some modern expositors, "be dislocated." So Ec. [ἵνα μὴ τὸ ἐναρχθῆν κακόν, τοῦτο γὰρ τὸ χωλόν, εἰς ἀνήκεστον ἔλθῃ, μᾶλλον δὲ διορθωθῇ], Thl. ἔτι προσπλάγητε καὶ ἐκτραπῶσιν οἱ πόδες ἡμῶν, τουτέστι παντελῶς στρεβλοὶ γίνονται], Schlichting, Grot., Wolf, Carpzov, Cramer, Michaelis, Ernesti, Schleusner, Heurichs, Bretschn., Klee, De Wette, Stuart, al. But against this there are two objections: 1. the common usage of the word; which [see Wetst. on 1 Tim. i. 6, and reff.] is, to be turned aside: and even in the place quoted from Galen by Carpzov to justify the other meaning, it far more likely has this one: τῆς ὑγιεινῆς ἔργου, τὸ κατὰ μικρὰ τὴν εἰς τὸ παρὰ φύσιν ἐκτροπήν [deviation] ἐπανορθοῦσθαι: 2. the μᾶλλον δέ, introducing the second clause, which seems to shew, that more is contained in the contrast than was in the member with which it was contrasted, and thus fully justifies the falling short in the meaning of ἐκτραπή from that of ἰαθῇ: q. d. 'should not be turned out of the way; nay rather than suffer any the least increase of its infirmity, should be healed of it.' It should be noticed that the Writer has still the image of a race before him. The making a beaten track for all is, that they may not miss the way and lose the prize). 14.] Follow peace with all (μετὰ πάντων belongs to εἰρήνην, not to the verb. Some have understood πάντων to refer not only to the brethren, but to unbelievers also. So Ec. [μεθ' ἑαυτῶν καὶ τῶν ἐπηρεαζόντων πολὺ γὰρ τὸ πλάτος τοῦ μετὰ πάντων], Thl. [οὐ μόνον πρὸς τοὺς οἰκείους, ἀλλὰ καὶ πρὸς τοὺς ἐχθροὺς εἰρηνεύειν παραινεῖ], Jac. Cappell., Grot., Calov., al., and Böhme, Lünem., al. But thus taken the exhortation would lose much of its proper force here. For it is introduced by a caution that the lame be not turned out of the way, and followed by taking heed that none fail of the grace of God: and between these two an exhortation to follow peace with all mankind would come in very flat and disjointed. It is clearly the brethren who are here meant by πάντων: and this is further shewn by the collocation of the words, which on the other view would more naturally be εἰρήνην μετὰ πάντων διώκετε.

The sentiment thus is the same as in Rom. xiv. 19, ἄρα οὖν τὰ τῆς εἰρήνης διώκωμεν, καὶ τὰ τῆς οἰκοδομῆς τῆς εἰς ἀλλήλους), and sanctification ("The connexion of καὶ τὸν ἁγιασμόν is much as in ver. 1; ch. xi. 58: the Writer uses the art., when he appends the particular to the general." Delitzsch. ἁγιασμός is not = ἀγιότης, but is the putting on of it and becoming ἅγιοι. Many Commentators, misled by the peculiar contextual reference of the word in 1 Thess. iv. 3, have restricted the meaning here to chastity. So Chrys. [τὸν ἁγιασμόν τί φησι; τὴν σωφροσύνην καὶ τὴν κοσμιότητα τὴν ἐν γάμῳ], Thdrt., Ec., Thl., Jer., Aug., and Jac. Cappell., Bengel, al. But the wider meaning, as a rule, must always be kept where the context does not require a narrower. And thus understood, the reference of it is well given by Limborch: "ne, dum paci studeat, nimis aliis obsequendi studio quidquam contra sanctimoniam Christianam delinquat"), without (apart from) which (χωρὶς seems to be put after its case for rhythm's sake. In Palm and Rost's art. on χωρὶς, this arrangement is quoted frequently from the poets and tragedians, but does not seem to occur often in prose) none shall see the Lord (whether κύριον is to be applied to Christ, or to the Father, is uncertain. The article determines nothing. ὁ κύριος is clearly the Father in ch. viii. 2: as clearly the Son in ch. ii. 3. But here it would seem that the Father is intended. For we know, Matt. xxiv. 30: Rev. i. 7, that every eye shall see the Son, even in His glory: whereas we have our Lord using, in an ethical sentence not much unlike this one, the expression αὐτοὶ τὸν θεὸν ὄψονται):

15.] looking well (ἐπισκοποῦντες, τουτέστιν, ἀκριβῶς ἐρευνῶντες, ἐπισκεπτόμενοι, καταμανθάνοντες, Chrys. τουτέστιν, ἀκριβῶς προσέχοντες καὶ ἐρευνῶντες, Ec. The word is found in Plato, e. g. Cratyl. 399 c, ὦν ὄρᾳ οὐδὲν ἐπισκοπεῖ, al.: in Xenophon, e. g. De Laced. Rep. 3. 1, ὁ βουλόμενος καὶ ταῦτα ἐπισκοπεῖσθω, al. freq.), lest any one falling short of the grace of God (on ὑστερέω, see on ch. iv. 1. It is here explained by Chrys., καθάπερ ὀδόν τινα μακρὰν ὀδεύόντων ἐν συνοδίᾳ πολλῆ, βλέπετε, φησί, μὴ τις ἀπέμεινεν: and so Thl. In that case ἀπό must mean 'far from' the grace of God, as the goal to which the journey is being made. But it is far more probably in its ordinary sense, and ἀπό as in refl., and as Ec.: μὴ τις εἴη ἀπολελειμμένος τῆς χάριτος τοῦ θεοῦ. The whole sentence is imitated from Deut. xxix. 18, μὴ τις ἐστὶν ἐν ὑμῖν ἀνήρ ἢ γυνὴ ἢ πατριὰ ἢ φυλὴ, τινὸς ἢ διάνοια ἐξέκλιεν ἀπὸ κυρίου τοῦ θεοῦ ὑμῶν, πορευθέντες λατρεύει τοῖς θεοῖς τῶν ἐθνῶν ἐκείνων μὴ τις ἐστὶν ἐν ὑμῖν ῥίζα ἄνω φύουσα ἐν χολῆ καὶ πικρία. And perhaps to this the ἀπό may be due, as Delitzsch suggests. But however this may be, the form of this sentence may certainly be inferred from observing that one. It is broken off at τοῦ θεοῦ in order to take up the second clause of that, μὴ τις ῥίζα κ.τ.λ. So that we need not understand ἦ after the participle here, as generally done, even by Thol. and Ebrard, but may pass on to the next clause, finding a common verb to both subjects in ἐνοχλῆ below. And so Heinrichs, Bleek, De Wette, Lünem., Delitzsch), lest any root of bitterness (not = ῥίζα πικρά, but πικρία is the origin and the ingrained character of the root, not its mere attribute. So Chrys. well, οὐκ εἶπε πικρά, ἀλλὰ, πικρίας τὴν μὲν γὰρ πικρὰν ῥίζαν ἐστὶ καρποῦς ἐνεγκεῖν γλυκεῖς, τὴν δὲ πικρίας ῥίζαν καὶ πηγὴν καὶ ὑπόθεσιν οὐκ ἐστὶ ποτὲ γλυκῶν ἐνεγκεῖν καρπῶν πάντα γὰρ ἐστὶ πικρά, οὐδὲν ἔχει ἡδύ, πάντα πικρά, πάντα ἀηδὴ, πάντα ἡμίους καὶ βδελυγμίας γέμοντα. And similarly Ec. and Thl. and several moderns) springing up (φύω intrans., see refl.) trouble you (it is remarkable that the LXX [see above] in Deut. 1. c. has not ἐνοχλῆ, but ἐν χολῆ, as the Heb.: and Delitzsch supposes that the Writer followed the sound of ἐν χολῆ and substituted for it ἐνοχλῆ: as in Jude 12 the ἀπάταις of 2 Pet. ii. 13 is changed into ἀγάπαις [or vice versa]. But this is hardly likely, especially when we find that the Alexandrine copy of the LXX, with which our Writer so often agrees, has ἐνοχλῆ. Delitzsch indeed supposes that this reading crept in after our Epistle was written : and strengthens his view by the superfluous and unintelligible και πικρία following the word in the alex. text. But clearly that is no reason : nor is it probable that such correction should have been only one of four which are found in the mss. in Holmes, the other three being εν οχλη, ενοχη, εν ω χολη. The fact of ενοχλείν, ref. Luke, οχλείν Acts v. 16, παρενοχλείν Acts xv. 19, being all in St. Luke, does not make for Delitzsch's view : all men [taking his hypothesis of the authorship by St. Luke] are more free in quoting sayings where their own favourite words occur), and by its means the many (the whole congregation : see Gal. v. 9 quoted below) be polluted (how ? by intercourse, by compromise, by over-persuasion, by imitation. The kind of pollution he explains in the next verse to arise from pollution and profanity. Thl. says, ο δε αλλαχου γράφει μικρά ζυμη όλον τδ φύραμα ζυμοί [Gal. v. 9], τοῦτο και ενταυθα φησι μη τις πονηρος εις λυμην πλειονων εινα συγχαρείσθω) : 16.] lest [there be] (this is a far more probable filling up of the construction, as an independent elliptic sentence, than to suppose it to furnish another subject to ενοχλη) any fornicator (to be taken literally, not as alluding to spiritual fornication, cf. Deut. xxxi. 16 : Exod. xxxiv. 15 f. : for as Del. observes, this sense is foreign to the N. T. except in the Apococalypse : and it is very unlikely that the Writer should have used a meaning lying so far from the context, and not suggested either by the passage of Deut. to which he was before alluding, or by the history of Esau which he is now introducing. Nearly connected with the question of the sense of πόρνος, is that of the punctuation : whether by a comma after it we are to sever it from connexion with Esau, or not. Most Commentators join it with what follows. So Thdrt., Schol.-Matthæi, Isidor.-pels., Primas., al., and explain it partly of the gluttony of Esau, partly of his having wedded strange women, partly by the character of a fornicator which is given him by later Jewish tradition : cf. numerous testimonies in Wetst. But others divide πόρνος from what follows. So Chrys., Joh. Damasc. [ενταυθα στίξαι δεί, ινα η τελεια διάνοια, και τδ επιφερόμενον και βέβηλος ως 'Ησαυ, cited in Wetst. var. readd.], Thl. [ου τουτου φησι, οτι πόρνος ην 'Ησαυ, αλλ' αχρισ αυτου στήσον, μη τις πόρνος εν υμίν ητω. ειτα υπ' αλλης αρχης ειπε μηδε βέβηλος ως 'Ησαυ κ.τ.λ.] : and so Calvin, Seb. Schmidt, Sykes, Cramer, Heinrichs, Bleek, De Wette, Bisping, Lünem. It seems hardly possible to decide. The character of Esau, from Scripture as well as tradition, will very well bear the designation πόρνος : and the balance of the sentence is better preserved by applying both to him, than by leaving πόρνος insulated. The objection, that the relative clause, ος αντι κ.τ.λ., applies only to βέβηλος, does not amount to much : for as Beugel remarks, "libido et intemperantia cibi affines." On the other hand Delitzsch's argument, that had πόρνος been intended to be separate, it would have stood μη τις πόρνος η, η κ.τ.λ., is not sound : for the ellipsis might just as well stand in both clauses, as in one. He notices that in Philo, Quæst. in Gen. xxvii. 11, lib. iv. § 201 Potter's Appendix, p. 404, "Pilosus intemperatus libidinosusque est" or profane person (τουτέστι, γαστρίμαργος, κοσμικός, τὰ πνευματικά βεβηλών και καταπατών, Thl. : a man of low views, who has no appreciation of any high or divine thing : ος την παρα του θεου τιμην ταύτην δια της οικειας ραθυμίας απεδото, και μικρας ηδονης χαριν την μεγιστην τιμην και δόξαν απάλεσε, Chrys.) as Esau, who for (on αντι, see on ver. 2) one meal sold (the use of αποδομαι, middle, for to sell, is common in good Greek) his own birthright ('rights of primogeniture' : τα προτοτόκια or -εία is the usual word in the LXX for the Heb. חַיְיָדָה or חַיְיָדָה עֶשָׂו, see Gen. xxv. 31—34 : 1 Chron. v. 1 : Deut. xxi. 17. The Greeks use for it η προσεια or τδ προσειον : Josephus has this last in this narrative, Antt. ii. 1. 1, and the LXX in Gen. xliii. 33. The reflexive ἑαυτοῦ, which must be read, may seem to be superfluous; but it serves to intensify the unworthiness of the act).

17.] For (the γὰρ gives a reason for the caution, from the terrible result in Esau's case) ye know (ἴστε is not imperative, as the vulg. [scitote] and Luther, but indicative. It was a fact of which no Hebrew could be ignorant) that when he afterward on his part (καί brings out this: he dishonoured his inheritance, but was in his turn rejected from the blessing) wished to inherit (see on this wide sense of κληρονομέω, ch. i. 4) the blessing, he was rejected (some supply παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ, some παρὰ τοῦ πατρός. But there is no reason why both should not be joined. His father's blessing was God's blessing; his father's rejection was God's rejection. And so Thl., ἡ . . . παρ' ἀμφοτέρων δῆλον γὰρ ὅτι καὶ ὁ πατήρ κατὰ θεὸν ἀπεδοκίμασεν αὐτόν); for he found not place of repentance (whose repentance—his own, or his father's?) The former is held by all the Greek expositors: by Luther, Calvin, Zeger, Grot., Bengel, De Wette, Bleek, Hofmann, Delitzsch, al. The latter, by Beza, Jac. Cappell., Schlichting, Raphel, Wolf, Carpzov, Tholuck, Ebrard, Stuart, Lünem., and most moderns except those named above. But the former I believe to be the only admissible sense. It is no mean argument for it, that the Fathers thought not of the other, though it would have been so useful to them in the Novatian controversy. Theodore of Mops. [Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. lxx. p. 968], though he wrests the passage from those who wished τὴν μετάνοιαν ἀνελεῖν, never hints at any other meaning. And his explanation is surely the right one: οὐχὶ συγχωρήσεως ἁμαρτημάτων μετανοήσας οὐκ ἔτυχεν ἐκεῖνος, οὐ γὰρ τοῦτο ἦται τότε, ἀλλ' εὐλογίαν, ἣν κατὰ τὴν ἄξιαν τοῦ τρόπου τῷ ἀδελφῷ δοθεῖσαν ἀφαιρεθῆναι αὐθις οὐδαμῶς οἶόν τε ἦν καὶ δοθῆναι αὐτῷ πάλιν. It would surely be a most unnatural use of the phrase μετάνοιαν τόπον εὔρεν [cf. ref. Wisd., κρίνων δὲ κατὰ βραχὺ ἐδίδους τόπον μετανοίας: Clem.-rom. ad Corinth. 7, p. 225, μετάνοιαν τόπον ἔδωκεν ὁ δεσπότης τοῖς βουλομένοις ἐπιστραφῆναι ἐπ' αὐτόν: Liv. xlv. 10, "penitentiae relinquens locum:" Plin. Ep. x. 97. 10, "ex quo facile est opinari, quae turba hominum emendari possit, si sit penitentiae locus:" and other examples in Bleek], to understand by μετάνοιαν, repentance not in the subject of εὔρεν, but in some one else. And thus referred to Esau himself, it will mean much as Thdr.-mops. above, that he found no way open to reverse what had been done, by repentance: the sin had been committed and the consequence entailed, irrevocably. He might change, but the penalty could not, from the very nature of the circumstances, be taken off. So that μετάνοια, in its full sense, had no τόπος. And such is the meaning of the 'locus penitentiae,' wherever occurring. We do not mean by it an opportunity to repent in a man's own bosom, to be sorry for what he has done, for this may be under any circumstances, and this might have been with Esau: but we mean, a chance, by repenting, to repair. So when a condemned criminal has a 'locus penitentiae' allowed him, we do not mean that he may die penitent, but that he is relieved. I see not how else to understand this, and what follows: and thus understood nothing can be plainer), although he earnestly sought (reff.) it (what? not εὐλογίαν, as Thl., τινές in Eccl., Calvin, Bengel, C. F. Schmid, Bleek, and even Delitzsch: for this would be, as Ebrard characterizes it, most unnatural, εὐλογίαν being separated from αὐτήν by a whole intervening clause, which will not bear parenthesizing, because ἐκζητήσας immediately takes up εὔρεν—he found it not, though he sought it. Regarding μετάνοιαν then as the only admissible antecedent for αὐτήν, the explanation will be very simple. μετάνοιαν τόπος is, in fact, μετάνοια. He found no place for μετάνοια: if he had found one, μετάνοια would have been secured: this was what he sought. So, when μετάνοιαν τόπον is taken up again, the mere secondary τόπος disappears, and it is αὐτήν, not αὐτόν, agreeing with the great thing really sought. This as against the arguments alleged in Delitzsch, al., who taking μετάνοια merely subjectively, maintain that it was not what Esau sought) with tears (Gen. xxvii. 38. It is obvious, that our passage, rightly understood, cannot by any means favour the exclusion of any sinner from repentance. In Esau's case the μετάνοιαν τόπος [see above] was closed, by circumstances themselves: the blessing had been given and could not be recalled. And this is our warning. It may be so, in many cases, with us. That it is always so, is not even hinted: but warning is given us that a path is not safe where even such a possibility may be encountered. See Prov. i. 24—32).

18—29.] Connected with what has preceded by γὰρ. Take heed that there be not such (as in vv. 15, 16) among you: for (not only have we the solemn warning of Esau, but) we are not under the law with its terrors, but under the gospel with its promises,—hearing one who speaks for the last time, who speaks from heaven—and receiving a kingdom which shall not be moved.

18.] For (see above) ye have not drawn near to ('in your approaching unto God [reff.], it has not been to, &c.' The E. V. "ye are not come unto" omits the approach to God implied in προσέρχεσθαι) that which was being touched (understand ὄρει, which is expressed below with Σιών, and hence has come in as a gloss here. From the seeming difficulty of this, and from all who omit ὄρει here having taken the two dative participles as agreeing with πυρί, and in consequence giving no adequate sense, many even of our critical editors and expositors have here forsaken the testimony of antiquity, and inserted the ὄρει. But if we suppose Σιών ὄρος to have been before the Writer's mind from the first, there is no difficulty in his deferring the ὄρος so long.

ψηλαφωμένῳ has been variously interpreted. Some, as Schöttgen, Kypke, Bengel, al., and Bretschneider, and even Palm and Rost, Lex., understand it, "touched by the fire of God," cf. Ps. ciii. 32, ὁ ἀπτόμενος τῶν ὀρέων καὶ καπνίζονται. But this seems hardly consistent with the present part., nor indeed at all with the sense of the word itself, which is to touch by feeling about, as a blind man does, contracto, palpo—Isa. lix. 10, ψηλαφήσουσιν ὡς τυφλοὶ τοίχων: Gen. xxvii. 12, μήποτε ψηλαφήσῃ με ὁ πατήρ: ib. 21, 22: Judg. xvi. 26, ἄφες με καὶ ψηλαφήσω τοὺς κίονας: Deut.

xxviii. 29, καὶ ἔση ψηλαφῶν μεσημβρίας, ὥσει τις ψηλαφήσαι τυφλὸς ἐν τῷ σκότει: Job v. 14, τὸ δὲ μεσημβρινὸν ψηλαφήσασαν ἴσα νυκτί: xii. 25, ψηλαφήσασαν σκότος καὶ μὴ φῶς: Exod. x. 21, γεννηθήτω σκότος . . . φηλαφητὸν σκότος. And this sense will I believe fit our passage very well. Mount Sinai was a material mountain, which not only might be touched,—as many [Knapp, Böhme, Bleek, De Wette, Tholuck, Ebrard, Bisping, al.], identifying ψηλαφώμενον with ψηλαφητόν,—but was being touched, would have been touched by the people had it not been forbidden. So that the part. pres. [or imperf.] is in that peculiar sense of incompleteness in which we so often find the imperf. itself, inviting after it an εἰ μή in Greek, or a 'ni' in Latin. Unless we bear this in mind, we are open to the objection that, while it was forbidden to be touched, it yet was touched. The other objection, brought by Delitzsch, that the Writer mentions this fact of touching below in other terms, with θιγγάνειν, is readily answered, that he is there using the very words of the prohibition in Exodus, whereas here he is giving scope to the graphic and rhetorical style of the passage. For the whole, cf. Exod. xix. 12, 13, where οὐχ ἄψεται αὐτοῦ χεῖρ and which was burnt with fire (cf. the same expression in reff. Deut., where nearly the same words, σκότος, γνόφος, θέλλα, following, put it beyond all doubt that πυρί is used here ablatively, not as a dative with κεκαυμένῳ, as Erasm., Calv., Beza, Bengel, Knapp, and more recently Delitzsch. [Such a connexion is perfectly allowable, against Ebrard, who ventures here one of his rash assertions: "κεκαυμένῳ cannot be an attribute of πυρί: for to designate a fire as 'a burning fire' would be superfluous, unless a burning fire is to be contrasted with a painted fire, which is not the case here."] And this in the face of πῦρ διαπαντός καυθήσεται ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον, Levit. vi. 13: see numerous other examples in Bleek.] The perfect participle, in either case, is somewhat startling. The present would

This form, which is blamed by Thomas Magister, is very commonly used by the classics. When Delitzsch states that it is the only form known to common Greek, he is as wrong the other way: see Aristoph. Av. 215: Plato, Rep. vii. p. 435: Herod. ix. 34: Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 53: Pind. Ol. 14. 29. Cf. Palm and Rost's Lex.) and the voice of words (ref.), 19.] which they who heard (ἧς, referring to φωνή, is governed by ἀκούσαντες, not as Storr, by λόγον) entreated (παραιτίσθαι τι = αἰτεῖσθαι τι παρά τιος, in all senses, but more usually in the deprecatory sense. Hence simply to deprecate [Thuc. v. 63, ὁ δὲ παρητέτο, μηδὲν τούτων δρᾶν]: hence further, to refuse or forbid, as in Acts xxv. 11, and even more directly in ver. 25 below) that (more) discourse should not be added to them (αὐτοῖς might agree with τοῖς βήμασι, but much more probably agrees with τοῖς ἀκούσασιν, from the form of construction in Deut. i. c., where they say that they should die, εἰάν προσθώμεθα ἡμεῖς ἀκοῦσαι [A, προσθώμεν ἀκοῦσαι ἡμεῖς] τὴν φωνὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν ἔτι. Calvin explains the sense, "Cæterum quod dicit populum excusasse, non ita debet accipi quasi populus renuerit audire Dei verba, sed deprecatus est, ne Deum ipsum loquentem audire cogeretur. Persona enim Mosis interposita horrorem non nihil mitigabat"): 20, 21.] Par-

And so Schlichting. But this would be exceedingly harsh, and finds no justification in the reason assigned by Schlichting, viz. that thus "sequentia verba tanquam per se posita, ad exaggerandum magis spectaculi illius terrorem pertinerebunt." It is manifest, from the retention of the future λιθοβοληθήσεται, that the words are a citation, and this clause the introduction of it. But among those who agree thus far, there is another wide difference about the voice of the participle, as to whether διαστελλόμενον is middle or passive. Storr, Heinrichs, Schulz, Delitzsch, take it middle, in an active sense, "that which ordered:" viz. the divine voice. But surely this is, if admissible grammatically [see Mark vii. 36 and viii. 15, where only διστέλλετο is found, all the other cases having the 1 aor. διαστείλασθαι, which stands on its own ground], yet contextually most improbable: 1. that God, or the voice of God, should be thus described by a neuter part.: 2. that with τὸ φανταζόμενον just below, in strict parallelism, τὸ διαστελλόμενον should signify any thing but that which was commanded), Even if a beast (much more if a man) touch the mountain, it shall be stoned (an abbreviation of Exod. xix. 12, 13, καὶ ἀφοριεῖς τὸν λαὸν κύκλω, λέγων, Προσέχεπε ἑαυτοῖς τοῦ ἀναβῆναι εἰς τὸ ὄρος καὶ θιεῖν τι αὐτοῦ· πᾶς δ' ἀψάμενος τοῦ ὄρους θανάτῳ τελευτήσεται. οὐκ ἄψεται αὐτοῦ χεῖρ· ἐν γὰρ λίθοις λιθοβοληθήσεται ἡ βολιδι κατατοξευθήσεται: ἐάν τε κτηῆνος ἐάν τε ἄνθρωπος, οὐ ζήσεται):

Mill, Bengel, Michaelis, and Lachmann. And thus, as Bl. well observes, should we have punctuated in an Epistle of St. Paul, who is full of these broken constructions. But nothing can be more different than the style of this Epistle, which is weighed and rhetorically balanced with constant care. There can be little doubt in any who take this style into account, that the punctuation which began with Beza is right, viz. the setting a comma at καί, and regarding οὕτως φοβ. ἦν τὸ φαντ. as a parenthesis. καί must not, with Carpzov, Cramer, al., be taken for “even,” for thus we should have an asyndeton: and it is too far separated from Μωυσῆς),—so fearful was that which was revealed (which appeared to them as a vision of the glory and majesty of Jehovah: φανταζόμενον δ’ εἶπεν, ἐπειδὴ οὐκ αὐτὸν ἐώραν τὸν τῶν δλων θεόν, ἀλλὰ τινα φαντασίαν τῆς θείας ἐπιφανείας, Thdrt.),—Moses said, I am in great terror and in trembling (no such saying of Moses at this time is to be found in the sacred narrative. In ref. Deut. he says, καὶ ἐκφοβὸς εἶμι, which εἶμι should be ἤμην, and refers to the time when Moses went up to the mount after he had broken the tables. Our Writer probably transfers these words from that time to this, indicative of the terror which Moses felt at the divine presence on Sinai. Some have supposed that the saying is taken from some tradition: but none has been found to justify the idea. Others, as Calvin, suppose that “hæc communis totius populi querimonia; sed Moses inducitur, qui fuit veluti commune os omnium.” But if so, where would be any climax, as there manifestly is in this verse?): 22—24.] Contrast to the above negation, in setting forth that to which they are come. There is apparently no studied logical order in the following clauses: and Bl. supposes there must have been some ancient inversion of them in our copies, seeing that πνεύμασι δικαίων τετελειωμένων would most naturally follow after μυριάσι ἀγγέλων. But see on the several clauses, and the general concluding note.

22.] but ye have drawn near (both congregations drew near, cf. Deut. iv. 11, καὶ προσήλθετε καὶ ἔστητε ὑπὸ τὸ ὄρος: the difference is in that, to which. So that Chrys. misses the mark, when he says, ἐκείνοι οὐ προσήλθον, ἀλλὰ πόρρωθεν εἰστήκεισαν, καὶ ὁ Μωυσῆς ὑμεῖς δὲ προσελήλυθατε: and Thl., when he adds, ὄρας τὴν ὑπεροχὴν) to Mount Zion (here at length ὄρει is expressed: see above. Böhme and Kuinoel would take the following ἐπουρανίῳ as an epithet belonging to all three, ὄρει, πόλει, and Ἱερουσαλήμ: and so apparently did Ec.: ἀντὶ τοῦ Σινᾶ ὄρους, φησί, ἐνταῦθά ἐστιν, ὁ οὐρανός τοῦτον γὰρ καλεῖ Σιών ὄρος καὶ Ἱερουσαλήμ. ὅθεν ἐπάγει ἐπουρανίῳ. But the form of the sentence will not allow this. Mount Zion, the abode of God which He loved and where He will abide continually, is used to signify, not its mere representative, which men know by that name, but the reality, God’s own abode in heaven. See Ps. lxxviii. 68; cx. 2; cxxxii. 13 ff.: Isa. ii. 2 f.; xxviii. 16: Joel ii. 32: Micah iv. 1 f.: Obad. 17 al. And so Thl., ἀντὶ τοῦ Σινᾶ ἔχομεν Σιών ὄρος νοητὸν καὶ πόλιν νοητὴν Ἱερουσαλήμ, τουτέστιν αὐτὸν τὸν οὐρανόν. See Delitzsch’s long note) and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem (as the earthly Jerusalem, situate on Mount Zion, was the πόλις τοῦ μεγάλου βασιλείως, Matt. v. 35, so in a more blessed sense is that heavenly city the city of the living God. He is its maker and builder, ch. xi. 10: nor only so, but also evermore dwells in it with the light of His presence, cf. Rev. xxi. 22—24):

23.] Before rendering this verse, the difficult question of its punctuation must be dealt with. I extract in substance Delitzsch’s note. The following varieties are possible, and occur, not only as proposed by Commentators, but as set down in mss. and editions:—

III. καὶ μυριάσιν, ἀγγέλων πανηγύρει καὶ . . .

According to I., which is found in most uncial MSS., &c., and is adopted by Erasmus, and by Tischendorf, the inner relation of the words of which the clause consists is left uncertain: all is undefined, for we punctuate as if it were καὶ μυριάων as in D¹, or as it might certainly be, καὶ μυριάδων ἀγγέλων πανηγύρει. This inaccuracy precludes both I. a (Griesbach, Knapp, Seb. Schmidt, Wolf, Böhm, Kuinoel, Tholuck), as making μυριάσιν in apposition with ἀγγέλων πανηγύρει, —and I. b (Ec. [πανηγύρει ἐν μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων ὑπερεχοῦσῃ], Thl. [ἡ πανήγυρις οὖν αὐτῇ ἐν μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων συνίσταται], Syr. ["ad cœtus myriadum angelorum"] D-lat. ["et multitudinem angelorum frequentem"], Ambr. [below], Jerome ["et multorum millium angelorum frequentiam"]: E. V. ["to an innumerable company of angels"], and so in A, C, and many cursive mss.), which makes πανηγύρει in apposition with μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων. The former of these two has nothing against it except that one cannot see any reason for μυριάσιν standing first so isolated: the latter is condemned by the unmeaning πανηγύρει lagging at the end. According to II. (Elzev., Beza, Jo. Gregor., Matthæi: also Calov., Kypke, Carizon, Cramer, Baumgarten, Storr, De Wette [transl. 2nd edn.]), a new clause begins with πανηγύρει καὶ ἐκκλησία: for which arrangement Lünemann and Hofmann have decided, the former remarking, that πανήγυρις assembles the company of the firstborn in feast and jubilee, while ἐκκλησία binds them together in unity; the latter, that πανήγυρις and ἐκκλησία answer to the Heb. קָהָל and עֵבֶר, the one denoting an assembly for worship, the other an assembly politically ordered. But it is difficult to see why the coupling of clause to clause by καὶ, which prevails through the sentence, should thus be broken through: and while the former of these Hebrew words is only once (ref. Amos) rendered πανήγυρις by the LXX, the two words never occur together in the O. T. We have then left III. (Bengel, C. F. Schmid, Ernesti, Schulz, Vater, Lachm., De Wette [transl. 3rd edn.], Theile), for which Bleek also decides, remarking rightly, that only on this view is the beginning of the sentence by the simple word μυριάσιν explained. The Writer begins with it, in order afterwards to say per partes of what these myriads consist, as in the O. T. also we read of מִלְיוֹת both of angels, ref. Deut., and of the congregation, Num. x. 36. πανήγυρις is the complete, multitudinous, above all, jubilant, festal and blissful assembly: thus Ambrose renders "et decem millibus lætantium angelorum," and Aug. "exultantium." Adopting then this arrangement, the verse will stand,—and to myriads (reff.: commonly used of the angelic company surrounding Jehovah), the festal host of angels and the assembly of the firstborn which are written in heaven (who are these? Why are they put with the angels? Why does the Writer place κριτῆ θεῷ πάντων between the assembly of the firstborn and the spirits of just men made perfect? These, says Delitzsch, are three closely connected questions, and among the very hardest in our Epistle. The answers to them are very various. Many understand them of the first-fruits of the Christian church [ἀπαρχή, Rev. xiv. 4: see also 2 Thess. ii. 13 v. r.]: so De Wette, "those who are fallen asleep in the faith of Christ, and possibly also glorified by martyrdom, who have entered earlier than others, as it were the firstborn, into blissful union with God and Christ." As Del. observes, if we hold them to be martyrs, the following words, καὶ κριτῆ θεῷ πάντων, might have a certain propriety from Rev. vi. 9 f., where the souls of the martyrs under the altar cry, ἕως πότε . . . οὐ κρίνεις καὶ ἐκδικεῖς τὸ αἷμα ἡμῶν ἐκ τῶν κατοικούντων ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς; But this view seems altogether to fail when we attempt to explain by it ἀπογεγραμμένων ἐν οὐρανοῖς. Those of whom our Lord says, Luke x. 20, χαίrete ὅτι τὰ ὄνόματα ὑμῶν ἐγγέγραπται ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, are yet living on earth. According to St. Luke's manner of speaking, the firstborn are hereby designated as enrolled [see reff. Luke] in the heavenly roll: and Scripture usage seems to demand that we consider one thus described, as not yet in possession of everlasting life in the fullest sense, but as destined so life [cf. Isa. iv. 3: Acts xiii. 48]. This would forbid us from thinking of the 141,000 whom St. John saw with the Lamb on the heavenly Zion, who bore on their foreheads the name of the Lamb and of the Father. For this sealing was among the insignia of their eternal glorification: whereas the being enrolled in the book of life is the token to us, while here below, of our heavenly citizenship, and seems to lose all its significance, as soon as we have entered the heavenly city and need no assurance of our citizenship either for ourselves or for others. So that though we are tempted, both by the fact of their being classed with the angels, and by their being πρωτότοκοι [cf. ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀπαρχῆ, Rev. xiv. 4], to identify these with the χιλιάδες seen by St. John, we must give up the parallel, these ἀπογεγραμμένοι ἐν οὐρανοῖς being not yet citizens of heaven who have taken up their full citizenship by passing through death, but persons to whom their citizenship is assured, they being as yet here below. Add to which, that they are distinguished from the spirits of just men made perfect, by the term ἐκκλησία: and that it would be difficult or rather impossible, on this hypothesis, to give any account of the sense or arrangement of the two following clauses. Just as inadmissible is it, or even more so, to understand, with Lünem., by the πρωτότοκοι the patriarchs and saints of the O. T., and then by πνεύμασι δικαίων τετελ., not, as De W., the O. T. but the N. T. saints. So that, to say nothing of other varieties of interpretation not worth mentioning, there is no way left but to see, in the ἐκκλησία πρωτοτόκων ἐν οὐρανοῖς ἀπογεγραμμένων, THE CHURCH BELOW. And this view, far from being a last refuge, is justified by every consideration. For, 1. thus ἐκκλησία is explained, which every where when used of men and not of angels, Ps. lxxxviii. 5, designates the assembly of saints on earth: 2. the adjunct ἀπογεγρ. ἐν οὐρ. is accounted for, indicating as it does the heavenly charter of the church below, the invisible side of their sonship and citizenship (cf. 1 John iii. 2), with which in this description of heaven we are mainly concerned: 3. we get an explanation of the choice of the term πρωτοτόκων to describe Christian believers. The Writer having given the warning example of Esau, who for a morsel of meat sold his birthright, has prepared the way for such a designation, while at the same time, as Knapp rightly remarks, the long sentence beginning at ver. 18 aims at this, "ut Christiani contra ἀπιστίαν muniantur et bona sua [τὰ πρωτοτόκια αὐτῶν] nosse discant." There is no distinction between firstborn and later-born Christians, but, as Hofmann also acknowledges, all Christians as such are called πρωτότοκοι because of their heritorship of the heavenly inheritance. We may also remark that thus the analogy with the firstborn of Israel is completely fulfilled. They were dedicated to God specially as his priests [Exod. xiii. 1, 2, 11—15], and royal succession was in the firstborn: so that in πρωτότοκοι we have that which St. John says: ἐποίησεν ἡμᾶς βασιλείαν, ἱερεῖς τῷ θεῷ καὶ πατρὶ αὐτοῦ. This primogeniture, which belonged to Israel as such [Exod. iv. 22], belongs to Christians as such, and to every one of them: they are enrolled not merely in an earthly register, cf. Num. iii. 42, but in the book of life in heaven. We also thus, 4. obtain an explanation of the juxtaposition in the sentence of the myriads of angels and the myriads of the firstborn: the key to it being found in ch. i. 14, where God is said to have apportioned the angels as λειτουργικὰ πνεύματα to minister to the heirs of salvation. Thus we have the heavenly spirits and the firstborn whose names are in heaven, the jubilant choir above and the militant church below, ranged together. But, 5. we also get, what we find on no other hypothesis, an explanation of the sequence of κριτῆ θεῶ πάντων οἱ ἐκκλησία πρωτοτόκων, and of that of πνεύμασιν δικαίων τετελειωμένων οἱ κριτῆ θεῶ πάντων. The key to the words is in ch. x. 30, κύριος κρινεῖ τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ. The church militant here below brings to mind those enemies and persecutors, for deliverance and righting from whom she looks to the righteous judgment of God. And he who is in fellowship [1 John i. 7] with the great Judge has no judgment to fear, but is δεδικαιωμένος; thereby leading on to the πνεύμασιν δικαίων τετελειωμένων which follows. Thus, according to Delitzsch's note, which in the main I have here followed, the connexion between the clauses is established, and the arrangement justified: and I own this interpretation seems to me the only one which in any way fulfils those requirements. tions may be seen in Bleek and Lünemann. There is a monograph by Mosheim, De Ecclesia Primogenitorum in Cælo adscriptorum ex Hebr. xii., Helmst. 1733, which I have not seen. He takes them, in common with Bleek, De W., al., as the first converts to Christianity already entered into glory. Estius most nearly approaches the interpretation given above. His whole note is very good; the conclusion especially so: "Sensus igitur hujus partis est: aggregati estis et adscripti in societatem eorum qui præ cæteris mortalibus electi sunt a Deo et ab aliis separati, tanquam primogeniti, et in cælis, tanquam beatitudinis cælestis hæredes, conscripti. Hæc vero dicens significat et ipsos esse primogenitos et conscriptos in cælis", and to God the judge of all (not, as many moderns,—Erasm. [annot. appy.], Hermann de Wall, Bengel, Wetst., Cramer, Michaelis, C. F. Schmid, Storr, Knapp, Dindorf, Vater, Paulus, De Wette, Bleek, Stuart, Lünem., Delitzsch,—"to the [a] judge, the God of all." For, 1. the order of the words in the clause is the natural one where a predicate is brought out into prominence for any reason, whether to be affirmed, or made the subject of attention: cf., for the first, 1 Thess. iv. 6, διότι ἔκδικος κύριος περὶ πάντων τούτων, and for the second James i. 5, παρὰ τοῦ διδόντος θεοῦ πᾶσιν: 2. all the Greek expositors, and the ancients without exception, took the words so, e. g. as Thl., πάντων γὰρ, οὐχὶ Ἰουδαίων μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ πιστῶν ἔστι κριτῆς: 3. if they meant, "to a judge, the God of all," surely they would have been otherwise expressed,—κριτῆ [τῶν] πάντων θεῶ or the like: 4. thus only, by uplifting the universal right judgment of God, does the clause fit the context, coming between the mention of the elect, written in heaven, and the spirits of the just, shewing that the ἀπογραφὴ is no arbitrary selection,—the δικαίωσις no unreasonableness procedure. It is not improbable that the Writer may have had in view Abraham's question Gen. xviii. 25, "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" I only stop to protest, even for those who adopt the θεῶ πάντων view, against the idea of Delitzsch, al., that πάντων is neuter. God could not be said to be θεὸς πάντων in the neuter sense of πάντα. He is ὁ ἐπὶ πάντων θεός, Rom. ix. 5, which is widely different: δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα καὶ δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα, ch. ii. 10, which again is widely different: He is θεὸς τῶν πνευμάτων καὶ πάσης σαρκός: but He is not θεὸς τοῦ κόσμου, nor θεὸς τῶν πάντων [neut.]. He is God of πάντες, but not of πάντα; the God not of the dead, but of the living. Primas., Eccl., Thl., Faber Stap., Braun understand this of Christ: but it is a characteristic of this Epistle that all judgment is formally, and in words, referred to God the Father: see ch. iv. 11 f.; x. 30 f.; ver. 29; ch. xiii. 4), and to the spirits of just men who have been perfected (i. e. the whole number of the just who have passed into their rest, from righteous Abel downwards; not yet δικαίως τετελειωμένοι, because they are as yet disembodied and awaiting the resurrection, but πνεύμασιν δικαίως τετελειωμένων. This τελεῖωσις has been through sufferings, through trials, through running and having ended their race. All is accomplished, their probation, their righteousness, God's purposes respecting them. They are not sleeping, they are not unconscious, they are not absent from us: they are perfected, lacking nothing, except, and that is our defect because we are as yet imprisoned in an unspiritual body, communion with us: their spirits are perfect, and therefore not suspended from the spirit life, but waiting only for bodily perfection also. The exposition of this clause has been much disturbed by the mistaken views taken of the former ones. It has been variously explained; of the N. T. saints only [Grot., Mosh., Bengel, Sykes, Baungarten, C. F. Schmid, Storr, al.], of the O. T. saints [Corn. a-Lap., Schlicht., Wolf, Schulz, Bleek, De W., Ebrard]. It is understood as above by Knapp, Böhme, Tholuck, Bisping, Delitzsch. The Greek expositors also give it a general reference: e. g. Thl., τουτέστι, ταῖς ψυχαῖς τῶν εὐδοκίμησάντων καὶ τελείων φανέντων παρὰ θεῶ, διὰ πίστεως δηλαδή, ὡς ἀπέδειξεν. This perfection of the just is the result of the [anticipated] just judgment of God, and thus aptly follows κριτῆ θεῶ πάντων), 24.] and to the mediator of the latter covenant (νέας, not = καινῆς. νέος is recens: καινός, novus; νέος, the more objective word, καινός, the more subjective. But this must not be taken exclusively. νέος carries with it the freshness of youth, and is the livelier, more graphic word. See reff., esp. Col. τετελειωμένοι at once introduces that of Him who was Himself τετελειωμένος, ch. ii. 10, and who is the τελειωτῆς τῆς πίστεως, ver. 2. Cf. ch. vii. 22. Our Writer especially loves to use the name JESUS. To Christ, all that is predicated of our Lord belonged officially: but when it is predicated of Jesus, it becomes personal fact, realized in one whom we know and who loves us. That Christ is the mediator of the new covenant, is a theological truth: that Jesus is, is a glorious token of God's love manifested to us men), and to the blood of sprinkling (naturally following on the mention of διαθήκη, for no διαθήκη is consecrated without blood, ch. ix. 18, 22. And if Moses had blood wherewith to sprinkle the people, much more Jesus, of whom Moses was a shadow. And therefore the Writer, enumerating the great differences of our Sion from their Sinai, though he has not recounted their blood of sprinkling, as not being worthy of mention in the face of the terrors of God's law, mentions ours, by which we were redeemed unto God, and assigns it a place in the heavenly city, next to, but separate from, Jesus Himself in His glorified state. If we come to enquire how this can be, we enter on an interesting but high and difficult subject, on which learned and holy men have been much divided. Our Lord's Blood was shed from Him on the Cross. And as His Body did not see corruption, it is obvious to suppose, that His Blood did not corrupt as that of ordinary men, being as it is so important a portion of the body. Hence, and because His resurrection Body seems to have been bloodless,—see Luke xxiv. 39: John xx. 27, and notes,—some have supposed that the Blood of the Lord remains, as it was poured out, incorruptible, in the presence of God. On such a matter I would neither affirm nor deny, but mention, with all reverence, that which seems to suit the requirements of the words before us. By that Blood we live, wherever it is: but as here it is mentioned separately from the Lord Himself, as an item in the glories of the heavenly city, and as “yet speaking,” it seems to require some such view to account for the words used. Bengel has here a long excursus on the point, in which he takes strongly the above view. Chrys. also seems to have done so, Hom. xxxiii. on Heb. xiii., vol. xii. p. 229, where the text is in some confusion, but Mutianus seems to have expressed the sense [p. 447]: “Foris quippe passus est, sed ad cœlum sanguis sublatus est” [eis τὸν οὐρανὸν τὸ αἷμα ἀννέχθη]. The blood of Christ is called αἷμα ῥαντισμοῦ, inasmuch as, like that sacrificial blood of old materially, it is spiritually sprinkled on the conscience of those who come unto God by Him, cf. ch. ix. 13 ff.; x. 22; xiii. 12) speaking better (κρείττον adverbially: as in 1 Cor. vii. 38, κρέισσον ποιῶν is opposed to καλῶς ποιῶν. And the adverb refers not to the manner of the speaking [as Thdrt., διὰ τῶν πραγμάτων φεγγόμενον: Chrys., τοῦτο γὰρ πάντας ἐκάθηρε, καὶ φωνὴν ἀφίησι λαμπροτέρα καὶ εὐσημοτέρα, ὅσῳ μείζονα τὴν μαρτυρίαν ἔχει τὴν διὰ τῶν πραγμάτων: and Schol.-Matthæi, τὸ μὲν γὰρ τοῦ Ἄβελ ἄδεται μόνον, τοῦτο δὲ ἐνεργεῖ τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων σωτηρίαν. This accords with their understanding of λαλεῖ above in ch. xi. 4], but to the matter spoken. So, after Cyr.-alex. de Adorat. in Spir., and ver. xv., vol. i. p. 528, (Ec., τὸ μὲν γὰρ Ἄβελ αἷμα κατακεκράγει τοῦ φωνεοῦ, τὸ δὲ χριστοῦ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν λαλεῖ πρὸς τὸν πατέρα: “ille flagitabat ultionem, hic impetrat remissionem,” Erasm. [par.]. And so most later Commentators. Delitzsch unites both views) than Abel (not, “than that of Abel:” for in ch. xi. 4, it is Abel himself who speaks, in his blood: see note there). 25.] This voice of the blood of sprinkling, just mentioned, leads naturally to the caution not to despise that voice, nor put it by as they of old did the φωνὴ ῥημάτων from Sinai. Take heed (more forcible without any inferential particle such as οὐ) that ye decline not (see above on ver. 19) him that speaketh (i. e. God in Christ, see below). For if they did not escape (how? in one of two senses: either, 1. they did not escape hearing the voice on account of this their παραίτησις: or, 2., which seems more probable, they did not escape God's vengeance in punishment: the Writer taking this their παραίτησις of the divine voice as a sort of sample of their disobedient and unbelieving spirit), declining as they did (not 'who declined,' οἱ παραιτ.) him who spoke (χρηματίζειν, see on ch. viii. 5, of an oracular command given by the Deity: and here the χρηματίζων is God, see below) on earth (on Mount Sinai. The construction is a trajection not unusual with our Writer: cf. ch. ix. 15, 16, and ver. 11), much more we [shall not escape], who are turning away from (ἀποστρεφόμενοι, 'aversantes:'), so we have an accusative after ἐκστῆναι, ὑπεκστῆναι, ὑπεκτρέπασθαι, ἐκτρέπεσθαι, ἀφίστασθαι, &c. See Kühner, § 551, Anm. 3. Cf. ἐξαναχωρεῖν τὰ εἰρημένα, Thuc. iv. 28) him (who χρηματίζει) from [the] heavens (we now come to the somewhat difficult question, the answer to which we have taken for granted in the rendering of this verse: viz. who are intended by the various objects, τὸν λαλοῦντα, τὸν ἐπὶ γῆς χρηματίζοντα, τὸν ἀπ' οὐρανῶν. Let us take the second of these first, as furnishing the key to the others. τίνα λέγει; [says Chrys.] ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ, Μωυσῆν. And so Ec., Carpov, al. But this cannot well be. For παραιτησάμενοι manifestly refers back to ver. 19: where it was not Moses, but God, whom they παρητήσαντο. It must be laid down then as certain, that ὁ ἐπὶ γῆς χρηματίζων is God. Then if so, who is ὁ ἀπ' οὐρανῶν, or in other words who is ὁ λαλῶν, for these two are manifestly the same? Clearly, not Jesus: for by οὐ ἢ φωνή, which follows, the voice of this same speaker shook the earth at the giving of the law: and it can by no ingenuity be pretended, that the terrors of the law proceeded from the Son of God; especially in the face of the contrast drawn here, and in ch. ii. 2 ff. And it would be against all accuracy and decorum in divine things, to pass from the speaking of the God of Israel to that of our Lord Jesus Christ in the way of climax as is here done, with πολὺν μάλλον, 'much more shall we not escape.' Add to which, that, if Christ is to be understood as the subject of vv. 26 ff., we shall have Him uttering the prophetic words εἶτι ἀπαξ κ.τ.λ., whereas both from our Writer's habit of quoting prophecy [cf. ch. i. 1; iv. 7; vi. 13; viii. 8; xi. 11]

and from the context of the prophecy itself, they must be attributed to the Father. How then are these difficulties to be got over? Simply by taking as above, the speaker in both cases to be GOD: in the first, as speaking from Mount Sinai by His Angels: in the second, as speaking from His heavenly throne through His exalted Son. Thus it is true we lie open to one objection, viz. that the giving of the law is ever regarded in the O. T. as a speaking from heaven: so Exod. xx. 22, ὑμεῖς ἐωράκατε, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ λελάληκα ὑμῖν: cf. Deut. iv. 36: Neh. ix. 13. But this objection, though at first sight weighty, is by no means decisive. The οὐρανός spoken of is surely nothing but the material heaven, as apparent to the Israelites in the clouds and darkness which rested on Sinai, and totally distinct from the οὐρανός here, the site of our blessed Lord's glorification, who is spoken of, ch. iv. 14, as διεληλυθὼς τοὺς οὐρανοῦς. Thus the words have been explained from early times: e.g. by Theodoret [παρακελεύεται αὐτοῖς μὴ ζηλωσαι τὴν ἐκείνων παχύτητα, μηδὲ παραπλησιῶς ἐκείνοις καταλιπεῖν τὸν δεσπότην, καὶ πρὸς τὸν οἰκῆτην δραμεῖν, καὶ ἀντὶ τοῦ θεοῦ τὸν Μωυσῆα λαβεῖν, καὶ ἀντὶ τῶν καινῶν προσμεῖναι τοῖς παλαιοῖς. καιροῖ, φησί, οὐκ οὐρανόθεν αὐτοῖς ὁ θεός, ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ Σινῶ ὕρει τὴν νομοθεσίαν ἐδίδου ἡμεῖς δὲ τὴν ἀπ' οὐρανῶν ἐπιφάνειαν προσδεχόμεθα τοῦ δεσπότη, καὶ διδάσκων ὡς αὐτὸς καὶ τοῦτων κάκεινων νομοθέτης γεγένηται, ἐπήγαγεν: where it is true in the last clause he seems rather to incline to believe that the Second Person of the Trinity is throughout spoken of], Calvin, Schlichting, Owen [in the main: "God himself, or the Son of God"], Grot. “the whole mount quaked greatly,” the LXX render, καὶ ἐξέστη πᾶς ὁ λαὸς σφόδρα: reading, perhaps, with some Hebrew mss., זָרַח instead of זָרַח. σαλευέν is intransitive as well as transitive in the classics [e. g. Soph. Œd. Tyr. 23], but in Hellenistic Greek transitive only: see reff. Some take this shaking of the earth to be meant of a figurative excitement of men’s minds: so Justiniani [“Ait Apostolus divinam vocem tunc movisse terram, cum angeli opera tam multa signa in monte Sinai edidit, quæ non modo ingentem admirationem pepererunt, sed non exiguum incusserunt terrorem: nonnullam etiam lætitiâ attulerunt bonis, quod legem ab ipso Deo immortalî acciperent”], Estius. But there can be little doubt, that the material explanation is the true one. The so-called pentameter, οὐ ἡ φωνὴ τὴν γῆν ἐσάλεισε τότε, could hardly have been observed, but by one whose eye was quicker than his ear, but now (ἴνυ, not only ut res nunc se habent, but here in a more temporal sense, as opposed to τότε: now, under the prophetic revelations since the captivity,—under the N. T. dispensation in which those prophecies will find their fulfilment) hath He (God: see above) promised (perf. pass., in middle sense, see reff. and Winer, § 39. 3. Cf. also Acts xiii. 2; xvi. 10; xxv. 12: Exod. iii. 18 al. Böhme and Vater would render it passive, “hath it been promised:” but λέγων following, though it might suit the style of the Apocalypse, will not agree with the careful precision of our Epistle), saying, Yet once [more], and I will shake not only the earth, but also the heaven. The prophecy in Haggai is uttered, like the whole of his prophecies, with reference to the second temple, which was then rising out of the ruins of the first, smaller indeed and poorer, but destined to witness greater glories. It was to be the scene of the last revelation of Jehovah to His people: and the house of David, then so low, was to rise above the ruins of the thrones of the earth, and endure as the signet on God’s right hand (Hag. ii. 21—23). It is this ruin of earthly powers, this antitypical shaking of the earth and all that is in it, after the typical material shaking at Sinai, of which the Prophet speaks. And the result of this shaking was to be, that the best treasures of all nations (not to be understood personally of Christ, but as LXX, ἕξει τὰ ἐκλεκτὰ πάντων τῶν ἐθνῶν), should be brought to adorn that temple. The expression here (as in LXX) rendered ἔτι ἅπαξ κ.τ.λ. is in the Heb. יִשְׁרָאֵל עַד עַד יִשְׁרָאֵל יִשְׁרָאֵל, i. e., as in E. V. (see Hofmann, Weissag. u. Erfüll. i. 330, and Hitzig in loc.), “Yet once, it is a little while, and:” i. e. the period which shall elapse shall be but one, not admitting of being broken into many; and that one, but short. Thus the prophecy seems to point to the same great final bringing of all the earth under the Kingdom of God, which is spoken of in Zechariah xiv. when the Lord shall come and all his saints with Him, the great antitype of Sinai (cf. Deut. xxxiii. 2), so often the subject of ancient prophecy. See this more fully entered upon in Hofmann, as above, and in Delitzsch’s note here. It is clearly wrong, with some interpreters, to understand this shaking of the mere breaking down of Judaism before the gospel, or of any thing which shall be fulfilled during the Christian œconomy, short of its glorious end and accomplishment. The οὐ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ, which the Writer has substituted for the simple καὶ of the LXX, is adopted for the sake of bringing out the point which is before him, the earth, and the speaking from the earth, on the one hand, the heaven, and the speaking from the heaven, on the other. But the οὐρανός here, that is to be shaken, is the material heaven stretched above this earth.

27.] But (now) this yet once [more] (Hengstenberg’s idea that the Writer lays no stress on ἔτι ἅπαξ, but, in citing these words, means in fact the whole of the prophecy [“this, ἔτι ἅπαξ κ.τ.λ.”], is evidently absurd. It is on these words that the Writer’s argument depends, there being nothing in the following words of the prophecy to imply this removing, but only in the ἔτι ἅπαξ. Still as Delitzsch well argues, the argument does not stand and fall with the ἔτι ἅπαξ of the LXX. The great final shaking which is to introduce the accomplished kingdom of God is at all events that after which there shall be no other. At this the words ἔτι ἅπαξ point: but it does not rest on them for its proof) indicates (see ch. ix. 8, note) the removal of the things shaken, as of things which have been made, in order that the things which are not (i. e. cannot be, which the μὴ hints at) shaken may abide (three ways of taking this sentence are grammatically and philologically possible. 1. That given above, to the consideration of which I will presently return. 2. We may join ἵνα &c., not with the fact pointed at, the μετάθεσις τῶν σαλευομένων, as its purpose, but with πεποιημένων, 'as of things which have been made in order that the things which cannot be shaken may remain:' i. e. the scope of Creation has been, the establishing of the kingdom of Redemption: that it, the transitory and baseless, may pass away when its work is fulfilled, and give place to that which shall never pass away. This view is strongly taken by Delitzsch, after Grotius, Bengel, Tholuck, al. Before discussing it, we may notice and dismiss [3], which is a mere variety of it, and consists in taking μένειν in the sense of "to await," or "wait for," "as of things which have been made in order that they should wait for the things which cannot be shaken." So Paul Bauldry in 1699 [see Wolf, Curæ, p. 795, h. l.], Storr, Böhme, Kuinoel, Klee. But, though μένειν does undoubtedly occur in this sense in Acts xx. 5, 23, yet the usage of this Epistle is for the other sense, cf. ch. vii. 3, 24; x. 34; xiii. 14. And another objection to this meaning seems to me to be, that in this case it would not be the aorist μείνη, indicating the final purpose as expressed once for all, but the present μένη, indicating the continuous attitude of expectancy. So that, although the sense would thus be good, and altogether according to St. Paul in Rom. viii. 18—25, we must pass this by, for the absolute sense of μείνη, may abide, endure: cf. Acts xxvii. 41, ἔμεινεν ἀσάλευτος: and Isa. lxvi. 22, ὃν τρόπον ὁ οὐρανὸς καινὸς καὶ ἡ γῆ καινὴ, ἃ ἐγὼ ποιῶ, μένει ἐνώπιον ἐμοῦ κ.τ.λ. Nor again can I accede to [2], beautiful as is the thought, and strictly true, that Creation was made but to subserve Redemption: the things removeable, to give place to the things unremoveable. For, a. the word μείνη will thus have an exceedingly awkward elliptic sense, "that the things which cannot be shaken may remain," i. e. "may come into the place of those removed, and thus abide for ever:" for things which cannot be shaken *remain-*ing merely, would be a matter of course. This is confessed by Grot.: "nam in id facta est hæc quam videmus machina, ut olim alteri meliori et non immutandæ locum faciat." But certainly this does not lie in the word μείνη. β. The logical propriety as well as the rhythm of the sentence is thus destroyed. For we should on this rendering have the ἵνα clause entirely subordinated to the πεποιημένων, and indicating, not the purpose of the main action of the sentence, but that of the creation, a matter lying quite out of the present record. Certainly, if this were the meaning, we should have had the part. πεποιημένων introduced with a καί, as is generally done when an outlying circumstance is taken into account by the way: as e. g. in 1 Pet. ii. 8, οἱ προσκόπτουσιν, τῷ λόγῳ ἀπειθοῦντες, εἰς ὃ καὶ ἐτέθησαν. Besides which, I should have expected in this case the aor. part., not the perf., the ἵνα of purpose relating to the time when the Creation took place, rather than to its subsistence since then. So that it seems to me, we must fall back on [1], viz. the making ἵνα belong to μετάθεσιν, the action of the sentence. This, it is true, is not without difficulty. For, a. even thus we must go some little out of our way for a sense for μείνη, though not so far as in the other case. μείνη must then mean, may remain over, when the σαλευόμενα are gone: may be permanently left: to which sense there is no objection in Greek any more than in English, but it does not exactly fit the requirements of the sentence: β. if πεποιημένων be taken absolutely, "as of things which have been made," we might be met by the ἃ ἐγὼ ποιῶ in the citation from Isa. lxvi. 22 above, to shew that the new heavens and the new earth are also πεποιημένα: see also Isa. lxv. 17, 18. The answer to this must be, though I own it is not altogether a satisfactory one, that the ποιεῖσθαι is not the same in the two cases: that this word carries rather with it χειροποίητος, ταύτης τῆς κτίσεως, as that word is explained ch. ix. 11: whereas the other ποιῶ rests in the almighty power of God, by which the spirit-world as well as the world of sense was called into existence. See by all means, on the whole, Luke xxi. 26).

ference, not from the whole preceding paragraph, but from the yet once more shaking and consequent removing of earthly things before those things which shall remain) receiving as we do a kingdom which cannot be shaken (the pres. part., with the slightly ratiocinative force. παραλαμβάνοντες, not, as Calvin, "Modo fide ingrediamur in Christi regnum;" and so Schlichting, Limborch, Bengel, Semler; nor does the participial clause belong to the exhortation: but it indicates matter of fact, from which the exhortation-sets out, and means [as in Dan. vii. 18, καὶ παραλήψονται τὴν βασιλείαν ἁγιοῦ ὑψίστου, which probably was in the Writer's mind,—and in other reff.], being partakers of, coming into possession of, βασ. or ἀρχὴν παραλαμβάνειν, 'regnum capessere.' The participle then will be descriptive of our Christian state of privilege and expectation; proleptically designating us as in possession of that, whose firstfruits and foretastes we do actually possess), let us have thankfulness (τουτέστιν, εὐχαριστῶμεν τῷ θεῷ, Chrys.: τουτέστι μὴ ἀλγῶμεν μηδὲ δυσπετῶμεν, ἀλλ' εὐχαριστῶμεν τῷ τοιαῦτα καὶ ἤδη δόντι καὶ μέλλοντι δώσειν, Thl. But this is impossible: ἔχωμεν would be κατέχωμεν [ch. iii. 6, 14; x. 23] or κρατῶμεν [ch. iv. 14], and the words would probably be in inverted order; besides that χάριν would hardly be anarthrous. On the sense see Ps. l. 23, "whoso offereth me thanks and praise, he honoureth me;" and on χάριν ἔχειν, besides reff., Jos. Antt. vii. 9. 4: Polyb. v. 104. 1: Xen. Mem. i. 2. 7; ii. 6. 21; iii. 11. 2, and many other examples in Bleek), by which (thankfulness) let us serve (the indicative readings, ἔχομεν and λατρεύομεν, are weakly supported, and do not suit the sense nor the inferential διό. And λατρεύομεν cannot be taken, as in E. V., "by which we may serve," but must be hortatory like the other) God well-pleasingly (the dative τῷ θεῷ belongs to the verb, not to εὐαρέστως as Valcknaer) with reverent submission and fear (see on ch. v. 7 for εὐλάβεια. The rec. reading has against it, i. the frequent conjunction in ordinary Greek of αἰδώς and εὐλάβεια, of which Bleek gives many examples, and, 2. the fact that δέος occurs no where else in the N. T. or LXX.) 29.] For moreover our God is a consuming fire (καὶ γὰρ, as in ch. iv. 2; v. 12, and in Luke xxii. 37, introduces the reason rendered by γὰρ as an additional particular not contained in what went immediately before,—answering to the Latin 'etenim.' It is quite impossible that the Writer should have meant, "For our God also, as well as the God of the Jews:" as even Bleek, De Wette, Tholuck, and Bisping make him say. Besides the utter incongruity of such a mode of expression with any thing found in our Writer or in the N. T., this would certainly have been expressed καὶ γὰρ ἡμῶν ὁ θεός. The words are taken from Deut. iv. 24, ὅτι κύριος ὁ θεός σου πῦρ καταναλίσκον ἔστί, θεός ζηλωτής. Cf. ib. ix. 3. And thus the fact that God's anger continues to burn now, as then, against those who reject his Kingdom, is brought in; and in the background lie all those gracious dealings by which the fire of God's presence and purity becomes to his people, while it consumes their vanity and sin and earthly state, the fire of purity and light and love for their enduring citizenship of his kingdom).

CHAP. XIII. 1—16.] Various exhortations to Christian virtues: more especially to the imitation of the faith of their leaders who had departed in the Lord: to firmness in the faith: and following of Jesus, who suffered outside the camp to teach us to bear His reproach.

1.] Let brotherly love (φιλαδελφία in the classics, the love of brothers and sisters for one another: in the N. T., the love of the Christian brethren. In ref. 2 Pet. it is expressly distinguished from ἀγάπη, the more general word) remain (we learn from the Acts,—on the hypothesis of this Epistle being addressed to the church at Jerusalem [on which however see Prolegg.],—how eminent this brotherly love had been in that church, and, without any hypothesis as to the readers, we see from our ch. x. 32 ff. that the persons here addressed had exercised it aforesaid, and from ch. vi. 10, that they still continued to exercise it. Let it then remain, not die out. And it is put first, as being the first of the fruits of faith. The exhortations in ch. iii. 12 f.; x. 24 f.; xii. 12 ff., point the same way).

2.] Forget not hospitality to strangers (so in ref. 1 Pet., after recommending ἀγάπην ἐκτενῆ εἰς ἑαυτοῦς, he proceeds φιλόξενοι εἰς ἀλλήλους. Cf. also ref. Rom., and Titus i. 8: 1 Tim. iii. 2. Bleek remarks that the notices found in the writings of the enemies of Christianity shew how much this virtue was practised among the early believers: and refers to Julian, Ep. 49, and Lucian de Morte Peregrini, ch. 16): for thereby (by exercising it) some unawares entertained angels (viz. Abraham, Gen. xviii., Lot, Gen. xix. Certainly it would appear at first sight from the former account, that Abraham regarded the “three men” from the first as angels: but the contrary view has nothing against it in the narrative, and was taken by the Jewish expositors: cf. Philo de Abr. § 22, vol. ii. p. 17, θεασάμενος τρεῖς ὡς ἄνδρας ὀδοποροῦντας, οἱ δὲ θεοίετρα ὄντες φύσεως ἀεληθήθεισαν: and Jos. Ant. i. 11. 2, θεασάμενος τρεῖς ἄγγέλους . . . καὶ νομίσας εἶναι ξένους, ἡσπασάτο τε ἀναστάς, καὶ παρ’ αὐτῷ καταχθέντας παρεκάλεν ξενίων μεταλαβεῖν. On the motive proferred, Calvin remarks, “Si quis objiciat rarum illud fuisse, responsio impromptu est, non angelos tantum recipi, sed Christum ipsum, quum pauperes in ejus nomine recipimus.” He further notices, “In Græcis elegans est allusio [ἐλαθον and ἐπιλανθάνεσθε] quæ Latine exprimi non potest.” On ἐλαθον ξενίσαντες, Chrys. says, τί ἐστὶν ἐλαθον; οὐκ εἰδότες φησὶν ἐξένισαν: and Thl., ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡγνόησαν ὅτι ἄγγελοι ἦσαν οἱ ξενιζόμενοι, καὶ ὅμως φιλοτίμως αὐτοὺς ἐξένισαν. Cf. Herod. i. 44, οἰκίστοις ὑποδεξάμενος τὸν ξεῖνον φονέα τοῦ παιδὸς ἐλάθανε βόσκων. The vulg. rendering, “latuerunt quidam angelis hospitio receptis,” has led some R.-Cath. expositors mentioned in Estius to imagine that Lot’s escape by the men of Sodom being smitten with blindness is alluded to. Bleek refers to, and with reason, a very beautiful sermon of Schleiermacher’s, vol. i. p. 645, “Ueber die Christliche Gastfreundschaft.” He there sets forth, how the motive, though no longer literally applying to us, is still a real one, inasmuch as angels were the messengers of God’s spiritual purposes, and such messengers may be found in Christian guests, even where least expected).

3.] Remember (cf. ch. ii. 6) them that are in bonds, as if bound with them (cf. 1 Cor. xii. 26: as fully sympathizing with them in their captivity: not, as Böhme, al., “quippe ejus naturæ et conditionis homines, qui ipsi quoque pro captivis sint, nimirum in ecclesia pressa degentes,” which is travelling too far from the context): those in distress (κακουχομένων is the general idea, including captives and any other classes of distressed persons: as Ec. and Thl., ἡ ἐν φυλακαῖς ἢ ἐν λιμῷ ἢ ἐν ἐτέρᾳ θλίψει), as also yourselves being in the body (i. e. as in reff., bound up with a body which has the same capacity of suffering. The words have been differently rendered. Calvin says, “Refero ad ecclesiæ corpus, ut sit sensus, Quandoquidem estis ejusdem corporis membra, communiter vos affici decet alios aliorum malis:” and so Brauu, al. But this cannot be extracted from the words ἐν σώματι, without the article. Beza renders, "ac si ipsi quoque corpore afflicti essetis:" and says, "ἐν σώματι prorsus videtur illud declarare quod in vernaculo sermone dicimus en personne:" in other words, says Bleek, as Philo expresses it, De Spec. Legg. ad 6. 7, § 30, vol. ii. p. 326, ὡς ἐν τοῖς ἑτέρων σώμασιν αὐτοὶ κακοῦμενοι. But this is equally out of the question: and there can be no doubt that the simple meaning is the true one. So Ec. [εἰ γὰρ τις ἀναλογίσαιτο, οὗτι καὶ αὐτὸς περικείται ὁμοιοπαθὲς ἐκείνους σῶμα, ἐλεήσει μᾶλλον αὐτοὺς διὰ τε τὴν συμπάθειαν καὶ διὰ τὸν φόβον μὴ τὰ ὅμοια ἐκ τῆς ἀπανθρωπίας πάθῃ], Thl., and most Commentators).

4.] Exhortation to chastity. Let your marriage (γάμος, elsewhere in N. T. in the sense of a wedding, here has its ordinary Greek meaning) be [held] in honour in all things (see below) and your marriage bed be undefiled: for fornicators and adulterers God shall judge. There are several debateable matters in this verse. First, is it a command or an assertion? The latter view is taken in Syr. "Honourable is marriage among all, and their bed is undefiled:" Beza, Grot., our E. V., al. And so Chrys. (πῶς τίμιος ὁ γάμος; ὅτι ἐν σωφροσύνῃ, φησί, διατηρεῖ τὸν πιστόν), Ec., Thdrt. (apparently). But against this is the following clause, καὶ ἡ κοίτη ἀμίαντος: for it is impossible to keep to the same rendering in this case: cf. Syr. above: the E. V. has evaded this difficulty by rendering, "and the bed undefiled," leaving it, as its guide Beza does, uncertain whether "undefiled" is an epithet, as usually taken by English readers, or a predicate, as the Greek absolutely requires. For had the meaning been, "Marriage is honourable among all, and the (an) undefiled bed," certainly the article could not have stood before κοίτη without standing also before ἀμίαντος: it must have been καὶ κοίτη ἀμίαντος or καὶ ἡ κοίτη ἡ ἀμίαντος. So that the indicative supplement, ἔστιν, must be dismissed, as inconsistent with the requirements of the latter clause; and, I might add, with the context: in which, besides that the whole is of a hortatory character, the very same collocation of words immediately follows in ἀφιλάργυρος

ὁ τρόπος, where no one suggests ἔστιν as our supplement. The imperative view has accordingly been taken by very many Commentators: as e. g. by Thl. (see below), and the great mass of moderns. Delitzsch holds that no supplement is wanted, the clause being an exclamation carrying with it a hortatory force. But surely this is equivalent to supplying ἔστω. The next question respects ἐν πᾶσιν, whether it is to be taken as masculine, 'among all men,' or as neuter, 'in all things.' The doubt was felt as early as Thl., who thus expresses it: ἐν πᾶσιν οὖν, μὴ ἐν τοῖς προβεβηκόσι μὲν, ἐν δὲ τοῖς νέοις οὖ, ἀλλ' ἐν πᾶσιν. ἢ καὶ ἐν πᾶσι τρόποις καὶ ἐν πᾶσι καιροῖς, μὴ ἐν θλίψει μέν, ἐν ἀνέσει δὲ οὖ, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ μὲν μέρει τίμιος, ἐν ἄλλῳ δὲ οὖ, ἀλλ' ὅλος ἐν ὅλῳ τίμιος ἔστω. The masculine is taken by Erasmus, Cajetan, Luther, Calvin, Beza, and most Commentators, especially Protestants, and in later times by Schulz, Böhme, De Wette, Wahl, Kuinoel, Tholuck. And it is variously interpreted: either, α. as by Luther, that all should keep marriage in honour, by not violating it; β. as by Böhme, Schulz, al., that the unmarried should not despise it, but it should be held in honour by all; or, γ. as Calvin, al., that it is allowed to all conditions of men, not denied to any, as e. g. it is to the Romish priesthood. But it is altogether against the masculine sense, 1. that ἐν πᾶσιν would not be the natural expression for it, but παρὰ πᾶσιν: cf. Matt. xix. 26 (bis), and ||: Acts xxvi. 8: Rom. ii. 13: 2 Thess. i. 6: James i. 27 (ἀμίαντος παρὰ τῷ θεῷ): and, 2. that our Writer uses ἐν πᾶσιν in this very chapter for 'in all things,' ver. 18. See also reff., and Col. i. 18: Phil. iv. 12. So that the neuter view is to be preferred: and so Ec., Corn. a-Lap., Calmet, the R.-Cath. expositors generally, Bleek, De Wette, Lüncem., Delitzsch, al. For the phrase κοίτη ἀμίαντος, Wetst. quotes from Plutarch de Fluviiis, p. 18, ὑπὸ τῆς μητρυῖας φιλούμενος, καὶ μὴ θέλων μιαινεῖν τὴν κοίτην τοῦ γεννήσαντος. The latter clause carries with it the anticipation of condemnation in κρινεῖ. Man may, or may not, punish them: one thing is sure: they shall come into judgment, and if so into condemnation, when God shall judge all.

Rom., ἡ ἀγάπη ἀνυπόκριτος· ἀποστνηγούντες τὸ πονηρὸν κ.τ.λ. Οὐ ἀρκούμενοι and τοῖς παροῦσιν, see Bleek's examples. Among them, we have the very phrase in Teles. in Stobæus, serm. 95, βίωσθι ἀρκούμενοι τοῖς παροῦσι, τῶν ἀπόντων οὐκ ἐπιθυμῶν: Democrit. in Stobæus, serm. 1, τοῖς παροῦσιν ἀρκείσθαι: Phocyl. 4, ἀρκείσθαι παροῦσι, καὶ ἀλλοτριῶν ἀπέχεσθαι. The construction ἀρκείσθαι τινι occurs in Herod. ix. 33, οὐδ' οὕτω ἔφη ἐπι ἀρκείσθαι τούτοιςι μούνοισι, and al. This is certainly singular, and cannot be mere coincidence. Bleek and Lünemann suppose the Writer to have made the citation direct from Philo [see Prelegg. § i. par. 156], whereas Delitzsch believes that the expression was taken from Deut. xxxi. 6 A, οὐ μὴ σε ἀνῶ οὐδ' οὐ μὴ σε ἐγκαταλίπη, and had become inwoven into some liturgical or homiletic portion of the services in the Hellenistic synagogue. οὐδ' οὐ μὴ occurs again Matt. xix. 21): 6.] so that we say (not 'can say' nor 'may say,' both which weaken the confidence expressed) with confidence, The Lord (יהוה in the Psalm, and probably used of the Father, as in other citations in this Epistle, e. g. ch. vii. 21; viii. 8—11; x. 16, 30; xii. 5 al., and without a citation ch. viii. 2) is my helper (in the Heb. only יְהוָה), [and (not in Heb., see also digest), I will not be afraid: what shall man do unto me (such is the connexion, both in the Heb. and here: not, "I will not be afraid what man shall do unto me," as the English Prayer Book after the vulg., "non timebo quid faciat mihi homo," which is ungrammatical [τί ἂν ποιῆ or ποιήσῃ])? 7.] Remember (may be taken in two ways, as Thl., βοηθεῖν αὐτοῖς ἐν ταῖς σωματικαῖς χρείασις, . . . ἡ καὶ πρὸς μίμησιν αὐτῶν ἐπαλεῖφει τούτους. those who heard the Lord, ὅψ' ὄν εἰς ἡμᾶς ἐβεβαιώθη [ἡ σωτηρία]. The phrase λαλεῖν τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ, is the usual one with St. Luke, cf. reff.), of whom surveying (ἀνα-θεωρεῖν, like ἀνα-ζητεῖν, to contemplate, or search from one end to the other. Bl. quotes from Winer de Verborum cum Prepp. compos. in N. T. Usu, p. iii, "aliquam rerum seriem ita oculis perustrare, ut ab imo ad summum, ab extremo ad principium pergas." Similarly Chrys., συνεχῶς στρέφοντες παρ' ἑαυτοῖς. The word occurs elsewhere in St. Luke only [reff.] the termination (by death: not as Ἔε, but without deciding, πῶς διεξέρχονται καλῶς τὴν ἐν τῷ βίῳ ἀναστροφῆν: nor, as Braum and Cramer, the result for others of their Christian walk, viz. their conversion: nor as Storr, al., the result for themselves, viz. their heavenly reward, which their followers could not in any sense ἀναθεωρεῖν. We have ἔξοδος in the sense of death Luke ix. 31: 2 Pet. i. 15: and ἀφιξίς Acts xx. 29. It is perhaps to be inferred that these died by martyrdom, as Stephen, James the brother of John, and possibly [but see the matter discussed in Prolegg, to James, and in Delitzsch's note here] James the brother of the Lord: and possibly too, St. Peter [see Prolegg. to 1 Pet.]. So the ancient Commentators: so Thdor.-mops., Θεόδωρος φησιν ἡγουμένους τοὺς παρ' αὐτοῖς καταγγελαντας τὸν λόγον τῆς εὐσεβείας καὶ τελειωθέντας ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀντόθη πολλοὶ δὲ ἦσαν, οὔτε Στέφανος μόνον καὶ Ἰάκωβος ὁ μαχαίρα ἀναιρεθείς, ἀλλὰ καὶ ὁ τοῦ κυρίου ἀδελφὸς Ἰάκωβος, ἕτεροι δὲ πλείστοι σιωπῇ παραδεδομένοι. Similarly Thdr., al.) of their conversation (i. e. their Christian ἀναστρέφεται, behaviour, walk, course. No English word completely gives it. For usage, see reff.), imitate the faith.

8.] Jesus Christ is yesterday and to-day the same, and for ever (as to the construction, ὁ αὐτός is the predicate to all three times, not as vulg. [not Syr., if at least Etheridge's version of it is to be trusted], "Jesus Christus heri et hodie: ipse et in sæcula;" Ambr. [passim], Calvin, al. As to the connexion, the verse stands as a transition from what has passed to what follows. 'It was Christ whom these ἡγουμένοι preached, ἐλάλησαν τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ: Christ who supported them to the end, being the author and finisher of their faith; and He remains still with regard to you [ὡςπερ τοὺς ἡγουμένους ὑμῶν οὐ κατέλιπεν, ἀλλ' ἐν πᾶσιν ἀντελαμβάνετο αὐτῶν, οὕτω καὶ ὑμῶν ἀντιλήφεται ὁ αὐτὸς γὰρ ἐστίν, altern. in Thl. Similarly Chrys. alt.] the same: be not then carried away' &c. As to the meaning of the words, ἐχθές [the common and also Attic form, whereas χθές is Epic, Ionic, and Attic] refers to the time past, when their ἡγουμένοι passed away from them; σήμερον to the time present, when the Writer and the readers were living.

In our E. V., this verse, by the omission of the copula 'is,' appears as if it were in apposition with "the end of whose conversation:" and in the carelessly printed polyglott of Bagster, the matter is made worse, by a colon being substituted for the period after "conversation." Observe Ἰησοῦς χριστός, not common with our Writer: only e. g. ver. 21, where he wishes to give a solemn fulness to the mention of the Lord: Jesus, the Person, of whom we have been proving, that He is χριστός, the Anointed of God. Cf. also ch. x. 10).

9.] Be not carried away (the rec. περιφ. is probably from Eph. iv. 14. παραφέρθη, as the prep. indicates, is to be carried out of the right course. ἀπὸ μεταφορᾶς τῶν μαινομένων τῶν τῆδε κάκεισε παραφερομένων εἴρηται. The fixed point from which they are not to be carried away, is clearly that given in the last verse, viz. Jesus Christ) by various (ποικίλαις, παντοδαπαῖς· αἱ τοιαῦται γὰρ οὐδὲν βέβαιον ἔχουσιν, ἀλλ' εἰσι διάφορον· μάλιστα δὲ τὸ τῶν βρωμάτων διάφορον. Chrys. Thl. says, τουτέστιν παρὰ τοῦδε τὸδε καὶ παρὰ τοῦδε τὸδε . . . ἡ γὰρ ἀλήθεια μονοειδής, καὶ πρὸς ἓν ἀφορώσα. The reference, from what follows, is to teachings about various meats) and strange (τουτέστιν, ἀλλότριαι τῆς ἀληθείας, Thl. The use of ἕτερος is similar, from which ἑτεροδοξία has its technical sense) doctrines (teachings: so διδασκαλῆαι, Matt. xv. 9: Col. ii. 22: 1 Tim. iv. 1): for it is good that the heart be confirmed (reff.) with grace (God's grace, working on us by faith: δείκνυσιν ὅτι τὸ πᾶν πίστις ἐστίν· ἂν αὐτῇ βεβαιώσῃ, ἡ καρδία ἐν ἀσφαλείᾳ ἔστηκεν, Chrys.), not with meats (it is a question whether βρώμασιν be meant of meat eaten after sacrifices, or of "meats" as spoken of so much by St. Paul, meats partaken of or abstained from as a matter of conscience: cf. 1 Cor. viii. 8, βρώμα ἡμᾶς οὐκ ἐστὶν τῷ θεῷ: ib. ver. 13; ib. vi. 13: Rom. xiv. 15, 20, μὴ ἔνεκεν βρώματος καταλύε τὸ ἔργον τοῦ θεοῦ. The former view is taken by Schlichting, Bleek, Lünemann, al., on the grounds, 1. that the expression will not suit meats abstained from, only those partaken of: "Cor non reficitur cibis non comestis, sed comestis. Ciborum ergo usui, non abstinentiæ, opponitur hic gratia," Schlicht.; 2. that ver. 10, which is in close connexion with this, speaks of an altar and of partaking of meats sacrificed: and, 3. that this same reference, to meats offered in sacrifice, is retained throughout, to ver. 15. The other view is taken by Chrys., Thdrt., Ec., Thl., Primas., Faber Stap., Erasm., Calv., Beza, the great body of later Commentators, and recently by Böhme, Tholuck, and Delitzsch. It is defended against the above objections, 1. by remembering that in the other passages where βρώματα occurs with this reference, it is used not merely in the concrete, for meats absolutely partaken of, but in the abstract, for the whole department or subject of βρώματα, to be partaken of or abstained from: 2. see below on the verse: [3] stands or falls with [2]. And besides, it is supported by the following considerations: 4. that βρώματα is a word not found in the law where offerings are spoken of [in Levit. xix. 6 and xxii. 30, we have βρωθήσεται of peace-offerings and thank-offerings]: but in the distinction of clean and unclean, Levit. xi. 34: 1 Macc. i. 63: 5. that in all N. T. places, where βρώμα is used in a similar connexion, it applies to clean and unclean meats: 6. that διδασκαίαι ποικίλαις καὶ ξένοις μὴ παραφέρεσθε must refer, not to meats eaten after sacrifices, but to some doctrines in which there was variety and perplexity, as to those concerning clean and unclean. And I own these reasons incline me strongly to this view, to the exclusion of the other. Two 'monstra interpretationis' need only be mentioned: that of the R.-Cath. Bisping, who interprets χάριτι "by the eucharist;" and that of Ebrard, who renders βεβαιώσθαι, "cling fast to," and χάριτι καὶ βρώμασιν as datives), in which (the observance of which, βρώματα, as above, being used for the observance of rules concerning meats and drinks &c.) they who walked were not profited (the ἐν belongs, not to ὠφελήθησαν, but to περιπατήσαντες, according to the very usual construction, περιπατεῖν ἐν τινι, for to observe, to live in the practice of any thing: see reff. and Acts xxi. 21. So Chrys., τουτέστιν, οἱ διὰ παντὸς φυλάξαντες αὐτά. These, who walked in such observances, are the whole people of God under the O. T. dispensation [notice the historic aorists], to whom they were of themselves useless and profitless, though ordained for a preparatory purpose: so that Calvin's objection is answered, "Certe patribus qui sub lege vixerunt utilis fuit pædagogia ejus pars erat ciborum discrimen." Yes, and so was the shedding of the blood of bulls and goats part of the pædagogia: but it was useless to take away sin. Cf. Thl., οἱ τῆ τῶν βρωμάτων τηρήσει στοιχήσαντες διὰ παντὸς οὐδὲν εἰς τὴν ψυχὴν ὠφελήθησαν, ὡς τῆς πίστεως ἔξω ὄντες καὶ τῷ νόμῳ τῷ ἀνωφελεῖ δουλεύοντες. But he understands it of τοὺς τὴν Ἰουδαϊκὴν παρατήρησιν τῶν βρωμάτων εἰσάγοντες). 10.] What is the connexion with ver. 9? It is represented as being entirely done away by our interpretation of βρώματα. If I regard it aright, it is not only not done away, but established in its proper light. Those ancient distinctions are profitless: one distinction remains: that our true meat is not to be partaken of by those who adhere to those old distinctions: that Christianity and Judaism are necessarily and totally distinct. See more below. We have an altar (to what does the Writer allude? Some have said [Schlichting, Sykes, Michaelis, Kuinoel, and even Tholuck] that no distinct idea was before him, but that he merely used the term altar, to help the figure which he was about to introduce. And this view has just so much truth in it, that there is no emphasis on θυσιαστήριον; it is not θυσιαστήριον ἔχομεν. The altar bears only a secondary place in the figure; but still I cannot think that it has not a definite meaning. Others understand by the altar, Christ himself. So Suicer, Wolf, al. So Cyr.-alex. de Adoratione, ix. vol. i. p. 310, αὐτὸς οὖν ἄρα ἐστὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον, αὐτὸς δὲ τὸ θυμίαμα, καὶ ἀρχιερεύς. This again has so much truth in it, that the Victim is so superior to the altar as to cast it altogether into shade; but still is not Himself the altar. Some again [Corn. a-Lapide, Böhme, Bähr, Ebrard, Bisping, Stier, al.] understand, the table of the Lord, at which we eat the Lord's Supper. This is so far true, that that table may be said to represent to us the Cross whereupon the Sacrifice was offered, just as the bread and wine, laid on it, represent the oblation itself: but it is not the altar, in any propriety of language, however we may be justified, in common parlance, in so calling it. Some again, as Bretschneider, have interpreted it to mean the heavenly place, where Christ now offers the virtue of His Blood to the Father for us. This again is so far true that it is the antitype of the Cross, just as the Cross is the antitype of the Lord's table: but we do not want, in this word, the heavenly thing represented by, any more than the enduring ordinance represent: the original historic concrete material altar: we want that altar itself: and that altar is, the Cross, on which the Lord suffered. That is our altar: not to be emphasized, nor exalted into any comparison with the adorable Victim thereon offered; but still our altar, that wherein we glory, that for which, as "pro aris," we contend: of which our banners, our tokens, our adornments, our churches, are full:

severed from which, we know not Christ; laid upon which, He is the power of God, and the wisdom of God. And so it is here explained by Thos. Aquinas, Jac. Cappell, Estius, Bengel, Ernesti, Bleek, De Wette, Stengel, Lünem., Delitzsch) to eat of which (cf. esp. 1 Cor. ix. 13, οἱ τὰ ἱερά ἐργαζόμενοι ἐκ τοῦ ἱεροῦ ἐσθλοῦσιν οἱ τῷ θυσιαστηρίῳ προσεδρεύοντες τῷ θυσιαστηρίῳ συμμερίζονται) they have not licence who serve the tabernacle (who are these? Some, as Schlichting, Morus, and strange to say more recently Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. 1. 322 ff., understand by them the same, viz. Christians, as the subject of ἔχομεν. We Christians have an altar whereof [even] they who serve the [Christian] tabernacle have no right to eat: i. e. as explained by Hofmann, as the high-priest himself did not eat of the sin-offerings whose blood was brought into the tabernacle, but they were burnt without the camp, so we Christians have no sacrifice of which we have any right to eat, no further profit to be derived from that one sacrifice, by which we have been reconciled to God. But this is, 1. false in fact. We have a right to eat of our Sacrifice, and are commanded so to do. All that our Lord says of eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood [explain it how we will] would be nullified and set aside by such an interpretation. And, 2. it is directly against the whole context, in which the βρώματα, whatever they are, are pronounced profitless, and they who walked in them contrasted with us who have higher privileges. To what purpose then would it be to say, that we have an altar of which we cannot eat? that we have a sacrifice which brings us no profit, but only shame? I pass over the interpretation which understands by the words some particular class of Christians among the Hebrews, because it involves the anachronism of a distinction between clergy and laity which certainly then had no place: and also because it would furnish no sense at all suiting the passage, referring as it then would to some Christians only, not to all. The only true reference of our words, as also that which has been all but universally acknowledged, is that to the Jewish priesthood, and in them to those who have part with them in serving the rites and ordinances of the ceremonial law. These have no right to eat of our altar: for just as the bodies of those beasts whose blood was brought into the sanctuary were burnt without the camp, so Jesus suffered altogether without the gate of legal Judaism. Let us then not tarry serving that tabernacle which has no part in Him, but go forth to Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For we cleave not to any abiding city, such as the earthly Jerusalem, but seek one to come. Let us then not tarry in the Jewish tabernacle, serving their rites, offering their sacrifices; but offer our now only possible sacrifice, that of praise, the fruit of a good confession, acceptable to God through Him. Thus and thus only does the whole context stand in harmony. Thus the words in οἱ τῆ σκηνῆ λατρεύοντες keep their former meanings: cf. ch. viii. 5, where we have λατρεύοντες ὑποδείγματι καὶ σκιᾷ τῶν ἐπουρανίων: and remember that ἡ σκηνή, barely so placed, cannot by any possibility mean any part of the Christian apparatus of worship, nor have an antitypical reference, but can only import that which throughout the Epistle it has imported, viz. the Jewish tabernacle: cf. ch. viii. 5; ix. 21 al. Bengel, with his keen sight for nice shades of meaning, has noticed, "est aculeus, quod dicit τῆ σκηνῆ, non ἐν τῆ σκηνῆ". 11.] For (reason why this exclusion has place: because our great Sacrifice is not one of those in which the servants of the tabernacle had any share, but answers to one which was wholly taken out and burnt: see below) of the animals of which the blood is brought into the holy place by the high-priest, of these the bodies are consumed by fire outside the camp (there was a distinction in the sacrifices as to the subsequent participation of certain parts of them by the priests. Those of which they did partake [I take these particulars mainly from Delitzsch] were: 1. the sin-offering of the rulers [a male kid], and the sin-offering of the common people [a female kid or lamb], Levit. iv. 22 ff., 27 ff. [compare the rules ib. ch. vi. about eating and not eating the sacrifices]: 2. the dove of the poor man, Levit. v. 9: 3. the trespass-offering, Levit. vii. 7: 4. the skin of the whole burnt-offering, ib. ver. 8: 5. the wave-breast and heave-shoulder of the peace-offerings: 6. the wave-offerings on the feast of weeks, entire. But those of which they did not partake were, 1. the sin-offering of the high-priest for himself, Levit. iv. 5—7, esp. ver. 12: 2. the sin-offering for sins of ignorance of the congregation, Levit. iv. 16—21, cf. Num. xv. 24: 3. the sin-offering for high-priest and people combined, on the great day of atonement, the blood of which was brought not only into the holy but into the holiest place, Levit. xvi. 27. Besides which we have a general rule, to which doubtless the Writer here alludes, Levit. vi. 30, "No sin-offering, whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten: it shall be burnt in the fire." As regards particular expressions: τὰ ἄγια here, as in ch. ix. 8, 12, 24, 25, and x. 19, probably means not the holy place commonly so called, but the holy of holies, into which the blood of the sin-offering was brought on the day of atonement, and which only typified heaven, whither Christ as High-priest is entered with His Blood. ἔξω τῆς παρεμβολῆς refers to the time when Israel was encamped in the wilderness: the enclosure of the camp was afterwards replaced by the walls of Jerusalem, so that ἔξω τῆς πύλης below answers to it).

12.] Wherefore (as being the antitype of the sin-offering on the day of atonement: "ut ille typus veteris testamenti impletur, illa figura quæ est de carnibus extra castra comburendis," Est.) Jesus also, that He might sanctify (see on ch. ii. 11) the people (see on ch. ii. 17) through His own blood, suffered (see on ch. ix. 26 on the absolute meaning of παθεῖν) outside the gate (ἔξω τῆς πόλεως Ἱερουσαλήμ, Ec. It is necessary in order to understand this rightly, to trace with some care the various steps of the symbolism. The offering of Christ consists of two parts: 1. His offering on earth, which was accomplished on the cross, and answered to the slaying of the legal victim and the destruction of its body by fire, the annihilation of the fleshly life : and, 2. His offering in the holy place above, which consisted in His entering heaven, the abode of God, through the veil, that is to say his flesh, and carrying his blood there as a standing atonement for the world's sin. This, the sanctifying of the people through His own blood, was the ulterior end of that sacrifice on earth : and therefore whatever belonged to that sacrifice on earth is said to have been done in order to that other. This will sufficiently account for the telic clause here, without making it seem as if the ultimate end, the sanctification of God's people, depended on the subordinate circumstance of Christ's having suffered outside the gate. It did depend on the entire fulfilment by Him of all things written of Him in the law : and of them this was one).

13.] So then (τοῖνυν commonly in Greek stands second at least in a sentence. But in later writers as in the LXX [reff.], it is not uncommonly put first, as here ; and sometimes even in classical Greek : cf. Lobeck on Phrynichus, p. 342 f., who gives an example from Aristoph. Acharn. 904, ἐγῶδα τοῖνυν συκοφάντην ἔξαγε : and several from later authors) let us go forth to Him outside the camp (ἀντὶ τοῦ ἔξω τῆς κατὰ νόμον γενώμεθα πολιτείας, Thlrt. This is certainly intended, and not the meaning given by Chrys. [τὸν σταυρὸν αὐτοῦ αἰρῶμεν καὶ ἔξω κόσμον μένωμεν, in his second exposition in Hom. xxxiii. His first exposition is very similar, not as quoted by Bleek, that we should follow the Lord in his sufferings : this latter is the explanation of τὸν ὀνειδισμὸν αὐτοῦ φέροντες : see below. I may mention that the fact of Chrys. having given two expositions of the passage, as of some others, has much bewildered the Commentators. Delitzsch, e. g., charges Bleek with error in saying that Chrys. omits περὶ ἁμαρτίας in ver. 11. He does omit it the second time, but not the first], Limborch, Heinrichs, Kuinoel, al., nor that of Schlichting ["exilia, opprobria, &c., cum illo subcamus"], Grot., Michaelis, Storr, al. Both these may be involved in that which is intended ; the latter particular is presently mentioned : but they are not identical with it. Possibly there may be a reference to Exod. xxxiii. 7, ἐγένετο, πᾶς ὁ ζητῶν κύριον ἐξεπορεύετο εἰς τὴν σκηνὴν τὴν ἔξω τῆς παρεμβολῆς. Bleek objects that if so, we should not expect ἡ σκηνή to have been so shortly before mentioned as representing the Jewish sanctuary, in distinction from the Christian. But this seems hardly sufficient reason for denying the reference. The occasion in Exod. xxxiii. was a remarkable one. The people were just quitting Sinai, the home of the law ; and the πᾶς ὁ ζητῶν τὸν κύριον seems to bear more than ordinary solemnity, bearing His reproach (see on ch. xi. 26. τουτέστι, τὰ αὐτὰ πάσχοντες. κοινωνοῦντες αὐτῷ ἐν τοῖς παθήμασιν, Chrys., Ec.).

14.] For (reason why such going forth is agreeable to our whole profession : not, as Bengel, al., why the word παρεμβολή, and not πόλις, is used above) we have not here (on earth : not, as Heinrichs, in the earthly Jerusalem. ὧδε in a local sense is said by Böhm, after Aristarchus, to be hardly Greek : but it is a mistake ; the sense being found in the classics from Homer downwards. Palm and Rost, sub voce, maintain the correctness of Aristarchus's view : but it seems beyond question that in such expressions as Ἠφαῖστε προμόλ' ὧδε, the local meaning must be recognized) an abiding city, but we seek for (ἐπιζητεῖν, see on ref.) that (abiding city) which is to come ("Futuram civitatem hanc vocat, quia nobis futura est. Nam Deo, Christo, Angelis jam præsens est." Schlichting. Yet this is not altogether true. The heavenly Jerusalem, in all her glory, is not yet existing, nor shall be until the number of the elect is accomplished. Then she shall come down out of heaven as a bride prepared for her husband, Rev. xxi. 2. This verse certainly comes with a solemn tone on the reader, considering how short a time the μένουσα πόλις did actually remain, and how soon the destruction of Jerusalem put an end to the Jewish polity which was supposed to be so enduring). 15.] Through Him (placed first, as carrying all the emphasis—through Him, not by means of the Jewish ritual observances) therefore (this οὖν gathers its inference from the whole argument, vv. 10—14) let us offer up (see on ref.) sacrifice of praise (θυσία αἰνέσεως is the term for a thank-offering in the law: see Levit. vii. 12 [5, LXX]. Cf. ref. and Ps. xlix. 23, θυσία αἰνέσεως δοξάσει με, and ex. 17 [cxvi. 8], σοὶ θύσω θυσίαν αἰνέσεως. The Commentators quote an old saying of the Rabbis, “Tempore futuro omnia sacrificia cessabunt, sed laudes non cessabunt.” Cf. Philo de Victim. Offer. § 3, vol. ii. p. 253, τὴν ἀρίστην ἀνάγουσι θυσίαν, ὕμνοι τὴν εὐεργέτην καὶ σωτήρα θεὸν γεραίροντες) continually (not at fixed days and seasons, as the Levitical sacrifices, but all through our lives) to God, that is, the fruit of lips (καρπὸν χειλέων is from Hosea [ref.], where the LXX give ἀποδώσομεν καρπὸν χειλέων ἡμῶν as the rendering of וְיִתְּנוּ עִרְשָׁי קָרְבָּן, “we will account our lips as calves” [for a sacrifice]: E. V., “we will render the calves of our lips.” The fruit of the lips is explained by the next words to be, a good confession to God) confessing to His name (i. e. the name of God, as the ultimate object to which the confession, δὲ αὐτοῦ, Jesus, is referred. For the construction, see ref.).

16.] But (q. d. the fruit of the lips is not the only sacrifice: God must be praised not only with the lips but with the life. So Thdrt., ἔδειξε τὴν τῆς αἰνέσεως θυσίαν ἀρέσκουσαν τῷ θεῷ συνέξυζε δὲ αὐτῇ καὶ τὴν τῆς εὐποιίας ἦν κοινωνίαν εἰκότως ἐκάλεσε) of beneficence (εὐποιία is a word of later Greek: Wetstein gives many examples of it. Pollux says εὐεργεσία, χάρις, δωρεά. τὸ γὰρ εὐποιᾶ οὐ λαν κέρριται) and communication (of your means to others who are in want, see ref.: an usage of the word which, as Bleek remarks, sprung up in the primitive Christian church, as also the corresponding one of the verb: see on ch. ii. 14) be not forgetful (ver. 2): for with such sacrifices (viz. εὐποιία καὶ κοινωνία, not including ver. 15, which is complete in itself) God is well pleased (εὐαρεστοῦμαι τινι [ref.] is not elsewhere found in N. T. or LXX, but in the later Greek writers, e. g. Diog. Laert. iv. 6. 18: Diod. Sic. iii. 54; xx. 18: Clem.-alex. Strom. vii. 7, § 45, p. 858, ib. 12, § 74, p. 876 P.: and so in Polyb. iii. 8. 11, δυσηρεστοῦντο τοῖς ὑπ’ Ἀννίβου πραττομένοις).

17—END.] Concluding exhortations and notices. 17.] Having already in ver. 7 spoken of their deceased leaders in the church, and thereby been reminded of their stedfastness in the faith, he has taken occasion in the intervening verses to admonish them respecting the danger of apostasy to Judaism, and to exhort them to come fearlessly out of it to Christ. Now he returns to their duty to their leaders. Obey your leaders (περὶ ἐπισκόπων λέγει, [Ec., Thl.], and submit [to them] (πέθεσθαι, in the regular course of your habits, guided by them, persuaded that their rule is right: ὑπέικειν, where that rule interferes with your own will: πέθεσθαι has more of free following, υπείκειν of dutiful yielding): for they (on their part, brought out by the αὐτοῖ) keep watch on behalf of your souls (not = ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν as Böhm, but rather = ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν εἰς σωτηρίαν: the ψυχὴ bringing in the idea of immortality), as having to give an account (Thdrt. well remarks, παραινεί μὲν τοῖς μαθηταῖς ὑπακοῦεν τοῖς διδασκάλοις· διήγειρε δὲ κατὰ ταῦτων καὶ τοὺς διδασκάλους εἰς πλείονα προθυμίαν· διδάσκει γὰρ αὐτοὺς ἀγρυπνεῖν καὶ τὰς εὐθύνas δειμαίνειν. Delitzsch. 18.]

Pray for us (here, as elsewhere, it is probably a mistake to suppose that the first person plural indicates the Writer alone. As Del. observes, the passage from the ἡγούμενοι to the Writer individually would be harsh. And when Bleek finds in ver. 19 a proof that the Writer only is meant, he misses the point, that this ἡμῶν, including the Writer and his companions, is in fact a transition note between ver. 17 and ver. 19. Cf. Eph. vi. 19: Rom. xv. 30: 2 Cor. i. 11): for we are persuaded (πειθόμεθα, which is St. Luke's way of speaking, cf. Acts xxvi. 26, has been changed into πεποιθαμεν, which is St. Paul's, cf. But the other is the better and more probable rendering, even with the rec.: and with πειθόμεθα, more necessary still) we have a good conscience (St. Luke's expression, see reff.: and here chosen perhaps to correspond to καλῶς below), desiring in all things (not as Chrys., Erasm. [par.], Luth., al., masculine,—ὅτι ἐν ἐθνικοῖς μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν,—but as in ver. 4) to behave ourselves with seemliness (τουτέστιν, ἀπροσκόπως διάγειν σπουδάζοντες καὶ ἀσκανδαλίστως. Thl. This appears to point at some offence of the same kind as we know to have been taken at the life and teaching of St. Paul with reference to the law and Jewish customs. 19.] But I the more abundantly (see on ch. ii. 1) exhort you to do this (ποιῶν τοῦτο; τὸ εὐχεσθαι περὶ ἡμῶν, Ec.), that I may be the sooner (τάχιον is the form of the comparative usual in later Greek: in Attic θᾶσσον is commoner: Herod. uses ταχύτερον: cf. Palm and Rost in ταχύς, and Löbeck on Phryn. p. 77, who adds "In vulgari dialecto quantopere hoc nomen vigerit, innumera Diodori, Plutarchi, Dionysii et æqualium, exempla docent, quæ sciens prætermittō") restored to you (reff., and Polyb. iii. 98. 7, ἐὰν ἐξαγαγῶν τοὺς δμήτρος ἀποκαταστήσῃ τοῖς γονεῦσι καὶ ταῖς πόλεσιν. Cf. St. Paul's expression Philem. 22, ἐλπίζω γὰρ ὅτι διὰ τῶν προσευχῶν ὑμῶν χαρισθήσομαι ὑμῖν. On the inferences from this and the other notices in this concluding passage, see Prolegg.)

20, 21.] Solemn concluding prayer. πρῶτον παρ' αὐτῶν αἰτήσας τὰς εὐχάς, τότε καὶ αὐτὸς αὐτοῖς ἐπεύχεται πάντα τὰ ἀγαθὰ. In the presence of so many instances of the expression under different circumstances, it would perhaps be hardly safe to infer from it here any reference to danger of strife within the church addressed. Still the words are not a mere formula, and in all the above places, some reference is made, doubtless, to circumstances either of internal discussion or external tribulation. And certainly both the exhortations in vv. 17—19 point to a state in which there was danger of disobedience within and suspicion towards the Writer and those who were on

(here the personal name, Jesus, is joined with the assertion of His lordship over us: below, where the inworking of the Spirit through Him is spoken of, it is διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, His office as Christ at God's right hand having made Him the channel of the Spirit to us: the anointing on Him, the Head, flowing down to the skirts of the raiment. Cf. Acts ii. 36, ἀσφαλῶς οὖν γνωσκέτω πᾶς οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ, ὅτι καὶ κύριον αὐτὸν καὶ χριστὸν ὁ θεὸς ἐποίησεν, τοῦτον τὸν Ἰησοῦν ὃν ὑμεῖς ἔστανράσατε).

Still, as Bleek remarks, the praise of having made a beginning is not necessarily involved in the wish that they may be perfected) in every good work, towards the doing His will (cf. ch. x. 36. The expression here is in the same final sense as there, as the aor. shews: it is not εἰς τὸ ποιεῖν, 'to the habit of doing,' but εἰς τὸ ποιῆσαι, 'to the having done,' i. e. 'to the accomplishing'), doing in you (ποιῶν chosen expressly as taking up εἰς τὸ ποιῆσαι, in exact correspondence with St. Paul's saying Phil. ii. 13, ὁ ἐνεργῶν ἐν ὑμῖν καὶ τὸ θέλει καὶ τὸ ἐνεργεῖν) that which is well-pleasing in His sight (ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ, an expression of St. Luke's principally. It is a pregnant construction, involving τὸ ἀγαθὸν ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο εὐάρεστον αὐτῷ. See Eph. v. 10 al.), through Jesus Christ (the reference is variously given: to εὐάρεστον, well-pleasing &c. through J. C.; so Grot., Hammond ["secundam Christi præcepta" &c.], al.: or to the verb, ποιῶν, as Thl., ὥστε, ὅταν ποιῶμεν ἡμεῖς τὸ καλόν, ὁ θεὸς ποιεῖ τοῦτο ἐν ἡμῖν διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, τουτέστι, μεσση κ. ἐνέργω τούτω χράμενος: so Ec. The latter is by far the more probable, as the former would introduce a superfluity): to whom (i. e. to God, the chief subject of the whole sentence, God, who is the God of peace, who brought up the Lord Jesus from the dead, who can perfect us in every good work, to accomplish His will, and works in us that which is well-pleasing to Him through Jesus Christ. The whole majesty of the sentence requires this reverting to its main agent, and speaks against the referring ᾧ ἡ δόξα to our blessed Lord, who is only incidentally mentioned. See the very similar construction 1 Pet. iv. 11, where however the reference is not by any means equally certain) be (in 1 Pet. i. c. ἐστίν: and possibly also here: but perhaps ἔστω is the more probable supplement) the glory for ever. Amen. 22.]

But ('claudendi,' see above, ver. 20) I beseech you, brethren, endure (reff.) the word of my exhortation (or, of exhortation. ἀσμένως θέξαθε τὰ παρ' ἐμοῦ γράμματα, Schol.-Matth. Cf. Philo, Quod Omn. In that case no ἀνέχεσθε would have been needed. The expression λόγος παρακλήσεως applies without doubt to the whole Epistle, from what follows: not as Beza, Calov., al., to the few exhortations preceding, nor as Grot. to ch. x.—xiii. only: nor as Kuinoel, al., to the exhortations scattered up and down in the Epistle. It is St. Luke's expression, see reff.): for also (besides other reasons, there is this) in (by means of, in the material of) few [words] (few in comparison of what might have been said on such a subject. τὸσαῦτα εἰπὼν ὅμως βραχεία ταῦτά φησιν, ὅσον πρὸς ἃ ἐπεθύμει λέγειν. CHAP. I. 1.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. James (for all questions who the Author of this Epistle was, see the Prolegomena. I assume here that which I have there endeavoured to establish, that it is "James the Lord's brother," the first president or bishop of the church at Jerusalem, an Apostle, but not one of the Twelve), servant (not necessarily, as Huther, an official appellation; but implying, as he also confesses, devotion to God and His work alone, irrespectively of self-will or other men's will. Ec. says, ὕπὲρ πάντων δὲ κοσμηκὸν ἀξίωμα οἱ τοῦ κυρίου ἀπόστολοι τὸ δούλου εἶναι χριστοῦ καλλωπιζόμενοι, τούτο γνῆρισμα ἑαυτῶν βούλονται ποιῆσαι, καὶ λέγοντες, καὶ ἐπιστέλλοντες καὶ διδάσκοντες. Similarly Didymus, and Incert. in Catena) of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ (not 'of the God and Lord, J. C.,' but as Ec., θεοῦ μέν, τοῦ πατρὸς· κυρίου δέ, τοῦ υἱοῦ). Huther remarks, that in all the addresses of Epistles, the whole name Ἰησοῦς χριστός is given. St. James mentions our Lord only here and ch. ii. 1 in this Epistle, and not at all in his speeches in Acts xv. and xxi. Bengel says, "Videri potuisset, si Jesum sæpe appellaret, id ex ambitione facere, cum esset frater Domini. Atque eo minus novit Christum secundum carnem"), to the twelve tribes (of Israel: nor can there be any reasonable doubt that this Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians in the first place. Not however to them, as distinguished from Gentile Christians: for the two classes appear to have been not as yet distinct. If the later date of the Epistle be taken [see Prolegg.], then the Jewish Christians are addressed as the nucleus and kernel of all Christendom. But to my mind, the former is more probable) which are in the dispersion ("Legimus, occiso a Judæis B. Stephano, quia facta est in illa die persecutio magna in ecclesia quæ erat Hierosolymis, et omnes dispersi sunt per regiones Judææ et Samariæ, præter Apostolos. His ergo dispersis qui persecutionem passi sunt propter justitiam, mittit Epistolam." Bede. This is hardly correct; but more probable than De W.'s view that the words are used merely to describe the scattered and distressed state of the Christians, as διασπορά did of the Jews. The most likely reference of διασπορά is to the literal and actual Jewish dispersion, as in reff.: and the Epistle must be considered as addressed, from the head of the mother church in Jerusalem, to the Jewish believers, residing among the dispersed tribes of Israel), greeting (the formula χαίρειν is not found in the address of any other apostolical Epistle; but it occurs in the Epistle drawn up under the direction of James to the Bengel’s idea is good, that ‘all’ is used as applying to all kinds of temptations; transferred from the subject to the predicate, my brethren (this is the constant address in our Epistle. It betokens community of origin and of faith), whenever ye fall into (περιπίπτειν is used of becoming unexpectedly surrounded by adverse circumstances of any kind: so in refl.: so ὕστis ἂν τοιαύταις συμφοραῖς περιπέση, Plato, Legg. ix. p. 877 c: μεγάλοις ἀτυχήμασιν ὑπ’ Αἰτωλῶν, καὶ μεγάλας συμφοραῖς περιπεσόντες, Polyb. iv. 19. 13: περιπεσῶν βιαίοις πληγαῖς, ib. iii. 116. 9. Herodotus also uses the expression, cf. vi. 16, and Thuc. ii. 54) various temptations (the πειρασμοί here are not only what we properly call temptations, but any kind of distresses which happen to us, from without or from within, which in God’s purpose serve as trials of us: the latter word being, in this its now common general meaning, a word derived from the Christian life. See ref. 1 Pet., which is strictly parallel. Ec. says, after Chrys. [in Catena], τὴν κατὰ θεὸν λύπην καὶ τοὺς πειρασμοὺς τούτους καὶ ἐπαινετοὺς οἶδε καὶ χαρὰς ἀγίους· δεσμὸς γὰρ οὗτοί εἰσιν ἀρβραγῆς, καὶ αὐθῆσις ἀγαπῆς καὶ κατανύξεως. Then, after quoting Sir. ii. 1: John xvi. 33: and Matt. vii. 14, . . .

οὐ γὰρ ἐστὶν ἐκτὸς γυμνασίων οὔτε κοσμικῶν οὔτε τῶν κατὰ θεὸν στεφάνων ἀξιωθῆναι): 3.] Ground of this joy:

knowing (as you do) that the proof of your faith (δοκίμιον, or δοκιμείον, Plato, Tim. p. 65 c. Pott explains it, “quo quid exploratur;” Heisen, “quo rei, quæ sub examen vocatur, manifestatur sinceritas, eaque probatur omne id intrinsecæ virtute possidere, quod extrinsecus specie et nomine præ se fert.” So in Dion. Hal. Rhetor. ii., δεῖ δὲ ὡςπερ κανόνα εἶναι καὶ σταθμὴν τινα καὶ δοκίμιον ὀριζόμενον πρὸς ὃ τις ἀποβλέπων δυνήσεται τὴν κρίσιν ποιῆσθαι: so, but joining with the idea of a test that of amelioration and perfecting also, Herodian ii. 10. 12, δοκίμιον δὲ στρατιωτῶν κάματος ἀλλ’ οὐ τροφή. The word must be taken here as abstract, ‘the proving,’ not as concrete, ‘the medium of proof,’ viz. the temptations. See further on 1 Pet. i. 7) worketh (reff.) endurance (ὑπομονή, “perseverantia, quod magis est quam patientia,” Theile. But does not St. Paul, Rom. v. 3, 4, state precisely the converse, viz. that ἡ θλιψὶς ὑπομονὴν κατεργάζεται, ἡ δὲ ὑπομονὴ δοκίμην? Doubtless: but it is really the same that is said: θλιψὶς there = τὸ δοκίμιον here. As De Wette observes, the thought is not carried to its end as in Rom., but the Apostle breaks away at ὑπομονήν to exhort respecting it): 4.] but (q. d. and be not weary of enduring: but) let endurance have a perfect work (σκοπέι, οὐκ εἶπε τὴν ὑπομονὴν ὀριστικῶς, ὅτι ἔργον τέλειον ἔχει, ἀλλὰ προστακτικῶς, ἐχέτω· οὐ γὰρ προῖκοιμένην ἀρετὴν ἐξαγγέλλει, ἀλλὰ νῦν ἐγγινομένην ὡς χρὴ γενέσθαι νομοθετεῖ. Ec. In fact, from the repetition of ἔργον from κατεργάζεται, it is much as if he had said ἡ δὲ ὑπομονὴ κατεργάσθω σωτηρίαν τέλειον. The illusion seems to be to our Lord’s saying Matt. xxiv. 13, ὁ δὲ ὑπομείνας εἰς τέλος, οὗτος σωθήσεται. So that the words are to be taken simply and literally; ὑπομονή as the abstract, endurance, and ἔργον as the work wrought out [see refl.]

by ὑπομονή in its continuance: not as by De Wette after Erasmus [“Tolerantia non habebit laudem absolutam, nisi quemadmodum in malis tolerandis fortis est et alacris, ita in bonis operibus exercendis sibi constet”], Calov., Morus [“Tolerantia adjunctum habeat factum”], Pott [“Perseverantiae fructus sit perfectum virtutis studium”], al., to be understood as if ὑπομονή were ὁ ὑπομένων, and ἔργον the aggregate of ἔργα. And τέλειος is not to be understood as = εἰς τέλος ὑπομένων, but in its ordinary sense of ‘perfect,’ fully brought out and accomplished. And as Bengel remarks, “Perfecta est patientia, quæ gaudet”, that ye may be perfect (for the work of God in a man is the man. If God’s teaching by patience have had a perfect work in you, you are perfect: His is a λόγος ἔμφυτος, ver. 21. And the purpose of that work is, to make us perfect) and entire (that in which every part is present in its place: so we have ὁλόκληρος καὶ ὕγιής, Plato, Tim. p. 44 c: τὸ βασίλειον ὄν ἐν ὁλοκλήρῳ τῷ γένει, Corp. Inscr. 353. 26. The word is much used in Philo [see also Athenæus vii. p. 700 and Pollux i. 1 in Wolf here] of sacrifices and sacrificing priests, in a technical sense, of which however there is no trace here), deficient in nothing (the subjoining a negative corroboration to a positive clause is characteristic of St. James: cf. vv. 5 and 6. The expression here is illustrated by Raphel from Polyb. p. 1202, l. 15, ἐν τῇ πρὸς Ῥωμαίους εὐνοίᾳ παρὰ πολὺ τὰ δελφοῦ λειπόμενος. Here however there is no comparison with others, only one implied with that ὁλοκληρία which ought to be their ultimate state). 5.] But (q. d. but this perfection and entireness, this defect in nothing, will not be yet attained; and you will find, when you aim at it, that you are lacking in the very first requisite) if any of you (εἰ is not “quandoquidem,” as Estius, but εἴ τις is as usual ‘if any,’ and nearly = ὅστις ἄν) is deficient in (of, gen. as in ch. ii. 15) wisdom (τὸ αἴτιον τοῦ τελείου ἔργου σοφίαν λέγει, Ec. Huther quotes from the Etym. Mag., γνῶσις μὲν ἐστὶ τὸ εἰδέναι τὰ ὕψα· σοφία δέ, καὶ τὸ τὰ ὕψα γινώσκειν καὶ τὸ τὰ γνωστὰ πράττειν. For what is meant by wisdom here, see ch. iii. 15—17), let him ask (either supply ‘it,’ or take the verb absolutely, which is better: so E. V., see below) from God who giveth (the part. is put first because it is that which is to be brought out in the sentence: q. d. ‘from the giver, God.’ Thus asking and giving are put forward as belonging to us and God in the abstract, and we do not want any object, as τὴν σοφίαν, supplied) to all men simply (so Rom. xii. 8, ὁ μεταδιδούς, ἐν ἀπλότητι: but perhaps ἀπλότης may also signify liberality. See note on that place. It is not however necessary here to render “benigne,” as Bede, Casaubon, al.: nor “affluenter,” as Erasim., Grot., Est., al.; nor “candide,” “sincere,” as Pott, Theile, al.; nor = συντόμιος, καθάπαξ, as Hesychius: but we must interpret by what follows, and understand it of simply giving, and adding nothing afterwards which may take off from the graciousness of the gift) and upbraided not (in what sense is rather doubtful. Many [Morus, Carpov, Storr, al.] interpret it of sending away with a refusal: but as Huther remarks, though κατασχύνειν may bear this meaning, ὀνειδίζειν is never found so used: certainly not in Sir. xx. 15, ἄφρων . . . ὀλίγα δώσει καὶ πολλὰ ὀνειδίσει. By far the greatest part of Commentators understand it of reproaching by the recounting of benefits bestowed. But this again does not reach the full and general nature of the expression here: nor does it find any justification in that of Demosthenes, p. 316. 10, ὑπομιμνήσκειν τὰς ἰδίας εὐεργεσίας μικροῦ δεῖν ὁμοῖον ἐστὶ τῷ ὀνειδίζειν: for it is one thing to say that such reminding is almost equivalent to ὀνειδίζειν, and another and a widely different one to use ὀνειδίζειν in this sense, which is never done. The real meaning here is just as in Sir. xx. 15 above, and in Sir. xli. 22, μετὰ τὸ δοῦναι μὴ ὀνειδίξει, viz. upbraiding with any kind of reproaches, as God might well do, so unworthy are we to approach Him with any request. This of course would include that other: but as Semler, “Non tantum significat molestam commemorationem beneficiorum, sed etiam qualemcunque reprehensionem.” So De ἐκεῖνος,—“ut qui sit animo duplici,” &c. There is no objection to this, but that it does not so well suit the abrupt and predicative style of St. James. How De Wette can say that it would require the article, I cannot imagine: the art. would be only admissible in two cases: 1. if [ὁ] ἀνὴρ were subject, and διψυχος, ἀκατάστ. . . . predicate; 2. on the rendering of the E. V., “The [a] double-minded man [generic] is,” &c. But then we should surely not have ἀνὴρ, but ἄνθρωπος. From this passage the use of διψυχος spread onwards in the Fathers: we have very early, in the Apostol. Constt. vii. 11, μὴ γίνου διψυχος ἐν προσευχῇ εἰ ἔσται ἡ οὐ: in Clem.-rom. i. 23, p. 260, ταλαίπωροί εἰσιν οἱ διψυχοί, οἱ διατάζοντες τὴν ψυχὴν. The διακρίνεσθαι arises out of the διψυχία: this causes him, as Sir. ii. 12, ἐπιβαίνειν ἐπὶ δύο τρίβους. Cf. also Sir. i. 27, μὴ ἀπειθήσης φάβω κυρίου, καὶ μὴ προσέλθῃς αὐτῷ ἐν καρδίᾳ δισσή, and Tanchuma Rabba in Deut. xxvi. 17, “Ne habeant [qui preces ad Deum facere velint] duo corda, unum ad Deum, aliud vero ad aliam rem directum”.)

9.] The connexion appears to be this: we must not pray before God, we must not be before God, double-minded; in our trials, we shall get no heavenly wisdom, if this is so. This double-mindedness, one soul drawn upwards to God, the other drawn downwards to the world, causes nothing but instability, and cannot result in that joy which is to be our attitude in trial. And it arises from misapprehension of our appointed state in trial: the poor and humble forget the exceeding honour thus done to them, which ought to be to them ground of boasting, far more worthy than (see below) the rich in this world have in their riches which shall so soon fade away: whereas (ver. 12) he that is tried shall receive a crown of life from the Lord. But (contrasted with the διψυχία above) let the brother (the Christian believer) who is low (poor and afflicted; not merely, low in station: this explanation goes with the view that ὁ δὲ πλούσιος below is Christian also) glory in his exaltation (which he has obtained by being admitted into the fellowship of Christ's sufferings, and which he has further in reversion in the glorious crown of life hereafter, ver. 12): 10.] but the rich (not ὁ ἀδελφὸς ὁ πλούσιος, nor is the πλούσιος to be understood any otherwise than in the rest of the Epistle, cf. ch. ii. 6 f.; v. 1 ff. There are difficulties either way; but on mature consideration I find those on the usual hypothesis, of the πλούσιος being also a brother, insuperable. For in that case, 1. a most unnatural change in the sense is necessary at ὅτι: ‘Let the rich brother glory in his humiliation, for, or because, considered merely as a rich man,’ &c.: so that ὁ πλούσιος is a Christian brother at first, and then a mere rich man in the next clause: 2. such a meaning will not suit οὕτως καὶ ὁ πλούσιος ἐν ταῖς πορείαις αὐτοῦ μαρτυρήσεται, which is simply predicated of ὁ πλούσιος above, and cannot with any probability be supposed to be said of him merely quoad his riches. Whereas on the other view the difficulties are no more than arise from a confessedly elliptical parallelism. After ὁ δὲ πλούσιος we must supply, not necessarily καυχάσθω, but rather καυχᾶται: ‘Let the ταπεινὸς glory in his exaltation, whereas the rich man glories in his debasement,’ cf. Phil. iii. 19, ὧν ἡ δόξα ἐν τῇ αἰσχύνῃ αὐτῶν. The above view, as far as πλούσιος is concerned, is adopted by the author of the Comm. on the Lamentations in Jerome's works [“Quod autem dicit, filiam Edom gaudere et lætari quod pervenerit ad eam calix Domini, per ironiam legendum est, et est illud in epistola Jacobi apostoli . . . ‘dives autem in humilitate sua,’ subauditur a superiore gloriatur, quod non tamen ad gloriam, sed ad humilitatem ejus et damnationem pertinet?”], Bede, Lyra, Thomas Aq., Beza, Wetst., Pott, Hottinger, Luther, al.: but impugned by De Wette, Wiesinger, Stier, al.) glories (see above) in his humiliation (cf. ref. Phil.: in that which is in reality his debasement, just as in the other case the lowly Christian is called on to boast in what is in reality his exaltation. Thus, and thus only, the parallelism coheres. On the ordinary view, the ἕψος of the ταπεινὸς brother is, that which is really but not apparently his exaltation, whereas the ταπεινωσις of the πλούσιος brother is that which is apparently but not really his debasement); because as a flower

11.] For (justification of ὡς ἄνθος χόρτον παρελεύσεται) the sun arose (it is given in the form of a tale, a narration of what happened and ever does happen: see Isa. xl. 7, from which the whole is adapted) with the heat (or, the hot east wind, the $\epsilon\pi\eta\rho\varsigma$: this interpretation seems approved by ref. Jonah, καὶ ἐγένετο ἅμα τῷ ἀνατεῖλαι τὸν ἥλιον, καὶ προσέταξεν ὁ θεὸς [κύριος ὁ θ. A] πνεύματι καύσωνι [-ρος ABN]: see Winer, Realw. art. "Wind." But καύσων in ref. Matt. and Isa. xlix. 10, is evidently only heat: and considering, 1. the relation between that Gospel and St. James, and, 2. that the LXX, when the Kadim is intended, almost always add ὁ ἄνεμος or τὸ πνεῦμα, I prefer the other meaning, the arid scorching which accompanies the increasing power of the sun), and dried up the grass, and the flower thereof fell away (all from Isaiah), and the beauty of its appearance (so πρόσ-ωπον in reff., the external appearance of any thing) perished: thus also shall the rich man (the same as was spoken of ver. 10: not ὁ πλούσιος αὐτοῦ, but the πλούσιος himself) wither (reff.: the verb continues the similitude) in his ways (cf. ref. Psalm and Prov. ii. 8. Luther's translation, in seiner Habe, rests on the reading πορείαις). 12.] We now return to the suffering and tempted Christian, who has his μακαρισμός, and a possession more precious and more sure than worldly wealth. Blessed is the man

(no stress on ἀνὴρ, cf. vv. 7, 8, 20) who endureth (the emphasis is on ὑπομένει, which distinguishes this saying from that in ver. 2; it is not the mere περιπεσεῖν πειρασμοῖς, but the ὑπομένειν πειρασμόν, which is felicitated. There is no reason to read ὑπομενεῖ, as Bengel. The blessing is categorical, and as well expressed by the present as by the future) temptation: because when he has become approved (by the trial: when he has undergone the δοκιμίον, ver. 2. This δοκιμος γενόμενος, as connected with that verse, furnishes some support to the reading which omits τῆς πίστεως there. The δοκιμίον is of himself, and it is he that becomes δοκιμος by it) he shall receive the crown of life (τῆς ζωῆς is gen. of apposition: the crown is life eternal: τῆς ζωῆς, 'vitæ illius,' of that life of which we know, which is glorious and eternal. No image derived from athletes must be thought of in the verse, as is done by many: such an image would be foreign to the ideas of Jews, with whom the receiving a crown from God was a familiar image, irrespective of any previous contest for a prize: cf. Ps. xxi. 3: Wisd. v. 16, λήψονται τὸ βασίλειον τῆς εὐπρεπείας καὶ τὸ διάδημα τοῦ κάλλους ἐκ χειρὸς κυρίου), which He promised to them that love Him (who promised it, is understood: God, repeatedly, in substance: whenever a kingdom is foretold as the future inheritance of His people: τοῖς ἀγαπῶσιν αὐτόν, cf. 2 Tim. iv. 8, and the same words again in ch.

13.] Let no one when tempted (in the manner hitherto spoken of through the chapter. There is no warrant for changing in the slightest degree the reference of the word. The 'tentatio' is a trying of the man by the solicitation of evil: whether that evil be the terror of external danger, or whatever it be, all ἁπειράζεσθαι by means of it arises not from God, but from ourselves—our own ἐπιθυμία. God ordains the temptation, overrules the temptation, but does not tempt, is not the spring of the solicitation to sin) say that (ἁτι recitantis) I am tempted from God (by agency proceeding out and coming from God: very different from ἁπὸ θεοῦ, which would represent God as the agent: as indeed He is in ἁπειράζει δὲ αὐτὸς οὐδένα below. See Winer, § 47 b. b note. Thus the man would transfer his own responsibility to God. There does not seem to be any allusion to the fatalism of the Pharisees, as Schneckenburger, al. seem to think: the fault is one of common life, and is alluded to Sir. xv. 11, μη εἶπης ἁτι διὰ κύριον ἁπίστην): for God is unversed in things evil (the meaning usually given, "untempted," or "not able to be tempted," is against the usage of the word. It occurs in four forms, ἁπειράτος, ἁπειράτος, ἁπειρήτος [Ion.], and ἁπειράστος; and in all of them seems to have but two meanings: 1. that has not been tried: so οὐδὲν ἁπειράτον ἔστι τι, Dem. p. 310; πόντος ἁπειράτος ἁν τοῖς ἁλλησι, Luc. Tox. 3: 2. that has not tried: so οὐκ ἁπειράτος καλῶν, Pind. Ol. 10 (11). 18; ἁλλοδαπῶν οὐκ ἁπειράτοι δόμοι, id. Nem. 1. 33; κακῶν ἁπειράτος [that has never experienced adversity], Plut. παρήσιας, ἁρωτος ἁπειράτος, unversed in free speaking, in love, Lucian, Plut. See Palm and Rost's Lex., and numerous other examples in Wetstein. And even if we chose here to depart from usage, and suppose that ἁπειράστος is not a later form of ἁπειράτος, but a verbal from ἁπειράω, to be interpreted by the meaning of that verb in the context, we should get a meaning for ἁπειράστος entirely foreign from the context: viz. that God is not tempted of evil, whereas there is no question here of God being tempted, but of God tempting. Some have endeavoured to escape this by giving ἁπειράστος an active sense—"God is not one who tempteth to evil." So Schol. in Cramer's Catena: ἁτι ὁ θεὸς ἁπειράζων ἐπ' ἁφελεία, οὐκ ἐπὶ τῷ κακοποιῆσαι διὸ καὶ ἐλέχθη ἁτι ὁ θεὸς ἁπειράστος ἔστι κακῶν: so the Æthiopic version: the vulg., "Deus intenter malorum est." Luther, al. This doubtless it may have: we find μηροὶ καλυπτῆς ἐξέκειντο πιμελῆς, Soph. Ant. 1011: τῷμῳ τῶνδρι μεμπτός, id. Trach. 446: ἁποπτος Τρωικῆς ἀλώσεως, Eur. Hec. 1117. But there are two objections: 1. that this sense would be tautological, the succeeding clause only repeating the assertion: 2. that thus the gen. κακῶν can only mean 'of evil men:' 'God is no tempter of evil men,' which is out of the question. It seems then that we must take refuge in the ordinary meaning of the word, and render it 'unversed in,' 'having no experience of.' And thus De Wette and Huther. Ec. takes the words as in the citation from Plutarch above: τὸ θεῖον τε καὶ κακῆριον οὐτε αὐτὸ πράγματα ἁχει, οὐτε ἁτέροις παρέχει: which is decidedly wrong. Taken as above, ἁπειράστος does not carry a negation of ἁπειράζει, but forms a paronomasia with it: and the sentiment is just as in the passage of Sir. above quoted, which goes on ἁν βδέλυγμα ἐμίσησεν κύριος, but (the δέ takes up the contrast again from ἁπειράζομαι: 'not so, but.' I may observe that the δέ is against the ordinary acceptation of ἁπειράστος, on which it ought to be καὶ) HE tempteth no man (the αὐτὸς does not, as commonly supposed, bring out God's action in distinction to His not being tempted—'as He is not tempted, so neither does He himself tempt any man' [see this urged in Wiesinger]: but brings out this, that the temptation indeed takes place, but from another cause. Huther gives the sense well: "Let none say when he is tempted to evil, From God am I tempted: for God hath no part in evil: but as to the temptation, He tempteth no man" &c.): 14.] but each man is tempted, being (slightly causal, 'in that he is') drawn out and enticed by (ἀπό again, as the source here, rather than the agent) his own lust (the image, if we are justified in supposing that a fixed one was contemplated from the first, seems to be, as Pott observes [in Huther], "ἐπιθυμία, ἁμαρτία, et θάνατος personarum vim habent: imaginem meretricis suppeditant voces συλλαβεῖν, τίκτειν, ἀποκύνειν, necnon et ἐξέλκειν atque δελεάζειν." The participles ἐξελκόμενος and δελεαζόμενος are abundantly illustrated by the Commentators, e. g. in Wetst. by Xen. Mem. ii. 1. 4, τὰ . . . ζωα . . . τούτων γὰρ δήπου τὰ μὲν γαστρι δελεαζόμενα . . . τῇ ἐπιθυμίᾳ τοῦ φαγεῖν ἀγόμενα πρὸς τὸ δέλεαρ, ἀλίσκεται. And Herod. ii. 70, of taking the crocodile, ἐπεὶν ἠὲ ὄντος δελεάζειν περὶ ἄγκιστρον κ.τ.λ. . . ὁ κροκόδειλος . . . ἐπεὶν ἐξελκυσθῆ ἔς γῆν κ.τ.λ. Schneckenburger says, "ἐξέλκειν et δελεάζειν sunt verba e re venatoria et piscatoria in rem amatorum et inde in nostrum tropum translata:" only we must not here interpret ἐξέλκειν which precedes δελεάζειν, as in Herod. above, "to draw to land," but rather as Schulthess, "elicere bestias ex tuto, ubi latent, in locum hamis retibusque expositum." But, as Huther observes, it is hardly likely that the original reference of the words would be distinctly before the Apostle as he used them. Cf. Aristot. Polit. v. 10, παρὰ τῆς γυναικὸς ἐξελκυσθεῖς, "ab uxore sollicitatus." In the Test. XII. Patrum, p. 702 [Kypke], Joseph says of Potiphar's wife, εἰς πορνείαν με ἐφέλκυσατο. And of Homer's αὐτὸς γὰρ ἐφέλκεται ἄνδρα σίδηρος, Od. π. 294: and, which is the nearest correspondence of all, Plut. de Sera Numinis Vindicta [in Huther], τὸ γλυκὺ τῆς ἐπιθυμίας ὡσπερ δέλεαρ ἐξέλκειν [ἀνθρώπους]. With regard to the matter treated, and the proper sense of ἐπιθυμία here, it seems to me that Huther is right in setting aside the difficulties which Hofmann [Schriftb. i. p. 415] and after him Wiesinger, have found in this passage as compared with Rom. vii. 7. St. James is not here speaking of the original source of sin in man, but of the actual source of temptation to sin, when it occurs. The ἁμαρτία of St. Paul, the sinful principle in man, is not here in question: we take up the matter, so to speak, lower down the stream: and the ἐπιθυμία here is the ἐπιθυμία there, itself the effect of sin [abstr.] in the members, and leading to sin [concrete] in the conduct): 15.] then lust having conceived, bringeth forth sin: and (δέ brings out the new subject) sin, when completed, bringeth forth death (it has been questioned whether ἁμαρτία is here in one, or in two senses. De Wette holds that the first ἁμαρτία is the purpose, or inner act, of sin,—the ἀποτελεσθεῖσα carrying this ἁμαρτία out into an act, which act brings forth death, the wages of sin. But this is decidedly wrong. Wiesinger has disputed it, and insisted rightly that the inner act is the union of the will with the ἐπιθυμία, the τίκτει denoting extrusion into outward act: then the second ἁμαρτία,—which Huther rightly maintains to be, not as Wiesinger, after Calvin, "cursus peccandi completus," but the sinful act when brought to perfection in all its consequences, in a series of results following on one another and bringing a man under bondage to his sin,—being thus perfected, brings forth eternal death. The imagery is throughout consistent. The harlot ἐπιθυμία, ἐξέλκει and δελεάζει the man: the guilty union is committed by the will embracing the temptress: the consequence is that she τίκτει ἁμαρτίαν, sin, in general, of some kind, of that kind to which the temptation inclines: then, ἡ ἁμαρτία, that particular sin, when grown up and mature, —herself ἀποκύνει, 'extrudit,' as if all along pregnant with it, Death, the final result of sin. So that temptation to sin cannot be from God, while trial is from Him. The one, being δοκίμιον ἡμῶν, κατεργάζεται ὑπομονὴν ἢ δὲ ὑπομονή, ἔργον τέλειον ἔχουσα, τὴν ζώην: the other, being ἐξέλκυσις κ. δέλεαρ arising from ἐπιθυμία, τίκτει ἁμαρτίαν ἢ δὲ ἁμαρτία ἀποτελεσθεῖσα ἀποκύνει θάνατον. The English reader will not fail to remember Milton's sublime allegory in Paradise Lost, where Satan, by his own evil lust, brings forth sin: and then by an incestuous union with Sin [which doubtless may be said to lie here also in the background, no cause being assigned for the ἀποκύνει] causes her to bring forth Death. As regards the single expressions, συλλαβοῦσα τίκτει is a regular LXX formula for τῆς ἁμαρτίας: cf. reff. Gen., also xxx. 17 al. fr. ἀποκύνειν, or ἀποκύνειν [either is allowable, see Winer, § 15] is found principally in later Greek: Wetst. gives examples from Maximus Tyr., Herodian, Lucian, Phlegon,—all with this meaning. For ἀποτελεσθεῖσα, cf. Polyb. ii. 58. 7, τὸ μέγιστον ἀσέβημα κατὰ προαίρεσιν ἀπετέλεσαν. 16—18.] The idea that God tempts to sin has been as yet only negatively contradicted. But so far is it from this being so, that He is the Author of all good. 16.] Do not err (some have ended the paragraph with these words: some have begun a new one. But Theile [in Huther] rightly remarks of this formula, “Ubi antecedentia respicit, nunquam finit cohortationem, sed ita interpositum est, ut continuet et firmet, nunc illustrando, nunc cavendo.” It occurs in reff.: see also 1 John iii. 7 [μηδεὶς πλανάτω ὑμᾶς]. Still we must not take Theile’s further exposition, “Nolite in alterum errorem abstrahi, ut nempe bona quoque a summo numine abjudicetis:” for this does not lie in the context), my beloved brethren (both this earnest address, and the caution, shew how important the Writer feels this to be, which he is about to enunciate): 17.] every good gift (δόσις, properly the act of giving: but the ideas of the giving and the gift are so convertible, that it as often has the passive meaning: as πράξις, and other similar words. So in reff. Prov., δόσις λάθριος ἀνατρέπει ὀργάς, δῶρων δὲ ὁ φειδόμενος θυμὸν ἐγείρει ἰσχυρόν) and every perfect gift (we cannot express δόσις and δῶρημα by two words in English. There is a slight climax in δῶρημα, as there is in τέλειον compared with ἀγαθὴ; it brings out the gratuitous and ‘proprio motu’ element in the gift, as is done again by βουληθεῖς below. πᾶσα and πᾶν are taken by Raphel, Bengel, al. in an exclusive sense, “nothing but good gifts and perfect gifts” &c. This is perhaps allowable, but it weakens the force of the sentence and spoils the context, the object of which is to shew, not that God’s gifts are all good, but that all good gifts come from Him. So that πᾶσα and πᾶν are better kept in their ordinary senses, and the stress laid, in each case, on the adjectives, ἀγαθὸν and τέλειον) descendeth from above (ἄνωθεν ἐστὶν καταβαῖνον) belong together, not as E. V., Grot., Wolf, al., ἄνωθεν ἐστὶν, καταβαῖνον. This is shewn by ἄνωθεν κατερ-χομένη, ch. iii. 15. ἐστὶν serves to bring out the essential quality of the gift; is, by its nature, sent down from above. Wies. quotes from Bereschith Rabba, 51. 1, “Dixit R. Chanina, Non est res mala descendens desuper”, from the Father of the lights [of heaven] (it seems now generally agreed that by τὰ φῶτα here is meant the heavenly bodies, and by πατήρ the creator, originator, as in Job xxxviii. 28, τίς ἐστὶν ἕτοῦ πατῆρ; Being this, being the Father of those glorious fountains of light, and thus [see below] purer and clearer than they all, it cannot be that He should tempt to evil. Our very life, as renewed in Christ, is of His begetting, and we are a firstfruit of His new world.

Various meanings have been given to τῶν φῶτων—spiritual light, Grot.: illumination, with reference to the Urim, Heisen: “luminum spiritualium in regno gratiae et gloriae,” Bengel: “omnis perfectionis, bonitatis, sapientiae et prosperitatis,” Wolf, Benson, al.: “omnis et praestantiae et bene compositi ordinis,” Calv. As regards the word φῶτα, we have, Ps. cxxxv. 7 ff., τῷ ποιήσαντι φῶτα μεγάλα . . . τὸν ἥλιον . . . τὴν σελήνην καὶ τοὺς ἀστέρας κ.τ.λ.: Jer. iv. 23, ἐπέβλεψα ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν, καὶ ἰδοὺ οὐθέν, καὶ εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, καὶ οὐκ ἦν τὰ φῶτα αὐτοῦ. In Gen. i. 14, 16 they are φωστῆρες, with (‘chez,’ ‘apud,’ ‘bei’: see reff.) whom there is (ἐνι, abbreviation of ἔνεστι: see reff. Not = ἔστι, but carrying the meaning ‘inest,’ ‘there is in Him’) no change (πόθεν δέ, says Arrian on Epict. i. 14, p. 62, πρὸς τὴν ἀΐξησιν καὶ μείωσιν τῆς σελήνης, καὶ τὴν τοῦ ἡλίου πρόσ-οδον καὶ ἄφοδον, τοσαύτη παραλλαγή καὶ ἐπὶ τὰ ἐναντία μεταβολὴ τῶν ἐπιγείων θεωρεῖται. This sentence confirms what Gebser [in Huther, al.] has observed, that παραλλαγή never occurs as an astronomical term: seeing it is used in its common sense, even where the heavenly bodies are being spoken of. Besides which, it is not at all probable that St. James should write to the dispersed Jewish Christians in the technical language of astronomy. I take then the word in its ordinary sense, ‘change:’ that uncertainty of degree of light which we see in the material heavenly bodies, but which is not in God their Creator. So in Wetst., we have Theophrastus speaking of a παραλλαγή τις εὐσμίας καὶ ἀσσμίας: Plato, Rep. vii., of the absurdity of one who looks on the order and symmetry of the heavenly bodies, and νομίζοντα γίνεσθαι τε ταῦτα αἰεὶ ὡσαύτως, κ. οὐδαμῇ οὐδὲν παραλλάττειν σώμα τε ἔχοντα καὶ ὀρώμενα: Plotinus, Enn. vi. 6. 3, of a παραλλαγή ἡμερῶν πρὸς νύκτας; Diogenes Laert. vii. 145 Zeno, of the moon eclipsing the sun, καὶ πάλιν παραλλάττουσα) or shadow (ἀποσκίασμα, the dark mark of shadow,—σκίασμα, the result of σκιάζεσθαι, cast ἀπό, from, any object) of turning (arising from turning. Here again we must look for a common-sense, not for an astronomical meaning of the word. τροπαὶ ἡλίου are, it is true, the solstices: but they have nothing to do with any darkening of the sun. So that I would take τροπή in the general sense of turning, or revolution, in which the heavens are ever found: by means of which the moon turns her dark side to us, in a constant state of παραλλαγή and τροπῆς ἀποσκίασμα: by means of which the moon is eclipsed by the shadow of the earth, and the sun by the body of the moon, or, if you will, though this is hardly so likely to have been in view, is hidden from us during the night. From all these God, the Father of lights, is free; as 1 John i. 5, ὁ θεὸς φῶς ἐστίν, καὶ σκοτία ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἐστίν οὐδεμία. It only remains to repudiate altogether, as inadmissible, the meaning given by Ec., the metaphorical acceptance of ἀποσκίασμα, ἀντὶ τοῦ οὐδὲ μέχρῃς ὑπονοίας τινὸς ὑποβολή, not a shadow of any change. So Hesych. [ἀλλοιώσεως καὶ φαντασίας ὁμοίωμα], Wolf, Lösner, Morus, Rosenm., al.).

 18.] The greatest example of this position, that all good and perfect gifts come from Him: mentioned not merely as an example, but as leading on to the following context. Because He willed it (the aor. part. is, 1. contemporary with the verb: 2. slightly causal, involving the condition of the act which follows. It was of His own mere will, 'proprio motu,' and the emphasis is on this word. "Exprimit quod Deus pro suo beneplacito nos genuerit, atque ita sibi fuerit causa. Unde sequitur, naturale esse Deo benefacere." Calvin) begat He (ἀποκύνει or -εἶν [see above, ver. 15], here in the sense generare, as there parere. Cf. 1 Pet. i. 23: 1 John iii. 9. The spiritual birth, not the natural, is meant, as is evident by what follows) us (ἡμᾶς, twice repeated, signifies the Writer and his readers, not Christians in general: not especially as Jewish Christians, Ἰουδαίῳ πρώτῳ,—for that is not [see below] the reference here) with the word of truth (the gen. is one of apposition: cf. John xvii. 17, ὁ λόγος ὁ σοὺς ἀληθείᾳ ἐστι. And the word of truth is the gospel, preached, and ἔμφυτος as below: cf. 1 Pet. i. 23, ἀναγεγεννημένοι. . . διὰ λόγου ζῶντος θεοῦ. The failure of the articles does not alter the sense. It is especially a characteristic of the abrupt sententious style of our Apostle. Cf. ποιηταὶ λόγου, ver. 22, where λόγος must be 'the word;' and indeed passim. Ec. makes λόγος personal: ἵνα μή τις ὑπολάβῃ ὁμοίως ἡμῖν καὶ τὸν υἱὸν ἀποτεκεῖν αὐτόν, καὶ μεθ' ἡμῶν καὶ τὸν υἱὸν γεγεννηῆσθαι, ἐπάγει τό, λόγῳ ἀληθείας, πάντα γὰρ κατὰ τὸν θεῖον Ἰωάννην διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ ἐγένετο: and so Athanasius, Sermon. iii. advers. Arianos, vol. ii. p. 483; and Bernard, Sermon. ii. ad Fratres [?]: which is clearly wrong), that we should be (aim, but not the primary aim, of the ἀποκυνῆσαι. His gracious purpose with regard to us in particular was, that should be, &c. His great purpose with regard to all Christians is not here in question. Hence ἡμᾶς is repeated) a kind of firstfruit ("τινα similitudinis est nota, nos quodammodo esse primitias," Calv. It does not appear to be intended as Bengel, "Quaedam" habet modestiam, nam primitiæ proprie et absolute est Christus." Rather, I should say, it would point to the early date of our Epistle, in which an idea afterwards so familiar is thus introduced as it were with an apologetic explanation. The figure in ἀπαρχή is from the appointment of the law by which the firstborn of man, of cattle, of fruits &c., were to be conseerated to God; and the word must be taken with this sacred meaning, not merely as a 'verbum commune' indicating priority. The first Christians, to whom St. James is writing, were as firstborn of the great family, dedicated as firstfruits to God. Wiesinger beautifully says, "The thought fully given would be this: they by Regeneration were dedicated as the firstfruits of a sacrificial gift which shall only be completed with the offering up of all κτίσματα") of His creatures (τὰ κτίσματα αὐτοῦ manifestly extends wider than merely to the great multitude of the regenerated whom no man can number; it embraces all creation, which we know shall partake in the ultimate glorious perfection of the sons of God: cf. Rom. viii. 20, 21. Obviously, the κτίσματα are not the καινή κτίσις, as Grot. and many others). Wiesinger has an important note, shewing from this verse what must be the right understanding of much which follows in this Epistle. "This passage," he says, "is among those which reveal the depth of Christian knowledge in which the practical and moral exhortations of the Writer are grounded: lying as it does expressly (διό, ver. 21) at the basis of them. We will here bring together in a few words the teaching of the passage, for the sake of its important bearing on the rest of the Epistle. It teaches us, 1. as a positive supplement to vv. 14, 15, that the life of man must be renewed, from its very root and foundation: 2. it designates this renewal as God's work, moreover as an imparting of the life of God (ἀπεκύησε), as only possible by the working of the Spirit, only on the foundation of the objective fact of our Redemption in Christ, which is the content of the λόγος ἀληθείας: 3. it sets forth this re-generation as an act once for all accomplished (ἀπεκύησεν, aor.) and distinguishes it from the gradual penetration and sanctification of the individual life by means of this new principle of life imparted in the re-generation: 4. it declares also expressly that the re-generation is a free act of God's love (βουληθείς) not induced by any work of man (Eph. ii. 8, 9: Titus iii. 5), so that man is placed by God in his right relation to God, antecedently to all works well-pleasing to God: for this the expression ἀπεκύησεν involves: cf. ἐξελέξατο, ch. ii. 5, and in so far as this ἀπεκύησεν necessarily implies the justification of the sinner (the δικαιοῦσθαι of St. Paul), it is plain also, that St. James cannot, without contradicting himself, make this δικαιοῦσθαι, in the sense of St. Paul, dependent on the works of faith. 5. λόγος ἀληθείας is specified as the objective medium of re-generation: and herewith we must have πίστις as the appropriating medium on the part of man himself: of the central import of which πίστις in St. James also we have already seen something (vv. 3, 6), and shall see more (ch. ii. 5, 14 ff.). 6. Together with this act of re-generation proceeding from God, we have also the high destination of the Christian, which the Apostle gives so significantly and deeply in εἰς τὸ εἶναι κ.τ.λ. And that which God has done to him, is now in the following verses made the foundation of that which the Christian has on his part to do: by which that which we said under (3) and (4) receives fresh confirmation. This passage is one to be remembered, when we wish to know what the Apostle understands by the νόμος τέλειος (i. 25; ii. 12), and what he means, when (ii. 14 ff.) he deduces δικαιοῦσθαι from the works of faith. As regards the dogmatical use, which some make of this passage, wishing to shew that regeneration is brought about by the word, as distinguished from the Sacrament of Baptism (Titus iii. 5—7), we may remark, that seeing that λόγος ἀληθείας designates the gospel, as a whole, without any respect to such distinction, nothing regarding it can be gathered from this passage. The word of the Lord constitutes, we know, the force of the Sacrament also. 'Accedit verbum ad elementum et fit Sacramentum.' And is it meant to be inferred that the readers of this Epistle were not baptized?"

the connexion with the last verse was plain, is not a consideration which usually entered into the minds of transcribers. They were much more likely to attempt to establish some connexion, plain or not, especially when so unusual a word as ἴστε admitted of change to so obvious an one as ὥστε. Next, comes the question how ἴστε is to be taken, whether imperatively or indicatively. If the former, the sense will be, ‘Know, my beloved brethren’ (either what has preceded or what follows: if the latter, then the introduction of ἔστω κ.τ.λ. with a δέ gives it as a generally received saying, possibly as a reference to ref. Sir., γίνου ταχύς ἐν ἀκροάσει σου, καὶ ἐν μακροθυμίᾳ φθέγγου ἀπόκρισιν: if the former, the imperative sense seems hardly applicable). On the whole I much prefer the indicative sense, for which we have a precedent in reff. Heb. and Eph., the only other places where the form occurs in the N. T. And taking this indicative sense, I refer the word not to what follows, but to what precedes, making it an appeal to their knowledge of the momentous facts which he has just stated: You are well aware of this: but (i. e. and having this knowledge &c.). Thus we bring ἴστε here into strict accord with its meaning in those two other places, where it is, “Ye are aware;” appealing to a well-known fact. Ye know it, my beloved brethren: but (consequently) let every man be swift to hear (the word of truth which has so great power for good and for life: we need not actually supply τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀληθείας as Est., al., De W., Wiesinger do: the verb is absolute and general, having only reference to the word of truth), slow to speak (λαλήσαι need not refer only to the caution μή πολλοὶ διδάσκαλοι γίνεσθε, ch. iii. 1, though it includes that, being general. The meaning is, be eager to listen, not eager to discourse: the former may lead to implanting or strengthening the new life, the latter to wrath and suddenness of temper, so often found in the wake of swift rejoinder and ready chattering. (Ec. reminds us that τίς ἀνὴρ θεῖος φησίν, ὁ λαλήσας μετέγνω πολλάκις, ὁ δὲ σιωπήσας οὐδέποτε), slow to wrath (Bengel and others interpret ὀργή, “ira sive impatientia erga Deum,” and so nearly Calvin: but the reference is more general, as the precept is. The quick speaker is the quick kinder. See below. We have in Philo de Confus. Ling. § 12, vol. i. p. 412, βραδύς ὠφελῆσαι, ταχύς βλάβαι: but the words occur in contrast only here in the N. T.): 20.] for the wrath (any wrath, all wrath) of man (ἀνὴρ is used by our Apostle without any such definite precision as has been supposed here by Bengel, “Sexus virilis maxime iram alit:” or Thomas, “Non dicit pueri, quæ cito transit.” Cf. ἀνὴρ δίψυχος, ver. 8, and reff.) worketh not (ἐργάζεται and κατεργάζεται would differ here slightly in sense: the latter would signify more ‘worketh out,’ ‘bringeth to issue or existence,’ the former, ‘practiseth,’ ‘worketh habitually,’ and each of these would throw its own shade of meaning on δικαιοσύνη—see below) the righteousness of God (if ἐργάζεται, = that which is righteousness in God’s sight = τὸ δίκαιον ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ: if κατεργάζεται, = that righteousness, to produce which is God’s end in begetting us to a new life. In other words, the more general ethical sense is given by ἐργάζεται: the more particular theological one by κατεργάζεται. At all events, we must not interpret δικ. θεοῦ the state of righteousness before God, as some, or that righteousness in another, into which God begets men by his word of truth, as Hofmann [Schriftb. 1. 548 f.] and Wiesinger. When this latter asks, What relevance here has the remark that anger doeth not that which is right in the sight of God?—an easy answer can be given. Be not intemperately zealous, hastily rash to speak and to be angered, even in God’s behalf [for this is implied]: be humble, ready to listen, for your angry zeal, your quick speaking, work not God’s righteous purposes—serve not Him, are not carriers forward of that righteousness which is the characteristic of His kingdom, ch. iii. 18. How many an endeavour, which might have ended in ἐργάζεσθαι δικαιοσύνην θεοῦ, has been diverted and blighted by hasty speaking and anger, and ended only in disgracing ourselves, and Him whom we would have served, before men! So 21.] Wherefore (consequence from ver. 20: seeing that ἀργή excludes you from having a share in the righteous work of God) putting off (reff.: aor., because it must be done as a single act, antecedently to that which follows. The previous putting off is the condition of the subsequent reception) all filthiness (ῥυπαρία is here figurative, as ῥυπαρός and ῥυπαρεύω in ref. Rev.: in the other reff. the word occurs in its literal sense. Some Commentators take it here as standing alone: others join it with καὶ περισσεΐαν, as belonging to the genitive κακίας, which seems better for the context, which concerns not the putting away of moral pollution of all kinds, but only of that kind which belongs to κακία: see below. And thus taken it will mean that κακία pollutes the soul, and renders it unfit to receive the ἔμφυτος λόγος. It is very possible that the agricultural similitude in ἔμφυτος may have influenced the choice of both these words, ῥυπαρία and περισσεΐα. The ground must be rid of all that pollutes and chokes it, before the seed can sink in and come to maturity: must be cleaned and cleared) and abundance ("superfluity" is perhaps too strong; it is, if the above figure be allowed, the rank growth, the abundant crop. Beza, Erasm. Schmid, al. take it as = περίσσωμα, "excrementum;" Pott, Schneckenb., De Wette, al., as "efflorescence," as Lösner, "ramos in vite vel arbore abundantes, falceque rescandos;" Michaelis, al. take it as the remnant of κακία surviving from old times = περίσσευμα Mark viii. 8. But the usual meaning seems preferable, as being both philologically correct, and suiting in its simplicity the solemn character of the exhortation) of malignity (evil disposition towards one another, as in reff. The word carries on the ἀργή above: which springs from [see note on ref. Eph.] κακία, evil disposition, which is inherent in our hearts, and requires putting off before we can receive the word of God. That this is so, is evident from ἐν πραύτητι which follows. However the exhortation may apply in the wider sense, it is not its sense here, as the context plainly shews), in mildness (towards one another, reff.: not "modestia et facilitas mentis ad discendum composita," Calvin., nor "docili animo," Grot., al.: see above on κακία) receive (cf. reff. and παράδχονται, Mark iv. 20, of the good ground) the implanted word (the word spoken of is beyond doubt the same as the λόγος ἀληθείας above—i. e. the gospel, in its fulness. But the epithet makes some little difficulty. First of all, it clearly is not, as Θεο. seems to take it, "innate:" τὸν διακριτικὸν τοῦ βελτίονος καὶ τοῦ χειρόνος, δι' ὃ καὶ λογικοὶ ἐσμὲν καὶ λεγόμεθα: and so in the Apostolical Constt. viii. 12, νόμον δέδωκας ἔμφυτον, for this would stultify δέξασθε, we having it already. Nor must ἔμφυτος be taken as proleptic, "ita ut inseratur," as Calvin, Semler, De Wette [but doubtfully], al. Nor again can it mean 'the word which has been planted in the whole of Christendom,' seeing that individuals are here being dealt with: but the allusion is apparently to the parable of the sower, and it is the word implanted [= which has been sown], the word whose attribute and ἀρετή it is to be ἔμφυτος, and which is ἔμφυτος, awaiting your reception of it to spring up and take up your being into it and make you new plants), which is able to save your souls (cf. Rom. i. 16, where the εὐαγγέλιον is said to be δύναμις θεοῦ εἰς σωτηρίαν παντὶ τῷ πιστεύοντι. "Magnificum celestis doctrinæ encomium, quod certam ex ea salutem consequimur. Est autem additum, ut sermonem illum instar thesauri incomparabilis et expetere et amare et magnificare discamus. Est ergo acris ad castigandam nostram ignaviam stimulus, sermonem cui solemus tam negligenter aures præbere, salutis nostræ esse causam. Tametsi non in hunc finem servandi vis sermoni adscribitur, quasi aut salus in externo vocis sonitu inclusa foret, aut servandi munus Deo ablatum alio transferretur. Nam de sermone tractat Jacobus, qui fide in corda hominum penetravit: et tantum indicat, Deum salutis auctorem evangelio suo eam peragere." Calvin. Observe ψυχάς. It is the ψυχή which carries the personality of the man: which is between the πνεῦμα drawing it upwards, and the σάρξ drawing it downwards, and is saved or lost, passes into life or death, according to the choice between these two. And the λόγος ἔμφυτος, working through the πνεῦμα and by the divine εἰς τὸ ἀκοῦσαι and δέξασθε are qualified, at the same time that they are enforced, by a caution. But be ye (not, 'become ye,' any more than in Matt. vi. 16; x. 16; xxiv. 44; John xx. 27; Rom. xii. 16. In all these places no other meaning will suit the context but simply "be ye:" with reference indeed to some future act by which the word γίνεσθαι gets its propriety; but 'become' in English carries a very different meaning, viz. that of change into the state mentioned from some other previous one, which is in none of these cases implied) doers of the word (viz. of the λόγος ἐμφυτος, the λόγος τῆς ἀληθείας. Theile remarks well, "Substantiva plus sonant quam participia;" the substantive ποιητῆς carries an enduring, a sort of official force with it: 'let this be your occupation.' For the expression, see reff.), not hearers only (ἄκροατῆς in classical Greek carries rather the idea of attentive observance with it, which cannot be the case either here or in ref. Rom.), deceiving yourselves (see note on ref. Col. παραλογίζεσθαι is used here probably as allusive to λόγος, and means, to deceive by a false logical conclusion. The 'hearer only' does this, when he infers that the mere sound of the word received in his outward ear will suffice for him. Cf. ἀπατῶν καρδίαν αὐτοῦ, ver. 26. Hesych. gives ἀπάτη λογισμοῦ as the explanation of παραλογισμός. See Suicer, sub voce. 23—25.] Justification of παραλογιζόμενοι, and of the foregoing exhortation.

23.] Because, if any is a hearer of the word and not (the hypothesis being one of fact, that he ἀκούει καὶ οὐ ποιεῖ, οὐ is used, where we should rather expect μὴ, and where in the exhortation, μὴ has been used. Strictly, it is 'if any one is a hearer, and a not-doer') a doer, this man (the demonstrative pronoun points more markedly at the individual in whom the hearing and not-doing are united: see reff.) is like to a man (ἀνδρὶ general again: see vv. 8, 12, &c. Huther quotes a curious comment from Paes: "Viri obiter tantum solent specula intueri, muliebri autem est curiose se ad speculum componere") contemplating (reff. Probably the example was meant to have a general reference: for though it may be true, as De Wette says, that many men remember well their appearance in the mirror, the common rule is that men forget it. Had a particular case of one who looks and forgets been intended, the next sentence would not surely have been introduced with the aor. and γάρ, but with καὶ and participles) the countenance of his birth (i. e. as E. V., "his natural face:" the face he was born with. The expression is to be explained apparently as Wiesinger: "Not that he can see in the glass any other than his natural face, but the addition τῆς γενέσεως αὐτοῦ serves more plainly to point out the sphere of mere material perception from which the comparison is taken, as distinguished from the ethical sphere of ἀκροᾶσθαι, and at the same time hints at the easy translation of the remark from the one department to the other, in which 'the word of God is a mirror in which we may and ought to see our moral visage,' as De Wette." Various other explanations have been given: by Pott, "Formam vultus nativam transeundo animadvertit: supple, non item maculas vultui haud ἐκ γενέσεως insitas, sed propria culpa adspersas:" Luther, Michaelis, Benson, Knapp imagine a contrast to be intended between his natural face and τὸ τοῦ πνεύματος πρόσωπον: Schulthess, between the natural face and a mask: &c. Whether the gen. αὐτοῦ [not αὐτοῦ] belongs to πρόσωπον or to τῆς γενέσεως, is uncertain as the words stand: more probably however to the latter: cf. τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ, Col. i. 13) in a mirror (see reff.: and Pind. Nem. vii. 20): 24.] for (this seems to stamp the example as a general one, applying to all, not merely taking some possible man who may do this: see above) he contemplated himself (on the aorr. see above, ver. 11), and has departed (the perfect in the midst of aorr. is to be noted. We might have had all aorr.: but seeing that the departing begins a permanent state of absence from the mirror, that is chosen to be designated by a perfect. The forgetting is also a permanent state; but the Apostle rather chooses in this case to bring out the act itself, as one immediately [εὐθέως] and suddenly taking place. For similar conjunctions of perfects with aorr., cf. Luke iv. 18: Mark xv. 44: Heb. ii. 14 and note: 1 Cor. xv. 4: and Winer, § 40. 4), and immediately forgot of what appearance he was (viz. in the mirror. It is to be observed, that the κατανοεῖν answers to the hearing of the word: the ἀπεληλυθέναι to the relaxing the attention after hearing—letting the mind go elsewhere, and the interest of the thing heard pass away: and then the forgetfulness in both cases follows. In the next verse we pass to one who looks and does not depart).

25.] But he who looked into (here we have the figure mingled with the reality, the comparison being dropped. The aor. participles are continued on from the former construction in ver. 24. Probably the verb παρακύψαι here, to stoop and look in, has reference to a mirror being placed on a table or on the ground, to contemplate which steadily, a man must put his face near to it. But we must not perhaps urge this too strictly: see ref. 1 Pet.: where it is used of looking closely into any thing. It is here the opposite of κατενόησεν, attention bestowed for a time only and then withdrawn. And this opposition is strengthened by καὶ παραμείνας) the perfect law which is [the law] of our (Christian) liberty (τὸν νόμον τέλειον, not, the gospel as contrasted with the law, nor the covenant of faith as more perfect than that of legal obedience: but, the rule of life as revealed in the gospel, which is perfect and perfecting, but not in contrast with the former law as being not perfect, and not able to make perfect: that distinction is not in view here: see below. The whole Epistle is founded on this perfect law of Christ, more especially on that declaration of it contained in the sermon on the mount: see Prolegg. And that this law here is meant, the λόγος ἔμφυτος, λόγος ἀληθείας, as it is a rule of conduct, is evident from what follows, where deeds, and they only, are spoken of. It is the law of our liberty, not as in contrast with a former law of bondage, but as viewed on the side of its being the law of the new life and birth, with all its spontaneous and free development of obedience. Huther remarks, "Ever in the O. T. the sweetness of the law was subject of praise [Ps. xix. 8—11], but the life-giving power belonged to the law only in an imperfect manner, because the covenant on which it rested, was as yet only one of promise, and not of fulfilment") and remains there (remains looking in, does not depart as the other. There is a paronomasia in the παρα- repeated. Schneckenburger tries to give it the sense of ἐμμένειν in Acts xiv. 22: but as Wiesinger remarks, the matter spoken of here is not so much observing the law in act, as observing it in attention—not letting it pass out of the thoughts. That leads to action, as below), being (not, having become: see above on γίνεσθε, ver. 22: the former οὗτος being omitted, this part. carries with it a slightly inferential force: 'cum sit') not a forgetful hearer (the expression ἀκροατῆς ἐπιλησμονῆς is a Hebraism, the genitive indicating the quality: see below on ch. ii. 4, κριταὶ διαλογισμῶν πονηρῶν) but a doer of work (ἔργον, not sing. for plur. as Grot., "effector eorum operum quæ evangelica lex exigit:" but abstract, of work, something which brings a result with it), this man (see on οὗτος above, ver. 23) shall be blessed in his doing (cf. Sir. xix. 20, ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ ποιήσεις νόμου). The words imply that even in the act there is blessing: ἐν not being instrumental, but taken in its proper meaning: the life of obedience is the element wherein the blessedness is found and consists). * 26, 27.] The Apostle is still on the command in ver. 19. As yet he has been exemplifying the ταχὺς εἰς τὸ ἀκούσαι in connexion with the βραδὺς εἰς ὀργήν. From this he passes to that which is again so nearly connected with it, —the βραδὺς εἰς τὸ λαλῆσαι. 26.] If any man imagines that he is (refl.: not “videtur,” as Calv.: our E. V. “seem” is ambiguous: it may mean ‘to others,’ whereas δοκεῖ means only, ‘to himself:’ ‘thinks that he is’) religious (in the sense of ‘observant of God’s outward service,’ not = εὐσεβής, but marking the external manifestation of εὐσεβεία. We have no word at all adequately expressing θρησκος. See refl.), not bridling (reff. Plato, Legg. iii. 701 c, has ἀχάλινον κεκτημένος τὸ στόμα) his tongue but deceiving his heart (see above on παραλογιζόμενοι ἑαυτούς, ver. 22: “Scil. eo quod nimiam dicendi licentiam et linguæ intemperantiam pro vera θρησκείᾳ habet,” Pott. Calvin adds, “Hoc vitium nominatim oportuit taxari, quum de legis observatione sermo esset. Nam qui crassiora vitia exuerunt, huic morbo sunt ut plurimum obnoxii. Qui neque adulter erit, neque fur, neque ebriosus, quin potius externa sanctimoniam specie fulgebit, aliorum famam lacerando se jactabit, zeli quidem prætextu, sed obstrictandi libidine”), of this man (cf. on οὗτος above, ver. 23) the religious service is vain (idle and fruitless). 27.] Religious service pure and unpolluted (the two adjectives seem merely to bring out the positive and negative sides of purity, as in the two members of the apodosis below) in the estimation of VOL. iv. 4, the whole earthly creation, separated from God and lying in sin, which, whether considered as consisting in the men who serve it, or the enticements which it holds out to evil lust [ἐπιθυμία], is to Christians a source of continual defilement. They, by their new birth unto God, are taken out of the world; but at the same time, by sin still dwelling in them, are ever liable to be enticed and polluted by it: and therefore must keep themselves [cf. 1 Tim. vi. 14], for fear of such pollution. This keeping is indeed in the higher sense God's work: cf. John xvii. 15: but it is also our work, 1 Tim. v. 22. The Commentators compare Isoer. ad Niccol. p. 36, ἡγοῦ τοῦτο εἶναι θῦμα κάλλιστον καὶ θεραπείαν μεγίστην, εἰς βέλτιστον καὶ δικαιοτάτον σεαυτὸν παρέχης. Also Ps. l. 8—15: 1 Sam. xv. 22: Ps. xl. 7 f.: Sir. xxxv. 2).

CHAP. II. 1—13.] THE SIN OF REPROOF OF PERSONS: as the first of a series of reproofs for errors in practice which spring out of the mention of the νόμος τέλειος ὁ τῆς ἐλευθερίας: cf. ch. i. 25 and ver. 12. The Apostle begins, as is his wont, with strong blame of the sin: then illustrates it, vv. 2—4: then gives the ground of its sinfulness, vv. 5—11, and concludes, vv. 12, 13, with a reference again to the law of liberty.

1—4.] The warning, and its practical ground.

1.] My brethren, do not (ἔχετε is not, as Schneckenburger, al., interrogative, but imperative, as ch. i. 16; iii. 1. The interrogative with μὴ may not always require a negative answer, but it always implies a doubt as to the fact questioned: 'Surely . . . not . . .?' e.g. μήτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ χριστός; 'Surely this cannot be the Christ?' John iv. 29: μὴ πλείονα σημεῖα ποιήσει; 'Surely he will not do more signs?' John vii. 31: &c. See Winer, § 57. 3, b. And this clearly cannot be the case here) in respectings of persons (ἐν, 'in,' i. e. in the practice of, in the midst of: see on ἔχετε below. The subst. is plur., to point out the various kinds and occasions of the fault. The fault itself, as here intended, is easily explained by the context, where an example is taken of one kind of it. Theile says well that it is, "iniquitas singulos Christianos non virtute sua christiana, sed fortuna qualitatibusque externis metiendi atque secundum hanc normam alios aliis præferendi." Notice, that ἐν προσωπολ. is put first, as carrying the weight of the dehortation, ἔχειν τὴν πίστιν following, as matter of course and existing fact) hold (ἔχετε has been taken wrongly: e. g. by Grot., "detinere velut captivam et inefficacem," = κατέχειν in the saying of St. Paul in Rom. i. 18, τῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἐν ἀδικίᾳ κατεχόντων: by Pott, as ἔχειν τινα ἐν ὀργῇ, ἐν αἰτίαις, ἐν ἐπιγνώσει, as Rom. i. 28, explaining it "religiosis partibus nimium studere," which however this construction would hardly bear. ἔχειν is simply to have or to hold, as ever in St. James, cf. ch. i. 4; iii. 14: and see reff.) the faith (not merely 'faith in,' but the faith of, thus setting before them more forcibly the utter inconsistency of such respect of persons with the service of Christ) of our Lord Jesus Christ, [the Lord] of glory (such I believe, with most Commentators, to be the construction of τῆς δόξης, though it is somewhat harsh and unusual. Others have been proposed, but all of them are more objectionable still: e. g. by Erasmus. ["Nolite facere discrimen personarum juxta rerum mundanarum aestimationem"], and Calvin ["ex opinione"], as if it were ἐν δόξῃ προσωπολημψίας or -ῶν: by Bengel ["Est appositio, ut ipse Christus dicatur ἡ δόξα, gloria, cf. Luc. ii. 32: Is. xl. 5: Eph. i. 17: 1 Pet. iv. 14;"] none of which places justify the idea, seeing that in the two former a genitive follows δόξα, and the two latter rather support the common view]: by Laurentius, who unites τῆς δόξης with χριστοῦ ["Christus gloriæ = Christus gloriosus"]; finally by Huther, who would join τῆς δόξης with τὴν πίστιν [differing however from Grot. who doing this had made τοῦ κυρίου dependent on it, τὴν πίστιν τῆς δόξης τοῦ κυρίου, and from Gataker and Hottinger, who also doing it, make it = τὴν πίστιν ἐνδοξον], making it a gen. of the object, and τοῦ κυρ. ἡμ. Ἰ. χρ. a gen. of the subject—the faith, resting on our Lord Jesus Christ, in the [future] glory, i. e. τὴν μέλλουσαν δόξαν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι εἰς ἡμᾶς, Rom. viii. 18. And, he adds, this belief in the glory which shall be revealed is the more naturally mentioned here, because of the contrast between it and the passing glory of this world's pomp. Exactly: but that contrast is just as vivid on the common hypothesis. This last, complicated and harsh as it is, seems to me the only admissible one of all these interpretations. But it is surely far better, either to govern τῆς δόξης by κυρίου, as a second genitive, or to regard it as the epithetal genitive which so constantly follows the mention of the divine Name, as ὁ θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης and the like. Both these are abundantly justified: see reff. Huther's objection to the first, that the full name Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ entirely completes the idea, and forbids another genitive following, is not decisive: just for the same reason that the full Name is given, viz. to make the contrast more solemn and striking, is the additional title τῆς δόξης given, to increase still further that solemnity. It is to be again noticed, how expressly St. James grounds Christian practice on the faith of Christ, in all its fulness. The θρησκεία just spoken of is here taken up and enlarged on; but its root and ground is πίστις, and that, ἡ πίστις τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ τῆς δόξης].

2—4.] Hypothetical example, to explain to them that to which he especially points. The hypothesis carries however in itself a foundation of fact, and appeals (γάρ) to the consciences of the readers whether it were not so. 2.] For (q. d. that which I mean, is) if there chance to have come (aor. because the entrance is accomplished when that which is alleged takes place. This is better than to account for the aor., with Huther, by its being St. James's manner to designate by aorists a fact habitually repeated; the examples which he gives, ch. i. 11, 24, resting on another ground: see there) into your assembly (some have too hastily inferred from the word συναγωγή that the Jewish synagogue is meant. This, in the face of the organization of the church implied in ch. v. 14, would be impossible. The word may well be understood of a Christian assembly, so in Test. XII. Patrum, p. 747, ἐν ταῖς συναγωγαῖς τῶν ἐθνῶν, —or as merely an assembly in general, cf. ref. Heb., μὴ ἐγκαταλείποντες τὴν ἐπισυναγωγὴν ἑαυτῶν. But it is most likely here, from the allusions to sitting and standing below, a place of Christian worship, the name being a natural one, considering to whom the Epistle is addressed) a man with gold rings (this ἀπαξ λεγόμενον is expressed by χρυσόχειρ in Lucian, Timon, § 20. Wetst. has accumulated evidence of the practice of overloading the fingers with rings: e. g. Lucian, Somm. [Gall] 12, ἐγὼ δὲ ἔχων δακτυλίους βαρεῖς ὅσον ἑκαταῖδεκα ἐξημμένους τῶν δακτύλων: Martial xi. 60, "Senos Charinus omnibus digitis laevit, Nec nocte ponit annulos, nec dum lavatur") in a splendid garment (glittering, either in colour, or with ornaments), and there have come in also a poor man in a vile garment (reff.),

3.] and (the δέ just expresses the change of subject, from the persons entering in, to the congregation) ye look upon (with respect, see reff.: so as to take into consideration) the man wearing the splendid garment (thus designated, because it is this which wins for him the respect— which attracts your notice) and say, Sit thou (κάθου for κάθησο, occurring Matt. xxii. 44: Luke xx. 42: Acts ii. 34: 1 Kings i. 23; xxii. 5: 4 Kings ii. 6 al., is not found in pure Greek. under (i. e. not literally underneath; but ‘on the ground beside,’ ‘down by’) my footstool (Wiesinger calls ὑποπόδιον an ἀπαξ λεγόμενον: but see reff. Thus it is implied that the speaker is in a good place and furnished with a footstool. The question, argued at considerable length by Wiesinger and Huther, who these incomers are supposed to be, whether Christians, or Jews who have looked in as strangers, is perhaps hardly worth the trouble spent upon it. The illustration merely requires that they should be strangers, not having a regular place in the congregation. Certainly so far I agree with Huther, that there appears nothing in the text which compels us to assume them to be Christians. They are taken merely as samples of a class, the rich and the poor: and these two are dealt with again in vv. 5 ff., as classes of persons, out of one of which God hath chosen His people for the most part, and out of the other of which the oppressors of His people arise. So that it is better to leave the examples in their general reference), 4.] (Now comes the apodosis in the form of a question)—did ye not (in the case supposed) doubt (such is the constant sense of διακρίνομαι in the N. T. throughout [reff.], except in two passages, Acts xi. 2: Jude 9, where it means “disputing,” a sense which cannot enter here [on Jude 22, see there]. And here, the sense seems very good: ‘Did ye not, in making such distinction between rich and poor, become of the number of those who doubt respecting their faith, ch. i. 6? Your faith abolishes such distinction: you set it up in practice. You are not then whole in that faith.’ Various other explanations have been given, which Huther enumerates thus: διακρίνεσθαι 1. = “separare:” thus Schulthess, Semler, Erasm. Schmid, al., with the verb either passive, “Nonne inter vos ipsos estis discreti et separati?” or middle, “Nonne vos discernitis inter vos ipsos?” 2. = “discrimen facere:” a. the verb active, and that, a. interrogative: “Nonne discrimen fecistis apud vos ipsos?” so Laurentius, Grot., Wolf, Hottinger, Knapp: thus ἐν ἑαυτοῖς = ἐν ἀλλήλοις: Schneckenburger however gives it “in animis vestris,” and makes “discrimen facere” to pass into an act of individual judgment, “statuere:” β. negative: “Then ye have not made a sound distinction in yourselves:” so Grashof: b. the verb passive, “Inter vos ipsos non estis discriminati, N. E. cessat piorum et impiorum differentia,” Oeder. 3. = “judicare:” a. the verb active: and that, a. interrogative: “Nonne judicastis, delibastis ipsi?” i. e. are ye not yourselves persuaded how wrong this is? Augusti: β. negative: “Non discrevistis justa deliberatione, considerantia et æstimatione, quid tribuendum esset pauperi potius vel certe non minus quam diviti,” Bengel [Luther combines this rendering with that under (2): und bedenket es nicht recht, sondern ihr werdet Richter, und macht bösen Unterscheid]: here also comes the explanation of EC: τὸ διακριτικὸν ὕμῶν διεφθείρατε, μηδεμίαν συζήτησιν ποιήσαντες πότερον τιμητέον, . . . ἀλλ’ οὕτως ἀδιακρίτως κ. ἐν προσωποληψία τὸν μὲν ἐτιμήσατε . . . τὸν δὲ ἡτιμάσατε: b. the verb passive: and that, a. interrogative: “Nonne vos in conscientiis dijudicati, h. e. convicti estis?” Paræus: β. negative: “Et dijudicati inter vos ipsos non estis ut judicastis secundum prava ratiocinia vestra,” Heisen. Cajetan, somewhat differently, “Hæc faciendo non estis iudicati in vobis ipsis, sed estis iudicati in vestibus et divitis et pauperis:” laying the chief stress on ἐν ἑαυτοῖς. 4. διακρίνεσθαι = ‘dubitare,’ to entertain doubts: a. interrogative: “Et non dubitastis apud vosmetipsos? et facti estis iniqui iudices?” “Should you not yourselves have entertained doubts? should you actually have passed evil-minded judgment?” Theile: β. negative: “Non dubitastis apud animum, ne scilicet quidem hæc cogitatio, id factum forte malum esse, sed certo apud vos statuistis id jure ac bene fieri.” The meaning above given is held by Keen, De Wette, Wiesinger, Huther) within yourselves (in your own minds, being at issue with your own faith), and become judges (in the case of the rich and poor; judges of the case before you), of evil thoughts (the gen. is one of quality, like ὁ κριτῆς τῆς ἀδικίας, Luke xviii. 6: ἀκροατῆς ἐπιλησμονῆς, ch. i. 25: not an objective gen., as Elsner, “Iniquas illas cogitationes approbastis:” and Bengel, “judices, approbatores, malarum cogitationum: i. e. divitum, foris splendentium, sed malis cogitationibus scatentium.” The evil thoughts are in the judges themselves, and consist in the undue preference given by them to the rich. The same blame, of being a judge when a man ought to be an obeyer of the law, is found in ch. iv. 11. Notice also the parallel containing the same paronomasia, in Rom. xiv.: σὺ δὲ τί κρίνεις τὸν ἀδελφόν σου; [ver. 10:] . . . ὁ δὲ διακρινόμενος ἐὰν φάγη καταέκριται [ver. 23]?

5.] Listen, my beloved brethren (bespeaking attention to that which follows, as shewing them in a marked manner the sin of their προσωποληψία), Did not God choose out (in His proceeding, namely, in the promulgation of the gospel by Christ, Matt. v. 3 ff.: Luke vi. 20. See also 1 Cor. i. 27) the poor (τούς, as a class, set against οἱ πλούσιοι as a class, below) as regards the world (reff.: or, those who in the world’s estimation are accounted poor; but the dative of reference is most likely here, as in παιδία ταῖς φρεσίν, and the like) rich in faith (i. e. to be rich in faith, or so that they are rich in faith: the words are not in apposition with τοὺς πτωχοὺς, as Erasmus, al., but form a predicatory specification of them. ἐν πίστει, as the element, the world, so to speak, in which they pass for rich, as in ref. 1 Tim.: not as the material of which their riches consist, as in ref. Eph. Wiesinger well says, “Not the measure of faith, in virtue of which one man is richer than another, is before the Writer’s mind, but the substance of the faith, by virtue of which substance every believer is rich. The riches are the treasures of salvation, and especially, owing to the following κληρονόμους, the sonship in God’s family.” And similarly Calvin, “Non qui fidei magnitudine abundant, sed quos Deus variis Spiritus sui donis locupletavit, quæ fide percipiuntus”), and heirs of the kingdom which He promised (Luke xii. 31, 32 al.) to them that love Him? 6.] Contrast to God’s estimate of the poor. But ye dishonoured the poor man (in the case just now put: with reference also to which the aor. is used. “Indignum est deiecere quos Deus extollit, et quos honore dignatur probrose tractare: atqui Deus pauperes honorat: ergo pervertit Dei ordinem quisquis eos reject.” Calvin. This is his first argument. Now, vv. 6, 7, he brings in another, deduced from the conduct of rich men towards Christians and towards Christ Himself). Do not the rich (opposed as a class, to τοὺς πτωχοὺς above. This serves to shew that ὁ πλούσιος, when generally spoken of in the Epistle, as e. g. ch. i. 10, is not the Christian rich man, but the rich man as such, in his worldliness and enmity to God) oppress you (see ref. So κατακυριεύειν, Matt. xx. 25: 1 Pet. v. 3: κατεξουσιάζειν, Matt. xx. 25: all signifying to use power, or lordship, or licence, against any to his hurt), and is it not they that (such is the force of the αὐτοί, again repeated below: not that they themselves ἔλκουσιν κ.τ.λ.) drag you (so “a licitoribus trahi,” Livy ii. 27: see ref. The term implies violence) to courts of judgment (see ch. v. 6, κατεδικάσατε, ἐφονεύσατε τὸν δίκαιον. See on the matter, ref. 1 Cor.)? 7.] Is it not they that (on αὐτοί, see above) blaspheme

(actually and literally, in words, it being, as we have maintained throughout, ungodly and heathens who are pointed at. Those who maintain them to be Christian rich men, would understand βλασφημεῖν, to disgrace by their lives: but apart from other objections, Huther has remarked well, that when the verb is thus used, it is ordinarily in the passive with διά,—see Rom. ii. 24: Titus ii. 5: 2 Pet. ii. 2: Isa. lii. 5, —not as a direct active governing a case, which is far more naturally taken in its literal sense) the goodly name which was called on you (i. e. which when you were admitted into Christ's Church by baptism was made yours, so that you are called χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. iii. 23 [not necessarily χριστιανοί: no particular form of the appropriation of the name is alluded to, but only the fact of the name being called over them. The appellation may or may not have been in use at this time, for aught that this shews]. The name is of course that of Christ: not that of "God," as Storr and Schulthess, nor that of "brethren," as some. On the phrase ἐπικληθὲν ἐφ', see, besides reff., Deut. xxviii. 10: 2 Chron. vii. 14: Isa. iv. 1: also Gen. xlviii. 16)? So that if ye thus dishonour the poor in comparison with the rich, you are, 1. contravening the standard of honour which God sets up in His dealings: 2. opposing your own interest: 3. helping to blaspheme the name of Christ.

8—11.] Proof that this behaviour is a transgression of God's law. The connexion is somewhat recon-dite. The adverbative μὲντοι clearly takes exception at something expressed or understood. Calvin, Corn. a-Lap., Laurentius, al., and Theile, Wiesinger, and Huther, suppose the Apostle to be meeting an objection of his readers: "But thus, according to you, we should be breaking the injunction, Love thy neighbour &c., for we should view the rich with hatred and contempt." Then he replies, "Certainly, if ye &c. ye do well:" understanding καλῶς π. as a very feeble approbation.

But this seems to me very unnatural. It contains indeed the germ of the true view, which appears to be this: The Apostle is not replying to a fancied objection on the part of others, but is guarding his own argument from misconstruction: q. d. 'All this is true of the rich. Still I do not say, hate them, drive them from your assemblies &c.: if you choose to observe faithfully the great command, Love others as yourselves, in your conduct to all, well and good (καλῶς ποιεῖτε): but respect of persons, instead of being a keeping, is a breach of this law; for I have proved it to be sin, and he who commits sin is a transgressor of the law, of the whole law, by the very terms of legal obedience.' Thus the context seems to run smoothly and naturally.

8.] Yet (for the connexion see above. Keen, Schneckenburger, al. try to make μὲντοι mean "igitur," which it never can: see reff.) if ye fulfil (emphasis on τελεῖτε, as put before the epithet; if ye really choose to fulfil in its completeness that law) the royal law (the law which is the king of all laws, as the old saying makes law itself king of all: νόμος πάντων βασιλεύς. Love fulfils the whole law, πληρωμα νόμου ἢ ἀγάπη, Rom. xiii. 10. See similar expressions in Wetst. and Kypke from Plato, al.: the most remarkable being this: ἐν τοῖς συγγράμμασι τοῖς περὶ τῶν δικαίων καὶ ἀδίκων, καὶ ὅλως περὶ πόλεως διακοσμήσεώς τε καὶ περὶ τοῦ ὡς χρὴ πόλιν διοικεῖν, τὸ μὲν ὀρθὸν νόμος ἐστὶ βασιλικός, τὸ δὲ μὴ ὀρθὸν οὐ δοκεῖ νόμος εἶναι βασιλικός. . . . ἐστὶ γὰρ ἄνομον. Plato, Minos, pp. 566 f. The explanations, Because it proceeds from God, the great King [Raphel, Wetst., Wolf, al.], from Christ [Grot.], because it applies to kings as well as other men [Michaelis], because "reges facit" [Thomus], Calvin's, "Regia lex dicitur, ut via regia, plana scilicet, recte et æquabilis, qui sinuosus devorticulis, vel ambagibus tacite opponitur," &c., are all objectionable, as not bringing in any epithet contextually justified, or peculiarly belonging to this and not to other laws: whereas "that first of all laws" fits excellently the requirements of the context), according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well (i. e. well and good: see above: if you choose to do this, 'do manus,' I have nothing to object. But then, this you can never do, as long as you respect persons):

9.] but if ye respect persons, it is sin that ye are working (not obedience to this royal law), being (i. e. seeing that ye are) convicted by the law as transgressors (viz. by virtue of what I have already proved as wrong in your conduct. "Deus enim proximos jubet diligere, non eligere personas." Calv.)

10.] The fact of transgression of this law is proved by its solidarity, not admitting of being broken in one point and yet kept in the whole. "Hoc tantum sibi vult," says Calvin, "Deum nolle cum exceptione coli, neque ita partiri nobiscum, ut nobis liceat si quid minus allubescit, ex ejus lege rescere." For whosoever shall have kept (reff.) the whole law, but shall have offended (stumbled) in (the matter of: as in ch. iii. 2: see there) one thing (one thing enjoined, one commandment, as by and by explained: not as Schulthess, ἐνὶ ἀνθρώπῳ; nor as Ec., al., τοῦτο περὶ ἀγάπης εἶρηκε [so the Schol.-Matthæi, ἐν ἐνὶ πταίσειν ἐστὶ, τὸ μὴ τελείαν ἔχειν ἀγάπην]: nor is it to be limited to commandments carrying capital punishment, as Grot., al. It is better to understand ἐντάλαμσι than νόμῳ [as De W., Wies., Huther, al.], seeing that νόμος here is evidently used collectively for the sum of the commandments, and so πάντων τῶν νόμων could not be said), has become guilty (brought into the condemning power of, involved in, see reff. The more usual construction is to put the punishment, in which a man is involved, in the genitive, as in reff. Matt. and Mark: sometimes in the dative, as in Matt. v. 21 f. The classical construction is to put both the crime and the punishment in the dative: so ἔνοχος τῇ προδοσίᾳ, Demosth.: τῇ γραφῇ, δίκαις, ὀνειδί, &c., Plato, Xen. Sometimes however we have the gen.: as ἔνοχος λειποταξίου, Demosth. See Palm and Rost, sub voce) of all (things mentioned as objects of prohibition—for such is the reference here, see below—in the law).

11.] Reason for this assertion: the unity of the divine Author of the whole law, and of that law, as the exponent of His will: "Unus est, qui totam legem tulit: ejus voluntatem qui una in re violant, totam violant," Bengel. Cf. also Aug. Ep. ad Hieronym. on this passage. For He who said, Commit not adultery, said also, Commit not murder; now if thou committest no adultery (οὐ, and not μή, because the attention is fixed on the fact of no committal of adultery having taken place. It corresponds, in fact, to μὴ μοιχεύσης above in prohibition. See Winer, § 55. 2, c. d: and cf. ch. i. 23; iii. 2: 1 Cor. xvi. 22), but committest murder, thou hast become a transgressor of the law. (Various fanciful reasons have been given for the selection of these two commandments: "because these two were punished with death," Baumgarten: "because no one had laid a charge of adultery against the readers, but the other they violated by violating the law of love," Wiesinger. But it is far more likely that they are alleged as the two first which regard our duty to our neighbour generally: μὴ μοιχεύσης being put first, as in Mark x. 19: Luke xviii. 20: Rom. xiii. 9: Philo de Decalog. § 10, 12, 24, 32, vol. ii. pp. 186, 189, 201, 207, who lays a stress on this order as shewing that adultery is μέγιστον ἀδικημάτων: see also De Spec. Leg. ad 6 et 7 Dec. Cap. § 2, p. 300. So that this order must have been one preserved in ancient tradition: or perhaps found anciently in the LXX. The Rabbis have the same sentiment as this: Wolf quotes from the Talm. Sabbath, fol. lxx. 2, where R. Jochanan says of the 39 precepts of Moses, “Quod si faciat omnia, unum vero omittat, omnium et singulorum reus est.”

12, 13.] Concluding and summary exhortations, to speak and act as subject to the law of liberty and love. 12.] So speak (pres. as regarding a habit of life) and so do (οὕτως both times does not regard what has gone before, but what follows: οὕτως, ὡς. Speaking had been before hinted at in ch. i. 19: and will come again under consideration in ch. iii.), as being about to be judged by (by means of, as the measure by which your lives will be estimated) the law of liberty (the same as in ch. i. 25: that perfect expansion of God's will, resting on the free unrestrained principle of love, which is the moral code of the gospel. And the point of the exhortation is as Schol.-Matthæi, οὕτως τὸ ἀγαθὸν ἐργάζεσθε ὡς μὴ ὑπὸ νόμου ἀναγκαζόμενοι, ἀλλ' ἀυθαίρετοι). 13.] Reason why we should be careful thus to speak and do: viz. that if we do not, we cast ourselves out of that merciful judgment at God's hands which is promised to the merciful: Matt. v. 7, μακάριοι οἱ ἐλεήμονες: ὅτι αὐτοὶ ἐλεηθήσονται, which is the key to our verse. For the judgment (which is coming) [shall be] unmerciful (Luther makes ἀνέλεος an epithet, es wird ein unbarmherzigeres Gericht ergeben, which would require the absence of the article) to him who wrought not (the aor. is proleptical, the Writer standing at the day of the judgment and looking back over life) mercy: mercy boasteth over judgment (without a copula, the sentence is introduced more emphatically and strikingly. The meaning is, the judgment which would condemn any and all of us, is, in the case of the merciful, overpowered by the blessed effect of mercy, and mercy prevails over it. The saying is abstract: to turn it into a concrete, ‘the merciful man,’ or to appropriate the ἔλεος, ‘the mercy of God,’ is to limit that which is purposely and weightily left unlimited as an universal truth). 14—26.] In close connexion with what has gone before, the Apostle sets forth that bare faith without works can never save a man. The following remarks of De Wette on the passage are important, and well condensed. They have been impugned by many, among whom are Neander, Schneckenburger, Theile, Thiersch, Hofmann: but they seem to me best to represent the simple and honest view of the matter, without any finessing to make the two Apostles in exact accord in their meaning of terms and their positions respecting them (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. pp. 556—563, is worth consulting for a good statement of the other view): “In order rightly to understand this polemical passage, it is necessary accurately to define St. James's ideas of faith, of works, and of justification, and to compare them with those of St. Paul. Faith is, according to St. James, the result of the reception of the Word (ch. i. 22), especially in a moral point of view: moral conviction (Rom. xiv. 23): and although he recognizes it also as belief in Christ (ch. ii. 1), as trust (i. 6; v. 15), and truth (i. 3), yet he makes these particulars here of so little moment, that he regards it as theoretical belief only, and ascribes it to the evil spirits (ii. 19). Widely different from this is St. Paul's idea of faith, which presupposes self-abase-ment, the feeling of unworthiness and incapability (Rom. iii. 9 ff., 23), and consists in trust on the grace of God revealed in the atoning death of Christ (Rom. iii. 25; v. 8; 2 Cor. v. 18 f.). Of this faith, moral faith is a branch (Rom. xiv. 23): but this latter, which is the adoption of the working principle of love (Gal. v. 6), can only spring from the purification of the inner man by faith in the atonement. So that it is impossible to say, as some have done, that the idea of faith in the two Apostles is the same. Works, according to St. James, are not the works of the law in the lower sense, the mere observance of carnal ordinances and usages,—but an active life of practical morality, the rule of which is indeed found in the Mosaic law, and especially in the command to love one another, but so found, as apprehended and appropriated by the spirit of liberty (see ch. i. 25; ii. 12). St. Paul also understands by ‘the works of the law’ not merely ceremonial observances, as plainly appears from Rom. vii. 14 ff.: but when he contends against the Jewish righteousness by works, and their pride, as in Rom. ix. 30 ff., he includes these observances in that to which he refers. As regards justification, St. James understands it in a proper, or moral sense (cf. Matt. xii. 37), which St. Paul also recognizes. But in the latter Apostle’s idea of justification, we must distinguish a threefold point of view: 1. the general moral, at which he stops, Rom. ii. 13 (cf. ib. ver. 5 ff.), taking no account, how the highest aim of morality, there indicated, is to be attained, and is attained: 2. in his polemical point of view, as combating Jewish righteousness by works, he denies that we can, by the fulfilment of the law (even of its moral part, seeing that no man fulfils it aright), attain justification or well-pleasingness to God (Rom. iii. 20; Gal. ii. 16): 3. in the third point of view also, in the Christian life itself, St. Paul recognizes the inadequacy of a good conscience to give peace and blessedness to men (1 Cor. iv. 4), and finds peace only in faith in God, who justifies him of His free grace, i. e. so looks on and accepts him, as if he were righteous. This higher kind of justification, St. James does not recognize.” A good résumé of the literature of the passage will be found in Wiesinger, p. 122, note. The whole question of fact, as to whether St. Paul’s teaching, or some misunderstanding of it, or neither the one nor the other, was in St. James’s view here, I have discussed in the Prolegomena, § iii. 5 ff. [14.] What is the profit (arising from that to be mentioned: the resulting profit), my brethren, if (so εἰν after τί ὄφελος ἦσεται, Matt. xvi. 26; 1 Cor. xiii. 3) any man say (there is no emphasis on λέγειν, as many [Vorst, Piscator, Wolf, Baumgarten, Pott, Stier] have supposed: both its place in the sentence, after πιστιν, forbids this, and more decisively still the context, in which the whole argument proceeds on the hypothesis of his possessing faith: and in ver. 19, faith is actually ascribed to the τῖς. At the same time it is not to be wholly passed over, that the Apostle has written not ἔχη, but λέγει ἔχειν. While this does not imply any want of genuineness in the faith, it perhaps slightly distinguishes the possession of such faith from the absolute πιστιν ἔχειν: or, as Huther, belongs to the dramatic form of the hypothesis, in which the man is introduced boasting of and appealing to his faith) that he has faith (no stress to be laid on the failure of the art. before πιστιν, as is done by Schneckenburger, “Recte articulo caret, quum non habeat τὴν πιστιν.” This is sufficiently refuted by St. Paul’s similar anarthrous use of πίστις, where it is spoken of in the highest sense, and by our Lord’s command, ἔχετε πιστιν θεοῦ, Mark xi. 22) but have not works (i. e. those acts in his life which are proofs and fruits of faith: not mere ceremonial works: see De Wette’s remarks cited above)? (a note of interrogation, not a comma, is to be placed here. The sentence contains two distinct but connected questions: ‘What is the profit, if’ &c.? and, ‘Can’ &c.? Otherwise we leave τί τὸ ὄφελος insulated, and make μὴ δύναται stand unnaturally in an interrogative apodosis) Can [his] faith (ἢ, merely because, by the hypothesis λέγειν πιστιν ἔχειν, the πίστις is now become definite, is appropriated, according to the general rule by which that which has been anarthrously introduced at the first mention, has the art. when next mentioned: not as Bede, “fides illa, quam vos habere dicitis:” nor as Theile, “quæ non habetur revera sed dicitur tantummodo et jactatur”) save him (see for σώσαι, ch. i. 21. αὐτόν is noticeable, as confining the question within the limits of the hypothesis, by

Application of the similitude. So also faith, if it have not (be not accompanied by as its proper result. Here, again, the quasi-identification of the πίστις with the man, and ascription of the ἔργα to it as a possession, shew in what relative places the two stand in the Apostle's estimate) works, is dead (so Plantus in a remarkably similar passage, Epidic. i. 2. 13, “Nam quid te igitur retulit Beneficum esse oratione, si ad rem auxilium emortuum est?”) in itself (not as E. V., “being alone,” καθ' αὐτήν οἶσα: nor, “against itself” = καθ' αὐτῆς, as Möller, al.; nor is it to be joined to πίστις, “fides sola,” as Knapp and Baumgarten [“in as far as it is alone”]: but the words belong to and qualify νεκρά, as De W., Huther, al.; it is dead, not merely “ad rem,” as Plaut. above, but absolutely, καθ' αὐτήν, in itself: has no living root whereby it energizes. Cf. uniting faith with works), Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me (not, 'prove to me,' but 'exhibit to me,' ostenta mihi) thy faith without the works (which ought to accompany it), and I will shew thee my faith by (from the evidence of, out of, as the ground of the manifestation) my works. The whole difficulty found in this verse by Commentators has arisen from overlooking the fact that it continues the argument from the previous verses, and does not begin a new portion of the subject. And the reason why this has been overlooked, is, the occurrence between the two of the general clause in ver. 17. The same mistaken person is in the Apostle's view throughout, down to ver. 22: and it is as addressed to him, on the part of a chance objector to his inconsistency, that the ἀλλ' ἐρεῖ τις is introduced: the ἀλλά conveying the opposition of an objection not to the Apostle himself, but to him whom the Apostle is opposing. For the various and curious difficulties and confusions which have been raised on the verse, see Huther's note.

19.] Still addressed to the same soli-fidian, but now directly, and not in the person of the ἀλλ' ἐρεῖ τις. This is better than to suppose the τις still speaking; on account of the length of argumentation before the second person singular is dropped, and the analogy of the two arguments drawn from Abraham and Rahab, both of which most naturally come, as the latter on any view does, from the Apostle himself. Thou believest (better without an interrogation: see John xvi. 31, note) that God is one (or with the reading εἰς θεός, 'that there is one God.' The Apostle selects, from all points of dogmatic belief, that one which stands at the head of the creed of Jews and Christians alike. Cf. especially Deut. vi. 4: Neh. ix. 6: Mark xii. 29, 32: Rom. iii. 30: 1 Cor. viii. 4, 6: ch. iv. 12: and the Shepherd of Hermas, ii. 1, p. 914, πρῶτον πάντων πιστεύουσιν ὅτι εἰς ἐστίν ὁ θεός. De Wette and Wiesinger have noticed that the construction with ὅτι after πιστεύεις instead of εἰς or ἐν, implies that merely a theoretical faith is spoken of.

But against this view there are two objections: 1. that εἰς or ἐν could hardly have been used in this case, where the existence [εἰς θεός] or the unity [εἰς ὁ θεός] of God is spoken of as the object of belief: 2. that ὅτι after πιστεύω does undoubtedly elsewhere express the highest kind of realizing faith: e. g. Mark xi. 23, 24: John vi. 69; xi. 27, 42; xiv. 10, 11; xvii. 8, 21; xx. 31 al.): thou doest well (i. e. either understood simply, 'so far is well:' 'it is a good faith, as far as it goes:' or understood ironically, as Calv. al., 'ac si dixisset, Hoc magnum est, infra diabolos subsidere:' only that "infra diab." is further than the text assumes: rather, 'diabolis, quod ad fidem, æquari.' The former seems preferable; it is hardly likely that the Apostle would speak slightly even 'argumenti causa,' of so fundamental an article of the faith): the dæmons also (not, the dæmoniacs, as Wetst., though his explanation is specious, "qui per exorcismos et pronuntiationem nominum Dei Hebræorum sanari dicuntur:" nor as Schneckenburger, al., the dæmons in the possessed, who trembled at the sacred Name: but simply, as usually, the evil spirits) believe (the verb is purposely used absolutely: not merely, 'believe this truth,' but, 'thus far, are believers in common with thyself'), and (not to be diluted into ἀλλὰ καί, as Pott, or "atqui," as Theile: the keenness of the sarcasm lies in the simple copula) shudder (φρίσσω, properly of the hair standing on end with terror. Their belief does nothing for them but certify to them their own misery. "Hoc, præter expectationem lectoris additum, magnam vim habet." Bengel). 20—23.] Proof of the uselessness of faith without works, from the example of Abraham: introduced by a severe and triumphant appeal to the objector. 20.] But (passing on to another example which is to prove it even more certainly) wilt thou know (the use of θέλεις serves to shew that the knowledge itself is plain and palpable, and the resisting it can only arise from perversity), O (this interjection is generally found, in the N. T., in conjurations or vituperations: e. g. Rom. ii. 1, 3;

So Demosth. p. 815, ἀργὰ χρήματα: Isocr. Panegy. p. 49, § 48, μήτε τοῖς ἰδιώταις μήτε . . . ἀργὸν εἶναι τὴν διατριβήν. The idea is much the same if we read νεκρά; but seeing that none read ἀργή in vv. 17, 26, and it was hardly likely that the easy νεκρά here would be changed into the difficult ἀργή, this latter is beyond reasonable doubt the genuine reading)?

No other meaning will satisfy the connexion, inevitable to any intelligent reader, between this ἐδικαιώθη and the σῶσαι of ver. 14: which again is connected with the μέλλοντες κρίνεσθαι of ver. 12. Commentators have endeavoured to evade this full meaning, in various ways. Thus e. g. Calvin, "Notanda est hæc amphibologia; justificandi verbum Paulo esse gratuitam justitiæ imputationem apud Dei tribunal: Jacobo autem esse demonstrationem justitiæ ab effectis, idque apud homines, quemadmodum ex superioribus verbis colligere licet: ostende mihi fidem tuam" &c. It is manifest, that by such "amphibology," any difficulties whatever may be explained away. On the difficulty itself, see in the Prolegomena) by (out of, as the ground of the justification: precisely as St. Paul so constantly uses the phrase δικαιοῦσθαι ἐκ πίστεως) works (the category to which the ground of his justification belonged.

It was one especial work, in matter of fact: and that work, itself springing out of pre-eminent faith) when he offered (not, as E. V., al., "had offered:" the aor. part., as so often, is synchronous with the aor. itself in the same sentence. ἀναφέρω in this reference with ἐπί is not 'to offer up in sacrifice,' but simply to offer, to bring as a sacrifice to the altar: whether the entire 'offering up' takes place or not. Where it did take place, the general meaning may be given: where it did not, as here, the particular one must be kept. Cf. 1 Pet. ii. 24) Isaac his son at the altar?

22.] Thou seest (better not a question: in which case the καὶ of ver. 23 does not follow so naturally as when we couple the direct verb βλέπεις with the direct verb ἐπληρώθη) that (not, "how," as E. V.: it is not the manner in which, nor even "how" in the sense of 'how that,' which is meant. The assertion is, that the inference is indubitable, that the fact was as stated) faith (the art. is abstract here, not possessive, as αὐτοῦ being expressed below shews) wrought (at the time, 'was working,' imperf.) with his works (τοῖς ἔργοις again categorical, the work in the example being but one), and by (out of, as the ground and source) works (again categorical; the general proposition proved by the particular case. Doubtless this second time it might be 'by his works, his faith,' &c.: but the other is more like St. James, who is singularly given to introduce abstract propositions as applicable to particular cases) faith (see above) was made complete (in one act, once for all: not imperf. as συνήργει, but aor.: not, as again many Commentators, even Bengel and De Wette, and so Calvin, "quod vera esse inde comprobetur;" an impossible meaning, and very far from the context of the Apostle's argument; which is, that faith is developed and brought to perfection by obedience: see below on ver. 26. And hence also is it evident, how faith συνήρει τοῖς ἔργοις αὐτοῦ. By the Apostle's own comparison, ver. 26, faith is the body, obedience the spirit: faith without obedience is dead, until obedience, the spirit, sets faith in motion: then faith, like the limbs of the body, moves with and works with the acts of obedience. Which is prior in time, which the ground of the other, is a point not touched by St. James at all. Pool collects well in his Synops. ad loc., the opinions of others: "Opera autem fidem perficiunt ratione operationis et consummationis, quum per opera fides ad maturitatem pervenit, quomodo arbor perfecta sit quum ita exerevit ut fructum ferat, Num. xvii. 8; et peccatum perficitur, Jac. i. 15, quum in habitum evasit. . . Fides tum demum consummata redditur, postquam bonos fructus protulit." But when he goes on to say, "Fides est causa: opera, effectus. Causa autem non perficitur a suo effectu, sed perfecta declaratur: ut fructus boni arborem bonum non efficiunt, sed indicant," he is travelling out of the record, and giving meanings unknown to this passage): 23.] and the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, But (καὶ, LXX) Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness (i. e. that saying of Scripture, which long preceded the offering of Isaac, received its realization, not, it may be, its only realization, but certainly its chief one, in this act of obedience. It was not, until this, fulfilled, in the sense of being entirely exemplified and filled up. Wiesinger combats this sense as an unworthy one, and follows Wolf and Knapp in understanding πληρωθῆναι and τελεσθῆναι not only "cum illud ipsum quod prædictum erat evenit, sed etiam ubi tale quid accidit quo ejusmodi dicta . . . quoquo modo vel confirmantur et illustrantur." But this is not satisfactory, unless the case in point be such a prominent illustration as to constitute the main fulfilment; and then we come to much the same point. No such objection as that which Wiesinger brings [viz. that we make thus the truth of God's saying depend on Abraham's subsequent conduct] lies against our view, that the saying received on and not till this occasion its entire and full realization. It was true, when uttered: but it became more and more gloriously true of Abraham's life and acts till it reached this its culminating point, in his chief act of self-denying obedience: and he was called (couple with ἐπίστευσεν not with ἐλογίσθη) God's friend ('amatus a Deo,' not 'amans Deum.' This appellation of Abraham is not found in the LXX. In ref. Gen., where they have Ἀβραὰμ τοῦ παιδὸς μου, Philo, De Resip. Noë, § 11, vol. i. p. 401, cites it Ἀβρ. τοῦ φίλου μου. And in Isa. xli. 8 the words σπέρμα Ἀβραὰμ ὃν ἠγάπησα are rendered by the vulg. "semen Abraham amici mei," and by the E. V. "the seed of Abraham my friend." So also in 2 Chron. xx. 7). 24.]

General inference from the example of Abraham. Ye see (not imperative, nor interrogative) that by (from, out of, as a source) works a man is justified (accounted righteous before God, as above: not, as Calvin, "Fructibus cognoscitur et approbatur ejus justitia"), and not by (from) faith only (notice μόνον: St. James never says that a man is not justified by faith, provided that faith include in it the condition of obedience: but by faith μόνον, χωρὶς ἔργων, is no man justified. μόνον must be joined with πίστεως, not with οὐκ, as Theile, "Appositionis lege explenda est oratio: non solum fide, sed etiam operibus. . . . nempe cum fide conjungendis:" see similar instances of adverbs joined to substantives in 1 Cor. xii. 31: 2 Cor. xi. 23: Gal. i. 23: Phil. i. 26: and cf. Winer, § 54. 2, b). 25.] The example of Rahab. Various reasons have been assigned for this example being added. Bede says, "Ne se causarentur opera tanti patris Abrahamæ imitari non valere, præsertim cum nullus eos modo cogeret Deo filios offerre perimendos, . . . addit et mulieris exemplum, mulieris criminosa, mulieris alienigenæ, quæ tamen per opera misericordiæ, per officium hospitalitatis, etiam cum periculo vitæ suæ Dei famulis exhibitum, jus-

Grotius, "Abrahami exemplum Hebræis ad Christum conversis sufficere debet, sed quia etiam alienigenis scribebat, adjunxit exemplum fœminæ extraneæ:" and similarly Hofmann, Schriftb. i. 557. Schneckenburger, "Novum additur exemplum e sexu muliebri sumptum:" and so Bengel, "Post virum ponitur mulier: nam viros et mulieres appellat," ch. iv. 4 [see note there]. When Delitzsch, on Heb. xi. 31, assigns as a reason that der Psalmsimus had already used this example to prove justification sola ex fide, he does not necessarily assume the later date for our Epistle. See the whole matter discussed in the Prolegomena. And (the δέ brings out the contrast of the example, again affirming the Apostle's proposition, to the ἐκ πίστεως μόνον, which has been just denied. Huther understands the δέ as bringing out the dissimilarity between the examples implied in πόρνη) in like manner (with Abraham) was not Rahab the harlot (not "caupona" or "hospita," as Grot., not "idololatra," as Rosenmüller, but to be taken literally: see on Heb. xi. 31) justified by works, when she received (not necessarily "clam exceptit," as Theile, see reff. It may be so, but the word does not express it. The word in Heb. is δεξαμένη) the messengers (κατασκοπους, Heb. xi. 31), and thrust them forth (in haste and fear, Josh. ii. 15, 16: ἐκβάλλειν is not simply 'emittere:' see reff.) by another way (viz. διὰ τῆς θυρίδος, Josh. ii. 15 LXX. For the local dative, see Rom. iv. 12: Rev. xxii. 14: and Winer, § 31. 9)? 26.] General conclusion to the argument, but in the form of a comparison, as in ver. 17. For (γάρ binds the verse on to the foregoing, and makes it rather depend on this axiom, than this axiom a conclusion from it: 'it must be so, Rahab must have been thus justified, seeing that' &c.) just as the body without (separate from) spirit (or, the spirit) is dead, so also faith without works (or without its works, the works belonging to it: as in ver. 20) is dead. This comparison has been found matter of surprise to some Commentators, inasmuch as the things compared do not seem relatively to correspond. Faith is unquestionably a thing spiritual: works are external and material: so that it would seem as if the members of the comparison should have been inverted, and works made the body, faith the spirit. But the Apostle's view seems rather to be this: Faith is the body, the sum and substance, of the Christian life: works (= obedience), the moving and quickening of that body; just as the spirit is the moving and quickening principle of the natural body. So that as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is also dead.

CHAP. III. a. 1—12.] The danger, as connected with the upholding of faith without works, of eagerness to teach: and, by occasion, the manifold and irrepressible sins of the tongue. Then follows, b. 13—18.] an exhortation, to prove a man's wisdom by mildness, not by a contentious spirit.

1.] The more the idea prevailed, that faith, without corresponding obedience, was all that is needful, the more men would eagerly press forward to teach: as indeed the Church has found in all ages when such an opinion has become prevalent: for then teachers and preachers of their own appointing have rapidly multiplied. Be not ('become not? let not that state of things prevail among you in which you become) many teachers (πολλοί belongs not to the predicate, as Schneckenb. al., so that πολλοὶ γίνεσθαι should = multiplicari: nor does it mean "nimium in docendo," as Baumgarten: nor = πάντες, as Grotius: but is to be taken with διδάσκαλοι, and in its proper meaning. And διδάσκαλοι is not, as E. V., "masters," which conveys a wrong idea: but teachers, persons imparting knowledge in the congregation. This in the primitive times might be done by all in turn, as we know from 1 Cor. xiv. 26—33: and St. James exhorts against the too eager and too general assumption of this privilege), my brethren, knowing (as ye do: or, as ye ought to do: it is a good remark of Huther's, that εἰδότες, being closely joined to the imperative, is itself hortatory: 'knowing, as ye might know') that we (i. e. as many of us as are teachers) shall receive greater condemnation (than others who are not teachers: κριμα, in the phrase κριμα λαμβανειν, according to N. T. usage, is not a 'vox media,' but signifies condemnation only: see besides reff. 1 Tim. v. 12. This being so, it has surprised some Commentators, that the Apostle includes himself with those whom he is dissuading: and Grot., al. would understand κριμα as meaning "responsibility:" but the solution is easy,—viz. that he includes himself out of humility, and obviously on the assumption that the office of teacher is not faithfully performed. The sense might be thus filled up, as, indeed, it is virtually filled up in ver. 2: 'be not many teachers, for in such office there is great danger of failing, and if we teachers fail, our condemnation will be greater').

2.] For (see above: this supplies the ellipsis) oftentimes (adverbial: see reff. and Winer, § 54. 1) we all (without exception: ἅπαντες is a stronger form than πάντες, being originally contracted from ἅμα πάντες) offend (πταίω, cognate with πίπτω, πέπτωκα, πτώσις, see Buttman, Lexil. i. p. 295, to stumble, fall: cf. the proverb, μὴ δὲς πρὸς τὸν αὐτὸν λίθον πταίειν: hence figuratively, to err or offend morally. The present assertion is to be taken in the widest moral sense, as an axiom applying to our whole conduct. It is in the next clause limited to the subject in hand, viz. the tongue): if any man (see ch. i. 5, 23, 26) offendeth not (is void of offence: οὐ, because the negative belongs, not subjectively to the hypothesis, but objectively to the fact included within the hypothesis) in word (in speaking: and therefore the hypothesis is applicable to these many who set up for teachers, seeing that thus their chances of offence would be multiplied many fold), he [is] a perfect man (explained by what follows), able to bridle the whole body also (I cannot see the force of De Wette's objections against the general sense of the πολλὰ πταίομεν ἅπαντες. The sense surely runs well thus: We all oftentimes offend: and of those frequent offences, sins of the tongue are so weighty a part and so constant a cause, that he who is free from them may be said to be perfect, inasmuch as he is able to rule every other minor cause of offence: 'the whole body' standing for all those other members by which, as by the tongue, sin may be committed: which may be ὅπλα ἀδικίας τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ or ὅπλα δικαιοσύνης τῷ θεῷ, Rom. vi. 13).

3—6.] The importance and depravity of the tongue, so small a member, is illustrated by comparisons: 1. with the small instrument, the horse-bit, ver. 3: 2. with the small instrument, the ship-rudder, ver. 4: 3. with a small fire burning a great forest, vv. 5, 6.

3.] This mention of χαλιναγωγῆσαι, and the situation of the tongue where the χαλινός also is placed, introduce this similitude: which circumstances will also account for τῶν ἵππων standing first and emphatic, χαλινός and στόμα being ideas already given by the context. But (transitional) if (as we do: = in our vernacular, 'when,' 'as often as') of horses (this would not be English, but indicates the emphatic place of τῶν ἵππων. the apodosis after the ει : see below) we turn about also (in turning the bit one way or the other) their whole body (cf. Soph. Antig. 473, σμικρῶ χαλινῶ δ' οἶδα τοὺς θυμουμένους "Ἴππους καταρτυθέντας).

4.] The second comparison takes up, not the protasis with its ει δε, but only the apodosis foregoing. Behold, even (or also) the ships, though so great (the participle carries a slightly ratiocinative force, illative or exeptive according to the circumstances), and driven by fierce (see ref. : and cf. Ælian de Animal. v. 13, σκληρὸν πνεῦμα : and Hist. Var. ix. 14, ἴνα μὴ ἀνατρέπηται ὑπὸ τῶν ἀνέμων, εἴποτε σκληροὶ κατέπνεον. See other citations in Wetst.) winds (Bede interprets this as having a meaning respecting ourselves : "Naves magnæ in mari, mentes sunt hominum in hac vita, sive bonorum sive malorum. Venti validi, a quibus minantur [?], ipsi appetitus sunt mentium, quibus naturaliter coguntur aliquid agere" &c. But it is not likely that the Apostle had any such meaning), are turned about by a very small rudder, whithersoever (ὅπου for ὅποι, which is not used in N. T. So also in the classics : e. g. Soph. Trach. 40, κείνος ὅπου βέβηκεν) the desire (not, as many Commentators, the external impulse given by the hand. Cf. Plato, Phileb. p. 35 D, ξύμπασαν τήν τε ὀρυήν καὶ ἐπιθυμίαν καὶ τήν ἀρχὴν τοῦ ζώου παντός) of the steersman (him who actually handles the tiller) may wish. The same thought occurs in Aristot. Quæst. Mechan. 5, τὸ πηδάλιον, μικρὸν ὖν, καὶ ἐπ' ἐσχάτῳ τῷ πλοίῳ, τοσαύτην δύναμιν ἔχει, ὥστε ὑπὸ μικροῦ οἰακος, καὶ ἐνὸς ἀνθρώπου δυνάμειος, καὶ ταύτης ἡρεμαίας, μεγάλα κινεῖσθαι μεγέθη πλοίων. Philo, In Flacc. 5, vol. ii. p. 521, joins the two ideas together, ἐμπειροτάτους κυβερνήτας, οἱ καθάπερ ἀθλητὰς ἵππους ἥνιοχοῦσιν, ἀπλανῆ παρέχοντας τὸν ἐπ' εὐθείας δρόμον. Cf. also Lucret. iv. 899, and other examples in Wetst. 5.] Application of the comparison. Thus also the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things (μεγάλα αὐχεῖ [or μεγαλαυχεῖ] is interpreted by (Ec., μεγάλα ἐργάζεται, and so Thl., Calv., De Wette, al., in the Homeric sense of εὐχεται εἶναι. But Huther well observes that there is no need for thus forcing the word out of its ordinary meaning, for the deeds of the tongue follow. This μεγάλα αὐχεῖ is the method which it uses to accomplish its deed ; it vaunts great words which bring about great acts of mischief). Behold, how small (ἡλίκος is 'quantulus' as well as 'quantus,' e. g. in Lucian, Hermot. 5, παπαί, ὦ Ἐρμότιμ, ἡλίκους ἡμᾶς ἀποφαίνεις, οὐδὲ κατὰ τοὺς πυγμαίους ἐκείνους, ἀλλὰ χαμαιπετεῖς παντάπασιν ἐν χρῶ τῆς γῆς. De Wette however understands it here "how great," and thinks that the smallness of the first spark, but the greatness of the fire in its ultimate extent, is intended. Against this, as Wiesinger and Huther observe, is ἀνάπτει, which can hardly mean 'consumes,' but must be said of the first lighting up. Seneca has the very similar words, "quam lenibus initiis quanta incendia oriantur," Contr. v. 5) a fire kindleth how great a forest (ὕλη is taken by some Commentators to mean "materia, lignorum congeries," as in ref. Cf. also Hom. Π. β. 455, ἥτε πῦρ αἰδηλον ἐπιφλέγει ἄσπετον ἕλην, and λ. 155, ὡς δ' ὅτε πῦρ αἰδηλον ἐν ἀξύλω ἐμπέση ἕλη. The comparison is beautifully used in a good sense by Philo, De Migr. Abr. § 21, vol. i. p. 455, σπινθηρ γὰρ καὶ ὁ βραχύτατος ἐντυφόμενος ὅταν καταπνευσθεὶς ζωπυρηθῆ, μεγάλην ἐξάπτει πυρὰν καὶ τὸ βραχύτατον οὖν ἀρετῆς, ὅταν ἐλπίσι χρησταῖς ὑποθαλάπμενον ἀναλάμψῃ, καὶ τὰ τέως μεμυκῶτα καὶ τυφλὰ ἐξωμμάτωσε, καὶ τὰ ἀφανυθέντα ἀναβλαστῆν ἐποίησε, καὶ ὅσα ὑπὸ ἀγωνίας ἐστεῖρωτο εἰς εὐφορίαν εὐτοκίας περιήγαγεν). 6.] Likewise the tongue is a fire, that world of iniquity (these latter words are still in apposition with ἡ γλῶσσα [and belong appositionally to the subject, not to πῦρ the predicate: as e. g. in Æsch. Choeph. 529 f., ἐν σπαργάνοισι παιδὸς ὀρυμῆσαι δίκην, τινὸς βορᾶς χρῆζοντα, νεογενὲς δάκος]; not, as many Commentators, an elliptical clause requiring ἕλη to complete it—"igni respondet lingua, materiæ seu silvæ respondet mundus improbus," Morus, in Huther. But, when taken as a designation of ἡ γλῶσσα, the interpretations are various. 1. Ec. mentions as an alternative the signification "adornment" for κόσμος. After giving the ordinary interpretation, he says, ἡ κόσμος ἐστίν, ἥτοι κοσμοῦσα τὴν ἀνθρωπίνην φύσιν κ.τ.λ., and before, κοσμεῖ τὴν ἀδικίαν διὰ τῆς τῶν ῥητόρων εὐγλωττου δεινότητος. And so it is taken by Wetst., Elsner, Wahl, and others. But it is rightly objected by Huther, that κόσμος never signifies that which [actively] adorns, but that wherewith a thing or person is adorned, as in 1 Pet. iii. 3: so that it would be here that wherewith, not that whereby, iniquity is adorned. 2. Estius makes the words mean, a world of iniquity, "quia [lingua] peccata omnigena parit." 3. Le Clerc, Hammond, Kuinoel, al. hold the words to be spurious, and a gloss: but most absurdly. We have the similar use of ὁ κόσμος in ref. Prov., τοῦ πιστοῦ ὄλος ὁ κόσμος τῶν χρημάτων, τοῦ δὲ ἀπίστου οὐδὲ ὕβολος: and the Latins often use 'abyssus,' 'mare,' 'oceanus,' in the same sense. The use of the art. in titular appositional clauses of this kind is natural as designating the thing pointed at—"mundus ille iniquitatis": the tongue (we must not, although we omit ουτως, follow Lachmann, and Tischdf., in destroying the step at ἀδικίας and carrying the sense on to this clause: for thus we make a very lame sentence, with the subject, ἡ γλῶσσα, twice repeated. The new sentence begins here) is (perhaps we cannot find in English a better word for the καθίσταται, though it does not give the exact meaning, which is as in vulg., "constituitur." Any rendering of this in English would be too forcible; as if some divine arrangement were spoken of: "collocata est"[Beza, Piscator, Schneckenburger, al.] is not exact. See reff.) among our members that one which (De Wette compares for the construction, Phil. ii. 13, ὁ θεὸς . . . ἐστὶν ὁ ἐνεργῶν) defileth (ref.) the whole body (thus justifying the title given to it of ὁ κόσμος τῆς ἀδικίας) and setteth on fire (the other clause, καὶ ἡ γλῶσσα πῦρ, is now taken up. By the construction, strictly considered, these two participles, φλογίζουσα and φλογιζομένη, are [as Wiesinger] subordinated to ἡ σπιλοῦσα, there being no articles before them. But forasmuch as thus we should find a difficulty in the sense, in that the action indicated by the first of these participles can hardly take place within our members, it is better, with Huther, to regard the participles as new particulars, and the construction as not a strictly exact one. Something of the same inaccuracy is found in ch. iv. 11, but not in iv. 14, as Huther also alleges) the orb of the creation (in interpreting the difficult words τὸν τροχὸν τῆς γενέσεως, one thing must especially be borne in mind: that like ὄλον τὸ σῶμα, they designate some material thing which agreeably to the figure used may be set on fire. This would at once set aside all figurative explanations, such as "rotam originis nostræ, quæ, simul atque nati sumus, cursum suum auspicatur," Gebser, al.,—τὸν χρόνον, τὸν τροχοεῖδη δηλονότι, τῆς ζωῆς, Isidor. pelus.,—founded on the parallel in Anacreon [iv. 7], τροχὸς ἄρματος γὰρ οἷα βίωτος τρέχει κυλισθεῖς. So likewise (Ec., τροχὸς, ὁ βίος εἰς ἑαυτὸν ἀνελιττόμενος, illustrating it by the Psalmist speaking of ὁ στέφανος τοῦ ἑναντοῦ: such again as that of Wolf, "indesinens successio hominum aliorum post alios nascentium," after the Syr., "It turneth the course of our generations which run as a wheel." In seeking then for some material interpretation, we come first to that of Wiesinger,—the whole body—the circumference of our corporeal being, the τροχὸς τῆς γενέσεως, as the πρόσωπον τῆς γενέσεως in ch. i. 23: the circumference [of the body] which is congenital with us. But, as Huther has observed, it would be in the highest degree unnatural, when the Writer has just expressed ὅλον τὸ σῶμα without a figure, that he should again express it in a figure, and that without the least indication of the identity of meaning. The same objection is fatal to Bengel's view, who also understands it of the body, but gets this meaning by an allegorical method, "Rota sive sphaera superior est ipsa natura humana rationalis: gehenna vero est pars profundior, cor: lingua in medio ex inferioribus inflammatur et superiora inflammatur." More ingenious is the idea of Beza [ed. 1598], "Jacobus mihi videtur alludere ad rapiditatem circumactae rotæ, suo motu flammam concipientis:" and this is followed by Benson, who says, "The present life of man is here compared to a wheel, which is put in motion at our birth, and runs swiftly till death puts a stop to it. By the rapidity of its [?] motion the tongue sets this wheel in a flame, which sometimes destroys the whole machine." Cf. Hor. Od. i. 1. 3, "metaque fervidis evitata rotis:" but it seems to lie too far from the words for us to suppose that the Apostle can have thus intended to express it. And besides, the propriety of the comparison is not satisfied: for in the case of a wheel, it is set on fire by its own rapid motion, not by any thing without it. It appears then to me that we are driven to the rendering given above, on which Beza says [ed. 1565], "Mihi videtur minus dura explicatio, si τὸν τροχὸν accipiamus ἀντὶ τοῦ κύκλου, ἐκ τῆς γενέσεως pro τῆς κτίσεως, ut significetur linguam posse vel totum orbem conditum accendere." In favour of this, we have, that τροχός is used for "orbis" in Aristoph. Thesmoph. 17: for circular enclosures, Plato, Critias, p. 113 ff.; Soph. frag. 222 d; Schol. on Plato, Legg. iii. p. 451: see also Odys. μ. 173; φ. 178, 183: and that γένεσις is used in the concrete sense of "creation" by Plato, Tim. p. 29 D, E [λέγωμεν δὴ δι' ἦντινα αἰτίαν γένεσιν καὶ τὸ πᾶν τότε ὁ δυνιστὰς ξυνέστησεν], and by other writers. And it is remarkable also [De W.], that just below, when St. James would speak of men as created after God's image, he uses not κτισθέντας but γεγονότας. Cf. also his use of τὸ πρόσωπον τῆς γενέσεως, before cited, in ch. i. 23, "the face wherewith he was created." This sense, the whole orb or cycle of creation, is not, as Wiesinger affirms, "at least not favoured" by ver. 7, but on the contrary agrees exceedingly well with it. After the mention of the τροχὸς τῆς γενέσεως, it is natural that the Apostle should take up with the γὰρ the details of creation, and assert that they might all be tamed by man, but that the tongue is untameable. Again, such sense is most agreeable to the similitude just used, of a small spark kindling a vast forest. This sense is found in Syr., æth., Crusius, Cocceius, and De Wette, and itself set on fire (notice the present, indicating that it is habitually, continually, so set on fire: see below) by hell (which is itself γέεννα τοῦ πυρός, ref. and al. These words are not to be explained away, as Theile, "igne fœdissimo ac funestissimo:" such is not St. James's teaching, cf. ch. iv. 7, where the devil, as a tempter to evil, is personally contrasted with God: but are to be literally taken. It is the devil, for whom hell is prepared, that is the tempter and instigator of the habitual sins of the tongue. It is out of the question [see above] to regard φλογίζομένη as alluding to the original temptations of the fall: equally so, to suppose it to have a future reference, and to imply that the tongue shall be tormented in [ὑπο?] hell: as some in (Ec., ἀλλὰ καὶ αὐτὴ φησι φλογίζεται ὑπὸ τῆς γέεννης, ὡς δῆλον ἀπὸ τοῦ τὴν γλώσσην ἀποτηγανίζομένου πλουσίον: so also Grot., Benson, Semler, Storr, Rosenmüller. I need hardly add, that the foolish conjectural emendation γέεννης, "a [ὑπο?] nativitate," insisted on with much confidence in a note to an anonymous version of St. James and St. Peter [Hatchard, 1842], is quite out of the realm of, as the construing proposed on its adoption is beneath, legitimate criticism. Wiesinger says, "This passage reminds us, in its general sense, of the O. T. sayings, Prov. xvi. 27: Ps. cx. 2—4: Sir. xxviii. 11 ff." The last clause, καὶ φλογ. ὑπὸ τ. γ., is strikingly paralleled by the Targum on Ps. cx. 2, where the deceitful tongue is compared "cum carbonibus juniperi, qui iucensi sicut in gehenna inferne." But none of these passages treats of the destruction which the tongue brings on its own body [cf. Wiesinger's interp. above]]. 7, 8.] The untameableness of the tongue. The thought in ver. 3, though not directly leading on to this, yet is a hint tending towards it.

7.] For (a fresh fact is adduced, substantiating the strong terms used of the mischief of the tongue) every nature (natural generic disposition and character; and so below, when joined to ἀνθρώπινος: not, "kind," "genus," as E. V. and many Commentators) of beasts (quadrupeds, see below) and winged things, of creeping things and things in the sea (creation is divided into four classes: θηρία, πετεινά, ἔρπετά, and ἐνάλια. The first then is not to be taken in its wide sense, as Acts xxviii. 4, 5, but as distinguished from the other three, i. e. as = quadrupeds, beasts of the earth, proper. The classification in Peter's vision, ref. Acts, is different: τὰ τετράποδα τῆς γῆς καὶ τὰ θηρία κ. τὰ ἔρπετά κ. τὰ πετεινά τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, θηρία there at least including the fishes) is (habitually, pres.) tamed and hath been tamed (has long ago been reduced into subjection: such taming has become [perf.] an enduring fact in the world's history, exemplified [pres.] every day) by (not, 'to,' as a 'dativus commodi': it is the dat. of the agent, after a passive verb, = the construction with ὄπο and a gen., as is shewn by the following active construction with οὐδεὶς ἀνθρώπων) the nature (not, "ingenii solertia," as Schneckenb., al.; but φύσις as before, natural generic character) of man:

8.] but (exception) the tongue no one of men can tame (the assertion is absolute, not to be weakened by εὐκόλως κ. ἀνευ πόνου, as the Schol. in Matthæi. And it is plain that to read it, as Ec., interrogatively [εἰ τὰ ἀπίθασσα θηρία ὁ ἀνθρώπος τιθασσεύει καὶ χειροθήθῃ παιεῖ, ἄρα τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γλῶσσαν οὐ δαμάσει;], is quite out of the question. Observe δαμάσαι, aor., 'even to tame once,' not habitually, pres. Now we see fully the meaning of ver. 2): it is a restless mischief (ἀκατάστατον expresses both fickleness and restlessness, see above on ch. i. 8 and Dio Chrys. there, who calls a democracy ἄστατον κακόν. The figure here seems to correspond nearly to what is related of Proteus, that he eluded the grasp of Menelaus under many various shapes. Cf. Hermas, Pastor ii. 2, p. 916, ὃ πόσον πονηρὰ ἐστὶν ἡ καταλαλιά, καὶ ἀκατάστατον δαιμόνιον), [it is] (the supply of a copula is necessary on account of the change of gender, referring back again to γλῶσσα. Or, the two clauses may be rendered without any copula, as quasi-exclamations) full of death-bringing poison (cf. ref. Ps., ἠκόνησαν γλῶσσαν αὐτῶν ὡσεὶ ὕφews, ἰδὲ ἀσπίδων ὑπὸ τὰ χεῖλη αὐτῶν). I cannot forbear referring the reader to Erasmus's very elegant paraphrase of these two verses, 7, 8; and thanking Wiesinger for directing attention to it.

9, 10.] Exemplification of ἀκατάστατον κακόν, by the inconsistent use of the tongue. 9.] Therewith (there could not be a word more accurately expressing the instrumental sense, as it is from nature, that such conduct is unnatural. Can a fountain (the fountain, generically, as δ κόκκος τοῦ σίτου, John xii. 24: ἐξῆλθεν ὁ σπείρων τοῦ σπείραι, Matt. xiii. 3: τὰ κοινοῦντα τὸν ἄβρωπον, ib. xv. 19, 20 al. freq.) out of the same chink (hole, from which the water flows, in a rock, or in the earth. The word is probably connected with ὕψ, ὄπτομαι) send forth (βρῦν, which is generally intransitive,—cf. Soph. Ed. Col. 16 f., χῶρος δ' ὄδ' ἱερός, ὡς σάφ' εἰκάσαι, βρῦν | δάφνης ἐλαίας ἀμπέλου,—is used transitively by Anacreon, 37. 2, ἴδε πῶς, ξαρος φανέντος, χάριτες βόδα βρῦνουν) the sweet and the bitter (water, of course: but there is no need to supply any thing: the contrast is in the contrary nature of the two)?

12.] Shews further that natural organizations do not bring forth things opposite to or inconsistent with their usual fruits, but each one has one result, and that always. Can, my brethren, a fig-tree bring forth (see on the whole, and on ποιῆσαι in this sense, Matt. vii. 16 ff. But De Wette is wrong, when he says that thistles or the like would be here, as there, more agreeable to the similitude. For the reasoning is not here, that we must not look for good fruit from a bad tree: but that no tree can bring forth fruit inconsistent with its own nature: as in Arrian, Epict. ii. 20, πῶς δύναται ἄμπελος μὴ ἀμπελικῶς κινεῖσθαι, ἀλλ' ἐλαϊκῶς; ἢ ἔλαια πάλιν μὴ ἐλαϊκῶς ἀλλ' ἀμπελικῶς; ἀμήχανον, ἀδιανόητον) olives, or a vine figs? Nor (as if the former sentence had been a negative one) can salt [water] bring forth sweet water (i.e. if the mouth emit cursing, thereby making itself a brackish spring, it cannot to any purpose also emit the sweet stream of praise and good words: if it appear to do so, all must be hypocrisy and mere seeming). 13—18.]

Wisdom must be shewn by meekness and peaceableness, not by contentiousness.

This paragraph is closely connected with the subject of the chapter as enounced in ver. 1. Where that ambition, and rivalry to be teachers, existed, there was sure to be contentiousness and every evil thing.

13.] Who is (cf. the similar question in Ps. xxxiii. 12, τίς ἐστιν ἄνθρωπος ὁ θέλων ὤλην κ.τ.λ.; παῖσον τὴν γλῶσσάν σου ἀπὸ κακοῦ κ.τ.λ.) wise and a man of knowledge (the same adjectives are joined in reff. It is not easy to mark the difference, if any is here intended. Wiesinger says, “σοφός is a general term for the normal habit as regards intelligence, cf. ch. i. 5: while ἐπιστήμων denotes the practical insight which in any given case judges rightly and teaches the right way to put σοφία in practice.” Rather would it follow the general analogy of the words to regard σοφία as denoting general ability backed by knowledge, ἐπιστήμη as acquaintance with particular facts and departments of knowledge. The σοφός is an able man, the ἐπιστήμων a well-informed man. But the distinction must be very uncertain: for while Plato says, Rep. v. p. 477 B, ἐπιστήμη ἐπὶ τῷ ὄντι πέφυκε γινῶναι ὡς ἔστι τὸ ὄν, in the Phædrus, p. 96 B, he says again, οἱ σοφοὶ ἐπιστήμη σοφοὶ εἰσιν ἐπιστήμη ἦρα σοφία ἐστίν) among you? Let him shew (aor. because referring to each individual ἔργον when performed, rather than to his general habit) out of (ref.: to which passage and its reasoning the Apostle seems again to be referring. The σοφία and ἐπιστήμη would be dead without this exhibition, as faith without works) his good conduct (in life: see reff.) his works (the good conduct is the general manifestation: the works, the particular results of that general manifestation. The sum of both makes up the ἔργα in the former case, ch. ii.) in meekness of wisdom (an adverbial clause belonging to δειξάτω: not to be tamed down into πραεῖα σοφία as Beza, Grot., al., nor into πραΰτης σοφῆ as Laurentius: meekness is the attribute, σοφία the character to which it belongs: ‘in that meekness which is the proper attribute of wisdom’). 14—16.]

Consequences of the opposite course. 14.] But if ye have (as is the fact: this is implied by the indic.: cf. Col. iii. 1, εἰ οὖν συνηγέρθητε τῷ χριστῷ κ.τ.λ.) bitter emulation (πικρὸν seems to refer back to the example in vv. 11, 12. “Non damnatur,” says Bengel, “zelus dulcis et ira dulcis, ex fide et amore”) and rivalry (see on ἐριθος and ἐριθεία in note, Rom. ii. 8. Beware of confounding ἐριθεία with ἐρις, as is very generally done) in your heart (out of which come thoughts and words and acts, see Matt. xv. 18, 19), do not (in giving yourselves out for wise, which [cf. ver. 15] you cannot really be) boast against (ref.) and lie against the truth (q. d. κατακαυχᾶσθε κ. καταψεύδεσθε, but the latter compound is resolved to bring out more forcibly the ψεύδος in their conduct. Some, as De W. and Wiesinger, suppose κατακαυχ. κατὰ to belong together, and καὶ ψεύδεσθε to be an insertion of the Apostle further to define the κατακαυχᾶσθε. Others again have taken pains to excuse the imagined tautology in ψεύδεσθε κατὰ τῆς ἀληθείας, which however is no tautology at all. ἡ ἀλήθεια, from its following κατακαυχᾶσθε, is necessarily not subjective, ‘truth’ merely, as a quality absent from the conduct of those thus acting, but objective, ‘the truth,’ of which their whole lives would be thus a negation and an opposition which would be in their persons vaunted against and lied against). 15.]

Designation of such pretended wisdom. This wisdom is not one descending from above (the verb is purposely resolved, to throw out the negation οὐκ ἔστιν, and to put the categorical κατερχομένη into prominence as a class to which this σοφία does not belong. κατέρχεται, as does E. V., Schneckenb., al.: still less must we with Luth., al., render ungrammatically, "this is not the wisdom which cometh down" [ἡ ἄνωθεν κατερχομένη]), but earthly (as the sharp-contrast to ἄνωθεν κατερχομένη: belonging to this earth, and its life of sin and strife), sensual (it is almost impossible to express satisfactorily in English the idea given by ψυχικός. Our 'soul' is so identified with man's spiritual part in common parlance, that we have lost the distinction between ψυχὴ and πνεῦμα, except when we can give a periphrastic explanation. The idea here is, belonging to the unspiritual mind of man. See the whole treated in the note on Jude 19, ψυχικοὶ πνεῦμα οὐκ ἔχοντες), devilish (like, or partaking of the nature of, the devils. This word must not be figuratively taken, as by Hottinger [in Huther], "impuro genio magis quam homine digna:" it betokens both the origin of this hypocritical wisdom [cf. φλογισομένη ὑπὸ τῆς γεέννης above, ver. 6], and its character: it is from,—not God, the giver of all true wisdom, ch. i. 5, but—the devil,—and bears the character of its author). 16.] Justification of the foregoing assertion. For where is emulation (in a bad sense) and rivalry (see above), there is confusion (ref. 1 Cor.: anarchy, restless disturbance. Cf. ref. Prov., στόμα ἄστεγον ποιεῖ ἀκαταστασίας), and every evil (reff.) thing (or, deed).

17, 18.] Character and praise of heavenly wisdom. 17.] But (contrast) the wisdom from above is first of all pure ("Ad duplex genus qualitas revocatur: altero interna vis uno vocabulo exprimitur, quippe una ipsa cæterarumque effectrix, altero externæ rationes sex notationibus describuntur, quæ ad primarium scriptoris consilium invidiæ rixisque occurrendi omnes redeunt." Theile. ἀγνή, καθαρὰ καὶ ἀρύπαρος, μηδενὸς τῶν σαρκικῶν ἀντεχομένη, Ec. It is hardly necessary to guard any scholar against the abuse of this text often found, when it is made to signify that the heavenly-wise must be pure, i. e. free from all contact with any thing that offends, before he can be peaceable: and thus it is used to further, instead of to discourage, an uncharitable spirit), then (= in the second place: its external qualities are now enumerated) peaceable, forbearing (μὴ ἀκριβοδίκαιος ἐπὶ τὸ χεῖρον, Aristot. Eth. Nic. x. 6. See note on Phil. iv. 5), easily persuaded ("suadibilis," vulg. The word occurs in the active sense of "easily persuading," in Æschyl. Agam. 274, πότερα δ' ὀνειρῶν φάσματ' εὐπειθῆ σέβεις: and Choeph. 259, πέμπειν ἔχουσ ἂν σήματ' εὐπειθῆ βροτοῖς: but not, that I am aware, in this passive sense), full of compassion (the great triumph of the Christian practical life is won by ἔλεος: see ch. ii. 13) and good fruits (contrast to πᾶν φαῦλον πρᾶγμα above), without doubting (as might be expected, from the various meanings of διακρίνεσθαι, this word has been variously interpreted. Luther, E. V., and most Commentators render it "without partiality," unparteiſch, thus giving to a passive adjective an active meaning: and in the same spirit, Ec., μὴ διακρίνουσα παρατηρήσεις βρωμάτων κ. διαφόρων βαπτισμάτων: Beza, "absque disceptatione:" vulg., "non judicans:" Calvin, "Nimis anxiam et scrupulosam inquisitionem notat, qualem fere in hypocritis cernere licet, qui dum nimis exacte inquirunt in fratrum dicta et facta, nihil non in sinistram partem rapiunt:" Bengel, "Non facit discrimen ubi non opus est, v. gr., inter potentes et tenues." The passive sense is kept by Gebser, who understands "undivided:" the heavenly-wise keeping banded together in love: Wetst., "non duplex." Two considerations contribute to substantiate the rendering given above, which is that of De Wette, Wiesinger, and Huther. 1. The word would seem, from its close junction with ἀνυπόκριτος, rather to betoken an inner quality than [as Gebser above] an outward circumstance: 2. when thus used of an inner quality, cf. ch. i. 6 and ii. 4, our Apostle, in common with other N. So that I would understand by it "expers omnis ejuscunq̄ue ambiguitatis et simulationis," as Huther), without feigning ("These two characteristics are also added with especial reference to the state of things among the readers: on ἀδιάκριτος, cf. ch. i. 6—8; ii. 4: on ἀνυπόκριτος, ch. i. 22, 26; ii. 1." Huther).

18.] Before, in ver. 16, after the characterization came the statement of the result: and so now here. That result was designated as a present one, ἀκαταστασία κ. πᾶν φαῦλον πρᾶγμα: this is a future one, but beautifully anticipated by the pregnant expression καρπὸς σπείρεται: see below. But (δέ passes from the subjective character to the objective result) fruit (or, the fruit, καρπὸς being in the emphatic place and therefore losing its article) of righteousness (genitive of apposition: that fruit which is righteousness: see ref. Heb. and cf. Isa. xxxii. 17: righteousness in its wider sense: in themselves and in others; in practice and in reward; in time and in eternity) is sown (in saying καρπὸς σπείρεται the Apostle uses a prolepsis, as if a husbandman should this autumn be said to sow next year's bread) in peace (not as De W., for εἰς εἰρήνην, but betokening the spirit and mode in which the sowing takes place, as opposed to ὑπου (ἡλος κ. ἐριθεία) by them who work (better than "make," which seems to confue the meaning to the reconciling persons at variance. So also in ref. Matt. The dative participle is not a 'dativus commodi,' but the dat. of the agent: the former view would leave out of the proposition that which is in fact its necessary and most important feature, viz. that the peace-workers themselves are the sowers of the fruit) peace.

CHAP. IV. 1—10.] Exhortations and pleadings, as connected with what preceded, first against wars and fightings, then against the lusts and worldly desires out of which these spring. And herein, 1—3.] against wars and fightings, the origin of which is detailed and exposed.

1.] Whence are wars, and whence fightings among you ("By what follows, it is not contentions between teachers that are meant, as Schneckenb., al., or sects, as Semler, al.,—but concerning 'meum' and 'tuum.' Grot. refers them to the tumults which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem. πόλ. and μάχ. are strong expressions, as in Arrian, Epict. iii. 21 in Raphael, and Wetst. πρὸς τὸ παιδᾶριον πόλεμος, πρὸς τοὺς γείτονας κ.τ.λ." De Wette. The above assertion, that these are strifes about mine and thine, confines them perhaps to too narrow a space; they seem rather, as Huther, to represent all those quarrels which spring up about common worldly interests from selfish considerations of pride, envy, covetousness, and the like) Are they not from hence (this second question contains in fact the answer to the former in an appeal to the consciences of the readers), from your lusts (an unusual sense of ἡδοναί, hardly distinguishable from ἐπιθυμίαι: in fact taken up by ἐπιθυμεῖτε) which militate (campaign, have their camp, and, as it were, forage about. There seems no need, with De W., Calov., al., to supply κατὰ τῆς ψυχῆς or κατὰ τοῦ νοός, as in ref.: Huther observes well, that, had this been intended, it would have been more plainly expressed. Schneckenb., Theile, al. understand it of militating one against another, but this again is not consistent with the context, in which αἱ ἡδοναί ὑμῶν are treated as a class, united for one purpose, cf. ver. 3 fin. Wiesinger thinks that the adversaries are to be found in the fact of the ἐπιθυμῆν having set over against it an οὐκ ἔχειν, an οὐ δύνασθε ἐπιτυχεῖν. But this again would not, except by implication [this οὐ δύνασθε implying a neighbour who is the obstacle], touch the point of wars and fightings. It is far better therefore to see as the adversaries, our fellow-men, against whom, to put down whom and set ourselves up, our lusts are as it were an army of soldiers ever encamped within us and waging war) in your members (see a remarkable parallel in Plato, Phædo, p. 66 c: καὶ γὰρ πολέμοις καὶ στάσεσι καὶ μάχαις οὐδὲν ἄλλο παρέχει ἢ τὸ σῶμα καὶ αἱ τούτου ἐπιθυμῆαι)?

Ver. 2 carries on the assertion in detail. Ye desire (generally: it is not said what: but evidently worldly possessions and honours are intended by the context, vv. 4 ff.), and possess not (lust of possession does not ensure possession itself, then comes a further step, out of this lust): ye murder (but how comes φόνος to be introduced at this early stage of the development of ἐπιθυμία, before ζήλος, which itself leads on to μάχαι κ. πόλεμοι? Three solutions of this difficulty may at once be set aside, as out of the question: 1. that which makes the words mean "ye envy even unto death," giving the so-called adverbial meaning to φονεύετε καὶ. So Carpzov, Pott, Schneckenburger, al. Against this, besides its exceeding lameness and clumsiness, is, that in this case the subordinate verb φονεύετε must come last, not first. 2. That which gives to φονεύετε the unexampled sense, "ye murder in thought," have the intent to murder. So Estius, Calov., Bengel, De Wette, Huther, Wiesinger. But even if such a meaning might be justified, which I doubt, by the strong figurative cast of the passage, yet the matter of fact character of the following clause, καὶ οὐ δύνασθε ἐπιτυχεῖν, makes it more probable that a matter of fact is here also pointed at, and that φονεύετε is rather qualified by καὶ ζηλοῦτε than strictly parallel with it. 3. That of (Ecum., which as far as I know stands alone: ἐπιστατέον δὲ ὡς φόνον ἐνταῦθα καὶ πόλεμον οὐ τὸν σαρκικόν φησι. τούτο γὰρ βαρὺ καὶ κατὰ ληστῶν ἐννοεῖν, μὴ ὅτι κατὰ πόσως πιστῶν καὶ τῷ κυρίῳ προσερχομένων. ἀλλ' ὡς γέ μοι δοκεῖ, φονεύειν φησὶ τοὺς τὴν ἑαυτῶν φυχὴν ἀποκτίνοντας ταῖς τολμηραῖς ταύταις ἐπιχειρήσεσι, δι' ὧς καὶ ὁ πρὸς τὴν εὐσέβειαν αὐτοῖς πόλεμος. Another inadmissible expedient is, to suppose φθονεῖτε to be the true reading; there being no authority whatever for it in manuscripts. Thus Erasm., Luther, Calvin, Beza, Piscator, Benson, and many others. It only remains then to take the word literally, and understand it to allude to such cases, e. g. as those in the O. T. of David and Ahab, who, in their desire to possess, committed murder. And if it be said, as Ec. above, that this is a hard saying of those who feared the Lord, be it remembered that the Apostle is speaking of πόλεμοι καὶ μάχαι, and though he may include under these terms the lesser forms of variance, the greater and more atrocious ones are clearly not excluded. In the state of Jewish society during the apostolic age, it is to be feared that examples of them were but too plentiful, and there is no saying how far the Christian portion of Jewish communities may have suffered themselves to become entangled in such quarrels and their murderous consequences) and envy, and are not able to obtain: ye fight and make war (these words form the final answer to the πόθεν κ.τ.λ. with which the section begins: and are therefore not to be joined with the following as by δέ in the rec.).

Reason why ye have not. Ye have not, because ye ask not (in prayer to God: in the following verse he explains, and as it were corrects this): 3.] ye ask (notice the unaccountable interchange of active and middle, αἰτεῖσθαι . . . αἰτεῖτε . . .

4.] Ye adulteresses (the occurrence of the fem. only is rightly explained by Theile: "A fem. nec vero a masc. facta denominatio suppetitari poterat ipsa imagine. Ea quum Deum sistat maritum, homines fœminam, non minus recte singuli homines scorta dicentur, quam totum genus atque universa aliqua gens scortum." Nor is De Wette's protest needed that only das Volf im Ganzen, only the entire people, is thus called: nor Huther's consequent modification of Theile, that St. James is addressing Churches here. For God is the Lord and husband of every soul that is His, as much as of every church; and the indignant μοιχαλίδες of the Apostle is just as applicable to every one who forsakes his or her God, as to an apostate church. This is one of those cases where the testimony of our ancient MSS. is so valuable, in restoring to us the nervous and pregnant rebuke of the original), know ye not that the friendship of the world (ὁ κόσμος here, precisely as in ch. i. 27, men, and men's interests and ambitions and employments, in so far as they are without God. So that we must not understand merely worldly goods, as Schneckenburger, Theile, al., nor merely worldly desires [Didymus, Laurentius], nor both of these together [De Wette], to neither of which will φιλία properly fit) is enmity ('the state of being an enemy: not ἐχθρά, "inimica," as vulg., which destroys the parallelism and force) of God (the man who is taken out of the world by Christ, cannot again become a friend and companion of worldly men and their schemes for self, without passing into enmity with God, of whose family he was a reconciled member. God and the world stand opposed to one another: so that a man cannot join the one without deserting the other. This is further stated in what follows)? whoever therefore (particular consequence on the general axiom just stated, carried however further, into all approach to, and not merely the completion of, the outward state) shall be minded (no stress on βουληθῆ: it is a mere statement of fact as to the man who becomes a friend of the world, and therefore, in so doing, sets his mind and thought and wish that way. So that we need not say with Laurentius, "Non is tantum est inimicus Dei, qui est ipso opere amicus mundi, sed etiam ille qui cum non possit, vult tamen." But he is so far right, that the Apostle certainly means to say, He that would be a friend of the world, must make up his mind to be God's enemy) to be a friend of the world, is (thereby, by the proceeding in the direction indicated by that βουλή) constituted (as above, ref.; not merely "is," or 'becomes:' 'becomes ipso facto,' 'then and there,' is rather the meaning of καθίσταται) an enemy of God.

5, 6.] Testimony from Scripture to convince further those who might question what has just been stated. 5.] Or (ref. the formula puts a hypothetical alternative, the assumption of which negatives itself) do ye think that the Scripture saith in vain, The Spirit that He (God) placed in us (viz. when the Spirit descended on the church. We have κατωκίζω somewhat similarly used Æsch. Prom. 250, τυφλὰς ἐν τοῖς θνητοῖς ἐλπίδας κατώκισα) jealously (πρὸς φθόνον, as φρὸς βίαν and the like: see below) desireth (us for his own)? These words connect naturally with the foregoing. We are married to one, even God, who has implanted in us His Spirit: and He is a jealous God, who will not suffer us to be friends of His enemy and His friends at the same time. The only difficulty seems to be, to trace this latter saying in any part of Scripture. For that this is the quotation, and no other, must be maintained against very many Commentators (see below) on account of λέγει, which can hardly be otherwise used than as introducing the thing said. I will state the solution which seems to me the most probable, and then give an account of other methods of solving it. The emphasis of this clause lies on the πρὸς φθόνον ἐπιποθεῖ: and, interpreting those words as above, we are naturally led to ask, is there any chapter or passage especially, where such a mind towards His people is ascribed to God? And this directs our thoughts at once to Deut. xxxii., where the love of Jehovah for Israel, and His jealousy over them is described. In that song of Moses we have this very word used of God, ver. 10 f., ἐκύκλωσεν αὐτὸν καὶ ἐπαίδευσεν αὐτόν, καὶ διεφύλαξεν αὐτόν ὡς κόρην ὀφθαλμοῦ ὡς ἀεὶ δὸς σκεπάσαι νοσσιὰν αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐπὶ τοῖς νοσσοῖς αὐτοῦ ἐπεπόθησεν: and ver. 19, καὶ εἶδεν κύριος καὶ ἐξήλωσεν, καὶ παρέξυθη δι' ὀργὴν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ καὶ θυγατέρων' καὶ εἶπεν, Ἀποστρέψω τὸ πρόσωπόν μου ἀπ' αὐτῶν κ.τ.λ. So that here we have the elements of the sense of that which is cited, viz. the jealous desire of the Lord over His people. And for the rest, τὸ πνεῦμα ὃ κατώκισεν ἐν ἡμῖν, the only solution seems to be, that the Apostle translates into the language of the Gospel the former declarations of the God of Israel, e. g. such as that Num. xxxv. 34, ἐγὼ γὰρ εἰμι κύριος κατασκηνῶν ἐν μέσῳ τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραὴλ, combining them with such prophecies as Ezek. xxxvi. 27, καὶ τὸ πνεῦμά μου δώσω ἐν ὑμῖν. I own that such a solution does not seem to me wholly satisfactory: still there is nothing improbable in the idea that St. James may have combined the general sense of Scripture on the point of God's jealousy over His people, and instead of the God who dwelt in Israel, may have placed the Holy Spirit who dwelleth in us. At all events it is better to understand it thus, than to make λέγει mean 'speaks,' or to force the words of the citation from their simple meaning. I now proceed to state other interpretations. And 1. of those who have recognized the fact that the words πρὸς φθόνον κ.τ.λ. are a citation. Of these, understanding the words variously (see below), Grotius believes them to refer to Gen. vi. 3, 5: Beza, Erasm. Schmid, to Gen. viii. 21: Witsius, to Num. xi. 29: Schneckenb. to Deut. v. 9 ff.: Le Clerc, to Ps. cxix. 20 ff.: Michaelis, to Prov. xxi. 10: Cocceius, to Cant. viii. 6: Wetstein, to Wisd. vi. 12. Others have supposed the N. T. to be intended by ἡ γραφή. Thus Benson believes the reference to be to Matt. vi. 24: Storr, al., to Gal. v. 17: Bengel, to 1 Pet. ii. 1 ff.: and Semler again, to a passage in the apocryphal book called the Testament of the XII Patriarchs. Bewildered by these differences, many Commentators, among whom are Ec., Bede, Calv., Est., Wolf, al., either deny the fact of a citation altogether, or refer the λέγει either on to the citation following in ver. 6, or back to what went before,—or, as I have done above, believe that the general sense of Scripture on the subject, and not any particular text, is adduced. Before passing from this part of my note, I may remark that Huther's objection, that against the view here given, the formula citandi, ἡ γραφή λέγει, is decisive, is not valid: see Wolf's Curæ, vol. v. p. 66: and cf. John vii. 38, 42, where though the formula εἶπεν ἡ γραφή is used, the general sense, and not the exact words, is given.

2. The sense of the words themselves, πρὸς φθόνον ἐπιποθεῖ τὸ πνεῦμα ὃ κατώκισεν ἐν ἡμῖν, is very variously given. a. πρὸς φθόνον is by some referred back to λέγει,—ἡ γρ. λέγει πρὸς φθόνον: "An putatis, quod scriptura in vanum loquatur adversus invidiam? Spiritus desideria excitat, sed meliora desideriiis carnis:" so Du Mont, in Huther. But this "desideria excitare" is an unexampled sense of ἐπιποθεῖν. Gebser takes this connexion, and renders, "Think ye, that the Scripture speaks in vain, and enviously?" And nearly so Ecumenius, ἡ δοκεῖτε ὅτι κενῶς ἡ γραφή λέγει, ἢ πρὸς ἡ χάριν ἡ διὸ ἡ λέγει, ἰ' Ὁ θεὸς ἰ ὑπερηφάνους ἡ ἀντιτάσφθόνον; οὐδὲν τούτων ἀλλ' ἐπιποθεὶ κ.τ.λ.

 But, as Huther remarks, this necessity for ἡ sufficiently condemns this view: and thus ἐπιποθεὶ would be left here without any qualifying adverb to fill out its sense.

β. Taking then πρὸς φθόνον with ἐπιπο-θεὶ, we have the following various views taken: I. πνεῦμα as the subject.

And herein A. τὸ πν. = the human spirit, in its natural condition.

So Hottinger, "Animus hominis natura fertur ad invidendum aliis:" so also Beza, Laurentius, Grot., al., and E. V.
 B. τὸ πν. = the Spirit of God, whom God hath caused to take up His dwelling in us: and then a. πρὸς φθ. = "ad invidiam:"

in which case the clause is interrogative:
 "Num ad invidiam proclivis est Spiritus, qui nobis inest? minime:" similarly Bede ("Numquid reditus gratiæ, quo significati estis in die redemptionis, hoc concupiscit ut invidetis alterutrum"), Witsius, Calv., Wolf, al. b. πρὸς φθ. = "contra invidiam:" so Luther, der Geist . . . gelüftet wider den Häß,—Pareus, Beugel, al.

c. πρὸς φθ. = "invidiose:" so De Wette, much as the interp. given above, neidisch liebt [uns] der Geist: so Schneckenburger, and in substance many old Commentators (see Pol. Synops. v. p. 1459, col. 1), rendering it "usque ad invidiam:"
 e. g. Tirinus, Menochius, Cajetan, al.

II. πνεῦμα as the object, supplying ὁ θεὸς as the subject, understanding πν. the human spirit, and taking πρὸς φθόν. adverbially. So Wiesinger, "The Love of God jealously desires as an object your love:" so Theile, supplying however ἡ γραφή as the subject, as also does Cœcumenius, continuing from the words cited above, οὐδὲν τούτων ἀλλ' ἐπιποθεὶ ἦτοι ἐπιζητεῖ τὴν διὰ τῆς παρακλήσεως αὐτῆς ἐγκατοικισθεῖσαν ἡμῖν χάριν: and below, πνεῦμα τὴν ἀγαθὴν φησι προαίρεσιν.

 In judging of the above interpretations (the classification of which I have mainly taken from Huther), we may notice, that to interpret πρὸς φθόνου ἐπιποθεὶ, as if it were κατὰ φθόνου ἐπιποθεὶ, see Gal. v. 17, is to do violence to the construction and meaning of the words: besides which, there is no mention here of envy, as a human passion, the discourse being of the enmity to God incurred by those who would be friends to the world; of God's enmity to the proud and upholding of the humble. So that God must be the subject of this clause, as expressed by τὸ πνεῦμα ὃ κατέκτισεν ἐν ἡμῖν. This being so, our only rendering of πρὸς φθόνον will be as above, adverbially, as so very frequently, e. g. πρὸς δίκην, πρὸς ἡδονήν, πρὸς χάριν, πρὸς λύπην, πρὸς ὀργήν, πρὸς βίαν, πρὸς ὕβριν, &c. &c. See Palm and Rost's Lex. under πρὸς, vol. ii. p. 1138, col. 2, where many examples are given,

 e. g. πρὸς χάριν ἢ πρὸς ἀπέχθειαν δικά-ζειν, Lucian: πρὸς ὀργήν ἀκούειν, &c.
 With regard to the sense above given, as fitting into the context, Theile well says, ἐπιποθεῖν with an accusative, "desiderio alicujus teneri," to love eagerly, as reff.
 2 Cor., Phil., introduces us into the same figurative realm of thought in which μοιχαλίδες placed us before. The Apostle is speaking of the eager and jealous love of God towards those whom He has united as it were in the bond of marriage with Himself.

6.] But He (God, by His Holy Spirit dwelling in us, the same subject as in the previous sentence) gives the more grace (the more and greater, for this longing and jealous desire): wherefore he saith (the Spirit, again: for it is the same Spirit who is implanted in us that speaks in Scripture. This is better than to supply 'the Scripture;' far better than to take λέγει impersonally, "it is written," as Kern), God (κύριος, LXX: and the same variation is found where the words are again cited in 1 Pet. v. 5) is set against the proud (reff.), but giveth grace to the lowly (see Rom. xii. 16. This is a proof that the ambitious and restless after worldly honours and riches, are God's enemies, whereas the humble and lowly are the objects of His gifts of ever-increasing grace.
 The inference follows in the shape of solemn exhortation [vv. 7—10]).

7.] Submit yourselves therefore to God (addressed mainly to the proud—the μοιχαλί-δες above; but also to all): but resist the devil (the ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου) and

which is merely an assurance as from man to man: this is a divine promise. Huther refers to Hermas, Pastor ii. 12. 5, p. 949, δύναται ὁ διάβολος παλαῖσαι, καταπαλαῖσαι δὲ οὐ δύναται. ἐὰν οὖν ἀντίστης αὐτόν, νικηθεὶς φεύζεται ἀπὸ σοῦ κατασχυμμένος from you: 8.] draw near to God, and He will draw near (here better 'will:' in speaking of the divine dealings, positive declarations are better softened: cf. John xvi. 23, E. V. Not that this is always observed: cf. Rev. vii. 17, E. V.) to you. But it is only the pure in heart and hand that can approach God: therefore—Purify your hands (the hands being the external organs of action, and becoming polluted by the act, as e. g. by blood in the act of murder: cf. Isa. i. 15, αἱ γὰρ χεῖρες ὑμῶν αἵματος πλήρεις: lix. 3: 1 Tim. ii. 8. And, for both the particulars here mentioned, Ps. xxiii. 4, ἀθῶος χερσὶ καὶ καθαρὸς τῇ καρδίᾳ), ye sinners: and make chaste your hearts (in allusion to μοιχαλίδες above), ye double-minded (ye whose affections are divided between God and the world. The Apostle is addressing not two classes of persons, but one and the same: "Eosdem vocat peccatores et duplices animo," Calv.). 9.] This cannot be done without true and deep repentance, leading them through deep sorrow. Be wretched (in your minds, from a sense of your sinfulness. That such feeling will have its outward demonstrations is evident: but this word itself does not allude to them, as Grot., "Affligite vosmetipsos jejuniis et aliis corporis σκληραγωγίαις:" so likewise Est., al. Beza also misses the point of the exhortation, when he says, "ἀναλγησίαν primum reprehendit in adversis, deinde immoderatam in rebus prosperis exultationem." "Vestram persentiscite miseriam," of Theile, is nearest the mark) and mourn and weep (here again Grot. refers the exhortation to outward things—"Lugubrem habitum induite, saccum et cilicia." These may follow on that which is here commanded, but are not the thing itself: let your laughter ("lautæ vitæ," Theile) be turned into mourning (these more of the outward manifestations) and your joy into humiliation (κατήφεια, lit. casting down of the eyes: hence shame or humiliation, which produces such downcast looks: cf. II. γ. 51, where Hector, addressing Paris, calls Helen πατρί τε σὼ μέγα πῆμα, πόληϊ τε παντί τε δήμῳ, Δυσμενέσιν μὲν χάρμα, κατηφείην δέ σοι αὐτῷ. These latter, more of the inner states of mind). 10.] Conclusion of the exhortation: the true way to exaltation, through humility. Calvin quotes from Augustine, "Sicuti arborem, ut sursum creseat, profundas subtus radices agere oportet, ita quisquis in humilitatis radice fixum animum non habet, in ruinam suam extollitur." Be humbled before the Lord (ref. Matt. and 1 Pet. v. 6: but ὑπὸ τὴν χεῖρα τοῦ θεοῦ there is not = ἐνώπιον κυρίου here. This latter gives more the realization in the soul of the presence of God, as drawing near to Him in humility: that, the subjection to Him in recognition of His providence and His judgments. κυρίου, not Christ, but the Father: see on ch. i. 7), and He shall exalt you (both here and hereafter: by His grace and counsel here [not exactly as Grot., who is too external throughout this passage, "Sublimes faciet donis suis"] to the hidden glory of His waiting children, and by His fruition and presence hereafter [ἐν καιρῷ as 1 Pet. v. 6] to the ineffable glory of His manifested

Exhortation against evil speaking and uncharitable judgment. Some have thought that there is no close connexion with the preceding: and Huther urges this from the milder word ἀδελφοί being here used, whereas before it was μοιχαλίδες, ἁμαρτωλοί, δίσυχοι. But it may be observed, that St. James frequently begins his exhortations mildly, and moves onward into severity: in this very paragraph we have an example of it, where unquestionably the σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ κρίνων τὸν πλησίον; is more severe than the ἀδελφοί with which it began. The connexion is with the whole spirit of this part of the Epistle, as dissuading mutual quarrels, undue self-exaltation and neighbour-depreciation. Chap. iii. dealt with the sins of the tongue: and now, after speaking against pride and strife, the Apostle naturally returns to them, as springing out of a proud, uncharitable spirit. 11.]

Do not speak against one another (it is evident what sort of καταλαλεῖν he means, by the junction of κρίνειν with it below: it is that kind which follows upon unfavourable judgment: depreciation of character and motive), brethren (ἀδελφοί prepares the way for the frequent mention of ἀδελφός below): he that speaketh against a brother (but not necessarily indefinite: the relations of life, πατήρ, μήτηρ, ἀδελφός &c. frequently lose their articles even when put definitely), and judgeth his brother (the expression of αὐτοῦ in this second case brings out more strongly the community under the νόμος, which such an one violates), speaketh against the law (of Christian life: the old moral law glorified and amplified by Christ: the νόμος βασιλικός, ch. ii. 8; νόμος τῆς ἐλευθερίας, i. 25), and judgeth the law

(viz. by setting himself up over that law, as pronouncing upon its observance or non-observance by another. This is far better, than with Grot., al., “Doctrinam evangelicam homo talis spernit et damnat ut imperfectam: Christus enim tales non damnat:” or than Laurentius, cited with approbation by Huther, “Is qui detrahit proximo, detrahit legi, quia lex prohibet omnem detractionem: sed et judicat idem legem, quia hoc ipso quod contra prohibitionem legis detrahit, judicat quasi, legem non recte prohibuisse.” This is condemned by the word quasi: for such an argument might be used of every transgressor. See below): but if (as thou dost) thou judgest the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge (seeing that he who judges, judges not only the man before him, but the law also: for he pronounces not only on the fact, but on that fact being, or not being, a breach of the law. So that thus to bring men’s actions under the cognizance of the law, is the office of a judge. There is no need to supply νόμου after κριτῆς: indeed it destroys the sense by removing the point of the assertion. That the evil speaker judges the law, was before asserted; now, he is stated to be thereby removed from the Christian brotherhood of doers of the law, and become categorically a judge. And then in the next verse, the inconsistency and absurdity of his placing himself in that category is shewn). 12.] One (God) is the lawgiver and judge (unites these two offices in His own person: the latter of them depending on the former), He who is able to save and destroy (this second clause, ὁ δυνάμ. κ.τ.λ., is an epexegetis of εἶς, and belongs closely to the subject, not to the predicative part of the sentence, as De Wette gives it, Einer ist der Gesetzgeber und Richter, der da vermag zu retten und zu verderben. ὁ δυνάμενος, because He alone has the power to carry out His judgment when pronounced: "Nostrum non est iudicare, præsertim cum exequi non possimus," Bengel. On ὠῶσαι, see on ch. i. 21 and ii. 14, as relating to ultimate salvation: and on κ. ἀπολέσαι, ref. Matt., to which this is the key text, fixing the reference there to God, and not to God's Enemy): but thou, who art thou (thou, feeble man, who hast no such power, and who art not the lawgiver) that judgest thy neighbour (see ref. Rom., the influence of which on our readings here it is, as usual in such cases, very difficult to estimate)?

13—17.] Against ungodly and presumptuous confidence in our worldly plans for the future. This again falls into the previous context, where we are warned against hearts divided between God and the world. But, as has been rightly remarked as early as Bede, and by many since, e. g. Ec., Semler, al., St. James, though carrying on the same subject, is no longer, from this place to ch. v. 6, addressing members of Christ's church, but those without: the ungodly and the rich in this world. This however must be taken with just this reservation,—that he addresses Christians in so far as they allow themselves to be identified with those others. This first paragraph, for example, might well serve as a warning for Christians who are in the habit of leaving God out of their thoughts and plans. That it is still Jews who are addressed, appears from ver. 15, and ch. v. 4.

13.] Go to now ("interjectio ad excitandam attentionem," Beng. This seems to be the true view of it: 'come on,' q. d. let us reason together: cf. δεῦτε, διελεγχθῶμεν, Isa. i. 18. The νῦν serves to mark the time, as noted by the point to which the argument of the Epistle has arrived. It is hardly purely temporal, but as so often, slightly ratiocinative, = 'rebus sic stantibus,' 'quæ cum ita sint:' see on 1 Cor. xiii. 13), ye that say (no stress on λέγοντες: not as Theile, "qui non solum cogitare soletis, sed etiam dicere audetis." The fault is even oftener perhaps committed in word than in thought. We speak more presumptuously before men than we think in our own hearts; though there also we are too liable to forget God), To-day and to-morrow (the ἡ of the rec. would suppose an alternative, "to-day, it may be, or to-morrow:" with καὶ, the two days are assigned for the journey, without any alternative. Bengel and Wiesinger take καὶ, as in δύο μαρτύρων καὶ τριῶν, 2 Cor. xiii. 1, as combining two possible cases: "Nunc dicit hodie, idem aliusve cras, at commodum est," Beng. This is possible: but I prefer the other) we will go (the indic. fut. [see var. readd.] gives the fixed certainty of the assumption) into this (most Commentators render, "this or that," = "such a," as E. V.: and Winer, Gramm. § 23. 5, refers to Plutarch, Sympos. i. 61, for this usage of ὅδε. But his reference does not quite hear him out. Plutarch is proving the vinity of Alexander from the βασιλικαὶ ἐφημερίδες, in which is found very often written ὅτι τήνδε τὴν ἡμέραν ἐκ τοῦ πότου ἐκάθευδεν, ἔστι δ' ὅτε καὶ τὴν ἐφεξῆς: where τήνδε τὴν ἡμέραν is clearly a quotation from the diary, not 'this or that day,' but "this day:" and then τὴν ἐφεξῆς is an improper elliptical way of recording, that against the next day a similar entry was made. So that I should much doubt this usage of ὅδε, there being no mention of it in the best Lexx., and apparently no other example: and should consider τήνδε τὴν πόλιν as a sort of 'oratio mixta,' to express in general terms the city then present to the mind of the speaker) city, and will spend (reff. for this temporal sense of ποιέω) there one year (ἐνιαυτὸν ἓνα is the accus. not of duration, but of the object, after ποιήσομεν. So that the E. V. "continue there a year," is not accurate. It should have been 'spend a year there,' which gives the presumption much more strongly and vividly. ἐνιαυτ. ἓνα: "Sic loquuntur, quasi mox etiam de insequentibus annis deliberaturi." Beng.),

It is not a case where [Bloomf.] the variations point to the original absence of a particle: for the καὶ in the text is not a particle of connexion, as the δέ is. For it to be so, the var. read. must have been καὶ ἔπειτα, not ἔπειτα καί) vanishing:

10) will (not θέλη, but aor.: properly, shall have willed; i. e. have so determined it in His counsel), we shall both live (with the reading ζήσομεν, it would be hardly grammatically allowable to make this clause part of the hypothesis, ‘and if we live.’ With the subjunctive ζήσωμεν of the rec., this will be the right rendering: but even then it is more probable that the ἐάν would have been repeated, than that two such incongruous members as κύριος θελήσῃ and ζήσωμεν should be included under one hypothetical ἐάν. The escape from this, “si Deo placet ut vivamus” [Schneckenb., so Grot., al.], is clearly unallowable) and shall do this or that. 16.] But (contrast to the spirit of resignation to the divine will just recommended) now (as things now are, see 1 Cor. v. 11; xiv. 6) ye boast in (not, as in ch. i. 9, “make your boast in:” the ἐν indicates the state, as in ch. iii. 18, and iv. 3 especially. The ἀλαζονεία is the source, but not the material of the boasting) your vain-gloriousnesses (see note on ref. 1 John. Here ἀλαζονεία is the self-deceived and groundless confidence in the stability of life and health on which the worldly pride themselves. On this, as on its foundation, your boastful speeches, σήμερον καὶ αὔριον κ.τ.λ., are built): all such boasting (all boasting so made and so grounded) is wicked. 17.] This conclusion is most naturally understood to refer to the universal notoriety of the shortness of human life, and to apply only to the subject just treated. Otherwise, if, as many Commentators, we take it for a general conclusion to all that has gone before, we must understand it as Estins, “Jam de his omnibus satis vos admonui, vobis bene nota sunt:" in which case this would hardly be the place for it, considering that more exhortations follow, ch. v. Grotius takes it to mean, "Moniti estis a me, ignorantiam non potestis obtundere, si quid tale posthac dixeritis, gravior erit culpa:" and so Theile, Wiesinger, De Wette, al. But in this case, why should such a conclusion follow this, rather than any other exhortation? So that (οὖν here does not prove what follows, but refers the particular case to the general principle; q. d. therefore we see 'hoc exemplo' the truth of the general axiom, &c.) to him who knoweth to do good (not τὸ καλόν: καλόν is not any positive good, as beneficence; but merely the opposite of πονηρόν. So Wiesinger, rightly: and ποιεῖν is the object after εἶδοτι, not the epexegetic inf. as De Wette, "knows the good, that he must do it") and doeth it not (not merely, omits to do it, as might be the case if it were some one definite deed that was spoken of. It is not sins of omission that men are here convicted of, as so often mistakenly supposed: but the doing πονηρόν, as in the case of the speech above supposed, where καλόν is easy and obvious), it is sin to him (i. e. reckoned to him as sin. Schneckenburger well remarks, "Videre licet, Jacobum omnia . . . ad thema suum primum revocare, recti scientiam requirere recti exercitacionem").

CHAP. V. 1—6.] Denunciation of woe on the rich in this world. These verses need not necessarily be addressed (as Huther) to the same persons as ch. iv. 13 ff. Indeed the ἄγε ὑῦν repeated seems to indicate a fresh beginning. Commentators have differed as to whether this denunciation has for its object, or not, exhortation to repentance. I believe the right answer to be, much as De Wette, that in the outward form indeed the words contain no such exhortation: but that we are bound to believe all such triumphant denunciation to have but one ultimate view, that of grace and mercy to those addressed. That such does not here appear, is owing chiefly to the close proximity of judgment, which the writer has before him. Calvin then is in the main right,—when he says, "Falluntur qui Jacobum hic exhortari ad pœnitentiam divites putant: mihi simplex magis denuntiatio iudicii Dei videtur, qua eos terrere voluit absque spe veniæ,"—except in those three last rather characteristic words.

1.] Go to now (see above, ch. iv. 13), ye rich, go weep (the imper. aor. gives the command a concentrated force, as that which ought to be done at once and without delay), howling (the part. is not merely a rhetorical reduplication of κλαύσατε, but describes the mode of the κλαύσαι by a stronger and more graphic word, in the present, as thus habitual during the κλαύσαι. ὀλολύζειν [reff.] is a word in the O. T. confined to the prophets, and used, as here, with reference to the near approach of God's judgments. Thus in Isa. xiii. 6, ὀλολύζετε, ἐγγὺς γὰρ ἡμέρα κυρίου) over your miseries which are coming on (no supply of ὑμῖν [see digest] is required after ἐπερχ. These miseries are not to be thought of as the natural and determined end of all worldly riches, but are the judgments connected with the coming of the Lord: cf. ver. 8, ἡ παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου ἤγγικεν. It may be that this prospect was as yet intimately bound up with the approaching destruction of the Jewish city and polity: for it must be remembered that they are Jews who are here addressed).

2.] The effect of the coming judgment is depicted as already present, and its material as already stored up against them. What is meant by the figure used, we learn in ver. 4. Your riches are corrupted (see besides reff., Job xxxiii. 21; xl. 7. σήπω is transitive—σήψον δὲ ἀσεβεῖς παραχρήμα, Job xl. 7 (12),—but σέσηπα the perf. middle. of all riches: 'your possessions') and your garments (the general term πλοῦτος is now split into its component parts, clothing and treasure) are become moth-eaten (ref.: see also Isa. li. 8: Acts xii. 23. The reference to Matt. vi. 19, 20 is obvious): 3.] your gold and your silver is rusted through ("Loquitar populariter, nam aurum proprie æruginem non contrahit." Horneius, in Huther. In ref. Ep. Jer., we have of golden and silver images of idols, οὐ διασώζονται ἀπὸ ἰοῦ. Rust happening generally to metals, is predicated of gold and silver without care for exact precision. So that there is no need to seek for some interpretation which may make the κατίωται true of gold, as that [Bretschu.] copper vessels plated with gold are intended. The stern and vivid depiction of prophetic denunciation does not take such trifles into account. In κατίωται, the prep. gives the sense of entireness; 'thoroughly rusted'), and the rust of them shall be for a testimony to you (not, as Ec., καταμαρτυρήσει ὑμῶν, ἐλέγχων τὸ ἀμετάδοτον ὑμῶν,—the rust which you have allowed to accumulate on them by want of use, shall testify against you in judgment,—but, as Wiesinger and Huther rightly, seeing that the rust is the effect of judgment begun, not of want of use,—the rust of them is a token what shall happen to yourselves: in the consuming of your wealth, you see depicted your own), and shall eat (φάγεται is a well-known future, contracted from φαγήσεται: cf. John ii. 17, and the prophecy ref. 4 [2] Kings, καταφάγονται οἱ κύνες τὰς σάρκας Ἰεζαβέλ) your flesh (plur. in refl. Huther remarks that in almost all the places cited, the same verb is used with the noun) as fire (i. e. as fire devours the flesh; which will account for the use of τὰς σάρκας, without giving it any emphatic meaning ["your bloated bodies," "your flesh of which alone you consist," and the like: see De Wette], seeing that fire consumes the flesh first).

al. place the period at ὑμῶν, and connect ὡς πῦρ with ἔθησαυρίσατε, explaining it, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις εὐρήσετε τὸν πλοῦτον ὑμῶν ὡς πῦρ ταμειυθέντα ὑμῖν εἰς ὕλεθρον (Ec.),—"quasi ignem in vestro malo asservastis" (Grot.). But the reasons given for this are not satisfactory. There is in reality no confusion of metaphor in φάγεται τ. σάρ. ὑμ. ὡς πῦρ, and no want of an expressed object in ἔθησαυρίσατε ἐν ἐσχ. ἡμ., the verb θησαυρίζειν containing its object in itself. Ye laid up treasure in the last days (i. e. in these, the last days before the coming of the Lord, ye, instead of repenting and saving your souls, laid up treasure to no profit; employed yourselves in the vain accumulation of this world's wealth. The aor., as so often when the course of life and action is spoken of, is used as if from the standing-point of the day of judgment, looking back over this life.

ἐν is not for εἰς, here or any where: nor is the meaning 'for' [ἐν] or 'against' the last days. Estius, Calvin, al., with this idea, follow the vulg. in supplying "iram" after "thesauravistis," as in Rom. ii. 5. Wolf and Morus understand by the last days, the last days of life: "Accumulavistis divitias extremæ vitæ parti provisuriv:" but this is clearly wrong in N. T. diction: cf. reff.). 4—6.] Specification of the sins, the incipient judgments for which hitherto have been hinted at under the figures of rust and moth. And 4.] the unjust frauds of the rich, in non-payment of just debts. Behold (belongs to the fervid graphic style), the hire of the workmen (the sentence would be complete without the words τῶν ἐργατῶν: but probably there is tacit reference to the well-known saying [see on 1 Tim. v. 18] used by our Lord, ref. Luke [Matt. x. 10], ἄξιος ὁ ἐργάτης τοῦ μισθοῦ αὐτοῦ) who mowed (ἀμᾶω, from ἄμα, properly to gather together; but commonly used as here of reaping or mowing corn for harvest. Antig. 598, and Hermann's note) your fields (reff.), which has been held back (for the sense cf. Levit. xix. 13: Jer. xxii. 13, and esp. ref. Mal. In Sir. xxxi. [xxxiv.] 22, we have ἐκχεῶν αἷμα δ' ἀποστερῶν μισθὸν μισθίου), crieth out ("Vindictam quasi alto clamore exposcit," Calv. Cf. Gen. iv. 10) from you (this, which was suggested by Huther, is better than to take refuge in the idea that ἀπό = ὑπό, and to render, "which has been held back by you:" or than Wiesinger's interpretation, which, recognizing the difference between the two prepositions, makes ἀπό designate, not the direct origin of the act, but the proceeding of the act of robbery from them: and so Winer, § 47, ἀπό, note: but none of the examples which he gives at all come near this one. The most plausible, Luke ix. 22 and xvii. 25, ἀποδοκιμασθῆναι ἀπὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων κ.τ.λ., differs in this, that a Person is spoken of, whose ἀποδοκιμασία will come from the πρεσβύτεροι: whereas here, where a thing is in question, with which the ἀποστεροῦντες deal, we can hardly say that its ἀποστέρησις proceeds from them. The other construction is amply justified by reff. The μισθός, which was kept back, and rests with you, cries out from you, your coffers, where it lies): and the cries of them who reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts (not only does the abstracted hire cry out from its place, but the defrauded victims themselves join, and the cry is heard of God. For the expressions see reff. This is the only place in the N. T. where κύριος Σαβαὼθ is used by any writer: Rom. ix. 29 is a citation. The Jewish character of the whole will sufficiently account for it. Bede gives another reason, which also doubtless was in the Apostle's mind: "Dominum exercituum appellat, ad terrorem eorum, qui pauperes putant nullum habere tutorem").

5.] Second class of sins: luxury and self-indulgence. Ye luxuriated on the earth (the last words of ver. 4 placed the thought in heaven, where the judgment is laid up) and wanted (ἐτρυφ., ἔσπαταλ., "luxuriare, lascivire: alterum deliciarum, alterum prodigentia," Theile. See on ref. 1 Tim.), ye nourished (satiated, fattened) your hearts (καρδίας as in reff., and in Acts xiv. 17, ἐμπιπλῶν τροφῆς . . τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν. Although the body is really that which is filled, the heart is that in which the satisfaction of repletion is felt) in the (the omission of the art. as so common before ἡμέρα, ὥρα, καιρός: cf. Matt. viii. 29: Winer, § 19. 1) day of slaughter (i. e. as Theile, "Similes sunt pecudibus quæ ipso adeo mactationis die se pascent saginantque lætæ et securæ." Cf. ref. Jer. ἐν is again not for εἰς. This seems the simplest and most obvious interpretation. It need not be dependent on the insertion of the ὡς; the sudden and direct application of the image to the persons addressed requires no particle of comparison. And it is no reason against it, which Huther somewhat petulantly alleges against De Wette, that beasts do not eat more greedily on the day of their slaughter than on any other day; for this is not implied. Even if we grant Huther's own view, that ἡμέρα σφαγῆς is an expression for the day of judgment, this expression derives its force from the above comparison, and will not let us forget it. Many Commentators, as Calvin, Beza, Grot., Laurentius, Bengel, al., understand ἡμ. σφαγῆς to mean a day of banqueting, when oxen and fatlings are slain. Calvin says, "Solebant in sacrificiis solemnibus liberalius vesci quam pro quotidiano more. Dicit ergo divites tota vita continuare festum." This might be allowable, were it not that the analogy of ἐν ἑσχάταις ἡμέραις above seems to demand the other. It is no objection to it [Huther], that thus all allusion to the judgment is lost; this comes in with the other interpretation, and appositely: but is not absolutely required by the sentiment of the verse, which regards the self-indulgence,

 Third class of sins: condemning the innocent. Ye condemned, ye murdered the just man (these words are probably spoken generally, the singular being collective. τὸν δίκαιον, not merely τὸν ἀθῶον; it is his justice itself which provokes the enmity and cruelty of the πλούσιοι. It has been usual to refer these words to the condemnation and execution of Christ. So Ec., ἀνατιθήτω τὸ, ἐφρονέυσατε τὸν δίκαιον, ἐπὶ τὸν χριστὸν ἀναφέρεται. τῇ μέντοι ἐπιφορᾷ, τῇ, οὐκ ἀντιτάσσεται ὑμῖν, ἐκοίνωσε τὸν λόγον καὶ πρὸς τοὺς ἄλλους τοὺς τὰ ἴμμοια παρὰ τῶν Ἰουδαίων παθόντας. ἴσως δὲ καὶ προφητικῶς τὸ περὶ ἑαυτὸν ὑπεμφαίνει πάθος. So Bede, at some length; Grot., al. But there is surely nothing in the context to indicate this, further than that such a particular case may be included in the general charge, as its most notorious example. I cannot see, with Huther, how the present ἀντιτάσσεται makes against this: for anyhow we must suppose a change of sense before the present can be introduced: and then it may as well be a description of Christ's patient endurance, or of His present long-suffering, as of the present meekness of the [generic] δίκαιος. But I prefer the latter, and with it the other reference throughout): he (the δίκαιος; Bentley more ingeniously than happily conjectured ὁ κύριος, as an emendation for οὐκ) doth not resist you (the behaviour of the just under your persecutions is ever that of meekness and submission. "οὐκ ἀντιτάσσεται sine copula et pronominde ponderose additur." Schneckenb.). This last clause serves as a note of transition to what follows. So Herder remarks, as cited by Wiesinger: "And thus we have as it were standing before us the slain and unresisting righteous man, when lo the curtain falls: Be patient, brethren, wait!" See, on the whole sense, Amos ii. 6, 7; v. 12; and the description in Wisd. ii. 6—20.

7—11.] Exhortation to suffering Christians to endure unto the coming of the Lord. On the connexion, see above. 7.] Be patient (reff.) therefore (the οὖν [ἐδόν, 'matters being so'] is a general reference to the prophetic strain of the previous passage: judgment on your oppressors being so near, and your own part, as the Lord's δίκαιοι, being that of unresistingness), brethren (contrast to οἱ πλούσιοι, last addressed), until (ἕως as a preposition, see Winer, § 54. 6. "Non tempus tantum sed rem quoque indicat, qua ἡ θλίψις μακροθύμως toleranda tollatur." Schneckenb.) the coming of the Lord (i. e. here, beyond all reasonable question, of Christ. ὁ κύριος, it is true, usually in this Epistle is to be taken in the O. T. sense, as denoting the Father: but we have in ch. i. 1 and ii. 1 examples of St. James using it of our Saviour, and it is therefore better to keep so well known a phrase to its ordinary meaning, than with Theile and De W. [but only wahe[r]deinlich] to understand it, "Dei, qui Messia adventante invisibili modo præsens est"). Encouragement by the example of the husbandman. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it (with reference to it: quasi sitting over it and watching it: this local superposition is the root of all derived meanings of ἐπὶ with a dative), till it (better than "he," as Luth. and E. V.) shall have received the early and latter [rain] (see reff., and Winer, Realw. under Bitterung. From the latter it appears that the πρώϊμος fell in Oct., Nov., and Dec., extending, with occasional snow, into Jan. [see reff. Deut., Jer.]: and after fine spring weather in Feb., the ὄψιμος in March to the end of April [reff. and Jer. iii. 3: Heb. and E. V.]. Ec. gives a curious interpretation of the early and latter rain: πρώϊμος ἕτερός, ἢ ἐν νεότητι μετὰ δακρῶν μετάνοια: ὄψιμος, ἢ ἐν τῷ γῆρα. As to the reading, it is much more probable that δύτον has been supplied than that it has been erased):

8.] be ye also patient (as well as, after the example of, the husbandman): establish (confirm, strengthen, both which are required for patience) your hearts, because the coming of the Lord is nigh (perf.: 'bath [already] drawn near, and is therefore at hand,' as the perfects εστηκα, εγρωκα, &c. Calvin says, "Colligendum robur ad durandum: colligi autem melius non potest, quam ex spe et quasi intuitu propinqui adventus Domini").

9.] Exhortation to mutual forbearance. "Quos ad manifestas et gravissimas improborum injurias fortiter ferendas incitarat, eos nunc hortatur, ut etiam in minoribus illis offensis quae inter pios ipsos saepe subnascuntur, vel condonandis vel dissimulandis prouti sint. Contingit enim ut qui hostium et improborum maximas saepe contumelias et injurias aequo animo tolerant, fratrum tamen offensas multo leniores non facile ferant." Horneius (in Huther). Murmur not, brethren, one another (there is not any imprecation of Divine vengeance to be thought of, as Calvin, Theile, al.), that ye be not judged (seeing that murmuring against one another involves the violation of our Lord's μη κρίνετε [ref. Matt.], he finishes with the following clause there, ina μη κριθητε: the passive verb here, as there, being to be taken in a condemnatory sense, or at all events as assuming the condemnatory issue): behold, the Judge standeth before the door (refl.

The Judge, viz. the Lord. These last words are added with a view to both portions of the sentence preceding, not to the latter one only as Huther: μη στεν. involving in itself μη κρίνετε: the near approach of the Judge is a motive for suspending our own judgment, as well as for deterring us from incurring that speedy judgment on ourselves which we shall incur if we do not suspend it).

10, 11.] Encouragement to patience in affliction by O. T. examples. Take, my brethren, as an example of affliction (not, 'of enduring' or "suffering affliction," E. V.: the word is strictly objective, and is found parallel with ξυμφορά and the like: in ref.: and Thucyd. vii. 77, ελπίδα χρῆ ἔχειν, μηδὲ καταμέμψασθαι ὑμᾶς ἄγαν αὐτοῦς, μήτε ταῖς ξυμφοραῖς, μήτε ταῖς παρὰ τὴν ἀξίαν νῦν κακοπαθείαις [spoken by Nicias to the suffering Athenian army in Sicily]: so Isocr. p. 127 c, μηδὲ μικρὰν οἴεσθαι δεῖν ὑπενεγκεῖν κακοπάθειαν: which examples are decisive) and of patience (beware of the silly hendiadys, which indeed can have no place at all with the right meaning of κακοπάθεια) the prophets (so Matt. v. 12) who spoke in the name (or, by the name. We may consider τῷ ὀνόμ. as equivalent to ἐν τῷ ὀν., or we may explain it as De Wette ('by means of the name') of the Lord (God).

may be a correction to suit the sense, and τέλος below, but it must be adopted as the most ancient reading, and it is connected with Matt. i. c., μακάριοι οἱ δεδιωγμένοι, they who have been persecuted): ye [have] heard of the endurance of Job; see also (not 'and have seen,' which Wiesinger renders even with the reading ἴδετε. The imperative is not as Huther aufflassend, but natural enough, see ch. i. 6, 7) the end of the Lord ('the termination which the Lord [in O. T. sense] gave: do not limit your attention to Job's sufferings, but look on to the end and see the mercy shewn him by God); for (better than "that," as Huther, al.: the sense being, 'Job's patience is known to you all: do not rest there, but look on to the end which God gave him: and it is well worth your while so to do, for you will find that He is' &c. And this has apparently occasioned the repetition by the Apostle of the word ὁ κύριος, which has been left out by those who imagined that ὅτι introduced merely the result of the inspection, and that therefore no new subject was needed) the Lord is very pitiful (πολύσπλαγχνος, a word no where else found: coined after the Heb. רַחֲמָנִי [Wiesinger], which the LXX render πολυέλεος, Exod. xxxiv. 6 al., always joined with μακρόθυμος: see in Trommius. We have εὐσπλαγχνος, Eph. iv. 32; 1 Pet. iii. 8) and merciful (reff. This remembrance of God's pity and mercy would encourage them also to hope that whatever their sufferings, the τέλος κυρίου might prove similar in their own case).

12—20.] Various exhortations and dehortations, connected with the foregoing chiefly by the situation, sufferings, and duties of the readers. 12.] This dehortation from swearing is connected with what went before by the obvious peril that they, whose temptations were to impatience under suffering, might be betrayed by that impatience into hasty swearing and imprecations. That this suffering state of theirs is still in view, is evident from the κακοπαθεῖ τις which follows: that it alone is not in view is equally evident, from the εὐθυμεῖ τις which also follows. So that we may safely say that the Apostle passes from their particular temptations under suffering to their general temptations in life. But (contrast of the spirit which would prompt that which he is about to forbid, with that recommended in the last verses) above all things (ref.: qu. d. 'So far is the practice alien from Christian meekness, that whatever you feel or say, let it not for a moment be given way to'), my brethren, swear not, neither by the heaven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath (ὄρκος for 'formula jurandi.' The construction of ὀμνύμι with an accus. of the thing sworn by is classical: that with εἰς or ἐν, as in ref. Matt., according to Hebraistic usage. Huther's note here is valuable and just: "It is to be noticed, that swearing by the name of God is not mentioned: for we must not imagine that this is included in the last member of the clause, the Apostle intending evidently by μήτε ἄλλον τιὰ ὄρκον to point only at similar formulæ, of which several are mentioned in ref. Matt. Had he intended to forbid swearing by the name of God, he would most certainly have mentioned it expressly: for not only is it in the law, in contradistinction to other oaths, commanded,—see Deut. vi. 13; x. 20: Ps. lxxiii. 11,—but in the Prophets is announced as a token of the future turning of men to God: ref. Isa.: Jer. xii. 16; xxiii. 7, 8. The omission of notice of this oath shews that James in this warning has in view only the abuse, common among the Jews generally and among his readers, of introducing in the common every-day affairs of life, instead of the common yea and nay, such asseverations as those here mentioned: so that we are not justified in deducing from his words any prohibition of swearing in general, as has been attempted by many expositors of our Epistle, and especially by Ec., Bede, Eras., Theile, De Wette, Neander, al. [on the other hand the following Commentators refer St. James's prohibition to light and trifling oaths: Calv., Est., Laurentius, Grot., Pott, Michaelis, Storr, Morus, Schneckenburger, Kern, Wiesinger, al.]. The use of oaths by heaven, &c., arises on the one hand from forgetting that every oath, in its deeper significance, is a swearing by God, and on the other from a depreciation of simple truth in words: either way

And thus joined, they shew that the anointing was not a mere human medium of cure, but had a sacramental character: cf. the same words, or ἐπὶ τῷ ὄν., εἰς τὸ ὄν., used of baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19: Acts ii. 38; x. 48; xix. 5: 1 Cor. i. 13, 15. κυρίου here is probably Christ, from analogy: His name being universally used as the vehicle of all miraculous power exercised by his followers). 15.] And the prayer of faith (gen. subj.: the prayer which faith offers) shall save (clearly here, considering that the forgiveness of sins is separately stated afterwards, σώσει can only be used of corporeal healing, not of the salvation of the soul. This has not always been recognized. The R.-Cath. interpreters, who pervert the whole passage to the defence of the practice of extreme unction, take σώσει of the salvation of the soul. Thus Corn. a-Lapide: “Oratio fidei, id est, sacramentum et forma sacramentalis extremæ unctionis, salvabit infirmum, hoc est, conferet ei gratiam qua salvetur anima.” Some Commentators, as Lyra and Schneckemb., take both meanings. The Council of Trent prevaricates: “Ægroti animam alleviat et confirmat [unctio extrema], magnam in eo divinæ misericordiæ fiduciam excitando: qua infirmus sublevatus, et morbi incommoda ac labores levius fert, et tentationibus dæmonis calcaneo insidiantis facilius resistit: et sanitatem corporis interdu, ubi salutis animæ expedierit, consequitur”) the sick man (κάμνω, ægrotō, is classical, even in its absolute use: cf. Soph. Phil. 262: Xen. Cyr. i. 6. 16), and the Lord (most probably Christ, again: He who is Lord in the Christian Church) shall raise him up (from his bed of sickness: see reff. Here again our R.-Cath. friends are in sad perplexity. The vulg. led the way with its “alleviabit.” The interpretations may be seen in Corn. a-Lap., Justiniani, Estius, al. Cf. the Council of Trent above. A curious contrast is furnished by the short comm. of Ec.: τοῦτο καὶ τοῦ κυρίου ἐστὶ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις συναναστρεφόμενον οἱ ἀπόστολοι ἐποιοῦν, ἀλείφοντες τοὺς ἀσθενοῦντας ἐλαίῳ καὶ ἰώμενοι): even if (κὰν precedes a climax: see the sense below. So that the καί is not copulative, but the sentence is abruptly introduced) he have committed (he be in a state of having committed, i. e. abiding under the consequence of, some commission of sin; for so the perf. implies; and hereby the sin in question is presumed to have been the working cause of his present sickness. So Bede: “Multi propter peccata in anima facta, infirmitate vel etiam morte plectuntur corporis:” citing 1 Cor. xi. 30. On this necessary force of the perfect, see Winer, § 40. 4: and on the sense, cf. Matt. ix. 2, 5 f.: John v. 14) sins, it shall be forgiven him (supply as a subject, τὸ πεποιηκέναι, from the foregoing). Among all the daring perversions of Scripture by which the Church of Rome has defended her superstitions, there is none more patent than that of the present passage. Not without reason has the Council of Trent defended its misinterpretation with the anathema above cited: for indeed it needed that, and every other recommendation, to support it, and give it any kind of acceptance. The Apostle is treating of a matter totally distinct from the occasion, and the object, of extreme unction. He is enforcing the efficacy of the prayer of faith in afflictions, ver. 13. Of such efficacy, he adduces one special instance. In sickness, let the sick man inform the elders of the Church. Let them, representing the congregation of the faithful, pray over the sick man, accompanying that prayer with the symbolic and sacramental act of anointing with oil in the name of the Lord. Then, the prayer of faith (see Corn. a-Lap. above for the audacious interpretation) shall save (heal) the sick man, and the Lord shall bring him up out of his sickness; and even if it were occasioned by some sin, that sin shall be forgiven him. Such is the simple and undeniable sense of the Apostle, arguing for the efficacy of prayer: and such, as above seen, the perversion of that sense by the Church of Rome. Here, as in the rest of these cases, it is our comfort to know that there is a God of truth, whose judgment shall begin at His Church. Observe, the promises here made of recovery and forgiveness are unconditional, as in Mark xvi. 18 al. 16.] A general injunction arising out of a circumstance necessarily to be inferred in the preceding example. There, the sin would of necessity have been confessed to the πρεσβύτεροι, before the prayer of faith could deal with it. And seeing the blessed consequences in that case, —‘generally,’ says the Apostle, in all similar cases, ‘and one to another universally, pursue the same salutary practice of confessing your sins.’ Confess therefore to one another (emphatically placed before τὰ παραπτώματα—‘not only to the presbyters in the case supposed, but to one another generally’) your transgressions (i. e. not merely, as Wolf, al., offences against your brethren; but also sins against God: cf. ref. Matt. vi.), and pray for one another, that ye may be healed (in case of sickness, as above. The context here forbids any wider meaning: and so rightly De Wette, Wiesinger, and Huther. So even Corn. a-Lap., “id est, ut sanemini, scilicet, ab infirmitate quæ vos detinet.” On the other hand Justiniani, “recte Latinus interpres animæ sanitatem intellexit, hoc est, salutem sempiternam.” And similarly Estius, Carpov, Grot., al. Baumgarten, Schneckenburger, Kern, al., would join both). It might appear astonishing, were it not notorious, that on this passage among others is built the Romish doctrine of the necessity of confessing sins to a priest. As a specimen of the way in which it is deduced, I subjoin Corn. a-Lapide’s exegesis: “Alterutrum, id est, homo homini, similis simili, frater fratri confitemini, puta sacerdoti, qui licet officio sit superior, natura tamen est par, infirmitate similis, obligatione confitendæ equalis.” Cajetan, on the contrary, denies that “sacramental confession” is here spoken of: “nec hic est sermo de confessione sacramentali.” The supplication of a righteous man (i. e. of one who shews his faith by his works, see ch. ii. 24) availeth much in its working (i. e. worketh very effectually. Much doubt has arisen about the meaning and reference of ἐνεργουμένη. It is usually taken as in E. V., “the effectual fervent prayer,”—as an epithet to δέσεις, setting forth its fervency. Œc. seems to take it passively, “helped forward by the sympathy of the person prayed for:”

for he says, ἐνεργεῖται ἡ τοῦ δικαίου εὐχή, ὅταν καὶ ὁ ὑπὲρ εὐχεται συμπράττει διὰ κακώσεως πνευματικῆς τῷ εὐχομένῳ. ἂν γάρ, ἐτέρων ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν εὐχομένων, σπαταλαῖς ἡμεῖς σχολάζωμεν κ. ἀνέσει κ. ἐκδεδητημένῳ βίῳ, ἐκλύομεν διὰ τούτου τὸ σύντονον τῆς εὐχῆς τοῦ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἀγωνιζομένου. The following is from Huther’s note: “Michaelis explains it ‘preces agitante Spiritu sancto effusæ:’ Carpov, δέσεις διὰ πίστεως ἐνεργουμένη: Gebser understands prayer in which the suppliant himself works for the accomplishment of his wish: similarly Calvin,—‘Tunc vere in actu est oratio, quum succurrere contendimus iis, qui laborant.’ Commonly, ἐνεργουμένη is assumed to be synonymous with ἐνεργῆς or ἐνεργός [ἐκτενής, Luke xxii. 44: Acts xii. 5], ‘strenuous,’ ‘intentus,’ ‘earnest,’ &c.: and this qualification of the prayer of the righteous man is attached to πολὺ ἰσχύει as its condition [so Wiesinger, and similarly Erasm., Beza, Gataker, Horneius, Grot., Wolf, Baumg., Hottinger, Schneckenb., Kern, Theile, al.]. This interpretation however has not only, as Wiesinger confesses, N. T. usage against it, but can hardly be justified from the context, it being necessarily implied that the prayer of the righteous man is not a dead and formal one. Besides which, the force of the general sentence, πολὺ ἰσχύει δέσεις δικαίου, suffers much from the appending of a condition under which alone the sentence could be true. Rightly therefore does Pott adhere to the verbal meaning of the participle ἐνεργουμένη, in periphrasing, πολὺ ἰσχύει ἐνεργεῖν, or πολὺ ἰσχύει καὶ ἐνεργεῖ δέσεις: but both these periphrases are arbitrary: the first weakens the force of ἰσχύει, and the second makes the two ideas co-ordinate, which the Apostle never intended. At all events we must connect ἐνεργουμένη closely with ἰσχύει: not as above, but so that by it may be expressed that which is the field or element of the πολὺ ἰσχύει: the prayer of the righteous can do much in its working [not, as De Wette, if it develops itself in act]. That it does work, this is assumed: that, besides working, it πολὺ ἰσχύει, this is it which St. James puts forward, and confirms by the following example of Elias"). 17, 18.] Example of this effectual prayer, in the case of Elias. 17.] Elias was a man of like passions with us (this precedes, to obviate the objection that the greatness of Elias, so far out of our reach, neutralizes the example for us weak and ordinary men. There is no contrast to δίκαιος intended, as Gebser, but rather Elias is an example of a δίκαιος: nor again can ὁμοιοπαθής be taken to signify "involved in like sufferings," as Laurentius and Schneckenb.: see reff.), and he prayed with prayer (made it a special matter of prayer: not, "prayed earnestly," as E. V., Schneckenb., Wiesinger, al. This adoption of the Heb. idiom merely brings out more forcibly the idea of the verb) that it might not rain (the gen. of the intent: the purport and purpose of the prayer being mingled, as so commonly: cf. on the similar προσεύχεσθαι ἵνα, note, 1 Cor. xiv. 13. This fact is not even hinted at in the O. T. history in 1 Kings xvii. ff.; nor the following one, that he prayed for rain at the end of the drought: though this latter may perhaps be implied in 1 Kings xviii. 42 ff.), and it rained not (the use of βρέχειν for to rain is found first in prose, according to Lobeck, Phryn. p. 291, in Polyb. xvi. 12. 3: then in Arrian, Epict. i. 6. 30, and in LXX, N. T. and subsequent writers. Classically, it is poetical only. The impersonal use appears to be confined to later writers) on the earth for three years and six months (so also Luke iv. 25: and in the Jalkut Simeoni, on 1 Kings xvi., where we have, "Anno xiii. Achabi famēs regnabat in Samaria per tres annos et dimidium anni." There is no real discrepancy here, as has been often assumed, with the account in 1 Kings: for as Benson has rightly observed, the words "in the third year" of 1 Kings xviii. 1 by no necessity refer to the duration of the famine, but most naturally date back to the removal of Elijah to Zarephath, ib. xvii. 8 ff.: cf. the same "many days" in ib. ver. 15, where indeed a variation is "for a full year." I cannot see how Huther can hold this to be an insufficient explanation, because we are bound to regard the drought as beginning immediately after Elijah's announcement 1 Kings xvii. 1: nor how it appears that that announcement must necessarily have been made at the end of the summer season during which it had not rained):

18.] and again he prayed (see above), and the heavens gave rain (reff.) and the earth brought forth (βλαστῶ or -άνω is properly an intr. verb, but used transitively in the 1 aor., as some other verbs. So in Hippocrates [Palm and Rost's Lex.], Apoll. Rhod. i. 1131 [οὐς ποτε νύμφη Ἀρχιᾶλη, Δικταῖον ἀνὰ σπέος, ἀμφοτέρησιν Δραξαμένη γαίης Οἰαζίδος ἐβλάσθησε], and later writers) her fruit ("quas ferre solet," Schneckenb.).

19, 20.] The importance and blessing of reclaiming an erring brother. This is very nearly connected with the foregoing; the duty of mutual advice and correction, with that of mutual confession and prayer.

19.] Brethren, if any among you be seduced (lit. passive; and there is no reason why the passive signification should not be kept, especially when we remember our Lord's warning, βλέπετε μή τις ὑμᾶς πλανήσῃ) from the truth (not merely truth practical, of moral conduct, but that ἀλήθεια which is the subject of the λόγος whereby our regeneration took place, ch. i. 18—the doctrine of Christ, spiritual and practical), and one convert him (turn him back to the truth, reff.), 20.] know (or, with the rec. γινωσκέτω, let him know, viz. the last τις, ὁ ἐπιστρέψας—for his comfort, and for the encouragement of others to do the like by this proclamation of the fact), that he who converteth (not, 'has converted': our English present, when connected with a future, exactly gives the aor. participle.

The first action is necessarily antecedent to the second, which is all that the Greek requires) a sinner from the error of his way (thus is the person converted more generally expressed than before; not only, τὸν πλανηθέντα, but any ἁμαρτωλόν) shall save a soul from death (in eternity: the future shews that the σωτηρία spoken of is not contemporary with the ἐπιστρέψαι, but its ultimate result), and shall cover a multitude of sins (viz. by introducing the convert into that state of Christian faith, wherein all sins, past, present, and future, are forgiven and done away. See reff. and for the expression, Ps. xxxi. 1: Neh. iv. 5 LXX. The ἁμαρτιῶν, following ἁμαρτωλόν, necessarily binds the reference to the converted, not the converters. It is not τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν αὐτοῦ [as Syr., “hideth the multitude of his sins”], because the Apostle wishes to put in its most striking abstract light the good deed thus done. The objection [Whitby] that thus we should have a tautology,—the saving of his soul including the covering of his sins, is entirely obviated by this latter consideration: even without Wiesinger’s reply, that “the words carry on further the σώσει ψυχὴν, and state the ground of that salvation.” The idea that they are the sins of the converter [Zacharias Ep. i. ad Bed., Erasmus, Whitby, Hammond, al.] is thus as abhorrent from the context, as it is generally repugnant to apostolic teaching: cf. on the whole, 1 Pet. iv. 8. “Commendat,” says Calvin, “fratrum correctionem ab effectu, ut majore studio in eam intenti simus”).

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREETING: corresponding generally with those of St. Paul's Epistles, designating however himself more briefly, and his readers more at length. 1.] Peter (the Greek form of the name Cephias, a stone, given him by our Lord, see John i. 43: in 2 Pet. i. 1 it is "Symeon Peter") an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the elect strangers (see on παρεπιδήμοις, Heb. xi. 13 note. ἐκλεκτοῖς, chosen of God to His adopted family in Christ. The construction is irregularly carried on from ἐκλ. by κατὰ πρόγνωσιν κ.τ.λ. below, where see) of the dispersion (i. e. belonging to the Jewish dispersion, as in reff. This leading character of the readers of 1 Peter has been acknowledged generally: see testimonies in Prolegg. At the same time, as there argued [§ iii. 3 ff.], there is no reason to exclude Gentile Christians from among them, as forming part of the Israel of God. Indeed, such readers are presupposed in the Epistle itself: cf. ver. 14; ch. ii. 10; iv. 3) of Pontus (see Acts ii. 9, note), Galatia (see Prolegg. to Gal. § ii.), Cappadocia (Acts, ut supra), Asia (not quite as in Acts ii. 9; xvi. 6, where Phrygia is distinguished from it: here it must be included) and Bithynia (Acts xvi.

The local meaning of κατὰ with an accus., 'along [down] the direction of,' gives at once the derived meaning here. κατὰ πρόγ. κ.τ.λ. follows ἐκλεκτοῖς, the emphatic position of the predicative epithet having as it were left its sound yet ringing in the ear, so that this epexegetical of it, though unusual, does not occasion any difficulty. put forward, seeing that all God's decrees rest on the ground of His omniscience." Huther. "Eligendos facit Deus, non invenit," is an important remark of Augustine. Cf. Hofmann's Schriftbeweis, i. 228 ff.) of God the Father (thus indicated, as leading on to the great mystery of the Holy Trinity in the work of our salvation) in (not "through," as E. V.: the κατὰ betokens the origin, and enduring pattern after which,—ἐν, the conditional and abiding element in which, and εἰς, the result for which. So that ἐν is not = εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἐν as De Wette) sanctification (ref.) of the Spirit (gen. subjective, or rather efficient, the Spirit being the worker of the sanctification: πνεύματος, not, as Beza, "vel spiritus sanctus, vel anima, quæ sanctificatur") unto (result as regards us—the fruit which we are to bring forth, and the state into which we are to be brought) obedience (absolutely, Christian obedience, the obedience of faith, as in ver. 14: see ref.: not to be taken with Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, which belongs closely to αἵματος) and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ (i. e. admission into and standing in that covenant, whose atoning medium is Christ's blood,—and mode of application, the sprinkling of that blood on the heart by faith. The allusion is to Exod. xxiv. 8, where the covenant was inaugurated by sprinkling the blood on the people. This, as Huther remarks, was the only occasion on which the blood was thus sprinkled on persons: for on the great day of atonement, only the sacred vessels were thus sprinkled. So also in Heb. ix. 13. But we need not confine the virtue of the sprinkling to admission into the covenant. Doubtless its purifying power, especially as connected with ὑπακοή, is also in the mind of the Apostle. And thus Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. 1. 305: maintaining that the Death of Christ is not only, as looking back on the past, a propitiation for sin, thereby removing the obstacle which stood in the way of God's gracious purpose towards man,—but also, looking forward to the future, a capacitating of us for the participation in God's salvation: just as Israel, sin having been atoned for by the sacrifice itself, was admitted into the actual state of reconciliation by the sprinkling on them of the sacrificial blood. The gen. αἵματος is that of the object, or material with which: cf. Heb. ix. 21, αἵματι ἐράντισεν. "By this description of the readers, an anticipation is given of the whole train of thought in the Epistle: the aim of which is to impress the blessed certainty of salvation, and with that, the obligations incurred by receiving God's gift." Harless): grace and peace be multiplied unto you (so, but more fully, in ref. 2 Pet. and Jude. "Pax a gratia distinguitur, tanquam fructus et effectus a sua causa." Gerhard. "Pax vestra multiplicetur" is quoted as a Rabbinical salutation by Wetstein and Schöttgen).

3—12.] The Apostle begins, much after the manner of St. Paul in the opening of his Epistles, with giving thanks to God for the greatness of the blessings of salvation; thus paving the way for the exhortations which are to follow. And herein, he directs his readers' look, first, forward into the future (vv. 3—9); then backward into the past (vv. 10—12).

3—5.] Thanksgiving for the living hope into which the Christian has been begotten. 3.] Blessed be (εὐλογητός) is used in the N. T. of God only: and so almost always in the O. T.: while εὐλογημένος is applied to men. The shade of distinction is perhaps this: that εὐλογητός carries with it rather the imperative, 'Blessed be' &c.,—εὐλογημένος the indicative, 'Blessed is' &c. This is better than Van Hengel's distinction [on Rom. p. 140], that the verbal adjective gives "quod sibi constat,"—the participle, "quod aliunde pendet:" for thus we should not get the idea of praise in εὐλογητός) the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (so verbatim ref. Eph., where see note), who according to (see on ver. 2, κατὰ πρόγνωσιν κ.τ.λ.) his much mercy (cf. πλούσιος ὢν ἐν ἐλέει, ref. Eph.)

begat us again (as in ref. and elsewhere in the N. T., where the idea, though not the word, occurs,—of the new birth from the state of nature to the state of grace, the work of God the Spirit [ver. 2], by means of the word [ver. 23], in virtue of Christ's propitiatory sacrifice and of union with Him [vv. 2, 18; ch. ii. 24; iii. 18]) unto (εἰς, either telic, unto as aim and end, = 'that we might have,' or local, unto = into; = 'so that we have.' The latter is here preferable, seeing that hope is not the aim but the condition of the Christian life) a living hope (ζῶσαν, as connected with ἀναγεννήσας; it is a life of hope, a life in which hope is the energizing principle. This is better than to understand it as contrasting our hope with that of the hypocrite, which shall perish: as Leighton, in some of his most beautiful language. ἐλπίς is not to be understood of the object of hope, but of hope properly so called, subjectively. This hope of the Christian "has life in itself, gives life, and looks for life as its object," De Wette) through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead (to what does δι' refer? Ec. says, καὶ πόθεν τὸ ζῶν ἔχουσα; ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀναστάντος Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ. And similarly, referring διὰ τὸ ζῶσαν, Luth., Bengel, De W., al. But, while we retain distinctly the connexion of our living hope with the life of Him on whom it depends, it is much more natural to join this instrumental clause with the verb ἀναγεννήσας, as bringing in with it the whole clause, ἡμᾶς εἰς ἐλπίδα ζῶσαν, by which it is defined. The resurrection of Christ, bringing in life and the gift of the life-giving Spirit, is that which potentiates the new birth unto a living hope).

4.] unto (this εἰς, as the former one, depends on ἀναγεννήσας, and is co-ordinate to the other. It introduces the objective end to which our hope is directed. "Quamdiu peregrinamur, habemus spem vivam: finita peregrinatione, ζῶσα ἐλπίς fit κληρονομία τῆς ἐπαγγελίας." Steiner, in Wies.) an inheritance ("By κληρονομία [cf. ch. iii. 7, 9] is imported the whole fulness of blessings not seen, of which the Christian as a child of God [ἀναγενν. ver. 3] has expectation, cf. Gal. iv. 7. This inheritance is more closely defined, as σωτηρία [vn. 5, 9], as χάρις, χάρις ζωῆς [ver. 13; ch. iii. 7], as δόξα [ch. v. 1], as ἀμαράντιος τῆς δόξης στέφανος [ch. v. 4], or ἡ αἰώνιος τοῦ θεοῦ δόξα [ch. v. 10]. The simplest expression for that, which the Apostle calls κληρονομία, is on the one side the χάρις ζωῆς with its δόξα, on the other the σωτηρία ψυχῶν. This κληρονομία is the full possession of that, which was promised to Abraham and all believers [Gen. xii. 3, see Gal. iii. 6 ff.], an inheritance, as much higher than that which fell to the children of Israel in the possession of Canaan, as the sonship of the regenerate, who have already received the ἐπαγγελία τοῦ πνεύματος διὰ τῆς πίστεως as a pledge of their κληρονομία, is higher than the sonship of Israel: cf. Gal. iii. 18, 29: 1 Cor. vi. 9: Eph. v. 5: Heb. ix. 15: and De Wette, h. l." Wiesinger) incorruptible (not liable to φθορά, decay. "We are here inter peritura perituri: the things are passing which we enjoy, and we are passing who enjoy them. . . . When death comes, that removes a man out of all his possessions to give place to another: therefore are these inheritances decaying and dying in relation to us, because we decay and die: and when a man dies, his inheritances, and honours, and all things here, are at an end in respect of him: yea we may say the world ends to him." Leighton), undefiled (Leighton quotes from Jerome, "Dives aut iniquus est, aut iniqui hæres." "All possessions here are defiled and stained with many defects and failings: still somewhat wanting, some damp on them, or crack in them: fair houses, but sad cares flying about the gilded and ceiled roofs: stately and soft beds and a full table, but a sickly body and queasy stomach. . . . All possessions are stained with sin, either in acquiring or using them, and therefore they are called mammon of unrighteousness, Luke xvi. 9") and unfading (in its beauty; which in all earthly things is passing and soon withered: see ver. 24. The Greek interpreters make these words an argument against the millenarians: so Ec., εἰ ἐν οὐρανοῖς ἡ κληρονομία, μυθῶδης ἢ χιλιετίας ἀποκατάστασις. Calvin, Steiger, al. take this εἰς as co-ordinate with εἰς κληρ. above, and this clause as a second [third] pendant on ἀναγεννήσας: "Rem unam duobus modis exprimit," Calv. But it seems better, as in Gal. i. c., to attach εἰς to φρουρουμένουσ salvation (σωτηρία, though in itself a merely negative idea, involves in itself, and came to mean in the N. T., the positive setting in bliss of the people of God: cf. ver. 9: James i. 21 al. fr.) ready (stronger than μέλλουσαν, Gal. iii. 23: Rom. viii. 18: ch. v. 1) to be revealed (see the two last cited places. The stress of the ἐτοιμῆν ἀποκαλυφθῆναι is, as Wiesinger well remarks, not the nearness of the ἀποκάλυψις, but the fact of the salvation being ready to be revealed: not yet to be brought in and accomplished, but already complete, and only waiting God's time to be manifested. On the inf. aor. after ἐτοιμῆν, here giving the rapid completion of the act of ἀποκάλυψις as contrasted with the enduring φρουρεῖσθαι, see Winer, § 44. 7, b, c) in the last time (not, as Bengel, "in comparatione ad tempora V. In the latter case the present ἀγαλλιᾶσθε in both places must be a categorical present, used of a future time: as Thl., Ec. τὸ ἀγαλλιᾶσθε ἀντὶ μέλλοντος εἴληπται. And this sense seems to be sanctioned by ver. 8, in which he could hardly predicate of his readers, that they at the present time rejoiced χαρᾷ ἀνεκλαλήτῳ καὶ δεδοξασμένῳ. To avoid this, those who suppose the whole to allude to the time present, and the realization of future bliss by faith, imagine the present ἀγαλλιᾶσθε (not to be an imperative, as Aug., al., but) to have a slight hortatory force, reminding them of their duty in the matter. This however again will hardly suit the very strong qualifying terms above quoted from ver. 8. On the whole, after consideration, I prefer the former interpretation, and the quasi-future sense of ἀγαλλιᾶσθε in both places, with Syr., Ec. [alt.], Thl., Erasm., Luther, Huther, Wiesinger, against Calv., Estius, Grot., Calov., Steiger, De Wette, al. And this interpretation will be found confirmed, as we proceed, by many lesser accuracies and proprieties of rendering. In which (i. e. ἐν ἐσχάτῳ καιρῷ: the ἐν φ is temporal, ἐν bearing the same sense in the resumption as it did at the end of ver. 5, from which it is resumed. Such is our Apostle's manner, to resume, in proceeding further, the thing or person just mentioned, in the same sense as before : cf. vv. 5, 8, 10. Or, ἐν ᾧ may mean, 'at which,' 'wherein,' as ch. iv. 4 : the καιρὸς ἔσχατος being not the time, but the object of your joy. Those who regard ἀγαλλιάσθε as strictly present, understand ἐν ᾧ as in ch. iv. 4, but refer it to the whole preceding : so Calv., "Articulus, 'in quo,' refert totum illud complexum de spe salutis in celo repositæ" ye rejoice (ἀγαλλ. is a stronger word than χαίρειν, implying the external expression and exuberant triumph of joy. It is sometimes joined with χαίρειν, as in ref. Matt. and Rev.), for a little time (as in ch. v. 10 and other ref.) at present (ἄρτι would, on the hypothesis of ἀγαλλιάσθε being a proper present, be superfluous) if it must be so (= 'si res ita ferat,'—if it be God's will that it should be so : 'si' is hypothetical, not affirmative as Bengel. Cf. Ec. [alt.], τούτέστιν, εἰ καὶ τοῦτο δεῖ· οὐ γὰρ πάντες οἱ ἄγιοι θλίβονται) having been afflicted (in this part., more than any thing, favours the quasi-future acceptation of ἀγαλλιάσθε : looking back from the time of which exultation, the grief is regarded as passed away and gone. It carries with it a slightly adversative sense—'though ye were troubled,' 'troubled as ye were,' or the like) in (not = διὰ, but the element and material of the λύπη) manifold temptations (πειρασμοῖς, as in ref. James, trials, arising from whatever cause ; here, mainly from persecution, see ch. iv. 12 ff., on the πύρωσις πρὸς πειρασμὸν ὑμῶν γινομένη. ποικίλοις : cf. James i. 2 : "non unam tentationem ponit, sed plures ; neque unum tantum genus, sed diversa." Calv.), 7.] that (end and aim of these temptations) the proof (see on ref. James) of your faith (= the fact of your faith being proved, and so, by an easy transition, the result of that proof, the purified and proved faith itself), more precious than gold which perisheth (πολυτιμότερον is in apposition with δοκίμιον above, forming part of the subject of εὐρεθῆ, not a predicate after it. No supply before 'gold,' such as "of," E. V., or 'that of,' is legitimate. It is not 'the proof' which is precious, though the literal construction at first sight seems to be this, but the faith itself : see above), yet is (usually, habitually) proved by fire (the δέ in this clause brings out this, that gold though perishable yet needs fire to try it—the inference lying in the background, how much more does your faith, which is being proved for eternity, not for mere temporary use, need a fiery trial?), may be found (finally and once for all, aor., as the result of the judicial trial at that day = 'evadat.' εὐρ. εἰς, see ref. Rom.) unto (having as its result : εἰς belongs to εὐρεθῆ, not [De W.] to the whole sentence) praise and glory and honour (whose ? "Hic agitur de ipsorum electorum laude," Beza, rightly : and so most of the Commentators. Some have pressed the meanings of the separate words : ἔπαινος being the praise from the Judge, His εἶγε δούλε ἀγαθέ : δόξα, admission into His glory, ch. v. 1, 10 : τιμή, the dignity and personal honour thence accruing, ch. iii. 7. But perhaps, as in Rom. ii. 7, we should rather regard them here as cumulative) in (i. e. 'at the day of : ' the element, in time, in which it shall be manifested) the revelation of Jesus Christ (i. e. His return, who is now withdrawn from our sight, but shall then appear again : and with His ἀποκάλυψις

8.] whom (it is in the manner of our Apostle to take up anew and with a fresh line of thought, a person or thing just mentioned: see above on ver. 6) having not seen (so the E. V. with more than usual accuracy: the οὐκ, as distinguished from μή, adhering closely to the verb. If οὐκ εἰδότες be read, the meaning will be the same: the lack of knowledge there predicated being that which arises from absence of personal eye to eye acquaintance) ye love (now, at this present time): in whom though now ye see Him not, yet believing (so E. V. again accurately. With this word the ἔρτι condition of believers ends, and with the next, ἀγαλλιᾶσθε, the then state again begins) ye (then) rejoice (pres. categoric, as before. Some would join εἰς ὃν with ἀγαλλιᾶσθε, taking ὁρῶντες and πιστεύοντες absolutely. So Huther [alt.], and probably E. V. which may be taken either way. The objection to this is, that ἀγαλλιᾶω is not found with εἰς, as neither are verbs of cognate meaning. Others again, as De Wette, would take εἰς ὃν with πιστεύοντες δὲ ἀγαλλιᾶσθε, leaving an object [αὐτόν] to be supplied after ὁρῶντες. This would confine ἀγαλλιᾶσθε to a strictly present meaning, as [see above] De W. maintains it has) with joy unspeakable (ineffable, which cannot be spoken out = ἀλάλητος, Rom. viii. 26) and glorified (this word δεδοξασμένη is the strongest testimony for the quasi-future sense which we have adopted and maintained for ἀγαλλιᾶσθε, both times. It fixes the reference of the verb to that time when hope shall have passed into enjoyment, and joy shall be crowned with glory. The meaning on the other interpretation is obliged to be weakened down to "joy bearing in itself glory, i. e. the high consciousness of glory:" so De Wette [herrlichkeit, das hochgefühl derselben in sich tragender freude], and Steinmeyer, "quia dόξαν futuram præsensem habet et sentit"),

9.] receiving (the word κομιζόμενοι quite forbids the sense of 'present realizing:' in every one of the reff. it betokens the ultimate reception of glory or condemnation from the Lord. Here it is, 'receiving [pres.], as you then, in a blessed eternity, will be receiving') the end of your faith (that, to which your faith ultimately looked forward: see, besides reff., Rom. vi. 21, 22. Cf. Æschyl. Choeph. 874, μάχης γὰρ δὴ κεκύρωται τέλος, salvation of (your) souls (the great inclusive description of future blessedness: the ψυχῆ being the central personality of the man. See reff.).

10—12.] The weightiness of this salvation, as having been the object of earnest enquiry of Prophets, by whom it was announced, and even of angels.

10.] Concerning which salvation (its time especially, as explained below, but its manner and issue also) sought earnestly and examined earnestly (the prep. ἐξ both times strengthens the verb) prophets (προφήται—ἄγγελοι, both times generic, to exalt the greatness of the σωτηρία. The οἱ περὶ . . . limits the assertion and defines the Prophets intended. Some take προφήται as = οἱ προφ., as in ch. v. 1 [rec.], πρεσβυτέρους τοὺς ἐν ὑμῖν: but placed as the word is here parallel with ἄγγελοι, the other way seems better. So Bengel, "Articulus hic prætermisissus grandem facit orationem, nam auditorem a determinata individuorum consideratione ad ipsum genus spectandum traducit: sic. ver. 12; angelii"), they who prophesied concerning the grace that was (destined) for you (we cannot fill up τῆς εἰς in English without defining the tense of the verb substantive, which here may be twofold: as above, or 'that hath come unto you.' The specification of ὕμων makes this latter more probable: the whole cast of the sentence, the former. For we are considering what the Prophets felt, and looking forward with them: and the ὕμων is not inconsistent with this. In matter of fact, in God's purposes it was you, for whom the salvation was destined, though you as indi-

And Justiniani: “*Non modo quod . . . sed etiam quale . . . pacisne an belli tempore, servitutis an libertatis, quo denique reipublicæ statu. . . . Et quidem David, ‘Orietur,’ ait, ‘in diebus ejus justitia, et abundantia pacis:’ et in eandem sententiam Esaias, ‘Conflabunt gladios suos in vomeres,’ &c. &c.”) season was declaring (signifying, revealing) the Spirit of Christ which was in them (the Spirit of Christ, i. e. Christ’s Spirit, gen. subj.: the Spirit which Christ has and gives, being He who reveals all things relating to Christ and the purposes of the Father: see Matt. xi. 27: John xvi. 14, 15, which passages, though in their normal sense they apply to N. T. revelations, yet in their declarative and abstract truth regard the Spirit’s office in all ages. Cf. also Acts xvi. 7. “Prophetæ ab ipso habentes donum in illum prophetarunt,” Ep. Barnab. c. 5, p. 735), testifying beforehand the sufferings regarding (spoken of with reference to; or, as before, ‘destined for’) Christ (it is disputed, whether χριστόν be meant of Christ individually, or of Christ mystically, including his Church. The former view is taken by Ec., Tbl., Eras., Grot., Aret., Piscator, Vorst, Bengel, Steiger, De Wette, al.: the latter by Luther, Calvin, Huther, Wiesinger. Our answer may be thus given. The expression is not indeed strictly parallel with that in Col. i. 24, ἀναπληρῶ τὰ ὑστερήματα τῶν θλίψεων τοῦ χριστοῦ: see note there: but still the two are so far analogous that they may throw light one on the other. In both, as in ch. ii. 21; iii. 18; iv. 1, 13; v. 1, and in many other places where Christ’s sufferings are spoken of, χριστός is used without Ἰησοῦς, not thereby precluding the personal designation of our Lord, but still carrying into prominence the official and mediatorial: and on this latter ac-* count, if the context seem to require it, including also the wider mystical sense in which Christ’s sufferings are those of the whole aggregate of His spiritual body. The question for us then is, Does the context here require this latter extended meaning? And to this we must answer decidedly in the negative. The δ νῦν ἀνηγγέλη ὑμῖν διὰ τῶν εὐαγγελισαμένων ὑμᾶς, are the contents of the gospel history, the sufferings and triumphs of Christ. And it was of these as appointed for [εἰς] Him as means of bringing in the grace which was appointed for [εἰς] you, that the prophets testified beforehand), and the glories after these [sufferings] (on these δόξαι, see ch. iii. 18, 22; v. 1. “Gloriam resurrectionis: gloriam adscensionis: gloriam judicii novissimi et regni cœlestis.” Bengel. If it be asked, what prophets are meant, we may reply, the prophets generally. Of one of them, who did prophesy of the sufferings of Christ, and the glories after them, viz. Daniel, we have it related, that he “understood by books the number of the years” destined for the desolations of Jerusalem: and our Lord declared that many Prophets and kings desired to see the things which his disciples saw, and saw them not): 12.] to whom (taking up again προφήται οἱ . . .) it was revealed (how are these words to be taken? Does ἀπεκαλύφθη, 1. correspond to ἐρανῶντες κ.τ.λ., so as to signify that the revelation was the result of their search, or the answer to it? The difficulty in such a rendering would be, that in one instance only would this be true, viz. that of Daniel, and even in that, not strictly correspondent: whereas it is here predicated of the Prophets generally. Most certainly it cannot be in any sense said of them, that the exact time of the fulfilment of their prophecies was revealed to them. Or does it, 2. signify that just so much was revealed to them, as that their prophecies were not to be fulfilled in their own time, but in ours? This again would be objectionable, seeing, α. that there would be nothing corresponding to it in prophetic history, with the sole exception of Daniel, as before: β. that it would rather indicate a stop and discouragement of their search, than its legitimate result. Add to this, that the cases in which St. Peter himself, in the Acts, cites the prophecies, shew how he intended this ἀπεκαλύφθη to be taken: e. g. he quotes Joel, Acts ii. 17, speaking of the things prophesied by him as to take place ἐν ταῖς εὐχάταις ἡμέραις: he says of David, ib. ver. 31, προῖδὼν ἐλάλησεν περὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως: and ib. iii. 24, he says, καὶ πάντες δὲ οἱ προφῆται ἀπὸ Σαμουὴλ καὶ τῶν καθεξῆς ὅσοι ἐλάλησαν καὶ κατήγγειλαν τὰς ἡμέρας ταύτας. From these examples it would appear, that the ἀπεκαλύφθη here is not said of any result or consequence of their ἐραυνηῆσαι, but of the general revelation made to them: that it is co-ordinate with, not subordinate to ἐραυρῶντες. So in substance Wiesinger: the great stream of interpreters being the other way, or not touching the difficulty at all), that (not, 'because,' as on interpretation [1] above it must be, and as Luther, al. take it: this clause does not contain the reason for the ἀπεκαλύφθη, but the content and purport of the ἀποκάλυψις) not to themselves (dat. commodi) but to you they were ministering (i. e. by announcing, foretelling: see reff.: Orig. on Ps. xlviii., vol. ii. p. 718, διακονεῖν τὸν λόγον: Jos. Antt. vi. 13. 6, of David's message to Nabal, ταῦτα τῶν πεμφθέντων διακονησάντων πρὸς τὸν Νάβαλον κ.τ.λ.) the things (in their previous announcement and foreshadowing) which now have been declared (aor., 'were declared': νῦν embracing the N. T. period: but we in English cannot join 'were' with 'now') unto you by means of those who preached the gospel to you by (dat. instrumental) the Holy Spirit sent (historic tense again, referring distinctly to the day of Pentecost) from heaven (herein consists the great difference between Prophet and Evangelist: the former was the organ of τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ πνεῦμα χριστοῦ, the latter preached by the πνεῦμα ἅγιον ἀποσταλέν ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ. Still, both are one in design, and in the contents of their testimony: cf. the τῆς εἰς ὑμᾶς χάριτος, and τὰ εἰς χριστὸν παθήματα. And both are here mentioned, to set before the readers their exceeding happiness in being the favoured objects of the ministration of salvation by Prophets and Apostles alike. "Ideo præcesserunt eorum vaticinia, quo certior esset fides nobis, qui nunc eadem vobis nuntiamus facta quæ prædixerant illi futura." Erasm. [paraph.], which things (viz. the things announced to you: the αὐτὰ . . . ᾧ: not, as many, the future glories promised to us: see below) angels (generic, as προφῆται above: see there) desire to look into (παρακύναι, see reff., to stoop down and peer into. It embraces further still the excellence of the salvation revealed to us, that angels, for whom it is not designed as for us [Heb. ii. 16], long to pry into its mysteries. To the principalities and powers in heavenly places is made known, by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. Hofmann remarks, Schriftb. i. 313, "Angels have only the contrast between good and evil, without the power of conversion from sin to righteousness. Being then witnesses of such conversion to God, they long to penetrate the knowledge of the means by which it is brought about. . . . They themselves are placed outside the scheme of salvation: therefore it is said that they desire to look into the facts of the apostolic preaching").

This connexion is better than that imagined by some Commentators, with vv. 5—9 generally; nor is the reason underlying διό, "because the Christian must through trial and proof reach glory" [De Wette], which rather lies in vv. 5—7, and is not again mentioned in the course of these exhortations) gird up (dynamic middle: the aor. conveying the sense of completeness and once-for-all-nature of the action) the loins of your mind (the figure is one throughout,—not your loins, viz. those of your mind, τὰς ὀσφύας ὑμῶν τῆς διανοίας. On διάνοια, see note on ref., 2 Pet. The exhortation seems to be taken from our Lord's command, Luke xii. 35, where, as here, the girding up is a preparation for the coming of the Lord. On the figure see Eph. vi. 14 ff., and Ec. above), being sober ("Mentis sobrietas et vigilantia requiritur, sicque metaphorā in lumborum cinctura prius reposita ἐξηγητικῶς explicatur." Gerhard in Wiesinger. Calvin explains it well, "Non temperantiam solum in cibo et potu commendat, sed spiritualem potius sobrietatem, quum sensus omnes nostros contineamus, ne se hujus mundi illecebris inebrient." Observe νήφοντες, pres. part., indicating the continuing state in which the ἀναζώσασθαι and the ἐλπῖσαι take place), hope perfectly (i. e. "without doubt or dejection, with full devotion of soul," De W.: even better Wahl, Lex., "ita, ut nihil desideretur." Erasm., Grot., Bengel take τελείως as merely temporal, "in finem usque;" and so E. V., "hope to the end:" but this clearly does not reach the full meaning. Syr., Ec., Jer., Benson, Semler, al. join τελείως with νήφοντες, which is of course possible, and better satisfies the rhythm of the sentence, in which on the other view νήφοντες stands rather feebly alone. But all things considered, I feel persuaded the majority of Commentators are right in making it an emphatic adjunct to the great word of exhortation, ἐλπῖσατε) for (in the direction of: so ref. 1 Tim.) the grace (i. e. the great gift of grace, the crowning example of grace. Syr., Ec., al. read χαράν which is being brought (E. V., "is to be brought;") not amiss, but not giving, what φερομένην expresses, the near impending of the event spoken of: q. d. 'which is even now bearing down on you') to you in the revelation of Jesus Christ (the meaning of St. Peter's own ἐν ἀποκαλύψει Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, as applied to the revelation of the Lord at His second advent, ver. 7, seems to fix the meaning of the above words as here given, and to preclude the rendering of Erasm. ["dum vobis patefit, seu manifestatur, Jesus Christus:" but doubtfully], Luther, Calov., Bengel, Steiger, al., who take the whole as referring to the present revelation of grace made by the gospel, in which Jesus Christ is revealed. The right meaning is given by Ec., Calv. [but taking ἐν for εἰς "usque ad"], Beza, Grot., Est., Semler, Pott, De W., Huther, Wiesinger). 14—21.] Second Exhortation—to OBEDIENCE, and HOLLINESS, and REVERENCE. This exhortation is intimately connected with the former; but not therefore, as Wiesinger, to be regarded as one and the same. Each of these is evolved regularly out of the last [cf. again ver. 22], but each is an advance onward through the cycle of Christian graces and dispositions. 14.] As braism for τέκνα ὑπῆκοα. The depths of the sacred tongue were given us to descend into, not to bridge over) not conforming yourselves (thus only, by expressing a middle sense, can we bring out the present participle as combined with the subjective prohibitory particle: and so E. V., well: “not fashioning yourselves according to.” Cf. ref., where the expression, and tense, are similar. The word συνσχηματίζεσθαι belongs to later Greek. The participial construction is variously explained: Wiesinger refers it back to ἀναζωσάμενοι and νήφοντες above; Bengel supplies γενήθητε; De Wette connects it with γενήθητε following, ἀλλὰ being inserted in negligence of the strict construction; Huther regards it as belonging not to γενήθητε, but to κατὰ τὸν καλέσ. ὑμ. ἅγιον below [?]. De Wette's view is in the closest analogy with the construction in ver. 22, ἡγνικότες . . . ἀγαπήσατε: and perhaps therefore to be preferred: but Wiesinger's is very obvious and natural) to your lusts [which were] formerly in your ignorance (ἀγνοια, as in ref., ignorance of things divine, even to the extent of heathenish alienation from God, which latter is most probably here pointed at. Cf. Rom. i. 18 ff. This ignorance marks not only the period, but also the ground and element of these lusts prevailing in fashioning the life. As to the construction in ταῖς | πρότερον ἐν τῇ ἀγνοίᾳ ὑμῶν | ἐπιθυμίαις, — πρότερον-ἐν-τῇ-ἀγν-ὑμῶν, which would more naturally stand as predicate [ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις ταῖς πρότ.-ἐν-τῇ-ἀγν.-ὑμ.], forms an adjectival epithet), and De Wette) who called you, be ye yourselves also (γενήθητε, aor. imperat., setting forth the completeness with which this holiness is to be put on. But the passive sense of ἐγενήθη must not be every where pressed: see notes on 1 Thess. i. 5: Heb. iv. 3. The attempt to assign an agent wherever ἐγενήθη is used, quite breaks down in some passages, e. g. 2 Cor. iii. 7; vii. 14) holy in all (manner of, every instance of: not πάσῃ τῇ nor τῇ πάσῃ: nor need we suppose, as De W., an irregular construction such as it is almost impossible to avoid recognizing in Eph. ii. 21) behaviour (conversation, in the old sense of turning and walking about in life: “Nulla sit pars vitæ quæ non hunc bonum sanctitatis odorem redoleat.” Calv.):

16.] because it is written (διότι gives the reason not only for the designation of God as the Holy One, but for the whole exhortation which precedes—for the duty of assimilation to Him in His Holiness), Ye shall be holy because I am holy (see Matt. v. 48: Eph. v. 1: 1 John iii. 3).

17.] Further exhortation, in consideration of our close relation of children to God our Judge, to reverence and godly fear. And if (“Si non dubitantis est, sed supponentis rem notam. Est enim omnium renatorum communis oratio, Pater noster qui es in cælis.” Estius. The εἰ introduces an hypothesis with an understood background of fact: If, [as is the case] &c.) ye call upon as father (πατέρα, not, as E. V. “the Father,” but used predicatively and prefixed for emphasis) Him who judgeth impartially (see Acts x. 34: James ii. 1 reff. The pres. part. gives the attribute or office: “Him, who is the Judge,” see ref. So that there is not even an apparent inconsistency with the declaration that the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son, John v. 22: for this last fact of itself implies that the Father is the Judge, the ‘fons iudicii’: as Didymus says here, “iudicante Filio Pater est qui iudicat”) according to the work of each man (ἔργον: "Unius hominis unum est opus, bonum malumve." Bengel. Cf. James i. 4: Gal. vi. 4. ἐκάστου, be he Jew or Gentile, high or low, rich or poor: thus by setting God's just judgment so above all alike, His Majesty, as inculcating godly fear, is enhanced), behave (see on ἀναστροφή above) during the time of your sojourning (on παροικίω, see note, Heb. xi. 9. The Christian, who calls God his Father, is in exile, tarrying in a strange country, while here on earth) in fear (ἐν φόβῳ stands first as emphatic. How, it is asked, is this, seeing that "there is no fear in love: for perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment [1 John iv. 18]? (Ec. answers, that the fear here recommended is not the φόβος καταρκτικός, leading to repentance, but the φόβος τελειωτικός, which accompanies the Christian through his whole course. And Leighton beautifully says, "This fear is not cowardice: it doth not debase, but elevates the mind: for it drowns all lower fears, and begets true fortitude and courage to encounter all dangers for the sake of a good conscience and the obeying of God. The righteous is as bold as a lion, Prov. xxviii. 1. He dares do any thing, but offend God: and to dare to do that, is the greatest folly, and weakness, and baseness, in the world. From this fear have sprung all the generous resolutions, and patient sufferings of the saints and martyrs of God: because they durst not sin against Him, therefore they durst be imprisoned, and impoverished and tortured and die for Him. Thus the prophet sets carnal and godly fear as opposite, and the one expelling the other, Isa. viii. 12, 13. And our Saviour, Luke xii. 4, 'Fear not them which kill the body, but fear Him' &c. Fear not, but fear: and therefore fear, that you may not fear"), 18.] knowing (being aware: this argument enhances the duty of godly fear by the consideration of the inestimable price at which they were redeemed. This consideration is urged through vv. 18—21) that not (emphatic) with corruptible things (φθαρτοῖς subst.; not, as Luther, agreeing with ἀργυρ. ἢ χρυσίῳ), silver or gold (notice ἀργυρίῳ ἢ χρυσίῳ, not ἀργύρῳ ἢ χρυσῶ. The diminutive forms stand generally [not always, cf. Palm and Rost in χρυσίον] for the coined or wrought metal: and such a sense would be applicable here), ye were redeemed (bought out of, by the payment of a λύτρον, presently to be specified: see reff., and cf. ἀγοράζεσθαι, 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; ἐξαγοράζεσθαι, Gal. iii. 13) out of your vain conversation (ματαίας ἀναστρ., "nam vivendi ratio, quae, ubi tempus praeteriit, nil reliqui fructus habet." Beng.) delivered to you from your fathers ("unus Pater imitandus ver. 17: idem antitheton, Matt. xxiii. 9." Bengel. This again makes it probable that the persons here more especially addressed are Gentile Christians. The Apostle, himself a Jew, would hardly speak of the vain ungodly lives of Jews as πατροπαραδότα, without more explanation. Benson, in loc., imagines that there is an allusion to the Jewish practice of paying down money as a ransom for life, Exod. xxi. 30; xxx. 11—16: Num. iii. 44—51; xviii. 15: but there does not seem any ground for this view here: the words following on ἐλυτρώθητε do not give countenance to it, but rather favour the view that it is the buying out of captivity which is in the Apostle's mind: see below),— 19.] but with precious (τιμῆ is not, as Huther, in opposition to φθαρτοῖς; nor does it signify "im-perishable," but simply and generally 'precious,' 'of worth') blood, as of a lamb blameless and spotless (see Exod. xii. 5: Levit. xxii. 20), [even the blood] of Christ (this I believe to be the more natural construction. The other, adopted by E. V., De Wette, Huther, Wiesinger, and many Commentators, "but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb” &c., is of course legitimate; and in that case τιμῶ being prefixed for emphasis, is explained by the ὡς ἀνοῦ clause inserted between it and χριστοῦ. We have a somewhat similar arrangement in Heb. xii. 27, δηλοῦ τῶν σαλευομένων τὴν μετᾴθαι, ὡς πεποιημένων. But I prefer the other, as bringing forward the τιμῶ αἵματι in contrast to the φθαροῖς, ἀργ. ἢ χρυσ. and then explaining the τιμῶ by a climax finding its highest point in χριστοῦ. The question, with what particular lamb Christ is here compared, will be found discussed in the main on John i. 29. Our reply here however will be somewhat modified by the consideration, that the figure of buying out of the ματαία ἀναστροφή seems to contain an allusion to the bringing up out of Egypt, and the προεγνωσμένου following, to the taking up of the paschal lamb beforehand, cf. Exod. xii. 3, 6. And thus I believe Wiesinger and Hofmann are right in maintaining here the reference to the paschal lamb. “As Israel’s redemption from Egypt required the blood of the paschal lamb, so the redemption of those brought out of heathendom required the blood of Christ, the predestination of whom from eternity is compared with the taking up of the lamb on the tenth day of the month.” Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. 1. 326. See, for a further discussion of this point, Wiesinger’s note here: and Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. 1. 194 ff.); 20.] The preciousness and completeness of this redemption is further enhanced by God’s foreordination of it, and His bringing it to glorious completion in His due time. Who (viz. χριστός, as shewn by the αὐτόν and αὐτῷ below) was foreordained indeed (see on ver. 2) before the foundation of the world (see reff. The same thought is foremost in the Apostle’s speech in Acts ii. 23, iii. 18), but manifested (brought out of the κρυπτόν of God’s purposes into the φανερὸν of Incarnation and historical world-fact. The same word occurs in ch. v. 4 of the yet future manifestation of Christ at His second coming) at the end of the times (cf. ἐπ’ ἑσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν τούτων, Heb. i. 1, and note there: and for this substantive sense of ἑσχάτου, Acts i. 8; xiii. 47. This φανέρωσις of Christ, as Wiesinger remarks, marks this as the end of the times, and this last time shall only endure so long, as this φανέρωσις requires) for your sakes (an additional and weighty intensification of their obligation) 21.] who are through Him (surely not only, as Wies., through His manifestation; but through Him personally, made to you all that He is made as the medium of your faith in God: the resurrection and glory being included. In fact τὸν ἐγείραντα κ.τ.λ. is an exegesis of δι’ αὐτοῦ) believers on God (a similar specification is found at ver. 4, εἰς ὑμᾶς τοὺς κ.τ.λ.) who raised Him from the dead, and gave Him glory (“That we are redeemed from our vain conversation, is owing to the blood of Christ: but that we have faith and hope in God, is brought about by God having raised Christ from the dead, and given Him glory.” Hofm. Schriftb. ii. 1, p. 383. Wies. remarks that the δόξαι of ver. 11 are here separately specified), so that your faith and hope are (not, as Syr., Vulg., Ec., Luth., Calv., Beza., Est., al., and E. V., “that your faith and hope might be,” nor, as Aretius [in Huth.], “so that your faith and hope ought to be,” but simply announcing a matter of fact. Your faith rests on Christ’s resurrection—it was God who raised Him: your hope, on Christ’s glorification: it is God who has given Him that glory. Closely accordant with this is St. Peter’s first public speech in the Acts, ii. 22 ff., where all that has happened to Christ is referred to God as the doer of it) on (resting on and in) God. 22—25.] Third exhortation, to LOVE OF ONE ANOTHER, from the consideration

22.] Having purified (i. e. 'seeing that ye have purified:' the part. carries with it an inferential force as to the exhortation, and besides, assumes that as a fact to which it covertly exhorts. Huther. ἀγνίξειν, of moral purification, as in ref.) your souls (the ψυχαί, as the centres of personality, though here described as purified by the persons themselves, yet are not so except by a process in which the whole person is employed: the habit of obedience) in (the course of: the region, in which the purification takes place) your obedience of ('to,' so that τῆς ἀλ. is gen. objective. It might be, obedience brought about by the truth, gen. subjective: but not so simply. 'The truth' is that of the Gospel of Christ in its largest sense, not merely as Calv., "regula, quam nobis Dominus in evangelio præscribit:" and ὑπακοή τῆς ἀληθείας nearly = ὑπ. [τῆς] πίστεως, Rom. i. 5 and elsewhere. Compare St. Peter's own saying, Acts xv. 9, τῇ πίστει καθάρσας τὰς καρδίας αὐτῶν) the truth (see above), unto ('with a view to,' 'in the direction of,' it might be with or without intention: the legitimate tendency of that purification, which ought to have been going on in your souls, was toward) unfeigned (reff.) brotherly love (love of Christians towards one another: see reff.), love one another from the heart earnestly (καρδία is the seat of the affections: let the love come straight and pure from thence, not short of it, from any secondary purpose as its origin. ἔκτενῶς is proscribed by Phrynichus, p. 311, where see Lobeek's note. But the adj. is not, as sometimes stated, a word of later Greek: we have ἔκτενης φίλος in Æsch. Suppl. 990. 'Intente' exactly gives the sense: with the energies on the stretch):

above, to the state of the new life of which that was an act; even to the beginning of that new life in their regeneration by the divine word. And the begetting cause of this new birth being God's living and imperishable word, from that fact come in new considerations, enforcing that pure love which belongs not to a transitory and shifting but to an eternal and abiding state. Being born again, not of (not in, as origin) corruptible seed (σπορά, not in its strict and proper sense, 'sowing' [ref. 4 Kings], but in its looser one of seed. And the seed spoken of is not, as Huther, that of plants; but the semen humanum, as the sequel shews), but incorruptible, by means of (not ἐκ this time. The word of God is not the begetting principle itself, but only that by which the principle works: as it were the cocoon or grain which is the involucrum and vehicle of the mysterious germinating power. We are not regenerated ἐκ but διὰ λόγου. But on the other hand, the word itself is no mere perishing vehicle; no mere sacramental symbol, lost in the using: but it lives by and with the divine principle of life which it conveys and expands, and abides for ever. The ἐκ of origination rests in God Himself, the Father, who begat us of his own will: the δικά of instrumentality moves on and abides for ever) the (the definite art. is necessary in English, for the very reason for which it is omitted in Greek: viz. to prevent the λόγου from becoming concrete, and keep it to its widest general and abstract reference) word of God, living and abiding (ζῶντος is thrown forward, as an emphatic predicate, before θεοῦ. That the two participles belong to λόγου, not to θεοῦ, is decisively shewn by the sequel, where the abiding nature, not of God, but of the word of God, is set forth. Many, however, have taken them with θεοῦ; so vulg. ["per verbum Dei vivi"], [not Œc. as commonly cited, for he says,

Its sense is as in ref. Rom., to distinguish the γάλα spoken of from mere σαρκικὸν γάλα, and to shew that it is spoken figuratively and spiritually: "Lac illud animi, non corporis, lac mente hauriendum." Our English is too poor in psychological distinctions to be able to express it by any appropriate adjective: "reasonable" [vulg.] is decidedly wrong, as E. V. in Rom.; and "of the word," as E. V., here after Beza, is just as bad) guileless (not 'unadulterated,' in contrast to less pure human teachings [cf. δολοῦν τὸν λόγον, 2 Cor. iv. 2]: but, in contrast to δόλος above, 'that is without guile,' has no by-ends, no one purpose but to nourish and benefit the soul) milk (not here in contrast, as in 1 Cor. iii. 2 and Heb. v. 12, 13, to strong meat: but simply in reference to its nourishing qualities), that on it (as τετραμμένος ἐν, 'fed on,' see Winer, § 48. a (2). d, note) ye may grow (properly passive: be nourished up) unto salvation (the growth is the measure of the fulness of that—not only rescue from destruction, but—positive blessedness, which is implied in σωτηρία; see on the word above, ch. i. 5): 3.] if, that is (wenn anderē of the German. Perhaps the simplest meaning of χρηστός, as applied to meats and drinks, is here intended: as vulg., "dulseis:" see Palm and Rost, χρηστός, 1. a). 4.] Exhortation to come to Christ the chosen stone, and be built up into a spiritual temple unto God. 4.] To whom (i. e. τὸν κύριον) approaching (pres., representing the daily habit of the Christian life, not something to be done once for all. προσέρχεσθαι is elsewhere in the N. i. 171: Ov. Met. xiv. 714] as distinguished from broken stones), by men indeed rejected (in Ps. l. c. ὃν ἀποδοκίμασαν οἱ οἰκοδομοῦντες), but in the sight of God (with God. "Deo iudice, coram Deo") chosen (not merely "eximius," but selected, chosen out), had in honour (see below on ver. 6), 5.] be ye also as living (see above) stones built up (it is disputed whether οἰκοδομείσθε is indicative or imperative. Much is to be said both ways. Wiesinger, who is the ablest recent advocate for the indicative, maintains that the passage is exegetical of the preceding ἵνα ἐν αὐτῷ ἀξιοθῆτε, shewing how love to the word, seeking in the word the Lord Himself and His goodness, of itself leads to the completion set forth in ver. 5. But I cannot help feeling that this view of epexegetis of ἵνα ἐν αὐτ. ἀξ. is much weakened by the fact that πρὸς ὃν must be referred to κύριος, which is already separated from ἵνα κ.τ.λ. by εἴπερ ἐγεύσασθε κ.τ.λ. And other weightier reasons are behind. On the indicative view, the pres. part. προσερχόμενοι could hardly have been used, but it would surely have been προσελθόντες. This is felt by Luther, who renders it zu welchem ihr gekommen seyd. Again, the connexion with the foregoing by a participle, proceeding on to an imperative, exactly corresponds to the former hortatory sentences, ch. i. 13, 14, 22, and ver. 1. Finally, the long procession of mere prediations, on this view, would be tame and almost tautological, in comparison with the powerful gathering up with the οὖν, ver. 7, of the high and holy state on which the preceding exhortation depends, as contrasted with that of the unbelieving. I therefore decide for the imperative, against Syr. [Etheridge: "you also as living stones are builded"], Estius, Grot., Beng., al., and Wiesinger, and with Ec., Syr. [as commonly quoted], Beza, Aret., Benson, Steiger, De Wette, Huther) a spiritual house (οἶκος = ναός,

1 Cor. iii. 16: Eph. ii. 21: as before, the stones are called living, and the house spiritual, not merely to signify that they are not dead stones, and the house not a material one, but on account of the life which Christians derive from Christ, the living Stone, and of the service which they render in virtue of being a body dwelt in by the Holy Spirit) for (see var. readd.) an holy priesthood (abstract, office of priesthood, including in itself the individual priests: see ref. Exod. Being God's spiritual temple, they form an holy priesthood to Him, approaching and serving before Him in virtue of that Living and Holy One, whose mystic Body they are, and in whom the Father is well pleased. And they need no other by whom to approach God: being all priests, they require not, nor admit of, any distinct body of men among themselves specially called priests, nearer to God than themselves. No where is this more clearly declared by inference, than here) to offer up (ἀναφέρειν, not occurring in St. Paul, nor in the classics, but [reff.] in Heb. and St. James, is the regular LXX word for offering up sacrifice. The aor. is here used, because no habitual offering, as in rite or festival, is meant, but the one, once-for-all, devotion of the body, as in Rom. xii. 1, to God as His. On the infin. of the purpose, see Winer, § 44. 1) spiritual sacrifices (cf. especially Heb. xiii. 15, 16. Spiritual, because as the temple, as the priests, as the God, so the offering. It is this, rather than any distinction from the O. T. sacrifices, that is pointed at in πνευματικός) acceptable (reff.) to God through Jesus Christ (these last words may be joined, either, 1. with εὐπροσδέκτους, or, 2. with ἀνεύγκαι. This latter has for it the analogy of Heb. xiii. 15, δι' αὐτοῦ ὄν ἀναφέρωμεν κ.τ.λ., and is preferred by Grot., Aret., De Wette, Huther, Wiesinger: and I think reasonably. The introduction of διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ as a mere appendage of εὐπροσδέκτους would not satisfy the weighty character of the words, nay would seem to put them in the wrong place, seeing that not merely the acceptability, but the very existence, and possibility of offering, of those sacrifices depends on the mediation of the great High-priest).

6.] The exhortation of the previous verses is substantiated in its form and its assertions by O. T. prophecy. Because (q. d. the aforesaid is so, on the ground of Scripture) it is contained (reff.: and for the impersonal sense, Jos. Antt. xi. 4. 7, καθὼς ἐν αὐτῇ [τῇ ἐπιστολῇ] περιέχει. Hence περιοχῇ, the contents or argument of a book or portion of a book, in later Greek) in Scripture (γραφῇ, in its technical sense, anathrous: not so found in the Gospels, but Rom. i. 2; xvi. 26; 2 Pet. i. 20), Behold, I place in Zion a chief corner-stone, chosen, had in honour (the citation is a free one: τίθημι ἐν Σιών representing ἐμβάλλω εἰς τὰ θεμέλια Σιών, —the epithet πολυτελῆ being omitted, and ἐκλεκτόν and ἀκρογωνιαῖον transposed): and he that believeth on Him [or, 'it': ἐπ' αὐτῷ is not in the LXX vat., but is found in AN] shall not be ashamed (it is remarkable, that St. Paul in citing the same prophecy, Rom. ix. 33, has in common with St. Peter the two divergences from the LXX, the τίθημι ἐν Σιών, and the insertion [?] of ἐπ' αὐτῷ. On ἀκρογωνιαῖον, see ref. Eph. note. Here, whatever may be the case there, can hardly be any idea of the 'lapis summangularis' joining the two walls, Jewish and Gentile, together, as some [e. g. Ec.] have thought). 7, 8.]

Appropriation of the honour implied in the last clause to believers: and per contra, to unbelievers, of another and opposite effect of the exaltation of this corner-stone. 7.] To you (dat. commodi) then (inference from the ὁ πιστεύων ἐπ' αὐτῷ κ.τ.λ.) is the honour (the τιμὴ belonging to the Stone itself [ἐντιμον above], with which you are united in the building: the honour implied in the οὐ μὴ κατασχυνοῦθῃ said of those who believe on Him. There can be, I think, no doubt that these two commonly divergent accounts given of the word τιμὴ ought to be combined in one. That the result of the οὐ μὴ κατασχυνοῦθῃ is what the Apostle means to state, is evident by the οὖν and τοῖς πιστεύουσιν: that the form in which this is stated is ὑμῖν ἡ τιμὴ, is evidently owing to the occurrence of ἐντιμον above. It is as plainly altogether beside the purpose, with Erasm., Luth., Calv., Aret., Bengel, al., to understand 'Christ,' or 'the Stone,' as the subject, and render as E. V., "He is precious," making ἡ τιμὴ predicate instead of subject) who believe: but to the disobedient (not, the unbelieving: see Heb. iii. 18, note. Unbelief is the root of ἀπειθεια: but it is the manner of Scripture, to follow it out into disobedience, its invariable effect, when spoken of in contrast to πίστις. The dat. is not one of reference, but incommodi. Then what follows is in the form of another quotation, or rather combination of quotations: the first from Ps. cxviii. 22), the stone which the builders rejected, this has become for a (has been made into a) head corner-stone (this is true with regard to believers also: but to them it is grace and glory, to these it is terror and destruction), and a stone of stumbling and rock of offence (second quotation from Isa. viii. 14. Here again, St. Paul in Rom. ix. 33 has taken the same words, differing from the LXX, but agreeing with the Hebrew. This stumbling is not mere mental offence, which, e. g. they take at the preaching of the Cross; but the “stumbling upon the dark mountains” of Jer. xiii. 16, see Prov. iv. 19: Dan. xi. 19: the eternal disgrace and ruin which forms the contrast to τιμή above. Cf. on πέτρα σκανδάλου Matt. xvi. 23, note). 8.] who stumble, being disobedient to the word (τῷ λόγῳ belongs to ὑπειθύντες, not as E. V. after vulg., Erasm., Luth., Beza, Estius, al., to προσκόπτουσιν, which is doubly objectionable, in, 1. making ὑπειθύντες a mere tautology from ὑπειθύνω before: 2. giving a place not prominent enough to τῷ λόγῳ, whereas on the other rendering it takes its proper place, as being the means of growth to the Christian, and rejected by the disobedient: 3. confining the sense of ‘stumbling’ [see above] to a mere subjective one: 4. opposing the analogy of ch. iii. 1 and iv. 17. Cf. Wolf, in loc.: “Qui impingunt, nempe, in lapidem illum angularem, verbo non credentes [obedientes?]: quo ipso et offensio ipsa et ejus causa indicatur”), for which (thing, fact, viz. the προσκόπτειν, τῷ λόγῳ ὑπειθύνω, their whole moral course of delinquency and the πρόσκομα at the end of it) they were also (καί, besides that they reach it, there is another consideration) appointed (set where they are, or were; viz. by Him who τίθησιν, above, the stone of stumbling. This exposition is certain, notwithstanding the protests of Ec., Did., al. Nor can I see how Bengel can escape, with his διττολογία, “Positi sunt respondet τῷ ρηοῦ ver. 6; sed cum differentia. Nam Deus Christum et electos active dicitur ponere; infideles dicuntur poni, passive.” What inference would he deduce from this? Would he take themselves as the agents, as Ec., Did., “Ad non credendum a semetipsis sunt positi,” thus passing over καί, and making the clause a vapid tautology? Or would he say with Aretius, “Non Deus certe, sed Satan tales posuit,” thus making in the world’s moral arrangement, Satan a co-ordinate power with God?). 9, 10.] Contrast, in a glorious description of the office, privilege, and function, of the enlightened and adopted people of God. 9.] But ye (emphatic) are a chosen generation (not, as De Wette, “the chosen generation;” though this is implied, it is not in the words, nor does it correspond with the indefinite predicates which follow. On the expression, cf. ref. Isa., τὸ γένος μου τὸ ἐκλεκτόν. γένος betokens a common origin and unity of related life: but perhaps Wiesinger goes too far in pressing the idea here), a kingly priesthood (ἱεράτευμα as above, see note. The expression is from the LXX of Exod. xix. 6. Cf. Rev. i. 6, ἐποίησεν ἡμᾶς βασιλείαν ἱερέων τῷ θεῷ, and v. 10. In the N. T. church these two elements, the kingship and the priesthood, are united in every individual believer, as in our great Head, Jesus Christ, who alone unites them in the O. T. church; the two coexisting, but never, except in the case of Melchisedek His foretype, united in the same Person), an holy nation (also from Exod. xix. 6, LXX; God’s declaration at Sinai respecting Israel), a people for acquisition (i. e. peculiarly God’s own, as interpreted by what follows in the place of Isaiah referred to, as well as here. There it stands, λαὸν μου ὃν περιποιήσαμην τὰς ἀρετὰς μου διηγείσθαι. See, on the word, ref. 1 Thess. note. In the place of Exodus which was before quoted, ch. xix. 5, we read ἔσεσθέ μοι λαὸς περιούσιος ἀπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐθνῶν. See also Deut. vii. 6. Ec. says, περιποίησιν ἡμᾶς καλεῖ διὰ τὸ περιποιήσασθαι ἡμᾶς τὸν θεόν, as in Acts xx. 28, τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ θεοῦ, ἣν περιποιήσατο διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ ἰδίου), that ye may tell out (ἐξαγγ. not = ἀναγγ. Had not this been intended, surely neither εἰς nor αὐτοῦ would have been used. "It is wonderful," says De Wette, "just as to one coming out of long darkness the light of day would be wonderful." The figure of the corner-stone has not quite passed away from the Apostle's mind; in the end of the prophecy concerning which we read, Ps. cxvii. 23 [Matt. xxi. 42], παρὰ κυρίου ἐγένετο αὐτή, καὶ ἔστιν θαυμαστὴ ἐν ὀφθαλμοῖς ἡμῶν;] 10.] who (contrast between their former and present states) were once no people (the Apostle is again citing, or rather clothing that which he has to write in, O. T. words. In Hosea ii. 23, alex., we read ἐλεήσω τὴν οὐκ ἠληθ-υένην, καὶ ἐρῶ τῷ οὐ λαῷ μου λαός μου εἶ σύ), but [are] now the people of God (these words, as Wies. maintains, apply most properly to Gentile Christians, although spoken in the prophecy of Jews. St. Paul thus uses them, Rom. ix. 25; and it is not impossible that that passage may have been in St. Peter's mind), who were uncompassionated (of God: the οὐκ here and above, not merely negatives, but contraries: not "who had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy," as E. V., indicating a mere change of time in order of progress, but who were unpitied, objects of aversion and wrath), but now compassionated (the aor. part. has a fine and delicate force which cannot be given in a version: q. d. who were men who [have received no pity], but now men who [received pity], viz. when God called you by Christ).

11 — IV. 6.] Exhortations to walk christianly and worthily towards and among those without who speak and act in a hostile manner. Hitherto we have seen them exhorted to walk worthily of their calling as distinguished from their own former walk: now the Apostle exhorts them to glorify God before an ungodly and persecuting world.

11, 12.] Ver. 11, negative, exhorts to abstinence from fleshly lusts: ver. 12, positive, to cause the unconverted Gentiles around, by their fair Christian walk, to glorify God. 11.] Beloved (as this word is only found once again in this Epistle, ch. iv. 12, we may apply to it Wiesinger's remark, "The seldomer our Apostle uses this endearing term, the weightier it is where it does occur as the opening of a hortatory discourse"), I exhort you as sojourners (see ref. Eph. and note) and strangers (see on ch. i. 1. This primary and literal meaning of the word is probably the uppermost one here, seeing that the Apostle is speaking of behaviour among the Gentiles. Still, from the more general reference of this first exhortation, the other and wider reference, "quia filii Dei, ubique terrarum agant, mundi sunt hospites" [Calv.], must not be left out of sight. These words, παροίκ. κ. παρεπίδ., belong, not to παρακαλῶ, as Huther, al., but to ἀπέχεσθαι. They form the ground why the readers should abstain, not why the Writer should exhort. In νοουθετεῖτε ὡς ἀδελφόν, 2 Thess. iii. 15, we have the other case) to abstain (or, with the reading -σθε, abstain) from the carnal lusts (= αι επιθυμια της σαρκος, reff. Eph. and 2 Pet.; αι κοσμικα επιθυμια, Titus ii. 12. Here, it is, from the context, the walking and acting in the indulgence of these lusts which the Apostle is forbidding. See them enumerated in Gal. v. 19—21), the which (αἵτινες, not = αι, but gathers up into a class the επιθυμια) and asserts it of all of them that they &c.: thus rendering a reason, ‘quippe quæ.’ With αι, it might have been taken, “from those fleshly lusts, which” &c.) war (ref. And among its adversaries are these fleshly lusts, warring against it to its ruin): 12.] Positive result of this abstinence, and its important fruit: having (we have the same disjunction of the construction in Eph. iv. 1, 2, παρακαλω . . υμῶς . . ανεχομενοι. It serves to give vividness to the description, taking the participle out from under the παρακαλω, and depicting, as it were, the condition recommended, as actually existing. It is so eminently, though not under exactly the same circumstances as to construction, in the beautiful procession of participles and adjectives in Rom. xii. 9—19) your behaviour among the Gentiles comely (as over against the ματαλα αναστροφη of the Gentiles, ch. i. 18. V., “pro eo quod,” Beza, for which sense of εν φ there is no precedent. The sense is, ‘that that conduct, which was to them an occasion of speaking against you as evil-doers, may by your good works become to them an occasion of glorifying God.’ And ‘that, in which,’ will be in fact your whole Christian life) they speak against you as evil-doers (often the Christians would be compelled to diverge from heathen customs and even to break human laws, and thus would incur the imputation of malefactors), they may, on the ground of your good works, being spectators of them (contrast to the ignorance assumed in the αγνωσια των αφρονων ανθρωπων below, ver. 15. On the word, see reff.: and cf. εποπτης, an eye-witness, 2 Pet. i. 16), glorify God in [the] day of visitation (i. e., the day when God visits,—επισκεπτεται, Luke i. 68, 78: Acts xv. 14,—mankind with His offers of mercy and grace: cf. also reff. Luke, where our Lord says of Jerusalem, ουκ εγνωσ τον καιρον της επισκοπης σου. The word has been variously understood: the Fathers generally [cf. Suicer in voc.], Lyra, Erasm., Beza, De Wette, al. explain it as above: (Ec., Wolf, Bengel, al. think that the day of inquisition before earthly magistrates is meant [ημεραν δε επισκοπης την κατὰ κόσμον εξετασιν καλει εξετασεως γαρ υπ αυτων του βλου ημων γενομενης, εἶτα πρὸς τὸ ἐναντίον τῆς ὑπολήψεως τῶν πραγμάτων εὔρισκομένην αὐτοῖ τε πρὸς οἷς αἰσχύνονται ἐπαυροθύνται, καὶ ὁ θεὸς δοξάζεται. (Ec.). Bede, al. understand it of the day of judgment. But the former sense is far preferable on account of usage, and for its fitness in the context). 13—17.] Exhortation to subjection to secular rule. 13.] Be subjected (aor. pass. with a quasi-middle sense, given by the aorist coupled with the fact of the command: be in a condition of having been subjected: on the medial signification of aorists passive in

N. T., see on ch. v. 6) to every human institution ("quod creat et condit homo," Luth. Such, and not "every human creature," as Syr., Erasm., Estius, Pott, De Wette, is the meaning. The latter would stultify what follows: for it is not to the king as a man, but to the king as a human institution, that we are to be subject. And so (Ec., κτίσιν ἀνθρωπίνην τὰς ἀρχὰς λέγει τὰς χειροτονητὰς ὑπὸ τῶν βασιλέων, ἣ καὶ αὐτοὺς τοὺς βασιλεῖς, καθότι καὶ αὐτοὶ ὑπὸ ἀνθρώπων ἐτάχθησαν ἤτοι ἐτέθησαν. It is no objection to this, that all powers are ordained of God: for that consideration does not come into notice in these words, but in those which follow, διὰ τ. κύριον. Here, it is the lower side of such institutions, the fact of their being ordained and upheld by men, that is brought into sight) for the Lord's sake (i. e. Christ's: κύριος with St. Peter, except in O. T. citations, is always our Lord. And here there is additional reason, for that He, the Head of all principality and power, is yet in us his members subject to them, until the day when all shall be put under His feet): whether to king (general,—but, from the nature of the case as regarded those to whom the Epistle is addressed, here the Roman Emperor) as supereminent ("qui ita imperat, ut ab aliis hominibus ipsi non imperetur," Gerh.), 14.] or to governors ("ἡγεμόνες πρæsides provinciarum, qui a Cæsare mittebantur in provincias," Gerh.) as to men sent (in the habit of being sent,—sent from time to time: the pres. part. describes the genus: the particular ἡγεμόνες would be described as πεμφθέντες) through him (the king, not κύριον, as some, and Calvin very positively, "qui pronomina ad regem referunt multum falluntur." But there can be little doubt that he is wrong. For first the analogy of the clauses, ὡς ὑπερέχοντι . . . ὡς δι' αὐτοῦ πεμπομένοις, shews that the grounds of obedience in each case, all being alike διὰ κύριον, belong to the actually existing rights of power in that case. The king is supreme, in his own right: governors rule by delegation from the king, 'mittuntur,' δι' αὐτοῦ. Then, the right understanding of διὰ κύριον, as applying to all, forbids this view. For thus we should obey the king as ὑπερέχον, no mention of the Lord being made, whereas rulers are to be obeyed as sent by the Lord. Finally, the prep. διὰ, as distinguished from ὑπό, designates rather the subordinate than the original sender. A governor could surely not be said to be sent διὰ κυρίου for (to bring about) vengeance on (as in ref.: ἐκδίκησις, being a 'vox media,' has another meaning, that of "avenging of," in Luke xviii. 7, 8. Ec., taking it in this latter meaning, gives a convenient limitation to the duty, which was the furthest possible from the mind of the Apostle: ἔδειξε καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Πέτρος τίσι καὶ ποιοῖς ἀρχουσιν ὑποτάσσεσθαι δεῖ, ὅτι τοῖς τῶ δίκαιον ἐκδικοῦσιν) evil-doers, and praise of well-doers. 15.] For (ground of ὑποτάγητε; correlative with, but not going so far as, the purpose announced in ver. 12) so (after this manner, in this direction and wise: viz. as follows, ἀγαθοποιούντας φιμουῖν κ.τ.λ.) is ('se trouve,' κείται) the will (thing willed, concrete result of the will) of God, that doing good (the anarthrous participle carries the reason with it: by doing good: "with well-doing," E. V.) ye (necessarily understood) put to silence the ignorance ("Locutio quam usurpat, 'obstruere ignorantiam,' quamvis per novitatem dura sit, sensum tamen non obscurat." Calv. On the word φιμώ, see reff.; and Palm and Rost's Lex. ἀγνωσία, see the instructive parallel, ref. 1 Cor., is not simply ignorance of this or that fact, but a state of lack of knowledge or understanding, habitual ignorance. This state is here introduced as speaking, "having [as Wiesinger] ever its mouth open rather than its eyes," ready to cry out upon any mere appearance of things as misunderstood by it) of the foolish men (above designated: those viz. who καταλαλοῦσιν ὑμῶν ὡς κακοποιῶν; not, 'of foolish men' in general, as E. V.). 16.] The connexion is somewhat doubtful. Chrys. (in Cramer's Catena, Ec., Bengel, Gerh., De Wette, join ὡς ἑλεύθεροι with ὑποτάγητε above, ver. 13: Bede, Luther, Calv., Hammond, Wiesinger, with ἀγαθοποιούντας, ver. 15: Steiger, Huther, with the following, ver. 17. This latter seems quite untenable, as carrying no application on from ver. 16 to ver. 17. No one would think of pleading his freedom as an excuse for not honouring all, or for not loving the brethren, or for not fearing God: or indeed for not, in some sense, honouring the King. But in a matter of subjection, such ἑλευθερία might be and often is made a cloak for disobedience. Connecting then ὡς ἐλεύθ. with what has preceded, which of the other connexions are we to take? That with ὑποτάγητε seems too distant: it may certainly be said that ver. 17 brings in again the general duty in its most simple form: but even thus we can hardly account for the parenthetical ver. 15, so unparenthetical in its aspect and construction. Whereas if we join ὡς ἐλεύθ. to ver. 15, we obtain, as Wiesinger well argues, an epexegetis which that verse seems to need,—for it is almost a truism that we are to accomplish the φημοῦν by ἀγαθοποιεῖν, unless some explanation be given of the particular circumstances under which this is to take place. I regard then ver. 16 as an epexegetis of ver. 15, not carrying on the construction with an accus. but with a nom. as already in ver. 12, and indeed even more naturally here, because not the act consequent on ἀγαθοποιεῖν, as there on ἀπέχουσαι, is specified, but the antecedent state and Christian mode of ἀγαθοποιεῖν. As free (children of God, His family and people, His kingly priesthood: not merely free from the law, or free from sin, or free from earthly subjection, but generally and abstractedly free—Christ's freed men), and not as (ὡς belongs to ἔχοντες, not to ἐπικάλυμμα) having (cf. above, ver. 12) your freedom [for] a veil (reff.) of your evil intent (the τῆς, hypothetical: of the evil intent which using your freedom as a veil would necessarily presuppose), but as God's (emphatic) servants (and therefore bound to submit yourselves to that which God ordains).

17.] A pithy general statement (πάντας τιμῆσατε, see below) of the whole department of Christian duty of which the Apostle is now speaking: then a note of transition, by the three following commands, to the next paragraph, where he severs the general into the special duties. Give honour to all men (i.e. by the force of the aor. imperat., to each man according as the case, which requires it, arises, q. d. 'in every case render promptly every man's due: = ἀπόδοτε πᾶσιν τὰς ὀφειλάς, Rom. xiii. 7. So that the distinction between this and τιμᾶτε below is a clear one: see there. And by this force of the aor., this first precept assumes a place of general and wide-reaching reference, which then is severed by the three following present imperatives into three great branches, before the relations of ordinary life are introduced ver. 18, with participial forms). Love (as your habit of mind and act, pres.) the brotherhood (the aggregate of οἱ ἀδελφοί: see ref. and compare ἱεράτευμα above, ver. 9), fear God, honour (both these latter as continuing habits, frames of mind and courses of action) the king. 18—25.] Exhortation to servants to be obedient to their masters.

18.] Ye servants (οἰκέτης, a domestic servant: a milder designation than δούλος. Possibly, as Steiger supposes, it may be here used to include the 'liberti' who still remained in their master's house), in subjection (the part. carries on, immediately, the πάντας τιμῆσατε above; but also belongs, at a greater distance, to the whole of the last paragraph, as a general designation of the habitual conduct, in and by which they were to shew forth an honest conversation among the Gentiles) in all fear (ἐν παντὶ φόβῳ provides, by its wide generality, for the case by and by to be specially commented on. φόβος, not merely the reverence of an inferior, but the awe of one in subjection) to your masters; not only to the good (kind) and considerate (see note, ref. Phil.: those who make reasonable allowances, and exact no more), but also to the perverse (σκολιός = שָׂרָר, ref. Deut.: crooked, in deviating from right and justice, see note on ref. Phil. These masters are, as Gerh., “sævi et intractabiles, duri ac morosi”), 19, 20.] Reason for being subject to the perverse: that it is well pleasing to God when we suffer for well-doing. 19.] For this is thank-worthy (as in ref. Luke, εἰ ἀγαπᾶτε τοὺς ἀγαπάντας ὑμᾶς, ποία ὑμῖν χάρις ἐστὶ; i. e. what recognition at God's hand in the day when He will come, and His reward with Him [= τίνα μισθὸν ἔχετε; Matt. v. 46]?) It is said of something, to do or suffer which is out of, beyond, the ordinary course of what might have been expected. The meaning attempted by Wiesinger after Steiger, “this is grace,” i. e. a mark of divine grace, does not suit ver. 20, χάρις παρὰ, not θεοῦ, but θεῶ: and is condemned by the passage in St. Luke. The idea that it means “gratiam divinam concilians,” Wahl, leading on to “hoc est opus supererogationis,” Lyra, is theologically inadmissible, besides doing violence to the construction. The E. V. has hit the meaning very well. Cf. Calvin: “Idem valet nomen gratiæ quod laudis. Intelligi enim nullam gratiam vel laudem conciliari nobis coram Deo, si pœnam sustinemus quam nostris delictis sinus promeriti: sed qui patienter ferunt injurias, eos laude dignos esse, et opus facere Deo acceptum”), if (εἰ ὑποφέρει τις = τὸ ὑποφέρειν τινά, forms an apposition to and expegesis of τοῦτο: see for the infin.

2 Cor. ii. 1, vii. 11, and for instances of ὅτι, ἵνα, &c. Winer, § 23. 5). We have ἐάν after τοῦτο in 1 John ii. 3) on account of consciousness of God (realization in a man's inner being, of God's presence and relation to himself: cf. συνείδ. ἁμαρτιῶν Heb. x. 2. Calov. says perhaps too much: “quia conscius est id Deum velle et Deo gratum esse.” Better Calvin, “Hoc enim valet conscientia Dei, dum quis non hominum, sed Deo respectu officiosus fungitur”) any one endures (as a superimposed burden, see reff., but here induced perhaps by the idea of ὑποταγή which is dominant throughout: so De Wette) tribulations (“res tristitiam afferentes,” Wahl: cf. λυπηθέντες, ch. i. 6), suffering wrongfully (ἀδίκως here emphatic, as carrying the transition to the next step of the argument). 20.] For (proof of the foregoing by assuming [interrogatively] the refutation of the contrary) what kind of (ὡς ἴναι, Wies. But the qualitative force of ποῖος in an interrogation of this kind must not be pressed; it is of the slightest tinge imaginable: cf. the similar questions above from St. Matt. and St. Luke) glory [is it] (the word κλέος is perfectly general, and must not [as Bengel] be supplied with παρὰ θεῶ. What credit is due . . . ? = τί περισπὸν ποιεῖτε; Matt. v. 47) if doing wrong and being buffeted (the participles are in close logical connexion, and both of them describe enduring habit, not the occurrence merely of one such case, not ἁμαρτήσαντες κ. κολαφιζόμενοι. “When ye be buffeted for your faults,” E. V., is somewhat too wide: “When ye do wrong and are buffeted for it” would express the Greek more closely. κολαφιζ., reff.: here perhaps in the literal sense, as Bengel, “pœna servorum, eaque subita”) ye shall endure it (ὑπομενεῖτε, not, as De Wette, only “the reluctant dull endurance of a criminal who cannot avoid his punishment:” this mars the hypothesis, which requires that the same kind of endurance should belong to both its sides, the only difference being in suffering justly and unjustly. So that ὑπομενεῖτε must carry the sense of ὑπομονή, patient endurance: as E. V., "ye shall take it patiently"? but if well-doing and suffering [for it] (these last words are amply justified by the logical connexion of the participles, see above) ye shall endure it [it is glory] (with the reading τοῦτο γὰρ below, it becomes necessary to supply, mentally at least, some such words): for this is thank-worthy (see above) with (in the estimation of: see Luke ii. 52) God.

21.] For (proof that undeserved suffering is χάρις παρὰ θεῶ, by the instance of Christ's sufferings, which were our example) to this (state, viz. the endurance of wrongful sufferings) ye were called: because (ground of the assertion εἰς τοῦτο ἐκλήθητε) Christ also (the καὶ applies to the ἔπαθεν ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, the words ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν carrying with them the ἀγαθοποιῶν, as explained below, ver. 24) suffered for you, leaving behind for you (emphatic repetition from the former ὑμῶν. Tischendorf's reasoning, edn. 7, that ἡμῶν, ὑμῖν was probably the original reading, and has given rise to ἡμῶν ἡμῖν and ὑμῶν ὑμῖν, may be met by the above consideration in favour of the more ancient reading. ὑπολιμπάνω is a late form of ὑπολείπω. Themist. Orat. x. p. 139 D, is the only place quoted for this sense: Dion. Hal. i. 23 uses the 2 aor. in an intransitive sense, of streams failing,—τὰ δ' ὑπελίμπανε θέρους, τὰ δ' εἰς τέλος ἀπεσβέννυτο. On the pres. part. here, Bengel remarks, "in abitu ad Patrem." It gives the abiding intent of the single fact ἔπαθεν: and might be rendered 'ut relinqueret') a copy (ὑπογραμμός, a pateru to write or paint by: technically, ὑπογραμμοὶ παιδικοί were formulae given by writing-masters to their pupils, containing all the letters of the alphabet. Clem. Strom. v. 8. 50, p. 675 P., who gives examples of them) that ye should follow upon (ἐπακολουθεῖτε, follow close upon, the ἐπί denoting close application to: it is a word commonly used of following behind another) His footsteps (so in reff.):

22.] Further expansion of this example of Christ, making it plain that He ἀγαθοποιῶν καὶ πάσχων ὑπέμεινεν:—who never did (the aor. gives the force, as distinguished from the imperf. ἐποίει, of "never in a single instance") sin (the words are almost a citation from Isa. liii. 9, A, ἀνομίαν οὐκ ἐποίησεν, οὐδὲ εὐρέθη δόλος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ) nor yet (climax: not only did He never sin in act, but not even . . .) was guilty ever found ("non reprehendebatur fraudulentus locutus," Wiesinger: cf. Winer, § 65. 8. on this sense of εὐρίσκομαι) in His mouth:

23.] who when reviled, reviled not again (a proof of his ὑπομονή. Isa. liii. 7 is before the Apostle), when suffering threatened not (both these, imperfects, denoting constant habit. The order is again that of climax: from λοιδορούμενος to πάσχων, from οὐκ ἀντελοιδόρει to οὐκ ἠπείλει): but (see on this particular use of δέ as a stronger contrast than ἀλλά, on Heb. ii. 6. It is nearly our 'yea, rather: 'removing the thing previously negated altogether out of our field of view, and substituting something totally different for it) delivered [them] (see below) up (what? Most Commentators supply εαυτῶν, or 'causam suam,' both of which seem out of place and hardly justified by the usage of the verb. Rather would I supply an object out of the λοιδορούμενος and πάσχων foregoing, either, with Huther and Wiesinger, "His reproaches and sufferings," or, which seems to me better, "those who inflicted them :” perhaps not without reference to “Father, forgive them : for they know not what they do”) to Him that judgeth (pres., whose office it is to judge) righteously (i. e. the Father : designated in ref. as ὁ ἀπροσωπολήμπως κρίνων. Calv. says well, “Qui sibi ad expetendam vindictam indulgent, non iudicis officium Deo concedunt, sed quodam modo facere volunt suum carnificem”): 24.] who Himself (now the ἀγαθοποιῶν reaches its height. He was not only negatively innocent, ver. 22, but suffered in the pursuance of the noblest purpose of love, and that love towards us : by which fact His example is further brought home and endeared to us) bore our sins (but in the pregnant sense of “bore to sacrifice,” “carried and offered up :” see notes on James ii. 21, Ἀβραὰμ . . . ἀνεγκας Ἰσαὰκ . . . ἐπὶ τὸ θυσιαστήριον : see Levit. xiv. 20 ; Heb. vii. 27. It is a word belonging to sacrifice, and not to be dissociated from it. In Isa. liii. 12, αὐτὸς ἁμαρτίας πολλῶν ἀνένεγκεν, [Heb. ix. 28,] we have the sense of bearing on Himself more prominent : and by that passage our rendering here must be regulated : always remembering that the other sense lies behind) in His [own] (this is almost required by the repetition of αὐτοῦ after αὐτός, when it might have been well omitted, if no emphasis had been intended) body on the tree (constr. prægn., “took them to the tree and offered them up on it ;” as the above sense of ἀνήνεγκεν necessitates. Cf. Vitringa in Huther : “Vix uno verbo ἔμφασις vocis ἀναφέρειν exprimi potest. Nota ferre et offerre. Primo dicere voluit Petrus, Christum portasse peccata nostra, in quantum illa ipsi erant imposita. Secundo, ita tulisse peccata nostra, ut ea secum obtulerit in altari. Respicit ad animantes, quibus peccata primo imponebantur, quique deinceps peccatis onusti offerebantur. Sed in quam aram ? ξύλον ait Petrus, lignum, h. e., crucem”); that (purpose of that great and crowning suffering of the Lord) having died (not, as some Commentators, “having past away,” being removed to a distance [“longefacti a peccatis,” Grot.], but literally, “having died :” so Herod. ii. 85, 136, μηδ’ ἄλλον μηδένα τῶν ἐαυτοῦ ἀπογενόμενον θάψαι : v. 4, vi. 58, and other examples in Raphel and Wetstein) to our sins (reff.), we should live to righteousness (the same contrast is found, but with another image, of being freed from, and become servants to, in Rom. vi. 18. In ib. ver. 11, where the same figure of death and life is used, it is νεκροὺς τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ, ζῶντας δὲ τῷ θεῷ), by whose stripe ye were healed (μάλωψ, the weal left by a stripe. From Isa. liii. 5, τῷ μάλωπι αὐτοῦ ἡμεῖς ἰάθημεν. “Paradoxon apostolicum : vibice sanati estis. Est autem μάλωψ, vibex, frequens in corpore servili, Sir. xxiii. 10.” Bengel). 25.] For (justification of the last assertion by another allusion to Isa. liii.) ye were straying like sheep (so in ref. Isa., πάντες ὡς πρόβατα ἐπλανήθημεν) : but ye have returned (not, “have been converted :” the 2 aor. pass. ἐπεστράφητε occurs often in a middle sense, and it is impossible to press the passive : cf. Matt. [ix. 22] x. 13 ; Mark v. 30. Wiesinger’s reason for doing so, that this word corresponds to ἰάθητε, is hardly tenable : it may with just as much plausibility be alleged that it corresponds to ἦτε πλανώμενοι) now unto the Shepherd (cf. ch. v. 4, and the prophecies in Isa. xl. 11 ; Ezek. xxxiv. 23, xxxvii. 24, also John x. 11) and Bishop (there may be a reference to Ezek. xxxiv. 11, ἰδοὺ ἐγὼ ἐκζητήσω τὰ πρόβατά μου καὶ ἐπισκέψομαι αὐτά [not to ref. Job, as some] : but the most likely account of the expression is, that the Apostle transfers the well-known name of the elders of the churches, ἐπίσκοποι, to the great Head of the Church, of whom they were all the servants and representatives. On the name and office, see notes, Acts xx. 17, 28 ; Phil. i. 1) of your souls (so in ch. i. 9, 22, and in ver. 11).

regard to the married state: and (1—6) to wives: (7) to husbands.

1.] In like manner (i. e. after the same general principle, enounced in ch. ii. 13, as the οἰκέται in their relation) wives (γυν., as οἱ οἰκέται, ch. ii. 18, οἱ ἄνδρες, ver. 7, is vocative. This is decisively shewn by ὑμῶν below, as in ver. 7. By the context γυναῖκες is shewn to be wives) in subjection to (the participle, as in ch. ii. 18: carrying on the general πάντας τιμήσατε) your own husbands (ἰδίοις gives point to the obligation, but is without any distinctive emphasis: see the parallel place, Eph. v. 22, and note), that even if (καὶ εἰ puts into climax the hypothesis: εἰ καὶ, only that which follows the καὶ, i. e. the fact assumed: see for the full elucidation of this, 1 Cor. vii. 21 note, and Winer, § 53. 7, Hermaun on Viger, p. 832, Klotz, Devar. ii. 519 f, Hartung i. p. 139; the views of Hermann and Klotz differing slightly from the above and Hartung, but coming to the same in the end. In this place, as De Wette remarks, καὶ εἰ assumes as possible, the apparently exceptional case which may seem to justify the wives' disobedience: εἰ καὶ would concede that the fact was so and direct notice to the fact itself) any (husbands) are disobedient to the word (in a state of unbelieving disobedience; most probably, though this is not directly nor necessarily assumed, heathens), they shall be won (see reff.: converted to faith and obedience: made a gain for Christian love, and for Christ Himself. Cf. Leighton: "A soul converted is gained to itself, gained to the pastor, or friend, or wife, or husband who sought it, and gained to Jesus Christ: added to His treasury, who thought not His own precious blood too dear to lay out for this gain." On ἵνα with an indic. fut., see Winer, § 41. b. 1. b: and cf. reff.) without word (with-horting them, but simply by your Christian behaviour. The grammarians call this way of speaking, in which a word [λόγου] is intentionally used in two different senses in the same sentence, antanaclassis. The other rendering, 'without the word,' is not indeed, as Wiesinger, precluded by the absence of the article, for λόγου, indefinite, might just as well, with the exclusive preposition ἄνευ, refer to the Gospel,—but on account of the general improbability of such a saying, seeing that faith is grounded on hearing, and hearing on the word of God. Besides which, the wives' conversation, being a shewing forth of obedience to the word, could not be said to produce its effect ἄνευ [τοῦ] λόγου. Ec. proposes a curious alternative rendering: ἄνευ λόγου, ἤτοι σχολάζοντος παντὸς λόγου καὶ πάσης ἀντιλογίας ἤ [then follows the interpretation as given above, but very well put] ὡς τῆς διὰ τῶν ἔργων ἐπιδείξεως κυριωτέρας οὐσης τῆς διὰ τῶν λόγων περιεργίας. ἄφωνον γὰρ ἔργον κρεῖσσον ἀπράκτου λόγου) by means of the behaviour of their wives,

2.] when they behold (lit. "having beheld:" the time of the ἐποπτεύσαι is slightly antecedent to that of κερδηθήσονται, but not enough to justify the use of the past. part. in English. On the verb, see reff.) your chaste behaviour (ἀγνήν, in the largest sense, not with its proper reference only: modest and pure) coupled with fear (so the E. V., admirably: conducted, led, maintained, in a spirit of reverence to your husbands, cf. Eph. v. 33, ἡ δὲ γυνὴ ἵνα φόβηται τὸν ἄνδρα. The connexion of words is τὴν ἐν φόβῳ | ἀγνήν ἀναστροφήν, not, as Huther, τὴν | ἐν φόβῳ ἀγνήν | ἀναστροφήν). 3.] Of whom (the wives; you, who are addressed) let [the adornment] be (much better so, supplying the word from κόσμος expressed below, than either, 1. as E. the word κόσμος expressed below as the subject, and supplying it after ἐξωθεν, which however comes to the same in sense, or, 2. as Huther, taking ὦν ἔστω as complete in itself, "let whose business be;" which is against not only probable construction, but the analogy of 1 Tim. v. 9, which see) not the outward adornment (ὁ ἐξωθεν κόσμος belong together, the intermediate words merely serving to define the κόσμος as that most usually adopted by women) of braiding of hair (cf. 1 Tim. ii. 9, μὴ ἐν πλέγμασιν, and Ellicott's note there) and putting round (the head, as diadems, or the arm, as bracelets, or the leg, as anklets, or the finger, as rings, or generally, hanging the body round with) of golden ornaments (χρυσίων, see ch. i. 7, 18, and note at the latter place) or of putting on of dresses ("the sex which began first our engagement to the necessity of clothing, having still a peculiar propensity to be curious in that, to improve the necessity to an advantage." The three verbal substantives, as Bengel, "inuunt operam comendi multa tempora absumentem"): 4.] but (rather let their adornment be) the hidden man of the heart (= ὁ ἔσω[θεν] ἄνθρωπος, see reff. Here, as Wies. well argues, it is not, as in ref. Rom., merely the inner man as distinguished from the outer man, which unbelievers have as well as believers: and that for this reason, that the κρυπτὸς ἄνθρωπος is not here that which is to be adorned, but is itself the adornment: and consequently is of necessity the regenerate life itself in its freshness and beauty. And this is designated as being τῆς καρδίας, a gen. of apposition,—consisting in the heart, changed, and lovely with Christian affections and graces), in (standing in, as its condition and element. No art. is needed before ἐν, because this clause is further descriptive, not of ἄνθρωπος, but of κόσμος) the incorruptible [ornament] (τῷ ἀφθάρτῳ, a concrete adj. used by preference over the abstract noun, apparently as contrasted with the concretes just mentioned) of the meek and quiet spirit ("mansuetus, qui non turbat: tranquillus, qui turbas aliorum fert placide. Bengel) which (viz. the meek and quiet spirit: not, as Grot. al., the whole preceding, ἀλλ' . . . πνεύματος, nor, as Bengel and Steiger, τὸ ἀφθαρτον). The art. before πραέος marks the antecedent to the ὅ in the sight of God ("qui interna, non externa spectat," Bengel) of great price (reff.: the word used for costly ointment and raiment). 5.] For (enforcing of the same by example) in this manner (i. e. with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit) formerly also (as well as you, if you obey) the holy women (ἄγναι, as in Luke i. 70; Acts iii. 21; Eph. iii. 5; women of blessed note in the sacred history as servants of God), who hoped (ἐλπίζουσαι, part. of the imperfect, according to Winer, § 45. 1: but is it not rather the indefinite pres. part. defining the quality or office, as ὁ σπειρων, ὁ πειράζων?) in God (i. e. whose hope was directed towards, and rested in, God. Bengel remarks, "vera sanctitas, spes in Deum: est hoc epitheton pars subjecti"), adorned themselves, being in subjection to their own husbands (this clause describes the state in which the adornment was put on, to which it belonged: being thus in subjection, they were adorned with the meek

 6.] As (e.g.) Sarah obeyed (aor. It refers to her whole course of obedience considered as a completed whole: cf. refl., and John xvii. 4) Abraham calling him lord (ref.: ὁ δὲ κύριός μου πρεσβύτερος): of whom ye have become (i. e. by your implanting through faith into the family of faithful Abraham. The aor. properly refers back to the precise time when they were so made; but cannot be so expressed in English) children, if (the connexion of the following participles is variously taken. The worst way is with Bengel, Ernesti, al. to suppose them in apposition with ὑποτασσόμεναι above, ὡς . . . τέκνα being in a parenthesis: for there is nothing in either of the participles which finds any historical justification in the history of the holy women. Didymus, al., understand them of the manner in which ye are to become Sarah's children: Harless, Wies., al., of the sign by which your having so become is to be known: but it is perhaps better to take them as the condition on which: and so most Commentators and virtually the E. V. "as long as," rendering literally the dum of Beza) ye do good, and are not afraid of any sudden fear (to what do these words allude? As in refl., they appear to be a citation from Prov.: where it is said to him that obeys the counsels of wisdom, οὐ φοβηθήσῃ πτόησιν ἐπελθοῦσαν, οὐδὲ ὄρμῶς ἀσεβῶν ἐπερχομένας. This passage, the coincidence with which can hardly be fortuitous, seems to point to the objective rather than the subjective sense of πτόησις, so that φοβεῖσθαι πτόησιν is not = φοβεῖσθαι φόβον, but πτόησις is some external cause of terror. And such a meaning would suit very well with the context, in which as in ver. 14, the Apostle is often encouraging his readers to bear affliction and persecution cheerfully. So that we may interpret πτόησιν with Est., "quod dum facitis, non est quod metuatis quidquam mali: velut, ne maritis vestris displiceatis, si minus corruptæ inceditis: aut ne serviliter vos tractent, si faciles ad obsequium vos præbeatis; ut solet sexus muliebris vasis pavoribus esse obnoxius. Sed et si forte nacti estis maritos iniquiores, silentio potius ac patientia, quam multis verbis studete eorum animos lenire." Cf. Luke xxi. 9; xxiv. 37. Huther quotes from Stephanns an extraordinary explanation, "jubentur mulieres officium facere etiam cum nullus eas metus constringit, i. e. sponte et ultro." And Ec., interpreting ἀγαθοποιούσαι of doing good deeds of benevolence, understands this of the wives not being afraid of the account which their [unbelieving] husbands would require of them: ἐλέημονας αὐτὰς εἶναι παραινέ, μηδὲν ὑποβλεπομένας τὸν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνδρῶν αὐτῶν διὰ τοῦτο ἐκλογισμὸν. See Winer, § 32. 2. b, who however interprets πτόησιν subjectively). With regard to the much-disputed question whether by the preceding injunction all ornament of dress is forbidden, or only the making such ornament the adorning, it may safely be left to the Christian wisdom of believing women, to be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is, in this as in other similar matters. Within the limits of propriety and decorum, the common usage is the rule. There is sin in singularity, both as ministering to pride in ourselves, and as giving offence to others and discommending our holy religion. As Leighton well says, "There may be in some an affected pride in the meanness of apparel; and in others, under either neat or rich attire, a very humble unaffected mind . . . 'Magnus qui fictilibus utitur tanquam argento; nec ille minor qui argento tanquam fictilibus,' says Seneca: Great is he who enjoys his earthenware as if it were plate, and not less great is the man to whom all his plate is no more than earthenware." 7.] Duty of husbands to their wives. Ye husbands in like manner (ὁμοίως, not as Est., Grot., Steiger, al., 'vicissim,' but referring back to the πάντας τιμήσατε ch. ii. 17: cf. τιμῆν below. This has not been seen, owing to inattention to the aor. there: even Huther, who interprets ὁμοίως rightly, that there is a certain τιμή due to the wife, as to the husband and the master before, does not connect the idea with the general precept under which all these are ranged) dwelling (συνοικεῖν is referred by the older expositors [e.g. Jerome contra Jov. i. 7, vol. ii. p. 248, Aug. in Ps. cxlvi., vol. iv. pt. ii., al.] to the 'tori conjugalis consuetudo:' but for this there seems no reason, as the word is often used of the whole conjugal life: so Kypke here, "connubio juncti vivant: ad totum respicit vitæ consortium, in quo justo copulati matrimonio vitam transigunt. Est hæc frequentior vocis notio, quæ apud Græcos antiquiores, ni fallor, sola occurrit. Demosth. in Neæram, p. 534, scopum τοῦ συνοικεῖν esse dicit, ut liberi gignantur legitimi et ingenui, et ab hoc distinguit τὸ ἐταίρας καὶ παλλακὰς ἔχειν") according to knowledge (in an intelligent and reasonable manner, well aware of the ἀσθένεια spoken of below: see refl.) with the feminine as with the weaker vessel (γυναικείῳ is an adj. not a subst. as Wahl: see refl. For σκεῦος, instrument, applied to the wife, see ref. 1 Thess. Here the man is a σκεῦος also; both being God's instruments in His beneficent work of the multiplication of mankind. The higher use of the word as a vessel of grace, or of wrath, does not preclude the lower one which is most obvious here, where the married relation is the subject of consideration. On ἀσθενεστέρῳ, Bengel says, "comparativus: etiam vir habet infirmitatem:" and so Steiger: but this is plainly not so: the word 'weaker' being used as comparing with something which is stronger, viz. the man. Some, as Luth., Calv., Beza, Est., Grot., Hamm., E. V., join these words, ὡς ἀσθενεστ. κ.τ.λ., with ἀπονέμοντες τιμὴν. But this mars the parallelism and the sense. For the Apostle prescribes two things: 1. consideration for the wife, as of the weaker sex: 2. honour for the wife, as a fellow-heir of the grace of life. (Ec. carries on the same idea, of not exacting too rigid accounts, as ou ver. 6: τουτέστιν, αἰσθησιν λαμβάνοντες τῆς τοῦ θήλεος κουφότητος καὶ τοῦ εὐπαραφόρου ἐν πᾶσι, καὶ εἰς μικροψυχίαν εὐολίσθου, μακρόθυμοι γίνεσθε πρὸς αὐτάς, μὴ λόγον ἀπαιτοῦντες πικρῶς τῶν κατὰ τὴν οἰκίαν αὐτῶν εἰς ταμείαν παρακατατιθέντων. But for this there does not seem any reason), giving (ἀπονέμειν, to apportion, see refl.) honour as to those who are also (besides being your wives) fellow-inheritors (with you) of the grace of life (i. e. God's gracious gift of life eternal: ch. i. 4, 13 suffice to clear the meaning, the former explaining κληρον., the latter, χάρις. So that χάρις ζωῆς must not be weakened into χάρις ζωῶσα with Erasmus, nor into χάρις ζωοποιούσα with Grot. The reading συγκληρονόμοι, which it is now proved that B has not, seems to have arisen from the mistaken joining of ὡς ἀσθ. κ.τ.λ. with ἀπονέμοντες τιμὴν: see var. readd.): in order that your prayers be not hindered (ἐγκόπτειν, ἐμποδίζειν, διακωλύειν, Hesych. The hindrance meant seems to be, that which would be occasioned by the man not giving his wife proper honour as a fellow-heir of the grace of life; in which case the peculiar promise of advantage in social united prayer would be lost: cf. Matt. xviii. 19. According to this view, the united prayers of man and wife are meant. And so most of the Commentators. Cf. Schol.-Matth., ὁ γὰρ περὶ τὴν οἰκίαν θόρυβος τῶν κατὰ θεὸν ἔργων ἐμπόδιον: and Lyra, "Cum vir et uxor non sunt bene concordæ, minus possunt orationi vacare, et eorum orationes sunt minus exaudibiles." De Wette understands it of losing the confidence requisite for [mutual?] prayer; Wiesinger, of the prayers of the husband alone. If ἐκκόπτεσθαι be read, it must be "be not cut off," see Rom. xi. 22, 24; 2 Cor. xi. 12).

8, 9.] General summary exhortations to mutual forbearance and love. 8.] Finally (τὸ τέλος, adverbial accusative, as μακράν, μάτην, ἀκμήν, τὴν ἀρχήν, John viii. 25, δωρεάν, &c. See Winer, § 32. 6. Ec. gives the connexion well: τί χρὴ ἰδιολογείσθαι; ἀπλῶς πᾶσι φημί τοῦτο γὰρ τέλος καὶ πρὸς τοῦτο πᾶσιν ὁ σκοπὸς ἀφορᾷ τῆς σωτηρίας, καὶ τοῦτο νόμος πᾶσιν ἀγάπης), all [being] (the adjectival construction still carried on) of one mind (reff.), sympathizing (συμπάθεια ὁ πρὸς τοὺς κακῶς πάσχοντας ὡς καὶ ἐφ' ἑαυτοῖς ἔλεος, Cc. But the meaning is not confined to cases of sorrow: the χαίρειν μετὰ χαιρόντων is also included), loving the brethren, compassionate (in classical Greek, of strong courage, lit. "of strong bowels," as in Hippocr. p. 89 c [Huther]; here, and in ref., as Bengel, "misericordes erga afflictos"), humble-minded (the word forms a note of transition to the next verse: humility being essential both to true gentleness of love and to true patience under injuries); 9.] not giving back evil for evil, or reproach for reproach ("non malum pro malo in factis injuriis, nec maledictum pro maledicto in verbis contentiosis." Lyra), may rather (the δέ sharpens the contrast more than ἀλλά: see above, on ch. ii. 23) on the contrary, blessing (scil., the evil doer or speaker. The word blessing, in E. V., is liable to be, and generally is, mistaken for the substantive εὐλογίαν): because to this end (viz. that which follows with ἵνα, as in ch. iv. 6: not as Cc., Grot., Calv., Steiger, De Wette, al., that which has gone before, which would leave a very lame connexion of the sentence: see below) ye were called (by God), that ye might inherit blessing ("qui cœleste regnum aliquando hereditare debent, illi sunt benedicti ac filii benedictionis, non solum passive sed etiam active, benedictionem spiritualem a Deo per fidem recipientes et vicissim aliis ex caritate benedicentes." Gerhard. And this is obviously the right connexion; for, as Wies. remarks, it is not in order to inherit a blessing that we must bless; but because our portion is, blessing: and the reasoning is much as in Eph. iv. 32, χαρίζομενοι ἑαυτοῖς καθὼς καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἐν χριστῷ ἐχαρίσατο ὑμῖν). 10.] For (the above exhortations are impressed by a citation from Ps. xxxiv. [xxxiii. LXX] 13—17. That the citation cannot, as De Wette maintains, apply directly to the last written words, is plain, by the verb κληρονομήσητε, necessarily referring to the future life, whereas the blessings promised in the Psalm as necessarily refer to the present. So that we must connect the citation mainly with the εὐλογοῦντες, and if we take in the intermediate clause, it must be only secondarily, as connecting, generally, blessing with blessing) he who desireth to love life (the citation is curiously divergent from the LXX, and very difficult to understand. The LXX have, τίς ἐστιν ἄνθρωπος ὁ θέλων ζῶν, ἀγαπᾶν ἡμέρας ἀγαθὰς; Here all is plain: whereas θέλων ζῶν ἀγαπᾶν is hardly intelligible. Commentators have endeavoured to make it so by introducing some foreign idea into one or other of the verbs: thus the 'glossa interlinearis,' De Wette, al., "qui vult ostendere, se dilectionem habere:?" Bengel and Steiger, "qui vult ita vivere, ut ipsum non tædeat vita." Huther, understanding ζῶν of the future life, "He that will love life," seeing that the love of life, in this sense, is dependent on a certain moral relation of man and is impossible without love. But if we are to take the words as they stand, and not rather regard them as another way of expressing the same as in the Psalm, it may well be, "He that loves life and wishes to continue to do so") and to see (reff.) good days, let him refrain (the LXX proceed in the 2nd person, παῦσον . . . σου. The case supposed would generally occur when some one invested with authority asked a reason: and the complexion of the answer to be given is taken from that circumstance. On the injunction, Luther says, speaking from his own experience at Worms and elsewhere, "Then must ye not answer with proud words and bring out the matter with a defiance and with violence as if ye would tear up trees, but with such fear and lowliness as if ye stood before God's tribunal . . . so must thou stand in fear, and not rest on thine own strength, but on the word and promise of Christ," Matt. x. 19 f. Considering St. Peter's love of antanaclasis [using the same term in two meanings], of which we have already had several examples, e. g. vv. 9, 14, 15, I have no hesitation in applying the παθεῖν περὶ ἁμαρτιῶν the one time to Christ, the other to ourselves, though His suffering for sin, and ours, are two very different things. He, the sinless One, suffered περὶ ἀμαρτιῶν, for sins; as a sacrifice for sin, as a sinner, made sin for us, dying the death of a criminal: we, though not sinless, yet ἀγαθοποιῶντες, are to suffer if God's will so will it, περι ἀμαρτιῶν, for sins which we are supposed to have committed, and as sinners. To miss this, is to miss one of the cardinal points of the comparison) once ("from this ἄπαξ, through the καί," as has been beautifully said [Besser, in Wies.], "a beam of comforting light falls on the sufferings of Christians." He suffered once: His sufferings are summed up and passed away: He shall suffer no more. And we are suffering ἄπαξ: it shall be soon so thought of and looked back upon. For this reason doubtless, and not as Ec. to shew τὸ τοῦ παθόντος δραστήριον τε καὶ δυνατόν, nor as Pott, al., to contrast the sufferings of Christ as in Heb. x. 1, 2, with the often-repeated sacrifices of the O. T., is ἄπαξ inserted), a just person (δίκαιος is purely predicative: not as E. V. 'the just,' which again loses the point of comparison) on behalf of unjust persons (this again, though the resembling tints are beginning somewhat to fade off, is another point of comparison: He suffered, just, righteous, ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων: He represented; He was offered for, the unjust, the unrighteous: and so we in our turn, though in a far less deep and proper meaning, when we, being δίκαιοι [ver. 12], suffer as ἀδικοί, though not in any propitiatory sense ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων. We have similar uncertainty and play of meaning where the same subject is treated Rom. vi. 10, 11, τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ ἀπέθανεν . . . ἢ τῷ θεῷ, οὕτως καὶ ὑμεῖς λογίζεσθε ἐάντους νεκροὺς μὲν εἶναι τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ, ζῶντας δὲ τῷ θεῷ: where the two expressions, though they have a common meaning of small extent, are in their widest and most important references of necessity widely divergent), that (with this ἵνα we leave the comparison, as far as suffering is concerned, returning to it presently for a moment with the θανατωθεὶς, and pass up to the μακαριότης of His innocent suffering, and to that which makes it so glorious and precious to us, as the ground of all our blessedness in suffering) He might bring us near to God ("ut nos, qui abalienati fueramus, ipse abiens ad Patrem, secum una, justificatos adduceret in cælum, ver. 22, per eodsem gradus quos ipse emensus est, exinanitionis et exaltationis. Ex hoc verbo Petrus, usque ad cap. iv. 6, penitus connectit Christi et fidelium iter sive processum [quo etiam ipse sequebatur Dominum, ex ejus prædictione, Joh. xiii. 36] infidelitatem multorum et pœnam innectens." Bengel: who also remarks on τῷ θεῷ, "Deo id volenti. Plus notatur per dativum quam si diceretur ad Deum"), put to death (this participial clause conditions the ἵνα προσαγάγη, giving the manner of that bringing us near to God) indeed in the flesh (of this there can be no doubt, and in this assertion there is no difficulty. σαρκί is adverbial; it was thus, in this region, under these conditions, that the death on the cross was inflicted: His flesh, which was living flesh before, became dead flesh: Christ Jesus, the entire complex Person, consisting of body, soul, and spirit, was put to death σαρκί), but made alive [again] in the spirit (here there may seem to be difficulty: but the difficulty will vanish, if we guide ourselves simply and carefully by the former clause. 'Quod ad carnem,' the Lord was put to death: 'quod ad spiritum,' He was brought to life [for this, and not "remained alive," must be insisted on as the meaning of ἐζωοποιήθη]. His flesh was the subject, recipient, vehicle, of inflicted death: His spirit was the subject, recipient, vehicle, of restored life. But here let us beware, and proceed cautiously. What is asserted is not that the flesh died and the Spirit was made alive; but that 'quoad' the flesh the Lord died, 'quoad' the Spirit He was made alive. He, the God-man Christ Jesus, body and soul, ceased to live in the flesh, began to live in the Spirit; ceased to live a fleshly mortal life, began to live a spiritual resurrection life. His own Spirit never died, as the next verse shews us. "This is the meaning, that Christ by His sufferings was taken from the life which is flesh and blood, as a man on earth, living, walking, and standing in flesh and blood and He is now placed in another life and made alive according to the Spirit, has passed into a spiritual and supernatural life, which includes in itself the whole life which Christ now has in soul and body, so that He has no longer a fleshly but a spiritual body." Luther. And Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. l. 336, says, "It is the same who dies and the same who is again made alive, both times the whole Man Jesus, in body and soul. He ceases to live, in that that, which is to His Personality the medium of action, falls under death; and He begins again to live, in that He receives back this same for a medium of His action again. The life which fell under death was a fleshly life, that is, such a life as has its determination to the present condition of man's nature, to the externality of its mundane connexion. The life which was won back is a spiritual life, that is, such a life as has its determination from the Spirit, in which consists our inner connexion with God." It is impossible, throughout this difficult and most important passage, to report all the various shades of difference of opinion which even the greater expositors have given us. I shall indicate only those which are necessary to be mentioned as meanings to be distinguished from that which I advocate, or as errors likely to fall constantly under the eye of my readers. Of this latter class is the rendering of the E. V. here, "by the Spirit," which is wrong both grammatically and theologically: the explanation of Ec., Calov., al., τουτέστιν ἀναστὰς ἐκ νεκρῶν τῇ τῆς θεότητος δυνάμει: ἀνέστη γὰρ ἐκ νεκρῶν οὐχ ὡς ἄνθρωπος, ἀλλ' ὡς θεός: and that of Grot. that πνεύματι = ἐκ δυνάμεως θεοῦ, 2 Cor. xiii. 4): 19.] in which (viz. πνεύματι, in the spirit, according to which His new life was ἐν ᾧ, not simply ᾧ this time: see below) He also went and preached (πορευθεῖς of a local transference here, just as below in ver. 22, πορευθεὶς εἰς οὐρανόν: and ἐκίηρυσεν of a preaching good news, nearly = εὐηγγελίσαστο, as in all other places of the N. T.) to the spirits in prison (the disembodied spirits, which were kept shut up [Jude 6: 2 Pet. ii. 4] in the place of the departed awaiting the final judgment: in Scheol, as Syr.), 20.] which were once disobedient (this clause is a secondary and dependent one, descriptive of the spirits intended: that they were those of men who were formerly disobedient) when (ὅτε marks distinctively the time intended by the ποτὲ) the longsuffering of God was waiting (and this marks the period of their disobedience, viz. those 120 years of Gen. vi. 3. ἀπεξεδέχετο, imperf.: the ἀπ- betokening the full time during which it was exercised. "Expectabat donec expectandi finis erat." Beng.) in the days of Noah while the ark (κιβωτοῦ anathrous as the well-known name for the ark in the LXX) was being prepared, in which (pregn. constr., "by having entered into which:" not "into which," see below) a few persons, that is eight souls (individuals: ψυχαί, as being in the body: the distinction may be noted here, but is not always kept: the disembodied are ψυχαί in Rev. vi. 9, xx. 4) were saved (from drowning) by water (not, "into which a few, &c. got safe through the water," which was not the fact. The water is in the Apostle's view the medium of saving, inasmuch as it bore up the ark: cf. the next verse: or it may be, and so Bengel, Steiger, De Wette, Huther, "through [the] water"). So much for the exegesis of the detail of this passage; from which it will be seen that we have regarded it, in common with the majority of Commentators, as necessarily pointing to an event in our Lord's redemptive agency which happened, as regards time, in the order of the context here: and that that event was, His going (whether between His death and resurrection, or after the latter, will be presently discussed) to the place of custody of departed spirits, and there preaching to those spirits, which were formerly disobedient when God's longsuffering waited in the days of Noah. Thus far I conceive our passage stands committed: and I do not believe it possible to make it say less, or other, than this. What was the intent of that preaching, and what its effect is not here revealed; the fact merely is stated. The statement of the fact, however, has been felt to be accompanied by such great difficulties, that other meanings have been sought for the passage than that which the words present at first sight. Expositors have endeavoured to remove the idea that the gospel was preached to the dead in Hades, either, 1. by denying the reference to our Lord's descent thither at all, or, 2. by admitting that, but supposing it to have had another purpose. I give, following the classification in Huther's note, an account of the principal upholders of these views. Under I., I place all those who deny any reference to Christ's descent into Hades, distinguishing the minor differences between them as to what κήρυγμα is there indicated.

I. 1. Augustine, Bede, Thos. Aquinas, Lyra, Hammond, Beza, Scaliger, Leighton, Horneius, Gerhard, al., and recently Hofmann, Schriftbeweis ii. 1. 335—341, maintain that the κήρυγμα was the preaching of righteousness by Noah to his contemporaries: that Noah thus preached not of himself, but by virtue of the Spirit of Christ inspiring him; and that thus his preaching was in fact a preaching by Christ in the Spirit. So, e. g. Augustine, Ep. 164 [99], vol. ii., suggests, that the "spiritus conclusi in carcere" may be "animæ quæ tunc erant in carne, atque ignorantia tenebris velut carcere clauderantur." Also that Christ had not indeed come in the flesh, but from the beginning of the race came from time to time to convict the evil, to console the good, or to admonish both. For this He came not in flesh, but in spirit, i. e. in substantia Deitatis. But he qualifies this by asking, "Quid facit Filius sine Spiritu Sancto, vel sine Patre, cum inseparabilia sint omnia opera Trinitatis?" But this arbitrary interpretation of φυλακή = "caro, et ignorantia tenebræ," is not common to all the supporters of this view. Beza represents a large class: "Christus . . . jam olim in diebus Noe . . . prædicavit spiritibus illis, qui nunc in carcere meritas dant penas, utpote qui recta momenti Noe . . . parere olim recensarint." Thus Scaliger, Horneius, al.: and Hofmann, except that he joins ποτέ with πορευθείς ἐκήρυξεν, not with ἀπειθήσασιν. It must be evident to every unprejudiced scholar, how alien such an interpretation is from the plain meaning and connexion of the words and clauses. Not a word is indicated by St. Peter on the very far-off lying allusion to the fact that the Spirit of Christ preached in Noah: not a word, here, on the fact that Noah himself preached to his contemporaries. Again, the same subject χριστός runs through the whole, without a hint, that we are dealing with historical matter of fact in ἔπαθεν, θανατωθείς, ζωοποιηθείς, and with recondite figure in πορευθείς ἐκήρυξεν. Again, whether we take the metaphorical φυλακή of Aug., which I suppose will find hardly any advocates, or the τοῖς νῦν ἐν φυλακῇ of Beza, al., it cannot surely be doubted that we are equally putting force on the Apostle's words, and that the τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν must describe the local condition of the πνεύματα at the time when the preaching took place. Moreover πορευθείς, as compared with ver. 22 (which Hofmann gets most lamely over, by saying that it presents no greater difficulty than the statement that Christ accompanied the Israelites through the wilderness in 1 Cor. x. 4: to which we may answer, If this were a plain statement involving such an application of the word, we might then discuss the intelligibility of it)—the part. ἀπειθήσασιν, marked off by the ποτέ as not belonging to the same time as the ἐκήρυξεν (which Hofmann shews he feels, by his impracticable attempt to connect ποτέ with ἐκήρυξεν), shew, as plainly as words can shew, that we are reading of some act of Christ which He then, at the time described, went and did, with reference to spirits who were, at some other time (ποτέ) specified (ὅτε), in a certain state (ἀπειθήσασιν). And, which has not been sufficiently noticed, a crowning objection to this view is the use of the word πνεύμασιν, connecting ἐν ᾧ (πνεύματι) our Lord's state, with the state of those to whom He preached: a word only used of men when departed out of this life (ref.).

I. 2. Several Commentators, principally Socinian, but also Vorst., Grot., Schöttgen, al., understand by τὰ ἐν φυλ. πν. either the Gentiles, or the Jews ("sub jugo legis existentes") and Gentiles ("sub potestate diaboli jacentes:" so in both cases, Schöttg. and Amelius) together, and by ἐκήρυξεν the preaching of the Spirit of Christ by the Apostles. These expositors take the mention of the disobedient in Noah's time to be merely by way of sample of the disobedient in all time, or, at least, in the time when the Apostle was writing. So Grot.: "adjungere voluit Petrus similitudinem a temporibus Noe, ut ostendat quanto res nunc melius per Christum quam tunc per Noen processerit." As Huther well says, "How this interpretation heaps on caprice upon caprice, need not be shewn." I will add, that its fautors do not appear to attempt to justify it philologically, as indeed it is plain they cannot. Every word of every clause protes's against it.

II. We now come to those who understand the passage of our Lord's descent into Hades, but, offended by the idea of the possibility of salvation being opened to spirits of the disobedient kept awaiting judgment, diverge from one another and from the 'prima facie' explanation.

II. 1. Flacius, Calov., Buddæus, Wolf, Aretius, al., understand τὰ ἐν φυλ. πν. of souls awaiting condemnation, but explain ἐκήρυξεν of announcing, not salvation, but condemnation. So Hollaz (in Huther),—"fuit prædicatio Christi in inferno non evangelica, quæ hominibus tantum in regno gratiæ annuntiatur, sed legalis, elenctica, terribilis, eaque tum verbalis, qua ipsos æterna supplicia promeritos esse convincit, tum realis, qua immanem terrorem iis incussit." But, besides that κηρύσσειν, as remarked above, has, as applied to Christ and His Apostles, but the one meaning of preaching the good tidings of salvation,—besides the utter superfluity of such a 'concio damnatoria' to spirits already reserved to damnation,—what a context would such a meaning give, in the midst of a passage intended to convey consolation and encouragement by the blessed consequences of Christ's sufferings! See this well insisted on in Wiesinger's careful discussion of the opinions on our passage, p. 241.

II. 2. Some of the Fathers, as Iren. (iv. 27. 2, p. 264; v. 31. 1, p. 331; al.; see Stieren's Index, p. 1017), Tertullian, Hippolytus,—the Schoolmen, Zwingle, Calvin, al., explain ἐκήρυξεν rightly, of announcing salvation, but regard τὰ ἐν φυλ. πνεύματα as the spirits of the just, especially of the O. T. saints. The most extraordinary instance of this class of interpreters is Calvin, who explains φυλακή to mean "specula, sive ipse excubandi actus:" and the spirits in φυλακή are, according to him, those which were in waiting for Christ's salvation: "piæ animæ in spem salutis promissæ intentæ, quasi eminentiam eam considerarent." Then he proceeds, "Postquam dixit, Christum se mortuis manifestasse, mox addit: quum increduli fuissent olim; quo significat, nihil nocuisse sanctis patribus quod impiorum multitudine pæne obruti fuerint:" and regards this consideration as one calculated to console the believers, few as they were in the midst of the ungodly world. And having thus interpreted, he ingenuously confesses, "Discrepat, factor, ab hoc sensu Græca syntaxis; debuerat enim Petrus, si hoc vellet, genitivum absolutum ponere. Sed quia apostolis novum non est liberius casum unum ponere alterius loco, et videmus Petrum hic confuse multas res simul coacervare, nec vero aliter aptus sensus elici poterat: non dubitavi ita resolvere orationem implicitam, quo intelligerent lectores, alios vocari incredulos, quam quibus prædicatum fuisse evangelium dixit." A sentence to be well remembered for many reasons.

II. 3. Suarez, Estius, Bellarmine, Luther (on Hos. iv. 2, anno 1545, quoted in Bengel), Peter Martyr, Bengel, al., assume that the words refer, not to all the unbelievers of Noah's time, but only to those who repented at the last moment when the flood was upon them. "Probabile est," says Bengel, "nonnullos ex tanta multitudine, veniente pluvia, respissare: cumque non credidissent dum exspectaret Deus, postea cum arca structa esset et pœna ingrueret, credere cœpisse: quibus postea Christus, eorumque similibus, se præconem gratiæ præstiterit."

II. 4. Athanasius, Ambrose, Erasmus, Calvin (Instit. ii. 16. 9), hold both kinds of prædication, the 'evangelica' to the spirits of the just, the 'damnatoria' to those of the disobedient.

One or two singular interpretations do not fall under any of the above classes: e. g. Marcion maintained that the preaching of Christ was to those whom the O. T. calls ungodly, but who were in reality better than the O. T. saints; Clem-alex. (Strom. vi. 6, p. 7€2 P.), that they were the δίκαιοι κατὰ φιλοσοφίαν, who were nevertheless imprisoned under idolatry.

It remains that we should enquire, whether this preaching to the imprisoned spirits by our Lord, took place between His death and His resurrection, or after the latter. The answer will very much depend on the sense which we give to ἐν φ̄. The argument which Wiesinger so much insists on, that the clauses must come in chronological sequence, will not determine for us; because ἐν φ̄ καὶ . . . might very well be a taking up again of πνεύματι, recapitulating some former act also done in the Spirit: qu. d. "put to death in the flesh, but made alive in the Spirit,—that Spirit in which also, ere He was made alive with the full resurrection life, He" &c. And this I incline to think the sense of the passage: ἐν φ̄ referring not to the complex resurrection life, but properly and strictly to the Spirit, in which the Lord never ceased to be, even when His complex life of body and soul was dissolved. And Wiesinger is in fact assuming too much, when he says that "Christ ζωοποιήθεις πνεύματι" is the subject of the sentence: that subject is simply χριστός from ver. 18, of whatever period we understand this act. When again Wiesinger says that πορευθ. ἐκέρυξεν cannot be understood of the time intermediate, because in no case can we think of our Lord's state in death in dualistic wise, so that while His body was held by the bands of death, His Spirit should be carrying on the Messianic work,—I answer, why not? Surely the reply to the penitent thief implies a πορευθῆναι, and in that πορευθῆναι a joy and triumph sufficient to be the subject of a consoling promise at that terrible moment. And might not the reasoning be turned, with as much propriety? Might not we say that it is impossible to conceive of our Lord during that time as other than employed in the Spirit in which He continued, not to exist merely, but to live? That, granted that His dying words imply a special delivering of his Spirit into the hands of his Father, and by consequence, a resting of his Spirit in those Hands in the death-state,—yet must we not conceive of His Spirit as going thither, where "the righteous souls are in the hand of God?" And if so, who shall place a limit to His power or will to communicate with any departed spirits of whatever character? So that, while I would not say that the conditions of the passage are not satisfied by the supposition that the event happened after the Resurrection, I believe there can be no reason for saying that they are not, on the other hypothesis. And I own, that the ἐν φ̄ καὶ inclines me to this other. It seems most naturally to be taken as a resumptive explanation of πνεύματι with a view to something (ver. 21) which is to follow; and the ἐν, capable indeed of being otherwise explained, yet seems to favour this idea,—that the Lord was strictly speaking ἐν πνεύματι when that happened which is related.

From all then which has been said, it will be gathered, that with the great majority of Commentators, ancient and modern, I understand these words to say, that our Lord, in His disembodied state, did go to the place of detention of departed spirits, and did there announce His work of redemption, preach salvation in fact, to the disembodied spirits of those who refused to obey the voice of God when the judgment of the flood was hanging over them. Why these rather than others are mentioned,—whether merely as a sample of the like gracious work on others, or for some special reason unimaginable by us, we cannot say. It is ours to deal with the plain words of Scripture, and to accept its revelations as far as vouchsafed to us. And they are vouchsafed to us to the utmost limit of legitimate inference from revealed facts. That inference every intelligent reader will draw from the fact here announced: it is not purgatory, it is not universal restitution; but it is one which throws blessed light on one of the darkest enigmas of the divine justice: the cases where the final doom seems infinitely out of proportion to the lapse which has incurred it. And as we cannot say to what other cases this κῆρυγμα may have applied, so it would be presumption in us to limit its occurrence or its efficacy. The reason of mentioning here these sinners, above other sinners, appears to be, their connexion with the type of baptism which follows. If so, who shall say, that the blessed act was confined to them? The literature of the foregoing passage is almost a library in itself. The principal Commentators have given accounts more or less complete, of the history of its interpretation. The most concise and comprehensive is that in De Wette's Handbuch.

21, 22.] The persons and the things compared must be carefully borne in mind. The ὄλγιοι in Noah's day were saved by water; we also are saved by water. The ἀντίτυπον to that water on which the ark floated, saving its inmates, is the water of baptism; but as ours is a spiritual, not a material rescue, so the ἀντίτυπον is not the washing of our flesh by that water,—the form in which it is applied to us, as the bearing up their ark was the form in which their water was applied to them,—but a far nobler thing, the clearness and purity of our inner consciousness towards God: and this saving power of the water of baptism in our case is by virtue of the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, into whose death and resurrection we are baptized. Thus by our very profession we are united to Him in sufferings as in glory. He through His innocent sufferings has glorified suffering and death, even in death working mercy, and now exalted as our Head above all principality and power. The course of thought is unusual, is startling, is mysterious; but it is not unaccountable, it is not arbitrary. From the mention of the spiritual nature of our Lord's resurrection life, arises the mention of His blessed employ even in that state of the pure spirit to which His sufferings brought Him: from that mention comes the connexion of a great type of that day of Noah with our share, by baptismal union with Christ, in His salvation and triumphs; by which thoughts the final point is reached, His utmost exaltation through suffering, our union with and following of Him. Having said thus much on the whole connexion, we can now go into the details.

ἕδωρ: not βάπτισμα, which does not come in till the end of the clause: nor, the whole fact announced in ver. 20. The construction is somewhat involved by the close connexion of the thing signifying and the thing signified. The ἕδωρ to which ὅ refers is not, as Huther, al., the water of Noah's flood, but water, generally, the common term between the type and antitype) the antitype [of that] (ἀντίτυπον, adj. antitypal: the corresponding particular in both cases: the word does not contain in itself any solution of the question which of the two, the τύπος or that which is ἀντίτυπον to it, is the original: in ref., from the context, the τύπος is the primitive, the ἀντίτυπον the representative: here, from the context, it is vice versa: this need not however be expressed, but left to be understood) is now saving (pres., the rescue not being as yet fully accomplished. We are as yet διασωζόμενοι δι' ἕδατος) you also (as well as them. Then this assertion having been made, follows the parenthetical explanation, that the method of saving in the ἀντίτυπον is not material, as in the type), even baptism (not, the water of baptism: the parenthesis following is a kind of protest against such a rendering:—but, water, in the form of baptism, become to us baptism. Water is the common term: water saves in both cases. It saved them, becoming to them a means of floating their ark and bearing them harmless: it saves us, becoming to us baptism: and that baptism not material, but spiritual); not putting away of the filth of the flesh (σαρκός, placed first for emphasis, see Winer, § 30. 3, note, 4. b; removing the baptism spoken of altogether out of the realm of carnal washings: q. d. "not fleshly putting away of filth." σαρκός cannot be the gen. subj. as Bengel, "carni adscribitur depositio sordium:" it is the gen. possessive governed by ῥύπου. It is possible that the Apostle may have special reference to the unavailing nature of the Jewish washings, as Justin Martyr, Tryph. § 14, p. 114, τί γὰρ ὕφελος ἐκέινου τοῦ βαπτίσματος ὃ τὴν σάρκα καὶ μόνον τὸ σῶμα φαιδρύνει; βαπτίσθητε τὴν ψυχὴν), but enquiry of a good conscience after God (i. e. the seeking after God in a good and pure conscience, which is the aim and end of the Christian baptismal life. This is the sense of ἐπερωτᾶν εἰς, in the only place where it occurs in Scripture, viz. 2 Kings xi. 7 LXX, καὶ ἐπηρώτησεν Δαυὶδ εἰς εἰρήνην Ἰωάβ, καὶ εἰς εἰρήνην τοῦ λαοῦ, καὶ εἰς εἰρήνην τοῦ πολέμου. On this view, συνειδ. ἀγ. is gen. subj.,—the enquiry which a good conscience makes. Very various have been the interpretations. (Ec. goes wrong, in saying συνειδήσεως ἀγαθῆς τῆς εἰς θεόν, ἦτοι κατὰ θεόν: for εἰς θεόν must by the requirement of the sentence be joined to ἐπερώτημα. His explanation of ἐπερώτημα is ἀρβαβών, ἐνέχυρον, ἀπόδειξις. This is taking the juristic sense of ἐπερώτημα, which prevailed in Byzantine Greek, of a stipulation or contract. And so in the main. Aretius, al., and recently De Wette and Huther understand the word of the questions asked in baptism, ἀποτάσση τῷ Σατανᾷ; ἀποτάσσομαι συντάσση τῷ χριστῷ; συντάσσομαι: and make συνειδ. ἀγ. a gen. object., pledge of a good conscience, i. e. to maintain a good conscience. But there does not appear to be any justification in Scripture, or in the usage of the time, of this sense of the word ἐπερώτημα: and εἰς θεόν would hardly occur in this sense: we have in the similar case of διαθήκη, oftenest a dative following [2 Kings v. 3], then πρὸς [2 Kings iii. 13], μετὰ [2 Kings iii. 12], ἀνὰ μέσον [3 Kings v. 12]; but never εἰς. Again, many understand, the request of a good conscience: so Bengel. "Salvat ergo nos rogatio bonæ conscientiæ, i. e. rogatio qua nos Deum compellamus cum bona conscientia, peccatis remissis et depositis, cf. ver. 16, et Hebr. x. 22. Hæc rogatio in baptismo datur et in omnibus fidei, preem, vitæque christianæ actibus exercetur." This same meaning of ἐπερώτημα is taken in the main by Wiesinger, making however συνειδ. a gen. object., "prayer [or, desire] to God for a good conscience?" so also Seb. Schmidt, Hofmann, Weiss. The objection to all these is, that they do not justify the expression as applied to the saving force of baptism: as indeed neither entirely does the meaning which I have given above: but where all explanations were unsatisfactory, I thought it best to adopt one which strictly keeps to the Scripture usage of the words, being at the same time full as good as any of the others in its contextual application),—by means of the resurrection of Jesus Christ (with what are these words to be joined? Grot., with others, connects them with the immediately preceding: "hæc bonæ conscientiæ sponso venit ex fide de resurrectione Christi." So also Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. 2, p. 167, saying, "By means of the resurrection of Christ, as the removal of sin once for all for all mankind, it is, that in baptism the prayer for a good conscience is directed to God." But as Wies. objects, it is surely allotting too insignificant a part to these words, to make them merely assign the method in which the prayer is heard. Most Commentators have joined them with σώζει, regarding the intervening sentence as parenthetical. Thus taken, the words refer back to ζωοποιηθεὶς πνεύματι in ver. 18, conducting on the course of thought with regard to Christ and to ourselves: His resurrection, and entrance into His kingdom, giving us, by Him, a living part in Him, and entrance also into His kingdom by means of His appointed sacrament of Holy Baptism, spiritually received. Steiger endeavours to combine both connexions, but this evidently cannot be): 22.] who and supramundane powers, but distinguished from them by being Himself at God's right hand. On the whole subject of Christ's exaltation, see Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. 1, pp. 370—407), angels and authorities and powers (the whole heavenly hierarchy, as in Col. ii. 10—15) being subjected to Him. And thus is announced the glorious completion of the result of Christ's voluntary and innocent sufferings: glorious for Himself, and glorious for us, who are by baptism united to Him. And now the practical inference for us follows.

CHAP. IV. 1—6.] Exhortation, after the forecited example of Christ's sufferings, to entire separation from the ungodly Gentile world. This passage closes the set of exhortations which began at ch. ii. 11, with reference to behaviour towards the heathen world around: and with ch. iv. 7, begins a new and concluding set, no longer regarding the world without. 1.] Christ then having suffered according to the flesh (see on σαρκὶ above, ch. iii. 18. This conclusion takes up again the ὅτι καὶ χριστὸς ἔπαθεν there, which led to the enlarging on the result of those His sufferings as regarded both Himself and us), do ye also arm yourselves with (put on as armour) the same mind (intent, resolution; scil., to suffer in the flesh, as He did. That this is the sense, is shewn, it appears to me, decisively by καὶ ὑμεῖς and τὴν αὐτήν. Those who, as Calv., Beza, Gerh., Beng., Erasm. Schmid, Wiesinger, al, take ἐννοίαν for 'thought,' and render the following ὅτι, 'that,' can give no adequate interpretation either to καὶ ὑμεῖς or to τὴν αὐτήν. The sentence, for them, stands as if it were ταύτην ἐννοίαν ὀπλίσασθε, ὅτι. . . . And when obtained, the expression, meaning only 'remember, that,' is surely mere rhetorical inflation. Wiesinger denies that ἐννοία ever means "intent" or "resolution;" and refers to Passow to justify his denial. But in Palm and Rost's edn., the meaning gesinnung is given, and borne out by Eur. Hel. 1026, ἰκετεύετε . . . "Ἦρας δὲ τὴν ἔννοιαν ἐν ταῦτῳ μένειν, ἣν ἐς σὲ καὶ σὺν πόσιν ἔχει σωτηρίας: Isocr. p. 112 D, —οὐ γὰρ [οἱ θεοὶ] αὐτόχειρες οὔτε τῶν ἀγαθῶν οὔτε τῶν κακῶν γίγνονται τῶν συμβαινόντων αὐτοῖς [τοῖς ἀνθρώποις], ἀλλ' ἐκάστοις τοιαύτην ἔννοιαν ἔμποιοῦσιν, ὥστε δι' ἀλήλων ἡμῖν ἐκάτερα παραγίγνεσθαι τούτων: Diodor. Sic. ii. 30 says of the Chaldeans, that they regard the planets as ἐρμηνεύοντες τοῖς ἀνθρώποις τὴν τῶν θεῶν ἔννοιαν [var. εἴνοιαν]. The meaning then is, "arm yourselves also with the same purpose as that which was in Christ"; because (the ὅτι assigns a reason for the expression τὴν αὐτὴν ἔννοιαν ὀπίσασθε: "and ye will need this arming, because, the course of suffering according to the flesh which ye have to undergo ending in an entire freedom from sin, your warfare with sin must be begun and carried on from this time forward") he that hath suffered according to the flesh is made to cease from sin (if actively expressed, the sentence, as Huther remarks, would be τὸ πάσχειν [rather τὸ παθεῖν] πέπαυκεν αὐτὸν ἀμαρτίας: he is, by the very fact of having thus suffered, brought to an end with sin—has no more to do with it: and by an inference, the suffering in the flesh, and the being made to cease from sin, are commensurate in their progress. Commonly, πέπαυται is taken in a middle sense, and παθῶν made = πάσχων: but neither of these is justifiable. On the sense see Rom. vi. 7, ὁ γὰρ ἀποθανὼν δεδικαίωται ἀπὸ τῆς ἀμαρτίας. Here too there is surely throughout, though Weiss denies it, a presupposition of our being united to the sufferings of Christ, and not merely, 'quoad' ourselves, πάσχοντες σαρκί, but by virtue of union with Him, τῷ παθόντι, παθόντες and so divorced from all sin. That this sentence itself is general, and not to be understood in itself of Christ, is plain: equally plain, that He is the person hinted at in the background, and with reference to whom the general truth is adduced. The general assertion itself, here and in Rom. i. c., is enthymematic, resting on the fact that the flesh is the element of sin, and he that has mortified it by suffering has in the same proportion got rid of sin): 2.] with a view (εἰς τό depends on ὀπίσασθε, the intermediate general sentence being parenthetical) no longer (μηκέτι, subjective) by the lusts of men (as your rule: what is called the normal dative: not, as Wies. al., = δικαιοσύνη ζήσωμεν, ch. ii. 24: cf. Rom. vi. 10—13: this βιώσαι κ.τ.λ. is a very different matter from ζῆν in those places. ἀνθρώπων, put forward for contemptuous emphasis, as opposed to θεοῦ, which gains more majesty by not being thus put forward. What the lusts are, is shewn in ver. 3), but by the will of God (according to that which God wills, as your rule) to live (the 2 aor. βιώσαι is more common) the rest of your time in the flesh (cf. τὸν τῆς παροικίας ἡμῶν χρόνον, ch. i. 17. Observe ἐν σαρκί here, not σαρκί,—of the actual matter-of-fact element, in which we corporeally live and move for a certain time). 3.] For (follows on τὸν ἐπίλοιπον χρόνον: "I say, the rest of the time, for the past time surely" &c.) sufficient is the past time ("μείωσις. Nam ne pristina quidem tempora debuere peccatis teri. Fastidium peccati apud resipiscentes." Bengel) to have wrought out (κατεργάζομαι cannot always be pressed in the sense of "to work out to an end," as distinguished from ἐργάζομαι: but this sense may fairly be insisted on here. The perf. implies that the course is closed and done, and looked back on as a standing and accomplished fact) the will of the Gentiles (that which the Gentiles βούλονται, would have you do. In ref. Rom. it is used of God. The N. T. line of demarcation between θέλω and βούλομαι appears to be but slender: and slenderer still that between their derivatives. We may perhaps say here, that the θέλημα, used of God, carries with it more of authority and "willing," βούλημα, used of man, more of persuasion, and wishing [cf. 1 Tim. vi. 9]: so that the βούλημα is that which we may be overpersuaded into following, the θέλημα that which we are bound to obey. τῶν ἔθνῶν, used not of any national distinction, but of heathens as distinguished from Christians, shews that the majority of the readers of the Epistle had been Gentiles, among these ἔθνη, themselves. Cf. a very similar passage in Isocr. Panegy. p. 75 D: ἄξιον δ' ἐπὶ τῆς νῦν ἡλικίας ποιήσασθαι τὴν στρατείαν, ἵν' οἱ τῶν συμφορῶν κοινωνήσαντες, οὔτοι καὶ τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἀπολαύσωσι· καὶ μὴ πάντα τὸν χρόνον δυστυχούντες διαγύγωσιν. ἱκανὸς γὰρ ὁ παρεληλυθὸς, ἐν ᾧ τί τῶν δεινῶν οὐ γέγονεν;], walking as ye have done (the perf. part. connects with κατειργάσθαι: the absence of the art. gives it the slight inferential force which justifies the former assertion) in lasciviousnesses (outbreaks of ἀσέλγεια), lusts (here perhaps not general, as in ver. 2, but particular, lusts of uncleanness), wine-bibbings (οιοφληγία ἐστὶν ἐπιθυμία οἴνου ἀπληστος, Andronicus Rhodius, περὶ παθῶν, p. 6. But from the other examples of its use in Wetst., it seems to express not only the desire, but its indulgence), revellings (see for a full explanation of κῶμοι, the word in Palm and Rost), drinking-bouts (Appian says of Sertorius, Bell. Civ. i. p. 700 [Wetst.], τὰ πολλὰ ἦν ἐπὶ τρυφῆς, γυναιξὶ καὶ κῶμοις καὶ πότοις σχολάζων. Suidas gives, ποτὸς τὸ πινόμενον, πότος δὲ τὸ συμπόσιον), and nefarious ("quibus sanctissimum Dei jus violatur," Beng.) idolatries (I may remark as against the view that this Epistle was written to Jews, that this passage cannot be explained on that supposition. The Jews certainly never went so far into Gentile abominations as to justify its assertions): 4.] at which (your having done with such practices, implied in the κατειργάσθαι and πεπορευμένους above: then the gen. absolute following further explains the ἐν ᾧ. ἐν, as the element in which their ξενίζεσθαι is versed. The aim of this verse is well given by Gerhard: "monuit hæc προθεραπεία ipsorum animos, ne perversis et præposteris illis impiorum judiciis ac blasphemis sermonibus turbentur, multo vero minus ad pristinorum vitorum societatem sese pertrahi patiantur." They must give offence to their former companions: for this there is no help) they are astonished (think it strange, as E. V. see reff.), that you run not (the μὴ puts the reader on their footing: "when they notice that you run not") with them (συντρέχ., 'turmatim,' 'avide,' Bengel) to (eis, of the direction and purpose of the confluence) the same slough (of ἀνάχυσις, Strabo iii. p. 206 A, says, λέγονται δὲ ἀναχύσεις αἱ πληρούμεναι τῇ θαλάττῃ κοιλάδες ἐν ταῖς πλημμυρίσι: æstuaries: and so ἀναχ. = 'sentina,' a sink, or slough, or puddle: and this is the meaning taken by Huther and Wiesinger. But Suidas interprets it βλακεία, ἐκχυσίς; and ἀνακεχυμένος, —ἀνεμένος, ἐκχυνόμενος, ἀνετός. Hence Gerhard takes it for 'virium exsolutio, mollities.' De Wette follows Grotius: 'profusio,' which in its etymology, though not in its ordinary acceptance, exactly answers to ἀνάχυσις. On the whole the local meaning is I think to be preferred, on account of the figure in συντρέχόντων) of profligacy (ἀ, σώζειν: see note on ref. a reason for the κρίναι νεκρούς just mentioned) to this end (viz. that enunciated by the ἵνα which follows; see ref. John; ch. iii. 9) to dead men also (as well as to living, which is the ordinary case: καὶ carrying with it a climax,—"even to the dead") was the gospel preached (when, and by Whom, see below), that they might indeed be judged (aor.) according to men as regards the flesh, but might live on (pres.) according to God as regards the spirit. In examining into the meaning of this difficult verse, one thing may be laid down at the outset, as certain on any sure principles of exegesis: and thereby a whole class of interpretations removed out of our way. Seeing that γὰρ binds vv. 5 and 6 logically together, and that καὶ νεκροῖς distinctly takes up the νεκρούς before in this logical connexion, all interpretations must be false which do not give νεκροῖς in ver. 6 the same meaning as νεκρούς in ver. 5: i. e. that of dead men, literally and simply so called: men who have died, and are in their graves. This at once rids us of all the Commentators who interpret this second νεκροῖς of the dead in trespasses and sins, so Aug., Cyril, (Ec. [only as an altern., and he blames the interpretation, saying that οἱ παλαιοὶ τῶν πατέρων so explained it, οὐδὲν φροντίσαντες τῆς συνέχειας τῶν ἄνω, οὐδ' ὅτι αἰτιολογικῶς εἰρημένων δεῖ πρὸς τὰ πρὸ αὐτοῦ ἀναφέρεσθαι. He himself interprets it of the descent of our Lord into Hades], Bede, Erasmus, Luther, Whitby, Gerhard, al., as well as those who to gain this meaning here, distort νεκρούς in ver. 5 from its constant reference in that connexion, to mean the spiritually dead, or the Gentiles, as e. g. Severus in Cramer's Catena, Huss, Benson, Macknight. A second principle which we may lay down is this: that νεκροῖς in ver. 6 must be kept as wide in its reference as νεκρούς in ver. 5: i. e., that it must not be interpreted as applying merely to the blasphemers of the Christians who should have died before the judgment, or merely to such blasphemed

Christians themselves as shall have then died, or merely to the spirits in prison of ch. iii. 19, but must be treated as a general assertion in the literal meaning of νεκροῖς. The want of the article does not justify any limitation of this word: for the art. is also wanting before νεκρούς in ver. 5, which indisputably is universal in its reference. At the same time, seeing that νεκροῖς asserts that which it asserts of the genus, the ground of so doing may be the occurrence of it with reference to certain fore-mentioned instances, though those instances themselves are not the subjects here. So that we cannot remove from consideration these last-mentioned interpretations, but must deal with them seriatim. First then comes that of Hofmann [Schriftb. ii. 1. 339—341], al., that the Apostle comforts his readers in persecution and slander, by the thought that bodily death would not exempt their adversaries from the divine judgment. In this case νεκροῖς would mean "now dead," and εὐηγγελίσθη would point to the time when the gospel was preached to them, before they died. This of itself is a very weighty objection. Such a divulsion of the verb from its object by an intervening change of state and time was precisely that against which we protested in τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν ἐκήρυξεν above, ch. iii. 19. But even granting that this might be so, other as great objections remain. For how does it consist with the ετοίμως ἔχειν above, that the Apostle should assume the deaths of these persecutors as a matter of course, to happen before the Lord's coming to judgment? Again, even granting such assumption, the number of their persecutors who would be amenable to punishment would thus be confined to those to whom the Gospel had been preached: any who might never have heard it would, by this reasoning, escape such judgment. Again, even supposing that all such objections were removed, the point established would be an utterly unworthy one. For who ever thought, that the fact of death before the Lord's coming would exempt any man from judgment? And to what purpose would it be, to speak to the readers in so marked a manner of their dead persecutors, in the midst of exhortations concerning their behaviour amidst their living ones? Next, we have the view [Calv., al.] that the particular case, on which the general νεκροῖς is founded, is that of such persecuted Christians as should cease before the Lord's coming. To this the first of the before raised objections, that νεκροῖς must mean 'now dead,' and εὐγγ. refer to a former preaching when they were alive, applies in full force. And this I should hold to be fatal to it. It must be confessed, that it agrees better with the context than the last: for while that finds no assignable contextual justification, it might be said in this case, that for this very reason was the Gospel preached to those among you who have suffered death at the hands of persecutors,—even herewith were they called,—that they might indeed be judged, condemned, by human persecution, as regards the flesh, but notwithstanding might live eternally with God as regards the spirit. Still I conceive we are not at liberty to receive it, on account of the above objection. If καὶ νεκροῖς εὐγγελισθη may mean, "the Gospel was preached to some during their lifetime, who are now dead," exegesis has no longer any fixed rule, and Scripture may be made to prove any thing. [Bengel takes it in both the last-mentioned references: to the persecutors, and to the Christians.] It remains that we consider the view, that the persons pointed at are those spirits in prison to whom our Lord went and preached, ch. iii. 19. This supposition, but always with the protest raised above, that νεκροῖς does not refer only to these, but to the dead generally, and that these are only the occasion of the general assertion, is also adopted by Wiesinger. And it may be thus defended: granted, that the γάρ of our verse assigns a reason, not for the persecutors giving an account to the judge of the quick and dead, nor for the Christians bearing up under the prospect of martyrdom,—it will follow of necessity that it assigns a reason for the κρῖναι ζώντας καὶ νεκρούς which it immediately follows: or rather, for the νεκροῖς portion of that clause. Our Lord is ready to judge the dead: and with reason: for even they have not been without opportunity of receiving His gospel: as the example which was adduced in ch. iii. 19 shews. For this end the gospel was preached even to the dead,—that they might—not indeed escape the universal judgment on human sin, which is physical death,—but, that they might be judged [aor.; be in the state of the completed sentence on sin, which is death after the flesh] according to [us] man as regards the flesh [this first clause following ἵνα being the subordinate one, of the state which the εὐγγελισθη left remaining], but [notwithstanding] might live [pres.; of a state to continue] according to God [with God, and divine] as regards the spirit: so that the relation of these two clauses with μὲν and δέ is precisely as in Rom. viii. 10, εἰ δὲ χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν, τὸ μὲν σῶμα νεκρὸν διὰ ἁμαρτίαν, τὸ δὲ πνεῦμα ζῶν διὰ δικαιοσύνην: where the former clause in the apodosis is not the consequence of the protasis, but an abiding fact, seeming to militate against, but really not hindering that consequence. And this interpretation I adopt, believing it to be the only one which satisfies the philological conditions of the sentence: which justifies the γάρ as accounting for the κρῖναι νεκρούς: the καί, as taking up, and bringing into prominence and climax the νεκροῖς: the νεκροῖς, as used in precisely the same sense as in the last verse, and contemporary with the verb which governs it: the εὐγγελισθη, as grounded on a previously announced fact, ch. iii. 19: the aim and end introduced by the ἵνα, which on this, and on no other rendering, receives meaning and perspicuity. And so, in the main, with minor deviations, the more accurate of the modern Commentators: Steiger, De Wette, Huther, Wiesinger, Weiss.

7—V. 11.] General exhortations with reference to behaviour within the Christian body, in contemplation of the approaching end. This portion of the Epistle falls into three sections: 7—11, Christian and social duties, in consideration of the end being at hand: 12—19, Christian bearing of suffering, in the same consideration: v. 1—11, ecclesiastical and general mutual ministrations: passing off into fervent exhortations and aspirations. 7.] But (the connexion is close with what had gone before: the ἐτοίμως ἔχοντι of ver. 5 is in the Apostle's mind: and he passes, with it before him, from considerations external to the church, to those affecting its internal condition) the end of all things (not, 'of all men:' nor as Ec. altern. is τέλος, the τέλος πάντων προφητών τουτο δε αληθει λογω, ο χριστος: but simply the end, as in reff. Observe the emphatically prefixed πάντων, almost bearing the sense of τούτων πάντων: as Bengel: "Finis adeoque etiam petulantiae malorum et passionum piorum") is at hand (on this being the constant expectation of the apostolic age, see Acts i. 7, note: 1 Thess. iv. 15, note): be therefore of temperate mind (see note on 1 Tim. ii. 9), and be sober unto (with a view to) prayers (the τας before προσευχάς, which Tischdf. in his 7th edition has again inserted, as probably omitted in AB &c., because its force was not perceived, may just as well be regarded as an insertion owing to the plural seeming strange, which has also led to the correction into προσευχήν in ms. 13. Possibly Polycarp's νήφοντες προς τας ευχάς, ad Phil. 7, p. 1012, led to the change. At all events, where subjective considerations are so equivocal, it is our simple duty to follow the most ancient testimonies),

8.] above all things (πρό πάντων, as Wies. well remarks, not placing love above prayer, but because all social life and duty must presuppose love as its necessary bond and condition. Here again it is just as likely that the δέ was inserted because there seemed to be no immediate connexion, as that it was omitted to produce that connexion), having your love towards one another (on εαυτους in this sense, see note, Col. iii. 13) intense (see ch. i. 22. "Amor jam præsuppouitur: ut sit vehemens, præcipitur." Beng.): because love covereth a multitude of sins (from ref. Prov., except that there it is $\text{כִּי יִכְסֶה לְכָל חַטֹּאתַי}$, all sins. The LXX have translated this word wrongly πάντας τοὺς μὴ φιλονεικοῦντας. De Wette denies the reference, seeing that if St. Peter had cited from the Heb., he would in all probability have written πάσας τὰς ἀμαρτίας, or rather πάντα τὰ ἀδικήματα, as in Prov. xvii. 9: and thinks, on account of the verbal correspondence with ref. James, that the expression was a proverb in common use. But even if so, there can be no reasonable doubt that Prov. x. 12 was the source of it: so that it comes to nearly the same thing. As to the meaning, the words here are used in a different reference from that in St. James, where see note. Here it is the hiding of offences [both from one another and in God's sight: see below] by mutual forbearance and forgiveness, which is meant. This has been recently denied by De Wette and Huther, the former understanding the sins rather as those of the Christian body, which mutual love keeps back from being committed, and the latter not excluding the other meaning. They would understand the words, as of old Ec., $\text{ὁ μὲν γὰρ εἰς τὸν πλησίον ἔλεος, τὸν θεὸν ἡμῖν ἕλεον ποιεῖ}$, and many Commentators both Romanist [not Estius] and Protestant, that love causes God to overlook a multitude of sins. This they do partly on account of ἀμαρτιῶν, which they maintain cannot well be applied to the mutual offences of common life [see however Matt. xviii. 15, $\text{ἐὰν ἀυαρτήσῃ εἰς σὲ ὁ ἀδελφός σου}$] and partly on account of οτι, which "indicare videtur ineitamentum aliquod, quo Christianus amor commendatur" [Hottinger in De W.]. And doubtless there is something in this latter consideration, especially when we remember that the nearness of the divine judgment is a pressing motive throughout these exhortations. I do not see why we should not take the saying in its widest reference, understanding it primarily perhaps of forgiveness, but then also of that prevention of sin by kindness of word and deed, and also that intercession for sin in prayer, which are the constant fruits of fervent love. It is a truth from which we need not shrink, that every sin which love hides from man's sight, is hidden in God's sight also. There is but One efficient cause of the hiding of sin: but mutual love applies that cause: draws the universal cover over the particular sin. This meaning, as long as it is not perverted into the thought that love towards others covers a man's own sin 'ex pro merito,' need not and should not be excluded):—

10.] And this is to be so, not merely in the interchange of this world's good offices, but also in the communication of the gifts of the Spirit, which are the common endowment of the whole body, individual Christians being only the stewards of them. Each man even as (in whatever quality and quantity: but the subsequent injunctions seem more to regard the quality than the quantity. It is otherwise in Ephl. iv. 7; Rom. xii. 3. The καθὼς has no reference to the manner of reception,—"Sicut gratis accepimus, ita gratis demus," Lortinus in Hntler) he received a gift of grace (see Rom. xii. 6 ff.: 1 Cor. xii. 4, 28. χάρισμα, anarthrous, any one of the gifts known by that name), to each other (see above ver. 8: the ἑαυτοῦς here brings up strikingly the idea that all are members of one body) ministering it (διακονεῖν, transitive, as in ch. i. 12: ministering to the need of others; his store out of which he ministers being that gift thus bestowed upon him) as (being: or, as becometh: see ch. i. 14) good (reff.) stewards (reff., there is most likely a reference to our Lord's parable of the talents) of the various (see this illustrated 1 Cor. xii. 4; Matt. xxv. 15; Luke xix. 13) grace of God.

11.] And this both in speaking and acting. If any one speaketh (as a προφήτης or διδάσκαλος, see 1 Cor. xii. 8, 10, where the several branches of this gift are laid out), speaking (understand λαλοῦντες, from the former construction, not λαλείω) as oracles (not, "the oracles;" the meaning is not, speaking in accord with Scripture, but, speaking what he does speak, as God's sayings, not his own: as a steward, "non liberalis de proprio sed de alieno," as Gerh. on the last verse. On λόγια, see note, ref. Heb.) of God: if any one ministereth (in Rom. xii. 8; 1 Cor. xii. 28, we have the several parts of this διακονία laid out), [διακονοῦντες] as (see above) out of (as his store and power of ministration) the power (thus to minister) which God bestoweth (ἐπιχορηγέω is commoner than the simple word: cf. 2 Pet. i. 11; 2 Cor. ix. 10; Gal. iii. 5; Col. ii. 19: and ἐπιχορηγία Phil. i. 19; Eph. iv. 16. From signifying the supply of means to furnish a chorus for the public performances at Athens, it came to mean generally, to supply, or furnish): that (aim and end of all this, as of every act both of the Christian community and of the Christian man) in all things (not, as De Wette, in all of you as His organs, referring to John xiii. 31, xvii. 10: but as in ref. The fact that all things are referred to God and done as of and to Him, is His being glorified in the Christian church. Œc. gives as an altern., ἐν πᾶσιν ἔθνεσιν, which is still more in fault) God may be glorified through Jesus Christ ("sicut a Deo per Christum omnia beneficia ad nos descendunt, ita quoque . . . per Christum omnia ad Dei gloriam referri debent." Gerh.), to whom (viz. to God, as the main subject of the foregoing, and also because ἡ δόξα refers back to δοξάζηται. Grot., Calov., Steiger, al. refer the words to Christ, which is not so natural here, seeing that διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ is introduced only secondarily. The case is very similar to Heb. xiii. 21, where see note. See similar doxologies, ch. v. 11; Rom. xi. 36; Eph. iii. 21) is the glory and the might (ex-

Then ver. 19 concludes. This passage is no repetition of ch. iii. 13—iv. 6, which treated of their sufferings with reference to their inflictors: whereas this proceeds wholly on reference to a Christian's own inner hopes, and considerations within the church itself. 12, 13.] See above.

the sentence would thus stand, "at the πύρωσις in your case happening for a πειρασμός to you." But this is not grammatically necessary, and would be pragmatically hardly justifiable: because it would take the occurrence of the πύρωσις for granted, and make its purpose alone matter of astonishment: which was not so) in your case (ἐν ὑμῖν is rendered "among you" by De Wette and Huther [einige in eurer Mitte betreffende, De W.], and this may be: we can hardly say with Wiesinger that it is afterwards treated as a trial for all: the εἰ ὀνειδίξεσθε and εἴ [τις πάσχει] ὡς χριστιανός necessarily assume that there were exceptions from the supposition. But I prefer the other rendering, as the Apostle evidently is in this and the next verse speaking generally) for a trial to you (ὑμῖν, dat. commodi), as if (explanatory of ξενίξεσθε) some strange thing were happening to you (συμβαίνοντος, as Bengel, "temere:" were falling by chance on you: opposed to πρὸς πειρασμὸν γινομένη, done with a purpose, by One who knows how to serve that purpose): 13.] but in as far as (καθὸ, not "in that," "inasmuch as," E. It is not the sufferings of Christ mystical in His Body the church [cf. Col. i. 24] which are meant: in these the readers might bear their part, but could hardly be said κοινωνεῖν), rejoice, that (ἵνα simply of the scope of that joy, as the preparation for what follows) ye may also at (in, i. e. See the summary above, at ver. 12.

14.] If ye are reproached in the name of Christ (see Matt. v. 11, from which the words are adopted, as also ch. iii. 14. The word there added, ψευδόμενοι, comes below, vv. 15, 16. On ὄνειδ. Bengel says, "probrum putabant gentes si quem appellarunt Christianum, ver. 16." But probably the reference is more general, and Calv. is right, "probrorum meminit, quoniam plus sæpe acerbitalis in se habent quam bonorum jactura, vel etiam tormenta et cruciatus corporis: itaque nihil est quod ingenuos animos magis frangat." And ἐν ὀνόματι χριστοῦ also must have a wider sense: on account of your confession of Christ in word and deed, as De Wette: cf. ἐν ὀνόματι ὅτι χριστοῦ ἐστί, Mark ix. 41), blessed are ye (cf. ch. iii. 14: blessed, and that even now), because the Spirit of glory and that of God (the Apostle does not mean, by repeating the art., two different spirits, but identifies the same Spirit under two different denominations: the Spirit of glory, which is also the Spirit of God: "qui idem Spiritus Dei." Winer, § 20. 1. c, compares Thuc. i. 126, ἐν τῇ τοῦ Διὸς τῇ μεγίστῃ ἑορτῇ: and Plat. Rep. viii. 565 D, περὶ τὸ ἐν Ἀρκαδίᾳ τὸ τοῦ Διὸς ἱερὸν, both of which however want the καί. Huther strangely takes τὸ τῆς δόξης alone, independent of πνεῦμα, as a periphrasis of δόξα: Bengel takes τῆς δόξης as concrete, "ut sit appellatio Christi, Jac. ii. 1," and remarks, "ut innatur, Spiritum Christi eundem esse Spiritum Dei Patris") resteth upon you (from ref. Isa.: on you, as on Him: cf. also Num. xi. 25, 26; 4 Kings ii. 15. ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, prægu., "demissus in vos requiescit in vobis," as Wahl: not, as Huther, "the construction of the prep. with the acc. denotes the living operation of the Spirit on him upon whom He rests:" for no such idea as living operation, however true the fact may be, is contained in ἀναπαύεται).

It is of course possible that the clause which follows in the rec. (see var. readd.) may have fallen out by similarity of endings, ἀναπαύεται . . . δοξάζεται: but in judging of this as a likelihood, we must remember that not only the three great MSS. ΑΒΝ omit it, but so many of the ancient versions, as to make it very improbable that it has been thus overlooked: and its very glossematic appearance, to explain τῆς δόξης, is against it.

15, 16.] Negative, and positive, resumptions and enlargements of ἐν ὀνόματι χριστοῦ.

15.] In the name of Christ, I say: for let no one of you suffer (reproach or persecution: suffer in any way) as (being) a murderer, or a malefactor (as opposed to ἀγαθοποιῶν, ch. iii. 17), or as (the repetition of ὡς separates the following word from the foregoing, as belonging to a separate class) a prayer into other men's matters (ὁ ἐπισκεπτόμενος τὰ ἀλλότρια. "Hanc explicationem," says Gerhard, "probat 1) ipsa vocis compositio, 2) veterum expositio, Tert. Cypr. Aug. [Ec., ὁ τὰ ἀλλότρια περιεργάζομενος], 3) temporis et loci circumstantia. Procul dubio quidam Christiani, ex incogitantia, temeritate et levitate, in actiones infidelium utpote vicinorum suorum curiosius inquirebant, eas proprio arbitrio redarguebant, ac iudices eorum esse volebant, quod non pertinebat ad eorum vocationem." Wies. suggests that the word probably alludes to the ἐπίσκοπος of the church, combining it with ἀλλοτρι-, to shew the incongruity).

16.] But if (he suffer) as (being) a Christian (see refl. The word appears here, as in Acts xxvi. 28, to be used as carrying contempt, from the mouth of an adversary), let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God in this name (viz. that of χριστιανός: at, or in, the fact that he is counted worthy to suffer and the sinner (he that is devoted to sin. The absence of a second article, and the singular verb, both shew, that the same person is meant by both), where shall he appear (so in Ps. i. 5: where shall he stand and find an abiding place in the judgment?)? 19.] Wherefore (general conclusion) from vv. 17, 18. If the sufferings of Christians as Christians are a sign of God's favour towards them, in subjecting them to His judgments, with a view to their not perishing with the ungodly world, then have they every reason to trust Him in those sufferings, and to take comfort: continuing in that same well-doing which is their very element and condition) let also them who suffer (καί, as well as all other persons: not as Bengel, καί, concessive: "καί, etiam, cum participio, idem quod ei καί, et si, cum verbo?" for it is on this very ei καί hypothesis that the Apostle has been long proceeding; so that it would be unnatural for him to introduce it here again with a climax:—nor as De Wette and Huther, is it to be taken with ὥστε) according to (in pursuit of, along the course of) the will of God (see on ch. iii. 17: here especially in reference to our ver. 17, seeing that it is God's will that judgment should begin at His house), commit (reff. deliver [subjectively] into the hands of, and confidently leave there) their souls (their personal safety and ultimate σώζεσθαι, ver. 18) in (ἐν, as clad in, accompanied with, subsisting and employed in) well-doing (as contrasted with the opposite characters in ver. 15. Huther says well: "This addition, ἐν ἀγαθοι., shows that the confident surrender to God is to be joined, not with careless indolence, but with active practice of good") to a faithful Creator (in God being our Creator, without whom* not a hair falls to the ground, we have an assurance that we are not overlooked by Him: in His being a faithful Creator [ἀσφαλῆς κ. ἀψευδὴς κατὰ τὰς ἐπαγγελίας αὐτοῦ, Œc.], whose covenant truth is pledged to us, it is implied that we are within that covenant, suffering according to His will and as His children. κτίστη must not be understood of the second creation in the new birth, nor must it be rendered possessor, as Calvin).

minum patientem, et nunc passiones sustinebat," Bengel];—but in the sense of an eye-witness, on the ground of which his apostolic testimony rested: q. d. I who say to you χριστὸς ἐπάθεν σαρκί, say this of sufferings which my own eyes saw. Thus this clause links on the following exhortation to the preceding portion of the Epistle concerning Christian suffering, and tends to justify the οὖν. Observe that it is not ὁ καὶ μάρτυς, but συμπρεσβ. κ. μάρτυς are under the same art.: q. d. "the one among the συμπρεσβύτεροι who witnessed the sufferings of Christ"), who am also a partaker of the glory which is about to be revealed (I prefer to take this as an allusion to our Lord's own words John xiii. 36, ἕστερον ἀκολουθήσεις μοι, rather than regard it as alluding to the Transfiguration, as some [e. g. Dr. Burton], or to the certainty that those who suffer with Him will be glorified with Him [see above on this view of μάρτυς]. As bearing that promise, he came to them with great weight of authority as an exhorter—having seen the sufferings of which he speaks, and being himself an heir of that glory to which he points onwards),— 2.] tend (the aor. stronger than the pres. in the imperative: gathering together the whole ποιμαίνειν into one ποιμάναι as the act of the life) the flock (compare the injunction given to St. Peter himself in John xxi. 16, ποιμαίνε τὰ πρόβατά μου. "Quam ergo ovium pascendarum curam a Christo sibi noverat commendatam, in ejus societatem presbyteros vocat," Gerhard. The verb includes in one word the various offices of a shepherd; the leading, feeding, heeding: "pascere mente, pascere ore, pascere opere, pascere animi oratione, verbi exhortatione, exempli exhibitione," Bernard, in Wiesinger. Our only, but not sufficient, word is, 'tending') of God (cf. Acts xx. 28. The similitude is among the commonest in Scripture: cf. Jer. iii. 15, xxiii. 1—4; Ezek. xxxiv. 2 ff.; John x. 11 ff.) which is among you (τὸ ἐν ὑμῖν is taken by Erasmus, and Calvin to mean "quantum in vobis est:" and no doubt this is possible; yet it sounds more Latin than Greek, which would rather perhaps be τὸ καθ' ὑμᾶς, or τὸ ἐξ ὑμῶν, as Wies. observes. But the sense is the greatest objection: "Petrus noverat sibi a Christo non esse dictum, pascere quantum in te est, oves meas, sed absolute et simpliciter, pascere," as Gerhard. And the ἐν ὑμῖν above seems decisive against this meaning. But even then we find various renderings: as "vobis pro vestra parte commissum," Bengel, as εἶναι or κεῖσθαι ἐν τῷ, and so Luther [die Herde, so euch befohlen ist], Steiger, al.: Huther says, ἐν signifies here, as elsewhere also, inner communion, not merely local presence: "the flock which is under your charge." Gerhard gives "qui vobiscum est, videlicet cum quo unum corpus, una ecclesia estis," to which I do not see that Huther has any right to object, as he does. But the mere local meaning is by far the best. He orders them to feed the flock of God, not generally, nor œcumenically, but locally, as far as concerned that part of it found among [overseeing (it) (the word ἐπισκοποῦντες, which tallies very much with St. Peter's participial style, has perhaps been removed for ecclesiastical reasons, for fear πρεσβύτεροι should be supposed to be as they really were, ἐπίσκοποι: "ipsum episcopatus nomen et officium exprimere voluit," Calv.)] not constrainedly ('coacte' as Bengel, "necessitas incumbit, 1 Cor. ix. 16, sed hujus sensum absorbet lubentia. Id valet et in suscipiendo et in gerendo munere. Non sine reprehensione sunt pastores qui, si res integra esset, malent quidvis potius esse." Bede, "Coacte pascit gregem Dei, propter rerum temporalium penuriam non habens unde vivat, idcirco prædicat evangelium ut de Evangelio vivere possit." And then, as Calv., "Dum agimus ad necessitatis præscriptum, lente et frigide in opere progredimur") but willingly (not exactly, as Bede, "supernæ mercedis intuitu," but out of love to the great Shepherd, and to the flock. The addition in AN al., κατὰ θεόν, is curious, and not easily accounted for. It certainly does not, as Huther says, clear up the thought, but rather obscures it. The expression is seldom found; and never in the sense here required. Cf. Rom. viii. 27; 2 Cor. vii. 9 ff.), nor yet (μηδέ brings in a climax each time) with a view to base gain ("propter quæstum et terrena comoda," as Bede. Cf. Isa. lvi. 11; Jer. vi. 13, viii. 10; Ezek. xxxix. 2, 3, &c.; and Tit. i. 7) but earnestly (as 2 Cor. xii. 14 [cf. προθυμία, 2 Cor. viii. 11, ix. 2], prompted by a desire not of gain, but of good to the flock;—ready and enthusiastic, as [the illustration is Bede's] the children of Israel, and even the workmen, gave their services eagerly and gratuitously to build the tabernacle of old): 3.] nor yet as lording it over (the κατα as in reff. and in καταδυναστεύω James ii. 6, κατακαυχάομαι Rom. xi. 18, James ii. 13, καταμαρτυρέω Matt. xxvi. 62, carries the idea of hostility, and therefore, when joined with κυριεύω, of oppression; of using the rights of a κύριος for the diminution of the ruled and the exaltation of self. Christian rulers of the church are προϊστάμενοι [1 Thess. v. 12; Rom. xii. 8], ἡγούμενοι [Luke xxii. 26], but not κυριεύοντες [Luke xxii. 25, 26]. One is their κύριος, and they are His διάκονοι) the portions [entrusted to you] (so is κλήρος understood by [not Cyril, as commonly cited: see below] Bede apparently, Erasm. ["gregem qui cuique forte contigit gubernandus"], Estius ["gregis Domini portiones, quæ singulis episcopis pascendæ et regendæ velut sortito obtigerunt"], Calov., Bengel, Wolf, Steiger, De Wette, Huther, Wiesinger, al. And so Theophanes, Homil. xii. p. 70 [in Suicer], addresses his hearers, ἡμεῖς δέ, ὃ κλήρος ἐμός: cf. also Acts xvii. 4 [of which I do not see why De Wette should say that it has nothing to do with the present consideration]. On the other hand, 2. 'the heritage of God' is taken as the meaning by Cyril [on Isa. iii. 12 (vol. iii. p. 63), not i. 6, as commonly cited by all, copying one from another. But the passage is not satisfactory. In the Latin, we read "non ut dominentur in clero, id est, populo qui sors Domini est:" but the words in italics have no representatives in the Greek, which simply quotes this verse without comment], Calv. ["quum universum ecclesiæ corpus hæreditas sit domini, totidem sunt veluti prædia, quorum culturam singulis presbyteris assignat"], Beza [and consequently E. V.], Grot., Benson, al. But the objections to this are, that κλήροι could not be taken for portions of κλήρος,—and that θεοῦ could in this case hardly be wanting. Again, 3. some, principally R.-Cath. expositors, have anachronistically supposed κλήροι to mean the clergy: so even (Ec.,—κλήρον τὸ ἱερόν σύστημα καλεῖ, ὡς περ καὶ νῦν ἡμεῖς, and Jer., Epist. ad Nepot. [lii. 7, vol. i. p. 262]: so Corn. a-Lap. ["jubet ergo S. Petrus Episcopus et Pastoribus, ne inferioribus clericis imperiose dominari velint"], Justiniani [doubtfully: "sive P. de fidei populo universo, sive de ordine ecclesiastico loquatur"], Feuardentius, al. 4. Dodwell understood it of the church-goods: which view has nothing to recommend it, and is refuted by Wolf, Curæ, h. l. That the first meaning is the right one, is decided by τοῦ ποιμνίου below: see there), but becoming (it is well, where it can be done, to keep the distinctive meaning of γίνομαι. This more frequently happens in affirmative than in negative sentences: cf. μή γίνου ἄπιστος ἀλλὰ πιστός, John xx. 27, where this distinctive meaning can be well brought out in the latter clause, but not in the former) patterns of the flock (the tyrannizing could only apply to the portion over which their authority extended, but the good example would be seen and followed by the whole church: hence τῶν κλήρων in the prohibition, but τοῦ ποιμνίου in the exhortation. τύποι, because the flock will look to you: "pastor ante oves vadit." Gerh. The Commentators quote from Bernard, "Monstrosa res est gradus summus et animus infimus, sedes prima et vita ima, lingua maguloqua et vita otiosa, sermo multus et fructus nullus:" and from Gregory the Great, "Informis est vita pastoris, qui modo calicem Domini signat, modo talos agit: qui in avibus cæli ludit, canes instigat," &c.); 4.] and then (καί of the result of something previously treated, as Matt. xxvi. 55; John x. 16 al. fr.: see Winer, § 53. 3) when the chief Shepherd (see ch. ii. 25; Heb. xiii. 20: and compare Ezek. xxxiv. 15, 16, 23; Matt. xxv. 32) is manifested (used by St. Peter, as ἀποκαλύπτω, in a double reference, to Christ's first coming, and His second also: cf. ch. i. 20: so also by St. Paul, Col. iii. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16: by St. John, 1 John ii. 28, iii. 2, 5, 8.

Here, clearly of the second coming. It would not be clear, from this passage alone, whether St. Peter regarded the coming of the Lord as likely to occur in the life of these his readers, or not: but as interpreted by the analogy of his other expressions on the same subject, it would appear that he did, ye shall receive (reff.) the amarantine (ἀμαράντινος is adj. from ἀμάραντος, the everlasting, or unfading, flower. Most Commentators have assumed without reason that it = ἀμάραντος, ch. i. 4, unfading. Philostr. in Heroicis, p. 741, cited in Wolf, has ὅθεν καὶ στεφάνους ἀμαραντίνους εἰς τὰ κήδη πρῶτοι Θετταλοι ἐνόμισαν: see also Palm and Rost, sub voce. In the sense, there will be no difference: but the Apostle would hardly have used two derivatives of the same word, to express one and the same quality) crown (reff.) of His glory (or, of glory: but I prefer the other. That we shall share His glory, is a point constantly insisted on by St. Peter: cf. ver. 1, ch. iv. 13, i. 7: and above all, ver. 10 below. This idea reaches its highest in St. John, with whom the inner unity of the divine life with the life of Christ is all in all. Cf. especially 1 John iii. 2 f.).

5—7.] Exhortation to the younger, and to all, to humility and trust in God. 5.]

In like manner (i. e. 'mutatis mutandis,' in your turn: see ch. iii. 7: with the same recognition of your position and duties), ye younger, be subject to the elders (in what sense are we to take νεώτεροι and πρεσβύτεροι here? One part of our answer will be very clear: that πρεσβύτεροι must be in the same sense as above, viz., in its official historical sense of presbyters in the church. This being so, we have now some clue to the meaning of νεώτεροι: viz. that it cannot mean younger in age merely, though this, as regarded men, would generally be so, but that as the name πρεσβύτεροι had an official sense, of superintendents of the church, so νεώτεροι likewise, of those who were the ruled, the disciples, of the πρεσβύτεροι. Thus taken, it will mean here, the rest of the church, as opposed to the πρεσβύτεροι. Nor will this meaning, as Weiss maintains, p. 344, be at all impugned by πάντες δὲ which follows, inasmuch as that clearly embraces both classes, πρεσβύτεροι and νεώτεροι. As Wiesinger well says, The Apostle is teaching what the πρεσβ. owe to the church, what the church to them, what all without distinction to one another. Weiss would understand these νεώτεροι as he does in Acts v. 6, and νεανίσκοι ib. ver. 10 [but see note there], young persons, who were to subserve the ordinary wants of the elders in the ministration. Luther, Calv., Gerhard, al., and more recently De Wette and Huther, take νεώτεροι for the younger members of the congregation: in which case, as most of these confess, we must enlarge the sense of πρεσβυτέροις here, which in my mind is a fatal objection to the view. The above interpretation, that νεώτεροι are the rest of the congregation as distinguished from the πρεσβύτεροι, is that of Bede, Est., Benson, Pott, al., and of Wiesinger): yea (the E. V. happily thus gives the sense of the δέ: q. d. Why should I go on giving these specific injunctions, when one will cover them all?) all gird on humility to one another (an allusion to our Lord's action of girding Himself with a napkin in the servile ministration of washing the disciples' feet: of which He himself said, καὶ ὑμεῖς ὀφείλετε ἀλλήλων νίπτειν τοὺς πόδας. ὑπόδειγμα γὰρ ἔδωκα ὑμῖν ἵνα καθὼς ἐγὼ ἐποίησα ὑμῖν καὶ ὑμεῖς ποιήτε. The impression made on St. Peter by this proof of his Master's love is thus beautifully shewn. As to the details: the ὑποτασσόμενοι of the rec. has probably been a clumsy gloss to help out the construction of the dat. commodi ἀλλήλοις. ἐγκομβώσασθε is variously interpreted. Its derivation is from κόμβος, a string or band attached to a garment to tie it with: hence κόμβωμα, an apron, through κομβώω, to gird or tie round; and thus ἐγκομβώω, to gird on, and -δομαι, to gird on one's self. ἐγκόμβωμα is used for a kind of girdle by Longus, Pastoralia ii. 33, and Pollux iv. 119. See in Wetst. The Schol. in ms. 16 says, ἀντὶ τοῦ ἐνειλήσασθε, περιβάλεσθε, ἢ ἀναστείλασθε. In Hesych., the κομβολύτης is explained to be a βαλαντιότομος. There is a very complete and learned dissertation on this passage in the Fritschiorum Opuscula, pp. 259—275, containing all the literature of the subject. The result there is, "omnes lectores, oratione in eos conversa, admonet, ut quemadmodum servi heris se modeste submitunt [the ἐγκόμβωμα being a servile garment or apron], ita unus alteri tanquam minor majori cedens obsequiosum modestumque se præbeat: 'omnes autem lubenter alter alteri cedentes modestam vobis pro servorum encombomate incingite.' This is perhaps going too far, to seek the meaning of the verb altogether in its derivative: but the reference is at least possible. For more particulars consult the dissertation itself, and Wetstein's note.

Some put a comma after ἀλλήλοις, and join πάντες δὲ ἀλλήλοις to the preceding, 'yea, all of you [be subject] to one another.' But this is unnecessary, the dative being in this sense abundantly justified: cf. Rom. xiv. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 22; 2 Cor. v. 13. Winer, § 31. 4. b): because (reason why you should gird on humility) God (the citation agrees verbatim with James iv. 6) opposeth Himself to the proud ('reliqua peccata fugiunt Deum, sola superbia se opponit Deo; reliqua peccata deprimit hominem, sola superbia erigit eum contra Deum. Inde etiam Deus superbia vicissim se opponit,' Gerhard. The student will remember the saying of Artabanus to Xerxes, Herod. vii. 10, ὄρᾳς τὰ ὑπερέχοντα ζῶα ὡς κεραυνοὶ ὁ θεός, οὐδὲ ἐᾷ φαντάζεσθαι, τὰ δὲ μικρὰ οὐδέν μιν κνίσει; . . . φιλέει γὰρ ὁ θεός τὰ ὑπερέχοντα πάντα κολοῦειν), but giveth grace to the humble (ταπεινοῖς here in a subjective sense, the lowly-minded, those who by their humility are low. "Humilitas est vas gratiarum," Aug. in Gerh.).

6.] Humble yourselves (on the medial signification of some verbs in the aor. 1 pass. in the N. T., see Winer, § 39. 2. The commonest example is ἀποκριθεῖς. Cf. also διεκρίθη, Matt. xxi. 21; Rom. iv. 20, &c) therefore (the same spirit as before continues through this and the following verses: the μέριμνα here, and the παθήματα, ver. 9, keeping in mind their persecutions and anxieties, as also does κραταίων χεῖρα, see below) under the mighty hand of God (on the expression, see reff., LXX. The strong hand of God is laid on the afflicted and suffering, and it is for them to acknowledge it in lowliness of mind), that He may exalt you (the Apostle refers to the often repeated saying of our Lord, Matt. xxiii. 13, Luke xiv. 11, xviii. 14.) The same is also found in the O. T., Ps. xviii. 27; Prov. xix. 23) in [the] time [appointed] (ἐν καιρῷ is one of those phrases in which the article is constantly omitted: see reff., and Winer, § 19. 1. This humility implies patience, waiting God's time: "ut nimis festinationi simul obviam eat," Calv. The καιρός need not necessarily be understood as Bengel ["Petrus sæpe spectat diem judicii"] of the end; it is more general: cf. ἐν καιροῖς ἰδίους, 1 Tim. vi. 15): 7.] casting (aor., once for all, by an act which includes the life) all your anxiety (πᾶσαν τὴν, 'the whole of; not, every anxiety as it arises: for none will arise if this transference has been effectually made. This again is an O. T. citation [ref. Ps.], ἐπιρρίψον ἐπὶ κύριον τὴν μέριμνάν σου. The art. also shews that the μέριμνα was not a possible, but a present one; that the exhortation is addressed to men under sufferings. As to the connexion, we may remark, that this participial clause is explanatory of the former imperative one, inasmuch as all anxiety is a contradiction of true humility: μέριμνα, by which the spirit μερίζεται, part for God, part for unbelief, is in fact an exalting self against Him) upon Him, because (seeing that: the justifying reason for the ἐπιρρίψαι) He careth (αὐτῷ prefixed for emphasis, to take up the ἐπ' αὐτόν) for (about: the distinction between περὶ and ὑπὲρ after verbs of caring is thus given by Weber, Demosth. p. 130 [see Winer, § 47. l]: "περὶ solam mentis circumspectionem vel respectum rei, ὑπὲρ simul animi propensionem significat." But perhaps it must not be too much pressed) you. 8, 9.] Other necessary exhortations under their afflictions; and now with reference to the great spiritual adversary, as before to God and their own hearts.

This sobriety of mind, as opposed to intoxication with μέριμνα βιωτικά, is necessary to the ἀντιστῆναι στερεοί: only he who is sober stands firm), be watchful (can it be that Peter thought of his Lord's οὐτως οὐκ ἰσχύσατε μίαν ὥραν γρηγορῆσαι μετ' ἐμοῦ, on the fatal night when he denied Him?

Bengel says, “νήψατε, vigilate, anima: γρηγορήσατε, vigilate, corpore:” but the distinction is not borne out: both words are far better taken as applying to the mind; as Aug. in Wies.: “corde vigila, fide vigila, spe vigila, caritate vigila, operibus vigila”): your adversary (the omission of any causal particle, as ὅτι, inserted in the rec., makes the appeal livelier and more forcible, leaving the obvious connexion to be filled up by the reader. ὁ ἀντίδ. ὑμ., your great and well-known adversary: “ut sciant, hac lege se Christi fidem profiteri, ut cum diabolo continuum bellum habeant. Neque enim membris parcat, qui cum capite præliatur,” Calv. ἀντιδικος properly, and in reff. an adversary in a suit at law: but here = ἰσχυρὸν, an enemy in general) the devil (anarthrous as a proper name, as in Acts xiii. 10; Rev. xx. 2) as a roaring lion (“comparatur diabolus leoni famelicus et præimpatia famis rugienti, quia perniciem nostram inexplebiliter appetit, nec ulla præda ei sufficit,” Gerh.) walketh about (cf. Job i. 7, ii. 2) seeking whom to devour (“incorporando sibi per mortalem culpam,” Lyra: see reff.):

hard expresses it, not only παθημάτων συμμέτοχοι, but in “precibus et pugna contra Satanam σύμμαχοι”) that the very same sufferings (this construction, a gen. after ὁ αὐτός, is not elsewhere found in N. T. In it, as in the dat. construction in reff., the adj. is made into a subst. to express more completely the identity. It is [see Winer, § 34. 2] much as when an adj. is made into a subst. governing a gen.: e. g. τὸ ἀμετάθετον τῆς βουλῆς Heb. vi. 17, τὸ ὑπερέχον τῆς γνώσεως Phil. iii. 8, τὸ πιστὸν τῆς πολιτείας Thuc. i. 68, τὸ ὑπερβάλλον τῆς ἀόπτης Plato, Phædr. 240 A) are being accomplished in (the case of: the dat. of reference, as in γίνεσθαι ὑμῖν and similar phrases. Much unnecessary difficulty has been found in the word ἐπιτελεῖσθαι. It has its usual N. T. meaning of ‘accomplish,’ ‘complete,’ as in reff. and Phil. i. 6, al.; these sufferings were being accomplished, their full measure attained, according to the will of God, and by the appointment of God, in, with reference to, in the case of, the ἀδελφότης. The Dative must not be regarded as = a gen. with ὑπό: but there is another way of taking it, viz. as dependent on τὰ αὐτὰ, making ἐπιτελεῖσθαι middle: “knowing that ye are accomplishing the same sufferings with” &c. This is defended by Harless; but in this case we should certainly expect ὑμᾶς to be inserted, as αὐτὸν in Luke iv. 41, and σεαυτὸν in Rom. ii. 19) your brotherhood (ref.) in the world (ἐν κόσμῳ, not to direct attention to another brotherhood not in the world, as Huther; but as identifying their state with yours: who, like yourselves, are in the world, and thence have, like yourselves, to expect such trials).

thing is sure: cr as Bengel, "vos tantum vigilate et resistite hosti: cætera Deus præstabit") the God of all grace (who is the Source of all spiritual help for every occasion: see reff.) who called you (which was the first proof of His grace towards you) unto (with a view to; 'consolationis argumentum: He who has begun grace with a view to glory, will not cut off grace till it be perfected in glory. Cf. 1 Thess. ii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 14) His eternal glory in Christ Jesus (ἐν χρ. Ἰησ. belongs to καλέσας, which has since been defined by ὑμᾶς εἰς τ. αι. αὐ. δόξ. Christ Jesus is the element in which that calling took place. The words cannot, as Calov., al., be joined with what follows), when ye have suffered a little while (these words belong to what has gone before, ὁ καλέσας ὑμᾶς κ.τ.λ., not to what follows, as is decisively shewn by the consideration that all four verbs must belong to acts of God on them in this life, while these sufferings would be still going on. The ὀλίγον παθόντας expresses the condition of their calling to glory in Christ, viz. after having suffered for a short time. παθόντας, as in all cases of an aor. part. connected with a future verb, is to be taken in the strictness of its aoristic meaning as a futurus exactus: the παθήματα are over when the δόξα comes in), shall Himself (αὐτός, solemn and emphatic: "ostendit enim Apostolus ex eodem gratiæ fonte et primam ad gloriam cælestem vocationem et ultimam hujus beneficii consummationem provenire," Gerhard) perfect [you] (see ref. Heb. and note: "ne remanet in vobis defectus," Beng.), shall confirm (establish you firmly, so as to be στερεοὶ τῇ πίστει: "ne quid vos labefactet," Beng.), shall strengthen (the word σθενώω belongs to later Greek), shall ground [you] (fix you as on a foundation, "ut superetis omnem vim adversam. Digna Petro oratio. Confirmat fratres suos," Bengel. Cf. Luke xxii. 32, σὺ ποτὲ ἐπιστρέψας στήρισον τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς σου: and 2 Tim. ii. 19, ὁ στερεὸς θεμέλιος τοῦ θεοῦ ἔστηκεν):

Amen.

12—14.] CONCLUSION. By Silvanus the faithful brother (there seems to be no reason for distinguishing this Silvanus from the companion of St. Paul and Timotheus, mentioned in 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1; 2 Cor. i. 19, and known by the name of Silas in the Acts. See further in Prolegomena, § iv. 19), as I reckon (ὡς λογίζομαι belongs most naturally to τοῦ πιστοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, not to δι' ὀλίγων which follows: and indicates the Apostle's judgment concerning Silvanus, given, not in any disparagement of him, nor indicating, as De W. and Bengel, that he was not known to St. Peter, but as fortifying him, in his mission to the churches addressed, with the Apostle's recommendation, over and above the acquaintance which the readers may already have had with him), I have written (the epistolary aor. See reff.) to you (ὑμῖν is taken by some, as E. V., Luther, Steiger, al., as dependent on πιστοῦ, which is harsh, and leaves ἔγραψα without any object of address) in (by means of, as my vehicle of conveying my meaning) few words (Erasm., Grot., Pott, al. fancy that this ἔγρ. δι' ὀλίγων refers to the second Epistle: but see 2 Pet. iii. 1. more copious instructions which Silvanus was to give them by word of mouth: or may serve to fix their attention more pointedly on that which had been thus concisely said), exhorting (such in the main is the character of the Epistle) and giving my testimony (the ἐπί in ἐπιμαρτυρῶν indicates merely the direction of the testimony, not as Bengel, "testimonium jam per Paulum et Silam audierant pridem: Petrus insuper testatur") that this (of which I have written to you; see below) is (the inf. εἶναι belongs to both παρακαλῶν and ἐπιμαρτυρῶν) the true grace (not "doctrina evangelii" as Gerh., nor "state of grace" as De Wette, but simply "grace" ch. i. 2, as testified by the preaching of the Apostles to be covenanted and granted to them by God. This identification of the preached and written message with the true mind of God towards man, is not uncommon with our Apostle: e. g., ch. i. 12, 25 [ii. 10, 25]. The reason of this was not any difference, as some would have us believe, between the teachings of St. Peter and St. Paul, but the difficulty presented to the readers in the fact of the fiery trial of sufferings which they were passing through) of God, in which stand ye (the construction is pregnant; into which being admitted, stand in it. On every account, we are bound to read στήτε, not ἐστήκατε, which has apparently come in from the similar ἐν ἧ [ῶ] ἐστήκατε in reff. Every reason which Wiesinger gives against στήτε, is in fact a reason for it. στήτε εἰς is, he says, evidently wrong, because the readers were already in the grace:—I answer,—and consequently it was corrected to what seemed right: εἰς ἣν στήτε, he says further, would not fit the context:—and consequently, we may reply, the temptation would be stronger to correct it. The idea of its having been an emendation to suit παρακαλῶν is simply absurd; that participle referring back to the contents of the Epistle, not requiring any justification in this sentence; as any, even the dullest copyist, must see. As it stands, it is a short and earnest exhortation, containing in it in fact the pith of what has been said by way of exhortation in the whole Epistle.

13.] She that is elected together with you in Babylon salutes you (who, or what is this? The great majority of Commentators understand it to mean a sister congregation, elect like yourselves, ch. i. 1. So N al. in digest, E. V., Luth., Calv., Gerhard, Steiger, &c., and the more recent interpreters, De Wette, Huther, Wiesinger. And this perhaps may be a legitimate interpretation. Still it seems hardly probable, that there should be joined together in the same sending of salutation, an abstraction, spoken of thus enigmatically, and a man, Μάρκος ὁ υἱός μου, by name. No mention has occurred in the Epistle of the word ἐκκλησία, to which reference might be made: if such reference be sought for, διασπορά, in ch. i. 1, is the only word suitable, and that could hardly be used of the congregation in any particular place. Finally, it seems to be required by the rules of analogy, that in an Epistle addressed to ἐκλεκτοὶ παρεπίδημοι, individually, not gregatim, ἢ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτή must be an individual person also. These considerations induce me to accede to the opinion of those, who recognize here the ἀδελφῆ γυνή whom St. Peter περιήγεν, 1 Cor. ix. 5: and to find, in the somewhat unusual periphrastic way of speaking of her, a confirmation of this view. Bengel, who defends it, adduces ch. iii. 7, where the wives are called συγκληρονόμοι χάριτος ζωῆς. Still, I own, the words ἐν Βαβυλῶνι a little stagger me in this view. But it seems less forced than the other. On the question, what Babylon is intended, whether Rome, or the Chaldaean capital, or some village in Egypt, see Prolegomena, § iv. 10 ff.), and Marcus my son (perhaps, and so most have thought, the well-known Evangelist [see Eus. H. E. ii. 15: Orig. in Eus. vi. 25: Ec. al.]: perhaps the actual son of St. Peter, bearing this name [Ec.-altern., Bengel, al.]. The fact of Peter taking refuge in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark [Acts xii. 2], casts hardly any weight on the side of the former interpretation: but it derives some probability from the circumstance

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. Symeon (see var. readd. The form, as belonging to our Apostle, is found, besides here, only in Acts xv. 14. Its occurrence is at all events a testimony in favour of the independence of the second Epistle. It was not adapted to the first: which, considering that it refers to the first, is a note, however slight, on the side of its genuineness) Peter, a servant (Rom. i. 1) and apostle (an ingenious reason is given by De Wette for the occurrence of both these designations: that the Writer combined 1 Pet. i. 1, with Jude 1) of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained (λαγχάνειν [with acc. as reff. Acts, 3 Macc.] shows, as Beng., that “non ipsi sibi pararunt:” as Huss in Huther, “sicut sors non respicit personam, ita nec divina electio acceptatrix est personarum”) like precious faith (faith,—i.e. substance of truth believed: faith objective, not subjective,—of equal value: not, as De W., which confers equal right to God’s kingdom, equal honour and glory: such a meaning would be unexampled. The E. V. has hit the meaning very happily by like precious. Cf. 1 Pet. ii. 7. Huther quotes from Horneius [similarly Estius]; “dicitur fides æque pretiosa, non quod omnium credentium æque magna sit, sed quod per fidem illam eadem mysteria et eadem beneficia divina nobis proponantur”) with us (apparently, in the first place, the Apostles: but more probably, in a wider sense, the Jewish Christians, with whom the Gentiles had been admitted into the same covenant, and the inheritance of the like precious promises) in the righteousness of our God and [our] Saviour Jesus Christ (first, concerning ἐν δικαιοσύνη. Some Commentators, as Beza, Grot., Piscator, al., take δικ. for an attribute of God, and ἐν as instrumental, by the righteousness, goodness, truth, of God: others, as Estius, Horneius, al., understand δικ. as “justitia quam Deus nobis dat et Christus peperit” [Horn.], explaining ἐν as ‘cum’ or ‘per:’ but, as Huther well replies, this is objectionable, seeing that righteousness comes by faith, not faith by righteousness. De Wette would give two different meanings to δικ. as applied to the Father and to the Son, in the former case making it mean grace, in the latter love: but this is evidently quite arbitrary. Gerhard would confine it altogether to the “obedientia et satisfactio Christi,” against which is τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν. The best explanation seems to me that of Huther, that δικαιοσύνη here betokens the righteous dealing of God, corresponding to His attribute of righteousness, as opposed to προσωποληψία: and that the words are to be taken in close connexion with the foregoing, τοῖς ἰσότημον ἡμῶν λαχοῦσιν πίστιν, ἐν being used of the conditional element, in which the λαχεῖν πίστιν ἰσότημον is grounded: so that the sense is, in His righteousness, which makes no difference between the one party and the other, God has given to you the like precious faith, as to us. De W.'s objection to this, that thus the Epistle must be regarded as written to Gentile Christians, is not valid, or proves too much: for at all events there must be two parties in view in the words ἰσότημον ἡμῖν, whatever these parties be. Next, as to the words τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν καὶ σωτήρος Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ. Undoubtedly, as in Titus ii. 13, in strict grammatical propriety, both θεοῦ and σωτήρος would be predicates of Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ. But here, as there, considerations interpose, which seem to remove the strict grammatical rendering out of the range of probable meaning. I have fully discussed the question in the note on that passage, to which I would refer the reader as my justification for interpreting here, as there, τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν of the Father, and σωτήρος Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ of the Son. Here, there is the additional consideration in favour of this view, that the Two are distinguished most plainly in the next verse): 2.] grace to you and peace be multiplied (so in ref.: but further specified here by what follows) in (as the vehicle, or conditional element of the multiplication) knowledge (ἐπίγνωσις, "cognitio maturior:" but this can hardly be given in English without too strong a phrase) of God, and of Jesus our Lord (every unusual expression, like Ἰησ. τοῦ κυρ. ἡμῶν, occurring only Rom. iv. 24, should be noticed as a morsel of evidence to the independence of the Epistle).

3—11.] Exhortation to advance in the graces of the spiritual life: introduced (vv. 3, 4) by a consideration of the rich bestowal from God of all things belonging to that life by the knowledge of Him, and the aim of His promises, viz. that we should partake in the divine nature. 3.] Seeing that (the connexion with the greeting which precedes must not be broken: it is characteristic of this Epistle, to dilate further when the sense seems to have come to a close. The sense of ὡς with a gen. absolute is, "assuming that," "seeing that;" cf. Plato, Alcib. i. p. 10, οὐκοῦν ὡς διανοουμένου σου ταῦτα ἐρωτῶ, ἀφίημί σε διανοεῖσθαι: Xen. Cyr. iii. 1. 9, ἀλλ' ἐρώτα, ἔφη, δὲ Κύρε, ὅτι βούλει, ὡς τὰ ληθῆ ἐροῦντος. See Matthiæ, § 568. 2. Winer, § 65. 9. The latter explains the usage thus, "ὡς with a participle in the gen. absolute construction, gives to the idea of the verb a subjective character, of assumption, or intention") His divine (θεῖος, a word peculiar in N. T., as an adjective, to this Epistle: see ref.) power hath given (δεδωρημένης, middle in signification, as perfect passives so often: so προσκείμεμαι αὐτοῦς, Acts xiii. 2, xvi. 10, xxv. 12: δ ἐπήγγελται, Rom. iv. 21; Heb. xii. 26: see Winer, § 39. 3) us all things (πάντα is prefixed by way of emphasis) which are [requisite] for (reff.) life and godliness (εὐσέβεια is a mark of the later apostolic period: reff.), through (by means of, as the medium of attainment: "Dei cognitio principium est vitæ [John xvii. 3] et primum in pietatem ingressus." However these words be read, whether as in text, or διὰ δόξης κ. ἀρετῆς, both substantives belong to God, not to us: still less must we render, as in E. V., "called us to glory and virtue," of which meaning there is not a trace in either reading. Bengel seems to give the meaning well, "ad glo-

 of this usage of the aor. has not been any

The reason here being, ὡς . . . δεδωρμένης κ.τ.λ., above: so that this forms a sort of apodosis to that sentence. The E. V. 'beside this' is entirely at fault. Nor can we, as Diellein, make αὐτὸ τοῦτο the object after ἐπιχορηγήσατε giving on your part (παρεισενέγκαντες, lit. introducing by the side of: i. e. besides those precious promises on God's part, bringing in on your part) all diligence (so σπουδῆν εἰσενέγκαι or εἰσενέγκασθαι in Libanius, Josephus, Antt. xx. 9. 2, Diod. Sic. p. 554, in Wetst.), furnish (from the original meaning of the verb, to provide expenses for a chorus, it easily gets this of furnishing forth: see ref. And the construction and meaning of the following clauses is not as Horneius and the E. V., "adjicite fidei virtutem &c.," but the ἐν is each time used of that which is assumed to be theirs, and the exhortation is, to take care that, in the exercise of that, the next step is developed: "præsens quisque gradus subsequentem parit et facilem reddit: subsequens priorem temperat ac perficit," Bengel) in your faith (Bengel remarks, "fides, Dei donum: ideo non jubemur subministrare fidem, sed in fide fructus illos, qui septem enumerantur: fide chorum ducente, amore concludente") virtue (best perhaps understood with Bengel as "strenuus animi tonus ac vigor." Ec. gives it τὰ ἔργα; but this seems too general: it is indeed that which produces τὰ ἔργα, without which faith is dead: and hence the connexion), and in your virtue, knowledge (probably that practical discriminating knowledge, of which it is said Eph. v. 17, μὴ γίνεσθε ἄφρονες, ἀλλὰ συνίετε τί τὸ θέλημα τοῦ κυρίου: "quæ malum a bono secernit, et mali fugam docet," Beng.: not as Ec., ἡ τῶν τοῦ θεοῦ ἀποκρῦφων μυστηρίων εἰδῆσις), 6.] and in your knowledge, self-government (ἐγκράτεια, τὸ μηδενὶ ἀποσύρῃσθαι πάθει, as Ec. "Temperance" is now too much used of one sort only of self-government, fully to express the word. The Commentators compare Sir. xviii. 30, where under the head ἐγκράτεια ψυχῆς is said, ὀπίσω τῶν ἐπιθυμιῶν σου μὴ πορεύου, καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν ὀρέξεων σου καλύου. The connexion is: let such discriminating knowledge not be without its fruit, of steady holding in hand of the passions and tempers), and in your self-government, patient endurance (in afflictions and trials), and in your patient endurance, godliness (i. e. it is not to be mere brute Stoical endurance, but united with God-fearing and God-trusting. Or it may perhaps be used without direct reference to God, as in Dio Cass. xviii. 5, διὰ τὴν πρὸς τὸν ἀδελφὸν εὐσέβειαν: but the other is much more likely in the N. T.: especially as the social virtues follow), 7.] and in your godliness, brotherly love (not suffering your godliness to be moroseness, nor a sullen solitary habit of life, but kind and generous and courteous), and in your brotherly love, charity (universal kindness of thought, word, and act towards all: a catholic large-heartedness, not confining the spirit of φιλαδελφία to ἀδελφοί only, Matt. v. 46, 47. So that these two last correspond to the ἀγάπη εἰς ἀλλήλους καὶ εἰς πάντας of 1 Thess. iii. 12). 8, 9.] Reasons for the foregoing exhortations: 1. positive, the advantage of these Christian graces in bringing forth fruit towards the mature knowledge of Christ: 2. negative, the disadvantage of their absence from the character. 8.] For these things (the above-mentioned graces) being in you (ὑπάρχων of previous sub-

V. “abounding:” see reff.) render you (not pres. for future, but as expressing the habitual character and function of these virtues) not idle (ἀργός = ἄεργος) nor yet (οὐδέ introduces a slight climax: a man may be in some sense not unfruitful, but yet unworkful) unfruitful towards (εἰς not = ἐν as E. V. after Luth., Calv., Grot., al.: these virtues are all regarded as so many steps in advancing towards the ἐπίγνωσις of Christ, which is the great complex end of the Christian life) the perfect knowledge (here, considering the place which it holds, it is well to give the full sense of ἐπίγνωσις) of our Lord Jesus Christ (in Him are hid, ethically as well as doctrinally, all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge: the knowledge of Him is the imitation of Him: for as it is true that hereafter the seeing Him as He is will ensure our being perfectly like Him, so it is true that here the only way in any degree increasingly to see Him as He is, is to become increasingly like Him. He only can declare Christ, who reflects Christ).

9.] For (negative reason: see above: and that, with reference not only to the exhortations of vv. 5, 6, 7, but by this γὰρ connected also with ver. 8: the advantage of the presence is great, for the disadvantage of the absence indicates no less than spiritual blindness and oblivion) he to whom these are not present (contrast to ταῦτα ὑμῖν ὑπάρχοντα κ. πλεονάζοντα, ver. 8) is blind (lacks discernment altogether of his own state as a member of Christ and inheritor of heaven), short-sighted (μυωπάζειν λέγονται οἱ ἐκ γενετῆς τὰ μὲν ἐγγύς βλέποντες, τὰ δὲ ἐξ ἀποστάσεως οὐχ ὀρῶντες: ἐναντία δὲ πάσχουσιν οἱ γέροντες τοῖς μυωπάζουσιν, τὰ γὰρ ἐγγύς μὴ ὀρῶντες τὰ ὑπὲρ ὄψιν βλέπουσιν, Aristot. Probl. § 31. Hence some, e. g. Beza, Grot., Est., De W., Huther, interpret the word of not being able to see the heavenly things, which are distant, only earthly, which are close at hand. Perhaps,

however, Horneius is right in characterizing this as an “interpretatio argutior quam ut Apostolo proposita fuisse videri possit.” The vulg. “manu tentans” [Luth., und tappet mit der Hand: “manu viam tentans,” Erasm.] seems to have come from the gloss ψηλαφῶν. Thl. explains it by τυφλωττειν, ἀπὸ τῶν ὑπὸ τὴν γῆν μῶν τυφλῶν εἰς ἅπαν διατελούντων: but thus we should have a mere tautology. Wolf adopts the interpretation “shutting the eyes,” seeing that Hesych. and Suidas explain it by καμμῆναι, and that μυωπάζειν is only μῦναι τὰς ὄψας. “Itaque,” he proceeds, “τυφλὸς μυωπάζων is dicitur qui ideo cæcus est, quia sponte claudit oculos, ut ne videat, aut qui videre se dissimulat, quod vel invitus cernit.” This was also the opinion of Bochart, Hieroz. i. 4, whose arguments will be found reproduced in Suicer sub voce. On the whole I prefer the interpretation “short-sighted,” without endorsing the ingenious explanation of Beza al. above), having incurred forgetfulness (reff. and Athen. xii. 5, p. 523, λήθην λαβόντες τῆς Κρητῶν περὶ τὸν βίον εἰκοσμίας. See more examples in Kyрке, Krebs, and Loesner, h. l. Bengel says, “participio naetus exprimitur quod homo volens patitur.” But surely this is very doubtful; certainly not upheld by the usage of the phrase) of the purification of his former sins (i. e. of the fact of his ancient, pre-Christian, sins having been purged away in his baptism. This, and not the purification of the sins of the world, and of his among them, by the cross of Christ, is evidently the sense, by the πάλαι and αὐτοῦ. And thus almost all the Commentators. καὶ γὰρ καὶ οὗτος ἐπιγνοὺς ἑαυτὸν διὰ τὸ καθαρῆναι τῷ ἁγίῳ βαπτίσματι, ὅτι πλήθους ἀμαρτιῶν ἐξεπλήθη, δέον εἰδέναί ὅτι καθαρθεὶς καὶ ἀγιότητα ἔλαβε, νήφειν ἵνα διαπαντὸς τηρῇ τὸν ἀγιασμόν, οὐ χωρὶς οὐδεὶς ὑψεται τὸν κύριον, ὃ δὲ ἐπελάθετο. (Ec. and so Thl.).

mate results, if followed. 10.] Wherefore the rather ("quæ cum ita sint, impensius." διό referring to the two considerations urged in vv. 8, 9, and μάλλον making them reasons for increased zeal in complying with the exhortation), brethren (making the appeal more close and affectionate), give diligence (so the E. V. admirably. 'Be earnest' would express rather σπουδάσετε pres., whereas the aor. includes the whole σπουδάσαι in one life-long effort) to make (not ποιεῖν, which lay beyond their power, but ποιείσθαι, on their side, for their part. But the verb must not be explained away into a pure subjectivity, 'to make sure to yourselves:' it carries the reflexive force, but only in so far as the act is and must be done for and quoad a man's own self, the absolute and final determination resting with Another. Calvin's "studete ut re ipsa testatum fiat, vos non frustra vocatos esse" [ββεβαίαν ποιείσθαι?] is a very weak dilution of the sense. We must take the passage as we find it: and as it stands its simple and irrefragable sense is that by σπουδῆν παρενεργεῖν ἐπιχορηγήσαι ἐν κ.τ.λ. is the way ββεβαίαν ποιείσθαι our κλήσιν and ἐκλογῆν. How this is to be reconciled with the fact, that our κλήσις and ἐκλογῆ proceed entirely and freely from God, would not be difficult to shew: but it must not be done, as Calvin attempts it, by wresting plain words and context) your calling and election (as Grot., al., "vocatío quæ nobis contigit per evangelium, et electio eam secuta, quum facti estis Dei populus." Both these were God's acts, cf. ver. 3 and 1 Pet. i. 2) secure ('ratæ,' as Grot.: for both, in as far as we look on them from the lower side, not able to penetrate into the counsels of God, are insecure unless established by holiness of life. In His foreknowledge and purpose, there is no insecurity, no uncertainty: but in our vision and apprehension of them as they exist in and for us, much, until they are made secure in the way here pointed out): for, doing these things (act., ποιούντες, now, because these are works done. And the participle is conditional, carrying with it an hypothesis: as E. V. 'if ye do these things'), ye shall never offend (reff. stumble and fall): 11.] for thus (i. e. ταῦτα ποιούντες) shall be richly (the adverb πλουσίως is not, as Huther, surprising, but most natural and obvious with the verb ἐπιχορηγήσεται, which is one of furnishing and ministering; therefore of quantity. The adverb belongs to the figure latent in the verb: and must therefore be interpreted in and with the interpretation of the verb: in which case it will indicate high degrees and fulness of glory) furnished to you (the verb seems expressly chosen in order to answer to ἐπιχορηγήσατε, ver. 5: "furnish forth your own lives with these Christian graces, so shall be furnished to you" &c.) the entrance (which all Christians look for: not the fact of this entrance taking place, but the fact of its πλουσίως ἐπιχορηγήσθαι, is that asserted) into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. 12—21.] The above exhortations confirmed by the consideration of the certainty of the power and announced coming of Christ, as shewn, 1. by apostolic testimony, 2. by O. T. prophecy. 12—15.] The Apostle holds it necessary to remind them of this truth, and will do so up to his approaching end.

12.] Wherefore (namely, because ταῦτα ποιῶντες is the only way to a rich participation in the blessings and glories of Christ's kingdom) I will be sure (μελλήσω, ref., is of very rare occurrence. The expression is nearly equivalent to "I will take care" [σπουδάσω, Hesych.]: for [see Lexx. and esp. Palm and Rost] the original idea of μέλλω [akin to μέλω and the Latin "velle"] includes purpose; and the verb is very commonly used, by Homer, e. g., to signify intent: so Od. v. 293, οὐκ ἔρ' ἐμελλες λήξειν ἀπατάων, and in other examples in Palm and Rost. At the same time there is an objectivity in the word, of which it is not possible to divest it, implying that the thing intended is surely about to happen: and which I have tried to express as above) always to remind you concerning these things (τούτων, the things just now spoken of: in the widest sense: it does not merely take up the ταῦτα of ταῦτα ποιῶντες, nor merely, as De W., refer to the kingdom of Christ and His coming), although ye know them (ἕκαστον ὑμῶν, καίπερ ἀκριβῶς εἰδότας, ὑμῶς ἐπαναμνήσαι βούλομαι. Demosth. p. 74. 7) and are confirmed (firmly established) in the truth which is present with you (the words "the present truth," E. V., give a wrong idea to the English reader: seeming to mean, the truth at present under notice. The meaning is exactly as in ref., τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τοῦ παρόντος εἰς ὑμᾶς:—"which is [known and professed] among you." "Vos quidem, inquit, probe tenetis quænam sit evangelii veritas, neque vos quasi fluctuantes confirmo, sed in re tanta monitiones nunquam sunt supervacua, quare nunquam molestæ esse debent. Simili excusatione utitur Paulus ad Rom., xv. 14." Calvin).

13.] But (notwithstanding this previously conceded fact, that you know and stand firm in the truth) I think it right (why, follows, ver. 14) as long as (ἔφ' ὅσον, scil. χρόνον, see Rom. vii. 1 al.) I am in this tabernacle (see for the sense 2 Cor. v. 1 ff.: and below), to stir you up in (not, "by:" in, as the medium in which I strive towards the stirring up, and in using which it has place) reminding (the same phrase occurs in ch. iii. 1):

14.] knowing (as I do; reason for δίκαιον ἡγοῦμαι above) that rapid is (see below. ἔστιν, of that which is to be: the normal present) the putting off (the two figures, of a tabernacle or tent, and a garment, are intermingled, as in 2 Cor. v. 1 ff.) of my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ declared to me (the allusion is to John xxi. 18 ff., where a swift and sharp death is announced to St. Peter by our risen Lord. And the sentence does not mean to say, as commonly understood, that he must soon put off his tabernacle, but that the putting off, whenever it did come, would be sudden and quick; so vulg.: "certus quod velox est depositio tabernaculi mei" [which can hardly be interpreted with Estius, "id est, brevi futura est"]: so Bengel, "repentina est; præsens. Qui diu ægrotant, possunt alios adhuc pascere. Crux id Petro non erat permissura. Ideo prius agit quod agendum est." So Eur. Hippol. 10-14, ταχύς γὰρ ἄδης ῥᾶστος ἀνδρὶ δυστυχεῖ: Soph. Ajax 833, σὺν ἀσφαδάστω καὶ ταχεῖ πηδήματι πλευρὰν διαρρήξαντα: Mosch. iii. 26, σεῖο, Βίων, ἐκλαυσε ταχὺν μόρον αὐτὸς Ἀπόλλων. Missing this point, some have imagined that some other special revelation to St. Peter is implied: and such revelations are related by Hegesippus de excid. Hierosol. iii. 2, Ambros. Sermo de bas. trad. Ep. 21 [32], vol. iii., p. 867: see especially Corn. a-Lapide h. l. But even if ταχινή be understood 'soon,' 'not far off,' no such inference need be drawn. For it might well be that advancing old age might lead the Apostle to the conclusion that the end prophesied to him ὅταν γηράσῃς could not be far off. The Commentators quote Jos. Antt. iv. 8. 2, where Moses says, ἐπεὶ . . . δεῖ με τοῦ ζῆν

15.] Moreover (δὲ καὶ both serve for connexion with the foregoing) I will endeavour that ye may on every occasion have it in your power (reff.) after my decease (it is at least remarkable that, with the recollection of the scene on the mount of transfiguration floating in his mind, the Apostle should use so close together the words which were there also associated, viz. σκῆνωμα and ἔξοδος: see Luke ix. 28 ff. The coincidence should not be forgotten in treating of the question of the genuineness of the Epistle) to exercise the memory of these things (μνήμην ποιῆσαι) is almost always used for to make mention of: so Herodot. vi. 19, 55, vit. Hom. 14, and other examples in Wetst.: but such evidently is not its sense here. In Thucyd. [reff.] the sense is ambiguous, but from οὕτως ἄσονται following, it would appear that to quote or make mention is also the sense there, though Palm and Rost give it as here. An interpretation has been given to this latter clause which the very position of the Greek words, μετὰ τὴν ἐμὴν ἔξοδον, after ἔχειν ὑμᾶς, ought sufficiently to have guarded against: viz. that St. Peter says σπουδαῖω καὶ μετὰ τὴν ἐμὴν ἔξοδον, meaning, as Ec. and Thl. mentioning this view, ὅτι καὶ μετὰ θάνατον οἱ ἅγιοι μέμνηνται τῶν τῆδε, καὶ πρὸς βουλοῦσιν ὑπὲρ τῶν ζώντων [but not with approval, merely stating that τοῦτό τις ἐν ὑπερβάτω ἀκούοντες (per hyperbaton intelligentes) βούλονται παριστᾶν ἀπὸ τούτου ὅτι κ.τ.λ.]. Many of the R.-Catholic interpreters take this view; so Corn. a-Lap., ἔχειν, “habere scilicet in mente et memoria mea [?] ut crebro vestri sim memor apud Deum, eumque pro vobis oram, ut horum monitorum meorum memoriam vobis refricet. Ita Cœcumenius [compare above. The more candid Estius confesses, “Ec. etiam hujus meminit interpretationis, sed alteram præfert ut simpliciore[m]”, &c.” and he concludes: “Hinc patet S. Petrum et Sanctos vita functos curare res mortalium, ideoque esse invocandos.” And so Justiniani, but not so confidently: Feuardentins, doubtfully at first, but “vires acquirens eundo,” and ending with a vehement invective against the heretics who hold the interpretation which he himself had previously given. Estius, on the other hand, impugns this view, supporting the ordinary one, and ending “Jam quid attinet, statuere velle doctrinam certissimam argumento incerto, cum alia certissima nequaquam desint?” It is most instructive, especially in our days, to take up any of the texts, by which the abuses of Rome are supposed to be sanctioned, and to trace their interpretations through the R.-Cath. Commentators themselves. It will be most frequently found, as here, that the confident allegation of them has arisen at first out of some merely conjectural sense, impugned by the very authorities which they quote for it, or supported, as in this case [compare the citations in Corn. a-Lap. and Estius], by spurious writings attributed to the Fathers). 16—18.] Corroboration of the certainty of the facts announced by apostolic eye-witness.

16.] For (reason for the zeal which he had just predicated of himself) not in pursuance of (ἐξακολ., see reff. The preposition must not perhaps be pressed: certainly not as Bengel, “τὸ ἐξ errorem notat, cap. ii. 2, 15.” If it is to be rendered, its sense may be much as in our expression, “following out,” i. e. “in pursuance of,” as given above) cunningly-devised fables (add to reff., Aristoph. Nub. 543, ἀεὶ καινὰς ἰδέας σοφίζομαι. They are, as Pott [in Huther], “fabulæ ad decipiendos hominum animos artificiosæ excogitatæ atque exornatæ.” The Commentators quote from the proœmium of Josephus, οἱ μὲν γὰρ ἄλλοι νομοθέται τοῖς μύθοις ἐξακολουθήσαντες κ.τ.λ. Such cunningly-devised fables would be the mythologies of the heathen, the cabalistic stories of the Jews; and these may be alluded to, and perhaps also the fables of the Gnostics, which could, it is true, only be in their infancy, but still might be pointed at by St. Peter, as by St. Paul in reff.: see Prolegomena, Vol. III. ch. vii. § i. 34) did we make known to you (the Writer of this Epistle, says De Wette, wishes to appear to stand in closer relation to his readers, than the writer of 1 Peter: cf. 1 Pet. i. 12. But why so? May not the same Apostle in one place mean the actual preachers who delivered the Gospel to them, in the other, the Apostles, who were its first witnesses? For observe, that first Epistle is addressed to certain definite churches; this, to all Christians generally. Or again, why should it be regarded as absolutely impossible that the publication of some one or more of the existing Gospels may have taken place, and may be alluded to in these words? the power (viz., that conferred on Him by the Father at His glorification, of which the following scene testified, and the actuality of which He himself asserted, when He said, Matt. xxviii. 18, ἐδόθη μοι πᾶσα ἐξουσία ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς: in the strength of which He will come to judge the world) and coming (i. e., as ever, second and glorious coming: not, as Erasm. and many others, His first coming. Nor must the two words be made by hendiadys into "præsentissima majestas," as Bengel) of our Lord Jesus Christ, but [in virtue of] having been admitted (the part., as so often, renders the reason,—the enabling cause of the act. The γενηθέντες may here be pressed to its passive sense, 'having been admitted as:' seeing that γενόμενοι would have been the more natural word, were no such meaning intended) eye-witnesses (ἐπόπτται is a technical word, used of those who were admitted to the highest degree of initiation in the Eleusinian mysteries: and, considering the occasion to which allusion is made, there seems no reason for letting go altogether this reference here: "admitted as initiated spectators." Still, in English, we have no other way of expressing this than as above. Any attempt to introduce the allusion would overcharge the language. The word "admitted" gives a faint hint of it) of His majesty (viz. on the occasion to be mentioned. The words must not be generalized, to reach to all occasions of such witnessing: but it is obvious that neither must the Transfiguration be regarded as standing altogether alone in such an assertion. It is indeed here that incident which marked, to the Apostle's mind, most certainly the reality of Christ's future glory: but it was not the only occasion when he had seen the exhibition of divine power by Him as a foretaste of His power at his return to judgment: cf. John v. 25—28, with John xi. 40—44).

17.] For (justification of the above assertion that we were admitted witnesses of His majesty) having received (the construction is an interrupted one, and seems rightly explained by Winer, as in reff.: "the construction is broken off by the parenthetical clause φωνῆς . . . εὐδόκησα, and the Apostle continues, ver. 18, καὶ ταύτην τὴν φωνὴν ἡμεῖς ἠκούσαμεν, instead, as he would have said, ἡμᾶς εἶχε ταύτην τὴν φωνὴν ἀκούσαντας [-οντας?], or the like." So that the participle does not want supplying by ἦν or ἐτύγχανε, nor is it put for the finite verb) from God the Father (not τοῦ πατρός, or τοῦ π. αὐτοῦ, because θεὸς πατὴρ was a term well known: cf. the same in Gal. i. 3; Eph. vi. 23; Phil. ii. 11; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Tim. i. 2; Tit. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 John 3; Jude 1) honour and glory (honour, in the voice which spoke to him: glory, in the light which shone from Him), when a voice was borne to Him (the occurrence of a similar expression in ref. 1 Pet. is to be noticed. The dative is purely local) of such a kind (viz. as is stated in what follows: "purporting as follows") by (uttered by: the ὑπό of agency after a passive verb. As Winer remarks, § 47, all other renderings are arbitrary) the sublime glory (the words seem to be a periphrasis of God Himself. In ref. Deut., God is called ὁ μεγαλοπρεπῆς τοῦ στερεώματος. So Gerh., De Wette, Huther. Others understand them of the bright cloud which overshadowed the company: others of the heaven: but ὑπό, in its only admissible meaning [see above], will not suit either interpretation), This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased (the words are as in Matt. xvii. 5, where however we have ἐν ᾧ for εἰς ὃν, and αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε is added. In Mark and Luke the words εἰς ὃν κ.τ.λ. are wanting. It is worth notice, that the words are in an independent form here. εἰς ὃν is a pregnant construction,—“on whom my pleasure has lighted and abides.” εὐδόκησα, aor., but only to be given in Eng. by the present. If an account is to be given of the aoristic sense, it must be “my pleasure rested from eternity”).

18.] Substantiation of the personal testimony above adduced by reference to the fact. And this voice we (Apostles: Peter, James, and John) heard borne from heaven (not, as E. V. ungrammatically, “this voice which came from heaven” [τὴν ἐξ οὐρ. ἐν.]: we heard it borne, witnessed its coming, from heaven), being with Him in the holy mount (De Wette is partly right, when he says that this epithet “holy” shews a later view of the fact than that given us in the evangelistic narrative: but not right when he designates that later view wundergläubigere. The epithet would naturally arise when the gospel history was known, as marking a place where a manifestation of this divine presence and glory had taken place. The place whereon Moses stood is said, ref. Exod., to be holy ground. So that really all we can infer from it is, that the history was assumed to be already well known: which is one entirely consistent with the probable date of the Epistle: see Prolegg. It is hardly necessary to refute Grotius’s idea, that Mount Zion is meant, and that the voice referred to is that related in John xii. 28).

19.] And we have more sure the prophetic word (first, for the construction: βεβαιότερον is predicative after ἔχομεν: ‘we have more sure:’ either in the sense of, a. we hold faster, making βεβαιότερον quasi-adverbial: or, b. we possess, more secure. . . . Of these, the latter [see below] is the only one which suits the interpretation of the comparative which we prefer. And thus a double explanation is possible: 1. that the comparative alludes to what has gone before as its reason, as if it had been said διὰ ἔχομεν βεβαιότερον, or καὶ νῦν ἔχ. . . . or καὶ ἐκ τούτου ἔχ.: i. e. ‘on account of this voice from heaven which we heard, we have firmer hold of, or esteem [possess] more sure, the prophetic word, as now having in our own ears begun its fulfilment.’ So (Ec., ἐπεὶ δὲ διὰ τῶν πραγμάτων ἐγνώμεν διὰ τῆς πείρας τὰ ὑπὸ τῶν προφητῶν προκαταγγελλμένα, βεβαιότεραν κρίνομένῃσι διὰ τούτων τὴν προφητείαν αὐτῶν: see the scholia, Grot., Bengel [“firmer fit sermo propheticus ex implemento”], al., and hesitatingly, De Wette. The great objection to such a view is, the omission of any such connecting particles as those above supplied. It is true the Apostle may have omitted them: but even supposing that, it is further against the view, that if such be the force of the comparative, the thought is not at all followed up in the ensuing verses. We come then to the other possible force of the comparative: 2. that it is used as comparing the prophetic word with something which has been mentioned before, as being firmer, more secure than that other. And if so, what is that other? The most obvious answer is, the voice from heaven: and this is at first sight confirmed by the consideration that one word would thus be compared with another, the φωνή with the λόγος. But then comes in the great difficulty, How could the Apostle designate the written word of God, inspired into and transmitted through men, as something firmer, more secure, than the uttered voice of God Himself? And our reply must be, that only in one sense of βεβαιότερος can this be so, viz. as being of wider and larger reference, embracing not only a single testimony to Christ as that divine voice did, but τὰ εἰς χριστὸν παθήματα, κ. τὰς μετὰ ταῦτα δόξας: as presenting a broader basis for the Christian’s trust, and not only one fact, however important. This is a modification of Huther’s view, which takes the comparison to be, that the testimony of the Transfiguration presented only the glory of Christ in the days of His flesh, whereas the prophetic word substantiates His future glory also. But this is insufficient, or rather is not strictly correct: for the Apostle clearly does regard the voice at the Transfiguration as a pledge of Christ's future glory. Either of these is better than Calvin's view:—"non difficilis est hujusmodi solutio, quia hic respectum habet gentis suæ Apostolus: . . . quum apud Judæos indubium esset, a Domino profectum quicquid Prophetæ docuerant, non mirum est si dicat Petrus, firmiorem esse eorum sermonem: jam vetustas quoque ipsa semper aliquid reverentiæ secum trahit." Bede's view is worth quoting: "si enim quispiam [inquit] nostro testimonio discredendum putaverit, quod in secreto gloriam Redemptoris nostri conspeximus divinam, quod vocem Patris ad eum factam audierimus, certe sermoni prophetico nemo contradicere, nullus de hoc ambigere audebit, quem divinis Scripturis jam olim insertum omnes verum esse testantur." And so nearly, Estius. But in this case we should have expected ἐχομεν δὲ καὶ . . . A modification of this view is found in Augustine, in Joh. Tract. xxxv. 8, vol. iii. pt. ii., "quia nos non ibi fuimus, et istam vocem de cælo tunc non audivimus, ait ad nos ipse Petrus, Et habemus certiore propheticum sermonem. Non audistis vocem de cælo delatam, sed certiore habetis propheticum sermonem" [see the same more fully expanded in his Sermon de Scripturis xliii. (xxvii.) 3, 4 (5), vol. v. p. 256]. But then we should have expected ἐχετε. Of course, all attempts to shelve the comparative by making it into a positive [Wir haben ein feste prophetische Wort, Luth.], or a superlative ["habemus firmissimum sermonem propheticum," Beza], are out of the question. τὸν λόγον προφητικόν cannot be as Sherlock, Griesb., N. T. prophecies,—nor as Benson, al., O. and N. T. prophecies combined, on account of the subsequent expression in ch. ii. 1, which confines it to O. T. times), to which ye do well in paying attention (cf. Joseph. in reff. προσέχοντες, sc. τὸν νοῦν, gives the idea of adherence, not merely of notice: compare Heb. ii. 1), as to a candle (the figure is taken from the lighting of a candle at night, and the imagery is as in Rom. xiii. 12, ἡ νύξ προέκοψεν, ἡ δὲ ἡμέρα ἠγγικεν) shining in a dark place (αὐχμηρὸς [αὖω], lit. dry, arid: hence neglected, dirty, dark: "Aristoteles de coloribus operonit τὸ στίλβον κ. λαμπρὸν τῷ αὐχμηρῷ καὶ ἀλαμπεῖ." Wetst. [which seems to answer Kypke, who questions if the sense "dark" can be proved except from Suidas and the grammarians]. Suidas gives αὐχμηρὸν, στυγνόν, ἢ σκοτεινόν: and so Hesych., ξηρόν, σκοτῶδες) until day shall dawn (aor. in the sense of 'futurus exactus': the fact involved in the διαυγάσει coming in upon and putting an end to the state indicated by the pres. participles above. The ἕως οὐ belongs more naturally to προσέχοντες than to φαίνοντι, because that which follows ἕως οὐ relates to the readers, not to the word of prophecy. For διαυγάσειν in the sense of dawning, see ref. Polyb. Plut. moral., p. 893 E, uses it of lightning, τῇ πληγῇ καὶ τῷ σχισμῷ διαυγάσει) and the morning-star shall rise in your hearts (it is said by the Commentators quoting from one another, that φωςφόρος is taken by Hesych. for the sun. But he merely says, φωςφόρος, φωτοδότης, λαμπρὸς ἀστήρ. And as there is no precedent, so also is there no occasion, for thus understanding it here. The dawn of the day is accompanied by the rising of the morning-star. It is not quite clear, what time is here pointed out by the ἕως οὐ. Gerhard says, "Petrus h. l. docet, scripta prophetica lucem quandam tenuem tempore V. T. exhibuisse, donec per verbum evangelii et operationem Spiritus sancti uberior, clarior et perfectior lux divinæ notitiæ in N. T. fuerit secuta." But it is entirely against this view, that the pres. ᾧ καλῶς ποιεῖτε προσέχοντες makes it necessary, as indeed does the whole context, that the time spoken of, which the ἕως οὐ is to put an end to, should be present. De Wette modifies this last view by saying, that this O. T. darkness of the pre-Christian time still endures for those who have not yet embraced the Christian faith. But this would make the readers, who are said, ver. 12, to be ἐστηρικμένοι ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ ἀληθείας, to be still unconverted to Christianity. Bede, Calvin, al., understand it of the glorious day which is to come when the Lord shall be manifested. So Bede: "ad lucernam nocturnam pertinet quod 'filii Dei sumus et nondum apparuit quid erimus.' Et in comparatione quidem impiorum, dies sumus, Paulo dicente, Fuisitis aliquando tenebræ, nunc autem lux in Domino. Sed si comparemur illi vitæ in qua futuri sumus, adhuc nox sumus, et lucerna indigemus." So Calvin, "Ego hanc caliginem ad totum vitæ stadium extendo, ac diem tunc nobis illucere interpretor, quum facie ad faciem videbimus quod nunc cernimus per speculum et ænigmatē:" so Dietlein, al. Others, as Grot., al., De Wette, Huther, think that some state in the readers themselves is pointed at, which is to supervene upon their present less perfect state: Grot. interpreting it of their attainment of the gift of prophecy: De Wette, of their arriving at full conviction of the certainty of the coming of Christ: Huther, much the same, adding, "The writer distinguishes between two degrees of the Christian life: in the first, faith rests upon outward evidences, in the second, on inward revelations of the Spirit: in the first, each detail is believed separately as such: in the second, each is recognized as a necessary part of the whole. And hence the being in the former is naturally called a walking ἐν τῷ πρωταύχμηρῷ, in the light of a λύχνος, while the being in the latter is a walking in the light of the morning." And this latter I believe to be nearly the true account. That which refers the words to the time of the Lord's coming is objectionable, because thus, 1. the time of the Christian's walk here, in which he is said to be light in the Lord, would, not comparatively [as Bede alone], but absolutely, be described as a walking in darkness by the slender light of O. T. prophecy: 2. the morning-star arising in men's hearts is not a description which can apply to the Lord's coming. So that, whatever apparent analogy there may be with the comparison used in Rom. xiii. 11 ff., the matters treated of seem to be different. At the same time it may well be, that the Apostle should have mingled both ideas together as he wrote the words; seeing that even in our hearts the fulness of the spiritual day will not have arisen, until that time when we see face to face, and know even as God knew us):

20.] Caution as to the interpretation of O. T. prophecy: to be borne in mind, while taking heed to it. This first knowing (τοῦτο, viz. what follows, introduced by ὅτι. πρῶτον, not as Bengel, "prius quam ego dico," but first and as most important in applying ourselves to prophetic interpretation. γινώσκοντες, as in reff., being aware of, and bearing in mind: = εἰδότες, 1 Pet. i. 18), that no prophecy of Scripture (γραφῆ most probably here imports the O. T. only, from the ποτε, and indeed the aorists in the next verse.

πᾶσα . . . οὐ, in the Hebr. manner for οὐδεμία: see Rom. iii. 20; 1 Cor. i. 29 al.) comes of private interpretation (how are these words to be understood? Two references seem to be possible: 1. to us, who try to understand written prophecies: 2. to the prophets themselves, as they spoke them. And of these the former, maintained by Bede, Erasm., Aret., Gerhard, Pott, Steiger, al., seems precluded by the context, the next verse assigning as a reason for the position in this, that the prophets spoke not of themselves, but as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. And though this might have been alleged as a reason why private interpretation cannot solve those prophecies, yet in that case we should expect not οὐ γάρ, which simply assigns the direct reason, but οὐδὲ γάρ, which assigns an analogical or remote reason. So that we seem driven to the conclusion that the saying regards, not our interpretation of prophecy, but its resolution, or interpretation, by the prophets themselves. And so (εἰ: τουτέστιν ὅτι λαμβάνουσι μὲν ἀπὸ θεοῦ οἱ προφῆται τὴν προφητείαν, ἀλλ' οὐχ ὡς ἐκείνοι βούλονται, ἀλλ' ὡς τὸ κινεῖν αὐτοὺς ἐνεργεῖ πνεῦμα. καὶ ᾗδεσαν μὲν καὶ συνέσαν τὸν καταπεπόμενον αὐτοῖς προφητικὸν λόγον, οὐ μέντοι καὶ τὴν ἐπίλυσιν αὐτοῦ ἐποιοῦντο: and below, . . . καίπερ εἰδότες οὐ χρεῖαν εἶχον ἐρμηνεύειν τὰ ὑπ' αὐτῶν, ἀλλ' ἑτέροις διηκόνουν ταῦτα, ἡμῖν γάρ. Similarly Thl.: and De Wette, adding, that this is said to excuse the difficulty of the interpretation of prophecy, and to remove occasion of unbelief and scoffing [ch. iii. 3]. But as Huther well remarks, this last purpose is not only not indicated in the context, but is quite out of the question; the Apostle referring to prophecy not as difficult of interpretation, but as a candle shining in a dark place, nay, as being even more firm and secure than external proofs of the same truths. I believe Huther's view to be the true one: which arises from this consideration, that ἐπίλυσις is not the subsequent interpretation of a prophecy already given, but the intelligent apprehension of the meaning of the prophecy, out of which [but not ιδίας on the part of those by whom it is sent] the prophecy itself springs. And this is much confirmed by γίνεται, which with a gen. as here, is not = έστιν, but rather seems to denote origin. So that the sense will be, that prophecy springs not out of human interpretation, i. e. is not a prognostication made by a man knowing what he means when he utters it: but &c. Thus, and thus alone, the whole context coheres. And this appears to be Bengel's view, though he does not express himself very clearly: "ut calide concinnatis fabulis opponitur spectatio apostolica: sic propriae interpretationi opponitur φορά, vectura prophetica. Itaque έπιλυσις dicitur interpretatio qua ipsi prophetæ res antea plane clausas aperuere mortalibus. Prophetia nec primo humana est, nec a se ipsa unquam ita desciscit ut incipiat esse verbum propriae, i. e. humanæ έπιλύσεως, sed plane divinae patefactionis est, et in rebus exituque talis cognoscitur, imo etiam firmior fit").

21.] Reason of the above position. For prophecy was never (at any time: ποτέ belongs to the negative, and though pointing, as do likewise the aorr., to a state of things passed away, and therefore not to be referred to N. T. prophecies, [see on ch. ii. 1,] must not be rendered as E. V. [after Beza, as usual] "in old time") sent (allata, vulg.: cf. above, vv. 17, 18) after the will (dat. of the cause; or rule, by or according to which: as in τις στρατεύεται ιδίοις δψωνοις ποτέ; 1 Cor. ix. 7: cf. 1 Cor. xi. 5; Heb. xii. 18) of man: but men spoke from God (spoke as with the voice of, as emissaries from, God: the άπο of άποστέλλω and άπόστολος. Besides critical considerations, probability seems against the reading άγιοι, in that, on account of the repetition, άγιου . . . άγιοι, the stress, in the latter part of the sentence, would be laid on the fact of άγιότης, which does not form any logical contrast to ιδίας έπιλύσεως, instead of on the fact of the φορά and the λαλιά coming from God, which does, borne (borne along, carried onward, as a ship by the wind, reff. Acts. "Impulsos fuisse dicit, non quod mente alienati fuerint [qualem in suis prophetis ένθουσιασμόν fingunt Gentiles] sed qui nihil a se ipsis ausi fuerint, tantum obediēter sequuti sint Spiritum ducem." Calv. See besides reff., Jos. Antt. iv. 6. 5, οὐκ ὦν ἐν ἑαυτῷ, τῷ δὲ θείῳ πνεύματι κεκινημένος: Macrob. i. 23, speaking of the processions carrying the image of the Sun at Heliopolis,—ferunturque divino spiritu, non suo arbitrio, sed quo deus propellit vehentes") by the Holy Spirit.

CHAP. II. 1—22.] DESCRIPTION OF ERRONEOUS TEACHERS WHO SHOULD ARISE: THEIR UNGODLY PRACTICES, AND CERTAIN DESTRUCTION. On the close parallelism with Jude 4—19, see in Prolegg. The fact will necessitate continual reference to that Epistle. 1.] Transition to the new subject. But (contrast to last verse) there were false prophets also (as well as the true prophets, just spoken of) among the people (of Israel. These words, more than any that have preceded, define the prophecies spoken of before as O. T. prophecies), as there shall be among you also (καί with έν ὑμῖν. On έσονται, Bengel says "et jam esse cœperunt tunc." It was so, see vv. 9 ff.: still the future in έσονται is simple, and this first declaration a pure prophecy) false teachers (teachers of falsehood: cf. ψευδόλογος. In the case of ψευδοπροφήται, the ψευδο- is ambiguous, whether subjective, pretenders to be prophets when they were not, or objective, prophesiers of false things: cf. for the latter Jer. xiv. 14, LXX, ψευδῆ οἱ προφήται προφητεύουσιν . . . ; ib. 15; xxiii. 25, al. fr.), the which (οἷτινες, of a class: not simply identifying the individuals) shall introduce (shall bring in by the side of that teaching which ye have received. There is a hint of secrecy and unobservedness, but not so strong as in E. V. "shall privily bring in." It is stronger in the παρεισέδυσαν of Jude 4) heresies (αἱρέσεις here rather in the sense in which we now understand the word, new and self-chosen doctrines, alien from the truth: not sects [vulg.], which may be founded, but can hardly be said to be introduced) of destruction (whose end is destruction, Phil. iii. 19. The expression is not to be resolved as E. V. [after Beza, as usual] by an adjective, "damnable heresies," as it thereby loses its meaning, merely conveying the writer's own condemnation), and denying (a remarkable word from St. Peter) the master (compare τὸν μόνον δεσπότην καὶ κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν χριστὸν ἀρνούμενοι, Jude 4) who bought them (reff. No assertion of universal redemption can be plainer than this. "Ex hoc loco bene colligitur," says Estius, endeavouring to escape the inference, "Christum redemisse quosdam reprobos, nimirum illos, qui redemptionis ejus secundum aliquos effectus facti sunt participes: ejusmodi erant hi, de quibus Petrus loquitur: utpotè per fidem in baptismo regenerati, et peccatorum veniam consecuti, licet postea in veterem peccati servitutem lapsi. . . . Sed ne hinc colligas, ad omnes omnino homines effectum redemptionis extendi." Calvin passes it without a word. It may be noted that by the use of this particular predication for Christ here, those heresies seem especially to be aimed at, which denied or explained away the virtue of the propitiatory sacrifice of our Lord, by which He has bought us to Himself), bringing upon themselves (the construction is not very plain. Of the two participial clauses, . . . ἀρνούμενοι, and ἐπάγοντες . . ., one must be taken as equivalent to a finite verb, corresponding to παρεισέδουσιν above:

unless indeed we understand καί to mean "even," and make both participial clauses follow παρεισέδουσιν . . . as epexegetical of it. This, however, would leave the ἐπάγοντες awkwardly pendent, and requiring "and" to fill it up, as in E. V. As regards then the alternative before proposed, Huther thinks it most natural to regard ἐπάγοντες as a finite verb: "who, by denying &c., bring on themselves &c.:"—Winer, § 45. 6. a, prefers making both depend on παρεισέδουσιν, regarding them however not as co-ordinate, but ἐπάγοντες as a sequel added to the sentence οἷτινες . . . ἀρνούμενοι. I much prefer taking καί as the simple copula, and regarding ἀρνούμενοι as standing in the place of a finite verb, co-ordinate with παρεισέδουσιν followed, as a consequence, by ἐπάγοντες κ.τ.λ.) swift (see note on ref., not speedy, but as Horneius in Huther, "inopinatum et inexpectatum") destruction: 2.] and many shall follow after (see on ch. i. 16) their licentiousnesses (the connexion of depraved moral conduct with erroneous doctrine was in the early ages of the church almost universal: see the Pastoral Epistles passim, and below vv. 18, 19. In || Jude, the two are expressed co-ordinately: τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν χάριτα μετατιθέντες εἰς ἀσελγίαν, κ. τὸν μόνον δεσπότην κ. κύριον ἡμῶν. Ἰ. χ. ἀρνούμενοι) on whose account (by reason of whom, i. e. from the ἀσελγείαι of those who follow after the false teachers: for to these, and not to the false teachers themselves, is the οὓς most likely referable. It is those who, seeming to be in the way of truth, yet favour and follow false teachers, that cause most scandal to the way of truth itself) the way of truth (reff. and Ep. Barnab. 5, p. 734, "homo habens viam veritatis") shall be evil spoken of ("ab iis qui foris sunt, discrimen ignorantibus verorum et falsorum Christianorum." Bengel): 3.] and in (i. e. living in, girt about with, as their element, not as E. V. "through") covetousness with feigned speeches (Wetstein quotes Artemid. i. 53, πλάσσειν δοκεῖ . . . ἀγαθὸν βήτορι . . . καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ἀπατεῶσι, διὰ τὸ τὰ μὴ ὄντα ὡς ὄντα δεικνύειν τὰς τέχνας ταύτας) they will make gain of you ("quæstum ex vobis facient, ad quæstum suum vobis abutentur." Gerh. See ref., and Athenag. xiii. 569, Ἀσπασία ἐνεπορεύετο πλήθη γυναικῶν: Philo in Flacc. § 16, vol. ii. p. 536, ἐνεπορεύετο τὴν λήθην τῶν δικαστῶν [Huther]. Pott tries to give the word the classic meaning of lucrari, 'to gain over:' "sectæ suæ conciliare conatur:" and this is borne out by Prov. iii. 14, LXX, κρείσσον αὐτὴν ἐμπορεύεσθαι, ἢ χρυσίου κ. ἀργυρίου θησαυρούς: but the other meaning seems better here. These false teachers would care not for their sect, but for their gain), for whom (οἷς is the dat. incommodi: its antecedents being the subjects of the verb ἐμπορεύονται, viz. the false teachers) the sentence (of God, decreeing their ἀπώλεια) from long since (ἐκπαλαι cannot surely, as De Wette, be joined predicatively with τὸ κρίμα, 'the sentence from of old decreed,' cf. οἱ πάλοι προγεγραμμένοι εἰς τοῦτο τὸ κρίμα, Jude 4: in this case we should at all events expect τὸ κρίμα τὸ ἐκπαλαι. Rather, with most Commentators, should ἐκπαλαι be taken adverbially with the following verb. The word is found, besides ref., in Arrian, Exp. Alex. i. 9, εἰς λογισμὸν τοῦ ἐκπαλαι: Jos. Antt. xvi. 8. 4, ἐκπαλαι μὲν συνεδρεῶν αὐτῶ προσέκειτο: Plut. Aristid. p. 328 E, ἀνήρ θυμοειδὴς κ. φιλοκίνδυνος, ἐκπαλαι πρὸς τὴν μάχην σπαργῶν. Phrynichus, p. 45, condemns it: ἀπόπαλαι, ἐκπαλαι ἀμφοῖν δυσχέριαι, ἐκ παλαιοῦ γὰρ χρῆ λέγειν: where see Lobeck's note) is not idle (i. e. is working itself out, is living and in action), and their destruction slumbereth not (i. e. is awake, and ready to seize them: ἀπώλεια being personified: for the verb, see ref.). 4—11.] Argument, enforced by three historical proofs, that God will assuredly punish these wicked

The protases, εἰ γὰρ . . . καὶ ἀρχ. κόσμ. . . . καὶ πόλεις, have no single apodosis, properly so called, to answer to them, but the apodosis when it comes, is complicated with an additional protasis καὶ δίκαιον Ἄωτ κ.τ.λ. which causes it to consist of two members, the deliverance of the righteous, and the punishment of the wicked. 4.] First historical proof: the punishment of the apostate angels. Cf. Jude 6. For (connect with the position immediately preceding, οἷς τὸ κρίμα κ.τ.λ.) if God spared not angels having sinned (how, is not here specified; but Jude, ver. 6, is more particular: see note there. ἀμαρτησάντων, anarthrous, is not = τῶν ἁμ., "that sinned:" but carries a ratiocinative force, giving the reason of οὐκ ἐφέισατο: "for their sin"), but casting them into hell (the word is no where else found: but its meaning must be plain by analogy. Tartarus is no where else mentioned in the N. T. or LXX: there can be no doubt that it is used as equivalent to γέεννα. It seems best to take the verb absolutely, by itself, and join σειροῖς ζόφου το παρέδωκεν, as is done in E. V. So Huther after Calov., Pott, Wahl, al., against De Wette, Dietlein, al. The aor. participle is contemporary with the aor. verb παρέδωκεν, as in ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπε) delivered [them] over ("παρέδωκεν is here, as often, used with an implied idea of punishment." The form σιρρός is found [as a var. read. in Demosth. also] in Pollux ix. 49; Phot. p. 504. 23; Varro de re rust. i. 57. The word is used for a wolf's den, by Longus i. 11. trated by Wisd. xvii. 17, ἀλῶσει σκότους ἐδέθησαν: and will probably mean, as there, that darkness itself is the chain, gen. of apposition) in custody (pres.: "being kept." The readings are in great confusion, from the combined influence of || Jude, and our ver. 9) unto (with a view to: or merely temporal, until: but this is not probable here, as the want of μεγάλης ἡμέρας, Jude 6, removes all definite allusion to the time of the judgment) judgment:

5.] Second historical proof—the flood. Wanting in Jude—and spared not the ancient world, but preserved (here first comes in the idea of the preservation of the righteous, which is worked out further in the next verse) Noah the eighth person (i. e. with seven others: according to the well-known formula, generally found in Greek with αὐτός: so Thucyd. ii. 79, ἐστρατήγει δὲ Ξενοφῶν ὁ Εὐριπίδου τρίτος αὐτός, and passim. But the shorter phrase is not without classic example: e. g., Plato, Legg. iii. p. 695 c, λαβὼν τὴν ἀρχὴν ἑβδομος, and other examples in Winer, § 37. 2: and in Wetstein. The numeral adj. must be taken with Νῶε, not with κήρυκα) preacher of righteousness (the obvious construction would be, "as a preacher of righteousness:" so Huther: but we should thus be introducing an element logically extraneous to the context, which treats not of the purpose why the righteous are preserved, but simply of their preservation. And in these later Epistles, all considerations based on stricter views of the usage of the article before substantives are exceedingly unsafe. The fact, that Noah was thus a preacher of [moral] righteousness to the depravity of his age, is found alluded to in Jos. Antt. i. 3. 1,—ὁ Νῶεος δὲ τοῖς πραττομένοις ὑπ' αὐτῶν δυσχεραίνων καὶ τοῖς βουλευέμασιν ἀηδῶς ἔχων, ἔπειθεν ἐπὶ τὸ κρεῖττον αὐτοὺς τὴν διανοίαν καὶ τὰς πράξεις μεταφέρειν: Benschith Rabba xxx. 6, in Wetst. "κῆρυξ generationis diluvii, id est, Noachus:" al. in De Wette), bringing (= "when He brought," or, "and brought:" temporary with the ἐφύλαξεν above) the flood (anarthrous, as well known; in the earlier written reff. Matt., Luke, the art. is expressed) on the world (again anarthrous) of ungodly men (Dietlein, in his commentary, attaching ver. 4 to ver. 5, and believing the crime of the angels to be that in Gen. vi. 2 [see note on Jude 6], holds that only one example is furnished by them both, as declaring God's dealings with the old world; vv. 7, 8 giving corresponding testimony with regard to the new. But his reasons, as Huther has shewn, will not hold: seeing that, 1. the sentences are strictly co-ordinate with each other, ver. 6; ver. 5; ver. 5; ver. 4, all being simply coupled by καὶ: 2. there is no mention of the new world at ver. 6, as there is none of the old at ver. 4: 3. the angels cannot be part of the κόσμος ἀσεβῶν. And Dietlein's idea, that if we take three examples, both members of the apodosis ver. 9, will not be represented in ver. 4, proves nothing, because that apodosis answers not to each of vv. 4, 5, 6, separately, but to vv. 4—7 generally: the idea of rescuing the righteous coming in as secondary, by the way. And the repetition of οὐκ ἐφείσατο, vv. 4, 5, by which Dietlein tries to strengthen his position, is in fact against him: marking off, as it does, expressly, ver. 5 from ver. 4, as a second example of God's unsparing vengeance):

6.] Third historical proof: the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha, Jude 7. And burning to ashes (Suidas, τεφρώσας, ἐμπρήσας, σποδώσας. The aor. part. is contemporary with the aor. following) the cities of (gen. of apposition) Sodom and Gomorrha, condemned [them] (κατέκρινεν, not imperf., but first aor. as παρέδωκεν and ἐφύλαξεν in the co-ordinate verses above) to (better than "with:" see reff.: not "eversione damnavit," "funditus evertendo punivit," as Gerh.: but "in cineres redigens damnavit ad eversionem," as Pott, Wahl, Winer, De Wette, Huther) overthrow (καταστροφή is the word used [ref. Gen.] in the history), laying down an example (cf. πρόκεινται δείγμα, Jude 7) of (i. e. that which might shew forth the fate of) those that should in aftertime live ungodly (so the E. V. well, but with “after”): 7.] and rescued (the contrast, the deliverance of the righteous, is here brought out at more length. This contrast is wanting in Jude, where only the punitive dealings of God are treated) righteous Lot (δίκαιον, as repeating the δικαιοσύνη of ver. 5: see also again, ver. 8) distressed (καταπονέω, properly to wear down or tire out by toil, as τῆ ἐνδεία τῆς τροφῆς τὴν ἀλκὴν τοῦ θηρίου καταπονεῖν, Diod. iii. 37: Ἡρακλῆς ὁ καταπονούμενος τῷ τῆς Δηϊανέρας χιτῶνι, Pol. xl. 7. 3: hence to oppress, as in ref. Acts, or harass beyond bearing, as here) by the behaviour of the lawless (ἄθεσμοι, “homines nefarii, qui nec jus nec fas curant”) in licentiousness (ἐν ἄσελγ. ἀναστροφή is to be taken together, as ἐν ἄσελγ. ἀναστρέφεται; ἐν ἄσελγ. denoting the character of the behaviour or manner of life): 8.] Explanation of καταπονούμενον. (these datives belong to ἐβασάνιζεν below, not as vulg., Erasm., al., ungrammatically, to ὁ δίκαιος,—“aspectu et auditu justus erat,” nor as Gerh. to ἐγκατοικῶν: nor again are they to be understood of the Sodomites, as Wetstein,—“Lotus vultu eorum meretricio conspecto, et audita fama impudicitiae eorum . . .” It was by his own sight and hearing of what went on around him, that he ψυχὴν δικαίαν ἐβασάνιζεν. βλέμμα is more usually of the look of a man from without: so in Demosth. Mid. in Wetst. τῷ σχήματι, τῷ βλέμματι, τῇ φωνῇ, and in numerous other examples in Wetst. The transition from this to the subjective sense is obvious) the righteous man, dwelling among them, day by day tormented his righteous soul with their lawless deeds (the form of the sentence is peculiar: that being represented as a deliberate act of Lot on himself, which was in fact the impression made on him by the lawlessness around him. The same way of speaking is common among us, when we say that a man “distresses himself” at any occurrence: cf. Isa. lviii. 5, “a day for a man to afflict his soul,”—ἡμέραν ταπεινοῦν ἄνθρωπον τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ. The older expositors have curiously and characteristically missed the right sense: so Ec., πρὸς ζῆλον τῶν ἀσεβῶν αὐτῶν πράξεων ἡμέραν ἐξ ἡμέρας παρακαλούμενον, εἶτα βασάνιζοντα τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ψυχὴν διὰ τῆς τούτων ἀποχῆς καὶ ἐγκρατείας [which he further expands afterwards]: and similarly Thl.):

The expression indicates both the apprehension of the manner of the act and the power to perform it) to rescue pious [men] out of temptation (as in ref. 1 Pet., where see note,—trials, persecutions, and the like), and to reserve unrighteous [men] under punishment (not as most, cruciandos: “to be punished,” E. V.: but as in ver. 4, actually in a penal state, and thus awaiting their final punishment) to the day of judgment (the great final doom: see reff.): 10.] but chiefly (cf. flesh (more general here than in || Jude, where ἐτέρας defines the particular sin. Here, all following after unlawful carnal lusts is meant) in lust of pollution (lust, hankering after unlawful and polluting use of the flesh. The gen. is not to be resolved into an adjective, "cupiditas fœda," as Wahl), and despise lordship (so in Jude 8, κυριότητα ἀθετοῦσιν: where see note). Darers (the construction suddenly alters to a description of the wicked persons who were the object in the former sentence. Cf. ref. and Thucyd. i. 70, where the Corinthians characterize the Athenians as καὶ παρὰ δύναμιν τολμηταί, καὶ παρὰ γνώμην κινδυνευταί), self-willed (see note on ref. Tit., where the word is explained. Both these plurals are used as substantives, in apposition with each other and with 'they,' the understood subject of the following verb), they tremble not [when speaking evil of (this participial construction, meaning much the same as an infinitive, is common: see ref. and Acts v. 42, xii. 16; and Winer, § 45. 4. a) glories (what is meant by this, is somewhat doubtful: see on || Jude. We might take the word here, as there also, in its widest sense, as any dignities or glories, human or divine, were it not for the example there following. The vulg. has a curious rendering here: "sectas [δόξας] non metuunt introducere blasphemantes:" whereas in Jude it renders "majestatem autem blasphemant:" on which Estins, "cur autem interpres eandem vocem hic sectas, apud Judam majestatem,—seu majestates translulerit in sententia simili, seu potius eadem, mihi non liquet"); 11.] where (i. e. "in cases where:" nearly = whereas: so ref., and Thueyd. viii. 96, ὅπου γὰρ . . . τοσαύτη ἡ ξυμφορὰ ἐπεγεγένητο, πῶς οὐκ εἰκότως ἠθύμουν;) angels, being greater [than they] in strength and might (such is of necessity the meaning, and not the curious and hardly grammatical interpretation of Huther, "angels who are greater in strength and might than the other angels," as, e. g., the archangel Michael in || Jude. This meaning would require ἄγγελοι οἱ ἰσχυ. κ. δυν. μείζ. ὄντες. As it is, the ὄντες carries a slight ratiocinative force with it: "being," i. e. "though they are:" and the thought is not, as Huther, a lame one, but shews forcibly the unbecomingness of their irreverence, seeing that even angels who are so far above them yet do not bring railing accusations against δόξαι, bring not against them (scil. δόξαι, in the interpretation, bad angels, fallen from their heavenly estate, but regarded here according to their essential condition as sons of glory. Cf. Milton's "excess of glory obscured," as descriptive of Satan,—an expression probably taken from the study of the original text in this place or in || Jude. The vulg. rendering, 'adversum se,' is clearly wrong: see below) before the Lord ("apud Dominum, judicem, eumque præsentem, reveriti, abstinent judicio," Bengel. It is to me on the whole more probable that the words παρὰ κυρίῳ should have dropped out, as not occurring in || Jude, than that they should have been inserted owing to any idea of a contention in the divine Presence being there intended: for no such intention is apparent there, but rather the contrary) a railing judgment (= κρίσιν βλασφημίας, Jude 9. βλάσφημον, in allusion to βλασφημοῦντες above.

As a curiosity in the way of erroneous rendering and more erroneous exegesis founded on it, we may notice the vulg. here:—"ubi angeli fortitudine et virtute cum sint majores, non portant adversum se execrabile judicium:" and Lyra's comment, "ubi, i. e. in pœna inferni: angeli, scil. mali: non portant, i. e. vix sustinent: execrabile judicium, i. e. pœnam." Cf. Estins, h. l. and the extraordinary commentary of Feuardentius on this Epistle, in which he derives from this interpretation an argument à fortiori, "If angels cannot bear their punishment, how much less heretics, Luther, Calvin, Bucer, &c.").

12—22.] Further description and denunciation of these persons. 12.] Cf. Jude 10. In words this verse is very similar to that, but in meaning quite different: and this fact, so often occurring in the passage, strongly confirms the view of the common matter taken in the Prolegg., viz., that it is a portion of the utterance of the Spirit used independently by the two inspired writers. See the separate sense of each, in the notes on each. But (contrast to the angels, just mentioned) these as irrational animals, born naturally (thus vulg. rightly, 'naturaliter,' according to the transposition in the text; φυσικά being nearly = φυσικῶς. According to the other reading, φυσικά is a second epithet to ἄλογα ζῶα, as Ἐε: κατ' αἰσθησιν μόνον ζῶντα, οὐ κατὰ νοῦν κ. τὴν νοεράν (ζῶν) for (with a view to) capture and destruction (i. e. not to take and to destroy, but to be taken and destroyed. Wetst. quotes from the Rabbinical Bava Mezia, p. 85. 1, "Quidam vitulus, cum ad inactandum adueeretur, R. Judam accessit, caputque in ejus grenium reponens flevit. Sed ille, Abi, inquit, in hunc finem creatus es"), speaking evil (as they do: the part. includes the ground of their perishing) in the matter of things which they know not (thus, viz., by ἐν τούτοις, & ἀγνοοῦσι, βλασφ. and not by ταῦτα, ἐν οἷς ἀγνοοῦσιν, βλ., I prefer to resolve the attraction. We have βλασφημεῖν εἰς as analogous to βλασφ. ἐν: on the other hand ἀγνοεῖν ἐν might be tolerated, as ἀγροεῖν περί, 1 Cor. xii. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 13. But the former construction seems better; because, it being almost necessary to suppose οἷς neuter, not masculine, it is not so natural to have a neut. accus. after βλασφημεῖν, as a neut. dative with ἐν), in their corruption (in their practising, and following out, of this corruption to which they have devoted themselves) shall even perish (shall go on till they perish; not only being found in it, living in it, advancing in it, but going on also to its final issue, viz. eternal perdition), receiving as they shall (fut. part.) [the] reward of unrighteousness (not, as Wolf, = μισθὸν ἔδικον, but exactly as in ver. 15, wages or retribution for unrighteousness: the only difference being that Balaam followed its temporal wages, they shall receive its eternal). 13, 14.] These verses most probably, as to construction, form an independent participial sentence, connected by apposition with what precedes. This is better than to consider them as all belonging to ἐπλανήθησαν in ver. 15, which clearly is confined in its reference to its own sentence,—or as giving the ground of φθαρῆσονται above. Imagining a pleasure delicate living for a day (the interpretations of ἐν ἡμέρᾳ have been various. Ἐε. gives it, τὴν ἀληθῆ κ. ἐπέραστον εὐφροσύνην κ. ἡδονὴν ἐν τῇ καθ' ἡμέραν τιθέμενοι τοῦ λαμοῦ ἀπολαύσει. And similarly Thl., Beza, al. But this seems inadmissible for ἐν ἡμέρᾳ. Some, as Erasm., Benson, Morus, E. V., al., take it for "in the daytime," as implying absence of all shame; but this would give a very lame and frigid sense, and is inconsistent with τρυφήν, which is not revelling or rioting, but delicate living, which those who practise carry on as much in the daytime as by night, being the habit of their lives. Bede's explanation is remarkable: he understands 'voluptas diei' to mean true pleasure, "qua sancti quoque delectantur in Domino," and "voluptas noctu" to be the unlawful pleasure of the ungodly. Then he takes ἡδονὴν τὴν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ together as predicate, understanding, "cum deliciis . . . vacent . . . , has tamen ipsi optimas et quasi lucifluas judicent." Few will accept this, though it is very ingenious. There can be little doubt that the true rendering is as vulg, "voluptatem existimantes diei delicias:" Grot., "in diem, id est ad breve tempus:" Calv., Est., "Felicitem statuunt in praesentibus deliciis." And so Corn. a-Lap., De Wette, Huther, al. With this also agrees the article τῆν and its position: "that delicate living which is but for a day", spots (but σπιλάδες, Jude 12, where see note) and blemishes (disgraces, disfigurements, causing shame: ἐθέλεις δέ κε μῶμον ἀνάψαι, Ob. B. 86), luxuriating in their deceits (i. e. as explained by Huther, in those things or materials of luxury, which they have fraudulently gotten, the abstract for the concrete. But, granting that interpretation as the words stand, there seems to be considerable doubt and difficulty about both reading and meaning. In Jude 12 they stand οὗτοί εἰσιν ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν σπιλάδες συννεωχούμενοι ἀφόβως, instead of, as here, σπιλοι καὶ μῶμοι ἐν-τροφῶντες ἐν ταῖς ἀπάταις αὐτῶν συννεωχούμενοι ὑμῖν. It seems hardly possible to imagine that there has not been some error in reading which has now become inveterate. And to this conclusion tends very much the testimony of C, which reads ἀπάταις in both places, and is thus nearly neutralized here. While therefore reading ἀπάταις, in deference to the weight of MSS. combined with critical principles, I have the strongest suspicion that ἀγάπαις is the original reading. The αὐτῶν is no witness against it, as De Wette thinks: the ἀγάπαις become αὐτῶν by their perversion of them while they συννεωχούνηται ὑμῖν. And on this supposition, the meaning will be, that in their love-feasts [see on || Jude] they find occasion of luxuriating and delicate living, while feasting with you. This view is favoured also by the emphatic position of ἐντροφῶντες. On the verb, Loesner says, "Philo de Jos. [34, vol. ii. p. 70], Josephum ait epulas quibus fratres exceperit jussisse fieri modicas, quod noluerit ταῖς ἐτέρων ἀτυχίας ἐντροφῶν, inter aliorum penuriam deliciis uti") while they feast with you (this at all events refers to the love-feasts, whatever be read above. See on || Jude), 14.] having eyes full of an adulteress ("quasi dicat, tam libidinosos eos esse, ut in ipsorum oculis quasi adulteræ habitent, seu ut adulteras semper in oculis ferant." Honeius, in Huther) and that cannot be made to cease from sin (cf. ὁ παθὼν ἐν σαρκί, πέπανται ἀμαρτίας, 1 Pet. iv. 1. Kypke quotes from Jos. B. J. vii. 37 [10.2], ἀκατάπαυστον νεωτεροποιῶν), laying baits for (Demosth., p. 241. 2, speaks of τῆ καθ' ἡμέραν βρωτώνη κ. σχολῆ δελεαζόμενοι) unstable souls (ref. The word occurs in Musæus, 295: βένθεα δ' ἀστήρικτα καὶ ὄγρὰ θέμεθλα θαλάσσης: the signification, as here, unstable, unfixed, "in fide et pietatis studio nondum satis fundatus et formatus"), having a heart practised in covetousness (this construction, a gen. after γυμνάζεσθαι, is not without example: see Thomas Magister sub voce, and Hensterhuis's note. So some in Acts xxii. 3 [see note there], cf. Hom.-Clem. iv. 7 [vol. ii. p. 123, Migne], πάσης Ἑλληνικῆς παιδείας ἐξησηκημένος. The phrases, τόξων, οἰωνῶν, πολέμων, εἰδῶς, are common in Homer: so οὐ πρὶν εἰδυῖα τόκιοι, Il. ρ. 5: διδασκόμενος πολέμοιο, π. 811: οὔτε τι ναυτιλῆς σεσοφισμένος, Hesiod. ἔργ. κ. ἡμ. 649. The true account of such genitives seems to be, not, as Hemst. that the particles are taken as nouns, but as in ἀκούειν, αἰσθάνεσθαι, τινός, that they are participative genitives), children of curse (i. e. as in ref. 2 Thess., ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας, John xvii. 12, persons devoted to the curse, accursed. But the E. V., "cursed children," does not give the meaning, τέκνα being used in the original simply with reference to κατάρας). 15.] The last clauses, from ὀφθαλμοὺς to τέκνα, have no representatives in Jude. Now again the parallelism begins, cf. Jude 11: but the sentiment is more expanded here. The construction is altered, and becomes direct and regular, καταλιπόντες . . . ἐπλανήθησαν. They have forsaken the right way (ref.) and are gone astray

(the aor. part. and aor. verb are contemporary: and both require, as so often, to be rendered by our English perfect; the English bare past not involving any present consequence, but rather leaving it to be inferred that the state predicated is over now), following out (this seems to be all that the ἐξ- implies; see on ch. i. 16. It is noticeable, that in || Jude the expression is ἐξεχίθησαν) the way of Balaam (τῇ ὁδῷ, not merely figuratively, the way [of life], but literally, seeing that it was by a journey that Balaam displeased God: cf. the frequent repetition of the word in Num. xxii. 23, and the words of the angel in ib. 32, οὐκ ἀστεια ἡ ὁδός σου ἐναντίον ἐμοῦ) [the son] of Bosor (Grot. supposes Bosor to be a corruption of the name βηρορ, "Pethor," Num. xxii. 5: Vitrunga, Observ. Sacrae, vol. i. pp. 936 f., maintains rightly that τοῦ βοσόρ rather signifies parentage than habitation, and that βοσόρ is a way of writing βωρ, Beor, owing to a peculiar pronunciation of the γ, which he traces in the formation of salio from βωρ, and in the case of other sibilants from aspirates, as sal from ἄλς, septem from ἐπτά, sisto from ἴστημι. And he conjectures that, coupled with an intimation that the Galileans gave a softer sound than others to the γ, this may have been connected with the Galilean dialect which betrayed Peter on a memorable occasion, Matt. xxvi. 73. So far well: but he goes on also to say, that the Apostle had a mystical reason for choosing this form, in allusion to the temptation which Balaam cast before Israel, because βωρ signifies flesh, "elegante hoc Insu subinnuens, Bileamum, suadendo voluptatum carnalium exercitium, merito dicendum esse filium βοσόρ, id est, carnis." It certainly is not beyond possibility that a Hebrew ear may have found such an allusion obvious: but the reference seems here rather to be to Balaam's attempt to curse Israel, than to his subsequent temptation of them), who loved the wages of unrighteousness (viz.

which he vainly thought he might get by disobeying the command of God. See Bp. Butler's masterly sermon on the character of Balaam, in his well-known volume), 16.] but had a rebuke for his own iniquity (what sort of a reproof, is shewn below. If any force can be given to ιδίας, it will be found in the fact that the reproof came from an animal which was part of his own substance: he himself furnished the conviction of his own iniquity, from the animal on which he rode): a (or, "the:" we are never sure of our ground with anarthrous substantives in these later Epistles) dumb beast of burden (ὑποζύγιον is apparently used as synonymous with ὄνος in ref. Matt. If so, the universal practice of riding on the ass in Palestine must be regarded as the reason) speaking (aor. part. contemporary with aor. verb following) in man's voice (not, "by speaking in man's voice:" the participial clause brings into notice the miraculous character of the incident) hindered (not in matter of fact, for Balaam went on his way: but subjectively, more as the imperfect is often used: "withstood," or as E. V. "forbade") the madness of the prophet (a discrepancy has been discovered between this and the Mosaic account, seeing that it was the angel, and not the ass, from whom the rebuke came, the ass having merely deprecated ill-treatment at Balaam's hands. But the Apostle evidently regards not so much the words of rebuke uttered, as the miraculous fact, as being the hindrance. It was enough to have prevented his going onward, when the dumb animal on which he rode was gifted with speech to shew him his madness).

Comm. in Catena) driven along by a whirlwind (λαίλαψ, according to Aristotle de mundo, is πνεῦμα βίαιον καὶ ἐλούμενον κάτωθεν ἄνω), for whom the blackness of darkness is reserved (see || Jude. It is obvious that no just charge of inappropriateness can be brought against our passage because this clause occurs in a different connexion from that in Jude. There it is said of wandering stars, here of driven clouds: of each, with equal appropriateness: darkness being predicable of clouds, as well as of stars extinguished).

18.] Justification of the description. For, speaking great swelling things (ὑπέρογκος is a classical word, occurring in Plato and Demosth., generally signifying excessive magnitude, as in μεγάλαι οὐσῖαι κ. ὑπέρογκοι, Plut. Ep. iii. p. 317 c. δύναντα ὑπέρογκος as opposed to ταπεινή, Dem. p. 46. 16. Xen. Hell. v. 4. 58, uses it in the literal sense, γενομένης δὲ τῆς κνήμης ὑπερόγκου: and Plut. which their laying of enticing baits is situated) by licentiousnesses (ἀσελγ. are the instrument, the bait itself. Far better so, with Huther, than with De Wette to regard ἐν as = διὰ, and ἀσελγ. as in apposition with ἐπιθυμίαις. Cc. inverts this construction, δελεάζουσι διὰ τῆς σαρκικῆς ἐπιθυμίας ἐν ταῖς ἀσελγείαις) of the flesh those who are scarcely (οὐκ ὀλίγως occurs in the Anthol. xii. 205, in the sense of "not a little:" and as a var. read. in Plato, Alcib. ii. p. 149 A. It may signify here, by degrees, = κατ' ὀλίγον: but the other, = ὀλίγου, seems more generally accepted as the sense) escaping from them who live in error (some take τοὺς ἐν πλ. ἀναστρ. as a clause co-ordinate and in apposition with τοὺς ὀλίγως ἀποφεύγοντας: but the other rendering is far better: these unhappy persons who are but just escaping from the influence of those who live in error [the heathen], are then laid hold of by these deceivers, enticing them with licentiousness), 19.] promising them liberty (these are the great swelling things which they speak; holding out a state of Christian liberty, which proves to be the bondage of corruption) while they themselves are (all the while: ὑπάρχω, of previous entity: see on Acts xvi. 20) slaves of corruption (cf. the same words occurring together in ref. Rom., αὐτῇ ἡ κτίσις ἐλευθερωθήσεται ἀπὸ τῆς δουλείας τῆς φθορᾶς εἰς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν τῆς δόξης τῶν τέκνων τοῦ θεοῦ: which it is very likely St. Peter had in view: cf. ch. iii. 15. he is also enslaved (cf. ref. John, πᾶς ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, δούλος ἐστὶν τῆς ἁμαρτίας; and ref. Rom., ᾧ παριστάνετε ἑαυτοὺς δούλους εἰς ὑπακοήν, δούλοι ἐστε τοῦ ὑπακούετε. These passages were certainly in the Apostle's mind. ἠττάομαι, generally found with a gen. of the agent, has here a dat. The classical rendering here would be "in whatever a man is overcome [by another], in that particular he is also enslaved [by that other]." But the context makes it clear that the datives are intended to designate the agent, not the mode).

20.] For if, having escaped (it might seem at first sight as if the ἀποφεύγοντας of ver. 18 were meant: but on close inspection it is plain that this is not so, but that we are continuing the description of the δούλοι τῆς φθορᾶς, viz. the deceivers themselves: the ἠττῆται and ἠττώνται marking the identity) the pollutions (reff.) of the world, in (element and condition of their escape) knowledge (ἐπιγνώσει, genuine and accurate knowledge: shewing that he is treating of men who have not been mere professors of spiritual grace, but real possessors of it) of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (expressed at length, to set forth more solemnly that from which they fall), but having again become entangled in these, they are overcome (the construction is ordinarily regarded as broken by the δέ, placed as if ἀποφύγωσιν and not ἀποφυγόντες had preceded: "if, after they have, &c., they are again entangled and overcome," as E. V. But it is better to regard ἠττώνται as the apodosis to both the participial clauses, and δέ as coupling them to each other), their last state is (we cannot say in English "has become," for we thereby convey an idea that it was not always so, but has undergone a change) worse than the first (αὐτοῖς, dat. incommodi. The saying is our Lord's own: see reff. Matt. || L.).

21.] Reason of these last words. For it were (that use of the imperfect without ἄν, answering to the Latin "faciebam, ni:" see on Rom. ix. 3) better for them not to have known the way of righteousness (viz. the Christian life: cf. ἡ ὁδὸς τῆς ἀληθείας, ver. 2) than, having known it (dat. instead of accus. by a very common attraction), to turn back (not perf., but aor.: now implying merely the final character of the act) from (out of, as out of a way) the holy commandment (the moral law of the gospel: here so designated, because it is of moral corruption that the Apostle is treating) delivered to them (cf. ref. Jude, τῇ ἅπαξ παραδοθείσῃ τοῖς ἁγίοις πίστει: where the arrangement of words is the same as here: παραδοθείσῃ being thrown forward and having the emphasis).

ἐξέραμα seems hardly to be found elsewhere than here [Schleusner cites Dioscorides vi. 19: adding "et alii," but qu. ?]: the verb ξεράω occurs in ref., and Aristoph. Vesp. 993, Hippocrates, al. See Lobeck on Phryn. p. 64: and Schleusner in voce): and, The sow after washing (the middle sense must not be pressed: it is the word commonly used of men, transferred to an animal) (ἐπιστρέψασα is generally understood before εἰς. But it seems better, with Huther, to understand the proverb as self-contained, and elliptical, as in "Sweets to the sweet:" so, "The washed sow to the mire") wallowing in the mire (if we read κύλισμα, we must render "the place of wallowing." In either case, the gen. βορβόρου imports that which characterizes the wallowing, and is a possessive gen. It is of, belongs to, mire).

CHAP. III. The general subject: THE CERTAINTY OF CHRIST'S COMING ESTABLISHED AGAINST CERTAIN SCOFFERS WHO SHALL CALL IT INTO DOUBT. EXHORTATIONS are intermingled, and follow as a CONCLUSION.

1.] This Epistle now, beloved, a second, write I unto you (or, "This second Epistle now write I unto you:" but the position of δευτέραν seems rather to shew that the emphasis of the sentence is on it): in which Epistles (E. V. well, "in both which:" viz. this and the first, implied in δευτέραν) I stir up your pure (see ref. Phil., note) mind (διάνοια is that aspect of the spiritual being of man, in which it is turned towards the outer world; his mind for business and outer interests, guiding him in action: see Beck, Umriss der biblischen Seelenlehre, p. 58. And this may be said to be εἰλικρινής, when the will and affection being turned to God, it is not obscured by fleshly and selfish regards: the opposite being ἐσκοτωμένοι τῇ διανοίᾳ, Eph. iv. 18. It seems impossible to reproduce in English these distinctions; we can only give them a general rendering, and leave all besides for explanatory notes) in reminding (see the same expression and note, ch. i. 13); 2.] that ye should remember (= εἰς τὸ μνησθῆναι:—compare the infinitives ποιῆσαι and μνησθῆναι abruptly introduced in a similar manner in Luke i. 72) the words spoken before by the holy prophets (i. e. the O. T. prophets, as referred to above ch. i. 19 ff. The vulg. has curiously misrendered: "eorum quæ prædixi verborum a sanctis prophetis"), and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour given by your apostles (as commonly taken, this sentence is made to contain a violent inversion, τοῦ κυρ. κ. σωτ. being taken out of its place after ἐντολῆς and attached to τῶν ἀποστόλων ὑμῶν. Any how, the construction is harsh, the double gen. being unavoidable: but it is surely much better to take ἐντολῆς in its most obvious connexion, and make τῶν ἀποστόλων ὑμῶν the second genitive—the command originating in our Lord, and given you by the Apostles who preached to you: τῶν ἀπ. ὑμῶν meaning "your Apostles" as we call St. Paul ἀπόστολον ἐθνῶν. It is quite impossible that ἡμῶν can stand: and difficult, even if it did, to render as E. V. "of us the Apostles." It is obvious, from the constant independence even in very similar sentences, of the two Epistles, that the || place in St. Jude, where it stands ὑπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων τοῦ κυρ. ἡμ. Ἰησ. χριστοῦ, is no guide here, nor reason why the same words should be joined together):— 3.] knowing this first (cf. ref., where the same phrase occurs.

The nom. γινώσκοντες is joined loosely with μνησθῆναι. Jude introduces the same prophetic fact with ὅτι ἔλεγον ὑμῖν, ver. 18), that there shall come in the last of the days (see note on Heb. i. 1: and 1 Pet. i. 20. It slightly differs from ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμ., at the end of the days, as extending, by the plur., the expression, though perhaps not the meaning, over a wider space: = ἐπ' ἐσχάτου [τοῦ] χρόνου, Jude 18) scoffers in [their] scoffing (scoffers making use of scoffing: cf. Rev. xiv. 2, κιθαρωδῶν κιθαρίζόντων ἐν ταῖς κιθάραις αὐτῶν: 2 Kings xx. 22, ἐλάλησεν [ἡ γυνὴ ἡ σοφὴ] ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ αὐτῆς: Dan. i. 4 Theod., συνιέντας ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ, κ. γινώσκοντας γινῶσιν, κ. διανοουμένουσ φρόνησιν. On the sense, cf. Jude 18), walking according to their own lusts (so Jude 18 and 16, here combined), 4.] and saying, Where is the promise of His coming (ποῦ ἐστὶν, implying that it is no where, has passed away and disappeared: cf. reff. αὐτοῦ, of Christ: whose name would be understood as of course)? for from the day when (ἀφ' ἧς, sc. ἡμέρας: reff.) the fathers fell asleep, all things continue thus from the beginning of creation (the assertion is not easy to apportion grammatically. One thing is certain and may be first cleared away, that we cannot after οὕτως supply ὡς ἦν, "as they were," E. V.: οὕτως simply referring to the present; as they are, as we now see them, and ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως belonging only to the verb, διαμένει. This being so, we still have two predicatory clauses following the verb: ἀφ' ἧς οἱ πατ. ἐκοιμ., and ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως. The way of explaining this must be, that the time of waiting for the promise necessarily dates from the death of the πατέρες, and the duration of things continuing as they are now extends back beyond the death of the fathers: so that the meaning will be, ever since the death of those to whom the promise was made, things have continued as we now see them [and as they have ever continued even before those fathers] from the beginning of creation. So that πάντα οὕτως διαμένει ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως is a general proposition applicable to all time: ἀφ' ἧς οἱ πατέρες ἐκοιμήθησαν, the 'terminus a quo' this general proposition is taken up and applied to the case in hand. And now we have cleared the way to enquiring, who are meant by οἱ πατέρες. And the answer is plain: largely and generally, those to whom the promise was made: the same as are indicated Rom. ix. 5, ὧν οἱ πατέρες: yet not exclusively these, but simultaneously with them any others who may be in the same category,—e.g. those who bear to the N. T. church the same relation as they to that of the O. T. The assertion, as coming from the ἡμπαϊκται, must not be pressed to any particular date, but given that wide reference which would naturally be in the mind of one making such a general charge). 5—10.] Refutations of this their scoffing inference.

5—7.] First refutation: from the biblical history of the creation. 5.] For

(i. e. they speak thus, because) this (viz. this fact which follows) escapes them (passes unnoticed by them) of their own will (i. e. they shut their eyes to this fact. So we have θέλων in Od. γ. 272, of Paris and Helen, τὴν δ' ἐθέλων ἐθέλουσαν ἀπήγαγεν ἄνευ δόμονδε; Il. δ. 300, al. Some, among whom are Rosenmüller, Pott, Bretschneider, Huthner, take τοῦτο to refer to the saying of ver. 4, and render θέλοντας 'meaning,' 'supposing,' as in Herodian, v. 3. 11, εἰκόνα τε ἡλίου ἀνέργαστον εἶναι θέλουσι. But besides that this would introduce an unusual meaning for θέλω, and that meaning not in its usual application to an hypothesis or assumption, but to an asserted fact,—a stronger objection is, that thus the sentence becomes a very flat one, and quite out of place among the sharp and nervous denunciations of the passage. The other is the rendering of almost all Commentators and versions. The vulg. is ambiguous, "latet enim eos hoc volentes"), that the heavens (οὐρανοὶ = οἱ οὐρανοί, see Winer, § 19. 1) were from of old (ref.: "jam inde a primo rerum omnium initio," Gerh.) and the earth (ἦσαν, above, serves for γῆ also) formed (συνεστῶσα, 'consists,' see refl.) out of [the] water and by means of [the] water (ἐξ ὑδατος, because the waters that were under the firmament were gathered together into one place and the dry land appeared: and thus water was the material, out of which the earth was made: δι' ὑδατος, because the waters above the firmament, being divided from the waters below the firmament, by furnishing moisture, and rain, and keeping moist the earth, are the means by which the earth συνίσταται. This is the simplest rendering, and very nearly that given by Huther. De Wette goes 'in omnia alia' after traces of far-fetched cosmogonical references, Indo-Ægyptian and Greek: but the whole interpretation of our passage lies in the book of Genesis. (Ec., without mentioning the reference to the waters above and beneath the firmament, gives a similar explanation of the ἐκ and διά, ἐξ ὑδατος μὲν, ὡς ἐξ ὑλικῶν αἰτίων δι' ὑδατος δέ, ὡς διατελικῶν) by the word of God (not of its own will, nor by a fortuitous concurrence of atoms), 6.] by means of which [two] (viz. the waters under the firmament and the waters above the firmament: for in the flood [1] the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and [2] the windows of heaven were opened, Gen. vii. 11. The interpretations of δι' ὧν have been very various. Ec. understands ὧν to refer to the heavens and the earth, τῆς μὲν τὸ ὑδωρ ἐπικλυσάσης, τῶν οὐρανῶν δὲ τοὺς καταβράκτας αὐτῶν ἐπαφέντων: and so Bede [but giving a curious meaning to δι' ὧν: not, as Huther states, 'in quibus partibus,' but grammatically, though strangely, 'by means of which (its parts perishing), the world, which was made up of heaven and earth, perished.' "per hæc enim perdita mundus qui in his constiterat, periit"], Beza, Wolf, Horneius, De Wette, al. Again Grot, Piscator, Dietlein, al., take δι' ὧν for 'quasiobrem,' i. e. because the world was ἐξ ὑδ. κ. δι' ὑδ., or because it was τῷ τοῦ θεοῦ λόγῳ. Luther renders wrongly, dennoch, nevertheless. Calvin, Pott, al. and recently Huther, understand δι' ὧν of waters; and account for the plur. by the ὑδωρ as material and the ὑδωρ as medium, above, or as Gerhard by understanding "things," and taking in also the word of God as comprehended) the then world (i. e. the whole state of things then existing. The Apostle's argument is, as against the assertors of the world's endurance for ever, that it has once been destroyed, so that their assertion is thereby invalidated. The expression ὁ τότε κόσμος must neither be limited, as Ec., τὸ ἀπόλετο μὴ πρὸς πάντα τὸν κόσμον ἀκουστέον, ἀλλὰ πρὸς μόνα τὰ ζῶα, ἃ τὸν ἅπαντα κόσμον οἰοῦν εἰδοποιεῖ: nor strictly pushed to its utmost extent, as Huther, who maintains that it must be exactly identical with οἱ οὐρανοὶ καὶ ἡ γῆ below. The analogy is not exactly, but is sufficiently close: and κόσμος, as an indefinite common term, takes in the οὐρανοὶ κ. γῆ, which were then instrumental in, and purified by, the destruction, if not altogether swept away by it. Nay the analogy is closer than this: for just as Noah stepped out of the Ark on a new world, the face of the heavens clear, and the face of the earth renewed, so we look for a new heavens and earth [ver. 13], yet like these others constructed out of the materials of the old) being inundated with water, perished (ἀπόλετο, see last note; not, was annihilated, but lost its then form and subsistence as a κόσμος, and passed into a new state. Only thus, as Huther observes, does the verse come in logically as a contradiction to the saying of the scoffers, πάντα οὕτως διαμένει ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως):

7.] but the new heavens and earth (contrast to ὁ τότε κόσμος: the postdiluvian visible world) by His (God's: if αὐτῷ be read, it must not be pressed to signify any one saying, but must refer generally [as with αὐτοῦ] to the prophetic word, which has announced that which comes to be mentioned) word are treasured up (perf. "have been, and are still," kept in store, put by, against a certain time: see especially ref. Rom. Dietlein fancies that the idea of θησαυρός must be kept hold of, the οὐρανοὶ κ. γῆ being the stored-up material for wrath to be exercised on: but this is mere fancy, and is contradicted by Rom. ii. 5, where the reference is the same), being kept (present, denoting that it is only God's constantly watchful Providence which holds together the present state of things till His time for ending it) for fire (πυρί, dat. commodi) against the day of judgment and perdition of impious men (τῶν ἀσεβῶν ἀνθρώπων does not, as Dietlein imagines, import that οἱ ἄνθρωποι, mankind, are ἀσεβεῖς: but = τῶν ἀσεβῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις). 8—10.]

Second contradiction to the scoffers: we are not to judge God, in the case of delay, as we do men, seeing that His thoughts are not as our thoughts. 8.] But let this one thing not escape you, beloved (ἐν τοῦτο, as especially important: λανθανέτω ὑμᾶς, in allusion to ver. 5), that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day (the saying is the completion of that in Ps. xc. [reff.], setting forth also in a wonderful way, that one day may be in God's sight as productive of events as a millennium: in other words, when both clauses are considered, placing Him far above all human limits of time. "Summa: Dei æonologium [sic appellare liceat] differt ab horologio mortalium. Illius guomon omnes horas simul indicat in summa actione et in summa quiete. Ei nec tardius nec celerius labuntur tempora, quam Ipsi et æconomiz ejus aptum sit. Nulla causa est cur finem rerum aut protelare aut accelerare necessum habeat. Qui hoc comprehendemus? Si comprehendere possemus, non opus foret a Mose et Petro addi, apud Dominum." Bengel). 9.] The Lord (i. e. God, the Father, as so often in this and in the first Epistle) is not tardy (βραδύνει, not merely to delay, but to be late, beyond an appointed time; so Gerh.: "discrimen est inter tardare et differre: is demum tardat, qui ultra debitum tempus quod agendum est differt") concerning his promise (so, connecting the gen. with the verb, and not with ὁ κύριος, must the words be taken. The gen. is one of partition, as in ὑστερεῖν τινος, 2 Cor. xi. 5, iii. 11.—παύσθαι τινος, 1 Pet. iv. 1,—&c., the being late implying a falling short) as some (viz. the scoffers in question, who are pointed at) account (His conduct) tardiness (better thus, making βραδυτήτα predicate, than to render νομίζουσιν "think concerning," "define," "explain," and make βραδυτήτα object only): but He is long-suffering towards you (μακροθυμεῖν with εἰς here only: with ἐπί, Matt. xviii. 26, 29; Luke xviii. 7; James v. 7; with πρός, 1 Thess. v. 14:—ὑμᾶς, the readers of the Epistle; not as a separate class, but as representing all, cf. πάντας below), not willing that any should perish, but (willing) that all should go forward (reff.) to repentance (Calvin is quite wrong in his rendering, "omnes ad pœnitentiam recipere:" equally wrong, in his alternatives, "aut colligi, vel aggregari." Plutarch has the very expression, De flum. p. 19 [Wetst.], ὀλίγον δὲ σωφρονήσας, καὶ εἰς μετάνοιαν ἐπὶ τοῖς πραχθείσι χωρήσας).

10.] Assertion of the conclusion as against the scoffers—the certainty, suddenness, and effect of the day of the Lord. But (notwithstanding the delay) the day (the art. is not needed for definiteness in the later Epistles, cf. ver. 7; Phil. i. 6, 10, ii. 16) of the Lord (= τοῦ θεοῦ, below, ver. 12) shall come (ἥξει has the emphasis, as opposed to all the doubts of the scoffers. It is more than merely "shall come," though no one word will give the exact force in English: "shall be here," "shall be upon you") as a thief (ref. 1 Thess.: from which place probably the expression is taken, as reference is made below to the Epistles of St. Paul); in which the heavens shall pass away (reff. Matt.; and Rev. xxi. 1) with a rushing noise (ροιζήδον, τὸ μετὰ ἤχου ἴδιος δὲ ὁ τοιοῦτος ἤχος πυρὸς ἐν τοῖς ὑπὸ πυρὸς καταβοσκομένοις, Ec. ροιζός is the rush of a bird, ref. Wisd., of an arrow, II. π. 361, of the music of a shepherd's pipe, Od. ι. 315: and, see Palm and Rost's Lex., of any thing rapidly moving. Some understand it of the actual noise of the flames which shall consume the heavens: others, as De W., of the 'ruina,' or crash with which they shall fall: "magno impetu," vulg.; "in modum procellæ," Calv.: "cum stridore," Beza: alii aliter), and the heavenly bodies (στοιχεῖα, according to Bede, the four elements, fire, air, earth, and water: but he is obliged to modify the meaning of λυθήσονται, inasmuch as fire cannot dissolve or consume fire: according to Bengel, the sun, moon, and stars, defending it by this word being often used in that sense by Theoph. of Antioch and others in Suicer sub voce. Certainly Justin Martyr so uses the word several times: cf. Apol. ii. 5, p. 92, τὰ οὐράνια στοιχεῖα εἰς αὔξησιν καρπῶν κ. ὠρῶν μεταβολὰς κοσμήσας: and Dial. Tryph. 23, p. 122, Epist. ad Diognet. 7 [Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. ii. p. 1177], and Otto's notes. And considering that this clause, on account of the δέ, followed presently by the καὶ when we come to speak of the earth, necessarily belongs to the heavens,—considering also that the mention of the heavenly bodies as affected by the great Day is constant in Scripture, cf. Matt. xxiv. 29; Isa. xiii. 9, 10, xxiv.

23, xxxiv. 4, &c., I should be inclined on the whole to accept this interpretation, feeling that the above-named reasons overbear the objection alleged by De Wette, that the word does not bear this sense in any other passage of Scripture. This objection is also weakened by remembering, 1. that it occurs in a physical sense here only: 2. that in Gal. iv. 3, where it is clearly not in a physical sense, the Greek interpreters give it this meaning: see in Suicer sub voce, and mine and Bishop Ellicott's notes on Gal. i. c., and note on Matt. xxiv. 29) being scorched up (καυσόμεναι, classically, to suffer from excessive heat: to be in a burning fever. The pres. part. gives the ground and reason of the following verb) shall be dissolved (not literally, melt: cf. λυομένων next verse, and reff. here), and the earth and the works in it (ἔργα may mean either the works of men, buildings and the like,—or, the works of the Creator: perhaps both of these combined, "opera naturæ et artis," Bengel. Estius's sense, "opera peccatorum," is out of the question: nor does 1 Cor. iii. 15 &c. apply here, any further than that the same purifying fire is spoken of) shall be burned up (the var. readd. are very curious. That of BKN, εὐρεθήσεται, has plainly arisen from the Latin urentur. That it has so arisen, is a most instructive fact, and leads to inferences which cannot be here followed out).

Winer, § 40. 2. a. It might be, with οὖν, a present proper, “are in course of dissolution;” but οὕτως forbids this: for they are not in course of dissolution by fire (βοιζῶν &c.), what manner of men (if we take ποταπούς interrogatively, we must not, as some [Pott, Meyer in his translation], put our interrogation at ὑμᾶς, or as others [Griesb., al.] at εὐσεβείαις: far better carry on the question to the end of ver. 12, as more like the fervent style of our Epistle. But [reff.] ποταπός seems in the N. T. never directly to ask a question, but always to belong to an exclamation. Certainly reff. Luke are close approaches to the interrogatory sense, so that I would not, as Huther, altogether exclude it, but only protest against dividing the sentence. Still I prefer the non-interrogatory form, as in the other reff. On the word, see note, 1 John iii. 1) ought ye to be (when the event comes: ὑπάρχειν seems to imply some fact supervening upon the previously existing state: see Acts xvi. 20, 21, 37 and notes) in holy behaviours and pieties (the plurals mark the holy behaviour and piety in all its different forms and examples. The words may be referred to ὑπάρχειν: but thus the strong ποταπούς would only be weakened, and it stands far better alone. So that I would join ἐν ἀγίαις κ.τ.λ. with what follows) 12.] looking for and hastening (the older Commentators mostly supplied εἰς after σπεύδοντας. So E. V., “hasting unto:” but there seems no reason for this. Two meanings are possible, regarding the accus. as in direct government by the participle: 1. ‘busied about:’ so in reff.; also Pind. Isthm. v. 22, σπεύδειν ἀρετάν. But in each of these, the object of σπεύδειν seems more properly to belong to the action than here. In Isa., and in Pind., it is an abstract substantive: in Hom., it is ταῦτα, matters within the power and personal employment of the speakers. And so in the numerous other examples in Palm and Rost. Whereas the παρουσία κ.τ.λ., a future thing, no matter of human practice, does not appear with equal propriety to be in this sense an object of σπεύδειν. 2. We have the other and cognate meaning of σπεύδειν transitive, to “hasten,” “urge on:” which I agree with De Wette in adopting, and in understanding as he does, “They hasten it by perfecting, in repentance and holiness, the work of the Gospel, and thus diminishing the need of the μακροθυμία ver. 9,” to which the delay of that day is owing. Huther’s objection to this is not difficult to answer. It is true, that the delay or hastening of that day is not man’s matter, but God’s: but it is not uncommon in Scripture to attribute to us those divine acts, or abstinences from acting, which are really and in their depth, God’s own. Thus we read, that “He could not do many mighty works there because of their unbelief,” Matt. xiii. 58 compared with Mark vi. 5, 6: thus repeatedly of man’s striving with, hindering, quenching, God’s Holy Spirit) the advent (παρουσία elsewhere commonly used of a person, and most usually of the presence or advent of the Lord Himself) of the day of God (= ἡμέρας κυρίου above. De W. compares Clem.-rom. Ep. ii. ad Cor. 12, p. 345, οὐκ οἶδαμεν τὴν ἡμέραν τῆς ἐπιφανείας τοῦ θεοῦ. See also Tit. ii. 13), by reason of which (δι’ ἣν, scil. ἡμέραν; or, but not so well, παρουσίαν, on account of, for the sake of, which) the heavens being on fire (the pres. part. gives the reason of the fut. verb following) shall be dissolved, and the heavenly bodies being scorched up are to be melted (τήκεται, the pres. of destiny: see above on λυομένων, ver. 11. De Wette thinks the meaning is not to be literally pressed, as if the στοιχεῖα were a solid mass which would actually liquefy: but why not? The same liquefaction has actually taken place in the crust of the earth wherever the central fires have acted on it. All our igneous rocks have been in a liquid state: why should not that day, in its purifying process, produce a similar effect on the earth again, and on her cognate planets, if they are to be included?

In this recapitulation, the Apostle mentions that part only of the destruction of that day which concerns the heavens: arguing à majori. The similarity to Isa. xxxiv. 4 can hardly escape notice, καὶ τακῆσονται πᾶσαι αἱ δυνάμεις τῶν οὐρανῶν. See also Micah i. 4).

13.] The positive result of that day, as regards the church. But (contrast to the destructive effects of the day lately dwelt on: not "nevertheless" as E. V., which looks as if the two effects were in antagonism, and the earth were to be annihilated, of which idea there is no trace. The flood did not annihilate the earth, but changed it; and as the new earth was the consequence of the flood, so the final new heavens and earth shall be of the fire) according to His (God's) promise (viz., that written in ref. Isa.) we (no stress, as is almost unavoidable in the E. V. "Nevertheless we, according to his promise:" there is no ἡμεῖς, nor is the distinction drawn between us and any other class of persons) expect new heavens and a new earth, in which (heavens and earth, plur.) righteousness dwelleth (ref. Isa., cf. also οὐκ ἀδικήσουσιν, . . . ἐπὶ τῷ ὕρει τῷ ἀγίῳ μου, λέγει κύριος, of Isa. lxxv. 25).

14.] Exhortation founded on this expectation. Wherefore, beloved, expecting (as ye do) these things (the pres. part. gives the reason of the verb following: and does not, as Huther and Dietlein, belong to the exhortation, προσδοκῶντες σπουδάσατε: for the Apostle has just assumed προσδοκῶμεν as a patent fact), be earnest (σπουδάσατε, aor.: not the daily habit so much, as the one great life-effort which shall accomplish the end, is in the Apostle's mind) to be found (at His coming. This word shews plainly enough that a personal coming of the Lord, as in ver. 4, is in the view of the Apostle throughout, as connected with the proceedings of the great Day. The form of expression reminds us forcibly of Matt. xxii. 11 ff.) spotless (reff.) and blameless (cf. 2 Cor. vi. 3, viii. 20; also σπῖλοι κ. μᾶμοι, the contrast, above, ch. ii. 13. From the connexion therewith a feast, it seems very probable that in both passages the parable of the wedding garment was floating before the Apostle's mind) in His sight (so, and not, "by Him," or "of Him," as E. V., must we render: see reff.) in peace (second predicate after εὐρεθῆναι: the ἄσπιλοι κ. ἄμωμοι were with reference to God [αὐτῷ]; this, in reference to your own state and lot: in peace among yourselves, in peace with yourselves, in peace for yourselves, with God. But perhaps an expression so familiar to the Eastern tongue as ἐν εἰρήνῃ, may have an onward as well as a present meaning, as in πορεύεσθαι ἐν εἰρήνῃ and εἰς εἰρήνῃν [reff. and Luke vii. 50, viii. 48]: and be taken of that eternal peace, of which all earthly peace is but a feeble foretaste):

It is He who waits and is long-suffering: He, in His union and co-equality with the Father, who ruleth all things after the counsel of His own will) salvation (contrast to βραδύτητα ἡγούνται, ver. 9): even as also (besides myself) our beloved brother (this term is probably used in a closer sense than as merely signifying fellow-Christian: our beloved fellow-Apostle) Paul according to the wisdom given to him (cf. 1 Cor. iii. 10, κατὰ τὴν χάριν τοῦ θεοῦ τὴν δοθεῖσάν μοι, ὡς σοφὸς ἀρχιτέκτων κ.τ.λ. found in the preceding clause, τὴν τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν μακροθυμίαν σωτηρίαν ἡγήσθε: which, in sense, is almost identical with Rom. ii. 4, ἀγνοῶν ὅτι τὸ χρηστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ εἰς μετάνοιαν σε ἔγει. So Ec., Grot., al., and more recently Huther, Dietlein. But surely the reference is too narrow to satisfy what follows here, λαλῶν ἐν αὐταῖς περὶ τούτων, where the reference must be to ταῦτα, which we Christians προσδοκῶμεν, viz. to the coming of the day of the Lord. Thus then we should interpret the καθὼς καὶ &c. of some particular passage in which St. Paul had exhorted to readiness in expectation of that day, and the ὡς καὶ ἐν πάσαις κ.τ.λ., ver. 16, of the frequent mention of that day in his other Epistles. In searching then, 2. for some passage which may fulfil the above condition, it seems to me that we need not go beyond the earliest Epistle of St. Paul, viz. 1 Thessalonians. There, in ch. iv. 13—v. 11, we have a passage on this very point, and the more satisfactory, because St. Peter seems, in our ver. 10, to have had 1 Thess. v. 2 before his mind. And as to, 3. ὑμῖν, there seems no need to press it as identifying any particular church, seeing that this our Epistle is addressed to all Christians alike: cf. ch. i. 1. All that follows from ὑμῖν is what may also be gathered from ver. 16, that our Epistle belongs to a date when the Pauline Epistles were no longer the property only of the churches to which they were written, but were dispersed through, and considered to belong to, the whole Christian Church. What date that is, I have discussed in the Prolegomena. There have been very various opinions as to the passage and Epistle meant: Estius, Calov., Spanheim, Bengel, Gerhard, al., think it to be the Epistle to the Hebrews, on account of ch. ix. 26 ff., x. 25, 37 [see on these in the Prolegg. to the Hebrews, § i. par. 6]: Jachmann, the Epistles to the Corinthians, especially 1 Cor. i. 7—9, finding an allusion to 1 Cor. ii. 1 ff. in κατὰ σοφίαν κ.τ.λ.: Benson, the Epistles to the Gal., Eph., Col., being addressed to Asia Minor churches, as he holds this to be: Augusti, referring ἐν εἰρήνῃ to the difference between Paul and Peter, the Epistle to the

Gal.: Pott, and Morus, some Epistle which has not come down to us), 16.] as also in all (his, but not expressed: with the ταις it would mean, in all his Epistles as a finished whole: without it, in all Epistles which he writes, leaving room for the possibility that the number of those Epistles was not complete, but still being added to) Epistles, speaking in them (as he does: the pres. part. contains the justification of the assertion: not as Huther, “when he speaks”) of these things (viz. the coming of our Lord, and the end of the world), in which (Epistles, if αἷς be read: if οἷς, “in which sayings of his:” not, “in which things,” “in which subjects,” as some [e. g. Bengel] have rendered by way of escape from the supposed difficulty: for οἷς is correlative with τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς, and must therefore designate some writings previously mentioned: or else the sentence is stultified) are some things difficult to understand (De W. especially refers to 2 Thess. ii. 1 ff.: and it is not improbable that this may have been particularly in the Apostle’s mind. See note on 2 Tim. ii. 18. Grot. is clearly wrong in extending the list to difficulties about faith and works, &c.), which the ignorant (unintelligent, uninformed: hardly, as De W., with an understood meaning of rebellion and unbelief: for that would be too much here. ἀμαθία may arise from many causes: but the misunderstanding of difficult Scriptures is common to the ἀμαθεῖς in general) and unstable (ref.: those who, wanting firm foundation and anchorage, waver and drift about with every wind of doctrine. Such persons are stirred from their Christian stability by every apparent difficulty: are rendered anxious and perplexed by hard texts: and shewing more anxiety to interpret them somehow, than to wait upon God for their solution, rush upon erroneous and dangerous ways of interpretation) distort (στρεβλώω, properly, to twist with a hand-screw or windlass, στρέβλη: σκάφος στρέβλαισι ναυτικαῖς προσηγμένον, Æsch. λειν), as also the other Scriptures (or, passages of Scripture having reference to this great subject: as we have ἑτέρα γραφή λέγει John xix. 37, πᾶσα γραφή θεόπνευστος [see note] 2 Tim. iii. 16. Whichever be understood, it is plain, 1. that by these words St. Paul's Epistles are reckoned among the Christian scriptures: 2. that there were at this time besides those Epistles, other writings holding a similar place, known as γραφαί; probably, at least, the three Gospels [and Acts?], and some of the earlier written catholic Epistles. That by τὰς λοιπὰς γραφάς should be meant the O. T. scriptures, is not probable: these would have been more fully designated than by being placed in the same category with the inspired writings of recent or living men), to (as a contribution to—towards,—so as to help towards) their own perdition (τὴν ἰδίαν αὐτῶν), more strongly reflective than with one of these merely). 17, 18.]

Concluding exhortations: conveyed first in the form of a caution (ver. 17), then in that of a positive exhortation to increase in grace and wisdom. 17.] Ye therefore, beloved, knowing (as ye do) beforehand (viz. the whole announcement of which this chapter has been full; the certainty that such false teachers will arise, and the course which they will take), take heed (be on your guard) lest (ἵνα μὴ aft. φυλάσσομαι, here only. In Xen. Mem. i. 2. 37, we have, in Charicles's famous answer to Socrates, φυλάττω ὅπως μὴ καὶ σὺ ἐλάττω τοὺς βούς ποιήσης) being led away together with (it is a remarkable coincidence, that St. Peter, well acquainted as he was with St. Paul's writings, should have written this word, which is the very one used by that Apostle [ref. Gal.] of Barnabas, at Antioch, when he συναπήχθη with the hypocrisy of Peter and the other Jews) the error (not, the deceit, act., deceiving others: but the aberration, wandering out of the right way, so as to follow it and become partakers with it) of the lawless (reff.) ye fall from (reff.: οὐκ, because the fall would be one and decisive) your own steadfastness (contrast to ἀστήρικτοι above: see note there): 18.] but (contrast to the fall just predicated as possible) grow (not only do not ἐκπέσητε τοῦ στηριγμοῦ, but be so firmly rooted as to throw out branches and yield increase. “Hæc unica est perseverandi ratio, si assidue progredimur.” Calv.) in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (the gen., τοῦ κυρ. κ.τ.λ., belongs to both χάριτι and γνώσει, as is sufficiently shewn by the preposition extending over both. The common rendering, “in grace and in the knowledge of . . .” would more naturally be ἐν χάριτι καὶ ἐν γνώσει. Taken as above, the genitive stands in somewhat different relation to the two datives. As regards χάριτι, it is a subjective gen.,—the grace of which Christ is the author and bestower; of which it is said, ἡ χάρις διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐγένετο: as regards γνώσει, it is an objective genitive,—the knowledge of which Christ is the object).

Concluding doxology: “hymnus Christo quasi Deo,” as Pliny's letter. To Him the glory (the glory—i. e. all glory that is rendered: the sum total of glory) both now and to the day of eternity (ἡμέρα αἰῶνος, the day which shall dawn at the end of time, and being eternal, itself know no end: “tota æternitas una dies est,” as Estius. Bengel takes it to mean “dies sine nocte, merus et perpetuus:” and so Calov.: but this idea does not seem so congruous here, as that of mere duration. Grot., Beza take ἡμέρα for time. But considering how frequent ἡμέρα has been in this chapter, we have no right to seek for an unusual meaning, when the common one suits so well). [Amen (cf. Jude 25).]

CHAP. I. 1. [εωρακαμεν B¹ (so vv 2, 3, and A ver 1).] Tischendorf [ed 7] edits εωρακαμεν, but, apparently, on insufficient grounds. The following is a statement of the evidence. The tense occurs six times in this epistle and once in 3 Jn, in all of these B¹ has εωρ., in addition to this B¹ has εωρ. in Jn ix. 37; xx. 25; 1 Cor ix. 1; and Col ii. 18; A has εωρ. once (or perhaps twice); C, twice (Lu ix. 36; Col ii. 1); D, once (Acts vii. 44); and N thrice (1 Cor ix. 1; Col ii. 1, 18). On the other hand the word occurs in 23 other passages, in all of which B has εωρ. (so Vercellone, nemine contradicente [except Tischdf who (Nov. Test. Vat.) assigns εωρ. to B¹ in Lu i. 22; Jn i. 18; vi. 46 bis; viii. 57; xx. 25]: he seems to have paid especial attention to this point in preparing the 2nd edition [in ed 8 Tischdf has εωρ.].)

CHAP. I. 1—4.] INTRODUCTION: THE PERSONAL AUTHORITY OF THE WRITER, AND OBJECTS OF THE EPISTLE. This Epistle does not begin with an address, properly so called. But there is in this sentence the latent form of an address: the ὑμῖν of ver. 3, and the ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ . . . πεπληρωμένη, answering to the more usual χαίρειν, seem to shew that what follows is an Epistle, not a treatise. The construction of these verses is difficult, and has been variously given. The simplest view, and that generally adopted (Syr., Vulg., Ec., Bullinger, Calv., Beza, Socinus, Grot., Calov., Fritzsche, Lücke, De Wette, Huther, &c.) is, that in ver. 1 a sentence is begun, which is broken off by the parenthetical ver. 2 inserted to explain ver. 1, and carried on again in ver. 3, some words being, for the sake of perspicuity, recited again from ver. 1. This construction was doubted by Wincr in the earlier editions of his Grammar, but has now in the 6th edit. been adopted (§ 63, i. 1, note). The smaller clauses, ὃ ἦν, ὃ ἀκηκόαμεν, &c., are co-ordinate with each other, not to be arranged as subject and predicate, as Capellus, "quod erat ab initio, hoc ipsum est, quod audivimus, &c." or, as Paulus, who begins his predicatory apodosis at καὶ αἱ χεῖρες, "that which, ὅς, ὅς, our hands also have handled." So that there is no need to adopt Calvin's solution of "abrupta et confusa oratio:" the sentence and construction flow smoothly and regularly. That which was (not 'took place,' as Crell., Schöttg., al. ἦν is not = ἐγένετο, as their very marked distinction in John i. 1 ff. might have shewn. See this idea discussed and refuted in a note to the dissertation de Epist. Johannearum locis difficilioribus, in the Fritzschorum Opuscula, p. 284 ff.: and in Düsterdieck's Comm. in loc. Ec. and Thl. say well, τὸ δὲ ἦν τοῦτο οὐ χρονικὴν παρίστησιν ὑπαρξιν, ἀλλ' ἐνυποστάτου πράγματος οὐσίαν) from the beginning (ἀπ' ἀρχῆς is not synonymous with ἐν ἀρχῇ, though in the depth of its meaning it is virtually the same. It sets before us the terminus a quo, but without meaning strictly to define it as such exclusively. So μέχρι, ἄχρι, and words of this kind are not unfrequently used: see Fritzsche on Matt. p. 53 f.: and cf. Acts xx. 6, Rom. viii. 22, 2 Cor. iii. 14. The interpretation, "Since the beginning of the Gospel," is connected with the misunderstanding of the whole passage by the Socinian interpreters, and cannot stand for a moment when we consider the context with ver. 2, and the use of ἀπ' ἀρχῆς by St. John when applied to Christ or to supernatural beings: see ref. Wherever he uses it of the preaching of the Gospel, it is definitely marked as bearing that meaning: cf. ch. ii. 7, 24, iii. 11. On the meaning of this clause, see below), that which we have heard (the perfect extends the reference of the verb from the beginning, and that which the Apostle might have heard concerning Christ, e. g. from John the Baptist, down to the time when he was writing; regards his hearing as a finished and abiding possession. This verb, ἀκηκόαμεν, rules the form of the sentence: hence περί below: see more there), that which we have seen with our eyes (the same is true again. The seeing as well as the hearing is a finished and abiding possession. The clauses rise in climax: seeing is more than hearing: τοῖς ὀφθ. ἡμῶν emphasizes the fact of eye-witness), that which we looked upon (now, the tense is altered: because the Evangelist comes from speaking of the closed testimony which abode with him as a whole, to that of the senses actually exercised at the time when Christ was on earth. Notice the climax again: θεᾶσθαι, 'intueri,' to look upon: ὄραν, merely 'videre,' to see: so Beza here: "quod ego his oculis vidi, idque non semel nec obiter, sed quod ego vere et penitus sum contemplatus." See more below), and our hands handled ("attulerunt viri docti Joh. xx. 20, 27: Luc. xxiv. 39. Sed nihil huiusmodi opus est. An probandum, Johannem, amatissimum et ἐπιστήθιον Christi discipulum, Dominum suum manibus contractasse?" Fritzsche, Opusc. p. 295. These words are not for a moment to be washed out with a 'veluti' or 'quasi:' they are literal matter of fact, and form one of the strongest proofs that what is said, is said of no other than the personal incarnate Son of God) concerning the Word of life (the construction seems to be this: the περί depends strictly upon ἀκηκόαμεν, loosely upon the other clauses. The exegesis turns wholly upon the sense which we assign to the words τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς: and here there has been great diversity among Commentators. This diversity may be gathered under two heads: those who make λόγου the personal hypostatic Logos, who is ζωή, and those who make it the account, or preaching, or doctrine, concerning ζωή. Of this latter number, are for the most part, Socinus and his school (see an exception below), and some few other expositors, e. g., Grotius, Semler, Rosenmüller. Of recent writers, the most distinguished is De Wette. The former, including Œc., Thil., Aug. ("forte de verbo vitæ sic quisque accipiat quasi locutionem quamdam de Christo, non ipsum corpus Christi quod manibus tractatum est. Videte quid sequatur: et ipsa vita manifestata est. Christus ergo verbum vitæ." In Ep. Joh. Tract. i. 1, vol. iii. p. 1978), Bede, Calvin (gives both), Beza, Luther, Schlichting ("id est de Jesu quem suo more Sermonem appellat"), Episcopius (who however strikes a middle course, "utrumque simul intelligi, Evangelium, quatenus partim ab ipso Christo revelatum est, partim de ipso Chr. J. agit"), Calov., Bengel, Wolf, Lücke, Fritzsche, Baumg.-Crus., Sander, Huther, al., have been most worthily represented among modern Commentators by O. F. Fritzsche, in his Commentatio I. de Epistolarum Johannearum locis difficilioribus, in the Fritzschorum Opuscula, pp. 276 ff. And with his interpretation, in the main, I agree, diverging from him in some points of more or less importance. And as this περί τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς is the keystone of the sentence, it will be well to set out the interpretation once for all. I regard then ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς as the designation of our Lord Himself. He is the λόγος; and is the λόγος τῆς ζωῆς, this gen. being one of apposition, as He describes Himself as being the ζωή, John xi. 25, xiv. 6,—the ἔστος τῆς ζωῆς, vi. 35, 48: the φῶς τῆς ζωῆς, viii. 12: cf. also i. 4. This being so, the ὁ —, ὁ —, ὁ —, ὁ —, are all matters concerning, belonging to, regarding, Himself, the Lord of Life: all Zeugmatically predicated of Him by the περί, which more properly belongs to the one verb ἀκηκόαμεν (notice that in ver. 5, where the nature of the ἀγγελία is stated, ἀκηκόαμεν alone, of all these verbs, is repeated). The ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς is His eternal præ-existence and inherent Life and Glory with the Father: this is what, in a sense slightly, though but slightly differing from the common one, may be said to have been ἀπ' ἀρχῆς περί τοῦ however, as some here, love: at the same time it sets forth plainly the distinction of Persons: as Basil: ἵνα τὸ ἰδιάζον τῆς ὑποστάσεως παραστήσῃ . . . ἵνα μὴ πρόφασιν δῶ τῇ συγχύσει τῆς ὑποστάσεως), and was manifested to us (here the parenthesis ends, and the construction of ver. 1 is resumed. But on account of the distance at which that verse now stands, the leading particulars of its sense are recapitulated. Huther objects to the parenthetical view, that ὁ ἑωρ. κ. ἀκηκ. is not a full resumption, ὁ ἦν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς not appearing in it. But it is included in the hearing, as the other sensuous clause in the seeing): that which we have heard and seen, we declare to you also (the και of the old MSS. here seems to give to the Epistle the character of being addressed to some special circle of Christian readers, beyond those addressed at the conclusion of the Gospel, ch. xx. 31, or we may, with Socinus (in Huther), take the και as indicating "vos, qui nimirum non audistis, nec vidistis, nec manibus vestris contrectastis verbum vitæ." But the other is more likely: a supposition which is confirmed when we look farther into it: see the Prolegomena. It is quite beyond all probability that the και should have been inserted to suit καὶ ὑμεῖς which follows, as De Wette imagines: far more probable that the very occurrence of those words so near made it seem superfluous, or even that it was erased to give the Epistle a more general character, as ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, ἐν Ῥώμῃ, at the opening of those Epistles), in order that ye also (see above) may have communion with us (not,—as Socinus ("nou nos solum, sed vos etiam nobiscum eam communionem cum patre et filio habetis"), Episcopus ("τὸ nobiscum nihil aliud sibi vult, quam 'sicut nos habemus'"), Bengel ("eandem, quam nos, qui vidimus"),—the same communion which we have, viz. that presently mentioned: but in the sense of κοιν. μετὰ immediately following, and in vv. 6, 7, communion with us, the Apostle and eye-witnesses (for thus I would take the ἡμεῖς throughout,

It may be very true, as Fr. insists, that here the Evangelist is speaking of his general work in the world, and below, ver. 4, the special object of writing this Epistle comes in: but even thus, the end proposed is simply that they might κοινωνίαν ἔχειν in the ordinary sense, of course by acquiring it; but this is not of necessity in the word ἔχειν): and indeed (see reff. for καὶ δέ. Denkweise zu liegen”), but because, the blessed Spirit being God dwelling in man, though we may be said to have τὴν κοινωνίαν τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος, 2 Cor. xiii. 13,—we would hardly be said to have κοινωνίαν μετὰ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος. And these things (i. e. this whole Epistle: not, as Sander, the foregoing, nor as De Wette (altern.), and Düsterdieck, the immediately following) we write (the reading ἡμεῖς finds no favour with most of the modern critical editors, as neither does ἡμῶν below. It is objected to the former, that thus an irrelevant emphasis will be introduced into the clause. But it has not been observed, that it is in St. John’s manner thus to use ἡμεῖς with a verb, perhaps without any especial emphasis being conveyed: e. g. John viii. 48, οὐ καλῶς λέγομεν ἡμεῖς . . ., where as here the pron. follows the verb: ib. vi. 42, ix. 24, 29 (1 John iii. 14). al. Besides which, the ἡμεῖς is by no means otiose here, whether we read ὑμῶν or ἡμῶν below. If the former, the contrast would be plain: if the latter, we must take this ἡμεῖς to be the apostolic first person—“I, as one of the eye and ear witnesses:” and the ἡμῶν following in a wider sense, “our joy”—“the joy of us and you:”—or, it may be, our joy in accomplishing the end and bringing you into communion with us and through us with the Father and the Son: so Thl.: ἡμῶν γὰρ ὑμῖν κοινωνούντων πλείστον ἔχομεν τὴν χαρὰν ἡμῶν, ἣν τοῖς θερισταῖς ὁ χαίρων σπορεύς ἐν τῇ τοῦ μισθοῦ ἀντιλήψει βραβεύσει χαίρόντων καὶ τούτων ἐπι τῶν πόνων αὐτῶν ἀπολαύουσι. Similarly Cc.: Schol. in catena, ἐπειδὴν δὲ ταύτην ἔχητε κοινωνίαν, χαρὰς ἐσόμεθα μεσοί, ὅτι τῷ θεῷ ἐκολληθήμεν: Bede, “gaudium Doctorem sit plenum, cum multis prædicando ad sanctæ Ecclesiæ societatem, atque ad ejus per quem Ecclesia roboratur et crescit, Dei Patris et Filii ejus Jesu Christi, societatem perducent:” referring to Phil. ii. 2, πληρώσατέ μου τὴν χαρὰν, κ.τ.λ. As regards possibility of change of reading, it is far more probable that the not very obvious ἡμεῖς and ἡμῶν should have been altered to the very obvious ὑμῖν and ὑμῶν, so exactly correspondent to John xv. 11, xvi. 24), that our (see above) joy may be full (this rendering better represents the perfect than “may be filled up,” which would indicate the process rather than the completion. The joy spoken of is the whole complex of the Christian life here and hereafter; its whole sum is, JOY. As Düsterdieck beautifully says, “The peace of reconciliation, the blessed consciousness of sonship, the happy growth in holiness, the bright prospect of future completion and glory,—all these are but simple details of that which in all its length and breadth is embraced by one word, Eternal Life, the real possession of which is the immediate source of our joy. We have joy, Christ’s joy, because we are blessed, because we have Life itself in Christ.” He quotes Augustine, Confess. x. 22 (32), vol. i. p. 793: “Est enim gaudium quod non datur impiis, sed eis tantum qui te gratis colunt, quorum gaudium tu ipse es. Et ipsa est beata vita gaudere ad te, de te, propter te, ipsa est et non altera.” It has been noticed before, sub initio, that this verse fills the place of the χαίρειν so common in the opening of Epistles, and gives an epistolary character to what follows).

bined with the fact that in ch. iii. 11 ἐπαγγ. is also read, and with this also, that ἐπαγγ. is a very common word in the N. T., whereas ἄγγ. occurs only in these two places, precludes De W.'s supposition. The correction from ἄγγ. to ἐπαγγ. was very obvious from ch. ii. 25, which also suggested transposing ἐστὶν αὐτῷ to αὐτ. ἐστ.) which we have heard from Him (viz. from Christ), and announce to you ("quod filius annuntiavit a patre, hoc apostolus acceptum a filio renunciat nobis." Erasmus. Dūsterd. remarks that St. John seems every where to observe the distinction between ἀν- and ἀπ-αγγέλλειν, to announce and to declare. And to this distinction ἀγγελία here exactly corresponds (as Bengel, "quæ in ore Christi fuit ἀγγελία, eam Apostoli ἀναγγέλλουσι: nam ἀγγελίαν ab ipso acceptam reddunt et propagant"); whereas ἐπαγγελία, which means in the N. T. nothing but "promise" (neither in 2 Tim. i. 1, nor in Acts xxiii. 21 has it any other sense; see note on the latter place), seems to carry no meaning here, and has, as above, evidently crept in from ch. ii. 25), is this (αὐτῷ) predicate, as always in such sentences): that God is light (not, as Luther, "a light;" φῶς is purely predicative, indicating the essence of God: just as when it is said in ch. iv. 8, ὁ θεὸς ἀγάπη ἐστίν. There it is true the predicative is purely ethical, and thus literal, when used of God who is a Spirit, whereas here, φῶς being a material, not an ethical object, some amount of figurative meaning must be conceded. But of all material objects, light is that which most easily passes into an ethical predicative without even the process, in our thought, of interpretation. It unites in itself purity and clearness and beauty and glory, as no other material object does: it is the condition of all material life and growth and joy. And the application to God of such a predicative requires no transference. He is Light, and the Fountain of light material and light ethical. In the one world, darkness is the absence of light: in the other, darkness, untruthfulness, deceit, falsehood, is the absence of God. They who are in communion with God, and walk with God, are of the light, and walk in the light), and there is not in Him any darkness at all (it is according to the manner of St. John, to strengthen an affirmation by the emphatic negation of its opposite; cf. ver. 8: ch. ii. 4, 10, 27, &c. Of the ethical darkness here denied, the Schol. says, οὔτε γὰρ ἄγνοια, οὔτε πλάνη, οὔτε ἁμαρτία, οὔτε θάνατος. The οὐδεμία strengthens the negative—"no, not even one speck." The Greek expositors ask the question respecting this message, καὶ τοῦ τοῦτο ἤκουσε;—and answer it, ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ χριστοῦ, ἐγὼ εἶμι τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου λέγοντος. Their reply is right, but their reference to those words of our Lord is wrong. It was ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ χριστοῦ: viz. from the whole revelation, in doings and sufferings and sayings, of Him who was the ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης of the Father. With that revelation those His words admirably and exactly coincided: but they were not the source of the message, referring as they did specially to Himself, and not directly to the Father. In His whole life on earth, and in the testimony of His Spirit, ἐκείνος ἐξηγήσατο αὐτόν. So that this message is the result of the whole complex of ver. 1).

6.] None can have communion with Him who walk in darkness. If we say (the hypothesis is not assumed,—“If we say, as we do:”—but is purely hypothetical, “say who will and when he will.” This εἰάν with the subj. is repeated in every verse as far as ch. ii. 1. The 1st pers. plur. gives to the sayings a more general form, precluding any from escaping from the inference: at the same time that by including himself in the hypothesis, the Apostle descends to the level of his readers, thus giving to his exhortations the “come,” and not “go,” which ever wins men’s hearts (the most) that we have communion with Him (see on ver. 3. “Communion with God is the very innermost essence of all true Christian life.” Huther), and walk in the darkness (περιπατῶμεν, as so often in N. T., of the whole being and moving Episcopus, "hoc dicentes non facimus quod rectum est:" but is an independent proposition, answering to ἐν τῷ σκότει περιπατῶμεν, and asserting that all such walking in darkness is a not-doing of the truth. Christ is "the Truth:" and all doing the Truth is of Him, and of those who are in union with Him. So that ἡ ἀλήθεια is objective, not as ἀλήθεια alone might be, subjective, and imports "God's truth," καθὼς ἐστιν ἀλήθεια ἐν τῷ Ἰησοῦ, Eph. iv. 21. We may observe how closely the teaching here as to φῶς and ἀλήθεια resembles that in Eph. iv. v. See also John iii. 21)

7.] (is not merely the contrasted hypothesis to ver. 6, but together with that contains a further unfolding of the subject): but if (see on ἐὰν with the subj. above) we walk in the light (this walking in the light is explained by what follows, ὡς αὐτός ἐστιν ἐν τῷ φωτὶ, and by the apodosis, which gives the result of so walking,—viz. communion, &c. See Eph. v. 8 ff. for the ethical details), as He (God) is in the light (because the Christian is made θείας κοινωνός φύσεως, 2 Pet. i. 4. ἐστὶν ἐν τῷ φωτὶ is parallel with φῶς ἐστὶν above, ver. 5. ἐστὶν, as of Him who is eternal and fixed; περιπατῶμεν, as of us who are of time, moving onward: so Bede, "notanda distinctio verborum, quia Deum esse in luce dicit, nos autem in luce ambulare debere. Ambulant enim iusti in luce, cum virtutum operibus servientes ad meliora proficiunt:" see note on ch. ii. 6: τὸ φῶς is the element in which God dwelleth: cf. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Notice that this walking in the light, as He is in the light, is no mere imitation of God, as Episcopus, al., but is an identity in the essential element of our daily walk with the essential element of God's eternal being: not imitation, but coincidence and identity of the very atmosphere of life), we have communion with one another (these words, κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' ἀλλήλων, are to be taken in their plain literal sense, and refer, not to our communion with God, which is assumed in our walking in the light as He is in the light, but to our mutual communion with one another by all having the same ground-element of life, viz. the light of the Lord, Isa. ii. 5. This has been very commonly misunderstood: e. g. by Ec. (ὥστε τῆς κοινωνίας ἐχόμενοι τῆς ἀλλήλων, δῆλον δὲ ὅτι τῆς ἡμῶν τε καὶ τοῦ φωτός, so Thl. also), Schol. in Oxf. Cat., Aug. ("ut possimus societatem habere cum illo"), Beza ("interpretor cum illo mutuum: agitur enim nunc de communione non sanctorum inter se, sed Dei et sanctorum"), Calv., Socinus, al.: even De Wette interprets "Gemeinschaft unter einander, nämlich mit Gott:" and Beugel wavers between the two. The words are taken rightly by Bede (who however regards them as putting forward mutual love as the necessary result of walking in the light), Erasmus, Lyra, Luther, Grot., Estius, (Bengel,) Lücke, Baumg.-Crus., Neander, Sander, Düsterd., al. The words are evidently an allusion to ver. 3, and as there communion with God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ is expressed, so here it lies in the background, but need not be supplied. De Wette's remark is most true; Christian communion is then only real, when it is communion with God), and the blood of Jesus His Son cleanseth us from all sin (in order to understand rightly this important sentence, we must fix definitely two or three points regarding its connexion and construction. First then, καὶ connects it, as an additional result of our walking in the light, as He is in the light, with κοινωνίαν ἔχομεν μετ' ἀλλήλων: just as in ch. iii. 10, end, καὶ ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ. Consequently, the proposition contained in it cannot be as Ec., Thl., Beza, Wolf, Sander, al., imagine the ground (καὶ γὰρ) of the former one, that "if we walk, &c., we have communion, &c.,” but follows as a co-ordinate result with κοιν. ἔχ. κ.τ.λ. Secondly, καθαρίζει is the present tense, and must be kept to its present meaning. This consideration precludes all such meanings as the former of the two given by Jerome (“quod scriptum est ‘et sanguis Jesu filii ejus mundat nos ab omni peccato’ tam in confessione baptismatis, quam in elementa pœnitentiis accipiendum est,” adv. Pelag. ii. 8, vol. ii. p. 750), and Bede (“sacramentum namque (καί) dominicæ passionis et præterita nobis omnia in baptismo pariter peccata laxavit (notice the past tense), et quidquid quotidiana fragilitate post baptismam commisimus ejusdem Redemptoris nostri gratia dimittit”): and as that of Calvin (“hæc igitur summa est, ut certo statuunt fideles se acceptos esse Deo, quia sacrificio mortis Christi illis placatus est”), Calovius, Episcopus, al. Thirdly, the sense of καθαρίζει must be accurately ascertained and strictly kept to. In ver. 9, ἵνα καθάρσις ἡμῶν ἀπὸ πάσης ἀδικίας is plainly distinguished from ἵνα ἀφῆ ἡμῶν τὰς ἀμαρτίας: distinguished, as a further process; as, in a word, sanctification, distinct from justification. This meaning then, however much it may be supposed that justification is implied or presupposed, must be held fast here. Fourthly, the sense of τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ must be also clearly defined. The expression is an objective one, not a subjective: is spoken of that which is the objective cause ab extra, of our being cleansed from all sin. And this is the material Blood of Jesus the personal Redeemer, shed on the cross as a propitiatory sacrifice for the sin of the world. So we have the same Blood said in Col. i. 20 to be the great medium of pacification between God and the world: so in Eph. i. 7, to be the means of our ἀπολύτρωσις: so in Heb. ix. 14, which approaches very nearly to our passage, to cleanse (καθαρίζειν as here) our conscience from dead works to serve the living God. In all these places, and similar ones, whatever application to ourselves by faith or otherwise may lie in the background, it is not that which is spoken of, but the Blood of Christ itself, as the actual objective cause, once for all, of our reconciliation and sanctification. These considerations remove much of the difficulty and possible misunderstanding of the sentence. Thus understood, it will mean, much as in the second clause of Bede’s interpretation, that this our walking in light, itself necessarily grounded in communion with the Father and the Son, will bring about, that whatever sin we may still be betrayed into by the infirmity of our nature and the malice of the devil, from them the Blood of Jesus purifies us day by day. Observe, not, the application of that Blood: for we are speaking of a state of faith and holiness, in which that blood is continually applied: the περιπατεῖν ἐν τῷ φωτί is, in fact, the application: is that, which, as a subjective conditional element, makes that Blood of Christ’s cross to be to us a means of purifying from all sin. The whole doctrine of this verse is fully and admirably set forth in Dusterdieck. The sum of what he says may be thus stated. St. John, in accord with the other Apostles, sets forth the Death and Blood of Christ in two different aspects: 1) as the one sin-offering for the world, in which sense we are justified by the application of the Blood of Christ by faith, His satisfaction being imputed to us. 2) as a victory over Sin itself, His blood being the purifying medium, whereby we gradually, being already justified, become pure and clean from all sin. And this application of Christ’s blood is made by the Spirit which dwelleth in us. The former of these asserts the imputed righteousness of Christ put on us in justification: the latter, the inherent righteousness of Christ, wrought in us gradually in sanctification. And it is of this latter that he here is treating. Cf. next verse). 8—II.2.] Unfolding of the idea of purification from sin by the blood of Christ, in connexion with our walking in light. This last is adduced in one of its plainest and simplest consequences, viz. the recognition of all that is yet darkness in us, in the confession of our sins. “Si te confessus fueris peccatorem, est in te veritas: nam ipsa veritas lux est. Nondum perfecte splenduit vita tua, quia insunt peccata: sed tamen jam illuminari cœpisti, quia inest confessio peccatorum.” Aug. The light that is in us convicts the darkness, and we, no longer loving nor desiring to sin, have, by means of the propitiatory and sanctifying blood of Christ, both full forgiveness of and sure purification from all our sins. But the true test of this state of communion with and knowledge of God is, the keeping of His commandments (ii. 3—6), the walking as Christ walked: and this test is concentrated and summed up in its one crucial application, viz. to the law of love (ii. 7—11). 8.] If we say (see on εὖν with subj. above, ver. 6) that we have not sin (i. e. in the course and abiding of our walking in light: if we maintain that we are pure and free from all stain of sin. St. John is writing to persons whose sins have been forgiven them (ch. ii. 12), and therefore necessarily the present tense ἔχομεν refers not to any previous state of sinful life before conversion, but to their now existing state and the sins to which they are liable in that state. And in thus referring, it takes up the conclusion of the last verse, in which the onward cleansing power of the sanctifying blood of Christ was asserted: q. d. this state of needing cleansing from all present sin is veritably that of all of us: and our recognition and confession of it is the very first essential of walking in light. The Socinian interpreters, Socinus, Schlichting, and following them Grotius, go in omnia alia, and understand the passage of sins before conversion, or of the general imputation of sin. And our own Hammond has been entirely led away from the sense of the passage by the unfortunate notion of Gnostics being every where aimed at in this Epistle: imagining that their profession of perfection while living impure lives was here intended. See these erroneous interpretations refuted at length in Lücke and Düsterdieck, we are deceiving ourselves (causing ourselves to err from the straight and true way), and the truth (God's truth, objective) is not in us (has no subjective place in us. That truth respecting God's holiness and our own sinfulness, which is the very first spark of light within, has no place in us at all. It would be mere wasting of room and of patience, at every turn to be stating and impugning the inadequate interpretations of the Socinian Commentators and of their followers, Grotius, Semler, &c. It may be sufficient here just to notice Grotius's "non est in nobis studium veri," and Semler's "castior cognitio." Even Lücke has gone wrong here; "die Selbsttäuschung verübet auf Mangel an innerem Wahrheitsſinn und ist dieser Mangel selbst." ἑαυτοὺς = ἡμᾶς αὐτοῦς, see Winer): if we confess our sins (it is evident, from the whole sense of the passage, which has regard to our walking in light and in the truth, that no mere outward lip-confession is here meant, nor on the other hand any mere being aware within ourselves of sin (as Socinus: "confiteri significat interiorem ac profundam suorum peccatorum cognitionem"), but the union of the two, an external spoken confession springing from genuine inward contrition. As evident is it, that the confession here spoken of is not confined to confession to God, but embraces all our utterances on the subject, to one another as well as to Him; cf. James v. 16: and see more below), He (God, the Father; not, Christ, though this may at first sight seem probable from ver. 7 and ch. ii. 1; nor, the Father and Christ combined, as Lange and Sander hold. God is the chief subject through the whole passage: cf. ὁ θεός, ver. 5: μετ' αὐτοῦ, ver. 6: αὐτός, and τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, in ver. 7. It is ever God's truth (1 Cor. i. 9, 10, 13; 2 Cor. i. 18; 1 Thess. v. 24) and righteous (John xvii. 25; Rom. iii. 25; Rev. xvi. 5) that are concerned in, and vindicated by, our redemption) is faithful and just (His being faithful and just does not depend on our confessing our sins: He had both these attributes before, and will ever continue to have them: but by confessing our sins, we cast ourselves on, we approach and put to the proof for ourselves, and shall find operative in our case, in the ἀφῆ and καθάριση, &c., those His attributes of faithfulness and justice.

On the former of these adjectives, πιστός, almost all Commentators agree. It is, faithful to His plighted word and promise: see reff. and citations above. Ec. and Thl. alone have given a singular and not very clear interpretation: πιστὸν δὲ τὸν θεὸν ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀληθῆ εἶρηκε. πιστὸς γὰρ οὐ μόνον ἐπὶ τοῦ πεπιστευμένου, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ πιστωτικοῦ εἶρηται, ὅς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ ἀληθοῦς τρόπου ἔχει καὶ τὸ τοῖς ἄλλοις τούτου μεταδιδόναι. The latter, δίκαιος, has not been so unanimously interpreted. The idea of God's justice seeming strange here, where the remission of and purification from sin is in question, some Commentators have endeavoured to give δίκαιος the sense of good, merciful: so Grot., Rosenm.; or, which amounts to the same, fair, favourably disposed: so Semler, Lange, Carpzov Bretschl. Lex. But Lücke has shewn, that in none of the O. T. passages which are cited to substantiate these meanings, have they really place; but in all, righteousness, justice, is the fundamental idea, and the context only makes it mean, justice in this or in that direction. See note on Matt. i. 19. The meaning then being just, we have still to decide between several different views as to what particular phase of the divine justice is meant. Some, as Calov, Wolf, al., understand that God's justice has been satisfied in Christ, and thus the application of that satisfaction to us if we confess our sins, is an act of divine justice: is due to us in Christ. But this is plainly too much to be extracted from our verse. In Rom. iii. 26, where this is asserted, the reason is given, and all is fully explained: whereas here the ellipsis would be most harsh and unprecedented, and thus to fill it up would amount to an introduction into the context of an idea which is altogether foreign to it. (The notion that δικαιος = δικαιῶν need only be mentioned to refute itself: Rom. iii. 26 is decisive against it.) The correct view seems to be, that δικαιος as well as πιστός here is an attribute strictly to be kept to that which is predicated of it under the circumstances, without entering upon reasons external to the context. God is faithful, to His promise: is just, in His dealing: and both attributes operate in the forgiveness of sins to the penitent, now and hereafter; and in cleansing them from all unrighteousness. The laws of His spiritual kingdom require this: by those laws He acts in holy and infinite justice. His promises announced it, and to those promises he is faithful; but then those promises were themselves made only in accordance with his nature, who is holy, just, and true. In the background lie all the details of redemption, but they are not here in this verse: only the simple fact of God's justice is adduced) to forgive us our sins (ἕνα here is not = ἕστε: it is not "so as to forgive, &c.," but "that He may forgive, &c.," His doing so is in accordance with, and therefore as with Him all facts are purposed, is in pursuance of, furthers the object of, His faithfulness and justice. "So that He is faithful and just in order that He may, &c." See John iv. 34 note: reff. here: and Winer, § 44. 8 c. With regard to the particular here mentioned, ἕνα ἀφῆ ἡμῖν τὰς ἁμαρτίας is the continued remission of the guilt of each committed sin, which is the special promise and just act of God under the Gospel covenant: see Heb. x. 14, 18), and cleanse us from all unrighteousness (the explanation of the sense, see above. Here ἁδικίας is used, in reference to δικαιος above, as corresponding to ἁμαρτίας in ver. 7. The divine δικαιοσύνη is revealed in God's law: every transgression then of that law (ἁμαρτία, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁμαρτάνειν τοῦ σκοπῶν: cf. Theodorus Abukara in Suicer, s. v. ἁμαρτία) is of its nature and essence an ἁδικία, an unrighteousness, as contrary to that δικαιοσύνη. Observe, the two verbs are aorists, because the purpose of the faithfulness and justice of God is to do each as one great complex act—to justify and to sanctify wholly and entirely.

10.] Not a mere repetition, but a confirmation and intensification of ver. 8. Huther well remarks, that this verse is related to ver. 9 as ver. 8 to ver. 7). If we say that we have not sinned (if we deny, that is, the fact of our commission of sins in our Christian state. The perf., so far from removing the time to that before conversion, brings it down to the present: had it been ἡμαρτήσαμεν, it might have had that signification. ἡμαρτήκαμεν answers in time to ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἔχομεν: the one representing the state as existing, the other the sum of sinful acts which have gone to make it up), we make Him (God, see above) a liar (this is the climax, gradually reached through ψευδόμεθα ver. 6, and ἑαυτοὺς πλανῶμεν ver. 8. And it is justified, by the uniform assertion of God both in the O. T. and N. T. that all men are sinners, which we thus falsify as far as in us lies), and His word is not in us (cf. John v. 38. ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ may be interpreted generally,—“that which He saith.” “Deus dixit ‘peccasti:’ id negare nefandum est. Verbum nos vere accusat, et contradicendo arectur a corde.” Bengel. οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν ἡμῖν, as in John l. c., has no abiding place in, within, us: is something heard by the ear, and external to us, but not finding place among the thoughts and maxims of our heart and life. God declares that to be true which we assume to be untrue. It is evident that with (Ec., Grot., De Wette, to understand the O. T. by ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ is to miss the connexion, seeing that it is of the sins of Christians that St. John is treating, to whom ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ has become a far higher revelation of His will, viz. that given by Christ, and brought home to the heart by His indwelling Spirit. This final revelation of God includes the O. and N. T., and all other manifestations of His will to us: and it is this as a whole, which we reject and thrust from us, if we say at any time that we have not sinned, for its united testimony proclaims the contrary). CHAP. II. 1.] The connexion is thus given by Augustine: "Et ne forte impunitatem videretur dedisse peccatis (but see below) quia dixit: fidelis est et justus qui mundet nos ab omni iniquitate, et dicerent jam sibi homines: peccemus, securi faciamus quod volumus, purgat nos Christus:—tollit tibi malam securitatem et inserit utilem timorem. Male vis esse securus, sollicitus esto: fidelis enim est et justus ut dimittat nobis delicta nostra, et semper tibi displiceas, et muteris donec perficiaris. Ideo quid sequitur? Filioli, &c. Sed forte surrepfit de vita humana peccatum. Quid ergo fiet? Jam desperatio erit? Audi. Si quis, inquit, peccaverit, &c." See more below. So also Bede, Calvin, Luther, Calov. But there is more in the connexion than this. It is not corrective only of a possible mistake, but it is progressive—a further step taken in the direction of unfolding the great theme of this part of the Epistle, enounced in ch. i. 5. The first step for those walking in the light of God was, that they should confess their sins: the next and consequent one, that they should forsake them, and, agreeably to their new nature, keep His commandments. This verse introduces that further unfolding of our subject, which is continued, and especially pressed as regards the one great commandment of love, in our vv. 3—11.

1.] My little children (see ref.: the diminutive expresses tender affection: perhaps also is used in reference to his age and long standing as a father in Christ. Compare the beautiful legend in Eus. H. E. iii. 23, where St. John calls back the young man to him with the words τί με φεύγεις, τέκνον, τὸν σαντοῦ πατέρα;) these things I write unto you, that ye may sin not (at all) (this exclusive meaning is given by the aor. implying the absence not only of the habit, but of any single acts, of sin. ταῦτα γράφω, not as Bengel, that which follows; nor, as Grot., both the preceding and the following: but as most Commentators, the preceding only, viz. the concluding verses 8—10 of the former chapter, not in their details merely, but as Düsterd., "in seiner lebendigen Harmonie." The object of writing that passage was, to bring about in them the forsaking of sin. The very announcement there made, that if we confess our sins He in His faithfulness and righteousness will cleanse us from all sin, sufficiently substantiates what the Apostle here says, without, with Aug., al. (see above), bringing out too strongly the contemplation of a supposed misunderstanding on the part of the readers. To do this is to miss the deeper connexion in which these words stand to the great whole in its harmony, and to give instead only an apparent and superficial one. The reference of this exhortation to the unconverted among them, and rendering of ἵνα μὴ ἀμάρτητε, "ne maneatis in peccato," maintained by Socinus and his followers, need only be mentioned to be refuted. The aor. alone, ἀμάρτητε, may serve to shew its utter untenableness). And if any man have sinned (aor., have committed an act of sin: still speaking of those spots of sin which owing to the infirmity of the flesh remain even in those who are walking in the light. By this ἐάν τις ἀμ, there is not, as Beason objects to this interpretation, any doubt expressed that all do occasionally sin, but the hypothesis is made, as ever by this formula, purely and generally. The resumption of the first person immediately, makes it evident that the hypothesis is in fact realized in us all), we have an Advocate with (here the sense of πρὸς, as a prep. of reference, is more brought out than when it is joined with a merely essential verb, as in John i. 1, and our ch. i. 2) the Father, Jesus Christ (the principal word requiring elucidation here is παράκλητον. There are two classes of interpretations of it, which, as already remarked (on John xiv. 16), by no means exclude one another. Of these, that one which may be summed up under the meaning "COMFORTER," has already been treated, on John, i. c. With the other we have now to deal. ADVOCATE, advocatus, παράκλητος, 'causa patronus,' is the commoner sense of the word, answering as it does more closely to its etymology. It is found in Demosth. (p. 343. 10) and the orators: and occurs frequently in Philo in the same peculiar reference as here: e. g. in Flacc. 3, vol. ii. p. 519, where Macro is called the παράκλητος of Caius with Tiberius: de Jos. 40, p. 75: and most notably for our present place, de vita Mos. iii. 14, p. 155, ἀναγκαῖον γὰρ ἦν τὸν ἱερώμενον τῷ τοῦ κόσμου πατρὶ, παρακλήτω χρῆσθαι τελειοτάτῳ τὴν ἀρετὴν υἱῷ πρὸς τε ἀμνηστίαν ἁμαρτημάτων καὶ χορηγίαν ἀφθουατῶν ἀγαθῶν. In patristic literature, Düsterd. cites the Epistle of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne (Eus. H. E. v. 1), where a young Christian, named Vettius Epagathus, ἤξιον καὶ αὐτὸς ἀκουσθῆναι ἀπολογούμενος ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀδελφῶν, . . . ἀνελήφθη καὶ αὐτὸς εἰς τὸν κλῆρον τῶν μαρτύρων, παράκλητος χριστιανῶν χρηματίσας, ἔχων δὲ τὸν παράκλητον ἐν ἑαυτῷ: where Ruffinus's version, "habens in se advocatum pro nobis Jesum," is certainly not right; τὸν παράκλητον meaning the Holy Spirit. Cyril Alex. in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, p. 164 (Suicer), says, παράκλητος καὶ ἰλαστήριον ὁ υἱὸς ἀνόμισται καθίστησι γὰρ τοῖς ἐπὶ γῆς εὐμενῆ τὸν πατέρα, καὶ παντὶς ἡμῖν εὐρίσκειται πρόξενος ἀγαθοῦ. Augustine gives the sense thus, in words following those above cited: "Ille est ergo advocatus: da operam tu ne pecces: si de infirmitate vitæ subreperit peccatum, continuo vide, continuo displiceat, continuo damna; et cum damnaveris, securus ad iudicem venies. Ibi habes advocatum: noli timere ne perdas caussam confessionis tuæ. Si enim aliquando in hac vita committit se homo disertæ linguæ et non perit: committit te verbo, et periturnus es?" There is no discrepancy between this passage, where the Son is our παράκλητος, and John xiv. 16, where the Holy Spirit is called by the same name: rather is there the closest accordance, seeing that there our Lord says He will pray the Father and He will send us ἄλλον παράκλητον: Himself, the Son of God, being thus asserted to hold this office in the first place, and the Holy Spirit to be His Substitute in His absence. See on the definite idea of the detail of the advocacy of the Son of God, Huther's important note here) (being) righteous (the adj. δίκαιον, without the art., carries a ratiocinative force; "in that He is righteous," as a contrast to ἐάν τις ἁμαρτη. In a strict rendering, this force of the anarthrous adj. should be kept, and pointed out in exegesis: in an English version, it is hardly possible to render it otherwise than our translators have done, "the righteous," though it is not τὸν δίκαιον. The definite art. in English calls attention at once to the predicate, as does the omission of the definite art. in Greek: and thus the purpose of the writer is answered. And this is often the case: a vernacular version, in order to bring out in English the same idea which is expressed by the Greek, is constrained to adopt a phrase which is not in the Greek, and which sometimes looks as if the translators had made a blunder in grammar. It would be well if this were always carefully kept in mind by those who would revise our authorized version. No supposed by-sense of δίκαιος, bonus, lenis (Grot.), or = δικαιῶν (see Wolf), must (see above on ch. i. 9) be for a moment thought of. "The righteousness of Christ stands on our side: for God's righteousness is, in Jesus Christ, ours." Luther):—

2.] and He ("idemque ille," as Lücke. καί is merely the copula, not = quia, as Corn.-a-lap.; nor γάρ, as Syr. Gr. vol. i. § 378. So that ἰλασμός is not, as Grot., in his notes, = ἰλαστής, but is abstract, as ἁγιασμός applied to Christ 1 Cor. i. 30, ἁμαρτία 2 Cor. v. 21. Düsterdieck here has given a long and able exposition of the word and idea, in refutation of Socinus, and of Grotius's notes. Grot. himself, being suspected of Socinianism, wrote his "Defensio fidei catholicæ de satisfactione Christi adversus Faustum Socinum," in which, ch. vii.—x., he gives a full and satisfactory explanation "de placatione et reconciliatione, de redemptione, de expiatione nostra per Christi mortem facta." Socinus had maintained that ἰλάσκεισθαι does not mean "ex irato mitem reddere," but merely "declarare quod pertinet ad penas peccatorum, ejus animum cujus est eas sumero atque repetere, mitem atque peccatum: declarare, fore ut peccata meritas pœnas non luant." But against this Grot. shews that ἰλάσκεσθαι, as εἰρηνοποιεῖν and καταλλάσσειν, imports 'placare,' i. e. 'iram avertere;' and Christ has, as our ἰλασμός or ἰλαστήριον, i. e. as a sin-offering, reconciled God and us by nothing else but by His voluntary death as a sacrifice: has by this averted God's wrath from us. According to the constant usage of Scripture, God is in so far ἴλεως in regard to the sins of men, as He suffers His ἔλεος to prevail instead of His ὀργή. See LXX in 2 Chron. vi. 25, 27, Jer. xxxviii. (xxxi.) 34, xliii. (xxxvi.) 3, Num. xiv. 18 ff. And the Greek usage entirely agrees; see Hom. II. a. 147, ὄφρ' ἡμῖν ἐκάεργον ἰλάσσειαι, and Alberti's note on Hesych. s. v. ἰλάσκεσθαι. Hesych. gives the sense of ἰλάσκεσθαι, ἐξιλοῦσθαι, and of ἰλασμός, ἰμῆνεια, συγχώρησις, διλλαγή, πραότης) for (περὶ, as so often in similar connexions, cf. Heb. x. 6, 8, and reff., concerning, i. e. in behalf of; not so strong as ὑπέρ, which fixes the latter meaning, excluding the wider one) our sins: yet not for ours only, but also for the whole world (in the latter clause there is an ellipsis very common in ordinary speech in every language: "for the whole world" = "for the sins of the whole world." See besides reff., Rev. xiii. 11, 2 Pet. i. 1; and Winer, edn. 6, § 66. 2 f. "Quam late patet peccatum, tam late propitiatio," Bengel. But this has been misunderstood or evaded by many interpreters. Cyril and Ec. (alt.) explain ἡμετέρων to refer to the Jews, ολου τοῦ κόσμου to the Gentiles. And many others, taking the former in its true sense, yet limit the latter, not being able to take in the true doctrine of universal redemption. So Bede, "non pro illis solum propitiatio est Christus quibus tunc in carne viventibus scribebat Joannes, sed etiam pro omni Ecclesia quæ per totam mundi latitudinem diffusa est, (a) primo nimirum electo usque ad ultimum qui in fine mundi nasciturus est porrecta . . . Pro totius ergo mundi peccatis interpellat Dominus, quia per totum mundum est Ecclesia, quam suo sanguine comparavit." (This latter part is an evident reference to Augustine; but it is remarkable that on referring to Augustine we find "Ecce habes Ecclesiam per totum mundum;" but he ends, ". . . sed et totius mundi, quem suo sanguine comparavit.") Similarly Calvin: "neque enim aliud fuit consilium Johannis, quam toti Ecclesiæ commune facere hoc bonum. Ergo sub omnibus, reprobos non comprehendit: sed eos designat qui simul eredituri erant, et qui per varias mundi plagas dispersi erant." But this unworthy and evasive view is opposed by the whole mass of evangelical expositors. The reason of the insertion of the particular here, is well given by Luther: "It is a patent fact that thou too art a part of the whole world: so that thine heart cannot deceive itself and think, The Lord died for Peter and Paul, but not for me".

3—11.] This communion with God consists, secondly, in keeping His commandments, and especially the commandment to love one another. No new division of the Epistle begins, as in Sander: ver. 3 is closely joined to ch. i. 5, 6, which introduced the first conditional passage i. 7—ii. 2. The great test of communion with God, walking in the light, first requires that we confess our sins: next requires that we keep His commandments. So in the main Ec.: εἰρηκῶς ἄνω τοὺς εἰς τὸν κύριον πιστευκότας κοινωνίαν ἔχειν πρὸς αὐτόν, πιστωτικὰ τῆς κοινωνίας τῆς πρὸς αὐτὸν παρατίθεται. And in this (ἐν, of the conditional element: in this is placed, on this depends, our knowledge. In ch. iii. 24 (see below), the ἐν τούτῳ is resumed by ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος οὗ ἡμῖν ἔδωκεν) we know (pres.: from time to time, from day to day) that we have the knowledge of him (perf.: have acquired and retain that knowledge: and this ἐγνώκειναι is not, as some (Lange, Carpzov., Wahl) make it, the love of God, as neither of course is it mere theoretical knowledge: but is that inner and living acquaintance which springs out of unity of heart and affection), if ("St. John uses the formula ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν first as referring the demonstrative pronoun back to what has gone before, as e. g. in our ver. 5, and in ch. iii. 10. If however the demonstrative pronoun in this or a like formula looks onward, and the token itself, with the circumstance of which it is a token, follows, he expresses this token variously and significantly, according to the various shades of meaning to be conveyed. times the token implied in the demonstrative follows in a separate sentence, as in ch. iv. 2: sometimes the construction is slightly changed, and the sentence begun with ἐν τούτῳ is not regularly brought to a close, but continued in a new and correlative form: e.g. ch. iii. 24, where ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκ. is taken up by ἐκ τοῦ πν. And this way of expression is closely parallel to that where ὅτι completes the construction begun with ἐν τούτῳ. So ch. iii. 16, 19; iv. 9, 10, 13. In these cases, the full objective reality of the token as a fact, is set forth. It is an undoubted fact that He has given us of His Spirit, that He has sent His Son: and from these facts our inference is secure to the other facts in question, that He abideth in us, &c. But in other passages, we find instead of this ὅτι, an ἴνα, as ch. iv. 17 (but see note there: the case surely is not quite parallel, H. A.), or an ἐάν, as here, John xiii. 35, or ὅταν, ch. v. 2. This ἐάν, ὅταν, mark the token implied in ἐν τούτῳ as one not actually existent, an historical or objectively certain fact; but as a possible contingency, something hypothetically, and conditionally assumed: in other words as ideal." Düsterdieck, pp. 172 f. And so here: the token, that we have the knowledge of Him, is present, if, posito that) we keep (pres., as a habit, from time to time, ἐντολαί being necessarily prescriptions regarding circumstances as they arise) His commandments (first as to the expression. St. John never uses the word νόμος for the rule of Christian obedience: this word is reserved for the Mosaic law, John i. 17, 46, and in all, fifteen times in the Gospel: but almost always ἐντολαί,—sometimes λόγος θεοῦ or χριστοῦ, John viii. 51 f., xiv. 23 f., xvii. 6, our ver. 5. And as a verb he always uses τηρεῖν, very seldom ποιεῖν (only in the two controverted places, ch. v. 4, Rev. xxii. 14 v. r.: ch. i. 6, ii. 17 are not cases in point). τηρεῖν keeps its peculiar meaning of watching, guarding as some precious thing, "observing to keep." Next, whose commandments? The older expositors for the most part refer αὐτόν, αὐτοῦ, αὐτῷ, vv. 3—6, to Christ: so Aug., Episcop., Grot., Luther, Seb.-Schmidt, Calov., Wolf, Lange, Bengel, Sander, Neander. Socinus inclines to this view, but doubtfully; Erasmus understands αὐτός vv. 3, 4, of God, αὐτός and ἐκεῖνος vv. 5, 6, of Christ. Most modern Commentators understand αὐτόν, αὐτοῦ, αὐτῷ throughout of God, and ἐκεῖνος of Christ. So Lücke, Baumg.-Crus., De Wette, Huther, Brückner, and in old times Bede and Œc. That this latter is the right understanding of the terms, is supposed to be shewn by the substitution (?) in ver. 5 of τοῦ θεοῦ for αὐτοῦ, and its taking up again by ἐν αὐτῷ in ver. 6, followed by καθὼς ἐκεῖνος περιεπάτησεν. But of this I am by no means thoroughly persuaded: see note, ver. 6). 4.] Assertion, parallel with ch. i. 8, of the futility of pretending to the knowledge of God where this test is not fulfilled. The man saying (ὁ λέγων answers to ἐάν εἴπωμεν, ch. i. 8. ὅτι recitantis cannot be expressed in English), I have the knowledge of Him (see above) and not keeping His commandments, is a liar (answers to ἐαυτοὺς πλανῶμεν ch. i. 8), and in this man the truth is not (see above on ch. i. 8, where the words are the same: 5.] assertion of the other alternative, not merely as before, but, as usual, carried further and differently expressed: "oppositio cum accessione," as Grot.):—but whosoever keepeth His word (synonymous with τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ, considered as a whole: on the mode of expression, see above), of a truth in him is the love of God perfected (why should this transition be made from knowledge to love? "Amor præsupponit cognitionem," as Grot.: and is a further step in the same κοινωνία with God: not indeed that the former step is passed through and done with, but that true knowledge and love increase together, and the former is the measure of the latter, just as keeping God's commandments is the test and measure of true knowledge of Him. And thus in the final and perfect ideal, the two are coincident: the perfect observation of His commandments is the perfection of love to Him. It is manifest, from what has been said, that ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ must be our love towards God, not His love towards us: τοῦ θεοῦ a gen. objective, not subjective. Some Commentators have held the other meaning: partly because τετελείωται seemed better to be interpreted thus, and partly from doctrinal motives, as in the case of Flacius and Calovius, to keep out the Romish folly of supererogation. But the explanation, though the words themselves admit it (see ch. iv. 9), is manifestly alien from the context. And of any foolish dreams of perfection or super-perfection there is no fear, if we understand the passage as intended by the Apostle, as setting forth the true ideal and perfection of knowledge and love to God, as measured by the perfect keeping of His word: which though none of us can fully reach, every true Christian has before him as his aim and final object. So that there is no need again to depart from the meaning of τετελείωται, as has been done by Beza (“itaque τελειοῦν hoc in loco non declarat perfecte aliquid præstare, sed mendacio et simulationi, inani denique speciei opponitur: ut hoc plane sit quod dicimus in vulgato sermone, mettre en exécution”). In this (in the fact of our progress towards this ideal state of perfection of obedience and therefore of love:—thus assured that the germ of the state is in us and unfolding) we know that we are in Him (this completes the logical period which began in ver. 3, by reasserting that verse, carrying however that assertion yet deeper, by substituting ἐν αὐτῷ ἐσμὲν for ἐγνώκαμεν αὐτόν. This “being in Him” is in fact the Christian life in its central depth of κοινωνία with God and with one another: the spiritual truth corresponding to the physical one enunciated by St. Paul, Acts xvii. 28, ἐν αὐτῷ ζῶμεν καὶ κινούμεθα καὶ ἐσμὲν).

6.] The state of being in Him is carried forward a step further by the expression “abide in Him:” (“Synonyma cum gradatione: Illum nosse: in Illo esse: in Illo manere: cognitio: communio: constantia.” Bengel:) and the way is prepared, by what follows, for the coming exhortation vv. 7—11, to walk in love. The man saying that He abideth in Him (God, as above) ought (see reff. Huther well remarks, that the obligation is grounded on the λέγειν, the profession, being one of consistency with it; not on the μένειν, which would imply that which follows, as matter of necessity), even as He (Christ: by ἐκεῖνος (see above) a third person is introduced: not necessarily, see 2 Tim. ii. 26 and note, but apparently by the requirements of this passage, αὐτός having come down all the way from ch. i. 5 as referred to God. I say apparently: because I do not regard it as by any means a settled matter that this αὐτός does not throughout apply to Christ, and then this ἐκεῖνος will merely refer to a different phase of predication respecting the same person as the ἐν αὐτῷ designates, as in the examples produced in the note as above) walked (during His life upon earth: see below), himself also thus to walk (not any one particular of Christ’s walk upon earth is here pointed at, but the whole of his life of holiness and purity and love. This latter, as including all the rest, is most in the Apostle’s mind. So in Eph. v. 1, 2, where St. Paul exhorts us to be followers of God, he adds, καὶ περιπατεῖτε ἐν ἀγάπῃ, καθὼς καὶ ὁ χριστὸς ἠγάπησεν ὑμᾶς. Luther simply but appositely remarks, that it is not Christ’s walking on the sea, but His ordinary walk, that we are called on here to imitate).

7—11.] The commandment of Love. The context see below. Beloved, I write not to you a new commandment, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning: the old commandment is the word which ye heard (on the right understanding of this verse, very much depends. The great question is, To what commandment does ἐντολή refer? Does it point forward to the commandment of brotherly love, in ver. 9, or back to that of walking as Christ walked, in ver. 6? One or other of these views has generally been taken decidedly, and exclusively of the other. The former view has been upheld by Aug., Bede, Ec., Thl., Luther, Calv., Grot., Wolf, Bengel, Knapp, Baumg.-Crus., De Wette, Neander, Sander, Düsterdieck, al.; the latter by Beza, Socinus, Seb.-Schmidt, Piscator, Episcopius, Flacius, Calov., Lücke, Fritzsche, Jackmann, al. Of these, some on both sides may fairly be dismissed, as maintaining preposterous meanings for some of the terms used. Thus Flacius, Seb.-Schmidt, Calov., understand ἐντολή to be, not a commandment, which from usage and from ver. 3 and ch. iii. 23, v. 3, it must be, but the whole “doctrina de Christo ejusque benefeiciis,” including the forgiveness of sins, vv. 1, 2, 12. Then thus taking it, the epithets “old” and “new” become the O. T. prophecies of Christ, and their N. T. fulfilment. Thus on the other side some, e.g. Aug., Bede, Beza, Luther (2), Seb.-Schmidt, Wolf, al., understand “new” and “old” not of time, but in a tropical meaning, with reference to the old Jewish or heathen darkness and the new light of Christ: a view which cannot possibly be maintained in the face of so plain a token of time as is furnished by ἀπ' ἀρχῆς and by the aor. εἶχετε and ἡκούσατε. These being so far set aside, the above classes of interpreters are again divided as to their understanding of the epithets “old” and “new.” Those who understand the ἐντολή vv. 7, 8, of the command of love, mostly explain the oldness and newness of the difference between O. and N. T. revelation (so the Greeks, Grot., and Wolf), and some go on to understand the ἀπ' ἀρχῆς of the original obscure and imperfect command to love one another in the O. T. which failed in the crowning particular of love towards enemies. Of these, the Greeks, holding not Jewish Christians alone, but Gentile also to be addressed, interpret παλαιὰ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς and ἡκούσατε of the testimony of conscience to the law of love among the Gentiles: so Ec. and the Scholl. speak of ἡ κατὰ τὰς φυσικὰς ἐννοίας φιλικῆ διαθέσις. Wolf tries to distinguish the ver. by referring εἶχετε to the Jews, ἡκούσατε to the Gentiles. On the other hand, those who refer ἐντολή in vv. 7, 8, to ver. 6, mostly understand the “old” and “new” of the different aspects in which the following the example of Christ would be regarded, within the limits of the N. T. period, since the readers had begun their Christian lives: so Socinus, Jackmann, Piscator, Episcopius, Lücke. The last-named reference of ἀπ' ἀρχῆς to the beginning of the Christian life of the readers, and the corresponding explanation of the “oldness” of the commandment, is combined by De Wette and Neander only with their view of ἐντολή as the law of love. Düsterdieck, from whom the above particulars are mainly taken, finds fault with the exclusive reference maintained for the most part by the interpreters on both sides, and believes that a via media may be found more agreeable to the ethical habits of thought of the Apostle, and to the context of the passage. This context requires, 1) that we maintain a logical connexion between ver. 6 and ver. 7, as indicated by δφείλει and ἐντολή: 2) that we maintain the like logical connexion between ver. 8 and ver. 9, as indicated by the figure common to them both, of the darkness and the light. Now, of these, 1) is neglected by those who understand the ἐντολή barely as the law of love; 2) is neglected by those who understand it barely of following Christ's example. The former make ver. 7 spring out of no contextual development: the latter treat similarly ver. 9. And the true view is to be found as thus indicated: the walk of Christ, which is our example, is essentially and completely summed up in one word, Love: and so the command, to walk as he walked, essentially and completely resolves itself into the law of brotherly love: for this last, taken in all its depth, includes not one special detail in a holy Christian life, but the whole of that life itself. Taking then this view, how are we to interpret in detail? What is καινήν? what is παλαιάν? what is ἀπ' ἀρχῆς? For these clearly all hang together. If ἀπ' ἀρχῆς is to signify ‘from the beginning of O. T. revelation,’ or ‘from the beginning of God's testimony in man's conscience,’ we seem to be doing violence to the simple mode of address which is prevalent in our Apostle's style. The εἶχετε and ἡκούσατε, especially the latter, will hardly bear interpreting of the remote forefathers of the readers, as on this hypothesis they must, but require to be confined to the readers themselves, especially as they are aorists and not perfects. And if so, the meaning of ἀπ' ἀρχῆς is fixed to be, from the beginning of the Christian lives, from the time when τὸν λόγον ἤκουσαν. Then as to καινήν, and παλαιάν, the explanation will be simple enough. The command to love one another cannot be said to be new, for it forms a part of the λόγος ὃν ἠκούσατε, nay, is the very sum and centre of that λόγος: but again, it may be said to be new, inasmuch as it ever assumes new freshness as the Christian life unfolds, as the old darkness is more and more cleared away and the true light shineth: in that light we see light; in the light of Him who maketh all things new.

That the ἐντολή as such refers to the law of love, thus indeed connected with Christ's example here, but still to the law of love and no other, is plain from the whole usage of the Apostle; compare especially 2 John 4—6, where the very same train of thought occurs as here, the περιπατεῖν ἐν ἀληθείᾳ being = περιπατεῖν ἐν φωτί here, being followed up by καθὼς ἐντολήν ἐλάβομεν παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς, and that ἐντολή being characterized, as here,—οὐχ ὡς ἐντολήν γράφων σοι καινήν, ἀλλὰ ἣν ἔχουμεν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, and finally being stated to be ἡ ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους. Indeed the whole process of that passage from this point is most instructive as to our present one: καὶ αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ ἀγάπη, ἵνα περιπατῶμεν κατὰ τὰς ἐντολάς αὐτοῦ. αὕτη ἡ ἐντολή ἐστίν, καθὼς ἠκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἵνα ἐν αὐτῇ περιπατήτε: where the same complex of the whole Christian walk is included in the one idea of love, and ἀγάπη identified with walking according to His commandments. Again in ch. iii. 11, the same formula is used in speaking of the law of love—αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ ἀγγελία ἣν ἠκούσατε ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους: cf. also ch. iv. 21, v. 3, iii. 22—24: again ch. iii. 14, v. 16, John xiii. 35; ch. v. 1, 2, John xv. 10.

To recapitulate: on the interpretation here adopted, which is also that of Düsterdieck and Huther, the ἐντολή is the command to walk as Christ walked, passing as the passage advances into the law of love. This ἐντολή is no καινή, but παλαιά, seeing that they had it ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning of their faith, and it was in fact the sum of the λόγος which they

ἤκουσαν). 8.] Again (this πάλιν is what is called ἐπανορθωτικόν; takes up and contravenes what has been as yet said: q. d., “in another view of the subject, . . . :” “et contrarietatem declarat et iterationem, hic autem non repetitionis sed contrarietatis est declaratio,” as Erasmus. It refers to the whole sentence, not merely to γράφω. The emphasis is on καινήν) a new commandment write I unto you (“new,” in three possible ways of interpretation: 1) “novum dicit quod Deus quotidie suggerendo veluti renovat: . . . Joannes negat ejusmodi esse doctrinam de fratribus diligendis, quæ tempore obsolescat: sed perpetuo vigere,” Calv.: or 2) “illam præceptionem quam vobis dudum cognitam esse dixi, sic vobis denuo commendo atque injungo, tanquam si nova esset, nec vobis antehac unquam cognita,” Knapp, and so Neander; or 3) in that it was first promulgated with Christianity and unknown before. The two first are condemned by the fact, that the word in each case on which the stress of the interpretation rests, is not expressed in the text: there is for 1) no αἶψ, for 2) no οὖν. The third agrees well both with the context and with St. John's habit of thought, as well as with matter of fact, and our Lord's own words, John xiii. 34, xv. 12. When Lücke objects to it that thus we have to take παλαιάν and καινήν in two different senses, he hits in fact the very point in which this interpretation approves itself the most to those who are familiar with the oxymoron of St. John's style. As Düsterd. replies, “when I stand at the point of time indicated by ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, and look forwards on the Christian life of the readers, the ἐντολή appears as one long known; the readers have known it from the beginning as an essential commandment, they have had it as long as they have been Christians: on the other hand, if I look backward on the life of the readers before that ἀρχή, whether they were before that Jews or Gentiles, this same commandment of necessity appears as a new one, essentially Christian, first beginning for the readers with that beginning; for even for the Jewish Christians the command of brotherly love is a new one, seeing that it is ordained in imitation of Christ, John xiii. 34”), which (thing, viz the fact that the commandment is a new one: see below) is true in Him and in you: because the darkness is passing away, and the true light is now shining (i. e. the commandment is a new one, and this is true both in (the case of) Him (Christ) and in (the case of) you: because (ἐν ὑμῖν) the darkness is passing away, and (ἐν αὐτῷ) the true light is shining: therefore on both accounts the command is a new one: new as regards you, because you are newly come from darkness into light: new as regards Him, because He uttered it when He came into the world to lighten every man, and began that shining which even now continues. This reference of the two clauses I hold fast against Düsterdieck, who maintains that the ὅ refers to the content of the ἐντολή, viz. walking in brotherly love: that the commandment finds its fulfilment (ἀληθές ἐστιν;) in the walk of Christians in union with Christ. But to this there are several objections which he has not noticed: 1) the probable logic of the sentence. The Apostle has made what is apparently a paradoxical assertion. He has stated that the commandment is not new but old, and then has, notwithstanding, asserted its newness. Then he proceeds ὅ ἐστιν ἀληθές . . . ὅτι κ.τ.λ. Is it not probable that this form of sentence introduces the explanation of the paradox? Is it probable, as would be the case on the other view, that so startling a proposition (after ver. 7) as πάλιν ἐντολήν καινὴν γράφω ὑμῖν, would remain altogether unexplained? 2) the word ἀληθές. Düsterd. says, "The Apostle calls that which is enjoined in the ἐντολή, ἀληθές, because it finds its truth in its living activity, in its practical reality: it is in deed and truth (ἀληθῶς, ver. 5, John iv. 42, (vi. 55)) living and present, and so far true, real." But even granting this sense of ἀληθής to be possible (which may be doubted: ἀληθῶς is clearly no case in point, its adverbial character removing it into another phase of predication), is it likely that so unusual and harsh a word would be chosen as the adj. ἀληθές (rather than the adv. ἀληθῶς) when the obvious sense of ἀληθές would so naturally refer it, in the reader's mind, to the καινότης just asserted? 3) Düsterd. has entirely neglected the repetition of the prep. ἐν, which fact separates off ἐν αὐτῷ and ἐν ὑμῖν as two distinct departments, and prevents their being considered in union. "Him," Christ, the Head, and "you," the readers, as the members, which depend on the Head as the grapes on the true vine, the Apostle regards as united in the real community of life (ch. i. 3 f.), &c. But this would require ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ ὑμῖν: and accordingly a little below he says, "Ihm und Euch) ist es wahr, was Johannes fördert." 4) The strict present παράγεται is disregarded by D.'s explanation. He upholds indeed a present sense, as against the "transierunt tenebræ" of the vulgate ("the darkness is past," E. V.), but makes no further remark, not seeing apparently how peculiarly this present fits the application of the sentence to accounting for the newness of the commandment—"You are living in a time when the darkness is rolling away, even now passing:" so that the command, which is of the Light, is well said to be "new."

As in almost every verse of this difficult portion of the Epistle, the divergencies of interpretation are almost endless. Some few only of them can be mentioned here. That recently defended (as above) by Düsterdieck, was before taken by Œc., Luther, Grot., Knapp, Baumg.-Crus., Semler, &c.: that which I have maintained, by Calvin, Socinus, Flacius, Calov., Morus, Horneius, De Wette, Lücke, Neander, Huther. Some take the ὅτι as declarative: "it is true, that the darkness," &c.: so Castello, Socinus, Bengel, "ὅτι, quod: hoc est illud præceptum, amor fratris, ex luce." Erasm., Episcopus, Grot., separate the words ὅ ἐστιν ἀληθές ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν into subject and predicate: "quod verum est in illo (Christo), id etiam in vobis verum est," or "esse debet." The whole discussion, carried into most minute detail, may be seen in Düsterdieck's note. To mention two matters of verbal nicety: 1) παράγεται need not be pressed, with Bengel, to its passive meaning: "non dicit παράγει, transit, sed -εται, traducitur, commutatur, ut tandem absorbeat. Idem verbum, ver. 17, ubi opponitur mansioni." But the passive is not necessary for this sense: nay, in ver. 17 it is hardly admissible, and there can be no doubt that the middle was intended, in the same sense as the intr. act., 1 Cor. vii. 31: 2) ἤδη φαίνει, joined with the present παράγεται, is best taken to mean, not the full and entire shining of the true light, but its beginning to shine: its full light at the coming of the Lord, is indeed close at hand, ver. 18, and to that the ἤδη φαίνει looks on.

9, 10.] We now come to the enunciation of the law of brotherly love, and in a form resembling that used in ch. i. 8, 10: and in vv. 4 f. First is asserted the incompatibility of living in hatred and walking in the light: then the identity of walking in love and walking in the light: then lastly as a contrast to the last (ὁ ἀγαπῶν . . . ὁ δὲ μισῶν), the same fact with regard to hatred and the darkness, and the blinding effect on him who walks in it. The φῶς is as before, the light of Christ, now partially shining, but one day to be fully revealed: the σκοτία is the darkness of this present world, now passing away). He that saith that he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness until now (Düsterd. has very properly protested against the softening down of μισεῖν into “minus diligere, posthabere, non colere,” &c. “Nothing,” he says, “can be more shallow and weak as compared with the ethics of the whole Scripture. All the truth, depth, and power of Christian ethics rests on the ‘aut . . . aut,’ so distinctly insisted on by St. John. On the one side is God, on the other the world: here is life, there is death (ch. iii. 14): here, love; there, hate, i. e. murder (ch. iii. 14 ff.), there is no medium. In the space between, is nothing. Life may as yet be merely elementary and fragmentary. Love may be as yet weak and poor, but still, life in God and its necessary demonstration in love is present really and truly, and the word of our Lord is true, ‘He that is not against me is with me,’ Luke ix. 50: and on the other side, the life according to the flesh, the attachment to the world, and the necessary action of this selfishness by means of hatred, may be much hidden, may be craftily covered and with splendid outer surface; but in the secret depth of the man, there where spring the real fountains of his moral life, is not God but the world; the man is yet in death, and can consequently love nothing but himself and must hate his brother: and then that other word of the Lord is true, ‘He that is not for me is against me,’ Luke xi. 23. For a man can only be either for or against Christ, and consequently can only have either love or hate towards his brother.” Bengel says well, on ver. 11, “oppositio immediata: ubi non est amor, odium est: cor enim non est vacuum.” It has been questioned, who is meant by τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ. It seems plain that the expression here is not = τὸν πλησίον αὐτοῦ, seeing that St. John is writing to Christians, and treating of their κοινωνία μετ’ ἀλλήλων. On the other hand, if we are to restrict the meaning, as is done by most modern Commentators, to Christian brotherhood, it is plain that we cannot understand strictly τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ in vv. 9, 11, seeing that the man there spoken of is in reality not a Christian at all. So that either we must enlarge the sense of ἀδελφός, or suppose some impropriety of language in the use of the term in these verses, q. d. him who ought to be loved by him as a Christian brother, supposing himself to be really a Christian. This difficulty does not seem to have struck any of the Commentators: but it is one which certainly will not allow us to confine the term to its utmost strictness of meaning. ἕως ἄρτι, up to this moment: notwithstanding any apparent change which may have taken place in him when he passed into the ranks of nominal Christians). 10.] He that loveth his brother abideth in the light (i. e. the continuance of the habit of brotherly love is a measure of and a guarantee for his continuance in that light whose great command is Love), and there is no occasion of stumbling in him (so E. V., excellently. For it is clear by the parallel in ver. 11, that this is what is meant, and not that he gives no occasion of stumbling to others, as Calov., al., “Qui fratrem odit, ipse sibi offendiculum est, et incurrit in seipsum et in omnia intus et foris; qui amat, expeditum iter habet.” Bengel. Cf. also John xi. 9, 10, which is in more than one respect the key-text here. For it also explains the apparently difficult ἐν αὐτῷ, occurring as it does there in ver. 10, ἐὰν δέ τις περιπατῇ ἐν τῇ νυκτί, πρόσκοπται, ὅτι τὸ φῶς οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν αὐτῷ. The light, and the darkness, by which we walk safely, or stumble, are within ourselves; admitted into us by the eye, whose singleness fills the whole body with light).

his brother (see above) is in the darkness (has never come out of it: corresponds to ἐν τῷ φωτὶ μένει above: denotes his state, whereas περιπατεῖ indicates more his outward acts), and walketh in the darkness, and knoweth not where (see reff. ποῦ with a verb of motion obviously includes that motion: but it includes also the spot on which the motion is taking place: e. g., here, not only the destination to which, but also the way by which, he is going. In some places, this cannot be pressed, as in John viii. 14, where πόθεν ἦλθον and ποῦ (ποῖ) ὑπάγω are opposed to one another) he goeth, because the darkness blinded (it is a matter of old standing: "blinded," and not "hath blinded," because it is no new effect of a state into which he has lately come, but the long past work of a state which is supposed to be gone by, and is not) his eyes.

12-14.] Threefold address to the readers, accompanied by a threefold reason for writing to them; all repeated by way of parallelism, with some variations and enlargements. On the connexion and explanation of these verses, it may be observed, 1) that we have three classes of readers, denoted the first time by τεκνία, πατέρες, νεανίσκοι, and the second time by παῖδια, πατέρες, νεανίσκοι. 2) that all three are addressed the first time in the present ἡ γράφα, the second time in the aorist ἡ γράψα. 3) that while to the πατέρες and νεανίσκοι the same words are each time used (to the latter with an addition the second time), the τεκνία and παῖδια are differently addressed. The first question arising is, what do these three classes import, and how are they to be distributed among the readers? It is obvious that the chief difficulty here is with τεκνία and παῖδια. The former word is used by our Apostle once with μου, ver. 1, and six times without μου; ver. 28, ch. iii. 7, 18, iv. 4, v. 21; but always as importing the whole of his readers; and once it is reported by him as used by our Lord, also in a general address to all His disciples, John xiii. 33. παῖδια is used by him similarly in our ver. 18, and reported by him as used by our Lord in a general address, John xxi. 5. These facts make it very probable that both the words are here used as general designations of all the readers, and not as a designation of any particular class among them. And this is made more probable, by the fact that if τεκνία and παῖδια did point out the children among them, properly or spiritually so called, the rank of classes would be different from that which would occur to any writer, viz. neither according to ascending age nor to descending, but children, fathers, young men. We seem then to have made it highly probable that τεκνία and παῖδια address all the readers alike. Now if we lay any stress on the third circumstance above mentioned, that τεκνία and παῖδια are differently addressed, and not so πατέρες and νεανίσκοι, and endeavour therefrom to deduce any distinction between τεκνία and παῖδια in the age or qualities expressed by them, I conceive that we shall establish nothing satisfactory. If a reason for this variation of address is to be discovered, it must be sought in the parallelism of the passage. With these preliminary remarks, we come to the details. I write to you, little children (see above), because (Socinus, Seb.-Schmidt, Schött., Bengel, Paulus, Sander, Neander, render ὅτι "that." But the meaning seems determined for us by ver. 21, where it is quite impossible thus to render it: although even there Bengel tries to be consistent. It is manifest that we must keep the same rendering throughout. The particle then gives the reasons why he writes (what, see below on the first ἡ γράψα) to each class among them) your sins have been (perf.: see note on Matt. ix. 2) forgiven you for the sake of His (Christ's) name (Ἰησοῦς χριστός, the Saviour, the anointed one, bringing to mind all the work wrought out by Him for us, and all the acceptance of that work by the Father: so that it may be well said that on account of, for the sake of, that Name which the Father hath given Him, which is above every name, our sins are forgiven).

χῆς, ch. i. 1) from the beginning (i. e. in St. John's usage of speech, Christ; see ch. i. 1 and notes). I write to you, young men, because ye have conquered the wicked one (the proper attribute of youth is, to carry on the active parts of life: if soldiers, to be engaged in all active service: that of age, to contemplate, and arrive at sound and matured knowledge. The latter have conquered as well, but the burden and heat of their struggle is past: "viribus fortibus et robustis tribuitur supra fortissimum et robustissimum victoria." Carpov. The πονηρὸς is he in whom, in whose power, the whole world lieth, ch. v. 19, John xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11: the διάβολος, who deceives from the beginning, John viii. 44, ch. iii. 8, 10, 12: whose works Christ came into the world to destroy, ch. iii. 8. He is conquered once and for all, by those who have passed from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, to communion with the Father and the Son, ch. v. 18. Whatever conflict remains for them afterwards, is with a baffled and conquered enemy: is a τηρεῖν αὐτοὺς (ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ), ch. v. 18, which τηρεῖν (see note there), owing to their whole life being led in communion with the Father and Son, is a τηρεῖσθαι, John xvii. 15). He now repeats (see above) the three classes, but with some variations and additions in his reasons for writing to each, and with the aor. ἔγραψα instead of the present γράφω. In seeking a reason for this change of tense, we have a choice between several views of Commentators. These are rather complicated by the fact that many of them read γράφω in the fourth place, against almost all authority. Of those, some, as Calvin, have been fairly baffled by the two aorists following the four presents, and have imagined ver. 14 to be interpolated: "Quaquam fieri potest ut Joannes ipse sententiam de adolescentibus augendi causa secunde insererit (illic enim addit fortes esse, quod non prius dixerat), librarii autem temere numerum implere voluerint." Of the rest, some (Storr, Lange, Baumg.-Crus., Schött.) think that the allusion is to St. John's Gospel: others, as Michaelis, to a former epistle; by far the greater part however agree rightly that this Epistle must be meant by both: see Gal. vi. 11, Philem. 19, 21; our vv. 21, 26; ch. v. 13. Still, there is a wide difference in giving each tense a distinct reference. Bengel holds them to import much the same: "a scribo transit ad scripsi: non temere: selicet verbo scribendi ex praesenti in praeteritum transposito immisit commotionem firmissimam:" and so Sander, and in the main Neander: "as John has said 'I write to you,' so now he takes up again and sums up that which he has written, saying, 'I have written to you?' q. d., it stands fast: I have nothing more to say: this you must regard as my permanent testimony." And Paulus, comparing the formula "we decree and have decreed." But as Huther remarks, this view presupposes the false rendering of ὅτι by "that." Lücke, after Rickli, with much ingenuity tries to fix ἔγραψα on the preceding portion of the Epistle, keeping γράφω for the following. And in so doing, he fancies he sees a correspondence, in what has preceded and in what follows, with these addresses to different classes of hearers: e. g., in ch. i. 5—7, and ii. 15—17, with ἀφένται αἱ ἄμ.: in i. 8—ii. 2, and ii. 18—27, with ὅτι ἐγνώκατε . . . : in ii. 3—11, and ii. 28—iii. 22, with ὅτι νενικήκατε . . . But no such correspondence really subsists: and Lücke himself subsequently gave up this view:—see note in Bertheau's edn. of Lücke, p. 265. De Wette and Brückner, with whom Huther agrees, believe γράφω to refer to the immediate act of writing, going on at the moment: ἔγραψα, to what has preceded this point: so that the former refers more to the whole Epistle, the latter to the contents of what has gone before. Dusterdieck disapproves this, and, following Beza, refers both γράφω and ἔγραψα to the whole Epistle: the former to the Apostle's immediate act of writing, the latter to the readers' act of reading when complete. In deciding between these two last views, we must bear in mind the epistolary use of the aor. ἔγραψα, according to which it refers, never, that I am aware, when thus used absolutely, to a previous portion of the Epistle, but always to the whole: which circumstance would seem to rule the meaning here, and to determine for Beza and Düs-terdieck. And no objection lies against their view, as Huther urges, from the change of persons to be supplied (see above): the supply may just as well be thus made, understanding the reference both times to be to the Apostle himself: "I write (γράφω), now that I am writing:" "I wrote (ἔγραψα), when I wrote." I wrote to you, children (by παιδία all the readers are meant: see above), because ye know the Father (the very word παιδία reminds of πατήρ: and the relation is close, between this and that which is said before, that their sins are forgiven for Christ's name's sake. They are received thus by adoption into God's family, and He is become their reconciled Father, as He is the Father of Him through whom they have received their adoption: and one of the first evidences of dawning intelligence in a child is the recognition of its father. But this knowledge of the Father does not precede, nay, it presupposes, communion with the Son: for none knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him, Matt. xi. 27). I wrote to you, fathers, because ye know Him that was from the beginning (verbatim as before: to shew perhaps in strong light the great truth of John xvii. 3, that the whole sum of Christian ripeness and experience is, this knowledge of σὲ τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν, καὶ ὃν ἀπέστειλας Ἰησοῦν χριστόν. Bengel gives another reason: "Hoc comma ex versu præcedente, non additis pluribus verbis, repetit propositioni tractationem æque brevem subjungens, et modestia ad patres utens, quibus non opus erat multa scribi"). I wrote to you, young men, because ye are strong (Ovid, Met. xv. 208, "Transit in ætatem post ver robustior annus, Fitque valens juvenis, neque enim robustior ætas Ulla." Wetst. ἰσχυρός, strong in fight: so in ref. Heb., Luke xi. 21 ||), and the word of God abideth in you (i. e. the whole announcement of the good news of the gospel in Christ has found entrance into your hearts and an abiding place there, and there dwells and works. The copulæ may be supplied as Grot., "Illud prius καὶ valet hic quia, alterum καὶ positum est pro ὁ ἰδ. . . . Fortes jam estis, non vestris viribus, verum ideo quod verbum illud Dei, profectum a Christo,

15—17.] Dehortation from the love of the world. The preceding designation of the different classes has been, as so frequently in St. John, their ideal designation, in the perfection of their several states of Christian life: and now, as so often, he brings that ideal state to bear on real temptations and duties. The love of the Father, the abiding in Him by His word abiding in them, the victory over him in whom ὅλος ὁ κόσμος κείται,— these particulars have been enounced: and though there may be a more apparent reason why the young should have this dehortation addressed to them, and more apparent allusion to the νευικήκατε τὸν πονηρόν in the bringing out of the κόσμος, yet there can be no doubt that it is to all that this address is made. All are in the world, and as long as they are, are in danger of being betrayed by the senses to cleave to the things present and seen, to the forgetfulness of those which are absent and unseen. This general reference is shewn by the εἰς τὸν which follows. Love not the world (what is ὁ κόσμος, in the diction of St. John? And what does he import by ἀγαπᾶν τὸν κόσμον? When we read John iii. 16, οὕτως ἠγάπησεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν κόσμον, ὥστε τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τὸν μονογενῆ ἔδωκεν, κ.τ.λ., are we to understand the same thing by the words as here? and if not, are both κόσμος and ἀγαπᾶν taken in a different sense, or if one only, which? Beza replies, "Mundum considerat quatenus cum Dei voluntate non consentit, et enim amorem damnat qui nos a Deo abducit: alioquin dicitur Deus ipse suum mundum infinito quodam amore dilexisse, id est, eos quos ex mundo elegit." The palpable error of this last "id est," directs us to the right solution of both questions. The κόσμος in both cases is the same, the ἀγαπᾶν is different. In John iii. 16 it is the love of divine compassion and creative and redeeming mercy: here, it is the love of selfish desire, cherishing avarice or pride. But then recurs our question, What is ὁ κόσμος? And it is no easy one to

answer. If we reply so as to make it personal, we are met at once by the difficulty of τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ: from which we cannot escape by saying that these are as below ἡ ἐπιθυμία κ.τ.λ., for none can be said ἀγαπᾶν τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν, but the ἐπιθυμία is the ἀγάπη. Hence some have been led to take these three, ἡ ἐπιθ. τῆς σαρκός, ἡ ἐπιθ. τῶν ὀφθ., ἡ ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου, as put for the things desired, and the material of the ἀλαζονεία. So Calvin, Episcopius, Bengel: but this manifestly will not hold, owing to the opposition in ver. 17 between ὁ κόσμος κ. ἡ ἐπιθυμία αὐτοῦ on the one hand, and ὁ ποιῶν τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ on the other, which evidently requires that its first member should be personal as well as its second. And this last will be a weighty reason also against 2) taking ὁ κόσμος as merely material, the present order of things, in so far as it is alien from God. We are thus brought to a point, for our understanding of ὁ κόσμος, intermediate between personal and material. But then our question is, which of the two is to take the first place? Is ὁ κόσμος the world of matter, including the men who dwell in it, or is it the world of man, including matter as subordinate to man? If the former, we seem in danger of falling into a dualism, in which God and the world of matter should be set over against one another as independent existences: for thus the evil one, the ἀρχῶν τοῦ κόσμου, and his agents the κοσμοκράτορες, would themselves be included in the κόσμος, and adjuncts to the world of matter: a mode of thought which no where appears in the apostolic writings. We are thus narrowed to our other alternative, that of understanding ὁ κόσμος as of human persons, including the inferior ranks of created being, and the mass of inanimate matter which they inhabit. Let us see whether this view will meet the necessities of our text and of similar passages. Thus understood, the κόσμος was constituted at first in Adam, well-pleasing to God and obedient to Him: it was man's world, and in man it is summed up: and in man it fell from God's light into the darkness of selfish pursuits and ἐπιθυμίας κοσμικαί, in and by which man, who should be rising through his cosmic corporeal nature to God, has become materialized in spirit and dragged down so as to be worldly and sensual and like him who has led him astray, and who now, having thus subjected man's nature by temptation, has become the ἀρχῶν τοῦ κόσμου. And thus the κόσμος is "man and man's world," in his and its fall from God. It was this world which God loved, in its enmity to Him, with the holy love of Redemption: it is this world which we are not to love, in its alienation from Him, with the selfish love of participation. And this κόσμος is spoken of sometimes as personal, sometimes as material, according to the context in which it occurs. To give but a few decisive examples; of the purely personal sense, John xv. 18, εἰ ὁ κόσμος ὑμᾶς μισεῖ κ.τ.λ., followed by εἰ ἐμὲ ἐδίωξαν, καὶ ὑμᾶς διώξουσιν, where the singular is broken up into the individual persons: of the purely material, John xi. 9, εἴν τις περιπατῆ ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, οὐ προσκόπτει, ὅτι τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου τοῦτου βλέπει. And in passages like the present, these two senses alternate with and interpenetrate one another: e. g. in τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, the κόσμος is apparently material and local: in the opposition which follows, between the love of the world and the love of the Father, the personal meaning begins to be evident: in what follows, πᾶν τὸ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, which at first sight seems material, is explained by ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός, κ.τ.λ., which are the subjective desires of the τὰ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, not the things themselves: then, finally, in ver. 17 where ὁ κόσμος καὶ ἡ ἐπιθυμία αὐτοῦ is opposed to ὁ ποιῶν τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ, it is plain that we have passed, by the transition in the last verse, from the material to the personal sense altogether. This account may serve to explain that which has given so much trouble to Commentators here, the question whether ἐπιθυμία is not put for the thing itself which is desired: the fact being that, the κόσμος including the material world in the men, the ἐπιθυμίας, which are in the men, are in the κόσμος, as well as the things of which they are the desires, and which are in their turn included in them. See on the whole, the long and elaborate note in Düsterdieck, the results of which are nearly the same as those arrived at above. To detail all the shades of opinion, would be hopeless: they will mostly be found, classified and discussed, in the note referred to, nor yet (not = μήτε, but carrying with it an exclusive and disjunctive force, implying that what follows is not identical with what went before. That was spoken of the world itself, the totality: "have no love for this present world as such." But an escape from this prohibition might be sought by men who would deny in the abstract the charge of worldly-mindedness, but devoted themselves to some one object of those followed by worldly men : so that it is necessary to add, after "Love not the world,"—"no, nor any thing in it") the things in the world (explained above : here, the objects after which the ungodly world's ἐπιθυμία reaches out, and on which its ἀλαζονεία is founded). If any man (see on the same expression above, ver. 1) love the world, the love of the Father is not in him (ἡ ἀγ. τοῦ πατρὸς, love to the Father, as opposed to his love to the world : not as Luther (2), Seb.-Schmidt, and Calov., the love which the Father hath shewed to us : nor as Bengel, "amor Patris erga suos et filialis erga Patrem." As Bede, "unum cor duos sibi tam adversarios amores non capit." Philo says, fragm. ex Joh. Damasceni sacris parallelis, p. 370 B (vol. ii. p. 649), ἀμήχανον συνυπάρχειν τῇ πρὸς κόσμον ἀγάπῃ τῇ πρὸς θεὸν ἀγάπῃ, ὡς ἀμήχανον συνυπάρχειν ἀλλήλοις φῶς καὶ σκότος). 16.] Gives a reason for the assertion in ver. 15 : viz. the entire separation from one another of the world and God. In order to understand clearly the following, it is necessary to define strictly the things mentioned, and to lay down explicitly the opposition between πᾶν τὸ ἐν τῷ κ., and the three particulars which follow as included in that category. By some Commentators this has been altogether passed over : by others very variously done. I apprehend it can only be rightly done by bearing in mind what was said before,—that, as the world is summed up in man, both those objective material things which are properly τὰ ἐν τῷ κ., and those inward subjectivities which are in man and grounded on his cosmic state, are regarded as being ἐν τῷ κ., and these pass into, and are almost interchanged with, one another. Now here, the three things spoken of as examples of τὰ ἐν τῷ κ., are all purely subjective,—ἐπιθυμία, ἐπιθυμία, ἀλαζονεία. But they are subjectivities having their ground in the objectivities of the ungodly world : the first ἐπιθυμία springs out of (see below) the σάρξ, the human nature unrenewed by God : the second resides in that sense which takes note of outward things and so is inflamed by them ; and the ἀλαζονεία is that belonging to δ βίος, the manner of life of worldly men among one another, whereby pride as to display and pomp is cherished. Now each one of these three is included in, and includes in itself, love to the world : and he that loves the world falls into, walks after, becomes part of, these lusts, and this ἀλαζονεία, which is not of the Father but of the world. Loving the things of the world, he becomes conformed to the world, and following the lusts and pride which are in the world, he himself becomes one of the things in the world. Because every thing that is in the world, (namely, or for instance) the lust of the flesh (τῆς σαρκὸς is not, as made by so many Commentators, an objective gen., so that the words should mean, "lust after the flesh," i.e. impure desire : this they include, but far more. The gen. is subjective, the flesh being that wherein the lust dwells, as in reff. : and in ἐπιθ. τῶν καρδιῶν, Rom. i. 24 : cf. Prov. xxi. 26, Sir. v. 2, xviii. 30,—τοῦ σώματος, Rom. vi. 12,—τῶν ἀνθρώπων, 1 Pet. iv. 2 : cf. 2 Pet. iii. 3, Jude 16, 18,—and cf. also such expressions as ἐπιθυμία κοσμικαί, Tit. ii. 12, and σαρκικαί, 1 Pet. ii. 11. The gen. after ἐπιθυμία is never, either in LXX or N. T., objective. Cf. some passages in which it occurs in other than the subjective sense, but never of the object desired : Eph. iv. 22, 2 Pet. ii. 10. In Phil. i. 23, only Origen reads after ἐπιθυμίαν ἔχων, τοῦ ἀναλῦσαι instead of εἰς τὸ ἀν.), and the lust of the eyes (subjective gen. as before : the lust which the eye begets by seeing. In the apocryphal Testament of the twelve patriarchs (Fabricius, cod. Pseudepigr. Vet. Test. i. p. 522), among the seven πνεύματα τῆς πλάνης is enumerated the πνεῦμα ὀράσεως, μεθ' ἧς γίνεται ἐπιθυμία. Sander, whose commentary, otherwise useful, is disfigured throughout by an ill-natured spirit of carping at Lücke and De Wette, denies the applicability of this passage, understanding ἐπιθυμ. τῶν ὀφθ. as (if I rightly take his meaning, which is not very clear) the desire of seeing, as of the man who would not come to the supper because he must go and see his five yoke of oxen. But his whole view of this difficult passage is very superficial), and the vain-glory of life (the δάξων is one who lays claim to credit or glory which is not his own : see notes on Rom. i. 30 and

James iv. 16. βίος here as in ref. is men's way or course of life. So in Polyb. vi. 57. 6, ἡ περὶ τοὺς βίους ἀλαζονεία κ. πολυτέλεια: he having before observed, τοὺς βίους γενέσθαι πολυτελεστέους. This βίος comprehends in it the means of living and fashion of living,—table, furniture, equipage, income, rank; and the ἀλαζονεία arising out of these is that vainglorious pride, which is so common in the rich and fashionable), is not of (springs not from, has not as its source: see below) the Father (this name is again used for God, in reference to τεκνία and παιδία above), but is of the world (has its origin from the world. It is necessary, in opposition to all such interpretations as that of Socinus, "valde dissident ab eis quæ Deus per Christum nos sectari jussit," and Rosenmüller, "non est in his perfectio moralis," to lay down very distinctly St. John's limits of thought and speech in this matter. "Through our whole Epistle," says Dusterdieck (cf. especially ver. 29, ch. iii. 7 ff., iv. 2 ff., 7 ff., v. 1 ff.), "runs the view, which also is manifest in the Gospel of St. John, that only the mind which springs from God is directed to God. He who is born of God, loves God, knows God (vv. 3 ff.), does God's will. God Himself, who first loved us, viz. in Christ His incarnate Son, begot in us that love which of moral necessity returns again to the Father, and of like necessity embraces our brethren also. This love is hated by the world, because it springs not from the world. It depends not on the world, any more than that perverted love which springs from the world and is directed towards the world, the lust of the flesh, &c., can be directed to the Father, or to God's children. So that John grasps in reality down to the very foundations of the moral life, when he reminds his readers of the essentially distinct origin of the love of the world, and the love of God. The inmost kernel of the matter is hereby laid bare, and with it a glimpse is given of the whole process of the love of the world, and the love of God, even to the end; and this end is now set forth expressly with extraorinary power:" viz., in the next verse).

17.] And the world is passing away, and the lust of it (αὐτοῦ is subjective again: not as Lücke, Neander, Sander, objective, "the lust after it," but as in ver. 16, which see on the construction: ἡ ἐπιθ. αὐτοῦ summing up in one the three which are there mentioned. παρ-άγεται as in ver. 8: not declaring merely an attribute, that it is the quality of the world and its lust to pass away,—but a matter of fact, that it is even now in act so to pass. See Meyer on 1 Cor. vii. 31. It is no objection to this, that the μένει, which is opposed to παράγεται, contains, not a matter of fact, but a qualitative predication. This is made necessary by the words εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα which that clause contains): but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever (in this latter member of the contrast, we have a clearly personal agent introduced: and therefore, as above remarked, we may expect that the former member also will have a like personal reference. But this expectation must not be pushed too far: seeing that in the κόσμος, the ungodly men, who are in all their desires and thoughts ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, are included. They and their lusts belong to, are part of, depend on, a world which is passing away. On the other hand, eternal fixity and duration belongs only to that order of things, and to those men, who are in entire accordance with the will of God. And among these is he that doeth that will, which is (see vv. 3—6) the true proof and following out of love towards Him. As God Himself is eternal, so is all that is in communion with Him: and this are they who believe in Him and love Him, and do His will).

18—28.] WARNING AGAINST ANTI-CHRISTS AND FALSE TEACHERS (vv. 18—23): AND EXHORTATION TO ABIDE IN CHRIST (vv. 24—28). The place which this portion holds will be best seen by strictly recapitulating. "God is light, and in Him is no darkness:" that (ch. i. 5) is the ground-tone of this whole division of the Epistle. In ch. i. 5—ii. 11, the Apostle shews, wherein the believer's walking in light consists. At ver. 12, his style takes at once a hortatory turn. In his addresses to the various classes of his readers, the tone of warning is slightly struck by νενικήκατε τὸν πονηρὸν: if indeed the whole form of assertion of an ideal state in each case do not of itself carry a delicate shade of warning. Hence the transition is easy to actual warning. And this in vv. 15—17 begins by general dehortation from the love of the world as excluding the love of God, and now proceeds by caution against those in the world who would rob them of Him by whom alone walking in the light of God is made both possible and actual to us. The note of transition from the last verses is the παράγεται, here taken up by ἐσχάτη ὥρα ἐστίν. The world is passing away: and those temptations and conflicts of which ye have heard as belonging to its last period, are now upon you: those adversaries who would endanger your abiding in Him and being found in Him at His coming.

18.] Children (παιδιά, as before, is addressed not to any one class, but to all the readers), it is the last time (what is exactly the Apostle's meaning by these words? Clearly, in some sense or other, that it is the last period of the world. For we must at once repudiate such views as that of Bengel, who, strange to say, seems to understand it as "extrema Johannis ætas," and that of Steinhofer, who explains it to be John's own time as the close of the Apostolic age: and even more decidedly that of Ec. (ἔστι δὲ τὸ ἐσχάτον καὶ κατὰ τὸ χεῖριστον ἐκλαθεῖν, ὡς ὄταν φαμέν, εἰς ἔσχατον ἀφίγμα κακοῦ), Schöttgen, Carpzov., Rosenm., for all other reasons, and on account of the saying 2 Tim. iii. 1, ἐν ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις ἐνστήσονται καιροὶ χαλεποί. These then being cleared away, we come to the view of Grot.: "ultimum tempus, ubi ad Judæos sermo est, significat tempus proximum excidio urbis ac templi et reipublicæ Judæorum," proceeding to interpret the ἀντίχριστοι to be the many false Christs who arose in that period, and ἀντίχριστος to be the chief of them, Barchochebas. So Hammond, Mede, Lightfoot, Socinus: and similarly, but not so decidedly, Episcopius. But two sufficient replies may be given to this view. First, that thus these false Messiahs of the Jews must have gone forth ἐξ ἡμῶν, i. e. from the Christian Church, which they did not. Secondly, what would the approximation of the destruction of Jerusalem, viewed merely as a Jewish event (which it must be, on the hypothesis here, as ἐσχάτη would only be true as addressed to Jews), have to do with the subject of our Epistle?

And thus we have arrived at the views of those who recognize here the last age of the world, but are anxious to get rid of the idea that the Apostle, in thus speaking, regarded the coming of the Lord as near at hand, and endeavour to give some meaning to the expression which shall preclude this (to them) objectionable notion. Among these may be mentioned Calvin, and many of the elder Commentators (e. g. Aug., Bede, Schol. 1., Ec., Thl.), who understand the latter dispensation: the time from Christ's advent in the flesh to His coming to judgment. This is (Calv.) "ultimum tempus, in quo sic complentur omnia, ut nihil supersit præter ultimam Christi revelationem." With this in the main, Beza, Wolf, Lücke, De Wette, Neander, Sauder, also agree. But, apart from considerations of the unfitnes of such an idea in the context, in which παράγεται, vv. 8, 17,—and our ver. 28, shew that it is the coming of the Lord which is before the mind of the Apostle,—this objection is fatal to it: that manifestly not this whole period itself, but some time within its limits is meant, from the nature of the sign given below, ὄθεν γινώσκομεν κ.τ.λ. If the whole Christian dispensation were intended by ἐσχάτη ὥρα, it would not be stated as a sign of its presence, that already there were many antichrists, but rather that already He was come who is to be the final revelation of the Father. The circumstance of there being already many antichrists, corresponds with a prophecy delivered by our Lord, not of the general character of the whole of the last dispensation, but of the particular character of the time preceding τὸ τέλος, to which prophecy and to which time the Apostle here beyond question alludes.

Düsterdieck's interpretation is founded in some respects on those of Socinus and Grotius, impugned above,—but with this difference, that he believes the expression to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem considered not as a Jewish, but as a Christian event: as opening that period of judgment, which shall precede the end, and the length of which was no where laid down in our Lord's prophecies, nor revealed to the Apostles. But thus, with all his anxiety to escape the ascribing to the Apostles a mistaken view as to the nearness of the Lord's second coming, he does in fact fall unavoidably into that class of interpreters, by regarding that as left uncertain, of which the apostolic prophecies seem to speak with some certainty. And I believe that if we are to deal ingenuously both with words and with facts, we must recognize this difficulty here, as well as in such passages as 1 Cor. xv. 52; 2 Cor. v. 1 ff.; 1 Thess. iv. 15 ff.; and understand the Apostle to be speaking, as any one in any subsequent age of the Church might have spoken, and as we may speak now, of his time as being the last time, seeing that the signs of the last time were rife in it. How long it may please God to prolong this ἔσχατη ὥρα, how long to permit the signs to continue which demonstrate each age of the church to have this character, is a question to which it was not given to him, and is not given to us, to reply. To him indeed many prophetic visions were given, and have been recorded for us; but what is their plain and unmistakable import, will only then be known, when it becomes necessary for the churches to see clearly the signs of His coming): and even as ye heard (in our preaching, when ye received the Gospel) that antichrist cometh (ἔρχεται, the present of ordained fixity: "is to come." But who, and what, is ἀντίχριστος? As far as the meaning of the word is concerned, it may mean, either 1) one who stands against Christ, or 2) one who stands instead of Christ. The latter meaning is strenuously maintained here by Grotius, who holds that our ἀντίχριστος here has nothing to do with the ἀντικείμενος of St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 3: that being "qui Deo summo se hostem proficitur," whereas this is "qui se Christum facit:" understanding this and what follows (see above) of the ψευδόχριστοι prophesied of by our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 5, 24. This he defends by ἀντιβασιλεύς, meaning a viceroy, not an adversary of the king. And as Düsterd. suggests, he might have cited more instances on his side: ἀντίψυχος, in Ignat. Smyrn. 10, p. 716; Eph. 21, p. 661; Polyc. 2, 6, pp. 721, 725, in the sense of ἀντιλυτρον: the Homeric ἀντίθεος, "equal to the gods:" ἀνθύπατος, a proconsul, &c. But seeing that the other meaning, "adversarius Christi," is also upheld by precedent,—e. g. τύπος—ἀντίτυπος, ἀντιφιλόσοφος, ἀντιφάρμακον, ἀντίθεος in Homer also = enemy to the gods (so Chrys. on 2 Thess. ii. 4, ἀντίθεός τις ἔσται, κ. πάντας καταλύσει τοὺς θεούς, κ. κελύσει προσκυνοῦν αὐτὸν ἀντὶ τοῦ θεοῦ), ἀντιφίλαξ, ἀντιμαχητής, ἀντικάτων (the book written by Caesar against Cato), &c.,—it is clear that we cannot solve the doubt by philology alone, but must take into account other considerations. And first among these comes the fact, that St. John, who was acquainted with the form ψευδόχριστος, using as he does ψευδοπροφήτης, ch. iv. 1, never uses it, but always (see ref.) this word ἀντίχριστος. Is it not hence probable that he intended to signify, not a false Christ, but an antichrist? Next, we may fairly allege the ancient interpretations, as shewing how Greeks themselves understood the word. In these we do not find a vestige of the meaning ψευδόχριστος being attached to the term ἀντίχριστος (Hippolyt. de Antichristo, § 6, p. 734, Migne, κατὰ πάντα ἐξομοιοῦσθαι βούλεται ὁ πλάγος τῷ νῶφ τοῦ θεοῦ, is not really to the point; it does not give a meaning to ἀντίχριστος, but only alleges an undeniable feature in his character. The same may be said of Iren. Hær. v. 28. 2, p. 326, "ut sicut Christum adorent illum qui seducentur ab illo:" and of that of Hippolytus, de Christo et Antichristo, c. 49, p. 768, ἐξομοιοῦσθαι μέλλει τῷ νῶφ τοῦ θεοῦ, and indeed of all the passages where the Greek Fathers, as Cyril, Theodoret, &c., speak of the likeness of antichrist to Christ), but every where (see e. g. the quotations in Suicer) they interpret ἀντίχριστος by ἐναντίος τῷ χριστῷ. The most decided is Thl., πάντως ὁ ψεύστης ἐναντίος ὢν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ ἦτοι τῷ χριστῷ ἀντίχριστός ἐστι. So also the Latins: Tert. de præser. hær. 4, vol. ii. p. 16,—"qui antichristi, interim et semper, nisi Christi rebelles?"—Aug. in loc.,—"Latine Antichristus est, contrarius Christo:" and so Bede. And lastly our ver. 22 is quite against Grot.'s view, where ἀντίχριστος is interpreted, not ὁ προσποιούμενος χριστὸν εἶναι, but ὁ ἀρνούμενος τὸν πατέρα κ. τὸν υἱόν, which is explained, ver. 23, to be involved in ἀρνεῖσθαι τὸν υἱόν. Taking then (δ) ἀντίχριστος for Christ's adversary, I would refer to the disquisition and summary of opinions in the Prolegomena to Vol. III. on

2 Thess. ii. 1 ff., where the reasons which have induced me to expect a personal Antichrist are given in full: as are also the indications furnished by prophecy, and by the history of the church and the world, as to his probable character and work), even now there have arisen many antichrists (not, "even now many have become antichrists:" this would rather be ἀντίχριστοι γεγόνασιν πολλοί, or πολλοί ἀντίχ. γεγ. By the πολλοί being thrown between the subst. and the verb, it is shewn to be only an epithet, not the subject of the proposition. But what are we to understand the Apostle as saying? Is this fact alleged as a presumption that ὁ ἀντίχριστος is near, these πολλοί ἀντίχριστοι prefiguring and heralding him,—or as a proof that he is come, being in fact the aggregate of these? The question is an important one, as affecting that of a personal or collective antichrist. And the first thing to be noticed in answering it is, that these ἀντίχριστοι πολλοί are explained by the Apostle himself, ver. 22 f., to be deniers of the Father and the Son: i. e. of the Son: and even more explicitly, ch. iv. 3, deniers that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. Here, however, this latter point is not yet brought out: here it is as ψεύσται that we hear of them: as deniers of the truth, which Truth is Jesus Christ, the Son of God: as not having the Spirit, which is truth and no lie, ver. 27. They are said to have gone forth from the Christian church, but not to have been ἐξ ἡμῶν, as their spirit ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ οὐκ ἐστίν, ch. iv. 3. They are ἀντίχριστοι; their spirit is τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ ἀντίχριστου, ibid., of which the readers had heard that it should come, and it was in the world already. From much of this it might at first sight appear as if these ἀντίχριστοι in their aggregate formed ὁ ἀντίχριστος. But a nearer inspection will convince us that this cannot be so. (ὁ) χριστός and (ὁ) ἀντίχριστος stand over against one another, and analogy requires that if the one be personal, the other should be also. And in ch. iv. 3 we are not told that merely the spirit is ἀντίχριστου, but that it is τοῦ ἀντίχριστου, the personal reference being still kept. Again, we have ἔρχεται, the present future of prophetic fixity, in both places, here and in ch. iv. 3, set against γεγόνασιν and ἐστίν: and the verb itself, in its prophetic sense, one regularly used of Christ, as here of antichrist. So that our only refuge in order to consistent interpretation here, is to regard these ἀντίχριστοι πολλοί clothed with the attributes and having the spirit of ὁ ἀντίχριστος, as being his forerunners, in the sense of 2 Thess. ii. 7, τὸ γὰρ μυστήριον ἥδη ἐνεργεῖται τῆς ἀνομίας: meaning, as I have explained at length in the summary referred to above, that the antichristian principle was then, as it is now, and will be in every age, working, realizing, and concentrating itself from time to time, in evil men and evil books and evil days, but awaiting its final development and consummation in (ὁ) ἀντίχριστος, who shall personally appear before the coming of the Lord. In St. John's time these ἀντίχριστοι πολλοί were to be seen in the early heretical teachers whose false and corrupting doctrine and practice was beginning to trouble the church. See again, Dusterdieck's long and elaborate note, in which he has discussed all the difficulties of the subject. He in the main agrees with the conclusion given above; as do also De Wette, Lücke, Erdmann): from whence we know that it is the last time (these words are a formal statement of the connexion between the first and second members of the foregoing sentence, which without them it would be left for the reader to supply in his mind). 19.]

These antichrists are designated as having been formerly attached to the Christian church, but never really members of it. They had not that communion with the Father and the Son in which the communion of Christians with one another really consists, inasmuch as they deny the Father and the Son. They went out from among us, but they were not of us (it is plain that the prep. ἐξ must in this sentence be taken in two different meanings: first, with ἐξῆλθαν, in the mere local reference, and even so our Lord Himself uses the expression, John viii. 42, ἐγὼ γὰρ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐξῆλθον καὶ ἤκω, words which are varied, John xiii. 3, by ἀπό, and xvi. 27 by παρά. And in xiii. 3, the local meaning is stamped as the true one by the addition of καὶ πρὸς τὸν θεὸν ὑπάγει. On the other hand, ἐκ with εἶναι is very frequently used by our Apostle to denote that inner and vital dependence which betokens origin: cf. John iii. 31, vii. 17, viii. 23, 44, &c. It is clear then from this double meaning of ἐξ, that ἐξῆλθαν ἐξ ἡμῶν should be rendered with Aug. and Bede, "ex nobis exierunt," and not "ex nobis prodierunt," as vulg. The idea of origin should be kept out of view, as necessarily not contained in the words, which are to be understood as Ec. and Thl., γεγονότες μαθηταὶ ἀπέστησαν τῆς ἀληθείας καὶ ἰδίας βλασφημίας ἐξείρον. Aug. and Bede illustrate their relation to the body of Christ by a homely but instructive comparison: "quandoquidem adhuc curatur corpus ipsius (Domini nostri Jesu Christi), et sanitas perfecta non erit nisi in resurrectione mortuorum; sic sunt in corpore Christi, quomodo humores mali. Quando evomuntur, tunc relevatur corpus: sic et mali quando exeunt, tunc ecclesia relevatur. Et dicit quando eos evomit atque projicit corpus, ex me exierunt humores isti, sed non erant ex me. Quid est, non erant ex me? Non de carne mea præcisi sunt, sed pectus mihi premebant dum inessent." Aug. in Ep. Joh. Traet. iii. 4, vol. iii. p. 1999. On this, see more below): for if they had been of us (ἐξ ἡμῶν is emphatically repeated), they would have remained with us (the E. V. inserts "no doubt," as representing the "utique" of the vulgate, which was the result of the futile endeavour to render the Greek verbatim, and was intended to give the ἂν. In some places this endeavour has produced results more serious than here. In John iv. 10, σὺ ἂν ᾔτῃσας is rendered "tu forsitan petiisses," and by the Rheims version, "Thou perhaps wouldest have asked of Him:?" in John v. 46, "si enim crederetis Mosi, crederetis forsitan et mihi:?" see also Vulgate, and Rheims, and Bishops' Bible, in John viii. 42, Matt. xi. 23. I am indebted for this useful remark to the Rev. Henry Craik of Bristol.

The sense is, if they had really belonged to our number, had been true servants of Christ, they would have endured, and would not have become ἀντίχριστοι: their very becoming so, proves the unreality of their Christian profession. This point is now brought out in what follows): but (the ellipsis is variously supplied: by ἐξῆλθαν from above; so the Syr., Bengel, Lücke, al.: by τοῦτο πεποιήκασιν, πεπόνθασιν, as Ec., Thl.: "hoc factum est," as Socinus: "hæc facit Deus," as Calvin. All these in fact come to the same, provided that we keep ἵνα to its true telic meaning, which must imply a doer; and that doer, God. So that it will be better, as the divine purpose must be understood in the depth of the meaning, whatever be supplied, to take the simplest supplement, viz. the ἐξῆλθαν, which is already the expressed verb of the sentence) in order that they may be made manifest, that all are not of us (the construction is a mixed one, compounded of two, 1) ἵνα φανερωθῶσιν ὅτι οὐκ ἦσαν ἐξ ἡμῶν, and 2) ἵνα φανερωθῇ ὅτι οὐκ εἰσὶν πάντες ἐξ ἡμῶν: and the meaning is, that by their example it may be made manifest that all (who are among us) are not of us. This is shewn by the change of tense from ἦσαν to εἰσὶν: and by the impossibility of giving any adequate grammatical sense to the words on the other hypothesis, viz. that πάντες means "they all," viz. the ἀντίχριστοι. For, of the two ways in which the words have been taken, we have 1) that of the E. V. "that they were not all of us," which leaves open the inevitable conclusion that some of them are of us. (Ecumenius indeed tries to make the distinction in another way, — τούτεστι κατάδηλοι γένωνται ὅτι πάντα ἀπῆλοτριώνται ἡμῶν καὶ μετὰ τῶν οὐχ ἡμετέρων προσεκκολλήθησαν. εἰσὶ γάρ τινες ἐν τούτοις καὶ οὐχ ἐξ ἡμῶν ὄντες, οἳς δηλαδὴ συνῆψαν ἑαυτοὺς οἱ ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξελεθόντες. . . . ἡμῶν γὰρ ἀπορραγέντες τῶν οἰκείων, ἄλλοις ἐκολλήθησαν τοῖς ἀλλοτρίοις ἡμῶν. But this is manifestly a mistake, and is in fact a confounding of ἐξ ἡμῶν εἰσὶν with ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξῆλθαν, which the Apostle expressly distinguishes. Then 2) we have the way proposed by Socinus, to take οὐ πάντες for "nulli;" not "non omnes" but "omnes non:?" in fact making οὐκ belong to the predicate, εἰσὶν ἐξ ἡμῶν, not to the subject, πάντες; which is the case in Rom. iii. 20, ἐξ ἔργων νόμου οὐ δικαιώθησεται πᾶσα σὰρξ. But it may fairly be replied here, that whereas in that passage there is no ambiguity whatever, the words πᾶσα σὰρξ falling emphatically at the end, here there would be every chance of the reader mistaking the meaning, no such stress lying on the πάντες as would lie if the arrangement were οὐκ εἰσὶν ἐξ ἡμῶν πάντες, or πάντες οὐκ εἰσὶν ἐξ ἡμῶν. So that our only refuge seems to be, to believe that the Apostle makes their φανέρωσις the proof not that they were not of us, but that all are not of us, scil. who are commonly found among us. This is the rendering of the principal modern Commentators: cf. Lücke, De Wette, Düsterdieck, Huther. See on the sense, 1 Cor. xi. 19, δεῖ γὰρ καὶ αἰρέσεις ἐν ὑμῖν εἶναι, ἵνα (καὶ) οἱ δοκιμοὶ φανεροὶ γέωνται ἐν ὑμῖν. It is not my intention to go at length into the question as to the dogmatic consequences which have been deduced from this verse. It may be sufficient to refer my readers to the principal sources of the two antagonistic opinions as to the final perseverance (not of the elect, which is a truism, but) of those who have been once truly children of God. They will find the most complete statement of the predestinarian view as founded on our passage, in Augustine, De dono perseverantiae, 8, 9 (19, 21), vol. x. p. 1003 f. and De correptione et gratia, 9 (20), p. 928. In the former passage he says, "Homini^{bus} videtur omnes qui boni apparent fideles perseverantiam usque in finem accipere debuisse. Deus autem melius esse iudicavit, miscere quosdam non perseveraturos certo numero sanctorum, ut quibus non expedit in hujus vitæ tentatione securitas, non possint esse securi, 1 Cor. x. 12. Ex duobus autem piis cur huic donetur perseverantia usque in finem, illi autem non detur, inscrutabilia sunt judicia Dei. Illud tamen fidelibus debet esse certissimum, hunc esse ex prædestinatis, illum non esse. Nam si fuissent ex nobis, ait unus prædestinatorum, qui de pectore Domini bibeat hoc secretum, mansissent utique nobiscum." See also Calvin h. l., who sums up all thus, "Quare non immerito dicit, ubi efficax est Dei vocatio, illic certam perseverantiam fore." The other side is ably stated by Didymus (cited in Düsterd.), whose conclusion is, "Igitur, licet figurate dicta sint hæc, attamen voluntariam necessitatem ostendunt, a quorum et cohabitatione quæ potest esse malis viris cum bonis abscesserit, dum vitio suo tales sint facti. Non igitur oportet intelligi contrarietatem hoc verbo significari naturarum." The various opponents of the predestinarian view as such, have had recourse, as so often, to various unworthy artifices and untenable explainings away of words, to escape from the inference pressed on them. Thus Socinus and Episcopus lay stress on the fact that ἦσαν is imperfect, not perfect: "non enim Apostolus dicit antichristos illos nunquam antea vere Christianos fuisse, sed tantum quod tum, vel jam antequam antichristos se esse profiterentur, non erant ii, qui esse debebant," &c. And so even Grot. ("qui ista crepabant, jam deseruerant Christianam professionem . . . Si illi tunc ex animo fuissent Christiani cum ista inciperent, non deseruissent cætus nostros"). Calov. again tries to escape from the inference, by making ἐξ ἡμῶν apply not to Christians in general, but to the Apostles only.

The best account of the whole matter is found in Düsterdieck's long note, in which he has thoroughly gone over all the opinions and given his own conclusion. It is, in the main, as follows. The Apostle is speaking here not dogmatically but ethically. As Didymus above, if there is a necessity in the μεμενῆκεισαν, it is a "necessitas voluntaria." As Aug. in his comm. here (written sixteen years before the treatise De dono perseverantiae), "de voluntate sua quisque aut Antichristus, aut in Christo est. Aut in membris sumus, aut in humoribus malis. Qui se in melius commutat, in corpore membrum est: qui autem in malitia permanet, humor malus est: et quando exierit, relevabuntur qui premebantur." We must take these words, ver. 19, in intimate connexion with the enunciation of this whole portion of the Epistle, ch. i. 5—7. The object of this portion is, ch. i. 3, that ye may have fellowship with us, in that we have fellowship with the Father and the Son. This aim penetrates all the warning and exhortation vv. 18—28. This fellowship depends on the walking in light, i. e. on knowledge of the truth as regards ourselves and God, and love to God and the brethren. He who departs from the truth, he who loves not God and the brethren, belongs not to this fellowship, and shews that he belongs not to it. If he had belonged to it, he would have held fast his walk in the light, as shewn by these indications. This is the human side, on which our passage regards the act and fact. There is also a divine side. They who attain eternal life are given by the Father to the Son, and no man can come to the Son except the Father draw him (John vi. 37, 44, 65, xvii. 6), and such are kept by God (ib. xvii. 11); but also we read that they believe on the Son, receive the word of the Son, and keep themselves (John vi. 40, xvii. 6 f., i. 12, James i. 27). And so again on the other side, they who remain at last excluded from eternal life, are thus excluded not only by God's decree, but by their own evil choice and will. The words cited above, John vi. 65, were spoken by our Lord with direct reference to the traitor Judas: but on the other hand St. John gives notices of the ethical development of Judas which leave no doubt that his depravity went hand in hand with God's judgment on him. Judas was covetous: his heart was inclined to mammon; hence he understood not the love of Mary when she anointed Jesus with her precious ointment: he grudged his Lord this token of love: he could not abide with Christ, because he shut his heart through greed, through love of the world, against the love of Christ; for the knowledge of the Lord, faith in Him, fellowship with Him, are all summed up in Love. Thus we see that in the rejection, as in the acceptance of eternal life, the two factors, God's will and man's will, are to be regarded in their ethical connexion only. In order to that knowledge of God, which is eternal life, man must be taught of God (John vi. 45): but man must also learn of God. And the more St. John sets forth the essential nature of this knowledge of God and Jesus Christ as ethical, the more does he recognize, in putting forward God's will in the matter, man's will also. Christ is the Saviour of the whole world, ch. ii. 2, iv. 14. But in the personal appropriation of this universal salvation, not all really take it to themselves,—and many, who have taken it, fall away again, because they do not keep the grace given, do not abide in Christ, do not walk in the light. This last is by no means denied by St. John when he says "if they had been of us they would have remained with us." The words set forth an ideal (ἀν, not γε or a similar particle) similar to that in ch. ii. 5, iii. 9, v. 18. As in no one of those places can the Apostle possibly mean, that a true believer, one really born of God, has perfect love to God and cannot sin (for what then would ch. ii. 1 mean?),—so neither here can he mean that whoever once inwardly and truly belongs to the communion of believers cannot by any possibility fall from it. I have abridged Düsterd.'s remarks, and thereby, I fear, not increased their perspicuity. Those who are able (and I would hope, for the sake of English theology, that this number is daily increasing) should by all means give some days to the thorough study of them).

20, 21.] The Apostle puts them in mind, in an apologetic form, of the truth which they as Christians possessed, and the very possession of which, not the contrary, was his reason for thus writing to them. This reminiscence carries at the same time with it the force of an exhortation, as so many of the ideal statements on Christian perfection in our Epistle. "What they have in the ideal depth of their Christian life, that they ought to have in living and working reality. And (hardly as Lücke, logically adversative to what preceded: so De Wette (ἀβέρ), and many others. Huther ascribes this interpretation virtually to Düsterdieck, but wrongly: for the latter keeps καὶ in its simple copulative meaning, and only asserts that what adversative meaning there is consists in the sense, not in the outward expression. "John," he says, "denotes only the passage to a new particular, without distinctly marking its adversative relation to the last") γε (expressed, as emphatic: see above) have an anointing (χρίσμα is properly the oil or ointment with which the anointing takes place, not the act itself of anointing. For this we have in English no word adequate to the necessity of the passage: "unguent" is the nearest approach, but is still inadequate. It is certain that in later Greek there arose a considerable confusion between verbal nouns in -μα and their cognates in -σις. Thus in Exod. xxix., the ἔλαιον τοῦ χρίσματος, ver. 7, becomes the ἔλαιον τῆς χρίσεως, in ver. 21. On the meaning, see below) from the Holy One (viz. from Christ, the δίκαιος of our ver. 1, the ἄγρός of ch. iii. 3, the ἅγιος of Acts iii. 14, and ἅγιος τοῦ θεοῦ of John vi. 69: cf. also Rev. iii. 18, where the Laodicean church is counselled to buy of Christ κολύριον ἔχρησαι τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς σου, ἵνα βλέπῃς. This is agreed to by almost all Commentators: even Socinus says that the Apostle "de Deo simul et Christo loqui, non secus ac si ambo una tantum persona essent:" and Schlichting concedes that the words may be understood of Christ), and know all things (the full and perfect knowledge of Christian truth is the ideal completion of those who have this anointing. This of course must not be understood as actually predicated of these readers: but the expression explains itself as referring to all things needful for right action in the matter under consideration: q. d. πάντα ταῦτα. So most Commentators. "Quod autem omnia dicit novisse, non universaliter capi, sed ad presentis loci circumstantiam restringi debet," Calv. See note on John xvi. 13: cf. also 1 Cor. i. 5, viii. 1; Eph. i. 18; Col. ii. 2. Some understand, and all things necessary to Christian life and godliness: so Ec., Wolf, Bengel, Neander: "quæ ut homines a Spiritu Sancto uncti doctique tum ad salutem, tum ad cavendos illos seductorum et antichristorum errores scire debetis," Wolf. The alternative reading πάντες would mean "ye all know it:" a sense which hardly seems to be applicable.

But now the question recurs, What is this χρίσμα, and what leads the Apostle to use this peculiar expression here? The reply to the latter question is probably, as Bengel, "Alludit appellatio chrismatis ad antichristi nomen, ex opposito." The Apostle sets his readers, as χριστούς, anointed of God, over against the ἀντίχριστοι. Then as to the nature of the χρίσμα, we can hardly fail to be right in interpreting it of the Holy Ghost. For "Christ received the Holy Ghost without measure (John iii. 34): on Him the Holy Ghost abode (ib. i. 33): God ἔχρισεν αὐτὸν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ (Acts x. 38). Christ baptizeth with the Holy Ghost (John i. 33): He sends the Holy Ghost, who takes of His and shews it to believers (John xv. 26, xvi. 14, Acts ii. 33). And seeing that the Son hath all which the Father hath, the Father is said to send forth the Spirit of His Son into the hearts of His children (Gal. iv. 6: cf. Eph. iii. 16, Phil. i. 19, 2 Cor. iii. 17 ff.), and this, at the prayer, in the name, through the mediation, of the Son (John xiv. 16, xvi. 7 f.): the Father anoints believers by giving them His Spirit (2 Cor. i. 21 f.), as He has anointed the Son with the Holy Ghost. And hence the Spirit, which we have received, is the token that we are in the Father (ch. iii. 24), and in the Son (ii. 27), that we are children of God (Rom. viii. 14 ff., Gal. iv. 6). The Holy Ghost teaches the faithful the truth and keeps them in it: that truth, in the knowledge of which they have eternal life, having thereby the Father and the Son." Düsterdieck, p. 354 f. This anointing, by virtue of which they are Christ's and the Father's, and without which a man is none of Christ's (Rom. viii. 14, 9), in respect of which they are χριστοί, the ἀντίχριστοι attack in its very root, and would rob them of, thereby severing them from the Son and from the Father: from light and truth and life. And this very χρίσμα is the means and weapon whereby they must be detected and resisted). 21.] I did not write to you (see on ἔγραψα above, vv. 13, 14. It may refer either to what has immediately preceded, or to the whole Epistle: here probably to the immediately preceding) because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and because no lie is of the truth (i. e. coupling the fact of your knowledge of the truth with the fact that no lie is of the truth, I wrote to supply the link between these two, to point out to you the lie and the liar, that you might at once act on that your knowledge of the truth, and not listen to them that deceive you. Thus we keep ὅτι and καὶ ὅτι correlative. So Justiniani, Schlichting, and Neander: but almost all the expositors take the second ὅτι as dependent on οἶδατε, "because ye know the truth, and (also know) that no lie, &c." So Aug., Bede, Erasmus, Grot., Calvin, Luther, Estius, Corn.-a-lap., Socinus, Episcopius, Wolf, Whitby, Hammond, Lücke, Baumg.-Crus., De Wette, Sander, Düsterd., Huther, and many others. But this surely does violence to the construction: ὅτι οἶδατε αὐτήν, καὶ ὅτι . . . οὐκ ἔστιν. ὅτι twice repeated, and each time with an indicative verb, surely must be kept to one and the same meaning in both clauses. Nor does the sense gain anything, as Düsterd. maintains. For their knowing the truth and their knowing that no lie is of the truth, the one a cognition of God and His Son, the other a mere apprehension of a truism, are no logical correlatives, nor can be concurrent reasons for the Apostle's writing: whereas the two facts, the one, their knowing the truth, the other, that no lie belongs to that truth, are concurrent reasons for the Apostle's writing: viz. that he may set plainly before them what the lie is, that they may at once discern their entire alienation from it. And this accordingly he proceeds to do in the next verse. As regards the construction of πᾶν ψεῦδος . . . οὐκ ἔστιν, it is not, as so many of the Commentators, a Hebraism, but merely that common one of attaching the negative to the predicate, instead of to the subject. πᾶν ψεῦδος (every lie) ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας οὐκ ἔστιν (is excluded from being of the truth)). 22.] Who is the liar (the question passes from the abstract τὸ ψεῦδος to the concrete ὁ ψεύστης. gel. The Apostle proceeds to identify the utterer of the ψεύδος of which he has just spoken. We have a similar question in ch. v. 4, 5: where after describing the victory that overcometh the world, he rejoins τίς ἐστιν ὁ νικῶν κ.τ.λ. εἰ μὴ ὁ, as here. Some have neglected the article altogether; so Luther, and the E. V.; others have given it merely the force of pointing out as "insigne" so Calv. ("nisi hoc censeatur mendacium, aliud nullum haberi posse"), Seb.-Schmidt; Socin. ("mendacium, quo nihil possit esse majus"), De Wette ("diese Irrlehre gilt dem Ἰη. statt aller, scheint ihm alle andern einzuschließen"). So also Lücke, and Huther. But there can be little doubt that the ὁ refers as above to the preceding ψεύδος, but ("if not:" so εἰ μὴ in ref. and Luke xvii. 18, Rom. xi. 15, 1 Cor. ii. 11, 2 Cor. ii. 2) he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ (lit. "denieth (to the effect) that Jesus is not the Christ." "This excepting εἰ μὴ," says Kühner, Gram. ii. p. 561, "is frequently found after τί (= τί ἄλλο), and also after οὐδὲς ἄλλος. Hom. hymn. Cer. 78, οὐδέ τις ἄλλος αἴτιος ἀθανάτοισιν, εἰ μὴ νεφεληγερέτα Ζεὺς: Aristoph. Eq. 1106, μηδὲν ἄλλ', εἰ μὴ ἔστιε: Xen. Ec. ix. 1, τί δέ, εἰ μὴ ὑπισχνεῖτό γε ἐπιμελήσεσθαι; Cf. Cyr. i. 4. 13." So the Greeks often, bringing out more distinctly the negative proposition involved in the verb of negation,—so Demosth. p. 871: ὡς δ' οὐκ ἐκείνος ἐγεώργει τὴν γῆν, οὐκ ἠδύνατ' ἀρνηθῆναι,—or prohibition,—so Herod. iii. 128, Δαρείος ἀπαγορεύει ὑμῖν μὴ δορυφορεῖν Ὀροῖτα. See Kühner, Gram. ii. p. 410. On the meaning, see below)? This (the ψεύστης just described; ὁ ἄρνούμενος, &c. below being appositional, and an additional consequence from his former denial) is the antichrist (on the personal interpretation, see above, ver. 18. ὁ ἀντίχρ. is obviously here used not as predicating the one person in whom the character shall be finally and centrally realized, but as setting forth identity of character with him, and participation in the same development of the antichristian principle. Nor is this, as Huther characterizes it, a "willkürliche Umbeutung und Ergänzung," but something of the kind must be understood, whichever way antichrist be taken, collective or personal), who denieth the Father and the Son (it is implied then, that the denying Jesus to be the Christ, is equivalent to denying the Father and the Son. And this the Apostle carefully asserts in the next verse). 23.] Every one that denieth the Son, neither hath he the Father (the οὐδέ is exclusive and climacteric; not only hath he denied the Son, but he cannot hold, possess the Father): he that confesseth the Son hath also the Father. As nearly the whole of this Epistle, so especially such an assertion as this, formed a battle-field for the old rationalists. Some of the early Commentators and Fathers imagining that Jewish error was indicated by the denying that Jesus is the Christ, the idea has been again taken up by Semler, al., and pressed in the anti-trinitarian interest. Grot., Socinus, Episcopius, all evade the Apostle's words by inadequate or far-fetched interpretations, understanding the expressions in this verse, of not obeying the teaching, not following the example, &c. of the Son, and by consequence of the Father. But the deeper and truer meaning of the Apostle's words has been recognized by all the better Commentators, with some variations from one another. While some, as Beza, Calov., Seb.-Schmidt, mark perhaps too precisely the doctrinal character of the words, others, as Lücke and De Wette, make their force consist too much in an ideal and economical relation between the divine Persons. Still all are agreed, that that which is spoken of is the revelation of the Father by the Son only, and that he who rejects this in its fulness rejects all that can be known of the real essence and nature of the Father Himself; "nempe quia Deus se totum nobis in Christo fruentum dedit," as Calvin. "The antichrists denied that Jesus, the definite Person whom the Apostles had seen, heard, and handled, is the Christ. In whatever sense this denial is to be taken,—the Apostle speaks merely of the fact, as known to the readers;—at all events there is involved in it a denial of the Son of God; because it is only as the incarnate Son of God (ch. iv. 2), that Jesus is the Christ. And in the denial of the Son is involved necessarily the denial of the Father, since the Father cannot be known without the Son, and the Father cannot be perceived, believed on, loved, by any man, without the Son, or otherwise than through the Son, i. e. the Son manifested in the flesh, the Christ, which is, Jesus. So that in St. John's development of the argument there are three essentially connected points: denial of the Christ, of the Son, of the Father. The middle link of the chain, the denial of the Son of God, shews how the denial of the Father is of necessity involved in the denial of Christ. And the cogency of this proof is made yet more stringent by another equally unavoidable process of argument. The antichristian false doctrine consists mainly in a negation, in the denying of the fundamental Christian truth, that Jesus is the Christ. But in this is involved the denial of the essence of the Son as well as of the Father, and again in this denial is involved the losing, the virtual not having of the Son and of the Father. In the sense of St. John, we may say, taking the first and last steps of his argument and leaving out the intervening ones: He who denieth that Jesus is the Christ, hath not the Father. And this necessary connexion between denying and not having, is perfectly clear, the moment we understand the ethical character, the living realism, of St. John's way of regarding the subject. As (ver. 23) we cannot separate the knowledge and confession of the Christ, the Son, the Father, from the having, the real possession of, the practical fellowship with, the actual remaining in the Son and the Father, so conversely, together with the denial is necessarily given the not-having; together with the loss of the truth of the knowledge, the loss of the life which consists in that knowledge (John xvii. 3). In such a connexion, the confession of the truth is as essential on the one side, as the denial on the other. Each is the necessary manifestation of the belief or unbelief hidden in the heart. And this ὁμολογεῖν is not to be understood of the 'confessio cordis, vocis, et operis' (Bede), but only as ch. i. 9, of the confession of the mouth (στομάτι ὁμολογεῖται, Rom. x. 10, see John xii. 42). It is parallel with φέρειν διδασχῆν, 2 John 7, 10; and indicates the definite utterance of the doctrine which was made known by the apostolic preaching, ver. 24." Düsterdieck. 24, 25.] Exhortation to perseverance in the truth delivered to them, and statement of the promise connected with it: connected with the foregoing by the ὁμολογεῖν, as involving an ἀκούσαι: see the concluding sentence of Düsterd. above. Ye (the ὑμεῖς stands alone, serving to mark more distinctly the change of person. We have a similar anacoluthon in ver. 27. Kühner, Gram. ii. p. 156, says: "The word which exceeds in significance the other members of the sentence, is sometimes with rhetorical emphasis not only put at the beginning of the sentence, but also expressed in a form calculated to shew that it is the subject underlying the whole sentence, although the grammatical structure would require another and dependent case. So Plato, Cratyl. p. 403, A, ὁ δὲ Ἀιδης, οἱ πολλοὶ μὲν μοι δοκοῦσιν ἀπολαμβάνειν τὸ ἀειδὲς προσευῆσθαι τῷ ὄνοματι τούτῳ: and ib. p. 404, Περσέφαττα δέ, πολλοὶ μὲν καὶ τούτο φοβοῦνται τὸ ὄνομα." Some however explain the position of ὑμεῖς here by a trajectory: so Bengel, "antitheton est in pronomine, ideo adhibetur tractor;" and so Beza, Socinus, and even De Wette. But the other is more probable),—let that which ye heard from the beginning, viciissim, as Bengel. If it abide in you, ye too shall abide . . .) shall abide in the Son and in the Father (here again the rationalizing Commentators, Socius, Grotius, Hammond, Semler, have endeavoured to explain away the close personal relation and immanence in God expressed by the Apostle's words: "ita cum Patre et Filio conjunctum esse, ut honorum ab utroque proficiscentium quis sit particeps," Socius, —and similarly Semler: "summo eorum favore et amicitia fruimini," Grot., Hamm. But here as every where else, they entirely miss the sense. He in whom abides the message of life in Christ which he has heard, not only has received the tidings of that life, but is transformed into the likeness of Him whose seed he has taken into him: is become a new creation: and the element in which and by which he lives and acts is even He in whom and by whom this new life comes, even Christ the Son of God. And thus living in the Son, he lives in the Father also: for Christ the Son of God is the manifestation and effulgence of the Father, himself abiding ever in the Father, as His people abide in Him. See the same truth declared John vi. 56; xv. 1 ff.; xvii. 23 (Eph. iii. 17; 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 17)). The result of that abiding will be the fulfilment, not only in partial present possession but in complete future accomplishment, of Christ's promise to us. This taking up again and explaining of something expressed (see ch. iii. 23, v. 11) or implied (see ch. i. 5, iv. 21, v. 14) before, is often found in our Apostle's style) which He Himself (Christ; cf. ὁ ἀκηκόαμεν περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς, ch. i. 1: cf. αὐτῷ, ver. 8; αὐτοῦ, ver. 27; αὐτῷ, ver. 28) promised to us (in many passages of the Gospel: e. g., John iii. 15; iv. 14; vi. 40, 47, 57; xi. 25, 26; xvii. 2, 3) is this, (even) eternal life (accus. instead of nom., by a common attraction of the subject of the sentence into the case of the relative clause: "urbem quam statuo vestra est." The fact of ζῶν αἰώνιον being put in logical apposition with ἐπαγγελία must not make us suppose, that ἐπαγγελία means the thing promised. The aor. ἐπηγγείλατο plainly enough shews that ἐπαγγ. is to be taken in its usual sense of a spoken promise. Then, when the purport of this promise comes to be explained, it is not "that we should inherit eternal life," but, instead, the subject of the spoken promise is expressed, as very commonly in ordinary discourse. "He promised me such or such a price" is a case in point.)

26, 27.] Conclusion of the section concerning anti-christ. These things I wrote to you concerning them that deceive you (ταῦτα, the whole since ver. 18. The pres. part. πλανώντων describes the occupation, the endeavour of the antichrists: what result it had had, is not expressed: some result seems implied by ver. 19). And you (the same anacoluthon rhetoricum as in ver. 24: again setting his believing readers in marked contrast to the deceivers just mentioned),—the anointing which ye received from Him (Christ, ver. 25: see above, ver. 20: as also on χρίσμα) abideth in you ("habet hic indicativus perquam subtilem exhortationem, conferendam ad 2 Tim. iii. 14." Bengel), and ("et ideo," Beng.) ye have no need that any one teach you (the construction = χρεῖαν ἔχετε τοῦ διδάσκειν ὑμᾶς, Heb. v. 12, or that with the simple infin., Matt. iii. 14, xiv. 16, al. See reff. The ἵνα in such cases cannot be pressed to its telic meaning; rather we should say that the clause beginning with ἵνα is expegetical of the verb preceding. Some Commentators have understood the διδάσκειν of the teaching of the antichrists: so Cornal., "non est necesse ut pseudo-apostoli et hæretici doceant veram fidem et doctrinam:" so Semler, Sander, al.: but manifestly from want of apprehension of the Apostle's meaning. His assertions here are so many delicate exhortations, veiled under the declaration of their true ideal state of unction with the Holy Spirit who guides into all truth. If that unction were abiding in them in all its fullness, they would have no need for his or any other teaching. And in what is said, he does not indeed say that it is not abiding in them; but the contrary, thus reminding them what their real state is: but (contrast to the οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχετε) as his anointing teacheth you concerning all things (if we read τὸ αὐτό, it is not, as Bengel, "semper idem, sibi constans:" but marks merely the identity of the anointing which they once received with that which was now abiding in them. On the reading, see the digest. Our διδάσκει ὑμᾶς περὶ πάντων is parallel to ὀδηγήσει ὑμᾶς εἰς τὴν ἀλήθειαν πᾶσαν, John xvi. 13.

Two ways are open to us of taking what follows. Either 1) καὶ ἀληθές ἐστὶν καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ψ., καὶ καθὼς ἐδίδαξεν ὑμᾶς is all part of the protasis, which begins with ὡς above, and the apodosis begins with μένετε,—or 2) the apodosis to ὡς κ.τ.λ. is καὶ ἀληθές ἐστὶν κ. οὐκ ἔ. ψ., and then comes a new protasis, κ. καθὼς ἐδ. ὑμ., with its apodosis μένετε κ.τ.λ. The former view is taken by (Ec. and Thl., by Lücke, De Wette, Neander, Düsterdieck, al.: the latter by Luther, Calv., Baumg.-Crus., Sander, Brückner, Huther, and indeed most Commentators. If we take the former, we must regard καὶ ἀλ. ἐ. κ. οὐκ ἔ. ψ. as a parenthetical insertion, stamping the character of the διδαχὴ περὶ πάντων just mentioned, and then καὶ καθὼς ἐδ. ὑμ. as a resumption, slightly varied, of ὡς . . . διδάσκει ὑμ. before. To this it is objected, that it is harsh, and not so like St. John's style as the other: that καθὼς does not naturally resume ὡς, nor καὶ, ἀλλά,—nor the aor. ἐδίδαξεν the pres. διδάσκει: that περὶ πάντων in the former clause has no correspondent in μένετε ἐν αὐτῷ in the latter. But it is answered on the other side, that these divergences from the former expression are entirely in accordance with the vivid and rapid movement of the thought in the Apostle's style, and cannot in any way tend to obscure the connexion. The ἀλλά above was occasioned by the preceding οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχετε ἵνα, whereas the καὶ before καθὼς seems to take up again the construction broken by the parenthesis κ. ἀλ. . . ψ. Again καθὼς, the fuller and more precise conjunction, not only repeats but enforces the ὡς above. And the change of the pres. διδάσκει into the aor. ἐδίδαξεν is no objection, but a recommendation, to this view. For by it we have, as so often in St. John's repetitions, a new side of the subject brought out: viz. the absolute historical fact, that at a certain time this teaching came to them from Christ, viz. when they heard the apostolic preaching: so that the ὡς διδάσκει, its enduring teaching, is not only taken up again but placed in a new light, by its commencement being referred to. And as to the last objection, which is Huther's, of there being in the resumption no member corresponding to περὶ πάντων, it seems to me to amount to nothing. The correspondent member would be found not in the apodosis, μενεῖτε or μένετε,—but in the resumption of the protasis: and there it may be well understood to be implied in ἐδίδαξεν, there being no reason why it should be again expressed. But against the second view there are weightier objections. First, the καὶ before ἀληθές is in this case no natural introduction to an apodosis. Huther compares it with the καὶ before ὑμεῖς in ver. 24: but that, giving (see there) the sense of "ye too," is quite another thing. Here, there is no mutual correspondence, and the καὶ merely drags on the ear. Then, the apodosis thus introduced is no logical apodosis: "as it teaches you concerning all things, (so) it is true and is not a lie," is not a connected judgment: its being true and not a lie may be an authoritative assertion inserted by way of reminding, but cannot be a logical inference from its teaching being universal; for universal teaching may be false, as well as true. For these reasons I prefer, and adopt the former rendering, —and is true, and is not a lie (what is true, and not a lie? the anointing itself, or that which it teaches about all things? (Ec. and Thl. understand the latter: ἀληθές γὰρ ἐστὶ κ. οὐκ ἔστι ψεῦδος ὃ δηλονότι ἐδίδαξεν ὑμᾶς. But the construction seems to require the other view: ἀληθές is in strict concord with τὸ χρίσμα, and to supply τὸ διδασκόμενον would be very harsh. And this is quite correspondent to the fact that the Spirit who is this anointing, is the Spirit of Truth (John xiv. 17) and therefore leads into all truth (ib. xvi. 13). As Düsterd. remarks, "the chrisma which abides in and teaches believers, is essentially true, is not a lie, and hence nothing can come from it which is a lie"—and even as He (or, it? so Erasmus, paraphrasing χρῖσμα by 'Spiritus' and adding "perseveretis in eo quod Ille vos semel docuit;" and so Düsterd.: but the change to the aor. seems necessarily to refer to Christ as the subject,—the ἅγιος from whom the χρῖσμα came, and who is ever in the Writer's mind, a subject ever ready to be supplied) taught you, abide in Him (or, "in it," as Erasmus? or, in that which it teaches, as Baumg.-Crus.? Neither of these: for the μένετε ἐν αὐτῷ is immediately after repeated, and the reference of αὐτῷ fixed, by what follows, to be to Christ. (But I see that Estius, holding it improbable that this αὐτῷ refers to Christ, makes that also to mean "in eo quod doctum fuerat:" supplying "Christ" as a subject before φανερωθῆ.)

As regards μένετε, Huther, who upholds this reading, takes it as indicative here, and imperative in the next verse. But, apart from the arbitrariness of such a distinction, would it be quite true or according to the Apostle's way of asserting as existent the ideal Christian state of his readers? True, he does assert that the chrisma μένει in them, and from that abiding, important consequences are hortatively deduced: one of the most important of which is, the enduring and ultimate abiding in Christ. Therefore I much prefer taking μένετε imperative. The reading μενετε is variously understood: by Socinus, Corn.-a-lap., Estius, Lorinus, Semler, al., as an imperative: by others as a pure future: so Beza, "mihi videtur omnino servanda futuri propria significatio ut est optime sperantis:" and Bengel, "vim consolandi et hortandi habet hoc futurum." But see Digest). 28.] Conclusion of this part of the Epistle: forming also a transition to the next part: see below. And now

The ἐὰν differs from ὅταν, in marking, not time but reality only. We may supply, "in our time:" but it is better to leave it unsupplied), we (observe that he changes to the communicative way of speaking. This was not a matter in which Apostle and converts, teacher and hearer, were separate: but one in which all had a share: viz. the Christian hope of standing before the Lord with joy at His coming. This is far the most likely reason, and not as Seb.-Schmidt, mere modesty, still less, as Sander, because the failure of any of his τεκνία at that day would be a detraction from his full apostolic reward: for the relation between shepherd and flock, minister and people, is not in question here) may have confidence (παρῥησία, subjective: not freedom of speech, but confidence,—see note on Heb. iii. 6; and the reff. from Him (ἀπ' αὐτοῦ) with shame and confusion when He appears." Düsterd.) at His coming (Bengel remarks, "Epistolam igitur hanc prius scripsisse videtur quam apocalypsin, in qua demum adventus magis est dilatus." On this, see Prolegomena).

II. 29—V. 5.] THE SECOND GREAT DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE: the doing of righteousness, the sign of new birth from God: the opposite, the sign of not being of God. This main subject, enunciated in verse 29, is carried onward throughout, and more especially with reference to brotherly love, which is the great and obvious example of likeness to God, and its absence the most decisive proof of alienation from Him. The various subdivisions see, as the exegesis proceeds.

III. 3.] Connected with the principle enounced ii. 29, is its obvious application to ourselves, as children of God. Hoping as we do to be entirely like Christ at His appearing, each one of us, in pursuance of this hope, is even now approximating to this perfect likeness by purifying himself even as He is pure.

29.] If ye know (appeal to their recognition of the divine character as that which he describes it) that He is righteous (of whom is this said? If of Christ, as seems most natural after αὐτοῦ . . . αὐτοῦ preceding, we find a difficulty in ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγέννηται below, seeing that we are never said to be born anew of Christ, but always of God (through Christ), ch. iii. 1, 9; iv. 7; v. 1, 4, 18 &c. If on the other hand they are said of God, it seems strange that after a change of reference from the preceding αὐτοῦ, another subject should be expressed in ch. iii. 1 by the words ὁ πατήρ. In consequence of these difficulties, some, as Storr, Lücke, al., have referred δίκαιός ἐστιν to Christ, and ἐξ αὐτοῦ to God; which cannot well be. It would be possible, doubtless, to understand the whole of Christ, without change of subject from ver. 28; and to leave the γεγέννηται ἐξ αὐτοῦ as we find it. If it occurs no where else in reference to Christ, there is in it nothing abhorrent from our Christian ideas. And in St. John's sense of the intimate union between the Father and Son, he who is born of the Father might be said to be born of the Son al.o. Another reason for this might be the easily occurring reference, in δίκαιός ἐστιν, to Ἰησοῦν χριστὸν δίκαιον, ver. 1. This view is taken by Bengel, Corn.-a-lap., Lorinus, al. But after all, the other, which is that of most ancient expositors, of Baumg.-Crus., De Wette, Neander, Düsterdieck, al., must, I apprehend, be adopted. The analogy of the passage, as shewn in ch. iii. 1, 2, 9, 10, fixes the ἐξ αὐτοῦ γεγέννηται to birth from God: and the absence of a new expressed subject in δίκαιός ἐστιν must be accounted for by remembering that this verse, as ch. i. 5, is the opening, and general statement, of a new section of the Epistle. And the essential unity of the Father and the Son comes in on this side also: so that the judgment alluded to ver. 28, which shall be executed by the Son, being judgment committed to Him by the Father, brings to mind the justice and righteousness in which that judgment is founded.

The whole subject of the righteousness of God is fully treated by Düsterd. in his note here. The definition which seems to him to express it most fully, is that of Hollaz, one of the best of the old Lutheran dogmatists (died 1713),—in his Examen theologicum,—"Justitia Dei est attributum divinum ενεργητικόν, vñ ejus Deus omnia quæ æterna suæ legi sunt conformia, vult et agit; creaturis convenientes leges præscribit, promissa facta hominibus implet, bonos remuneratur et impios punit": ye know (many, as vulg., which Aug., Bede, and the R.-C. expositors follow, also Luth., Calv., Socin., Episcop., Grot., Carpzov., Lücke, Sander, al., take γινώσκετε as imperative. But the whole tone of the Epistle is against this: which is one not of authoritative revelation of truth, but of inferring ethical truth from previously known theosophic facts. And with such a tone it is much more consonant to say, "If ye know the one, ye know—that knowledge sets forth and assumes—the other:" than to say, "If ye know the one, know the other." Not to insist, that γινώσκειν is more the apprehension, εἰδῆτε the possession, of knowledge; if ye are already aware, . . . ye thereby know . . .) that also every one who doeth righteousness (τὴν δικαιοσύνην, the righteousness which is implied in δίκαιος above: if it were not too strong, we might almost say, “that righteousness:” the art. shewing that there is no other. πᾶς, “omnis, et solus,” says Bengel: every one, and no one else. The proposition will bear converting: not logically, but theologically. ποιῶν, for (see Hollaz’s definition above) all righteousness is energetic: it springs out of holiness, truth, love: πρακτικὰ γὰρ αἱ ἀρεταί, καὶ ἐν τῷ γίνεσθαι ἔχουσι τὸ εἶναι παυσάμεναι γὰρ ἢ μέλλουσαι οὐδὲ τὸ εἶναι ἔχουσι. (Ec. on ch. iii. 3), is born (= hath been begotten) of Him (God: see above: ὁ δίκαιος γὰρ δικαίους γεννᾷ. The inference here must be carefully kept to the Apostle’s words and obvious sense. And those require that we should understand it thus: God is righteous. This is our axiom, from which we set out. And if so, then the source of righteousness. When therefore a man doeth righteousness, γινώσκουμεν, we apprehend, we collect, from our previous knowledge of these truths, that the source of his righteousness is God: that in consequence he has acquired by new birth from God, that righteousness which he had not by nature. We argue from his ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην to his γεγενῆσθαι ἐκ θεοῦ. And the right apprehension of this is the more important, because the whole mass of Socinian and Pelagian Commentators have reversed the members of the argument, and made it conclude that ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην is the condition, on our part, of becoming a child of God. So Socinus, Episcopius, Grot., Hammond, Semler, Rosenmüller, al. And the R.-C. expositors, while they avoid this error, making the good works spoken of to be, as Lyra, “opera justitiæ infusæ, quæ datur cum gratia, per quam homo constituitur in quadam participatione supernaturali esse divini,” yet go equally wrong, in understanding γεγέννηται not as the statement of a past and abiding fact, but as the ground of a confidence as to the future: “habebit omnimodam fiduciam, quia iudici suo justo similis, imo ex ipso natus est, hoc est, ipsius filius et hæres est.” Corn.-a-lap.) III. 1—10.] The true and distinguishing signs of the children of God and the children of the devil. 1—3.] The foundation and source of all righteousness in us is, the essential righteousness of God. All our doing of righteousness is a mere sign that He has begotten us anew—that we are His children. And what great things are contained in this name—how precious treasures of faith, of hope, of love!

On this thought the Apostle now enters. He places the whole glory of the children of God before his readers. The being righteous as He is righteous, is the token of that new birth, and the measure of the life which began with it: the striving to perfect and mature this token, to fill up this measure, is an additional proof that a man is of God. 1.] Behold (as in John i. 29; xix. 5, does not express the Writer’s own astonishment, but directs the attention of those who are addressed: “commendat Apostolus his verbis magnum Dei beneficium,” Estius. But there immediately follows ἡμῖν, the communicative address, so that in fact the Apostle does in a manner include himself among those addressed in ἴδετε), what manner of (thus the E. V., literally and rightly. ποταπός, properly ποδαπός, originally meant, “of what country;” and occurs in this sense continually in the classics: e. g. Herod. vii. 218, εἶρετο . . . ποδαπός (or ὀποδ-) εἶη ὁ στρατός, al. Its derivation is matter of dispute: whether from δάπος, τάπος, which forms enter into δάπεδον, ἔδαφος, τόπος; see Valcknaer: or from ἀπό, as Buttm. Lexil. comparing ἀλλοδάπος, παντοδάπος &c., δ being inserted as in prodiere, prodesse. Then in later writers it came to signify “of what kind,” as e. g. in Demosth. p. 782, 8, τίς ὁ κύων καὶ ποδαπός; οἷος μὴ δέκνειν, al. The signification quantus seems never to have belonged properly to the word. It may of course be often included in qualis, as it undoubtedly is here: “what manner of” including “how great,” “how free,” “how precious”—in fact all the particulars which are afterwards brought out respecting this love: see ver. 16, ch. iv. 9, 16) love (is ἀγάπην here, joined as it is with the verb δέδωκεν, literally love itself, or does it import some gift, bestowal, or fruit of love? The latter (caritatis munus) is taken by Beza: and similarly, beneficium, or the like, by Socinus, Episcopius, Seb.-Schmidt, Grot., Est., Rosenm., Neander, al. But there seems no necessity for diverting the word from its proper meaning. As in ch. iv. 9, the proof of the love is that which is imported, not by the love itself, but by the verb joined with it; as by ἐφανέρωθη there, so by δέδωκεν here. So that in fact δέδωκεν, which has been the motive for these renderings, speaks, as Düsterd. observes, most decidedly against them. He quotes from Luther’s scholia, “Usus autem est Joannes singulari verborum pondere:

James) the Father (ὁ πατήρ, spoken here not, as some, of God in general, the whole three Persons in the blessed Trinity, but personally, of the Father, as distinguished from the Son, in whom we have received our adoption. Even the Socinian Schlichting has recognized this: "Nempe Pater ille Jesu Christi et consequenter omnium in Jesum Christum credentium, unus ille Deus, qui si Pater Jesu Christi non esset, nec Jesus Christus ejus Filius ille singularissimus, neque nobis tanta ejus ac vere paterna gratia unquam obtigisset") hath given (see above) unto us, that (how is ἵνα here to be taken? is it to be kept to its strong telic sense, indicating that our being called the children of God is the purpose of that gift of love just spoken of, or does it, as so often in St. John, introduce the purport of that love, stated in the form of an end to be gained by its manifestation? Lange, Lücke, De Wette, and Brückner keep the strong telic sense. "What great love," says Lücke, "hath the Father shewn us (viz. in sending His Son, ch. iv. 10), in order to make us children of God!" But the objection to this is, that thus a proof of the divine Love is hinted at in our verse which is not expanded, but is left to be gathered from elsewhere: and the purpose introduced by ἵνα becomes the secondary and remote subject of the sentence, whereas, from τέκνα θεοῦ taking up the preceding γενένηται, and being again taken up in verse 2, it is evidently the primary subject. The other meaning of ἵνα is taken by the ancient Greek expositors, so Ec., Thl., εἶδετε γὰρ ὅτι ἔδωκεν ἡμῖν τέκνα θεοῦ γενέσθαι τε καὶ κληθῆναι (λογισθῆναι Thl.). And this is not to confound ἵνα with ὅτι. Of the latter construction we have a plain example with ποταπός, in Matt. viii. 27: ποταπός ἐστιν οὗτος, ὅτι καὶ οἱ ἄνεμοι . . . ὑπακούουσιν αὐτῷ. There, the matter of fact is the ground of the wonderment expressed in the ποταπός—"What a man must this be, seeing that . . .:" whereas here the ground of the wonderment is in the result: "what manner of love . . . resulting in, proved by, our being, &c." The effect of the love, that at which it is aimed in its immediate bestowal (its ζῆσις), is, that we should be called children of God: its ultimate purpose (its ζῆσις) is another thing. Cf. vv. 11, 23, where we have the same construction) we should be called children of God (why has the Apostle rather used κληθῶμεν than δῶμεν? Probably to bring forward the title, the reality of which, notwithstanding its non-recognition by the world, he is about to assert immediately. It is not that καλεῖσθαι, as Baumg.-Crusius, = ἐξουσίαν ἔχειν γενέσθαι, John i. 12, so that the sense should be, "that we have a right to presume to call ourselves children of God," Neander: against this the aor. κληθῶμεν is decisive, signifying our reception of the title once for all, and identifying this reception with the gift of love spoken of above. In this definite reference to an actual bestower of the name, probably an allusion is made to such prophecies as that cited 2 Cor. vi. 18); and we ARE (so): for this cause the world doth not know (apprehend, recognize) us; because it did not know Him (viz. God: the Father. The insertion of καὶ ἐσμῆν appears to serve the purpose of bringing out the reality of the state conferred upon us with this title, in spite of any non-recognition of it by the unbelieving world. To those, as Lücke and De Wette, who regard the preceding ἵνα as telic, the clause has no meaning, and they at once reject it as a gloss. Had it been, it would surely have been καὶ δῶμεν, as the vulg. et simus. But in our rendering of the passage, καὶ ἐσμῆν is of the highest possible significance. On ἐσμῆν depends διὰ τοῦτο: and we ARE God's children; for this very reason, because we bear not the name only but the essence, the world knows us not: and then, as a reason for this ignorance following on this reality of our derivation from Him,—because it knew Him not. The reality of a believer's sonship of God, and his non-recognition by the world, are thus necessarily connected together. But Whom did the world not know, and when? αὐτόν here, by the very requirements of the logic of the passage, must be the Father, who not being recognized, neither are His children: τὸν υἰοθετήσαντα, as Ec.; Aug., Benson, al., understand Christ: “ambulabat et ipse Dominus Jesus Christus, in carne erat Deus, latebat in infirmitate.”

But this can only be, if we understand that the world rejected that revelation of the Father which was made by Christ His Son. And if we introduce this element, we disturb the strictness of the argument. It is the world's ignorance of God, considered (and this is the force, if it is to be pressed, of the aor. ἐγνώ) as one great act of non-recognition, disobedience, rebellion, hate (for all these are involved in St. John's οὐ γινῶναι, as their opposites in his γινώσκειν), which makes them incapable of recognizing, loving, sympathizing with, those who are veritably children of God: cf. ch. v. 1).

2.] Beloved, now are we children of God (the world recognizes us not: but our sonship is real: none the less real, that we ourselves know not our future condition in all its manifestation. So that the next member of the sentence is introduced not with an ἀλλά, but with a καί: the two are not contrasted, but simply put in juxtaposition as components of our present state. We are really sons of God, even now: and we look (this very word νῦν suggesting a future) for an inheritance in virtue of that sonship: it has not been yet manifested of what sort that inheritance shall be: thus much we know &c. Such seems to be the simple connexion, without any adversative particles expressed or understood), and it was never yet manifested (on any occasion: such is the force of the aor. And ἐφανερῶθη, as so often in St. John, and as in the next sentence, does not mean, made manifest to knowledge or anticipation,—for that it is, as asserted below: but, shewn forth in actuality, come to its manifestation) what we shall be (understand, in virtue of this our state of sons of God: to what new development or condition this already existing fact will lead. But we must take care not to fall into Grot.'s error, “quo modo futuri simus filii Dei:” for as Calov. rightly remarks, “non dantur gradus υἰότητος:” we are as truly, and in the same sense, children of God now, as we shall be then: but now (cf. Gal. iv. 1) we are children waiting for an unknown inheritance—then we shall be children in full possession of that inheritance. And hence, from the reality and identity of that sonship, comes what follows,—our certain knowledge, even in this absence of manifestation in detail, that our future condition will consist in likeness to Him. As Ec., τὸ γὰρ νῦν ἄδηλον φανερὸν γενήσεται, ἐκείνου ἀποκαλυπτομένου. ὅμοιοι γὰρ αὐτῶ ἀναφανέτες τὸ τῆς υἰοθεσίας λαμπρὸν παραστήσομεν. οἱ γὰρ υἱοὶ πάντες ὅμοιοι τῷ πατρὶ. We know (no contrast—see above: what we know of this τί ἐσόμεθα is this. There is not even a correction of the preceding as Düsterd.: the connexion is simply, “This future condition of ours hath never yet appeared: thus much we know of it.” οἶδαμεν, as always, of certain, well-assured cognition) that if it were manifested (viz. the τί ἐσόμεθα; this φανερωθῆ takes up again the former one. So Didymus (Aug. is quoted on both sides by the Commentators, but he does not really commit himself on the point), Ec. (τὸ γὰρ νῦν ἄδηλον φανερὸν γενήσεται), Luther, Seb.-Schmidt, Socinus, Episcopus, Schlichting, Grotius, Spener, Bengel, Benson, Rosenm., Lücke, Sander, De Wette, Baumg.-Crus., Neander, Düsterd., Huther, and others: on the other hand, Bede, Calvin, Beza (and the E. V.: Tyndale and Cranmer had “it”), Aretius, Whitby, Calov., Estius, al., supply “He,” understanding Christ: appealing to St. John's well-known usage which we have in ch. ii. 28, and below in our ver. 5. But it may be replied, that in the former case the subject was plainly suggested by ἐν αὐτῶ in the latter actually expressed in ἐκείνος: whereas here the reference of the verb is no less plainly given by the preceding ἐφανερῶθη. Besides which, ἐκείνος in verse 5 clearly shews that the divine subject of these verses is not Christ but the Father. Estius and Lyra indeed seem to hold it possible to supply ὁ θεός as a subject to φανερωθῆ here, but not even themselves have propounded this for their own interpretation: indeed the former sets it aside, and the latter seems to be only paraphrasing when he says, “cum nobis se patrem ostenderit in possessione cælestis hæreditatis.” On the ἐὰν, hypothetical, see above, ch. ii. 28. As there, the φανερωθῆ is the futurus exactus: “on its manifestation:” and here the hypothesis, from the repetition of the verb, necessarily gains emphasis, almost = that, even if it were manifested,

. . . This consideration has an important bearing on what follows), we shall be (ἔσόμεθα taken up again from above, and the emphatic ὁμοιοὶ αὐτῷ corresponding exactly to τί above) like Him (God; as Ec. above, and most Commentators. See below), because (ὅτι must be kept firm to its causal meaning, and all the difficulties of the sentence met thus, not by explaining it away, as even Ec. (ἀλλὰ καί), Schol. ii. (ὅτε καί), Luther (et). Nor does it express merely the mode of the transformation, as Lyra. Still less must we, with Calvin ("neque enim docet similes ideo nos fore, quia fruemur aspectu, sed inde probat nos divinæ gloriæ fore participes, quia nisi spiritualis et cælesti beataque immortalitate prædita esset natura, ad Deum nunquam tum prope accederet"), Seb.-Schmidt ("Qui visurus est Deum sicuti est, eum oportet esse perfecte similem Deo"), and Socinus ("neque enim fieri potest ut quis ipsum Deum videat, . . . nisi ei similis aliquo modo . . . fuerit"),—and so even Huther, endorsing Calvin's statement, "ratio hæc ab effectu sumta est non a causa,"—reverse the causal connexion, and make the seeing Him as He is merely a proof that we shall be like Him (ὅτι = γάρ). Whatever consequences it may entail, it is philologically certain that the proposition introduced by ὅτι contains the real essential cause and ground of that which it follows) we shall see Him (God: see below) as He is (with St. John, the recognition and knowledge of God is ever no mere cognition, but the measure of the spiritual life: he who has it, possesses God, has the Father and the Son: becomes more and more like God, having His seed in him. So that the full and perfect accomplishment of this knowledge in the actual fruition of God Himself must of necessity bring with it entire likeness to God. And this is the part of the future lot of the sons of God which is certain. Because we shall see Him as He is,—which is taken for granted as a Christian axiom,—it of necessity follows that we shall be entirely like Him: ethically like Him: we shall behold, as Ec., δίκαιον δίκαιοι, ἀγνὸν ἀγνοί. The difficulty that no man can see God, is not in reality contained here, any more than it is in our Lord's "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." The word, however understood, has for its limit, that no created eye even in the glorified body can behold the Creator: that beyond its keenest search there will be glory and perfection baffling and dazzling it: but this incapacity does not prevent the vision, as far as it can reach, being clear and unclouded: being, to the utmost extent of which our glorified nature is capable, ὡς ἐστίν—a true and not a false vision of God. And if it be again objected that we seem to be thus confounding the ethial sight of God which is the measure of our likeness to God, with corporeal sight of Him in the resurrection body, I answer that in the realm where our thoughts are now employed, I cannot appreciate that distinction between ethial and corporeal. We are speaking of things which eye hath not seen, nor mind conceived: what a σῶμα πνευματικόν may imply, our ideas now do not enable us to conceive: but I suppose it must at all events be a body, all of whose senses are spiritually conditioned and attuned: that what τὰ φυσικά are to our bodies here, τὰ πνευματικά will be there: and feeling this, however little I may know of the details of the great fact, it removes from me all insuperable difficulty as to the ὀψόμεθα αὐτὸν καθὼς ἐστίν. "I know that in my flesh I shall see God," may not be the right expression in Job, but it is the expression of my hopes as a son of God: it is the one expression of a hope in which all other hopes culminate and centre. And every son of God knows, that for it ever to be fulfilled, he must be growing onward in likeness to Him, pure, even up into His purity: for in His light only shall we see light.

The literature of this verse would far surpass our limits, even in an abridged summary. It will be found in Düsterdieck's Commentary, vol. ii. pp. 56—82. One point only must be noticed before passing onward; the fact that several of the great interpreters understand αὐτῷ and αὐτόν of Christ. This has partly of course been occasioned by their supplying Christ as a subject to the verb φανερωθῆ above. Augustine has one of his most beautiful passages, explaining how at Christ's appearing, the impious shall see only formam servi, but we formam Dei. The whole view, however, does not satisfy the requirements of the passage. It is the τέκνα θεοῦ who are addressed: and the topic of exhortation is that they be righteous as God their Father is righteous. Christ is expressly introduced below in ver. 5 (see on ver. 3) by ἐκεῖνος. Augustine concludes with a burst of eloquence which describes just as well the true view of the vision: "Ergo visuri sumus quandam visionem, fratres, quam

3.] And every one that hath this hope (viz., that of being like Him hereafter) on Him (i. e. rested and grounded on God. In God, and grounded on His promises, is all our hope), purifieth himself (these words are not to be taken in any Pelagian sense, as if a man could of himself purify himself: "apart from me," says our Lord, "ye can do nothing." John xv. 5. The man who purifies himself has this hope, resting upon God. This mere fact implies a will to purify himself, not out of, nor independent of, this hope, but ever stirred up by, and accompanying it. So that the will is not his own, sprung out of his own nature, but the result of his Christian state, in which God also ministers to him the power to carry out that will in self-purification. So that Aug. who pleads strongly for free will here, is right when he says "castificas te, non de te, sed de illo qui venit ut inhabitet te." See 2 Cor. vii. 1, which is remarkably parallel; and 1 Pet. i. 21, 22. The idea of ἀγνίζειν is much the same as that of καθαρίζειν, ch. i. 9: it is entire purification, not merely from unchastity but from all defilement of flesh and spirit. "In the LXX, the word (ἀγνός) appears to be synonymous with καθαρός, being used for ἁγῆς and like words. Levitical purity of persons and things (Num. viii. 21, xxxi. 19, 23; 1 Chron. xv. 12), the pure life of the Nazarenes (Num. vi. 2, 3), the purity of God's word (Ps. xi. 7, xviii. 10), all these are expressed by ἀγνός, ἀγνίζειν &c. And correspondent to this is N. T. usage. The purity of the wisdom that cometh from above (James iii. 17), the purity of those who had to keep a vow (Acts xxi. 24, 26, xxiv. 18), the absence of moral stain in the Christian character generally, which includes above all things purity of heart (1 Pet. i. 22; James iv. 8; 2 Cor. vi. 6; 1 Tim. v. 22; cf. Phil. iv. 8; 1 Pet. iii. 2), and the particular purity of chastity (Tit. ii. 5; 1 Tim. iv. 12, v. 2; 2 Cor. xi. 2),—all these are rightly included in the name ἀγνεία." Düsterdieck), even as He is pure (Who is intended by ἐκεῖνος? Clearly below in ver. 5, Christ, from the facts of the case. But is it as clear here? Almost all the modern Commentators assume it. And certainly, first appearances are greatly in its favour: the usual rule requiring that ἐκεῖνος shall point to a third person as yet not spoken of in the context, and differing from αὐτός. The inference is also upheld by a first view of ch. ii. 6, where much the same expression is used, and used of Christ. But there are some weighty considerations against the view. First, it is the Father, of whom it is written, "Be ye holy, for (or, as) I am holy," 1 Pet. i. 15, 16; Levit. xi. 44, xix. 2; cf. also Matt. v. 48. Secondly, it would be very harsh thus to introduce a new subject, in the face of this Scripture usage. Thirdly, it would be against the whole spirit of the context: in which sonship of God and likeness to God are joined together, and the hopes belonging to the state are made motives for the duty. Fourthly, if it be asserted that Christ is our Pattern, in whom we see the Father's purity shewn forth; I answer that this would be perfectly intelligible, if allusion was made, as in ch. ii. 6, to some historical manifestation in our Lord's life (καθὼς ἐκεῖνος περιπάτησεν): but being as it is in the present tense, it refers to the essential divine attribute of purity: and if so, then to that attribute in its primary inherence in the Father. Fifthly, the usage of ἐκεῖνος with αὐτός does not at all require the change of persons, only a change of the phase of predication regarding the same person, and the throwing up into emphasis some new particular which is brought into view. See this discussed on 2 Tim. ii. 26, and consult also the note on ch. ii. 6, where it is very doubtful whether αὐτός and ἐκεῖνος do not refer to the same divine Person. For these reasons, I would interpret ἐκεῖνος here of the Father, in whom essentially abides this perfection of purity, and after continual increase of likeness to whom his sons, having the ultimate hope of being completely like Him, will be striving. In ver. 5 the case is otherwise: see there, and also on ver. 7). 4—10.] The irreconcilability of sin with the work of redemption, with communion with Christ, and with being born of God. So De Wette: and the passage seems thus to be well described. But the difficulty has been, to mark distinctly the connexion with the foregoing. In order to discover this, we must go back to the theme of the whole section of the Epistle, in ch. ii. 29: "If God is righteous, then every one that doeth rightousness, is born of Him." Hitherto the positive side of this position has been illustrated: the inseparability of birth-from-God and likeness-to-God. Now, the Apostle comes to treat its negative side: the incompatibility of sin with birth-from-God. And this he deals with essentially and in the ideal, as always. The whole is in the closest connexion with the foregoing, and is developed step by step with the minutest precision, as will be seen in the exegesis.

4.] In this verse we have ver. 3 taken up (cf. πᾶς ὁ ἔχων . . . πᾶς ὁ ποιῶν) ex adverso. There, God's essential purity formed a law, according to which the child of God, having hope of ultimate complete likeness to Him, purifies himself. Here we have it declared that the sinner goes counter to (this and all other) law: indeed the two terms, sin and lawlessness, are synonymous and convertible. Every one that committeth sin, also committeth transgression-of-law: and sin (abstract and in general) is transgression-of-law (abstract and in general). The assertion amounts to the identification of the terms, and the ἐστὶν amounts to "is equivalent to." If either of the words were anarthrous, it would become predicative of quality,—“is of the nature of”—as in θεὸς ἦν ὁ λόγος: both having the article, both are distributed logically, and the one is asserted to be co-extensive and convertible with the other. And from the nature of the foregoing clause, which was to declare the ἀνομία of sin, it would appear here also that we must take ἡ ἁμαρτία as the subject and ἡ ἀνομία as the predicate, not the converse.

This being so, what is it exactly that our verse asserts respecting these two things, sin, and transgression-of-law? First and obviously, no appropriation must be made, in this verse and throughout this passage, of ἁμαρτία to one kind of sin, whether it be mortal sin as distinguished from venial (so the R.-C. expositors, e. g. Estius, but hesitatingly, “loquitor præcipue de peccato mortali, quamquam et venalia sunt iniquitates quædam et legi divinæ alicui repugnant, et ab ingressu regni cœlestis ac similitudine Christi participanda remorantur, donec expurgata fuerint”), or notorious and unrepented sins, or sins against brotherly love (as Luther, and Aug. on ver. 9): “peccare contumaciter,” Aret.: “peccato dare operam,” Beza, Piscator: “peccare scientem et volentem,” Seb.-Schmidt, Spener. The assertions are all perfectly general, and regard, in the true root and ideal, every sin whatever. Every sin whatever then is a transgression of God's law: as indeed its very name implies: ἁμαρτάνειν being to miss a mark, and the mark being that will of God which is the νόμος and σκοπὸς to him who ποιεῖ τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ, ch. ii. 17. Ec. gives the meaning very well, except that he understands of the law of nature only, what ought to be understood of the law of God, the revelation of His will, in whatever way made: ἰστέον δὲ ὡς ἁμαρτία μὲν ἡ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ἀπόπτωσις ἐστίν, ἀνομία δὲ ἡ περὶ τὸν θετὸν νόμον πλημμέλεια. καὶ ταύτην ἔχουσιν ἀρχὴν ἐκάτερον τούτων, τὸ μὲν τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ἐκπτώσιν, τὸ δὲ τὴν περὶ τὸν θετὸν νόμον πλημμέλειαν. συμφέρονται δὲ ταῦται καὶ κατὰ ταῦτόν. ὁ τε γὰρ ἁμαρτάνων τοῦ κατὰ τὴν φύσιν καὶ ἐν τῇ φύσει ἀπέτυχε σκοποῦ. σκοπὸς γὰρ τῇ ἀνθρωπείᾳ φύσει τὸ κατὰ τὸν λόγον ζῆν, τῆς ἀλογίας πόρρω ἀφικισμένη. ὡσαύτως καὶ ὁ ἄνομος πλημμελεῖ περὶ τὸν ἐν τῇ φύσει δεδομένον νόμον, διαγινόμενος ἀκρατῶς, καλῶς οὖν ὁ μαθητὴς τοῦ κυρίου εἰς ταῦτόν ἀμφοτέρα περιέστησεν).

5.] Additional argument for the incompatibility of sin with the life of God's children; that He, Christ, in and by whom we have this adoption (John i. 12), and by being in whose likeness alone we can be perfectly like God, was manifested to take away all sins, being Himself sinless. And ye know (the Apostle assumes it as known by those who had an anointing from the Holy One and knew all things, ch. ii. 20) that He (now clearly Christ, from the context, which (see above on ἐκεῖνος, ver. 3) can alone decide the reference in each case) was manifested (viz. by His appearing in the flesh, and all that He openly and visibly did and taught in it, or may be known, by the Spirit, to have done and taught) in order that He may (might) take away (aor. “take away by one act and entirely.” The meaning, “take away,” and not “bear,” is necessitated here by the context. Sin is altogether alien from Christ. He became incarnate that He might blot it out: He has no stain of it on Himself. If we render ἔρη "bear," this coherence is lost. Of course this fact is in the background, that He took them away by bearing them Himself: but it is not brought out, only the antagonism between Him and sin. See, on the word, the note on ref. John) sins (τὰς ἀμαρτ., all sins, not merely certain sins. The object of his manifestation is stated not only categorically, but definitively. Compare the striking parallel Heb. ix. 26, εἰς ἀθέτησιν ἀμαρτίας διὰ τῆς θυσίας αὐτοῦ πεφανέρωται); and in Him sin is not (as His work, in being manifested, was, altogether to take away sin, so likewise is He himself free from all spot of sin. The καὶ serves to co-ordinate the last clause with the first, not to subordinate it, as many Commentators have supposed, and even Aug.: "In quo non est peccatum, ipse venit auferre peccatum: nam si esset et in illo peccatum, auferendum esset illi, non ipse auferret:" and Ec., τὸ καὶ ἀντὶ τοῦ διότι: and afterwards, ἵνα ὡς μὴ ἀμαρτίαν ποιήσας τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν ἔρη: so also Corn.-a-lap., Lorinus, Baumg.-Crus., Sander, Neander. This interpretation is confuted by the ἔστιν, which should have been ἦν: and by the following context, in which this fact of the sinlessness of Christ serves as the foundation for what is said, verse 6. The most palpable violations of the construction and sense are made by the rationalists, of whom Grotius may serve as an example: "præsens pro præterito: peccatum in eo non erat, nempe cum vitam mortalem viveret." Socinus, feeling that this could not be, tries to explain away peccatum, as meaning "non vitium aliquid in moribus," but the consequences of sin, "omnia mala, omnesque perpressiones, una cum ipsa morte," from which Christ is now (hodie) for ever free, "utpote beatissimus, et impatibilis atque immortalis." And strange to say, Calvin so far misunderstands what is here said as to write "non de Christi persona hic agit, sed de toto corpore. Quocunque vim suam diffundit Christus, negat amplius locum esse peccato." This would deprive ἐν αὐτῷ μένων, verse 6, of all its meaning as referring back to the ἐν αὐτῷ here, and make it merely tautological. It is only by holding fast here the personal reference to Christ in himself, that we keep the logical coherence between that verse and this: the reasoning from that which He is not, and cannot be, to that which they that abide in Him are not and cannot be). 6.] The connexion see above. Every one that abideth in Him (μένει ἐν αὐτῷ is not to be weakened down, with Semler, Episcopus, al., by any rationalistic interpretation as "credere in Christum," "Christi discipulum esse;" still less as Ec., does ἀνευδότως τὰς ἀρετὰς μετιῶν express ὁ ἐν αὐτῷ μένων. Grot. is better this time,—"qui vero amore Christo conjungitur;" but this is not enough. This a man might be to an earthly friend: but could not be said ἐν αὐτῷ μένειν. See the sense expanded in the note on ch. ii. 24. Nothing short of personal immanence in the personal Christ will satisfy the words: a living because He lives, and as receiving of His fulness) sinneth not (nor again is this to be tamed down, as has been done by far more and better interpreters than in the last case, by making it mean "does not persist in sin;" so Luther, "does not allow sin to reign over him"—so Hunnius: and similarly Socinus, Episcopus, Calvin, Beza, the Schmidts, Calov., J. Lange, Bengel ("bonum justitiæ in eo non separatur a malo peccati"), Sander, al. Against all such the plain words of the Apostle must be held fast, and explained by the analogy of his way of speaking throughout the Epistle of the ideal reality of the life of God and the life of sin as absolutely excluding one another. This all the best and deepest Commentators have felt: so Augustine and Bede, "in quantum in ipso manet, in tantum non peccat." The two are incompatible: and in so far as a man is found in the one, he is thereby separated from the other. In the child of God is the hatred of sin; in the child of the devil, the love of it; and every act done in virtue of either state or as belonging to either, is done purely on one side or purely on the other. If the child of God falls into sin, it is an act against nature, deadly to life, hardly endured, and bringing bitter repentance: it is as the taking of a poison, which if it be not corrected by its antidote, will sap the very springs of life. So that there is no real contradiction to ch. i. 8—10, ii. 2, where this very falling into sin of the child of God is asserted and the remedy prescribed. The real difficulty of our verse is in that which follows); every one that sinneth hath not seen Him, neither hath known Him (here it seems to be said that the act of sinning not only "in tantum" excludes from the life in God and Christ, but proves that that life has never existed in the person so sinning. That this cannot be the meaning of the Apostle, is evident from such passages as ch. i. 8—10, ii. 2, and indeed from the whole tenor of the Epistle, in which the νῦν τέκνα θεοῦ ἐσμέν occurs in combination with μηδεὶς πλανάτω ὑμᾶς and the like: whereas if the above view were correct, the very fact of πεπλανῆσθαι not only would cause them to cease from being τέκνα θεοῦ, but would prove that they never had been such. If then this cannot be so, what meaning are we to put upon the words? First observe the tense in which the verbs stand: that they are not aorists but perfects: and that some confusion is introduced in English by our perfect not corresponding to the Greek one, but rather partaking of the aoristic sense: giving the impression "hath never seen Him nor known Him:" whereas the Greek perfect denotes an abiding present effect resting on an event in the past. So much is this so, that ἔγνωκα, and many other perfects, lose altogether their reference to the past event, and point simply to the abiding present effect of it: ἔγνωκα is the present effect of a past act of cognition, = "I know." In the Greek perfect, the present predominates: in the English perfect (and in the German still more), the past. Hence in very many cases the best version-rendering of the Greek perfect is by the English present. And so here, without for a moment letting go the true significance of the tense, I should render, if making a version, "seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him." But manifestly such an interpretation would be philologically insufficient, and would only be chosen as the less of two evils, and as bringing out that side of the Greek perfect which, besides being the prevalent cue, is less liable to mistake than the other. In exegesis, we must take in not merely the absence of such sight and knowledge in the present state of the sinner, but the significance of such present failure as regards the past: that his sight and knowledge are so far annulled as to their validity and reality. In fact, we get to much the same declaration as that in ch. ii. 19, εἰ ἐξ ἡμῶν ἦσαν, μεμενήκεισαν ἂν μεθ' ἡμῶν: and their very going out shewed that they were not (all are not) of us: so here: the cutting off by an act of sin of the sight and knowledge of Christ, shews, and shews in proportion as it prevails, unreality in that sight and knowledge.

As regards the relation of the words themselves, ἑώρακεν and ἔγνωκεν; some, with whom Düsterd. in the main agrees, hold that there is no perceptible difference: but that the latter word fixes and specifies the necessarily figurative meaning of the former: οὐδέ being simply copulative (= οὐτε). Lücke would understand ὄρα of knowledge obtained by historical information, which matures and completes itself into γινώσκειν (edn. 3); taking οὐδέ also merely as copulative. But this seems hardly according to St. John's practice, who uses ὄρα either of bodily sight (John i. 18, 1 John i. 1, &c., &c.),—or of an intuitive immediate vision of divine things, such as Christ has of the Father and heavenly things (John iii. 11, 32, vi. 46, viii. 38),—or of spiritual intuition gained by knowledge of Christ and the divine life (John xiv. 7, 9; 3 John 11)· and there can be little doubt that this last is the meaning here: as Sander; and thus οὐδέ will retain its proper exclusive and climacteric force: ὄρα is a further step than γινώσκειν: a realization of Christ's personality and of the existence of heavenly things which is the result of spiritual knowledge: and thus the sinner "hath not seen Him, nor yet known Him". 7, 8.] The contrast is again stated, and introduced by a solemn warning not to be misled respecting it: and, as usually in St. John's repetitions, a new feature is brought in, which the following verses take up and further treat: viz. ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν. 7.]

Little children, let no one deceive you (it does not seem that any particular false teacher is here in St. John's view; but he alludes to all who would sever ethical likeness to God from the Christian life): he that doeth righteousness (τὴν δ., perhaps as being abstract, but more probably because the righteousness spoken of is but one, and that God's: the righteousness which is His) is righteous, even as He (here apparently, God, notwithstanding the apparent parallel of Ἰησοῦν χριστὸν δίκαιον in ch. ii. 2: for we are by this saying, as by that in verse 3,—where see note,—referred back to the great Source of our spiritual birth, ch. ii. 29, and our likeness to Him insisted on: ὁ ποιῶν τὴν δικαιοσύνην ἔγνωκεν τὸν δίκαιον, καὶ δίκαιός ἐστιν ὡς καὶ ἐκεῖνος δίκαιός ἐστιν, τούτῳ τὴν ὁ θεός) is righteous.

This verse has absolutely nothing to do with the sense which the R.-Cath. expositors have endeavoured to extract from it, “adversus hæreticos hodiernos, simili ratione populum seducentes, cum negant per bona opera quemquam justum esse coram Deo,” Est., and so Lyræ, Corn.-a-lap., and Tirinus. But this is altogether to invert the proposition of the Apostle, who is reasoning, not from the fact of doing good works to the conclusion that a man is righteous, but from the hypothesis of a man’s being a child of God, born of Him and like Him, to the necessity of his purifying himself and doing righteousness. And in doing this, he ascribes the ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην to its source, and the ποιεῖν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν to its source: the one man is of God, the other is of the devil. As Luther well says (in Düsterd. h. l.), “good works of piety do not make a good pious man, but a good pious man does good pious works. . . . Fruits grow from the tree, not the tree from fruits”.)

8.] Contrast to ver. 7: cf. ὁ ποιῶν . . . ὁ ποιῶν: but here by the necessity of the case, when a positive assertion comes to be made respecting the sinner, the new element ἐκ τ. διαβ. ἐστίν is introduced: see below. He that doeth sin is of the devil (notice first ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, as indicative not so much of individual acts as of a state, corresponding to ὁ ποιῶν τὴν δικαιοσύνην. And then ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν must not be rationalized away, as is done by those who deny the personal existence of the devil. It is the distinct opposite correlative of ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν (ver. 10 al. freq.), and implies a personal root and agency just as much as that other does. But again, it does not imply any physical dualism on the part of the Apostle. “Neminem fecit diabolus,” says Aug. h. l. Tract. iv. 10, 11, vol. iii. p. 2011, “neminem genuit, neminem creavit; sed quicunque fuerit imitatus diabolum, quasi de illo natus, fit filius diaboli, imitando, non proprie nascendo . . . Omnes peccatores ex diabolo nati sunt, in quantum peccatores. Adam a Deo factus est; sed quando consensit diabolo, ex diabolo natus est, et tales omnes genuit qualis erat. . . .” And below, § 11, “Ergo duas natiuitates attendite, Adam et Christi. Duo sunt homines, sed unus ipsorum homo homo, alter ipsorum homo Deus. Per hominem hominem peccatores sumus, per hominem Deum justificamur. Natiuitas illa deiecit ad mortem, ista natiuitas erexit ad vitam: natiuitas illa trahit secum peccatum, natiuitas ista liberat a peccato: ideo enim venit Christus homo, ut solueret peccata hominum.” Origen (in Joan. tom. xx. 13, vol. iv. p. 325 D) remarks that ἐστίν is said ἐπὶ τοῦ ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου, not ἐπὶ τῶν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, and on the other hand γεγεννημένος is said ἐπὶ τῶν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, not ἐπὶ τῶν ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου. This must not be urged too far, seeing that St. John does speak of εἶναι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, e. g. ch. v. 19, and places over against one another the τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ and the τέκνα τοῦ διαβόλου ver. 10: besides which, the devil is said to be ὁ πατήρ of the unbelieving (John viii. 44). All that we can say is, that the two are not strictly correspondent: that Origen’s latter assertion is true—we have no γεγεννησθαι ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου. In the case of the children of God, there is a definite time, known to Him, when they passed from death unto life (ch. ii. 29, iii. 14, v. 11; John i. 12, iii. 3 ff., v. 24, &c.): from which their new life unto God dates: but there is no such point in the life of those who are the children of the devil: no regeneration from beneath corresponding to that from above: the natural life of men is not changed by seed of the devil as it is by seed of God. Rather may we say, that in those who are of the devil this latter change has never taken place. Since sin has come to reign in the world by man’s sin, our natural birth, which is properly and essentially a birth from God, a creation by the eternal Word, has become a birth from the devil: so that it is, as Bengel expresses it, “corruptio, non generatio,” and there is no trace of a physical dualism in St. John’s doctrine: nay, the idea is at once precluded by the fact that according to the Apostle (John i. 12) those who are children of God have become so from having been children of the devil. See this expounded, as usual, in Düsterd.’s note, from which much of the above is gathered): because the devil sinneth from the beginning (= 'sinned in the beginning, and has never ceased to sin since:' as Bede: "cum præmitteret 'ab initio,' subjunxit verbum præsentis temporis 'peccat:' quia ex quo ab initio cepit diabolus peccare, nunquam desit.") But the question meets us, what is ἀπ' ἀρχῆς? Bede, al., understand it of the beginning of all creation: "neque enim dubitandum est inter primas creaturas angelos esse conditos; sed cæteris ad laudem Creatoris gloriam suæ conditionis referentibus, ille qui primus est conditus, mox ut altitudinem suæ claritatis aspexit, contra conditorem cum suis sequacibus superbus intumuit, perque eandem superbiam ex initio peccans, de archangelo in diabolum est versus." Many Commentators, to avoid all chance of dualism, make it mean not from the time of his creation, but from that of his fall: so Estius, understanding the ἀρχή of the beginning of our world: "statim a mundi creatione diabolum peccasse, cum prius nullum esset in mundo peccatum:" Calvin, "nihil aliud vult Johaunes, quam diabolum statim a creatione mundi fuisse apostatam." But again, others suppose the term to mark the beginning of the devil's own apostasy: so Bengel, "ex quo diabolus est diabolus," Sander, al. And lastly, Lücke, De Wette, Brückner, Düsterd., Neander, take it with Seb.-Schmidt, "ab initio τοῦ peccare," from the time when any began to sin. And this seems, when we compare John viii. 44, to be the true interpretation. He has ever been the depository, as it were, of the thought and the life of sin: the tempter to sin: the fountain out of which sin has come, as God is the fountain out of which has come righteousness. See on this subject, my Sermons on Divine Love, Sermon v. pp. 68 ff., "the First Sinner;" and Sartorius, "Lehre von der heiligen Liebe," i. pp. 115 ff.). To this end was the Son of God manifested (viz. in His incarnation, pregnant with all its consequences), that He might destroy (do away, break up, pull down: see reff.: of a building, or a law, or an organized whole) the works of the devil (what are these? Clearly, in the first place, works whereof the devil is the author: not as Baumg.-Crus., merely devilish works. And then, are we to include in the list not only sins, which manifestly belong to it, but also the consequences of sin, pain, sorrow, death? The fact would be true if we did: for Christ hath abolished death (2 Tim. i. 10): and Estius's objection need not have any weight with us, "mors peccatum non est, sed pena peccati, Deum habens auctorem. . . . Destruitor mors per Christum, non quod ipsa sit opus diaboli sed quod ex opere diaboli justo Dei judicio subsecuta:" for even thus considered, it would be implicitly one of those works. But the context seems to require that we should at all events keep death and the results of sin in the background, as no mention is made of them here, and sinful works are clearly in the Apostle's mind. These works the whole φανέρωσις of Christ went directly to nullify: more especially His Death, in which His power over Satan reached its highest point,—the bruising of His heel, in which He bruised the Enemy's head:—for it was in that, that He won for us that acceptance which is sealed by His glorification, and in virtue of which the Holy Spirit is given us, of whose work in us it is said that we πνεύματι τὰς πράξεις τοῦ σώματος θανατοῦμεν, Rom. viii. 13).

9, 10.] The contrast taken up again, and from the converse: he that is born of God cannot sin: he that does not righteousness, is not of God: i. e. is a child of the devil. Then we have the usual new particular, to give the transition note to that which is to follow,—including in this last category him that loveth not his brother. Every one that is begotten of God, doeth not sin (the meaning of this declaration has been treated of above, ver. 6. Here we meet it in its barest and plainest form—the two states, being begotten of God, and sin, absolutely excluding one another), because His seed abideth in him (i. e. because that new principle of life from which his new life has unfolded, which was God's seed deposited in him, abides growing there, and precludes the development of the old sinful nature. So the majority of the better expositors, defining somewhat differently, when they come to explain in detail this germ of spiritual life: Ἐε.,—ἦτοι (1) τὸ πνεῦμα ὃ διὰ τοῦ χαρίσματος ἐλάβομεν, . . . ἢ (2) καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ χριστός, ὃς ἐνοικῶν ἐν τοῖς πιστοῖς ποιεῖ αὐτοὺς υἱοὺς θεοῦ: Severus in Cramer's Catena, ἢ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος ἐπιφοίτησις δι' ἧς ἀνεγεννήθημεν: so (1) Lücke, Düsterd.;

—“ Spiritus sanctus et virtus ejus,” Calvin, Beza; “ gratia,” Lyra, Tirinus, Corn.-a-lap.; “ nativitas spiritualis,” Estius, Luther; “ vires regenerationis quæ a Spiritu sancto fit,” Seb.-Schmidt; “ the power of the divine life,” De Wette (= τὸ πν. τοῦ θ.), Baumg.-Crus., Neander, Erdmann, De W.; “ the spirit of man new begotten by the Spirit of God, in contrast to the flesh,” Sander. Some of the ancients understood it of the word of God, as in the parable of the sower, Matt. xiii. 3 ff. So Clem. Alex. (but not as exegesis on this passage: at least if the passage in Strom. i. 1. 1, p. 317 P be meant,—ὁ Σαλομῶν (Prov. ii. 1) . . . σπειρόμενον τὸν λόγον κρύπτεσθαι μὴ γίνῃ καθάπερ ἐν γῆ τῇ τοῦ μαθηάοντος ψυχῆ, καὶ αὐτῇ πνευματικῇ φυτεία), Aug. (Tract. v. § 7, vol. iii. p. 2016, “ Semen Dei, id est, verbum Dei: unde dicit apostolus, Per evangelium ego vos genui, 1 Cor. iv. 15 ”), Bede (h. 1.), Luther (1), Spener, Grotius, Calov., Bengel, Benson, Whitby, Socinus, Schlichting, Rosenmüller, al. This last interpretation has been impugned by all the moderns, but I cannot see that they have made good their objection: the force of which, as stated by Huther and Düsterd., amounts to this; that the word of God is not so much the Seed, as the means whereby the begetting to the new life takes place (“ das Mittel der Erzeugung des neuen Lebens,” Huth.). But whether we regard the generation of plants, or animal procreation, which latter is more in question here, what words can more accurately describe the office of the seed, than these? and what is the word of God but the continually abiding and working seed of the new life, in the child of God? Nay, it seems to be that exactly of which we are in search: not the Holy Spirit, the personal agent; not the power of the new life, the thing begotten; but just that which intervenes between the two, the word, the utterance of God—dropt into the soul of man, taking it up by divine power into itself, and developing the new life continually. This is in the most precise and satisfactory sense the σπέρμα τοῦ θεοῦ: and on this all Scripture symbolism is agreed: cf. 1 Pet. i. 23, James i. 18. In fact the very passage which is the key to this, is John v. 38, τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἔχετε ἐν ὑμῖν μένοντα. Nor should any exception have been taken by Huther and Düsterd. to the comparison with the parable of the Sower (“ wie viele älttere Ausleger mit ungeschickter Vergleichung von Matt. xiii. 3 ff.,” Düsterd.), for though the attendant circumstances of generation are different, the analogy is the same.

There is a novel and extraordinary rendering proposed by Bengel, who, after explaining σπέρμα by “ verbum Dei cum sua virtute,” says, “ vel potius sic: Semen Dei, i. e. is qui natus est ex Deo, manet in Deo. σπέρμα, natus. Tales sunt vere σπέρμα γνη, semen Dei: Mal. ii. 15.?”—and adopted by Sander,—see above. This hardly needs refutation: we can only say that any one who can persuade himself that σπέρμα αὐτοῦ, anarthrous, and loco subjecti, can mean ὁ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ γεγεννημένος, has, both philologically and exegetically, much yet to learn.

The reason of this absence of the article is plain: the seed is thought of not individually, but categorically: q. d., “ because seed of His abideth in him ”; and he cannot sin (there is no climax in καὶ οὐ: if there is any, it rests entirely with δύναται. No explaining away of this declaration may be attempted, as is done by Corn.-a-lap., who understands it of deadly sin; by Aug. and Bede, who confine the ἀμαρτάνειν to the violation of brotherly love: or as Grot. “ res de qua agitur aliena est ab ejusmodi ingenio.” The Apostle is speaking not only of the ideal, but of the real state of those born of God: drawing the strongest possible contrast between the life of God and the life of sin, as excluding one another absolutely. And there is no contradiction between what is here said and ch. i. 8, 9; nay, rather that passage shews, by the strong desire to be cleansed from all sin, which it assumes, the same incompatibility as is here insisted on), because he hath been begotten of God (almost all the expositors, from the first times until now, make this ὅτι more or less represent ἐφ’ ὅσον, in quantum, quam diu, quatenus, and the like. And where τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ μένειν was the matter to be measured, as in ver. 6, no doubt this might be: but τὸ ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ γεγεννηθῆναι is an absolute fact, to which an ἐφ’ ὅσον refuses to be applied: it either has been, or it has not been: its effect either endures, or does not endure. And in this last consideration lies the true solution of the difficulty. As before in ver. 6, so now, the Greek perfect is especially to be held firm in our exegesis. The Apostle does not say οὐ δύναται ἀμαρτάνειν, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐγεννήθη: this would testify to a past fact, once for all occurring, without any reference to its present permanence: but he has said ὅτι ἐκ τ. θ. γεγέννηται,—because he has abiding in

him that his birth from God. So that the ἐφ' ὅσον explanation, though falling far short of the real meaning, has at least a feeling after the truth of the Apostle's assertion in it. The abiding force of this divine generation in a man, excludes sin ("qui eam indolem retinebit, non peccabit," as Grotius, thus far right): where sin enters, that force does not abide: the γεγεννησθαι is in danger of becoming a γεννηθῆναι, a fact in the past instead of a fact in the present: a lost life, instead of a living life. And so all such passages as this, instead of testifying, as Calvin would have this one do ("Johannes non solum docet quam efficaciter agat semel Deus in homine, sed elare affirmat, Spiritum suum gratiam in nobis ad extremum usque persequi, ut ad vitam novitatem inflexibilis perseverantia accedat"), to the doctrine of final perseverance of the regenerate, do in fact bear witness to the very opposite: viz., that, as the Church of England teaches, we need God's special grace every day to keep us in the state of salvation, from which every act and thought of sin puts us in peril of falling away. Jerome, advers. Jovin. ii. 1, vol. ii. p. 321, quotes Jovinian as maintaining, from this verse, "eos qui fuerint baptizati a diabolo non posse tentari: quicunque autem tentati fuerint, eos aqua tantum et non spiritu baptizatos;" which view Lücke ascribes to his desire, in a spirit of ethical reform, to bring back men's minds to the fundamental and ideal contrasts of Scripture itself. But surely in such a case, "a diabolo non posse tentari" was rather beyond the mark.

Before leaving this important passage, I must quote Düsterdieck's concluding remarks. "The difference between the older and more modern expositors (as Lücke, Rieckli, De Wette, and Neander) lies in this, that the former are more anxious to moderate the details of the Apostle's sentiment, and to tone down his assertion to the actual life of Christians, while the moderns recognize the full precision of the text as it stands, but then remind us that the ideal truth of the principle announced by St. John continually so to speak floats above the actual life of believers as their rule and aim, and that, in so far, the Apostle's saying finds in such actual life only a relative fulfilment. None however of all the expositors, who in any way has recognized the ideal character of St. John's view, has overlooked the fact, that even in the actual life of all that are born of God there is something which in full verity answers to the ideal words 'they cannot sin.' The children of God, in whom the divine seed of their eternal life abides, have, in reality, a holy privilege, as Steinhofer says,—they sin not, and they cannot sin, just in proportion as the new divine life, unconditionally opposed to all sin, and manifesting itself in godlike righteousness, is present and abides in them. Expositors of all theological tendencies, in all times, e. g. Didymus, Ec., Est., Schlichting, Luther, Hunnius, Seb.-Schmidt, Calov., Bengel, Joachim Lange, Rosenm., Lucke, Neander, &c. point to this, that the new life of believers, veritably begotten by regeneration from God, is simply incompatible with sin (ἀνακόλουθον καὶ ἀνάρμωστον, Didymus);—the life which essentially alienates the spirit from all sin (ἀνεπίδεκτον ἁμαρτίας τὸν νοῦν ἡμῶν ποιεῖ, Ec.), fills it with an irreconcilable hate against every sin, and urges it to an unceasing conflict against all unrighteousness. Luther excellently says, that a child of God in this conflict receives indeed wounds daily, but never throws away his arms or makes peace with his deadly foe. Sin is ever active, but no longer dominant: the normal direction of life's energies in the believer is against sin, is an absence of sin, a no-will-to-sin and a no-power-to-sin. He that is born of God has become, from being a servant of sin, a servant of righteousness: according to the divine seed remaining in him, or, as St. Paul says, according to the inner man (Rom. vii. 15 ff.), he will, and he can work only that which is like God,—righteousness, though the flesh, not yet fully mortified, rebels and sins: so that even in and by the power of the new life sin must be ever confessed, forgiveness received (ch. i. 8 ff.), the temptation of the evil one avoided and overcome (ch. v. 18), and self-purification and sanctification carried on").

10.] "Epilogus superioris argumenti," as Luther: with the insertion, in the latter half, of the new particular which is to form the argument of the next section. But this latter half belongs not only to that next section, but to this as well: its assertion πᾶς ὁ μὴ κ.τ.λ., is requisite for the carrying out fully of the ἐν τούτῳ, which at the same time looks backward and forward: backward, for the children of God have already been designated by the absence of sin, ver. 9: forward, for the children of the devil are designated below by the presence of sin in the second half of the verse. (fact, circumstance: in better than by, which gives the idea that this is the only sign) are manifest (it has been asked, to whom? Lücke, Sander, and Düsterd. say, to God's unerring eye alone. True, in the full and deep truth of the saying: but surely in degree and proportion to those whom the unction from the Holy One enables to know all things: in proportion as sin is manifested, or hatred and avoidance of sin is manifested, in a character. And the especial sign which follows, the sin of hate, is one which is plainly open to men's eyes, at least in its ordinary manifestations) the children of God and the children of the devil (see these expressions explained and vindicated from the charge of dualism, above, ver. 8. Cf. John viii. 44, Acts xiii. 10. Socinus remarks well, "Ex Apostoli verbis satis aperte colligi potest, quod inter filios Dei et filios diaboli nulli sint homines medii"): every one that doeth not righteousness (see ch. ii. 29: the difference here being that δικαιοσ. having no art. is more general, whereas it was τὴν δικαιοσ. there in reference to the δίκαιος which was predicated of God. It is natural that, in a recapitulation, the language should be more general, though the same thing is intended) is not of God (= is not a child of God. It may be observed that Orig., Tert., Cypr., al. read ὁ μὴ ὄν δίκαιος, which is edited by Lachmann), and he that loveth not his brother (see below, these words pointing on to the next section).

11—24.] Of brotherly love, as the sum and essence of δικαιοσύνη: as Christ's command (ver. 11): whereas in the world there is hate (12, 13): bound up with life, as hate with death (14, 15): finding its great pattern in Christ (16); to be testified not in word only but in deed (17, 18); as the ground of confidence toward God and the granting of our prayers to Him, being obedience to His will (19—22); which obedience consists in faith and love (23), and is testified to by the witness of His Spirit (24).

Before entering on ver. 11, the latter half of ver. 10 must be considered, as belonging properly, in its sense, to this section, though in arrangement inseparable from the last. The καί, which binds on the additional particular in the last clause, serves, as in ver. 5, to co-ordinate that clause with the foregoing: not in this case as excluded from the forementioned category, but as one particular, taken out from among the general category, and put into a co-ordinate position with it. And it is thus put, as being the most eminent, and most of the nature of a summary, and criterion, of the rest, of any of those graces which are necessarily involved in δικαιοσύνη. Aug. beautifully says, "Dilectio sola discernit inter filios Dei et filios diaboli. Signent se omnes signo crucis Christi: respondeant omnes Amen: cantent omnes Halleluia: baptizentur omnes, intrent ecclesias, faciant parietes basilicarum: non discernuntur filii Dei a filiis diaboli nisi caritate." And this love, thus constituted into "magnum indicium, magna discretio" (Aug.), is necessarily the family love of brother for brother within the limits of those who are begotten of God. Universal love to man is a Christian grace—but it is not that here spoken of: it neither answers the description of the ἀγγελία given in ver. 11, nor corresponds to the context here in general, the drift of which is that a test of our belonging to God's family is our love towards His children who are our brethren in that family: cf. ch. v. 1 ff. But, while there can be no doubt that this is the right understanding of the brotherly love here insisted on, we incur at once a formal difficulty in applying this meaning to the negative or exclusive side of the test. He who does not love his brother, has in strict fact no brother to love, for he is not a child of God at all. Hence we must understand, strictly speaking, τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ in this case as importing his hypothetical brother: him, who would be, were he himself a true child of God, a brother, and if so, necessarily beloved. That this love does not exist in him, demonstrates him not to be of God's family.

11.] Because (proof that absence of love of the brethren excludes from God's family) the message which ye heard from the beginning (the announcement which from the beginning of the preaching of the Gospel was made to you. ἀγγελία is not here = ἐντολή, though that which is cited is a commandment: but it is an ἐντολή conveyed in words and by messengers, and thus become an ἀγγελία is this (in all such sentences as this, the demonstrative pronoun which begins them is in reality the predicate, and often migl t in English be transposed to the end with advantage), that we love one another (on ἵνα, see note, ver. 1. It is impossible here, as there, to press the strong telic sense. The particle carries that combination of purpose and purport which we have so many times had occasion to notice: see c. g., note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13). 12, 13.]

See summary above: example of the first instance of the world's hate, by way of contrast. 12.] Not as Cain was of the wicked one and slew his brother (the construction is elliptic, or rather bra-chylogic, for nothing is to be supplied, as ἐσμέν (Sander), or ἄμεν ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, as Grot., Lücke, or diligamus, as Corn.-a-lap.; or a relative ὅς before ἐκ τ. πον. ἦν, as Beza and Socinus. The construction is just as in John vi. 58, and in the passage of Demosth. p. 415 A, which Winer adduces, οὐ γὰρ ἐκ πολιτικῆς αἰτίας, οὐδ' ὡσπερ Ἀριστοφῶν . . . ἔλυσε τὴν προβολήν. It would be simpler, οὐ καθὼς Κάϊν ἔσφαξε τὸν ἀδ. αὐτοῦ, ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ὄν.

 The word σφάζω properly means to kill by cutting the throat. It is said to occur in LXX and N. T. in the general sense of killing (so Düsterd.); but I cannot find any instances which will not bear the precise meaning as well as a more general one.
 It is remarkable however, that St. John only of N. T. writers uses the verb, and that in every place there is nothing requiring the proper sense: so that any inference from its occurrence here as to the manner of Cain's murder of Abel would be unsafe. In ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν we have a resumption of ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν from above, ver. 8: the word πονηροῦ being used probably on account of τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ πονηρὰ ἦν following. Observe, the ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν is the inference from that great proof which he gave of it by killing his brother: as is also the reason given in what follows: see below. So that here the assertion of his being of the wicked one is, as above, strictly ethical, and in no way physical or dualistic: "Cain erat filius non Dei sed diaboli, non gene-ratione, sed imitatione et suggestione," Corn.-a-lap.). And for what reason (reff.) slew he him? because his (own) works were wicked, and those of his brother righteous (it has caused some difficulty, that no mention of this ethical difference is made in the narrative in Genesis. It has been supposed, e. g. by Socinus, that the Apostle gathers it from God's differing acceptance of the offerings of the two: others, as Lyra, have called the ethical characters of the two the "occasio prævia," whereas the immediately exciting cause was the "occasio propinqua," of the murder. But properly considered, the Apostle's assertion here is only a "deductio ex concessio." Cain murdered his brother: therefore he hated him: and hate belongs to the children of the evil one,—classes him at once among those whose works are evil, and who hate those who, like Abel, are testified to (Heb. xi. 4) that they are of the children of God who work righteousness. Whatever might be the exciting occasion of the murder, this lay at the root —the hatred which the children of the devil ever bear to the children of God.

 The various legends, about Cain being the child of the serpent by Eve, and the characters of Cain and Abel, see in Lücke, edn. 3, pp. 317, 318, notes; and the former in Huther, p. 148). 13.] The connexion with verse 12 is close: the world (= the children of the devil) began so, and will ever go on as it began. Marvel not, brethren, if (no doubt is expressed by this εἰ. The hypothesis is set forth as actually fulfilled. See on this (originally Attic) use of εἰ after θαυμάζω, and like verbs, in Kühner, § 771. Among his examples are the following: οὐ δὴ θαυμαστόν ἐστιν εἰ στρατευόμενος κ. πονῶν ἐκένος . . . ἡμῶν μελλόντων . . . περιγίγνεται, Kühner ascribes the idiom to the Attic urbanity, which loved to give to speech a certain tinge of doubt and uncertainty) the world hateth you ("magis esset mirabile si diligenter eos," says Didymus. This verse is in close sequence on the example just given: Cain being taken as the prototype and exemplar of such hate).

14, 15.] See summary above on ver. 11. The connexion with the foregoing is very close. We learnt from ver. 10, that the love of the brethren is that which makes manifest the children of God and the children of the devil. And now again, having spoken of the hate of the world as a thing to be looked for, the Apostle brings up this sign as one tending to comfort the child of God, and shew him that, notwithstanding the world's hate, he has more to rejoice at than to fear from the fact: he is in life, they in death. We (ἡμεῖς, emphatic: we whom the world hates: we, as set over against the world) know (see above, ver. 2 al.: of certain knowledge) that we have passed over out of death into life (notice both times the articles after the prepositions, removing the nouns in this case out of the abstract, and giving them a concrete totality—the death, which reigns over the unregenerate: the life, which is revealed in Christ), because (ὅτι gives the ground and cause, not of the μεταβεβήκαμεν, but of the οἶδαμεν) we love the brethren (here distinctly, our Christian brethren: the term οἱ ἀδελφοί being that well-known one by which the body of Christians was represented. It is curious to follow Düsterdieck in his recension of the R.-Cath. and Socinian interpretations of this verse, and to see how they both run into one in wresting it to their own doctrines. First, the former begin with οἶδαμεν. Lyra would confine it to the Apostles; they knew "certitudinaliter, de hoc per divinam revelationem certificati;" but "si ad alios refertur, tum hoc scire accipitur pro probabili conjectura." Similarly Corn.-a-lap., Tirinus, and Estius (and I may add, Justiniani, even more strikingly; see below), denying that St.

John speaks of the certainty of assurance grounded on faith by the heretics, but "de certitudine morali et conjecturali, concepta ex testimonio bonæ conscientiæ, innocentiæ vitæ et consolatione Spiritus Sancti." (Justiniani's words are, "Recte ait (Didymus) nos disciplinabiliter id scire, ut formidinem quidem excludat, nihil tamen præter probabilitatem ex scientia offerat.") Estius predicates the knowledge indeed simply of Christians respecting all the "boni fideles," "quorum e numero nos esse singuli confidimus." On the other hand Socinus, remarking that the Scripture writers (and even our Lord Himself, for which he refers to the Beatitudes) often "hyperbolicis quibusdam amplificandæ rei causa loquutionibus utuntur," says of the text here proposed, "nam qui tali animo est præditus, vix fieri potest quin alias etiam Christianas qualitates habeat, quæ necessariæ sunt ad vitam æternam consequendam." This remark brings us on common ground with the R.-Catholics, who would do violence to the express perfect tense μεταβεβήκαμεν to suit their purpose. So even Didymus, "quoniam qui diligit fratres secundum Deum, ad vitam ex morte transit:" (so Justiniani, making brotherly love the instrument of our μετάβασις, instead of the sign of its having taken place: "amor itaque ex caritate a morte nos ad vitam traducit:" so Bede, who having explained rightly μένει ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ below, "quod in anima mortui omnes in hanc lucem nascimur," goes on to say, "in illa utique morte, . . . si fratres perfecte amaret, exurgere posset:" so Lyra,—"opera ex caritate facta sunt meritoria;" so the Socinians, e. g. Schlichting ("docet quid maxime Deum impellat, ut nos ex morte transferre velit in vitam æternam"), adding, as we might expect, "dicit transivimus, per enallagen temporis pro transibimus:" so the rationalists, Grotius ("juri ad rem sæpe datur nomen rei ipsius"), and Carpzov. It is very remarkable, that the fine exegetical tact of Estius causes him on the one hand to deliver a clear and decided interpretation of the verse as it really is ("non hic significatur meritum aut omnino causa dictæ translationis, quasi prius sit, diligere fratres, posterius autem, et effectus illius, transferri de morte ad vitam, id est, justificari.

Nam ex dilectione fraterna vel effectū et signo cognoscimus, nos de morte ad vitam translatos esse: et quantum de illa certi sumus, tantum et de isto”), while his doctrinal bias leads him, a few lines after, to strike out the whole of this sound exposition by saying, “Veruntamen etsi dilectio Dei et proximi justificationem nostram totam, cujus initium est a fide, nec mereatur, nec præcedat, sed sub ea comprehendatur tanquam pars ejus, impetrat tamen remissionis gratiam, juxta verbum Domini Luc. 7, Remittuntur ei peccata multa quoniam dilexit multum: sed et augenda justificationis est causa, ut qui justus est, opera caritatis exercendo justificetur adhuc, Apoc. ultimo.” I have not considered it beside my purpose to spend even a long note on recounting the above interpretations. It may conduce to a right estimate of the doctrines of men and churches, and put younger Scripture students on their guard, to see the concurrent habits and tendencies of interpreters apparently so opposite. When Pilate and Herod are friends, we know what work is in hand. But as a conclusion, I will quote the clear and faithful exposition of a greater and better man: “Quid nos scimus? quia transivimus de morte ad vitam. Unde scimus? quia diligimus fratres. Nemo interroget hominem: redeat unusquisque ad cor suum: si ibi invenerit caritatem fraternam, securus sit quia transit a morte ad vitam. Jam in dextera est: non attendat quia modo gloria ejus occulta est; cum venerit Dominus, tunc apparebit in gloria. Viget enim, sed adhuc in hyeme: viget radix, sed quasi aridi sunt rami: intus est medulla quæ viget, intus sunt folia arborum, intus fructus: sed æstatem expectant.” Aug. in 1 Joan. Tract. v. § 10, vol. iii. p. 2017): he that loveth not (there is this time no qualifying object, as τὸν ἀδελφόν: the absence of love from the character is the sign spoken of. τὸν ἀδελφόν is right enough as a gloss, but the Apostle’s saying is more general), abideth in death (ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ: on the art., see above: in that realm of death, in which all men are by nature: see Bede, quoted above. Here again, the absence of love is not the reason, why he remains in death; but the sign of his so remaining. The μετάβασις has not passed upon him. The words have no reference to future death any further than as he who is and abides in death, can but end in death: “notandum quod non ait qui non diligit, venturus est in mortem, quasi de pœna perpetua loqueretur, quæ restat peccatoribus in futurum: sed ‘qui non diligit,’ inquit, ‘manet’ in morte.” Bede. 15.] Every one that hateth his brother is a manslayer (in these words, (1) the ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν which preceded is taken up by πᾶς ὁ μισῶν: shewing, as most Commentators have remarked, that the two are identical: the living spirit of man being incapable of a state of indifference: that he who has banished brotherly love has in fact abandoned himself to the rule of the opposite state. In the ethical depth of the Apostle’s view, love and hate, like light and darkness, life and death, necessarily replace, as well as necessarily exclude, one another. He who has not the one, of necessity has the other in each case. (2) He who hates his brother is stated to be an ἀνθρωποκτόνος. The example given, ver. 12, shewed the true and normal result of hate: and again in the Apostle’s ethical depth of view, as in our Lord’s own (Matt. v. 21 ff., 27 ff.), he who falls under a state, falls under the normal results of that state carried out to its issue. If a hater be not a murderer, the reason does not lie in his hate, but in his lack of hate. “Quem odimus, velle-mus perisse,” says Calvin. Some would make ἀνθρωποκτόνος mean, a destroyer of his own soul: so Ambrose (partly), precat. ad Missam: Lyra (not Corn.-a-lap., as Düsterd. implies), Tirinus. But this, as well as the view (Corn.-a-lap., al.) that it is the murder of his brother’s soul which is intended, “provocando cum ad iram et discordiam,”—errs by pressing the reference to the example of Cain above. Some again, as Sander, would interpret it by a reference to John viii. 44, understood as pointing to the ruin of Adam by the Tempter. But as Düsterd. remarks (referring to a paper on John viii. 44, by Nitzsch, in the Theolog. Zeitschrift, Berlin, 1822, Heft. 3, p. 52), far rather should we say that this passage throws back a light on that passage, and makes it likely that the case of Cain, and not that of Adam, is there referred to); and ye know that every manslayer hath not (is without the possession of) eternal life abiding in him (οἴδατε, viz. by your own knowledge of what is patent, and axiomatic in itself. We must not fall into the error of referring the saying to the future lot of the murderer, as Bede, "Etsi hic per fidem inter sanctos vivere cernitur, non habet in se perpetuo vitam manentem; nam ubi retributionis dies advenerit, cum Cain . . ., damnabitur:" it regards his present state, and is another way of saying that he μένει ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ, ver. 14. Eternal life, which abides in God's children, which is the living growth of the seed of God in them, is evidenced by love: if the very crown and issue of hate, homicide, be present, it is utterly impossible that this germ of life can be coexistent with it; can be firmly implanted and abiding (cf. John v. 38) in the man.

Socinus (and Corn.-a-lap.) gives the syllogism contained in these verses thus: "nullus homicida habet vitam æternam in se manentem: verum qui fratrem suum odit est homicida: ergo qui fratrem suum odit, non habet vitam æternam in se manentem. Hoc syllogismo probat Apostolus eum qui non diligit fratrem suum manere in morte"). 16—18.] Description and enforcement of true love.

"Exposui hactenus et probavi, quod dilectio fratrum verissima et optima nota sit discernendi filios Dei et filios diaboli. Sed ne quis hic loci vel scipsum decipiat, vel ab aliis decipiatur, . . . exponendum etiam erit, . . . quæ sit vera et christiana caritas." Seb.-Schmidt, in Düsterd. 16.] Example of true love in Christ, and enforcement of it on us.

In this (on ἐν τούτῳ, see above, ver. 10, and note, ch. ii. 3) we have the knowledge of (ἐγνώκαμεν, "we have arrived at and possess the apprehension of:" γνώσκειν implying knowledge as an act of the understanding proceeding on intellectual grounds. Here however it is used entirely within the sphere of the Christian life of union with Christ. None can understand true love as shown in this its highest example, but he who is one with Christ, and has felt and does feel that love of His in its power on himself. See note on ch. ii. 3) love (i. e. what love is: the nature of love true and genuine: "amoris naturam," Bengel; "veram indolem amoris," Rosenmüller, and Aug., "perfectionem dilectionis dicit, perfectionem illam quam commendavimus." And so most of the Commentators. Some have held to the insertion of τοῦ θεοῦ after ἀγάπην, which has hardly any authority (only one cursive ("52") vulg. arm-usc). So Beza, Socinus, Whitby, Grot., Seb.-Schmidt, Calov. And others, as Spener, Carpzov., Episcopus, though they do not read θεοῦ, yet would supply it, or χριστοῦ, in the sense of Rom. v. 8, John iii. 16. But there can be but little doubt that the other is the right view. The love of God to us is not that which would, as such, be adduced as a pattern to us of brotherly love; it is true that in the depth of the matter, all true love is love after that pattern: but in a passage so logically bound together it is much more probable that the term common to the two, Christ and ourselves, would be, not divine love, which as such is peculiar to Him, but love itself simply, that of which He has given the great example which we are to follow), that He (Christ, as the words beyond question shew) laid down His life for us (ψυχὴν τιθέναι, as "vitam ponere" in Latin, to lay aside life, to die; not as Grot., who in all the places where it occurs maintains that it is only "vitam objicere periculis," which would entirely encvert the Apostle's saying here. ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν carries in it and behind it all that we know of the nature of the death which is spoken of: but the vicariousness and atoning power of Christ's death are not here in consideration: it is looked on here as the greatest possible proof of love, as in John xv. 13. It is the very perversity of unsound reasoning to maintain, as Paulus (in Düsterd.), that because our imitation of Christ's example, insisted on below, cannot have the virtue commonly ascribed to his death, therefore his death had in reality no such virtue): and we (ἡμεῖς, emphatic: we on our part, as followers of Christ) ought on behalf of the brethren to lay down our lives (on ψυχάς, Socinus says well: "Non dicit nos debere animam ponere, quasi ut unus pro multis morti sit obstrictus, sed animas, quia singuli pro singulis mori debemus." The Apostle states the duty generally: and thus stated it is clear enough. As Christ did in pursuance of His love, so ought we to do in pursuance of ours, bound as we are to Him not by the mere force of an outward example, but by the power of an inward life. But naturally and necessarily the precept finds its application only in those cases where our Heavenly Father's will sets the offering of such a sacrifice in the course and pursuance of our brotherly love, which He has ordained. Of such an occasion the aor. θείναι gives perhaps a hint: not τιθέναι, as a habit of mind ever ready: but θείναι, once for all, on occasion given. It is not the place here to enter on, or even to enumerate, the various cases of conscience which casuists have raised as to the question, when a Christian ought to lay down his life for a brother. The subject will be found discussed in such commentaries as those of Corn.-a-lap., Justiniani, Estius, Episcopus; and a summary is given by Düsterdieck h. l.) 17.] But ("by the adversative connexion of ver. 17 with ver. 16 the Apostle marks the passage from the greater, which is justly demanded of us, to the lesser, the violation of which is all the more a transgression of the law just prescribed." Düsterd.) whosoever hath the world's sustenance (βίος, as in ch. ii. 16, and in reff., for that whereon life is sustained. Grotius quotes the classical proverb, βίος βίου δεόμενος οὐκ ἔστι βίος. Ec. and some others have misunderstood τὸν βίον τοῦ κόσμου as if it meant excessive wealth: Ec. even making τοῦ κόσμου a gen. of apposition: οὐ τοὺς βίου σπανίζοντας λέγω, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοὺς ὅλον τὸν κόσμον σχεδὸν ὑπαρξιν ἔχοντας πλούτου. And Piscator makes it mean "victus, cui acquirendo mundus est deditus." But there can be little doubt that most Commentators are right in explaining the expression to mean, with Beza, "mundanæ facultates," "les biens de ce monde;" as E. V., "this world's good"), and beholdeth (θεωρῇ gives more than the casual sight: it is the standing and looking on as a spectator: so that it ever involves not the eye only, but the mind also, in the sight: it is contemplari, not simply videre. So Chrys. in Joh. Hom. lxxv. 1, vol. viii. p. 405, οἶδεν ἢ γραφῇ ἐπὶ ἀκριβοῦς γνώσεως θεωρίαν λέγειν· ἐπειδὴν γὰρ τῶν αἰσθήσεων τραυτέρᾳ ἢ ὄψις, διὰ ταύτης αἰεὶ τὸν ἀκριβῆ παραύτησι γινώσιν. St. John is very fond of the word (reff.), and wherever it occurs, this its meaning may be more or less traced. There is then in this unmerciful man not merely the being aware of, but the deliberate contemplation of the distress of his brother) his brother having need, and shutteth up (by the slight addition of "up," we faintly represent the force of the Greek aor. κλείσῃ, as implying that the shutting is then and there done, as the result of the contemplation: not a mere constitutional hardness of heart, but an act of exclusion from sympathy following deliberately on the beholding of his brother's distress) his bowels (= his heart, the seat of compassion: as so often in the N. T. See reff., and Luke i. 78, 2 Cor. vii. 15, Phil. i. 8, ii. 1, Philem. 7, 12) from him (ἀπ' αὐτοῦ is pregnant, as in ch. ii. 28, "aversandi notione habens.") There is no Hebraism: nor is any supply such as ἀποστρεφόμενος wanted. κλείειν ἀπὸ is just as good Greek as κρύπτειν ἀπὸ, John xii. 36 al. As Düsterd. remarks, the fact that a man shuts up his heart against his brother, includes in it the fact that that brother is excluded from the heart thus shut up), how (can it be that; as in ch. iv. 20, πῶς δύναται ἀγαπᾶν;) doth the love of God (i. e. from the very express filling out of the thought in ch. iv. 20, "love to God;" not God's love to us. See also ch. ii. 5, where we have the same expression and reference to the love of God being in a man. The context indeed here might seem, as the mention of Christ's love to us has so immediately preceded, to require the other meaning; or at least, that of "the love whereof God hath set us a pattern;" and accordingly both these have been held: the former by Luther, in his second exposition, and Calov., the latter by Socinus and Grotius. But I see not how we can escape the force of the passages above cited) abide in him (Lücke and Düsterd. are disposed to lay a stress on the μένει here, thereby opening a door for the view that the love of God may indeed be in him in some sense, but not as a firm abiding principle; that at all events at the moment when he thus shuts up his bowels of compassion, it is not abiding in him. But this would seem to violate the ideal strictness of the Apostle's teaching, and the true sense rather to be, "How can we think of such an one as at all possessing the love of God in any proper sense?" giving thus much emphasis to μένειν, but not putting it in opposition to ἐστίν, as Lücke does; for it is, in the root, equivalent to it.

Here again, many questions of casuistry have been raised as to the nature and extent of the duty of almsgiving, on which it is impossible to enter here, and for which I must refer my readers as before. The safest answers to them all will be found in the Christian conscience enlightened by the Holy Spirit, guiding the Christian heart warmed by the living presence of Christ? 18.] Exhortation to true brotherly love: following naturally on the example of the want of it given in the last verse. Little children, let us not love with word nor yet with tongue, but (let us love) in deed and truth (there is some little difficulty in assigning these words their several places in the contrast. We may notice first, that the two former, λόγῳ and γλώσσῃ, are simple datives of the instrument, whereas the two latter are introduced by the preposition ἐν, denoting the element in which. The true account of the arrangement seems to be, that the usual contrast of λόγῳ and ἐν ἔργῳ is more sharply defined by the expegetic τῆ γλώσσῃ and ἐν ἀληθείᾳ: τῆ γλώσσῃ giving, by making the mere bodily member the instrument, more precisely the idea of absence of truth than even λόγῳ, and (ἐν) ἀληθείᾳ more definitely the idea of its presence than even ἐν ἔργῳ. Similar contrasts are adduced by the Commentators from the classics: especially from Theognis; e. g. 973 f., μή μοι ἀνὴρ εἴη γλώσσῃ φίλος, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἔργῳ χερσίν τε σπείδοι χρήμασί τ' ἀμφοτέρα: 63, ἀλλὰ δοκεῖ μὲν πᾶσιν ἀπὸ γλώσσης φίλος εἶναι: 96, ὅς κ. εἶπῃ γλώσσῃ λῶστα, φρονῆ δ' ἔτερα. As connected with the exhortation in this verse, I may cite the tradition reported by Jerome in his Commentary on Gal. vi. 10, vol. vii. p. 528 f.: "Beatus Joannes Evangelista cum Ephesi moraretur usque ad extremam senectutem, et vix inter discipulorum manus ad ecclesiam deferretur, nec posset in plura vocem verba contexere, nihil aliud per singulas solebat proferre collectas, nisi hoc: 'Filioli, diligite alterutrum.' Tandem discipuli et fratres qui aderant, tædio affecti, quod eadem semper audirent, dixerunt: Magister, quare semper hoc loqueris? Qui respondit dignam Joanne sententiam: Quia præceptum Domini est, et si solum fiat, sufficit"). 19—24.] See the summary at ver. 11. The blessed effects of true brotherly love as a test of the Christian state.

19, 20.] [And] in this (on ἐν τούτῳ, see above, vv. 10, 16. It here refers to what had gone before: viz. to the fulfilment of the exhortation in ver. 18, as the future shews: q. d., which thing if we do, This has been very generally acknowledged: some Commentators mentioning, but only to repudiate, the connexion with what follows, ὅτι ἐὰν κ.τ.λ. Some, as De W., refer ἐν τούτῳ back to vv. 10, 16; others, as Lücke, to ver. 14. But to whichever of these it is referred, the sense is much the same. The context which follows is best satisfied by taking it as above: see on ἐξ ἀληθείας ἐσμέν below) we shall know (on the future, see above. It is the result consequent on the fulfilment of the condition implied in ἐν τούτῳ. De Wette's idea, after Bengel, that the rec. γνωσκομεν has been altered to the future to suit the following future πείσομεν, is not to be thought of, in the presence of the common formula ἐν τούτῳ γνωσκομεν, ch. ii. 3, iii. 24, iv. (2, 6,) 13, v. 2. The prevalent form was adopted by the transcribers, regardless of the future following) that we are of the truth (ἐν τίνι: ἐν τῷ μή λόγῳ ἀγαπᾶν, ἀλλὰ ἔργῳ καὶ ἀληθείᾳ καὶ πῶς; ὁ γὰρ ἄλλο μὲν λέγων, ἄλλο δὲ ποιῶν, μὴ σύμφωνον ἔχων τῷ λόγῳ τὴν πρᾶξιν, ψεύστης ἐστὶ καὶ οὐκ ἀληθής. (Ec. But, true as this is, and self-evident, it does not reach the depth of the meaning: as of course do not the many rationalistic paraphrases which have been given: "congruere evangelio," Grot., Whitby, &c. To be ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας, is a different matter from to be truthful or true men. Estius approaches the meaning, understanding ἀλήθεια to be the truth of God in His promises, and so ἐκ τῆς ἀλ. ἐσμέν to mean "are of the number of the elect." Bede's interpretation, "ex veritate quæ Deus est," in which Lyra, Tinus, Calvin agree, is nearer still: but had the Apostle intended this, he surely would have written ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ. The Lutheran Commentators have come nearer still, making ἡ ἀλήθεια to be "verbum veritatis" by which we are begotten anew unto God: so Luther, Seb.-Schmidt, Calov., Spener, Bengel, Lücke, De Wette. But why stop at that which after all is itself ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας? Why not mount up to the ἀλήθεια itself, that pure and objective Truth which is the common substratum and essential quality of the Spirit Himself, of the Word, of those who are born of the Word by the Spirit? and thus Dürster., Huther, al.), and shall persuade our hearts before him (i. e. and in and by this same sign, shall still the questionings of our hearts before God, by the assurance that we are His true children. This meaning has been acquiesced in by almost all Commentators both ancient and modern.

Fritzsche alone maintains a different one:
"Et coram Deo, i. e. Deum intuiti et revertiti, animos nostros flectemus (viz. ad amorem vita factisque ostendendum), quia, si animus nos hujus officii prætermissi condemnet, quia major est, inquam, Deus animo nostro et omnia scit." He denies that πείσομεν is to be referred to ἐν τούτῳ, and, as above, interprets that by the consideration of God's greatness and omniscience we are to persuade our hearts to love in truth. This view is impugned and satisfactorily confuted by Lücke, on the following grounds: 1. that after so solemn an exhortation to brotherly love on the deepest grounds, it is not likely that the Apostle would subjoin another, grounded on less deep and more general motives: 2. that every thing said by way of a motive in ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ has been included in what has been said before:

3. (And this is the weightiest objection of all, enlarged on and pressed further by Dürsterdieck) in this case τὰς καρδίας here must denote the heart as the seat of the affections, whereas in ver. 20 ἡ καρδία
conscience. Whereas on the common view, καρδία is, throughout, the heart as the seat of the conscience, giving rise there to peace or to terror, according as it is at rest or in inquietude: nearly as Thl., πείσομεν τὴν συνείδησιν ἡμῶν, τούτο γὰρ βούλεται σημαίνειν διὰ τὰς καρδίας:— only that this view of the identity of the conscience with the καρδία is not correct.
St. John uses καρδία for the innermost seat of our feelings and passions: of alarm (John xiv. 1, 27), of mourning (xvi. 6), of joy (xvi. 22); it was into the καρδία of Judas that the devil put the intent of betraying the Lord (xiii. 2): and the καρδία here is the inward judge of the man,— whose office is, so to say, promoted by the conscience, accusing or else excusing (Rom. ii. 15). Then, as to πείσομεν, there is no need to give to the verb any unusual meaning. It does not mean "quiet" or "assure," except in so far as its ordinary import, "persuade," takes this tinge from the context. And so it is, in every instance cited by the Commentators for this unusual meaning: e. g. in Matt. xxviii. 14, Acts xii. 20, and reff.: in Jos. Antt. vi. 5, 6, where Samuel ὑπ-ισχυεῖται καὶ παρακαλεῖσιν τὸν θεὸν συγ-γῶναι περὶ τούτων αὐτοῖς καὶ πείσειν: in the passage in Plutarch, where one says ἀπολοίμην εἰ μὴ σε τιμωρησαίμην, and the other answers, ἀπολοίμην εἰ μὴ σε πέισαιμι.

It must be plain from what has been said, that the future πείσομεν is not, on account of ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ, to be taken as referring to the future day of judgment, as some (e. g. Benson, Lücke, De Wette) have done. In ch. iv. 17, which is in some respects parallel with this, that day is expressly named: whereas in our passage, an equally clear indication is given, by the parallelism of γινώσόμεθα and πεί-σομεν, that no such reference is intended. ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ is not, at His appearing, but, in His sight, as placed before His all-seeing eye: ὡς ὑπὸ θεῷ μάρτυρι, as (Ec., though misunderstanding the whole: see roga cor tuum . . . si persuademus cordi nostro, coram ipso persuademus”), Bede, Corn.-a-lap., Luther, Calov., Bengel, Neander, Huther, Sander, Erdmann, Düsterd. It may be remarked finally, that by ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ being thus put first, it has evidently the emphasis: and this is important for that which follows. 20.] takes up this matter of the persuading our hearts before God, and shews its true importance and rationale. This is carried on in the following verses, but is here and in ver. 21 placed as its ground. If our heart, ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ, judges us unfavourably—we may be quite sure that He knowing more than our heart does, judges us more unfavourably still: if our heart condemn us not, again ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ, judging and seeing in the light of His countenance, then we know that we are at one with Him, and those consequences follow, which are set forth in ver. 22.

But before arriving at this sense, there are several difficulties of no slight weight to be overcome. With these it will be best to deal, before translating the verse. Three principal questions must be answered: 1. What is the first ὅτι? 2. What is the second ὅτι? 3. What is the meaning of μείζων? 1, 2. Some monstra of exegesis must first be eliminated. It has been tried to make ὅτι ἐάν = ὅταν, “whenever.” For this is quoted Sam. Andreū, of whom I can discover nothing. This of course is impossible. Equally impracticable are the endeavours to alter the text; by striking out the 2nd ὅτι as Grot., or making this one into ἔτι (H. Stephanus, Pricæus, Piscator). Again it is quite out of the question to supply before the second ὅτι, “eheu nobis,” as Episcopius,—“scimus, aut scire debemus,” as Calov., al. Of other interpretations, the first requiring notice is that upheld by De Wette, and pronounced the only tenable one by Brückner, which would make the second ὅτι independent of the first, and regard it as containing the reason of the final clause, καὶ γινώσκει πάντα. The objection to this is, not the καὶ before γινώσκει, which would be natural enough,—“because God is greater than our heart, it follows that . . .;” such an apodosis being very commonly introduced by καί,—but 1) the sense thus obtained, which would be illogical, as it would not follow, because God is greater than our heart, that He knows all things: and 2) that brought by

Düsterd., the exceeding harshness and clumsiness thus introduced into the style, whereas St. John is singularly lucid, and has but very few inversions, none indeed at all approaching the harshness of this. Bengel, Hoogeveen, Morus, Nüsselt, Baumg.-Crus., Huther, regard the first ὅτι as the pronoun relative, ὅτι: “coram ipso secunda reddemus corda nostra quocunque tandem crimine damnat nos cor;” as Hoogeveen. The objection to this is not N. T. usage, as alleged, e. g. by Düsterdieck against ὅστις ἐάν, for we read ὅστις ἐάν Gal. v. 10, and ἥτις ἐάν Acts iii. 23: but sense, context, and analogy. Sense,—for it would surely be monstrous to make the Apostle say that if we have brotherly love, we may make ourselves easy, whatever else our consciences accuse us of: context,—for in this sentence no logical reason would thus be given by the following ὅτι, which Hoog. renders quia: analogy, as shewn in the parallelism ἐάν καταγινώσκη and ἐάν μὴ καταγινώσκη, which we thus altogether destroy. Another interpretation is given, and, as usual, defended with extreme fervency and bitterness against those who differ, by Sander. He would make the whole of ver. 20 depend on ἐν τούτῳ γνωσόμεθα and on πείσομεν (some others had done the same before, e. g. Meyer. See also Erdmann below); and regard it as meant in a consolatory sense: by thus loving in deed, &c., we shall know, &c., and shall persuade our hearts that if our heart condemn us, God (he is troubled with the second ὅτι, and offers to his readers the alternative of erasing it with Lachmann or reading ἔτι with Stephens) is greater than our heart and knoweth all things: i. e. knows us to be His children and better than we seem to ourselves. With this in the main Erdmann agrees: “Hoc igitur apostolus dicit: filiis Dei, si forte in peccata incederint, et conscientia accusatione perterriti fuerint, quum e conscientia veræ caritatis erga Deum et fratres pro certo sciant se ex veritate esse, vitæque novitatem in Dei patris societate accepisse, persuasum fore, τὸ καταγινώσκειν, conscientia magnitudine et potestate gratiæ divinæ illoque Dei γινώσκειν πάντα superari.”

But how any exegete of tact and discernment can hold this, I am at a loss to imagine. Leaving for the present the question respecting the sense of μείζων ἐστὶν κ.τ.λ., can we conceive the Apostle to write so loosely as this—“we shall persuade our hearts, that if our heart condemn us . . . ?” For, in this case, the καρδίας of the former clause has no connexion with the καρδιά of the latter, but, as Erdmann confesses, is equivalent to ἡμᾶς αὐτούς, whereas in the latter, καρδιά is the “conscientia reatus.” And besides, the πείσομεν has already had its emphatic completion in the words ἔμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ, declaring its meaning to be absolute, and preventing its passing on to the ὅτι.

It would seem then that the first ὅτι cannot be “that,” but must be causal. And if the first, then the second, which, as far as I know, no one has attempted to render “that” after rendering the other “because.” How then is the repetition to be interpreted? The first ὅτι furnishes the reason for introducing the clause: what purpose is served by the second? The old scholium says, τὸ δεύτερον ὅτι παρέλκει. And so several of the Commentators, adducing instances of a repeated and superfluous ὅτι from Xenoph. Anab. v. 6. 19, λέγουσιν ὅτι, εἰ μὴ . . . ὅτι κινδυνεύσει . . . : and so Anab. vii. 4. 5: Eph. ii. 11, 12 in N. T. But in all these places ὅτι is “that,” not “because:” nor can an instance be produced of the repetition of a causal ὅτι. This resource thus seems taken from us. The second ὅτι must have its distinct place and meaning assigned it. And, reserving the consideration of the meaning thus obtained, till we treat of μείζων ἐστίν κ.τ.λ.,—there is one legitimate way of taking it, which does not seem to have been suggested: viz., that there is an ellipsis of the verb substantive before the 2nd ὅτι, and that the clause, thus introduced, forms the apodosis to the ἐὰν κ.τ.λ.: “because if our heart condemns us, (it is) because God, &c.” Instances of similar ellipses after εἰ or ἐὰν are of course common enough: εἴ τις ἐν χριστῷ, καὶ ἡ κτίσις, 2 Cor. v. 17: εἶτε ὑπὲρ Τίτου, κοινῶς ἐμὸς κ. εἰς ὑμᾶς συνεργός: εἶτε ἀδελφοὶ ἡμῶν, ἀποστολοὶ ἐκκλησιῶν, δόξα χριστοῦ, ib. viii. 23. Nearer to the point is 2 Cor. i. 6, εἶτε θλιβόμεθα, ὑπὲρ τῆς ὑμῶν παρακλήσεως καὶ σωτηρίας: 1 Cor. xiv. 27, εἶτε γλώσση τις λαλεῖ, κατὰ δύο . . .

But this brings us to consider (3) the meaning of the words μείζων ἐστίν ὁ θεὸς τῆς καρδίας ἡμῶν καὶ γινώσκει πάντα. Two ways of taking them have been prevalent: the ancients regarded them as intensifying the ἐὰν καταγινώσκη ἡμῶν ἢ καρδιά: as the Schol. in Cramer’s Catena, εἰ γὰρ ἁμαρτάνοντες, τὴν καρδίαν ἑαυτῶν λαθεῖν δυνάμεθα (qu. οὐ δυνάμ.) ἀλλὰ νυττόμεθα ὑπὸ τοῦ συνειδότος, πόσῳ μᾶλλον τὸν θεὸν πράττοντές τι τῶν φαύλων δυνήθωμεν (οὐ δυν.) λαθεῖν; and so Aug., &c., and of the moderns, Calvin, Beza, Socinus, Grot., Corn.-a-lap., Castalio, Estius, Calov., Semler, Lücke, Neander, al. On the other hand, Luther, Bengel, Morus, Spener, Nösselt, Rickli, Baumg.-Crus., Sander, Besser, Düsterd., Huther, Erdmann, regard them as consolatory in their tendency, and as softening our self-condemnation by the comforting thought of God’s greatness and infinite mercy. Erdmann remarks, “Respondet his sententia S. Pauli ad Rom. v. 20 sq.: οὐ δὲ ἐπλεόνασεν ἡ ἁμαρτία, ὑπερπερίσσευσεν ἡ χάρις. Luther ad h. l. dicit: Daß Gewissen ist ein einziger Tropfen, der versöhnte Gott aber ist ein Meer voller Tropfen.” He compares John xxi. 17, κύριε, πάντα σὺ οἶδας, σὺ γινώσκεις ὅτι φιλοῶ σε.

But beautiful and true as this is, and the similar considerations which have been urged by others of the above Commentators, it is to me very doubtful whether they find any place in the context here. That context appears to stand thus. The Apostle in ver. 19 has said that by the presence of genuine love we shall know that we are of the truth, and shall persuade our hearts in God’s presence. He then proceeds to enlarge on this persuading our hearts, in general. If our heart condemn us, what does it import? If our heart acquit us, what? The ἐὰν καταγινώσκη, and the ἐὰν μὴ καταγινώσκη, are plainly and necessarily opposed, both in hypothesis and in result. If the consolatory view of ver. 20 is taken, then the general result of vv. 20, 21 will be, whether our heart condemn us or not, we have comfort and assurance: and then what would be the import of πείσομεν τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν at all? But on the other interpretation, taken with some modifications, all will be clear. I say, taken with some modifications: because the sense has been much obscured by the introduction of the particular case treated in ver. 18 into the general statements of vv. 20, 21. It is not, If our heart condemn us for want of brotherly love, as Lücke for instance, calling it a statement ‘e contrario’ to ver. 19: but this test is dropped, and the general subject of the testimony of our hearts is entered upon. Thus we get the context and rendering, as follows): because (q. d., and this ἔμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ πείσαι τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν is for us a vital matter, seeing that condemnation and acquittal by our own hearts bring each such a weighty conclusion with it) if our heart condemn (notice the words γνωσόμεθα . . . καταγινώσκη . . . γινώσκει: for the meaning, see reff. It is a word especially appropriate to self-consciousness: "know (aught) against us") us, it is because (our self-condemnation is founded on the fact, that) God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things (i. e. the condemning testimony of our conscience is not alone, but is a token of One sitting above our conscience and greater than our conscience: because our conscience is but the faint echo of His voice who knoweth all things: if it condemn us, how much more He? and therefore this πείσαι, for which this verse renders a reason, becomes a thing of inestimable import, and one which we cannot neglect, seeing that the absence of it is an index to our standing condemned of God. And then, having given the reason why the καταγινώσκειν should be set at rest by the πείσαι, he goes on to give the blessed results of the πείσαι itself in verses 21, 22). Beloved (there is no adversative particle, because ἀγαπητοί throws up the contrast quite strongly enough, as introducing the very matter on which the context lays the emphasis, viz., the πείσαι τὰς κ. ἡμῶν), if our heart (so it will stand, whether ἡμῶν be read or not) condemn us not, we have confidence towards God (reff.: said generally: not with direct reference to that which follows, ver. 22, which indeed is one form of this confidence: see ch. v. 14, where the connexion is similar. The confidence here spoken of is of course present, not future in the day of judgment, as Estius. πρὸς τὸν θεόν, with reference to God: but more than that: to God-ward, in our aspect as turned towards and looking to God. It must be remembered that the words are said in the full light of the reality of the Christian state,—where the heart is awakened and enlightened, and the testimony of the Spirit is active: where the heart's own deceit does not come into consideration as a disturbing element), and (such another καὶ as that in ver. 10 above, where, after πᾶς ὁ μὴ ποιῶν δικαιοσύνην οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, we have καὶ ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ, i. e. after the general statement, καὶ introduced the particular instance in which the general truth was carried forward. So here: By dwelling and walking in love, we can alone gain that approval of our conscience as God's children, which brings real confidence in Him and real intercommunion in prayer, which is a result and proof of that confidence) whatsoever we ask, we receive (pres.: not for future, as Grot. The Apostle is setting forth actual matter of fact) from Him (these words must be taken in all their simplicity, without capricious and arbitrary limitations. Like all the sayings of St. John, they proceed on the ideal truth of the Christian state. "The child of God," as Huther says, "asks for nothing, which is against the will of its Father"), because (ground of the above λαμβάνομεν) we keep His commandments, and do the things which are pleasing in His sight (on the last expression (and parallelism) see Exod. xv. 26; also Deut. vi. 18, xii. 25, Ezra x. 11, Isa. xxxviii. 3. It is added, not as epeexegetical of τὰς ἐντολάς αὐτοῦ τηροῦμεν, as Sander, but as Düsterd., to connect with His granting our prayers, since our lives are in accord with His good pleasure. This however brings us to the theological difficulty of our verse, wherein it would seem at first sight as if the granting of our prayers by God depended, as its meritorious efficient, on our keeping of His commandments and doing that which pleases Him. And so some of the R.-Catholic expositors here: Corn.-a-lap., with the curious peculiarity of distinguishing τὰς ἐντολάς αὐτοῦ τηρεῖν, the keeping of the moral law of the decalogue, from τὰ ἀρεστὰ ἐνώπ. αὐτοῦ ποιεῖν, the doing of "consilia evangelica, viz. continentia, obedientia et paupertas," the observance of which goes "angere gratiam Dei et merita." This is refuted by the parallelism, in which (see above) the second clause takes up the first and applies it to the matter in hand. And it is further refuted by the usage of the expression τὰ ἀρεστὰ, by which never “consilia evangelica,” but always things ethically pleasing to God, as commanded by Him, are denoted: cf. ref. John, Rom. xii. 1, xiv. 18, 2 Cor. v. 9, Eph. v. 10, Phil. iv. 18, Col. iii. 20. Estius again has pressed the words as against the heretics, who say “omnia justorum opera esse peccata,” “nisi,” he adds, “dicant, quod absque blasphemia dici non potest, peccata esse Deo placita.” But both here and elsewhere the solution of the difficulty is very easy, if separated from the party words of theology, and viewed in the light of Scripture itself. Out of Christ, there are no good works at all: entrance into Christ is not won nor merited by them. In Christ, every work done of faith is good and is pleasing to God. The doing of such works is the working of the life of Christ in us: they are its sign, they its fruits: they are not of us, but of it and of Him. They are the measure of our Christian life: according to their abundance, so is our access to God, so is our reward from God: for they are the steps of our likeness to God. Whatever is attributed to them as an efficient cause, is attributed not to us, but to Him whose fruits they are. Because Christ is thus manifested in us, God hears our prayers, which He only hears for Christ’s sake: because His Spirit works thus abundantly in us, He listens to our prayer, which in that measure has become the voice of His Spirit. So that no degree of efficacy attributed to the good works of the child of God need surprise us: it is God recognizing, God vindicating, God multiplying, God glorifying, His own work in us. So that when, e.g., Corn.-alap. says, “congruum est et congrua merces obedientiæ et amicitia, ut si homo faciat voluntatem Dei, Deus vicissim faciat voluntatem hominis,” all we can reply is that such a duality, such a reciprocity, does not exist for Christians: we are in God, He in us: and this St. John continually insists on. We have no claim ab extra: He works in us to do of His good pleasure: and the works which He works, which we work, manifest before Him, and before all, that we are His children. The δ ἐὰν αἰτῶμεν, λαμβάνομεν, I reserve to be treated of on ch. v. 14, 15, where it is set forth more in detail. 23.] Summing up of all these commandments in one: faith in Christ, and brotherly love according to Christ’s command. And (see καὶ similarly used, ch. i. 5, ii. 17, ver. 3) His commandment (“singulari numero mandatum præmisit, et duo subsequentia adjungit mandata, fidem scilicet et dilectionem, quia nimirum hæc ab invicem separari nequeunt. Neque enim sine fide Christi recte nos alterutrum diligere, neque vere in nomine Jesu Christi sine dilectione possumus credere,” Bede: and Cc., ἔχοντες ἐντολήν, ἵνα τῇ πίστει τῇ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰησ. χρ. ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους) is this, that (see on ἵνα, ver. 11) we should believe (the aor. imports one act of receptive faith: the present, a continuing habit) the name (this unusual expression, πιστεύειν τῷ ὀνόματι (reff.)), is well explained by Calvin and Beza,—“nomen ad prædicationem respicit,” so that, as Seb.-Schmidt, it is “credere merito, satisfactioni, omnibusque promissionibus Christi et de Christo,” to believe the Gospel message concerning Him, and Him as living in it, in all His fulness. We have similar expressions, πιστεύειν τῇ γραφῇ, John ii. 22; τοῖς ῥήμασι, v. 47; τῇ ἀκοῇ, xii. 38) of His Son Jesus Christ, and love one another (pres., of a continued habit), even as He gave us commandment (some Commentators have referred these words to both πιστεύσωμεν and ἀγαπῶμεν, and understood ὁ θεός as the subject of ἔδωκεν. So Estius, Hunnius, Bengel, Sander. But this would seem to introduce too much of a tautology: “God’s commandment is, that we should, &c. . . . as He gave us commandment.” It seems more natural, with the generality of Commentators, to understand Christ as the subject to ἔδωκεν, and by the commandment, John xiii. 34, xv. 12, 17). 24 a.] General return, with reference to what has been said in the last verses, to the great key-note of the Epistle, μένετε ἐν αὐτῷ, with which the former part of it concluded, ch. ii. 28. This keeping of His (God's) commandments is the abiding in God: this of which brotherly love is the first and most illustrious example and summary. So that the exhortation given at the beginning of this portion of the Epistle is still in the Apostle's mind, as again ch. iv. 15, 16, and v. 20; see also ch. ii. 6, iii. 6, 9. And he that keepeth His (God's) commandments abideth in Him (God), and He (God) in him (Sander, Neander, al., hold that αὐτός, αὐτῷ are to be referred to Christ. And no doubt they would be perfectly true, and according to our Lord's own words, when thus applied: cf. John xiv. 15, xv. 5 ff. Still, from the context (cf. on ἔδωκεν below), it is better to refer them to the chief subject, viz. to God. In the sense, the difference is not important. It is one of the most difficult questions in the exegesis of this most difficult of Epistles, to assign such expressions as the present definitely to their precise personal object).

24 b.] And of one part of this mutual indwelling there is a sign and token, given us by God Himself, viz. the Holy Spirit. By the mention of the Spirit, the Apostle makes these words the note of transition to the subject of the next section, ch. iv. 1-6, which is parenthetical, of the discerning of true and false spirits, and after which the main subject of brotherly love is resumed again. And in this we (all the children of God; not as the R.-Cath. expositors, Lyra, Corn.-a-lap., Estius, the Apostles, or the apostolic church, only) know that He abideth in us, from the Spirit (the change of construction is unusual. It arises from the Apostle having combined together two ways of speaking in this connexion,—ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν, ὅτι . . ., see vv. 16, 19, and ἔκ τούτου γινώσκομεν, ch. iv. 6. The knowledge is ἐν τούτῳ, in this element or department of fact, and it is ἔκ τούτου, derived from, as its source, that which follows) which He gave us (ἔδωκεν, aor.; at a certain time, by a definite act, viz. on the day of Pentecost, when the Father bestowed the Holy Spirit on the Church. And this ἔδωκεν is one sign that the whole is to be referred to the Father: seeing that our Lord says, καγὼ ἐρωτήσω τὸν πατέρα, καὶ ἄλλον παράκλητον δώσει ὑμῖν . . . τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, John xiv. 16, 17. This indwelling Spirit of God is to the child of God the spring and source of his spiritual life, the sure token of his sonship, Rom. viii. 14, 15, Gal. iv. 6, and of his union with God in Christ).

CHAP. IV. 1-6.] Warning against, and criteria whereby to distinguish, false teaching. This passage takes up again, with reference to this portion of the Epistle, the similar warning given in the former portion, ch. ii. 18 ff. It is intimately connected with what has immediately preceded. By brotherly love we are to know that we are of the truth, ch. iii. 19,—and the token that He abideth in us is to be the Spirit which He gave us. This Spirit, the Spirit of Truth, it becomes then all-important for us to be able to distinguish, and not to be led astray by any false spirits pretending to his character and office. Such false spirits there are, which are not of God, but of the world, and which make up that spirit of antichrist, of which prophecy had already spoken.

1.] Beloved (so verse 7, and ch. iii. 2, 21, marking a transition to a subject on which the Apostle affectionately bespeaks their earnest attention), believe not every spirit (the expressions πᾶν πνεῦμα, τὰ πνεύματα, indicating plurality of spirits, are to be explained by the fact that both the Spirit of Truth and the spirit of error speak by the spirits of men who are their organs. So we have, in reference to prophecy, 1 Cor. xiv. 32, πνεύματα προφητῶν προφήταις ὑποτάσσεται. By the nature of the testimony of the human spirits, we shall know whether they are of God or not; whether they are organs of the πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας or of the πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης. It will be observed that this interpretation of πᾶν πνεῦμα, and the Apostle's way of speaking, rest on the assumption of there being One Spirit of Truth, from God, and one spirit of error, from the world; as opposed to all rationalizing interpretations, such as "sensus hominis aliquo modo inspiratus, Socinus; “doctrina,” Episcopus: as opposed also to all figurative understanding of the word, as Calv., “metonymice accipio pro eo qui spiritus dono se prædicitum esse jactat ad obeundum prophetiam munus,” Beza, Grot., Whitby, Wolf, and even Lücke, who explains it by λαοῦντες ἐν πνεύματι. It is not the men themselves, but their spirits as the vehicles of God’s Spirit or the spirit of antichrist, that are in question.

In πιστεύετε some have seen a figure drawn from the physical meaning of πνεῦμα; so Corn.-a-lap,—“Respicit ad nautas, qui non credunt omni spiritui, id est, vento.” But this is far-fetched and unlikely, in the universal acceptance of the spiritual meaning of both words), but try the spirits (this δοκιμάζειν is enjoined not on the “ecclesia in suis prælatis,” as Estius and the R.-Cath. expositors, but on all believers, as even he reluctantly admits: and the test is one of plain matter of fact, of which any one can be judge. The Church by her rulers is the authoritative assertor of this δοκιμασία in the shape of official adoption or rejection, but only as moved by her component faithful members, according to whose sense those her formularies are drawn, of which her authorities are the exponents) whether they are of God (bear the character of an origin from Him): because (ground for the necessity of this trial) many false-prophets (= ἀντίχριστοι πολλοί, ch. ii. 18: προφήται, not as foretelling future things, but as the mouth-pieces of the πνεῦμα which inspires them. Cf. 2 Pet. ii. 1, where the N. T. false teachers are called ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι, and compared to the O. T. ψευδοπροφήται) are gone forth (scil. from him who sent them: even as Jesus Himself is said, John viii 42, xiii. 3, xvi. 27, 28, ἐξεληλυθέναι from God. Or we may take it as in ch. ii. 19, ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξῆλθον,—from the Church: but the other is more likely. Socinus and Grotius take it of “prodire ad munus suscipien- dum;” but it certainly means more than this) into the world (cf. John xvi. 28, which tends to fix the ἐξεληλύθασιν above).

2, 3 a.] Test, whereby the spirits are to be tried. In this (see above, ch. iii. 10, &c.) ye know (apprehend, recognize. γινώσχετε is taken as imperative, on account of the preceding πιστεύετε and δοκιμάζετε, by Huther, De Wette, Lücke (most Commentators do not touch it). But on account of the very frequent ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκομεν, I should let analogy prevail, and take it as indicative) the Spirit of God (the Holy Spirit, present, inspiring, and working in men’s spirits). Every spirit which confesseth (“spiritui tribuitur actio quæ hominis est per spiritum.” Schlichting. The confession is necessarily, from the context here, not the genuine and ascertained agreement of lips and life, but the outward and open profession of faith: see 2 John 7—10, where ταύτην τὴν διδαχὴν . . . φέρειν is its equivalent) Jesus Christ come in the flesh (‘I. χρ. primary predicate: ἐν σαρκὶ ἐλληλυθότα, secondary predicate: = ‘I. χρ. ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί, 2 John 7. Cf. the same arrangement of predicates 1 Cor. i. 23, κηρύσσομεν χριστὸν ἐσταυρωμένον: 2 Cor. iv. 5, κηρύσσομεν χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν κύριον. In all these cases it is important to observe, that the construction is not equivalent to an accusative with an infinitive, ‘I. χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐλληλυθέναι. If it were, the confession, or the preaching, would be simply of the fact announced: whereas in each case it is the PERSON who is the object or primary predicate: the participle carrying the attributive or secondary predicate. This is abundantly shewn here, by the adversative clause, where it is simply μὴ ὁμολογοῦν τὸν Ἰησοῦν. The confession required is, “Jesus Christ come in the flesh;” ἐλληλυθός here standing midway between the ἐρχόμενος of 2 John 7, which is altogether timeless, and the ἐλθόν of ch. v. 6, which is purely historical. That Irenæus and Origen really had this reading before them is evident from the whole context as given by their interpreters. Iren. (iii. 16. 8, p. 207) says, Igitur omnes extra dispositionem sunt, qui sub obtentu agnitionis alterum quidem Jesum intelligunt, alterum autem Christum, et alterum Unigenitum, et alterum Salvatorem. . . Hic est seductor et Antichristus. Videte eos, ne perdatiis quod operati estis." Et rursus in epistola ait: "Multi pseudoprophetae exierunt de sæculo. In hoc cognoscite Spiritum Dei. Omnis spiritus qui confitetur Jesum Christum in carne venisse, ex Deo est. Et omnis spiritus qui solvit Jesum, non est ex Deo, sed de Antichristo est." Hæc autem similia sunt illi quod in evangelio dictum est, quoniam "Verbum caro factum est, et habitavit in nobis." Origen on Matt xxv. 14 thus writes (Com. Ser. 66, vol. iii. p. 1703 f.): Secundum hanc divinitatis suæ naturam non peregrinatur, sed peregrinatur secundum dispensationem corporis quod suscepit. . . Hæc autem dicentes non solvimus suscepti corporis hominem, cum sit scriptum apud Joannem "Omnis spiritus qui solvit Jesum non est ex Deo:" sed unicuique

the present endurance of a past historical fact.

If we enquire what that fact is, we are met by two widely divergent interpretations. On the one side we have the Socinian view, which, while it keeps to the strict philological sense of the words, ἐν σαρκί and ἔρχεσθαι (see below), distorts the meaning to bring the Apostle into accord with the tenets of that school: e.g. Socinus: "Jesum Christum, i. e. Jesum qui dicitur Christus, non modo mortalem hominem fuisse, sed etiam innumeris malis et denique ipsi cruentæ morti obnoxium:" and Grotius,—“non eum regia pompa et exereitibus, sed in statu humili, abjecto, multisque malis ac postremum cruci obnoxium.” But no such sense of ἐν σαρκί can be or has been attempted to be adduced. On the other hand we have many of the orthodox expositors, who strive to make the words not implicative only, but directly assertive of the Incarnation. So Piscator, who plainly asserts that ἐν σαρκί = εἰς σάρκα: so others who waver between ἐν and εἰς, e.g. Hunnius,—“tunc venire in carne dicitur Jesus Christus, quando λόγος ex sua velut arcana sede prodicens assumta visibili carne se in terris manifestat:” so Bengel (apparently), al. And among this number must proximately be reckoned Augustine, who introduces in the train of the Incarnation the death and redeeming love of Christ, and makes the confession or denial depend on “caritatem habere:” “Deus erat et in carne venit: Deus enim mori non poterat, caro mori poterat: ideo ergo venit in carne ut moreretur pro nobis. Quemadmodum autem mortuus est pro nobis? Majorem hac caritatem nemo habet, quam ut animam suam ponat pro amicis suis. Caritas ergo illum adduxit ad crucem. Quisquis ergo non habet caritatem, negat Christum in carne venisse.” As between these two, the recent Commentators, Lücke, De Wette, Düsterd., Huther, appear to have taken the right path, in keeping ἐν strictly to its proper meaning, ‘in,’ ‘clothed with,’ = διά, ch. v. 6: and ἔρχεσθαι also to its proper meaning, to “come forward,” “appear,” “prodire:” and in interpreting the words as directed against the Docetæ, who maintained that the Son of God had only an apparent, not a real human body.

I cannot however agree in Huther’s view, that Ἰησοῦν is here to be taken alone as the object, and χριστόν ἐν σαρκί ἐληλ. together as predicate: Jesus as Christ come in the flesh. For first, it would be against the usage of our Apostle, see ch. v. 1, in this case, to leave out the article before χριστόν: secondly, Ἰησοῦν χριστόν thus in conjunction, could hardly but express the joint Name so well known: and thirdly, the sense required, that Jesus is the Christ, is assumed, by the very juxtaposition of the names. The words imply the præ-existence and incarnation by their very terms: but they do not assert these doctrines, only the verity of our Lord’s human nature, is of God (has its origin and inspiration from Him by His Spirit):

3 a.] ex adverso: and every spirit which does not confess (as Huther rightly remarks, μὴ sets forth, not only the non-confession as matter of fact, but the opposition to, the denegation of the confession:

substantiæ proprietatem servamus. Si enim omnis homo fidelis "qui conjungitur Domino unus spiritus est:" quanto magis homo ille quem secundum dispensationem carnis Christus susceperit non est solvendus ab eo, nec alter est dicendus ab eo? Et vide quomodo ait: "sicut homo peregre futurus" quoniam non erat homo, sed sicut homo et quasi homo peregrinabitur, qui erat ubique secundum divinitatis naturam.

On the other hand Polycarp (Ep. ad Phil. cap. 7, p. 1112) seems to quote, though loosely, the received text—Πᾶς γὰρ ὃς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθῆναι, ἀντιχριστός ἐστι· καὶ ὃς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ σταυροῦ ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστὶ· καὶ ὃς ἂν μεθοδεύῃ τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου πρὸς τὰς ἰδίας ἐπιθυμίας καὶ λέγῃ μῆτε ἀνάστασιν μῆτε κρίσιν εἶναι, οὗτος πρωτότοκός ἐστι τοῦ Σατανᾶ. om τον ΚΝ b c d g h l 40 Polyc Thl: ins ABL rel Cyr Thdrt Socr. rec aft ιησουν ins χριστον, with KL rel am demid sah Polyc Thl Ec Aug; κυριον Ν: om AB a 13 syrr copt arm Cyr Thdrt Socr Iren-int Orig-int Did-int Lucif Fulg, Tich. rec further adds εν σαρκι εληλυθота, with KLN rel syrr arm Thl Ec Iren-int Cyp; εν σαρκι εληλυθεναι 13(-ηναι) Polyc Thdrt: om AB vulg copt æth-rom(omg τ. ιησ.) q. d. "refuseth to confess") Jesus (τὸν Ἰησοῦν, in the complex of all that He is and has become, involved as it is in His having come in the flesh), is not of God. Some notice must be taken of the remarkable reading ὃ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν. The words of Socrates (see Digest) hardly seem to amount to an absolute assertion that the reading was found in any mss. extant in his time, and it appears to have been regarded rather as an interpretation against the Nestorians than as a part of the ancient text. Bengel says well of it, "humanam potius artem quam apostolicam redolet sapientiam." The appearance of it in the vulgate is remarkable, seeing that not one of our present mss. has it, and not one version besides. 3 b.]

This has been already virtually explained on ch. ii. 18. And this is the (spirit) (so nearly all the Commentators supply the ellipsis, and rightly. Episcopus, Valla, Zeger, the R.-Cath. Mayer, and Huther, render it, this is "proprium antichristi." But this would not surely be τὸ τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου, but τοῦ ἀντιχρίστου only. None of the passages cited by Huther touch the point, Matt. xxi. 21, τὸ τῆς συκῆς, "this of the fig-tree;" 1 Cor. x. 24, τὸ τοῦ ἐτέρου, "that which belongs to his brother;" 2 Pet. ii. 22, τὸ τῆς παροιμίας, "that of the proverb;" James iv. 14, τὸ τῆς αἰριον, "the event of to-morrow." In every one of these the genitive belongs to the subject: but Huther would attach it to the predicate, "hoc est proprium antichristi," in which case I cannot see how the article could be there. Besides, the ὃ ἀκηκόατε οτι ἔρχεται would be awkwardly said as applied merely to an abstract fact, the τὸ μὴ ὁμολογεῖν τὸν Ἰησοῦν, to which it must be referred if τοῦτο is subject, and the genitive imports proprium antichristi) of antichrist (of) which ye have heard (the reference is not to ch. ii. 18 (ἠκούσατε), but to the course of their Christian instruction in which this had been taught them) that it cometh (the present used as so often of that which is a thing fixed and determined, without any reference to time: "that it should come" of the E. V. is in sense very good, but does not quite suit the perf. ἀκηκόατε, which seems grammatically in English to require "that it shall come:" "that it must come" would perhaps be better), and now it is (not, now is: this ἐστίν is not dependent on the preceding ὅτι, but introduces a fresh assertion) in the world already (viz., in the person of these ψευδοπροφήται, who are its organs). 4.] Ye (so we had ἡμεῖς ch. ii. 24, 27: his readers clearly and sharply set against the antichristian teachers) are of God, little children (thus he ever speaks to his readers, as being children of God, see ch. iii. 1 fl.), and have overcome (there need not be any evading or softening of this perfect: see ch. ii. 14. It is faith outrunning sight: the victory is certain in Him who said ἐγὼ νενίκηκα τὸν κόσμον, John xvi. ult. The ground of this assurance follows) them (αὐτούς, the false prophets, thus identified with antichrist. ὁ ἐν ὑμῖν is most naturally understood of GOD, seeing that ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστὶ preceded; for he who is ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ has God dwelling in him. Though, as Düsterd. remarks, it matters not much whether we take it thus, or of the indwelling of God by His Spirit, or of the life of Christ in believers. The former of these is taken by Lücke, al., the latter by Aug., Bede, Grot., Corn.-a-lap., al.

ὁ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ is the devil, the prince of this world. Having said this, he proceeds in the next verse to identify these false prophets with the κόσμος of which he has spoken.

5.] They are of the world (this description is not ethical, as Socinus and Grot.,—"affectus habent, quales habet mundus, i. e. pars longe maxima humani generis: amant splendorem hujus vitæ, opulentiam et voluptates:"—but betokens the origin and source of that which they are and teach, as ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστὶ did on the other side. That origin and source is the world, unregenerate human nature, ruled over and possessed by the devil, the prince of this world): for this cause they speak of (not concerning, but of, as out of and from; the material of what they say being cosmic: "ex mundi vita et sensu sermones suos promunt," Bengel) the world, and the world heareth them (loving as it does its own, who are of it, John xv. 19, from which our verse is mainly taken: see also John viii. 47, xviii. 37).

6.] contrast. We (emphatic, as opposed to them: but who are meant? The Apostles and their companions in the ministry, or all believers? Or again, all teachers of God's truth, the Apostles included? It is hardly likely that the wider meaning has place here, seeing that 1) he has before said ὑμεῖς ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστὶ, and 2) he is here opposing one set of teachers to another. On the other hand, it is not likely that he should confine what is said to the Apostles only: such as are mentioned with praise in

3 John 5—8 would surely be included) are of God (see above): he that knoweth (pres.: apprehendeth: hath any faculty for the knowledge of. The Apostle sets ὁ γινώσκων τὸν θεόν in the place of ὁ ἄν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, as belonging more immediately to the matter in hand, the hearing, and receiving more knowledge. This γινώσκειν τὸν θεόν, the apprehension and recognition of God, is the peculiar property of God's children, not any natural faculty in which one unrenewed man differs from another. All rationalistic interpretations of these words, e. g., that of Socinus, Schlichting, al. "animi probitas et studium ea faciendi quæ Deo probantur," are quite beside the purpose) God heareth us: he who is not of God doth not hear us (here we must remember carefully, what the context is, and what its purpose. The Apostle is giving a test to distinguish, not the children of God from those who are not children of God, but the spirit of truth from the spirit of error, as is clear from the words following. And this he does by saying that in the case of the teachers of the truth, they are heard and received by those who apprehend God, but refused by those who are not of God. It is evident then that these two terms here, ὁ γινώσκων τὸν θεόν, and ὃς οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, represent two patent matters of fact,—two classes open and patent to all: one of them identical with the κόσμος above: the other consisting of those of whom it is said above, ἐγνώκατε τὸν πατέρα, . . . ἐγνώκατε τὸν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, ch. ii. 13, 14. How these two classes are what they are, it is not the purpose of this passage to set forth, nor need we here enquire: we have elsewhere tests to distinguish them, ch. iii. 9, 10, and have there gone into that other question. We have a striking parallel, in fact the key to these words, in the saying of our Lord to Pilate, John xviii. 37). From this (viz., not, as Düsterd., al., the whole foregoing train of circumstances; nor, those tests proposed in vv. 2, 3: but the facts set forth in vv. 5, 6: the reception of the false teachers by the world the reception of the true teachers by those that apprehend God, and their rejection by those who are not of God: as Schlichting, who however means the words in his rationalistic sense, "ex assensu et dissensu proborum et improborum." The same point is touched by our Lord in John x. 8, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἤκουσαν αὐτῶν τὰ πρόβατα) we know (in this unemphatic first person the Apostle includes his readers: we, all God's children. γινώσκουμεν, distinguish, recognize, as so often) the Spirit of truth (the Spirit that cometh of God and teacheth truth: see reff.) and the spirit of error (the spirit that cometh of the devil, teaching lies and seducing men into error: see ch. i. 8, ii. 26).

7—21.] The Apostle again takes up his exhortations to brotherly love, but this time in nearer and deeper connexion with our birth from God, and knowledge of Him who is Himself Love, vv. 7, 8. This last fact he proves by what God has done for us in and by His Son, vv. 9—16: and establishes the necessary connexion between love to God and love to man, vv. 17—21.

The passage is in connexion with what went before, but by links at first sight not very apparent. The great theme of the whole was enounced ch. ii. 29. The consideration of that has passed into the consideration of that δικαιοσύνη in its highest and purest form of love, which has been recommended, and grounded on His love to us, in ch. iii. 11—18, where the testimony of our hearts came in, and was explained—the greatest of His presence in us being the gift of His Spirit, ch. iii. ult. Then from the necessity of distinguishing and being sure of that His Spirit, have been inserted the foregoing tests and cautions respecting truth and error. And now he returns to the main subject. The γινώσκει τὸν θεόν, ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐστίν and γεγέννηται, the taking up again of God's love to us in Christ at ver. 9 from ch. iii. 16, the reiteration of the testimony of the Spirit in ver. 13, all serve to shew that we are reading no collection of spiritual apophthegms, but a close and connected argument, though not in an ordinary style.

7, 8.] Beloved (as before, marks the fervency and affection of the Apostle turning to his readers with another solemn exhortation. Here the word is especially appropriate, seeing that his own heart is full of that love which he is enjoining), let us love one another: because (he at once rests the exhortation on the deepest ground) love (ἡ ἀγάπη, abstract, in the widest sense, as the following words shew) is from God (has its origin and source in God: He is the wellspring and centre of all love. No such weakening as "Deo maxime placeat" (Grot.) must be thought of. It is remarkable that Didymus understood ἀγάπη here of Christ,—ἦντινα οὐκ ἄλλην εἶναι νομιστέον ἢ τὸν μονογενῆ, ὡσπερ θεὸν ἐκ θεοῦ, οὕτω καὶ ἀγάπην ἐξ ἀγάπης ὄντα:—and Augustine, fitting together "Dilectio est ex Deo," and "Dilectio est Deus ex Deo," which comparing with Rom. v. 5, he infers that love is the Holy Spirit: Tract. vii. 6, vol. iii. p. 2032): and every one that loveth (there is no need to supply an object after ἀγαπῶν, as τὸν θεόν in A, "his brother" as some latt., and Lücke: indeed to do so would be to narrow the general sense of the Apostle's saying: all love is from God: every one that loveth, taking the word of course in its pure ideal sense in which the assertion follows from the former), hath been begotten of God (has truly received within him that new spiritual life which is of God: see note on ch. ii. 29), and knoweth (pres.: in his daily walk and habit, recognizes and is acquainted with God: by virtue of that his divine birth and life) God: 8.] (Contrast, but with some remarkable variations) he that loveth not (general, as before: no object: he that hath not love in him) hath never known God (aor.: hath not once known: has never had in him even the beginnings of knowledge of God: as Lücke, "noch gar nicht kennen gelernt hat." So that the aorist makes a far stronger contrast than the present οὐ γινώσκει would. That is excluded, and much more); because (reason why he who loveth not can never have known God. ὅτι cannot well be "that," dependent on ἔγνω, as e. g. Tirinus (cited by Düsterd.) seems to make it: "non novit, saltem practice non ostendit se nosse et agnoscere, Deum esse . . . caritatem:" in that case

 God is love (ἀγάπη, not ἡ ἀγάπη: love is the very essence, not merely an attribute, of God. It is co-essential with Him: He is all love, love is all of Him: he who has not love, has not God. It is not the place here to enter on the theological import of this weighty and wonderful sentence. It will be found set forth in Augustine, de Trinitate, ix. 2 ff., vol. viii.
 p. 961 ff.: in Sartorius, die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe, i. 1, and in the first of my Sermons on Divine Love, which are founded on Sartorius's work. Düsterd. refers also to Nitzsch, über die wesentliche Dreieinigkeit Gottes, in the Studien u.
 Kritiken for 1841, 2, p. 337: and Liebner, Christologie, p. 135. But it may be necessary to put in a caution against all inadequate and shallow explanations of the saying: such as that of Grotius (after Socinus), "Deus est plenus caritate."—Benson, "God is the most benevolent of all beings: full of love to all His creatures,"—Whitby, "The Apostle intends not to express what God is in his essence . . . but what He is demonstrativè, ἐνεργητικῶς, shewing great philanthropy to men."—Hammond, "God is made up of love and kindness to mankind:"—Calvin, "hoc est quod ejus natura sit, homines diligere . . . de essentia Dei non loquitur, sed tantum docet qualis a nobis sentiatur:" &c. &c. In all these,—in the two last by supplying an object, "homines," which is not in the sacred text,—the whole force of the axiom as it stands in the Apostle's argument is lost. Unless he is speaking of the essential being of God, quorsum pertineat, to say that he that loveth not never knew God, because "God is love?" Put for these last words, "God is loving," and we get at once a fallacy of an undistributed middle: He that loveth not never knew what love is: God is loving: but what would follow? that in as far as God is loving, he never knew Him: but he may have known Him in as far as He is just, or powerful. But take ὁ θεὸς ἀγάπη ἔστιν of God's essential being,—as a strict definition of God, and the argumentation will be strict: He that loveth not never knew love: God is love (the terms are co-essential and co-extensive): therefore he who loveth not never knew God).

9, 10.] Proof of this as far as we are concerned, in God's sending His Son to save us. In this (viz. which follows: the ἔτι is the apodosis, as in ch. iii. 16) the love of God was manifested in regard to us (ἐν ἡμῖν must be taken with the verb, not with ἡ ἀγάπη, which in this case (pace Huther: being the case of a particular manifestation of that which has been before generally stated. The combination of anarthrous predicatory clauses only takes place when the whole will bear running together into one idea, as τοῖς κυρτοῖς κατὰ σάρκα) would require the article ἡ ἐν ἡμῖν. Many Commentators have thus wrongly connected it, and in consequence have been compelled to distort ἐν into εἰς: so Luther, Seb.-Schmidt, Spener, Beza, Socinus, Schlichting, Episcop., Grot., Benson, Neander, al. Bengel has fallen into the former fault, though not into the latter:
 "amor Dei qui nunc in nobis est, per omnem experientiam spiritualem." This is upheld also by Sander, who defends it by Gal. i. 16, where a totally different matter is treated of.

Connected then with the verb, it must not be taken as = εἰς, but as in reff., especially John ix. 3, where the same phrase occurs: "in," i. e. "in the matter of," in regard of: cf. ver. 16 below: the manifestation not being made to us as its spectators, but in our persons and cases, as its "materies." ἡμῖν, communicative, believers in general), that God hath as one act, done implicitly when God sent His Son: but the sending is regarded in its present abiding effects, which have changed all things since it took place) His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him (no words may be seen in Düsterd. He well remarks, "Such expositors may naturally be expected to give an answer to the question, how a Christ so understood could be our life (ver. 9), our atonement (ver. 10), or our salvation (ver. 14)." The two emphatic words in the sentence are μονογενῆ and ζήσωμεν. This was the proof, that SUCH a Son of God was sent, that we might LIVE). 10.] The same proof particularized in its highest and noblest point, the atonement: and at the same time this brought out, that the love manifested by it was all on God's side, none on ours: was love to us when we were enemies, Rom. v. 8, and therefore all the greater. Ch. iii. 16 is very similar: except that there it is Christ's personal love to us: here the Father's, in sending His Son. In this is love ("in this case," "in this matter," "herein," is, 'is found,' 'exists,' ἡ ἀγάπη, Love; in the abstract: "herein is Love," as E. V. This interpretation is necessary, on account of the disjunction which follows. If ἡ ἀγάπη meant, the love of God just spoken of, then it would be irrelevant to subjoin that this love was not our love to Him but His to us. Ec.'s comment is in the main right, though inaccurately expressed: ἐν τούτῳ δείκνυται ὅτι ἀγάπη ἐστὶν ὁ θεός, not that (the ὅτι is the usual one, introducing the apodosis for which the ἐν τούτῳ prepares us: and οὐκ denies this. "In this is love, not in the fact that . . ., but in the fact that" . . . Thus taken, there is no difficulty whatever in the sentence: cf. John xii. 6, 2 Cor. vii. 9. Some Commentators have missed this, and thus found a difficulty. "οὐχ ὅτι (non quasi) pro ὅτι οὐκ (quasi non)," says Grotius: but does not make his meaning very plain. Rosenm., who takes the transposition, explains it, "Quod, quamvis nos non amavissimus Deum, ille tamen amaret nos." Justiniaui takes ὅτι as "because" both times, and regards the apodosis as beginning at καὶ ἀπέστειλεν) we loved God (the aor., corresponding to the aor. below, marks the verb as referring to an indefinite time past—no act of love of ours to God at any time done furnishes this example of love, but an act of His towards us. It is not the nature of our love to God, as contrasted with His to us, of which the clause treats, but the non-existence of the one love as set against the historical manifestation of the other. Again that "He loved us, though we did not love Him," is so far in the words as it is given by the context (see above), but is not the meaning of the words themselves), but that He loved us (aor., referring again to an act of Love, which is now specified), and (proved this love in that He) sent His Son a propitiation (see on ch. ii. 2) for (see ibid.) our sins (His death being therein implied, by which that propitiation was wrought, Eph. i. 7: and that, God's giving His own Son to death for us, being the greatest and crowning act of divine Love). 11.]

Application to ourselves of this example, as a motive to brotherly love. Strictly parallel with the latter part of ch. iii. 16, where the same ethical inference is drawn with regard to the example of Christ Himself. Beloved (the Apostle's usual introduction of a fervent and solemn address, vv. 1, 7, al.), if (this εἰ with an indicative is very difficult to give exactly in English. It is not on the one hand any expression of uncertainty: but neither on the other is it = "since," or "seeing that." We may call it a certainty put in the shape of a doubt, that the hearer's mind may grasp the certainty for itself, not take it from the speaker. "If (it be true that) . . ." is perhaps the nearest English filling up of the sense) God so loved us (so namely as detailed in ver. 10, which and which alone, by the catch-word ἠγάπησεν in the aorist, is pointed at), we also ought to love one another (the καὶ does not belong to the ὀφείλομεν, but purely to the ἡμεῖς,—"we, on our side." But on what does the obligation, asserted in ὀφείλομεν, rest? Clearly, on that relation to God and one another implied by being children of God, ἐκ θεοῦ γεγεννηῆσθαι, which runs through all this section of the Epistle. If we are of God, that love which is in Him, and which He is, will be in us, will make us like Him, causing us to love those who are begotten of Him, ch. v. 1, 2. And of this love, our apprehension of His Love to us will be the motive and the measure). 12.] God hath no one ever beheld (what is the connexion of these words, so suddenly and startlingly introduced? It is evident that ver. 12 is connected with ver. 11, by the words ἐὰν ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους, taking up again ὀφείλομεν ἀλλήλους ἀγαπᾶν. But it is also evident that it is connected with ver. 13 by the ἐν ἡμῖν μένει, κ.τ.λ. And it is further plain, that these words, θεὸν οὐδεὶς πῶποτε τεθέαται, must have some close reference to ἀλλήλους ἀγαπᾶν, seeing that they stand between those words in ver. 11, and the resumption of them in ver. 12. It would appear by this, that the idea of connecting them with ἡμεῖς τεθεάμεθα, ver. 14, in the sense, "but we have truly beheld," &c., as Carpzov., is a mistake. Ec. (and similarly Thl. and Aretius) takes it as if some objector were introduced,—ἀκόλουθον δ' ἦν εἰπεῖν τινα, καὶ πόθεν τοῦτο λέγεις περὶ πραγμάτων ἀθεάτων καὶ ἀνεφίκτων, καὶ διαβεβαιοῖς ἡμῶς οἷς μήπω τις ἔγνωκε; and that the Apostle, συντρέχων τοῖς οὕτω λέγουσι φησὶ καὶ αὐτὸς ὅτι θεὸν μὲν οὐδεὶς ἑώρακε πῶποτε, σύμφημι καὶ αὐτός. ἀλλ' ἐκ τῆς εἰς ἀλλήλους ἀγάπης φησὶ γινώσκουμεν ὅτι ὁ θεὸς ἐν ἡμῖν ἐστι. But of this objection there is not the slightest trace in the text: and had the Apostle intended to adduce such an one, he would, as Düsterd. well observes, have replied to it not from the effect of our love to one another, but from the facts of the mission and ministry of the Son of God. Of the remaining Commentators, there are two great divisions. The first consists of those who take the axiom as referring forward to ὁ θεὸς ἐν ἡμῖν μένει: i. e. our inner communion of life with God whom we have not seen must be realized and will be realized, by love towards one another: so the Scholl., I.,—ὁ ἀόρατος θεὸς κ. ἀνεφίκτος διὰ τῆς εἰς ἀλλήλους ἀγάπης ἐν ἡμῖν μένει, and II.,—τοῦτο οὖν κατορθώσει, φησὶν, ἡ ἀγάπη, τὸ ἐνοικον ἡμῖν γενέσθαι θεόν, ὃν οὐδεὶς πῶποτε τεθέαται. And so Hunnius, Seb.-Schmidt, Spener, Joach. Lange, Socinus, Grot., Rosenm., Baumg.-Crus., Rickli, Neander, De Wette, Sander, Düsterd., Huther, al. Düsterd. quotes Rickli's representation of this view as the best: "To behold God,—to perceive Him immediately and according to His infinite divine essence, is given to no man here: we cannot apprehend God: but then in the highest and the best manner do we perceive Him inwardly, as His true children, if we love one another, for then God abideth in us." And all this is most true. But I would submit that although it might explain ver. 12 and what follows, it does not explain the place of ver. 12 in the context at all. How comes the Apostle thus suddenly to introduce this axiom and what follows it? Clearly, vv. 11 and 14 are connected: the same strain of argument is going on, and it is most improbable that a thought thus foreign to that argument would be introduced into the midst of it. Obviously, this is a great defect in this interpretation. Let us turn to the other, and see whether we have it supplied. It takes the words as saying this: "We cannot immediately return to the invisible God the love which He has shewn to us: for no man has ever seen Him: i. e. He is not to be seen by any. But if we love our brethren, whom we do see, God abides in us, we are His children, objects of His love, and so, by love to our brethren, love to God is perfected in us." (Lücke.) And thus or nearly thus, Corn.-a-lap., Mayer, Schlichting, Episcopius, Bengel, Whitby, G. Lange, Jachmann.

Now this interpretation, as above given, has the merit of being linked to what went before, by our inability to return God's love: but I must feel that Düsterd.'s objection to it is fatal: it gives a sense wholly alien from St. John's habit of thought, in alleging that we cannot return God's love, and further alien in giving as a reason for this inability, that He is invisible. It would be a most unjustifiable use of ver. 20, to convert it thus and make it say that we cannot love God whom we have not seen.

Thus it appears that each view has something to recommend it, each something to discommend it. Is there no third way to be found? In examining ver. 11, we find an unexpected substitution, εἰ οὕτως ὁ θεὸς ἠγάπησεν ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἡμεῖς ὀφείλομεν (not τὸν θεόν, but) ἀλλήλους ἀγαπᾶν. Why so? Here, ver. 20 will guide us to an answer, if rightly used. Not, because we cannot love God whom we have not seen: but because the exponents of God whom we have not seen are our brethren whom we do see. And the Apostle, in substituting ἀλλήλους, does not for a moment drop or set aside the higher τὸν θεόν, but in fact leads up to it by putting its lower and visible objects before us. And then ver. 12 comes in as an explanation, an apology as it were, for this substitution, in the following manner: ἀλλήλους ἀγαπᾶν, I say: for the love to God, which is our ὀφειλή, is love towards one whom we have never seen, and cannot exist in us (as ver. 20) unless by and with its lower degrees as manifested towards our brethren whom we have seen. By our love to them are we to know, how far we have love to Him: if that be present, He dwelleth in us, and ἡ ἀγάπη αὐτοῦ τετελειωμένη ἐστίν ἐν ἡμῖν. And thus (see below) the way is prepared for vv. 15, 16, which take up and bring to a conclusion the reasoning): if we love one another, God abideth in us (for the reason already stated in ver. 8, and re-stated in immediate connexion with this very matter in ver. 16, that God is Love, and every one that loveth is born of God, knows God, abides in God and God in him), and (simply the copula: not as Calvin, "copulam accipit causalis particulæ loco") the love of Him (i. e. ἡ ἀγάπη αὐτοῦ, as in ch. ii. 5, where we had the same expression, our love to Him, not, as Beza, Bengel, Sander, al., His love to us. This is evident not merely from ch. ii. 5, but from the context here: see it explained above, and remember that it is our love to God which is here the subject, as evinced by our love to our brethren. This is further shewn by the recurrence of the same expression in ver. 17, ἐν τούτῳ τετελείωται ἡ ἀγάπη μεθ' ἡμῶν, and ver. 18, ὁ φουβούμενος οὐ τετελείωται ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ. And so the majority of Commentators. Calvin proposes as a possible alternative, "caritas, quam nobis inspirat." Socinus renders "dilectio quam ipse Deus nobis præscripsit." But both these are forced, and agree neither with usage nor with the context) is perfected (see note ch. ii. 5. Here, as there, it signifies, has reached its full maturity: the ἀγαπᾶν ἀλλήλους being the token and measure of it. The form τετελειωμένη ἐστίν, like all resolved forms of verbal tenses, brings out more strongly the peculiar temporal force of the verb substantive united with the import of the participle as a predicate. Hence in this case, the present sense always contained in the perfect, predominates, and there is more reason than ever for rendering "is," not "hath been") in us (on the view above maintained of ἡ ἀγάπη αὐτοῦ, ἐν ἡμῖν keeps its primary and obvious sense, "in us," "within us," as in ch. ii. 5).

13.] In this we know that we are abiding in Him and He in us, because He hath given us of His Spirit (nearly repeated from ch. iii. 24. But why introduced here? In the former verse, the fact of His abiding in us was assured to us, if we love one another. Of this fact, when thus loving; we need a token. Him we cannot see: has He given us any testimony of His presence in us? He has given us such a testimony, in making us partakers of His Holy Spirit. This fact it is to which the Apostle here calls our attention, as proving not the external fact of the sending of the Son (ver. 14), but one within ourselves,—the indwelling of God in us, and our abiding in Him. It is obvious that all inferences from the expression ἐκ τοῦ πν. against the personality of the Holy Ghost are quite beside the purpose: compare Acts ii. 17 with Joel ii. 28 (Heb. and E V.). We each have the indwelling of one and the same personal Spirit, but each according to our measure, 1 Cor. xii. 4, 11. One only had the Spirit without measure, in all His fulness: even Christ; John iii. 34. And the presence of the Holy Spirit is most aptly adduced here where love is in question, His first fruit being love, and His presence being tested by His fruits). 14, 15, 16.] The connexion seems to be this: the inward evidence of God's abiding in us and we in Him, is, the gift of His Spirit. But this is not the only evidence nor the only test which we have. This internal evidence is accompanied by, nay, is itself made possible (see ver. 19) by, our recognition of the Father's love in sending His Son as our Saviour: which last is a fact, testified by human evidence. This recognition of God's love is a condition of abiding in Him and He in us: in a word, is the μένειν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, which is equivalent to abiding in Him. And we (this ἡμεῖς brings up in sharp relief the apostolic body whom Christ appointed His witnesses, John xv. 27, Acts i. 8. The assertion is of the same kind as that in ch. i. 1) have beheld (τεθεάμεθα is joined closely to μαρτυροῦμεν, and in common with it belongs to the ὅτι following. tem." Piscator. The construction of θεᾶσθαι with ἔτι is found John vi. 5) and do testify that the Father hath sent (not merely to the historical fact as a thing past, but to its abiding influence as implied by σωτήρα τ. κόσμου below: q. d., that the Father sent the Son, and that the Son is the Saviour of the world) the Son (better here than "His Son:") ὁ πατήρ, τὸν υἱόν, are termini theologicī) as Saviour of the world (σωτήρα, anarthrous, is not appositive but predicatory = in meaning "to save the world," but one degree removed back from it in telic force: σώζειν τὸν κόσμον would express more strongly the ultimate view of His mission; σωτήρα τοῦ κόσμου gives the mediate aim, leaving it possible that another may be yet behind. τοῦ κόσμου here, as in ch. ii. 2, John iii. 16, in its widest sense: no evasion of this sense, such as the "electorum in omnibus populis" of Piscator and Aretius, is to be endured).

15.] And recognition of this fact is a condition and proof of the life of God. Whosoever confesseth (the aorist can only be given by the English present and an exegesis,—viz. that this present betokens not a repeated act and habit, but a great act once for all introducing the man into a state of ὁμολογήσαι. All futures, "shall confess," and futuri exacti, "shall have confessed," are objectionable; the one as losing the retrospective tinge, the other as making it unduly prominent, and indeed imparting a slight hue of transitoriness, which least of all belongs to the word.

The same remark holds good of this confessing, as before with regard to denying, ch. ii. 23: viz., that we must not bring into it more than the Apostle intends by it: it is not the "confession of the life" which is here spoken of, but that of the lips only. Of course it would be self-evident that this is taken by the Apostle as ruling the life: but simply as a matter of course. He speaks of the ideal realized) that Jesus is the Son of God (i. e. receives the testimony in the last verse as true), God abideth in him, and he in God.

16.] a) And we (not now the apostolic body only, but communicative, the Apostle and his readers. This is evident and necessary (against Episcopius, Huther, al.), because on the other view the ἐν ἡμῖν which follows, interpreted as it must necessarily be of the same persons, would fit awkwardly on to the repeated general proposition with which the verse concludes) have known and have believed (the two roots which lie at the ground of ὁμολογεῖν, ἐγνώκαμεν and πεπιστεύκαμεν, are in St. John's language, most intimately connected. "True faith is, according to St. John, a faith of knowledge and experience: true knowledge is a knowledge of faith." Lücke. Cf. John vi. 69) the love, which God hath in regard to us (ἐν ἡμῖν as above, ver. 9: not "towards us," as Beza (and E. And here, as there, ἀγάπη is in its widest abstract sense. Its two principal manifestations are, love to God, and love to one another: but this saying is of Love absolute). 17, 18.]

These verses, which are parallel with ch. iii. 19—21, set forth the confidence with which perfect love shall endow the believer in the great day of judgment. In this is love perfected with us (for ἐν τούτῳ, see below. ἡ ἀγάπη, not, as Luther, Calv., Spener, Grot., Calov., Bengel, Sander, al., God's love to us: this is forbidden by the whole context: our verse is introduced by ὁ μένων ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, and continued by φόβος οὐκ ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ: it is love dwelling and advancing to perfection in us. And again, not love to God merely, nor love to our brethren merely; these are concrete manifestations of it: but love itself in the abstract—the principle of love, as throughout this passage. This sense of ἀγάπη will point out that of μεθ' ἡμῶν, which belongs not to ἡ ἀγάπη but to the verb, as in ver. 12. Love is considered as planted in us; its degrees of increase take place μεθ' ἡμῶν—not merely “bei uns,” “chez nous,” πρὸς ἡμᾶς, but as concerned with us; in a sense somewhat similar to that in which ἐμεγάλυνεν κύριος τὸ ἔλεος αὐτοῦ μετ' αὐτῆς, Luke i. 58. See 2 John 2, where however the idea of dwelling with is more brought out than here), that we have confidence in the day of judgment (ἵνα gives not the purpose of the τετελείωται, but the apodosis to the ἐν τούτῳ, as in reff.: “in this love is perfected in us, viz. that we, &c.” So most, and nearly all the best Commentators. Beza (and E. V.), Socinus, Grot., Mayer, give ἵνα its telic force, regarding ὅτι as the apodosis (not so E. V.), and assuming a trajection: the objection to which is, not the transposition, but the sense so gained, as belonging to the context. On this view, the aim given by the ἵνα comes in altogether disjointed from the context, and the perfection of love in us is stated to be found in a fact which is objective, not subjective. It is only necessary to cite Grotius's exegesis to shew the incongruity, even in his understanding of ἡ ἀγάπη. “Hic est summus gradus dilectionis Dei erga nos, si qualis in hoc mundo Christus fuit, i. e. mundi odiis et propterea plurimis malis expositus tales et nos simus (Joh. xv. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 19, iv. 16). Ideo hoc Deus ita disponit, ut cum bona fiducia appareamus in die iudicii. Nam constans perpessio malorum ad exemplum Christi efficit, ut a Christo optima expectemus, quippe ipsi similes.” Can any thing be more broken and far-fetched than such a connexion? to say nothing of its “si simus” for ὅτι ἐσμέν.

On the right interpretation, the confidence which we shall have in that day, and which we have even now by anticipation of that day, is the perfection of our love; grounded on the consideration (ὅτι καθὼς κ.τ.λ.) which follows: casting out fear, which cannot consist with perfect love, ver. 18): because even as He (Christ, see below) is, we also are in this world (this is the reason or ground of our confidence: that we, as we now are in the world, are like Christ: and in the background lies the thought, He will not, in that day, condemn those who are like Himself. In these words, the sense must be gained by keeping strictly to the tenses and grammatical construction: not, as e. g. Œc. ὡς ἐκεῖνος ἦν ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, by changing the tenses (so also Thl., Tirin., Corn.-a-lap., Mayer, Grot., Luther, Calov., Rickli, al.), nor by referring the words ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ to Christ, as several of the above, and Socinus. And when we have adhered to tense and grammar, wherein is the likeness spoken of to be found? Clearly, by what has been above said, not in our trials and persecutions. Nor by our being not of the world as He is not of the world (Sander, who however adds, “clothed with His righteousness”: nor in that we, as sons of adoption through Him, are beloved of God, even as He is beloved (Tirinus, Neander); nor as Huther, in that we live in Love, as He lives in Love: but in that we are righteous as He is righteous, ch. ii. 29, iii. 3 ff., 10, 22: this being evinced by our abiding in Love. And so mainly (Œc., Thl., with the mistake pointed out above), Beza, Corn.-a-lap., Mayer, Socinus, Lücke, De Wette, Rickli, Düsterd., al. Many indeed of these approach to Huther's view impugned above, and make it to be love in which we are like Christ: but Düsterd. brings rightly this logical objection,—that St. John does not say that Love is perfected in confidence in us, because we resemble Christ in Love; but he refers to the fundamental truth on which our Love itself rests, and says; because we are absolutely like Christ, because we are in Christ Himself, because He lives in us, for without this there cannot be likeness to Him; in a word, because we are, in that communion with Christ which we are assured of by our likeness to Him in righteousness, children of God, therefore our love brings with it also full confidence. Essentially, the reason here rendered for our confidence in the day of judgment is the same as that given ch. iii. 21 f. for another kind of confidence, viz., that we keep His commandments. This also betokens the δικαιοσύνη, of which Christ is the essential exemplar and which is a necessary attribute of those who through Christ are children of God).

18.] Confidence in (or as understood, as to) that terrible day presupposes the absence of fear: and this casting out of fear is the very work of love, which in its perfect state cannot coexist with fear. Fear (φόβος, abstract and general: anarthrous, on account of the negative predication) existeth not in love (τῇ ἀγάπῃ, abstract and general also, as in ver. 17: not "God's love to us," as Calv., Calov., Spener, al.: nor "brotherly love," as Lücke, al.), nay perfect (see on τετελειώται in ver. 17) love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment (see below): but he that feareth hath not been perfected in (his) love. The points here to be noticed are, 1) the emphatic οὐκ ἔστιν, which is better rendered as above, than "There is no fear in love," in order to keep φόβος, which is the subject in the Greek, also the subject in the English: 2) ἀλλά, which is not here the mere adversative after a negative clause, in which case it would refer to something in which fear is, e. g. φόβος οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, ἀλλ' (ἔστιν) ἐν τῷ μίσει: but it is the stronger adversative, implying "nay far otherwise:" "tantum abest ut . . . ut." 3) the argument in ἀλλ' . . . ἔχει, which is doubly enthymematic, having in it two assumptions or suppressed premisses, α) that nothing having κόλασις can consist with perfect love: β) that fear is in us by nature and needs casting out in order to its absence:

4) the meaning of κόλασιν ἔχει. There are two opinions: a) that κόλασις is merely pain or torment; so Aug. ("tormentum habet"), Erasmus ("punitiōnem seu potius cruciatum habet"), Tirinus ("parit animi perturbationem cruciatum et tormentum, ob impendens, quod metuit, malum seu pœnam"), Luther, Calvin, Schlichting, Beza (and E. V.), Piscator, Aretius, Episcopus, Rosenm., Bengel ("nam diffidit, omnia inimica et adversa sibi fugit ac proponit, fugit, odit"), Joach. Lange (who interprets it, compunction at the preaching of the law), Sander, al.:

b) that κόλασις is properly punishment. So Lyræ (but mistaking κ. ἔχει; "debetur pœna timori servili"), Corn.-a-lap., Estius (well: "pœnam, quam committit, pœner animo versat"), Mayer, Seb.-Schmidt, Calov., Spener, Benson, Whitby, Baumg-Crus., Neander, Lücke (includes in itself punishment, i. e. consciousness of deserving it), De Wette, Düsterd., Huther. And this last is certainly the sense, both from the usage of the word (reff.), and from the context, in which the day of judgment is before us. Fear, by anticipating punishment, has it even now; bears about a foretaste of it and so partakes of it: 5) the last clause, ὁ δὲ φοβούμενος οὐ τετελειώται ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ, is intimately connected with what follows (see on ver. 14) as well as with what went before. The δέ is adversative to the whole preceding sentence, ἡ τελεία ἀγάπη κ.τ.λ., and mainly to the idea of τελεία ἀγάπη therein expressed.

As regards the absence of fear from the love of the Christian believer, it has been well observed by Œcum., that there are two kinds of godly fear, φόβος προκαταρκτικός, which afflicts men with a sense of their evil deeds and dread of God's anger, and which is not abiding: and φόβος τελειωτικός, of which it is said, "The fear of the Lord is clean and endureth for ever," Ps. xix., and which δέους τοιούτου ἀπήλλακται. And Bengel says in his brief pointed manner, "Varius hominum status: sine timore et amore: cum timore sine amore: cum timore et amore: sine timore cum amore." The difference is finely wrought out by Augustine, in loc. Tract. ix. 5—8, vol. iii. p. 2048 ff.

19.] I am sorry to be obliged here to differ from the best modern Commentators, Lücke, De Wette, Düsterdick, Huther, as well as from Episcop., Grot., Luther, Calov., Spener, al., and the Commentators on the vulgate, in holding firmly that ἀγαπῶμεν is indicative, not imperative (i. e. hortative). This I do not merely on account of the expressed ἡμεῖς, though that would be a strong point in the absence of stronger, but on account of the context, which appears to me to be broken by the imperative. He that feareth is not perfect in love. Our love (abstract, not specified whether to God or our brother) is brought about by, conditioned by, depends upon, His love to us first: it is only a sense of that which can bring about our love: and if so, then from the very nature of things it is void of terror, and full of confidence, as springing out of a sense of His love to us. Nor only so: our being new begotten in love is not only the effect of a sense of His past love, but is the effect of that love itself: We (emphatic—one side of the antithesis) love (see above). The indic. is taken by Calvin, Beza, Aretius, Socinus, Schlichting, Seb.-Schmidt, Whitby, Bengel, Rickli, Neander, al. Most Commentators supply αὐτόν or ἀλλήλους, but unnecessarily. It is of all love that he is speaking; of love in its root and ideal, because He (God: see the parallel, ver. 10) first loved us (viz. in the sending of His Son). 20.] The connexion is most close: and the error great of those who, as e. g. Erdmann, have made a new section begin here. This ἀγάπη is universal, necessarily manifested in both of the two great departments of its exercise. Love, living and working in the heart as a principle, will fix first upon objects at hand and seen: those objects being natural objects for it to fix on. How then can a man love God, the highest object of love, who is removed from his sight, and at the same time refuse to love his brother, bearing the mark of a child of God, before his eyes from day to day? Put in a brief form, the argument, as connected with the last verse, is this: His love has begotten us anew in love: in this us are included our brethren, objects of our daily sight: if therefore we do not love them, we do not love Him. If any say (aor. “have said;” i. e. at any time: the saying once, rather than the habit, is the hypothesis) I love God, and hate (pres. of habit) his brother, he is a liar: for (here again the argument is enthymematic, and we must supply from our common sense ἐφελκυστικὸν γὰρ ὕρασις πρὸς ἀγάπην, Ec.: “oculi sunt in amore duces,” &c.) he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen (perf.: and continues to feel the influence of that sight). We do not say “I have seen him” of the dead, but of the living only), cannot love God whom he hath not seen (St. John does not say that there is no love without sight; nor that we love all we see better than any thing we do not see: his argument rests on a deeper and truer position: viz. on that assumed in the word ἀδελφόν, which carries with it the consideration that he of whom it is said is begotten of God. Both ὁ ἀδελφός and ὁ θεός are used within the limits of the Christian life, of which that is true, which is unfolded ch. v. 1, that this ἀδελφός as begotten of God is a necessary object of love to one that loves Him that begat him. Here, a lower step of the same argument is taken; but without this great truth, lying beneath the word ἀδελφός, it would carry no conviction with it). 21.] And besides this argument from common sense, there is another most powerful one, which the Apostle here adds. “Quomodo diligis eum, cujus odisti præceptum?” as Aug. And this commandment we have from Him (God: not, Christ: see below), that he who loveth God, love also his brother (where have we this commandment? In the great summary of the law, “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, . . . and thy neighbour as thyself,” so often cited by our Lord; see Matt. xxii. 37—39). CHAP. V. 1.] And who is our brother? and why does this name carry with it such an obligation to love? These questions, in closest connexion with the last verse, the Apostle answers in this.

Every one that believeth (not as Grot. "qui credere se ostendit:" it is the faith itself which is spoken of) that Jesus is the Christ hath been begotten of God (to whom do these words apply? from what follows, in which the γεγέννηται is taken up by τὸν γεγεννημένον, to the brother whom we are to love as a necessary accompaniment of our loving God. But most Commentators, including Lücke, De Wette, Huther, Düsterd., assume that it is of ourselves that this is said: our birth of God depends on and is in closest union with our faith, ch. iii. 23, 24. Then the connexion between this and the following clause must be made by filling up an ellipsis, "and if born of God we love God." But this is far-fetched and, as has been above shewn implicitly, alien from the context, the object of which is to point out who those are whom we are bound to love if we love God. Then having made this predication of all the children of God, πᾶς ὁ πιστ. κ.τ.λ., he, as so frequently, takes it up again below, ver. 4, with a more general reference, and dwells on our faith as the principle which overcomes the world: see there): and every one who loveth him that begot (these words take up again the ἐάν τις εἶπη ὅτι ἀγαπᾷ τὸν θεόν, of ch. iv. 20), loveth also him that is begotten of him (viz. the brother of whom the former clause spoke: not, as Aug., Hil., Corn.-a-lap., al., Christ, the Son of God. As Calvin, "sub numero singulari omnes fideles designat. Est enim argumentum ex communi natura ordine sumptum").

2.] And indeed so inseparable are the two, that as before, ch. iv. 20, our love to our brethren was made a sign and necessary condition of our love to God, so conversely, our love to God, ascertained by our keeping His commandments, is itself the measure of our love to the children of God. Either of the two being found to be present, the presence of the other follows. In this we know that we love the children of God (τὰ τέκνα τοῦ θεοῦ takes up again τὸν γεγεννημένον ἐξ αὐτοῦ of the preceding verse) when (the indefiniteness in ὅταν is to be taken not within the limits of each case, "whenever we," but as belonging to the cases collectively, "in every case where") we love God, and do His commandments (this adjunct is made, as the following verse shews, in order to introduce an equivalent to ἀγαπῶμεν τ. θεόν by which its presence may be judged. It will be seen from what has been said, that all the devices which have been used to extract from this verse a sense different from that which it really conveys, are wholly unneeded, nay, out of place. diate this reference, but apparently on account of the form of expression; observing that the Apostle has said not ελαφραλ εισιν, but βαρεῖαι οὐκ εισιν; but the comment of Ec. is in confusion, and not easy to understand. The Schol. in the Oxf. Catena well remarks, εἰ τις προσελθὼν αὐταῖς μὴ ὄν δεῖ τρόπον λέγει αὐτὰς βαρεῖας, τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ἀσθένειαν ἠτιόσατο· φίλον γὰρ τοῖς ἄγαν ἀποβάλλουσιν ἰσχὺν βαρεῖα νομίζεσθαι καὶ τὰ πάνυ ἐλαφρὰ καὶ κοῦφα.

This declaration, that His commandments are not grievous, has, as did ch. iii. 9, furnished some of the R.-Cath. Commentators with an opportunity of characterizing very severely the Protestant position that none can keep God's commandments. But here as there the reply is obvious and easy. The course of the Apostle's argument here, as introduced in the next verse by ὅτι, substantiates this βαρεῖαι οὐκ εισιν by shewing that all who are born of God are standing in and upon the victory which their faith has obtained over the world. In this victorious state, and in as far as they have advanced into it, in other words in proportion as the divine life is developed and dominant in them, do they find those commandments not grievous. If this state, in its ideality, were realized in them, there would be no difficulty for them in God's commandments: it is because, and in so far as sin is still reigning in their mortal bodies and their wills are unsubdued to God's will, that any βάρος remains in keeping those commandments), 4.] because (reason, why His commandments are not grievous: not, as Ec., ἐπιτίθησι τοῖς ἡδὴ εἰρημένους καὶ ἕτερον ἐπακτικὸν πρὸς τὴν μεταχείρισιν τῆς ἀγάπης, making καὶ αἱ ἐντ. αὐ. β. οὐκ εισ. merely parenthetical) all that is born of God (the neuter is here used as gathering together in one, under the category of "born of God," the ἡμεῖς implied in the last verses. So St. John uses the comprehensive categorical neuter in reff. Ec. seems to deny this personal meaning of πάν, and to understand it

"every thing," applying it afterwards to ἡ πίστις ἡμ. as one such thing. Aretius and Paulus take it similarly. But besides the Apostle's usage cited above, the whole analogy here is against such an interpretation. It is we, not our faith, of which the term ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ γεγενησθαι is used) conquereth (νικᾷ, of habit: simply predicated of the category πάν τὸ κ.τ.λ.) the world (the kingdom of evil under its prince the devil, God's adversary; in the main as Calv., "quicquid adversum est Dei spiritui. Ita naturæ nostræ pravitas pars mundi est, omnes concupiscentiæ, omnes Satanæ actus, quicquid denique nos a Deo abstrahit."

The argument then is this: The commandments of God are not grievous: for, although in keeping them there is ever a conflict, yet that conflict issues in universal victory: the whole mass of the born of God conquer the world: therefore none of us need contemplate failure, or faint under his struggle as a hard one), and the victory which (hath) conquered the world is this, our faith (the identification of the victory with the faith which gained it, is a concise and emphatic way of linking the two inseparably together, so that wherever there is faith there is victory. And this is further expressed by the αοριστ participle, by which, as Estius (notwithstanding that the vulgate has "quæ vincit"), "significatur victoria jam parta:" cf. ch. ii. 13, iv. 4. Socinus absurdly explains the αοριστ as speaking of those whose Christian course is done, against the plain ἐστίν, not only here but in ver. 5).

5.] If it be asked, How does our faith overcome the world? this verse furnishes the answer; because it brings us into union with Jesus Christ the Son of God, making us as He is, and partakers of His victory, John xvi. 33. Through this belief we are born again as sons of God; we have Him in us, One greater than he who is in the world, ch. iv. 4. And this conclusion is put in the form of a triumphant question: What other person can do it? Who that believes this, can fail to do it? Who is he that conquereth the world, except he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? By comparing ver. 1 a, we find 1) that δ χριστός there answers to δ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ here; 2) that by the combination of the two verses, we get the proposition of ver. 4 a. Episcopius gives well the meaning: "Lustrate universum mundum et ostendite mihi vel unum, de quo vere affirmari possit, quod mundum vincat, qui Christianus et fide hac præditus non est."

6—21.] THE THIRD AND LAST DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE. This portion falls naturally into two parts: vv. 6—13, and vv. 14—21: the former of which treats of the concluding part of the argument, and the latter forms the close of the Epistle.

6—13.] As in the former portions, our communion with God who is light (ch. i. 5 ff.) was treated, and our birth in righteousness from God who is righteous (ii. 29 ff.), by faith in Jesus the Son of God,—so now we have another most important element of the Christian life set before us: the testimony to it arising from that life itself: the witness of the spiritual life to its own reality. This witness rests not on apostolic testimony alone, but on the Holy Spirit, which the believer has in himself (ver. 10), and which is God's testimony respecting His Son (vv. 9, 10), and our assurance that we have eternal life (ver. 13).

There is hardly a passage in the N. T. which has given rise to more variety of interpretation: certainly none which (on account of the apparent importance of the words interpolated after ver. 7) has been the field of so much critical controversy. Complete accounts of both the exegesis and the criticism will be found in the recent monographs on the Epistle: more especially in that of Düsterdieck. I shall indicate the more salient points of the divergent interpretations as I proceed.

6.] This (viz. the person spoken of in the last verse; Jesus. This, which is maintained by most Commentators, is denied by Knapp and Huther, who refer οὗτος to δ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ: "This Son of God is he &c.:" making the proposition assert the identity of the Son of God with the historical Jesus, not the converse.

This Huther supports on two grounds: 1) that the fact that Jesus came by water and blood needed no proof even to Heretics: 2) that on the ordinary interpretation the following words, Ἰησ. (δ) χριστός, become altogether superfluous. But to these it is easily replied, 1) that although the fact might be confessed, that was not confessed to which the fact bore testimony, viz. that Jesus who came in the flesh was the Son of God: 2) that the appositional clause Ἰησ. (δ) χριστός is by no means superfluous, being only a solemn reassertion of our Lord's Person and Office as testified by these signs.

The main objection to Huther's view is, that, as well stated by Düsterd., it makes the coming by water and blood, which, by the context, is evidently in the Apostle's argument a substantiating consideration, to be merely an exceptional one: "this Son of God is Jesus (the) Christ, though He came by water and blood." Therefore the other interpretation must stand fast. It is well defended also by Lüicke is he that came by water and blood (the words δι' ὕδατος κ. αἵματος have been universally and rightly taken with ἐλθὼν. Only Hofmann, in the Schriftbeweis, ii. 1, p. 331, maintains the joining δι' ὕδ. κ. αἵμ. to ἐστιν, understanding ἐλθὼν, "He that has come," in the sense of δ ἐρχόμενος. But this latter idea is wholly without N. T. precedent, and condemns the whole. It indeed, without Hofmann's construction, is taken by several Commentators, Corn.-a-lap., Tiranus, Calov., Bengel ("Jesus est is quem propter promissiones venire oportuit, et qui venit revera"), Knapp, &c. But if this meaning is in ἐλθὼν, then it cannot be the mere exponent of δι' ὕδ. κ. αἵμ., but must take an emphatic place of its own, and δι' ὕδ. κ. αἵμ. must stand awkwardly alone, "and that by water and blood," or must, as Hofmann, belong to ἐστιν.

Taking then the generally received construction, we may observe that the article before the aor. part. ἐλθὼν, makes οὗτος ἐστιν ὁ ἐλθὼν to be the identification of οὗτος with ὁ ἐλθὼν, i. e. with one who as an historical fact, ἦλθεν, precluding such renderings as "came" for ἐστιν ὁ ἐλθὼν; also forbidding the making the aor. into a present, "this is He that cometh," as Luther, Seb.-Schmidt, J. Lange, Rickli,

Sander, al., and perhaps Ec., as has been inferred from his understanding ὑδωρ and αἷμα of present means of grace and salvation: ὁ γὰρ ἐλθὼν Ἰησοῦς ὁ χριστὸς δι' ὑδατος ἀναγεννᾷ καὶ αἵματος. But he may have been misunderstood: the ἐλθὼν in this comment, and the circumstance that he afterwards dwells on the historical facts of the Baptism and the Crucifixion, seem to shew that he understood the participle aoristically. We may clearly do so, and still regard the water and blood as present in their effects and testimony. All Commentators, except Hofmann (see above), regard ἐλθὼν as referring, not to the Lord's birth in the flesh, but to His open manifestation of himself before the world. See above on ch. iv. 2.

The prep. διὰ, which passes into ἐν in the next sentence, is thereby explained to bear its very usual sense of through or by means of, as said of that which accompanies, as the medium through which, or the element in which. We have an example of ἐν passing into διὰ, 2 Cor. vi. 6, 7: and the very same phrases, δι' αἵματος and ἐν αἵματι, are used of our Lord in Heb. ix. 12, 25, which chapter is the best of all comments on this difficult expression.

δι' ὑδατος κ. αἵματος has been very variously understood. Two canons of interpretation have been laid down by Düsterd., and may safely be adopted: 1) "Water" and "blood" must point both to some purely historical facts in the life of our Lord on earth, and to some still present witnesses for Christ: and 2) they must not be interpreted symbolically, but understood of something so real and powerful, as that by them God's testimony is given to believers, and eternal life assured to them. These canons at once exclude such interpretations as that of Wetst., al., "probavit se non phantasma sed verum hominem esse qui ex spiritu (sive aëre, ver. 8) sanguine et aqua seu humore constaret, Joh. xix. 34:"—as the purely symbolical interpretation, of which there are two kinds:—1) that of Socinus and his school, in which ὑδωρ stands for the purity and innocence of the life and doctrine of Christ, Heb. x. 22, Eph. v. 26,—and αἷμα of the death of Christ as His testimony of Himself. So Schlichting and Grotius: 2) that given by Clement of Alex., Adumbrationes ad h. l. 1011

P (not in Migne), in which ὑδωρ represents regeneration and faith, and αἷμα, knowledge (cognitionem): by Beza,—in which ὑδωρ is "ablutio a peccati labe, ejus nunc tessera est Baptismus,"—αἷμα, "expiatio et persolutio pro peccatis:" by Calvin, in which he explains both ὑδωρ and αἷμα by "summam ostendit quorsum præcipue tenderent ceremoniæ veteres: nempe ut homines ab inquinamentis purgati et soluti omnibus piculis, Deum haberent propitium et illi consecrarentur." By the latter of our two canons is excluded also the idea of mere symbolical reference to the sacraments, as e. g. Beza (see above), Luther, Calvin, al.

Düsterdieck observes that it is remarkable that the best R.-Cath. expositor, Estius (whose commentary is unfortunately broken off at this verse), does not as some have done, interpret αἷμα of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but puts together ὑδωρ and αἷμα, as Calvin and Luther: "per sanguinem vivificat tum in baptismo aquæ, tum in aliis sacramentis, tum etiam extra sacramenta." So that, as Düsterdieck proceeds, the great leaders of the three schools of theology have had the tact to see that which their less skilful followers have missed seeing,—that αἷμα cannot by any means be understood of the Lord's Supper, as has been done by Hunnius, Seb.-Schmidt, Calov., Wolf, Bengel, Carpzov., Sander, al.

The next point which comes before us is, to enquire whether at all, or how far, our passage is connected with John xix. 34? It occurs here, because many Commentators, e. g., Bede, Hunnius, Seb.-Schmidt, Calov., Wolf, Bengel, &c., have seen in the incident there related a miraculous symbolizing of the two sacraments, and in this passage an allusion to that incident. To deny all such allusion, as is done by Düsterdieck, seems against probability. The Apostle could hardly both here and in that place lay such evident stress on the water and blood together, without having in his mind some link connecting this place and that. That in the Gospel it is αἷμα and ὑδωρ,—in this place ὑδωρ and αἷμα,—a difference of which Düsterd. makes much, is surely not worth mentioning. The idea that we have here nothing more than a reference to the fact of John xix. 34, is against our 2nd canon

above: but that John xix. 34 and this refer to the same fundamental truth, is I conceive hardly to be doubted.

It rests now then that we enquire into the meaning of each expression. On αἷμα, there cannot surely be much uncertainty. The blood of His Cross must, by all Scripture analogy, be that intended. The pouring out of this blood was the completion of the baptism which He had to be baptized with, Mark x. 38, 39, Luke xii. 50. And if this is so, to what can ὕδωρ be referred so simply, as to that baptism with water, which inaugurated the Lord's ministry? It might indeed be said that the baptism which He instituted for His followers, better satisfies the test of our 2nd canon, that viz. of being an abiding testimony in the Christian Church. But to this there lies the objection, that as αἷμα signifies something which happened to Christ Himself, so must ὕδωρ likewise, at least primarily, whatever permanent testimony such event may have left in the Christian Church. And thus some modern Commentators have taken it: as uniting the historical fact of the Lord's baptism with the ordinance of baptism, grounded on it, and abiding in the Christian Church. So Semler, Rosenm., Baumg.-Crus., Brückner, Neander, Huther. Düsterd. refuses to accept this view, denying that our Lord's Baptism was any proof or testimony of His Messiahship, and understanding ὕδωρ of the ordinance of baptism only. But surely we are not right in interpreting ὁ ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδατος, He that ordained baptism: nor, whatever Düsterd. may say, in giving the two, αἷμα and ὕδωρ, an entirely different reference. For his endeavour to escape from this by making αἷμα not Christ's death but His blood, applied to us, cannot be accepted, as giving a "non-natural" sense to ἐλθὼν δι' αἵματος likewise.

All this being considered, it seems impossible to avoid giving both to αἷμα and ὕδωρ the combined senses above indicated, and believing that such were before the Apostle's mind. They represent,—ὕδωρ, the baptism of water which the Lord Himself underwent and instituted for His followers, αἷμα, the baptism of blood, which He Himself underwent, and instituted for His followers. And it is equally impossible to sever, as Düsterd. does, from these words, the historical accompaniments and associations which arise on their mention. The Lord's baptism, of itself, was indeed rather a result than a proof of his Messiah-ship: but in it, taking St. John's account only, a testimony to His divine Sonship was given, by which the Baptist knew Him to be the Son of God: ἐγὼ ἑώρακα κ. μεμαρτύρηκα ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, are his words, John i. 34; and when that blood was poured from His "riven side," he that saw it again uses the same formula, ὁ ἑωρακὸς μεμαρτύρηκε. It cannot be that the word μαρτυρία being thus referred to two definite points of our Lord's life, should not apply to these two, connected as they are with ὕδωρ and αἷμα here mentioned, and associated by St. John himself with the remarkable preterite μεμαρτύρηκεν, of an abiding μαρτυρία in both cases. But these past facts in the Lord's life are this abiding testimony to us, by virtue of the permanent application to us of their cleansing and atoning power. And thus both our canons are satisfied, which certainly is not the case in Düsterdieck's interpretation, though they were laid down by himself), Jesus Christ (see above on οὗτος. As now, with the art. omitted, the words are merely the name, "Jesus Christ:" if it were inserted, the adjunct ὁ χριστός would be an appositive predicate, and would necessarily send the thought back to the ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδ. κ. αἵμ. as a proof of the Messiahship of Jesus. It may be remarked, however, that in all the places where St. John uses this Name, it has a solemn meaning, and is by the emphasis thus thrown on the official designation of our Lord, nearly = Ἰησοῦς ὁ χριστός. Cf. John i. 17, xvii. 3: 1 John i. 3, ii. 1, iii. 23, iv. 2, v. 20: 2 John 3, 7): not in the water only, but in the water and in the blood (ἐν, see above on διὰ. The sense of the two is there shewn to be closely allied, ἐν giving rather the "element in which," διὰ, the medium through which. The art. before each dative shews not merely, as Huther, that ὕδωρ and αἷμα have been before named, but that they are well-known and solemn ideas. It is inserted not as matter of course, but as giving solemnity.

But why has the Apostle added this sentence? Schöttgen thought that it is to give Christ the preference over Moses, who came only by water (1 Cor. x. 2), and Aaron, who came only by blood (of sacrifice), whereas Christ united both. But this is too far-fetched. Baumgarten-Crusius again regards the words as directed against those who despised the Cross of Christ (1 Cor. i. 23): but a more definite explanation than this is required. And those can hardly be wrong, who find it in such words as those of the Baptist in John i. 25, ἐγὼ βαπτίζω ἐν ὕδατι, μέσος ὑμῶν στήκει ὃν ὑμεῖς οὐκ οἴδατε: cf. the emphatic repetitions below, ib. ver. 31, ἦλθον ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι βαπτίζων, and ver. 33, ὁ πέμψας με βαπτίζειν ἐν ὕδατι. The baptism of Jesus was not one of water only, but one of blood,—ἴδε ὁ ἀμνὸς τοῦ θεοῦ— and something more than that, which follows in the next clause): and the Spirit is that which witnesseth, because the Spirit is the truth (that is, as explained by the next verse, the Spirit is an additional witness, besides those already mentioned, to the Messiahship of Jesus, and in that, to the eternal life which God has given us in Him. This at once removes the meaning “that,” which some have given to ὅτι. It is not to the fact that the Spirit is the truth, that the Spirit gives witness: but the fact, that He is the truth, is that which makes Him so weighty a witness; which makes the giving of witness so especially His office.

Very various however have been the meanings here given to τὸ πνεῦμα. The scholium in Matthäi understands, the spirit of our Lord (τὸ πν. τῆς ψυχῆς) which He when dying commended into His Father's hands. Augusti, who explains ὕδαρ and αἷμα of the two Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, sees in πνεῦμα, in connexion with John xx. 22 ff., a third Sacrament of absolution. Ziegler and Stroth regard it as = ὁ πνευματικός, i. e. St. John himself. Ec. and Knapp regard it as = ὁ θεός—διὰ δὲ τοῦ πνεύματος, ὅτε ὡς θεὸς ἀνέστη ἐκ νεκρῶν θεοῦ γὰρ τοῦτοῦ μόνου λοιπόν, τὸ ἀνίσταῖν ἑαυτόν. τῇ δὲ τοῦ πνεύματος φωνῇ σημαίνεται ὁ θεός: thus making the threefold witness to the υιοθεσία of Jesus, τὸ βάπτισμα, ὁ σταυρός, ἡ ἀνάστασις. Then again Socinus, Schlichting, Grot., Whitby, al., interpret it of the Divine power by which Christ wrought His miracles: “id est,” says Grot., “per μετωνυμίαν, admiranda ejus opera, a virtute divina manifeste procedentia.” But this, as well as Bede's interpretation, that the Spirit which descended on the Lord at His baptism is meant, inasmuch as it testified to His being “verus Dei filius,”—fails, in giving no present abiding testimony such as the context requires. Others again understand by πνεῦμα the ministry of the word: so Aretius, J. Lange, Hunnius (“Spiritus per externam prædicationem verbi testificatur de Jesu Christo, atque simul intrinsecus in cordibus fidelium banc Christi notitiam obsignat”), Luther, Piscator, Carpzov., Rosenmüller (the Gospel), Seb.-Schmidt (“verbum evangelii et cum eo ministerium ecclesiasticum”), &c. Most of these, as well as Bengel, whose whole interpretation is confused by his attempt to force the interpolated words in ver. 7 into the context, understand πνεῦμα here and in ver. 8 differently. But nothing can be plainer than that we must not alter the meaning, where the ὅτι binds together the sentences so closely.

The above interpretations (to which we may add that of Sander, that τὸ πν. = τὸ χάρισμα, the transformation of a man which takes place by the agency of the Holy Spirit) failing to give any satisfactory account of the text, we recur to the simple and obvious meaning, the Holy Spirit. This is taken by Schol. I., Estius, Corn.-alap., Tirinus, Calvin, Calov., Lücke, Riekl, De Wette, Huther, Neander, Düsterdieck, al. And it seems fully to satisfy all the requirements of the passage. The Holy Spirit is He, who testifies of Christ (John xv. 26), who glorifies Him, and shews of the things which belong to Him (John xvi. 14). It is by the possession of Him that we know that we have Christ (ch. iii. 24). And the following clause, “because the Spirit is the Truth,” exactly agrees with this. He is the absolute Truth (John xiv. 17, xv. 26), leading into all the Truth (John xvi. 13 f.). And in this consists the all-importance and the infallibility of His witness. “Testimonium ejus haudquaquam rejici potest, quoniam Spiritus est veritas, quum sit Deus, ideoque nec falli potest, nec fallere.” Estius).

7.] “Johannes hic causam reddit, cur locutus fuerit non de Spiritu tantum, ejus præcipua in hoc negotio est auctoritas, verum etiam de aqua et sanguine, quia in illis etiam non exigua est testimonii fides, et ternarius numerus in testibus est perfectissimus.” Grot. I. Scholz numbers 192 cursive mss in the Acts and Catholic Epistles. Of these; six do not contain 1 John, viz. "55. 74. 85. 90. 157. 159;" six are defective at this point, viz. "53 (= Scrivener's n). 103. 120. (122?) 130. 177;" seven are identical with mss named on our margin, viz. "13," "24" = "1," "31" = "m," "61" = "111" = "o" (see Scriv.), "91" = "h," and "102" = "K;" two, viz. "110" and "152," are not mss at all but printed books; one, viz. Cantab. Kk 6. 4 (= *2068 of Nasmith's index), is cited twice, first as "9," and then as "112" (cf. "o"); and three more must be dismissed from the enumeration for separate reasons ("107" is a lectionary, and does not contain the pericopa, "44" represents not a ms but an ancient collection of various readings, and "83" is probably the same ms as "173"). We have thus left 165 (including (see prolegomena) "108" and "109"), all of which, together with H¹, and the eighteen given on the margin, 184 in all [nineteen are now given on the margin, making 185 in all. R. H.], have been examined and found to omit the disputed passage. This statement however is not really quite as accurate and complete as at first sight it might seem to be. Nine of the number named above (viz. "c. f. 8. 39. 47. 49. 50. 52. 98") may possibly be hereafter identified with others as yet denoted by a separate symbol, for it is not distinctly known where they are now preserved. When we say then that all known manuscripts, with the exception of two, omit the words in question; let it be understood that we mean, to begin with, 175 [176] mss to be found at the places indicated in the list prefixed to this volume; and in addition probably not less than 70 more seen and examined by trustworthy persons. (The nine named above; the ms entered as 182 a in our list; eighteen given by Scrivener, Introd. to N. T. Crit. pp. 199, 200; and about 50 lectionaries.) We have thus, at least 175 [176], possibly as many as 250 manuscripts, of all ages, to be set against 2 of the 16th century. Codex Ravianus at Berlin and two mss at Wolfenbüttel are sometimes brought forward to support the insertion. Cod. Rav. and one of the Wolf. mss were made from the printed text: the former "from the Complutensian Polyglott, imitating its very misprints" (Treg. on P. T.); part of the plan of the latter (written in the 17th century) is to give various readings from the Latin translations of Erasmus, Beza, &c. In the other Wolf ms, and in that at Naples cited as "173," the addition is only found on the margin and in writing not earlier than the 16th century. Even "34" and "162" cannot be admitted as trustworthy witnesses. Written at the time when the contest was going on in favour of the current Latin text as opposed to the Greek, they differ from the received text and from one another. Both read πατηρ λογος και πνευμα αγιον (an expression which it is instructive to compare, as to the omission of the articles, with Erasmus' latin-derived text of Rev. xxii. 16—21. Erasmus himself, however (edd. 1527, 1535). here inserted the articles in his text, though in his quotation of "Cod. Brit." they do not occur). "34" has εν τω ουρανω and εν τη γη; too strong a causal rendering for ὅτι, and that even at the risk of identifying it with γάρ, logical accuracy requires the slighter causal conjunction) those who bear witness are three (τρεις εισιν is copula and predicate. The three are considered as living and speaking witnesses; hence the masculine form. By being three, they fulfil the requirements of the Law as to full

All the lectionaries which contain the passage omit the disputed words. (They are sometimes reckoned as about 50 in number, but are possibly much fewer.)

II. The Vulgate is cited in support of the disputed passage. It is true that it is found in the mass of the later mss of that version; but it is wanting in the two earliest (written in the 6th century), in those revised by Alcuin and in about fifty others; whilst those that contain it differ both as to the words themselves and as to their position. Some have it as it stands in the authorized editions: others (as demid tol) insert it after verse 8. Some have it in the ordinary form; others (and these after verse 8) Sicut et in celo tres sunt, pater, verbum, et spiritus; et tres unum sunt. (For minor variations, see Tischendorf.)

III. The testimony of the Latin fathers, taken as a whole, has been relied upon by the advocates of the received text.

It is as follows:—

“Cæterum de meo sumet,” inquit, “sicut ipse de Patris.” Ita connexus Patris in Filio et Filii in Paraceto, tres efficiunt coherentes alterum ex altero: qui tres unum sunt, non unus; quomodo dictum est: “Ego et Pater unum sumus,” ad substantiæ unitatem, non ad numeri singularitatem. (Tertull. adv. Praxean c. 25, vol. ii. p. 183.)

Si baptizari quis apud hæreticos potuit, utique et remissam peccatorum consequi potuit. Si peccatorum remissam consecutus est, et sanctificatus est, et templum Dei factus est; . . . quæro cujus Dei? Si Creatoris; non potuit quia in eum non credidit: si Christi; non hujus fieri potuit templum, qui negat Deum Christum: si Spiritus Sancti, cum tres unum sint, quomodo Spiritus sanctus placatus esse ei potest, qui aut Filii aut Patris inimicus est? (Cypr. ad Jubaianum 12, Migne Patr. ii. p. 1117.)

Dicit Dominus “Ego et Pater unum sumus;” et iterum de Patre et Filio et Spiritu Sancto scriptum est, “Et hi tres unum sunt.” (Cypr. de unitate ecclesiæ, § 6, p. 503 f.)

Si ea quæ his significata sunt velimus inquirere non absurde occurrit ipsa Trinitas qui unus . . . est deus, Pater et Filius et Spiritus Sanctus, de quibus verissime dici potuit “Tres sunt testes et tres unum sunt:” ut nomine spiritus significatum accipiamus Deum Patrem . . .; nomine autem sanguinis, Filium . . .; et nomine aquæ, Spiritum Sanctum. (Augustin. contra Maximin. Ariantum, lib. ii. c. 22. 5, vol. viii. p. 795.)

Sic alius a Filio Spiritus, sicut a Patre Filius. Sic tertia in Spiritu ut in Filio secunda persona: unus tamen Deus omnia, tres unum sunt. (Phœbadius, contra Arianos 22, Migne, vol. xx. p. 30.) Plures tamen hic ipsam interpretatione mystica intelligunt Trinitatem. (Eucherius de Quæst. N. T. (Instruct. i. 2, Migne Patr. vol. i. p. 810 f.)) Johannes Evangelista . . . ad Parthos “Tres sunt” inquit “qui testimonium perhibent in terra, aqua, sanguis et caro, et tres in nobis sunt; et tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in celo Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus, et ii tres unum sunt.” (Vigilius of Thapsus against Varimadus, i. 5, p. 367. For this and further quotations, see Davidson’s Bibl. Criticism and Tischendorf h. l.)

The words cited from St. Augustine form the commencement of an elaborate justification of the mystical meaning assigned by him to “the spirit,” “the water,” and “the blood.” Throughout the whole, there is no allusion to the disputed words; though them), and the three concur in one (contribute to one and the same result: viz. the truth that Jesus is the Christ and that we have life in Him. Corn.-a-lap.’s mistake, “in unum, ad unum, scil. Christum,” cannot have come (as Düsterd.) from a misunderstanding of the vulgate, seeing that it has “hi tres unum sunt:” but is merely an exegesis, and in the main a right one. But the words simply signify in themselves, “are in accord.” And this their one testimony is given by the purification in the water of baptism into His name, John iii. 5: by the continual cleansing from all sin which we enjoy in and by His atoning blood: by the inward witness of His Spirit, which He hath given us).

The question of the genuineness of the words read in the rec. at the end of ver. 7, has been discussed, as far as external grounds are concerned, in the digest; and it has been seen, that unless pure caprice is to be followed in the criticism of the sacred text, there is not the shadow of a reason for supposing them genuine. Even the supposed citations of them in early Latin Fathers have now, on closer examination, disappeared (see Digest)

a simple quotation of that one sentence would have had greater controversial value than the most perfect proof of the symbolical meaning of the other clause. So far is he from knowing the words, that he brings forward John viii. 18 and xv. 26 to shew that it is not improper to speak of the Persons of the Ever Blessed Trinity as "witnesses." If he had had any thing plainer to urge, he would not have contented himself with "NON ABSURDE occurrit ipsa Trinitas." The authority of so great a father would soon lead to the noting down of the substance of his interpretation, on the margin of the books belonging to the orthodox. From the margin to the text is but one step. At the end of the 5th century, Vigilius, perhaps (see Davidson), quotes the interpretation as part of the text. There is no real citation before this date. The passages brought forward from Tertullian and Cyprian contain only the words "Et hi tres unum sunt," or the like: this being the Latin form of the corresponding clause in either verse, there is nothing in the words themselves to shew from which they came. In the two first passages it would be hard to prove that there is any thing more than a simple statement of the Catholic doctrine. In the third, Cyprian, treating of the unity of the Church, urges that very analogy between earthly and heavenly things, the acknowledgment of which seems to have led first to the use of "hi tres unum sunt" as a convenient formula in speaking of the Holy Trinity; next, to Augustine's mystical interpretation; and then, to the received gloss. With the teaching of his "master" Tertullian in his mind, Cyprian would not hesitate to speak as he does of the unchallenged verse; had his copies contained the words we reject, we might naturally expect that he would quote the whole passage as fitting in precisely with the course of his argument.

IV. The Greek words were first inserted in the Complutensian edition of 1514. When Erasmus enquired whether the editors really had mss so different from any he had seen, the answer given by one of them was, "Sciendum est Græcorum codices esse corruptos; nostros vero (i. e. Latinos) ipsam veritatem continere." Erasmus unfortunately pledged himself to insert the words if they existed in any one Greek ms. A Codex Britannicus was at length found which contained them. Erasmus, in his 3rd edition (1522), fulfilled his promise. In his annotations, however (ed. 1535, p. 770), after giving the words precisely as they stand in Cod. Montf., he writes thus, "Ex hoc igitur Codice Britannico reposuimus, quod in nostris dicebatur deesse: ne cui sit ausa calumniandi. Tametsi suspicor codicem illum ad nostros esse correctum." A. W. Something remains to be said on internal grounds, on which we have full right to enter, now that the other is secured. And on these grounds it must appear, on any fair and unprejudiced consideration, that the words are 1) alien from the context: 2) in themselves incoherent, and betraying another hand than the Apostle's. For 1) the context, as above explained, is employed in setting forth the reality of the substance of the faith which overcomes the world, even of our eternal life in Jesus the Son of God. And this is shewn by a threefold testimony, subsisting in the revelation of the Lord Himself, and subsisting in us His people. And this testimony is the water of baptism, the blood of atonement, the Spirit of truth, concurrent in their witness to the one fact that He is the Son of God, and that we have eternal life in Him. Now between two steps of this argument,—not as a mere analogy referred to at its conclusion,—insert the words "For there are three that bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit:

and these three are one," and who can fail to see, unless prejudice have blinded his eyes, that the context is disturbed by the introduction of an irrelevant matter? Consequently, Bengel, one of the most strenuous upholders of the words, is obliged tamely to take refuge in the transposition of vv. 7 and 8 (which was perhaps the original form of its insertion in the vulgate; see Digest I. II. and the quotation by Vigilius), so as to bring into treatment the matter in hand, before the illustration of it is introduced. But even suppose this could be done; what kind of illustration is it? What is it to which our attention is directed? Apparently the mere fact of the triplicity of testimony: for there is not the remotest analogy between the terms in the one case and those in the other; the very order of them, differing as it does in the two cases, shews this. Is this triplicity a fact worthy of such a comparison? And then, what is the testimony in heaven? Is it borne to men? Certainly not: for God hath no man seen, as He is there: His only-begotten Son hath declared Him to us on earth, where all testimony affecting us must be borne. Is it a testimony to angels? Possibly: but quid ad rem? And then, again, what but an unworthy play on words can it be called, to adduce the ἐν εἰσιν on the one side, the essential unity of the ever blessed Godhead, and on the other the εἰς τὸ ἐν εἰσιν, the concurrence in testifying to one fact,—as correspondent to one another? Does not this betray itself as the fancy of a patristic gloss, in the days when such analogies and comparisons were the sport of every theological writer? And 2) the very words betray themselves. ὁ πατήρ and ὁ λόγος are never combined by St. John, but always ὁ πατήρ and ὁ υἱός. The very apology of Bengel, “Verbi appellatio egregie convenit cum testimonio,” may serve to shew how utterly weak he must have felt the cause to be.

The best conclusion to the whole subject is found in the remark of Bengel himself on another occasion (cited by Lücke here), of the practice reprobated, of which he himself furnishes here so striking an instance: “male strenuos ii se præbent in bellis Domini, qui ita animum inducunt, ‘Dogmati elenchoque meo opportunus est hic textus: ergo me ipse cogam ad eum protinus pro vero habendum: eumque ipsum, et omnia quæ pro eo corradi possunt, obnixè defendam.’ Atqui veritas non eget fulcris falsis, sed se sola multo melius nititur.” A sketch of the principal particulars of the dispute and of the books relating to it is given in Horne’s Introduction, vol. iv. pp. 355—388.

9.] An argument a minori ad majus, grounded on the practice of mankind, by which it is shewn that God’s testimony must be by all means believed by us. If we (mankind in general: all reasonable men) receive (as we do: εἰ with an indic.: cf. John vii. 23, x. 35, xiii. 14. On the expression μαρτ. λαμβάνειν, see ref. It is, to receive with approval, to accept) the testimony of men (τῶν ἀνθρώπων, generic; τῆν μαρτ. in any given case. No special testimony need be thought of, as touching this present case: the proposition is general), the testimony of God is greater (supply in the argument, “and therefore much more ought we to receive that.” The testimony of God here spoken of is not any particular testimony, as the prophecies concerning Christ (Bede), or the testimony of the Baptist and other eye-witnesses to Him (Wetstein, Storr), or the Prophets, the Baptist, Martyrs, and Apostles (Bengel, Episcopus, al.): it is general, as is the testimony of men with which it is compared. The particular testimony pointed at by the general proposition is introduced in the following words: for (see above at the beginning of ver. 7. Here, there is an ellipsis: “and this maxim applies in the case before us, because”), the testimony of God is this, that He hath borne testimony concerning His Son (i. e. the testimony of God to which the argument applies is this, the fact that He hath borne testimony to His Son: αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ μαρτυρία, ὅτι . . . , as in ver. 11. The correction to the easier ἦν, as in ver. 10, gives a wrong reference for αὕτη, making it refer back to that mentioned in vv. 6—8, and throws back also a wrong shade of meaning over ver. 9, making “the testimony of God” there particular instead of general. The absolute sense of μεμαρτύρηκεν is found in the Gospel, i. 32, xiii 21, xix. 35: see also vv. 6, 7 above).

10—12] The perfect μεμαρτύρηκεν, ver. 9, shewed that the testimony spoken of is not merely an historical one, such for instance as Matt. iii. 17, which God ἐμαρτύρησεν, but one abiding and present. And these verses explain to us what that testimony is. He that believeth in the Son of God hath the testimony (just spoken of; τοῦ θεοῦ, as the gloss adds: see var. read.) in him (i. e. in himself. The two readings do not differ in sense. The object of the divine testimony being, to produce faith in Christ, the Apostle takes him in whom it has wrought this its effect, one who habitually believes in the Son of God, and says of such an one that he possesses the testimony in himself. What it is, he does not plainly say till below, ver. 11. But easily enough here we can synthetically put together and conjecture of what testimony it is that he is speaking: the Spirit by whom we are born again to eternal Life, the water of baptism by which the new birth is brought to pass in us by the power of the Holy Ghost (John iii. 5, Tit. iii. 5), the Blood of Jesus by which we have reconciliation with God, and purification from our sins (ch. i. 7, ii. 2), and eternal life (John vi. 53 ff.),—these three all contribute to and make up our faith in Christ, and so compose that testimony, which the Apostle designates in ver. 11 by the shorter term which comprehends them all. This is rightly maintained by Düs-terd. as the exegesis: identifying the μαρ-τυρία here with that in ver. 11, as against numerous expositors who make the one differ from the other. It is plain that all evasive senses of ἔχει ἐν αὐτῷ, such as “recipit in se” of Socinus, Grot., Rosen- müller, are inadmissible: he that believeth not God (St. John, as so frequently, proceeds to put his proposition in the strongest light by bringing out the opposite to it.

The reading τῷ θεῷ is internally as well as externally substantiated. The participle with the dative is wholly different from the same above with εἰς τὸν υἱόν. That is the resting trust of faith: thus the mere first step of giving credit to a witness. Huther well fills in τῷ θεῷ by τῷ μεμαρτυρηκότι. And thus it is tacitly assumed that one who does not believe in the Son of God, gives no credit to God Himself) hath made Him a liar (perf. because the state of discredit implies a definite rejection still continuing. On the expression, see ch. i. 10), because he hath not believed in (here, not only, hath not credited, though that was the more shameful rejection of God’s word: but now the full rejection—the refusal to believe in, cast himself on God’s testimony) the testimony which God hath testified concerning His Son.

11.] Wherein this testimony consists. And the testimony (just spoken of) is this, that (consists in this, namely, that . . .) God gave (not, “hath given.” This is of especial importance here, where not the endurance of a state, but the fact of the gift having been once made, is brought out. The present assurance of our possessing this gift follows in the next clause, and in ver. 12) to us (not “decevit,” “promisit,” as Socinus, Schlichting, Episcopius, &c.,—nor as Bede, “dedit . . . sed adhuc in terra peregrinantibus in spe, quam daturus est in cœlis ad se pervenitibus in re”) eternal life, and (ἔτι is not to be supplied, nor does this clause depend on αὕτη ἐστὶν κ.τ.λ., but it is appositional and co-ordinate with it) this life is in His Son (is, as Düs-terd. quotes from Joachim Lange, in Him, οὐσι-ωδῶς (John i. 4, xi. 25, xiv. 6), σωμα-τικῶς (Col. ii. 9), ἐνεργητικῶς (2 Tim. i. 10). Here again, as ever in this Epistle, we have to guard against the evasive and rationalistic interpretations of Socinus, Grotius, Schlichting, al., such as “vitæ æternæ a Deo consequendæ rationem totam inveniri in ipso Jesu” of Socinus: “in pro per,” and “est pro contingit,” of Grot.: “illa vita æterna ipsa est quam Jesus revelavit,” of the same).

12.] Conclusion of the whole argument from ver. 6 dependent on the last clause of ver. 11, and carrying it on a step farther, even to the absolute identity as matter of possession for the believer, of the Son of God, and eternal life. He that hath the Son, hath the life: he that hath not the Son of God, the life hath he not. First notice the diction and arrangement, on which Bengel has well remarked, “Habet versus duo cola: in priore nou additur Dei, nam fideles norunt Filium: in altero additur, ut demum scientifid eles, quanti sit non habere. Priore hemistichio cum emphasi pronunciantum est habet: in altero, vitam.” This latter furnishes a simple and beautiful example of the laws of emphasis in arrangement: ἔχει τὴν ζῶν—τὴν ζῶν ουκ ἔχει. Next, the ἔχειν τὸν υἱόν must not be explained away with Grotius by “verba illa retinere quæ Pater Filio mandavit,” nor ἔχειν τὴν ζῶν, with the same, by “jus certum habere ad vitam æternam.” The having the Son is the possession of Christ by faith testified by the Spirit, the water, and the blood: and the having the life is the actually possessing it, not indeed in its most glorious development, but in all its reality and vitality.

Thirdly, it must be remarked that the question as to whether eternal salvation is altogether confined to those who in the fullest sense have the Son (to the exclusion, e. g., of those who have never heard of Him), does not belong here, but must be entertained on other grounds. See note on 1 Pet. iii. 19. Düsterd. has remarked that the use of ὁ μὴ ἔχων, not ὁ οὐκ ἔχων (cf. οἱ οὐκ ἠλεημένοι 1 Pet. ii. 10), shews that the Apostle is contemplating, at all events primarily, rather a possible contingency than an actual fact: and thus is, primarily again, confining his saying to those to whom the divine testimony has come. To them, according as they receive or do not receive it, according as they are οἱ ἔχοντες or οἱ μὴ ἔχοντες τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ θεοῦ, it is a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death.

13.] This verse seems, as John xx. 30 f., like an anticipatory close of the Epistle: and its terms appear to correspond to those used in ch. i. 4. This view, which is maintained by Düsterd., is far more probable than that it should refer only to what has occurred since ver. 6, as ch. ii. 26 to ver. 18 ff. there (so De Wette): or only to vv. 11, 12, as Huther. Still less likely is it that the concluding portion of the Epistle begins with this verse, as Bengel, Baumg.-Crus., Lücke, Sander, and Tischendorf in his editions. These things wrote I to you that ye may know that ye have eternal life, (to you) that believe in the name of the Son of God (as to the reading, I believe the text, which is found in BN¹ only, to be the “fons lectionum.” The unusual position of the dative seeming hard, it was altered to the nominative as in A al., or transposed with its accompanying words, to follow ὑμῖν. Then the final clause, not having been struck out, was adapted to the preceding ἵνα εἴδητε, or to John xx. 31, from whence came the reading (see Tischdf.) πιστεύσητε. The two readings come, in the sense, to much the same. If the rec. be followed, then the πιστεύητε must be interpreted “continue to believe.” 14—21.] CLOSE OF THE EPISTLE. The link which binds this passage to ver. 13 is the παρῆρσία, taken up again from the εἴδητε ὅτι of that verse. This παρῆρσία is the very energizing of our spiritual life: and its most notable and ordinary exercise is in communion with God in prayer, for ourselves or for our brethren, vv. 14—17. Then vv. 18—20 continue the explanation of the “sin unto death,” and the “sin not unto death,” by setting forth the state of believers as contrasted with that of the world, and the truth of our eternal life as consisting in this. Then with a pregnant caution, ver. 21, the Apostle closes his Epistle.

14, 15.] The believer's confidence as shewn in prayer. And the confidence which we have towards Him (which follows as a matter of immediate inference from the fact of our spiritual life: see ch. iii. 19—21) is this, that if we ask any thing according to His will, He heareth us (this confidence may be shewn in various ways, including prayer as one, ch. iii. 22. And that one, of prayer, is alone chosen to be insisted on here. As regards the construction, there is no ellipsis between ἡ παρ. and ὅτι; “our confidence is this, (the confidence) that . . .,” as some, e. g. Lücke, have thought. ἡ παρῆρσία is itself subjective, the feeling of confidence.

αὐτόν and τὸ θέλημα αὐτοῦ must by all analogy be referred to the Father, not to the Son, by whom we have access to the Father. See especially ch. iii. 21, 22.

The truth that God hears (ἀκούει, as in reff.) all our prayers, has been explained on ch. iii. 22. The condition here viz., that the sin of the brother is not unto death. It does so in the plural, because the αὐτῷ before being indefinite, all such cases are now categorically collected: q. d. "shall give this life, I repeat, to those who sin not unto death"). There is a sin unto death: concerning it I do not say that he should make request (leaving for the present the great question, I will touch the minor points in this verse. First, it necessarily by the conditions of the context involves what is equivalent to a prohibition. This has been denied by many Commentators, "Ora si velis, sed sub dubio impetrandi," says Corn.-a-lap. And it is equally denied, without the same implied meaning being given, by Socin., Schlichting, Grot., Carpov., Neander, Lücke, De Wette, Huther: some of these, as Neander, thinking it implied, that prayer may be made, though the obtaining of it will be difficult,—others, as De Wette, that it will be in vain, others as Huther, that St. John simply says such a case was not within his view in making the above command. And most of even those who have recognized the prohibition, strive to soften it, saying, as e. g. Lyra, that though "non est orandum pro damnatis," yet we may pray for such a sinner, "ut minus peccaret et per consequens minus damnaretur in inferno:" or as Bengel, "Deus non vult ut pii frustra orent, Deut. iii. 26. Si ergo qui peccatum ad mortem commisit ad vitam reducitur, id ex mero provenit reservato divino." Calvin indeed holds fast the prohibition in all its strictness, but only in extreme cases: adding, "Sed quia rarissime hoc accidit, et Deus, immensas gratiæ suæ divitias commendans, nos suo exemplo misericordes esse jubet: non temere in quemquam ferendum est mortis æternæ iudicium, potius nos caritas ad bene sperandum flectat. Quod si desperata quorundam impietas non secus nobis apparet, ac si Dominus eam digito monstraret, non est quod certemus cum justo Dei iudicio, vel clementiores eo esse appetamus." Certainly this seems, reserving the question as to the nature of the sin, the right view of the οὐ λέγω. By an express command in the other case, and then as express an exclusion of this case from that command, nothing short of an implied prohibition can be conveyed.

The second point here relates to the difference between αἰτεῖν and ἔρωτᾶν. The first is petere, the second rogare: as in Cicero, Planc. x. 25, "Neque enim ego sic rogabam ut petere viderer, quia familiaris esset meus." Cf. Trench, N. T. Synonyms, pp. 140—143, edn. 1865. αἰτεῖν is more of the petition of the inferior: "in victum quasi et reum convenit," as Bengel: ἔρωτᾶν is more general, of the request of the equal, or of one who has a right. Our Lord never uses αἰτεῖν or αἰτεῖσθαι of His own requests to God, but always ἔρωτᾶν, John xiv. 16, xvi. 26, xvii. 9, 15, 20. It is true, Martha says, ἴσα ἂν αἰτήσῃ τὸν θεόν, δώσει σοι ὁ θεός, John xi. 22, but it was in ignorance, though in simplicity of faith, see Bengel in loc.: Trench, p. 142: and my note, Vol. I. And this difference is of importance here. The αἰτεῖν for a sin not unto death is a humble and trusting petition in the direction of God's will, and prompted by brotherly love: the other, the ἔρωτᾶν for a sin unto death, would be, it is implied, an act savouring of presumption—a prescribing to God, in a matter which lies out of the bounds of our brotherly yearning (for notice, the hypothesis that a man sees a brother sin a sin unto death is not adduced in words, because such a sinner would not truly be a brother, but thereby demonstrated never to have deserved that name: see ch. ii. 19), how He shall inflict and withhold His righteous judgments.

And these latter considerations bring us close to the question as to the nature of the sin unto death. It would be impossible to enumerate or even classify the opinions which have been given on the subject. Dusterdieck has devoted many pages to such a classification and discussion. I can do no more than point out the canons of interpretation, and some of the principal divergences. But before doing so, ver. 17 must come under consideration). 17] All unrighteousness is sin (in the words πᾶσα ἀδικία we have a reminiscence of ch. i. 9, εἰς ὁμολογῶμεν τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν, πιστός ἐστιν καὶ δικαίος, ἵνα σφῆ ἡμῖν τὰς ἁμαρτίας καὶ καθάρισῃ ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ πάσης ἀδικίας, and also, but not so directly, of ch. iii. 4, which is virtually the converse proposition to this. Here the Apostle seems to say, in explanation of what he has just written, ἁμαρτία οὐ ᾠ πρὸς θάνατον. 18 οἶδαμεν ὅτι πᾶς ὁ ᾠ γε- u ch. iv. 7 reff.

17. om ου 13. 67¹ vulg syr sah æth-rom arm Tert(teste Wtst). (Simly d in ver 16 has την for 1st μη.)

“SIN is a large word, comprehending all unrighteousness whatever: whether of God’s children, or of aliens from Him.” The thoughts which have been brought into these words,—that ἀδικία is a mild word, meant to express that every slight trip of the good Christian falls under the category of sin, and so there may be a sin not unto death,—or, on the other hand, that it is a strong word, as Grot., “ἀδικίαν vocat non quamvis ignorantiam aut obreptionem subitam, sed quicquid peccatur aut eum deliberatione aut dato ad deliberationem spatio,”—or thirdly, as Beza, that “peccata omnia hactenus paria sunt, ut vel minima minime peccati cogitatio mortem æternam millies mereatur . . .” and “omnia per se lethalia esse peccata,”—are equally far from the meaning of the words, whose import is, as above, to account for there being a sin not unto death as well as a sin unto death); and there is a sin not (in this case not μή, because no hypothetical case is put, nor one dependent on judgment, but an objective fact) unto death (not having death for its issue: within the limit of that ἀδικία, from all of which God cleanseth all those who confess their sins, ch. i. 9).

Our first canon of interpretation of the ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον and οὐ πρὸς θάνατον is this: that the θάνατος and the ζωή of the passage must correspond. The former cannot be bodily death, while the latter is eternal and spiritual life. This clears away at once all those Commentators who understand the sin unto death to be one for which bodily death is the punishment, either by human law generally, as Morus and G. Lange, or by the Mosaic law, as Schöttgen,—or by sickness inflicted by God, as our Whitby and Benson; or of which there will be no end till the death of the sinner, which Bede thinks possible (“Potest etiam peccatum ad mortem, p. usque ad mortem, accipi.” But he rejects this himself), and Lyra adopts. This last is evidently absurd, for how is a man to know whether this will be so or not?

Our second canon will be, that this sin unto death being thus a sin leading to eternal death, being no further explained to the readers here, must be presumed as meant to be understood by what the Evangelist has elsewhere laid down concerning the possession of life and death. Now we have from him a definition immediately preceding this, in ver. 12, ὁ ἔχων τὸν υἶδν ἔχει τὴν ζωὴν· ὁ μὴ ἔχων τὸν υἶδν τοῦ θεοῦ τὴν ζωὴν οὐκ ἔχει. And we may safely say that the words πρὸς θάνατον here are to be understood as meaning, “involving the loss of this life which men have only by union with the Son of God.” And this meaning they must have, not by implication only, which would be the case if any obstinate and determined sin were meant, which would be a sign of the fact of severance from the life which is in Christ (see ch. iii. 14, 15, where the inference is of this kind), but directly and essentially, i. e. in respect of that very sin which is pointed at by them. Now against this canon are all those interpretations, far too numerous to mention, which make any atrocious and obstinate sin to be that intended. It is obvious that our limits are thus confined to abnegation of Christ, not as inferred by its fruits otherwise shewn, but as the act of sin itself. And so, with various shades of difference as to the putting forth in detail, most of the best Commentators, both ancient and modern: e. g. Aretius, Luther, Calvin, Beza, Piscator, Corn.-a-lap., Tirinus, Baumg.-Crus., Lücke, Hutler, Düsterd.

Our third canon will help us to decide, within the above limits, what especial sin is intended. And it is, that by the very analogy of the context, it must be not a state of sin, but an appreciable act of sin, seeing that that which is opposed to it is the same kind, as being not unto death, is described by ἐάν τις ἴδῃ ἁμαρτάνοντα. So that all interpretations which make it to be a state of apostasy,—all such as, e. g. Bengel’s “peccatum ad mortem est peccatum non obvium, neque subitum, sed talis status animæ in quo fides et amor et spes, in summa, vita nova, exstincta est,”—do not reach the matter of detail which is before the Apostle’s mind.

In enquiring what this is, we must be guided by the analogy of what St. John says elsewhere. Our state being that of life in Jesus Christ, there are those who have gone out from us, not being of us, ch. ii. 19, who are called ἀπίχριστοι, who not only “have not” Christ, but are Christ’s enemies, denying the Father and the Son (ii. 22), whom we are not even to receive into our houses nor to greet (2 John 10, 11). These seem to be the persons pointed at here, and this the sin: viz. the denial that Jesus is the Christ the incarnate Son of God. This alone of all sins bears upon it the stamp of severance from Him who is the Life itself. As the confession of Christ, with the mouth and in the heart, is salvation unto life (Rom. x. 9), so denial of Christ with the mouth and in the heart, is sin unto death. This alone of all the proposed solutions seems to satisfy all the canons above laid down. For in it, the life cast away and the death incurred strictly correspond: it strictly corresponds to what St. John has elsewhere said concerning life and death, and derives its explanation from those other passages, especially from the foregoing ver. 12: and it is an appreciable act of sin, one against which the readers have been before repeatedly cautioned (ch. ii. 18 ff., iv. 1 ff., vv. 5, 11, 12). And further, it is in exact accordance with other passages of Scripture which seem to point at a sin similarly distinguished above others; viz. Matt. xii. 31 ff., and, so far as the circumstances there dealt with allow common ground, with the more ethical passages, Heb. vi. 4 ff., x. 25 ff. In the former case, the Scribes and Pharisees were resisting the Holy Ghost (Acts vii. 51) who was manifesting God in the flesh in the Person and work of Christ. For them the Lord Himself does not pray (Luke xxiii. 34): they knew what they did: they went out from God's people and were not of them: receiving and repudiating the testimony of the Holy Ghost to the Messiahship of Jesus.

18—20.] Three solemn maxims of the Epistle regarding sin, and the children of God and the world, and our eternal life in Christ, are repeated as a close of the teaching of the Apostle. Ver. 18 seems to be not without reference to what has just been said concerning sin. In actual life, even our brethren, even we ourselves, born of God, shall sin, not unto death, and require brotherly intercession: but in the depth and truth of the Christian life, sin is altogether absent. It is the world, not knowing God, which lies under the power of the wicked one: God's new-begotten children he cannot touch: they are in and they know the True One, and in Him have eternal life. These maxims are introduced with a thrice-repeated οἶδαμεν, the expression of full persuasion and free confidence. They form a triumphant repetition of and anticipation of the attain-

18.] We know that every one who is born of God, sinneth not (see on ch. iii. 9, from which place our words are almost repeated. As explained there and in our summary of these verses there is no real inconsistency with what has been just said. And that there is none the second member of the verse shews): but he that hath been born of God (γεννηθείς, aor. this time. The perf. part. expresses more the enduring abidance of his heavenly birth, and fits better the habitual οὐχ ἁμαρτάνει: the aor. part., calling attention to the historical fact of his having been born of God, fits better the fact that the wicked one toucheth him not, that divine birth having severed his connexion with the prince of this world and of evil. So Düsterd. and Huther. See also the construction according to the true reading below. Sander, in apparent ignorance of the force of the tenses, has curiously taken them exactly vice versa: and Bengel has failed to hit the difference when he says, "Præteritum grandius quiddam sonat quam Aoristus: non modo qui magnum in regeneratione gradum assecutus, sed quilibet qui regenitus est, servat se." The distinction is ingenious, but is not contained in the tenses) it keepeth him ("it," viz. the divine birth, pointed at in the aor. part. γεννηθείς. So the vulg., but omitting the pendent nom., "sed generatio Dei conservat eum." It is this, and not the fact of his own watchfulness, which preserves him from the touch of the wicked one: as in ch. iii. 9, where the same is imported by ὅτι σπέρμα αὐτοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ μένει, κ. οὐ δύναται ἁμαρτάνειν, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ γεγέννηται. The rationalistic Commentators insist on τηρεῖ ἑαυτόν, as shewing, as Socinus, "aliquid præstare eum atque efficere, qui per Christum regeneratus fuerit:" and the orthodox Commentators have but a lame apology to offer. Düsterd. compares ἀγνίσει ἑαυτόν ch. iii. 3. But the reference there is wholly different—viz. to a gradual and earnest striving after an ideal model; whereas here the τηρεῖσθαι must be, by the very nature of the case, so far complete, that the wicked one cannot approach: and whose self-guarding can ensure this even for a day? Cf. John xvii. 15, ἵνα τηρήσης αὐτοὺς ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, which is decisive. There is a possible construction of the clause which I do not remember to have seen suggested, but which should hardly be left out of account. ὁ γεννηθεὶς ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ might be taken as meaning the Son of God: "He that was begotten of God keepeth him." But this would hardly suit the analogy of the Epistle: see e.g. ver. 1 and note), and the wicked one (Satan: see ref. and notes) doth not touch him (Düsterd. approves of Calvin's paraphrase, which is self-condemnatory—"continet se in Dei timore, nec se ita abripi patitur, ut extincto pietatis sensu diabolus et carni totum se permittat"—as the meaning of ὁ πον. οὐχ ἄπτται αὐτοῦ. Of course the words must not be understood as saying that he is not tried with temptation by the evil one: but imply that as the Prince of this world had nothing in our blessed Lord, even so on His faithful ones who live by His life, the Tempter has no point d'appui, by virtue of that their γέννησις by which they are as He is. "Malignus appropinquat," says Bengel, "ut musca lychnum, sed non nocet, ne tangit quidem").

19.] Application of that which is said ver. 18, to the Apostle and his readers: and that, in entire separation from ὁ πονηρός, the ruling spirit of this present world. We know (see summary above) that we (not emphatic: no ἡμεῖς as set over against ὁ κόσμος. It is not the object now to bring out a contrast, but to reassert solemnly these great axioms of the Christian life) are of God (i.e. born of God: identifying us with those spoken of ver. 18), and the whole world lieth in the wicked one (this second member of the sentence does not depend on the preceding ὅτι, but like those of vv. 18, 20, is an independent proposition. τῷ πονηρῷ, by the analogy of St. John's diction, is masculine, not neuter, as Lyra ("in maligno, i. e. in malo igne concupiscentiæ"), Socinus, Selhlichting, Episcopus ("in peccandi consuetudine tenentur"), Grotius (but with an allusion to ὁ πονηρός), al., and E. V. ("lieth in wickedness"). This neuter sense can hardly stand after comparing ch. ii. 13, 14, iii. 8, 10, 14, iv. 4:

John xvii. 14 f., and above all after the preceding verse here. For κείσθαι ἐν in this sense, there is, as in refl., no other example. That in Polybius, vi. 14. 6, ἐν τῇ συγκλήτῳ κείται, "lies in the power or determination of the Senate," is an approximation, but not quite the same sense. θεῶν ἐν γούνασι κείται, so common in Homer, is another. The idea in the power of, and the local idea, seem to be combined. ὁ πονηρός is as it were the inclusive abiding-place and representative of all his, as, in the expressions ἐν κυρίῳ, ἐν χριστῷ, ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, ἐσμέν ἐν τῷ ἀληθινῷ, ver. 20, the Lord is of His. And while we are ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ, implying a birth and a proceeding forth and a change of state, the κόσμος, all the rest of mankind, κείται ἐν τ. π., remains where it was, in, and in the power of, ὁ πονηρός. Some Commentators have been anxious to avoid inconsistency with such passages as ch. ii. 2, iv. 14, and would therefore give κόσμος a different meaning here. But there is no inconsistency whatever. Had not Christ become a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, were He not the Saviour of the whole world, none could ever come out of the world and believe on Him; but as it is, they who do believe on Him, come out and are separated from the world: so that our proposition here remains strictly true: the κόσμος is the negation of faith in Him, and as such lies in the wicked one, His adversary).

20.] Yet another οἶδαμεν: and that in general, as summing up all, the certainty to us of the Son of God having come, and having given us the knowledge of God, and of our being in Him: and the formal inclusion, in this one fact, of knowledge of the true God here, and life everlasting hereafter. Moreover (δέ closes off and sums up all: cf. 1 Thess. v. 23; 2 Thess. iii. 16; Heb. xii. 20, 22, al. fr. This not being seen, it has been altered to καί, as there appeared to be no contrast with the preceding) we know that the Son of God is come (the incarnation, and work, and abiding presence of the Son of God, is to us a living fact. The adjective ἀληθινόν is not subjective, = ἀληθῆ, but objective, in its usual sense of genuine, in distinction from every 'deus fictitiuus.' So Calvin: "verum Deum intelligit non veracem, sed cum qui revera Deus est eum ab idolis omnibus discernat. Ita verus fictio opponitur." And thus the way is prepared for the warning against all false gods, ver. 21): and we are (again, as in vv. 18, 19, this second member is an independent proposition, not dependent on the ὅτι nor on the ἵνα as in the vulgate, "et simus . . .") in (see above on κείται ἐν, ver. 19) the true One (viz. God, as above), in His Son Jesus Christ (i. e. by virtue of our being in His Son Jesus Christ: this second ἐν is not in apposition with, but as αὐτοῦ shews, is expegetic of the former). This (viz. God, the Father: the ὁ ἀληθινός, who has been twice spoken of: see below) is the true God, and eternal life. There has been great controversy, carried on principally from doctrinal interests, respecting the reference of this οὗτος: whether it is to be understood as above, or of ὁ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ Ἰησοῦς χριστός, just mentioned. The Fathers who were engaged against Arian error, and most of the orthodox expositors since, regarding the passage as a precious testimony for the Godhead of the Son, have maintained this latter view, rather doctrinally than exegetically. To this list belong Bede, Lyra, a-Lapide, Trinus, Barthol.-Petrus (the continuator of Estius), Mayer, Luther, Calvin, Beza, Aretius, Piscator, Erasm.-Schmidt, Seb.-Schmidt, Spener, Whitby, Calov., Wolf, Joach. Lange, Bengel, Sander, Stier: and even Episcopus takes this view, not being able, says Düsterd., to bear the caprice and tortuousness of the Socinian exegesis. The opposite doctrinal interest has led many of those who deny this application: e. g. Schlichting (who combats the other view simply by abusing the Trinitarians), Socinus, Grotius, Benson, Samuel Clarke, Semler, which last takes οὗτος in as far as it belongs to ἀληθ. θεός as referring to the Father, in as far as to ζωὴ αἰώνιος, to the Son. To these have succeeded another set of expositors with whom not doctrinal but exegetical considerations have been paramount: e. g. Wetstein, Lücke, De Wette, Rickli, Baumg.-Crusius, Neander, Huther, Hofmann (Schriftb. i. 128), Düsterdieck, Erdmann.

The grounds on which the application to Christ is rested are mainly the following: 1) that οὗτος most naturally refers to the last-mentioned substantive: 2) that ζωὴ αἰώνιος, as a predicate, more naturally belongs to the Son than to the Father: 3) that the sentence, if understood of God the Father, would be aimless and tautological. But to these it has been well and decisively answered by Lücke and Düsterd., 1) that οὗτος more than once in St. John belongs not to the nearest substantive, but to the principal one in the foregoing sentence, e. g. in ch. ii. 22 and in 2 John 7: and that the subject of the whole here has been the Father, who is the ὁ ἀληθινός of the last verse, and the Son is referred back to Him as ὁ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ, thereby keeping Him, as the primary subject, before the mind. 2) that as little can ζωὴ αἰώνιος

1—3.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. The elder (the Apostle, known by this name: see prolegg., "On the writer of the Epistle") to the (not, an: see prolegg. "To whom the Epistle was written") elect lady (see prolegg. ibid.), and to her children whom (οὓς, masc., probably embraces the whole, mother and children of both sexes: see 3 John 1. Ver. 4 is no reason why we should regard the masc. relative as applying to sons only: when proceeding to single out some for praise, as there, he naturally speaks in the masculine) I love in truth (not merely, in reality, as G^c., ἔστι γὰρ καὶ ἐπιπλάστως ἀγαπᾶν, στόματι: but in truth, such truth being the result, as stated below, of the truth of the Gospel abiding in him: "amor non modo verus amor, sed veritate evangelica nititur." Bengel. See 1 John iii. 18, and note on iii. 19), and not I alone, but also all who know the truth (there is no need to limit this πάντες to all dwelling in or near the abode of the Writer, as Grot., Carpzov., De Wette, al., or all who were personally acquainted with those addressed, as Lücke: it is a general expression: the communion of love is as wide as the communion of faith), on account of the truth (objective: God's truth revealed in His Son, see 1 John ii. 4), which abideth in us, and shall be with us (the Apostle continues the construction as if he had previously written ἡ μένει) for ever (cf. John xiv. 16, 17. These words are a reminiscence of our Lord's words there, παρ' ὑμῖν μένει, καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν ἔστί. The future is not the expression of a wish, as some, e. g. Lücke, have supposed; but of confidence, as that also which follows, which takes its tinge and form from this): there shall be with us (by the ἡμῶν the Apostle includes himself in the greeting, as he had before done in the introductory clauses. ἔσται, again, not a wish: see above: we must of necessity connect this second ἔσται with the first. But the very fact of a greeting being conveyed, must somewhat modify the absolute future sense, and introduce something of the votive character.

It is as Bengel, “votum cum affirmatione” —a wish expressed by a confident assertion of its fulfilment) grace, mercy, peace (see reff. Trench says well, N. T. Synonyms, pp. 164, 5, edn. 1865, “χάρις has reference to the sins of men, ἔλεος to their misery. God’s χάρις, His free grace and gift, is extended to men as they are guilty: His ἔλεος is extended to them as they are miserable.” And thus χάρις always comes first, because guilt must be done away, before misery can be assuaged: see further in Trench, and in Düsterdieck, h. l. εἰρήνη is the whole sum and substance of the possession and enjoyment of God’s grace and mercy; cf. Luke ii. 14; Rom. v. 1 (x. 15); John xiv. 27, xvi. 33) from God the Father and from Jesus Christ the Son of the Father (from the Father as their original fountain, who of His great love hath decreed and secured them for us: from Jesus Christ the Son of the Father, this solemn title being used for the more complete setting forth of the union of Jesus with the Father in the essence of the Godhead), in truth and love (not to be understood of the Holy Spirit, the third Person in the blessed Trinity, as Lyra,—nor to be joined with τοῦ υἱοῦ τ. πατρὸς, “filio verissimo et dilectissimo,” as Barthol.—Petrus (continuator of Estius) and Whitby, nor to be filled up by “ut perseveretis,” as Corn-a-lap,—nor to be taken as adding two more to χάρις ἔλεος εἰρήνη, making ἐν = cum, as Tirinus and Schlichting;—nor as Grot., al.—is it “per cognitionem veri et dilectionem mutuum: nam per hæc Dei beneficia provocamus, conservamus, augemus:” but the real sense is an approximation to this last;—truth and love are the conditional element in which the grace, mercy, and peace are to be received and enjoyed. So Bengel, Lücke, De Wette, Huther, Düsterdieck).

4—11.] Truth and love: These were the two ground-tones of the Epistle. And now the Apostle proceeds to describe his joy at
VOL. IV.

finding the children of the ἐκλεκτῇ κυρία walking in truth (ver. 4), and to enforce the commandment to love one another (5, 6); and this in presence of the fact that many deceivers are in the world who would rob us of our Christian reward, and of our share in God (7—9). These are not to be treated as brethren, nor greeted, lest we partake of their evil deeds (10, 11). 4.] I rejoiced greatly (at some definite time indicated by the aor., perhaps: and so it is taken by Huther and Düsterdieck; but it may also be the epistolary aor., as ἔγραφα so often: and this is made more probable by the perf. εὔρηκα which follows. See however 3 John 3), that I have found (there is not a word nor a hint of the assumption of Sander, that this finding was the result of proof and trial. The most obvious interpretation is, that at some place where the Apostle was, he came upon these who are presently mentioned: as in Acts xviii. 2, (ὁ Παῦλος) . . . ἦλθεν εἰς Κόρινθον καὶ εὔρων τινα Ἰουδαίων ὄν. Ἀκύλαν, κ.τ.λ.) of thy children (no τινάς is needed as a supply: it is contained in the participle which follows) walking in truth (i. e. not only in honesty and uprightness, but in that truth which is derived from and is part of the truth of God and Christ: see above on ver. 1. Again, there is no hint whatever given that the rest, or that others, of her children were not walking in truth.
The Apostle apparently, as above, in some place where he was, lit upon these children of the κυρία, and sends her their good report. Respecting the rest, he makes no mention nor insinuation) according as we received commandment from the Father (viz. to walk in the truth: not, as Lücke, to love one another, making this clause a further description of the manner in which they were walking in truth. And τοῦ

5.] And now (so καὶ νῦν, coupling to what has gone before, 1 John ii. 28. It has also a force of breaking off, and passing to that which is the main subject, or most in the Writer's thoughts, which here is, that this walking in truth is a walking after God's commandments in love) I entreat thee (see on ἐρωτῶ and αἰτέω, 1 John v. 15, 16. Here ἐρωτῶ carries, as Schlichting, "blandior quædam admonendi ratio:" with the assumed fact of a right thus to entreat) lady, not as writing to thee a new commandment, but (as writing to thee . . . the construction is not strictly logical) that which we had from the beginning (see on this, 1 John ii. 7), that (ἵνα here is not expegetic of ἐντολή, as so often in St. John, but is to be taken in its proper sense, as the aim of ἐρωτῶ, and dependent on it) we love one another (the expression of the commandment in the first person is a mark of gentleness and delicacy: a sign that he who wrote it kept the commandment himself.)

6.] And ("eine eigenthumliche Kreisbewegung der Gedanken, wie Johannes sie liebt." Düsterd.) this is the love (ἡ ἀγάπη here is subject, not predicate: the love (intended by this command) is this, i. e. may be thus described), that (the explicative ἵνα of St. John) we walk according to His commandments. The commandment (the one commandment in which God's other commandments are summed up) is this, even as ye heard from the beginning that ye should walk in it (the apodosis to αὕτη ἐστίν begins with καθὼς: = "is this,

even that which ye heard from the beginning, that ye should walk in it," viz. in ἀγάπη. ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, as above, ver. 5, and 1 John ii. 7). 7.] The condition of Love is Truth, see ver. 3. And the necessity of fresh exhortation to walk in love, in that love whose condition is truth, lies in the fact that there are many deceivers gone forth, denying the Truth: of whom we are to beware, and not, by extending to them a spurious sympathy, to become partakers with them. Because (see above. ὅτι cannot be referred to βλέπετε ἑαυτοῦς, ver. 8, for its apodosis, as is done by Grot., Carpzon., J. Lange, as this would involve a length of protasis, broken by a parenthetical clause, οὗτός ἐστιν κ.τ.λ., quite alien from St. John's style. Nor can we well understand ὅτι with Bengel, "ratio cur jubeat retinere audita a principio:" because the foregoing is not a command "retinere audita a principio;" this latter particular being only introduced by the way, not as a principal feature) many deceivers (makers to wander, see reff.) went forth (here probably, on account of the aor., "from us," as in 1 John ii. 19. In 1 John iv. 1, it is perf., ἐξεληλύθασιν, where I have preferred the sense, "are gone forth from him who sent them," viz. the evil one. Huther prefers this latter sense here also) into the world (namely) they who confess not (instead of οὐχ ὁμολογοῦντες, the Apostle writes οἱ μὴ ὁμολογοῦντες, thereby not merely characterizing the πλάνοι as not confessing &c., but absolutely identifying all who repudiate the confession which follows, as belonging to the class of πλάνοι. The subjective μὴ is the necessary consequence of such an arrangement, involving an hypothesis within the limits of the relative of,—the repudiation of the confession: see 1 John iv. 3, note) Jesus Christ coming in (the) flesh (ἐρχόμενον, altogether timeless, and representing the great truth of the Incarnation itself, as distinguished from its historical manifestation (ἐλθών, 1 John v. 6), and from the abiding effect of that historical manifestation (ἐληλυθότα, 1 John iv. 2): and all three, as confessions of the Person Ἰησοῦς χριστός, distinguished from the act. with infin. construction: see note on 1 John iv. 2. He who denies the ἐρχεσθαι ἐν σαρκί, denies the possibility of the Incarnation: he who denies the ἔλθειν or ἐληλυθέναι, denies its actuality. Other interpretations, such as that of Ec., εἰπὼν δέ, . . . ἐρχόμενον ἐν σαρκί, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐλθόντα, ἐμφανιστός ἐστιν ὡς τοὺς ἀθεοτοῦντας λέγει τὴν δευτέραν τοῦ κυρίου παρουσίαν, . . . that of Erasmus, Schlicht, Bengel,—"qui veniebat," and of Baumg. Crus., "who was to come," are beside the mark). This (viz., "he that fulfils the above character." No supply, such as ὁ οὖν μὴ ταῦτα ὁμολογεῖ, Ec., is needed. See the same construction, 1 John ii. 22) is the deceiver and the antichrist (see notes on 1 John ii. 18, 22, as to the personal relation of these πολλοί to the one great Antichrist of prophecy. The οὗτος, pointing to a class, makes each one of these, in his place, a representative and "precursor Antichristi"). 8.] The warning is suddenly introduced without any coupling particle, and becomes thereby so much the more solemn and forcible. Look to yourselves (the construction with the reflexive pronoun is not usual, see reff. ἑαυτοὺς here probably implies not as Bengel, "me absente," but "yourselves," as contrasted with the deceivers, that ye too become not as they), that ye lose not the things which we wrought (i.e. that ye, Christian converts, lose not that your Christian state of truth and love which we, Apostles and Teachers, wrought in you. This not being understood, the verbs have been altered in the various texts to the first or to the second person to conform to one another. The Apostles were God's ἐργάται, Matt. ix. 37, 38; Luke x. 2, 7; 2 Tim. ii. 15: the ψευδοῦστολοι were ἐργάται δόλιοι, 2 Cor. xi. 13, κακοὶ ἐργάται, Phil. iii. 2: the true ἔργον was to cause men to believe on Christ, John vi. 29: and this ἔργον the false teachers put in peril of loss), but receive reward in full (what μισθός? The connexion of εἰργασάμεθα with μισθός must not be broken. The idea is a complex one. Ye, our converts, are our μισθός in the day of the Lord: and this has suggested the use of the well-known word, even where it manifestly applies not to the teachers but to the taught, whose μισθός is the eternal life, which shall receive on that day its glorious completion: which is ἔχειν τὸν υἱόν, κ. τὸν πατέρα: see 1 John iii. 2. If this reading be right, the use which Roman-Catholic expositors, as Bart.-Petrus, Mayer, al., have tried to make of this verse to establish the merit of human works ("opera bona per Spiritum Dei facta mercedem apud Deum mereri," B.-Petrus), falls at once to the ground. Nor indeed does it fare much better if either of the other readings be taken. If the whole be in the first person, then the apostolic μισθός, the souls which are to be their hire, must be understood: if in the second, no human merit, but the reward laid up for faithfulness, and for every thing done in His name, must be understood, which is reckoned of grace, and not of debt). 9.] Explanation of this loss, that it is the non-possession of God, which

The expositors who take this reading interpret it, "goeth forward too fast," "maketh false and unsound advance," regarding it, either as ironical (so Huther), or as serious (so Düsterdieck), and not abiding in the doctrine of Christ (i. e. in Christ's doctrine,—that truth which Christ Himself taught. This is far more likely than that the gen. should be objective, as Bengel ("in doctrina, quæ Jesum docet esse filium Dei"), Lücke, Sander, al.: and thus we have the personal gen. after διδαχή wherever it occurs in the N. T.: cf. Matt. vii. 28 ||, Mark iv. 2, John xviii. 19, Acts ii. 42, al. fr.), hath not God (see 1 John ii. 23, v. 12, notes): he that abideth in the doctrine, that man hath both the Father and the Son (see as above. The order in the text is the theological one, the Father being mentioned first, then the Son. That in A &c. (see digest) is the logical and contextual one, seeing that the test is, abiding in the doctrine of Christ. Thus he has Christ, and through Him, the Father).

10, 11.] The exercise of the love of the brethren is conditioned and limited by the truth: and is not to be extended to those who are enemies and impugners of the truth. Those who harbour or encourage such, make common cause with them, and their evil deeds. If any cometh to you, and bringeth not (the indic. after εἰ shows that the case supposed actually existed: that such persons were sure to come to them:

cf. John xi. 12, 2 Cor. ii. 5, 1 John iv. 11. It is not = ἐάν with subj., which always carries a purely hypothetical force, corresponding to an interrogation, whereas the other corresponds to an assertion: e. g. in 1 John ii. 15, ἐάν τις ἀγαπᾷ τὸν κόσμον, which may be resolved, "Does any among you love the world? If he do," &c. On the other hand, εἴ τις ἔρχεται πρὸς ὑμᾶς may be resolved, "Some will come to you," &c., "If any does," &c. this doctrine (the expression ταύτην τὴν διδαχὴν οὐ φέρει points out the person as a teacher, not a mere traveller seeking hospitality. And the οὐ, not μή, distinctly reverses the φέρει: he not only comes without this doctrine, but by so doing brings the contrary doctrine. The absence of testimony for the truth is, in one who brings any testimony at all, equivalent to testifying for error), receive him not into (your) house, and do not bid him good speed: for he that biddeth him good speed, partaketh in his evil deeds (these words must be understood with their right reference: "non de iis qui alieni semper fuerunt ab ecclesia, 1 Cor. v. 10, sed de iis qui volunt fratres haberi et doctrinam evertunt," as Grot. These were not to be received with the φιλοξενία with which all Christian brethren were to be entertained. Such reception of them would in fact be only opening an inlet for their influence. But this is not the point on which the Apostle mainly dwells. It is the κοινωνία which the host in such a case would incur with them and their anti-christian designs, by encouraging them. And this is further impressed by the caution against saying χαίρειν to them: which is to be understood not with Clem.-Alex., of the solemn salutation after prayer, "quoniam in oratione quæ fit in domo, postquam ab orando surgitur salutatio gaudii est et pacis indicium," Adumbrat. in 2 Joan. juxt. fin., p. 1011 P. (not in Migne): nor with Corn.-a-lap., of all intercourse whatever, "omne colloquium, omne consortium, omne commercium cum hæreticis:" but it is a further intensification of the exclusion from the house, and forms a climax, καὶ μὴ = μηδέ: do not even, by wishing him χαίρειν, good speed, and if spoken by a Christian, God speed, identify yourselves with his course and fortunes. If you do, you pronounce approval of his evil deeds, and so far share his guilt, advancing their success by your wishes for it.

This command has been by some laid to the fiery and zealous spirit of St. John, and it has been said that a true Christian spirit of love teaches us otherwise. But as rightly understood, we see that this is not so. Nor are we at liberty to set aside direct ethical injunctions of the Lord's Apostles in this manner. Varieties of individual character may play on the surface of their writings: but in these solemn commands which come up from the depths, we must recognize the power of that One Spirit of Truth which moved them all as one. It would have been infinitely better for the Church now, if this command had been observed in all ages by her faithful sons).

12, 13.] CONCLUSION. Having many things to write to you, I would not (communicate them) by means of paper and ink ("ὁ χάρτης," says Lücke, "the Egyptian papyrus, probably the so-called Augutan or Claudian,—τὸ μέλαν, the ink, commonly made of soot and water thickened with gum,—ὁ κάλαμος (3 John 13), the writing-reed, probably split, μεσοσχιδῆς or μεσότομος,—were the N. T. writing materials"), but I hope to come to you (reff., and note on Rev. i. 9) and to speak mouth to mouth (so πρόσωπον πρὸς πρόσωπον 1 Cor. xiii. 12. στόμα πρὸς στόμα in Xen. Mem. ii. 6. 32 is not said of conversation, that your joy may be filled full (see 1 John i. 4, viz. by hearing from the mouth of the Apostle himself those messages of life and truth which he forbore writing now; not, as Schlichting and Benson, by his bodily presence: still less as Bart.-Petrus, "Apostolos non omnia voluisse scripto committere quæ ad salutem pertinentia vellent nota esse fidelibus, sed multa sermone solo tradidisse" (see also Corn.-a-lapide h. l.), than which it is hardly possible to imagine a sillier comment: for the first Epistle was written with this very same view, i. 4). There greet thee the children of thine elect sister (these words are variously interpreted according as the κυρία is understood of a lady, or of a church. The non-mention of the κυρία herself here seems, it must be confessed, rather to favour the latter hypothesis). See on the whole, the prolegomena.

1.] ADDRESS. The elder (see prolegg. to the two Epistles) to Caius the beloved (on Caius, see prolegg. The epithet τῷ ἀγαπητῷ seems to be used this first time in a general sense: cf. ἐγὼ below), whom I (for my own part: Caius was generally beloved, and the Apostle declares that he personally joins in the affection for him) love in (the) truth (see 2 John 1, note. Ἐν ἀληθείᾳ ἀγαπᾷ ὁ κατὰ κύριον ἀγαπῶν ἐνδιαθέτω ἀγάπη, Ec.). 2—4.] Wish that Caius may prosper, as his soul prospers: and ground of this latter assertion. Beloved (the repetition of ἀγαπητέ is due perhaps more to the fact that the direct address begins here, than to any specific motive, such as the supposed ill-health of Caius, as Düsterd. from Lücke (but not in his 3rd edn.)), I pray that concerning all things thou mayest prosper (περὶ πάντων is taken by many, e.g. Beza (E. V.), Wahl, Lücke (1st edn.), al., and recently by Düsterd., as signifying "above all things:" for which they allege Hom. Il. a. 287, ἀλλ' ὄδ' ἀνὴρ ἐθέλει περὶ πάντων ἔμμεναι ἄλλων. But it has been urged on the other side 1) that Homeric usage is no real index to N. T. usage:

2) that the meaning in Homer is not that sought here: 3) that it would be unnatural for the Apostle to pray for Caius's bodily health and prosperity "above all things." And hence the other modern Commentators, Lücke (edn. 2), De Wette, Huther, Sander, have taken the above meaning: which cannot be impugned, as Düsterd., by saying that περὶ is never found joined with εὐδοῦσθαι, or that ἐν πᾶσιν would be more natural than περὶ πάντων. περὶ with a gen. is too usual signifying reference, to be set aside or judged of by the consideration of the verb which precedes: St. John himself uses it with verbs of very various classes. εὐδοῦσθαι is pass. of εὐδοῶ, of which the neut. form is εὐοδέω, from εὐοδία, to have a καλὴ ὁδός: -ῶ, to make, or give a καλὴ ὁδός. So Hesych., εὐοδάσει, κατευθυνεῖ εὐοδώθη, ἡτοιμάσθη. So that the pass. εὐδοῦσθαι comes to much the same as the intrans. εὐοδεῖν. Its use is common, and regular, in the LXX. See notes on reff., and Lücke's and Düsterd.'s account of the usages, here) and be in health (i.e. bodily health. περὶ πάντων, in all probability, does not belong to ὑγιαίνειν, but only to εὐδοῦσθαι: the latter verb is a particular, taken out of the former, which is general), even as thy soul prospereth (viz. ἐν τῇ κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πολιτεία, Cc.: as is shewn by what follows. There is a passage in Philo, Quis rer. div. hæres, § 58, vol. i. p. 514, in which the well-being of body and soul are similarly compared: θταν εὐδοῦ μοι τὰ ἐκτὸς πρὸς εὐπορίαν καὶ εὐδοξίαν· εὐδοῦ τὰ σώματος πρὸς ὑγείαν τε καὶ ισχύν, εὐδοῦ δὲ καὶ τὰ ψυχῆς πρὸς ἀπόλασιν ἀρετῶν). For I rejoiced greatly when the brethren came and testified to thy truth (the participles ἐρχ. and μαρτ. are in reality timeless, and convey merely the reason of the ἐχάρην: but such a connexion is given in English by the temporal adverb, which has in this case rather a ratiocinative than a purely temporal force. In σου τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, the subst. is necessarily subjective—thy share of that Truth in which thou walkest, see below), even as (almost = how that, see below) thou walkest in truth (this clause is not an independent one, adding the testimony of the Apostle to that of the brethren,—“as (I know that) thou walkest &c. :” but is expegetical of the former deed, and states the substance of the testimony of the brethren, as is shewn by what follows, ἀκούω τὰ ἐμὰ τ. κ.τ.λ.).

4.] Explains ἐχάρην λίαν above. I have no greater (the form μείζοτερος is condemned by some (Phryn. Lob. p. 136, Cc. h. l.) as barbarous. But these comparatives of comparatives and superlatives are found both in classical and in N. T. Greek: see Eph. iii. 8, and note) joy than this (lit. “than these things:” following the usage by which ταῦτα is so often put where one thing only is intended: cf. the formula, καὶ ταῦτα, “idque:” so Plato, Phæd. p. 62, D, ἀλλ’ ὁ ἀνόητος ἀνθρωπος τάχ’ ἂν οἰηθείη ταῦτα, φευκτέον εἶναι ἀπὸ τοῦ δεσπότου. See Kühner, Gr. ii. p. 48), that (explicative, as constantly in St. John after the demonstrative pronoun) I hear of my children walking in the truth (on the participial construction, see note on 2 Johu 7. The expression τέκνα here seems rather to favour the idea that the κυρία of the 2nd Epistle is a Church: but see prolegg. to 2 John).

5—8.] Praise of the hospitality shewn by Caius; and reason of that praise. Beloved (beginning again of new address: see above on ver. 2), thou doest a faithful act (ἄξιον πιστοῦ ἀνδρός, as Cc. and most interpreters. De W. and Bengel explain it “fidele facis: facis quiddam quod facile a te pollicebar mihi et fratribus.” But the other is better. In πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, 1 Tim. i. 15 al., there is possibly the same allusion: not only a saying worthy of credit, but one belonging to those who are of the πίστις) whatsoever thou workest (the aor. betokens these deeds as summed up in one and characterized as πιστόν) towards (so the Lord in Matt. xxvi. 10 describes His anointing by Mary thus, καλὸν ἔργον εἰργάσατο εἰς ἐμέ) the brethren, and that (and those brethren), strangers (φιλοξενία is an especial mark of Christian ἀγάπη, Rom. xii. 13, 1 Tim. iii. 2, Tit. i. 8, Heb. xiii. 2, 1 Pet. iv. 9), who (the above-named ξένοι ἀδελφοί) bore testimony to thy love in the presence of the church (viz. where St. John was at the time of writing. They were Evangelists, ver. 7 : and thus would naturally give the church an account of their missionary journey, during which they were so hospitably treated by Caius) : whom thou wilt do well if thou forward on their way (as Bengel says, the future is a "morata formula hortandi." The aor. part. presents no difficulty : it will then, and not till then, be a good act, when it is done. And this would only be expressed by the fut. with an aor. part. : οὗς καλῶς ποιήσεις προπέμπων would be liable to be rendered "whom thou wilt benefit by forwarding &c."—the present part. being, in such a conjunction, timeless, and merely ratiocinative. On προπέμψ., see reff. and Tit. iii. 13) worthily of God (this qualification belongs to προπέμψας, not as Carpzov., who supplies a καί before ἀξίως, to ποιήσεις,—"well and worthily of God." The words mean, in a manner worthy of Him whose messengers they are and whose servant thou art). For on behalf of the Name (of Christ : see the second ref., and cf. Ignat. ad Eph. 3 and 7, pp. 648 f., and ad Philad. 10, p. 705, δοξάσαι τὸ ὄνομα. Bengel says, "subaudi, Dei, Lev. xxiv. 11. Conf. Jac. ii. 7." But neither of these places applies. O. T. usage is naturally no guide for us here ; and St. James alludes to the name of Christ) they went forth (on their missionary journey : not, as Beza, Erasm.-Schmidt, Wolf, Carpzov., Bengel, "were driven forth : " see more below), taking nothing (receiving nothing by way of benefaction or hire : even as St. Paul in Achaia, 1 Cor. ix. 18, 2 Cor. xi. 7 ff., xii. 16 ff., 1 Thess. ii. 9 ff. : against Huther, who denies the applicability of the comparison, seeing that in St. Paul's case they were Christian churches : but so must these have been, before they would contribute to the support of their missionaries. Notice μηδέν ; implying that it was their own deliberate purpose ; refusing to take any thing : οὐδέν would have expressed only the fact, which might have arisen from the remissness of the ἔθνικοί, and might have been considered by themselves as a hardship. This is the force of μηδέν, and not as Dusterd., that οὐδέν would only have stated the fact, but by μηδέν the Apostle presents it for the consideration of his readers) from the heathens (reff. The expositors spoken of above under ἐξήλθον, take these words as belonging to it, "expulsi sunt a paganis," and interpret μηδέν λαμβάνοντες, "nihil secum asportantes," "omnibus rebus spoliati." Grot., who takes ἐξήλθον of expulsion, understands it to have been "a Judæa, per Judæos incredulos, ob Christum : " and takes the rest as meaning "potuerant in ista calamitate adjuvari misericordia τῶν ἕξω, sed maluerunt omnia Christianis debere." But the whole interpretation is forced and unnatural, and the ordinary one obvious, and very suitable, considering the motive put forward in ver. 8, which clearly shews them to have been workers for God's truth. The pres. part. λαμβάνοντες indicates, not what they did when they ἐξήλθον, but their habit after their setting out : and is as so often, indicative of norm, without any particular time being pointed out. So that we need not, with Huther and Dusterd., imagine that there is an allusion to a missionary maxim, to take nothing from the heathen, in accordance with which they acted). We therefore (ἡμεῖς, contrast to the ἔθνικοί : οὖν, because they μηδέν λαμβάνουσιν ἀπὸ τ. ἡθνικῶν) ought to support (see Strabo in reff. Notice the allusion to λαμβάνοντες above. The word

9, 10.] Notice of the hostility of Diotrophes. I wrote somewhat to the church (the τι does not imply that the thing written was specially important, nor on the other hand does it depreciate; but merely designates indefinitely: cf. Acts xxiii. 17, ἔχει γὰρ ἀπαγγεῖλαι τι αὐτῷ, and Luke vii. 40, Σίμων, ἔχω σοί τι εἰπεῖν; and Matt. xx. 20. The contents of the Epistle are not hinted at. The "scripsissem forsitan" of the vulgate (ἔγραψα ἄν, see var. readd.) has arisen from a foolish notion that the Apostle must not be represented as having written any thing which has been lost to us. The ἐκκλησία is apparently the church of which Caius was a member : not as Bengel, that out of which the missionaries of ver. 7 had gone forth): howbeit (ἀλλά after an affirmative sentence is stronger than the mere adversative but: see Kühner, Gr. ii. p. 436) Diotrophes who loveth pre-eminence (ὁ ὑφαρπάζων τὰ πρωτεία as the ancient Schol. He appears to have been not, as Bede, "hæresiarcha temporis illius quidam superbus et insolens, malens nova dicendo primatum sibi usurpare scientiæ quam antiquis sanctæ Ecclesiæ, quæ Johannes prædicabat, humiliter auscultare maudatis;" so much is not implied in the words, but only that he was an ambitious man who willed that not the Apostle but himself should rule the church) over them (the members of the church, implied in the word ἐκκλησία. The gen. after verbs of pre-eminence, as δὲ ἀριστεύσκε μάχεσθαι Τρώων, Il. ζ. 460: καλλιστεύσει πασέων τῶν ἐν Σπάρτῃ γυναικῶν, Herod. vi. 161. See Kühner, ii. p. 197) receiveth us not (does not recognize our authority: here in an improper sense, but in the next verse probably literal: see there. Its more usual sense in Polybius, who uses it frequently, is to admit of, τοῦ καιροῦ οὐκ ἐπίδεχομένου καταμονήν, iii. 79. 12. The ἡμᾶς wants no explanation such as "monita nostra," "σοστατικὰς nostras," or the like: in rejecting the Apostle's person, he rejected all his influence). On this account, if I should come (see for ἐάν 1 John ii. 28), I will bring to mind (i. e. as Bede, "in omnium notitiam manifestius arguendo producā:" see reff. No αὐτόν is understood: it is not to his mind, but to the minds of all) his works which he doeth (what they were, is explained by the participle following), prating against us (this is the best rendering of φλυαρῶν, which conveys not only the λοιδορῶν, κακολογῶν of Ec., but also that the reproaches were mere tattle, worth nothing, irrelevant: so Eustathius on Il. χ. 361, in Raphael, h. l., τὸ ἐν οὐ δέοντι λόγους προϊέναι φλυεῖν λέγεται κ. φλυαρεῖν. Cf. 1 Tim. v. 13) with wicked speeches: and not satisfied with a dative: the ἐπί, as in χαίρειν ἐπί, and similar expressions, introduces the ground on which the ἀρκεῖσθαι superimponitur) this (more probably plur., as in ver. 4, where the whole matter in question is meant, than as agreeing with the λόγοι πονηροί, which had not been the only things mentioned of him), neither doth he himself receive the brethren (here ἐπιδέχομαι seems best taken in its literal sense, as in Polyb. xxii. 1. 3, πάντας ἐπέδεχτο φιλανθρώπως (if the reading can be depended upon), of entertaining hospitably, see 2 John 10. The ἀδελφοί are probably the same as in ver. 5, the travelling missionaries), and (so καὶ after οὔτε in reff., and Eur. Iph. Taur. 595 f., εἰ γὰρ οὔτε δυσγενής, καὶ τὰς Μυκήνας οἶσθα. τε is more frequently found, see Kühner, Gramm. ii. p. 441. The occurrence of the construction explains itself. It is found when the negative form of the first member of a series of connected clauses, is not possible or not convenient in the second or any following one. Here it might have been, but not so forcibly expressed, οὔτε τοὺς βουλομένους ἐξ) hinders (by forbidding: cf. 1 Thess. ii. 16) those that would (receive them), and casts them (those that would receive the brethren: not, as C. F. Fritzsche, Carpzov., al., the travelling brethren themselves) out of the church (manifestly, by excommunication, which owing to his influence among them he had the power to inflict. There is no difficulty, nor any occasion to take the word as pointing at that which Diotrophes was attempting to do or threatening to do, and so as spoken in irony (Huther): the present tense indicates his habit, as ἐπιδέχεται and ποιεῖ above. He was evidently one in high power, and able to forbid, and to punish, the reception of the travelling brethren. See prolegg.).

11.] Upon occasion of the hostility just mentioned, St. John exhorts Caius to imitate not the evil but the good,—probably as shewn in the praises of Demetrius which follow. Beloved, imitate not evil (τὸ κακόν, abstract), but good (abstract also). He that doeth good, is from God (is born of God, and has his mission and power from Him: as so often in the first Epistle): he that doeth evil, hath not seen God (so in reff., πᾶς ὁ ἁμαρτάνων οὐχ ἐώρακεν αὐτόν, where see note. And yet this expression is called by Lücke and De Wette “unjohanneisch,” and 1 John iv. 20, adduced to prove it, where the word ἐώρακεν is used in its literal physical sense).

12.] The praise of Demetrius. Testimony hath been borne to Demetrius by all (scil. who know him, and have brought report concerning him: “nemo qui non”), and by the truth itself (it is not very easy to explain this expression. If we understand it that the reality of facts themselves supports the testimony of the πάντες, we have abundance of authority for the expression in classical usage: Wetst. gives, from Demost. contra Næar. (qu. page?), δεῖ δ' ὑμᾶς ἐξ αὐτῆς τῆς ἀληθείας τὴν ἀκριβειαν ἀκούσαντας τῆς τε κατηγορίας καὶ τῆς ἀπολογίας οὕτως ᾗδῃ τὴν ψῆφον φέρειν: de corona, p. 232, τούτων τοιοῦτων ὄντων καὶ ἐπ' αὐτῆς τῆς ἀληθείας οὕτω δεικνυμένων. de sa vertu." But there are two reasons against this view: 1) that it does not correspond to the objective fact asserted in the μεμαρτύρηται, nor to the parallelizing of this testimony with that of the πάντες and that of the Apostle: and 2) that thus the Christian and divine sense of ἡ ἀλήθεια which St. John seems always to put forward, would be entirely sunk. Nor is the former of these met either by Schlichting, who says, "si ipsa veritas loqui posset, homini isti præberet testimonium virtutis et probitatis," or by Lücke, "if infallible Christian truth itself, cf. ver. 3, could be asked, it would bear favourable witness of him." Against both there is the μεμαρτύρηται, as matter of fact, not of hypothesis. Baumg.-Crus. would understand that Demetrius had done much for the truth, and his deeds were his witness: but this is hardly a witness of ἡ ἀλήθεια to him. Sander takes refuge in the extraordinary supposition, that the Holy Spirit had revealed to the Apostle the truth respecting Demetrius. Huther regards the testimony borne by the truth to be that furnished by the πάντες, whose evidence was decisive, not from their credit as men, but because they all spoke of and from the truth of Christ dwelling in them. This would reduce this new μαρτυρία to the former, and would in fact besides include the following in it likewise. The best interpretation is that of Düsterdieck (from whom much of this note is derived). The objective Truth of God, which is the divine rule of the walk of all believers, gives a good testimony to him who really walks in the truth. This witness lies in the accordance of his walk with the requirement of God's Truth. It was the mirror in which the walk of Demetrius was reflected: and his form, thus seen in the mirror of God's Truth, in which the perfect form of Christ is held up to us (1 John ii. 6, iii. 3, 16), appeared in the likeness of Christ; so that the mirror itself seemed to place in a clear light his Christian virtue and uprightness, and thus to bear witness to him): yea, we too (see ref. and note there. The contrast here is between his own personal testimony (for to that and not to any collective one does ἡμεῖς refer) and the two testimonies foregoing) bear testimony, and thou knowest that our testimony is true (see reff).

¹³—¹⁵]. Close of the Epistle. I had (not, as Huther, for εἶχον ἄν: it is a pure imperfect, describing that which has not come to pass, but might have done so under certain conditions: cf. Acts xxv. 22: Rom. ix. 3, also alleged by Düsterd. is not quite a case in point. He gives the meaning here well: "I had indeed much to write: that I have not written it is owing to this, that I wish not, &c.") many things to write to thee, howbeit I will not to write (present, not only "to write them," which would be aorist, but to write at all, to write any more) by means of ink and reed (see on 2 John 12): but (on the other hand) I hope immediately to see thee, and (then) we shall speak mouth to mouth (see 2 John 12). Peace be to thee (beautifully paraphrased by Lyra, "Pax interna conscientiæ, pax fraterna amicitia, pax superna gloriæ." Remember our Lord's legacy, John xiv. 27, and His greeting after the Resurrection, εἰρήνη ὑμῖν, John xx. 19, 26). The why St. John mentions φίλοι (see John xi.

sonal character of the Epistle, not addressed as from an Apostle to a church, but as from a friend to his friend, in which mutual friends on both sides would be the senders and receivers of salutation.

The meanings “by,” = ὑπό, cf. 2 Thess. ii. 13, ἀδελφοὶ ἠγαπημένοι ὑπὸ κυρίου; “on account of,” understanding ἠγαπημένοις “beloved by the writer,” are hardly admissible. The only allowable sense of ἐν seems to be, “in the case of,” “as regards,” understanding of course that the love of the Father is spoken of) God the Father (St. Paul ordinarily in his greetings adds ἡμῶν to θεὸς πατῆρ, cf. Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2; Eph. i. 2; Phil. i. 2; Col. i. 2.

2 Thess. i. 1; Philem. 3. It became more frequently used, as might be expected, in the later days of the canon) and kept for Jesus Christ (reserved, to be His at the day of His coming: the dative is commodi. If the question be asked, kept by whom? the answer must be, by God the Father: though constructionally the words are not connected. Observe the perfect participles, giving the signification “from of old and still”): mercy to you and peace and love be multiplied (all three proceeding from God: God’s mercy, God’s peace, God’s love: see ver. 21. In the somewhat similar passage, Eph. vi. 23, εἰρήνη τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς κ. ἀγάπη μετὰ πίστεως ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς κ. κυρίου Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, the love and faith are clearly, in themselves, the gift of God: mutual love or love towards God. 3, 4.] Purpose, and occasion, of the Epistle. 3.] Beloved (only found in the beginning of an Epistle here and 3 John 2), giving all diligence (the phrase σπουδην ποιείσθαι is only found here: see reff. and especially 2 Pet. It implies more than mere earnest desire: a man's σπουδή is necessarily action as well as wish: "giving diligence" seems the exact idea required. The participle like other present participles is contemporaneous with the verb to which it is attached, viz. ἔσχον: cf. John ix. 25, τυφλὸς ὢν ἄρτι βλέπω, "I, who am a blind man, now see") to write to you concerning the common salvation (thus must the sentence be arranged, and not as Lachm. al., with a comma after ὑμῖν, and joining περὶ τῆς κοινῆς ἡμ. σωτηρίας to the next clause. For thus the participial clause loses all its weight and propriety, and indeed the apodosis likewise: see below. περὶ τῆς κοινῆς σωτηρίας may mean, concerning the fact of our common salvation, brought in by Christ; or concerning the means of attaining that salvation, i. e. the doctrines and practices by which it is to be forwarded. Perhaps the latter is here preferable. On the idea conveyed by κοινῆς, see reff. and 2 Pet. i. 1, I found it necessary (reff.: not, as E. V., "it was needful:" nor as Grot., "nihil potius habui, quam ut:") the ἀνάγκη was not part of the σπουδην ποιείσθαι, but supervened on it owing to the circumstance to be mentioned in the next verse) to write to you (notice the aorist here following the present before: I was most desirous to write (present expressing merely the general fact of writing) . . . : but I found it necessary to write (at once: to have written, "epistolam absolvere") . . .) exhorting (you) to contend earnestly for (cf. συν-αθλοῦντες τῇ πίστει, Phil. i. 27: the ἐπί gives the purpose for which the fight is to be waged) the faith (objective here: the sum of that which Christians believe: "fides quæ creditur" not "quæ creditur") once for all ("particula valde urgens: nulla alia dabitur fides," Bengel. This is obscured by the "once" of the E. V., which represents merely "olim," not "semel") delivered to the saints (i. e. Christians: believers, as in reff. The meaning then of this verse is, that St. Jude, who was before earnestly desirous to write to the Church universal concerning the salvation which is common to us all (De Wette, after Sherlock, supposes that St. Jude was actually engaged on a larger and more general Epistle, and was compelled to break it off by the necessity mentioned. This may have been so: but we can hardly gather so much from the words), found urgent occasion at once to do so, respecting not merely nor directly that common salvation, but one point, viz. the keeping inviolate the faith once for all delivered to God's people. And the reason of this necessity which arose, now follows). 4.] For there crept in (aor. explaining the arising of the occasion of his thus writing. On παρεισεδυσαν, cf. 2 Pet. ii. 1, παρεισεδουσιν, and note: also Gal. ii. 4, where we have both παρεισεδουσιν and παρεισήθον. Secrecy, and lack of legitimate introduction, are plainly expressed in this word. the various meanings of the word are discussed: 2) that of publicity, "openly," taking "to proscribe" as the sense of the word. But it is against this latter that this sense is never found in the N. T.: and that "proscribed," if taken in its usual meaning, will not admit of εἰς τοῦτο τὸ κρίμα following it. Wolf's interpretation, "qui dudum sunt accusati in hoc iudicium," lets go the proscripti altogether. There can be little doubt then that we must keep πόσ to its temporal sense, as indeed do Ec., Thl. (but understanding the reference wrongly: προγεγραμμένους δὲ αὐτοῦς ἔλεγεν, ὅτι καὶ Πέτρος κ. Παῦλος περὶ αὐτῶν εἶρηκεν ὅτι ἐν ἐσχάτοις χρόνοις ἐλεύσονται πλάνοι τοιοῦτοι κ.τ.λ.), and most recent Commentators. Then, thus understanding it, to what time and fact are we to refer such designation of them?

Clearly not to God's eternal purpose, in this place, from the term πάλαι, which, as Huther remarks, is never used of that purpose, but points to some fact in time.
And if so, then the previous writing down of these men can only point to the O. T. prophecies. In that case there is a pregnant construction, "of old fore-described (and destined)." What special description of them is intended, might be difficult to say were it not for the quotation below ver. 14 from the prophecy of Enoch. The warnings contained in the historical facts adduced below may also be meant. It may be observed that the ultra-prædesti-narians, Beza and Calvin, find, as we might expect, strong defence for their views in their interpretation here. Beza indeed gathers from this place, "hoc æternum Dei decretum non modo eventum rerum, sed ipsas imprimis personas comprehendere" to this judgment (what judgment, or rather result of judgment? "Iudicium de quo mox," as Bengel: the sentence which St. Jude has in his mind and proceeds in the following verses to unfold.

κρίμα, as so often, though not = κατὰκρίμα, yet gets the condemnatory meaning from the character of the context), impious, changing the grace of our God (τὴν χάριτα, the gift of grace, the state of salvation, in which our sins are forgiven us and we are admitted into the freedom of God's children. ἡμῶν, drawing closer the bond of God's true children to Him and one another, and thus producing greater abhorrence of those who have thus abused His grace) into lasciviousness (the words might mean, "perverting the grace of our God in the direction of, for the purpose of, lasciviousness:" and so De Wette: but it is against this, that μετατιθέναι in reff. is simply to change, not to pervert: and we therefore must understand, as above, that they made the state of grace and Christian liberty into a state of (moral) licence and wantonness: as Bede, "hanc ejus gratiam transferunt in luxuriam, qui nunc tanto licentius et liberius peccant quanto minus se vident asperitate legis de admissis facinoribus examinari"), and denying (see 2 Pet. ii. 1) the only Master, and our Lord Jesus Christ (in 2 Pet. ii. 1 δεσπότης is used of Christ: which circumstance might tempt us to refer it to Christ here also: and so Bengel, De Wette, Stier, al. But probability seems to weigh on the other side. In every other place (see reff.) δεσπότης is used of God: 2) the addition μόνος seems to bind this meaning to it here: (3) the denial of God by disobeying His law is the epexgetic resumption of the last clause: 4) δεσπότην κ. κύριον are hardly distinguish-able if both applied to Christ. For these reasons I must agree with Huther, in regarding the rejected θεόν as having been, although a gloss, yet a true one:
and would remind the reader, once for all, that the reference of any term in the parallel place of 2 Peter is no guide for us here, seeing that it belongs to the ex-

5—7] Examples of Divine vengeance.

5.] First example: unbelieving Israel in the wilderness. Cf. Heb. iii. 16—iv. 5.
But (solemn contrast to the conduct just mentioned) I wish to remind you, knowing as ye do (better here than “although ye know,” on account of ἀπαξ. “Causa, cur admoneat duntaxat; quia jam sciant, semelcogue cognitum habeant.” Bengel. The E. V. is doubly wrong: in rendering εἰδώς as an aor. part., “though ye . . . knew,” and in giving to ἀπαξ the signification of “olim,” “once”) once for all (i. e. having once for all received the knowledge of) all things (all that refers to that of which I am speaking: the τοῦτο of the rec. was a good explanation: but πάντα is more forcible, and carries with it a latent admo-nition, to apply other examples for yourselves), that Jesus (critical principles seem to require this remarkable reading. It is not entirely preceded by 1 Cor. x. 4: for there St. Paul uses not the personal human name, but χριστός, in which there is no such difficulty. The only account to be given seems, that the Person designated by the two names being the same, they became sometimes convertibly used in popular exhortation. On the fact see Exod. xiv. 19; xxiii. 20, 23; xxxii. 2; Isa. lxiii. 9, where however note the remarkable rendering of the LXX), having saved the people (perhaps “a people:” λαός is not one of those words of which we can say that they are constantly found without the art. where yet their meaning is definite: cf. Acts xv. 14, Rom. x. 21, 2 Cor.
 vi. 16, Heb. viii. 10, 1 Pet. ii. 9 (10)).
 But we are never safe in strictness on this point in these later Epistles; and especially when an objective case is thus thrown forward into emphasis, which emphasis often does the work of the definite article) out of the land of Egypt, secondly (not as E. V., “afterward:” still less with Grot., Wolf, “ex contrario:”

but it indicates a second deed of the Lord, His first-mentioned having been the deliverance out of Egypt. By this τὸ δεύτερον the former aor. part. is marked as being not contemporary with but antecedent to the aor. verb following) destroyed them that believed not (viz. by forbidding their entrance into the land of promise (cf. Heb.
 iii. 18), and slaying them in the wilderness.
 This example is not mentioned in 2 Pet. ii., but instead of it, the judgment of the flood).

6.] Second example:
 the rebel angels. See 2 Pet. ii. 4. And (τε shews that the connexion with the foregoing is very close) angels, those which kept not (ἀγγέλους is probably indefinite, and then the art. τοὺς designates those angels who are meant. μὴ stands with the part., not οὐ, because μὴ τηρήσαντας conveys not only the fact (cf. οἱ οὐκ ἠληθμένοι, 1 Pet. ii. 10), but the reason for what follows: cf. Matt. xviii. 25, μὴ ἔχοντος αὐτοῦ ἀποδοῦναι ἐκέλευσεν αὐτὸν ὁ κύριος αὐτοῦ πρᾶθῆναι. See Acts xxii.
 34: Luke xii. 47, ἐκείνος ὁ δοῦλος ὁ . . . μὴ ἐτοιμάσας μηδὲ ποιήσας . . . δαρήσεται πολλάς: and many more examples in Winer, edn. 6, § 55, where the whole matter is ably discussed) their own dignity (some interpret ἀρχή, as E. V., “first estate,” “original condition.” So Erasm., Calv., and Beza, “originem:” Stier, “ihren ersten Grund:” some again, “the government which was over them,” viz. that of God: so Ollarius in a dissertation on this passage, cited in Wolf, h. l.
 But seeing that angels are often in the N. T. called ἀρχαί, as they also were among the Jews, and that such meaning answers best to the parallel clause which follows, there can be little doubt that the Vulg. “principatum” is right. The fact alluded to is probably that which is obscurely indicated in Gen. vi. 2.
 See prolegomena), but left their own τηρήσαι) against the judgment of the great day (at the end of the world) in eternal bonds under darkness (cf. Hes., Theogon. 729, ἔμβα θεοι Τιτῆνες ὑπὸ ζόφον ἠερόεντα | κεκρύφαται βουλῆσι Διὸς νεφεληγερέταο | χάρω ἐν εὐρώεντι. The ὑπὸ in both cases is to be accounted for by the darkness being considered as brooding over them, and they under it. There is apparently a difference which we cannot explain, between the description of the rebel angels here and in || 2 Pet., and that in the rest of the N. T., where the devil and his angels are said to be powers of the air, and to go about tempting men. But perhaps we are wrong in absolutely identifying the evil spirits mentioned here with those spoken of in 2 Pet.).

7.] Third Example: Sodom and Gomorrhah. See 2 Pet. ii. 6. How (not "even as," E. V.; "wie auch," Luther; "similiter," Semler, al.; nor does it answer to ὁμοίως below, ver. 8; but is dependent on ὑπομῆσαι ἡμᾶς βούλομαι above, ver. 5, and parallel with ἔτι there: see reff.) Sodom and Gomorrhah, and the cities about them, following fornication (the ἐκ, as in ref. Gen., seems to mean, to its fulfilment, thoroughly, without reserve: hardly, as Stier, "beyond the bounds of nature," though this was so) in like manner to these (τούτοις, the angels above mentioned. The manner was similar, because the angels committed fornication with another race than themselves, thus also ἀπελθόντες ὀπίσω σαρκὸς ἑτέρας. So τούτοις is taken by Lud.-Cappell., Herder, Angusti, Schneckenberger, Achmann, De Wette, Arnaud, Stier, Huther. But other references have been attempted. Beza, Est., Calov., Krebs, understand the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrhah to be intended: justifying the construction by such passages as Jos. Vita 69, τίνα τρόπον

ἐξαρπάσω τὴν Τιβεριάδα τῆς Γαλιλαίων ὀργῆς ἔτι αὐτούς. But it is fatal to this, that thus we should have αἱ περὶ αὐτὰς πόλεις as the main subject of the sentence, and Sodom and Gomorrhah only mentioned by the way. Again, Bengel and Rosenmüller have referred τούτοις to the ungodly men who are being treated of. But this is still less likely, seeing that they come in ver. 8, evidently after a series of examples in which they have not been mentioned, with ὁμοίως μέντοι καὶ οὗτοι and going away after (see reff. Here more stress is to be laid on the ἀπ-, than in those passages: it was a departure from the appointed course of nature and seeking after that which was unnatural) other flesh (than that appointed by God for the fulfilment of natural desire: as Ec., σάρκα ἑτέραν τὴν ἄρρενα φύτιν λέγει. ὡς μὴ πρὸς συνουσίαν γενέτωσιν συντελοῦσαν: the sin of Sodom was afterwards common in the most enlightened nations of antiquity, see Rom. i. 27. But in all probability Sodom and Gomorrhah must be numbered among those whose sin went farther even than this: cf. Levit. xviii. 22–25. See 2 Pet. ii. 10), are set forth as an example (reff. Libanius says of Troy, κεῖται παράδειγμα δυστυχίας), undergoing (to this day, pres. part. alluding to the natural phenomena of the Dead sea: cf. Wisd. x. 7, οἷς ἐπὶ μαρτύριον τῆς πονηρίας καπιζομένη καθέστηκε χέρσος: and Winer's Realw., "Sodtes Meer") the just punishment of eternal fire (δίκην ὑπέχειν, see reff.: especially 2 Macc., and add δίκην τείν, 2 Thess. i. 9. πυρὸς αἰωνίου is far better joined with δίκην than with δεῖγμα as Huther: and the sense is, undergoing the punishment, as may even now be seen, of eternal fire of that fire which shall never be quenched).

following the same destructive courses. In like manner nevertheless (i. e. notwithstanding these warning examples) these men in their dreams (ένυπνιαζόμενοι, by the construction of the sentence which proceeds with σάρκα μὲν μαιίνουσιν, κυρ. δὲ ἀθετοῦσιν, δόξας δὲ βλασφημοῦσιν, —must belong not to the first member alone, but to all. This necessity precludes the whole class of meanings represented by “de somniis, in quibus corpus polluitur:” explained by Calv., “est metaphorica loquutio, qua significat, ipsos esse tam hebetes, ut sine ulla verecundia ad omnem turpitudinem se prostituunt.” And those being got rid of, and a fortiori the interpretation given by Bretschneider, “falsis oraculis decepti, vel falsa oracula edentes” (see reff.),—we have but this left, that the word should represent that state of dreaming in the sleep of sin, out of which men are so often called on to awake to righteousness and the light of Christ: so (in Huther) Horneus: “tam insipientes sunt, ut quasi lethargo quodam sopiti non tantum impure vivant, sed etiam quæ non norunt tam audacter vituperent:” and Arnaud (ibid.), “cependant ceux-ci, comme des gens qui agissent sans savoir ce qu'ils font, comme s'ils rêvaient, pour ainsi dire. . . .”) defile the flesh (by unnatural lusts, as in ver. 7. σάρκα, generally: not, ‘their flesh,’ but our common flesh), and despise lordship and speak evil of glories (of what sort? Calv., Beza, Grot., Leclerc, Wolf, Semler, al., understand those of kings and Caesars: Ec. alt., Hammond, include ecclesiastical rulers and Apostles. But to neither of these meanings can vv. 9, 10 be fitted: and it becomes therefore necessary to understand the words of celestial lordships and dignities: probably in both cases those of the holy angels. So De Wette: similarly Huther, but understanding κυριότητα of God, and δόξας of the angels.

It is against this last view, that κυριότης, in reff. Eph. Col., is used of angels. Philo de Monarchia i. 6, vol. ii. p. 218, says, δόξαν δὲ σὴν εἶναι νομίζω τὰς σε δορυφορούσας δυνάμεις. The ancient interpretations were curious, as given in the Oxf. Catena: τὴν μίαν κυριότητα κ. δόξαν τῆς ἁγίας Τριάδος βλασφημοῦντες:—again, δόξας ἐκάλεσε τὰς δύο διαθήκας, ὡς ὁ Παῦλος φησὶν, εἰ γὰρ ἡ διακονία τῆς κατακρίσεως δόξα, πολλῶ μᾶλλον ἢ διακονία τῆς δικαιοσύνης δόξα: and so Severus also, and Ec. alt.): 9.] But Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed concerning the body of Moses, dared not (by the context, from reverence for Satan’s former glory) bring against him a judgment of evil speaking (i. e. as E. V., a railing accusation: a sentence savouring of, belonging to, βλασφημία; not as Calov., “ultionem de blasphemia sumere:” the blasphemy is not one spoken by, but against, the devil), but said, The Lord rebuke thee (the source of the tradition to which St. Jude here refers as familiar to his readers, is not known with any certainty. Origen, περὶ ἀρχῶν, iii. 2. 1, vol. i. p. 138, says, “primo quidem in Genesi serpens Evam seduxisse describitur: de quo in Adscensione Mosis, cujus libelli meminit in Epistola sua Apostolus Judas, Michael archangelus cum diabolo disputans de corpore Mosis, ait. . . .” Ec. h. l. says, λέγεται τὸν Μιχαὴλ τὸν ἀρχάγγελον τῇ τοῦ Μαῦσέως ταφῇ δεδικονηκέναι, τοῦ διαβόλου τοῦτου μὴ καταδεχομένου, ἀλλ’ ἐπιφύροντος ἔγκλημα αὐτῷ τοῦ Αἰγυπτίου φόνου, ὡς αὐτοῦ ἦντος τοῦ Μαῦσέως, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο μὴ συγχωρεῖσθαι αὐτὸν τυχεῖν ἐντίμου ταφῆς. No such tradition is found in any apocryphal or rabbinical book now extant. In the targum of Jonathan in Deut. xxxiv. 6, it is stated that the grave of Moses was given into the special custody of Michael. See also several Rabbinical legends having more or less reference to the point in Wetstein. Some, mentioned as early as Severus in the Catena, have given an allegorical interpretation, understanding by τὸ σῶμα Μωϋσέως the law, or Jewish polity, or even people: and, thus interpreting, fix the occasion very variously: at the giving of the law (τινὲς in Severus): at the siege under Hezekiah, or the rebuilding under Zerubbabel (Starck, in Wolf). All such explanations are of course out of the question: and the literal matter of fact alone to be held fast. It is, however, remarkable, that the same words, ἐπιτιμῆσαι (ἐν) σοι κύριος, are spoken by the angel (κύριος, LXX) to the devil in Zech. iii. 1—3. This has led some, e. g. Bede, to imagine, that this was the occasion referred to, when Joshua and Satan stood as adversaries concerning the deliverance of Israel from captivity. Another and more curious explanation is given in the Catena: ὅτε ἤγαγεν (ὁ Μιχαήλ) Μωϋσῆν ἐν τῷ ὄρει ἔνθα μετεμορφώθη ὁ κύριος, τότε ἔλεγεν ὁ διάβολος τῷ Μιχαήλ, ἐψεύσατο ὁ θεός εἰσαγαγὼν τὸν Μωϋσῆν, ἔνθα ὤμοσε μὴ εἰσελθεῖν αὐτόν. The whole matter is thoroughly discussed, and every source of illustration exhausted, in Rampf, Der Brief Judæ u. s. w. pp. 201—253. His conclusion, in which I entirely agree, is that St. Jude took the incident from primitive tradition, which tradition slightly modified, is also given by the prophet Zechariah. That the incident is related as matter of fact, and not as an “argumentum ad hominem,” is evident by the very form of it. That, being thus related as matter of fact, it is matter of fact, is a conclusion which will or will not be made, according as we are or are not persuaded of the authenticity of our Epistle as a part of canonical Scripture: and according as we esteem that canonical Scripture itself).

10.] Contrast of the behaviour of these persons to that just related. 2 Pet. ii. 12. These on the other hand, whatever things they know not, speak evil of (the reference in ὅσα μὲν οὐκ οἶδασιν is to the spiritual world. Those who understand κυριότητα and δόξας above of human authorities, are at a loss for an explanation here: so Arnaud, “il est assez difficile de préciser, quelles étaient ces choses qu’ignoraient ces impies”): but whatever things naturally, as the irrational animals, they understand (viz. the objects of sense: of which σὰρξ ver. 8 has already been mentioned as one. φυσικῶς, as Ec., φυσικῆ ὁρμῇ ἀδιακρίτως: Wetst. cites Xen. Cyr. 7, μάχη, ἣν ὄρω πάντας ἀνθρώπους φυσικῶς ἐπισταμένους: but it appears from Sturz, Lex: Xen. φύσις, 1. f. that the place is Cyr. ii. 3. 5, and the word φύσει, not φυσικῶς. In Xen. Apol. Socr. iii. 9. 1, we have ἡ ἀνδρεία πότερον εἴη διδακτὸν ἢ φυσικόν. In 2 Pet. ii. 12, the comparison to irrational creatures is not confined to the sort of knowledge which they have, but is extended to the persons themselves and their conduct), in these (in the clement and region of these) they corrupt themselves (or, are depraved).

11.] The description is interrupted by a denunciation on them for having followed in the steps of former ungodly men. Woe unto them (see refl.: from which it appears that Bengel is not exact, when he says “uno hoc loco unus hic apostolus ræ intentat”): for they went by the way (the dat. is probably one of rule, cf. refl., rather than one following ἐν understood. The orists ἐπορεύθησαν, &c. are probably proleptic, as looking back on their course; as those in John xvii.,—ἐγὼ σε ἐδόξασα ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, &c. In an English version we are almost compelled to render these by our perfect, “they have gone,” &c.) of Cain (how? Ec. answers, δὴ τῆς ἀδελφοκτονίας, by perverse doctrine, or even according to his interpretation of ἐνυπνιαζόμενοι above, by abusing that process by which men might be born into the world: Grot., “Cain fratri vitam caducam ademit: illi fratribus adimant æternam.” But these explanations do not seem to fit the context, where as yet no indication has been given of their seducing power. Some (e. g. Lyra) have answered, from their persecuting the believers: but neither does this appear in the context: others, as De Wette and Arnaud, have regarded Cain simply as a representative of all bad men: Schneckenb., as that of all unbelievers, according to Jewish tradition (“respondit Cain . . . non est iudicium nec iudex, nec est aliud sæculum,” with ἐν implied, "perished in," i. e. as included in, "the gainsaying of Korah," i. e. when we read of Korah and his company perishing in their gainsaying, we read of these too, as perishing after the same example. This latter seems preferable, on account of the parallelism with the other two clauses) of Korah (the common point being, that they like Korah despised God's ordinances. ἀντιλογία, because Korah and his company ἀντέλεγον τῷ Μωϋσεῖ. See reff., and cf. τὸ ὕδωρ τῆς ἀντιλογίας, Num. xx. 13 (24), xxvii. 14; Deut. xxxii. 53, xxxiii. 8; Ps. lxxx. 7, cv. 32).

&c. Targ. Hieros. ad Gen. iv. 7: see also Philo, "quod deterins," &c., p. 155 ff., De agriculturâ, p. 169. De Wette). The most probable answer is that given by Stier and Huther, that the point of comparison is that selfish regard and envy which was at the root of Cain's sin, and rushed after (ἐκχυθῆναι, "effundi in," as Tacitus, Ann. i. 54, "Mæcenate effusus in amorem Bathylli:!" so Polyb. xxxii. 11. 4, οἱ δ' εἰς ἐταίρας ἐξεκέχυντο: Clem. Al. Strom. ii. 20 (118), p. 491 P., εἰς ἡδονὴν ἐκχυθέντες) the error of Balaam for reward (such, and not as De Wette, "they were poured out (ruined) by the deception of the reward of Balaam." So also Horneius, "deceptione mercedis qua deceptus fuit Balaam, effusi sunt." For this latter disturbs the parallelism of the three clauses, in which we have τῇ ὀδῷ τοῦ Κάιν, . . . τῇ πλάνῃ τοῦ Βαλαάμ, . . . τῇ ἀντιλογία τοῦ Κορέ, strictly correlative. De Wette's reasons for his view are (1) that the ordinary rendering severs the purpose, "for reward," from the error of Balaam: 2) that "for reward" does not suit ἐξεχύθησαν, which implies recklessness. But it may be answered to 1) that this by no means follows: for under the μισθοῦ may be well implied, "as Balaam did," or we may take μισθοῦ—ἐξεχύθησαν as one idea, "they ran-greedily-for reward," and τῇ πλάνῃ τοῦ Β., after the error of Baalam, i. e. as Balaam did in his πλάνῃ: and to 2) that although ἐκχυθῆναι implies recklessness, yet it may be reckless pursuit of some favourite end, as in "alienari in libidinem." As to the construction, πλάνῃ may be either the normal dative, as τῇ ὀδῷ above, or the dat. of direction, = εἰς τὴν πλάνην: and the gen. μισθοῦ is the usual one of price, as in 1 Cor. vii. 23, τιμῆς ἡγοράσθητε), and perished in the gainsaying (ἀντιλογία, either the instrumental dative, "perished by gainsaying, as Korah," or the dative

12, 13.] Continuation of the description of these ungodly men. 2 Pet. ii. 13, 17. These are the rocks (which are) in your love-feasts (σπιλάδες, αἱ ὑφαλοι πέτραι, Etymol. M. Cf. Od. ε. 405, ἀλλ' ἄκται προβλήτες ἔσαν, σπιλάδες τε πάγοι τε. See Wetst.'s note. They are the rocks on which the ἀγάπαι stand in danger of being wrecked. Cf. Cc., as quoted under ἀφόβως below. It is unnecessary and unjustifiable to attempt to give σπιλάδες any other meaning, as some have done on account of the σπιλοι in 2 Pet. ii. 13. But each passage must stand on its own ground. See Palm and Rost's Lex., who however give at the end, = ὁ σπιλος, citing for it this passage and Orph. lith. 614. Arnaud endeavours to unite both meanings, resting on the etymology as given by Eustathius (see Wetst.), αἱ παράλαι πέτραι, παρὰ τὸ σπιλοῦσθαι τῇ ἄχνη: "les rochers continuellement battus par les flots de la mer et souillés par son écume:" but this is too far-fetched. See by all means the illustrations in Wetstein. As regards the construction, we might, as Stier, take οἱ with σπιλάδες: but the above may, supplying ὄντες, seem better, as ἀγγέλους τοὺς μὴ τηρήσαντας κ.τ.λ. ver. 6. ἀγάπαις has generally been taken to refer to the love-feasts: the ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις γινόμεναι τράπεζαι, ὡς καὶ Παῦλος φησιν ἐν τῇ πρὸς Κορινθίους, ἃς καὶ ἀγάπας ἐκάλουν: see Winer, Realw. Erasmus will keep the ordinary meaning, "in dilectionibus vestris," or "inter charitates vestras." But the συνευωχούμενοι seems to fix the other. St. Peter has for ἀγάπαις, ἀπάταις, as at present read: see note there), feasting with you (συνευωχούμενοι may mean, feasting together: but the ὑμῶν preceding makes the other more probable) fearlessly (ἀφόβως is joined with ἐαυτ. ποιμ. by Erasmus, Beza (and consequently E. V.), Tricæus, and Stier: but thus συνευωχ. would be left standing very badly alone. "Cum timore colenda sunt convivia sacra. Convivari per se nihil vitii habet. Ideo 'sine timore' huic verbo annexi debet," Bengel. Cc. mentions both arrangements: ἀφόβως συνευωχούμενοι, τουτέστιν, μηδένα φόβον τοῖς συνευωχουμένοις προσδοκῶσιν, ἐξαιφνης ὡς περ σπιλάδες ἐπαγοντες αὐτοῖς τὸν ὕλεθρον τῶν ψυχῶν. ἤ, πρὸς τὸ ποιμαίνοντες, τό, ἀφόβως ἐαυτοῖς συντάττοντες), pasturing their own selves (using the ἀγάπα, not for their legitimate purpose, the realization of the unity of Christians by social union, but for their own purposes, the enjoyment of their lusts, and the furtherance of their schemes. See Ezek. xxxiv. 1 ff., the parallelism of which has however been too far pressed here by Grot. ("se dum saginent, gregem negligunt"), Bengel ("non gregem"); which thought does not seem to be in the context, but merely that they feed and pasture themselves in the ἀγάπαι, having no regard to the Shepherd (or shepherds) set over them. Erasmus widens the sense too far—"suo ductu et arbitrio viventes"): clouds without water (see on πηγαὶ ἄνδρῳ in 2 Pet. ii. 17. Water is expected from clouds), carried out of course by winds (here our text is the more concise: St. Peter having, as above, the πηγαὶ ἄνδρῳ separate from the ὑμίχλαι, ὑπὸ λαίλαπος ἐλαυνόμεναι. Cf Prov. xxv. 14, Heb. or E. V. παραφερόμεναι, borne by, or as above, borne out of their course, hither and thither), autumn trees (i. e. as trees are in the late autumn (ἄκαρπα explaining it, see below): as Bengel, "arbor tali specie qualis est autumnò extremo, sine (foliis et?) pomis:" not "frugiperdæ," as Grot.: and so Erasmus, Beza (and consequently E. V.), al., and Stier, for which meaning there is no authority in usage: as neither for Schöttgen's, "quæ non nisi auctumno senescenti fructus ferunt immaturos et nulli usui futuros"), without fruit (as trees at the time above mentioned; but there is nothing in this word to indicate whether fruit has been on them or not), twice dead (it is not easy to explain these words in reference to trees. For that we must do so, and not, as Beza, Est., Beugel, Schneckenb., al., desert the similitude, and understand it of spiritual death twice inflicted, or of death here and in eternity (so Grot.: "neque hic bonum habebunt exitum, neque in sæculo altero"), must be evident by ἐκριζωθέντα following. Cc. says, τὰ φθινοπωρινὰ δένδρα δις ἀποθνήσκοντα. ἐν τε τῇ τοῦ καρποῦ αὐτῶν ἀποβολῇ, καὶ ἐν τῇ τῶν φύλλων ἀπορροῇ: and then he explains the first particular as above: Beza, Rosenm. explain δις by "plane," "prorsus," which meaning, though denied by Bretschneider, De Wette illustrates by "bis dat qui cito dat:" and Horace's "pro quo bis patior mori." But the most likely reference of the word is to the double death in a tree, which is not only as it seems to the eye in common with other trees, in the apparent death of winter, but really dead. dead to appearance, and dead in reality. Huther comes near this, but does not quite reach it, when he says, "not only without fruit, but dead and dried up:" but this would not be two deaths; whereas the other is), rooted out (the various descriptive clauses form a climax: not only without leaves and fruit, but dead: not only dead, but plucked up and thrown aside.  ἀστέρες πλανῆται would seem most probably to indicate comets, which (as in Oct. 1858) astonish the world for a time, and then pass away into darkness. The similitude would not find any propriety as applied to the planets, properly so called :

 for there can be no allusion to the astronomical fact of their being naturally opaque bodies, as Bengel imagines. Many Commentators have supposed that the similitude is to be understood of teachers, who would enlighten others, and yet are doomed to darkness themselves: so Ec., comparing the transformation into an angel of light, 2 Cor. xi. 14. But the context does not justify this. Rather should we say, these professing Christians, by their profession lights in the world, instead of letting that light shine on more and more into the perfect day, are drifting about in strange errors of doctrine and practice till it will be utterly extinguished in eternal darkness).

very uncertain, whether he intends to ex-clude himself) that at the last of the time (see notes on 2 Pet. iii. 3: Heb. i. 1: 1 Pet. i. 20: = at the end of the world, in the last age of the Church) there shall be scoffers (men who sport with what is holy and good: the λοιμοί of Ps. i. 1. The prophecy is contained in 2 Tm. iii. 1, 1 Tm. iv. 1, Acts xx. 29, and doubtless formed a constant subject of viva voce warning. 2 Pet. iii. 1, 2. can hardly be supposed to be referred to, for that place is, as this, a reminiscence of things before said by the Apostles, and nearly in the same words), walking according to their own lusts of impieties (ἀσεβειῶν, gen. after ἐπιθυμίας, indicating the direction, or perhaps the character, of those desires. Cf. the same words above, ver. 16). 19.] Last characteristics of these men. These are they that separate (or "are separating," viz. from the Church, having no real sympathy with the spirit of the Gospel. The act. verb does not seem to require εαυτούς to be supplied: that draw lines of distinction, by walking after their own desires, not in the path of the Church's obedience, thus separating both themselves from you, and you from themselves), sensual (we have no English word for ψυχικός; and our biblical psychology is, by this defect, entirely at fault. The ψυχή is the centre of the personal being, the "I" of each individual. It is in each man bound to the spirit, man's higher part, and to the body, man's lower part; drawn upwards by the one, downwards by the other. He who gives himself up to the lower appetites, is σαρκικός:

he who by communion of his πνεῦμα with God's Spirit is employed in the higher aims of his being, is πνευματικός. He who rests midway, thinking only of self and self's interests, whether animal or intellectual, is the ψυχικός, the selfish man, the man in whom the spirit is sunk and degraded into subordination to the subordinate ψυχή. In the lack of any adequate word, I have retained the "sensual" of the E. V., though the impression which it gives is a wrong one: "selfish" would be as bad, for the ψυχικός may be an amiable and generous man: "animal" would be worse: "intellectual," worse still. If the word were not so ill-looking in our language, "psychic" would be a great gain), not having the spirit (πνεῦμα, see above, not directly the Holy Spirit of God (the absence of the art. would be no objection to this: see reff. and Rom. viii. 14, 1 Cor. ii. 4, al. fr.), but the higher spiritual life of man's spirit in communion with the Holy Spirit. These men have not indeed ceased to have πνεῦμα, as a part of their own tripartite nature: but they have ceased to possess it in any worthy sense: it is degraded beneath and under the power of the ψυχή, the personal life, so as to have no real vitality of its own. See Delitzsch, Biblische Psychologie, v. Abschn. § 2, "das neue Geistesleben;" and Beek, Umriss der biblischen Seelenlehre, p. 35 ff.).

in Phil. ii. 12) upon (as a foundation) your most holy faith (the faith here is the foundation. viz., the fides qua creditur, the object of faith. Bullinger (in Huther), "Vestrae fidei superstruentes vos ipsos." Elsewhere in Scripture, CHRIST is this foundation, see 1 Cor. iii. 11; which in fact comes to the same, for He is the Author and Finisher of our Faith, the α and ω), praying in the Holy Spirit (as the means of thus building yourselves up. The expression προσεύχεσθαι ἐν πν. ἀγίῳ is not found elsewhere, but is in strict analogy with Scripture usage: cf. λαλεῖν ἐν πν. ἀγ., also Rom. viii. 26, Eph. vi. 18. Some, e.g. Luther, join ἐν πν. ἀγ. with what has gone before, and this is approved by De Wette: but surely προσευχόμενοι would not be left thus standing alone. De W. cites (Ec. for this arrangement, but it is very doubtful whether he adopts it: ὑμεῖς δὲ τῇ ἀγιατάτῃ ἡμῶν πιστεῖ ἐποικοδομοῦντες, ἧτοι ἑαυτοὺς ἀνακτῶμενοι ἐν πνεύματι ἀγίῳ, τούτέστι, κατὰ τὴν τοῦ ἀγίου πνεύματος διδασκαλίαν τὰς ἑαυτῶν ἀθροίσεις ἐν ταῖς προσευχαῖς ἡμῶν ποιούμενοι: where it is evident that there should be a period at ἀνακτῶμενοι, and that προσευχόμενοι has been omitted, or perhaps was never expressed, after ἀγίῳ; at any rate the latter sentence is an explanation of ἐν πν. ἀγ. προσευχόμενοι), keep yourselves (aor. of the one great life-long act to be accomplished by the ἐποικοδομῆν and προσεύχεσθαι) in the love of God (within that region of peculiar love where-with God regards all who are built up on the faith and sustained by prayer: θεοῦ being a subjective gen., "God's love," not objective, as Grot., Semler, Bengel, Vorstius, Arnaud, al. The expression is very like μείνατε ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ τῇ ἐμῇ, John xv. 9, where κατὰ ὑμᾶς ἠγάπησα preceding fixes the meaning to be Christ's love to them), looking for (present part.

as in Tit. ii. 13, where see note. It is to be the habit of the life, as those other pres. participles, ἐποικ. and προσευχόμενοι) the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ (viz. that which He will shew at His coming, τὸν εἰς τὴν ἐσχάτην ἡμέραν τῆς αἰωνίου ζωῆς βραβεύομενον ὑμῖν, Ec.: cf. Tit. ii. 13. Huther remarks that ἔλεος, more usually predicated of the Father, is in the addresses of the Pastoral Epistles, and of 2 John, attributed to the Father and Son jointly) unto eternal life (these words may be joined with ἔλεος,—that mercy, whose issue shall be eternal life; or with προσδεχόμενοι,—as the issue and aim of the expectation; or with τηρήσατε,—as the final terminus of that watchful guarding. Perhaps the right choice between the three will be to combine the two last: for προσδεχόμενοι is subordinate and conditional to τηρήσατε: "keep yourselves . . . in expectation of . . . unto"). The direct and studied reference to the Blessed Trinity will not escape the reader. b) vv. 22, 23.] Exhortation as to their conduct with reference to the persons previously stigmatized in the Epistle. And some indeed convict when contending with you (or, "when separating from you." These appear to be the only two meanings which suit the context. Ec. takes the latter, but apparently including in it the idea of hostile disputation: κακείνους δέ, εἰ μὲν ἀποδίστανται ὑμᾶν, τούτο γὰρ σημαίνει τὸ διακρίνεσθαι . . . where the Latin renders, "illos vero si vobis resistant, nam id significat disceptantes . . ." The Vulg. renders it passive: "et hos quidem argueat iudicatos," which can hardly stand as giving the pres. part. διακρινουένους, and representing rather διακρινόντες. De Wette, following Bengel, understands it "doubting"—"convince," "persuade in the right direction," "those who doubt." But thus the sense of ἐλέγγετε is missed, which is never simply to convince, but always carries the punitive idea with it, to convict. Grot. gives another meaning, "reprehendite eos qui se cæteris præferunt." Huther goes with Ec. The sense of contending, for διακρίνομαι, is found both in classical writers and in the N. T., e. g. Acts xi. 2, and our Epistle, ver. 9 (which is no slight indication of the meaning here): cf. διακρίνεσθαι μάχη Herod. ix. 58, ἔπλοισ κ. λόγοις Demosth. p. 163. 15 al. in Palm and Rost's Lex.

This is the first class: that of those who oppose themselves, who must be convicted and down-argued. According to the rec. οὓς μὲν ἐλεεῖτε διακρινόμενοι, the rendering will be, as E. V., "of some have compassion, making a difference," viz. between them and the others); but others save (pres., attempt to save; not σώσατε, which would imply that you had the power, and must do it effectually), snatching them from the fire (the same passage in the prophets, Zech. iii. 1—3, which has already been before St. Jude's mind in ver. 9, again furnishes him with the material of this figure. There we read οὐκ ἰδοὺ τοῦτο ὡς δαλὸς ἐξεσπασμένος ἐκ πυρός; cf. also ref. Amos. Notice too the repetition of διακρίνεσθαι in close connexion, which speaks not a little for the sense above given to it. The πῦρ is most probably not future eternal fire, as Ec. ἐκ τοῦ ἠπειλημένου αὐτοῖς πυρός: but the present hell into which their corrupt doctrines and practices have cast them, not however without reference to its ending in fire eternal. This is the second class; as Ec., εἰ δὲ πρὸς ἰασιν ἀφορῶσι: or rather perhaps, any over whom your influence extends, as younger members of the Church, &c., whom you can thus rescue by snatching them out of the fire of temptation and peril), and others compassionate (the form ἐλεᾶω for the usual ἐλεέω is also found in ref. Rom.; and ἔλλογαν, Rom. v. 13 (in A(N)), Philem. 18. See Winer, edn. 6, § 15) in fear (on what account, is shewn by what follows. Ec. rightly, except that (see below) he identifies this class with the last,—προσλαμβάνεσθε δὲ μετὰ τοῦ ἐλεεῖν αὐτοὺς καὶ μετὰ φόβου, περισκεπτόμενοι μὴ πως ἢ πρόσληψις τούτων, ἀμελῶς ὑμῶν τὰ πρὸς αὐτοὺς διακειμένων, λύμης ὑμῖν γενηται αἰτία. This is the third class: consisting of those whom not falling in the way of so as personally to convict, nor having influence over so as to rescue, the believers could only compassionate (and on occasion given, lovingly help) as led away hopelessly to their ruin: but in shewing such compassion, they were to maintain a wholesome fear of their deadly error, for fear they themselves should become defiled by it. It may suffice to repudiate at once Bengel's interpretation of ἐν φόβῳ, "elementar, metu duntaxat incusso." The following clause is exegetical of ἐν φόβῳ), hating (not, "seeing that ye hate," as De W., nor "though ye hate," as Jachm.: the pres. part. simply falls under and expands the verbal clause ἐλεᾶτε-ἐν-φόβῳ, thus forming part of the command) even the (or, "their," cf. Ec. below) garment which has received defilement from the flesh (τῷ ἐλέω τῷ πρὸς αὐτοὺς συνεπέσθω τὸ μῖσος τὸ πρὸς τὰ μιὰρὰ αὐτῶν ἔργα, μισούντων ὑμῶν καὶ βδελυσομένων, καὶ τὸν ἀπὸ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτῶν ἐσπιλωμένον, ἦτοι μειασμένον αὐτῶν χιτῶνα, ὡς τῇ πρὸς τὴν αὐτῶν σάρκα προσψαύσει, καὶ αὐτοῦ βδελυροῦ χρηματίζοντος. And so Bengel, understanding χιτῶνα of their garment, which you are to loathe, and to be afraid even to touch: "tunica est totius vitæ habitus exterior, qua ab aliis attingimur." This may be, but it is more probable that the χιτῶν is literal, and the saying a proverbial one—hating not merely fleshly pollution itself, but even the traces and outskirts of it; even that, be it what it may, which has its mark and stain upon it. On the sense, see Rev. iii. 4). strictly temporal idea to the hearer) to Him that is able (exactly thus, Rom. xvi. 25) to keep them (the occurrence of αὐτούς (which is almost beyond doubt the true reading instead of ὑμᾶς or ἡμᾶς) can only be accounted for by the supposition that St. Jude writes here, as of all to whom he has been addressing himself, in the third person, as if he was praying to God for them. His reason for not using ὑμᾶς may have been his desire to include also in the term those who might be convicted, rescued from the fire, and compassionated, as well as his more immediate reader. But it is hardly likely, in the solemn close of his Epistle, that he should mean by αὐτούς, those only) without falling (see reff.: and for πταίειν, James ii. 10, iii. 2), and to set (them) before-the-presence-of His glory (which will be revealed when the Son of man shall come, ἐν τῇ δόξῃ αὐτοῦ καὶ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ τῶν ἁγίων ἀγγέλων, Luke ix. 26, in the ἐπιφανείᾳ τῆς δόξης τοῦ μεγάλου θεοῦ καὶ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, Tit. ii. 13) blame-not be taken in any but this its general sense, as in 2 Cor. xii. 1, where it is plural ; the particular purpose of this revelation follows, with the inf. δείξαι below. ἀποκάλυψις is one of those words which have passed, in their later usage, from indicating the act, to signify that with which the act is concerned : so καύχησις, 2 Cor. i. 12, vii. 14. Jerome on Gal. i. 11, 12, vol. vii.

 p. 387, says : " Verbum ipsum ἀποκαλύψεως, id est, revelationis, proprie scripturarum Græcos usurpatum." But Plutarch, de

 Euripides was an atheist, but ἀποκαλύ-

 Clearly here the former : for it is not Christ sense : but Christ who reveals, as is plain in what follows : see also ref. Ebrard

 The not very important distinctions between ἀποκάλυψις and its result προφητεία the Father, what should be the process of the world's history, what the fate of the Church ? What purpose was served by a revelation from God to Jesus ?" He proceeds to say that the words cannot refer merely to the revelation as made to us, but are clearly against such an interpretation: and gives, at some length and very well, that which in one form or other all will accept as the true explanation, in accordance with John vii. 16, xiv. 10, xvii. 7, 8. The man Christ Jesus, even in his glorified state, receives from the Father, by his hypostatic union with Him, that revelation which by His Spirit He imparts to His Church. For, Acts i. 7, the times and seasons are kept by the Father in his own power: and of the day and the hour knoweth no man, not the angels in heaven, nor even the Son, but the Father only, Mark xiii. 32. I may observe, that the coincidence in statement of this deep point of doctrine between the Gospel of St. John and the Apocalypse, is at least remarkable, to shew (is this infinitive of the purpose dependent on ἔδωκεν, or on the subst. ἀποκάλυψις? Is it the purpose of God in giving, or the purpose of the revelation in revealing, that is asserted? At all events, Heinrichs is wrong, who takes ἡν ἔδωκεν δεῖξαι together, "which God gave (empowered) Him to shew." But of the others, the construction with ἔδωκεν is the more probable, as being the more usual: "that He might shew," &c. δεῖξαι must not here be confined to its stricter meaning of shewing in vision, as Hengst.; for then, as De W. remarks, we must confine τοῖς δούλοις αὐτ. to the Apocalyptic Seer alone: but must be taken in its wider sense of exhibiting as knowledge, informing of. So in Matt. xvi. 21: where however Hengst. strangely denies this meaning, and upholds that of prove, demonstrate: which our Lord did not do till after His resurrection) to His (Christ's, most probably, as below in this verse, and in ref.: for thus the αὐτός is kept to the same subject throughout) servants (here meaning all Christians, not, as Hengst., prophets only: indeed his sense of δεῖξαι, which necessitates this, brings confusion into the whole sentence. That John himself is one of these δούλοι below, does not affect this general meaning) what things must (by the necessity of the divine decree: see besides ref., Matt. xvii. 10, al.) come to pass shortly (i. e. 'before long': see ref. especially Luke. The context, the repetition below, ὁ γὰρ καιρὸς ἐγγύς, and the parallel ch. xxii. 6, followed ib. 7 by ἰδοὺ ἔρχομαι ταχύ, fix this meaning here, as distinguished from the other of 'swiftly,' which indeed would be hardly intelligible with the historic aorist γενέσθαι. This expression, as De W. well remarks, must not be urged to signify that the events of apocalyptic prophecy were to be close at hand: for we have a key to its meaning in Luke xviii. 7, 8, where our Lord says, ὁ δὲ θεὸς οὐ μὴ ποιήσει τὴν ἐκδίκησιν τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν αὐτοῦ τῶν βοώντων αὐτῷ ἡμέρας κ. νυκτός, καὶ μακροθυμῆ ἐπ' αὐτοῖς; λέγω ὑμῖν ὅτι ποιήσει τὴν ἐκδίκησιν αὐτῶν ἐν τάχει: where long delay is evidently implied. Hengstenberg repudiates this, and says it is self-evident that these words can only be adduced here "nach unrichtigen Auslegung." But surely the two cases are exactly parallel: and Hengst.'s strong language, here as elsewhere, proves nothing. His own interpretation of the words, natural as he seems to think it, is forced and unwarrantable. He (in common with many others) takes them to mean that the events spoken of would very soon begin to take place. The axe, he says, lay at the root of the Roman Empire when John wrote this, as it did at the root of the Persian Empire when Daniel wrote. But this interpretation is not borne out by the Greek. ἃ δεῖ γενέσθαι ἐν τάχει is not "which must soon begin to come to pass," but, in the well-known sense of the aorist, "which, in their entirety, must soon come to pass:" γενέσθαι being in fact, a past tense, "must have come to pass," "be fulfilled:" so Beugel most truly, "Totus liber tanquam unum verbum uno momento pronnunciatione debet accipi." So that we are driven to the very same sense of ἐν τάχει as that in Luke xviii. above, viz. to God's speedy time, though He seem to delay: in spite of the scorn which Hengst. pours on this meaning. His maxim, that a Prophet, speaking to men, must speak according to men's ideas, is quite worthless, and may be confuted by any similar prophetic saying, even by the one which he brings in its favour, Hagg. ii. 7: and his complaint, that thus we make the Seer and even the Lord Himself like bad physicians who delude their patients with false hopes (so, in the main, Stern also), is unworthy of a Christian Expositor, after our Lord's own plain use of the same method of speech again and again in His prophecies in the Gospels and in this book. It remains to observe, that these words cannot with any fairness be used as furnishing a guide to the interpretation of the prophecy. They are far rather to be regarded as a prophetic formula (see Beza), common with him to whom a thousand years are as one day, and used in order to teach us how short our time, and the time of this our world, is. See, on the whole, Ebrard's able note, and his remarks on the absurdity of Hengstenberg's pressing the words in favour of his præterist scheme.

τὴν ἑκβασιὺν δὲ τῶν χρηματιζομένων ἐν τάχει ὑπισχνεῖται προβῆναι, οὐχ ὡς ἔτυχεν, ἀλλὰ παραμετρῶν τὰ ἀνθρώπινα τοῖς θεοῖς, οἷς καὶ τὰ πολυχρονίως καὶ χιλιαστῶς ἐκτελοῦμενα ὡς ἡ χθὲς ἡμέρα, καὶ ἡ ἐν νυκτὶ φυλακὴ κρίνεται. Arethas. There is a profitable and consolatory exegesis of the words in Ambrose Ansbert, B. P. M. ix. pt. 2, p. 310. Dionysius of Alexandria, as cited in Eus. H. E. vii. 25, omits the words ἀ δεῖ γενέσθαι, joining δεῖξαι with ἐν τάχει; and He (Ἰησοῦς χριστός, not ὁ θεός, see ch. xxii. 16: the subject is changed, and the relative construction abandoned. So almost all Commentators) signified (it) (it is remarkable (see reff.), that with one exception, this prophetic use of σημαίνω is confined in the N. T. to the Evangelist St. John) sending by His angel (the aor. part. is contemporary with the aor. verb, not necessarily antecedent to it. ἀποστ. διά, as in reff. No word, as τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν, need be supplied, the verb being used absolutely after the manner of the Heb. וַיִּבְרַח of Exod. iv. 13 and ref. 2 Kings. Still less must διά be taken with ἐβέσημανεν, as Hengst. The Angel mentioned is perhaps the same who informs the Seer in ch. xvii. 1, 7, 15, xix. 9, xxi. 9, xxii. 1, 6, which latter place takes up this; ib. 8 ff.; and who is spoken of by our Lord ib. 16. It is remarkable that this angel does not appear as the impartor of the visions until ch. xvii. Some indeed, as Ewald, have fancied that they trace his presence in ch. iv. 1 and throughout: but ch. xvii. 1 is too manifestly the introduction to a new appearance for this to be the case; and previously to that the Seer receives his information from different persons. Our Lord Himself opens the Apocalyptic vision. It is another voice which calls John up to the place of heavenly vision, ch. iv. 1. In vii. 13, one of the four and twenty elders speaks to him; in x. 8, it is the former voice again which addresses him, and in ib. 9, it is the angel who stands on the earth and the sea that gives him the book. Only in the great close of the prophecy, opening with ch. xvii., does one angel stand by him; referred to, as here, under the name ὁ ἄγγελος. In the visions of Daniel and Zechariah an angel mediated: Dan. viii. 16, ix. 20, x. 10 ff., Zech. i. 1, 19, al.) to His servant John (on the whole question of the writer of the book, see prolegomena), 2.] who testified of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ, whatsoever things he saw (these words must, in all fairness of construction, be referred to this present book, and not, as by some of the older Expositors, and recently by Ebrard, to the Gospel of St. John. The reasons given by Ebrard for such reference will not hold. He objects to ἐμαρτύρησεν being taken of this book, that such a use of the aor. would be peculiar to the Epistolary style, whereas this book, though containing Epistles, is not itself an Epistle. Even were the usage thus confined, it might be answered from verse 4, that the whole is in an Epistolary form. But the usage is not thus confined, as every scholar knows. Witness Thucyd. i. 1, Θουκυδίδης Ἀθηναῖος ξυνέγραψε τὸν πόλεμον κ.τ.λ. Again, Ebrard objects that the sense thus obtained would be a strange one: "God gave the Revelation to Christ; He signified it by His angel to John, which last hereby makes it known." But I own I am unable to see any strangeness in it. It seems to me the obvious way in which a faithful account of this Revelation would be prefaced by its Writer. On the other side, the objections to Ebrard's reference are to me insuperable. First, as to its introduction with the simple relative ὅς. We may safely say that had any previous writing or act been intended, we should have had ὅς καὶ, or in St. John's simple style, even more than this, ὅς καὶ τὸ πρότερον, or ὅς καὶ ἐν ἄλλῳ βαλίῳ. The ὅς as it stands, I submit, carries on the action, and does not identify John as the same who at a previous time did some other action. Next, as to the things witnessed. The words ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ κ. ἡ μαρτυρία Ἰ. χρ. cannot with any likelihood be taken to mean "the (personal) Word of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ;" for why, if the former term refer to Christ personally, should He be introduced in the second member under a different name? Besides, the words occur again below, ver. 9, as indicating the reason why John was in the island Patmos; and there surely they cannot refer to his written Gospel, but must be understood of his testimony for Christ in life and words: moreover, ἡ μαρτυρία Ἰησοῦ is itself otherwise explained in this very book, ch. xix. 10. But there is yet another objection to the supposed reference to the Gospel, arising from the last words, ὅσα εἶδεν. First, the very adjective ὅσα refutes it. For the Evangelist distinctly tells us, John xx. 30, that in writing his Gospel, he did not set down ὅσα εἶδεν, but only a portion of the things which Jesus did in the presence of His disciples, whereas in the case of this Revelation it was otherwise: he set down all which he saw, as a faithful transmitter of the Apocalyptic vision to the churches. But still more does the verb εἶδεν carry this refutation. In no place in the Gospel does St. John use this verb of his eye-witnessing as the foundation of his testimony; indeed he only uses it of himself at all on two occasions, John i. 40, and xx. 8. But in this book, it is the word in regular and constant use, of the seeing of the Apocalyptic visions; being thus used in it no less than 55 times. And some of these usages are such that there can be no doubt this place is connected with them; e. g., ver. 19, γράψον οὖν ἃ εἶδες, and the repetition itself so frequently occurring καὶ εἶδον καὶ ἰδού. Taken then as representing the present book, τὸν λόγον here will be the aggregate of οἱ λόγοι ver. 3: ἡ μαρτυρία Ἰησ. χρ. will be the πνεῦμα τῆς προφητείας, embodied in writing for the Church in all ages).

3.] Blessed is (or be, in the ordinary meaning of μακάριος: not necessarily referring on to eternal blessedness, as Hengst.) he that readeth, and they that hear the words of the prophecy and observe the things written in it; for the time is near (it can hardly be reasonably denied that in the ὁ ἀναγινώσκων and the οἱ ἀκούοντες, the Apostle had in his mind the one public reader and the many hearers. Ebrard attempts to deny this, but it seems to me unsuccessfully. His instance of St. John's passing from a singular to a plural, πᾶς ὀφθαλμός, καὶ οἳτινες αὐτὸν ἐξεκέντησαν, ver. 7, would be applicable only if we had here πᾶς ὁ ἀναγινώσκων. Considering that no such transition is elsewhere found, we can hardly escape the inference that it was intended. And so the great majority of Commentators: so Andreas ("plures uno legente possunt audire," Gloss. ord.), Bede ("doctores et auditores"), Lyra ("qui legit, quantum ad doctores: qui audiunt, quantum ad discipulos"), &c.: Bengel ("unus, ille primum, per quem Johannes librum ex Patmo in Asiam misit, legebat publice in ecclesiis, et multi audiebant"), Ewald, Hengst., De Wette, Stern, Gräber, &c. Others have explained the change of number variously: e. g., Beza, ex Hebraismo; Cotter (in Pool), "quia soli legitimus, audimus conjuncti:" Ribera, "quoniam multo plures audiunt, quam legunt:" &c. If the words are to be understood as above, they form at least a solemn rebuke to the practice of the Church of England, which omits with one or two exceptions the whole of this book from her public readings. Not one word of the precious messages of the Spirit to the Churches is ever heard in the public services of a Church never weary of appealing to her Scriptural liturgies. Surely it is high time, that such an omission should be supplied. Notice that not three classes of persons, but two only, are here indicated: he that reads, and they that hear and do. Had there been an article before τηρούντες, these latter would have formed a separate class from the ἀκούοντες. The E. V. is right in the sense, in rendering τῆς προφ., 'this prophecy:' it = τῆς προφ. τοῦ βιβλίου τούτου, ch. xxii. 7. τὰ ἐν αὐτῇ γεγραμμένα are the several exhortations to repentance, faith, patience, obedience, prayer, watchfulness, steadfastness, which are scattered up and down in the prophecy. The time being near makes the book of the more importance, and the blessedness of reading and observing it greater. The nearness spoken of is to be understood as the ἐν τάχει, ver. 1, which see. We know little now of relative nearness and distance in point of time: when the day of the Lord shall have opened our eyes to the true measure, we shall see, how near it always was).

CH. I. 4—III. 22.] INTRODUCTION TO THE PROPHECY, in the form of a sevenfold Epistle to the seven churches of Asia. And herein, vv. 4—6, address and greeting, ending with doxology. (Ebrard, who seems to love singularity for its own sake, objects to the above arrangement, because the sevenfold epistle has not yet begun, and prefers calling this a dedicatory title to the whole book. But the other view is far simpler and better. The sevenfold Epistle is clearly before St. John's mind, and, full of the images of the vision which he had seen, he only interrupts it by solemn ejaculatory references to the glories of that vision and the sublime announcement of the Lord's coming, and then hastens on to introduce it by a prefatory account of his own circumstances when the Epistles were entrusted to him and of the appearance of the Lord who thus entrusted them.) John to the seven churches which are in Asia (the form of address is exactly that in the Epistles of St. Paul: see Rom. i. 1 ff., 1 Cor. i. 1 ff., &c. That St. Paul in Rom.

and elsewhere is careful to designate himself and his office, and St. John introduces himself without any such designation, belongs doubtless in part to the individual character of the two Apostles, but is besides a strong testimony that the John who here writes needed no such designation in the eyes of those to whom he was writing. See this, and other evidence as to the authorship, urged in the prolegomena. See on the seven churches prolegg. § iii. 7 ff. Ἀσία, as always in the N. T., is the proconsular province so called. "Constabat,—ut a Cicerone alicubi dicitur illa proconsularis Asia, quæ inter præcipuas Romani orbis provincias olim habita,—ex Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, Lydia; sub quibus insuper, sub Mysia nempe et Lydia, intelligi debent Ionia et Æolis, ac addi præterea vicinæ maris Ægæi insulæ. Dicebatur Proconsularis, quod eadem a viro consulari sub Proconsulari nomine regebatur." Spanheim de usu numismatum, p. 610 (from Hengstenb.); grace be to you and peace (so St. Paul in all his Epistles except the two to Timothy) from Him who is and who was and who is to come (a paraphrase of the unspeakable name יהוה, resembling the paraphrase יהוה אלהינו in Exod. iii. 14, for which the Jerusalem Targum has, as here, qui fuit, est, et erit: as has the Targum of Jonathan in Deut. xxxii. 39, Schemoth R. iii. f. 105. 2: "Dixit Deus S. Each of the appellations by itself is to be regarded as a proper name—ὁ ὢν, —ὁ ἦν (not ὁ ἦν: the imperf.—or aor.—being used in the lack of a past participle of εἶμι), and ὁ ἐρχόμενος: and it follows from what is remarked above that the meaning of ἐρχόμενος is not here to be pressed as referring to any future coming, any more than in its English representative, "He that is to come." By doing so we should confuse the meaning of the compound appellation which evidently is all to be applied to the Father, ὡς αὐτοῦ περιέχοντος ἐν ἑαυτῷ πάντων τῶν ὄντων τὴν ἀρχὴν καὶ τὰ μέσα καὶ τὰ τελευταῖα, as the second alternative in the Catena. In the first (Arethas?) ὁ ὢν is supposed to mean the Father (ἐγὼ εἶμι ὁ ὢν, as said to Moses), ὁ ἦν the Son (ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ λόγος), and ὁ ἐρχόμενος the Spirit, as ever proceeding forth and descending on the Church. Hengstenb., who presses the literal sense of ἐρχόμενος, avoids this confusion, but falls into that of making the covenant Jehovah, Father, Son, and Spirit, come to judge the world and the Church. At least so it would seem: for when he comes to this the weak part of his exegesis, he obscures his meaning by raising a cloud of rhetorical description of what shall take place at that coming. He connects ἐρχόμενος with ἰδοὺ ἔρχεται μετὰ τῶν νεφ. below, in spite of the καὶ ἀπὸ . . . καὶ ἀπό intervening. It is needless to say, that that ἐρχεται is to be referred to the last subject only, viz. to Ἰησοῦς χριστός. And wherever the ἔρχομαι ταχύ, with which he also connects it, occurs, it is distinctly said of the glorified Saviour, and from the seven spirits which (are) before His throne (Andreas, in catena, takes these for the seven principal angels (ch. viii. 2): so Clem.-Alex., Beza, Lyra, Ribera, Hammond, Bossuet, Wetst., al. But this is highly improbable, as these angels are never called πνεύματα, and as surely mere creatures, however exalted, would not be equalized with the Father and the Son as fountains of grace. The common view is doubtless right, which regards the seven as τὰς ἐνεργείας τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος (so τινές in catena: Andr., Victorin., Primas., al.):—"Thou the anointing Spirit art, Who dost thy sevenfold gifts impart:" but rather perhaps to be regarded as expressing His plenitude and perfection, than to be separately assigned as (but qu.?) in the following lines of the hymn Veni Creator Spiritus. The key to this expression, which is an anticipation of the visions afterwards to be related, is ch. v. 6, where see notes: as also on ch. iv. 5. The ἑπτὰ can hardly be entirely without allusion to the ἑπτὰ ἐκκλησίαι, and to the sevenfold imagery throughout. The number seven denotes completeness, and, as Schöttgen shows h. l., was much noted by the Jewish Commentators as occurring in the O. T. The seven spirits betoken the completeness and universality of working of God's Holy Spirit, as the seven churches typify and indicate the whole church. The reference to Isa. xi. 2 is but lamely made out, there being there but six energies of the Spirit mentioned. That to Zech. iv. 2, 10 is more to the point: see notes as above. The ζ, without its verb, is solœcistic, and from Jesus Christ (as we have before had the Father and the Holy Spirit mentioned as the sources of grace and peace, so now the Son, coming last, on account of that which is to follow respecting Him: "quia de illo continuanda erat oratio," Vitr., who also notices that what follows has respect to His threefold office of Prophet, King, and Priest: see however below), the faithful witness (see John xviii. 37, εἰς τοῦτο ἐλήλυθα εἰς τὸν κόσμον, ἵνα μαρτυρήσω τῇ ἀληθείᾳ. It is to the general mission of the Redeemer to bear witness to the truth, and not merely to the apocalyptic portion of His testimony which is to follow (De W.), that this title must be referred. This book (ver. 2) is ἡ μαρτυρία Ἰησοῦ χρ.: but the titlle reaches far wider. Embracing as it does that μαρτυρία before Pontius Pilate, and indeed that of His whole life of witnessing to the truth, we can perhaps hardly say that it marks out his prophetic office with sufficient distinctness for us to believe it indicated here), the first-born of the dead (death is regarded as the womb of the earth, from which the resurrection is the birth: see note on ref. Col.: and Acts ii. 24 note. πρωτότοκος must not with Hengst. be diluted into πρῶτος. The ἀπαρχὴ τῶν κεκοιμημένων, 1 Cor. xv. 20, is quite a different figure), and the Ruler of the kings of the earth (this kingly office of Christ is reached through his death and resurrection. In Ps. lxxxviii. 27, the combination of titles is much as here, καὶ γὰρ πρωτότοκον θήσομαι αὐτόν, ὑψηλὸν παρὰ τοῖς βασιλεῦσι τῆς γῆς.

the Father being the ultimate object of reference, as His will is the origin, and His glory the result, of all that is brought about by the mediatorial work of Christ) God and His Father (to Him who is God and His Father: or, to His God and Father. The former is the more probable here, Ebr. remarks, on account of St. John's habit of repeating the possessive genitive after words of possession: e. g. ch. vi. 11, οἱ σύνδουλοι αὐτῶν κ. οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτῶν: ix. 21, ἐκ τῶν φόνων αὐτῶν οὔτε ἐκ τ. φαρμάκων αὐτῶν οὔτε ἐκ, &c.: John ii 12, which is more to the point here,—ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ κ. οἱ ἀδελφοὶ [αὐτοῦ] κ. οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ. See notes on the places where the expression occurs in St. Paul (reff. Rom. See note on Gal. i. 5): Amen.

7, 8.] A solemn announcement of the coming of Christ, and declaration, by way of ratification, of the majesty and omnipotence of God (see below). Behold He (the Person last spoken of: the subject being continued from the preceding verses) cometh with the clouds (τῶν, viz. of heaven: so expressed in reff. Dan., and Mark: cf. ἐν τῇ νεφέλῃ, ch. xi. 12), and every eye shall see Him (by a well-known figure, not merely Hebraistic but common to all tongues, the acting member is said to do that which the man does by its means. This is to be understood of the whole human race, risen and summoned before Him), and (among them: the καὶ does not couple a separate class, but selects a prominent one) they which (οὔτινες, of the whole class: almost = "whoever:" "all they who") pierced Him (see John xix. 36 f. and note. As there St. John evidently shews what a deep impression the whole circumstance here referred to produced on his own mind, so it is remarkable here that he should again take up the prophecy of Zechariah (reff.) which he there cites, and speak of it as fulfilled. That this should be so, and that it should be done with the same word ἐξεκέντησαν, not found in the LXX of the passage, is a strong presumption that the Gospel and the Apocalypse were written by the same person. It is true, that Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion have used the verb ἐκκευτεῖν; but this hardly comes into consideration as affecting this presumption. The persons intended in this expression are beyond doubt those to whom our Lord prophesied in like terms, Matt. xxvi. 64; viz. those who were His murderers, whether the Jews who delivered Him to be crucified, or the Romans, who actually inflicted His death. That the meaning must not here be generalized to signify all who have by their sins crucified the Son of God afresh, is plain from the consideration that this class, οὔτινες, are taken out from among the πᾶς ὀφθαλμὸς which precedes, whereas on that supposition they would be identical with it; for we all have pierced Him in this sense), and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn at Him (i. e. their mourning shall be directed towards Him as its object: in fear for themselves in regard to the consequences of his coming: similarly πρὸς τι, John xiii 28. The account to be given of the meaning in ref. 2 Kings, ἐκόψατο ἐπὶ τὸν ἄνδρα αὐτῆς, is in fact the same, the circumstances only making the difference. In Zech. xii. 10, both meanings are united.

The prophecy is in allusion to Matt. xxiv. 30; and its sense, that all, even the holiest of men, shall mourn at the visible approach of that day. But as Bengel well remarks, there will be then two kinds of mourning: "præ terrore hostili," and "præ terrore penitentiali." The former will prevail in the impenitent and careless world; the latter even in the comforted and rejoicing church. The holiest saint when that Presence is manifested, in the midst of his "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us," will personally feel with St. Peter, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." The whole is an adaptation and amplification of the words of Zechariah, l. c. See Vitringa's note. But we must not adopt his notion, taken up also by Hengst., "Venire dicitur Christus in nubibus cœli, quoties gloriam majestatemque suam in singularibus gratiæ, severitatis et potentiæ suæ effectis demonstrat, et se ecclesiæ quasi præsentem exhibet:" for thus we confuse and indeed stultify the whole of this solemn announcement. The certainty of Christ's revealing Himself to his Church in mercies and judgments needed no such asseveration as is here used: but the certainty of His great personal second coming did and still does; being the one fact which the world and the church alike are disposed to lose sight of). Yea, Amen (both these words are used in ref. 2 Cor. as forms of ratification. The former is Greek, the latter Hebrew; and both together answer to the "Thus saith the Lord" of the prophets: τούτοις δὲ τοῖς εἰρημένοις τὸ βέβαιον ἐπιμαρτυρῶν, ἐπεσφράγισε διὰ τοῦ εἰπεῖν ναὶ καὶ ἄμην. τοῦ ναὶ μὲν ἐξ Ἑλληνικῆς συνηθείας τὸ ἀμετάστατον τῶν εἰρημῶν ἐξακριβοῦντος, τοῦ δὲ ἄμην παρ' Ἑβραίων, εἰς τὸ μηδὲν ἂν γενέσθαι ἐμποδῶν μὴ ἐκβῆναι τὰ ἤπειλημένα ἐπαγομένου. Andr. in Catena). I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God, He that is and that was and that is to come, the Almighty (by whom are these words spoken? Certainly as they here stand, with κύριος ὁ θεός, and ὁ παντοκράτωρ, they must be understood as uttered by the Eternal Father. And similarly we find Him that sitteth on the throne speaking in ch. xxi. 5 ff. In our ver. 17, and in ch. xxii. 13, it is our Lord who speaks. Nor need we be surprised, that He who is of one essence with the Father should assert of Himself the same eternal being as the Father. This need not lead us to force the reference of any passage, but each must be ruled by considerations of its own context. Schöttgen gives examples of the Rabbinical usage of "ab Aleph usque ad Tau," to signify "completely," "entirely;" and of the word נשׂא being a name of the Shechinah, because it comprehends all the letters. The ἀρχὴ κ. τέλος was a correct gloss, from ch. xxi. 6, xxii. 13). ὁ παντοκράτωρ answers in the LXX to the Hebr. נשׂא also to נשׂא. See note on Rom. ix. 29.

and by Christ: but the insertion of βασιλεία between θαλίψει and ὑπομονῇ is startling, and the effect of it must be to make the construction zeugmatic, ἐν χρ. Ἰ. not properly belonging to βασιλεία. It can hardly be that the words are, as De W., "ordnungsgelöst neben einander gestellt." More probably, the tribulation brings in the kingdom (Acts xiv. 22), and then as a corrective to the idea that the kingdom in its blessed fulness was yet present, the ὑπομονῇ is subjoined. "Tres hæreditatum uncias introducit Johannes, quibus se participem ostendit. Sed media harum, i. e. regnum, possideri non potest, nisi et hæc tribulatio exercuerit, et illic patientia defenderit." Ambr. Ansbert), was ("befand mich;" not = ἦν, which announces the simple fact. When an event is notified with ἐγένετο, we express the meaning by "came to pass:" when a person, we have no word which will do it) in the island which is called Patmos (see Prolegomena, § ii. par. 4) on account of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus (the substantives form the same expression as occurred before ver. 2, where see note. There they indicated this portion of the divine word and testimony, of which John was a faithful reporter. Whether their meaning is the same here, will depend partly on what sense we assign to the prep. διὰ. In St. Paul's usage, as in reff., it would here signify for the sake of, i. e. for the purpose of receiving: so that the Apostle would thus have gone to Patmos by special revelation in order to receive this ἀποκάλυψις. Again, keeping to this meaning of διὰ, these words may mean, that he had visited Patmos in pursuance of, for the purposes of, his ordinary apostolic employment, which might well be designated by these substantives. And such perhaps would have been our acceptance of the words, but that three objections intervene. 1) From what has preceded in this verse, a strong impression remains on the mind that St. John wrote this in a season of tribulation and persecution. Why should he throw over his address this tinge of suffering given by the θαλίψει and ὑπομονῇ, if this were not the case? De W. will not allow this: but to my mind Hofmann is quite right in pressing it (Weiss. u. Erfüll. ii. 308). 2) The usage of our Writer himself in two passages where he speaks of death by persecution (reff.) shews that with him διὰ in this connexion is "because of," "in consequence of." De W. naively says that had it not been for these parallel places, such a meaning would never have been thought of here. We may as simply reply, that owing to those parallel places, it must be accepted here. St. John's own usage is a better guide in St. John's writings than that of St. Paul. And Origen's ear found no offence in this usage, for he incorporated it into his own sentence, . . . κατεδίκασε τὸν Ἰωάννην μαρτυροῦντα διὰ τὸν τῆς ἀληθείας λόγον εἰς Πάτμον τὴν νῆσον. See the passage, Prolegg. § i. par. 12. 3) An early patristic tradition relates that St. John was banished to Patmos. See the authorities in the Prolegg. ut supra, and the question discussed, whether we are justified in ascribing this tradition solely to our present passage. These considerations, mainly those arising from the passage itself, compel us, I believe, to understand the words of an exile in Patmos).

10, 11.] I was (on ἐγενόμην, see above. Not merely "I was," but "I became") in the Spirit (i. e. in a state of spiritual ecstasy or trance, becoming thereby receptive of the vision or revelation to follow. That this is the meaning is distinctly shewn by the same phrase occurring in ch. iv. 2: where after seeing the door open in heaven, and hearing the ἀνάβα ὧδε, he adds, εὐθέως ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι. See also ch. xxi. 10. Ebrard well says, "Der Rapport mit der Umgebung durch die Sinne ist unterbrochen, und ein Rapport mit der unsichtbaren Welt tritt ein;" "connexion with surrounding objects through the senses is suspended, and a connexion with the invisible world established." On the attempt made by some to give the words a different meaning, see below) on the Lord's day (i. e. on the first day of the week, kept by the Christian church as the weekly festival of the Lord's resurrection. On any probable hypothesis of the date of this book, this is the earliest mention of the day by this name. This circumstance, coupled with an exegetical bias, has led certain modern interpreters, of whom as far as I know, Wetstein was the first, to interpret the words of the day of the Lord's coming, ή ημέρα του κυριου. So Züllig, and in our own country, Drs. S. R. Maitland and Todd. But 1) the difficulty, of the thus early occurrence of this term, is no real one. Dr. Maitland says (see Todd's Lectures on the Apoc., Note B, p. 295), "I know of nothing in the Scripture or in the works of the ante-Nicene Fathers on which to ground such an assumption." To this we may answer, that the extent of Dr. Maitland's knowledge of the ante-Nicene Fathers does not, happily for us, decide the question. For, while he repudiates passages "professedly (?) brought forward from Ignatius, Irenæus, &c.," those of Tertullian ("die dominico jejuniun nefas ducimus," de coron. c. 3, vol. ii. p. 70: "quomodo dominica solennia celebrabimus," de fug. pers. c. 14, p. 119), Dionysius of Corinth (την σημερον οδν κυριακην αγιαν ημεραν διηγάγομεν, εν η ανεγνωμεν υμων την ηπιστολην, Eus. iv. 23), Julius Africanus (τάχα τε σημαίνει τδ πολυχρόνιον αὐτοῦ διὰ τὴν ὑπερκόσμων ὀγδοάδα, κυριακην ημεραν, de temp. 5), Eriphanian (πᾶς τε ἀπολύειν εἰς ἐπιφώσκουσαν κυριακην, φανερόν ἐστι; Hær. lxxv. 7, p. 910), Clem.-Alex. (οὔτος ἐντολὴν τὴν κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον διαπραξάμενος κυριακὴν ἐκείνην ποιεῖ, Strom. vii. 12 (76), p. 877 P.), are apparently unknown to him. Indeed he confesses (Todd, ut supra p. 301) to have found the word in Origen against Celsus viii. 22, vol. i. p. 758 (ἐὰν δέ τις πρὸς ταῦτα ἀνθυποφέρῃ τὰ περὶ τῶν παρ' ἡμῖν κυριακῶν, ἢ τοῦ πάσχα, ἢ τῆς πεντηκοστῆς . . .), and concedes that there may be many more places, but this does not modify his opinion, nor its adoption by his successor Dr. Todd. It may be well to cite the testimonies from

Ignatius (ad Magnes. 9, p. 669, μηκέτι σαββατίζοντες, ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν ζωῶν ζῶντες) and Irenæus (in the Quæstt. ad Orthod. in the works of Justin Martyr, 115, ed. Otto, vol. iii., p. 180 f., τὸ ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ μὴ κλίνειν γόνυ, σύμβολόν ἐστι τῆς ἀναστάσεως . . . ἐκ τῶν ἀποστολικῶν δὲ χρόνων ἢ τοιαύτη συνήθεια ἔλαβε τὴν ἀρχήν, καθὼς φησιν ὁ μακάριος Εἰρηναῖος . . . ἐν τῷ περὶ τοῦ πάσχα λόγῳ, ἐν ᾧ μέμνηται καὶ περὶ τῆς πεντηκοστῆς, ἐν ᾗ οὐ κλίνομεν γόνυ, ἐπειδὴ ἰσοδυναμεῖ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῆς κυριακῆς κατὰ τὴν ἰηθεῖσαν περὶ αὐτῆς αἰτίαν): whence it is hardly possible but that the word should have occurred in Irenæus. Mr. Elliott, Hor. Apoc. iv. 367 note, has pointed out that the Peschito renders οὐκ ἐστιν κυριακὸν δείπνον φαγεῖν, 1 Cor. xi. 20, "not as befitfeth the day of the Lord ye eat and drink" (Etheridge), which is an interesting proof of the early usage. This chronological objection being disposed of, and the matter 2) taken on its own merits, it really is astonishing how any even moderate Greek scholars can persuade themselves that the words can mean that which these Commentators maintain. They must be bold indeed who can render ἐγεγνόμην ἐν πνεύματι ἐν, "I was transported by the Spirit (or, in spirit) into,"—in the face of ch. iv. 2: and κυριακὴ ἡμέρα, "the day of the Lord's coming," in the face of the absence of a single precedent, and of the universal usage of the early Church. No such rendering would ever have been thought of, nor would it now be worth even a passing mention, were it not that an apocalyptic system has been built upon it. What Drs. M. and T. say of the art. τῆ as making for their sense, is really past comprehension: as it is, that Dr. T. should call it the emphatic article. I need hardly remind students that it is in this connexion any thing but emphatic, being merely designative, as in ἐν τῇ σημερον ημερα, Acts xx. 26; τῇ ἐχομένη ημερα, ib. xxi. 26; (ἐν τῇ εσχάτῃ ημερα, so often used by St. John in his Gospel. One day being known by the name κυριακῆ, any thing happening on it would be designated ordinarily as happening ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ, ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ κυριακῇ, or, as ἡμέρᾳ is one of those nouns which frequently lose the article, ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κυριακῇ. In either case, the meaning, as far as the sense of κυριακή is concerned, is precisely the same. Nor does either the art., or the use of the word κυριακή by Chrys. in that sense (? I have not been able to find it), make it probable that Easter Sunday is meant: and I heard behind me (cf. Isa. xxx. 21) a voice (ref. Ezek.), great as of a trumpet, saying (the trumpet is the instrument of festal proclamation, Num. x. 10; Joel ii. 15, &c.: accompanies divine manifestations, Exod. xix. 19 f.; Joel ii. 1; Matt. xxiv. 31; 1 Thess. iv. 16. The similarity to the sound of the trumpet here was in the loudness and clearness of the voice: see also ch. iv. 1. From this latter it appears that this voice was not that of our Lord, but of one who there also spoke to the Apostle. Düsterd. remarks that the ^{ὀπίσω} μου leaves an indefiniteness as to the speaker), What thou seest (the present carries on the action through the vision now opening,—“what thou art seeing”) write (forthwith: aor.) into a book (the prep. of motion gives the transference from the writer to the document), and send to the seven churches, to Ephesus, and to Smyrna, and to Pergamum, and to Thyatira, and to Sardis, and to Philadelphia, and to Laodicea (for all particulars respecting these churches see the Prolegomena, § iii.).

12—20.] THE VISION, in which our Lord appears to St. John, and the command is repeated. This vision is the introduction, not only to the messages to the churches, but to the whole book: see further on ver. 19. 12.] And I turned about to see the voice which was speaking with me (the voice, the acting energy, being used for the person whose voice it was. ἥτις, giving the force of qualis; of what sort it was which was speaking, &c.): and when I had turned about I saw seven golden candlesticks (λυχνία is a word repudiated by the Atticist writers. It is found in Philo, Josephus, and Lucian. See Lobeck's Phrynichus, p. 313 note. It is the vessel containing the λύχνος: better therefore rendered candlesticks than lamps, which gives more the idea of the light itself. The seven golden candlesticks are (united in one λυχνία) part of the furniture of the tabernacle, Exod. xxv. 31 ff. Again, in ref. Zech., we have the λυχνία χρυσῇ ὅλη with its seven λύχνοι. Here there are seven separate candlesticks, typifying, as that one, the entire church, but now no longer bound together in one out-

I will not deny that the anarthrous use of this title may mark out less sharply our Lord himself than the use with the articles; but in N. T. Greek we should be no more justified in rendering ὡς ἄνθρωπον in such a connexion as this, "a son of man," than πνεῦμα θεοῦ, "a spirit of God." That meaning would doubtless have been here expressed by τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων. The same remarks apply to ref. Dan.), clothed in a garment reaching to the feet (see the ref. in Dan. and Ezek., which the description and even the diction closely resemble. The χιτῶν ποδήρης, vestis talaris, was a sign of high rank or office; "sunt enim vestes pendulæ et laxæ, apud Persas imprimis, regum nobilium et sacerdotum insigne, cf. Esa. vi. 1, Ezek. x. 2:" Ewald. Arethas, in the catena, supposes the dress to be that of the Melchisedek-priesthood (see also Andreas and Vitr.); but without reason, as De W. shews.

Cf. ref. Sir., ἐὰν διώκης τὸ δίκαιον, καταλήψῃ καὶ ἐνδύσῃ αὐτὸ ὡς ποδήρη δόξης), and girt round at the breasts with a golden girdle (in ref. Dan., Gabriel has his loins girt with gold of Uphaz. Bengel, and after him Züllig and De Wette, suppose a distinction—the girding round the loins betokening activity, while that round the breast is a sign of repose. But Hengst. well observes that this would hardly apply: for Christ is here in fulness of energy as ruler and orderer of His Church. Ebrard seems nearer the truth in regarding the higher girding as a sign of majesty. But perhaps after all the point is not to be pressed; for the angels in ch. xv. 6 are also girt περι τὰ στήθη. Nor is the golden girdle distinctive of regal majesty: for this they also bear, ibid. In 1 Macc. x. 89, xi. 58, the πόρρη χρυσῆ is the privilege of the συγγενεῖς, or φίλοι τῶν βασιλέων, not, as is commonly cited, of kings themselves): 14.] and his head and his hairs (were) white like white wool, as snow (by the κεφαλὴ is perhaps indicated the forehead; not the face, which is afterwards described. It is only in colour, not in material, that His hair is compared to white wool; and the ὡς χιῶν is afterwards added to impress this still more. The whiteness signifies purity and glory, not as Aug. (Expos. ad Galat., c. 40, vol. iii. p. 2134: "quia et Dominus non nisi ob antiquitatem veritatis in Apocalypsi albo capite apparuit"), Vitr., Stern, al., eternity, either here or in Dan. vii. 9), and his eyes as a flame of fire (so Dan. x. 6: representing perhaps, as Vitr., "perspicaciam divinæ et puræ mentis, omnia arcana pervadentis." This may be, notwithstanding that Gabriel has eyes like lamps of fire in Daniel. Though omniscience could not be ascribed to him, the figure might be relatively consistent. But it is perhaps better to consider these physical details rather as in themselves characteristic, than as emblematic of attributes lying beneath them. The "fiery eye," among the sons of men, is indicative of energy and power of command: so also in the Son of man Himself): 15.] and his feet were like to chalcobanus (this word has defeated all the ingenuity of Commentators hitherto. Art. poet. 202), the Syriac and Arethas, “brass from Lebanon” (1st altern. in catena,—εἶτε τὸν ἐν τῷ Λιβάνῳ τῷ ὕρει μεταλλεύομενον), the Arabic “Greek brass,”—Andreas, and most of the German editions of the Bible, a kind of incense so called (2nd altern. in catena,—εἶτε καὶ τὸν χαλκοειδῆ λιβάνωτον νοητέον, ὃν ἱατρῶν παῖδες ἄρρηνα καλοῦσιν, εὐώδεις καὶ αὐτὸν πυρὶ δμιλοῦντα ἀποπέμποντα: Germ., Erzweihrauch), on the authority of Antonius of Nebrissa (in Salmasius (Wetst.), εἰ λίβανος ἔχει τρία εἶδη δένδρων, καὶ ὁ μὲν ἄρρην ὀνομάζεται χαλκολίβανος, ἡλιοειδῆς καὶ πυρρός, ἤγουν ξανθός), who understands by the word some superior species of frankincense, the so-called ‘thus masculum’: for in Greek frankincense is called λίβανος, after the Heb. לבנן or לבנז, from the root לבז, albus fuit. This writer refers to hymns of Orpheus in honour of Apollo and of Artemis, in which χαλκολίβ. occurs in the sense of a costly kind of incense (but all we find in the titles of hymns 7, 19, 21, 65, is λιβανόμanna, possibly a mixture of frankincense and manna), and to Virg. Ecl. viii. 65,—‘Verbenasque adole pingues et mascula thura.’ Still it appears somewhat strained to refer χαλκολίβανος or -ον to ‘thus masculum’: for, granted that ‘masculum’ may betoken its purity and clearness, how is χάλκος accounted for, which looks more like a hint at hardness? Besides, incense is not burnt ἐν καμίνῳ, in a smelting furnace, but in a censer or shallow vessel, and its colour while burning is no way observable. The interpretation, “brass from Lebanon,” does not appear to be tenable, as there is no notice of Lebanon ever having produced brass of superior quality, such as this from the context must be. Suidas interprets it thus: χαλκολίβανον, εἶδος ἡλεκτρον τιμιώτερον χρυσοῦ. ἔστι δὲ τὸ ἡλεκτρον ἀλλότῳπον χρυσιόν μεμιγμένον ὑεῶφ καὶ λιθείᾳ. And this, considering that in the similar and model passage, Dan. x. 6 LXX, we have χάλκος ἐξασράπτων (as also in Ezek. i. 7), ib. Theod. χάλκος στίλβων (as also in Ezek. xl. 3), and in Ezek. i. 4, 27, and viii. 2, ἡλεκτρον,—seems the most likely direction in which to find the meaning. Still, as almost all Commentators confess, it must remain enigmatical, of what the word is compounded, and to what it precisely applies. According to usual analogy, not χάλκος but λίβανος is the central idea, and χάλκος the qualifying one, as in χαλκάνθη, χαλκόλιθος, χαλκοθήκη, &c. But this makes the difficulty greater; for we can assign no meaning to λίβανος which would fit this requirement. If conjecture were admissible (which it is not), I should, in despair of any way out of the difficulty, suggest whether the word might not have been χαλκολιβαδίω, a stream of melted brass: ΔI having been read ΔI or N. At all events this may rank with Hitzig’s conjecture, χαλχοκλιβάνω, as if they had been burnt in a furnace (and so red-hot and glowing): and his voice as the voice of many waters (Ebrard sees an allusion to the quiet and majestic sound of the sea, appealing to ch. xvii. 1 and xiii. 1; but, as Düsterdieck remarks, there seems to be no such allusion here, but only to the power of the voice as resembling the rushing of many waters. So Dan. x. 6 Theod., ἡ φωνὴ αὐτοῦ ὡς φωνὴ ὄχλου: Ezek. xliii. 2, where the same expression is found (in the Heb., with which agree Vulg., Syr., &c., but not LXX), i. 24, where the sound of the wings of the creatures is ὡς φωνὴ ὕδατος πολλοῦ).

16.] And having (ἔχων, not = καὶ εἶχεν, but as in ref. St. John takes up the description from time to time irrespective of the construction, as if (De W.) with separate strokes of the pencil) in his right hand seven stars (not, as Heinr., on his right hand, as a number of jewelled rings, but in his right hand, as a wreath or garland held in it. De W. well remarks that this, which is the more natural rendering, is also required by the symbolism. If the seven churches which the seven stars symbolize, were on the Lord’s hand as rings, they would seem to be serving (adorning?) Him, and not to be the objects of his action: but now that He holds them in his hand, He appears as their Guardian, their Provider, their Nourisher: and, we may add, their Possessor, who brings them out and puts them forth to be seen when He pleases. His universal Church would hardly be thus represented, but only a portion of it which it pleases Him to take in his hand and hold forth as representing the rest): and out of his mouth a two-edged sharp sword going forth (cf. Isa. xi. 4, xlix. 2 (ἔθηκε τὸ στόμα μου ὡς μάχαιρα ὀξεῖαν): also our ch. ii. 16, and Wisd. xviii. 15, 16. The same figure occurs with reference to men in Ps. lv. 21, lvii. 4, lix. 7: and Wetst. and Schöttg. give examples of it from the Rabbinical writings. The thing signified may perhaps be as in 2 Thess. ii. 8, ὁ ἔνομος ὃν ὁ κύριος Ἰησοῦς ἀνελεῖ τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ . . . : and in ch. xix. 21; but clearly we must not exclude (as Düsterd.) the attributes of the word of God, Heb. iv. 12, Eph. vi. 17. And this all the more, inasmuch as 1) here the Lord is represented not as taking vengeance on his enemies, but as speaking with his own, both in the way of comforting and of threatening: and 2) in ch. xix. 21, where this very sword is again alluded to as slaying the Lord's enemies, His title as καθήμενος ἐπὶ τοῦ ἵππου is ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ): and his countenance (not, as Düsterd., who wrongly quotes De W. as supporting him, general appearance: so also Ewald, al. Had this been so, how should the Apostle have noted the details just mentioned? for the whole figure of our Lord would have been too dazzling for him to contemplate. It is natural that after describing the eyes, and that which proceeded from the mouth, he should give the general effect of the countenance. And as matter of usage, John xi. 44 is decided, being spoken of a person, which ib. vii. 24 is not) as the sun shineth in his strength (see ref. Judges:—that is, when unclouded and in full power: not necessarily at midday, but at any time. The construction is again broken: ὡς ὁ ἥλ. φαίνων would be the regular connexion). 17, 18.] And when I saw Him, I fell at his feet as dead (the effect of the divine appearance: see Exod. xxxiii. 20; Job xlii. 6; Isa. vi. 5; Ezek. i. 28; Dan. viii. 17 ff., x. 7 ff. There is no discrepancy in this bodily action with the spiritual nature of the vision, as De W. thinks, either here or in the places where similar physical effects are described, ch. v. 4, xix. 10, xxii. 8 (Dan. vii. 15). Düsterd. well remarks in reply, that the ἐν πν. of ver. 10 does not supersede existence in the body. Just as dreamers express their bodily feelings by physical acts, e. g. by starting or weeping, so might St. John while in this ecstasy: cf. Acts ix. 3). And he placed his right hand upon me, saying, Fear not (see, besides ref., Luke ii. 10, Matt. xvii. 7, Mark xvi. 6. These places, and the whole character of our Lord's words, shew that the Apostle's falling down as dead was purely from fear, not, as Ebrard imagines, as an expression of ecstatic love); I am the first and the last (reff.: = a and y above: not as the semi-Socinian Commentators, Grot., Wetst., "summus dignitate . . . contentissimus:" it is the eternity of God which is expressed—of Him who is before all and after all, from and to everlasting), and the living One (not = ὁ ζωοποιῶν, however true the fact may be; nor here signifying alive from the dead: but is the well-known attribute of God, the Eternal, not in bare duration, but in personal Life. 19.] Write therefore ('because I have vouchsafed thee this vision,—I whose majesty is such, and whose manifested loving-kindness to thee.' The connexion is better thus than with ver. 11, as some:

"Now that thy fear is over, write what I bade thee," Hengst. So Aret., who remarks, "ἔκστασις memoria lædit." But it is very doubtful whether ver. 11 is spoken by our Lord at all: see there) the things which thou sawest (just now: the vision which was but now vouchsafed thee), and what things they signify (two meanings of ἂ εἰσὶν are possible. 1) 'the things which are,' viz. which exist at the present time. This has been taken by Arethas, Lyra, Corn.-a-lap., Grot., Calov., Vitr., Beng., Wolf, Züll., Hengst., Ebrard, Lücke, Düsterd., al. 2) as above, 'what things they (the ἂ εἶδες) signify:' so Alcas., Aretius, Eichhorn, Heintr., Ewald, De W. In deciding between these, we have the following considerations: a) the use of the plural εἰσὶν, as marking off this clause in meaning from the next, which has ἂ μέλλει γενέσθαι. If this latter is sing., why not this? Is it not because the μέλλει γενέσθαι merely signifies the future time, in which this latter class, en masse, were to happen, whereas this ἂ εἰσὶν imports, what these things, each of them, severally, mean? And b) this seems to be borne out by the double repetition of εἰσὶν in the next verse, both times unquestionably in this meaning. So that I have no hesitation in taking the meaning given above), and the things which are about to happen after these (viz. after ἂ εἶδες: the next vision, beginning with ch. iv., which itself opens with μετὰ ταῦτα εἶδον. I would take γενέσθαι in the sense of happening, not in the wide ages of history, but in apocalyptic vision: seeing that, ταῦτα meaning ἂ εἶδες, a present vision, ἂ μέλλει γενέσθαι will by analogy mean the things which shall succeed these,

i. e. a future vision. Notice, it is not ἂ δεῖ γενέσθαι as in ver. 1: not the necessity of prophecy, but only the sequence of things seen); 20.] the mystery of γράφον. Lyra interprets the word well, “sacramentum stellarum,” i.e. “sacrum secretum per ipsas significatum:” see refl.), and the seven candlesticks of gold (elliptic construction for ‘and the mystery of the seven candlesticks,’ &c.). The seven stars are (the) (the prefixed predicate ἄγγελοι, though on that account wanting the article, is rendered definite by the definite gen., τῶν ἑπτ. ἐκκ., which follows) angels of the seven churches: and the seven candlesticks are seven churches (the import of the ἄγγελοι has been much disputed. Very many Commentators take them for the presiding presbyters, or bishops, of the churches. So Primas., Bede, Joach., Lyra, Alcas., Corn.-a-lap., Ribera, Bossuet, Beza, Grot., Calov., al. m. So also Vitr., Whitby, and with some modification, Hengst. This view is variously supported. It derives probability from the analogy of the vision itself, in which, seeing that the candelabra represent the churches themselves, existing vessels containing much light, the stars, concentrated sparks of light, should represent some actually existing persons in or connected with the churches. Again it is supported by our finding that throughout the seven Epistles the angel is treated as representing and responsible for the particular church. But before we pass on to the other great section of interpretation, we may at once dismiss those forms of this one which make ἄγγελος the ideal representative of the governing body (as Hengst.), or an ideal messenger from the church (as Ebrard), or a proleptic idea of the office of Bishop, not yet instituted, as Rothe, or, in short, any idealism at all. As the ἐκκλησία is an objective reality, so must the ἄγγελος be, of whatever kind. This consideration will also affect the current of interpretation which takes the angels to be the churches themselves. So Andreas and Arethas (in Cat.,—ἄγγελον τῆς Ἐφέσου, τὴν ἐν αὐτῇ ἐκκλησίαν λέγει. οὐ γὰρ δὲ προστατῶν ἄγγελος ἡμαρτήκει, ὥστε δεῖν ἀκοῦσαι μετανόησον, ὁ δὲ ἀγιάτητα ἐν τῇ δεξιᾷ τοῦ κυρίου ὑπάρχων ἀστήρ ὦν . . . τίς δὲ καὶ χρεῖα γράφειν τῷ ἐν τῇ δεξιᾷ τοῦ διαλεγομένου παρόντι; κ.τ.λ.). The second line of interpretation is that which regards the ἄγγελοι as angels, in some way representing the churches. In favour of this is 1) the constant usage of this book, in which the word ἄγγελος occurs only in this sense: 2) the further usage of this book, in which we have, ch. xvi. 5, the ἄγγελος τῶν ὀδάτων introduced without any explanation, who can be none other than the angel presiding over the waters: 3) the expression of our Lord Himself Matt. xviii. 10, οἱ ἄγγελοι αὐτῶν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ διὰ παντὸς βλέπουσιν τὸ πρόσωπον τοῦ πατρὸς μου τοῦ ἐν οὐρανοῖς, coupled with the saying of the church in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark, Acts xii. 15, with regard to their disbelief of Peter standing at the door, ὁ ἄγγελός ἐστιν αὐτοῦ: both asserting the doctrine that angels are allotted to persons, and are regarded as representing them: a subject full of mystery, and requiring circumspect treatment, but by no means to be put aside, as is commonly done. 4) The extension of this from individuals to nations in the book of Daniel, which is so often the key to apocalyptic interpretation. See Dan. x. 21, xii. 1: an analogy according to which there might well be angels not only of individuals, but of churches. 5) The fact that throughout these Epistles, nothing is ever addressed individually as to a teacher, but as to some one person reflecting as it were the complexion and fortunes of the church in a way in which no mere human teacher or ruler could. That there is no exception to this in ch. ii. 20, see maintained in note there.

6) To the objection advanced in the comment of Arethas above, οὐ γὰρ ὁ προστατῶν ἄγγελος ἡμαρτήκει κ.τ.λ., the reply may be made, with advantage to this interpretation, that there evidently is revealed to us a mysterious connexion between ministering angels and those to whom they minister, by which the former in some way are tinged by the fates and fortunes of the latter. E.g., in our Lord’s saying cited above, the place of dignity there asserted of the angels of the little children is unquestionably connected with the character of those whose angels they are: and it cannot be following out such a revelation too far to say that, if some of the holy angels are thus and for this reason advanced to honour, others may be similarly, and for the opposite reason, placed in less honour and relatively disgraced. That this idea is found expressed in the Rabbinical writings (see in Wetst.) is a mark of the further development of the truth which seems to have been first revealed to Daniel. 7) It will be perceived that this interpretation does not lie under any of the objections stated above as idealizing that which ought to be an objective reality. For it contemplates the angels of the churches as really existent, not as ideal beings. It is only when this latter is the case, that those objections can apply. 8) It will also be perceived, that both the circumstances, which were cited as making for the former interpretation, tell equally for this: viz. a) that just noticed, the actual existence of these persons in or belonging to the churches, and b) the fact that in the Epistles the angel is treated as representing and responsible for the particular church.

So that I cannot but regard this second view as far the more likely one. It has been taken by Origen, Greg.-Naz., Jerome, Andr., Areth. (in Catena: holding as above, the churches themselves to be virtually meant, inasmuch as the angel himself could not need repentance, &c.: but never doubting that by ἄγγελοι the angels are meant), Wetst., Züllig, Wahl, Bretschneider, Bleek, De Wette (see above), al.

The attempt to defend the interpretation of ἄγγελοι as bishops by the analogy of the רַבּוּן, legatus Ecclesiae, in the synagogue, appears to be futile, inasmuch as that officer held quite an inferior place, in no way corresponding to a bishop, or any kind of president of the church. I may also notice, that the weight laid by Brightmann, al., and recently by Ebrard, on the omission of the art. before ἄγγελοι is worth nothing (see the rendering above). Such a sentence as Ebr. suggests in case ἄγγελοι had been definite, οἱ ἐπτ. ἀστ. οἱ ἄγγελοι τῶν ἐκκ. εἰσιν, could hardly be written in Greek: it would have stood εἰσιν οἱ ἄγγ. τῶν ἐκκλ. The fact, that each succeeding epistle is addressed τῷ ἀγγέλῳ τῆς ἐν . . . ἐκκλησίας, should have guided Commentators aright in this matter.

As regards the symbolism, stars are the symbols of the angels of the churches, inasmuch as angels are beings of light, Heb. i. 7 (from Ps. civ. 4), where see note;

Job xxxviii. 7, where they are called the morning stars. The same symbolism is used in the prophets of Lucifer, the day-star, the son of the morning, Isa. xiv. 12 ff., who would exalt his throne above the stars of God, ib. ver. 13; Rev. xii. 4, 9. See also Luke x. 18. That stars are also used to symbolize earthly authorities, is what might be expected from the very nature of the symbol, and should never have been alleged here as a reason against the literal interpretation of ἄγγελοι.

The churches themselves are represented by candlesticks, agreeably with the universal symbolism both of the prophetic and evangelic Scriptures. Cf. Prov. iv. 18; Isa. lx. 1, 3; Matt. v. 14, 16; Luke xii. 35; Phil. ii. 15).

CH. II. 1—III. 22.] THE EPISTLES TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES. Views have considerably differed respecting the character of these Epistles, whether they are to be regarded as simply historical, or historico-prophetical, or simply prophetical. The point on which all, I presume, will be agreed is, that the words contained in these Epistles are applicable to and intended for the guidance, warning, and encouragement of the whole Church Catholic, and its several parts, throughout all time. The differing interpretations will here be only briefly alluded to. An account of them will be found in Vitringa, Apocalypsis Johannis, &c. pp. 27—58: and (but scantily, as most interpreters pass over them but slightly) in the introductions to the principal Commentaries.

Before commenting on each individual Epistle, I would notice the similar construction of all. This may be thus described. Each Epistle contains, 1. A command to write to the angel of the particular church. 2. A sublime title of our Lord taken for the most part from the imagery of the preceding vision. 3. An address to the angel of the church, always commencing with οἶδα, introducing a statement of its present circumstances: continuing with an exhortation either to repentance or to constancy: and ending with a prophetic announcement, mostly respecting what shall be at the Lord's coming. 4. A promise made to δ νικῶν, generally accompanied with a solemn call to earnest attention, δ ἔχων οὖς κ.τ.λ.

the angel of the church in Ephesus write: These things saith he that holdeth fast (cf. ver. 25, ch. iii. 11) the seven stars in his right hand (cf. John x. 28), He that walketh in the midst of the seven candlesticks of gold (assertions of Christ's being the Lord, the Governor and the Upholder of His Church, agreeably to the vision of ch. i. : coming in suitably in this first Epistle, as beginning the complete number): I know (am aware of: not as Lyrn, "id est, approbo." The context determines this to be the fact here, but not this word. The ἔργα might be bad ones, see John iii. 19) thy works (so in all the Epistles, except those to Smyrna and Pergamum) and thy labour (reff.) and endurance (κόπος and ὑπομονή form the active and the passive sides of the energizing Christian life. The omission of the σου after τὸν κόπον serves to bind the two together in one. They are exegetic, in fact, of ἔργα; cf. 1 Cor. xv. 58: these being the resulting fruits of κόπος and ὑπομονή, see ch. xiv. 13), and that thou canst not bear (reff.) evil men (on κακός and πονηρός, see note, ch. xvi. 2. These are here regarded as a burden, an incubus, which the Ephesian church had thrown off. The assertion is as yet general: it is particularized in the next clause) and didst try (make experiment of, rather than put to the test, which is δοκιμάζειν, 1 John iv. 1) those who call themselves apostles and are not, and didst find them false (this is deeply interesting in connexion with St. Paul's prophetic caution, Acts xx. 28—30. That which he foretold had come to pass, but they had profited by his apostolic warning): and hast endurance, and didst bear (them, while trying them: or perhaps the verb is used absolutely) for my Name, and hast not been weary (there is a seeming inconsistency in ἴδω τὸν κόπον σου . . . και οὐ κεκοπιακες, which caused those who were not aware of St. John's use of the last word (reff.) to alter the sentence as in var. readd. first (towards whom? Arethas, in Cat., understands τὴν πρὸς τοὺς πλησίον χορηγίαν: Grot. similarly, "multum remisisti de prima illa cura circa pauperes:" Calov., "sedula cura et vigilantia cum fervore ac zelo pro verbi divini puritate adversus pseudopphetas:" Eichhorn, strangely enough, "quod nimis morose et severe coerces improbos doctores:" Heinrichs, De Wette, and Ebrard think it is brotherly love which is meant. But there can I think be little question that the language is conjugal, and the love, as Aretius, Ansbert ("casti sponsi dilectionem abjecisti"), Vitringa, Züllig, Hengstenb., Düsterd., Stern (but applying it all to the bishop personally), al., the first fervent chaste and pure love of the newly-wedded bride: cf. Jer. ii. 2. τὴν πρῶτην must not be taken as if it were comparative (priorem), but literally. In what particular the Ephesian church had left her first love, is not stated. Perhaps, as Ansbert, "dilectione sæculi æstuat:" or, seeing that it is negative, rather than positive delinquency which is blamed, the love of first conversion had waxed cold, and given place to a lifeless and formal orthodoxy). Remember therefore whence thou hast fallen (the first fervour of love is regarded as a height, from which the church had declined. The Commentators cite Cic. ad Att. iv. 16, "non recorde unde ceciderim, sed nude resurrexerim"), and repent (quickly and effectually, aor.) and do the first works (the works which sprung from that thy first love: those resume); but if not, I (will) come to thee (a strong 'dativus incommodi:' = ἐπί σε, ch. iii. 3. Not Christ's final coming, but his coming in special judgment is here indicated), and will move thy candlestick out of its place (i. e. as Aretius, "efficiam ut ecclesia esse desinas:" see the fulfilment noticed in Prolegg. § iii. par. 7. Some take it too vaguely, as Ewald, "gra-tiam et benevolentiam meam tibi detrahā:" others, as Grot., misled by their acceptance of the first love (see above), "efficiam ut plebs tua alio diffugiat, nempe ad ea loca ubi major habetur cura pauperum:" others again, going quite wrong, owing to a fancy that the Epistle is addressed to the bishop, "tollam a te ecclesiam, ne illi ultra presideas;" so Zeger, al. Koppe and Heinrichs give a modification of the true meaning which is hardly justified: "primariam episcopatus sedem Epheso aliorum transferam"), if thou do not repent (shalt not have repented; i. e. by the speedy time indicated in the previous aorist).

6.] Notwithstanding, this thou hast (this one thing: there is no need to supply ἀγαθόν or the like: of what sort the τοῦτο is, is explained by what follows. We may notice the tender compassion of our blessed Lord, who, in his blame of a falling church, yet selects for praise one particular in which His mind is yet retained. This is for our comfort: but let us not forget that it is for our imitation also. μεταξὺ τῶν λυπηρῶν τίθησι καὶ τὰ πρὸς εὐθυμίαν ἄγοντα, ἵνα μὴ τῇ περισσοτέρᾳ λύπῃ καταποθῇ τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας. The prevailing opinion among the fathers was, that they were a sect founded by Nicolaus the proselyte of Antioch, one of the seven deacons. (H. E. iii. 29, citing Clem.-Alex., as above), Epiphanius (Hær. xxv. pp. 76 ff., where he gives a long account of Nicolaus and his depravation and his followers): so also Jerome (dial. adv. Lucif. 23, vol. ii. p. 197) and Aug. (de hæres. 5, vol. viii. p. 26), and many other fathers, citations from whom may be seen in Stern's notes, h. l.: also Areth. in Catena, referring to Epiph.*

We have already seen, in Clem.-Alex., symptoms of a desire to vindicate Nicolaus the deacon from the opprobrium of having been the founder of such a sect; and we find accordingly in the apostolical constitutions, οἱ νῦν ψευδώνυμοι Νικολαῖται are spoken of: and Victorinus of Pettau, in our earliest extant commentary on the Apocalypse, says, "Nicolaitæ autem erant illo tempore ficti homines et pestiferi, qui sub nomine Nicolai ministri fecerunt sibi hæresin." &c. Thence we advance a step farther, and find another Nicolaus substituted for the deacon of that name. So in Dorotheus (cited in Stern) we find him described as a bishop of Samaria (ὁς ἐπίσκοπος Σαμαρείας γενόμενος ἐτεροδόξῃσεν ἅμα τῷ Σίμωνι). And an apocryphal Acts of the Apostles in Fabricius, Cod. Apocr. N. T. i. p. 498 (Stern), speaks of a Corinthian of this name, infamous for licentious practices. We come now to the second principal view with regard to this sect, which supposes their name to be symbolic, and Nicolaus to be the Greek rendering of Balaam, בַּלְעָם, or, Chald., בַּלְעָם, 'perdidit vel absorpsit populum.' Consequently the name Nicolaitans = Balaamites, as is also inferred from ver. 14. This view seems first to have been broached by Chr. A. Heumann in the Acta Eruditorum for 1712, and since then has been the prevailing one. (There is a trace in ancient times of a mystical interpretation, e.g. in Haymo, gloss. ord., who says, "Nicolaus, stultus populus, id est, Gentiles Deum ignorantes:" and Ambrose Ansbert, "si a proprietate ad figuram, ut solet, sermo recurrit, omnes hæretici Nicolaitæ esse probantur: Nicolaus enim interpretatur stultus populus." What this means, I am as unable to say as was Vitringa: it perhaps arises from thus understanding בַּלְעָם, 'non-populus:' cf. Deut. xxxii. 21.) But this is very forced, and is properly repudiated by some of the best modern Commentators: e.g. by De Wette, Ebrard, and Stern. (See also Winer, Realw. sub voce: Neander, Kirchengesch. i. 2. 774 ff.: Gieseler, Kirchengesch. i. 1. 113 note.) In the first place, the names are by no means parallel, even were we to make Balaam, as some have done, into בַּלְעָם, lord of the people (Ἀρχέλαος): and next, the view derives no support from ver. 14 f., where the followers of Balaam are distinct from the Nicolaitans: see note there. And besides, there is no sort of reason for interpreting the name otherwise than historically. It occurs in a passage indicating simple matters of historical fact, just as the name Antipas does in ver. 13. If we do not gain trustworthy accounts of the sect from elsewhere, why not allow for the gulf which separates the history of the apostolic from that of the post-apostolic period, and be content with what we know of them from these two passages? There is nothing repugnant to verisimilitude in what Clem.-Alex. relates of the error of Nicolaus; nor need all of those, who were chosen to aid the Apostles in distributing alms, have been, even to the end of their lives, spotless and infallible. At least it may be enough for us to believe that possible of one of them, which the post-apostolic Fathers did not hesitate to receive), which I also hate (this strong ex-

7.] Solemn conclusion of the Epistle. He that hath an ear (no fanciful distinction must be imagined between the singular, and the plural which is found in the Gospels (reff.): nor must we imagine with Hengst. that οὗς denotes the spiritual hearing or apprehension. We have precisely the same use of the sing. in Matt. x. 27, ὃ εἰς τὸ οὗς ἀκούετε κηρύξατε ἐπὶ τῶν δαματῶν: where the distinction will hardly be maintained), let him hear what the Spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα, speaking in its fullness, through Him to whom it is given without measure, to John who was ἐν πνεύματι, in a state of spiritual ecstasy and receptivity: cf. John xvi. 13) saith to the churches (Ebrard well notices that not a colon, but a full stop must be put here, as indeed might be shewn from the way in which the proclamation is repeated in ver. 29 and in ch. iii. 6, 13, 22. It directs attention, not to that which follows only, but to the whole contents of the seven Epistles). To him that conquereth (the verb is absolute, without any object expressed as in reff. John and 1 John. So of Christ Himself in ch. iii. 21), I will give to him (the personal pronoun is repeated both idiomatically and for emphasis) to eat (i. e. I will permit him to eat: not in the ordinary sense of giving to eat: see ch. iii. 21, δόσω αὐτῷ . . . καθίσαι) of (the fruit of) the tree (see ref. Gen., from which the words come: and to suit which apparently the words μέσω τοῦ have been substituted for τῷ) of life, which is in the paradise of (my) God (the way to which tree was closed up after man's sin, Gen. iii. 24. The promise, and its expression, are in the closest connexion with our Lord's discourse in John vi., as will be seen by comparing Gen. iii. 22, μή ποτε ἐκτείνη τὴν χεῖρα αὐτοῦ, καὶ λάβῃ ἀπὸ τοῦ ξύλου τῆς ζωῆς, καὶ φάγῃ, καὶ ζήσεται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα,—with John vi. 51, ἐάν τις φάγῃ ἐκ τούτου τοῦ ἔρτου, ζήσεται εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. But we need not therefore say (as Ebrard: so also Calov.) that Christ is the tree of life here, nor confuse the figure by introducing one which in its character is distinct from it. Still less, as Grot., is the tree to be interpreted as being the Holy Spirit. See, for the imagery, ch. xxii. 2, 14, 19. There is meaning in τοῦ θεοῦ (μου). The two former words as following παραδείσῳ, come from Ezek. xxviii. 13, and set forth the holiness and glory of that paradise as consisting in God's dwelling and delighting in it: and the adjunct μου (John xx. 17), if read, connects this holiness and glory with Him who is ours, and who has every right to make the promise in virtue of his own peculiar part in God. On the whole image and expression, see Schöttgen, h. l., who adduces many parallels from the rabbinical writings).

8—11.] THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH AT SMYRNA. See Prolegg., § iii. 8. And to the angel of the church in Smyrna (in accordance with the idea of the angel representing the bishop, many of the ancient Commentators have inferred that Polycarp must have been here addressed. Whether this were chronologically possible, must depend on the date which we assign to the writing of the Apocalypse. He was martyred in A.D. 168, 86 years after his conversion, Eus. H. E. iv. 15) writes: These things saith the first and the last, who was (became) dead and revived (see ch. i. 17, 18, and for this sense of ζῆν, reff. The words here seem to point on to the promise in vv.

10, 11): I know thy tribulation and thy poverty (in outward wealth, arising probably from the θλίψις, by the despoiling of the goods of the Christians); nevertheless thou art rich (spiritually; see reff. To suppose an allusion to the name πολυκαρπος (Hengst.), is in the highest degree fanciful and improbable): and (I know) thy calumny from (arising from) those who profess themselves to be Jews, and they are not, but (are) Satan's synagogue (these slanderers were in all probability actually Jews by birth, but not (see Rom. ii. 28; Matt. iii. 9; John viii. 33; 2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 4 ff.) in spiritual reality; the same who every where, in St. Paul's time and afterwards, were the most active enemies of the Christians. When Polycarp was martyred, we read ἅπαν τὸ πλῆθος ἔθνῶν τε καὶ Ἰουδαίων τῶν τὴν Σμύρναν κατοικούντων ἀκατασχέτω θυμῷ καὶ μεγάλῃ φωνῇ ἐπεβόα: and afterwards when fagots were collecting for the pile, μάλιστὰ Ἰουδαίων προθύμως, ὡς ἔθος αὐτοῖς, εἰς τοῦτο ὑπουργούντων, Mart. Polyc. c. 12, 13, pp. 1037, 1042. This view is strengthened by the context. Had they been, as some have supposed, e. g. Vitringa, Christians, called Ἰουδαῖοι in a mystical sense, they would hardly have been spoken of as the principal source of calumny against the Church, nor would the collective epithet of Satan's synagogue be given to them. Respecting the latter appellation, see some interesting remarks by Trench, N. T. Synonyms, § i. He brings out there, how ἐκκλησία, the nobler word, was chosen by our Lord and His Apostles for the assembly of the called in Christ, while συναγωγή, which is only once found (James ii. 2) of a Christian assembly (and there, as Düsterd. notes, not with τοῦ θεοῦ, but with ὑμῶν), was gradually abandoned entirely to the Jews, so that in this, the last book of the canon, such an expression as this can be used. See also his Comm. on the Epistles to the Seven Churches, p. 95. See the opposite in Num. xvi. 3, xx. 4, xxxi. 16,—συναγωγὴ κυρίου). 10.] Fear not the things which thou art about to suffer (in the ways mentioned below. α indicates manifold tribulation, as there): behold [for certain (δὴ gives the tone of present certainty and actuality: see reff. It is in fact originally no more than a shortened form of ἦδη: see Hartung, Partikellehre, i. 245 ff.)], the devil (Hengstb. after Züllig, would lay stress here on the import of the name of the great adversary, as connected with the βλασφημία above. But this again would be forced and unnatural, especially after the recent mention of σατανᾶ. Of course it is understood from the context, that the devil would act through the hostility of human agents, and among them eminently these Jewish enemies. Trench, in loc., remarks on the reference to the devil, as the primary author of all assaults on the Church, found in the Acts of the ancient martyrs: e. g. the Ep. from the Churches of Lyons and Vienne: the Martyrdom of Polycarp, 3, 17, pp. 1032, 1041: Martyr. accompaniment of persecution, Acts xii. 4; xvi. 23: not, as Heinr., put for all kinds of misery), that ye may be tried (by temptations to fall away: not, that ye may be proved,—“ut fidem suam inter maxima pericula probare eoque consummatam virtutem consummare possint,” as Ewald. This might be the end which Christ had in view in permitting the persecution: but ἴνα here rather gives the purpose of the agent in the previous clause, ὁ διάβολος): and ye shall have tribulation ten days (the expression is probably used to signify a short and limited time: so in Gen. xxiv. 55; Num. xi. 19; Dan. i. 12: see also Num. xiv. 22; 1 Sam. i. 8; Job xix. 3; Acts xxv. 6. Wetst. quotes Ter. Adelp. v. 1. 36, “decem dierum vix mihi est familia.” So Arethas in Catena, eis ὀλίγον χρόνον τούτων ἢ θλίψις, καὶ οὐδ’ ὅσον δέκα ἡμέραις παραμετρεῖσθαι ἀξία. And so, recently, Trench. All kinds of fanciful interpretations have been given: so in Gloss. ord.,—“Deus suos ad bella mitens Decalogo armat” (another variety of which is, “tribulatio ecclesiae durabit quamdiu observatio præceptorum Decalogi, quod est usque ad finem mundi:” so Lyra, altern.):—“x. diebus, i. e. toto hoc tempore in quo per septem dies contra tria principalia vitia pugnatur, avaritiam, cupiditatem, vauam gloriam.” Similarly Ansbert. And again, “significatur totum tempus usque ad finem sæculi, eo quod omnes numeri sequentes denarium sunt replicationes ipsius et partium suarum.” Lyra introduces “the year-day principle:” —“posset etiam aliter salvo meliori iudicio exponi, ut per decem dies intelligantur decem anni, secundum illud, Ezech. iv. 6, ‘Diem pro anno dedi;’ forte tantum duravit persecutio Smyrnenis ecclesiae.” This has been taken up by Cluver. in Calov., Brightmann, al. Bede, Haymo, and Joachim understand it of the ten persecutions from Nero to Diocletian: Perer., Ribera, and Corn.-a-lap., “decem, id est, multis, diebus:” Ambr., “quia, licet ista tribulatio pluribus diebus et mensibus duret, decem tamen diebus erit atrocissima:” and recently Ebrard understands the ten days of ten divisions, or periods, in the persecution). Be (γίνου, not ἴσθι, see reff.: new circumstances of trial requiring new kinds and degrees of fidelity; which does not remain as it is, but takes accession) thou (it is quite futile to attempt to distinguish in these Epistles between what is said to the Angel in the singular, and what is said to the Church in the plural. This is shewn by the former part of this verse,—& μέλλεις πάσχειν . . . followed by ἐξ ἑμῶν. Only where there is occasion to discriminate, is the plural used: cf. ver. 24 f.: but wherever the whole church is spoken of it is in the singular, under the person of its representative angel) faithful unto (reff. not, “until:” but “even unto,” i. e. up to the point or measure of: Let not thy faithfulness stop short of enduring death itself. Cf. Phil. ii. 8) death, and (reff.) I will give thee the crown (τὸν στ., as being the well-known prize promised to the faithful: as in reff. Trench. in loc., has an interesting note on the question whether this is a diadem of royalty, or a garland of victory; and decides for the former, seeing that the στέφανος of ch. v. can only be royal crowns,—that the word is employed by all the Evangelists of the “Crown of thorns,”—and that the imagery of this book is not any where drawn from Gentile antiquity, but is Jewish throughout) of life (gen. of apposition: the life itself being the crown: see note, and distinction, on 2 Tim. iv. 8). 11.] Conclusion: see above, ver. 7. 12—17.] THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH AT PERGAMUM (see Prolegg. § iii. 9; Trench, p. 106). And to the angel of the church in Pergamum write: These things saith He that hath the sharp two-edged sword (this is the logical order in English of the epithet-predicates, τὴν δίστομον τὴν ῥομφαίαν. ἡ ῥ. ἡ δίστομος is the sword with two edges: and to the whole of this is added ἡ ῥομφαία. The designation of our Lord is made with reference to ver. 16 below): I know where thou dwellest; (viz.) where is the throne of Satan (it is not easy to say, what these words import. Andr. and Areth. say in the Catena, θρόνος τοῦ σ. τὸν Περγ. καλεῖ, ὡς κατείδωλον ὄσαν ὑπὲρ τὴν Ἀσίαν πᾶσαν. And so Vitrina and Bengel. But Vitr. himself asks, "an Satauas in illa superstitione (Æsculapii cultu) se magis prodidit Pergami, quam in Dianæ cultu Ephesi?" Grot. Wetst. al. fancy that σατανᾶς was the serpent form under which the god Æsculapius was worshipped at Pergamum. But even the fact itself is doubtful; and the interpretation halts, in that the text is not ὁ θρόνος τοῦ δράκοντος, instead of τ. σατανᾶ. Zornius, mentioned in Wolf, h. l., explains it of the famous Pergamene library, and the writings of the Sophists therein contained. A more likely direction in which to find the solution is that taken by Lyra, "id est, ejus potestas, infideles inclinando ad persecutionem ecclesie:" for above, ver. 10, the act of persecution is ascribed to the devil: and here we learn by what follows, that he had carried it at Pergamum to the extent of putting Antipas to death; which seems not to have been reached elsewhere at this time. Whether this may have been owing to the fact of the residence of the supreme magistracy at Pergamum, or to some fanatical zeal of the inhabitants for the worship of Æsculapius, or to some particular person or persons dwelling there especially hostile to the followers of Christ (Hengst., Ewald), must remain uncertain. The above view, with unimportant modifications, is adopted by De Wette, Ebrard, Stern (who combiues the others with it), Gräber, Düsterd., al.—I may remark, that it is plainly out of the question to attempt, as has been done by some, to connect such an expression as this with the prophecies of the latter portion of the book, and to anticipate for the insignificant Pergamum a leading place in their fulfilment. The expression is relevant, as the context shews, merely to the then existing state of the city (ὅπου κατοικεῖ below), and not to any future part which it should take in the fulfilment of prophecy), and thou holdest fast (reff.) my name (the profession of thy faith in Me) and didst not deny the faith of me in the days of Antipas (or, taking the other form of the text, 'in which Antipas:' see var. readd. As the shorter text runs, and probably also if we read the ταῖς of the Codex Sinaiticus, Ἀντίπας is regarded as indeclinable, which circumstance has apparently led to all the perplexing varieties of reading) my witness, my faithful one (or, if we omit the second μου, my faithful witness: the appositional nominative, see above, ch. i. 5. A motive for its use here may have been the nominative form of the gen. Ἀντίπας. This consideration of itself would obviate the untenable objection which Düsterd. brings against the above account of the construction, viz. that there is no reason to suppose it to have been used except in the case of the Sacred Name, as in ch. i. 5: but see Düsterd.'s own text in ver. 20: and reff. there), who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth (of Antipas = Antipater (Jos. Antt. xiv. 1. 3),—after the analogy of Hermas for Hermodorus, Lucas and Silas for Lucanus and Silvanus, —nothing is known to us with certainty, except from this passage. Andreas says that he had read the account of his martyrdom: Ἀντίπας δέ τις τοῦνομα μάρτυς ἐν Περγάμῳ γέγονεν ἀνδρείοτατος, οὔπερ ἀνέγγων τὸ μαρτύριον: and Areth. in Cat. says, οὗ καὶ τὸ μαρτύριον εἰς ἔτι σώζεται. Ribera gives the following account from Simeon Metaphrastes: “Pergami episcopum hunc fuisse tradunt, et ejus martyrium Metaphrastes Simeon scripsit, qui ad extremam eum senectutem pervenisse dicit, et cum res Christianorum propter Domitiani persecutionem magno in discrimine versarentur, nullo timore captum sæpius in publicum prodiisse et inter crudelissimorum tortorum minas intrepide sinceram fidei doctrinam ac Christi laudes prædicasse. Ita Christianis præsidio, dæmonibus terrore erat, qui ab ipso se fingari et sacrificiis suis privari fatebantur. Quare a præfecto urbis captus et in Christi confessione generose persistens ad Dianæ templum tractus et in bovem æneum, quem multo ante igne inflammaverant, conjectus, vitam in gratiarum actione precibusque finivit. Et tanta (inquit Simeon) præstitit virtute, ut locus hic ubi martyrium pertulit, in hodiernum usque diem miraculis excellat, et magnæ in eo fiant curationes.” The Greek and Roman menologies contain similar accounts at his day, April 11th. It is hardly possible to withhold indignation at the many childish symbolic meanings which have been imagined for the name, in defiance of philology and of sobriety alike. First is that of Aretius, ἀντι-πᾶς, the enemy of all, i. e. the child of God and enemy of the world; which has been taken up by Hengstenberg, who ought to have known better, and Antipas identified with the historic Timotheus. Such folly would hardly be credited, were it not before our eyes:— “Ist man bis hieher gefolgt, so wird man es nicht zu fñhn finden, wenn wir die Veramtung aufstellen, das durch Antipas Timotheus bezeichnet werde. Die beiden Namen ‘Furchtegott’ und ‘Gegenall’ stehen in inniger Correspondenz mit einander,” &c., Hengst. p. 190. This Commentator also finds remarkable meaning in the way in which the name is written in A, Ἀντίπας. Then that of E. Schmidt and others, who hold Ἀντίπας to be = Ἀντίπαπα: that of Cocceius, who makes Antipas represent the Athanasians, seeing that ἀντίπατρος = ἰσόπατρος = ὁμοούσιος. I mention such interpretations, to shew how far men may go wrong when once they surrender their judgment to their fancy in search of a mystic sense for plain history. On ὅπου ὁ σατ. κατοικ., see above). 14, 15.] Nevertheless I have against thee a few things (not “a little matter,” as Luth., Hengstb.; nor does ὀλίγα imply that more than one matter is blamed, as Beng.: nor is it used by libotes, to mean “graviter de te conqueror,” as Heinr. and Ebrard; nor is any reference to be thought of to the sins of Christ’s people having been removed by His atonement, and thus spoken of lightly by Him, as Aretius: but is used as a word of comparison with the far greater number of approved things which remained, and is plural, inasmuch as ὀλίγον would refer, not to the objective fewness, but to the subjective unimportance, of the grounds of complaint; which latter was not so. This use of the plural comes under the case treated by Winer (§ 27. 2), where only one thing is really meant, but the writer speaks of that one generically; e. g. τεθνήκασιν οἱ ζητοῦντες τὴν ψυχ. τοῦ παιδίου, Matt. ii. 20, where Herod only is meant. And so De Wette and Düsterd.): thou hast there (in Pergamum: the locality is specified probably on account of the description which has been just given of it as the place where a faithful martyr had suffered unto death) men holding (cf. κρατεῖς τὸ ὄν. μου above) the teaching of Balaam (διδαχὴν: not simply as De W., “doctrine corresponding to the character of the advice of Balaam," but used in strict correspondence with δς ἐδίδασκεν following: that which a man teaches being his doctrine. And κρατεῖν this διδαχὴν, is to follow the teaching), who taught Balak (the dat. seems to be a Hebraism, ἡ τῷ, Job xxi. 22: so Ewald, De W., Ebrard, Düsterd.: not a dat. commodi, "for Balak" to serve his purpose, understanding "men" as an object after ἐδίδασκεν, as Hengstb. Certainly it is not expressly asserted in Num. xxxi. 16 that it was Balak whom Balaam advised to use this agency against Israel: but the narrative almost implies it: Balak was in power, and was the most likely person to authorize and put in force the scheme. And so Josephus, Antt. iv. 6. 6, makes Balaam on departing call to him τὸν τε Βάλακον καὶ τοὺς ἔρχοντας τῶν Μαδιανιτῶν, and give them the advice) to put a stumbling-block (properly σκανδάλῃθρον: see refl., and a minute investigation of the word by Trench in loc.: an occasion of sin) before (in the way, or before the face of) the sons of Israel, to eat (i. e. inducing them to eat. See var. readd.) things offered to idols (from Num. xxv. 1, 2, it was not only participation in things offered to idols, but the actual offering sacrifices to them, of which the children of Israel were guilty. But seeing that the participation was that which was common to both, our Lord takes that as the point to be brought forward: "satis hic habuit Christus id dicere, quod illi Israelitæ cum Nicolaitis habebant commune." Grot.) and to commit fornication. 15.] Thus thou also holding (see above) the teaching of the Nicolaitans (the art. though not expressed, is in fact, in this later usage, contained in the proper name) in like manner (viz. in eating things offered to idols, and fornication. We may remark, 1) that it is most according to the sense of the passage to understand these sins in the case of the Nicolaitans, as in that of those whom Balaam tempted, literally, and not mystically. So Victorin., Andr., Areth., Ribera, Calov., Beng., Heinr. (doubtfully), Ewald, De W., Hengst., Ebrard, Düsterd., Trench, al.: 2) that the whole sense of the passage is against the idea of the identity of the Balaamites and the Nicolaitans; and would be in fact destroyed by it. The mere existence of the etymological relation is extremely doubtful (see above on ver. 6): and even granting it,—to suppose the two identical, would be to destroy the historical illustration by which the present existing sect is described).

16.] Repent [therefore] (Lyra, a-Lapide, Tirinus, Bengel, al., join the preceding ὁμοίως to this clause, understanding it, as well as the church at Ephesus, ver. 5.

This making war must not be understood as Grotius, "Prophetas excitabo in Ecclesia, qui id faciant quod Episcopus negligit, et fortiter se opponant Nicolaitis" (similarly Calov.)) with (ἐν, in, as armed with or arrayed in: but sometimes in the Rev. it is difficult to trace the proper meaning of ἐν, and it seems almost purely instrumental: cf. Winer, edn. 6, § 48, d) the sword of my mouth (many expositors (e. g., Grot., Wetst., Vitr., Beng., Stern, Hengst., Trench, al.) suppose an allusion to the sword of the angel, armed with which he withstood Balaam in the way (Num. xxii. 23, 31), or to that and the sword by which those who sinned in the matter of Baal-peor (Num. xxv. 5), and eventually Balaam himself (Num. xxxi. 8), were slain: but seeing that the connexion with ch. i. 16 is so plainly asserted by our ver. 12, it seems better to confine the allusion to that sword, and not to stretch it to what after all is a very doubtful analogy).

17.] Conclusion. For the former clause see on ver. 7. We may notice that in these three first Epistles, the proclamation precedes the promise to him that conquereth: in the four last, it follows the promise. To him that conquereth I will give to him (see above on ver. 7) of the manna which is hidden (on the participle gen. see ref., and Winer, edn. 6, § 30. 7, b. In this manna, there is unmistakably an allusion to the proper and heavenly food of the children of Israel, as contrasted with the unhallowed idol-offerings; but beyond that, there is an allusion again (see above on ver. 7) to our Lord's discourse in John vi., where He describes Himself as the true bread from heaven: not that we need here, any more than in ver. 7 (see note there), confuse the present figure by literally pressing the symbolism of that chapter. Christ's gifts may all be summed up in the gift of Himself: on the other hand, He may describe any of the manifold proprieties of his own Person and office as His gift. This manna is κεκρυμμένον, in allusion partly perhaps to the fact of the pot of manna laid up in the ark in the holy of holies (Exod. xvi. 33: cf. our ch. xi. 19: not to the Jewish fable, "Hæc est arca quam . . . Josias abscondit ante vastationem templi nostri, et hæc arca futuro tempore, adveniente Messia nostro . . . manifestabitur." Abarbanel on 1 Sam. iv. 4, cited by Düsterd.), but principally to the fact that our spiritual life, with its springs and nourishments, κέκρυπται σὺν τῷ χριστῷ ἐν τῷ θεῷ, Col. iii. 3. See also Ps. lxxviii. 24; cv. 40. The distinction between κεκρυμμένον, reconditum, and κρυπτόν, occultum, pressed here by Trench after Cocceius, does not appear to be warranted, further than that the participle represents more the objective fact, while the verbal adjective sets forth the subjective quality), and I will give to him a white stone (see below), and on the stone (the prep. of motion betokens the act of inscribing) a new name written, which none knoweth except he that receiveth it (the views concerning this stone have been very various. Bede interprets it "corpus nunc baptismo candidatum, tunc incorruptionis gloria refulgens." And similarly Lyra, "corpus dote charitatis decoratum, quod dicitur calculus sive lapillus, quia est extractum de terra, sicut et lapis," adding, "nomen novum, quia tunc quilibet beatus manifeste et corporaliter per dotes corporis gloriosi erit ascriptus civitati cælestium." But both these are surely out of the question. Some have connected this with the mention of the manna, and cited (as Wetst., who gives it merely among others and expresses no opinion) the Rabbinical tradition, Joma 8, "cadebant Israelitis una cum manna lapides pretiosi et margaritæ." Others again think of the precious stones bearing the names of the twelve tribes on the breastplate of the High-priest, the order for which was contemporary with the giving of the manna, Exod.

xxviii. 17; xxxix. 10, and regard this as indicating the priestly dignity of the victorious Christian. So Ewald, Züllig, Ebrard: the last remarks, that as the hidden manna was the reward for abstaining from idol-meat, so this for abstinence from fornication. But, as Düsterd. observes, these are never called ψῆφοι. Again some, as Arethas, Grot., Hamm., Eichhorn, Heinr., have reminded us of the Gentile custom of presenting the victors at the games with a ψῆφος or ticket which entitled them to nourishment at the public expense, and to admission to royal festivals. Titus, they quote from Xiphilinus, Epit. Dion. p. 228, used to cast small pieces of wood (σφαίρια ξύλινα μικρά) down into the arena, σύμβολον ἔχοντα, τὰ μὲν ἐδαδίμου τινός, κ.τ.λ., which whoever got was to bring καὶ λαβεῖν τὸ ἐπιγεγραμμένον. Hence they regard the white stone as the ticket of admission to the heavenly feast. But it may be replied, 1) the feast is mentioned separately under the name of the hidden manna: and 2) the description of the writing on the stone, which follows, will not suit this view. Again, others, regarding the connexion of the white stone with the manna, refer to the use of the lot cast among the priests, which should offer the sacrifice (so Schöttg., quoting the Rabbis): or to the writing a name, at election by ballot, on a stone or a bean (so Elsner, and perhaps Victorinus, who says, "gemma alba, adoptio in filium Dei"): or to the "mos erat antiquis niveis atrisque lapillis, His damnare reos, illis absolvere culpa," Ov. Met. xv. 41. So Erasmus, Zeger, a-Lap., Aretius, Calov., Vitruvius, Wolf, al. Some expositors combine two or more of these expositions: as De Wette, understanding it as typical of justification and election; Bengel; Stern, who also notices the white stone as the mark of felicity, "Hunc, Macrine, diem numera meliore lapillo, Qui tibi labentes apponit candidus annos," Pers. Sat. ii., and "O diem lætum notandumque mihi candidissimo calculo," Plin. Ep. vi. 11. 3. But, as Düsterd. well observes, it is against all these interpretations, that no one of them fits the conditions of this description. Each one halts in the explanation either of the stone itself, or of that which is written on it. Least of all, perhaps, does the last apply: the verdict of acquittal would be a strange reward indeed to one who has fought and overcome in the strength of an acquittal long ago obtained, ὁ κύριος ἐχαρίσατο ὑμῖν, Col. iii. 13. The most probable view is that which Bengel gives a hint of ("scribebant veteres multa in lapillis"), and which Hengst. ("Das hier in Betrachtkommende Moment ist allein das, daß man im Austerthume manches auf kleine Steine schrieb") and Düsterd. hold, that the figure is derived from the practice of using small stones, inscribed with writing, for various purposes, and that, further than this, the imagery belongs to the occasion itself only. Taking it thus, the colour is that of victory, see ch. iii. 4; vi. 2; iv. 4; xix. 14. The name inscribed yet remains for consideration. It is in this, as it would be in every case, the inscription which gives the stone its real value, being, as it is, a token of reward and approval from the Son of God. But what name is this? not what name in each case, for an answer to this question is precluded by the very terms, ὁ οὐδεὶς οἶδεν, κ.τ.λ.: but of what kind? Is it the name of Christ Himself, or of God in Christ? This supposition is precluded also by the same terms: for any mysterious name of God or of Christ would either be hidden from all (so ch. xix. 12, ἔχων . . . ὄνομα γεγραμμένον ὁ οὐδεὶς οἶδεν εἰ μὴ αὐτός), or known to all who were similarly victorious through grace. These very terms seem to require that it should be the recipient's own name, a new name however; a revelation of his everlasting title, as a son of God, to glory in Christ, but consisting of, and revealed in, those personal marks and signs of God's peculiar adoption of himself, which he and none else is acquainted with. "If the heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger intermeddled not with its joy" (Prov. xiv. 10), then the deep secret dealings of God with each of us during those times, by which our sonship is assured and our spiritual strife carried onward to victory, can, when revealed to us in the other blessed state, be known thoroughly to ourselves only. Bengel beautifully says, "Möchtest Du wissen, was Du für einen neuen Namen bekommen wirst? Überwinde! Vorher fragst Du vergeblich: und hernach wirst Du ihn bald auf dem weißen Stein geschrieben lesen." Trench, in loc., after Züllig, suggests that the white, or glistening stone, may be the Urim, in which the most precious stone of

18—29.] THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH AT THYATIRA. See Prolegg. § iii. 9. And to the angel of the church in Thyatira write: These things saith the Son of God (our Lord thus names himself here, in accordance with the spirit of that which is to follow; ver. 27 being from Ps. ii., in which it is written, κύριος εἶπεν πρὸς με Τίός μου εἶ σύ, ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε), who hath his eyes as a flame of fire (connected with ver. 23, ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἐρευνῶν νεφροὺς καὶ καρδίας) and his feet are like to chalcobanous (for χαλκοβ., see on ch. i. 15. There is here probably a connexion with ver. 27, ὡς τὰ σκεύη τὰ κεραμικὰ συντρίβεται, the work of the strongly shod feet): I know thy works, and (the four which follow are subordinated to the ἔργα preceding, as is shewn by σου placed after the four, not after each one. The καὶ then is the subordinating or expegetic copula, as in καὶ χάριν ἀντὶ χάριτος, John i. 16. See Winer, edn. 6, § 53. 3, c) the love (ἀγάπη, standing first, is probably quite general, to God and man) and the faith (general again: not = faithfulness, but in its ordinary sense) and the ministrations (viz., to the sick and poor, and all that need it: the natural proof of ἀγάπη and πίστις—πίστις δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργουμένη, Gal. v. 6) and the endurance (in tribulation: or perhaps the ὑπομονὴ ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ of Rom. ii. 7) of thee, and (that) thy last works (are) more (in number, or importance, or both) than the first (this praise is the opposite of the blame conveyed by ver. 5 to the Ephesian church). 20.] Notwithstanding I have against thee that thou sufferest (ἀφείς from ἀφέω, see ref. Ex. and Winer, edn. 6, § 14. 3) thy wife (or, the woman) Jezebel (on the whole, the evidence for σου being inserted in the text seems to me to preponderate. It could not well have been inserted: and was sure to have been erased, from its difficulty, and possibly from other reasons, considering what was the common interpretation of the ἄγγελος. It does not create any real difficulty: finding its meaning not in the matter of fact at Thyatira, but in the history from which the appellation Ἰεζαβὲλ is taken. In 3 Kings xx. 25 (1 Kings xxi. 25) we read Ἀχαάβ, ὃς ἐπράθη ποιῆσαι τὸ πονηρὸν ἐνώπιον κυρίου, ὡς μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν Ἰεζαβὲλ ἡ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ: from which text the phrase is transferred entire, importing that this Jezebel was to the church at Thyatira what that other was to Ahab. It is not so easy to determine who is, or who are, imported by the term. The very fact of the name Jezebel being chosen (for it is impossible, even were this the actual name of a woman, that it should be used here with any other than the symbolic meaning), coupled with τὴν γυναῖκά σου above explained, takes us out of the realms of simple fact into those of symbolism.

The figure of "Jezebel thy wife" being once recognized in its historical import, it would not be needful that an individual woman should be found to answer to it: the conscience of the Thyatiran church could not fail to apply the severe reproof to whatever influence was being exerted in the direction here indicated. So that I should rate at very little the speculations of many Commentators on the supposed woman here pointed out. Düsterd., recently, remarks that ἡ λέγουσα has something individual about it. So it has: but may not this individuality belong just as well to the figure, as to the thing signified by it? The sect or individuals being once concentrated as Jezebel, ἡ λέγουσα would follow of course, in the propriety of the figure. On the whole, however, I should feel it more probable that some individual teacher, high in repute and influence at the time, is pointed at. The denunciation of such a teacher under such a title would be at once startling and decisive. Nor would probability be violated by the other supposition, that a favoured and influential party in the Thyatiran church is designated. The church herself is represented by a woman: why may not a party (compare the Jews, who are the συναγωγὴ τοῦ σατανᾶ of ver. 9) within the church be similarly symbolized? However this may be, the real solution must lie hidden until all that is hidden shall be known. See more below, who calleth herself a prophetess (the appositional nom. again: see reff.: and again with an indeclinable proper name, as in ver. 13. This clause perhaps points at an individual: but there is on the other hand no reason why a sect claiming prophetic gifts should not be indicated: the feminine belonging as before to the historical symbol), and she teacheth and deceiveth my servants, to commit fornication and eat things sacrificed to idols (hence the propriety of the name Jezebel: for both these were the abominations of the historic Jezebel: 2 Kings ix. 22, 30 (cf. Jer. iv. 30; Nahum iii. 4): the latter indeed in its more aggravated form of actual idolatry, 1 Kings xviii. 19. This specification of the mischief done shews us that this influence at Thyatira was in the same direction as the evil works of the Nicolaitans at Pergamum, ver. 14. The fact that this was the prevalent direction of the false teaching of the day, is important in a chronological point of view: see Prolegg., § iii. par. 6). And I gave her time (not, "in my pre-ordination of what is to be," as the aor. in Mark xiii. 20, but denoting historically that which the Lord had actually done, in vain. Notice that the ἀφείναι, on which depended the time given her for repentance, is yet blamed in the church of Thyatira as a sin) that she should repent, and she willeth not to repent of (lit. "out of:" constr. pragn., so as to come out of: or the μεταν. itself is regarded as an escape. The construction (reff.) is confined to this book: we have the verb once with ἀπό, Acts viii. 22; and the subst. μετάνοια, Heb. vi. 1) her fornication (πορνεία is here to be taken, as in all these passages, in its literal sense. Otherwise, if taken figuratively, it would be only a repetition of the other particular, idolatry).

22.] Behold (arrests attention, and prepares the way for something unexpected and terrible), I cast her (evidently against her will: but there is not necessarily violence in the word: it is the ordinary denly changed into a direct address to those threatened) to each according to your works (ἔργα, not the mere outward products of the visible life, but the real acts and verities of the inward man, discerned by the piercing eye of the Son of God).

24.] But (contrast to those addressed before) to you I say, the rest who are in Thyatira, as many as have not (not only do not hold, but are free from any contact with) this teaching, such as (οἰτινες, as usual, classifies) have not known the depths (deep places, in the resolved form) of Satan, as they call them (it was the characteristic of the falsely named γνῶσις, to boast of its βάθρα, or depths, of divine things. Iren. ii. 22. 1, p. 146, speaks of those "qui profunda bythi adinvenisse se dicunt:" and ib. 3, p. 147, "profunda Dei adinvenisse se dicentes." And Tert. adv. Valent. 1, vol. ii. p. 528 ff., should by all means be read, as admirably illustrating this expression. He there says, "Eleusinia Valentiniana fecerunt lenocinia, sancta silentio magno, sola taciturnitate caelestia. Si bona fide quæris, concreto vultu, suspensio supercilio Allum est, aiunt." We may safely therefore refer the expression οὐκ ἔγνωσαν τὰ βάθρα to the heretics spoken of. But it is not so clear to whom as their subject the words ὡς λέγουσιν are to be appropriated, and again whose word τοῦ σατανᾶ is, whether that 1) of our Lord, 2) of the heretics, or 3) of the Christians addressed. If ὡς λέγουσιν belong to the Christians, then the sense will be, that they, the Christians, called the βάθρα of the heretics, the βάθρα τοῦ σατανᾶ, and were content to profess their ignorance of them. So Andr., Areth., Heinr., Züllig, Ebrard: and so far would be true enough; but the sentence would thus be left very flat and pointless, and altogether inconsistent in its tone with the solemn and pregnant words of the rest of the message. If ὡς λέγουσιν belong to the heretics, we have our choice between two views of τοῦ σατανᾶ: either 1) that the heretics themselves called their own mysteries τὰ β. τοῦ σατανᾶ. But this, though held by Hengst.,—and even by Neander, Pfl. u. L. edn. 4, p. 619 note, as a possible alternative, and recently by Trench,—can hardly be so, seeing that the words surely would not bear the sense thus assigned to them, viz. that they could go deeper than and outwit Satan in his own kingdom: and seeing moreover, that no such formula, or any resembling it, is found as used by the ancient Gnostic heretics: or 2) that the ὡς λέγουσιν applies only to the word βάθρα, and that, when, according to their way of speaking, τοῦ θεοῦ should have followed (cf. ref. 1 Cor.), the Lord in indignation substitutes τοῦ σατανᾶ. This has been the sense taken by most Commentators, e. g., Corn.-a-lap., Ribera, Grot., Calov., Wetst., Vitr., Bengel, Wolf, Eichhorn, Ewald, De W., Stern, Düsterd. And it appears to me that this alone comes in any measure up to the requirements of the passage, in intensity of meaning and solemnity, as well as in verisimilitude.

I need hardly remark that the rendering which I am sorry to see in Tregelles's very useful little English version of the purer text of the Apoc., "how they speak," is quite untenable. In the E. V., "as they speak," is meant to = "as they say:" but for "how they speak" (absol.), λαλοῦσιν would be required), I cast not upon you any other burden (it is better, seeing that no τοῦτο or τό follows after πλὴν below, not to carry on the sentence as if ἄλλο, πλὴν . . . were closely joined, but to break it off at βάρος: leaving however the πλὴν to take it up (see below) by and by. And this being so, to what do the words refer? There can, I imagine, be little doubt as to the answer, if we remember some of the expressions used in the apostolic decree in which these very matters here in question, fornication and abstaining from unholy meats, were the only things forbidden to the Gentile converts. For our Lord here takes up and refers to those very words. In Acts xv. 28, we read ἔδοξεν γὰρ τῷ ἁγίῳ πνεύματι κ. ἡμῖν μηδὲν πλέον ἐπιτίθεσθαι ὑμῖν βάρος πλὴν τῶν ἐπιτάγης, ἀπέχεσθαι εἰδωλοθύτων κ. αἵματος κ. πικρῶν κ. πορνείας. This act of simple obedience, and no deep matters beyond their reach, was what the Lord required of them. And this βάρος resolved itself into keeping the faith once delivered to the saints, as enjoined in the next sentence. This view is taken by Bede (2) (in substance: "non ego vobis novam mitto doctrinam: sed quam accepistis, servate in finem;" but he does not mention the allusion), Primas., Lyra, Corn.-a-lap., Stern, Hengst., Düsterd. Grot. al. give a more general meaning, true in part: "jactant illi se rerum multarum cognitione; eam a vobis non exigo." Bengel understands by βάρος the trouble given them by Jezebel and her followers: Ewald, the punishments about to befall the heretics, which were not to be feared by the Christians: Ebrard similarly,—they had had enough trouble already in enduring Jezebel, &c., and should not have any share in her punishment: De Wette, the burden of previous suffering implied in ὑπομονή; and so Bede (1), "non patiar vos tentari supra quod potestis," and Beza, understanding βάρος in the sense of "burden," so often occurring in the prophets when they denounce the divine threatenings. But to my mind the allusion to the apostolic decree is too clear and prominent to allow of any other meaning coming into question: at least any other which sets that entirely aside. Others may be deduced and flow from that one, which have meaning for the church now that those former subjects of controversy have passed away; but (though not (see above) directly and in the same sentence connected with ἄλλο, πλὴν distinctly looks back to it and takes it up. It is, "only:" q. d., forget not that the licence just accorded involves this sacred obligation) that which ye have (cf. ch. iii. 11: not to be restricted in its sense to their steadfastness in resisting Jezebel and hers, but representing the sum total of Christian doctrine and hope and privilege; the ἅπαξ παραδοθεῖσα τοῖς ἁγίοις πίστις of Jude 3), hold fast (the aor. is more vivid and imperative than would be the present; it sets forth not so much the continuing habit, as the renewed and determined grasp of every intervening moment of the space prescribed) until the time when I shall come (the ἂν gives an uncertainty when the time shall be, which we cannot convey in our language). 26.] And (the announcement of reward to the conqueror now first precedes the proclamation to hear what the Spirit saith to the churches: and is joined, here alone, by καὶ to the preceding portion of the Epistle; being indeed more closely connected with it in this case than in any of the others; see below) he that conquereth and he that (by the second ὁ, this καὶ is precluded from being taken as introducing a clause merely exegetical of νικῶν, as Düsterd., al. Rather must we say, that by it ὁ τηρῶν κ.τ.λ. is included in the class pointed out by ὁ νικῶν) keepeth to the end (it is remarkable that immediately after the words, so pointedly alluded to above, in the apostolic decree, Acts xv. 28, was added, ἐξ ὧν διατηροῦντες ἑαυτοὺς εὖ πράξετε) my works (contrast to τὰ ἔργα αὐτῆς, ver. 22: but extending beyond that contrast to a general and blessed truth. μου, gen. possess, which belong to Me, are the attributes of Myself and of mine), I will give to him authority over the nations (compare the ἴσθι ἐξουσίαν ἔχων ἐπάνω δέκα πόλεων in Luke xix. 17, which is the reward of him who obeyed the command πραγματεύσασθε ἐν ᾧ ἔρχομαι. spoken of is that which shall be conferred on the saints when they shall inherit the earth, and reign with Christ in His Kingdom. It has been gradually realized, as the stone cut out without hands has broken in pieces other kingdoms; but shall only then find its entire fulfilment. Various insufficient meanings have been given: of which one of the most curious is that of Grot., "Evolvam illum in gradum presbyteri, ut judicet de iis qui non christiane sed ethnicis vivunt;" who also understands ver. 27 below of excommunication, "per gladium hic intelligitur verbum Dei, cujus pars est et excommunicatio"), and he shall govern (lit. "shepherd." It is the LXX rendering of the Heb. שָׂרַף, break in pieces, which they have taken as שָׂרַף, shepherd, in ref. Ps. The saying, as rendered by them, is sanctioned by being thrice quoted in this book, see refl.) them with (see 1 Cor. iv. 21) a rod of iron (a sceptre of severity: "inflexibili justitia," as Lyra), as the vessels of pottery are broken up (συντριβεται, are crushed, or shivered, or broken up: the συν gives the idea of the multitudinous fragments collapsing into a heap: the "broken to shivers" of the E. V. is very good), as I also have received from my Father (viz. in Ps. ii. 9, in which Psalm it is said visus μου ei σύ, ver. 7. The power there conferred on Me, I will delegate to my victorious servant; see Luke xxii. 29). And I will give to him the star of the morning (it is not easy to say what, in strict exactness, these words import. The interpretations given, even in the Catena, are very various and inconsistent. Andr. and Areth. understand it of the Lucifer of Isa. xiv. 12, i. e. the devil, whom our Lord saw as lightning fall from heaven,—or, as there imported, the King of Babylon, the most powerful monarch on earth; so Züllig. Another meaning in the Catena is τὸν ὑπὸ τοῦ Πέτρου λεχθέντα φῶσφορον ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις τῶν πιστῶν ἀνατέλλοντα, 2 Pet. i. 19. Victorinus says, "Primam resurrectionem scilicet promittit." Primas., Bede, Alcas., Corn.-a-lap., Calov., Vitruv., Wolf, Beng., Stern, Ebrard, understand Christ Himself, who, ch. xxii. 16, declares Himself to be ὁ ἀστὴρ ὁ λαμπρὸς, ὁ πρωϊνός: and doubtless, as has been before remarked on the fruit of the tree of life, ver. 7, and on the hidden manna, ver. 17, in the mystical sense, Christ Himself is the sum and inclusion of all Christ's gifts: this truth serves to connect the symbolism of all these passages, but does not justify us in disturbing that of one by introducing that of another. Here the morning star clearly is not Christ Himself, the very terms of the sentence separating the two. Then again, we have Lyra,—"id est, corpus gloriosum dote claritatis refulgens,"—nearly the same words in which he before explained the white stone, ver. 17, only that there it was "charitatis:" Grot., "dabo et fulgorem, non qualis cuique stella, sed Luciferi, qui cæteras stellas multum vincit." And this interpretation is probably near the mark. In Dan. xii. 3 we read that the righteous shall shine ὡς οἱ ἀστέρες, and in Matt. xiii. 43 that they ἐκλάμψουσιν ὡς ὁ ἥλιος ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτῶν. And in Prov. iv. 18 we read that "the path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Still, this interpretation does not quite satisfy the words δώσω αὐτῷ: unless indeed the poetic imagery be, that he is imagined as clad in the glory of that star, putting it on as a jewel, or as a glittering robe. De Wette supposes it is to be given to him as its ruler: but such an interpretation would lead into a wide field of speculation which does not seem to have been opened by Scripture, and is hardly required by the passage itself.) 29.] See above, ver. 7.

CHURCH AT SARDIS. The Spirit of this Epistle is one of rebuke and solemn denunciation. Even the promise, ver. 5, is tinged with the same hue. For the history, see Prolegg., § iii. 10. And to the angel of the church in Sardis write: These things saith He that hath the seven spirits of God (this designation of our Lord has not before occurred: but as Düsterd. observes, it is new rather in form than in substance. We have mention in ch. i. 4 of the seven spirits which are before God's throne: and we there found occasion to interpret them of the plenitude of the Godhead in its attributes and energies. See, for further elucidation, ch. iv. 5, v. 6. These spirits, this plenitude, Christ, the Lord of the church, possesses, is clothed and invested with, in all fullness. From Him the spiritual life of his churches comes as its source, in all its elements of vitality. He searches all the depths both of our depravity and of His own applications of grace. He has in his hand all the Spirit's power of conviction. He wields the fire of purification and the fire of destruction. Whether the Spirit informs, or rebukes, or warns, or comforts, or promises, whether He softens or hardens men's hearts, it is Christ who, searching the hearts as Son of God and feeling their feelings as Son of man, wields and applies the one and manifold Spirit.

The designation here has its appropriateness in the whole character of this solemn Epistle. The Lord of the church comes, armed with all the powers of the Spirit; searching the depths of hypocrisy, judging of the worthlessness of works not done in faith. The difficulty of this general attribute of Christ, and not any one selected specially as applying to Sardis being here introduced, seems to be best accounted for, not, as Ebrard, by the general prophetic import of the Epistle, but by the fact that the minatory strain of the Epistle justifies the alleging the whole weight and majesty of the divine character of our Lord, to create alarm and bring about repentance) and the seven stars (the former symbolism (reff.) still holds in all its strictness. Nor have we the least right here, as some (e.g. Arethas in Catena, and Wetst.), to suppose that the stars and the spirits are identical. The motive mentioned above would fully account for this designation also: The Lord of all the churches: He who appoints them their ministering angels, and has them, and all that is theirs, in His hand): I know thy works, that (there is no need of a καί being inserted: the ὅτι is the inference from the ἔργα) thou hast a name that thou livest (I need only mention for warning the childish fancy, that the Bishop of Sardis was named Zosimus or Vitalis: so some blamed by Corn.-a-lap.: so, with approval, Bengel and Hengst. The expression explains itself: see ref. Herodot.: thou hast a repute that thou livest: art nominally, as we commonly now say, Christian), and (the mere copula carries the contrast far more vividly and pathetically than when it is made rhetorically complete by inserting "yet." The καί is not as Ebrard, "hebraisirend für ἀλλά," but is common in classical Greek, and indeed in all languages, in this sense) art dead (spiritually dead: void of vitality and fruitfulness: sunk in that deep deadly sleep which, if not broken in upon and roused up, is death itself: so St. Paul, Eph. v. 14, ἔγειρε ὁ καθεύδων κ. ἀνάστα ἀπὸ τῶν νεκρῶν, κ. ἐπιφύσκει σὺ ὁ χριστός: see reff.). Βε (γίνου), because a change is involved: become what thou art not) watchful (we can hardly help in English substituting the adj. for the participle "watching;" thereby losing the objective vividness of the pres. part., and getting instead a subjective attribute of character. "Awake and watch" would be, in paraphrase, tantamount to the text), and strengthen the remaining things, which were (the time is transferred to that indicated by στήρισον: which were, when thou shalt apply thyself to strengthen them) about to die (there is a question whether these λοιπά are to be understood as things, matters in which the Sardinian church was not yet totally without spiritual vitality, or as persons, who were not yet passed into the almost universal death-slumber of hypocrisy. The latter view is taken by (Andr., Areth., as reported in Düsterd.: but not in Catena, see below) Calov., Vitruv., Eichh., De Wette, Stern, Ebrard, Düsterd., Trench, al. And there is nothing in the construction to preclude the view. But if I mistake not, there is in the context. For to assume that the λοιποί could be thus described, would surely be to leave no room for those mentioned with so much praise below in ver. 4. Had τὰ λοιπά not occurred, we might have well understood στήρισον & ἐμελλον ἀποθανεῖν of confirming those thy weak members who on account of the general deadness were near losing their spiritual life altogether: but with τὰ λοιπά this can hardly stand. We must therefore take the other view,—"strengthen those thy remaining few graces, which in thy spiritual deadly slumber are not yet quite extinct." And so Andr. and Areth. in Catena (I transcribe the whole, by which it appears that μέλη has been carelessly taken to mean personal members: see under the other view above),—τὸν ὕπνον τῆς βραθυμίας ἀποτιναξάμενος, καὶ τὰ μέλη σου τὰ ἀποθνήσκειν τελῶς μέλοντα δι' ἀπιστίας στήριξον· οὐ γὰρ ἡ ἀρχὴ τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἔργων τὸν ἐργάτην στεφανοῦν τὸν δόκιμον ἀλλ' ἡ ἐπιμονὴ ἕχρη τέλους. τὸ στήριξον δὲ οὐχ ἀπλῶς εἴρηται, ἀλλὰ τὸ οἶονεὶ στερέρωσίν σου καὶ

Düsterd. well observes, "The express reference to the absolute rule of all Christian morality is here put the more strongly and strikingly, because this church had among men a name that she lived." The μου binds on the judgment of Him who speaks to that of God). Remember [therefore] how (not subjective, "with what manner of reception," as even Düsterd., after many others, but objective, "after what sort," "quomodo institutus fueris," as Castalio: as οὕτως, Eph. iv. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 11. Trench would unite both) thou hast received (perf.: of the permanent deposit of doctrine entrusted) and heardest (aor., of the act of hearing, when it took place), and keep (what thou hast received and heardest: pres., of an abiding habit) and repent (not pres. now, as the command is of a quick and decisive act of amendment). If therefore (the οὖν is hardly, as De Wette, because it is assumed, in the present evil state of the Sardinian church, that the exhortation will be in vain: far rather, as Düsterd. (alt.), Hengst., al., because repentance is so grievously needed. time about to be indicated in the threat which is coming), I will come as a thief (these words do not here refer to our Lord's final coming, but to some signal judgment in which He would overtake the Sardian church. Just as the formula derived from the great eschatological truth of the suddenness of His second coming is frequently applied to His final judgment in Jerusalem, so is it to other His partial and special advents to judgment in the case of individuals and churches), and thou shalt not know (οὐ μὴ, see on ch. ii. 11) at what hour (the accus. of the time when has been called a Hebraism: so even De Wette from Gesenius: or an Aramaism, according to Ewald. But it is common enough in later Greek, and is only, in its first form, a particular case of the accusative of measure, whether of space or time: see Krüger, § 46, anm. 1, where he cites such common expressions, as ἐξήλομεν ἔτος τουτί τρίτον εἰς Πάνακτον, Demosth.: Πρωταγόρας τρίτην ἡδὴ ἡμέραν ἐπίδεδήμηκεν. The change which the construction underwent seems to have been that which was usual in such cases; it lost its own peculiar significance of measure and duration, and became used where a mere point of time was in question. But even thus it finds abundant justification in good Greek in such expressions as that in Homer, II. φ. 111, ἀλλ' ἐπι τοι καὶ ἐμοὶ θάνατος καὶ μοῖρα κραταῖη ἔσσειται ἢ ἠώς, ἢ δέλτης, ἢ μέσον ἡμαρ: in Herod. ii. 2, τὴν ὄρην ἐπαγινέειν σφίσι αἴγας: and in such accusatives as ἡμαρ, νύκτα, ἀρχήν, τέλος, πυκνά, and the like. See also Matthæ, Gr. Gr. § 424, a) I will come upon thee. Nevertheless (notwithstanding this state of apathy even to spiritual death) thou hast (belonging to thee as members. Notice, as Bengel remarks, that these few had not separated themselves from the church in Sardis, notwithstanding its degraded state) a few names ("homines nominatim recensiti," as Vatabl. in Düs-terd. See reff. The gloss. interlin. is good: "quasi paucos nominatos, i. e., bonos qui nominatione digni sunt." The term would hardly be used except of a limited number. Hengstenb., with his usual faucfulness, in which he is here followed by Ebrard, finds an allusion in the ἔχεις ὀλίγα ὀνόματα to the ὄνομα ἔχεις ὄτι . . . above. It hardly needs remark, that the whole sense and connexion is different, the stress there on ὄνομα, here on ἔχεις. Besides which, in my judgment nothing can be further from the solemnity of the passage than the existence of such mere verbal allusions) in Sardis, which (the peculiar form ὀνόματα carries its own gender through the first part of the verse; in the latter part the thing signified prevails, and we have ἀξιοὶ) have not defiled their garments (the aor. is from the standing-point of the future day presently introduced, as so commonly when life is looked back on from the great time of retribution. The meaning of the figure (which occurs also in Jude 23) has been variously given. There can be little doubt that the simpler and more general explanation is the right one: viz., who have not sullied the purity of their Christian life by falling into sin. So the gloss. interlin., Lyræ, al. m. It seems unnecessary, and introducing confusion, to specify further; either the garments as importing their flesh (Areth., al.), their consciences (Alcas., Tirinus, Grot., Peiræus), the robe of Christ's righteousness put on by faith (Calov.), the robe of baptismal purity (Ansbert, Bede, Ribera, Corn.-a-lap., Hengst.), or again the keeping undefiled as consisting in abstinence from contact with the dead body of the rest of the church. This last view Ebrard attributes to Hengst., but it is not in his exposition here. He characteristically finds in ἐμόλυναν an allusion to Sardes = Sordes): and they shall walk with me in white (so, not filling up λευκοῖς, E. V. admirably. The supply, ἱματίοις, comes below, ver. 5: where see note. The white here is not to be identified with the undefiled garments which they now wear: it is a new and glorious hue of victory: see ch. vi. 11; vii. 9; xix. 8. The allusion which Schöttg., Vitringa, al., have imagined, to their priesthood,—because when a judgment was held by the Sanhedrim on the priests, those who were condemned were clothed in black, while the blameless wore a white robe—seems, like so many of these rabbinical illustrations, to be far-fetched, and to spoil the simplicity of the passage. An allusion to Zech. iii. 3 ff. is far more obvious. μετ' ἐμοῦ, in remarkable accord with our Lord's prayer in Joh. xvii. 24, πάτερ, ὁ δέδωκάς μοι, θέλω ἵνα ὅπου εἰμι ἐγὼ κἀκεῖνοι ὦσιν μετ' ἐμοῦ: see also Luke xxiii. 43) because they are worthy (the ἀξίότης here is found in the terms of the sentence itself. They have kept their garments undefiled: they of all others then are the persons who should walk in the glorious white robes of heavenly triumph. Exactly thus in ch. xvi. 6, αἶμα . . . ἐξέχεαν, καὶ αἶμα αὐτοῖς ἔδωκας πικρῶν ἀξιοί εἰσιν. To dream of any merit here implied, is not only to miss, but to run counter to the sense of the whole saying and situation. The οὐκ ἐμόλυναν is only explained by ch. vii. 14, ἐπλυναν τὰς στολὰς αὐτῶν καὶ ἐλεύκαναν ἐν τῷ αἵματι τοῦ ἀρνίου: and as Vitringa excellently says, "Dignitas hic notat proportionem et congruentiam, quæ erat inter statum gratiæ quo fuerant in terris, et gloriæ quam Dominus ipsis decreverat æstimandam ex ipsa lege gratiæ"). He that conquereth, he (the reading οὔτως, found in so many manuscript's, may have arisen originally in the very usual confusion of ο and ω, and then have been retained, from not being altogether without meaning; "thus," i. e. as those first mentioned. But this would perhaps be ὁμοίως, not οὔτως) shall be clad in white garments (the concluding promise takes the hue of what had gone before, and identifies those just spoken of with these victorious ones): and I will not wipe out his name out of the book of life (this again takes its colour from the preceding. Those who have a name that they live, and are dead, are necessarily wiped out from the book of life: only he whose name is a living name, can remain on those pages. Here again the Rabbinical expositors have gone wrong in imagining that the genealogical tables of the priests are alluded to. Far rather is the reference to the ordinary lists of citizens, or of living members of any body or society, from which the dead are struck out. So Wetst., citing Dio Chrys. Rhod. xxxi. p. 336 c, ὅταν δημοσία τιὰ δέρη τῶν πολιτῶν ἀποθανεῖν ἐπ' ἀδικημάτων, πρότερον τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ ἐξαλείφεται. And Aristoph. Pac. 1180, τοὺς μὲν ἐγγράφοντες ἡμῶν, τοὺς δ' ἔνω τε καὶ κάτω ἐξαλείφοντες δις ἢ τρίς. Thus they whose names have been once inscribed in this book, whether by their outward admission into Christ's church in baptism, or by their becoming living members of Him by faith, if they endure to the end as His soldiers and servants, and obtain the victory, shall not, as all His mere professed members shall, have their names erased from it. The figure itself, of the book of life, is found as early as Exod. xxxii. 32 f. See reff. for other places): and I will confess his name in the presence of my Father and in the presence of his angels (see Matt. x. 32; Luke xii. 8, both of which are here combined, cf. Luke ix. 26, || Mark. The promise implies that in the great day the Judge will expressly acknowledge the name thus written in the 7—13.] THE EPISTLE TO THE CHURCH AT PHILADELPHIA. It has been remarked, that this Epistle bears a tinge throughout of O. T. language and imagery, correspondent to the circumstances of the church as connected with the Jews dwelling there. For the history, &c., see Prolegomena. And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write: These things saith the true One (it is doubtful whether the distinction between ἀληθινός and ἀληθής, which lies on the surface in ordinary usage, can be held firmly, on thorough examination of the places where the word occurs in the N. T. It is not easy for instance to justify the meaning “genuine,” answering fully to its name,” in passages like John vii. 28: and more experience in the habit of later Greek to break down the distinctions of derivative nouns has shaken me in the assertion of this meaning wherever the word occurs. Here, it would certainly appear as if it were chosen to declare an attribute of our Lord opposed to the λεγόντ. και οὐκ εἰσιν ἀλλὰ ψεύδονται below. Not that the meaning genuine would be out of place in such a connexion: but that where ἀληθινός is used absolutely, of a person, the two meanings, genuine and truthful, running up into one head of truth, we must not in later diction press the one subordinate meaning as against the other. See for the distinction, which, however, is too exclusively pressed, Trench, N. T. Synonyms, § viii. The senses here to be avoided are,—ὁ ἀληθῶς ἄγιος, as Corn.-a-lap. and Grot., thus losing the word altogether;—the real Messiah, in reference to the rejection of Him by the Jews, as Hengst.

and Düsterd.; He that bears the truth, as the High-priest the Urim and Thummim, δῆλωσιν κ. ἀλήθειαν, LXX, Exod. xxviii. 26 (30); so Vitringa: “promissis suis stans,” as Ewald and Zillig, the Holy One (as opposed to the συναγωγὴ τοῦ σατανᾶ below; not with reference to Christ’s High-priesthood, as Vitr.: nor as Eichhorn and Heinr., “legatus divinus:” but expressive of moral attribute), He that hath the key of David (i. e. He that is the Heir and Lord of the abiding theocracy, as Düsterd. In Isa xxii. 22, it is said of Eliakim son of Hilkiah, δῶσω αὐτῷ τὴν κλεῖδα οἴκου Δαυεῖδ ἐπὶ τῷ ὄμφ αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀνοίξει καὶ οὐκ ἔσται ὁ ἀποκλείων καὶ κλείσει καὶ οὐκ ἔσται ὁ ἀνοίγων: which is manifestly the passage here incorporated into the Lord’s message: and the sense is, that whatever inferior degrees there may be of this power of opening and shutting the church (= the house of David, with reference to the false Jews below), the supreme power, the one true key, belongs to the Lord Christ alone. It is hardly justified, and serves but little purpose, to attempt to set up a distinction between τὴν κλεῖν τοῦ Δαυεῖδ here, and τὴν κλεῖδα οἴκου Δαυεῖδ in l. c. (so Hengst., Ebr., Düsterd.: see the idea well refuted in Vitringa.) The key is the same in both cases: but the One possesses it as his own by right, the other has it merely entrusted to him; laid on his shoulder. Some mistaken views have been: “potestatem aperiendi intellectum Scripturarum,” Lyra, so also Primas., Bede, Zega, al.: that Δαυεῖδ should be Τάφει, or Τάφει, and that our words mean the same as ch. i. 18, ἔχω τὰς κλεῖς τοῦ θανάτου καὶ τοῦ ἄδου (Wolf). This idea is quite distinct from that, and is closely connected with ver. 8, where the reference is entirely to the Church of God and success in God’s work. The same

Lord of all has the keys both of the prison and of the palace; but these words refer to the latter alone. Cf. on the whole sense, Matt. xvi. 19, who openeth and no one shall shut, and shutteth (the construction is altered to the direct from the participial: as in Amos v. 7, ὁ ποιῶν εἰς ὕψος κρίμα, καὶ δικαιοσύνην εἰς γῆν ἔθηκεν. This is said to be Hebraistic (De W.): but such irregularities are not confined to any particular language) and no one shall open (these words are to be taken not merely of the power of Christ to forgive sins, but generally, as indeed the next verse requires. Christ only has power to admit into and exclude from His kingdom; to enlarge the work and opportunities of His Church, and to contract them): I know thy works (these words stand by themselves; not, as De W. (so also Ewald and Bengel), as connected with ὅτι μικρὰν κ.τ.λ. below, the intervening sentence, ἰδοὺ . . . αὐτήν, being considered parenthetical. They are words of comfort and support to the Philadelphian Church): behold I have given before thee a door opened (i. e. have granted, in my possession and administration of the key of David, that a door should stand opened. For the construction, see ref. The door is variously understood: by Lyra, al. (see above on ver. 7) as "ostium apertum ad scripturas intelligendas:" by Areth., as τὴν εἰσοδον πρὸς ἀπόλαυσιν: by Bengel, as an entrance into the joy of thy Lord and so to an uninterrupted progress in all good; Eichhorn and Heinrichs, "aditus ad me tibi patet," in the merely superficial sense of "bene tibi cupio:" most expositors take it to mean, as in reff. 1 Cor.; 2 Cor.; Col. (otherwise in ref. Acts), an opportunity for the mission work of the church. And this appears to be the true sense here, by what follows in ver. 9, promising conversion of those who were now foes. This connexion, which lies in the context itself, is made yet plainer by the ἰδοὺ δέδωκα . . . ἰδοὺ διδῶ . . . ἰδοὺ ποιήσω. ἐνώπιόν σου, because the course is naturally forward), which no one is able to shut (it, redundant: see reff.): because (not, as Vit., etiamsi: ὅτι gives the reason of what preceded; the Lord will confer this great advantage on the Philadelphian church, because . . .) thou hast little power (not as E. V. "a little strength," thereby virtually reversing the sense of the words: μικρὰν ἔχεις δύν. importing "thy strength is but small," and the E. V. importing "thou hast some strength," the fact of its smallness vanishing under the indefinite term "a little."

The meaning of this μικρὰν must not be assigned as Lyra, "quia non dedi tibi gratiam miraculorum, sicut multis aliis episcopis illius temporis, recompensavi tibi intellectu sacrarum scripturarum excellenti" (see above), but it must be understood, as most Commentators, to have consisted in the fewness of the congregation of Christians there: possibly also, as Hengst., in their poverty as contrasted with the wealth of their Jewish adversaries), and (using that little well) didst keep my word and didst not deny my name (the aorr. perhaps refer to some time of especial trial when both these temptations, to break Christ's word and deny His name, were put before the church). Behold, I give (not, to thee, as Hengst., nor can we render it by "patiar" as Wolf: the sense is broken off in the following clause, and the διδῶ resumed by ἰδοὺ ποιήσω αὐτοὺς ἵνα: see reff. in both places) of the synagogue of Satan (see on ch. ii. 9, where the same expression occurs of outward Jews who were not real Jews), who profess themselves to be Jews and they are not, but do lie,—behold I will make them (this αὐτοὺς is put as the object of the preceding verb rather than as the subject of the following, as in οἰδαμεν τοῦτον, πόθεν ἐστίν, not by a mere attraction of grammar, as usually represented (even in Winer, edn. 6, § 66. 5, a), but in the strictest logical propriety, αὐτοὺς being the object on which the action indicated by the preceding verb is exercised) that they shall come (for ἵνα aft. ποι., and for the fut. indic. after ἵνα, see refl.), and shall worship before thy feet (so in Isa. lx. 14, "the sons also of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee: and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet: and they shall call thee the city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel." See also Isa. xlix. 23; Zech. viii. 20—23. These passages are decisive against the sense given by Corn.-a-lap., "significatur summa fidelium devotio, reverentia et submissio erga ecclesiam ejusque prælatos. Hæc enim adoratio præcedit ex apprehensione excellentiæ prælatorum plusquam humanæ et minus quam divinæ:" a sense unknown to Estius and the better R.-Cath. expositors. Areth. in the catena says well: τούτους οὖν προσδραμεῖσθαι οὐ κατὰ τὸ τυχόν, ἀλλὰ μετὰ πολλῆς τῆς θερμότητος καὶ συντριβῆς φησί· τοῦτο γὰρ αἰνίττεται τὸ πρὸς τοὺς πόδας προσκυνῆσαι, καὶ ἐν ἐσχάτοις ἐλέσθαι τετάχθαι τῆς ἐκκλησίας, μόνον τοῦ μέρους εἶναι τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἀξιωθῆναι, ὡς καὶ Δαβὶδ ἀσπαστῶς φησιν ὁ προφήτης, "ἐξελεξάμην παραρριπτεῖσθαι ἐκ τῶ ὄκφου τοῦ θεοῦ μου, μᾶλλον ἢ οἰκεῖν με ἐν σκηνάμασι τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν"), and that they may know that I loved thee (the English idiom requires, "have loved thee:" but the aor. has its propriety, referring as it does to the time preceding that in which they shall do this. Düsterd. takes it as used of that great proof which Christ gave of His love by dying for His church, appealing to the same aor. in Eph. v. 25; Gal. ii. 20; 1 John iv. 10, 11. But thus we lose the especial reference to the particular church which seems to be involved in the recognition. It is the love bestowed on the Philadelphian church, in signaling its success in the work of Christ, that these converted enemies shall recognize. Lyra's explanation is curious and characteristic,—"quia ego dilexi te, promovendo non solum ad fidem catholicam, sed etiam ad episcopalem dignitatem"). Because thou didst keep the word of my endurance (the λόγος preached to thee, enjoining that ὑπομονή which belongs to Me and mine, see ch. i. 9. μου belongs to ὑπομονῆς alone, not to the whole τὸν λ. τῆς ὑπ. as Düsterd., Winer (edn. 6, § 34. 3, b), al. Such a construction would, I conceive, be indefensible: certainly all the places which are quoted as for it, are against it: viz. ch. xiii. 3; Col. i. 13; Heb. i. 3. Had it been so here, I should have expected τὸν λόγον μου τῆς ὑπομονῆς), I also (I on my side: the καὶ expressing reciprocity. And this reciprocity depends, in its form, on the close juxtaposition of the ὑπομονῆς μου and καὶ γὰρ, which is materially interfered with by referring μου to the whole sentence and resolving τῆς ὑπομονῆς into a mere epithet: see above) will keep thee (σε emphatic and prominent) from (ἐκ, from out of the midst of: but whether by immunity from, or by being brought safe through, the preposition does not clearly define. Nor can the distinction which Düsterd., al., attempt to set up between τηρεῖν ἐκ and τ. ἀπό, be safely maintained. In comparing John xvii. 15, οὐκ ἔρωτῶ ἵνα ἄρῃς αὐτοὺς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, ἀλλ' ἵνα τηρήσῃς αὐτοὺς ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ, with James i. 27, ἄσπιλον ἑαυτὸν τηρεῖν ἀπὸ τοῦ κόσμου, it is not easy to see that the former implies passing scatheless through the evil, while the latter imports perfect immunity from it. This last we may grant: but is it not equally true in the other case? Rev. vii. 14, ἐρχ. ἐκ τῆς θλίψ., which they cite on their side, is quite different: the local meaning of ἐκ being made decisive by the local verb ἐρχεσθαι) the hour of temptation (the appointed season of sore trial, τοῦ πειρασμοῦ, of the well-known and signal temptation. But the article cannot be expressed in English, because it would unavoidably become the antecedent to "which" following) which is about to come upon the whole world (the time imported is that prophesied of in Matt. xxiv. 21 ff., viz. the great time of trouble which shall be before the Lord's second coming. As such, it is immediately connected with ἔρχομαι ταχύ following), to try them that dwell upon the earth (see ch. viii. 13, &c., as in reff., where the expression applies to those who are not of the church of Christ. In this great trial, the servants of Christ shall be kept safe, ch. vii. 3. The trial of the πειρασμοῦ will operate in two ways: on the faithful, by bringing out their fidelity; on the unfaithful and unbelieving, by hardening them in their impenitence, see ch. ix. 20, 21, xvi. 11, 21.

The expositors have in many cases gone away from this broad and obvious meaning here, and have sought to identify the ὥρα πειρασμοῦ with various periods of trial and persecution of the Church: a line of interpretation carrying its own refutation with it in the very terms used in the text. Thus Grot. understands it of the persecution under Nero; Lyra, of the future increase of that under Domitian, which was raging as the Apostle wrote: Alcas., Paraus, al., of those under Trajan: Primasins and Bede, of the troubles which should arise on account of Antichrist, which is nearer the mark. Andr. and Arethas give the alternative: ἢ τὸν ἐπὶ Δομετιανοῦ διωγμὸν λέγει, δεύτερον ὄντα μετὰ Νέρωνα ὡς Εὐσέβιος ἱστορεῖ ὁ Παμφίλου, ὅτε καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ εὐαγγελιστῆς εἰς τὴν Πάτμον ὑπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ Δομετιανοῦ κατεκρίθη, ἢ τὴν ἐπὶ συντελείᾳ τοῦ αἰῶνος ὑπὸ τοῦ Ἀντιχρίστου κατὰ χριστιανῶν ἐσομένην παγκόσμιον, ἀναιροῦντος τοὺς χριστιανούς).

11.] I com quickly (these words, which in different senses and with varying references form the burden of this whole book, are here manifestly to be taken as an encouragement and comfort to the Philadelphian church, arising from the nearness of the Lord's coming to reward her; cf. τὸν στέφανόν σου below): hold fast that which thou hast (ὁ ἔχεις, in the language of these Epistles, imports any advantage, or progress in grace, already possessed; cf. ch. ii. 6, τοῦτο ἔχεις, ὅτι . . . This is regarded as a treasure, to be firmly grasped, as against those who are ever ready to snatch it away. In this case the ὁ ἔχεις was a rich treasure indeed: cf. vv. 8, 10), that no one take (snatch away: but here the figure stops: it is not for himself that the robber would snatch it, but merely to deprive the possessor. So λαβεῖν τὴν εἰρήνην ἐκ τῆς γῆς, ch. vi. 4. The idea of the robber taking it for himself must, as De W. remarks, have been expressed by μηδεὶς ἄλλος) thy crown (ref.).

12.] The reward of the conqueror. He that conquereth (for the pendent nom., see ref.), I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God (i. e. he shall have a fixed and important place in the glorified church hereafter. That this, and nothing referring to any honour or dignity in the church militant (so Lyra, Aretius, Grot., Wetst., Schöttg., al.), or in that as leading on to the church triumphant (so Vitruv., Corn.-a-lap., Stern, al.) is intended, is manifest from the whole diction of this passage, as well as from comparing the corresponding promises, which all refer to the blessings of the future state of glory. It is no objection to this view, that in the heavenly Jerusalem there is no temple, ch. xxi. 22: but rather a corroboration of it. That glorious city is all temple, and Christ's victorious ones are its living stones and pillars. Thus as Düsterd. well remarks, the imagery of the church militant, 1 Cor. iii. 16 ff.; Eph. ii. 19 ff.; 1 Pet. ii. 5 ff., is transferred to the church triumphant, but with this difference, that the saints are no longer the stones merely, but now the pillars themselves, standing in their immovable firmness. μου, see note on ch. ii. 7), and out of it he shall never more go out (the subject is not the στύλος, but ὁ νικῶν; and the sense, that he who is thus fixed in his eternal place as a pillar in the heavenly temple, will never more, from any cause, depart from it. Those Commentators who have understood the promise of the church militant, have been obliged to take ἐξέλθῃ as a passive, “non ejicietur,” justifying this by such expressions as μήτι ὁ λύχνος ἔρχεται Mark iv. 21. Lyra takes it in both senses—“nec per apostasin, nec per excommunicationem.” And thus, except that the latter word will have no place, we may well understand the general word ἐξέλθῃ: none shall thrust him out, nor shall he be any more in danger of falling, and thus thrusting himself out. It is well worth noticing, as Wetst. has done, the recorded fact, that Philadelphia was notorious for calamities by earthquake. The language in which Strabo describes this is remarkable in connexion with this promise of the pillar which should not be moved; ἢ τε Φιλαδέλφεια . . . οὐδὲ τοὺς τοίχους ἔχει πιστούς, ἀλλὰ καθ’ ἡμέραν τρόπον τινα σαλεύονται καὶ δίστανται· διατελοῦσι δὲ προσέχοντες τῆς γῆς τοῖς πάθεσι, καὶ ἀρχιτεκτονοῦντες πρὸς αὐτήν. xii. p. 866 B: and still more so in xiii. p. 936 B, —πόλις Φιλαδέλφεια σεισμῶν πλήρης. οὐ γὰρ διαλείπουν οἱ τοῖχοι διστάμενοι, καὶ ἄλλοτ’ ἄλλο μέρος τῆς πόλεως κακοπαθοῦν οἰκοῦσιν οὐν ὀλίγοι τὴν πόλιν διὰ τοῦτο . . . ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ὀλίγων θαυμάζειν ἔστιν ὅτι οὕτω φιλοχωροῦσιν ἐπισφαλεῖς τὰς οἰκήσεις ἔχοντες· ἔτι δ’ ἂν τις μάλλον θαυμάσειε τῶν κτισάντων αὐτήν. See also Tacit. Ann. ii. 47, where among the twelve cities of proconsular Asia which were overthrown by an earthquake, Philadelphia suffered, and was in consequence excused its taxes, and in common with the others entrusted to a senatorian commissioner to repair): and I will write upon him (the conqueror; not as Grot., the pillar) the name of my God (Wetst. quotes from the Rabbinical book Bava Bathra 75. 2, “R. Samuel filius Nachmanni ait, R. Jochananem dixisse, tres appellari nomine Dei S. B.,—justos (Is. xliii. 7), Messiam (Jer. xxiii. 6), Hierosolyma (Ezek. xlvi. 35).” Some think of the mitre frontlet of the high-priests, on which was inscribed “Holiness to the Lord;” Exod. xxviii. 36: so Schöttg., Ewald, al. But this does not seem applicable here, where, from this and the following particulars, it is rather a blessed belonging to God and the holy city and Christ, that is imported, than the priestly office of the glorified Christian) and the name of the city of my God, the new Jerusalem, which descendeth (the appositive nom., see reff.) out of heaven from my God (on the whole, see ch. xxi. 2, 3, and notes. It is possible, that the name Jehovah Shammah, Ezek. xlvi. 35, may be meant; but hardly probable, seeing that the Holy Name itself has before been mentioned as inscribed on him. The inscription of the name of the city would betoken citizenship), and mine own new name (not the name mentioned ch. xix. 16, which is known and patent, but that indicated ch. xix. 12, ὃ οὐδεὶς οἶδεν εἰ μὴ αὐτός: for this is clearly pointed at by the word καινόν. By the inscription of this new name of the glorified Saviour is declared, that he belongs to Him in His new and glorious state of eternal rest and triumph).

church in Laodicea write: These things saith the Amen (see ref. Isa. Christ is the Amen, inasmuch as His words shall never pass away, but shall find certain ratification. This, and not the particular case which is treated in ref. 2 Cor., seems to be the reference here, where not the ratification of promises merely, but general fidelity and certainty are concerned: as Areth., in Catena, ισοδυναμεῖ τοῦτο, τάδε λέγει ὁ ἀληθινός . . . ἀμὴν γὰρ ἐστὶ τὸ ναί· ναὶ οὖν ἐστὶν ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς περὶ αὐτοῦ λεγομένοις, ἥτοι ἀλήθεια καὶ οὐδὲν ψεῦδος. That expression is illustrative of this, but this takes the wider range. Züllig has imagined that the title here owes its occurrence to this being the last among the Seven Epistles: but this probably is mere fancy; the faithful and true (on ἀληθινός, see above, ver. 7) witness (there does not seem in this title to be any allusion to the prophecies which are about to follow in ch. iv. ff. as some (Grot., De Wette) have imagined. Far rather does it substantiate the witness borne in the Epistle itself, as we have seen in the case of the other introductions. See a lengthened notice of the title in Trench, p. 181 f.), the beginning of the creation of God (= πρωτόκοκος πάσης κτίσεως, ref. Col., where see note, as also Bleek on the Hebrews, vol. ii. 1, p. 43 note. In Him the whole creation of God is begun and conditioned: He is its source and primary fountain-head. The mere word ἀρχή would admit the meaning that Christ is the first created being: see Gen. xlix. 3; Deut. xxi. 17; and Prov. viii. 22. And so the Arians here take it, and some who have followed them: e.g. Castalio, "chef d'œuvre:" "omnium Dei operum excellentissimum atque primum:" and so Ewald and Züllig. But every consideration of the requirements of the context, and of the Person of Christ as set forth to us in this book, is against any such view. Others, as Calov., Bengel, Whitby, al., make ἀρχή = ἔρχω, which is impossible: as it is also to interpret κτίσεως of the new spiritual creation, the church, as Ribera, Corn.-a-lap., Grot., Wetst., al. There can be little doubt that ἀρχή is to be taken in that pregnant sense in which we have it, e.g., in Wisd.

xii. 16, ἡ γὰρ ἰσχὺς σου δικαιοσύνης ἀρχή,—ib. xiv. 27, ἡ γὰρ τῶν . . . εἰδώλων θρησκεία παντὸς ἀρχὴ κακοῦ καὶ αἰτία καὶ πέρας ἐστίν: and in the Gospel of Nicodemus, p. ii. cap. vii. Tischdf. Ev. Apoc. p. 307, where Satan is said to be ἀρχὴ τοῦ θανάτου καὶ ρίζα τῆς ἁμαρτίας, viz. the incipient cause. So Andr., Areth. in Catena (ἡ προκαταρκτικὴ αἰτία τῆς κτίσεως), Lyra, Vitruv., Wolf, Stern, Hengst., De Wette, Ebrard, Düsterd., al. The latter asks the questions, "How could Christ write if it were only this present Epistle, if he were himself a creature? How could every creature in heaven and earth adore him, if he were one of themselves (cf. ch. xix. 10)? We need only think of the appellation of our Lord as the A and Ω (ch. xxii. 13: cf. i. 8) in its necessary fullness of import, and we shall see that in the A lies the necessity of his being the ἀρχή of the Creation, as in the Ω that of his coming to bring the visible creation to an end": I know thy works, that (see above, ver. 1, where the construction is the same: I have thy whole course of life before me, and its testimony is, that . . .) thou art neither cold nor hot (the peculiar use of the similitude of physical cold and heat here, makes it necessary to interpret the former of the two somewhat differently to its common acceptance: so that while ζεστός, from ζέω (cf. τῷ πνεύματι ζέοντες, Rom. xii. 11), keeps its meaning of fervent, warm, and earnest in the life of faith and love, ψυχρός cannot here mean "dead and cold," as we say of the listless and careless professor of religion: for this is just what these Laodiceans were, and what is expressed by χλιαρός below. So that we must, so to speak, go farther into coldness for ψυχρός, and take it as meaning, not only entirely without the spark of spiritual life, but also and chiefly, by consequence, openly belonging to the world without, and having no part nor lot in Christ's church, and actively opposed to it. This, as well as the opposite state of spiritual fervour, would be an intelligible and plainly-marked condition: at all events, free from that danger of mixed motive and disregarded principle which belongs to the lukewarm state inasmuch as a man in earnest, be he right or wrong, is ever a better man than one professing what he does not feel. This necessity of interpretation here has been much and properly pressed by some of the later Commentators (De Wette, and more clearly still, Düsterd.), but was by the older ones very generally missed, and the coldness interpreted of the mere negative absence of spiritual life. So Andr., Areth. in Catena, ψυχρός, ὁ ἐστερημένος τῆς τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος ἐνεργείας καὶ ἐπιφοιτήσεως: Grot., “qui nullam habet evangelii notitiam ac proinde nec ullos motus christianos:” so Bengel, Ebrard, and many others. There have been some singular interpretations, e. g. that of Lyra, “frigidus, devitans transgressiones pœnæ timore:” of Ansbert, “quia nimirum ille eos glaciali quodammodo more constringit, qui dixit, ‘Sedebo in monte testamenti, in lateribus aquilonis.’ Aquilo itaque valde frigidissimus ventus,” &c.: of Hengstenberg, who regards both hot and cold as spoken of Christ’s servants in relation to Christ, and cold as equivalent to poor in spirit, conscious of one’s own coldness and desire for warmth. Any thing more opposed to the context cannot be imagined: would that (ref., for both indic. and opt. usages) thou wert cold or hot: so (see ref. It expresses the actual relation of facts to the wish just expressed, as not fulfilling it: = “quod cum non ita fiat”) because thou art lukewarm (τοῦ μηδέπω θερμαίνοντος, ὃ χλιαρὸν καλεῖται, Galen. It is one of the many derivatives from χλῖω, to melt), and neither hot nor cold, I shall soon spue thee out of my mouth (τῇ μεταφορᾷ τοῦ χλιαροῦ δεόντως ἐχρήσατο, ὃ καὶ ἱατρῶν παῖδες πλάδες ἐργαζόμενον εἰς ἔμετον ἐρεθίζειν παραλαμβάνουσιν. Areth. in Catena. The μέλλω is a mild expression, carrying with it a possibility of the determination being changed, dependently on a change in the state of the church). 17, 18.] In these verses, the χλιαρότης is further expanded, as inducing miserable unconsciousness of defect and need, and empty self-sufficiency. And the charge comes in the form of solemn and affectionate counsel. Because (this ὅτι forms the reason of συμβουλευέω below: = seeing that . . . Cf. a similar construction in ch. xviii. 7, 8) thou sayest [that] I am rich, and am become wealthy, and have need in nothing (the three expressions form a climax: the first giving the fact of being rich, the second the process of having become so (in which there is not merely outward fact, but some self-commendation: cf. ref. Hosea), the third the result, self-sufficiency. From the whole context it is evident that not outward worldly wealth, but imagined spiritual riches, are in question. The former is held to be meant by Andr., Areth., Aretius, Corn.-a-lap., Bengel, Ewald, Züllig, al., the latter by Bede, Lyra, Ribera, Alcas., Grot., Calov., Vitranga, Eich., De W., Hengst., Ebrard, Düsterd., Trench. Stern thinks the wealth is partly worldly (Cicero, Epist. ad div. ii. 17, iii. 5; Strabo xii. 16: see on the wealth of Laodicea the Prolegg.), and partly spiritual. But thus the correspondence in our sentence would be confused. Stern is doubtless so far right, that the imagined spiritual self-sufficiency was the natural growth of an outwardly prosperous condition: but the great self-deceit of which the Lord here complains was not concerning worldly wealth, which was a patent fact, but concerning spiritual, which was a baseless fiction, and knowest not that thou (σύ, emphatic; “thou, of all others;” corresponding to the use of the article below) art the wretched and [the] pitiable one (ὁ, as distinguished above others (not as De W., al., “the well-known”), as the person to whom above all others the epithets belong. And these epithets are especially opposed to οὐδὲν χρεῖαν ἔχω), and poor and blind and naked (are these adjectives all subordinate to ὁ preceding, or are they new predicates dependent on εἶ? Better the latter, if only for the reason that the counsel which follows takes up these three points in order, thereby bringing them out as distinct from and not subordinate to the two preceding), I advise thee (there is a deep irony in this word. One who has need of nothing, yet needs counsel on the vital points of self-preservation) to buy (at the cost only of thy good self-opinion. That a πτωχὸς should be advised to buy gold and raiment, and ointment, might of itself shew what kind of buying is meant, even if Isa. lv. 1, ἀγοράσατε . . . ἀνεν ἀργυρίου κ. τιμῆς, had not clearly defined it. Yet notwithstanding such clear warning not to go wrong, the Roman-Catholic expositors have here again handled the word of God deceitfully, and explained, as Lyra, “Emerere, op ribus bonis.” Corn.-a-lap., “verbum ergo emendi significat, quod multa debet homo facere, et multa conferre, ut idoneus sit a Deo accipere ista dona.” Bede and Ribera, somewhat better, “derelectis omnibus.” Bede: “etiam cum voluptatum dispendio.” Rib. (which however is travelling out of the context, making the wealth to be earthly riches): Estius, better still, but curiously characteristic, “Emerere significat aliquod studium præcedens, quo ambiat charitatem (his interpretation of χρυσίον πεπυρ.) : quod tamen etiam ex Deo est. Unde statui potest meritum congruum, respectu justificationis.” Far better again Ausbert, though missing the point of ἀγοράσαι: “Numquid is qui miser et miserabilis et pauper et cæcus et nudus redarguitur, aliquid boni habet, quod pro tanto hono largitori suo tribuat, nisi forte prius ab ipso accipiat quod pro accipiendis aliis illi tribuat? Sic certe invenit quod det, qui nisi desuper acceperit, non habet quod det.” Augustine seems to be on the right track for the meaning of ἀγοράσαι when he says, “contende ut pro nomine Christi aliquid patiaris.” The term continues the irony. “All this lofty self-sufficiency must be expended in the labour of getting from Me these absolute necessaries.” So most of the later expositors. So even the R.-Cath. Stern, but disguising the truth under an appearance of a ‘quid pro quo:’ “Welches ist der Kaufpreis? Hat nicht der Herr selbst gesagt, daß sie arm seien und elend, nackt und jämmerlich? Ihr Herz sollen sie Christo hingeben, ihr Fühlen, Denken, Wollen, und thatkräftiges Handeln; sich selbst ganz und gar dem Herrn zur Freigeigenschaft opfern, Matt. xiii. 45, 46”) from me (who am the source of all true spiritual wealth, Eph. iii. 8) gold (fresh) burnt from the fire (the ἐκ gives the sense of being just fresh from the burning or smelting, and thus not only tried by the process, but bright and new from the furnace. This is better than, with many Commentators, to make the ἐκ almost = ὑπό, signifying the source from which the πύρωσις comes, as ch. viii. 11. In the interpretation, this gold represents all spiritual πλοῦτος, in its sterling reality, as contrasted with that merely imaginary sort on which the Laodiceans prided themselves. It is narrowing it too much to interpret it as caritas (cf. Estius above), or fides, as Aret., Vitringa, Hengstb., al., or indeed any one spiritual grace, as distinguished from the sum total of them all), that thou mayest be (aor., literally, mayest have become, viz., by the purchase) rich: and white garments (Düsterd. rightly remarks that the white garments are distinct from the gold only in constituting a different image in the form of expression, not really in the thing signified. On the meaning, see ver. 4, ch. vii. 14, xix. 8. The lack of righteousness, which can be only bought from Christ, and that at the price of all fancied righteousness of our own, is just as much a πτωχεία as the other), that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness be not made manifest (the choice of the word φανερωθῇ seems as if some particular time were in view when such manifestation would take place. If we are to assign one, it will naturally be that of the Lord's coming, when τοὺς πάντας ἡμᾶς φανερωθῆναι δεῖ ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ βήματος τοῦ χριστοῦ, 2 Cor. v. 10: when the Lord of the Church will come to see his guests, and all not clad in the wedding robe will be cast out, Matt. xxii. 11 ff.), and collyrium (the use of which is apparent from what follows. The κολλύριον was so called from its shape, being a stick or roll of ointment for the eyes, in the shape of a bread-cake, κόλλυρα or -ρις, 2 Kings vi. 19, LXX) to anoint (from reff. Tobit, ἐγχεῖσαι appears to have been the common technical word for anointing the eyes) thine eyes, that thou mayest see (in the spiritual interpretation, this collyrium will import the anointing of the Holy Spirit, which, like the gold of His unsearchable riches, and the white garment of His righteousness, is to be obtained from him, John xvi. 7 (πέμψω αὐτὸν . . .), 14 (ἐκ τοῦ ἐμοῦ λήμψεται . . .); Acts ii. 33 (ἐδέχεν τοῦτο), and also at the price of the surrender of our own fancied wisdom. The analogy of 1 John ii. 20, 27 is not to be overlooked: see notes at those places). 19.] Importing that these rich proofs of Christ's love are only to be sought by such as the Laodiceans in the way of rebuke and chastisement: and reciprocally, as tending not to despair, but to encouragement, that rebuke and chastisement are no signs of rejection from Christ, but of His abiding and pleading love, even to the lukewarm and careless. I (emphatically prefixed: I, for my part: it is one of My ways, which are unlike men's ways)—as many as (ἐάν = ἄν, the common particle after the relative: see reff.) I love (not as Grot., "non absolute sed compare, i. e. quos non plane ob diuturna peccata abjicere et objurare constitui:" but in its fullest and most blessed sense. Nor is the assertion addressed, as Vitruvius, only "ad meliorem ecclesiae partem," but to all, as a gracious call to repentance; as is evident from the words next following), I rebuke and chasten (ἐλέγχειν, the convincing of sin, producing conviction, is a portion of παιδεύειν, the Lord's chastening: the latter may extend very much wider than the former, even to judgments and personal infliction, which, however they may subserve the purpose of ἐλέγχειν, are not, properly speaking, part of it. "Redargutio sane ad verba, castigatio vero pertinet ad flagella," Ansbert); be zealous then (ζήλευε, pres., of a habit of Christian life), and repent (begin that life of zeal by an act, decisive and effective (aor.), of change of purpose. There is not in the words any ὑπερονρότερον, as De Wette, but the logical connexion is made plain by the tenses. Düsterd. (following Grot., Beng., Hengstb., Ebrard) is clearly wrong in saying that "the Lord requires of the church a burning zeal, kindled by the love shewn by Him (but where is this in the context?), and as the practical putting forth of this zeal, true change of purpose." This goes directly against both the grammatical propriety and the facts of the case, in which change of purpose must precede zeal, which is the effectual working in a man's life of that change of purpose). 20.] Behold, I stand at the door (the construction with the prep. of motion after ἔστηκα, is perhaps owing to the idea of motion conveyed in the verb,—“I have placed myself.” See reff., especially ref. Luke) and knock (the reference to Cant. v. 2 is too plain to be for a moment doubted: and if so, the interpretation must be grounded in that conjugal relation between Christ and the church,—Christ and the soul,—of which that mysterious book is expressive. This being granted, we may well say, that the vivid depiction of Christ standing at the door is introduced, to bring home to the lukewarm and careless church the truth of His constant presence, which she was so deeply forgetting. His knocking was taking place partly by the utterance of these very rebukes (ἐλέγχω), partly by every interference in judgment and in mercy. Whenever His hand is heard, He is knocking at the door. But it is not His hand only that may be heard: see below): if any man hear my voice (here we have more than the mere sound of his knock: He speaks. See Acts xiii. 13 f. κρούσαντος δὲ τοῦ Πέτρου τὴν θύραν . . . ἐπιγνοῦσα τὴν φωνὴν τοῦ Πέτρου. In that case we must conceive Rhoda to have asked "who is there?" and Peter to have answered. It may not be uninteresting to fill up this connexion in a similar manner. "It is I," is an answer the soul may often hear, if it will enquire the reason of an unexpected knock at the door of its slumbers; or we may compare Cant. v. 2, φωνὴ ἀδελφίδου μου κρούει ἐπὶ τὴν θύραν, Ἄνοιξόν μοι, and open the door (ἀκούσῃ, ἀνοίξῃ, aorists, because prior in time to the futures which follow: "shall have heard," "shall have opened:" but it would be pedantry thus to render them in our language. On the sense, cf. Cant. v. 6.

Our verse is a striking and decisive testimony to the practical freedom of our will to receive or reject the heavenly Guest: without the recognition of which, the love and tenderness of the saying become a hideous mockery. We then open the door to Christ, when we admit Him, His voice, His commands, His example, to a share in our inner counsels and sources of action. To say that this can be done without His grace, is ignorance: to say it is done only by that grace irresistibly exerted, is far worse—it is, to deprive His gracious pleadings of all meaning, [and] (this καὶ is superfluous in the sense, merely expressing the sequence: and may on that account have been omitted) I will enter in to him, and I will sup with him, and he with me (the imagery is taken from the usages of intimate hospitality. But whereas in these it would be merely the guest who would sup with the host who lets him in, here the guest becomes himself the host, because He is the bread of life, and the Giver of the great feast of fat things and of the great marriage supper (Matt. viii. 11, xxv. 1 ff.; ch. xix. 7, 9). St. John is especially fond of reporting these sayings of reciprocity which our Lord uttered: cf. John vi. 56 (x. 38), xiv. 20, xv. 4, 5, xvii. 21, 26. This blessed admission of Christ into our hearts will lead to His becoming our guest, ever present with us, and sharing in all our blessings—and, which is even more, to our being ever in close union with Him, partaking ever of His fulness, until we sit down at His table in his Kingdom).

21.] He that conquereth (see above, ch. ii. 26, and ver. 12, for the construction), I will give to him to sit (in the blessed life of glory hereafter: such promises cannot be regarded, as this by some, as partially fulfilled in this life: for thus the following analogy, ὡς κἀγὼ κ.τ.λ., would fail. The final and complete act is also pointed out by the aor. καθίσει) with me (cf. John xvii. 24, πᾶτερ, ὃ δέδωκας ἐμοὶ θέλω ἵνα ὅπου εἶμι ἐγὼ κάκεινοι ὧσιν μετ' ἐμοῦ) on my throne (have a share in My kingly power, as ch. ii. 27, xx. 6), as I also conquered and sat down with my Father on His throne (the aor. refer to the historical facts of the Resurrection and Ascension. By the latter, Christ sat down at the right hand of God, or of the throne of God, as Heb. xii. 2. No distinction must be made between the throne of the Father, on which Christ sits, and that of Christ, on which the victorious believer is to sit with Him: they are one and the same, cf. ἐκ τοῦ θρόνου τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου, ch. xxii. 1; and the glory of the redeemed will be a participation in that of the Father and the Son, John xvii. 22). Doubtless the occurrence of this, the highest and most glorious of all the promises, in this place, is to be explained not entirely from any especial aptness to the circumstances of the Laodicæan church, though such has been attempted to be assigned (e.g. by Ebrard—because the victory over lukewarmness would be so much more difficult than that in any other case), but also from the fact of its occurring at the end of all the Epistles, and as it were gathering them all into one. It must not be forgotten too, that the ἐκάθισα μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς μου ἐν τῷ θρόνῳ αὐτοῦ forms a link to the next part of the book where we so soon, ch. v. 6, read καὶ εἶδον ἐν τῷ μέσῳ τοῦ θρόνου . . . ἄρνιον ἐστῆκός ὡς ἐσφαγμένον. ^{22.}] See on ch. ii. 7.

From this point begins the Revelation proper, extending to the end of the book. And herein we have a first great portion, embracing chapp. iv.—xi., the opening of the seals and the sounding of the trumpets. But preparatory to both these series of revelations, we have described to us in chapp. iv. v., the heavenly scenery which furnishes the local ground for these visions. Of these, chap. iv. is properly the scene itself; chap. v. being a further unfolding of its details with a view to the vision of the seals which is to follow. So that we have,—

CH. IV. 1—11.] THE VISION OF GOD'S PRESENCE IN HEAVEN. "Decrees respecting the fortunes of the future rest with God, and from Him comes the revelation of them through Jesus Christ. Hence the Revelation begins with the imparting to the Apostle, through Christ, of the vision of God's presence." De Wette.

1.] After these things (μετὰ ταῦτα (or τοῦτο) is a formula frequently occurring in this book, and no where indicating a break in the ecstatic state of the Seer, but only the succession of separate visions. Those are mistaken, e.g. Bengel, Hengstb., who imagine an interval, here and in the other places, during which the Seer wrote down that which had been previously revealed to him. The whole is conceived as imparted in one continuous revelation consisting of many parts. See below on ver. 2) I saw (not with the bodily eye, but with the eye of ecstatic vision, as throughout the book. He is throughout ἐν πνεύματι. It is not I looked, as in E. V.: not the directing of the Seer's attention which discovers the door to him, but the simple reception of the vision which is recorded), and behold, a door set open (not, was opened (ἠνοιχθη) as E. V., which gives the idea that the Seer witnessed the act of opening. For the same reason the word "opened" is objectionable, as it may be mistaken for the aor. neuter) in heaven (notice the difference between this vision and that in Ezek. i. 1; Matt. iii. 16; Acts vii. 56, x. 11. In those, the heaven itself parts asunder, and discloses the vision to those below on earth: here the heaven, the house or palace of God (Ps. xi. 4, xviii. 6, xxix. 9), remains firmly shut to those on earth, but a door is opened, and the Seer is rapt in the Spirit through it. Henceforth usually he looks from the heaven down on the earth, seeing however both alike, and being present in either, as the localities of his various visions require), and the former voice (much confusion has been introduced here by rendering, as E. V., "the first voice which," &c., giving the idea that ἡ πρώτη means, first after the door was seen set open; whereas ἡ φωνὴ ἡ πρώτη is the voice which I heard at first, viz. in ch. i. 10) which I heard (aor. at the beginning) as of a trumpet speaking with me (viz. ch. i. 10. ὡς σάλπ. κ.τ.λ., is not predicative, "was as . . ." as E. V. and Treg. The construction simply is—"behold, a door . . . and the voice . . .," both θύρα and φωνὴ dependent on ἰδοῦ. The voice is not that of Christ (as Stier, Reden Jesu viii. 93, 207 ff.: Reden der Engel, p. 242,—and al.), but of some undefied heavenly being or angel. As Düsterd. observes, all we can say of it is that it is the same voice as that in ch. i. 10, which there, ver. 17, is followed by that of our Lord, not ὡς σάλπιγγος, but ὡς ὑδάτων πολλῶν, as stated

See more examples in Winer), Come up hither (viz. through the opened door), and I will shew thee (it is surprising how Stier can allege the δέξω as a proof that the Lord Himself only can be speaking: cf. ch. xxi. 9, 10, xxii. 8, 9, which latter place is decisive against him) the things which must (of prophetic necessity: see reff.) take place after these things (ταῦτα, the things now present: as in ch. i 19, but the ταῦτα not being the same in the two cases. So that μετὰ ταῦτα has very much the general meaning given by the "hereafter" of the E. V.). 2.] Immediately I was (became) in the Spirit (i. e. I experienced a new accession of the Spirit's powerful influence, which transported me thither: qu. d. "I was in a trance or ecstasy:" see on ch. i. 10. It is hardly credible that any scholar should have proposed to understand ἐκεῖ after ἐγενόμην, "immediately I was there in the Spirit:" but this was done by Züllig, and has found an advocate in England in Dr. Maitland: cf. Todd on the Apoc., Note B, p. 297): and behold, a throne stood (the E. V. "was set," gives too much the idea that the placing of the throne formed part of the vision: "lay" would be our best word, but we do not use it of any thing so lofty as a throne. ἔκειτο is wrongly taken by Bengel as importing breadth; and by Hengstb. as representing the resting on the cherubim. But it is St. John's word for mere local position: see reff.) in heaven, and upon the throne (the accus. is perhaps not to be pressed; it may be loosely used as equivalent to the gen. or dat. The variations of the case in this expression throughout the book are remarkable, and hardly to be accounted for. Thus we have the gen. in ver. 10, ch. v. 1, 7 (13?), vii. 15, ix. 17, xiv. 15, 16, xvii. 1, 9, xix. 18, 19, 21: the dat. in ver. 9, ch. (v. 13?), vi. 16, vii. 10, xix. 4, xxi. 5: the accus. in ver. 4, ch. vi. 2, 4, 5, xi. 16, xiv. 14, xvii. 3, xix. 11, xx. 4, 11. The only rule that seems to be at all observed is, that always at the first mention of the fact of sitting, the accus. seems to be used, e. g. here, and ver. 4, ch. vi. 2, 4, 5, xiv. 14, xvii. 3, xix. 11, xx. 4 (11 seems hardly a case in point), thus bearing a trace of its proper import, that of motion towards, of which the first mention partakes. But the accus. is not confined to the first mention, witness ch. xi. 16, and no rule at all seems to prevail as regards the gen. and dat.) one sitting (called henceforward throughout the book, ὁ καθήμενος ἐπὶ τ. θρ.: and being the Eternal Father (not as Lyra, "Deus trinus et unus,"—so also Corn.-a-lap., Calov.; for He that sitteth on the throne is distinguished in ch. vi. 16, vii. 10 from the Son, and in ver. 5 from the Holy Spirit): see ch. vii. 10, xix. 4, where we read expressly, τῷ θεῷ τῷ καθήμενῳ ἐπὶ τ. θρ. So that it is not for the reasons sometimes suggested, that the Name is not expressed: e. g. that by Eich. and Ewald, on account of the Jewish unwillingness to express the sacred Name: that by Herder (see also De W. al.), that the mind has no figure and the tongue no word by which to express it: still less that of Heinec., "Non nisi ex negligentia scribendi videtur omisum." The simple reason seems to be, as assigned by Hengstb. and Düsterd., that St. John would describe simply that which he saw, as he saw it. For the same reason he does not name Christ expressly in the first vision, ch. i. 13): and he that sat (no need to supply "was," as ἦν in rec.: the nominatives are all correlative after ἰδοὺ) like in appearance (lit., "in vision," "in sight," as E. twelve stones in Aaron's breastplate says, λίθος ἰασπισ, οὗτός ἐστι τῷ εἶδει σμαραγδίζων (see below). παρὰ δὲ τὰ χεῖλη τοῦ Θερωμόδοντος ποταμοῦ εὐρίσκεται . . . ἀλλ' ἐστὶ γένος πολὺ καλούμενον Ἀμαθούσιον, τὸ εἶδος δὲ τοῦνδε ἐστὶ τοῦ λίθου· κατὰ τὴν σμάρραδόν ἐστι χλωρίζουσα, ἀλλὰ ἀμβλυτέρα καὶ ἀμαυροτέρα. καὶ ἔνδοθεν χλωρὸν ἔχει τὸ σῶμα, εἰκονία ἰῶ χαλκοῦ, ἔχουσα φλέβας τετραστίχους κ.τ.λ. He then describes several other kinds, a purple, a yellow, &c. One kind appears to be that meant in our ch. xxi. 11, where we have the glory of God like ὡs λίθῳ ἰάσπιδι κρυσταλλίζοντι: for he describes it as ἄλλη κρυστάλλου ὕδατι ὁμοία. It is true that Epiphanius may have put in this species merely to satisfy ch. xxi. 11. From this latter passage, where it is described as τιμιάτατος,—which jasper, as commonly known, never was,—Ebrard argues that by ἰασπισ the diamond is meant. ἰασπισ, Heb. יָסַפִּיט, a beautiful stone of various wavy colours, semi-opaque, granulous in texture, used in ancient times for gems and ornaments, but in more modern ones on a larger scale for pavements and tables. Even Pliny wrote, xxxvii. (8.) 37, “viret, et sæpe translucet iaspis, etiamsi victa a multis, antiquitatis tamen gloriam retinens.” The altar in Canterbury Cathedral stands on a platform of yellow Sicilian jasper pavement, 30 feet by 14 feet.

σάρδιος, Heb. סָרְדִיּוֹס, is, as this name shews, a red stone, commonly supposed to answer to our cornelian. But Epiphanius, in his treatise on the twelve stones in Aaron's breastplate, says of it, λίθος σάρδιος ὁ Βαβυλώνιος, οὕτω καλούμενος. ἐστὶ δὲ πυρῶπς τῷ εἶδει καὶ αἱματοειδής, σαρδίῳ τῷ ἰχθὺι τε ταριχευμένη εἰκίως. διὰ καὶ σάρδιος λέγεται, ἀπὸ τοῦ εἶδους λαβὼν τὸ ἐπώνυμον. ἐν Βαβύλωνι δὲ τῇ πρὸς Ἀσσυρίαν γίνεταί. ἐστὶ δὲ διαυγῆς ὁ λίθος. Several of the Commentators, e. g. Victorin., Areth., Lyra, Ansbert, Joachim, &c., Bengel, Hengst., Düsterd., have said much on the symbolic significance of these stones as representing the glory of God. Thus much only seems, in the great uncertainty and variety of views, to stand firm for us: that if ἰασπισ is to be taken as in ch. xxi. 11, as, by the reference there to τὴν δόξαν τοῦ θεοῦ, it certainly seems it must, then it represents a watery crystalline brightness, whereas σάρδιος is on all hands acknowledged to be fiery red. Thus we shall have ample material for symbolic meaning: whether, as Victorinus, Tichon., Primas., Beke, al., of the one great judgment by water (or of baptism) and the other by fire,—as Andr., Areth., Lyra, al., of the goodness of God in nature (ἰασπισ being green) and His severity in judgment,—as Ansbert, of the divinity and humanity (“quia nimirum humanitas ejus tempore passionis sanguine coloratur”), &c., or as the moderns mostly, e. g. Bengel, Stern, Hengstb., of the holiness of God and His justice. This last seems to me the more probable, especially as the same mixture of white light with fire seems to pervade the Old Testament and Apocalyptic visions of the divine majesty. Cf. Ezek. i. 4, viii. 2; Dan. vii. 9: and our ch. i. 14, x. 1. But nothing can be confidently asserted, in our ignorance of the precise import of ἰασπισ, and a rainbow (cf. Gen. ix. 12—17; Ezek. i. 28) round about the throne (i. e. in all probability surrounding the throne vertically, as a nimbus; not, as Beng. and Hengstb., horizontally) like to the appearance (ὁμοίος is here an adj. with two terminations, as those in -ios frequently in Attic Greek: see Winer (reff.)): the construction of ῥάσει is not as above, but the dat. is here after ὁμοίος of an emerald (on σμάρραδος (-δινος is the possess. adj. of two terminations) all seem agreed, that it represents the stone so well known among us as the emerald, of a lovely green colour:—Pliny says of it, ut supra, “quin et ab intentione alia obscurata aspectu smaragdi recreatur acies, scalpentibusque gemmas non alia gratior oculorum refectio est; ita viridi lenitate lassitudinem mulcent.” Almost all the Commentators think of the gracious and federal character of the bow of God, Gen. ix. 12—17. Nor is it any objection to this (as Ebrard) that the bow or glory here is green, instead of prismatic: the form is that of the covenant bow, the colour even more refreshing and more directly symbolizing grace and mercy. “Deus in iudiciis semper federis sui meminit:” Grot. So far at least we may be sure of as to the symbolism of this appearance of Him that sitteth on the throne: that the brightness of His glory and fire of His judgment is ever girded by, and found within, the refreshment and surety of His mercy and goodness. So that, as Düsterd. says well, “This fundamental vision contains all that may serve for terror to the enemies, and consolation to the friends, of Him that sitteth on the throne . . .”). 4.] The assessors of the enthroned One. The construction with ἰδοῦ, partly in the nom., partly in the accus., still continues. And round the throne twenty-four thrones (i. e. evidently smaller thrones, and probably lower than ὁ θρόνος), and upon the twenty-four thrones elders sitting (the accus., either after εἶδον understood, or more likely loosely placed with the nominatives after ἰδοῦ), clothed in white garments, and on their heads golden crowns (these 24 elders are not angels, as maintained by Rinck and Hofmann (Weiss. u. Erfüll. p. 325 f.), as is shewn (not by ch. v. 9, as generally argued,—even by Elliott, vol. i. p. 81 f.: see text there: but) by their white robes and crowns, the rewards of endurance, ch. iii. 5, ii. 10,—but representatives of the Church, as generally understood. But if so, what sort of representatives, and why 24 in number? This has been variously answered. The usual understanding has been that of our earliest Commentator, Victorinus; who says, “Sunt autem viginti quatuor, patres: duodecim Apostoli, totidem Patriarchæ.” And this is in all probability right in the main: the key to the interpretation being the analogy with the sayings of our Lord to the Apostles, Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30. That those sayings do not regard the same session as this, is no argument against the inference from analogy. Joachim brings against this view that the twelve patriarchs were not personally holy men, and never are held up as distinguished in the Old Testament. But this obviously is no valid objection. It is not the personal characters, but the symbolical, that are here in question. It might be said with equal justice that the number of the actual Apostles is not definitely twelve. It is no small confirmation of the view, that in ch. xv. 3, we find the double idea of the church, as made up of Old Testament and New Testament saints, plainly revealed to St. John; for he heard the victorious saints sing the song of Moses, and the song of the Lamb. See also ch. xxi. 12, 14, where the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem are inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes, and its twelve foundations with those of the twelve Apostles. Various other interpretations have been: that of Lyra, “designatur universæ cathedrales ecclesiæ: quæ licet sint multæ, tamen sub tali numero designantur propter concordantiam novi Testamenti ad vetus, in quo legitur, 1 Paralip. xxv., quod sanctus David volens augmentare cultum divinum, statuit viginti quatuor sacerdotes templo per hebdomadas successive ministrantes, in sacra enim scriptura frequenter ponitur determinatus numerus pro indeterminato:” that of Alcas., Calov., Vi-tringa, Zeger, Ewald, al., who explain the number similarly by the 24 courses of priests and their heads,—the objection to which is, that these elders are not priests, their occupation in ch. v. 8 being simply connected with their representative character:—that of Grot., that the number is that of the presiding elders of the Jerusalem church (a pure assumption): that of Joaehim, Heinrichs, Bleek, De Wette, that the number 12, that of the tribes of Israel, is doubled, to signify the accession of the Gentiles to the church: that of Primasius and Ansbert, that the doubling is “propter geminum Testamentum, quin et in veteri et in novo eadem formatur Ecclesia.” Besides these, there have been many fanciful reasons, deduced from numerical considerations: as e. g. that of Arethas in Catena, that 21 is 3 × 7, the combination of the number of perfection with that of the Holy Trinity, and then 3 is added; &c. &c.) 5.] And out of the throne go forth (the tense is changed, and the narrative assumes the direct form, which, however, is immediately dropped again, and the accumulation of details resumed) lightnings and voices and thunders (the imagery seems to be in analogy with that in the Old Testament, where God’s presence to give His law was thus accompanied: cf. Exod. xix. 16; where ἀστραπαὶ and φωναὶ occur in juxtaposition as here. If this idea be correct, then we have here represented the sovereignty and almightiness of God. And nearly so Vitr., Hengstb., Düsterd., al. De Wette and Ebrard understand God’s power over nature, De W. uniting it with what follows: see below. Grot. says, “Fulgura et tonitrua significant minas Dei contra impios: voces sunt in ipsis tonitribus, infra x. 3, i. e. non generaliter tantum minatur, sed et speciales penas prædicat.” But there seems no ground for this): and seven lamps (the former construction is resumed) of fire burning before the throne [itself] (or, before his throne, viz. the throne of the καθήμενος), which are the seven spirits of God (see notes on ch. i. 4, v. 6. These seem to represent the Holy Spirit in his sevenfold working: in his enlightening and cheering as well as his purifying and consuming agency. So most Commentators. De W. and Ebrard regard the representation as that of the Holy Spirit, the principle of physical and spiritual life, which appears only wrong by being too limited. Hengstenb. is quite beside the mark in confidently (as usual) confining the interpretation of the lamps of fire to the consuming power of the Spirit in judgment. The fact of the parallel ch. v. 6 speaking of ἑπτὰ ὀφθαλμοί, and such texts as ch. xxi. 23; Ps. cxix. 105, should have kept him from this mistake. The whole of this glorious vision is of a composite and twofold nature: comfort is mingled with terror, the fire of love with the fire of judgment): and before the throne as it were a sea (the ὡς belongs to θάλ. ὑάλ., not to ὑάλ. alone as Bengel: so also in the parallel place, ch. xv. 2) of glass (not, “glassy,” as rendered by Elliott: ὑαλίνη describes not the appearance, but the material, of the sea: it appeared like a sea of glass—so clear, and so calm) like to crystal (and that not common glass, which among the ancients was as we see from its remains, cloudy and semi-opaque, but like rock crystal for transparency and beauty, as Victorinus, “aquam mundam, stabilem, non vento agitatum.” Compare by way of contrast, ἡ καθημένη ἐπὶ [τῶν] ὑδάτων [τῶν] πολλῶν, the multitudinous and turbulent waters, ch. xvii. 1. In seeking the explanation of this, we must first track the image from its O. T. earlier usage. There, in Exod. xxiv. 10, we have καὶ εἶδον τὸν τόπον οὗ εἰστήκει ὁ θεὸς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ καὶ τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦς πόδας αὐτοῦ ὡσεὶ ἔργον πλίνθου σαφείρου, καὶ ὡσπερ εἶδος στερεώμα-τος τοῦ οὐρανοῦ τῇ καθαριότητι. Compare with this Ezek. i. 22, και ὁμοίωμα ὑπὲρ κεφαλῆς αὐτῶν[αὐτοῖς A] τῶν ζῶων ὡσεὶ στερῶμα, ὡς ὕρασις κρυστάλλου, ἔκτε- ἄσθεν ἐπὶ τῶν πτερυγῶν αὐτῶν ἐπάνωθεν. In Job xxxvii. 18 also, where the LXX appear to have gone quite astray, the sky is said to be "as a molten looking-glass." If we are to follow these indices, the primary reference will be to the clear ether in which the throne of God is upborne: and the intent of setting this space in front of the throne will be, to betoken its separation and insulation from the place where the Seer stood, and indeed from all else around it. The material and appearance of this pavement of the throne seem chosen to indicate majestic repose and ethereal purity. All kinds of symbolic interpretations, more or less fanciful, have been given. Such are those of Victorinus ("donum baptismi"), Tichonius, Primas., Bede, Lyra, Calov., al.—of Joachim ("in mari vitreo sacrum designatur scripturarum volumen"),—of Alcas. (repentance), of Ribera ("ego mare vitreum dici arbitror multitudinem hominum in terra viventium"), Paræus, al.,—of Vitringa ("id, quo clare intelligimus regnum Dei in Christo Jesu niti et fundari: id vero est α) certa et constans Dei voluntas, qua constituit regnum gratiæ habere inter homines . . . β) jus certum et liquidum ejusmodi regnum gratiæ inter homines erigendi . . ."), Herder, al.,—of Bengel and Hengstb., that the sea of glass, on account of its being described as mixed with fire in ch. xv. 2, is "das Product der sieben Feuerlampen," and (Ps. xxxvi. 6, "Thy judgments are a great deep") betokens the great and wonderful works of God, His righteous and holy ways. But as Düsterd. remarks, the parallel place, ch. v. 6, where the seven lamps are seven eyes, precludes this:—of Arctius, Grot., and Ebrard, who, because the sea, in its stormy and agitated state, represents (ch. xvii. 15) the nations of the earth in their godless state, therefore the pure and calm sea represents (Ebr.) the creatures in their proper relation to their Creator, or (Arct.) "cœtum ecclesiæ triumphantis," or as Grot. strangely, and as De W. remarks, most unfeliciously, "summa puritas plebis Hierosolymitanæ ejus quæ Christo nomen dederat: quæ puritas describitur Act. ii. et iv." Düsterd. connects it, and in fact identifies it, with the river of the water of life, λαμπρ. ὡς κρύσταλλον, which, ch. xxii. 1, proceeded out of the throne of God and the Lamb. But the whole vision there is quite distinct from this, and each one has its own propriety in detail. To identify the two, is to confound them: nor does ch. xv. 2 at all justify this interpretation. There, as here, it is the purity, calmness, and majesty of God's rule which are signified by the figure). And in the midst of the throne (not, as Hengstb., under the throne: their movements are free, cf. ch. xv. 7. See below), and round about the throne (i. e. so that in the Apostle's view they partly hid the throne, partly overlapped the throne, being symmetrically arranged with regard to it, i. e. as the number necessitates, one in the midst of each side), four living-beings (the E. V., "beasts," is the most unfortunate word that could be imagined. A far better one is that now generally adopted, "living creatures:" the only objection to it being that when we come to vv. 9, 11, we give the idea, in conjoining "living-creatures" and "created" (ἐκτίσας), of a close relation which is not found in the Greek. I have therefore preferred living-beings) full of eyes before and behind (this, from their respective positions, could be seen by St. John: their faces being naturally towards the throne. On the symbolism, see below). And the first living-being like to a lion, and the second living-being like to a steer (μόσχος is not necessarily to be pressed to its proper primary meaning, as indicating the young calf in distinction from the grown bullock: the LXX use it for an ox generally, in Exod. xxii. 1; Levit. xxii. 23; also Exod. xxix. 10, and Gen. xii. 16), and the third living-being having its face as of a man (or, the face of a man), and the fourth living-being like to a flying eagle. And the four living-beings, each (reff.) of them having (ἔχων, the gender being conformed to that of the thing signified, see on φωνή. . . λέγων, ver. 1) six wings apiece (for the distributive ἀνά, see reff.). All round and within (I prefer much putting a period at ἔξ, to carrying on the construction; as more in accord with the general style of this description. Understand, after both κυκλόθεν, and ἔσωθεν,—τῶν πτερόγων: the object of St. John being to shew, that the six wings in each case did not interfere with that which he had before declared, viz. that they were full of eyes before and behind. Round the outside of each wing, and up the inside of each (half-expanded) wing, and of the part of the body also which was in that inside recess) they are full of eyes: and they have no rest by day and by night (ἡμέρας καὶ νυκτὸς may belong either to ἀνάπ. οὐκ ἔχ., or to λέγοντες. Partly on account of the καί, partly as a matter of the mere judgment of the ear, I prefer joining it with the latter) saying (the gender, see as above), Holy Holy Holy Lord God Almighty (so far is identical with the seraphim's ascription of praise in Isa. vi. 3: παντοκράτωρ answering usually in the LXX to רִנְיָא, though not in that place. See Bengel's remarks in note on Rom. ix. 29), which was, and which is, and which is to come (see on reff.). These four living-beings are in the main identical with the cherubim of the O. T. (compare Ezek. i. 5—10, x. 20), which are called by the same name of living creatures (רִנְיָא), and are similarly described. We may trace however some differences. In Ezekiel's vision, each living-being has all four faces, Ez. i. 6, whereas here the four belong severally, one to each. Again in Ezekiel's vision, it is apparently the wheels which are full of eyes, Ez. i. 18; though in id. x. 12, it would appear as if the animals also were included. Again, the having six wings apiece is not found in the cherubim of Ezekiel, which have four, Ez. i. 6,—but belongs to the seraphim described in Isa. vi. 2, to whom also (see above) belongs the ascription of praise here given. So that these are forms compounded out of the most significant particulars of more than one O. T. vision.

In enquiring after their symbolic import, we are met by the most remarkable diversity of interpretation. 1) Our earliest Commentator, Victorinus, may serve as the type of those who have understood them to symbolize the Four Evangelists, or rather, Gospels:—"Simile leoni animal, Evangelium secundum Marcum, in quo vox leonis in eremo rugientis auditur, vox clamantis in deserto, Parate viam Domini. Hominis autem figura Matthæus enititur enunciare nobis genus Mariæ unde carnem accepit Christus. Ergo dum enumerat ab Abraham usque ad David et usque ad Joseph, tanquam de homine locutus est. Ideo prædicatio ejus hominis effigiem ostendit. Lucas sacerdotium Zachariæ offerentis hostiam pro populo, et apparentem sibi angelum dum enarrat, propter sacerdotium, et hostiæ conscriptionem, vituli imaginationem tenet. Joannes Evangelista aquilæ similis, assumptis pennis ad altiora festinans, de verbo Dei disputat." I have cited this comment at length, to shew on what fanciful and untenable ground it rests. For with perhaps the one exception of the last of the four, not one of the Evangelists has any inner or substantial accordance with the character thus assigned. Consequently these characteristics are found varied, and that in the earliest writer in whom the view can be traced, viz. Irenæus, who (iii. 11. 8, p. 190) makes the lion to be the gospel of St. John, which τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς ἡγεμονικὴν αὐτοῦ . . . καὶ ἔνδοξον γενεὰν διηγείται: the steer that of St. Luke, as above: the man, that of St. Matthew: the eagle, that of St. Mark, who ἀπὸ τοῦ προφητικῶν πνεύματος τοῦ ἐξ ὕψους ἐπιόντος τοῖς ἀνθρώποις τὴν ἀρχὴν ἐποίησατο. So also Andreas in Catena. But again Augustine, de cons. ev. i. 6, vol. iii. p. 1046, attributes the lion to St. Matthew, the man to St. Mark, the steer to St. Luke, and the eagle to St. John. These notices may again serve to shew with what uncertainty the whole view is beset. It has nevertheless been adopted by Jerome (Prolog. ad ev. Matth., vol. vii. p. 5, 6), Primas., Bede, and many others of old, and among the moderns by Williams (on the Study of the Gospels, pp. 1—92), Scott (Interpretation of the Apocalypse, p. 132, but making, as Aug. above, the lion = St. Matthew, the man = St. Mark, the ox = St. Luke, and the eagle = St. John), Wordsworth (Lectures on the Apoc. p. 116, see also his note here, who, as in his statements on the other details, so here, ascribes unanimity (but see below) to the ancients: "in them the ancient church beheld a figure of the four gospels"), &c. The principal of the other interpretations have been: 2) the 4 elements; so some mentioned in the Catena; 3) the 4 cardinal virtues: so Arethas, as cited by Corn.-a-lap., and generally: but not in the Catena: 4) the 4 faculties and powers of the human soul; "homo est vis rationalis, leo irascibilis, bos concupiscibilis, aquila est conscientia, sive spiritus;"—so Corn.-a-lap. refers to Sixtus Senensis as citing Greg. Naz. from Orig. Hom. 1 on Ezekiel, vol. iii. p. 361 f.: 5) Our Lord in the fourfold great events of Redemption: so a conjecture in the Catena (ἰσως δὲ καὶ διὰ τούτων ἡ οἰκονομία χριστοῦ δηλοῦται διὰ τοῦ λέοντος, ὡς βασιλεύς διὰ δὲ τοῦ μύσχου, ὡς ἱερεύς, μᾶλλον δὲ καὶ ἱερεῖον διὰ δὲ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, ὡς δι' ἡμᾶς ἀνθρωπείνους διὰ τοῦ αἵτου, ὡς χορηγὸς τοῦ ζωοποιῶν πνεύματος καὶ ἐπὶ πάντας καταπτάντος), Aretius, Ansbert (inter alia: for he tries to combine all possible interpretations which can relate to Christ and the Church); 6) the 4 patriarchal-churches: so Lyra, explaining the lion = Jerusalem, "propter constantiam ibi existentium," citing Acts v. 29: the ox = Antioch, "quia fuit parata obedire mandatis Apostolorum in Judæa existentium, et quia (?) primo in ea vocati sunt discipuli Christiani:" the man = Alexandria, "nam in ea a principio fuerunt doctores docti non solum in literis divinis sed etiam humanis:" the eagle = Constantinople, "nam in ea fuerunt viri per contemplationem elevati, ut Gregorius Naz. et plures alii." This is referred to by Corn.-a-lap., who ends characteristically, "Hæ quatuor sunt in circuitu throni Dei, id est, Cathedræ Romanæ, in qua sedet vicarius Dei:" 7) the 4 great Apostles, Peter, "fervens animo et in hoc leonis similis;" James the Lord's brother, because "bos patientiam significat:" Matthew, "bonitate homo antecedit animantia cætera. Puto designari Matthæum qui diu dicitur mansisse in Judæa" (?): Paul, because the eagle "celeritatem ministerii significat, quod certe Paulo proprium qui sæpius Hierosolymis fuit. Et bene πετομένη, quia semper erat in cursu:" so Grotius: 8) all the doctors of the church: so Vitranga, al.: 9) "in quatuor animalibus istis quatuor speciales ordines designati sunt, quorum primus pastorum est, secundus diacourum, tertius doctorum, quartus contemplantium," Joachim: 10) the 4 representatives of the N. T. church, as the four standards of the tribes Reuben, Judah, Ephraim, and Dan, which are traditionally thus reported (see also Num. ii.), were of the O. T. church. So Mede and many others: 11) the 4 virtues of the Apostles, "magnanimitas, beneficentia, æquitas sapientia,"—Alcasar (in De W.):

12) the 4 principal angels, Corn.-a-lap., Laun., al.: 13) the angelic, or is-angelic, state of the glorified church: so Elliott, vol. i. p. 87. But thus we have no account given of the peculiar symbolism of these living-beings, nor of the part which they perform in the act of praise below. There are many other interpretations and ramifications of interpretation, hardly worth recounting. But the one which above all these seems to me to require our notice is that which is indicated in the rabbinical sentence cited by Schöttgen here: "Quatuor sunt qui principatum in hoc mundo tenent. Inter creaturas homo, inter aves aquila, inter pecora bos, inter bestias leo." The four cherubic forms are the representatives of animated nature—of God's sentient creation. In Ezekiel, each form is compounded of the four. Here, the four forms are distinct. There (xxviii. 12), where the prince of Tyrus is compared to one of them, it is called the impression of similitude, and the crown of beauty: in Isaiah vi., where the seraphim, which enter into the composition of these living beings, ascribe holiness to Jehovah, they cry, "His glory is the fulness of the whole earth." With this view, every thing that follows is in accordance. For when these, and the 24 elders, in vv. 9—11, fall down before the throne, the part which these living-beings bear in the great chorus of praise is sufficiently indicated by the reason which is given for their ἄξιός ἐστι, viz. ὅτι σὺ ἐκτίσας τὰ πάντα, καὶ διὰ τὸ θέλημα σου ἦσαν καὶ ἐκτίσθησαν. The objection brought against this view by Ebrard, viz. that Behemoth, the king of the waters, is not here represented, is mere trifling. He forgets that in the record of creation, the noblest of the creatures sprung from the waters are not fishes, but birds; and that the eagle represents both. It is in strict accordance also with this view, that these living-beings are full of eyes, ever wakeful, ever declaring the glory of God: that they have each six wings, which doubtless are to be taken as in Isa. vi. from which the figure comes—"with twain he covered his face (reverence, in not venturing to look on the divine majesty), and with twain he covered his feet (humility, hiding his own created form from the glory of the Creator), and with twain he did fly (obedience, readiness to perform the divine commands). This view is taken by the best of the modern Commentators: by Herder, De Wette, Rinck, Hengstb., Düsterd., Ebrard differs only in this, that he regards them as symbolic not of creation itself, but of the creative power of God. Stern, whose commentary on this whole passage is very able and beautiful, inclines rather to take them as representing the power of divine grace within the church of God: but in his usual interpretation (see in p. 209, on ὅταν δώσουσιν, κ.τ.λ.) treats them as "alles creaturliche Leben der Natur." See also my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, vol. i. Lecture ii. We have thus the throne of God surrounded by His Church and His animated world: the former represented by the 24 elders, the latter by the four living-beings. 9—11.] The everlasting song of praise of creation, in which the church joins. It is well observed by Düsterd., that the ground of this ascription of praise is not redemption, which first comes in ch. v. 9 ff.—but the power and glory of God as manifested in Creation; so that the words of the elders are in beautiful harmony with the praise of the four living-beings, and with the signification of the whole vision. And whensoever the living-beings shall give (the future δώσουσι must not be pressed quite so strongly as is done by De Wette (so also Stern), "from henceforth for all the time to come: see ch. vii. 15 ff.: beforetime it was not so, seeing that the 24 elders have only assumed their place since Christ's work of Redemption has been proceeding and His victory developing." Still, it is more than a mere frequentative put for the regular subjunctive, as Düsterd., after Vitr., Beng., Hengstb., and Ebr. It has a distinct pointing onward towards the future, implying eternal repetition of the act, which the subjunctive would not carry) glory and honour (i. e., recognition of His glory and honour) and thanksgiving (i. e. actual giving of thanks: the 3 accusatives are not strictly co-ordinate in meaning) to Him that sitteth upon the throne, to Him that liveth to the ages of the ages, the twenty-four elders shall fall down before Him that sitteth upon the throne, and shall worship Him that liveth to the ages of the ages (cf. ch. v. 8, xix. 4), and shall cast down their crowns (to disclaim all honour and dignity of their own, and acknowledge that all belongs to Him. See instances of casting down crowns cited in Wetstein. Cf. especially Tacit. Ann. xv. 29: "ad quam (effigiem Neronis) progressus Tiridates . . . sublatum capiti diadema imaginis subiecit") before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord and our (Düsterd. remarks that the ἡμῶν has a force here peculiarly belonging to the 24 elders, as representing the redeemed, and thus standing in a covenant relation to God nearer than that of the 4 living-beings. But we must not forget, that Creation is only a part of Redemption, Col. i. 20) God, to receive the glory (τὴν δ. &c., as alluding to the δόξα &c., ver. 9, ascribed by the living-beings. The articles are improperly omitted in E. V.) and the honour and the might (observe that τὴν δύναμιν in the mouth of the 24 elders represents εὐχαριστίαν in that of the 4 living-beings. The elders, though themselves belonging to creation, in this ascription of praise look on creation from without, and that thanksgiving, which creation renders for its being, becomes in their view a tribute to Him who called them into being, and thus a testimony to His creative power. And thus the reason follows): because Thou didst create all things (τὰ πάντα, "this universal whole," the universe), and on account of Thy will (i. e. because Thou didst will it: "propter voluntatem tuam," as Vulg.: not durch Deinen Willen, as Luther, which represents διά with a gen. "For thy pleasure," of the E. V., introduces an element entirely strange to the context, and however true in fact, most inappropriate here, where the ὅτι renders a reason for the ἀξιώτης of ἡ δόξα, ἡ τιμή, and ἡ δύναμις) they were (ἦσαν, not = ἐγενήθησαν, came into being, as De W., al.: for this it cannot signify: nor again, though thus the requirement of ἦσαν would be satisfied, as Lyra, "in dispositione tua ab æterno, antequam crearentur:" nor, as Grot., "erant jam homines quia tu volueras, et conditi sunt, id est, iterum conditi, per Christum:" nor again as Bengel, "all things were, from the creation down to the time of this ascription of praise and henceforward." The best explanation is that of Düsterd., they existed, as in contrast to their previous non-existence: whereby not their coming into being, but the simple fact of their being, is asserted. The remarkable reading οὐκ ἦσαν is worth notice: "by reason of Thy will they were not, and were created:" i.e. "they were created out of nothing." But besides the preponderance of authority the other way, there is the double chance, that οὐκ may have arisen from the preceding ου, and that it may have been an escape from the difficulty of ἦσαν) and were created (they both had their being,—ἦσαν; and received it from Thee by a definite act of Thine,—ἐκτίσθησαν).

CH. V. 1—14.] The book with seven seals, containing & δεῖ γενέσθαι μετὰ ταῦτα, which the Seer was to be shewn, ch. iv. 1. None found worthy to open it but the Lamb, who takes it for this purpose, amidst the praises of the heavenly host, of the church, and of the creation of God.

1.] The sealed book. And I saw (notice, that from the general vision, in the last chapter, of the heavenly Presence of God, the scene is so far only changed that, all that remaining as described, a particular incident is now seen for the first time, and is introduced by καὶ εἶδον) (lying) on the right hand (i.e. the right hand was open, and the book lay on the open hand. So in ch. xx. 1, where see note. The common rendering, in the right hand, misses the ἐπί with the accus. Beza's and Ebrard's rendering, "on the right side of Him on the throne," is shewn to be wrong by what follows ver. 7, where the Lamb takes the book ἐκ τῆς δεξιᾶς τοῦ καθημένου ἐπὶ τ. θρ.: see there. The lying on the open hand imports, that on God's part there was no withholding of His future purposes as contained in this book. The only obstacle to unsealing it was as follows, ver. 3) of Him that sat upon the throne a book (i.e. "a roll of a book," as in Ezek. ii. 9 f. This explanation alone will suit the meaning of the word-as applied to the contemporary practice regarding sacred writings. See also Jer. xxxvi. 2, 23; Zech. v. 2: and below) written within and behind (such scrolls, written not only, as commonly, on the inner side, but also on the outer, which, to one reading the inner, was behind (see below), are mentioned by Pliny, Epist. iii. 5, who says of his uncle Pliny the elder, "tot ista volumina peregit, electorumque commentarios CLX mihi reliquit, opistographos quidem et minutissime scriptos, qua ratione multiplicatur hic numerus:" by Lucian, Vitarum auctio, i. p. 549, ἡ πῆρα δέ σοι θερμῶν ἔσται μυστή, καὶ ὀπισθογράφων βιβλίων: by Juvenal, Sat. i. 6, "summi plena jūm margine libri Scriptus et in tergo nondum finitus Orestes:" by Martial, viii. 22, "Scribit in aversa Picens epigrammata charta." This writing within and without, so that the whole roll was full, betokens the completeness of the contents as containing the divine counsels: there was no room for addition to that which was therein written. This would be of itself a sufficient reason for the fullness of the scroll. To see, as Elliott, i. p. 99; iii. p. 4, two divisions of written matter indicated, by the writing within, and by that on the back, correspondent to one another, seems hardly warranted by the text), fast-sealed with seven seals (not, consisting of seven writings, each sealed with one seal, as Grot. (who joins καὶ ὀπισθ. with κατεσφραγισμ.), Vitringa, Wetst., Storr, Ewald, al.: but one book, fastened with seven seals, which were visible to the Apostle. Various ingenious methods have been imagined, by which the opening of each of these seals may have loosened a corresponding portion of the roll: see e.g. the apocalyptic chart in Elliott, vol. i. p. 111, and its explanation, ib. note 2, p. 98. But they all proceed on the assumption that the roll in the vision was unfolded, which is no where to be gathered from the text. Nor have we any right to say that the separate visions which follow the opening of each seal are identical with separate portions of writing on the roll. These visions are merely symbolic representations of the progress of God's manifestation of the purpose of His will; but no portion of the roll is actually unfolded, nor is any thing read out of the book. Not its contents, but the gradual steps of access to it, are represented by these visions. What is in that book, shall not be known, until, in full completion, γνωρισθῆ ταῖς ἀρχαῖς καὶ ταῖς ἐξουσίαις ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις διὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἡ πολυποικίλος σοφία τοῦ θεοῦ, Eph. iii. 10: till those material events, which marked the gradual opening of the sum of God's purposes, are all past, and the roll is contemplated in its completeness by the spirits of the glorified hereafter. This completeness is here set forth to us again by the mystic number seven. See some excellent remarks on the entire distinctness of the opening of the seals, and the reading of the book, in Corn.-a-lap., p. 77 c:—"nihil enim in libro legi poterat, nisi post resignationem omnium septem sigillorum: omnibus enim reseratis, tunc demum aperiri et legi potuit liber, non ante." So also Ribera, p. 197: "calamitates illæ quæ sigillis continebantur, prius omnes pene venturæ erant, quam ea quæ in libro scripta erant, apparent et cognoscerentur." Mr. Elliott, in his work "Apocalypsis Alfordiana," specially directed against my commentary on this book, treats this view with all the scorn which is unfortunately so characteristic of him, calling it absurd, unscriptural, &c. He has not produced a word of proof, or even illustrative corroboration, of his own view, that the opening of each seal corresponds to the unrolling of a certain portion of the scroll: but has contented himself with re-asserting it in the strongest language, and pouring contempt on those who hold the other view. I grieve to say, that this is so often the case throughout his above-mentioned work, as to render it generally impossible for me to meet his objections in argument. One who distrusts his own as well as all other explanations, and believes that much of this mysterious book is as yet unfathomed, is no match for one who hesitates not on every occasion to shew his confidence that he is in the right, and all who differ from him are wrong.

An enquiry here arises, What is represented by this Book? Opinions have been very various. 1) Some of our earliest Commentators understood by it the Old Testament: or the Old and New conjoined. So, apparently, Orig. (in Ezech., Hom. xiv., vol. iii. p. 405: where after quoting our vv. 2—5, he says, "quandiu non venit Deus meus, clausa erat lex, clausus sermo propheticus, velata lectio veteris testamenti.") But again, he says, ἡ γὰρ πᾶσα γραφή ἐστὶν ἡ δηλουμένη διὰ τῆς βίβλου: so that he can hardly be safely quoted for this view), Euseb. (Demonstr. Ev. viii. 2, vol. iv. p. 386,—ποιᾶς δὲ σφραγίδας, ἡ τῶν προφητῶν τὰς ἀσαφείας:), Epiphanius (Hær. li. 32, vol. i. p. 45½, ὅσα γὰρ ἦν νόμφ καὶ ἐν προφήταις

Cujus unitas concors vetus testamentum quasi exterius, et novum continet interius:" and so Augustine), Tichonius (similarly to Bede), Hilary (Prol. to Comm. on Psalms, vol. i. p. 6, "Liber iste, et præterita et futura in his quæ intus et foris scripta erant continens, a nemine dignus est aperiri, &c. . . . I have given several of the above testimonies at length, as helping us to estimate this view. For it will appear from them, that the opening of the seals was very generally by these fathers and interpreters taken to mean, the fulfilment, and consequent bringing to light, of O. T. prophecy by the events of Redemption as accomplished in the Person of our Lord. But, if so, then this view cannot consist with what follows in the Apocalypse. For manifestly the opening of the seals, as notified by the symbolic visions belonging to each, does not relate to things past, but to things which were yet future when this book was written. Nor can this apparent consensus of the early expositors be cited, as it has been e. g. by Dr. Adams ("Sealed Book, &c." pp. 82 ff.), in support of any other view than theirs, in which this Book shall still represent the O. T. Such for example is that of Dr. Adams himself, who regards the opening of the sealed book as symbolizing a future republication of the genuine text of the O. T., by which the Jewish people is to be converted. The untenableness of this view appears at once, if only from (so to speak) its touching the apocalyptic course of visions at this point only, and finding no justification or expansion in any of the symbolic visions accompanying the opening of the seals. 2) Some have held the Book to be Christ Himself: so Hilary ((?) as cited by Corn.-a-lap. from the Prologue to the Psalms, "Liber, ait, hic est Christus, quia Christus est hujus libri materia et argumentum:" and, "sigilla septem, ait Hilarius, sunt septem præcipua Christi mysteria, &c." But the words are not found in that prologue), Heterius (Migne, Patr. Lat., vol. xcvi. pp. 963 ff.), Paschasius (Præfatio in Matth. p. 11). But for the same reasons as above, neither can this be held.

3) Wetstein takes it to be "libellus repudiæ a Deo scriptus nationi Judaicæ:" which for the same reason falls to the ground. 4) Schöttgen, "sententiam a Judice et patribus ejus conscriptis in hostes ecclesiæ conceptam:" and similarly in the main, Hengstenberg: but this view, though strongly defended by Hengstb., is not borne out by the contents of these chapters. 5) Alcasar holds it to be that part of the Apocalypse which treats of the opening of the seven seals (ch. vi.—xi.): and nearly so Hengstb. also, except that he allows only from vi. 1 to viii. 1 for this portion. But both are obviously wrong, seeing that the opening of the seventh seal evolves a series of symbolic actions which only ends with the book itself. So that this comes to 6) the Book being = the Apocalypse itself: so Corn.-a-lap., seeing in the seven seals that part relating to their opening, and after that regarding the subsequent visions concerning Anti-christ and the end of the world, as the contents of the book itself. But he seems, in concluding his paragraph, to resolve this view into the wider one 7) that the Book represents "divinæ providentiæ concilium et præfinitio, qua apud Se statuit et decrevit facere vel permittere, &c." This is very nearly that of Areth. (in Catena, τί δὲ τὸ βιβλίον; ἡ πάνσοφος τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ ἀνεπίληπτος μνήμη, ἣν καὶ ὁ προφήτης Δαβὶδ καὶ Μωσῆς παρεδήλον, ὁ μὲν διὰ τοῦ Ἐπὶ τὸ βιβλίον σου πάντες γραφήσονται ὁ δὲ διὰ τοῦ Κἀμὲ ἐξάλεψον ἐκ τῆς βίβλου ἧς ἔγραψας), Lyra ("liber iste est divina scientia, in qua omnia sunt scripta"), Vitringa, Mede ("codex fatidicus seu consiliorum Dei"), Ewald, De Wette, Stern, Düsterd., al. And this is, in the main, my own view. We may observe, that it is in fact but a limitation of this meaning, when many understand the Book to contain the prophetic fortunes of the Church of Christ: but also that it is a limitation which has arisen from the mistake, noticed above, of confounding the opening of the seals with the reading of the contents of the book. Those successive openings, or if we will, the fortunes and periods of the Church and world, are but so many preparations for that final state of perfection in which the Lamb shall reveal to the Church the contents of the Book itself. 2.] And I saw a strong angel (the epithet ἰσχυρόν is by no means superfluous, but corresponds to the φωνῇ μεγάλῃ below, which, as appears by what followed, penetrated heaven and earth and Hades. Compare ch. x. 1, 3 and notes) proclaiming in (reff.); the voice is the vehicle, or investiture, of the thing proclaimed) a loud voice, Who is worthy (see reff. ἄξιος here = ικανός Matt. viii. 8) to open the book and to loose the seals of it? and no one was able, in heaven, nor yet upon the earth, nor yet under the earth (in Hades, the place of departed spirits: not, as Grot., in mari), to open the book, nor yet to look on it (if we were reading an ordinary Greek sentence, this οὐδέ would introduce a climax, which would rule the meaning to be, “nor even so much as to look upon the book,” lying there closed as it did. But the somewhat indiscriminate use of οὐδέ in the former clause, in which no such climax can be intended, removes this necessity, and enables us to take βλέπειν of an act subsequent to the ἀνοῖξαι,—the looking on the book, with a view to read it. For the claim to open the book must be founded on a claim of worthiness to see that which was contained in it). 4.] And I (ἐγὼ emphatic, ‘I, for my part’) wept much, because no one was found worthy to open the book nor to look upon it (“per hunc fletum designatur Johannis desiderium de sciendo ecclesiae futurum processum.” Lyra. It had been promised to him, ch. iv. 1, that he should be shewn future events: and now it seemed as if this promise were about to be frustrated by the lack of one worthy to open the book. There was no weakness of faith, as Hengstb. fancies: indeed such a supposition is entirely out of place here: St. John is in this book the simple recipient of the Apocalypse: for that he is summoned to the heavenly scene, for that he is waiting in humility: but that now seems to be precluded, and his tears burst forth in the earnestness of disappointed desire after the fulfilment of the promise. Christ, as the opener of the book, is not yet revealed to him: and to have him anticipating that revelation by the power of his individual faith, would be to put him out of his place and violate consistency). 5.] And one from among the elders (“dicunt aliqui,” says Lyra, “quod fuit Matthæus evangelista, qui dixit in persona Christi, Data est mihi omnis potestas in cælo et in terra:” he himself preferring Peter, who had before this suffered martyrdom, and who was “unus, id est, primus, inter Apostolos.” But see the interpretation of the elders above, ch. iv. 4. The elders, in their triumphant place round God’s throne, know better than the Evangelist, yet clothed with the infirmities of this earthly state, the nature and extent of the victory and glory of Christ. It is the practice of the book to introduce the heavenly beings thus talking with the Scer: cf. ch. vii. 13 f.; x. 4, 8 ff.; xvii. 1; xix. 9; xxi. 9, &c.; xxii. 8, &c.) saith to me, Weep not: behold (the ἰδοὺ serves to present before him the scene of which he says in the next verse καὶ εἶδον) the Lion which is from the tribe of Judah (from ref. and so representing it: not, as Calov., al., the Divine root which brought forth David, —to which Vitringa also approaches very near:—for the evident design here is to set forth Christ as sprung from the tribe of Judah and lineage of David, and His victory as His exaltation through suffering, ver. 6), conquered (as De W. well remarks, this word needs no comparison with any Hebrew usage to explain it (so Vitringa: “vox Hebræa נָחַץ circa recentiora tempora reip. Hebr. receptissima fuit hoc usu ut significaverit mereri, dignum esse, haberi vel censerī: imo etiam simpliciter obtinere, nancisci provinciam v. munus administrandum.” And so the majority of Commentators, as E. V., “hath prevailed to open:” most of all Ewald, “Messiam a Deo veniam hanc petiisse et impetrasse”), but is simply to be taken as standing in its proper sense in a pregnant construction. The usual rendering loses sight of the victory of Christ, and of the uniform sense in which the verb νικᾶν is constantly used in this book. The aor. must not be resolved into a perfect, but points to the past event of that great victory, by virtue of which the opening is in His power), (so as) to open (construction, see above) the book and (in order to that) its seven seals. 6.] The vision of the Lamb.

And I saw in the midst of the throne and of the four living-beings, and in the midst of the elders (the words seem to indicate the middle point before the throne; whether on the glassy sea (De W.) or not, does not appear; but certainly not on the throne, from what follows in the next verse. ἐν μέσῳ is repeated, as ἀγαμέσων in Levit. xxvii. 12,

14) a lamb (the use of ἀρνίον, the dimitive, as applied to our Lord, is peculiar to the Apocalypse. It is difficult to say what precise idea is meant to be conveyed by this form. Elsewhere, it is ἀμνός, John i. 29, 36; 1 Pet. i. 19; Acts viii. 32; and as ἀμνός is found in Isa. liii. 7, from which the figure here is taken, the alteration of the word appears to be purposely made. Possibly, as De W., it may be to put forward more prominently the idea of meekness and innocence) standing (i. e. in its natural living position: the word is probably chosen on account of what immediately follows. Though ὡς ἐσφαγμένον, it was not lying, but standing), as if slain (i. e. retaining the appearance of death-wounds on its body: looking as if it had been slain: cf. ch. i. 18. So the majority of Commentators: cf. especially Vitringa;—“vivens equidem, verumtamen insignitum nota majoris alicujus in jugulo vulneris, et conspersum sanguine.” Ebrard is quite wrong in supposing that the ὡς has any emphasis on it: it merely serves to solve the apparent paradox lying in the juxtaposition of ἐστηκός and ἐσφαγμένον), having (the gender again is that not of the thing expressed, but of the thing signified. See above, ch. iv. 1) seven horns (the horn is the well-known emblem of might: cf. 1 Sam. ii. 10; 1 Kings xxii. 11; Ps. cxii. 9, cxlviii. 14; Dan. vii. 7, 20 ff., viii. 3 ff.; ch. xvii. 3 ff. The perfect number seven represents that “all power is given unto Him in heaven and earth,” Matt. xxviii. 18) and seven eyes, which (eyes) are the seven spirits of God, sent forth (as they have been) into the whole earth (i. e. which eyes represent the watchful active operation of God's Spirit poured forth through the Death and by the victory of the Lamb, upon all flesh and all creation. The weight of the whole sentence lies on the predicative anarthrous participle ἀπεσταλμένα. As the seven burning lamps before the throne represented the Spirit of God immanent in the Godhead, so the seven eyes of the Lamb represent the same Spirit in his sevenfold perfection, profluent, so to speak, from the incarnate Redeemer : busied in His world-wide energy : the very word ἀπεσταλμένα reminding us of the apostolic work and church.

Observe, οἱ εἰσιν does not as Bede ("Spiritus in Christo septiformis propter eminentiam potestatis cornibus, propter illuminationem gratiæ comparatur oculis"), Bengel, De W., al., refer to both κέρατα and ὀφθαλμοί : this would be of course grammatically possible, but it seems otherwise decided here both by the context, and by Zech. iv. 10 : ἐπὶ τὰ οὐτοὶ ὀφθαλμοὶ εἰσιν [add κυρίου A ; pref. N], οἱ ἐπιβλέποντες (E. V. which run to and fro ; Heb. עָפְרִיפָּר, from עָפַר, remigare, cursitare) ἐπὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν).

7.] The Lamb takes the Book. And he (or, it) came and took (not, 'received,' as Ebrard. The book lay on the open hand of Him that sat on the throne, for any to take who was found worthy. That "das Buch überreichte" which Ebrard insists on, is found not here, but in the previous description : and to introduce it here, confuses the distinctness of the symbolism.

The perfect εἴληφεν apparently cannot be pressed : see reff.) it (i.e. the Book ; cf. next verse) out of the right hand of Him that sat upon the throne (Vitringa's enquiry, whether we are to imagine the Lamb to have had partly a human form and hands, is rightly dismissed by Düsterd. as "unnöthig und geschmacklos"). 8—10.] Song of praise following the eurphon. And when he took (the aor. ἔλαβεν is not an imperfect, "when he was taking," "als es nahm," Luth. : nor again is it a pluperf. "when he had taken," as E. V. (our idiom perhaps so requiring it), and many Commentators (even De W. and Düsterd.) ;—but a pure past : the context, and not the word itself, indicating that the act to be described was subsequent to that thus expressed. And so in all places commonly cited for aorists "put for" pluperfects) the book, the four living-beings and the twenty-four elders fell down before the Lamb (who shares the divine throne, and honour, and worship, cf. ver. 13 ; ch. xxii. 1 ; and ch. iii. 21), having each (of them) (ἔχοντες ἕκαστος apparently applies only to the elders : not for any grammatical reason, but on account of the symbolism : for

1) it is unnatural to suppose figures described as the four living-beings are, having harps or vials ; and even if this is not to be pressed (see above on ver. 7), yet

2) it is inconsistent with the right view of the four living-beings, as representing creation, that they should present the prayers of the Saints) a harp (κιθάρα, properly a zithern or kind of guitar : the harp of David, which the LXX call κινύρα in 1 Kings xvi. 16, 23, al., but always κιθάρα in the Psalms, is described by Josephus, Ant. vii. 12. 3, ἡ μὲν κινύρα, δέκα χορδαῖς ἐξημμένη, τύπεται πλήκτρῳ : and then he adds, ἡ δὲ νάβλα, δώδεκα φθόγγους ἔχουσα, τοῖς δακτύλοις κρούεται. But David, in the passages above cited, appears to have played with his hand ; so that perhaps the κινύρα or κιθάρα was played in both ways), and golden vials (cups, or bowls. or, by the context, censers) full of incense (θυμίαμα is generally used in the plural, e. g. Herod. ii. 86, διηθέουσι θυμῆμασι τετριμμένοισι: viii. 99, ἐθυμίων θυμῆματα), which (αἷ might well have θυμιαμάτων for its antecedent, being fem. to suit προσευχαί below: but it is perhaps more likely that φιάλας is its antecedent—each vial being full of incense) are (represent: see reff.) the prayers of the saints (see reff.: especially ch. viii. 3: Ps. cxl. 2, κατευθυνθήτω ἡ προσευχή μου ὡς θυμίαμα ἐνώπιόν σου. The twenty-four elders, representing as they do the whole church of God, offer the praises and the prayers of the whole church: the harps symbolizing the former, the censers the latter. Of any thing approaching intercession on the part of the glorified saints for the church below, or indeed of the glorified saints at all, there is not the least mention, nor does this passage at all touch the question of the fact of such intercession. In the division of the two employments, the most of prayer falls to the lot of the church in trial, and the most of praise to the church in glory: and this is perhaps the reason why, while they have harps on which they themselves play, they only offer or present the vials of incense. De W. remarks, that the Writer of the Apocalypse seems not to know any thing of the intercessory office of Christ. But that office is prominent through this whole scene. What is the lamb as it had been slain—what the ἠγόρασας τῷ θεῷ ἐν τῷ αἵματι σου, but recognitions of it? It underlies the whole book: and they sing (why present? Is it because the sound still lingered in his ears? Or more probably, as describing their special and glorious office generally, rather than the mere one particular case of its exercise?) a new song (new, because the occasion was new; the manifestation of the worthiness of the Lamb calls forth fresh words springing from fresh and living thoughts. These words which follow could not be spoken except by those who had seen Christ's redemption complete; therefore they must needs be new), saying, Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals of it: for Thou wert slain, and didst redeem (the object is not expressed, nor need it be: see similar constructions with ἐκ, Matt. xxv. 8; 1 John iv. 13. The ἡμᾶς, which is in the mss. added or prefixed to the verb, has considerable authority, but on the whole seems more likely to have been inserted, considering the prevalent early interpretation of the elders as Apostles and Prophets, than omitted because they were imagined to be angels) to God through (ἐν, as the vehicle, and conditioning element of redemption) thy blood out of every tribe and tongue and people and nation (the only thing to be noticed is the quadruple number of these specifications, as indicating universality: see again below, ver. 13. To identify φυλῆς as Bengel, or λαοῦ as Züllig, with the Jewish people, seems forbidden by the πάσης), and madest them a kingdom and priests, and they reign upon the earth ("this clause differs from that in ch. i. 6, both by the καί before ἱερεῖς, and by the important addition καὶ βασιλ. κ.τ.λ. with kingly power.' Here we have three particulars: 1) that those who are bought to be God's own are made into a kingdom, viz. God's,—2) (καί) that they are made into priests,—3) (καί) that they are invested with kingly power. So rightly Ebrard." Düsterd. The present βασιλευουσιν is not to be rendered as a future, but keeps its own meaning (the whole aspect and reference of this heavenly vision being not future, but present: the world and church as now existing, cf. Eph. ii. 6). The Church even now, in Christ her Head, reigns on the earth: all things are being put under her feet, as under His: and even if this meaning be questioned, we have her kingly rank and office asserted in the present, even in the midst of persecution and contempt). 11, 12.] The as-senting chorus of the host of angels. And I saw (εἶδον, not in a general vague sense, introducing a fresh particular merely; but in its proper sense: John saw the host of angels whose voice he heard: cf. ch. vi. 1 f. The gloss. ord. refers εἶδον to what has preceded: but this is contrary to St. Johu's usage), and I heard [as it were] a (or, the: φωνή, like many other substantives in regimen with their possessive genitives, being definite though anar-throus) voice of many angels around the throne and the living-beings and the elders (i. e. surrounding on all sides, in the more distant space, the smaller circle hitherto described. The Church, as the vehicle of the work of Redemption, of which Creation is but a part, is the central and crowning manifestation of God's power and love and wisdom. Round it, and Him who is its Head, the heavenly hosts are ranged in humble admiration; and into its wonders they desire to look. Cf. Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 12); and the number of them was myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands (i. e. innumerable in its vastness. See Ps. lxxviii. 18, and ref. Dan., where χιλιαι χιλιάδες comes before μύριαι μυριάδες: but it is of very little import whether the specification is by way of climax or of anti-climax, the same idea being conveyed), saying (the appositional nom. instead of the gen.: as in ch. iv. 1) with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb which hath been slain to receive (by way of ascribed praise: cf. ch. iv. 11 and note) the power and riches and wisdom and might and honour and glory and blessing (here, as in ch. vii. 12, but in differing order, we have seven particulars of ascription. But here there is a difference both from ch. vii. 12 and iv. 11. In each of those places the art. is repeated before each particular: here, one article includes them all. Bengel well remarks, that we must regard them all as if they formed but one word. And when they are thus regarded, the article seems to point out the fact of all these, as one, belonging to God, whose power and glory the Lamb is declared worthy to share. Of the particulars themselves, πλοῦτος is better kept in its generality, all riches and fulness, than limited, as by De W., to spiritual riches; see 1 Chron. xxix. 11: εὐλογία is blessing, in the sense so frequent when the word and its cognate verb are used of an act passing from man to God: viz. that of ascribed praise; the will on the part of the creature, though unaccompanied by the power, to return blessing for blessing conferred. The idea of Bengel, that the septenary number has to do with the seven seals, is hardly probable: the number, as indicating completeness, running through the whole book). 13, 14.] The chorus of assenting praise from Creation itself.

And every creature (i. e. by the very terms, animated creature: for heaven and earth and sea themselves are mentioned as the abodes of these κτίσματα) which is in the heaven (the chorus being universal, this will include the angels, previously mentioned, and the glorified saints) and on the earth and under the earth (i. e. not the devils, as even Vitringa: but as in Phil. ii. 10, the departed spirits in Hades: see note there), and upon the sea (i. e. most probably, on the surface of the sea; meaning not those on ships, but those sea-animals which are regarded as being on the surface), and all the things in them (so in Exod. xx. 11. The clause added seems to serve the purpose of complete enumeration, applying here to γῆ and θάλασσα only, as ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ has occurred already. The ἐπί and ὑποκάτω being both superficial, ἐν completes the list—in the depths of the earth and the sea: cf. ch. viii. 9) I heard saying (the gender again is that of the things signified, not that of κτίσμα: see ch. iv. 8), To Him that sitteth upon the throne (for the various cases after καθημ. ἐπί, see note, ch. iv. 2) and to the Lamb (the Church, including Creation, gives praise to the Lamb for Redemption, vv. 9, 10: the angels praise the infinite condescension of the Son of God: the entire universe celebrates the glory of the universal Father and of the Redeemer, thence accruing) (be (or, is, belongs)) the blessing and the honour and the glory and the might (notice the fourfold arrangement where universality is set forth: and the repeated article, exhaustive of each predicate separately. It is fanciful, with Bengel, to allot the four ascriptions among the four classes of creatures above mentioned. In each case the number has the same signification: but they need not separately correspond) to the ages of the ages. 14.] The solemn assent of the celestial representatives of Creation and of the Church. And the four living-beings said Amen (as above, in ch. iv. 11, the four living-beings assert the worthiness of God to receive the glory and the honour and the power on account of His having created all things, so here they say their Amen to creation's chorus of praise: being themselves the representatives of the animated Creation). And the elders fell down and worshipped (in silent adoration of God and of the Lamb. The inference of Ewald from the rec. text (which is itself here wholly untenable), "presbyteri adoratione repetita Deum prosequuntur, ut a quo auctore omnia progressa sunt et Messias creatus est, ad eum omnis redeat honor, omnis reverentia," would be unwarranted even were that text retained: ζῶντι, anarthrous, would apply to the whole object of praise in ver. 13).

CH. VI. 1—VIII. 1.] THE OPENING OF THE SEVEN SEALS. As preliminary to the exegesis of this section, I may observe that it is of the first importance to bear in mind, that the openings of these seals correspond to the various arrangements of God's Providence by which the way is prepared for the final opening of the closed book of His purposes to His glorified Church. That opening shall not fully and freely be made, till His people will know even as they are known. And that will not be, till they are fully gathered in to His heavenly garner. This book the Lamb opens, containing as it does matters which οὐδεὶς ἵδεν, οὐδὲ ἄγγελος ἐν οὐρανῷ, οὐδὲ ὁ υἱός, first by the acts and procedures of His establishment of His reign over the earth, and then finally by His great second coming, the necessary condition of His elect being gathered out of the four winds into His glory. When these preparations for His coming have taken place, and that coming itself has passed, and the elect are gathered into glory, then will be the time when the last hindrance to our perfect knowledge will be removed, and the book of God's eternal purposes will lie open—the theme of eternity's praise.

I may add that for the sake of per-spicuity, I shall mainly follow, in these notes, the track of that interpretation which seems to me to be required; noticing only differences in those of other Commentators where grammar and philology are concerned.

1—8.] THE OPENING OF THE FIRST FOUR SEALS, marked by the ministration of the four living-beings. 1, 2.] And I saw when the Lamb opened one from among the seven seals, and I heard one from among the four living-beings saying, as the voice (a pendent nominative; the regular construction would be dative) of thunder (which is to be taken not as peculiarly belonging to this first as resembling a lion, but as belonging to all alike, and accounted for by their mysterious and exalted nature: cf. ch. i. 10, x. 3), Come (to whom, and with what meaning is this ἔρχου spoken? The great majority of Commentators have taken the rec. reading, which fixes it by adding και βλεπε, as an address to the Seer, to approach nearer and look at the coming vision. And even those who have rejected this addition have yet regarded it as a true gloss, and the "Come" as addressed to the Seer. But whither was he to come? Separated as he was by the glassy sea from the throne, was he to cross it? And where shall we find the simple verb ερχεσθαι used absolutely in such a sense, "Draw near," without ᾗδε or some such particle? Compare also the place where the Seer is to go and take the little book (ch. x. 8), and see how different is the whole form of expression. In interpreting so unusual a term of address, surely we should rather begin by enquiring whether we have not the key to it in the book itself. And in this enquiry, are we justified in leaving out of consideration such a verse as ch. xxii. 17, τὸ πνεῦμα καὶ ἡ νύμφη λέγουσιν Ἔρχου· καὶ ὁ ἀκούων εἰπάτω Ἔρχου, and the following ἀμὴν ἔρχου, κύριε Ἰησοῦ, ib. ver. 20? This seems to torious power, the embodiment of His advancing kingdom as regards that side of its progress where it breaks down earthly power, and makes the kingdom of the world to be the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ. Further it would not be wise, nor indeed according to the analogy of these visions, to specify. In all cases but the last, these riders are left in the vagueness of their symbolic offices. If we attempt in this case to specify further, e. g. as Victorinus, "Equus albus verbum est prædicationis cum Spiritu sancto missum in orbem. Ait enim Dominus, Prædicabitur hoc Evangelium per totum orbem terrarum in testimonium coram gentibus, et tunc veniet finis,"—while we are sure that we are thus far right, we are but partially right: we do not cover the extent of the symbol, seeing that there are other aspects and instruments of victory of the kingdom of Christ, besides the preaching of the Word. The same might be said of any other of the partial interpretations which have been given by those who have taken this view. And it was taken, with divergences of separate detail, by all expositors from the earliest times down to the year 1500).

3, 4.] And when he opened the second seal, I heard the second living-being saying, Come (see above on ver. 1). And there came forth another horse, red (the colour of blood: so 4 Kings iii. 22, ὕδατα πυρρὰ ὡς αἷμα. The colour of the horse in each case has reference to the employment of the rider. Tertullian, de Spectaculis, 9, vol. i. p. 641, says: "russeum . . Marti . . consecraverunt"), and to him that sat upon him it was given (to him) to take away peace (τὴν εἰρ. not, as Elliott, "the peace left by the former seal," for 1) the former seal neither implies nor leaves such peace, and 2) these four seals are strictly correlative, not consecutive on one another: but, peace in its entirety, the τὴν distributing, as the logicians say, the substantive. See for εἰρήνη without the art., Matt. x. 34 (peace, at all: any peace): Luke ii. 14 (peace, in each particular case, under every circumstance), &c.: with the art., Rom. xiv. 19, τὰ τῆς εἰρ. διώκωμεν: xv. 33, al., ὁ θεὸς τῆς εἰρήνης: Eph. ii. 14, αὐτὸς ἐστὶν ἡ εἰρήνη ἡμῶν, &c.) out of the earth (generally, as ever: not, Judæa, nor the Roman "orbis terrarum," nor any special portion merely) and that they (men: the inhabitants of the earth) shall kill (the pregnant future after ἵνα not only imports the result of purpose, but includes also matter of fact, "that they may . . . which they also shall," see Winer (edn. 6, § 41 ὁ. 1. b), who however interprets it as expressing duration (?), whereas the aor. denotes rapid transition) one another: and there was given to him a great sword (the key to the interpretation of this seal is to be found in Matt. x. 34, μὴ νομίσητε ὅτι ἦλθον βαλεῖν εἰρήνην ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν· οὐκ ἦλθον βαλεῖν εἰρήνην ἀλλὰ μάχαιραν: see also Luke xii. 51. It represents to us the taking away of peace from the earth, the slaying one another, the reign of the sword, as one of the destined concomitants of the growing and conquering power of Christ, and one of the world-long and world-wide preparations for His coming. Observe, all limitations of this meaning are wrong: whether to the persecutions of the Christians, or to any period of time, ancient or modern. The above was the most ancient interpretation; e. g. we have in Victorinus, "Equus roseus et qui sedebat super eum habens gladium, bella sunt significata fu-

5, 6.] And when he opened the third seal, I heard the third living-being saying, Come (see above on ver. 1). And I saw, and behold a black horse (the colour is indicative of the mournful nature of the employment of the rider: see below), and he that sat on him having a balance (the symbol of scarcity, during which the bread is doled out by weight: see Ezek. iv. 16, φάγονται ἄρτον ἐν σταθμῷ καὶ ἐν ἐνδείᾳ: and Levit. xxvi. 26, ἀποδώσουσι τοὺς ἄρτους ὑμῶν ἐν σταθμῷ, καὶ φάγεσθε καὶ οὐ μὴ ἐμπλησθῆτε. Some, as e. g. Woodhouse, have defended the meaning "yoke" for ζυγόν. But surely the question is here decided for us by ref. Ezek., ζυγὸς δίκαιος, καὶ μέτρον δίκαιον, καὶ χοῖνιξ δίκαια ἔσται ὑμῖν τοῦ μέτρον: where the same words occur in juxtaposition. The assertion of Mr. Barker, in his strictures on Elliott's Horæ Ap., that ζυγός in the sense of balance absolutely is very rare, is sufficiently answered by the proverb ἀκριβέστερος ζυγοῦ: by Diog. Laert. viii. 18, where he records of Pythagoras the maxim ζυγὸν μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν, τουτέστι, τὸ ἴσον καὶ δίκαιον μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν. When a word can be thus used figuratively in common sayings, its literal sense cannot be so very rare. Cf. also the Etymologicon in Wetstein, ζυγὸς εἰρηται καὶ τὸ λεγόμενον ὑπὸ τῶν ποιητῶν τάλαντον ἡγοῦν ἢ τρυτάνη: and his citations from Sextus Empir. and Demosthenes) in his hand. And I heard as it were (ὡs must apparently be taken with the whole clause—"something like (a voice in the midst of the four living-beings)," the uncertainly applying to the situation, not to its being a voice, which it was) a voice in the midst of the four living-beings (it is not specified, whose voice: but the point from which the voice comes is appropriate to its intent, which is to mitigate the woes of creation, represented by the four living-beings: see below), saying (Let there be) A chœnix of wheat for a denarius (gen. of price, see Winer, edn. 6, § 30. 10 end), and three chœnixes of barley for a denarius (the sense seems to be, Take care that there be thus much food for thus much price. The denarius was the ordinary soldier's pay for a day in the time of Tiberius (see note on Matt. xx. 2), and has been usually and not unfairly assumed to be twice mentioned here as representing a day's wages. The chœnix appears in like manner to be taken for a day's provision: for so it is used in several of the numerous places cited by Wetst.: e. g. Herod. vii. 187, who, in estimating the amount of food consumed by the army of Xerxes, assumes this: εὐρίσκω γὰρ συμβαλλεόμενος, εἰ χοίνικα πυρῶν ἕκαστος τῆς ἡμέρας ἐλάμβανε καὶ μηδὲν πλέον: Thuc. iv. 16, speaking of the allowance made to the Lacedæmonians in Sphacteria while negotiations were going on,—σίτον . . . δύο χοίνικας ἑκάστῳ Ἀττικὰς ἀλφίτων, καὶ δύο κοτύλας: Athen. x. 452 E, μὴ καθῆσθαι ἐπὶ χοίνικα, ἀντὶ τοῦ μὴ σκοπεῖν τὰ ἐφ' ἡμέρας, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἐπιούσαν ἀεὶ προσδέχεσθαι: Diog. Laert. Pythag. viii. 18, and Suidas under Pythagoras, ἐπὶ χοίνικος μὴ καθίξεν, ἐν ἴσῳ τοῦ ἐνεστώτος φροντίδα ποιέσθαι καὶ τοῦ μέλλοντος ἢ γὰρ χοίνιξ ἡμερήσιος τροφή. Nothing can be more decisive than such proverbial usage. The tendency of the voice is then to check or limit the agency of the rider on the black horse, and to provide that notwithstanding his errand sustenance shall not utterly fail. With regard to the three choenixes of barley, the cheaper and less profitable grain, it seems to have been rightly interpreted as taking in the other case, of the workman who, out of his denarius a day, has to maintain not himself only, but his family also, and cannot consequently afford the dearer wheaten bread); and the oil and the wine do not thou injure (not, as Heinr. and recently Elliott, "do thou not commit injustice in the matter of the oil and the wine." The usage of this book should have prevented such an interpretation: for ἀδικεῖν with the accus. of the material object hurt or injured is the constant habit of our Writer, see reff.: and in no case do we find the other construction used by him, or indeed by any other writer to my knowledge, except with such general adverbial accusatives as τι and οὐδέν, e. g. Gal. iv. 12; Philem. 18. This statement of the usage of ἀδικεῖν in this Book and in Greek literature, Mr. Elliott, more suo, calls a "vain dictum:" and adds, "In the three Apocalyptic examples of the thing injured, occurring in connexion with the verb ἀδικεῖν in the active sense of injury, the accusative follows the verb: vii. 2, 3, ix. 4." It did not suit his purpose to cite xi. 5, αὐτοὺς ἀδικῆσαι, and he therefore appears to introduce a distinction (of course untenable) between the person and thing injured. But this whole matter of the position of the accusative has to do with the emphasis only, and not with the construction at all. Not one of the examples which he cites in his note is to the point: in that from Xenophon, Cyrop. iv. 5. 42, τὴν δ' ἀγορὰν τὴν οὖσαν ἐν τῷ στρατοπέδῳ κηρυξάτω μὲν ἦδον, ἔφη, μὴ ἀδικεῖν μηδένα, πωλεῖν δὲ τοὺς καπήλους βῆτι ἔχει ἕκαστος πράσιμον... the pendent accusative being evidently prefixed to the whole subsequent enactment, not connected with the first verb in it only. Rinck gives another meaning, equally untenable, "waste not the oil and the wine," seeing they are so costly.

As regards the meaning, the spirit of the saying is as explained above: the rider on the black horse symbolizing Famine, is limited in his desolating action by the command given, that enough is to be reserved for sustenance. Wheat, barley, oil, and wine, formed the ordinary sources of nourishment: cf. Ps. civ. 14, 15. So that as regards its intent, the command is parallel with that saying of our Lord in Matt. xxiv. 22: καὶ εἰ μὴ ἐκολοβώθησαν αἱ ἡμέραι ἐκεῖναι, οὐκ ἂν ἐσώθη πᾶσα σὰρξ· διὰ δὲ τοὺς ἐκλεκτοὺς κολοβώθησονται αἱ ἡμέραι ἐκεῖναι. It is the mercy of God, tempering His judgments. And in its general interpretation, as the opening of the first seal revealed the certain proceeding on to victory of Christ and His church, and the second, that His coming should be prepared in the world not by peace but by the sword, so now by this third we learn that Famine, the pressure of want on men, not sweeping them away by utter failure of the means of subsistence, but keeping them far below the ordinary standard of comfort, and especially those who depend on their daily labour, will be one of the four judgments by which the way of the Lord's coming will be opened. This seems to point, not so much to death by famine, which belongs to the next vision, as to agrarian distress with all its dreadful consequences: ripening in some cases (see below) into the hunger-death, properly the consequence of Famine.

The above interpretation of the third seal is given in the main by Victorinus—"Equus niger autem famem significat; ait enim Dominus: Erunt fames per loca:" but he allegorizes the latter part of the vision: "vinum et oleum ne læseris, id est, hominem spiritualement ne plagis percusseris").

7, 8.] And when he opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth living-being saying, Come (see above on ver. 1). And I saw, and behold a livid horse (χλωρός, originally and properly grass-green, when used of flesh implies that greenish pallor which we know as livid: the colour of the corpse in incipient decay, or of the complexion extremely pale through disease. Thus Thucyd. in describing the symptoms of the plague at Athens, says that the body was οὐκ ἄγαν θερμόν, οὔτε χλωρόν, ἀλλ' ὑπέρουθρον.

Callistratus, as quoted in Wetst. says, ἡ μὲν γὰρ χεῖρ ὑπὸ τοῦ φόβου χλωρόν τε καὶ τεθηγκὸς ὀρώσα. Hippocrates, ibid. says of the colour, μελάντερόν ἐστι τοῦ ἐρυθροῦ, καὶ οἶον ἀρχὴ τις τοῦ μελαινέσθαι καὶ πελιδνούσθαι. And again, in describing the symptoms of approaching death,—ὅτις ὀξεία, ὀφθαλμοὶ κοιλοί, . . . καὶ τὸ χρώμα τοῦ ξύμπαντος προσώπου χλωρόν τε καὶ μέλαν ἐν . . . σημαίνει θανάτωδες. See also Wetst.'s other quotations), and he that sat upon him (ἐπάνω αὐτοῦ, lit. on the top of him: in the three other cases, ἐπ' αὐτόν. The nominative is pendent, see ch. iii. 12, 21) his name was Death (i. e. he was death personified. In this case only of the four is the explanation given. It is wrong to understand Pestilence by this θάνατος: see below), and Hades (the impersonation of the place of the departed: see ch. i. 18, xx. 14, where as here θανάτου καὶ ἄδου go together. Eichhorn and Ebrard understand it of the whole multitude of the departed: but this clearly is beside the purpose: personification being the prevailing character of these four riders) was following with him (in his train: ready to engulf and detain his victims), and there was given to them (Death and Hades, considered as joint partners in the baleful work) power over the fourth part of the earth (ἐπὶ with accus., as extending over, spreading over, τὸ τέταρτον τῆς γῆς, perhaps owing to the fourfold division of these former seals: not implying thereby that this last rider divided the earth with the three former, but thus specifying his portion as being one of four. At all events this suggests itself here as a possible reference of the number four: whereas in ch. viii.

the continually recurring τὸ τρίτον has no such assignable solution. The expositors for the most part pass it over, merely as signifying a considerable portion. Elliott, with whose historical interpretation it will not square, takes refuge in the reading of the vulg., "super quatuor partes terræ"), to kill with (the ἐν of investiture, expressing the element or vehicle in which the action transpires) sword and with famine and with death (i. e. here, pestilence: see below), and by (ὑπο, seeing that the other three were rather general indications of the manner in which, but this last of the actual agent by whose administration. Wetst. gives examples of ἀποθανεῖν, τελευτᾶν, ὑπο, but the construction with an active verb is not common. See Matthiæ, § 592, who gives, besides ref., Eurip. Alcest. 753, εἰ δὲ ἀπειπεῖν χρῆν με κηρύκων ὑπο τὴν σὴν πατρῶαν ἐστίαν,—Plato, Phileb. p. 320, ὑπὸ ἀγγέλων φράζειν,—and Thuc. vi. 32, ὑπὸ κήρυκος εὐχὰς ποιέσθαι. It is singular that these examples should all belong to the same description of employment of agents) the wild beasts of the earth (the enumeration comprehends the "four sore judgments" enumerated in Ezek. xiv. 21, and in the same terms: τὰς τέσσαρας ἐκδικήσεις μου τὰς πονηράς, ῥομφαίαν καὶ λιμὸν καὶ θηρία πονηρὰ καὶ θάνατον. This fixes the meaning of this second and subordinate θανάτω as above. This seal also is interpreted as above by the earliest Commentators: e. g. Victorinus: "Hæc eadem quoque inter cæteras clades præmiserat Dominus, venturas pestes magnas et mortalitates." But as on the third seal, so here also, he goes off into vague allegory about the latter part of the vision).

We have now passed the four first seals, after which the character of the vision changes. One feature common to these four is, Personification: the representation of processions of events by the impersonation of their leading features. Another is, the share which the four living-creatures bear in the representation, which after this point ceases, as far as the seals are concerned. No interpretation can be right, which does not take both these common features into account. And in my view this may best be done by viewing, as above, these four visions as the four solemn preparations for the coming of the Lord as regards the visible Creation, which these four living-beings symbolize. The whole Creation demands His coming. Ἐρχου, is the cry of all its tribes. This cry is answered, first by the vision of the great Conqueror, whose arrows are in the heart of his enemies, and whose career is the world's history. The breaking of this first seal is the great opening of the mystery of God. This in some sense includes and brings in the others. Those others then, as we might expect, hold a place subordinate to this. They are, in fact, but exponents of the mysteries enwrapt within this conquering career: visions of the method of its being carried out to the end in its operation on the outward world. That the world-wide declaration of the everlasting Gospel should be accompanied by war, by famine, by pestilence, and other forms of death, had been announced by our Lord Himself (Matt. xxiv. 7), and is now repeated in this series of visions. The fulfilment of each of these judgments is, as it were, the removing a seal from the book of God's mysterious purposes: the bringing nearer of the time when that book shall be open for all the redeemed to read.

With regard to the question whether these four visions are to be regarded as consecutive or contemporaneous, I have already expressed an opinion. In their fulness, I believe them to be contemporaneous, and each of them to extend through the whole lifetime of the church. The analogy of the whole four symbols seems to require this. We read nothing implying that there are "days" of the opening of any particular seal, as there are, ch. x. 7, of the sounding of the several trumpets. The ἴνα νικῆσῃ of the first seal speaks of a purpose which will not be accomplished till the earth be all subjugated: and if I am right in supposing the other visions subordinate to this, their agency is necessarily included in its process. At the same time I would by no means deny that they may receive continually recurring, or even ultimate fulfilments, as the ages of the world go on, in distinct periods of time, and by distinctly assignable events. So far we may derive benefit from the Commentaries of those who imagine that they have discovered their fulfilment in successive periods of history, that, from the very variety and discrepancy of the periods assigned by them, we may verify the fact of the prevalence of these announced judgments, hitherto, throughout the whole lifetime of the Church.

As regards ultimate fulfilment, there can be no doubt, that all these judgments on the world without, as well as the manifestation (of which they form a part) of the conquering career of the Kingdom of Christ, will reach their culminating point before the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord. I may add, that no account whatever is taken, in the common historic interpretation, of the distinctive character of the four first seals, as introduced by the cry of the four living-beings: nor indeed is any interpretation commonly given of that cry itself.

9—11.] OPENING OF THE FIFTH SEAL.

We may at once observe, that the whole character of the vision is altered. The four living-beings have uttered each his cry of ἔρχου, and are now silent. No more horses and riders go forth upon the earth. The scene is changed to the heavenly altar, and the cry is from thence. Any interpretation which makes this vision of the same kind with and consecutive to the four preceding, must so far be wrong. In one point only is the character of the former vision sustained. It is the κατοικούντες ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς who are objects of the judgment invoked: as it was the earth, and its inhabitants, and its produce, which were the objects of the former judgments. See again below on the sixth seal.

9.] And when he opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar (it is an altar of sacrifice which is here meant; ἑσφαγμένων, which follows, seems plainly to imply this: see below) the souls (i. e. departed spirits. It is manifestly idle to enquire, seeing that the Apostle was in a state of spiritual and supernatural vision, how these disembodied spirits became visible to him. That they were not, as Eichhorn, clothed with bodies, is manifest) of those that have been slain on account of the word of God and on account of the testimony which they had (i. e. which was committed to them to bear, and which they bore: see reff., especially ch. xii. 17. The testimony is one borne by them, as most Commentators: not one borne to them by the faithful Witness, as Düsterd. and Ebrard, most unnaturally: for how could the testimony borne to them before the Father by Christ (so Ebr.) be the cause of their being put to death on earth?

Much has been said about the souls of the martyrs not being their departed spirits, which must be conceived of as being in bliss with Christ (cf. Hengstb.), and in consequence it has been imagined that these were only their animal lives, resident in the blood and shed forth with it. But no such difficulty really exists. We know, whatever be the bliss of the departed martyrs and confessors, that they are waiting for the coming of the Lord, without which they are not perfect: and in the holy fire of their purified zeal, they look forward to that day as one of righteous judgment on the ungodly world. The representation here, in which they are seen under the altar, is simply symbolical, carrying out the likening of them to victims slain on an altar. Even as the blood of these victims was poured under the altar and the life was in the blood, so their souls are represented as under the symbolical altar in heaven, crying for vengeance, as blood is often said to do. After this, it hardly need be said that no inference can be drawn from this vision respecting the intermediate state between the death of the saints and the coming of the Lord): and they cried with a great voice, saying (viz. αι ψυχαί, which are identified in the sentence with the persons themselves: not, as Ebr. and Düsterd. the ἑσφαγμένοι as distinguished from the ψυχαί) Until when (i. e. how long: see reff.), thou Master (δεσπότης is the correlative of δούλος, cf. σύνδουλοι below, ver. 11, and see ch. i. 1; Luke ii. 29; 1 Tim. vi. 1. It is God who is here addressed; with Him rests the time when to avenge His elect, cf. Luke xviii. 7, 8) holy and true (see on ch. iii. 7, for the sense of ἀληθινός in such connexion: here it is too evidently intended of subjective truthfulness for the other meaning even to be brought into question: and it is wonderful that Düsterd. should have insisted on it, "der Herr, welcher in Wahrheit diesen Namen verdient." For the voc. expressed by the nom. with the art., see reff., and Winer, edn. 6, § 29. 2), dost thou not judge (give decision in the matter of; with ἐκ, see reff.) and exact vengeance for our blood from (reff.: απο is found in Luke xviii. 3) them that dwell upon the earth (i. e. the ungodly world, as distinguished from the church of God)?

As hitherto, so here again, the analogy and order of our Lord's great prophecy in Matt. xxiv. 11 is closely followed. "The signs of His coming, and of the end of the world" were there announced by Himself as war, famine, and pestilence, vv. 6, 7. And when He had declared that these were but the beginning of sorrows (ἠδίνων), He next, vv. 9 f., announces the persecution and martyrdom of His people. Similarly here, after the judgments already announced, we have the prayer for vengeance on the part of the martyrs, and the announcement of more such martyrdoms to come. And as our Lord's prophecies received a partial fulfilment in the events preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, and may have done so again and again since, but await their great and final fulfilment when the day of His coming approaches, so it is with these. The cry of the martyrs' blood has been ever going up before God since Stephen fell: ever and anon, at some great time of persecution, it has waxed louder: and so on through the ages it shall accumulate and gather strength, till the great issue of the parable Luke xviii. 1 ff. is accomplished. And there was given to them [each] a white robe (there will be no real difficulty in understanding this, if we are careful to mark its real place and interpret it accordingly. The white robe, in this book, is the vestment of acknowledged and glorified righteousness in which the saints walk and reign with Christ: cf. ch. iii. 4; vii. 13 ff., al. This was given to the martyrs: but their prayer for vengeance was not yet granted. The Seer saw in vision that this was so. The white robe was not actually bestowed as some additional boon, but seemed in vision to be thus bestowed, because in that vision one side only of the martyrs' intermediate state had been presented, viz. the fact of their slaughter and their collective cry for vengeance. Now, as over against that, the other more glorious side is presented, viz. that though the collective cry for vengeance is not yet answered, yet individually they are blessed in glory with Christ, and waiting for their fellows to be fully complete), and it was said to them that they should rest (not merely, abstain from their cry for vengeance, be quiet (so De W., al.):—but rest in blessedness, see ch. xiv. 13, and ref. Daniel) yet a little while until (construction, see reff.) their fellow-servants (see above on δεσπότης) also and their brethren (the καὶ . . . καὶ may be taken as “both . . . and,” in which case two different sets of persons are indicated by the σύνδουλοι and the ἀδελφοί, which distinction it would not be easy to give an account of. So that I prefer regarding the first καὶ as “also,” “as well as themselves,” and the two substantives as describing (notwithstanding the repetition of the οἱ before ἀδελφοί) the same persons; those who are οἱ σύνδουλοι αὐτῶν and οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτῶν: the former term reminding them of the necessity of completeness as far as the service of their one Master is concerned: the latter, as far as they belong to one and the same great family) shall have accomplished (scil. “their course.” Considering that this absolute use of πληροῦν without an object following is an ἄπαξ λεγόμενον, it is strange that Ebr. and Düsterd. should designate πληρώσωσιν as an explanatory reading for πληρωθῶσιν. If this latter be read, then we must render, shall have been completed (in number); a meaning found Luke xxi. 24; Acts vii. 23, 30, ix. 23, xxiv. 27: cf. also Col. ii. 10, which suggests another reason for altering to -θῶσιν), who are about to be slain as also they were.

12—VII. 17.] OPENING OF THE SIXTH SEAL, AND ITS ATTENDANT VISIONS. And herein (12—17) Immediate approach of the great day of the Lord, Matt. xxiv. 29 ||: (vii. 1—8) gathering of the elect out of the four winds, Matt. xxiv. 31: (vii. 9—17) vision of the whole glorified church, Matt. xxv.

The interpretation of this sixth seal is a crucial point in Apocalyptic exegesis. We may unhesitatingly set down all interpretations as wrong, which view as the fulfilment of this passage any period except that of the coming of the Lord. See the grounds of this below. And I saw when he opened the sixth seal, and a great earthquake took place (we have no word but "earthquake" for σεισμός, but it does not by any means cover the meaning. For here the heavens are shaken (against Dürsterd.), and the sea, and the dry land. See Hag. ii. 6, 7, and the comment in Heb. xii. 26 f. Compare also Zech. xiv. 4, 5), and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair (see ref. Isa. The cloth meant is the cilicium: see note on Acts xviii. 3. This answers to Matt. xxiv. 29,—εὐθὺς δὲ μετὰ τὴν θλίψιν τῶν ἡμερῶν ἐκείνων ὁ ἥλιος σκοτισθήσεται . . . , and to ὁ ἥλιος μεταστραφήσεται εἰς σκότος, in Joel ii. 31), and the whole moon (i. e.

not the moon in her crescent or her incomplete form, but entire; as we say, the full moon) became as blood (so Matt. l. c., καὶ ἡ σελήνη οὐ δώσει τὸ φέγγος αὐτῆς; and Joel ii. 31, καὶ ἡ σελήνη εἰς αἷμα, πρὶν ἔλθουν τὴν ἡμέραν κυρίου τὴν μεγάλην καὶ ἐπιφανῆ), and the stars of the heaven fell to the earth (so Matt. l. c., καὶ οἱ ἀστέρες πεσοῦνται ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ), as a fig-tree casteth her unripe figs (ὄλυνθος, τὸ μὴ πεπαμμένον σῖκος, Hesych. De W. explains it to mean, the winter figs, which almost always fall off unripe) when shaken by a great wind (so Matt. again, l. c., καὶ αἱ δυνάμεις τῶν οὐρανῶν σαλευθήσονται. It is remarkable, that in Matt., when the description has finished, the next words are ἀπὸ τῆς συκῆς μάθετε τὴν παραβολήν. The similitude from the fig-tree, though a different one, rises to the mind of the Apostle as he sees in vision the fulfilment of his Master's words which were so shortly followed by a similar illustration. The imagery itself, as that in the beginning of the next verse, is from Isa. xxxiv. 4). And the heaven parted asunder as a scroll when rolled up (the stars having fallen from it, the firmament itself was removed away, as an open scroll which is rolled up and put by. So also almost verbatim, approach, and those terrible signs with which all Scripture ushers it in, have taken place. We are now then arrived at the time described in Matt. xxiv. 30: the coming itself of the Son of man being for a while kept in the background, as hereafter to be resumed. He is seen as it were coming; but before the vengeance is fully accomplished, the elect of God then living on the earth must be gathered, as Matt. xxiv. 31, out of the four winds of heaven, from among the inhabitants of the earth. To this ingathering the sealing in our text is the necessary preliminary. The correspondence between the series of prophecies holds even in the minutest particulars, and where they do not correspond, their very differences are full of instruction. See these pointed out as we proceed.

CH. VII. 1—8.] The sealing of the Elect. [And] after this (these words, μετὰ τοῦτο, shew that the opening of the sixth seal is complete, and that what is now to follow, —viz. the two visions each introduced with similar words, μετὰ τοῦτο (ταῦτα) εἶδον,—comes in by way of episode. They represent two great events, the sealing of the elect on earth, and the great final assemblage of the saints in heaven. The great day of the Lord's judgment is not described; it is all but brought before us under the sixth seal, and is actually going on in the first of these episodes (see below): but only that part of it which regards the saints appears to us, and that only by its result—their gathering in to heaven) I saw four angels (not, as many interpreters, bad angels; nor does it necessarily follow that we are to adopt the analogy of ch. xvi. 5 and to regard them as “angels of the winds:” but simply angels, to whom this office is committed. This is all that is declared to us in the text, and it is idle to enquire beyond it. All allegorizing and all individualizing interpretations are out of the question) standing upon the four corners (ἐπὶ with accus. at the first appearance, as indicating the coming into that position, “sensu prægnanti;” see on ch. iv. 2) of the earth (i. e. North, South, East, and West, the cardinal points from which the winds blow) holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind may not blow on the earth nor on the sea, nor against any (or a, i. e. any) tree (the three disjunctives, μήτε, merely couple, without any climax), and I saw another angel (as before, simply an angel; not as has been fancied, our Lord, nor the Holy Spirit; cf. τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν below) coming up from the rising of the sun (ἀναβαίνοντα, because the rising of the sun is low on the earth's horizon, whereas the Apostle was in heaven, looking down on the earth: and ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς ἡλίου, as naturally agreeing with the glorious and salutary nature of his employment. Cf. Ezek. xliii. 2; Mal. iv. 2. The allegorical interpretations which have been given are entirely uncountenanced in the text), having the seal (σφραγίδα, though anarthrous, is defined by the possessive gen. following) of the living God (ζῶντος, as giving to the seal solemnity and vital import): and he cried with a great voice to the four angels to whom it was given (reff.) to injure (viz. by letting loose the winds, which they as yet held in) the earth and the sea, saying, Do not ye injure the earth nor the sea nor the trees, until we (not I: see Matt. xxiv. 31, cited below) shall have sealed the servants of our God (the God alike of the speaker and of those addressed) upon their foreheads (the noblest, as well as the most conspicuous part of the human frame).

This vision stands in the closest analogy with Matt. xxiv. 31, where immediately after the appearing of the sign of the Son of man and the mourning of the tribes of the earth, we read και αποστειλει τους αγγελους αυτου μετα σάλπιγγος φωνῆς μεγάλης, και επισυναξουσιν τους εκλεκτους αυτου εκ των τεσσαρων ανεμων, απ' ακρων ουρανων εως ακρων αυτων. The judgment of the great day is in fact going on in the background; but in this first and general summary of the divine judgments and dealings, in which the signs of Creation and of the Church for Christ's coming are set before us, only that portion of its proceedings is described which has reference to these two. When the strain is again taken up, the case and reference are different.

The questions now arise, 1) who are these that are sealed? and 2) what is the intent of their being sealed? 1) Those who have followed the preceding course of interpretation will have no difficulty in anticipating the reply. They are, primarily, those elect of God who shall be living upon earth at the time here indicated, viz. that of the coming of the Lord: those indicated in Matt. xxiv. 31, above cited. (On the import and reason of the use of Israel and its tribes, I shall speak below.) As such, they are not identical with, but are included in, the great multitude which no man can number of ver. 9 ff. But they are also symbolical of the first-fruits of the Church: see notes on ch. xiv. 1 ff.

ber is symbolical of fixedness and full completion, 12 × 12, taken a thousand fold. No one that I am aware of has taken it literally, and supposed that just this particular number and no more is imported. The import for us is that the Lord knoweth and sealeth His own: that the fulness of their number shall be accomplished and not one shall fail: and, from what follows, that the least as well as the greatest of the portions of his Church, shall furnish its quota to this blessed company: see more below) from every tribe (i. e. from the sum of the tribes; from every tribe, all being taken together. This is evident from what follows. For this accumulative sense of pās with an anarthrous substantive, see reff. and Winer, edn. 6, § 18. 4) of the sons of Israel (this has been variously understood. By many, and even by the most recent Commentator, Düsterdieck, these sealed ones are taken to represent Jewish believers: the chosen out of the actual children of Israel. I need hardly say that such an interpretation seems to me to be quite inconsistent with the usage of this book. Our rule in such cases must be, to interpret a term, where it may possibly be ambiguous, by the use of the same term, if we can discover any, in a place or places where it is clear and unmistakable. Now in the description of the heavenly Jerusalem, ch. xxi. 9 ff., we have the names τῶν δώδεκα φυλῶν υἰῶν Ἰσραὴλ inscribed on its 12 gates. Can there be any doubt as to the import of those names in that place? Is it not that the city thus inscribed is the dwelling-place of the Israel of God? Or are the upholders of the literal sense here prepared to carry it out there, and to regard these inscribed names as importing that none but the literal descendants of Israel dwelt within? (For observe that such an inference could not be escaped by the fact of the names of the 12 Apostles being inscribed on its foundations: those being individual names, the others collective.) It seems certain, by this expression being again used there "totidem verbis," that the Apostle must here, as there, have intended Israel to be taken not as the Jewish nation, but as the Israel of God. Again, we have a striking indication furnished in ch. iii. 12, who these children of Israel are, and to what city they belong:—ὁ νικῶν . . . γράψω ἐπ' αὐτὸν τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ θεοῦ μου, καὶ τὸ ὄνομα τῆς πόλεως τοῦ θεοῦ μου τῆς καινῆς Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἣ καταβαίνουσα ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ μου, καὶ τὸ ὄνομά μου τὸ καινόν. These words serve to bind together the sealing here, and the vision of the new Jerusalem in ch. xxi. Nor is it any valid objection to this view that the persons calling themselves Jews in ch. ii. 9, iii. 9, have been taken to be actual Jews. There is a wide difference in the circumstances there, as there is also in the appellation itself): out of the tribe of Judah, twelve thousand sealed, &c. &c. The points to be noticed in this enumeration are, 1) that with the exception of Judah being placed first, the order of the tribes does not seem to follow any assignable principle. It may indeed be not without reason, that Reuben, the eldest, next follows Judah, and Benjamin the youngest is placed last, with Joseph his own brother: but beyond this all is uncertainty: as any one will find, who attempts to apply to the order any imaginable rule of arrangement. So far has been generally confessed. "Nul-lus servator ordo, quia omnes in Christo pares," says Grotius. 2) That the tribe of Dan is omitted. This is accounted for by the fathers and ancient interpreters, from the idea (founded on Gen. xlix. 17) that antichrist was to arise from this tribe. So Areth. in Catena,—ἡ τοῦ Δάν φυλὴ τῆς σωτηρίας ἐκβέβληται, ἅτε μαιεύουσα τὸν Ἀντίχριστον, καὶ ὑπ' αὐτοῦ συγκροτου-μένη, καὶ τούτῳ προσανέχουσα, καὶ κἀ-χημα τοῦτον προβαλλομένη καὶ κλέος ἀκλέες καὶ ὀλέθριον: by most Commentators, from the fact, that this tribe was the first to fall into idolatry, see Judg. xviii.: by others (Grot., Ewald, De W., Ebrard, Düsterd., al.), from the fact that this tribe had been long ago as good as extinct.

Grot. quotes for this a Jewish tradition,— "jam olim ea tribus ad unam familiam Hussim reciderat, ut aiunt Hebræi, quæ ipsa familia bellis interisse videtur ante Esdrae tempora." Accordingly we find in 1 Chron. iv. ff. where all Israel are reckoned by genealogies, that this tribe is omitted altogether. This latter seems the more probable account here, seeing that in order to the number 12 being kept, some one of the smaller tribes must be omitted. In Deut. xxxiii., Simeon is omitted. 3) That instead of Ephraim, Joseph is mentioned.
We have a somewhat similar instance in Num. xiii. 11, with this difference, that there it is "of the tribe of Joseph, namely of the tribe of Manasseh." The substitution here has been accounted for by the "untheocratic" recollections connected with the name Ephraim (so e. g. Düsterd.).
But this may well be questioned. In the prophecy of Hosea, where the name so frequently occurs, it designates Israel repentant, as well as Israel backsliding; cf. especially Hos. xiv. 4—8, the recollection of which would admirably fit the spirit of this present passage. I should rather suppose that some practice had arisen which the Apostle adopts, of calling the tribe of Ephraim by this name. 4) That the tribe of Levi is included among the rest, hardly appears to depend on the reason assigned by Bengel, al., that the Levitical ceremonies being now at an end, all are alike priests and have access to

It yet remains to enquire, before passing on to the second vision in this episode, what is the import and intent of the sealing here mentioned. It has been the general view, that it was to exempt those sealed from the judgments which were to come on the unbelieving. And it can hardly be denied, that this view receives strong support from Scripture analogy, e. g. that of Exod. xii. and Ezek. ix., especially the latter, where the exempted ones are marked, as here, on their foreheads. It is also borne out by our ch. ix. 4, where these sealed ones are by implication exempted from the plague of the locusts from the pit. It is again hardly possible to weigh fairly the language used in this place itself, without coming to the same conclusion. The four angels are commanded not to begin their work of destruction, until the sealing has taken place. For what imaginable reason could such a prohibition be uttered, unless those who were to be sealed were to be marked out for some purpose connected with that work? And for what purpose could they be thus marked out, if not for exemption? The objection brought against this view by Düsterd., that so far from being exempt from trials, the saints in glory have come out of great tribulation, is grounded on the mistake of not distinguishing between the trials of the people of God and the judgments on the unbelieving world. In the latter, the saints have no part, as neither had the children of Israel in the plagues of Egypt. And indeed the very symbolism here used, in which the elect are pointed out under the names of the 12 tribes, serves to remind us of this ancient exemption. At the same time, exemption from the coming plagues is not the only object of the sealing. It serves a positive as well as a negative purpose. It appropriates to God those upon whom it has passed. For the seal contains His own Name, cf. ch. iii. 12, xiv. 1. And thus they are not only gathered out of the world, but declared to be ready to be gathered into the city of God. And thus the way is prepared for the next vision in the episode.

9—17.] The great multitude of the redeemed in heaven. The opening of the sixth seal introduced the coming of the Lord. The first vision of the episode revealed the gathering together of the elect from the four winds. But before the seventh and last seal can be opened, and the book of God's purposes be unrolled, not only must all things on this earth be accomplished, but the whole multitude of the redeemed must be gathered in to the joy of their Lord. Then, and not till then, shall we know even as we are known, and read the mystery of God's ways without hindrance. Accordingly, in this sublime vision we are admitted to a sight of the finished state of glory, in which the seventh seal shall be opened. After these things (see above on ver. 1. The term indicates separation from that which went before, and introduces a second and distinct vision in the episode) I saw, and behold a great multitude, which (construction, see reff.) no one could (the past ἐδύνατο represents the classical ἂν δύναιτο: not that the attempt was actually made, but that if made it was sure to fail) number, out of every nation (see ch. v. 9) and (all) tribes and peoples and tongues (observe, that this very specification, of a multitude without number, carries us on past the first or millennial resurrection, indicated in the two former parables of Matt. xxv. (see notes there), and past the final judgment sublimely described at the end of that chapter: οἱ δὲ δίκαιοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον is the point at which our vision takes up that prophecy. We have οἱ δίκαιοι, in their robes of righteousness, made white in the blood of the Lamb, already, vv. 15—17, in the midst of those pleasures for use of ἀπεκρίθη, see reff.) saying to me (the elders symbolizing the Church, one of them fitly stands out as the interpreter of this vision in which the glorified Church is represented), These that are clothed in the white robes, who are they, and whence came they ('ad hoc interrogat, ut doceat,' Bede. The questions are those ordinarily put when we seek for information respecting strangers. Wetst. compares the τίς; πόθεν εἰς ἀνδρῶν; of Homer, and the "Qui genus? unde domo?" of Virgil. Both enquiries are answered in ver. 14)? And I said to him, My Lord (the address is one of deep reverence as to a heavenly being. See the limits of this reverence in ch. xix. 10, xxii. 8, 9), thou knowest (see ref. Ezek., from which the form of expression comes. The σὺ οἶδας must not with Ebrard be forced to mean, "I know well, but thou knowest better:" but must be taken in its simple acceptation, "I know not, but thou dost." And this again need not mean that the Apostle had no thought on the subject, but that he regarded himself as ignorant in comparison with his heavenly interlocutor). And he said to me, These are they that come (not, as E. V., "that came:" nor again must the present be put prominently forward, that are coming, as if the number in the vision were not yet complete: still less is it to be taken as a quasi-future, "that shall come," cf. ἔπλυναν and ἐλεύκαναν below;—but as in the expression δ ἐρχόμενος, the present is merely one of designation. Their description, generically, is, that "they are they that come," &c.) out of the great tribulation (the definite art. ought not to be omitted as in E. V. It is most emphatic: "out of the tribulation, the great one." And in consequence some, e. g. Düsterd., have explained the words of that last great time of trial which is to try the saints before the coming of the Lord. But to limit it to this only, is manifestly out of keeping with the spirit of the vision. I would rather understand it of the whole sum of the trials of the saints of God, viewed by the Elder as now complete, and designated by this emphatic and general name: q. d. "all that tribulation", and they washed their robes (the aor. is that so often used of the course of this life when looked back upon from its yonder side: they did this in that life on earth which is now (in the vision) past and gone by) and made them white (the reff. are full of interest) in the blood of the Lamb (i. e. by that faith in the atoning blood of Christ of which it is said, τῇ πίστει καθάρισας τὰς καρδίας αὐτῶν, Acts xv. 9: and 1 John i. 7, τὸ αἷμα Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ . . . καθαρίζει ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ πάσης ἁμαρτίας. See also Eph. v. 25 —27. Several of the ancient Commentators have misunderstood this: e. g. Areth., —φάμεν ὡς ἐκ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτῶν ἢ ὑπὲρ χριστοῦ ἔκχυσιν πάσης ἀπήλλαξεν αὐτοὺς κηλίδος. τῷ γὰρ οἰκίω αἵματι βαπτισθέντες. λευκοὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ τοιοῦτου λουτροῦ ἀνέβησαν πρὸς τὸν ἑαυτῶν βασιλεῖα χριστόν: and, though differently, Joachim:—"sed cum sancti martyres in sanguine suo baptizati sint, quomodo sanguini Christi ascribitur quod abluti sunt, et non potius proprio sanguini quem pro Christo fuderunt? sed sciendum est, quod postquam empti sumus sanguine Christi, et ejus sacratissimo cruori communicare concessi, etiam sanguis noster sanguis ejus effectus est." Similarly Lyra: "merito dicitur sanguis Agni, quia est sanguis membrorum ejus, in quibus dicit se persecutionem pati." Ansbert ambiguously, "eas in sanguine agni candificant, subaudis, in Christi passionibus habitum mentis exornant." And Ewald has fallen into the same mistake: "sanguine Christi, i. e. cæde quam ob Christi doctrinam, Christi et in hac re exemplar secuti, passi sunt." Observe, we must not separate the two acts, washing and making white, as Hengstb., interpreting the former of the forgiveness of sins, the latter of sanctification: the latter is only the result of the former: they washed them, and by so doing made them white. The act was a life-long one,—the continued purification of the man, body, soul, and spirit, by the application of the blood of Christ in its cleansing power). On this account (because they washed their robes white in Christ's atoning and purifying blood: for nothing that has spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, can stand where they are standing: cf. again Eph. v. 27: none will be there who are not thus washed) they are before the throne of God (in the presence of His throne: seeing Him (Matt. v. 8; 1 Cor. xiii. 12) as He sees them), and they serve Him by day (gen. sing.) and by night ("more nostro loquens æternitatem significat," Bede) in His temple (as His priests, conducting the sweet praises of that heavenly choir, ver. 10, and doing what other high and blessed service He may delight to employ them in): and He that sitteth on the throne shall spread His habitation over them (it is exceedingly difficult to express the sense of these glorious words, in which the fulfilment of the O. T. promises, such as Levit. xxvi. 11; Isa. iv. 5, 6; Ezek. xxxvii. 27, is announced. They give the fact of the dwelling of God among them, united with the fact of His protection being over them, and assuring to them the exemptions next to be mentioned. In the word σκηνώσει are contained a multitude of recollections: of the pillar in the wilderness, of the Shechinah in the holy place, of the tabernacle of witness with all its symbolism. These will all now be realized and superseded by the overshadowing presence of God Himself). They shall not hunger any more, nor yet (the repeated οὐδέ is exclusive, and carries a climax in each clause) thirst any more, neither shall the sun ever light upon them, no, nor any (reff.) heat (as, e. g., δ καύσων, the sirocco, which word is used in Isa. xlix. 10, from whence this whole sentence is taken): because the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne (the ἀνὰ μέσον is somewhat difficult to express in its strict meaning. In ref. Matt., it has the sense of among: in ref. Mark, that of through the midst of: in ref. Isa., of between. It seems to imply at least two things, between or in the midst of which any thing passes, or is situate. And in order to apply this here, we must remember the text and note at ch. v. 6, where we found reason to believe that ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ θρόνου, κ.τ.λ., imported in the middle point in front of the throne. If so, the two points required for ἀνὰ μέσον would be the two extreme ends of the throne to See, besides reff., Exod. xi. 7; Levit. xxvii. 12, 14; Judges xv. 4; 3 Kings v. 12; Ezek. xxii. 26) shall tend them (as a shepherd his flock), and shall guide them to the fountains of the waters of life (cf. ch. xxii. 1. ζωῆς is prefixed for emphasis, as σαρκός in 1 Pet. iii. 21, οὐ σαρκὸς ἀπόθεισι ῥύπου. It is not found in the place of Isaiah, which runs thus: ὁ ἐλεῶν αὐτοὺς παρακαλέσει, καὶ διὰ πηγῶν ὕδατων ἄξει αὐτούς. See Ps. xxiii. 2): and God shall wipe away (see reff.) every tear out of their eyes.

All is now ready for the final disclosure by the Lamb of the book of God's eternal purposes. The coming of the Lord has passed, and the elect are gathered in. Accordingly, THE LAST SEAL IS NOW OPENED, which lets loose the roll.

CH. VIII. 1.] And when (for ὅταν with indic., see reff. Notice, that it occurs in the opening of this seal only, giving it an indefiniteness which does not belong to any of the rest. The touch is so slight as not to be reproducible in another language: but it can hardly be denied that in the Writer's mind it exists) he opened the seventh seal (what sign may we expect to follow? The other six seals have been accompanied each by its appropriate vision. Since the opening of the last one, followed as it was by the portents and terrors of the day of the Lord, there has been an episodal series of visions, setting forth the gathering in of the elect, and the innumerable multitude of the glorified Church. What incident is appropriate for the removal of this last, the only obstacle yet remaining to the entire disclosure of the secret purposes of God?) there was (there became, there came on, supervened, from a state very different, viz. the choral songs of the great multitude, re-echoed by the angelic host) silence in the heaven about (see reff. There is no ellipsis in the ὥς: the duration is contained in the ἡμίωρον) half an hour (in enquiring into the meaning of this silence, let us first see whether we have any indication by analogy in the book itself, which may guide us. In ch. x. 4, when the Apostle is about to write down the voices of the seven thunders, he is commanded to abstain, and not to write them down. And though neither the manner nor the place of that withholding exactly corresponds to this half-hour's silence, yet it holds a place related to the sounding of the seventh trumpet, quite sufficiently near to that of this, with regard to the seventh seal, to be brought into comparison with it. It imports 1) a passing over and withholding, as far as the Apostle is concerned, of that which the seventh seal revealed: i. e. of that complete unrolling of God's book of His eternal purposes, of the times and seasons which He holds in His own power. For this unrolling, every thing has been prepared: even to the taking off of the last seal which bound the mysterious roll. But as to what the roll itself contains, there is silence. 2) But it also imports, as Victorinus beautifully says, "semihora, initium quietis æternæ:" the beginning of that blessed sabbatical state of rest, during which the people of God shall be in full possession of those things which ear hath not heard nor eye seen. With equal truth and beauty does the same, our earliest apocalyptic expositor, proceed: "sed partem intellexit, quia interruptio eadem per ordinem repetit. Nam si esset jure silentium, hic finis narrandi fieret." So that the vexed question, whether what follows belongs, or not, to the seventh seal, is, in fact, a question not worth seriously answering. Out of the completion of the former vision rise up a new series of visions, bearing a different character, but distinguished by the same number, indicating perfection, and shewing us that though evolved out of the completion of the former series, they do not belong to the last particular member of that series, any further than as it leads the way to them. Even more marked is this again below in ch. xi.—xvi., where the pouring out of the seven vials can in no way be said to belong to or form part of the blowing of the seventh trumpet. It will be seen then that I believe all interpretation to be wrong, which regards the blowing of the seven trumpets as forming a portion of the vision accompanying the seventh seal in particular: and again that I place in the same category all that which regards it as taking up and going over the same ground again. In the seven seals, we had revealed, as was fitting, the opening of the great Revelation, the progress and fortunes of God's Church and people in relation to the world, and of the world in relation to the church.

0. With regard to the trumpets them-
 3. selves, we may observe, 1) that they re-1. peat again the same mystic number seven, indicating that the course of events (see below) represented by this sounding is complete in itself, as was that indicated before by the breaking of the seals, and as is also that afterwards to be indicated by the pouring out of the vials: 2) that as in the case of the seals, there is a distinction made between the first four and the following three. Cf. below, ver. 13. 3) that as also in the case of the seals, there is an interval, with two episodical visions, between the sixth and the seventh trump-pet. Cf. ch. x., and ch. xi. 1—14. 4) that of the trumpets, six only announce visions partaking of the common character of judgments, whereas the seventh forms, as we also saw in the case of the seventh seal, the solemn close to the rest. 5) and further, that as regards this seventh trump-pet, the matters imported by it as being ἡ οὐαὶ ἡ τρίτη (ch. xi. 14) are not given, but merely indicated by ἦλθεν . . ὁ καιρὸς τῶν νεκρῶν κριθῆναι, κ.τ.λ. (ch. xi. 18): just as we saw that the things imported by the opening of the seventh seal were not detailed, but only indicated by the episodical visions, and by the nature of the similitude used. 6) that before the sounding of the seventh trumpet, the mystery of God is finished, as far as relates to the subject of this course of visions.
 This is indicated by the great Angel in ch. x. 7; and again by implication in ch.
 xi. 15—19, both by the purport of the voices in heaven, ver. 15, and by the ascriptions of praise, vv. 16—18. This is the same again at the pouring out of the seventh vial, where the great voice from the throne announces γέγονεν, ch. xvi. 17: as we saw that it was at the opening of the seventh seal, as indicated by the silence of half an hour. Each course of visions is complete in itself: each course of visions ends in the accomplishment of that series of divine actions which it sets forth. 7) that as, when the preparation for the seven angels to sound their trumpets is evolved out of the opening of the seventh seal, the vision of the seals is solemnly closed in by ἐγένοντο βρονταὶ καὶ ἀστραπαὶ καὶ φωναὶ καὶ σεισμός, so the vision of the trumpets is solemnly closed in by ἐγένοντο ἀστραπαὶ καὶ φωναὶ καὶ βρονταὶ καὶ σεισμός καὶ χάλασα μεγάλη.
 That the similar occurrence, ch. xvi. 18, does not close the series of the vials, seems to be owing to special circumstances belonging to the outpouring of the seventh vial: see there (ch. xvi. 21). 8) that as in vv. 3—5, which form the close of the vision of the seals, and the opening of that of the trumpets, the offering of the prayers of the saints is the prominent feature (see notes below), so in the close of the series of the trumpets we have a prominent disclosure of the ark of the covenant of God, declaring and sealing His faithfulness to His church. Similarly again at the beginning of the series of the vials, we have the temple of the tabernacle of witness opened. Why we have not a similar appearance at the close of that series, is to be accounted for as above. 9) that, seeing that this course of visions opens and closes as last noticed, it (to say nothing at present of the following series of the vials) is to be regarded as embracing a course of judgments (for such evidently is every one of its six visions) inflicted in answer to those prayers, and forming a portion of that ἐκδίκησις invoked by the souls of the martyrs in ch. vi. 10. 10) If this be so, then, as this series of visions is manifestly to be regarded as extending to the end of the whole period of time (cf. ch. x. 7, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆς φωνῆς τοῦ ἑβδόμου ἀγγέλου, ὅταν μέλλῃ σαλπίζειν, καὶ ἐτελέσθῃ τὸ μυστήριον τοῦ θεοῦ, κ.τ.λ.), we may fairly say that it takes up the great world-wide vision of the seals at the point where it was said to the vengeance-invoking martyrs ἵνα ἀναπαύσωνται ἔτι χρόνον: and that the judgments of this series of visions occur during the time of waiting. This view is confirmed by finding that οἱ κατοικ-οῦντες ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, upon whom the vengeance is invoked in ch. vi. 10, are the objects of vengeance during this series of judgments, cf. ver. 13. 11) In reference to this last remark, we may observe that no one portion especially of the earth's inhabitants is pointed out as objects of this series of judgments, but all the un-godly, as usurpers of the kingdom of Christ. This is plain, by the expressions in the ascription of praise with which it closes, I mean, ἐγένετο ἡ βασιλεία κ.τ.λ.

 Earthly domination is cast down, and the Lord's Kingdom is brought in. And it is also plain, from the expression used in that same ascription of praise, καὶ διαφθείραι τοὺς διαφθειρόντας τὴν γῆν, of what character have been these ungodly—the corrupters of the earth—the tainters and wasters of the means and accessories of life. 12) Whatever be the interpretation which follows from the foregoing considerations, two canons must not be violated. a) As in the case of the seals, so it is manifest here, from ch. xi. 18, ἦλθεν . . . ὁ καιρὸς τῶν νεκρῶν κριθῆναι, κ.τ.λ., that the series of visions reaches forward to the time of the end, and is only terminated by the great events indicated in those words. And b) as yet, no particular city, no especial people is designated as the subject of the apocalyptic vision. All is general. The earth, the trees, the grass, the sea, the waters, the lights of heaven, mankind,—these are at present the objects in our field of view. There is as yet no θρόνος τοῦ θηρίου, as in the outpouring of the vials, ch. xvi. 10. The prophecy goes on becoming more specific as it advances: and it is not for us to anticipate its course, nor to localize and individualize where it is as yet general and undefined. The further details will be treated as we go on).

2.] First appearance of the seven trumpet angels. And I saw (viz. during the symbolic silence, at the end of the half-hour. What now follows is not to be considered as in the interpretation chronologically consequent upon that which was indicated by the seals, but merely as in the vision chronologically consequent on that course of visions. The evolution of the courses of visions out of one another does not legitimately lead to the conclusion that the events represented by them are consecutive in order of time. There are other and more important sequences than that of time: they may be independent of it, or they may concur with it) the seven angels which stand before God (cf. Tobit xii. 15, ἐγὼ εἶμι Ῥαφαήλ, εἷς ἐκ τῶν ἑπτὰ ἁγίων ἀγγέλων οἱ προσαναφέρουσι τὰς προσευχὰς τῶν ἁγίων καὶ εἰσπορεύονται ἐνώπιον τῆς δόξης τοῦ ἁγίου. The agreement is not entire, inasmuch as here another angel, and not one of the seven, presently offers the prayers of the saints. These are not the archangels, as De W. and Stern, nor are they the seven spirits of ch. iv. 5, as Aret. and Ewald: nor again are they merely seven angels selected on account of the seven trumpets, as Hengstb. and Ebrard: this is entirely precluded by the article τούς. It is clear that the passage in Tobit and the words here refer to the same matter, and that the fact was part of that revelation with regard to the order and employments of the holy angels, which seems to have taken place during the captivity), and there were given to them seven trumpets (understand, with intent that they themselves should blow them). And another angel (not to be identified with Christ, as is done by Bede, Vitringa, Calov., al., and recently by Elliott: for thus confusion is introduced into the whole imagery of the vision. In ch. v. 8, we have the twenty-four elders falling down with vials containing the prayers of the saints: here we have an angel offering incense that it may mingle with the prayers on the heavenly altar. Any theological difficulty which belongs to the one belongs also to the other; and it is a canon which we must strictly observe in interpretation, that we are not, on account of any supposed doctrinal propriety, to depart from the plain meaning of words. In ch. vii. 2 we have ἄλλος ἄγγελος in the sense of a created angel (see note there): and would it be probable that St. John would after this, and I may add with his constant usage of ἄγγελος throughout the book for angel in its ordinary sense, designate our Lord by this title? There is something to me far more revolting from theological propriety in such a supposition, than in an angel being seen in the heavenly ministrations offering incense to mix with the prayers of the saints. It ought really to be needless to remark, in thus advocating consistency of verbal interpretation, that no countenance is hereby given to the invocation of angels: the whole truth of their being and ministration protesting against such an inference. They are simply λειτουργικὰ πνεύματα, and the action here described is a portion of that their ministry. Through Whom the prayers are offered, we all know. He is our only Mediator and channel of grace) came and stood over (ἐπί with gen., not simply juxta, nor ante, but super; so that his form appeared above it; the altar being between the Apostle and him) the altar (viz. the altar named ch. vi. 9, as the repetition of the word with the art. shews: see below on ver. 5), having a golden censer (the word λιβανωτός is elsewhere the frankincense itself: so ref. 1 Chron.: so also Schol. on Aristoph. Nub., cited by Grot., λίβανος . . . αὐτὸ τὸ δένδρον λιβανωτός δὲ ὁ καρπὸς τοῦ δένδρου: and Ammonius (ib.), λίβανος μὲν γὰρ κοινῶς καὶ τὸ δένδρον καὶ τὸ θυμιώμενον λιβανωτός δὲ μόνον τὸ θυμιώμενον. But here it unquestionably means a censer: cf. below, ver. 5, εἴληφεν τὸν λ. καὶ ἐγένισεν αὐτὸν κ.τ.λ. No argument can be derived from the censer being a golden one, as Elliott, partly after Sir I. Newton. The spirit of the heavenly imagery will account for this without going farther: we have, throughout, crowns (ch. iv. 4), incense-vials (v. 8), vengeance-vials (xv. 7), girdles (xv. 6), a measuring-reed (xxi. 15), &c., all of the same costly metal). And there was given to him (viz. by divine appointment, through those ministering: not, by the saints who offered the prayers (Ell.), for two reasons: 1) because the incense is mentioned as something distinct from the prayers of the saints; see below: 2) because no forcing of ἐδόθη will extract this meaning from it. It is a frequent apocalyptic formula in reference to those things or instruments with which, or actions by which, the ministrations necessary to the progress of the visions are performed: cf. ver. 2, ch. vi. 2, 4 bis, 8, 11, vii. 2, ix. 1, &c.) much incense (see ch. v. 8, and on the difference of the imagery, below), that he might (if we read δώσει, which after all is not really a various reading,—η, and ηι, being in the MSS. perpetually confused with ει,—we must remember that the fut. with ἵνα is a mixed construction, made up of ἵνα δώση and δώσει. We are compelled in English to choose one of these) give it to (various renderings and supplyings of the construction have been devised: but the simple dative after δώσει appears the only legitimate one: and the sense as expressed by Calov., “ut daret ταῖς πρ., orationibus sanctorum, eadem, i. e., ut redderet eas boni odoris preces.” This object was, to incense the prayers of the Saints: on the import, see below) the prayers of all the saints (not only now of those martyred ones in ch. vi. 9: the trumpets which follow are in answer to the whole prayers of God’s church. The martyrs’ cry for vengeance is the loudest note, but all join) upon (the ἐπί with accus. carrying motion; which thus incensed were offered on the golden altar, &c. From what follows it would seem that the prayers were already before God: see below) the altar of gold which was before the throne (this may be a different altar from that over which the angel was standing; or it may be the same further specified. The latter alternative seems the more probable. We must not imagine that we have in these visions a counterpart of the Jewish tabernacle, or attempt to force the details into accordance with its arrangements. No such correspondence has been satisfactorily made out: indeed to assume such here would perhaps be inconsistent with ch. xi. 19, where first the temple of God in heaven is opened. A general analogy, in the use and character of the heavenly furniture, is all that we can look for). And the smoke of the incense ascended to (such again seems to be the only legitimate rendering of the dative. The common one, “with,” cannot be justified: see Wiener, edu. 6, § 31. 6. The prayers, being already offered, received the smoke of the incense. The whole imagery introduces the fact that those prayers are about to be answered in the following judgments) the prayers of the saints out of the hand of the angel, before God (these latter words belong to ἀνέβη, or rather to ἀνέβη ταῖς πρ. τ. ἁγ. Notice, that no countenance is given by this vision to the idea of angelic intercession. The angel is simply a minister. The incense (importing here, we may perhaps say, acceptability owing to the ripeness of the season in the divine purposes, so that the prayers, lying unanswerd before, become, by the fulness of the time, acceptable as regards an immediate reply) is given to him : he merely wafts the incense up, so that it mingles with the prayers. Düsterd. well remarks, that the angel, in performing sacerdotal offices, is but a fellow-servant of the saints (ch. xix. 10) who are themselves priests (ch. i. 6, v. 10, vii. 15). 5.] And the angel took (it is quite impossible to maintain a perfect sense: an aorist (ἐγένευσεν) is indeed coupled to εἴληφεν) the censer (after having used it as above, i. e. shaken from it the incense on the altar) and filled it (while the smoke was ascending) from the fire of the altar (i. e. from the ashes which were on the altar), and cast it (i. e. the fire with which the censer was filled: the hot ashes) towards the earth (to signify that the answer to the prayers was about to descend in the fire of God's vengeance: see below, and compare Ezekiel in ref.): and there took place thunders and voices and lightnings and an earthquake ("per orationes sanctorum," says Corn.-a-lap., "... precantium vindictam de impiis suisque persecutoribus, ignis vindictæ, i. e. tonitrua, fulgura et plagæ sequentes vii. angelorum et tubarum in impios sunt demissa." All these immediate consequences of the casting down of the hot ashes on the earth are the symbolic precursors of the divine judgments about to be inflicted).

One point must here be noticed: the intimate connexion between the act of this incense-offering angel and the seven trumpets which follow. It belongs to them all: it takes place when now the seven angels have had their trumpets given them, and this series of visions is introduced. So that every interpretation must take this into account: remembering that the judgments which follow are answers to the prayers of the saints, and are inflicted on the enemies of the church.

6.] And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves that they might blow (raised their trumpets to their mouths, and stood in attitude to blow them).

7-12.] The first four trumpets. It has been before observed, that as in the case of the seals, so here, the first four are marked off from the last three. • The distinction is here made, not only, as there, by an intrinsic feature running through the four, but by the voice of the eagle in ver. 13, introducing those latter trumpets and giving them also a distinguishing feature. And as we there maintained (see note on ch. vi. 8) that any interpretation, to be right, must take into account this difference between the four and the three, so here also. But in order to the taking into account of this difference, we must gain some approximate idea of its import. Does the intrinsic feature, common to these four plagues, bear a general interpretation which will suit their character as distinguished from the other three? I imagine it does. For, whereas each of those three (or rather of the former two of them, for, as has been observed, the seventh forms the solemn conclusion to the whole) evolves a course of plagues including separate and independent details, these four are connected and interdependent. Their common feature is destruction and corruption: not total, it is true, but partial: in each case to the amount expressed by τὸ τρίτον: but this fractional extent of action appears again under the sixth trumpet, ch. ix. 15, 18, and therefore clearly must not be pressed as carrying the distinctive character of the first four (on its import see note below, ver. 7). It is in the kind of exercise which their agency finds, that these four trumpets are especially distinguished. The plagues indicated by them are entirely inflicted on natural objects: the earth, trees, grass, sea, rivers, lights of heaven: whereas those indicated by the two latter are expressly said to be inflicted on men, and not on natural objects: cf. ch. ix. 4, 15. Surely, however these natural objects are in each case to be understood, this is a point not lightly to be passed over. Nor can it fail to strike every unprejudiced student, that we must not, as is done by many expositors, interpret the γῆ and χόρτος and δένδρα as signifying nations and men in the former portion of the series of visions, and then, when the distinction between these and men is made in the latter part, be content with the literal meaning. With every allowance for the indisputable intermixture, in many places, of literal and allegorical meanings, all analogy requires that in the same series of visions, when one judgment is to destroy earth, trees, and grass, and another not to injure earth, trees, or grass, but men only, the earth, trees, and grass should bear the same meaning in the two cases. We may fairly say then, that the plagues of the four former trumpets affect the accessories of life—the earth, the trees, the green grass, the waters as means of transit and of subsistence, the lights of heaven:—whereas those of the last two affect life itself, the former by the infliction of pain, the latter of death.

A certain analogy may be noticed, but not a very close one, between these plagues and those in Egypt of old. The analogy is not close, for the order is not the same, nor are all particulars contained in the one series which are contained in the other: but the resemblance is far too striking to pass without remark. We have the hail and fire, the water turned to blood, the darkness, the locusts, the infliction of death): five, in fact, if not six, out of the ten. The Egyptian plagues are beyond doubt remembered in the sacred imagery, if they are not reproduced.

The secret of interpretation here I believe to be this: The whole seven trumpets bring before us the punishment of the enemies of God during the period indicated by their course. These punishments are not merely direct inflictions of plagues, but consist in great part of that judicial retribution on them that know not God, which arises from their own depravity, and in which their own sins are made to punish themselves. This kind of punishment comes before us especially in the four first trumpet-visions. The various natural accessories of life are ravaged, or are turned to poison. In the first, the earth and its produce are ravaged with fire: in the second, the sea is mingled with blood, and ships, which should have been for men's convenience, are destroyed. In the third, the waters and springs, the essential refreshments of life, are poisoned, and death is occasioned by drinking of them. In the fourth, the natural lights of heaven are darkened. So that I regard these first four trumpets as setting forth the gradual subjugation of the earth to Him whose kingdom it is in the end to become, by judgments inflicted on the ungodly, as regards the vitiating and destroying the ordinary means of subsistence, and comfort, and knowledge. In the details of these judgments, as also of the two following, there are many particulars which I cannot interpret, and with regard to which it may be a question whether they are to be considered as other than belonging to the requisite symbolic machinery of the prophecy. But in confessing this I must also say, that I have never seen, in any apocalyptic Commentator, an interpretation of these details at all approaching to verisimilitude: never any which is not obliged to force the plain sense of words, or the certain course of history, to make them fit the requisite theory. Many examples of these will be found in the history of apocalyptic interpretation given by Mr. Elliott in vol. iv. of his Horæ Apocalypticæ.

7.] And the first blew his trumpet, and there took place hail and fire mingled in blood (i. e. the hail and the fire were mingled together (plur.) in blood, as their flux or vehicle; the stones of hail and the balls of fire (not lightning, as Ebr.) fell in a shower of blood, just as hail and fireballs commonly fall in a shower of rain. There is here manifestly an allusion to the plague of hail in Egypt, of which it is said that "the fire ran along upon the ground:" ἦν δὲ ἡ χάλαζα καὶ τὸ πῦρ φλογίζον ἐν τῇ χαλάζῃ, ref. Exod.: but with the addition of the blood. With regard to this latter, we may remark, that both here and under the vials, where the earth, seas, and rivers are again the objects of the first three judgments, blood is a feature common to all three. It appears rather to indicate a general character of the judgments, than to require any special interpretation in each particular case. In blood is life: in the shedding, or in the appearing, of blood, is implied the destruction of life, with which, as a consequence, all these judgments must be accompanied), and it was cast into the earth (towards the surface of the earth): and the third part (this expression first occurring here, it will be well once for all to enquire into its meaning in these prophecies. I may first say, that all special interpretations seem to me utterly to have failed, and of these none so signally as that of Mr. Elliott, who would understand it of a tripartite division of the Roman Empire at the time to which he assigns this judgment. It is fatal to this whole class of interpretations, that it is not said the hail, &c. were cast on a third part, but that the destruction occasioned by them extended to a third part of the earth on which they were cast. And this is most expressly declared to be so in this first case, by all green grass being also destroyed, not a third part: a fact of which Elliott takes no notice. It is this mixture of the fractional third with other designations of extent of mischief, which will lead us, I believe, to the right interpretation. We find it again under the third trumpet, where the star Wormwood is cast ἐπὶ τὸ τρίτον τῶν ποταμῶν, καὶ ἐπὶ τὰς πηγὰς τῶν ὑδάτων: the result being that τὸ τρίτον τῶν ὑδάτων was embittered. This lax usage would of itself lead us to suppose that we are not to look for strict definiteness in the interpretation. And if we refer to the prophecy in Zech. xiii. 8 f., where the import is to announce judgment on a greater part and the escape of a remnant, we find the same tripartite division: καὶ ἔσται ἐν πάσῃ τῇ γῇ, λέγει κύριος, τὰ δύο μέρη αὐτῆς ἐξολοθρευθήσεται, καὶ ἐκλείψει, τὸ δὲ τρίτον ὑπολειφθήσεται ἐν αὐτῇ. καὶ διάξω τὸ τρίτον διὰ πυρός, κ.τ.λ. Nay, in the Apocalypse itself, we have τὸ τρίτον used where the sense can hardly but be similarly indefinite: e. g., under the sixth trumpet, ch. ix. 15, 18, and xii. 4, where it is said that the dragon's tail σύρει τὸ τρίτον τῶν ἀστέρων τοῦ οὐρανοῦ: the use of the present shewing that it is rather a general power, than a particular event which is designated. Compare again the use of τὸ τέταρτον τῆς γῆς in ch. vi. 8, and of τὸ δέκατον τῆς πόλεως in ch. xi. 13. All these seem to shew, that such prophetic expressions are to be taken rather in their import as to amount, than in any strict fractional division. Here, for instance, I would take the pervading τὸ τρίτον as signifying, that though the judgment is undoubtedly, as to extent, fearful and sweeping, yet that God in inflicting it, spares more than he smites: two thirds escape in each case, while one is smitten) of the earth (i. e. plainly of the surface of the earth, and that, of the cultivated soil, which admitted of such a devastation) was burnt up (so that the fire prevails in the plague, not the hail nor the blood), and the third part of the trees (in all the earth, not in the third part) was burnt up, and all green grass (upon earth: no longer a third part: possibly because green grass would first and unavoidably every where scorch up at the approach of such a plague, whereas the hardier crops and trees might partially escape) was burnt up.

8.] And the second angel blew his trumpet: and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea (first, by the ὄς, that which was cast into the sea was not a mountain, but only a burning mass so large as to look like one. Then, it was this mass itself, not any thing proceeding from it, which was cast down. So that the introduction of a volcano into the imagery is quite unjustifiable. In the language (hardly in the sense) there seems to be a reminiscence of Jer. xxviii. (li.) 25, δώσω σε ὡς ὕρος ἐμπεπυρισμένον. It is remarkable that there the ὕρος should be characterized as τὸ διεφθαρμένον τὸ διαφθεῖρον πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν: cf. our ch. xi. 18), and the third part of the sea became blood (so in the Egyptian plague the Nile and all the Egyptian waters. By the non-consequence of the result of the fiery mass falling into the sea (so De W., "eine Wirfung ohne Analogie") is again represented to us that in the infliction of this plague from above, the instrument of it is merely described as it appeared (ὡς), not as it really was. So that all ideas imported into the interpretation which take the mountain, or the fiery character of it, as elements in the symbolism, are departures from the real intent of the description): and the third part of the creatures (reff.) (that were) in the sea (not, as Elliott, "in the third part of the sea," but in the whole. Nor again must we stretch ἐν τῇ θαλάσσει to mean the maritime coasts, nor the islands, nor the transmarine provinces: a usage not even shewn to exist by the examples cited by him, vol. i. p. 344 note: nor by Tacitus's "plenum exsiliis mare;" any more than, if we were to say "the sea is full of emigrants from Ireland," we should by "the sea" mean "the ships") died (cf. Exod. vii. 17-21) those which have life (animal souls: see reff.: and for the appositional nominative, ch. ii. 20 reff.), and the third part of the ships were destroyed (another inconsequence result, and teaching us as before.

We may remark, at the end of this second trumpet, that the judgments inflicted by these first two are distinctly those which in ch. vii. 3 were held back until the servants of God were sealed: μὴ ἀδικήσητε τὴν γῆν μήτε τὴν θάλασσαν μήτε τὰ δένδρα, ἄχρι σφραγίσωμεν κ.τ.λ. So that, as before generally remarked, the place of these trumpet-plagues must be sought after that sealing: and consequently (see there) in very close conjunction with the day of the Lord itself.

10.] And the third angel blew his trumpet, and there fell from heaven a great star burning as a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers and upon the fountains of the waters (it can hardly be said, as Düsterd., that we are here as matter of course to understand, on the third part of the fountains, any more than we are to limit the πᾶς χόρτος χλωρός in ver. 7 to all the grass within the third part of the earth). And the name of the star is called Wormwood (the more usual forms are τὸ ἀψιθιον, or ἡ ἀψιθου. The masc. seems to be chosen on account of its conformity to ὁ ἀστὴρ. There is a river in Thrace so called. See on the plant, and its medicinal use by the ancients, Wiener, Realw. art. Bermuth: and Pliny, xxvii. 28), and the third part of the waters became (was turned into, see refl.) wormwood: and many of the men (who dwelt by these waters: such may be the force of the article. But τῶν ἀνθρ. may be general. It is the only place where the expression πολλ. τῶν ἀνθρ. occurs) died from (ἐκ of the source whence a result springs, see Winer, edn. 6, § 47, sub voce) the waters, because they were embittered (compare the converse history, Exod. xv. 23 ff., of the bitter waters being made sweet by casting a certain tree into them: see also 2 Kings ii. 19 ff. The question whether wormwood was a deadly poison or not, is out of place here. It is not said that all who drank, died. And the effect of any bitter drug, however medicinally valuable, being mixed with the water ordinarily used, would be to occasion sickness and death. It is hardly possible to read of this third plague, and not to think of the deadly effect of those strong spirituous drinks which are in fact water turned into poison. The very name absinthe is not unknown in their nomenclature: and there is no effect which could be so aptly described by the falling of fire into water, as this, which results in ardent spirit,—in that which the simple islanders of the South Sea call firewater. That this plague may go on to destroy even this fearful proportion of the ungodly in the latter days, is far from impossible, considering its prevalence even now in some parts of the civilized world. But I mention this rather as an illustration, than as an interpretation). And the fourth angel blew his trumpet: and the third part of the sun was struck (it is not said, as in the case of the former three trumpets, with what. And this absence of an instrument in the fourth of these correlative visions perhaps teaches us not to attribute too much import to the instruments by which the previous judgments are brought about. It is the πληγή itself, not its instrument, on which attention should be directed) and the third part of the moon and the third part of the stars, that the third part of them might be darkened, and the day might not shine during the third part of it (the limitation of the τὸ τρίτον is now manifestly to time, not to brightness. So E. V. rightly, "for a third part of it." That this consequence is no natural one following upon the obscuration of a third portion of the sun, &c., is not to be alleged as any objection, but belongs to the altogether supernatural region in which these visions are situated. Thus we have a globe of fire turning seawater to blood—a burning star embittering the waters: &c.), and the night in like manner (i. e. the night as far as she is, by virtue of the moon and stars, a time of light. And this is far more so under the glorious Eastern moon and stars, than in our mist-laden climate).

an (ένός indefinite, as in reff.: see Winer, edn. 6, § 18. 9. Or it may carry meaning—a single or solitary eagle,—as might also be the case in one of the reff., ch. xviii. 21, see there) eagle (hardly to be identified with the eagles of Matt. xxiv. 28: for 1) that saying is more proverbial than prophetic: and 2) any application of that saying would be far more aptly reserved for our ch. xix. 17. Nor again is the eagle a bird of ill omen, as Ewald: nor a contrast to the dove in John i. 32, as Hengstb.: but far more probably the symbol of judgment and vengeance rushing to its prey, as in Deut. xxviii. 49; Hos. viii. 1; Hab. i. 8. Nor again is it to be understood as an angel in eagle's shape: but a veritable eagle in the vision. Thus we have the altar speaking, ch. xvi. 7) flying in mid-heaven (i. e. in the south or noon-day sky where the sun reaches the meridian, for which μεσουρανεῖν is the word. Wetst. cites from Eustath. on Pl. θ. 68, ἀβησις ἡμέρας λέγεται καθ' Ὁμηρον τὸ ἀπὸ πρωῆας μέχρι ἡλιακοῦ μεσουρανήματος, τὸ δὲ ἐντεῦθεν φθίνειν ἡμέρα δοκεῖ. See his many other examples. So that the word does not signify the space intermediate between heaven and earth, but as above. And the eagle flies there, to be seen and heard of all. I may also notice that the whole expression favours the true reading αἰτοῦ as against the substituted ἀγγέλου) saying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe, to those that dwell (the government of an accus. after οὐαὶ is also found in ch. xii. 12) upon the earth (the objects of the vengeance invoked in the prayers of the martyrs, ch. vi. 10: the ungodly world, as distinguished from the church) by reason of (so E. V., well: ἐκ denoting, as in ver. 11, the source whence the woe springs) the remaining voices of the trumpet (the sing. is used generically: the three voices all having this common to them, that they are the sound of a trumpet) of the three angels who are about to blow.

CH. IX.—XI.] The last three, or woe-trumpets. These, as well as the first four, have a character of their own, corresponding in some measure to that of the visions at the opening of the three last seals. The particulars related under them are separate and detailed, not symmetrical and correspondent. And as in the seals, so here, the seventh forms rather the solemn conclusion to the whole, than a distinct judgment of itself. Here also, as there, it is introduced by two episodical passages, having reference to the visions which are to follow, and which take up the thread of prophecy again at a period previous to things detailed before.

1—12.] The fifth, or first Woe trumpet. And the fifth angel blew his trumpet, and I saw a star fallen (not, as E. V. fall, which gives an entirely wrong view of the transactions of the vision. The star had fallen before, and is first seen as thus fallen) out of heaven to the earth (the reader will at once think on Isa. xiv. 12, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" And on Luke x. 18, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." And, doubtless, as the personal import of this star is made clear in the following words, such is the reference here. We may also notice that this expression forms a connecting link to another place, ch. xii. 9, in this book, where Satan is represented as cast out of heaven to the earth: see notes there. It is hardly possible with Andr., Ribera, Bengel, and De W., to understand a good angel by this fallen star. His description, as well as his work, corresponds only to an agent of evil. Andreas is obliged to distort words to bring in this view: ἐπὶ γῆν δὲ καταβάντα, τοῦτο γὰρ τὸ πεπτωκέναι σημαίνει, is enough to condemn any interpretation), and there was given to him (ἐδόθη, as usual, for the purpose of the part which he is to bear in the vision) the key of the pit of the abyss (viz. of hell, which in the vision is a vast profundity opening by a pit or shaft upon the surface of the earth, imagined as shut down by a cover, and locked. This abyss is in the Apocalypse the habitation of the devil and his angels: cf. ver. 11, ch. xx. 1, 3: see also ch. xi. 7, xvii. 8), and he opened the pit of the abyss, and there went up smoke from the pit as smoke of a great furnace (see ref. Gen.), and the sun was darkened and the air (not, as Bengel, a hendiadys, "aer, quatenus per solem illuminatur:" for the sun may be obscured, as by a cloud, without the air being darkened) by reason of the smoke of the pit. And out of the smoke (which therefore was their vehicle or envelope) came forth locusts into (towards, over, so as to spread over: εἰς gives more the sense of distribution than ἐπὶ would) the earth, and there was given to them power as the scorpions of the earth (τῆς γῆς, not as noting any distinction between land-scorpions and water-scorpions, as Ewald, but because the scorpions are natural and of the earth, whereas these locusts are infernal and not of nature) have power (viz. to sting, as below explained): and it was commanded them that they shall not hurt (for construction, see reff.) the grass of the earth, nor yet every (i.e. any) green thing, nor yet every (any) tree (the usual objects on which locusts prey: cf. Exod. x. 13, 15), but only (lit. except: the former sentence being regarded as if it had run, "that they should hurt nothing,"—and then "except" follows naturally) the men, the which (οἴτινες designates the class or kind: see reff.) have not the seal of God upon their foreheads (this, as before noticed, fixes this fifth trumpet to the time following the sealing in ch. vii. It denotes a plague which falls on the unbelieving inhabitants of the earth after the servants of God have been marked out among them, and of which the saints are not partakers. Either then it denotes something purely spiritual, some misery from which those are exempt who have peace with God,—which can hardly be, consistently with vv. 5, 6,—or it takes place in a state totally different from this present one, in which the wheat and tares are mingled together. One or other of these considerations will at once dismiss by far the greater number of interpretations. That of Elliott, the fact of Mahomet's mission being avowedly against corrupt Christianity as idolatry, does not in the remotest degree answer the conditions. In the very midst of this corrupt Christianity were at that time God's elect scattered up and down: and it is surely too much to say that every such person escaped scathless from the Turkish sword). And it was given to them (allotted to them by God as the limit of their appointed work and office: here the ἐδόθη expresses rather the limitation than the extension of the grant) that they should not kill them (the unsealed), but that they (the unsealed: the subject is changed) shall be (fut. aft. ἵνα, see above, ver. 4) tormented five months (the reason seems to be correct, which several Commentators have given for this number being chosen: viz., that five months is the ordinary time in the year during which locusts commit their ravages: so Calov., Vittr., Eich., Ewald, De W., Dürsterd., al. At all events we are thus in some measure delivered from the endless perplexities of capricious fancy in which the historical interpreters involve us): and their torment (i. e. that of the sufferers: against Dürsterd.) is as the torment of (arising from: notice the same construction in two senses) a scorpion, when it has smitten (παίσῃ, the regular futurus exactus: "whenever it shall have . . ." παίω and πατάσσω (Jon. iv. 7. Achill. Tat. ii. 7, ἡ μέλιττα ἐπάταξε τὴν χεῖρα), as in the Latin ictus (Pliny, H. N. vi. 28), are used of the bite or sting of an animal) a man. And in those days men shall seek death (observe the transition of the style from the descriptive to the prophetic. For the first time the Apostle ceases to be the exponent of what he saw, and becomes the direct organ of the Spirit), and shall not (the οὐ μὴ, with a subjunctive (its ordinary construction), is a more certain and definite negation than even the future itself. The latter expresses fact; whereas the former states that the fact cannot be otherwise: οὐ μὴ with the future, as in text, seems to be a later and lax way of expressing the same) find it: and they shall vehemently desire (desire alone is not strong enough: ἐπιθυμέω, -ία, express the direction of the θῦμος (itself from θύω, ferveo—ἀπὸ τῆς θύσεως καὶ ζήσεως τῆς ψυχῆς, Plato, Cratyl. 419 E) upon an object. As desire is too strong for θέλω, so is it too weak for ἐπιθυμέω) to die (notice what Dürsterd. well calls "ein scharfliche Gegenstück," to the Apostle's saying in Phil. i. 23, ἐπιθυμίαν ἔχω ἐν εἰς τὸ ἀναλῦσαι καὶ σὺν χριστῷ εἶναι), and death fleeth (the pres., of the habitual avoidance in those days) from them (the longing to die arises from the excruciating pain of the sting. Cf. Jer. viii. 3. I cannot forbear noticing as we pass, the caprice of historical interpreters. On the command not to kill the men, &c., in ver. 5, Elliott says, "i. e. not to annihilate them as a political Christian body." If then the same rule of interpretation is to hold, the present verse must mean that the "political Christian body" will be so sorely beset by these Mahometan locusts, that it will vehemently desire to be annihilated, and not find any way. For it surely cannot be allowed that the killing of men should be said of their annihilation as a political body in one verse, and their desiring to die in the next should be said of something totally different, and applicable to their individual misery. Is it in consequence of foreseeing this difficulty, that Mr. Elliott has, as in the case of many important details in other places, omitted all consideration of this verse?).

7.] The Apostle now returns to the description of the locusts themselves. And the shapes (so E. V., rightly: not, the likenesses. ὁμοίωμα is the product of ὁμοίω: the finished form of any thing which is made like (ὁμοιον) to any pattern. See Winer, edn. 6, § 16. A. 2, α) of the locusts (were) like horses made ready for war (this resemblance,—cf. ref. Joel, ἡ ὕρασις αὐτῶν ὡς ὕρασις ἵππων,—has been noticed by travellers. Winer, Realw. art. Heuschrecken, refers to Niebuhr, Beschreibung, 173. Ewald gives other references, and says, “refert omnino animal equini corporis quædam similia, unde nostris etiam Heupferd dici notum est.” And especially does it hold good when the horse is equipped for war; the plates of the horse’s armour being represented by the hard laminae of the outer shell of the locust: see below, ver. 9), and on their heads as it were crowns like unto gold (it is not easy to say what this part of the description imports. Elliott tries to apply it to the turban: but granting some latitude to στέφανοι, the ὅμοιοι χρυσῶ will hardly bear this. The appearance of a turban, even when ornamented with gold, is hardly golden. I should understand the words, of the head actually ending in a crown-shaped fillet which resembled gold in its material, just as the wings of some of the beetle tribe might be said to blaze with gold and gems. So we have below εἶχον θώρακας ὡς θ. σιδηροῦς: the material not being metallic, but only quasi-metallic. Eichhorn and Heur. understand these crowns of soldiers’ helmets: but this is quite arbitrary and gratuitous): and their faces (were) as the faces of men (Düsterdieck well observes, that we must not suppose them actually to have had human faces, but that the face of the locust, which under ordinary circumstances has a distant resemblance to the human countenance, bore this resemblance even more notably in the case of these supernatural locusts. It is not τὰ πρ. αὐτῶν πρόσωπα ἀνθρ. but ὡς πρόσωπα ἀνθρ. Nor again can we agree with Mr. Elliott’s idea that ἀνθρώπων is here used to designate the male sex: an interpretation recommended to him by his wish to introduce the moustache of the Arabs. Wherever the general term ἄνθρωπος is used for the particular sex, it must, as in the case of our “man,” be necessarily so interpreted by the context, as is the case in every one of the passages cited by Mr. E. in support of his view, viz. Matt. xix. 3, 5, 10; 1 Cor. vii. 1; Gen. ii. 18; Exod. xiii. 2; Lev. xx. 10; Esth. iv. 10 (ἄνθρωπος ἢ γυνή); Eccl. vii. 28; Isa. iv. 1. But here there is no such necessity in the context: nay, it is much more natural to take ἀνθρώπων as the general term, their faces were like human faces, and then comes the limitation, not in the face, but in another particular), and they had hair as the hair of women (i. e. long and flowing, 1 Cor. xi. 14 f. De Wette quotes from Niebuhr an Arabic proverb in which the antlers of locusts are compared to the hair of girls. But perhaps we must regard the comparison as rather belonging to the supernatural portion of our description. Ewald would understand the hair on the legs, or on the bodies, of the locusts, to be meant, referring to רַחֲוּ רַחֲוּ, rough locusts, Jer. li. (xxviii.) 27, where the LXX have merely ἀκρίδων, and the E. V. “rough caterpillars.”

To infer, from this feature, licentiousness as a characteristic in the interpretation, is entirely beside the purpose): and their teeth were as the teeth of lions (so also of the locust in Joel i. 6, οἱ ὀδόντες αὐτοῦ ὀδόντες λέοντος. Ewald rightly designates as very doubtful a fancied resemblance to a lion in the under jaw. We may observe that this, as some other features in the description, is purely graphic, and does not in any way apply to the plague to be inflicted by these mystic locusts), and they had breastplates as iron breastplates (the plate which forms the thorax of the natural locust, was in their case as if of iron), and the sound of their wings (was) as a sound of chariots of many horses (by the two genitives the sound of both, the chariots and the horses, is included. The chariots are regarded as an appendage to the horses) as they run to war. And they have tails like to scorpions (i. e. to the tails of scorpions: the construction called the comparatio compendiaris: see reff.), and stings (viz. in their tails: this is the particular especially in which the comparison finds its aptitude): and in their tails is their power to hurt men five months (see above on ver. 5). They have as king over them (or, "they have a king over them, viz." . . . the two accusatives being in apposition. It favours this last alternative, that in this particular, of having a king, they are distinguished from natural locusts: for Prov. xxx. 27, ἀβασιλευτόν ἐστιν ἡ ἀκρίς) the angel of the abyss (we can hardly with Luther, render "an angel from the abyss:" ἄγγελος, though anathrous, is necessarily defined by the genitive τῆς ἀβύσσου; his name is in Hebrew Abaddon (אַבְדֹּן, perdition, from רָצַח, perit, is used in the O. T. for the place of perdition, Orcus, in Job xxvi. 6; Prov. xxvii. 20 (Keri: Chetib has רָצַח), in both of which places it is joined with חַיִּץ,—Ps. lxxxviii. 12; Job xxviii. 22. In all these places the LXX express it by ἀπόλεια. So that this is the local name personified: or rather perhaps that abstract name personified, from which the local import itself is derived), and in the Greek (scil. γλώσση) he has for his name Apollyon (the name ἀπολλύων seems chosen from the LXX ἀπόλεια, see above.

It is a question, who this angel of the abyss is. Perhaps, for accurate distinction's sake, we must not identify him with

Satan himself,—cf. ch. xii. 3, 9,—but must regard him as one of the principal of the bad angels. The one (first) woe hath passed: behold, there cometh (singular, the verb applying simply to that which is future, without reference as yet to its plurality) two woes after these things.

There is an endless Babel of allegorical and historical interpretation of these locusts from the pit. The most that we can say of their import is, that they belong to a series of judgments on the ungodly which will immediately precede the second advent of our Lord: that the various and mysterious particulars of the vision will no doubt clear themselves up to the church of God, when the time of its fulfilment arrives: but that no such clearing up has yet taken place, a very few hours of research among histories of apocalyptic interpretation will serve to convince any reader who is not himself the servant of a preconceived system.

13—21.] The sixth Trumpet. And the sixth angel blew his trumpet, and I heard a (it is doubtful, in the uncertain authenticity of τεσσάρων, whether any stress is to be laid on this μίαν or not. Vitringa gives it the emphasis,—“quatuor hæc cornua simul edidisse vocem, non diversam, sed unam eandemque:” and so Hengstb. The allegorical interpreters give it various imports—the agreement of the four Gospels (Zeger, Calov., al.),—that of the prayers of exiled Jews (Grot.), &c.) voice out of the [four] horns of the golden altar which was before God (the same altar as that previously mentioned in ch. viii. 3 and vi. 9, where see notes. From ch. xvi. 7 it would appear that the voice probably proceeded from the altar itself, represented as uttering the cry of vengeance for the blood shed on it; cf. ch. vi. 9, with which cry of the martyred saints the whole series of retributive judgments is connected. The reading in the Codex Sinaiticus (see digest) is very remarkable, and may represent the original text. To suppose, as Elliott, that the cry from the altar is indicative of an altar having been the scene of some special sin on the part of the men of Roman Christendom, and so to apply it to the perversions of Christian rites in the Romish Church, is surely to confuse the whole imagery of the vision. For it is not of any altar in the abstract that we are reading, but of the golden altar which was before God, where the prayers of the saints had been offered by the angel, ch. viii. 3, 5: and the voice is the result of those prayers, in accordance with which those judgments are inflicted.

The horns again, representing the enceinte of the altar, not any special rites with which the horns of an altar were concerned, cannot be pressed into the service of the above-noticed interpretation, but simply belong to the propriety of that heard and seen. The voice proceeded from the surface of the altar, on which the prayers had been offered: and that surface was bounded by the κέρατα saying (the noun to which the participle, in this broken construction, is to be referred, may be either φωνή, which is most probable, or κέρατων, in which latter case an emphasis would naturally fall on the foregoing μίαν, or, if λέγοντος be read, θυσιαστηρίου) to the sixth angel, who had (construction, see reff. It is far better to take ὁ ἔχων as the appositional nom., so common in this book, than, as Tregelles, to understand it as vocative. It is natural that the word ἕκτω should be further specified by adding the class to which the angel belonged, ὁ ἔχων τὴν σάλπιγγα: but hardly, that he should be singled out by the address, “Thou that hast the trumpet,” from the whole seven who had trumpets) the trumpet (τὴν, as being that one now before us,—belonging to the present vision), Loose (it is too much to say that the angel himself is made the active minister of this loosing: we do not read καὶ πορευθεὶς ἔλυσεν following, but simply καὶ ἐλύθησαν. must therefore believe that the command is given to him only in so far as he is the representative and herald of all that takes place under his trumpet-blowing) the four angels which are bound (so E. V. rightly: "are bound" is the true perfect passive, not "have been bound") on (not "in," as E. V.: ἐπί with the dat. denotes close adherence or juxtaposition: so our Lord sat ἐπὶ τῇ πηγῇ, John iv. 6) the great river Euphrates (the whole imagery here has been a crux interpretum: as to who these angels are, and what is indicated by the locality here described. I will only venture to point out, amidst the surging tumult of controversy, one or two points of apparent refuge to which we must not betake ourselves. First, we must not yield to the temptation, so attractive at first sight, of identifying these four angels with the four angels standing on the four corners of the earth and holding in the four winds, in ch. vii. 1 ff. For the mission of these angels is totally distinct from theirs, as the locality is also. There is not a syllable of winds here, nor any hurting of earth, sea, or trees. Secondly, the question need not perplex us here, whether these are good or bad angels: for it does not enter in any way into consideration. They simply appear, as in other parts of this book, as ministers of the divine purposes, and pass out of view as soon as mentioned. Here, it would almost seem as if the angelic persons were little more than personifications; for they are immediately resolved into the host of cavalry. Thirdly, that there is nothing in the text to prevent "the great river Euphrates" from being meant literally. Diisterd. maintains, that because the rest of the vision has a mystical meaning, therefore this local designation must have one also: and that if we are to take the Euphrates literally and the rest mystically, endless confusion would be introduced. But this is quite a mistake, as the slightest consideration will shew. It is a common feature of Scripture allegory to intermingle with its mystic language literal designations of time and place. Take for instance the allegory in Ps. lxxx. 8, 11, "Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt . . . she sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river:" where, though the vine and her boughs and branches are mystical, Egypt, the sea, and the river, are all literal. See some good remarks on this in Mr. Elliott's 1st vol., p. 331 ff., where the above example is cited among others). And the four angels were loosed, which had been prepared (the perf. part. in conjunction with an aor. verb is necessarily pluperf. in sense) for (in the ordinary sense of eis after ἐτοιμάζω and its kindred words—viz. "in reference to," "in reservation for," "with a view to;" see ver. 7; 2 Tim. ii. 21; and πρὸς, 1 Pet. iii. 15) the hour and day and month and year (viz. which had been appointed by God: the appointed hour occurring in the appointed day, and that in the appointed month, and that in the appointed year. The art., prefixed, and not repeated, seems to make this meaning imperative. Had the art. been repeated before each, the ideas of the appointed hour, day, month, and year would have been separated, not, as now, united: had there been no art., we might have understood that the four were to be added together to make up the time, though even thus the eis occurring once only would have made some difficulty. The natural way of expressing this latter meaning would be, εἰς ὄραν κ. εἰς ἡμέραν κ. εἰς μῆνα κ. εἰς ἑνιαυτόν. The only way in which it can be extracted from the words as they now stand, is by understanding the τὴν to designate some previously well-known period, "for the (well-known) hour and day and month and year." But as no such notoriety of the period named can be recognized, we must I conceive adhere to the sense above given), that (ἵνα belongs to ἠτοιμασμένοι more naturally than to ἐλύθησαν) they should kill the third part of men (on τὸ τρίτον, see above, ch. viii. 7. The armour of both was uniform) breastplates fiery-red (the three epithets express the colours of the breastplates, and are to be separated, as belonging each to one portion of the host, and corresponding to the fire, smoke, and brimstone which proceeded out of the horses' mouths below) and fuliginous (answering to καπνός below. δακτύλιος is used for any dark dull their mouths. For the power of the horses is in their mouths (principally; seeing that by what proceeded from their mouths their mission, to slay the third part of men, was accomplished) and in their tails: for their tails were like serpents, having heads, and with (ἐν is the prep. of investiture, used of that in which clad or armed a man does any thing) them they hurt (i. e. inflict pain: viz. with the bites of the serpent heads in which they terminate. I cannot but mention, in no unfriendly spirit, but because, both being friends, Truth is the dearer, that which may be designated the culminating instance of incongruous interpretation in Mr. Elliott's historical exposition of these prophecies. These tails are, according to him, the horsetails, borne as symbols of authority by the Turkish Pachas. Well may Mr. Barker say (Friendly Strictures, p. 32), "an interpretation so wild, if it refutes not itself, seems scarcely capable of refutation." Happily, it does refute itself. For it is convicted, by altogether leaving out of view the power in the mouths, which is the principal feature in the original vision: by making no reference to the serpent-like character of these tails, but being wholly inconsistent with it: by distorting the canon of symmetrical interpretation in making the heads attached to the tails to mean that the tails are symbols of authority: and by being compelled to render ἀδικοῦσι "they commit injustice," a meaning which, in this reference, it surely will not bear. When it is said of fire- and smoke- and brimstone-breathing horses which kill the third part of men, that besides having power in their mouths they have it in their tails, which are like serpents, ending in heads, it would be a strange anti-climax to end, "and with these they do injustice." I will venture to say, that a more self-condemnatory interpretation was never broached than this of the horsetails of the Pachas. And the rest of men (this specification which follows clearly shews what sort of men are meant; viz. the ungodly alone) who were not killed in (the course of: the ἐν again of that in which, as its vehicle or investiture, their death would come, if it had come) these plagues, did not even (the force of οὐδέ, which on the whole seems likely to have been the original reading) repent of (ἐκ, so as to come out from: see reff.) the works of their hands (i. e. as the context here necessitates, not, the whole course of their lives, but the idols which their hands had made. This will at once appear on comparing our passage with Deut. iv. 28, λατρεύσετε ἐκεῖ θεοῖς ἐτέροις, ἔργοις χειρῶν ἀνθρώπων, ξύλοις καὶ λίθοις, οἱ οὐκ ὄψονται, κ.τ.λ., and Ps. cxxxiv. 15, τὰ εἰδῶλα τῶν ἐθνῶν ἀργύριον κ. χρυσίον, ἔργα χειρῶν ἀνθρώπων στόμα ἔχουσι καὶ οὐ λαλήλουσιν, κ.τ.λ. See also Acts vii. 41) that they should not (in order not to: the final purpose, explaining the οὐ μετεν. ἐκ preceding: cf. devils, by whatever name they may be called), and images of gold (lit. the images which are, &c. But this we idiomatically express as above) and of silver and of brass and of stone and of wood, which can neither see nor hear nor walk: and they did not repent of their murders nor of their witchcrafts (lit. their drugs: concrete in sense of abstract, as in all the places in the canonical LXX in ref. On the sense, see note on Gal. v. 20) nor of their fornication (Bengel remarks on πορνείας being in the sing., whereas the rest are plural, "Alia scelera ab hominibus per intervalla patrantur: una perpetua πορνεία est apud eos qui munditie cordis carent." But perhaps this is too refined) nor of their thefts. The character of these sins points out very plainly who are the sufferers by this sixth, or second woe trumpet, and the survivors who do not repent. We are taught by St. Paul that the heathen are without excuse for degrading the majesty of God into an image made like unto corruptible things, and for degenerating into gross immoralities in spite of God's testimony given through the natural conscience. And even thus will the heathen world continue in the main until the second advent of our Lord, of which these judgments are to be the immediate precursors. Nor will these terrible inflictions themselves bring those to repentance, who shall ultimately reject the Gospel which shall be preached among all nations. Whether, or how far, those Christians who have fallen back into these sins of the heathen, are here included, is a question not easy to decide. That they are not formally in the Apostle's view, seems clear. We are not yet dealing with the apostasy and fornication within the church herself. But that they, having become as the κατοικούντες ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, even so far as to inherit their character of persecutors of the saints, may by the very nature of the case, be individually included in the suffering of these plagues,—just as we believe and trust that many individually belonging to Babylon may be found among God's elect,—it is of course impossible to deny.

CH. X. 1—XII. 14.] EPISODICAL AND ANTICIPATORY. As after the sixth seal, so here after the sixth trumpet, we have a passage interposed, containing two episodes, completing that which has been already detailed, and introducing the final member of the current series. But it is not so easy here as there, to ascertain the relevance and force of the episodes. Their subjects here seem further off: their action more complicated. In order to appreciate them, it will be necessary to lay down clearly the point at which we have arrived, and to observe what is at that point required.

The last vision witnessed the destruction of a third part of the ungodly by the horsemen from the East, and left the remainder in a state of impenitent idolatry and sin. Manifestly then the prayers of the saints are not yet answered, however near the time may be for that answer. If then this Episode contains some assurance of the approach of that answer in its completeness, it will be what we might expect at this point in the series of visions.

At the same time, looking onwards to the rest of the book, we see, that as out of the more general series of visions at the opening of the seals, there sprung a new and more particular series of the trumpets, having reference to one incident in the former vision, and affecting especially the "inhabiters of the earth," so if now the gaze of prophecy once more turns to the church and her fortunes, and the Apostle receives a new commission to utter a second series of prophecies, mainly on that subject, it will also be no more than what we might fairly look for. Again: if the episcodical vision in its character and hue partakes of the complexion of the whole series of trumpet-visions, and, as regards the church, carries a tinge of persecution, and of the still crying prayer for vengeance, not yet fully answered,—while at the same time it contains expressions and allusions which can only be explained by reference onward to the visions yet to come; this complex character is just that which would suit the point of transition at which we are now standing, when the series of visions immediately dependent on one feature in the opening of the seals is just at its end, and a new one evolving the other great subject of that general series is about to begin.

Now each one of these particulars is found as described above. For 1) the angel of ch. x. declares, with reference to the great vengeance-burden of the whole series of the trumpet-visions, respecting which the souls of the martyrs had been commanded ἵνα ἀναπαύσωνται ἔτι χρόνον μικρόν, ch. vi. 11,—that χρόνος οὐκέτι ἔσται, but that in the days of the seventh angel, when he is about to blow, the whole mystery of prophecy would be fulfilled.

2) The same angel gives to the Seer the open little book, with a distinct announcement that he is to begin a new series of prophecies, and that series, by what immediately follows, ch. xi. 1 ff., evidently relating to the church of God in an especial manner.

3) The whole complexion of the episcodical vision of the two witnesses, ch. xi. 3 ff., is tinged with the hue which has pervaded the series of trumpet-visions, from their source in ch. vi. 9—11, viz. that of vengeance for the sufferings of the saints: while at the same time allusions occur in it which are at present inexplicable, but will receive light hereafter, when the new series of visions is unfolded. Such are the allusions to τὸ θηρίον τὸ ἀναβαῖνον ἐκ τῆς ἀβύσσου, ch. xi. 7, and τὸ ἡ πόλις ἡ μεγάλη, ib. ver. 8.

With these preliminary considerations, we may, I think, approach these episcodical visions with less uncertainty.

1—11.] THE VISION OF THE LITTLE BOOK. 1—4. Introductory. And I saw another strong angel (ἄλλον, perhaps in allusion to the many which have been mentioned: but seeing that the epithet ἰσχυρόν occurs in the mention of the angel who cried out in reference to the sealed book, ch. v. 2, and that the present angel's errand also regards a book, we can hardly help taking ἄλλον with both substantive and adjective, and referring it to that first ἄγγελος ἰσχυρός in ch. v. 2. And this consideration may serve to introduce the assertion, to me hardly admitting of a doubt, that this angel is not, and cannot be, our Lord himself. Such a supposition would, it seems to me, entirely break through the consistency of apocalyptic analogy. Throughout the book, as before observed, on ch. viii. 3, angels are the ministers of the divine purposes, and the carriers out of the apocalyptic course of procedure, but are every where distinct from the divine Persons themselves. In order to this their ministry, they are invested with such symbols and such delegated attributes as beseem in each case the particular object in view: but no apparent fitness of such symbolical investiture to the divine character should induce us to break through the distinction, and introduce indistinctness and confusion into the book. When St. John means to indicate the Son of God, he indicates Him plainly: none more so: when these plain indications are absent, and I find the name ἄγγελος used, I must take leave to regard the agent as distinct from Him,—however clothed, for the purposes of the particular vision, with His delegated power and attributes) descending out of heaven (the place of the Seer yet continues in heaven: see below, vv. 8, 9), clothed with a cloud (as a messenger of divine judgment: see ch. i. 7), and the rainbow upon his head (ἡ well-known, ordinary, rainbow: indicating, agreeably with its first origin, God's covenant of mercy. See note on ch. iv. 3. On the accus. after ἐπὶ at the first mention of superposition, see note, ch. iv. 2), and his face as the sun (indicating the divine glory with which he was invested: see ch. i. 16, xviii. 1: and compare Luke ix.

26), and his feet as pillars of fire (see ch. i. 15. The symbols with which this angel is accompanied, as those which surrounded the throne of God in ch. iv. 2 ff., betoken judgment tempered with mercy, the character of his ministration, which, at the same time that it proclaims the near approach of the completion of God's judgments, furnishes to the Seer the book of his subsequent prophecy, the following out of God's purposes of mercy), and having in his hand (his left hand, by what follows, ver. 5) a little book (the diminutive has been taken by some to point to the subsequent eating of the book by the Apostle: so Eichhorn: but Düsterd. remarks that if so, even the βιβλαρίδιον would be too large:—by others, to the size relatively to the angel: so Bengel. But the most natural reason for its use is to be found by comparison with the βιβλίον of ch. v. ff. That was the great sealed roll of God's purposes: this (see below) but one portion of those purposes, which was to be made the Seer's own for his future prophesying. The form βιβλαρίδιον is not found in Greek writers: the diminutive is βιβλιαρίδιον, used by Aristoph. frag. (in Julius Pollux, vii. 210. See also Phot. Bibl. p. 142). On the signification, &c., of this little book or roll, see below ver. 8, notes) open. And he placed his right foot on the sea, and his left on the earth, and cried with a loud voice as a lion roareth (the whole imagery represents the glory and majesty of Him whose messenger this angel is: and is to be taken literally in the vision, the earth meaning the earth; the sea, the sea: and the description of the loudness of the voice being simply thus descriptive). And when he cried, the seven thunders (it is probable that the art. αι is prefixed because, like the seven stars, churches, seals, trumpets, and vials, these seven thunders form a complete portion of the apocalyptic machinery: and having no other designation, for the very reason that their meaning is not revealed, they are thus designated, as "the seven thunders") spoke their (no further stress on εαυτῶν, than as it belongs to the peculiar character of the utterances of these thunders. They were to be concealed, remaining unwritten: and this fact, I conceive, reflects back a tinge on the possessive genitive, making it so far emphatic: the voices were, and remained, εαυτῶν: not shared by being perpetuated) voices. And when the seven thunders spoke, I was about to write (in obedience to the command in ch. i. 19): and (not, "but:" as I was about to write, a new circumstance arose) I heard a voice out of heaven (from which it does not follow that the Seer is on earth, any more than in ver. 1) saying,

Seal up the things which the seven thunders spoke, and do not write them (cf. the contrary command, ch. xxii. 10. Many speculations have been raised as to the purport of the utterances of the seven thunders, and the reason for concealing them. From the very nature of the case, these must be utterly in vain. The wisdom of Him who signified this Revelation to His servant John, has not seen fit to reveal these things to us. But the very nature of the case also convicts some of these speculations of error. The thunders, e. g., did not speak "humanum excedentia captum" as Ewald, seeing that not only did St. John understand their utterances, but he was about to write them down for others to read, as intelligible to them also. Again, they were not any utterances of mere human device. They were spoken by command of the great angel, as ver. 3 necessarily implies: they in common with the seals, trumpets, and vials, form part of the divinely-arranged machinery of the Apocalypse. It is matter of surprise and grief therefore, when we find historical interpreters of our day explaining them of the papal anathemas of the time of the Reformation. Elliott, vol. ii. p. 100 ff. It seems to me that no interpretation could be more unfortunate—none more thoroughly condemnatory of the system which is compelled to have recourse to it. For, merely to insist upon one point,—if it were so, then the Apostle sealed the utterances in vain, for all know what those thunders have uttered: then the command should have run σφράγισον . . . ἔως καιροῦ συντελείας, as in Dan. xii. 4, instead of an absolute command as here. Thus much we may infer; from the very character of thunder,—that the utterances were of fearful import: from the place which they hold, that they related to the church: from the command to conceal them, first, encouragement, that God in His tender mercy to His own does not reveal all His terrors: secondly, godly fear, seeing that the arrows of His quiver are not exhausted, but besides things expressly foretold, there are more behind not revealed to us). 5-7.]

The oath of the strong angel, that the time of fulfilment of all prophecy was close at hand. In this portion of the vision, the reminiscences of Dan. xii. 7 are very frequent:—καὶ ἤκουσα τοῦ ἀνδρός τοῦ ἐνδεδυμένου τὰ βαδδίν, ὃς ἦν ἐπάνω τοῦ ὕδατος τοῦ ποταμοῦ, καὶ ὕψωσε τὴν δεξιάν αὐτοῦ καὶ τὴν ἀριστεράν αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, καὶ ὤμοσεν ἐν τῷ ζῶντι εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, ὅτι εἰς καιρὸν καιρῶν καὶ ἡμισυ καιροῦ, ἐν τῷ συντελεσθῆναι διασκορπισμὸν γνώσονται πάντα ταῦτα. And the angel whom I saw standing upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted his right hand (not both hands, as in Daniel above, seeing that the little book lay open on his left. On the practice of lifting the hand in swearing, cf. ref. and Gen. xiv. 22 (Exod. vi. 8 and Num. xiv. 30, marg. and LXX) towards heaven (as God's dwelling-place, Isa. lvii. 15) and swore by (construction, see ref.) Him that liveth to the ages of the ages (cf. Dan. above), who created the heaven and the things in it, and the earth and the things in it, and the sea and the things in it (this full and formal designation of God as Creator of all is given, because the subject of the angel's oath is, the mystery of God, which necessarily rests in His power alone who made all things.

We may observe, that the fact as well as the form of this oath is against the supposition, that this strong angel is the Lord Himself. Considering St. John's own declarations respecting the Son of God, it is utterly inconceivable that he should have related as spoken by Him an oath couched in these terms), that time (see below) should no longer be (i. e. should no more intervene: in allusion to the answer given to the cry of the souls of the martyrs, ch. vi. 11, καὶ ἐββέθη αὐτοῖς ἵνα ἀναπαύσονται ἔτι χρόνον μικρόν. This whole series of trumpet-judgments has been an answer to the prayers of the saints, and now the vengeance is about to receive its entire fulfilment: χρόνος οὐκέτι ἔσται: the appointed delay is at an end. That this is the meaning is shewn by the ἀλλ' ἐν τ. ἡμ. which follows. Several erroneous views have been taken of this saying: e. g., 1) that of Bede "mutabilis saecularium temporum varietas in novissima tuba cessabit," al., and apparently the E. V. ("that there should be time no longer")—that it imports the ending of the state of time, and the beginning of eternity: 2) the chronological one of Bengel, who allots a definite length, viz. 1111½ years (?) to a chronus, and then interprets, "there shall not elapse a chronus:" bringing the end, on his successive-historical system, to the year 1836, which is self-refuted: 3) the view of Vitringa and Heugstenb., which grounds an error on the right understanding of these words themselves,—“moram nullam temporis esse intercessuram inter clangorem septimæ tubæ et oraculorum prophetorum implementum:" for the assertion of ver. 7, which is the carrying out of this denial, expressly identifies the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to sound, with the immediate fulfilment of all prophecy): but (ἀλλά is not = εἰ μή, but bears its proper meaning of strong contrast) in the days of the voice of the seventh angel (i. e. the days indicated, in the fulfilment of the vision, by the sounding of the seventh angel's trumpet. De W. well observes, that there is in the diction of this clause a mingling of the fulfilment with the prophecy), when he is about to blow his trumpet (these words ὅταν μέλλῃ are used, as in reff., in their strictest propriety. For when the seventh angel does sound, the completed time of the fulfilment is simultaneous with his blowing: cf. ch. xi. 18: so that it is properly said that the fulfilment comes in the days when he is about to blow. Elliott's version, "at what time soever he may have to sound," can hardly be the rendering of ὅταν μέλλῃ σαλπίζειν. For 1) ὅταν will not in the LXX and N. T. bear this emphatic uncertainty, but is simply "when," in contingent clauses: and 2) μέλλῃ, in a sentence spoken strictly of time, must be kept to its temporal signification. Of course, the E. V., "when he shall begin to sound," is inadmissible), then (this καί in apodosis is in fact the token of a mixed construction: which resolved would be ἀλλ' ὅτι ἤξουσιν αἱ ἡμέραι κ.τ.λ., καὶ κ.τ.λ. So also in reff. See Wiener, edu. 6, § 53. 3, f) the mystery of God (this expression will be best understood by ref. Rom., connected as it is here with the verb εὐηγγέλισεν (see below). It is the mystery of the kingdom, as unfolded in the course of the Gospel dispensation, as is clearly shewn by the thanksgiving after the blowing of the seventh trumpet in ch. xi. 15 ff.) is fulfilled (lit., was fulfilled,—the speaker looking back, in prophetic anticipation, on the days spoken of, from a point when they should have become a thing past), as He evangelized (it is impossible to give the force of εὐηγγέλισεν with the accus. by a periphrasis, without losing its force. It expresses that God informed them of the glad tidings: it being left to be understood by their office of προφήτης, that they published the εὐαγγέλιον. 3—11.] The delivery of the little book to John, and announcement of a further work of prophecy to be carried on by him. And the voice which I heard out of heaven, (I) again (heard) talking with me and saying (the sentence is a curious instance of mixed construction. One of its simple forms would be κ. ἡ φωνὴ ἦν ἤκ. ἐκ τ. οὐρ. πάλιν ἐλάλει μετ' ἐμοῦ λέγουσα: the other, κ. τὴν φωνὴν ἤκουσα ἐκ τ. οὐρ. πάλ. λαλοῦσαν μετ' ἐμοῦ κ. λέγουσαν. The former member of the first of these, and the latter member of the second, are united in the text), Go take the book which lieth open in the hand of the angel which standeth upon the sea and upon the earth. And I went away (from my former place as a spectator in heaven: from which, however, the Seer does not seem wholly to remove, cf. ch. xi. 16; xix. 1 ff., although his principal spot of observation is henceforth the earth: cf. ch. xi. 1, xiv. 1, xvii. 3, &c.) to the angel telling him (the pres. part. contains the reason of the ἀπῆλθον) to give me the little book. And he saith to me, Take and eat it up (cf. Ezek. iii. 1 ff.; Jer. xv. 16; Ps. xl. 9): and it shall embitter thy belly, but in thy mouth shall be sweet as honey. And I took the book out of the hand of the angel and ate it up: and it was in my mouth as honey, sweet; and when I had eaten it up, my belly was embittered (there is the difference between Ezekiel's roll and this, that, in the prophet's case, only the sweetness in the mouth is mentioned. The Angel, dwelling most on the most important thing, the working of the contents of the book, puts the bitterness first: the Evangelist, in relating what happened, follows the order of time. The text itself will guard us against some misinterpretations of this bitterness and sweetness. It is plain that we must understand these to belong, not to differing characters of different portions of the contents of the book (as Heine, Ewald), but to different sensations of the Evangelist in different parts of his body respecting one and the same content of the book. Nor again must we invert the order, imagining (as Herder and Rinck) that the first bitterness leads afterwards to sweetness and joy, or (as Bede, Aretius, al.) that the bitterness in the belly indicates the reception by the Evangelist, but the sweetness in the mouth, the declaration to others; proceeding on a misunderstanding of ver. 11. For further particulars, see below). And they say (λέγουσιν) leaves the speakers quite indefinite; amounting in fact to no more than "it was said" to me, Thou must (i. e. it is God's will that thou shouldest: a command is laid upon thee so to do) again prophesy (as thou hast done before in writing the former part of the ἀποκάλυψις: see in the interpretation below) concerning (not, as E. See Winer, edn. 6, § 48, c. c) peoples and nations and languages and many kings (i. e. concerning the inhabitants of the earth, as before: cf. ch. v. 9, where the Lamb's worthiness to open the former βιβλίον is connected with His having redeemed ἐκ πάσης φυλῆς κ. γλώσσης κ. λαοῦ κ. ἔθνους).

I have postponed till this point the question, what we are to understand by the βιβλαρίδιον, and the Seer's concern with it. And I will at once say, before discussing the various differing interpretations, that I conceive the simple acceptance of the description and symbolism here can lead but to one conclusion; viz. that it represents the μυστήριον τοῦ θεοῦ above spoken of, the subject of the remainder of the apocalyptic prophecies. So far, many of the principal Commentators are at one. Indeed it is difficult to conceive how any other interpretation can have been thought of, except as made necessary by some previous self-committal of the Expositor regarding the sealed book of ch. v., or by the exigencies of some historical system. But within the limits of this agreed meaning, there are many different views as to the extent of the reference of the "little book" to that which follows, and as to its relation to the seven-sealed book of ch. v. As regards these points, we may remark, 1) that the contents of the "little book" cannot well be confined to ch. xi. 1—13, or we should not have had so solemn an inauguration of it, nor so wide-reaching an announcement of the duty of the Apostle consequent on the receipt of it: 2) that the oath of the Angel must necessarily be connected with his bearing of the open book on his hand, and if so, makes it necessary to infer that the contents of the book are identical with the mystery, respecting which he swears: 3) that the episode which follows, containing the first work of the Apostle under this his new prophetic commission, inchoates an entirely new matter—the things which befall the Church of God and the holy city, which new character of incidents continues to prevail until the very end of the book: 4) that the relation of this "little book" to the sealed book of ch. v. can hardly be doubtful to the readers of this Commentary, seeing that we have maintained that book to be the sum of the divine purposes, which is not opened at all within the limits of the apocalyptic vision, but only prepared to be opened by the removal of its seven seals. That this is not that complete record of the divine purposes, nor, technically speaking, any portion of it, must be evident to us. For it forms a small detached roll or volume, lying open on the angel's hand: it is destined for the especial individual behoof of the Seer, into whom it passes, and becomes assimilated with himself, to be given forth as he should be directed to utter it. 5) That it contained more than we possess in the remaining portion of this book, is probable. St. John doubtless knew more than he has told us. Previously to this, he knew what the seven thunders uttered: and subsequently to this, we can hardly imagine that he was ignorant of the name of the wild beast, whose number he has given us.

It remains that we say something on the circumstances accompanying the Apostle's reception of the mysterious book.

Its sweetness, when he tasted it, allusive as it is to the same circumstance in Ezekiel's eating the roll which was all lamentation, mourning, and woe, doubtless represents present satisfaction at being informed of, and admitted to know, a portion of God's holy will: of those words of which the Psalmist said, Ps. cxix. 103, "How sweet are thy words unto my taste, yea sweeter than honey unto my mouth!" But when the roll came to be not only tasted, but digested,—the nature of its contents felt within the man,—bitterness took the place of sweetness: the persecutions, the apostasies, the judgments, of the church and people of the Lord, saddened the spirit of the Seer, and dashed his joy at the first reception of the mystery of God.

CH. XI. 1—14.] The measurement of the temple of God. The two witnesses: their testimony, death, resurrection, and assumption into heaven: the earthquake, and its consequences.

This passage may well be called, even more than that previous one, ch. x. 1 ff., the crux interpretum; as it is undoubtedly one of the most difficult in the whole Apocalypse. Referring to the histories of apocalyptic exegesis for an account of the various interpretations, I will, as I have done in similar cases, endeavour to lay down a few landmarks, which may serve for guidance at least to avoid inconsistency, if we cannot do more. And I will remark, 1) that we are not bound to the hard "wooden" literal sense so insisted on in our day by some of the modern German Expositors. I would strongly recommend any one who takes that view, who will have Jerusalem = nothing but Jerusalem, and confine the two witnesses to two persons bodily appearing there, to read through the very unsatisfactory and shuffling comment of Düsterdieck here: the result of which is, that finding, as he of course does, many discrepancies between this and our Lord's prophecy of the same destruction of Jerusalem, he is driven to the refuge that while our Lord describes matters of fact, St. John idealizes the catastrophe, setting it forth not as it really took place, but according to its inner connexion with the final accomplishment of the mystery of God, and correspondently to the hope which God's Old Testament people possessed as contrasted with the heathen power of this world, which abides in "Babylon." But really, if we have come thus far by fighting for the literal interpretation, why not a little further? Or rather why so far? If "Babylon" is the abode of the world, why not "Jerusalem" of the church? If our interpreter, maintaining the literal sense, is allowed so far to "idealize," as to exempt the temple of God itself (ver. 1) from a destruction which we know overtook it, and nine-tenths of the city (ver. 13) from an overthrow which destroyed it all, surely there is an end to the meaning of words. If Jerusalem here is simply Jerusalem, and the prophecy regards her overthrow by the Romans, and especially if this passage is to be made such use of as to set aside the testimony of Irenæus as to the date of the Apocalypse by the stronger testimony of the Apocalypse itself (so Düsterd. from Lücke), then must every particular be shewn to tally with known history; or if this cannot be done, at least it must be shewn that none contradicts it. If this cannot be done, then we may fairly infer that the prophecy has no such reference, or only remotely, here and there, and not as its principal subject. 2) Into whatever difficulty we may be led by the remark, it is no less true, that the πόλις ἡ ἅγια of ver. 2 cannot be the same as the πόλις ἡ μεγάλη of ver. 8. This has been felt by the literal interpreters, and they have devised ingenious reasons why the holy city should afterwards be called the great city: so De Wette, "he named Jerusalem the great city, because he can no more call her holy after her desecration" (but he need not therefore call her great, by which epithet she is never called)—Düsterd., "because it is impossible in one breath to call a city 'holy,' and 'Sodom and Egypt'" (most true: then must we not look for some other city than one which this very prophecy has called holy?). So far Joachim says well, "Veruntamen quod ait in plateis civitatis magnæ, non satis videtur facere pro eodem intellectu (the literal). Nunquam enim magna civitas forte legitur, sed magis Nineve et Babylon magnæ civitates dictæ sunt: nimirum quia multi sunt vocati, pauci vero electi." His other reason see in the interpretation below. 3) We are compelled, if I am not mistaken, to carry the above considerations somewhat further, by the very conditions of the prophecy itself. For it is manifestly and undeniably of an anticipatory character. It is not, and cannot be, complete in itself. The words of ver. 7, τὸ θηρίον τὸ ἀναβαῖνον ἐκ τῆς ἀβύσσου, bear no meaning where they stand, but require, in order to be understood at all, to be carried on into the succeeding visions of ch. xiii. ff. And if into those visions, then into a period when this wild-beast has received power from the dragon,—when, as in ch. xiii. 7, he makes war with the saints and conquers them, and all on earth except the elect are worshipping him. 4) Let us observe the result as affecting our interpretation. We are necessarily carried on by the very terms of our present compendious prophecy, into the midst of another prophecy, far more detailed and full of persons and incidents: of one which has its μεγάλη πόλις, its ναὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, its προσκυνούντες ἐν αὐτῷ, its μαρτυρία Ἰησοῦ, and other coincident particulars. What inference does a sound principle of interpretation force upon us? What, if not this—that our present compendious prophecy, as in the particular of the beast that comes out of the abyss, so in its other features, must be understood as giving in summary, and introducing, that larger one? and consequently, that its terms are to be understood by those of that larger one, not servilely and literally where they stand? And observe, this is deduced from the very necessity of the case itself, as shewn in ver. 7, not from any system throwing its attraction forward and biasing our views. We cannot understand this prophecy at all, except in the light of those that follow: for it introduces by anticipation their dramatis personæ. 5) If I mistake not, we thus gain much light on the difficulties of this prophecy. If it is a compendium of the more detailed prophecies which follow, opening the great series regarding God's church, and reaching forward to the time of the seventh trumpet, then its separate parts, so hard to assign on any other view, at once fall into their places. Then, e. g. we at once know what is meant by the temple and its worshippers, viz. that these expressions are identical in reference with those others in the subsequent prophecy which point out an elect remnant, a Goshen in Egypt, a Zoar from Sodom, a number who do not worship the wild-beast and his image, who are not defiled with women, &c. And so of the rest. 6) It will then be on this principle that I shall attempt the exposition of this difficult prophecy. Regarding it as a summary of the more detailed one which follows, I shall endeavour to make the two cast light on one another: searching for the meaning of the symbols here used in their fuller explanation there, and gaining perhaps some further insight into meanings there from expressions occurring here.

1, 2.] Command to measure the temple, but not the outer court, which is given to the Gentiles: And there was given to me (by whom, is not said, but it is left indefinite, as at ch. vi. 11, viii. 2) a reed like to a staff (see ref.) saying (λέγων is out of the construction, and indefinite: as in ch. iv. 1. Andr., in Catena, imagines that it is the reed that speaks, and builds an allegorical interpretation on the idea: πῶς γὰρ ὁ κάλαμος ἄψυχος ὧν ἔλεγεν Ἐγειραι κ.τ.λ.; ἐκ τούτου οὖν δείκνυται, ἀγγελικῇ συνείσει μετρεῖσθαι τὸν ναὸν τοῦ θεοῦ. And so in our own time, remarkably enough, Bp. Wordsworth: "The Reed speaks: it is inspired: the Spirit is in it: it is the Word of God. And it measures the Church: that is, the Canon of Scripture is the rule of faith." (Thus in his Lectures on the Apocalypse. In his notes ad loc., he treats λέγων as absolute.), Arise (ἔγειρε does not necessarily imply that the Apostle was kneeling before: see ref.) and measure the temple of God and the altar (apparently, the altar of incense: as that alone stood in the ναὸς. But perhaps we must not be too minute in particularizing), and them that worship in it (see the previous remarks on this prophecy. The measuring here is evidently for the purpose of taking account of, understanding the bearing and dimensions of, that which is to be measured; see ch. xxi. 15, where the heavenly Jerusalem is measured by the angel. But here two questions arise: 1) What is that which is measured? and 2) when does the measuring take place? 1) I have no doubt that, as above hinted, the ναὸς τ. θεοῦ and its θυσιαστήριον are to be here taken symbolically, as the other principal features of the prophecy: and to one believing this, there can be but little further doubt as to what meaning he shall assign to the terms. Thus understood, they can only bear one meaning: viz., that of the Church of the elect servants of God, every where in this book symbolized by Jews in deed and truth. The society of these, as a whole, is the ναὸς, agreeably to Scripture symbolism elsewhere, e. g. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17, and is symbolized by the inner or holy place of the Jerusalem temple, in and among which they as true Israelites and priests unto God, have a right to worship and minister. These are they who, properly speaking, alone are measured: estimated again and again in this book by tale and number—partakers in the first resurrection,—the Church of the first-born. Then as to our question 2), it is one which, so far as I know, has not engaged the attention of expositors. When a command is elsewhere in this book given to the Seer, we may observe that his fulfilment of it is commonly indicated. He is commanded to write, and the writing before us proves his obedience. He is ordered to take the little book, καὶ ἀπῆλθον κ.τ.λ. But of the fulfilment by him of this command, ἔγερε καὶ μέτρησον, no hint appears to be given. The voice goes on continuously, until it melts imperceptibly into the narrative of the vision. After this, we hear no more of the measuring, till another and more glorious building is measured in ch. xxi. This being so, either 1) which is inconceivable, the measurement does not take place at all, or, 2) which is hardly probable, it takes place and no result is communicated to us, or 3) the result of it is found in the subsequent prophecies: in the minute and careful distinctions between the servants of God and those who receive the mark of the wild-beast—in all those indications which point out to us the length and breadth and depth and height, both of faith, and of unfaithfulness). And the court which is outside the temple (i. e. apparently, every thing except the ναὸς itself: not merely the outer court or court of the Gentiles. That only the ναὸς itself, in the strictest sense, is to be measured, is significant for the meaning above maintained) cast out (of thy measurement. But these strong words, conveying so slight a meaning, doubtless bear in them a tinge also of the stronger meaning, “reckon as profane,” “account not as included in the sacred precinct”), and measure not it (αὐτὴν has a slight emphasis: otherwise it need not have been expressed), because it was given (viz. at the time when the state of things subsisting in the vision came in: or, in God’s apportionment) to the Gentiles (if the ναὸς and the προσκυνοῦντες represent the elect church of the first-born, the ἔθνη will correspond to those who are outside this sacred enclosure: those over whom eventually the millennial reign of ch. xx. shall be exercised: those from among whom shall spring the enmity against God’s church, but among whom also shall be many who shall fear, and give God glory, cf. ver. 13. Of these is formed the outward seeming church, mixed up with the world; in them, though not in each case commensurate with them, is Babylon, is the reign of the wild-beast, the agency of the false prophet: they are the κατοικοῦντες τὴν γῆν or ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, the material on which judgment and mercy are severally exercised in the rest of this book (cf. especially ver. 18), as contrasted with God’s own people, gathered and to be gathered out from among them), and they shall tread down (i. e. trample as conquerors, the outer church being in subjection to them: see ref. The other meaning, shall tread, merely, is of course included; but must not be made the prevalent one. The period named shall be one during which ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν βιάζεται, καὶ βιασται ἀρπάξουσιν αὐτήν, Matt. xi. 12) the holy city (Jerusalem, in the literal sense of the prophecy: the whole temple except the ναὸς itself being counted with the city outside) forty and two months (this period occurs in three forms in this book: 1) as forty-two months; see ch. xiii. 5: 2) as 1260 days = 42 months × 30, see ver. 3, ch. xii. 6: 3) as time, times, and half a time = 3½ years, 3 × 360 + 180 = 1260 days, see ch. xii. 14. This latter designation is also found in Dan. vii. 25, xii. 7. With respect to these periods, I may say that, equal as they certainly seem to be, we have no right to suppose them, in any two given cases, to be identical, unless the context requires such a supposition. For instance, in these two verses, 2 and 3, there is strong temptation to regard the two equal periods as coincident and identical: but it is plain that such a view is not required by the context; the prophecy contains no note of such coincidence, but may be very simply read without it, on the view that the two periods are equal in duration, but independent of one another: and the rather, that this prophecy, as has been already shewn, is of a compendious character, hereafter to be stated at large. I will further remark, and the reader will find this abundantly borne out by research into histories of apocalyptic exegesis, that no solution at all approaching to a satisfactory one has ever yet been given of any one of these periods. This being so, my principle is to regard them as being still among the things unknown to the Church, and awaiting their elucidation by the event. It is our duty to feel our way by all the indications which Scripture furnishes, and by the light which history, in its main and obvious salient events, has thrown on Scripture: and, when those fail us, to be content to confess our ignorance. An apocalyptic commentary which explains every thing, is self-convicted of error).

3—13.] THE TWO WITNESSES: their testimony, death, resurrection, ascension: consequences on the beholders. The remarks just made are here especially applicable. No solution has ever been given of this portion of the prophecy. Either the two witnesses are literal,—two individual men,—or they are symbolical,—two individuals taken as the concentration of principles and characteristics, and this either in themselves, or as representing men who embodied those principles and characteristics. In the following notes I shall point out how far one, how far another of these views, is favoured by the text, and leave the reader to judge. And I will give to my two witnesses (the heavenly voice is still speaking in the name of Christ. That we must not press the μου to the inference that Christ himself speaks, is plain by ὅπου καὶ ὁ κύριος αὐτῶν ἐσταυρώθη below. The art. τοῖς seems as if the two witnesses were well known, and distinct in their individuality. The δυσίν is essential to the prophecy, and is not to be explained away. No interpretation can be right which does not, either in individuals, or in characteristic lines of testimony, retain and bring out this dualism. See further below. As regards the construction, δώσω is followed, not by an infin., but by the less usual apodosis, καὶ προφητεύσουσιν κ.τ.λ. Nothing need be supplied after δώσω, as is done by Lyra and Corn.-a-lap. ("constantiam et sapientiam") and Beza ("sanctam civitatem," which is decidedly wrong, seeing it is given to the Gentiles), and they shall prophesy (προφητεύσουσιν here has generally been taken to mean, shall preach repentance. It may be so: but in ch. x. 11, the verb is used in its later and stricter sense of foretelling events, as in 1 Pet. i. 10; Jude 14. If their testimony consisted in denouncing judgment, the other would necessarily be combined with it) a thousand two hundred and sixty days (Düsterd. remarks that the fact of a period of the same length as the forty-two months being now expressed in days, implies that they will prophesy day by day throughout it. The reader will of course see, that the two questions, of these days being days or years, and of the individuality or the symbolical character of the witnesses, are mutually connected together. He will also bear in mind that it is a pure assumption that the two periods, the forty-two months and the 1260 days, coincide over the same space of time. The duration of time is that during which the power of Elijah's prophecy shut up the heaven: viz. three years and six months: see Luke iv. 25, and more on ver. 6 below) clothed in sackcloth (in token of need of repentance and of approaching judgment: see Isa. xxii. 12; Jer. iv. 8, vi. 26; Jonah iii. 5. Certainly this portion of the prophetic description strongly favours the individual interpretation. For first, it is hard to conceive how whole bodies of men and churches could be thus described: and secondly, the principal symbolical interpreters have left out, or passed very slightly, this important particular. One does not see how bodies of men who lived like other men (their being the victims of persecution is another matter), can be said to have prophesied clothed in sackcloth. It is to be observed that such was the garment of Elijah; see 2 Kings i. 8, and cf. Matt. iii. 4). These are the two olive trees and the two candlesticks which stand before the Lord of the earth (the whole from ref. Zech., to which the art. αἱ refers. But it is to be observed that while in Zech. we have the two ἐλαῖαι, and spoken of in the same terms as here, there is but one λυχναῖα, with its seven lights, which very seven lights, as there interpreted in ver. 10, are referred to in our ch. iv. 5, v. 6. So that it is somewhat difficult to say, whence αἱ δύο λυχναῖαι has come. The most probable view is that St. John has taken up and amplified the prophetic symbolism of Zechariah, carrying it on by the well-known figure of lights, as representing God's testifying servants. Who the two "sons of oil" in the prophet were, whether Zerubbabel and Joshua, or the prophets Zechariah and Haggai, is of no import to our text here): and if any one be minded to harm them, fire goeth forth (the pres., of that which is habitual and settled, though yet future: see also on ver. 7 below) out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies (so Elijah, 2 Kings i. 10 ff.; and so ran the word of promise to Jeremiah (ref.), ἰδοὺ ἐγὼ δέδωκα τοὺς λόγους μου εἰς τὸ στόμα σου πῦρ, καὶ τὸν λαὸν τοῦτον ξύλα, καὶ καταφάγεται αὐτούς: the two being here combined together. Cf. also Sir. xlviii. 1, ἀνέστη Ἥλιας προφήτης ὡς πῦρ, καὶ ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ ὡς λαμπὰς ἐκαίετο); and if any one be minded to harm them, after this manner (see Sir. xlviii. 3) he must be killed (this whole description is most difficult to apply, on the allegorical interpretation; as is that which follows. And as might have been expected, the allegorists halt and are perplexed exceedingly. The double announcement here seems to stamp the literal sense, and the εἴ τις and δεῖ αὐτὸν ἀποκτανθῆναι are decisive against any mere national application of the words (as Elliott). Individuality could not be more strongly indicated). These have (see on the pres. above) [the] power to shut the heaven, that the rain may not rain during the days of their prophecy (as did Elijah: the duration of the time also corresponding: see reff.): and they have power over the waters to turn them into blood (as had Moses, ref.), and to smite the earth with (the εν of investiture. See ref. 1 Kings, from which, applying to the plagues in Egypt, the expression is taken) every plague as often as they shall be minded (all this points out the spirit and power of Moses, combined with that of Elias. And undoubtedly, it is in these two directions that we must look for the two witnesses, or lines of witnesses. The one impersonates the law, the other the prophets. The one reminds us of the prophet whom God should raise up like unto Moses; the other of Elias the prophet, who should come before the great and terrible day of the Lord; ὁ καταγραφεις ἐν ἐλεγμοῖς εἰς καιρους, κοπάσαι ὄργην πρὸ θυμοῦ, Sir. xlviii. 10. But whether we are to regard these prophecies as to be fulfilled by individuals, or by lines of testimony, must depend entirely on the indications here given). And when they had finished (τελέσωσιν is a futurus exactus, implying, as plainly as words can imply it, that the whole period of their testimony will be at an end when that which is next said shall happen. All attempts of the allegorical expositors to escape this plain meaning of the words are in vain. Such is that of Mede, "when they shall be about finishing:" of Daubuz, "whilst they shall perform:" of Elliott, "when they shall have completed their testimony," meaning thereby not the whole course of it, but any one complete delivery of it which others might have followed) their testimony, the wild-beast that cometh up out of the abyss (this is the first mention of the wild-beast; and the whole description, as remarked above, is anticipatory. The pres. part. ἀναβαῖνον gives simply designation, as so often: and is not to be interpreted future, as Elliott, "that is to ascend." The character of the beast is that he ascendeth out of the abyss; just as the tempter of our Lord is called ὁ πειράζων, Matt. iv. 3, though the narrative is in the past tense. This wild-beast is evidently identical with that mentioned in ch. xvii. 8, of which the same term is used, ὁ μέλλει ἀναβαίνειν ἐκ τῆς ἀβύσσου: and if so, with that also which is introduced ch. xiii. 1 ff., as ἐκ τῆς θαλάσσης θηρίον ἀναβαῖνον, seeing that the same details, of the seven heads and ten horns, are ascribed to the two. But, though the appellation is anticipatory as far as this book is concerned, the beast spoken of was already familiar to its readers from Dan. vii. : see below) shall make war with them (see ref. Dan.), and shall conquer them and kill them. And their corpse (πτῶμα, das Gefallene derjelben, as Düsterd. gives it : “their wreck.” The singular is used, not for any mystical reason, as Wordsw. imagines (who interprets the two witnesses of the Old and New Testaments, and says, “The two witnesses have but one body. They twain are one flesh. The two Testaments are one”), but simply as above, because πτώμα does not properly signify a dead body, but that which has fallen, be it of one, or of many. Below, where the context requires the separate corpses to be specified, the less proper meaning of πτώμα is adopted, and we have the plural (is) (the present is best to supply, on account of the verbs following, which are in the present, until we come to πέμψουσιν : and with which the portion relating to the corpses is bound up) upon the street (reff.) of the great city (not Jerusalem (see above), which is never called by this name : but the ἡ πόλις ἡ μεγάλη of the succeeding visions, of which this is anticipatory and compendious), namely, that which (ἥτις, not = ἡ, but specifying and particularizing) is called spiritually (i. e. allegorically; in a sense higher than the literal and obvious one. The only other place in which we find this usage of the word is in ref. 1 Cor., which see, and notes there) Sodom and Egypt (those Commentators who maintain that the literal Jerusalem is here meant, allege Isa. i. 9 ff., and Ezek. xvi. 48, as places where she is called Sodom. But the latter place is no example : for there Jerusalem is compared, in point of sinfulness, with her sisters, Samaria and Sodom, and is not called Sodom at all. And in Isaiah i. 9 ff., 1) it is not Jerusalem, but the Jewish people in general (see also Isa. iii. 9) that are called by this name : and that 2) not so much in respect of depravity, as of the desolation of Judæa, which (vv. 7—9) almost equalled that of the devoted cities. And even supposing this to be a case in point, no instance can be alleged of Jerusalem being called Egypt, or any thing bearing such an interpretation. Whereas in the subsequent prophecy both these comparisons are naturally suggested with regard to the great city there mentioned : viz. that of Sodom by ch. xix. 3, ὁ καπνὸς αὐτῆς ἀναβαίνει εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, compared with Gen. xix. 28, and that of Egypt, and indeed Sodom also, by ch. xviii. 4 ff., ἐξέλθατε ἐξ αὐτῆς ὁ λαὸς μου, κ.τ.λ.), where their Lord also (as well as they : not the specific term ἐσταυρώθη, but the general fact of death by persecution, underlying it, being in the Writer’s mind) was crucified (these words have principally led those who hold the literal Jerusalem to be meant. But if, as I believe I have shewn, such an interpretation is forbidden by the previous words, then we must not fall back on an erroneous view on account of the apparent requirements of these words, but enquire whether by the light of the subsequent prophecy, which is an expansion of this, we may find some meaning for them in accordance with the preceding conditions. And this is surely not difficult to discover. If we compare ch. xviii. 24, καὶ ἐν αὐτῇ αἷμα προφητῶν κ. ἁγίων εὐρέθη κ. πάντων τῶν ἐσφαγμένων ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, with Matt. xxiii. 35, ὅπως ἔλθη ἐφ’ ὑμᾶς πᾶν αἷμα δίκαιον ἐκχυννόμενον ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, we shall find a wider ground than the mere literal Jerusalem on which to place the Lord’s own martyrdom and that of His saints. It is true, He was crucified at Jerusalem : but it is also true that He was crucified not in, but outside the city, and by the hands, not of Jews, but of Romans. The fact is that the literal Jerusalem, in whom was found the blood of all the saints who had been slain on earth, has been superseded by that wider and greater city, of which this prophecy speaks : and as the temple, in prophetic language, has become the church of God, so the outer city, in the same language, has become the great city which will be the subject of God's final judgments. For those who consider this, there can be no hesitation in interpreting even this local designation also of this great city). And some from among (construction, see reff.) the peoples and tribes and languages and nations look upon (the prophetic history is carried on in the present, as in ch. xviii. 11 compared with ib. ver. 9, and elsewhere) their corpse (see above) three days and a half (on this period we may remark, that these 3½ days are connected by analogy with the periods previously mentioned : with the 1260 days and 42 months = 3½ years : and that in each case the half of the mystic number 7 enters. Also, that Elliott's calculation of this period as 3½ years, by which he makes out that that period elapsed, "precisely, to a day," between the ninth session of the Lateran council, and the posting up of the theses by Luther at Wittenberg,—and on the accuracy of which he exclaims, "O wonderful prophecy! O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the foreknowledge of God!"—labours under this fatal defect :—that whereas his 3 years, from May 5, 1514, to May 5, 1517, are years of 365 days, his half-year, from May 5, 1517, to Oct. 31, of the same year, is "180, or half 360 days : " i. e. wanting 2½ days of the time required ac-

ording to that reckoning. I may observe, that in his Apocalypsis Alfordiana, p. 123, he has repeated this inconsistency), and do not permit (ἀφιουσιν, as ἤφιεν in Mark i. 34, xi. 16, is from the form ἀφίω. The same form occurs in Eccl. ii. 18 ; Philo, Leg. ad Cai. § 30, vol. ii., p. 576. See Winer, edn. 6, § 14. 3 [and Moulton's note, p. 97. 2]) their corpses to be put into a tomb (the following exposition will hardly be credited : but is useful, as shewing how far away men can be led in forcing the sense in favour of a particular view. Wordsw. regards the two witnesses as the Old and New Testaments, and the beast that makes war with them as Papal Rome. On this clause, he says, "the original word here is μνήματα, not τάφους, and is to be rendered not graves, but monuments : i. e. she has laboured that the Two Witnesses may not be committed to the immortal monuments of Editions, Translations, and Expositions." It will be hardly necessary to remind any N. T. student that μνήμα never occurs in it in any sense but in the concrete one of a grave or tomb : see reff. The same is true of the LXX, where it occurs fifteen times. And again it is fatal to this strange exposition, that it is not the beast, but ἐκ τῶν λαῶν κ. φυλ. κ. γλ., who will not permit their bodies to be put into a tomb. It may also be remarked, that it is now to a Roman printing press that we owe our only edition of the oldest published codex of the Greek Old and New Testaments). And they that dwell upon the earth (see reff.: the goddess world) rejoice over them (at their fall: ἐπί with dat., of the close juxtaposition which connects a mental affection with its object) and are glad and shall send gifts to one another (as on a day of festival, see reff.; and Winer, Realw. i. 411, art. Geföhne), because these two prophets tormented them that dwell upon the earth (viz. by the plagues above mentioned, vv. 5, 6). And after the three days and half, the Spirit of life (not, a spirit: the whole diction is closely imitated from that used of the dry bones in Ezek. xxxvii. 10, where A reads εἰσῆλθεν εἰς ὑποὺς νεῦμα ζωῆς: and no inference as to indefiniteness can be drawn from the absence of the art. from such a word as πνεῦμα) from God (may belong to ζωῆς only; but much better to πνεῦμα ζωῆς taken as one word. The art. τό would strictly be required, but may well be wanting in later Greek) entered into them (the ἐν would be a pregnant construction: entered into, so as to be in), and they stood upon their feet (the very words of Ezek. i. c., but with one difference, the accus. πόδας, which, as remarked on ch. iv. 2, is characteristic of our Writer at the first mention of a superimposition), and great fear fell upon those who beheld them. And they heard a great voice from heaven saying to them, Come up hither. And they went up to heaven in the cloud (or, as we more commonly say in English, the clouds: viz. the cloud which ordinarily floats in the air; the mist: see ref.: not, as Wordsw., "the cloud of Christ's glory:" nor needing, as Elliott, identification with any cloud previously mentioned in this book. But the ascension of the witnesses partakes of the character of His ascension. No attempt has been made to explain this ascension by those who interpret the witnesses figuratively of the Old and New Testaments or the like. The modern historical system, which can interpret such a Scripture phrase of "calling up to political ascendancy and power," surely needs no refutation from me), and their enemies beheld them. And in that hour there was a great earthquake, and the tenth part of the city (the great city, as above) fell, and there were slain in the earthquake names of men (i. e. men themselves, the ὀνόματα shewing that the number is carefully and precisely stated, as if the name of each were recounted: see reff.: and more below) seven thousands (i. e. the member of the series we hear what is done, not on earth, but in heaven,—the half-hour's silence, the song of thanksgiving, the voice from the temple and the throne, saying, "It is done." c) At each seventh member likewise we have it related in the form of a solemn conclusion, 1) ἐγένοντο βρονταὶ καὶ φωναὶ καὶ ἀστραπαὶ καὶ σεισμός, ch. viii. 5,—2) ἐγένοντο ἀστραπαὶ καὶ φωναὶ καὶ βρονταὶ καὶ σεισμοὶ καὶ χάλασα μεγάλη, ch. xi. 19,—3) ἐγένοντο ἀστραπαὶ καὶ φωναὶ καὶ βρονταὶ, καὶ σεισμοὶ ἐγένετο μέγας κ.τ.λ., ch. xvi. 18 ff. d) At each seventh member we have plain indication in the imagery or by direct expression, that the end is come, or close at hand: 1) by the imagery of the sixth seal, and the two episodes, preceding the seventh seal: 2) by the declaration here, ἦλθεν ὁ καιρὸς τῶν νεκρῶν κριθῆναι: 3) by the Γέγονεν sounding from the temple and the throne on the pouring out of the seventh vial. e) All this forms strong ground for inference, that the three series of visions are not continuous, but resumptive: not indeed going over the same ground with one another, either of time or of occurrence, but each evolving something which was not in the former, and putting the course of God's Providence in a different light. It is true, that the seals involve the trumpets, the trumpets the vials: but it is not in mere temporal succession: the involution and inclusion are far deeper: the world-wide vision of the seals containing the cry for vengeance, out of which is evolved the series of the trumpets: and this again containing the episodic visions of the little book and the witnesses, out of which are evolved the visions of ecclesiastical faithfulness and apostasy which follow), saying (whose these voices were, is not specified: but we may fairly assume them to have been those of the armies of heaven and the four living-beings, as distinguished from the twenty-four elders which follow. For the masc. part., see ref.), The Kingdom of the world (i. e. over this world: ἡ βασιλεία abstract. In the received text, reading αἱ βασιλείαι, it is the kingdoms, concrete, of the world) is become (aor., but alluding to the result of the whole series of events past, and not to be expressed in English except by a perfect) our Lord's and of His Christ (no supply, such as "the Kingdom," is required: nor is this the case even in the rec. text. The gen. in both cases is one merely of possession), and He (no emphasis on He, as we are almost sure to lay on it, perhaps from the accent unavoidable in the Hallelujah Chorus of Handel) shall reign to the ages of the ages (this announcement necessarily belongs to the time close on the millennial reign: and this is no more than we might expect from the declaration of the strong angel in ch. x. 7). And the twenty-four elders (representing the church in glory) which before God sat upon their thrones (or, omitting the οἱ, sitting upon their thrones before God), fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, saying, We give thanks to Thee, O Lord God the Almighty (this ascription of thanks is the return for the answer to the prayers of the saints furnished by the judgments of the trumpets), who art and wast (for construction, see reff.), because Thou hast taken Thy great might and hast reigned (on the αοr., see above). And the nations were angry (see ref. Ps.), and Thine anger came, and the time of the dead to be judged (another indication that the end is at hand when these words are spoken), and (the time) to give their reward to Thy servants the prophets (see reff. and especially Matt. x. 41, to which reference seems to be made), and to the saints, and to them that fear Thy name, the small and the great (the three terms together include the whole church), and to destroy the destroyers of (so is the pres. part. best rendered) the earth (all this looks onward to judgments and acts of God yet to come when the words are spoken. The thanksgiving is not that God hath done all this, but that the hour is come for it all to take place. Before it does, another important series of visions has to be unfolded).

19.] Concluding, and transitional. And the temple of God was opened in the heaven (or, according to the apparently grammatical correction of AC, "the temple of God which was in the heaven was opened"), and the ark of

His covenant was seen in His temple (the episode of ch. xi. 1 ff. began with measuring the temple of God, the shadow of things in the heavens: and now, when the time is come for the judgments there indicated to be fulfilled, that temple itself in the heavens is laid open. The ark of the Covenant is seen, the symbol of God's faithfulness in bestowing grace on His people, and inflicting vengeance on His people's enemies. This is evidently a solemn and befitting inauguration of God's final judgments, as it is a conclusion of the series pointed out by the trumpets, which have been inflicted in answer to the prayers of His saints. It is from this temple that the judgments proceed forth (cf. ch. xiv. 15, 17, xv. 5 ff., xvi. 17); from His inmost and holiest place that those acts of vengeance are wrought which the great multitude in heaven recognize as faithful and true, ch. xix. 2. The symbolism of this verse, the opening for the first time of the heavenly temple, also indicates of what nature the succeeding visions are to be: that they will relate to God's covenant people and His dealings with them): and there were lightnings and voices and thunderings and an earthquake and a great hail (the solemn salvos, so to speak, of the artillery of heaven, with which each series of visions is concluded : see this commented on above at the beginning of this section).

CHAP. XII. 1—17.] THE VISION OF THE WOMAN AND THE GREAT RED DRAGON. On the nature of this vision, as introductory of the whole imagery of the latter part of the Apocalypse, I have already remarked at ch. xi. It is only needful now to add, that the principal details of the present section are rather descriptive than strictly prophetic: relating, just as in the prophets the descriptions of Israel and Judah, to things passed and passing, and serving for the purpose of full identification and of giving completeness to the whole vision. And a great (important in its meaning, as well as vast in its appearance) sign (σημεῖον, one of those appearances by which God ἐσήμανεν to John the revelations of this book, ch. i. 1) was seen in heaven (heaven here is manifestly not only the show-place of the visions as seen by the Seer, but has a substantial place in the vision: for below, ver. 7 ff., we have the heaven contrasted with the earth, and the dragon cast out of heaven into the earth. See more there), a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon (ἡ σελήνη = ἔχουσα τὴν σελήνην) beneath her feet (see Cant. vi. 10, which seems to be borne in mind), and on her head a crown of twelve stars (the whole symbolism points to the Church, the bride of God: and of course, from the circumstances afterwards related, the O. T. church, at least at this beginning of the vision. That the blessed Virgin cannot be intended, is plain from the subsequent details, and was recognized by the early expositors. The crown of twelve stars represents the Patriarchs. Victorinus's comment is worth quoting: "Mulier . . . antiqua Ecclesia est patrum et prophetarum et sanctorum apostolorum quæ gemitus et tormenta habuit desiderii sui usque quo fructum ex plebe sua secundum carnem olim promissum sibi videret Christum ex ipsa gente corpus sumpsisse. . . . Corona stellarum duodecim chorum patrum significat secundum carnem natiuitatis, ex quibus erat Christus carnem sump-turus"), and [she is] (or, being) with child [and] crieth out in pangs and tormented to bring forth (the inf. τεκεῖν, of that which would be the result of the βασανίεσθαι, has a parallel in Acts vii. 19, ἐάκαυσεν . . . τοῦ ποιεῖν, and in other places, see Winer, edn. 6, § 44. 4, but not without the art.). And another sign was seen in heaven. and behold, a great red dragon (interpreted below, ver. 9, to be the devil, the ancient serpent: see also vv. 13, 15. He is πυρρὸς perhaps for the combined reasons, of the wasting properties of fire, and the redness of blood: "rufus, ut homicida," as the gloss. interl.: see John viii. 44), having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his heads seven diadems (the Dragon being the devil, these symbolic features must be interpreted of the assuming by him of some of those details in the form of the beast in ch. xiii. 1 ff., to whom afterwards he gives his power and his throne: in other words, as indicating that he lays wait for the woman's offspring in the form of that anti-christian power which is afterwards represented by the beast. At the same time, the seven crowned heads may possess an appropriateness of their own, belonging as they do to the dragon alone (the beast has the crowns on his horns, ch. xiii. 1). They may represent, as he is Prince of this world, universality of earthly dominion. The ten horns belong to the fourth beast of Daniel, vii. 7, 20). And his tail draggeth down the third part of the stars of the heaven, and cast them to the earth (so the little horn in Dan. viii. 10, "cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them." The allusion here may be as Areth, in Catena, συγκατα-εβαλε γὰρ ἑαυτῇ πλείστον ἀγγέλων μοῖραν συναποστήσαι πείσασα τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ πεποίηκε χθονίους τοὺς οὐρανοίους, καὶ σκότος τοὺς λαμπροὺς ὡς ἀστέρας. The magnitude and fury of the dragon are graphically given by the fact of its tail, in its lashing backwards and forwards in fury, sweeping down the stars of heaven). And the dragon stands (not "stood." The Commentators cite from Pliny H. N. viii. 3 of the dragon, "Nec flexu multiplici ut reliquæ serpentes corpus impellit, sed celsus et erectus in medio incedens") before the woman which is about to bear, that when she has borne he may devour her child (this was what the devil instigated Herod the Great to do, who was the dependant of the Roman Empire. But doubtless the reference is wider than this: even to the whole course of hostility against the Lord during His humiliation: see below). And she bore a male (if ἄρσεν is neuter, and not to be written ἄρσεν', the expression is a solecism, or rather a combination of genders, ἄρσεν going back from the masculine individual υἱὸν to the neuter of the genus) son, who shall rule (lit. shepherd, i. e. order and guide) all the nations with (ἐν of investiture, very nearly expressed by our instrumental "with," which in its primitive meaning does but signify accompaniment) a rod of iron (these words, cited verbatim from the LXX of the Messianic Psalm ii, and preceded by the ὅς of personal identification, leave no possibility of doubt, who is here intended. The man-child is the Lord Jesus Christ, and none other. And this result is a most important one for the fixity of reference of the whole prophecy. It forms one of those landmarks by which the legitimacy of various interpretations may be tested; and of which we may say, notwithstanding the contradiction sure to be given to the saying, that every interpretation which oversteps their measure is thereby convicted of error. Again, the exigencies of this passage require that the birth should be understood literally and historically, of that Birth of which all Christians know. And be it observed, that this rule of interpretation is no confident assertion of mine, as has been represented, but a result from the identifying use of words of the prophetic Scripture, spoken of Him, who will not suffer His honour to be given to another): and her child was caught up to God and to His throne (i. e. after a conflict with the Prince of this world, who came and tried Him but found nothing in Him, the Son of the woman was taken up to heaven and sat on the right hand of God. Words can hardly be plainer than these. It surely is but needful to set against them, thus understood, the interpretation which would regard them as fulfilled by the "mighty issue of the consummated birth of a son of the church, a baptized emperor, to political supremacy in the Roman empire," "united with the solemn public profession of the divinity of the Son of man." Elliott, iii. 24). And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath there a place prepared from (the source of the preparation being His command: see reff., and Winer, edn. 6, § 47, b) God, that they (the subject to the verb is left indefinite. In ver. 14 below, it is simply passive, ὑπου τρέφεται ἐκεῖ) may nourish her there for a thousand two hundred and sixty days (the whole of this verse is anticipatory: the same incident being repeated with its details and in its own place in the order of the narrative below, vv. 13 ff. See there the comment and interpretation. The fact of its being here inserted by anticipation is very instructive as to that which now next follows, as not being consecutive in time after the flight of the woman, but occurring before it, and in fact referred to now in the prophecy as leading to that pursuit of the woman by the dragon, which, as matter of sequence, led to it). 7 ff.]

And there was war in heaven (we now enter upon a mysterious series of events in the world of spirits, with regard to which merely fragmentary hints are given us in the Scriptures. In the O. T. we find the adversary Satan in heaven. In Job i., ii., he appears before God as the Tempter of His saints: in Zech. iii. we have him accusing Joshua the High-priest in God's presence. Again our Lord in Luke x. 18 exclaims, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven," where see note. Cf. also John xii. 31. So that this casting down of Satan from the office of accuser in heaven was evidently connected with the great justifying work of redemption. His voice is heard before God no more: the day of acceptance in Christ Jesus has dawned. And his angels, those rebel spirits whom he led away, are cast down with him, into the earth, where now the conflict is waging during the short time which shall elapse between the Ascension and the second Advent, when he shall be bound. All this harmonizes together: and though we know no more of the matter, we have at least this sign that our knowledge, as far as it goes, is sound, —that the few hints given us do not, when thus interpreted, contradict one another, but agree as portions of one whole.

The war here spoken of appears in some of its features in the book of Daniel, ch. x. 13, 21, xii. 1. In Jude 9 also we find Michael the adversary of the devil (in the matter of the saints of God): Michael ("one of the chief princes," Dan. x. 13: "your prince," i. e. of the Jewish nation, ib. ver. 21: "the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people," ib. xii. 1: "the archangel," Jude 9: not to be identified with Christ, any more than any other of the great angels in this book. Such identification here would confuse hopelessly the actors in this heavenly scene. Satan's being cast out of heaven to the earth is the result not of his contest with the Lord Himself, of which it is only an incident leading to a new phase, but of the appointed conflict with his faithful fellow-angels led on by the archangel Michael. The οἱ ἄγγελοι αὐτοῦ in both cases requires a nearer correspondence in the two chiefs than is found between Satan and the Son of God) and his angels to war (the construction is remarkable, but may easily be explained as one compounded of (του) τον M. καὶ τοὺς ἀγγ. αὐτοῦ πολεμήσαι (in which case the τοῦ depends on the ἐγένετο, as in ref.) and ὁ M. καὶ οἱ ἄγγ. αὐτοῦ ἐπολέμησαν. In the next clause, it passes into this latter) with the dragon, and the dragon warred and his angels, and they prevailed not, nor was even (οὐδέ brings in a climax) their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast down, the ancient serpent (in allusion to the history in Gen. iii. Remember also that St. John had related the saying of our Lord, that the devil was ἀνθρωποκτόνος ἀπ' ἀρχῆς), he who is called the devil and Satan, he who deceiveth the whole inhabited world, was cast to the earth, and his angels were cast with him (I would appeal in passing to the solemnity of the terms here used, and the particularity of the designation, and ask whether it is possible to understand this of the mere casting down of paganism from the throne of the Roman empire? whether the words themselves do not vindicate their plain literal sense, as further illustrated by the song of rejoicing which follows?). And I heard a great voice in the heaven (proceeding apparently from the elders, representing the church (cf. τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἡμῶν): but it is left uncertain) saying, Now is come (it is impossible in English to join to a particle of present time, such as ἄρτι, a verb in aoristic time. We are driven to the perfect in such cases) the salvation and the might and the kingdom of our God and the power of His Christ (i. e. the realization of all these: ἡ σωτηρία τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν being, as so often, that salvation which belongs to God as its Author: see reff. and cf. Luke iii. 6): because the accuser (the form κατήγορ, instead of κατήγορος, is rabbinical, רבנא. They had also a corresponding term, סנהגור, = συνήγορος, to designate Michael, the advocate of God's people. See Schöttgen, vol. i. p. 1119 ff., where he accumulates extracts of some interest from the rabbinical books) of our brethren is cast down, who accuseth (the pres. part. of the usual habit, though that his office was now at an end) them before our God by day and by night (see, as above, the passage cited in Schöttgen). And they conquered him on account of the blood of the Lamb (i. e. by virtue of that blood having been shed: not as in E. V., “by the blood,” as if διά had been with the genitive. The meaning is far more significant; their victory over Satan was grounded in, was a consequence of, His having shed his precious blood: without that, the adversary’s charges against them would have been unanswerable. It is remarkable, that the rabbinical books give a tradition that Satan accuses men all the days of the year, except on the Day of Atonement. Vajikra Rabba, § 21, fol. 164. 3, in Schöttgen) and on account of the word of their testimony (the strict sense of διά with an accus. must again be kept. It is because they have given a faithful testimony, even unto death, that they are victorious: this is their part, their appropriation of and standing in the virtue of that blood of the Lamb. Without both these, victory would not have been theirs: both together form its ground): and they loved not their life unto death (i. e. they carried their not-love of their life even unto death: see reff.). For this cause (viz., because the dragon is cast down: as is shewn by the contrast below) rejoice, ye heavens and they that dwell (there is no sense of transitoriness in St. John’s use of σκηνώω: rather, one of repose and tranquillity (reff.) in them. Woe to the earth and the sea (the construction is a combination of the usual accus. in exclamations, with οὐαὶ, which takes a dative), because the devil is come down (see above on ἔρτι ἐγένετο, ver. 10, on the impossibility of expressing the aor. in such connexions) to you (the earth and sea) having great wrath (the enmity, which was manifested as his natural state towards Christ, ver. 4, being now kindled into wrath), because he knoweth (so E. V., rightly, the participle carrying with it this ratiocinative force) that he hath but (in our language this “but” is necessary to shew that it is not the ἔχειν but the ὀλίγον which excites his wrath. In Greek this is made clear by the position of ὀλίγον) a short season (i. e. because the Lord cometh quickly, and then the period of his active hostility against the church and the race whom Christ has redeemed will be at an end: he will be bound and cast into the pit. Until then, he is carrying it on, in ways which the prophecy goes on to detail). And when the dragon saw that he was cast down to the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the male child (the narrative at ver. 6 is again taken up and given more in detail. There, the reason of the woman’s flight is matter of inference: here, it is plainly expressed, and the manner of the flight also is related. ἔτεκεν is not to be taken as pluperfect, still less as pointing to what was yet to take place; but is the simple historic tense, used for identification in again taking up the narrative). And there were given (in the usual apocalyptic sense of δοθῆναι, to be granted by God for His purposes) to the woman [the] two wings of the great eagle (the figure is taken from O. T. expressions used by God in reference to the flight of Israel from Egypt. The most remarkable of these is in ref. Exod., ἀνέλαβον ὑμᾶς ὡσεὶ ἐπὶ πτερύγων αἰετῶν καὶ προσηγαγόμεν ὑμᾶς πρὸς ἑμαυτόν. So also in ref. Deut. But the articles are not to be taken as identifying the eagle with the figure used in those places, which would be most unnatural: much less must they, with Ebrard, be supposed to identify this eagle with that in ch. viii. 13, with which it has no connexion. The articles are simply generic, as in ὁ κροκόδειλος ὁ χερσαῖος, Levit. xi. 29. With these O. T. references before us, we can hardly be justified in pressing the figure of the eagle's wings to an interpretation in the fulfilment of the prophecy, or in making it mean that the flight took place under the protection of the Roman eagles, as some have done), that she might fly into the wilderness (the flight of Israel out of Egypt is still borne in mind) to her place (prepared of God, ver. 6 : so also in Exod. xxiii. 20, ὅπως εἰσαγάγῃ σε εἰς τὴν γῆν ἣν ἠτοίμασα σοί), where she is nourished (there) (as God nourished Israel with manna in the wilderness, see Deut. viii. 3, 16, where ψωμίζειν is used) a time and times and half a time (i. e. 3½ years = 42 months, ch. xi. 2 = 1260 days, ver. 6 and ch. xi. 3) from the face of the serpent (ἀπό must not be joined, as some texts are punctuated, with πέτηται, but belongs, as in ref., ἔφυγεν . . . καὶ ᾤκησεν ἐκεῖ ἀπὸ προσώπου Ἀβ., to the last verb, τρέφεται : importing "safe from," "far from," "hidden from"). And the serpent cast out of his mouth after the woman water as a river, that he might make her to be borne away by the river. And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth (reff.) and swallowed down the river which the dragon cast out of his mouth (in passing to the interpretation, we cannot help being struck with the continued analogy between this prophecy and the history of the Exodus. There we have the flight into the wilderness, there the feeding in the wilderness, as already remarked: there again the forty-two stations, corresponding to the forty-two months of the three years and half of this prophecy : there too the miraculous passage of the Red Sea, not indeed in strict correspondence with this last feature, but at least suggestive of it. These analogies themselves suggest caution in the application of the words of the prophecy; and in this direction. The church in the wilderness of old was not, as some expositors would represent this woman, the pure church of God: His veritable servants were hidden in the midst of that church, as much as that church itself was withdrawn from the enmity of Pharaoh. And, it is to be noted, it was that very church herself which afterwards, when seated at Jerusalem, forsook her Lord and Husband, and committed adultery with the kings of the earth, and became drunk with the blood of the saints. It would seem then that we must not understand the woman of the invisible spiritual church of Christ, nor her flight into the wilderness of the withdrawal of God's true servants from the eyes of the world. They indeed have been just as much withdrawn from the eyes of the world at all times, and will continue so till the great manifestation of the sons of God. I own that, considering the analogies and the language used, I am much more disposed to interpret the persecution of the woman by the dragon of the various persecutions by Jews which followed the Ascension, and her flight into the wilderness of the gradual withdrawal of the church and her agency from Jerusalem and Judæa, finally consummated by the flight to the mountains on the approaching siege, commanded by our Lord Himself. And then the river which the dragon sent out of his mouth after the woman might be variously understood,—of the Roman armies which threatened to sweep away Christianity in the wreck of the Jewish nation,—or of the persecutions which followed the church into her retreats, but eventually became absorbed by the civil power turning Christian,—or of the Jewish nation itself, banded together against Christianity wherever it appeared, but eventually itself becoming powerless against it by its dispersion and ruin,—or again, of the influx of heretical opinions from the Pagan philosophies which tended to swamp the true faith. I confess that not one of these seems to me satisfactorily to answer the conditions: nor do we gain any thing by their combination. But any thing within reasonable regard for the analogies and symbolism of the text seems better than the now too commonly received historical interpretation, with its wild fancies and arbitrary assignment of words and figures. As to the time indicated by the 1260 days or 3½ years, the interpretations given have not been convincing, nor even specious. We may observe thus much in this place: that if we regard this prophecy as including long historic periods, we are driven to one of two resources with regard to these numbers: either we must adopt the year-day theory (that which reckons a day for a year, and consequently a month for thirty years,—and should reckon a year for 360 years), or we must believe the numbers to have merely a symbolical and mystical, not a chronological force. If (and this second alternative is best stated in an inverse form) we regard the periods mentioned as to be literally accepted, then the prophecy cannot refer to long historic periods, but must be limited to a succession of incidents concentrated in one place and lustrum either in the far past or in the far future. Of all prophecies about which these questions can be raised, the present is the one which least satisfactorily admits of such literal interpretation and its consequences. Its actors, the woman and the dragon, are beyond all controversy mystical personages: one of them is expressly interpreted for us to be the devil: respecting the other there can be little doubt that she is the Church of God: her seed being, as expressly interpreted to be, God's Christian people. The conflict then is that between Satan and the church. Its first great incident is the birth and triumph of the Son of God and of man. Is it likely that a few days or years will limit the duration of a prophecy confessedly of such wide import? I own it seems to me that this vision, even if it stood alone, is decisive against the literal acceptance of the stated periods. Rejecting that, how do we stand with regard to the other alternative in its two forms? Granting for the moment the year-day principle, will it help us here? If we take the flight into the wilderness as happening at any time between the Ascension, A.D. 30, and the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70, 1260 years will bring us to some time between A.D. 1290 and 1330: a period during which no event can be pointed out as putting an end to the wilderness-state of the church. If again we enlarge our limit for the wither event, and bring it down as late as Elliott does, i. e. to the period between the fourth and seventh centuries, we fall into all the difficulties which beset his most unsatisfactory explanation of the man-child and his being caught up to God's throne, and besides into this one: that if the occultation of true religion (= the condition of the invisible Church) was the beginning of the wilderness-state, then either the open establishment of the Protestant churches was the end of the wilderness-state of concealment, or those churches are no true churches: either of which alternatives would hardly be allowed by that author. And if on the other hand we desert the year day principle, and say that these defined and constantly recurring periods are not to be pressed, but indicate only long spaces of time thus pointed out mystically or analogically, we seem to incur danger of missing the prophetic sense, and leaving unfixed that which apparently the Spirit of God intended us to ascertain). And the dragon was wroth at the woman (on ἐπί with a dat. as applied to the object of mental affections, see ref. and note) and departed (from his pursuit of her) to make war with the rest of her seed, who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus (τὴν μαρτ. Ἰησοῦ as in ch. vi. 9: see note there. Notice as important elements for the interpretation, 1) that the woman has seed besides the Man-child who was caught up to God's throne (for this is the reference of τῶν λοιπῶν), who are not only distinct from herself, but who do not accompany her in her flight into the wilderness: 2) that those persons are described as being they who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus: 3) that during the woman's time of her being fed in the wilderness, the dragon is making war, not against her, but against this remnant of her seed: 4) that by the form of expression here, these present particles descriptive of habit, and occurring at the breaking off of the vision as regards the general description of the dragon's agency, it is almost necessarily implied, that the woman, while hidden in the wilderness from the dragon's wrath, goes on bringing forth sons and daughters thus described. If I mistake not, the above considerations are fatal to the view which makes the flight of the woman into the wilderness consist in the withdrawal of God's true servants from the world and from open recognition. For thus she must be identical with this remnant of her seed, and would herself be the object of the dragon's hostile warfare, at the very time when, by the terms of the prophesy, she is safely hidden from it. I own that I have been led by these circumstances to think whether after all the woman may represent, not the invisible church of God's true people which under all conditions of the world must be known only to Him, but the true visible Church: that Church which in its divinely prescribed form as existing at Jerusalem was the mother of our Lord according to the flesh, and which continued as established by our Lord and His Apostles, in unbroken unity during the first centuries, but which as time went on was broken up by evil men and evil doctrines, and has remained, unseen, unrealized, her unity an article of faith, not of sight, but still multiplying her seed, those who keep the commandments of God and have the testimony of Jesus, in various sects and distant countries, waiting the day for her comely order and oneness again to be manifested—the day when she shall “come up out of the wilderness, leaning on her Beloved:” when our Lord's prayer for the unity of His being accomplished, the world shall believe that the Father has sent Him. If we are disposed to carry out this idea, we might see the great realization of the flight into the wilderness in the final severance of the Eastern and Western churches in the seventh century, and the flood cast after the woman by the dragon in the irruption of the Mahometan armies. But this, though not less satisfactory than the other interpretations, is as unsatisfactory. The latter part of the vision yet waits its clearing up).

The ten horns are found also in the fourth beast of Daniel, vii. 7) and seven heads, and upon his horns ten diadems, and upon his heads (notice the gen. ἐπὶ τῶν κεράτων and the accus. ἐπὶ τὰς κεφαλὰς: the reason being probably, that the crowns are simply spoken of as in position on the horns, whereas the names were inscribed on the heads, and the preposition takes the tinge of motion belonging to the act of inscription) a name of blasphemy (whether (see digest) we read plural or singular, the meaning will be the same—on each head a name. The heads are (see for the interpretation ch. xvii. 9, 10, where it is given by the angel) Kings, in the widest acceptation of the word; Kings, as representing their kingdoms; not necessarily individual Kings (see as above):—the name or names of blasphemy, the divine titles given to those Kings, “Lord of the whole earth,” and the like: in the Roman form, “Deus” or “Divus.” Hereafter, when the great harlot succeeds to the character and symbolic details of the beast, this is carried yet further). And the beast which I saw was like to a leopard, and its feet as of a bear, and its mouth as the mouth of a lion (thus uniting in itself the three previous kingdoms of Dan. vii. 4 ff., the first of which was like a lion, the second like a bear, the third like a leopard; and in consequence representing, not the Roman Empire merely, but the aggregate of the Empires of this world as opposed to Christ and His kingdom). And the dragon gave to it his might and his throne and great power (i. e. this beast, this earthly persecuting power, was the vicegerent and instrument of the devil, the prince of this world, and used by him for his purposes of hostility against the remnant of the seed of the woman). And (I saw) one from among his heads as it were wounded unto death (this seems to represent the Roman pagan Empire, which having long been a head of the beast, was crushed and to all appearance exterminated), and the stroke of its death was healed (in the establishment of the Christian Roman Empire. The period now treated of is the same, introduced here by anticipation, but hereafter to be described in detail, as that during which the woman sits on the beast and guides it. Very many Commentators have explained these seven heads as individual kings, and supposed the one who was wounded to death to be Nero, and these last words to allude to the idea that Nero would return from the dead and become antichrist. But this idea was certainly not prevalent in this form at the time when the Apocalypse was written. Tacittus merely relates, that there were many rumours about Nero's death, "eoque pluribus vivere eum fingentibus credentibusque," Hist. ii. 8, and that on the strength of this, a Pseudo-Nero arose in the East, Hist. i. 2, "mota etiam prope Parthorum arma falsi Neronis ludibrio." See also the citations from the Sibylline oracles, Lactantius, and Sulpicius Severus, in Düst.'s note. The first who mentions the idea of Nero returning from the dead, is Augustine, Civ. Dei xx. 19. 3, vol. vii. p. 686, in explaining 2 Thess. ii. 3 ff.: "quidam putant hoc (ver. 7) de imperio dictum fuisse Romano—ut hoc quod dixit, jam enim mysterium iniquitatis operatur, Neronem voluerit intelligi, cujus jam facta velut Antichristi videbantur. Unde nonnulli ipsum resurrecturum et futurum Antichristum suspicantur." But it is observable that Aug. does not connect the idea with the Apocalypse. This is first done by Sulp. Severus, and completed by Victorinus, whose very words ("unum autem de capitibus occisum in morte et plaga mortis ejus curata est, Neronem dicit. Constat enim, dum insequeretur eum equitatus missus a senatu, ipsam sibi gulam succidisse. Hunc ergo suscitatum Deus mittit regem dignum dignis, et Christum qualem meruerint Judæi") betray the origin of the idea having been from this passage itself). And the whole earth wondered after (pregnant construction for wondered at, as they followed, or gazed, after) the beast, and worshipped the dragon, because he gave the (or, his) power to the beast, and worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like to the beast? And who is able to war with him (these words are a sort of parody, in their blasphemy, on ascriptions of praise to God: cf. besides reff., Ps. cxii. 5; Isa. xl. 18, 25, xlvi. 5; Jer. xxix. 20 (xlix. 19); Micah vii. 18: they represent to us the relapse into all the substantial blasphemies of paganism under the resuscitated Empire of Rome, and the retention of pagan titles and forms. I may remark, that nothing in those words finds any representative in the history of the times of the Pagan Empire)? And there was given to it a mouth speaking great and blasphemous things (so we read of the little horn in Daniel vii. 8): and there was given to it power to work (more probably, as in former reff., than "to spend" merely: this meaning is indeed found in latter reff., but the places in Daniel seem to decide for us) forty-two months (the well-known period of the agency of antichrist = 3½ years = 1260 days: see Prolegomena, § v. 29 f.), and he opened his mouth (spoken, see reff., of the commencement of a series of discourses. These vv. 6, 7, in fact expand into detail that which ver. 5 gave compendiously for blasphemies against God, to blaspheme His name and His tabernacle, which dwell in heaven (the apposition is strange, but if the καὶ must be omitted, the meaning is to enhance the enormity of the blasphemy by bringing out the lofty nature of God's holy Name and dwelling-place. With the καὶ, the last clause would mean that he blasphemes them that dwell in heaven, i. e. the holy angels of God. To take this as still the meaning without the καὶ, is to introduce into the apocalyptic style an asyndeton which is not found in it). And there was given to it to make war with the saints (see Dan. vii. 21) and to conquer them (see ch. xi. 7, of which this is a wider statement): and there was given to it power over every tribe and people and tongue and nation (viz. universal empire). And all shall worship it (αὐτόν, though masculine, must be referred to the θηρίον, which has been now for some time spoken of as an agent, and not to an impersonation of it by a living king) who dwell upon the earth, (every one) whose (the change into the singular arises from resolving πάντες into its component individuals) name (οὐ . . . αὐτοῦ, the usual Hellenistic redundancy: see reff.) is not written in the book of life of the Lamb which is slain from the foundation of the world (these last words are ambiguously placed. They may belong either to γέγραπται, or to ἐσφαγμένου. The former connexion is taken by Hammond, Bengel, Heinrich, Ewald, Züllig, De Wette, Hengstb., Dieterd. But the other is far more obvious and natural: and had it not been for the apparent difficulty of the sense thus conveyed, the going so far back as to γέγραπται for a connexion would never have been thought of. See this remarkably shewn in the Catena: ὡν γέγραπται, ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου γέγραπται οὕτω γὰρ δεῖ νοεῖν, οὐχ ὡς ἡ γραφὴ ἔχει ὅτι μηδὲ ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου ἢ τοῦ ἀρρίου σφαγή. The difficulty however is but apparent: 1 Pet. i. 19, 20 says more fully the same thing. That death of Christ which was foreordained from the foundation of the world, is said to have taken place in the counsels of Him with whom the end and the beginning are one. Ch. xvii. 8, which is cited by De W. as decisive for his view, is irrelevant. Of course where simply the writing in the book of life from the foundation of the world is expressed, no other element is to be introduced: but it does not therefore follow, that where, as here, other elements are by the construction introduced, that, and that alone is to be understood).

9, 10.] These verses bear various meanings, according to the reading which we adopt. If the rec. be taken, they express a consolation to the persecuted saints in the form of a jus talionis: the judgment of God will overtake the persecutors, and in that form in which their persecution was exercised. If we take the reading in the text, they form a prophetic declaration how it shall fare with the saints in the day of persecution, and declare also that in holy suffering of captivity and death consists their faith and patience. The latter appears to me, both from critical and contextual considerations, by far the more eligible. Thus we have what is so frequent in this book, an O. T. citation (see below): and all falls into its place in connexion with the victorious war of the beast against the saints: whereas the other declaration is at least out of place in the context. If any man hath an ear, let him hear (see reff.). This notice is given to bespeak solemn attention to what follows, as warning Christians of their fate in the days of the beast's persecution). If any one is for captivity, into captivity he goeth: if any to be slain (ἀποκτανθῆναι = εἰς τὸ ἀποκτανθῆναι) with (see reff. and note on ch. vi. 8) the sword, that (i. e. it is necessary that: δεῖ, as the other reading supplies) he should be slain with the sword (so ref. Jer., "Such as are for death, to death: and such as are for the sword, to the sword: and such as are for the famine, to the famine: and such as are for captivity, to captivity:" cf. also Jer. xliii. 11 and Zech. xi. 9. As that was the order and process of God's anger in his judgments on his people of old, so shall the issue be with the saints in the war of persecution which the beast shall wage with them). Here is (reff., viz. in the endurance of these persecutions) the endurance and the faith of the saints.

11—18.] THE SECOND WILD-BEAST, THE REVIVER AND THE UPHOLDER OF THE FIRST. It may be well to premise a few remarks, tending to the right understanding of this portion of the prophecy. 1) These two beasts are identical as to genus: they are both θηρία, ravaging powers, hostile to God's flock and fold. 2) They are diverse in origin. The former came up out of the sea: that is, if we go back to the symbolism of Daniel, was an empire, rising up out of confusion into order and life: the latter comes out of the earth: i. e. we may not unreasonably say, arises out of human society and its progress: which as interpreted by the context, will import its origin and gradual development during the reign and progress of the secular empire denoted by the former beast. 3) The second beast is, in its zeal and action, entirely subsidiary to the first. It wields its authority, works miracles in its support, causes men to make and to worship its image; nay, itself is lost in the splendour and importance of the other. 4) An important distinction exists between the two beasts, in that this second one has two horns like a lamb. In other words, this second beast puts on a mild and lamb-like appearance, which the other did not. But it speaks as a dragon: its words, which carry its real character, are fierce and unrelenting: while it professes that which is gentle, its behests are cruel. And now I may appeal to the reader, whether all these requisites do not meet in that great wasting Power which arose, not out of anarchy and conquest, but out of men's daily life and habits, out of and in the presence of the last form of the secular power, which was the Empire of Pagan Rome; I mean, the sacerdotal persecuting power, which, gentle in its aspect and professions, was yet cruel in its actions; which did all the deeds of the Empire, in its presence, which kept up its image, its laws, its formulæ, its privileges; which, coming in as it did by a corrupt and ambitious priesthood, deceived by its miracles the dwellers on earth, and by them maintained the image of the despotic secular power? Surely it is this Latin Christianity, in its ecclesiastico-secular form, not identical with, but as preparing the way for, the great apostasy, helping, so to speak, to place the woman on the beast, as in ch. xvii., that is here depicted before us. It is this which, owing its power in the main to imposture and unwarrantably assumed spiritual authority, deserves best the name of the false prophet, expressly given to this second beast in ch. xix. 20. Nor would I limit the interpretation, as has generally been done, by dividing off Pagan from Christian. Primarily, this second beast plainly sets forth the Pagan sacerdotal power; this it was that made the image of the Emperors, that compelled Christians to worship that image, that wrought signs and wonders by its omens and magic. But as the first beast, still subsisting, has passed into a so-called Christian Roman Empire, so has the second beast into a so-called Christian priesthood, the veritable inheritor of pagan rites, images, and superstitions; actually the continuators, nomine mutato, of the same worship in the same places; that of the Virgin for that of Venus, Cosmas and Damian for Romulus and Remus, the image of Peter for that of Jupiter Tonans: lamb-like in profession, with the names and appearances of Christianity, but dragon-like in word and act. And this was surely never more strikingly shewn than at the time when I am writing (Jan. 1860), when the Papal priesthood is zealously combining in the suicidal act of upholding the temporal power as necessary to the spiritual pre-eminence of their "Lord God the Pope." So that I believe the interpretation of the second beast to be, the sacerdotal persecuting power, pagan and Christian, as the first is the secular persecuting power, pagan or Christian. I conceive the view which would limit it to the priesthood of Paganism (Hammond, Grot., Ewald, De Wette, Hengstb., Düsterd.) quite insufficient for the importance of the prophecy; while that of Elliott, al., which would limit it to the priesthood of the Papacy, fails notably in giving a meaning to its acts as here described, the making an image to the beast and causing men to worship it. And I saw another beast coming up out of the earth (see the preceding note), and it had two horns like a lamb (i. e. like the two horns of a lamb: see ref. It is quite true that the absence of the article before ἄρνιῶ forbids the idea that a direct comparison is intended between this lamb-like beast, and the Lamb on Mount Sion: but it does not follow from this that no reference is made to that Lamb in the choice of the animal to which this beast is compared. I believe the choice is made to set forth the hybrid character of this second beast: see more below. The number may perhaps be of no special import, but merely inserted to complete the similarity: it, as a lamb has, had two horns), and it spoke as a dragon (here again we cannot doubt that the term is chosen on account of the dragon which has been before mentioned. It is no objection to this, that we do not hear of that dragon speaking (Düsterd.): the character of the animal explains what kind of speech is meant, and the acts of the dragon were of that kind. And as to this second beast, though its appearance and profession are sacerdotal, its words and acts are devilish. The whole description strongly recalls to our mind our Lord's προσέχετε ἀπὸ τῶν ψευδοπροφητῶν, οἵτινες ἔρχονται πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἐν ἐνδύμασιν προβάτων, ἔσθην δὲ εἰσὶν λύκοι ἄρπαγες, Matt. vii. 15). And it worketh all the power (performs all the acts of authority) of the first beast in his presence (while the first beast is subsisting and beholding; and as the expression seems to shew, being in a relation to it of serving and upholding), and maketh the earth and those that dwell in it to worship (construction, see reff.) the first beast, whose wound of death was healed (this was formerly, ver. 4, described as the reason why the world wondered after the former beast): and worketh great miracles, so that (ἵνα depends on μεγάλα: "miracula magna, tam magna, ut" &c. So that ἵνα ποιῇ = ἵστε ποιεῖν. See Winer, edn. 6, § 53. 6, who as well as Düsterd. finds fault with Bengel for recognizing here a feature of St. John's style. But Bengel only remarks "ἵνα frequens Johanni particula: in omnibus suis libris non nisi semel, Joh. iii. 16. ἵστε posuit:" and this is true and applicable to the case here in hand, where ἵστε would naturally have stood,—whatever may be the minute shade of difference between the force of ἵνα as connected with the previous words in various passages. We know that the Apocalypse is written in a laxer style and more faulty Greek than either the Gospel or the Epistles: what wonder, if the use of ἵνα expegetic be carried further in it, and from its meaning of ideal purpose be extended to detail of matter of fact? Granting the two meanings to be even as far apart as Düsterd. insists, may we not say that the Writer who so often uses the one is just the person who, when writing less strictly, was likely to use the other?

As to the fact described, it is notorious enough that the great arm of support of the sacerdotal power, pagan and papal, has ever been the claim to work miracles) he even maketh fire to come down from the heaven to the earth in the sight of men ("hæc magi per angelos refugas et hodie faciunt," says Victorinus, writing in the beginning of the fourth century, before yet the Empire professed Christianity. But it is probable that this special miracle is mentioned to recall the spirit and power of Elias, and shew how the false prophet shall counterfeit the true). And he deceiveth those who dwell on the earth on account of (the prep. expresses not the instrument, but the ground of the deceit: the imposture succeeds, because of . . .) the miracles which it has been given to him to work in the presence of the beast, ordering those who dwell on the earth to make an image to the beast (dat. commodi) who hath the stroke of the sword and lived (this part of the prophecy seems to describe the acts of the pagan sacerdotal power then presently to follow. See more below). And it was given to him to give breath (or, spirit; by inference, life) to the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should even speak, and should cause (the regular subject to ποιήσῃ is the image, not the second beast) that as many as do not worship the image of the beast, shall be slain. The Seer is now describing facts which history substantiates to us in their literal fulfilment. The image of Cæsar was every where that which men were made to worship: it was before this that the Christian martyrs were brought to the test, and put to death if they refused the act of adoration. The words of Pliny's letter to Trajan are express on the point: "cum præeunte me deos appellarent, et imagini tuæ, quam propter hoc jusseram cum simulacris numinum afferri, thure ac vino supplicarent, præterea maledicerent Christo, quorum nihil cogi posse dicuntur qui sunt revera Christiani, dimittendos esse putavi." Above he had said, "perseverantes duci jussi." And if it be said as an objection to this, that it is not an image of the Emperor but of the beast itself which is spoken of, the answer is very simple, that as the Seer himself in ch. xvii. 11, does not hesitate to identify one of the ἐπὶ βασιλεῖς with the beast itself, so we may fairly assume that the image of the beast for the time being would be the image of the reigning Emperor.

It is not so easy to assign a meaning to the giving life and speech to the image of the beast. Victorinus gives a curious explanation: "faciet etiam ut imago aurea Antichristo in templo Hierosolymis ponatur, et intret angelus refuga et inde voces et sortes reddat." The allusion probably is to some lying wonders permitted to the Pagan priests to try the faith of God's people. We cannot help, as we read, thinking of the moving images, and winking and speaking pictures, so often employed for purposes of imposture by their far less excusable Papal successors. And he (i. e. the second beast, more naturally than the image) maketh all men, the small and the great, and the rich and the poor, and the free and the bond, that they should give them (i. e. stamp on them. The subject to δῶσιν is left uncertain: it will naturally be understood to be, those whose office it is: see reff. It evidently is not as Dūsterd., "that they impress on themselves:" nor does this at all follow from ch. xiv. 9, 11, xvi 2, xix. 20, xx. 4, which he quotes to support it, but merely that they may refuse to receive it, and by receiving it become apostates from God) a mark (such a mark as masters set on their slaves, or monarchs on their soldiers, a brand, stamped or burnt in, στίγματα, see note on Gal. vi. 17, and Grotius and Wetst. here. We read in 3 Macc. ii. 29, of Ptolemy Philopater, that he ordered the Jews in Alexandria to be forcibly enrolled, τούτους τε ἀπογραφόμενους χαράσσεσθαι καὶ διὰ πυρὸς εἰς τὸ σῶμα παρασήμω Διονύσου κισσοφύλλω. And Philo, de Monarch. i. § 8, vol. ii. p. 221, mentions idolaters who confessed their idolatry by ἐν τοῖς σώμασι καταστίζοντες αὐτὴν σιδήρῳ πεπυρμένῳ πρὸς ἀνεξάλειπτον διαμονήν, οὐδὲ γὰρ χρόνος ταῦτα διαμαυροῦνται) on their right hand (στίγματά ἐστι τῶν στρατευομένων ἐν ταῖς χερσίν, Ælian, in Grot.) or upon (before, the fact of the mark being visible on the hand was prominent, and the gen. was used: now, that of the act of impression is, and the accus. is used) their forehead (i. e. in some conspicuous part of the body, that all may see it: or as Aug. Civ. Dei, xx. 9. 3, vol. vii. p. 674, "in fronte, propter professionem: in manu, propter operationem"), [and] that no one should be able to buy or to sell, except he who has the mark, the name of the beast, or the number of his name (τὸ ὄνομα κ.τ.λ. is in apposition with τὸ χάραγμα: it is in this that the mark consists: either in the name stamped in letters, or in the number of the name thus stamped, i. e. the number which those letters make when added together according to their numerical value. The practice of thus calculating the numerical value of the letters in names was widely prevalent: see the instances collected by Mr. Elliott, vol. iii. pp. 220 ff.: and more below.

This particular in the prophetic description seems to point to the commercial and spiritual interdicts which have, both by Pagan and by Papal persecutors, been laid on nonconformity: from even before the interdict of Diocletian mentioned by Bede in his hymn on Justin Martyr ("non illis emendi quidquam, Aut vendendi copia: nec ipsam haurire aquam Dabatur licentia, antequam sacrificarent Detestandis idolis." Mede, p. 511) through those of the middle ages (of which Mr. Elliott gives an example from Harduin vi. ii. 1684, in a canon of the 3rd Lateran Council under Pope Alexander III., "ne quis eos—scil. hæreticos—in domibus vel in terra sua tenere vel fovere vel negotiationem cum eis exercere præsumat"), down to the last remaining civil disabilities imposed on nonconformity in modern Papal or Protestant countries. For these last have their share in the enormities of the first and second beast in as far as they adopt or continue their practices.

With regard to the circumstance of the imposition of the mark, I conceive that with the latitude here given, that it may be the name or the number, and having regard to the analogy of the mark inscribed on the saints (ch. vii. 1 ff.: cf. ch. xiii. 1), we need not be anxious to find other than a general and figurative interpretation. As it is clear that in the case of the servants of God no actual visible mark is intended, so it may well be inferred here that the mark signifies rather conformity and addiction to the behests of the beast, than any actual stigma impressed. Certainly we fail to recognize any adequate exposition of such stigma in the sign of the Cross as propounded by Mr. Elliott (iii. 236), or in the monogram on the labarum as succeeded by the Papal cross-keys of Bp. Wordsworth (Apocalypse, Appendix G: see also his note in loc.). Here is wisdom (these words serve to direct attention to the challenge which follows: see ver. 10, where ὡδέ ἐστιν is similarly used): let him who hath understanding calculate the number of the beast (the terms of the challenge serve at once to shew that the feat proposed is possible, and that it is difficult. Irenæus's view, that if St. John had meant the number to be known he would have declared it, and that of Andreas, ὁ χρόνος ἀποκαλύψει, are, it seems to me, excluded by these considerations. The number may be calculated: and is intended to be known): for (gives a reason why the calculation may be made) it is the number of a man (i. e. is counted as men generally count: not, as Bede, Grot., al., and recently Hofmann, Schriftb. ii. 637, the number belonging to an individual man: see against this the refl. which are decisive as to usage), and the number of it (the beast) is six hundred sixty-six (of all the hundreds of attempts which have been made in answer to the challenge, there is but one which seems to approach near enough to an adequate solution to require serious consideration. And that one is the word mentioned, though not adopted, by Irenæus, v. 30. 3, p. 330 (the passage cited in the Prolegg. § i. par. 7), viz. λατῆινος (the diphthong ει being, as all critical students of the Greek text know, not only an allowable way, but the usual way, of writing the long i by the Greeks of the time): (λ = 30) + (α = 1) + (τ = 300) + (ε = 5) + (ι =

10) + (ν = 50) + (ο = 70) + (ς = 200) = 666. This name describes the common character of the rulers of the former Pagan Roman Empire,—“Latini sunt qui nunc regnant,” Iren.: and, which Irenæus could not foresee, unites under itself the character of the latter Papal Roman Empire also, as revived and kept up by the agency of its false prophet the priesthood. The Latin Empire, the Latin Church, Latin Christianity, have ever been its commonly current appellations: its language, civil and ecclesiastical, has ever been Latin: its public services, in defiance of the most obvious requisite for public worship, have ever been throughout the world conducted in Latin: there is no one word which could so completely describe its character, and at the same time unite the ancient and modern attributes of the two beasts, as this. Short of saying absolutely that this was the word in St. John's mind, I have the strongest persuasion that no other can be found approaching so near to a complete solution. See however the remarks on this subject in the Prolegomena, § v. par. 32, where I have after all thought it best to leave the matter in doubt).

CH. XIV. 1—20.] THE CONTRAST: THE BLESSEDNESS, AND THE COUNTER-AGENCY OF THE SAINTS OF GOD. THE HARVEST AND THE VINTAGE OF THE EARTH. This is not entirely another vision, but an introduction of a new element, one of comfort and joy, upon the scene of the last. And thus it must be viewed: with reference to the persecution by the beast which is alluded to in its course, vv. 9 ff. It is also anticipatory, first containing reference to the mystic Babylon, hereafter to become the subject of prophecy in detail; and to the consummation of punishment and reward, also to be treated in detail hereafter. It is general in its character, reaching forward close to the time of the end, treating compensively of the torment of the apostates and the blessedness of the holy dead, and leading, by its concluding section, which treats of the harvest and the vintage of the earth, to the vision of the seven last vials, now immediately to follow.

It naturally divides itself into three sections: of which the first is, [1—5.]
The Lamb on Mount Zion, and his hundred and forty-four thousand. And I saw, and beheld the Lamb (viz., the same which before was seen in the midst of the throne, ch. v. 6 al.) standing upon (see on this accus., when the super-position is first mentioned, note, ch. iv. 2) the mount Zion (as in ch. xi., the holy city is introduced as the seat of God's true Church and worship, so by a similar figure (not the same, for thus Mount Zion would be outside the ναός, and thus given to the Gentiles) the holy mountain Zion is now chosen for the site of the display of God's chosen ones with Christ, the Son of David, whose city Zion was), and with Him an hundred and forty-four thousand, having His name and the name of His Father (observe the tacit assumption that all understand Who is imported by the Lamb) written on their foreheads (first observe the contrast: the nations of the earth, constrained to receive the mark of the beast on their forehead and hand, and the Lamb's elect, marked with His name and that of His Father. The question next meets us, Are these 144,000 identical with the same number in ch. vii. 4? This question clearly must not be answered merely by the absence of a defining article here, to identify these χιλιάδες as those there spoken of. For it might well be, that the reader should be meant to identify the two in his mind, by recognizing the marks common to the two, without the note of identification being expressly set in the text. The presumption certainly is that the same number occurring here, representing as there the elect and first-fruits of the church, here as there also inscribed on their foreheads with the seal of God in the one case, and His Name in the other, must be descriptive of the same body of persons. And this view, if acquiesced in here, will reflect back considerable light on that former vision of the sealing in ch. vii. Those, as these, will represent the first-fruits or choice ones among God's people, as indeed we have treated them in this commentary, and not the totality of those who shall form the great multitude which no man can number.

 These, as those, are taken to represent the people of God: their introduction serves to place before us the church on the holy lill of Zion, where God has placed His King, as an introduction to the description of her agency in preaching the everlasting Gospel, and her faithfulness amidst persecutions). And I heard a voice out of heaven as a voice of many waters (reff.), and as a voice of great thunder (ch. vi. 1): and the voice which I heard (was) as of harpers harping with (the ἐν of investiture, cf. ch. vi. 8, ix. 19 and notes) their harps. And they sing [as it were] a new song (i. e. if the ὡς be retained, they sing what sounded like a melody unheard before. The subject to ἄδουσιν is of course not the 144,000, but the heavenly harpers.
 On the subject of their song, see below) living-beings and the elders (the whole heavenly symbolism remaining as before, while the visions regarding God's temple and Mount Sion and the holy city are going forward. I would call the attention of the reader to the fact, essential to the right understanding of the vision, that the harpers and the song are in heaven, the 144,000 on earth): and no one was able to learn the song (to apprehend its melody and meaning, so as to accompany it and bear a part in the chorus) except the hundred and forty-four thousands who (the gender is πρὸς τὸ σημαίνονμενον, see ref.) were purchased (reff. and ver. 4) from the earth (the song has regard to matters of trial and triumph, of deep joy and heavenly purity of heart, which none other among men but these pure and holy ones are capable of apprehending. The sweetest and most skillful harmonies convey no pleasure to, nor are they appreciated by an uneducated ear: whereas the experienced musician finds in every chord the most exquisite enjoyment. The unskilled ear, even though naturally distinctive of musical sounds, could not learn nor reproduce them: but both these can be done by those who have ears to hear them. Even so this heavenly song speaks only to the virgin heart, and can be learnt only by those who accompany the Lamb whithersoever He goeth). These are they who were not (the aor. shews that their course is ended and looked back on as a thing past: and serves to confute all interpretations which regard them as representing saints while in the midst of their earthly conflict and trial) defiled with women (see below); for they are (always were and have kept themselves till the time present) virgins (there are two ways of understanding these words. Either they may be figurative, merely implying that these pure ones lived in all chastity, whether in single or in married life, and incurred no pollution (ref. 2 Cor.): or they may be meant literally, that these purest ones had lived in that state of which St. Paul says 1 Cor. vii. 1, καλὸν ἀνθρώπῳ γυναικὸς μὴ ἄπτεσθαι. And as between these two meanings I conceive that the somewhat emphatic position of μετὰ γυναικῶν goes some way to decide. It is not ἐμολύνθησαν, the fact of impurity in allowed intercourse, but μετὰ γυναικῶν, that is put forward, the fact of commerce with women. I would therefore believe that in the description of these who are the first-fruits from the earth, the feature of virginity is to be taken in its literal meaning. Nor need any difficulty be found in this. It is on all hands granted that he who is married in the Lord enters into holy relations of which the single have no experience, and goes through blessed and elevating degrees of self-sacrifice, and loving allowance, and preferring others before himself. And as every step of grace assured is a step of glory secured, there is no doubt that the holy married servants of God shall have a peculiar entrance into the fulness of that future Kingdom's employ, which will not be the lot of the single: seeing that in this matter also, the childhood of this state will be the father of the manhood of that one. But neither on the other hand can it be denied that the state of holy virginity has also its peculiar blessings and exemptions. Of these, the Apostle himself speaks of that absence of distraction from the Lord's work, which is apt to beset the married, busy as they are with the cares of a household and with pleasing one another. And another and primary blessing is, that in them that fountain of carnal desire has never been opened, which is so apt to be a channel for unholy thoughts and an access for the tempter. The virgins may thus have missed the victory over the lusts of the flesh: but they have also in great part escaped the conflict. Theirs is not the triumph of the toil-worn and stained soldier, but the calm and the unspottedness of those who have kept from the strife. We are perhaps more like that which the Lord intended us to be: but they are more like the Lord Himself. And if He is to have round Him a peculiar and closer band, standing with Him on Mount Sion, none will surely grudge this place to those who were not defiled with women. Among these will be not only those who have lived and served Him in holy virginity, but also the dear children whom He has claimed from us for Himself, the youths and maidens who were gathered to His side before the strife began: before their tongues had learned the language of social falsehood, or their good names been tarnished with the breath of inevitable calumny. There is one meaning which these words will not bear, and which it is surprising that any Commentator should ever have attached to them; viz. that μετὰ γυναικῶν refers to the woman mentioned below, ch. xvii. So Bp. Wordsworth, Lectures, p. 284: "They have not been defiled with women. What women? it may be asked. If we proceed, we read of the woman seated on the Beast, and of the harlotry of the woman, with whom the Kings of the earth commit fornication. And soon we see her displayed in all her meretricious splendour. There then is the reply." Similarly in his notes ad loc. The fact, that an indefinite plural sometimes points to a singular, is, as in all other figures of speech, substantiated by the undoubted requirements of the particular context: whereas here the whole context is against it: the following παρ- θένοι γάρ εισιν carrying its decisive condemnation): these (are) they that follow the Lamb whosoever (for this use of ἔπου, see reff.) he goeth (ἄν seems to have lost its peculiar force, and to have been joined to the ἔπου preceding, so that an indicative after it did not offend the ear.

The description has very commonly been taken as applying to the entire obedience of the elect, following their Lord to prison and to death, and wherever He may call them: so Cocceius, Grot., Vitringa, Wolf (who cites the oath of soldiers, ἀκολουθεῖν τοῖς στρατηγοῖς ἔπου ποτ' ἂν ἄγωνισ), Bengel, De Wette, Hengstb., Ebrard: but this exposition is surely out of place here, where not their life of conflict, but their state of glory is described. The words, as Aug. (in a beautiful passage, De sancta Virginitate, c. 27, vol. vi. p. 410 f., in which however he rhetorically mingles both meanings), Andreas, Züllig, Stern, Düsterd., are used of special privilege of nearness to the Person of the Lamb in glory): these were purchased from men as a first-fruit to God and to the Lamb (all have been thus purchased: but these specially as and for the purpose of being a first-fruit. The ref. James treats of a different matter, the purchase of all the redeemed as the first-fruits of creation. But these are a first-fruit among the purchased themselves), and in their mouth was not found falsehood: they are blameless (the Apostle has before him the words of Ps. xiv. 1 ff., so strikingly similar: τίς κατασκηνώσει ἐν τῷ ὕρει τῷ ἁγίῳ σου; πορευόμενος ἕμματος, . . . λαλῶν ἀλήθειαν ἐν καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ, ὅς οὐκ ἐδόλωσεν ἐν γλώσσῃ αὐτοῦ). These stand on Mount Sion, with Him who eminently fulfilled this character, and being in all things like Him).

6-13.] Three Angels appear in mid-heaven, announcing three details of the period of the coming prophecy. A proclamation of the blessedness of the holy dead. These four announcements form the text and the compendium of the rest of the book: see Prolegg. § v. parr. 57 ff. And I saw another angel (besides those already mentioned) flying in mid-heaven (see ch. viii. 13), having the everlasting gospel (such and no other is the meaning of εὐαγγέλιον αἰώνιον, notwithstanding that it is anarthrous. From this latter circumstance no argument can be derived in the case of a word which had become so technical an one: even in Rom. i. 1, we have ἄφωρισμένος εἰς εὐαγγέλιον θεοῦ: and in no place in the N. T. does the word occur in any other than the technical sense of "the Gospel." Besides which, the epithet αἰώνιος here, if nothing else, fixes it to this meaning. Düsterd., wishing to evade the prophetic sense, would render it, a message of good tidings (viz. regarding the Lord's coming) determined by God from everlasting. And so Grot. ("bonum nuntium jam pridem a Deo definitum"), Ewald, Züllig, Hengstb., al. I should have thought such a rendering only needed mentioning to be repudiated. Ch. x. 7, which is adduced to justify it, is quite beside the purpose. See there.

The epithet αἰώνιος, here only applied to the Gospel, belongs to it as from everlasting to everlasting, like Him whose word it is: in contrast to the enemies of God whose destruction is in view) to preach (see reff.) to ("over," throughout the extent of, and thus "upon." Or we may justify it as in reff., by the signification "with reference to," "towards." Ch. x. 11, which is referred to by Düsterd., is not to the point) those that sit (reff.) upon the earth, and to every nation and tribe and tongue and people (cf. Matt. xxiv. 14, κηρυχθήσεται τοῦτο τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς βασιλείας ἐν ὅλη τῇ οἰκουμένῃ, εἰς μαρτυρίαν πᾶσιν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν καὶ τότε ἤξει τὸ τέλος), saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give Him glory (the message of repentance ever accompanies the hearing of the Gospel among the nations; cf. the first preaching of our Lord and of His Forerunner, Matt. iv. 17, iii. 2, and St. Paul's message to the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. i. 9), because the season of His judgment is come (see the citation from Matt. xxiv. above: the time of the end is close at hand when this great era of Christian missions is inaugurated: see below): and worship Him who made the heaven and the earth and the sea and fountains of waters (i. e. turn from idols and vanities to serve the living and true God. The division of the waters into the sea and the fountains is one kept up through this prophecy: cf. ch. viii. 8—11, xvi. 3, 4). And another second angel followed (“Quot res nunciandæ, totidem nuncii,” of Grot., is not strictly correct, the last being announced merely by a voice in heaven. But it belongs to the solemnity of this series of proclamations that a separate place and marked distinction should dignify each of them) saying, Babylon the great is fallen, [is fallen] (aor. of that which is past; only to be expressed in English by a perfect), which hath given all the nations to drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication (two things are mingled: 1) the wine of her fornication, of which all nations have drunk, ch. xvii. 2; and 2) the wine of the wrath of God which He shall give her to drink, ver. 10, and ch. xvi. 19. The latter is the retribution for the former: the former turns into the latter: they are treated as one and the same. Grot. and Ewald would render θυμός venenum; and Ewald and Züllig understand by οἶνον τοῦ θυμοῦ, vini feruidi, neither of which the words will bear. The whole is from Jer. li. (xxviii.) 7, 8, where Babylon is a cup in the Lord's hand of which the nations are made to drink. This is the first mention of Babylon, hereafter to be so much spoken of. I reserve treatment of the interpretation till ch. xvii.: only mentioning by anticipation that Rome, pagan and papal, but principally papal, is intended). And another third angel followed them saying with a loud voice, If any one worshippeth the beast and his image (see above, ch. xiii. 15), and receiveth the mark on his forehead or upon his hand (ch. xiii. 16), he also (καὶ either 1) may be quasi-redundant, introducing the apodosis merely as an addition to the protasis, or 2) may mean, as well as Babylon. The former sense seems to me the more probable) shall drink (we have the second person πίεισαι of the same future form in Luke xvii. 8: see also Ps. lxxiv. 8, cited below) of the wine of the wrath of God, which is mingled (i. e. as E. cup. From the almost universal custom of mixing wine with water, the common term for preparing wine, putting it into the cup, came to be κεράννυμι. Hence the apparent contradiction in terms here, τοῦ κεκρασμένου ἀκράτου (and in Ps. lxxiv. 8 below). On Od. ε. 93, κέρασσε δὲ νέκταρ ἐρυθρόν, Eustathius says, οὐ δηλοῖ κρᾶμά τι, ἀλλ' ἀντὶ τοῦ ἐνέχει κείμεται. See Wetst., who gives several citations in which κεράννυμι itself is derived from κέρας, a drinking-horn) pure (unmixed: cf. Galen in Wetst., οἶνον ἄκρατον εἶναι λέγομεν, ᾧ μὴ μέμικται τὸ ὕδωρ, ἢ παντάπασιν ὀλίγον μέμικται). The figure of the cup of the Lord's wrath is found in ref. Ps., ποτήριον ἐν χειρὶ κυρίου, οἴνου ἀκράτου πλήρες κεράσματος . . . πίνονται πάντες οἱ ἁμαρτωλοὶ τῆς γῆς, from which this is evidently taken) in the cup of His anger, and shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the angels and in the presence of the Lamb (see ch. xx. 10, and ref. Isa. from which the imagery comes. De Wette is certainly wrong in interpreting ἐνώπιον "nach dem Urtheile," "in the judgment of." It is literal, and the meaning as in Luke xvi. 23 ff., that the torments are visible to the angels and the Lamb). And the smoke of their torment goeth up to ages of ages (see ref. Isa., and Gen. xix. 28, which doubtless is the fountain-head: also ch. xix. 3): and they have not rest (from torment) day and night who worship the beast and his image; and whoever (from speaking collectively the solemn declaration becomes even more solemn by individualizing) receives the mark of his name. Here (viz. in the inference to be drawn from the certainty of everlasting torment to all who worship the beast or receive his mark: that all the saints of God must refuse to do either) is the endurance of the saints, who keep (the independent nom. construction, see ref.) the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus (gen. objective, which has Him for its object: compare ref. Mark). And I heard a voice out of heaven (whose, is not told us, and it is in vain to speculate: certainly not, as Hengstb., from the spirits of the just themselves. The γράφον would rather point to the angel who reveals the visions to the Seer, ch. i. 1, and compare ch.

iv. 1, and xix. 9), saying, Write, Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord henceforth (the connexion is not difficult. The mention of the endurance of the saints brings with it the certainty of persecution unto death. The present proclamation declares the blessedness of all who die not only in persecution, but in any manner, in the Lord, in the faith and obedience of Christ. And the special command to write this, conveys special comfort to those in all ages of the church who should read it. But it is not so easy to assign a fit meaning to ἀπ' ἄρτι. That it belongs to the former sentence, not to the following one, is I conceive plain: few will be found to join with Lambert Bos, Exercit. p. 209, in connecting it to vai, and making it = ἀπρητισμένως, absoluté. And, thus joined with the former sentence, it must express some reason why this blessedness is to be more completely realized from this time when it is proclaimed, than it was before. Now this reason will quickly appear, if we consider the particular time, in connexion with which the proclamation is made. The harvest of the earth is about to be reaped; the vintage of the earth to be gathered. At this time it is, that the complete blessedness of the holy dead commences: when the garner is filled and the chaff cast out. And that not on account of their deliverance from any purgatorial fire, but because of the completion of this number of their brethren, and the full capacities of bliss brought in by the resurrection. Nor can it legitimately be objected to this, that the pres. part. ἀποθνήσκοντες requires a continuance of that which is imported by it: that the deaths implied must follow after the proclamation. For no doubt this would be so, the proclamation itself being anticipatory, and the harvest not yet actually come: but on the other hand so much must hardly be built upon the pres. part., which is so often used to designate a class only, not to fix a time). Yea, saith the Spirit (the utterance of the voice from heaven still continues. The affirmation of the Spirit (reff.) ratifies the blessedness proclaimed, and assigns a reason for it), that they shall rest (the ἵνα gives the ground of the μακάριοι, and the construction with an indic. fut. is a mixed one compounded of "that they may," and "in that they shall." The future ἀναπαήσονται from ἀναπαύω is formed as κατακάθωμαι from κατακάω. It seems not to be elsewhere found) from their labours: for their works follow with them (γάρ, which has seemed so difficult, and which apparently gave rise to the δέ of the rec., is in fact easily explained. They rest from their labours, because the time of working is over, their works accompanying them not in a life of activity, but in blessed memory: wherefore not labour, but rest is their lot. Wetst. quotes from Aboth vi. 9, "hora discessus hominis non comitantur eum argentum aut aurum aut lapides pretiosi aut margaritæ, sed lex et opera bona").

14—20.] The vision of the harvest and the vintage. 14—16.] The harvest. And I saw, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud (ἐπί with accus. on first mention, see ch. iv. 2 note), one sitting like to the Son of man (i. e. to Christ, see ch. i. 13 note. This clearly is our Lord Himself, as there), having upon his head a golden crown (in token of His victory being finally gained: see ch.

xix. 12) and in His hand a sharp sickle. And another angel (besides the three angels before mentioned: no inference can be drawn from this that the Sitter on the cloud is a mere angel) came out of the temple, crying out in a loud voice to him that sat upon the cloud, Put forth (send = ἀποστέλλειν, ref. Mark. De W.'s objection, that the sitter on the cloud cannot be Christ Himself, because He would not be introduced receiving a command from an angel, may be well answered, as Dusterd., that the angel is only the messenger of the will of God. And I may add what to me makes this reply undoubtedly valid, that the command is one regarding the times and seasons, which the Father hath kept in his own power) thy sickle (the whole is a remembrance of our Lord's own saying in ref. Mark: see below) and reap: because the time to reap is come, because the harvest of the earth (θερισμός for that which is to be reaped: as in the first ref.) is dried (perfectly ripe, so that the stalk is dry = παρέστηκεν ὁ θερισμός, Mark iv. 29: = also the fields being λευκαὶ πρὸς θερισμὸν ἤδη, John iv. 35: which they can only become by losing their moisture. The distinction in the passages cited by Mr. Elliott from Bernard ("magis sicca ad ignem quam albæ ad messem"), and Pope Gregory X. ("agerque potius arescere videatur ad ignem, quam albescere inveniatur ad messem") does not seem really to exist. The passage of Hermas, book iii. sim. 3, 4; Luke xxiii. 31; John xv. 6, do not apply; trees, and not grain, being there spoken of). And he that sat upon the cloud put in (reff.) his sickle upon (into, from above) the earth, and the earth was reaped (to what does this harvest refer? Is it the ingathering of the wicked, or of the saints, or of both together? Each of these has examples in Scripture symbolism. The first, in Jer. li. 33, where it is said of Babylon, "It is time to thresh her, yet a little while and the time of her harvest is come:" and as appears, Joel iii. 13, though the reference seems rather there to be to the vintage, and the LXX render ἡ ἄλλη τρυγητός: the second, in Matt. ix. 37, 38; Mark iv. 29; Luke x. 2; John iv. 35: the third, in Matt. xiii. 30, 39. The verdict of Commentators is very much divided. There are circumstances in the context which tell both ways. The parallelism with the vintage, which follows, seems to favour a harvest of the wicked: but then on the other hand, if so, what is the distinction between the two ingatherings? And why do we read of the casting into the winepress of God's wrath in the second case, and of no corresponding feature in the other? Again, why is the agency so different—the Son of man on the white cloud with the golden crown in the one case, the mere angel in the other? Besides, the two gatherings seem quite distinct. The former is over before the other begins. On the whole then, though I would not pronounce decidedly, I must incline to think that the harvest is the ingathering of the saints, God's harvest, reaped from the earth: described here thus generally, before the vintage of wrath which follows. And thus we have at least these two visions in harmony with the character of this section, which contains the mingled agency and fortunes of the Church and of its enemies; thus this harvest answers to the great preaching of the everlasting gospel above, vv. 6, 7, while the following vintage fulfils the denunciations of wrath on those who worship the image or receive the mark of the beast, vv. 8, 11. And thus too we bring this description into harmony with our Lord's important parable in Mark iv. 29, where the very words are used of the agency of Christ Himself when the work of grace is ripe, whether in the individual or in the church. But while thus inclined, I will not deny that the other view, and that which unites both, have very much to be said for them).

17—20.] The vintage of wrath. And another angel (the ἄλλος may perhaps refer to the three angels who have already appeared in this vision: or, which is more probable, referring to the last-mentioned Agent, may be a general term, not necessarily implying that He was a mere angel) came out from the temple which was in heaven (from which come forth God's judgments: see ch. xi. 19), having himself also (as well as that other: but the καὶ αὐτός rather raises a distinction between the two personages than sets them on an equality: there is some slight degree of strangeness, after what has gone before, in this angel having a sickle) a sharp sickle. And another angel came out from the altar (viz. that elsewhere several times mentioned, ch. vi. 9, viii. 3, xvi. 7, in connexion with the fulfilment of God's judgments in answer to the prayers of His saints), he who hath power over the fire (viz. that on the altar; the same angel who is introduced ch. viii. 3—5 as presenting the prayers of the saints, and casting some of the fire of the altar to the earth as introductory to the judgments of the trumpets), and he cried with a great cry to him who had the sharp sickle (it is to be observed that the whole description of this angel, coming from the altar of vengeance, differs widely from any thing in the former part of the vision, and favours the idea that this vintage is of a different nature from that harvest), saying, Put in thy sharp sickle, and gather the bunches of the vine of the earth, because her grapes are ripe. And the angel (no such expression is used above, ver. 16. There it is ὁ καθήμενος ἐπὶ τῆς νεφέλης. All these signs of difference are worthy of notice) put in (reff.) his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and cast (viz. what he had gathered) into the great winepress of the wrath of God (the curious combination, τὴν ληνον . . . τὸν μέγαν, is only to be accounted for by an uncertainty in the gender of the substantive (it is masc. Gen. xxx. 38, 41 and perhaps a tendency, when emphatically subjoining an epithet describing greatness, to substitute the worthier gender. Any thing corresponding to this feature is entirely wanting in the previous description of the harvest. See on it, ch. xix. 15, and the prophetic passages in reff. especially Isa. from which the symbolism comes). And the winepress was trodden (reff.) outside the city (see below), and blood (so Isa. lxiii. 3) came forth from the winepress as far as to the bits of the horses, to the distance (reff.) of a thousand six hundred stadii (it is exceedingly difficult to say what the meaning is, further than that the idea of a tremendous final act of vengeance is denoted. The city evidently = ἡ πόλις ἡ ἔξωθεν of ch. xi. 2 (not that of ib. 8, see note there), viz. Jerusalem, where the scene has been tacitly laid, with occasional express allusions such as that in our ver. 1. The blood coming forth from the treading of the winepress is in accordance with the O. T. prophecy alluded to, Isa. lxiii. 3. It is in the depth, and the distance indicated, that the principal difficulty lies. The number of stadii is supposed by some to be the length of the Holy Land as given by Jerome (Ep. (cxxxix.) ad Dard., 4, vol. i. p. 971) at 160 Roman miles. But the great objection to this is, that 160 miles = 1280, not 1600 stadii. Another view has been, that 1600 has been chosen as a square number, = 40 × 40, or 4 × 400, or 4 × 4 × 100. Victorinus explains it “per omnes mundi quatuor partes: quaternitas enim est conquaternata, sicut in quatuor faciebus et quadriformibus et rotis quadratis.” He gives a very curious interpretation of the depth, —“usque ad principes populorum.” We may fairly say, either that the number is assigned simply to signify completeness and magnitude (in which case some other apocalyptic numbers which have been much insisted on will fall perhaps under the same canon of interpretation), or else this is one of the riddles of the Apocalypse to which not even a proximate solution has ever yet been given).

 CH. XV., XVI. THE SEVEN VIALS. And herein, XV. 1—8.] PREFATORY: the description of the vision, ver. 1: the song of triumph of the saints victorious over the beast, vv. 2—4: the coming forth of the seven angels and delivering to them of the seven vials, vv. 5—8.
 And I saw another sign in heaven great and marvellous, seven angels having seven plagues which are the last (plagues), because in them is completed the wrath of God (I have adopted an unusual arrangement to throw the ὅτι into connexion with ἐσχάτας, for which epithet it renders a reason. It is to be observed 1) that this verse is evidently only a compendious description of the following vision: for the angels themselves are not seen till ver. 6, and do not receive the vials containing the plagues till after they are seen: 2) that the whole of God’s wrath in final judgment is not exhausted by these vials, but only the whole of His wrath in sending plagues on the earth previous to the judgment. After these there are no more plagues: they are concluded with the destruction of Babylon. Then the Lord Himself appears, ch. xix. 11 ff.). And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire (see ch. iv. 6 and note: not merely glassy: the ὡς indicates the likeness: it was as it were made of glass. The addition μεμιγμένην πυρί is probably made as bringing into the previous celestial imagery an element belonging to this portion of the prophecy, of which judgment is the prevailing complexion. The fact, that the personages of the former heavenly vision are still present, ver. 7, seems to remove all doubt of this being the same sea of glass as that before described ch. iv. 6, in immediate connexion with which the four living-beings were mentioned), and the conquerors (the pres. part. has the force of simple designation, as so often in this book) of (see ref.: they have come victorious out of the strife: cf. Thuc. i. 120, ἀγαθῶν δέ, ἀδικουμένους ἐκ μὲν εἰρήνης πολεμῆν, εἰ δὲ παρασχόν, ἐκ πολέμου πάλιον ζυμβῆναι) the beast and of his image and of the number of his name (i. e. of the temptation to worship his image and to receive the mark consisting of the number of his name, ch. xiii. 17, 18), standing on (does ἐπὶ import actually "upon," so that they stood on the surface of the sea, or merely on the shore of? On every account the latter seems the more probable: as better suiting the heavenly imagery of ch. iv., and as according with the situation of the children of Israel when they sung the song to which allusion is presently made. The sense may be constructionally justified by ch. iii. 20, and viii. 3: the fact of ἐπὶ having a genitive in the latter place not setting it aside as a precedent) the sea of glass, having harps of God (sacred harps, part of the instruments of heaven used solely for the praise of God. We have had them before mentioned in ch. v. 8, xiv. 2). And they sing the song of Moses the servant of God (i. e. a song similar to that song of triumph which Moses and the children of Israel sung when delivered from the Red Sea and from the Egyptians, Exod. xv. In Exod. xiv. 31, Moses is called, as here, the servant (θεράποντι, LXX, as also in Heb. iii. 5) of God (see also Num. xii. 7; Josh. xxii. 5 (ὁ παῖς κυρίου)): and this song is formed on the model of parts of that one: see below) and the song of the Lamb (it is not meant that there are two distinct songs: the song is one and the same; and the expression which characterizes it betokens, as do so many other notices and symbols in this book, the unity of the Old and New Test. churches. Their songs of triumph have become ours: the song of Moses is the song of the Lamb. In this great victory all the triumphs of God's people are included, and find their fulfilment), saying (the song is a reproduction of several portions of the O. T. songs of praise), Great and wonderful are thy works (Ps. cx. 2, cxxxviii. 14, LXX), Lord God Almighty: just and true are thy ways (Ps. cxliv. 17; Dent. xxxii. 4 in Moses' song), thou King of the nations (or, of the ages (see 1 Tim. i. 17 reff. and note). The confusion has apparently arisen from the similarity of ΑΙΘΝΩΝ (ἐθνῶν) and ΑΙΩΝΩΝ: but which was the original, it is impossible, in the conflict of authorities, to decide): who can but fear (Thee), O Lord (these two clauses are from Jer. x. 7, but not in the LXX [ABN]. The title "King of nations" is especially appropriate, as it is God's judgments on the nations, and their effects on them, which are the theme of the Church's praise), and shall glorify (the construction of τις οὐ μὴ δοξάσῃ and τις οὐ δοξάσει) thy Name? because Thou only art holy (ὄσιος is only used of God here and ch. xvi. 5: hence the var. ἅγιος. Düsterd. quotes from the Schol. in Eurip. Hec. 788, τὸ πρὸς θεοῦ ἐξ ἀνθρώπων γενόμενον δίκαιον ὄσιον καλοῦμεν. This first ὅτι grounds the τις οὐ μὴ in the attributes of God): because all the nations shall come and worship before thee (so it is declared in reff. LXX. This second ὅτι grounds the τις οὐ μὴ in matter of fact): because Thy righteous acts (= Thy judgments: thy deeds of righteousness acted out towards the nations, both in the publication of the Gospel and in the destruction of Thine enemies) have been made manifest (the aor. as so often lately, looking back over the past and regarding it as matter of history, simply as the past. This third ὅτι grounds the πάντα τὰ ἔθνη ἤξ. in its immediately exciting cause—the manifestation of God's judgments). And after these things I saw, and there was opened the temple of the tabernacle of witness in heaven (see on ch. xi. 19, xvi. 17. The ναός is the holy place of the tabernacle, to which latter the appellation τοῦ μαρτυρίου is here peculiarly appropriate, seeing that the witness and covenant of God are about to receive their great fulfilment): and there came forth the seven angels (viz. who were before mentioned: the οἱ does not point out any particular seven, such as the archangels. On the other hand, if we omit the second οἱ, we must not violate the force of the anarthrous participle by saying "the seven angels who had," οἱ ἔχοντες. The E. V. here is strictly correct) which had (or, "having." This was their office: but they had them not yet) the seven plagues out of the temple (cf. ch. xiv. 15, 17), clad in linen (the remarkable reading λιθον can hardly be genuine, though strongly attested: see digest. There is a precedent for λιθον ἐνδεδυμένοι in Ezek. xxviii. 13) pure (and) glistening (the well-known clothing of angels and heavenly beings, see Acts x. 30 (i. 10), ch. xix. 8; Matt. xvii. 2 ||, xxviii. 3), and girt round their breasts with golden girdles (being in this like our Lord Himself as seen in vision, ch. i. 13). And one from among the four living-beings (appropriately to the symbolic meaning of these ζῶα as the representatives of creation, see notes on ch. iv. 7, 11, inasmuch as the coming plagues are to be inflicted on the objects of creation) gave to the seven angels seven golden vials (the φιάλη was a shallow bowl or cup, usually without a stand or foot, in which they drew out of the κρητήρ or goblet: so Plato, Crito p. 120 a, χρυσαῖς φιάλαις ἐκ τοῦ κρητήρος ἀρτυτόμενοι. The Schol. on II. ψ. 270 explains it οὐ τὸ παρ' ἡμῶν ποτήριον, ἀλλὰ γένος τι λέβητος ἐκπέταλον ἐκ παντὸς μέρους δυνάμενον ἔχειν. Cf. Eurip. Ion 1181 ff.; Xen. Cyr. v. 2. 7), full of the wrath of God who liveth for ever and ever (this addition serves, as in ch. i. 8, to give solemnity to the fact related). And the temple was filled with smoke from (arising from) the glory of God and from His might (i. e. from His presence, in which His glory and His might were displayed. The description calls to mind similar ones in the O. T., e. g. Ps. xviii. 8 f.; Isa. lxv. 5. See also below), and no one was able to enter into the temple (cf. 1 Kings viii. 10, 11; Exod. xl. 34, 35) until the seven plagues of the seven angels should be finished (the passages above referred to give the reason: because of the unapproachableness of God, when immediately present and working, by any created being. See Exod. xix. 21. When these judgments should be completed, then the wrathful presence and agency of God being withdrawn, He might again be approached. Many other meanings more or less far-fetched have been given, but where Scripture analogy is so plain, the simplest is the best).

CH. XVI. 1—21.] THE SEVEN VIALS. See the general remarks on ch. viii. 1 for all questions common to the three great series of visions. The following special particulars are here to be noticed: 1) In the description, ch. xv. 1, which first introduces these plagues, they are plainly called τὰς ἑπτὰ πληγὰς τὰς ἐσχάτας. There can then be no doubt here, not only that the series reaches on to the time of the end, but that the whole of it is to be placed close to the same time. And this is borne out by the particulars evolved in the course of the visions themselves. For we find that they do not in point of time go back, but at once take up the events of the former visions, and occur during the times of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, when the mystery of God should be finished. 2) As in the seals and in the trumpets, so here again, there is a marked distinction between the first four and the following three. As there, so here, the objects of the first four are the earth, the sea, the springs of waters, and the sun. After this the objects become more particularized: the throne of the beast, the river Euphrates, with the reservation of that peculiar and vague character for the seventh, which seems to belong to it in all the three series. 3) As before, so now, there is a compendious and anticipatory character about several of the vials, leading us to believe that those of which this is not so plain, partake of this character also. For example, under the third vial we find an acknowledgment of the divine justice in making those drink blood who shed the blood of saints and prophets. This, there can be little doubt, points on to the judgment on Babylon, in whom, ch. xviii. 24, was found the blood of saints and prophets, and of all that had been slain on the earth. Again, under the sixth we have the same great gathering to battle which is described in detail, ch. xix. 17—21. And finally, under the seventh, we have a compendious anticipatory notice of the judgment of Babylon, hereafter, ch. xvii., xviii., to be described in detail,—and of the great day itself in ver. 20, also hereafter (ch. xx. 11—15) to be resumed at more length. 4) As we might expect in the final plagues, we have no longer, as in the trumpets, a portion of each element affected, but the whole. 5) While in the first four vials the main features of the first four trumpets are reproduced, there is one notable distinction in the case of the fourth. While by the plague of the fourth trumpet, the sun, moon, and stars are partially darkened, by that of the fourth vial the power of the sun is increased, and the darkening of the Kingdom of the beast is reserved for the fifth.

The minor special features will be noticed as we proceed. On the whole, the series of the vials seems to bear a less general character than the other two. It takes up a particular point in the prophecy, and deals with symbols and persons previously described. It belongs, by its very conditions, exclusively to the time of, or to days approaching very near to the time of, the end: including in itself the subsequent details as far as the end of ch. xx.: without however noticing most important features and considerable prophetic periods.

1.] Introductory. And I heard a great voice out of the temple (from the fact ch. xv. 8, that the divine Presence is filling the temple, and that none might enter into it, this voice can be no other than the divine voice. The words ἐκ τοῦ ναοῦ may have been erased (as in var. readd.) from the difficulty presented by τοῦ θεοῦ below, none being able to enter during the pouring out of the vials) saying to the seven angels, Go and pour out the seven vials of the wrath of God into the earth (so, previous to the series of trumpets, the angel casts the fire from the altar into the earth, ch. viii. 5).

2.] And the first departed (each angel, as his turn comes, leaves the heavenly scene, and from the space between heaven and earth, empties his vial on the appointed object) and poured out his vial into the earth (the γῆ, which before in ver. 1 was general, is now particular, and correlative with the objects of the other vials, cf. vv. 2, 3, εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν, εἰς τοὺς ποταμούς): and there came (took place: fell, as E. V.) an evil (κακόν, in itself) and painful (πονηρόν, to the sufferers, ἐπίπονον, Suidas. See reff.) sore upon the men that had the mark of the beast and that worshipped his image (see above ch. xiii. 15—17, xiv. 9, 10. The allegorical and historical interpretations have been very various: see them in Elliott, vol. iv. Notice the parallel with the sixth Egyptian plague, Exod. ix. 8 ff. Cf. Deut. xxviii. 27, 35).

3.] And the second poured out his vial into the sea: and it (the sea, cf. ch. viii. 8, 11: not, "there was," as De Wette: for the question would arise, where? the analogy of the Egyptian plague is surely decisive) became blood as of a dead man (blood as when a dead corpse lies in its blood: loathsome and corrupting): and every soul of life (living soul, ref. Gen.: ψυχῇ in its physical sense of animal soul) died, (all) the things in the sea (τά is in apposition with and exegetical of πᾶσα ψ. ζωῆς).

4—7.] And the third poured out his vial into the rivers and the fountains of the waters: and they became (it is quite impossible, in the lax construction of the Apocalyptic Greek, to maintain here a distinction, as Düsterd. has done, from the previous ἐγένετο, and to render here, "there came blood." Analogy must be our guide: and the account to be given of the singular is either that it belongs to τὰ ὕδατα, or that the rivers and fountains are taken together, and regarded as neuter in sense though not in construction) blood (that the fact was so, is testified by what follows, in which it is assumed that the sources of ordinary drink have become blood). And I heard the angel of the waters (i. e. the angel who was set over the waters; see reff.: not as Grot., "vocatur angelus aquarum quia in aquas immisit phialam." Schöttgen, h. l., p. 1131 f., gives examples of angels of the earth and of the sea: see also Wolf, h. l. This is more probable than Düsterd.'s idea that the analogy to be followed is that of the four living-beings, and that the angel symbolized the waters) saying, Thou art righteous who art and wast (as in ch. xi. 17, the καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος is omitted. For the construction, see reff.) holy (I incline against Düsterd., to the usual connexion, viz. the making ὅσιος belong to δ ὢν κ. ὁ ἦν, and not in apposition with δίκαιος. And that which moves me to it is, 1) the extreme improbability of two epithets, δίκαιος and ὅσιος, both being predicated in such an acknowledgment of an act of justice: and 2) that as I have taken it, it best agrees with the ὅσιος in ch. xv. 4, where it is predicated of God not as the result of any manifested acts of His, but as an essential attribute confined to Him alone), because Thou didst judge thus (lit., "these things:" viz. the issue mentioned in ver. 4; the turning the drinking-water into blood: "Thou didst inflict this judgment"): because (this ὅτι repeats the former ὅτι, καὶ following being "and:" not, as it might be taken, "because they, &c., Thou hast also") they shed the blood of saints and prophets, and Thou hast given them blood to drink (on the form of the inf., πείν, see Winer, edn. 6, § 15, and Anthol. xi. 140. 3, οἷς οὐ σκῶμμα λέγειν, οὐ πείν φίλον): they are worthy (these words are made stronger by their asyndetous character). is, that they involve a personification of the altar. On the altar are the prayers of the saints, offered before God: beneath the altar are the souls of the martyrs crying for vengeance: when therefore the altar speaks, it is the concentrated testimony of these which speaks by it), Even so, Lord God Almighty: true (reff.) and just are Thy judgments.

8, 9.] And the fourth poured out his vial upon (no longer eis) the sun: and it was given to it (the sun: not "to him," the angel, as, strangely enough, Bengel and Hengstb., and Elliott, iii. 361. The angels throughout this vision are simply the pourers out of the vials, not the executors of the plagues. Besides which, the verb καυματίζω, in a sentence where the sun is mentioned, can have but one reference: see reff.) to scorch men (the τούς is probably generic merely. If it is to be assigned a meaning, it may be, the men who have received the mark and number of the beast. But the other is more likely) with (the εν of investiture: the element in which the scorching takes place) fire (not, as Hengstb., understanding αὐτῷ of the angel, some fire other than the sun: but the glowing increased heat of the sun itself), and men were scorched with great heat (on the accus. after the passive verb which takes a double accus. in active, see reff., and Winer, edn. 6, § 32. 5), and blasphemed the name of God who hath power over these plagues, and did not repent to give Him glory (on the inf. epexegetic, see Winer, edn. 6, § 44. 1).

10, 11.] And the fifth poured out his vial upon the throne of the beast (given to it by the dragon, ch. xiii. 2. That is, on the spot where the power and presence of the beast had its proper residence): and his kingdom (those lands which owned his rule) became darkened (as in the ninth Egyptian plague, Exod. x. 21 ff., the darkness is specially sent over the land, not occasioned by any failure of the lights of heaven). And they (the inhabitants: the subjects of the beast. They are by and by identified with those who had received his mark) chewed their tongues (the word μασάομαι is confined to the comedians and later Gr. prose. ἡ τῶν γλωσσῶν μάσησι τὴν ὑπερβολὴν τῆς ὀδύνης δηλοῖ, says Andreas) from (ἐκ, of the source of the action: see reff.) their pain (viz. under which they were previously suffering: not, that occasioned by the darkness, which would not of itself occasion pain: see below), and blasphemed the God of heaven (see ch. xi. 13) by reason of (ἐκ as above) their pains and their sores (these words bind on this judgment to that of the first and following vials, and shew that they are cumulative, not simply successive. The sores, and pains before mentioned, are still in force), and repeated not of (see ch. ix. 20, 21) their works.

12.] And the sixth poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates: and its water was dried up, that the way of the kings which come from the rising of the sun might be prepared (notice, but not to be blindly led by it, the analogy of the sixth trumpet, also having reference to the river Euphrates. In order to understand what we here read, we must carefully bear in mind the context. From what follows under this same vial, we learn that the kings of the whole earth are about to be gathered together to the great battle against God, in which He shall be victorious, and they shall utterly perish. The time is now come for this gathering: and by the drying up of the Euphrates, the way of those kings who are to come to it from the East is made ready. This is the only understanding of these words which will suit the context, or the requirements of this series of prophecies. For to suppose the conversion of Eastern nations, or the gathering together of Christian princes, to be meant, or to regard the words as relating to any auspicious event, is to introduce a totally incongruous feature into the series of vials, which confessedly represent the "seven last plagues." Andreas explains it as above: and so Bleek, Ewald, De Wette, Düsterd., al.).

13—16.] And I saw (notice the curious reading of Ν, which derives some interest from the absence of any participle to signify "going forth") out of the mouth of the dragon (who is still in the prophetic scene, giving his power to the beast, ch. xiii. 2) and out of the mouth of the beast and out of the mouth of the false prophet (viz. the second beast of ch. xiii. 11 ff. Cf. ch. xix. 20, xx. 10) three unclean spirits like frogs (in shape and character. In the entire absence of Scripture symbolism,—for the only mention of frogs besides this is in, or in regard to, the relation of the plague in Egypt,—we can only explain the similitude from the uncleanness, and the pertinacious noise, of the frog.  Him who is our Righteousness: and the walking naked is that destitution of these garments which will at that day bring shame before assembled men and angels).
 And they (the unclean spirits, as is evident gether to the place which is called in Hebrew Harmagedon (it is evidently in the meaning of the Hebrew name of this place that its appropriate significance lies. For otherwise why should εβραϊστί be prefixed to it? When St. John does this in his Gospel, in the cases of Bethesda, v. 2, Gabbatha, xix. 13, Golgotha, xix. 17, and in this book in the case of Abaddon, ch. ix. 11, it is each time not without such reference: see the notes in those places. But this circumstance does not deprive the name of geographical reality: and it is most probable on every account that such reality exists here. The words τὸν τόπον τὸν καλούμενον would surely not be used except of a real place habitually so named, or by a name very like this. Nor need we search far for the place pointed out. ἰσχυρῆ, the mountain of Megiddo, designates at least the neighbourhood where the Canaanitish kings were overthrown by Barak, Judg. v. 19; an occasion which gave rise to one of the two triumphal songs of Israel recorded in the O. T., and therefore one well worthy of symbolizing the great final overthrow of the Kings of the Earth leagued against Christ. That the name slightly differs from that given in the O. T. where it is the plain (2 Chron. xxxv. 22) or the waters (Judg. i. c.) of Megiddo, is of slight consequence, and may be owing to a reason which I shall dwell on below. The LXX in both places adopt the form which we have here, Μαγεδῶ -δῶν or -δδῶ. Nor must it be forgotten, that Megiddo was connected with another overthrow and slaughter, viz. that of Josiah by Pharaoh-Necho (2 Kings xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. ubi supra), which though not analogous to this predicted battle in its issue, yet served to keep up the character of the place as one of overthrow and calamity: cf. also Zech. xii. 11, and the striking description, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25, of the ordinance of lamentation for Josiah. At Megiddo also another Jewish King, Ahaziah, died of the wounds received from Jehu, 2 Kings ix. 27. The prefix Har, signifying "mountain," has its local propriety, see Stanley's description of the plain of Esdraclon, in the opening of his Sinai and Palestine, ch. ix. And to the fisherman of the lake of Galilee, who would know Megiddo as he saw its background of highland lit up by the morning or evening sun across the plain from his native hills, the name would doubtless be a familiar one. Still there may have been a deeper reason which led to, or at all events justified the prefix. As the name now stands, it has a meaning ominous of the great overthrow which is to take place on the spot. Drusius, believing the word to be merely a mystic one, explains it to be ἰσχυρῆ, "internecio exercitus eorum," the overthrow of their army. But, conceding and maintaining the geographical reality, must not we suppose that such a name, with such a sound, so associated with the past, bore to a Hebrew ear, when used of the future, its ominous significance of overthrow? It is remarkable that in Zech. xii. 11, where the mourning for Josiah is alluded to, the LXX render not in the plain of Megiddo, but ἐν πεδίῳ ἐκκοπτομένου: and this agrees with the interpretation of Andreas here, who supposes the name equivalent to διακοπή).

17—21.] And the seventh poured out his vial upon the air (the consequences are presently seen), and there came forth a voice out of the temple from the throne (the voice, as in ver. 1, of God Himself. This is rendered even more certain here by the addition of ἀπὸ τοῦ θρόνου) saying, It is done (the limitation of the meaning of γέγονεν to "that is done which was commanded," viz. the outpouring of the seven vials, is in fact no limitation: for the plagues are the last plagues: if therefore they are done, all is done. But the declaration is of course proleptically made, and imports that the outpouring of the seventh vial had done that which should accomplish all and bring in found no mountains (not as E. V., "the mountains (τὰ ὄρη) were not found." The expression is far stronger than this: amounting to that in ch. vi. 14, that every mountain was removed out of its place and was looked for in vain), and a great hail (see reff. Egypt is again in view) as of a talent in weight (i. e. having each hailstone of that weight. Diod. Sic. xix. 45 speaks of hailstones of a mina each in weight as being enormous: καταβραγόντων ἐξαίφνης μεγάλων ὕμβρων, καὶ χαλάζης ἀπίστου τὸ μέγεθος, μνααῖαι γὰρ ἐπιπτον, ἔστι δ' ὅτε καὶ μείζους, ὥστε πολλὰς μὲν τῶν οἰκιῶν συμπίπτειν διὰ τὸ βάρος, οὐκ ὕλιγους δὲ καὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀπόλλυσθαι: and the talent contained sixty minæ. Josephus, in reff., speaks of the stones which were thrown from the machines in the siege of Jerusalem as each of a talent weight) descendeth from heaven on men (τοὺς ἀνθρ. must apparently be generic here: it can hardly mean the men; for the plague is universal. See above on ver. 9): and men blasphemed God by reason of the plague of the hail, because great is the plague of it exceedingly (i. e. mankind in general,—not those who were struck by the hailstones who would instantly die,—so far from repenting at this great and final judgment of God, blasphemed Him and were impatient. The issue is different from that in ch. xi. 13, where the remnant feared and gave glory to God).

CH. XVII. 1—XIX. 10.] THE JUDGMENT OF BABYLON. And herein, XVII. 1—6.] The description of Babylon under the figure of a drunken harlot, riding on the beast. And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials (we are not told which of the seven, and it is idle to enquire. The seventh has been conjectured, because under the out-pouring of his vial Babylon was remembered) and talked with me saying, Hither (see reff.), I will shew thee the judgment of the great harlot that sitteth upon [the] many waters, with whom the kings of the earth (have) committed fornication, and they who inhabit the earth have been made drunk from the wine (ἐκ, the wine having been the source of their drunkenness) of her fornication (the figure here used, of a harlot who has committed fornication with secular kings and peoples, is frequent in the prophets, and has one principal meaning and application, viz. to God's church and people that had forsaken Him and attached herself to others. In eighteen places out of twenty-one where the figure occurs, such is its import; viz. in Isa. i. 21; Jer. ii. 20, iii. 1, 6, 8; Ezek. xvi. 15, 16, 28, 31, 35, 41, xxiii. 5, 19, 44; Hosea ii. 5, iii. 3, iv. 15 (Micah i. 7). In three places only is the word applied to heathen cities: viz. in Isa. xxiii. 15, 16 to Tyre, where, ver. 17, it is also said, "she shall commit fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth:" and in Nahum iii. 4 to Nineveh, which is called the well-favoured harlot, the mistress of witchcrafts, that selleth nations through her whoredoms, and families through her witchcrafts. And there the threat is pronounced of a very similar ruin to that which befalls Babylon here. So that the Scripture analogy, while it points to unfaithfulness and treachery against God's covenant, also brings to mind extensive empire and wide-spread rule over the kingdoms of the earth. It is true, that as far as the image itself is concerned, pagan Rome as well fulfils its requirements as Tyre and Nineveh. It will depend on subsequent features in the description, whether we are to bound our view with her history and overthrow. Still, it will not be desirable to wait for the solution of this question till we arrive at the point where those features appear: for by so doing much of our intermediate exegesis will necessarily be obscured. The decisive test then which may at once be applied to solve the question, is derived from the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon in ch. xviii. 2. It is to be laid utterly waste, and to "become the habitation of devils and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird." Now no such destruction as this has yet befallen Rome, unless her transfer from pagan to papal rule be such a destruction, and the Pope and his ecclesiastics be described in the above terms. In an eloquent passage of Vitranga, he presses Bossuet with this dilemma. Again, it is said of this harlot, μεθ' ἧς ἐπόρνευσαν οἱ βασιλεῖς τῆς γῆς. But we may ask, if this be pagan Rome, who and what are these kings, and what is indicated by her having been the object of their lustful desires? In the days of Imperial Rome, there were no independent kings of the earth except in Parthia and Persia. Rome in her pagan state, as described for the purpose of identification in ver. 18, was not one who intrigued with the kings of the earth, but ἡ ἔχουσα βασιλείαν ἐπὶ τῶν βασιλείων τῆς γῆς: she reigned over them with undisputed and crushing sway.

I do not hesitate therefore, induced mainly by these considerations, which will be confirmed as we proceed step by step in the prophecy, to maintain that interpretation which regards papal and not pagan Rome as pointed out by the harlot of this vision. The subject has been amply discussed by many expositors. I would especially mention Vitranga, and Bp. Wordsworth.

The "sitting upon many waters" is said of Babylon in Jer. in reff., but has here a symbolical meaning; see below, ver. 15. On the ἐμεθύσθησαν see ch. xiv. 8. The same thing is said of Babylon in Jer. l. c. But there she herself is the cup in the Lord's hand). And he (the angel) carried me away to the wilderness (not, as Elliott, al., and even Düs-terd., "a wilderness." Such inferences from the absence of the art. in this later Greek, never secure, are more than ever unsafe when a preposition precedes: and the usage of the LXX should have prevented any such rendering here. In no fewer than twenty places (see Tromm.) they use the word ἔρημος anarthrously, where there can be no question that "the wilderness" is the only rendering. In fact it may be questioned whether the expressly indefinite rendering, "a wilderness," is ever justifiable, except in case of predication, or junction with an adjective, without some further indication than the mere omission of the definite article after a preposition. Had it been intended here, we may safely say that εἰς τόπον ἔρημον, or εἰς τόπον τινα ἔρημον would have been used. The most natural way of accounting for the Ser being taken into the wilderness here, is that he was to be shewn Babylon, which was in the wilderness, and the overthrow of which, in the prophecy from which come the very words ἔπεσεν (πέπτωκεν, LXX) Βαβυλῶν (Isa. xxi. 9), is headed τὸ δράμα τῆς ἐρήμου. So that by the analogy of prophecy, the journey to witness the fall of Babylon would be εἰς ἔρημον. The question of the identity of this woman with the woman in ch. xii. is not affected by that of the identity of this wilderness with that) in the spirit (see reff., and note on ch. i. 10): and I saw a woman sitting upon a scarlet beast (this beast is introduced as if a new appearance: but its identity with that mentioned before, ch. xiii. 1 ff., is plain as the description goes onward. For not to mention the features which the two have in common, this beast, as soon as described, is ever after mentioned as τὸ θηρίον: and in ch. xix. 19, 20 the identity is expressly established. For there we read, ver. 19, that the beast and the kings of the earth make war against the Lamb, which beast can be no other than this on which the woman rides, cf. our vv. 12-14:—and in the next verse, ch. xix. 20, we read that the beast was taken, and the false prophet who did miracles before him, which beast can be no other than that of ch. xiii. See ver. 14 there. The identity of the two is therefore matter not of opinion, but of demonstration. The differences in appearance doubtless are significant. That with which we are now concerned, the scarlet colour, is to be understood as belonging not to a covering on the beast, but to the beast itself. It is akin to the colour of the dragon (πυρρός), but as that is the redness of fire (see however ch. vi. 4), so is this of blood, with which both the beast and its rider are dyed. It was the colour, see ref. Heb., of the wool to be used in sprinkling the blood of sacrifice. There may be an allusion to the Roman imperial purple: for the robe which was put on our Lord in mockery was κόκκινος, ref. Matt. But this is more probably conveyed by its own proper word in the next verse. By the woman sitting on the wild-beast, is signified that superintending and guiding power which the rider possesses over his beast: than which nothing could be chosen more apt to represent the superiority claimed and exercised by the See of Rome over the secular kingdoms of Christendom), full of names of blasphemy (for the construction with accus., see ref., and Wiener, edn. 6, § 32. 5. The names of blasphemy, which were found before on the heads of the beast only, have now spread over its whole surface. As ridden and guided by the harlot, it is tenfold more blasphemous in its titles and assumption than before. The heathen world had but its Divi in the Cæsars, as in other deified men of note: but Christendom has its "most Christian" and "most faithful" Kings, such as Louis XIV. and Philip II.; its "Defenders of the faith," such as Charles II. and James II.; its society of unprincipled intriguers called after the sacred name of our Lord, and working Satan's work "ad majorem Dei gloriam;" its "holy office" of the Inquisition, with its dens of darkest cruelty; finally its "patrimony of St. Peter," and its "holy Roman Empire;" all of them, and many more, new names of blasphemy, with which the woman has invested the beast. Go where we will and look where we will in Papal Christendom, names of blasphemy meet us. The taverns, the shops, the titles of men and of places, the very insurance badges on the houses, are full of them), having seven heads and ten horns (as in its former appearance, ch. xiii. 1; inherited from the dragon, ch. xii. 3. These are presently interpreted: we now return to the description of the woman herself). And the woman was clothed in purple (St. John's own word, even to its peculiar form, see ref., for the mock-imperial robe placed on our Lord: and therefore bearing probably here the same signification; but not in mockery, as Bede, "fucus simulati regiminiis:" for the empire is real) and scarlet (see above. This very colour is not without its significance: witness the Cardinals, at the same time the guiding council of the Church and princes of the State), [and] gilded with gold and with (the κεχρυσωμένη is zeugmatically carried on) precious stone and with pearls (this description needs no illustration for any who have witnessed, or even read of, the pomp of Papal Rome: which, found as it is every where, is concentrated in the city itself), holding a cup of gold in her hand full of abominations and of the impure things (the change of construction is remarkable: for such it must be accounted, and not, with Dūsterd., the accus. governed by ἔχουσα. It seems to be made, not to avoid an accumulation of genitives, as Hengstb., but to mark a difference between the more abstract designation of the contents of the cup as βδελύγματα, and the specification of them in the concrete as τὰ ἀκάθαρτα κ.τ.λ.) of her fornication (this cup is best taken altogether symbolically, and not as the cup in the Mass, which, however degraded by her blasphemous fiction of transubstantiation, could hardly be called by this name, and moreover is not given, but denied by her to the nations of the earth. That she should have represented herself in her medals as holding forth this cup (with the remarkable inscription, “sedet super universam;” see Elliott, vol. iv. p. 30, plate), is a judicial coincidence rather than a direct fulfilment), and (having) upon her forehead a name written (as was customary with harlots: so Seneca, Controv. i. 2, in Wetst.: “Stetisti puella in lupanari: . . . nomen tuum pendit a fronte: pretia stupri accepisti:” and Juv. Sat. vi. 123 of Messallina, “Tunc nuda papillis Constitit auratis, titulum mentita Lyeiscæ”), Mystery (is this word part of the name, or not? On the whole it seems more probable that it is. For though no such word would in the nature of things be attached to her forehead as part of her designation, so neither would the description which follows Βαβυλῶν ἢ μεγάλη, to which the word μυστήριον seems partly to refer. But whether part of the name or not, the meaning will be the same: viz. that the title following is to be taken in a spiritual and an enigmatical sense: compare ch. i. 20, and 2 Thess. ii. 7), Babylon the great, the mother of the harlots and of the abominations of the earth (i. e. not only first and greatest of these, but herself the progenitress and origin of the rest. All spiritual fornication and corruption are owing to her, and to her example and teaching). And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus (as the Seer contemplates the woman, he perceives that she is drunken: and from what is revealed to him, and from her symbolic colour of blood, he assigns the cause of that intoxication. Wetst. quotes Plin. H. N. xiv. 28, “quo facile intelligitur ebrius jam sanguine civium, et tanto magis eum sitiens”). And I wondered, when I saw her, with great wonder (what was the ground of the Seer's astonishment? One doubtless might be assigned, which would at once account for any degree of such emotion. If this woman is the same as he before saw, who fled into the wilderness from the face of the dragon, "the faithful city become an harlot" (Isa. i. 21), he might well wonder. And certainly there is much in favour of such a supposition. It has been taken up by some considerable expositors, such as Auferlen (Der Prophet Daniel, pp. 278 ff.), who has argued earnestly but soberly for it. There is one objection to it, which has been made more of in this place than perhaps it deserves. It is, that in the Angel's replication to St. John's wonder, no allusion is made to this circumstance as its principal ground. But, it may well be replied, this would be just what we might expect, if the fact of identity were patent. The Seer, versed in the history of man's weakness and depravity, full of O. T. prophetic thoughts and sayings, would need no solution of the fact itself: this would lie at the ground of his wonder, and of the angel's explanation of the consequences which were to follow from it. Auferlen very properly lays stress on the fact, that the joint symbolism of the wilderness and the woman could not fail to call up in the mind of the Seer the last occasion when the two occurred together: and insists that this symbol must be continuous throughout. Without going so far as to pronounce the two identical, I think we cannot and ought not to lose sight of the identity of symbolism in the two cases. It is surely meant to lie beneath the surface, and to teach us an instructive lesson. We may see from it two prophetic truths: first, that the church on earth in the main will become apostate and faithless, cf. Luke xviii. 8: and secondly, that while this shall be so, the apostasy shall not embrace the whole church, so that the second woman in the apocalyptic vision should be absolutely identical with the first. The identity is, in the main, not to be questioned: in formal strictness, not to be pressed. This being so, I should rather regard St. John's astonishment as a compound feeling, occasioned partly by the enormity of the sight revealed to him, partly also by the identity of the symbolism with that which had been the vehicle of a former and altogether different vision).

7—18.] Explanation by the angel of the mystery of the woman and of the beast. And first, 7—14.] of the beast. And the angel said to me, Wherefore didst thou wonder? I will tell to thee the mystery (which, be it noted, is but one) of the woman and of the wild-beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and the ten horns. The beast which thou sawest, was, and is not, and shall come up out of the abyss and goeth to perdition (these words have been a very battle-field for apocalyptic expositors, whose principal differing interpretations are far too long to be given at all intelligibly here, but will be seen best in their own works, and compendiously but fairly stated in the notices in Mr. Elliott's fourth volume. What is here required, is that I should give a consistent account of that solution which I have been myself led to adopt. 1) It will not be supposed, with the general view which I have taken of the beast as the secular persecuting power, that I am prepared to accede to that line of interpretation which makes the whole vision merely descriptive of the Seer's own time, and of the Roman emperors then past, present, and expected. Against such a view it seems to me the whole imagery and diction of the vision protest: and this it will be my endeavour to shew as each of their details comes under my notice. If, as universally acknowledged, our prophecy be a taking up and continuation of that of Daniel, then we are dealing with larger matters and on a wider scale than such a limited interpretation would imply. 2) Nor again, after the meaning assigned above to the harlot and her title, will it be expected that I should agree with those who take her as, according to the letter of our ver. 18, strictly confined in meaning to the material city of Rome. She is that city: but she is also μυστήριον. She is herself a harlot, an apostate and faithless church; but she is also a mother: from her spring, of her nature partake, with her shall be destroyed, all the fornications and abominations of the earth, though they be not in Rome, though they be not called by her name, though in outward semblance they quarrel with and oppose her. 3) The above remarks will lead their intelligent reader to expect, that the present words of our text, which are in the main reproductive of the imagery of ch. xiii. 1—4, will be interpreted as those were interpreted, not of mere passing events and persons, but of world-wide and world-long empires and changes. 4) Having thus indicated the line of interpretation which I shall follow, I reserve the details for ver. 10, where they necessarily come before us): and they shall wonder who dwell upon the earth, of whom the name is not written upon (the accus. as so often in this book) the book of life from the foundation of the world (these latter words, even in ordinary N. T. Greek, would belong to γέγραπται, and the art. τό would be wanted to connect them with τὸ βιβλίον λίον τῆς ζωῆς. But it is by no means certain, in the loose Greek of the Apocalypse, whether these accuracies must be insisted on. Judging by the analogy of ch. xiii. 8 (see note there), ἀπὸ κατ. κόσμου belongs to that which immediately precedes it: as indeed it does in every place where it occurs in which its connexion might be ambiguous. I prefer therefore to follow analogy, rather than to insist on philological accuracy in a book where its rules are manifestly not observed), seeing (the reader expects βλέποντες, to agree with οἱ κατοικοῦντες: but instead, we have βλεπόντων, agreeing with ὧν by attraction) the beast that he was and is not and shall come again (see for full explanation, below on vv. 9, 10). Here (is) the mind that hath wisdom (by these words, as in ch. xiii. 18, attention is bespoken, and spiritual discernment challenged, for that which follows). The seven heads are seven mountains, where (= ἐφ' ὧν, on which) the woman sitteth (upon them) (ἐπ' αὐτῶν, the well-known Hebraistic redundancy of construction after ἐφ' ὧν, here expressed by ἕπου).

By these words, no less plainly than by ver. 18, Rome is pointed out. Propertius, iii. 11. 57, by a remarkable coincidence, unites both descriptions in one line: "Septem urbs alta jugis, toto quæ præsudet orbi." The more remarkable out of the very many testimonies of Rome being thus known, are those of Horace, Carmen Seculare, 7, "Di quibus septem placuere colles:" Virg. Æn. vi. 782, "Illa inclyta Roma Imperium terris, animos æquabit Olympo, Septemque una sibi muro circumdabit arces:" where Servius annotated, "alii dicunt breves septem colliculos a

Wordsworth's Letters to M. Gondon on the Church of Rome, Let. xi. Also the coin of Vespasian figured in Elliott, vol. iv. p. 30): and they are seven kings (let us weigh well the significance of this indication furnished by the angel. The seven heads have a reference to the woman, who sits upon the beast to whom they belong: and, as far as this reference is concerned, they are hills, on which she sits. But they have also another reference—to the beast, of which they are the heads: and as far as this other reference is concerned, they are kings. Not, be it noticed, kings over the woman, nor kings of the city symbolized by her: but kings in a totally different relation, viz. that to the beast, of which they are heads. So that to interpret these kings as emperors of Rome, or as successive forms of government over Rome, is to miss the propriety of the symbolism and to introduce utter confusion. They belong to the beast, which is not Rome, nor the Roman Empire, but a general symbol of secular antichristian power. They are in substance the same seven crowned heads which we saw on the dragon in ch. xii. 3: the same which we saw, with names of blasphemy on them, on the beast of ch. xiii. 1, to whom the dragon gave his power and his throne). The five (i. e. the first five out of the seven) fell (Angl., "are fallen." Of whom is this word used? Is it one likely to be chosen to describe the mere passing away of king after king in an empire more or less settled? One appropriate to Augustus and Tiberius, who died in their beds? Or again is it one which could well be predicated of the government by consuls, which had been absorbed into the imperial power, or of that by dictators, which had merely ceased ad tempus sumi, because it had become perpetual in the person of one man? Had Roman emperors been meant by the seven kings, or successive stages of government over Rome (even supposing these last made out, which they never have been), we should in vain have sought any precedent, or any appropriate meaning, for this ἔπεσαν: "have passed away" would be its constrained and unexampled sense. But let the analogy of Scripture and of this book itself guide us, and our way will be clear enough. ἔπεσαν is the cry over Babylon herself. πίπτω is used in the LXX constantly, and by Theod. in ref. Dan., of the violent fall, the overthrow, either of kings or of kingdoms: it is a word belonging to domination overthrown, to glory ruined, to empire superseded. If I understand these five of individual successive kings, if I understand them of forms of government adopted and laid down on occasion, I can give no account of this verb: but if I understand them of forms of empire, one after another heading the antichristian secular power, one after another violently overthrown and done away, I have this verb in its right place and appropriate sense. Egypt is fallen, the first head of the beast that persecuted God's people, Ezek. xxix., xxx.: Nineveh is fallen, the bloody city, Nahum iii. 1—19: Babylon is fallen, the great enemy of Israel, Isa. xxi. 9; Jer. l., li., al.: Persia is fallen, Dan. x. 13, xi. 2: Græcia is fallen, Dan. xi. 3, 4. Thus, and as it seems to me thus only, can we do justice to the expression. Nor is any force done thus to βασιλεῖς, but on the contrary it is kept to its strict prophetic import, and to the analogy of that portion of prophecy which is here especially in view. For in Dan. vii. 17 we read these great beasts which are four are four kings, ἡ τετράβητος; not βασιλεῖαι, as LXX and Theodotion), the one is (the Roman), the other (required to complete the seven)

is not yet come (I agree with Auberlen, der Prophet Daniel, pp. 304 ff., in regarding this seventh as the Christian empire beginning with Constantine: during whose time the beast in his proper essence, in his fulness of opposition to God and His saints, ceases to be), and when he shall come he must remain a little time (certainly the impression we derive from these words is not as Düsterd., al., that his empire is to be of very short continuance, but the ὀλίγον, as in ref. 1 Pet., gives the idea of some space not assigned, but vaguely thus stated as "some little time.") The idea given is rather that of duration than of non-duration. Herodotus, iv. 81, says of the river Exampæus, τοῦ καὶ ὀλίγον τι πρότερον τούτων μνήμην εἶχον, but it was twenty-nine chapters back. See for the usage of this book itself, ch. ii. 14, iii. 4; not xii. 12, where the context decides ὀλίγον to be emphatic. Here, the stress is on δεῖ μείναι, and not on ὀλίγον: on the fact of some endurance, not on its being but short). And the beast, which was and is not (as in ver. 8, whose peculiar power and essence seem suspended while the empire is Christian by profession. But observe, the seventh is for all that a veritable head, and like the others carries names of blasphemy. The beast is not actually put out of existence, but has only received a deadly wound which is again healed, see ch. xiii. 3, notes), he himself (or, this) also is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth unto perdition (this eighth, the last and worst phase of the beast, is not represented as any one of his heads, but as being the beast himself in actual embodiment. He is ἐκ τῶν ἑπτὰ, —not, "one of the seven," but, the successor and result of the seven, following and springing out of them. And he εἰς ἀπώλειαν ὑπάγει—does not fall like the others, but goes on and meets his own destruction at the hand of the Lord Himself. There can be little doubt in the mind of the student of prophecy, who is thus described: that it is the ultimate antichristian power, prefigured by the little horn in Daniel, and expressly announced by St. Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 3 ff., as ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας,—as ὁ ἄνομος, ὃν ὁ κύριος Ἰησοῦς ἀνελεῖ τῷ πνεύματι τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ, καὶ καταργήσει τῇ ἐπιφανείᾳ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ). And the ten horns which thou sawest, are ten kings (not necessarily personal kings: see on ver. 10 above: but kingdoms, regarded as summed up in their kings) which (οἵτινες, kings of that kind who) have not yet received a kingdom, but receive power as kings (the ὡς βασιλεῖς is somewhat enigmatical. Auberlen suggests, whether the kingly power itself may not have passed away from these realms in the days of antichristian misrule; and thus their power be only ὡς βασιλεῖς. But this seems inconsistent with their being called βασιλεῖς. Rather I would say the ὡς represents the reservation of their kingly rights in their alliance with the beast) one hour (i. e. during the space of one hour: just as ἡμίωρον in ch. viii. 1 is during the space of half an hour. Some, e. g. Vitringa and Elliott, have upheld the meaning, for μίαν ὥραν μετὰ, of "at one and the same time with." From the use of ποίαν ὥραν in ch. iii. 3, we might concede such usage to be within the bare limits of possibility; though even thus the μίαν μετὰ, for "one and the same with," is a hard saying. But we are not to enquire in our exegesis, what may possibly be, but what probably is. And I venture to say that but for a preconceived opinion, no one would ever have thought of any other meaning for these words than the ordinary one, "for the space of one hour." And thus accordingly we will take them, as signifying some definite space, unknown to us, thus designated: analogous in position to the ὀλίγον above) together with (i. e. in conjunction with, allied with: their power will be associated with his power) the beast (who are these? The answer seems to be furnished us in Dan. vii. 23 ff. They are ten kingdoms which shall arise out of the fourth great kingdom there: ten European powers, which in the last time, in concert with and subjection to the antichristian power, shall make war against Christ. In the precise number and form here indicated, they have not yet arisen. It would not be difficult to point out the elements and already consolidating shapes of most of them: but in precise number we have them not as yet. What changes in Europe may bring them into the required tale and form, it is not for us to say). These have (the present is used in describing them, though they have not yet arisen) one mind (one and the same view and intent and consent), and give their might and their power to the beast (becoming his allies and moving at his beck). These shall war with the Lamb (in concert with the beast, ch. xix. 19), and the Lamb shall conquer them, because He is Lord of lords and King of kings, and they who are with Him (νικήσουσιν αὐτούς also: the verb is implied in νικήσει above) called and chosen

(all the called are not chosen, Matt. (xx. 16.) xxii. 14: but all that are chosen are first called, 2 Pet. i. 10) and faithful (this way of taking this clause is far better than with Bengel to make κλ. κ. ἐκλ. κ. πιστοὶ into predicate, "and they that are with him are called and chosen and faithful." For 1) it can clearly be no co-ordinate reason with the other assigned for the Lamb's victory, that His followers are, &c., and 2) the arrangement of the sentence seems against this view, seeing that in the former case the predicate is put forward, and in this we should have expected it also: καὶ κλ. κ. ἐκλεκτ. κ. πιστοὶ οἱ μετ' αὐτοῦ).

There is also doubtless an impious parody intended in the position of the harlot to that of Him who sitteth above the water-flood and remaineth King for ever, Ps. xxix. 10). And the ten horns which thou sawest, and the beast (viz. in that compact and alliance just now mentioned), these shall hate the harlot (we now enter upon prophetic particulars other than those revealed in the vision, where the harlot was sitting on the beast. Previous to these things coming to pass, she must be cast down from her proud position, and shall make her deserted and naked (contrast to ver. 4. Her former lovers shall no longer frequent her nor answer to her call: her rich adornments shall be stripped off. She shall lose, at the hands of those whom she formerly seduced with her cup of fornication, both her spiritual power over them and her temporal power to adorn herself), and shall eat her flesh (batten upon her spoils; confiscate her possessions: or perhaps, as the same expression, Ps. xxvii. 2; Micah iii. 2 ff., where it is used to indicate the extreme vengeance of keen hostility. So Xen. Hell. iii. 3. 6, says of the hatred between the Helots, Περιᾶει, &c., and the pure Spartans, ὅπου γὰρ ἐν τούτοις (the Helots, &c.) τις λόγος γέναιτο περὶ Σπαρτιατῶν, οὐδένα δύνασθαι κρύπτειν τὸ μὴ οὐχ ἡδέως ἂν καὶ ὠμῶν ἐσθίειν αὐτῶν), and shall consume her with (or, in) fire (Düsterd. remarks that in the former clause the figure of a woman is kept: in this latter the thing signified, a city. But this need not absolutely be; the woman may be here also intended: and all the more probably, because the very words ἐν πυρὶ κατακαύσουσιν are quoted from the legal formula of the condemnation of those who had committed abominable fornications: cf. Levit. xx. 14, xxi. 9. The burning of the city would be a signal fulfilment: but we cannot positively say that that, and nothing else, is intended). For God put it (refl.: the aor. is proleptic) into their hearts to do His mind, [and to make one mind (ποιῆσαι is in the same sense each time—to put in practice: this they do in regard both to God's mind and their own common mind, the two being the same. The identity is not asserted, which would require τὴν μίαν γνώμην αὐτῶν, but implied),] and to give their kingdom (i. e., as above, the authority of their respective kingdoms) to the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled (the prophetic words or discourses, — not ῥήματα, but λόγοι, — respecting the destruction of Babylon). And the woman whom thou sawest, is the great city, which hath kingdom over the kings of the earth (every thing here is plain. The “septem urbs alta jugis toto quæ præsidet orbi,” Propert., can be but one, and that one ROME. The pres. part., ἡ ἔχουσα, points to the time when the words were uttered, and to the dominion then subsisting. It has already been seen, that the prophecy regards Rome pagan and papal, but, from the figure of an harlot and the very nature of the predictions themselves, more the latter than the former. I may observe in passing, that the view maintained recently by Düsterd., after many others, that the whole of these prophecies regard Pagan Rome only, receives no countenance from the words of vision, which this school of Commentators are fond of appealing to as decisive for them. Rather may we say that this verse, taken in connexion with what has gone before, stultifies their view entirely. If the woman, as these Commentators insist, represents merely the stone-walls and houses of the city, what need is there for μυστήριον on her brow,—what appropriateness in the use of all the Scripture imagery, long familiar to God's people, of spiritual fornication? And if this were so, where is the contest with the Lamb,—where the fulfilment of any the least portion of the prophecy? If we understand it thus, nothing is left for us but to say, as indeed some of this school are not afraid to say, that only the Scer's wish dictated his words, and that history has not verified them. So that this view has one merit: it brings us at once face to face with the dilemma of accepting or rejecting the book: and thereby, for us, who accept it as the word of God, becomes impossible. For us, who believe the prophecy is to be fulfilled, what was Rome then, is Rome now. Her fornications and abominations, as well as her power and pride, are matter of history and of present fact: and we look for her destruction to come, as we believe it is rapidly coming, by the means and in the manner here foretold.

If so, the announcement is still anticipatory, see ver. 21), and the earth was lighted up by his glory (ἐκ, as the source of the brightness): and he cried with (or, in) a mighty voice saying, Babylon the great is fallen [is fallen], and is become an habitation of dæmons (see especially LXX, Isa. xxxiv. 14 ff.), and a hold (a place of detention: as it were an appointed prison) of every unclean spirit, and a hold of every unclean and hated bird (see the prophecy respecting Babylon, Jer. l. 39): because by (out of, as source: or, according to the other reading, of) the wrath of her fornication all the nations have fallen (or, according to the other reading, drunk: see on ch. xiv. 8. of her fornication which has turned into wrath to herself), and the kings of the earth committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth became rich out of the quantity (δύναμις, copia, as Vitringa, who remarks, "alluditur ad Hebræam vocem ἵπ, cujus hæc significationis vis est, Job xxxi. 25, Ezek. xxviii. 4." We have πλούτου μεγάλου δύναμιν in Jos. Antt. iii. 2. 4) of her luxury (στρήνος, see reff. and note on 1 Tim., seems properly to mean the exuberance of strength, the flower of pride).

4—20.] Warning to God's people to leave her, on account of the greatness of her crimes and coming judgments (4—8); lamentations over her on the part of those who were enriched by her (9—20). And I heard another voice out of heaven (not that of the Father nor of Christ, for in such a case, as has been well observed, the long poetical lamentation would be hardly according to prophetic decorum; but that of an angel speaking in the name of God, as we have μου ch. xi. 3 also) saying, Come out of her, my people (in reff. Isa., the circumstances differed, in that being a joyful exodus, this a cautionary one: and thus the warning is brought nearer to that one which our Lord commands in Matt. xxiv. 16, and the cognate warnings in the O. T., viz. that of Lot to come out of Sodom, Gen. xix. 15—22, when her destruction impended, and that of the people of Israel to get them up from the tents of Dathau and Abiram, Num. xvi. 23—26. In reff. Jer., we have the same circumstance of Babylon's impending destruction combined with the warning: and from those places probably, especially Jer. li. 45, the words here are taken. The inference has been justly made from them (Elliott iv. p. 40), that there shall be, even to the last, saints of God in the midst of Rome: and that there will be danger of their being, through a lingering fondness for her, partakers in her coming judgments, that ye partake not in her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues (the fear, in case of God's servants remaining in her, would be twofold: 1) lest by over-persuasion or guilty conformity they should become accomplices in any of her crimes: 2) lest by being in and of her, they should, though the former may not have been the case (and even more if it abundance): and with fire shall she be burnt (the punishment of the fornicatress; see ch. xvii. 16 note. Whether this is to be understood of the literal destruction of the city of Rome by fire, Elliott iv. 43, is surely doubtful, considering the mystical character of the whole prophecy): because strong is [the Lord] God who hath judged her (a warrant for the severity of the judgment which shall befall her).

9—20.] The mourning over her: and first, 9, 10, by the kings of the earth. And there shall weep and mourn over her (when the catalogue of mourners has yet to begin, the fact of mourning is thrown forward by the verbs being placed first: but below, ver. 11, when we come to the second member, the persons, as the new feature, are put forward before the verbs. ἐπ' αὐτήν, as the direction and converging of their lamentation) the kings of the earth, who committed fornication and luxuriated (see above, ver. 7) with her, when they see the smoke of her burning, standing afar off on account of their fear of her torment (this feature in the prophecy is an objection to the literal understanding of its details. It can hardly be imagined that the kings should bodily stand and look as described, seeing that no combination of events contemplated in the prophecy has brought them together as yet), saying, Woe, woe, the great city, Babylon the strong city, because in one hour has come thy judgment. 11—16.] Lamentation of the merchants. And the merchants of the earth weep and lament (the construction passes into the graphic present, but resumes the future again below, ver. 15, in speaking of the same thing) over her, because no one any longer buys their cargo (reff.: so Eustath. in Wetst.: φόρτος νηός, δ καὶ γόμος. The description which follows is perhaps drawn, in its poetic and descriptive features, from the relation of Rome to the world which then was, rather than from its relation at the future time depicted in the prophecy. But it must not for a moment be denied, that the character of this lamentation throws a shade of obscurity over the interpretation, otherwise so plain from the explanation given in ch. xvii. ult. The difficulty is however not confined to the application of the pro-phcey to Rome papal, but extends over the application of it to Rome at all, which last is determined for us by the solution given ch. xvii. ult. For Rome never has been, and from its very position never could be, a great commercial city. I leave this difficulty unsolved, merely requesting the student to bear in mind its true limits, and not to charge it exclusively on that interpretation which only shares it with any other possible one. The main features of the description are taken from that of the destruction of and lamentation over Tyre in Ezek. xxvii., to which city they were strictly applicable. And possibly it may be said that they are also applicable to the church which has wedded herself to the pride of the earth and its luxuries. But certainly, as has been observed, the details of this mercantile lamentation far more nearly suit London, than Rome at any assignable period of her history), a cargo of gold, and of silver, and of precious stone, and of pearls, and of fine linen manufacture (βυσσίνου is the neut. adj. from βύσσοσ), and of purple, and of silken stuff (in describing Vespasian's triumph, Jos., B. J. vii. 5. 4, says, κάκεινοι χωρὶς ὕλων ἦσαν ἐσθήσεσι σηρικαῖς, ἐστεφανωμένοι δάφναις) and of scarlet stuff, and (the accusative is now taken up instead of the genitive governed by γόμον, which latter is however resumed below at ἵππων, and again dropped at ψυχάς) all citron wood (the wood of the θύον, θύα, or θυία, the citrus of the Romans (Plin. iii. 29), probably the eupressus thyioides, or the thya articulata. Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. v. 5, thus describes it: τὸ δὲ θύϊνον, οἱ δὲ θυϊαν καλοῦσι, παρ' Ἀμμωνίδι γίνεται, καὶ ἐν τῇ Κυρηναίᾳ: τὴν μὲν μορφὴν ὅμοιον κυπαρίττω καὶ τοῖς κλάδοις καὶ τοῖς φύλλοις καὶ τῷ στελέχει καὶ τῷ καρπῷ . . . ἀσαπὶς . . . ὅλως τὸ ξύλον, οὐλόταον δὲ τὴν ῥίζαν ἐστὶ, καὶ ἐκ ταύτης τὰ σπουδαιότατα ποιεῖται τῶν ἔργων. It was used for costly doors, with fittings of ivory, Ath. v. 205 B, 207 F, and for tables, Strabo iv. 310 A. It had a sweet smell, Plin. ut supra, "Nota etiam Homero fuit; θύον Græce vocatur, ab aliis thya. Hanc igitur inter odores uri tradit in deliciis Circes . . . magno errore eorum qui odoramenta in eo vocabulo accipiunt, cum præsertim eodem versu cedrum laricemque una tradat: in quo manifestum est de arboribus tantum locutum." But Pliny is clearly wrong: for Homer's words are πῦρ μὲν ἐπ' ἐσχαρόφιν μέγα καίετο, τηλόθι δ' ὄδηι Κέδρου τ' εὐκαέτοιο θύον τ' ἀνὰ νῆσον ὀδώδει Δαιομένων, Od. ε. 60. See Wetst. for more illustrations, and Winer, Realw. art. Thüenholz, and every article of ivory, and every article of most costly wood, and of brass, and of iron, and of marble; and cinnamon (it is not certain, whether the κιννάμωμον or κίνναμον, ἰνκάρ, of the ancients was the same as our cinnamon. Various accounts are given of its origin (see Winer, Realw. art. Zimmt, and Theophr. plant. ix. 4; Strabo xvi. p. 778; Diod. Sic. ii. 49, iii. 46), but Herodotus, who (iii. 111) ascribes it to the country where LXX, where the denunciation regards Jerusalem, and is to be performed by the King of Babylon) shall never be heard in thee any more, and the light of a lamp shall never shine in (or ουρου) thee any more (still from Jer. l. c.), and the voice of the bridegroom and the bride shall never be heard in thee any more: because thy merchants were the great men of the earth, because in thy sorcery (on the form φαρμακία (= -κεία) see reff.) all the nations were deceived (see Isa. xlvii. 9—12). And in her (the angel drops the address to the fallen city, and speaks out this last great cause of her overthrow as a fact respecting her) the blood of prophets and of saints was found and of all who have been slain on the earth (i. e. naturally, of all slain for Christ's sake and His word. Compare the declaration of our Lord respecting Jerusalem, Matt. xxiii. 35).

CH. XIX. 1—8.] The Church's song of praise at the destruction of Babylon. As each of the great events and judgments in this book is celebrated by its song of praise in heaven, so this also: but more solemnly and formally than the others, seeing that this is the great accomplishment of God's judgment on the enemy of His Church. Cf. ch. iv. 8 ff., introducing the whole heavenly scenery: v. 9 ff., celebrating the worthiness of the Lamb to open the book: vii. 10 ff.: xi. 15 ff., on the close fulfilment of God's judgments at the sounding of the seventh trumpet: xv. 3, on the introduction of the series of the vials: xvi. 5, on the retributive justice shewn in the pouring out of the third vial.

After these things I heard as it were a great voice of much multitude in heaven, of people saying (λεγόντων is most naturally a second dependent genitive following on ὄχλου) Hallelujah (the word so often found in the Psalter, ἡλληλη, 'Praise ye Jah,' i. e. Jehovah. Perhaps it is hardly justifiable to lay, as Elliott has done, a stress on this Hebrew formula of praise being now first used, and to infer thence that the Jews are indicated as bearing a prominent part in the following song. The formula must have passed, with the Psalter, into the Christian Church, being continually found in the LXX: and its use first here may be quite accounted for by the greatness and finality of this triumph, the salvation and the glory and the might belong to our God: because true and just are His judgments: because He judged (the aor. as before are proleptic. In this case they can be rendered by the simple past in English) the great harlot, which corrupted (imperf.: whose habit it was to corrupt) the earth in (ἐν of the element of the corruption) her fornication; and He exacted in vengeance the blood of His servants from her hand (so almost verbatim in 4 Kings ix. 7, καὶ ἐκδικήσεις τὰ αἵματα τῶν δούλων μου τῶν προφητῶν, καὶ τὰ αἵματα πάντων τῶν δούλων κυρίου ἐκ χειρὸς Ἰεζάβελ. The vengeance is considered as a penalty exacted, forced, out of the reluctant hand: see also Gen. ix. 5; Ezek. xxxiii. 6, where the verb is ἐκζητεῖν). And a second time they said Hallelujah; and her smoke (of her burning, ch. xviii. 9 al.: not, as Ewald, because τῆς πυρώσεως αὐτῆς is not added, of hell in general) goeth up to the ages of the ages (this addition gives a reason for the praise, parallel with those introduced by ὅτι before). And the twenty-four elders and the four living-beings fell down and worshipped God who sitteth upon the throne, saying Amen: Hallelujah (thereby confirming the general song of praise of the great multitude). And a voice came forth from the throne (ἀπό perhaps (De W.) gives more the direction than the actual source of the voice (ἐκ, as rec.). It is useless to conjecture whose voice it is: but we may say that (τῷ θεῷ ἡμῶν) it is not that of the Lamb, as Ew. and Hengstb. Our Lord never spoke thus :

 cf. John xx. 17, note) saying, Give praise to our God, all His servants (cf. Ps. cxxiv. 1), [and] ye that fear Him, the small and the great (cf. Ps. cxv. 13).
 And I heard as it were the voice of much multitude (cf. ver. 1), and as it were the voice of many waters, and as it were the voice of strong thunders, saying (nom. see ref.), Hallelujah, because the Lord God Almighty reigneth (here is a case where we cannot approach the true sense of the aor. ἔβασίλευσεν but by an English present: "reigned" would make the word apply to a past event limited in duration :
 "hath reigned" would even more strongly imply that the reign was over. It is well to note such cases, to shew the inadequacy of our past tenses to reproduce the Greek ones). Let us rejoice and exult, and we will give the glory to Him : because the marriage of the Lamb is come (these words introduce to us transitionally a new series of visions respecting the final consummation of the union between Christ and His Church, which brings about the end, ch. xxi. 1 ff. : the solemn opening of which now immediately follows in vv.
 11 ff. This series, properly speaking, includes in itself the overthrow of the kings of the earth, the binding of Satan, the thousand years' reign, the loosing of Satan, the final overthrow of the enemy, and the general judgment : but is not consummated except in the entire union of Christ and His with which the book concludes.

 So that the aor. ἦλθεν, ἠτοίμασεν, are in a measure proleptic. This figure, of a marriage between the Lord and His people, is too frequent and familiar to need explanation. Cf. in the O. T. Isa. liv.
 1-8 ; Ezek. xvi. 7 ff. ; Hos. ii. 19 f. : and in the N. T., Matt. ix. 15 || and note, xxv. 1 ff. ; John iii. 29 ; Eph. v. 25 ff.
 Indeed it penetrates almost every where the thoughts and language used respecting Christ and the Church), and his wife hath made herself ready (is complete in her adornment, as in next verse).
 And it was given to her (have we in these words still the voice of the celestial chorus, or are they merely narrative, written in the person of the Seer himself ? It seems to me that the latter alternative is rendered necessary by the fact of the explanation, τὸ γὰρ κ.τ.λ., being subjoined.
 Düsterd. makes the song end at λαμπρόν : but this seems harsh and disjointed.
 Moreover the ἔδωθη is the regular formula narrandi of the book) that (a construction of St. John's, see ref.) she should be clothed in fine linen raiment, bright

(and) pure ("Vides hic cultum gravem ut matronæ, non pompaticum qualis meretricis ante descriptus." Grot.), for the fine linen raiment is (imports, see Matt. xxvi. 26 reff.), the righteousness of the saints (i. e. their pure and holy state, attained, as in the parallel description ch. vii. 14, is declared by the elder, by their having washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. The plur. ματα is probably distributive, implying not many δικαιώματα to each one, as if they were merely good deeds, but one δικαίωμα to each of the saints, enveloping him as in a pure white robe of righteousness. Observe that here and every where, the white robe is not Christ's righteousness imputed or put on, but the saints' righteousness, by virtue of being washed in His blood. It is their own; inherent, not imputed; but their own by their part in and union to Him).

9, 10.] The Bride in this blessed marriage being in fact the sum of the guests at its celebration, the discourse passes to their blessedness, and an assurance of the certainty of that which has been foretold respecting them. The Apostle, moved by these declarations, falls down to worship the angel, but is forbidden. And he saith (who? the only answer ready to our hand is, the angel of ch. xvii. 1. Some, as Ewald and Ebrard, suppose some one angel to have been constantly with St. John throughout the visions: but there seems no reason for this) to me, Write (cf. ch. xiv. 13) Blessed are they who are bidden (see reff.: and bear in mind, throughout, our Lord's parables on this matter: Matt. xxii. 1 ff., xxv. 1 ff. Our ch. iii. 20 furnishes us with a link binding on the spiritual import to the figure) to the supper of the marriage of the Lamb. And he saith to me (the solemn repetition of this formula shews that what follows it is a new and important declaration), These sayings (cf. ch. xvii. 17. If we understand that the speaker is the angel of ch. xvii. 1, then οἱ λόγοι will most naturally include the prophecies and revelations since then) are the true (we should hardly be justified, in a book where ἀληθινοῦς has repeatedly occurred in a sense hardly distinguishable from ἀληθής, in pressing it here to its more proper meaning of "genuine" (as Düsterd.), which would very well suit the sense in this place) (sayings) of God (are the very truth of God, and shall veritably come to pass).

And I fell down before his feet to worship him (out of an overweening reverence for one who had imparted to him such great things: see also ch. xxii. 8, where the same again takes place at the end of the whole revelation, and after a similar assurance. The angel who had thus guaranteed to him, in the name of God, the certainty of these great revelations, seems to him worthy of some of that reverence which belongs to God Himself. The reason given by Düsterd., that in both cases John imagined the Lord Himself to be speaking to him, is sufficiently contradicted by the plain assertion, here in ch. xvii. 1, and there in ch. xxii. 8 itself, that it was not a divine Person, but simply an angel): and he saith to me, Take heed not (to do it): I am a fellow-servant of thine, and (a fellow-servant) of thy brethren who have the testimony of Jesus (as in reff.: on the former of which see note): worship

God (both words are emphatic: let προσκύνησις be reserved for Him), for (these words following are those of the angel, not of the Apostle, as Düsterd.: ver. 8, and ch. v. 8, where the Apostle gives explanations, are no rule for this place, where the explanation of necessity comes from the speaker, whose reason for prohibiting the offered homage it renders) the testimony of Jesus (the gen. Ἰησοῦ is, as before, objective: the testimony borne to Jesus by these σύνδοκοι, men and angels) is the spirit of prophecy (there is no real difficulty in this saying: no reason for destroying its force by making Ἰησοῦ subjective, and ἡ μαρτ. Ἰησ. to mean “the witness which proceeds from Jesus” (Düst.). What the angel says is this:
Thou and I and our brethren are all ἔχοντες τὴν μαρτυρίαν Ἰησοῦ (= μάρ-τυρες Ἰησοῦ, as uniformly in this book); and the way in which we bear this witness, the substance and essence of this testimony, is, the spirit of prophecy; ἐν πνεύμα ἐποτίσθημεν. This Spirit, given to me in that I shew thee these things, given to thee in that thou seest and art to write them, is the token that we are fellow-servants and brethren.
Thus Vitringa: “Idem ille Spiritus qui loquitur agitque per eos qui prædicant testimonium Christo, quod agebant Apos-toli, idem ipse est, qui per me loquitur, qui missus sum a Domino ut res venturi temporis tibi declararem. Tanta itaque tua quanta mea est dignitas, sumusque adeo conservi ad officia non disparia honoris et gradus a Domino appellati.” It does not follow that every one of those ἔχόντων τὴν μαρτυρίαν Ἰησοῦ has, in the same distinguished degree, the Spirit of prophecy: but every such one has the same Spirit, and that one Spirit, and no other, is the Spirit of prophecy.)

11—XXII. 5.] THE END: beginning with the triumphal coming forth of the Lord and His saints to victory (vv.
11—16), then proceeding with the great defeat and destruction of the beast and false prophet and kings of the earth (vv.
17—21), the binding of Satan and the millennial reign (ch. xx. 1—6), the un-binding of Satan and his destruction and that of the deceived nations (xx. 7—10), the great general judgment (xx. 11—15), and terminating with the vision of the new heavens and earth, and the glories of the new Jerusalem (xxi. 1—xxii. 5).

11—16.] The triumphal coming forth of the Lord and His hosts to victory.
And I saw heaven opened, and beheld a wonderful that this striking identity, in a book where symbolism is so constant to itself, has not prevented the mistakes which have been made in interpreting that place. This horse and Rider are (symbolically) the same as there: the νικῶν καὶ ἵνα νικήσῃ is on the point of its completion: the other horses and their riders, dark forms in His great world-long procession to victory, will now for ever vanish, and war and famine and pestilence be known no more), and He that sitteth upon him [called] faithful and true (see ref.), and in righteousness He judgeth and warreth (both those acts being his concern in his present triumphant progress. Notice that the very construction with the participles καθήμενος and καλούμενος is the same as that in ch.

vi. 2). His eyes (the δέ, as often, is best given in English by an asyndeton, marking a break in the sense, passing from the subjective to the objective description)

Him), and upon His head (accus.: see ch. iv. 2, note) many diadems (probably as He is βασιλεὺς βασιλέων: so Ewald, De W., Hengstb. Certainly these are not the crowns of the ten kings, as Züllig, al., for they are yet to be overthrown, ver. 19 ff. The στέφανος of ch. vi. 2 has become multiplied in the course of the subjection of the world to Him): having [names written (if these words are genuine, probably the meaning is that the names were inscribed on the diadems, signifying the import of each), and] a name written (where, is not said. From this portion of the description regarding His head, probably on the Brow) which none knoweth except Himself (what name is indicated? Certainly not that given below, ver. 13; nor can these words mean that He Himself alone knows the mystery latent in that name (so Vitranga, al.). Nor again can we say that it is any of the names by which our blessed Lord is known to us already (so Ewald, al.). But it is the τὸ ὄνομά μου τὸ καινόν of ch. iii. 12: some new and glorious name, indicative, as appears from the context there, of the completed union between Him and His people, and of His final triumph. This name the Apostle saw written, but knew not its import: that, like the contents of the sealed book, being reserved for the day when He shall reveal it) and clothed in a vesture dipped in blood (see Isa. lxiii. 2, 3: which is clearly in contemplation here, from our ver. 15 b. This being so, it is better perhaps to avoid the idea of His own blood being in view) and His name is called, The Word of God (this title forms so plain a link between the Apocalypse and St. John's writings, where only it occurs, that various attempts have been made by those who reject his authorship, to deprive it of that significance. I have discussed these in the Prolegomena, § i. parr. 110, 111). And the armies which are in heaven (not the holy angels only, as De W. and Hengstb., but the glorified saints: the οἱ μετ' αὐτοῦ of ch. xvii. 14, who are spoken of in reference to this very triumph, and are said to be κλητοὶ καὶ ἐκλεκτοὶ καὶ πιστοὶ) followed Him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen [raiment] white, pure (this clothing also speaks for the saints being included in the triumphal procession: see ver. 8, and ch. vi. 11). And out of His mouth goeth forth a sharp sword (see ch. i. 16, ii. 12, 16), that with (ἐν, as invested in or with) it he may smite the nations; and He (there is an emphasis in this and the following clause on αὐτός, which however would be too strongly rendered by "himself") shall rule (see ch. ii. 27, xii. 5, and note) them (masc.; their component members being in the Writer's mind) with a rod of iron: and He (and none other, as we know from Isa. lxiii. 3) treadeth (it is His office to tread) the winepress of the wine of the fierceness of the wrath (of the outbreking of the anger: see on ch. xvi. 19) of Almighty God. And He hath upon His vesture and upon His thigh a name written (i. e. most naturally, written at length, partly on the vesture, partly on the thigh itself; at the part where, in an equestrian figure, the robe drops from the thigh. The usual way of taking the words is to suppose the και expegetic or definitive of the former words, "on His vesture," and that on the part of it covering His thigh. So De W., Düsterd., al. Others imagine (so Grot., al.) a sword, on the hilt of which the name is inscribed. But there is no trace of this in the text. Wetst. quotes Cicero, Verr. iv. 43, "Signum Apollinis pulcherrimum, ejus in femore literulis minutis argenteis nomen Myronis erat inscriptum:" and Pausanias, on them, and the flesh of all, free as well as bond, both small and great (this proclamation is evidently not to be pressed into a place in the prophecy, nor are its details to be sought in the interpretation, as has been done by Andreas and Primasius, who hold the birds to be angels, and Brightm., who holds them to be nations and churches. The insertion is made, as above, to shew the greatness and universality of the coming slaughter). And I saw the beast (ch. xiii. 1) and the kings of the earth and their armies gathered together (as above under the sixth vial, ch. xvi. 12 ff., on the field of Harmagedon) to make their war (viz. that predicted above, ch. xvi. 14, xvii. 14) with Him that sitteth upon the horse and with his army (στρατεύματος, sing. probably as being one, and having one Head, whereas they are many, and under various leaders). And the beast was taken (reff.), and

V. : the aor. part. is contemporary, as usual, with the aor. verb. : and is probably here used because the receiving the mark is one act, the worship (προσκυνούντας) a continued habit) the mark of the beast and those who worshipped his image (cf. ch. xiii. 14, 16) : the two were cast alive into the lake of fire which burneth (the extraordinary concord, τοῦ πυρὸς τῆς καιομένης, appears to have been in the original text, and must be simply accepted as it stands) with brimstone (viz. into

Gehenna, or hell properly so called, Matt. v. 22; where also, after the millennium, Satan himself is cast, ch. xx. 10, and when their work is finally accomplished, Death and Hades, ib. 14 a. This lake of fire constitutes the second death, ib. 14 b, xxi. 8. These only, and not the Lord's human enemies yet, are cast into eternal punishment. The latter await the final Judgment, ch. xx. 11 ff.). And the rest (the βασιλεῖς and their στρατεύματα) were slain with the sword of Him that sitteth on the horse, which (sword) goeth forth out of His mouth (see Isa. xi. 4; 2 Thess. ii. 8. De Wette remarks, that it is a hint of the spiritual nature of this victory, that no battle seems actually to take place, but the Lord Himself, as in 2 Thess., destroys the adversaries with the sword out of his own mouth. But clearly, all must not be thus spiritualized. For if so, what is this gathering? what is indicated by the coming forth of the Lord in glory and majesty? Why is His personal presence wanted for the victory? and all the birds were satiated with (out of, as the material of the satiety) their flesh.

CH. XX. 1—10.] THE VICTORY OVER SATAN. The next enemy now remaining is the Arch-fiend himself, who had given his might and his throne and great power (ch. xiii. 2) to the beast: whose instruments the other enemies were. The blow given to him by their overthrow is followed by his binding and incarceration for 1000 years (vv. 1—3): during which period the Saints live and reign with Christ, and judge the world, and the first resurrection takes place (vv. 4—6). But his malice and his power are not yet at an end. One final effort is permitted him at the end of that time (ver. 7), and he once more succeeds in deceiving the nations (ver. 8), who come up against the camp of the saints, and are destroyed by fire from heaven (ver. 9). He is then cast into the lake of fire with the beast and false prophet, there to be tormented for ever (ver. 10).

1—3.] The binding of the dragon. And I saw an angel coming down out of heaven (not Christ himself, as Aug., Andr., Calov., Vitruv., Hengstb., al.: nor the Holy Spirit, as Joachim, Cocceius (al.?): but a veritable angel, as always before in this book) having the key of the abyss (of hell, the abode of the devil and his angels: see ch. ix. 1. For this abyss apparently is distinct from the lake of fire, a further and more dreadful place of punishment: see on ver. 10. This key had been for the purposes of God's judgments given to Satan (= Abaddon, Apollyon), and by him the locusts were let forth, ch. ix. 1—11. Now it is entrusted to other hands, and for another purpose), and a great chain in (so in English: Gr., resting on, hanging upon, as a chain naturally would be: see reff.) his hand. And he laid hold of the dragon (already well known from ch. xii. 3 ff., 9; xiii. 2, 4; xvi. 13), the ancient serpent (for the expression and the construction, see reff.), who is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the abyss, and shut and sealed over him (shut the door or cover at the top, and sealed it down. Notice, that the same absolute use of σφραγίζω in the active is found in ref. John, and apparently there only : see Palm and Rost, sub voce), that he might deceive the nations no more (there does not appear to be the least ground for Düsterd.'s idea, that the reading πλανᾶ was adopted in order to suit the views of the later Fathers who regarded the millennium as present), until the thousand years shall be (shall have been : futurus exactus) accomplished : after that he must (the δεῖ of prophecy ; must, according to the necessity of God's purposes) be loosed for a little time (see below, ver. 7).

4-6.] The Millennial reign. And I saw thrones (combine the two passages in the reff.), and they sat upon them (who ? the Apostles, as in ref. Matt. : the Saints, as in 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3,—οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι οἱ ἄγιοι τὸν κόσμον κρινούσιν ; . . . οὐκ οἴδατε ὅτι ἀγγέλους κρινόμεν ; Notice well, that there is nothing to hinder this in the souls of the saints not being seen till the next clause : for there is no mark of temporal sequence connecting the two verses : nay, such an idea is precluded by the specification at the end of ver. 4, that those very souls of the saints are they who reigned with Christ, and were His assessors in reigning and judging, during this time), and judgment (κρίμα, the act and decision of judgment) was given to them (so in ref. Daniel (Theod.), ἕως οὗ ἦλθεν ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμερῶν, καὶ τὸ κρίμα ἔδωκεν ἁγίοις ὑψίστου. That is, they were constituted judges). And I saw the souls of them who had been beheaded (the word πελεκίζω, to smite with the axe, is found in Polybius (i. 7. 12, xi. 30. 2), Strabo, Plutarch, and Diodorus Siculus, in the sense of beheading) on account of the testimony of Jesus and on account of the word of God (ref.), and (of those) the which did not worship (during life) the beast nor yet his image, and did not receive the mark (mentioned ch. xiii. 16) on their forehead and upon their hand: and they lived (i. e. "lived again;" ἔζησαν = ἀνέζησαν, as in reff.: and, as the act is presently described as the first resurrection, with their bodies, perfect and complete) and reigned with Christ (took part in His Kingdom; see ch. i. 6; 2 Tim. ii. 12: also 1 Cor. iv. 8 and note) a thousand years (it would certainly appear that this reigning includes the office of judgment. Many interpreters suppose that these saints are the judged: so recently Düsterd.: but there is nothing in the context, nor in other parts of Scripture, to favour this idea. Nay, it is expressly negatived by our Lord's saying in John v. 24, ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν ὅτι ὁ τῶν λόγων μου ἀκούων καὶ πιστεύων τῷ πέμψαντί με ἔχει ζωὴν αἰώνιον, καὶ εἰς κρίσιν οὐκ ἔρχεται, ἀλλὰ μεταβέβηκεν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωὴν). The rest of the dead lived not (again, as above) until the thousand years be completed. This (αὕτη is not the subject, as De Wette, but the predicate, as in all such cases: the reduction of the proposition to the logical form requiring its inversion) is the first resurrection (remarks on the interpretation of this passage will be found in the Prolegomena, § v. par. 33. It will have been long ago anticipated by the readers of this Commentary, that I cannot consent to distort words from their plain sense and chronological place in the prophecy, on account of any considerations of difficulty, or any risk of abuses which the doctrine of the millennium may bring with it. Those who lived next to the Apostles, and the whole Church for 300 years, understood them in the plain literal sense: and it is a strange sight in these days to see expositors who are among the first in reverence of antiquity, complacently casting aside the most cogent instance of consensus which primitive antiquity presents. As regards the text itself, no legitimate treatment of it will extort what is known as the spiritual interpretation now in fashion. If, in a passage where two resurrections are mentioned, where certain ψυχὰς ἔζησαν at the first, and the rest of the νεκροὶ ἔζησαν only at the end of a specified period after that first,—if in such a passage the first resurrection may be understood to mean spiritual rising with Christ, while the second means literal rising from the grave;—then there is an end of all significance in language, and Scripture is wiped out as a definite testimony to any thing. If the first resurrection is spiritual, then so is the second, which I suppose none will be hardy enough to maintain: but if the second is literal, then so is the first, which in common with the whole primitive Church and many of the best modern expositors, I do maintain, and receive as an article of faith and hope). Blessed (see ch. xiv. 13, xix. 9) and holy is he that hath part in (ref., the expression is peculiar to St. John) the first resurrection: over such persons the second death (see reff.: and bear in mind what is said of our Lord Himself, Rom. vi. 9) hath not power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and they [shall] reign with Him (Christ) a (or, the) thousand years.

And when the thousand years are completed, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison (see ver. 3. The prophetic future is here used: but in ver. 9 the historic form with aorists is resumed) and shall go forth to deceive the nations which are in the four corners of the earth (there will be nations on earth besides the saints reigning with Christ, who during the binding of Satan have been quiet and willing subjects of the Kingdom, but who on his being let loose are again subjected to his temptations, which stir them into rebellion against God), Gog and Magog (compare Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. throughout. This which is here prophesied is the great final fulfilment of those chapters. And the names Gog and Magog, taken from there, had been used in the rabbinical books to signify the nations which should in the latter days come up to Jerusalem against the Messiah. So the Jerus. Targum on Num. xi. 27, in Wetst., "In fine extremi-tatis dierum Gog et Magog et exercitus eorum ascendent Hierosolyma et per manus regis Messiae ipsi cadent et vii. annos dierum ardebunt filii Israel ex armis eorum:" and Avoda sara, 1: "quando videbunt bellum Gog et Magog, dicet ad eos Messias: ad quid huc venistis? Respondebunt, Adversus Dominum et adversus Christum ejus." This name Magog occurs Gen. x. 2, as that of a son of Japhet, in company with brethren whose names mostly belong to northern and north-eastern nations: Gomer (Kimmerians), Madai (Medians), Mesbech (Muscovites), &c. With these however are joined in Ezek. xxxviii. 5, Persians, Ethiopians, Libyans. Josephus renders the word Σκύθαι (Antt. i. 6. 3), Μαγώγης δὲ τοὺς ἀπ' αὐτοῦ Μαγώγας ὀνομασθέντας ἕκισε, Σκύθας δὲ ἅπ' αὐτῶν (τ. Ἑλλήνων) προσαγορευομένους, and so Jerome: Suidas, "Persians (Μαγώγ, ὁ Πέρσης)." It seems to be a general name for the northern nations, and Gog, if at least we may follow the analogy of Ezekiel, xxxviii. 2, is their prince, to gather them together to the (well-known) war: of whom the number (of them) is as the sand of the sea. And they went up (the historical aor. is here resumed) upon the breadth of the earth (i. e. entirely overspread it; see ref.) and encompassed the camp of the saints, and the beloved city (by these two is probably meant one and the same thing, the καί being expegetical ; or at all events the camp must be conceived as surrounding and defending the city. The πόλις ἡ ἡγαπημένη is Jerusalem (reff.) : not the new Jerusalem, but the earthly city of that name, which is destined yet to play so glorious a part in the latter days). And there came down fire out of heaven (so in reff. Ezek.), and devoured them : and the devil that deceiveth them (the pres. part. merely designates : the devil their deceiver) was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where also are the beast and the false prophet (ch. xix. 20). And they shall be tormented by day and by night to the ages of the ages.

11—15.] The general judgment. And I saw a great white throne (great, in distinction from the thrones before mentioned, ver. 4 : white, as seen in purest light, and symbolizing the most blameless justice), and Him that sitteth on it (viz. God : the Father : see ch. iv. 3, xxi. 5. It is necessary to keep to the well-known formula of the book in interpreting τὸν καθήμενον ἐπ' αὐτοῦ, even though some expressions and sayings seem better to belong to the Son. Be it also remembered that it is the Father who giveth all judgment to the Son : and though He Himself judgeth no man, yet He is ever described as present in the judgment, and mankind as judged before Him. We need not find in this view any difficulty, or discrepancy with such passages as Matt. xxv. 31, seeing that our Lord Himself says in ch. iii. 21, ἐγὼ . . . ἐκάθισα μετὰ τοῦ πατρὸς μου ἐν τῷ θρόνῳ αὐτοῦ. Nor need we be surprised at the sayings of our Lord, such as that in ch. xxi. 6 b, being uttered by Him that sitteth on the throne. That throne is now the throne of God and of the Lamb, ch. xxii. 1. Cf. also ch. xxi. 22), from whose face the earth and the heaven fled, and place was not found for them (these words again seem to indicate the presence of One who has not hitherto appeared : whereas Christ in glory has been long present on earth. This fleeing away of heaven and earth is elsewhere described as their consumption by fire, 2 Pet. iii. 10—12. Both descriptions indicate the passing away of their present corruptible state and change to a state glorious and incorruptible). And I saw the dead (viz. the λοιποὶ τῶν νεκρῶν of ver. 5 : those who rose as described below, ver. 13), the great and the small, standing before the throne, and books were opened (see ref. Dan.), and another book was opened, which is (the book) of life (Düsterd. remarks that the order of proceedings indicated seems to be that the contents of the books in which were written the works of men indicated whether they were to be found in the book of life. But this could hardly be: for in that case, what need for the book of life at all? Rather should we say that those books and the book of life bore independent witness to the fact of men being or not being among the saved: the one by inference from the works recorded: the other by inscription or non-inscription of the name in the list. So the 'books' would be as it were the vouchers for the book of life): and the dead were judged out of the things written in the books according to their works (reff.: and 2 Cor. v. 10). And the sea gave forth the dead that were in her (the citation in Wetst. from Achilles Tatius, v. p. 313 B, λέγουσι δὲ τὰς ἐν ὕδασι ψυχὰς ἀνηρημένας μηδὲ εἰς ᾄδου καταβαίνειν ὄλωσ, ἀλλ' αὐτοῦ περὶ τὸ ὕδωρ ἔχειν τὴν πλάνην, is no illustration of this passage, which simply imports that the dead contained in the sea shall rise), and Death and Hades (see ch. i. 18, vi. 8) gave forth the dead which were in them (i. e. all the dead, buried and unburied, rose again), and they were judged each according to their (his) works. And Death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire (Death and Hades are regarded as two dæmons, enemies of God. So in 1 Cor. xv. 26, ἔσχατος ἐχθρὸς καταργεῖται ὁ θάνατος: and in Isa. xxv. 8, Heb. and E. V., not LXX, "He will swallow up death in victory," cf. 1 Cor. xv. 54. Hades, as in ch. vi. 8, is Death's follower and the receiver of his prey. The punishment of sin is inflicted on both, because both are the offspring of and bound up with sin). This is the second death, the lake of fire (thus then our Lord's saying, ch. ii. 11, and that of the Apostle in our ver. 6, are explained. As there is a second and higher life, so there is also a second and deeper death. And as after that life there is no more death

 the book of life, he was cast into the

CH. XXI. 1—XXII. 5.] The new heavens and new earth: the glories of the heavenly Jerusalem. The whole of the things described in the remaining portion of the book are subsequent to the general judgment, and descriptive of the consummation of the triumph and bliss of Christ's people with Him in the eternal kingdom of God. This eternal kingdom is situated on the purified and renewed earth, become the blessed habitation of God with his glorified people. And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first (i. e. old, see ref.) heaven and the first earth were departed: and the sea exists no longer (see on the whole, Isa. lxxv. 17).
 The vision does not necessarily suppose the annihilation of the old creation, but only its passing away as to its outward and recognizable form, and renewal to a fresh and more glorious one. And though not here stated on the surface, it is evident that the method of renewal is that described in 2 Pet. iii. 10 ff.; viz. a renovation by fire. This alone will account for the unexpected and interesting feature here introduced, viz. that the sea exists no longer. For this the words mean (see ver. 4), and not as Düsterd., that the (former) sea, as well as the former heaven and earth, had passed away). And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem (see especially ref. Gal., ἡ ἄνω Ἱερουσα., and note), coming down out of heaven from God (Schöttg. quotes from the remarkable Jewish book Sohar, Gen. f. 69, c. 271,

 "R. Jeremias dixit, Deus S. B. innovabit mundum suum, et ædificabit Hierosoly-mam, ut ipsam descendere faciat in medium sui de celo, ita ut nunquam de-struat." See Schöttg.'s dissertation "de Hierosolyma cœlesti," in his vol. i.
 1205 ff.), prepared as a bride adorned for her husband (as in our common discourse, so here with the Evangelist, the name of the material city stands for the community formed by its inhabitants. But it does not follow in his case, any more than in ours, that both material city and inhabitants have not a veritable existence: nor can we say that the glorious description of it, presently to follow, applies only to them. On the figure, see Isa. lxi. 10—lxii. 5). And I heard a great voice out of the throne saying, Behold, the tabernacle (i. e. dwelling: the allusion being to the tabernacle in the wilderness, in which God dwelt in symbol only) of God 9—XXII. 5.] More particular description of the heavenly Jerusalem. And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, which (namely the angels, however strange it may seem) were full of the seven last plagues (one of these angels had before shewn the Apostle the great harlot, ch. xvii. 1. The contrast to that vision is maintained throughout these opening verses), and he talked with me, saying, Hither, I will shew thee (hitherto verbatim as in ch. xvii. 1) the bride, the wife of the Lamb (here likewise note the contrast to the succeeding context in ch. xvii. 1,—in the faithfulness and purity implied in these words). And he carried me away in the spirit (ch. xvii. 3) to (ἐπί, as we say in some parts of England, on to, combining motion towards and position upon) a mountain great and high (so likewise when the vision of the heavenly city is vouchsafed to Ezekiel, Ezek. xl. 1, 2), and shewed me the holy city Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God (this vision had begun in ver. 2, but the Apostle is now carried to this

“specular mount” to have a nearer and fuller view of it. The city must not be conceived of as on or covering the mountain, but as seen descending to a spot close by it: so in Ezek. xl. 2, whether we read “by” or “upon” as in our margin), having the glory of God (i. e. not merely brightness of a divine and celestial kind, but the glorious presence of God Himself, the Shechinah, abiding in her: see ver. 23: also ch. xv. 8): her brightness (henceforward the description goes on independent in construction of ἔδειξεν, and changes several times: so in ch. i. 15 ff. See Winer, edn. 6, § 59. 11. φωστὴρ, from ver. 23, is the effect of the divine glory shining in her: see reff. Gen., where it is used of the heavenly bodies) (was) like to a stone most precious, as it were to a jasper stone, crystal clear (Wetst. quotes from Psellus, ἡ ἰασπίς φύσει κρυσταλλοειδής. See this “crystallizing” jasper discussed in note on ch. iv. 3. Ebrard thinks it is the diamond); having (on the construction, see above) a wall great and high, having (also) twelve gates (see Ezek. xlviii. 30 ff., where the same features are found in the description), and at the gates (dat. after ἐπί, of close juxtaposition, primarily of addition) twelve angels, and names inscribed (contrast to the ὀνόματα βλασφημίας, ch. xvii. 3), which are [the names] of the twelve tribes of the sons of Israel (it does not follow from this description either, 1. that the angels must necessarily be guardians, seeing that no foes remain to be guarded against: they are for the completeness and adornment of the city after the idea of a beautiful fortress, adopted to set it forth:—or, 2. that, as in the Jewish books (see De Wette here), each gate is to be imagined as used by each tribe: the twelve tribes of Israel represent the whole people of God, and the city the encampment of Israel: see below). From (on the side entering from) the sun-rising three gates (Joseph, Benjamin, Dan, in Ezek. xlvi. 32. In ch. vii. 6, Manasseh is substituted for Dan, which is omitted. See there), from the north three gates (Reuben, Judah, Levi), from the south three gates (Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun), from the sun-setting three gates (Gad, Asher, Naphtali: Ezek. ibid. In Numbers ii., the order of encampment is thus set down: East,—Judah, Issachar, Zebulun: South,—Reuben, Simeon, Gad: West,—Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin: North,—Dan, Asher, Naphtali). And the wall of the city (the wall surrounding the city) having (had: for masc. of the part., see ch. iv. 1 reff.) twelve foundation-stones (i. e. probably, each portion of the wall joining two gates had a conspicuous basement, of one vast stone. Four of these, as Düsterd. observes, would be corner-stones, joining the third gate on one side to the first gate on the next), and upon them (gen. over them, perhaps extending all their length) twelve names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb (cf. Eph. ii. 20, where however the ruling idea is a different one, see the interpretation in the note. No inference can be drawn as has been drawn by some from this that the Writer was not himself an Apostle: see prolegg. § i. 84 ff.). 15—17.] Its measurement: cf. Ezek. xl. 3—5. And he that spoke with me had as a measure a golden reed (reff.) that he might measure the city, and her gates and her wall. And the city lieth four-square (so E. V. well; is in shape tetragonal), and her length is as great as [also] her breadth (see below). And he measured the city with the reed to the length of stadii of the amount of twelve thousands (such appears to be the construction. On the ἐπί, 'over,' of extent, see Winer, edn. 6, § 49, l. 3, a. We have it in the adverbial phrase ἐφ' ὅσον, Rom. xi. 13. The 12,000 stadii are in all probability the whole circumference, 1000 to each space between the gates); the length and the breadth and the height of it are equal (the supposition of many expositors, that the city thus formed a monstrous cube, 3000 stadii in length, in breadth, and in height, really does not appear to be necessarily included in these words. Nay, it seems to be precluded by what next follows, where the angel measures the height of the wall. For Dusterdieck's idea that the houses were 3000 stadii in height, while the wall was only 144 cubits, is too absurd to come at all into question. The words are open, this last consideration being taken into account, to two interpretations: 1) that the city, including the hill or rock on which it was placed, and which may be imagined as descending with it, formed such a cube as seems here described: or 2) that there is some looseness of use in the word ἴσα, and that we must understand that the length and breadth were equal to each other and the height equal all round: nearly so De Wette, al. Of these two

I prefer the former, as doing no violence to the words, and as recalling somewhat the form of the earthly Jerusalem on its escarpment above the valley of the Kedron. Some such idea seems also to be pointed at in the rabbinical books, e.g. Bava Bathra, f. 75. 2, "Dixit Rabba, R. Jochananem dixisse, Deum S. B. tempore futuro Hierosolyma evecturum in altitudinem xii. milliarum S. D. Zach. xiv. 10. Quid est 'in loco suo?' talem esse futuram superne, qualis est infra. Rabba dixit, senex mihi narravit, se vidisse Hierosolyman priorem, quæ xii. milliarum erat. Dices, difficile fore adscensum? sed scriptum est, Isa. lx. 8." And in Schir R. vii. 5, "Jerusalem tempore futuro dilatabitur ita ut pertingat usque ad portas Damasci, Zach. ix. 1. . . . et exaltabitur ut pertingat usque ad thronum gloriæ, donec dicatur, locus mihi angustus est." See more citations in Wetsl.). And he measured the wall of it (i. e. the height of the wall of it), of an hundred and forty-four cubits, the measure of a man, which is that of an angel (meaning that in this matter of measure, men and angels use the same. The interpretation, that in this particular case, the angel used the measure current among men (De Wette, al.), is ungrammatical.

As to the height thus given, it may be observed that the height of Solomon's porch, the highest part of his temple, was 120 cubits, 2 Chron. iii. 4, and the general height of his temple, 30 cubits, 1 Kings vi. 2).

The word is not found in LXX as the name of a gem. Pliny, xxxvii. 41: "ille emicans in amethysto fulgor violaceus dilutus est in hyacintho"), the twelfth, amethyst (ἰακίνθος reff. Pliny, xxxvii. 40, reckons the amethyst among the purple stones, and says of the best, the Indian, "absolutum felicis purpuræ colorem habent. . . . perlucent autem omnem violaceo colore." So that it seems to be the stone now known by that name). And the twelve gates, twelve pearls (Isa. liv. 12, "carbuncles." Wetst. quotes from the Rabbinical Bava Bathra, f. 75. 1: "Deus S. See many more in Wetst. and Schöttgen), each one separately (reff.) of the gates was (made) out of one pearl. And the street (generic: the street-material, throughout) of the city (was) pure gold like transparent glass (see above on ver. 18). And a temple I saw not in it: for the Lord God Almighty is the temple of it, and the Lamb (i. e. the inhabitants need no place of worship or sacrifice, the object of all worship being present, and the great Sacrifice Himself being there). And the city hath not need of the sun nor yet of the moon, that they should shine on her (αὐτῇ, dat. commodi): for the glory of God (the brightness of His presence, the Shechinah: see above, ver. 11) lightened her, and her lamp was the Lamb (see Isa. lx. 19, 20. moon, but protests against applying these to the divine Persons separately): and the nations shall walk by means of her light (i. e. she shall be so bright as to serve for light,—for sun and moon both,—to the world that then is, and her inhabitants. For such inhabitants are clearly supposed; see below, and ch. xxii. 2). And the kings of the earth (no longer hostile to Christ) bring (pres. of habit and certainty, as so often in this prophecy) their (the kings', not the nations', as ver. 26) glory (cf. Isa. lx. 3: all in which they glory) into her: and her gates shall never be shut by day (i. e. in meaning, shall never be shut, seeing it will always be day: shall never be shut, for if they were, they must be shut by day): for night shall not exist there. And they (men) shall bring the glory and the costliness of the nations into her (Isa. lxvi. 12. Among the mysteries of this new heaven and new earth this is set forth to us: that, besides the glorified church, there shall still be dwelling on the renewed earth nations, organized under kings, and (ch. xxii. 2) saved by means of the influences of the heavenly city). And there shall never enter into her, every thing unclean, and working abomination and falsehood, but only (lit. except) they that are written in the book of life of the Lamb (if then the kings of the earth, and the nations, bring their glory and their treasures into her, and if none shall ever enter into her that is not written in the book of life, it follows, that these kings, and these nations, are written in the book of life. And so perhaps some light may be thrown on one of the darkest mysteries of redemption. There may be,—I say it with all diffidence,—those who have been saved by Christ without ever forming a part of his visible organized Church).

Ch. XXII. 1—5.] The end of the description: the means of healing for the nations (1, 2): the blessedness, and eternal reign of the glorified servants of God (3—5).

And he shewed me a river of water of life, bright as crystal, coming forth out of the throne of God and of the Lamb (which throne is one and the same: see ch. iii. 21, and note on ch. xx. 11. The

See Ezek. xlvi. 7), (was) the tree of life (ch. ii. 7; Ezek. ut supra ff., i. e. trees of the kind described: as in Ezek.), producing twelve fruits (kinds of fruit, Ezek. xlvi. 12), according to each month yielding its fruit (Ezek. ut supra): and the leaves of the tree (are) for healing of the nations

There shall no more be those accursed things which bar the residence of God among His people: see Josh. vii. 12, which shews that these words are in close connexion with what follows): and the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in her, and His servants shall serve Him (in

And night shall not be any more (ch. xxi. 25), and they shall have no need of the light of a lamp or (and) of the light of the sun (ch. xxi. 23), because the Lord God shall shine (shed light) upon them: and they shall reign (De Wette well remarks, in a higher sense than in ch. xx. 4, 6) to the ages of the ages.

6—21.] CONCLUDING ASSURANCES AND EXHORTATIONS: and herein, 6, 7, assurance by the angel of the truth of what has been said, in the terms of ch. i. 1. And he (the angel) said to me, These sayings (the whole book, by what follows) are faithful and true (see on reff.): and the Lord (Jehovah) the God of the spirits of the prophets (i. e. of those spirits of theirs, which, informed by the Holy Spirit, have become the vehicles of prophecy) sent His angel to shew to His servants what things must come to pass shortly (on the whole of this see on ch. i. 1, from which place it is repeated at the close of the book of which that is the opening). And behold,

I come quickly (the speech passes into the words of Christ Himself, reported by the angel: so in ver. 12, and in ch. xi. 3): Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book (the speech is a mixed one: in τοῦ βιβλίου τούτου, the Writer has in view the roll of his book now lying all but completed before him: but the words are the saying of the angel: τῆς προφητείας ταύτης would express it formally). And I John (was he) who heard and saw these things (pres. participles without temporal significance—was the hearer and seer of these things): and when I heard and saw, I fell down (as in ch. xix. 10, where see notes) to worship before the feet of the angel who shewed me (pres. part. as above) these things. And he saith to me, Take heed not: I am a fellow-servant of thine, and (a fellow-servant) of thy brethren the prophets, and of those who keep the sayings of this book: worship God (the same feeling again prevailed over the Apostle as before, and is met with a similar rebuke. I hardly can with Düsterd. see any real distinction implied, in the ἀδελφῶν σου τῶν προφητῶν here, between the situation of the Seer then and now. D. thinks, the intention now is to exalt his prophetic office and character). And he saith to me, Seal not up the sayings of the prophecy of this book (cf. ch. x. 4, where the command is otherwise: also reff. Daniel): for the time is near (in Dan. viii. 26, the reason for sealing up the vision is that the time shall be for many days). Let him that is unjust (pres. part. as above) commit injustice (aor. of acts, not of a state, which would be pres.) still: and let the filthy (reff.: morally polluted) pollute himself (in the constant middle sense of passive verbs when the act depends on a man's self) still: and let the righteous do righteousness still, and the holy sanctify himself still (see Ezek. iii. 27: and cf. Matt. xxvi. 45, "Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, the hour is at hand:" also Ezek. xx. 39. The saying has solemn irony in it: the time is so short, that there is hardly room for change—the lesson conveyed in its depth is, "Change while there is time"). Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me (reff. Isa.) to render (this infin. may be either of purpose, dependent jointly on ερχομαι and δ μισθ. κ.τ.λ., or exegetical of that which is wrapped up in the word μισθός itself. No very satisfactory account is given of this last construction in Winer, edn. 6, § 44. 1) to each as his work is (these words sound as if spoken by our Lord Himself: perhaps at the conclusion, the Apostle puts together, in prophetic shortness, many divine sayings of warning and consolation, with the replies to them). Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end (these words have hitherto been said by the Father: see above, ch. i. 8, xxi. 6, and notes. And in all probability it is so here likewise, whether we assume the words to be spoken by Christ in God's name, or by the Eternal Father Himself). Blessed are they that wash their robes (see the digest. The vulg. addition "in sanguine agni," after ch. vii. 14, is of course the right supplement), that they may (on ἴνα with fut. see reff., and ch. xiv. 13 note. It is a mixed construction: between "that they may have" and "for they shall have") have the power (licence) over the tree (to eat of the tree: ἐπι of the direction of their reaching for the fruit) of life, and may enter by the gates into the city. Outside are the dogs (impure persons, reff.), and the sorcerers, and the fornicators, and the murderers, and the idolaters, and every one loving and practising falsehood (see on these, ch. xxi. 8).

I Jesus (our Lord now speaks directly in His own person) sent my angel to testify these things to you in (the ἐπί of addition by juxtaposition, see reff.) the churches. I am the root (reff.) and the race (the offspring, as E. V. So Virg. Æn. iv. 12, "genus esse Deorum") of David, the bright morning-star (that brings in the everlasting day).

And the Spirit (in the churches, and in the prophets) and the Bride (the Church herself) say Come (see on ch. vi. 1, &c.): and let him that heareth (the cry of the Spirit and Bride) say Come: and let him that thirsteth come: let him that will, take the water of life freely (this verse is best understood as a reply of the Apostle to our Lord's previous words).

18—20.] Final solemn warning of the Apostle. I (emphatic) testify to every one (or, "of every one," by a very common N. T. construction: see reff. for both usages) who heareth the sayings of the prophecy of this book, If any one add

(aor. = futurus exactus, shall have added) to them, God shall add to him (lay upon him, as he has laid his own additions upon them: the verb being from ref. Deut., where the plagues of Egypt are threatened to the Israelites in case of their disobedience) the plagues which are written in this book: and if any one shall take away from the sayings of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his portion from the tree of life (strike out his portion from the aggregate of those of which the whole participation of that tree is made up), and [out of] the holy city, which are written in this book (see Deut. iv. 2; xii. 32). The adding and taking away are in the application and reception in the heart: and so it is not a mere formal threat to the copier of the book, as that cited from Irenæus in Eus. H. E. v. 20, ὀρκίζω σε τὸν μεταγραφάμενον τὸ βιβλίον τοῦτο . . . ἵνα ἀντιβάλης ὃ μετεγράψω, καὶ κατορθώσης . . . All must be received and realized. This is at least an awful warning both to those who despise and neglect this book, and to those who add to it by irrelevant and trifling interpretations).

20, 21.] FINAL ASSURANCE of the Lord, and REPLY of the Apostle on behalf of the Church: and BENEDICTION. He who testifieth these things (the Lord Jesus) saith, Yea, I come quickly. Amen (the reply of the Apostle, not the conclusion of our Lord's saying), Come, Lord Jesus.

The grace of the Lord Jesus be with the saints (i. e. with the church of God. This, the reading of the Codex Sinaiticus, is no where else found as a parting formula).
