PREFACE TO VOL. I.

This work was commenced in 1853. From that time to this, the editors have been engaged, with the aid of several regular collaborators, and of numerous contributors of special articles, in its preparation.

The aim of the work is to furnish a book of reference on all the topics of the science of Theology, in its widest sense, under one alphabet. It includes, therefore, not only articles on the Bible and its literature, but also upon all the subjects belonging to Historical, Doctrinal, and Practical Theology. There is no Dictionary in the English language which seeks to cover the same ground, except upon a comparatively small scale. The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge, published several years since, under the supervision of the Rev. J. Newton Brown, is, indeed, quite comprehensive in its aim; but, as it is confined to a single volume, it could not give full treatment to the vast range of topics embraced in its plan. Besides this, there is but one other attempt in English at a comprehensive Dictionary of Theology, and that, unfortunately, remains incomplete. We refer to the translation of Herzog’s Real-Encyklopädie, commenced in 1856 by the Rev. J. H. A. Bomberger, D.D., the publication of which was suspended during the war.*

In the preparation of this Cyclopedia, Dr. Strong has had exclusive charge of the department of Biblical literature, and for the articles in that field he is responsible. Twenty years ago, before the publication of Kitto’s Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature, the student of the Bible had no better Dictionary to consult than the various recessions of Calmet. The great work of Dr. Kitto brought together the results of the critical labors of the preceding century, in which Biblical literature had become substantially a new science. Notwithstanding many and grave defects, Kitto’s Cyclopedia gave a new impulse to Biblical studies, and supplied a want almost universally felt. The lapse of twenty years, in which vast advances have been made in the literature of the Bible, has made a new edition necessary, and it has been well prepared under the editorship of Dr. Alexander. In the mean time, Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible (3 vols. imp. 8vo) has been issued, on a plan somewhat similar to Kitto’s Cyclopedia. It is the aim of the present work, as a Dictionary of the Bible, to combine the excellences of both the great works named, and to avoid their faults. Free use is made of their matter, so far as it has been found suitable to our plan;† but every article has been thoroughly revised, and more than half the articles on Biblical topics are entirely original, while most of the others are so in part. We acknowledge similar, though not quite so extensive obligations to Winer’s Biblisches Real-Wörterbuch, a book whose discrimination and compactness are unrivalled in this branch of literature. It will be perceived that the Biblical department of this Cyclopedia embraces many subjects and names not contained in any of these three works.

For the treatment of all the topics in Systematic, Historical, and Practical Theology, Dr. M’Clintock is responsible. In this field there has heretofore been no copious Dictionary answering to the Bible Dictionaries of Kitto and Smith. The Real-Encyklopädie of Herzog, and Wetzer und Welte’s Kirchen-Lexikon, have been the fullest sources of material in this form. Besides these, all other Encyclopaedias and

* It has now been superseded by Dr. Schaff’s Encyclopaedia of Religious Knowledge, noticed in our Supplement.
† Due credit is given in, or at the end of each article, for the use made of the works cited. In some instances the above general credit to Kitto and Smith is all that could justly or conveniently be given. We have incorporated all the information that is valuable in their works, with many qualifications and additions.
Dictionaries of importance, both general and special, have been used in the preparation of this work. Every article has either been written de novo, or thoroughly revised, with reference to the more recent literature on each topic. Great pains have been taken with the verification of references, but we cannot hope to have entirely avoided error in this, or in other points of minute detail in so vast a labor.

The whole work is of course prepared from the editors' point of view as to theology, but, at the same time, it is hoped, in no narrow or sectarian spirit.

The articles on the several Christian denominations have either been prepared by ministers belonging to them, or have been submitted to such ministers for examination and correction. Many of the papers on the various branches of Christian art and archaeology are written or revised by Professor George F. Comfort. Most of the articles on Bible Societies have been prepared by the Rev. Joseph Holdich, D.D.

Many of the short biographical sketches of ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church are due to the Rev. George Lansing Taylor; of the German Reformed Church, to the Rev. H. Harbaugh, D.D.; of the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, to Mr. A. Merwin; of the Prot. Epis Church, to Mr. W. Major. In this department Dr. Sprague's Annals of the American Pulpit have been of great service. Our thanks are due to the Rev. O. H. Tiffany, D.D., and to Mr. J. K. Johnston, for contributions, especially in Church history and early ecclesiastical biography. Professor Alexander J. Schem and Mr. J. N. Proescher (of Paris) have been regular collaborators throughout the work. The articles relating to Roman Catholic topics have all been prepared or revised by Professor Schem, who has also had entire charge of Church and national statistics, and of reading the proofs in all departments of the work except the Biblical. Many of the articles drawn chiefly from German or French sources are due to Mr. Proescher's careful and intelligent industry, both as compiler and translator. In succeeding volumes, articles will be found from other contributors, whose services were enlisted at a later period in the progress of the work than that covered in this volume.

The literature of the subjects treated has been a special object of care. Our aim has been to give the names of the most important works, both old and new; but we have especially sought, in view of the wants of the majority of those who will probably use this Cyclopaedia, to refer, on all essential points, to accessible books, which ordinary students, seeking to enlarge their knowledge, would be likely to fall in with or could readily obtain. It would have been easy to enlarge the lists of books by emptying the works on Bibliography into them, but we have preferred the more laborious, and, we trust, the more satisfactory plan of discrimination and selection.

One of the greatest difficulties of such a task as this is the adjustment of the relative length of the articles. We have endeavored to keep in mind the relative importance and interest of the various topics as the only safe guide in this respect. Long articles are given on certain of the more important subjects; but we have never sacrificed to this end our chief purpose, viz., to give as complete a vocabulary as possible of all the branches of theological science. This is what, according to our view, is most wanted in a Dictionary. No essay, however elaborate, in a Cyclopaedia, can satisfy the wants of the student who seeks to master any special topic; he will and must go beyond the Dictionary to its sources. But students, and even theologians, are in constant need of accurate information upon minor points; and upon all these we have sought to give statements that may be relied upon.

If the work shall be found, in actual use, to have gathered into a convenient and clear summary the mass of knowledge accumulated in its several departments, and shall likewise serve to advance, in some degree, the cause of religious truth, it will have met the expectations of the authors, who have expended upon it many years of earnest toil and solicitude.

A'lar (אלאך), a person who (or a place from which some of the Jews) returned after the captivity (1 Esdr. vi, 36); more correctly called in the parallel list (Neh. vii. 61) Immer (q. v.).

Aʻéra (אֶרֶאָ), a factitious term used by the Rabbinists (Lev. Talm. Aruch, s. v.) as an example of a word beginning with two נs, like Aazrak (q. v.). In the Talmud, according to Buxtorf (Lex. Talm. col. 2), it is written Aera (אֶרֶא), perhaps only a sing. Chaldaic form of the plural. Urim (q. v.), light.

Aʻaron [vulg. pronounced Av′ron] (Heb. Aʻaron, עַרֹּן; נָעַר, derivation uncertain: Genesius, Theol. Heb. p. 33, thinks from the obsolete root נער, to be libidinous [so in the Heb. Lex. Aruch, from נער, referring (erroneously) to his conception during the Pharisaic edict; but in his Heb. s. v. compares with נער, mountaineer; Fürst, Heb. Handwörterbuch, s. v., makes it signify enlightener, from an obsolete root נער = נער, to shine. Sept. נ, N., and Josephus, "Aprion").

1. History.—Aarón was the eldest son of the Levite Aaron, who was a Levite of the tribe of Judah, named depoisheila (or Elizahielh), who had born to him four sons, Naadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar; and Eleazar had, before the return of Moses, become the father of Phebebas (Exod. vi. 29-23). Pursuant to an intimation from God, Aaron went into the wilderness to meet his long-exiled brother, and conduct him back to Egypt. They met and embraced each other at the Mount of Horæ (Exod. iv. 27), B.C. 1658. When they arrived in Goshen, Aaron, who appears to have been well known to the chief of Israel, introduced his brother to them, and aided him in opening and enforcing his great commission (Exod. iv. 29-31). In the subsequent transactions, Aaron appears to have been almost always present with his more illustrious brother, assisting and supporting him; and no separate act of his own is recorded, although he seems to have been the actual instrument of opening many of the miracles (Exod. vii. 19 sq.). Aaron and Hur were present on the hill from which Moses surveyed the battle which Joshua fought with the Amalekites (Exod. xvii. 10-12); and these two long sustained the weary hands upon whose uplifting (in order to extend the official rod, rather than in prayer; see ver. 9) the fate of the battle was found to depend. Afterward, when Moses ascended Mount Sinai to receive the tables of the law, Aaron, with his sons and seventy of the elders, accompanied him part of the way up, and were permitted to behold afar off the symbol of the Sacred Presence (Exod. xxiv. 1, 2, 9-11). During the absence of Moses in the mountain the people seem to have looked upon Aaron as their head, and an occasion arose which fully vindicates the divine preference of Moses by showing that, notwithstanding the seniority and greater eloquence of Aaron, he wanted the high qualities which were essential in the leader of the Israelites (see Níemeyer, Charact. iii. 238 sq.). The people at length concluded that Moses had perished in the fire that gleamed upon the mountain's top, and gathering around Aaron, clamorously demanded that he should provide them with a visible symbolic image of their God, that they might worship him as other gods were worshipped (Exod. xxxii). Either through fear or ignorance, Aaron complied with their demand; and with the ornaments of gold which they freely offered, cast the figure of a calf (see Kitto's "Daily Bible Illustr. in loc."). See CALF. However, to fix the meaning of this image as a symbol of the true God, Aaron was careful to proclaim a feast to Jehovah for the ensuing day (see Monseuri, Aaron purgatus sie de vita lucre, Atreb. 1605, Francf. 1675). At this juncture, Moses' reappearance confounded the multitude, who were severely punished for this sin. Aaron attempted to excuse himself by casting the whole blame upon the people, but was sternly rebuked by his brother, at whose earnest intercessions, however, he received the divine forgiveness (Deut. ix. 20). During this and a second absence in the mountain, Moses had received instructions regarding the ecclesiastical establishment, the tabernacle, and the priesthood, which he soon afterward proceeded to execute. See Tabernacle; Worship. Under the new institution Aaron was to be high-priest, and his sons and descendants priests; and the whole tribe to which he belonged, that of Levi, was set apart as the sacerdotal or learned caste. See Levite. Accordingly, after the tabernacle had been completed, and every preparation made for the commencement of actual service, Aaron and his sons were consecrated by Moses, who anointed them with the holy oil and invested them with the sacred garments (Lev. viii. ix), B.C. 1657. The high-priest applied himself assiduously to the duties of his exalted office, and during the period of nearly forty years that it was filled by him his name seldom comes under our notice. But soon after his elevation his two eldest sons, Nadab and Abihu, were struck dead for daring, seemingly when in a state of partial inebriety, to conduct the service of God in an irregular manner, by offering incense with unlawful fire. On this occasion it was enjoined that the priests should manifest none of the ordinary signs of mourning for the loss of those who were so dear to them. To this heavy stroke
AARON Bен ASER

AARON bowed in silence (LEV. x. 1-11). Aaron joined in, or at least sanctioned, the invidious conduct of his sister Miriam, who, after the wife of Moses had been brought to the camp by Jethro, became apprehensive for her own position, and cast reflections upon Moses, much calculated to bring in disgrace his office (Ex. xx. 7). It was altogether distinct from the semi-sacerdotal character with which his mere seniority in the family invested him according to patriarchal usage. (See JETHRO.)

Aaron was the son transferred from the family of the senior Eleazar (see JOSEPHUS, Ant. v. 11, 5, vii. 1, 3), but afterward restored (comp. 1 Sam. ii. 30), as "HEAT-PRIEST."

II. Priesthood.—Aaron and his sons were invested by Moses with the priestly office, which was to remain in Aaron's line for ever (Ex. xxx. 35, 36). This was altogether a type of the semi-sacerdotal character with which his mere seniority in the family invested him according to patriarchal usage. The duty and right of sacrificing to God was afterward reserved to that family exclusively. The high-priesthood was confined to Aaron's line for ever (Ex. xxviii. 11). The priestly office was peculiar; it could not be sold, or purchased by money (30th of Lehi). The high-priest was endowed; in bearing the names of all the tribes of Israel upon his breast and upon his shoulders, thus presenting them always before God, and representing them to Him; and in being medium of the communication of His will to them. But, though the offices of Aaron were typical, the priesthood of Christ is of a far higher order. Aaron's priesthood was designated as "a shadow of heavenly things." He was the type of the greater and perfecter priest, whose name was Jesus (Heb. v. 4, 10, 12). He was the Priest who has been brought near to God through His own blood (Heb. x. 19). He who is without sin (Heb. viii. 2). He who should be constituted, not after the law of natural commandment, but after the power of an endless life. (See HUNTER, Sacred Biol. p. 282; EVANS, Scrij. Biol. iii. 77; Williams, Characters of O. T. p. 97; Gordon, Christ in the Ancient Church, i. 271.) See PRIEST.

Aaron the younger (i.e. the yonger), a rabbit born at Nicomedia in the beginning of the 14th century. He was the son of a rich merchant, and was sent to France, from him several Hebrew works on mystical theology (The Tree of Life, The Garden of Faith, The Garden of Eden), and a literal commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled נבון רוח (Vail of the Law). — HOEFER, Biographie Generale, i. 5.

Aaron the elder (i.e. the elder), a celebrated rabbi of the sect of the Caraites, practiced medicine at Constantinople toward the close of the 13th century. He was the reputed author of a work on the Jewish prayer-book according to the rites of the Caraitic sect ( CONSTANTINOPLE, 1580), and of a Jewish prayer-book according to the rites of the Caraitic sect (VENICE, 1589-89, 2 vols. 4to). He also wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, the first prophets (Joshua, the Judges, Samuel, and the Kings), on Isaiah and the Psalms, and on Job, all of which are still in use. — HOEFER, Biographie Generale, i. 6.

Aaron ben-Aser, or Aaron ben-Moses, a celebrated Jewish rabbi, lived in the first half of the 14th century. He is the author of a Treatise on the Aramaic alphabet (PERSIA, 1076). He was the son of Aser, he was the high-priest in general, his lineal descendants being the high-priests. See AARONITE. Even in the time of David, these were a very numerous body (1 Chron. xii. 27). The other branches of the tribe of Levi were assigned subordinate sacred duties. See LEVITE. the Orientals, which only admitted the authority of Ben-Nephthali. Their editions give for the first time the vowel signs, the invention of which has therefore frequently been ascribed to them. The works of Aaron ben-Asher have been printed, together with those of Moses ben-David, at the end of the Biblical Rabbinics of Venice.—Hoefer, Biographie Generale, 1, 7.

Aaron ben-Chayim, a celebrated rabbi, born at Fez in the middle of the 16th century. He was the head of the synagogues of Fez and Morocco. In order to superintend the printing of his works, he made in 1609, a voyage to Venice, where he died soon after. His works are (in Hebrew), The Heart of Aaron, containing two commentaries on Joshua and the Judges (Venice, 1609, fol.); The Offering of Aaron, or remarks on the book Sifra, an ancient commentary on Leviticus (Venice, 1609, fol.); The Measures of Aaron, or an essay on the 13 hermeneutical rules of Rabbi Ismael.—Hoefer, Biographie Generale, 1, 7; Fürst, Bibl. Jud., 1,590.

Aaron ben-Joseph Sason (Scharon), a rabbi of Thessalonica, lived at the close of the 16th century. He is the author of several celebrated Jewish works, among which are דעון דעה (the law of truth), a collection of 292 decisions on questions relating to sales, rents, etc. (Venice, 1616, fol.); and דעון דעה (the book of truth), explicatory of the Tosaphot of the Gemara (Amsterdam, 1706, 8vo.—Hoefer, Biographie Generale, 1, 7.

Aaron Zalaha, a Spanish rabbi, died 1298. He is the author of several commentaries published under the title ספר חסינא, id est Liber Instructum libri 613 legis Moasica processorum, etc. (in Hebrew, Venice, 1523, fol.—Hoefer, Biographie Generale, 1, 7.

Aironite (Heb. same as Aros, used collectively), a designation of the descendants of Aaron, and therefore priests, who, to the number of 5700 fighting men, with Jehoiada the father of Benahiah at their head, joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. xii, 27). Later on in the history (1 Chron. xxvii, 18) we find their chief was Zadok, who in the earlier narrative is distinguished as "a young man mighty of valor." They must have been an important family in the reign of David to be reckoned among the tribes of Israel. See also, Priest.

Asrak (אָסְרָק), a Cabalistic word found in the Talmudic Lexicon Aruch, and apparently invented by the Rabbinists in order to correspond to a prohibition found in the Mishna (Skhabbat, xvi, 6). Asrak should write on the Sabbath two letters, this word beginning with the letter נ repeated. In the Talmud, however, it is written Adaruk (אַדָּרָק). Buxtorf (Lex. Talmud. col. 2) thinks it is merely the Biblical word אָסְרָק, as אָסְרָק, I will gird thee (Auth. Ver. "I girded thee"), found in Isa. xiv, 5.

Ab (אָב), prob. i. q. "the season of fruit," from אָבָה, to be fruitful, and apparently of Syriac origin, D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v.: comp. Abin; Josephus, Ant. iv, 4, 7), the Chaldee name of the fifth ecclesiastical and eleventh civil month of the Jewish year (Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. col. 2); a name introduced after the Babylonian captivity, and not occurring in Scripture, in which this is designated simply as the fifth month (Num. xxxviii, 38; Jer. i, 3; Zech. vii, 3, etc.). It corresponded with the Macedonian month Λουες (Λοῦε), beginning with the new moon of August, and always containing thirty days. The 1st of Ab is observed either as a day for the death of Aaron (Num. xxxix, 38); or the 9th is the date of the appearance of Moses (Genesis, in Wagenser's Sota, p 786) of the desert from Canaan (Num. xiv, 30), and the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar (Zech. vii, 5; vii, 19; comp. Reland, Anecd. Sacr. iv, 10; but the 7th day, according to 2 Kings xxx, 8, where the Syriac and Arabic read 9th; also the 10th, according to Jer. iii, 15, probably referring to the close of the confabulation, Buxtorf, Syn. g. (in Judaeis. xxxviii, 1, 3, 4, 5); the 16th was the festival of the Xylophoria, or bringing of wood into the Temple (Bodenschatz, Kirchliche Verfassung der Juden, ii, 106; comp. Neh. x, 34; xiii, 31; on nine successive days, according to Ortho, Lex. Rabb. p. 333; on the 14th, according to Josephus, War, ii, 17); the 21st in memory of the extinction of the western lamp of the Temple; the 25th, the 27th, and the 28th were called, according to Josephus, the seven Sabbaths of Ab, because the temple was not to be entered on that day. —Hoefer, Biographie Generale, 1, 7; Forth, Proph. Name. Hence it is equally applicable to females; e. g. Ami- gail (as among the Arabs; comp. Koegsman, in Ewald's Zeitung, pp. 14, 15); "fuer die Konade der Morgen-landes," in v. 297-317. In all cases it is the full name that is to be considered as the genitive, the prefix 2N being in "construct," and not the reverse. See Also.

Ab'racou (Lat. Abacce, the Greek text being no longer extant), one of the minor prophets (2 Esdr. [in the Vulg. 4 Esdr.] i, 40), elsewhere Habakkuk (q. v.).

Abd'don (אַבְדָּדֹן), for Heb. אַבְדָּדֹן, destruction, i. e. the destroyer, as it is immediately explained by עָבְרָלעָלעָלע (APOTTOI), the name ascribed to the ruling spirit of Tartarus, or the angel of death, described (Rev. ix, 11) as the king and chief of the Apocalyptic host and the fifth trumpet, and as the angel of the abyss or "bottomless pit" (see Origen, Biblica, ii, 445). In the Bilde, the word abaddon means destruction (Job. xxxi, 12), or the place of destruction, i. e. the subterranean world, Hades, the region of the dead (Job xxvi, 6; xxvii, 22; Prov. xv. 11). It is, in fact, the second of the seven names which the Rabbinists apply to it. It is perhaps taken particularly from Isa. xxxviii, 11, "Shall thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave, or thy faithfulness in (abaddon) destruction?" See Hades. Hence they have made Abaddon the nethermost of the two regions into which they divided the under world. But that in Rev. ix, 11, the angel of the abyss, or the abyss, is perfectly evident in the Greek. There is a general connection with the destroyer (q. v.) alluded to in 1 Chron. xxii, 15; but the explanation, quoted by Bengel, that the name is given in Hebrew and Greek, to show that the locusts would be destructive alike to Jew and Gentile, is far-fetched and unnecessary. The popular interpretation of the Apocalypse, which finds its symbols in the poetry of that prophecy the details of national history in later ages, has usually regarded Abaddon as a symbol of Mohammedian destruction at the head of the Saracenic hordes (Elliott's Hora Apocalyptica, i, 410). It may well be doubted, however, whether this symbol is anything more than a new and vivid figure of the same moral convulsions elsewhere typified in various ways in the Revelation, namely, those that attended the breaking down of Judaism and paganism, and the general establishment of Christianity (see Stuart's Comment., in loc.). See also, Revelation.

Abd'el, the name of the king of the deserts in Jewish mythology, which seems to point to a connection with Apollyon in his character as "the destroyer," or the destroying angel. Compare Exclus. xviii, 22, 25. See Apostles.

Abad y Queypo, Manuel, a Mexican bishop, born in the Asturias, Spain, about 1775. Having become priest, he went to Mexico, where he was at first judge of wills at Valladolid de Mechoacan, and, in 1809, appointed bishop of Mechoacan. Upon the out-brake of the war of independence, Abad favored the national party, and declared himself against the Reign of Terror. When the Restoration of Ferdinand VII was proclaimed, Abad was sent to Spain and imprisoned at Madrid. He succeeded in winning the favor of the king, and was not only released, but appointed minister of justice. In the night following, however,
he was again arrested by order of the Grand Inquisitor,
and shut up in a convent. He was liberated in consequence of the events of 1820, and elected a member of the provisional junta of the government. Subsequently he was appointed Bishop of Tortosa. In 1823 he was again arrested by order of the Inquisition, and sentenced to six years imprisonment. He died before the time had expired.—Hoefler, Biographica Gene-rale, i, 17.

Ab'ana [many Ab'ane] (Heb. Abanah', אבנה;
Sept. 'Abn; Vulg. Abana; or rather, as in the margin, Amaran [q. v.]; Heb. Amaranah', אבנה; [comp. Is. xxiii, 16], since the latter means perpetual;
Genesis, Thesaur. Heb. p. 1162, in a stream mentioned by Naaman as being one of the rivers of Damascus; an-orther being the Pharpar (2 Kings v. 12). The main stream by which Damascus is now irrigated is called Barada, the Chysorrhoe, or "golden stream" of the ancient geographers (Strabo, p. 761), which, as soon as it issues from a cleft of the Anti-Lebanon mountains, is divided into three smaller courses. The central or principal stream runs straight toward the city, and there supplies the different public cisterns, baths, and fountains; the other branches diverge to the right and left along the rising ground on either hand, and having furnished the means of extensive irrigation, fall again into the main channel, after diffusing their fertilizing influences, and are at length lost in a marsh or lake, which is known as the Bohr el-Merj, or Lake of the Meadow. Dr. Richardson (Truedi, ii, 498) states that the "water of the Barada, like the water of the Jordan, is of a white, sulphureous hue, and an unpleasant taste." Some contend that the words Bohr el-Merj, and are explained as a loss for the Pharpar; others find both in the two subsidiary streams, and neglect the Barada; while still others seek the Abana in the small river Fijah, which Dr.
Richardson describes as rising near a village of the same name in a pleasant valley fifteen or twenty miles to the north-west of Damascus. It issues from the limestone rock, in a deep, rapid stream, about thirty feet wide. It is pure and cold as ice water; and, after coursing down a stony and rugged channel for above a hundred yards, falls into the Barada, which comes from another valley, and at the point of junction is only half as wide as the Fijah. The Abana or Abana has been identified by some (especially Ge-serius, Heb. Lex.) with the Barada, from the coincidence of the name Abana mentioned in Cant. iv, 8, as one of the tops of Anti-Libanus, from which the Chysorrhoeas (or Barada) flows; and the ruins of Abla, now found on the banks of that stream, are thought to confirm this view. A better reason for this identification is, that Naaman would be more likely to refer to some prominent stream like the Barada, rather than to a small and comparatively remote fountain like the Fijah. See Pharpar. The turbid character of the water of Barada is no objection to this view, since Naaman refers to Abana as important for its me-notch rather than on account of its physical coldness.

The identification of the Abana with the Barada is confirmed by the probable coincidence of the Pharpar with the Arvajj; these being the only considerable streams in the vicinity of Damascus (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1849, p. 571; Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 447), which is the river by which taken by the latest traveler who has canvassed the question at length (J. L.
Porter, in the Jour. of Soc. Literat. Literature, July, 1853, p. 245 sq.). According to Schwarz (Pilast. p. 54), the Jews of Damascus traditionally identify the Barada with the Abana (q. v.). The Arabic version of the passage in Kings has Baradas. According to Lightfoot (Cev.
Chor. iv.) the river in question was also called Kermis יסרנָף (Kermis), a name applied in the Talmud to a river of Palestine (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 218). See Abarim (Heb. Abarim, אברים, regions beyond,

I.e. east of the Jordan; Sept. 'Abarim, but to miyvah
'Ararim, but to Baris in Num. xxvii, 49. Vulg. Baris;
"passages"), a mountain (ื่בריים, Num. xxvii,
12; Deut. xxxii, 49), or rather chain of hills (ב ריים, Num. xxxiii. 47, 48), which form or belong to the mountainous district east of the Dead Sea and the lower Jordan, being situated in the land of Moab
(Num. xxvi, 11), on the route to Palestine (Num. xxvii, 12). It was the last station but one of the Hebrews on their way from Egypt to Canaan (Num. xxxii, 47, 48). See Jef-Abarim. The range presents many different masses and elevations, commanding extensive views of the country west of the river (Irbet and Mangles, p. 459). From one of the highest of these, called Mount Nebo, Moses surveyed the Promised Land before he died (Deut. xxxii, 49). From the manner in which the names Abarim, Nebo, and Pisgah are connected, it would seem that they were different names of the same mountain range. See Nebo. According to Josephus, who styles it Abaris (Aσαρις, Ant. iv, 8, 48), it was a "very high mountain, situated opposite Jericho,"
and Eusebius (Onomast. Nāsā'ēz) locates it six miles west of Heshbon. The name Abaris has been tortured by some disciples of the Faber and Bryant school of etymologists into a connection with the name of a district of Egypt called Aberis or Avaris (Josephus, Apam. i, 14), and so with the system of Egyptian idolalty, from the deity of the same name. Affinities between the names of two of the peaks of this range, Nebo and Abaris, have also been traced with those of other Egyptian deities, Anubis and Horis. There is no good foundation for such speculations.

Abausit, Firmin, a French Unitarian, was born at Uzes, in Languedoc, Nov. 11, 1679. Though his mother was a Protestant, he was forcibly placed in a Roman Catholic seminary, to be educated as a Papist.
His mother succeeded in recovering him, and placed him at school in Geneva. At nineteen he travelled in Holland and England, and became the friend of Baye and Newton. Returning to Geneva, he rendered important assistance to a society engaged in preparing a translation of the New Testament into French (published in 1726). In 1727 he was appointed public librarian in Geneva, and was presented with the freedom of the city. He died at Geneva, March 20, 1677. Though not a copious writer, he was a man of great reputation in his day, both in philosophy and theology. Newton declared him "a fit man to judge between Leibnitz and himself. Rousseau describes him as "that wise and modest Abauctus," and Voltaire pronounced him "a great man." His knowledge was extensive in the whole circle of antiquities, in ancient history, geography, and chronology. His manuscripts were burned after his death by his relatives at Uzes, who had become Romanists; his printed works are collected, in part, in Oeuvres Divines et Humaines d'Abbaye. (Amst. 1672, 2 vols.). Many of his theological writings are contained in a volume entitled Miscellanées on Historical, Theological, and Critical Subjects, transl. by E. Harwood, D.D. (Lond. 1774, 8vo.). A list of his works is given by Haag, La France Protestant, 1, 3. See, also, Hoefer, Biog. Générale, i, 86.

Aba (Greek, αβα) is the Hebrew word אב (ab), father, under a form (the "emphatic" or definite state אב) the father peculiar to the Chaldean idiom (Mark xiv, 36; Rom. viii, 15; Gal. iv, 6). As a substantive it is common use to express the paternal relation, in the mixed Aramaic dialect of Palestine, during the New Testament age. Especially would it be naturally employed from infancy in addressing the male parent, like the modern paı́dus; hence its occurrence in the New Testament only as a vocative (Winer, Gesch. des neuest. Test., i, 77). Its reference to God (comp. Jer. iii, 4; John viii, 41) was common among the later Jews (Hamburger, Real-Exeget. s. v.). To guard against the appearance of too great familiarity, however, the writers of the New Testament, instead of translating the title into its Greek equivalent, πατὴρ, have retained it in its foreign form—One of elegance and dignity; but they have in all cases added its meaning, for the convenience of their merely Greek readers. Hence the phrase "Aba, father" in its two-fold form (Crítica Biblica, ii, 445).

1. Through faith in Christ all true Christians pass into the relation of sons; are permitted to address God with filial confidence in prayer; and to regard themselves as heirs of the heavenly inheritance. This adoption into the family of God inseparably follows our justification; and the power to call God our Father, in this special and appro priate sense, results from the inward testimony of our forgiveness given by the Holy Spirit. See ABBOT, B. C. C. 1. The word Abba in after ages came to be used in the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic churches, in an improper sense, as a title given to their bishops (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v.), like padre, etc., in Roman Catholic countries. The bishops themselves bestowed the title Abba more eminently upon the Bishop of Alexandria; which gave occasion for the people to call him Baba, or Papa, that is, grandfather—a title which he bore before the Bishop of Rome.

Abbadie, Jacques, born about 1658, at Nay, in Bearn, studied at Saumur and Sedan. His proficiency was so early and so great, that at seventeen he received the title of D.D. from the Academy at Sedan. In 1676 he accepted an invitation from the Elector of Brandenburg, and was for some time pastor of the French Protestant church at Berlin. The French congregation at Berlin was at first but thin; but upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes great numbers of the exiled Protestants refixed to Brandenburg, where they were received with the greatest humanity; so that Dr. Abbadie, who was not able to support his family, and who took all possible care; and, by his interest at court, did many services to his distressed countrymen. The Elector dying in 1688, Abbadie accepted a proposal from Marshal Schomberg to go with him to Holland, and afterward to England with the Prince of Orange. In the autumn of 1689 he accompanied the Marshal to Ireland, where he continued till after the Battle of the Boyne, in 1690, in which his great patron was killed. He returned to London, was appointed minister of the French Church in Savoy; next was made dean of Killala, in Ireland, and died near London, Sept. 15 (other authorities say Oct. 2 or 6), 1727. His chief work is his Traité de la Religion Chrétienne (Rotterd. 1692, 2 vols. 12mo), which has passed through several editions, and has been translated into several languages (in English, Lond. 1694–8, 2 vols. 8vo). Madame de Sévigné called it "the most charming of books;" and, though written by a Protestant, it was found just as favorable among French Romanists, and even at the court of Louis XIV. His other important writings are: Réflexions sur la Présence du Corps de Jésus Christ dans l'Eucharistie; Les Caractères du Chrétien et du Christianisme; Traité de la Diversité de Notre Seigneur Jésus Christ; L'Art de se convaincre (Rotterd. 1692, translated into different languages); La Vérité de la Religion Réformée (Rotterd. 1718, 2 vols. 8vo); Le Triomphe de la Providence et de la Religion, an explanation of a portion of the Apocalypse (Amst. 1728, 4 vols. 12mo); Accomplissement de Prophecy in Christ (Lond. new ed. 1840, 12mo). A full list of his writings is given by Haag, La France Protestant, i, 7;—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, i, 86.

Abbess. Two different authors are frequently quoted by this title.

1. A celebrated canonist who flourished in 1250, and wrote a Commentary on the Five Books of DeCREd, printed at Venice in 1588, folio. He is known as Abbess antiquus.

2. The celebrated Nicholas Tudeschi, the Panormitan, known as Abbess Sicilus or Abbess junior. See PANORMITAN.

Abbé, the French name for abbot (q. v.). It is used in France not only to designate the superior of an abbey, but also the general title of the secular clergy. Before the French Revolution it was even sometimes assumed by theological students (unordained) in the hope that the king would confer upon them a portion of the revenues of some abbey. There were at one time in France so many unordained abbés, poor and rich, men of quality and men of low birth, that they formed a particular class in society, and exerted an important influence over its character. They were seen everywhere; at court, in the halls of justice, in the theatres, the coffee-houses, etc. In almost every wealthy family an abbé was an abbe, occupying the post of familiar friend and spiritual adviser, and not seldom, that of the head of the family. As in their correspondence, in a certain degree, to the philosophers who lived in the houses of the wealthy Romans in the time of the emperors.

Abbé commendataire. See ABBOT.

Abbess (Lat. abbatia), the superior or head of an abbey of nuns, bearing the same relation to them as the abbott to the monks. An abbess possesses in general the same dignity and authority as an abbot, except that she cannot exercise the spiritual functions appertaining to the priesthood (Conc. Trident. Sess. cv. v. vii). Generally the abbess must be chosen from the nuns of the same convent; she must be sprung from legitimate marriage, must be over forty years old, and must have observed the vows for eight years. In case of emergency, however, any nun of the order who is thirty years old, and has professed five years, may be elected. In Germany fifteen abbesses (of Essen, Ettlingen, Herford, Ganderheim, etc.) had formerly the right of sending a representative to the German Diet, and possessed a kind of episcopal jurisdiction, which they exercised through an official. After the Reformation the superiors of several German abbey, which were changed into Protestant institutions of ladies living in common, retained the title "abbess." See ABBEY; ABBOT.
Abbey (Lat. abbatio), a monastery of monks or nuns, ruled by an abbot or abbess (for the derivation of the name, see Abbott). The abbeys in England were enormously rich. All of them, 190 in number, were abolished in the time of Henry VIII. The abbey lands were afterward granted to the nobility, under which grants they are held to the present day. Cranmer begged earnestly of Henry VIII to save some of the abbeys for religious uses, but in vain.

In most abbeys, besides the Abbot, there were the following officers or obedientiarii, removable at the abbot's will:

1. Prior, who acted in the abbot's absence as his locum tenens. In some great abbeys there were as many as five priors.
2. Echonomarius, or Almoner, who had the oversight of the daily distributions of alms to the poor at the gate.
3. Pitanarius, who had the care of the pittances, which were the allowances given on special occasions over and above the usual provisions.
4. Sacrista, or Sacristian (Sexton), who had the care of the vessels, vestments, books, etc.; he also provided for the sacrament, and took care of burials.
5. Cameraerius, or Chamberlain, who looked after the dormitory.
6. Cellarius, or Cellarer, whose duty it was to procure provisions for strangers.
7. Thesaurarius, or Burser, who received rents, etc.
8. Precentor, who presided over the choir.
9. Hospitalarius, whose duty it was to attend to the wants of strangers.
10. Infirniarius, who attended to the hospital and sick monks.
11. Reflectionarius, who looked after the hall, and provided every thing required there.

For the mode of electing abbots, right of visitation, etc., see Conc. Trident. Sess. xxiv. On the most important English abbeys, see Willis, History of Mixed Abbeys, vol. i; A. Butler, Lives of Saints, ii. 688. See Convoy; Monastery; Priory.

Abbo, Abbot of Fleury, in France, born 958, slain in a tumult at Reole, in Gascony, Nov. 13, 1004. He presided two years (968-967) over a monastic school in England, and returned to Fleury, where he was made abbot. He was so celebrated for his wisdom and virtues that people, even in far-distant parts, had recourse to him for advice and assistance, especially in all questions relating to monastic discipline, his zeal for which caused the tumult in which he was slain.—Neander.

Abbot (Lat. abbòs: from Chaldee נָבִי, the fa ther), the head or superior of an abbey of monks. 1. The title was originally given to every monk, but after the sixth century was restricted to the heads of religious houses. At a later period the title was not confined to the superiors of monasteries, but was also given to the superiors of other institutions (as abbœ curiæ, palatii, scholarum, etc.), while, on the other hand, several other terms, as provost, prior, guardian, major, rector, etc., were adopted to designate the superiors of the convents of the several orders. The Greek Church uses generally the term archimandrite (q. v.). The name abbœt was especially retained by the order of the Benedictines, and its branches, the Cistercians, Bernardines, Trappists, Grandmontains, Prémonstratenses. But the congregation of Cluny (q. v.) reserved the title abbot to the superior of the principal monastery, calling those of the other monasteries oAbbœtes and prohbates. The Abbot of Monte Cassino assumed the title abbœt abbœtum. A number of religious orders are governed by an abbœt-general, e. g. (according to the Notitia per l'Anno 1859, the Official Roman Almanac), the regular canons of Lateran, the Camaldulenses, the Trappists, the Olivetans, the (Oriental) order of St. Antonius, and the Basilians. Regular abbœtes are those who wear the religious habit, and actually reside over an abbœy, both in spiritual and temporal matters. Secular abbœtes are priests who enjoy the benefits, but employ a vicar (q. v.) to discharge its duties. Lay abbœtes are laymen to whom the revenues of abbœyes are given by princes or patrons. Field abbœtes (Abbœtes octavense) are regular abbœtes appointed for army service. Arch abbœt is the title of the abbot of St. Martini, in Hungary. The abbœtes are, in general, subject to the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishop, but formerly some were exempt, and had even a kind of episcopal jurisdiction (jurisdictio quæst episcopalis), together with the right of wearing episcopal insignia (mitred abbœtes, abbœtes mitrales). Some, as the abbot of St. Maurice, in Switzerland, have even a small territory. Abbœtes with episcopal jurisdiction have the right of taking part in general councils, and the right of voting in provincial synods. The privileges and duties of abbœtes are determined by the rules of the order to which they belong, as well as by canonical regulations.

Costume of an English Mitred Abbot.

The commendatory abbœtes (abbœtes commendatoriae; Fr. abbœs commendaires), in France and England, were secular ecclesiastics, to whom abbœtes were given in commendam, who enjoyed a portion of the revenues, together with certain honors, but without jurisdiction.
over the inmates of the abbey. This became latterly so common that most abbots were thus held perpetually in commendam. In England many abbots, among other privileges, had the right of sitting in the House of Lords. According to Fuller (Ch. Hist. b. vi, p. 392, ed. 1655), there were sixty-four abbots and thirty-six priors, besides the Master of the Temple summoned to Parliament, which he terms "a jelly number." Edward III reduced them to twenty-six. In Germany, ten prince-abbots (of Fulda, Corvey, etc.) were members of the German Diet till 1806. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. b. vii, ch. iii; Conc. Tridrual. Sess. xxv, and, for full details, Martene, De Aula. Mon. Rial. iii. 67ff. Articles for the benefactions of abbots (i. e. an inquisition) are given in Boissonnet, Dict. des Céreq. monast., i. 22 sq. 2. The title of Abb. is still used in some Protestant countries. In Germany it is sometimes conferred upon divines, especially if they enjoy the revenues of former monasteries. Thus the late Professor Lücke of Göttingen was an abb. Abbott, Abiel, D.D., a Unitarian minister, born in Wilton, N. H., Dec. 14, 1765. He graduated at Harvard, 1787, was assistant in the Phillips Andover Academy from 1787 to 1789, and became pastor of Coventry, Conn., 1795. Having been brought up a Trinitarian Calvinist, Mr. Abbott became, 1792, a decided and consistent Unitarian, in 1811, was disowned by the Congregational Church, and in 1824 was disowned by the Unitarians for his attacks on the Bible. He was a leading citizen of Manchester, and held the office of mayor. He died in 1834. He published in 1813 a "Statement of the Proceedings in his Church at Coventry, which terminated in his Removal," and some occasional pamphlets.—Sprague, Unitarian Pulpit, p. 229 sq. Abbott, Abiel, D.D., a Unitarian minister, born at Andover, Mass., Aug. 17, 1770. He graduated at Harvard, 1792, and was pastor at Haverhill from 1794 to 1803, and at Beverly from 1803 until 1826. His health failing, he spent the winter of 1825-6 in Charleston, S. C., and in Cuba, but died just as the ship reached quarantine at New York, June 7, 1826. He was a man of taste and culture, and an eloquent preacher. His Letters from Cuba were published after his death (Boston, 1859, 8vo); and also a volume of Sermons, with a Memoir by Everett (Boston, 1831, 2 vols., 8vo).—Sprague, Unitarian Pulpit, p. 229 sq. Abbott, George, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, brother of Robert (inf.), one of the translators of the English Bible, and a man of great ability and learning, was born at Guildford, October 29, 1567, and entered at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1578; subsequently was made Master of University College, and, in 1599, Dean of Winchester. At the university he was first brought into contact with Alep, Land, whose ecclesiastical schemes he opposed through life. In 1604, Dr. Abbott was the second of eight learned divines at Oxford, chosen by King James, to whom the care of translating all (but the Epistles of the New Testament was committed. In 1608, he assisted in a design to unite the churches of England and Scotland; in which his prudence and moderation raised him high in the favor of the king, who bestowed upon him successively the bishoprics of Lichfield (1609) and of London (1610). In 1611 his majesty elevated him to the See of Canterbury. As archbishop, he had the courage to displease the king by opposing the Hobie of Sports, the dispute of the English and Scotch bishops. In 1617, he vindicated the displeasure of Charles I, by refusing to license a sermon, which Dr. Sibbald had preached, to justify one of Charles's unconstitutional proceedings. For this act he was suspended from his functions, but was soon, though unwillingly, restored to them. A cause of deep sorrow theory has been successfully applied to the solution of the discrepancy between Mark xv, 25, and John xix, 14 (where the Greek Ἰάκωβος has doubtless been mistaken for στίγμα)—Kitto, s. v.

Abbreviator, a clerk or secretary employed in the Papal Court to aid in preparing briefs, bulls, etc. They were first employed by Benedict XII in the 14th century. Many eminent men have filled the office. Pius XI (Érasme Sylvius) was an abbreviator for the Council of Trent.

Ab'da (Heb. 'Abda', עבדה [a Chaldaizing form, the servant, i.e. of God], the name of two men.

1. (Sept. 'Aḇḏā). The father of Adoniram, which latter was an officer under Solomon (1 Kings iv, 6). B.C. ante 995.

2. (Sept. 'Aḇḏēq). The son of Shammua and a Levite of the family of Jethro, resident in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. xi, 17); elsewhere called Oniel (q. v.), the son of Shemariah (1 Chron. ix, 16).

Ab'das, a Persian bishop during the reign of Yezeedgird (or Isdegirdes), King of Persia, under whom the Christians enjoyed the free exercise of their religion. Abdas, filled with ill-directed zeal, destroyed (A.D. 414) one of the temples of the fire-worshippers; and being ordered by the monarch to rebuild the temple, refused to do so, although warned that, if he persisted, the Christian temples would be destroyed. Yezeedgird put the bishop to death, and ordered the total destruction of all the Christian churches in his dominions; upon which followed a bitter persecution of the Christians, which lasted thirty years, and was the occasion of war between the Persians and the Roman empire. In the Roman and Greek churches he is commemorated as a saint on May 16. See Socrat. Ch. Hist. vii, 18; Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 110; Theod. Hist. Eccl. v, 39; Butler, Lives of Saints, May 16.

Ab'dell (Heb. Abdeel, עבדל, servant of God; Sept. Ἀβδίλ), the father of Shelemiah, which latter was one of those commissioned to apprehend Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvi, 26). B.C. ante 605.

Ab'di (Heb. Adbi', עבדי, my servant; or, according to Gesenius, for עבדיה, servant of Jehovah; but, according to Fürst, properly עבדיה, bondman), the name of three men.

1. (Sept. 'Aḇdi v. r. 'Aḇḏn). A Levite, grandfather of Hilkiah, who latter lived in the time of David (1 Chron. vi, 44). B.C. considerably ante 1014.

2. (Sept. 'Aḇḏa). A Levite, father of one Kish (different from Kish, a son of the preceding), which latter assisted in the reformation under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 12). B.C. ante 726.

3. (Sept. 'Aḇḏn). An Israelite of the "sons" of Elam, who divorced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 26), B.C. 450.

Ab'dias, the name of two men.

1. Ab'dias (Lat. Abedas, the Greek text not being extant), one of the minor prophets (2 Esdr. i, 39), elsewhere called Obadiah (q. v.).

2. Ab'dias, of Babylon, is said to have flourished about the year 150 B.C., and to have been one of the seventy disciples; but his very existence is somewhat doubtful. The work attributed to him, viz. Historia Cer-taminia Apostolorum, in ten books, was written in the 5th or 9th century. It may be found in Fabrici Cod. Apocryphi. Nov. Test. ii, 388; and was published also by Leunis Basle, 1557, and Paris, 1560). A German translation is given in Barbeire, Bibliothek d. N.-T. Apokryphen (Stuttgart, 1841), p. 391 sq.—Gieseler, Ch. Hist. i, 67; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 59; Baronius, i nonal. anno 44.

Ab'diel (Heb. Ab'diel, עבדייל, servant of God; Sept. 'Aḇḏiṿa), a son of Guni and father of Ahi, one of the chief Gadites resident in Gilead (1 Chron. v, 15), B.C. between 1093 and 792.

of Zego, i.e. of Nebo, or the Chaldaic Mercury, Dan. ii. 7, and Chald. id. N.22270; Sept. and Josephus (Aδεδενος), the Chaldean name imposed by the king of Babylon's officer upon Azariah (q. v.), one of the three companions of Daniel (Dan. ii. 49; iii. 12-30). With his two friends, Shadrach and Meshach, he was microbes, thrown into the burning furnace, into which they were cast for refusing to worship the gold- en statue which Nebuchadnezzar had caused to be set up in the plain of Dura (Dan. iii.). He has been supposed by some to be the same person as Ezra; but Ezra was a priest of the tribe of Levi (Ezra viii, 5), while this Azariah was of the royal blood, and conse- quently not a priest. (Dan. i. 3, 6.)

Abeel, David, D.D., an eminent missionary, was born at New Brunswick, N. J., June 12th, 1804, studied theology at the seminary in that place, and in 1826 was licensed to preach in the Dutch Reformed church. In October, 1822, he sailed for Canton as a chaplain of the Seamen's Friend Society; but at the end of a year's labor placed himself under the direction of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He visited Java, Singapore, and Siam, studying Chinese, and laboring with much success, when his health failed him entirely, and he returned home in 1833 by way of England, visiting Hol- land, France, and Switzerland, and everywhere urging the claims of the heathen. In 1835 he returned to Canton. The "opium war" preventing his usefulness there, he visited Malacca, Borneo, and other places, and settled at Kolojzoo. His health giving way once more, he returned in 1845, and died at Albany, Sept. 4, 1846. He published Journal of Resi- dence in Canton 1832-1833 (N. Y. 1837.); The Min- istry Convention at Jerusalem (N. Y. 1838, 12mo.); Claims of the World to the Gospel (N. Y. 1838). See Williamson, Memoirs of the Rev. D. Abeel (N. Y. 1849, 16mo.); Amer. Missionary Memorial, p. 338.

Abeel, John Nelson, D.D., a minister of the Reformed Dutch church, who was born in 1769, gradu- ated in 1787 at Princeton, and was licensed to preach in April, 1793. In 1795 he became one of the clergy of the Collegiate Dutch church in New York, where he continued until his death, Jan. 20, 1812. He was an eloquent preacher, and a man of great and deserved influence.

Abel (Heb. Abel, $2277$, a breath, l. q. transitory; as Genesis [Heb. Azar], from the shortness of his life; or, as Kitto [&quot;Daily Bible Illustrat.&quot;] suggests, perhaps l. q. murmuring, as he was frequently chidden during the infancy of Cain; Sept. and N. T. &quot;A&beta;&quot; Josephus, &quot;A&gamma;&alpha;&omicron;,&quot; the second son of Adam and Eve, slain by his elder brother, Cain (Gen. iv, 1-16), B.C. ch. 4:45. See Adam.

I. Notary.—Cain and Abel having been instructed, perhaps by their father, Adam, in the duty of worship to their Creator, each offered the first-fruits of his labors: Cain, as a husbandman, the fruits of the field; Abel, as a shepherd, fatings of his flock (see Fritzsche, De Sacrificia Cain et Habeaci, Lips. 1751). God was pleased to accept the offering of Abel, in preference to that of his brother (Heb. xi. 4), in consequence of which Cain, giving himself up to envy, formed the design of killing Abel; which he at length effected, having invited him to go into the field (Gen. iv, 8, 9; comp. John iii. 12). See Cain. The Jews had a trad- ition that Abel was murdered in the plain of Damascus; and accordingly his tomb is still shown on a high hill near the village of Sinia or Sineia, about two miles northwest of Damascus, on the road to Basra (Jerome, in Ezex. xxxvii). The summit of the hill is still called Nebi Abel; but circumstances lead to the probable supposition that this was the site, or in the vicinity of the site, of the ancient Abel or Abila (Po- cecte, Ext., ii. 144 sq.; Schubert, Reis. iii. 286 sq.). See Abila. The legend, therefore, was most likely suggested by the ancient name of the place (see Stanley, Palest. p. 405). See Abel.—(For literature, see Wolf, Cura in N. T., iv, 749.)

II. Traditional Views.—Ancient writers abound in observations on the mystical character of Abel; and he is spoken of as the representative of the pastoral race, or of the nomadic tribes, while Gen. iv. speaks of him as the "heir of the promise, who for the good of the name of the Lord, and the salvation of the faithful, it seems to intimate that Cain presented the fruit which might be most easily procured (Hom. in Gen. xviii. 5). St. Augustine, speaking of regeneration, al- ludes to Abel as representing the new or spiritual man in contradistinction to the natural or corrupt man, and says, "Cain founded a city on earth; but Abel, as a stranger and pilgrim, looked forward to the city of the saints which is in heaven" (De Civitate Dei, v. 1). Abel, he says in another place, was the first-fruits of the Church, and was sacrificed in testimony of the future Mediator. And on Ps. cxviii, (Sermon, § 9) he says: "This city" (that is, "the city of God") "has its beginning from Abel the son of Adam, the brother of Cain." Ireneus says that God, in the case of Abel, subjected the just to the unjust, that the righteousness of the former might be manifested by what he suffered (Contra Haer., iii. 23). Herein lies, in ancient times who represented Cain and Abel as embodying two spiritual powers, of which the mightier was that of Cain, and to which they accordingly rendered divine homage. In the early Church, Abel was considered the first of the martyrs, and many persons were accus- tomed to pronounce his name with a particular reverence. An obscure sect arose under the title of Ableites (q. v.), the prosessed object of which was to inculcate certain fanatical notions respecting marriage; but it was speedily lost amidst a host of more popular par- ties. For other mythological speculations respecting Abel, see Buhmann's Mythologia, i, 55 sq.; for Rab- binical traditions, see Eichendorff, Entsck., Juden-k, i, 452 sq., 682 sq.; for Oriental notices, see Ko- ran, v, 30 sq.; and Hist. Orient. p. 24 sq.; comp. Fabric. Pseudepigrapha, i, 118; other Christian writings may be seen in Iren. v, 6; Cedrenus, Hist. p. 8 (Kitto).

The general tenor of these Eastern traditional fic- tions is that both Cain and Abel had twins sisters, and that Adam determined to give Cain's sister to Abel, and Abel's sister to Cain in marriage. This arrange- ment, however, did not please Cain, who chose his own sister as a wife, and she the more beautiful. Adam referred the matter to the divine arbitration, directing each brother to offer a sacrifice, and abide the result. Abel presented a choice animal from his flock, and Cain a few poor ears of grain from his field. Fire fell from heaven and consumed Abel's offering without smoke, while it left Cain's untouched. Still more incensed at this disappointment, Cain resolved to take his brother's life, who, perceiving his design, endeavor- ed to dissuade him from so wicked an act. Cain, how- ever, cherished his malice, but was at a loss how to execute it, until the devil gave him a hint by a vision of a man killing a bird with a stone. One night, apparently, he crushed the head of his brother, while sleeping, with a large stone. He was now at a loss how to conceal his crime. He enclosed the corpse in a skin, and carried it about for forty days, till the stench became intolerable. Happening to see a crow, which had killed a little fowl, and stood "in his face in the hole in the ground, he acted on the suggestion, and buried his brother's body in the earth. He passed the rest of his days in constant terror, having heard a voice inflicting this curse upon him for his fratricide. (See D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, s. v. Cabil.)

111. Character of his Offering.—The superiority of ABEL

Abel's sacrifice is sacrificed by the Apostle Paul to fail (Heb. xi. 4). Faith implies a previous revelation: it comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. It is probable that there was some command of God, in reference to the rite of sacrifice, with which Abel complied, and which Cain disbelieved. The "more excellent" sacrifice was the firstfruits; in the offering of which there was a confession that his own sins deserved death, and the expression of a desire to share in the benefits of the great atonement which, in the fulness of time, should be presented to God for the sins of man. By his faith he was accepted as "righteousness by faith." God testified, probably by some visible sign—the sending of fire from heaven to consume the victim (a token that justice had seized upon the sacrifice instead of the sinner)—that the gift was accepted. Cain had no faith: his offering was not indicative of this principle. Although it is doubtful whether we can render the clause in God's excommunication with him—"sin lieth at the door."—by the words, "a sin-offering lieth or croucheth at the door," that is, a sin-offering is easily procured, yet the sin of Cain is clearly pointed out; for though he was not a keeper of sheep, yet a victim whose blood could be shed as a typical propitiation could without difficulty have been provided and presented. The truth is, much taught in this important event are, confession of sin; acknowledgment that the penalty of sin is death; submission to an appointed mode of expiation; the vicarious offering of animal sacrifice, typical of the better sacrifice of the Seed of the woman; the efficacy of faith in Christ's sacrifice to obtain pardon, and to admit the guilty into divine favor (Westley, Notes on Heb. xi. 4). The difference between the two offerings is clearly and well put by Dr. Magee (On the Atonement, i. 58-61): "Abel, in firm reliance on the promise of God, and in obedience to his command, offered that sacrifice which had been enjoined as the religious expression of his faith; while Cain, disregarding the gracious assurances which had been vouchsafed, or, at least, disdaining to adopt the prescribed method of manifesting his belief, possibly as not appearing to his reason to possess any efficacy or natural fitness, thought he had sufficiently acquitted himself of his duty in acknowledging the general superintendence of God, and expending a tender gratitude to the Divine Benefactor, by presenting some of those good things which he thereby confessed to have been derived from His bounty. In short, Cain, the first-born of the fall, exhibits the first-fruits of his parents' disobedience, in the arrogance and self-sufficiency of reason, rejecting the sacrifice, not because they felt an apprehension of right. He takes the first place in the annals of Deism, and displays, in his proud rejection of the ordinance of sacrifice, the same spirit which, in later days, has actuated his enlightened followers in rejecting the sacrifices of Christ." See SACRIFICE. There are several references to Abel in the New Testament. Our Saviour designates him "righteous." (Matt. xxiii., 35; comp. 1 John, iii. 12). He ranks among the illustrious elders mentioned in Heb. xi. According to Heb. xii, 24, while the blood of sprinkling speaks for the remission of sins, the blood of Abel for vengeance: the blood of sprinkling speaks of mercy, the blood of Abel for the malice of the human heart. the fruit of the earth, justice, ii. 174, 191; Whately, Prolegomena, p. 29; Horne, Life and Death of Abel, Works, 1812, vol. iv.; Hunter, Sacred Geography, p. 17 sq.; Robinson, Script. Abel, Thomas. See Able.

A'bel- (Heb. 'Abel), a name of several villages in Palestine, with additions in the case of the more important, to distinguish them from one another (see each in its alphabetical order). From a comparison of the Arabic and Syriac, it appears to mean from green grass; and the places so named may be conceived to have been in peculiarly verdant situations (Genesius, Thee. Heb. p. 14; see, however, other significations in Lengerke, Xenæus, i., 358; Hengstenberg, Penn., ii., 261.). See Abel. Abel as the name of an aged man, 18, it is used as an appellative, and probably signifies a gr unny plain. In this passage, however, perhaps we should read (as in the margin) stone, instead of ┬ localize Able, or meadow, as the context (verses 14, 15) requires, and the Sept. and Syriac versions explain; the awkward insertion of our translators, "the great [stone] of Abel," would thus be unnecessary.

In 2 Sam. xx, xx. , Abel stands alone for Abel-Beth-Maachah (q. v.).

See Abel, Abel-Beth-Maachah.

Abéard, Pierre (or Abaéard, Abaillad, Abelhardus), born at Le Pallet, or Palais, near Nantes, 1578, was a man of the most subtle genius, and the father of the so-called scholastic theology. In many respects he was far in advance of his age. After a very careful education, he spent part of his youth in the army, and then turned his attention to theological studies. He was one of the first to study the history of age, the celebrated Roscelin, of Compiegne. He left Palais before he was twenty years of age, and went to Paris, where he became a pupil of William of Champeaux, a teacher of logic and philosophy of the highest reputation. At first the favorite disciple, by degrees Abelard became the rival, and finally the antagonist of Champeaux. To escape the persecution of his former master, Abelard, at the age of twenty-two, removed to Melun, and established himself there as a teacher, with great success. Thence he removed to Corbeil, where his labors seem to have injured his health; and he sought repose and restoration by retirement to Palais, where he remained a few years, and then returned to Paris. The controversy was then renewed, and continued till Champeaux's scholars deserted him, and he retired to a monastery. Abelard, having paid a visit to his mother at Palais, found on his return to Paris in 1113 that Champeaux had been made Bishop of St.-Chapelle-sur-Marne. He recommended the study of divinity under Anselm at Laon. Here also the pupil became the rival of his master, and Anselm at length had him expelled from Laon, when he returned to Paris, and established a school of divinity, which was still more numerous attended than his former schools had been. Gaucelm Faidit, sent by the student of the sacred school, was trained at the apos (Coesstene II), nineteen cardinals, more than fifty bishops and archbishops, French, English, and German; and a much larger number of those men with whom popes, bishops, and cardinals had often to contend, such men as Arnold of Brescia, and many others. The number of pupils who used at that time to assemble round Abelard has been estimated at upward of 5000.

Abelard was about thirty-five when he formed an acquaintance with Héloïse, the niece of Fulbert, a canon in the Cathedral of Paris. She was probably under twenty. He contracted with her a secret and unlawful connexion, the fruit of which was a son named Peter Astralous. Soon after Abelard married Héloïse; but the marriage was kept secret, and, at the suggestion of Abelard, Héloïse retired into the convent of Argenteuil, near Paris, where she had been, as a child, brought up. The relatives of Héloïse, enraged at this, and believing that the lord had deceived them, revenged themselves by inflicting the severest personal injuries upon him. He then, being forty years old, took the monastic vows at St. Denis, and persuaded Héloïse to do the same at Argenteuil. From this time he devoted himself to the study of theology, and, before long published his work "Introductio ad Theologian, in which he spoke of the Trinity in so subtle a manner that he was openly taxed with heresy. Upon this he was cited to appear before a council held at Soissons, in 1121, by the pope's legate, where, although he was convicted of no error, nor was any examination made of his Ecloga, but his book was confiscated, his book with his own hands. After a brief detention at the abbey of St. Medard, he returned to his monastery, where he quarrelled with his abbot, Adamus, and the other monks (chiefly because he was too good a critic to admit that Dionysius, the patron saint of France, had written his Ecloga with the regapotic of the same name mentioned in the Acts), and retired to a solitude near Nogent-sur-Seine, in the diocese of Troyes, where, with the consent of the bishop, Hatto, he built an oratory in the name of the Most Holy Trinity, which he called Paraclete, and dwelt there with another cleric and his pupils, who soon gathered around him again. His hearers, at various periods, were numbered by thousands. Being called from his retreat (A.D. 1125) by the monks of St. Gildas, in Bretagne, who had elected him their abbot, he abode for some time with them, but was at length compelled to flee from the monastery (about 1134) to escape their wicked designs upon his life, and took up his abode in Paraclete, where Hilse and her nuns were at that time. About the year 1140, the old charge of heresy was renewed against him, and by no less an accuser than the celebrated Bernard of Clairvaux, who was his opponent in the council held at Sens in that year. Abelard, seeing that he could not expect his cause to receive a fair hearing, appealed to Rome, and at once set out upon his journey thither. Happening, however, on his route, to pass through Cluny, he was kindly received by the abbot, Peter the Venerable, by whom his means he was reconciled to Bernard, and finally determined to pass the remainder of his days at Cluny. He died April 51, 1142, aged sixty-three years, at the monastery of S. Marco, whither he had been sent for his health.

As Bernard was the representative of Church authority in that age, so Abelard was the type of the new school of free inquiry, and of the use of reason in theology. His philosophy was chiefly, if not wholly, dialectical. In the controversy between the Schoolmen and the Nominalists he could be classed with neither; his position was the intermediate one denoted by the modern term Conceptualism. In theology he professed to agree with the Church doctrines, and quoted Augustine, Jerome, and the fathers generally, as authorities; and at the same time, that it was the province of reason to develop and vindicate the doctrines themselves.

"At the request of his hearers he published his Introductio ad Theologian; but in accordance with the stand-point of theological science in that age, the idea of Theologia was confined, and embraced only Dogmatics. The work was originally, and remained a mere fragment of the doctrines of religion. He agreed so far with Anselm's principles as to assert that the Incarnation can only develop what is given in the Fides; but he differs in determining the manner in which Fides is brought into existence; nor does he recognize the whole limits of speculative theology; in some points, he goes beyond the doctrinal belief of the Church; yet the tendency of the rational element lying at the basis, and his method of applying it, are different. The former was checked in its logical development by the limits set to it in the Creed of the Church, and many things are included in the terms of the moment. The work not only created a prodigious sensation, but also showed traces of a preceding hostility."

He treated the doctrine of the Trinity (in his Theologia Christiana) very boldly, assuming "unity in the Divine Being, along with diversity in his relations (rationem diversitatem), in which consist the Divine Persons. He also maintains a cognition of God (as the most perfect and absolutely independent Being), by means of which, he subscribes to the heathen philosophers, without derogating from the incomprehensibility of God. He also attempted to explain (in his Ecloga), and to establish, the principal conceptions of theological morality, as, for instance, the notions of vice and virtue. He made both to consist in the mental resolution, or in the intention; and maintained, against the moral conviction of his age, that no natural pleasures or sensual desires are in themselves sinful. He also discovered and defined the essence of the morality of actions in the frame of mind and maxims according to which those actions are undertaken."

A pretty clear view of Abelard's theology is given by Neander, Hist. of Christian Dogmas, 478 sq. (transl. by Ryland., Lond. 1858, 2 vols,). Abelard founded no school, in the proper sense of the word; the results of his labors were critical and destructive, rather than positive. The later scholastics, however, who were greatly indebted to him, especially as to form and method. His writings are as follows: Epistola ad Helierum, 4; Epistola ad diversis; Historia Calixtinum surnum, Apologia; Expositio Orations Domincae; Expositio in hymnorum Aposostorum; Expositio in Symbolum Athanasii; Sententiae ProĘblemata; Commentarium in Epistolam ad Romanas, libri 5; Commentarii in libros dogmatis; De Hilo et ejusque Virginitate Paracletinae; Introductio ad Theologian, libri 3; Epitome Theologia Christiana.

The philosophy and theology of Abelard have been recently brought into notice anew; in fact, the means of studying them fully have only of late been afforded by the following publications, viz. A. Abala's Epitome Theologia Christiana, nunc primum edidit F. H. Rheinwald (Berlin, 1885); Cousin's edition of his Oeuvres inédites (Paris, 1856, 4to); by the excellent Vie d'Abelard, par C. Remusat (Paris, 1845, 2 vols.); and by P. Abelardii Sic et non, primum ed. Henke et Lindenkohl (Marsburg, 1851, 8vo). The professedly complete edition of his works by A. B. (Paris, 1816, 4to) does not contain the Sic et Non. Migne's edition (Patrologia, tom. 175) is expurgated of certain antipapal tendencies. An edition was begun in 1849 by MM. Cousin, Jouürand, and Despees; but only two vols., out, were published, being after a short time. Two Letters of Abelard and Heloise (Lond. 1874, 4to); Nean- der, Ch. Hist. iv. 373; Metz. Quart. Rev. articles In- stauratio Novo, July and Oct. 1853; Böhringer, Kir- cheng. in Biog. vol. iv.; Presb. A'bel-beth-ma'aklah (Heb. Abel Beth-Maakah, נב אל בִּית-מָאָה, Abell Beth-Maachah; Sept. Αβιλ δικαίου Maych 1 in 1 Kings xvi, 20, Aβηλ Βαβδα- αχα in 2 Kings xx, 29, ατηβέλ νομίσματοι in 2 Kings xx, 29, a city in the north of Palestine, in the neighborhood of Dan, Kadesh, and Hazor. It seems to have been of considerable strength from its history, and of importance from its being called "mother of Israel" (1 Sam. xxv, 10), i.e., a metropolis; for the same place is doubtless there meant, although peculiarly expressed (ver. 14, פִּנְיָה פַּנְיָה, toward Abel and Beth-Maachah, Sept. οις τις οις Βαβδα- αχα, Vulg. in Abelam et Beth- Maachah, Russ. Vers. "unto Abel and to Beth-Maachah;" ver. 15, פִּנְיָה פַּנְיָה, in Abelok, in house of Maackah, Sept. in Βαβδα-αρχα, Vulg. inABELA in Beth-Maachah, Russ. Vers. "in Abel of Beth-maachah"). See BETH-MAACHAH. The same place is likewise once denoted simply by Abel (2 Sam. xx, 49); and in the parallel passage (2 Chron. xxvi, 4),
ABEL-CERAMIM

ABEL-MAIM, which indicates the proximity of a fountain or of springs from which the meadow, doubtless, derived its verdure. See Abela.

The addition of "Maashach" marks it as belonging to, or being near to, the region Maashach, which lay eastward of the Jordan under Mount Lebanon. See Maachah. It was besieged by Joab on account of its having sheltered Sheba, the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, who had rebelled against David; but was saved from an assault by the "prevalence" of the place, who persuaded the men to put the traitor to death, and to throw his head over the wall; upon which the siege was immediately raised (2 Sam. xx, 14-22). At a later date it was taken and sacked by Benhadad, king of Syria; and 200 years subsequently by Tiglath-pileser, who sent away the inhabitants captive into Assyria (2 Kings xx, 29). The name Belimim (Belaim), mentioned in Judith (iv, 4), has been thought a corruption of Abel-maim; but the place there spoken of appears to have been much more southward. Josephus (Ant. vii, 11, 7) calls it Abel-maashech (אֵלֶם-מַשְּחֵה), or (Ant. viii, 12, 4) Ablémene (אָבֵלֶמֶנֶה), and Valerius Flaccus (Georg. II. 340) says it was still named Abela (אֵבֶלֶה). Reland (Palest., p. 520) thinks it is the third of the cities called Abela, mentioned by Eusebius (Onomast.), as a Phoenician city between Damascus and Paneas; but Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 15) objects that it need not be located in Galilee (Hazana, in the Nw. Macel. Lips. iv, 470), and abounds in loci in the Nw. (Kings xv, 29) called Abel-beth-Maachah (q. v.).

ABELMAACHAH. See Abel-beth-Maachah.

ABEL-ma'am (Heb. Abel Mis'imm, אֵבֵל מִשְּמַי, meadow of water; Sept. Α'βαλαμίαν, Vulg. Abelaiman), one of the Naphthali captured by Bendahad (2 Chron. xxxiv, 6); also mentioned to belong to the kings (Kings xv, 29) called Abel-beth-Maachah (q. v.)

ABELMA. See Abel-melahah.

ABEL-melahah (Heb. Abel Melekhah, אֵבֵל מֵלֶכָּה, meadow of a king; Sept. Α'βαλομηλακα and Α'βαλομηλακα, Vulg. Abelmelachus and Abelimeleach), a place not far from the confines of Issachar and Manasseh, in the vicinity of Beth-shittah, Zeredah, and Tabbath, with Tabith Gideon's three hundred picked men pursued the routed Midianites (Judg. vii, 22). It was the birthplace or residence of Eliah the prophet (1 Kings xii, 16), and lay not far from Beth-shean (1 Kings iv, 19), and on the road from Eusebius (Onomast. Βαλόμηλα), in the plain of the Jordan, 16 (Jerome 10) Roman miles south, probably the same with the village Abilmes mentioned by Jerome (ibid. Eusebius less correctly 'Αβιλεκά as situated between Scythopolis (Bethshan) and Neapolis (Shechem). It is also alluded to by Epiphanius (whose text has inaccurately Αμάλκην Αβίλομήλακα). Herostratus long since indicates it in the tribe of Reuben, and (as Αβιλομήλακα) in the Pachai Chronicle (see Reland, Palest. p. 522). It was probably situated not far from where the Wady el-Malch (which seems to retain a trace of the name) emerges into the Aulon or valley of the Jordan; perhaps at the ruins now called Kurbet el-Sheik, which are on an undulating plain beside a stream (Van de Veldes, Narrative, ii, 340). This appears to agree with the conjectural location assigned by Schwartz (Palest. p. 169), although the places he names do not occur on any map.

ABELITES, BELISAIS, or ABELONIANS, a sect of heretics who appeared in the diocese of Hippo, in Africa, about the year 580. They insisted upon marriage, but permitted no carnal conversation between man and wife, following, as they said, the example of Abel, and the prohibition in Gen. ii. 17. When a man and woman entered their sect they were obliged to adopt a boy and girl, who succeeded to all their property, and were united together in marriage in the church. Augustine says (De Haer. cap. 8) that in his time they had become extinct. The whole sect was at last reduced to a single village, which returned to the Church. This strange sect is, to some extent, reproduced in the modern day Shakers.—Moisiou, Ch. Hist. c. ii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 18.

ABELLI, Louis, Bishop of Rodez (South France), was born at Vez, 1604. He was made bishop in 1664, but resigned in three years, to become a monk in the convent of St. Lazare, at Paris. He was a violent opponent of the Jansenists, and author of a system of Doctrinal Theology, entitled Medulla Theolologica (re-published in Mayence, 1833), and also of Vie de St. Vincent de Paul, 4to. He was an ardent advocate of the worship of the Virgin Mary, and wrote, in its defence, La Tradition des Nefas de la Vierge, 1699, 8vo. He died in his convent in 1691.

ABEL-MAIM (Heb. Abel Mis'mim, אֵבֵל מִשְּמַי, meadow of water; Sept. Α'βαλαμίαν, Vulg. Abelaiman), one of the Naphthali captured by Bendadad (2 Chron. xxxiv, 6); also mentioned to belong to the kings (Kings xv, 29) called Abel-beth-Maachah (q. v.).

ABEL-MELOHAH (Heb. Abel Melekhah, אֵבֵל מֵלֶכָּה, meadow of a king; Sept. Α'βαλομηλακα and Α'βαλομηλακα, Vulg. Abelmelachus and Abelimeleach), a place not far from the confines of Issachar and Manasseh, in the vicinity of Beth-shittah, Zeredah, and Tabbath, with Tabith Gideon's three hundred picked men pursued the routed Midianites (Judg. vii, 22). It was the birthplace or residence of Eliah the prophet (1 Kings xii, 16), and lay not far from Beth-shean (1 Kings iv, 19), and on the road from Eusebius (Onomast. ABEL-MIR'.im (Heb. Abel Mitera'im, אֵבֵל מִטְרְאִים, meadow of Egypt; but which should probably be pointed אֵבֵל מְטְרָאִים, E'bel Mitera'im, mourning of the Egyptians, as in the former part of the same verse; and so appear to have read the Sept. περίθοις ἀγαθοντος, and, in the Vulgate, a place beyond (i.e. on the west bank of) the Jordan, occupied (perhaps subsequently) by the threshing-floor of Atad, where the Egyptians performed their seven days' mourning ceremonies over the embalmed body of Jacob prior to interment (Gen. i. 11). See Atad. Jerome (Onomast. Area Atad places it between Jericho and the Jordan, at three Roman miles distance from the former and two from the latter, corresponding (Reland, Palest. p. 522) to the later site of Beth-hoaghah (q. v.).

ABEL-SHITTIM

(Abel-shittim) (Heb.ABEL-shittim; אֶבֶל שִׁתִּית, meadows of the acacias; Sept. Ἀβελσιττή, Vulg. Abel-sarrim), a town in the plains of Moab, on the east of the Jordan, between which and Beth-del-moth was the last encampment of the Israelites on their passage into the Promised Land (Num. xxxiii. 49). See EXOD. The place is noted for the severe punishment which was there inflicted upon the Israelites when they were seduced into the worship of Baal-peor, through their evil intercourse with the Moabites and Midianites. See BAAL.

Eusebius (Onomast. Sign.1) says it was situated on the coast of the Dead Sea, about twenty miles from the Red Sea (Pallad. § 93). In the time of Josephus it was a town embossed in palms, still known as Abila or Abila (Ἀβιλα or Ἀβιλα), and stood sixty stadia from the Jordan (Ant. iv. 8, 1; v. 1, 1). Rabbinical authorities assign it the same relative position (Schwarz, Palest. p. 229). It is more frequently called Shittim merely (Num. xxxv. 1; Josh. ii. 1; Mic. vi. 5). From the above notices (which all refer to the sojourn of the Israelites there), it appears to have been situated nearly opposite Jericho, in the eastern plain of Jordan, about where Wady Seir opens into the Ghor. The acacia-groves on both sides of the Jordan still “mark with a line of verdure the upper terraces of his valley” (Stanley, Palæstina, p. 299), and doubtless gave name to this place (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, ii. 37).

Abedana (i. e. Son of Dana), Jacob, a Jewish rabbi, born in Spain about 1630, died in London in 1696. He was rabbi first in Amsterdam, and from 1686 till his death in London. He translated into Spanish the book of Cusari as well as the Mishna, with the commentaries of Maimonides and Bartenora. His Spicilegium rerum perserratae de inferioremimorum contains valuable philological and critical notes to the celebrated Michal Jophi (Amsterdam, 1685). A selection from his works appeared after his death, under the title Discourses of the Ecclesiastical and Civil Polity of the Jews (Lond. 1706).

Aben-Ezra (otherwise Aben-Edra, or Ibn-Edra, properly, Abrahæm Ben-Meyr), a celebrated Spanish rabbi, called by the Jews the Sage, the Great, etc., was born at Toledo in 1062. Little is known of his early life; but he was a learned and stedent, and was at once philosopher, mathematician, and theologian. His fame for varied and accurate learning was very great in his own day, and has survived, worthy, to the present age. He died at Rome, Jan. 28, 1157. De Rosel, in his Hist. Dict. of Hebrew Writers (Parma, 1802), reproduces a great part of the writings attributed to him. Many of them still exist only in MS. A list of those that have been published, with the various editions and translations, is given by Furtâ in his Biblioteca Judaica (Lpz. 1849, i. 251 sq.). A work on astronomy, entitled הַבָּנֶה לְמִסְפָּר (the Beginning of Wisdom), partly translated from the Arabic and partly compiled by himself, greatly contributed to establish his reputation (a Latin translation of it is given in Wolf, Bibliotheca Hebraica, t. iii). He also wrote a “Commentary on the Talmud,” and another work on the importance of the Talmud, entitled הַבָּנֶה לְמִסְפָּר (the Basis of Instruction), several times printed (in German, F. ad M. 1810). His most important work consists of “Commentaries on the Old Testament” (פַּסְפָּר לְלָשׁוֹן הָלֹאָך, in several parts), a work full of erudition. Bomberg, Buxtorf, and Moses Frankfurter included it in their edition of the Hebrew text, and added it to the Bible (Venice, 1526; Basel, 1618-19; Amst. 1724-7). His “Commentary on the Pentateuch” (פַּסְפָּר לְלָשׁוֹן הָלֹאָך) is very rare in its original form (fol. Naples, 1488; Constantinople, 1514), but it has often been reprinted combined with other matter, overlaedy by later annotations, or in fragmentary form. None of the other portions of his great commentary have been published separately from the Rabbinical Bibles, except in detached parts, and then usually with other matter and translated. Aben-Ezra usually wrote in the vulgar Hebrew or Jewish dialect; but that he was perfectly familiar with the original Hebrew is shown by some poems and other little pieces which are found in the preface to his commentaries. The works of Aben-Ezra are thoroughly philosophical, and show a great acquaintance with physical and natural science. He also wrote several works on Hebrew Grammar (especially יִנָּה וְשָׁמַר, Augs. 1521, 8vo; וַיְהִי, Ven. 1546, 8vo; וַיְהִי יִנָּה, Consl. 1530, 8vo), most of which have been re-edited (by Lippmann, Heidenheim, etc.) with Heb. annotations. Some of his arithmetical and astronomical works have been translated into Latin.—Hoefcr, Biographie Générale.

Abercrombie, James, D.D., an Episcopal divine and accomplished scholar, was born in Philadelphia in 1758, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, 1776. He then studied theology, but, on account of an injury to his eyes, he entered into mercantile pursuits in 1782. In 1785 he was ordained, and became associate pastor of Christ Church in 1794. From 1810 to 1819 he was principal of the Philadelphia Academy. In 1823 he resigned on a pension granted at Philadelphia, June 56, 1841, the oldest preacher of that Church in the city. He was distinguished as well for eloquence and liberality as for learning. He wrote Lectures on the Catechism (1807), and published a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, v, 384.

Abercrombie, John, D.M., author of Enquiries concerning the Intellectual Powers, published 1805; and the Philosophy of the Moral Feelings, published 1838, was born at Aberdeen, Nov. 11, 1781, and attained the highest rank as a practical and consulting physician at Edinburgh. He became Lord Rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen, 1855. Besides the works above named, he wrote Essays and Tracts on Christian Subjects (Edinb. 1800); Harmony of Christian Faith and Character (reprint from preceding, N. Y. 1845, 18mo). He died Nov. 14, 1844.—Quart. Rev. xlv, 341.

Aberdeen (Aberdonia Deurno), the seat of a Scotch bishopric, formerly suffragan to the Archbishopric of St. Andrew. The bishopric was transferred to Aberdeen about the year 1360, by King David, from Murrithlack, now Mortlach, which had been erected into an episcopacy in the year 1101. It continued as such to the year 1010, Bencus, or Benv, being the first bishop.

Aberdeen, Breedvaw of. While Romanism prevailed in Scotland, the Church of Aberdeen had, like many others, its own rites. The misal, according to Palmer, has never been published; but an edition of the breviary was printed in 1599. —Palmer, Orig. Liturg. i. 198, where also Eusebius, Biblioth.bishop. tom. i; A. Butler, Lives of Saints, i. 113.

Abernethy, John, an eminent Presbyterian divine, educated at the University of Glasgow, and afterward at Edinburgh. Born at Coleraine, in Ireland, 1680; became minister at Antrim in 1708, and labored zealously for twenty years, especially in behalf of the Roman Catholics. The subscription controversy, which was revived in Scotland by Bishop Hankey, the famous Bishop of Dungarvan, and the agitation of whichkindled the flames of party strife in Ireland also, having led to the rupture of the Presbytery of Antrim from the General Synod in 1726, Abernethy, who was a warm supporter of the liberal principals of HoAdy, lost a large number of his people; and in the formation of a new congregation, he felt his usefulness so greatly contracted that, on his services being solicited by a church in Wood Street, Dublin, he determined to accept their invitation. Applying himself with renewed energy to his ministerial work, he soon collected a numerous congregation. His constitution failed under his excessive labors, and he died suddenly in December, 1740. His discourses on the beings and attributes of God have always been held in much esteem. His works are: 1. Discourses on the Divine Nature and Attributes of God (Lond. 1746, 2 vols., 8vo); 2. Sermons on various Subjects (Lond. 1747, 3 vols., 8vo); 3. Tracts and Sermons (Lond. 1751, 8vo).

Abesar. See Abez.

Abest. See Avesta.

Abeyance signifies expectancy, probably from the French bayer, to gape after. Lands, dwelling-houses, or goods, are said to be in abeyance when they are only in expectation, or the intention of the law, and not actually possessed. In the Church of England, when a living has become vacant, between such time and the institution of the next incumbent, it is in abeyance. It belongs to no parson, but is kept suspended, as it were, in the purpose, as yet undeclared, of the patron.

A'bez (Heb. A'bet, אֲבֶז, in pause אֲבֶז, A'etz, i.e., and hence, perhaps, i.e., Sept. 'Ayzig, Vulg. Abes), a town in the tribe of Issachar, apparently near the border, mentioned between Kishon and Remeth (Josh. xix. 20). It is probably the Abeser (A'itezarop) mentioned by Josephus (Ant. vi, 13, 8) as the native city of the wife whom David had married prior to Abigail. It was the scene of the deposition of Michael; possibly referring to Abinadab the Hezreelites (1 Sam. xxxv. 43), as if she had been so called as having resided in some town of the valley of Edeselon. According to Schwartz (Palest. p. 167), "it is probably the village of Kavoiz, called also Kerm en-Ahi, which lies three English miles west-south-west from Eka;" meaning the Khamesi or Ulhmasi of Robinson (Researches, iii, 167, 218), which is in the general locality indicated by the associated names.

Abgarus (Abgarus, Abgarus; sometimes derived from the Arabic Akbar, "greater," but better from the Armenian Arag, "great," and airm, "man," see Ersch and Gruber, s. v., Abgar), the common name of the petty princes (or Toparchs) who ruled at Edessa in Mesopotamia, of one of whom there is an Eastern tradition, recorded by Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. i, 13), that he wrote a letter to Christ, who transmitted a reply. Eusebius gives copies of both letters, as follows: Abgarus, Prince of Edessa, to Jesus, the merciful Savior, who has appeared in the country of Jerusalem, greeting. I have been informed of prodigies and cures wrought by you without the use of herbs or medicines, and by the efficacy only of your words. I am told that you enable cripples to walk; that you force devils from the bodies possessed; that there is no disease, however incurable, which you do not heal, and that you restore the dead to life. These wonders persuade me that you are some god descended from heaven, or that you are the Son of God. For this reason I have taken the liberty of writing this letter to you, beseeching you to come and see me, and to cure me of the indisposition under which I have so long labored. I understand that the Jews persecute you, murmuring at your miracles, and seek your destruction. I have here a beautiful and agreeable city, though it be not very large, will be sufficient to supply you with every thing that is necessary.

To this letter it is said Jesus Christ returned him an answer in the following terms: "You are happy, Abgarus, to have believed in me without having seen me; for it is written of me, that they who shall see me will not believe in me, and that they who have never seen me shall believe and be saved. As to the desire you express in receiving a visit from me, I must tell you that all things for which I am come must be fulfilled in the country where I am; when this is done, it return to him who sent me. When I am departed hence, I will send to you one of my disciples, who will cure you of the disease of which you complain, and give life to you and to those that are with you." According to Moses of Chorene (died 470), the reply was written by the Apostle Thomas.

Eusebius further states that, after the ascension of Christ, Abgarus sent Thaddeus, one of the seventy, to Abgarus, who cured him of leprosy, and converted him, together with his subjects. The documents from which this narrative is drawn were found by Eusebius in the archives of Edessa. Moses of Chorene relates further that Abgarus, after his conversion, wrote letters in defence of Christianity to the Emperor Theodosius and to the king of Persia. It is also the first who mentions that Christ sent to Abgarus, together with a reply, a handkerchief impressed with his portrait. The letter of Christ to Abgarus was declared apocryphal by the Council of Rome, A.D. 494, but in the Greek Church many continued to believe in its authenticity, and the people of Edessa believed that their city was made unconquerable by the possession of this palladium. The original is said to have later been brought to Constantinople. In modern times, the correspondence of Abgarus, as well as the portrait of Christ, are generally regarded as forgeries; yet the authenticity of the letters is defended by Tillemont, Millet, Mermet, Servais &c.; and several writers of the fifteenth century, as well as several others. Two churches, St. Sylvester's at Rome, and a church of Genoa, professed each to have the original of the portrait. A beautiful copy of the portrait in Rome is given in W. Grimm, Die Zeugen vom Ursprung der Christusbilder (Berlin, 1843). The authenticity of the portrait in Genoa is defended by the Mechiatar, M. Samuelian. Hefele puts its origin in the fifteenth century, but believes it to be the copy of an older portrait. See the treatises on this subject, in Latin, by Fraendendorff (Lips. 1695), Albinus (Viteb. 1654), E. Dalhaise (Hafn. 1659), Schulze (Regiom. 1736); Semler (Hal. 1739); Heino (Hal. 1768); Zeller (Franf. ed. O. 1798); in German, by Hartmann (Jena, 1786); Rink (in the Merchengblatt, 1819, No. 110, and in Ilgen's Zeit.achrift, 1843, ii, 3-26); and comp. Bayer, Hist. Edessanae, p. 104 sqq., 358 sqq. See also, Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 80; Mosheim, Comm. Hist. i, 99, ed. 1786, 506; Stru. ut. A. 1808, iii; and the articles Christus, Images of. Ap'bi (Heb. Ab'i, עָבִי, my father, or rather father of [see Abi-] Sept. 'Abi, Vulg. Abi), a shortened form (comp. 2 Chron. xxix, i) of Abi'ail (q. v.), the name of the mother of King Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 2, where the full form is also read in some MSS.).

Abi- (עָבִי, an old construct form of עָבָה, as is evident from its use in Hebrew and all the cognate languages), forms the first part of several Hebrew proper names (Bib. Repos. 1846, p. 760); e. g. those following. See Abi-.

Abi'a (עָבִיָא, a Grecized form of the name Abi'ah (Matt. i, 7; Luke i, 6). It also occurs (1 Chron. iii, 10) instead of Abiai (q. v.).

Abi'ah, a less correct mode (1 Sam. viii, 2; 1 Chron. ii, 4; vi, 29; viii, 7) of Anglicizing the name Abi'el (q. v.).

Abi'al-bone (Heb. Ab'i'elbon, עָבִיָא מִבְּנֵי, father of strength, i.e. valiant; Sept. 'Ael 'Abiielbon, Vulg. Abialbon), one of David's bodyguard (2 Sam. xxiii, 31); called also in the parallel passage (1 Chron. xi, 32) by the equivalent name Abiel (q. v.).

Abi'asaph (Heb. Abi'saph, עָבִיָא, father of gathering, i.e. gatherer; Sept. 'Aiasaph, Vulg. Abiasaph), the youngest of the three sons of Korah the Levite (Exod. vi, 24); B.C. post 1740. He is different from the Eliaaph of 1 Chron. vi, 29, 37; xx, 19. See Samuel.
ABIATHAR 15 ABIEZER

ABIATHAR (Heb. Abiathar), אֵבִּיתָר, father of abundance, i. e. liberal; Sept. 'Aḇiṭṭuwr or 'Aḇiṭṭuwr, N. T. 'Aḇiṭṭuwr, Josephus 'Aḇiṭṭuwr), the thirteenth high-priest of the Jews, being the son of Ahimelech, and the third in descent from Eli; B.C. 1060-1012. When his father was slain with the priests of Nob, for suspected partiality to David, Abiathar escaped; and being with him the most excellent of David's persons, in regard to his nobleness, and his worthiness of preferment [see Ephod], repaired to the son of Jesse, who was then in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii, 20-23; xxiii, 6). He was well received by David, and became the priest of the party during its exile and wanderings, receiving for David responses from God (1 Sam. xxviii, 6, 9; 2 Sam. ii, 1, 21). The cause of this strong attachment on the part of the monarch was the feeling that he had been unintentionally the cause of the death of Abiathar's kindred. When David became king of Judah he appointed Abiathar high-priest (see 1 Chron. xvi, 11; 1 Kings ii, 26), and a maidservant was made his private attendant (1 Chron. xxvii, 34). Mean-while Zadok had been made chief-priest by Saul—an appointment not only unprecedented in itself, but in accordance with the divine sentence of deposition which had been passed, through Samuel, upon the house of Eli (1 Sam. ii, 30-36). When, therefore, David acquired the kingdom of Israel, he had no just ground on which to question Zadok's right to his priestly office, and Abiathar set in his place; and the attempt would probably have been offensive to his new subjects, who had been accustomed to the ministration of Zadok, and whose good feeling he was anxious to cultivate. The king appears to have got over this difficulty by allowing both appointments to stand; and until the end of David's reign Zadok and Abiathar were joint high-priests (1 Kings iv, 4). As a high-priest, Abiathar was the least excusable, in some respects, of all those who were parties in the attempt to raise Adonijah to the throne (1 Kings i, 19); and Solomon, in deposing him from the high-priesthood, plainly told him that only his sacerdotal character, and his former services to David, preserved him from capital punishment (1 Kings ii, 26, 27). This completed the doom upon the house of Eli, and restored the pontifical succession—Zadok, who remained the high-priest, being of the elder line of Aaron's sons. See ELZEVAR.

In Mark ii, 26, a circumstance is described as occurring "in the days of Abiathar the high-priest" (καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἡμετέροις τοῦ Ἀβιαθάρου ὁ ἅγιος τῆς ἐκκλησίας), a phrase that is susceptible of the rendering, in the [time of] Abiathar, [the son of] the high-priest, (which appears, from 1 Sam. xxvi, i, to have really occurred when his father Ahimelech was the high-priest. The most probable solution of this difficulty (but see Alford's Comment. in loc.) is that which interprets the reference thus: "in the days of Abiathar, who was afterward the high-priest" (Middleton, Greek Article, p. 188-190). But this leaves open another difficulty, which arises from the precisely opposite reference (in 2 Sam. viii, 17; 1 Chron. xviii, 16; xxiv, 8, 9, 31) to "the Ahimelech of Abiathar" (or Abimelech) the son of Abiathar," as the person who was high-priest along with Zadok, and who was deposed by Solomon; whereas the history describes that personage as Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech. Another explanation is, that both father and son bore the two names of Abimelech and Abiathar, and might be, and were, called by either (J. C. Lumsden, Ezech. 20, 65, 3; Zech. xiii, 6). But although it was not unusual for the Jews to have two names, it was not usual for both father and son to have the same two names. Others suppose a second Abiathar, the father of Abimelech, and some even a son of the same name; but these opinions are warranted by the text, nor allowable in the list of high-priests. See HIGH-PRIEST. The names have probably become transposed by copyists, for the Syriac and Arabic versions have "Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech." The mention of Abiathar in the apocryphal sage of Mark, rather than the acting priest Ahimelech, may have arisen from the greater prominence of the former in the history of David's reign, and he appears even at that time to have been with his father, and to have had some part in the pontifical duties. In additional explanation of the other difficulty above referred to, it is suggested as not unlikely that Abimelech may have been the name of one of Abiathar's sons likewise associated with him, as well as that of his father, and that copyists have confounded these names together.—Kitto, s.v. See AHIMELECH.

Aḇib (Heb. Aḇīḇ, אֹבִיב, from an obsolete root אָבָב, נָעַב, to fructify), properly, a head or ear of grain (Lev. ii, 14, "green cars;" Exod. xiii, 31, "ear"); hence, the month of newly-ripened grain (Exod. xiii, 4; xxiii, 15; xxxiv, 15; Deut. xvi, 1), the first of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, afterward (Heb. ii, 1) called Nisan (q. v.). It began with the new moon of March, according to the Rabbinins (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 3), or rather of April, according to Michaelis (Comment. de Mensibus Hebrœis, comp. his Commentat. Brevern. 1709, p. 16 sq.) at which time the first grain ripens in Palestine (Robinson's Researches, ii, 99, 100). See MORD. Hence it is to be regarded as a specific name of a month, but rather as a designation of the season; as the Sept., Vulg., and Suidas have well rendered, in Exod. xiii, 4, "the month of the new grain;" less correctly the Syriac, "the month of flowers" (comp. Bochart, Hieroz. i, 557). Others (as A. Müller, Gloss. Sacc., p. 2) regard the name as derived from the eleventh Egyptian month, "Nisannu," in the Egyptian calendar, de Iside, p. 372; but this corresponds neither to March or April, but to July (Fabrici Memorandorum, p. 22-27; Jablonsky, Opusc. ed. Water, i, 65 sq.). See TEL-ABIB.

Abibas, a martyr of Edessa, burned in 322, under the Emperor Licinius. He is commemorated in the Greek Church, as a saint, on 15th November.

Aḇīḏa [many Abiḏa] (Heb. Aḇīḏa, אָבִידָא, father of knowledge, i. e. knowing; 1 Chron. i, 28, Sept. Aḇiḏā; Gen. xxiv, 4, Aḇiḏā; Avt. Vers. "Aḇidah"), the fourth of the five sons of Midian, the son of Abra- ham by Keturah (Gen. xxiv, i; 1 Chron. i, 30), and apparently the head of a tribe in the peninsula of Arabia, B.C. post 2000. See ARABIA. Josephus (Ant. i, 15, 1) calls him Ebida (Eḇiḏā). For the city Abida, see ABILA.

Aḇiḏah [many Abiḏah], a less correct mode of Anglicising (Gen. xxiv, 4) the name Aḇiḏa (q. v.).

Aḇiḏan (Heb. Aḇiḏān, אָבִידָן, father of judgment, i. e. judge; Sept. Aḇiḏān, the son of Gideon, and phylarch of the tribe of Benjamin at the exods (Num. i, 11; ii, 22; x, 24). At the erection of the Tabernacle he made a contribution on the ninth day, similar to the other chiefs (Num. vii, 60, 65), B.C. 1657.

Aḇiḏel (Heb. Aḇiḏel, אָבִדֵל, lit. father [i. e. possessor] of God, i. e. pious, or perhaps father of strength, i. e. strong; Sept. Aḇiḏēl), the name of two men.

1. The son of Zeror, a Benjamite (1 Sam. ix, 1), and father of Ner (1 Sam. xiv, 51), which last was the grandson of Saul, the first king of Israel (1 Chron. vii, 32; iii, 39). B.C. 1020. In 1 Sam. ix, 1 he is called the "father" (q. v.) of Isha, meaning grandfather. See NER.

2. An Atriulithe, one of David's distinguished warriors (1 Chron. x, 32). B.C. 1053. In the parallel passage he is called Aḇiḏal-bos (2 Sam. xxii, 31). See DAVID.

Aḇiḏer (Heb. Aḇiḏer, אָבִידֶר, father of help, i. e. help of these), the name of three men.

1. The second of the three sons of Hanleicheth, sister of Gilead, grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 18). B.C. cir. 1618. He became the founder of a family that settled beyond the Jordan [see OPHRAN], from which Gideon sprang (Josh. vii, 2), and which bore this name as a patronymic (Judg. vi, 34), a circumstance that is beautifully alluded to in Gideon's delicate reply to the jealous Ephraimites (Judg. viii, 2). See ABIEZRITE. He is elsewhere called JEEZER, and his descendants Jeezerites (Num. xxvi, 80).

2. A native of Anathoth, one of David's thirty chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 27; 1 Chron. xi, 26). B.C. 1038. He was afterward appointed captain of the ninth contingent of troops from the Benjamites (1 Chron. xxvii, 12, B.C. 1014. See David.

Abozirite (Heb. Abi' ha-Erri), דָּבָּרָן פַּתִית אֵרִי, father of the Errites; Sept. πατερίδα τοῦ Ἑρίου, Vulg. pater familias Eri; but in Judg. viii, 9, אֲבֹזָר אֵרִי, de familia Eri), a patronymic designation of the descendants of ABEZRITE (Judg. vii, 24; viii, 32).

Abigail (Heb. Abigā'yi), אֲבִיגָיֵית, נָקָיָה, נָקָיָה יִשְׂרָאֵל, person, or perh. i. q. leader of the dance, once contracted Abigā'yi, אֲבִיגָיֵית יִשְׂרָאֵל, 2 Sam. xvii, 25; Sept. A'bi'gai v. r. A'bi'gaya, Josephus A'bi'gaya), the name of two women.

The daughter of Nahash (2 Jesse), sister of David, and wife of Jethro or Ishmael (q. v.), an Ishmaelite, by whom she had Amasa (1 Chron. ii, 16, 17; 2 Sam. xvii, 25). B.C. 1068.

The wife of Nabal, a prosperous but churlish sheep-merchant in the district of Carmel, west of the Dead Sea (1 Sam. xvi, 1). B.C. 1009. Her promiscuous disposition and discretion averted the wrath of David, which, as she justly apprehended, had been violently excited by the insulting treatment which his messengers had received from her husband (comp. Josephus, Ant. vi, 18, 6-8). See Nabal. She hastily prepared a liberal supply of provisions, of which David's troops stood in much need, and went forth to meet him attended by only one servant, without the knowledge of her husband. When they met, he was marching to exterminate Nabal and all that belonged to him; and not only was his rage mollified by her prudent remonstrances and delicate management, but he became sensible that the vengeance which he had purposed was not warranted by the circumstances, and was thankful that he had been prevented from shedding innocent blood (1 Sam. xiv, 14-35).

The beauty and prudence of Abigail (see H. Hughes, Female Characters, ii, 250 sq.) made such an impression upon David on this occasion that, when not long after, he heard of Nabal's death, he sent for her, and she became his wife (1 Sam. xxv, 30-42). She accompanied him in all his future fortunes (1 Sam. xxvii, 3; xxx, 5; 2 Sam. i, 2). See David. By her he had one son, Chilleb (2 Sam. iii, 3), who is probably the same elsewhere called Daniel (1 Chron. iii, 1).—Kétto, s. v.

Abiahu (Heb. Abi' ha-yi), בָּיָהוּ, נָקָיָה, נָקָיָה יִשְׂרָאֵל, father of [i. e. possess or worshiper] of Jehovah; also in the equivalent form Abihu, 2 Chron. xii, 20; 21; and Sept. and N. T. 'Ašhân, but 'Ašha in 1 Kings xiv, 1; Neh. x. 7; ′Ašṣāh in 1 Chron. xxiv, 10; Neh. 7, 3; 13; 'Ašhōv in 1 Chron. xxiv, 10; Neh. 7, 4; 'Ašhōv v. r. 'Ašāi in 1 Chron. xxiv, 10; 2 Chron. ii, 7; 3, 13; 14; ′Ašhā in 1 Chron. iii, 10; Matt. i, 5; Luke i, 5), the name of six men and two women.

1. A son of Becher, one of the sons of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 8). B.C. post 1866.

2. The great-grandson of Zerubbabel, and father of Eliakim, among the paternal ancestry of Jesus (Matt. i, 13, where the name is Anglicized "Abid") ; apparently the same with the same with the name of a son of Joanna and father of Jesus in the genealogy of Luke (Luke iii, 25). Also with Orahadi, son of Aram and father of Shechaniah in the O.T. (1 Chron. iii, 21). B.C. ante 410. (See Strong's Harmony and Expos. of the Comp. p. 16.) Comp. Hodiayah.

Abijah (Heb. Abi'ha, אַבִּיהָ, father [i. e. possess or worshiper] of Jehovah; also in the equivalent form Abihu, 2 Chron. xii, 20; 21; and Sept. and N. T. 'Ašhân, but 'Ašha in 1 Kings xiv, 1; Neh. x. 7; ′Ašṣāh in 1 Chron. xxiv, 10; Neh. 7, 3; 13; 'Ašhōv in 1 Chron. xxiv, 10; Neh. 7, 4; 'Ašhōv v. r. 'Ašāi in 1 Chron. xxiv, 10; 2 Chron. ii, 7; 3, 13; 14; ′Ašhā in 1 Chron. iii, 10; Matt. i, 5; Luke i, 5), the name of six men and two women.

1. A son of Becher, one of the sons of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 8). B.C. post 1866.

2. The daughter of Machir, who bore to Hebron a posthumous son, Abihu (1 Chron. xiii, 24). B.C. cir. 1612.

3. The second son of Samuel (1 Sam. vii, 2; 1 Chron. vi, 28). Being appointed by his father a judge in Beersheba, in connection with his brother, their corrupt administration induced such popular discontent as to provoke the elders to demand a royal form of government for Israel (1 Chron. vii, 16). See Samuil.

4. One of the descendants of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, and chief of one of the twenty-four courses or orders into which the whole body of the priesthood was divided by David (1 Chron. xxiv, 10, B.C. 1014. Of these the course of Abijah was the eighth. Only four of the courses returned from the captivity, of which that of Abijah was not one (Exra ii, 36-39; Neh. vii, 39-42; xii, 1). But the four were divided into the original number of twenty-four, with the original names; and it hence happens that Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, is described as belonging to the course of Abijah (Luke i, 5). See PRIEST. 5. The second king of a separate kingdom of the Israelites, another brother of Rehoboam, son of Solomon (1 Chron. iii, 10). He is also called (1 Kings xiv, 31; xv, 1-8) ABIJAM (q. v.). He began to reign B.C. 956, in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, and he reigned three years (2 Chron. xili, 16: xiii, 1, 2). At the commencement of his reign, looking upon himself as the successor of the tribes from the house of David as rebellion, Abijah made a vigorous attempt to bring them back to their allegiance (2 Chron. xiii, 3-19). In this he failed; although a signal victory over Jeroboam, who had double his force and much greater experience, enabled him to take several cities which had been held by Israel (see J. F. Bahrdt, De bello Abie et Jerobo, Lips. 1760). The speech which Abijah addressed to the opposing army before the battle has been much admired (C. Simeon, Works, iv, 96). It was well suited to its object, and exhibits correct notions of the theological institutions (Kell, Apologie d. Chron. p. 336). His view of the political position of the Jewish Church, with respect to the house of David, is however, obviously erroneous, although such as a king of Judah was likely to take. The numbers reputed to have been present in this action are 500,000 on the side of Jeroboam, 400,000 on the side of Abijah, and 500,000 left dead on the field. Hales and others regard these extraordinary numbers as corruptions, and propose to reduce them to 80,000, 40,000, and 50,000 respectively, as in the Latin Vulgate of Sixtus V, and many earlier editions, and in the old Latin translation of Josephus; and probably also in his original Greek text, as is collected by De Vignoles from Abnarban's charge against the historian of having made Jeroboam's loss no more than 50,000 men, contrary to the Hebrew text (Kennicott's Dissertations, i, 533; ii, 201 sq., 361). See NUMBER. The book of Chronicles mentions nothing concerning Abijah adverse to the impressions which we receive from his conduct on this occasion. The kings we are told, "are all slain in all the sins of his father" (1 Kings xv, 3). He had fourteen wives, by whom he left twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters (2 Chron. xiii, 20-22). Asa succeeded him (2 Chron. xiv, 1; Matt. i, 7). See JUDAH. There is a difficulty connected with the maternity of Abijah, which was promised to him (1 Kings xiv, 2), with his name: he was the son of Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom (comp. 2 Chron. xii, 20); but in 2 Chron. xiii, 2, "His mother's name was Michal, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah." Maachah and Michal are variations of the same name; and Abishalom is in all like Abisalom, the son of David. The word (72) rendered "daughter" (q. v.), is applied in the Bible not only to a man's child, but to his niece, granddaughter, or great-granddaughter. It is therefore possible that Uriel of Gibeah married Tamar, the beautiful daughter of Abisalom (2 Sam. xiv, 27), and by her had Maachah, who was thus the daughter of Uriel and granddaughter of Abisalom. See MAACHAH. A son of Jeroboam I, king of Israel. His severe and threatening illness induced Jeroboam to send his wife with a present [see GIFT] suitable in the guise in which she went, to consult the prophet Abijah respecting his recovery. This prophet was the same who had, in the days of Solomon, foretold to Jeroboam his elevation to the throne of Israel. Though blind with age, he knew the divine impulse that came upon him, to reveal to her that, because there was found in Abijah only, of all the house, should come to his grave in peace, and be mourned in Israel (see S. C. Wilkes, Family Sermons, 12; C. Simeon, Works, iii, 385; T. Gataker, Sermons, pt. ii, 291). Accordingly, when the mother returned home, the youth died as she crossed the threshold of the door. "And they buried him, and all Israel mourned for him" (1 Kings xiv, 1-18), B.C. cir. 782.—Kittel, s. v. see JEROBOAM. 7. The daughter of Zacharias, and mother of King Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 1), and, consequently, the wife of Ahaz, whom she survived, and whom, if we may judge from the piety of her son, she excelled in moral character. She is elsewhere called by the shorter form of the name, Atna (2 Kings xviii, 2). B.C. 726. Her father may have been the same with the Zachariah, the son of Jerebeciah, whom Isaiah took as a witness of his marriage with "the prophetess" (Isa. viii, 2; comp. 2 Chron. xxvi, 5). B. One of those (apparently priests) who affixed their signatures to the covenant made by Nehemiah (Neh. vii, 7). B.C. 410. He is probably the same (notwithstanding the great age this implies) who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 4), B.C. 536, and who had a son named Zichri (Neh. xii, 17). Abij'am (Heb. Abiyam', אַבְיַיָם, father of the sea, i. q. sea man; Sept. Αβιγιαί v. r. Αβιγιαί, Vulg. Abiam), the name always given in the book of Kings (1 Kings xiv, 31; xvi, 1, 3, 7, 8) to the king of Judah (1 Kings xiv, 1, refers to the other person), and listed (1 Chron. iii, 10; 2 Chron. xiii, 1-22) called Abijah (q. v.). Lightfoot (Harov. O. T. in loc.) thinks that the writer in Chronicles, not describing his reign as wicked, admits the sacred JAH into his name; but which the book of Kings, charging him with following the evil ways of his father, changes into JAM. This may be fanciful; but such changes of name were not unusual (comp. Bethaven; Sychar).—Kittel, s. v. Abila (אֵבִילָה and יֵבִילָה, Polyb. v. 71, 2; Ptol. v. 18), the name of at least two places. 1. The capital of the "Abilene" of Lysias (Luke iii, 1), and distinguished (by Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 1) from other places of the same name as the "Abila of Lysiasian" ("Αβίλα ή Λυσιανισ). The word is evidently of Hebrew origin, signifying "a plain." See Abel. This place, however, is not to be confounded with any of the Biblical localities of the O. T. having this prefix, since it was situated beyond the bounds of Palestine in Cilicia-Syria (Antonin. Itin. p. 197, ed. Wessel), being the same with the "Abila of Lebanon" (Abila Libanum, "Abila Libanosa") between Baalbek and Helipolis (Roland, Palest. p. 317, 458). Josephus (see Hudson's ed. p. 864, note) and others also write the name Abena ("Αβήλα), Abala (Αβάλα), and even Abilla (Αβίλλα), assigning it to Phenicia (Ireland, ib. p. 527-529). A medal is extant, bearing a bunch of grapes, with the inscription, "Abila Leucas," which Belioxy (in the Transactions of the Acad. of Belles Lettres) refers to this city; but it has been shown to have a later date (Eckhel, iii, 337, 345); for there is another medal of the same place, which bears a half figure of the river-god, with the inscription "Christos Claudiaion," a title which, although fix-
ABILENE

ABIMÆL

The site to the river Chrysorhoas, yet refers to the imperial names of Claudius. Perhaps Leucus and Claudiuopolis were only later names of the same city; for we can hardly suppose that two cities of the size and importance which each of these evidently had, were located in the same vicinity and called by the same name. The existence of a large and well-built city in this region (Hogg's Damascus, i, 301) is attested by numerous ruins still found there (Bankes, in the Quart. Review, vol. xxxvi, p. 888), containing inscriptions (De Saulcy, Narrativa, ii, 455). Some of these inscriptions (first published by Lebomne, Journal des Savants, 1827, and afterwards by Ureill, Inscriptions Lat. 4907, 4909) have lately been deciphered (Trans. Roy. Geog. Soc. 1851; Jour. Soc. Lit. July, 1858, p. 248 sq.), and one has been found to contain a definite account of certain public works executed under the Emperor M. Aurelius, "at the expense of the Abilenians;" thus identifying the spot where this is found with the ancient city of Abila (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1848, p. 86 sq.).

It is the modern village Suk el-Barada, not far from the south bank of the river Barada (the ancient Chrysorhoas), near the mouth of the long gorge through which the stream flows from above, and directly under the cliff (800 feet high) on which stands the temple of the Abila, or tomb of Abel. (Bib. Sacra, 1853, p. 144). This tradition is an ancient one (Quarismius, Eusebius, Terra Sanctae, vii, 7, 1; Maundrel, May 4), but apparently based upon an incorrect derivation of the name of the son of Adam. See Abel. This spot is on the road from Heliopolis (Baalbek) to Damascus, at a distance corresponding to ancient notices (Beland, Palest. p. 657, 658). The name Suk (i.e. market, a frequent title of villages where produce is sold and therefore indicating fertility) of Wady Barada first occurs in Burckhardt's Syria, p. 2, who speaks of the lively green of the neighborhood, which, no doubt, has suggested the name Abel in the Hebrew term of meadow (see Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 480 sq.). See Abilene.

2. There are two or three other places mentioned in ancient authorities (Reldan, Palest. p. 523 sq.) by the general name of Abel, Abela, or Abila (once Ahab; Ashak explains, apparently by error, Reldan, ib. p. 456), as follows:

(a.) ABEA OF PHENICIA (Jerome, Onomat. s. v.), situated between Damascus and Panasus (Caesarea Philippi), and therefore different from the Abila of Lysanias, which was between Damascus and Heliopolis (Baalbek). It is probably the same as Abel-Beth-Maachah (q. v.).

(b.) ABILA OF PEREA, mentioned by Josephus (War, ii, 13, 9) as being in the vicinity of Julias (Bethsaida) and Besimoth (Bethshebimoth) (ib. iv, 7, 6). It is probably the same as Abel-Shittim (q. v.).

(c.) ABEA OF BANANAA, mentioned by Jerome (Onomat. s. v. Astaroth Carnaim) as situated north of Adarn, and by Josephus (quoting Polybius) as being taken with Gadaras by Antiochus (Ant. xii, 5, 9). It is stated to be the same with the Abila of the Decapolis" (comp. Pliny, v, 18), named on certain Palmyrene inscriptions (Reldan, Palest. p. 625 sq.), and probably the Abil (A'ibil) of Eusebius (Onomat. s. v.), situated 12 miles of Gadaras, now Abil. See under Abel-Ceramin.

Abilænus (Ἀβιλανής sc. χώρα, Luke, iii, 1). The small district or territory in the region of Lebanon which took its name from the chief town, Abila (Po-lyb. v, 71, 2; Josephus, War, ii, 18, 2; iv, 7, 5; Ieh. xxvii, 29, 33), which was situated in Cœle-Syria (Polyb. v, 18), and according to the Antonine Itin. 18 miles N. of Damascus, and 38 S. of Helipolus (lat. 68° 45', long. 32° 20'); but which must not be confused with Abila of the Decapolis (Burckhardt, p. 289; Ritter, xv, 1089). See Abila. Northward it must have reached beyond the upper Barada, in order to include Abila; and it is probable that its southern border may have extended to Mount Hermon (Jebel es-Sheikh). It seems to have included the eastern declivities of Anti-Libanus, and the fine valleys between its base and the hills which front the eastern plains. This is a very beautiful and fertile region, well wooded, and watered by many rivers from Anti-Lebanon. It also affords fine pastures; and in most respects contrasts with the stern and barren western slopes of Anti-Lebanon.

This territory had been governed as a tetrarchy by Lysanias, son of Poylemy and grandson of Men- anus (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 13, 5); but he was put to death by his subjects, and the government was then reined by Tiberius, who then took possession of the province (Ant. xvi, 4, 1). After her death it fell to Augustus, who rented it out to one Zenodorus; but as he did not keep it clear of robbers, it was taken from him, and given to Herod the Great (Ant. xvi, 10, 1; War, i, 20, 4). At his death a part (the southern, double) of the territory was added to Trachonitis and Iturea to form a tetrarchy for his son Philip; but by far the larger portion, including the city of Abila, was then, or shortly afterward, bestowed on another Lysanias, mentioned by Luke (iii, 1), who is supposed to have been a descendant of the former Lysanias, but who lived a long time after mentioned by Josephus. See Lysanias. Indeed, nothing is said by him or any other profane writer respecting this part of Abila until several years after the time referred to by Luke, when the Emperor Caligula gave it to Agrippa I as "the tetrarchy of Lysanias" (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 10), to whom it was afterward confirmed by Claudius. At his death it was included in that part of his possessions which went to his son Agrippa II. (See Josephus, Ant. xiii, 16, 3; xiv, 12, 1; 3; 7; 4; xv, 10, 8; xvii, 11, 4; xix, 5, 1; x, 7; 1; War, i, 12, 1; ii, 6, 5; 11, 5; Dio Cass. xiii, 32; liv, 9.) This explanation as to the division of Abila between Lysanias and Philip removes the apparent discrepancy in Luke, who calls Lysanias tetrarch of Abila at the very time that, according to Josephus (a part of Abila) was in the possession of Philip (see Noldi Hist. Iud. p. 279 sq.; Krebs, Okav. Flan. p. 110 sq.; Süsskind, Symbol. ad Ilustr. Quae- dem Nova Carinae, i. 21; iii, 23, sq. also in Pachy, loc. cit. log. viii, 90 sq.)—also in the Stud. u. K. 286, ii, 431 sq.; Münter, De Rebus Ituvarv. Hæs. 1824, p. 22 sq.; Wieseler, Chronol. Synop. p. 174 sq.; Ehrard, Wissenschaftl. Kritik, p. 181 sq.; Hug, Gutachten üb. Strauss, p. 110 sq.). In fact, as Herod never actually possessed Abila (Josephus, Ant. xix, 5, 1; War, ii, 14, 4), then only had it, nor is there any record that this region never could have descended to Herod's heirs, and therefore properly did not belong to Philip's tetrarchy. The same division of the territory in question is implied in the exclusion of Chalcis from the government of the later Lysanias, although included in that of the old Lysanias (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 1). We find Abila mentioned among the places captured by Placidas, one of Vesperian's generals, in A.D. 69-70 (Josephus, War, iv, 7, 5); and from that time it was permanently annexed to the province of Syria (Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.). The metropolis Abila is mentioned in the lists of the Christian councils as the seat of a bishop, or at least to be seen down to A.D. 694 (Reldan, Palest. p. 529).—Winer, s. v.

Abim'æl (Ieb. Abîmâlî, ־בֶּן־פַּאֵל, s. f. father of Melc; Sept. Ἀβίμαλα, Ἄβιμάλη, Josephus Ἀβιμαλη, one of the sons of Joktan in Arabia (Gen. x, 28; 1 Chron. i, 22). B.C. post 2414. See Arabia. He was probably the father or founder of an Arabian tribe called Malî (Mâli, of unknown origin), a trace of which Bochart (Phaleg, ii, 24) discovers in the Thunder (Hist. Plant. i, 4), where the name Malî (Mâli) occurs as that of a spear-bearing region. Perhaps the same is indicated in Eratosthenes (ap. Strabo, xvii, 34) and Ptolemy (vii, 2) as the seat of the Tyrians; and Ptolemy (vi, 7) distinguishes the Matians (Euthia) from these, and at the same time refers to a village called Manala (Makula) on the shore of the Red Sea. Hence Schneider proposes to read Manallak (Makulak) in the above passage, and rather read Manali (Makulai), a natural interchange of liquids; and then we may compare a place mentioned by Abulfeda (Arabia, ed. Gagnier, p. 6, 42), called Minya, 3 miles from Mecca (Michaeels, Spicileg. ii, 173 sq.)—Genesius, This. Heb. p. 9.

Abimelech (Heb. Abimelech, אֵבִּימֶלֶךְ, father [i.e. friend] of the king, or perhaps i. e. royal father; Sept. Alexandrinus, but Alex in Chronicles, viii, 16; Josephus Ἀβιμεληχος), the name of four men.

From the recurrence of this name among the kings of the Philistines, and from its interchange with the name "Achish" in the title to Psal. xxxiv., it would appear to have been, in that application, not a proper name, but a title. He who had intercourse with the Egyptians. Compare the title Padiashah, i. e. "father of the king," given to the kings of Persia, supposed by Ludolf (Lex. Ethiop. p. 350) to have arisen from a salutation of respect like that among the Ethiopians, akba nqusi, equivalent to "God save the king" (Simon,🍩 p. 466).

The Philistine king of Gezer (q. v.) in 1. the time of Abraham (Gen. xx, 1 sq.) B.C. 2086. Abraham removed into his territory perhaps on his return from Egypt; and, fearing that the extreme beauty of Sarah (q. v.) might bring him into difficulties, he declared his wife to be his sister. See CHANDLER, Viz. of. O. T. p. 52. The king of Abimelech in taking Sarah into his harem shows that, even in those early times, kings claimed the right of taking to themselves the unmarried females not only of their natural subjects, but of those who sojourned in their dominions. The same usage still prevails in Oriental countries, especially in Persia (Critical Review, iii, 392). See Woman. Another contemporary instance of this custom occurs in Genesis xii, 15, and one of later date in Esther i, 3. But Abimelech, obedient to a divine warning communicated to him in a dream, accompanied by the information that Abraham was a sacred personage, or at any rate one who had reached such a degree of respectability as to be able to protect his wife and his her husband (see J. Orton, Works, i, 231). As a mark of his respect he added valuable gifts, and offered the patriarch a settlement in any part of the country; but he nevertheless did not forbear to rebuke, with mingled delicacy and sarcasm (see C. Simeon, Works, i, 183), the conduct as practised upon him (Gen. xx). The present consisted in part of a thousand pieces of silver, as a "covering of the eyes" for Sarah; that is, according to some, as an atoms present, and to be a testimony of her innocence in the eyes of all (see J. C. Biedermann, Meletem. Philol. iii, i; J. Körner, Exeget. Th. l. ii; J. A. M. Nagel, Exeget. Philol. Aed. 1759; J. G. Voigt, Geschichte des Alterthums, ii, 472). Others more happily (see COVERING OR THE EYES) think that the present was to procure a veil for Sarah to conceal her beauty, that she might not be coveted on account of her comeliness; and thus was she preserved for not having worn a veil, which, as a married woman, she was not permitted to wear, in the country, she ought to have done (Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr., in loc.). The interpolation of Prov. v. 17: "to love her husband, that her beauty may not fail, when she is old, and her beauty may not be envious of, when she is old," is not such a comment that the husband of a married woman is murdered in order that his wife may be retained by the tyrant (Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 355). Nothing further is recorded of King Abimelech, except that a few years after he repaired to the camp of Abraham, who had removed beyond his borders, accompanied by Phichol, "the chief captain of his host," to invite the patriarch to contract with him a league of peace and friendship. Abraham consented; and this first league on record [see ALLIANCE] was confirmed by a mutual oath, made at a place which has not been given by Abraham, but which the herdsmen of Abimelech had forcibly seized without his knowledge. It was restored to the rightful owner, on which Abraham named it Beersheba (the Well of the Oath), and consecrated the spot to the worship of Jehovah (Gen. xxvii, 23—34). See ORIGEN, Opera, ii, 76; WHITTY, Prototypy, p. 297. See ABIMELECH.

2. Another king of Gerar, in the time of Isaac (Gen. xxvi, i—22), supposed to have been the son of the preceding. B. C. cir. 1885. Isaac sought refuge in his territory during a famine; and having the same fear respecting his fair Mesopotamian wife, Rebekah, as his father had entertained respecting Sarah (supra), he reported her to be his sister. This brought upon him the just rebuke of Abimelech when he accidentally discovered the truth. The country appears to have become more cultivated and populous than at the time of Abraham's visit, nearly a century before; and the inhabitants were more jealous of the presence of such powerful pastoral chieftains. In those times, as now, wells of water were very important for agriculture and general purposes, that they gave a proprietary right to the soil, not previously appropriated, in which they were dug. Abraham had dug wells during his sojourn in the country; and, to bar the claim which resulted from them, the Philistines had afterward filled them up; but they were not cleared out by Isaac, who proceeded to cultivate the ground to which they gave him a right. See WELL. The virgin soil yielded him a hundred-fold; and his other possessions, his flocks and herds, also received such prodigious increase that the jealousy of the Philistines could not be suppressed, and Abimelech desired him to seek more distant quarters. Isaac complied, and went out into the open country, and dug wells for his cattle. But the shepherds of the Philistines, out with their flocks, were not inclined to allow the claim to exclusive pasturage in these districts to be thus established; and their opposition induced the quiet patriarch to make successive migrations, until God reached such a state that the operations were no longer disputed. Afterward, when he was at Beersheba, he received a visit from Abimelech, who was attended by Ahuzzath, his friend, and Phichol, the chief captain of his army. They were received with some reserve by Isaac; but when Abimelech explained that it was his wish to renew, with one so manifestly blessed of God, the covenant of peace and good- will which had been contracted between their fathers, they were more cheerfully entertained, and the desired covenant was, with due ceremony, contracted accordingly (Gen. xxvi, 26—31). From the facts recorded respecting the connection of the two Abimelechs with the same period, it appears that the Philistines, even at this early time, had a government more organized, and more in union with that type which we now regard as Oriental, than appeared among the native Canaanites, one of whose nations had been expelled by these foreign settlers from the territory which they occupied. See ORIGEN, Opera, ii, 94—97; Saurin, Dic. or. i, 368; Dacier, p. 207. -Kitto, s. v. See PHILISTINE.

3. A son of Gideon by a concubine wife, a native of Shechem, where her family had considerable influence (Judg. ix). Through that influence Abimelech was proclaimed king after the death of his father, who had himself reigned when that honour was given both for himself and his children (Judg. viii, 22—24). In a short time, a considerable part of Israel seems to have recognised his rule (Ewald, Gesch. Isr. ii, 444), which lasted three years (B.C. 1822-1819). One of the first acts of his reign was to destroy his brothers, seventy in number, being the first example of a system of barbarous state policy of which there have been frequent instances in the East, and which indeed has only within the recent period of history been discontinued. They were slain "on one stone" at Ophrah, the native city of the family. Only one, the youngest, named Jotham, escaped; and he had the boldness to make his appearance on Mount Gerizim, where the Shechemites were assembled for some public purpose (perhaps to inaugurate Abimelech), and rebate them in his father's name on the tree chosen as the true king (see Josephus, Ant. v. 7, 2); a fable that has been not unaptly compared with that of Menenius Agrippa (Livy, ii, 32; comp. Herder, Geist der Hebr. Poesie, ii, 263). See Jotham; Parable. In the course of three years the Shechemites found ample cause to repent of what they had done; they eventually revolted in Abimelech's absence, and caused an ambuscade to be laid in the mountains, with the design of destroying him on his return. But Zebul, his governor in Shechem, contrived to apprise him of these circumstances, so that he was enabled to avoid the snare laid for him; and the people, assembled and assembled embassy, appeared unexpectedly before Shechem. The people of that place had meanwhile secured the assistance of one Gaa (q. v.) and his followers, who marched out to give Abimelech battle. He was defeated, and returned into the town; and his inefficiency and misconduct in the action had been so manifest that the people were induced by Zebul to expel him and his followers (comp. Josephus, Ant. v. 7, 4). But the people still went out to the labors of the field. This being told Abimelech, who was at Arumah, he laid an ambuscade in four parties in the neighborhood; and when the men came forth in the morning, two of the ambushers rode against them, while the other two seized the city gates to prevent their return. Afterward the whole force united against the city, which, being now deprived of its most efficient inhabitants, was easily taken. It was completely destroyed by the exasperated victor, and the ground strewn with salt (q. v.), symbolical of the desolation to which it was doomed. The fortress, however, still remained; but the occupants, deeming it untenable, withdrew to the temple of Baal-Berith, which stood in a more commanding situation. Abimelech employed his men in collecting and piling wood against this building, which was then set on fire and destroyed, with the thousand men who were afterward burned to death by Abimelech's order to reduce the Thebez, which had also revolted. The town was taken with little difficulty, and the people withdrew into the citadel. Here Abimelech resorted to his favorite operation, and while heading a party to burn down the gate, he was struck on the head by a large stone cast down by a woman from the wall above. Perceiving that he had received a death-blow, he directed his armor-bearer to thrust him through with his sword, lest it should be said that he fell by a woman's hand (Judg. ix. 5). Abimelech appears to have been a bold and able commander, but uncontrolled by religious principle, or humanity in his ambitious enterprises. (Niemeyer, Charact. iii, 224.) His fate resembled that of Pyrrhus II, king of Epirus (Justin. xxxii, 5; Pausan. i, 18; Val. Max. v. 1, 4; comp. Cresias, Exc. 42; Thucyd. iii, 70); and the dread of the ignominy of its being said of a warrior that he died by a woman's hand was very general (Sophoc. Trach. 1064; Senec. Helv. (Ed. 1178). Vainly did Abimelech seek to avert this disgrace (Saurin, Disc. Hist. iii, 400); for the fact of his death by the hand of a woman was long after associated with his memory (2 Sam. xi, 21). See Shechem.

5. The son of Abiathar, and high-priest in the time of David, according to the Masoretic text of 1 Chron. xviii, 16 [see Abi-], where, however, we should probably read (with the Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg., Targums, and many MSS.) ABIMELECH (as in the parallel passage, 2 Sam. viii, 17). See Abiathar.

Abin adab (Heb. Abin adab, אֶבִּינָדָב, father of nobleness, i.e. noble; Sept. everywhere 'Απίναδαβ), Vetus. 2 Samuel 17:29; Josephus 'Απίναδαβος, Αν. viii, 2, 9), the name of four men.

1. A Levite of Kiriath-jearim, in whose house, which was on a hill [see Gibeah], the ark of the covenant was deposited, after being brought back from the land of the Philistines (1 Sam. vii, 1), B.C. 1154. It was committed to the special charge of his son Eleazar; and remained there eighty years, until it was removed by David (2 Sam. vi, 3, 4; 1 Chron. xiii, 7). See Ark.

2. The second of the eight sons of Jesse, the father of David (1 Sam. xvi, 8; 1 Chron. ii, 13), and one of the three who followed Saul to the campaign against the Philistines in which Goliath defeated the army (1 Sam. xvi, 18), B.C. 1063.

3. The third named of the four sons of King Saul (1 Chron. viii, 38; ix, 89), and one of the three who perished with their father in the battle at Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxxi, 2; 1 Chron. x, 2), B.C. 1055. His name appears last in the list in 1 Sam. xxiv, 23.

4. The father of one of Solomon's purveyors (or rather Ben-Abinadib, since he is to be regarded as the name of the purveyor himself), who presided over the district of Dor, and married Taphath, Solomon's daughter (1 Kings iv, 11), B.C. ante 1014.

Abin olm (Heb. Abin olm, אֶבִּינָוֹלָם, father of grace, i.e. gracious; Sept. 'Απίνωλωπ), the father of Barak the judge (Judg. iv, 6, 12; v, 1, 12), B.C. ante 1409.

Abi rim (Heb. Abirim, אֶבִּירִים, father of height, i.e. proud), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. 'Abyroiv, Vulg. Abrum, Josephus 'Abyroovos, Αν. iv, 2, 2.) One of the sons of Ellaib of the family-heads of Reuben, who, with his brother, Dathan, and with On of the same tribe, joined Korah the Levite in a conspiracy against Moses and Aaron, which resulted in their being swallowed up with all their family and possessions (except the children of Korah) by an earthquake (Num. xvi, 1-7; xxxi, 9; 1 Pet. iv, 6; Ps. cxvi, 17), B.C. cir. 1620. See Korah.

2. (Sept. 'Abyroiv, Vulg. Abiram.) The eldest son of Helo the Bethelite, who is remarkable as having died prematurely (for such is the evident import of the statement), for the presumption or ignorance of his father, in fulfillment of the doom pronounced upon his posterity who should undertake to rebuild Jericho (1 Kings xvi, 34), B.C. post 906. See Helo.

Abir on ('Abyrons), the Grecized form (Eclaus. xi, 18) of the name of the rebellious Abiram (q. v.).

Abi. See Caphar-abish.

Abkasari (many Abi's) (Lat. Abius; for the Greek text is not extant), an incorrect form (2 Vulg. 4 Esdr. i, 5) of the name of the priest Abishcha (q. v.).

Abishag (Heb. Abishag, אֶבִּישָּׁח, father of [i.e. given to] error, i. e. inconsiderate; Sept. 'Abityad), a beautiful young woman of Shunem, in the tribe of Issachar, who was chosen by the servants of David to be introduced into the royal harem, for the special purpose of ministering to him and cherishing him in his old age (1 Kings ii, 10-15). She became his wife, but the marriage was never consummated (1 Kings i, 8-15). Some time after the death of David, Adonijah, his eldest son, persuaded Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, to entreat the king that Abishag might be given to him in marriage (1 Chr. cir. 1015. But as rights and privileges peculiarly regal were associated with the control and possession of the harem (q. v.) of deceased kings (2 Sam. xii, 8). Solomon detected in this application a fresh aspiration to power, which he visited with death (1 Kings ii, 17-22; Josephus, Αβισαΐος, Ant. vii, 14, 6). See ADONIZAI.

Ab'iah [many Abi'ah] (Heb. Abi'shoy, אֶבְיָשָׁי, father [i.e. desirous] of a gift; Sept. Ἀβίαθ, but Ἀβίαθ in 1 Sam. xxvi, 6, 7, 8, 9; 1 Chron. xix, 11, 15; 2 Sam. xiv, 7, 18, 19; 1 Chron. xxii, 20; 2 Sam. xiv, 20, 36; and Αμών in 2 Sam. xx, 6; also contracted Abé'ahy, אבֹאָהִי, in the text of 2 Sam. x, 10; 1 Chron. ii, 16; xi, 20; xvii, 12; xix, 11; Josephus Ἀβιαθάρ, a nephew of David (by an unknown father, perhaps a foreigner) through his sister Zeruiah, and brother of Joab and Asahel (2 Sam. ii, 18; 1 Chron. ii, 16). The three brothers devoted themselves zealously to the interests of their uncle during his wanderings. Though David had more reliance upon the talents of Joab, he appears to have given more of his private confidence to Abishai, who seems to have attached himself in a peculiar manner to his person, as we ever find him near, and ready for counsel or action, on critical occasions (2 Sam. ii, 13; 1 Chron. xi, 24; 1 Chron. xxviii, 1). Abishai was not only a man of action, but also of counsel; and, although David must have been gratified by his devoted and uncompromising attachment, he had more generally occasion to check the impulses of his ardent temperament than to follow his advice (2 Sam. iii, 80). Abishai was one of the two persons whom David asked to accompany him to the camp of Saul, and he alone accepted the perilous distinction (1 Sam. xxvi, 5-9), B.C. 1055. The desire he then expressed to smite the sleeping king identifies him as the man who afterward burned to rush upon Shimeel and slay him for his abuse of David (2 Sam. xvi, 9, 11; xix, 21). When the king desired that the ark of the covenant should be removed from Abishai's house, Abishai went away by his side; and he was intrusted with the command of one of the three divisions of the army which crushed that rebellion (2 Sam. xviii, 2-12), B.C. cir. 1023. When the insurrection of Sheba occurred David sent him, in connection with Joab, to quicken the tardy preparations of Amasa in gathering troops against the rebel (2 Sam. xx, 6-10), B.C. cir. 1022. During the last war with the Philistines David was in imminent peril of his life from a giant named Ishbi-benob, but was rescued by Abishai, who slew the giant (2 Sam. xxii, 15-17), B.C. cir. 1018. He was also the chief of the second rank (2 Sam. xvii, 19; 1 Chron. xi, 39) of the three "mighty men," who, probably in some earlier war, performed the chivalrous exploit of breaking through the host of the Philistines to procure David a draught of water from the well of his native Bethlehem (2 Sam. xxiii, 14-17). Among the exploits of this hero it is mentioned (2 Sam. xxiii, 18) that he withstood 360 men, and slew them with his spear; but the occasion of this adventure, and the time and manner of his death, are equally unknown.

In 2 Sam. viii, 13, the victory over the Edomites in the Valley of Salt (B.C. cir. 1037) is ascribed to David, but in 1 Chron. xvi, 12, to Abishai. It is hence probable that the three "mighty men" mentioned gained by Abishai, in connection with Joab (1 Kings xi, 16), but is ascribed to David as king and commander-in-chief (comp. 2 Sam. x, 10, 14).—Kitt, s.v. See David.

Abish'ah-alom, a fuller form (1 Kings xv, 2, 10) of the name ABELOM (q. v.); Abish'aa (Heb. Abi'shaw, אֶבְיָשָׁא, father of Bukki, being the fourth high-priest of the Hebrews (1 Chron. vi, 4, 5, 50; Ezra vii, 5). Josephus calls him Abiazer (Ἀβίαζερ, Ant. vi, 11), but elsewhere Josephus (Ἰωαννος, Ant. viii, 1, 5, ed. Havercamp). He appears to have been in the Chronicle of Alexander to have been nearly contemporary with Euhud, B.C. cir. 1523-1466. See HIGH-PRIEST.

Ab'iahu (Heb. Abi'shaw, אֶבְיָשָׁו, father of the wall, i.e. perhaps mason; Sept. Αβιασώσιον), the second named of the two sons of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah, who married Abihail, by whom he had two sons (1 Chron. ii, 28, 29), B.C. considerably post 1612.

Ab'iaum (Ἀβίαυμ v. r. Αβιαουμ), the son of Phinees and father of Bocceas, in the genealogy of Ezra (1 Esdr. viii, 2); evidently the high-priest Antiochus (q. v.).

Ab'tal (Heb. Abi'tal, אֶבְיָתָל, father of dem, i.e. freak; Sept. Αβιατώλι, the fifth wife of David, by whom she had Shephatiah, during his reign in Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 4; 1 Chron. iii, 8), B.C. 1052.

Ab'tub (Heb. Abi'tub, אֹבֵיתוּב, father of goodness, i.e. good; Sept. Αβιατούβ v. r. Αβιατοῦβ, a Benjamite, first named of the two sons of Shammaiah by his second wife, Baara or Hodesh, in Moab (1 Chron. viii, 11), B.C. cir. 1612. See SHAHARAIM.

Ab'ud, a Grecized form (Matt. i, 18) of the name ABELOU (q. v.).

Abiyonah. See CAIFER.

Abjuration (I), in the Roman Church, a formal and solemn act by which heretics and those suspected of heresy denied and renounced it. In countries where the inquisition was established, three sorts of abjuration were practised: 1. Abjuration of formalis, made by a notorious apostate or heretic; 2. Abjuration de ecce, made by a Roman Catholic strongly suspected of heresy; 3. Abjuration de leas, made by a Roman Catholic only slightly suspected. (11.) In England, the oath of abjuration was an oath by which a Catholic who was come under not to acknowledge any right in the pretender to the throne of England. It is also used to signify an oath ordained by the 25th of Charles II, abjuring particular doctrines of the Church of Rome. (See S. G. Wald, De Harei Abjurando, Regiom. 1821; Id. d. Absolutione ab Sacramentis, in Hencke's Eusebius, i, 184 sq.) See HERETIC.

Able (or Abel), THOMAS, chaplain to queen Catharine, wife of Henry VIII of England. He took the degree of M.A. at Oxford, in 1516, and subsequently that of D.D. He vehemently opposed the divorce of the king and queen, and wrote a treatise on the subject in 1530, entitled De non dissolendo Henrici et Catharinae matrimonio. He was also a strenuous opponent of the king's supremacy, for which he was hanged at Smithfield in 1540 (Hook, Excl. Diog. i, 45).

Abolution (I), the ceremonial washing, whereby, as a symbol of purification from uncleanness, a person was considered (1) to be cleansed from the taint of an inferior and less pure condition, and initiated into a higher and purer state; (2) to be cleansed from the soil of common life and fitted for the highest religious service; (3) to be cleansed from defilements contracted by particular acts or circumstances, and restored to the privileges of ordinary life; (4) as abolishing or purifying himself, or declaring himself absolved and purified, from the guilt of a particular act. We do not meet with any such abolutions in patriarchal times; but under the Mosol dispensation all are all indicated. See LAVATION; SPRINKLING.

A marked example of the first kind of abolution occurs when Aaron and his sons, on their being set apart for the priesthood, were washed with water before they were invested with the priestly robes and anointed with the holy oil (Lev. viii, 6). To this head we are inclined to refer the action of persons and rain which was required of the whole of the Israelites, as a preparation to their receiving the law from Sinai (Exod. xix, 10-15). We also find examples of this kind of purification in connection with initiation into some higher state both among the Hebrews and in other nations. Thus those admitted into the mysteries of Eleusis were previously purified on the banks of the Iliusus by water being poured upon them by the Hydronas (Polyen. vii, 17; iii, 11). See CONSECRATION.

The second kind of ablation was that which required the priests, on pain of death, to wash their hands and their feet before they approached the altar of God (Exod. xxx, 17-21). For this purpose a large basin of water was provided both at the tabernacle and at the temple. See Laver. To this the Psalmist alludes when he says, "I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar" (Ps. xxvi, 6). Hence it became the custom in the early Christian Church for the ministers, in the view of the congregation, to wash their hands in a basin of water brought by the deacon, at the commencement of the communion (Jameson, p. 126); and this practice, or something like it, is still retained in the Eastern churches, as well as in the Church of Rome, when mass is celebrated. See HOLY WATER. Similar ablutions by the priests before proceeding to perform the more sacred ceremonies were usual among the heathen (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Chemipis). The Egyptian priests indeed carried the practice to a burdensome extent (Wilkinson, i, 294, abridg.), from which the Jewish priests were, perhaps designedly, exonerated; and in their less torrid climate it was, for purposes of real cleanliness, less needful. Reservoirs of water were attached to the Egyptian temples; and Herodotus (ii, 57) informs us that the priests shaved the whole of their bodies every third day, that no insect or other filth might be upon them when they served the gods, and that they washed themselves in cold water twice every day and twice every night; Porphyry says thrice a day, with a nocturnal ablution occasionally. This kind of ablution, as preparatory to a religious act, answers to the simple rite of the Moslems, which they are required to go through five times daily before their stated prayers (see Lane, Mod. Eg., i, 94 sq.), besides other private purifications of a more formal character (see Reland, De Relig. Moh. p. 80-83). This makes the ceremonies of ablation much more conspicuous to a traveller in the Moslem East at the present day than they would appear among the ancient Jews, seeing that the law imposed this obligation on the priests only, not on the people. Connected as these Moslem ablutions are with various forms and imitative ceremonies, and recurring so frequently as they do, the awesomely heavy yoke of even the Moslem law seems light in the comparison. See BATH.

In all other class of ablutions washing is regarded as a purification from positive defilement. The Mosaisc law recognises eleven species of uncleanness of this nature (Lev. xii-xv), the purification for which ceased at the end of a certain period, provided the unclean person then washed his body and his clothes; but in a few cases, such as leprosy and the defilement caused by touching a dead body, he remained unclean seven days after the physical cause of pollution had ceased. This was all that the law required; but in later times, when the Jews began to refine upon it, these cases were considered generic instead of specific—as representing classes instead of individual cases of defilement—and the causes of pollution requiring purification by water thus came to be greatly increased. This kind of ablution for substantial uncleanness answers to the Moslem ghul (Lane, i, p. 99; Reland, i, b. 66-77), in which the cause of defilement greatly exceeds those of the Mosaisc law, when they are perhaps equalised in number and minuteness, of which the later Jews had devised. The uncleanness in this class arises chiefly from the natural secretions of human beings and of beasts used for food, and from the ordure of animals not used for food; and, as among the Jews, the defilement may be communicated not only to persons, but to clothes, utensils, and dwellings—in all cases in which the purification must be made by water, or by some representative act where water cannot be applied. Thus in drought or sickness the rinsing of the hands and face may be performed with dry sand or dust, a ceremony that is termed tugemmum (Lane, i, b.). See UNCLEANNESS.

Of the last class of ablutions, by which persons declared themselves free from the guilt of a particular action, the most remarkable instance is that which occurs in the expiation for an unknown murder, when the elders of the nearest village washed their hands over the expiatory heifer, beheaded in the valley, saying, 'this heifer have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it' (Deut. xxii, 1-9). This was thought by some that the signal act of Pilate, when he washed his hands in water and declared himself innocent of the blood of Jesus (Matt. xxvii, 24), was a designed adoption of the Jewish custom; but this supposition does not appear necessary, as the practice was also common among the Greeks and Romans (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Lustration). See MURDER.

Other practices not indicated in the law appear to have existed at a very early period, or to have grown up in the course of time. From 1 Sam. xvi, 5, compared with Exod. xix, 10-14, we learn that it was usual for those who presented or provided a sacrifice to purify themselves by ablution; and as this was everywhere a general practice, it may be supposed to have existed in patriarchal times, and, being an established and approved custom, not to have required to be mentioned in the law. There is a passage in the apocryphal book of Judith (xii, 7-9) which has been thought to intimate that the Jews performed ablutions before prayer. But we cannot fairly deduce that meaning from it (comp. Ruth iii, 3); since it is connected with the anointing (q. v.), which was a customary token of festivity (see Arnold, loc.). It would indeed prove too much if so understood, as Judith bathed in the water, which is more than the Moslems do before their prayers. Moreover, the authority, if clear, would not be conclusive. See PURIFICATION.

But after the rise of the sect of the Pharisaees, the practice of ablation was carried to such excess, from fingers into the chalice (see Boissonnet, Dict. des Rites, i, 65). See Mass.

(III.) In the Greek Church, ablation is a ceremony observed seven days after baptism, wherein theunction of the chrism is washed off from those who have been baptized (see Greek* Catholic* Church).

Ablúma (rather Oñaim). See Stool.

Ablu're (Heb. Abner), יָתָם, once in its full form Abner יָתָם, 1 Sam. xiv. 50, father of light, i.e. enlightening; Sept. Ἀβυσσίπης, Josaphus Ἀβυσσός, Ant. vi, 4, 3, elsewhere Ἀβυσσός, the son of Ner (q. v.) and uncle of Saul (being the brother of his father Kish), and the commander-in-chief of the king's army (1 Sam. xiv. 50 sq.), in which character he appears several times during the early history of David (1 Sam. xvii, 55; xx. 25; xxxvi, 5 sq.; 1 Chron. xxxvi, 28). It was through his instrumentality that David was first introduced to Saul's court after the victory over Goliath (1 Sam. xvii, 57, B.C. 1063); and it was he whom David sarcastically addressed when accompanying his master in the pursuit of his life at Hachilah (1 Sam. xxvi, 14, B.C. 1055). After the death of Saul (B.C. 1055), the experience which he had acquired, and the character for ability and decision which he had established in Israel, enabled him to uphold the falling house of Saul for seven years; and he might probably have done so longer if it had suited his views (2 Sam. ii, 10; v, 5; comp. vi, 1). It was generally known that David had been divinely nominated to succeed Saul on the throne; when, therefore, that monarch was slain in the battle of Gilboa, David was made king over his own tribe of Judah, and reigned in the old capital. In the other tribes an influence adverse to Judah existed, and was controlled chiefly by the tribe of Ephraim. Abner, with great decision, availed himself of this state of feeling, and turned it to the advantage of the house to which he belonged, of which he was now the acknowledged chief. He did not, however, venture to propose himself as king; but took Ishboseth, a surviving son of Saul, whose known imbecility had excused his absence from the fatal fight in which his father and brothers perished, and made him king over the tribes, and ruled in his name (2 Sam. ii, 8). This event appears to have occurred five years after Saul's death (2 Sam. ii, 10; comp. 11), an interim that was probably occupied in plans for settling the succession, to which Ishboseth may have been at first disinclined. See Ishboseth.

Nor, perhaps, had the Israelites sooner than this recovered sufficiently from the oppression by the Philistines that would be sure to follow the death of David on Mount Gilboa to reassert their independence, at least throughout Palestine proper. Accordingly Ishboseth reigned in Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, and David in Hebron. A sort of desultory warfare continued for two years between them, in which the advantage appears to have always been on the side of David (2 Sam. ii, 1). The only one of the engagements of which we have a particular account is that which ensued when Joab, David's general, and Abner met and fought at Gideon (2 Sam. ii, 12 sq.), B.C. 1048. Abner was beaten, and fled for his life; but was pursued by Asahel (the brother of Joab and Abishai), who was "swift of foot as a wild rose." Abner, dreading a blood-feud with Joab, for whom he seems to have entertained a sincere respect, entreated Asahel to desist from the pursuit; but finding that he was still followed, and that his life was in danger, he at length ran through the body by a back thrust with the pointed heel of his spear (2 Sam. ii, 18-32). This put a striffe of blood between the two foremost men in all Israel (after David); for the law of honor, which had from times before the law prevailed among the Hebrews, and which still prevails in Arabia, rended personal national duty ventrion to avenge the blood of his brother upon the person by whom he had been slain. See BLOOD-REVENGE.

As time went on Abner had occasion to feel more strongly that he was himself not only the chief, but the only remaining prop of the house of Saul; and this conviction, acting upon a proud and arrogant spirit, led him to more presumptuous conduct than even the mildness of the feeble Ishbosheth could suffer to pass without question. See ABSALOM; ADONI-JAH. He took to his own harem a woman named Rizpah, who had been a concubine-wife of Saul (2 Sam. iii, 7 sq.). This act, from the ideas connected with it, was not deemed by a deceased king's camp. Josephus, Apion, i, 15; Herod. iii, 68), was not only a great impropriety, but was open to the suspicion of a political design, which Abner may very possibly have entertained. See HAREM. A mild rebuke from the nominal king, however, enraged him greatly; and he perhaps forebore to publish it, lest he should henceforward abandon his cause and devote himself to the interests of David. To excuse this desertion to his own mind, he then and on other occasions avowed his knowledge that the son of Jesse had been appointed by the Lord to reign over all Israel; but he appears to have been unconscious that this avowal exposed his previous conduct to more censure than it offered excuse for his present. He, however, kept his word with Ishbosheth. After a tour, during which he explained his present views to the elders of the tribes which still adhered to the house of Saul, he repaired to Hebron with authority to make certain overtures to David on their behalf (2 Sam. iii, 12 sq.). He was received with great attention and respect; and David even thought it prudent to promise that he should still have the chief command of the armies when the desired union of the two kingdoms took place (De Pacto Davide et Abneri, in the Crit. Sac. Thea. Nov. i, 661). The political expediency of this engagement was very clear, and to the eyes of Abner and his adherents and friends of David were sacrificed. That distinguished personage happened to be absent from Hebron on service at the time, but he returned just as Abner had left the city. He speedily understood what had passed; and his dread of the superior influence which such a man as Abner might establish with David (see Josephus, Ant. vii, 1, 5) quickened his remembrance of the vengeance which his brother's blood required. His purpose was promptly formed. Unknown to the king, but apparently in his name, he sent a message after Abner to call him back; and as he returned, Joab met him at the gate, and as if to lead him peaceably and privately with him, suddenly thrust his sword into his body, B.C. 1046. The lamentations of David, the public mourning which he ordered, and the funeral honors which were paid to the remains of Abner (2 Sam. iv, 12), the king himself following the bier as chief mourner and comforted him for public opinion from having been privy to this assassination (2 Sam. iii, 31-39; comp. 1 Kings ii, 5, 32). As for Joab, his privilege as a blood-avenger must to a great extent have justified his treacherous act in the opinion of the people; and that, together with his influence with the army, screened him from punishment. See JOAB.

David's abhorrent but emphatic lament over Abner (2 Sam. ii, 32, 33) may be rendered, with strict adherence to the form of the original (see Ewald, Dict.

Abomination (בָּעֵבֶר, piggul), filthy stock. Lev. vii, 18; "abominable," Lev. xiv, 7; Isa. lxxv, 4; Ezek. iv, 14; "קִנְחַל, šnikhal," Deut. xxvii, 17; 1 Kings xi, 5, 7; 2 Kings xliii, 24, 24; 2 Chron. xvi, 8; Isa. lxxvi, 3; Jer. iv, 1; vii, 30; xlil, 27; xvii, 36; xxxiv, 34; Ezek. v, 11; vii, 20; xli, 8, 22; xxvii, 7, 8; xxxii, 28, 29; lxx, 27; xlii, 28, 31; liii, 11; Hos. ix, 10; Nah. ii, 9; Zech. ix, 7, 14; "הָעֵעָבֶר, íneebáver, abhorrance; Sept., βάρβαρον, and so N.T., Matt. xxiv, 14; Mark xiii, 14; Luke xvi, 15; Rev. xvii, 4, 5; xvi, 27), any object of detestation or disgust (Lev. xvii, 22; Deut. xvii, 29), and applied to an impure or detestable action (Ezek. xxii, 11, xxx, 26; Mal. ii, 11, etc.); to any thing causing a ceremonial pollution (Gen. xlii, 25; Deut. xlii, 24; Deut. xiv, 3), but more especially to idols (Lev. xvii, 22; xx, 18; Deut. vii, 20; 1 Kings xi, 5, 7; 2 Kings xxii, 13), and also to food offered to idols (Zech. ix, 7); and to filth of every kind (Nah. iii, 6). There are several texts in which the word occurs, to which, on account of their peculiar interest or difficulty, especial attention has been directed. The first is Gen. xxiii, 22: "The Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination (בָּעֵבֶר) unto the Egyptians." This is best explained by the fact that the Egyptians considered themselves ceremonially defiled if they ate with any strangers. The primary reason appears to have been that the cow was the most sacred animal among the Egyptians, and the eating of it was abhorrent to them; whereas it was both eaten and sacrificed by the Jews.
and most other nations, who, on that account, were abominable in their eyes. It was for this, as we learn from Herodotus (ii, 41), that no Egyptian man or woman would kiss a Greek on the mouth, or would use the cleaver of a Greek, or his spit, or his dish, or would taste the fish of even clean beef (that is, of oxen) that had been cut with a Greek knife, or eaten. It is true that Wilkinson (Anc. Egyptians, iii, 258) ascribes this to the disgust of the fastidious-clean Egyptians at the comparatively foul habits of their Asiatic and other neighbours; but it seems scarcely fair to take the facts of the father of history, and ascribe them to any other than the very things very recently which he assigns for them. We collect, then, that it was as foreigners, not pointedly as Hebrews, that it was an abomination for the Egyptians to eat with the brethren of Joseph. The Jews themselves subsequently exemplified the same practice; for in later times they held it unlawful to eat or drink with foreigners in their houses, or even to enter their dwellings (John xviii, 28; Acts x, 28; xi, 8); for not only were the houses of Gentiles unclean (Mishna, Oholoth, xviii, 7), but they themselves rendered unclean those in whose house they lodged (Maimonides, Mishab a Morkeb, xii, 12) which was carrying the matter farther than the Egyptians were pleased to go. We do not trace these instances, however, before the Captivity (see J. D. Winkler, Animadvers. Philol., ii, 175 sq.).

The second passage is Gen. xli, 34. Joseph is telling his brethren how to conduct themselves when introduced to the king of Egypt: he instructs them that when asked concerning their occupation they should answer, "Thy servants' trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we and also our fathers." This last clause has emphasis, as showing that they were hereditary nomad pastors; and the reason is added, "That ye may dwell in the land of Goshen, for every shepherd is an abomination (מְנַחֵֽשְׂרָה) unto the Egyptians." In the former instance they were "as an abomination" as strangers, with whom they could not eat; here they are a further abomination as nomadeshepherds, whom it was certain that the Egyptians, for that reason, would locate in the border land of Goshen, and not in the heart of the cities. That is, to the Egyptians, or Bedouins, and not simply shepherds, who were abominable to the Egyptians, is evinced by the fact that the Egyptians themselves paid great attention to the rearing of cattle. This is shown by their sculptures and paintings, as well as by the offer of this very king of Egypt to make each of Jacob's sons as men of activity "overseers of his cattle" (xvii, 6). For this aversion to nomad pastors two reasons are given; and it is not necessary that we should choose between them, for both of them were, it is most likely, concurrently true. One is, that the inhabitants of Lower and Middle Egypt had previously been invaded by, and had remained for many years subject to, a tribe of nomad shepherds, who had only of late been expelled, and a native dynasty restored—the grievous oppression of the Egyptians by these pastoral invaders, and the insult with which their religion had been treated. See HYKSOS. The other reason, not necessarily superseding the former, but rather strengthening it, is that the Egyptians, as a settled and civilized people, detested the lawless and predatory habits of the wandering shepherd tribes, which then, as now, bound the valley of the Nile and occupied the Arabia—a state of feeling which modern travellers describe as still existing between the Bedouin and falabas of modern Egypt, and indeed between the same classes everywhere in Turkey, Persia, and the neighboring regions (see Crit. Soc. Thee. Nov., i, 220). See SHEPHERD.

The third marked use of this word again occurs in Egypt. The king tells the Israelites to offer to their god the sacrifices which they desired, without going to the desert for that purpose. To this Moses objects that they should have to sacrifice to the Lord, "the abomination (מִלְחָם) of the Egyptians," who would thereby be highly exasperated against them (Exod. viii, 26). A reference back to the first explanation shows that this "abomination" was the cow, the only animal which all the Egyptians agreed in holding sacred; whereas, in the great sacrifice which the Hebrews proposed to hold, not only would heifers be offered, but the people would feast upon their flesh (see J. C. Driest, Antiquites, p. 136). See APIS.

A fourth expression of marked import is the abomination of desolation (בְּנָאָלָה) Dan. xi, 31; Sept. βέλημνα ἡραμάνων, or βέλημνα ναγον, Dan. xii, 11; Sept. το βέλημνα τῆς ἀρμοσίως, literally, slătness of the desolation, or, rather, desolating sīlēnness), which, without doubt, means the idol or idolatrous apparatus which the desolator of Jerusalem should establish in the holy place (see Hitzig, in loc.). This appears to have been (in its first application) a prediction of the pollution of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, who caused an idolatrous altar to be built on the altar of burnt offerings, whereon unclean things were offered to Jupiter Olympus, to whom the temple itself was dedicated (see Hoffmann, in loc.). Josephus distinctly refers to this as the accomplishment of Daniel's prophecy; as does the author of the first book of Maccabees, in declaring that "they set up the abomination of desolation (το βεληνμα τῆς ἀρμοσίως) upon the altar" (1 Macc. i, 50; vi, 7; 2 Macc. vi, 2-5; Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 4; xii, 7, 6). The phrase is quoted by Jesus in the same form (Matt. xxiv, 15), and is applied by him to what was to take place at the advance of the Romans against Jerusalem. They who saw "the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place" were enjoined to "flee to the mountains." This may with probability be referred to the advance of the Roman army against the city with their image-crowned standards, to which idolatrous honors were paid, and which the Jews regarded as idols. The unexpected retreat and discontinuance of the Roman forces afforded such as were mindful of our Saviour's prophecy an opportunity of obeying the injunction which it contained. That the Jews themselves regarded the Roman standards as abomination is shown by the fact that, in deference to their known aversion, the Roman soldiers quartered in Jerusalem forbore to introduce their standards into the city; and on one occasion, when Pilate gave orders that they should be carried in by night, so much stir was made in the market by the principal inhabitants that the sactions of peace, the serenity was eventually induced to give up the point (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 3, 1). Those, however, who suppose that "the holy place" of the text must be the temple itself, may find the accomplishment of the prediction in the fact that, when the city had been taken by the Romans and the holy house destroyed, the soldiers brought the standards in that form to the temple, set them up over the eastern gate, and offered sacrifice to them (Joseph. War, vi, 6, 1); for (as Havercamp notes from Tertullian, Apol. c. xvi, 162) "almost the entire religion of the Roman camp consisted in worshipping the ensigns, swearing by the ensigns, and in preferring the ensigns before all the other gods." Nor was this the last appearance of "the abomination of desolation in the holy place for not only did Hadrian, with studied insult to the Jews, set up the figure of a boar over the Bethlehem gate of the city (Elia Capitolina) which rose upon the site and ruins of Jerusalem (Euseb. Chron. i, p. 48) and (as the erection of this was to be followed by the erection upon the site of the Jewish temple (Dion Cass. xix, 12), and caused an image of himself to be set up in the part which answered to the most holy place (Nicephorus Callist. iii, 24). This was a consumption of all the abominations which the iniquities of the Jews might put in their holy place (see Auberlen, Daniel and the Revelation, p. 161 sq.). -Kitto, s. v. See JERUSALEM.

In Dan. ix, 27, the phrase is somewhat different and peculiar: סְכֹלֶה, which (as pointed in the text) must be rendered, "And upon the wings of filthinesses that desolate, or (there shall be) a desolator; but the Sept. has סְכֹלֶה יִבְגִּיאָר עַל יַחַד בְּחָרָיָה פְּרוּשָׁה (v. r. תִּבְגִּיאָר עַל יַחַד בְּחָרָיָה פְּרוּשָׁה) just as in Rev. xiii, 7, יִבְגִּיאָר עַל יַחַד בְּחָרָיָה פְּרוּשָׁה, that is followed by Christ in his allusion (Matt. xxiv, 15), and which may be attained by a slight change of pointing בְּחָרָיָה פְּרוּשָׁה (in the "absolute"), so and rendering, "And upon the wing (of the sacred edifice there shall be) filthinesses, even a desolator." Rosenmuller (Scholia in Vet. Test. in loc.) understands the "wing" (יִבְגִּיאָר) to signify the hostile army or battalion detached for that purpose (a sense corresponding to the Latin auxilia), at the head of which the proudest general should enter the city. Stuart, on the other hand (Commentary on Daniel, in loc.), likewise interpreting the whole passage as denoting exclusively the pollution of the temple caused by Antiochus, translates the verse in question thus, "And over the winged-fowl of abominations shall be a waster," and applies the "wing" (יִבְגִּיאָר, i. q. "fowl," in our version "overspreading") to a "statue of Jupiter Olympus erected in the temple; and this statue, as is well known, usually stood over an eagle at its feet with wide-spread wings." Both these interpretations, however, appear too fanciful. It is preferable to render יִבְגִּיאָר, with Gesenius (Theeaur. Heb. p. 608), Forst (Hob. Handl. s. v.), and the marginal translation, a battlement, i. e. of the temple, like προσφύγος, in Matt. iv. 5; both words meaning literally a wing, and applied in each case to a corner or summit of the wall inclosing the temple. Neither can we so easily dispose of our Saviour's reference to this prophecy, for of the ten passages from it that touch the destruction of Jerusalem. It appears to tally completely with that event in all its particulars, and to have had at most but a primary and typical fulfilment in the case of Antiochus (q. v.). (For the dates involved in this coincidence, see the Meth. Quar. Rev. 1851, 494 sq.) See ABOMINATION.

The distinction attempted by some (Alford and Olshausen, in loc.) between the events referred to in this passage and in Luke xxii, 20, is nugatory, for they are obviously parallel (see Strong's Harmony, § 1235). Meyer (in loc.) thinks the pollution designated in these verses by the Romans of the temple area generally," but the terms are more explicit than this. The abomination cannot in any case be to a profanation of the sacred precincts by the Jews themselves, for the excesses of the Zealots (q. v.) during the final siege (Josephus, War, iv, 3, 7) were never directed to the introduction of idolatry there, but to the destruction of the temple. The erection of the standards crowned with the bird of victory—a circumstance that may be hinted at in the peculiar term "wing" here employed (see F. Nolan, Warburton Lect. p. 186). See ABOMINATION.

A still more important difference among commentators as to the meaning of the word, in its present context, has respect to the point, whether the abomination, which somehow should carry along with it the curse of desolation, ought to be understood of the idolatrous and corrupt practices which should inevitably draw down desolating inflections of vengeance, or of the heathen powers and weapons of war that should be brought to bear upon the temple to destroy the sacred edifice. The following are the reasons assigned for understanding the expression of the former: 1. By far the most common use of the term abomination or abominations, when referring to spiritual things, and especially to things involving severe judgments and sweeping desolations, is to intimate that such pollutions were regarded as the "wings" of the prophecies. It was the pollution of the first temple, or the worship connected with it by such things, which in a whole series of passages is described as the abominations that provoked God to lay it in ruins (2 Kings xxi, 2-18; Jer. vii, 10-14; Ezek. vi, 11; vii, 8, 9, 29-33). And our Lord very distinctly intimates, by referring on another occasion to some of these passages, that as the same wickedness substantially was lifting itself up anew, the same retributions of evil might certainly be expected to chastise them (Matt. xxii, 13). 2. When reference is made to the prophecy in Daniel it is coupled with a word, 'Whososeedth let him understand,' which seems every way to point to a profound spiritual meaning in the prophecy, such as thoughtful and serious minds alone could apprehend. But this could only be the case if abominations in the moral sense were meant; for the defiling and desolating effect of heathen armies planting themselves in the holy place and taking possession was what the prophet general should understand. And the unseemly intruders were but the outward signs of the real abominations, which cried for vengeance in the ear of heaven. The compassing of Jerusalem with armies, therefore, mentioned in Luke xxii, 20, ready to bring the desolation, is not to be regarded as the same with the abomination of desolation; it indicated a further stage of matters. 3. The abominations which were the cause of the desolations are ever spoken of as springing up from within, among the covenant people themselves, not as invasions from without. They are so represented in Daniel also (ch. xi, 30, 32; xii, 5, 10); and that the Jews themselves, the better sort of Jews, were understood the condition from 1 Macc. i, 54-57, where, with reference to the two passages of Daniel just noticed, the heathen-inclined party in Israel are represented, in the time of Antiochus, as the real persons who "set up the abomination of desolation and built idol altars;" comp. also 2 Macc. iv, 15-17. (See Hengstenberg on the Gemma, and the Lexicon, p. 693; and Cl. Lightfoot, in loc. i, 27, with the authorities there referred to.) These arguments, however, seem to be outweighed by the conclusive historical fact that the material ensigns of paganism were actually erected both by the Syrian and Roman conquerors in the place in question, and that in the laying根基, in 1 Macc. vii, 67, 72, 73, 78, 91, we have to suppose that both Daniel and our Lord intended to refer to this palpable circumstance. See DESOLATION.
ABRAHAM

d-photo logical treatise on the creation of the world, in which he argues against the assumption of an eternal nature of the world (Venice, 1592, 4to). Several of Abram's works of Abraham have not been printed yet. The proposal of Bashuysen to issue a complete edition of all the works of Abraham has never been executed. All his works were in Hebrew, but many of his Dissertations have been translated into Latin by Buxtorf (4to, Basle, 1660) and others. Although Abraham spent many years at royal courts, Abraham, in one of his works, expressed very decided republican opinions. He left two sons, one of whom distinguished himself as a physician and as the author of an Italian poem, Dialogo d'Amore; the other embraced the Christian religion. The son of the former was born at Venice, in 1522, a collection of Hebrew letters.—Winer, Thes. Lit. vol. i; Fürst, Bibl. I, ii sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenhems., iii, 104; Wolf, Biblioth. Abracadabra, a magical word of fictitious origin, like most alliterating incantations. It is found on one of the amulets under which the Basilians in Egypt were supposed to conceal the name of God. It was derived from the Syrian worship, and was recommended as a magical charm against ague and fever. It is described by Serenus Sammonicus (the elder), who is usually classed, apparently without reason, among the followers of Democritus. The word is derived in a kind of inverted cone, omitting the last letter every time it is repeated. The lines of Serenus (De Medicina) which describe it are as follows:

"Mortiferum magiae est, quod Graeciae hereticae Vulgaris verbis, hoc nostrae dieire lingua
Non potest usus, nec retinet parentis
Inscribere Charis, quod dicitur Abracadabra, Sepius et subtus repetit, sed detraho summa
Magi magiae magiae delent, elementa
Singula, qua semper repuls, et retorta figus,
Donee in angustiam refregit litera comum.
His uno nuncus coloim rodens memento," etc.

Different opinions have been advanced as to the origin and meaning of the word. Bunsen ascribed it to an Egyptian, Beausobre a Greek, others a Hebrew origin, but Grotefend (in Ehrich and Gruber, Encycl. s. v.) tries to prove that it is of Persian (or rather Pehlevi) origin. As Greek amulets are inscribed with ABACDABA, he considers it certain that the word ought to be pronounced "Abracadabra." He derives it from the Persian Abrasaaz (the name of the Supreme Being) and the Chaldean word אבראה (the utterance), so that the meaning of it is "a divine oracle." This explanation, Grotefend thinks, throws some light on other magical words which the Basilians used in nearly the same manner as the Tibetans and Mongolians their homunculi, as the Talendrones Ablanathmolba and Amoromona.—Lardner, Works, viii, 988; C. F. Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. See ABRAXAS.

Up to Gen. xvii, 4, 5 (also in 1 Chron. i, 27; Neh. ix, 7), he is uniformly called ABRAM (Heb. Abram, אברון, father of elevation, or high father; Sept. I. History.—Abraham was a native of Chaldea, and descended, through Heber, in the ninth generation, from Sem the son of Noah (see F. Lee, Disertations, i, 78 sq.). His father was Terah, who had two other sons, Nahor and Haran. Terah maturely "before his father," leaving a son, Lot, and two daughters, Milcah and Iscah. Lot attached himself to his uncle Abraham; Milcah became the wife of her uncle Nahor; and Iscah, who was also called Sarai, became the wife of Abraham (Gen. xi, 28-29; comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 6, § 5). See Iscah. And see n. 5 to A. M. 2939, to the "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi, 28). The concise history in Genesis states nothing concerning the portion of his life prior to the age of about 75. There are indeed traditions, but they are too manifestly built up on the foundation of a few obscure intimations in Scripture to be entitled to any credit (see Walf's Biblical Legends). Thus it is intimated in Josh. xxiv, 2, that Terah and his family "served other gods" beyond the Euphrates; and on this has been found the romance that Terah was not only a worshipper, but a maker of idols; that the youthful Abraham, discovering the futility of such gods, destroyed all those his father had made, and justified himself to his father with various arguments and arguments with Terah, which we find repeated at length. Again, "Ur of the Chaldees" was the name of the place where Abraham was born, and from which he went forth to go, he knew not whither, at the call of God. Now Ur (NIN) means fire; and we may therefore read that he came forth from the fire of the Chaldees, on which has been built the story that Abraham was, for his disbelief in the established idols, cast by king Nimrod into a burning furnace, from which he was by special miracle delivered. And to this the premature death of Haran has suggested the addition that he, by way of punishment for his disbelief of the truths for which Abraham suffered, was marvulously destroyed by the same fire from which his brother was still more madly preserved. Again, the fact that Chaldea was the region in which astronomy was reputed to have been first cultivated, suggested that Abraham brought astronomy westward, and that he even taught that science to the Egyptians (Josephus, Ant. i, 6). It is now of course an established fact that these traditions are rejected by him, although the tone of some of his remarks is in agreement with them. Abraham is, by way of eminence, named first, but it appears that he was not the oldest (nor probably the youngest, but rather the second) of Terah's sons, born (perhaps by a second wife) when his father was 100 years old (see N. Alexander, Hist. Eccles. i, 287 sq.). Terah was seventy years old when the eldest son was born (Gen. xi, 32; xii, 4; xx, 12; comp. Hales, ii, 107); and that eldest son appears to have been Haran, from the fact that his brothers married his daughters; and that his daughter Sarai was only ten years of age when his brother Abraham (Gen. xxii, 17). Abraham must have been about 70 years old when the family quitted their native city of Ur, and went and abode in Charran (for he was 75 years old when he left Haran, and his stay there could not well have been longer than five years at most). The reason for the movement does not appear in the Old Testament. Jahn and others alleges that he left Char at the death of the third son of Terah, as he could not bear to remain in the place where Haran had died (Ant. i, 6, 5); while the apocryphal book of Judith, in conformity with the traditions still current among the Jews and Moslems, affirms that they were cast forth because they would no longer worship the gods of Chaldea (Judg. xi, 7). These versions are not found in Acts vii, 2-4: "The God of glory appeared to our father Abraham while he was (at Ur of the Chaldees) in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charron, and said unto him, Depart from thy land, and from thy kin-removed thither. See LOT. Thus was accomplished the dissolution of a connection which had been formed before the promise of children was given, and the disruption of which appears to have been necessary for that complete isolation of the coming race which the Divine purpose required. Immediately afterward the patriarch journeyed to the ships of Tarshish, and took a living sacrifice and formal reiteration of the promises which had been previously made to him of the occupation of the land in which he lived by a posteriority numerous as the dust (see M. Weber, Proles et salus Abraham promissa, Viteb 1877).

Not long after, he removed to the pleasant land of Bashan, east of the Jordan, the country of the sons of Amor, to which Lot had withdrawn. This burden was borne impatiently by these states, and they at length witheld their tribute. This brought upon them a ravaging visitation from Chedorlaomer and other four (perhaps tributary) kings, who scourcd the whole country east of the Jordan, and ended by defeating the kings of the plain, plundering their towns, and carrying the people away as slaves. Lot was among the sufferers. When this came to the ears of Abraham he immediately armed such of his slaves as were fit for war, in number 518, and being joined by the friendly Amorite chiefs, Anor, Eshcol, and Mamre, pursued the retiring invaders. They were overtaken near the springs of the Jordan; and their camp being attacked on opposite sides by night, they were thrown into disorder, and fled (see Thomson's Land and Book, 1, 320 sq.). Abraham and his men pursued them as far as the neighborhood of Damascus, and then returned with the spoil wherewith they came.
ABRAHAM

rbw. It would seem to be an older document, a fragment of Canaanite history preserved and sanctioned by Moses. The invasion was clearly another northern immigration or foray, for the chiefs or kings were of Sinhar (Babylonia), Ellasar (Assyria?), Elam (Persia), etc.; that it was not the first is evident from the vassalage of the kings of the cities of the plain; and it extended (see Gen. xiv, 5-7) far to the south, over the country. The patriarch appears here as the head of a small confederacy of chiefs, powerful enough to venture on a long pursuit to the head of the valley of the Jordan, to attack with success a large force, and not only to rescue Lot, but to roll back for a time the stream of northern immigration. He might have been with the gods on ten in the great mass of the people, at the dignity with which he refuses the character of a hireling. That it did not elate him above measure is evident from his reverence to Melchizedek, in whom he recognised one whose call was equal and consecrated rank superior to his own. See Melchiz-dek.

Soon after his return to Mamre the faith of Abraham was rewarded and encouraged, not only by a more distinct and detailed repetition of the promises formerly made to him, but by the confirmation of a solemn contract, as nearly as might be, “after the manner of men,” between him and God. See Con. xvi. That now he fully understood that his promised posterity were to grow up into a nation under foreign bondage; and that, in 400 years after (or, strictly, 405 years, counting from the birth of Isaac to the exode), they should come forth from that bondage as a nation, to take possession of the land in which he sojourned (Gen. xiv). After ten years’ re-idence in Canaan (B.C. 2078), Sarai being then 75 years old, and having long been accounted barren, chose to put her own interpretation upon the promised blessing of a progeny to Abraham, and persuaded him to take her woman-slave Hagar, an Egyptian, as a secondary, or combined, wife, with the view that whatever child might proceed from this union should be accounted her own. See HAGAR. The son who was born to Abraham by Hagar, and who received the name of Ishmael [see Ishmael], was accordingly brought up as the heir of his father and of the promise (see Gen. xvi). Thirteen years after, when Abraham was 90 years old and was favored with explicit declarations of the Divine purposes. He was reminded that the promise to him was that he should be the father of many nations; and to indicate this intention his name was now changed (see C. Iken, De mutatione nominum Abrahami et Sarra in his Dissertation, Philol. 1) from ABRAH to ABRAHAM (see Philo, Opp.
xi, 6; Ewald, Int. Gesch. i, 373; Lengerke, Kev.
i, 227). See NAME. The Divine Being then solemnly renewed the covenant to be a God to him and to the race that should spring from him; and in token of that covenant directed that he and she should receive in their flesh the sign of circumcision. See Circumc.
ssion. Abundant blessings were promised to Ishmael; but it was then first announced, in distinct terms, that the heir of the special promises was not yet born, and that the barren Sarai, then 90 years old, should have twelve months thence to be his mother. Then also her name was changed from Sarai to Sarah (prin-cessa); and, to commemorate the laughter with which the prostrate patriarch received such strange tidings, it was directed that the name of Isaac (laugher) should be given to the future child. The very same day, in obedience to the Divine ordinance, Abraham himself, his son Ishmael, and his household and his house-slave, were all circumcised (Gen. xvii, spring, B.C.
2064). Three months after this, as Abraham sat in his tent door during the heat of the day, he saw three travelers approaching, and hastened to meet them, and hospitally pressed upon them refreshment and rest (Derst, De tribu viva Abraham appur. Rest. 1707).

They assented, and under the shade of a terebinth,
or rather an oak (q. v.) tree, partook of the abundant fare which the patriarch and his wife provided, while Abraham himself stood by in respectful attendance, in accordance with Oriental customs (see Shaw, Trav.
1, 207; comp. H deny, ix, 206 sq.; xxiv, 621; Odysse.
viii, 10; Judg. vi, 19). From the manner in which one of the two travelers related how his visitors were no other than the Lord himself and two attendant angels in human form (see J. R. Kiessling, De divinis Abrahami hospitibus, Lips. 1748). The promise of a son by Sarah was renewed; and when Sarah herself, who overheard this within the tent, laughed inwardly at the tidings, which, on another occasion, she at first disbeliefed, she incurred the striking rebuke, “Is any thing too hard for Jehovah?” The strangers then addressed themselves to their journey, and Abraham walked some way with them. The two angels went forward in the direction of Sodom, while the Lord made known to him that, for their enormous iniquities, Sodom and the other “cities of the plain” were about to be made signal monuments of his wrath and of his moral government. Moved by compassion and by remembrance of Lot, the patriarch ventured, reverently
but perseveringly, to intercede for the doomed Sodom;
and at length obtained a promise that, if but ten righ-eous souls could be found there, the city should be saved for their sake. Early the next morning Abraham arose to ascertain the result of this concession;
and when he looked toward Sodom, the smoke of its destruction, rising “like the smoke of a furnace,” made known to him its terrible overthrow (Gen. xix, 1-8).

See SODOM. Tradition still points out the supposed site of this appearance of the Lord to Abraham. About a mile from Hebron is a beautiful and massive oak, which still bears Abraham’s name (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 875; ii, 414). The residence of the patriarch was called “the oaks (A. V. ‘plain’) of Mamre”
(Gen. xiii, 18; xviii, 1); but the spot is doubtful, since the tradition in the time of Josephus (War.
iv, 9, 7) was attached to a terebinth. See MAMRE.
This latter tree no longer remains; but there is no doubt that it stood within the ancient enclosure, which is still called “Abraham’s House.” A fair was held beneath it in the time of Constantine; and it remained a favorite place of devotion, and still more today under the name of the Martyr, Palestine, p. 142.)—The same year Sarah gave birth to the long-promised son, and, according to provisional direction, the name of Isaac was given to him.
See ISAAC. This greatly altered the position of Ishmael, who had hitherto appeared as the heir both of the temporal and the spiritual heritage; whereas he had now to share the former, and could not but know that the latter was limited to Isaac. This ap-pers to have created much ill-feeling both on his part and that of his mother toward the child; which was in some way manifested so pointedly, on occasion of the festivities which attended the weaning, that the child Ishmael was, as the language of the Tell el-ney, Palestine, p. 142.)—The same year Sarah gave stood) [see Moriam], and there offer up in sacrifice

the son of his affection, and the heir of so many hopes and promises, which his death must nullify. (See Hufnagel, Christ. Anf. 4. 2, vii, 592 sq.; J. G. Grofür Phil. u. kath. Theol. 20.) It is probable that humans sacrifices already existed; and as, when they did exist, the offerings were not for the purpose of saving the most meritorious, it may have seemed reasonable to Abraham that he should not withhold from his own God the costly sacrifice which the heathen of-fed to their idols (comp. Hygin. Fab. 98; Tzetzes in Lyripror. 40, ed. Canter.; see Apollodor. Bibl. i, 5, 1; Euseb. Prep. Ev. 1, x, 40). The trial and peculiar character of this act was pointed out by the child was considered the likelihood that his loy could be supplied.
But Abraham's faith shrunk not, assured that what God had promised he would certainly perform, and "that he was able to restore Isaac to him even from the dead" (Heb. xi, 17-19), and he rendered a ready, however painful, obedience. Assisted by two of his servants, he prepared wood suitable for the purpose, and without delay set out on his melancholy journey. On the third day he described the appointed place; and, informing his attendants that he and his son would go some distance farther to worship and then return, he proceeded to the spot. To the touching question of his servants, (Heb. xi, 19), "Shalt thou indeed bring thy son, and offer him up a sacrifice by thee on the heathen." He no less certainly than his master replied by expressing his faith that God himself would provide the sacrifice; and probably he availed himself of this opportunity of acquainting him with the Divine command. At least, that the communication was made either then or just after is unquestionable; for no one can suppose that a young man could, against his will, have been bound with cords and laid out as a victim on the wood of the altar. Isaac was most certainly have been slain by his father's uplifted hand, not the angel of Jehovah interposed at the critical moment to arrest the fatal stroke. A ram which had become entangled in a thicket was seized and offered;
and a name was given to the place (Jehovah-jirthe Lord will provide)" allusive to the believing answer which Abraham had given to his son's inquiry respecting the victim. The promises before made to Abraham—of numerous descendants, superior in power to his enemies, and of those blessings which his spiritual progeny, and particularly the Messiah, would be sent to all mankind—were again confirmed in the most solem manner; for Jehovah spoke by himself (comp.
Heb. vi. 13, 17), that such should be the rewards of his uncompromising obedience (see C. F. Bauer, De Semina ad Abrahamum juramento, Viteb. 1746). The father and son then rejoined their servants, and returned to rejoicing to Beersheba (Gen. xxvi, 19).

Sarah died at the age of 127 years, being then or near Hebron, B.C. 2927. This loss first taught Abraham the necessity of acquiring possession of a family septagon in the land of his sojournings (see J. S. Sem-ter, The Pentateuch, p. 344 sq.; Eichhorn, Comm. in Heb. Hal. 1756). His choice fell on the cave of Machpelah
(q. v.), and, after a striking negotiation [see BARGAIN] with the owner in the gate of Hebron, he purchased it, and had it legally secured to him, with the field in which it stood and the trees grew thereon (see Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 263; Ephes. iii, 17; Jer. vii. 19), for an inheritance, in the desire of the Land of Promise (Gen. xxiii). The next care of Abraham was to provide a suitable wife for his son Isaac. It has always been the practice among pas-son tribes to keep up the family ties by intermarriages of blood-relations (Burckhardt, Notes, p. 154); and now Abraham had a further inducement in the desire to maintain the purity of the separated race from forgers and idolatrous connections. He therefore sent his son and confidential steward Eliezer (q. v.), under the bend of a solemn oath to discharge his mission faith-falily, to renew the intercourse between his family and that of his brother Nahor, whom he had left behind in Charran. He prospered in his important mission, and in due time returned, bringing with him Rebekah (q. v.), the daughter of Nahor's son Bethuel, who became the wife of Isaac, and was installed as chief lady of the camp, in the separate tent which Sarah had occupied (Gen. xxiv). Some time after Abraham him-selves, he took a wife named Keturah, by whom he had several children. See KETURAH.

These marriages with Ishmael, seem to have been portioned off by their father in his lifetime, and sent into the east and southeast, that there might be no danger of their interference with Isaac, the divinely appointed heir. There was time for this; for Abraham lived to the age of 175 years, 100 of which years he had spent in the land of Canaan. He died B.C. 1899, and was buried by his two oldest sons in the family sepulchre which he purchased of the Hittites (Gen. xxv, 1-10).—Kitto, s. v.

II. Traditions and Literature.—The Orientals, as well Christians and Mohammedans, have preserved some knowledge of Abraham, and highly commend his character; indeed, a history of his life, though it would be highly fanciful, might easily be compiled from their traditions. Arabic accounts name his father Azar (Abulfeda, Hist. Antit. p. 21), with which some have compared the contemporary Adores, king of Damascus (Just. xxxvi, 2; 2; see Josephus, Ant. i, 7, 1; Bertheau, Gesch. p. 217; Schmid, Gesch. i, 159). His name is given as Adna (Herbelot, Bib. Orient. s. v.
Abraham). The Persian magi believe him to have been the same with their founder, Zoroaster, or Zoro-aster; while the Zabians, their rivals and opponents, lay claim to a similar honor (Hyde, Rel. Persar. p. 28 sq.). Some have affirmed that he reigned at Damascus (Nicol. Damascus apud Josephus, Ant. i, 7, 2; Justin xxxvi), that he dwelt long in Egypt (Artapan. et Eupolem. apud Euseb. Prepar. i, 17, 18), that he taught the Egyptians astronomy and arithmetic (Joseph. Ant. i,
8, 2), that he invented letters and the Hebrew language (Suidas in Abrahams), or the characters of the Syriouns and Chaldeans (Isidor. Hisp. Orig. i, 8), that he was the author of several works, among others of the farous book entitled Jezira, or the Creation—a work
mentioned in the Talmud, and greatly valued by some rabhins; but those who have examined it without prejudice speak of it with contempt. See CARALA.

In the first ages of Christianity, the Persian and Semitic authors regarded the Old Testament as the Ivan's Revelations" (Epiphan. Haeres. xxxix, 5). Athanasius, in his Synopsis, speaks of the "Assumption of Abraham," and Origen (in Luc. Homil. 35) notices an apocryphal book of Abraham's, wherein two angels, one good, the other bad, dispute concerning his damnation or salvation.
The Jews (Rab. Selem, in Baba Bathra, c. i) attribute to him the Morning Prayer, the 94th Psalm, a Treatise on Idolatry, and other works. The authorities on all these points, and for still other traditions respecting Abraham, may be found collected in Fabrici Cod.
Pseudepigraphorum. V. 344 sq.; Eiselen's Hist. Israel. i, Deuth. i, 490; Otho, Lex. Bobp. p. 2 sq.; Beck, ad
Larg. Chron. i, 267; Stanley, Jewish Church, p. 2 sq.

We are informed (D'Herbelot, ut sup.) that A.D.
1119, Abraham's tomb was discovered near Hebron,
in which Jacob, likewise, and Isaac were interred.
The bodies were found entire, and many gold and siler lamps were found in the place. The Christians have so great a respect for his tomb, that they make it their fourth pilgrimage (the three others being Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem). See HERON. The Christians built a church over the cave of Machpelah, where Abraham was buried, which the Turks have converted into a mosque, and call it the tomb of approaching (Quaresm. Elmeid. ii, 772). The supposed oak of Mamre, where Abraham received the three angels, was likewise honored by Christians, as also by the Jews and Pagans (see above). The Koran (iv. 124) entitles him "the friend of God" (see Michaelis,

III. Typical Character.—The life and character of Abraham were in many respects typical. 1. He and his family may be regarded as a type of the Church of God in after ages. They, indeed, constituted God’s ancient Church. Not that many scattered patriarchal and family churches did not remain; such was that of Melchizedek; but a visible church relation was established between Abraham’s family and the Most High, signified by the visible and distinguishing sacrament of circumcision, and followed by new and enlarged revelations of truth. Two purposes were apparently served by this—the preservation of the true doctrine of salvation in the world, which is the great and solemn duty of every branch of the Church of God, and the manifestation of that truth to others. Both were done by Abraham. Wherever he sojourned he built his altars to the true God, and publicly celebrated his worship; and, as we learn from the Apostle Paul, he lived in tents in preference to settling in the land of Canaan, though it had been given to him for a possession, in order that he might thus proclaim his faith in the eternal inheritance of which Canaan was a type (Gal. iii, 16-29). 2. The numerous national posterity promised to Abraham was also a type of the spiritual seed, that true member of the Church, Christ, springing from the Messiah, of whom Isaac was the symbol. Thus the Apostle Paul expressly distinguishes between the fleshly and the spiritual seed of Abraham (Gal. iv, 22-31). 3. The faithful offering up of Isaac, with its result, was probably the transaction in which Abraham, more clearly than in any other, “saw the day of Christ, and was glad” (John viii, 56). He received Isaac from the dead, says Paul, “in a figure” (Heb. xi, 19). This could be a figure of nothing but the resurrection of our Lord; and if so, Isaac’s being laid upon the altar was a figure of his sacrificial death, scenically and most impressively represented to Abraham. 4. The transaction of the expulsion of Hagar was also a type. It was an allegory in action, by which the Apostle Paul teaches us (Gal. iv, 22-31) to understand that the son of the bondwoman represented those who are under the law; and the child of the freewoman those who by faith in Christ are supernaturally begotten of the family of God. The casting out of the bondwoman and her son represents the expulsion of the unbelieving Jews from the Church of God, which was to be composed of true believers of all nations, all of whom, whether Jews or Gentiles, were to become “fellow heirs.”

V. Covenant Relation.—1. Abraham is to be regarded, further, as standing in a federal or covenant relation, not only to his natural seed, but specially and eminently to all believers. “The Gospel,” we are told by Paul (Gal. iii, 8), “was preached to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed.” “Abraham believed in God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.” In other respects, he was justified (Gen. xv, 6). A covenant of gratuitous justification through faith was made with him and his believing descendants; and the rite of circumcision, which was not confined to his posterity by Sarah, but appointed in every branch of his family, was the sign or sacrament of this covenant of grace, and so remained till it was displaced by the sacraments appointed by Christ. Wherever that sign was, it declared the doctrine and offered the grace of this covenant—free justification by faith, and its glorious results—to all the tribes that proceeded from Abraham. “The grace is offered to us by the Gospel, who become “the heirs of Abraham’s seed,” his spiritual children, with whom the covenant is established through the same faith, and are thus made “the heirs with him of the same promise.” 2. Abraham is also exhibited to us as the representatives of true believers; and in this especially, that the true nature of faith was exhibited in him. This great principle was marked in Abraham with the following characters: an entire, unhesitating belief in the word of God; an unaltering trust in all his promises; a steady regard to his almighty power, leading him to overlook all apparent difficulties and impossibilities in every case where God had explicitly promised, and habitual, cheerful, and entire obedience. The Apostle has described faith in Heb. xi, 1, and that faith is seen living and acting in all its energy in Abraham. (Niemeier, Charakl. ii, 72 sq.)

V. The intended offering up of Isaac is not to be supposed as viewed by Abraham as an act springing out of his love to his own child. Though this may have somewhat lessened the shock which the command would otherwise have occasioned his natural sympathies. The immolation of human victims, particularly of that which was most precious, the favorite, the first-born child, appears to have been a common usage among many early nations, more especially the tribes by which Abraham was surrounded. It was the distinguishing rite among the worshippers of Moloch; at a later period of the Jewish history, it was practised by a king of Moab; and it was undoubtedly derived by the Carthaginians from their Phoenician ancestors on the shores of Tyre, Sidon, and Lebanon; and in the worship of Moloch, it was in unison with the character of the religion and of its deity. It was the last act of a dark and sanguinary superstition, which rose by regular gradation to this complete triumph over human nature. The god who was propitiated by these offerings had been satisfied with more cheap and vulgar victims; he had been glutted to the full with human suffering and with human blood. In general, it was the final mark of the subjugation of the national mind to an inhuman and domineering priesthood. But the Mosaic religion held human sacrifices in abhorrence; and the God of the Abrahamic family, uniformly beneficent, had imposed no duties which entailed human suffering, had demanded no offerings which were repugnant to the better feelings of our nature. The command to offer Isaac as a “burnt-offering” was, for these reasons, a trial the more severe to Abraham’s faith. He must, therefore, have had a deep and comprehensive belief of God’s good and beneficent purposes, which had left the mystery to be explained by God himself. His was a simple act of unhesitating obedience to the command of God; the last proof of perfect reliance on the certain accomplishment of the Divine promises. Isaac, so miraculously bestowed, could be as miraculously removed; and Abraham, such is the command of the Christian Apostle, “believed that God could even raise him up from the dead” (Heb. xi, 17).

VI. The wide and deep impression made by the character of Abraham upon the ancient world is proved by the reverence which people of almost all nations and countries have paid to him, and the manner in which he and events connected with him have been treated in their mythology and their religious traditions. Jews, Magians, Sabians, Indians, and Mohammedans have claimed him as the great patriarch and founder of their several sects; and his history has been embellished with a variety of fictions. The ethnological relations of the race of Abraham have been lately treated by Ewald (Geschichte des Volkes Israel), and by Berthau (Geschichte der Israeliten), who maintain that Abraham was the leader of tribes who migrated from Chaldea to the south-west. See ARABIA.

ABRAHAM'S BOSSOM (το κοινον Αβρααμ). There was no name which conveyed to the Jews the same associations as that of Abraham. As undoubtedly he was in the highest state of felicity of which departed spirits are capable, "to be with Abraham" implied the current and permanent possession of the same felicity; and "Abraham's bosom" meant to be in repose and happiness with him (comp. Josephus, De Macc. § 13; 4 Macc. xiii. 16). The latter phrase is obviously derived from the custom of sitting or reclining at table which prevailed among the Jews in and before the time of Christ. See ACCOMMODATION. By the head of one person was necessarily brought almost into the bosom of the one who sat above him, or at the top of the triclinium, and the guests were so arranged that the most favored were placed so as to bring them into that situation with respect to the host (entication xiii. 23; xxii. 20). See Bosom. These Jewish images and modes of thought are admirably illustrated by Lightfoot, Schütten, and Wettstein, who illustrate Scripture from rabbinical sources. It was quite usual to describe a just person as being with Abraham, or lying on Abraham's bosom; and as such images were unobjectionable, Jesus accommodated his speech to the Jews and rendered to them a lifting of the veil by familiar notions, when, in the beautiful parable of the rich man and Lazarus, he describes the condition of the latter after death under these conditions (Luk. xvi. 21, 22).—Kitto, s. v. Abraham, A Sancta Clara, a Roman Catholic preacher, highly popular in Vienna, and remarkable for his powers of delivery. He was born at Uestrich, Mejerle, and he was born in Baden, June 2, 1624. In 1652 he entered the order of barefooted Augustinians, and became distinguished, as a preacher, for directness, truth, and pungency, mixed with rudeness. He died Dec. 1, 1729. His sermons and other writings are contained in (unpublished) 38 volumes, ten of which passed after his original (Lindas, 20 vols. 1853-50). His Grammatica Religionis, containing 55 sermons, was reprinted in Latin, 1719 (Colin. 4to).

Abraham, Usquak, a Portuguese Jew, who translated the celebrated Spanish Bible of the Jews, first printed at Ferrara, in 1553. It is translated word for word from the Sinaitische Werke, with the use of many old Spanish words, only employing the Synagogue, renders it very obscure. Astieriola (mostly omitted in the Holland ed. of 1630) are placed against certain words to denote that the exact meaning of the original Hebrew words is difficult to determine.—Furst, Bib. Abrahmas (1), a sect of heretics, named from their founder Abraham (or Ibrahim), of Antioch, A.D. 856. They were charged with the Paulician errors, and some of them with idolatry and licentiousness; but for these charges we have only the word of their persecutors. See PAULICANS. (2), a sect of Delits in Bohemia, who existed as late as 1782, and professed the religion of Abraham before his circumcision, admitting no scriptures but the dogmatism and the Lord's prayer. They believed in one God, but rejected the Trinity, and other doctrines of revelation. They rejected the doctrines of original sin, the immortality of the soul, and future rewards and punishments. They were required by Joseph II to incorporate themselves with one of the religions tolerated in the empire; and, in case of non-compliance, threatened with banishment. As the result of obstinate refusal to comply with the imperial command, they were transported to Transylvania. Many persons are still found in Bohemia, between whom and the Abrahmites some connection may be traced. They are frequently called Nihilists and Delits. (See an anonymous Grec. der Gothen. Dietsen (1785); Grégoire, Hist. des Sacer. relig. V, 419 sq.)

Abroas (1), (αποστασια και αποστασεις), a mystical word composed of the Greek letters α, β, ρ, ι, ε, κ, which together, according to Greek numeation, make up the number 365. Basilius taught that there were 365 heavens between the earth and the empyrean, and as many different sorts of angels; and he Chaldean name Abroas to the Supreme Lord of all these heavens (Irenaeus, lib. i, cap. xxiv, 67). See BASILIDES. In his system there was an imitation of the Pythagorean philosophy with regard to numbers, as well as an adoption of Egyptian hieroglyphical symbols. Jerome seems to intimate that this was done in imitation of the practice of the represented Mithras, the deity of the Persians; or the sun, otherwise Apollo, the god of healing. For instance:

\(\lambda = 600\), Meithras, or Mithras = 605. Probably Basilius intended, in this way, to express the number of intelligences which compose the Pleroma, or the Deity under various manifestations, or the sun, in which Pythagoras supposed that the intelligence resided which produced the world.

Belsermons derives the word from the Coptice; the syriac σαλβαδας, (which the Grecian word was probably derived from) is fomented into σαλβαδος, or σαλβασ, or σαλβας, as the last letter of this word could only be expressed by Σ, Σ, or Σ (signifying "word," and »ai, "blessed, holy, adorable," abroas being, therefore, "adorable word." Others make it to signify "the new word." Beausobre derives it from διπλογ, which he renders, perhaps, "to be divided in two," and either ευδη, "to see," or αυδη, "safety.

Other assume that it is composed of the initial letters of the following words:

The latest suggestion is that it is the Aramaic for נֶאֶם נֶאֶם, "this is the great seal," read backwards. See ABRACADABRA.

(2) Abroas Gems or Images.—A great number of relics (gems and plates, or tablets of metal) have been discovered, chiefly in Egypt, bearing the word abroas, or an image supposed to designate the god of that name. There has been much discussion about these relics, some regarding them as all of Basilian origin; others holding them, in part or in whole, to be Egyptian. Description of them may be found in Massignon, "Abroas seu de Gem. Basil. Disquisitio," edited by Ciflett (Ant. 1657, 4to); Montfaucou, Palaeogr.
Geoc. lib. ii, cap. viii; Passeri, De Gemmis Basiliciam, in Gori, Theaurum Gem. Astrif. (Floer. 1750, 3 vols. 4to); Bellermann, Ueb. die Gemmen der Alten mit den Abrasusbildes (Berlin, 1817–1819); Wahal, Access. coins, Medals, etc. (Lond. 1828, 8vo); Kopp, Palæographica Critica (Mannh. 1827, pt. i). Master (in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. vol. 3) has given a classification of them which will tend greatly to facilitate their study. Some of them contain the Abrasus image alone, or with a shield, spear, or other emblems of Gnostic origin. Some have Jewish words (e.g. Jehovah, Adonai, etc.); others combine the Abrasax with Persian, Egyptian, or Grecian symbols. Montfaucon has divided these gems into seven classes: 1. Those having the head of a cock, the symbol of the sun; 2. Those having the head of a lion, expressive of the heat of the sun: these have the inscription Mit-thras; 3. Serapis; 4. Sphinxes, apes, and other animals; 5. Human figures, with the names of Iao, Sahas, Adonai, etc.; 6. Inscriptions without figures; 7. Monstrous forms. He gives 300 fac-similes of gems with different devices and inscriptions, one of which is shown in the accompanying cut from the collection of Viscount Scangford. It is of an oval form, convex on both sides, and both the surface of the stone and the impression of the sculpture highly polished.

On one side is represented a right line crossed by three curved ones, a figure very common on gnostic gems, and perhaps representing the golden 'candelabrum.' This is surrounded by the legend AB-PACAE IAO, words also of very common use, and which are to be found either by themselves, or accompanied by every variety of figure. The word IAO, in a variety of modifications, is also found on most of the gems of the Gnostics; and, next to Abrasax, seems to have been the most portentous and mysterious. It is generally supposed to be a corruption of the tetragrammaton, יהוה, Jehovah, to which the Jews attached so awful an importance. Irenæus supposes it has allusion to the name by which the Divine character of Christ was expressed; as if the Aυ could have been intended to be the Alpha and Omega of the Revelation, and the character HAD stood for Jesus the 'Redeemer, the first and the last.' See Mosheim, Comm. i, 417; Master, Hist. du Gnosticisme, t. iii; Neander, Gnost. System, 1818; Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 401; Lardner, Works, viii, 352 sqq.; Jerem. Ch. Hist. p. 149; Schmid, Pent. (who shows that not all Abrasax gems were of Gnostic origin): King, The Gnostics and their Remains (Lond. 1864), which contains various cuts of gems, but is otherwise of little value. See Gnosticism; Basilides.

Aberch (Heb. abrek, עבך, Sept. κρύπτω, Vulg. genu flexerectus), a word that occurs only in the original of Gen. xii, 43, where it is used in proclaiming the authority of Joseph. Something similar happened in the case of Mordecai, but then several words were employed (Esth. vi, 11). If the word be Hebrew, it is probably an imperative (not directly, Buxtorf, Thes. Gramm. p. 134; nor the first pers. fut., as explained by Aben-Ezra, but the infinit. absolute used imperatively, Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 19) of בְּכָר in Hiphil, and would then mean, as in our version, "bow the knee" (so the Vulg.; Erasmus, Luther, Aquila, and the Ven. Gr. version). We are indeed assured by Wilkinson (Ant. of Egypt, ii, 24) that the rubric describing the present day by the Arabs when requiring a camel to kneel and receive its load. But Luther (subsequently) and others (e.g. Onkelos, the Targum, Syr. and Persic versions) suppose the word to be a compound of בְּכָר, "the father of the star," and to be of Chaldean origin. The Sept. and Samar. understand vaguely a herald. It is, however, probably Egyptian. Slightly modified as to suit the prose, and most later writers are inclined with De Rossi (Ez. Egyptian p. 1) to repair to the Coptic, in which Aberch or Abrik means "bow the head"—an interpretation essentially agreeing with those of Pfeiffer (Opp. i, 94) and Stobbe (Oenop. i, 4, 5, ed. Water). See Saltetan. But Origen (Hexap. i, 49, ed. Montfaucon), a native of Egypt, and in whose comment, in loc. where he knew the Semitic languages, are the opinion that Aberek means "a native Egyptian;" and when we consider how important it was that Joseph should once be regarded as a foreigner (see Abomination), it has in this sense a signification, as a proclamation of his origin, which no other interpretation can (see Ameside, De Abrach. Egyptian. Lond. 1750) osburn thinks the title still appears in Joseph's tomb as Ab-resh, "royal priest" (Mon. Hist. of Eg. ii, 99).

Ab'salaim (Heb. Abshalam, fully Ab-shalaim, גָּשָׁלֵי, 1 Kings, xx, 10, 12, father of pearl, i.e. peaceful; Sept. Αβισαλαμ, Josephus, Αβισαλα, Ant. xvi, 4, 4), the name of three men.

1. The third son of David, and his only one (comp. 1 Kings i, 6) by Maacah, the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur (2 Sam. iii, 3; 1 Chron. iii, 2), born B.C. cir. 1050. He was particularly noted for his personal beauty, especially his profusion of hair, the inconveniency weight of which often (not necessarily every year), as in the Auth. Ver., compelled him to cut it off, when it was found to weigh over 200 shekels after the king's weight—an amount variously estimated from 127.4 to 7 ounces (A. Ch.) and, at least, designating an extraordinary curiosity (2 Sam. xiv, 25–26; see Journal de Travoux, 1702, p. 175; Dieudich, Ueb. d. Haare Absaloms, Göt. 1776; Handb. d. A. T. p. 142 sq.; Bochart, Opp. ii, 861).

David's other child by Maacah was a daughter named Tamar, who was also very beautiful. She became the object of lustful regard to her half-brother Amnon, David's eldest son; and was violated by him, in pursuance of a plot suggested by the artful Jonadab (2 Sam. xiii, 1–20). Cir. B.C. 1030. See Ammon. In all cases where polygamy is allowed we find that the honor of a sister is in the guardianship of her full brother, rather than than that of her father, whose interest in her is considered less peculiar and intimate (see Nieluhr, Beschr. p. 29). We trace this notion even in the time of Jacob (Gen. xxxiv, 6, 13, 25 sq.). So in this case the wrong of Tamar was taken up by Absalom, who kept her secluded in his own house, and brooded silently over the injury he had sustained. It was not until two years had passed that Absalom found opportunity for the bloody revenge he had meditated. He then held a great sheep-shearing at Beal-hason near Ephraim, to which he invited all the king's sons, and, to null suspicion, he also solicited the presence of his father. As he expected, David declined for himself, but allowed Amnon and the other princes to attend. They feasted together; and when they were warm with wine Ammon was set upon and slain by the servants of Absalom, according to the previous directions of their master. He was found dead, and publicly took possession of that portion of his father’s kingdom which had been left behind in Jerusalem; thus fulfilling Nathan’s prophecy (2 Sam. xiii, 11). This was not only a mode by which the succession to the throne might be confirmed [see ARISHAI; comp. Herodotus, iii, 68], but in the present case, as suggested by the wily counsellor, this villainous measure would divide the people to throw themselves the more unrestrainedly into his cause, from the assurance that no possibility of reconciliation between him and his father remained. But David had left friends who watched over his interests. Hushai had not then arrived. Soon after he came, when a council of war was held to consider the course of operations to be taken against David. Abihitho wel counselled that the king should be pursued that very night, and smitten while he was “weary and weak handed, and before he had time to recover strength.” Hushai, however, whose object was to gain time for David, specially urged, from the known valor of the king, the possibility and disastrous consequences of a defeat, and advised that all Israel should be assembled against him in such force as it would be impossible for him to withstand. Falsely for Absalom, the counsel of Hushai was preferred to that of Abihitho; and time was thus afforded for the soldiers, by the help of the king’s followers, to collect his resources, as well as for the people to reflect upon the undertaking in which so many of them had embarked. David soon raised a large force, which he properly organized and separated into three divisions, commanded severally by Joab, Abishai, and Ittai of Gath. The king himself intended to take the chief command; but the people refused to allow him to risk his valued life, and the command then devolved upon Joab. The battle took place in the borders of the forest of Ephraim; and the tactics of Joab, in drawing the enemy into the wood, and there hemming them in, so that they were destroyed with ease, eventually, under the providence of God, decided the action against Absalom. Twenty thousand of his troops were slain, and the rest fled to their homes. Absalom himself fled on a swift mule; but as he went, the boughs of a terebinth (or oak; see Thomson’s Land and Book, 1, 374; ii, 224) tree caught in the long hair which he had cut off in his prime, suspended there (comp. Josephus, Ant. vii, 10, 2; Celsii HIEROB. i, 48). The charge which David had given to the troops to respect the life of Absalom prevented any one from slaying him; but when Joab heard of it, he hastened to the spot and pierced him through with three darts. His head was then taken down and cast into a pit there in the forest, and a heap of stones was raised upon it as a sign of abhorrence (see Thomson, Ibid. ii, 224). David’s fondness for Absalom was unextinguished by all that had passed; and as he sat, awaiting tidings of the battle, at the gate of Mahanaim, he was probably more anxious to learn how the child of his heart was gained; and no sooner did he hear that Absalom was dead, than he retired to the chamber above the gate, to give vent to his paternal anguish. The victors, as they returned, slunk into the town like criminals when they heard the bitter wallings of the king: “O my father, Abihitho! how could I have forsaken the bower of my father’s house, and come out to meet Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!” The consequences of this weakness might have been most dangerous, had not Joab gone up to him, and, after sharply rebuking him for thus discouraging those who had risked their lives in his cause, induced the king to go down and cheer the returning warriors by his presence (2 Chron. xii, 8; comp. Psa. iii, title). B.C. cir. 1023.—Kitto, s. v.

Absalom is elsewhere mentioned only in 2 Sam. xx, 6; 1 Kings ii, 7, 28; xv, 2, 10; 2 Chron. xi, 20, 21.
from the last two of which passages he appears to have left only a daughter (having lost three sons, 2 Sam. xiv, 27; comp. xviii, 18), who was the grandmother of Abijah (q. v.). Absalom's Tomb. A remarkable monument bearing this name makes a conspicuous figure in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, outside Jerusalem; and it has been noticed and described by almost all travellers. It is close by the lower bridge over the Kidron, and is a square isolated block hewn out from the rocky ledge so as to leave an area or niches around it. The body of this monument is about 24 feet square, and is ornamented on each side with two columns and two half columns of the Ionic order, with pilasters at the corners. The architrave exhibits triglyphs and Doric ornaments. The elevation is about 18 or 20 feet to the top of the architrave, and thus far it is wholly cut from the rock. But the adjacent rock is here not so high as in the adjoining tomb of Zecharias (so called), and therefore the upper part of the tomb has been carried up with mason-work of large stones. This consists, first, of two square layers, of which the upper one is smaller than the lower; and then a small dome or cupola runs up into a low spire, which appears to have spread out a little at the top, like an opening flame. This mason-work is perhaps 20 feet high, giving to the whole an elevation of about 40 feet. There is a small excavated chamber in the body of the tomb, into which a hole had been broken through one of the sides several centuries ago. Its present Mohammedan name is Tasur Faroun (Bibl. Sac. 1843, p. 54). The old travellers who refer to this tomb, as well as Calmet after them, are satisfied that they find the history of it in 2 Sam. xvii, 18, which states that Absalom, having no son, built a monument to keep his name in remembrance, and that this monument was called "Absalom's Place" (אַבָּלֹם וָאֵצֶל, יִשָּׂא). The Hand, as in the margin; Sept. Χειρ Αβσαλωμοῦ, Vulg. Manua Absalom), that is, index, memorial, or monument. See Hand. Later writers, however, dispute such a connection between this history and any of the existing monuments on this spot. "The style of architecture and embellishment," writes Dr. Robinson (Bib. Rev. i, 519 sq.), "shows that they are of a later period than most of the other countless sepulchres round about the city," which, with few exceptions, are destitute of architectural ornament. But the foreign ecclesiastics, who crowded to Jerusalem is the fourth century, found these monuments here; and, of course, it became an object to refer them to persons mentioned in the Scriptures. Yet, from that day to this, tradition seems never to have become fully settled as to the individuals whose names they should bear. The Itin. Hieros. in A.D. 333 speaks of the two monolithic monuments as the tombs of Isaiah and Hezekiah. Adamnus, about A.D. 867, mentions only one of these, and calls it the tomb of Jehoshaphat. . . . The historians of the Crusades apparently have noticed these tombs. The first mention of a tomb of Absalom is by Benjamin of Tudela, who gives to the other the name of king Uziah; and from that time to the present day the accounts of travellers have been varying and inconsistent." Yet so eminent an architect as Prof. Cockrell speaks of this tomb of Absalom as a monument of antiquity, perfectly corresponding with the ancient notices (Anc. Num., Jan. 28, 1843). Notwithstanding the above objections, therefore, we are inclined to identify the site of this monument with that of Scripture. Josephus (Ant. v, 10, 3) says that it was "a marble pillar in the king's dale [the Valley of Jehoshaphat, which led to the "king's gardens"], two furlongs distance, six cubits high," as if it were even in Christ's time. The simple monolithic pillar may naturally have been replaced in after times by a more substantial monument. See Pillar. It is worthy of remark that the tradition which connects it with Absalom is not a monochon merely; the Jewish residents likewise, who were not likely to borrow Christian legends, have been in the habit from time immemorial of casting a stone at it and spitting, as they pass by it, in order to show their horror at the rebellious conduct of this unnatural son. (See Williams, Holy City, ii, 451; Olin's Travels, ii, 145; Pococke, East, ii, 54; Richter, Wulf., p. 33; Rosenmüller's Anthologia Canthi, ii, 14; Wilson, Landes des Bible, i, 458; Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 482; Crit. Soc. Theol. Rev. i, 676; Frith, Palest. Photographed, p. 21.)

2. (Sept. Ἀβσαλωμός). The father of Bathsheba (1 Mac. xi, 70) and Jonathan (1 Mac. xii, 21), two of the generals under the Maccabees.

3. (Sept. Ἀβσαλωμ.): One of the two Jews who gave the foreigner an opportunity to speak to the ruler Lysias (2 Mac. xi, 17, in some "Absalon").

Absalon, or Axel, archbishop of Lund, in Sweden, and prince of the kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, was born in the island of Zealand, in 1126. After finishing his studies at Paris, he devoted himself to the priesthood, and was appointed bishop of Roskilde in 1158. He was at the same time made prime-minister and general of the army of Waldemar. In the latter capacity he overcame the Wends, and established Christianity there. In 1178 he was made archbishop of Lund, but still retained the see of Roskilde, and remained in Zealand until 1191. He also quelled a rebellion in the district of Schonen; and after Canute VI had ascended the throne he helped this prince in repulsing his rival, the Duke of Pomerania, and in conquering Mecklenburg and Estonia. These occupations did not prevent his attending diligently to his clerical duties. In 1187 he called a national council to regulate the ceremonial of the churches. He was also a patron of the sciences and of learning. He died in the convent of St. Nicolai in 1201.

Absinthium. See WORMWOOD.

Absolution, the act of loosing or setting free. In civil law it is a sentence by which the party accused is declared innocent of the crime laid to his charge, and is equivalent to acquittal. In the Roman theology it signifies the act by which the priest declares the sins of penitent persons to be remitted to them.
1. In the first centuries, the restoration of a penitent to the bosom of the Christian Church was deemed a matter of great importance, and was designed not only to be a means of grace to the individual, but also a benefit to the whole body. Absolution was at that time simply reconciliation with the Church, and restoration to the communion, without the remission of sins. Early writers, such as Tertullian, Novatian, Cyprian, Athenasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Cyril, lay great stress on the fact that the forgiveness of sins is the prerogative of God only, and can never belong to any priest or bishop. After the fourth century, the practice of private penance prevailed, the doctrine of ministerial absolution began to gain ground, and was at length exalted to the rank of a sacrament.

2. Five kinds of absolution are mentioned by the early writers. a. That of baptism. b. The eucharist.
   c. The word and doctrine. d. The imposition of hands, and prayer.
   e. Reconciliation to the Church by remission of censures. Baptism in the ancient Church was called absolution, because remission of sins was supposed to be connected with this ordinance. It is termed by Augustine "absolutor; or, "sacramentum absolutionis et remissio peccatorum." It had no relation to the penitential discipline, being never given to persons who had once received baptism. Absolution of the eucharist had some relation to penitential discipline, but did not solely belong to it. It was given to all baptized persons who never fell under discipline, as well as to those who fell and were restored. In both respects it was called the perfection or consummation of a Christian (τὸ ἐκλήσιον). The absolution of the word and doctrine was declarative. It was that power which the ministers of Christ have, to make declaration of the terms of reconciliation and salvation to mankind. The absolution of intercession and prayer was generally connected with all other kinds of absolution. Prayers always attended baptism and the eucharist, and also the final reception of penitents into the Church. The absolution of reconciliation to the Church took place at the altar, after canonical penance, and is often referred to, in earlier writers, by the terms, "granting peace," "restoring to communion," "reconciling to the church," "loosing bonds," "granting remission of sin and pardon." Some councils enacted that the absolution of a penitent should only be granted by the bishop who had performed the act of excommunication, or by his successor. Severe penalties were inflicted on any who violated this regulation. Various ceremonies accompanied absolution. The time selected through Passion-week; and, from this circumstance, the restoration is called hebdomas indulgentiae. If not in Passion-week, it took place at some time appointed by the bishop. The act was performed in the church, when the people were assembled for divine worship, and usually immediately before the administration of the Lord's supper. The penitent, kneeling before the altar, or the reading-desk (ambo), was absolved by the bishop, by the imposition of hands, and by prayer. As the act was designated by the phrase Dura pacem, it is probable that a form was used which contained in it the expression, "Depart in peace." The fifty-first Psalm was usually sung on the occasion, but it was a necessary part of the service. Immediately after the ceremony, the absolved were admitted to the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and from that moment restored to all church privileges, with one exception, that a minister, under these circumstances, was reckoned among the laity, and a layman qualified for the clerical office. In the case of heretics, no absolution was added to the imposition of hands, to denote their reception of the Holy Spirit of peace on their restoration to the peace and unity of the Church. The bishop touched with oil the forehead, eyes, nose, mouth, and ears of the penitent, saying, "This is the sign of the gifts of the Holy Ghost." The Roman Church has also a form of absolution for the dead (absolutor defunctorum). It consists in certain prayers performed by the priest, after the celebration of the mass for a deceased person, for his delivery from purgatory.

3. The Roman Church practices sacramental absolution. According to the decision of the Council of Trent (see xiv, cap. vi, etc. can. ix), the priest is judge as well as the minister of Jesus Christ; so that the meaning of the words, ego te absolvo a peccatis tua, in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen, is not merely, "I declare to thee that thy sins are remitted," but, "As the minister of Jesus Christ, I remit thy sins." The view of the Greek Church appears to be that penitence is a mystery, or sacramentum, in which he who confesses his sins is, on the outward declaration of pardon by the priest, inwardly loosed from his sins by Jesus Christ himself" (Longer Catechism of the Russian Church, by Blackmore). It is very plain that the New Testament does not sanction the power claimed by the Roman hierarchy, and that it is altogether inconsistent with the teaching of the earlier fathers in the Church. When Jesus Christ says to his ministers, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained," he imparts to them a commission to declare with authority the Christian forms of pardon, and he also gives them a power to remit and retract abasial censures; that is, admitting into a Christian congregation or excluding from it. Absolution in the New Testament does not appear to mean more than this; and in early ecclesiastical writers it is generally confined to the remission of church censures, and re-admission into the congregation. It is generally agreed that the indicative form of absolution is, "I absolve thee"—instead of the deprecatory—that is, "Christ absorve thee."—was introduced in the twelfth or thirteenth century, just before the time of Thomas Aquinas, who was one of the first that wrote in defence of it. The Greek Church still retains the deprecatory form. See INDULGENCE.

4. "The Church of England also holds the doctrine of absolution, but restrains herself to what she supposes to be the Scriptural limits within which the power is granted, which are the pronouncing of God's forgiveness of sins upon the supposition of the existence of that state of mind to which forgiveness is granted. The remission of sins is God's special prerogative—"Who can forgive sins but God only?" (Luke v, 21)—but the public declaration of such remission to the penitent is, like all other ministrations in the Church, committed to men as God's ministers. The Church of England has three forms of absolution. In that which occurs in the morning service, the act of pardon is declared to be God's. The second form, in the communion service, is prepotent; it expresses the earnest wish that God may pardon the sinner. The third form, in the visitation of the sick, is apparently more unconditional, but not really so; since it is spoken to those who 'truly repent and believe in God.' The words of absolution which follow must be interpreted according to the analogy of the two other forms, which refer the act of pardon to God. And that the Church does not regard the pronouncing of this absolution as necessary, or as conducing to the sinner's pardon, is evident from the absence of any injunction or admonition to that effect. It is not necessary, in the words of the rubric, "accordingly, as an indulgence to the sick man if he heartily repents; but no hint is given that he ought to desire it, nor any exhortation to seek it." See Palmer On the Church, li, 280; Wheatley On Common Prayer, 440 sq.; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xix. ch. 1; Pascal, Liturg. Cathol. p. 34; Coleman, Christ. Abstemii, a name given to such persons as could not partake of the cup at the Eucharist on account of their natural aversion to wine.

Abstinence (ίματία, not eating, Acts xxvii, 21) is a general term, applicable to any object from which one abstains, while fasting is a species of abstinence, namely, from food. See Fast. The general term is like the particular and imply a partial abstinence from particular food, but fast signifies an abstinence from food altogether. Both are spoken of in the Bible as a religious duty. Abstinence again differs from temperance, which is a moderate use of food or drink usually taken, and is sometimes extended to other indulgences; while abstinence (in reference to food) is a refraining entirely from the use of certain articles of diet, or a very slight partaking of ordinary meals, in cases where absolute fasting would be hazardous to health. See Self-denial.

1. Jewish.—The first example of abstinence which occurs in Scripture is that in which the use of blood is forbidden to Noah (Gen. ix, 20). See Blood. The next is that mentioned in Gen. xxxlii, 22: “The children of Israel eat not of the sinew which shranks, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day, because he (the angel) touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shranks.” See Sinew. This practice of particular and commemorative abstinence is here mentioned by anticipation long after the date of the fact referred to, as the phrase “unto this day” intimates. No actual instance of the practice occurs in the Scripture itself, but the usage has always been kept up; and to the present day the Jews generally abstain from the whole hind-quarter on account of the trouble and expense of extracting the particular sinew (Allen's Modern Judaism, p. 421). By the law abstinence from blood was confirmed, and the use of the flesh of even lawful animals was forbidden, if the manner of their death rendered it impossible that they should be, or could be, holy (Exod. xxii, 21; Deut. xiv, 21). A broad rule was also laid down by the law, defining whole classes of animals that might not be eaten (Lev. xi). See Animal; Food. Certain parts of lawful animals, as being sacred to the altar, were also interdicted. These were the large lobe of the liver, the kidneys and the fat upon them, as well as the tail of the “fattail” (Lev. iii, 9-11). The forty days' abstinence of Moses, Elijah, and Jesus are peculiar cases, requiring to be separately considered. See Fasting. The priests were commanded to abstain from wine previous to their actual ministrations (Lev. x, 9), and the same abstinence was enjoined to the Nazarites during the whole period of their separation (Num. vi, 5). See Nazarite. A constant abstinence of this kind was, at a later period, voluntarily undertaken by the Pharisees (Jer. xxxix, 16). See Pharisee.

Amon; the early Christian converts there were some who deemed themselves bound to adhere to the Mosiacal limitations regarding food, and they accordingly abstained from flesh sacrificed to idols, as well as from wine, upon which the law laid an implied obligation while others contemned this as a weakness, and exulted in the liberty wherewith Christ had made his followers free. This question was repeatedly referred to the Apostle Paul, who laid down some admirable rules on the subject, the purport of which was, that every one was at liberty to act in this matter according to his own individual convictions. The strong-minded had better abstain from the exercise of the freedom they possessed whenever it might prove an occasion of stumbling to a weak brother (Rom. xiv, 1-3; 1 Cor. vii). In another place the same apostle reproves certain sectaries who should arise, forbidding marriage, and enjoining abstinence from meats which God had created for enjoyment, with thanksgiving (1 Tim. iv, 3, 4). The council of the apostles at Jerusalem decided that no other abstinence regarding food should be imposed upon the converts than “from meats offered to idols, from blood, and from things strangled” (Acts xxv, 23). Paul says (1 Cor. ix, 12): “I eat anything sold in the market, not to cause my brother to stumble, in order to keep the corruptible crown, abstain from all things, or from every thing which might weaken them.” In his First Epistle to Timothy (iv, 8), he blames certain heretics who condemned marriage, and the use of meats which God had created. He requires Christians to abstain from all appearance of evil (1 Thess. v, 22), and, with much stronger reason, from everything really evil, and contrary to religion and piety. See Flesh; Alimenta.

The Essenes, a sect among the Jews which is not mentioned by name in the Scriptures, led a more abstinence like that any recorded in the sacred books. See Essenes. They refused all pleasant food, eating nothing but bread and drinking only water; and some of them abstained from food altogether until after the sun had set (Philo, De Vita Contemplativa, p. 632, 636). That abstinence from ordinary food was practised by the Jews medically is not shown in Scripture, but is more than probable, not only as a common custom, but as a consequence of their Egyptian neighbors, who, we are informed by Diodorus (i, 82), “being persuaded that the majority of diseases proceed from indigestion and excess of eating, had frequent recourse to abstinence, emetics, slight doses of medicine, and other simple means of relieving the system, which some persons were in the habit of repeating every two or three days.” See Purify, De Abst. iv.—Kittos, s. v. See Uncleanness.

2. Christian.—a. Early.—In the early church catechumens could be admitted to baptism; they were required, according to Cyril and Jerome, to observe a season of abstinence and prayer for forty days; according to others, of twenty days. Extreme caution and care were observed in the ancient Church in receiving candidates into communion, the particulars of which may be found under the head Catechumens. Spiritual abstinence by the clergy was deemed a crime. If they abstained from flesh, wine, marriage, or any thing else, it was considered in accordance with real and false notions that the creatures of God were not good, but polluted and unclean, they were liable to be deposed from office. See Abstinence. There was always much disputation between the Church and several heretical sects on the subjects of meats and marriage. The Manichees and Priscillianists professed a higher degree of spirituality and refinement, because they abstained from wine and flesh as things unlawful and unclean, and on this account censured the Church as impure in allowing men the moderate and just use of them. The Apostolical Canons enjoin, “That if any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or any other clerk, abstain from flesh, wine, or marriage, he is to be accounted unclean; but abhorrence—for, setting that God made all things very good, and created man male and female, and speaking evil of the workmanship of God, unless he correct his error, he shall be deposed, and cast out of the church.” At the same time, strict observance of the fasts of the church was enjoined, and deposition was the penalty in case of non-compliance with the directions of the canons on this subject.

b. Romish.—In the Roman Church a distinction is made between fasting and abstinence, and different days are appointed to each. On days of fasting, one meal in twenty-four hours is allowed; but on days of abstinence, none at all is eaten, but not even water. If the season is moderate, a collation is allowed in the evening. Their days of abstinence are all the Sundays in Lent, St. Mark's day, if it does not fall in Easter-week, the three Bogation-days, all Saturdays throughout the year, with the Fridays which do not fall within the twelve days of Christmas. The observance of St. Mark’s day, or his day of abstinence is said to be in imitation of St. Mark’s disciples, 16, and the Christians of Alexandria, who are said to have been eminent for their prayer, abstinence, and sobriety. The Roman days of fasting are, all Lent except Sundays, the Ember-days, the vigils of the more solemn fasts, and all Fridays except such as fall between Easter and the Ascension. See CALENDAR.

c. Protestant.—The Church of England, in the table of vigils, mentions fasts and days of abstinence separately; but in the enumeration of particulars, they are called indifferently days of fasting or abstinence, and the words seem to refer to the same thing. The Word of God never teaches us that abstinence is good and valuable per se, but only that it ministers to holiness; and so it is an instrument, not an end.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. x, ch. 11, § 9. See ASCETISM.

Abstinence, a sect of heretics that appeared in France and Spain about the end of the third century, during the persecutions of Diocletian and Maximian. They condemned marriage and the use of flesh and wine, which were said to be made not by God, but by the devil. See ABSTINENCE.

Abusa, a river of Palestine, according to Vibiaus Sequester (see Reland, Palest., p. 257), the "gentle stream" (mollis) referred to by Lucan (v, 485), and by Cassar (Bell. Civ. iii, 13), as having been crossed by Pompey near Apollonia; hence, no doubt, the brooklet that exists at Mediterranean at this place.

Abubus ("Abouc), prof. of Syrian origin, the father of Polemus, the patriarch of Antiochus, who slew Simon Maccabeus (1 Macc. xvi, 11, 15).

Abul-faraj (Abelpharagias, or Abelpharadach), GREGORY (called also Bar-Hebraus, from his father having been originally a Jew), was the son of Aaron, a physician of Malatia, in Armenia, and was born in 1109. His only father, was a Jacobite. He applied himself to the study of the Syriac and Arabic languages, philosophy, theology, and medicine: in the latter he became a great proficient, and acquired a high reputation among the Moslems. When only twenty-one years of age he was made bishop of Guba by the Jacobite patriarch Ignatius; and in 1247 he was consecrated archbishop of Ctesiphon. He made Marphian, or primate of the Jacobites in the Eust, which dignity he retrenched till his death, in 1266. His works are very numerous; the best known is the Syriac Chronicle, which is largely cited by Gibbon, and is, in fact, a repository of Eastern history. It consists of two parts: 1. The Dynasties—a Civil Chroni-

Abuna (Aboua). See RUMA.

Abuna (our father), the title given by the Abyssinian Christians to their metropolitan. They receive this prelate from the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria. At one time, when the Abyssinians were greatly oppressed, they applied to the pope for help, promising never again to accept their metropolitan from the Coptic patriarch; but this forced submission to Rome did not last long. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

Abyss ("Abyssus," the Greek word means literally "without bottom," but actually "deep"). It is used in the Sept. for the Hebrew tekom (תַּכּוֹמָ), which we find applied either to the ocean (Gen. i, 2; vii, 11) or to the under world (Ps. lxxii, 21; cix, 26).

In the New Testament it is used as a noun to describe Hades, or the place of the dead generally (Rom. x, 7); but more especially Tartarus, or that part of Hades in which the wicked were supposed to be confined (Luke viii, 31; Rev. ix, 11; xiv, 10; xxi, 14, comp. 2 Pet. ii, 4). In the Revelation the authorized version invariably renders it "bottomless pit;" else-where "deep." See PIT.

Most of these uses of the word are explained by reference to some of the cosmological notions which the Hebrews were familiar in common with the ancient nations. It was believed that the abyss, or sea of fathomless waters, encompassed the whole earth. The earth floated on the abyss, of which it covered only a small part. According to the same notion, the earth was founded upon the waters, or, at least, had its foundations in the deep abyss (Ps. cxxv, 2; xxxiii, 6). Under these waters, and at the bottom of the abyss, the wicked were represented as groaning and undergoing the punishment of their sins. There were confined the Rephaim—those old giants who, while living, caused surrounding nations to tremble (Prov. ix, 18; xxix, 16). In the deep regions the sovereigns of Tyre, Babylon, and Egypt are described by the prophets as undergoing the punishment of their cruelty and pride (Jer. xxxvi, 14; Ezek. xxxviii, 10, etc.). This was the "deep" into which the evil spirits, in Luke viii, 31, besought that they might not be cast, and which was evidently dreaded by them. See CREATION; HADES. The notion of such an abyss was by no means confined to the East. It was equally entertained by the Celtic Druids, who held that Amnun (the deep, the low part), the abyss from which the earth arose, was the abode of the evil principle (Gwarchawn), and the place of departed spirits, commonly called Elyas. "The spirit of Elyas, the spirit of antiquity. With them also wandering spirits were called Plant amnun, "the children of the deep" (Davis's Celtic Researches, p. 175; Myth. and Rites of the B. Druids, p. 49). See DEEP.

We notice a few special applications of the word "deep," or abyss, in abysmal circumstances (Dict. s. v.). Isaiah (xxiv, 27) refers to the method by which Cyrus took Babylon, viz., by laying the bed of the Euphrates dry, as mentioned by Xenophon and others. The same event is noticed in similar terms by Jeremiah (l, 38 and li, 36). A parallel passage in relation to Egypt occurs in Isaiah (lxv, 5), where the exhaustion of the country and its resources to furnish the conquerors seems to be pointed out. Rom. x, 7: "Who shall descend into the abyss [Deut. xxx, 13, "beyond the sea"] to bring up Christ again from the dead?" i. e. faith does not require, for our satisfaction, things impracticable, either to see the heavens or to explore the profound recesses of the earth and sea. The abyss sometimes signifies metaphorically grievous afflictions or calamities, in which, as in a sea, men seem ready to be overwhelmed (Ps. xiii, 7; lxix, 20).

Abyssinia. See ABYSSINIAN CHURCH.

Abyssinian Church. Abyssinia is an extensive district of Eastern Africa, between lat. 7° 30' and 15° 40' N., long. 55° and 42° E., with a population of perhaps fifteen millions. Carl Ritter, of Berlin, has shown that the high country of Habab consists of three terraces or distinct table-lands, rising one above another, and of which the several grades of ascent offer themselves in succession to the traveller as he advances from the shores of the Red Sea (Zuridawde, th. i. 4, 15). The lowest of these levels is the plain and kingdom of Tigré, which formerly contained the kingdom of Axum; the third level is high Abyssinia, or the kingdom of Amhara. This name of Amhara is now given to the whole kingdom, of which Gondar is the capital, and where the Amharic language is spoken, eastward of the Takrazé. Amhara Proper is, however, a mountainous province to the south-east, in the centre of which was Tegulat, the ancient capital of the empire, and at one period the centre of the civilization of Abyssinia. This province is now in the possession of the Gallas, a barbarous people who have overcome all the southern parts of Halbed. The present kingdom of Amhara is the heart of Abyssinia, and the abode of the emperor, or Negash. It contains the upper course of the Nile, the valley of Dembea, and the lake Tanza, near which is the royal city of Gondar, and likewise the high region of Gojam, which Bruce states to be at least two miles above the level of the Red Sea.

I. History.—Christianity is believed to have been introduced, about A.D. 330, by Frumentius, who was ordained bishop of Axum (now Axum, or Tigré) by Athanasius. See Frumentius. As the Alexandrian Church held the Monophysite doctrine, the Abyssinian church is described in this faith, which has maintained itself ever since. From the fifteenth to the sixteenth century little was known in Western Europe about Abyssinia or its Church. The Portuguese sent out by John II having opened a passage into Abyssinia in the sixteenth century, an emissary (Bermudez) was sent to extend the influence and authority of the Roman pontiff, clothed with the title of patriarch of Ethiopia. The Jesuits sent out thirteen of their number in 1555, but the Abyssinians stood so firm to the faith of their ancestors that the Jesuits were recalled by a bull from St. Peter's. Another Jesuit mission was sent out in 1650, and led to twenty years of intrigue, civil war, and slaughter. In December, 1654, the Abyssinian Church formally submitted to the see of Rome; but the people rebelled, and, after several years of struggle and bloodshed, the emperor abandoned the cause of Rome, and the Roman patriarch abandoned Abyssinia in 1655. After this, little or nothing was heard from Axum, until when Bruce visited the country and brought back with him a copy of the Ethiopic Scriptures. In 1809 Mr. Salt explored Abyssinia by order of the British government, and described the nation and its religion as in a ruinous condition. Mr. Salt urged the British Protostants to send missionaries to Abyssinia. Portions of the Bible were translated and published in the Amharic and Tigré languages under the auspices of the British and Foreign Bible Society (Jowett, Christ. Researches, vol. i.) and in 1826 two missionaries (from the Basle Missionary Seminary), viz., Dr. Gobat, now bishop of Jerusalem, and Christian Kugler, were sent out by the Church Missionary Society. Kugler died lying by Mr. Isenberg. He was followed by the Rev. Charles Henry Blumhardt in the beginning of 1837, and by the Rev. John Ludwig Krapf at the close of that year. The Roman Church renewed its missions in 1828, and, by stirring up intrigues, compelled the withdrawal of the missionaries in 1839. The Gallas had already laid the foundation of a reform in the Abyssinian Church. Much had been done also in the way of translations into the Amharic language. Mr. Isenberg carried through the press, after his return to England in 1840, an Amharic spelling-book, 8vo; grammar and dictionary, 4to; Church history, 8vo; Amharic general history, 8vo. Mr. Isenberg had prepared a vocabulary of the Danakil language, which was likewise printed. The mission aimed not only at the Christian population of Soa, but the Galla tribes extensively spread over the southern parts of Africa. To the Galla language, therefore, bilateral to that of the Soa, Mr. Krapf's attention was much given. During Mr. Isenberg's stay in London, the following Galla works, prepared by Mr. Krapf, were printed: Vocabulary, 12mo; Elements of the Galla Language, 12mo; Matthew's Gospel, 12mo; John's Gospel, 12mo.

Recent indications give us better hopes of Abyssinia. In 1840 the Roman Catholic missionaries themselves were expelled. The young king of Shoa requested in that year the return of Dr. Krapf, now engaged in the East African Mission. King Theodore, who now unites under his sceptre the greater part of Abyssinia, has shown himself favorable to the Protestant missionaries. The present Abuna, appointed in 1841, is a pupil of the Church Mission school at Cairo. At the request of both the king and the Abuna the missionaries of the Society of Basle have recommenced their labors for the evangelization of the Abyssinian Church. In 1858 their number was increased to six. In 1859 the king received gladly the vernacular Scripture translated by the London Bible Society and sent them to distribute them. In the same year Negusie, king of Tigré and Sämen, sent an embassy to Rome to announce to the pope his submission to the Roman Church. According to the reports of the Roman Catholic missionaries, 50,000 subjects of the king have entered into communion with him in communion with Rome. See Africa.

II. Doctrines and Usages.—(1.) The Abyssinian creed is, as has been said, Monophysite, or Eutychian; maintaining one nature only in the person of Christ, namely, the divine, in which they consider all the properties of the humanity to be absorbed, in opposition to the Nestorians. In both faith and worship they resemble the Romish Church in many respects; but they do not admit transubstantiation. (2.) They practise the invocation of saints, prayer for the dead, and the veneration of relics; and while they reject the use of images, they adopt a profusion of pictures, and venerate them, they practise circumcision, but apparently not as a religious rite. They keep both the Jewish and the Christian sabbath, and also a great number of holidays. Their clergy and churches are very numerous, the latter richly ornamented; and the number of monastic institutions among them is said to be great. The monks call themselves Bétä or Betä, and have various rules. (3.) The supreme government lies with the patriarch, called Abuna (q. v.), who resides in Gondar. The Abuna receives his investiture from the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria, who is the nominal head of the Ethiopian Church. (4.) They practise an annual abolution, which they term baptism, and which they consider necessary to wash away the defilement of sin. The priests receive the Lord's Supper every day, and always fasting; besides priests and monks, scarcely any but aged persons and children attend the communion. They call the consecration of the element Mekalat. At Gondar the bishop of Gobat, now bishop of Jerusalem, established transubstantiation. In Tigré there are some who believe in it. The wine is mixed with water. They consider fasting essential to religion; consequently their fasts occupy the greater part of the year, about nine months; but these are seldom all observed except by a few monks. The priests may marry, but they are not married; they have received orders. The priesthood is very illiterate, and there is no preaching at all. The Abyssinians prostrate themselves to the saints, and especially to the Virgin; and, like the Copts of Egypt, practice circumcision. When questioned on the subject, they answer that circumcision is for the infant, and that they abstain from the animals forbidden in the Mosaic law, but only because they have a disgust to them; but
ACACIA

Dr. Gobat observed that, when they spoke upon these subjects without noticing the presence of a stranger, they attached a religious importance to circumcission, and that a priest would not fail to impose a fast or penance on a man who had eaten of a wild boar or a hare without the pretext of illness. In short, their religion was so emphatically in covenant with domestic customs. Their moral condition is very low; facilities of divorce are great, and chastity is a rare virtue; the same man frequently marries several women in succession, and the neglected wives attach themselves to other men. Yet their religion, corrupt as it is, has raised the country to a great height in character to a height not equalled by any African race. Much authentic information as to this interesting Church and people in modern times is to be found in Gobat, Three Years' Residence in Abyssinia: Isenberg and Krapf, Missiary Journals in Abyssinia (London. 1849, 8vo); Marsden, Churches and Sects., vol. i; Newcomb, Cyclopedia of Missions; Ruppell, Reisen in Abyssinien, Frankf. 1847; Veitch, W. Year-book for 1859, p. 225; American Theol. Review, Feb. 1867.

ACACIA. See Shittah-tree.

Acacians, followers of Acacius, Monophysite, bishop of Caesarea. In the Council of Seleucia, A.D. 539, they openly professed their agreement with the pure Arians, maintaining, in opposition to the semi-Arians, that the Son was not of the same substance with the Father, and that even the likeness of the Son to the Father was a likeness of will only, and not of essence. Socrat. Eccl. Hist. iii. 25. See Acacius.

Acacius (surnamed Monophathus, from his having one eye), was the disciple of the semi-Arian, in Palestine, whom he succeeded in the see of Caesarea in 340. He was one of the chiefs of the Arian party, and a man of ability and learning, but unsettled in his theological opinions. He was deposed as an Arian by the Synods of Antioch (A.D. 541) and Seleucia (542). Subsequently he subscribed the Nicene creed, and therefore fell out with the Anomans, with whom he had before acted. He died A.D. 566. St. Jerome (de Scrip. cap. 98) says that he wrote seventy books of commentaries upon Holy Scripture, six on various subjects, and very many treatises, among them his book Adversus Marcionem, a considerable fragment of which is contained in Lib. 1 of Socrates (lib. ii, cap. 44) says that he also wrote a life of his predecessor, Eusebius.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 340; Lardner, Works, iii. 583.

Acacius, bishop of Berea, was born about the year 322, in Syria. He embraced the monastic life at an early age under the famous anchorite Asterius. About A.D. 378 he was promoted to the see of Berea by Eunibius of Samosota; and after 381 Flavian sent him to Rome, to obtain for him communion with the Eastern bishops, and to effect the extinction of the schism in the Church of Antioch, in both which designs he succeeded. At the commencement of the 6th century he conspired with Theophilus of Alexandria and others against Chrysostom, and was present in the pseudo-Iconoclastic Synods, where he acted as the apostate Persian bishops, and deposed in the great contest between Cyril and Nestorius, Acacius wrote to Cyril, endeavoring to excite Nestorius, and to show that the dispute was in reality merely verbal. In 481 the Council of Ephe- ses assembled for the decision of this question. Acacius did not attend, but gave his proconsular throne to Eunibius of Caesarea, and addressed a letter to the Oriental bishop, accusing him of Apollinarianism. In 482 he was present in the synod of Berea, held by John, and did all in his power to reconcile Cyril and the Orientals. His death occurred about 490, so that he must have attained the age of 114 years. Of the numerous letters which he wrote, three only, according to Cave, are extant, viz., two Epistles to his Prime Minister, Alexander of Hierapolis; one to Cyril.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 480; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iv. 27. 125. 126. 127.

Academia, a name given to such philosophers as adopted the doctrines of Plato. They were so called from the Academis, a grove near Athens, where they studied and lectured. The Academis are divided into those of the first academy, who taught the doctrines of Plato in their original purity; those of the second, or middle academy, who differed materially from the first, and inclined to skepticism; and those of the new academy, who pursued probability as the only attainable wisdom. The Academis and Epicureans (qv. v.) were the prevailing philosophical sects at the time of Christ's birth.—Tennemann, Hist. Phil. §§ 127-138.

Ac'atan (Acaris), the father of Johannes, said to be one of those who returned from the Babylonian captivity (1 Esdr. viii, 88); evidently the same with Hakattan (q. v.) of the parallel text (Ezra viii, 12).

Acatholici, not catholic; a name sometimes used by members of the Papal Church to distinguish Protestants, under the arrogant assumption that the word "Catholic" is to be appropriated solely to Romanists. See Catholic.

Ac'cad (Heb. Akkad), "Zūr, fortress; or, according to Simonis Onomast. p. 276, bond, i.e. of conquered nations; Sept. Ακαδήμια [prob. by resolution of the Dagadse, like πεποιθα for πεποίθη, Vulg. Achad], one of the four cities in "the land of Shinar," or Babylonia, which are said to have been built by Nimrod, or, rather, to have been "the beginning of his kingdom" (Gen. x, 10). Eleam (in Animal. xvi, 43) mentions that in the district of Sittacana was a river called Ardages (Ἀρδάγγος), which is so near the name Ar- cad which the Sept. gave to this city, that Bochart was induced to fix Accad upon that river (Philothe, iv, 17). Mr. Loftus (Trans. in Chald. and Susian. p. 95) compares the name of a Hamite tribe emigrating to the plains of Mesopotamia from the shores of the Red Sea, and which he says the cuneiform inscriptions call Akkaddin; but all this appears to be little more than conjecture. In the inscriptions of Sargon the name of Akkadd is applied to the Armenian mountains instead of the vernacular title of Ararat (Bawlinson in Herodotus, i, 247, note). The name of the city is believed to have been discovered in the inscriptions under the form K'uzi Akkadd (ib. 357). It seems that several of the ancient translators found in their Hebrew MSS. Accar (אכאר) instead of Accad (Ephrem Syrus, Pseudo- Jonathan, Targum Hi eros, Jerome, Abulpharag, etc.). Achur was the ancient name of Ninisie (see Michaelis, Spicileg. i, 226); and hence the Targumists give Nisiea or Isinibin (יִסֵּינָב) for Accad, and they continued to be identified by the Jewish literati in the times of Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Accad). But Ninisie is unquestionably too remote northward to be associated with Babol, Erech, and Calneh, "in the land of Shinar," which could not have been far distant from each other. On the supposition that the original name was Akker, Col. Taylor suggests an identification with the remarkable pile of altar-building called Akker-kuf, in Sittacana, and which the Turks know as Acker-..-Nimrud and Akker-i-Babbel (Cheyne's Survey of the Ephrasties, i, 117). The Babylonian Tal- mud might be expected to mention the site, and it occurs accordingly under the name of Aggond. It oc- curs also in the CHALDEAN TRANSLATOR, Moeller, fol. 25, as quoted by Hyde). Akker-kuf is a ruin, consisting of a mass of sun-dried bricks, in the midst of a marsh, situated to the west of the Tigris, about five miles from Baghad (Layard's Babylon, 2d ser. p. 407). The most conspicuous part of this primitive monument is still called by the natives Tel Nimrud, and Nimrud Tropaei, both designations signifying the hill of Nimrod (see Ker Porter's Travels, ii, 275). It consists of a mound, surmounted by a mass of building which looks like a tower, or an irregular pyramid, according to the point from which it is viewed; it is about 400 feet in circumference at the bottom, and rises to the height of 125 feet above the elevation on which it stands (Ainsworth's Researches in Assyria, p. 175). The mound which seems to form the foundation of the pile is a mass of rubbish, accumulated from the decay of the superincumbent structure (Bonomi's Niniveh, p. 41). In the ruin itself, the layers of sun-dried bricks can be traced very distinctly. They are cemented together by lime or bitumen, and are divided into courses varying from 12 to 20 feet in height, and are separated by layers of reds, as is usual in the more ancient remains of this primitive region (Buckingham, Mesopotamia, ii, 217 sq.). Travellers have been perplexed to make out the use of this remarkable monument, and various strange conjectures have been hazarded. The embankments of canals and reservoirs, and the remnants of brick-work and pottery occupying the place all around, evince that the Tel stood in an important city; and, as its construction announces it to be a Babylonian relic, the greater probability is that it was one of those pyramidal structures erected upon high places, which were consecrated to the heavenly bodies, and served at once as the temples and the observatories of those remote times. Such buildings were common to all Babylonian towns; and those which remain appear to have been constructed more or less on the model of that in the metropolitan city of Babylon.—Kitto, s. v. See Babel.

Acaron (1 Mac. x, 89). See Erkon.

Accomarii. In the early Church there was a class of officers called acolyths, corresponding to the Roman usuraius or petellus, betellus, bethel. In their ordination, the bishop, after informing them as to the duties of their office, placed in the hands of each a candlestick with a lighted taper in it, intimating that it was their duty to light the candles of the church; hence they were sometimes called acaryonit, taper-lighters. Jerome says it was a custom in the Oriental churches to set up lighted tapers when the Gospel was read, as a demonstration of joy; but it does not appear that there was a peculiar order of acolyths for this purpose. The duty in question seems to have been nothing more than lighting the candles at night, when the church was to meet at evening prayer. The Romanists contend that their ceraferiux, taper-bearing a short or doubtful ('common') vowel in the pe- nult. Many apply the same rule to the Greek language; but, as this has a written accent, the custom, still preserved among the modern Greeks, is gradually prevailing, of conforming the spoken to the written tone. In Hebrew the place of the accent is carefully designated in the common or Masoretic text (see R. Jehuda Ibn Balam, Tz'dikim, or the Poetic Accents, in Hebrew, Paris, 1556; reprinted with amendments, Amsterdam, 1858), although the Jews of some nations, disregarding this, pronounce the words with the accent on the penult, after the analogy of modern languages, and as is done by natives in speaking Syriac and Arabic (see J. D. Michaelis, Aa'farangränder der Hebr. Accen- tuation, Hall., 1741; Hirts, Einleit. in d. Hebr. Abteilung, Jena, 1762; Spitzer, Idea Analytica V. T. ex Acctionibus, Lips., 1763; Stern, Grund. der Lehre d. Hebr. Accentuation, Frankf., 1840). In words angli- cized from the Greek the Latin rules are observed for the accent; and in those introduced from the Hebrew, as they have mostly come to us through the Vulgate, the same principle is in the main adhered to, so far as applicable, though with great irregularity and disagre ment among orthoepists, and generally to the utter neglect of the proper Hebrew tone. In reading Scripture and other foreign names, therefore, care should be taken to conform to the practice of the best speakers and readers, rather than to any affected or pedantic standard, however exact in itself (see Worcester's Eng. Dict. 1860, Appendix).

Accept. Acceptable. To accept (properly rup, 'to take pleasure in, or enjoy') To accept is not only to receive, but to receive with pleasure and kindness (Gen. xxxii, 20). It stands opposed to re- ject, which is a direct mode of refusal, and implies a positive sentiment of disapprobation (Jer. vi, 30; vii, 29). To receive is an act of right—we receive what is our own; to accept, is an act of courtesy—we accept what is offered by another. Hence an acceptable time, or accepted time (Psa. ixxi, 12; 2 Cor. vi, 5), signifies a favorable opportunity. "No prophet is accepted in his own country" (Luke iv, 24), that is to say, his own countrymen do not value and honor him as they ought. "Neither acceptest thou the person of any" (Luke xxii, 21), the second saying intended to denote the outward appearance in contrast with inward character. See Access.

Acceptance, (1) a term which imports the admission of man into the favor of God. As things are best understood by contrast with their opposites, so acceptance is to be understood from its opposite, rejection, the second saying intended by reference to Jer. vi, 30; vii, 29. To understand aright the Scriptural idea of acceptance with God, we must keep in mind the fact that sin is highly displeasing to God, and is attended by the hiding of his face or the withholding of his favor. Sin causes God to refuse to hold friendly intercourse with man; but the mediation of the Son of God restores this intercourse. Sinners are said to be "accepted in the Beloved" (Eph. i, 6); that is, in Christ. They are no longer held in a state of rejection, but are received with approbation and kindness. It is to be noticed that it is an idea of a positive kind which the word acceptance contains. As the rejection of man is a fact which all believe, so it is the same with the fact of acceptance of which Christ is the author. One who had disgraced himself before his sovereign would be particularly refused any share in the favors of the court. When this breach was repaired, the excluded party would again be favorably received (Ezek.). See Access.

(2) Acceptance (Eph. i, 6), in theology, is nearly synonymous with justification. We mistake the terms of acceptance with God when we trust in, 1, the superiority of our virtues to our vices (Rom. iii, 20; Jas. ii, 20), in a faith in Christ which does not produce good works (Jas. ii, 14); 3, in the atonement; without personal fitness for the grace of sin (Luke xiii, 5); 4, in the hope of future repentance, or conversion on a dying bed (Prov. i, 23-31). See Adoption; Justification.

Acceptors, a name that arose in the second period of the Jansenist controversy in France. The bull Unigenitus (q. v.) of Clement XI, 1718, was accepted by some of the French clergy unconditionally; by others only on condition of its reference to a general council (Ambass. from sin (Luke xiii, 5); 4, in the hope of future repentance, or conversion on a dying bed (Prov. i, 23-31). See Adoption; Justification.

Accepturn, a term in theology, used, with regard to redemption, to denote the acceptance on the part of God of an atonement not really equal to that in place of which it is received, but equivalent, not because of its intrinsic value, but because of God's determination to receive it. The term is borrowed from the commercial law of the Romans, in which it is defined "an acquittance from obligation by word of mouth, of a debtor by a creditor" (Pandecta of Justinian), or "an imaginary payment" (Institutes of Justinian). In the theology of the Middle Ages, the term was first used and the theory developed by Duns Scotus in his controversy with the followers of Thomas Aquinas. He defended the proposition that "every created oblation or offering is worth what God is pleased to accept it for and no more." The doctrine continued to be a subject of dispute between the followers of Duns Scotus and those of Thomas Aquinas throughout the Middle Ages, and still divides the Roman Catholic theologians, as the Popes have never authoritatively settled it. The Lutheran and Calvinistic theologians most aptly adopted the doctrine of a strict satisfaction; but the theory of a relative necessity found eloquent defenders in Hugo Grotius (q. v.), and the Armenian theologians Episcopius (q. v.), Limporich (q. v.), and Curcellaeus (q. v.). See Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 347 sqq.

Access (proporaywq, a bringing toward) is the privilege of approaching a superior with freedom. It is distinguished from admittance thus: "We have admittance where we enter; we have access to him whom we address. There can be no access where there is no admittance; but there may be admittance without access. Servants are often here intended to denote the outward appearance in contrast with inward character. See Access.

(1.) Introduction, free admission into the presence of a superior. In the New Testament it signifies the free intercourse which we enjoy with God in the exercise of prayer resulting from our having entered into a state of friendship with him (Rom. vii. 2; Eph. ii. 18; i. 12). It is more than simple admittance; it is such an introduction as leads to future and frequent intercourse. When the veil of the temple was rent at the death of Christ, a new and living way of access to God was opened. Under the law, the high-priest alone had access into the holy of holies. By the death of Christ the middle wall of partition was broken down, and Jew and Gentile have both free access to God; before this, the Gentiles, in the temple-worship, had no nearer access than to the gate of the court of Israel. All the privileges of Christianity are entirely bestowed on all nations, which were not so under the Mosaic law.

(2.) In Roman ecclesiastical usage—_i._ a collection of preparatory prayers, used by the priests before the celebration of the mass; _ii._ in the election of the pope, a transfer of votes from one candidate to another to secure a necessary number is called an access. If a voter wishes to change his vote to another person, he writes on his paper accedó domino, etc.

Ac'cho (Heb. 'Akkò, 'a'kho, from an Arab. root signifying to be hot [see Drummond, Origins, p. 3], referring to the name of the poet, and in the nether world, used by the Phoenicians in the manufacture of glass [Pliny, v. 19; Strabo, xvi, 677]; Sept. 'Arrx, Josephus, Aram. Ant. ix, 14, 2), a town and haven within the nomenclatural territory of the tribe of Asher, which, however, never acquired possession of it (Judg. i, 31). It is, perhaps, likewise mentioned in Micah i, 10 (222, prob. for 222), in Acco; Sept. iv. Arxii, Vulg. lachrymatis. Auth. Vers. "at all" see Henderson, Comment. in Ezra and Neh. (1880, p. 109). The Greek name for it is Arx (Strabo, xvi, 677; Dion. Sich. xix, 93; C. Nep. xiv, 5), but it was eventually better known as Ptolemais (Plin. Hist. Nat., x, 19), which name it received from the first Ptolemy, king of Egypt, by whom it was much improved. By this name it is mentioned in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xxii, 24; xii, 45, 46; 2 Macc. xiii, 14), in the New Testament (Acts xxii, 7), and by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 12, 2 sqq.). It was also called Colossi Claudii Cesarei, in consequence of its receiving the privileges of a Roman city from the emperor Claudius (Plin. v. 17; xxxxvi, 65). It continued to be called Ptolemais by the Greeks of the lower empire, as well as by Latin authors, while the Orientals adhered to the original designation (see Mishna, Abiadah Zarah, iii, 4; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. p. 117), which it still retains in the form Akka. During the Crusades the place was usually known to Europeans by the name of Acre; afterward, from the occupation of the town by the Knights of St. John in 1261, it was known as St. John, and in more modern times, as Acre, or simply Acce. The Romans at a late date appear to have called it also Ptolemeidas (the accusative being transformed into a nominative); at least the name appears in this form in the Pin. Antonia, and Hierodul. The Greeks themselves, although using the name Ptolemais, were evidently aware of the original Heb. 'Akkò, from which it is said by Aramaic to have been Graecized into Acce. Thus, the authors of the Etymologicon Magnum, say, "Acce, a city of Phoenicia, which is now called Ptolemais. Some say that the citadel of Ptolemais was called Acce because Hercules, being bitten by a serpent and there cured, named it so, from dazouo [to heal]." Other ancient authors speak of the place by the same name, and some of them allude to the same fable as the origin of the name (Reland, Palest., p. 586, 537). These, however, were evidently but speculations common to the mythology of the Greeks, who were fond of giving Greek terminations as the termination of Greek derivations to foreign terms. See Ptolemais.

This famous harbor-city is situated in N. lat. 32° 55', and E. long. 35° 5', and occupies the north-western point of a commodious bay, called the bay of Acre, the opposite or south-western point of which is formed by the promontory of Mount Carmel. The city lies on a plain which it gives its name to. Inland the plain is broken by hills, which from Tyre southward press close upon the sea-shore, gradually receding, leaving in the immediate neighborhood of Acre a plain of remarkable fertility about six miles broad, and watered by the small river Behes (Nahr Namun), which discharges itself into the sea close under the walls of the town; to the S.E. the still receding heights afford access to the interior in the direction of Sephoris. Accho, thus favorably placed in command of the approaches from the north, both by sea and land, has been justly termed the "key of Palestine." The bay, from the town of Acre to the promontory of Mount Carmel, is three leagues wide. The bay is at the mouth of its harbor enterable by vessels of small burden (Prokesch, p. 146); but there is excellent anchorage on the other side of the bay, before Haifa, which is, in fact, the roadstead of Acre (Turner, ii, 111; G. Robinson, i, 198).

In the time of Strabo Accho was a great city (xvi, p. 867), and it has continued to be a place of importance down to the present time. But after the Turks gained possession of it, Acre so rapidly declined, that the travelers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries concur in describing it as much fallen from its former glory, of which, however, traces still remain. The missions of the French and English in Syria (Ranger (la Terre Sainte, 1615, p. 44-45) remarks that the whole place had such a sacked and desolate appearance that little remained worthy of notice except the palace of the grand-master of the Knights Hospitallers and the church of St. Andrew; all the rest was a sad and desolate ruin, pervaded by a pestiferous air which soon throws strangers into dangerous sickness. The emir Pake-ed-din had, however, lately built a commodious hotel for the use of the merchants; for there was still considerable traffic, and vessels were constantly arriving from France, Venice, England, and Holland, laden with oil, cotton, skins, and other goods. The emir had also built a spacious building representing the Porte from the Porte to desist. Roger also fails not to mention the immense stone balls, above a hundred-weight, which were found in the ditches and among the ruins, and which were thrown into the town from machines before the use of cannon. This account is confirmed by other travelers, who add little or nothing to it (Doubdan, Cotovics, Zuzallert, Morison, Nau, D'Arvieux, and others). Morison, however, dwells more on the ancient remains, which consisted of portions of old walls of extraordinary height and thickness, and of fragments of buildings, sacred and secular, which still afforded manifest tokens of the original magnificence of the place. He affirms (ii, 8) that the metropolitan church of St. Andrew was equal to the finest of those he had seen in France and Italy, and that the church of St. John was of the same perfect beauty, as might be seen by the pillars and vaulted roof, half of which still remained. An excellent and satisfactory account of it is given by Naini, v. x, ch. 19), who takes particular notice of the old and strong cellars and vaults on which the houses are built. Maundrell remarks that the town appears to have been encompassed on the land side by a double wall, defended with towers at small distances; and that without the walls were ditches, ramparts, and a kind of bastions faced with hewn stone (Journey, p. 72). Pococke speaks chiefly of the ruins (East, ii, 176 sq.). After the assault given to the prosperity of the place by the measures of Sheik Daher, and afterward of Djazzar Pasha, the descriptions differ (Clarke, Trav., ii, 373).

It is mentioned by Buckingham (i, 116) that, in sinking the foundations of this part of the town wall, the foundations of small buildings were exposed, twenty feet below the present level of the soil, which must have belonged to the earliest ages, and probably formed part of the original Accho. He also thought that traces of Ptolemais might be detected in the shafts of gray and red granite and marble pillars, which rise above the mud; or that the dun in which the emir lived might indicate the site of large doorways, of the Saracenic period; some partial remains might be traced in the inner walls; and he is disposed to refer to that time the now old khan, which, as stated above, was really built by the emir Pake-ed-din. All the Christian ruins mentioned by the travelers already quoted had disappeared. In actual importance, however, the town had much increased. The population in 1819 was computed at 10,000, of whom 8000 were Turks, the rest Christians of various denominations (Connor, in Jowett, i, 425).

Approached from Tyre the city presented a beautiful appearance, from the trees in the inside, which rise above the houses, and extend commonly around it on the outside being planted with orange, lemon, and palm trees. Inside, the streets had the usual narrowness and filth of Turkish towns; the houses solidly built with stone, with flat roofs; the bazaars mean but tolerably well supplied (Turner, ii, 113). The principal objects were the mosque, the pasha's seraglio, the granary, and the arsenal (Irby and Mangles, p. 195). Of the mosque, which was built by Djazzar Pasha, there is a description by Pliny Fisk (Life, p. 337; also G. Robinson, i, 200). The trade was not considerable; the exports consisted chiefly of grain and cotton, the produce of the neighboring plain; and the imports chiefly of rice, coffee, and sugar from Damietta (Turner, ii, 113). As thus described, the city was all but demolished in 1822 by the hands of Ibrahim Pasha; and although considerable pains were taken to restore it, yet, as lately as 1837, it still exhibited a most wretched appearance, with ruined houses and crumbling walls (Lindsay, Letters, ii, 81). It is only important at present as a military post, and all its municipal regulations are according to the laws of war (Thomson, Land and Book, 4, 480).

Ascho continued to belong to the Phoenicians (Strabo, xvi, 890), until the time of Cremona and the Jews, when they were subjugated by the Babylonians (comp. 1 Mac. v, 15). By the latter it was doubtless maintained as a military station against Egypt, as it was afterward by the Persians (Strabo, xvi, p. 877). In the distribution of Alexander's dominions Accho fell to the lot of Ptolemy Soter, who valued the acquisition, and gave it his own name. In the wars that ensued between Syria and Egypt, it was taken by Antiochus the Great (Ptol. v, 62), and attached to his kingdom. When the Maccabees established themselves in Judea, it became the base of operations against them (1 Mac. v, 15, 50). Simon found it occupied by the king of Egypt at that place, and treated with the king of Egypt there (2 Mac. 56); but he did not take it (1 Mac. v, 22). In the endeavor of Demetrius Soter and Alexander Balas to bid highest for the support of Jonathan, the latter gave Ptolemais and the lands around to the temple at Jerusalem (x, 30).

Jonathan was afterward invited to meet Alexander in the king of Egypt at that place, and was treated with the utmost respect (xii, 56); but he at length (B.C. 144) met his death through the treachery of Tryphon (xii, 48-50). On the decay of the Syrian power it was one of the few cities of Judaea which established its independence. Alexander Janu-nes took advantage of the civil war between Anti-chus Philometor and Antiochus Cyzicenus to besiege
Macedonia, as the only maritime city in those parts, except Gaza, which he had not subdued; but the siege was raised by Ptolemy Lathyrus (then king of Cyprus), who got possession of the city (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 12, 2-6), of which he was soon deprived by his mother, Cleopatra (xiii, 12, 2). She probably gave it, along with her daughter Selene, to Seleucus, king of Syria. At least, after his death, Selene held possession of that and some other Phoenician towns, after Tiganes, king of Armenia, had acquired the rest of the kingdom (xiii, 16, 4). But an injudicious attempt to extend her dominions drew upon her the vengeance of that conqueror, who, in 195, issued a strong edict against Ptolemais, and while thus employed received with favor the Jewish embassy which was sent by queen Alexandra, with valuable presents, to seek her friendship (xiii, 16, 4). A few years after, Ptolemais was absorbed, with all the country, into the Roman empire, and the rest of its ancient history is obscure and of little note. It is only mentioned in the New Testament from Paul's having spent a day there on his voyage to Cesarea (Acts xxi, 7). The importance acquired by the last-named city through the mole constructed by Herod, and the safe harbor thus formed, must have had some effect on the prosperity of Ptolemais; but it continued a place of importance, and was the seat of a bishopric in the first ages of the Christian Church. The see was filled sometimes by orthodox and sometimes by Arian bishops; and it has the equivalent distinction of having been the birthplace of the Sabellian heresy (Niepfh. vi, 7). Accho (or Acco as the Latin style is) was an imperial garrison town when the Saracens invaded Syria, and was one of those that held out until Cesarea was taken by Arnu, in A.D. 638 (Mod. Univ. Hist. i. 473) —Kitto, s. v.

The Franks first became masters of it in A.D. 1104, when it was taken by Baldwin, king of Jerusalem. But in A.D. 1187 it was recovered by Salah-ed-din, who retained it till A.D. 1191, when it was retaken by the Christians under Richard Coeur-de-Lion. The Christians kept it till A.D. 1291; and it was the very last place of which they were dispossessed. It had been assigned to the Knights Hospitallers of Jerusalem, who fortified it strongly, and defended it valiantly, till it was at length wrenched from them by the Turk, L开门, sultan of Egypt, who is called Melek Seruf by Christian writers (D'Herbelot, s. v. Acca; Will. Tyr. i. xxiii, c. 6, 7; Vitruvius, cap. 25, 99, 100; Quaresmies, tom. ii, p. 297). Under this dominion it remained till A.D. 1317, when the Mameluke dynasty was overthrown by Selim, and all its territories passed to the Turks (Chronica de Syria, p. 745); Mod. Univ. Hist. b. xvi, c. 10, § 2). After this Acre remained in quiet obscurity till the middle of the last century, when the Arab sheik Daher took it by surprise. Under him the place recovered some of its trade and importance. He was succeeded by the barbarous but able tyrant, Phazzar Pasha, who strengthened the fortifications and improved the town. Under him it rose once more into fame, through the gallant and successful resistance which, under the direction of Sir Sidney Smith, it offered to the arms of Bonaparte. After that the fortifications were further improved, but till it became the strongest place in all Syria. In 1822 the town was besieged for nearly six months by Ibrahim Pasha, during which the Christians were thrown into it, and the buildings were literally beaten to pieces (Hogg's Damascus, p. 160-166). It had by no means recovered from this calamity, when on the 3d of November 1840, it was bombarded by the English fleet till the explosion of the powder-magazine destroyed the garrison and town (Napier's War in Syria). The walls and castles have since been repaired more strongly than ever; but the interior remains in ruins (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 473).

There are several medals of Acco, or Ptolemais, both Greek and Latin. Most of the former have also the Phoenician name of the city, Aк, (see Gesenius, Mon. Phoen. p. 260, 270, pl. 85), and the head of Alexander the Great, apparently in consequence of favors received from that prince, perhaps at the time when he was detained in Syria by the siege of Tyre. From others it appears that the city assumed the privilege of asylum and of sanctity, and that it possessed a temple of Diana. (For the ancient history of Acre, see Reland, Palæst., p. 534-542; for its modern history and appearance, see M'Culloch's Gazetteer, s. v. Acre; comp. Accident, a term of philosophy used to express that which is merely adventitious to a substance, and not essential to it; e. g. roundness is an accident of any body, since it is a body all the same, whether it be round or square. In theology this word is used in connection with the Roman doctrine of transubstantiation, which teaches that the accidents of the bread and wine in the holy Eucharist continue to subsist without a subject: "Accidentia autem sine subjecto in eodem [sacramento] subsistunt" (Aquin. Opuscol, p. 57). And the cathedrals of the council of Trent speaks in these terms: "Tertium reatum, quod in hæc sacramento maximum atque mirabile videatur, panis videilet et vini species in hoc sacramento sine aliqua re subjuncta constare" (Par. ii, No. 44). In defence of this doctrine, Roman writers argue thus: If the eucharistic accidents have any subject, that subject must be either (1) the matter of bread, or (2) the surface of the Lord's body, or (3) the air and other corpuscles contained in the pores, etc., of the matter, whatever it is, which, by God's appointment, continue to subsist after the destruction of the matter, so as to produce the same sensations. Now (1) they cannot have the matter of bread for their subject, because that matter no longer subsists, and is changed into the body of Jesus Christ; (2) they cannot have the surface of the Lord's body for their subject, because it is only present in an invisible manner; and (3) the air cannot be the subject of these accidents, because the same accidents, numero, cannot pass from one subject to another; and because, further, the air cannot at the same time be the substance of its own proper attributes and of those of bread (Thomas Aquinas, par. iii, qu. 77, art. i, in corp.). They argue further, that the contrary doctrine, viz., that they are not really the accidents of bread and wine, but only appear such to us, destroys the nature and idea of a sacrament and of transubstant-
ACCLAMATION

That a sacrament, by its very nature, is essentially a sensible sign, not only in relation to ourselves, but in itself, i.e., in the language of the schools, not only ex parte nostris, but ex parte sui; and that, consequently, if all that there is real and physical in the eucharistic accidents consists in this, that God causes them to produce in us, after consecration, the same sensible effect, the bread did previously the sacrament is no longer a sensible sign, ex parte sui, in itself, but only ex parte nostrī; and, therefore, when God ceases to produce such sensations in us, as, for instance, when the consecrated host is locked up in the pyx, it is no longer a sacrament. They argue also, that if this were not so, they are not, nor are the holy eucharistic accidents, destroys equally the nature of transubstantiation, because (1) transubstantiation is a real conversion of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Jesus Christ. Now, in every conversion there must be something common to both substances remaining the same after the change that it was before, else it would be simply a substitution of one thing for another. As, then, in the holy eucharist, the substances of bread and wine do not remain after consecration, it follows that what does remain is the pure accidents. (2) They who oppose the doctrine of absolute accidents teach that one body differs from another only in the different configuration of its parts; and that wherever there is the same configuration of parts, there is the same body; and wherever there are the same sensations produced, there is also the same arrangement of parts to produce them. If this be so, since, in the holy eucharist, the same sensations are produced after the consecration as before, there must be the same configuration of parts after consecration as before, or the same body; in other words, there is no change, no transubstantiation. — Landon, Eccl. Dictionary, s. v. See Transubstantiation.

ACCLAMATION. (1.) In Roman use, the unanimous concurrence of all the votes in an election for pope or bishop, without previous balloting, is called acclama- tion or quasi-inscription.

(2.) In the ancient Church, the name acclamation was given to shouts of joy, by which the people expressed their approval of the eloquence or doctrine of their preachers. Sometimes in the African Church, when the people could not understand the apocryphal Scripture, or the illustration or confirmation of his argument, the people would join him in repeating the close of it. This was encouraged by the minister, in order that the people might gain a familiar acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures. The acclamations were general, and consisted not only of exclamations, but of clapping the hands, and other indications of assent. It is said that the people applauded the sermons of Chrysostom, by tossing their garments, others by moving their plumes, others laying their hands on their swords, and others waving their handkerchiefs, and crying out, "Thou art worthy of the priesthood! Thou art the true shepherd of the sheep!" Chrysostom often said, when he was in the pulpit, or in preaching; he should try to excite the Greeks of the people rather than their applauses, and let the tears of the hearer be the commendation of the preacher. Many passages in Chrysostom's writings show that he desired the practice to be banished from the Church, because it was abused by vain and ambitious persons, who only preached to gain the applause of their hearers, and even hired men to applaud them. He says, "Many appear in public, and labor hard, and make long sermons, to gain the applause of the people, in which they rejoice as much as if they had gained a kingdom; but, if their sermon ends in silence, they are more mortified about that silence than about the pains of hell. This is the ruin of the Church, that ye seek to hear such sermons as are apt not to move compunction, but pleasure; hearing them as you would hear a musician or singer, with a tinkling sound and composition of words." The practice of giving expression to the voice of the congregation, which is justly considered an essential part of Christian worship, has been usual in almost all the churches of Christendom. There was a sect in Flanders, in the fourteenth century, called Dancers, whose practice it was to seize each other's hands, and to continue dancing till they fell down breathless. The Whippers or Flagellants, the Jumper, the Shakers, have obtained their respective notoriety from a system of absolute sects, adopted in worship.—Bingham, Orig. Eccl. xiv, 27.

ACCO. See ACCIO.

Acoelt, Piaenon, known under the title of Cardinal of Aconon, was born at Florence in 1497, and died there in 1649. Under Leo X he occupied the place of Apostolical Abbreviator, and in 1649 he drew up against Luther the famous bull which condemned 41 propositions of this reformer. While secretary of Clement VII he was appointed cardinal in 1527, and sent to the Emperor Charles V into the Marches of Ancona. Under Paul III he fell into disfavor, and was imprisoned in the castle of San Angelo. He obtained his liberty only upon paying the large sum of 99,000 dollars. He obtained several bishoprics, and left one daughter and two sons. He is the author of a treatise on the rights of the papacy touching the kingdom of Jerusalem. Some of his poems are contained in the first volume of the Corinna illustrum poetarum Itallorum (Florence, 1563, 8vo.).—Hoefner, Biographie Générale, i, 165.

ACCOMMODATION, a technical term in theology, first innocently used by certain mystical interpreters, who maintained that although the sense of holy Scripture is essentially but one, yet that certain passages and the like form the basis of a higher sense, which is the more important than the mere literal expressions exhibited (Walsh, Bibl. Theol. iv, 228). See HYPOSTASIA. From this, however, the term was extended by writers of a Socinian tendency to indicate a certain equivocal character in the language of the sacred writers and speakers. (See Whiteley's Damon Lect., Conybeare's, Lect on Scripture, More's Miletus, Barrow's Remer. ob. d. Lehrart Jean; Forster, Crit. Essays, p. 69; Marsh, in Michaelis's Introduct. i, 473 sq. Express treatises on the subject have been written in Latin by Priansky [Gedan. 1781], Pappelbaum [Stargard. 1783], Weber [Viteb. 1780], Bang [Amst. 1783], Van Huetem [Amst. 1771; 2d ed. Amst. 1778; 3d ed. Viteb. 1781], Kiranen [Amstalden, 1816], Cramer [Havanna, 1792], Ceres [Lips. 1783], Detharding [Got. 1782]; in German, by Zacharia [Bütz. and Wism. 1762], Eckermann, in his Thiel. Bibl., ii, 947 sq.; comp. Henke's Magaz. ii, 2, 688 sq., also the Journ. f. Prät. xli, 129 sq.; xviii, 1 sq.; and, generally, Davidson's Sacred Hermetica, p. 109 sq., 324 sq., 487 sq.) It is now applied.

1. To explain the application of certain passages of the Old Testament to events in the New to which they have no apparent historical or typical reference. Citations of this description are apparently very frequent throughout the whole New Testament, but especially in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The difficulty of reconciling such seeming misapplicameant that the prophecy or citation from the Old Testament was not designed literally to apply to the event in question, but that the New Testament writer merely adopted it in order to produce a strong impression, by showing a remarkable parallelism between two analogous events which had in themselves no mutual relation. Thus Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary on Jeremiah, i. 17-19, remarks, (as quoted by Mathew, who is ever fond of accommodation, applied these words to the massacre of the children of Bethlehem; that is, they were suitable to that occasion, and therefore be applied them, but they are not a prediction of that event.

There is a catalogue of more than seventy of these accommodated passages adduced by the Rev. T. H. Hone, in support of this theory, in his Introduction (ii, 317, Am. ed. 1835), but it will suffice for our purpose to select the following specimens:

Matt. xiii. 35, cited from Psa. lxxviii. 2.
vi. 17, Isa. xiii. 4.
ix. 10, Hos. xi. 1.
ii. 17, 18, Jer. xxxix. 15.
iii. 3, Isa. xl. 8.

It will be necessary, for the complete elucidation of the subject, to bear in mind the distinction not only between accommodated passages and such as must be properly understood (as those which are alluded to as proofs), but also between such passages and those which are merely borrowed, and applied by the sacred writers, sometimes in a higher sense than they were used by the original authors. Passages which do not strictly and literally predict future events, but which can be applied to an event recorded in the New Testament by an accidental parity of circumstances, can alone be thus designated. Such accommodated passages therefore, if they exist, can only be considered as descriptive, and not predictive.

The accommodation theory in exegesis has been equally combated by two classes of opponents. Those of the more ancient school consider such mode of application of the Old Testament passages not only as totally irreconcilable with the plain grammatical construction and obvious meaning of the controverted passages which are said to be so applied, but as an unjustifiable artifice, altogether unworthy of a divine teacher. The New Testament, they believe, to be found chiefly among the most modern of the German Rationalists (see Rose's Protestantism in Germany, p. 78), maintain that the sacred writers, having been themselves trained in this erroneous mode of teaching, had mistakenly, but bona fide, interpreted the passages which they had cited from the Old Testament in a sense altogether different from their historical meaning, and thus applied them to the history of the Christian dispensation. Some of these have maintained that the accommodation theory was a mere shift resorted to by commentators who could not otherwise explain the application of Old Testament prophecies in the New Testament consistently with the inspiration of the sacred writers. See Condescension.

2. The word is also used to designate a certain rationalistic theory, viz., that Christ fell in with the popular prejudices and errors of his time; and so accommodated himself to the mental condition of the Jews. The Gnostics seem to have first originated this theory. They asserted that Christ's doctrine could not be fully known from Scripture alone, because the writers of the New Testament condescended to the stage of culture existing at the time (Irenaeus, Ad. Haer. ii. 5). The theory derives all its plausibility from confounding two things essentially different, viz., condescension in the sense just given, and condescension in the sense of the Word dwelling in the flesh. The former was indeed employed by the great Teacher (e.g. in his use of parables); the latter would have been utterly unworthy of him. In this last sense, the theory is one of the most pernicious outgrowths of German rationalism. See Hone, Introd. i, 317, 324; and for the rationalistic view, Seiss, Bib. Herm. 418; Planck, Introd. 145; Neander, Life of Christ, 113, 114.

Accubation. The posture of reclinatura (ανάκεμα, ανακλίνω, "sit at meat," "sit down") on couches at table, which prevailed among the Jews in and before the time of Christ; a custom apparently derived from Persian luxury, but usual among the Romans likewise. The dinner-bed, or triclinium, stood in the middle of the dining-room (itself hence called "triclinium") also, clear of the walls, and formed three sides of a square which enclosed the table. The open end of the square, with the central hollow, allowed the servants to attend and serve the table. In all the existing representations of the dinner-bed it is shown to have been higher than the enclosed table. Among the Romans the usual number of guests on each couch was three, making nine for the three couches—equal to the number of the Muses; but sometimes there were four to each couch. The Greeks went beyond this number (Cic. In Pis. 27); the Jews appear to have had no particular fancy in this matter, and we know that at our Lord's last supper thirteen persons were present. As each guest leaned, during the greater part of the entertainment, on his left elbow, so as to leave the right arm at liberty, and as two or more lay on the same couch, the head of one man was near the breast of the man who lay behind him, and he was, therefore, said to "lie in the bosom of" the other.

This phrase was in use among the Jews (Luke xvi. 22, 28; John i. 18; xii. 22), and occurs in such a manner as to show that to lie next below, or "in the bosom" of the master of the feast, was considered the most favored place; and is shown by the citations of Kypke and Wetstein (on John xiii. 23) to have been usually assigned to near and dear connections. So it was the disciple whom Jesus loved who "reclined upon his breast" at the last supper. See Lord's Supper. Lightfoot and others suppose that as, on that occasion, John lay next below Christ, so Peter, who was also highly favored, lay next above him. This conclusion is founded chiefly on the fact of Peter beckoning to John that he should ask Jesus who was the traitor. But this seems rather to prove the contrary—that Peter was not near enough to speak to Jesus himself. If he had been there, Christ must have lain near his bosom, and he would have been in the best position for whispering to his master, and in the worst for beckoning to John. The circumstance that Christ was able to reach the feet of Judas when he had dipped it, seems to us rather to intimate that he was the one who filled that place. The morsel of favor was likely to be given to one in a favored place; and Judas, the treasurer and almoner of the whole party, might be expected to fill that place. This also ag-

gratue by contrast the turpitude and treachery of his conduct. See BANQUET. The frame of the dinner-bed was laid with mattresses variously stuffed, and, latterly, was furnished with rich coverings and hangings. Each person was usually provided with a cushion or bolster on which to support the upper part of his person in a somewhat raised position, as the left arm alone could not long without weariness sustain the weight. The lower part of the body being extended diagonally on the bed, with the feet outward, it is at once perceived how easy it was for "the woman that was a sinner" to come behind between the dinner-bed and the wall and anoint the feet of Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 7; Mark xiv. 8). The dinner-beds were so various at different times, in different places, and under different circumstances, that no one description can apply to them all (see Critica Bibliica, ii, 481). Even among the Romans they were at first (after the Punic war) rude form and materials, and covered with mattresses stuffed with rushes or straw; mattresses of hair and wool were introduced at a later period. At first the wooden frames were small, low, and round; and it was not until the time of Augustus that square and ornamental couches came into fashion. In the time of Tiberius the most splendid sort were veneered with costly woods or tortoise-shell, and were covered with valuable embroideries, the richest of which came from Babylon, and cost large sums (Soc. Useful Knowl. Pompeii, ii, 88). The Jews perhaps had all these varieties, though it is not likely that the usage was ever carried to such a pitch of luxury as among the Romans; and it is probable that the mass of the people fed in the ancient manner—seated on stools or on the ground. It appears that couches were often so low that the feet rested on the ground; and that couches or bolsters were in general use. It would also seem, from the mention of two and of three couches, that the arrangement was more usually square than semicircular or round (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in John xiii, 25). See DIVAN.

It is utterly improbable that the Jews derived this custom from the Romans, as is constantly alleged. They certainly knew it as existing among the Persians long before it had been adopted by the Romans Confirmation, ii, 84); and the works on Pompeii and Herodias (see Cockburn's Pompeii Illustrated, ii, 5) supply the more recent information. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Cena, Deipnon, Triclinium.—Kitto, s. v. See EATING.

ACCUSSED (in general designated by some form of καλήτερος, Gr. κατάραφος, to "curse") a term used in two senses. See OATH.

(1.) Anathema (αναθήμα, ch'exem, ανάθιμα), a vow (Num. xxii, 2), by which persons or things were devoted to Jehovah, whose property they became irreversibly and never to be redeemed (sacer, sacrum esto Jehovah; comp. Cesar, Bell. Galli. vii, 17; Tacit. Annal. xiii, 57; Liv. iii, 55; Diod. Sicil. x, 3; see Mayer, De Nomine, Pecuniae, in Ugelini Theor. xxii). Persons thus offered were doomed to death (Lev. xxvi, 29; see Judg. xi, 31 sq.; 1 Sam. xiv, 44). Cattle, land, and other property were appropriated for the use of the temple, i.e. of the caste of the priests (Lev. xxvii, 28; Num. xvii, 14; Ezek. xxiv, 29). Originally such vows were spontaneous on the part of the Israelites (see Num. xxvii, 3), and were first introduced for public sacrifices (capital sentence pronounced against an idolatrous Israelite (Exod. xxv. 20), or against a whole idolatrous city (Deut. xiii, 10 sq.), which was ordered to be destroyed utterly by fire with all that was therein, and the inhabitants and all their cattle to be put to the sword (see Judg. x, 46; xxi, 10, 19; comp. Appian. Pum. 139; Mitridat. 45; Liv. x, 29; see also Strabo, De rerum rerum in loc. Lips. 1730). Essentially identical with this was the anathema against the Canaanish cities, to be executed by the Israelites when they should enter the land (Deut. ii, 34 sq.; iii, 6; Josh. vi, 17 sqq.; x, 28, 35, 37, 40; xi, 11). (In consequence of a vow (Num. xxii, 2 sq.), or upon the express command of Jehovah (Deut. vii, 2; xx, 16 sq.; see 1 Sam. xv, 31), in order that they should be secured against all manner of temptation to enter nearer relations with the idolatrous natives (Deut. xx, 18; see Exod. xxviii, 32 sq.). Such city, therefore, was burned with all things therein, and the inhabitants and their cattle were killed, while all metals and metallic utensils were delivered up to the sanctuary (Josh. vi, 21, 24). At times (when the wants of the army made it desirable?) the cattle was spared, and, like other spoils, divided among the warriors (Josh. viii, 26 sq.; Deut. ii, 34 sq.; iii, 6 sq.). Finally, in some cities merely the living things were destroyed (Josh. x, 29, 30, 32, 37, 39, 40), but the cities themselves were spared. Those who were guilty of any sort of violation of the laws of the anathema were put to death (Josh. vii, 11 sq.; see vi, 18; Deut. xiii, 17; Cesar, Bell. Galli. vii, 17). In the anathema pronounced by a zealous interpreter of the law (Ezra x, 8) against the possession of such Jews as had sold foreign wives and refused to divorce them, the banishment of such persons themselves was comprehended. It does not appear, however, whether their property was destroyed or (as H. Michaelis understood) given to the priests: the latter case would be inconsistent with a strict interpretation of Deut. xiii, 16. See ANASTHMA.

(2.) Different from this is the Ban of the later Jews, mentioned in the New Testament as a sort of ecclesiastical punishment (for heresy), Luke vi, 22 (φαρισαῖοι); John ix, 22; xii, 42; xvi, 2 (δισανακνοούν γίνεται συν τούτου, viz., the exclusion of a Jew from the congregation, and all familiar intercourse with others, by a resolution. "Excommunicated" (ηκομικομική, μενοδόθη) and "excommunication" (ηκομική, ἡδοθῇ) are also frequent terms in the Mishna (Talmud, iii, 8; Middot Katam, iii, 1). Stones were thrown (a mark of dishonesty) over the graves of those who died in communication (Ederyoth, v, 6). The excommunicated person was not permitted to enter the Temple by the common door with others, but was admitted by a separate one (Middot Katam, iii, 1). He was also proscribed from shaving the during the time of his excommunication (Middot Katam, iii, 1; see Selden, Jus Nat. et Gent. iv, 8 sq.). There is mention in the Gemara, as well as in other rabbinical writings, of another sort of excommunication, בקע, ברעמ (the person thus excommunicated was called בקע, ברעמס, muchahram), more severe than the above, בקע. The difference between the two—according to Maimonides—was, [1], that the nidday was valid only for the thirty days following its date, and was pronounced without accusing; but the cherek was always connected with a curse: [2], that cherek could be pronounced only by several, at least ten, members of the congregation; but the nidday even by a single Israelite (e.g. by a rabbi); [3], that the muchahram was excluded from all intercourse with the others; but it was permitted to converse with the memeshah. He was allowed only four cubits, and his household was not subjected even to this restriction. According to the Gemara, the latter was compelled to wear a mourning dress, in order to be distinguished outstandingly from others. Elia Leviita (in Tabb, under בקע) and later rabbis speak of a third and still higher degree of excommunication, בקעת, ברצעה, execution (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 289, col. 294, and a number of others), which was delivered up to all sorts of perdition. It does not appear, however, that older Talmudists used this word in a sense different from nidday, [the formula declaration is quoted by Maimonides in the case of the latter, however, is בקעת, ברצעה, let him be in בקעת, ברצעה,] (see Selzn, De Synedr. 1, 7, p. 64 sq; Ugolino, in Pfeiffer's Antiqu. Ebr. iv; Theaurer. p. 1294); or perhaps it was a term for excommunication (see Daza, in Menonach, N. T. Talm. p. 615 sq.), and the hypothesis of Elias seems, in fine, to have been founded upon a whimsical etymology of the word בקעת (q. d. בקעת, there, and בקעת, the death). But it may even be questioned whether nidday and cherek were distinguished from each other in the age of Jesus, or in the first centuries after the destruction of Jerusalem, in the sense attributed to them. In general, it is not improbable that there were even then degrees of excommunication. The formal exclusion from the Hebrew congregation and nationality is mentioned already by Ezra x, 8 (see above). In the passages of John foregoing a minor excommunication is spoken of; while in that of Luke, without doubt, a total exclusion is understood; even if we take merely the דָּרָשׁ in this sense, or (with Luke, Commentar. sit. Ev. Joh. ii, 287) we suppose that there is a gradation in the passage, so that דָּרָשׁ refers to בקעת, גָּוִיס, even גָּוִיס, to בקעת. Many were of the opinion that the highest degree of excommunication, בקעת, according to the classification of Elias Leviita, is to be found in the formula נַעֲנָדֵהֵי הָעֲנָדֵהֵי (Zerubbabel, 1 Cor. v, 8, 5, 1 Tim. 1, 20). But there is no firm historical ground for such explanation, and the above expression should be explained rather from the usual idiomatic language of the apostle Paul, according to which it cannot mean, surely, a mere excommunication, as has been satisfactorily proved by Platt (Fires. ob. d. Br. on die Kor. i, 102 sq), and concurred in by other commentators. See Daza. Finally, it is not less improbable that, in Romans x, 1, q. νὰ δοθῇ οὑς ὁ Χριστός should refer to the Jewish excommunication (as was asserted of late by Tholuck and Racket) see Frisse (in loc.). See EXECUTION.

also referred to in the Syro-Chaldais "אכְלֵדָמָא, exeget. καλέονται, field of the blood, as it is explained in the text, ἄγως αἰμαρος, see Critica Biblica, ii, 447), the field purchased with the money for which Judas betrayed Jesus, and which was staked off among the kinsmen of Judas as a place of burial for strangers—that is, of such numerous visitors at Jerusalem as might take during their stay, while attending the festivals (Matt. xxvii, 8; Acts i, 19, the slight discrepancy between these passages has been unduly magnified by Alford, Comment. in loc. post.; see Oehler, Comment. iii, 61, Am. ed.). It was previously a "potter's field." The field now shown as Acedelama lies on the slopes of the hills beyond the valley of Hinnom, south of Mount Zion. This is obviously the spot which Jerome points out (Onomast. s. v. Acdelamach) as lying on the south (Eusebius, on the north) of Zion, and which has since been mentioned though with some variance, by almost every one who has described Jerusalem. Sandys describes it (Relation of a Journey, p. 187), and relates the common story that the Emperor Helena caused 270 ship-loads of its flesh-consuming mould to be taken to Rome, to form the soil of the Campo Santo, to which the same virtue is ascribed. Castel affirms that great quantities of the mouldy soil were removed by divers Christian princes in the time of the Crusades, and to this source assigns the similar sarcophagus properties claimed not only by the Campo Santo at Rome, but by the cemetery of St. Innocents at Paris, by the cemetery at Naples (Le Saint Vénérable de Monceaux, 1603, 150, also Roger, p. 160), and by that of the Campo Santo at Pisa. This plot seems to have been early set apart by the Latins, as well as by the Crusaders, for a place of burial for pilgrims (Jac. de Vitrac, p. 64). The charnell-house is mentioned by Maundeville (Travels, 1322, p. 175, Bohn's ed.) as belonging to the Knights Hospitallers. Sandys shows that, early in the seventeenth century, it was in the possession of the Armenians. Rogers (La terre sainte, p. 161) states that they bought it for the burial of their own pilgrims, and it is the last of the churches that remain to them. They still possessed it in the time of Maundrell, or, rather, rented it, at a sequin a day, from the Turks. Corpses were still deposited there; and the traveller observes that they were in various stages of decay, from which he conjectures that the grave did not make the quick dispatch with the bodies committed to it which had been reported. "The earth, hereabouts," he observes, "is as chalky substance; the plot of ground was not above thirty yards long by fifteen wide; and a moiety of it was occupied by the church-house, which was twelve yards high" (Journey, p. 196). Richardson (Travels, p. 567) affirms that bodies were thrown in as late as 1818; but Dr. Robinson alleges that it has the appearance of having been for a much longer time abandoned: "The field or plat is not now marked by any boundary to distinguish it from the rest of the hill-side; and the former charnell-house, now a ruin, is all that remains to point out that quick disjunction of the bodies committed to it which had been reported." The "church-house," a ruined square edifice—half built, half excavated—perhaps originally a church (Pauli, Cod. Diplom., IV, 23), but the last conjectures (Schultz, Williams, and Barclay) propose to identify with the tomb of Ananus (Joseph, II, 2, 12, 2). It is said (Kraft, Topogr., p. 193) to contain the graves of several German pilgrims; but the intuition (Ritter, Erdk. XV, 463) that a pottery still exists near this spot does not seem to be borne out by other testimony. (See, on the subject generally, Schlegel, De agro Sambuci, Rheni, 1709, ed. Molitor, 1792; in Menricken, Theatar, p. 222.)—Kitto, s. v. See Potter's Field.

Acephali (i and ecephali), literally, those who have no chief. The term is applied to various classes of persons (see Biedermann, De Acephalii, Freiberg, 1751). 1. To those at the Council of Ephesus who refused to follow either St. Cyril or John of Antioch. 2. To the scribes in the Synagogue who denied, with Eutyches, the distinction of natures in Jesus Christ, and rejected the Council of Chalcedon. About the year 482 the Emperor Zeno endeavored to extinguish these religious dissensions by the publication of an edict of union, called Henoticus. The more moderate of both parties subscribed the decree, but the object was generally unsuccessful. The Monophysites and Henoticus. These Acephali were the recipients of the synod of Ephesus, 526. 3. To bishops exempt from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of their patriarch. 4. To the Flagellants (q. v.).

Acesius, a Novatian bishop, present at Nicea, in 325, who agreed with the decisions of the council concerning the time for celebrating Easter, and the doctrine of the consubstantiality of the Son, but nevertheless commenced to communicate with other bishops. When the emperor asked of him his reason for so doing, he replied (according to the heresy of Novatian) that he could not communicate with those who had fallen after baptism. "Then, Acesius," answered Constantine, "set up a ladder for yourself, and mount up to heaven alone."—Soc. Eccl. Hist. lib. i, cap. 10; Soz. Eccl. Hist. lib. i, cap. 22.

Achabara (A), a designation of a certain rock (Aχαβάρας φίλτρα) mentioned by Josephus (War, ii, 20, 6) as one of the spots in Upper Galilee fortified by him on the approach of the Romans under Cestius; probably the same place with the Chabara (Kafara) erroneously annexed to the preceding word, see Rendel, Palast., 705, a suggestion followed by Hudson and Havercamp, who write 'Aχαβάρας', mentioned likewise by Josephus (Jos. Ant., xlvii, 37) as a place of naturally great strength. Rendel (p. 542) thinks it is identical with a place called Abbarra (נֶבֶרָה), identified by Haggai with Abbarah, situated between Tiberias and Zepath (Septuaginthis), and perhaps also the residence of the Abbarites (Aχαβαρίας) mentioned in the Gemara (Baba Metzia, xxxiv, 1). But the place named by Haggai would be in Lower Galilee. The cliff in question (associated in both passages of Josephus with Jamnia, or Jannith, and Moreh) appears to have been some eminence of Middle Galilee; probably (as suggested by Schwartz, Palast., p. 186) the Tell Abbarah (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 263). It lies some two miles south-east of Safed, having a fine spring (Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 675, 771).

Achad (Heb. Achad, one, i. e. v. Acher, d. id.), thought by some to be the name of a heathen deity mentioned in the difficult phrase, Isa. lxvi, 17, יְהֹוֶה וְאִישׁ יְהֹוֶה, after one (of them) in the midst. Sept. καὶ ἐν τῷ ρῆμα ὡς; Vulg. post iunviam inreancus natus, Auth. Vers. behind one (tree) in the midst." According to Gesenius (Commentar, in loc.) the phraseology is susceptible of three interpretations: (a) ""One after another in the midst;"" (b) ""After Achad in the midst;"" or (c) ""After one (or a tree) in the midst. [I. e. a priestess of the temple, with diviner rites] in the midst,"" a rendering which he prefers (comp. Rosenmüller, Scholia in loc.). In favor of the allusion to a heathen deity is only the slender analogy with the name Adad, a Syrian divinity. See HADAD. (See Mill, De Idololo Thyn, in his Dissert. Select. Lugd. Bat. 1748, p. 187-166; Doderlein, Philol. Abhandl. u. d. Gott. Achad, in his Verm. Abhandl. Halle, 1755, p. 217-237.)

Achala (Akaia, derivation uncertain), a region of Greece, which in the restricted sense occupied the north-western portion of the Pelloponnesus, including Corinth and its isthmus (Strabo, vii, p. 438 sq.). By the poets it was often put for the whole of Greece, whence they called Akanthos, Achaen, i.e. Greece. The cities of the narrow slip of country, originally called Achala, were confederated in an ancient league, which was renewed in B.C. 280 for the purpose of resisting the Macedonians. This league subsequently included several of the other Greek states, and became the most powerful political body in Greece; and hence it was natural for the Romans to apply the name of Achala to both the Peloponnesus and the Peloponnesian Greeks, when they took Corinth and destroyed the league in B.C. 146 (Pausan. vii, 16, 10). Under the Romans, Greece was divided into two provinces, Macedonia and Achala, the former of which included Macedonia proper, with Illyricum, Epirus, and Thessaly; and the latter, all that lay southward of the former (Cellar, i, p. 1170, 1022). It is in this latter acceptation that the name of Achala is always employed in the New Testament (Acts viii, 12, 16; xii, 21; Rom. xv, 26; xvi, 25; 1 Cor. vii, 16; 2 Cor. 1, 1, ix, 2, i, 10, 1 Thess. 1, 7, 6). In the division of the provinces by Augustus between the emperor and the senate in B.C. 27, Achala was placed in the imperial province (Sallust, xvi, 20, 90); and, as such, was governed by procurators (Dion. Cass. liti. p. 704). In A.D. 16 Tiberius changed the two into one imperial province under procurators (Tacit. Annal. i, 76); but Claudius restored them to the sena...

(Achish, Heb. אֲכִישָׁ, perhaps angry; Sept. Α'χίς v. r. Ἄχιςος, a name which, as it is found applied to two kings of Gath, was perhaps only a general title of royalty, like "Abimelech" (q. v.), another Philistine kingly name, with which, indeed, it is interchanged in the title of Ps. xxxiv.,

1. A Philistine king of Gath, with whom David sought refuge from Saul (1 Sam. xxii, 1-15).
By this act he incurred imminent danger; for he was recon-nised and spoken of by the officers of the court as one whose glory had been won at the cost of the Philistine. Achish told David with alarm that he feigned himself mad when introduced to the notice of Achish, who, seeing him "scrabbling upon the doors of the gate, and letting his spittle fall down upon his beard," rebuked his people sharply for bringing him to his presence, asking, "Have I need of madmen,
that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman
in my presence?" Shall this come into my house?"
B.C. 1061. After this David lost no time in quitting the territories of Gath (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illus. in loc.). This prince is elsewhere called Abimelech (Psa. xxxiv, title), possibly a corruption for "Achish the king" (בֵּית אֵל). David's conduct on this occasion has been illustrated by the similar proceeding of some other great men, who feigned themselves mad in difficult circumstances—as Ulysses (Cic. Off. iii, 26; Hygin. f. 95, Schol. ad Lyceophr. 818), the astronomer Meton (Elian, Hist. xiii, 12), Lucius Brutus (Liv. i, 56; Dion. Hal. iv, 68), and the

The name of the Canaanite king of Ziklag. Achish is given as being the son of Maacah, who, with two servants of Shimee fled, and thereby occasional their master the journey which cost him (Achish ii, 39, 40), B.C. cir. 1012. Achish (Ἀχῖς), the Gracized form (1 Esdr. viii, 2; 2 Esdr. i, 1) of the name of Amithu (q. v.), Achmetha (Heb. אַּחְמֶתָּ, Ezra vi, 2; Sept. Ἀκμήθα, Vulg. Ecbaetana), the Ecbatana of classical writers (Ῥα Ἰ βάταρα, 2 Mac. ii, 3; Judith xi, 1; Tob. vi, 9; Josephus, Ant. x, 11, 7; xi, 4, 6; also, in Greek authors, Ἰβάταρα and Ἰβαταρα), a city in Media. The derivation of the name is doubly (see Ganenius, Thes. Iseb. p. 70); but Major Rawlin-son (Geogr. Journ., x, 184) has left little question that the title was applied exclusively to cities having fortresses for the protection of the royal treasures.

The ancient orthography of this name is traced by Lassen
(Jud. Bibl., iii, 86) in the Sanscrit 악바단, i.e. ἱστατον, ἰστάματα, stable.
In Ezra we learn that, in the reign of Darius Hystaspis, the Jews petitioned that some place be made in the king's treasure-house at Babylon for the decree which Cyrus had made in favor of the Jews (Ezra vi, 17). Search was accordingly made in the record-office ("house of the rolls"), where the treasuries were kept at Babylon (vi, 1); but it appears not to have been found there, as it was eventually discovered "at Achmetha, in the palace of the province of the Medes" (vi, 2). Josephus (Ant.
ii, 11, 7; xi, 4, 6), while retaining the proper name of Ecbatana, yet (like the Sept., which adds the generic name πόλις) employs the word βουλία to express the Chaldee נֵבֶר, בְּרִיתא ("the palace"), which is used as the distinctive epithet of the city (Ezra vi, 2).

In Judith i, 2-4, there is a brief account of Ecbatana, in which we are told that it was founded by Arphaxad (Diebold), and that it was one of the Medes, who had Darius Hystaspis' capital. It was built of hewn stones, and surrounded by a high and thick wall, furnished with wide gates and strong and lofty towers. Herodotus ascribes its foundation to Dacaces, in obedience to whose commands the Medes erected "that great and strong city, now known as the name of Achmetha. Where the walls are built circle within circle, and are so constructed that each inner circle overtops its outer neighbor by the height of the battlements alone. This was effect-ced partly by the nature of the ground—a conical hill and partly by the building itself. The number of the circles was seven, and within the innermost was the palace of the treasury. The battlements of the first circle were white, of the second black, of the third scarlet, of the fourth blue, of the fifth orange; all these were brilliantly colored with different pigments; but the battlements of the sixth circle were overlaid with silver, and of the seventh with gold. Such were the seven circles and the wall surrounding for Dacace's protection. For the Dacaces constructed for himself; but he ordered the mass of the Median nation to construct their houses in a circle around the outer wall" (Herodot. i, 88). It is contended by Rawlinson (Geogr. Journ. x, 127) that this story of the seven walls is a fable of Sabean origin—the seven colors mentioned being precisely those employed by the Orientals to denote the seven great heavenly bodies, or the seven climates in which they revolve.

This Ecbatana has been usually identified with the present Hamadan (see Journal of Education, ii, 305), which is still an important town, and the seat of one of the governments into which the Persian king divided his empire. It is situated in a broad and east long, 40°, at the extremity of a rich and fertile plain, on a gradual ascent, at the base of the Elwund mountains, whose higher summits are covered with perpetual snow. Some remnants of ruined walls of great thickness, and also of towers of sun-dried bricks, are still visible. It is a very ancient city more ancient than the present on the same spot. Although still declining, it has a population of about 25,000, and contains excellent and well-supplied bazaars, and numerous khans of rather a superior description—it be-ging the great centre where the routes of traffic between Persia and Arabia, and Persia and India, converge. Its own manufactures are chiefly in leather. Many Jews reside here, claiming to be descended from those of the captivity who remained in Media. Benjamin of Tudela says that in his time the number was 50,000.
Achmeth.

Balsh David de Beth Hillel (Travels, p. 85-87, Madras, 1839) gives them but 200 families. The latest authority (J. J. Benjamin, Eight Years in Asia and Africa, Hanover, 1839, p. 214) reckons them at 500 families. They are mostly in good circumstances, having fine houses and gardens, and are chiefly traders and goldsmiths. They speak a Turkish of their own. They have two synagogues. They derive the name of the town from "Hamam" and "Jedef," and say that it was given to that foe of Mordecai by King Ahasuerus. In the midst of the city is a tove, which is in their charge, and which is said to be that of Mordecai and Esther lived and were buried there (see Kinnei's Peri, p. 126; Moric's Second Journey, p. 264 sq.; Southgate's Travels, ii, 152 sq.; Buckingham, Assyria, i, 264 sq.; M'Culloch's Geschichte, ii, 271). The door of the town is very small, and consists of a single stone of great thickness, turning on its own pivot from one side. On passing through the little portal, the visitor is introduced into a small arched chamber, in which are seen the graves of several rabbi, some of which may contain the bodies of the first rebuilders of the tove, after the destruction of the original one by Timour. A second door, of very confined dimensions, is at the end of this vestibule, by which the entrance is made into a large apartment on hands and knees, and under the concave stand two sarcophagi, made of very dark wood, curiously and richly carved, with a line of Hebrew inscription running round the upper ledge of each. Other inscriptions, in the same language, are cut on the walls, while one of the most ancient, engraved on a white marble slab, is let into the wall itself. This slab is traditionally alleged to have been preserved from the ruins of the tove destroyed by the Persians, and in the sarcophagi in the same consecrated spot. This last inscription is as follows: "Mordecai, beloved and honored by a king, was great and good. His garments were as those of a sovereign. Ahasuerus covered him with this rich robe, and also placed a golden chain around his neck. The city of Samarkand (or Shushan) rejoiced at his honors, and his high favor from the glory of the Jews." The inscription which encompasses the sarcophagus of Mordecai is to the following effect: "It is said by David, Preserve me, O God! I am now in thy presence. I have cried at the gate of heaven that thou art my God, and what goodliness have I received from thee, O Lord! Those whose bodies are now beneath the earth, when animated by thy mercy, were great; and whatever happiness was bestowed upon them in this world came from thee, O God! Their griefs and sufferings were many at the first, but they became happy, because they always called upon thy name in their miseries. Thou liftest me up, and I become powerful. Thine enemies sought to destroy me in the early times of my life; but the shadow of thy hand was upon me, and covered me as a tent from their wicked purposes.—Mordecai." The following is the inscription carved round the sarcophagi of Esther: "I praise thee, O God, that thou hast created me. I show that my sins are a just punishment, yet I hope for mercy at thy hands; for whenever I call upon thee, thou art with me; thy holy presence secures me from all evil. My heart is at ease, and my fear of thee increases. My life became, through thy goodness, at the last, full of peace. O God! do not that my soul out from thy divine presence. Those whom thou lovest never feel the torments of hell. Lead me, O merciful Father, to the life of life, that I may be filled with the heavenly fruits of Paradise.—Esther" (Ker Porter's Travels, ii, 88 sqq.). See Esther.

Ecbatana, or Hamadan, is not without other local traditions connected with sacred history. On the mountain Orontes, or Elwund, the body of a son of King Solomon is pretended to be buried, but what son it is not mentioned. It is a large square platform, a little raised, formed by manual labor out of the native rock, which is ascended by a few rugged steps, and is forty cubits in diameter. There is no ancient piece of workmanship, but how it came to be connected with a son of the Jewish monarch does not appear. The Jewish natives of Hamadan are credulous as to the reputed story, and it is not unlikely that it was originally a mountain altar to the sun, illustrating what we often read in Scripture respecting the idolatrous sacrificial worship in "high places." The natives believe that certain ravines of the mountain produce a plant which can transform all kinds of metal into gold, and also cure every possible disease. They admit that no one had ever found it, but their belief in its existence is nevertheless unshaken. They also claim to have a fabulous legend respecting the hidden gold of this mountain, which reminds the English reader of the celebrated story of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves in the Arabian Nights. This stone contains an inscription in cabbalistic characters, unintelligible to every one who has hitherto looked on it; but it is believed that if any person could read the characters aloud an effect would be produced which will shake the mountain to its centre, it being the protecting spell of an immense hidden treasure; and these characters once pronounced, would procure instant admissance from the genii of this subterranea cavern, and the wealth it contains would be laid at the feet of the fortunate invoker of this golden "Seasme!" See Ecbatan.

History mentions another Ecbatana, in Palestine, at the foot of Mount Carmel, toward Ptolemais, where Cambyses died (Herodotus iii, 64; Plin. v, 19). It is not mentioned by this or any similar name in the Hebrew writings. (See Reldan, Palestine, p. 745.)

A'chor (Heb. Akor, או כור, trouble; Sept. Ακώρ, the name of a valley (גֶּש יא, Sept. φοργύς, κόλπος. "Eme) not far from Jericho, given in consequence of the trouble occasioned to the Israelites by the sin of Achan (q. v.). It was strongly fortified (Josh. vii, 24). It was known by the same name in the time of Jerome (Onomast. s. v.). The prophets more than once allude to it typically in predicting the glorious changes under the Messiah, either on account of its proverbial fertility (Isa. lxv, 10) or by way of contrast with the unfortunate entrance of the Israelites near this pass into Canaan on their first approach (Hos. ii, 15). It was situated on the boundary of Judah and Benjamin, between the stone of Ben-Banan and Debir, south of Gilgal (Josh. xv, 7), and was probably the same now called (see Zimmerman's Map) Wady Debir, running into the Dead Sea east of Ain Jehair (Robinson's Researches, ii, 234)." Thrice Thomson (Land and Book, ii, 185) says vaguely that "it runs up from Gilgal toward Bethel;" but this is inconsistent with the above notices of location (comp. Kell, Comment. on Josh. p. 201). See CHERITH.

Ach'sa, a less correct mode (1 Chron. ii, 49) of Anglicizing the name ACHSAH (q. v.).

Ach'sah (Heb. אֲכָשָה, אוֹכָשָה, seat, Sept. Ἄχασ, the daughter of Caleb (and apparently his only daughter, 1 Chron. ii, 49, "Achsa"), whose hand her father offered in marriage to him who should lead the attack on the city of Debir, and take it, B.C. 1612. The prize was won by his nephew Othniel; and as the ACLOTHY or Acolyte (ακολουθος, follower), the name of an inferior order of clergy or servants. It is not known in the Greek Church, but appears to be of very ancient establishment in the Latin Church, since mention is made of it in the epistles of Cyprian. Their office in the ancient Church was to light the candles and to pour the wine intended to be consecrated into the proper vessels; to wait upon the bishop.
ops and their officers, presenting to them the sacer-dotal vestments; and to accompany the bishop everywhere, acting as witnesses of his conduct. At present their duties in the Papal Church are to attend upon the deacon and sub-deacon at the altar, to wash and dry
the wine and water at mass, to carry the Thurible,
and to light and carry the candles, especially at the chanting of the Gospel. At Rome there are three kinds of Acolythes: the Acolythes of the palace, palatini, who wait on the pope; those who serve the churches, statasini, who are stationed; and regionarii, who serve with the deacons in the churches in different quarters of the city. The order of Acolythes is the fourth of the ordinaries masora, through which a Romish priest must pass.
For a full account of the office and its functions, see Bois-sasset, Dict. des Rites, i, 87; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk.

Acutius or Acoubis, James, a native of Trent, and the intimate friend of Francis Beati, a Romanist.
They both quitted Italy on account of their religion, having both left the communion of the Church of Rome. Beati, who left first, waited for Acutius at Basle; this was in the year 1557. Hence they went together to Zurich, where they parted, and Acutius, after leaving Strasburg, journeyed into England, where he was very well received by Queen Mary, who employed him as an engineer. He was a member of the Dutch congregation in Austin-Friars, but falling under the suspicion of "anabaptistical and Arian principles," proceedings were taken against him before Grindal, bishop of London, who sentenced him to be refused the Holy Sacrament, and forbade the Dutch congregations to receive him. He died in 1566, according to Niceron. He inclined toward moderation and principles of toleration in matters of religion.
Arminius styled him "divinum prudentiae ac modera-tionis lumen." He wrote De Methodo, hoc est, de recto et justo egeno, and Serenendorum et aliorum saeculae (svo, Basle, 1558); Strategemata Salomonis (svo, Basle, 1565). Transl. into French, 4to. There is also an English translation of the first four books, London, 1614.

Acosta, Gabriel (afterward Uriel), a Portuguese, of Jewish extraction, born at Oporto, and becoming a Romanist, in 1508. He left Portugal at the age of twenty-two yrs. he began to entertain doubts
first as to the doctrine of indulgences, and, finally,
as to the truth of Christianity; and being unable to satisfy himself, he returned to the religion of his ancestors, became a Jew, retired from Portugal to Amsterdam, and was circumcised. He soon, however, became disgusted with the Pharisaism of the Jews of Amsterdam, and advocated a doctrine like that of the ancient Sadducees. He wrote in the Portuguese language a treatise entitled "The Traditions of the Pharsae compared with the written Law" (Amsterdam, 1621), which so exasperated the Jews that they accused him of stirring up the Jewish tribunal. His book was confiscated, he was imprisoned ten days, and fined three hundred guilders. He was also expelled from the Jewish synagogue. After seven years he submitted to a painful punishment, and was readmitted, though it does not appear that he really changed his views. He died, according to Fabricius, in 1547, whether by suicide or not is uncertain. He left an autobiography which fell into the hands of Limborch, and was reprinted in 1847 (Uriel Acosta's Selfbiographia, Lat. u. Deutsch, Leipzig).
His life afforded Gutzkow the material for a novel, "The Sadducees in Amsterdam" (1834), and for a drama, "Uriel Acosta" (Leips. 1847).—Jellinek, Ueber

Acosta, Joseph d', a Spanish Jesuit, born about 1589, appointed provincial of the Jesuits in Peru, and died
rector of the university of Salamanca, Feb. 15, 1600.
He wrote The Natural and Moral History of the Indians (Seville, 1590, 4to); a treatise De Christo Revelato Il-lori novem (Lugub, 1592, 8vo); De Promulgatione Eemgeli opud Barbaros (Cologne, 1586, 8vo).

Acra (Aspa), a Greek word, signifying a summit or castrum, in which sense its Hebraized form Chakra (Acts 15:35) also occurs in the Syriac and Chaldaic (Bux-torff, Lex. Talm. col. 816). Hence the name of Acra was applied to the city that stood on the north of Mount Zion, at Jerusalem, on which a citadel was built by Antiochus Epiphanes, to command the holy place (1 Mac. iii,
45; iv, 2, 41; vi, 18, 36, 52; ix, 52 sq.; x, 6; xi, 41;
2 Mac. iv, 12, 27, etc.). It thus became, in fact, the Acropolis of Jerusalem (see Michaelis, in Mac. p. 90 and others). Crome, 'Josephus,' ii, 312, says, "Jos-phus describes this eminence as semicircularly (see Reland, Palest. p. 802); and reports that when Simon Macabeus had succeeded in expelling the Syrian garrison, he not only demolished the citadel, but caseed the hill itself to be levellcd, that no neighboring site might henceforth be higher than or so high as that on which the temple stood. The people had suf-fured so much from the garrison, that they willingly lag-bored day and night, for three years, in this great work (Ant. xiii, 6, 6; War, v, 4, 1). At a later period the palace of Helena, queen of Adiabene, stood on the site, which still retained the name of Acra, as did also, probably, the cathedral and the name throughout the archives (War, vi, 6, 8; see also Deser. Urbis Jersolymae, per J. Heydenwn, lib. iii, cap. 2).—Kitto, s. v.
A good deal of controversy has lately arisen as to the position of this eminence, Dr. Robinson (Bib. Res.
1, 414; new ed. iii, 207-211) strongly contending for the sloping eminence now occupied by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and others (especially Williams, Holy City, ii, 25, 49) placing Acra more northward from the temple. The latter position, in the middle of the Mohammedan quarter, on the whole, seems best to accord with the present state of the surface and the ancient notes of place (see Strong's Harmony and Exp. of the Gospels, Append. ii, p. 4, 5); especially with Josephus's statements (War, v, 4, 1) respecting the valley of the Tyropoeon (q. v.). See Jerusalem.
A place by the name of Acræa (Aspa) is mentioned by Josephus (War ii, 2, 2) as having been taken by Simon Macabeus, in connection with Gazzara, Joppa, and Jana; and its site has long been a subject of a change of reading), while others take the word in the ordinary sense of tower. The passage is eviden-antly parallel with 1 Mac. xiv, 7, where Simon is said, after having taken Gazzara and Bethsura, to have cleansed "the tower" (aspa); which, by a comparison with chap. xiii, 49, appears to mean no other than the above fortress in Jerusalem. See BACH.

jamin of Tudela) of the Crusades, see ACCIO.

Acrabattine (Ἀκραβαττίνης; Gr. χώρα), the name of two regions in Palestine.
1. A district or toparchy of Judea, extending between Shechem (Nablous) and Jericho eastward, being about 12 miles long (see Reland, Palest. p. 192).
It is mentioned by Josephus (War, ii, 12, 4; 20, 4; 22, 2, iii, 3, 4, 5); and doubts have been raised as to a town called Acrabite, mentioned by Eusebius (Onom. s. v. Ακραβατινής; Jerome corruptly "Adorabii, see Clerici ed. Amst. 1707, p. 17, note 5) as a large village 9 Roman miles east of Neapolis, on the road to Jericho; probably the same found by Dr. Robinson under the name of Acrabat, in his topography, and described as a considerable town, finely situated on the slope of a fertile hill, with a mosque (new ed. of Researches, iii, 296, 297) and a ruined fort (Van de Velde, Narrativa, ii, 304-307).

2. Another district of Judea toward the southern end of the Dead Sea, described by the Edersheim during the captivity (1 Mac. v, 8, Anh. Vers. "Arabattine," comp. Joseph. Ant. xil, 8, 1). It is supposed to have taken its name from the Maaler-acrabbim (q.v.) of Num. xxxiv, 4; Josh. xv, 5, which lay in this vicinity. Acrabim. See Maaler-acrabbim.

Acre is put by our translators (Isa. v, 10) for גָּדָה, גָּדָה, which properly means a yoke, i. e. as much land as a yoke of oxen can plough in a day. So the Latin jugerum, an acre, from jugum, a yoke. See Measure. In 1 Sam. xiv, 14, the word "acre" is supplied in our translation after פְּקֵשׁ, a furlong, which is omitted (see margin).

Acre. See Acco.

Acrostic (from ἀκρότητι, extremity, and άριστος, verse). The word commonly signifies the beginning of a verse; but it is sometimes taken for the end or close of it. It ordinarily signifies an ode in which the initial letters of the verses in their order spell a certain word or sentence. In this form acrostics do not occur in the Bible. There are certain parts of the poetical compositions of the Old Testament, however, in which the successive verses or lines in the original begin with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet; these may be called alphabetical acrostics. For instance, in Psalm cxix, there are as many stanzas or strophes as there are letters in the alphabet, and each strophe consists of eight double lines, all of which, in each case, begin with that letter of the alphabet corresponding to the place of the strophe in the Psalm—that is, the first eight lines begin each with כ, Aleph, the next eight with ב, Beth, and so on. See Acediastic. Other Psalms have only one verse to each letter, in order, as Psalms xxxv, xxxiv. In others, again, as Psalms cxii, cxxi, each verse is divided into two parts, and these hemistichs follow the alphabetical arrangement, like the whole verses of the last mentioned Psalms. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are mostly acrostic, some of the chapters repeating each letter one or more times. The last chapter of Proverbs also has the initial letters of its last twenty-two verses in alphabetical order. See Poetry.

The term Acra is used in ecclesiastical history to describe a certain mode of performing the psalmsody of the ancient Church. A single person, called the precentor, commenced the verse, and the people joined with him at the close. We find also the words ἀγιώτατα and ἀγιώτατα, likewise ἀγίωτατον and ἀγίωτατον, almost synonymous with acrostic, used to describe such practices. They do not always mean the end of a verse, but sometimes what was added at the end of a psalm, or something repeated in the middle of it, e. g. the phrase "for his mercy endureth forever," repeated or chanted by the congregation. The Gloria Patri is by some writers called the epode or acroetie, because it was always sung at the end of the psalms (Bingham, Orig. Ecc. i, xiv).

Acta Martyrum (Acts of the Martyrs), the title of the record of the lives and actions of martyrs kept in the churches for the edification of the faithful. Whenever a Christian was apprehended, the accusation, defence, and verdict were noted in these Acts. Some of the martyrs also wrote accounts of their own sufferings, or this was done for them by a regular officer of the Church acting as notary, who took down the facts in a proleptic form; and these were reports also full. In the Latin Church we have the 14 hymns of Trudenus (q. v.), entitled Psalterium et Bibliorum Collectio, a collection of the psalms designated as acta martyri or martyrium, Comp. Calendaria; Martyrologia; Memoria; Menologium. The oldest are those referring to the death of St. Ignatius (q. v.), Bishop of Antioch (died 107), and of Polyarpus (q. v.) (died about 165), both of which are given in the 9th and 10th centuries. See also Hefele's editions of the Pater Apostolic. The oldest collection of Acts of the Martyrs was compiled by the Church historian Eusebius, in his two works de Martyribus Palestinae and Synagoge Martyrium. The latter, a martyrology of the Church universal, was lost as early as the end of the sixth century; the former has reached us as an appendix to his Methophelion book of the Chronicon pontificum. A second large collection of 12 volumes was in existence at Constantinople in the ninth century, and probably formed the basis of the work of Simeon Metaphrastes, de Actis Sanctorum, in the tenth century.

In the Latin Church a catalogue of martyrs, containing the names of martyrs from different countries arranged according to the days on which they were commemorated in the mass, as also the place and the day, but not the details, of their martyrdom, was, at the close of the sixth century, in extensive use. It was, though without good reason, ascribed to Jerome. The particular churches used to add to this general catalogue of martyrs their local calendar, and sometimes an epitome of the life which explains the diversity of the different copies of this work still extant (ed. by Fr. Mar. Florentinius, Lucem, 1668 sq.; d'Achery, Spicileg. ed. Nor. ii, p. 27, according to a manuscript of the French convent Gellou, written about 804) J. B. Sellarius, Act. Sanctorum, June 24, 1896 (copied from a manuscript in the Ulrici's at Augsburg, Corvey, etc.). While this work excludes all historical accounts of the lives of martyrs, giving only their names and the place and day of their martyrdom, there are indications that detailed historical works were also compiled at an early period. A council at Carthage 897 permitted the reading of the Passiones Martyrum on the days of their commemorations, besides the reading-lessons from the Scriptures. Pope Gelasius, on the contrary, excludes this kind of literature from ecclesiastical use, on the ground that the names of the authors were unknown, and that infidels, heretics, and unlearned persons (idiotae) had inserted many superfluous and improper things, a conclusive proof of the untrustworthy condition in which this literature, even at that early time, was found. The heads of the monastic orders were in general very urgent in recommending to their monks the reading of the Gesta Martyrum, the history of their sufferings. Details in ten cases of works just named, were given as a third class, the so-called Vita Patrum, whose object was more literary than edifying, and some of which belong among the most valuable sources of the early Church history. To this class of works belong the very valuable history of Severin, by his disciple Eugippius, the biographies of Columban, Gallus, etc. Collections of accounts of this kind are extant by Palladius (about 450), in his Historia Lausiacæ (Aenoussis); by Heracles, in his Paradisia, s. de Vitæ Patrum; by Johannes Moschus (died about 620), the author of the lives of the monks, under the title Αιώνιον, Αιώνιον, or Νεόν Παρακάτους. These works are in the Greek Church in the Greek Church under the name of Γενικαί, Κυνοκλαίοι, Ασιανοί, and Παρακάτους. They were followed by Simeon Metaphrastes (q. v.), about 901, of whose biographies of saints we have 122 left, while a much larger number have been erroneously ascribed to him. In the Latin Church we have the 14 hymns of Trudenus (q. v.), entitled Psalterium et Bibliorum Collectio, a translation of the Collationes Patrum, by Cassian (q. v.); and several historical works of Gregory of Tours (q. v.), as de Miraculis, Vita Patrum, de Gloria Martyrum. The biographical material contained in this class of works was gradually worked into the martyrologies. That is known, however, also to be derived from the same class of works, and often to be independent of other historical works, and to be derived from sources inaccessible to statistical statements; yet a copy of it at the beginning of the ninth century received considerable additions from Florus, a sub-deacon at Lyons. Considered.
See Paul. The identity of the writer of both books is strongly shown by their great similarity in style and idiom, and the usage of particular words and compound forms. (See Tholuck, in the Stud. u. Act. 1839, iii; Klosemann, Vindicatio Lucanae, Gott. 1866.) The only parties in primitive times by whom this book was rejected were certain heretics, such as the Marcionites, the Severians, and the Manicheans, whose objections were entirely of a dogmatical, not of a historical nature (so those of Baur and his school).

At the same time we find Chrysostom complaining that by many in his day it was not so much as known (Hom. i, in Act. s. init.). Perhaps, however, there is some rhetorical exaggeration in this statement; or it may be, as Kuinöel (Proleg. in Acta App. Comment. iv. 5) suggests, that Chrysostom's complaint refers rather to the fact that his book in which his criticism of the books publicly read in the churches (see Salmerson, De libris Actorum auctoriis, in his Opera, vol. xii.)

II. Source of Materials. The writer is for the first time introduced into the narrative in ch. xvi, 11, where he speaks of accompanying Paul to Philippi. He then disappears from the narrative until Paul's return to Philippi, more than two years later, when he is stated that they left that place in company (xx. 6), from which it may be justly inferred that Luke spent the interval in that town. From this time to the close of the period embraced by his narrative he appears as the companion of the apostle. For the materials, therefore, of all he has recorded from ch. xvi, 11, to the close of the narrative, the historian has been, so to say, having drawn upon his own recollection of that of the apostle.

To the latter source also may be confidently traced all he has recorded concerning the earlier events of the apostle's career; and as respects the circumstances recorded in the first twelve chapters of the Acts, and which relate chiefly to the Church at Jerusalem and the apostle Peter, we readily suppose that they were so much matter of general notoriety among the Christians with whom Luke associated, that he needed no assistance from any other merely human source in recording them. Some of the German critics (see Zeller, Die Apostelgesch. nach ihrem Inhalt u. Ursprung kritisch untersucht, Stuttgart, 1854) have labored hard to show that he must have had recourse to written documents, in order to compose those parts of his history which record what did not pass under his own observation, and they have gone the length of supposing the existence of a work in the language of Palestine, under the title of "Acts of Cephas" or his "Preaching" (Nep. xxv. 21-27 or 29-59), of which the apocryphal book of the same title (Παράκλητος Πέτρου or Οἰκογενεία Πέτρος), mentioned by Comenius of Alex- andria (Strom. vii. p. 736) and Origen (Comment. in Joh. p. 298), was an interpolated edition (Heinrichs, Proleg. in Acta App. p. 21; Kuinöel, Proleg. p. 5).

All this, however, is mere ungrounded supposition; and such Hebrew editions, if they at all existed, must have been versions from the Greek (Rieland, Patr. p. 1038). See Peter.

III. Design. A prevalent opinion is that, Luke, having in his Gospel given a history of the life of Christ, intended to follow that up by giving in the Acts a narrative of the establishment and early progress of his religion in the world. That this, however, could not have been his design, is obvious from the very passage of the Gospel which his narrative gives of the state of things in the Church generally during the period through which it extends. As little can we regard this book as designed to record the official history of the Apostles Peter and Paul, for we find many particulars concerning both these apostles mentioned in connection with their preaching, of which Luke takes no notice (comp. 2 Cor. xi.; Gal. i. 27; ii. 11; 1 Pet. v. 18. See also Michaels, Introduction, iii, 328; Hanlein's Ein- leitung, iii, 150.). Heinrichs, Kuinöel, and others are of opinion that no particular design should be ascribed to the evangelist in composing this book beyond that of furnishing his friend Theophilus with a pleasing and instructive history of the events that had come under his own personal notice, either immediately through the testimony of his senses or through the medium of the reports of others; but such a view savors too much of the lax opinions which these writers unhappily entertained regarding the sacred writers to be adopted by us, who regard all the sacred books as designed for the permanent instruction of the Church universal. Much more deserving of notice is the opinion of Hanlein, with which that of Michaelis substantially accords, that "the general design of the author of this book was, by means of his narratives, to set forth the co-operation of God in the diffusion of Christianity, and along with that, the visible, by remarkable facts, the divinity of the apostles and the perfectly equal right of the Gentiles with the Jews to a participation in the blessings of that religion" (Einleitung, iii, 116. Comp. Michaelis, Introduction, iii, 430.). Perhaps we should come still closer to the truth if we think that the design of Luke in writing the Acts was to supply, by a new and suitable instance, an illustration of the power and working of that religion which Jesus had died to establish. In his Gospel he had presented to his readers an exhibition of Christianity as embodied in the person, character, and works of its great founder; and having followed that design in his narrative until Jesus was out of the sight of his disciples into heaven, this second work was written to show how his religion operated when committed to the hands of those by whom it was to be announced "to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke xxiv. 47). Hence, as justly stated by Baumgarten, in his work on the Acts, Jesus, as the already exalted king of Zion, appears, on all suitable occasions, as the ruler and judge of supreme resort; the apostles are but his representatives and instruments of working. It is he who appoints the twelfth witness, that takes the place of the fallen apostle (chap. i. 24); he who, having received the promise from the Father, sends down the Holy Spirit with power (chap. ii. 33); he who comes near to turn the people from their iniquities and add them to the membership of his Church (chap. ii. 47; iii. 26); he who works miracles from time to time by the hand of the apostles; who sends Peter to open the door of faith to the Gentiles; who instructs Philip as to the Ethiopian; who arrests Saul in his career of persecution, and makes him a chosen vessel to the Gentiles; in short, who continually appears, presiding over the affairs of his Church, directing his servants in their course, protecting them from the hands of their enemies, and in the midst of much that was adverse, still giving effect to their ministrations, and causing the truth of the gospel to grow and bear fruit. We have therefore in this book, not merely a narrative of facts which fell out at the beginning of the Christian Church, in connection more especially with the apostolicscene of Peter and Paul, but we have, first of all and last, the present, contemporaneous, narrative agency of the Lord Jesus Christ himself, shedding forth the powers of his risen life, and giving shape and form to his spiritual and everlasting kingdom.

IV. Time and Place of Writing. These are still more uncertain. As the history is continued up to the close of Acts, it would be necessary for Luke to have written it before A.D. 60; it was probably, however, composed very soon after, so that we shall not err far if we assign the close of the year 88 as the period of its completion. Still greater uncertainty hangs over the place where Luke composed his work; so that he accompanied Paul to Rome, perhaps it was at that city as at Tarsus, but the suspicion of some, that it was prepared. Had any considerable alteration in Paul's circumstances taken place before the publication tion, there can be no reason why it should not have been noticed. And on other accounts also this time was by far the most likely for the publication of the book. The arrival in Rome was an important period in the apostle's life; the quiet which succeeded it seemed to promise no immediate determination of his case.

VI. Synopsis.—This like that of Luke's Gospel, is much parer than that of most other books of the New Testament. The Hebraisms which occasionally occur are almost exclusively to be found in the speeches of others which he has reported. Those speeches are indeed, for the most part, to be regarded rather as summarised from the reports of what the speaker uttered; but as these summaries are given in the speaker's own words, the appearance of Hebraisms in them is as easily accounted for as if the addresses were reported in full. His mode of narrating events is clear, dignified, and lively; and, as Michaelis observes, he "has well supported the character of each person whom he has introduced as delivering a public harangue, and has very faithfully and happily preserved the manner of speaking which was peculiar to each of his orators" (introduction, iii, 332). See Luke.

VI. Contents.—Commencing with a reference to an account given in a former work of the sayings and doings of Christ before his Passion, its author proceeds to acquaint us successively with the circumstances attending that event, the conduct of the disciples on their return from witnessing it, the outpouring on them of the Holy Spirit according to Christ's promise to them before his crucifixion, and the amazing success which, as a consequence of this, attended the first announcement by them of the doctrine concerning Jesus as the promised Messiah and the Saviour of the world. After following the fates of the mother-church at Jerusalem up to the period when the violent persecution of its members by the rulers of the Jews had broken up their society and scattered them, with the exception of the apostles, throughout the whole of the surrounding region, and after introducing to the notice of the reader the case of a remarkable conversion of one of the most zealous persecutors of the Church, who afterward became one of its most devoted and successful advocates, the narrative takes a wider scope and leads us to view the gradual expansion of the Church by the free admission within its pale of persons directly converted from heathenism, and who had not passed through the preliminary stage of Judaism. The first step toward this more liberal and cosmopolitan order of things having been effected by Peter, to bring the honor of founding the foundation of the Christian Church, both within and without the confines of Judaism, seems, in accordance with our Lord's declaration concerning him (Matt. xvi, 18), to have been reserved, Paul, the recent convert and the destined apostle of the Gentiles, is brought forward as the main actor on the scene. On his course of missionary activity, his successes and his sufferings, the chief interest of the narrative is therefromforward concentrated, until, having followed him to Rome, whether he had been sent as a priest to abide his trial, on his own appeal, at the bar of the emperor himself, the book abruptly closes, leaving us to gather further information from the subsequent history of the Church from other sources.—Kittel, s. v. See Paul.

VII. History.—While, as Lardner and others have very satisfactorily shown (Lardner's Credibility, Works, i, Bisson, On the Acts; Paley's Horse Paulines; Benson's History of the First Planting of Christianity, i, etc.), the credibility of the events recorded by Luke is fully authenticated both by internal and external evidence, very great obscurity attaches to the chronology of these events (see Davidson's Introduction to the N. T., ii, 34; Alford's Greek Test., ii, Proleg., p. 23 sq.; Meyer, Comment., 5d ed. pt. iii, s. fn.). The following is probably the true order of events in the Acts (see Meth. Quat. Rev., 1856, p. 409 sq.). For further discussion, see Burton, Attempt to ascertain the Chronology of the Acts (London 1830); Anger, De temporum in Acta Apostolorum ratione (Lips. 1834); Grosset, Dissert. ii, 1, etc.; Wortzworth, Greek Test. pt. 2; Wieseler, Chron. d. ap. Zeit (Gott. 1848).
(3.) There is a saying ascribed to Christ in the Epistle of Barnabas, a work at least of the second century: “Let us resist all iniquity, and hate it”; and again, “So they who would see me, and lay hold on my kingdom, must receive me through much suffering and tribulation”; but it is not improbable that these passages contain merely an allusion to some of our Lord’s sayings.

(3.) Clemens Romanus, the third bishop of Rome after St. Peter (or the writer who passes under the name of Clement), in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, ascribes the following saying to Christ: “Though ye should be united to me in my bosom, and ye should wear the muslin, I will reject you and say, Depart from me, I know not whence ye are, ye workers of iniquity.” This passage seems evidently to be taken from Luke’s gospel, xiii, 25, 26, 27.

There are many similar passages which several eminent writers, such as Grabe, Mill, and Fabricius, have considered as derived from apocryphal gospels, but which seem, with greater probability, to be nothing more than loose quotations from the Scriptures, which were very common among the apostolic Fathers.

There is a saying of Christ’s, cited by Clement in the same epistle, which is found in the apocryphal Gospel of the Egyptians: “The Lord, being asked what his kingdom should concern, replied, ‘What toucheth any of these things do I know not, except it wittieth and the male with the female neither male nor female.’” See Gospels (SPURIOUS).

We may here mention that the genuineness of the Second Epistle of Clement is itself disputed, and is rejected by Eusebius, Jerome, and others; at least Eusebius says of it: “We know not that this is as highly approved of as the former, or that it has been in use with the ancients” (Hist. Eccles. iii, 38, Cruse’s tr. 1842). See Clement.

(4.) Eusebius, in the last chapter of the book just cited, states that Papias, a companion of the apostles, “gives another history of a woman who had been as- sociated with many sins before the Lord, which is also contained in the Gospel according to the Nazarenes.” As this latter work is lost, it is doubtful to what woman the history refers. Some suppose it alludes to the history of the woman taken in adultery; others, to the woman of Samaria. There are two discourses ascribed to Christ preserved in the St. John of Antioch (Herer, v. 35), relating to the doctrine of the Millennium, of which Papias appears to have been the first propagator. Dr. Cave has defended the truth of these traditions, but the discourses themselves are unworthy of our blessed Lord.

(5.) There is a saying ascribed to Christ by Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, which has been supposed by Dr. Cave to have been taken from the Gospel of the Nazarenes. Mr. Jones conceives it to have been an allusion to a passage in the prophet Ezekiel. The same father fuses us with an apocryphal history of Christ’s baptism, in which it is asserted “a five days” (or ten days) after the baptism we acquaint us that Christ worked, when he was on earth, at the trade of a carpenter, making ploughs and yokes for oxen.

(6.) There are some apocryphal sayings of Christ, preserved by Irenæus, but his most remarkable obser- vation is on the picture of him that he was as “forty or even fifteen years.” This he finds partly on absurd inferences drawn from the character of his mission, partly on John vii, 55, and also on what he alleges to have been John’s own testimony delivered to the presbyters of Asia. It is scarcely necessary to refute this false notion, which is in contradiction with all the statements in the gospels. Papias is also an absurd saying attributed to Christ by Athanasius (Legat. pro Christianis, cap. 28).

One of the most remarkable is, “Be ye skilful money-changers.” This is supposed to have been contained in the Gospel of the Nazarenes. Others think it is an early interpolation into the text of Scripture. Origen and Jerome cite it as a saying of Christ’s.

(8.) In Origen, Contra Celsum, lib. i, is an apocryphal history of our Saviour and his parents, in which it is reproached on Christ that he was born in a poor village, of a poor woman who gained her livelihood by spinning, and was turned off by her husband, a carpenter. Celsus adds that Jesus was obliged by poverty to work as a servant in Egypt, where he learned many powerful arts, and thought that on this account he ought to be despised by God. There was a similar account contained in some apocryphal writers extant in the time of St. Augustine. It was probably a Jewish forgery. Augustine, Epiphanius, and others of the fathers, equally cite sayings and acts of Christ, which they probably met with in the early apocryphal gospels.

(9.) There is a spurious hymn of Christ’s, extant, ascribed to the Priscillanists by St. Augustine. There are also many such acts and sayings to be found in the Koran of Mahomet, and others in the writings of the Mohammedan doctors (see Tolland’s Nazarenes).

(10.) There is a prayer ascribed to our Saviour by the same person, which is printed in Latin and Arabic in the learned Dr. Bassani’s Christian Church, a new edit. of Auxiliana, published at Oxford, in 1600, by Dr. Pococke. It contains a petition for pardon of sin, such as is sufficient to stamp it as a forgery.

(11.) There is a curious letter said to have been written to our Saviour by Agbarus (or Agbarus), king of Edessa, requesting him to come and heal a disease under which he labored. The letter, together with the supposed reply of Christ, are preserved by Eusebius. This learned historian asserts that he obtained the documents, together with the history, from the public registers of the city of Edessa, where they existed in his time in the Syriac language, from which he translated them into Greek. See Abaras.

The letter is also mentioned by Ephraem Syrus, deacon of Edessa, at the close of the fourth century. Jerome refers to them in his comment on Matt. x, and they are mentioned by Pope Gelasius, who rejects them as spurious and apocryphal. They are, however, referred to as genuine by Evagrius and later historians. Among the documents written in the Syriac, of these letters has been maintained by Dr. Parker (in the preface to his Demonstrations of the Law of Nature and the Christian Religion, part ii, § 16, p. 235); by Dr. Cave (in his Historia Literaria, vol. i, p. 23); and by Grabe (in his Speculum Patrum, particularly p. 819).

On the other hand, most writers, including the great majority of Roman Catholic divines, reject them as spurious. Mr. Jones, in his valuable work on the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, although he does not venture to deny that the Acts were contained in the public registers of the city of Edessa, yet gives it, as a probable conjecture, in favor of which he advances some strong objections, drawn from internal evidence, that this whole chapter (viz. the 18th of the first book) in the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius is itself an interpolation. See Epistles (SPURIOUS).

(32.) The other apocryphal history related by Evagrius, of Oropsocipus, states that Agbarus sent a picture of his picture of Christ to him, as he was not being able to do it by reason of the brightness of Christ’s countenance; our “Saviour took a cloth, and laying it upon his divine and life-giving face, he impressed his likeness on it.” This story of Christ’s picture is related by several, in the Second Council of Nica, and by other ancient writers, one of whom (Leo) asserts that Edessa had four of these images of Christ, not made with hands, worshipped by the people. This is the first of the four likenesses of Christ mentioned by ancient writers. The second is that said to have been stamped on a handkerchief by Christ, and given to Veronica, who had followed him to his crucifixion. The third is the statue of Christ, stated by Eusebius to have been erected by the woman whom he had cured of an issue of blood, and which the learned historian acquaints us he saw at Cesarea Philippi (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii, 16).

Sozomen asserts that an image of the emperor Julian took down this statue and erected his own in its place. It is, however, stated by Asterius, a writer of the fourth century, that it was taken away by Maximinus, the predecessor of Constantine. The fourth picture is one which Nicodemus presented to Gamaliel, which was preserved at Berytus, and which having been taken away by the Pisans, there issued out from the side blood and water. This is stated in a spurious treatise concerning the passion and image of Christ, falsely ascribed to Athanasius. Eusebius, the historian, asserts (I. c.) that he had here seen the pictures of Peter, Paul, and of Christ himself; in his time (see also Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. v, 21).

That such relics were actually exhibited is therefore indubitable, but their genuineness is quite another question. They were probably of a piece with the papal miracles and pious frauds of superstitions times.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, SPURIOUS. Of these several copies others are lost, or only fragments of them have come down to us. Of the following we know little more than that they once existed. They are here arranged chronologically:—(1.) The Preaching of Peter, referred to by Origen (in his Commentary on St. John's Gospel, lib. xiv), also referred to by Clemens Alexsandrinus. (2.) The Acts of Peter, supposed by Dr. Cave to be cited by Serapion. (3.) The Acts of Paul and Thecla, mentioned by Tertullian (Lib. de Baptismo, cap. xvii). This is, however, supposed by some to be the same which is found in a Greek MS. in the Bodleian Library, and has been published by Dr. Graebe (in his Specul. Patrum Socul. 1.). (4.) The Doctrine of Peter, cited by Origen ("Procem. in Lib. de Principi."). (5.) The Acts of Paul (id. de Principi, i, 2). (6.) The Preaching of Peter, referred to by St. Cyrilian (Tract. de Non Iterando Baptismo). (7.) The Preaching of Peter and Peter at Rome, cited by Lactantius (De vera Sup. iv, 21). (8.) The Acts of Peter, which refer to the events of Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii, 5): "as to that work, however, which is ascribed to him, called the 'Acts' and the 'Gospel according to Peter,' we know nothing of their being handed down as Catholic writings, since neither among the ancient nor the ecclesiastical writers of our own day has there been one that has testified to their having been known to him." (9.) The Acts of Paul (ib.). (10.) The Revelation of Peter (ib.). (11.) The Acts of Andrew and John (ib. cap. 25). "Thus," he says, "we have it in our power to know . . . those books that are adduced by the heretics, under the name of the apostles, such, viz., as compose the gospels of Peter, Thomas, and Matthew, . . . and such as contain the Acts of the Apostles by Andrew and John, and others of which no one of those writers in the ecclesiastical succession has condescended to make any mention in his works; and, indeed, the character of the style itself is very different from that of the apostles, and the sentiments and the purport of these books comprising as it were the subjacent as far as possible from sound orthodoxy, evidently proves they are the fictions of heretical men, whence they are to be ranked not only among the spurious writings, but are to be rejected as altogether absurd and impious." (12.) The Acts of Peter, John, and Thomas (Athanasius, Apologia v, 138). (13.) The Things of the Barbarous the Apostle, mentioned by the pseudo-Dionysius. (14.) The Acts, Preaching, and Revelation of Peter, cited by Jerome (in his Catal. Script. Eccles.). (15.) The Acts of the Apostles by Seleucus (ib. Epist. ad Chrom., etc.). (16.) The Acts of Paul and Thecla (ib. Liber. Script. Eccles.). (17.) The Acts of the Apostles, used by the Ebionites, cited by Epiphanius (Adven- suae Hieros. § 16). (18.) The Acts of Leucius, Leucius, or Leucius, called the Acts of the Apostles (Augustin. Lib. de Fid. c. 88). (19.) The Acts of the Apostles, used by the Manichees. (20.) The Revelations of Thomas, Paul, Stephen, etc. (Gelasii, de Lib. Apost. opus Graeco). (21.) The Apostles' Creed.

To these may be added the genuine Acts of Pilate, appealed to by Tertullian and Justin Martyr, in their Apologies, as being then extant. Tertullian describes them as "the records which were transmitted from Jerusalem to Tiberius concerning Christ." He refers to the same for the proof of our Saviour's miracles.

—Kito, s. v. See Apostles.

The following are the principal spurious Acts still extant:—(1.) The Acts of Paul and Thecla, said to have been written by a disciple of St. Paul, and who (according to Tertullian, De Bap. cap. xvii, and Jerome, De Scrip. cap. vii), when convicted by John the Evangelist of having falsified facts, confessed that he had done so, but through his love for his master Paul. These Acts were rejected as uncanonical by Pope Gelasius. They were printed, together with some that follow, at London (in English) in 1821, 8vo, under the title "Apocryphal New Testament," (see Fabricius, Cod. i, 704). (2.) Acts of Peter. Twelve Apostles, falsely attributed to Aquilas of Babylon. See Abdias. These Acts are said to have been written by him in Hebrew, translated into Greek by Euphranius, and into Latin by Julius Africanus, and were published by Lazius, at Basle, in 1551 (Fabric. ii, 386). It is a work full of the most extravagant fables, and bears internal evidence of having been written after the second century. (3.) Acts of St. Peter, or, as the work is sometimes designated, "Recognitiones abri 10, attributed falsely to Clemens Romanus. (4.) The Acts or Voyages (Periodi) of St. John, mentioned by Ephranius and Augustine, is probably that which we now have as the Acts of St. John among those attributed to Abdias.

There exist also the following (for which see each name in its place):—The Creed of the Apostles; The Epistles of Barnabas, Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp; The Shepherd of Hermas; The Acts of Pilate (spurious), etc. See Canon of the Acts of the Apostles; The Canon of the Acts of the Apostles; The Canon of the Apostles; The Literature of the Apostles; St. Paul's Epistle to the Laodiceans; St. Paul's Letters to Senecu.

Besides these there are some others still more obscure, for which see Cotelerius's Ecclesiarum Grece Monuments (Paris, 1677-82); Fabricius, Codex Apocryphonum, N. T. (Lips., 1803); History of the Canon of the New Testament (London, 1859); Grabbe's Speculium Patrum (Ox- ford, 1714); Lardner's Credibility, etc.; Jones's New and Just Method of setting the Canonical Authority of the New Testament; Birch's Auctarium (Hafniæ, 1804); Thilo's Acta St. Thomas (Lips. 1823), and Codex Apocryphonatus, N. T. (Lips., 1829). Tischendorf has published the original Greek of the following apocryphal Acts (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Lips. 1841, 8vo), several of which had not before been edited: "Acts of Peter and Paul;" "Acts of Paul and Thecla;" "Acts of Barnabas, by Mark;"" Acts of Philip;" (ed. princeps); "Acts of Andrew;" "Acts of Andrew and Matthew;" "Acts of martyrdom of Matthew" (ed. princeps); "Acts of Thomas;" "Consummation of Thomas" (ed. princeps); "Acts of Bartholomew" (ed. princeps); "Acts of Thaddeus" (ed. princeps); "Acts of John" (ed. princeps). See CANON.

Acts of Pilate. The ancient Romans were scrupu- lously careful to preserve the memory of all remarkable events, which had happened in the city, and this was done either in their "Acts of the Senate" (Acta Senatorum), or in the "Daily Acts of the People" (Acta Diurna Populi), which were diligently made and kept at Rome (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Acta Diurna). In like manner it was customary for the governors of provinces to send to the emperor an account of remarkable transactions that occurred in the places where they resided, which were preserved as the Acts of their respective governments. Indeed, this would naturally occur in the transmission of their returns of administration (rationes), a copy of which was also preserved in the provincial archives (Cicero, ad Fam. iii. 17; v. 20). In conformity with this usage, Eusebius says, "Our Saviour's resurrection being much talked of throughout Palestine, Pilate informed the emperor of it, as likewise of his miracles, of which he had heard; and that, being raised up after he had been put to death, he was already believed by many to be a god" (Eccles. Hist. lib. ii. 32). These accounts were never published for general perusal, but were deposited among the archives of the empire, where they served as a fund of information to historians. Hence we find, long before the time of Eusebius, that the primitive Christians, in their disputes with the Gentiles, appealed to these Acts of Pilate as to most undoubted testimony. Thus, Justin Martyr, in his first Apology for the Christians, which was presented to the Emperor Antoninus Pius and the senate of Rome, about the year 140, having mentioned the crucifixion of Jesus Christ and some of its attendant circumstances, adds, "And that these things were done, you may know from the Acts of Pilate in the time of our Lord." Afterward, in the same Apology, having noticed some of our Lord's miracles, such as healing diseases and raising the dead, he says, "And that these things were done by him you may know from the Acts made in the time of Pontius Pilate" (Justin Martyr, Apol. i. p. 55, 72, ed. Benedict). Tertullian, in his Apology for Christianity, about the year 200, after speaking of our Saviour's crucifixion and resurrection, and his appearance to the disciples and ascension into heaven in the sight of the same disciples, who were ordained by him to publish the Gospel over the world, thus proceeds: "Of all these things relating to Christ, Pilate himself, in his conscience already a Christian, sent on account to Tiberias, then emperor" (Tertull. Apolog. c. 21). The same writer, in the same treatise, thus relates the proceedings of Tiberius on receiving this information: "There was an ancient decree that no one should be preserved for a day unless he was first approved by the senate. Tiberius, in whose time this religion had its rise, having received from Palestine in Syria an account of such things as manifested the truth of his" (Christ's) "divinity, proposed to the senate that he should be enrolled among the Roman gods, and gave his own prerogative vote in favor of the motion. But the senate rejected it, because the emperor himself had declined the same honor. Nevertheless, the emperor persisted in his opinion, and threatened punishment to the accusers of the Christians. Search your own Commentaries, or public writings; you will there find that Nero was the first who outraged with the imperial sword against this sect, when rising most at Rome" (Tertull. Apol. c. 6). These testimonies of Justin and Tertullian are taken from public apologies for the Christian religion, which were presented either to the emperor and senate of Rome, or to magistrates of public authority and great distinction in the Roman empire. See PILATE.

Açu (rather Acæd, Acothiò by erroneous transcription for Acothirh), Acæb, 1 Esdr. v. 51, the progenitor of the families of the slave-servants (παραπαράθηκοι, i.e. Nethinim), said to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v. 30); evidently the Askor (t. v.) of the parallel texts (Exx. ii. 45, or; rather, ver. 42; comp. Neh. vii. 48, where the name is not fixed).

Acothirh (rather Acothi, Acothirh v. r. Acothirh, Acem; Heb. corrections for Baisboe; another head of the Nethinim that returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v. 81), evidently the Baxbok (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Exx. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 52).

Acæth. See ACHIRH.

Ad, according to Arabian traditions, was the son of Udh, or Us (the grandson of Shen, Gen. x. 23), and the progenitor of a powerful tribe called the Adites, which settled in Er-Rami, or Sandy Arabia (Abulfeida, Hist. Antiquam. p. 17, ed. Fleischer). Like the other kindred tribes of those early times, the Adites soon abandoned the true worship of God, and set up four idols whom they worshipped: Sekkh, whom they imagined to supply rain; Ihsdhar, who preserved them from all foreign and external dangers; Rasa, who provided them with food; and Salema, who restored them from sickness to health (Sale's Koran, p. 122, note). It is said that God commissioned the prophet Hud or Heber to attempt their reformation, but, remaining obstinate in their idolatry, they were almost all destroyed by a suffocating wind. The few who escaped retired with the prophet Hud to another place. Before this severe punishment they had been visited with a dreadful drought for four years, which killed their cattle, and reduced them to great distress (see D'Herbelot, Bibl. Or. s. v. Houd). They are often mentioned in the Koran, and some writers, on the authority of that work, affirm that they were of gigantic stature. See ARAKIA.

Adad, the Græcized form of the name of the idol Hadad (Josephus, Antiq. viii. 5, 2); also a less correct form of the name of King Hadad (1 Kings xi. 17, original). See HIADAD.

Ada'adah (Heb. Adadah, 'adadah, from the Syr., festrat, or perhaps, by reduplication, boundary; Sept. 'Ača'ē, v. r. 'Apawq, a town in the southern part of the tribe of Judah, mentioned between Dimonah and Kadesh (Josh. xv. 22); probably situated in the portion afterward set off to Simeon (Josh. xix. 1-9). It is possibly the village Gadda mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Gadda), being on the western border of Daroms, opposite the Dead Sea. But see GADDIAH. M. de Saulcy believes that he passed some ruins by this name on his way from the southern end of the Dead Sea to Helbon on the high ground after leaving Wady es-Zoweirah (Narrat. i, 390, 430).

Ada'dah (Heb. Adad, 'adad, ornament; Sept. Αδάδα, the name of two women.

1. The first born of the two wives of the Canaan Lamech, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen. iv. 19, 20, 23). B.C. cire. 3600.

2. The first of the three wives of Esaü, being the daughter of Elion the Hillite, and the mother of Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 4, 10, 12, 16). B.C. 1694. She is elsewhere confounded with Basemath (Gen. xxxvi. 34). See ESAU.

Ada'lah (Heb. Adyak, 'adâlah, adorned by Jehoa ihm, once in the prolonged form Ada'as̱a, 'adâlas̱a, 2 Chron. xxiii. 1), the name of several men.

1. (Sept. 'Ača'ē, v. r. 'Ačal.) The son of Ethni and father of Zerah, of the Levitical family of Gershom, in the ancestry of Asaph (1 Chron. vi. 40); apparently the same with Indo, the son of Joah (ver. 21). B.C. cire. 1580. See ASAPH.

2. (Sept. 'Ača'ē, v. r. 'Ačal.) A son of Shimeh, and chief Benjamite resident at Jerusalem before the captivity (1 Chron. viii. 21), B.C. long post 1612.

3. (Sept. 'Ačal, v. r. 'Ačal.) The father of Masseiah, which latter was a "captain of hundred" during the protectorate of Jehohada (2 Chron. xxiii. 1). B.C. ante 877. He is apparently the same as Juda the son of Joseph and father of Simeon, among Christ's maternal ancestry (Luke iii. 60). See GENEALOGY.

4. (Sept. 'Etis̱î, v. r. 'Etis̱al.) The father of Jedidah and maternal grandfather of King Josiah, a native of Boscath (2 Kings xxiii. 1). B.C. ante 646.

5. (Sept. 'Ačal, v. r. 'Ayeal.) A son of Jariel and ADALBERT

father of Hazalah, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. xi, 5). B.C. considerably ante 536.

6. A priest, son of Jeroham, who held a prominent post in defending the second temple while building (1 Chron. ix, 12. Sept. Αδάνι v. r. Αδάνιa; Neh. xi, 12, Αδάνι). B.C. 516.

"A son of Bani", an Israelite who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (Ezra x, 29), B.C. 459.

7. (Sept. Αδάνατ v. r. Αδάνα.) Another of the "sons" of Bani, who did likewise (Ezra x, 89), B.C. 459.

Adalbert. See ADALBERT.

Adalbert, archbishop of Prague, was born of a princely Slavonic family, about the year 950, at Prague. His parents sent him to Magdeburg to enter upon his studies under the archbishop Adalbert, who gave him his own name at confirmation. Upon his return into Bohemia, touched by the death-bed remorse of Dietmar, bishop of Prague, for not having led a life of greater piety and activity, he at once assumed a penitent life, withdrawing himself and giving great alms. In 983 he was elected bishop of Prague with the unanimous consent of the people. He made great efforts to promote the spiritual welfare of his flock, which was in a fearful state of immorality: among the laity polygamy, and among the clergy incontinence were general. Had he been less impatient, he might have accomplished much more than he did. Finding all his labor in vain, he left his see in 989 by permission of Pope John XV, and retired into the monastery of St. Boniface, at Rome. He was, however, constrained to return to his bishopric, which he again quitted for his monastic retreat; and again was on the point of returning to it, when, finding his people set against him, he finally forsook it, in order to preach the Gospel in Prussia, where he suffered martyrdom, April 23, 997 (after making many converts at Dantzig and in Pomerania), at the hands of seven assassins, whose chief was an idol-priest, and who pierced him with seven lances. Since that period Adalbert has been the patron saint of Poland and Bohemia. For a graphic account of him, see Neander, Light in Dark Places, 272. The Martyrologies commemorate him on the 24th of April.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 322; Butler, Lives of the Saints, April 23.

Adalbert, archbishop of Bremen and Hamburg, was descended from a noble Saxton family. He served as subdeacon to archbishop Hermann for several years, and was ordained priest and later appointed archbishop, from Henry III, whom in 1046 he accompanied to Rome. There he barely failed of election to the papal throne. Pope Leo IX, in whose behalf he had spoken in the synod at Mentz in 1049, made him in 1050 his legate in the North. Adalbert intended, with the support of the Emperor Henry, to consecrate the archdiocese of Bremen into a northern patriarchate, which was to be independent of Rome, and embrace the sees of Northern Germany, of Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and England. Henry III compelled the pope, Clement II (one of the three German popes who were in succession elevated to the papal throne by Henry), to recognize Adalbert as his pope. A bull is still extant in which the pope addressed Adalbert with "Vos," while generally the popes addressed every bishop with "Tu." (hence the principle, Popa neminem vominat.) But this was all ended by a bull of Pope Leo IX, recognizing Adalbert as apostolic vicar, but demanding fees for the consecration of a see. During the minority of the Emperor Henry IV he usurped, together with archbishop Hanno of Cologne, the administration of the empire. His ambition and violence made him so obnoxious to the German princes that, in 1066, they forcibly separated him from the emperor; but in 1069 he regained his former power, and kept it until his death, March 16, 1072.—Adam Bremensis, Gesta Han-

Adalagus, archbishop of Hamburg and Bremen, lived during the reigns of the three emperors Otto (the last of whom died 1002), and enjoyed great influence in the empire. He held the office of bishop of Hamburg after the victory which Otto I gained over the Danes, he established three episcopal sees in Jutland, viz., Sleswick, Ripen, and Arhusen. He baptized Harol, king of Denmark, and sent missionaries among the northern nations.—Moosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. x, p. 4, ch. i, § 7.

Adalar, a Benedictine monk of Corby, and the companion of Rembertus, or Rheinbertus, whom he succeeded, in 888, in the archiepiscopal chair of Hamburg and Bremen. The archbishop of Cologne claimed supremacy over Cologne, and Pope Formosus cited Adalar to appear at Rome to prove his rights to the archbishopric, but he refused both to attend in person and to send a deputy. The investigation was postponed; and came to a conclusion in 906, when Adalar was placed among the lowest bishops. The archbishopric was restored by a bull of Sergius III, A.D. 906. Adalar established a seminary of priests for the propagation of the Gospel in the North, and died May 9, 906, after holding the see for nineteen years.

Adalhard, abbot of Corbie, born about 753, died in 826. He was a son of Count Bernard, and a relative of Charles Martel. He was one of the first to oppose the pretensions of the nobility, and to preach openly that the laws must be equally obeyed by patrons and commoners. Charles the Bald confirmed to him important missions, and appointed him his delegate at the Council of Rome in 808. After the death of this emperor he fell into disfavor, having been represented by the nobility to Louis the Debonar as an ambitious demagogue. He is commemorated as a saint, Jan. 2. Mabillon failed to publish his sermons. His Statuta Corbiniana Ecclesiae was published, but very incorrectly, by d'Achery. Many other writings of Adalar are still scattered and indelible. Some extracts of his Libellus de Ordine Palatii were given by Hinricum. See Radbert, Vita S. Adalardi abbatis Corbiniensis, i. 1617.—Hoefler, Diog. Generale, i, 218.

Adal'li (Heb. Adal' ly, probably of Arabian origin; Sept. Βορία v. r. Βορία, Vulpg. Adaj), the fifth of the ten sons of Haman slain by the Jews under the royal edict at Shushan (Esth. ix, 6), B.C. 475.

Ad'am (Heb. 'Adam', רד"ב red [see EDOM], hence 'adām, the ground, from the ruggedness of flesh and of clayey soil, see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 24, 25; comp. Josephus, Ant. ii, 1; Jonathan's Targum on Gen. ii, 7; Leusden, Onomat. s. v.; Marek, Hist. Paradisi, ii, 5), the name of a man and a place.

1. The first man, whose creation, fall, and history are detailed by Moses in Gen. ii-v, being in fact the same Hebrew word usually rendered "man" (including woman also, Gen. v, 1, 2), but often used distinctively with the article (ה'Adam, 'ha-Adam", "the man," Sept. and N.T. 'A'dāy, Josephus 'Adayoc, Ant. i, 1, 2), as a proper name (comp. Tobit viii, 5). It seems at first thought somewhat strange that the head of the human family should have received his distinctive name from the affinity which he had, in the lower part of his nature, to the animal kingdom. In that he had been called Adam, as being taken in his bodily part from adamáh, the ground; the more especially as the name was not assumed by man himself, but imposed by God, and imposed in immediate connection with man's destination to bear the image of God: "And God said, Let us make man (Adam) in our image, after our likeness," etc. This apparent incon-

Grufy has led some, in particular Richers (Die Schöpfungs-, Paradies- und Stadtfurchtercirc, p. 183), to adopt another etymological view—namely, to make Adam a derivative of dammoch (ὑπάρχω, to be, like, to resemble). Delitzsch, however (System der Bibl. Psychologie, p. 49), has objected to this view, both on grammatical and other grounds; and though we do not see the force of his grammatical objection to the derivation in question, yet we think he puts the matter itself rightly, and thereby justifies the received opinion. Man's name is kindled with that of the earth, adamoc, not because of its being his characteristic dignity that God made him after his image, but because of this, that God made after his image one who had been taken from the earth. The likeness to God man has in common with the angels, but that, as the possessor of this likeness, he should be Adam—this is what brought him into union with two worlds—the world of spirit and the world of matter—rendered him the centre and the bond of all that had been made, the fitting toposome of the world in general, and the principle of the world's history. It is precisely his having the image of God in an earthen vessel, that, while made somewhat less than the angels, he occupies a higher position than they in respect to the affairs of this world (Psa. viii. 5; Heb. ii. 5).

1. History.—In the first nine chapters of Genesis there are three distinct histories relating more or less to the life of Adam. The first extends from Gen. i. 2 to Gen. iii. 25, the second from Gen. iv. 2 to Gen. vi. 8, and the third from Gen. vi. 9 to Gen. vii. 10. The word (גנבים וּרְאוֹם) at the commencement of the latter two narratives, which is rendered there and elsewhere generations, may also be rendered history. The style of the second of these records differs very considerably from that of the first. In the first the Deity is designated by the name Elohim; in the second, Elohim, which is usually spoken of as Jehovah Elohim. The object of the first of these narratives is to record the creation; that of the second to give an account of paradise, the original sin of man, and the immediate postery of Adam; the third contains mainly the history of Noah, referring, it would seem, to Adam. and the descendants, predominantly in relation to that patriarch. The mutual influence of the creation of man is in general terms, the two sexes being spoken of together (ch. i. 27) as a unit of species; whereas in the second, or resumptive account, the separate formation of the man and the woman is detailed. This simple consideration reconciles all apparent contradictions between the two narratives. Smith, t. v. See Genesis.

The representation given there is that Adam was absolutely the first man, and was created by the direct agency of God; that this act of creation, including the immediately subsequent creation of Eve, was the last in a series of creative acts which extended through a period of six literal days. See Creation. This Scriptural account is, of course, entirely opposed to the atheistic hypothesis, which denies any definite beginning to the human race, but conceives the successive generations of men to have run on in a kind of infinite series, to which no beginning can be assigned. Such a theory, originally propounded by heathen philosophers, has also been asserted by the most extreme section of infidel writers in Christian times. But the voice of tradition, which, in all the more ancient nations, uniformly points to a comparatively recent period for the origin of the human family, has now received conclusive attestations from learned research and scientific inquiry. Not only have the remains of human art and civilization, the more they have been explored, yielded more convincing evidence of a period not very remote when the human family itself was in infancy, but the languages of the world also, when carefully investigated and compared, as they have of late been, point to a common and not exceeding ly remote origin. This is the view of Sir William Jones, and, later, of Bunsen also. The same conclusion substantially is reached by Dr. Donaldson, who, after stating what has already been accomplished in this department of learning, expresses his conviction, on the ground alone of the affinities of language, that "investigation is fully confirmed in what we are told by the prophetic oracles that God had made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (New Crusifix, p. 19). The position is still further confirmed by the results that have been gained in the region of natural science. The most skillful and accomplished naturalists—such as Blumenbach, Pritchard—have established beyond any reasonable doubt the unity of the human family as a species (see particularly Pritchard's History of Man); and those who have prosecuted geological researches, while they have found remains in the different strata of rocks of numberless species of inferior animals, can point to no human petrifications—no human vestiges, that is, but what appear in some comparatively recent and local formations—a proof that man is of too late an origin for his remains to have mingled with those of the exact animal tribes of preceding ages. Science generally can tell of no separate creations for animals of one and the same species, and while the animal history is full of the beginnings and the ends of species, "it exhibits no genealogies of development" (Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, p. 201). That, when created, man must have been formed in full maturity, as Adam is related to have been, was a necessity arising from the very conditions of existence. It has been discovered, by searching into the remains of preceding ages and generations of living creatures, that there has been a manifest progress in the succession of beings on the surface of the earth—a progress in the direction of an increasing resemblance to the existing forms of beings, and in particular to mankind. The contrast between the earlier and the later, the imperfect and the perfect, is not that of direct lineage or parentage, but as if it came in the way merely of natural growth and development. The connection, as Agassiz has said in his Principles of Zoology, "is of a higher and immortal nature; it is to be sought in the view of the Creator in relation to the form of the earth, in allowing it to undergo the successive changes which geology has pointed out, and in creating successively all the different types of animals which have passed away, was to introduce man upon the surface of our globe. Man is the last toward which the natural history has tended from the apes and monkeys of the paleozoic fishes."—Fairbairn, s. v. See Geology.

The Almighty formed Adam out of the dust of the earth, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and gave him dominion over all the lower creatures (Gen. i. 26; ii. 7). B.C. 4172. He created him in his own image [see Perfecton], and having pronounced a blessing upon him, placed him in a delightful garden, that he might cultivate it and enjoy its fruits. See Eden. At the same time, however, he gave him the following injunction: "Of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." The first recorded exercise of Adam's power and intelligence was his giving names to the beasts of the field and fowls of the air, which the Lord brought before him for this purpose. The examination thus afforded him having shown that it was not good for man to be alone, the Lord caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and while he remained in his slumber, took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh; and of the rib thus taken from man he made a woman, whom he presented to him when he awoke. See Eve. Adam received her, saying, "This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man." See Marriage.

This woman, being seduced by the tempter, persuaded her husband to eat of the forbidden fruit (comp. Theuer, De Adamo Iapo, dissortum c. Eva cognitac. Jen. 1759). When called to judgment for this transgression before God, Adam blamed his wife, and the woman blamed the serpent-tempter. God punished the tempter by degradation and death [see Serpent?]; the woman blamed the serpent and a sentence of submission; and the man by a life of labor and toil—of which punishment every day witnesses the fulfillment. See FALL. As their natural passions now became irregular, and their exposure to accidents great, God made a covering of skin for Adam and for his wife. He also expelled them from his garden, and placed around it, where it had been made, and where was to be their future dwelling; placing at the east of the garden a flame, which turned every way, to prevent access to the tree of life (Gen. iii).—Calmet, s. v. See DEATH.

It is not known how long Adam and his wife continued in Paradise: some think many years; others not many days; others not many hours. Shortly after their expulsion Eve brought forth Cain (Gen. iv. 1, 2). Scripture notices but three sons of Adam, Cain, Abel, and Seth (q. v.), but contains an allusion (Gen. v. 4) to "sons and daughters!" no doubt several. He died B.C. 3525, aged 380 (see Drucker, Os Adam wink- kekt. 900 J. alt. geworden, Aurch, 1739). See LONGEVITY.

Such is the simple narrative of the Bible relative to the progenitor of the human race, to which it only remains to add that his faith doubtless recognised in the promise of the woman's seed that should "bruise the serpent's head" the amending merits of the future Redeemer. See MESSIAH. Whatever difficulties we may find in the Scriptural account, we accept it as a literal statement of facts, and shall therefore dismiss the rationalistic theories and speculations to which it has given rise. The results are of the utmost importance to mankind, and the light that the Bible thus sheds upon the origin of the race and the source of human depravity is of inestimable value even in a historical and philosophical point of view. II. The question of the unity of the human race, or the descent of the race from a single pair, has given rise to much discussion of late, after it had been thought to be finally settled. It may be stated thus: "Did the Almighty Creator produce only one man and one woman, from whom all other human beings have descended? or did he create several parental pairs, from which all the different races and nations have been derived? The question is usually regarded as equivalent to this: whether or not there is more than one species of men? But we cannot, in strict fairness, admit that the questions are identical. It is hypothetically conceivable that the adorable God might give existence to any number of creatures, which should all possess the properties that characterize identity of species, even without such differences as constitute varieties, or with any degree of those differences. But the admission of the possibility is not a concession of the reality. So great is the evidence in favor of the derivation of the entire mass of human beings from one pair of ascendants, that it has obtained the suffrage of the men most in the interest of the question, a question of comparative anatomy and physiology.

"(1) The animals which render eminent services to man, and peculiarly depend upon his protection, are widely diversified—the horse, the dog, the hog, the domestic fowl. Now of these, the varieties in each species have increased to a degree so great that an observer ignorant of physiological history would scarcely believe them to be of the same species. But man is the most widely diffused of any animal. In the progress of ages and generations, he has natu-realized himself to every climate, and to modes of life which would produce fatal to an individual man suddenly transferred from a remote point of the field. The alterations produced affect every part of the body, internal and external, without extinguishing the marks of the specific identity.

"(2) A further and striking evidence is, that when persons of different varieties are conjugally united, the offspring is usually only in two or three generations becom-comes more prolific, and acquires a higher perfection in physical and mental qualities than was found in either of the parental races. From the deepest African black to the finest Caucasian white, the change runs through imperceptible gradations; and, if a middle hue be assumed, suppose some tint of brown, all the varieties of complexion may be explained upon the principle of divergence influenced by outward circumstances. Mr. Poinsett saw in South America a fine healthy regiment of spotted men, quite peculiar enough to be held by Professor Agassiz a separate race. And why were they not? Simply because they were a known cross-breed between Spaniards and Indians. Changes as great are exhibited by the Magyars of Europe, and by the Ulster Irish, as quoted by Miller. Sir Charles Lyell was of opinion that a climatic change was already perceptible in the negro of our Southern states. Professor Cabell (Testimony of Modern Science, etc. ed. 1867) in his System of Natural History, as well as Professor Cabell shows, they came by an antipodal route from the same Asia. Pursue the investigation, and the clue of history will lead our treasured feet to the Mosaic cradle of man.

"(3) The objection drawn from the improbability that the one race springing from a single locality would migrate from a pesant on a worse region is very completely dispatched. Ample cause, proofs, facts, and authorities are furnished to show that, were mankind now reduced to a single family, only time would be wanting, even without civilization, to over-spread the earth. European man and European-American man, as all history agrees, came from Asia. Whence came our aboriginal men? Professor Cabell shows, they came by an antipodal route from the same Asia. Pursue the investigation, and the clue of history will lead our treasured feet to the Mosaic cradle of man.

"(4) Ethnology, or rather Glottology, the grada-fully perfecting comparison of languages is, of course, our best guide. The unscientific attempt to trace the striking analogies of languages to the mere similarity of human organs, and the still more unscientific attempt of Professor Agassiz to attribute them to a transcendental mental unity in races sprung from different original localities, look like desperation. Meanwhile, comparison is educing wonderful yet rarely demonstrative laws, and laws are guiding threads converging to unity.

"(3.) Another argument is derived from the real mental unity of the universal human soul. Races differ, indeed, in mental power, as do individuals, widely, even in the same family. But there is the same principle of truth, the same essence, the same intellect, affections, instincts, conscience, sense of superior divine power, and susceptibility of religion. For the European, the Esquimaux, the Hottentot, there is the same power in the cross of Christ.

"(6.) Finally, Geology, with her wonderful demonstration of the recent origin of man, proves the same thing. The known history of fossil man have been failures. Not far back of the period that our best but somewhat hypothetical calculations from Mosaic chronology would assign, Geology fixes the birth of man.

The conclusion may be fairly drawn, in the words of the able translators and illustrators of Baron Cuvier's great work: 'We are fully warranted in concluding, both from the comparison of man with inferior animals, so far as the inferiority will allow of such comparison, and, beyond that, by comparing him with himself, that the great family of mankind loudly proclaim a dependence, at some period or other, from one common origin.'

"Thus, by an investigation totally independent of historical authority, we are brought to the conclusion of the inspired writings, that the Creator ' hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth' (Acts xiiii, 28)." III. The grand character of the same human pair have also formed the subject of much discussion. It will be found, however, that the best conclusions of reason on this point harmonize fully with the brief Scriptural account of the facts as they were. 1. It is evident, upon a little reflection, and the close investigation confirms the conclusion, that the first human pair were created sinless; and, if they were not equivalent to that which all subsequent human beings have had to reach by slow degrees, in growth, experience, observation, imitation, and the instruction of others; that is, of a state of prime maturity, and with an infusão, so to speak, of knowledge and habits, both physical and intellectual, suitable to the place to which man had to occupy in the system of creation, and adequate to his necessities in that place. Had it been otherwise, the new beings could not have preserved their animal existence, nor have held rational converse with each other, nor have paid to their Creator the homage of knowledge and love, adoration and obedience; and reason clearly tells us that the last was the noblest end of existence. The Bible coincides with this dictum of honest reason, expressing these facts in simple and artless language: "And Jehovah God formed the man [Heb. the Adam], dust from the ground [Heb. habuth], and blew into his nostrils the breath of life [Heb. neshamath, life]; and the man became a living soul." (Gen. ii. 7.) Here are two objects of attention, the organic mechanism of the human body, and the vitality with which it was endowed. (c.) The mechanical material, formed (moulded, or arranged, as an artist modeler clay or wax) into the human and all other animal bodies, is called "dust from the ground." This expression conveys, in a general form, the idea of earthly matter, the constituent substance of the ground on which we tread. To say that of this the human and every other animal body was formed, is a position which would be at once the most easily apprehensible to an uncultivated mind, and which yet is the most directly opposite to the highest purpose of the purpose. We now know, from chemical analysis, that the animal body is composed, in the inscrutable manner called organization, of carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen, lime, iron, sulphur, and phosphorus. Now all these are mineral substances, which in their various combinations form a very large part of the solid ground.

(b.) The expression in which we have, "...the image of God," sets before us the organic life of the animal frame, that mysterious something which man cannot create nor restore, which baffles the most acute philosophers to search out its nature, and which reason combines with Scripture to refer to the immediate agency of the Almighty—' in him we live, and move, and have our being.'"

2. But the Scripture narrative also declares that "God created man in his own image: in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them" (Gen. i. 27). The image (resemblance, such as shadows bear to the shadow bearer, which is the object), is an expression which breathes at once primitive simplicity and the most recondite wisdom; for what term could the most cultivated and copious language bring forth more suitable to the purpose? It presents to us man as made in a resemblance to the Author of his being, a true resemblance, but faint and shadowy; an outline, faithful according to its capacity, yet infinite, remote from the reality: a distant form of the intelligence, wisdom, power, rectitude, goodness, and dominion of the Adorable Supreme. As to the precise characteristics of excellence in which this image consists, theologians have been much divided. Tertullian (Adv. Marc. ii, 5, 6) placed it in the faculties of the soul, especially in the power of choice between good and evil. Among the fathers generally, and the schoolmen after them, there were many different theories, nor are the later theologians at all more unanimous. Many unnecessary disputes have been avoided by the confession, that the phrase the image of God is a very comprehensive one, and is used in the Bible in more than one sense. Accordingly, the best writers speak of the image of God as twofold, Natural and Moral.

(a.) Natural.—The notion that the original resemblance of man to God must be placed in some one quality of Creation, is destitute of proof either from reason; and we are, in fact, taught that it comprises also what is so far from being essential that it may be both lost and regained. (1.) When God is called "the Father of Spirits," a likeness is suggested between man and God in the spirituality of their nature. This is also implied in the striking argument of St. Paul with the Athenians: "Forasmuch, then, as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device;" plainly referring to the idolatrous statues by which God was represented among heathens. If likenesses to God in man consisted in bodily shape, this could not have been an argument against human representations of the Deity; but it imports, as Howe well expresses it, that "we are to understand that our resemblance to him, as we are his offspring, lies in some higher, more noble, and more excellent thing, of which there can be no figure; as who can tell us to give the figure or image of a thought, or of the mind or thinking power?" In spirituality, and, consequently, immateriality, this image of God in man, then, in the first instance, consists. (2.) The sentiment expressed in Wisdom ii, 23, is an evidence that, in the opinion of the ancient Jews, the image of God in man comprised immortality also.
"For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of his own eternity;" and though other creatures were made capable of immortality, and at least the material human frame, whatever we may think of the case of animals, would have escaped death, if it had entered that hypothesis, admitting the absurdity of the "natural immortality" of the human soul, that essence must have been constituted immortal in a high and peculiar sense, which has ever retained its prerogative of continued duration amid the universal death not only of animals but of all human beings. There appears in the image also a manifest allusion to man's immortality, as being included in the image of God, in the reason which is given in Genesis for the law which inflicts death on murderers: "Whose sheddeth man's blood, by him shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man." The essence of the crime of homicide is not confined here to the putting to death the mere animal part of man; and it must, therefore, lie in the peculiar value of life to an immortal being, accountable in another state for the actions done in this, and whose life ought to be specially guarded for this very reason, that death introduces him into changeless and eternal relations, not to be left in the mercy of human passions. (3.) The intellectual faculties of man form a third feature in his natural likeness to God. Some, indeed (e.g. Philo), have placed the whole likeness in the voice, or rational soul. (4.) The will, or power of choice and volition, is the last of these features, the essence and ineffaceable. Man could not be "not without them."

(b.) Moral.—(1.) There is an express allusion to the moral image of God, in which man was at first created, in Colossians ii, 10: "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of Him that created him," and in Ephesians iv, 24: "And new creature, which is created in righteousness and true holiness." In these passages the apostle represents the change produced in true Christians by the Gospel, as a "renewal of the image of God in man; as a new or second creation in that image;" and he explicitly declares, that that image consists in "knowledge," in "righteousness," and in "true holiness." (2.) This also may be finally argued from the satisfaction with which the historian of the creation represents the Creator as viewing the works of his hands as "very good," which was pronounced with reference to each of them individually, as to the whole: "And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." But, as to man, this goodness must necessarily imply moral as well as physical qualities. A rational creature, as such, is capable of knowing, loving, serving, and living in communion with the Most Holy One. Adam, at first, did or did not exert this capacity; if he did not, he was not very good—not good at all.

3. On the intellectual and moral endowments of the progenitor of the human race, extravagant views have been taken on both sides. (a.) In knowledge, some have thought him little inferior to the angels; others, as furnished with but the simple elements of science and of language. The truth seems to be that, as to capacity, his intellect must have been vigorous beyond that of any of his fallen descendants; which itself gives us very high views of the strength of his understanding, although we should allow him to have been created "lower than the angels." As to his actual knowledge, that would depend upon the time and opportunity he had to observe the nature and laws of the objects around him; and the degree in which he was favored with revelations from God on moral and religious subjects. The "knowledge" in which the Apostle Paul, in the passage quoted above from Colossians ii, 10, places the "image of God" after which man was created, does not merely imply the faculty of understanding, which is a part of the natural image of God, but that which might be lost, because it is that in which we may be "renovated." It is, therefore, to be understood of the faculty of knowledge in right exercise; and of that willing reception, and firm retaining, and hearty approval of religious truth, in which the essential attribute of morality is always understood in the Scriptures. We may not be disposed to allow, with some, that Adam understood the deep philosophy of nature, and could comprehend and explain the sublime mysteries of religion. The circumstance of his giving names to the animals indicates, in which he was cognizant of a philosophical acquaintance with their qualities and distinguishing habits, although we should allow their names to be still retained in the Hebrew, and to be expressive of their peculiarities as some explorers have stated. Sufficient time appears not to have been afforded him for the study of the properties of animals, as this event took place previous to the formation of Eve; and as for the notion of his acquiring knowledge by intuition, this is contradicted by the revealed fact that angels themselves acquire their knowledge by observation and study, though, no doubt, with great rapidity and certainty. The whole of the new creature, which is "brought" to Adam, and it is probable that he named them under a Divine suggestion. That his understanding was, as to its capacity, deep and large beyond any of his posterity, must follow from the perfection in which he was created; and his acquisition of knowledge would, therefore, be rapid and easy. It was, however, in moral and religious truth, as being of the first concern to him, that we are to suppose the excellency of his knowledge to have consisted. "His reason would be clear, his judgment uncorrupted, and his conscience upright and sensible." The best knowledge would, in him, be placed first, and that of every other thing be made secondary to it, as to its relation to that. The apostle adds to knowledge "righteousness and true holiness;" terms which express, not merely freedom from sin, but positive and active virtue.

Sober as these views of man's primitive state are, it is not, perhaps, possible for us fully to conceive of an unexalted condition even as this. Below this standard it could not fall; and that it implied a glory, and dignity, and moral greatness of a very exalted kind, is made sufficiently apparent from the degree of guilt charged upon Adam when he fell; for the aggravating circumstances of his offence may well be deduced from this sublime contrast. (b.) As to Adam's moral perfection, it has sometimes been fixed at an elevation which renders it exceedingly difficult to conceive how he could fall into sin at all. On the other hand, those who deny the doctrine of our hereditary depravity, delight to represent Adam as little superior in moral perfection and capability to his descendants. But if we attend to the passages of Holy Writ above quoted, we shall be able, on this subject, to ascertain, if not the exact degree of his moral endowments, yet that there is a certain standard below which they cannot be placed. Generally, he was made in the image of God, which we have before observed, is to be understood morally as well as naturally. To whatever extent it went, it necessarily included all which did not resemble God; it was a likeness to God in "righteousness and true holiness," whatever the degree of each might be, and excluded all admixture of unrighteousness and unholiness, in whatever original state, was sinless, both in act and in principle.

4. The rabbis and the Arabsians relate many absurd traditions about Adam's personal beauty,.endowments, etc., and such are still current among the Eastern nations. An account of many of them may be found in Bayle (s. v.).

5. That Adam was a type of Christ is plainly af... firmed by Paul, who calls him "the figure of him who was to come." Hence our Lord is sometimes called, not inappropriately, the second Adam. This typical relation stands sometimes in similitude, sometimes in contrast. Adam was formed immediately by God, as was the humanity of Christ. In each the nature was spotless, and richly endowed with knowledge and true holiness. Both are seen invested with dominion over the earth and all its creatures; and this may explain the eighth Psalm, where David seems to make the sovereignty of the first man over the whole earth, in its pristine glory, the prophetic symbol of the dominion of Christ over the world restored. Beyond these particulars fancy must not carry us; and the typical contrast must also be limited to that which is stated in Scripture or supported by its allusions. Adam and Christ were each a public person, a federal lead to the whole race of mankind; both were invested with the fountain of sin and death, the other of righteousness and life. By Adam’s transgression "many were made sinners" (Rom. v, 14–19). Through him, "death passed upon all men, because all have sinned" in him. But he thus prefigured that one man, by whose righteousness the free gift comes upon all men to justification of life. The first man condemned all to sin; but all to his posterity; the other is a quickening Spirit, to restore them to newness of life now, and to raise them up at the last day. By the imputation of the first Adam’s sin, and the communication of his fallen, depraved nature, death reigned over those who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam’s transgression; and through the righteousness of the second Adam, and the communication of a divine nature by the Holy Spirit, favor and grace shall much more abound in Christ’s true followers unto eternal life.—Watson, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Hunter, Stac. Biol. p. 8; Williams, Characters of O. T. 1; Kurz, Hist. of Old Cot. 2, 82; Rawlinson, Fall, and Babylon, 2. (Sept. ‘Mab., but most copies omit; Vulg. ‘Amom.) A city at some distance from the Jordan, to which (according to the text, וָעַמְּדָה, in Adam), or beyond which (according to the margin, מָאָמְדָה, "from Adam"), as in our version), the overflow of the waters of that stretch extended in its annual inundation, at the time when the Israelites passed over (Josh. iii, 16). The same is the city called Adamath in the alluvial clay in the vicinity (comp. 1 Kings vii, 45). It has been incorrectly inferred from the above text that the city Adam was located east of the river; whereas it is expressly stated to have been beside (בַּאֲדָם) Zarethan (q. v.), which is known to have been on the west bank, not far from Bethshean (1 Kings iv, 12). It hence appears that the 'heap' or accumulation of waters above the Israelites’ crossing-place, caused by the overflow of the stream, reached back on the shore and many miles up the river, over the secondary banks of the Ghor, on which Zarethan stood, as far as the higher ground on which Adam was located (see Keil, Comment. in loc.) probably the ridge immediately north of Bethshean, which closes the plain of Moab in this direction.

Adam of Bremen, born in Upper Saxony, came to Bremen in 1067, and was made magister scholaram in 1069—hence often named Magister. He died about the year 1076. (See Asmusen, De feminis Adami Bremiensis, Kiliion, 1834.) He wrote the Gea Humanae-synmens ecclesiae pontificum, which is our chief source of information for the Church history of Northern Europe from 808 to 1073; the present work is the best edition. The best edition is that of Lappenberg, in the Monumenta Germaniae (ed. Pertz, tom. vii, p. 266–389); also published separately, "in unus schollarum" (Hannover, 1846). The best treatise on his life, his trustworthiness as a historian, and his sources of information, is the introduction of Lappenberg to his edition. Corrections of some of his statements may be found in N. Comm. Sac. Geot. i, ii, 126 sq.; and in Staphorst, Hist. Eccles. Hamburg.

Adam, Melchior, born in Silesia, obtained about 1600 the headship of a college, and finally a professorship in the University of Heidelberg. His chief works are Vita Germanorum Philosophorum, Theologorum, etc. (Heidelberg, 1578, 2 vols. 8vo), De Hermeneutica Specimen, etc. Theor. (Heidelberg, 1580, 1581, 1582, 3 vols.), and De tractatione Ellae et Thologorum et rerum Principia (Franc. 1618, 8vo), published together, under the title Dignorum laude virorum immortalitatis (Franc. 1658, 5 vols. 8vo, and 1706. fol.)—a great repository, from which compilers of church history and of biographical dictionaries have since drawn their materials. He died March 25, 1622, at Heidelberg.

Adam, Thomas, born at Leeds, 1701, was rector of Wintringham, England, fifty-eight years, and died 1784. He was a sensible and voluminous writer: his ‘Works’ (Lond. 1822, 8 vols. 8vo) contain a Paraphrase on the Romans, Lectures on the Church Catechism, and a number of Sermons. His life, with his Exposition of the Gospels, was published in London in 1837 (2 vols. 8vo).

'Ad'namah (Heb. 'Adamam, אֲדָמָה, ground, as often; Sept. 'A' SYN v. r. 'Adam, Vulg. Edema), a famous city of Naphthali, mentioned between Chinnereth and Ramah (Josh. xix, 36); it probably the same as ADAMI (q. v.) of the same tribe (ver. 38). Schwarz, however (Palest. p. 188), thinks it is the present village Dama, situated, according to him, 5 English miles W. N. W. from Safed; but no such name is given by other travellers.

Adamnanus or Adamnannus, a Scoto-Irish priest and monk, made in 679 abbot of Hy. In 701 he was sent on a mission to Alfred, king of Northumberland, and on his return endeavoured in vain to induce his countrymen to observe Easter after the Roman fashion, which he had learned in England. He then passed over to Ireland, where he persuaded nearly all the people to follow the Roman custom. From Ireland he returned to Hy, and having again tried, but with as little success, to bring his monks round to his newly-adopted views, he died there, aged 89. Sept. 28. 794. He edited a Life of St. Columb, in three books, which is given by Cambra, Acta s. v., (p. 10); and in the new edition (p. 680); also De Locis Terrae Sanctae, lib. 3, published by Serarius, at Ingolstadt, 1619, and at Malbion, in his Sac. Benedicti, part ii, p. 502. He is also said to have written a book, De Pascua Legitimo, and some canonics. See Sir James Ware’s Irish Writers, lib. i, cap. iii, p. 86.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 678, lib. i, cap. vi, p. 268.

Adaman, a term vaguely used to describe any very hard stone, and employed in the Ath. Vera. in Ezek. iii, 9; Zech. viii, 12, as the rendering of נַעַמ (shamir), elsewhere (Jer. xvii, 1) rendered DIAMOND (q. v.). ‘A’dama, Esclus. xvi, 16, in some copies.

'Adani (Heb. 'Adami, אֲדָמֵי, redishá; Sept. ‘Adam, Vulg. Adam). A city near the border of Naphthali, mentioned between Zaanaim and Nekeb (Josh. xix, 38). The best interpreters (e. g. Rosenmüller, Keil, in loc.) join this with the following name, Nekeb (נָקֶב), l. q. in the hollow; so the Vulg. que est Necess, but the Sept. distinguishes them, eni Nekob, as if an epithet of the same place; although the Jerusalem Talmud (Megilla, lxx, 1) makes them distinct, and calls the former Damim (דָּמִים), which Schwarz (Palest. p. 181) supposes identical with a ‘village Dami 5 English miles west of the S. W. point of the Sea of Tiberias,’ meaning the ruined site Daniel (Robinson, Researches, iii, 237), falling on the limits of Naphthali. See Tribe. The place appears to be the same elsewhere (Josh. xix, 36), called ADAMI (q. v.), and the enumeration in ver. 36 requires the collection Adamim nekob as one locality. See NEKOB.
ADAMIC Constitution. See COVENANT.

ADAMITE, 1, a sect of heretics in Northern Africa in the second and third centuries. They pretended to the primitive innocence which Adam had before the fall; and, in imitation of his original condition, they appeared naked in their religious assemblies, which they called Paradises. The author of this abominable heresy was a certain Proculus, a disciple of Carpocrates (August. De Haeres. 81). 2. A similar heresy, under the same name, appeared in Bohemia in the fifteenth century. (See Picard, Ceremonies Religieuses, fig. 215.) Their followers were known as Adamites, or Adamites, from whom they were also called Picardists. From France they spread over a large portion of Germany, especially over Bohemia and Moravia. Their chief seat was a fort on an island of the river Lusinice, from whence they frequently set out for plundering and murdering. Ziska suppressed them in 1241. For a long time they seemed to be extinct, but in 1781, when Joseph II issued his patent of toleration, the Adamites came again forward and claimed toleration of their principles and meetings. But when they made known the character of both, the government speedily suppressed them. Adamites, in their extinction was not entirely apparent, and in 1840, after the publication of the edict of toleration, they again showed themselves in public, especially in the district of Chrudim, Bohemia. In five villages they were very numerous, and in one, Stradan, they even succeeded in making many converts. All their members belong to the Czech (Slavonian) nationality, and are mostly mechanics or pedlars. They deny the existence of a personal God, but assume a Supreme Power (Moc) which has created the world, which henceforth exists through itself. Every Adamite claims a spirit who cleanses him from sins. They reject sacraments and worship, but expect a saviour (Mahis) whose appearance they hope the realization of their communist ideas. Their meetings and the public confession of their principles have been again suppressed by the government, but they are known still to exist in secret. (See Beaussie, Sur les Adamites en Boheme, in L’Enfant, Hist. Hum. 1, 304 sq.; Pertz, Script. rer. Austriae, sect. xiv.—Monheim, Ch. Hist. cent. ii. pt. ii. ch. v. § 18; Lardner, Works, viii. 425; Wetzer and Welto, xii. 11 sq.)

ADAMANNUS. See ADAMANNUS.

ADAMS, Eliphalet, an eminent Congregational minister, was born at Dedham, Mass., March 26, 1677, and graduated at Harvard College in 1694. After preaching in various places for ten years without settlement, he was ordained pastor of the church in New London, Conn., February 1, 1700, and died April 17, 1733. He was a man of learning, and was very much interested in the Indians, whose language he had acquired. He published a number of occasional sermons.—Allen, Amer. Biog.; Sprague, Annals, i. 234.

ADAMS, Hannah, was born at Medfield, near Boston, in 1756. She learned Greek and Latin from students who lodged in her father’s house. In 1784 she published a View of all Religions, which went through several editions in America, and was reprinted in England. In her fourth edition she changed the title to Dictionary of Religions. She also published a History of the Jeews (Boston, 1812). Her History of New England appeared in 1790. She died at Brookline, Mass., Nov. 15, 1831.

ADAMS, Jasper, D.D., President of Charleston College, S. C., was born at Medway, Mass., Aug. 27, 1793, graduated at Brown University in 1815, and studied theology at Andover. In 1819 he was made professor of mathematics at Brown University, and was ordained a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1821. In 1824 he became President of Charleston College, but in 1826 he removed to West Point Academy. In 1828 he moved to Pendleton, S. C., where he died, Oct. 25, 1841. Besides the "Moral Philosophy," he published a number of occasional sermons and addresses.—Sprague, Annals, v. 641.

ADAMS, John, was the only son of Hon. John Adams, of Nova Scotia, and was graduated at Harvard College in 1771. He was pastor in Roxbury, but dismissed, 1780. He died at Cambridge in 1740. He was distinguished for his genius and piety, and is said to have been master of nine languages. A small volume of his poems was published at Boston in 1743.—Allen, Amer. Biog.; Sprague, Annals, i. 350.

ADAMS, Samuel, M.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1768, and practised medicine till mature years, holding infidel opinions in regard to Christianity. After his conversion, in 1818, he entered the Ohio Conference in 1818 as a travelling minister, and devoted himself to the ministry fifteen years. He died at Beaver, Pa., March 6, 1832.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 214.

ADAMS, Thomas, a pious and learned English Anglican, of St. Benner’s, London, was appointed for his loyalty, and died before the Restoration. He was a great favourite with Southey, who says that he "had all the oddity and felicity of Fuller’s manner." His Works, chiefly sermons, were published in 1830 (fol. Lond.). His Exposition of St. Peter was reprinted in 1839 (in 2 vols., London).

ADAMS, William, a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born in Fairford Co., Va., June 29, 1785. Educated in a pious household, he was converted at an early age, and commenced preaching in 1813, in Kentucky, whither his family had removed. His mind, naturally vigorous, was cultivated by assiduous study, and he became one of the most acceptable and useful preachers of the Kentucky Conference, of which he was a member from 1814 to the time of his death. For many years he was secretary of the Conference. He died in 1836.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 496.

ADAMSON, Patrick, archbishop of St. Andrews and one of the most learned writers of the 16th century, was born at Perth, March 15, 1543. At the age of 28 he fled from home and as private tutor in the household of the Duke of Ossian, escaped death at Bourges at the time of the massacre of the French Protestants. He lived in concealment seven months, during which time he translated into Latin verse the Book of Job, and wrote the tragedy of Herod, also in Latin verse. In 1578 he returned to Scotland, became minister of Paisley, and was soon raised to the archbishopric of St. Andrews, the accepting of which brought him into continual discredit and affliction till his death, in great poverty, Feb. 18, 1592. His Works were printed at London in 1619.

A’dar, the name of a month and also of a place. See also ADAR.

ADAR. See Tse'h. "The large, Eth. iii. 7, 13; viii. 12; ix. 1, 16, 17; xix. 21; Ezra vi. 15; Sept. 'Adar.' The sixth month of the civil and the twelfth of the ecclesiastical year of the Jews (comp. 1 Macc. vii. 49); from the new moon of March to that of April; or, according to the rabbins, from the new moon of February to that of March. The name was first introduced after the introduction of the Macedonian Dystrus (Ã'firoe). (See Michellis, Gram. Arab. p. 25; Suppl. p. 25; Golius, in Loc. ob Alfer. p. 17, 34; Hyde, De relig. et Pers. p. 63.) The chief reason why the names of the first day of the month are given is that these are the days in which there is a rest apart for commemoration: The 7th is a fast for the death of Moses (Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6). In the first century, in time honored and tied to his death by some ancient authorities. Josephus (Ant. iv. 8, 49) states that he died on the first of this month; which also agrees with Midrash Megillath Esther, cited by Reland (Antiq. Hebr. iv. 10); whereas the Talmudical tracts Kaddishim and Sota take the scene as the day. It is at least certain that the latter was the day on which the fast was observed. On the 9th there was a fast in memory of the contentions (or rather rupture of the celebrated schools of Hillel and Shamai), which happened but a few years before the birth of Christ. The cause of the dispute is obscure (Wolf's Bibliothek. Hebr. ii. 826). The 18th is the so-called "Fast of Esther." Iker observes (Antiq. Hebr. p. 150) that this was not an actual fast, but merely a commemoration of Esther's esteems those days, as is still observed among the Jews on the 18th, and a preparation for the ensuing festival. Nevertheless, as Esther appears, from the date of Haman's edict, and from the course of the narrative, to have fasted in Nisan, Buxtorf adduces from the rabbins the following account of the name of this fast, and of the foundation of its observance in Adar (Syn. Sepher, p. 564); that the Jews assembled together on the 18th, in the time of Esther, and that, after the example of Moses, who fasted when the Israelites were about to engage in battle with the Amalekites, they devoted that day to fasting and prayer, in preparation for the perilous trial which awaited them on the morrow. In this sense the 18th does stand in the most direct relations to the feast of Purim. The 13th was also, "by a common decree," appointed as a festival in memory of the death of Nicanor (2 Macc. xx. 36). The 14th and 15th were devoted to the feast of Purim (Esth. ix. 21). See Purim.

In case the year was an intercalary one, when the month of Adar occurred twice, this feast was first modestly observed in the intercalary Adar, and then celebrated with full splendor in the ensuing Adar. See VEDAR. The former of these two celebrations was then called the lesser, and the latter the great Purim. Home has erroneously stated (Introduction, iii. 177) that these designations apply to the two days of the festival in an ordinary year. For the Scripture lessons of this month, see Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 8—Kittel, s. v. See CALENDAR; MONTH.

2. (Heb. Addar), "splendor, otherwise thrashing-floor; Sept. 'A'daráh, apparently mistaking the appended ìl for a part of the word; Vulg. Addar) a contracted form (Josh. xv. 8) of the name elsewhere (Num. xxxiv. 4) written HAZAR-ADDAR. See also ARAOTH-ADAR, HAZAR-ADDAR.

ADARCONIM. See DARIC.

ADARGASERIN. See TREASURER.

ADASA (ADASI), a village of Judaea, where Judas the Maccabaeus slew the Assyrian general Nicanor (1 Macc. vii. 40, 46), and where he was himself afterward slain by the generals of Antiochus (Josephus, War i. 1. 6). It was situated, according to Josephus (Ant. xii. 10, 80) and Strabo (Geog. x. 649), near Gophna, but was hardly the HUDÁNAI (q. v.) of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 37). See LAISH.

ADASHIM. See LENTIL.

ADACTUS, an Italian and steward of certain of the royal domains, in a city of Phrygia, the name of which is unknown. He perished during the persecution of Decius, about 250. His memory is celebrated by the Latin church on the 7th of February; by the Greeks, October 3d—Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. viii. 11; Butler, Lives of Saints, Feb. 7.

ADBEEL (Heb. Adbeeł), 'adbeel, prob. miracle of God, the first member being by Syriac for Ḥabar, 'savor; or progeny of God, the first member being Arab. sob. offspring; Sept. Naḥāleḳ [Josephus 'Aḇi-ḏi-ḥoḳ, Ant. i. 12, 4], Vulg. Adbiel), the third name of the twelve sons of Ishmael, and head of an unknown tribe (Gen. xlix. 13; 1 Chron. i. 29).

B.C. post 2061. See ARABIA.

ADDAN (Heb. Adam'an, 'adán; Sept. 'Háwý, another form (Ezra ii, 59) of the name (Neh. vii. 63) ADDAN (q. v.).

ADÁR (Heb. Addar), 'adár, ample or splendid, otherwise [from the Chaldean. Ḥ Dar] threshing-floor; Sept. 'Apôd v. r. 'Addôp, Vulg. Addar), a son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chron. vi. 8); elsewhere (Gen. xlv. 21) called AND (q. v.). See also ARAOTH-ADAR, HAZAR-ADAR.

adder, in the general sense of a venomous serpent (see SERPENT), is the rendering in the Authorised Version of the following Hebrew words in certain passages: 'aháš (akahat, perhaps so called from coming and lying in scab), an asp, or other venomous reptile, only found in Ps. exii. 3; ḫÔš (pa than, probably from twisting itself), an equally indefinite term for a viper or venomous serpent, Ps. li. viii. 4; xcl. 13 (elsewhere "asp"); Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 14, 16; Isa. xi. 8; ḫÔbām, 'išpikōm, so called from hissing, a basilisk, or other poisonous serpent, Prov. xxiii. 32 (elsewhere "cockatrice"); Isa. xi. 8; lx. 5; Jer. xviii. 17; like the kindred ḫÔbām, 'isphāhā, Isa. xiv. 29; ḫÔbāp, shēkhiphōn, so called from creeping, apparently an adder, or small speckled venomous snake, occurs only in Gen. xlix. 17. For any, or all of the particular species of serpent, although special traits are given in connection with some of them that enable us to make an approximation toward their identification with those described by modern naturalists. See SNAKE. The terms adder and viper are nearly interchangeable in modern science, the latter being strictly the name given to a genus of snakes having the head covered with scales. See VIPER. The true adders are classed under the sub-genus BERUS, and are of several species, properly distinguished by the granular scales of the head, sometimes with larger scales internosed, and having nostrils of a moderate size. See SERP.

ADÁTH (ADHÁTH, probably for Heb. Adháth, "ornamental, as in Exod. xxxii. 4, etc.), the name of one or two men.

1. An Israelite, several of whose descendants, on returning from Babylon, married heathen women (1 Esdr. ix. 31); for which the parallel text (Ezra x, 30) has more correctly FARATH-MOA'R (q. v.).

2. The son of Adam, the father of Malchiel (I. c., probably Masseah, 2 Chron. xxx. 4) in the maternal ancestry of Christ (Luke ii. 28). B. C. ante 628.

ADISON, Joseph, one of the most eminent of British writers, was the son of Dean Addison, and was born at Milton, May 1, 1672. He was educated at the Charter House and at the colleges of Queen's and Magdalen at Oxford. Of his contributions to general literature we do not speak. In the course of his writings in the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, appeared a series of papers, afterward collected, and often reprinted, under the title of "Addison's Evidence of the Christian Religion." In his latter years he projected a paraphrastic version of the Psalms of David, of which he gave a beautiful specimen in his metrical translation of Psalm xxiii: "The Lord my pastor shall prepare," etc. But a long illness prevented the completion of this design. Addison died at Holland House, Kensington, June 17th, 1719. During his lingering decay he sent for a young nobleman of very irreligious life and of loose opinions to attend him; and when the latter, with great tenderness, requested to receive his last injunctions, Mr. Addison told him, "I have sent for you that you may see how a Christian can die." The best edition of his Whole Works is that of Bishop Hurd (Lond. 1711, 6 vols. 8vo).—Jones, Chr. Biog. p. 5.

ADDO (Adho, comp. ADDON), the "father" of the prophet Zechariah (1 Esdr. vi. 3), called in the genuine text (Exod. v, 1) IDDÖ (q. v.).
ADDON

Ad'odon (Heb. "Addon", אָדֹד, "low or lord, or perhaps i.q. 'Ido; Sept. Ἀδῶν), the second of three persons mentioned in Neh. vii, 61, who, on returning from the captivity to Palestine, were unable to "show their father's house or their seed, whether they were of Israel," B.C. 536. This probably means that they were unable to furnish such undeniable legal proof as was required in such cases. And this is in some degree explained by the subsequent (v. 63) mention of priests who were expelled the priesthood because their descent was not found to be genealogically registered. These instances show the importance which was attached to their genealogies by the Jews. See Genealogy. In Ezra ii, 59, he is called Addan, but in 1 Esdr. v, 36, his name is contained in Chara-Athar-Lar. According to others, this is the name of a place in the land of the captivity, like Tel-melah and Tel-haimah, whose son is said to have returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 34); but the genuine text (Ezra ii, 51) has no such name.

A'idden, as it is for Juddan. A priest, after the captivity, who is said to have married a daughter of Bzerzelus, and hence assumed his name (1 Esdr. v, 36); evidence for correction for Barzillai (q.v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 61).

Adelaide, a city and capital of South Australia, which had, in 1855, a population of 20,000 souls and 15 churches. It is the see of a bishop of the Church of England, as well as of a Roman Catholic bishop. The former was established in 1847, and had, in 1859, 80 clergy-men, among whom were 1 dean, 1 archdeacon, and 7 honorary curates. Adelaide also has an Episcopalian literary institution, called St. Peter's Collegiate School. See Clergy List for 1860 (London, 1860, 8vo).

Adalbert (Aldebert or Adalbert), a priest and irregular bishop of the eighth century, who obtained great celebrity from his piety and zeal, and from his strides in ecclesiastical matters with Boniface, the (so-called) "pope of Germany." Our knowledge of him is derived mostly from the account of his adversary, Boniface, who paints him in dark colors; but the truth seems to be that he had much more of the spirit of the Gospel than was usual in his times. He opposed, for instance, pilgrimages to Rome, and advised sinners to "seek relief from the omnipresent God, or from Christ alone." Boniface charged him with having superstitious practices, and he was condemned by the Synod of Soissons, 744.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 56; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. viii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 2.

Aelem or Adelheim. See Aldhelm.

Adedatus, Pope, a Roman by birth, who obtained great celebrity from his piety and zeal, and from his strides in ecclesiastical matters with Boniface, the (so-called) "pope of Germany." Our knowledge of him is derived mostly from the account of his adversary, Boniface, who paints him in dark colors; but the truth seems to be that he had much more of the spirit of the Gospel than was usual in his times. He opposed, for instance, pilgrimages to Rome, and advised sinners to "seek relief from the omnipresent God, or from Christ alone." Boniface charged him with having superstitious practices, and he was condemned by the Synod of Soissons, 744.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 56; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. viii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 2.

A'der (Heb. E'der, אֶדֶר, in pause A'der, אֶדֶר, a flock, i.q. Eder; Sept. Ζέβη ντ ζ Τέβη, a chief Benjamite, "son of Beriah, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 19), B.C. ante 588.

Adesenari, or Impannati, a sect in the 10th century, who believed in the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, but not in the full Roman dogma on that subject. The name is derived from the Latin word A'des, "to be present." They held the so-called doctrine of impantation, scit., "non adesce in Eucharistia Humanae seu Carneum Christi Corpus sumptum ex B. Virginis Matre sed Corpus panaceum assumptum a Verbo." See Impantation.

Adabans (Αἰδαβάν, sc. χώρα, probably from the river Zab or Dhib), the principal of the six provinces of Assyria. See Adanas. Nat. v, 12 and Ammianus (xxiii, 6, § 20) comprehended the whole of Assyria under this name, which, however, properly denoted only the province which was watered by the rivers Diab and Adab, or the Great and Little Zab (Dhib), which flow into the Tigris below Nineveh (Mosul), from the north-east. The queen of this region, and the queen her Isates, as Phoenicians convert to Judaism, are very often named by Josephus (Ant. xx, 2, 4; War, ii, 16, 19; v, 4, 6, 11).

Adiaphora (ἀδιάφορα), things indifferent. In ethics the term has been applied to actions neither expressly commanded nor prohibited by the moral law, which may or may not be done. The question whether such actions are possible, is affirmed by the Stoics, and, among the Scholastics, by Dun Scotus, but denied by Thomas Aquinas. At the time of the Reformation it gave rise to the Adiaphoristic Controversy (q.v.). The Pietists of the 17th and 18th centuries and the philosophers Wolf and Fichte rejected it. Modern writers on ethics generally agree with Schleiermacher, who (in his History of Dogma, 1841) shows that this distinction can and ought to exist in state law, but cannot in the court of conscience. See, generally, Schmid, Adiaphora, wissenschaftlich und historisch untersucht (Leips. 1809).

Adiaphoristic Controversies. I. A dispute which arose in 1546 among the Lutheran reformers. The Augsburg Confession (q.v.) gave great offence to the Lutherans, as well as to the pope, Melancthon, Camerarius, Bugenhagen, and other divines were summoned by the Elector Maurice of Saxony to consider how far the Interim might be adopted in Germany. They decided that in "things indifferent" (in rebus adiaphorosis) the emperor might be obeyed; and they prepared the "Leipsic Interim," as a formula concordatis, and rule, especially, for the churches of Saxony. While it professed to yield no point of protestant faith, it admitted the use of some of the Roman ceremonies, e. g. confirmation, use of candles, gowns, holidays, etc., matters which Melanchthon considered adiaphoros. The controversy arose when the Elector and his opponents (and justly) with Romanizing, not merely in things indifferent, but also in matters of faith; e. g. with granting that the pope is head of the Church, even though not jure divino; allowing that there are seven sacraments; admitting the use of extreme unction, and of other ceremonies. The controversy was continued with great bitterness until the adoption of the Augsburg Formula Concordis, 1555; but the topics of the Interim afforded matter for internecine strife among the Protestant theologians long after. See, generally, Schmid, Controversia de Adiaphoros (Jen. 1857).—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xvi, § 8, pt. ii, ch. 1; Planck, Geschichte der Protestant. Theol. i, p. 151-248; iii, p. 801-804, adiaph. on second Adiaphor. Controversy; Hase, Ch. Hist. § 348, 351. Compare Flacius; Interim; Melancthon; SYNERGETIC CONTROVERSY.

II. A second controversy, called "Adiaphorist," arose among the Pietists and their opponents. The former urged an abandonment of such secular amusements as dancing, playing (especially at cards), joining, visiting theatres, etc. See Pietism.

A'dida (Ἀδίδα, Josephus also v. 'A'dia or Α'diā, probably of Heb. origin; Vulg. Adda), a fortified town in the tribe of Judah (1 Macce. xii, 38), which Simon Maccabaeus set up "in Sephelia" (iv τυ Σεφηλία) and made it strong with bolts and bars. Eusebius (Porph. v. 11) ascribes to this the ear of wheat handled in his time to the open country about Fleutberopolis (see Reland, Palæst. p. 187). This A'dida is probably the "Adda over against the plain," where Simon Maccabees encamped to dispute the entrance into Judea of Tryphon, who had treacherously seized on Jonathan at Polemarchus (1 Macc. xiii, 13). Josephus (Ant. xiii, 6, 4) adds that this Addis was upon a hill, before which lay the plains of Judea. It is scarcely (see Rendel, Palaest. p. 546) the same as Adikaim (Jos. xv, 36), but may be the ancient A'datka (A'datuza of Eusebius, Onomast. s. v. 'A'datuza) and the modern Edikam (Schwarz, Palaest. p. 102), near Gaza. See ADITHAIM. It was apparently here that Aretas defeated Alexander (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 2). Lightfoot, however, contrasts the scene of the meeting in the description of Josephus and Josephus into four or five different towns (see Chorog. Decad. § 8). Another place of the name of Addis, mentioned by Josephus (War, iv, 9, 1) as having been garrisoned by Vespasian, is thought to be Tell a Cord (Geogr. Ant. p. 388) to have been near Jericho; but Rendel (Palaest. p. 546) argues that it was precisely in the opposite direction from Jerusalem, perhaps identical with the Haddin (q. v.) of Ezra ii, 89. — Kitto.

A'diel (Heb. 'Adiel, בֶּיתָבֶּם, ornament of God), the name of three men.

1. (Sept. 'A'diel v. r. 'O'diel.) The father of Azmaveth, which latter was treasurer under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 25). B.C. ante 1024.

2. (Sept. 'Edia v. r. 'Ediel.) One of the family before the Levites of Simon, who seem to have deserted the aborigines of Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 36), B.C. cir. 711.

3. (Sept. 'Adiel.) A priest, son of Jahaziah and father of Maaiah, who last one was most active in reconstructing the Temple after the captivity (1 Chron. ix, 12). B.C. ante 586.

A'din (Heb. 'Adin, בֶּיתָבֶּם, eminence, as in Isa. xxi, 8; Sept. 'Adin, 'A'din, 'A'din, 'A'din, 'A'din, the head of one of the Israelitish families, of which a large number (454, according to Ezra ii, 15, but 655, according to Neh. vii, 20)—the discrepancy being occasioned by an error in the hunderds, and the including or excluding (of himself) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (B.C. 536) and fifty more (with Ebed the son of Jonathan) under Ezra (B.C. 459, Ezra viii, 6). He appears to have been the same with one of those who subscribed the religious covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. xvi, 16, B.C. cir. 410). His name occurs in the parallel passages of the Apocrypha ('A'din, 1 Esdr. v, 14; 'A'din, 1 Esdr. vi, 32).

A'dinos (Heb. 'Adinos, בֶּיתָנָבֶּד, delectate; Sept. 'A'dinos), son of Shibza, a Reubenite, captain of thirty of his tribe, and second of the sixtenth of the thirty-three thousand warriors of David (1 Chron. xi, 42). B.C. 1045.

A'dino (Heb. 'Adino, בֶּיתָנּוּד, perhaps for וֹעַדִּינָו, i. q. Adino; Sept. 'A'dinos, Vulg. 'Cenitunum'), a name that occurs in the common version of 2 Sam. xxiii, 8, as one of the mighty men of King David. Instead of the confused translation, "The Tachmonite that sat at the seat, chief among the captains; the same [was] Adino," the margin renders the words translated "the same [was] Adino the Eznite" by the brandishing of his spear [fall]." It is clear that these words are not proper names, although their grammatical construction is not very easy. The meaning, according to the above view, omitting the words supplied in the common version, would be, "Joshebassibeth the Tachmonite, chief of the three, he brandished it, his spear, against," etc. This seems the best mode of disposing of this difficult passage, which others resolve by supposing some corruption in the text. See EXNITE.

A'dinu (אַדִּינָו), one of the Levites who interpreted the law as read by Ezra (1 Esdr. ix, 48); evidently a corruption of Jamin (q. v.) of the genuine text (Neh. viii, 7).

Adite. See AD.

Aditha'mon ( Heb. Aditha'mon, בֶּיתָבֶּד, double prey or double ornament; Sept. 'A'dathiazi, but some copies omit; Vulg. Adikaim), a town in the plain of Judah, mentioned between Sharon and Gederah (Josh. xv, 36). Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) mentions two places of the name of Aditha (A'datho, Jerome, Aditha and Adia), one near Gaza, and the other near Diopolis (Lydia); the former being commonly supposed to be the same with Adithaim, and the latter with Hadid; and probably corresponding respectively to the two places called Adida (q. v.) by Josephus. Schwarz (Palaest. p. 102) accordingly thinks that Adithaim is represented by the modern village Edikam, 5 Eng. miles East of Gaza (correctly Edikam, Aedikam, Rosearia, ii, 570 sqq.) —but this is too far from the associated localities of the same group [see TIBE], which require a position not far from Menevia, a village with traces of antiquity, about 5 miles south of Ekrion (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 114).

Adjuration (the verb is expressed by בַּשְׁסַד, alak,' in Hiph., to cause to swear, as rendered in 1 Kings viii, 31; 2 Chron. vi, 22; also בַּשָּׁב, shoba, in Hiph., to make swear, or charge with an oath, as often rendered; Gr. ἀνακυρίζω, to bind by oath), a solemn act or appeal, whereby one man, usually a person vested with natural or official authority, imposes upon another the obligation of speaking or acting as if under the solemnity of an oath (1 Sam. xiv, 24; Josh. vi, 26; 1 Kings xxii, 16; 2 Chron. xviii, 15). See SWEAR.

(1.) A striking example of this occurs in the N. T., where the high-priest calls upon Christ, in the presence of the Sanhedrim, to declare who he is (Matt. xxvi, 63; Mark v, 7; see Acts xix, 13; comp. 1 Thess. v, 27). An oath, although thus imposed upon one without his consent, was not only solemn, but binding in the highest degree; and when connected with a question, an answer appears to have been compulsory, and, if false, chargeable with perjury. Thus our Saviour, who had previously disavowed or declined to reply to the charges brought against him, now could not avoid an answer. The impropriety, however, of thus extorting truth must be evident; and in the case of Christ it was an outrage against the commonest principle of judicial fairness, by which a prisoner in power may be put in a position to inculpate himself. But the hierarchy, having failed to elicit any reliable evidence that would condemn Jesus, at last resorted to this base method of compelling him to declare his Messiahship, with a view to convict him upon his own testimony. See JESUS.

(2.) The term also occurs (Acts xxiv, 9) in reference to the expulsion of demons. See EXORCISM.

(3.) In the Roman Church, an act by means of which the name of God, or some other holy thing, is made use of, in order to induce any one to do what is required of him. An adjuration is said to be express when the majesty of God, or any one of his attributes, is interposed as the purpose, as adiuro te per Deum virum; implicit, when not the majesty of God, but any one of his more marked productions is made use of, as adiuro te per Evangelium Christi. See OATH.

A'dlai (Heb. 'A'dlay, בֶּיתָבֶּה, just; Sept. 'A'dai v. r.
ADMAH | ADONI-BEZEK

ADMAH (Heb. 'Admāh, 'āḏāmāh, "properly earth; Sept. 'Aḏāmāh, but 'Aḏāma in Hos.") one of the five cities in the valley of Siddim (Gen. x, 19), which had a king of its own (Gen. xiv, 2, 8). It was destroyed along with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix, 24; Deut. xxix, 23; Hos. xi, 8). Near the south-west end of the Dead Sea, M. De Saulcy passed through a place marked as the effect of volcanic action called et Thamah, where his guides assured him were ruins of a city anciently overthrown by the Almighty (Narrativa, i, 425); but its identification with Admah needs corroboration. Reland (Palaest. p. 845) is inclined to infer, from the constant order of the names, that it was situated between Sodom and Zeboim; but even these sites are so uncertain that we can only conjecture the locality of Admah somewhere near the middle of the southern end of the Dead Sea. See Sodom.

ADMAH (Heb. 'Admāha, 'āḏāmāḥa, prob. from Persic thma, "the Highest," and ta-da, "given;") i. q. Theodore; Sept. 'Aḏāmāḥa, but most copies omit; Vulg. Admahata), the third named of the seven princes or courtiers of Xerxes (Esth. i, 14), B.C. 483.

ADMAH a town, according to the Pentinger Table, on the route from Damascus to Palmyra; located by Ritter (Erdrk. xvii, 1457) at Kureish, but, according to Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 282), to be found at the present Jabb-Adim, between Yabrud (Jebruda) and Sitibaya.

ADMISSION, (1) a term in use among English and Scotch Presbyterians, to denote the service and act by which a minister is publicly introduced into a new charge. (2) In the Church of England, when the bishop accepts a candidate presented for a benefice as sufficient, he is said to admit him. The canon and common law allow the bishop twenty-eight days after presentation, during which to examine him and inquire into his life and doctrine. A bishop may refuse to admit the candidate presented on account of perjury, schism, heresy, or any other crime on account of which he might be deprived. Bastardy, without a dispensation, is a just cause of refusal, but not so the fact of the person presented being the son of the last incumbent of the cure, and the canon, saving sedet patre non habiendo in England; still, if the bishop refuse on this account, and the patron thereupon present another, the former nominee has no remedy. When the bishop refuses to admit he is bound, within a reasonable period, to send notice to the lay patron in person.

ADMONIT. See REDDY.

ADMONITION, an act of discipline much used in the ancient Church: the first step toward the recovery or expulsion of delinquents. In case of private offences it was performed, according to the evangelical rule, privately; in case of public offence, openly before the Church. If either of these sufficed for the recovery of the fallen person, all further proceedings in a way of censure ceased; if they did not, recourse was then had to excommunication (Tit. iii, 10; 1 Thess. v, 14; Eph. iii, 4; Matt. iii, 18). Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xvi, ch. ii, § 6. It is still exercised in the Methodist Episcopal Church (Discipline of M. E. Church, pt. iii, ch. i, § 5).

ADMONITIONISTS, a name given by the High Church party, Cartwright and other Puritans in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who sent in two "Admonitions to the Parliament," 1571, in which were set forth the abuses of the hierarchy and the grievances under which non-subscribing Protestants labored (Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i, 188).

ADNA (Heb. 'Adnā, 'āḏānā, pleasant; Sept. 'Elvēi, but in Neb. 'Morāḏī, the name apparently of two men.

1. A chief-priest, son of Harim, and contemporary with Joelakim (Neb. xii, 15), B.C. cir. 500.

2. An Israelite of the sons (i.e. inhabitants) of Phath-mosh, who divorced the Gentile wife married by him after the captivity (Ezra x, 30), B.C. 445.

ADNAM (Heb. 'Adnām, 'āḏānām, i. q. 'Adnā, the name of two men.

1. A wall-nich of the tribe of Manasseh, which joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 20, where the text has erroneously 'āḏānāh, 'Sept. 'Elvēi, Vulg. Edun), B.C. 1054.

2. (Sept. Edwāy, Vulg. Ednās.) A Judahite, and principal general under Jehoshaphat, with a force of 300,000 (7 men) (2 Chron. xvii, 14), B.C. cir. 908.

ADO, St., archbishop of Vienne, France, born about 800, made archbishop in 860, and noted for his zeal in reforming the morals of the people and in enforcing Church discipline. He died 873. His memory is celebrated by the Roman Church on Dec. 16. His principal works are a Martyrologium (Paris, 1648, fol.; also, with notes, ed. Georgius, Rome, 1745, 4to) and a Brevarium Chronicorum de 6 Mundis Etatibus (Basil, 1568; also in Bibl. Max. Patr. 16, 768).

ADOAN (Heb. 'Adnāy, 'āḏānāy, prob. my master, in the plural form for the sake of intensity; see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 822; Sept. Kīnāv, Vulg. Domina, Auth. Vers. Lord, 'not in small capitals; but 'Adunay, 'with that term has just a translation of Jehovah), a term employed in the Hebrew Scriptures by way of eminence to God, especially in the Pentateuch always where he is submissively or reverently addressed in his character of sovereign; frequently with other titles added. See Jahvah.

The simple form 'yōḇ, Adon (either with or without suffixes), is spoken of an owner or possessor in general, e.g. "property" (1 Kings xvi, 21), of slaves (Gen. xxiv, 14, 27; xxix, 2, 7), hence, of kings, as rulers over their subjects (Isa. xxxvi, 15), and of husbands, as lords of their wives (Gen. xviii, 12); also of God, as proprietor of the world (Josh. iii, 18; Exod. xxii, 17; Psa. xxvii, 7). It is also used of a ruler or governor (Gen. xiv, 6) and of a title of address given to a person by a father (Gen. xli, 50), a brother (Num. xii, 11), a royal consort (1 Kings i, 17, 18), and especially kings or nobles (2 Sam. xiv, 9; 1 Kings iii, 17). The plural is employed in a similar manner. The distinctive form, Adonai, never has the article; it is another applied by God to himself (Gen. xi, 18), and elsewhere, may have "Jehovah," Isa. viii, 7; where, however, the expression may be only the prophet's; a circumstance that may have arisen from the superlativeness of the Jews, who always point the sacred name Jehovah with its vowels, and even substitute for it that name in reading, so that in some cases it appears to have supplanted it. Elated with this success, he ventured at the head of the confederate Canaanites and Perizites, to attack the army of the tribes of Judah and Simeon, after the death of Joshua; but was himself defeated, captured, and served in the same manner as he had treated his.
ADONICAM

own captives—a fate which his conscience compelled him to acknowledge as a retributive retribution for his inhumanity. He died of these wounds at Jerusalem, whither he was taken, B.C. cir. 1590. (See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.; and comp. E. Allan, Var. Hist. ii, 9.)

Adoni'cam (1 Esdr. viii, 39). See ADONIKAM.

Adoni'jah (Heb. Adoniyahu), גַּדְוָה יְהֵעַ, my lord is Jehovah, otherwise lord (i. e. worshipper, comp. Ab.) of Jehovah, also in the prolonged form Adoniyahu ha-yiyyaw, יְהֵעַ לִי, 1 Kings i, 8, 17, 24, 25, 41-51; ii, 13-24; 2 Chron. xviii, 8; Sept. Adowia; but in 2 Sam. iii, 4; 1 Chron. iii, 2, Adowia; in Neh. x, 16, Adowia v. r. 'Aavāv, 'Aavīv), the name of three men. See also TOADONIKAM.

1. The fourth son of David, and his second by Hag- gith; born while his father reigned over Judah only (2 Sam. iii, 4). B.C. cir. 1050. According to Oriental customs, Adonijah might have considered his claim superior to that of his eldest brother Amnon, who was born while his father was in a private station; but not to that of Absalom, who was not only his elder brother, but the son of his father's preferred queen, and of royal descent on the side of his mother. When, however, Amnon and Absalom were both dead, he became, by order of birth, the heir-apparent to the throne. But this order had been set aside in favor of Solomon, who was born while his father was king of all Israel. Understandably, then, Adonijah, called Adonijah or Adonijam (q. v.), Adonijam, son of Solomon (q. v.), also took the same means of showing that he was disposed to relinquish the claim of primogeniture which now devolved upon him (comp. Josephus, Ant. vii, 14, 4). But it does not appear to have been his wish to trouble his father as Absalom had done; for he waited till David appeared at the point of death, when he called around him a number of influential men, whom he had previously gained over, and caused himself to be proclaimed king. In all likelihood, if Absalom had waited till a similar opportunity, Joab and Abiathar would have given him their support; but his premature and unmaternal attempt to dehrone his father disgraced these friends of David. This danger was avoided by Adonijah; but his plot was, notwithstanding, defeated by the prompt measures taken by David, who, at the instance of Nathan and Bethsheba, directed Solomon to be at once proclaimed king, with solemn coronation by Zadok, and admitted to the real exercise of the power of King Solomon. Adonijah had all been lost, and fled to the altar (see ASYRIA), which he refused to leave without a promise of pardon from King Solomon. This he received, but was warned that any further attempt of the same kind would be fatal to him (1 Kings i, 5-53), B.C. cir. 1015. Accordingly, when, some time after the death of David, Adonijah covertly endeavored to reproduce his claim through a marriage with Abishag (q. v.), the virgin widow of his father, his design was at once penetrated by the king, by whose order he was instantly put to death (1 Kings ii, 18-25), B.C. cir. 1012. See SOLOMON.

Far from looking upon this as 'the most flagrant act of disloyalty since David's death at Saul's command' (Newman, Hebrew Monarchy, ch. iv), we must consider that the clemency of Solomon, in sparing Adonijah till he thus again revealed a treasonable purpose, stands in remarkable contrast with the almost universal practice of Eastern sovereigns. Any one of these, situated like Solomon, would have easily secured his throne by putting all his brothers to death, whereas we have no reason to think that any of David's sons suffered except the open pretender Adonijah, though all seem to have opposed Solomon's claims; and if his execution be thought an act of sedition, we must remember that we cannot expect to find so many cases on record as actually occur within the years before Christ came, and that it is hard for us, in this nineteenth century, altogether to realize the position of an Oriental king in that remote age. 2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to assist in teaching the law to the inhabitants of Judah (2 Chron. xvii, 8), B.C. 909.

3. A chief Israelite after the captivity (Neh. x, 16); probably the same elsewhere (Ezra ii, 18; viii, 18; Neh. vii, 18) called ADONIKAM (q. v.).

Adon'ikam (many Adon'ikam) (Heb. Adonikam), אֲדֹנֵי-קָם, probably, whom the Lord sets up; Sept. Adowia, one, whose retainers, to the number of 666, returned to Jerusalem when Zerubbabel (Ezra xii, 18), besides himself (Neh. vii, 18), and stood before later (B.C. 459) his three immediate descendants, with 60 male followers (Ezra xii, 18). In the Apocryphal text (1 Esdr. viii, 89) his name is once Anglicized ADONIKAM (אֲדֹנֵי-קָם) comp. ADONIKAM, 1 Esdr. vi, 14. He appears (from the identity of the associated names) to have been the ADONICAM who joined in the religious covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. vi, 16), B.C. 410.

Adon'i'am (Heb. Adoniram), אַדֹנֵי-רָם, lord of height, i. e. high lord; Sept. Adowia, a person mentioned as receiver-general of the importes [see Tax] in the reigns of David (1 Kings v, 6, where he is said to have been the son of Abda; 2 Sam. xx, 24, where he is called ADORAM, by contraction), Solomon (1 Kings iv, 14), and Rehoboam (1 Kings xii, 18, where he is called ADONIKAM, for his father's sake). He is called HADAROM, q. v., for an extended term (B.C. 1014-0753), during which he had rendered himself, as well as the tribute itself, so odious to the people (comp. 1 Kings xii, 4), in sustaining the immense public works of Solomon (q. v.), that, when Rehoboam rashly sent him to enforce the collection of the taxes, the exasperated populace rose against him, and stoned him to death, as a signal for the revolt under Jeroboam I (1 Kings, xii, 18).

Adon'is (אַדֹנִיס, prob. from a Phoenician form of the Heb. 'adon, lord), was, according to Apollopidorus (iii, 14, 8), the son of Cinyrus and Medane, or, according to other accounts (Hesiod and Panyasis in Apoll. ut sup. 14), of Phoenix and Alciphisoba, or of an Assyrian king, Theias, by his own daughter, Smyrna, who was changed into a myrrh-tree (σμύρνα) in endeavoring to deflowering to her father's rage at having incest. The beauty of the youth made him a favorite with Venus, with whom he was permitted to spend a portion of each year after his death, which occurred from a wound with a wild boar in the chase. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.)

This event was celebrated by a yearly festival, originally by the Syrians, who called a river near which the fatal accident occurred (Reland, Palest. p. 269) by his name (Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 606), and thence by all the nations around the Mediterranean. See Bruns, Beiträge zur, p. 576 sq.; Fickenseher, Erklär. d. Myth. Adonis (Gotth., 1862); Grotius, Ueb. d. Fest des Adonis, in his Antiquar. Verzeich. (Lemberg, 1800), p. 88 sq.; Mönichsen, De Adonis Phoenicum (Hafn. 1702); Maurer, De Adonis et the mass (Erlang. 1782).

The Vulc. gives Adonis as a rendering for Thammuz or Thammuz (אַדֹנִיס; Sept. θαμμοῦζ), a Syrian deity, for whom the Hebrew idolatresses were accustomed to hold an annual lustration (Ezek. viii, 14). This idol was doubtless the same with the Phoenician Adon or Adonis, and the feast itself such as they celebrated.

Silvestre de Sacy thinks that the name Tammuz was of foreign origin, and probably Egyptian, as well as the god by whom it was borne. In fact, it would probably not be difficult to identify him with Osiris, from whose worship he must have derived his name. A similar feast held in honor of Tammuz was solstitial, and commenced with the new moon of July, in the month also called Tammuz. It consisted of two parts, the one consecrated to lamentation, and the other to joy; in the days of grief they mourned the disappearance of the god, and in the days of gladness celebrated his discovery and return. Adonis or Tammuz appears to have been a sort of incarnation of the sun, regarded principal as in the case of Jove, and the same concept, as in the case of Jove, with the apparent vicissitudes in its celestial position, and with respect to the terrestrial metamorphoses produced, under its influence, upon vegetation in advancing to maturity. (See Lucian, De Dea Syrta, § vili, 19; Selden, De Dile Syria, ii, 81; Creuzer, Symbolik, iv, 3.) See TAMMuz.

Adonists. Critics who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah are not the natural points belonging to that word, but to the words Adonat (q. v.) and Elohim; and that they are applied to the consonants of the ineff-able name Jehovah, to warn the readers that, instead of the word Jehovah, which the Jews were forbidd to pronounce, they are always to read Adonai. They are opposed to Jehovahists, who maintain the opposite view. See JAHVIST.

Adon1'-se-dak (Heb., Adon1'-Te-dek, p'se-v'g, lord of justice, i. e., just lord; Sept. "Adon1'-is'ke, r. "Adoni'shek, Vulg. Adoni'sedek), the Canaanitish king of Jerusalem when the Israelites invaded Palestine (Josh. x, i, 3), B.C. 1618. After Jericho and Ai were taken, and the Gibeonites had succeeded in forming a treaty with the Israelites, Adonizedek was the first to raise himself from the stupor which had fallen on the Canaanites (Josh. i, 9-11), and he induced the other Amoritish kings of Hebron—Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon—to join him in a conspiracy against the enemy. They did not, however, march directly against the invaders, but went and besieged the Gibeonites, to punish them for the discouraging example which their success and the common cause had afforded. Joshua no sooner heard of this than he marched all night from Gilgal to the relief of his allies; and falling unexpectedly upon the besiegers, soon put them to utter rout. The pursuit was long, and was signalized by Joshua's famous command to the sun and moon, as well as by a tremendous hail-storm, which greatly distresed the fugitive Amorites. See JOSHUA. The five kings took refuge in a cave, but were observed, and by Joshua's order the mouth of it was closed with large stones, and a guard set over it, until the pursuit was over. When the pursuers returned, the cave was opened, and the kings brought chiefl y to their feet upon the necks of the prostrate monarchs—an ancient mark of triumph, of which the monuments of Persia and Egypt still afford illustrations. See TRIUMPH. They were then slain, and their bodies hung on trees until the evening, when (comp. Deut. xx, 25) they were taken down and cast into the cave, the mouth of which was filled up with large stones, which remained long after (Josh. x, 1-27). The severe treatment of these kings by Joshua has been censured and defended with equal disregard of the real circumstances, which are, that the war was avowedly of extermination, no quarter being given excepted on either side; and that the war-usages of the Jews were neither worse nor better than those of the people with whom they fought, who would most certainly have treated Joshua and the other Hebrew chiefs in the same manner had they fallen into their hands. (Simeon's Works, ii, 592.—Kittel. See CANAANIT.

Adoplianists or Adoptivi, a sect which orig-nated with Felix, bishop of Urgel, in Spain. They taught that Jesus Christ, as to his human nature, was not the natural, but merely the adopted Son of God, whence they were called Adoptivi or Adoptiani. This error was brought before the Council of Narbonne in 791; but it does not appear that Felix, who was present, was then condemned, as was the case at Ratibon in the following year, at Frankfort in 794, and at Urgel in 799. The Adoptian doctrine had existed before in the East, but this development of it in Spain seems to have been aboriginal there, though it is not impossible that Felix may have been influenced by some of the writings of Theodores of Mopsuestia (q. v.). By the use of the term Adoptio this school wished to mark the distinction of proper and improper in reference to the Son. They made use of the illustration that, as a son cannot have two fathers, but may have one by birth and the other by adoption, so the distinction must be made between his proper sonship and his adoption by adoption. Thus, they regarded as the important point the different relation in which Christ is called the Son of God according to his divine or his human nature. The former relation marked something founded in the nature from which the second results from choice and good pleasure (electione, placito); and the name Son of God was given to him only in consequence of his connection with God (munificat), and hence the expressions for this distinction, secundum naturam and secundum adoptiorem. The sect is fully treated by Walch, Historiae Adopti Nari nae, Bollandist, 4, 14; and see Neander, History of Dogmas, 337, 432, 442 (transl. by Ryland, Lond., 1834, 2

I. Literal. The practice of adoption had its origin in the natural desire for male offspring, the operation of which is less marked in those countries where the equi-alizing influences of high civilization lessen the pecular privileges of the paternal character, and where the security and the well-observed laws by which estates descend and property is transmitted withdraw one of the principal inducements to the practice, but was peculiarly prevalent in the patriarchal period. The law of Moses, by settling the relations of families and the rules of descent, and by formally establishing the Levirate law, has left this mode of operation almost obliterated. The allusions in the New Testament are mostly to practices of adoption which then existed, but not confined to the Romans. In the East the practice has always been common, especially among the Semitic races, although the additional and peculiar stimulus which the Hebrews derived from the hope of giving birth to the Messiah was inapplicable to cases of adoption. But, as the arrangements of society became more complicated, some restrictions were imposed upon the power of adoption, and certain public forms were made necessary to legalize the act:
precisely what these were, are different ages, among the Jews, and it is difficult to gather from the analogous practices of other Eastern nations. For the practice had ceased to be common among the Jews by the time the sources of information became more open; and the culpable facility of divorces in later times re-dered unnecessary those adoptions which might have arisen, and in earlier times did arise, from the stigma of infantile and his adopted name, and his care for the infant deer. The case of Esther affords the only example of the adoption of a female; for the Jews certainly were not behind any Oriental nation in the feeling expressed in the Chinese proverb, "He is happiest in daughters who has only sons" (Mém. sur les Chinois, x, 140).

1. The first instances of adoption which occur in Scripture are less the acts of men than of women, who, being themselves barren, give their female slaves to their husbands, with the view of adopting the children they may bear. Thus Sarah gave her handmaid Hagar to Abraham; and the son who was born, Ishmael, appears to have been considered as her son as well as Abraham's until Ishmael's (Gen. xxx, 3); on which his other wife, Leah, although she had sons of her own, yet fearing that she had left off bearing, claimed the right of giving her handmaid Zilpah to Jacob, that she might thus increase their number. Sarah was made up his handmaid Bilhah to her husband (Gen. xxx, 9-15).
ADOPTION

In this way the child was the son of the husband, and, the mother being the property of the wife, the progeny must be her property also; and the act of more particular appropriation seems to have been that, at the time of birth, the handmaid brought forth her child "upon the knees of the adoptive mother" (Gen. xxx, 3).

In this case the vicarious bearing of the handmaid for the mistress was as complete as possible; and the sons were regarded as fully equal in right of heritage with those by the legitimate wife. This privilege could not, however, be conferred by the adoption of the child, nor by the receipt of the child, but only by the actual reception of the child by the husband. Sarah's case proves that a mistress retained her power, as such, over a female slave whom she had thus vicariously employed, and over the progeny of that slave, even though by her own husband (Gen. xxi, 10).

Still earlier Abraham appears to have adopted a house-born slave, his faithful and devoted steward Eliezer, as a son (Gen. xv, 2)—a practice still very common in the East. A boy is often purchased young, adopted by his master, brought up in his faith, and educated as his son; or if the owner has a daughter, he adopts him through a marriage with that daughter, so that the slave becomes the husband of the master's daughter, as he would have been if the child had been born to him. House-born slaves are usually preferred, as these have never had any home but their master's house, are considered members of his family, and are generally the most faithful of his adherents.

This practice was very common among the Romans, and is more than once referred to by Paul (Rom. viii, 19; 1 Cor. vi. 13), as signifying the transition from the condition of a slave to that of a son, and the privilege of applying the tender name of "father" to the former "master," affording a beautiful illustration of the change which takes place from the bondage of the law to the freedom and privileges of the Christian system.

As in most cases the adopted son was considered dead to the family from which he sprang, the separation of natural ties and connections was avoided by this preference of slaves, who were mostly foreigners or of foreign descent. For the same reason the Chinese make their adoptions from children in the hospitals who have been abandoned by their parents (Mem. sur les Chinois, vi, 328). The Tartars prefer to adopt their near relatives—nephews or cousins, or, failing them, a Tartar of their own banner (ib. iv, 136). In like manner Jacob adopted his own grandsons Ephram and Manasseh to be counted as his sons (Gen. xlvii. 12, 13). This practice is peculiar to China, whereas Joseph himself could only have one share of his father's heritage along with his brothers, the adoption of his two sons enabled Jacob, through them, to bestow two portions upon his favorite son. The adoption of Moses by Pharaoh's daughter (Exod. ii, 10- 14) is an instance of this sort of adoption, but it differs from what has just been stated respecting the adoption of outcast children by the Chinese.

A man who had only a daughter often married her to a freed slave, and the children were counted as those of the woman's father, or the husband himself is adopted as a son. Thus Sheshan, of the tribe of Judah, gave his daughter to Jarba, an Egyptian slave (whom, as the Targum premies, he no doubt liberated on that occasion): the posterity of the marriage are not, however, reckoned to Jarba, the husband of the woman, but to her father, Sheshan, and as his descendants they take their heritage and station in Israel (1 Chron. ii, 44). So Machir (Genesis x, 27) gave his daughter in marriage to Hezron, of the tribe of Judah. She gave birth to Segub, who was the father of Jair (q. v.). This Jair possessed twenty-three cities in the land of Gilead, which came to him in right of his grandmother, the daughter of Machir; and he acquired other towns in the same quarter, which are mentioned in the enumeration of cities or villages (1 Chron. ii. 21-24; Josh. xiiiii, 9; 1 Kings iv, 18). Now this Jair, though of the tribe of Judah by his grandfather, is, in Num. xxxii, 41, counted as of Manasseh, because through his grandmother he inherited the property, and was the linear representative of Machir, the son of Manasseh. This case illustrates the difference between the pedigree of Christ as given by Matthew and that in Luke—the former being the pedigree through Joseph, his supposed father, and the latter through his mother, Mary. This opinion [see Genealogies] supposes that Mary was the daughter of Hel, and that Joseph is called the son (Luke iii, 25) because he was adopted by Hel when he had his daughter, who was an heiress, as has been presumed from the fact of her going to Bethlehem to be registered when in the last stage of pregnancy. Her heirship, however, is not essential to this relation, and her journey may rather have been in order to continue under the protection of her husband during such a period of suspicion.

By the time of Christ the Jews had, through various channels, become well acquainted with the more remarkable customs of the Greeks and Romans, as is apparent particularly from the epistles of Paul. In John vii, 51, to the Jews he says, "I am he that shall be free indeed," is supposed by Grotiuss and other commentators to refer to a custom in some of the cities of Greece and elsewhere, called ἀλελοθησία, whereby the son and heir was permitted to adopt brothers and admit them to the same rights which he himself enjoyed. But it seems more likely that the reference was to the more familiar Roman custom, by which the son, after his father's death, often made free such as were born slaves in his house (Theophil. Antecensor, "Institut. Imp. Justinian. i, 1, 22). In Rom. viii, 23, παρθένος ἀπελευθερώμενος, "anxiously waiting for the adoption," the former word appears to be used in a sense differing from that which it later came to have, to signify the consummation of the act there mentioned, in which point of view it is conceived to apply to the twofold ceremony among the Romans. The one was the private act between the parties; and if the person to be adopted was not already the slave of the adopter, this private transaction involved the purchase of him from his parents when practicable. In this manner Caius and Lucius were purchased from their father Agrrippa before their adoption by Augustus. The other was the public acknowledgement of that act on the part of the adopter, when the adopted person was solemnly avowed and declared to be his son. The peculiar force in which the adoption of such an allusion in an epistle to the Romans must be very evident. In Gal. iv, 5, 6, there is a very clear allusion to the privilege of adopted slaves to address their former master by the endearing title of Aboza, or father. Selden has shown that slaves were not allowed to use this word in addressing the owner of the family to which they belonged, nor the corresponding title of Mama, mother, when speaking to the mistress of it (De Succ. in Bona Defunct. secund. Hdr. c. iv.)—Kitto, s. v.

2. The Roman custom of adoption, by which a person, not having children of his own, might adopt as his son one born of other parents, was a formal act, effected either by the process named adoptatio, when
The person to be adopted was independent of his parent, or by adopțio, specifically so called, when in the power of his parent. The effect of it was that the adopted child was entitled to the name and auctoritas of his new father, and his beneficent laws; while the son, on his part, was entitled to the property of that dignity. The law told Shem, captain of the temple, that he would deprive him of his honorable station, and substitute Elias, son of Hilkiah (Isa. xxii. 21): "I will clothe him with thy robe, saith the Lord, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand." And Paul in several places, as Christians "put on the Lord Jesus; that they put on the new man," to denote their adoption as sons of God (Rom. xiii. 14; Gal. iii. 27; Ephes. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10; comp. John i. 12; 1 John iii. 2). See Son. When Jonathan made a covenant with David, he stripped himself of his girdle and his robe and put them on his friend (1 Sam. xviii. 8).—Taylor's Calf. v.

1. Figurative.— Adoption in a theological sense is that act of God's grace by which, upon our being justified by faith in Christ, we are received into the family of God, and entitled to the inheritance of heaven.

2. In the New Testament, adoption appears too much a distinct act of God, as involved in, and necessarily flowing from, our justification; so that at least the one always implies the other. Nor is there any good ground to suppose that in the New Testament the term adoption is used with special reference to the civil adoption of Roman citizens, as they are called. The heathens, and, therefore, these formalities are illustrative only so far as they confirm the usages among the Jews likewise. The apostles, in using the term, appear rather to have had before them the simple view, that our sins had deprived us of our sonship, the favor of God, and the right to the inheritance of eternal life; that when we return to God, and reconcile ourselves to him, our forfeited privileges were not only restored, but greatly heightened through the paternal kindness of God. They could scarcely be forgetful of the affecting parable of the prodigal son; and it is under the same view that Paul quotes from the Old Testament, "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty" (2 Cor. vi. 18).

(1.) Adoption, then, is that act by which we are, in a real sense, were adopted into the family of God and heirs of his eternal glory. "If children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ" (Rom. viii. 17); where it is to be remarked that it is not in our own right, nor in the right of any work done in us, or which we ourselves do, though it should be an evangelical work, that we become heirs; but jointly with Christ, and in his right.

(2.) To this state belong, freedom from a servile spirit, for we are not servants, but sons; the special love and care of God, our heavenly Father; a filial confidence in him; free access to him at all times and in all circumstances; a title to the heavenly inheritance; and the assurance and witness of the Holy Spirit to our adoption, which is the foundation of all the comfort we can derive from those privileges, as it is the only means by which we can know that they are ours.

(3.) The last-mentioned great privilege of adoption merits special attention. It consists in the inward conviction and knowledge of that, and the assurance of believers, from which flows a comfortable persuasion or conviction of our present acceptance with God, and the hope of our future and eternal glory. This is taught in several passages of Scripture:

[1.] Rom. viii. 15, 16; "For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The spirit it self-bear witness in our spirit that we are the children of God." In this passage it is to be remarked (a) That the Holy Spirit takes away "fear," a servile dread of God as offended. (b) That the "Spirit of God" here mentioned is not the personified spirit or genius of the Gospel, as some would have it, but "the Spirit of Christ," of himself; and hence he is called (Gal. iv. 6) "the Spirit of his Son," which cannot mean the genius of the Gospel. (c) That he inspires a filial confidence in God, as our Father, which is opposed to "the fear" produced by the "spirit of bondage." (d) That he excites this filial confidence, and makes us call God our Father, by witness-bearing testimony with our spirit, "that we are the children of God." [2] Gal. iv. 4-6. "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons; and because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." Here, also, are to be noted. (a) The means of our redemption from under (the curse of) the law, the incarnation and sufferings of Christ. (b) That the adoption of sons follows upon our actual redemption from the curse of the law, in other words, upon our pardon. (c) That upon our being pardoned, the "Spirit of the Son" is "sent forth into our hearts," producing the same effect as that mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans, viz., filial confidence in God, "crying, Abba, Father." [3] To these texts are to be added all those passages, so numerous in the New Testament, which express the confidence and the joy of Christians, their friendship with God, their confident access to him as their own, their entire union and delight in proceeding with him in spirit. (See Watson, Institutes, ii. 263; Dwight, Theology, vol. ii.) 2. In the early fathers, adoption seems to have been regarded as the effect of baptism. The Romanist theologians generally do not treat of adoption as a separate theological topic, nor, indeed, does their system admit it. According to the old Lutheran theology (Apol. iv. 140; Form. Conc. iv. 631; Gessner, 112; Heuser, 128) adoption is to be understood at the same time with regeneration and justification, justification giving to the sinner the right of adoption, and regeneration putting him in possession and enjoyment of this right. The certainty of one's adoption, and of the inheritance warranted by it, are counted among the graces of the new birth. Pietism (q. v.) caused an exaggeration of the Lutheran theology to that of the Reformed Church, which, from the beginning, had distinguished more strictly between regeneration and adoption. The expressions of the Reformed theologians differed, however, greatly. Usually they represented adoption as the effect or as the fruit of justification. Sometimes, however, as co-ordinate, but always as subsequent to regeneration. Rationalism (q. v.) threw aside the biblical conception of adoption as well as that of regeneration. Breitnieder explains it as the firm hope of a moral man for everlasting bliss after this life. Schleiermacher speaks of adoption as a constitutive element of justification, but explains it, on the whole, as identical with the putting on of a new man, and regards it as a phase in the phenomenology of the Christian consciousness. Lange (Christliche Dogmatik, § 97) regards the new birth as the transformation of the individual life into a divine human life, and finds it in the union of justification and faith. Addition, as the result of the new birth, appears to him as a substantial relation with God and an individualized image of God according to his image in Christ. Güter, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, thinks that the words of the Bible conceal treasures which theological science has not yet fully succeeded in bringing to light, and that adoption must be brought into an organic connection not only with justification, but with the new birth - the latter not to be taken merely in a psychological, but in a deeper mystical sense. Adō'ra (1 Macc. xiii, 20). See Adoraim.

Adō'ra'im (Heb. Adō'rā'îm, אֲדוֹרָאִים, two mounds or dellcings; Sept. Άδωραία v. r. Άδωραία), a town, doubtless in the south-west of Judah, since it is enumerated along with Hebron and Marreshah as one of the cities fortified by Rehoboam (1 Chron. xi, 9). Under the name of Adōra it is apparently mentioned in the Apocrypha (Άδωρα, 1 Macc. xiii, 20), and also often by Josephus (Άδωρα or Άδωρα, Ant. viii, 10, 1; xiii, 6, 5; 15, 4; War, i, 2, 6; 8, 4), who usually connects it with Maraesa, as cities of the later Idumaea (see Rendel, Palæst. p. 547). It was captured by Titus at the same time with Maraesa, and rebuilt by Gabinius (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 9, 1; xiv, 5, 3). Dr. Robinson discovered the site under the name of Dura, a large village without ruins, five miles W. by S. from Hebron, on the eastern slope of a cultivated hill, with olive-groves and fields of grain all around (Rees's Nat. Hist., ii, 25; comp. Schwartz, Palæst. p. 110). Dura.

Adō'ram (Heb. A'dō'râm', אֲדוֹרָם, a contracted form of A'dō'ria'm; Sept. Άδωραϊα v. r. Άδωραϊα), the officer in charge of the tribute under Solomon and Rehoboam (2 Sam. xx, 24; 1 Kings xii, 18); elsewhere (1 Kings iv, 6) called Adō'nīram (q. v.).

Adoration, an act of worship to a superior being; strictly due to God alone, but performed to other objects also, whether idols or men. The word "adorer" may be derived from (mem) ad os (mutter), or the custom of kissing the hand in token of respect. The Greek term προσευχή implies the prostration of the body as a sign of reverence. See Worship.

1. The Hebrew forms of adoration or worship were various; putting off the shoes, standing, bowing, kneeling, prostration, and kissing (Exod. iii, 5; Josh. v, 15; Psa. ii, 12; Gen. xii, 40-43; xiii, 26-28; Dan. ii, 46; Matt. xxvii, 9; Luke vii, 38; Rev. xix, 20). See Attitudes. In this last sense the term (in its Latin signification as above) is descriptive of an act of worship alluded to in Scripture: "If I had held the sun when it shined, or the moon, walking in brightness; and if the bread of Joy had blessed my mouth; or if my mouth had kissed my hand; this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge" (Job xxxi, 26-29); a passage which clearly intimates that kissing the hand was considered an overt act of worship in the East (see Kiesling, in the Mincul. Lips. Nov. ix, 355 sq.). See Astrology. So Minutius Felix (De Sacris, cap. 2, ad 66) observes that Socrates observed the statue of Serapis, "according to the custom of the superstitious vulgar, he moved his hand to his mouth, and kissed it with his lips." The same Act was used as a mark of respect in the presence of kings and persons high in office or station. Or rather, perhaps, the hand was not merely kissed and then withdrawn from the mouth, but held continuously before or upon the mouth, to which allusion is made in such texts as Judg. xvii, 10; Job xxii, 5; xxix, 9;

ADORATION

acts of this adoration we find offered even by priests to the pope, and Gregory XIII claims this act of homage as a duty.

Adoration properly is paid only to the pope when placed on a throne, and in which posture, as a further degree of worship, alone are admitted to kiss his feet. The people are afterward admitted to do the like at St. Peter's church; the ceremony is described at large by Gulicciardini.

4. In the Roman worship it is said that "to adore the cross, the saints, relics, and images, is to prostrate one's self on the ground, and touching the forehead until the forehead touched the ground. The various expressions in Hebrew referring to this custom appear to have their specific meaning: thus נָפָל (naphal), † to fall down, הַנְּפָרָה (kara'), to bend, קָמִיתוּ (kamitoh), bending the knee; קָדָדָא (kadad), to stop, קָיָדָא, the inclination of the head and body; and, lastly, עֲקֵדַה (akhadah), to bow, προσκυνεῖν, complete prostration; the term עַלָּדָא (agal), to prostrate one's self, Isa. xiv. 15, 17, 19; xvi. 6, was introduced at a late period as appropriate to the worship paid to idols by the Babylonians and other Eastern nations (Dan. iii. 5, 6). Such prostration was usual in the worship of the Persians (G. xcvii. 16, xxviii. 6); but it was by no means exclusively used for that purpose. It was the formal mode of receiving visitors (Gen. xviii. 2), of doing obeisance to one of superior station (2 Sam. xiv. 4), and of showing respect to equals (1 Kings ii. 19). Occasionally it was repeated three times (1 Sam. xx. 41), and even seven times (Gen. xxxiii. 3). It was accompanied by such acts as a kiss (Exod. xvii. 2), laying hold of the knees or feet of the person to whom the adoration was paid (Matt. xxviii. 9), and kissing the ground on which he stood (Ps. lxxxix. 5; Mic. vii. 17). Similar adoration was paid to the heathen Roman emperors (Acts xvi. 18) by the people, the act of prostration was omitted, and the act consisted simply in kissing the hand to the object of reverence (as above) in the manner practised by the Romans (Plin. xxxviii. 5; see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Adoratio), or in kissing the statue itself (Hos. iii. 2). The same customs prevailed at the time of our Saviour's ministry, as appears not only from the numerous occasions on which they were put in practice toward himself, but also from the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. xxviii. 26), and from Cornelius's reverence to Peter (Acts x. 25), in which case it was objected to by the apostle, as implying a higher degree of reverence than was extended to any other person from a Roman, to whom it was not usual.—Smith, s. v.

2. The adoration performed to the Roman and Greek emperors consisted in bowing or kneeling at the prince's feet, laying hold of his purple robe, and then bringing the hand to the lips. Some attribute the origin of this practice to Constantine. Bare kneeling before the emperor to deliver a petition was also called adoration. It is particularly said of Diocletian that he had gams fastened to his shoes, that divine honors might be more willingly paid him by kissing his feet. And this mode of adoration was continued till the last age of the heathen church. The practice of adoration may be said to be still subsisting in England in the custom of kissing the king's or queen's hand.

3. Adoration is also used in the court of Rome in the ceremony of kissing the pope's feet. It is not certain at what period this practice was introduced into the Church; but it was probably borrowed from the East, and accompanied the temporal power. Baronius pretends that examples of this homage to the popes occur so early as the year 204. These prelates, finding a vehement disposition in the people to fall down before them and kiss their feet, procured crucifixes to be fastened on their slippers, by which means the adoration intended for the pope's person is supposed to be transferred to Christ. ADRAMYTTEUM

See Sennacherib. Moses Chorænæus (p. 69) calls him
Aderomolus; so, also, Abydenus (in Euseb. Chron. Arm., i, 30), who makes him the son and murderer of Nergal, Sennacherib's immediate successor (see Hitz., Begriff d. Kritik, p. 194 sq.); while, according to Alexander Polyhistor (in Euseb. Chron. Arm., i, 48), Sennacherib was assassinated by his own command, according to Col. Rawlinson (Outlines of Assyrian History, also in the Lond. Athenæum, March 18 and April 15, 1854) thinks he has deciphered the names of two Assyrian kings called Adramelech, one about 800 and the other 15 years anterior to Sennacherib; but neither of them can be the one referred to in Scripture.

ADRAMYTTEUM (Ἀδραμυττεῖον or Αδραμυττοῦν [also Αδραμύττος, see Poppo's Theser., ii, 441 sq.], and Αδραμυττίους, Plin. v, 82), in the N. T. only in the adj. 'Ἀδραμυττῆνη, Αδραμυττητός', a city of Asia Minor, on the coast of Mysia, (Ἑλλία, according to Mela, i, 18), and at the head of an extensive bay (Sinus Adramyttæns) facing the island of Lesbos and at the foot of Mount Ida. See MYTILENE. Strabo (xiii, p. 806) and Herodotus (vii, 42) make it an Athenian colony (comp. Pausan. iv, 27, 5; Xenoph. Anab. vii, 8, 8; Livy, xxxvii, 19). Stephanus Byzantinus follows Aristotéles, and mentions Adramys, the brother of Cresus, as its founder (hence the name). This last is more probably the true account, except that an adjacent district bore the name of Lydia. According, however, to Eustathius and other commentators, the place existed before the Trojan war, and was no other than the Pedasus of Homer (Plin. v, 38). Thucydides (v, 1; viii, 108) also mentions a settlement made here by those inhabitants of Delos who had been expelled by the Athenians, B.C. 422. The city became a place of importance under the kings of Pergamus, and continued so in the time of the Roman power, although it suffered severely during the war with Mithridates (Strabo, 605). Under the Romans it was the seat of the Conventus Juridicus for the province of Asia (q. v.), i.e. the court-town of the district (Pliny, v, 22). It is mentioned in Scripture only (Acts xxvii, 2) from the fact that the ship in which Paul embarked at Caesarea as a prisoner on his way to Italy, belonged to Adramyttæum (σκόλον Ἀδραμυττητοῦν Ρ. Ἀδραμυττῆνην, see Wetstein in loc.). It was rare to find a vessel going direct from Palestine to Italy. The usual course, therefore, was to embark in some ship bound to one of the ports of Asia Minor, and there go on board a vessel sailing for Italy. This was the course taken by the centurion who had charge of Paul. Ships of Adramyttæum must have been frequent on this coast, for it was a place of considerable traffic. It lay on the great Roman road between Amos, Troas, and the Hellespont on one side, and Pergamus, Ephesus, and Miletus on the other, and was connected by similar roads with the interior of the country. The ship of Adramyttæum took them to Myra, in Lycia, and here they embarked in an Asian vessel bound for Italy (see Conybeare and Howitt's Life of St. Paul, iii, 219), accompanied by a powerful squadron of Roman war-vessels (Hammond, Grotius, Witsius, etc.) strongly suppose that Adramyttæum (see Tzschucke, ad Med. i, 7, 2) in Africa (Plin. v, 8; Ptol. iv, 8; Appian, Syr. xxxiii, 47; comp. Shaw, Trans. p. 96 sq.) was the port to which the ship belonged. Adramyttæum is still called Edromid or Adramati (Fellows, Asia Minor, p. 52; comp. Pococke, Trans. ii, 11, 16). It is built on a hill, contains about 1000 houses, and is still a place of some commerce (Turner, Tour, iii, 265). The general appearance of the place, however, is poor, the houses being meanly built, and inhabited principally by Greek fishermen (Büsching, Erdbesch. v, 91). From medals struck in this town, it appears that it celebrated the worship of Castor and Pollux (Acts xxvii, 11), as also that of Jupiter and Minerva (whose effigies appear in the preceding cut).

A'dria, or A'driatic Sea (Ἀδριατικὴ ἀκρωτηρῖα, Acts xxvii, 27), the modern Gulf of Venice (Forbiger, Alte Geogr. ii, 36 sq.). It derives its name from the city Adria, in Cisalpine Gaul, on the river Po, now called Atri. The name Adriatic is now confined to the gulf lying between Italy on one side and the coasts of Dalmatia and Albania on the other (comp. Pliny, iii, 16, 29). But in Paul's time it extended to all that part of the Mediterranean between Crete and Sicily (Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.). Thus Ptolemy (iii, 16) says that Sicily was bounded on the east by the Adriatic, and that Crete was bounded by the Adriatic on the west; and Strabo (ii, p. 185; vii, p. 488) says that the Ionian Gulf was a part of what was in his time called the Adriatic Sea (comp. Eustath. ad Dionys. Perig. p. 163, 168, ed. Bernhardy; Josephus, Life, 3). This obviates the necessity of finding the island of Melita (q. v.) on which the ship was shipwrecked, on the Adriatic gulf (Hackett's Comment. in loc.). See Stirr-wreck. On the modern navigation, see M'Culloch's Gazetteer, s. v.

A'drian, Emperor. See Hadrian.

A'drian, abbot of the monastery of Neridan, near Naples. Pope Vitalian selected him to fill the vacant see of Canterbury, but he refused, and induced the pope to select Theodore instead, promising that he would accompany him. Theodore was consecrated in 668; and upon their arrival in England, after a very long journey, Adrian was made abbot of the monastery of St. Augustine at Canterbury. By their united efforts the Church in England was brought into strict conformity with that of Rome. He died January 9th, 708.—Bede, Hist. Ecc. iv, 1; Hook, Antiquities, i, 66.

A'driano, Pope, elected in the room of Stephen III, Feb. 9th, 772. He was a man of large mental endowments and great perseverance, and all his powers were studiously devoted to the enlargement of the papal power. Charlemagne, after defeating Desiderius and destroying the power of the Longobards in Italy in 774, went to Rome, where Adrian received him with high honors, and, by the seating him in the chair of St. Peter, conceded to him the name of king of Italy and patriarch of Rome. Charlemagne, in turn, confirmed the grants made by Pepin to the Roman See, and added also Ancona and Benevento. In a letter to Charle-magne, Adrian flatters him with the title of noster Christianissimus Constantiæ. Charlemagne visited Rome again in 787, when Adrian christened his son Pepin. In the same period, upon the invitation of the Emperor Irene of Constantinople, Adrian sent legates to the second Ecumenical Synod of Nice, by which image-worship was sanctioned. See Nicæ. In 794 he sent legates to the synod of Frankfort, which was presided over by Charlemagne, and condemned the Adoptanists (q. v.), but also image-worship, although he showed a desire for reconciliation. Adrian, in a charter of the king (Mag. Car. viii, III, 1), had declared, "Si quis sanctas imaginés Domini nostrí Jesu Christi et ejus genetrix atque omnium sanctorum secundum St. Pòtrum doctrinam venerari noluerit, anathema sit." Adrian wrote against the theological opinions of Felix of Urgel, and through his endeavors the Gregorian chant and rite were introduced into Spain at Metz, and subsequently in other churches of the empire. His fame is tarnished (see Rudolph, De Codicis Conmonium quum Adrimonis I Carolo Magno dedit, Erod. 1777) by the use which he made of the Pseudo-Isidorean Decretals (q. v.). He died Dec. 25, 795, having occupied the see twenty-three years. In spite of his dispute with Charlemagne about image-worship, and also of the fact that he attempted a reply to the "Caroline books" (q. v.) in his Libellus responsorius ad Carolum Magnus pro Synodo Ne. II, it is certain that Charlemagne was greatly distressed by his death. His Inpsoge SS. Literarum may be found in the Critici Sacri, 4th ed., Hofr, Biographia Sacra, n. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, v. 447.

II. Pope, a native of Rome, elected Dec. 14th, 867, at the age of seventy-five, having twice before refused the pontificate. His term of office was almost wholly occupied in disputes with Lothaire, Charles the Bald, and the Greek Church. In the war of Charles the Bald against Louis II, Adrian declared in favor of the latter, and threatened every one with the "censure of the apostolic vengeance" (apostolice uinum censuram) who should dare to invade the country "contrary to the divine and the apostolic will." This papal interference in secular affairs was, however, sternly opposed by Archbishop Hincmar (q. v.) of Rheims. In letters to Charles the Bald and the synod of Dunicaum (873), which was presided over by Bishop Hincheim, notwithstanding his appeal to the pope, Adrian put forth the claim that bishops should be only deposed by the pope, not by particular synods. Charles the Bald renounced, however, so energetically against this claim, that Adrian endeavored to gain his object by flatteries. Among others, Adrian was made, according to 4th V, n. 373, 41, 448, to act as arbiter between the Patriarch Photius of Constantinople and his opponent Ignatius. Adrian deposed Photius in a synod at Rome, and he sent delegates to the synod of Constantinople (869), which repeated the sentence against Photius. During the pontificate of Adrian a synod was held at Rome which prohibited the marriage of priests. In the year 1164, December 4, he was elected pope, and received the felicitations of Henry II of England, whose ambassadors were accompanied by the monks of St. Alban's, whom he mildly rebuked for having rejected him from their society in his youth on account of his ignorance. In the following year he placed under an interdict the city of Rome, because the followers of Arnold of Brescia had wounded a cardinal. The Romans were compelled to expel Arnold, who fell into the hands of Frederic Barbarossa, and the latter was prevailed upon by the pope to deliver Arnold over to him. Adrian then met the emperor at Lutri, and compelled him to hold his stirrup. Frederic abandoned the pope to Rome, and was crowned emperor (1156). Adrian also communicated King William of Sicily as a usurper of church property, raised his subjects against him, and put himself at the head of an army against the king. The latter finally had to consent to receive his kingdom as a papal fief. A letter of Adrian's to the emper or and the German bishops, in which he stated that he had conferred the crown upon the emperor, and that the emperor had received benefits from him, led to a new conflict between him and the emperor, in which the German bishops generally sided with the latter. Adrian, however, in his defense of the actions of the imperial commissioners who were sent to administer justice at Rome without his participation; he maintained that the patrimony of the Church should be exempt from paying foderum, or feudal tribute to the emperor; and, lastly, he claimed the restitution of the lands and revenues of Countess Matilda, of Tusc, of Beaufort, and even the duchy of Sardinia. Thus arose that spirit of bitter hostility between the popes and the house of Hohenstaufen, which lasted until the utter extinction of the latter. The pope was on the point of excommunicating the emperor when he died, September 1, 1159, so poor that he commended the support of his mother to the church of Canterbury. He transferred the pontifical see first to Orvieto, and afterward to Anagni, where he resided until his death. He was the founder of the penney tributum to the papal chair in Ireland. He was also the author of dispensations concerning the accumulation of ecclesiastical benefices, and the residence-duty of the bishop. He died at Rheims, and was buried at St. Andrew, near Parma, and at Canterbury. In the latter capacity he held a synod in the church of St. Paul at London in 1268, where the Thirty-six Constitutions, known as those of Othothen, were published. On the 12th of July, 1276, he was elected pope, but was carried off by a sudden illness on the 18th of August in the same year, before his consecration.—Biog. Univ. 1.; London, Eccles. Dictionary, i, 110.

VI. Pope, born at Utrecht, in 1459, of very humble parents, who could not afford to educate him. He was placed, however, in one of the charitable foundations at Louvain, and was soon distinguished for piety and diligence in study. He was professor of theology, and subsequently chancellor of the university of Louvain. In 1482, he was appointed bishop of St. Rufus, near Arras, where he had preached, and was ever after his friend, and sided in raising him to the papal chair (Rosch, Jts over Paus Adrianus VI, Utrecht, 1896; Höfner, Die deutschen Päpste). He had, in 1517, been created cardinal by Leo X, and on his death Adrian was elected pope, January 9, 1522, at a time when all Germany was in the flame of the Lutheran Reformation. Adrian set himself reform of the clergy, and to put down the Reformation. In his letter to the Diet of Nuremberg, 1522, in which he urged that Luther should be cut off as Huss and Jerome had been, he still admitted that Luther's charges against the corruptions of the Church were just. "Confess, Adrian," they cried to the pope, "that God hath permitted this schism and this persecution for the sins of mankind, and above all for those of the priests and prelates of the Church.... For we know that many scandalous things have been done in this holy see, abuses of spiritual matters, and excessive ordinances and decrees which have emanated from it," etc. He always refused to advance his own relations to any dignity in the Church. After filling the papal chair during twenty months, he died, September 14, 1529. He was greatly hated by the Romans, whom his dislike to all luxuries and vain expenses offended. In December, 1516, when the death of Ferrold, the Catholic was considered to be immi-

ADULLAM

ADULLAM (Heb. Adullam), גַּלְּעָד, prob. justice of the people; Sept. Ὅδοιῷα, Odolam; and so in the Apocrypha, 2 Macc. xii, 38, and Josephus, Ant. viii, 10, 1; but Adullam, Ἀδουλλαμή, in Ant. vi. 12, 8, an old city (Gen. xxxviii, 1, 12, 20) in the plain country of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv, 52), and one of the royal cities of the Canaanites (Josh. xii, 15). It was one of the towns which Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. xi, 7, Micah i, 15), and is mentioned after the captivity (Neh. xi, 80; 2 Macc. xii, 38). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s. v.) state that it existed in their time as a large village, ten miles to the east of Elathopolis, by which (unless, as Reland thinks, Palestine, p. 547, they confound it with Eglon) they probably mean north-east (Keil, Comment, in loc. Josh.; Schwar. Palestine, p. 87), possibly at el-Khir, near Tumattal (comp. Gen. xxxviii, 12); or perhaps (see Tholuck, Dr. W. Wimmer, p. 150) called Beth Ul (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 582). It is evident that Adullam was one of the cities of "the valley" or plain between the hill country of Judah and the sea; and from its place in the lists of names (especially 2 Chron. xi, 8), it appears to have been not very far from the Philistine city of Gath.

This circumstance would seem to show that the cave of Adullam (2 Sam. xxiii, 18; 1 Chron. xi, 15), to which David withdrew immediately from Gath (1 Sam. xxii, 1), was near the city of that name (see Stanley, Palestine, p. 254, note). But there is no passage of Scripture which connects the city and the cave, and it is certainly not in a plain that one would look for a cave capable of affording a secure retreat to 400 men; nor has any such cave been found in that quarter. It is therefore far from improbable that the cave of Adullam was in the mountainous wilderness in the east of Judah toward the Dead Sea, where such caves occur, and where the western names (as Carmel) are sometimes repeated. Accordingly, we suspect that in this very region the name Dhuliam, belonging to a tribe of Arabs who encamp here for pasturage, but properly belong to a more western district around Beer-sheba (Robinson's Researches, ii, 475), and whose predatory character well befits the ancient notoriety of the spot (De Saulcy's Narrative, i, 484, 485) is the same nomadic habit which has transferred the name of the city to the cave in former times likewise. This view is favored by the fact that the usual haunts of David were in this quarter (1 Chron. xi, 15); whence he moved into the land of Moab, which was quite contiguous, whereas he must have crossed the whole breadth of the land, if the cave of Adullam had been near the city of that name. Tradition (William of Tyre, De Bello Sacro, xvi, 6) fixes the cave on the borders of the Dead Sea, about six miles south-east of Bethlehem, in the side of a deep ravine (Wady Khureitum) which passes below the Frank mountain on the south (Robinson's Researches, i, 175). It is an immense cave, with a central cavern, the mouth of which can be approached only on foot along the side of the cliff. It is a cliff, and Mangles, who visited it without being aware that it was the reputed cave of Adullam, state that it "runs in by a long, winding, narrow passage, with small chambers or cavities on either side. We were soon come to a large chamber with natural arches of great height; from this last there were numerous passages, leading in all directions, occasionally joined by others at right angles, and forming a perfect labyrinth, which our guides as sured us had never been perfectly explored, the people being afraid of losing themselves. The passages are generally four feet high by three feet wide, and were all on a level with each other. There were a few petrifications where we were; nevertheless the grotto was perfectly clean, and the air pure and good” (Travecis, p. 440, 441). It seems probable that David, as a native, must have been well acquainted with this remarkable spot, and had probably often “availed himself of its shelter when out with his father’s flocks.” Dr. Thomson, who explored it to some extent, thinks that it corresponds to the Biblical account of David’s fastness (Land and Book, ii, 427). Others (as in the instance of the caves in the question was one of the numerous excavations found in the soft lime-stone hills along the eastern edge of the “plain” of Judah, particularly those at Deir Dub-ban (Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 156, 157); but these are evidently artificial, being apparently enlargements of naturally small crevices for the purpose of magazines of grain (Robinson, Researches, ii, 852, 855, 393, 396).—Kitto, s. v. See CAVE (of ADULLAM); ODOLLAM.

ADULTERATE (Heb. ADULLAM, עדלמה, Sept. “Oδολλαμίτης,” probably an inhabitant of the city called ADULLAM (Gen. xxxiii, 1, 12, 20).

ADULTERATE. Baptism. See BAPTISM.

ADULTERY (some form of the verb אָדָל, הָאָדָל, possibly) commonly denotes the sexual intercourse of a married woman with any other man than her husband, or of a married man with any other woman than his wife. See MARRIAGE.

1. Nature of the Crime. Among the Hebrews, as in other Oriental nations, adultery was the act whereby any married man was exposed to the risk of having a spurious offspring imposed upon him. An adulterer was, therefore, any man who had illicit intercourse with a married or betrothed woman; and an adulteress was a betrothed or married woman who had intercourse with any other man than her husband. An intercourse between a married man and an unmarried woman was simply fornication—a great sin, but not, like adultery, involving the contingency of polluting a descent, of turning aside an inheritance, or of imposing upon a man a charge which did not belong to him. The law which was thus to the social wrong, against which society protected itself by much severer penalties than attended an unchaste act not involving the same contingencies.

This Oriental limitation of adultery is intimately connected with the existence of polygamy. If a Jew was betrothed to a woman who was the concubine, or his slave, he was guilty of unchastity, but committed no offence which gave a wife reason to complain that her legal rights had been infringed. If, however, the woman with whom he was associated was the wife of another, he was guilty of adultery—not by infringing his own marriage covenant, but by causing a social wrong, which was thus already existing between this woman and her husband (Michaelis, Monatliches Recht, a. 259; Jahn’s Archäologie, Th. i, b. 2, § 183). See POLYGAMY.

2. Roman. It seems that the Roman law made the same important distinction with the Hebrew between the infidelity of the husband and of the wife, by defining adultery to be the violation of another man’s bed (violatio iuris alieni); so that the infidelity of the husband could not constitute the offence. The more ancient laws of Rome, which were very severe against the offence of the wife, were allent as that of the husband (Smith’s Dict. of Class. Antiq.). See WIFE.

3. Spiritual. Adultery, in the symbolic language of the Old Testament, means idolatry and apostasy from the worship of the true God (Jer. ii, 23; Ezek. xvi, 32; xxiii, 87; also Rev. ii, 22). Hence an adulteres meant an apostate Church or city, particularly “the daughter of Jerusalem,” or the Jewish Church and people (Isa. i, 21; Jer. iii, 6, 8; 9; Ezek. xvi, 22; xxiii, 7). This figure resulted from the primary one, which describes the connection between God and his separated people as a marriage between him and them (Jer. ii, 2; iii, 14; xiii, 27; xxxi, 82; Hos. vii, 5).

By an application of the same figure, “an adulterous generation” (Matt. xxi, 39; xvi, 4; Mark viii, 38) means a faithless and impious generation. See FORNICATION.

11. Trial of Adultery. The Mosaic trial of the suspected wife by the bitter water, called the water of jealousy (Num. v, 11-31)—the only ordeal in use among the Israelites, or sanctioned by their law—is to be regarded as an attempt to mitigate and bring under legal control an old custom which could not be ex-tincted by legislation. The object of the trial was not intended to limit the application of this test. (1) By prescribing certain facts presumptive of guilt, to be established on oath by two witnesses, or a preponder-ating but not conclusive testimony to the fact of the woman’s adultery. (2) By technical rules of evidence which made proof of those presumptive facts dif-cult (see the Talmudic tract Sotah, v, 2-5). (3) By exempting certain large classes of women (all, indeed, except a pure Israelite married to a pure Israelite, and some even of them) from the liability. (4) By providing that the trial could only be before the great Sanhedrin (Sotah, i, 4). (5) By restricting it with a certain humiliation and infamy, which still harmonized with the spirit of the whole ordeal as recorded in Num. v; but, (6) above all, by the conventional and even mercenary light in which the nuptial contract was latterly regarded. (See Sincou, Works, ii, 1.)

When adultery ceased to be capital, as no doubt it did, and divorce became a matter of more convenience, it would be absurd to suppose that this trial was continued; and when adultery became common, as the Jews themselves confess, it would have been impious to expect the miracle which it supposed. If ever the Sanhedrin were driven by force of circumstances to adopt this trial, no doubt every effort was used, nay, was prescribed (Sotah, i, 5, 6), to overawe the culprit and induce confession. Nay, even if she submitted to the trial, and was really guilty, some rabbi held that the effect on her might be suspended for years through the merit of some good deed (Sotah, iii, 4-6). Besides, it is argued that the verdict of the trial was irrevocable, so that the man was likely to feel the public exposure of his suspicious oaths and repulsive. Divorce was a ready and quiet remedy; and the only question was, whether the divorce should carry the dowry and the property which she had brought, which was decided by the still prevalent custom (Sotah, vi, 1; Gemara, Ketuboth, vii, 6; Ugodino, Uxor Hev. c. vii). If the husband were incapable, through derangement, imprisonment, etc., of acting on his own behalf in the matter, the Sanhedrin proceeded in his name as concerned the dowry, but not as concerned the trial by the water of jealousy (Sotah, iv, 6).

12. Jealousy. This ordeal was probably of the kind which we still find in Western Africa, the trial by red water, as it is called, although varying among different nations in minute particulars, and a comparison of the two may suggest the real points of the evil which the law on Moses (Ex. xxii, 16) prescribed for the woman which it was calculated to secure. This ordeal is in some tribes confined to the case of adultery, but in others it is used in all crimes. In Africa the drink, in cases of proper ordeal, is poisonous, and calculated to produce the effects which the oath impregnates; whereas in the “water of jealousy,” however unpleasant, which it was calculated to secure.

draught, and attended by such awful imprecations, was believed to be visitable with immediate death from heaven. On the Gold Coast the ordinary oath-drink (not poisonous) is used as a confirmation of all oaths, not only oaths of purgation, but of accusation, or even of obligation. In all cases it is accompanied with an imposition, that if the oath be really perjured, they shall speak untruly, or do not perform the terms of their obligation; and it is firmly believed that no one who is perjured under this form of oath will live an hour (Villaut; Bosman). Doubtless the impression with respect to this mere oath-drink is derived from observation of the case supposed to possess the act of perjury in solemn form; and the popular opinion regards such an oath as of so solemn a nature that perjury is sure to bring down immediate punishment. The red water, as an ordeal, is confined to crimes of the worst class. These are murder, adultery, witchcraft. Perhaps this arises less from choice than from the fact that such crimes are not only the highest, but are the least capable of that direct proof for which the ordeal is intended as a substitute. A party is accused: if he denies the crime, he is required to drink the red water, and, on refusing, is deemed guilty of the offence. The trial is so much dreaded that innocent persons often confess themselves guilty, and cut off their hands to save their lives. The immediate effect is supposed to result less from the water itself than from the terrible oath with which it is drunk. So the person who drinks the red water invokes the fiend to destroy him if he is really guilty of the offence with which he is charged. The drink is made by an infusion in water of pieces of a certain tree or of herbs, and, if rightly prepared, the only chance of escape is the rejection of it by the stomach, in which case the party is deemed innocent, as he also is if, being retained, it has no sensible effect, which can only be the case when the priests, who have the management of the matter, are influenced by private considerations or by reference to the probabilities of the case, to prepare the draught with a view to acquittal. The imprecations upon the accused if he be guilty are repeated in an awful manner by the priests, and the effect is watched very keenly. If the party seems affected by the draught, like one intoxicated, and be not able to stand, he is brought unharmed, undoubtedly guilty, and is slain on the spot; or else he is left to the operation of the poisonous draught, which causes the body to swell and burst, and occasions death. (Barbot, p. 126; Bosman, p. 148; Artus, in De Bry, vi, 62; Villaut, p. 191; Corry's Windward Islands, pp. 148, 149; London, No. xxvii; Davis's Journal, p. 24.) See Poison.

Traces of a similar ancient custom may be produced from other quarters. Hesiod (Theogon, 755-95) reports that when a falsehood had been told by any of the gods, Jupiter was wont to send Iris to bring some water out of the river Styx in a golden vessel; upon this an oath was taken, and if the god aforesaid falsely remained for a whole year without life or motion. There was an ancient temple in Sicily, in which there were two very deep basins, called Delli, always full of hot and sulphurous water, but never running over. Here the more solemn oaths were taken; and perjuries were immediately punished most severely (Diod. Sic. xi, 67). This is also mentioned by Aristotle, Silius Italicus, Virgil, and Macrobius; and from the first it would seem that the oath was written upon a ticket and cast into the water. The ticket floated if the oath was true, and sunk if it was false. In the latter case an oracle was followed by an acclaimation, as an act of divine vengeance (q. v.). See Oath.

The trial for suspected adultery by the bitter water amounted to this, that a woman suspected of adultery by her husband was allowed to repel the charge by a public oath of purgation, which oath was designingly made so solemn in itself, and was attended by such awful circumstances, that it was in the highest degree unlikely that it would be dared by any woman not supported by the consciousness of innocence. And the fact that no instance of the actual application of this ordeal occurs in Scripture affords some countenance to the assertion of the Jewish writers, that the trial was so much dreaded by the women that those who were really guilty, yet thought it such a confession; and that thus the trial itself early fell into disuse. And if this mode of trial was only tolerated by Moses, the ultimate neglect of it must have been desired and intended by him. In later times, indeed, it was disputed in the Jewish schools, whether the trial could be placed on the act of perjury, for the extremity, or whether it was not lawful for him to convocate and pardon her act, if he were so inclined. There were some who held that he was bound by his duty to prosecute, while others maintained that it was left to his pleasure (Sotah, xvi, 2). From the same source we learn, that this form of trial was finally abrogated about forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem (see Wagensen's Sota, containing a copious commentary, with full illustrations of this subject, from rabbinical sources, Altendorf, 1674). The reason assigned is, that the men themselves were at that time generally adulterous, and that God would not fulfil the sanctuary of the imprecation in the case of adultery, while the husband was guilty of the same crime (John viii, 1-8). See Ordeal.

III. Penalties of Adultery.—1. Jewish.—By excluding from the name and punishment of adultery the offence which did not involve the enormous wrong of imposing upon a man a suppositional offspring, in a nation where the succession to landed property went entirely by birth, so that a father could not by his testament alienate it from any one who was regarded as his son, the law was enabled, with less severity than if the inferior offence had been included, to punish the crime with death. It is still so punished wherever the practice of polygamy has similarly operated in limiting the crime—not, perhaps, that the law expressly assigns that punishment, but it recognises the right of the injured party to inflict it, and, in fact, leaves it, in a great degree, in his hands. Now death was the punishment of adultery before the time of Moses, and, if he had wished it, his punishment, his law would have been inoperative, for private vengeance, sanctioned by usage, would still have inflicted death. But by adopting it into the law, those restrictions were imposed upon its operation which necessarily arise when the calm inquiry of public justice is substituted for the arbitrary and violent act of an excited hand. Thus death would be less frequently inflicted; and that this effect followed seems to be implied in the fact that the whole Biblical history offers no example of capital punishment for the crime. Indeed, Lightfoot goes farther, and remarks, "I do not remember that I have anywhere, in the Jewish Pannistext, with an example of a woman punished for adultery by death. There is mention (in the Talmud, Sanhed, 242) of the daughter of a certain priest burned for committing fornication in her father's house; but she was not married" (Hor. Heb. ad Matt. xix, 8). Eventually, divorce superseded all other punishment. There are, indeed, some grounds for thinking that the thing had happened before the time of Christ, and we throw it out as a matter of inquiry, whether the Scribes and Pharisees, in attempting to entrap Christ in the matter of the woman taken in adultery (see infra), did not intend to put him between the alternatives of either declaring for the law that already existed, or of making the woman an oblique, but which the law was supposed to command, or of giving his sanction to the apparent infraction of the law, which the substitution of divorce involved (John viii, 1-11). In Matt. v, 22, Christ seems to assume that the practice of divorce for adultery already existed. In later times it certainly did; and Jews who were averse to part with their adulterous wives were compelled to put them away (Maimon. in Gerushin, c. ii). In the passage just referred to our Lord does not appear to render divorce for adultery even in case of adultery; he only permits it in that case alone, by forbidding it in every other. See DIVORCE.

In the law which assigns the punishment of death to adultery (Lev. xx, 10), the mode in which that punishment should be inflicted is not specified, because it was known from custom, or, as the Talmudists contend, but stoning, as we may learn from various passages of Scripture (e.g. Ezek. xvi, 38, 40; John viii, 5); and as, in fact, Moses himself testifies, if we compare Exod. xxxi, 14; xxxv, 2, with Num. xv, 35, 36. If the adulteress was a slave, the guilty parties were both scourged with a leathern whip, the number of lades not exceeding forty. In this instance the adulterer, in addition to the scourging, was subject to the further penalty of bringing a trespas offering (a ram) to the door of the tabernacle, to be offered in his behalf by the priest (Lev. xix, 20-22). Those who wish to enter into the reasons of this distinction in favor of the slave may consult Michaelis (Moasachex Rechel, art. 294). We only observe that the Moslem law, derived from old Arabian usage, only inflicts upon a slave, for this and other crimes, half the punishment incurred by a free person.—Kitto, s. v.

See SLAVERY.

The system of inheritances, on which the policy of Moslem law was based, was threatened by the doubtful offspring caused by this crime, and this secured popular sympathy on the side of morality until a far advanced stage of corruption was reached. Yet, from stoning being made the penalty, we may suppose that the exclusion of private revenge was intended. It is probable that, when that territorial basis of polity passed away—as it did after the captivity—and when, owing to Gentile example, the marriage tie became a looser bond of union, public feeling in regard to adultery changed, and the penalty of death was seldom or never inflicted. Thus, in the case of the woman brought under our Lord's notice (John viii), it is likely that no one then thought of stoning her, in fact, but there remained the written law ready for the purpose of the caviller. It is likely, also, that a divorce in which the adulteress lost her dower [see Dowry], and rights of maintenance, etc. (Gemara, Ketuboth, cap. vii, 6), was the usual remedy suggested to avoid scandal and commiseration for crime. The word תמא אכזבון ("make a public example," Matt. i, 19) probably means to bring to the case before the local Sanhedrim, which was the usual course [see Trial], but which Joseph did not propose to take, preferring repudiation (Buxtorf, De Spona, et Divort. iii, 1-4), because that could be managed privately (לידת).—Smith, s. v.

2. Rom.—As the Roman civil law defined adultery to be "the violation of another man's bed," the husband's incontinence could not constitute the offence. The punishment was left to the discretion of the courts. The penalty for the old law, could be put to death. The most usual mode of taking revenge against the man offending was by mutilating, castrating, or cutting off the nose or ears. The punishment assigned by the lex Julia de adulteris, instituted by Augustus, was banishment, or a heavy fine. It was decreed by Antoninus, that to satisfy the anger of the husband, the husband who brought it must be innocent himself. The offence was not capital until made so by Constantine, in imitation of the Jewish law. Under Marcinus, adulterers were burnt at the stake. Under Constantius and Constans they were burnt, or sewed up in their skin and thrown into the sea. The punishment was mitigated, under Leo and Marcinus, to perpetual banishment or cutting off the nose; and, under Justinian, the wife was only to be scourged, lose her dower, and be shut up in a monastery; or, at the expiration of two years, the husband might take her back again; if he refused, she was shaven, and made a nun. By Théodoricus the shocking practice of public construction, which, however, was soon abolished.

3. Other ancient Nations.—The punishment of cutting off the nose brings to mind the passage in which the prophet Ezekiel (xxiii, 25) after, in the name of the Lord, inquiring of certain cities, says: "And, lo, a courtier (i.e. eunuch) with the Assyrians and Chaldeans, threatens the punishment, "they shall take away thy nose and thy ears," which Jerome states was actually the punishment of adultery in those nations. One or both of these mutilations, most generally that of the nose, were also inflicted by other nations, as the Persians and Egyptians, and even the Romans; but we suspect that among the former, as with the latter, it was less a judicial punishment than a summary infliction by the aggrieved party (Ez. vi, 496). It would also seem that these mutilations were more usually inflicted on the male than the female adulterer. In Egypt, according to the Moslem law, the female punishment, and the man was beaten terribly with rods (Diod. Sic. i, 89, 90). The respect with which the conjugal union was treated in that country in the earliest times is manifested in the history of Abraham (Gen. xxii, 10). See HAREM.

The law is not out of the eyes of the adulterers. In Crete, adulterers were covered with wool as an emblem of their effeminacy, and carried in that dress to the magistrate's house, where a fine was imposed on them, and they were deprived of all their privileges and their share in public business. See PUNISHMENT.

4. Modern.—Among savage nations at the present day the penalties of adultery are generally severe. The Mohammedan code pronounces it a capital offence. It is one of the three crimes which the prophet directs to be expiated by the blood of a Musulman. In some parts of India it is said that any woman may prostitute herself for an elephant, and it is reputed so small a thing to have been rated so high. Adultery is stated to be extremely frequent in Ceylon, although punishable with death. Among the Japanese and some other nations it is punishable only in the woman. On the contrary, in the Marian Islands, the woman is not punishable, but the man is, and the wife and her relations waste his lands, burn him out of his house, and deprive him of all he owns; but if the husband be chicken-hearted, the adultery is not capital; parents will even make a contract with the future husbands of their daughters to allow them the indulgence.

In Portugal an adulteress was condemned to the flames; but the sentence was seldom executed. By the ancient laws of France this crime was punishable with death. Before the Revolution the adulteress was usually condemned to a convent, where the husband could visit her during two years, and take her back if he saw fit. If he did not choose to receive her again by the expiration of this time, her hair was shaven, she took on the habit, and was consecrated to the convent; but the sentence of banishment or confinement was not a capital punishment. In Spain there is no such punishment. In Poland, previous to the establishment of Christianity, the criminal was carried to the market-place, and there fastened by the testicles with a nail; a razor was laid within his reach, and he had the option to execute justice on himself or remain where he was and die. The Saxons consigned the adulteress to the flames, and over her ashes erect- ed a stone pillar on which her pardon was inscribed. King Edmund the Saxon ordered adultery to be pun- ished in the same manner as homicide; and Canute the Dane ordered that the man should be banished, and the woman have her ears and nose cut off. In the time of Henry I it was punished with the loss of the eyes and genitals. Adultery is in England con- sidered as a spiritual offence, cognizable by the spirit- ual courts, where it is punished by fine and penance. The common law allows the party aggrieved only an action and damages. In the United States the pun- ishment of adultery has varied materially at different times, and differs according to the statutes of the sev- eral States. Adultery is, moreover, very seldom pun- ished criminally in the United States.

5. Ecclesiastical.—Constantine qualified adultery as a sacriilege which was to be punished with death. His successors went farther, and placed it on a level with patricide. But the definition of adultery remained, in general, confined to the infidelity of the wife and her accomplice, and for some time the Church did not succeed in establishing with the Romanic nations the conviction that the infidelity of either party de- served an equal punishment. This principle was, on the other hand, carried through in the codes of most of the Christian Germanic States. The penalty was in all cases very severe, and, if there were aggravating circumstances, death. Later, especially since the eighteenth century, the penalty was reduced in all legislations to imprisonment. The canon law pun- ished both adulterer and adulteress with excommuni- cation, and a clergyman who was an accomplice with imprisonment for life. Protestant churches, which are not impeded in the exercise of their juris- diction by a connection with the state, generally ex- clude persons guilty of adultery from church member- ship; while state churches are mostly prevented, in this case as in others, from taking any measures. See DUCALOGUE.

According to the canons of the Roman Church a clerk guilty of adultery was punishable by deposition and perpetual imprisonment in a monastery. Since the Reformation clerks have been deprived of their benefits for the sin of adultery. (See Stillingfleet, Ecc. Cases, p. 92.) See CELEBACY.

IV. Adulteress in the Gospel.—A remarkable exam- ple under the Jewish law in cases of this offence occurs in the account of the "woman taken in adultery" (yevv in me'min kyllymim), given by one of the evan- gelists (John vii, 52, to viii, 11), from which some have supposed that a woman of high rank was com- modeled her act as venial—a view that is readily sub- stituted by Paley (Moral Philosophy, vol. i). It is true, great doubt exists as to the genuineness of the entire passage (see the dissertations of Detmers, Vindiciae aevi uria, etc., Frankf. ad V. 1732; Staudlin, Pericopae de adulterio verba et sententiarum defensio, Goting. 1806, as it is omit- ined in very many of the early MSS. and versions, and greatly corrupted in others (see Tischendorf, 7th ed. in loc.), and rejected by numerous critics of note; yet, as it is retained in some good texts and editions, and as its presence cannot be explained by ascetic or moralist aberrations, since it is not only without a trace of the rigor of the law, but appears as an attempt to adapt the doctrine as to involve serious difficulty in its adjust- ment to the ethics of all who could have been the au- thors of the interpolation), it seems to present strong claims to being true history, if not entitled to its place in the evangelical narrative (see Tregelles, Account of the Text of the N.T. p. 298). The arguments and advocates on both sides in Kuenkel, Com- ment. in loc. See John.

From this narrative, many have supposed that the woman's accusers were themselves guilty of the crime (at that time very common, Mark viii, 38; comp. Matt. xix, 10) which they alleged against her; and as it was not just to receive the accusations of those who are guilty of the evil of which they accuse others, our Lord dismissed them with the most obvious propriety. But it seems enough to suppose that the consciences of these witnesses accused them of such crimes as re- strained their hands from punishing the adulterers, who, perhaps, was guilty, in this instance, of a less enormous sin than they were conscious of, though of another kind. It may be, too, that their malevolent design to entrap our Lord was appealed to by him, and was no slight cause of their confusion, if they wished to found a charge which might affect his life. Their intended murder was worse than the woman's adultery; and if they had their way, she would have been punished, as the woman had suffered some violence. See STONING.

Adum'mim (Heb. Adum'mim, עָדּוֹמָים, the red ones; Sept. Ἀλκατιοῦς), a place on the border between Judah and Benjamin (see Ta'amria), and near the ascending road between Gilgal (and also Jericho) and Jerusalem, "on the south side of the river torrent" (Josh. xv, 7; xvii, 17), which is the position still occupied by the road leading up from Jericho and the Jordan valley to Jerusalem (Robinson, Researches, ii, 280), on the south side of the gorge of the Sorek. See MALEK-ADUMMIM. Several commentators take the name to mean the place of blood (Heb. בְּד), and follow Jerome, who finds the place in the dangerous or moun- tainous part of the road between Jerusalem and Jeri- cho (in his time called corruptly Maledomim; in Greek, Αλκατιοῦς; in Latin, Ascensus rufforum sine rotamenti), and supposed that it was so called from the frequent effusion of blood by the robbers, by whose hands it was much frequented. On see Keil, Con. i, 362. It gives the name to the color of the rocks; these, however, are of limestone. It is possibly a date of some importance far more remote, and is rather derived from some tribe of "red men" [see EDOM] of the earliest inhabitants of the country (see Stanley, Palestine, p. 416 note), doubtless themselves bandits likewise. Indeed, the character of the road was so notorious, that Christ lays the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke x) upon it; and Jerome informs us that Adummin or Adummmim was believed to be the place where the traveller (taken as a real person) "fell among thieves." But adds that it was not a large vil- lage, but at that time a large, and that a fort and garrison was maintained here for the safeguard of travellers (Onomast. a. v. Adummmim, and in Egypt. Palaus). The travellers of the sixteenth and twentieth centuries noticed the ruins of a castle, and supposed it the same as that mentioned by Jerome (Zual-Iart, iv. 30); but the judicious Nau (Voyage Nouveau de la Terre-Sainte, p. 349) perceived that this castle be-toned to the time of the Crusades. Not far from this northwest, called the "khan" (le Khan du Samaritain), in the belief that it was the "inn" to which the Samaritans brought their wounded traveller. The travellers of the present century mention the spot and neighborhood nearly in the same terms as those of older date; and describe the ruins as those of a "khan." (Hamm, 1913). They still all represent the road as still infested by robbers, from whom some of them (as Sr F. Henniker) have not escaped without danger. The place thus indicated is about two thirds the distance from Jerusalem towards Jericho. Dr. Robinson probably means the same by the ruined Khan Nua, not (as other a little south of it) on the way between Jerusalem and Jericho (Researches, ii, 122); and Schwarz speaks of seeing "a very high,
rocky hill composed entirely of pyrites, called by the Arabs Tell Adum, six English miles E.E. of Jerusalem" (Pales. p. 50), apparently the ruined locality, Kalud ed-Dem, observed by Schultz (Bitter, Erdk. xvi, 492) (a ruin on the descent of the mountain from Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 292, and Map).—Kitto, s. v.

Advent (Lat. adventus, sc. Redemtoris), signifies the coming of our Saviour. The name is applied to the season (four weeks in the Roman, Lutheran, and English Churches, six weeks in the Greek Church) preceding Christmas. The origin of this festival as a Church ordinance is not clear. The first notice of it is such as found in the synod of Lerida (A.D. 524),
at which marriages were interdicted from the begining of Advent until Christmas. Casarius of Arles (A.D. 542) has two sermons on Advent, fully implying its ecclesiastical celebration at that time. The four Sundays of Advent, as observed in the Romish Church and the Church of England, were probably introduced into the calendar by Gregory the Great.
It was common from an early period to speak of the coming of Christ as fourfold: his "first coming in the flesh," his coming at the hour of death to receive his faithful followers (according to the expressions used by St. John), his coming at the feast of Jerusalem (Matt. xxiv, 30), and at the day of judgment. According to this fourfold view of the Advent, the "gospels" were chosen for the four Sundays, as was settled in the Western Church by the Homiliarum of Charlemagne. The festival of Advent is intended to accord in the minds of mankind with and to celebrate that once called upon to prepare themselves for the personal coming of Christ, so, according to the idea that the ecclesiastical year should represent the life of the founder of the Church, Christians are exhorting during this festival to look for a spiritual advent of Christ.
The time of the year, when the shortening days are fastening toward the solstice—which almost coincides with the festival of the Nativity—is thought to harmonize with the strain of sentiment proper during Advent. In opposition, possibly, to heathen festivals, observed by ancient Romans and Germans, which took place at the same season, the Roman Church ordained this period as a season of mortification. Advent was supposed to come "in Christ's name" (i.e. of the Saviour's), and a month of fasting should be kept as a time of penitence, according to the words of Christ, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." During these weeks, therefore, public amusements, marriage festivities, and dancing are prohibited, fasts are appointed, and sombre garments used in religious ceremonies. The Protestant Church is free from public recreations and celebrations of marriage during Advent, but fasting is not enjoined. The Church of England and Protestant Episcopal Church observe Advent, but do not prescribe fasts. Advent begins on the first Sunday after November 26, i.e. the Sunday nearest St. Andrew's Day. In the sixth century, the Eastern and Western Churches (following the Nestorians) made Advent the beginning of the Church year instead of Easter. (See Bingham, Orig.
Eccl. bk. xxii, ch. i, § 4; Procter, On Common Prayer,
p. 268.) See Christmas.
On the general subject of the appropriateness of the time of Advent, see khan; le Khan du Samaritain; in the belief that it was the "inn" to which the Samaritans brought the wounded traveller. The travellers of the present century mention the spot and neighborhood nearly in the same
terms as those of older date; and describe the ruins as those of a "khan." (Hamm, 1913). They still all represent the road as still infested by robbers, from whom some of them (as Sr F. Henniker) have not Advent, second. See Millennium.

Adventists, the name of a recent sect of Millen-arians, which owes its origin to William Miller, from whom they are frequently called Millerites. About 1830 Miller began to teach that the "second Advent"
of scriptural times arrived, and that the time was found disciples; among whom was Joshua V. Himes, a member of the "Disciples of Christ" (q. v.), who had a great deal of energy and prophesying spirit. He commenced a journal called The Signs of the Times, and, later, the Advent Herald, to disseminate the doctrines of the sect.
Millerites became chiefly the possessors of the old belief; and, at the time appointed, it is said that thousands were out all night, waiting, in anxiety, for
"the coming of the Lord," according to the prediction of the leaders of the sect. They were disappointed, of course, but many still gave credit to new predictions, fixing the time at new periods. At these succeeding times arrived, the predictions still failed, and many of the believers fell off. There is still in existence, however, a sect bearing the name Adventists, who look for the "coming of the Lord," but who do not fix dates as definitely as Miller. Miller and Himes used to do. A large camp-meeting of Adventists has for many years been annually held at Williamstown.
As to doctrine, they differ from the Evangelical Churches generally only in their peculiar belief in the personal coming of Christ, and his bodily reign with the saints on the earth. They have no regular creed or form of discipline. It is a common belief among them that the wicked will be annihilated. Their numbers are estimated at 20,000. See Millen-arians.—American Christian Recorder, p. 21.

Adversary, in Heb. properly הָעָלָם, Satan (i.e.
Satan, as it signifies, when with the article), an opponent, e. g. in war, a foe (1 Kings v, 18; xi, 14; xxiii, 25; 1 Sam. xxix, 4), in the forum, a plaintiff (Placix, 6; comp. Zech. iii, 1, 2), or generally a resister (2 Sam. xix, 29), as one that holds the way (Num.
xxii, 23; comp. ver. 8). In Greek properly διτέωμαι, one who speaks against us, e. g. in a suit, the complainant (Matt. v, 25; Luke xii, 50); or, generally, an enemy (Luke xviii, 8), specially, the Devil (1 Pet. v, 8). See Accuser.

Advocate (Ἀποστάλλων, PARACLETE), one who pleads the cause of another; also one who exerts, defends, or brings before the tribunal. Papias says that the first advocate was sent with a certain prophe-ciation given to the Holy Spirit by Christ (John xiv, 16; xv, 26; xvi, 7) [see CONFIRMER], and to Christ himself by an apostle (1 John ii, 1; see also Rom.
vi, 34; Heb. vi, 25).

In the forensic sense, advocates or pleaders were not knew. The apostle uses the term "Philetai" (Acts under the dominion of the Romans, and were obliged to transact their law affairs after the Roman manner.
Being then little conversant with the Roman law and with the forms of the jurists, it was necessary for them, in pleading a cause before the Roman magistrates, to obtain the assistance of a Roman lawyer or advocate who was well versed in the Greek and Latin languages (Otii Spicil. Crim. p. 225). In all the Roman provinces such men were found who devoted their time and labor to the pleading of causes and the transacting of other legal business in the provincial courts (Lamprid. Vit. Alex. Ser. c. 44). It also apppears (Cic. pro Cule. c. 80) that many Roman youths who had devoted themselves to forensic business were used to repair to the provinces with the consuls and pra-tors, in order, by managing the causes of the provincials, to fit themselves for more important ones at home. Such an advocate was Tertullius, whom the Jew employed to accuse Paul before Felix (Acts xxiv. 1). It though "Pyrrho, now, in the Temple of Jerusael, which were accessible to the priests alone, especially the sanctuary, or "holy place," and still more to the "holy of holies," or inmost chamber. Ecclesiastical writers also employ it metaphorically to denote the recesses of the heart or spiritual nature, and sometimes to designate the deepest mysteries of divine truth. See

Epigdius, an eminent prelate, was born at Rome,
A.D. 1247, of the illustrious race of Colonna, and carefully educated under Thomas Aquinas and Bonaven-tura. He became in 1287 Augustinian. In 1295 Philipp the Bold brought him to Paris to be tutor to his son. He afterward taught philosophy and theology for many years in the university of Paris with so great fame that he was styled doctor fundamentis, theologiorum primum. He was a very voluminous writer, but many of his writings remain in MSS. Among those published are : De Peccato Originali (printed at Oxford, 4to, 1470); Questions Metaphysica (Venice, 1501); Lucubraciones de P. Lombardi Sententiae (Basel, 1823).
In 1299 he was made general of his Augustinian order;
and in 1296 bishop of Bourges. He died Sept. 22, 1316.—

Elfric, ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, consecrated in 996, died in 1066, was a scholar to whom we are indebted for much of our present knowledge of Anglo-Saxon literature. He wrote a Treatise of the Old and New Testaments in Saxon ; also a Paschal Homily in Latin and Saxon; in the latter of which he declares himself against the papal doctrine of transubstantia-tion. Many of his works exist, it is said, in MS., and some few have been published, one in Saxon, viz.
Tract. de V. et N. Testamento; and others in Latin, viz.
the Paschal Homily. Also two letters, one to Wal-finus, bishop of Sherborne or Salisbury; the other to Wulfstanus, archbishop of York, on the same subject, printed at London in 1566, 1625, and 1656. There is, moreover, in the collection of Cottons (Huntington i, 256.
and Lolle, i, 1003), a letter of this拱hispope to Wulffinus, containing a sort of ritual for priests.—Cave,

Elfric, partly contemporary with the last, and with him, apparently, educated by Ethelwold, who was at the time abbot of Abingdon. On the removal of Ethelwold to the see of Winchester in 993, Elfric succeeded him at Abingdon. He died in 1006, and was buried at Abingdon. By many he is believed to have been the same with the last-mentioned Elfric, and the question is involved in extreme obscurity; it is most probable, however, that they were different persons.

He testifies that he heard the African confessors, whose tormentors were the judges of Rome, say, that when the saints had, used to cut out, speak. He wrote the Dialogue called Theophrastus, de Animalium Immortalitate et Corporis Resurrectione, which was printed at Basle, 1516; and has since appeared both in Greek and Latin, in different editions, with the version of Wolius and the Notes of Gaspard Barthius. Ænon (Aiowt, from Chald. ַּיַּו, Ezanah, fountain; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 1001), the name of a place near Salim, where John baptized (John iii, 23); the reason given, "because there was much water (PÉaira rólla, many waters) there," would suggest that he baptized at the springs from which the place took its name. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) places it eight miles to the south of Sebaste (Bethsean), and fifty-three north-east of Jerusalem; and it was evidently (comp. John iii, 26 with i, 23) on the west side of the Jordan (contrary to Kuiñoï and Lampe in loc.; after Zorn, De Ænome, in his Opusc. ii, 71-94; also in Ugolini Theastr. viii), but not necessarily in Judaea (as Wieseler, Chronol. Synop. p. 240). See the curious speculations of Lightfoot (Hist. Chrem. i, 2, 3; 4). Dr. Robinson's most careful search, on his second visit (new ed. of Researches, iii, 333), failed to discover any trace of either name or remains in the locality indicated by Eusebius; but a Salim has been found by him to the east of and close to Nablus, where there are two very copious springs (ib. ii, 279; iii, 298).

This position agrees with the requirements of Gen. xxxiii, 18. See Shalem. In favor of its distance from the Jordan is the consideration that, if close by the river, the evangelist would hardly have drawn attention to the "much water" there. Dr. Barclay is disposed to locate Arnon and Wady Farah, a secluded valley, five miles to the N.E. of Jerusalem, running into the great Wady Fawar immediately above Jericho; but only the grounds for this identification are the copious springs and pools with which W. Farah abounds, and also the presence of the name Selam of Selcam, the appellation of another valley close by (City of the Great King, p. 558-570).—Smith. See Salim.

Ænon (aiow, ai age), originally, the life or duration of any person or thing. In the system of Gnosticism we find the term used to signify spiritual beings who emanated from the Deity, and who presided over the various periods of the history of the world. See Gnostics.

Æphraem, Johannes, originally named Irbæch, was born in 490, in the province of Brandenburg, and studied at Wittenberg, where he imbibed the principles of the Reformers. In 1592 he was appointed pastor at Hamburg, and for many years he contributed to further the cause of the Reformation by preaching, writing, and travelling. He took part against Melanchthon in the Anti-Lutheran controversy (q. v.), but was very moderate and kind in his views and statements. He wrote a work de Purgatorio, and died May 13, 1558. —Adami, Vita Theol.

Æra, a series of years used for chronological purposes, dating from some well-known event. See Epoch.

I. The ancient Jews made use of several eras in their computations: 1. From Gen. vii, 11, and vii, 13, it appears that they reckoned from the lives of the patriarchs, or other illustrious persons. 2. From their departure out of Egypt, and the first institution of their polity (Exod. xix, 1; Num. i, 1; xxxii, 38; 1 Kings vi, 1). 3. After the destruction of the temple (1 Kings ix, 10; 2 Chron. viii, 1), and from the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel. 4. From the commencement of the Babylonian captivity (Ezék. i, 1; xxxiii, 21; xl, 1), and, perhaps, also from their return, and the dedication of the second temple. In course of time, and after the adoption of the years of the Seleucids, which, in the books of Maccabees is called the Æra of the Greeks, and the Alexandrian Æra; it began from the year whenSeleucus Nicarnattained the sovereg power; that is, about 312 years before the birth of Jesus Christ. This era continued in general use among the Orientals, with the exception of the Mohammedans, who employed it, together with their own era, from the flight of Mohammed. The Jews had no other epoch until A.D. 1040, when, being expelled from Asia by the caliphs, they began to date from the Creation, though still without entirely dropping the Æra of the Seleucids. 6. They were accustomed to count their years from the time of their return, and from the year when their princes began to reign. Thus, in 1 Kings xv, 1; Isa. xxxvi, 1; and Jer. i, 2, 8, we have traces of their anciently computing according to the years of their kings; and, in later times (1 Macc., xiii, 42; xiv, 27), according to the years of the Asmonean princes. Of this era a table of computations we have in Matt. ii, 1; Luke i, 5; and iii, 1. 7. Ever since the compilation of the Talmud, the Jews have reckoned their years from the creation of the world, which they fix at B.C. 5761. (See Reland, Antiq. Hebr.; Schlesin Compend. Arch. Heb.; Jahn, Arch. Bibli.) See Chronology.

II. The ancient Britannia used the following eras: 1. The Æra of the First Olympiad is placed in the year of the world 3228, before the Visigothic Æra 776. 2. The taking of Troy by the Greeks, in the year of the world 2820, and B.C. 1184. 3. The voyage undertaken for the purpose of bringing away the golden fleece, in the year of the world 1265. 4. The foundation of Rome, in B.C. 753. 5. The Æra of the Byzantines, in B.C. 477. 6. The Æra of Alexander the Great, or his last victory over Darius, B.C. 380. 7. The Julian Æra, from B.C. 45. 8. In a great part of India, the Æra of Sushanwas, from A.D. 78. 9. In the later part of the Christian era, in the Æra of the Byzantine Æra, D.C. 284. 10. Among the Mohammedans, the Hegira, from A.D. 622. 11. Among the modern Persians, the Æra of Yazdegird, from A.D. 632. See Age.

III. The Christians for a long time had no era of their own, but followed those in common use in the several countries. 1. In the western part of the Roman empire the Consular Æra remained in use until the sixth century after Christ. Frequently also, the years were counted from the accession of an emperor to the throne. 2. The Æra Dioecletiana, beginning with the accession of Diocletian to the throne (284), came into use first, and became very common in Egypt. The Christians who used it gave to it the name Æra Martyrum, on account of the great number of those who suffered martyrdom under the reign of that emperor. It is still used by the Abyssinians and Copts. 3. In the days of Constantine the custom arose to count the years according to Indiction. A cycle of indiction is a period of fifteen years, and the first year of the first cycle is generally considered to correspond with the year of the Christian Æra. The use of the Æra was very common in the Middle Ages. 4. The Æra Hispanicus was in use in Spain from the 5th until the 14th century, when it gave way to the Dionysian Æra. It begins with the year 38 B.C., i.e. the year following the conquest of Spain by Augustus. 5. The Æra of the Seleucids, or Macedonian Æra, begins, according to the computation generally followed, with September 1, B.C. 312, the epoch of the first conquests of Seleucus Nicator in Syria. It is still used in the church year of the Syrian Christians. 6. The Era of Antioch, which was adopted to commemorate the victory of Caesar on the plains of Pharsalus, begins with Sept. 1, B.C. 49, according to the computation of the Greeks, but 11 months later according to that of the Syrians. It is followed by Evagrius in his Ecclesiastical History.

7. The Era of the Armenians begins with the year A.D. 552, in which the Armenians, at the council of Tiboen, separated from the mass of the Eastern Church by rejecting the council of Chalcedon. 8. The Era of Constantinople, or Byzantine Era, begins with the creation of the world, which it fixes 5508 years before the Christian Era. It is still in use among the Albanians, Servians, and modern Greeks.

9. The most common era among Christians is the Dionysian Era (Era Dionysiana), so called after Dionysius Exiguus (q. v.), who proposed it in the sixth century. It counts the years from the birth, or rather the conception of Christ, designating the January of the year in the December of which Christ was born, as the January of the first year post Christum. Christ, according to this calculation, was born in the year 5502 of the era. 10. The German pope incurred censure (i.e. the conception). As the first year post Christum, Dionysius assumes the year 754 from the foundation of Rome, an opinion which has long ago been shown to be incorrect. See NATIVITY. The Dionysian Era was adopted in Rome as early as the middle of the 6th century. The first public transaction which was dated according to it is the Concordium Germanum, a. 742; and the first sovereign who used it was Charlemagne. In the 11th century it was adopted by the popes, since which time its use in the Western Church has been universal.

AETNA, a city noted in the Antonine Itinerary on the way from Damascus to Scythopolis (Bethshean); identified, from an inscription found in its extensive ruins, with the biblical Abila, in the territory of the Amalekites, ed. Koehler, p. 97, now Sunaim, a large Moslem village in the district of Jedur (Ritter, Erdk. xy, 812—317). See AETNAHOTHE-KARNAIM.

AETURIA, a sect which arose about the middle of the fourth century, being the followers of Aetius (different from Arianus and Aetius), a monk and a presbyter of Asia in Pontus, A. D. 355—400. He is charged by Epiphanius, with being an Arian, without just ground. The real cause, perhaps, of the accusation against him was his attempt to reform the Church, by maintaining that a presbyter or elder differ not in order and degree from a bishop; and by rejecting prayers for the dead, with certain fasts and festivals then superstitiously observed. Epiphanius attributes the zeal of Aetius to his being disappointed of the bishopric of Sebastia, which was conferred on his friend Eustathius; but the statements of Epiphanius are evidently colored by his personal prejudice against Aetius. His followers were driven from the churches and out of all the towns and villages, and were obliged to assemble in the woods and open defiles. There was still existing at the time of Augustine. — Epiphanius, Adv. Haece, iv.; Næsander, Ch. Hist. ii, 342, 343; Bingham, b. xvi, ch. 5; Lardner, Works, iv. 179; Walch, Hist. d. Ketzer, iii. 261.

AETUS, a branch of Arrians, from Aetius of Aegina, the most eloquent and learned of the Lacedaemonians. On the name of Aetius, who, after being servant to a grammarian, of whom he learned grammar and logic, was ordained deacon, and at last bishop, by Eudoxus, patriarch of Constantinople (about A.D. 356). He wrote about 300 theological treatises, one of which has been preserved by Epiphanius, who reports that he held that the son was of a nature inferior to the Father (τινός, και οὐκ ἵναι, καὶ αὐξόμενος τοῦ γεγονός καὶ εἰρημένος); that the Holy Spirit was but a creature, made by the Father and the Son before all other creatures. Socrates (Ch. Hist. ii, 83) says that, though his "doctrines were strange to those of the Church, and the abstruseness of his arguments, which they could not comprehend, they pronounced him a heretic." He was said to be well versed in the Aristotelian logic. His doctrine and his disciples were condemned by the Council of Seleucia, A.D. 359. He died about A.D. 367. See Theodore, Ch. Hist. iv, 4; Næsander, Ch. Hist. ii, 399, 405; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 359; Lardner, Works, iii, 584; Walch, Hist. d. Ketzer, ii, 660. See ANOMIANS.

AFFECTION, in a philosophical sense, refers to the manner in which we are affected by any thing for a continuance, whether painful or pleasant; but in the most common sense it may be defined to be a settled bent of mind toward a particular being or thing. It holds a middle place between disposition on the one hand and passion on the other. It is distinguishable from disposition, which, being a branch of one's nature originally, must exist before there can be any opportunity to exert it upon any particular object; whereas affection can never be original, because, having a special relation to a particular object, is cannot exist without the object has once been presented. It is also distinguishable from passion, which, depending on the real or ideal presence of its object, vanishes with its object; whereas affection is a lasting connection, and, like other connections, subsists even when we do not think of the object. See Disposition and Passion. The affections, as they respect religious, may be defined to be the "vigorous and sensible exercises of the inclination and will of the soul toward religious objects." Whatever extremes Stoics or enthusiasts have run into, it is evident that the exercise of the affections is essential to the existence of true religion. It is true, indeed, "that all affectionate devotion is not wise and rational; but it is no less true that all wise and rational devotion must be affectionate." The affections are the springs of action: they belong to our nature, so that, with the highest perceptions of truth and religion, we should be inactive without them. They have considerable influence on men in the common concerns of life, much more if they should operate in those important objects that relate to the Divine Being, the immortality of the soul, and the happiness or misery of a future state! The religion of the most eminent saints has always consisted in the exercise of holy affections. Jesus Christ himself affords us an example of the most lively and vigorous affections; and we have every reason to believe that the employment of heaven consists in the exercise of them. In addition to all which, the Scriptures of truth teach us that religion is nothing if it occupy not the affections (Deut. vi, 4, 5; xxx, 6; Rom. xii, 11; 1 Cor. xiii, 12; xxvii, 14).

A distinction, however, must be made between what may be merely natural and what is truly spiritual. The affections may be excited in a natural way under ordinances by a natural impression (Ezek. xxxiii, 32), by a natural sympathy, or by the natural temperament of our constitution. It is no sign that our affections are spiritual because they are raised very high, produce great effects on the body, excite us to be very zealous in externals, to be always conversing about ourselves, etc. These things are often found in those who are mere professors of religion (Matt. vii, 21, 22).

Now, in order to ascertain whether our affections are excited in the most perfect manner, it is necessary whether that which moves our affections be truly spiritual; whether our consciences be alarmed, and our hearts impressed; whether the judgment be enlightened, and we have a perception of the moral excellency of divine things; and, lastly, whether our af-sections have a holy tendency, and produce the happy effects of obedience to God, humility in ourselves, and justice to our fellow-creatures. Consult Lord Kaimes' "Elements of Criticism," ii, 517; Edwards "On the Affections," Pike and Hayward's "Cases of Conscience," Watts' "Use and Abuse of the Passions;" M'Paurin's "Essay," § 5 and 6, where this subject is ably handled; Jeremy Taylor's "Works," ii, 114, 164; Buck.

Affendofulo, Caleb, a Jewish rabbi, who flourished at Adrianople, Belgrade, and Constantinople in the present century. The name Affendofulo is a compound of the Turkish effendi and the Greek παθός (son). He wrote a commentary on the Song of Solomon and Psalm cxix, with introductions and epilogues to each section, referring sometimes to the divergence of the Karaites from the Rabbins (Vienna, 1830, 4to), besides two other works of a polemical character.—See Fürst, "Bibliotheca Judsica," i, 20, 21.

Affinity (designated in Hebrew by some form of the verb נָתַן, chathan, 'to give in marriage') is relation by marriage, as distinguished from consanguinity, which is relationship by blood.

1. Marriages between persons thus related, in various degrees, which previous usage, in different conditions of life, had allowed, were forbidden by the law of Moses. These degrees are enumerated in Lev. xxviii, 7 sq. The examples before the law are those of Cain and Abel, who, as the necessity of the case required, married their own sisters. Abraham married Sarah, the daughter of his father by another wife; and Jacob married the two sisters Leah and Rachel. In the first instance, and even in the second, there was an obvious consanguinity, and only the last offered a previous relationship of affinity merely. So also, in the prohibition of the law, a consanguinity can be traced in what are usually set down as degrees of affinity merely. The degrees of real affinity interdicted are, that a man shall not (nor a woman in the corresponding relations) marry, (1), his father's widow (not his own mother); (2), the daughter of his father's wife by another husband; (3), the widow of his paternal uncle; (4), nor his brother's widow if he has left children by her; but, if not, he was bound to marry her if she has children to his deceased brother. See Levirate Law. The other restrictions are connected with the condition of polygamy, and they prohibit a man from having, (1), a mother and her daughter for wives at the same time, (2), or two sisters for wives at the same time. These prohibitions, although founded in the natural condition of society, and connected with the peculiarities of the Levitical marriage law, have been imported wholesale into our canon law. The fitness of this is doubted by many; but as, apart from any moral or sanitary questions, the prohibited marriages are such as few would, in the present condition of Occidental society, desire to contract, and such as would be deemed repugnant to good taste and correct manners, there is little real matter of regret in this adoption of the Levitical law.

Indeed the objections have arisen chiefly from a misunderstanding of the last of the above prohibitions, which, under permitted polygamy, forbade a man to have two sisters at once.—An injunction which has been construed under the Christian law, which allows but one wife, to apply equally to the case of a man marrying the sister of a deceased wife. The law itself is rendered in our version, "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, and to bring her to shame in her lifetime" (Lev. xxviii, 18). Clear as this seems, it is still clearer to both Gesenius and others, we take the word נָתַן, natan, rendered to give, to mean to rival, as in the Sept., Arabic, and Vulgate. The Targum of Jonathan, the Mishna, and the celebrated Jewish commentators Jarchi and Ben Gerson, are satisfied that two sisters at once are intended; and there seems an obvious design to prevent the occurrence of such unseemly jealousies and contentions between sister-wives as emblazoned the life of the patriarch Jacob. The more reconcile sense has been extracted, with rather ungentle violence to the principles of Hebrew construction, by making 'vex her' the antecedent of 'in her lifetime,' instead of 'take her sister to her, in her lifetime.' Under this view it is explained that the married sister should not be 'vexed' in her lifetime by the prospect that her sister might succeed her. It may be safely said that such an idea would never have occurred in the East, where unmarried sisters are far more rarely than in Europe brought into such acquaintance with the husband of the married sister as to give occasion for such ' vexation' or 'rivalry' as this.

Yet this view of the matter, which is completely exploded among sound Biblical critics, has received the sanction of several Christian councils (Concil. Ilber. can. 61; Aurat. can. 17; Auzer. can. 30), and is perhaps not calculated to do much harm, except under peculiar circumstances, and except as it may prove a snare to some sincere but weak-minded believers. It may be remarked that, in these codes of law which most resemble that of the Jewish, the general subject, no prohibition of the marriage of two sisters in succession can be found. (See Westhead, "Marriage Code of Israel," London, 1850; Critici Sac. Theol. Nov. i, 379.)—Kitto, s. v. See Marriage.

2. The substance of the Levitical law is adopted in England, and may be found in the "table of degrees which no persons may not marry, which was set forth by Archbishop Parker in 1563, and was confirmed by can. xxix of the synod of London, 1604. See Incest.

3. According to the Roman canon law, affinity arises from marriage or from an unlawful intercourse between a man and his brother's wife, and the blood relation of the other party; but in either case it is necessary that the zuplal sit completa (S. Thomas, 4to, dist. 41, qu. 1, art. 1). Persons related to each other may contract affinity, as the husband with the relations of his wife, without the relations of the parties becoming bound together by any affinity; e.g., two brothers may marry two sisters, a father and his son may marry a mother and her daughter. The impediment of affinity, arising from marriage consummated, extends canonically, as in natural relationship, to the fourth degree included. The impediment of affinity arising ex coitu illicito only extends to the second degree (Concil. Trid. sess. 21, de reform.)

It is ruled in the church that the pope cannot dispense in the first degree of affinity in the direct line, but he can in the indirect; thus he can grant a dispensation to a man to marry his brother's widow. See Consanguinity.

Affirmative (Gr. ἀπαντάω, ἀπαντήσω, etc.). Among the Jews the formula of assent or affirmation was παντί, παντί, παντί, thou hast said, or thou hast rightly said. It is stated by Aryda and others that this is the prevailing mode in which a person expresses assent at this day, in asking a question, especially when he does not wish to assert anything in express terms. This explains the answer of our Saviour to the high-priest Caiaphas (Matt. xxvi, 64), when he was asked whether he was the Christ, the son of God (see also Matt. xxvi, 25, and comp. John xviii, 57).

In the Talmud it is thus stated: 'A Talmudist asked, 'Is Rabbi dead?'' He answered, 'Ye have said: on which they rent their clothes'—taking it for granted from this answer that it was so (Jerusalem Talmud, Kilaim, xxiii, 2).—All readers even of translations are familiar with a frequent elegance of the Scriptures, or rather of the Hebrew language, in using an affirmative to express a negative thought. The affirmative sense is rendered more emphatic: sometimes the negative, first, as Ps. cxviii, 17, 'I shall not die, but live," etc.; sometimes the affirmative first, as asa, xxxi., i. "Thou shalt die, and not live." In John ii, 20, there is a remarkable instance of emphasis produced by a negative being placed between two affirmatives, "And he confessed, and denied not, but confessed, I am not the Christ." —Kitto. See OATH.

AFFRE, DENIS AUGUSTE, a French prelate, was born at St. Remo (Aveyron), Sept. 27, 1738. He became in 1811 professor of philosophy at the first union, having been, in 1816, ordained priest, in 1818 was made professor of theology at the seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris; in 1821, vicar-general of the diocese of Luxon;
in 1823, vicar-general at Amiens; in 1854, canon and honorary vicar-general of Paris. In 1859 he was appointed coadjutor of the bishop of Strasbourg, but, before entering upon his episcopal duties at Strasbourg,
he was, after the death of Archbishop Quelen, of Paris,
appointed one of the three vicars capitular of the diocese, and in 1840 appointed by Louis Philippe archibishop of Paris. He had several conflicts with the government of Louis Philippe, especially upon the enunciation of the Church and social state.

During the insurrection of 1848, he climbed upon a barrack in the Place de la Bastille, carrying a green bough in his hand, as a messenger of peace, and wished to persuade the insurgents to lay down their arms.
He had scarcely uttered a few words when the insurgenents and the troops commenced firing again, and he fell, mortally wounded by a musket ball, coming apparently from a window above. He was carried by the insurgents into the house of a priest, and the next day
was removed to his palace, where he died, June 27, 1848. On the 28th of June the National Assembly passed the following resolution: "The National Assembly considers it its duty to protest against the sentence of religious gratitude and of profound grief which all hearts have felt at the saintly and heroic death of the archbishop of Paris." His writings include Traité de l'administration des Paroisses (1827); Traité des écoles primaires (1826); Traité des appels comme d'alibis; Suprême temporelle du Pape (1829, in the Gallican interest); Propriétés des biens ecclésiastiques; Essai sur les Histoires Egyptiennes (1834, maintaining the insufficiency of the system of Champollion to explain the biographical); Introduction philosopique et à l'étude du Christianisme. See biographies of Archbishop Affre by Henry de Riancy, and Abbé Cruice (subsequently bishop of Marseilles).

AFGHANISTAN, a country of Asia. Its area is esti-minated at 225,000 square miles, and its population at about 4,000,000, most of whom are Mohammedans, belonging partly to the Soonito and partly to the Shitte sects. Hindus, Christians, and Jews are tolerated.
There are besides two Indian sects, which have adherents in the Suts, who hold pantheistic views, and the Mullah Fakirs, who are freethinkers. The clergy (Mullahs) are, at the same time, also teachers.
Schools, in which reading and the Mohammedan religion are taught, are found in almost every village.
The Presbyterian Mission in Northern India has directed its attention also to the neighboring Afghans,
and established, in 1866, the first church among them.
Their missionary, the Rev. Isidor Löwenthal (q. v.), took up his residence at Peschawur, and entered at once with ardor upon his work. Having acquired the difficult language of the Afghans, the Pushtoo, he translated and published in it the New Testament. The first native convert was baptized by him in 1859. —Pierier, News of the Churches, 1869.

AFRA, martyr of Augusta Vindellicorum (Augburg), is reported to have been originally a common prostitute, but Retberg (Kirch. Deutschlands, i., 144) denies it. When the persecution in the time of Dioecletan and Maximianus Herculis occurred Augsburg, Afra was seized and carried before Galus the judge, as a Christian; when Galus could by no means prevail upon her to deny the faith, he condemned her to be burned alive, which sentence was speedily executed (7th of August, 304) upon her, continually, during her agony in the flames, glorifying and blessing God.
Her festival is kept on the 5th of August.—Butler,
Lives of Saints, 227.

AFRICA, one of the four principal divisions of the globe, and the third in magnitude. The origin of its name is uncertain. Its general form is triangular, the northern part being the base, and the southern extremity the vertex. Its length may be reckoned about 70 degrees of latitude, or 4990 miles, and its greatest breadth something more than 4090 miles.

Until the late researches of Livingston and Barth,
its interior was almost unknown.

Only very rough estimates can be made of the population of Africa. They vary from 50,000,000 to 200,000,000 and more. Most of the recent discoveries indicate, however, the existence of a dense population in the interior of Africa, and favor the highest estimates of the aggregate population. The natives are partly negroes, comprising the negroes proper, the Cafres, Betchuanas, Foolaas, Fellataas, Hotentotos, Bushmen, etc.; partly Caucasians, among whom belong the Copts, Egyptians, Arabs, Egyptians, Egipians, Nubians, etc. Malays are to be found in Madagascar, and numerous Europeans have settled in the European colonies.

Until the beginning of the present century a very large portion of Africa was yet entirely unknown to the civilized world. The Arabs, who had extended their rule in Africa in the 7th century, conquered the whole of the northern coast, and became acquainted with the western coast as far as the Senegal, and the eastern coast nearly as far as the Cape of Good Hope.
For a better knowledge of the western coast we are indebted to the Portuguese, who, after the expulsion of the Moors from their country, pursued them to Africa, and gradually advanced southward on the western coast. Steadily pushing forward, they cir-sumnavigated, in 1497, under Vasco de Gama, the Cape of Good Hope, and soon after explored the south-eastern shore. The Portuguese were soon followed by English, Dutch, and French explorers (since 1600), who depended more or less directly on them, and contributed to a better knowledge of the entire coast. But the interior still remained an unknown land; and even the bold travellers who were sent out by the African Society of London (established in 1788) could not overcome the immense obstacles, and many of them,
the Ledyard, Hunt, Houghton, Mungo Park, Horne-
mann, and Röntgen, lost their lives.

Since the beginning of the present century the explo-trations into the interior of Africa have grown rapidly in number and in importance. The progress of the French rule in Algeria and in Senegambia, the increased prosperity of the English colonies, the success of the numerous missionary societies, many of whose missionaries, as Livingstone, Moffat, Knoblecher, Krupf, and Isenberg, belong among the chief explorers of the interior,
the construction of the Suez Canal, and the efforts made by European governments and the Geographical Societies of London, Paris, Berlin, etc., have given a wonderful impulse to the exploration of the interior.
Important discoveries have quickly succeeded each other; and quite recently (1862) even the great problem of many centuries, the discovery of the sources of the Nile, has been successfully solved by Captains Grant and Speke. All these discoveries and explorations have an important bearing upon the prospects of Christianity, and draw us a better idea of the relative importance of the religious views of the natives, of their habits
and their languages, and thus teach the missionaries and the missionary societies what they have to overcome.

The political divisions of Africa are much more numerous than those of any other of the grand divisions of the earth's surface. On the north we have the empire of Morocco, the French province of Algeria, the pashaliks of Tunis, Tripoli, and Barca, and the oasis of Fez, dependencies of the Turkish empire; Egypt, a viceroyalty of the Turkish empire, though in a state of quasi independency. On the east, Nubia and Korzofan, dependencies of Egypt; the empire of Abyssinia, recently enlarged by the subjection of a number of savage tribes; the countries bordering on the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean, and stretching south-westward for more than 1000 miles. The names of the principal countries are Adel, Ajan, Berber, Zanguebar, and Mozambique, the coast of which is Portuguese. The coast of Mozambique is the populous island of Madagascar. In South Africa Great Britain has several important colonies. Cape Colony is the oldest of these, and occupies the southern portion of the continent; above it, on the south-east, are Caffarria, Natal, and the Zulu country; west of these, and separated from them by the Kalambo Mountains, are the Orange River and Transvaal republics, composed mostly of Dutch settlers and their Hottentot or Bechuana dependents. On the west coast, north of the Orange River, and extending about 800 miles into the interior, is the Hottentot country; and lying between this and the Transvaal republics is the Portuguese colony of Natal. South of the Orange River, a country is Lower Guineas, a country composed of numerous chiefdoms and some Portuguese colonies. Among the best known of these chiefdoms are Angola, Congo, and Loango. Between this and the eastern coast lies a vast tract, varying in width from ten to twenty-eight degrees of longitude, and extending from nearly ten degrees above to sixteen degrees below the equator, almost wholly unexplored by Europeans. Upper Guineas, long known as the slave coast, is occupied by several native states, the largest being the kingdom of Dahomey. North of these is that region known formerly as Soudan and Nigritia, composed of numerous and constantly changing states (Borno, Timbuctoo, etc.), part of them Mohammedan, and part pagan. Turning again northward, we find the republic of Liberia and the British colony of Sierra Leone, both settled in great part by free negroes. Lying between this and the Great Desert is the country of the Tuaregs, the larger part of which is already become a dependency of France. England has a settlement, Bathurst, at the mouth of the Gambia. The Great Desert, which extends eastward from this country to the confines of Egypt and Nubia, is inhabited by tribes of Arab, or half Arab origin.

AFRICA was colonized principally by Ham, or his descendants; hence it is called the "land of Ham" in several of the Psalms. See Ham. Mizzrain peopled Egypt (Gen. x, 6, 13, 14), and the Pathrusim, the Naphtuchim, the Calschum, and the Ludim, peopled other parts; but the situations they occupied are not now known distinctly. It is thought that many of the Canaanites, when expelled by Joshua, retired into Africa; and the Mohammedans believe that the Amalekites, who dwelt in ancient times in the neighborhood of Mecca, were forced from thence by the kings descended from Zoram. —Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab. See CANANITE.

The necessary information relative to those places in Africa which are spoken of in Scripture will be found under their respective names, Abyssinia, Alex- andria, Egypt, Ethiopia, Libya, Cyrene, etc.

II. Early Christian Church in Africa. —The continent of Africa, in the ancient Church, contained: 1. The Exarchate of Africa Proper; this contained, in Africa Proconsularis, fourteen dioceses, which numbered fifteen; in Mauritania, eighteen; in Tripoli, five. A list of these is given, from the Notitia of Leo, by Bingham (Orig. Ecd. bk. ix. ch. vii.; see also ch. ii. § 5).

2. The Patriarchate of Alexandria, called also the Egyptian Patriarchate. It comprehended Libya, Pen- tapolis, Egypt, from Tripolis to the Red Sea, and Abyssinia, and contained more than a hundred Episco- pal sees. Thus the whole of the north of Africa was, in the early ages, Christian. In the fifth cen- tury the Vandals, who were Arians, founded an em- pire there. The worst enemies, however, of the Church in Africa were the Greeks, or Oriental Arabs, who, in the seventh and eighth centuries overran the coun- try, and almost entirely extinguished the light of Christianity. The ancient sees which still remain are filled by Coptic prelates [see Coptic], the chief of whom is the patriarch of Alexandria, and dependent upon him is the abuna, or patriarch of the Abyssinians. To the north of the Soudan we know not, the situation is entirely lost, owing to the change wrought in the names of places by the Arabs. Little, then, can be said of the geography, and as little of the chronology, of these bishoprics; for, as to the former, all that we know is the provinces in which they were situated; as to the latter, we have no proofs of the most ancient before the third century, and of very few later than the seventh. —Bingham, Orig. Ecd. ix. 7. See Abyssinia; Alexandria; Ethiopia; Carthage.

III. The Roman Catholic Church. —The circumnavig- ation of Africa in the fifteenth century led to con- quests which opened the way to the establishment of Roman Catholic missions. In Western Africa the population of several entire kingdoms [see Angola; Congo], and of a large number of islands, became, at least nominally, connected with the Roman Church. In Eastern Africa, Mozambique and the islands Bourbon and Mauritius were the principal missionary fields. In Northern Africa several bishoprics were established in the Spanish possessions. The establishment of the French dominion in several parts of Western and Northern Africa, especially in Algeria, likewise enlarged greatly the territory of the Roman Catholic Church and improved its prospects. Also in the Eng- lish possessions a considerable Roman Catholic popu- lation gradually gathered, especially among the Irish immigrants. Great efforts were also made by the Roman missionaries to effect a union of the Copts and Abyssinians with their Church, but without much per- manent success [see Copts; Abyssinia]. Repeatedly Roman missionaries penetrated farther into the interior, but no great results have as yet been obtained. In 1859 there was, outside of the possessions of Christian nations and of Tunis, Tripoli, and Egypt, only one vicariate apostolic for the Gallas.

IV. The Protestant Mission. —Protestantism got a firm footing in Africa after the beginning of the seventeenth century, in the possessions of the Dutch, English, and Danes. The foundation of another Protestant state was laid in 1623 by the establishment of the negro republic Liberia, whose growth and progressive influence is entirely under the control of Protestant Chris- tianity. See Liberia. The missionary operations among the natives were commenced in South Africa, in 1797, by the Moravians. Their early operations, however, were greatly embarrassed by the Dutch colonial gov- ernment, and, for fifty years (1744 to 1792), entirely interrupted. During all this time nothing was done for the conversion of the pagans. The London Mis- sionary Society established its first mission in 1795, the Wesleyan Missionary Society in 1814. In 1820 a mission was established by the Glasgow Missionary Society, a union of members of the Established Church of Scotland and Dissenters. In 1828 this union was dissolved, the members of the Established Church re- taining the name of the Glasgow Missionary Society, and the members of the Dissenting faith the name of the Glasgow African Missionary Society. After the division in the Church of Scotland in 1845, the Glasgow Missionary Society became merged in the foreign mission scheme of the Free Church of Scot- land. The Glasgow African Missionary Society trans-fered its operations, in 1847, to the care of the United Presbyterian Church. The first missionaries of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society came to Africa in 1822, and commenced, in 1830, their present mission among the Bechuana. The American Board resolved in 1834 on a mission among the Zulus, which was commenced in 1835. The Rhenish Missionary Society sent to Africa, in 1829, four graduates of their Mission Seminary at Barmen. Most of the flourishing stations founded by it are within the limits of the territory of the Dutch Boers. The operations of the Berlin Society commenced in 1833; those of the Norwegian Missionary Society, near Port Natal, in 1853. In West Africa the first efforts to introduce the Gospel were singularly disastrous. Attempts made by the Moravians in 1736, and by several English societies since 1755, had soon to be relinquished as hopeless. A permanent settlement was effected by the Church Missionary Society in 1804, which has been very successful, and is still extending its operations on every side. A bishop for Sierra Leone was consecrated in 1851. The English Baptist Missionary Society established in 1841 a flourishing mission at the island of Fernando Po, but it was almost entirely suppressed in 1858 by a new Spanish governor. The missions of the Wesleyan Missionary Society of England commenced as early as 1796, but until 1811 there was only one missionary. They have since become the most flourishing among all the Protestant missions in West Africa. The missions of the American Baptist Missionary Union, in Liberia and among the Basas, commenced in 1821; those of the (American)
Africa

Presbyterian Board, in Liberia, in 1832; of the American Board, at Cape Palmas, in 1834; of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in Liberia, in 1833; of the Southern Baptist Convention of America, in Liberia and Yoruba, in 1855; of the American Missionary Association in the Sherbro country, in 1842; of the Bashi Missionary Society, at the Gold Coast, in 1828; of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, at Cape Palmas, in 1886. A new interest in the missions of Western Africa was awakened in England by the return of Dr. Livingstone, and an enlargement of the missionary operations resolute upon. In Eastern Africa, the island of Madagascar was visited in 1819 by missionaries of the London Missionary Society, and a large number of the natives were converted to Christianity. But the premature death of King Radama in 1828 put a stop to the progress of Christianity, and, in 1856, the mission schools were closed and the missionaries driven from the island. The persecution lasted until the death of Radama's widow, Ranavalona, and the accession to the throne of Radama II in 1861, under whom Christianity was again tolerated, and began to make new progress. The assassination of Radama II, in 1863, had no influence on the legal condition of the Christians, who, in 1864, were supposed to number about 7000. See Madagascar. In Abyssinia, German missionaries of the Basel society have labored in behalf of Protestantism since 1880, without, however, achieving any permanent result. See Abyssinia. Egypt has some flourishing churches, schools, and benevolent institutions for the Protestant residents of foreign countries, and the United Presbyterians of America sustain there a prosperous mission. See Egypt.

V. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The entire population of the Cape Verde, St. Thomas, and Prince's Islands (Portuguese), of the Spanish Presidios and Guinea Islands, and of the French island of Bourbon, belong to the Roman Catholic Church. The same is the case with a majority of the population of the English island of Mauritius and of the European population in Algeria. In Angola and Benguela the Portuguese claim dominion over 637,000, in Mozambique, over 200,000 subjects; but with the decline of the Portuguese power also, the connection of the natives with the Roman Church has to a great extent ceased. Angola had, in 1857, only 6 priests, Mozambique only 3. See also Egypt and Abyssinia. The Roman Church had, in 1839, a total of the Portuguese possessions, 2 in the French, 1 in the English, 2 in the Spanish; and 12 vicarates apostolic, viz., 2 in Egypt (1 Latin and 1 Copt), 1 in Tunisia, 1 in Abyssinia, 1 for the country of the Gallas, 2 for the Cape of Good Hope, 1 for the two Guineas, 1 for Sierra Leone, 1 for Madagascar, 1 for Natal. See Algeria.

The African missions of the Roman Church are mostly supported by the General Missionary Society for the Propagation of Faith. There are, besides, special missionary societies for Africa in France and Austria. The Church of England had, in 1844, the following dioceses: Capetown, Grahamstown, Sierra Leone, St. Thomas, Zanzibar, Zambesi, Zambesi, and Niger, the last three of which are outside of the British possessions. These bishoprics constitute the "Ecclesiastical Province of South Africa," with the Bishop of Capetown as metropolitan. The Wesleyan Methodists, in 1854, had 6 missionary districts (Cape of Good Hope, Grahamstown, Natal, Sierra Leone, Gambia, and the Gold Coast), 75 chapels, 204 chaplains and assistants, 1500 places, 95 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 17,055 members, 18,059 scholars in schools, and 76,453 attendants on public worship. The missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Western Africa are organized into an Annual Conference, which, in 1864, had 200 preachers, 1531 members, 142 probationers, 96 local preachers, 98 native members, 20 schools, 1334 scholars, and 19 churches.

The statistics of the other missionary societies were given by the Journal of Missions, in 1859, as follows:

Other Christian denominations are found only in Egypt and Abyssinia (q. v.). Jews are numerous in all Northern Africa, especially in Morocco, where, before the persecution in 1869, they counted over 300,000 souls. Mohammedanism prevails in Egypt, Tunisia, Tripolis, Algeria, Morocco, Fez, and also throughout Soudan. Dioderri estimated this part of the population at about 100 million souls. The rest are pagans. The following table, taken from Schem's Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, presents the statistics of the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Christian population in the various portions of Africa:

VI. Literature.—The religious aspects of the subject are treated in the following works: Sanchez, Hist. Ecles. Africanae (Madrid, 1784); Morelli, Africa Cristiana (Brescia, 1816, 1820); Münzer, Primor- dita Ecles. Africanae (Hafn, 1829); Lischer, De patrum Africarum moribus (Rosthitz, 1712); Kellogg, North-Afr. Missionists Bible (in the Deutsche Mission), v. 254, etc.; von Gerlach, Gesch. d. Ausbreitung d. Christenth. in Säd-Afrikas (Berlin, 1832). The most recent geographical information is contained in Livingstone's Travels in S. Africa (Lond. 1857, N. Y. 1858); Zambesi (Lond. and N. Y. 1867-1859); Barth's Travels in N. and Cent. Africa (Lond. and N. Y. 1867-1859); Trench's Travels in Eastern Africa (Lond. and N. Y. 1867); Burton, Lake Regions of Cent. Africa (Lond. and N. AFRICAN M. E. CHURCH

African Methodist Episcopal Church, a body of Christians composed entirely of colored people in the United States and Canada.

I. History.—The early Methodists labored zealously for the welfare of the Africans, both slaves and free, in the United States. Multitudes of them became Christians, in the fellowship of the Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.), which, at its General Conference of 1864, organized two new conferences, consisting exclusively of colored members. In 1816, a number of these Methodists, believing that they could be freed and more useful in a separate communion, called a convention in Philadelphia, in April of that year. This was the "African Methodist Episcopal Church." The Rev. Richard Allen (q. v.) was elected first bishop, and was ordained by five presbyters. He served until his death in 1831. In 1828 the Rev. M. Brown was also elected bishop. In 1838 the Rev. E. Waters was ordained bishop. The growth of the Church has been steady, and many of its preachers have been men of ability. It had, in 1858, 8 conferences: Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Ohio, Indiana, New England, Missouri. In 1856 the Canada Conference was organized as a separate body. The civil war which broke out in the United States in 1861, and the gradual destruction of slavery, greatly enlarged the territory of this Church and added to its membership. In May, 1864, the quadrennial General Conference of the Church was held at Philadelphia, simultaneously with the General Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church and of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. The General Conference was called by a deputation from the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, to reciprocate this act of fraternal sentiment, appointed in its turn a committee, consisting of five members, to visit the latter body. A committee was also appointed to muster, with a similar committee appointed by the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, a plan of union of these two denominations, to be laid before the next General Conferences of both.

On June 14, 1864, twenty-five delegates of this Church met, with an equal number of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, at Philadelphia, to consider the terms upon which the two bodies would unite. The session of the joint convention was entirely harmonious. All the arrangements for the consummation of a union were perfected, and all were satisfied that at the next meeting of the General Conferences of the two Churches in 1868 the union would be effected.

On May 15, 1865, Bishop Payne reorganized the South Carolina Annual Conference of the A. M. E. Church. This Church was first established in Charleston forty years ago. Among those concerned in the movement was Morris Brown, the second bishop of the connection. The church then founded existed in poverty for six years, worshiping in a house erected by themselves, when the African M. E. Church as a separate organization was overthrown, and ever since, until the breaking out of the rebellion, the colored people were compelled to worship with the whites, and were brought under the pastoral care of the white pastors. Upon the change, Charleston, Bishop Payne, a native city, and, the laws of South Carolina to the contrary notwithstanding, reorganized an Annual Conference.

II. Doctrines.—The doctrines are the same as those of the Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.).

III. Government.—The bishops preside in the conferences, and when they are styled "Right Reverend." The General Conference is composed of travelling preachers of two years' standing, and of local preachers delegated by the Annual Conference, in the ratio of one to every five travelling preachers. Its sessions are quadrennial. The Annual Conference consists of all the travelling preachers in full connection, and of all local preachers who have been licensed a certain period, and can pass a satisfactory examination. In other respects the government resembles that of the M. E. Church.

IV. Statistics.—From the reports made at the General Conference of 1864 on the constitution of the Church, it appears that in that year the real estate and church property was estimated at about $2,000,000, located in the New England States, the North-western States, in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, and California. The membership of the connection was about 50,000; the number of those attending the Church, 300,000; local preachers, 1000; travelling preachers, 500; ordained ministers, 200; and 8 bishops. Missions had been established in nearly all of the states above named, and the number of missionaries was about 20. The Church had about 1200 day-schools, and 1000 teachers of color, educated at the various institutions of learning in the United States and Canada. Sunday schools had been established in connection with nearly all of the meeting-houses. They were attended by about 200,000 children, and some 200,000 volumes of Sunday-school books were used. The highest literary institution of the denomination is Wilberforce University, which is under the control of the General Conference, and located three miles north of Xenia, Green County, Ohio. It had, in 1864, about 100 students. There are also seminaries at Baltimore, Columbus (O.), Alleghany, and Pittsburg. The school near Columbus has a farm of 172 acres. There are two religious papers, the Christian Recorder, a weekly, issued by the Book Concern at Philadelphia, and the Repository.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, a religious denomination composed entirely of colored Methodists, organized Oct. 25, 1820.

I. History.—This denomination originated in the secession, in 1820, of the Zion congregation of African Methodists, in the city of New York, from the Methodist Episcopal Church. The congregation assigned as the cause of its separation some resolutions passed by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1820, concerning church government. Zion congregation was soon joined by several other congregations, and in 1821 the first Annual Conference was held in the city of New York, which was attended by 22 ministers, and reported the number of members connected with Conference as by 1007. Seven or eight years successively an Annual Conference was convened, each of which appointed its president. At the Annual Conference of 1838, the Rev. Christopher Rush was elected permanent superintendent for four years. In 1847 the denomination had 2 general superintendents, 4 annual conferences (New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore), 75 travelling ministers, from 150 to 200 local preachers and exhorters, 5000 lay members, 50 churches, and many congregations without churches, in 11 states of the Union, the District of Columbia, and Nova Scotia. The General Conference of 1864, held at Philadelphia, declared in favor of a union with the African Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.).

II. Doctrines.—The doctrines are the same as those of the Methodist Episcopal Church (q. v.).

III. Government.—The highest functionsaries of the Church are general superintendents, who are elected to their office every four years by the suffrage of the members of the General Conference. They may be re-elected at the expiration of their terms. The General Conference meets every four years, and is composed of all the travelling ministers of the connection. The Annual Conference is composed of all the travelling ministers of a district. See Rev. Christopher Rush's Hist. of the African Methodist Church (M. Y.).
AFRICANUS, JULIUS (called by Suidas Sextus Julius), was an intimate friend of Origen, an eminent Christian chronicler, and flourished about the year 225. Having been attracted by the fame of Justin the Martyr, a celebrated philosopher, and pupil of Origen, he came to Alexandria to study with him, but he seems to have lived chiefly at Nicopolis (the ancient Emmaus), in Palestine, and to have exerted himself for its restoration; for which purpose, in 220, he made a visit to Antoninus Heliogabalus, to obtain from him permission that the walls of the ruined city should be rebuilt. According to one writer (Hebedjæus, Cat. Cc. Chald. xv, 18), he was bishop of Nicopolis. He died about 232. Africanus wrote a chronological work in five sections under the title of Pentatablos—a sort of universal history, composed to prove the antiquity of true religion and the novelty of paganism. Fragments of this chronological work are extant in the works of Eusebius, Syncellus, Malala, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and in the "Chronicon Paschale." The "Pentatablos" commences with the creation, B.C. 5499, and closes with A.D. 221. The chronology of Africanus places the birth of Christ three years before the commencement of the Christian era. But under the reign of Domitian and the first ten years were taken from the number which had elapsed, and thus the computation of the Church of Alexandria and Antioch were reconciled. According to Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. ed. nova, vii, 9), there exists at Paris a manuscript containing an abstract of the "Pentatablos." Scaliger has borrowed, in his edition of Eusebius, the chronology of Africanus extant in "Ges. Syncellii Chronographia ad Aedem ad Diocletianum, a Jac. Goar." (Gr. et Lat., Paris, 1652, fol.). Africanus wrote a learned letter to Origen, in which he disputes the authenticity of the apocryphal history of Susannah (Bustle, Gr. and Lat. 1674, 4to). A great part of another letter of Africanus to Aristides, reconciling the disagreement between the genealogies of Christ in Matthew and Luke, is extant in Eusebius (bk. vi, ch. xxxi).

It is believed that Africanus was still a pagan when he wrote his work entitled Caesari (Kios, a girdle of Venus), in which he treated of agriculture, medicine, physics, and especially the military art. Hebedjæus, in his catalogue of Chaldean works, mentions a commentary on the N. T. by Africanus, bishop of Emmaus. Finally, a translation of the work of Abdis of Babylon, entitled Historia certaminium apostolici, has been attributed to him, but probably he had nothing to do with it. The fact of a man so learned and intelligent as the chronicler Africanus being a Christian, refutes the error of those who think that all Christians in the first centuries of our era were illiterate. The criticism of Africanus upon the apocryphal books seem to attest that he did not receive the canonical writings of the New Testament without previous examination; and, from his manner of reconciling the different genealogies of Christ, it appears certain that he recognised the authenticity of the Gospels in which they occur.—Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 220; Lardner, Works, ii, 457.

Afternoon (Αφρον, ἀφρόν, noeth ha-gom, the dry's declining, Judg. xix. 8, as in the margin). Hebrews, in conformity with the Mosaic law, reckoned the day from evening to evening, and divided it into six unequal parts.

1. The break of day.
2. The morning, or sunrise.
3. The heat of the day. It begins about nine o'clock (Gen. xviii. 1, 1 Sam. xi, 11).
4. Midday.
5. The cool of the day, literally the wind of the day, from the fact that in Eastern countries a wind commences blowing regularly for a few hours before sunset, and continues till evening.
6. The evening. See Day.

A'g'abas (Ἀγαβᾶς, prob. i. q. Agabal), one of the temple servants, whose "sons" returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v. 80), evidently the Hagob (q. v.) of the genuine text (Esr. ii, 46).

Ag'abas (Hagobas), a fortress near Jerusalem, which, finding it, its governor, restored to Aristobulus, the son of Alexander Jannaeus (Joseph, Ant. xiii. 24, 20). The place cannot well be identified on account of the various readings (see Hudson's ed. i. 602, note), one of which (Ῥαβδαρ) even seems to identify it with Gath-batha (q. v.). It was perhaps the eminence of Gibr'ar (q. v.).

Ag'abas (Hagobas; either from the Heb. ḥgôb, a locust [which even occurs as a proper name, Ezra ii, 40], or ḥgôb, to love; Simon. Onom. N. T. 15, and Wolf, Crit. ii, 1157), the name of a "prophet," supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples of Christ (Walch, De Agabo Vate, Jen. 1759, and in his Diss. ad Act. Ap. ii, 131 sq.). He, with others, came from Judea to Antioch, while Paul and Barnabas (A.D. 49) were there, and announced an approaching famine, which actually occurred that year (Acts xi, 27, 28). Some writers suppose that the famine was general, but it is not probable that all the provinces in Judaea and the reign of Claudius (see Joseph. Ant. xiii. 24, 30). It may be understood that the large terms of the original (ולından יתיכוים) apply not to the whole world, nor even to the whole Roman empire, but, as in Luke i, 1, to Judea only. Statements respecting four famines, which occurred in the reign of Claudius (Onom. N. T. 15, and Wolf, Crit. ii, 1157), are produced by the commentators who support this view (Weisselv. Observ. i. 9, p. 28); and as all the countries put together would not make up a tenth part of the whole Roman empire, they think it plain that the words must be understood to apply to that famine which, in the fourth year of Claudius (Suetonius, Claud. 18), overspread Palestine (see Kunîlî, Comment. in loc.). The poor Jews, in general, were then relieved by the queen of Adiabene, who sent to purchase corn in Egypt for them (Josephus, Ant. xx, 2, 6; 5, 5); and for the relief of the Christians in that country contributions were raised by the brethren at Antioch, and conveyed to Jerusalem by Paul and Barnabas (Acts xi, 29, 30). Many years after this, Agabus met Paul at Caesarea, and warned him of the sufferings which awaited him if he prosecuted his journey to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 10-12), A.D. 55. (See Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, i, 227; ii, 233; Baumgarten, Apostolic, ii. 17). The Greek Church asserts that he suffered martyrdom at Antioch, and holds his festival on the 8th of March (Eichhorn, Bibl. d. bibl. Lit. i, 22, 23; vi, 20).—Kitt, s. v. A'g'ag (Heb. ἀγαγ, ἀγαγ, perhaps, flame; from an Arab. root, in 1 Sam. always written ἀγάγ; Sept. ἀγάγ, but ἀγαγ in Num.), the name of two kings of the Amalekites, and probably a common name of all their kings (Hengstenberg, Pennit. ii, 307), like Pharaoh in Egypt, and Achish or Abimelech among the Philistines. See also AGAOTHE.

A king apparently of one of the hostile neighboring nations, at the time of the Exode (B.C. 1618), referred to by Balaam (Num. xxiv, 7) in a manner implying that the king of the Amalekites was, then at least, a greater monarch, and his people a greater people, than is commonly imagined. See AMALEKITE.

2. A king of the Amalekites, who was spared by Saul, contrary to the solemn vow of devotion to destruction (see ANATHEMA) whereby the nation, as such, had of old precluded itself from giving any quarter to that people (Exod. xvii. 14; Num. xiv. 45). Hence it is supposed that the name Saul, in the form of Saul, ordered Agag to be brought forth. He came "pleasantly," desiring secure the life which the king had spared. But the prophet ordered him to be cut in pieces; and the expression which he employed—"As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women"—indicates that, apart from the obligations of the vow, some such example of retributive justice was intended as had been exercised in the case of Adamiboez; and, in other words, that Agag had made himself infamous by the same treatment of some prisoners of distinction (probably Israelites) as he now received from Samuel (see 1 Kings, 1:10; 1 Samuel, 21:25). This unusual mode in which his death was inflicted strongly supports this conclusion (1 Samuel, 15:6-38). B.C. cir. 1050. Kito, v. See SAMUEL.

Agapé, plural Agare (ἡ ἀγάπη, ἄγαπη), the Greek term for love, used by ecclesiastical writers (most frequently in the plural) to signify the social meal of the primitive Christians, which generally accompanied the Eucharist. The New Testament does not appear to give it the sense of a divine command; it seems to be attributable to the spirit of a religion which is a bond of brotherly union and concord among its professors. It was not a mere social dinner.

1. Much learned research has been spent in tracing the origin of this custom; but, though considerable obscurity may rest on the details, the general historical connection is tolerably obvious. It is true that the ἱεραμοί and ἱεραμώται, and other similar institutions of Greece and Rome, presented some points of resemblance which facilitated both the adoption and the abuse of the Agape by the Gentiles converts of Christianity; but we cannot consider them as the direct models of the latter. If we reflect on the profound impression which the transactions of "the night on which the Lord was betrayed" (1 Cor. xi, 23) must have made on the minds of the apostles, nothing can be conceived more natural, or in closer accordance with the genius of the new dispensation, than a wish to perpetuate the commemoration of his death in connection with their social meal (Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 643; Planning of the Christian Church, i, 27). The profound celebration in which the Eucharist had impressed a sacredness on the repeat of which it formed a part (comp. Matt. xxvi, 26; Mark xiv, 22, with Luke xxii, 20; 1 Cor. xi, 25); and when to this consideration we add the ardent faith and love of the now converts on the one hand, and the loss of property with the dissipation of old convictions and attachments on the other, which must have heightened the feeling of brotherhood, we need not look farther to account for the institution of the Agape, at once a symbol of Christian love and a striking exemplification of its benevolent energy. However soon its purity was soiled, at first it was not undeserving of the eulogy pronounced by Chrysostom, "A love weak and of common use, for it was a supporter of love, a solace of poverty, a moderator of wealth, and a discipline of humility."

Thus the common meal and the Eucharist formed together one whole, and were conjointly denominated Lord's Supper (Δίδυμον τοῦ κυρίου, Δίδυμον εὐαγγελίων) and feast of love (ἡ ἀγάπη, ἡ ἀγαπή). The breaking of bread (ἀρτιὰν ἀρτίαν, Acts ii, 46; κληρικὴν ἀρτίαν, Acts ii, 42; κληρονομικὴν ἀρτίαν, Acts xx, 7). We find the term ἀγαπή thus applied once, at least, in the New Testament (Jude 12). "The promise of good things to come, feasts of charity (ἐν πλούσια πάσιν ἐκκλησία, Acts ii, 46)." The reading in 2 Pet. ii, 18, is of doubtful authority: "Spots and blemishes, living luxuriously in their Agape (ἐν πλούσιας πάσις ἐκκλησίας);") but the common reading is ἐν ἀγαπαῖς ἀγαπησῶν, "in their own deceivings."

The phrase δίδυμαν ὑπὸν ὑπὸν was early employed in the sense of celebrating the Eucharist; thus in the epistle of Ignatius to the church at Smyrna, § viii. In § vii ὑπὸν ὑπὸ appears to refer more especially to the Agape.

By ecclesiastical writers several synonyms are used for the Agape, such as συμφώσις (Balasmon, ad Con. Chrest. cap. xxvii; Concilium, epist. vi, 18; Const. Lact. in ps. 110, κοιναί ἱεραμοίς, κοινά συμφωνίαν (Chrysostom); διιναὶ κοιναὶ (Eccumenus); συνφωνία και συμφωνία (Zonaras).

Though the Agape usually succeeded the Eucharist, yet they are not alluded to in Justin Martyr's description of the latter (Apol. i, § 65, 67); while Tertullian, on the contrary, in his account of the Agape, makes no distinct mention of the Eucharist. The Eucharist was of course of our Cura," he says, "may be gathered from its name, which is the Greek term for love (ἀγάπη). However much it may cost us, it is real gain to incur such expense in the cause of piety; for we aid the poor by this refreshment; we do not sit down to it till we have first tasted of prudence to God; we eat to satisfy our hunger; we drink no more than bettis the thermometer; we feast as those who recollect that they are to spend the night in devotion; we converse as those who know that the Lord is an ear-witness. After water for washing hands, and lights have been brought in, every one is required to sing something to the Scripture praise of God, either from the Scriptures themselves, or from their own thoughts; by this means, if any one has indulged in excess, he is corrected. The feast is closed with prayer." Contributions or obligations of provisions and money were made on these occasions, and the surplus was placed in the hands of the presiding elder (ὁ πρωτοεραστής, compare 1 Tim., x, 17, ὁ πρωτεραστής πρεσβύτερος), by whom it was applied to the relief of orphans and widows, the sick and destitute, prisoners and strangers (Justin, Apol. i, 67).

Allusions to the εὐαγγελικὴν ἀγάπην are to be met with in heathen writers. Thus Pliny, in his celebrated epistle to the Emperor Trajan, after describing the meeting of the Christians for worship, represents them as assembling again at a later hour, "ad caputem cibium, promiscuum tamen et innominatum." By the phrase "cibum promiscuum" (Augustine remarks) we are not to understand merely food partaken in common with others, but common food, such as is usually eaten; the term intimates that the meal was rendered wholesome and lawful, not consisting, for example, of human flesh (for, among other odious imputations, that of cannibalism had been cast upon the Christians, which, to prejudiced minds, might derive some apparent support from a misinterpretation of our Lord's language in John vi, 53. "Unless ye eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man," nor of herbs prepared with incantations and magical rites. Lucian also, in his account of the philosopher Peregrinus, tells us that, when imprisoned on the charge of being a Christian, he was visited by his brethren in the faith, who brought with them εὐαγγελικήν τοῦρα, which is generically used to mean the provisions which were reserved for the absent members of the church at the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Gesner remarks on this expression, "Agape, offerente magnoque aliq. quod una commensuram; kine toula, non ad taurum."

prisoners. The kiss of charity was given, and the ceremony concluded with prayer (Rom. xvi, 16; 1 Cor. xvi, 20; 1 Thess. v, 26; 1 Pet. v, 14).

3. Their Decline.—From the passages in the Epistles of Jude and Peter, already quoted, and more particularly from the language of Paul in I Cor. xi, it appears that at a very early period the Agape was perverted from its original design; the rich frequently practised a selfish indulgence, to the neglect of their poorer brethren: έκαστος τούτων διαπραμαν έκ των κερος των προσωπών (1 Cor. xi, 21); i.e. the rich feasted on the provisions they brought, without waiting for the poorer members, or granting them a portion of their abundance. Their superiors supposed they had the Grecian mode of entertainment called διαπρας από σπώρα (see Xenophon's Memorabilia, iii, 14; Neander's Planing of the Christian Church, i, 292). On account of these and similar irregularities, and probably in part to cludge the notice of their persecutors, the Christians, about the middle of the second century, frequently celebrated the Eucharist by itself and before daybreak (ante Lucia consulisinsi) (Tertullian, De Cor. Milites, § 8). From Pliny's Epiaste it also appears that the Agape were suspected by the Roman authorities of belonging to the class of Heterius (trajectories), unions or secret societies, which were often employed for political purposes, and as such were denounced by the imperial edicts; for he says (referring to the "cum promiscus," etc.) "quod pressum facere dei salutem post cuncta meum, quocumque mundum facta tua Heterius esse veretur." (Plin. Ep. 66. 96. al. 97.) At a still later period the Agape were subjected to strict regulation by various councils. Thus by the 280th canons of the Council of Laodicea it was forbidden to hold them in churches. At the Council of Cartage (A.D. 387) it was ordered (can. 29) that none should partake of the Eucharist unless they had previously abstained from food; but it is added, "excepto uno die anniversario, quo cerni dominus celebratur." This exception favors the supposition that the Agape were originally held in close imitation of the Last Supper, i.e. before, instead of after, the Eucharist. The same prohibition was repeated in the sixth, seventh, and ninth centuries, at the Council of Orleans (can. 12), A.D. 533; in the Trullan Council at Constantinople (A.D. 553) and in the Council at Aix-Chapelle, A.D. 816. Yet these regulations were not intended to set aside the Agape altogether. In the Council of Gangra, in Paphlagonia (about A.D. 860), a curse was denounced on whoever despised the partakers of the Agape or refused to join in them. When Christianity was introduced among the Anglo-Saxons by St. Gregory the Great, St. Augustine of Canterbury, in his De Caelo et Mundi, advised the celebration of the Agape, in booths formed of the branches of trees, at the consecration of churches.

Few vestiges of this ancient usage can now be traced. In some few churches, however, may still be found what seem to be remnants of the old practice; thus it is usual, in every church in Rouen, on Easter-day, after mass, to distribute to the faithful, in the nave of the church, an Agape, in the shape of a cake and a cup of wine. It appears that it was used to be done on all great festivals; for we read in the life of Ansbertus, archbishop of Rouen, that he gave an Agape to the people in his church "after communion, on solemn days, and in the church, walled up at table especially upon the poor." Dr. King suggests, that the Benediction of the Loaves, observed in the Greek Church, is a remnant of the ancient Agape. Suicer says that it is yet the custom in that Church on Easter-day, after the celebration of the holy mysteries, for the people to join together in the church, and this distribution ponis benedicti et nisi, he also seems to consider a vestige of the Agape. But the primitive love-feast, under a simpler and more expressly religious form, is retained in modern times by the Moravians and the Methodists. See LOVE-FEAST. Similar meetings are held in Scotland by the followers of Mr. Robert Sandeman (q. v.).

and by a branch of them in Danbury, Conn.—Suicer, Theology, 26; Gieseler, Ch. Hist., i, 59, 104, 269; Larder, Works, viii, 380; Coleman, Anecd. Christiandæ, ch. xxii, § 13; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. xv, 8; Disciplices of the M. E. Church, pt. ii. Beside these Mystagogic Agapes, three other kinds are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers: (1) Agape natalitium, held in commemoration of the martyrs (Theo-doret, Euseb. Vitr. viii, 298, 924, ed. Scholz); (2) Agape communiates, or marriage-feasts (Greg. Naz. Epist. i, 14); (3) Agape funeralea, funeral-feasts (Greg. Naz. Comp. x.,) probably similar to the mystagor of newscel in the Greeks.—Kitto, s. v.

Agape (di'ya-prai-ri), beloved, used in the primitive Church as a title of saints. In the early ages of the Church this title was given to virgins who dwelt with monks and others professing celibacy, and in later times to virgins, who were called virgins by sect. This intercourse, however pure and holy it may have been at first, soon occasioned great scandal in the Church, and at length became the cause of such evils that it was synodically condemned (Lateran Council, 1139). It seems that the name Agapi (di'ya-prai-ri) was given to men who passed the same kind of life with desceousness and other women. The 6th Novell (cap. vi) forbids deconesse to have with them such men, with whom they dwell as with their brothers or relations.—Epiphanius, Hær. 43; Mosheim, Comm. ii, 138. See SUBINTEBDUCTE.

Agapetus I, pope, son of Gordianus, a priest, by birth a Roman; succeeded John II in the papacy, April 21st (26th, Cave), 535. Theodorus, the king of the Visigoths, performed at the conquests of Belis-arius, obliged Agapetus to proceed to Constantinople to sue for peace from the Emperor Justinian. This the pope was unable to obtain; but he signalized his zeal for relief by refusing to communicate with Athinnaeus, the Euthyian, then patriarch of Constantinople. The emperor endeavored to compel Agapetus to receive him into communion, but he resolutely persisted in his refusal. Induced by this bold conduct to look more closely into the question, Justinian became convinced of the error that had been committed in elevating Anthimus to the patriarchal see, and by his order a council was held at Constantinople in 536, in which Agapetus presided, where Anthimus was deposed, and Menas elected in his stead, and consecrated and installed as bishop of the pope. Agapetus died at Constantinople in that same year, on the 22d day of April, after having held the see eleven months and three weeks, according to the most probable opinion. His body was carried to Rome, and buried in the church of St. Peter, in the Vatican, September 29th, on which day a festival is marked in the Roman Martyrology. Five of his epistles remain, viz., one to Justinian, two to Cassarius, bishop of Arles, and two to Reparatus, bishop of Carthage. The epistle to Anthimus, given together with these in the collections of Councils, is spurious. He was succeeded by Silvester. — Biog. Univ. vol. 1; Baronius, A.D. 535, 536; Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 535.

Agapetus II, pope, A.D. 946, was a Roman by birth, and was chosen, like his predecessor, by the faction of Alberic. The first action of the pope was to establish his political rule over the churches of the empire. For this purpose he sent Marinus, bishop of Bormano, in Tuscania, as a legate to the Emperor Otto I., to suppress the synod. This council, composed of French and German prelates, was held at Ingelheim, in the church of St. Remi, on the 7th of June, 948, in the presence of Kings Otto and Louis. Marinus presided over it. Notwithstanding the opposition of the synod, the legate re-established in his episcopal dignity Anthimus, the former bishop of Bormano, who had been removed from his see by Hugo, count of Paris.

In order to break down the powerful house of Marozia in Italy, Agapetus favored the claims of Otto to the imperial dignity, and was about to summon him to Rome, when the pope himself died, A.D. 955. His successor, John XII., placed the crown of Charlemagne on Otto's head. — Baronius, *Annal. 551; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. x, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Agard, Horace, an esteemed Methodist Episcopal minister, entered the itinerancy in the Genesee Conference in 1819. In 1821 he was ordained deacon, and in 1823 elder. In 1826 he was made presiding elder of the Genesee Conference district, which office he held seven years, and then was transferred to Berkshire district. He filled the various posts to which he was called with great credit and success. In 1838 he was supernumerary. His later years were clouded by nervous disease, which abated, so as to leave his mind clear and happy, a few days before his death in 1850.— Minutes of Conference, iv, 498; Peck, Early Methodism, p. 457.

Agate, σκέλος, signifying unknown; Sept. σκέλος, Vulg. scelus), a precious, or rather ornamental stone, which was one of those in the breastplate (see Brannum Vet. Sacred. Heb. ii, 15) of the high-priest (Exod. xxvii, 19; xxxix, 12). The word agate, indeed, occurs in Isa. lv, 12, and Ezek. xxvii, 6, in our translation; but in the original the word is yatsar, bedad. See Rutyc.

Theophrastus describes the agate as an "elegant stone, which took its name from the river Achates (now the Drillo, in the Val di Noto), in Sicily, and was sold at a great price" (58). But it must have been known long before in the East, and, in fact, there are few countries in which agate of some quality or other is not produced. The finest are those of India; they are plentiful, and sometimes fine, in Italy, Spain, and Germany. We have no evidence that agates were found in Palestine. Those used in the desert were doubtless brought from Egypt. Pliny says that those found in the neighborhood of Thebes were usually red veined with white. He adds that these, as well as most other agates, were deemed to be effective against scorpions, and gives some curious accounts of the pictorial delineations which the variegations of agates occasionally assumed. Agate is one of the numerous modifications of form under which silica presents itself, almost in a state of purity, forming 96 per cent. of the entire mineral. The silicious particles are not so arranged as to produce the transparency of rock crystal, but a semi-pellucid, sometimes almost opaque substance, with a resinous or waxy fracture, and the various shades of color arise from minute quantities of iron. The same stone sometimes contains parts of different degrees of translucency, and of various shades of color; and the endless combinations of these produce the beautiful and singular internal forms, from which, together with the high polish they are capable of receiving, agates acquire their value as precious stones. Agates are usually found in detached rounded nodules in that variety of the trap rocks called amygdaloid or mandelstein, and occasionally in other rocks. Some of the most marvellous specimens on record were probably merely fancied, and possibly some were the work of art, as it is known that agates may be artificially stained. From what we learn that the ancient works were less valued than they had been in more ancient times (Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 10). The varieties of the agate are numerous, and are now, as in the time of Pliny, arranged according to the color of their ground. The Scripture text shows the early use of this stone for engraving pictures, and the antique art of decorating vessels with exquisite beauty, are still preserved in the cabinets of the curious. (For a further account of the modern agate, see the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. — Kitto, s. v. See Gem.

Agatha, a female Christian martyr, born at Palermo, in the third century. Quintianus, the pagan governor of Sicily (A.D. 261), captivated with her charms, and incensed by her rejection of his illicit overtures, tortured her in the most brutal manner. By his order she was first scourged with rods, then burnt with red-hot irons and cruelly torn with sharp hooks; after which she was laid upon a bed of live coals mingled with glass. She died in prison February 5, A.D. 261. The story of Agatha, which was a favorite with the people, given by the Bollandists, is suspected of corruption. — Tillemont, iii, 209; Butler, Lives of Saints, Feb. 5.

Agatho, Pope, surnamed Thaumaturgus, on account of his pretended gift of working miracles. He was a native of Palermo, in Sicily. On the 22d of June, 678, he was elected pope on the death of Donus. He is remembered mainly for his efforts against the Monothelite heresy. Chiefly by his instrumentality the 6th and last Ecumenical Council was assembled in 680 at Constantinople against these opinions, to which he sent four legates; and at that council the doctrine sanctioned by Pope Honorius was denounced by Pope Agatho—infallibility against infallibility. He died January 9th, 682.

His legates against the Monothelites are preserved in the records of the 6th council (Hardouin, Concilia, tom. iii).

Agathopolis, a diocesan town of Palestine referred to in the records of the Council of Chalcedon, probably for "Asoptopolis" (Reland, Palaest. p. 550) or Ashqod (q. v.).

Age (represented by several Heb. and Gr. words), sometimes signifies an indefinite period; at others, it is used for: 1. A generation (q. v.) of the human race, or thirty years; 2. As the latter end of red years; 3. The maturity of life (John ix, 21); 4. The latter end of life (Job xi, 17). See Eon.

Old Age. The strong desire of a protracted life, and the marked respect with which aged persons were treated among the Jews, are very often indicated in the Scriptures. The most striking instance which Job can give of the respect in which he was once held, is that even old men stood up as he passed them in the streets (Job xxxix, 8), the force of which is illustrated by the injunction in the law, "Before the hoary head shalt stand up, and shalt reverence the aged" (Lev. xix, 30). Similar injunctions are repeated in the Apocrypha so as to show the deportment expected from young men toward their seniors in company. Thus, in describing a feast, the author of Ecclesiasticus (xxxii, 8, 7) says, "Speak thou that art the elder, for it becometh thee. Speak, young man, if there be need of thee, and yet scarcely when thou art wise asked." See ELEODER. The attitude of old age is constantly promised or described as a blessing (Gen. xv, 15; Job v, 26), and communities are represented as highly favored in which old people abound (Isa. lxv, 20; Zech. viii, 4, 9), while premature death is denounced as the greatest of calamities to individuals, and to the families to which they belong (1 Sam. ii, 32); the aged are constantly supposed to excel in understanding and judgment (Job xii, 20; xv, 10; xxxii, 9; 1 Kings xxi, 6, 8), and the meekness of the Chaldeans is expressed by their having "no compasion" upon the "old man, or him who stoooped for age" (9 Chroniclers, i, 17). The strong desire to attain old age was necessarily in some degree connected with or resembled the respect paid to aged persons; for people would scarcely desire to be old, were the aged neglected or regarded with mere sufferance. See OLD. Attention to age was very general in ancient times; and is still observed in all such conditions of society as those through which the Israelites passed. Among the Egyptians, the young men rose before the aged, and always yielded to them the first place (Herod. ii, 80). The youth of Sparta did the same, and were silent—or, as the Hebrews would say, laid their hand upon their mouth— whenever the aged were present. At Athens, in other Greek states, old men were treated with corresponding respect. In China deference for the aged, and the honors and distinctions awarded to them, form a capital point in the government (Mem. sur les Chinois, i, 450); and among the Moslems of Western Asia, whose usages offer so many analogies to those of the Hebrews, the same regard for seniority is strongly shown. Among the Arabs, it is very seldom that a youth can be permitted to eat with men (Lane, Arabi an Nights, c. xi, note 26). While the Turks, age, even between brothers, is the object of marked deference (Urquhart, Spirit of the East, ii, 471).—Kittel, s. v

AGE: AGGÆUS

Ages, A.D. 140, or the marriage which may be contracted or religious vows made. The canonists agree that men may contract marriage at fourteen years of age, and women at twelve. Until the contracting parties are each twenty-one years of age, no marriage can be legally contracted without the consent of the parents or guardians of the party which is a minor.

Ages, Canonical, i.e. proper for receiving orders. In the Latin Church it is forbidden to give the tonsure to any one unless he be seven years of age, and have been confirmed (Conc. Trid. sess. xxiii, cap. 4). The proper age for conferring the four minor orders is left to the discretion of the bishop; but it is forbidden to promote any one to the rank of subdeacon under twenty-two years of age, to that of deacon under twenty-three, and to that of priest unless in his twentyfifth year (Ibid. cap. 12). A bishop must be at least in his twenty-seventh year, or, more properly, thirty-

In the Church of England a deacon may be admitted to the priesthood at the expiration of one year from the time of receiving deacon's orders, and not before, i.e. at twenty-four years of age at the earliest; and it is to be noted that the stat. 15 Eliz. 12 declares all dispensations to the contrary to be absolutely void in law. The preface to the ordination service declares that every man, to be consecrated bishop, must be full thirty years of age.

Ages of the World. The time preceding the birth of our Saviour has been generally divided into six ages: 1. From the beginning of the world to the Deluge; 2. From the Deluge to the birth of Abraham; 3. From the birth of Abraham to the birth of Isaac; 4. From the birth of Isaac to the death of Jacob; 5. From the death of Jacob to the birth of Jesus Christ; 6. From the birth of Jesus Christ to the birth of our Lord. See CHRONOLOGY.

Aggæus (Agæus)

Agæus (Heb. Ag‘ã, N. T. Aga‘, Sept. Ἀγαῖος), a Hararite, father of Shammah, which latter was one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 11). B.C. ante 1046.

Agellus

Agellus, or Agellii, ANTONIO, an Italian bishop, was born at Sorrento in 1532. An account of him will be found in the letters of Peter Morin (Paris, 1787). He was remarkable for his extensive knowledge of languages. He died at Avignon, 1608. His works are: 1. A Commentary on the Psalms and Canticles (Rome, 1606, fol.); 2. A Commentary on the Book of Lamentations, taken from the Greek writers and translated (Rome, 1583, 4to); 3. A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs (Verona, 1609, fol.); 4. A Commentary on Tobit (Antwerp, 1627, 8vo).

He was employed by Gregory XIII upon the beautiful Greek edition of the Tsuchapt, published at Rome, and was a member of the institution of persons called Scholasticati, who were charged with the office of superintending the printing establishment of the Vatican. Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Agenda (Lat. things to be done)

Agenda (Lat. things to be done), among ecclesiastical writers of the ancient Church, denotes (1), divine service in general; (2), the mass in particular. We meet with agenda matutina and vesperina—morning and evening prayers; agenda diei—the office of the day, whether fast or feast day; agenda mortuorum—the service of the dead. It is also applied to church-books, compiled by the authority, presided over by a priest, to be observed by the ministers and people in the ceremonies and devotions of the Church. In this sense agenda occurs for the first time in a work of Johannes de Janua, about 1287. The name was especially used to designate a book containing the formule of prayer and official duties to be observed by the priests in their several ecclesiastical functions. It was generally adopted in the Lutheran Church of Germany, in which it is still in use, while in the Roman Church it has been, since the 16th century, supplanted by the term ritual (q. v.). For the history of the Lutheran Agendas, see Liturgy.

Aggeus (Agyios)

Aggeus (Agyios), the Graceful form (1 Eadri. vi, 1; vii, 2; 2 Eadri. i, 40) of the name of the prophet Haggai (q. v.).
Agier, Pierre Jean, a French jurist, was born at Paris, December 28th, 1748, of a Jansenist family. When forty years old he commenced the study of Hebrew, and gave translations of the Old and New Testaments and the prophecies (principally on the four gospels). In 1789 he appeared his Vues sur la réformation des lois civiles, suivies d'un plan et d'une classification de ces lois (Paris, 2 vols. 8vo), followed by his Pascuus nouvellement traduit en Français sur l'Hebreu, etc. (Paris, 1800, 3 vols. 8vo); Paulus ad Hebraicos veritates translati, etc. (Paris, 1818, 1 vol. 16mo); Vues sur le second amincissement de Jésus-Christ (Paris, 1818, 1 vol. 8vo); Prophecies concernant Jésus-Christ et l'Église, éparses dans les Livres saints (Paris, 1819, 8vo); Les Prophecies nouvellement traduites de l'Hebreu, avec des explications et des notes critiques (Paris, 1820-1822, 9 vols. 8vo); Commentaire sur les Apocalypses (Paris, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo).

In all these works the Jansenist doctrines are strongly upheld. It is said of him that Napoleon, on seeing him once, said, "Voilà un magistrat!" He died at Paris September 22d, 1823. — Mahul, Annuaire nérologique (Paris, 1823).

Agion, or rather Hagion (Ἠγίων or Ἡγίων ἁγίων, the saints, the most holy place). See Temple. A name recently given to a certain street in the heart of the city, which was appropriated to the clergy. See ADYTON.

Agonion. See RUSH.

Agna, saint and martyr. The acts of her martyrdom which have come down to us as written by Ambrose are spurious, and nothing further is known of her history than what Prudentius relates in the 14th Hymn, περί αὐτῆς, and Ambrose in lib. i, de Virgibus, which amounts to this: Agna, at the early age of twelve or thirteen, having made profession of the Christian faith at Rome, was put to the torment to induce her to retract, in vain, and the judge ordered her to be conveyed to a house of ill fame, hoping that fear for her chastity might force her to recant. But God preserved his servant in this trial; for, according to the tradition, the first man who cast his eyes upon her was struck with blindness, and fell nearly dead at her feet! Nevertheless the sainty story adds that she was immediately delivered of every sickness, and was beheaded, according to Ruinart, in 304, or, according to Bollandus, in the preceding century. Augustine, in his 23d Sermon, declares that he made that discourse on the anniversary of the passion of St. Agna, St. Rusticus, and St. Eulogius, viz., Jan. 21st, on which day the festival is celebrated by the Latin, Greek, and English Churches. Many churches are strongly for the honor of possessing her remains.—Butler, Lives of Saints, Jan. 21.

Agonistes (from ἀγονίοις, to be ignorant of), a sect which appeared about A.D. 370, adopting the opinions of Theophrastus of Cappadocia. They questioned the omniscience of God, alleging that He knew things past only by memory, and things future only by uncertain prophecy. As a result, many of them died, and the mythol. letic and supernaturalist tendencies of the Christian sect, which in the sixth century followed Themistius, descem of Alexandria. They maintained that Christ was ignorant of many things, and particularly of the day of judgment (see Colbe, Agonietismus, Giss. 1654). Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria, ascribes this opinion to the Christian Origen, and some other bishop of Alexandria; the serpent, who cited, in vindication of their opinion, Mark xiii, 22: "Of that day and that hour knoweth no man, neither the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father."—Baronius, A.D. 536; Mohheim, Ch. Hist. cent. vi, pt. ii, ch. v, § 9; Walch, Hist. der Kirchengesch., vol. i, 1811.

Agunas Dei (Lat. Lamb of God). (1.) A hymn generally supposed to have been introduced into the Roman Mass service by Pope Sergius I in 688. It is more probable that before his time it had been sung by the clergy alone, and he only required 'the laity to join. The hymn is founded on John i, 29, with the words Agnas Dei, but it ends at the close of the mass. For a full account of the hymn and its varieties, see Pascal, Liturg. Cathol. p. 51.

(II.) A cake of wax used in the Romish Church, stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the cross. These cakes, being consecrated by the pope, hung on a cross on Tuesday after Easter in the first and seventh years of pontificate, are given by the Roman Catholics to possess great virtues. They cover them with a piece of stuff cut in the form of a heart, and carry them very devoutly in their processions. From selling these Agni Dei to some, and presenting them to others, the Romish clergy and religious officers derive considerable pecuniary advantage. The practice of blessing the Agnas Dei took its rise about the 7th or 8th, according to others, about the 14th century. Though the efficacy of an Agnas Dei has not been declared by Romish Councils, the belief in its virtues has been strongly and universally established in the Church of Rome. Pope Urban V sent to John Paleologus, emperor of the East, a number of these cakes, made in fine paper, on which were written verses explaining all its properties. These verses declare that the Agnas is formed of balm and wax mixed with chrism, and that being consecrated by mystical words, it possesses the power of removing thunder and dispersing storms. Women, with child and a sick man, expect delivery, of preventing shipwreck, taking away a storm, repelling the devil, increasing riches, and securing against fire. See LAMB.

Agobard (Agobertus, Agobaldus, or Agobaudus), archbishop of Lyons, was born in 779, but whether in France or Spain is uncertain. He was appointed coadjutor of Leiradus, the archbishop of Lyons, who was the very far advanced in years; and in 816 the archbishop retired into the monastery of Soissons, having appointed Agobard his successor in the episcopal chair. Agobard was driven from his see by Louis-le-Debonnaire for having taken an active share in deposing him in the assembly of bishops, held at Compiègne in 838. When peace was restored between Louis and his son, Lothaire and Pepin, Agobard recovered his see. He died at Saintonge, June 6th, 840. He was considered a man of much genius, and of no small learning in theological questions. He held liberal views with regard to inspiration. He wrote against the Adoptionists, against Ordeix by his works in verse, and against the Nestoreans. (See Hendershausen, De Agobardii vita et scriptis, Giss. 1831.) His works have been preserved to us by a singular accident. Papyrus Massenus, happening to enter the shop of a bookbinder at Lyons, as the latter was on the point of tearing up a MS. which he held in his hands, asked permission to look at it first, which he did, and, receiving its value, he rescued it from its impending destruction, and shortly after published it. The MS. itself is preserved in the Bibliothèque du Roi at Paris. His works were edited Paris, 1606, and again by Baluez (2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1665), and by Masson (Paris, 1600). They may also be found in Bib. Med. Patr. tom. xiv.

Agonistae, a branch of the Donatists who spread themselves through Africa to preach the opinions of Donatus, and committed many crimes under pretext of doing justice to such poor martyrs, they exposed themselves to the greatest dangers, and sometimes even killed themselves. They were forcibly suppressed under Emperor Constant, but existed till the inroad of the Vandals. See DONATISTS.

Agonists (Confraternity of the), a society of Brothers of Charity established at Rome (and elsewhere, as at Lima in South America), whose chief duty is that of prayer for persons condemned to death by the law. On the eve of an execution they give notice of it to several nurseries, and on the day on which the criminal is to suffer they cause a great number of masses to be said for him. Another confraternity under the same name exists at death-beds generally.

Agony (ag'own), a word generally denoting contest, and especially the contests by wrestling, etc., in the public games; whence it is applied metaphorically to a severe struggle or conflict with pain and suffering (Robinson's Lex. of the N. T. s. v.). Agony is the actual struggle with present evil, and is thus distinguished from temptation, which arises from reflection on evil that is past (Crabb's Eng. Synonymes, s. v.). In the New Testament the term is only used by Luke (xx, 44) to describe the fearful struggle which our Lord sustained in the garden of Gethsemane (q. v.). The circumstances of this mysterious transaction are reported in Matt. xxvi. 36-46 and Mark xiv. 32-42, and referred to by Luke xx, 38-48; Heb. v, 7, 8. Luke alone notices the agony, the bloody sweat, and the appearance of an angel from heaven strengthening him. Matthew and Mark alone record the change which appeared in his countenance and manner, the complaint which he uttered of the overpowering sorrows of his soul, and his repetition of the same prayer. See BLOODY SWEAT. All agree that he prayed for the removal of what he called "this cup," and are careful to note that he qualified this earnest petition by a preference of his Father's will to his own; the question is, what does he mean by "this cup?" Duddridge and others think that he means the instant agony of the torture he then actually endured. But Dr. Mayer (of York, Pa.) argues (in the Am. Bibl. Repos. April 1841, p. 294-317), from John xviii, 11, that the cup respecting which he prayed was one that was then before him, which he had not yet taken up to drink, and which he desired, if possible, that he should remove. It could, therefore, be no other than the death which the Father had appointed for him—the death of the cross—with all the attending circumstances which aggravated its horror; that scene of woe which began with his arrest in the garden, and was consummated by his death on Calvary. Jesus had long been familiar with this prospect, and had looked to it as the appointed termination of his ministry (Matt. xvi, 21; xvii, 9-12; xx. 17, 19, 28; Mark x, 32-34; John x, 18; xii, 32, 33). But when he looked forward to this destination, as the hour approached, a chill of horror sometimes came over him, and found expression in external signs of distress (compare p. 27; comp. Luke xii, 36-40). But on no occasion did he exhibit any very striking evidence of perplexity or anguish. He was usually calm and collected; and if at any time he gave utterance to feelings of distress and horror, he still preserved his self-possession, and quickly checked the desire which nature felt for the relief of such a death. It is, therefore, hardly to be supposed that the approach of his sufferings, awful as they were, apart from every thing else, could alone have wrought so great a change in the mind of Jesus and in his whole demeanor, as soon as he had entered the garden. It is manifest that something more than the cross was now before him, that he saw the issue of his sufferings laid before him. Thus the patient, feeling the approach of imminent death, looks, not to the element of torture, but to some other element that comes into view. Dr. Mayer says: "I have no hesitation in believing that he was here put upon the trial of his obedience. It was the purpose of God to subject the obedience of Jesus to a severe ordeal, in order thereby to test him as an object of more perfect and illustrious virtue; and for this end he permitted him to be assailed by the fiercest temptation to disobey his will and to refuse the appointed cup. In pursuance of this purpose, the mind of Jesus was led to pass under a dark cloud, his views lost their clearness, the Father's will was shrouded in obscurity, the cross appeared in toto horror, and nature was left to indulge her feelings, and to put forth her reluctance." See JESUS (CHRIST).

Dr. Mayer admits that the sacred writers have not explained what that was, which was connected in the mind of Jesus with the death of the cross, which at this time excited in him so distressing a fear. "Pious and holy men have looked calmly upon death in its most ghastly forms. But the pious and holy man has not had a world's salvation laid upon him; he has not been required to be absolutely perfect before God; he has known that, if he sinned, there was an advocate and a ransom for him. But nothing of this consolation could be presented to the mind of Jesus. He knew that he must die, as he had lived, without sin; but if the extremity of suffering should so far prevail as to provoke him into impatience or murmuring, or into a desire for revenge, this would be sin; and if he sinned, all would be lost, for there was no other Saviour. In such considerations may probably be found the reason why motives and fears and objections and griefs and longings, and the deepening of that dreadful night."—Kitto, s. v.

This, however, is not entirely satisfactory. Doubtless there was much of this obscurcation of our Saviour's mind [see CRUCIFIXION]; but it would appear to have had reference to another point, and one connected with his condition and circumstances at the time, rather than any one of those which belong to the apostle's inspired remark in Heb. v, 7, has not been sufficiently attended to by interpreters, "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, unto Him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that [i. e. as to what] was asked." We are here distinctly informed, respecting this agony of Christ, that he was delivered from the object of dread, whatever it was; but this was not true in any sense of his future passion, which he suffered, and could not consistently have been expected to have avoided, in its full extent. The best of men is but a shadow of the great and perfect Saviour; and some relief was administered to him on the spot: "Thero appeared an angel unto him from heaven strengthening him" (Luke xxii, 43). The strength imparted appears to have been physical, thus, as the passage in Hebrews intimates, saving him from the death which would otherwise have instantly supervened from the force of his emotions. This death Jesus was anxious to avoid just at that time; his work was not yet done, and the "cup" of sacrifice atonement would have been premature. His heavenly Father, in answer to his prayer, removed it for the time from his lips, by miraculously sustaining his bodily powers, and his mind, soon recovered its former state of equanimity. The emotions themselves under which he labored were evidently the same as those that oppressed him while hanging on the cross, and on other occasions in a less degree, namely, a peculiar sense of abandonment by God. This distress and perplexity cannot be attributed to a mere disorganization of the body, ever having found its place in the mind of any on account of the crucifixion. Neither can they well be attributed (as above) to any uncertainty as to whether he had thus far fulfilled the will of God, for his mind was deeply impressed with the future necessity to fulfill it as perfectly, without a gratuitous contradiction of all his former experience.
and statements, and assigning him a degree of faith unworthy of his character. The position thus assigned him is incompatible with every thing hitherto in his history. Some other explanation must be sought. The story of his death is indicated in his history, only upon the cross. "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" seems to betray the secret ingredient that gave the stoning cu its poignant bitterness. This appears to have been the consciousness of enduring the frown of God in the place of sinful man; without which sense of the divine displeasure, by a temporary without the moral sense of the moral wrongs experienced by the Redeemer, although in others' behalf, the full penalty of transgression could not have been paid. See Atonement. Jesus must suffer (in character) what the sinner would have suffered, and this with the concentrated intensity of a world's infinite guilt. The sacrifice of his human body could only have redeemed man's body; his soul's beclouded anguish alone could represent the sentence passed upon men's souls. This view very essentially agrees with that taken by Oldshausen (Comment. in loc.).

Agreda, Maria de, abbess of the Franciscan convent of the Immaculate Conception of Agreda, in Aragon. She was born April 24, 1602, of rich and pious parents. Her mother, influenced by some dream or supposed vision, conceived it to be her duty to found a convent of the Immaculate Conception; and when her husband died, she, in 1619, began to build the new monastery on the site of their own house. Subsequently, the father assumed the franciscan habit, as his two sons had done previously, and Maria, with her mother and younger sister, took the veil in the new monastery. She was elected superior, by dispensation, at twenty-five years of age. She believed herself commanded from heaven to write the life of the Virgin, but seems to have resisted the impression for ten years, for it was not till 1637 that she commenced it. When it was finished she burned it, by direction of her temporary confessor, but her ordinary confessor immediately directed her to write it again. She finished it in 1660. She died May 24, 1666. As soon as the book appeared it was justly condemned by the censors in Spain, Portugal, Rome, and Germany, and by the Faculty of the Theology at Paris (the Sorbonne), in 1696. The title of the book, which is written in Spanish, is filled with statements which are not only without foundation, but that is immoral, is "The Mystical City of God." (Mística Ciudad de Dios, Perpigan, 1696, 4 vols. Antwerp, 1692, 3 vols. and oft.; French translat. by Crozet, Marseilles, 1696, 3 vols.). Eusèbe Amort, theologian of Cardinal Lercari, declares that the book was inserted in the Index at Rome in 1710, but that subsequently, during the pontificate of Benedict XIII, there appeared a decree permitting it to be read. Nevertheless, he asserts that he saw in the hands of Nicolas Ridolphe, then the secretary of the congregation of the Index, another and later decree, annulling the first, and declaring that it had been surreptitiously obtained. "At first," says Amort, "I wondered why this latter decree of Benedict XIII had not been published; but my surprise ceased when I found that they had already commenced the process of the beatification of the venerable Maria de Agreda!" See Amort, De revelinandis, etc., Augsburg, 1744, and, on the other side, a long article by J. Gueranger, Benedictine of Solesmes, in Univers., 1859.

Agricolà, Francòs, canon and curate of Redingè, and afterward of Sittarden, in the duchy of Jülich, celebrated for his erudition. He died in 1621, leaving the following works: 1. Libri quatuor Ex. alicicorum Demonstraticum (Cologne, 1578); 2. Loc. præcipuis S. Scip. de Sacerdotis Institutione et Officio (Lugd. 1587).

Agricolà, Johannes (called Mogiiter Ilebus), said to be the founder of the sect of Antiromans (q. v.), born April 20th, 1492, at Eisleben, in Upper Saxony. His real name was Schneider or Schneider, which he Latinized, according to the custom of the time. He studied philosophy and theology at Wittenberg, where he was distinguished for his learning and virtue, and taught in the university for several years. At Eisleben he became distinguished as a preacher. In 1528 he was present at the diet of Speyer, at the synod of Saxony and the count of Mansfeld; he also subscribed the confession of Augsburg, although he subsequently differed from it in many things. In 1538 he began to preach "against the Law," and, for a time, Antinomianism appeared likely to spread; but Luther opposed the new error with so much force that the sect was suppressed in his infancy; and Agricolà, at least in form, renounced his heresy (see Nitzsche, De Antinomismo Jo. Agricola, Viteb. 1804). Having retired to Berlin, he became preacher to the elector of Brandenburg, in 1540. In 1537 he signed the Articles of Smalcald, excepting, however, the additional article on the doctrine of the papacy. In 1548 he received the appointment of bishop of Julius Plungius (Phog), bishop of Nuremberg, and Michael Helden, titular bishop of Sidon, he composed the celebrated Interim of Charles V. He endeavored, in vain, to appease the Adiaphoristic controversy (q. v.), and, at Berlin, September 22d, 1566. His works are: 1. Comment. in Ezech. Luc. Act. et Psal. (Witten. 1552); 2. Comment. in Ezech. (Witten. 1552); 3. A Collection and Explication of three hundred German Proverbs (Magdeburg, 1526). The best edition, Wittenberg, 1592, contains seven hundred and fifty proverbs; 4. Comment. in Ep. Pauli ad Tumum (Hague, 1550); 5. Refutation of Thomas Maner's Explication of Paul's xil: 6. I. History.—The antiquity of agriculture is indicated in the history of Cain and Abel, when it tells us that the former was a "tiller of the ground," and brought some of his fruits of his labor as an offering to God (Gen. iv, 2, 3), and that part of the ultimate curse upon him was, "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield to thee her strength" (iv, 12). Of the actual state of agriculture before the Deluge we know nothing. See ANTEDELUVIAN.

II. Weather, etc.—As the nature of the seasons lies at the root of all agricultural operations, it should be noticed that the variations of sunshine and rain, which with us extend throughout the year, are in Palestine and Egypt limited to the summer and the winter. During all the rest of the year the sky is almost uniformly cloudless, and rain very rarely falls. The autumnal rains usually commence at the latter end of October or beginning of November, not suddenly, but by degrees, which gives opportunity to the husbandman to sow his wheat and barley. The rains continue during November and December, but afterward they occur at longer intervals, and rain is rare after March, and almost never occurs as late as May. The cold of winter is not severe; and as the ground is never frozen, the labors of the husbandman are not entirely interrupted. Snow falls in different parts of the country, but it lies only on the ground in winter. In the plains and valleys the heat of summer is oppressive, but not in the more elevated tracts. In these high grounds the nights are cool, often with heavy dew. The total absence of rain in summer soon destroys the verdure of the fields, and gives to the general landscape, even in the high country, an aspect of drought and barrenness. No green thing remains but the foliage of the scattered fruit-trees, and occasional vineyards and fields of millet. In autumn the whole land becomes dry and parched, the cisterns are nearly empty, and all nature, animate and inanimate, looks forward with longing for the return of the rainy season. The harvest is usually earlier in the valley than in the plains of the Jordan and of the seacoast. The barley harvest is about a fortnight earlier than that of wheat. In the plain of the Jordan the wheat harvest is early in May; in the plains of the coast and of Edreelon, it is toward the latter end of that month, and in the hills not until June. The general vintage is in September, but the first grapes ripen in July; and from that time the towns are well supplied with this fruit.—Robinson, Biblical Researches, ii, 96-100. See PALESTINE.

The Jewish calendar (q.v.), as fixed by the three great festivals, turned on the seasons of green, ripe, and fully-gathered produce. The former season was backward, or, owing to the imperfections of a non-astronomical reckoning, seemed to be so, a month was intercalated. This rude system was further refined long after mental progress and foreign intercourse placed a correct calendar within their power; so that not only was the notice of a month, i.e., second or intercalated Adar, on account of the corns being not on the same, and the barley not forward enough for the Abib (green sheaf), was sent to the Jews of Babylon and Egypt (Ugol. de Re Rust., v, 22) early in the season. See TIME. The year, ordinarily consisting of twelve months, was divided into six agricultural periods, as follows (Mishna, Tosephta Tamid, ch. i) were heated with such things as dung and hay (Ezek. iv, 12, 15; Mal. iv, 18); and, in any case of sacrifice on an emergency, some, as we should think, unused supply of copper is constantly mentioned for the wood.

Thus, the former months from mid Tishri to mid Nisan were mainly occupied with the processes of cultivation, and the rest with the gathering of the fruits. Rain was commonly expected soon after the autumnal equinox, or mid Tishri; and if by the first of Kislev none had fallen, a fast was proclaimed (Mishna, Tract. ch. i).

The common Scriptural expressions of the "early" and the "latter rain" (Deut. xi, 14; Jer. v, 24; Hos. vi, 3; Zech. xi, 1; Isai. vii, 7) are scarcely confirmed by modern experience, the season of rains being unbroken (Robinson, i, 41, 429; iii, 96), though perhaps the fall is more strongly marked at the beginning and the end of it. The consternation caused by the failure of the former rain is depicted in Joel i, 19; and this prophet seems to promise that and the latter rain together "in the first month," I. e. Nisan (li, 28). See Rain.

It's plenty of water from natural sources made Canaan a contrast to rainless Egypt (Deut. viii, 7; xi, 8-12). Nor was the peculiar Egyptian method of horticulture adopted, as in Deut. xi, 10 unknown, though less prevalent in Palestine. That peculiarity seems to have consisted in making in the fields square shallow beds, like our salt-pans, surrounded by a raised border of earth to keep in the water, which was then turned from one square to another by pushing aside the mud, to open one and close the next, with the foot. Robinson, however, describes it as a different process, to which he thinks this passage refers (Rob. i, 547; ii, 351; ii, 21), as still in use likewise in Palestine. There irrigation (including under the term all appliances for making the water available) was as essential as drainage in our region; and for this the large extent of rocky surface, easily excavated for cisterns and ducts, was most useful. Even the plain of Jericho is watered not by canals from the Jordan, since the river lies below the land, but by rills converging from the mountains. In these features of the country lay its expansive resources to meet the wants of a multiplying population. The lightness of agricultural labor in the plains set free an abundance of hands for the task of terracing and watering, and the result gave the highest stimulus to industry. See Irrigation.

III. Soil, etc.—The Israelites probably found in Canaan a fair proportion of woodland, which their necessities, owing to the discouragement of commerce, must have been most useful (Josh. xxiii, 10). But even in early times timber seems to have been far less used for building material than among Western nations; the Israelites were not skilful hewers, and imported both the timber and the workmen (1 Kings v, 6, 8). No store of wood-fuel seems to have been kept; ovens were heated with such things as dung and hay (Ezek. iv, 12, 15; Mal. iv, 18); and, in any case of sacrifice on an emergency, some, as we should think, unused supply of copper is constantly mentioned for the wood.

crease of population and the clearance of trees, must have taken place before the period of the N. T. A further change, caused by the decrease of skilled agricultural labor, e. g. in irrigation and terrace-making, has since ensued. Not only this, but the great variety of elevation and local climate as well as a small compass of country necessitates a partial and guarded application of general remarks (Robinson, i, 567, 568, 564; iii, 595; Stanley, Palestine, p. 122-126). Yet wherever industry is secure, the soil still asserts its old fertility. The Hauran (Peræa) is as fertile as Damascus, and its bread enjoys the highest reputation. The black and fat, but light soil at Gaza, is said to hold so much moisture as to be very fertile with little rain. Here, as in the neighborhood of Beyrut, is a vast olive-ground, and the very sand of the shore is said to be fertile if watered. See WATER.

IV. Crops and Fields.—Under the term δασός, dagon, which we translate "grain" and "corn," the Hebrews comprehended almost every object of field culture. Syria, including Palestine, was regarded by the ancients as one of the first countries for corn (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xviii, 7). Wheat was abundant and excellent; and there is still one bearded sort, the ear of which is three times as heavy, and contains twice as many grains as our common English wheat (Irby and Mangles, p. 472). Barley was also much cultivated, not only for bread, but because it was the only kind of corn which was given to beasts; for oats and rye do not grow in warm climates. Hay was not in use; and therefore the barley was mixed with chopped straw to form the food of cattle (Gen. xxiv, 25, 32; Judg. xix, 19, etc.). Other kinds of field culture were millet, spelt, various species of beans and peas, pepperwort, cummin, cucumbers, melons, flax, and perhaps cotton. Many other articles might be mentioned as being now cultivated in Palestine; but, as their names do not occur in Scripture, it is difficult to know whether they were grown there in ancient times or not. The cereal crops of constant mention are wheat and barley, and more rarely rye and millet (?). Of the two former, together with the vine, olive, and fig, the use of irrigation, the plough and the harrow, mention is found in the book of Job (xxx, 40; xv, 30; xxv, 6; xxix, 9, 10; xxxi, 10). Two kinds of cummin, the black variety, "fēchah," (Is. xxviii, 27), and such podded plants as beans and lentils, may be named among the staple produce. To these, later writers add a great variety of garden plants, e.g. kidney-beans, peas, lettuce, endive, leek, garlic, onion, melon, cucumber, cabbage, etc. (Mishna, Kilaim, i, 2). The produce which formed Jacob's present was of such kinds as would keep, and had kept during the famine (Gen. xlii, 11). The ancient Hebrews had little notion of green or root crops grown for fodder, nor was the long summer drought suitable for them. Barley supplied food both to man and beast, and the plant called in Ezek. iv, 9 "millet," כנף, dockam (the hooko dockus of Linna according to Gesenius, Heb. Lex. s. v.), was grazed while green, and its ripe grain made into bread. In the later period of more advanced irrigation the כנה, tīlam, "fenugreek" (Buttfort, Lex. Talm. col. 2601), occurs (Mishna, Maaseeroth, i), also the כנף, shach'ath, a clover, apparently, given cut (Mishna, Peah, v, 5).

Mowing (12, γρ., Am. vi, 1; Ps. lxxii, 6) and hay-making were familiar processes, but the latter had no express word; כנה, caret, standing both for grass and hay, a token of a hot climate, where the grass may become hay as it stands. The yield of the land, besides fruit from trees, was technically distinguished as כנה, bekash, produce, including apparently all cereal plants, כנה, kimiyoth, pod-fruits (nearly equivalent to the Latin legumen), and כנה, sarmey' gëna, garden seeds (Buttfort, ib. col. 698), while the simple word seeds (כנה, zarmim) was used also generically for all seed, including all else which was liable to tithe, for which purpose the distinction seems to have existed. (See Otho, Lex. Rabl. p. 17 sq.). See BOTANY.

The rotation of crops, familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii, p. 4), can hardly have been unknown to the Hebrews. Sowing a field with divers seeds was forbidden (Deut. xxii, 9), and minute directions are given by the rabbis for arranging a seeded surface with great variety, yet avoiding the juxtaposition of heterogenea. Some of these arrangements are shown in the annexed drawings (from Surenhusius's Mischne,

...Three furrows' interval was the prescribed margin (Kilaim, ii, 6). The blank spaces represent such margins, often tapering to save ground. In a vineyard wide spaces were often left between the vines, for whose roots a radius of four cubits was allowed, and the rest of the space cropped; so herb-gardens stood in the midst of vineyards (Peah, v, 5). Similar arrangements were observed in the case of a field of grain with olives about and amidst it.

Anciently, as now, in Palestine and the East the arable lands were not divided into fields by fences, as in most countries. The ripening products therefore presented an expanse of culture unbroken, although perhaps variegated, in a large view, by the difference of the products grown. The boundaries of lands were therefore marked by stones as landmarks, which, even in patriarchal times, it was deemed a heinous wrong to remove (Job xxiv, 2); and the law pronounced a curse upon those who, without authority, disturbed them (Deut. xix, 14; xxvii, 17). The walls and hedges which are occasionally mentioned in Scripture... belonged to orchards, gardens, and vineyards. See Garden. Fields and doors were not commonly enclosed; vineyards mostly were, with a tower and other buildings (Num. xxii, 24; Isa. lxix, 18; Isa. vi, 5). Banks of mud from ditches were also used. See Wall.

was like the Egyptian, and the process of ploughing like that called scarificatio by the Romans ("Syria tenui sulco arat," Plin. xviii, 47), one yoke of oxen mostly sufficient to draw it. Mountains and rough places were hoed (Isa. vii, 5; Maimon. ad Mishn. vi, 2). The breaking up of new land was performed, as with the Romans, in "early spring" (were now). Such new ground and fallows, the use of which latter was familiar to the Jews (Jer. iv, 3; Hos. x, 12), were cleared of stones and of thorns (Isa. v, 2; Gemara Hierosol. ad loc.) early in the year, sowing or gathering from "among thorns" being a proverb for slovenly husbandry (Job v, 5; Prov. xxviii, 30, 31; Robinson, ii, 127). Virgin land was ploughed a second time. The proper words are "

V. Agricultural Operations and Implements.—Of late years much light has been thrown upon the agricultural operations and implements of ancient times, by the discovery of various representations on the sculptured monuments and painted tombs of Egypt, and (to some degree) of Assyria. As these agree surprisingly with the notices in the Bible, and, indeed, differ little from what we still find employed in Syria and Egypt, it is very safe to receive them as guides on the present subject (see also Gores's Assyria, p. 560).

1. Ploughing has always been a light and superficial operation in the East. At first, the ground was opened with pointed sticks; then a kind of hoe was employed; and this, in many parts of the world, is still used as a substitute for the plough. But the plough was known in Egypt and Syria before the Hebrews became cultivators (Job i, 14). At first it was little for manure (Fellows, Asia Minor, p. 72). Where the soil was heavier, the ploughing was best done dry ("dum sicca tellure licet," Virg. Georg. i, 214); and there generally, the hoeing (arratia, ἄρατιον, idior, dressing), and even the livario, or ridging, of Roman husbandry, performed with fasces attached to the sides of the share, might be useful (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antig. s. v. Aratrum). But the more formal routine of heavy western soils must not be made the standard of such a naturally fine tillth as that of Palestine generally (comp. Columella, ii, 12). During the rains, if not too heavy, or between their two periods, would be the best time for these operations; thus 70 days before the passover was the time prescribed for sowing for the "wheat-sheaf," and, probably, therefore, for that of barley generally. The plough was drawn by oxen, which were sometimes urged by a scourge (Isa. x, 26; Sahum iii, 2), but oftener by a long staff, furnished at one end with a flat piece of metal for clearing the plough, and at the other with a spike for goading the oxen. This ox-rod (q. v.) might easily be used as a spear (Judg. iii, 31; 1 Sam. xiii, 21). Sometimes men followed the plough with hoes to break the clods (Isa. xxviii, 24); but in later times a kind of harrow was employed, which appears to have been then, as now, merely a thick block of wood, pressed down by a weight, or by a man sitting on it, and drawn over the ploughed field. See Plough.

2. Sowing.—The ground, having been ploughed as soon as the autumnal rains had mollified the soil, was fit, by the end of October, to receive the seed; and the sowing of wheat continued, in different situations, through November into December. Barley was not generally sown till January and February. The seed appears to have been sown and harrowed at the same time, although sometimes it was ploughed in by a cross furrow. See Sowing.

Occasionally, however, the sowing was by patches only in well-manured spots, a process called "םֶתָנָה, memanah", variegating like a leopard, from its spotted appearance, as represented in the accompanying drawing by Surenhusius (i, 46) to illustrate the Mishna.

3. Ploughing in the Seed.—The Egyptian paintings illustrate the Scriptures by showing that in those soils which needed no previous preparation by the hoe (for breaking the clods) the sower followed the plough, holding in the left hand a basket of seed, which he scattered with the right hand, while another person filled a fresh basket. We also see that the mode of sowing was what we call "broadcast," in which the seed is thrown loosely over the field (Matt. xiii, 3-8). In Egypt, when the levels were low, and the water had continued long upon the land, they often dispensed with the plough altogether; and probably, like the present inhabitants, broke up the ground with hoes, or simply dragged the moist mud with bushes after the seed had been thrown upon the surface. To this cultivation without ploughing Moses probably alludes (Deut. xi, 10), when he tells the Hebrews that the land to which they were going was not like the land of Egypt, where they "sowed their seed, and watered it with their foot, as a garden of herbs." It seems, however, that even in Syria, in sandy soils, they sow without ploughing, and then plough down the seed (Russell's N. H. of Aleppo, i, 78, etc.). It does not appear that any instrument resembling our harrow was known; the word "שָׂדָד, sadad", rendered to harrow, in Job xxxix, 10, means literally to break the clods, and is so rendered in Isa. xxviii, 24; Hos. x, 11; and for this purpose the means used have been already indicated. The passage in Job, however, is important. It shows that this breaking of the clods was not always by the hand, but that some kind of instrument was drawn by an animal over the ploughed field, most probably the rough log which is still in use. See Harrow. The readiest way of brushing over the soil is by means of a bundle composed simply of dry bushes. In highly-irrigated spots the seed was sown by clavus (Isa. xxxii, 20) as in Egypt by goats (Wilkinson, i, p. 39, 2d ser.).

4. Harvest.—The custom of watching ripening crops and threshing-shocks against theft or damage (Robinson, i, 460; li, 18, 83, 99) is probably ancient. Thus Boaz slept on the floor (Ruth iii, 4, 7). Barley ripened a week or two before wheat; and, as fine harvest weather was certain (Prov. xxxvi, 1; 1 Sam. xii, 17; Amos iv, 7), the crop chiefly varied with the quantity of timely rain. The period of harvest must always have differed according to elevation, aspect, etc. (Robinson, i, 450, 551). The proportion of harvest gathered to seed sown was often vast, a hundred-fold is mentioned, but in such a way as to signify that it was a limit rarely attained (Gen. xxvi, 12; Matt. xiii, 8).

Among the Israelites, with all other people, the harvest was a season of joy, and such is more than once alluded to in Scripture (Psa. cxxxvi, 5; Isa. ix, 17). See Harvest.

Reaping.—In the most ancient times the corn was plucked up by the roots, which continued to be the practice with particular kinds of grain after the sickle was known. In Egypt, at this day, barley and "door-

Palestine, by the consideration pointed out by Russell (N. H. of Aleppo, i, 74), who states that "wheat, as well as barley in general, does not grow half as high as in Britain; and is therefore, like other grain, not reaped with the sickle, but plucked up by the roots with the hand. In other parts of the country, where the corn grows ranker, the sickle is used." When the sickle was used, the wheat was either cropped off under the ear or cut close to the ground. In the former case, the straw was afterward plucked up for use; in the latter, the stubble was left and burned on the ground for manure. As the Egyptians needed not such manure, and were economical of straw, they generally followed the former method; while the Israelites, whose lands derived benefit from the burned stubble, used the latter, although the practice of cutting off the ears was also known to them (Job xxiv, 24). Cropping the ears short, the Egyptians did not generally bind them into sheaves, but removed them in baskets. Sometimes, however, they bound them into sheaves; and such as they plucked up were bound into single long sheaves. The Israelites ap-

Reaping—4000, while the other had more resemblance in its shape to a scythe, and some of the Egyptian examples appear to have been toothed. This last is probably the same as the Hebrew maggāl, which is indeed rendered by scytch in the margin of Jer. 1, 16. See Sickle.

The reapers were the owners and their children, men-servants and women-servants, and day-laborers (Ruth ii, 4, 6, 21, 23; John iv, 36; James v, 4). Refreshments were provided for them, especially drink, of which the gleaners were allowed to partake (Ruth ii, 9). So in the Egyptian harvest-scenes (as above depicted), we perceive a provision of water in skins, hung against trees or in jars upon stands, with the reapers drinking, and gleaners applying to share the draught. Among the Israelites, gleaning was one of the stated provisions for the poor; and for their benefit the corners of the field were left unreeaped, and the reapers might not return for a second crop. The gleaners, however, were to obtain in the first place express permission of the proprietor or his steward (Lev. xix, 9, 10; Deut. xxiv, 19; Ruth ii, 2, 7). See Reaping; Gleaning.

6. Threshing.—Formerly the sheaves were conveyed from the field to the threshing-floor in carts; but now they are borne, generally, on the backs of camels and asses. The threshing-floor is a level plot of ground, of a circular shape, generally about fifty feet in diameter, prepared for use by beating down the earth till a hard floor is formed (Judg. vi, 5). Such floors were probably permanent, and became well-known spots (Gen. i, 10, 11; 2 Sam. xxiv, 16, 18). Sometimes several of these floors are contiguous to each other. The sheaves are spread out upon them; and the grain is trodden out by oxen, cows, and young cattle, arranged usually five abreast, and driven in a circle, or rather in all directions, over the floor. This was the common mode in the Bible times; and Moses forbids that the oxen thus employed should be muzzled to prevent them from treading the corn (Deut. xxv, 4; Isa. xxviii, 28). See Muzzle.

Flails, or sticks, were only used in threshing small quantities, or for the lighter kinds of grain (Ruth ii, 17; Isa. xxviii, 27). There were, however, some kinds of threshing instruments, such as are still used in Egypt and Palestine. One of them is composed of two thick planks, fastened together side by side, and

With regard to sickles, there appear to have been two kinds, indicated by the different names בָּשָׁלִּים, chermesh, and מַגָּל, maggal; and as the former occurs only in the Pentateuch (Deut. vi, 5; xxiii, 20), and the latter only in the Prophets (Jer. ii, 16; Joel i, 17), it would seem that the one was the earlier and the other the later instrument. But as we observe two very different kinds of sickles in use among the Egyptians, not only at the same time, but in the same field, it may have been so with the Jews also. The figures of these Egyptian sickles probably mark the difference between them. One was very much like our common bent upward in front. Sharp fragments of stone are fixed into holes bored in the bottom. This machine is drawn over the corn by oxen—a man or boy sometimes sitting on it to increase the weight. It not only separates the grain, but cuts the straw and makes it fit for fodder (2 Kings xxxii, 7). This is, most probably, the הַכָּרַע, 'kara'ot, or "corn-drill," which is mentioned in Scripture (Isa. xxviii, 27; xli, 15; Amos i, 3; rendered "threshing instrument"), and would seem to have been sometimes furnished with iron points instead of stones. The Bible also notices a machine called a שִׁנִּיה, morag' (2 Sam. xxiv, 22; 1 Chron. xxi, 23; Isa. xli, 15), which is unquestionably seen in Palestine; but is more used in some parts of Syria, and is common in Egypt. It is a sort of frame of wood, in which are inserted three wooden rollers armed with iron teeth, etc. It bears a sort of seat or chair, in which the driver sits to give the benefit of his weight. It is generally drawn over the corn by two oxen, and separates the grain, and breaks up the straw even more effectually than the drag. In all these processes, the corn is occasionally turned by a fork, and, when sufficiently threshed, is thrown up by the same fork against the wind to separate the grain, which is then gathered up and winnowed. barley was sometimes soaked and then parched before treading out, which got rid of the pellele of the grain. (See further the Antiquitates Titratae, Ugozlini, xxix.) See THRESHING.

7. Winnowing was generally accomplished by repeating the process of tossing up the grain against the wind with a fork (Jer. iv, 11, 12), by which the broken straw and chaff were dispersed, while the grain fell to the ground. After this it underwent a still further purification, by being tossed up with wooden scoops or short-handed shovels, such as we see in Egyptian paintings (Isa. xxx, 24). See WINNOWING.

difference is very doubtful) indicate a conspicuous part of ancient husbandry (Psa. xxxv, 5; Job xxi, 18; Isa. xvii, 13), and important, owing to the slovenly threshing. Evening was the favorite time (Ruth iii, 7), when there was mostly a breeze. The makhe (scatterer, prob. = רַכָּת, Matt. iii, 12; Hom. Iliad, xviii, 50) was perhaps a broad shovel which threw the grain up against the wind; while the rakath (blacker) may have been a fork (still used in Palestine for the same purpose) or a broad basket, in which it was tossed. The heap of produce customarily rendered in rent was sometimes so large as to cover the rakath (Misbaha. Bara Mezah, ix, 2): this favors the latter view. And the rakath (blacker) may also have been a fork (still used in Palestine for the same purpose) or a broad basket, in which it was tossed.

1. Grandson of Herod the Great, and son of Aristobulus and Berenice (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 1, 2; War, i, 28, 1). After various fortunes in Egypt and Judea (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6; War, ii, 9, 5), be received from Caligula, soon after his accession, the original territories of Philip (Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitica) and the tetrarchy of Lyctanias, with the title of king (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 10; Wars, ii, 9; Philo, Opp. ii, 520). Returning to Palestine in the second year of Caligula (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 11), A.D. 38, he was soon afterward invested likewise with the tetrarchy of the banished Antipas (Galilee and Perea), and finally by Claudius (to whom he had rendered important services at Rome during the changes of succession, Josephus, Ant. xix, 4; Wars, ii, 11) also with Samaria and Judea (Josephus, Ant.

Ant. a. v.). At the close of B.C. 17 he visited Jerusalem, and at the invitation of Herod the Great, and conferred many privileges upon the Jews of Palestine (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 2) as well as in Ionia (Ant. xii, 2, 1-4) and other provinces (Ant. xvi, 6, 4-7). He died, however, without a successor, as B.C. 9, by the death of his imperial patron. (Dio Cass. lib. 46-54; Liv. Epit. 117-137; Appian, Bell. Civ. lib. 5; Suet. Octar.; Tran- sen, Hist. Untersuchung u. M. Vip. Agrippa, Altona, 1836.) See Ascurres.

Agrippa, Fountius, probably the son of a Roman of the same name (Tacitus, Ann. ii, 30, 86), was procurator of Asia Proconsularis in A.D. 67, and was recalled by Vespasian, who placed him over Moesia, A.D. 70 (Tacit. Hist. iii, 46). He was shortly afterward killed in battle with the Sarmatians (Josephus, War, vii, 4, 8).

Agrippa, Heinrich Cornelius, was born at Cologne Sept. 14, 1486. He first followed the profession of arms, and served in the armies of Italy seven years with credit. Subsequently he took the degrees of doctor in law and medicine, and in 1509 had the chair of Professor of Sacred Literature at Dole, in Franche-Comté. After passing over into England on some secret mission, he took up his abode at Cologne, where he delivered some theological lectures called Quodlibeta. These were widely read, and were highly approved by the so-called secret arts, and he belonged to a society for the promotion of them. In 1509-10 he wrote his treatise De Occulta Philosophia, which was kept in MS. until 1581. But now he appears to have returned to his first profession of arms, and served again with the Emperor Maximilian I, until he was called to the Council of Pisa, in 1511, by the cardinal of St. Croix. In 1515 he taught theology at Turin and Pavia, where he explained Mercurius Triumphantus. After his wife's death in 1519 he wandered about for the following twelve years from place to place, and eventually, in 1535, he went to France, where he was imprisoned for having written against Louisa of Savoy, the mother of Francis I. As soon as he was set at liberty he proceeded to Grenoble, where he died in the same year, 1535. It has been said that he became a Calvinist or Lutheran, but without foundation. Many authors accuse him of dealing in magic; and Paul Jovius, Delrio, and others speak harshly of him. He was styled the Triumvirates of his time, because he was learned in theology, medicine, and law.

Agrippa was a man of quick intellect and of varied knowledge: in many respects he was far in advance of his age. His Oeconomia Philosophia is a system of visionary and monarchical views of world and political philosophy, as he terms it, and the key of all the secrets of nature, is represented under the three forms of natural, celestial, and religious or ceremonial, agreeably to the threefold division of the corporeal, celestial, and intellectual worlds. He there enumerates, with a superabundance of scientific classifications, the hidden powers which the Creator has assigned to the different objects of the creation, through the agency of the Spirit of the World. It was natural that Agrippa should become a partisan of Raymond Lulli (q. v.), and he accordingly wrote a commentary on his Ars Magna. Nevertheless his caprice sometimes inclined him to opinions incorrectly the reverse; and at such a mood he composed his cynical treatise, as he terms it, De Inseritutio et Vanitatis Scientiarum. This work, which had great reputation in its day, occasionally presents us admirable remarks on the imperfections and defects of scientific pursuits. It contains also some severe reproofs of the superstitions of Agrippa's sect of craftsmanship. He insisted on the Bible as the only rule of faith, and taught the necessity of a moral change through the Holy Spirit. Still he remained a Romanist to the end. Agrippa and his follower, John Weir, were of service to philosophy by opposing the belief in witchcraft. A full account of Agrippa is given in Meiners' Lives of Eminent Men, vol. i. His writings are collected...

Agrippia. See ANTHEDON.

Agrippius, a bishop of Carthage in the 5th century. He maintained, in opposition to Bishop Stephen of Carthage, that apostates had to be banished anew. His adherents were called AGrippinians.

Agoge, a disease of the fever kind, in which a cold shivering fit is succeeded by a hot one; in the Heb. תְּנֵה, kaddach atah, a kindling, a burning or inflammatory fever (Lev. xxvi, 16; Dout. xxviii, 22). See DISEASE.

Agurte, José Sanz de, a Spanish prelate, was born at Logroño, March 24, 1630, assumed the habit of the order of St. Benedict, and in 1668 took the degree of doctor at Salamanca, where he was chosen professor. He was afterward inquisitor, and in 1668 Innocent XI gave him the cardinal's hat as a return for the book which he had written against Gallicanism (q.v.). He was a man of acquisitions, but strongly biased in favor of ultramontane views. He died at Rome on May 15, 1677. He had written three folios on philosophy, and in 1675 a work on Aristotole's Morals. His Treatise on the Virtues and Vices appeared in 1677; in this work he followed the principles of probability, which he abandoned in 1679. During the following two years he put forth at Salamanca his Theologiae Amalge, which he afterward printed at Rome, in three vols. fol. In 1688 he published his Defence of the Chair of St. Peter against the Declaration of the Gallican Clergy; but another work, entitled De Libertatibus Eccl. Galliarum, is incorrectly attributed to him, having been written by M. Charlas, a priest of the diocese of Pamiers, who composed it at Rome. He is, however, perhaps best known by his Collection of the Councils of Spain (Rome, 1693-4), in which he inserted many original dissertations, some of which are attempts to defend the false decrees attributed to the early popes.

A'gur (Heb. Agor, אָגוּר, gathered), the author of the sayings contained in Prov. xxx, which the inscription describes as composed of the precepts delivered by "Agor, the son of Jakeh," to his friends (Isaiah 13, 1). Some writers have interpreted the name as an appellative, but differ as to its signification (Genesius, Thee. Heb. p. 22). The Vulg. has "Verba Congregantis filii Vomentia." Most of the rabbins and fathers think that Solomon himself is designated under this name, which they render collecter, i.e. holder of a congregation (comp. Eccles. xii, 19); and if the word is to be understood as an appellative, it may be as well to look for its meaning in the Syriac, where, according to Bar Bahul (in Castell. Lex.), agor means qui sapientia studia se applicat, a sense that aptly designates Solomon. Most copies of the Sept. omit the chapter ascribed to Aigor, as well as the first nine verses of the following chapter, but insert verses 1-14 of this chap. between verses 23 and 24 of chap. xxiv. That version renders the present verse thus: Toceh eti me lexov yev, fofidshet, eti lemyov avoet yamova. Tovi lemy o avom tois puvintov oth, eti panov. Son, fear my words, eti reccetin panov. With pienuess. Tell the man to those that believe God, and I cease. Winer (Revised s. v.) argues that by Agor must be designated some otherwise unknown Israelite, since he is designated as the son of Jakeh (אתויהש), a rarer form for "etio," and not Solomon, who, even in Eccles. (l. 1), is styled by his proper patronymic, "the son of David" (see viroth, Edw. v, 1970). See JAEGER. This argument, however, especially the latter part of it, is not of much force, since Solomon is elsewhere designated in Prov. by a symbolical name, in connection with his parentage (xxx, 1). See LEMUEL. Prof. Stuart (Comment. in loc.) understands by Agor the son of a queen of Massa, a place which he locates near the head of the eastern fork of the Red Sea, and supposes to have been peopled by a Jewish colony. See MASSA. Agor. See SWALLOW.

Agniani or Agyniand (from εὐ and γινω, a woman), a sect belonging to the seventh century, and chiefly distinguished by their condemmation of marriage, and of the use of certain meats.

Ah (Heb. Ach, אָח, or Achi, אֹחֵי, brother of) occurs as the former part of many Heb. proper names, with a signification of relationship or property, similar to that contained in An- (q. v.) or Ami-, father (Genesis, Thes. i, p. 64, e.g. the names following; and likewise applied to females, e.g. Ahoiam; comp. Ahoiam; indeed in some cases they are nearly interchangeable, e.g. Ahibimlech, Ahimelech.

A'hab (Heb. Ahab, אָהָב, father's brother; Sept. Ἀχαβ, Josephus Αχαβος), the name of two men.

1. The son of Omri, and the eighth king of Israel, who reigned twenty-one years (current, B.C. 915-896, the preceding year apparently as viceroy in his father's old capital, Jezreel), the last of the two great lines of Israelite kings. Ahab was one of the most powerful monarchs, although not without occasional good feelings and dispositions (Kitts's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). Many of the evils of his reign may be ascribed to the close connection which he formed with the Phoenicians (Ewald, Jer. Gesch. iii, 189 sqq.). There had long been a beneficial commerce between the Phoenicians and the Israelites, and the relations arising thence were very close in the times of David and Solomon. This connection appears to have been continued by the nearer kingdom of Israel, but to have been nearly, if not quite, abandoned by that of Judah. The wife of Ahab was Jezebel (q. v.), the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre, who had been priest of Astarte, but had usurped the throne of his brother Phalle (comp. Josephus, Ant. viii, 18, 2, with Apion, i, 18). She was a woman of a decided and energetic character, and soon acquired such influence over her husband that he sanctioned the introduction of the Phoenician sect into Israel, and they were intended as symbols of Jehova. But now the king built a temple at Samaria, and erected for Ahab and the Phoenician god Baal. A multitude of the priests and prophets of Baal were maintained. Idolatry became the predominant religion; and Jehovah, with the golden calves as symbolical representations of him, were viewed with no more reverence than Baal and his image. But a man suited to this emergency was raised up in the person of Elijah, who boldly opposed the regal authority, and succeeded in retaining many of his countrymen in the worship of the true God.—Kitto, s. v. See ELIJAH.

The history of King Ahab is given in detail in the sacred narrative, 1 Kings xvi.-xxii (see Obbabit, Gesch. d. Hebrae. Ahsen Ahab, 1784, 1785, 1786, 1787). One of his chief tastes was for splendid architecture, which he showed by building an ivory house and several cities, and also by ordering the restoration and fortification of Jericho, which seems to have belonged to Israel, and not to Judah, as it is said to have been rebuilt in the days of Ahab rather than in the time of the contemporary king of Judah, Jehoshaphat (2 Kings x, 29). But the place in which he chiefly indulged this passion was the beautiful city of Jezreel (now Zenin), in the plain of Esdraelon, which he adorned with a palace and park for his own residence, though Samaria remained the capital of his kingdom. Desiring to add to his pleasure-grounds there the vineyard of his neighbor Naboth, he proposed to buy it and give land in exchange for it; and when this was refused by Naboth, Benhadad declared war against him. Benhadad said, on the grounds that the vineyard was "the inheritance of his father" (Lev. xxv, 23), a false accusation of blasphemy was brought against him, and not only was he himself stoned to death, but his sons also; as we learn from 2 Kings ix, 26. Elijah, already the great vindicator of religion, now appeared as the scourge of meanness and lawlessness, and declared that the entire extirpation of Ahab's house was the penalty appointed for his long course of wickedness, now crowned by this atrocious crime. The execution, however, of this sentence was delayed in consequence of Ahab's deep repentance. (See Niemeyer, Charakt. v, 102). See NABOTH.

We read of three campaigns which Ahab undertook against Benhadad II, king of Damascus, two defensive and one offensive. See BENHADAD. In the first, Benhadad laid siege to Samaria, and Ahab, encouraged by the patriotic counsels of God's prophets, who, next to the truth religion, valued most deeply the independence of his chosen people, made a sudden attack on him, and obtained a splendid victory. He was banqueting in his tent with his 82 vassal kings. The Syrians were totally routed, and fled to Damascus. Next year Benhadad, believing that his failure was owing to some peculiar power which the God of Israel exercised over the hills, invaded Israel by way of Aphek, on the east of Jordan. Yet Ahab's victory was so complete that Benhadad himself fell into his hands, but was released (contrary to the will of God as announced by a prophet) on condition of restoring all the cities of Israel which he had held, and making "streets" for Ahab in Damascus; that is, admitting into his capital permanent Hebrew commissioners, in an independent position, with special dwellings for themselves and their retinues, to watch over the commercial and political interests of Ahab and his subjects. This was apparently in retaliation for a similar privilege exacted by Benhadad's predecessor from Omri in respect to Samaria. After this great success Ahab enjoyed peace for three years, and it is difficult to account exactly for the third outbreak of hostilities, which in Kings is briefly attributed to an attack made by Ahab on Ramoth in Gilead on the east of Jordan, in conjunction with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, whom he then claimed as belonging to Israel. But if Ramoth was one of the cities which Benhadad agreed to restore to Ahab, it is difficult to see how he could then enforce the fulfilment of the treaty? From this difficulty and the extreme bitterness shown by Benhadad against Ahab personally (1 Kings xxii, 31), it seems probable that this was not the case (or at all events that the Syrians did not so understand the treaty), but that Ahab, now strengthened by Jehoshaphat, who must have felt keenly the paramount importance of crippling the power of Syria, originated the war by assaulting Ramoth without any immediate provocation. In any case, God's blessing did not rest on the expedition, and Ahab was told by the prophet Micaiah that it would end in his assassination. Yet Ahab, who was the prophet's master, deferred to his advice and went to Ramoth with a large army. For giving this warning Micaiah was imprisoned; but Ahab was so far roused by it as to take the precaution of disarming himself, as not to offer a conspicuous mark to the archers of Benhadad. But he was slain by a "certain man who drew a bow at a venture," and, though stayed up in his chariot for a time, yet he died toward evening, and his army dispersed. When he was brought to be buried in Samaria, the dogs licked up his blood as a servant was washing his chariot; a partial fulfilment of Elijah's prediction (1 Kings xi, 19), which was more literally accomplished in the case of his successor Elisha: Josephus, however, substitutes Ezechiel for Samaria in the former passage (Ant. viii, 15, 6). See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OP.

2. A false prophet who deceived the Israelites at Babylon, and was threatened by Jeremiah, who foretold that he should be put to death by the king of Babylon in the presence of those whom he had beguiled; and that in following times it should become a common malediction to say, "The Lord make thee like Ahab and Zedekiah, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire" (Jer. xxix, 21, 22), B.C. 594. The rebukes, followed by several expositions, believe that this Ahab and his associate Zedekiah were the two riders who were seen riding against the chariot and life of Susanna, as related in the Apocrypha; but their punishment appears to have been by stoning (Penz, De suppillio Achaeh, etc. Lp. 1786). Ahara (Heb. Achraach, Αχραάχ), surn. after the brother; Sept. Αχράας, the third son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 1), elsewhere called Ein (Gen. xlvii, 21), AHIRAM (Num. xxvi, 80), and AHER (1 Chron. vii, 12). See AHIRAM.

Aharhel (Heb. Acharchel, Αχραχκηλ, abbr. born behind the breastwork; Sept. αθραχκηλ Προξεσθενης, a son of Harum, whose families are named as among the lineage of Coz, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 8). B.C. post 1612. See HARUM.

Ahassu (Heb. Achassay, Αχασσαγις, prob. a prolonged form of Ahaz; Sept. omitts, Vulg. Ahaza), a grandson of Immer and grandfather of Amashai (Neh. xi, 13). Gessenius thinks him the same as JAHZERAH (q. v.), who is made the great-grandson of Immer in 1 Chron. ix, 12.

Ahassuab (Heb. Achasabay, Αχασσαβαγις, prob. the Hebrew form of Xerxes; Tobit xiv, 15, Αχασσαβος), the name, or rather the title, of three or four Median and Persian monarchs in the Bible. See MEDIA; PERSIA. The true native orthography of the name Xerxes, long a subject of dispute (Simonis Lex. V. T. p. 598; Jahn, Einleit. in A. T. p. 299; Pott, Eynmol. Forsch. i, 65; Hyde, Rel. Vet. Pers. p. 40), has recently been brought to light from the cuneiform inscriptions (Glaenzer, in Heeren's Ideen, i, 2, pl. 4), where it is written kahhakaru (Niesbuer, ii, p. 24), or Khasuru (Lassar, Keilshcr. p. 23), which seems to correspond to the modern Persian xshahrshah, lionking (Gessenius, Thea. Heb. p. 75), corresponding nearly to the interpretation, apigios, given by Herodotus (vi, 86). It may be of service here to prefix a chronological table of the Media-Persian kings from Cyrus to Artaxerxes Longimanus, according to their ordinary classical names. The Scriptural names conjectured to correspond to them are added in italics. See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS; HIEROGLYPHICS.

3. Cyrus, son of his daughter Mandane and Cambyses, a Persian noble, first king of Persia, 559. "Cyru".

1. The first Ahaseurus (Sept. Αχασαβος, Theodoto-AHASUERUS

tion Xe[c]s[γ]s is incidentally mentioned in Dan. ix. 1 as the father of Darius (q. v. the Mede). It is generally agreed that the person here referred to is the Asnyages (q. v.) of profane history. (Jehring, in the Bibl. dren. viii, 565 sq.; Bertholdt, Exzurcs cum Dan. ii, 840 sq.) According to others, however (Raw-ington, Hist. Eub. ii, 261), his father, Cyaxares (q. v.), is meant, as in Tobit xiv, 15.

2. The second Ahazasusus (Sept. Ασσαριογος) occurs in Ezra iv, 6, where it is said that in the beginning of his reign the enemies of the Jews wrote an accusation against them, the result of which is not mentioned (Hastings, Eit. ii, 359). They have been very much divided in identifying this prince with those mentioned in profane history (Prideaux’s Conneckion; Gray’s Key; Tomline’s Elements; Hale’s Analysis; Ussher’s Annals); so much so that some au-or or another has sought to identify him in turn with each personage in the line of Persian kings, unless it be Cyrus and Xerxes. The form of the word favors Xerxes, but this is inconclusive, as it is rather a tile than a distinctive proper name. The account of Jo-ephus (Ant. xii, 6) favors the popular identification with Artaxerxes Longimanus, but his testimony is more opinion in such a case, and this king is elsewhere mentioned. Now from the account of Xenophon (vii, 1, 1) by his usual name. The order of time in the sacred narrative itself requires us to understand Cambyses (q. v.), son of Cyrus, who came to the throne B.C. 529, and died after a reign of seven years and five months. His character was proverbially furious and despot; much confusion has been caused by mistaking; this Ahazasusus for the following (Stud. u. Krit. 1847, iii, 660, 663, 678).

3. The third Ahazasusus (Sept. Ασσαριογος) is the Persian king of the book of Esther. The chief facts recorded of him there, and the dates of their occurrence, which are important in the subsequent inquiry, are these: in the third year of his reign he made a sumptuous banquet for all his nobility, and prolonged the feast for 180 days. Being on one occasion merry with wine, he ordered his queen, Vashti, to be brought out, to show the people her beauty. On her refusal thus to make herself a gazing-stock, he not only indignantly-discouraged her, but caused her to be stoned to death for disobedience, in order to insure to every husband in his dominions the rule in his own house. In the second year of his reign he married Esther, a Jewess, who, however, concealed her parentage. In the tenth year of his reign his minister Haman, who had received some favor from the king, went in his robes of purple, 10,000 talents of silver for the privilege of ordering a massacre of the Jews in all parts of the empire on an appointed day. The king refused this immense sum, but acceded to his request; and couriers were despatched to the most distant provinces to enjoin the execution of this decree. Before it was accomplished, however, Mordecai and Esther obtained such an influence over him that he so far annulled his recent enactment as to despatch other couriers to implore the Jews to defend themselves manfully against their enemies on that day; the result of which was that they slew 800 of his native subjects in Shushan, and 75,000 of them in the provinces. (See Journ. Soc. Lit. July, 1860, p. 366 sq.)

The same statements regarding chronology or exp. with reference to the identification of this Ahazasusus as with the preceding, with whom he has usually been confounded. But the circumstances under which he is mentioned do not well comport with those under which any other of the Persian kings are introduced, and leave us in Suspense as to the extent from the exterior to the Persian empire (Esth. i, 1), “from India even unto Ethiopia,” it is proved that Darius Hystaspis is the earliest possible king to whom this history can apply, and it is hardly worth while to consider the claims of any after Artaxerxes Longimanus. But Ahazasusus cannot be identical with Darius, whose wives were the daughters of Cyrus and Otanes, and who in name and character equally differs from that foolish tyrant. Josephus (Ant. xi, 6, 1) makes him to be Artaxerxes Longimanus; but as his twelfth year (Esth. iii, 7) would fall in B.C. 454, or 144 years after the deportation by Nebuchadnezzar, in B.C. 598 (Jer. iii, 28), Mordecai, who was one of those captives (Esth. vii, 6), could not possibly have survived to this time. Besides, in Ezra vii, 1-7, 11-26, Artaxerxes, in the sec-enth year of his reign, issues a decree very favorable to the Jews, and it is unlikely, therefore, that in the twelfth (Esth. iii, 7) Haman could speak to him of them as if they had nothing to hope for from him, and persuade him to sentence them to an indiscriminate massacre. Nor is the disposition of Artaxerxes Longimanus, as given by Plutarch and Diodorus (xi, 71), at all like that of this weak Ahazasusus. It therefore seems necessary to identify him with Xerxes (q. v.), whose regal state and affairs tally with all that is here said of Ahazasusus (the names being, as we have seen, identitical); and this conclusion is fortified by the resemblance of character, and by certain chronological indications (see Rawlinson’s Hist. Evidences, p. 150 sq.). As Xerxes scoured the sea, and put to death the engineer of his bridge because their work was injured by a storm, so Ahazasusus reproved his minister, because she would not violate the decorum of her sex, and ordered the massacre of the whole Jewish people to gratify the malice of Haman. In the third year of the reign of Xerxes was held an assembly to arrange the Grecian war (Herod. vii, 78 sq.); in the third year of Ahazasusus was held a great feast and assembly in Shushan the palace (Esth. i, 3). In the seventh year of his reign Xerxes returned defeated from Greece, and consoled himself by the pleasures of the harem (Herod. ix, 108); in the seventh year of his reign “fair young virgins were sought” for Ahazasusus, and he replaced Vashti by marrying Esther. The tribute he “laid upon the land and upon the isles of the sea” (Esth. x, 1) may well have been the result of the expenditure and ruin of the Grecian expedition. Throughout the book of Esther in the Sept. Artaxerxes is writtern for Ahazasusus, but on this no argument of any weight can be founded. See Esther.

Xerxes was succeeded in the second year of his reign by Hystaspis, whom he succeeded on the throne about B.C. 486, and was succeeded by his son Artaxerxes Longimanus about B.C. 466 (omitting the seven months’ reign of the usurper Artabanus). He is famous in history from his memorable invasion of Greece at the head of an army of more than a million. He was repulsed by the little band of Spartans at Thermopylae, and, after burning the city of Athens, were broken to pieces, and the remnant, with the king, compelled to return with disgrace to Persia (Baumgarten, De fide Esth. p. 141 sq.; De Wette, Einl. i, 274; Petavius, Doctrina Temp. xvi, 27; Kelle, Vind. Esth. Frh. 1620; Rambach, Annot. ii, 1066; Bertholdt, Einl. v, 2422; Scaliger, Emund. Temp. 1. vii; Justi, Neue Abhandl. i, 38 sq.; Gesenius, Thes. Heb. i, 75).

4. The fourth Ahazasusus (Ασσαριογος) is mentioned (Tobit xiv, 15), in connection with Nabuchodonosor (i.e. Nabopolassar), as the destroyer of Nineveh (Herod. i, 100); a circumstance that points to Cy-axares (q. v.). This king has subsequently been ascribed to an Indian king, son of Phraortes, and father of Astyages (Igem, Comment, in loc.).

Aha′va (Heb. אַハָבָה, מַדְתִּין, prob. water; Sept. Ἀοῦι, Ἀοῦς in Ezra viii, 21, 31, but Ἀοῦι v. r. Ἐνι in verse 15), the “river” (מַדְתִּין) by which the Jewish exiles assembled their second caravan under Ezra, in returning from Babylon to Jerusalem; or, rather, as appears from verse 15 (“the river that runneth to Ahava”), the name of some spot (according to Mi-cheias, a city; comp. De Wette, Einl. ii, 1, 589; but more probably the river Emphrates itself, which is still called "the river" by way of eminence, Geze-nlus, Heb. Lex. s. v.), in the direction of which the stream where they encamped ran. Some have inferred from the mention of Carphisa (q. v.), apparently in the same neighborhood (ver. 17), that the place in question was situated near the Caspian Sea, or, at least, in its neighborhood, but this would be out of the realm of direction, and no corresponding name has been found in that vicinity. Others have sought the Ahaba in the Lycus or Little Zab, finding that this river was anciently called Adiabaa or Diabaa (i.e. of Adiabene, Ammian, Marcell. xxii, 6; comp. Mannert, v, 429). But these names would, in Hebrew, have no resemblance to אָבָא; and it is extremely unlikely that the abode for the Palestine caravan should have been in the north-eastern part of Assyria, with the Tigris and Euphrates between them and the plains they were to traverse (Le Clerc, in loc.). Rosenmüller, on the other hand, supposes (Bibl. Geogr. II, 11, 93) that it lay to the south-west of Babylonia, because that was in the direction of Palestine; but caravaran routes seldom remained straight between two places. In this case a straight line would have taken the car-avian through the whole breadth of a desert seldom traversed but by the Arabs; and to avoid this the usual route for long caravans lay, and still lies, northwest through Mesopotamia, much above Babylonia; and the river being crossed at a point about midway between Babylon and the Temple and his own palace, and even appeared before him in Damascus as a vassal. He also ventured to seek for safety in heathen ceremonies, despite the admonitions of Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah; making his son pass through the fire to Moloch, consulting wizards and necromancers (Isa. viii, 19), sacrificing to the Syrian gods, introducing a foreign (originally Assyrian, apparently, Rawlinson, Hist. Evidences, p. 117) altar from Damascus, and probably the worship of the heavenly bodies from Assyria and Babylon, as he would seem to have set up the horses of the sun mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii, 11 (comp. Tacit. Ann. xii, 10); and the altars on the top (or roof) of the upper cham-er of Ahab (2 Kings xxii, 12) were connected with the adoration of the stars. See Astrology. The worship of Jehovah became neglected, and the Temple at length altogether closed. We see another and blameless result of this intercourse with an astronomical people in the "sundial of Ahab" (Isa. xxviii, 20). See Dial. He died at the age of fifty years, and his body was refused a burial in the royal sepulchre (2 Kings xvi; 2 Chron. xxvii, Isa. vii). He was succceeded by his son Hezekiah (see Simeon's Works, iv, 177).—Smith, s. v. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

1. (Sept. Haad v. r. 'Ayax.) A great grandson of Jonathan, son of King Saul, being one of the four sons of Micah, and the father of Jehohanan or Jarash (1 Chron.
v, 25; 2 Chron. xxv, 23, 27). B. C. 800-726.

Judah, who reigned fourteen years, B. C. 740-726.

A'ha zi'ah (Heb. A'chazia, 'Azia, held by Jebozah, 2 Kings i, 2; ix, 16, 28, 27, 29; xi, 2; 2 Chron.
xx, 85; elsewhere in the prolonged form, A'chaza, 'Azia,
'Azit; Sept. 'Oziq, but v. r. 'Oziq in 1 Chron.
l, 11), the name of two Jewish kings.

1. The son and successor of Ahaz, and ninth king of the house of David, reigned seven years (B. C. 805-4).
Under the influence of his mother, Jezebel, Ahabiah pursued the evil courses of his father. The most signal public event of his reign was the revolt of the vassal king of the Moabites, who took the opportunity of the defeat and death of Ahab to discontinue the tribute which he had paid to the Israelites, consisting of 100,000 lambs and as many rams, with their wool (comp. Isa. xvi, 1). The difficulty of enforcing this tribute was enhanced by the fact that after the battle of Ramoth in Gilead (see AHAAN) the Syrians had the command of the country along the east of Jordan, and they cut off all communication between the Israelites and Moab. The hostility to the Assyrians in the attemp'pt of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to revive the maritime traffic by the Red Sea, in consequence of which the enterprise was blasted, and came to nothing (1 Chron. xx, 35-87). Soon after, Ahabiah, having been much injured by a fall from the roof-gallery of his palace, but the infatuation to send to consult the oracle of Basl-zebub, the god of Ekron, respecting his recovery. But the messengers were met and sent back by Eljah, who announced to the king that he should rise no more from the bed on which he lay (1 Kings xxii, 51, to 2 Kings l, 50).—Kitto, s. v. See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

2. The son of Jehoram by Athaliah (daughter of Ahab and Jezebel), and sixth king of the separate kingdom of Judah; otherwise called Jehovahaz (2 Chron. xxvi, 17; xxxv, 23), and Azariah (2 Chron. xxii, 6). In 2 Kings vii, 26, we read that he was 22 years old at his succession; but in 2 Chron. xxii, 2, that his age at his death was 42. The former number is certainly right (comp. ver. 1), as in 2 Chron. xxii, 5, 29, we see that his father Jehoram was 40 when he died, which would make him younger than his own son, so that a transcript must have confounded 22 (29) and 42 (49). (See the treatises on this difficulty in Latin by Lillenthal [Regiom. 1750], and in German by Mühlenthal [Nordhaus. 1758].) He reigned but one year (B.C. 884-885), and that ill, being gored by his horse (2 Kings vii, 25-29). He joined his uncle Jehoram of Israel in an expedition against Hazael, king of Damascus-Syria, for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, and afterward paid him a visit while he lay wounded in his summer palace of Jezreel. The two kings rode out in their several chariots to meet Jehu (q. v.); and when Jehoram was not through the heart, Ahiahah attempted to escape, but was pursued as far as the pass of Gihon, and being there mortally wounded, had only strength to reach Megiddo, where he died (Grannmüller, Harmonia vitæ Achaear, Jen. 1717). His body was conveyed by his servants in a chariot to Jerusalem for interment (2 Kings ix, 25-26). The various titles are found in 2 Chron. xxii, 2-49. (see Poole's Synopsis, in loc.). It appears from the latter passage that Jehu was right in considering Ahaziah as included in his commission to root out the house of Ahab, his presence in Jezreel at the time of Jehu's operations being an arrangement of Providence for accomplishing his doom. See JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

Ah'ban (Heb. Ḥeḇôn, ʾāḇôn, brother of the wise, i.e. discreet, otherwise ʾāḇôn, wise, noble; Sept. Ἀχαβάς v. r. Ἀχαβαίος, the first named of the two sons of Ahab by Ahbanah, of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 29), B.C. long after 1612. A'her (Heb. Ḥeḇér, ʾāḇer, after; Sept. Ἀχαβός, a descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 12), the same person as Ahahah (1 Chron. viii, 1), or Ahirah (q. v.).

A'hi (Heb. Ḥeph, ʾāḥi, my brother [comp. Ahih], the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Ἀχή.) The first named of the four sons of Shamer, a chieflain of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 59), B.C. long post 1612.

2. (Sept. Ἀχήμ, but most copies omit.) A son of Abiel, and chieflain of the tribe of Gad, resident in Bashan (1 Chron. v, 15), B.C. apparently cir. 782.

A'hil (Heb. Ḥeḇil, ʾāḥil, another mode of Anglicizing (1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18; 1 Kings iv, 8; 1 Chron. vii, 7) the name Ahijah (q. v.).

Ahi'ah, another mode of Anglicizing (1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18; 1 Kings iv, 8; 1 Chron. vii, 7) the name Ahijah (q. v.).

A'ham (Heb. Ḥeḇ'am, ʾāḇam, mother's brother, pers. for Ḥeḇ'el, ʾāḇel, father's brother; Sept. Ἀχαβ, ʾαχαβ, ʾαχαβιδ, v. r. Ἀχαβιάνος and Ἀχαβίαν, a son of Sharar the Hararite, and one of David's thirty heroes (2 Sam. xxiii, 31; 1 Chron. xi, 35), B.C. 1016. See DAVID.

A'ham (Heb. Ḥeḇ'am, ʾāḇam, brotherly; Sept. Ἀχαβ, v. r. Ἀχαβιάς, the first named of the four sons of Shemihab, of the family of Manasseh (1 Chron. vi, 19), B.C. post 1856.

Ahi'zer (Heb. Ḥeḇ'zer, ʾāḇzer, brother of help, i.e. helpful; Sept. Ἀχαβίζη, the name of two men.

1. A son of Amminadib, and phylarch or chief of the tribe of Dan at the time of the exode (Num. i, 13; ii, 25; x, 25). He made an offering for the service of the tabernacle, like his comparses (Num. vii, 66, 71), B.C. 1657.

2. The chief of the Benjamite warriors and sengers that repaired to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii, 8), B.C. 1054.

Ahi'jah, the name of two men, alike in our version, but different in the original.

1. (Heb. Ἀχιὰ, ʾαχια, brother [or friend] of ὀμιός; Sept. Ἀγγελιής v. r. Ἀγγελίος), the second named of the two later sons of Bela the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii, 7), B.C. post 1856. See SHAHARAIM. Perhaps the same as Abihu (ver. 8). See JACOB.

2. (Heb. Ὄχιβ, ʾαχιβ, brother [i.e. lover] of renown; Sept. Ἀγγέλος), a son of Schemai, and phylarch of the tribe of Asher; one of those appointed by Moses to superintend the partition of Canaan (Num. xxxiv, 27), B.C. 1618.

Ahi'jah (Heb. Ἀχιὰ, ʾαχια, brother [or friend] of Jehorah, also in the prolonged form Achiyaḥ, ʾαχηία, ʾαχηύα, 1 Kings xiv, 4, 5, 6, 18; 2 Chron. v, 5; Sept. Ἀγγελος or Ἀγγίος, but omits in 1 Chron. ii, 25, oi Ἀγγελιανος ἄνευ ἄνων in 1 Chron. xxxvi, 20, v. Ἀγγελος. “Ahihah” in 1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18; 1 Kings iv, 8; 1 Chron. viii, 7), the name of several men.

1. The second named of the three earlier sons of Bela son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 7), [see SHAHARAIM, elsewhere (ver. 4) called Ahoah (q. v.).

2. The last named of the five sons of Jerahmeel (great-grandson of Judah) by his first wife (1 Chron. ii, 25), B.C. cir. 1612.

3. A son of Ahihah, and high-priest in the reign of Saul (1 Sam. xiv, 3, 18); hence probably the same as Ahimelekh (q. v.) the son of Ahihah, who was high-priest at Nob in the same reign, and was slain by Saul for assisting David (1 Sam. xxv, 11). See HIGH-PRIEST. In the former passage Abijah is described as being the Lord's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod. And it appears that the ark of God was under his care, and that he inquired of the Lord by means of it and the ephod (comp. 1 Chron. xiii, 8). There is, however, some difficulty in understanding this statement concerning the ark being used for inquiring by lots; as Saul's bidding and the statement elsewhere (1 Chron. xiii, 8) that they inquired not at the ark in the days of Saul, if we understand the latter expression in the strictest sense. This difficulty seems to have led to the readings of the Vatican copy of the Sept. at 1 Sam. xiv, 18, of “ephod” instead of “ark” (i.e. ἄρχος instead of ἀρχήν, in the Hebrew codex from which that version was made). Others avoid the difficulty by interpreting the ἄρχος in this case to mean a chest for carrying about the ephod in. But all difficulty will disappear if we apply the expression only to all the latter years of the reign of Saul, when we know that the priestly establishment was at Nob, and not at Kirjath-jearim, or Baale of Judah, where the ark was. The narrative in 1 Sam. xiv is entirely favorable to the mention of the ark; for it appears that Saul was at the time in Gibeon of Benjamin, so near the place where the house of Abinadab was situated (2 Sam. vi, 3) as to be almost a quarter of Kirjath-jearim, which lay on the very border of Benjamin and Judah. See Josh. x, 14, 28). Whether it was the encroachments of the Philistines, or an incipient schism between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah, or any other cause, which led to the disuse of the ark during the latter years of Saul's reign, is difficult to say. But probably the last time that Abijah, required of the Lord by means of the ark was on the occasion related 1 Sam. xiv, 36, when Saul masturbated his victory over the Philistines by his rash oath, which nearly cost Jonathan his life; for we there read that when Saul proposed a night-pursuit of the Philistines, the priest, Ahijah, said, "Let us draw near hither unto God," for the purpose, namely, of asking counsel of God. But God returned no answer, in consequence, as it seems, of Saul's rash cursing and commonly thought, and as seems most likely, Ahijah is the same person as Ahimelech the son of Abital, this failure to obtain an answer from the priest, followed as it was by a rising of the people to save Jonathan out of Saul's hands, may have led to an estrangement between the king and the high-priest, and predisposed him to suspect Ahimelech's loyalty, and to take that terrible revenge upon him for his favor to David. Such changes of name as Ahimelech and Ahijah are not uncommon. However, it is not impossible that, as Gesenius supposes (Thes. Heb. p. 65), Ahimelech may have been brother to Ahijah, and that they officiated simultaneously, the one at Gibeah or Kirjath-jearim, and the other at Nob.—See ANK.

4. A Pelonite, one of David's famous heroes (1 Chron. xi. 46); apparently the same called Eliam (q. v.) the son of Abihophel the Gilonite in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). See DAVID.

5. A Levite appointed over the sacred treasury of David, and over the Treasures in the Temple in the arrangement by David (1 Chron. xxvi. 20), B.C. 1014.

6. The last named of the two sons of Shisha, secretaries of King Solomon (1 Kings iv. 3), B.C. 1014.

7. A prophet of Shiloah (1 Kings iv. 2), hence called the Shilonite (xi. 29), in the days of Rehoboam, of whom we have two remarkable prophecies extant: the one in 1 Kings xi. 31-35, addressed to Jeroboam, announcing the rending of the ten tribes from Solomon, in punishment of his idolatries, and the transfer of the kingdom to Jeroboam, B.C. 973. This prophecy, though delivered privately, became known to Solomon, and excited his wrath against Jeroboam, who fled for his life into Egypt, to Shishak, and remained there till Solomon's death. The other prophecy, in 1 Kings xiv. 6-16, was delivered in the prophet's extreme old age to Jeroboam's wife, in which he foretold the death of Abijah (q. v.), the king's son, who was sick, and to inquire concerning whom the queen had come in disguise, and then went on to denounce the destruction of Jeroboam's house on account of the images which he had set up, and to foretell the captivity of Israel "beyond the river" Euphrates, B.C. 952. These prophecies give us a high idea of the faithfulness and boldness of Abijah, and of the eminent rank which he attained as a prophet. Jeroboam's speech concerning him (1 Kings xiv. 2, 3) shows the estimation in which he held his truth and moral powers. In 2 Chron. ix. 29, reference is made to a record of the events of Solomon's reign contained in the "prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite." If there were a later work of Ahijah's, the passage in 1 Kings xi. is doubtless an extract from it.—Smith, s. v. See JEROBOAM.

8. An Issacharite, father of Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings xv. 27, 33; xvi. 2; 2 Kings ix. 3), B.C. ante 950.

9. One of the chief Israelites who subscribed the sacred covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (Neh. x. 26), B.C. cir. 410.

Ah'kim (Heb. Achik'm, אֲכִיקִם, brother of support, i. e. helper; Sept. Ἀκίκιμ, the second named of the four eminent persons sent by King Josiah to inquire of the prophets of Huldah at Jerusalem, under the proper course to be pursued in relation to the acknowledgment of violations of the newly-discovered book of the law (2 Kings xxii. 12-14; 2 Chron. xxxv. 19, 20), B.C. 623. He afterward protected the prophet Jeremiah from the persecuting fury of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxvi. 24), B.C. 609, and other members of his family were equally humane (Jer. xlix. 19). He was the son of Shaphan, the royal secretary, and father of Gedaliah, the viceroy of Judea after the capture of Jerusalen by the Babylonians (2 Kings xxv. 22; Jer. xi. 5-16; xii. 1-18; xiii. 6).

Ah'lud (Heb. Achil'd, אֲכִילֵד, perh. brother of the Lydian; Sept. Ἀκιλλός, but Ἀκυλλός in 1 Kings iv. 12), the father of Jehoshaphat, chronicler under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 16; xx. 24; 1 Kings iv. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 12), and also of Baana, one of Solomon's purveyors (1 Kings iv. 19), B.C. ante 1014.

Ahn'sek (Heb. Achin'a'ts, אַחֲנַאי'אֵת, brother of anger, i. e. irascible; Sept. Ἀκινάς), the name of three men.

1. The father of Ahinoam, wife of King Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 60), B.C. ante 1093.

2. The son and successor of Zadok (1 Chron. vi. 8, 9), in the high-priesthood (B.C. cir. 956), in which he was succeeded by his son Azariah (1 Chron. vi. 9). See HIGH-PRIEST. During the revolt of Absalom, David having refused to allow the ark of God to be taken from Jerusalem when he fled thence, the high-priests Zadok and Abiathar necessarily remained in attendance upon it; but their sons, Abiathar and Jonathan, concealed themselves outside the city, to be in readiness to bear off to David any important information respecting the movements and designs of Absalom which they might receive from within. See ABSALOM. Accordingly, Hushai having communicated to the priests the result of the council of war, in which he was preferred to Abiathar, and to his mother Abihophel (q. v.), they instantly sent a girl (probably to avoid suspicion) to direct Abiathar and Jonathan to speed away with the intelligence. The transaction, however, was witnessed and betrayed by a lad, and the messengers were so hotly pursued that they took refuge in a dry well, over which the woman of the house placed a covering, and spread thereon parched corn. She told the pursuers that the messengers had passed on in haste; and when all was safe, she released them, on which they made their way to David (2 Sam. xx. 24-37; xvii. 15-21). B.C. cir. 1023. As may be inferred from his being chosen for this service, Abiathar was swift of foot. See RONER. Of this we have a notable example soon after, when, on the defeat and death of Absalom, he prevailed on Joab to allow him to carry the tidings to David. Another messenger, Cushi, had previously been despatched, but Abiathar outstripped him, and first came in with the news. He was known afar off by the manner of his running, and the king said, "He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings;" and this favorable character is justified by the delicacy with which he waived that part of his intelligence concerning the death of Absalom, which he knew would greatly distress so fond a father as David (2 Sam. xviii. 13-30).

—Kitto, s. v. See DAVID.

3. Solomon's purveyor in Naphtali, who married Basmath, Solomon's daughter (1 Kings iv. 15), B.C. post 1014.

Ah'man (Heb. Ach'man, אַחֲמָן, in pause Ah'man', brother of a gift, i. e. liberal; Sept. Ἀχίμαν, but in 1 Chron. ix. 17, Ἀμίαν v. r. Διμών), the name of two men.

1. One of the three famous giants of the race of Anak, who dwelt at Hebron when the first Hebrew spies explored the land (Num. xxii. 33), B.C. 1657; and who (or their descendants, Keil, Comment. in loc.) were afterward expelled by Caleb (Josh. xv. 14), B.C. 1612, and themselves eventually slain by the Judites (Judg. i. 10), B.C. cir. 1593.

2. One of the Levitical temple wardens after the exile (1 Chron. ix. 17), B.C. cir. 516.
1. The twelfth high-priest of the Jews, B.C. cir. 1085-1060, son of Ahitub (q. v.), and father of Abiathar (q. v.); apparently called also Ahiah (q. v.). See High-priest. (On the difficulties involved in these names, see KOTEN, in Jour. Biblical Lit., xvi. 229 ff.).

2. Ahiah was king of the tribe of Judah in the days of Rehoboam (1 Chron. xi. 17, 20). He is also mentioned in the same capacity in the Kiriath-jearim, in a passage which is not included in the text of any of the Septuagint manuscripts (see 1 Chron. xi. 20, 22).

3. Ahiah was the first (according to Josephus, Ant. vi. 13, 8) wife of David, while yet a private person (1 Sam. xxv. 48; xxvii, 8), B.C. 1060. In common with his other wife, she was taken captive by the Amalekites when they plundered Ziklag, but was recovered by David (1 Sam. xxx, 5, 18). B.C. 1054. She is again mentioned as living with him when he was king of Judah in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 5), B.C. 1052, and was the mother of his eldest son Amnon (2 Sam. iii. 2). See DAVID.

Ahi (Heb. Acheg), יִהְיֶה, brotherly; Sept. in all cases translates as an appellative, his brother or brethren, the name of two men. (In 1 Chron. viii. 14 we should read יִהְיֶה his brother, as an appellative of Sha-shak following.)

1. The fifth named of the sons of Jehiel, or Jeiel, the Gibeonite, by Maachah (1 Chron. viii. 31, ix. 57), B.C. post 1062.

2. One of the sons of the Levite Abinadab, who went before the new cart on which the ark was placed when David first attempted to remove it to Jerusalem, for the purpose of guiding the oxen, while his brother Obed-walked beside the cart (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; 1 Chron. xii. 7), B.C. 1043. See UZZAH.

Ahirah (Heb. Ackira), כִּירָה, brother of evil, i.e. unlucky; Sept. Achiraios, a son of Enan and phylarch of Naphtali, whose followers were numbered, and who made a contribution to the sacred service at the Exodus (Num. i. 15; ii. 29; vii. 78, 83; x. 27), B.C. 1567.

Ahiram (Heb. Ackira), כִּירָה, brother of height, i.e. high; Sept. Achiraios, a brother of Bela and son of Benjamin, whose posterity assumed his name (Num. xxvi. 38), B.C. post 1066; apparently the same with Ahirah (1 Chron. viii. 1), Ahin (1 Chron. viii. 12), and Ezr (Gen. xvi. 31). See JACOB, HARRAH.

Ahirame (Heb. Ackiram), כִּירָאָם, a designation of the descendants of the Benjamite Ahiram (Num. xxvi. 38).

Ahias (Heb. Achias), מַשָּׁה, brother of help, i.e. aiding; Sept. Achiasoios, the father of one of the famous workmen upon the tabernacle, Ahijah the Danite (Exod. xxxi. 6; xxxvi. 34; xxxvii. 29), B.C. ante 1657.

Ahiashar (Heb. Achiaschar). כִּירָשָׁה, brother of the dawn, i.e. early; Sept. Achiascharos, a warrior, first named of the sons of Benjamin of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 10), B.C. ante 1658.

Ahiashar (Heb. Achiaschar), כִּירָשָׁה, brother of song, i.e. singer; Sept. Achiascharos, the officer who was "over the household" of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 6), i.e. steward (q. v.) or governor of the palace (comp. ch. xvii. 9; Isa. xxii. 15), B.C. 1014—a post of great influence in Oriental courts, on account of the ready access to the king which it affords.

Ahithophel (Heb. Achithophel), אַחִיתוֹפֶל, brother of insinuabilité, i.e. foolish; Sept. Achitophelos, Josephus (Ant. viii. 32), the singular name of a man renowned for political sagacity among the Jews, who regarded his counsels as oracles (2 Sam. xvi. 23). He was the chief of David's body-guard in the days of Solomon (2 Sam. xii. 24), and the son Eliam (q. v.) was one of David's body-guard (2 Sam. xii. 24). He was a man of great weight and influence. When, in the days of King Rehoboam, by whom he was appointed to the government, it was decided to have a new capital, he was joined by the queen madre to oppose the car of Absonam's cause in Israel that a man so capable of foreseeing results, and estimating the probability of success, took his side in so daring an attempt (2 Sam. xv. 12). He probably hoped to wield a greater sway under the vain young man than he had had under David, against whom it is also possible that he entertained a secret malice on account of his granddaughter Bathidentified by Robinson under the abbreviated name of el-Jish, near Safed, in the hilly country to the north-west of the sea of Galilee (Researches, new ed. ii, 446; iii, 78). This place was in rabbinical times famous for its oil, and the olive-trees still remain in the neighborhood (Reland and Robinson, ib.). From it el-Jish, as the name implies, or from the town of Al-Tish, as it is termed in the siege of Jerusalem (Joseph. Life, 10; War, ii, 21,1), and it had a legendary celebrity as the birth-place of the parents of no less a person than the Apostle Paul (Jerome, Comment. ad Ep. ad Phil.). But this cannot be the Ahab of Asher. See GISCHALA.

Ah'la'i (Heb. Achk'ly, יִנְּחֶם, perh. ornamental), the name of a man and also of a town.

1. Sept. 'Ach's'el v. r. 'Dál'qó. The daughter and only child of Sheshan, a descendant of Judah, married to her father's Egyptian slave Jarha (q. v.), by whom she had Attai (1 Chron. i, 31, 34, 85). B.C. prob. ante 1068.

2. Sept. 'At'íh v. r. 'Am'mú. The father of Zabad, which latter was one of David's body-guard (1 Chron. xi, 41). B.C. ante 1046.

Aho'lah (Heb. Anko'lah, גַּלָּל, brotherly; Sept. 'Avá'ár v. r. 'Am'mó, one of the sons of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 4); called also AHIH (ver. 7), and perhaps 1H (1 Chron. vii, 7). B.C. post 1056. It is probably he whose descendants are called AHÔHTES (1 Sam. xxiii, 9, 28).

Aho'hte (Heb. Anko'chá, קֶחֶמ, i. q. q. ابن, she has her own tent, i. e. tabernacle, for luscious rites; Sept. 'O'a'dá v. r. O'a'dá, 'O'lá (vulg. Odóla), the name of an imaginary harlot, used by Ezekiel (xxiii, 4, 5, 36, 44) as a symbol of the idolatry of the northern kingdom, the apostate branch of Judah being desig- nated by this name. Ezek. xxi, 13; xliii, 25; xxxi, 26; xlv, 11), to which decent from Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 8), and his son Eleazor, one of David's three chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 9; 1 Chron. xi, 12), as well as to Zalmon or Hai, another of his body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii, 38; 1 Chron. xi, 29), and to the author of the Psalms (see Ps. i, 24; 1 Chron. vii, 4) the Benjamite (comp. 1 Chron. xi, 20).

Aho'lah (Heb. Olóah, עֹלָה, i. q. q. ابن, she has her own tent, i. e. tabernacle, for luscious rites; Sept. 'O'lóá v. r. 'O'lóá, 'O'lóá (vulg. Odóla), the name of an imaginary harlot, used by Ezekiel (xxiii, 4, 5, 36, 44) as a symbol of the idolatry of the northern kingdom, the apostate branch of Judah being desig- nated by this name. Ezek. xxi, 13; xliii, 25; xxxi, 26; xlv, 11), to which decent from Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii, 8), and his son Eleazor, one of David's three chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 9; 1 Chron. xi, 12), as well as to Zalmon or Hai, another of his body-guard (2 Sam. xxiii, 38; 1 Chron. xi, 29), and to the author of the Psalms (see Ps. i, 24; 1 Chron. vii, 4) the Benjamite (comp. 1 Chron. xi, 20).

Ahi'lab (Heb. Ach'láb, אֵלָה, fainness, i. e. fertile; Sept. 'Eláéle, תְּאֵלָא, a town of Asher, apparently near Zidon and Achzib, the native inhabitants of which the Israelites were unable to expel (Judg. i, 81). Its lying thus within the unconquered Phoeni- cian border may be the reason of its omission in the list of the Asherite cities (Josh. xix, 24-31). It is supposed to be Athal'na, a town of Asher (p. 115). Ahab' appears in later history as Gus's'hah (גָּשַׁה) or Giscala (Reland, Palest. p. 818, 817), a place lately with of Jehovah, but having prostituted herself to foreign idolatries (Haver Nik, Comment. in loc.). See Aholah.
AHLIBAMAH

AI

Aholiba'mah [many Aholib'amach] (Heb. Oholi-ba'machı̂m, 'load of the heifer'), the name, apparently, of a woman (Sept. Υλαζύμα), and of a man or district (Sept. 'Eli/zýmā) named after her, in connection with the family and lineage of Esau (q. v.). She was the granddaughter of Zibeon (q. v.) the Hivite (of the house of Sihon the Horite) by his daughter (q. v.)

and became one (probably the second) wife of Esau

(Gen. xxxvi, 2, 55). B.C. 1634. It is doubtful thro' this connection of Esau with the Canaanite inhabitants of Mount Seir that we are to trace the subsequent occupation of that territory by him and his descendants, and it is remarkable that each of his three sons by this

wife is himself the head of a tribe, while all the tribes

of the Edomites sprung from his other two wives are found by his grandson (Gen. xxxvi, 15-19).

In the earlier narrative (Gen. xxvi, 84) Aholibamah is called Jedrata (q. v.), daughter of Beeri (q. v.) the Hivite

(q. v.). The explanation of the change in the name of the father seems to be that Jedrata was the personal name and that Aholibamah was the name she received as the wife of Esau and foundress of three tribes of his descendants; she is, therefore, in the narrative called by the first name, while in the genealogical table of the Edomites she appears under the second. This explanation is confirmed by the recurrence of the name Aholibamah in the concluding list of the genealogical table (Gen.

xxxvi, 40-43), which, with Hengstenberg (Die Au-thentik d. Pent. ii, 279; Eng. transl. ii, 228, Tuch

(Comm. ad. d. Gen. p. 452), Knobel (Genes. p. 258), and others, we must therefore regard as a list of names of places, and not of mere persons, as, indeed, is expres-sively said at the close of it: "These are the chiefs (heads of tribes) of Esau, according to their settlements in the land of their possession." The district which received the name of Esau's wife, or, perhaps, rather from which she received her married name, was doubtless (as the name itself indicates) situated in the heights of the mountains of Edom, probably, therefore, in the neighborhood of Mount Hor and Petra, though Knobel places it south of Petra, having been mired by Burchardt's name Hemata, which, however,

according to Robinson (Researches, ii, 332), is a materially traversed by mountains around it, and not itself a mountain, as reported by Burchardt. It seems not unlikely that the three tribes descended from Aholibamah, or, at least, two of them, possessed

this district, since there are enumerated only eleven districts, whereas the number of tribes is thirteen, exclusive of that of Korah, whose name occurs twice,

and which we may further conjecture emigrated (in part at least) from the district of Aholibamah, and became associated with that of Eliphaz—Smith. See EDOM.

Ahum'alab (Heb. Aham'olab, "the brother of water,

i. e. living near a stream; otherwise, anotherly, Sept.

'Ayūyel), the first named of the two sons of Jaa-thah, a Zorathite, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 2), B.C. post 1612.

Ahum'azam (Heb. Aham'azam, "their possession; otherwise, tenacious; Sept. 'Qā'azāt v. 'Qū'azāt), the first named of the four sons of Ashur ("father of Tekoa) by one of his wives, Naarah, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 6), B.C. cir. 1612.

Ahum'azath (Heb. Aham'azath, "possessed,

as often in the constr. of פְּנֵיה, otherwise, tenacious

[the termination "-ath" being frequent in Philistine

language, comp. GATH, GOLIATH, etc.]; Sept. 'Qō'azāt,

Vulg. Ochazath), the "friend" (בִּקְרֵץ; 2 Sam. 25:16; 2

but rather, evidently, that unofficial

but important personage of oriental courts called "the king's friend" or favorite) of Abimelech

(q.v.), king of Gerar, who attended him on his visit to Isaac (Gen. xxvi, 26), B.C. cir. 1886.

AI (Heb. Ay, "ruin", perm. so called after its destruction, Gen. xii, 8; xiii, 8; Josh. vii, 2-5; viii, 1-9; ix, 1; x, 1; Josh. x, 11, 2; Neh. vii, 22; Jer. xl, 8; always with the art., הָעִי, in the passage last cited; Sept. Gāi in Josh., 'Ayyār in Gen., 'Ayīd in Ezra, 'At in Neh., Gāi in Jer.; Vulg.

longed forms φαώα, Ψαώα, Neh. xi, 81, Sept. 'Ayād, vii, 16; ἐλεώας, Samar. Gen. xii, 8, comp. 'Avād, Jēsephus, Am. v, 1, 12; Jerome Gai), the name of one or two places. See also AVIM.

1. A royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. x, 1), the site of which (not necessarily then a city) is mentioned

early as the time of Abraham, who pitched his tent between it and Bethel (Gen. xii, 8; xiii, 8), but it is chiefly noted for its capture and destruction by Joshua

(vii, 2-5; viii, 1-29). See AMBUSH. At a later period AI appears to have been rebuilt, for it is mentioned by Isaiah (x, 28), and it was inhabited by the Benjamites after the Conquest (Ezra ii, 22; Neh. vii, xi, 81). The site was known, and the ruins still exist in the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. 'Ayyār), but Dr. Robinson was unable to discover any certain traces of either. He remarks (Bib. Researches, ii, 318), however, that its situation with regard to Bethel may be well determined by the facts recorded in Scripture. That AI lay to the east of Bethel is certain (comp. Josh. xii, 9; "beside Bethaven," Josh. vii, 2; viii, 9); and the two cities were not so far distant from each other but that the men of Bethel mingled in the pursuit of the Israelites when they feigned to flee before the king of AI, and thus both cities were left defenceless (Josh. viii, 17); yet they were not so near but that Joshua could place an ambuscade on the west (or south-west) of AI, without its being observed by the men of Bethel, while he himself remained behind in a valley to the north of AI (Josh. viii, 4, 11-13). A little to the south of a village called Elazar, and on the heath called Mount

Bethel, the site of an ancient place is indicated by reservoirs hewn in the rock, excavated tombs, and foundations of hewn stone. This, Dr. Robinson inclines to think, may mark the site of AI, as it agrees with all the intimations as to its position. Near it, in the north, is the deep Wady el Mutayah, and toward the south-west other smaller wadys, in which the ambrushed part of Israelites might easily have been concealed. According to Schwarz (Palest. p. 84), the ancient name is still preserved in some ruins called

Khirbet Medinat Gai, near the edge of a valley, two English miles south-east of Bethel; a position which he thinks corresponds with a ruins called El Majd of

AI (Shemoth Rabbah, c. 32) as lying three Roman miles from Bethel (erroneously written Jericho). Thenius, however (in Käufner's Exeg. Studien, ii, 127 sq.), locates

AI at Turmus Ayn, a small rocky mound east of Sinjil (Robinson's Researches, iii, 85), a position which is defended by Keil (Commentary on Joshua, 1827), in which he has been influenced by an incorrect location of Bethel (q. v.). Stanley (Palest. p. 200 nce) places it at the head of the Wady Haritah. For Kraft's identification withKirbet el-Haray, see Rolinson (new

ed. of Researches, iii, 286). Van der Velde, after a careful examination, offers the opinion that no specific to the conditions except Tell el-Majdi, about 40 E. by S.

of Beita, on the southern border of Wady el-Mutayah, with no remains but a broken cistern (Narratives, ii, 278-282). This position essentially corresponds to that assigned by Robinson.

It is the opinion of some that the words AVIM in Josh. xviii, 13, and Gaza in 1 Chron. vii, 29, are corruptions of Ai.

2. A city of the Ammonites, apparently opposite Heshbon, and devastated next to it by the Babylonians on their way to Jerusalem (Jer. xlix, 3). Others, however, regard the name as an appellative here.

Al'ah, another mode (2 Sam. iii, 7; xxi, 10, 11; 1 Chron. i, 40) of Anglicizing the name Azaz (q. v.).

Al'aith, another form (Isa. x, 26) of the name of the capital of Judah (q. v.).

Achmel'htaroch (αχμεληθαροχ) an imaginary title (Carpov, Apocryph. Crit. p. 8 sq.), signifying chief of the captives, appointed to the head of the Jewish families during the captivity (q. v.).

Ad'an, born in Ireland about A.D. 605, was sent, according to Bede, by the Scottish bishop, at the request of Oswald, king of Northumbria, as missionary bishop to the Northumbrians, about A.D. 625. Upon his arrival in Northumbria, he was appointed, at his own request, to the see of Lindisfar, then first erected, on the island of that name. Here he set up the rule of St. Columban, and persuaded the king to establish the Church in his kingdom. "Often," says Bede, "might be seen a beautiful sight—while the bishop (who was but imperfectly acquainted with the English tongue) was speaking, and his office, who, owing to their long exile in Scotland, had acquired the language of that country, interpreted his words to the people." Bede says that "nothing more commended his doctrine to the attention of his hearers than the fact that, as he taught, so he himself lived, seeking for nothing and attaching himself to nothing which belonged to this world. All that the king gave him he quickly distributed to the poor; and never, unless when compelled to do so, did he travel through his diocese except on foot." He died August 81, 651, apparently broken-hearted at the death of the king, who, as he had predicted, perished by treachery twelve days before. He is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on the 31st of August.—Bede, Eccl. Hist. lib. iii, cap. 3, 5, 14-17; Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 21; Collier, Eccl. Hist. i, 293.

Aigen'ler, Adam, a German Jesuit, born in the Tyrol, 1633, who became professor of Hebrew at Ingolstadt. In 1673 he was sent out to China as missionary, and died on the voyage, August 16, 1675. Among his writings, he left Philosophia langui sancta (Dillingen, 1670, 4to).—Jocher, Allg. Gelehrten-Lexicon, Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, i, 454.

Al'a, another form (Neb. xi, 31) of the name of the city of At (q. v.).

Al'ajalon, another mode (Josh. xxi, 24; Judg. i, 35; xii, 12; 1 Sam. xiv, 31; 1 Chron. vi, 69; viii, 13; 2 Chron. xi, 10) of Anglicizing the name of the city Azalon (q. v.).

Al'ej eleh Sh'nah (Heb. 'al ej eth shah-Shark ur, יִלֶל שַׁנָּה, kind of the dawn, in which signification the terms often occur separately: Sept. ἡ ἀλειπότητα ἡ ἡμερήσιά, Vulg. suscipio mentis) occurs in the titles of Psalm 141, and is apparently the name of some other poem or song, to the measure of which this ode was to be performed or chanted (Aben Ezra, in loc.; Bochart, Hieroz. i, 888; Eichhorn, Prof. ad Jonestan, De Poesi Astart. p. xxxiii; Rosenmüller, De Wette, in loc.); like the similar terms, e. g. AL-TASCHRH (q. v.), which are the inscriptions of other Psalms (Ivi, lix, lixxxv), after the manner of Syriac poets (Asssemani, Bibl. Orient. i, 80). The phrase, however, is not necessarily taken from the initial words of a song (as Aben Ezra maintains, comp. Prov. v, 19), much less an amatory effusion (comp. the opening of a poem of the Doreid, "O gazelle"), but the title may be borrowed, according to Oriental custom, from some prominent expression or theme in it, like David's "Song of the Bow" (2 Sam. i, comp. Gesenius, Coment. in Isai, xxi, 1). It may in this case allude either to the hunting of the deer by the early daylight, as the most favorable time for the chase; or, as more probably, to the Arabic simile (Schultens, ad Medeas, Prop. p. 29), as well as rabbinic mention (Talmud, H. B. Berakoth, 80, 80, 85, 85, ed. Crass.). It may refer to the rays of the rising sun under the metaphor of a stag's horns (comp. Schultens and De Sacy, ap. Horrarium Com. xxxixi). The interpretation of Faber (in Harmer's Observ. ii, 172) as signifying the second element, is less agreeable to the etymology. Some (as Hare in the Bibl. Brem. Claus. i, pt. 2) understand some instrument of music; and others (e. g. Kimchi and the Talmudists) the morning star.—Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 45. See Psalms.

Ailly, Pierre d' (Petrus de Alliacus), a noted cardinal and learned theologian of the fourteenth century, surnamed the "Hammer of Heretics." He was born at Complègne in 1350, of humble parentage, and completed his studies at the college of Navarre in Paris. The dispute between Nominalism and Realism had been acute in his day, but D'Ailly thought himself lacerated by both schools, and was induced by the exigencies of his profession to enter upon a critical examination of the tenets of both schools. He soon became noted among the students for the skill and subtlety with which he advocated the nominalist theory, and for the wide extent of his general knowledge. At twenty-five he lectured in the university of Paris on Peter Lombard's Sentences, and soon obtained a brilliant reputation. In 1377, while yet a subdeacon, he was sent as delegate to the Provincial Council of Amboise, a rare distinction for one so young. In 1380 he was made doctor of the Sorbonne. In his inaugural address he extolled the study of Holy Writ, and afterward held lectures upon the New Testament and the Old Testament. D'Ailly declared that the passage, "Upon this rock," etc., Matt. xvi, 18, was to be taken in a spiritual sense, asserting that the Bible alone is the everlasting rock upon which the Church is built, as Peter and his successors could not be such, on account of their human frailty. He also distinguished the universal Church of Christ and the Church of Rome as a particular Church, and maintained that the latter had no precedence before the universal Church, and that another bishop than that of Rome might be the head of the Church. In 1384 D'Ailly was made the head of the College of Navarre, where Guillaume d'Orange (q. v.) and Nicholas de Clerval (q. v.) among his predecessors. When in the university of Paris, he defended the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception against the Dominicans, and especially against John de Montèce; and when the latter appealed from an ecclesiastical censure to Pope Clement VII, the university sent D'Ailly to the pope to defend before him the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, as also the opinion that the right to decide in such questions ("circa ea qua sunt sibi doctrinæ definitæ") does not belong to the pope alone, but also to the doctors ecclesiasticus. The pope approved both opinions; and the university of Paris elected D'Ailly, in reward for his victory, chancellor. Soon afterward he was elected a cardinal and almoner of Charles VI, archdeacon at Cambray, and treasurer of the Holy Church at Paris. In 1394 he was sent by Charles VI to Peter de Luna (Benedict XIII), to prevail upon this antipope to resign, but Benedict succeeded in bringing D'Ailly over to his side. Through him, was recognized by France as the legitimate pope. He approved D'Ailly in 1398, bishop of Cambray. D'Ailly continued to take an active and prominent part in the endeavors made for a restoration of the ecclesiastical unity. In 1409 he was a leading member of the Council of Pisa, and prevailed upon the council to depose all the popes who at that time claimed the Papal See. Alexander V was nominated in their place, but died soon after.

His successor, John XXIII, made D'Ailly a cardinal, and papal legate in Germany. As such, he took part in the Council of Constance, where he was again very conspicuous. See Constance, Council of. Soon after his arrival, and through his influence, the Council adopted a resolution that the vote on the reformation of the Church should be taken, not according to heraldic, but according to national representation. Shortly after, he once fixed the fate of John XXIII. He again urged the resignation or deposition of all the popes, and the election by the Council of a new pope, who should pledge himself to carry out the reformation decrees of the Council. He strongly maintained the superiority of the clergy over the laity, and the influence of his views Benedict XIV was deposed. He was one of the Committee to investigate the case of John Hius, and it is a stain upon his great name that he voted for the condemnation of the reformer. In the question whether the election of a new pope was to take place before or after the completion of the reformatory decrees of the Council, D'Ailly separated from the reformatory party (the Germans, Gerson, etc.), carried the priority of the papal election, and thereby neutralized to a large extent the beneficial effects which otherwise the Council might have produced. Martin V appointed him legate at Avignon; he led to the bull of February 1412, and returned to France in 1415; or, according to a contemporary account, on a legislative mission in the Netherlands, 1420. D'Ailly is one of the most remarkable dignitaries of the Church of the Middle Ages, and greatly distinguished both as a theologian and orator. He was, however, addicted to a belief in astrology, maintaining that important events might be predicted from the conjunctions of the planets. A very remarkable coincidence appears in the case of one of his predictions, viz., that in the year 1478, "si mundus usque ad illa tempora duraverit, quod solus Deus novit, multa tunc et magnea alterationes mundi et mutationes futurae sunt, et maxime circa legem et securam." This prediction was written in 1414, in his Conspectus astronomiae cum historicis narrationibus (published in August, 1490, 4to). D'Ailly may be considered as a predecessor of that liberal party in the Roman Catholic Church afterward represented by Bossuet and Fénelon. His principal writings were published at Douai in 1618, but there is some doubt as to the authenticity of some of his works. Among them are: 1. Commentarius Brevis in libros 4 Sententiae (1500, 4to);—2. Quatuor Principia in 4 libros Sententiae.—3. Recommissio S. Scripturae.—4. Principia in cursibus Bibliorum.—5. AIN

Alredus, Alredus, an English historian, born in 1109, and said to have died in 1166. According to Cave, he was an Englishman, educated in Scotland, having been educated together with Henry, son of David, king of Scotland. When he was of the proper age, he was offered a bishopric in Ireland, which he refused; and, returning to England, he took the monastic vows among the Cistercians of Revesby Abbey, in Lincolnshire. He became abbot of this monastery, and afterward of Rievaulx, and made Bernard of Clairvaux his model both as to his life and style of writing. His works include Historia de vita, and Sacramentum, a commentary on the "Decem Scriptores" of England, edited by Twisden, Lond. 1652; Genealogica Regum Anglorum; De Belo Storico; Historia de Sacramentio de Watton (all in Twisden); Sermones de Tempore et de Sancta (in Bibl. Clare Vallis); In Issum Prophetam Sermones III; Speculatiz Charitatis, libri 3; Tractatus de quoc. Jesus duodecennii (ed. by David Camerarius, de Scot. Fortitudo, Paris, 1613); De Spirituall Amicitia, libri 3. The latter four treatises were edited by Gibbon, a Jesuit, and printed at Douay in 1631; also in the Bibliothèque Cisterc. tom. v, 16, and Bibl. Patr. tom. xxiii, 1.—Cave, Hist. Lit. sec. xii, vol. ii, 297;—Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, cent. xii;—Landon, Eccl. Dictionary, i, 170;—Clarke, Sacred Literature, ii, 696.

AIMO. See Haymo.

Aimoin, also called Aimoun, Ayrouin, a French Benedictine of the convent of Fleury, died 1006. He was a pupil of Abbo of Fleury, at whose request he wrote the work Historia Francorum, which extends from 253 to 654. A continuation by another author, which is more valuable than the original, carries the narrative to the year 777. It is contained in Bouquet's Collection des historiens de France (Paris, 1738, 8 vols.). Aimoin also wrote Vita Abbonis Floridanensis, and several works on St. Bernard.—Hersoz, i, 198.

A'n (Heb. A'nīm, "a fountain") signifies literally an eye, and also, in the simple but vivid imagery of the East, a spring, or natural burst of living water, always contradicting distinguished from the well or tank of artificial formation, and which latter is designated by the word "Be'er" (לבר, lit. "the well") and "Bar" (לב, "lub"). Aïm still retains its ancient and double meaning in the Arabic 'Ain. Such living springs abound in Palestine even more than other mineralized springs, apart from their natural value in a hot climate, form one of the most remarkable features of the country. Prof. Stanley (Palest. p. 147, 509) has called attention to the accurate and persistent use of the word in the original text of the Bible, and has well expressed the inconveniences arising from the confusion in the Auth. Vers. of words and things so radically distinct as 'Ain and Be'er. The importance of distinguishing between the two is illustrated by Exod. xv, 27, in which the word 'Aineth (translated "wells") is used for the springs of fresh water at Elim, although the rocky soil of that place excludes the supposition of dug wells. Aïn oftentimes occurs in combination with other words, forming the names of definite localities; these will be found under En- (q. v.), as En-gedi, En-gannim, etc. It occurs alone in two cases. See Fountain.

1. (Sept. at Josh. xxi. 16, "Arar", at 1 Chron. iv. 22, "Hiv"); elsewhere it blends as a prefix with the following names, Ep-timus, Ep-imus. A city at first assigned to the tribe of Judah, on its southern border (Josh. xvii. 22), but afterward belonging to Simeon (Gen. xlvi. 11; 1 Chron. iv. 22). In all these passages it is mentioned as adjoining Remmon or Rimmon (q. v.), and it seems to be the beEx-Rimon (q. v.) of Neh. xi. 29. It was one of the Levitical cities (Josh. xxi. 16). Roland (Palest. p. 554, 629) thinks it the same with the Bethem (Be'eraim) of Judith 1, 9, and the Bethamim (Beth-samim) located by Eusebius (Onomast. s. v. "Aphi", i. e. "Aphi") at four Roman miles from Hebron. But these are rather the Bethanoth (q. v.) of Josh. xv, 59. Dr. Robinson conjectures it may have been the ruins of a village elsewhere in the ruins of which he saw in a valley a short distance to the right of the road a few hours south of Hebron (Researches, ii, 625). But this again is probably the Anim (q. v.) of Josh. xv, 56. The margin of our Bibles identifies this Anim with the Ashan of Josh. xv, 42, but in 1 Chron. iv, 32 both are mentioned. In the Making of the Bibles in 1 Chron. vi, 59, Ashan (q. v.) appears to take the place of Anim.

2. (With the art., τῆς Α' Ἀ. γ'.) One of the landmarks on the northern or eastern boundary of Palestine as described by Moses (Num. xxxiv, 11), near the lake Gennesareth, adjoining Shephan, and apparently mentioned to define the position of Riblah, viz. "on the east side of the spring." (Sept. εἰς πηγάς) (literally, from the east as to the spring), rather refers directly to the boundary as extending in general terms easterly in Aim, in the direction of Riblah (q. v.). By Jerome, in the Vulgate, it is rendered contra fontem Daphnem, meaning the spring which rose in the celebrated grove of Daphne dedicated to Apollo and Diana at Antioc. Riblah having been lately, with Aphek, identified with Riblah (Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 542-6; Porter, ii, 385) with a place of the same name on the north-east slopes of the Lebanon range, "the spring" of the text is probably the modern Ain, in Caele-Syria, between the Orontes and the Litany (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1847, p. 495), so called from a large fountain of the same name a little to the north of the village, which "is strong enough to drive several mills, and about it are heavy blocks of hewn stone of a very antique appearance" (ibid., 1848, p. 698). Dr. Robinson, however, thinks it is rather an appellative, and refers to the fountain of the Orontes still farther south-west of Riblah (new ed. of Researches, iii, 554).

Ainsworth, Henry, D. D., one of the earliest leaders of the Independents, then called Brownists; a celebrated nonconformist divine of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The time and place of his birth are unknown. In early life he gained great reputation by his knowledge of the Saxon and Hebraic languages and of the ancient fay of Hebrew. He removed about 1590 to Amsterdam, and had a church there (with an interval spent in Ireland) until his death, which occurred suddenly in 1622. Suspicion of his having been poisoned was raised by his having found a diamond, of great value, belonging to a Jew, and his refusing to return it to him till he had conferred with some of the rabbins on the prophecies of the Old Testament relating to the Messiah, which was promised; but the Jew not having sufficient interest to obtain one, it is thought he was the instrument of his death. Ainsworth was a man of profound learning, well versed in the scripture, and deeply read in the sacred writings of the rabbins. His much celebrated "Annotations on several Books of the Bible" were printed at various times and in many sizes. In those on the five Books of Moses, Psalms, and the Canticles, the Hebrew words are compared with and explained by the ancient Greek and Chaldee versions, and by the commentaries and monuments of the Hebrew. The "Annotations on the Pentateuch" were republished in Edinburgh (Blackie and Son, 2 vols. 8vo) in 1843.—Neal, Hist. of the Puritans, ii, 43; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 22.

Ainsworth, John, a Congregational minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., July 19th, 1757. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1777 and became pastor of the church at Jaffrey, N. H., Dec. 10th, 1782. Here he continued in the pastoral relation until his death, March 17th, 1858. He was an evangelical preacher of more than ordinary ability, and a man of great humor in his social intercourse, but earnestly intent in his great calling. He retained the respect and affection of his people to the last. Amer. Cong. Year Book (vol. vi, 1859, p. 117).

Aisles. See Eternal.

Air (ἀέρ), the atmosphere, as opposed to the ether (ἄτομπος) or higher and purer region of the sky (Acts xxii, 24; 1 Thess. iv, 17; Rev. ii, 2, xvi, 17). The Heb. term רָעֲךָ, r'akh, occurs in this sense but once (Job xlii, 16); "air" is elsewhere the rendering of נַפָּר, naphar, in speaking of birds of the heavens. The later Jews (see Eisenmenger, Entd. Jud. ii, 437 sq.), in common with the Gentiles (see Elmer, Obs. ii, 200; Doug. Annal. p. 127), especially the Pythagoreans, believed the air to be peopled with spirits, under the government of a chief, who there held his seat of empire (Philos. 31, 28; Diog. Laert. viii, 32; Plut. Quast. Rom. p. 274). These spirits were supposed to be powerful, but malignant, and to incite men to evil. That the Jews held this opinion is plain from the rabbincal citations of Lightfoot, Wetstein, etc. Thus in Pirke Abot, ixxiii, 2, they are described as "sitting in a flock, arranged in troops, in regular subordination (see Rosenroth, Cabalista demoni, i, 417). The early Christian fathers entertained the same belief (Ignat. ad Ephes. § 13), which has indeed come down to our own times. It is to this notion that Paul is supposed to allude in Eph. ii, 2, where Satan is called "prince of the power of the air (i.e. of those who exercise the power of the air," see Stuart, in the Biblioth. Sacra, 1843, p. 139). Some, however, explain "air" here by darkness, a sense which it bears also in profane writers. But the apostle no doubt speaks according to the notions entertained by most of those to whom he wrote, without expressing the extent of his own belief (see Bahr, Rec. Syn., and Meyer, Comment. in loc.). See Power; Principality. The sky as the midst of heaven, or the middle station between heaven and earth, may symbolically represent the place where the Divine judgments are denounced, as in 1 Chron. xxvi, 16. See Angel.

The phrase ἐκ ἀεροῦ λαίθει, to speak into the air (1 Cor. xiv, 9), is a proverbial expression to denote speaking in vain, like verba verba profundere in Latin (Lucret. iv, 292), and a similar one in our own language; and ἐκ ἀεροῦ ἐσπασαν, t' beat the air (1 Cor. 1 x,x, 26), denotes acting in vain, and is a proverbial allusion to the flight of birds into the air in pugilistic combats (comp. Virgil, Æn. v, 377). See Gases.

Alr's (Ἀλρ'ς, comp. Jairus of the N. T.), one of the temple servants whose "sons' are said to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 31); probably a corruption for Gahar (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 47).

Aisle is derived from the Latin ala, French aile, a wing, and signifies the wings or aisles of the cloisters of the church. The term is incorrectly applied to the middle avenue of a church, which its derivation shows to be wrong. While the aisle is but an aile to a transept, it is always to the east. In churches on the continent of Europe the number of aisles is frequently two on either side of the nave, and at Cologne there are even three. See Church Architecture.
AIX-la-Chapelle. A large city of Germany, dependent on the archbishopric of Cologne in spiritual matters. As the favorite abode of Charlemagne, it acquired great ecclesiastical importance; and many councils were held there. From the time of Otto I (937) to Ferdinand I, 1558, twenty-nine German emperors were crowned in this city. The first Council of AIX-la-Chapelle was held in 789, on discipline; in the council held in 799 Felix of Urgel renounced Adoptionism, which he previously upheld. The others are that of 803, where the Bene-dictines received their religious regulations; of 809, on punishment of the clergy; of 838, on the canons of the preceding council were published; 816, confirmatory of the rules of Chrodegang; 817, on St. Benedict’s rule, etc.; 825, on the same subjects; 831, declaring the innocence of the Empress Judith; 836, on the restoration of Church property; 837, on Epis-copal controversy; 842, by Kings Louis and Charles, on the division of Lothaire’s possessions; two sessions in 860, against Queen Theutberga; 862, allowing King Lothaire to contract a new marriage; 992, forbidding marriages during Advent, from Septem-to November in East- er, etc.; 1165, to canonize Charlemagne. — Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

A-jah (Heb. אָוֶ֛ה, יָוֶ֖ה, prop. a cry, hence a kaaz, as often), the name of two men.

A-khon (Heb. אָוֹן, אָוֶ֛ן, place of deer, or of oaks), the name of two towns.

A. (Sept. Aho, but Elah in Jos. xix. 42, iv qòq in Judg. i. 33, omit A in 1 Sam. xxiv, 31, H. 4. v. r. Alow in 1 Chron. vi. 69, Alah v. r. Elah and A-laah in 1 Chron. viii. 13, A-ho-sa in 2 Chron. xxvii, 18; Josephus Βαβακι, Ant. viii. 10, 1; Auth. Vers. “Ailullon” in all the passages except Jos. x. 12; xix. 41; 2 Chron. xxx. 1); a town and valley in the tribe of Dan (Jos. xix. 42), which was given to the Levites (Jos. xxii. 21; 1 Chron. ii. 63). The native Amorites for a long time retained possession of it, although reduced to the condition of tributaries by the neighboring Ephraimites (Judg. i. 33). Being on the very frontier of the two kingdoms, we can understand how Alah should be spoken of sometimes (1 Chron. vi. 69, comp. with 66) as in Ephraim, and sometimes (2 Chron. xl. 10; 1 Sam. xiv. 31) as in Judah and Benjamin. It was not far from Bethhehem (2 Chron. xxvii. 18), and was one of the places which Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. xii. 10) during his conflicts with the new king-dom of Ephraim. He passed through the strongholds which the Philistines took from Ahaz (2 Chron. xxvii. 18). Saul pursued him the route of Philistines from Michmas (1 Sam. xiv. 31), and some of its chiefs appear to have subsequently defeated an incursion of the same enemies from Gath (1 Chron. viii. 11). Although the town, or rather the valley which the town gave name, derives its chief renown from the circumstance that when Joshua, in pursuit of the five kings, arrived at some point near Upper Beth-horon, looking back upon Gideon and down upon the noble valley before him, he uttered the celebrated command, “Stand ye still upon Gideon, and thou moon, in the valley of Ailullon” (Josh. x. 12). From the locations of Jerome (Onomast. and Epist. Paul.,) who places Ailullon two Roman miles from Nicopolis, on the way to Jerusalem (comp. Ιωάν in Ephphan. 20, 705;), joined to the preservation of the ancient name, Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Researches, iii. 63) appears to have identified the valley and the site of the town. From a housetop in Beit Ur (Beth-horonom) he looked down upon a broad and beautiful valley, which lay at his feet, toward Ramleh. This valley runs out west by north through a tract of hills, and then bends off south-west through the great western plain. It is called Merj Ibh Oum Rabi, on the side of the long hill which skirts the valley on the south, and was perceived, called Yalo, which cannot well be any other than the ancient Ailullon; and there can be little question that the broad wady to the north of it is the valley of the same name (see Thomson’s Land and Book, ii. 304, 546). Keil, however (Comment. in Josh. x. 12), avoids controversy of the view of Jeremias, and most recent views, that the two ravines, the western one of which contains a fountain that supplies the village. It has an old appearance, and contains several cavers in the cliffs (new ed. of Robinson’s Researches, iii, 144).

A-khoymin (Heb. Akheymmin, יָהִיָּמְיִים, weary ones; Sept. ἀναφορίον, Vulg. lentos, Auth. Vers. “weary”) occurs in the original, 2 Sam. xvi, 14, where, although rendered as an appellative in the versions, it has been regarded by many interpreters (e.g. Michaelis, Dushe, Theinius, in loc.) as the name of a place to which the fugitive David and his company retired from Jerusalem on the south of the rebellious Absalom, and where they made their halt for the night, but from which they were induced to remove by the news sent them by Hushai. This view is favored by the phraseology, έν ἰρένης, and he came, οὖν, there, evidently referring to some locality, which must be sought east of Jerusalem, beyond the Mount of Olives, toward the ford of the Jordan; perhaps between Bethany and Khan Hidrur, on the S. W. bank of Wady Sidur.

A-chan (Heb. אָמַ֖נ, בֵּ֖אָמַ֖ן, twisted; Sept. τρίτον), the last name of the three sons of Zalman, son of the Horite Seir of Teman (Gen. xxvi. 17); elsewhere called Jakan (1 Chron. i. 41). See JAKAN.

Aked, a learned Jewish rabbi of the second century. He was president of the seminary at Iene Bemak (Jos. xix. 40), near Jamnia. As a teacher he wielded great influence, especially in developing and diffusing the Talmudic learning and the Cabalism. Among his scholars were Rabbi Meir, one of the commentators of the Misha, and Rabbi Sh. ben-Jochai, author of the Cabalistic work Zohar. He is said to have joined the rebel Barcochebas, and to have been taken and flayed by the Romans in his 120th year. See Jos. Geschichtl. d. Israelit. p. 222; Fürst, Bib. Jud. 1.

Akins, James, one of the early Methodist ministers, was born in Ireland 1776, removed to America.
in 1799, and entered the itinerant ministry in 1801. He labored for over twenty years with success, chiefly in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, and died at Haverstraw, Aug. 9, 1828.—Minutes of Conferences, 1824, p. 439.

Ak'kub (Heb. Akkō', עַקּּעַב, a contracted form of Jacob; Sept. Ἀκόβ, sometimes Ἀκοῦβ v. r. usually Ἀκόβι), the name of at least three men.

1. The head of one of the families of Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 45), B.C. 536 or ante. The name means "the names of the Temple," and it seems to return on the return with many of his family from the captivity (1 Chron. ix, 17; Ezra ii, 42; Neh. vii, 45; ix, 19; xii, 23); and probably one of those who expounded the law to the people (Neh. vii, 7), B.C. 536-440.

2. The fourth named of the seven sons of Elioenai or Eeli, a descendant of David (1 Chron. iii, 24), B.C. cir. 410.

Akrab. See SCORPION.

Akrabbim (Heb. Akrabbim, עָקֶרְבִּים, scorpiions, as in Ezek. ii, 6; Sept. Αἰχμαλώτος, Ἀχμαλώτος), one of the names in connection with MALLEKHIM (q. v.), i. e. Scorpion-Height (Josh. xv, 3; "ascent of Akrabbim" Num. xxxiv, 4; "going up to Akrabbim," Judg. i, 86), an ascent, hill, or chain of hills, which, from the name, would appear to have been much infested by scorpions and serpents, as some districts in that quarter certainly were (Deut. viii, 15; comp. Volney, ii, 266). It is only mentioned in describing the frontier-line of the promised land southward in the region of the Amorites (Num. xxxiv, 4; Josh. xv, 3; Judg. i, 86). Shaw conjectures that Akrabbim may be the same with the mountains of Akabah, by which he understands the easternmost range of the "black mountains" of Ptolemy, extending from Paran to Judea. This range has lately become well known as the mountains of Edom, being those which bound the great valley of Arbaah on the east (Travels, ii, 120). More specifically, he seems to refer Akrabbim to the southernmost portion of this range, near the fortress of Akabah and the extent of the eastern coast of the Red Sea; where, as he observes, "from the badness of the roads, and many rocky passes that are to be surmounted, the Mohammedan pilgrims lose a number of camels, and are no less fatigued than the Israelites were formerly in getting over them." Burckhardt ('Journey,' p. 217) also has probably the same conclusion, except that he rather refers the "ascent of Akrabbim" to the acclivity of the western mountains from the plain of Akabah. This ascent is very steep, "and has probably given to the place its name of Akabah, which means a cliff or steep declivity." But the south-eastern frontier of Judah could not have been laid down so far to the south in the time of Moses and Joshua. The signification of the names in the two languages is altogether different. M. De Saucy finds this "Scorpion-steep" in the Wady es-Zuzeriah, running into the S.W. end of the Dead Sea; a precipitous, zigzag ascent, up which a path marked with ancient ruins is cut in the flanks of the hard rock, and which is peculiarly infested with scorpions (Varraniti, i, 361, 418, 421). Schwarz, on the other hand, locates it at the Wady el-Kurbah, running into the south-eastern extremity of the Dead Sea (Palest. p. 22). Both these latter positions, however, seem as much too far north as the preceding are too far south, since the place in question appears to have been situated just beyond the point where the southern boundary of Palestine turned northward; and we know from the localities of several towns in Judah and Simeon (e. g. Kadesh, Beersheba, etc.) that the territory of the promised land extended as far southward as the ridge bounding the depressed level of the desert et-Tih.

The conclusion of Dr. Robinson is, that in the absence of more positive evidence the line of cliffs separating the Ghor from the valley of the Akabah may be regarded as the Maaleh-Akrabbim of Scripture (Researches, ii, 501). This, however, would be a decept and not an ascent to those who were entering the Holy Land from the south. Perhaps the most feasible supposition is that Akrabbim is the general name of the ridge containing the steep pass ex-Styful, by which the final step is made from the desert to the level of the actual land of Palestine. As to the name, scorpions abound in the whole of this district. The same spot may be that alluded to in the Mishna (Shabb. Rab. 2), as "the place where he was scolped." The district of Akrabattine mentioned in 1 Macc. v, 8, and Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 1, as lying on the frontier of Idumaea, toward the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, may have derived its name from this ridge. But Dr. Robinson thinks that the toparchy referred to took its name from Akrabah, now a large and flourishing village a little east of Nablous, the ancient Shechem (Be'ersheba). (See C. and R, 1863, p. 132; and other authorities in his Researches, iii, 103). This "Akrabattine" of the Apocrypha, however, was probably a different place. See ACRABATTINE.

Akrothinion (Ακροθινίων, from the top of the heap). This Greek word (usually in the plur. ακροθινίων), which occurs in Heb. vii, 4, means the best of the "(scorpion, hence) spica, the Class. Ant. a. v. (Acrothion). The Greeks, after a battle, were accustomed to collect the spoils into a heap, from which an offering was first made to the gods; this was the ἄκροθινιον (Xenophon. Cyrop. vii, 5, 85; Herodot. viii, 122, 123; Fинд. Neim. 7, 58). In the first cited Case, Cyrus, after the taking of Babylon, calls on the chorus to "proffer the spoils to the ἄκροθινιον of certain portions of the ground for sacred purposes (see Stephens, Thes. Grec. p. 1560). See SPOIL.

Alabama, a diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States coextensive with the state of the same name. In 1869 the diocese counted 32 clergymen and 36 parishes, and the following dioce- sene and churchmen; diocesan, Bishop George H. White; suffragans, Bishops J. B. Swann, and A. B. McClellan; dean of the cathedral, Mr. W. H. F. Sharpe; treasurers of the diocesan and bishop's church, Mr. J. M. L. Rudder; archdiocesan, Bishop C. J. Mount; and of the Episcopal Church, Mr. J. B. S. Swann. The diocesan, Bishop White, which, in 1862, organized "the General Council of the Confederate States of America."

Aklabarch (Ἀκλαβαρχός, a term compounded apparently of some unknown foreign word, and ἰκλέπτω, to rule; also ἰκλαβαρχός), a term not found in Scripture, but which Josephus uses repeatedly, to signify the chief of the Jews in Alexandria (Ant. xviii, 6, 3; 8; 1; xix, 5.1; xx, 5.2; 7, 8). Philo calls this magistrate Γυναῖκαρχος, γυναρχός (q. v.), which terms signify the prince or chief of a nation. Some believe that the term alabarch was given, in railedy, to the principal magistrate or head of the Gemalata, or by the Gentiles, who despised the Jews. See ALEXANDRIA. The Jews who were scattered abroad after the captivity, and had taken up their residence in countries at a distance from Palestine, had rulers of their own. See DISPERSION. The person who sustained the highest office among those who dwelt in Egypt was denominated alabarch; the magistrate at the head of the Syrian Jews was designated archon (q. v.). (See Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 239.) The dignity of alabarch was common in Egypt, as may be observed in Juvenal, Sat. 1, 120. It was perhaps synonymous with chief tax-gatherer (comp. Sturz, De Dietl. Mosul. p. 65 sq.). Thus Cicero (Ep. ad Attic. 17) calls Pompey an ala-phærusa, sets this matter in a clear light, distinguishing the alabasterites of naturalists as harsh as the addes:

"This stone was by the Greeks called also sometimes onyx, and by the Latin marmor onyx, from its use in making boxes to preserve ointments, which boxes were commonly called onyxes and alabasters. So Diodorus interprets it. It is apprehended that, from certain appearances common to both, the same name was given not only to the common alabaster, called by mineralogists gypsum, and by chemists sulphate of lime, but also to the carbonate of lime that has a harder stone from which the alabaster were usually made."

By the English word alabaster is likewise to be understood both that kind which is also known by the name of gypsum, and the Oriental alabaster which is so much valued on account of its translucency, and for the variety of colored streakings, red, yellow, gray, etc., which it owes for the most part to the admixture of oxides of iron. The latter is a fibrous carbonate of lime, of which there are many varieties, satum spar being one of the most common. The former is a hydrous sulphate of lime, and forms, when calcined and ground, the well-known substance called plaster of Paris. Both these kinds of alabaster, but especially the latter, are and have been long used for various ornamental purposes, such as the fabrication of vases, boxes, etc., etc. The ancients considered alabaster (carbonate of lime) to be the best material in which to preserve their ointments (Pliny, H. N. xiii. 8). Herodotus (iii. 20) mentions an alabaster vessel of ointment which Cambyses sent, among other things, as a present to the Ethiopians. Hammond (Annal. ed Matt. xxvi, 7) quotes Plutarch, Julius Pollux, and Athenæus, to show that alabaster was the material in which ointments were wont to be kept. Pliny (ix, 56) tells us that the usual form of these alabaster vessels was long and slender at the top, and round and full at the bottom. He likens them to the long pears, called elouchi, which the Roman ladies suspended from their fingers or dangled from their ears. He compares also the green pointed cone of a rose-bud to the form of an alabaster ointment-vessel (H. N. xxi, 4).

The onyx (Hor. Od. iv, 12, 37, "Nardi parvus onyx"), which Pliny says is another name for alabastrides, must not be confounded with the precious stone of that name, which is a sub-species of the quarts family of minerals, being a variety of agate. Perhaps the name of onyx was given to the pink-colored variety of the calcareous alabaster, in allusion to its resembling the finger-nail (onyx) in color, or else because the calcareous alabaster bears some resemblance to the agate-onyx in the characteristic lunar-shaped mark of the last-named stone, which mark reminded the ancients of the whitish semicircular spot at the base of the finger-nail."

Alabaster, William, a learned but erratic divine, born in Suffolk 1567, and studied both at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1596 he went to Cadiz as chaplain to the Earl of Essex, and there joined the Church of Rome. A few years of Romish life disenchanted him, and in 1610 he returned to the Church of England. He obtained a prebend in St. Paul's, and afterward was made rector of Thetford, where he died in 1640. He was a great student of the so-called calballetic learning. His works are (1) Lexicon Pentagogon (Heb., Chald., Syr., etc.), Lond. 1837, fol.; (2) Comm. de Bestia Apostolicae, 1821. He also wrote a tragedy, "Rosacum," of which Dr. Johnson spoke highly. —Wood, Athen. Oxon., Hook, Ecc. Bkgs. i, 102.

Al'ameth, a less correct mode (1 Chron. vii, 9) of anglicizing the name Alemeth (q. v.).

Alamamelech (Heb. Alalmamelek, נָאָרָןָא, perhaps king's ox; Sept. Αἰρῳδρ), a town on the border of the tribe of Asher, mentioned between Archelah and Amad (Josh. xix, 26). Some reference may possibly be made to a place on the branch of the Kishon still called Nahar el-Melech; perhaps at the ruins el-Harbiyeh (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 283).

Alamoth (Heb. Alamoth, נֵרָן, virgina, as often; Sept. ἀρτοῦν v. r. ἀλαθων and ἀλυκων, Vulg. arcana), a musical term used in 1 Chron. xxv, 20, apparently to denote that the choristers should sing in the female voice. —our treble, or soprano). So Laffage (Hist. Gén. de la Musique) renders it "chant supérieur ou à l'octave" (comp. Mendelssohn, Intro. to Psalms). The word occurs in the same form and significance in the inscription of Psal. xi6 (where the Sept. and Vulg. translate κυρίων, arcana, i. e. secreta, as if indicative of the contents of the Psalm), and twice again in nearly the same form (τοῦ Κυρίου), namely, in the inscription of Psal. ix (where it has the same sense, but is differently rendered by our translators "upon Muth," Sept. again τοῦ κυρίου, Vulg. voculce), and in Psal. xlviii, 15 (where the context requires the meaning formerly given, but our version has "unto death," Sept. correctly τοῦ κυρίου, Vulg. exsultate). See MÜHLENBERG., Forkel (Gesch. d. Musik, i, 149) understands virginae meageris (Gutart, Jungfernsamen), i.e. in maidenly style, but against the propriety of the usage. See Psalms.

Alan, Cardinal. See Allán.

Alan (rather Alain) de L'Isle (Alenus de Insula), so called because he was a native of Ryesal, in Flanders, now Lille (L'Isle, Insula) in France, or it was the name of his family. He obtained the name of the "Univ. Doctor," being equally well skilled in theology, philosophy, and poetry. It is said that a great part of his life was spent in England. The opinion that he was the same as Alan of Flanders (q. v.) is now generally rejected. He was born in 1114, and died about 1200. Having been appointed to the episcopal see of Auxerre or Canterbury (the place is uncertain as to the fact), he soon resigned his functions in order to retire to the monastery of Citeaux, where he seems to have devoted himself to alchemy. Of his alchemical labours, we only know his aphorism (dicta) on the philosopher's stone. Alan calls the amalgam resulting from the union of gold or of silver with mercury the "solution of philosophers" (solutio philosophorum), and adds that great advantages may be derived therefrom. His works are: 1. Doctrina Minus; or the book of parables (Gons. 1491, 4to); 2. Doctrina Minus Alterum, or Liber Sententiarum et Dictionarium Memorabilium (Paris, 1492, 4to); 3. Elucidatio supra Cantica Canonicum (Paris, 1560); 4. Lib. de Planta Natura, on the vices of the age and their remedy; 5. Aulicianum Libretto de officio vir in omnibus virtutibus perfectum; libri ix (Basle, 1586, 8vo; Ant. 1621): this work is also called the "Encyclopedia," from its professed to contain every thing divine and human which man ought to meditate upon and admire; 6. De arte seu arteullo Catholicae aelei (published by Masson, Paris, 1612, 8vo); 7. Aleni Magni de Insula explicata commentarius per sergentis Merlini Ambrosii, Britann. libri vii (Francfort, 1607, 8vo); 8. Liber pentomitalia, dedicated to Henry de Sully, archbishop of Bourges. Several other works of Alan are found in manuscript in the libraries of France and England. Another work of his on morals has been discovered during the present century at Avranches (see Ravaillon, Rapport sur les Bibliothèques de l'Ouest de la France, Paris, 1841, p. 157). The work Opus Quaestiorum de fide Catholica contra Valdenses, Albigeenses et alios hujus temporis heretics, which was formerly enumerated among his works, is probably not from him, but from Alan de Podio (q. v.). —Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 1151; Moisheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xii, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Alan (or Alain) du Puy (Alenus de Podio), who is probably the author of the work Opus Quaestiorum de fide Catholica. See Alan de l'Isle. No particulars of the life of this author are known. His surname points to Provence. Another work of his has been discovered during the present century at Avranches (see Ravaillon, Rapport sur les Bibliothèques de l'Ouest de la France, Paris, 1841, p. 157); and he is also supposed to be the author of a work dedicated to the Abbé Ermenegildus, of St. Gilles, and designated in the manuscript as Oecus, Oraclum Scripturae Sacrae, Aquinensis, etc.

Alan of Flanders (Alenus Flandrinarum), bishop of Auxerre, born in Flanders at the beginning of the 12th century, died in 1182. Some historians, as Oudin (q. v.), identify him with Alan de l'Isle (q. v.), while others, and the authors of the "Histoire Littéraire de France," regard them as different persons. He became a monk at Clairvaux, under St. Bernard, in 1128; was, about 1180, made the first abbot of Rivoir or Rivour, in the diocese of Troyes, in Champagne, and, in 1151 (or 1182), bishop of Auxerre. He is the author of the life of St. Bernard (included in Opera in Ser. Bernardi, 6, 7, 1160, fol.).

Alam (╡∩∩阒, terouk), a loud sound or tone, as often a broken quivering sound of the silver trumpets of the Hebrews, warning them in their journey in the wilderness (Num. x, 5, 6; comp. Lev. xxiii, 24: xxv, 9; xxxi, 1). When the people or the rulers were to be assembled together, the trumpet was blown softly; when the campers were to move forward, or the people to march to war, it was sounded with a deeper note (Jahn, Bihl. Archd. § 95, v). Hence a vario-note or call to arms, or other public exigency in general (Jer. iv, 19: xlix, 2; Zeph. i, 16). See TAMPET.

Alasco, JOHN. See Lasco.

Alb, Alba, a long white tunic in the Church of Rome, worn by all ecclesiastics during service, and answering to the surplice in the Church of England, excepting that the alb is narrower in the sleeves, and fits the body more closely, being often gathered at the waist by a girdle. The ornaments at the bottom and wrists are called apparels, and it is also sometimes embroidered with a cross upon the breast. See VESTMENTS. It was an ancient custom to clothe the newly-baptized in alba, in white garments. These garments were delivered to the child, with a solemn charge to keep their robes of innocence unsullied until the day of Christ. This dress was worn from the morning of the Sunday after Easter, which was called Dominica in albis; that is, the Sunday in white, whence the name Whitsunday. The garment was usually made rials.—Blom, Orig. Eext. lib. xiii, cap. viii, § 2.

Alban, St., martyr of England, is said to have served seven years with Diocletian, after which, return- ing to his country, he took up his abode at Verul- amium, in Hertfordshire, his birth-place. Shortly after this the persecution of Diocletian broke out, which drove Amphibalus, who had been the compan- ion of Alban, on his journey to Rome, and his fellow- soldier, to Britain for safety, where he at once be- came a Christian. When the persecution of the Christians commenced in Britain, the name of Am- phibalus was brought before the prefect, Asclepiodotus, as that of a man guilty of following the new religion; but, when he could not be found, Alban voluntarily presented himself to the judge, and was put to the tor- ment and imprisoned. Shortly after, both he and his friend, who had been discovered, were condemned to die as being Christians: Alban was put to death by the sword on a small hill in the neighborhood, called afterward by the Saxons Holmehurst, and where his body was also buried. When tranquillity had been restored to the Church, great honors were paid to the tomb of this saint, which Bede says was of admirable workmanship. About 735, Offa, king of the Mercians, founded here a spacious monastery in honor of St. Alban, and soon after the town called St. Alban arose in its neighborhood. Pope Adrian IV, who was born in this neigh- borhood, directed that the abbots of the place should hold the first place among the abbots of England. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on June 22d.

Albanenses, a sect of the Cathari, which appeared toward the close of the eleventh century, and de- rived its name from Albanius, who Dualism was quite prevalent; or, as is more usual, from Albanius, who held the Gnostic and Manichaeon doctrines of two prin- ciples, one good and the other evil. They denied the divinity of Jesus Christ, and rejected the account of his sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension. They rejected the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, affirmed that the general judgment was already pass- ed, and that the tombs of hell are the pains which men feel in this life. They denied man's free will, did not admit the doctrine of original sin, and held that man can impart the Holy Spirit to himself.—Mos-heim, Ch. Hist. cent. xii, pt. ii, ch. v, p. 8; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. per. iii, § 87. See CATHARI.

Albätz, a sect so called from the eschewsments ther- eunto. They entered Italy from the Albani about 1600, having as their guide a priest clothed in white, and a crucifix in his hand. He was deemed a saint, and his followers multiplied so fast that Pope Boniface IX. growing jealous of the augmenting power of the leader, sent soldiers, who put him to death and dis- covered his followers. (See SIBER, De Albatiis, Lep. 1784.) They are said (by their enemies and perse- cutors, however) to have been discolate in their habi- tics, while, at the same time, they professed to weep and sorrow for the sins and calamities of the times.—Mosheim, Church History, ii, 467.

Alber, Erasmus, a German Protestant theolo- gian, born, is thought, at Spredlingen, or at Wette- nham, who died at Wittenberg. In 1528 he was called by Landgrave Philip of Hesse as pastor to Spredin- gra. Subsequently, he was court preacher to Elector Joseph II of Brandenburg, by whom he was again dismissed on account of the violence of language with which he combated the taxation of the clergy. In 1535 he received, at Spredlingen, or at Wette- nham, the title of doctor of divinity. In 1545 he was called by the count of Hanau- Lichtenberg to carry through the reformation in his land. From Magdeburg, to which city he was subse- quently called as pastor, he was expelled on account of his opposition to the Interim. In 1558 he was ap- pointed superintendent at Neu-Brandenburg, in Meck- lenburg, where, however, he died, in 1558. As a preacher of the elector of Brandenburg, he found in a Franciscan convent a work by a Franciscan monk, Bartholomew Albizzi (q. v.), entitled Liber Conformi- tatis S. Francisci ad vitam Jesu Christi. This induced him to write his celebrated work, Der Bau der Himmels Kirche, which was published with a preface from Luther, at Wittenberg, in 1542, and then appeared in a French, Latin, and Dutch translation. He wrote several other works against the Interim, against Andreas Osiander, against the followers of Karstadt, against Witzel, fables for the youth in rhymes, and religious songs, published by Strömbur- ger, in Geistliche Lustspielchen, which was published in 1674. See der deutsche Nation, vol. x (Halle, 1857). A complete list of his works is in Strieder, Grundlage zu einer /kischen Gelehrten- und Schriftstellergeschichte (Gottingae, 1783), i, 24 sq.—See Herzog, Suppl.; i, 83; Biogr. Univ. i, 894.

Alber, Johann Nepomuk, a Roman Catholic theologian of Hungary, was born at Ovar, July 7, 1758, died about 1840. He wrote a large work on Her- meneutics, Al. (Vienna, 1791; Pesth, 1801-4), which Horne recommends as an able refutation of the opinions of the anti-supernaturalist divines of Germany. He also wrote Institutiones Historiae Ecclesiae. (Vienna, 1798); Institutiones Hermeneuticas, 1817; and Institutiones Linguarum Hebraicarum, 1826.—Hoyer, Biogr. Generale, ii. 529.

Alber, Matthew, one of the leaders of the Refor- mation in Germany, born at Reutlingen, Dec. 4, 1496, studied at Tübingen, and was ordained priest about 1521. He received a call as preacher to his na- tive town, where he labored so faithfully in behalf of the Reformation, that, in 1523, the people generally were favorable to it. In 1524, Alber, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the abbot of Königsbronn, the patron of the churches of Reutlingen, was appointed by the city authorities the first pastor of the city. At the instigation of the abbot of Königsbronn, he was summoned before the bishop of Constance, but, owing to the urgent solicitations of his friends, did not go. He was therefore put under the ban by the bishop, by Pope Leo X, and by the imperial court of Rothwell. The three decrees were simultaneously published in the church doors, but failed to produce any effect. Alber, with the applause of the people, proceeded undauntedly on the way of reformation. He abolished the Latin mass, introduced the use of the native lan- guage at divine service, removed the images from the churches, and got married. In December, 1524, he was summoned before the Imperial Chamber at Esslingen, where he was charged with 68 heresies, all of which he acknowledged, except the charge that he had spoken disrespectfully of the Virgin Mary. The court, after examining him three days, dismissed him unpunished. The Anabaptists, who at this time endeavored to es- tablish themselves at Reutlingen, were prevailed upon by the sermons of Alber to leave the city. He also succeeded in keeping the citizens of Reutlingen from joining in the peasants' war. Zuingle in a letter of November 16, 1526, endeavored to gain Alber over to his view of the Lord's Supper; but Alber, like his friend Brenta, remained on the side of the doctor of divinity. In 1536 he became personally acquainted in Wittenberg. In 1537 Alber took part in the colloquy of Urach, when he zealously combated the use of images in the churches. In 1539 he received from the un- iversity of Tübingen the title of doctor of divinity. When the Interim was forced upon Reutlingen, he left the city on or about May 16, 1538, and went to Ulric as antistes (first pastor) of the collegiate church (Stiftskirche) of Stuttgart. Duke Christopher ap- pointed him church counsellor, and, in 1568, he was made abbot of Blaufaberen. He died Dec. 2, 1570. He Albert, bishop of Liege (saint and martyr of the Roman Church), was the son of Godfrey, duke of Brabant. He was unanimously chosen to succeed Radulfus, bishop of Liege, who died on the 5th of August, 1191. The Emperor Henry VI opposed this election with all his power, but Celestine II confirmed Albert in the see, and made him cardinal. Henry sent to Rome to oppose this election; but he was carried out fully, three German gentlemen followed Albert to Rheims, whither he had retired, and in his own house, where they had been kindly and generously received, they murdered him, piercing him with thirteen mortal wounds. His body was at first interred at Rheims; but, under Louis XIII, it was translated to Brussels, where it is still preserved. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him on the 21st of November. His life, written by one of his attendants, is in the history of the bishops of Liege, by Gilles, monk of Orval.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. i. 202; Hoefer, Biog. Générale, i. 587.

Albert, "the Great" (Albertus Magnus), so called on account of his vast erudition, was born at Liege in 1193. The date of his birth is variously given, by some 1198, by others 1205. He studied at Padua, and entered the order of St. Dominic in 1211. His abilities and learning were of the highest class, and he was deemed the best theologian, philosopher, and mathematician of the age; indeed, his knowledge of mathematics was such, that the people, unable to comprehend the intricate mechanism which he used in some of his works, regarded him as a magician. An automaton which he made was so exquisitely contrived that it seemed to be endowed with powers of spontaneous motion and speech, and deceived even St. Thomas Aquinas, his pupil, who broke it in pieces with a stick, thinking it to be an emissary of the evil one. He was a strong Aristotelian, and his authority contributed greatly to uphold the reign of Aristotle in the schools at that period, in opposition to the papal bull against him. When Jordanus, general of the Dominicans, died in 1238, Albert governed the order for two years and a half. Being afterwards made provincial for Germany, he established himself at Cologne, where he publicly taught theology to an infinite number of pupils who flocked to him from all parts; and from this school proceeded Thomas Aquinas, Ambrose of Siena, and Thomas of Canterbury. In 1260 he was nominated to the bishopric of Ratisbon, and reluctantly consented to accept it; he did not, however, long retain it, and in 1263 obtained permission to leave it, and retire into his convent, where he occupied himself entirely in prayer and study until his death, which happened on the 15th of November, 1280.

Albert was certainly one of the most cultivated men of his age; but yet he was rather a learned man, and a compiler of the works of others, than an original and profound thinker. He wrote commentaries on most of the works of Aristotle, in which he makes especial use of the Arabian commentators, and blends the notion of the Neoplatonists with those of his author. Logic, metaphysics, theology, and ethics, were the eternal object of his labors, rather than effectually improved. With him began those minute and tedious inquiries and disputes respecting matter and form, essence and being (Essema or Quidditas, and Ersidentia, whence subsequently arose the further distinction of Eseae Essema and Ersidentia) of the universal, he assumes that it exists partly in external things and partly in the understanding. Rational psychology and theology are indebted to him for many excellent hints. The latter science he treated in his Summa Theologiae, as well according to the plan of Lombardus as his own. In the former he proposed the same, and so well, his general relation to theology is thus stated by Neander History of Dogmas (ii. 552): "Albert defines Christianity as practical science; for although it is occupied with the investiagation of truth, yet it refers every thing to the life of the soul, and shows how man, by the truths it reveals, must be formed to a divine life. It is his works, not in reference to abstrac truth, but to God as the supreme good, to the salvation of men, to the production of piety in the inner and outer man. He also distinguishes various kinds of certainty: the theoretical, which merely relates to knowledge (informatio mentis), and the certainty of immediate consciousness (informatio conscientiae). The knowledge obtained by faith is more certain than that derived from other sources; but we must distinguish between the fides informis and the fides formata: the first is only a means to knowledge, but the second is an immediate consciousness. Man is attracted by the object of faith just as moral truth leads him to moral knowledge and truth concerning God, but they are imparted in different ways; our reason has the capacity to perceive truth, as the eye possesses the faculty of sight. Natural light is one thing, and the light of grace is another. The latter is a higher stage, an assimilation between him who knows and him who is known. In his theology he labored to define our rational knowledge of the nature of God, and enlarged upon the metaphysical idea of him as a necessary Being (in whom pure Esse and his determinate or qualified nature [Seyn und Wesen] are identical), endeavoring to develop in this manner his attributes. These inquiries are often mixed up with idle questions and dialectic absurdities, and involve abundant inconsistencies; as, for instance, when he would account for the creation by the doctrine of emanation (causatio sciemiae), and nevertheless denies the emanation of souls, he insists upon the universal intervention of the Deity in the course of nature, and yet assents to the existence of natural causes defining and limiting his operations. In treating of the Trinity, he traced an analogy between the divine and the human as follows: 'There is no excellence among the creatures which is not to be found in a much higher style, and as an archetype, in the Creator; among creatures only in the image. This is true also of the Trinity. No artistic spirit can accomplish his work without first forming to himself an outline of it. In the spirit, therefore, first of all, the idea of its work is conceived, which is, as it were, the offspring of the spirit, in every feature resembling the spirit, representing it in its acting. (Format ex se rationem operis et speciem, quae est sicut prope ipsius intellectus, intellectual agenti similis in quantum agentia est.) Thus, therefore, the spirit reveals himself in the idea of the spirit. Now, from the acting spirit this idea passes into reality, and for this purpose the spirit must find a medium in outward action. This medium must be the same substance with him who first acted, if indeed the latter is so simple that being, nature, and activity are one in him. From this results the idea in reference to God, of the formative spirit, of the planned image, and of the spirit by which the image is realized. (Spiritus rectus format.) The creative spirit is the eternal representation of God, the eternal generation of his Son. The revelation of God in time for the sanctification of nature, is an image of the eternal procession of the spirit from the Father and the Son. Our love is only a reflection of the divine love; the archetype of all love is the Holy Spirit, which is expressed in such a way that it exists only in the spread abroad through all holy souls proceeds from the Holy Spirit. ther diminishes nor increases, but we diminish or in-

He considered conscience to be the highest law of reason, and distinguished the moral disposition (centurate, averagincus) from its habitual exercise (conscien-tia). Albertus Magnus was a plenipotentiary for the Council of Lyons (1286) and had a great influence by him into the hearts of men. His scholars were distinguished by the name of Albertists. His life is given at length in Quétif and Echard, Script. Ord.
Predicatorum, i, 171. His works, embracing natural and moral science, metaphysics, and theology, are collected and published under the title Opera Alberti Magae quae habent Alberti potius, ed. Pol. Janny (21 vols. fol. Lyons, 1651). Those which relate to theology are the following: 1. Commentaries on different Books of Holy Scripture, contained in the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th vols. of the above edition: — 2. Ser-mones for the whole Year and Saints' Days: Proper-ments formed upon the principal Gospels of all the Year; thirty-two Sermones on the Exegetical, which are usually contained among the works of St. Thomas; all contained in vols. 11 and 12:—8. Commentaries on the works attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite; also, An Abridgment of Theology, in seven books; contained in
vol. 15. Also some of the Commentaries on the Four Books of the Master of the Sentences, in vols. 14, 15, 16: A Summary of Theology, in vols. 17 and 18:—6. Summaries of Creatures, in two parts, the second concerning Man, in vol. 12:—7. A Discourse in honor of the Virgin. A special edition of his "Paradise animae sine libello de

Albert. fifth archbishop of Magdeburg and primate of all Germany (1513), and further, in 1514, elected archbishop of Mentz, both of which archiepiscopal sees,
by dispensation from Pope Leo X, he held together—a thing altogether without example. Besides this, he was appointed administrator of the bishopric of Halberstadt. He made a contract with Pope Leo for the arming of indulgences, and made the notorious Tetzel (q.v.), one of the agents for their sale in Germany.
The proceedings of Tetzel were vigorously watched and opposed by Luther, who, in turn, was hated by the archbishop. His efforts to retard the Reformation were rewarded by the cardinal's hatred, and he was the first to introduce the Jesuits into Germany. He died at Mentz in 1545. His writings are, 1. Statuta pro Clerici Reformacione:— 2. Decreta adversus Noctatura Lutheranum et Aesca:—3. Sermona:—4. Orationa de Bono movendo contra Turcos (Eisleben, 1603);—5. Repetitionis de Legibus Ecclesiasticis, in German (Leipzig, 1552).

Albert, Johannes, a Dutch theologian, was born at Assen, March 6, 1698, and died there Aug. 13, 1762.
He was pastor at Harlem, and subsequently professor of theology at the university of Leyden. He wrote Observations Philologicas in sacros Nori Federis Libros (Leyd. 1725), in which he collected from profane writers parallel passages in justification of the Greek language of the New Testament; a Glossarium Grammaticum in sacros nova Federis Libros (Leyd. 1735). He also published the first volume of the Lexicon of Hesychius, the second volume of which was published by Rubthenius (Leyd. 1766).—Hoefner, Bog. Générale, iii, 615.

Alberti, Leandro, a Dominican monk and writer, was born at Bologna, Dec. 11, 1476, and entered the order of St. Dominic in 1495. He applied himself entirely to study, and was called to Rome by the general of his order, Francis Sylvester, of Ferrara, in 1525, to act as one of his assistants, with the title of Provincial of the Holy Land. He was also inquisitor-general at Bologna, where he died in 1552. Among his writings are De Viris Illustri. Ord. Predicatorum libri (t. Bolog. 1537), De D. Dominici Obitu et s. pultura (Bolog. 1535), and Historia de Bolognana (up to 1514—1590); Descrizone di tulla l'Italia, etc. (Bolog. 1550; Venet. 1551, 1561, and 1688; Latin, Cologne, 1567).

Albertini, Johann Baptist von, a Moravian diocese, born Feb. 17, 1769, at Newied, in Germany.
He was appointed in 1804 preacher at Nissey, and consecrated bishop in 1817. He died Dec. 6, 1881, at Herrnhut, and was declared Dec. 6, 1881, at Bitherbad. He distinguished himself especially as the author of many beautiful hymns, some of which have been received into nearly all the Protestant hymn-books of Germany.
His theological works are, Predigiten (1806, 8d ed. 129);
Geschichtl. Lieder und Sonaten (1821, 8d ed. 1852); Reden (1832).

Albigenses, the name of one or more religious sects to whom this title seems to have been first given in the twelfth century in the south of France, distinguished by their zealous opposition to the Church of Rome, as also by the peculiar doctrines for which they contended. Some writers (e. g. Cave) suppose them to be the same as the Waldenses, as the two sects are generally associated and condemned together by the Romanist writers. But it is certain that the Wal-denses originated at a later period and held a purer faith, though it is not at all impossible that in the terrrible persecutions to which the Albigenses were subjected many Waldenses were included. In the creed of the Waldenses there are many archeologies of Dualism, nor any thing which indicates the least affinity with the Oriental theories of emanation. That the Albigenses were identical with the Waldenses has been maintained by two very different schools of theologians for precisely opposite interests: by the Romanists, to make the Waldenses responsible for the errors of the Albigenses, and by a number of true-to-life Protestant writers (e. g. Allix), to show that the Albigenses were entirely free from the errors charged against them by their Romish persecutors. What these carried in common, and what made them equally the prey of the inquisitor, was their unwavering belief in the corrupt practices of the medieval Church, especially as governed by the Roman pontiffs" (Hardwick, Middle Ages, p. 311).
By some writers their origin is traced to the Paulicians (q. v.) or Bogomiles (q. v.), who, having withdrawn from Bulgaria and Thrace, either to escape per-session or more probably, from motives of zeal to extend their doctrines, settled in various parts of Europe. They acquired different names in different countries; as in Italy, whither they originally migrated, they were called Paterini and Cathari; and in France Albigenses, from the name of a diocese (Alb) in which they were dominant, or from the fact that their opinions were condemned in the first council held at Alb in the year 1176. Besides these names, they were called in different times and places, and by various authors, Bulgarians, Publicans (a corruption of Paulicians), Boni Homines, Petro-Brussians, Henricians, Abelardists, and Arnaldists. In the twelfth century the Cathari were very numerous in Southern France. At the beginning of the thirteenth century a crusade was formed for the extirpation of heresy in Southern Europe, and Innocent III enjoined upon all princes to expel them from their dominions in 1209. The prelates of the church, from the pope down to the humblest of the papal legates and inquisitors, were made to understand this. The inquisition of Count Raymond VI of Toulouse; but its real object was to deprive the count of his lands, as he had become an object of hatred from his toleration of the heretics. Raymond, in vain that he had submitted to the most humiliating penance and flagellation from the hands of the legate Milo, and had purchased the papal absolution by great sacrifices. The legates, Arnold, abbot of Citeaux, and Milo, who directed the expedition, took by storm Beziers, the capital of Raymond's nephew, Roger, and massacred 20,000—some say 40,000—of the inhabitants, Catholicae as well as heretics. “Kill them all,” said Arnold; “God will know his own!” (For a full and graphic account of this crusade, see Milman, Latin Christianity, iv, 210 sq.) Simon, count of Montfort, who conducted the war under the legates, proceeded in the same relentless manner, and captured and burned the castles and properties of Raymond and his allies. Of these, Roger of Beziers died in prison, and Peter I of Aragon fell in battle. The conquered lands were given as a reward to Simon of Montfort, who never came into quiet possession of the gift. At the siege of Toulouse, 1218, he was killed by a stone, and counts Raymond VI and VII disputed the possession of their territories with his son. But the papal indulgences drew fresh crusaders from every province of France to continue the war. Raymond VII continued to struggle bravely against the legates and Louis VIII of France, to whom Montfort had ceded his possessions, and who followed the war in 1226. After hundreds of thousands had perished on both sides, a peace was concluded in 1229, at which Raymond purchased relief from the ban of the Church by immense sums of money, gave up Narbonne and several lordships to Louis IX, and had to make his son-in-law, the brother of Louis, heir of his other possessions. These provinces, hitherto independent, were thus for the first time joined to the kingdom of France; and the pope sanctioned the acquisition in order to bind Louis more firmly to the papal chair, and induce him more readily to admit the inquisition. The heretics were handed over to the proselytizing zeal of the order of the inquisition, and the bloody annals of the inquisition; and both used their utmost power to bring the recusant Albigenases to the stake, and also, by inflicting severe punishment on the penitent converts, to inspire dread of incurring the Church's displeasure. From the middle of the thirteenth century the name of the Albigenases gradually disappears. So far as the Albigenases were a branch of the Cathari, they were Dualistic and, to a certain extent, Manichaeans. For their doctrines and usages, see Bo- gomiles; CATHARI; PARLIACIANS. But the name “Albigenses” does not seem to have been used until some time after the Albigenasian controversy (Maitland, Facts and Documents, p. 96). It is likely, as has been remarked above, that many who held the simple truths of the Gospel, in opposition to the corruptions of Rome, were included in the title by the Romish authorities, from whom our knowledge of these sects must chiefly be derived. Indeed, the gross charges brought even against the men of the order were cast upon the shoulders of their persecutors, and therefore are to be taken with allowance. In the reaction from the mistake of Alix and others, who claimed too much for the Albigenases, there is little doubt that Schmidt and others of recent times have gone too far in admitting the trustworthiness of all written accounts. Raimondus, who is the only Romanist source of information, both as to the Albigenases and the pure Cathari (Hase, Church History, § 228). With the exception of the charge of rejecting marriage, no allegation is made against their morals by the better class of Roman writers. Their constancy in suffering excited the wonder of their opponents. “Tell me, holy father,” says Evrevino to St. Bernard, relating the murder of three of these heretics, “how is this? They entered to the stake and bore the torment of the fire, not only with patience, but with joy and gladness. I wish your explanation, how these members of the devil could persist in their heresy with a courage and constancy scarcely to be found in the most religious of the faith of Christ?” Elliott, in his Hora Apologitica, vindicates the orthodoxy of the Albigenases, however, too absolutely. For arguments in their favor, see Allix, History of the Albigenases (Oxford, 1821, 8vo); Faber, Theology of the Vallesians and Albigenases (Lond. 1886); Baird, History of the Albigenases, Vouzols, etc. (N. Albinus (a frequent Roman name, signifying white), a monk and writer, better known under his Latin name, Albolenus. Born at Florentiae in the reign of Nero, about A.D. 62 and 68, the successor of Festus and predecessor of Florus. He was guilty of almost every kind of crime in his government, paroling the vilest criminals for money, and shamelessly plundering the provincials (Josephus, Ant. xx, 9, 1; War, ii, 14, 1). He was perhaps identical with Lucius Albolenus, a procurator of Mauritania under Tiberius and Caligula, but murdered by his subjects on the accession of Otho, A.D. 69 (Tacitus, Hist. ii, 59, 59).

Alibizi, Antonio, an Italian theologian, born at Florence on November 25, 1547, died at Kempten, Bavaria, on July 17, 1626. He occupied important posts at several Italian courts, but had to leave his native country, when he embraced Protestantism, in 1600, lived afterward at Augsburg, Innsbruck, and (after 1606) at Kempten. He published Sermones in Matthaeum (Augsburg, 1609, 8vo); Principium Chrismonorum Summata (1612, 2mo); De principia religiosae Christianae (1612); Exercitationes theologicae (Kempten, 1616, 4to).

Albizio, Bartolomeo, of Pisa, a Franciscan monk, better known under his Latin name, Bartolomeus Albizius Planus, born at Rivano, in Tuscania, died at Pisa, Dec. 10, 1401. He owes his celebrity to a blasphemous work (Libri Conformitatum Sancti Francisci cum Christo), in which he drew a parallel between the events in the life of Christ and the life of Francis of Assisi. This work was presented to and approved by the council of Lyons, and formed part of the Franciscan Order in the meeting at Assisi in 1389. The first edition of the work appeared, without date, at Venice (in folio); the second (1480) and third (1484) editions, which appeared under the title Li Fioretì di San Francisco, assimilati alla vita ed alla passione di Cristo, were published at Nortoni. A French version of this work by P. Vergerio (Discorsi sopra i Fioretì di San Francisco) was put into the Index, and the author declared a heretic. At the time of the Reformation Erasmus Alber (q. v.) wrote a celebrated work against Albizzi. The refutations of Albizzi, and especially the work of Alber, produced so profound an impression that the Franciscans considered it best to modify the work, and a large number of editions in other languages were published, which differ from the original both in title and in contents, such as the Liber Aureus by Bucchius (Bologna, 1590), and the Anticristus Franciscanus by Bosquier (Cologne, 1623, 8vo). These editions were again followed by several apologies, refutations, and counter-refutations, so that a large number of editions in other languages were published, which differ from the original both in title and in contents, such as the Liber Aureus by Bucchius (Bologna, 1590), and the Anticristus Franciscanus by Bosquier (Cologne, 1623, 8vo). These editions were again followed by several apologies, refutations, and counter-refutations, so that a large number of editions in other languages were published, which differ from the original both in title and in contents, such as the Liber Aureus by Bucchius (Bologna, 1590), and the Anticristus Franciscanus by Bosquier (Cologne, 1623, 8vo).

Alcantara, Orders of. 1. The name of a military order in Spain. The town of Alcantara having been taken from the Moors in 1212 by Alphonso IX, he intrusted the keeping of it to the knights of Calatrava, in the first instant, and two years after to the knights of St. Julian, in an order instituted (according to Angelo Marrique) by Suarez and Gomez, two brothers, and confirmed by Pope Alexander III in 1177, under the mitigated rule of St. Benedict, as in the case of the knights of Calatrava, whose other observances they also, subsequently, followed. Gomez at first was only styled prior, but afterward he assumed the title of grand master, and the order itself came to be styled the order of the knights of Alcantara. Upon the defeat of the Moors and the capture of Granada, the mastership of the order, as well as that of Calatrava, was united to the crown of Castile by Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1560 the knights of Alcantara received permission to marry ("to avoid offence"). Joseph Bonaparte, in 1808, deprived the order of all its revenues, part of which was restored in 1814 and the following years by Ferdinand VII. In 1835 it was abolished as an ecclesiastical order, but it still exists as a court and civil order, having for its arms a pear-tree with two grafts. This order, in its best days, possessed 50 commanderies, and exercised lordship over 58 towns or villages of Spain; it had the same dignities and the same statutes, as the order of Calatrava. The dress of ceremony consisted of a large white mantle with a green cross, fleur-de-lis, on the left side, to distinguish them from the knights of Calatrava. They were bound by vow to maintain the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin. — Helyon, Dict. des Ordres Religieus.

2. The name of a branch of the Franciscan order. See Franciscans.

Alcimius (Ἀλκημός, strong, or perhaps only a Greco-Latinism of the Heb. Ὠλίχαμ, called, also, Jacimius, i.e. Joakim (Ἰωάκημος, Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 7), a Jewish priest (1 Macc. vii, 14) who, apostatizing to the Syrians, was appointed high-priest (B.C. 162) by King Demetrius, as successor of Menelaus (1 Macc. vii, 5), by the influence of Lydus, though not of the pontifical family (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 7; xx, 10; 1 Macc. vii, 14), to the exclusion of Onias, the nephew of Menaus, having already been nominated by Antiochus Eupator (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 7; comp. Selden, De success in pontif, p. 150), and instated into office by force of arms by the Syrian general Bacchides (1 Macc. vii, 9 sq.). According to Josephus (Bel. jud. i, 74, 1 Eich. 11, abib R. 65), he was "sister's son of Joze ben-Joachaz," chief of the Sanhedrini, whom he afterward put to death (Raphael, Hist. of Jews, i, 245, 308). At first he attached many of the patriots to his cause by fair promises (1 Macc. vii, 18 sq.), but soon alienated by his perfidy, his cruelty, and his debauchery, as well as by the intrigues of his friends, so that he was at length compelled to flee from the disposition of Judas Maccabæus to the Syrian king (1 Macc. viii, 25; 2 Macc. xiv, 3 sq.). Nicanaor, who was sent with a large army to assist him, was routed and slain by the Jewish patriots (1 Macc. vii, 48; 2 Macc. xv, 57), B.C. 161. Bacchides immediately advanced a second time against Jerusalem with a large army, routed Judas, who fell in the battle (B.C. 161), and reinstated Alcimus. After his restoration, Alcimus seems to have attempted to modify the ancient worship, and, as he was engaged in pulling down "the walls of the inner court of the sanctuary" (i.e. which separated the court of the Gentiles from the court of the Jews, according to Grimm, Comment. on 1 Macc. ix, 64), he was "plagued" (by paralysis), and "died at that time." B.C. 160 (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 8; xii, 10; 1 Macc. vii, ix, comp. 2 Macc. xiv, xv; see Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes isr. iv, 866 sq.). —Smith, s. v.

Alcuin, a native of Yorkshire, England, born A.D. 785, and educated under the care of Egbert and Albert, bishops of York, from whom he learned Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. Most of the schools of France were either founded or improved by him. He was sent to Rome about 780, and on his return passed through Parma, where he met with Charlemagne, who secured his services, gave him a country in France, and retained him as his tutor and friend during the rest of his life. The palace of Charlemagne was converted into an academy, in which the family and the intimate counsellors of Charlemagne joined the latter in becoming pupils of Alcuin. This academy, in which all the members assumed antique names (Charlemagne called himself David, Alcuin Flaccus, etc.), was the origin of the famous palatine schools in the houses of the princes which so long rivalled the cloister schools in the houses of the bishops. In 794 Alcuin took a prominent part in the Council of Frankfort, at which the theological opinions of the Adoptionistians were condemned. About 806 Alcuin retired from the court to the abbey of St. Martin, at Tours, which he soon made the most famous school of the age. He died May 19, 804. His Life, by Loventz (Halte, 1829), translated by Mrs. Slees, was published in London, 1857. The best edition of his works is entitled Alcuini opera post primos editiones à D. A. Quercianu curatum, etc., stud. Frobeni Abbatia (Ratisbon, 1777, 2 vols. fol.). This edition contains 282 letters from Alcuin, and also several letters from Charlemagne in reply to Alcuin. They are a very valuable source of information for the ecclesiastical history of that age, and extend to the year 827. Other letters, not contained in this edition, have been discovered by Pertz. Alcuin, in these letters, strongly declares himself against all compulsion in matters of faith, and in favor of religious toleration. The theological works of Alcuin comprise Questio scolast in Genesis (20 questions and answers on important passages of the Gospels; Encomiomenum et brevissima in Psalmum Periclitantes, a literal commentary on the penitential Psalms; a commentary on the gospel of John; a treatise on the doctrine of the Trinity; and a number of homilies or sermons on the lives of the saints; he left, besides many theological writings, several elementary works in the branches of philosophy, rhetoric, and philosophy; also poems, and a large number of letters. He is acknowledged as the most learned and polished man of his time, although his writings are chiefly compilations from older authors. The edition of Alcinou, published at Paris by Duchesne in 1617, in one vol. fol., is divided into three parts. Contents of Part I (On Scripture): 1. Interrogation et disputation de diverses questions concernant 151 questions, with their answers, addressed to Sigulhus, his disciple and companion. The last question and reply are very much longer than the others, and were in after times included among the works of St. Augustine. They are also included, with some changes, in the third book of the Commentary on Genesis of St. Eucherius, Archbishop of Lyons. 2. Dicta super illud Genesee, "Faciamus Hominem ad Imaginem nostram." This has been printed among the works of St. Ambrose, with the title "Treatise on the Excellence of Man's Creation:" and also among the writings of St. Augustine, "Of the Creation of the Man." 3. Enchiridion seu Epistola post mortem et hæresi copiosiores in Psalmos Plicentiales, in Psalm. cxxvii et in Psalmos Graduales; addressed to Arno, archbishop of Salzburg; printed at Paris, separately, in 1547, 8vo, without the preface, which D'Achery has given in his Spicilegium (old ed. ix, 111, 110). 4. De Psalmorum Usu in Sermonibus, a manuscript of Irregular. In which he marks in detail the Psalms to be said on every day of the week, together with hymns, prayers, confessions, and litanies. 6. Epistola de illa Canonici Canticorum loco, "Sexaginta sunt Reg ne," etc. 7. Commentarius in Evangelistâ. 8. Commentariorum in Joh. Evangelistâ, libri vii, printed at Strasburg in 1527. By the preface at the head of book vii, it appears that Alcuin was at the time employed, by order of Charlemagne, in revising and correcting the Vulgate. Copies of this work in MS. are extant in the library at Vauzelles and at Rome.—Part II (Doctrine, Morals, and Discipline): 1. De Fide S. Spiritu sancto libri iii, ad Carolum M. cum Inquisitione S. Spiritu sancto, Trinitate at Frederickus, De Trinitate at Frederickus Questions 28. 12. De Differ- eniis eterne et sempiterni, immortalis et perpetuâ. 13. De Temporibus Expiationis. 4. De Animis Ratione, ad Eulalium Virgini. 5. Contra Felici Origenes Ianu. Episcopi libri vii. This work was composed in A.D. 796, and in the Biblioth. Patrum is erroneously attributed to Paulinus of Linz. 6. Epistola ad Eulpam (Bishop of Toledo). 7. Epistolae Episcopi ad Alcuinum, a defence made by Elipandus. 8. Contra Episcopum Epistolam, libri ii; a reply to the above, addressed to Leidradus, archbishop of Lyons, Nephrilus of Narbonne, Benedict, abbot of Anciens, and all the other bishops, abbots, etc., for the preface of the first book. 9. The Letter of Epistola ad Felix, and the Confession of Faith made by the latter after having retraced, are added at the end. The above are all the dogmatical works contained in Part II; the others are works on discipline. 12. De Divinis Officiis liber, esse Exposicio Romani Ordinis. 13. De usu scripturarum in the presence of the emperor. 14. De Baptismo Sacramenti, et Commentario in Epistola ad Caroly. 15. Epistola a letter to Charlemagne, which, having "suffragio" under him, cannot be the work of Alcuin, who was only deacon. It appears from this letter that triple immersion was in use at that period, as well as the custom of giving the holy eucharist and confirmation to the newly baptized. 16. De Consecratione Pec- toratorum, ad Pius V. Martini Episcopi. 17. Sacramen- torum Liber, containing the collectes, secrets, prefaces, and post-communions for 22 different masses. 7. Homilies. 8. Vita Ambrosii, ad Carolum M. this is properly the work of Adso, abbot of Montier-en-Der. 9. De Virtutibus et Vitis, addressed to Count Wido or Guido. This is one of the chief of the moral treatises of Alcuin, containing 66 questions and various discourses, placed in the appendix to the works of St. Augustine, are taken from this treatise, viz., those numbered 254, 291, 297, 302, and 304 in the new edition. 10. De vit Artibus liber imperfectus, containing only what relates to grammar and rhetoric. The preface is written with that which is appended at the head of his work on the same subject. 11. Grammatica. This was printed separately at Nantes in 1605. 12. De Rhetorica et de Virtutibus Dialogus (Paris, 1695). 13. Dialiectica. Like the last, is in a form of a dialogue between Alcuin and Charlemagne (Ingolstadt, 1604). 14. Deipnosophia Regia. A familiar dialogue between Pepin, afterwards king of Italy, and Alcuin.—Part III (History, Letters, and Poetry): 1. Scriptum de Vita S. Martini Turonensis. 2. De Tram- situ S. Martini Sermo. 3. Vita S. Vicedi Episcopi Atrubentensis: written about 796, at the request of the abbot Rado. 4. Vita Beatiis Raimundis, Presbyteris. 5. De liis usus scripturarum. 6. De inveniendis et symbolis Fide. One hundred and fifteen letters, exclusive of many fragments of letters given by William of Malmedie. 7. Povmata et Versus de pluribus SS. Many of these, however, are erroneously attributed to Alcuin. Since Duchesne's edition, the following have been printed: 1. Treatise of the Procession of the Holy Ghost. This work is divided into three parts. In Part I he shows that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and from the Son; in Part II that He is the Spirit of the Father and of the Son; and in Part III that He is sent by the Father and by the Son. It is dedicated to Charle- magne; but as the name of Alcuin nowhere appears in the book, the only ground for believing every part of the work of Alcuin is the act of donation by which Didon, bishop of Laon (who was nearly contemporary with Alcuin), gave the MS. of the work to his cathedral church, prohibiting its ever being taken away from the library of that church under pain of incurring the anger of God and the Blessed Virgin. This may prob- ably be the cause why the work was so long concealed. 2. Various letters—three of which are given by D'Achery, in his Spicilegium; one in the Irish letters of Archbishop Usher, published at Paris in 1695; two in the 8th volume of the Acts of the order of St. Benedict; three given by Baluze, in his Miscellany; twenty-four by the MSS. of the Order. I. The first of these poems, a poem, in elegiac verses. Baluze also gives Epistola et Prefatio in libros vii, ad Felicem Origenis librum, iv. 413. 3. Two poems published by Lambecius. 4. Homilia de die nativitatis S. Vicesati (Bolland, February, p. 800). 5. Libri Quattuor Caroli ni de Imaginibus, at- tributed by Roger de Hoveden to his Amala, to Alcuin. 6. Poem Heroicum de Pontificibus Angliae et SS. Ecclesie Eboracensis, containing 1658 verses. Thomas Gale, dean of York, caused this to be printed from two MSS. Oudinus attributes this poem to Fridegodos, a Benedictine, who lived about 960. 7. Commentarios brevium eius in Concilium Canonicorum. Cave and others regard this as a scholium, containing the scholia of the t-x. "Sexaginta sunt regina," etc., in the first part of Duchesne's volume. 8. Breviarium sive aduersus Arianos, by Sirmonduus (Paris, 1630); attributed to Alcuin by Chifflet, on the authority of a MS. 2. The cata- logue of the library of Centula mentions a Lectionary, indicating that there was a great annual festival and day in the year, which was corrected and put in order by Alcuin. This is given by Pallinus in his collection of liturgical works (Cologne, 1561, 1571, and 1606, p. 1890). 10. A Book of Homilies, attributed to Alcuin by the author of his life, although probably he only corrected the Homilies of Paul, the deacon, which was in two volumes, as well as that attributed to Alcuin. If the latter wrote a homily, it has not yet seen the light. (See Milhous, Elena, a. p. 15.) The Book of Homilies attributed to Alcuin, but really the work of Paul, was printed at Cologne in 1388. 11. Cidone and Veiss; published as the work of Alcuin, with other treatises by Chifflet, at Dijon, 1656, 4to. It has been doubted by some writers whether Alcuin was really the author. Mabillon (Analecta, i, 178, or 490 in the folio edition) gives proofs to show that he was so, one of which is, that the MS. itself from which Chifflet printed it assigned it to him by name. Besides all these works, some of the writings of Alcuin have been lost, others still remain in MS. only, and others again have been erroneously ascribed to him. Some of these have been recently discovered by Pertz.— See Monnier, Alcuin et Charlemagne (with fragments of an unpublished commentary of Alcuin on St. Matthew, and other pieces, published for the first time (Paris, ed. 1864, 32mo).—Bibl. Alden, Noah, a Baptist minister, was born at Middleborough, Mass., May 80, 1725. At 19 he married, and in 1749 removed to Stafford, Conn. In 1760 he removed to himself at that time with the Congregational Church. In 1768 he became a Baptist, and was ordained in 1775 pastor of the Baptist church in Stafford. In 1766 Mr. Alden was installed pastor of the church in Bellingham, Mass.: from which place he was sent as a delegate to the General Assembly of the state. He was also a member of the convention to which was submitted the Constitution of the U. S. Mr. Alden remained pastor at Bellingham until his death, May 6, 1797.—Sprague, Anecd. vi, 67.

Alden, Timothy, was born at Yarmouth, Mass., Aug. 28, 1771, and graduated in 1794 at Harvard, where he was distinguished for his knowledge of Oriental languages. In 1799 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Portsmouth, N. H., but in 1805 devoted himself to teaching. He conducted female schools successively in Boston, Newbad, New York, and in 1817 was appointed president of Meadville College, Penn., which office he held till 1820. He died at Westfield, July 1, 1860. He published a number of occasional sermons and pamphlets.—Sprague, Anecd. ii, 452.

Aldhelm or Adelme, an English bishop, born in Wessex about 550, educated by Adrian in Kent, embraced the monastic life, and founded the abbey of Malmesbury, of which he was the first abbot. He became bishop of Sherborne 703, and died May 25, 709. He is said to have lived a very austere life, "giving himself entirely to reading and prayer, denying himself in food, and rarely quitting the walls of the monastery. If we may believe the account of William of Malmesbury, he was also in the habit of immersing himself as far as the shoulders in a fountain hard by the church, unless he did not come forth until he had completely repeated the Psalter; this he did not omit, summer or winter." The first organ used in England is said to have been built under the directions of Aldhelm. According to Camden (Britannia in Vill. p. 116), he was the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and taught his people to compose Latin verses. His works have recently been collected and published under the title Aldhelm opera quae extant, omnia et codicibus MSS. emendata, nonnulla nunc primum edita by J. A. Giles, LL.D. (Oxon. 1844, 8vo) — Collier, Eccl. Hist. 1, 263; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 680; Landon, Eccles. Dict. i, 91.

Aldrich, Henry, was born at Westminster, 1647, and studied at Christ Church, Oxford. He was celebrated for the zeal and ability which he displayed as a controversialist against the Romish writers of his time. After the Revolution he was made dean of Christ Church, Oxford (1689), and was presented to the living of Wem, in Shropshire. He was a great lover of church music, and had left twenty anthems; he was also the author of the well-known "Hark, the bonny Christ Church Bells." Himself a sound and accomplished scholar, he endeavored by every means in his power to foster the love of classical learning among the students of his college, and presented them annually with an edition of some Greek classic, which he printed for this special purpose. He also published a system of lexicography, and his death was a severe blow to his college, and the university of Trinity College, Oxford. He died Dec. 14, 1710. Among his writings are: 1. A Reply to five Discourses [by Abr. Woodhead] concerning the Adoration of our Blessed Saviour in the Holy Eucharist (1697) — 2. A Discourse on the Oxford Repeal (1689) — 3. Aria Logica Compendium (1691), and a series of sermons — it is still in use at Oxford as a manual for beginners.— English Cyclopaedia, a. v.; New Gen. Dict. i, 142.

Aleandro, GIOHOLAMO, Cardinal, born Febr. 18, 1490, at Motta, on the confines of Friuli and Istria. He studied at Venice, where he became acquainted with Erasmus, and applied himself with great success to the study of the Latin and Greek languages. In 1506 Louis XII called him to France, where he became rector of the university of Paris. In 1519 Pope Leo X sent him as nuncio into Germany to oppose Luther, and, during his absence, in 1520, made him librarian of the Vatican. Aleander, who was papal legate at the diet of Worms, is said to have taken the long hours of argument which he drew up the edict which condemned him (Münter, Beitr. zur Kirch.-Gesch. p. 48). In 1528 he caused the burning of two monks at Brussels. He afterward became archbishop of Brindisi and nuncio in France, and was made pensioner by the Spaniards at the battle of Pavia, 1525. After his liberation he was created cardinal of St. Chrysogonus, 1538, and died at Rome, Feb. 1, 1542.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. i, 227.

Al'ema (only in the dat. plur. iv. 'Al'umos), one of the fortified cities in Gilead beyond the Jordan, occupied in the time of Judas Maccabaeus, to the oppression of the Jews, by the Gentiles, in connection with certain neighboring towns (1 Macc. v. 26). Grimm (Vand. zu d. Macc. in loc.) thinks it is probably the Bethel-Elam mentioned in xxxv. 1, 118, 21. The second time he was mentioned (Num. xxi. 16), it is an identification favored by the associated names (Bozrah and Carmaim).

Alembert, JEAN LE ROND d', a French mathematician and philosopher of the empirical school, was born in Paris, Nov. 16, 1717, and died in the same city Oct. 29, 1783. He was the illegitimate child of the Chevalier Destouches-Cannon, and of the celebrated Madame de Tencin, sister of the archbishop of Lyons.
ALEMETH 188

ALEXANDER

His unnatural parents exposed him, soon after his birth, near the church of St. Jean le Rond, and hence his Christian name. After he became eminent, his father recognised him and gave him a pension. In childhood he displayed great precocity of talent, and in 1730 he entered the College Mazarin, where he had a Jansenist tutor, studied mathematics and philosophy, and wrote a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. After leaving college he attempted to study medicine, and afterward law; but finding his turn for mathematics all-powerful, he determined to live on his small pension of 360 francs a year, and devote himself to free studies. At twenty-three he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1741 he published his “Treatise on Dynamics,” which was followed by successive publications in mathematical science, all of the first rank, but which do not fall within our province to notice. About 1750 he joined with Diderot in the Encyclopédie, to which he communicated many articles, and also the preliminary “Discourse.” In 1754 he became a member of the French Academy; and in 1759 he published his Elements of Philosophy. After the peace of 1768 D’Alembert was one of the three who filled the office of president of the Academy of Berlin, and the empress of Russia had also solicited him to superintend the education of her children. Having refused, however, both these appointments, he was, in 1772, nominated perpetual secretary to the French Academy, a position in which he wrote seventy obits of deceased members. In the latter part of his life he was attacked with calculus, and died of that disease in his sixty-sixth year. His miscellaneous writings are collected in Œuvres littéraires, edited by Bastien (Paris, 1805, 18 vols. 8vo; new ed. Paris, 1821, 5 vols. 8vo, the best). As a philosopher, D’Alembert was a disciple of Locke, and confessed his principles to their ultimate conclusion in scepticism and materialism. He never wrote as virulently or violently against Christianity as Voltaire, but he was quite as far gone in unbelief. As to the existence of God, he thought the “probabilities” were in favor of Theism; as to Christianity, he thought the “probabilities” were against Revelation. — Hoeker, Encyc. Générale, i, 768; Teunenmann, Manual Hist. of Philosophy, p. 387.

Alemeth, the name of two persons, and also of a place; of two forms in the original.

2. (Heb. same as preceding; Sept. Γαλαμας and Γαλαμδας, v.r. Σαλαμας, Vulg. Almata.) The first named of the two sons of Jehoshua or Jarab, son of Ahuz, of the posterity of King Saul (1 Chron. viii, 36; ix, 49), B.C post 1037.

3. (Heb. Ale’math, אֲלֵמַת, but other copies same as the foregoing, with which the signifi. agrees; Sept. Χαλαμῆς v.r. Χαλαμα, Vulg. Almata.) A sacerdotal city of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. vi, 60; doubtless the same elsewhere (Josh. xxii, 18) called Almon (q.v.).

Alex (originally Alane), Alexander, was born at Edinburgh, April 23, 1500, and educated at St. Andrew’s, where he afterward became canon. Employed to influence Patrick Hamilton (q.v.) to recant, he was so impressed by Hamilton’s arguments, and by his constancy at the stake, that he embraced the reformed doctrine himself. In 1559 he went to Germany, and visited Luther and Melancthon, with whom he became intimate. In 1554 he came to England on the invitation of Cranmer, and was appointed professor of theology at Cambridge. Cranmer employed him in translating the English liturgy into Latin. In 1540 he returned to Germany, and was professor first at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and afterward at Leipsic, where he died March 17, 1566. Although a firm and decided Calvinist, he maintained the necessity of good works. His principal works are, 1. De necessitae et merito bonorum operum (1560); — 2. Commentarii in Evangelium Joannis, et in utraque Epistolae ad Timotheum; — 3. Expositio in Psalmos Davidis; — 4. De Justificatione, contra Oelandrum; — 5. De Transubstantiatione et errore Valentini; — 6. Responsio ad triginta et duodecim errores theologorum Locenses. Also a Latin work on the right of the laity to read the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue, and a defence of that work against Calv. — Hook, Eccl. Bibl. i, 138; Burnet, Hist. of Reform. i, 246; ii, 247; Proctor on Common Froyer, 65, 66.

Alexander (Ἀλεξάνδρος, man-defender, a title often bestowed by Homer upon Paris, son of Priam, and hence a frequent Greek name), the name of several men mentioned or involved in Biblical history, or in the Apocalypse and Josephus.

1. The title of a man’s name, sometimes THE GREAT, son (by Olympia) and successor of Philip, king of Macedon. He is not expressly named in the Bible, but he is denoted in the prophecies of Daniel by a leopard with four wings, signifying his great strength, and the unusual rapidity of his conquests (ch. vii, 6); also by a one-horned he-goat, running over the earth so swiftly as not to touch it, attacking the horne, overthrowing him, and trampling him under foot, without any being able to rescue him (vii, 4–7).

2. The he-goat prefigured Alexander; the ram Darius Codomannus, the last of the Persian kings. In the statue beheld by Nebuchadnezzar in a dream (ii, 39), the belly of brass was the head of Alexander, and the legs of iron designated his successors (Lengerke, Dan. p. 95 sq.). He is often mentioned in the books of the Maccabees (Wernsdor, De fidei libr. Macc. p. 40 sq.); and his career is detailed by the historians Arrian, Plutarch, and Quintus Curtius (Droyson, Gesch. Alexander d. Gr. Berlin, 1833, 1838, 1843).

3. Alexander II. was born at Pella B.C. 356 (comp. 1 Mac. i, 7; 2 Euseb. Chron. Ann. ii, 83). At an early age he was placed under the care of Aristotle; and while still a youth he turned the fortune of the day at Chersonoe (B.C. 356). Philip was killed at a marriage feast when Alexander was a youth of twenty. After he had performed the last duties to his father, and put an end to the general anarchy which followed, he was chosen by the Greeks general of their troops against the Persians, and entered Asia with an army of 34,000 men, B.C. 354. In one campaign he subdued almost all Asia Minor. In the battle of Granicus he defeated Orontes, one of Darius’s generals; and Darius himself, whose army consisted of 400,000 foot and 100,000 horse, in the narrow pass of Issus, which leads from Syria to Cilicia. Darius fled, abandoning his camp and baggage, his children, wife, and mother, B.C. 335. After he had subdued Syria, Alexander proceeded to Tyre, and the Tyrians opposing his entrance into their city, he besieged it. At the same time he is said to have written to Jaddus, high-priest of the Jews, that he expected to be acknowledged by him, and to receive those submissions which had hitherto been paid to the king of Persia. Jaddus styling to comply, as having sworn fidelity to Darius, Alexander resolved to march against him when he had reduced Tyre (q.v.). After a protracted siege, the latter city was taken and sacked, B.C. 332. This done, Alexander entered Palestine and reduced it. Egypt next submitted to him; and in B.C. 331 he founded Alexandria (q.v.), which remains to the present day the most important city of the Delta. In the same year he finally defeated Darius at Gaugamela; and in B.C. 330 his unhappy rival was mur-
ALEXANDER

But admitting the incorrectness of the details of the tradition as given by Josephus, there are several points which confirm the truth of the main fact. Justin says that "many kings of the East came to meet Alexander wearing fillets" (ix, 10); and after the capture of Tyre "Alexander himself visited some of the cities which still bear the names of his victorious" (x, 5, 10). Even at a later time, according to Curtius, he executed vengeance personally on the Samaritans for the murder of his governor Andromachus (Curt. iv, 8, 10). Besides this, Jewish soldiers were enlisted in his army (Hecat. ap. Josephus, Apion, i, 22); and Jews formed an important element in the population of the city which he founded and shortly after the event. Above all, the privileges which he is said to have conferred on the Jews, including the remission of tribute every sabbatical year, existed in later times, and imply some such relation between the Jews and the great conqueror as Josephus describes. Internal evidence is decidedly in favor of the story even in its picturesque fulness. From policy or conviction, Alexander delighted to represent himself as chosen by destiny for the great act which he achieved. The siege of Tyre arose professedly from a religious motive; the battle of Issus was preceded by the visit to Gordium; the invasion of Persia by the pilgrimage to the temple of Ammon. And if it be impossible to determine the exact circumstances of the meeting of Alexander and the Jewish envoys, the silence of the classical historians, who notoriously disregarded (e. g. the Maccabeans) and misrepresented (Tac. Hist. v, 8) the fortunes of the Jews, cannot be held to be conclusive against the occurrence of an event which must have appeared to them trivial or unintelligible (Jahn, Arch. iii, 580 sq.; Ste. Croix, Essai sur la critique, etc., Paris, 1810 [in Eng. Bath, 1798]; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, ii, 193 sq.; and, on the other side, Ant. van Dale, Dissert. super Aristaei, Amstel. 1705, p. 69 sq.; Favin, De Alex. Magn. ingrexis, Histoire de l'Amphithéâtre, Flor. 1781). See Pamst.

The tradition, whether true or false, presents an aspect of Alexander's character which has been frequently lost sight of by his recent biographers. He was not simply a Greek, nor must he be judged by a Greek standard. The Orientalism, which was a scandal to his followers, was a necessary deduction from his principles of policy. The result of this policy is very clear in the political history (comp. Art. vii, 29). He approached the idea of a universal monarchy from the side of Greece, but his final object was to establish something higher than the paramount supremacy of one people. His purpose was to combine and equalize, not to annihilate; to wed the East and the West in a just union—"The Jews have a share in making the Jews to Greece" (Plut. de Alex. Fort. i, 6). The time, indeed, was not yet come when this was possible, but if he could not accomplish the great issue, he prepared for its accomplishment.

The first and most direct consequence of the policy of Alexander was the weakening of nationalities, the first condition necessary for the dissolution of the old religions. The swift course of his victories, the constant incorporation of foreign elements in his armies, the fierce wars and changing fortunes of his successors, broke down the barriers by which kingdom had been separated from kingdom, and opened the road for larger conceptions of life and faith than had ever been possible (comp. Polyb. iii, 50). The contact of the East and West brought out into practical forms thoughts and feelings which had been confined to the schools. Paganism was deprived of life as soon as it was transplanted beyond the narrow limits in which it took its shape. The spread of commerce followed the progress of the Greek language; and the higher and literature vindicated their claim to be considered the most perfect expression of human thought by becoming practically universal. The Jews were at once most exposed to the powerful influences thus brought to bear upon the East, and most able to support them.
ALEXANDER

In the arrangement of the Greek conquests which followed the battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301, Judaea was made the frontier land of the rival empires of Syria and Egypt, and though it was necessarily subjected to the constant vicissitudes of war, it was able to make advance in the terms with the state to which it owed allegiance from the important advantages which it offered for attack or defence. See Antiochus.

Internally also the people were prepared to withstand the effects of the revolution which the Greek dominion effected. The constitution of Ezra had obtained its full development. A powerful hierarchy had succeeded in substituting the idea of a church for that of a state, and the Jews now able to wander the world and yet remain faithful to the God of his fathers. See Dispersion. The same constitutional change had strengthened the intellectual and religious position of the people. A rigid "fence" of ritualism protected the course of common life from the license of Greek manners; and the great doctrine of the unity of God, which was now seen to be the divine centre of their system, counteracted the attractions of a philosophic pantheism. See Simon the Just.

Through a long course of discipline, in which they had been left unguided by prophetic teaching, the Jews had realised the significance of their mission to the world, and were waiting for the means of fulfilling it. The conquest of Alexander furnished them with the occasion and the power. But, at the same time, the example of Greece fostered personal as well as popular independence. Judaism was speedily divided into sects, analogous to the typical forms of Greek philosophy. But even the rude analysis of the old faith was productive of good. The freedom of Greece was no less instrumental in forming the Jews for their final work than the contemplative spirit of Persia, or the civil organisation of Rome; for if the city which Alexander was rapid, its effects were lasting. The city which he chose to bear his name perpetuated in after ages the office which he providentially discharged for Judaism and mankind; and the historian of Christianity must confirm the judgment of Arrian, that Alexander, "who was like no other man, could not have been given to the world without the special design of Providence" (Arr. vii. 80).

See Alexandria. And Alexander himself appreciated this design better even than his great teacher; for it is said (Plut. Alex., 1, 6) that when Aristotle urged him to treat the Greeks as freemen and the Orientals as slaves, he found the true answer to this counsel in the recognition of his "divine mission to unite and reconcile the world."—Smith. See Secta, Jews.

Tetrarchum (Attic Talent) of one of the Successors of Alexander.—Observe: Head of Alexander the Great as a young Jupiter Ammon, holding a Victory with Monogram and Letter (γ); Inscription in Greek, "Of King Lyssimachus." In the prophetic visions of Daniel the influence of Alexander is necessarily combined with that of his successors. They represented with partial exaggeration the hopes of his charioteers; and to the Jews nationally the policy of the Syrian kings was of greater importance than the original conquest of Asia. But some traits of "the first mighty king" (Dan. viii. 21; xi. 3) are given with vigorous distinctness. The emblem by which he is typified ("αξιωματικος") is a "he-goat, from ἀξιωματικος, Gensacus, Thes. s. v.) suggests the notions of strength and speed; and the universal extent (Dan. viii, 5. . . . from the west on the face of the whole earth) and marvellous rapidity of his conquests (Dan. 1.c. he touched not the ground) are brought forward as the characteristics of his power, which was directed by the strongest personal impetuosity (Dan. viii, 5, in the fury of his strength), and which was armed with greater allegiance from the important advantages which it offered for attack or defence. See Antiochus.

The name of Alexander is equally celebrated in the writings of the Orientals, as in those of the Greeks and Romans; but they vary extremely from the accounts which the historians give of him (P. Herod., Bibl. Orient., s. v. Exceder; Mommsen, Homer, p. 86). They call him Iasianus Dukturnus (see Goli, Let. Arab. 1866), "double-horned Alexander," alluding to the two horns of his empire (or his power) in the East and West. For further details, see Anthony's Clas. Dict.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. See GREECE.

2. Surnamed Balas (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 4, 3, 'Αλεξάνδρος καὶ Ἀλεξάνδρην Ἀλεξανδρείαν; Justin. xxxv, 1, Sesonact pro eo Balsam quandam . . . . nomen e Alexan-dri inditum; comp. the Araman ΝΑΛΑΣ, the lord), a personage whose history is detailed in the Maccabees and Josephus (comp. Justin. xxxv; Polyb. xxxvii, 14, 15; Iuv. Epit. I, iii; Apian. Syriac, Ixvii; Euseb. Chron.). He likewise assumed the titles "Epiphanes" ("ἐπιφανής, an illustrious one") and "invictus" ("invictus, unconquered"). His extraction is doubtful; but he professed to be the natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and in that capacity, out of opposition to Demetrius Soter, he was recognised as king of Syria by the king of Egypt, by the Romans, and eventually by Jonathan Maccabaeus (Strab. xvi. 2, 32, 33; Ant. xiii. 9, 3). He was more generally regarded as an impostor, who falsely assumed the name (App. Syr. 67; Justin. i. c. comp. Polyb. xxxii, 16). He claimed the throne of Syria in B.C. 182 in opposition to Demetrius Soter, who had provoked the hostility of the neighboring kings and alienated the affections of his subjects (Josephus, i. c.). His pretensions were put forward by Hierocles, former treasurer of Antiochus Epiphanes, who obtained the recognition of his title at Rome by scandalous intrigues (Polyb. xxxvii, 14, 16). After landing at Polemais (1 Macc. 1, 1) Alexander gained the warm support of Jonathan, who was now the leader of the Jews (1 Macc. ix. 78); and though his first efforts were unsuccessful (Justin. xxxv, 1, 10), in B.C. 150 he completely routed the forces of Demetrius, who himself fell in the retreat (1 Macc. 1, 48-50; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 2, 4; Strab. xvi. 751). After this Alexander married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemaeus VI Philometor; and in the arrangement of his kingdom appointed Jonathan governor (μαχητής της Πατρίδος), 1 Macc. vi, 65) of a province (Judaea; comp. 1 Macc. vii, 57).

But his triumph was of short duration. After retaining power, he gave himself up to a life of indulgence (Liv. Epit. 50; comp. Athen. v. 211), leaving the government in the hands of ministers whose misrule rendered the country wretched (Diod. Sic. Fr. 141, 1). Accordingly, when Demetrius Nicator, the son of Demetrius Soter, landed in Syria in B.C. 117, the new pretender found powerful support (1 Macc. 1, 67 sq.). At first Jonathan defeated and slew Apollonius, the governor of Cule-Syria, who had joined the party of Demetrius, for which he received fresh favors from Alexander (1 Macc. 1, 69-89); but shortly afterward (B.C. 146) Ptolemy entered Syria with a large force, and after he had placed garrisons in the chief cities on the coast, which received him according to the commands of Alexander, suddenly pronounced himself the successor of Demetrius (1 Macc. x, 11; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 4, 5 sq.), alleging as the basis of his claim, by truth, the existence of a conspiracy against his life (Josephus, l. c.; comp. Diod. ap. Muller, Fragm. xvi. 11). Alexander, who had been forced to leave Antioch (Josephus, l. c.), was in Cilicia when he heard of Ptolemy's defection (1 Macc. xi, 14). He hastened to meet him, but was defeated (1 Macc. xi, 15; Justin. xxxv, 2), and fled to Abbe, in Arabia (Diod. l. c.), where he was murdered, B.C. 146 (Diod. l. c.; 1 Macc. xi, 17, differ as afterward in the manner, and Euseb. Chron. Arm. 1, 343, represents him as having been slain in the battle). The narrative in 1 Macc. and Josephus show clearly the partiality which the Jews entertained for Alexander as 'the first that entertained true peace with them' (1 Macc. x, 47); and the same feeling was exhibited afterward in the seal with which they supported the claims of his son Antiochus. Balas left a young son, who was eventually made king of Syria by Tryphon, under the name of Antiochus Theos (1 Macc. xi, 13-18; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 4). See Antiochus.

3. Surnamed Zebrina (or Zabrina, Zabirinac, said to signify 'purchased,' from a report that Ptolemy had bought him as a slave), the son of a merchant named Protaruchus; he was set up by Ptolemy Phuson, king of Egypt, as a pretender to the crown of the Greek kingdom of Syria shortly after the death of Antiochus Sidetes and the return of Demetrius Nicol; from his captivity among the Parthians (B.C. 128). Antiochus, Apamea, and several other cities, disputed with the tyranny of Demetrius, acknowledged the authority of Alexander, who pretended to have been adopted by Sidetes; but he never succeeded in obtaining power over the whole of Syria. In the earlier part of the year 125 he defeated Demetrius, who fled to Tyre, and was there killed; but in the middle of the same year Alexander's patron, the king of Egypt, set up Antiochus Gryphus, a son of Demetrius, by whom he was defeated in battle. Alexander fled to Antioch, where he attempted to take the temple of Jupiter in order to pay his troops; but the people rose against him and drove him out of the city. He soon fell into the hands of robbers, who delivered him up to Antiochus, by whom he was put to death, B.C. 122. He was weak and effeminate, but sometimes generous. (Justin. xxix, 1, 2; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 10; Clinton, Fasti, iii, 394.)

4. Surnamed Janneus (Iapnaion), the first prince of the Macedeian dynasty who for any considerable period enjoyed the title of king. See Maccabees. Coins of his reign are extant, from which it appears that the original name was Erimonon, which he exchanged for the Greek name Alexander, according to the Hellenizing custom of the age. His history is detailed by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 12-16). He was the third son of John Hyrcanus, who left three sons, or at least five, according to Josephus (War, i, 4, 7). The father was particularly fond of Antigonus and Aristobulus, but could not endure his third son, Alexander, because he had dreamed that he would reign after him, which implied the death of his two brothers. Antigonus never reigned, and Aristobulus reigned but for a short time. After his death, Salome, or Alexander, his widow, liberated Alexander, whom Aristobulus had confined in prison since their father's death, and made him king, B.C. 104. Alexander put to death one of his brothers, who had formed a design on his life, and heaped favours on another, called Absalom, who, being contented with a private condition, lived peaceably, and retired from public employment. Alexander was of a warlike, enterprising disposition; and when he had regulated his dominions he marched against Ptolemais, but was soon compelled to relinquish the object of his expedition in order to defend his own territories against Ptolemy Lathyrus, who had marched a powerful army into Galilee. Alexander gave battle near Antiochus, and, far from the Jordan; but Ptolemy killed 80,000, or, as others say, 50,000 of his men. After this victory the latter met with no resistance. His mother, Cleopatra, however, apprehensive for the safety of Egypt, determined to stop his further progress, and for this purpose levied a numerous army, and equipping a large fleet, soon landed in Phoenicia, B.C. 102. Ptolemais opened its gates to receive her; and hero Alexander Janneus presented himself in her camp with considerable presents, and was received as an unhappy prince, an enemy of Ptolemy, who had no refuge but the queen's protection, B.C. 101. Cleopatra consented to receive him in the city of Scythopolis, and Alexander marched with his troops into Coele-Syria, where he took the town of Gadara after a siege of ten months, and after that Amathus, one of the best fortresses in the country, where Theodorus, son of Zeno, had lodged his most valuable property as in absolute security. This Theodorus, falling suddenly on Alexander's army, killed 10,000, and plundered his baggage. Alexander, however, was not deterred by this disaster from prosecuting his purposes: having recruited his army, he besieged Raphia, Anthenon, and Gaza—towns on the Mediterranean—and took them; the latter, after a desperate resistance, was reduced to a heap of ruins, B.C. 96.

After this Alexander returned to Jerusalem, but the Jews had revolted; and on the feast of tabernacles, while he, as high-priest, was preparing to sacrifice, the people assembled in the temple had the insolence to throw lemons at him, taken from the branches which they carried in their hands. Alexander put the seditionists to the sword, and killed about 6000. Afterward he erected a portion of wood before the altar and the inner temple to prevent the approach of the people; and to defend himself in future against such attempts, he took into his pay guards from Pidias and Cilicia. Finding Jews of his nation like to continue the seeds of clamor and discontent, Alexander quitte the metropolis, at the head of his army, B.C. 93; and, having crossed the Jordan, he made war upon the Moabites and Ammonites, and obliged them to pay tribute; attacked Amathus, the fortress beyond Jordan before mentionned, and razed it; also made war with Obeida, king of the Arabians, whom he subdued. On his return to Jerusalem he found the Jews more incensed against him than ever, and a civil war shortly ensued, in which he killed above 50,000 persons. All his endeavors to bring about a reconciliation proving fruitless, Alexander one day asked them what they would have him do to acquire their good-will. They answered unanimously: "that he had nothing to do but to kill himself." After this they sent deputies to desire succors from Demetrius Eucerus against their king, who marched into Judea with 3000 horse and 40,000 infantry, and encamped at Sichem. A battle ensued, in which Alexander was defeated, and was compelled to fly to the mountains for shelter, B.C. 88. This occurrence, however, contributed to his re-establishment, for a large number of the Jews, touched with the unhappy condition of their king, joined him; and Demetrius, retreating into Syria, left the Jews to oppose their king with their own forces. Alexander, collecting his army, marched against his rebellious subjects, whom he overcame in every engagement, and having shut up the fiercest of them in Bethom, he forced the town, made them prisoners, and carried them to Jerusalem, where he ordered eight hundred of them to be crucified before him during a great entertainment which he held the next day; and the unhappy wretches had expired he commanded their wives and children to be murdered in their presence—an unheard-of and excessive cruelty, which occasioned the people of his own party to call him "Thracides," meaning "as cruel as a Thracian," B.C. 86. Some time afterward, Alexander yielded to his creditors, and surrendered Damascus, resolved to invade Judea; but Alexander defeated his intention, and compelled him to return into Arabia, where he was killed. Aratus, the succeeding king of Damascus, however, came into Judea, and defeated Alexander in the plain of Sephala, B.C. 82. A peace being concluded, Aratus returned to Damascus, and Alexander ingratiated himself with the Jews, B.C. 81. Having given himself up to excessive drinking, he brought on a violent quartan fever, which terminated his life. His queen, Alexandra, observing him to be near his end, and foreseeing all she had to fear from a mutinous people not easily governed, and her children not of age to conduct her affairs, was greatly distressed. Alexander told her that, to reign in peace, she should conceal his death from the army till Ragaba, which he was then besieging, was taken; that, when returned to Jerusalem, she should give the Pharisees some share in the government; that she should not disturb the burial of his dead body, give them permission to treat it with what indignities they pleased in revenge for the ill-treatment they had received from him, and promise that she would in future do nothing in the government without their advice and participation. He died at the age of forty-two, which made him, according to Jewish chronology, seven years, B.C. 78. This admission of the Pharisees into the government demands the special notice of the reader, as it accounts not only for their influence over the minds of the people, but also for their connection with the rulers, and their power as public governors, which appear so remarkably in the history of the Gospels—much beyond what might be expected from a sect merely religious. Alexander left two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, who disputed the kingdom and high-priesthood till the time of Herod the Great, and whose dissensions caused the ruin of their family, and were the means of Herod's elevation.—Calmet, s. v. See A. 5.

5. The son of Aristobulus and Alexandra, and grandson of Alexander Janneus. He was to have been carried captive to Rome, with his brother Antigonus, when Pompey took Jerusalem from Aristobulus (B.C. 63); on the way, however, he found means to secede from the galley, raised an army of 10,000 foot and 15,000 horse, with which he performed many gallant actions, and seized the fortresses of Alexandria and Machærus. Hyrcanus applied for aid to Gabinius, the general of the Roman troops, who drove him from the mountains, beat him near Jerusalem, killed 3000 of his men, and made many prisoners. By the mediation of his mother, Alexandra, Gabinius found him so atoned with Gabinius, and the Romans marched into Egypt, but were soon compelled to return by the violent proceedings of Alexander. Wherever he met with Romans he sacrificed them to his resentment, and a number were compelled to fortify themselves on Mount Gerizim, where Gabinius found him at his approach. He was apprehensive of engaging the great number of troops who were with Alexander, Gabinius sent Antipater with offers of general pardon if they laid down their arms. This had the desired success; many forsook Alexander, and retired to their own houses; but with 50,000 still remaining he resolved to give the Romans battle. The armies met at the foot of Mount Tabor, where, after a very obstinate action, Alexander was overcome, with the loss of 10,000 men.

Under the government of Crassus (B.C. 58) Alexander again began to embroil affairs; but after the unhappy expedition against the Parthians Crassus obliged him, under a treaty made while he marched to the Euphrates to oppose the passage of the Parthians. During the wars between Caesar and Pompey, Alexander and Aristobulus, his father, espoused Caesar's interest, B.C. 49. Aristobulus was poisoned, and Alexander beheaded at Antioch. B.C. 48, Anna, Aristobulus' only daughter, was exiled. 6. The son of Jason, sent to Rome to renew friendship and alliance between the Jews and Romans: he is named in the decree of the senate directed to the Jews in the ninth year of Hyrcanus's pontificate, B.C. 60 (Josephus, Anti. xiv. 8, 5).

7. The son of Phasael, another Jewish ambassador on the same occasion (Josephus, ib. 6). Perhaps identical with the following.

8. The son of Theodorus, sent to Rome by Hyrcanus to renew his alliance with the senate. He is named in the decree of the senate addressed to the magistrates of Ephesus, made in the consulship of Dostalibus (B.C. 48), which specified that the Jews should not be forced into military service, because they could not bear arms on the Sabath-day, nor have, at all times, such provisions in the armies as were authorized by their law (Josephus, Anti. xiv. 10, 10 and 11).

9. A son of Herod the Great by Mariamne. The story of his birth is interesting: the king desired to beget a son on her, and desired that she should, after the death of his deceased body, give them permission to treat it with what indignities they pleased in revenge for the ill-treatment they had received from him, and promise that she would in future do nothing in the government without their advice and participation. He died at the age of fourteen (Josephus, Anti. xv, xvi; War, i, 22-27), can hardly be separated from that of Aristobulus, his brother and companion in misfortune. After the tragic death of their mother, Mariamne (Josephus, Anti. xv, 7), Herod sent them to Rome to be educated in a manner suitable to their rank (ib. 10). Augustus allowed them an apartment in his palace, intending this mark of his consideration as a compliment to their father Herod. On their return to Judea (ib. xvi, 1, 2) the people received the princes with great joy; but Salome, Herod's sister, who had been the principal cause of Mariamne's death, apprehending that if ever the sons of the late possessed authority they would relieve their resentment, resolved by her calumnies to alienate the affections of their father from them. This she managed with great address, and for some time discovered no symptoms of ill-will. Herod married Alexander to Glaphyrn, daughter of Archelaus, king of Capadocia. Aristobulus to Bessus of Bithynia. Salome, Therusa, the king's brother, and Salome, his sister, conspiring to destroy these young princes, watched closely their conduct, and often induced them to speak their thoughts freely and forcibly concerning the manner in which Herod had put to death their mother. Whatever they said was immediately reported to the king in the most odious and aggravated terms, and Herod, having no distrust of his brother and sister, confided in their representations as to his sons' intentions of revenging their mother's death. To check in some degree their lofty spirits, he sent for his eldest son, Antipater, to court—having been afraid that the death of his queen, so deeply with that of his queen, had been ordered to them to be tortured. The present of Antipater only exasperated the two princes, and at length succeeded in so entirely alienating his father's affection from them, that Herod carried them to Rome to accuse them before Augustus of designs against his life, B.C. 11 (ib. 10, 7). But the young princes defied Augustus, and after being convicted of their associations so deeply with their secrets, that Augustus reconciled them to their father, and sent them back to Judea, apparently in perfect union with Antipater, who expressed great satisfaction to see them restored to Herod's favor. When returned to Jerusalem Herod convened the people in the temple, and publicly declared his intention of collecting, but he was taken and brought back to Rome, demanding from Augustus justice against Alexander and Aristobulus. Augustus ordered them to be tried at Berytus, before the governors of Syria and the tributary sovereigns of the neighboring provinces, particularly mentioning Archelaus as one, and giving Herod permission, should his sons be found guilty, to finish them as he might deem proper. Herod convended the judges, but basely omitted Archelaus, Alexander's father-in-law; and then, leaving his sons under a strong guard at Plataea, he pleaded his own cause against them before the assembly, consisting of 150 persons. After addicating against them every thing he had been able to collect, he exhibited before the assembly that, as a king, he might have tried and condemned them by his own authority, but that he preferred bringing them before such an assembly to avoid the imputation of injustice and cruelty. Saturnius, who had been formerly consul, voted that they should be punished, but not with death, but with banishment. These resolutions were overruled by Volumnius, who justified the father by condemning his sons to death, and induced the rest of the judges to join with him in this cruel and unjust sentence. The time and manner of carrying it into execution were left entirely to Herod. Damascenus, Tyro, and other friends were hindered in order to save the lives of the unfortunate princes, but in vain. They remained some time in confinement, and, after the report of another plot, were conveyed to Selaste, or Sarea, and there strangled, B.C. 5 (ib. 11, 7).—Calmet.

The leading incidents of this narrative, which is chiefly interesting as confirmatory of the barbarous character attributed to Herod in the Gospels, are confirmed by Strabo (xvi. 765). It is probably this event to which Macrobius alludes (Saturn. ii. 4), when speaking of the jocose remark that Augustus is said to have made on hearing that in the massacre of the Bethlehemite children (Matt. ii. 18) one of the king's own sons had been killed, "It is true, he said, 'it is true. He was killed, but not by his own." Perhaps, however, the son referred to may be Antipater (q. v.), whom he also ordered to execute just before his death. See HEROD.

30. A son of Alexander Herod (above) by Glaphyra (Josephus, War, i. 18, 1). See HEROD.

31. A son of Phasaelus (son of Phasaelus, Herod's brother) by Salampeia, Herod's daughter (Josephus, Ant., xviii. 5, 4). See HEROD.

32. A relative of the high-priest, and a leading Jew, present at the examination of Peter and John before the Sanhedrim for the cure of the lame man (Acts iv. 6), A.D. 29. Many (Kunlé, in loc.) suppose it was the same Judas Iscariotus (below), who was a brother of the well-known Philo, and an old friend of the Emperor Claudius (Josephus, Ant., xviii. 8, 1; xix, 5, 1), and whose son, Alexander Tiberius (below), was procurator of Judea and afterward of Egypt (Josephus, War, ii. 11, 6; 15, 1, etc.).

33. A man whose father, Simon, a Cyrenian Jew, was compelled to bear the cross of Christ behind him from the gate to Calvary (Mark xvi. 21), A.D. post 29. From the manner in which he and his brother Rufus are mentioned, it is not unlikely that they were afterward known as Christians among the Gentiles.

34. An alabarch (q. v.) of Alexandria, named Lysimachus, steward of Antonia the mother of Claudius, who freed him from the incarceration to which he had been subjected by the preceding emperor (Josephus, War, i. 18, 1).
II. Pope (originally called Asealmo da Baggio), a native of Milan. As priest of his native town, he began, about the middle of the 11th century, to preach against the married clergy. And, as a means of securing the sympathy of Milan, who sympathized with the married clergy, obtained for him from the Emperor Henry and the Pope Stephen II, the diocese of Lucca, in order to remove him. Anselm, however, in his new position, vigorously pursued his attacks upon the married clergy, and was therefore not only attacked by the new Pope, but by the party, Hildebrand and Petrus Damiani. On the death of Pope Nicholas II (1061), Hildebrand, who was already all-powerful at Rome, succeeded in elevating Anselm to the papal throne under the name of Alexander II. The party of the count of Tusculum, in union with the married clergy, opposed to him Bishop Cardinal of Parma as antipope under the name of Hilorius II, but Alexander was generally recognised in Germany by the Synod of 1062. As pope, Alexander endeavoured to enforce all the exorbitant pretensions of the papacy, and in this effort was supported by Hildebrand and Damiani, who acted as his legates and assistants in the beyond the city. It was apparently during his government in Egypt that he accompanied Corbulo in his expedition into Armenia, A.D. 64; and he was, in this campaign, given as one of the hostages to secure the safety of Tiridates when the latter visited the Roman camp. Alexander was the first Roman governor who declared in favor of Vespasian; and the day on which he administered the oath to the legions in the presence of the emperor, the knowledge of July, A.D. 65, is regarded as the beginning of that emperor's reign. Alexander afterwards accompanied Titus in the war against Judaea, and was present at the taking of Jerusalem. (Josephus, War, ii, 11, 6; 15, 1; 18, 7; 8; iv, 10, 6; vi, 4, 8; Tacitus, Ann., xxv, 28; Plut. i, 10, 6; ii, 10, 6; Suetonius, Aug., 89.)

16. A Jew of Ephesus, known only from the part he took in the uproar about Diana which was raised there by the preaching of Paul (Acts xix, 83), A.D. 54. As the inhabitants confounded the Jews and Jewish Christians, the former, apprehensive lest they might be involved in the popular commotion as opponents of the prevalent idolatry, put forward Alexander, apparently one of their own number, and perhaps a practised speaker, to defend them from any connexion with the Christians (Coneybear and Howson's St. Paul, ii, 87 note); but his interference only inflamed the mob the more, so that he was unable in the tumult to obtain a hearing (Neander, Planting of the Church, i, 318, Edinb. ed.). Some suppose that this person is the same with "Alexander the coppersmith" of 2 Tim. iv, 14; but this is by no means probable: the name of Alexander was in those times very common among the Jews. A coppersmith or brazier (mentioned in 1 Tim. i, 20; 2 Tim. iv, 11), who, with Hymenæus and others, broached certain heresies touching the resurrection, for which they were excommunicated by the Apostle Paul, A.D. 54-64. These persons, and especially Alexander, appear to have malignated the faith they had forsaken and the character of the apostle. As every Jew learned some trade, it has been imagined that Alexander was really a man of learning, and not an artisan, although acquainted with the brazier's craft. But we are not aware that it was usual to designate a literate person by the name of the trade with which he was acquainted, although this may possibly have been done in some cases as a manner of indicating his profession and so distinguishing him as that of Alexander. The supposition of some (Neander, Planting, i, 407 note), that different persons are alluded to in the two passages cited, is not the more probable one (Matthies, Pastoralbriefe, p. 239 sq.).

Alexander, first bishop of Rome, succeeded Evælius about A.D. 110. He ruled for eight years and five months, and is said to have suffered martyrdom under Hadrian in 119, though this is doubted (Euseb. H. E. iv, 4; Iren. iv, 3). Alexander is said by some writers to have been the first who directed that water should be mixed with the wine in the Eucharist, and also to have introduced many other religious ceremonies, as the usual custom of Roman Catholic writers to attribute the events of later periods to earlier ones. The epistles attributed to him are spurious.

and was appointed by Alexander governor of Benevent. The opponents of Alexander elected, however, another antipope (Sept. 29, 1178), who assumed the name of Innocent III, but was soon after captured by order of Alexander, and imprisoned in a monastery, until his death. In 1179 Alexander held at Rome the third general council of Lateran (q. v.), which issued a number of decrees on church discipline and excom-unicated the Albigenenses. In 1180 Alexander revisited the courts of France and England to underwrite a new crusade for the purpose of aiding the king of Jerusalem against Saladin. Alexander even endeavored to convert the sultan of Iconium by addressing to him a kind of letter, Always Assisted by Instructio Fidei. Alexander reserved the cancellation of saints, which had formerly been practised also by the metropolitans, to the popes, and introduced the Liber Monitorum, on which the history of Alexander is by Reuter, Geschichte Alexander III und der Kirche seiner Zeit (3 vols. Berlin, 1845-64). See also Turner, Hist. lit. vol. iv; Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 168.

The Pope (originally Pietro il Reggini), a man of worldly spirit, ascended the throne in 1154, at a period of great disturbance. Alexander, like his predecessor, endeavored to confiscate the entire kingdom of Sicily on the ground that the Emperor Frederick II, who was also king of Italy, had died excom-unicated. When Manfred, an illegitimate son of Frederick, maintained himself against the papal troops
as ruler of Sicily, Alexander excommunicated him, proclaimed against him a crusade, and put the entire kingdom under the ban. At the same time he asked considerable sums from Henry III, king of England, in order to defray the expenses of the crusade, and, as an indemnification, offered the kingdom of Sicily to Edmund, the second son of Henry. A legate gave to this young prince in advance the investiture. Manfred, however, maintained himself, and, aided by the Saracens, conquered the pope, and compelled him to take refuge at Viterbo, where he died, May 25, 1206, leaving the papal authority greatly enfeebled. At the beginning of his pontificate, Alexander, at the request of Louis XI, sent inquisitors to France. He was very partial to the Dominicans, and condemned a work by William of St. Amour against the mendicant orders ("On the Dangers of the last Times") and a work entitled The Everlasting Gospel, authorized to John of Parma, the general of the Franciscans. Like his predecessors, he endeavored to bring about a union between the Greek and the Roman Churches. Several letters and bulls of this pope have been printed in Labbe's Concilia, Ughelli's Italo Sacra, Acchery's Speculum, and other collections.—Hoefner,
Bis. Genera., i, 878; Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 192, 209, 612.

V, Pope (originally Pietro Philargyri), a Franciscan monk from Candia, was raised to the papal throne in 1189 by the Council of Pisa, which deposed the popes Gregory XII and Benedict XIII. His prodigality of gifts and offices during his pontificate so unbounded that he used to say, "When I became a bishop I was rich; when a cardinal, poor; and when a pope, a beggar." He died May 3, 1410, it was supposed from punishment administered by his successor, John XXII.
He was regarded as one of the most learned men of his age.
His pontificate is characterized not so much by actions,
which, however, have never been printed, as by his books, a little treatise on the conception of the Virgin Mary.—Hoefner, Bis. Genera., i, 879.

VI, Pope (originally Rodrigo Leonati, but afterward Burgio, from his mother's family), was born at Valentia, Spain, in 1481. His mother, Jane Borgia, was the sister of Pope Calixtus III. Roderic first studied law, but entered on a military career at the age of 18. His youth was a very dissolute one; and he early formed a criminal connection with a Roman lady living in Spain with her two daughters. He soon seduced the daughters also; and one of them, Rosa Vanozza, became his life-long mistress. By her he had five children, two of whom, Cesar Borgia and Lucretia, surpassed their father, if possible, in abominal crimes. In 1453, while Roderic was living in adultery in Spain, his uncle became pope. This opened to him a new career of ambition. He went to Rome on a promise from the pope of an office worth 12,000 crowns a year; and at the same time his mistresses and her children went to Venice, under the charge of an intendant, Manuel, who afterward passed as her husbond, to shield the amours of Roderic. The pope was charmed with the pleasing manners and apparent piety
of his nephew, and made him cardinal and vice-chancelloi in 1456. Roderic affected great piety, visited the prisons and the poor, was diligent in keeping church services, and soon beguiled the Romans into confidence in his purity. During the pontificates of Pius II, Paul II, and Sixtus IV, successors of Calixtus, he remained quiet. In the pontificate of Innocent VIII, which began in 1484, he brought his mistresses to Rome, and put her in a house near St. Peter's, when he passed his nights with her, the days being devoted ostentationiously to his public duties and acts of piety!
In the mean time he was busy buying up votes for the papal chair, and when Innocent died (1492), he had purchased a sufficient number of cardinals to secure his election. This statement rests on the author-

Alexander VI.

ity of Burchard, master of ceremonies to Alexander VI, who left a journal, which was afterward published in 1696 (Hanover, ed. by Leibnitz) in part, and has recently been published in full (Florence, 1854, 8vo).
Burchard states the price paid by Roderic for the votes of the cardinals as follows: to Cardinal Orsino, the castles of Montecelli and Sarzana; to Ascanius Sforza,
the vice-chancellorship of the Church; to the cardinal of Colonna, the rich abbey of St. Benedict, as well as the domains and right of patronage for himself and family forever; to the cardinal of St. Angelo, the bishopric of Porto, and the tower which was a dependency on it, with a cellar full of wine. The cardinal of Parme recived the city of Nepl; Savelli received the government of Citta Castellana, and of the church of St. Mary the Greater; a monk of Venice, who had obtained the cardinalate, sold his vote for five thousand ducats of gold. Roderic became pope August 2, 1492, and took the name of Alexander VI. His pontificate of eleven years was a stormy one, as he made every thing subordinate to the purpose of raising his bastard children above the heads of the oldest princely houses of Italy. Of the crimes alleged against Alexander and his children, Caesar and Lucretia, this is not the place to speak in detail; it is enough to say that this pontificate ran several years into the worst period of the Roman Empire in debauchery, venality, and murder. It was in 1692 that Columbus discovered America, and the Portuguese were soon after disputing with the Spaniards as to their claims through Vasco de Gama. The dispute was referred to Alexander. He traced a line which passed from pole to pole through the Azores, or Western Islands, and decreed that all the countries which were beyond this line, that is, the West Indies, or America, should belong to Spain; and all east of it, i.e. the East Indies and the African coast, to Portugal. The censorship of books forms one of the many claims of Alexander to the gratitude of posterity, as he is said to have originated in 1569. The monk Savonarola (q.v.) fearlessly exposed the wickedness of Alexander, who caused him to be burned in 1498.

K

The wise of the time did not fail of their duty in pasquinades, one of which runs thus:

De vitto in vitam, de flamua transit in ignem. Venit Alexander claves, alitaria Carusam; Vendeure jure potest, emerat ille prius; Etc.

The death-scene of this wretch is stated by Tommaso de’ Medici in his history as follows: After the marriage of his daughter Lucretia, the pope requested Cardinal Cornocto to lend him his palace for a great feast, to which all the cardinals and nobility were to be invited, and at which some of them were to be poisoned. By mistake the poisoned wine was handed to the pope and his son Caesar. Both were soon taken ill; Caesar recovered, but the pope died the same night, August 18, 1503.

Of course there have not been wanting apologetics even for such a monster as Alexander VI. Among those who doubt, or affect to doubt, the stories of his great crimes, are Voltaire, Boscoe, the Biographie Universelle of Mihaud, and Appleton’s Cyclopaedia. But the evidence of contemporary writers is not to be shaken by the kind of criticism employed by those who would whitewash the Borgias. See, as the chief authorities, Burchard, Diarium, nunc primum pub., juris factum ab A. Gennareli (Florence, 1584, 8vo); Tommaso de’ Medici (Parma, 1600); E. G. Borg a. The chief points of Burchard’s diary are given in Gordon, Life of Alexander VI and Cesar Borgia (London, 1729, fol.; 1730, French, 2 vols. 8vo). See also Ranke, History of the Popes, i, 44 sq.; Masse, Hist. du Pape Alexandre VI (Paris, 1838, 8vo); Gieseler, Ch. Hist. per. iii, § 183, and authorities there cited.

VII. Pope (originally Fabio Chio), born at Siena 1502, succeeded to the papacy in 1555. He surrounded himself with splendor, and while he indulged in luxury and licentiousness, he also spent vast sums in improving and adorning the city of Rome. He confirmed the bull of Innocent X against the five propositions of Jansenius; and was the author of the "Certificate," an act the intention of which was to prove that these five propositions were contained in the writings of Jansenius. In consequence of a difficulty with the government of France, French troops seized the town and the district of Avignon, which at that time still belonged to the Papal States; and the Sicilians, on this occasion, proved that the popes, so far from being inestimable in temporal affairs, were not even inestimable in spiritual matters. After having in vain invoked the aid of several Catholic princes, Alexander complied with all the demands of the French king, and had Avignon restored to him. He died May 22, 1556. His bulls are found in Cherubini’s Bullaria. A volume of his verses, Philosophi Musae Juveniles (so called because written when he was at the college of the Philomathes, at Siena), was printed in 1566.—Biog. Unnu. i, 592; Ranke, Hist. of Popes, ii, 191; Pallavicino, Della Vita di Alessandro VII libri v (Prato, 1840, 2 vols.); Hoefner, Biographie Generale, i, 903.

VIII. Pope (originally Ottoborn), born at Vena 1610, made pope 1688, died Feb. 1, 1691, having held the chair long enough to advance his own family, and secure for himself an enormous reputation for avarice and duplicity. He declared the decrees of 1682 which guaranteed the independence of the Gallican Church, to be null and void. This pope, though opposed to the Jansenists, nevertheless, adopted the doctrine of "philosophical sin," as taught by the Jesuit professor, Bongot, of Dijon. The Vatican Library is indebted to him for the acquisition of the magnificent collection of books and manuscripts of the Queen Christina.—Hoefner, Biographie Generale, i, 905; Ranke, Hist. of Popes, ii, 273.

Alexander, Saint, bishop of Cappadocia, and afterward of Jerusalem; first, as colleague of the aged Narcissus, and afterward alone. Eusebius (lib. vi, ch. xi) gives an account of his call to the episcopacy of Jerusalem, and of his service there. He protected Origen, whose fellow-disciple he had been, and ordained him priest. Under Alexander Severus he was imprisoned for several years. He suffered persecution under Decius, and died in prison at Caesarea in 251. He is the first bishop who has been a confessor. He was a friend of literature, and established a library at Jerusalem. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on March 18; by the Greek, on December 22.—Dupin, Eccl. Writings, 90 cent.

Alexander, Saint, patriarch of Alexandria, succeeded Achillas A.D. 312 or 313, and his appointment excited the envy and hatred of Arius, who had himself aspired to the episcopal throne. His doctrines were attacked by Arius, whom, after mildly exhorting to return to the truth, he cited before an assembly of the clergy at Alexandria, and, on his refusing to recant his errors, excommunicated him and his followers. This sentence was afterward confirmed by a hundred bishops in the Council of Alexandria, A.D. 320. One of his epistles against Arius may be found in Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i, 6, and another in Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. i, 4. He died April 17, 326.

Alexander, Saint, bishop of Constantineople, is commemorated Aug. 28 (Latin) or 30 (Greek). He resolutely opposed the Arian heresy; and when Eusebius of Nicomedia insisted upon Arius being received into the communion of the Church, the patriarch, in the deepest affliction, ordered public fasting and prayer to be made to God to avert it; and himself passed whole nights before the altar, with his face upon the ground. Arius died on the day before that fixed for his restoration. Alexander died in 404.—Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i, 87, 88; ii, 6; Acta Somontorium.

Alexander, bishop of Hierapolis, an adherent of Nestorius. At the Council of Ephesus (431), where he was appointed as legate, he signed, with eight other bishops, a letter addressed by Nestorius to the Emperor Theodosius, for the purpose of obtaining the convocation of another synod, to which Cyril of Alexandria and the Egyptian bishops should not be invited. Pope Sixtus III, to whom Alexander at a later date appealed, refused him a hearing, and at length the emperor banished him to Famagusta in Egypt. Twenty-three letters, existing in a Latin translation (Epist. Lpiz Epheseos), are ascribed to him as author; and Suidas reports a discourse of his, Quis nulli Christus in mundum intulit.—Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, s. v.

Alexander, founder of the Acomate (q.v.), was born of an ancient family, in Asia Minor, in the time of the Emperor Constantius. He first filled an inferior court office, but afterward gave all that he had to the poor, and retired into Syria. He afterward founded or allows worldliness and the lower powers of the soul to govern it. In the latter case, the consciousness of God may be wanting, and the fool will say, There is no God." He distinguishes also between the idea of God in general (ratio communis) and the particular application of it (ratio propria). "The former is true even in idolatries, that is, in the highest idea of God, though Palmyra, Antioch, and Constantinople, in all which places he suffered for the faith. At last he died, about 440, at another monastery of his institution, called Gomon, at the mouth of the Pontus Euxinus. Beliansis gave a life of him, which purports to have been written by his disciples.—Ballot, Jan. 15; Landon, Eccles. Dict. i, 240.

Alexander Alexius, or de Hales (so called because he was born at Halles, in Gloucestershire, or was a monk in the monastery there), one of the most eminent of the scholastic divines. After studying in England he proceeded to Paris, and studied theology and the canon law, and gained such a high reputation that he was styled "the Irrefragable Doctor." He became a Franciscan in 1222, and died at Paris, Aug. 27, 1245. His works are: 1. A Commentary on the Psalms (erroneously attributed to Bonaventura, and by others, with greater probability, to Hugo de Sancto-Cario) (Venice, 1554, 6 vols.; Paris, 1647, 8 vols.).—2. Summa Theologica (Ninom, 1492; Basle, 1592; Venice, 1574, 4 vols.; Cologne, 1592, and many other places).—4. Commentary on the Four Books of the Sentences (1 volume, 1581); there are doubts whether he was the author of this last work.

The Summa was written at the command of Pope Inno cent IV, and enjoined by his successor, Alexander IV, to be used by all professors and students of theology in Christendom. Alexander gave the doctrines of the Church a more rigorously syllogistic form than they had previously had, and may thus be considered as the author of the scholastic theology. He answered the question whether theology is a science in the following manner: he made a distinction in the application of the idea of science; science relates either to the completion of the knowledge of truth (in which case it has to do with knowledge as such—that is, the theoretical or speculative)—and, of the former kind is theological knowledge. This knowledge can only proceed from the disposition. Theology demands the human soul, since it rouses the affection, the tendencies of the disposition, by the principles of goodness, the fear of God, and love. The relation of knowledge to faith is therefore the reverse of what is in the other sciences, since theology first of all produces faith, and, after the soul has been purified through faith working by love, the result is the understanding of theology. In logical science, on the contrary, rational knowledge produces faith. If the former have produced faith, then the internal grounds for such conviction will appear. Faith is then the light of the soul; and the more any one is enlightened by this light, so much more will he apprehend the reasons by which his faith is proved. There is, indeed, a faith which does not rise so high as knowledge, which satisfies itself with probabilities; but Christian faith is different. It proceeds from experience, appeals to the witness of the highest authority, and stands above all knowledge. (Neander, History of Dogm., ii, 550.) As to our knowledge of God, Alexander taught that "the idea of God is a habitus naturalis impressus prime veritatis, and is founded on the conjunction subsisting between eternal truth and the world. But from this, and the resulting cogito, there is a cognitio in habitus and in acta. The habitual lies at the basis of human consciousness; the actual is the developed idea. In reference to the former, the idea of God is undeniable; in reference to the second, a twofold tendency of the soul is possible—in proportion as it either turns to the revelation of the highest truth,
Alexander, Archibald, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian clergyman, was born in Rockbridge Co., Va., Dec. 22, 1792, was licensed to preach in 1791, and labored with great acceptance in his native state till 1796, when he accepted the presidency of Hampden Sidney College. By his wisdom and industry he soon imparted to the institution a more healthful and vigorous tone, as well as greatly increased the number of students. In 1807 he removed to Philadelphia, taking charge of the Pine Street church. Made D.D. in 1810, Dr. Alexander was chosen in 1812 to the professorship of Didactic and Polemical Theology at the Princeton Seminary, then just organized. He continued in this office till his death, Oct. 22, 1851. As a preacher, he was very effective. As a teacher, "Dr. Alexander was possessed of a combination of qualities admirably fitted to secure both the respect and the affection of his students, and the strongest and most unanimous testimony has been borne by multitudes to the beneficial influence of his instructions and example in forming their religious character, in cultivating their intellectual powers, and in storing their minds with useful knowledge. Above eighteen hundred candidates for the ministry had studied under hissuperintendence, of whom about sixteen hundred were alive at the time of his death, most of them occupied as pastors in the two leading branches of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, but not a few also as missionaries among the heathen. While his great talents and acquirements, his sound judgment, and his profound piety secured their esteem and confidence, his unaffected simplicity, his cordial kindliness, and his hearty vivacity called forth a very large measure of personal affection. He filled for forty years, with powers that scarcely exhibited any symptom of decay, a situation of great influence; he was able and willing to improve fully his opportunities of usefulness; and thus he became a great benefactor to his Church and country, by exerting a most powerful and wholesome influence on the formation of the character of a large number of men, who are now in the full possession of their ministry, and are workmen that need not to be ashamed." (Brit. Qu. Rev. 1854). His principal works are: Brief Compendium of Bible Truth (N. Y. 12mo);-Advice to a young Christian (Phila.);-Annals of the Jewish Nation (N. Y.);-Bible Dict. (18mo, Phila.);-Chrestomathy of Biblical Theology (1846);-Evidence of Christianity (12mo, Phila. 1825; often reprinted);-Hist. of the Patriarchs (1833, Phila.)-Canon of O. and N. T. (Phila, 1861, 12mo);-History of Colonialization (8vo, 1846);-History of the Israelitish Nation (Phil. 1833, 8vo). His "Manual Science" (12mo) was a posthumous publication. He left also many MSS., which will, it is to be hoped, be published hereafter. -Sprague, Annals, iii. 612; Memoir, by Rev. J. W. Alexander (N. Y. 1834, 8vo);-Brit. and For. Exch. Rev., 1854, p. 584; Meth. Quar. Rev. 1862, p. 250.

Alexander, Caleb, a Presbyterian minister of the last century, born at Northfield, Mass., July 22, 1755, and graduated at Yale in 1777, was licensed to preach in 1782, instrumental in founding Hamilton College, a seminary at Auburn, and other institutions. He died April 12, 1828. -Sprague, Annals, iii. 406.

Alexander, James Waddell, D.D., eldest son of Archibald Alexander, was born March 18, 1804, in Louisa Co., Va. He received his academical training under James Ross in Philadelphia, and graduated A.B. at Princeton in 1826. He was appointed tutor in the college at the age of twenty, having in the mean time attended the theological studies under the instruction of his father, who was appointed in 1812 first professor in the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1824, and soon after became pasteur of the same church in Charlotte Co., Va., in which his father had commenced his ministry. In 1826 he was appointed a call to the First Presbyterian church in Trenton, N. J. In 1832 he resigned his charge in Trenton, on account of impaired health, and became editor of the Presbyterian newspaper in Philadelphia. In the following year he was appointed Professor of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres in the University of Princeton, which he was compelled to occupy until, in 1844, he was called to the Duns Street church in New York. While fulfilling the professorship he preached regularly to a small congregation of colored people at Princeton, without compensation, for the space of seven years. In 1843 he was made D.D. by Lafayette College, Pa. In 1845 he was appointed by the General Assembly Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government in Princeton Theological Seminary, and in 1851 he was called to take charge of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church, New York. Here his most important work in the Gospel ministry was performed. He gathered around him one of the most influential and most influential of theologians in the land, who were attracted, not by his popular talents, but by his personal worth, and weight, and piety, and by the fervid simplicity with which he preached Christ Jesus. Dr. Alexander was a man of eminent and varied learning, reaching into all the departments of science and literature, the study of which, in many modern as well as ancient languages, were as familiar to him and as much at his command as those in his mother tongue. Yet his practical religious zeal was so great that the greater part of his writings consists of books for children, and writings to increase practical religion. His rare qualities as a writer and as a preacher enabled him to say every thing in a style of originality and peculiar grace. He was equally distinguished for moral excellence, especially for childlike simplicity of character, unaffected humility, and simple but ever-glowing piety. In the spring of 1859 his health began to fail. With a view to its restoration, he went to Virginia in the early summer, and appeared to grow better. About a week before his death he was seized with dysentery, and died at the Red Swett Spring, Alleghany Co., Va., July 31, 1859. Dr. Alexander's writings are chiefly practical, but all distinguished by breadth of thought and by admirable excellence of style. Among them are, A Gift to the Young (2 vols. 1824);-A Geographical and Historical Treatise of the Holy Land (2 vols. 1824); and J. A. Alexander, 12mo;-—Concordia, or Discourses to the Suffering Children of God (N. Y. 1858, 8vo);-—American Mercenar (2 vols. 1830);-—Thoughts on Family Worship (12mo);-—Life of Rev. Alexander, D.D. (8vo);-—Young Communicant (12mo);-—The American Sunday-School and its Adjutants (Phil. 1856). He wrote more than thirty juvenile books for the American Sunday-School Union, of which the best known are Infant Library, Only Son, Scripture Guide, Frank Harper, Card, the Young Emigrant. He was also a frequent contributor to the Princeton Review. Since his death has appeared his Thought on Preaching (N. Y. 1861, 12mo);-—An Account of the General Re-Union (N.Y. 1862, 12mo);-—New York Observer; Forty Years' Correspondence of Dr. J. W. Alexander with a Friend (N. Y. 1860, 2 vols. 12mo);-—New Englander, Nov. 1600, art. v;—Merserburg Rev. Oct. 1860.

Alexander, Joseph Addison, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister and scholar, third son of Dr. Archibald Alexander (q. v.), was born at Princeton, N. J., 1809. He graduated at Princeton in 1826, receiving the first honor of his class. He was soon after appointed tutor in that college, but declined the post, and united with Professor Robert B. Patton in the establishment of the Edgehill Seminary for boys at Princeton, to which the late Mr. Hununderer, Professor of Ancient Languages at Princeton, but resigned in 1833 to visit the German universities. He spent a reason at Halle and Berlin, and returned to accept the professorship of Oriental Literature in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, to which he had been appointed during his absence. In 1862 he was transferred to the chair of Ecclesiastical History. He died at Princeton, Jan. 28, 1860.

Alessio, P., in his Discorsi, gives a detailed account of the geography and topography of Alexandria.

Alexandria, a so-called 'theological city,' was a remarkable instance of the influence of the climate on the growth of a town.

Alessio, P., in his Discorsi, gives a detailed account of the geography and topography of Alexandria.

All those who had been opposed to them during the king's reign. Many of the Saducees, therefore, were put to death; and their vindictiveness proceeded to such acts of cruelty and injustice that none of Alexander's friends could be secure of their lives. Many of the principal persons who had served in the late king's armies, Aristobulus at the head, obtained permission to quit their country, or to be placed in some of the distant fortresses, where they might be sheltered from the persecution of their enemies. After some deliberation, she adopted the expedient of distributing them among the different garrisons of the kingdom, excepting those, however, in which she had deposited her son, the great learning, the clear method, and, at times, the high flight of eloquence he displayed. He had the rare capacity, both mental and physical, of almost incessant reading and intellectual labor, and he tasked his great energies to the utmost. The result is before us in a life of seldom paralleled intellectual achievement. He studied Arabia when a boy, and had read the whole Koran in that tongue when he was fourteen. Persic, Syriac, Hebrew, Coptic were successively mastered. He did not study these languages for the sake of their grammar, but of their literature; not for the purpose of knowing, but for loving them. He studied, however, profoundly the philosophy of the philosophers and the religions of each other, and learned the Sanscrit to possess the basis of comparative philology. Greek and Latin, and all the modern languages of Europe, were familiar to him. From this foundation of linguistic learning he proceeded to a wide and comprehensive system of historic, antiquarian, and philosophical studies. All his other acquisitions were subordinated to the study and elucidation of the Word of God. His professional lectures and his commentaries were the fruit of his wide researches thus applied and consecrated. But his personal love for the Scriptures and delight in them were not less remarkable than his ability in illustrating them. He had learned whole books of them by heart, both in the original and in our English version.

The exegetical works of Dr. Alexander have gained him a great reputation in Europe, as well as in America, and will doubtless remain a permanent part of Biblical literature. They include the earlier Prophets of the Old Testament (N. Y., 1850; 2 vols. 12mo)—The Psalms and Hymns of the New Testament (N. Y., 1857; 2 vols. 12mo)—The Book of Revelation (N. Y., 1858; 2 vols. 12mo). A more recent work is his Hebrew Grammar (N. Y., 1861; 12mo).

Alexander (Ał'ek'sja, fem. of Alexander), the name of several women in Josephus.

1. Surnamed (or rather, perhaps, originally named Salome), first married to Aristobulus, and afterward the wife of Alexander Janneus, his brother. In the account of the latter prince we have noticed the advice which he gave upon his death-bed to Alexander, who accordingly married the queen, but she herself in the kingdom. Alexander followed his counsel, and secured the object of her wishes. The Pharisees, won by the marks of respect which she paid to them, exerted their influence over the people, and Alexander Janneus was buried with great pomp and splendor, and Alexander ruled during the space of nine years. In later times, iv. 27, he is called by some the rightful king of the Jews, and by others the rightful king of the land, external peace, but was distracted by internal strife. The Pharisees, having obtained an ascendency over the mind of the queen, proceeded to exact from her many important advantages for themselves and friends, and then to obtain the punishment and persecution of

2. The daughter of Hyrcanus, wife of Alexander (son of Aristobulus and brother of Hyrcanus), and mother of another Aristobulus and of Mariamme (v. v.), whose death, in consequence of her husband's (Herod the Great's) suspicions, she perfidiously connived at; but she was afterward herself put to death by Herod's order (Josephus, Ant. xxv, 2, 5-7, 8).

3. A daughter of Phasaelus by Salomias: she married Tittius of Cyprus, but had no children (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4).

Alexandria (properly Αλεξάνδρια, Α'Λεξάνδρε), 3 Mac. iii, 20; iv, 11; occurs in the N. T. only in the derivatives Αλεξάνδριος, an Alexandria, Acts vi, 9; xviii, 24; and Α'Λεξάνδρως, Alexandria, Acts xxvi, 6; xxxvii, 11), the chief maritime city and long the metropolis of Lower Egypt, so called from its founder, Alexander the Great, was in many ways most importantly connected with the later history of the Jews—as well as with the relations between them and the Ptolemies, who reigned in that city, as from the vast number of Jews who were settled there, with whom a constant intercourse was maintained by the Jews of Palestine. It is situated on the Mediterranean, twelve miles west of the Canaanitic mouth of the Nile, in 31° 18' N. lat. and 30° 59' E. long. It owes its origin to the comprehensive policy of Alexander, who traced himself the ground-plan of the city (Plut. Alex. 26), perceiving that the usual channels of commerce might be advantageously altered; and that a city occupying this site could not fail to become the common emporium for the trade of the Eastern and Western world, between the river Nile and the two adjacent seas, the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. See ALEXANDER THE GREAT. For a long period Alexandria was the greatest of known cities, for Nineveh and Babylon had fallen, and Rome had not yet risen to pre-eminence; and even when Rome gained the maritime supremacy of the Mediterranean, and Alexandria only the metropolis of a province, the latter was second only to the former in wealth, extent, and importance, and was honored with the magnificent titles of the second metropolis of the world, the city of cities, the Queen of the East, a second Rome (Diod. Sic. xvii; Strab. xvii; Ammian. Marcell. xvi; Hec. s. r. 27). It is not mentioned at all in the Old Testament [see No], and only incidentally in the New (Acts vi, 9; xviii, 24; xxvii, 6).

Alexandria was founded B.C. 382, upon the site of the small village of Rhacotis (Strabo, xvi, c. 1, 6), and opposite to the little island of Pharos, which, even before the time of Homer, had given shelter to the Greek traders on the coast. Alexander selected this spot for the Greek colony which he proposed to found, from the capability of forming the deep water between Rhacotis and the isle of Pharos into a harbor that might become the port of all Egypt. He accordingly ordered Dinocrates, the architect who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, to improve the harbor, and to lay down the plan of the new city; and he further appointed Cleomenes of Naucratis, in Egypt, to act as superintendent. The light-house upon the isle of Pharos was to be named after his friend Hephæstion, and all contracts between merchants in the port were to commence "in the name of Hephæstion." The great market which had hitherto existed at Canopus was speedily removed to the new city, which thus at once rose to commercial importance. After the death of Alexander, the building of the city was carried on briskly by his successor, Ptolemy Lagos, or Soter, but many of the public works were not completed till the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The city was built upon a strip of land between the sea and the Lake Mareotis, and its ground plan resembled the form of a Greek chlamys, or soldier's cloak. The two main streets, 240 feet wide, left a free passage for the north wind, which alone conveys coolness in Egypt. They crossed each other at right angles in the middle of the city, which was three miles long and seven broad, and the whole of the streets were wide enough for carriages. The long narrow island of Pharos was formed into a sort of breakwater to the port, by joining the middle of the island to the main-land by means of a mole seven stadia in length, and hence called the Heptastadium. To let the water pass, there were two breaks in the mole, over which bridges were thrown. The public grounds and palaces occupied nearly a third of the whole extent of the city. The Royal Docks, the Exchange, the Ptolemaion, or temple of Serapis, and many other public buildings, fronted the harbor. There also stood the burial-place for the Greek kings of Egypt, called "the Soma," because it held "the body," as that of Alexander was called. On the western side of the Heptastadium, and on the outside of the city were other docks, and a ship-channel into Lake Mareotis, as likewise the Necropolis, or public burial-place of the city. There were also a theatre, an amphitheatre, a gymnasion, with a large portico, more than 600 feet long, and supported by several rows of marble columns; a stadium, in which games were celebrated every fifth year; a hall of justice, public groves or gardens, a hippodrome for chariot races, and, towering above all, was the temple of Serapis, the Serapeum. The most famous of all the public buildings planned by Ptolemy Soter were the library and museum, or College of Philosophy. They were built near the royal palace, in that part of the city called Bruchion, and contained a great hall, used as a lecture-room and common dining-room, and had a covered walk all round the outside, and a seat on which the philosophers sometimes sat in the open air. Within the verge of the Serapeum was a supplementary library, called the daughter of the former. The professors of the college were supported out of the public income. The light-house at Alexandria was not finished till the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, B.C. 284-246. It was built by the architect Sostratus. The royal burial-place was also finished in this reign, and Philadelphus removed the body of Alexander from Memphis to this city, and hither pilgrims came and bowed before the golden sarcophagus in which the hero's body was placed. Seleucus Cybiæates, B.C. 54, is said to have stolen the golden coffin of Alexander. The Emperor Claudius, A.D. 41-55, founded the Claudian Museum; and Antoninus, A.D. 162-166, built the Gates of the Sun and of the Moon, and likewise made a hippodrome. At the great rebellion of Egypt, A.D. 297, Alexandria was besieged by Diocletian, when, in commemoration of his humanity in staying the pillage of the city, the inhabitants erected an equestrian statue, now lost, but which, there is little doubt, surmounted the lofty column known by the name of Pompey's Pillar, the base of which still bears the inscription, "To the most honored emperor, the saviour of Alexandria, the unconquerable Diocletian." The port of Alexandria is described by Josephus (War, iv. 10, 5), and his description is in perfect conformity with the best modern accounts, which prove, notwithstanding the difficulties of access, in consequence of which a magnifi cent Pharos, or light-house, accounted one of the "seven" wonders of the world, was erected upon an islet at the entrance. From the first arrival of Ptolemy Soter in Egypt, he made Alexandria his residence; and no sooner had he some respite from war than he bent all the resources of his mind to draw to his kingdom the whole trade of the East, which the Tyrians had, up to this time, carried on by sea to Elath, and from thence, by the way of Rhinocorura, to Tyre. He built a city on the west side of the Red Sea, whence he sent out fleets to all those countries to which the Phenicians traded from Egypt. He established a trade between the Red Sea, by reason of rocks and shoals, was very dangerous toward its northern extremity, he transferred the trade to another city, which he founded at the greatest practicable distance southward. This port, which was almost on the borders of Ethiopia, he called, from his mother, Berenice, but the harbor being found inconvenient, the neighboring city of Myos Hormos was preferred. Thither the products of the East and South were conveyed by sea, and were from thence taken on camels to Coptos on the Nile, where they were again shipped for Alexandria, and from that city were dispersed into all the nations of the West, in exchange for the commodities of Egypt. This trade of Alexandria was exported to the East (Strab. xxii, p. 865; Pliny, Hist. Nat. vi. 23). The commerce of Alexandria being so great, especially in corn—for Egypt was considered the granary of Rome—the centurion might readily "find a ship, corn- laden, sailing into Italy" (Acts xxvii, 6; xxviii, 11; see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, ii, 360, 360). The beauty (Athen. i, p. 8) of Alexandria was proverbial. Every natural advantage contributed to its prosperity. The climate and site were singularly healthful (Strab. p. 786) and the island of Pharos and the headland Lobiachus, were safe and commodious, alike for commerce and for war; and the lake Mareotis was an inland haven for the merchandise of Egypt and India (Strab. p. 785). Under the despotism of the later Ptolemies the trade of Alexandria was carried on, but its monopoly was unbroken. The gen-men, Dio.xvii, 55, which, as Mannert suggests, should be doubled, if we include the slaves; the free population of Attica was about 130,000 and wealth (Strab. p. 798) were enormous. After the victory of Augustus it is stated for its attachment to the cause of Antony (Strab. p. 792); but it importance as one of the chief corn-ports of Rome secured for the great favor of the first emperors. In later times the sedi-tions tumults for which the Alexandrians had always been notorious desolated the city (A.D. 260, Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. x), and religious funds aggravated the religious distress (Dionys. Alex. Ep. iii, xii; Euseb. H. E. vi. 41 sq.; xii. 22). Yet even thus, though

The climate and site were singularly healthful (Strab. p. 786) and the island of Pharos and the headland Lobiachus, were safe and commodious, alike for commerce and for war; and the lake Mareotis was an inland haven for the merchandise of Egypt and India (Strab. p. 785). men, Dio.xvii, 55, which, as Mannert suggests, should be doubled, if we include the slaves; the free population of Attica was about 130,000 and wealth (Strab. p. 798) were enormous. After the victory of Augustus it is stated for its attachment to the cause of Antony (Strab. p. 792); but it importance as one of the chief corn-ports of Rome secured for the great favor of the first emperors. In later times the sedi-
tions tumults for which the Alexandrians had always been notorious desolated the city (A.D. 260, Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. x), and religious funds aggravated the religious distress (Dionys. Alex. Ep. iii, xii; Euseb. H. E. vi. 41 sq.; xii. 22). Yet even thus, though Alexander suffered greatly from constant dissensions and the weakness of the Byzantine court, the splendor of "the great city of the West" amazed Amrou, its Arab conqueror (A.D. 640, Gibbon, c. x); and after centuries of Mohammedan marlue it promises once again to justify the wisdom of its founder (Strab. xxi, 791-9; Frag. ap. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 7, 2; Plut. Alex. 26: Arri. iii. 1; Josephus, War, iv, 5). Bonaparte took Alexandria in 1798, and it remained in the possession of the French till they surrendered it to the British, Sept. 2, 1801, when they were finally expelled from the country. Mohammed Ali dug a canal, called El-Mahmudieh, in 1849 (cf. map of the father of the present sultan, Abd-el-Mejid), which provided a water communication with the Nile, entering that river at a place called Fouah, a few miles distant from the city. All about the city, but particularly to the south and east, are extensive mounds, and fragments of ancient luxury and magnificence, granite columns, marble statuary, and broken pottery. The modern city of Alexandria is surrounded by a high wall, built by the Saracens between A.D. 1200-1300. Some parts of the walls of the old city still exist, and the ancient vaulted reservoirs, extending under the whole town, are almost entire. The ancient Necropolis is excavated out of the Eunomiacum, a locality now known to have been Rhacotis is now covered by the sea; but beneath the surface of the water are visible the remains of ancient Egyptian statues and columns. Alexandria became not only the seat of commerce, but of learning and the liberal sciences. This distinction also is owed to Ptolemy Soter, himself a man of education, who founded an academy, or society of learned men, who devoted themselves to the study of philosophy, literature, and science. For their use he made a collection of choice books, which by degrees increased under his successors until it became the finest library in the world, and numbered 700,000 volumes (Strab. p. 781; Euseb. H. E. vi. 41 sq.). Contained repeated losses by fire and otherwise, but these losses were as repeatedly repaired; and it continued to be of great fame and use in those parts, until it was destroyed by a mob of Christians, A.D. 691, or, according to others, burnt by the Saracens, A.D. 642. See ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY. Undoubtedly the Jews at Alexandria shared in the benefit of these institutions, as the Christians did afterward, for the city was not only a seat of heathen, but of Jewish, and subsequently of Christian learning (Am. Bib. Repos. 1834, p. 1-21, 190, 617). The Jews never had a more profoundly learned man than Philo, nor the Christians men more erudite than Origen and Clement; and if we may judge from these celebrated natives of Alexandria, who were remarkably intimate with the heathen philosphoy and literature, the learning acquired in the Jewish and Christian schools of that city must have been of that broad and comprehensive character which its large and influential institution enforced. It will be remembered that the celebrated translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek [see Septuagint] was made, under every encouragement from Ptolemy Philadephus, principally for the use of the Jews in Alexandria, who knew only the Greek language (see Sturr, De origine et factione amoris, loc. cit., Lips. 1808); but partly, no doubt, that the great library might possess a version of a book so remarkable, and, in some points, so closely connected with the ancient history of Egypt. The work of Josephus against Aplon affords ample evidence of the attention which the Jewish Scriptures excited. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii. 14, Mark) the first introduced the Gospel into Alexandria; and, according to less authentic accounts, he suffered martyrdom here about A.D. 68. A church dedicated to this evangelist, belonging to the Coptic (Jacobite) Christians, still exists in Alexandria (Rosenmüller, Bib. Geogr. i, 351 sq.). The Jewish and Christian schools were long held in the highest esteem, and there is reason to believe that the latter, besides producing many eloquent preachers, paid much attention to the multiplying of copies of the sacred writings. The famous Alexandrian manuscript (q.v.), now deposited in the British Museum, is well known. For many years Christians labored at Alexandria, but at length it became the source, and for some time continued the stronghold, of the Arian heresy. The divisions, discord, and animosities which were thus introduced rendered the churches of Alexandria... an easy prey to the Arabian impostor, and they were swept away by his followers.

Alexandria was mixed from the first (comp. Curt. iv, 8, 5), and this fact formed the groundwork of the Alexandrine character. The three regions into which the city was divided (Regio Judæorum, Bruchæum, Phacotis) corresponded to the three chief classes of its inhabitants, Jews, Greeks, Egyptians; but in addition to these principal races, representatives of almost every nation were found there (Dion Chrys. Orat. xxxiii). According to Josephus, Alexander himself assigned to the Jews a place in his new city; "and they obtained," he adds, "equal privileges with the Macedonians" (Ap. ii, 4) in consideration "of their services against the Egyptians" (War, ii, 9). In 309 B.C. Ptolemy I invited the policy of Alexander, and, after the capture of Jerusalem, he removed a considerable number of its citizens to Alexandria. Many others followed of their own accord; and all received the full Macedonian franchise (Josephus, Ant. xii, 1; comp. Ap. i, 22) as men of known and tried fidelity (Josephus, Ap. ii, 4). Already on a former occasion the Jews had sought a home in the land of their bondage. More than two centuries and a half before the foundation of Alexandria a large body of them had taken refuge in Egypt after the murder of Gedaliah; but these, after a general apostacy, were carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings ii, 28; Jer. xxxviii, 17); Josephus, xii, 1. The Jews, however much their religion was disdained, were valued as citizens, and every encouragement was held out by Alexander himself and by his successors in Egypt to induce them to settle in the new city. The same privileges as those of the first class of inhabitants (the Greeks) were accorded to them, as well as the free exercise of their religion and peculiar usages; and this, with the protection and security which a powerful state afforded against the perpetual conflicts and troubles of Palestine, and with the inclination to traffic which had been acquired during the captivity, gradually drew such immense numbers of Jews to Alexandria that they eventually formed a very large portion of its vast population, and at the same time constituted a most thriving and important section of the Jewish nation (Hecataeus, in Josephus, Apion, ii; War, ii, 46; Q. Curtius, iv, 8). The Jewish inhabitants of Alexandria are therefore often mentioned in the history of the region, and their importance as a section of that nation would doubtless have been more frequently indicated had not the Jews of Egypt thrown off their ecclesiastical dependence upon Jerusalem and its temple, and formed a separate establishment of their own at On or Heliopolis. See On; Onias.

We find (Acts ii, 10) that, among those who came up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, there were Jews, devout men from Egypt, and the parts of Libya about Cyrene. Of this city, Apollos, the eloquent convert, was a native (Acts xviii, 24); and of the Jews who lived here with Stephen and put him to death, many were Alexandrians, who, it is thought, by an anticipation of the events that were about to happen, had a tyrannical gogue at that time in Jerusalem (Acts v, 9). Philo estimates them in his time at little less than 1,000,000 (in Flacc. § 6, p. 971); and adds that two of the five districts of Alexandria were called "Jewish districts," and that many Jews lived scattered in the remaining three (ib. § 10). July 28, A.D. 60, in the reign of Josephus, at the xiv, 10, 1) and Augustus confirmed to them the privileges which they had enjoyed before, and they retained them, with various interruptions, of which the most important, A.D. 39, is described by Philo (l. c.), during the tumults and persecutions of later reigns (Josephus, Ant. xii, 9, 3). They were represented (at least from the time of Cleopatra to the reign of Claudius, Josch. d. Judæn. p. 555) by their own officer [see Alabarch] (şiaprès, Strab. ap. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 7, 2; ἄλαβαρχος, i. xvii, 7, 8; 9, 1; xix, 6, 5; comp. Rup. ap. Iuv. Sat. i, 130; γεγονος, Philo, in Flacc. § 10, p. 970, and Augustus appointed a consul (Josephus, i. l. c.) to superintend the affairs of the Jews," according to their own laws. The establishment of Christianity altered the civil position of the Jews, but they maintained their relative prosperity; and when Alexandria was taken by Amrou, 40,000 tributary Jews were reduced to various servile conditions in the city (Gibbon, i. 37). They enjoyed their privileges undisturbed until the time of Ptolemy Philopator, who, being exasperated at the resistance he had met with in attempting to enter the temple at Jerusalem, wreaked his wrath upon the Jews of Alexandria on his return to Egypt. He reduced to the third or lowest class all such as would consent to hand over to him the skins of the whole body only 300 were found willing to abandon their principles in order to preserve their civil advantages. The act of the general body in excluding the 300 apostates from their congregations was so represented to the king as to move his anger to the utmost, and he madly determined to exterminate all the Jews in Egypt. Accordingly, as many as could be found were brought together and shut up in the spacious hippodrome of the city, with the intention of letting loose 500 elephants upon them; but the animals refused their horrid task, and, turning wildly upon the spectators and soldiers, destroyed large numbers of those who were gathered about them. But the king, not least, seemed so manifest an interposition of Providence in favor of the Jews, that he not only restored their privileges, but loaded them with new favors. This story, as it is omitted by Josephus and other writers, and only found in the third book of Maccabees (ii-v), is considered doubtful. The Synagogue, seems to be of great antiquity, and not the church (ib. v). The dreadul persecution which the Jews of Alexandria underwent in A.D. 89 shows that, notwithstanding their long establishment there, no friendly relations had arisen between them and the other inhabitants, by whom, in fact, they were intensely hated. This feeling was so well known that, at the date indicated, the Roman governor, Avilius Flaccus, who was anxious to ingratiate himself with the citizens, was persuaded that the surest way of winning their affection was to withdraw his protection from the Jews, against whom the emperor was already exasperated by their refusal to acknowledge his right to divine honors, which his enemies had represented to his apprehensions by the emblems of their synagogues. The Alexandrians soon found out that they would not be called to account for any proceedings they might have recourse to against the Jews. The insolent and bitter mockery with which they treated Herod Agrippa, when he came to Alexandria before proceeding to take possession of the kingdom which he had received from Caligula, gave the first intimation of their dispositions. Finding that the governor connived at their conduct, they proceeded to insist that the emperor's images should be introduced into the Jewish synagogues; and on resistance being offered, they destroyed most of them, and polluted the others by introducing statues of the emperor. The temple thus set by the Alexandrians was followed in other cities of Egypt, which contained at this time a million of Jews; and a vast number of oratories—of which the largest and most beautiful were called synagogues—were all either levelled with the ground, or converted into churches. (Philo, in Flacc. p. 968-969, ed. 1640; De Leg. xii; Euseb. Chron. 27, 29.) Flaccus soon after published an edict depriving the Jews of the rights of citizenship, which they had so long enjoyed, and declaring them aliens. The Jews then occupied two out of the five quarters (which took the five letters of the alphabet) into which the city was divided; and as they were in those times by no means remarkable for their submission to wrong treatment, it is likely that they made some efforts to maintain the preservation of their rights, which Philo neglects to record, but which gave some pretence for the excesses which followed. At all events, the Alexandrians, regarding them as abandon-red by the authorities to their mercy, openly proceeded to these violent excesses, which all the authorities had forbade driving off all the other parts of the city, and confined to one quarter; and the houses from which they had been driven, as well as their shops and warehouses, were plundered of all their effects. Impoverished, and pent up in a narrow corner of the city, where the greater part were obliged to lie in the open air, destitute of any assistance, and all the products of them died of hardship and hunger; and whoever was found beyond the boundary, whether he had escaped from the assigned limits or had come in from the country, was seized and put to death with horrid tortures. So likewise, when a vessel belonging to Jews arrived in port, it was boarded by the mob, pil-laged, and then burnt, together with the owners. At depth King Herod Asrippa, who staid long enough in Alexandria to see the beginning of these atrocious acts, transmitted to the emperor such a report of the real state of affairs as induced him to send a centurian to arrest Flaccus, and bring him a prisoner to Egypt. He did this, not only to destroy Flaccus and brought some relief to the Jews; but the tumult still continued, and as the magistrates refused to acknowledge the citizenship of the Jews, it was at length agreed that both parties should send delegates, five on each side, to Rome, and refer the decision of the controversy to the authority of the city of Alexandria.

The delegation was the celebrated Philo, to whom we owe the account of these transactions; and at the head of the Alexandrians was the noted Apion. The latter chiefly rested their case upon the fact that the Jews were the only people who refused to consecrate images to the emperor, or to swear by his name. But on this point the Alexandrians held with the Athenians so well that Caligula himself said, "These men are not so wicked as ignorant and unhappy in not believing me to be a god."
The ultimate result of this appeal is not known,
but the Jews of Alexandria continued to be harrassed during the remainder of Caligula's reign;
and their alabarch, Alexander LySinachus (brother of Philo), was thrown into prison, where he remained till he was discharged by Claudius, upon whose accession to the empire the Alexandrian Jews betook themselves to arms. This occasioned such disturbances that they attracted the attention of the emperor, who,
at the joint entreaty of Herod and Agrippa, sent for Philo to Alexandria, and there addressed himself to the Jews of Egypt as their all ancient privileges (Philos, In Flacc. p. 1019-1014; Josephus, Ant. xvi., 10, xii. 4). The state of feeling in Alexandria which these facts indicate was very far from being alleviated when the revolt of the Jews in Palestine caused even those of the nation who dwelt in foreign parts to be regarded as enemies both by the populace and the government. In Alexandria, on a public occasion, they were attacked, and those who could not save themselves by flight were put to the sword. Only three were taken alive, and they were dragged through the city to be consigned to the flames. At this spectacle the pagans of the Jews joined the besiegers.
They first assailed the Greek citizens with stones,
and then rushed with lighted torches to the amphitheatre to set it on fire and burn all the people who were there assembled. The Roman prefect, Ti-berius Alexander, finding that milder measures were of no avail, sent agents to destroy all the Jews, both dead, who numbered about 50,000 of them, and plundered and burned their dwellings (Josephus, War, ii. 18. 7; comp. Matt. xxiv. 6).

After the close of the war in Palestine, new disturbances were excited in Egypt by the Scirri, many of whom had fled thither. They endeavored to persuade the Jews to acknowledge no king but God, and to throw off the Roman yoke. Such persons as opposed their designs, and tendered wiser counsels to their brethren, they secretly assassinated, according to their custom. But the principal Jews in Alexandria having in a general assembly earnestly warned the peolace against this, all the authors of all the troubles in Palestine, about whom stories were delivered up to the Romans. Several fled into the Thebaid, but were apprehended and brought back.
The most cruel tortures which could be devised had no effect in compelling them to acknowledge the emperor for their sovereign; and even their children seemed not to be endowed with the same incapacity for death.
Vespasian, when informed of these transactions, sent orders that the Jewish temple in Egypt should be destroyed. Lupus, the prefect, however, only shut it up, after having taken out the consecrated gifts; but his successor, Paulinus, stripped it completely, and excluded the Jews entirely from it.
This was in A.D. 75, being the 84th year of its erection by Onias. The Jews continued to form a principal portion of the inhabitants, and remained in the enjoyment of their civil rights till A.D. 415, when they incurred the hatred of Cyril, the patriarch, at whose instance they were expelled, to the number of 40,000, destroyed them, and made Crete desert. In 414, just before, in A.D. 649, took the place for the Caliph Omar, he wrote to his master in these terms: "I have taken the great city of the West, which contains 4000 palaces, 4000 baths, 400 theatres, 12,000 shops for the sale of vegetable food, and 40,000 tributary Jews." From that time the city of Alexandria was rapidly declining; and when, in 869, the Fatemite caliphs seized on Egypt and built New Cairo, it sunk to the rank of a secondary Egyptian city. The discovery of the passage to the East by the Cape in 1497 almost annihilated its remaining commercial importance; and although the commercial and maritime enterprises of Mehemet Ali have aided it to some extent, Alexandria must still be accounted as one of those great ancient cities whose glory has departed. When Benjamin of Tudela visited the place (Itin. i. 158, ed. Asher), the number of Jews was not more than 8000, and does not now exceed 500 families of African Jews, besides about 150 families of the Italian community (Benja-mim's Eight Years in Asia and Africa, Hannov. 1869,
p. 230). The entire population, at present, is rapidly increasing, but the statistical statements greatly vary. Pierer's Universal Lexicon (Altenburg, 1857) gives

ALEXANDRIA, CHURCH OF. Christianity was early introduced into Alexandria, probably by some of the Jews converted by the preaching of Peter on the day of Pentecost; but its progress was slow; for it had to struggle against all the varieties of worsip and opinion known to exist, and the spirit of the Neo-Platonic philosophy, which, by forcing every creed to bear an allegorical significance, represented each
as a variety of itself. See Alex, ANDIAN SCHOOLS.
In consequence of the disputations to which the attempts to blend the simple truth of the old dispensation and the abstruse speculations of the Platonic philosophy gave rise, the Church of Alexandria was early divided into sects and parties, whose violent controversies soon engaged the attention of the whole Christian world.
In Alexandria itself the rivalry between the followers of Athanasius and Arius led to deeds of atrocious violence on both sides, and inflicted a schism on the Christian community which lasted for several centuries. The final triumph of the orthodox party was followed by a manifest decay of piety, and when the Saracens introduced the religion of Islam by the sword, they found little obstinacy in the Alexandrian Christians, the great number of whom had apostatised. Since that time a Christian Church has only had a nominal existence in the city, where the slightest variation in a single article of faith was once deemed of sufficient importance to require the interference of a general council. Ecclesiastical historians generally agree that the city fell like a house of cards at once, and that only a remnant of the Christian Churches, not only of Asia, but of Europe, to the influence of the Alexandrian Platonists.

Alexandria was the scene of some of the fiercest persecutions which wasted the early Church; and among the sufferers in the time of the Emperor Severus was Leonides, father of the celebrated Origen, and Potamians, a woman not less distinguished for her chastity than her beauty, who, with her mother, Marcella, was burned to death,ailing pitch being poured over their naked bodies. These calamities induced Tertullian to compose his "Apology.""Asia was the source, and for some time the principal stronghold, of Arianism, as Arius was a presbyter of the Church of this city about the year 315. His doctrines were condemned by a council held here in the year 320, and afterward by a general council of three hundred and eighty fathers held at Nice, by order of Constantine, in 325. These doctrines, however, with which the reign of the patriarchal theology and the pride and self-sufficiency of nominal Christians better than the unsophisticated simplicity of the Gospel, spread widely and rapidly notwithstanding that Arius was steadfastly opposed by the celebrated Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, the irrepudiating champion of the Catholic faith, who was raised to the archiepiscopal throne of Alexandria in 326.

This city was, in 415, distinguished by a fierce persecution of the Jews by the Patriarch Cyril. They who had enjoyed the rights of citizens and the freedom of religious worship for seven hundred years, ever since the foundation of the city, incurred the hatred of this ecclesiastic, who, in his zeal for the extermination of heretics of every kind, pulled down their synagogues, plundered their property, and expelled them, to the number of forty thousand, from the city.

ALEXANDRIA, PATRIARCHATE OF. I. Alexandria was the metropolis of Egypt, which was divided after the time of Marcellinus into nine provinces: 1, Egyptus Prima; 2, Augustamnica Prima; 3, Augustamnica Secunda; 4, Egyptus Secunda; 5, Arcadia; 6, Thebais Inferior; 7, Libya Superior; 8, Thebais Superior; and 9, Libya Inferior. Libya was also called Cyrenaica. The number of bishops in these provinces was, early, very numerous. At a synod held in 321, about 100 were present. At that time the bishop of Alexandria held the second rank in the Christian Church, next to the bishop of Rome. Later, they had to yield this place to the bishop of Constantinople. See PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE. Dandolo and Arian controversy; see PATRIARCHATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

II. In modern times the number of dioceses within this patriarchate is miserably reduced. The Jacobites (Copts), who prevailed in number, had in 1680 but eleven virtual sees, viz.: 1, Nuggadei; 2, Girga; 3, Abuteige; 4, Siut (to which Girge and Abuteige are united); 5, Monfayri; 6, Belacasse; 7, Afshad; 8, Tahla, with Aschumin; 9, Birbebes; 10, Mansours; 14, Damietta, to which the last mentioned are united; 15, Menuf. See Corra.

The Melchites, or Catholics, had but four sees besides Alexandria: 1, that of Libya, or Ethiopia; 2, Memphis, or Old Cairo; 3, Pelusium, or Danietta; and 4, Rosetta. These four sees, Mr. Neale informs us, have now virtually ceased to exist (Hist. East. Ch. iii. 474). See GREEK CHURCH.

Both the patriarchs, viz., the Melchite, or orthodox, and the Jacobite, reside at present in Cairo. The title of the Jacobite patriarch, as given by Le Quien, is "Pater N., sanctissimae archiepiscopii magnae et dominii urbis Alejandriae, et Nomorum, Aegypt. Thaebdiai," etc. Willbach, Geneal. and Stat. of the Church (London 1860).

ALEXANDRIA, COUNCILS OF. The following councils were held at Alexandria: 1, A.D. 231, in which Origen was deposed from the priesthood; 2, A.D. 239, against Ammonius; 3, A.D. 256, against Novatus; 4, A.D. 262, against Nepotianus and Cerinthus (Fabric. Lit. Rom. ii. 266). 5, A.D. 312, in which the emperor Constantine threatened the teachers of the Christian religion with destruction. 6, A.D. 314, in which the emperor Constantine threatened the teachers of the Christian religion with destruction. 7, A.D. 312, in which the emperor Constantine threatened the teachers of the Christian religion with destruction. 8, A.D. 321, against Arius; 9, A.D. 325, in which St. Athanasius was elected patriarch; 10, A.D. 340, in favor of the or Antichis; 11, A.D. 362, in which the divinity of the Holy Spirit, the Incarnation, the term Hypostasis, and other matters, were treated of; 12, A.D. 363, in which St. Athanasius drew up a confession of faith, which was presented to the Emperor Julianus; 13, A.D. 389, in which the Origenists were condemned; 14, A.D. 430, in which the emperor Caliphrum condemned Nestorius; 15, A.D. 451, against the Eutychians; 16, A.D. 578, by Damianius, the Eutychian patriarch, against Peter of Antioch; 17, A.D. 683, under Cyrus the Monothelitist, in which the Monothelite errors were adroitly defended. For a good summary of the doings of these councils, see Landau, Manual of Councils, p. 17 sq.

Alexandri (Alexandri), an inhabitant of Alexandria in Egypt, spec. a Jew living there (Acts vi. 9, xxiii. 29). Alexandria was not identified by Jews, so that 10,000 of them are said to have been numbered among its inhabitants (Philo, In Flacc. p. 971; Josephus, Ant. xix. 5, 2). See ALEXANDRIA. It appears from Acts vi, 9, that they were accustomed to attend the festivals at Jerusalem, and that they even had a synagogue for their special use (Ruinus, Hasekett, in loc.). See SAGAOUX.

ALEXANDRIAN CHRONICLE, the name given to a MS. found in Sicily by Jerome Surtius, and carried to Rome, and preserved by Antonius Augustinus, abbot of the Rota. Charles Sagonius and Onuphrius Panvinius made considerable use of it in the composition of their Commentaries on the New Testament, and published its Greek and Latin. The name "Alexandrian" was given to this annals because of their having been found in that island. It is not so easy to assign a reason for the name of "the Chronicle of Alexandria," except that the name of Peter of Alexandria is at the head of the Augsburg MS. found in the library of Augsburg by Casaubon. Matthew Paris, in his Itinerary, published a complete edition of this Chronicle at Munich, in 1615, in Greek and Latin. Dufes, who published an improved edition (Gr. and Lat. with notes, Paris, 1668), gives it the name of the Paschal Chronicle, because it treats of the time of commemorating Easter. Cave and Usuard attribute it to George Piseus, A.D. 640; Casmir Oudry and Philip of London assign it to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, and this chronicle begins at the creation, and is carried up to the tenth year of the consulate of the Emperor Hercules, or A.D. 628. It seems to have been written by two authors, of whom one carried the work on to the year of Christ 854, and the other completed it. It is compiled without any great judgment of church, but the writer evidently had access to many ancient monuments, which are now lost. —Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 640.
ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY. This remarkable collection of books, the largest of the ancient world, was founded by Ptolemy Soter, in the city of Alexandria, in Egypt. Even in the time of its first manager, Demetrius Phalerus, a banished Athenian, the number of volumes or rolls already amounted to 50,000; and during its most flourishing period, under the direction of Zenodotus, Aristarchus of Byzantium, Apollonius Rhodius, and others, is said to have contained 400,000, or, according to another authority, 700,000. The greater part of this library, which embraced the collected literature of Greece, Rome, India, and Egypt, was contained in the Museum, in the quarter of Alexandria called Brachelum. During the siege of Alexandria by Julius Caesar this part of the library was destroyed by fire; but it was afterward replaced by the collection of Pergamos, which was presented to Queen Cleopatra by Mark Antony, to the great annoyance of the educated Romans. The other part of the library was kept in the Serapeion, the temple of Jupiter Serapis, where it remained till the time of Theodosius the Great. When the emperor permitted all the heathen temples in the Roman empire to be destroyed, the magnificent temple of Jupiter Serapis was not spared. A mob of fanatic Christians, led on by the Archbishop Theophilus, stormed and destroyed the temple, together, it is most likely, with the greater part of its literary treasures, in A.D. 391. It was at this time that the destruction of the library was begun, and not at the taking of Alexandria by the Arabians, under the Caliph Omar in A.D. 642. The story, at least, is ridiculously exaggerated which relates that the Arabs found a sufficient number of books remaining to heat the baths of the city for six months. The historian Orosius, who visited the place after the destruction of the temple by the Christians, relates that he then saw only the empty shelves of the library (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. 51). See Petit-Radet, Recherches sur les Bibliothèques Anciennes et Modernes (Paris, 1819); and Ritschl, Die Alexandrinischen Bibliotheken (Berlin, 1838). Compare ALEXANDRIA.

ALEXANDRIAN MANUSCRIPT (Codex Alexandrinus), so called from its supposed origin at Alexandria, one of the three or four most famous copies of the Holy Scriptures, and designated as B of the N. T. It contains the whole Bible in Greek, including the Septuagint version of the O. T., with the first (or genuine) Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and part of his second (or apocryphal). It is defective, however, in several passages of the N. T. (Matt, i, 1-xxv, 6; John vi, 50-viii, 52; 2 Cor, iv, 18-xii, 6), and in part of the Psalms, where the leaves are totally missing. Letters here and there have also been cut away in binding; and in a considerable part of the N. T. one of the upper corners of the leaves has been wormed off. The N. T. books are found in the order in which they are arranged in the other ancient MSS.: the Catholic Epistles follow the Acts; then come the Pauline Epistles, but with that to the Hebrews before the Pastoral Epistles; the Apocalypse, so rare in extant ancient codices, stands as usual at the close of the N. T.; and in this copy it has been preserved from the 13th to the 18th century, which has befallen both ends of the volume by reason of the Epistles of Clement having been added. The MS., which is on thin vellum and in semi-sulphur form, is now bound in four volumes, the first three of which contain the O. T. The pages are about thirteen inches long and ten broad; the writing on each is divided into two columns of fifty lines each, having about twenty letters or upward in a line. These letters are continuously written in uncial characters, without any space between the words, the uncials being of an elegant yet simple form, in a firm and uniform hand, though the space between the letters is sometimes larger. The punctuation merely consists of a point placed at the end of the sentence, usually on a level with the top of the preceding letter, but not always, and a vacant space follows the point at the end of the paragraph, the space being proportioned to the break in the sense. Capital letters of various sizes abound at the beginning of books and sections, not painted as in later copies, but written by the original scribe in common ink. Vermilion is freely used in the initial lines of books. Accents and breathings are found in the beginning of Genesis only. At the end of each book are neat and unique ornaments in the ink of the first hand. Contraction occurs as in other very ancient MSS. It has the Ammonian divisions of the Gospels, with references to the canons of Eusebius; the headings of the large sections are placed at the top of the page, the places where they begin being indicated in the text, and in Luke and John the numbers being set in the margin of the column. The subdivisions of the Acts, Catholic Epistles, and Apocalypse by Euthalius and others, are not indicated; a cross occasionally appears as a separation of the chapters of the Acts—a large initial dotting a paragraph throughout (Davidson, Bib. Crit., ii, 271 sq.).

This MS. is now in the manuscript-room of the British Museum, where it was placed on the formation of that library in 1738. It previously belonged to the king's private collection, having been presented to Charles I through Sir Thomas Roe, English ambassado'r to Turkey, by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople. An Arabic inscription, several centuries old, at the back of the table of contents, on the first leaf of the MS., states that it was written by the hand of Thecla the martyr, and given to the Patriarchal Chamber in the year of the Martyrs 814 (A.D. 1098). Another, and apparently an earlier inscription, in Moorish Arabic, declares that the book was dedicated to the Patriarchal Chamber at Alexandria. But upon neither of these notices can much reliance be placed. That the book was brought from Alexandria by Cyril (who had previously been patriarch of that see), need not, however, be doubted, though Wetstein, on the dubious authority of Matthew Muntrip of Cyprus, Cyril’s deacon, concluded that it came from Mt. Athos. It is now very generally assigned to the beginning or middle of the fifth century. The reasons for this view are neither strong nor decisive. The characters, especially the shape of certain distinctive letters (e.g. γ. δ. ι. σ. θ., and ω.), the presence of the Eusebian canons (A.D. 268-340), and of the Epistle of Marcellinus to Athanasius before the Psalms (308?-573), which place a limit in one direction; while the absence of the Esthonian divisions of the Acts and Epistles, and the shortness of the subscriptions appear tolerably decisive against a later date than A.D. 450. The insertion of Clement’s Epistles points likewise to a period when the canons was yet unsettled. These were added as parts of the specified number of the N. T. books; while the apocryphal Psalms bearing that title, which the schools, which the writers to have once contained, were separated in the list, as something wholly different in point of authority. The latter were prohibited by the Council of Laodicea, soon after the middle of the fourth century, from being read in the church; and to this prohibition the MS. is conformable, although it repeats the writings of Clement at so different. Wetstein’s and Weide’s objections to this date (such as the use of Θωρισος as a title of the Virgin in her song added to the Psalms) are anomalous. Weide believes that a different hand was employed upon it from 1 Cor. v. onward, but this is not clear. The original copyist was not very careful, and some later hand was by no means accurate. Yet of all the uncial, this holds a rank as one of the first value. It contains indeed the italics (interchange of ι and αι, η and ε, and αι and αι) common to that period, and certain orthographical peculiarities (e.g. εφρομενην, Αιματησαν, etc.) frequent in the Egyptian MSS. The reference to St. Thecla as its writer is plausibly explained by Tregelles, who remarks that, inasmuch as the text (Matt. xxv. 6) where this MS. now begins was the lesson in the Greek Church for her festival, the Egyptian scribe may have hastily concluded that she wrote it (Scrivener, Intro. to N. T. p. 398). The N. T. portion of this Codex was published by Weide, from fac-simile letters cast expressly for the purpose, under the title “Nov. Test. Graec. et Cod. Alexandr.” (Lond. 1786, fol.) revised by Cowper (Lond. 1800). The O. T. part was printed from the same characters by Bauer (4 vols. fol. Lond. 1816-28). On its critical value, see Semi, De arate Cod. Alexandr. (Hal. 1759); Weide, Notitia Cod. Alexandr. curavit Spohn (Lips. 1788). Comp. Michaelis, Oriental. ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOLS, a term usually applied to various systems of philosophy and religious belief that have characterized or originated among the citizens of Alexandria at different periods in its history. See ALEXANDRIA.

1. Pagan.—When Alexander the Great built the city of Alexandria, with a determination to make it the seat of learning, he also opened the doors of this new mart of philosophy, which emulated the fame of Athens itself. A general indulgence was granted to Egyptians, Greeks, Jews, or others, to profess their respective systems of philosophy without molestation. The consequence was that Egypt was soon filled with religious and philosophical sects of every kind, and particularly that almost every Greek sect found an advocate and preacher in Alexandria. The family of the Ptolemies, who, after Alexander, obtained the government of Egypt, from motives of policy encouraged this new establishment. Ptolemy Lagus, who had obtained the crown of Egypt by usurpation, was particularly careful to secure the interest of the Greeks in his favor, and to give them a strong hand in the government of the part of Greece to settle in Egypt, and removed the schools of Athens to Alexandria. Under the patronage, first of the Egyptian princes and afterward of the Roman emperors, Alexandria long continued to enjoy great celebrity as the seat of learning, and to send forth eminent philosophers of every sect to distant countries. Philosophy during this period suffered a grievous corruption from the attempt which was made by philosophers of different sects and countries, Greek, Egyptian, and Oriental, to frame from their different tenets one general system of opinions. The respect which had long been universally paid to the ancients and their authority was in a measure transferred to the deities, given by heaven, and superior to all the attempts of human speculation. The eclectic teaching taught by Antiochus was exclusively confined to the doctrines of the Greek school. The celebrated Philo (q. v.), who flourished from A.D. 40 to 60, borrowing from the works of Plato a great number of ideas and views, endeavored to amalgamate them with the truth contained in the Old Testament, the traditions of the Cabala, and the Essene philosophy. Philo may be said to have spiritualized Judaism by the means of Platonicism; and in turning the mind of his countrymen away from the external criteria of revelation, arid minimus of legal observances, he prepared them, to some degree, for the reception of the Gospel. But the philosopher whose name is chiefly connected with the history of Alexandria is Ammonius Saccas (q. v.), sur- named Θαλεδανος, on account of the beauty of his teaching, who was a mystic theosophist, but a theosophist who blended his views with polytheism, and engrafted them there, not on Christianity. Seeing how fast the old confictions were vanishing away before ideas, feelings, and hopes of a totally different origin, he endeavored to renovate philosophy by showing that on the most important points Plato and Aristotle agree. This was the ruling axiom of his theories, which he completed in systematizing the Greek daemonology by the help of elements derived from Egyptian and Eastern sources. As soon as the Christian religion became the creed of the state, the pagan school of Alexandria fell to the ground. It had to maintain, single-handed, a desperate struggle against the united forces of the eclectic philosophers and of the new religion, which, after having originated in an obscure corner of the Roman empire, was advancing with rapid strides to the conquest of society. The best accounts of the literary history of Alexandria, its pagan schools, libraries, philosophy, etc., may be found in M. Matthey’s Histoire de l’école d’Alexandrie (Paris, 2d ed. 8 vols. 8vo) and in Simon’s Histoire de l’Ecole d’Alexandrie (Paris, 2d ed. 2 vols. 8vo).
2 vols. 8vo). A rapid and vigorous, but not very trustworthy sketch is given in Kingsley's Alexandria and her Schools (Cambridge, 1854, 12mo).

II. Jewish.—For some time the Jewish Church in Alexandria was in close dependence on that of Jerusalem. Both were subject to the civil power of the first Patriarch, and the latter was regarded as the religious head. The persecution of Ptolemy Philopator (B.C. 217) occasioned the first political separation between the two bodies. From that time the Jews of Palestine attached themselves to the fortunes of Syria [see ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT]; and the same policy was pursued by the Jewish community in Alexandria, which gave unity and decision to the Jews of Alexandria. The Septuagint translation, which strengthened the barrier of language between Palestine and Egypt, and the temple of Leontopolis (B.C. 161), which subjected the Egyptian Jews to the charge of schism, widened the breach which was thus opened. But the division, though marked, was not complete. At the beginning of the Christian era the Egyptian Jews still paid the contributions to the temple-service (Raphall, Hist. of Jews, ii, 72). Jerusalem, though its name was fashion ed to a Greek shape, was still the Holy City; the metropolis, not of a country but of a people (Ioudaia, Philo). The Jewish settlement of Alexandria had a synagogue there (Acts vi, 9). The internal administration of the Alexandrine Church was independent of the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem; but respect survived submission.

There were, however, other causes which tended to produce at Alexandria a distinct form of the Jewish character and faith. The religion and philosophy of that restless city produced an effect upon the people more powerful than the influence of politics or commerce. Alexander himself symbolized the spirit with which he wished to animate his new capital by founding the temple of his adopted gods by the side of the temple of the Grecian gods (Arr. iii, 1). The creeds of the East and West were to coexist in friendly union; and in after-times the mixed worship of Serapis (comp. Gibbon, c. xxviii; Smith, Dict. of Class. Geogr., i, 98) was characteristic of the Greek kingdom of Egypt (August., De Civ. Het., xviii, 5; S. maritvse—Egyptiarvm Dvs). The new philosophy and the new religions of Egypt met with the spread of universal learning. The same monarchs who favored the worship of Serapis (Clem. Al. Protr. iv, § 48) founded and embellished the museum and library; and part of the library was deposited in the Serapeum. The new faith and the new literature led to the growth of a new and independent Jewish sect. It was naturally imbied the spirit which prevailed about them. The Jews were, indeed, peculiarly susceptible of the influences to which they were exposed. They presented from the first a capacity for Eastern or Western development. To the faith and conservatism of the Oriental they united the activity and energy of the Greek. The mere presence of Hellenic culture could not fail to call into play their powers of speculation, which were hardly repressed by the traditional legalism of Palestine (comp. Jost, Geisch. d. Judenth., p. 293 sq.); and the unchanging element of divine revelation, which they always retained, enabled them to harmonize the new elements with the old. The fact that the Hebrew descent of the Jew and of the Greek would have produced the same general consequences in any case, Alexandria was peculiarly adapted to ensure their full effect. The result of the contact of Judaism with the many creeds which were current there must have been speedy and profound. This may be gathered more directly from the actual Jewish writers, whose fragmentary writing which has been preserved (about 160 B.C.) [see ARISTOBLOUS] contains large Orphic quotations, which had been already moulded into a Jewish form (comp. Jost, Geisch. d. Judenth., p. 378); and the attempt thus made to connect the most ancient Hellenic traditions with the law was often repeated afterward. Nor was this done in the spirit of bold forgery. Orpheus, Musaeus, and the Sibyls appeared to stand in some remote period anterior to the corruptions of polytheism, as the witnesses of a primaeval revelation and of the teaching of nature, and thus it seemed excusable to attribute to them a knowledge of the Mosaic doctrines. The third book of the Sibyllines (c. B.C. 150) is the chief exponent of the profound influence of Orphic and Sibylline literature, and shows how far the conception of Judaism was enlarged to meet the wider views of the religious condition of heathendom which was opened by a more intimate knowledge of Greek thought; though the later Apocrypha of Ezra [see EUSEBIUS, 4] exhibits a marked advance toward the extreme exclusiveness of former times.

But the indirect influence of Greek literature and philosophy produced still greater effects upon the Alexandrine Jews than the open conflict and combination of religious dogmas. The literary school of Alexandria was essentially critical and not creative. For the first time men labored to collect, revise, and classify all the records of the past. Poets trusted to their learning rather than to their imagination. Language became a study; and the legends of early mythology were transformed into philosophic mysteries. The Jews took a vigorous share in these new studies. The cautious writer of the Apol. Col. (c. 120), who was the Sanhedrin, who was the law in Palestine, found no favor in Egypt. Numerous authors adapted the history of the Patriarchs, of Moses, and of the Kings to classical models (Euseb. Prep. Ev. ix, 17-30. Eupolomus, Artapanus [?] Demetrius, Aristaeus, Cleomedon or Malchus, "a prophet"). A poem which bears the name of Phocylides gives in verse various precepts of Leviticus (Dionys. Luc. 11, Apology p. 512 sq. Rome, 1772); and several large fragments of a "tragedy" in which Ezekiel (c. B.C. 110) dramatized thc Exodus have been preserved by Eusebius (l. c.), who also quotes numerous passages from the verses of the elder Philo and Theodotus. This classicism of style was a symptom and cause of classicism of thought. The same Aristobulus who gave currency to the Judeo-Orphic verses endeavored to show that the Pentateuch was the real source of Greek philosophy (Euseb. Prep. Ev. xiii, 12; Clem. Al. Strom. vi, 98).

The precepts thus enunciated was thoroughly congenial to the Alexandrine character; and henceforth it was the chief object of Jewish speculation to trace out the subtle analogies which were supposed to exist between the writings of Moses and the teaching of the schools. The circumstances under which the philosophical and religious development of the first generation of Alexandrine Jews favored the attempt. For some time the practical sciences reigned supreme, and the issue of these was scepticism (Matter, Hist. de l'école d'Alex., iii, 162 sq.). Then at length the clear analysis and practical morality of the Peripatetics found ready followers, and, in the strength of the reaction, men eagerly trusted to those splendid ventures with which Plato taught them to be content till they could gain a surer knowledge (Phaed. p. 85). To the Jew this surer knowledge seemed to be already given, and the belief in the existence of a spiritual meaning underlying the letter of Scripture was the great principle on which all his investigations rested. The belief that the text of Scripture should be essentially symbolic; the language the veil (or sometimes the mask) which partly disguised from common sight the truths which it enwrapped. In this way a twofold object was gained. It became possible to withdraw the Supreme Being (ου αύτος, ου) from immediate consideration; and the Jews did not meditate on the mystery of the names of God as the narratives of the Bible to the phenomena of the soul. It is impossible to determine the process by which these results were embodied; but, as in parallel cases, they seem to have been shaped gradually in the minds of the mass, and not fashioned at once by one great teacher. Even in the Sept. there are traces of an endeavor to interpret the anthropomorphic imagery.
of the Hebrew text [see Septuagint], and there can be no doubt that the Commentaries of Aristobulus gave some form and consistency to the allegoric system. In the time of Philo (B.C. 20–A.D. 50) the theological and interpretative systems were already fixed even in many of their details, and he appears in both cases only to have collected and expressed the popular opinions of his countrymen. See Philo. In each of these great forms of speculation—the theological and the exegetical—Alexandrianism has an important bearing upon the Church, as it has upon the Gentile world.

When the characteristic of the Alexandrian school were by no means peculiar to it. The same causes which led to the formation of wider views of Judaism in Egypt, acting under greater restraint, produced corresponding results in Palestine. A doctrine of the Word (Mémeno), and a system of mystical interpretation grew up within the rabbinical schools, which bear a closer analogy to the language of the Apostle John and to the "allegories" of Paul than the speculations of Philo. See Logos.

The speculative doctrines which thus worked for the general reception of Christian doctrine were also embodied in the literature which was, in a way, transferred to the Christian Church. Numerous bodies of ascetics (Therapeutae), especially on the borders of Lake Mareotis, devoted themselves to a life of ceaseless discipline and study. See Therapeutae. Unlike the Essenes, who present the corresponding phase in Palestinian life, they adjured society and labor, and often detached, as it is said, the simplest wants of nature. In the contemplation of the hidden wisdom of the Scriptures (Philo, De Vit. Contemp. throughout). The description which Philo gives of their occupation and character seem to Eusebius to present so clear an image of Christian virtues that he claimed them as Christian. These ascetics can be not only a new form of the forms of monasticism were shaped upon the model of the Therapeuta (Euseb. H. E. ii. 16).

At the beginning of the second century the number of Christians at Alexandria must have been very large, and the great leaders of Gnosticism (q. v.) who arose there (Hastides, Valentine) exhibit an exaggeration of the tendency of the Church. But the later forms of Alexandria speculation, the strange varieties of Gnosticism, the progress of the c.technical school, the development of Neoplatonism, the various phases of the Arian controversy, belong to the history of the Church of the whole world. To the last Alexandria fulfilled its mission; and we still owe much to the spirit of its great teachers, which in later ages struggled, not without success, against the sternest systems of the West.—Smith, Dict. of Bible, i. 46.

See Kirklaubu, D. Judi. in Alexandrinum (Lpz. 1841); Dähne, Geschichtliche Darstellung der Juden in Alexandrinum (Halle, 1844); Gfrörer, Philo, and the Judisch-Alexandrinische Theologie (Stuttgart, 1835). To these may be added, Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Israel (Göttingen, 1829), iv. 20 sq.; 895 sq.; Jost, Gesch. des Juden (Leipzig, 1867), i. 544 sq.; 588 sq.; Schaf, Hist. of the Church, § 126. At Alexandria first aimed at the instruction of converts from heathenism, and the instruction was catechetical. It was afterward developed into a theological seminary. Jerome dates its origin from the time of St. Mark, but there is no authority for his statement. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v. 10) states that it had existed from "ancient times;" but the first definite account dates from about 181, when Pantaenus, a philosopher who had abandoned first Stoicism and then Platonism, and had been a Christian missionary in India, commenced lecturing in Alexandria (Euseb. loc. cit.). Whether Athenagoras, a philosopher who embraced Christianity about the middle of the 3d century, is called on account of his books by Philip of Sida (see Dodwell, Dissertation in Iren. Or. 1689, p. 488, 497) a predecessor of Pantaenus, was ever at Alexandria, is extremely doubtful. The testimony of Philip of Sida is not very trustworthy, and the silence of Eusebius, and Athenagoras's way of teaching, which is by no means Alexandrine, speak against it. About A.D. 190 Clement became assistant to Pantaenus, and, about 208, head of the school. Origen became connected with the school as teacher when only a youth of 18 years, and he labored then, with some brief interruptions, until 282, when he was expelled from Alexandria. In the later years of his stay at Alexandria he was assisted by his disciple and successor, and by his brother Heraclides, who subsequently became bishop of Alexandria. Heraclides was succeeded by Dionysius, also a disciple of Origen, and later, likewise a bishop of Alexandria. The celebrity of the Alexandrian school continued for some time after the death of Dionysius, notwithstanding the rival institution which arose at Caesarea Palestinae, and which was for some time conducted by Origen. It did not cease until the close of the fourth century.

Of the history of the school after the death of Dionysius we are, however, but imperfectly informed. Eusebius (H. E. vii. 82) names among the successors of Dionysius Philo Archimedes, who was omitted by Philip of Sida, and who, at all events, was less prominent than Pherius, who is mentioned by Philo and by Photius (Cod. 118). The names of the Neo-pagans and Serapians are given as principals of the school only by Philip. It is possible, as Philip states, that about the close of the third century the Alexandrian bishop and martyr, Peter (Eus. H. E. vii. 82), gave catechetical instruction, and later, about the middle of the fourth century, an Alexandrian monk, Macarius. Arius, the originator of Arianism, seems to have likewise been for some time principal of the school. The name of the learned and pious Didymus is mentioned as an Alexandrian catechist, not only by Philip, but by Sozomen (H. E. iii. 15) and Ruin (H. E. ii. 7), and there is reason to believe that he presided over the school during the long period from 340 to 395. His assistant in later years, and his successor as catechist, was Rhodon, the teacher of Philip of Sida, and his withdrawal from Alexandria to Sida about 395 led, according to the testimony of Philip, to the close of the Alexandrian school. It is more probable that other causes had a greater share in bringing about this event. The controversies concerning Origen, and later, concerning Nestorianism and Monophysitism, in which the Alexandrian spirit degenerated into an extreme, were the subject of controversy in the Church, which diminished the number of adult converts and lessened the need of catechetical instruction for adults, and the prosperous development of Christian science, gradually undermined the prominent position of the Alexandrian school in the Church. It again became what it had been at the beginning, a school in which children received catechetical instruction.

In the best days of the school the number of students was very great, but it seems never to have had buildings or endowments. The head master chose his own assistants, and laid down rules for the conduct of the pupils, which were observed by the scholars; and the students lodged where they could. The manner of teaching was as in the schools of the ancient philosophers, accommodated in many cases to the needs of individuals, and frequently it was catechetical. Whoever wished it received instruction in philosophy, in the sciences connected with the Christian Gospel, as much as he could follow it in the catechetical instruction for adults, and the prosperous development of Christian science, gradually undermined the prominent position of the Alexandrian school in the Church. It again became what it had been at the beginning, a school in which children received catechetical instruction.

Schaff gives the following brief but clear account of the influence of the Alexandrian school on theology: "From this school proceeded a peculiar theology, the most learned and genial representatives of which were Clement and Origen. This theology is, on the one hand, a regenerated Christian form of the Alexandrian Jewish religious philosophy of Philo; on the other, a Catholic counterpart and a positive refutation of the heretical Gnosis, which reached its height also in Alexandria but half a century earlier. The Alexandrian school here reconciled Christianity with philosophy, or, subjectively speaking, of plaitis with the gnoeisis; but it seeks this union upon the basis of the Bible and the doctrine of the Church. Its centre, therefore, is the Logos, viewed as the sum of all reason and all truth, before and after the incarnation. Clement came from the Hellenic philosophy to the Christian faith; Origen, conversely, was led by faith to speculation. The former was an aprioristic thinker, the latter a systematician. The one borrowed ideas from various systems; the other followed more the track of Platonicism. But both are Christian philosophers and churchly gnostics. As Philo, long before them, in his great works, had combined Judaism with Greek culture, so now they carried Grecian culture into Christianity. This, indeed, the apologists and controversialists of the second century had already done as far back as Justin the 'philosopher.' But the Alexandrians were more learned and Illyric-minded, and made much freer use of the Greek philosophy. They saw in it, not sheer error, but in one view a gift of God, and a theoretical school master for Christ, like the law in the practical sphere. Clement compares it to a wild olive-tree, which can be ennobled by faith; Origen (in the fragments of his epistle to Gregory Thaumaturgo) to Egypt which the Jews dissolved with them out of Egypt, and turned into ornaments for their sanctuary, though they also wrought them into the golden calf. It is not necessarily an enemy to the truth, but may, and should be its handmaid, and at least neutralize the attacks against it. The elements of truth in the heathen philosophy they attributed to the secret operations of the Logos in the world of reason, partly to acquaintance with the Jewish philosophy, the writings of Moses and the prophets. So with the Gnostic heresy. The Alexandrians did not successively condemn it, but recognized the desire for deeper religious knowledge which lay at its root, and sought to meet this desire with a wholesome supply from the Bible itself. Alexandrinum (Ἀλεξανδρινον), a place frequently referred to by Josephus as having been originally built by Alexander (hence, doubtless, the name), apparently Janneus (Ant. xiii, 16, 8), on a hill near Corse (q. v.), toward Jericho (Ant. xiv, 8, 4); fortified by Alexander the son of Aristobulus (Ant. xiv, 5, 2; War, i, 6, 2), and demolished by Gabinius (Ant. xiv, 5, 4; War, i, 6, 2), but restored by Herod, but again restored (Ant. xiv, 15, 4). It was the burial-place of the founder's family, and here accordingly the bodies of Herod's sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, were removed by night for interment (Ant. xvi, 11, 7; War, i, 17, 6). It has been identified by Schultz (Ritter, Erdk. xv, 452-454) as the modern vilayet of Kaffeh Esmi, about two miles S.E. of Shilloh, containing the ruins of an ancient castle built with very large stones (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 284).

Alfred the Great, king of England, was born in 849, his parents being Ethelwulf, king of the West Saxons, and Asburga, his first wife. He mounted the throne in 871, and during the thirty years in which he held the reins of government he experienced the greatest vicissitudes of fortune. As king, he was a great benefactor of the Church; he built many monasteries and churches; he founded the University of Oxford, which has been, under God, through all ages, the main support of the true faith in that kingdom. He died Oct. 21 or 28, 901, being little over fifty years old. Besides drawing learned men to his court, Alfred himself was devoted to letters. He translated Boethius, De consolatione (published by Cordale, London, 1829, 8vo). Several other works are attributed to Alfred; among them, 1. A Saxon Paraphrase of the History of Bede, given in the Cambridge edition of Bede's History (1722, fol.):—2. Variorum Lexicon relating to the Church, contained in the same work (Appendix):—3. A Saxon Translation of the Liber Pastoralis of St. Gregory (in MS. at Cambridge).—4. The Peaker of Dard, partly translated into Saxon (printed at London, with the Latin text, in 1640, 4to).—5. Anglo-Saxon Translation of Orosius (given at the end of Paul's "Life of Alfred," in Bohn's Library). He is also said to have translated the Four Dialogues of St. Gregory, which are lost.—Powell, Life of Alfred the Great (Lond. 1834, 12mo); Cave, Hist. Algeria, a country of Northern Africa, which forms now (since 1830) a French possession. Its area is about 150,000 square miles; population, in 1856, 3,250,000, most of whom are Mohammedans. The European population has rapidly increased since 1830. In 1832 it was only 5919 souls; in 1856, 155,607, among whom were 86,969 French, and 42,693 Spaniards. Among the Europeans were, in 1837, about 10,000 Protestants, with eleven clergymen. The rest are mostly Roman Catholics, who have one bishopric at Algiers. There are several convents, among which a large agricultural and educational institution of the Trappists is celebrated. There were, in 1845, 178 boys' and 113 girls' schools, with 10,672 boys and 8986 girls. Four towns had Arabic-French schools, with 400 scholars. An Association of St. Louis was formed in 1859 for the civilization of the Mohammedans, and had commenced the publication of an Arabic paper, Birjus Birjus (the Eagle of Persia).—Schem's Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859; Behaghel, L'Algérie (Par. 1845). Alien (אֶלֶּה, ger, also יִשְׂרָאֵל, nekár, or יִשְׂרָאֵל, noḵí), both meaning stranger, as often rendered; ἀλλότριος, a foreigner or person born in another country, and not having the usual rights and privileges of the citizens of the country in which he lives. Among the Hebrews there were two classes of persons denominated thus: 1. The proper aliens (בָּשָׂר), those who were strangers generally, and who possessed no landed property, though they might have purchased houses; 2. Those less properly so called (בָּשָׂר לִשְׂרָאֵל), sojourners), i.e. strangers dwelling in another country without being naturalized (Lev. xxii, 10; Psa. xxxix, 12). Both of these classes were to be treated with kindness, and were to enjoy the same rights with other citizens (Lev. xix, 33, 34; Deut. x, 19; xxiii, 7; xxiv, 17). Strangers might be naturalized, or permitted to enter into the congregation of the Lord, by submitting to circumcision and renouncing idolatry (Deut. xxiii, 1–8).

The Edomites and Egyptians were capable of becoming citizens of Israel after the third generation. It appears also that other nations were not entirely excluded from being incorporated with the people of Israel. But the Ammonites and Moabites, in consequence of the hostile disposition which they had manifested to the Israelites in the wilderness, were absolutely excluded from the right of citizenship (Michaelis, Mos. Recht, § 83).
EGYPT, e. g. the Balboa kali, or the Mesembryanthemum nodiflorum of Linnaeus (comp. Hasselquist, Reiss, p. 229; Raaffman Delile, Flore de l'Illustration, p. 24). The saline plants indigenous in Palestine from which bo- riša was obtained were also, according to the Talmudists (see Celsius Hierobot, i, 490) and Jerome (in loc. seu), called by the same name, and are the same as those called by the Arabo-Arabians. Of these plants Rauwolf (Reisen, p. 87) found in Syria two species; one was a thick bushy shrub, with numerous slender branches, surmounted by thick tufts, and furnished with narrow pointed leaves; the other in stem and top resembles "sheep-dew," with thick ash-colored roots (see his figures of each under Nos. 87, 68). The distinction of the various kinds of Oriental saline plants requires a new botanical treatment (Kito, Phys. Geogr. of Holy Land, p. ccxxvii). Piniy, xix., 18, mentions among the plants growing in Syria one "which yields a juice useful for washing wool," under the name rudica, Gr. ıntoono, comp. Dioscorides, ii, 198; Beckmann, Grec. d. Exilv. iv, 18 sq.; Spregel, ad Dioscor. ii, 478, regards this as no other than the Sapomoria officinalis). Formerly, as at the present day (Rauwolf, ut sup.; Arriuix, Reisen, ii, 168; Bellon, in Paulinus's Sammel. iv, 151), the ashes of these plants formed an important article of commerce in Oriental markets, under whose name (from the Romans) they were sold, and it is not only employed (in the form of lye or soap) as a means of cleansing clothes and the skin (Jer. ii, 22; Mal. iii, 2; Job ix, 80), but also in the reduction of metals, e. g. silver and lead (Isa. i, 28), and in the manufacture of glass (comp. generally Celcius, i, 449 sq.; Michel, Comment. ut sup.). Allan, William (Cardinal), born in Lancashire in 1532, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he afterward became, in Queen Mary's time, principal of St. Mary's and also made archbishop of York. At Queen Elizabeth's accession he retreated to Lou- vain, and then became professor at Douay, canon of Cambrai and Rheims, and lastly, in 1587, he was made cardinal-priest of St. Martin's in Rome, and in 1588 archbishop of Mechlin. He was very active in collecting the Roman law and restoring the use of it, and in establishing a college, first at Douay and then at Rheims. His zeal against Queen Elizabeth showed itself in two bitter works, which he published before the invasion of England by the Spaniards, encouraging King Philip to that enterprise, and urging the subjects of Queen Elizabeth to consider themselves absolved from their allegiance, and to execute the papal ban dethroning Elizabeth and putting Philip II in her stead. This treason greatly embittered the English people against Allan, and the Earl of Arundel was afterward condemned to death for corresponding with him. He died at Rome in 1594, and the Jesuits were charged with poisoning him. They, in turn, charged the crime against Dr. Lewis, bishop of Cassone, who, they said, hoped to succeed Allan as English cardinal. —Hook, Eccl. Bish. i, 103; Collier, Eccl. Hist. vii, 180.

Allatius, Leo (Leo Allacci) in Italian), was born in 1586 of Greek parents in the island of Chios, went to Rome in 1600, and studied at the Greek College in that city. When his course of studies was completed, Ber-nard Justinius, bishop of Angoulême, selected him for his grand-vicar. In 1621 Pope Gregory XV sent him into Germany to bring to Rome the Palatinate Library of Heidelberg, and Alexander VII made him libra-rian of the Vatican in 1661. He died Jan. 19, 1669.
ALLEGORY 162

Allegory (ἀλληγορία) occurs in the Bible only in the participial form, ἀλληγοροῦμεν, allegorized (Gal. iv. 24), where the apostle cites the history of the free-born Isaac and the slave-born Ishmael, and only speaks of it as allegorically applied. Allegories themselves are, however, of frequent occurrence in Scripture.

An allegory has been sometimes considered as only a lengthened metaphor; at other times as a conventional division of narrative. But, according as its original and proper meaning, as shown by its derivation, the term denotes a representation of one thing which is intended to excite the representation of another thing. In most allegories the immediate representation is made in the form of a narrative; and, since it is the object of the allegory itself to convey a moral, not a historic truth, the formal exactness of the common narrative, that the immediate representation is understood from the words of the allegory; the ultimate representation depends upon the immediate representation applied to the proper end. The interpretation of the former is commonly called the grammatical or the literal interpretation, although we should speak more correctly in calling it the verbal interpretation, since, in the plainest narratives, even in narratives not designed for moral application, the use of words is never restricted to their mere literal senses. Every parable is a kind of allegory; e.g. in the parable of the sower (Luke viii, 5-15) we have a plain narrative—a statement of a few simple and intelligible facts, such, probably, as had fallen within the observation of the persons to whom our Saviour addressed himself, followed by the explanation or allegorical interpretation. The impressive and pathetic allegory addressed by Nathan to David affords a similar instance of an allegorical narrative accompanied with its explanation (2 Sam. xii, 1-14). Allegories thus constituted constitute a kind of simile, in both parts of which the words themselves are construed either literally or figuratively, according to the respective use of them; and then we institute the comparison between the things signified in the former part and the things signified in the latter part. The most frequent error in the interpretation of allegorical representations is the attempt to discover too minute coincidences, or to apply them in all their details. See Parable.

But allegorical narratives are frequently left to explain themselves, especially when the resemblance between the immediate and ultimate representation is sufficiently apparent to make an explanation unnecessary. Of this kind we cannot have a more striking example than that beautiful one contained in the 80th Psalm, "Thou broughtest a vine out of Egypt," etc. The allegorical delineations of old age by Solomon (Eccl. xii, 2-6) is perhaps one of the best of the Old Testament. The use of allegorical interpretation is not, however, confined to mere allegory, or fictitious narratives, but is extended also to history, or real narratives. And in this case the grammatical meaning of a passage is called its historiical, in contradistinction to its allegorical meaning. The allegorical interpretation, in which Scripture history has been thus allegorized. According to one, facts and circumstances, especially those recorded in the Old Testament, have been applied to other facts and circumstances, of which they have been described as representative. According to others, these facts and circumstances have been described as mere emblems. The former is warranted by the practice of the sacred writers themselves; for when facts and circumstances are so applied, they are applied as types of those things to which the application is made. But the latter has no such authority in its favor, though attempts have been made to procure such authority by the same means as before. The former is not, as true representations, like the immediate representations in allegory. By this mode, therefore, history is not treated as allegory, but converted into allegory—a mode of interpretation that cannot claim the sanction of Paul. The other treatise of this kind is the treatment of the Isaac and Ishmael—the Marsh, Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible, lect. v. See Interpretation.

Alleine, Joseph, an eminently pious non-conformist divine, was born at Devizes in 1633. His pity and love of learning displayed themselves very early, and at sixteen he was sent to Lincoln College, Oxford, but in 1651 he removed to Corpus Christi College, a Wiltshire scholarship being then vacant. In 1653 he was made a fellow of arts, and in 1660 a co-pastor with the Rev. George Newton, at Tetsworth, where he labored with great diligence and success until 1662, when he was deprived of his office for non-conformity, and on the 26th of May, 1663, was committed to Hitcher jail, where, after being treated with great integrity, with seven months with Mr. Quakers, he was indicted at the assizes for preaching on the 17th of May, of which he was found guilty, and fined one hundred marks. He declared in court "that, whatsoever he was charged with, he was guilty of nothing but doing his duty." He continued in prison a year, and, after his release, he was even more anxious in his efforts. In the Gospel, till his expulsion through agitation of illness. In 1665 he was again apprehended, and, with some of his friends, was committed to prison for sixty days. The confinement increased his disorder, and he rapidly became worse, and died Nov. 16, 1663. His A Karm to the Unconverted is one of the most useful and most widely circulated books of practical religion ever published. —Life of Alleine, with Letters (N. Alleluia (ἀλληλούια), a Græcized form (Rev. xix, 1, 3, 4, 6) of the Heb. exclamation Hallelujah (q. v).

Allemannia, a confederation of German tribes, among which, probably, the Tencerti, Usipetti, Chatti, and Vangiones were the most important. The name denotes either (according to Zeuse) a confederation of men of different nations, or (according to Grimm) the true descendants of Manus, real German men. They appear for the first time on the stage of history under the reign of Caracalla (211), who assumed the title of Allemannicus because he pretended to have conquered the Allemanni on the Maine. Toward the close of the 3d century, there was a quick succession of war between the Rhine, Maine, and Danube. There they existed under this distinctive name until the beginning of the 10th century, when Duke Ergcher was executed, and his successor Burcard proclaimed Duke of Swabia.

The Roman provinces on the Rhine and Danube, at the close of their occupation by the Allemanni, were partly inhabited by Christians. The Allemanni suppressed in some districts Christianity altogether, while in others it was strong enough to withstand all persecutions. Thus Paganism and Christianity existed side by side until the battle of Zulphi (496), in consequence of which the Franks, soon entered the Christian Church. The connection of the Allemannian dukes and grandees with the Frankish kings, the Frankish legislation, especially the less Allemannicas of Dogealth the Great (630), and the efforts of the bishops of the neighboring seas of Ausburg and Vindisenis, greatly promoted the spreading of Christianity. When the latter see was transferred to Constance, an Allemannic city, the growth of Christianity became still more rapid. Among the missionaries who labored for the conversion of the Allemanni, Fridolin (560), Columban and Gallus (610),
Tregopl (640), and Firminius (724), are best known.

Allen, Benjamin, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Hudson, N. Y., September 29, 1769,
and was a Presbyterian, and obtained his education
under many difficulties by strenuous exertion.
In 1814 he entered the Protestant Episcopal Church,
and was licensed as a lay reader in Charlestown, Va., where he gave special attention to the instruction of the colored people. He was ordained deacon in 1816 and priest in 1818. In 1815 he published the "Layman's Magazine," and in 1820 an "Abridgment of Burnett's History of the Reformation," which had a very large sale.
In 1828 he was chosen rector of St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia, as successor to the Rev. Dr. Filmore. Here his labors as pastor and preacher were incessant, and he added to them a great deal of literary work. In 1822 he published "Christ and Him Crucified" (12mo), and
"Living Musicians," a tale (12mo); in 1823-4, A History of the Church of Christ (2 vols. 8vo); in 1825, The Parish Counselor, or the Narrative of the Newton Family;
and a Sketch of the Life of Dr. Filmore.
In 1827 he established the "Lambing House," called the "Prayer-Book and Missionary House," toips to prayer-books, tracts, etc., and wrote for publication several small practical and biographical works. Under these accumulated labors his health broke down, and he sailed for Europe in March, 1828. In England he imprud-ently allowed himself to be called into frequent services at anniversaries and public meetings, and his strength failed entirely by midsummer. He died on the return voyage to America, Jan. 13, 1829. Besides the publications above named, he published also a number of separate sermons, and several small volumes of poems, written in early life.—Sprague, Annals, v, 601.

Allen, Cardinal. See ALLAN

Allen, David Oliver, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Barre, Mass. He graduated at Amherst College, in 1823, studied theology in Andover Theological Seminary, 1824-27, went with his wife, as missionary to India in 1827.
In 1844 he took charge of the printing establishment in Bombay, employing at that time one hundred persons. He published several tracts in the Marh-eta language, and supervised a revised and corrected edition of the whole Scriptures in that language.
He returned, on account of enfeebled health, to America M June, 1853, and published in 1856 a "History of India, Ancient and Modern." He was a member of the Royal Asiatic Society and the American Oriental Society.
He died in London, July 3, 1868.

Allen, Henry. See ALLENITE

Allen, James, a Puritan minister, was born in England in 1632. He was a fellow of New College, Oxford, but was ejected for non-conformity in 1662, came to America, and was ordained teacher of the First Church, Boston, December 9, 1668, as colleague with Mr. Davenport, who was at the same time ordained. He served this church for sixty years with dignity and industry, but without remarkable success. Several of his occasional sermons were printed.
He died September 22, 1710.—Sprague, Annals, i, 163.

Allen, John, one of the early ministers of Massachusetts, was born in England in 1696, and was driven from his native land during the persecution of the Puritans. Refusing to go to New England, to which place he was sent, he was settled pastor of the church at Dedham, April 24, 1699, where he continued till his death, August 26, 1761. He was a man of considerable distinction in his day. He published a defense of the nine positions, in which, with Mr. Shepard of Cambridge, he discusses the points of Church discipline, and a defense of the name of "Indians," against Mr. Chauncy, under the title of An Addisoner-sions upon the Antinomian, (4to, 1664).—Allen, Biographical Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 58.

Allen, John, chancellor of Ireland, was born in 1475, was educated at Oxford, and took his bachelor's degree at Cambridge. He soon obtained several ben-efices, and was sent by Archbishop Warham to Rome on ecclesiastical af-airs; he spent nine years there,
and, on his return, Wolsey made him his chaplain.
He was made archbishop of Dublin in 1528, and soon after chancellor. He was an active assistant of Cardinal Wolsey in the spoliation of the religious houses, and was a learned canonist. Allen was murdered by Thomas Fitzgerald, son of the Earl of Kildare, July 28, 1534, and his death was regarded by the King as a vindictive judgment upon him for having been instrumental in the destruction of forty monasteries. He wrote Epist. de Palliis Significatione, and other pieces relating to ecclesiastical subjects.—Biog. Univ. tom. i, p. 690;
Rose, Biog. Dictionary; Landon, Ecles. Dict, s. v.; Wood, Ait Theatrum Ossuarum.

Allen, John, a learned layman, was born at Truro, Cornwall, England, in 1771, and conducted for upward of thirty years a private school in London, where he died June 17, 1839. He published a work on Modern Judaism (8vo, London, 1816 and 1830). Bickersteth calls it the best work on the subject in the English language. In 1818 he published a translation of Calin's Institutes of the Christian Religion, which has continued to be the standard English version of that great work, though it may now, perhaps (1862), be superceded by Beveridge's new translation. Allen's edition of the Institutes was reprinted at New York (1819, 4to), and often since in 2 vols. 8vo, in which form it is isdued by the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia.—Darling, Cyclopedia Bibliographical, i, 49;
Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 58.

Allen, John, was pastor of a Baptist congregation at Spitalfields, 1764 to 1767. Engaging in business, he became involved in difficulties, was tried for forgery, and was acquitted. He subsequently went to New York, and after some time at New York, there until his death. He published The Spiritual Magazine, or the Christian's Grand Treasure, wherein the doctrines of the Bible are unfolded (Lond. 1762;
reprinted, with preface by Romaine, Lond. 1810, 3 vols.
8vo); (Obain of Truth, a dissertation on the Harmony of the Gospels (1764).—Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 426; Darling, Cyclopedia Bibliographical, i, 49.

Allen, Moses, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Northampton, Massa-uchetta, September 14, 1748. He was educated at Princeton, where he graduated in 1772. He was ordained at Christ's Church parish, about twenty miles from Charlestown, S. C., March 26, 1775. In 1777 he removed to Midway, Georgia. The British army from Florida, under General Prevost, disperscd his society in 1778, and burned the church, almost every dwelling-house, and the crops of rice then in stacks.
In December he was taken prisoner by the British, and prisoned with great severity. Seeing no prospect of release from the prison-ship where he was confined,
he determined to attempt the most certain means of escape by jumping overboard and swimming to an adjunct point; but he was drowned in the attempt, February 8, 1779.—Allen, Biog. Dictionary, s. v.
Allen, Richard, first bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1760. After 17 years' service in the Methodist ministry, to which he had been ordained by Bishop Asbury, he was elected bishop of the newly-formed "African Methodist Episcopal Church" (q.v.) in 1816. He died in Philadelphia, March 26, 1881.—Corrie, Churches and Sects, p. 54.

Allen, Solomon, a useful minister of the Gospel, brother of Moses Allen (q.v.), was born at Northampton, February 29, 1731. He, with four of his brothers, bore a part in the Revolutionary war, and rose to the rank of major. At 40 he was converted, and was made deacon of the church at Northampton. Soon after he felt it his duty to preach the Gospel, but the neighboring clergy discouraged him, on account of his great age and his want of theological learning. But he was not to be hindered; he devoted himself to the study of the Bible, and went for his theology to the works of Hoar and Baxter. At fifty years of age he entered upon a career of voluntary labor as a preacher, which lasted, chiefly in the new settlements in Western New York, for 20 years. "He rejoiced in fatigue and privations in the service of his beloved Lord. Sometimes, in season and out, he reposed himself with nothing but a blanket to protect him from the inclemency of the weather. But though poor, he was the means of enriching many with the inestimable riches of religion. Four churches were established by him, and he numbered about two hundred souls as by his preaching reclaimed from perdition. Though poor himself, there were those connected with him who were rich, and by whose liberality he was enabled to accomplish his benevolent purposes. From such sources he expended about a thousand dollars in books and clothing for the people in the wilderness." In 1820 he returned to Massachusetts, "At Pittsfield, where some of his relations lived, and where his brother had been the minister, Mr. Allen went through the streets, and entering each house, read a chapter in the Bible, exhorting all the members of the family to serve God, and praying fervently for their salvation. In like manner he visited other towns. He felt that the time was short, and he was constrained to do all the good in his power. With his white locks, and the strong, impressive tones of his voice, and having a known character for sanctity, all were awed at the presence of the man of God. He went about with the holy zeal and authority of an apostle," Mr. Allen dispersed a substantial and pathos which good judges have considered as unequalled by any ministers whom they have known. It was the energy of true faith and strong feeling. In November he arrived at New York, and there, after a few weeks, he expired in the arms of his children, Jan. 28, 1821."—Allen, Biog. Dictionary, s. v.

Allen, Thomas, a non-conformist minister, was born at Norwich, England, 1668, and educated at Cambridge. He was afterward minister of St. Edmond's, in Norwich, but was silenced by Bishop Wren, about 1636, for refusing to read the Book of Sports. In 1638 he fled to New England, and was installed in Charlestown, where he preached the Gospel till about 1651, when he returned to Norwich, and continued the exercise of his ministry till 1662, when he was ejected for non-conformity. He died September 21, 1673. He published a Chain of Scripture Chronology, from the Creation till the Death of Christ (Long. 1669, 4to), and a number of practical writings.—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 51; Allen, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Allen, Thomas, a Church of England divine, was born at Oxford in 1662, and was educated at Wadham College, Oxford, of which he became Master of Dean's Yard in 1714, and continued to serve that parish until his death, May 31, 1755. He published An Apology for the Church of England (Lond. 1725, 8vo); The Christian's sure Guide to eternal Glory, Expositions of Rev. ii, iii (Lond. 1735, 8vo); The Practice of a Holy Life (Lond. 1716, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, 1, 51; Nichols, Ib. It was during his ministry of thirty years that he was more or less wearied in his sacred calling. Besides his stated labors on the Sabbath, he frequently delivered lectures, and in the course of his life preached six or seven hundred funeral sermons. During the war of the Revolution he went out twice as a volunteer chaplain. He died February 11, 1810.—Sprague, Annals, i, 568; Allen, Biog. Dictionary, s. v.

Allen, William (Cardinal). See ALLAN.

Allen, William, a tradesman of London, whose works were highly esteemed by Bishop Kidder and others, was originally an Independent, but from conviction joined the Church of England in 1688. He died in 1688, at an advanced age. His Works were published at London, folio, in 1707, with a preface concerning his life, and his writings and works of Chichester. Bishop Kidder preached his funeral sermon.—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 51.

Allen, William, a member of the Society of Friends, and a distinguished Christian philanthropist, was born, in 1770, at Spitalfields. He founded, in 1797, with Mr. Phillips, the "Spitalfields Soup Society," exerted himself for the abolition of the slave-trade, and for capital punishment in the case of minor offences, for the improvement of primary schools and prisons, for the establishment of saving funds and other similar purposes. From 1816 to 1838 he visited four times the principal countries of Europe in behalf of his philanthropic enterprises. Many years before his death, Mr. Allen purchased an estate near Lindfield, Sussex, and withdrew from business. Here, while still zealously engaging in public schemes of usefulness and benevolence, he carried out various philanthropic plans for the improvement of his immediate dependents and poorer neighbors. He erected common schools on his property, made an allotment of land attached to each cottage; and he established schools at Lindfield for boys, girls, and infants, with workshops, out-houses, and play-grounds. About three acres of land were cultivated on the most approved system by the boarders, who also took part in household work. The subjects taught were land-surveying, mapping, the elements of botany, the use of the barometer, rain-gauge, etc., and there was a good library with various scientific and useful apparatus. He died at his house near Lindfield, December 80, 1843.—Sherman, Life of William Allen (1857, 8vo); English Cyclopedia, s. v.; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 84.

Allenites, the followers of Henry Allen, born at Newport, R. I., June 14, 1748, a man of natural capacity but undisciplined mind, who, about the year 1774, journeyed through most parts of the province of Nova Scotia, and, by his popular talents, made many converts. He also published several treatises and sermons, in which he maintains that the souls of all the human race are not moral agents, but in constant Spirit, but that originally they had individually the powers of moral agents—that they were all present with our first parents in the garden of Eden, and were actually in the first transgression. He supposes that our first parents in innocence were pure spirits; that the material world was not then made; but, in consequence of the fall, mankind being cut off from God, that they might not sink into immediate destruction, the world was produced, and they were clothed with hard bodies; and that all the human race will in their turns, by natural generation, be invested with such bodies, and in them enjoy a state of probation. He maintains that the body of our Saviour was never raised from the grave, and that none of the bodies of men ever will be; but when the original number of souls had been retrieved from corruption, these disembodied spirits and the reward or punishment in their original unembodied state. He held baptism, the Lord's Supper, and ordination, to be matters of indifference. Allen died in 1784, after which his party greatly declined.—Adams's Dict. of Religions; Grégoire, Hist. des Scetes, v. 114.

Alletree, Richard, D.D., an eminent English divine, born at Uppingham, Rutlandshire, in March, 1619, and educated at Oxford. In 1641 he took up arms for the king, and, after the royal downfall, he took orders. In 1660 he was made rector of Brownsden in Essex, and in 1661 he was made rector of Eton, where he died Jan. 26, 1680. He was a laborious scholar, and did a great deal for Eton College. He published Forty Sermons (Oxf. 1694, 2 vol. fol.).—Hook, Eccl. Biog. i. 142.

Alley, William, bishop of Exeter, was born about 1512 at Great Wycombe, Bucks; he was educated at Eton, from whence in 1528, he went to King's College, Cambridge; after having taken his degree of A.B. in that university, he removed to Oxford. At this time the interest between the king and the reforming party in the Church of England was carried on with much violence on both sides. Alley attached himself zealously to the reformers, and, on the accession of Queen Mary, thought it expedient to conceal himself, and earned an honorable maintenance in the north of England by practising physic and teaching youth. When Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, he returned to London, and read the divinity lectures in St. Paul's. He is said to have discharched this office with great ability; and he is also distinguished as the translator of the Pentateuch for Archbishop Parker's Bible. On July 14, 1560, he was consecrated bishop of Exeter, and discharged his duties faithfully until his death, April 16, 1570. He published an exposition of 1 Peter in The Poor Man's Library (Lond. 1565, fol.).

Alliance, a confederation formed by treaty between two nations for their amicable intercourse and mutual advantage. Compacts of this character are designated in Scripture by various terms, e. g. league; covenant; treaty.

1. History of Jewish Treaties. Anterior to the Moslem institutions, such alliances with foreigners were not forbidden. Abraham was in alliance with some of the Canaanitish princes (Gen. xiv, 13); he also entered into a regular treaty of alliance with the Philistine king Abimelech (ch. xxii, 22 sq.), which was renewed by their sons (ch. xxvi, 30-33). This primitive treaty is a model of its kind; it leaves all details to the honest interpretation of the contracting parties. Abimelech says: "Swear unto me here by God that thou wilt not deal falsely with me, nor with my sons, nor with my son's son; but according to the kindness that I have done unto thee thou shalt do unto me, and unto the land wherein thou hast sojourned." Even after the law it appears that such alliances with distant nations as could not be supposed to have any dangerous effect upon the religion or morals of the people were not deemed to be prohibited. Thus, in the case of the treaty with the Gibeonites, Joshua and the elders are commanded for one reason only, that the Gibeonites were in fact their near neighbors (Josh. ix, 3-27).

On the first establishment of the Israelites in Palestine, lest the example of foreign nations should draw them into the worship of idols, intercourse and alliance with such nations were strongly interdicted ( Lev. xvii, 4; xx, 27, 28). For the same object of political isolation a country was assigned to them shut in by the sea on the west, by deserts on the south and east, and by mountains and forests on the north. But with the extension of their power under the kings, the Jews were brought more into contact with foreigners, and alliances became essential to the security of their commerce (1 Kings x, 1 sq.). These diplomatic relations may primarily be referred to a partial change of feeling which originated in the time of David, and which continued to operate among his descendants. During his wanderings he was brought into association with several of the neighboring princes, from some of whom he received aid, by way of tribute, and in 1014 he, when he ascended the throne, he gratefully remembered (2 Sam. x, 2). He married the daughter of a heathen king, and had by her his favorite son (2 Sam. i, 3); the king of Moab protected his family (1 Sam. xxii, 3, 4); the king of Ammon showed kindness to him (2 Sam. x, 2); the king of Gath showered favors upon him (1 Sam. xxv, 1, 2); the king of Hamath sent his own son to congratulate him on his victories (2 Sam. viii, 15); in short, the rare power which David possessed of attaching to himself the good opinion and favor of other men, extended even to the neighboring nations, and it would have been difficult for any one to have disposed of his disposition for the advances of kindness and consideration which they made. Among those who made such advances was Hiram, king of Tyre; for it eventually transpires that "Hiram was over a lover of David" (1 Kings v, 2), and it is probable that other intercourse had preceded that time relating to the palace which Hiram's artificers built for David (2 Sam. v, 11). The king of Tyre was not disposed to neglect the cultivation of the friendly intercourse with the Hebrew nation which had thus been opened. He sent an embassy to condole with Solomon on the death of his father, and to congratulate him on his own accession (1 Kings i, 1). The plans of the young king rendered the friendship of Hiram a matter of importance, and accordingly "a league" was formed (1 Kings v, 12) between them; and that this league had a reference not merely to the special matter then in view, but was a general league of amity, is evinced by the fact that more than 250 years after a prophet foretells the Lord's vengeance upon Tyre, because she "remembered not the brotherly covenant" (Amos i, 9). Under this league large bodies of Jews and Phenicians were associated, first in preparing the materials for the Temple (1 Kings v, 6-18), and afterward in navigating the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean (1 Kings x, 26-30). One of these great merchants contracted an alliance with a Pharaoh, king of Egypt, which was cemented by his marriage with a princess of the royal family; by this he secured a monopoly of the trade in horses and other products of that country (1 Kings x, 29, 30). After the division of the kingdom the alliances were of an offensive and defensive nature; they had their origin partly in the internal disputes of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, and partly in the position which these countries held relatively to Egypt on the one side, and the great Eastern monarchies of Assyria and Babylonia on the other. The sanctity of the historical records at our command makes it probable that the key to the political events that occurred is to be found in the alliances and counter-alliances formed between these people, of which no mention is made. Thus the invasion of Shishak in Rehoboam's reign was not improbably the result of an alliance made with Jeroboam, who had previously formed an asylum in Egypt (1 Kings xii, 24, xiv, 25). Each of these monarchies sought and maintained connection with the neighboring kingdom of Syria, on which side Israel was particularly assailable (1 Kings xv, 19); but Asa ultimately succeeded in securing the active co-operation of Benhadad against Baasha (1 Kings xv, 16-20). Another policy, induced probably by the encroaching spirit of Syria, led to the formation of an alliance between the two kingdoms under Ahab and Jehoshaphat, which was maintained until the end of Ahab's dynasty; it occasionally extended to commercial operations (2 Chron. xx, 86). The alliance ceased in Jehu's reign; war broke out shortly after between Amaziah and Jophiel, and a coalition was formed between Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah on the one side, and Ahaz and Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, on the other (2 Kings xvi, 5-9). By this means an opening was afforded to the advances of the Assyrian power; and Jehoash and Joram, Sais (2 Kings xviii, 4); Hazekiah adopted the same policy in opposition to Senacherib (Isa. xxx, 2): in neither case was the alliance productive of much good—the Israelites were abandoned by So; it appears probable that his successor Sasis, who had offended the military caste, was unable to render Hazekiah any assistance; and it was on the contrary the influence of Egypt that threatened to confine their treaties to distant states, which were by no means likely ever to exercise that influence upon the religion of the people which was the chief object of dread. The most remarkable alliances of this kind in the whole Hebrew history are those which were concluded with Egypt. Josiah's attempt to take a part in the affairs of Western Asia. Judas claimed their friendly intervention in a negotiation then pending between the Jews and Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc. xi, 24 eq.); and two years after he sent ambassadors to the banks of the Tiber to propose a treaty of amity. But this treaty the Romans ostensibly threw over the Jews the broad shield of their dangerous protection, promising to assist them in their war, and forbidding any who were at peace with themselves to be at war with the Jews, or to assist directly or indirectly those who were so. The Jews, on their part, engaged to assist the Romans to the utmost of their power in any wars they might wage in those parts. The obligations of this treaty might be enlarged or diminished by the mutual consent of the contracting parties. This memorable treaty, having been concluded at Rome, was graven upon brass and deposited in the Capitol (1 Macc. xvi, 29; 2 Macc. vii, 12; other treaties with the Romans are given in lib. xiii.).

3. Rites by which they were ratified.—From the time of the patriarchs a covenant of alliance was sealed by the blood of some victim. A heifer, a goat, a ram, a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon were immolated in confirmation of the covenant between the Lord and Abraham (Gen. xv, 2). The animal or animals sacrificed were cut in pieces (except birds, ver. 10), to typify the doom of perjurers. Between the two parts the contracting parties passed, involving impreca tions of a similar destruction upon him who should break the terms of the alliance (Gen. xv, 10; cf. Lev. i, 24); hence the expression הַרְפָּאָה חָסֵל (ḥāšāl ḫēḇēʿ, ḫēḇēʿ istead jēḇēʿ), to make (lit. to cut) a treaty; hence, also, the use of the term ḫēḇēʿ (lit. imprecation) for a covenant. This usage often recurs in the prophets, and there are allusions to it in the New Testament (e.g. Lev. xi, 29; 2 Cor. xi, 23 (=ἰμπρεσία, ἱερά), to make (lit. to cut) a treaty; hence, also, the use of the term ἱερά (lit. imprecation) for a covenant. This usage often recurs in the prophets, and there are allusions to it in the New Testament (e.g. Lev. xi, 29; 2 Cor. xi, 23 (=ἰμπρεσία, ἱερά), to make (lit. to cut) a treaty; hence, also, the use of the term ἱερά (lit. imprecation) for a covenant.

2. Their Religious and Political Effects.—This intercourse with the heathen appears to have considerably weakened the sentiment of separation, which, in the case of the Hebr.ws, it was of the utmost importance to maintain. The disastrous consequences of even ALLOCTION (Lat. allocutio, i.e. an "address") is applied, in the language of the Vatican, to denote specially the address delivered by the pope at the College of Cardinals in a public consistory. The publication of the resolutions taken in the secret consistories is generally accompanied by an address in which the pope frequently the condition of the Roman Church in the various countries furnishes the subject for it. It may be considered as corresponding in some measure to the official explanations which constitutional ministers give when questions are asked in Parliament, or to the political messages of the French emperor. The Pontiff of Rome makes abundant use of this mode of address when it desires to guard a principle which it is compelled to give up in a particular case, or to reserve a claim for the future which has no chance of recognition in the present.—Wetzer and Welte, ii, 94. 5.

Allom (Ἀλλομίον, v. r. 'Allom'), one of the 'servvants of Solomon,' is described as having been said to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 84); but as the genuine text (Ezra ii, 57) has no such (nor the preceding) name, it is probably an error of copyists or editors for the appellative ἀλλομ, 'of others' (Fritzsche, Homil. in loc.), unless for ἀμων.

Allon ( Heb. Allon), יָלְנֵה,  אוק, as often, the name of a place and of a man. See also Allon-Bachuth; Oek.

2. A town on the border of Naphtali, according to the Auth. Vers., between Heleph and Zaanannim (Josh. xix, 83); but perhaps rather designating only some remarkable tree as a landmark near the latter place (Josephus [D] ἐναλλομιόν ἐν τῇ περιφέρειᾳ τοῦ Ἰσραήλ, and their border ran from Cheleph, thence from the oak that is by Zaanannim; Vulg. et copit terminus de Heliph, et Elom in Zaananim; Sept. et iugum quod est aorum Melioph καὶ Μαλυφ καὶ Ζαναννιρ, q. d. Allon-Zaan-amim, l. e. the oak of Zaanannim (since the enumeration in ver. 83 requires the union of these names as of one place), or 'the oak of the loading of tents,' as if deriving its name from some nomad tribe frequenting the spot (Stanley, Palest. p. 940 note). See Zaanam. Such a tribe were the Kenites, and in connection with them the place is again mentioned in Judg. iv, 11, with the additional definition of 'by Kedesh (Nap-tali). Here, however, the Auth. Vers. following the Vulgate, renders the words 'the plain of Zaanannim.'

In Josh. xix, 83, יָלוֹנ, Allon, is the reading of Y. d. Hooght, and of Walton's Polyglot; but most MSS. have יָלּוֹנ, Elom (Davidson's Heb. Text, p. 46). In Judg. iv, 11, the Targum Jonathan renders 'the plain of the swamp' (see Schwartz, Palest. p. 181). This is Ewald's explanation also (Gerch. Isr. ii, 492 note). For other interpretations, see Fürst (Heb. Handb. p. 91). In Gen. xxxvii, 8, the Sam. Version, according to its customary rendering of Allon, has יָלוֹנָה, יָלוֹנ, 'the plain of Bakith.' See more fully under ELON.

3. (Sept. 'Allon v. r. 'Alon.) The son of Jehediah and father of Shiphah, chief Simeonites, of the family of those who espoused the Hamites from the valley of Godol (1 Chron. iv. 37). B.C. apparently considerably earlier.

Allon-bachuth ( Heb. Allon-背叛uth, יָלוֹנְבַּאֵת, יָלוֹנְבַּא, oak of weeping; Sept. διαλοχος ξιδυου, a spot near Bethel, so designated from a tree under which Jacob encamped, and where Reuben's nurse Deborah was buried (Gen. xxxvi, 8). See OAK. From the comparative rarity of large trees in the plains of Palestine, they were naturally designated as landmarks, and became favorite places for residence and sepulture (Judg. vi, 11—19; 1 Sam. xi, 18). See ALLON. The particular tree in question is thought by some to have been a terebinth (q. v.), but scarcely the same under which Abraham sojourned (Gen. xviii, 1) [see MANIne], but perhaps the 'palm-tree of Deborah,' under which Deborah (q. v.) dwelt (Judg. iv, 5). So Ewald (Isr. Gesch. i, 342; 39) believes the 'oak of Tabor' (1 Sam. x, 3, Auth. Vers. 'plain of F.' ) to be the same as, or the successor of, this tree, 'Tabor' being possiibly a merely dialectical change from 'Deborah' (see also Stanley, Palest. p. 143, 220). See BAL-AMAR.

Allophyli (ἀλλοφυλοι), a Greek term which signifies properly strangers; but is generally taken (not only by the Septuagint, but by classical writers) to signify the Philistines (Reland, Palest. p. 41, 75, 76). See ALLON. 6.

All-saints Day, a festival celebrated by the Greek Church the week after the Whitsuntide, and by the Roman Catholics on the 1st of November, in honor of all saints and martyrs. Chrysostom (Hom. 74 de Martyriis) seems to indicate that it was known in the fourth century, and that it was celebrated on Trinity Sunday, called by the Greeks Κυριακή των δώρων (the Sunday of the Martyrs). It was introduced into the Western Church in the beginning of the seventh century by Boniface. The number of saints being excessively multiplied, it was found too burdensome to dedicate a feast-day to each, there being, indeed, scarcely born enough in the year to distribute among them all. It was therefore resolved to commemorate on one day all who had no particular days. By an order of Gregory IV, it was celebrated on the 1st of November, 834; formerly the 1st of May was the day appointed. It was introduced into England (where it is usually called 'All-hallows') about 670, and is still observed in the English Court of Western Churches, as well as in the Church of Rome, on 1st November, Hilig. De Omnium Sanctorum, in the Missel. Lips. i, 900 sq.; Farrar, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. b. lxx, ch. vii, § 14.

All-souls' Day, a festival held by Roman Cathoblics on the day after All-saints' Day, for special prayer in behalf of the souls of all the faithful dead. It was observed in 938, by Oddolin, abbot of Clugny, who enjoined it on his own order; it was soon adopted by neighboring churches. It is the day on which, in the Roman Church, extraordinary masses are repeated for the relief of souls said to be in purgatory. Formerly, on this day, persons dressed in black perambulated the towns and cities, each provided with a bell, a light, and a censer, which was rung by way of exhortation to the people to remember the souls in purgatory (Farrar, Eccl. Dictionary, s. v.). In some parts of the west of England it is still 'the custom for the village children to go round to all their neighbors soulsaying, as they call it—collecting small contributions, and singing the following verses, taken down from two of the children themselves:

Soul soul! for a soul cake;
Pray, good mistress, for a soul cake,
One for Peter, two for Paul,
Three for them who made us all.

Soul soul! for an apple or two;
If you've got no apples, pears will do,
Up with your kettle, and down with your pan;
Give me a good big one, and I'll be gone.

The soul-cake referred to in the verses is a sort of ban which, until lately, was an almost general custom for people to make, and to give to one another on the 2 nd of November. —Notes and Queries, 1st ser. vol. iv.

Allut, Jean, surmaned l'Eclairir (the Enlightenor), a pseudonym adopted by a French fanatic, who, at the beginning of the 18th century, attempted at London the establishment of a new sect. His real name was Élie Marion, and he was a native of Barre, a village in the vicinity of Montpellier. His apostles or associates were Nicolas Fatio, Jean Dandé, and Charles Portalis. His works, which are now very rare, are as follow:

1. Discours de la lumière, et de la vie de l'homme (Lond. 1710, 8vo).—2. Éclair de la lumière descendant des cieux, et du relèvement de la chasse de l'homme par son péché (without name of place, 1711, 8vo).—3. Plan de la justice de Dieu sur la terre dans ces derniers jours (1714, 8vo).—4. Quand vous aurez succombé, vous serez (1714, 8vo); the latter work is a collection of letters signed Allut, Marion, Fatio, and Portalis.—5. Avertis-

Allyn, John, D.D., a Unitarian minister, born in Barnstable, Mass., March 21, 1767. He graduated at Harvard 1786, and in 1788 became a Deacon in the Unitarian Church, which position he retained until his death, July 19, 1833. In 1820 he was the delegate from Duxbury in the Constitutional Convention of Massachusetts. He published several of his sermons and charges.—Sprague, Unitarian Pulpit, p. 207.

Almain, Jacques, a French theologian, was born at Sens, became professor in the college at Navarre, where he had studied under John Major, in 1612. He was one of the greatest theologians of his time, and a follower of Scotus and Occam. In 1611 he took his doctor's degree, and very shortly after was chosen by the faculty of theology to reply to the work of Cajetan, on the superiority of the pope to a general council. In 1615 he died, in the very prime of life. Among his works are: Auctoritate Ecclesiasticae auctoritatem, seu representationem, etc., contra Th. de Vio (Par. 1512, and in Gerson's works, Dupin's edition); De Potestate Ecclesiastica et laicai (an exposition of the decisions of Occam; in Gerson, and also in the edition of his works published at Paris in 1517); Merula (Paris, 1629, 8vo), Exerc. Almeida, Emmanuel, was born at Viseu, in Portugal, in 1580. He entered the order of Jesuits at the age of eighteen, and in 1622 was sent by Vitiellochi, the general of the order, as ambassador to Ethiopia, where he remained ten years, catechizing the people, and gaining a just insight into the African customs. He died at Goa in 1646, leaving collections for a Histoire de la haute Ethiopie, which Balthasar Teller arranged, augmented, and published at Colmbr, in 1660, in fol. He also wrote Lettres Historiques (Rome, 1632, 8vo), correcting the false statements of the Dominican, Usserius, concerning Ethiopia.—Hoef. Biog. Generale, ii, 181.

Almericans or Aumauricians, a short-lived sect of the thirteenth century, which derived its name from Amalric (Amalarie or Amauric, of Bena), a theologian whose doctrines (approaching to Pantheism) were prohibited and condemned at Paris by a public decree in the year 1294. The followers of Almeric, after his death, led by David of Dinanto (1294), carried his doctrines out to their full consequences. Respecting the Trinity, they held and taught that the power of the Father had continued only during the Mosaic dispensation, that of the Son twelve hundred years after his incarnation; and that in the thirteenth century the age of the Holy Ghost commenced, in which all sacraments and external worship were to be abolished, and the salvation of Christians was to be accomplished entirely by the internal operation of the Holy Spirit, without any external acts of religion. "Although an abstract speculative system was not calculated in that age to spread among the laity, yet, through the element of mysticism, these doctrines were diffused quite widely among the people. Books unsealing the system and its practical aims were written in French, and widely circulated. Pantheism, with all its practical consequences, was more plainly expressed than Amalric had probably ever intended or expected. The members of the sect were subject to be executed in which the incarnation of the Holy Ghost was begun. Cessarius of Heisterbach charges the sect with teaching that God had spoken in Ovid as well as in Augustin; that the only heaven and the only hell are in the present life; that those who pro-Almogàda, Francisco de, a Portuguese theologian, was born at Lisbon, July 31, 1701. He gained a great reputation as a writer on ecclesiastical law, and, on May 18, 1728, became a member of the Royal Academy. He wrote several learned works on the origin and ecclesiastical law of the churches of the Iberian Peninsula, the most important of which is entitled Aparatatio ad disciplinam e ritu ecclesiasticam de Portugal (Lisbon, 4 vol. 1735-37, 4to).—Hoef. B.C. post 2094. See Arabia. The ancient interpreters afforded no light as to the location of the tribe, either simply retaining the name (Sept., Vulg., Syr., Samar.), or giving fanciful etymological paraphrases (Sadd., Pseudo-.). Syncellus (p. 46) understands the inhabitants of India (1yvo3). Bochart (Phaleg, ii, 16) supposes the Almamians (Alyamnrones) of Toleme (vi, 7, 24) to be a people in the neighborhood of Felix, near the sources of the river Lar, which empties into the Persian Gulf. The early Arabic genealogies contain the name Modad (Al-im enim the Arabic article) as that of at least two kings of the Jordanian reigning in Hezaz (Cassian of Perceval, Esmé sur

ALMON

(1'Hist. des Arabes avant l'islamisme, i, 83 sq., 188, 194 sq.), one of whom is said to have married the daughter of Ishmael (Pococke, Specim. p. 80); while another named Mador was the grandson of Adnan (Pococke, p. 46; Ibn Cotulle, in Eichborn's Monum. Arabum, p. 68). Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 98) rejects both these names, as less likely than a corruption from Morad, the name of a tribe in the mountains of Arabia Felix near Zabid (see Abulfeda, Hist. Anteislamicum, p. 190, ed. Fleischer), so called from their progenitor, a son of Kahan, son of Baha, son of Jasteh, son of Jarash, son of Kachtan, i.e. Joktan (Pococke, Specim. p. 42, ed. White; Abulfeda, p. 478, ed. Do Sacy; Eichhorn, ut sup. p. 141; comp. generally Michaelis, Spicileg. ii, 153 sq.).

Al'mon (Heb. Almon', אַלְמוֹן, hidden; Sept. Ἠλαμών v. τ. Ἑλαμών), the last named of the four sac- erdotal cities of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xxi, 18), called Alemeth (q. v.) in the parallel passage (1 Chron. vi, 60), where it is named second of the three there mentioned; it is omitted in the general list of the Benjamite cities (Josh. xviii, 21-28). Jarchi and Kimchi, after the Targum of Jonathan, confound it with the Bahurim (q. v.) of 2 Sam. iii, 16. Schwartz (Pala- est. p. 129) says he discovered the ruins of ancient buildings bearing the name Al-Mud, which he regards as Al'mon. This is a hill one mile north-east of the site of Anathoth; doubtless the Al'mit similarly identified by Dr. Robinson (new ed. of Researches, iii, 287; comp. Tobler, Denkbücher, p. 631). See also ALMON-DILBATHA'IM.

Almond (גָּפָלָב, gafal, wakeful, from its early blossoming, comp. Pinn. xvi, 25, 42) occurs as the name of a tree in Eccles. xili, 5: “The almond-tree (Sept. ἀμύγδαλος, Vulg. amygdales) shall flourish, and the fruit of the caper (q. v.) droop, because man goeth to his long home.” This evidently refers to the profuse flowering and white appearance of the almond-tree when in full bloom, and before its leaves appear. It is hence adduced as illustrative of the hoary hairs of age (Thompson's Land and Book, i, 496). Gesenius, however, objects (Thes. Heb. p. 1472) that the blossoms of the almond are not white, but roseate, like the peach-blow; but see Knobel, Ewald, Hitzig, in loc. In Jer. i, 11, a “rod of an almond-tree” (Sept. καπίνος, Vulg. virgulus) is made an emblem of prompt vigilance and zeal, according to the inherent force of the original term (Henderson, Comment, in loc.). The produce of the tree is also denoted by the same term, evidently some species of nut, in Gen. xliii, 11 (Sept. קָפָלָב, Aquila and Symmachus ἄμυγδαλον), where Jacob desires his sons to take into Egypt of the best fruits of the land, almonds, etc. As the almond-tree is a native of Syria and Palestine, and extends from thence to Afghanistan, and does not appear to have been indigenous in Egypt, almonds were very likely to form part of a present from Jacob, even to the great men of Egypt; the more especially as the practice of the East is for people to present what they can afford in their respective stations. In Num. xvii, 8, the rod of Aaron is described as having “brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds” (Sept. ἀμύγδαλος). In Exod. xxv, 33, 54; xxxvii, 19 (comp. the derivative verb ἀμυγδαλέω) the bowls are directed to be made like almonds (Sept. αμύγδαλος). The form of the almond would lead to its selection for ornamental carved work, independently of its forming an esteemed esculent, as well as probably yielding a useful oil. See Nut.

The word ἠλαμ, luz, translated “hazel,” also occurs in Gen. xxx, 57, as the name of some tree, rods of which Jacob peeled and set before his ewes at the time of their conception; and was probably another term for the almond, of which the Arabic name is still luz (For- skal, Flora Æg. p. 67). Some think this was the wild almond, while shaked designates the cultivated variety (Rosenmüller, Athr., iv, 1, 263 sq.). See HAZEL.

The almond-tree very closely resembles the peach-tree both in form, blossoms, and fruit; the last, however, being destitute of the pulpy flesh covering the peach-nut. It is, in fact, only another species of the same genus (Amygdalus communis, Linn.). It is a native of Asia and Africa, but it may be cultivated in the south of Europe, and the hardier varieties even in the milder portions of the United States. The flowers appear as early as Feb- ruary (Thompson, Land and Book, i, 490), or even January (Thompson, i, 492, comp. Bahl, Calend. Palest. p. 5 sq.; Schubert, Reis. iii, 114), the fruit in March (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palest.).

Helmondilbathaim), the fifty-first station of the Israelites [see EXODE] between Dibongad and the well (Beir) in the wilderness east of the Dead Sea (Num. xxxiii, 46, 47); probably the same elsewhere called BETH-DILBAITHAIM (Jer. xlvii, 22) and DIBLATHAIM ( Ezek. vi, 14). See DILBATHAIM. It appears to have been a fertile spot not far south of Dibon-gad, perhaps on the edge of the eminence overlooking the Wady Waleh. See DIBON-GAD.

Almoner is the name given originally to that member of a religious order who had the distribution of the money and other things set apart for alms, which, by canonical law, was to amount to at least a tenth of the revenues of the establishment. Afterward, these ecclesiastics also received this name who were appointed by princes to the same office in their households. The Grand Almoner of France was one of the principal officers of the court and of the kingdom, usually a cardinal, and, in right of his office, commander of all the orders, and also chief director of the great houses for the blind. Queens, princes, and princesses had also their almshouses and leprosaria, usually appointed to this office. In England the office of almoner is now a sinecure, his only duty being to distribute the coronation medals among the assembled spectators. The lord high almoner, who is usually a Bishop, distributes twice a year the queen's bounty, and consists in giving a certain sum of money to as many poor persons as the queen is years of age.

Alms (δανεούμενα, mercifulness, i.e. an act of charity, Matt. vi. 1–4; Luke xi. 42; xii. 38; Acts iii. 2, 3, 10; x. 4, 51; xxiv. 17; almsgoods, Acts ix. 36), beneficence toward the poor, from Anglo-Saxon almsce, probably, as well as Germ. almoen, from the corresponding Greek word λαμπραῖα; Vulg. eleemosyna (but see Bosworth, Anglo-Saxon Dict.). The word "alms" is not found in our version of the canonical books of the O.T., but it occurs repeatedly in the N.T., and in the Apocryphal books of Tobit and Ecclesiasticus. The Heb. שְׁמַעְתָּם, tekek slah, righteousness, the usual equivalent for alms in the O.T., is rendered by the Sept. as δικαιοσύνα (Tobit, xlii. 15), meaning moral virtue, while the best MSS., with the Vulg. and Rheim. Test., read in Matt. vi. 1, δανεούμενα, righteousness. See Poen.

I. Jewish Alms-giving.—The regulations of the Moslem law respecting property, and the enjoining of a general spirit of tender-heartedness, sought to prevent destitution and its evil consequences. The law in this matter is summed up in Deut. xv. 2, 10. "And if any of thy brother be wont to go forth out of the land of Egypt to give thee the land of Canaan, and to be thy God." The spirit of the Hebrew legislator on this point is forcibly exhibited in Deut. xv, 7 sq.: "If there be among you a poor man thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him. Beware that thine eye be not evil against thy poor brother in the land of Egypt to give him hunger and to cast him into the land against thee, and it be sin unto thee. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works." The great antiquity of the practice of beneficence toward the poor is shown in Job xxix. 13 sq. How high the esteem in which this virtue continued to be held in the time of the Hebrew monarchy may be learnt from Psa. xlii, 1: "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will remember him in time of trouble" (comp. Psa. cxii, 9; Prov. xiv. 31). The practice of almsgiving brings with it the oppression of the poor, which the prophets, after their manner, faithfully reproved (Isa. lvii. 9; where, among other neglected duties, the Israelites are required to deal their bread to the hungry, and to bring the outcast poor to their house (comp. Isa. x. 2; Amos ii. 7; Jer. v. 29; Ezek. xxiii. 25). However favorable to the poor the law was, the additional law against them in Matt. vi. 2, has not yet been fully explained, on account of the obscurity of the expression "do not sound a trumpet before thee" (μὴ σαλπίσης οὐκ οὖν), which can hardly refer to the modern Oriental practice (Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 181) of beggars (as in some parts of Switzerland). Such an extreme practice as this, indeed, since in that case the "trumpeting" would not proceed from the donor, nor would he be bowdled in fault. The language conveys the idea that the Pharisees as-seemed the poor in the synagogues and streets by the sound of a trumpet, which naturally attracted also spectators thither; but this custom would be too ceremonious to be probable, because it would require these individuals to have an attendant with a trumpet, as they could not well have blown it themselves. But the worship of Christ has been kept holy and inviolate, even in the audience-room, at least during divine service, but only the porch or immediate vicinity of the edifice. On the whole, the expression "sound a trumpet" may more easily be interpreted metaphorically (with the Church fathers, also Grotius, Frölich, Tholuck, and others) than literally, in a formal sense. "From you, I. e. we do not proclaim your liberality in a noisy manner. See generally Aster, De Ecclesiis Judaeorum (Lips. 1728); Maimonides, De Jure Paukerii, vii, 10; ix, 1, 6; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. iv, 371; Lightfoot, Horae Hebr. on Matt. vi, 2, and Deacr. Temp. 15; and comp. Smith’s Dict. of Class. Antiq. a. v. Tuba. See Offering (2); Tithe (2); Temple. II. Apostolical. The general spirit of Christianity, in regard tosuborning the needy, is nowhere better seen than in 1 John iii, 17: "Who hath this world’s good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" 1 Peter iv, 11 says, "As every man hath received grace, let him use it." Observe the observance of the "royal law" of love, particular manifestations of mercy to the poor seem to be left by Christianity to be determined by time, place, and circumstances; and it cannot be supposed that a religion, one of whose principles is that, if any would work, neither should he eat" (3 Thess. iii, 10), can give any sanction to indiscriminate alms-giving, or intend to encourage the crowd of wandering, idle beggars with which some parts of the world are still infested. The emphatic language employed by the Lord Jesus Christ and others (Luke iii, 11; vi, 30; xx, 38; Mark vii, 37, in this text, and Gal. ii, 1; and Goth. 1877); xii, 33; Matt. vi, 1; Acts ix, 37; x, 2, 4) is designed to enforce the general duty of a merciful and practical regard to the distresses of the indigent—a duty which all history shows men have been lamentably prone to neglect; while the absence of ostentation and even secrecy, which the Saviour explained in connexion with almsgiving, was intended to correct actual abuses, and bring the practice into harmony with the spirit of the Gospel. In the inimitable reflections of Jesus on the widow’s mite (Mark xii, 42) is found a principle of great value, to the effect that the magnitude of men’s offerings to God is to depend upon the freewill disposition in which they proceed; a principle which cuts up by the very root the idea that merit attaches itself to alms-giving as such, and increases in proportion to the number and costliness of our almsdeeds. Accordingly, we find that the duty of relieving the poor was not neglected by the early Christians (Luke xiv, 13; Acts xx, 35; Gal. ii, 10). Every individual was exhorted to lay by on the Sunday in each week some portion of his profits, to be applied to the wants of the needy (Acts xi, 30; Rom. xv. 25-27; 1 Cor. xvi, 1-4). It was also considered a duty specially incumbent on the churches to devote themselves to such ministrations (1 Tim. v, 10). One of the earliest effects of the working of Christianity in the hearts of its professors was the care which it led them to take of the poor and indigent in the "household of faith." Neglected and despised by the world, cut off from its sympathies, and denied any succor it might have, the churches, so far as the necessities of other though distant communities (Acts xi, 29; xxiv, 17; 2 Cor. ix, 12). This commendable practice seems to have had its Christian origin in the deeply interesting fact (which appears from John xiii, 29) that the Saviour and his attendants were wont, notwithstanding their own comparative poverty, to contribute out of their small resources something for the relief of the needy. See generally Gude, Ecclesia et Antiqua Sacra (Lauban, 1728).—Winer, i, 46; Kitto, s. v.; Smith, a. v. III. Ecclesiastical Alms-giving. In the early ages of Christianity there was no especial almsgiving known into four portions; one of which was allotted to the bishops, another to the priests, a third to the deacons and sub-deacons, which made their whole subsistence, and a fourth part was employed in relieving the poor and in repairing churches. These alms were given to the poor in their own country, from and at will. The reasons assigned for this practice by Chrysostom indicate on his part a very defective view of Gospel truth. He says, "For this reason our forefathers appointed the poor to stand before the door of our churches, that the sight of them might provoke the most backward and inhuman soul to compassion. And as, by law and custom, we have fountains before our oratories, that they who go in to worship God may first wash their hands, and so lift them up in prayer, so our ancestors, instead of fountains and cisterns, placed the poor before the door of the church, that, as we wash our hands in water, we should cleanse our souls by almsgiving; and that almsgiving may rather offer up our prayers. For water is not more adapted to wash away the spots of the body than the power of almsdeeds is to cleanse the soul. As, therefore, you dare not go in to pray with unwashed hands, though this be but a small offence, so neither should you without alms ever enter the church for prayer" (Hom. xxv, de urch. Apos.). The period of Lent was particularly fruitful in alms. During the last week Chrysostom enjoins a more liberal distribution than usual of alms to the poor, and the exercise of all kinds of charity. The reason he assigns is, the nearer men come to the Lord's Supper and the expectation of Christ's coming, by which all the blessings of the world were poured forth on men, the more they should feel themselves obliged to show all manner of acts of mercy and kindness toward their brethren (Bingham, bk. xxi, ch. x, § 25). At the time of marriage, as a substitute for the old Roman practice of throwing about nuts, the early Christians were accustomed to distribute nuts to the poor and to children. The distribution of alms at funerals was associated with the unscriptural practice of praying for the dead. In one of Chrysostom's "Homilies," he says, "if many barbarous nations burn their goods together with their dead, how much more reasonable is it for you to give your child his goods when he is dead! Not to reduce them to ashes, but to make him the more glorious; if he be a sinner, to procure him pardon; if righteous, to add to his reward and retribution." In several of the fathers almsgiving is recommended as meritorious; and the work of Romish teaching on the subject of salvation by the merit of good works may be clearly found in them.—Bingham, Orig. Ecc. xiiii, viii, § 14; Coleman, Anc. Christianity, ch. iv, § 8; Höding, Lehr d. alt. Kirche v. Opfer. See Almone. The order in the Church of England is, that alms should be distributed at that part of the community service which is called the offertory, while the sentences are reading which follow the place appointed for the sermon. In the Methodist Episcopal Church alms are collected at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper and at the love-feast. On the Christian duty of almsgiving see Taylor, Holy Living and Dying, ch. iv, § 8; Saurin, Sermons (Serm. ix); Barrow's Sermon on Bounty to the Poor (Works, ii, 69); Wayland's Moral Science, p. 576 sq. Almug (Heb. only in the plural almugim', אַלְמוּֽגִים, according to Bohlen, from the Sanscrit nācita, a similar wood, al-being the Arab. article, 1 Kings x, 11, 12; Sept. as ζύξα ρα πεσίναρι, Vulg. ζύξα, Νεσίνα, Anth. Vers. “almond-trees”), a kind of precious wood brought along with gold and precious stones from Ophir by the nave of Hiram in the time of Solomon, and employed by him for the ornaments of the temple and palace, as well as for making musical instruments (1 Kings x, 11, 12), and previously unknown to the Israelites (2 Chron. ix, 10, 11), although it is stated to have been also procured from Lebanon (2 Chron. ii, 8). The Sept. translators of Kings understood “laurus wood” to be meant, but in Chron. it is rendered “pine wood,” as by the Vulg. in one passage, although elsewhere “thyine-wood” (comp. Rev. xviii, 12), or citron-wood. See THTINE. Its occurrence in 2 Chron. ii, 8 (whence the inference that it was a species of πισιναρι, see Bibl. Dec. lignis ex Lulambis petitis, in the Museum Hagani. iv, 1 sq., or cedar, as Alwand tells) among the trees exported from Lebanon (comp. its occurrence in the parallel passage 1 Kings v, 8) is probably an interpolation (Rosenmühl-er, Bibl. bot. p. 246), since it would not in that case have afterward become unknown (1 Kings x, 12). Dr. Shaw supposes it to have been the cypress, because the wood of that tree is still used in Italy and elsewhere for vines, arches, stringed instrumaments. Hiller (Hierophyt. xiii, § 7) supposes a gummy or resinous wood to be meant, but this would be unfit for the uses to which the almug-tree is said to have been applied. Josephus (Ant. viii, 7, 1) describes the wood as that of a kind of pine, which he distinguishes from the pine of his own days. Many of the rabbis (e.g. R. Tanach) understand pereis, for which the wood in the sing. (almug, אַלְמוּֽג) occurs in the Talmud (Mishnah, Kelim, xiii, 6; comp. Maimon-des and Bartinora, in loc.) but these are not a wood (AÎM), and are obtained from the Red and Mediterranear seas, whence they are even exported to India (Pliny, xxxii, 2); so that we must probably understand the Talmudists as only referring to the red or coriæse hue of the wood. The interpretation of Kimbhi (Targ. on Ps. lxxiv, 16. in loc. 2 Chron. v) is that it was a red dyer-wood, called albeccum in Arabic, and commonly Brasil-wood (Abulfed and Edrisi, ap. Celsius), has been followed by most moderns since Celsus (Hierop-hot. i, 171 sq.), who refer it to the sandalwood-common (in Sanscrit, roda), a view which is corroborated by the position of Ophir (q. v.), probably southward and eastward of the Red Sea, in some part of India (Pict. Eblite, ii, 249-266), whence alone the associated products, such as gold, precious stones, ivory,
peacocks, apes, and tin, could have been procured.
Among those, however, who have been in favor of sandal-wood, many have confounded with the true and far-famed kind what is called “red sandal-wood,”
the product of Pterocarpus santalinus, as well as of Adansonnaria paranoma (Beckmann, Warrenkunde, ii, i, 112 sq.; Wahl, Ostindien, ii, 802; Faber, Archäologiene, p. 374). But the most common sandal-wood is that which is best known and most highly esteemed in India and Persian gulf, a native of the mountainous parts of the coast of Malarbar, where large quantities are cut for export to China, to different parts of India, and to the Persian and Arabian gulf. The outer parts of this tree are white and without odor; the parts near the root are most fragrant, especially of such trees as grow in hilly situations and stony ground. The trees vary in diamo-ter from 9 inches to a foot, and are about 25 or 80 feet in height, but the stems soon begin to branch. This wood is white, fine-grained, and agreeably fragrant,
and is much employed for making rosaries, fans, ele-geous boxes, and cabinets. The Chinese use it also as incense both in their temples and private houses, and burn long slender candles formed by covering the ends of sticks with its sawdust mixed with rice-paste.
As sandal-wood has been famed in the East from very early times, it is more likely than any other to have attracted the notice of, and been desired by, more northern nations. We do not, however, trace it by its present or any similar name at a very early period
in the writings of Greek authors; it may, however,
been confounded with agila-wood, or saqalloum,
which, like it, is a fragrant wood and used as incense.
See ALOE. Sandal-wood is mentioned in early Sanscrit works, and also in those of the Arabs. Actuarius is the earliest Greek author that expressly notices it,
but he does so as if it had been familiarly known.
In the Periplus of Arrian it is mentioned as one of the articles of commerce obtainable at Omanca, in Gedrosia, by the name ξύλα σαγάλλων, which Dr. Vincent remarks may easily have been corrupted from σαζάλα-
να. As it was produced on the Malabar coast, it could readily be obtained by the merchants who convoyed the cinnamon of Ceylon and other Indian prod-

A'λανθαν (Ἀλανθάν v. r. Ἀλανθάν), one of the popular chiefs at the return from Babylon (1 Esdr.
vi, 16; evidently the first Ἐλανθάν (q. v.) of the parallel text (Ezra viii, 44).

Aloe, ALOE, or LIGN-ALOE, an Oriental tree, having a fragrant wood, but entirely different from the plant from which the bitter resin aloe is obtained, used in medicine. The Hebrew words ahalim' and ahaloth (עָהלִים, עָהלָה) occur in Ps. xlv, 8, “All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes (Sept. στατήρι), and cassia,” Prov. vii, 17, “I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, with cinnamon and aloes” (Sept. onitis).
Cant. iv, 14, “Spikenard and safron, calamus and combination, with all trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes (Sept. άλανθαν), with all the chief spices.”
From the articles which are associated with them (both names indicating the same thing), it is evident that it was some odoriferous substance probably well known in ancient times. See AROMATICS.

This tree or wood was called by the Greeks ἀγάλ-λογος, and later Ξαλλιάν (Dioscor. i, 21), and has been known to moderns by the names of aloes-wood, paradise-wood, eagle-wood, etc. Modern botanists distinguish two kinds; the one genuine and most precious, the other more common and inferior (Alma-lie, Materia Indica, i, 479 sq.). The former (Cymome-tra agallocha, or the Aquilaria ovata of Linn.) grows in Cochin-China, Siam, and China, is never exported, and is of so great rarity in India itself as to be worth its weight in gold (Martius, Lehrbuch der Pharmacog-nosie, p. 88 sq.). Pieces of this wood that are resinous, of a dark color, heavy, and perforated as if by worms, are called calamba; the tree itself is called by the Chinese sik-biak. It is represented as large, with an erect trunk and lofty branches. The other or more common species is called garo in the East In-Indies, and is the wood of a tree growing in the Moluccas, the Exsiccaria agallocha of Linknuss (Oken, Leibr.
d. Naturg., II, ii, 609 sq.; Lindley, Flora Med. p. 190 sq.). The leaves are like those of a pear-tree;
and it has a milky juice, which, as the tree grows old, hardens into a fragrant resin. The trunk is knotty, crooked, and usually hollow (see Gildemeister, De Re-bus Indicis, fasc. i, 65). The domestic name in India is aghil (Sanscrit, agaru); whence the Europeans who first visited India gave it the name of agnum aquila, or eagle-wood. From this the Hebrew name seems also to be derived (Genesis, Thes. Heb. p. 88), while the Vulgate, in Numb. xxiv, 6, has translated, "As tents which the Lord hath spread"; instead of "As aloe-trees which the Lord hath planted"—in our version, " lign-aloes." Aloe-wood is said by Herodotus to have been used by the Egyptians for embalming dead bodies; and Nicodemos brought it, mingled with myrrh, to embalm the body of our Lord (John xix, 39). By others, however, the aloe (αλοι) with which Christ's body was embalmed is thought to have been an extract from a different plant, the prickly shrub known among us by that name (Penny Cyclopædia,
s. v. Agave). Some, again, consider the lign-aloe of the Old Testament to be a different East-Indian tree
from the above, namely, the Aquilaria agallocha, but whether it be the same with the more precious

Branch of Eagle-wood.

variety above spoken of is uncertain (Celius, Hierobot. i, 135). An inferior kind of aloe is also said to be obtained from the Aquilaria Malaccensis (Rumphius, Herbar. Amb. i, 29 sq.). The aloe of the ancients was procured from Arabia and India (Salma-sius, Exerc. ad Plin. ii, 1604 sq.). It is still highly prized as an article of luxury in the East (Harmar, Gloss. ii, 149; Kiepert, Aeg. p. 204; Burckhardt,
Arabien, i, 216; Hartmann, Hebr. i, 315 sq.; Lamarck, Enc. Meth. i, 422-429; Roxburgh, Flora Ind. ii, 428).
The plant which has the reputation of producing the best aloes of modern shops is the Aloë Socotrana, a native of the Cape of Good Hope and the island of Socotra, but now commonly cultivated in the West Indies. The resin is obtained by inspissation from the juice of the leaves (Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.
Aloe). See BOTANY, and comp. LIGN-ALOE.

Alógì or Alogian (α λογία, denying the Logos; or from α λογία, unreasonable), a sect
of heretics in the second century, who wereardon
ponents of the Montanists. According to Epiphanius
(Her. 51) they denied that Jesus Christ was the Logos, and did not receive either the Gospel according to John or the Apocalypse, both of which they ascribed to the Gnostic Cerinthus. Lardner doubts their existence. It does appear, however, that certain opponents of the Montanists not only denied the prophetic gifts claimed by these heretics, but began also to reject from the creed all those things out of which the error of the Montanists had sprung; hence they denied the continuance of the gifts of the Holy Ghost
in the Church; and from thus rejecting the doctrines of the Logos, so clearly taught in the earlier part of the Gospel, they acquired their name. They are said to owe their origin to Theoclotus of Byzantium, a carrier. See Euseb. Ch. Hist. v, 28; Lardner, Works, iv, 190; vii, 627; Heinichen, De Alogia, etc. (Lips.
1829); Neander, Ch. Hist. i, 526, 588.

Alombrados (prop. Alumbrados, i. e. enlightened), a mystic sect in Spain since 1575, who considered neither the sacraments nor good works necessary, and rejected the ministerial office. They were exterminated in Spain by the Inquisition in 1623. A part of them emigrated to France, where they were likewise suppressed by royal order in 1655. See ILLUMINATI.

Aloyatus (or Louia) of Gonzaga, a saint of the Roman calendar, born in Castiglione, 1568, noted in his youth for devotion and severity, entered the order of Jesuits 1567. In 1591, during an epidemic at Rome, he distinguished himself by labors and sacrifices, and finally fell a victim to the pestilence. He is commemorated 1726 by Benedict XIII, and is commemorated in the Roman Church June 21.—Butler, Lives of Saints,

A'lmar or A', the first letter in almost all alphabets.
In Hebrew it is called aleph (א), which signiifies ox, from the shape of it in the old Phoenician alphabets, where it somewhat resembles the head and hooves of that animal (Plutarch, Quast. Sympos. ix, 2; Gesen. Theol. Heb. p. 1). The following figures illustrate the steps by which this letter reached its form in various languages. See ALPHABET. Its pro-
dominant sound in nearly all languages is very simple,
being little more than a mere opening of the mouth
as in ah! In Hebrew, however, it is treated in gram-monograms, which occur on the catacombs of Melos (Ross, Reisen auf d. Inseln d. ägäischen Meeres, iii, 149) and Naples (Aginc. Pict. xi, 9), and in the cemeteries of Rome (Mamachi Orig. et antiqu. Christ. iii, 75), as well as on coins and inscriptions anywhere.

\[ A \rightarrow \Theta \quad \alpha \rightarrow \omega \quad \pi \rightarrow \rho \]

Early Christian Symbols, containing the Greek letters A and \( \Theta \), with the cross or the sign XP (or XPIA).

They are sometimes enclosed in a circle. See Beyschlag, De sigillo nominis Dei nominis (Viteb. 1692); Ewald, De a et \( \Theta \) nomine Chr. mystico, in his Embl. ii, 169 sq.; Pfeiffer, De a et \( \Theta \) (Regiom. 1677); Rüdiger, De Christo per primum (\( \pi \nu \nu \nu \mu \nu \nu \nu \) et ultimum (\( \alpha \nu \upsilon \nu \) S.S. vocem indicato (Gloss. 1724). See OMEGA.

Alphabet (from the first two Greek letters, alpha and beta), the series of characters employed in writing any language. The origin of such written signs is unknown, having been ascribed to some to Adam and other antediluvians (Bangl. Exercitationes de ortu et progressu literarum, Hafniae, 1657, p. 99 sq.), and lately to an astronomical observation of the relative position of the planets in the zodiac by Noah at the deluge (Seffarth, Uner Alphabet ein Abbild des Thierkreises, Leips. 1854). See LANGUAGE.

The earliest and surest data, however, on which any sound speculation on this subject can be based, are found in the genuine paleographical monuments of the Phoenicians; in the manifest derivation of all other Syro-Arabian and almost all European characters from that type, and in the testimony which history bears to the use and transmission of alphabetical writing (Carpzov, Crit. Sacr. p. 227; Kopp, Bilder und Schriften der Vorzeit, Mannh. 1819; and especially Gesenius, Scripturae linguae Phinicae monumenta, Lips. 1887). See WRITING.

There are only three nations which can compete for the honor of the discovery, or rather the use and transmission of letters—the Babylonians, the Phoinicians, and the Egyptians. The chief arguments in favor of the first (Kopp, Bilder und Schriften, ii, 147; Hoffmann, Gram. Syr. p. 63) are based on the very early civilization of Babylon; on numerous passages which attribute the discovery to the \( \Sigma \nu \omega \), Syri, and modern European, as represented by the three forms of character employed in this work, namely, the Hebrew, Greek, and English, to which all the others bear a well-known and mostly obvious relation. The sounds attributed to them respectively, however, were in many cases different. Another and more fundamental variation arises from the fact that in the Hebrew all the letters are regarded as consonants, the vowels being designated by certain additional marks called "points," of late invention. See Hebrew Language. For a view of the printed characters of all languages with their powers, see Ballhorn, Alphabet orientalischer und occidentalischer Sprachen (Leips. and Lond., 1890). This (and still more the above) classification must be understood as applying only to the written symbols, and not to the etymological affinities of languages, which depend upon national derivation. See Etymology.

Alphabetus (Ἀλφατος), the name of two men. 1. The putative father of James the Lees (Matt. x, 8; Mark iii, 18; Luke vi, 15; Acts i, 13), and husband of Mary, the sister-in-law of our Lord's mother (John xix, 20) (see Mary); for which reason James is called "the Lord's brother" (Gal. i, 19). See James. A.D. ante 26. It seems that he was a (perhaps elder) brother of Joseph, to whom, on his death without issue, his widow was married according to the Levirate Law (q. v.). By comparing John xix, 25, with Luke xxiv, 10, and Matt. x, 3, it appears that Alphabetus is the Greek, and Cleophas or Cleopus (q. v.) the Hebrew or Syriac name of the same person, according to the custom of the provinces or of the time, when men had often two names, by one of which they were known to their friends and countrymen, and by the other to the Romans or strangers. More probably, however, the double name in Greek arises, in this instance, from a diversity in pronouncing the η in his Latin name, "Paulo" (calaphy, &c.), as in the Talmudists, Lightfoot, ad Acta, i, 13), a diversity which is common also in the Septuagint (Koönig, Comment. on John xix, 25). See Name. Or rather, perhaps, Cænas was a Greek name adopted out of resemblance to the Jewish form of Aphonos (like "Paul" for "Saul"), if, indeed, the former be not the original from which the latter was derived by corruption.

Aphonos or Elphecus, archbishop of Canterbury, distinguished for humility and piety. He was infected with the views of the sect, and took the habit in the monastery of the Benedictines, and afterward shut himself up in a cell at Bath. Here he remained until the see of Winchester being vacated by the death of Ethelwold, Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, called him to the vacant bishopric. In 1066 he was restored to the see of Canterbury. As he had governed this metropolitan see some years, the Danes made an irruption into the city, burned the cathedral, and having put to death upwards of seven thousand of the inhabitants, seized the archbishop, whom they kept in bonds seven months, and then murdered; this was on the 10th April, 1012. God, however, so protected that the murderers did not escape the penalty of their sacrilegious act, scarcely one in the whole Danish army escaping. —Coll. Eccles. Hist. ii, 487-498.

Alphonse, a Jewish theologian, was born at Hanau, May 23, 1663; studied at Frankfort and Leyden; became pastor at Wormond, and afterward at Amsterdam; and finally, in 1715, professor of theology at Utrecht, which office he held until his death at Utrecht, Nov. 7, 1742. His principal work is Specimen Animologiae, in Epist. Pauli (Utrecht, 1742, 2 vols. 4to).—Drakenbronk, Oratio Funeraria in Alphonse (Utrecht, 1743); Hoefer, Biog. Gener. i, 410.

Alpheratz, a star in the constellation of Pegasus, was once considered as the dwelling-place of the chief god of the Chaldeans, Anu. This star was made to symbolize Anu by the Egyptians, and was accordingly identified with one of the principal deities of their system.

Alphtamiony, a kind of divination (q. v.) performed with barley, first among the pagans, and from them introduced among Christians. A person suspected of crime was brought before a priest, who made him swallow a piece of barley-cake; if this did not come without difficulty, he was declared to be innocent; otherwise, not.—Delrio, Disq. Magie, lib. iv, cap. 11; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Alphonso de Alcalá (in Latin Alphonsus Comte de Alcalá), a Spanish rabbi, was a native of Alcalá de Henares, and lived in the beginning of the 16th century. He embraced Christianity, and was employed by Cardinal Ximenes in the revisal of the celebrated Polycrat. —Wolff, Bibl. Hebr. i, 198.

Alsted, Johann Heinrich, a German Protestant divine, born in 1588 at Herborn, in Nassau, professor of philosophy and theology in his native town, and subsequently at Weissembourg, in Transylvania, where he died in 1638. He represented the Reformed Church of Nassau at the Synod of Dort. Among his numerous works may be mentioned, Tractatus de Melle Anna (1618; a treatise on the Millennialium, which appeared at Amsterdam); Encyclopaedia Bibliica (Francof. 1602, 1642), in which he attempts to prove that the principles and materials of all the arts and sciences should be sought for in the Scriptures. He wrote also a general Encyclopaedia (Lyons, 1649, 4 vols. fol.), and other works, of which a list may be found in Nicomai, Memoires, t. xli.

Altana (Ἀλτανά, prob. for Μαρτανᾶ), one of the "sons" of Asom (or Hashum), who divorced his Gentile wife after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 83); evidently the Mattanai (q. v.) of the genuine text ( Ezra x, 83).

Altar (Ἀλτήρ, misbêd 'āch, from 'al, to stay in sacrifice; בְּשֵׁכל, a structure on which sacrifices of any kind are offered. In ancient times this was always done by slaughter or by fire. The term is borrowed in modern times to signify a table or other erection in a church on which the sacraments are administered, or near which prayer is offered and other religious exercises performed (comp. Heb. xii, 10). They were originally of earth (Exod. xx, 21; comp. Lucan. ix, 998; Horace. Odára iii, 8, 4; Ovid, Amáns, iv, 752; Trist. v, 5, 9; Pliny, v, 4) or unwrought stone (Exod. xx, 25), erected on such spots as had been early held sacred (Gen. xii, 7 sq.; xiii, 18; xxv, 23-26, xxxv, 1; Exod. xvii, 10; xxxiv, 4 sq.), especially hill-tops and eminences (Gen. xxii, 9; Ezek. xviii, 21; comp. Hebr. viii, 13; xxvi, 171; Apollon. Rhod. 524; Ixvy, xxxi, 38; Philostr. Apol. ii, 2), also house-tops (2 Kings xxii, 12), as being nearer the sky (Tact. Antiq. xiii, 57; Philostr. Apol. ii, 5), occasionally under remarkable trees (2 Kings vi, 4). See Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Arā; Selden, Synods. iii, 269 sqq.; John, Arcádua. pt. iii, c. 2, 5; Bähr, Symbolik, i, 126 sqq.; Lakesamar, Aneg. s. v.). The stone altars erected at the true God (Josh. vii, 31; 1 Kings xix, 31; 1 Sam. vi, 14) were indicated by the Gentiles, as appears from the Pau- sanias (vi, 182), where he mentions "an altar of white stone," and Apollonius Rhodius, in speaking of the temple of Mars (Argonaut. i, 528). The Altars were generally erected at the gates of the city (2 Kings xxii, 13). We may refer to this Acts xiv, 13, where the priest of Jupiter is said to have brought filled oxen to the gates to perform sacrifice. An altar, both among the Jews and the heathen, was an asylum, a sanctuary, for such persons as fled to it for refuge (Exod. xxii, 14; 1 Kings i, 50; ii, 28, etc.). As to the practice of the heathen in this respect, all the Greek writers are more or less copious. See Horns.

Heb. xili, 10, "We have an altar," etc., Macknight explains thus: "Here, by a usual metaphor, the altar is put for the sacrifice, as is plain from the apostle's adding 'of which they have no right to partake' in the sacrifice which Christ offered for the sins of the world; and the eating of it does not mean corporeal eating, but the partaking of the pardon which Christ, by that sacrifice, had procured for sinners" (comp. Olschnau- sen, Comment. in loc.). See LORD'S SUPPER.

One wooden table was wont to be placed in the midst of every meeting-place of the primitive Christians, upon which each of them laid what he bestowed for the use of the poor, as we are informed by Theodoret (v. 18; see Heb. xiii, 16); and because alms are noted with the name of sacrifice, that table upon which they were laid was called by the ancient Christians an altar. Compare Sacrifice.

Druidical Circle in the Isle of Jersey.

I. Pagan.—There is a strong probability that some of those ancient monuments of unhewn stone, usually called Druidical remains, which are found in all parts of the world, were derived from the altars of primitive times. See Stone. These are various in their forms, and their peculiar uses have been very much disputed. (See Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Avebury, Carnac, Stonehenge.) Dr. Kitto has elaborately examined the subject (Pict. Hist. of Palæst. append. to bk. iii, ch. iii and iv), and comes to the conclusion that the cromlechs are representatives of ancient altars, while the kastrons, or stones disposed in a chest-like form, are analogous to the arks of Jewish and Egyptian worship [see Ark], and are remnants of the so-called arkite traditions. See Flood. Cromlechs are somewhat in the form of a table; one large stone being supported in a horizontal or slightly inclined position upon three or more, but usually three stones, set upright. That they were used as altars is almost instinctively suggested to every one that views them; and this conclusion is strengthened when, as is often the case, we observe a small circular hole through which probably the rope was run by which the victims, when slaughtered, were bound to the altar, as they were to the angular projections or “horns” of the Jewish altar (Psa. cxliv. 27). It was natural that when a sufficiency of large stones could not be found, heaps of smaller ones should be employed, and that, when practicable, a large flat stone would be placed on the top, to give a proper level for the fire and the sacrifice. Such are the caims of altar-like form, many of which still remain; but as they are sometimes found in places where stones of large size might have been obtained, it seems that in later times such altars had a special appropriation; and Toland shows (Hist. of Brit. Druids, p. 101) that the sacred fires were burned on them, and sacrifice offered to Bel, Baal, or the Sun. In many instances, as at Stonehenge, a circle of stones is ranged around a central one in an amphitheatral manner, an arrangement which has been found to take place likewise even in Persia, as at Darab (Ouseley’s Travels, ii, 121). Caesar refers to such consecrated circles for national deliberation among the Gauls (Bell. Gall. vi), and Homer alludes to Grecian councils held within circles of stones (Il. xvi, 585; comp. Od. viii, 5). The following, figured from Ouseley (Travels in Persia, ii, 80–83), was called by the natives “Stone of the Fire Temple,” and is surrounded by a low wall. It is ten or eleven feet high, and about three square. Two sides contain an inscription, in Pelivi, within a square

Passing by the early and rude forms of altars still extant of the Mexican worship, since too little is known of the history and application of these to illustrate our subject in any definite manner, we notice those of Egypt as being first both in point of age

Ancient Egyptian altar of bloody offerings.
In the entire painting, of the birds or ibises one is lying down at ease, another is standing up without fear or apprehension; a third, perched on some paling, is looking over the heads of the people; and a fourth is standing on the back of a Sphinx, nearly adjacent to the temple, in the front of it. It deserves notice that this altar (and the other also) has at each of its four corners a rising, which continues square to about half its height, but from thence is gradually sloped off to an edge or a point. These are no doubt the horns of the altar, and probably this is their true figure (see Exod. xxvii, 2, etc.; xxix, 12; Ezek. xliii, 10). The priest is blowing up the fire, apparently with a bellows or fan, so as to avoid the pollution of the breath. The other figure, which we give more in full, shows the horns of the altar, formed on the same principle as the foregoing; but this is seen on its angle, and its general form is more elevated. It has no garlands, and perfumes appear to be burning on it. In this picture the assembly is not so numerous as in the other; but almost all, to the number of ten or a dozen persons, are playing on musical instruments.

The heathens at first made their altars only of turf, afterward of stone, marble, wood, and other materials. They differed in form as well as material, some being round, some square, and others triangular. All their altars turned toward the east, and stood lower than the statue of the god, and were adorned with sculptures representing the deity to whom erected, or the appropriate symbols. These altars were of two kinds, the higher and the lower; the higher were intended for the celestial gods, and were called by the Romans altaria; the lower were for the terrestrial and infernal gods, and were called arcu. Those dedicated to the heavenly gods were raised a great height above the ground; those of the terrestrial gods were almost as high as the deity; and those for the infernal deities were only holes dug in the ground, called erebibi-culi. Most of the ancient Greek altars were of a cubical form; and hence, when the oracle of Apollo at Delphi commanded that a new altar should be pre-
The ALTAR AT ATHENS, inscribed "to the unknown God."—Paul, discoursing in that city on the resurrection of the dead, was carried by some of the philosophers before the judges of the Areopagus, where he used this expression (Acts xxvii, 22, 23): "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious" (over-fond of gods); "for as I passed by, and beheld your sacred instruments, I found an altar with this inscription, 'To the unknown god;' him, therefore, whom ye worship as 'unknown,' him declare (represent, announce)" I unto you." The question is, What was this altar thus consecrated to the "unknown god?" Jerome says that it was inscribed "to the gods of Asia, Europe, and Africa—to the unknown and strange gods;" and that the apostle uses the singular form because his design was only to demonstrate to the Athenians that they adored an unknown god (Comment. ad Tit. i. 19). Some, as Grotius, Vossius, Beza, believe that Paul speaks of altars extant in several places of Attica, without any inscription, erected after a solemn expiation for the country, by the philosopher Epimenides (Diog. Laert. Vit. Epim. i. 29). Others conceive that the altar was the one mentioned by Pausanias (i, 1, 3) and Philostratus (Vit. Ap. vi. 3), who speak of altars at Athens consecrated "to the unknown gods." Lucian (Philopat. § 9) swears "by the unknown god at Athens." He adds, "Being come to Athens, and finding there the unknown god, we worshipped him, and gave thanks to him, with hands lifted up to heav- en" (but see Niemeyer, Interp. Great. Pauli in Areop. hab.). Peter Comestor relates that Dionysius the Areopagite, observing while he was at Alexandria after the eclipse which, contrary to nature, happened at the death of our Saviour, from thence concluded that some unknown god suffered; and not being then in a situation to learn more of the matter, he erected at his return to Athens this altar "to the unknown god," which gave occasion to Paul's discourse at the Areopagus. Theophylact, Ecumenius, and others, give a different account of its origin and design, but each of their opinions, as also those we have noticed, has its difficulties. Augustine had no doubt that the Athenians, under the appellation of the unknown God, really worshipped the true one (comp. Hales, Analysis, iii, 519-531). See PHILIP. The most probable appears to be the conjecture of Eichborn (Allgr. Biblioth, iii, 414), to which Niemeyer subscribes, that there were standing at Athens several very ancient altars, which had originally no inscription, and which were afterward not destroyed, for fear of provoking the anger of the gods to whom they had been dedicated, although it was no longer known who these gods were. He supposes, therefore, that the inscription αὐτῶν Θεός, to an except in particular instances, such as those of Gideon (Judg. vi, 26) and David (2 Sam. xxiv, 18). It is said of Solomon that he "loved the Lord, walking in the statutes of David, his father, only he sacrificed and burnt incense on the high-places" (1 Kings iii, 8).

Altars were sometimes built on the roofs of houses: in 1 Kings xxiii, 12, we read of the altars that were on the roof of the upper chamber of Azaz. In the tabernacle, and afterward in the temple, two altars were erected, one for sacrifices, the other for incense; the table for the shew-bread is also sometimes called an altar.

1. The Altar of Burnt-Offering (גּוּלָה גּוּלָה), Exod. xxx, 29, or brazen altar (גּוּלָה גּוּלָה), Exod. xxxix, 39, called in Mal. i, 7, 12, "the table of the Lord," perhaps also in Ezek. xlv, 16. This differed in construction at different times.

(a) In the tabernacle (Exod. xxvii, xxxviii) this was a hollow square, five cubits in length and breadth, and three cubits in height; it was made of shittim-wood [see Shittim], and overlaid with plates of brass. In the middle there was a ledge or projection (בּעַרְבּ, karko'v), Rosenmüller, deambulacrum), on which the priest stood while officiating; immediately below this a brass grating was let down into the altar to support the fire, with two rings attached, through which poles were passed when the altar was removed. Some critics have supposed that this grating was placed perpendicularly, and fastened to the outward edge of this projection, thus making the lower part of the altar larger than the upper. Others have imagined that it extended horizontally beyond the projection, in order to intercept the soot or portions of the sacrifice which might accidentally fall off the altar. To this effect is a statement by the Targumist Jonathan. But for such a purpose (as Bähr restit. Symbol. i, 480) a grating seems very unsuitable (comp. Josephus, Ant. iii, 6, 8).

As the priests were forbidden to go up by steps to the altar (Exod. xx, 20; comp. Gell. x, 15; Servius, ad Ex. iv, 464), a slope of earth was probably made rising to a level with the projection. According to the Jewish tradition, this was on the south side, which is not improbable; for on the east was "the place of the ashes" (Lev. i, 16), and the laver of brass was probably near the western side, so that only the north and south sides were left (Ezek. viii, 6). Those critics who suppose the grating to have been perpendicular or on the outside consider the injunction in Exod. xx, 24, as applicable to this altar, and that the inside was filled with earth; so that the boards of shittim-wood formed merely a case for the real altar. So Jarchi, on Exod. xxvii, 8, it is ornamented with "horns" (Exod. xxxix, 12; Lev. iv, 18 sq.). See Horn.

In Exod. xxvii, 3, the following utensils are mentioned as belonging to the altar, all of which were to be made of brass. 1. גּוּלָה, eiroth', pann or dishes to receive the ashes (q. v.) that fell through the grating.

2. גּוּלָה, yisim', shovels (Vulg. foricpes), for cleaning the altar.

3. גּוּלָה, misrokoth' (Auth. Vers. basins; Sept. μίσρωκος; Geinenius, patera sacrificialis), vessels for receiving the blood and sprinkling it on the altar.

4. גּוּלָה, misrokoth' (Auth. Vers. flesh-hooks; Sept. ἀποσιών; Vulg. fuscuminae), large forks to turn the pieces of flesh, or to take them off the fire (see 1 Sam. ii, 13).

5. גּוּלָה, machloth' (Auth. Vers. fiery-pan; Sept. ῥο,assign; the same word is elsewhere translated censors (Num. xvi, 17); but in Exod. xxv, 29, "saff-dishes:" Sept. ἑυρωδύναμα. (Comp. Lammy, De Tabern. p. 489 sq.; Meyer, Bibelkom. p. 201 sq.; Van Til, De Tabern. p. 87.)

(6.) The altar of burnt-offerings in Solomon's temple was of much larger dimensions, "twenty cubits in length and breadth, and ten in height" (2 Chron. iv, 1; comp. 1 Kings viii, 22, 64; ix, 25), and was made entirely of brass, i. e. bronze plates covering a structure of earth or stone (Cramer, De Ara exter. p. 29 sq.). It is said of Asa that he renewed (בּאשָר), that is, either of the altar of burnt-offering in the second temple. The canonical scriptures give no information excepting that it was erected before the foundations of the temple were laid (Ezra iii, 8, 6), on the same place where it had formerly been built (Josephus, Ant. xii, 4, 1). From the Apocrypha, however, we may infer that it was made, not of brass, but of unburned stones (comp. 2 Esdr. iv, 41 sq. ; Bähr, Sym. sol. i, 489 ; Grotius, p. 92 sq.), for in the account of the restoration of the temple service by Judas Maccabaeus, it is said, "They took whole stones, according to the law, and built a new altar according to the former" (1 Macc. iv, 47). When Antiochus Epiphanes pillaged Jerusalem, Josephus informs us that he left the altar in situ, and took away the golden candlesticks, and the golden altar (of incense), and table (of shew-bread), and the altar of burnt-offering (Ant. xii, 5, 4).

The altar of burnt-offering erected by Herod is thus described by Josephus (Wars, v, 5, 6) : "Before the altar there were high steps, equal both in length and breadth, each of which dimensions was fifty cubits. The figure it was built in was a square, and it had corners like horns, and the passage up to it was by an insensible acclivity from the south. It was formed without any iron tool, nor did any iron tool so much as touch it at any time." The dimensions of this altar are differently stated in the Mishna (Midr. iii, 1). It is there described as a square 32 cubits at the base; at the height of a cubit it is reduced 1 cubit each way, making it 30 cubits square; at 5 cubits higher it is similarly contracted, becoming 28 cubits square, and at the base of the horn 26 cubits; and, allowing a cubit each way for the deambulacrum, a square of 24 cubits is left for the fire on the altar. Other Jewish writers place the deambulacrum 2 feet below the surface of the altar, which would certainly be a more suitable construction. The Mishna states, in accordance with Josephus, that the stones of the altar were unburned, agreeably to the command in Exod. xxv, 25; and that they were whitewashed every year at the Passover and the feast of tabernacles. On the south side was an inclined plane, 32 cubits long and 16 cubits broad, made likewise of unburned stones. A pipe was connected with the south-west horn, through which the blood of the victims was discharged by a subterraneous passage into the brook Kidron. Under the altar was a cavity to receive the drink-offerings, which was covered with a marble slab, and cleaned from time to time. On the north side of the altar several iron rings were fixed to fasten the victims. Lastly, a red ledge was thrown round the middle of the altar to distinguish between the blood that was to be sprinkled above and below it (Reland, Antiq. Sacr. p. 97 sq.; Laivy, De Tabern. table 16; 1 Empereur, in the Mishna, in loc.; Cramer, De Ase exteriore Templo secund. Lugd. Bat. 1637, and in Ugoii Thesaur. x; Ugoii Altar-likezer. in his Thesaur. x; Otho, Res. Robb. p. 82 sq.).

According to Lev. vi, 6, the fire on the altar of burnt-offerings was not permitted to go out (Buxtorf, Historia syma sacri, in his Exercit. p. 288 sq.; and in Ugoii Thesaur. x; Horeh, De syma Sacro, in Ugoii Thesaur. xxixii; Bohn, De syma Gentilium sacro in Ugoii Thesaur. x; copious. 5. Of other Jewish altars, we read only of (1) Altars of Brick. There seems to be an allusion to such in Isa. lxxvi. 3. The words are, "offering incense on the bricks," generally explained as referring to altars made of this material, and probably situated in the "gardens" mentioned just before. Rosenmüller suggests, however, that the allusion is to some Babylonian custom of burning incense on bricks covered over with magic formulæ or cuneiform inscriptions. This is also the view of Gessin and Maurer.

III. Christian.—1. Significance. The word altar is used, figuratively, to denote the Lord's table, not, however, in a sacrificial sense. As there is but the one sacrificing priest, the Lord Jesus, and the one propitiatory sacrifice, namely, the sacrifice of himself, so there is but one altar, upon that upon which he gave himself a ransom for all. The apostles in no instance call the bread and wine a sacrifice, or the Lord's table an altar, or the Christian minister a priest. And this is the more remarkable in this case; for they do speak of priests, and sacrifices, and altars under the Christian dispensation, but never in reference to the Lord's Supper. There cannot but have been design in this omission. In the earliest age of Christianity the table was not called altar (Lardner, Works, iv, 212); at a later period both altar and table were used indiscriminately, the former word, however, not in a Jewish or pagan sense. When the ancient apologists were reproved with having no temples, no altars, no shrines, they simply replied, "Shrines and altars we have not." The more common word employed was table, with the addition of some epithet implying the peculiar use of it in a Christian church. In Chrysostom it is termed the mystical and tremendous table; sometimes the spiritual, divine, royal, immortal, heavenly table. Wherever the word altar was used, it was carefully distinguished from the Jewish altar on which bloody sacrifices were laid, and from heathen altars, connected with absurd idolatries.

The Church of England never uses the word "altar" for communion-table in her rubrics, and she carefully excludes the notion of a literal sacrifice, which altar would imply, by expressly referring in her communion-service to the sacrifice of Christ ("who, by his one oblation of himself once offered, made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world"); and by studiously introducing into the same service the word "sacrifice" in the several figurative senses (warranted by Scripture) which it will bear; applying the word to our offerings of praise and thanksgiving, to the offering of ourselves, souls and bodies, but never applying it to the elements. That the English reformers wished to discountenance the notion of altars, and sacrifices thereon, appears from the fact that at the Revolution service to the sacrifice of Christ ("who, by his one oblation..."") was to be called tables, in consequence of a sermon preached by Bishop Hooper, who said, "I that it would do well, that it might please the magistracy to turn 'altars' into 'tables,' according to the first institution of Christ; to take away the false persuasion of the people, which they have of sacrifice to be done upon the altars; for as long as altars remain, both the ignorant people and the ignorant and evil-persuaded priest will always dream of sacrifice" (Hooper's Writings, Parker Society, p. 498; Burnet, Hist. of Reformation, ii, 252, 253). Other Protestant Churches, in particular the Lutherans, have retained the use of an altar, as in which the Liturgy is read, the Lord's Supper celebrated, and other ecclesiastical actions performed.

2. Material and Form.—In the time of Augustine it appears that the altars in the churches of Africa were of wood, and it is commonly thought that stone altars began to be used about the time of Constantine. In the time of Gregory Nyssen altars began to be made generally of stone; and the twenty-sixth canon of the council of Epapha, A.D. 517, forbids to consecrate any but a stone altar; from which and other evidence (see Martene, lib. i, cap. iii, art. 5, No. 5) it appears that wooden altars were in use in France till that and a much later period. In England, however, wooden altars were originally in common use (William of Malmesbury, iii, 14, De Vita Wulfstani, Ep. Wigorni: "Erant tunc temporis altaria lignea, jam inde a proximis diebus in Anglia, ca ille per diecensia demolitum, ex lapidibus compaginavit alia"). At the English Reformation stone altars were removed and wooden tables substituted. The eighty-second canon of the synod of London, 1608, orders that a convenient and decent table shall be provided for the celebration of the holy communion, covered with a carpet of silk, or other decent stuff, and with a fair linen cloth at the time of communion, and to its position, the rubric before the communion-service states that it may stand in the body of the church, or in the chancel.

Altars in the Romish Church are built of stone, to represent Christ, the foundation-stone of the spiritual building, the Church. Every altar has three steps going up to it, covered with a carpet. It is adorned with natural artificial flowers, according to the season of the year, and no cost is spared in adorning it with gold, silver, and jewels. The tabernacle of the Holy Sacrament is placed on the holy altar, on each side of which are tapestries of white wax, except at all offices for the dead, and during the last three days of Passion-week, at which time they are yellow. A crucifix is placed on the altar. There is a copy, written in a legible hand, of the Te Igier, a prayer addressed only to the first Person of the Trinity. The altar is furnished with a little bell, which is rung thrice when the priest kneels down, thrice when he elevates the host, and thrice when he sets it down. There is also a portable altar or consecrated stone, with a small recess in the middle of the front side, in which are put the relics of saints, and it is sealed up by the bishop. Should the seal be broken, the altar loses its consecration. The furniture of the altar consists of a chalice and paten for the bread and wine, both of gold or silver, and a paten or paten of the vessel, gilt; a veil, in form of a pavilion, of rich white stuff to cover the pyx; a thurible, of silver or pewter, for the incense; a holy-water pot of silver, pewter, or tin; also corporals, palmes, purificatories, etc. About the time of Charlemagne it became common to have several altars in one church, a custom which spread, especially since the twelfth century. The side altars were usually erected on pillars, side walls, or in chapels, while the main or high altar stands always in the choir. The Greek churches have generally only one altar.

8. The portable altar (altare portatile, gyptorium, or stipulum) was one that might be carried about at convenience. These altars Martene refers to the very earliest ages of the Church, maintaining, with some reason, that during times of persecution portable altars were much more likely to be used than those which were fixed and immovable. The use of such portable altars as afterward retained (in a case of necessity). The order of benediction is given by Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Riti, ii. 291. — Bingham, Orig. Eccl. Bk. viii, ch. vi, § 11—15; Procter, on Common Prayers, p. 59; Collier, Eccl. Hist. vi. 257; Butler, Lives of Saints, iv. 418; Neal, Hist. of Puritanism, i, 44, ii, 906.

4. The priviedegial altar (ara prividegialis) was one to which the pope or other prelates were privileged to come or give masses; it was so called, says Martene, because it opens in a small door which, by privilege of the pope, masses for the dead may be said on days when they are not permitted at other altars, and where, according to the modern Roman doctrine, the Church applies, in a peculiar manner, the merits of Jesus Christ and the saints to the souls in purgatory: ‘‘but not so that a soul is insallibly delivered from purgatory at each mass that is said, as some may imagine, because indulgences can only avail the dead in the way of sufferages.’’—Richard and Giraud.

The origin of these privileged altars in the Roman Church dates as early as the time of Gregory X (1111). Between 1172 and 1586, although some writers have endeavored to assign them to a earlier period. —Landon. In the earliest ages, the clergy only were allowed to approach the altar; not even the emperor himself, at first, was allowed this privilege, but afterward the royal person as well as the clergy of the Imperial dignity (Canon 69, in Trullo). The approach of women to the altar was, if possible, even more strictly prohibited than that of men (Can. 44 of Laodicea, can. 4 of Tours, etc.). “In these days,” says Martene, “the licentiousness of men has arrived at that pitch in the churches, that not only emperors and princes, but the very common people so fill the choir that scarcely is there sitting room left for the ministering clergy. Nay, more; with shame be it spoken, often women are found so lost to all reverence and shame, as not to hesitate to sit on the very steps of the altar.”—Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Riti, lib. i, cap. 5; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Alypius, St., of Tagaste, in Numidia, was some years younger than Augustine, to whom he was strongly attached. From Carthage, whither he followed Augustine, he went to Rome to study the law, and there obtained a place in the imperial treasury. This charge he gave up in order to follow Augustine to Milan. Both of them had this time been Manichaeans, and both were at this time converted to the Catholic faith, and baptized in the church of St. Ambrice on Easter-eve, A.D. 387. Upon their return to Africa they withdrew into a solitude near Tagaste; but when Augustine was ordained a priest of the church of Hippo, he drew Alypius from his solitude to take charge of the monastery which he had just built in Hippo. After this Alypius visited the Holy Land, and upon his return in 404 was elected bishop of Tagaste. In 403 he was present at a council held at Carthage in which the Donatists were invited to a conference, but refused, and in 411 he was summoned, with six others, to represent the Catholics in the celebrated conference between the Catholics and Donatists which the Emperor Honorius enjoined. It is believed that he was with Augustine at Hippo at the time of his death in 430, and it is uncertain how long he survived him. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him on the 11th of August.—Ep. iv.; Ep. 22, etc.; S. Jerome, Ep. 81; Ballut, Lives of Saints, iii. 375.

A'mad (Heb. 'Amad), עֲמַד, people of duration; Sept. 'Am'add v. r. 'Am'ah, Vulg. Amadus), a town near the border of Asher mentioned between Alalmealeh and Azenia, if in a south-easterly county (Josh. xix. 26). Schwarzs (Pales. p. 192) thinks it is the modern village Al-Mad, a few miles north of Acco, meaning apparently the place called Em el-Mad, with extensive ruins near the sea-coast, the identity of which with the ancient Amad is also suggested by Thomson (Land and Book, i, 405), but we should otherwise look for a more south-easterly position, and one on the boundary. The same objection applies to the location proposed by Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 284) at Um el-'Amad, on the shore south of Tyre, which, however, contains no ruins (Robinson, later Researches, iii, 113). It may not improbable be identified with Shefa 'Omar or Shefa 'Amar (perhaps, מַדָּה for מַדָּשׁ), a large market-town on a ridge east of Haifa, with streets of shops and a large desert castle (Robinson, later Researches, iii, 108).

Amadatha (Ἀμαδαθα, Esth. xvi, 10, 17) or Amadathus (Ἀμαδαθος, Esth. xii, 6), the form of the name HAMMEDATHA (q. v.) as given in the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther (these portions being found only in the Vulg. in most editions, although the name is given in the genitive, ᾨμαδαθου, throughout the book).

A'mal (Heb. Amal, עָמָל, tow; Sept. 'Amal), the last named of the four sons of Helam, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35). B.C. prob. post 1658.

Amalarius, a priest of Metz in the 9th century. He wrote a treatise, De Divinis Officiis libri quatuor, giving an account of the church services, and a rationale of their meaning. Some passages in it favor the idea that he was free from the superstitions of his time as to the Lord's Supper. He also wrote De ord. Antiphonarii. Both this and the former treatise are given in Bibl. Max. Patr. xiv. He wrote many Letters, to be found in D'Achery, Spicileg. iii, 336. The sixth letter is occupied with a curious discussion, arising from the notion of our Lord's body being actually present in the sacrament. Amalarius was convinced that no one, however, who had spiritually received the sacrament, whether he had thus spit away some of our Lord's body and blood, and whether he could be saved after such an act; he does not decide whether the person had voided some particles of Christ's body, but says that the health of the soul will not be endangered by this act which was done for the health of the body.—Clarke, Sac. Lit. ii. 471; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 812.

A'malek (Heb. Amalek, עָמַלְאֵק, according to Fürst, from the Arabic, dweller in a valley; Sept. 'Amalek, Vulg. Amalech, Amalec), the son of Egliphas (the first-born of Esaau) by his concubine Timna (Gen. xxxvi, 12; 1 Chron. 1, 86); he was the chieftain, or emir ("Duke"), of an Idumean tribe (Gen. xxxvi, 16); which, however, was probably not the same with the AMALIKITES (q. v.) so often mentioned in Scripture (Num. xxiv, 20, etc.). B.C. post 1905. His mother came of the Horite race, whose territory the descendants of Esaau had seized; and, although Amalek himself is represented as of equal rank with the other sons of Egliphas, yet his posteriority appears to have shared the same inferiority with the Horite population only being mentioned as existing in Edom in the time of Hezekiah, when they were dispersed by a band of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 43).

A'malkeite (Heb. Amalke'i, עָמַלְקֶהִי, also the simple Amalek, used collectively; Sept. 'Amalkeis, Ἀμαληκίτης), the title of a powerful people who dwelt in Arabia Petraea, between the Dead Sea and the Red Sea, on the border of Havilah and Shur (1 Sam. xvii, 7), south of Idumea, and east of the land of the Philistines, called the Red Sea. The Amalekites are generally supposed to have been the descendants of Amalek, the son of Egliphas and grandson of Esaau (Vater, Comment. 2, 24, p. 140 sq.; but Moesø speaks of the Amalekites long before this Amalek was born, i.e. in the days of Abraham, and places it on the border of Elam, devastated their country (Gen. xvi, 7); from which Le Clerc inferred that there was some other and more ancient Amalek from whom this people sprung. The supposition that this people are those prophetically spoken of (Hengstenberg, Genuineness of the Penta- teuch, i, 247 sq.) is only a satisfactory solution of the difficulty (Kurtz, Hist. of the Old Covenant, i, 1 sq.). Arabian historians represent them as originally dwelling on the shores of the Persian Gulf, where they were pressed westward by the growth of the Assyrian empire, and spread over a portion of Arabia at a period antecedent to its occupation by the descendants of the Amalek. This is in account of their coexistence with the Gemarae of Gen. xiv, 6 (7); it throws light on the traces of a permanent occupation of central Palestine in their passage westward, as indicated by the names Amalek and mount of the Amalekites (Judg. xv, 14; xii, 15); and it accounts for the silence of Scripture as to any relations between the Amalekites and either the Edomites or the Israelites (Gen. xxxvi, 16, does not refer to the whole nation).

The physical character of the district which the Amalekites occupied [see ARABIA] necessitated a nomadic life, which they adopted to its fullest extent, taking their families with them even on their military expeditions (Judg. vi, 6). They consisted in flocks and herds. Mention is made of a nomadless "town" (1 Sam. xv, 5), and Josephus gives an exaggerated account of the capture of several towns by Saul (Am, vi, 2); but the towns could have been little more than stations, or nomadic enclosures. The kings or chieftains were perhaps distinguished by the hereditary title Agag (Num. xxiv, 7; 1 Sam. xv, 8).

Two important routes led through the Amalekite district, viz., from Palestine to Egypt by the Isthmus of Suez, and to Southern Asia and Africa by the Elatonic arm of the Red Sea. It has been conjectured that the descendants of the exiled Amalek (Gen. xiv) had for its object the opening of the latter route; and it is in connection with the former that the Amalekites first came in contact with the Israelites, whose progress they attempted to stop, adopting a guerilla style of warfare (Deut. xxv, 18). The Amalekites, suspecting that the Philistines were advancing to take possession of the land of Canaan, did not wait for their near approach to that country, but came down from their settlements on its southern borders to attack them at Rephidim. Moses commanded Joshua with a chosen band to attack the Amalekites, while he, with Aaron and Hur, went up to the mount of Horeb. During the battle Amalek held up his hands to be blessed so long as they were maintained in this attitude the Israelites prevailed, but when through weariness they fell, the Amalekites prevailed. (See Verpoorten, De bello in Amalek, Ged. 1788; Sartorius, De bello Domini in Amalek, Danz. 1786.) Aaron and Hur, seeing this, held up their hands till the latter were entirely defeated with great slaughter (Exod. xvii, 8-18; comp. Deut. xxv, 17; 1 Sam. xv, 2). In union with the Canaanites they again attacked the Israelites on the borders of Palestine, and defeated them near Hormah (Num. xiv, 46). Thenceforward we hear of them only as a secondary power, at one time in league with the Moabites (Judg. iii, 13), when they were defeated by Ehud near Jericho; at another time in league with the Midianites (Judg. vi, 3), when they penetrated into the plain of Edraelon, and were defeated by Gideon. Saul in his expedition overran their whole district and inflicted immense loss upon them, but spared Agag, the king, and took his wife and the choicest of the males as captives, contrary to the divine command (1 Sam. xv. 48; xx. 2 sq.). After this the Amalekites scarcely appear any more in history (1 Sam. xxvii. 8; 2 Sam. xviii. 12). Their power was thenceforth broken, and they degenerated into a horde of banditti (τίμημα, predatory band). Such a "troop" came and pillaged Ziklag, which belonged to David (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), but he returned from an expedition which he had made to the land of Edom (1 Chron. xii. 4); and probably another band of Amalekites under the command of Zeroril pursued them, caught them by surprise and dispersed them, and recovered all the booty which they had carried off from Ziklag. This completed their political destruction, as predicted (Num. xxv. 20); for the small remnant of the Amalekites whose residence excised by the Simeonites is spoken of in 1 Chron. iv. 43, were the descendants of another family. See AMALEK.

Yet we meet again with the name of Amalek (according to Josephus, Ant. xi, 6, 5) in the history of Esther, in the person of Haman the Agagite, in Esth. iii. 1, 10: viii. 5, 12, who was most likely an Amalekite of the royal house of Agag (Num. xxiv. 7; 1 Sam. xv. 8), and hence descended from the general carnage, and escaped to the court of Persia.

The Arabian relate of the Amalek destroyed by Saul that he was the father of an ancient tribe in Arabia, which contained only Arabian called pure, the remains of whom were mingled with the posterity of Iskand and Adnan. According to Josephus (Ant. iii. 1), the Amalekites intermarried Gabalites (Psa. 112, 116; see also v. 14). According to Schwarz (Palast. p. 219), traces of this name are preserved in that region to this day. The editor of Calmet supposes that there were no less than three distinct tribes of Amalekites: (1) Amalek the ancient, referred to in Gen. xiv. (2) A tribe in the region east of Egypt, between Egypt and Canaan (Exod. xvii. 8; 1 Sam. xv. 6, etc.); (3) Amalek, the descendants of Eliphas. No such distinction, however, appears to be made in the biblical narrative, at least as regards the former two of these tribes: their national character is everywhere the same, and the different traditions, according to which we find them, are equally easy explained by their habits, which were evidently so much as belong to a warlike nomad people (Roland, Palais. p. 78 sq.; Mannert, Geogr. VI, i, 183 sq.).

Arabian writers mention Amalakka, Amalkit, Ismak, as an original tribe of their country, descended from Ham (Abdel-nida says from Shem), and more ancient than the Ishmaelites (D'Hérelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. Amale; De Sacy, Excerpta ex Abulf. in Pococoe's Spec. p. 542 sq.; Michaelis, Spicilegis, i, 170 sq.). They also give the same name to the Philistines and other Canaanites, and assert that the Amalekites who were conquered by Joshua (Josh. xiv. 16) lived originally along the North American (Ewald, Ier. Gesch. I, 800, 450). Ps. (Vulg. Magis, i, 98) calls the Amalekites who fought with the Israelites on leaving Egypt Phenicians. The same writer interprets the name Amalek as meaning "a people that live up or are exhausted" (Legis Allegor. ii, 66). From the scriptural notices of their location several attempts have been made to identify them with the Israelites (Exod. xvii. 8 sq.) and their connection with the Ammonites (Jedg. iii. 13), Midianites (Jedg. vi. 8; vii. 12), Kenites (1 Sam. xv. 6), as well as their neighborhood to the Philistines (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), Mount Sinai (1 Chron. v. 43), and the city of Shur or Pelusium (1 Sam. xv. 7), it is evident that their proper territory was bounded by Philistia, Egypt, Idumea, and the desert of Sinai.—Van Iperen, Histor. Crit. Edom. et Amalecitar. (Leonard. 1788); Journ. of Soc. Lit. Apr. 1802, p. 89 sq.; Noldeke, Uber die Am.-alekiter. See AMAL. See AMAL.
AMAN (Amán), the Greco-ized form (Tobit xiv, 10; Esth. x, 7, etc.) of the name HAMAN (q. v.).

AMANA (many Amánu) (Heb. Amánah, יַעֲמָה, a cow-cout, as in Neh. x, 1), the name of a river and of a hill.

1. The marginal reading (of many codices, with the Syriac, the Targum, and the Complutensian ed. of the Sept.) in 2 Kings v, 12, of the stream near Damascus called in the text AMANA (q. v.).

2. (Seep. πιστευ, Vulg. AWAN.) A mountain mentioned in Cant. iv, 8, in connection with Shenir and Hemon as a resort of wild beasts. Some have supposed it to be Mount Amalek, on which the dominion of Solomon is alleged to have extended northward. But the context, with other circumstances, leaves little doubt that this Mount Amana was rather the southern part or summit of Anti-Libanus, and was so called perhaps from containing the sources of the river Amasa or Amana (q. v.). The rabbis indeed, call Mount Lebanon various names (Reland, Palest. p. 820), among which appears that of Amamon (אֲמַמְוֹן, Gittin, fol. viii, 1, v. r., Umman, or Mt. Mor, according to Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 117).

3. AMANAH, the correct form of the name AMANA (q. v.), which has probably crept in by an error of copyists. See AMANA.

AMANDUS, St., bishop of Maastricht, called "the apostle of Belgium," who was born in 869 in Nantes, of a Roman family, and at twenty-one entered a monastery near Rochelle. After visiting Rome, he was in 866 ordained a missionary bishop without any fixed see, and he labored first in Brabant and Flanders, then in Schlovania near the Danube. After this he passed into Austria, but was driven away by Dagsbert, whom he had reproved for his vices; afterward, however, the repentant prince recalled him, and made him the spiritual instructor of his son Sigebert. In the territory of Ghent, to which he went next, he was cruelly used, and, after being appointed bishop of Maastricht in 869, he resigned it at the end of three years, in order that he might resume his former mode of life. He was a great itinerant preacher, founded many monasteries, and died in 879, on the 6th of February.—Baillit, February 6; Butler, Lives of Saints, 1, 369; Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 41.

AMARANTINE (ἀμαράντινος, unfading), occurs in the original of 1 Pet. v, 4 (Auth. Vers. "that fadeth not away," comp. ἀμαράντως, 1 Pet. i, 4, 4, Auth. Vers. "that fadeth not away") seems to allude to the fadend sprig, or crown of laurel awarded to him who came off victorious in the Grecian games (q. v.). Hence the word AMARANTH, the name of a class of flowers, so called from their not speedily fading (see Milton, Par. Lost, iii, in med.). They have a rich color, but dry flowers. Prince's-feather and cock's-comb are examples of the natural order of Amaranthaceae, all the varieties of which are innocuous. To such unwithering garlands the apostle compares the Christian's crown of glory, won by faith and self-denial (1 Cor. i, 25). See CROWN.

AMARI'AH (Heb. Amarayh, יַעֲמָרָה, said [as promised] by Jehovah, q. d. Theophrastus; also in the paragogic form Amara’i, יַעֲמָרָא, 1 Chron. xxiv, 22; 2 Chron. xix, 11; xxxi, 15), the name of several men.

1. (Seep. Amaría, Amaria.) A person mentioned in 1 Chron. vi, 7, 52, in the list of the descendants of Aaron by his eldest son Eleazar, as the son of Meleath and the father of Abihu, which last was (not the grandson and successor of Elei of the same name, but the younger son of Zadok in whose person Saul restored the high-priesthood to the line of Eleasar). The year during which the younger line of Ithamar enjoyed the pontificate in the persons of Elei, Abihu, and Abimelech (who was slain by King Saul at Nob) were doubtless more than sufficient to cover the time of this Amariah and his son Abihu (q. v.), if they were contemporaneous, and it has, therefore, been thought that they may have been bigamists in fact, although their names are given to carry on the direct line of succession to Zadok. But it is more probable that Amariah was the last of the high-priests of Eleasar's line prior to its transfer (for some unknown reason) to the house of Ithamar in the person of Eli (q. v.), and that the Abihus and Abimelechs of the line of Zadok were of a later date, or that the lost succession was a more distant descendant in private life, the intermediate names in the genealogy being omitted. See High-Priest. B. C. ante 1125. Josephus (Ant. vii, 1, 9) calls him Arophanes (Ἀροφανῆς), and says he lived in private, the pontificate being at the time in the family of Ithamar.

2. (Seep. Amariá, Amaria.) A Levite, second son of Helbon and grandson of Kohath of the lineage of Moses (1 Chron. xxiii, 19, 22, 33). B. C. 1014.

3. A "chief-priest" active in the political reformation instituted by Josiah (2 Chron. xiii, 11); perhaps identical with the high-priest that appears to have been interpolated between Azariah and Zadok (1 Chron. i, 9). See High-Priest. B. C. 889. Josephus (Ant. ix, 1, 1) calls him "Amasia the priest" (Ἀμασίας ὁ ιερέας); and says that he (as well as Zebediah) was of the tribe of Judah, a statement probably due to the inaccuracy of the text (ἰερέας, "both," being evidently spurious or corrupt, see Hudson, in loc.). The name of Josephus (1 Chron. vi, 6) his name does not appear.

4. (Seep. Amariáia, but Ἱσομαρία v. r. Ἱσομαρία in Extra.) A high-priest at some later date, the son of another Azariah (q. v.), and also father of a different Abihu (1 Chron. vi, 11; Extra vi, 8), or rather, perhaps, of Uziah (2 Kings xvi, 10). See High-Priest. B. C. prob. ante 740. Josephus (Ant. vii, 8, 6) appears to call him Jotham (וֹדֶמֶה), as also the Jewish chronicle Seder Olam.

5. (Seep. Amariáia v. r. Mariia.) One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to superintend the distribution of the temple dues among the sacerdotal cities (2 Chron. xxxiii, 23). B. C. 726.

6. (Seep. Amariáia v. r. Māriia and Māriia.) The son of Hizkiah and father of Gedaliah, which last was grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i, 1). B. C. long ante 640.

7. (Seep. Seomaria.) The son of Shephatiah and father of Zabad, which last was grandfather of Athaiah, the Judahite descendant of Phares, resident at Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. x, 4). B. C. long ante 536.

8. (Seep. Amariáia.) One of the priests who returned from Babylon with Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. vi, 3), B. C. 536, and afterward (in a very early age, if the same) sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. xii, 2). B. C. cir. 410. He appears to have been identical with the chief-priest the father of Jehohanan (Neh. xii, 13).

9. (Seep. Amariáia v. r. Māriia.) One of the Israelite "sons" of Bani, who divorced the Gentile wife whom he had married after the return from Babylon (Ezra xii, 40). B. C. 459.

AMARANTH (Amarath), the Greco-ized form (1 Esdr. vii, 2; 2 Esdr. 1, 2) of the name Amaryah (q. v.).

AMASA (Heb. Amasa, Amāsā, guardian), the name of two men.

1. (Seep. Amasía, Amasia; but v. r. Amasías, and in 1 Chron. ii, 17, even Amasías.) The son of Abigail, a sister of King David, by Jether or Ithra (q. v.), an Ishmaelite (1 Chron. i, 17; 2 Sam. xviii, 25; 1 Kings ii, 5, 82); a foreign patrony that appears to have caused his neglect in comparison with the more honored sons of David's other sister Zeruiah; until on the occurrence of Absalom's rebellion, whose party he naturally joined, and of which he was made general, his good conduct probably of the battle, although de-fated, led David to offer him not only pardon, but the command of the army in the room of his cousin Joab (2 Sam. xix, 13), whose overbearing conduct had become intolerable to him, and to whom he could not entirely forgive the death of Absalom (v. v.). B.C. cir. 1022. But on the breaking out of Sheba's insurrection, Amasa was so tardy in his movements (probably from the reluctance of the troops to follow him) that David despatched Abishai with the household troops in pursuit of Sheba, and Joab joined his brother as a volunteer. When they reached "the great stone of Gibeon," they were overtaken by Amasa with the force he had been able to collect. Joab thought this a favorable opportunity of getting rid of so dangerous a rival, and immediately executed the treacherous purpose he had formed. See ABNER. He saved Amasa, asked him of his health, and took his head in his right hand to kiss him, while with the unbeheld left hand he smote him dead with his sword. Joab then put himself at the head of the troops, and continued the pursuit of Sheba; and such was his popularity with the army that David was unable to remove him from the command, or call him to account for this bloody deed (2 Sam. xx, 4-12). B.C. cir. 1022. See ABNER.

Amasa (Aasmii). A son of Hadlai and chief of Ephraim, who, with others, vehemently and successfully resisted the retention as prisoners of the persons whom Pekah, king of Israel, had taken captive in a successful campaign against Ahab, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii, 12). B.C. cir. 738.

Am'sal (some Amos'ai) (Heb. Amasonki, 애스알), the name, of several men. See also AMASAI

Am'sai (some Amos'i) (Heb. Amasonki, 애스알), the name of several men. See also AMASAI

Am'say (Sept. Αμοσάη), and 'Amp'as v.l. 'Ampas and 'Ampas) A Levite, son of Ekanath, and father of Abinath or Mahath, of the ancestry of Samuel (1 Chron. vi, 25, 35). B.C. cir. 1410.

Am'say (Sept. Αμοσάη), and 'Amp'as v.l. 'Ampas and 'Ampas) The principal leader of a considerable body of men from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, who joined David in "the stronghold," apparently the castle of Aderam; he issued a formal declaration of attachment instantly dispelled the apprehensions that David expressed at their coming (1 Chron. xii, 18), B.C. cir. 1061. There is not much probability in the suggestion (Ewald, Jr, Greek ii, 544) that he was the same with AMASA (q.v.), the nephew of David.

Am'say (Sept. Αμοσάη) One of the priests appointed to proceed with the blowing of trumpets on its removal from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv, 24), B.C. cir. 1408.

Am'say (Sept. Αμοσάη) Another Levite, father of a different Mahath, and one of the two Kohathites that were forward at the instance of Hezekiah in cleansing the temple (2 Chron. xxix, 12). B.C. 726.

Am'asah (Heb. Amasonki, 애스알), prob. an incorrect form of the name AMASA; Sept. 'Ampas and 'Omas or 'Umas, the son of Azareel, and chief of the valiant priests of his family, appointed by Nebuchadnezzar to reside at Jerusalem and do the work of the temple (2 Chron. xiii, 13), B.C. cir. 440.

Am'masah (Heb. Amasonki, 애스알), burden of [i.e. sustained by] Jehovah; Sept. 'Ampas or 'V. Mal'mas, of the tribe of Judah, who volunteered to uphold King Jehoshaphat in his religious efforts, at the head of 200,000 chosen troops (2 Chron. xvii, 16), B.C. cir. 910.

Am'sas, supposed to be the Pharao whose house in Taphaneth is mentioned in Jer. xil, 9, and who reigned B.C. 569-528; he was the successor of Apries, or Ptolemy II. He appears to have cultivated the friendship of the Greeks; and, to secure their alliance, he married Laodice, the daughter of Battus, the king of the Greco colony of Cyrene (Herod. ii, 161-182; iii, 1-16; Diod. i, 68, 95). He also contributed a large sum toward the rebuilding of the temple of Delphi, and is said to have been visited by Solomon (Herod. i, 90; Ptol. Chron., 26; Plato, Timaeus, 10.21.)—Smith's Bible Com. v. See APTAP.

Amash. See HAMATH; BORCOES.

Am'ma'θa (Amaa'θi, i. q. Hamath, v. c. comp. Josephus, Ant. x, 5, 2), a place named by Jerome and Eusebius (Epp. 612) in the Onomasticon (s. v. 'Eamath, 'Ama'θy) as one of several places by that name, this being situated near Gadara, and having warm springs. It is apparently the modern ruin Amatsh, discovered by Setzen (Jitter, Eritk. xv, 872), on the Nahr Yarmuk, not far from Umm Elard, Trarara, p. 273, 276-278. See also AMATHIUS.

Amath'eth (rather Amath 'an, 'Ama'θiç, one of the "sons" of Bebai, who divorced his Gentle wife after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 29); evidently a corruption for the Athlai (q.v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 29).

Am'ath's (1 Macc. xii, 25). See AMATHITIS.

Am'athit'is (Ama'θiç, Eng. Vers. "Amathis"), a district to the north of Palestine, in which Jonathan Maccabeus and the forces of Demetrius (1 Macc. xii, 25) not around the city AMATHUS (q.v.) beyond the Jordan (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 18, 8; War, i, 4, 8); but the neighborhood of the metropolis Amathus or HAMATH (q.v.) on the Orontes (Drusius; Michaelis, loc. Mack.). So the Sept. gives 'Ama'θiç for Αμάθης in Gen. x, 17.

Amath'us (Ama'θos, Ἀμαθῶς, also τό Αμάθος), a strongly-fortified town beyond the Jordan, which Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon, s. v. 'Eamath) place twenty-one Roman miles south of Pella. It was taken by Alexander Janneaus (Josephus, War, i, 4, 3; Ant. xiii, 18, 3), and its importance is shown by the fact that Gabinius made it the seat of one of the five jurisdiction (αὐλικά) into which he divided the country (Ant. xiv, 5, 4; War, i, 8, 5). Josephus elsewhere (Ant. xvii, 10, 6) mentions that a palace was burnt at Amathus (q.v.) on the Jordan, which was probably the same place. It is mentioned as the seat of a Christian bishopric at the Council of Chalcedon (Concil. iv, 118). Reland (Palest. 550 eq.) thinks it mentioned in the Talmud by the name of Amathus (אאמה), and that it may be the same with Ramoth-Gilead. Burckhardt passed the ruins of an ancient city standing on the declivity of the mountain, called Amata, near the Jordan, and a little to the north of the Zerka or Jabok; and was told that several columns remain standing, and also some large buildings (Trarara, p. 546). This is doubtless the site (Van de Velde, Mémoire, p. 284), although not quite so far south as the Onomasticon would make it (Raumer, Palast. p. 218).

Amaury. See AMALRIC.

Amaz'ah (Heb. Amaz'at, 애스델), strengthened by Jehovah, 2 Kings xii, 21; xiii, 12; xiv, 8; xv, 1; 1 Chron. iv, 34; vii, 45; Amos vii, 10, 12, 14; elsewhere in the prolonged form Amaz'at, 애스델; Sept. Αμασίας, but Materasia in 1 Chron. vi, 45), the name of four men.

1. A Levite, son of Hilkiah and father of Hashabiah, of the ancestry of Ethan the Merarite (1 Chron. vi, 45), B.C. considerably ante 1014.
2. The son and successor of Josiah (by Jehoaddan, a female of Jerusalem), and the ninth king on the separate throne of Judah; he was twenty-five years old at his accession, and reigned twenty-nine years, B.C. 857-838 (2 Kings xiv, 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxv, 1). His reign was marked, in general, by piety as well as energy, but was not without irritants (2 Kings xiv, 3, 4; 2 Chron. xxv, 2). He commenced his sovereignty by punishing the murderers of his father; and it is mentioned that he respected the law of Moses by not including the children in the doom of their parents, which seems to show that a contrary practice had previously existed (2 Kings xiv, 5-7; 2 Chron. xxv, 8-9). The principal event of Amaziah's reign was his attempt to reimpose upon the Edomites the yoke of Judah, which they had cast off in the time of Jehoram (2 Kings viii, 20; comp. 1 Kings xii, 48). The strength of Edom is evinced by the fact that Amaziah considered the unused power of his own kingdom, although much diminished, to consist of 300,000 men, unequal to this undertaking, and therefore hired an auxiliary force of 100,000 men from the king of Israel for 100 talents of silver (2 Chron. xxxv, 5, 6). This is the first example of a mercenary army that occurs in the history of the Jews. It did not, however, render any other service than that of giving Amaziah an opportunity of manifesting that he knew his true place in the Hebrew Constitution, as the viceroy and vassal of the King Jehovah. A prophet commanded him, in the name of the Lord, to send back the auxiliaries, on the ground that the state of alienation from God in which the kingdom of Israel lay rendered such assistance useless, but disastrous. The king obeyed this seemingly hard command, and sent the men home, although by doing so he not only lost their services, but the 100 talents, which had been already paid, and incurred the resentment of the Israelites, who were naturally exasperated at the indignity suffered by the kingdom of Edom (2 Kings xiv, 7). This exasperation they indicated by plundering the towns and destroying the people on their homeward march (Kitto's Daily Bible Illustr. in loc.). The obedience of Amaziah was rewarded by a great victory over the Edomites (2 Chron. xxv, 14-16), ten thousand of whom were slain in battle, and ten thousand more savagely destroyed by being buried down from the high cliffs of their native mountains (2 Chron. xxv, 11, 12). He even took the city of Petra (q. v.) by assault, and changed its name from Selah to Joktheel (2 Kings xiv, 7). But the Edomites afterward were avenged; for among the goods which fell to the conquerors were some of their idols, which, although impotent to deliver their own worshippers, Amaziah beheld himself to worship (Withof, De Amasiae des Edom. secum abducente, Ling. 1678). This proved his ruin (2 Chron. xxv, 14-16). Puffed up by his late victories, he thought also of reducing the ten tribes under his government, and sent a challenge to the king of Judah to meet him in a pitched battle. After a courteous reply, he was defeated by King Joash of Israel, who, carried him a prisoner to Jerusalem, which, according to Josephus (Ant. ix, 9, 8), opened its gates to the conqueror under a threat that otherwise he would put Amaziah to death—a statement evidently made conjuncturally to explain the fact that the city was taken apparently without resistance (2 Kings xiv, 13). Joash broke down a great part of the city wall on the side toward the Israelitish frontier, plundered the city, and even laid his hands upon the sacred things of the temple. He, however, left Amaziah on the throne, but about taking his behavior (2 Kings xiv, 8-14; 2 Chron. xxv, 17-24), B.C. cir. 824. The disasters which Amaziah's infatuation had brought upon Judah probably occasioned the conspiracy in which he lost his life, although a space of fifteen years intervened (2 Kings xiv, 17). On receiving information of this conspiracy, he hastened to throw himself into the fortress of Lachish; but he was pursued and slain by the conspirators, who brought back his body "upon horses" to Jerusalem for interment in the royal sepulchre (2 Kings xiv, 19, 20; 2 Chron. xxxv, 27, 28). His name, for some reason, is omitted in our Savior's genealogy (Matt. i, 8; comp. 1 King. viii, 2). See also 2 King. i, 12. New JERUSALEM DICTIONARY. 3. The priest of the golden calves at Bethel, who, in the time of Jeroboam II, complained to the king of Amos's prophecies of coming evil, and urged the prophet himself to withdraw into the kingdom of Judah and prophesy there; for which he was threatened with severe family degradation in the approaching captivity of the northern kingdom (Amos vii, 10-17), B.C. cir. 750. 4. The father of Josiah, which latter was one of the Simeonite chiefs who expelled the Amalekites from the valley of Gedor in the time of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv, 46). B.C. cir. 712. AMBASSADOR.Ambassador, a public minister sent from one sovereign to another as a representative of his prince, to another. At Athens ambassadors mounted the palat of the public orators, and there acquainted the people with their errand. At Rome they were introduced to the senate, and there delivered their commissions (Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Legatus). In the Old Testament, the word יִשְׁמָר, i.e., one who goes on an errand, is thus rendered in Josh. iv, 4; (Num. xxx, 14; 1 Chron. xvi, 14; Obad. 1; and this translation is used for יִשְׁמֵר, millet, an interpreter, in 2 Chron. xxxii, 31; also for יִשְׁמֵר, molad, messenger, in 2 Chron. xxxiv, 21; Isa. xxxiv, 4; xxiii, 7; Ezek. xvii, 15. Ministers of the Gospel in the New Testament are said to be ambassadors (prophetae), because they are appointed by God to declare his will to men, and to promote a spiritual alliance with him (2 Cor. v, 20; Eph. vi, 20). See ALLIANCE.
treat. The inviolability of such an officer's person may perhaps be inferred from the only recorded infraction of it being followed with unusual severities toward the vanquished, probably designed as a condign chatissisment of that offence (2 Sam. x, 2-5; comp. xii, 26-31). The earliest examples of ambassadors employed occur in the cases of Edom, Moab, and the Amorites (Num. xx, 14; xxi, 21; Judg. xi, 17-19), afterward in that of the fraudulent Gibeonites (Josh.
ix, 4, etc.), and in the instances of civil strife mentioned in Judg. xii, 22, and xx, 12 (see Cuneus de Rep.
Hebr. ii, 30, with notes by Nicolaus in Ugolini Thes.
aurii, iii, 771-774). They are mentioned more frequently during and after the contact of the great adjacent monarchies of Syria, Babylon, etc., with those of Jusdah and Israel, e.g. in the invasion of Sennacherib.
They were usually men of high rank, as in that case
the chief captain, the chief cup-bearer, and chief of the enuchs were deputed, and were met by delegates of similar dignity from Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 17, 18; see also Isa. xxx, 4). Ambassadors are found to have been employed, not only on occasions of hostile challenge or insolent menace (2 Kings xiv, 8; 1 Kings xx, 2, 6), but of friendly compliment, of request for alliance or other aid, of submissive deprecation, and of curious inquiry (2 Kings xiv, 8; xvi, 7; xviii, 14; 2 Chron. xxxii, 31). The dispatch of ambassadors with urgent haste is introduced as a token of national grandeur in the obscure prophecies in Isa. xviii, 2.

Amber (Heb. ויחות, ḥashmāl', Ezek. i, 27; viii,
3) is a yellow or straw-colored gummy substance, originally a vegetable production, but reckoned to the mineral kingdom. It is found in lumps in the sea and on the shores of Pruasia, Sicily, Turkey, etc. Externally it is rough; it is very transparent, and on being rubbed yields a fragrant odor. It was formerly supposed to be medicinal, but is now employed in the manufacture of trinkets, ornaments, etc. (Fawcett Cyclopedia, s. v.).

Amber in the Church of St. Clement at Rome.

Ambo, a raised platform or reading-desk, from which, in the primitive Church, the gospel and epistle
were read to the people, and sometimes the sermon preached. Its position appears to have varied at different times; it was most frequently on the north side of the entrance into the chancel. The singers also had their separate ambo.—Bingham, Orig. Excl. uk.
iii, ch. vii.

Baldus and Durandus derive the name from the circumstance of there being a double flight of steps to the ambo; others, with more probability, from the Greek ἀμβώνα, to ascend. Treatises on this subject are by Geret, De vet. ecclesiae ambonibus (Onold. 1575); Weibling, De ambonibus vet. ecclesiae (Lips. 1687). See

Ambrose, deacon of Alexandria, flourished chiefly about the year 290; he was a man of wealth, and by his wife, Mabella, had many children. For some time he was entangled in the errors of the Valentin-ians and Marcionites, but Origen brought him to the true faith. With Origen he became closely intimate, and they studied together. He is said to have furrished Origen with seven secretaries, whom he kept constantly at work. Ambrose died about 250, after the persecution of Maximinus, in which he confessed
the faith boldly with Protocetes, a priest of Caesarea in Palestine. His letters to Origen, which St. Jerome commends highly, are lost. The Roman Church commemorates him as confessor on March 17. Euseb.

Ambrose, bishop of Milan, was born about 340,
at Treves (Triumfatum), where he later resided as prefect of the Praetorium, among the Gauls.
It is said that while he was yet an infant a swarm of bees settled upon his mouth, which his father interpreted as a portent of future greatness. After his father's death his mother took him to Rome, where he received the education of an advocate under Anicius Probus and Symmachus. For some time he pleaded at the bar, and his success, together with his family influence, led to his appointment (about A.D. 370) as consular prefect of Liguria and Emilia, a tract of Northern Italy which extended, as near as can be ascertained, to Bologna. It is said that Anicius Probus, the prefect, when he sent him to his government, did so in those remarkable words, which may well be called prophetic, "Go, then, and act, not as a judge,
but as a bishop." Ambrose made Milan his residence;
and when Auxentius the bishop died, the people of Milan assembled to elect a successor. This the cruel divisions made in the Church by the Arian hæresy rendered no easy matter; and the contest was carried on between Catholics and Arians with such violence that Ambrose was obliged to proceed himself to the church to exhort the people to make their election quietly and in order. At the close of his speech the whole assembly, Arians and Catholics, with one voice demanded him for their bishop. Believing himself to be unworthy of so high and responsible an office, he tried all means in his power to evade their call, but in vain, and he was at last constrained to yield (A.D. 374). He was yet only a catechumen; he had then to be baptized, and on the eighth day after he was consecrated bishop. He applied himself with unexampled zeal; gave all his property to the Church and poor, and adopted an ascetic mode of life. He opposed the Arians from the very beginning of his episcopacy, and soon acquired great influence both with the people and the Emperor Valentinian. In 382 he presided at an ecumenical synod in Aquileia (where he was bishop), called to reform the discipline of the Western Church. The writings of the early fathers concur in recording the employment of music as a part of public worship, although no regular ritual was in existence to determine its precise form and use. This appears to have been first supplied by Ambrosius, who instituted that method of singing known by the name of the "cantus Ambrosianus," which is said to have had a reference to the modes of the ancients, especially to that of Ptolemaeus. This is rather matter of conjecture than certainty, although the Eastern origin of Christianity and the practice of the Greek fathers render the supposition probable. The effect of the Ambrosian chant is described by those terms by which it is in the cathedral of Milan. "The voices," says Augustine, "flowed in at my ears, truth was distilled into my heart, and the affection of pious overflowed in sweet tears of joy." Whether any genuine relics of the music thus described exist at the present time is exceedingly doubtful; the style of singing it may, however, have been preserved; and it is still said to be applied at Milan to compositions of a date comparatively recent (Bich. Diet. Soc. Useful Knowledge). His writings are more numerous than valuable. Ten of the many hymns which are ascribed to him are generally admitted to be genuine, but it is doubtful whether the Ambrosian bishop. He devoted himself to his work in the cathedral of Milan. 1682 for non-conformity. He was a man of great learning, which he adorned by sincere ardor piety. He died in 1684. Amid the labors of an active ministry he found time to prepare several works of practical religion for the press. He was the author of "The Three Anti-Nicene Fathers," "Christological Doctrines," "Sacraments," "Sanctification, and Meditations on Life, Death, and Judgment," etc. But his book entitled "Looking unto Jesus" is one which has most of all received, and longest retained, the award of popular favor. Both these, with other writings, may be found in his "Complete Works" (Dundee, 1792, fol.).

Ambrose, archbishop of Moscow, with his family name Vasily-Konstantin, was born in 1733, at St. George's, in the government of Tcheremisov, in 1708. After studying at the seminary of St. Alexander Nevsky, he became, in 1736, one of its teachers. In 1738 he entered a monastic order, and, according to custom, changed his Christian name, assuming, that is, of Ambrose. After being for some time prefect of studies at the academy of St. Alexander, he was transferred as archimandrite to the convent of New Jerusalem at Y莫ezovskis, and, in 1758, was consecrated bishop, first of Perevolsky, and later, of the diocese of Krasnoye, near Moscow. He was appointed archbishop of Moscow in 1761, and retained his dignity until his death. He was the author of a description of 1761 to 1769, translated by Syroed. Ambrose displayed great zeal in the service of his Church. He established a number of new churches and monasteries, and distinguished himself by his zeal for the benevolent institutions of Moscow. His death was very tragic. In 1771 the pestilence raged in Moscow with extraordinary fury, and carried off, it is reported, nearly one hundred thousand people. The people, attributing a miraculous healing power to the sacred image of the Virgin (called "the Iberian"), the whole population of the city crowded around the chapel where this image was preserved. Ambrose, who was sufficiently enlightened to see that the contagion in this way would spread more rapidly than before, had the miraculous image removed during the night. On the next day the populace, charging at once the archbishop with the removal, rushed toward his house. The archbishop had retired to a monastery outside of the city. The populace followed him, and broke open the gates of the monastery. The archbishop concealed himself in the sanctuary of the church, where only priests are allowed to enter; but they found him out, and dragged him to the gate of the temple. The archbishop begged them for enough time to receive once more the eucharist; this was granted to him. The populace remained silent spectators of the ceremony; the archbishop was then dragged out of the church and strangled, Sept. 16. Ambrose published a large number of translations from the Church fathers, some sermons, and a liturgy.—Hoefer, "Biblioth. A. M. 841.

Ambrosiaster, a Pseudo-Ambrosian, the usual name of the unknown author of the "Commentaria in Epistolae B. Pauli," which is contained in the second volume of the Benedictine edition of the works of Ambrose. It appears from the book itself that it was compiled while Ambrose was bishop of Milan. Ambrose quotes a passage from this book, but ascribes it to St. Hilary, from which circumstance many have concluded that Hilary, a deacon of the Roman Church under Damsus, who joined the schism caused by Bishop Lucifer of Caesarea, was the author. But again, in the passage it may be adduced that Augustine would not have given to a follower of Lucifer the title of saint.—Hersz., i, 277.

Ambrosius ad Nemus (AMBROSE-AT-THE-WOOD), ORDER OF, monks of. The origin of the order is known from a bull of Gregory XI, addressed in 1375 to the monks of the church of St. Ambrose without the walls of Milan; from which it appears that these monks had for a long time been subject to a rule. It had no fixed rule, in consequence of which the pope, at the prayer of the archbishop, had ordered them to follow the rule of Augustine, permit them to assume the above name, to recite the Ambrosian office, and directed that their prior should be confirmed by the archbishop of Milan. They afterward had many establishments in different parts of Italy; but they were independent of the church another until Eugenius IV, in 1441, united them into one conclave, exempted them from the jurisdiction of the ordinaries, making the convent at Milan the chief of the order. In 1579 they applied to St. Charles Borromeo to aid them in the reformation of their houses, whose discipline had become somewhat relaxed. In 1589 Sixtus V united them to the congregation of St. Barnabas; but in 1650 both were dissolved by Pope Innocent X.—Helyot, ed. Migne, i, 203.

Ambuscade and Ambush (Heb. לארי, arab', to lie in wait), in military phraseology, are terms used promiscuously, though it is understood that the first more properly applies to the act, and the second to the locality of a stratagem which consists mainly in the concealment of an army, or of a detachment, where the enemy, if he ventures, in ignorance of the measure, within the sphere of its acting, is suddenly taken at a disadvantage, and liable to be totally defeated. The principles which must guide the contrivers of an ambuscade have been nearly the same in all ages; embracing concealment from the observation of an enemy so as to create no suspicion; a position of advantage in case of being attacked by superior forces; and having reserves of re-inforcements ready for the issue forth to attack, without impediment, when the proper moment is arrived. The example of Joshua at the capture of Ai (Josh. viii) shows the art to have been practised among the Jews on the best possible principles. The failure of a first attempt was sure to produce increased confidence in the assailant, who, being the armed, but not disciplined inhabitants of a strong place, were likely not to be under the control of much caution. Joshua, encamping within sight, but with a valley intervening, when he came up to make a false attack, necessarily appeared to disadvantage, the enemy being above him, and his retreat toward his own line to render difficult. The way was lying likewise above him on the other side, and both sides no doubt very steep, as they are in general in the hills of this region. His men therefore fled, as directed, not toward the north, where the camp was, but eastward, toward the plain and desert; while in the hills, not behind, but on the west side, lay the ambuscade, in sufficient force alone to vanquish the enemy. This body of Israelites had not therefore the objectionable route to take from behind the city, a movement that must have been seen from the walls, and would have given time to close the gates, if not to warn the citizens back; but, rising from the woody hills, it had the shortest direction to pass over to the town directly to the gate; and, if an accident had caused failure in the army of Joshua, the detachment could not itself be intercepted before reaching the camp of the main body; while the citizens of Ai, pursuing down hill, had little chance of returning up to the gates in time, or of being able to maintain any effectual onset (see Stanley, "Sinai and Pales.," p. 198). In the attempt to surprise Shechem (Judg. ix, 30 sq.) the operation, so far as it was a military manoeuvre, was unskilfully laid, although ultimately successful in consequence of the party spirit within, and the intelligence which Abimelech (g. v.) maintained in the fort (Kittis, s. v. See War.)
AMERICANS

Adéaména, Adéaméntza, an order of minor friars, instituted about 1462; so called from their professing themselves amans Deum, loving God; or amans Deum, loved by God. Others derive the name from their founder, Adéanou or Amenou, a Portuguese nobleman. They wore a gray habit and wooden shoes, and girt themselves with a cord. They had twenty-eight convents in Italy, besides others in Spain, and were united by Pope Pius V partly with the mendicant order, and partly with that of the Secolanti, or wooden-shoe hermits.—Helyot, ed. Magne, i, 200.

"A'men" (Heb. "amen"). ἀμήν, āmēn, a particle of attestation adopted into all the languages of Christendom.

(1.) This word is strictly an adjective, signifying "firm," and, metaphorically, "faithful." Thus, in Rev. iii, 14, our Lord is called "the amen, the faithful and true witness." In Isa. lxv, 16, the Heb. has "the God of amen," which our version renders "the God of truth," i.e., of fidelity. In its adverbial sense amen means certainly, truly, surely. It is used in the beginning of a sentence by way of emphasis—rarely in the Old Test. (Jer. xxviii, 6), but often by our Saviour in the New, where it is commonly translated "verily, verily." In Joh. vi, 49, etc., it means used by him in this way doubly, i.e., "verily, verily." In the end of a sentence it often occurs singly or repeated, especially at the end of hymns or prayers, as "amen and amen" (Psa. xli, 14; lixii, 19; lixiii, 58). The proper signification of it in this position is to confirm the words which have preceded, and invoke the fulness of them: "so be it," fiat, Sept. καλός. Hence in oaths, after the priest has repeated the words of the covenant or imprecation, all those who pronounce the amen bind themselves by the oath (Num. v, 22; Deut. xxvii, 15, 17; Neh. vi, 13, viii, 6; 1 Chron. xvi, 86; comp. Psa. civ, 48).—Kittel, s.v. See ὄΑΣΙΩ. [OASIS.] (11.) In the public worship of the primitive churches it was customary at the assembly to say Amen at the close of the prayer; a custom derived from apostolic times (1 Cor. xiv, 16). Several of the fathers refer to it. Jerome says that in his time, at the conclusion of public prayer, the united voice of the people pronounced Amen, the very last of words in the tongue of a thunder. Great importance was attached to the use of this word at the celebration of the eucharist. At the delivery of the bread the bishop or presbyter, according to the Apostolical Constitutions, is directed to say, "The body of Christ;" at the giving of the cup the same order is directed to say, "The blood of Christ; the cup of life;" the communicant is directed on each occasion to say "Amen." This answer was universally given in the early Church. See Response.

(III.) It is used as an emphatic affirmation, in the sense "so be it," at the end of all the prayers of the Church of England. It is sometimes said in token of undoubting assent, as at the end of the creed, Amen. "So be it." The order of the Church of England directs that "the people shall, at the end of all prayers, answer Amen."—Bingham, bk. xv, ch. iii, § 25.

Amerita, a subdivision of the Mennonites, so named from Jacob Amen, a Mennonite minister of Amenityal, Switzerland. He was not a man of note, nor was he considered the founder of a sect. The perpetuation of his name in this way is due to a contro-very in 1670 on minor points of doctrine between Jacob Amen and John Heiny, another Mennonite, which produced, finally, a schism in the Mennonite body. By a corruption the name of the sect was, in some of the members of the sect in Pennsylvania, where they abounded, are called Amish, Amish, or Omishers. See Mennonites.

America. I. Church History.—Of the religious creeds of the American aborigines we treat in the article AMERICAN INDIANS. Christianity coincides with the discovery of America by Europeans. About the year 1000 the Icelanders and Norwegians are said to have established in Greenland twelve churches, two convents, and one bishopric (of Gardar) on the eastern shore, and four churches on the western. In 1166 some priests who have made a voyage of discovery to regions which have recently become more known by Parry, John and James Ross, and others. All traces of Christianity, however, had disappeared when, in the sixteenth century, North America, and in particular Greenland, were discovered again. The discovery of America by Columbus was followed by the establishment of the Roman Church in South and Central America, in the West Indies, and on the southern coast of North America. Canada, the northern lakes, and the Mississippi valley were for a century under the sway of the French, and thus likewise under the influence of the Roman Church. But the temperate zone, the heart of the continent, was reserved for the Protosts of England, Germany, Holland, and the persecuted Hugenots. The Church of England was established in Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia; in Maryland after the decline of the Roman Catholic influence, and in New York after its cession by the Dutch. Its attempts at gaining ground in other colonies failed; and at the time of the Revolution its growth had remained far behind that of the persecuted and dissenting bodies of the Old World, which soon became the strength of the New. The Puritans and non-conformists occupied New England, the Quakers planted Pennsylvania, the Presbyterians and Methodists became numerous in the Middle States, and a number of minor denominations found here religious toleration, and helped to foster the spirit of religious liberty. The Declaration of Independence, by which thirteen British colonies freed themselves from the mother country in 1776, marks a new era not only in the church history of the United States but in the general history of Christianity. The union between church and state was dissolved; the state renounced its claims over the consciences of men, and the church sought its support no longer from the state, but from the voluntary contributions of its members. See United States. This principle, which was originally established in the United States only, soon began to exert an influence over the churches of the whole country, and even to spread across the Atlantic, where it prepared, slowly but steadily, an entire transformation of the relation between church and state. Protestantism has since not only brought the whole of North America and a part of South America under its banner, but has steadily pressing forward toward the south, and narrowing the territory of the Roman Church. The states of Central and South America have nominally remained connected with the Roman Church, but religious toleration has been established in most of them, and even the states which were founded by the Roman Church, clergy and people, are seeking to free themselves against an advanced liberal party, which is determined to abolish all the privileges of the Roman Church, and to introduce unlimited religious liberty. For the details of American Church History, see the articles on the various states, United States, Mexico, etc. A brief survey of the development of American Church History is given in the Table of Church History.

It appears from the above table that Protestant Christianity prevails in the United States, in British America, and in the Dutch, Danish, and Swedish possessions in the West Indies and South America. In the rest of America the Protestant population consists mostly of foreigners. But in Brazil a large immigration from Germany and Switzerland has already established the foundation of a native Church; and in New Granada, Chili, the Argentine Confederation, Uruguay, and Hayti flourishing congregations labor for the same end. The Roman Church prevails in Mexico, the West Indies, and all the Central and South American states, and is also numerously represented in the United States and in the British possessions. In Russian America all the native Russian population belongs to the Greek Church. A number of pagan In-Indians still live in nearly all parts of America. Their number is estimated at about 1,000,000. Jews, Mormons, and Spiritualists are found almost only in the United States, where there are also a number of other congregations which expressly place themselves outside of Christianity, without having established any other positive creed (see Schem, Ecclesiastical Yearbook for 1869, p. 14-16).

American and Foreign Bible Society. See Bible Societies.

American and Foreign Christian Union, a religious association of the United States, organized in the city of New York in May, 1849. It was formed by the fusion of three societies which had existed for several years, the Foreign Evangelical Society, the American Protestant Society, and the Philo-Italian Society. The Foreign Evangelical Society was organized in 1829 to advance the work of evangelization in papal countries generally. It had been preceded by the French Association, which was founded in 1834, in order to assist the evangelical efforts made by the French Protestants, and, in 1836, changed its name into that of Evangelical Association. The receipts of the French Association and the Evangelical Association were $19,759, those of the Foreign Evangelical Society during the ten years of its existence, $154,345. At the request of the French Association, Rev. Dr. Baird went, in 1835, for three years to Paris, for the purpose of learning what could be done by the American churches to aid their Protestant brethren in France, and later, at the request of the Foreign Evangelical Society, travelled for four more years extensively on the Continent in prosecution of the same work. In 1840 the society had missionaries in France, Belgium, Sweden, Canada, Hayti, and South America, besides having aided the work in Germany, Russia, and Italy. The American Protestant Society was formed in 1843 in consequence of the large immigration of Roman Catholics into the United States. Its objects were: To enlighten Protestants of this country in regard to the errors of Rome, and to convert and save the members of the Roman Church in the United States. A number of colporteurs and other missionaries were maintained, laboring mostly among the Irish and German immigrants. The total receipts from 1843 to 1849 were $29,160. The Philo-Italian Society, which later took the name of the Christian Alliance, was also founded in 1843. As the proceedings of this society were not published, little is known of it farther than that it employed an active agent, a Protestant Italian, for years on the confines of Italy. The American and Foreign Christian Union, which arose in 1849 out of a union of these societies, undertook the work and assumed the responsibility of all combined. Its objects are: "to diffuse and promote, by missions, colportage, the press, and other appropriate agencies, the principles of religious liberty, and a pure and evangelical Christianity, both at home and abroad, wherever a corrupted Christianity exists." In the first two years of its existence, 1850 and 51, it expended nearly $15,000 for the removal to Illinois of some 500 or 600 Portuguese exiles, who had been exiled from Madeira for having embraced Protestantism. The receipts from 1843 to 1859 have ranged from $45,000 to $90,000, making a total of over $300,000 in ten years. In 1863 they were $59,683; in 1864, $73,778. It publishes a monthly magazine of 82 pages, the "Christian World" (formerly the "American Christian Home Magazine"), which has a large circulation. The society also published a Sabbath-school library, consisting of 21 volumes, mostly exposing the doctrines and usages of the Roman Church. The agents of the society in the home field preach the Gospel to Roman Catholics and Jews, French, Pennsylvania Dutch, Dutch, Irish, German, and Bohemian. In the foreign field, the society sustains missionaries itself, or supports the Protestant missions of other societies in Canada, Hayti, Mexico, South America, Ireland, Western or Azore Islands, Sweden, Belgium, Switzerland, Piedmont, France. The number of laborers employed in the home field was in 1859, 63; the number of teachers, male and female, 875; making a force of 488 persons endeavoring tocounteract the influence of the popery. The aggregate number of children and youths which were reported, up to May, 1859, as having been brought under evangelical influences, was upward of 14,550. The total number of converts from the Roman Catholic Church amounted, in 1858, to 1,404.

Amos (or Amorim), William, a celebrated Puritan divine, born in Norfolk, 1576, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, under Dr. Perkins, by whom he was taught evangelical religion. Appointed chaplain to the university, he gave great offence by a sermon in which he inveighed against some of the bad practices of the university, e.g. card-playing, etc., and, to avoid expulsion, he left England and became English chaplain in the Hague, and afterward divinity professor at Franeker in Friesland. He attended the synod of Dort, and died at Rotterdam, Nov. 14, 1633. He wrote many works, among them, 1. Purismus Anglicanus (1623, in English, 1641)—2. De Conscientia (1630, in English, 1648)—3. A Reply to Bishop Morton (on Ceremonies) (1647, in English; Sermon, in Geneva Ceremonies in God's Worship (1633)—5. Antinomianidion, 1629 (against the Remonstrants)—6. Medulla Theologia (1623 and often after, both Lat. and Eng.). His Latin works are collected under the title Opera, quae Lat. scrip. omnia (Amst. 1658, 5 vols. 12mo). Amos was eminent in casuistry (q. v.), and was a strong opponent of Nativity, i.e. Intercalation, Hist, i Puritaniss., i. 572 sq.; Brooks, Lives of Puritans, ii. 405; Mosheim, Ch. T. άμυθυστος, Vulg. ametystus), a precious stone mentioned in Scripture as the Ninth in the breastplate of the high-priest (Exod. xxvii, 19; xxxix, 12), and the twelfth in the foundations of the New Jerusalem with ten thousand carbuncles (Rev. xxi, 20). The name is merely a corruption of the Greek amethystos, which name is applied are of a color which seems composed of a strong blue and deep red, and, according as either of these prevails, exhibit different tinges of purple, sometimes approaching to violet, and sometimes declining even to a rose color. From these differences of color the ancients distinguished five species of the amethyst; modern collections afford many varieties, but they are all comprehended under two species—the Oriental amethyst and the Occidental amethyst. These names, however, are given to stones of essentially different nature, which were, no doubt, anciently confounded in the same manner. The Oriental amethyst is very scarce, and of great hardness, lustre, and beauty. It is, in fact, a rare variety of the adamantine spar, or corundum. Next to the diamond, it is the hardest substance known. It contains about 90 per cent. of alumine, a little iron, and a little silica. Of this species emery, used in cutting and polishing glass, etc., is composed. The more common Occidental amethyst, is a variety of quartz, or rock crystal, and is found in various forms in many parts of the world, as India, Siberia, Sweden, Germany, Spain; and even in England very beautiful specimens of tolerable hardness have been discovered. This also loses its color in the fire (Penney Cyclopaedia, s. v.). Amethysts were much used AMHARIC LANGUAGE, a degenerate Semitic dialect, mixed with many African words, spoken with the greatest purity in Amhara, one of the principal divisions of the Abyssinian empire. See Amhara.

It is apparently referred to by Agatharcides (Hudson, Geogr. Min. i, 46), about B.C. 129, under the name Καυηακα ληγις, as the language of the Trogloydites of Ethiopia. It began to prevail in Abyssinia over the Geez language about A.D. 1300, and is more or less prevalent throughout that country to the present day. It has been more or less confined to the theological treatises and translations of portions of the Holy Scriptures, which have been printed mostly by the British and Foreign Bible Society, in Ethiopic character (See Gesenius, in Ershire's Encyclopaedia, s. v. Amharische Sprache.). The Amharic has the same alphabet as the Ethiopic, with the addition of seven characters, which have, respectively, the sound nearly of sh, ch (soft), nasal n, guttural (German) ch, weak (French) ch, g (soft), and z (as in wattle). The vowels and diphthongs are the same in number and sound as in Ethiopic; also the same rules of pronunciation prevail as in that language. The formation of nouns differs very little from the Ethiopic. The indication of gender is the same. Declension takes place by means of certain particles; but the accusative case exhibits the peculiar Arabic "numination." See Arabic Language.

The verb appears in four modifications, as active (neuter), a two-form active, and a two-form passive voice, perfectly clearly distinguishable by a change in formation. Besides the "conjunctive" form of the present imperative and infinitive, there is also a peculiar kind of participle. Numerals and pronouns are, as to their form and use, entirely after the Semitic analogies. The same is almost universally true of the particles. In the arrangement of words the nominative follows the other cases, and some of the conjunctions are placed at the end of the sentence. The best known specimens of Amharic literature are contained in Ebbhragzer's Catechismus Christian. lingua Amharicae, Rome (1787).

An'md (Heb. אמא, "mother," prob. a corrompt. form of the name A'man: q.v.), the chief of a family that returned from Babylonia ( Ezra ii, 67); more properly called Ammon (q. v.) in the parallel passage (Neh. vii, 59).

Amiansthus (Αμιανθος, unstated, l. b. by sin; Heb. vii, 3, "unconfined," and so tropically, Jas. i, 27; undecaying, 1 Pet. i, 4; chaste, Heb. xiii, 4), the name of a fibrous mineral substance commonly called asbestos. This extraordinary mineral was well known to the ancients. It occurs in long, parallel, extremely slender fibers, which, when wet, were pliable, and when dried, formed a network of more or less abundantly, and exists, forming veins, in serpentine, mica, slate, and primitive lime- stone rocks; the most delicate variety comes most pleasantly from Savoy and Corsica. Its fibrous texture, and the little alteration it undergoes in strong heats, caused it to be used by the Eastern nations as an article for the fabrication of cloth, which, when soiled, was purified by throwing it into the fire, from whence it always came out clear and perfectly white; hence it obtained the name of amiantus, or unsullied. By the Romans this cloth was purchased at an exorbitant price, for the purpose of wrapping up the bones of the dead, in opposition to their being laid maimed in the funeral pile, in order to prevent their ashes from being mingled with those of the dead.—Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. and Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Asbestos.

Amatite Manuscript (Codex Amiatinus), the most valuable of the Latin uncial MSS. of the Vulgate translation, of which it is designated on (Tischendorf, N. T. Gr. 7th ed. proleg. p. cxviii; Servivius, Intro. to N. T. Crit. p. 264). Its name is derived from the Fiesolana Monastery of Amatino in Tuscany, whence it was brought into the Laurentian Library at Florence, where it still remains. It was written by the Abbot Servandus about A.D. 541, and contains both Testaments, with scarcely any defect, in one very large volume, stichometrically divided without a line. It was pointed out its value, although it had been slightly used for the Sixtine ed. of the Vulg. in 1587-90. Fleck wedgedly edited the N. T. part in 1840; Tischendorf collated it in 1848, and Tregelles in 1846 (Del Furesc paring it for the differences); and it was published by Tischendorf in 1850 (Testamentum Novum, Latina inntegrae editionis); and Lepsius (Denkm. und Lipse. 4to), and again in 1854. The O. T. has been but little examined. The Latin text of Tregelles' N. T. is taken from this MS. (Davidson, Bib. Criticum, ii, 254; Tregelles, in Horne's introd. iv, 353). See Vulgate.

Amice (amice, amiculum sacram.), in Roman antiquity, this was an upper garment worn over the tunic. In ecclesiastical writers, it is a square-shaped piece of fine linen or silk, fastened by a clasp, and, says, was originally a veil worn by women to cover the shoulders. Its use was formerly, as now, different in different places; sometimes it was worn round the neck, and sometimes over the head. When worn over the shoulders and neck, it was called the super-lamellare, or simply lam- neurale. It was originally worn under the alb, but now, over it—a custom which is still preserved among the Maronites. It is still in use in the Roman Catholic Church, but not in the Church of England.

Am'inatal (Heb. אמינית, "truth, true; Sept. ἀμεθ, 25), the father of the prophet Jonah, a native of Gath-hepher (2 Kings xiv, 25; Jon. i, 1). B.C. ante 820.

Am'mah (Heb. אממה, אמה, a cubit, as often; Sept. ἀμαμή v. ἀμαιμίον), a bill "that lieth before Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon;" the sun went down as Joab and Abishai reached this place in pursuit of Abner (2 Sam. ii, 25). The description appears to indicate some eminence immediately east of Gibeon (q. v.). Josephus (Ant. vii, 3, 8) renders, "a place called Ammina" (τον τις τον ἀμαμίαν καλοιδ- σιν; compare the Amma (Ἀμμα) of Jonathan's Targum). Both Syriacum (עַרְכָּם) and Theodotion (ὑπέρ-

See Ben-Ammi. It also stands for his posterny (comp. Ps. lxxiii, 7, 8), usually in the phrase "children of Ammon." Sopoulse speaks: "The expression most commonly employed for this nation is (in the original) "Bene-Ammon;" next in frequency comes "Ammoni" or "Ammonim;" and least often "Ammon." The translators of the Act. Vers. have, as usual, neglected these minute differences, and have employed the phrase "children of Ammon." Ammonites, Ammon, indiscriminately. For No-Amon, see Amón, and No. The name is perpetuated in the modern ruins called Amman, which represent Rabba-Ammon (q. v.).

Ammon, CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH VON, a German theologian, born at Bayreuth, January 16, 1766. He became, in 1786, professor of philosophy in Erlangen; in 1792, professor of theology at the same university, and in 1795, professor of the same faculty at Göttingen. In 1804 he was called back to Erlangen, and was at the same time appointed superintendent and consistorial counsellor at Ansbach. In 1813 he was called chief court-preacher (Oberhofprediger) and chief consistorial counsellor to Dresden. In 1831 he became a member of the state council. The expression, and at the ministry of worship and public instruction, and, subsequently, vice-president of the supreme consistory. He resigned in 1840, and died at Dresden on May 21, 1850. He is chiefly known by his work on the Development of Christianity as a Universal Religion (Fortbildungs geschichte des christlichen Glaubens 4 vols. Leips. 1833-1840), in which he argues in favor of such development of doctrine as may keep theology in harmony with the progress of science. Ammon was a leader of the rationalist school. He was a man of extensive learning, and a copious author. Among his writings are Geschichte d. Humelekt (Göt. 1804); Kanonisierungs sammlung (1792 and 1813, 8vo); Opuscula Theologica (2 vols. 1793, 1803); Bibl. Theologie (2d ed. 1801-2, 8 vol. 8vo); Summa Theologia (3d ed. 1816); Chritiologie (Erld. 1794, 8vo); besides many minor works. He was regarded as one of the first pupil orators of Germany, and is the author of many volumes of sermons. He also edited the Magazin für christliche Prediger (Magazine for Christian preachers, Hanover, 1816-21, 6 vols.). A biographical sketch of Ammon is given in the pamphlet "Christoph Friedrich von Ammon nach Leben, Todt und Wirken" (Leipsic. 1860). See also Bibliotheca Sacra, x, 244.—Winer, Theol. Litteratur.

Am'monite (Heb. ἀµµώνιτης, Sept. ἀµµώνιτης and ἀµµώνιτης; also ἀµµώνις, "children of Ammon;" Sept. νησί τού ἀµµών), the usual designation of the people descended from Ben-Ammi, the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix, 88; comp. Ps. lxxiii, 7). As the elder was by the elder; and dating from the destruction of Sodom. The near relation between the two peoples indicated in the story of their origin continued throughout their existence—from their earliest mention (Deut. ii) to their disappearance from the biblical history (Jud. v. 2) the brother-tribes are named together (comp. Judg. x, 10; 2 Chron. vii, 1; Zeph. ii, 8, etc.). Indeed, so close was their union, and so near their interest, that each would appear to be occasionally spoken of under the name of the other. Thus the "land of the children of Amnon" is said to have been given to the "children of Lot," i. e. to both Ammon and Moab (Deut. ii, 10). The terms are both said to have hired Balaam to curse Israel (Num. xxii. 14, 16; Deut. xxii, 17, 18), whereas the language of that event omits all mention of Ammon (Num. xxii, xxiii). In the answer of Jephthah to the king of Ammon the alliances are continually to Moab (Judg. xi. 15, 18, 25), while Chemosh, the peculiar deity of Moab (Num. xxii. 29), is called "thy god" (ver. 24). The land from Armon to Jabok, which the king of Ammon calls "my land" (ver. 12), is elsewhere distinctly stated to have once belonged to a "king of Moab" (Num. xxii. 26). "Land" or "country" is, however, but rarely ascribed to them, nor is there any reference to those habits and circumstances of civilization—the "plentiful fields," the "hay," the "sump of wine," the "wine-press," and the "grapes-treaders"—which so constantly recur in the allusions to Moab (Isa. xvi, xvi; Jer. xlvi); but, on the contrary, we find everywhere traces of the fierce habits of marauders in their incursions, thrusting out the right eyes of whole cities (1 Sam. vii. 5), ripping up the women with child (Amos i. 13), and desiring to have a very high degree of cruelty (Jer. xii, 6, 7; Jud. vii, 11, 12) to their enemies, as well as a suspicious discourtesy to their allies, which on one occasion (2 Sam. x, 1-5) brought all t? extermination on the tribe (xii, 8). Nor is the connection of the tribes with the one city of Ammon, the fortified hold of Rahab (2 Sam. xvi, 14; Amos i. 13), and the "streets," the "house-tops," and the "high-places" of the numerous and busy towns of the rich plains of Moab (Jer. xlvi; Isa. xvi, xvi). Taking the above into account, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that, while Moab was the settled and civilized half of the nation of Lot, the Bene-Amon formed its predatory and Beduin section. A remarkable confirmation of this opinion occurs in the fact that the special deity of the tribe was worshipped, not in a house or on a high place, but in a booth or tent designated by the very word which most keenly expresses the mode of life, the "bivouac," a nomadic and a settled life (Amos v, 26; Acts vii, 41). See Soccot. (See Stanley, Palast. App. § 89.) On the west of Jordan they never obtained a footing. Among the confusions of the times of the judges we find them twice passing over; once with Moab and Anakim, seizing Jericho, the "city of palm-trees" (Judg. iii. 13), and a second time "to fight against Judah and Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim;" but they quickly returned to the freer pastures of Gilead, leaving but one trace of their presence in the name of Chephir ha-Ammoni, "the hamlet of the Ammonites" (Josh. xvii, 24), situated in the portion of Benjamin some hours at the head of the passes which lead up from the Jordan valley, and form the natural access to the table-land of the west country. Unlike Moab, the precise position of the territory of the Ammonites is not ascertainable. They originally occupied a tract of country (sometimes called Ammon, sometimes Moab) between the two Jordan branches; 2 Macc. iv. 8; comp. Joseph. Ant. v. 7, 9; x. 2, 13) east of the Ammonites, but south of the Moabites, with the point which was occupied by the river Arnon, and from Bashan or Gilead by the Jabok (Deut. iii. 16; Josh. xii. 2). The capital of this naturally well-fortified territory (Num. xxii, 24) was Rabba-Admon (Deut. iii. 11; Josh. xii. 16; comp. Roland, Palaest., p. 168 sq.; Cellarius, Not. ii, 671 sq.). It was previously in the possession of a gigantic race called Zamummim.
AMNONIUS

(Deut. ii, 20), "but the Lord destroyed them before the Ammonites, and they succeeded them and dwelt in their stead." The Israelites, on reaching the borders of the promised land, found Sihon, king of Hebron, in possession by conquest of the district adjoining the Dead Sea (Num. xx. 13; Deut. ii, 20). They were commanded not to molest the children of Ammon, for the sake of their progenitor Lot (Deut. ii, 10). But, though thus preserved from the annoyance which the passage of such an immense host through their country might have occasioned, they showed them no hospitality or kindness; they were therefore prohibited from entering the country of the children of Lot (Deut. ii, 20), and thus transgressed the divine command (Deut. vii, 8). The last appearances of the Ammonites in the biblical narrative are in the books of Judah (v, vi, vii) and of the Maccabees (1 Macc. vi, 6, 38-43), and it has been already remarked that their chief characteristics—close alliance with Moab, hatred of Israel, and cunning cruelty—are maintained to the end. Judas Maccabaeus fought many battles with the Ammonites, and took Jazer, with the towns belonging to it (1 Macc. vi, 8-48). In the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, Josephus (Ant. xiii, 6, 1) speaks of a certain Zenon Cotylas as the ruler of Philistia (the old Elapheth). Justin Martyr affirms that in his time the Ammonites were numerous (Dialog. cum Tryph. § 119). Origen speaks of their country under the general denomination of Arabia (In Job. c. i). Josephus says that the Moabites and Ammonites were inhabitants of Canaan-Syria (Ant. i, 11, 6; xi, 5, 8). See AMMON.

The tribe was governed by a king (Judg. xi, 12; 1 Sam. xii, 9, 12; 1 Sam. xii, 12; 2 Sam. x, 1; Jer. xi, 14) and by "princes," בֶּן־כּוֹת (2 Sam. x, 3; 1 Chron. xix, 8). Their national idol was Molech or Milcom (see Jour. Soc. Lit. 1852, p. 366 sq.), whose worship was introduced among the Israelites by the Ammonith wives of Solomon (1 Kings x, 5, 7); and the high-places built by that sovereign for this "abomination" were not destroyed till the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxii, 13). Besides Nahash and Hannan, an Ammonite king, Bealis, is mentioned by Jeremiah (xi, 14) and Josephus (Ant. i, 9, 8). The following Ammonite names are preserved in the sacred text: Achior (Judith v, 5, etc.), Bealis (Jer. xi, 14), Hannan (2 Sam. x, 1, etc.), Molech, Naaman (1 Kings xiv, 21, etc.), Naresh (1 Sam. xiv, 19), Tobbi (2 Chron. xxvi, 6), Timothetus (1 Macc. v, 6, etc.), Tobijah (Neh. ii, 10, etc.), Zelek (2 Sam. xxiii, 37); to which may probably be added the name Zammumim, applied by the Ammonites to the Raphaim whom they possessed—Kitt, s. v.; Smith, s. v. CANAANITE.

Ammonites. See AMMONITE.

Ammonius, a Christian philosopher, sometimes confounded with Ammonius Saccas, lived at Alexandria in the third century. He is the author of a "Harmony in the Gospel," a work which by several critics is attributed to Eusebius, who is said to have induced Eusebius to write his "Canons." There is a Latin translation of this work by Victor of Capua, entitled Ammonius, vulgo Turuimi, dialectarum, seu harmoniae in quatuor evangelicas (Mayence, 1524, 8vo.), a life of Christ was extracted from this work by Nicholas of Jachète, a later compiler of the Latin sacramentaries, under the title Liber Christi, ex quatuor evangelistis ex Ammonii Alex. fragmenta greciae latina versione, per O. Luscinium (Erfurt, 1564). This Ammonius is perhaps also the author of a metaphor of the gospel of John, which is generally attributed to Nonnus, and which is found in MS. in the library of St. Mark at Venice.—Hoefer, Biographie Générale, ii, 924.
AMMONIUS SACCAS, or Saccopphorus (so called because he was a porter in early life), a philosopher of Alexandria toward the end of the second century. He is considered as the founder of the Neo-Platonic Philosophy. Plotinus, Longinus, and Origen, were among his pupils. His object was to reconcile Plato and Aristotle, and to establish the schools of both. Ammonius had been educated in Christianity; and he seems never to have abandoned the name of the faith, while he was disapproving its doctrines and its essence. Porphyry asserts that Ammonius deserted Christianity, Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi, 19) that he adhered to it. His pupil a certain Eunapius, variously attributed by the most modern divines, others have added a third, that Eunapius mistook a Christian writer of the same name for the heathen philosopher; and this is warmly maintained by Lardner (Works, ii, 458; vii, 446). He was a man of great talents and energy, and indefatigable in the pursuit of knowledge.—Waddington, C. Hist. ch. iii; Tarnemann, Hist. Phil. § 208; Bruce, Hist. Phil. ii, 206; Mosheim, Comm. ii, 584, 7; Simon, Hist. de l'école d'Alexandrie, i, 204; Dehaan, Essai sur Am- moni s Saccas (Bruxelles, 1886, 4to). See Alexandrian School; Eclectics; New Platonists.

Am'non (Heb. Am'môn, יְרֵעַ [2 Sam. xii, 20, יְרֵעַ יְרֵעַ אַמִּיֹּן, Am'môn], faithful; Sept. 'A'môn), the name of two men.
1. The first named of the four sons of Shimon or Shamuel, of the children of Efraim, the descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 20, comp. ver. 17), B.C. prob. post 1612.
2. The eldest son of David by Abinoam of Jezreel (1 Chron. iii, 1), born at Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 2), B.C. cir. 1052. He is only known for his violation of his half sister Tamar, B.C. cir. 1081, which her full brother Absalom revenged two years after, by causing him to be assassinated while a guest at his table (2 Sam. xiii). See Absalom. The Sept. (in a clause added in 2 Sam. xiii, 21, but wanting in the Hebrew) assigns as the reason for David's refraining from executing the penalty due to Amnon, that "he loved him because he was his first-born." A fact that no doubt formed an additional incentive to the ambitious Absalom for putting him out of the way. See David.

A'mok (Heb. A'mok, עֵמֶק, deep; Sept. 'A'môû, 'A'mûkh), the father of Eber, and a chief among the priests that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 7, 20), B.C. 586.

Amolo or Amulo, archbishop of Lyons, A.D. 841, was one of the opponents of Gotteschalcus, but seems to have been of a different spirit from some of them, Binacmar especially. He wrote, 1. An Epistle to Theobald, about certain pretended relics of saints and the false miracles which were promulgated by the sounders who sold them. Amolo declared it all imposture. 2. To Gotteschalcus, an epistle (Siamondi, Opera, ii, 595) written with a great deal of brotherly love, and declaring that "God had not destined a man to damnation." Also "Orasula duo de Predecessnatorum," to be found in Bib. Max. Patr. xiv, 329.

Amônum (Ἀμωμόν). This word is only found in Rev. xviii, 13 (between "cinnamon" and "odor"). It is also and there omitted in the received text. It denoted an odoriferous plant or seed, used in preparing precious ointments. It is probably derived from the modern ammonium of the druggists (Penney cyclopedia, s. v.), but the exact species is not known. It was of various qualities, growing in Armenia and Media, and also in Pontus, with seeds in clusters like grapes (Pliney, Hist. Nat. xii, 28; Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. ix, 7).

A'mon (Heb. Am'môn, יְרֵעַ, builder [the deriv. of No. 3 is prob. different]), the name of three men and a deity.
1. (Sept. 'A'môn and 'Ezyph v. r. 'Ezyph). The governor of the city of Samaria in the time of Ahab, to whose custody the prophet Micahah was delivered (1 Kings xxii, 26; 2 Chron. xvii, 20, B.C. 885).
2. (Sept. 'A'môn v. r. 'A'môn). The son of Manasseh (by Meshullemeth the daughter of Harus of Jotbah), and fifteenth separate king of Judah, B.C. 642-640. He appears to have derived little benefit from the instructive example which the sin, punishment, and repentance of his father offered; for he restored idolatry, and again set up the images which Manasseh had cast down. To Amon's reign we must refer the terrible picture which the prophet Zephaniah gives of the moral and religious state of Jerusalem; idolatry supported by priests and prophets (i, 4; iii, 4), the poor ruthlessly oppressed (iii, 8), and shameless indifference to evil (iii, 11). He was assassinated in a court conspiracy; but the people put the regicides to death, and raised to the throne his son Josiah, then but eight years old (2 Kings xxiii, 26-28; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 20-28). He is mentioned among the ancestors of Christ (Aµôû, Matt. i, 10; comp. 1 Chron. iii, 14; Jer. i, 2; xxv, 8; Zeph. i, 1). See Judah, Kingdom of.

3. (Sept. 'A'môn). Ammon, an Egyptian and Libyan god, in whom the classical writers unanimously recognise their own Zeus and Jupiter (Αµωμός, Herod. ii, 42; 'A'môûs, Dion. Sic. i, 18). The primitive seat of his worship appears to have been at Merod, from which it descended to Thebes, and thence, according to Herodotus (ii, 54), was transmitted to the oasis of Siwa and to Dodona; in all which places there were celebrated oracles of this god (Plut. Ind. c. 9; Alex. c. 72; Ammianus, vi, 12; Justin, xi, 11; Strabo, i, 49 sqq.; xvii, 814). His chief temple and oracle in Egypt, however, were at Thebes, a city peculiarly consecrated to him, and which is probably meant by the No and No-Amon of the prophets, the Didopollis of the Greeks. He is generally represented on Egyptian monuments

Image of Ammon. From the Egyptian Monuments. by the seated figure of a man with a ram's head, or by that of an entire ram, and of a blue color (Wilkinson, 2 ser. i, 348 sq.). In honor of him, the inhabitants of the Thebaïd abstained from the flesh of sheep, but they annually sacrificed a ram to him and dressed his image in the hide. A religious reason for that ceremony is assigned by Herodotus (hi, 49); but Diodorus (iii, 72) ascribes his wearing horns to a more trivial cause. There appears to be no account of the manner in which his oracular responses were given; but as a sculpture at Karnak, which Creuzer (Symbol. 1, 507) has copied from the Description de l'Égypte, represents his portable tabernacle mounted on a boat and borne on the shoulders of forty priests, it may be conjectured, from the resemblance between several features of that representation and the description of the oracle of Jupiter Ammon in Diodorus, xvii, 50, that his responses were communicated by some indication during the solemn transportation of his tabernacle. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. Ammon.) That the name of this god really occurs in the passage "Behold, I will punish the multitude (literally, Amor) of No" (Jer. xlv. 25), is a view favored by the context and all internal grounds; but in the parallel passage, Ezek. xxx. 15, the equivalent Ahzon, אֶחְזְן, is employed. Comp. also Ezek. xxx. 4, 10, for the use of the latter word with reference to Egypt. These cases, or at least the former two, seem therefore to be instances of paronomasia (comp. Is. xxv. 7; lxxvi. 11, 13). It also is of doubtful origin; if the name No is simply a transliteration of a real name No, this same name No, as seen in Nahum iii. 8, where the English text translates "populous No". The etymology of the name is obscure. Eustathius (ad Dionys. Peripleg. p. 125, ed. Bernhardy) says that, according to some, the word means shepherd. Jablonski (Famil. Egypt. i, 193) proposes an etymology by means of the Hellenic γενεύς, apparently referring to the value of the root as figuring in the word genepos (Klopstock), and Cornillius originally regarded it as meaning glory (Σωτηρείας τις έλημμα, i, 247), but, in his latest interpretation (after Manetho in Plut.), assigned it the sense of hidden. The name accompanies the above figure on the monuments is written Amun, more fully Amun-Re, i.e. "Amon-Suns" (Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 115). Macrobius asserts (Saturnal. i, 21) that the Libyans adored the sun under the form of Amon; and he points to the ram's horns as evidence of a connection with the zoological sign Aries (_arch. p. 276; Pauly, Real-Encycl. i, 407 sq.); but this has been disputed (Jomard, Deser. de l'Egypt. i, 120; Mommsen, Symbolik d. M. 841), although it would seem unsuccessfully (Creuzer, Sym- bolum, ii, 205; Schmidt, De Zodiaci origine _eg_. p. 58, in his Opusc. quibus de _eg_. Illustratur, Carolin. 1785).

4. (Sept. Ῥητις v. r. Ῥητίς.) The head or ascen tors of one of the families of the "Solomon's servants" that returned from Babylon (Neh. vii. 59); called Ami in Ezra ii. 57. B.C. ante 536.

Am'orite (Heb. Amor, אַמְוֹר עִיָּה, Sept. Αμώριφος, the designation of the descendants of one of the sons of Canaan (Gen. x. 16, in like manner of Ammon, with the art., Ἀμύριφος, Sept. Αμώριφος, Auth. Vers. "the Amorites." Gesenius, however, prefers the derivation suggested by Simonia, from an obsolete "height, q. d. mountain," comp. Ewald, Is. Gesch. i. 270 sq.). They were the most powerful and distinguished of the Canaanitic nations (Gen. x. 16; Exod. iii. 8; xiii. 5, xxxii. 3), We find them first noticed in Gen. xiv. 7, "the Amorites that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar," (q. v.), when their cities were captured by the wanderers of the land of Canaan, and were not far from the Dead Sea (Num. xiii. 29; Deut. i. 7, 20). In the promise to Abraham (Gen. xvi. 21), the Amorites are specified as one of the nations whose country would be given to his posterity. But at that time three confederates of the patriarch belonged to this tribe—Mamre, Aner, and Eshcol (Gen. xiv. 8, 21). When the Israelites were about to enter the promised land, the Amorites occupied a tract on both sides of the Jordan. Josephus calls it Amoritis (Ἀμωρίτης, _Ant. iv. 5, 1; 7, 8) and Amorita (Ἀμωρίτα, _Ant. v. 1, 1). They seem to have had already inhabited the southern slopes of the mountains of Judaea (hence called the "mountains of the Amorites, Deut. i. 7; xix. 20), but whether as aborigines or as dispossessors of an earlier race is uncertain, probably the former. It appears, therefore, that from the barren heights west of the Dead Sea (Gen. xiv. 7) they had stretched west to Hebron (Gen. xiv. 15); but it may be added from this, their ancient seat, they may have crossed the valley of the Jordan, and have been driven out by the high table-lands on the east, for there we meet them at the date of the invasion of the country. Sihon, their then king, had taken the rich pasture-land south of the Jabbok, and had driven the inhabitants, their former possessors, across the wide chasm of the Arnon (Num. xxii. 16, 18), which thenceforward formed the boundary between the two hostile peoples (Num. xxi. 18). That part of their territories which lay to the east of the Jordan was allotted to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh. This district was under two kings—Sihon, king of Hebron (frequently called king of the Amorites), and Og, king of Bashan, whose capital was Edreth (Deut. i. 24, compared with Josh. xii. 4; xiii. 12). The Israelites apparently approached from the southeast, keeping "on the other side" (that is, on the east) of the upper part of the Arnon, which there bends southward, so as to form the eastern boundary of the country of Moab. Their request to pass through his land to the Jordan, Sihon was refused (Deut. ii. 20); but he "went out" against them (xxii. 28; ii. 82), was killed with his sons and his people (ii. 38), and his land, cattle, and cities, taken possession of by Israel (xxi. 24, 25, 31; iii. 8, 56). This rich tract, bounded by the Jabbok on the north, the Arnon on the south, Jordan on the west, and "the wilderness" on the east (Judg. xi. 21, 22)—in the words of Josephus, "a land lying between three rivers after the manner of an island" (_Ant. iv. 5, 2)—was, perhaps, in the most special sense, the "land of the Amorites" (Num. xxii. 31; Josh. xii. 2, 9; xii. 9; Judg. xii. 21, 27), but their possessions are distinctly stated to have extended to the east of the Jordan (Deut. ii. 32, 40; 48), embracing "all Gilead and all Bashan" (iii. 10), with the Jordan valley on the east of the river (iv. 49), and forming together the land of the "two kings of the Amorites," Sihon and Og (Deut. xxxi. 4; Josh. ii. 10; ix. 10; xiv. 12). Og also gave battle to the Israelites at Edrei, and was totally defeated. After the capture of Ai, five kings of the Amorites, whose dominions lay within the allotment of the tribe of Judah, united together to wreak vengeance on the Gibeonites for having made a separate peace with the invaders. Joshua, on being apprised of their design, marched to Gibeon and defeated them with great slaughter (Josh. x. 10). Another confederacy was shortly after formed on a still larger scale; the associated forces are described as "much people, even as the sand upon the sea-shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many" (Josh. xii. 4). Josephus says that they consisted of 800,000 armed foot-soldiers, 10,000 cavalry, and 20,000 chariots (_Ant. v. 5, 1_). The day of battle came suddenly upon them by the waters of Merom (the lake Semechonitis of Josephus, _Ant. v. 5, 1, and the modern Bahr el-Huleh), and Israel smote them until they left none remaining (Josh. xi. 8). Still, after their severe defeats, the Amorites, by means of their war-chariots and charioteers, were able to retreat to the hills, and would not suffer them to settle in the plains; they even succeeded in retaining possession of some of the mountainous parts (Judg. i. 86). It is mentioned as an extraordinary circumstance that in the days of Samuel there was peace between Israel and the Amorites (1 Sam. vii, 14). In Solomon's reign a tribute of horse-service was levied on the remnant of the Amorites and other Canaanitic nations (1 Kings xii. 21; 2 Chron. viii. 8). See CANAAN.

A discrepancy has been supposed to exist between Deut. i. 44, and Num. xiv. 45, since in the former the Amorite is said to have attacked the Israelites, and in the latter, the "children of the Amorite," is, that both terms are used synonymously for the "Canaanites" named in the same connection. Thus the Gibeonites in Josh. ix. 7, are called Hivites, yet in 2 Sam. xxii. 1, 2, they are said to be "of the remnant of the Amorites," probably because they were descended from a common stock, and were in a sense subjects of the same prince, as we do not read of any king of the Hivites. The Amorites, on account of their prominence among the Canaanitish tribes, sometimes stand (Josh. xxiv. 18; Amos ii. 9; 1 Kings xxvi. 26) as the representatives of the Canaanites in general (Hammelsward, iii. 56 sq.; Kurz, on the primitive inhabitants of Palestine, in the Luther. Zeitschr. 1846, ii. 49 sq.; _Jour. of_ Sae. Lit. Oct. 1851, p. 166; Apr. 1859, p. 76; Jan. 1858, p. 806; Rosenmüller, Bibli. Geogr. II, i, 255; Reland, Palast. p. 138). But although the name generally denotes the mountain tribes of the centre of the country, yet this definition is not always strictly maintained, very often being applied for the particular part of the history, and the time at which it was written.
AMORT

Nor ought we to expect that the Israelites could have possessed very accurate knowledge of a set of small tribes whom they were called upon to exterminate—where with them they were forbidden to hold any intercourse—and, moreover, of whom the genealogy to each other bears no convincing parallel in the confusion in question. Thus, Hebrom is "Amorite" in Gen. xxiii, 18; xiv, 13, though "Hittite" in xxiii, and "Canaanite" in Judg. i, 10. The "Hivites" of Gen. xxiv, 2, are "Amorites" in xviii, 22; and also in Josh. ix, 7; x, 18, as compared with 2 Sam. xxii, 12. Jerusalem is "Amorite" in Josh. x, 5, 6, but in xvii, 63; xviii, 29; Judg. i, 21; xix, 11; 2 Sam. v, 6, etc., is "Jeusalemite." The "Canaanites" of Num. xiv, 45 (comp. Judg. i, 17), are "Amorites" in Deut. i, 44. Jarmuth, Lachish, and Egelon were in the low country of the Shefelah (Josh. xv. 39, 39), but in Josh. x, 5, 6, they are called "amorites" that dwelt there amongst them; and it would appear as if the "Amorites," who forced the Danites into the mountain (Judg. i, 34, 84) must have themselves remained on the plain. Notwithstanding these few differences, however, from a comparison of the passages previously quoted, it appears plain that "Amorites" was in general a local term, and not the name of a distinct tribe. This is confirmed by the following facts: 1. The wide area over which the name was spread. 2. The want of connection between those on the east and those on the west of Jordan—which is only once hinted at (Josh. ii, 10). 3. The existence of kings like Sihon and Og, whose territories were inseparable and which were called "the two kings of the Amorites," a state of things quite at variance with the habits of Semitic tribes. 4. Beyond the three confederates of Abrāhām and these two kings, no individual Amorites appear in history (unless Aranah or Ornan the Jebusite be one). 5. There are no traces of any peculiar government, worship, or customs, different from those of the other "nations of Canaan." See CAANAITE.

All mountaineers are warlike; and, from the three confederate brothers who at a moment's notice accompanied "Amar the Hebrew" in his pursuit of the five kings, down to those who, not depressed by the slaughter of Sihon and Og, continued to retain the name of Israel, persisted in driving the children of Dan into the mountain, the Amorites fully maintained this character. From the language of Amos (ii, 9) it has been inferred that the Amorites in general were men of extraordinary stature, but perhaps the allusion is to an individual, Og, king of Bashan, who is described by Moses as being the last of the remnant of the giants. His headstock was of iron, "nine cubits in length and four cubits in breadth" (Deut. ii, 21). One word of the "Amorite" language has survived—the name Senir (not "Sheni") for Mount Hermon (Deut. iii, 9); but this was not the Semitic name of the Canaanites, but was given to the Phoenician (Sidonian) on the one side and the Hebrew on the other—KITO, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See HERMON.

Amort, Eustachius, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at the Bibermühl (beaver mill) near Toelz, Bavaria, Nov. 15, 1692. He entered the ordo canonum, and during the period of his studies, he subse-sequently became professor of philosophy, theology, and ecclesiastical law. He followed Cardinal Cervari to Rome, where he gained the favor of Pope Clement XII. He returned to Bavaria in 1735, and died Feb. 5, 1775.

He wrote two works to vindicate the authorship of Thomas à Kempis to the book "De Imalitio Christi" (Stigmati Kumpos, Cologne, 1728, 4to; and Despectio

Criticus, Augsburg, 1761, 4to). Among his numerous other works are a manual of theology in four volumes (Theologiae ecclesiasticae moralis et scholasticae, Augsb. 1761), and a defence of the Roman Catholic Church (Demonstratio criticus Religiosi Catholicos, Augsb. 1781). Amory, Thomas, D.D., an English dissenting minister, born at Taunton, Jan. 28, 1701, and educated under the care of his uncle, Mr. G. Grove, who had a school for training young ministers at Taunton. In 1730 he was ordained to the pastoral office. On the death of Mr. Grove, in 1738, Mr. Amory succeeded him as chief tutor in the academy at Taunton, where he was greatly regarded for his learning, his integrity and his care of the students. In 1762 he was established in the chair of divinity at the Dissenting Academy at London, which he filled with able and stimulating sermons, both practical and affecting to the attentive hearer, were rather too close, judicious, and philosophical for the common run of congregations. When the dissenting ministers, in 1772, formed a design of endeavoring to procure an enlargement of the Toleration Act, Mr. Amory was one of the committee appointed for that purpose. He died on the 24th of June, 1774. He was a good Biblical critic, and an excellent scholar. His principal works are, Sermons (5 vols. v. y.��—A Letter to a Friend on the Perplexities to which Christians are exposed:—A Dialogue on Non-sense after the manner of Xenophon (Lond. 1746):—Form of Dedication to the Planet. He also wrote the Life and edited the Writings of the Rev. Henry Grove (Lond. 1740); also the edited Sermons of Grove, and Grove's System of Moral Philosophy: he wrote the Life and edited the Writings of Dr. George Benson, and edited the Pithy Sermons of Dr. Chandler.—Jones, Chr. A'noe (Heb. A'moé', Am'ô, Am'mó, bome; Sept. and New Test. 'A'mô), the name of two men.

1. One of the twelve minor prophets, and a contemporary of Isaiah and Hosea. He was a native of Te-koah, about six miles south of Bethelhem, inhabited chiefly by shepherds, to which class he belonged, being also a dresser of sycamore trees, and not trained in any of the prophetic schools (i, 1; vii, 14, 15). Though somewhat obscure, he was one of the great seers of his time, and was a native of the kingdom of Israel, and took refuge in Te-koah when persecuted by Amaziah, yet a comparison of the passages Amos i, 1; vii, 14, with Amaziah's language, vii, 12, leads us to believe that he was born and brought up in that place. The period during which he filled the prophetic office was of short duration, unless we suppose that he uttered other predictions which are not recorded. It is stated expressly that he prophesied in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam, the son of Joash, king of Israel, two years before the earthquake (Amos i, 1). This earthquake, to which there is an allusion in Zechariah (xiv, 5), is represented by Josephus (Ant. ix, 10, 4) and some other Jewish writers as a mark of the divine displeasure against Uzziah (in addition to his leprosy) for usurping the priest's office some time before his death. This agrees with the sacred narrative, which informs us that Joatham, his son, acted as regent during his father's last illness, and afterwards became king, and that Joash succeeded him by the grace of the Lord (2 Kings xv, 25, 26). Joash was twenty-five years old, to refer to this association with his father. See JOTHAM. As Uzziah and Jeroboam were contemporaries for about twenty-seven years (B.C. 808-782), the latter part of this period will mark the date when Amos prophesied. This agrees with the intimation in ch. vii, 10, of the proximity of Jeroboam's death. Amos speaks of the conquest of this warlike king as completed (vi, 13; comp. 2 Kings xiv, 23); on the other hand the Assyrians, who toward the end of his reign were approaching Palestine (Hos. x, 5; xi, 5), not only began to give cause for alarm in the city. Amos predicts, indeed, that Israel and other neighboring nations will be punished by certain wild conquests from the north (i, 5; v, 27; vi, 14), but does not name them, as if they were still unknown or unheeded. (See Niemeyer, Charakt. d. Bibel, v, 802 sq.)

Book or Amos.—When Amos received his commission (see Introduction, chap. i), he was a shepherd and a tent-dweller (compare the "cut short" by Hazaël (2 Kings x, 38) toward the close of Jehu's reign, was restored to its ancient limits and splendor by Jeroboam II (2 Kings xiv, 25). But the restoration of national prosperity was followed by the prevalence of luxury, licentiousness, and oppression, to an extent that again provoked the divine displeasure; and Amos was called from the sheepfolds to be the harbinger of the coming judgments. The poor were oppressed (viii, 4), the ordinances of religion thought burdensome (viii, 5), and idleness, luxury, and extravagance were general (iii, 15). The source of these evils was idolatry, of course that of the goddess Asherah (see Introduction, chap. ii). Amos appealed the throne, though it seems probable from 2 Kings xii, 6, which passage must refer to Jeroboam's reign [see Benhadad III], that the rites even of Astarte were tolerated in Samaria, though not encouraged. calf-worship was specially practised at Bethel, where was the temple of the golden calf and the golden Bethel altar (Deut. xi, 26; 40:16, 17). 2. The ninth in the maternal line of ascent from Christ, being the son of Nahum (or Johanan), and the father of Mattathiah (Luke iii, 25). B.C. cir. 400. His name perhaps would be more properly Anglicized into Ammou, and in that case it could have the same derivation as under that article.

Amour, Saint. See Saint-Amour, William.

A'mos (Heb. Amôs), strong, Sept. 'A'moc, the father of the prophet Isaiah (2 Kings xxii, 23), tw, 1:2 Chr. xxiv, 11, 12: 2xxii, 30, 92; Isa. i, 1; ii, 1; xiii, 1; xx, 2), B.C. ante 756. He is also traditionally said to be the son of King Joash, and brother of Amaziah. The rabbins assert that the father of Isaiah was also a prophet, according to a rule among them, that when the father of a prophet is called in Scripture by his name it indicates an anticipation of the gift of prophecy ( Clem. Alex. Stromat. 1. Augustine conjectured (De civ. Dei, xviii, 27) that the prophet Amos was the father of Isaiah; but the names of these two persons are written differently. Besides, the father of Isaiah, as well as Isaiah himself, was of Jerusalem. Some are of opinion that the man of God who spoke to King Amaziah, and obliged him to send back the hundred thousand men of Israel, who he had purchased to march against the Edomites (2 Chron. xxv, 7, 8); but this opinion is supported by no proofs.

Amphibulum (outer coat, from ἀμφίβαι, to throw around), the outermost dress worn by the priest in the service of the altar; not used in the Church of England, but retained in the Roman and Greek churches. It resembled in form the penula, which took the place of the Roman toga. The penula formed a circle, with an aperture to admit the head, while it fell down so as to envelop the person of the wearer. The Romish Church has altered it by cutting it away laterally, so as to expose the arms, and leave only a straight piece before and behind. The Greek Church retains it in its primitive shape. See Vestment.

Amphilochius, St., bishop of Iconium, was born in Cappadocia, and studied for the bar; but, after discharging for some time the office of advocate and judge, he retired into a solitude, where he led a self-denying life. In 574 he was consecrated bishop of Iconium, the metropolitan see of Lycaonia. He attended the second ecumenical council in 581, and in 383 held a synod at Side against the Messallians. The time of his death is unknown, but Jerome speaks of him as still living in 392. He opposed Arianism (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii, 2). Jerome also mentions a treaty concerning the Holy Spirit, written by Amphilochius, in which he proved the godhead of the Holy Ghost. Theodoret, in his dialogues, cites some passages of certain homilies of Amphilochius on the words of our Saviour, "My Father is greater than I," and "The Son can do nothing of Himself," etc. All these fragments were collected and published by Combes (fol. Paris, 1644). Among them are: 1. A Discourse on the Birth of Jesus Christ:—2. A Discourse on the Circumcision:—3. Another on the Meeting with the Lord:—4. Three Homilies—as Lazarus, on the Woes of the Poor, and on Holy Saturday. The fourth, given by Combes, on Psalms, certainly is not his; neither is the life of Basil, and some other pieces which that father has inserted in his collection as the works of Amphilochius. Both Greeks and Latins commemorate him as a saint on the 234th of November.—Theodoret, Ch. Hist. lib. v, cap. 16; Cave, Hist. Eccl. lib. vii, cap. 50; Cassian, Mem. Mon. vii, lib. ii.

Amphipolis (Ἀμφιπόλις, σείτε on both sides), a city of Macedonia, through which Paul and Silas passed on their way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts xix, 1; see Conybeare and Howson, Life of Paul, i, 818 sq.). It was distant 33 Roman miles from Philippi (Itin. Anton. p. 320). It was situated along the Egyptian Way, on the left bank of the river Strymon (by which it was nearly surrounded [hence its name], just below its egress from the lake Kerkine (now Takino), and about three miles above its influx into the sea (Leake, Northern Greece, iii, 181 sq.; Cousinney, Voyage dans le Macedonia, i, 126). This situation upon the banks of a navigable river, a short distance from the sea, with the vicinity of the woods of Kerkine and the gold-mines of Mount Pangeus, rendered Amphipolis a place of much importance (see Kutzen, De Amphipoli, Lips., 1836), and an object of contest between the Thracians, Athenians, Lacedemonians, and Macedonians, to whom it successively belonged (Thucydiad. i, 101; iv, 192 sq.; Herod. vii, 117; Dio. Sic. viii, 8; Appian, iv, 104 sq.; Plin. iv, 17; Lucan, vii, 1053 sq.). It was a colony of the Athenians, and was memorable in the Peloponnesian war for the battle fought under its walls, in which both Brasidas and Cleon were killed (Thuc. v, 6–11). It has long been in ruins; and a village of about one hundred houses called Neochoro New Town." In Turkish Jeni-bek, now occupies part of its site (Tafel, Thessalonica, p. 494 sq.). There is a miserable place near it called Eoblai by the Turks, a corruption of the ancient name. It was called Popolai in the time of the Byzantine empire. (See Athan. Class. Dict. s. v.; Penny Cyclopædia, s. v.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.)

Amphora is a general term among the Greeks and Romans, as often in the Vulgate, for a "pitcher (q. v.)" or vessel to hold wine or water. Thus the passage in Luke xxii, 10, is rendered, "There shall a man meet you bearing a pitcher of water"—(ἐσῴζουσι) ἀμφοραν aquam portan. At other times it is taken for a certain measure. The Roman amphora contained forty-eight sextiers, equal to about seven gallons one pint English wine measure; and the Grecian or Attic amphora contained one third more. Amphora was also a dry measure used by the Romans, and contained about three bushels (Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.).

Amphorae were generally tall and narrow, with a small neck, and a handle on each side (whence the name, from ἀμφί, on both sides, and ποιν, to carry), and terminating at the bottom in a point, which was let into a stand or stuck in the ground. They were commonly made of earthenware. Homer mentions amphorae of gold and stone, and the Egyptians had them of brass; glass vessels of Amphora of this form have been found at Pompeii.

Amphilias (Ἀμφιλίας), a Christian at Rome, mentioned by Paul as one whom he particularly loved (Rom. vii, 8), A.D. 55. It is not known with certainty who Amphilas was; but the Greeks say that he was ordained bishop of Odytopolis, in Messes, by the Apostle Andrew, and was an apostolical person, one of the seventy-two disciples, and a martyr. His festival, in the Greek calendar, is observed Oct. 31.

Ampulla, (1) the name, among Roman ecclesiastical writers, of one of the vessels used at the altar to hold the wine. (2) The vessel for holding the oil in chrismation, consecration, coronation, etc., which frequently appears in the inventory of church furniture, was also called ampulla. The ampulla is used in the coronation of the sovereigns of England.

A'mram (Heb. 'A'mram', אָמְרָם, kindred of the High, i. e. friend of Jehovah), Sept. in Exod. vi, 20, ἀμφίσβητος; in 1 Chron. i, 41, ἀμφίσβητον v. r. ἀμφίσβητις, [where the text has יִם הָאָמְרָם, Camaraon, marg. Romanus]; elsewhere ἀμφίσβητος, the name of two or three men.

AMRAMITE

Aaron, Miriam, and Moses (Exod. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19). He died in Egypt, aged 187 years (Exod. vii. 20), B.C. ante 1656. Before the giving of the law, it was permitted to marry a father's sister, but this was afterward forbidden (Lev. xiii. 42). His descendants were sometimes called Amramites (Num. iii. 27; 1 Chron. xxvi. 28).

1. One of the "sons" of Bani, who, after the return from Babylon, separated from his Gentile wife (Ezra x. 35, 44. 45).

2. A descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iv. 41). In Gen. xxxvi. 26, he is called more correctly Haman (q. v.).

Amramite (Heb. always with the art., ha-Amrami, אַהַמְרַמִי; Sept. ἁμαράμεις), apparently the Sanscrit amarapada, "keeper of the gods;" Sept. Αμαρόμιδ, Josephus Αμαρώμιος, Ami, i. 9, 1, a king (perhaps Hamite, comp. Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 466) of Shinar (i. e., Babylonia), confederated with Chedorlaomer, king of Elam and two other kings, to make war against the kings of Pentapolis, viz., Sodom, Gomorrah, and the three neighboring cities, which they plundered; among the captives whom they carried off was Lot, Abraham's nephew; but Abraham (q. v.) pursued them, retook Lot, and recovered the spoil (Gen. xiv. 1, 4). B.C. 2050.

Amron; Amron, NICOLAS VON, born at Wurtzen, in Misnia, Dec. 3, 1483, was a celebrated disciple and warm supporter of Luther. Educated at Leipsic and Wittenberg, he became licentiate of theology in 1511, and accompanied Luther in 1519 to the Leipzig disputation, and in 1521 to Worms. He was greatly instrumental in introducing the Reformation into Magdeburg and Gotha. In 1542 he was consecrated bishop of Naumburg by Luther; but his life in this office was embittered by strife, and in 1548 he fled to Jena. In the adiaphoristic controversy he opposed Melancthon strenuously. A work having a title purporting that good works are pernicious, and a hindrance to salvation, came from his pen (reprinted in Baumgarten, Geschichte der Religionsparteien, p. 1172-78). He died May 14, 1565. A biography of Amador, with a selection from his works, has been published by Pressel, in the collective work Leben und ausgewählte Schriften der Väter & luth. Kirche, vol. viii (also published separately, in 1867). See also also Adam of Camerino, Chist. Hist. Ami, 147; Bibliotheca Sacra, 1858, p. 641.

Amulet (Lat. amuletum, from amollir, to averet evil; French amulette; according to others, originally from the Arabic hamel, a locket suspended from the neck). From the earliest ages the Orientals have believed in the influences of the stars, in spells, witchcraft, and the malign power of envy; and to protect themselves against the maladies and other evils which such influences were supposed to occasion, almost all the ancient nations wore amulets (Plin. Hist. Nat. xxx, 15). These consisted, and still consist, chiefly of tickets inscribed with sacred sentences (shaw, i. 92, Lane's Mod. Egyp., ii. 955), and of pieces of metal (Richardson, Dissertation; D'Arvieux, iii. 208; Chardin, i, 243 sq.; iii, 206 sq.; Niebuhr, i, 65; ii, 182). Not only were persons thus protected, but even houses were, as they still are, guarded from supposed malign influences by certain holy inscriptions upon their doors. The existence of these customs is implied in the attempt of Moses to turn them to becoming uses by directing that certain passages extracted from the law should be employed (Exod. xiii, 9, 16; Deut. vi, 8; xi, 18). The door-schedules being noticed elsewhere [see Door-post]; we here limit our inquiry to personal amulets. By this religious appropriation the then all-pervading tendency to idolatry was in this matter obviated, although in later times, when the tendency to idolatry had passed away, such written scrolls degenerated into instruments of superstition (q. v.).

The "ear-rings" in Gen. xxxv, 4 (נְפָעִים הָאֵילָנִים; הָאֵילָנִים), were obviously connected with idolatrous worship, and were probably amulets taken from the bodies of the slain Shechemites. They are subsequently mentioned among the spoils of Midian (Judg. viii, 24), and perhaps their objectionable character was the reason why Gideon asked for them. Again, in Hosea i, 18, "decking herself with ear-rings" is mentioned as one of the signs of the "days of Baalim." Hence in Chaldée an ear-ring was called נַפָעַן, kadidka, sanctity. But amulets were more often worn round the neck, like the golden bulla or leather loros of the Roman boys. Sometimes they were precious stones, supposed to be endowed with peculiar virtues. In the "Mirror of stones" the strangest properties are attributed to the amethyst, Kinoeetus, Alectoria, Carneum, etc.; and Pliny, speaking of aurum montanum, says "It is useful to bind upon children like an amulet" (xxxvii, 32, 37). They were generally suspended as the centre-piece of a necklace (q. v.), and among the Egyptians often consisted of the emblems of various deities, or the symbol of truth and Justice ("Thmēl"). A gem of this kind, formed of sapphire, was given by a priest of Egypt (Diod. i. 48, 75), and a similar one is represented as worn by the youthful deity Harpocrates (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii, 864). The Arabs hang round their children's necks the figure of an open hand, a custom which, according to Shaw, arises from the symbolism of the number 5. This principle is often found in the use of amulets. See SERAPHIM.

The צָחִים (tsakahim, charms) of Isa. iii, 20 (Sept. παρθενία, Vulg. insurae, Auth. V ers. ear-rings), it is now allowed, denote amulets, although they served also the purpose of ornament. They were probably precious stones, or small plates of gold or silver, with sentences of the law or magic formulas inscribed on them. Used in the ears, or suspended by a chain round the neck. "Ear-rings" is not perhaps a bad translation. It is certain that ear-rings were sometimes used in this way as instruments of superstition, and that at a very early period, as in Gen. xxxv, 4, where Jacob takes away the ear-rings of his people along with their false gods. Ear-rings, with strange figures and characters, are still used as charms in the East (Chardin, in Harmer, iii, 814). Schroeder, however, deduces from the Arabic that these amulets were in the form of serpents, and similar probably to those golden amulets of the same form which the women of the pagan Arabs were suspended between their breasts, the use of which was interdicted by Mohammed (Schroeder, De Visitis Mullerum, cap. xi, p. 172, 178; Grotendiek, art. Amuleus, in Ersch and Gruber's En-cyclop.; Rosenmüller, ad Isa. iii. 20; Gesenius, ad eund.; and in his Thesaurus, art. ἀμulet. Thus the basilisk is constantly engraved on the talismanic scarabaei of Egypt, and, according to Jahn (Bibl. Arch. § 231), the teknakhim of Isa. iii. 28, were "figures of serpents poured into the hands (more probably worn in the ears)" by Hebrew women. The word is derivable from נקֹחַ, 'lack whk, to kiss, and means both "enchantments" (comp. Isa. iii. 8) and the magical gems and formularies used to avert them (Gesenius, s. v.). It is doubtful whether the Sept. intends περιπλακία as a translation of this word (Schleusener's Thesaurus).

For a like reason the phallus was among the sacred emblems of the Vestals (Smith's Dict. of Ant. s. v. Fauchenium). See EAR-RING. That these tseknakhim were charms inscribed on silver and gold, was the opinion of Aben-Ezra. The Arabic has boxes of amulets, manifestly concluding that they were similar to those ornamental little cases for written charms which are still used by Arab women. These are represented in the first figure of cut 1. Amulets of this kind are called chegah, and are specially adapted to protect and preserve those written charms, on which the Moslems, as did the Jews, chiefly rely. The writing is covered with waxed cloth, and enclosed in a case of thin embossed gold or silver, which is attached to a silk string or a chain, and generally hung on the right side, above the girdle, the string or chain being passed over the left shoulder. In the specimen here figured there are three of these chegahs attached to one string. The square one in the middle is almost an inch thick, and contains a folded paper; the others contain scrolls.

Amulets of this shape, or of a triangular form, are worn by women and children; and those of the latter shape are often attached to children's head-dress (Lane's Modern Egyptians, ii. 365). Charms, consisting of words written on folds of papyrus tightly rolled up and sewed in linen, have been found at Thebes (Wilkinson, i. c.), and our English translators possibly intended something of the kind when they rendered the curious phrase (in Isa. iii. 21) בְּרֵשֵׁית (b'reshî'îth) "houses of the spirit" by "tablets." It was the danger of idolatrous practices arising from a knowledge of this custom that probably induced the sanction of the use of phylacteries (Deut. vi. 8; ix. 18, וְשֵׁנַח בּוֹלְטֵים, bole'tîm, "frontlets"). The modern Arabs use scraps of the Koran (which they call "telemes" or "alakakire") in the same way. See PHYLACTERY.

The superstitions connected with amulets grew to a great height in the later periods of the Jewish history. "There was hardly any people in the whole world," says Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xxiv. 24), "that more used or were more fond of amulets, charms, murrinnings, exorcisms, and all kinds of enchantments. The amulets were either little roots hung about the neck of sick persons, or, what was more common, bits of paper (and parchment) with words written on them, whereby it was supposed that diseases were either driven away or cured. They wore such amulets all the week, but were forbidden to go abroad with them on the Sabbath, unless they were "approved amulets"; that is, prescribed by a person who knew that at least three persons had been cured by the same means. In these amulets mysterious names (especially the tetragrammaton, or sacred name, יהוה) and characters were occasionally employed in lieu of extracts from the law. One of the most usual of these was the cabalistic hexagonal figure known as "the shield of David" and "the seal of Solomon" (Bartoloz. Bibliotheca Rubrimbica, i. 576; Lakema-cher, Oracula, ad loc. i. 143 sqq.). The reputation of the Jews was so well established in this respect that even in Arabia, before the time of Mohammed, men applied to them when they needed charms of peculiar virtue (Muhammad, ii. 877). A very large class of amulets depended for their value on their being constructed under certain astronomical conditions. Their most general use was to avert ill-luck, etc., especially to nullify the effect of the "evil eye" (αἰμαθῶς βομβανως, a blessing which is found among all nations and in all substances) and to possess such properties, as we see from Tobit. Pliny (xxviii. 47) mentions a fox's tongue worn on an amulet as a charm against clear-eyes, and says (xxx. 15) that beetles' horns are efficacious for the same purpose—perhaps an Egyptian fancy. In the same way one of the Roman emperors wore a seal-skin as a charm against thunder. Among plants, the white bryony and the Hypericin, or Pega daemonum, are mentioned as useful. On the African "pieces of medicine"—a belief in which constitutes half the religion of the Africans (see Livingstone's Travels, p. 265 et passim).

Many of the Christians of the first century wore amulets marked with a fish, as a symbol of the Redeemer. See ICHTHYS. Another form is the pentangle (or pentacle, ride Scott's Antiquary), which consists of three triangles intersected, and made of five lines, which may be drawn forth with the body of man as to touch and point out the places where our Saviour was wounded" (Sir Thos. Brown's Vulg. Errors, i. 10). Under this head fall the "curious arts" (ῥαπτοπείγας) of the Ephesians (Acts xix. 19), and in later times the use of the word "Abracadabra," recommended by the physician Serenus Samonicus as a cure of the hemifected with pains in the head, let us not run to enchanters and fortune-tellers, and remedies of vanity.

I mourn for you, my brethren; for I daily find these things done. And what shall I do? I cannot yet persevere Christians to put their only trust in Christ.
With what face can a soul go unto God that has lost the sign of Christ, and taken upon him the sign of the devil? For I have seen it: and God instructed that these persons were most probably taken from the custom of the Jews, who were the trichilium, or phylectaries. The Council of Trullo ordered the makers of all amulets to be excommunicated, and deemed the wearers of them guilty of beastly superstition. Faith in the virtue of amulets was then almost universal among the people, but it could not, therefore, excite our surprise that some of the less-informed should have adhered to the heathenish practice after their admission into the Christian Church.

AMYOT, Joseph, a Jesuit missionary to China, was born at Toulon in 1716. At the close of 1750 he arrived at Canton, and was confidentially told of the arrivals of Jesuits, and the brethren of that order already established at Peking presented a petition to the reigning emperor, Kien-Loong, to the effect that the newcomers were well acquainted with mathematics, music, and medicine. A persecution against the Christians was going on, but the reply of the emperor was favorable, and he directed the missionaries to be conveyed to Peking at the public expense. Amyot gives an interesting account of the journey in a letter inserted in the Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses, from which these particulars are taken. On arriving at the capital, where an underhand sort of toleration was extended to the missionaries, he applied himself to the study of the Chinese, and afterward to the Manchoo-Taratar language and literature, in both of which he made great proficiency. From that time he appears to have acted rather as a missionary of learning than of religion. While his name scarcely figures at all in the Lettres Edifiantes, not a year seems to have passed without his dispatching to Europe some information on the history and manners of the Chinese and Tartars, to the illustration of which he contributed more than any other writer of the 18th century.
He remained at Peking 43 years, during which time the emperor to whom he belonged was so often more than one vigorous persecution was directed against the Christians in China. At the time of Lord Macartney’s embassy in 1793, Amyot wrote a letter to the ambassador on his arrival in Peking, “expressive of the most fervent wishes for his success, and offering every assistance that his experience could supply,” for which he was rewarded as not to be able to wait on Lord Macartney. In the following year, 1794, he died at Peking, at the age of 76. Among his works are: 1. Abrégé histor. des principaux traits de la vie de Confucius (Paris, 1789), the best history of the Chinese philosopher, the material of which has been carefully selected from the most authentic of the principal sources;—2. Dictionnaire Tatrare-Marchonien, Amyraldism. See AMYRAUT.

AMYRAUT (or AMYRALDUS).—Molinos, a French Protestant, in the region of the seventeenth century;
born at Bourges, in Anjou, in 1596, and instructed in theology at Saumur. He was nominated to success John Daillé, at Saumur, and was appointed professor of theology in that academy with Louis Cappel and Joshua de la Place (Placeau) in 1633. In 1631

he was sent to attend the national synod of French Protestants at Charenton, where he depuited him to declare a harangue to the king, which is inserted in the Mémoire Français of 1631. His conduct in this affair gained him the esteem of Richelieu. The eminence of the three Saumur professors drew students from many parts of Europe; but it soon began to be redected, for the professorship was subverted of the doctrines of Dort on Predestination and Grace. The views of Amyraut on these topics were derived from Cameron (q. v.), and were first published in a tract,
De Predestinatione (Traité de la Préscription et de ces principales dependences), in 1684. His views were called Unilateral and Arminian, but they were neither.
Amyraut asserted a grandiose theory, which is indeed, but he meant by it simply that God desires the happiness of all men, provided they will receive his mercy in faith; that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, but that he does not grant to all his assistance, that they may improve this power to saving purposes; that none can so improve it without the Holy Spirit, which God is not bound to grant to any,
and, in fact, only does grant to those who are elect according to his eternal decree. “In defending his doctrine of universal atonement, Amyraut appealed to the authority of the fathers, and wrote a treatise, entitled Economie de la doctrine de Calvin touchant la Préscription, to show that Calvin supported his views concerning the extent of the atoment, and was in all respects a very moderate Calvinist” (Cunningham, The Reformers, p. 395). Universal grace (as Amyraut held the doctrine of it) is of no actual saving benefit to any. He distinguished between objective and subjective grace. Objective grace offers salvation to all men on condition of repentance and faith, and is universal; subjective grace operates morally in the conversion of the soul, and is particular, i.e., only given to the elect. The aim of Amyraut was to reconcile the Lutherans and Calvinists; and his views were received widely, as seeming to soften down
the rigid Predestinarianism of Dort. The true peculiarity of Amyraut’s theology is the combination of a real particularism, in the full Calvinistic sense, with an ideal universality of grace, which, in fact, never possessed a single advocate (Schweitzer, in Prolegg., : Anthropologie, e. v.). Charges were brought against him by Du Mounin and others, but he was acquitted by heresy
by the Synod of Almenon (1657), and afterward at Charenton (1664). Daille and Blondel favored the views of Amyraut. He died Jan. 8, 1664. Eleven years after (1675) the Formula Consensus was drawn up and published, chiefly against the so-called heresies of the Saumur professor.
Amyraldism was, in substance, the theory adopted by Baxter (q. v.), and has been sustained, with various modifications, in recent times, by Williams (Essay on Sovereignty, 1818), Payne (Essay on Sovereignty and Liberty, 1838), Wardle (On the Attonements, 1841), and Fuller and Hinton among Baptists; by T. Scott and Miller in the Church of England; by many Congregationalists and New-School Presbyterians in America; and,
of late, by many ministers of the U. P. Church of Scotland. Among his writings are, 1. Paraphrases on variious books of the N. T. and of the Apoc., 1603– 1643—1692);—2. De la Vocation des Pasteurs (Saumur,

besides various sermons and tracts on the dis-

Am'zi (Heb. Am'm, 'strong', the name of two Levites.
1. (Sept. 'Am'say.) A Levite, son of Bani, and father of Hilkiah, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 40), C. 550 B.C. 1014.
2. (Sept. 'Am'say.) A priest, son of Zechariah, and father of Pelaiah, in the family of Adayah (Neh. xi. 12). B.C. considerably ante 566.

An'ab (Heb. An'ab, 'avenge; town; Sept. 'An'bah v. r. 'An'bah and 'An'bow), one of the cities in the mountains of Judah, from whose borders the Asnami (Josh. xi. 21; xv, 50). Nearly west of Main (Mam) Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 195) observed a place called Anab, distinguished by a small tower. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Anab) both confound it with a Beth-Anab (q. v.) lying a few miles from Diospolis or Lydda (Rolid, Pisoest. p. 560). Schwartz (Pisoest. p. 196) says it is the village Anab, that is, the seat of Ramath, near by. Doubtless the Anabch marked on Zimmermann's Map; but this is not at all in the mountains of Judah, as stated in both passages of Joshua.

Anabaptists (aviv, 'again, and bat'tiç, I baptize), a name given to those who reject infant-baptism, because they baptize such as join their communion; and who maintain that this sacrament is not valid if it be administered by sprinkling and not by immersion, and if the persons baptized be not in a condition to give the reasons of their faith. The name is sometimes given reproachfully to the modern BAPTISTS (q. v.); but, as they disclaim the title, it should not be applied to them.

1. The term Anabaptist, or Relaptizers, is connected with the controversies of the third century. In Asia Minor and in Africa, where the spirit of controversy had raged long and bitterly, 'baptism was considered to be only valid when administered in the orthodox church.' In the Western Church the great principle of the Anabaptists rested on the cessation of the name of Christ or of the Trinity; and, therefore, 'any baptism administered in the name of Christ or of the Trinity, let it be performed by whomsoever it might, was held valid," so that heretics baptized by heretics, coming over to the Church, were received as baptized Christians. So high were the disputes on this question that the synods were convened to investigate it, one at Iconium, and the other at Synnada, in Phrygia, which confirmed the opinion of the invalidity of heretical baptism. From Asia the question passed to Northern Africa: Tertullian accorded with the decision of the Asiatic councils in opposition to the practice of the Roman Church. Agrippinus convened a council at Carthage, which came to a similar decision with those of Asia. Thus the matter rested, till Stephen, bishop of Rome, prompted by ambition, proceeded to excommunicate the bishops of Asia Minor, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Cilicia, and applied to them the epithets of Relaptizers, A.D. 208.

2. A fanatical sect of Anabaptists arose in Germany in the early part of the sixteenth century who brought the name into great disrepute. It originated at Zwickau, in Saxony, in the year 1520, and its leaders, by their lawless fanaticism, completely separated themselves from the cause of the reformers, and with the subject of adult baptism connected principles subversive of all religious and civil order. The vast increase of their adherents from the year 1524, especially among the common people on the Rhine, in Westphalia, Holstein, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, was soon met by severe measures on the part of the magistrates. Imperial and ecclesiastical decrees were issued against them, and many were put to death, after being urged to repent. But persecution produced its usual fruits. Still new associations were perpetually formed by itinerant prophets and teachers, whose doctrines consisted of the following propositions: "Impiety prevails everywhere. It is therefore necessary that a new family of holy persons should be founded, enjoying, with the ascetic practice of sex, the kingdom of God, and skill to interpret divine revelations. Hence they need no learning: for the internal word is more than the outward expression. No Christian must be suffered to engage in a legal process, to hold a civil office, to take an oath, or to hold any private property: let all things be a common." With an army led by John Bochhold, or Bockel, a tailor, of Leyden, aged 26, and John Matthias, or Matthiessen, a baker, of Harlem, came, in 1553, to Münster, in Westphalia, a city which had adopted the doctrines of the Reformation. Here they soon gained over a portion of the excited populace, and among the rest, Rothmann, a Protestant clergyman, and the councillor Knipperdolling. The magistrates in vain excluded them from the churches. They obtained possession of the council-house by violence. Their numbers daily increased, and toward the end of the year they extorted a treaty, securing the religious liberty of both, by renouncing strength and by the submission to the ascension of the restless spirits of the adjacent cities, they room made themselves masters of the town by force, and expelled their adversaries. Matthiessen came forward as their prophet, and persuaded the people to devote their gold, and silver, and movable property to the common use, and to burn all their books but the Bible; but in a rally against the bishop of Münster, who had laid siege to the city, he lost his life. He was succeeded in the prophetic office by Bochhold and Knipperdolling. The churches were destroyed, and twelve judges were set over the tribes, as in Israel; but even this form of government was soon abolished, and Bochhold, under the name of John of Leyden, raised himself to the dignity of king of New Zion (so the Anabaptists of Münster styled their kingdom), and caused himself to be formally crowned. From this period (1534) Münster was a theatre of all the excesses of fanaticism, lust, and cruelty: the public altars were reconstituted in polygamy, and the neglect of civil order, concealed from the infatuated people the avarice and madness of their young tyrant and the daily increase of danger from abroad. Bochhold lived in princely luxury and magnificence; he sent out seditionary proclamations against neighboring rulers—against the Pope and Luther; he threatened to destroy the church; he made secret plans to slay from him; made himself an object of terror to his subjects by frequent executions, and while famine and pestilence raged in the city, persuaded the wretched, deluded inhabitants to a stubborn resistance of their besiegers. The city was at last taken, June 24, 1535, by treachery, though not without a brave defence, in which Rothmann and others were killed, and the kingdom of the Anabaptists destroyed by the execution of the chief men. Bochhold, and two of his most active companions, Knipperdolling and Kretching, were tortured to death with red-hot pincers, and then hung up in iron cages on St. Lambert's tree, as an example to all rebels. In the mean time, some of the twenty-six apostles, who were sent out by Bochhold to extend the limits of his kingdom, had been successful in various places; and many independent teachers, who preached the same doctrines, continued active in the work of founding a new empire of pure Christians, and extending the same principles in the countries above mentioned. It is true that they rejected the practice of polygamy, community of goods, and intolerance toward those of different opinions, which had prevailed in Münster; but they enjoined upon their adherents the other doctrines of the early Anabaptists, and certain heretical opinions in regard mode of life: monks, from the Greek μοναχός, alone, one who dwells alone; eremites, corrupted into hermits, from ἔρημος, a desert; and anchorites, those who withdraw from society. These terms were afterward employed to define more accurately the various shades of austerity by which these persons lived. Thus, monks denoted those who adopted a secluded habit of life, but were still disposed occasionally to hold intercourse with society, and later, as carniboles, to dwell in communities; the hermits were those who withdrew to sequestered places, but who did not eschew all intercourse with man; and finally, the anchorites, or that supply of food which might be obtained from cultivating the ground; the anchorites were most excessive in their austerities, and chose the wildest localities as their retreats. Many of the anchorites voluntarily subjected themselves to the vicissitudes of the weather, without proper habitation or clothing, restricted themselves to coarse and scanty fare, wore chains and iron rings, and even throughout many years maintained painful postures, such as standing on the top of a pillar [see stylites], thus displaying an earnestness which greater enlightenment might have directed to the good of mankind. Paul (q. v.), the Hermit, and Antony (q. v.), were among the first anchorites.

The anchorites were not able always to preserve their solitude unbroken. The fame of their sanctity drew many to visit them; their advice was often sought; and the number of their visitors was much increased by the belief that maladies, particularly mental diseases, were cured by their blessing. Sometimes, also, they returned for a short time to the midst of their fellow-men to deliver warnings, instructions, or encouragements, and were received as if they had been inspired prophets or angels from heaven. The number of anchorites, however, gradually diminished, and the streets and the religious life of countries were preferred to that of the hermitage.

The Western Church, indeed, at no time abounded in anchorites like the Eastern, and perhaps the reason may in part be found in the difference of climate, which renders a manner of life impossible in most parts of Europe that could be pursued for many years in Egypt or Syria.—Holyot, Ordres Relig., lib. vi., cap. 18, 15.

Anacletus II, Antipope. His name was Pietro Leoni, cardinal of Santa Maria beyond the Tiber, and on the death of Honorius II he was elected, Feb. 14, 1138. A part of the cardinals at the same time acceded and elected Innocent. Anacletus kept Innocent II besieged in the palace of the Lateran, and obtained possession of the city of Rome and the entire papal dominions. He wrote to the princes of Europe in order to have him recognised, but he had no success. He was considered by the Councils of Rheims and Pisa, rejected by the larger portion of the clergy of the Roman Catholic world, not recognised by any sovereign except Roger of Sicily, to whom he had given his sister in marriage, and the duke of Aquitania; but in Rome he maintained himself, notwithstanding the Lord of the Lateran, who rejected Innocent. This schism lasted until the death of Anacletus, Jan. 25, 1188. Voltaire calls him, ironically, the Jewish pope, because he descended from a Jewish family which had grown rich at the expense of the church. Anacletus was a disciple of Arnold of Brescia (q. v.), and found implacable enemies in St. Bernard and Arnoul, archdeacon of Seez.—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, ii. 468; Riddle, Hist. of Papacy, ii. 169.
AN AEL

An'a'il (Ar. ʿaṭīl, prob. contracted for ʿaṣāʾiṣi), the brother of Tobit, and father of Achiascharus (Tob. i. 21).

Anagnostēs (ἀναγνώστης), reader, the name of a class of officers in the early church. In the Greek Church they held the first rank in the lower order of officers; in the Roman Church they were next to the sub-deacons. They have sometimes been regarded as an order instituted by the apostles, and by them decreed canonical. The same name was given to the Jewish synagogals Compare Luke iv. 16; Acts xiii. 15, 27; 2 Cor. iii. There were among the Jews persons who performed the same office as readers among the Christians. There is not, however, any proof of the early appointment of a special minister in the capacity of reader: the office was probably introduced in the third century. Territulian distinguishes the lector from the episcopus, and dis- coinus; and the church observed a fixed rule respecting the office and duty of these respective ministers. Both in the synagogue and in the early Christian Church, any person who was able to discharge the duty was allowed to hold the office of reader, without reference to age. Boys of twelve, ten, and eight years of age, were frequently employed in this manner. The office was a favorite one with youths in the higher classes of society. Julian, afterward the apostate, in his younger years was reader in a church in Nicomedia.

Anagogical (ἀναγωγικός, to lead or bring up), in the older writers on interpretation, is one of the four senses of Scripture, viz. the literal, allegorical, anagogical, and mystical. The anagogical sense is when the sacred text is explained with regard to eternal life; for example, the rest of the Sabbath, in the anagogical sense, signifies the repose of everlasting happiness.

A'nah (Heb. 'anâh, תַּנָּה, speech or affliction; Sept. 'anâv), the name of one or two Horites.

1. The fourth mentioned of the sons of Seir, and head of an Idumenean tribe preceding the arrival of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 29; 1 Chron. i. 88), B.C. much ante 1654. It seems most natural to suppose him to be also the one referred to in Gen. xxxvi. 29, as otherwise his children are not at all enumerated, as are those of all his brothers (Hengstenberg, Geminisoria des Pentateuch, ii, 229), although from ver. 2 some have inferred that another person of the same name is the one meant. See also Dishon; Ahobilamah.

2. The second named of the two sons of Zibeon the Hivite, and father of Esau's wife Ahobilamah (Gen. xxxvi. 18, 24). B.C. ante 1654. While feeding asses in the desert he discovered "warm springs" (aquas calides), as the original, טַנָּה, ʿinammen, is rendered by Jerome, who states that the word had still this signification in the Punic language. Genesiusest and most modern critics think this interpretation correct, supported as it is by the fact that warm springs are still found in the region east of the Dead Sea. The Syriac has simply "waters," which Dr. Lee seems to prefer. Most of the Greek translators retain the original as a proper name, ταυμις, probably not venturing to translate. The Samaritan text, followed by the Targums, has "Emin," which in the Arab. means "garden." Our version of "mules" is now generally abandoned, but is supported by the Arabic and Veneto-Greek versions.—Kitto. See MULE.

In verse 2, 14, of the above chap. Anah is called the daughter of Zibeon, evidently by an error of transcription, as the Samaritan and Sept. have son; or (with Westcott, Lachmann, Tuch, Kloekel, and many others) we may here understand it to be Zibeon's grand-daughter, still referring to Ahobilamah (Turner's Comps. to Gen. p. 381). See Zibeon. He had but one son, Dishon (ver. 25; 1 Chron. i. 40, 41), who appears to be named because of his affinity with Esau (q. v.) through his sister's marriage. We may further conclude, with Hengstenberg (Pent. ii. 206; Engl. trans. ii, 229), that the Anah mentioned among the sons of Seir in v. 20 in connection with Zibeon is the same person as is here referred to, and is therefore the grandson of Seir. The intention of the genieology plainly is not so much to give the lineal descent of the Seirites as to enumerate those descendants who, being heads of tribes, came into connection with the Edomites. It would thus appear that Anah, from whom the tribe of the same name sprang, was the head of a tribe independent of his father, and ranking on an equal footing with that tribe. Several difficulties occur in regard to the race and name of Anah. By his descent from Seir he is a Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 20), while in v. 2 he is called a Hivite, and again in the narrative (Gen. xxvi. 24), which was written by the hand of Moses, he is distinguished as "the Hittite," Hengstenberg's explanation of the first of these difficulties, by supposing that one of the descendants of Seir received the specific epithet Orii (i.e. Trogloodyte, or dweller in a cave) as a definite proper name (Pent. ii, 228), is hardly adequate, for others of the same family are similarly named; it is more probable that the word Hivite (תַּנָּה) is a mistake of transcribers for Horite (תַּנָּה), or rather that all the branches of the Hivites were, in course of time, more particularly called Horites, from their style of habituation in the caves of Mt. Seir. See Horite. As the name Beeri signifies naves, i.e. "man of the fountain" (יוֹדֵה), this has been thought to be his designation with reference to the above noticed "warm springs" of Callirrhoe discovered by him; whereas in the genealogy proper he is fully called by his original name Anah.—Smith. See Beeri.

Anah'arah (Heb. Anaḥāraḥ, עֲנַחָרָה, master; Frst; Sept. ἄναχαραχ, Vulg. Anacharath), a town or within the border of Issachar, mentioned between Shilhon and Rabbith (Josh. xix. 19). Its site was apparently unknown in the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. ἀναχαραχ), it was, perhaps, in the northern part of the tribe, possibly at Masarah, where there are ruins (Vand de Velde, Map). See Beeri.

Anah'ah (Heb. Anahāh, עֲנַחָה, answered by Je- boam; Sept. 'anaviq, 'avatta), one of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra while he read the law to the people (Neh. viii. 4), and probably the same with one of the chief Issacharites who joined in the sacred covenant (Neh. x. 22). B.C. cir. 410.

A'nak (Heb. 'anak, תַּנָּכָא, long-necked, i.e. a giant; Sept. 'evw, the son of Arba who founded Kirjath-Arba (afterward Hebron), the progenitor of a race of giants called Anakim (Josh. xv. 13). B.C. ante 1658.

Anakah. See Ferret.

An'akim (Heb. 'anakīm, תַּנָּקִים, Test. ii, 10, 11, 21; Josh. xi. 21, 22; iv. 12, 15; also called sons of Anak, תַּנָּקִים, Num. xiii. 33; תַּנָּקִים, Josh. xv. 14; children of Anak, תַּנָּקִים, Num. xiii. 22; Josh. xv. 14; sons of the Anakim, דְּמִים, Josh. x. 29; Sept. 'anaviq 'iovi 'avatta 'evw, γενεά 'ανακάνων; Vulg. Enamim, filii Anakim, filii Enamos, Enamos, Emnos, Auth. Vers. "Anakin," "sons of Anak," "children of Anak," "sons of the Anakim," a nomadic tribe of giants (Num. xiii. 34; Dest. x. 3, 4; New, xxii. 14) descended from a certain Arba (Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, xxii. 11), and bearing the name of their immediate progenitor, Anak (Josh. xi. 21), dwelling in the southern part of Palestine, particularly in the vicinity of Hebron (q. v.), which was called Kirjath-Arba (city of Arba) from their ancestor (Gen. xxv. 10). These designations serve to show that we must regard Anak as the name of the race as well as that of an individual, and this is confirmed by what is said of Arba, their progenitor, that he was a great man among the Anakim (Josh. xiv. 15). The Anakim appear (see Bochart, Chazam. i, 1) to have been a tribe of Cushite wanderers from Babel, and of the same race as the Philistines, the Phoenicians, the Philistim, and the Egyptian shepherd-kings (see Jour. Soc. Lit. July, 1855, p. 308 sq.; Jan. 1855, p. 293 sq.). The supposition of Michell (Synag. Comment., i. 196; also Lowth, p. 183) that they were a fragment of the aboriginal Troglodytes is opposed to Josh. xi. 21 (see Faber, Archæol., p. 44 sq.). They consisted of three tribes, descended from and named after the three sons of Anak—Ahiman, Sassi, and Talmai (Josh. xv. 14). When the Israelites invaded Canaan, the Anakim of Hebron, Debir, Anah, and other towns in the country of the south (Josh. xi. 21), their formidable stature and warlike appearance struck the Israelites with terror in the time of Moses (Num. xiii. 32, 33; Dent. ix. 2); but they were nevertheless dispossessed by Joshua, and utterly driven from the land, except a small remnant that found refuge in the Philistine cities, Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Josh. xi. 22). Their chief city, Hebron, became the possession of Caleb, who is said to have driven out from it the three sons of Anak mentioned above—that is, the three families or tribes of the Anakim (Josh. xv. 14; Judg. i. 20). The Philistine giants [see Goliath] that David on several occasions encountered (2 Sam. xxii. 15-22) seem to have sprung from the remnant of this stock. Josephus says (Ant. v. 2, 3) that their bones were still shown at Hebron, and Benjamin of Tudela tells a story respecting similar relics at Damascus (Ibid. p. 56). See also 1 Chron. v. 17; Judges x. 2; 1 Sam. xiv. 19. The chief of Bashan, was of this race, and the same dubious authority states that the prophet Shaob or Jethro was sent by the Lord to instruct the Anakim, having been born among them (D’Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 106). They are thought to be depicted in the Egyptian monuments. See Talm. iv. 14. The analogy of faith (see Goliath) that David on several occasions encountered (2 Sam. xxii. 15-22) seem to have sprung from the remnant of this stock. Josephus says (Ant. v. 2, 3) that their bones were still shown at Hebron, and Benjamin of Tudela tells a story respecting similar relics at Damascus (Ibid. p. 56). See also 1 Chron. v. 17; Judges x. 2; 1 Sam. xiv. 19. The chief of Bashan, was of this race, and the same dubious authority states that the prophet Shaob or Jethro was sent by the Lord to instruct the Anakim, having been born among them (D’Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 106). They are thought to be depicted in the Egyptian monuments. See Talm. iv. 14.

Analogy (διαλογισμός), proportion. 1. As applied to the works of God generally, it leads to the conclusion that since He is the chief of intelligent beings, a part of any system of which He is the author must, in respect of its leading principles, be similar to the whole of that system; and, farther, that the work of an intelligent and moral being must bear in all its lineaments the traces of the character of its author. In accordance with these principles of analogy, it is maintained that the revelation of God in the Holy Scriptures is in all respects agreeable to what we know of God, from the works of nature and the order of the world. This agreement amounts to a strong evidence that the book professing to be Divine revelation is from God; and this revelation of God’s mind and purposes is truly and truly inspired by Him. The best exposition of this argument is to be found in Bishop Butler’s immortal Analogy of Religion to the Constitution and Course of Nature (best ed. by Crooks, N. Y. 12mo.). See Butler.

2. The analogy of faith is the correspondence of the several parts of divine revelation in one consistent whole. Its use is pointed out by the apostle in his direction (Rom. xii. 6) that “prophecy”—that is, preaching—be according to the proportion of faith. His rule, of course, extends to all interpretation and exposition. The contrivance of the construction of this argument is explained according to the tenor of the whole; and, in order to his doing this, the reader must understand the design of the whole. If he do not, he will be continually liable to fall into error. Prejudices and leanings of our own will dispose us to interpret particular parts of the works of God according to the analogy of our own system, rather than the real sense of the divine word. Almost every sect and school of divinity has fallen into this error. A prerequisite for following the analogy of faith is the simple love of truth for its own sake. This, more than anything else, will protect the mind of a student of Scripture from all the delusions of sectarian pride.
sions were established by Spanish Dominicans, who came from the Philippine Islands, more than 200 years ago, and they have survived to the present day, in spite of frequent and cruel persecutions. Especially since 1820 the persecution has raged with great intensity, and thousands of Christians have been either put to death or forced into apostasy. In 1858 France and Spain sent a joint expedition against Cochín China, which, in September of that year, conquered the fort and the bay of Tura. The war continued until 1862, when the power of the emperor of Anam was so completely broken that he was made overtures for the cessation of hostilities. On June 6, 1862, a treaty of peace was signed, by which the provinces of Saigon, Bienhoa, and My tho were ceded to France; three ports of Tonkin were opened to commerce; the other provinces of Lower Cochín China not ceded to France were to reserve only such number of troops as the French government should permit; Christianity was to be tolerated, and the Christians protected in their lives and property throughout the empire. In 1863 the French concluded a special treaty with the king of Cambodias, by which this whole kingdom was placed under the protectorate of France, and liberal stipulations were made in favor of Roman Catholic missionaries. The Roman Church had, in 1859, eight vicariates apostolic, viz.: 1. Eastern Tonkin; 2. Middle Tonkin; 3. Western Tonkin; 4. South Tonkin; 5. North Cochín China; 6. Eastern Cochín China; 7. Western Cochín China; 8. Cambodias. The first two are under the administration of Spanish Dominicans, the others under that of French Lazarites. The number of native converts was estimated in 1854 at about 500,000 or 600,000, but has since considerably decreased, in consequence of the persecution. The number of the native priests amounted to about 800, and there were also numerous congregations of native nuns. In 1859 the French government provided liberal mission donations, and dispensed the churches of Tonkin and Cochín China as being almost a complete wreck.—Wetzer and Welte, s. v. Tonkin and Asiam (in vol. XII), Schem., Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1855, p. 18, 38; Annual American Encyclo. p. 1862, p. 224; 1863, p. 148. See INDIA.

Anam' im (Heb. An'amim, עֲנַמִי), signif. unknown; Sept. 'Enammiti, Aminim, in Chron. 'Anam, Vulg. Anam). The name of some Egyptian tribe, descended from Mizraim (Gen. x, 18; 1 Chron. vii, 5). Compare the 'Enemim, or 'Enemim, or Enemim, in Palestine (Josh. xvi, 24) as having possibly been settled by an Egyptian colony. Others (as Bochart, Phileg. iv, 80), on very precarious etymological grounds (Arab. anam, a shepherd; transposed, anam), refer the name to the nomadic custodians of the temple of Jupiter Ammon (but see Michaelis Suppl. 1592 sq.). Still others (as Calmet) regard the Anamim or Oaramim or Garamannim in the oasis Phazania on the river Cinophus (q. d. כְּנַפְס) in north-western Africa (Strabo, xvii, 385; Pol. iv, 6; Plin. v, 4; Mel. i, 8), but with little probability (see Schultze, Parod. p. 154). Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 1092) calls special attention to a geographical name, Irenamis, found on the Egyptian monuments (Champollion, Genii, ii, 60 sq.) as meaning truly (or by the article); or else he thinks they may be the Blemmyes, a people of Upper Egypt (Champollion, L'Egypte sous les Pharaons, 155). Among the old versions, Saodias interprets Alexandrinis, the Chaldean paraphrases (comp. Beck, ad Targ. Chron. i, 9 sq.) inhabitants of Morocco (מִשְׁרְדֵּית וּמַכָּבִים). (See generally Michaelis, Spicileg. i, 260 sq.; Vater, Comm. i, 186.)—Winer, s. v.

Anam'melech (Heb. Anammelch, אָנָמִיִּאל, Sept. 'Enammiti'el, Vulg. Anamellach) is mentioned, together with Adramelch, as a rod whom the people of Seppharvaim, who colonized Samaria, worshipped by the sacrifice of children by fire (2 Kings xvii, 31). No satisfactory etymology of the name has been discovered. The latter part of the word is the Heb. for king, but as the former part is not found in that language (unless it be for the Arabic ammān, a statute, Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 1032), the name is probably foreign. Roland (De ver. ling. Persarum, § 9) renders it king of grief (from the Persic); but Hyde (Rel. ver. Persarum, p. 131) understands it as referring (from זַכָּב) to the Arabian constellation Cepheus, containing the sheep and the shepherd. Benfey (Monatssamen einiger alter Völker, p. 188) proposes the name of the Persian goddess Anahit or that of the Zend Aniram, as contained in the name of the title Anameschel. So Rawlinson (Herodotus, i, 498), who understands the female power of the sun to be meant, derives it from the name of the Assyrian goddess Anunit. Other conjectures are still more fanciful. The same obscurity prevails as to the form under which the god was worshipped. The Babylonian Talmud states that his image had the figure of a horse; but Kimchi says that of a pheasant or quail (Carpo's Apparatus, p. 576).

—Kito, s. v. See ADRAMELCH.

An'an (Heb. Anan, עֲנַנ), closed; Sept. Ἀνάν, v. r. Ἄναν, one of the chief Israelites that sealed the sacred covenant on the return from Babylon (Neb. xx, 26); B.C. cir. 410. In the apocryphal list of the "temple-servants," whose names returned from the captivity, the same name (Ἀνάν) occurs (1 Esdr. v, 80) in place of the HANAN (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 46).

Anan'el (Ἀνανέλ, i. e. Hananiel), a descendant of one of the sacerdotal families still resident in Babylonia, appointed by Herod high-priest (B.C. 87) on his own elevation to royalty (Josephus, Ant. xv, 3, 1), but removed to make room for the youth Aristobulus (ib. 2, 7), upon whose murder he was replaced (ib. 3, 3); B.C. cir. 84.

An'ani (Heb. Ananiah, עֲנַנְיָאֵה, protected, or perhaps, a shortened form of the name ANANIAH; Sept. Ἀνανία, v. r. Ἀνάν) the last named of the seven sons of Iliocena, a descendant of the royal line of David after the captivity (1 Chron. iii, 24); B.C. cir. 494.

Ananti'ah (Heb. Ananittah, עֲנַנְיָתָה, protected by Jehovah), the name of a man and of a place. See also ANANIAS.

3. Sept. Anani'ah. The father of Massaeah and grandfather of Azariah, which last repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. iii, 23). B.C. considerably ante 446.

2. (Sept. 'Anani). A town in the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned between Nob and Hazor as inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi, 82). Schweitzer (Palaest. p. 163) regards it as the modern Beth Hamma, three miles north of Jerusalem; a small village, tolerably well built of stone, on a rocky ridge, with many olive-trees (Robinson, Res. iii, 68; comp. Tobler, Topog. von Jerus. ii, 414).

Anan'ias (Ἀνανίας, the Greek form of the name ANANIAH, q. v.), the name of several men, principally in the Apocalypse and Josephus. See also HANANIAH, etc.

1. (Ἀνανίας v. r. Ἀνανίας). One of the persons (or places) whose "sons," to the number of 101, are said to have returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 16); but the genuine text (Ezra ii, 15, 16) has no record of them.

2. One of the priests, "sons" of Emmer (I. e. Emmer), who renounced his Gentile wife after the return from Babylon (1 Esdr. ix, 21); evidently the HANANNI (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 29).

3. An Israelite of the "sons" of Belah, who did the same (1 Esdr. ix, 20); evidently the HANANIAH (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra x, 29).

4. One of the priests who stood at the right hand of Eara while reading the law (1 Esdr. ix, 48); the Anahal (q. v.) of the genuine text (Neh. viii, 4).
5. One of the Levites who aided Eara in expounding the law (1 Esdr. ix, 48); the Hanah (q. v.) of the true text (Neh. viii, 7).
6. A person called "Anashas the Great," the son of that great Samaun, the brother of Azazas, and the father of Azaxs, of the family of Tobit; who the angel that addressed Tobit assumed to be (Tob. v.
12, 13). The names are apparently allegorical (see Fritzsche, Hamzb. in loc.).
7. The son of Gideon and father of Elcia, in the ancestry of Judith (Judith viii, 1).
8. The three Children, ver. 67, of the original name, Hamahash (q. v.), of Shadrach,
(Dan. i, 7). See also in 1 Mac. ii, 59.
9. One of the Jewish ambassadors in Samaria, to whom the decree of Darius in favor of the Jews was addressed (Josephus, Ant. xi, 4, 9).
10. A son of Oziel (who built the Jewish temple at Hezopolis), high in favor with the Egyptian queen Cleopatra (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 4), who made a league with Alexander Jannaeus at his instance as general of her army in Palestine (id. 13, 5).
11. A Christian belonging to the infant church at Jerusalem, who, conspiring with his wife Saphira to donate to Rome, was overtaken by sudden death,
and immediately buried (Acts v, 1 sq.), A.D. 29.

The Christian community at Jerusalem appear to have entered into a solemn agreement that each and all should devote their property to the great work of furthering the Gospel and giving succor to the needy.
Accordingly they proceeded to sell their possessions, and brought the proceeds into the common stock of the church. Thus Barnabas (Acts iv, 36, 37) having land, sold it, and brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet. The apostles, then, had the general disposal, if they had not also the immediate distribution, of the common funds. The contributions, therefore, were designed for the sacred purposes of religion. As all the members of the Jerusalem Church had thus agreed to hold their property in common for the furtherance of the holy work in which they were engaged, if any one of them withheld a part, and offered the remainder of what he committed to two offences—he defrauded the church, and was guilty of falsehood; and as his act related, not to secular, but to religious affairs, and had an injurious bearing, both as an example and as a positive transgression against the Gospel while it was yet struggling into existence, An-anas was put to death. He was guilty of a sin of the deepest dye. Had Ananas chosen to keep his property for his own worldly purposes, he was at liberty, as Peter intimates, so to do; but he had, in fact, alienated it to pious purposes, and it was therefore no longer his own. Yet he wished to deal with it in part as if it were so, showing, at the same time, that he was conscious of his misdeed, by presenting the residue to the common treasury as if it had been his entire property. He wished to satisfy his selfish cravings, and at the same time to enjoy the reputation of being purely disinterested, like the rest of the church.

The death of these evil-doers was miraculous
seems to be implied in the record of the transaction, and has been the general opinion of the church. That this incident was no mere physical consequence of Peter's severity of tone, as some of the German writers have maintained (Ehrmann, Frühj. d. theolog. Li.
ii, 1), is now generally supposed to be warranted by the similar death pronounced by the same apostle upon his wife Saphira a few hours after. See Saphira.

It is, of course, possible that Ananias's death may have been an act of divine justice unlooked for by the apost-else, as there is no mention of such an intended result in his speech; but in the case of the wife, such an idea is out of the question. Niemeyer (Charakteriester der Bibel, i, 574) has well stated the case as regards the blame which some have endeavored to cast on Peter in this matter (Wolffm. Fragm. p. 256) when he says that not man, but God, is thus animadverted on: the apostle is but the organ and announcer of the divine justice, who, acting in the name of the Father of God, and with the authority of the law, punishes the offenders, among whom are Augustine and Basil, argue that the severity of their punishment on earth showed how great their criminality had been, and left no hope for them hereafter.—Kitti, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

12. A Christian of Damascus (Acts ix, 10; xxii, 12), held in high repute, to whom the Lord appeared in a vision, and bade him proceed to "the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarshus; for, behold, he prayeth." Ananias had difficulty in giving credence to the message, remembering how much evil Paul had done to the saints at Jerusalem, and knowing that he had come from Damascus with the object of laying waste the church of Christ there. Receiving, however, an assurance that the persecutor had been converted, and called to the work of preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, Ananias went to Paul, and, putting his hands on him,
made him receive his sight, when immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales; and, recovering the sight which he had lost when the Lord appears-ed to him on his way to Damascus, Paul, the new convert, arose, and was baptized, and preached Jesus Christ (see Walch, Dissert. in Act. Apost. ii, 78 sq.),
A.D. 30.

Tradition (Memblog. Greecor, i, 72 sq.) represents Ananias as the first that published the Gospel in Damascus, over which place he was subsequently made bishopus; but having roused, by his zeal, the hatred of the Jews, he was seized by them, scourged, and finally stoned to death in his own church.—Kitti, s. v.

13. A son of Nebadeus (Josephus, Ant. xx, 5, 2), was made high-priest of the time of the procurator Ti-berius Alexander, about A.D. 48, by Herod, king of Chalcis, who for this purpose removed Joseph, son of Camuysus, from the high-priesthood (Josephus, Ant. xx, 1, 3). He held the office also under the procurator Cumanus, who succeeded Tiberius Alexander,
A.D. 52. Being implicated in the quarrels of the Jews and Samaria, he was put to death by the latter (who,
being dissatisfied with the conduct of Cumanus, appealed to Ummidius Quadratus, president of Syria),
sent in bonds to Rome, together with his associate Jonathan and a certain Ananus (Josephus, War, ii, 17, 6), to answer for his conduct before Claudius
in Cesar (Jochm. in passim), the case being decided in favor of the accused party. Ananus appears to have returned with credit, and to have remained in his priesthood until Agrippa gave his office to Ioseph, the son of Phabi (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 8), who succeded (Wieseler, Chronol. Synops., p. 157 sq.) a short time before the departure of the procurator Felix (Jo-ANANIEL and occupied the station also under his successor Festus (Josephus, Ant. xx. 6, 8). Ananias, after retiring from his high-priesthood, "in increased in glory every day" (Josephus, Ant. xx. 9, 2), and obtained favor with the citizens, and with Albinus, the Roman procurator, by a lavish use of the great wealth he had amassed. After this, he was sent to Caesarea, where he became a favorite with the people. After this, he was sent to Rome, where he died. Paul was defended by the Roman authorities, and was eventually allowed to return to Jerusalem.

ANAPHIL (Ἀναπηλ), 1. q. Hananok, q. v., the son of Ananias, father of Tobit, and grandfather of Tobit (Tob. 1, 3).

ANAPHORIA (Ἀναφορία, prob. a Greek form of Hanan, q. v.), the name of several men in Josephus.

1. The name of a man, whose five sons all enjoyed the office of high-priest (Josephus, Ant. xx. 9, 1), an office that he himself filled with the greatest fidelity (War, iv, 5, 7). He is probably the same as Ananias, the son of Seth, who was appointed high-priest by Cyrenius (Ant. xxii. 9, 1), and removed by Valerius Gratus (ib. 2). He is apparently the Anaphor (q. v.) mentioned in the Gospels.

2. Son of the preceding, high-priest three months, A.D. 23, by appointment of Agrrippa (Josephus, Ant. xx. 9, 1). He was a man extremely bold and enterprising, of the sect of the Sadducees; who, thinking it a fine opportunity to put fear the high-priest of Festus, governor of Judea, and before the arrival of Albinus, his successor, assembled the Sanhedrin, and thereupon procured the condemnation of James, the brother (or relative) of Christ, who is often called the bishop of Jerusalem, and of some others, whom they stigmatized as heretics, and delivered, and consigned. This was extremely displeasing to all considerable men in Jerusalem, and they sent privately to King Agrippa, who had just arrived in Judea, entreating that he would object Ananus from taking such proceedings in his office. He was, in consequence, deprived of his office. He was exceedingly active in opposing the Zealots (Josephus, Life, 56; War, iv, 9, 9-12), and, in consequence, was put to death at Jerusalem at the beginning of the Jewish war, A.D. 67 (ib. iv, 5, 1). He was from the name Ananias, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 13, 1). He was from the name Ananias, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 13, 1). He was from the name Ananias, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 13, 1). He was from the name Ananias, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 13, 1). He was from the name Ananias, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 13, 1). He was from the name Ananias, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 13, 1). He was from the name Ananias, the most barbarous of all the guards of Simon the tyrant during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 13, 1).

ANAPHORA (Ἀναφορά, raising up), in the Greek Church, is that part of the service which includes the consecration of the elements. The book containing the service is also called Anaphora. The term answers to the canon missae of the Roman Liturgy.

ANASTASIO, a martyr of the fourth century, of Roman descent, instructed in the principles of Christianity by Chrysogonus. Her father, being a pagan, gave her in marriage to a man of his own choice, Publius, who informed against her as a Christian. By command of Flocus, governor of Illyricum, she was put to the torture; but, her faith remaining unshaken, he ordered her to be burnt, which sentence was executed December 25, A.D. 304, about one month after the martyrdom of Chrysogonus, her instructor. The feast commemorating her is kept on Dec. 22: the Latinus, Dec. 25.—Baillet, under Dec. 25.

ANASTASIA. See RESURRECTION.

ANASTASIO I, Pope, a native of Rome, succeeded Siricus about the year 398. He was a contemporary of St. Jerome, who speaks highly of his probity and apostolic zeal. He condemned the doctrine of Origen, and excommunicated Rufinus, who, in a controversy with Jerome, had been the advocate of Origen. Anastasius is said to have acknowledged that he did not understand the controversy. Rufinus wrote an apology, which is found in Constant's collection of the "Epistles of the Popes." Anastasius died in 402, and was succeeded by Innocent I.—Riddle, Hist. of Popes, i, 150; Halkin, April 37.

II. Pope, a native of Rome, succeeded Gelasius I in 496. He endeavored to put an end to the schism then existing between the see of Constantinople and that of Rome about the question of precedence. Two letters written by him on the occasion to the Emperor Anastasius are still extant. He also wrote a con-
"Epistles of the Popes." Anastasius died in 402, and was succeeded by Innocent I.—Riddle, Hist. of Popes, i, 129; Barnabas, Annal. A.D. 496.

III. Pope, likens a Roman, succeeded Sergius III in 658; he died the following year.

IV. Cardinal Conrad, bishop of Sabina, was elected pope in 1158, after the death of Eugenius III. Rome was then in a very disturbed state, owing to the movements of Arnold of Brescia and his followers. Anastasius died in 1154, and was succeeded by Adrian IV. He wrote a work on the Trinity.

ANASTASIO, Anti-pope, elected about 555 in opposition to Benedict III. Emperor Louis, at the request of the people and clergy of Rome, induced him to resign.

ANASTASIO, St., patriarch of Antioch, was raised to that throne in 559. The Emperor Justinian, who favored the errors of the Apollinaris doctrine (who held that our Lord before his resurrection was, as to his flesh, incorruptible and incapable of suffering), did all in his power to induce Anastasius to support them also, but he persisted in opposing them. Justinian II—banished him from Antioch, which he did not revisit until 585, after twenty-three years of exile. He died in 598 or 599, amid the heaviest afflictions. Gregory the Great wrote often to him to console him, and to congratulate him on his return. In the second council of Constantinople it was read, in which he drew the distinction between the worship due to God, and that which we render to men and angels, viz., that we serve God alone. His remains may be found in St. Max. Patr. tom. ix, and in Cornell., Nov. Aust. tom. I. He is often confounded with Anastasius Sinaita (q. v.),—Landon, Eccl. Dict. i, 886.

Anastasius, Sr., surnamed Astric, the bishop of Hungary, born in 954, died Sept. 9, 1044. He entered the Benedictine order at Rouen, France. Subsequently he went to Bohemia with Adalbert, bishop of Prague, by whom he was made abbot of Brouna. When Adalbert had fled to be from Bohemia, Astric left with him. He found an asylum at the court of Duke Stephen of Hungary, who, in the year 1000, put him at the head of the Benedictine abbey of St. Martin. Stephen having divided his duchy into ten bishoprics, that of Colocza was accorded to Astric, who beneath assumed the name of Anastasius. The duke then sent him to Rome to obtain from the pope, Sylvester II, the sanction of the ecclesiastical organization of the bishopric of Hungary (Stephen had died 1038). He brought back for Stephen, with the royal crown and the double cross, the right to regulate the affairs of the Hungarian Church. Being proclaimed king by the nation, Stephen was consecrated and crowned by Anastasius. The latter was, during three years, provincial metropolitan of Hungary, the archbishop of Strigonia being, by a temporary loss of sight, prevented from discharging the duties of his office. While provincial metropolitan, Anastasius was present at the assembly of Frankfurt, and blessed the marriage of the king with Gisela, sister of Holy Roman Emperor Henry II. When the archbishop of Strigonia recovered his sight, Anastasius retired into his diocese, when he devoted himself until his death to the propagation of the Christian faith,—Österreichisches biographisches Lexicon (Vienna, 1851); Hoefer, Biogr. Générale, ii, 480.

Anastasius Sinaita, a monk of Mt. Sinai, born, it is supposed, about 609, though the date is undecided. He is said to have been called to be the successor of St. John of Damascus in defending the faith against the Arians, separatists, and Theodians. In his "Odegor," or "Guide to the Right Path," he speaks of John who was the Theodian patriarch of Alexandria from 677 to 686; he was consequently alive about that period, but when he died is not known. He is honored as a saint in the Greek Church. His principal work, the Odegor just mentioned, has been attributed by some writers to the patriarch Anastasius, who died in 598; but the fact just mentioned, viz., that John of Alexandria, who was patriarch from 677 to 686, is spoken of in it, will prove the impossibility of this. This work was published by Grasset, at Innsbruck, in 1606. Some of the MSS. do not, however, contain the Exposition of the Faith, which is contained in Grateur's edition at the beginning, and differ in many other particulars. The complete works of Anastasius Sinaita have been published by Migne, in Patrologia Graec. tom. lxxxix (Paris, 1860).

Anastasius, a Persian martyr who was baptized at Jerusalem. After his baptism he retired into the monastery of Anastasius, and thence imbibing the superstitious desire of martyrdom, he journeyed to Césarea. When there, he was brought before the governor Barzabanes, who endeavored, first by bribes, and afterward by tortures, to induce him to forsake the destruction of the temple, but in vain. Returning to Persia, where he was first strangled, and then beheaded by order of Chosroes, January 22, 628, the day on which he is commemorated as a saint both in the East and West.—Balley, Vies des Saints, Jan. 22; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Anastasius (Bibliothecarius), librarian of the Vatican, and abbot of St. Maria Trans-Tiberim at Rome, a celebrated and learned writer of the ninth century. The dates of his birth and death are unknown. He was on terms of intimacy with the learned men of his age, especially with Photius and Hincmar. He was present in 889 at the eighth council of Constantinople, where Photius was condemned. He translated the Acts of the Council from Greek into Latin. He wrote Historia Ecclesiastica (ed. by Stephani, 1649, fol.); but the most important of his writings is a History of the Popes, under the title De Vita Romornorum pontificum, a Petro Apostolo ad Nicolaum I, adiectis vita Hadriani II et Stephani IV (Rome, 1718-1735, 4 vols. fol. and several other editions).—Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 870; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, ii, 473.

A'math (Heb. Amath, אתם, an ammer, i. e. to prayer; Sept. ἀμαθή, the father of Shammur, one of the judges of Israel (Judg. iii. 31; v. 6). B.C. ante 1429.

Anath'zma (ἀναθήμα), literally any thing laid up or suspended from ἀναθηματικός, to lay up, and hence any thing laid up in a temple set apart as sacred (2 Macc. ix. 16). In this general sense the form employed is ἀναθήμα, a word of not unfrequent occurrence in Greek classic authors, and found once in the N. T., Luke xxii. 6. The form ἀναθηματικός, as well as its meaning, is peculiar to the Alexandrine dialect (Vellachsen, Schoel. 1, 593). The distinction has probably arisen from the special use made of the word by the Greek Jews. In the Sept. ἀναθήμα is the ordinary rendering of the Hebrew word פֶּתַרְמ, che'rem (although in some instances it varies between the two forms, as in Lev. xxvii. 28, 29), and in order to ascertain its meaning it will be necessary to inquire into the signification of the word. The Alexandrine writers preferred the short penuinmate in this and other kindred words (e. g. καθήμα, καθηματικός); but occasionally both forms occur in the Mss., as in Judg. xvi. 19; 2 Macc. xii. 10; Luke xxii. 6; no distinction therefore existed originally in the meanings of the words, as had been supposed by many early writers.

The word ἀναθηματικός, a verb signifying primarily to shut up, and hence to (1) consecrate or devote, and (2) exterminate. Any object so devoted to the Lord was irredeemable; if an inanimate object, it was to be given to the priests (Num. xviii. 14); if a living creature, or even a man, it was to be slain (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29); hence the idea of extermination as connected with devotion. Generally speaking, a word of this description was taken only with respect to the idolatrous nations who were marked out for destruction by the special decree of Jehovah, as in Num. xxi. 2; Josh. vi. 17; but occasionally the vow was made indefinitely, and involved the death of the innocent, as is illustrated in the case of Jephtha's daughter (Judg. xi. 31), according to the frequent custom in that of Jonathan (1 Sam. xiv. 24), who was only saved by the interposition of the people. The breach of such a vow on the part of any one directly or indirectly participating in it was punished with death (Josh. vii, 25). In addition to these cases of spontaneous devotion on the part of the people, the word הַמֹּס, כֶּרֶם, is frequently applied to the extermination of idolatrous nations; in such cases the idea of a vow appears to be dropped, and the word assumes a purely secondary sense (Sept. יָצָאָתָיו); or, if the original meaning is still to be retained, it may be in the sense of Jehovah (Isa. xxxiv. 2) shutting up, i. e. placing under a ban, and so necessitating the destruction of the people involved in it. The extermination being the result of a positive command (Exod. xxii. 20), the idea of a vow is excluded, although doubtless the instances already referred to (Num. xxi, 2; Josh. vi, 17) show how a vow was occasionally superadded to the command. It may be further noticed that the degree to which the work of destruction was carried out varied. Thus it applied to the destruction of (1) men alone (Deut. xx, 10; [9]) (2) men and all living creatures (Deut. xxi, 10; (3) all living creatures (Deut. xxi, 16; 1 Sam. xv, 8); the spoil in the former cases were reserved for the use of the army (Deut. ii, 35; xx, 14; Josh. xxi, 8), instead of being given over to the priesthood, as was the case in the recorded vow of Joshua (Josh. vi, 19). See Vow.

I. We thus find that the chereim was a person or thing consecrated or devoted irrevocably to God, and that it differed from any thing merely vowed or sanctified to the Lord in this respect, that the latter could be redeemed (Lev. xxviii, 1-27), while the former was irrevocable (Lev. xxvii, 21), and in reference to living creatures, the devoted thing, whether man or beast, must be put to death (Lev. xxvii, 29). The prominent idea, therefore, which the word conveyed was that of a person or thing devoted to destruction, or accursed. Thus the cities of the Canaanites were anathematized (Num. xxxi, 2, 8); and after their complete destruction, the name of the place was called Hormah (נמרות Sept. ומכרה). Thus, again, the city of Jericho was made an anathema to the Lord (Josh. vi, 17); that is, every living thing in it (except Rahab and her family) was devoted to death; that which could be destroyed by fire was burned, and all that could not be thus consumed (as gold and silver) was forever alienated from man and devoted to the use of the sanctuary (Josh. vi, 24). The prominence thus given to the idea of a thing accursed led naturally to the use of the word in cases where there was no reference whatever to consecration to the service of God, as in Deut. vii, 26, where an idol is called ומכרה, or ומכרה, and the Israelites are warned against idolatry lest they should be anathema like it. In these instances the term refers to the object of the curse, but it is sometimes used to designate the curse itself (e. g. Deut. xx, 17, Sept.; comp. Acts xxiii, 14), and it is in this latter sense that the English word is generally employed.

In this sense, also, the Jews of later times use the Hebrew term, though with a somewhat different meaning as to the curse intended. The word, chereim, of the Rabbins, signifies excommunication or exclusion from the Jewish Church. The more recent rabbinical writers reckon three kinds or degrees of excommunication, all of which are occasionally designated by this generic term (Elias Levi, in Stepber Tishbi). (1) The first of these, נדוע, nidocus, separation, is merely a temporary separation or suspension from ecclesiastical privileges, involving, however, various civil inconveniences, particularly seclusion from society to the distance of four cubits. The person thus excommunicated was not debarred entering the temple, but instead of going in on the right hand, as was customary, he was obliged to enter on the left, the usual way of departure: if he died while in this condition there was no mourning for him, but a stone was thrown on his coffin to indicate that he was separated from the people and had deserved stoning. Buxtorf (Lex. Talm. col. 1304) enumerates twenty-four causes of this kind of excommunication: it lasted thirty days, and was pronounced without a curse. If the individual did not repent at the expiration of the term, however, according to Buxtorf, was extended in such cases to sixty or ninety days), the second kind of excommunication was resorted to.

(2.) This was called simly and more properly ומכרה, chereim, curse. It could only be pronounced by an assembly of at least ten persons, and was always accompanied with curses. The formula employed is given at length by Buxtorf (Lex. col. 828). A person thus excommunicated was cut off from all religious and social privileges: it was unlawful either to eat or drink with him (comp. 1 Cor. v, 11). The curse could only be pronounced by a rabbin, by several rabbins, or by one person of dignity. (3.) If the excommunicated person still continued impenitent, a yet more severe sentence was, according to the rabbins, pronounced against him, which was termed卡通, kam-i-mata, inspiration (Elias Levi, in Tishbi). It is described as a complete excommunication from the Church and the giving up of the individual to the judgment of God. There is reason to believe that these three grades are of recent origin. The Talmudists frequently use the term by which the first and last are designated interchangeably, and some rabbinical writers (whom Lightfoot has followed in his Hora Hebr. et Talm. ad 1 Cor. v, 5) consider the last to be a lower grade than the second; yet it is probable that the classification rests on the fact that the sentence was more or less severe according to the circumstances of the case; and though we cannot expect to find the three grades distinctly marked in the writings of the N. T., we may not improbably consider the phrase "put out of the synagogue," "excom- munication," "withholding," etc., (comp. ix, 25; xii, 42), as referring to a lighter censure than is intended by one or more of the three terms used in Luke vi, 22, where perhaps different grades are intended. The phrase "deliver over to Satan" (1 Cor. v, 5; 1 Tim. i, 20) has been by many commentators understood to refer to the most severe kind of excommunication. Even admitting the allusion, however, there is a very important difference between the Jewish censure and the formula employed by the apostle. In the Jewish sense it would signify the delivering over of the transgressor to final perdition, while the apostle expressly limits his sentence to the "destruction of the flesh" (i. e. the depraved nature), and resorts to it in order "that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." See ACCURSED.

II. But, whatever diversity of opinion there may be as to the degrees of excommunication, it is on all hands admitted that the term ומכרה, with which we are more particularly concerned as the equivalent of the Greek ἀθηναίμαι, properly denotes, in its rabbinical use, an exclusion from society, with severe curses and denunciations of evil. We are therefore prepared to find that the anathema of the N. T. always implies excommunication; but it yet remains to be ascertained whether it is ever used to designate a judicial act of excommunication. That there is frequently no such reference is very clear: in some instances the individual denounced the anathema on himself, unless certain conditions are fulfilled.

The noun and its corresponding verb are thus used in Acts xxii, 12, 14, 21, and the verb occurs with a similar meaning in Matt. xxvi, 74; Mark xiv, 71. The phrase "to call upon the name of the Lord" (1 Cor. xii, 3; Eph. i, 21) is commonly applied to a judicial sentence pronounced by the Jewish authorities, but to the act of any private individual who exhorted him and pronounced him accursed. That this was a common practice among the Jews appears from the rabbinical writings. The term, as it is used in reference to any who should preach another gospel, "Let him be anathema" (Gal. i, 8, 9), has the same meaning as let him be accounted execrable and accursed. In none of these instances do we find any reason to think that the word was employed to designate specifically and technically excommunication either from the Jewish or the Christian Church. The absence of two passages in which it occurs in the N. T., both presenting considerable difficulty to the translator.
(c.) With regard to the first of these (Rom. 1, 8), Grotius and others understand the phrase "accursed from the earth" to signify excommunication from the Christian Church, while most of the fathers, together with Tholuck, Rücker, and a great number of modern interpreters, explain the term as referring to the Jewish practice of excommunication. On the other hand, Deyling, Olshausen, and others maintain that it properly means a general meaning of accursed. The great difficulty is to ascertain the extent of the evil which Paul expresses his willingness to undergo: Chrysostom, Calvin, and many others understand it to include final separation, not, indeed, from the love, but from the presence of Christ; others limit it to a violent death; and others, again, extend it to damnation. Let us consider whether any of these are to be regarded simply as expressions of the most intense desire (γεγενομένους παραδότος ἐν, I could wish, i.e. were such a thing proper or available, see Winer, Idiom., p. 222). Some have even thought (taking the verb as a historical Imperfect) that the apostle was simply referring to his former declaration of detestation of Christ, when yet unconverted (see Bloomfield, Ecclesio Synag. in loc.), and Tregelles proposes (A Account of Gr. Text of N. T., p. 219) to remove the difficulty altogether in this way, by enclosing the clause in question in a parenthesis. See Wollf Cure, in loc.; Poli Sympos., in loc.; Trautmann, Illustratio (Jen. 1798); Meth. Quest. Rev. 1863, p. 420 sqq. Comp. Ban.

(b.) The phrase ANATHEMA MARAN-ATHA, οὐαίτια μαρανατσά (1 Cor. xvi, 22), has been considered by many to be equivalent to the Ναϴωματα, shammatas, of the rabbins, the third and most severe form of excommunication. This opinion is derived from the supposed etymological identity of the Syriac phrase itself, maran-atha (q. v.), Ναϴωματα, "the Lord cometh," with the Hebrew word which is considered by these commentators to be derived from ותמה, shem atha, "the Name (i.e. Jehovah) cometh." This explanation, however, can rank no higher than a plausible conjecture, since it is supported by no historical evidence. The Hebrew term is never found thus divided, nor is it ever thus explained by Jewish writers, who, on the contrary, give etymologies different from this (Baxtor, Lex. col. 2466). It is, moreover, very uncertain whether this third kind of excommunication was in use in the time of Paul, and the phrase which he employs is not found in any rabbinical writer (Lightfoot, Horae Hebr. et Talm. on 1 Cor. xvi, 22). The literal meaning of the words is clear, but it is not easy to understand why the Syriac phrase is here employed, or what is its meaning in connection with anathema. Lightfoot supposes that the apostle uses it to signify that he pronounced this anathema against the Jews. However this may be, the supposition that the anathema, whatever be its precise object, is intended to designate excommunication from the Christian Church, as Grotius and Augusti understand it, appears to be on very slight grounds: it seems preferable to regard it, with Lightfoot and most other commentators, simply as an expression of detestation. Though, however, we find little or no evidence of the use of the word anathema in the N. T. as the technical term for excommunication, it is certain that it obtained this meaning in the early ages of the Church; for it is thus employed in the apostolic canons, in the council of Chalcedon, in the fathers, and in the councils of the Church. Hence it was used in excommunication in being attended with curses and execrations. It signifies not only to cut off the living from the Church, but the dead from salvation. It was practiced in the early Church against notorious offenders. The form has been preserved: the following was pronounced by Synagoga against one Andronicus: "Let no Church of God be open to Andronicus and his accusers, but let every sacred temple and church be shut against them. I abominate both private men and magistrates to receive them neither under their roof nor to their table; and priests, more especially, that they neither converse with them living nor attend their funerals when dead." When any one was thus anathematized, notice was given to the neighboring churches, and occasionally to the churches over the world, that all might confirm and ratify this act of discipline by refusing to admit such a one into their communion. The form of denouncing anathemas against heretics and heresies is very ancient. But as zeal about opinions increased, and Christians began to set a higher value on trifles than on the weightier matters of the law, it became a common practice to add anathemas to every point in which men differed from each other. At the Council of Trent a whole body of divinity was put into canons, and an anathema affixed to each, how fearful an instrument of power the anathema was in the hands of popes in the Middle Ages is attested by history. Popes still continue to hurl anathemas against heretics, which are little regarded.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xvi, ch. ii, § 16. See Interdict.

An'athoth (Heb. Anathoth, אנתוית, anawra, l. e. to prayer; Sept. Αναθών, the name of one city and of two men.

1. One of the towns belonging to the priests in the tribe of Benjamin, and as such a city of refuge (Josh. xxvi, 18). It is omitted from the list in Josh. xviii, but included as a "suburb" (1 Chron. vi, 60 [45]). Hither, to his "fields," ahab is banished by Solomon after the failure of his attempt to put Adonijah on the throne (1 Kings ii, 26). This was the native place of Abiezer, one of David's 80 captains (2 Sam. xxiii, 27; 1 Chron. xi, 28; xxvii, 12), and of Jehu, another of the mighty men (1 Chron. xii, 9). This "men" (אנתוית, anawra, i.e. one who is in his own case; compare, however, Netophah, Michmash, etc.) of Anathoth returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 28; Neh. vii, 37; 1 Esdr. v, 18). It is chiefly memorable, however, as the birthplace and usual residence of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. i, 1; xi, 21-23; xxix, 37; xxxii, 7-9), whose name it seems to have borne in the time of Jerome, "Anathoth of Jeremia" (Onomast. v). This same writer in Jer. i, 1 places Anathoth three Roman miles north of Jerusalem, which correspond with the twenty stadia assigned by Josephus (Ant. x, 7, 8). In the Talmud (Yoma, 10) it is called Anath (אנת). (For other notices, see Reland's Palest. p. 561 sqq.) Anathoth lay on or near the great road from the north to Jerusalem.
Ancillon

Ancillon was a bishop in the Cyrillid Church who lived between 1554 and 1558. He was a missionary in Brazil, where he distinguished himself more than any other member of his order. He is often called the Apostle of Brazil. He had an extraordinary influence over the Indians, who, under his guidance, aided in establishing the city of Rio, and in expelling the French from the country. He is the author of a grammar of the Brazilian Indians, which is still regarded as a classic work on that subject (see Ausland, 1835, p. 656 sq.). Although a large number of miracles were reported of him, he has not yet been canonized. He died June 19, 1597. A Latin biography of him was published by Bercarius in Cologne, 1617.

Anchor [Sonomy], the instrument fastened in the bottom of the sea to hold a vessel firm during a storm (Acts xxvii, 29, 30, 40); from which passage it appears that the vessels of Roman commerce had several anchors, and that they were attached to the stern as well as prow of the boat (see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, ii, 385). The anchors used by the Romans were for the most part made of iron, and their form resembled that of the modern anchor. The anchor as here represented, and as commonly used, was called ἄντηρα, because it had two teeth or flukes. Sometimes it had one only. The following expressions were used for the three principal processes in managing the anchor: ἀντοράμα συλλέπει, ἄνθυσα τοῦ ἄντηρος, "to loose the anchor;" ἀντοράμα τολλοζε, ἀποχάλει, ἀναπεκ νεον, "to cast anchor;" ἀντοράμα τολλοζε, ἀποχάλει, ἀναπεκ νεον, "to weigh anchor." The anchor usually lay on the deck, and was attached to a cable (funicum), which passed through a hole in the prow, termed occlus. In the

of his varied learning is to be obtained from the work entitled "Mélanges Critiques de Littérature, recueilli des Communications de feu M. Ancillon," published at Baie in 1698 by his son Charles, who was a man of literary distinction (see Haag, La France Protestant, i, 60; Bayle, Dict. s. v.).

Andillon, Jean Pierre Frédéric, a descendant of David Ancillon, was born at Berlin on the 30th of April, 1766. He studied theology, and on his return from the university he was appointed teacher at the military academy of Berlin, and preacher at the French church of the same town. He began his literary career by a work entitled "Mélanges de Littérature, philos. et phil.," Berlin, 1801, 2 vols. 8vo.; and a few years after he was appointed professor of the Academy of Sciences of Berlin, and was, at the same time, appointed his historiographer. His preaching at Berlin attracted the attention of the king, and he was drawn into political life. In 1806 he was appointed instructor of the Crown Prince of Prussia, and was further distinguished by the title of Councillor of State. In 1825 he was made Minister of Foreign Affairs, in which office he died, April 10, 1837.—Biog. Dict. Soc. Utile. Knowledge: Haag, La France Protestant, i, 90.

Ancora, a city in Galatia (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog., s. v.), where three councils were held: I. In 314, attended by twelve or eighteen bishops; the subject of apostates was discussed, and twenty-five canons were passed. II. Semi-Arian council, 315, and a second formula of Sirmium (q. v.). III. In 375, when Hypsius, bishop of Parnassus, was deposed.—Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

Anderson, Christopher, an English Baptist minister, born at Edinburgh, Feb. 19, 1782, and educated at the Baptist College, Bristol. In 1806 he commenced his labors as a city missionary in Edinburgh, at his own expense, and in ten years a church was established, of which he remained the pastor till his death. He was one of the principal founders of the Edinburgh Bible Society (1809) and of the Gaelic School Society (1811). He died Feb. 18, 1852. Besides fugitive essays on missions, etc., he wrote "The Design of the Domestic Constitution" (Lond. 8vo); —History of the Council of the Ancients (Lond. 1833, 12mo); —Annals of the English Bible (Lond. 1845, 2 vols. 8vo.); —Jamieson, Relig. Biog. p. 16.

Anderson, John, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, born in Guildford, N.C., April 10, 1677, licensed to preach in 1791. He itinerated in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio until 1801, when he became pastor at Upper Buffalo, Washington Co., Pa., where he remained till 1833. He was made D.D. by Washington College, 1821. He died Jan. 5, 1835. Many ministers of eminence studied in Dr. Anderson's house.—Sprague, Ancilla, iii, 588.

Anderson (or Andree), Lawrence (or Le Querent), chancellor of Gustavus Vasa, born in Sweden in 1480. He was at first a priest at Strängnäs, and became subsequently archdeacon at Upsal. On his return from a journey to Rome he passed through Paris, and became convinced of the truth of Luther's doctrines. Arriving in Sweden, he was made chancellor by Gustavus Vasa, who readily seconded all his efforts for promoting the Reformation in Sweden. At the request of the king, Anderson, together with Claus Petr, translated the Bible into Swedish. The Reformation was established by the Diet of Wetter in 1528. Anderson was high in office and favor until 1540, when he was charged with having failed to disclose a conspiracy against the king of which he had knowledge, and he was sentenced to death. He was, however, let off for a sum of money, and retired to Strängnäs, where he died April 3, 1552.—Hoefer, Biog. Centrale, ii, 529.

Anderson, Peyton, a Methodist preacher of Virginia, born 1795, entered the Virginia Conference at nineteen, and preached in the principal cities and stations until his death in 1823, aged twenty-eight. Mr. Anderson was a teacher previous to his ministry, and, being well-educated, modest, faithful, and circumspect, and greatly devoted to his calling, his promise of future usefulness to the church was rapidly maturing, which was proved by his election to the Committee of 1824.

Andrade, Antonio d', a Portuguese theologian and missionary, born at Villa de Olienera about 1500, died August 20, 1583. He entered the order of Jesuits at Coimbra in 1566, and was, in 1601, sent as missionary to India. Having been appointed the superior of the missions of Mongolia, he learned that in Thibet certain vestiges of Christianity, or some form of religious worship similar to that of the Roman Catholic Church, was to be found. He accordingly concluded to visit that, until then, almost entirely unknown country. He successfully accomplished the hazardous journey, and reached Caparanga, a city which was the residence of the military chief of Thibet. It is said that he was well received by the grandees and the court, and that he was allowed to preach and to erect a temple to the Virgin Mary. He returned to Mongolia in order to associate with himself other missionaries. With these he went a second time to Thibet, where he again met with a favorable reception. Subsequently he was elected provincial of the residence of Gos, where he remained until his death. He published an account of his first journey to Thibet under the title Novo Descobrimento do Grão Cato, ou dos Reinos de Thibet (Lisb. 1626, 4to); —Novo Descobrimento do Grão Cato, ou dos Reinos de Thibet (Lisb. 1626, 4to).—(New Discovery of the Great Cathay, or the Kingdoms of Thibet). This work was translated into many other languages—into French in 1586, Dict. Gén. des d. des dom. s. v.; into Spanish, in 1589, and 1601; into Italian, and 1604; into Portuguese, in 1586, and 1594; into Dutch, in 1602; and into German, in 1603.——Alegamba, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jnerv.; Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Gén. des d. des dom. s. v., 588.

Andrade, Diogo Payva d', a Portuguese theologian, was born at Coimbra in 1528, and became grand treasurer of King John. He distinguished himself as the Council of Trent, concerning which he wrote Quasiriwm Ordororom libri x, against Chemnitz Examen Conc. Trid. (Venice, 1604, 4to); besides Defensor Fidei Trident. lib. vi (Lisb. 1614, 4to); De Conciliorum Authoritate: and several other volumes of secular and sacred works. He died in 1675.—Alegamba, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jnerv.; Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Gén. des d. des dom, i, 588.

Andrade, Thomas d' Jesus, brother of the last, and monk of the Augustine monastery at Coimbra. He laid the foundation in 1578 of the Discalced. He followed King Don Sebastian into Africa, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Alcarez, August 4, 1578, and thrown by the infidels into a dungeon, but other light penetrated but that which came to him through the cracks in the door. Here he wrote, in Portuguese, The Labors of Jesus, which obtained great celebrity, and has been translated into Spanish, Italian, and French. He died April 17, 1582, in the place of his confinement, where, in spite of the ransom sent by his sister, the Countess of Linhares, he preferred to remain, that he might comfort, during the remainder of his days, the Christian captives imprisoned with him. Father Alexis de Meneses has written his Life, which is appended to "The Labors of Jesus," printed in 1651.—Landon, Ecles. Dict. i, 20.

André, Jakob, a celebrated Lutheran theologian, born at Waiblingen, in Württemberg, March 25, 1528. In 1543 he took the degree of B.A. in the University of Tübingen, and in 1553 that of doctor in theology. In 1546 he became deacon in Stuttgart; and when the Spanish troops took the town, he alone, of all the Protestant preachers, remained. In 1556 and 1559 he labored successfully in planting the Reformation in Oettingen and Baden. In 1557 he attended the diets of Frankfort and Ratisbon, and was one of the secretaries at the Conference of Worms. In 1557 he published his work De Cælo, Domini, and in the year following he published a reply to the work of St philippus (who had gone over to the Roman Church) against...
Luther, in which that writer had made a collection of the various opinions of all the different Protestant sects, and attributed them to Luther as the origin of all. In 1562 he was made professor of theology and chancellor of the University of Tübingen. He went, in 1563, to Strauburg, where Zanchius had been previously employed, and the elector was full of grace, sin as they will, and persuaded Zanchius to sign a confession of faith which he drew up. See ZANCIUS.

During the next eight years he travelled largely in Germany and Bohemia, consolidating the Reformation. In 1571 he pronounced the sentence that sin is a capital crime. But the most important labor of his life was his share in the preparation of the Formula Concordiae, composed by a meeting of divines at Torgau, 1576, and revised in April, 1577, at the monastery of Berg, by André, Chemnitz, and Seinecker. This Liber Bergensis was accepted by Augustus, elector of Saxony, who caused his clergy to sign it, and invited those of other German states to sign also. Many refused. The book, previously revised by Musculus, Cornerus, and Chytraeus, with a preface by André, was printed in 1579. (See Francke, Libri Symbolici, part iii, Prologum; and see FORMULA CONCORDIAE.) It is thoroughly polemical, and marks the Lutheranism of the Calvinistic view of the sacraments. An account of the controversies caused by the Formula is given by Mosheim (CH. Hist. cent. xvi, sec. iii, pt. ii, ch. 1). André laboriously earned to gain general assent to the Formula; for five years he travelled widely, confering with princes, magistrates, and prelates, and in 1584 the labors of the luminous work on the ubiquity of Christ. In 1586 he disputed with Beza at the colloquy of Montbéliard, and died at Tübingen Jan. 7, 1590. He wrote more than one hundred and fifty different works, chiefly polemical.

ANDREAS, ABRAHAM, Lutheran archbishop of Upsala, a native of Saxony, was born in 1607. While rector of the university of Stockholm he offended King John, the son of Gustavus Vasa, who wished to re-establish the Roman Catholic Church in Sweden. In order to escape imprisonment he fled to Germany, where he spent thirteen years, during which time he published most of his works. At the death of John, in 1611, he returned to his see, on the accession of Sigismund, his successor, who was at the same time king of Poland, the Swedish clergy met at Upsal, resolved to maintain the Confession of Augsburg, and unanimously elected Andreas archbishop. King John Sigismund, on his arrival at Stockholm, had to confirm the election, and he was crowned by Andreas. Duke Charles, the prince regent of Sweden, charged him with reorganizing the church affairs; but on the tour which he undertook to this end he raised the indignation of the people by his rigor, and incurred the displeasure of the regent. Being moreover accused of a secret understanding with Sigismund, he was seized in his office and imprisoned in the Castle of Gripsholm, where he died. Andreas wrote a work against the Adiaphorists (Forum Adiaphororum, Wittenberg, 1587, 8vo), with several other works. He also translated a commentary on Daniel by Draciotes, and published several works of his father-in-law, Laurentius Petri de Nerikle.

ANDREAS CACETTIUS (Andrew of Crete), so called because his province was that of Crete. Born at Damascus about 656, he embraced the monastic state at Jerusalem, for which reason he is sometimes styled Hieroelmotimianus. He was a vehement antagonist of the Monothelites, was ordained deacon at Constantinople, and shortly after was made archbishop of Crete, which church he governed for many years, and died at Mitylene at the end of the seventh century. Besides his sermons, homilies, and orations, he wrote many hymns, some of which are still sung in the Greek churches. The Greek Church commemorates him as a saint on July 4. His remains are gathered under the title Opéra Gr. et Lat. cons. nodis Combollé, fol. (Paris, 1639; Seeave, Hist. Lit. anno 633; Landon, Eccles. Dict. i, 352.

ANDREAS, archbishop of Crain in Austria, one of the forerunners of Luther, lived in the second half of the fifteenth century. Having been sent by the Emperor Frederick III to Rome, he was scandalized at the manners of the Roman court. Andreas urged the necessity of a reform of the church upon the cardinals, and the pope, who at first praised his zeal, but when Andreas continued to press, made him understand that his labors were of no avail. Having been liberated through the intervention of Emperor Frederick III, he went to Basle, and attempted to convoke another general council. Public opinion and the universities showed to him a great deal of sympathy, but the pope excommunicated him and all who would give him an asylum. When the city of Basle refused to expel Andreas, the papal legate put it under the interdict, to which, however, no one paid any attention except the Carmelite monks, who on that account were refused any alms by the citizens, and nearly starved to death. After a long negotiation with the pope and the cardinals, it was determined that Andreas was to be retracted, and when he refused he was put in prison, where, after a few months, he was found hung, in 1484—on the same day, it is said, when Luther was born. His body was put in a barrel, and, through the executioner, thrown into the Rhine.

ANDREIS, or ANDREI, JOHANN VALENTIN, grandson of Jakob von See, born at Herrenberg, 1546. After completing his academic course at Tübingen, he travelled for some years as tutor. In 1614 he became deacon at Vaihingen, where he labored zealously six years as preacher and writer, directing his efforts mainly against formalism and mysticism. Himself a practical Christian, he mourned over the frivolous learning and pedantry of the time, and directed his life and labors against it. But instead of attacking them in the usual way, he adopted wit and satire as his weapons. He wrote Minippus, sive Saeculiornus d'alorum et ciurorum secularium in praepulitica orthodoxy, and Atenea Eva, against cabalistic theosophy. His Fama Fraternitatis Roman Cruunt (1614) and Confessio Natorealitatis H. C. (1615), were an ironical attack on the secret societies of his times. Those who did not understand the mystification ascribed to him the foundation of the Rosicrucians (q. v.). He wrote again, and book after book, to show that his first work was fictitious, and destined to teach a useful lesson; but nobody would believe him at first. But finally he was understood, and "no satire was probably ever attended with more beneficial results." His real object was to overthrow the idols of the time in literature and religion, and to bring the minds of men back to Christ; and no writer of his time did more to accomplish this end. He removed to Venice in 1629, where he died in 1634, and the church of Nördlingen, 1634, he lost his library and other property. He died at Adelberg, June 27, 1634. For a further account of him, see Hossbach, Andreae und sein Zeitalter (Berlin, 1819); Hurst, History of Rationalism, chap. i. Rheinwald, Andreae Iusop ubi conscripta (Berlin, 1856), and Ch. Itzler, § 2.

ANDREW (Ἀνδρέας, manly), one of the twelve apostles. His name is of Greek origin (Athen. xv. 675; vii. 312), but was in use among the later Jews (Josephus, Ant. xii. 2, 2; see Dio Cass. lxviii. 82; comp. Dios. Sid. Excerpta Vat. p. 14, ed. Lipe.), as appears from a passage quoted from the Jerusalem Talmud by Lightfoot (Harmony, Luke v. 10). He was a native of the city of Bethsaida in Galilee (John i. 44), and brother of Simon Peter (Matt. iv. 18; Acts...
ANDREW

2, John 1:43). He was at first a disciple of John the Baptist (John 1:29), and was led to receive Jesus as the Messiah in consequence of John's expressly pointing him out as "the Lamb of God" (John 1:30, A.D. 26). His first care, after he had satisfied himself as to the validity of the claims of Jesus, was to bring to him his brother Simon. Neither of them, however, became at that time steadfast disciples. but afterwards, for a time, they were pursuing their occupation as fishermen on the Sea of Galilee when Jesus, after John's imprisonment, called them to follow him (Matt. iv, 18 sq.; Mark i, 16, 17). A.D. 37. See PETER.

In two of the lists of the apostles (Matt. x, 2; Luke vi, 15) he is named in the first pair with Peter, but in Mark xvi, 7, in the company of Thomas. In Acts i, 13, with James. In accompanying Jesus he appears as one of the confidential disciples (Mark xii, 3; John vi, 21; xii, 22), but he is by no means to be confounded (as by Lützelberger, Kirchl. Tradit. über Jch. p. 199 sq.) with the beloved disciple of the fourth Gospel (see Luke, Conn. c., ib. Joh. i, 65 sq.; Masler, Comm. in Joh. 8, 94 sq.). Very little is related of Andrew by any of the evangelists: the principal incidents in which his name occurs during the life of Christ are the feeding of the five thousand (John vi, 9), his introducing to our Lord certain Greeks who desired to see him (John xii, 22), and his asking, along with his brother, Simon, to point him the way to the kingdom of God. For a further explanation of what our Lord had said in reference to the destruction of the temple (Mark xiii, 8), of his subsequent history and labors we have no authentic record. Tradition assigns Scythia (Eusebius, iii, 1, 71), Greece (Theodoret, i, 1425; Jerome, Ep. 149 ad Marce), and, at a later date, Asia Minor, Thrace (Hippolytus, ii, 80), and elsewhere (Nepos, ii, 89), as the scenes of his ministry. It is supposed that he founded a church in Constantinople, and ordained Stachys (q. v.), named by Paul (Rom. xvi, 9), as its first bishop. At length, the tradition states, he came to Patras, a city of Achaea, where Stachys, the proconsul, enraged at his persistent preaching, commanded him to join in sacrifices to the heathen gods; and upon the apostle's refusal, he ordered him to be severely scourged and then crucified. To make his death the more lingering, he was fastened to the cross, not with nails, but with cords. Having hung two days, praisings the Lord and the God to whom his trust had been committed, he is said to have expired on the 8th of November, but in what year is uncertain. The cross is stated to have been of the form called "crux decussata" (X), and commonly known as "St. Andrew's cross;" but this is doubted by some (see Lepalus, De cruce, i, 7; Sagittar. De crucisat. ac scissori. viii, 19). His relics, it is said, were afterward removed from Patras to Constantinople. (Comp. generally Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. i, 456 sq.; Salut. Lax Ecgym. p. 98 sq.; Menolog. Graecor. i, 221 sq.; Petavii VII. Apostol. p. 82 sq.; Andr. de Sassy, Andreae frater Petri, lar. 1646.) See APOSTLE.

An apocryphal book, bearing the title of the Acts of Andrew, is assigned by some to the 3rd century (iii, 29), Epiphanius (Hier. xlvii, 1; ixiii, 1), and others. the ornaments of his chapel, and the ceremonies there. He was a man of the most fervent devotion. Five hours every day did he dedicate almost entirely to devotion exercises. Prayer might be said to be the very element he breathed. During the illness that lasted for months of anguishing and death, his voice was almost constantly heard pouring forth ejaculatory prayers; and when, through failure of strength, he could no longer articulate, his uplifted hands and eyes indicated the channel in which his unexpressed thoughts continued to flow. He died September 25, 1626, at the age of seventy-three. His chief work in his Sermons, nine volumes in all, the best edition of which is that published in the Anglo-Catholic Library (Oxford, 5 vols. 8vo, 1841-48). He also wrote Tortura Torti (Lond. 1609), being an answer to Belleramine on King James's Book concerning the Oath of Aligiance (Oxford, 1651, 8vo); Frecce Privata (1594); and lately in English by the Rev. Andrews, Ellisah, a Baptist minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., Sept. 25, 1768. He was converted at an early age, and soon resolved to become a Baptist minister. His opportunities of education were limited, but he made the most of them, and was occupied as a teacher and surveyor, with occasional attempts at preaching, until he was ordained as pastor in Fairfax, Vt., in 1793. He labored successively in Hopkinton, N. H.; Nottingham West (now Hudson), in the same state; Templeton, Mass., in which region he is still remembered as the "apostle of the Baptists;" Hillsdale, N. H.; the region west of Lake Champlain; Princeton; Leominster; South Gardner and Royalston. Amid all his labors, his desire for study was increased. He attended Andrews, and was graduated German. In January, 1833, he had an attack of paralysis, and a second in 1834, which disabled him almost wholly. He died Feb. 8, 1840. Mr. Andrews published several essays, tracts, and sermons; also The Moral Tendencies of Universalism (1820); Review of Winchester on Universal Restoration and the Argument of the Baptist (1820).—Sprague, Ameul, vi, 268.

Andrews, Jedediah, the first Presbyterian minister in Pennsylvania, was born at Hingham, Mass., in 1674, graduated at Harvard 1695, and settled in 1698 at Philadelphia, where he was ordained in 1701. In the division of the church in 1744, Mr. Andrews remained with the Old Side. Toward the close of his life he was suspended for immorality, but afterward restored. He died in 1747.—Sprague, Bibl. Hist., iii, 10.

Andrews, Lorin, LL.D., was president of Kenyon College, Ohio, who was born in Ashland Co., Ohio, April 1, 1819. He was educated at Kenyon College. On leaving college, he became a teacher, and was engaged in various educational positions of importance until 1854, when he was elected president of Kenyon College. The college was then at its lowest ebb. There was scarcely a student in the remnant of the faculty. Yet in six years of his administration the number of students grew to 250, the faculty was enlarged, and new buildings added. When the war of the Rebellion broke out in 1861, "President Andrews felt it to be his duty to come forward with all his energies and influence in support of the government. He raised a company at Knox County, of which he was made captain; and afterward was elected colonel of the 4th Ohio Regiment. His first post was at Camp Dennison, from whence he was ordered with his regiment to Virginia. After fatiguing service on the field, he was stationed at Oakland, where he remained on duty till the close of the war, and the exposure to which he was subjected, wore so much on his health that he was prostrated with camp fever. He was ordered at once to proceed home, and arrived there only to be placed on the bed from which he never rose. He died at Gambier, September 18, 1861. A large part of his activity had been devoted to the common school system of Ohio, and his influence is largely due to his labors. Eminent as a teacher, orator, and college officer, he crowned the glory of an active and faithful life by a patriarchal and glorious death for his country."—Episcopal Recorder, Nov. 28, 1861.

Andrews's, St. See and University of, county of Fife, Scotland. The legendary story is that "Regulus, a Greek monk of Patras, in Achaea, warned by a vision, carried with him in a ship the relics of St. Andrew. After long storms the ship was wrecked near the place where the city of St. Andrew's now stands; Regulus and his company escaped, and brought the relics safe to shore. This was in the time of Her-gestus, king of the Picts (about the year 620), who erected a church on the spot. Afterwards called the church of St. Regulus, or St. Rule's church, the ruins of which still remain. Kenneth, 8th king of the Scots (+ 994), transferred the see of Abernethy to this city, and ordered it to be called the church of St. Andrew, and the bishop thereof was styled Maximus Scotorum Episco-pus." The present incumbent of "St. Andrew's, Dunkeld, and Dublame," is Charles Wordsworth, D.D., consecrated in 1852. The University, the oldest in Scotland, was founded by Bishop Wardlaw in 1410. It consists of the United College of St. Salvador, founded by Bishop Kennedy in 1456, and St. Leonard, founded in 1517, and Mary's College, founded by Bishop Bisset in 1587. The education in the latter is exclusively theological. The number of chairs in the colleges which constitute the university is 14, and the attendance of late years has been rather less than 200. Here, in the centre of the papal jurisdiction in Scotland, the Reformation found its prototype, and Patrick Hamilton suffered here in 1527, and George Wishart in 1564, and here John Knox first opened his lips as a preacher of the Reformed faith.—Chambers, Encyclopedia; Landon, Eccl. Dict. i, 358.

Andronicus, followers of a certain Andronicus, who taught the errors of Severus. They believed the upper part of the woman to be the creation of God, and the lower part the work of the devil;—Epiph. Heres. xiv, 1; Landon, Eccl. Dictionary, s. v.

Andronicus (Ἀνδρόνικος, man-conquering), the name (frequent among the Greeks) of several men in Scripture history.

2. An officer left as viceroy (ژاکتشیمرو, 2 Macce. iv, 81) in Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes during his absence (B.C. 171). Menelaus availed himself of the opportunity to secure his royal office by offering him some choice gifts. He left the sacred vessels which he had taken from the temple. When Onias III (q. v.) was certainly assured that the sacrilege had been committed, he sharply reproved Menelaus for the crime, having previously taken refuge in the sanctuary of Apollo and Artemis at Daphne. At the instigation of Menelaus, Andronicus immediately went and gave the sacred vessels, actually putting to death in prison (παρισίακαν, 2 Macce. iv, 34). This murder excited general indignation; and on the return of Antiochus, Andronicus was publicly degraded and executed (2 Macce. iv, 80—88), B.C. 163. Josephus places the death of Onias before the high-priesthood of Simon (2 Macc. i, 7), and omits all mention of Andronicus; but there is not sufficient reason to doubt the truthfulness of the narrtire in 2 Macc., as Wernsdorf has done (De Sede libr. Mace. p. 90 sq.).—Smith, s. v.

2. Another officer of Antiochus Epiphanes who was left in charge of Gerizim (2 Macc. v. 23), probably in occupation of the same name. As the name was common, it seems unreasonable to identify this general with the former one, and so to introduce a contradiction into the history (Ewald, Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. iv. 335 n.; comp. Grimm, 2 Macc. iv. 98). He was possibly the same with the Andronicus, son of Messa- las, mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xiii. 4:5 4) as having convinced Ptolemy (Philomath) of the orthodoxy of the temple at Jerusalem in opposition to that of the Samaritans.

3. A Jewish Christian, thekinsman and fellow-prisoner of Paul, who speaks of him as having been converted to Christianity before himself, and as now enjoying the high regards of the apostles for his usefulness (Rom. xvi. 7), A.D. 55. According to Hippolytus, he became bishop of Pannonia; according to Dorotheus, of Spain. See the treatises of Bosa, De Anonico et Quocio (Lips. 1742); Orlog, De Romanica piscis Pauli epistolam misit (Hafn. 1722).

Andronicus. See Andronicians.

Andronicus, a pious and devoted Methodist preacher, born in Litchfield, Conn., and entered the ministry in 1810, laboring effectively in Connecticut and New York until superannuated in 1834. He died in 1852.

Anoechtea (αὐθεχτρέα, not given out), a term applied to the unpublished works of ancient writers. The word entitles the works of the Greek fathers which have gathered value among libraries, and published for the first time, Anoechtea Graeca. Martene styles his work of a similar nature Theaurus Anoechitorum Novarum.

Anem (Heb. Aenem, אֶזֶּה, two fountains; Sept. Alv. v. Aivai), a Levitical city with “suburbs,” in the tribe of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonites, and mentioned in connection with Ramoth (1 Chron. vi. 23). It was called Ex-Gawain (q. v.) in the Josh. xix, 21; xxi. 29.

Anex (Heb. Aner, אֶזֶּה, perhaps a boy), the name of a man and of a place.

1. (Sept. Alv. v.) A Canaanite chief in the neighborhood of Hebron, who, with two others, Esbhol and Mazer, joined his forces with those of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 3), of Chedorlamer and his allies, who had pillaged Sodom and carried Lot away captive (Gen. xiv. 13, 24), B.C. cir. 2060. These chiefs did not, however, imitate the disinterested conduct of the patriarch, but retained their portion of the spoil. See ABRAHAM.

2. (Sept. Alv. v. r. Alv. v.) A city of Manasseh given to the Levites of Kohath’s family (1 Chron. vi. 7). Gesenius supposes this to be the same with the TASHEM (q. v.) of Judg. i. 27, or TASHM (Josh. xxi. 25).

Anathosthite, An’athosthite, less correct forms of Angelicizing the word ANATHOTHE. See ANATHOTHE.

The variations in the orthography of the name, both in Hebrew and the A. V., should be noticed.

1. The city: In 1 Kings ii. 26, and 1 Chr. xxix. 9, is ANTHOS, and similarly in 2 Sam. xxiii. 27, with the article: Anathoth. 2. The citizens: Anathothite, 2 Sam. xxiii. 27; Anethothite, 1 Chron. xxvii. 12; Anothite, 1 Chron. xi. 29; xii. 3. “Jeremiah of Anathoth;” Jer. xxix. 27, should be “Jeremiah the Anathothite.”

Aedothum. See AMIS.

Angarano (ἀγαράνω, to impress; Vulg. angario; Matt. v. 23, Mark xvi. 21), translated “compel” (q. v.) in the A. V., is a word of Persian, or rather of Tatar origin, signifying to compel to serve as an ayyag or mounted courier (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii. 6. 17 and 18; Athen. iii. 94, 122; Esch. Agam. 292; Pers. 217; Plat. De Alep. p. 325). The word ankaros or ankarhia, in Tatar, means compulsory work without pay. Herodotus (vii. 98) describes the system of the ἀγωγεῖα. He says that the Persians, in order to make all hands in carrying messages, have relays of men and horses stationed at intervals, who hand the dispatch from one to another without interruption either from weather or darkness, in the same way as the Greeks in their λαμακασφωρία. This horse-post the Persians called ἀγαγεῖα. In order to effect the object, license was given to the couriers by the government to press into the service men, horses, and even vessels (comp. Esth. viii. 14). Hence the word came to signify “press,” and ἀγωγεῖα is explained by Siduines (Lex. s. v.) as signifying to extort public service. Persian supremacy introduced the practice and the name into Palestine; and Lightfoot (On Matt. v. 14) says they had to call any oppressive service ἀγαγεῖα (see Buxtorf, Lex. Tana. col. 191).

Among the proposals made by Demetrius Soter to Jonathan the high-priest, one was that the beasts of the Jews should not be taken (ἀγωγεῖαιες) for the public use (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 2, 8). The system was also adopted by the Romans, and thus the word angario came into use in later Latin. Pliny (Ep. x. 14, 121, 122) speaks of the post as thus expediting public dispatches. Chardin (Travels in the 27th) and other travellers (e. B. Col. Cambell, Trav. pt. ii. p. 92 sq.) make mention of it. The ἀγαγαῖοι were also called ἀνταγαῖοι (Stephens, Theasur. Gr. p. 62). The word is also applied to the imposition of our Saviour’s cross upon Simon the Cyrenian (Matt. xxvii. 32), and to the wearing of the crown, and hence to the literature there referred to: Raviuison’s Herodotus, ii. 295.

Angel (ἄγγελος, used in the Sept. and New Test. for the Hebrew בָּנִין, messager), a word signifying both in Hebrew and Greek a messenger (q. v.), and therefore used to denote whatever God employs to execute his purposes, or to manifest his presence or his power; hence often with the addition of γεννήτορ, ἡκόνι, or ἀγγελικός, and ἐλθέω. In later books the word γεννήτορ, μητρόπος, holy one, or ἀγγελός is used as an equivalent term. In some passages it occurs in the sense of an ordinary messenger (Job i. 14; 1 Sam. xi. 8; Luke vii. 4; ix. 28); in others it is applied to prophets (Isa. xiii. 19; Hag. i. 18; Mal. 3); to priests (Eccl. v. 6; Mal. ii. 7); to ministers (2 Sam. xxv. 16; 2 Kings xiii. 8); and to the winds (“who maketh the winds his angels,” Psa. civ. 4); so likewise plagues generally are called “evil angels” (Psa. lxviii. 40), and “Paul calls his horn in the flesh an “angel of Satan” (2 Cor. xii. 7).

But this name is more eminently and distinctly applied to certain spiritual beings or heavenly intelligences, employed by God as the ministers of his will, and usually distinguished as angels of God or angels of Jahweh. In this case the name has respect to their official capacity as “messenger” of their nature or condition. The term “spirit,” on the other hand (in Greek ψυχή, in Hebrew בָּל), has reference to the nature of angels, and characterises them as incorporeal and invisible essences. When, therefore, the ancient Jews called angels spirits, they did not mean to deny that they were endowed with bodies. When they affirmed that angels were incorporeal, they used the term in the sense in which it was understood by the ancients; that is, free from the purifications of gross matter. This distinction between a “natural body” and a “spiritual body” is indicated by Paul (1 Cor. xv. 44); and we may, with sufficient safety, assume that angels are spiritual bodies, rather than pure spirits in the modern acceptation of the word. (See Odo, De Angelis, Tr. ad Litt. 1782.)
ANGEL

It is disputed whether the term Elohim (q. v.) is ever applied to angels; but in Psa. viii, 5, and xcvii, 7, the word is rendered by angels in the Sept. and other ancient versions; and both these texts are so cited in Gen. xii, 12, and in xiii, 14, where He who is called the "angel of God" in one verse is called "God," and even "Jehovah," in those that follow, and accepts the worship due to God alone (contrast Rev. xix, 10;xxi, 9). See also Gen. xvi, 7, 13; xxi, 11, 13; xlviii, 15, 16; Num. xxii, 22, 25; and comp. Is. xxiii, 9 with Exod. xxxiii, 14, etc. The same expression, it seems, is used by Paul in speaking to heathens (see Acts xxvii, 23; comp. with xxiii, 11). More remarkably, the word "Elohim" is applied in Psa. lxxxvi, 6, to those who judge in God's name.

It is to be observed also, that side by side with these expressions of the presence of God's being manifested in the form of man, e.g. Abraham appearing at Mamre (Gen. xxviii, 22; comp. xix, 1); to Jacob at Penuel (Gen. xxxii, 24, 30); to Joshua at Gilgal (Josh. v, 13, 15, etc.), it is hardly to be doubted that both sets of passages refer to the same kind of manifestation of the Divine Presence. This being the case, since we know that "no man hath seen God," or "the Father," or "the Son," and that "the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath revealed him" (John i, 18), the inevitable inference is that the "Angel of the Lord" in such passages is meant He who is from the beginning, the "Word," i.e. the Manifestor or Revealer of God. These appellations are evidently "shadows of the incarnation" (q. v.). By these God the Son manifested himself from time to time in that human nature which he united to the Godhead forever in the virgin's womb. See Jehovah.

This conclusion is corroborated by the fact that the phrases used as equivalent to the word "angels" in Scripture, viz., the "sons of God," or even in poetry, the "gods" (Elohim), the "blessed ones," etc., are names which, in their full and proper sense, are applicable only to the Lord Jesus Christ. As He is the "Son of God," so also is He the "angel" or "messenger" of the Lord. Accordingly, it is to his incarnation that all angelic inspiration in the Old Testament is distinctly referred. The whole truth, we find, and according to the agency of angels every manifestation of the greatness and power of God has led some to contend that angels have no real existence, but are mere personifications of unknown powers of nature; and we are reminded, in like manner, among the Gentiles, whatever was wonderful, or strange, or unaccountable, was referred to them by the poet, and they were permitted to deduce from the passages in which angels are described as speaking and delivering messages might be interpreted of fortificable or apparently supernatural suggestions to the mind, but they are sometimes represented as performing acts which are wholly inconsistent with this notion (Gen. xvi, 7, 12; Judg. xiii, 1-21; Matt. xxviii, 2-4); and other passages (e.g. Matt. xxiii, 30; Heb. i, 4) would be without force or meaning if angels had no real existence. (See Winer's Zittgen. 1827, II.)

That these superior beings are very numerous is evident from the following expressions: Dan. vii, 10, "thousands of thousands," and "ten thousands times ten thousands" of angels; xii, 8, most excellent one of the angels; Gen. ii, 18, the multitude of the heavenly host; Heb. xii, 22, 28, "myriads of angels." It is probable, from the nature of the case, that among so great a multitude there may be different grades and classes, and even natures—ascending from man to angels; and by forming a chain of being to fill up the vast space between the Creator and the first fruits of his intellectual creatures. Accordingly, the Scripture describes angels as existing in a society composed of members of unequal dignity, power, and excellence, and as having chiefs and rulers. It is admitted that this idea is not clearly expressed in the books composed before the Babylonian captivity; but it is developed in the books written during the exile and afterward, especially in the writings of Daniel and Zechariah. In Zech. i, 11, an angel of the highest order,

"who stands before God," appears in contrast with angels of an inferior class, whom he employs as his messengers and agents (comp. iii, 7). In Dan. x, 12, the appellation one of the chief princes (אֵלֶוִים אֲשֶׁר נָךְ), and in xii, 1, "the great prince" (אֵלֶוִים נֵכְּדָשָׁתִים), are given to Michael. The Grecian Jews rendered this appellation ὁ ἐν αἰεί ὁ χειρότερος δαίμονας archon of a lower order. An angel in the same class occurs in the New Test. (Jude 9; 1 Thess. iv, 16). The names of several of them even are given. See Gabriel Michael, etc. The opinion, therefore, that there were various orders of angels was not peculiar to the Jews, but was held by Christians in the time of the apostles, and is mentioned by the apostles themselves. The distinct divisions of the angels, according to their rank in the heavenly hierarchy, however, which we find in the writings of the later Jews, were almost or wholly unknown in the apostolic period. The appellations ἄρχοι, Ἁγίασιν, Ἰησοῦς, ὕπαινος, ἑκατοντάρχης, etc., are, indeed, applied in Eph. i, 21; Col. i, 16, and elsewhere, to the archangels; not, however, exclusively, or with the intention of denoting their particular classes; but to them in common with all beings possessed of might and power, visible as well as invisible, on earth as well as in heaven. (See Hanke's Magaz. 1795, iii, 1796, vi.) See Principality.

II. Their Nature. They are termed "spirits" (οὐσίαι) or "beings" (ἄτομα), and they stand in a central position between the purely spiritual and the purely material. They are, more especially, not so much to themselves as to their power dwelling in man (1 Sam. xvii, 10; Matt. viii, 16, etc. etc.). The word is the same as that used of the soul of man when separate from the body (Matt. xiv, 26; Luke xxiv, 57, 89; 1 Pet. iii, 19), but, since it properly expresses only that supernatural and rational element of man's nature, which is in him the image of God (see John iv, 24), and by which he has communion with God (Rom. viii, 16); and since, also, we are told that there is a "spiritual body" as well as a "natural (σωματίου) body" (1 Cor. xv, 44), it does not assert that the angelic nature is incorporeal. The contrary seems expressly implied by the words in which our Lord declares that, after the Resurrection, men shall be "like the angels" (τῶν ἀγγελίων) (Luke xx, 36); because (as elsewhere said, Phil. iii, 21) their bodies, as well as their spirits, shall have been made entirely like His. It may also be noticed that the glorious appearance so often referred to the angels in Scripture (as in the case of the angels mentioned in Gen. iii, 24; the archangel Michael mentioned in Dan. ix, 21) is the same as that which may have determined our Lord's Transfiguration, and in which John saw Him clothed in heaven (Rev. i, 14-16); and moreover, that whenever angels have been made manifest to man, it has always been in human form (as in Gen. xviii, xix; Luke xxiv, 4; Acts i, 10, etc., etc.). The very fact that the titles "sons of God" (Job i, 6; xxvii, 7; Dan. iii, 25, comp. with 28), and "fathers"
ANGEL

(Psa. viii. 5; xcvii, 7), applied to them, are also given to men (see Luke iii, 58; Psa. lxxxiv, 6, and comp. our Lord’s application of this last passage in John x, 34–37), points in the same way to a difference only of degree and an identity of kind between the human and the angelic nature. The angels are therefore revealed to us as beings, such as man might be and will be when the power of sin and death is removed, partaking of the nature of God, Truth, Purity, and Love, because always beholding His face (Matt. xviii, 10), and therefore being “made like Him” (1 John iii, 2). This, of course, implies finiteness, and therefore (in the strict sense) “imperfection” of nature, and constant progress, both moral and intellectual. The angels’ perfection, contrasted with the infinity of God, is expressly ascribed to them in Job iv, 18; Matt. xxiv, 36; 1 Pet. i, 12; and it is this which emphatically points out to us as creatures, fellow-servants of man, and therefore incapable of usurping the place of gods. This finiteness of nature implies capacity of temptation (see Butler’s Anal. pt. i, c. 6), and accordingly we hear of “fallen angels.” Of the nature of their temptation and the circumstances of their fall we know absolutely nothing. All that is certain is, that they left their first estate (rǐ αὐτοὺς ἐξέφυγον), and that they are now “angels of the devil” (Matt. xxxv, 41; Acts vii, 37, 9), partaking in the falsehood, uncleanness, and hatred, which are his peculiar characteristics (John viii, 44), All that can be conjectured must be based on the analogy of man’s own temptation and fall. On the other hand, the title especially assigned to the angels of God, that of the “holy ones” (see Dan. iv, 18, 29; viii, 15; Matt. xxv, 31), is precisely the one which is given to those men who are renewed in Christ’s image, but which belongs to them in actuality and in perfection only hereafter. (Comp. Heb. ii, 10; v, 9; xii, 28.) Its use evidently implies that the angelic probation is over, and that the crown of glory is theirs.

In the Scriptures angels appear with bodies, and in the human form; and no intimation is anywhere given that these bodies are not real, or that they are only assumed for the time and then laid aside. It was manifest, indeed, to the ancients that the matter of these bodies was not like that of their own, inasmuch as they could make themselves visible and vanish again from their sight. But this experience alone cannot suggest no doubt of the reality of their bodies; it would only intimate that they were not composed of gross matter. After his resurrection, Jesus often appeared to his disciples, and vanished again before them; yet they never doubted that they saw the same body which had been crucified, although they must have perceived that it had undergone an important change. The fact that angels always appeared in the human form does not, indeed, prove that they really have this form, but that the ancient Jews believed so. That which is not pure spirit must have some form or other; and angels may have the human form, but other forms are possible. See Cherub.

The question as to the food of angels has been very much discussed. If they do eat, we can know nothing of their actual food; for the manna is manifestly called “angels’ food” (Psa. lxxxv, 23; Wisd. xvi, 26) merely by way of expressing its excellence. The question as to manna is still open; the things they eat are not the manna. We sometimes find angels in their terrean manifestations, eating and drinking (Gen. xviii, 8; xix, 3); but in Judg. xiii, 15, 16, the angel who appeared to Manoah declined, in a very pointed manner, to accept his hospitality. The manner in which the Jews of old understood the name of Deity, and the sense in which they understood such passages, is evident from the apocryphal book of Tobit (xii, 19), where the angel is made to say, “It seems to you, indeed, as though I did eat and drink with you; but I use invisible food which no man can see.” This intimates that the rich is supposed to simulate when they appear to partake of man’s food, but that yet they had food of their own, proper to their natures. Milton, who was deeply read in the “angelic” literature, derides these questions (Par. Lost, v, 483–489). But if angels do not need food; if their spiritual bodies are inherently incorporeal of waste or death, it seems not unlikely that they gratuitously perform an act designated, in all its known relations, to promote growth, to repair waste, and to sustain existence.

The passage already referred to in Matt. xxiii, 30, teaches by implication that there is no distinction of sex among the angels. The Scripture never makes any mention of female angels, so that male and female divinities, who were the parents of other gods, and Gesenius (Thee. Heb. s. v. τῆς 12) insists that the “sons of God” spoken of in Gen. vi, 2, as the progenitors of the giants, were angels. But in the Scriptures the angels are all males; and they appear to be so represented, not to mark any distinction of sex, but because the masculine is the more honorable gender, and angels are neither descended of the earth, of age, but sometimes with those of youth (Mark xvi, 5). The constant absence of the features of age indicates the continual vigor and freshness of immortality. The angels never die (Luke xx, 36). But no being besides God himself has essential immortality (1 Tim. vi, 16); angels are not eternally mortal in itself; but they can be immortal only by the will of God. Angels, consequently, are not eternal, but had a beginning. As Moses gives no account of the creation of angels in his description of the origin of the world, although the circumstance would have been too important for omission had it then taken place, there is no doubt that they were called into being before, probably very long before the acts of creation which it was the object of Moses to relate. See Sons of God.

That they are of superhuman intelligence is implied in Mark xiii, 22: “But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not even the angels in heaven.” That their power is great may be gathered from such expressions as “mighty angels” (2 Thess. i, 7); “angels, powerful in strength” (Psa. ciii, 20); “angels who are greater than [man] in power and might.” The moral perfection of angels is shown by such phrases as “holy angels” (Luke ix, 26); “the elect angels” (2 Tim. v, 15). Their wondrous beauty is evident by the passage (Luke x, 26) in which the blessed in the future world are said to be ἵππος γυναικός, καὶ φως τοῦ θεοῦ, “like unto the angels, and sons of God.” (See Timpson, Angels of God, Lond. 1887.)

III. Their Functions.—Of their office in heaven we have, of course, only vague and prophetic glimpses (as in 1 Kings xxii, 19; Isa. vi, 1–3; Dan. vii, 9, 10; Rev. vi, 11, etc.), which show us nothing but a never-ceasing adoration, proceeding from the vision of God. Their office toward man is far more fully described to us. (See Whatley, Angels, Lond. 1851, Phil. 1856.)

1. They are represented as being, in the oldest sense, agents, messengers, and, in a secondary sense, supernatural, to the body and to the soul. Thus the operations of nature are spoken of, as under angelic guidance fulfilling the will of God. Not only is this the case in poetical passages, such as Psa. civ. 4 (commented upon in Heb. i, 7), where the powers of air and fire are referred to them, but in the simplest prose history, as where the pestilences which slew the first-born (Exod. xii, 23; Heb. xi, 28), the disobedient people in the wilderness (1 Cor. x, 10), the Israelites in the days of David (2 Sam. xxiv, 16; 1 Chron. xxiii, 16), and the army of Sennacherib (2 Kings xi, 8), are as also the plague which cut off the children of Sodom, are plainly referred to as the work of the “Angel of the Lord.” Nor can the mysterious declarations of the Apocalypse, by far the most numerous of all, be resolved by honest interpretation into mere poetical imagery. (See especially Rev. vii and ix.) It is evident that angelic agency, like that of man, does not involve the action of secondary, or what are called "natural" causes, or interfere with the directness and universality of the providence of God. The personifications of poetry and legends of mythology are obscure witnesses of its truth, which, however, can rest only on the revelations of Scripture itself.

2. More particularly, however, angels are spoken of as ministers of what is cometary, or what are called the "supernatural," or, perhaps, more correctly, the "spiritual" providence of God; as agents in the great scheme of the spiritual redemption and sanctification of man, of which the Bible is the record. The representations of them are different in different books of Scripture, in its literal and in its spiritual sense; but the reasons of the differences are to be found in the differences of scope attributable to the books themselves. As different parts of God's providence are brought out, so also arise different views of His angelic ministers.

1. In the Book of Job, which deals with "Natural Religion," they are spoken of but vaguely, as surrounding God's throne above, and rejoicing in the completion of His creative work (Job i, 6; ii, 1; xxxvii, 7). No direct and visible appearance to man is even hinted at. (See Rawson, Holy Angels, N. Y. 1858.)

2. In the Book of Genesis there is no notice of angelic appearances till after the call of Abraham. The gradual unfolding of the history of the family, so the angels mingle with and watch over its family life, entertained by Abraham and by Lot (Gen. xvii, xix), guiding Abraham's servant to Padan-Aram (xxiv, 7, 40), seen by the fugitive Jacob at Bethel (xxviii, 12), and welcoming his return at Mahanaim (xxxii, 1). Their ministry hallows domestic life, in its trials and its blessings alike, and makes it a more dearer, more familiar, and less awful than in after times. (Contrast Gen. xviii with Judg. vi, 21, 22; xiii, 16, 22.)

3. In the subsequent history, that of a chosen nation, the angels are represented more as ministers of wrath and mercy, messengers of a King, than as common children of the One Father. It is, moreover, to be observed that the records of their appearance belong especially to two periods, that of the judges and that of the captivity, which were transition periods in Israelitish history, the former destitute of direct revelation or prophetic guidance, the latter one of the most unusual contacts with the heathenism of the surrounding nations. During the lives of Moses and Joshua there is no record of the appearance of created angels, and only obscure references to angels at all. In the Book of Judges angels appear to rebuke idolatry (ii, 1-4), to call Gideon (vi, 11, etc.), and consecrate Samson (xiii, 3, etc.) to the work of deliverance.

4. The prophetic office begins with Samuel, and immediately angelic guidance is withheld, except when needed by the prophets themselves (1 Kings xix, 5; 2 Kings vi, 17). During the prophetic and kingly period angels are spoken of only (as noticed above) as ministers of God in the operations of nature. In the New Testament, in the history of the Gentiles and the foreign nations, each claiming its tutelary deity, then to the prophets Daniel and Zechariah angels are revealed in a fresh light, as watching, not only over Jerusalem, but also over heathen kingdoms, under the providence, and to work out the designs, of God. (See Daniel, xii, 20; 2 Kings, xx, 13, 25; 10, 13, 20, 21, etc.) In the whole period they, as truly as the prophets and kings, are God's ministers, watching over the national life of the subjects of the Great King. (See Heigel, De angelico fatere, Jen. 1600.)

5. The Incarnation marks a new epoch of angelic manifestation. "The Angel of Jehovah," as Lord of all created angels, having now descended from heaven to earth, it was natural that His servants should continue to do Him service here. Whether to predict and glorify His birth itself (Matt. i, 20; Luke i, 10), to minister to Him after His temptation and agony (Matt. iv, 11; Luke xxii, 43), or to declare His resurrection and triumph (Acts x, 10, 11), in John xx, 12; Acts i, 10, 11), they seem now to be indeed "ascending and descending on the Son of Man," almost as though transferring to earth the ministrations of heaven. It is clearly seen that whatever was done by them for men in earlier days was but preparing the way for their service to Him. (See Psa. xxi, 11; comp. Matt. iv, 6.)

6. The New Testament is the history of the Church of Christ, every member of which is united to Him. Accordingly, the angels are revealed now as "ministering spirits" to each individual member of Christ for his spiritual guidance and aid (Heb. i, 14). The records of the history of the Church (Acts v, 19; viii, 26; x, 8; xii, 7; xxvii, 23) then tell of the way in which all their presence and their aid are referred to familiarly, almost as things of course, ever after the Incarnation. They are spoken of as watching over Christ's little ones (Matt. xviii, 10), as rejoicing over a penitent sinner (Luke xv, 10), as present in the worship of Christians (1 Cor. xii, 10), and (perhaps) bringing their prayers before God (Rev. viii, 3, 4), and as bearing the souls of the redeemed into heaven (Luke xvi, 22). In one word, they are Christ's ministers of grace now, as they shall be of judgment hereafter (Matt. xxiii, 39, 40; xvi, 27; xxiv, 31, etc.). By what method they do this we know not, but we may be sure it is seen, perhaps lest we should worship them instead of Him, whose servants they are (see Col. ii, 18; Rev. xxii, 9); but, of course, their agency, that of human ministers, depends for its efficacy on the aid of the Holy Spirit.

The ministry of angels, therefore, a doctrine implied in their very name, is evident, from certain actions which are ascribed wholly to them (Matt. xiii, 41, 49; xxiv, 81; Luke xvi, 22), and from the scriptural narratives of other events, in the accomplishment of which they acted a visible part (Luke i, 11, 26; ii, 9; Acts v, 19; x, 8, 19; xii, 7; xxvii, 28), principally in the guidance of the destinies of man. In those cases also in which the agency is concealed from our view we may admit the probability of its existence, because we are told that God sends them forth "to minister to those who shall be heirs of salvation" (Heb. i, 14; also Psa. xxxiv, 8, 91; Matt. xviii, 10). Thus they could make a visible appearance, not act independently, but as the instruments of God, and by His command (Psa. ciii, 20; civ, 4; Heb. i, 13, 14): not unto them, therefore, are our confidence and adoration due, but only to Him (Rev. xix, 10; xxi, 9) whom the angels themselves reverence reverently worship. (See Mostov, Ministry of Angels, Lond. 1841.)

3. Guardian Angels.—It was a favorite opinion of the Christian fathers that every individual is under the care of a particular angel, who is assigned to him as a guardian. See Guardian Angel. They spoke also of two angels, the one good, the other evil, whom they conceived to be attendant on each individual: the one good could cause no sensible harm, nor any direct evil, but could prevent, either by warning or by other methods, whatever was going to be evil (Hermas, ii, 6). See Abaddon. The Jews (excepting the Sadducees) entertained this belief, as do the Moslems. The heathen held it in a modified form—the Greeks having their tutelary daimons (q. v.). The general tendency was that the good angel was called upon to ward off illness, and the evil angel prompting to all ill, and encouraging evil (Hermas, ii, 6). See Abaddon. The Jews (excepting the Sadducees) entertained this belief, as do the Moslems. The heathen held it in a modified form—the Greeks having their tutelary daimons (q. v.).
ANGELA

ANGELUS

Angelic l, a heretical sect of the 8th century, supposed to have gained the appellation in consequence of their worship of angels. The practice was imitated in the time of Chrysostom, and called forth his animadversions in his Homilies on the Colossians; and the Council of Laodicea enacted a severe canon accompanied with the denunciation of anathema to restrain it. That council says, "Christians ought not to forsake the Church of God, and go aside, and hold conventions to invoke or call upon the names of angels; which things are forbidden. If any one, therefore, be found to exercise himself in this private idolatry, let him be accursed, because he hath forsaken our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and gone over to idolatry." — Episc. Chilms, "Other Lardner, Works," ii. 692.

Angeli, or Angelii Degli. Girolamo, a Jesuit born at Castro Giovanni, in Sicily, in 1567, died Dec. 4, 1623. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1586, and prepared himself for the Eastern missions. He embarked in 1596, and, after a long navigation, was cast upon the coast of Brazil, where he was seized by pirates and brought to England. Having from thence returned to Portugal, he was, in 1602, sent to Japan, in which country he lived for seven years, and during the mission of the Jesuits in 1614. With the permission of his superiors, Angeli put on a Japanese dress, and remained on the island of Niphon for nine more years. He is said to have been the first European who visited the neighboring islands. In Jeddo he is said to have converted ten thousand natives to Christianity. Ultimately he was arrested, imprisoned, and burned in 1619, with ninety of his converts, after a stay in Japan of twenty-two years. A work on Jeddo (Relazione del regno di Yeyo), which was published at Rome in 1625, is attributed to him.—Hoefcr, Biog. Generale, ii. 646.

Angilet, a sect in the reign of the Emperor Anastasius, about the year 494, so called from Angeli, a place in the city of Alexandria, where they held their first meetings. They held that the persons of the Trinity are not the same; that neither of them exists of himself, and of his own nature; but that there is a common God or Deity existing in them all, and that each is God by a participation of this Deity.—Buck, Thol. Dict. s. v. See SADELLIANI.

Angelo, Rocco, of the order of St. Augustine, educated at Rome, Venice, and Pavia, spent the greater part of his life in Italy, and was approved in the order in 1616. Sixtus V employed him to superintend the printing of the Bible, Council, and Fathers; and to his care the Augustines of Rome owe the "Bibliotheca Angelica," the "Library of the Vatican," that of "Theology and Holy Scripture," etc. He died at Rome, April 7, 1620.—Landon, Ecc. Dict. s. v.

Anglius, a prayer to the Virgin, commonly said in the Roman Church three times a day, viz., in the morning, at noon, and in the evening. It is sounded thrice, three strokes each time. Pope John XXII instituted this office in 1316, and several popes have granted indulgences to those who say the Anglius on their knees.—Landon, Ecc. Dict. i. 870.

Angulus, Christopher, a Greek scholar, born in the Peloponnesus about the middle of the 16th century, died Feb. 28, 1563. Being compelled to leave his country, he fled to England, where he was enabled by the support of the bishop of Norwich and of several members of the clergy to study at the universities of Cambridge and Oxford. He was subsequently appointed teacher of Greek in Balliol College, Oxford, which position he held till his death. He published a work in his flight from Greece (Oxford, 1619, in Greek and in English); a work on the Greek religion (Encouricum de Institutioni Graecia, Cambridge, 1619, in Greek and Latin); Encomium on the Kingdom of Great Britain (Cambridge, 1619); De Apos
ANGER

Anger (usually ωάς, ἄφιξις, ἀφόβητος), the emotion of instant displeasure, which arises from the feeling of injury done, or from the discovery of intention intended, or, in many cases, from the discovery of the omission of good offices to which we supposed ourselves entitled; or, it is simply the emotion of displeasure itself, independent of its cause or its consequences. "Like most other emotions, it is accompanied by effects on the body, and in some cases they are of a very marked kind. The arterial blood-vessels are highly excited; the pulse, during the paroxysm, is strong and hard, the face becomes red and swollen, the brow wrinkled, the eyes protrude, the whole body is put into commotion. The secretion of bile is excessive, and it seems to assume a morbid consistency. In cases of violent passion, and especially in nervous persons, this excitement of the organs soon passes to the other extreme of depression; generally, this does not take place till the anger has subsided, when there follows a period of general relaxation. The original tendency to anger differs much in individuals according to temperament; but frequent giving way to it begets disinclination, and incre-ses the natural tendency. From the nature of anger, it is easy to see that it must be—often at least—prejudicial to health. It frequently gives rise to bile-fever, inflammation of the liver, heart, or brain, or even to mania. These effects follow immediately a fit of the passion; other evil effects come on, after a time, as the consequence of repeated paroxysms, such as paralysis, jaundice, consumption, and nervous fever. The milk of a mother or nurse in a fit of passion will cause convulsions in the child that sucks; it has been known even to occasion instant death, like a strong poison. The controlling of anger is a part of moral discipline. In a rudimentary state of society, its active exercise would seem to be a necessity; by imposing some restraint on the selfish aggressions of one individual upon another, it renders the beginnings of social co-operation and intercourse possible. This is its use, or, as it is sometimes called, its final cause. But the natural social intercourse comes to be regulated by customs and laws, the less need is there for the vindictive expression of anger. It seems an error, however, to suppose that the emotion ever will be—or that it ought to be—extirpated. Laws themselves lose their efficacy when they have not this feeling for a background; and it remains as a resource for man to use as it does every now and then—resolves itself into its elements. Even in the most artificial and refined states of society, those minor moralities on which half the happiness of social intercourse depends, are imposed upon the selfish, in great measure, by that latent fund of anger which every man is known to carry about with him."—Chambers. Encyclopedia, s. v.

Anger is not evil per se. The mind is formed to be angry as well as to love. Both are original susceptibilities of our nature. If anger were in itself sinful, how could God himself be angry? How could He, who was separate from sin and sinners, have a reason for roving about with anger? An essentially immoral character cannot attach to it if it be the mere emotion of displeasure on the infliction of any evil upon us. Anger may be sinful, when it arises too soon, without reflection, when the injury which awakens it is only apparent, and was designed to do good. The disposition which becomes specially angry when it is novel, is one which is usually pierced by the hook] with a cord [line], which thou lastest down? Canst thou put a hook into his nose, or bore his jaw through with a thorn?" (Job xii, 1, 2). This last phrase obviously refers to the thorns which were sometimes used as hooks, and which are long at the mouth of a fish, as the thorns of the heart by passionate love. When it is disproportionate to the offence; when it is transferred from the guilty to the innocent; when it is too long protracted. It then becomes revengeful (Eph. iv, 26; Matt. v, 22; Col. iii., 8). When anger, hatred, wrath, are ascribed to God, they denote his holy and just displeasure with sin and sinners. In him they are principles arising out of his holy and just nature, and are, therefore, steady and uniform, and more terrible than if mere emotions or passions. See Paley, Mor. Phil. ch. vii, vol. i; Secker, Sermons, ser. xxvii; Fawcett, Essay on Anger; Seed, Poth. Serms. 11; Buck, Discourses, s. v.

Angers (AUNIVIRNE), a town in France, where the first town council were held: 456, for celibacy; 1065, against Berengar, archdeacon of Angers, for heresy; 1062, on the same subject; 1279, where four canons were made for the regulation of the clergy; 1698, on discipline; 1448, for reforms.—Smith, Tables of Church Hist.; London, Manual of Councils.

Angilbert, St., a noble Frank, first councillor of the Italian King Pepin and of Charlemagne. He is said to have married Bertha, the daughter of Charlemagne, but to have retired in 790, with the consent of his wife, to the convent of Centole (now St. Riquier). In 794 he became abbot of this convent, and died Feb. 18, 814. He is the author of a history of the abbey of Centole and of several poetical works, and was summoned the Homer of his time. See Acta S. Angilberti, Feb. 18; Cellier, Auteurs sacrés, vol. xviii.

Anglimon, bishop of Metz from 768 to 791, also abbot of the monastery Senones, and arch-chaplain of Charlemagne. After 798 he bore the title arch-bishop as a personal distinction. His name is celebrated in the history of the Canon Law by a collection of laws respecting legal proceedings against bishops, called Capitula Angilrmi. According to some Codd. they were presented by Angilram to Pope Adrian, but, according to others, presented by Adrian to Angilram. They are generally regarded as spurious (see Ret-berg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i, 501; and Herzog, s. v. Angilram), and as extracts from the Pseudo-Decretals; but their authenticity has been defended by Wasserachelen, Beiträge zur Gesch. der früheren Decretalen, i, 1856; læse, Church History, p. 185. See DECRETALS.

Anglican Church, another name of the Established Church of England. The phrase "Anglican Churches" is coming into general use as the collective title of the Established Church of England and Ireland, the Scottish Episcopal Church, the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, and the Diocesan churches established by any of these three bodies. The Churchman's Calendar for 1865 gives the following synoptical view of the Anglican Churches: 1. England, 2 archbishops, 26 bishops; 2. Ireland, 2 archbishops, 10 bishops; 3. Scotland, 8 bishops; 4. Mediterranean, 1 bishop; 6. United States, 38 bishops; 7. West Indies, 6 bishops; 8. Asia, 8 bishops; 9. Africa, 8 bishops; 10. Oceania, 14 bishops. See England, CHURCH OF.

Angling, the art of taking fish with a hook and line. The word יָנָךְ, ḥaklak., which the Auth.
Vers. renders "angle" in Isa. xix, 8; Hab. i, 15, is the same that is rendered "hook" in Job xii, 1, 12. The Scriptures contain several allusions to this mode of taking fish. The first of these occurs as early as the time of Job: "Canst thou draw out leviathan with a hook; or his tongue [edgeth, which is usually pierced by the hook] with a cord [line], which thou lastest down? Canst thou put a hook into his nose, or bore his jaw through with a thorn?" (Job xii, 1, 2). This last phrase obviously refers to the thorns which were sometimes used as hooks, and which are long at the mouth of a fish, as the thorns of the heart by passionate love. See the Auth. Vers. "fish-hooks." Of the various passages relating to this subject, the most remarkable is that which records, as an important part of the "burden of Egypt," that "the fishers also shall mourn; and all they that cast angle [the hook] into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish" (Isa. xix, 9). In this poetical description of a part of the calamities which were to befall Egypt, we are furnished with an account of the various modes of fishing practised in that country, which is in exact conformity with the scenes depicted in the old tombs of Egypt. See Fish. Angling appears to have been regarded chiefly as an amusement, in which the Egyptians of all ranks found much enjoyment. The Egyptian hooks were of bronze, as appears from the specimens that have been found. Insects, natural or artificial, were not used in angling, ground bait being exclusively employed; and the float of the Vulgate into the vernacular tongue of our ancestors, began to be made by the monks. Some of these are still extant. The oldest is the celebrated Durham Book, preserved among the Cotton MSS., in the British Museum. The Latin text of this MS. was written by Eadfrith, bishop of the Church of Holy Isle, some time before the year 688; it received many decorations from the combined skill of Bishop Ethelwold and Bilfrith the anchorite, and it was finally glossed over into English (cf. glosses on Oleg) by Aldred, who describes himself as "Presbyter indulgens et misericordius," and ascribes his success to "Godes fulfultne & Sci Cathterbhea." The work existed first in four separate volumes, but these were at an early period collected into one. The date of Aldred's gloss is supposed to be before A.D. 900. The next of these versions in the Rushworth Gloss of the Gospels, preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford; it closely resembles the Durham book in form, arrangement, and style of execution, and is regarded as of almost equal antiquity with it. Its authors were Farmen and Owen, priests at Harewood, and the Latin text was written by one Macregol. Another Anglo-Saxon translation of the gospels is extant, the author of which is unknown; he is believed to have been executed near the time of the Norman conquest, and bears traces of having been made from one of the ante-hieronymian Latin versions. A translation of the Heptateuch, or first seven books of the Bible, was made by Zelfric, archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1006; and there is in the Cottonian Collection a MS. of a translation of the Book of Job, also ascribed to him. Of the same date is a gloss on the Proverbs by an unknown author, also among the Cotton MSS. Of the Psalter an interlinear translation was made at a very early period (about 706) by Adhelm, bishop of Sherborn, but of this no

MS. remains. It is reported that King Alfred was also engaged at the time of his death on a translation of the Psalms (William of Malmesbury, De Gest. Reg. Angl. p. 44, E. T. p. 121, ed. Bohun), and other parts of the Bible are said also to have been translated by him. There are other versions of the Psalms in Anglo-Saxon extant in MS. An edition of the Four Gospels was printed at London in 1571, in 4to, with an English translation; it was edited by Archdeacon Parker, with a preface by John Fox, the martyrologist. This edition was reprinted by Dr. Marshall, with improvements from the collection of several MSS. by Fr. Junius, Jr. (Dort, 1665, 4to.; reissued with a new title-page, Amst. 1684). The best edition of the Gospels is that of Thorpe (London, 1842, 12mo.). Eilfric's Heptateuch and Job were published by Traxaile (Oxford, 1659, 8vo.). Two editions of the Anglo-Saxon Psalter have ever been issued: the former by Spelman (London, 1640, 4to.); the latter by Thorpe (Oxford, 1855, 4to.). Mill made use of the Anglo-Saxon versions for critical purposes in his edition of the Greek Testament. Critics are divided as to their value in this respect. Tischendorf has, however, made use of them in his edition (see his Prolegomena, p. 356, ed. 1839). — Kitto, s. v. See also Spelman (loc. cit.).

Anglus, Thomas, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in England in 1852, and died July 6, 1876. He was for some time principal of the English College at Lisbon, and assistant principal of the English College at Douai. He lived for a long time at Rome and Paris, defended the peripatetic philosophy against Descartes, tried to develop philosophical doctrine from the Aristotelian and Thomistic principles, and was involved in a controversy with the Molinists (q. v.) and the Jansenists. He wrote a number of mystical books, most of which have been put into the Index. His principal works are: De numine (Paris, 168); Institutiones perp. singularibus (Amsterdam, 1698); Institutiones S. Thome (1699). He assumed sometimes the names Candidus, Albius, Bianchi, and Richworth, but his true name seems to have been White.—Bibl. Britanica, s. v.; Bayle.

Angola, a country on the western coast of Africa. It was discovered in 1486 by the Portuguese, who soon after began to form settlements on the river Congo and at various points south of that river. They still hold the entire coast. The interior of Angola is very wild and unexplored, and different places, in some instances extending many hundreds of miles into the interior, where the Portuguese colonists and natives meet for the purpose of trading. The Portuguese claim dominion over a population of about 800,000 souls. Toward the middle of the 18th century, the Jesuits of Angola were established, and a large number of the inhabitants nominally received into the Roman Catholic Church; but with the decline of the Portuguese, also the hold which the church had of the native population became weaker. A large portion of them, however, are desirous to be regarded as members of the Roman Catholic Church, although in 1857 they were only six priests for an Angola. The Roman Catholic population may be estimated at about 100,000 souls.—Schem, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859, p. 21. See AFRICA.

Anhalt, the name of a German duchy. At the beginning of the present century there were three duchies of Anhalt, denominates Anhalt-Deussan, Anhalt-Bernburg, and Anhalt-Kothen. The line of the reigning princes of Anhalt-Kothen was extinct in 1487, and that of Anhalt-Bernburg in 1658, and thus the whole of Anhalt was united under one prince. The area of Anhalt is 1017 square miles. The population amounted, in 1854, to 193,046, of whom about 2000 are Roman Catholics and an equal number Jews; the remainder are Protestants. The supreme Court is in Berlin, which has superintendents at Dessau and Bernburg, and about 150 ministers. Anhalt was one of the first German states which joined the Reformation, and several dukes distinguished themselves in the defence of German Protestantism. Until 1560 Lutheranism prevailed in the whole country, but in that year the controversies arising from the Formosa (Concord) in 1847. Since 1847 the governments of the duchies issued several decrees, which again bind the clergy more strictly to the symbolic books of the two denominations. See GERMANY.

A'nam (Heb. אֱנָּם), נֶחָּנָה, signifying of the people; Sept. Άναμ τ. v. Άναθα, the last named of the four sons of Shemidah, of the tribe of Manasséh (1 Chron. vii. 19). B.C. post 1856.

Anímosa, a native of Campania and ardent adherent of Pelagius, whose cause he defended at the council of Diospolis in 415. He wrote a work, Contra Epistolam Hieromysii ad Epiphantem, which is lost, and translated the homilies of Chrysostom on the Gos- pel of Matthew. According to the testimony of Rich- ard Simon, Huet, and Castellion, he was one of the ablest translators of the ancient church. His translation of Chrysostom is reprinted in the Benedictine edition.—Dupin, Ecl. Writ. vol. iii.

Anicstus, a bishop of Rome, followed Pius I about 157, and is called a martyr in the Roman and other martyrologies, although it is not certain whether he shed his blood for the faith. He received, about 160, a visit from Polycarp, and tolerated the custom of the Anitete in the passing Easter, on the fourteenth day of the first moon after the vernal equinox with the Jews. He had to combat the heretics Valentine and Marcion, and died 168. He is commemorated as a saint by the Roman Church on April 17.—Butler, Lives of the Saints, April 17.

A'nim (Heb. עֲנִימ, עֲנָימ), מְנַהָג, fountain; comp. Ænos; Sept. Άνιμ v. Άνιμ. A city in the mountains of the tribe of Judah, mentioned between Elea- moah and Geshen (Josh. xv. 60), in the district south- east of Jerusalem. Cheremmenah (mentioned in Josh. xix. 13, and Jerome appear to call it Amena (Amaud), and state that it was wholly inhabited by Jews, lying 9 Roman miles south of Hebron, near another village (with which the name likewise closely agrees) called Azenia (Aziyya), wholly inhabited by Christians (Oxonscas. s. v. Aunia, Aunah). Schwartz (Palest. p. 102) mentions here it is the modern village Ben-Enaim, 2 English miles E.N.E. of Hebron, meaning probably Beit-Anim; but this is in a different direction, and is probably the ancient Bethaneth (q. v.). Van de Velde (Mém., p. 289), although apparently wrong in thinking it may be the Levitical Ain (Josh. xxii. 10), is probably correct in identifying it with the Ain on the road from Hebron to Moladah; but unnecessarily supposes the Ain mentioned along with Rimmon (q. v.) in the "south" (Josh. xv. 92), and apportioned to Simeon (Josh. xix. 7), to have been a different one, as he is thus obliged to do. See AIN.

A'ni-Mundo, "the soul of the world," according to some philosophical systems, a soul-substance penetrating the entire world in a similar way as the human soul penetrates the body. Whether the Pythagoreans assumed a particular a\nima mundi is not certain; but Plato regards the existence of the a\nima mundi as essential to the world of nature. To him it is a product of the architect of the world, of the highest reason, as a connecting link between pure reason and the sensuous, which gives measure and order to the latter. Aristotle did not assume a particular animal mundi. With the Stoics, the conception of it coincides with that of a primitive divine power producing everything from itself. With Plotin and the Neo-Platonists the animal mundi is not an immediate product of the highest personal unit; but emanates from it through the soic (reason). Plotin sometimes distinguished between a higher animal mundi, which is a being absolutely non-sensuous and separated from the corporeal world, and a lower animal mundi, which is connected with the bodies of the universe in a similar manner as the individual soul is connected with its body. The origin of this philosophical opinion must be sought in the desire to find between the primitive cause of all things and the phenomenal world connecting links which are to make the origin of the latter from the former more easily comprehendible. Christianity, which derives the origin of the world from an immediate creative act of God, rejects altogether the notion of a particular animal mundi.—Pierer, xix, 89. See PANtheISM.

Animal (designated by various Heb. terms, rendered "creature," "living thing," "cattle," etc.), an organized living body, endowed with sensation. See Beast. The Hebrews distinguished animals into pure and impure, clean and unclean; or those which might be eaten and offered, and those whose use was prohibited. The sacrifices which they offered were: (a.) Of the beeve kind, a cow, bull, or calf. The ox could not be offered, because it was mutilated. Where it is said in our version oxen were sacrificed, we are to understand bulas (Exod. xx, 24). (b.) Of the goat kind, a he-goat, a she-goat, or kid (Levit. xxii, 21). (c.) Of the sheep kind, a ewe, lamb, ram. When it is said sheep are offered, rams are chiefly meant, especially in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sins. See SACRIFICE. Besides these three sorts of animals used in sacrifices, many others might be eaten, wild or tame. All that have not cloven hoofs, and do not chew the ced, were esteemed impure, and could neither be eaten nor eaten. See CLEAN. Commentators on the Scriptures are much divided with relation to the legal purity or impurity of animals. It would appear that this distinction obtained before the Flood, since God commanded Noah (Gen. vii, 2) to carry seven couples of clean animals into the ark and two of unclean. See FLOOD. The following is a complete list of all the Biblical animals, both clean and unclean (many of them named in Deut. xiv; Lev. xi), exclusive of birds, fishes, insects, and reptiles (all which see in their order), arranged under their true English names (with the Hebrew or Greek term in italics), so far as these have been discovered. Animal Worship. From the Egyptian Monuments. See IDOLATRY. The ox, the sheep, and the ichneumon were held in almost general veneration; the cat and the asp had their distinguishing homage; and the Egyptian custom of selecting some in preference to others, as the objects of veneration by different cities, extended to other countries, and was adopted by the Lemnians and Thessalia-
The bloody wars occasioned by the variety of homage paid to animals, such as that caused by the inhabitants of Cyzicus eating the oxyrhinicus, and the Oxirchians the dog, prove how fiercely the superstition was cherished. Herodotus says that the hippopotamus was sacred only in the Peprieine Nome, and he adds the cey and water-snake to the list of hallowed fishes, and the fox- and goat to that of hallowed birds. Sacred serpents were kept at Thebes, and in the mystagogical processions other pagans made use of them, with much ceremony (Herod. ii, 65-67). The solar deities of the Egyptians are usually represented with the head of a hawk. In the procession at Dendera, several of these hawk-headed divinities appear with an ornament upon the head, composed of the circle, and a serpent to India, and neck, or, as it is usually termed, a basiliak. The worship of the serpent appears to have been at an early period almost universal, which may be accounted for by considering that reptile as the earliest type of the solar influence, which in later times gave place to other emblems, possibly on account of the venomous properties of the creature, which rendered it an unsuitable representation of that from which it was supposed all good proceeded. See Worship. Lands were set apart for the support of the sacred animals; men and women were employed in feeding and maintaining them. If a person killed any of these creaturesdesignedly, he was punished with death; if involuntarily, his punishment, in some cases, was referred to the priest; but if the animal killed were either a cat, a hawk, or an ibis, and that whether by design or not, the culprit was to die, without mercy, and the enraged multitude seldom waited even for the formalities of a trial. A Roman, in the time of one of the Ptolemies, who killed a cat accidentally, was torn in pieces by the populace on the spot, in spite of all the efforts of the king's guard to save him. When any of these animals died, great lamentation was made, and vast sums expended on their funeral. We are told that in the beginning of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, the bull Apis dying, his keeper expended more than fifty talents of silver, or £15,000, on his interment (see Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt, i, 226 sq.). The Israelites often debased themselves by an imitation of this demonolatry, for which they were severely punished by God, because it was one grand design of the Mosaic law to keep their theology free from these gross appendages. See Apis; Cat; Crocodile; Ibis; Ichneumon; Serpent; Satty, etc.

Animales (animalia), an opprobrious epithet bestowed by the Origenites on persons who differed from them in opinion as to the resurrection of the body. The doctrine of the Origenites was that men would have spiritual bodies in the next world; and they ridiculed others who maintained that the same body, altered in quality but not in substance, would be raised. They gave them the opprobrious names of simiplices and philosarcor, idiots and lovers of the flesh; carnes, animalia, jumenta, carnal, sensual, animals; lutæ, earthy; piliosot, from pilus, hair, because it was asserted that the body would rise perfect in all its parts. —Bingham, Orig. Exe. bk. i, ch. iii; Farrar, s.v.

Aniso (*ἀνισόν, anistemon) occurs in Matt. xxii, 28, "Woe unto you—for ye pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin." By the Greek and Roman writers it was employed to designate a plant used both medicinally and as an article of diet (Pliny, xix, 61; xx, 74; Apicius, vi, 5, 9). The Arabian translators of the Greek medical authors give as its synonyme shabib, the name applied in Eastern countries to an umbelliferous plant with flattened fruit commonly called "seed," which is surrounded with a dilated margin. In Europe the word has always been used to denote a similar plant, which is familiarly known by the name of dill. Hence there is no doubt that, in the above passage, instead of "anise," ἀνισόν should have been translated "dill;" and it is said to be rendered by a synonymous word in every version except our own.

The common dill, or Anethum graveolens, is an annual plant, growing wild among the corn in Spain and Portugal; and on the coast of Italy, in Egypt, and about Astrachan. It resembles fennel, but is smaller, has more glaucous leaves, and a less pleasant smell: the fruit or seeds, which are finely divided by capillary segments, are elliptical, broader, flatter, and surrounded with a membranous disk. They have a warm and aromatic taste, owing to the presence of a pale yellow volatile oil, which itself has a hot taste and a peculiar penetrating odor. The error in translation pointed out above is not of very great consequence, as both the anise and the dill are umbelliferous plants, which are found cultivated in the south of Europe. The seeds of both are employed as condiments and carminatives, and have been so from very early times; but the anethum is more especially a genus of Eastern cultivation, since either the dill or another species is feared in all the countries from Syria to India, and known by the name shabib; while the anise, though... known, appears to be so only by its Greek name ἀνέσσων. In the Talmudic tract Maseroth (of Tithes), iv, 5, we read, "The seed, the leaves, and the stem of ἀνέσσω (ἀνέσσω, skabath) are, according to Rabbi Eliezer, subject to tithe." (comp. Gemara, Aboda Zara, i, 2), which indicates that the herb was eaten, as is said, in the case of the Eastern species in their present day; and, therefore, to those acquainted with the cultivated plants of Eastern countries, the dill will appear more appropriate than anise in the above passage (see Celsii Hierob. i, 494 sq.). See DILL.

The proper anise (Gr. ἀνέσσων) is the Pimpinella anisum of Linnaeus, an annual umbelliferous plant, the seeds of which are principally employed in the manufacture of cordials or liqueurs, and as a remedy against flatulence. Indeed all these kinds of plants, like the common fennel, possess a warming medicinal property. See ANIS.

There is another plant very dissimilar in external character to the two named above, the leaves and capsules of which are powerfully carminative. This is the "staranise," or aniseed-tree (Illicium anisatum), which belongs to the natural order Magnoliaceae. In China this is frequently used for seasoning dishes, etc.; but the species of this genus are not natives of the Bible lands, and must not be confused with the umbelliferous plants noticed in this article. See BZORX.

Ankle. This word does not occur in Scripture, but the ornament which it denotes is clearly indicated by "the tinkling (or jingling) ornaments (ταῖς, c. les) about the feet" mentioned in the curious description of feminine attire which we find in Isa. iii. See ATTIRE.

Even in the absence of special notice, we might very securely conclude that an ornament to which the Oriental women have always been so partial (Thomson's Land and Book, i, 192) was not unknown to the Jewish ladies. The Egyptian monuments represent them as worn by men likewise (Wilkinson, iii, 375). The figures below represent different styles of anklets, as found on the Egyptian monuments, and in use at present (particularly by females) among the Egyptians, Persians, Arabs, and Hindoes. Anklets of solid gold or silver are worn by some ladies, but are more uncommon than they formerly were. They are, of course, very heavy, and knocking together as the wearer walks, make a ringing noise; hence it is said in a song, "The ringing of thy anklets has deprived me of reason" (Lane's Mod. Egyptian, ii, 410). This practice, nevertheless, is forbidden in the Koran (xxiv, 31). This prohibition, however, perhaps rather refers (see Chardin, i, 138, 148, 194) to the small bells used by females, especially dancing-girls, around the ankles (Lane, ib. ii, 368). To increase this pleasant sound, pebbles were sometimes enclosed in them (Calmet, s. v. Periscelides, Bells). Tertullian disconnects them (De cult. femin. ii, 43). They were sometimes of great value, but the poorer village children wear them for iron. For their use among the ancient Egyptians, see Wilkinson, iii, 374, and among the ancient Greeks and Romans, Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Periscelides. They do not, we believe, occur in the Nineveh sculptures. Livingstone writes of the favorite wife of an African chief, "She wore a profusion of iron rings on her ankles, to which were attached little pieces of silver so as to enable her to make a tinkling as she walked in her mincing African style" (p. 278). On the weight and inconvenience of the copper rings worn by the chiefs themselves, and the odd walk it causes them to adopt, see id. p. 276. See BRACELET.

An'na ('Avva), the Greek form of the name Han'nah (q. v.); it also occurs in the cognate Punic as that of the sister of Dido, Virgil, Aen. iv, 9), the name of two women.

1. The wife of Tobit, whose history is contained in the apocryphal book that bears his name (Tob. i, 9 sq).
2. An aged widow, daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher. She had married early, but after seven years her husband died, and during her long widowhood she daily attended the morning and evening services of the temple. Anna was eighty-four years old when the infant Jesus was brought to the temple by his mother, and, entering as Simeon pronounced his thanksgiving, she also broke forth in praise to God for the fulfillment of his ancient promises (Luke ii, 26, 37), B.C. 6. See Mayer, De Anna prophetisa vidua (Gryn. 1706).

Anna, St., the name, according to tradition, of the mother of the Virgin Mary, and wife of Joachim. The names of Anna and Joachin are not found in the Hebrew Scripture, but are gathered from the fathers. According to a legend, her body was brought, in 710, from Jerusalem to Constantinople, and from that time many churches of Europe pretended to possess some relic of it. Her festival is kept in the Greek Church July 26th, in the Roman Church July 26th. See Anna, iii, 375; Bp. Bp. Spencer, Bp. De Joachimo, Anna et Josopho (Antw. 1688); Goette, De cultu Annae (Lips. 1702); Willrich, Ehenal. An'nuwā (A'nuwā), a man whose postery (or place) whose posterity (or place) was returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 29); evidently the Senaah (q. v.) of the genuine text ( Ezra ii, 35).

Annōlēs Ecclesiastici. See BARONUS.

Annam. See ANAM.

An'nās ('Avvo, probably a contracted form of the name Amanoik in its Greek form, 'Amanoik), a high-priest of the Jews mentioned in Luke (iii, 2) as being high-priest along with Caliphas his son-in-law. Our Lord's first hearing (John xviii, 18) was before Anna, who then sent him bound to Caliphas. In Acts iv, 5, he is plainly called the high-priest, and Caliphas merely named with others of his family. He is called by Josephus Amanos (q. v.) the son of Seth; and was first appointed to that office in his 37th year by Quirinus, procurator of Syria, about A.D. 7 (Ant. xviii, 2, 1), but was afterward deprived of it by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea (A.D. 14), who gave the office first to Iamael the son of Abanusa, and a short time after to Eleazar the son of Anna (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 1 and 2). He held the office one year, and was then succeeded by Simon the son of Camithus, who, after another year, was followed by Joseph, also called Caliphas, the son-in-law of Anna, A.D. ante 27, who continued in office until A.D. 37. The passages of the New Testament above cited, therefore, it is apparent that Caliphas was the only actual and proper high-priest; but Anna, being his father-in-law, and having been formerly himself high-priest, and being also perhaps his substitute (sempes), had great influence and authority, and could with great propriety be still termed high-priest along with Caliphas.

ANNAS

Annnas (Aννας v. r. Ἀννας) likewise occurs in the Apocalypse (Vulg. Ναζα) as one of the Israelites who was put to death for opposing the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 32); evidently a corruption for the Ἀρίακ (q. v.) of the genuine text (Exa x, 81).

Annathae, or First-fruits, in the ecclesiastical law, means the value of every spiritual living for a whole year (hence the name, from the Latin word ansus, a year), which the pope, claiming the disposition of every spiritual benefice within Christendom, reserved out of every living. This impost was at first only levied from persons appointed to bishopric; but it was afterward extended to the inferior clergy. The value of these annates was calculated according to a rate made under the direction of Pope Innocent IV (A.D. 1258), but which was afterward increased by Pope Nicholas III (A.D. 1292). This papal exaction was abolished in England by the act 25 Henry VIII, c. 13, 1543, but the act passed one year after the same reign, 26 Henry VIII, c. 3, the right to annates, or first-fruits, was annexed to the crown. The various statutes subsequently passed on this subject have all been consolidated by an act (the 3 Vict. c. 20) regulating the collection of the money so levied.—Gieseler, Cl. Hist. iii, 63-68. See First-fruits; Queen Anne's Bounty.

Annelesy, Samuel, D.D., maternal grandfather of John Wesley, was one of the leading non-conformist divines of his day, and a man of good family, being a nephew of the earl of Anglesea. He was born near Warwick in 1729, and educated at Oxford, where, like his grandson, he was noted for his piety and diligence. He served the national church as chaplain at sea, and as parish priest at Clif, in Kent, at St. John the Apostle's and at St. Giles's, two of the largest congregations in London. He refused to "conform" to the "Act of Uniformity," and endured a series of severe persecutions, which were remedied by many remarkable instances of pious fortitude that distinguished the latter history of the family. One of his persecutors fell dead while preparing a warrant for his apprehension. He became a leader of the Puritans during the troubles of the times, preaching almost daily, providing pastors for destitute congregations, and relief for his ejected and impoverished brethren. After a ministry of more than half a century, and of sore trials, under which he never once faltered, he died, Dec. 31, 1696, exclaiming, "I shall be satisfied with thy likeness; satisfied, satisfied." De Foe, who sat under his preaching, has drawn his character as perfect and non-conformist, considered him a second St. Paul. Richard Baxter pronounced him totally devoted to God (Clarke, Wesley Family, p. 298). He was endeared to all who knew him intimately; and his noble relative, the countess of Anglesea, desired, on her death-bed, to be buried in his grave. He had nearly countess, a dignified personage; a state, which he devoted to charity; robust health, which was capable of any fatigue. Calamy (Non-conformist's Memorial, vol. i) calls him an Israelite indeed.—Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, i, 48; Crowther, Portraiture of Methodism, p. 8.

Annihilation, the act of reducing anything to nothing. Whatever matter can be utterly destroyed or not, is a question that has been much agitated in the schools. According to some, nothing is so difficult: according to others, nothing is so easy. Existence, say the last, is a state of violence; all things are continually endeavoring to return to their primitive nothing; no power is required to effect it; it would be accomplished of itself; nay more, an infinite power is required to prevent it. And, as to human things, the majority of the Greek philosophers opposed the doctrine; the Brahmins held that at stated intervals all created things are annihilated; the Siamese hold annihilation to be the greatest reward of virtue (Brock, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.). The theory of the annihilation of the wicked has been brought forward at different times as a refutation of the doctrine that has recently been revived. See Annihilationists.

Annihilationists, a name given to the holders of the theory that the wicked will not be kept in eternal misery, but will suffer a total extinction of being. See Annihilation.

1. There are only a few traces of this doctrine in early church history. Some are disposed to find the first hint of it in Justin (Dialog, cum Tryphoe. c. 5), where it is said that the souls of the wicked should be punished as long as οτὸν αἰνέαν καὶ τινι καὶ καλὸτα καὶ θείαν δίαρ (as long as God wishes them to exist and to be punished). Similar expressions are quoted by Tertullian, c. Marc. (see Quodscripturum necessitatem, persecute solvere), and Clem. Hom. iii, 5. In clearer terms the doctrine was propounded by Arnobius (q. v.) at the beginning of the 4th century. See HELL.

2. The theory of annihilation was maintained in the last century in England by a few writers of inferior note, as Samuel Bourne (Sermons), J. N. Scott, and others. They took the name of "destructurists," assuming the point in dispute, viz., that the word destruc- tion in Scripture means annihilation. Their proper designation is "Annihilationists." Among the more eminent supporters of this doctrine was Taylor of Norwich (q. v.); and Macknight is also claimed as among its advocates. Jonathan Edwards, in his answer to Dr. Chaucey, on the salvation of all men, says that this scheme was provisionally retained by Dr. Chaucey, i. e. in case the scheme of universal salvation should fail him; and Edwards, in his examination of that work, appropriates a chapter to the consideration of it. Among other reasons against it are the following: 1. The different degrees of punishment which the wicked will suffer according to their works, prove that it does not consist in annihilation, which admits of no degrees. 2. If it be said that the punishment of the wicked, though it will end in annihilation, yet shall be preceded by torment, and that this will have an effect upon the degrees, according to the degrees of sin, it may be replied, this is making it to be compounded partly of torment and partly of annihilation. The latter also appears to be but a small part of future punishment, for that alone will be inflicted on the least sinner, and on account of the least sin; and that all punishment which will be inflicted on any person above that which is due to the least sin is to consist in torment. Nay, if we can form any idea in the present state of what would be dreadful or desirable in another, instead of its being any punishment to be annihilated after a long series of torment, it must be a degradation or a repugnance to the sinner, not a reward with anxious desire. And is it credible that this was the termination of torment that our Lord held up to his disciples as an object of dread? Can this be the destruction of body and soul in hell? Is it credible that everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, should constitute such a small part of future punishment; and such too as, after a series of torment, must, next to being made happy, be the most acceptable thing that could befal them? Can this be the object threatened by such language, as recompensing tribulation, and taking vengeance in flaming fire? (2 Thess. i, 9). Is it consistent with God's character towards them with putting an end to their miseries? Moreover, this de- struction is not described as the conclusion of a succession of tortures, but as taking place immediately after the last judgment. When Christ shall come to be glorified in his saints then shall the wicked be destroyed. 3. Everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, cannot be annulled, intimation, for let the upholding power of God be withheld for one moment, and the whole creation would sink into nothing. 4. The punishment of wicked men will be the same as that of wicked angels (Matt. xxv, 41): Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. But the punishment of wicked angels consists not in annihilation, but torment. Such is their present punishment in a degree, and such, in a greater degree, will be their punishment hereafter. They are 'cast down to hell;' 'they believe, and tremble;' they are reserved in chains under darkness to the judgment of the great day; they cried, saying, 'What have we to do with thee? Art thou come to torment us before our time? Could the devils but persuade themselves they should be annihilated, they would believe, and be at ease rather than tremble. 5. The Scriptures explain their own meaning in the use of such language. The image of the dead in Sheol is expressly said to consist in being cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, and as having a part in that lake (Rev. xx, 14; xxxi, 8), which does not describe annihilation, nor can it be made to consist with it. The phrase put him asunder (Matt. xxv, 41) is as strong as though of death or destruction. Bishop Law († 1749) maintained that spiritual death is an entire destruction—an annihilation of the soul, with the resolution of the body into its original dust (Theory of Religion, 7th ed. p. 389-391). The name of Archbishop Whately is probably to be enrolled among the modern supporter of annihilationism in England. In his work on the future state (A View of the Scripture Revelations concerning a Future State, Philad. 1855) he argues the opinion fully. He says, that in the passages in which the words "death," "destruction," "eternal death," are spoken of, those words may be taken as signifying any evil, or the loss of one of his parts. The "unequable fire" may mean that fire which utterly consumes what it is burning upon. The "worm that dieth not" may be that which entirely devours what it feeds upon. "Everlasting perdition" may mean that perishing from which the soul cannot be saved, but it will be final annihilating. The passage "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death," affords, according to Whately, some ground for thinking that there may be a "final extinction of evil and suffering by the total destruction of such as are incapable of good and happiness. If eternal death means final destruction without any revival—we can understand what meaning is by the death being destroyed, viz., that none henceforth are to be subjected to it" (p. 184). And Whately concludes this scriptural argument by this sentence: "On the whole, therefore, I think we are not warranted in concluding, as some have done, positively concerning the question, as to make it a point of faith that the final destruction of the wicked is confirmed by the statement 'death and destruction' spoken of in the Scriptures as the doom of the condemned, and to insist on the belief that they are to be left alive for evermore."

3. The revival of annihilationism in this country seems to have begun with the publication of Six Sermons on the Doomsday and the Future State of the Wicked (1694) by George Storr, answered by Prof. Port, in the New Englander, Feb. and May, 1856. One of the most representative advocates of the doctrine, and a very moderate one, is Dr. McCulloh, of Baltimore, in his Analytical Investigations concerning the Scriptures (Balti- more, 1852, 2 vols. 8vo). He maintains that after the final decisions of the judgment, the wicked will be utterly destroyed by a dreadful visitation of Almighty wrath. The ablest work produced on the side of destructionism is Hudson, Debt and Grace, as Related to the Doctrine of a Future State (Boston, 1857, 12mo). This work "denies that the natural immortality of the soul is ever expressed or even implied in the Bible. On the contrary, life and immortality were given by the Redeemer to the redeemed alone; while all others are not only naturally mortal, soul and body, at death, but, after that mortal suspension of positive existence, are raised at the final resurrection and cast into the lake of fire as the second death. It denies that endless conscious suffering is ever affirmed to be the nature of future punishment; but affirms that the penalty consists in privation, and in its perpetuity consists the eternity of future punishment. The class of Scripture terms by which eternal misery is usually understood to be designated, such as condemnation, damnation, perdition, destruction, the writer understands to express the temporary and partial nature of the temporary nature to the disorganization and complete non-existence from which it sprang" (Met. Quar. Rev. Jan. 1858, p. 149). An exhaustive reply to Mr. Hudson, and a thorough examination of the whole controversy, is given by Landis in his treatise On the Immaturity of the Soul (St. Louis, 1858). The Final Condition of the Wicked (N. Y. 1858, 12mo). The subject is also ably treated by Mattison in his work, The Immortality of the Soul (Philad. 1864). Annulus, Giovanni, was born at Viterbo July 7, 1492. Having entered the order of Dominicans, he became a proficient in the Latin, Greek, and Oriental languages, and in theology. He published two works, entitled, 1. Tractatus de Imperio Tucurarn; and 2. De Futura Christianorum triumphi, etc. (Genoa, 1490, 4to), in which he endeavors to show that Mahomet was the Antichrist of the Apocalypse. But the work by which he is most known is his Historia Antiquitatis (Rome, 1498, fol.), in which he pretended to give the works of Berosus, Marylyus of Leabeo, Caton, Sempronius, Archilochus, Xenophon, Metasbathes or Megasthenes, Manetho, and others. These writings were the cause of a dispute among the learned at the time, some, as Pineda, Louis Viveza, the Spaniard, Vosius, Malchier Cannus, and others, maintained the utter futility of all these pieces, and declared Annulus to be a sheer impostor; while others, who had among them such men as Naderius, Leander Albert, Sixtus of Siena, Alph. Maldonatus, etc., declared themselves in his favor. Annius was master of the palace for Al- exander VI, and was, it is supposed, poisoned by Cas- sar Borgia, whom he had offended. He died Nov. 18, 1502.—Hoefer, Bioc. Générale, ii, 729; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Anniversary, in the Greek and Roman Churches, a name given to the day on which a martyr or saint is commemorate. Also, the day on which a private prayer is made, year by year, for the souls of deceased persons, and masses said and alms distributed, are in the Roman Church called anniversaries. The anniversary office (officium anniversarium) is a double office, said only on the first anniversary day after the death. On all succeeding anniversary days, the single office is said, as in the daily office for the dead.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.
Anno or Hanno (St.), archbishop of Cologne in the 11th century. Belonging to the Suabian family of Sonneberg, he was at first devoted to a military life; but, after a short career of arms, he entered the church. The emperor Henry III, the Bloed, appointed him to the see of Cologne upon the death of archbishop Hermann in 1055. He applied himself with diligence to his duties, both temporal and spiritual. He reformed many of the monasteries of his diocese, and built five or six others, among the latter the abbey of Siegburg. After the death of Henry III the emperor made him regent. His zeal for the church outran his discretion, especially in the excessive energy with which he seconded the measures of Gregory VII (q. v.). The emperor Henry IV, though his pupil, was so dissatisfied with his conduct that he drove him from his see. He died December 4th, 1075, on which day he is commemorated.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biographie Generale, ii, 730; Ballot, Vies des Saints, December 4.

Annual Conference, the name of the territorial synods or councils of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which are held every year, as distinguished from the general synod (General Conference) held quadrennially. The Annual Conference is composed of all the ministers in full connection within certain territorial limits. Preachers "on trial" are required to attend the sessions, but are not allowed to vote. The times of holding the Annual Conferences are fixed by the bishops, the place by the Conference itself. The procuring officer is the bishop; but, in case of his absence, some "member of the Conference appointed by the bishop shall preside; but if no appointment be made, the Conference elects a president by ballot among the elders, without debate." The duties of the Annual Conference, and the limits of its authority, are prescribed by the Discipline. A record of its proceedings is sent to each General Conference for revision, if necessary. The territorial boundaries of the Annual Conferences are fixed by the General Conference. There are now (1866) sixty annual conferences (including mission conferences) of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, Europe, Africa, India, and China. See CONFERENCE; METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Annulus, a ring. The clergy do not appear to have worn any badge of office until the fourth century; but subsequently various insignia or emblems of office were appropriated. The ring is now given to Roman bishops on their investiture, as emblematical of the bishop's episcopal authority to the Church, in imitation of the ancient ceremony of presenting a ring in marriage. It was called "the ring of his episcopal," annulus spondalitiu, or annulus pronuba; but sometimes, also, annulus palatii. The pope wears a ring with the device of Peter fishing; and papal briefs, stamped with this seal, are said to be given under annulo piscatorio. The fisher-ring has been used for this purpose since the 13th century.

Anunniciad or Annunziada, Order of, a military order, founded by Amadeus, count of Savoy, in 1580 or 1590, called at first the order of the Virgin and the Holy Love, because of a hair bracelet, formed in love-knots, given to the count by a lady. Amadeus VIII, duke of Savoy (created Pope Felix III at the council of Basle), in 1496, changed the name of the order to that of the Annunziada. The figure of the Virgin was appended to the collar, in which the love-knots were changed into a pattern in twisted cord, which bore the initials F. E. R. T., supposed to mean Fortitudine ejus Rhodum tenat, in reference to the valiant defence of Rhodes by Amadeus the Great in 1510. The cloak of the knights was first red, afterward blue, and now of the color of amaranth, lined with cloth of silver. It still exists in Sardina as an order of merit.

Annunziada, the name of two orders of nuns. 1. That founded at Bourges in 1500, by Jeanne, queen of France, after her divorce from Louis XII. These nuns also call themselves the Annunziata, viz., the virgins exhibited, as they say, in the mysteries which the Roman Church commemorates in the ten festivals of the Virgin Mary. Their rule is formed upon the idea of an initiation of these virgins. They wear a gray habit, a red scapulary, a cross of gold or silver, suspended from the neck, and a ring of one of those metals on the right finger. At the initiation they had 45 nunneries in France and Holland, all of which were suppressed. —Helyot, Ordres Religieux, i, 224; Burck, Orders of Knighthood, p. 350.

Annunciation, Feast of, from the Lat. annunciatio, announcement, a festival observed in honor of the tidings which the angel Gabriel brought to the Virgin Mary of the incarnation of our Saviour. It is called by various names in church history, e.g. Ημερα σαραφατου, "the day of salvation,\" Харрармων, in reference to the epithet ευχαριαρωμην, employed by the angel (Luke i, 28); also Ειγαγγιασμος, with reference to the subject of the announcement. Some doubt exists as to the date of its establishment. Angusti is of opinion that the festival was celebrated at the time of the council of Laudicis, cit. 564. In the homily ascribed to Athanasius it is called one of our Lord's festivals. After the fifth century, in consequence of what passed during the Nestorian controversies, this festival was referred to Mary, and its observance fixed for the 25th of March, on which day it is now celebrated by the Greek, Roman, and English Churches. It seems to have been generally observed in the sixth century, but the first formal mention that we meet with of its being commemorated among the festivals of the Church is in the decrees of the council of Trullo, convened at the close of the seventh century. Chrysostom, and Bernard after him, call it the root of all festivals."—Bingham, Orig. Ecl. bk. xx, ch. viii, § 4.

The following writers treat on this subject: Köcher, De salutatione angelica (Den. 1760-1); Myrvolds, De angelica communio (Helsing. 1629); Rancke, De locutione angelorum (Lips. 1678); Sonntag, De chasismio (Aldorfi, 1700); Zeilich, De verbo Gabrieli ad Mariam (Viteb. 1754). See MARY.

Annuus (Aννοος, Vulg. Anim), given (1 Eedr. viii, 48) as the name of one of the Levites sent to accompany the captives returning from Babylon; but it is evidently an error of the translator for ἀνους, peptos, "and with him," of the original text (Ezea viii, 19).

Anoint (usually μαθαξω, masbach; χρίσω). The practice of anointing with perfumed oils or ointments appears to have been very common among the Hebrews, as it was among the ancient Egyptians. See UNGeorge. The practice, as to its essential meaning, still remains in the East; but perfumed waters are now far more commonly employed than oils or ointments (v. q.). See PERUME. It is from this source that the usage has extended to other regions. Among the Greeks and Romans oil was employed as a lubricant for supplying the bodies of the athletes in the games (q. v.), and also after the bath (q. v.).

1. In the Scriptures several kinds of anointing are distinguishable (Scacchi, Mythothec, iii, Rom. 1837).
2. Consecration and Inauguration.—The act of anointing appears to have been viewed as emblematical of a particular sanctification, of a designation to the service of God, or to a holy and sacred use. Hence the anointing of the high-priests (Exod. xxix, 29; Lev. iv, 3), and even of the sacred vessels of the tabernacle (Exod. xxx, 26, etc.); and hence also, probably, the anointing of the king, who, as "the Lord's anointed," and, under the Hebrew constitution, the viceroy of Jehovah, was undoubtedly invested with a sacred character. This was the case also among the Egyptians, among whom the king was, ex officio, the high-priest, and as such, doubtless, rather than in his secular capacity, was solemnly anointed at his inauguration. See UNCRONISH (of Christ).

As the custom of inauguing anointing first occurs among the Israelites immediately after they left Egypt, and no example of the same kind is met with previously, it is fair to conclude that the practice and the notions connected with it were acquired in that country. With the Egyptians, as with the Jews, the investiture to any sacred office, as that of king or priest, was confirmed by this external sign; and as the Jewish lawgiver mentions the ceremony of pouring oil upon the head of the high-priest after he had put on his entire dress, with the mitre and crown, the Egyptians represent the anointing of their priests and kings after they were attired in their full robes, with the cap and crown upon their heads. Some of the sculptures introduce a priest pouring oil over the monarch (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, iv, 280). It is from this that the high-priest, as well as the king, is called "the anointed" (Lev. iv, 8; v, 16; vi, 15; Psa. cxxxiii, 2). In fact, anointing being the principal ceremony of regal inauguration among the Jews, as crowning is with us, "anointed," as applied to a king, has much the same signification as "crowned." It does not, however, appear that this anointing was repeated. "The anointing of the head of the lord of the dynasty being considered efficient for its purpose as long as the regular line of descent was undisputed (John, Bibl. Archdol. § 228); hence we find no instance of anointing as a sign of investiture in the royal authority, except in the case of Saul, the first king of the Jews, and of David, the first of his line; and, subsequently, in those of Solomon, Josiah, and Jehu, who ascended the throne under circumstances in which there was danger that their right might be forcibly disputed (1 Sam. xix, 24; 2 Sam. li, 4; v, 1-3; 1 Chron. xi, 1; 2 Kings xi, 12-20; 2 Chron. xxiii, 1-21). Those who were inducted into the royal office in the kingdom of Judah appear to have been anointed and consecrated with some peculiar ceremonies (2 Kings ix, 18).

But it is not clear that they were anointed at all; and the omission (if real) is ascribed by the Jewish writers to the want of the holy anointing oil which could alone be used on such occasions, and which was in the keeping of the prince of the house of David in the temple in Jerusalem. No private anointing which was performed by the prophets (2 Kings ix, 3; comp. 1 Sam. x, 1) was not understood to convey any abstract right to the crown, but was merely a symbolical intimation that the person thus anointed should eventually ascend the throne.

The following species of official anointing appear to have prevailed among the Jews: (a) Prophets were occasionally anointed to their offices, and are called messiahs, or anointed (1 Chron. xvi, 22; Psa. cv, 15). (b) Priests, at the first institution of the Levitical priesthood, were all anointed to their offices, the sons of Aaron as well as Aaron himself (Exod. xi, 18; Num. iii, 8); but afterward anointing seems not to have been repeated at the consecration of ordinary priests, but to have been especially reserved for the high-priest (Exod. xxix, 29; Lev. vii, 32); so that "the priest that is anointed" (יְהִי בְּהַעֲשָׂר, Lev. iv, 8) is generally thought to mean the high-priest (Sept. ό δρυμός ου εγερμομοις; comp. vers. 5, 16, and c. vi. 22 [106]). (c) Kings. The Jews were familiar with the idea of making a king by anointing before the establishment of their own monarchy (Judg. ix, 8, 15). Anointing was the divinely-appointed ceremony in the inauguration of their own kings (1 Sam. i, 16; x, 1; 1 Kings i, 34, 39); indeed, so pre-eminent it did belong to the kingly office, that "the Lord's anointed" was a common designation of the theocratic king (1 Sam. xii, 5, 5; 2 Sam. i, 14, 16). The rite was sometimes performed more than once. David was thrice anointed to be king: first, privately by Samuel, before the death of Saul, by way of conferring on him a right to the throne (1 Sam. xvi, 1, 13); again over Judah at Hebron (2 Sam. ii, 4), and finally over the whole nation (2 Sam. v, 8). After the separation into two kingdoms, the kings both of Judah and of Israel seem to have been anointed (2 Kings i, 5; xi, 12). So late as the time of the captivity the king is called "the anointed of the Lord" (Psa. lxxviii, 38, 81; Lam. iv, 20). Besides Jewish kings, we read that Hazael was to be anointed king over Syria (1 Kings xix, 15). Cyrus also is called the Lord's anointed, as having been raised by God to the throne to fulfill the special purpose of delivering the Jews out of captivity (Isa. xlv, 14). (d) Inanimate objects also were anointed with oil in token of their being set apart for religious service. Thus Jacob anointed a pillar at...
Bethel (Gen. xxxi, 13); and, at the introduction of the Mosaic economy, the tabernacle and all its furniture were consecrated by anointing (Exod. xxx, 29-28). The expression “anoint the shield” (Isa. xxix, 5; Sept. ἰονυσάως θυρώς; Vulg. arripite olivarem) refers to the custom of rubbing oil into the hide which, stretched upon a frame, formed the shield, in order to make it supple and fit for use. (See the treatises in Latin, on the priestly anointing, by Clavius [Lamgoni, 1717;] Schwarz [Viteb, 1755;] Zinger [Viteb, 1692;] Zoega [Lips., 1680;] on the royal anointing, by Weimar [Jen., 1629;] and among other nations, by Eschenbach [Jen., 1687;] and Speckner [Viteb, 1716].)

2. As an Act of Hospitality.—The anointing of our Saviour's feet by "the woman who was a sinner" (Luke vii, 38) led to the remark that the host himself had neglected to anoint his head (ver. 46); whence we learn that this was a mark of attention which those who gave entertainments paid to their guests. As this is the only direct mention of the custom, the Jews are supposed by some to have borrowed it from the Romans at a late period, and Westein and others have brought a large quantity of Latin erudition to bear on the subject. (See the treatises, on this instance, in Latin, by Bailer [Altdorf, 1722;] Goetze [Lips., 1687;] and in Menelius Theosar., ii, 200–204; Jaeschke [Lips., 1790;] Krakewitz [Rost, 1708;] Polchow [Jen., 1738;] Riese [Marb., 1777;] Sonnenschein [Lond. 1775, 1778;] and Trautmann [Jen., 1749;].) But the careful reader of the O. T. knows that the custom was an old one, to which there are various indirect allusions. See Hospitality. The circumstances connected with feasts and entertainments are, indeed, rarely intimated; nor would the present direct reference to this custom have transpired but for the remarks which the act of the woman in anointing the feet of Jesus called forth. (See Walde, De unctionibus Vett. Eboromum consciencibuls, Jen., 1751.) Such passages, however, as Ps. xxxii, 5; Prov. xxii, 7; xxvii, 9; Wis. ii, 7, as well as others in which the enjoyment of oil and wine are coupled together, may be regarded as containing a similar allusion. It is, therefore, safer to refer the origin of this custom among the Hebrews to their nearer and more ancient neighbours, the Egyptians, than to the Romans or the Greeks, who themselves had probably derived it from the same people. Among the Egyptians the antiquity of the custom is evinced by their monuments, which offer in this respect analogies more exact than classical antiquity or modern usage can produce. With them the custom of anointing was not confined to the appointment of kings and priests to the sacred offices they held. It was the ordinary token of welcome to guests in every party at the house of a friend; and in Egypt, no less than in Judæa, the metaphorical expression 'anointed with the oil of gladness' was fully understood, and applied to the ordinary occurrences of life. It was customary for a servant to attend every guest as he seated him and to anoint his head" (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, iv, 279; ii, 215). See Emblem. It is probably, however, that the Greeks and Jews, anointed themselves at home, before going abroad, although they expected the observance of this etiquette on the part of their entertainers. That the Jews thus anointed themselves, not only when paying a visit, but on ordinary occasions, is shown by many passages, which describe the oiling of it as a sign of mourning (Dent., xxviii, 40; Ruth iii, 3; 2 Sam. xiv, 2; Dan. x, 3; Amos vi, 6; Mic. vi, 15; Esth. ii, 12; Psa. cix, 15; Isa. lxi, 3; Eccles. ix, 8; Cant. i, 8; iv, 10; also Judith, x, 8; Sus. ii; Eclesi., xxxix, 26; Wis. ii, 7). One of these passages (Psa. cix, 15, "oil that maketh the face to shine") is specially remarkable, for not only was the hair but the skin was anointed. In our northern climates this custom may not strike us as a pleasant one; but as the peculiar usages of most nations are found, on strict examination, to be in accordance with the peculiarities of their climate and condition, we may be assured that this Oriental predestination for external unction must have arisen from a belief that it contributed materially to health and cleanliness. Niebuhr states that "in Yemen the anointing of the body is believed to strengthen and protect it from the heat of the sun, by which the inhabitants of this province, as those on the west, are subject to sunstroke. Oil, by closing up the pores of the skin, is supposed to prevent that too copious transpiration which enfeebles the frame; perhaps, too, these Arabian think a glistering skin a beauty. When the intense heat comes on they always anoint their bodies with oil." See Oil. 3. Anointing the Sick.—The Orientals are indeed strongly persuaded of the sanative properties of oil; and it was under this impression that the Jews anointed the sick, and applied oil to wounds (Psa. cix, 18; Isa. i, 6; Luke x, 34; Rev. iii, 18). Anointing was used in sundry disorders, as well as to promote the general health of the body. It was hence, as a salutary and approved medicament, that the seventy disciples were directed to "anoint the sick" (Mark vi, 13); and hence also the sick man is directed by the apostle (James v, 14) to send for the elders of the Church, who were "to pray for him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." The Talmudical practice of Lightfoot on Matt. vi, 16, shows that the later Jews connected charms and superstitious mutterings with such anointings, and he is therefore probably right in understanding this text to mean, "it is customary for the unbelieving Jews to use anointing of the sick, joined with a magical and enchanting muttering; but how infinitely better is it to join the pious prayers of the elders of the Church to the anointing of the sick." Niebuhr assures us that at Sana (and doubtless in other parts of Arabia) the Jews, as well as many of the Moslems, have their bodies anointed whenever they feel themselves indisposed. Analogous to this is the anointing performed practised by the twelve (Mark i, 13), and our Lord's anointing the eyes of a blind man with clay made from saliva, in restoring him miraculously to sight (πάμπως, John ix, 6, 11). See Medicine.

4. Anointing the Dead.—The practice of anointing the bodies of the dead is intimated in Mark xiv, 8, and Luke xii, 46. This ceremony was performed after the body was washed, and was designed to check the progress of corruption. Although, from the mode of application, it is called anointing, the substance employed appears to have been a solution of odoriferous drugs. This (together with the laying of the body in spices) was the only kind of embalming in use among the Jews. See Burial; Embalming.

5. Spiritual.—(1.) In the O. T. a Deliverer is promised under the title of Messiah, or Anointed (Psa. ii, 2; Dan. ix, 25, 26); and the nature of his anointing... is described to be spiritual, with the Holy Ghost (Isa. xxi. 1; see Luke iv. 18). As anointing with oil bestowed prosperity, and produced a cheerful aspect (Psa. civ. 15), so this spiritual unction is figuratively described as anointing "with the oil of gladness" (Psa. xlv. 7; Heb. i. 9). In the N. T. Jesus of Nazareth is shown to be the Messiah or Christ, or Anointed of the O. T. (John i. 41; Acts ix. 22; xii. 30; xviii. 28); and the historical fact of his being anointed with the Holy Ghost is recorded and asserted (John i. 32, 33; Acts iv. 37; x. 38). (2.) Spiritual anointing with the Holy Ghost is conferred also upon Christians by God (2 Cor. i. 21), and they are described as having an unction, "anointing," an immediate blessing of which they partake of in all things (John ii. 27). To anoint the eyes with eye-salve is used figuratively, to denote the process of obtaining spiritual perception (Rev. iii. 18).

6. Religious Significance of the Act.—It is somewhat remarkable that the first Biblical instance of anointing—that of Jacob’s anointing of his pillow at Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 19)—has reference to an inanimate object; yet the sacred import of the ceremony is obvious, and must have been derived from primeval custom. At a later date, the formal agreement noticed by Sir G. Wilkinson, between the use of oil among the Egyptians and the Israelites in consecrating to an office, may undoubtedly be regarded as evidence that the Mosaic prescription was framed with some regard to the observances in Egypt; for by the time the former was instituted, the Israelite people had been long habituated to the customs of Egypt; and it was the part of wisdom, when setting up a better polity, to take advantage of what existed there, so far as it could be safely employed. The king so anointed was solemnly recognised as the guest and protege of the lord of the temple; the statue was set apart for, and so far identified with the god it represented, and both were stamped as qualified for the respective offices. But in the true religion something more and higher was involved in the act of consecration. The article or subject was brought into contact with the holiness of Jehovah, and was made a vessel and instrument of the Spirit of God. Hence, anointing with oil in the times of the old covenant was always a symbol of the gift and grace of the Holy Spirit—in the case of inanimate objects imparting to them a ceremonial sanctity, so as to fit them for holy ministrations; and in the case of persons, not only designating them to a sacred office, but sealing to them the spiritual qualifications needed for its efficient discharge.—Kittel, e. v.; Smith, e. v.; Fairbairn, e. v. See Consecration.

II. Modern.—1. In the Romish Church the custom of anointing priests is still continued. The ordaining bishop anoints with the holy oil called chrism (q. v.), the palm of both hands, the thumb, and the forefinger of the person to be ordained; and thus, according to the expression in the ritual of ordination, the hands receive power to bless, to consecrate, and to make holy. If a clergyman is excommunicated these spots are rubbed off. This custom, like many others, is a perversion of the sacred ceremony by which the Jewish priests and kings were inducted into office.

2. The history of extreme unction (q. v.) in its present form can be traced back no further than the twelfth century. When the ceremony of anointing is mentioned at an earlier period, the reference is to the offices of baptism and confirmation. There is no mention of extreme unction in Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, or Cyprian, or in any of the writers of the first three centuries. The fourth century, however, makes no mention of it. It is not found in the "Apostolic Constitutions," a work in which all church forms are minutely described, nor in the bishops of the first six centuries. After the twelfth century it was universally adopted in the Western Church.

3. The only occasion on which anointing is used in the Church of England is at the coronation of the sovereign, when the archbishop solemnly anoints the king or queen, after the ancient practice of the Hebrews.

ANOINTING OIL. The "oil of holy ointment" prescribed by divine authority (Exod. xxx. 23-25) for the consecration of the Jewish priests and kings was compounded of the following ingredients:

Under the law persons and things set apart for sacred purposes were anointed with this "holy unction" (Exod. xxix. 7), which appears to have been a typical representation of the communication of the Holy Ghost to the Church of Christ (Acts i. 5; x. 38). Hence the Holy Spirit is called an unction (q. v.), whereby believers were divinely inspired and guided into all truth (2 Cor. i. 21; 1 John ii. 20, 27). The profane or common use of the holy ointment was expressly forbidden, on pain of being excommunicated (Exod. xxx. 33; Ezek. xxviii. 31). It was commanded to be kept by the Hebrews throughout their generations; it was therefore laid up in the most holy place. Prideaux observes that it was one of those things which was wanting in the second temple. There is an allusion to the anointing of the kings of Israel or Judah in Eccles. xxiv. 15. The use of aromatics in the East may be dated from the remotest antiquity. "Ointment and perfume," says Solomon, "rejoice the heart" (Prov. xxvii. 9). They are still introduced, not only upon every religious and festive occasion, but as one essential expression of private hospitality and friendship. See Scent.

THE ANOINTED. The propheta, priests, and kings were anointed at their inauguration; but no man was ever dignified by being anointed to hold the three offices in himself, so no person ever had the title of the Messiah, the Christ, the Anointed One, but Jesus the Saviour. He alone is king of kings and lord of lords; the king who governs the universe, and rules in the hearts of his followers; the prophet, to instruct men in the way wherein they should go; and the great high-priest, to make atonement and intercession for the whole world. Of him, Melchizedek, Abraham, Aaron, David, and others were illustrious types; but none of these had the title of "The Anointed of God." This does, and ever will, belong exclusively to Jesus the Christ, who was consecrated in our nature by the anointing of the Holy Ghost (Psa. ii. 2; Isa. lxxi. 1; Dan. ix. 24; Matt. iii. 16, 17; Luke iv. 18-21; Acts iv. 27; x. 38). See Messiah.
ANOMEANS (δισγενος, dissimilar), the name by which the stricter Arians, who denied the likenes of the Word to the Father, were distinguished from the Semi-Arians, who merely denied his consubstantiality. —Gieseler, Ch. Hist. i, 198. See ARIANS.

A'nos (Ἀνως), one of the "sons" of Mani (Bani), who divorced his Gentile wife (1 Esdr. ix, 84); apparently the Vaniani (t. v.) of the true text (Ezra, x, 56).

ASSAIRIANS or ASSASSINS, inhabitants of a district called Assair, situated also in Persia. Their religion is a compound of pygmagism and Mohammedanism, which they are said to have been taught by an old man who in 891 inhabited the village of Nasaer, near Koufa, and passed for a saint and a prophet. Some of them worship the sun, others the dog and other material objects. A special work on them has been published by the Rev. Samuel Lyde, (see a valuable summary of this work in the N. Amer. Review, Oct. 1862.) According to Lyde, "they number about 200,000, for the most part rude and vicious. They are divided into Shemseeh (men of the sun, Northerners) and Kurneel (men of the moon, Southerners); the former may be descendants of the Caesars, the latter, foreigners, having forced their present religion into the land. The name Assaireh is probably derived from the founder of the sect, Nusairi, dating from the ninth century. Their sacred name is Khaseebeh, from the apostle of the sect. In many points they have affinities with the Assassins. They believe in the divinity of the imam in the person of the imam — the second and third being created. The first person, the supreme deity, is Mannun, or Meaning; the second, Imam, or Name; the third, Bab, or Door. Of the supreme deity there have been seven manifestations; the last is Allah, Mohammed, and Salamun II Farisee. All is the highest manifestation of God, alone to be adored. There is also a system of hierarchies, bewildering in numbers: 14,000 Near Ones, 15,000 Cerublim, 16,000 Spirituals, 17,000 Saints, 18,000 Hermits, 19,000 Listeners, 20,000 Followers— in all, 119,000 besides prophets, apostles, and heroes. The doctrine of metempsychosis is strictly held, and minutely delineated. They receive the Old and New Testaments, and the Koran, with many apocryphal works." An account of them is given in Chesney's "Expedition to the Euphrates and the Tigris." See also Walford's "Travels in the East," and "Blackwood's Magazine," lxx, 719. See ASSASSINS.

Anschar, Ansgar, or Anschaurius, St., the first archbishop of Hamburg; bishop of Bremen, and so-called apostle of Sweden and Denmark. The most probable opinion is that he was born in Pomerania, Sept. 8, 901. In 821 he went from the abbey of Corbie, in Picardy, to that in Saxony. Having from his youth been desirous to labor in a missionary field, he was sent in 826 to Denmark, and thence to Sweden, where he preached the Gospel with wonderful success. After this he made bishop of Hamburgh, which he governed until the destruction of the city by the Normans in 843; four years after this, Louis, king of Germany, made him bishop of Bremen, where he died, Feb. 8, 865, regretting that he was not called to seal his profession by martyrdom. He wrote a life of St. Wilheland, (De Portis, Monumenta Germaniae, ii, 688 sq.) For a glowing account of him, see Neander, Light in Dark Places, p. 264 sq.; comp. Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 272, 284; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. ii, 29. See also Brit. and For. Ecclesiastical Review, July, 1855. The first biography of Anschar was written by his successor, Rimbert (p. 83, 1846, in Pohlmann, in Deutsch Gemanische Zeitschrift, translated into German by Misailis, Bremen, 1886). See also Kruse, St. Anscam (Altona, 1829); Knommacher, St. Ansgar (Brem. 1828); Reuterdahl, Ausgeist (Berlin, 1887); Klippel, Lebensbeschreibung des Erzbischöfes Ansgar (Brem. 1847); Cave, Hist. Anseigia. 1. A Benedictine monk, born of noble parents at Lyons, was, together with Eginhard, superintendant of the royal edifices; became in 877 abbott at Luxen, and in 827 at Fontenelles. Charlemagne and Louis the Pious employed him for important embassies. He died in 883. He is the author of that important collection of imperial laws known as Libri IIII Capitolarium, containing a number of decrees issued by Charlemagne and Louis the Pious. The German king kept his oath upon the translation containing the laws of the empire. The best edition of it is contained in Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae legum, vol. i.—Acta Sanctorum, eccles. iv, 1.—D'Archev., instit. l. iii.

2. Abbé of St. Michael's (probably at Beausvais); was sent in 870 by Charles the Bald as ambassador to Rome; appointed in 871 archbishop of Sens, and used as a tool by the pope against the clergy. John VIII appointed him in 876 primate of the French Church and vicar-general of the apostolic see, but a synod of Pontefcontest against this, and recognised him only as metropolitan. He died in 883, and his successors had to abandon the distinction, which the pope had intended to connect forever with the see.—Grüber, Kirchengeschichtliche, vol. ii; Gallia Christiana.

Anselm of Canterbury (commonly called St. Anselm) was born at Aosta, a town of the Alps, in Savoy, A.D. 1033. He was treated harshly by his father, and sent in 1052 to Liége, and in 1053 to Beaufort, in Normandy, where he took the monastic habit in 1069, at Bec, where Lanfranc, afterward archbishop of Canterbury, was prior. Three years after, when Lanfranc was promoted to the abbacy of Caen, Anselm succeeded him as prior of Bec, and became abbot in 1076. Anselm came to England while prior of Bec, and afterward in 1092 by the invitation of Hugh Lupus, earl of Chester, who requested his aid in sickness. Soon after his arrival William Rufus also required Anselm's assistance, and finally nominated him (though with great difficulty of acceptance on Anselm's part) to the see of Canterbury, which had lain vacant from Lanfranc's death in 1093. Anselm was consecrated with great solemnity December 4, 1093. In the following year a tinted offer, as the king thought it of £500 from the archbishop, in aid of the war which William was carrying on against his brother Robert, was the first cause of the royal displeasure toward Anselm. Further disorders, which the king desired to go to Rome to receive the pall from Pope Urban II, whom the king refused to acknowledge as pope. Anselm proposed a visit to Rome to consult the pope, but was refused permission. He went a second time to court to ask for leave, and was again refused, but gave his blessing to the king, and embarked at Dover. The king seized upon the archbishop, and made every act of Anselm's administration void. The archbishop got safe to Rome, and was honorably received by the pope. He lived quietly, at Rome and other places, and finished his treatise Cur Deus Homo at a monastery in Champagne. He assisted the pope to obtain the crown of Henry IV. He prevented Urban from excommunicating the king of England for his various and frequent outrages upon religion. The king, however, finally bribed the court of Rome to desert Anselm, who retired to Lyons, where (with the interval of an attendance at a council at Rome in 1099) he continued to reside until the death of William Rufus, with that of Pope Urban shortly after. Henry I, immediately upon his accession, invited Anselm to return. The archbishop was received in England with extraordinary respect both by the king and people, but refusing to be reinvested by the king, and to do the same homage with his predecessor, was not admitted under the dignity of an archbishop in court. In 1108, at the request of the king and barons, Anselm went to Rome to arrange an accommodation; the king at the same time, in distress, dispatching an agent of his own, who arrived before the archbishop. The pope still continued inexorable, but wrote to the king, promising compliance in other matters if the king would but waive the matter of investiture. Anselm in chagrin again took up his residence at Lyons, while a fresh embassy to Rome from the king was still more unsuccessful than the former. Anselm now removed to the court of Adela of Blois, the king's sister, which had been united with the power of Guillaume,
who, through the intervention of the pope, had convinced an interview between him and Anselm July 22, 1105,
when the king restored to him the rev-
"enes of the archbishopric, but refused to allow him to return to England unless he would comply with the investiture. Anselm remained in France, retiring to the middle course, refused to give up the investitures, but was willing so far as dispensation to give leave to bishops and abbots to do homage to the king for their tem-poralities. This was in 1105. The king now invited Anselm to England; but the messenger finding him sick, the king himself went over into Normandy, and made him a visit at Bec, where all their differences were adjusted. Anselm, being recovered, embarked for England, and, landing at Dover, was received with extraordinary marks of welcome. From this time little that is remarkable occurred in his life, except a dispute with Thomas, elected archbishop of York in 1107,
which was protracted by his acrimonious letters.
Despite Anselm's reluctance to accept the see of Canteb-ry, the pope, as on the Virgin's son, was fitting that the king be reconciled with his Archbishop, and united him with a woman without the co-operation of man, and even from a virgin; for as sin and the ground of condemnation were brought about by that sex, it is just that the remedy should also have come from it alone. Thus Christ was then born without original sin; he could sin if he willed it, but he could not will it; consequently he died without owing death and of his own free will. His death, therefore, outweighed the number and magnitude of all sins. He gave unto God, for the sins of mankind, his own life unassailed by any sin of his own, thus giving what he did not owe, when considered as both God and man. In consequence of his offering voluntarily so great a sacrifice, and in a manner far more equivalent for it could be given, it was necessary, in order that the sacrifice should not be vain, that others at least should be benefited thereby in some way, namely, humanity in the forgiveness of sin. Anselm affirms the doctrine of a satisfacio partialis (passive satisfaction) for man, but not of a satisfacio passiva (passive satisfaction); for he nowhere says that Christ endured the actual punishment of men's sins (Neander, Dogmengeschichte, ii, 516). Dr. Sheed (Hist. of Doctrines, ii. 285) questions this statement of Neander's, but on what appear to be insufficient grounds.

The fundamental principles of Anselm's doctrine of satisfaction are found in the writings of many fathers before Anselm, e.g. Athanasius, Gregorius of Nazianzen, Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria; but Anselm is the first who collected and arranged them into a systematic whole. Dr. Sheed has treated the relation of Anselm to theology (Hist. of Doctrines, i, 4v
and v) more skilfully than any other modern writer in short compass. In concluding his analysis of the Cur Deus Homo, he remarks that it "exhibits a depth, breadth, and vigor of thinking not surpassed by any production of the same extent in theological literature. Such a view of the stonemason's art is exhibited is thoroughly Biblical, and thoroughly Proestant. There may be incidental views and positions in this tract with which the modern theologian would not wholly agree; but certainly, so far as the general theory of vicarious satisfaction is concerned, this little tract contains the substance of the reformed doctrine; while it was, at the same time, a fair and philosophical principles which must enter into the scientific construction of this cardinal truth of Christianity. On both the theoretic and the practical side, it is one of the Christian classics" (vol. ii, p. 283).
As to the claim of absolute originality for Anselm's system, "it may be admitted that Anselm first used Anselm is commemorated as a saint in the Church of Rome on the 21st of April. His life, by Eadmer, his friend and companion, is given in the edition of his works named below. The best edition of his works is that of the Opera omnia, memory edition, under the title of Monarchica Cantuariensis Historiae (Venet. 1744, 2 vols. fol.).

The selection of the most important theological and philosophical works of Anselm has been published by C. Haas (S. Anselmi opera philosophico-theologica selecta, vol. i., containing the Monologium and Proslogium, Tubingen, 1862). Special editions of the book Cur Deus Homo were published at Berlin, 1857, and at London, 1883.

Anselm has been much studied of late years: a beautiful monograph by C. Römantis (Saint Anselm de Canterbury, 8vo, Paris, 1882); a study by Böhringer (Die Kirche Chriſtia und ihre Zeugen, ii, 224); and a copious treatise by Hasse (1. Das Leben Anselms; 2. Die Lehr-Anselms, 2 vols. Leipzig, 1843-1842; an abridged translation by Turner, London, 1889, 12mo) give ample facilities for the study of his history and writings.

Translations of the Proslogium and of the Cur Deus Homo are given in the Bibliotheca Sacra, vols. viii., xi., and xii. St., called Badurius after the name of his family (Badaglo), was born at Milan, 1086. He succeeded, in 1061, his uncle, Pope Alexander II., as bishop of Lucca, which see he resigned in order to become a monk at Cluny. He returned to his see at the express order of Pope Gregory VI., who employed him for important missions, which involved him in the anti-pope Gilbert, and a treatise against the right of the secular princes to dispose of the property of the church. The two former may be found in Canisius, Antiqua lectiones, and in the Bibl. Patrum. The life of Anselm was written by the Jesuit Rota (Notiz di San Anselmo, Verona, 1773, 8vo).—Landon, s. v.

Anselm, son of the Margrave Otto the Rich of Ascania, became bishop of Havelberg in 1126, and archbishop of Ravenna in 1154; was Aporciasius of Emperor Lothaire II., and was sent as an ambassador to the emperor of Constantinople for the purpose of effecting a union between the Roman and Greek Churches. He died in 1159. He wrote Three Books of Dialogues with the advocates of the Arians, with the object of putting the points in dispute between the Greek and Roman Churches, given by D'Achery in the Spicilegium, i, 161 (new ed.).—Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, ii, 865; Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1149; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Anselm, dean of the cathedral church of Laon, flourished at the end of the 11th century. He died July 13, 1117. He added the books of the Old and New Testaments with an Interlinear Glossary, compiled from the fathers, which has been several times printed, with the additions of Iyya and others, especially at Antwerp, in 1684; also, the Commentary on St. Matthew, and Explanations of various Passages in the Gospels, Epistles of St. Paul, Apocalypse, etc., which are printed under the name of Anselm of Canterbury, are attributed by many writers to this author. But Dupin asserts that they are from the pen of Hervaeus, a monk of Bourg, near Die—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1188; Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, ii, 364; Landon, s. v.

ANSWER (usually γανων, ἀποκρινομαι) has other significations in Scripture besides the common one in the sense of reply. 1. Moses having composed a thanksgiving after the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam, it is said, "made song" (Deut. xvi, 11). Then we see the men on one side, and Miriam with the women on the other side, sung the same song, as it were, in two choruses or divisions, of which one "answered" the other (Exod. xv, 21). So also 1 Sam. xxix, 5, where they sung in distinct choruses; comp. Num. xxxi, 17.

2. This word is likewise taken for "to answer," or "to defend judicially" (Gen. xxx, 83; Deut. xxxi, 21; Hose. v, 5). 3. To "answer" is likewise taken in a bad sense, as when it is said that a son answered his father insolently, or a servant his master (John xviii, 22; Rom. ix, 20; 2 Cor. i, 9). 4. To "answer" is also used in Scripture for the announcement of a discourse, when no reply to an interrogation or objection be required. This mode of speaking is often used by the Evangelists: "And Jesus answered and said." It is a Hebrew idiom (Job iii, 2; Cant. ii, 10; Zech. iii, 4; iv, 11, 12; Matt. xi, 20; xii, 38; xvii, 9; Mark i, 5; Luke vii, 40). See AFFIRMATIVE.

ANSWER OF CONSCIENCE (ανωτερωσις γνωσις), a phrase occurring 1 Pet. iii, 21, very variously interpreted, but apparently signifying simply the ability to address God in prayer (as if a response to His searching of the heart) with a conscience free from a sense of guilt, or the seeking after Him with a pure conscience (see Afford, in loc.). See CONSCIENCE.
regard to Solomon's words respecting the ant, Kirby and Spence are of opinion 'that, if they are properly considered, it will be found that the interpretation which seems to favor the ancient error respecting ants has been fathered upon them rather than fairly deduced from them. He does not affirm that the ant, which he describes as so prodigious a store bearer, and as gathering her food (namely, such food as is suited to her) in the summer and harvest (that is, when it is most plentiful), and thus shows her wisdom and prudence by using the advantages offered to her.'

It is true that Col. Sykes speaks (Transactions of Entomol. Soc. ii, 108) of a species of Indian ant which he calls Atta proovidae, so called from the fact of his having found a large store of grass-seeds in its nest; but the amount of that gentleman's observations merely go to show that this ant carries seeds under ground, and brings them again to the surface after they have got wet during the monsoons, apparently to dry. 'There is not,' writes Mr. F. Smith (Catalogue of the Formicidae in the British Museum, 1688, p. 169), 'any evidence of the seeds having been stored for food;' he observes that the processory ant of Brazil (Ectomoma cerbaloce) carries immense quantities of portions of leaves into its underground nests, and that it was supposed that these leaves were for food; but that Mr. Bates satisfied himself that the leaves were for the purpose of lining the channels of the nest, and not for food. There is no evidence that any portion of plants ever forms an article of their diet. The fact is, that ants seem to delight in running away with almost any thing they find—small portions of sticks, leaves, little stones—as any one can testify who has cared to watch the habits of this insect. This will explain the erroneous opinion which the ancients held with respect to that part of the economy of the ant now under consideration; nor is it, perhaps, necessary to conclude that the error originated in observers mistaking the cocoons for grains of corn, to which they bear much resemblance. It is scarcely credible that Aristole, one of the first investigators of this insect, storing up grains of corn, should have been so far misled, or have been such bad observers, as to have taken the cocoons for grains. Ants do carry off grains of corn, just as they carry off other things, not, however, as stated, for food, but for their nests. 'They are great robbers,' says Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 350), 'and plunder by night as well as by day; and the farmer must keep a sharp eye to his floor, or they will abstract a large quantity of grain in a single night.' See CIBERN.

It is right to state that a well-known entomologist, the Rev. F. W. Hope, in a paper 'On some Doubts respecting the British Ants' (Trans. Entom. Soc. ii, 211), is of opinion that Col. Sykes' observations do tend to show that there are species of exotic ants which store up food for winter consumption; but it must be remembered that Mr. Bates' investigations are subsequent to the publication of that paper. (See ANTS.

The particular species of ant referred to by Solomon has not been identified; and, in fact, ants have only latterly become the subjects of accurate observation. The investigations of Latrille (Histoire Naturelle des Fourmis, Par. 1802), Gould, Geer, Huber, and Kirby and Spence, have dispelled many erroneous notions respecting them, and revealed much interesting information concerning their domestic pollity, language, migrations, affections, passions, virtues, ways, diversions, etc. (see Penny Cyclopædia, a. v.).
The following facts are selected as relevant to scriptural illustration. Ants dwell together in societies;
and although they have "no guide, overseer, or ruler," yet they have all one soul, and are animated by one object—their own welfare, and the welfare of each other. Each individual strenuously pursues his own peculiar duties, and regards (except in the case of females), and is regarded by, every other member of the republic with equal respect and affection. They devote the utmost attention to their young. The egg is cleaned and licked, and gradually expands under this treatment till the worm is hatched, which is then tended and fed with the most affectionate care. They continue their attendance to the apha, or chrysalis, which is the third transformation. They heap up the pupae, which greatly resemble so many grains of wheat,
or rather rice, by hundreds in their spacious lodges,
watch them in an attitude of defence, carry them out to enjoy the radiance of the sun, and remove them to different situations in the nest, according to the required degree of temperature. When the pupae are open and, at the precise moment of the transformation, disintarrth
the new-born insect of its habiliments.—Kitto, s. v.

To some readers it may seem strange that ants should be considered four-winged insects, whereas they may have never seen a winged individual among the thousands of ants they may have looked upon.
The fact is, this tribe presents the curious anomaly (parallelled also in the Termites, or white ants, of an-orther order) of three forms of individuals—we might almost say, three sexes. The males and females are furnished with four wings on their leaving the chryalis state, but soon drop them spontaneously. These are comparatively few in number; but there is another race, which are the workers, and which constitute the main body of the teeming population, which never have any wings at all. These are sexless, but are considered as imperfectly developed females.

The Arabians held the wisdom of the ant in such estimation, that they used to place one of these insects in the hands of a newly-born infant, repeating these words: "May the boy turn out clever and skilful." Hence, in Arabic, with the noun nemeh, "an ant," is con-ected the adjective nemil, "quick," "clever" (Bochart, Hieroz., iii, 491). The Talmudists, too, attributed great wisdom to this insect. It was, say they, from beholding the wonderful ways of the ant
that the following expression originated: "Thy justice, O God, reaches to the heavens" (Gen. iv, 5.)

It may not be out of place to adduce the parallel economy of a tribe of insects, which, though they belong to another zoological order, so greatly resemble ants in their most remarkable peculiarities as to be popularly associated with them. We refer to the white ants (Termites), so abundant in all tropical countries.
These, too, form populous societies, living in commonwealth, in elaborate structures, which are constructed by the united labors of the whole. We have not any detailed accounts of the Oriental species; but in the minute and careful description, by Smethian, of the African kinds, he speaks of their magazines of stored

food. These are "chambers of clay, always well filled with provisions, which, to the naked eye, seem to consist of the rest of the wood, over which the termites destroy, but are found by the microscope to be principally the gums and inspissated juices of plants.
These are thrown together in little masses, some of which are finer than others, and resemble the sugar
about preserved fruits; others are like tears of gum,
one quite transparent, another like amber, a third brown, and a fourth quite opaque, as we see often in parcels of ordinary gums."—Fairbairn, s. v.

It may be observed that the word canemal, (κανεμαλ), translated "frost" in our version of Ps.
xxviii, 47, is thought by many to refer to some species of ant or kindred insect destructive of trees.

Antarickas (Ἀνταρίκας, Ptol. v, 15, § 16; Hiero-cles, p. 716), a city of Phoenicia, situated on the mainland opposite the island of Aradus (whence its name), which latter is alone referred to in Scripture (Gen. x, 16; 1 Chron. i, 16). See ARVAD. According to the Antonine Itinerary and the Peutinger Table, it was 24 Roman miles from Balanes and 50 from Tripolis (Reland, Palaeis, p. 216, 818). It was rebuilt, A.D. 246, by the Emperor Constantius, who named it Constantia after himself (Cedren. Histor. p. 246), but it appears under its old name by the subsequent writers and councils. During the Crusades it was a populous and well fortified town (William of Tyre, vii, 15), and was known as Tortosa (Tasso, Gerusalem. lib. i, 6; Wilken, Kreuz, i, 253; ii, 200; vii, 410, 740). It is now a mean village of 241 taxable Moslems and 44 Greeks (Biblioth. Sacra, 1848, p. 247). The walls, of hewn beehive stones, are still remaining (Michaud, Mem. sur

our authentic information respecting this long and interesting period is contained in forty-nine verses of Genesis (v, 6–vi, 8), more than half of which are occupied with a list of names and ages, invaluable for chronology, but conveying no particulars regarding the primeval state of man. The information thus afforded, although so limited in extent, is, however, eminently suggestive (see Clarkson, Antediluvian Re-

ditional information, though less direct, may be safely
deduced from the history of Noah and the first men

Noah and his sons, the new families of men were in a condition to inherit, and did inherit, such sciences and arts as existed before the Flood. This enables us to understand how settled and civilized communities were established, and large and magnificent works undertaken within a few centuries after the Deluge.

The scriptural notice shows [see ADAM] that the father of men was something more than "the noble savage," or rather the grown-up infant, which some have represented him. He was an instructed man; and the immediate descendants of a man so instructed could not be ignorant or uncivilized people. It is not necessary, indeed, to suppose that they possessed at first more cultivation than they required; and for a good while they did not stand in need of that which results from or is connected with the settlement of men in organized communities. They probably had this before the Deluge, and at first were possessed of whatever knowledge or civilization their agricultural and pastoral pursuits required. Such were their pursuits from the first; for it is remarkable that of the strictly savage or hunting condition of life there is not the slightest trace before the Deluge. After that event himself, although a human outcast, was not a savage, and did not belong to hunting tribes of men. In fact, barbarism is not discoverable before the confusion of tongues, and was, in all likelihood, a degeneracy from a state of cultivation, eventually produced in particular communities by that great social convulsion. At least, that a degree of cultivation was the primitive condition of man, from which savage life in particular quarters was a degeneracy, and that he has not, as generally has been supposed, worked himself up from an original savage state to his present condition, has been powerfully argued by Dr. Philip Lindley (Am. Bib. Rep. iv. 377-298; vi. 1-27), and is strongly corroborated by the conclusions of modern ethnographical research; from which we learn that, while it is easy for men to degenerate into savages, no example has been found of savages rising into civilization but by an impulse from without administered by a more civilized people; and that, even with such impulse, the inerces of established habits is with difficulty overcome. The aboriginal traditions of all civilized nations describe them as receiving their civilization from without—generally through the instrumentality of foreign colonists: and history affords no example of a case parallel to that which must have occurred if the primitive races of men, being originally savages, had civilized themselves.

All that was peculiar in the circumstances of the antediluvian period was eminently favorable to civilization. The longevity of the earlier seventeen or twenty centuries of human existence is a theme containing many problems. It may be here referred to for the purpose of indicating the advantages which most necessarily have therefrom accrued to the mechanical arts. In pottery, mining, metallurgy, clothmaking, the applications of heat and mixtures, etc., it is universally known that there is a tacit of manipulation which no instruction can teach, which the possessor cannot even describe, yet with which returns powerful and unfailing, within his narrow range, to a degree almost incredible; and when he has reached his limit of life he is confident that, had he another sixty or seventy years to draw upon, he could carry his art to a perfection hitherto unknown. Something like this must have been acquired by the antediluvians; and indeed it is strongly corroborated by the conclusions of those who would increase the precision and success within the range. See LONGEVITY.

By reason of their length of life the antediluvians had also more encouragement in protracted undertakings, and stronger inducements to the erection of superfluous buildings, temples, and churches; and monuments, public and private, then exist at present. They might reasonably calculate on reaping the benefit of their labor and expenditure. The earth itself was probably more equally fertile, and its climate more uniformly healthful and more auspicious to longevity, and consequently to every kind of mental and corporeal exertion and enterprise, than has been the case since the great convulsion which took place at the Deluge.

But probably the greatest advantage enjoyed by the antediluvians, and which must have been in the highest degree favorable to their advancement in the arts of life, was the uniformity of language. Nothing could have been so powerful to equalize, and promote whatever advantages were enjoyed, and to prevent any portion of the human race from degenerating into savage life. See CONFUSION OF TONGUES.

The opinion that the old world was acquainted with astronomy (q. v.) is chiefly founded on the ages of Seth and his descendants being particularly set down (Gen. v. 6 sq.), and the precise year, month, and day being stated in which Noah and his family, etc., entered the ark, and made their exodus from it (Gen. vii. 11; viii. 15). The distinctions of day and night, and the lunar month, were of course observed; and the thirteenth rotation of the moon, compared with the sun's return to his primary position in the southern heaven, the day and night produced on the earth by his return, would point out the year. See MONTH. The variation between the rotations of the moon and sun easily became discoverable from the difference which in a very few years would be exhibited in the seasons; and hence it may be supposed that the calculation of time might be by lunar months or revolutions, yet the return of vegetation would dictate the solar year. See YEAR. The longevity of the antediluvian patriarchs, and the simplicity of their employments, favor this conjecture, which receives additional strength from the fact that the Hebrew for year, yahr, implies an iteration, a return to the same point, a repetition (Genesis, Thee. Heb. p. 1448); and it is also remarkable that the Indians, Chinese, Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, and other nations, all deduce their origin from personages said to be versed in astronomy. See TIME. The knowledge of zoology (q. v.) which Adam possessed was doubtless imparted to his children; and we find that Noah was so well informed on this subject as to be able to distinguish between clean and unclean beasts, and that his instructions extended to birds of every kind (Gen. xi. 2-4). A knowledge of some essential principles in botany (q. v.) is shown by the fact that Adam knew how to distinguish "seed-bearing herb" and "tree in which is a seed-bearing fruit," with an every great certainty (Gen. i. 20, 29). The trees of life and of knowledge are the only ones mentioned before the Fall; but in the history of Noah the vine, the olive, and the wood of which the ark was made (Gen. vi. 14; viii. 11; ix. 20) are spoken of in such a manner as clearly to intimate a knowledge of their qualities. With mineralogy (q. v.) the antediluvians were at least as far acquainted as to distinguish metals; and in the description of the garden of Eden gold and precious stones are noticed (Gen. ii. 12).

That the antediluvians were acquainted with music (q. v.) is certain; for it is expressly said that Jubal (while Adam was still alive) became "the father of those who handle the lyre, &c., and the pipes, psaltery" (Gen. iv. 21). The former see H; the latter see LYRE. The former were a stringed instrument resembling a lyre; and the latter [see LYRE] was without doubt the Pandean pipe, composed of reeds of different lengths joined together. This clearly intimates considerable progress in the science; for it is not probable that the art of playing on wind and on stringed instruments was discovered at the same time. We may rather suppose that the principles of harmony, having been discovered in the one, were by analogy transferred to the other; and that Jubal, by repeated efforts, became the first performer on the harp and the pipe. See Ante.

It is impossible to speak with any decision respecting the form or forms of government which prevailed before the Deluge. There is a slight intimation of a form of government which was founded on the subject seem to favor the notion that the particular governments were patriarchal, subject to a general theocratical control, God himself manifestly interfering to uphold the good and check the wicked. The right of property was recognized, for Abel and Jubal possessed flocks, and Cain built a city. Among the descendants of Cain, however, sacrifices certainly existed (Gen. iv. 4), and some think that the Sabbath was observed; while some interpret the words, "Then men began to call upon the name of the Lord" (Gen. iv. 26), to signify that public worship then began to be practiced. From Noah's familiarity with the distinction of clean and unclean (Lev. xi. 2), it is evident that the Levitical rules on this subject were by no means new when laid down in the code of Moses. See Worship.

Marriage (q. v.), and all the relations springing from it, existed from the beginning (Gen. ii. 25-28); and, although polygamy was known among the antediluvians (Gen. iv. 19), it was most probably unlawful; for it must have been obvious that, if more than one wife had been necessary for a man, the Lord would not have confided the first man to one woman. The marriage of the sons of Seth with the daughters of Cain appears to have been prohibited, since the marriage was the result of the concupiscence of Adam's family of Seth so forcibly expressed in this short passage, "All flesh had corrupted its way upon the earth" (Gen. vii. 11). This sin, described Orientally as an intermarriage of "the sons of God" with "the daughters of men" (Gen. vi. 2), appears to have been in its results one of the grand causes of the Deluge; for if the family of Seth had remained pure and obedient to God, he would doubtless have spared the world for their sake, as he would have spared Sodom and Gomorrah had ten righteous men been found there, and as he would have spared his own people, the Jews, had they not corrupted themselves by inoffensive marriages with the heathen. Even the longevity of the antediluvians may have contributed to this ruinous result. Vastly more time was upon their hands than was needful for clearing woodlands, draining swamps, and other laborious and tedious processes, in addition to their ordinary agriculture and care of cattle; see Agriculture (q.v.). That the position of Noah, who, immediately after the Flood, became a husbandman, and planted a vineyard. He also knew the method of fermenting the juice of the grape; for it is said he drank of the wine, which produced inebriation (Gen. ix. 20, 21). This knowledge he doubtless obtained from his progenitors anterior to the destruction of the old world.

Pasturage (q. v.) appears to have been coeval with husbandry. Abel was a keeper of sheep, while his brother was a tiller of the ground (Gen. iv. 2); but there is no necessity for supposing that Cain's husbandry excluded the care of cattle. The class of tenacious materials is, of those given by the Bible, the most probable that they may move with their flocks and herds from one pasture-ground to another—did not originate till comparatively late after the Fall; for Jubal, the seventh from Adam in the line of Cain, is said to have been the "father" or founder of that mode of life (Gen. iv. 20). The原材料 of cloth is involved in the mention of the linen, seeing that excellent tent-coverings are even at this day made of skins; and we know that skins were the first articles of clothing used by fallen man (Gen. iii. 21). The same doubt applies to the garment with which the sons of Noah covered their inebriated father (Gen. viii. 22). Many have doubt that, in the course of so long a period, the art of manufacturing cloths of hair and wool, if not of linen or cotton, had been acquired. See Weaving.
the natives as having some affinity to cattle, and others delicate and rather small, that may be compared with young deer, to which, in truth, they bear a general resemblance. See DEER. The antelopes, considered as a family, may be distinguished from all others by their uniting the light and graceful forms of deer with the permanent horns of goats, excepting that in general their horns are round, annulated, and marked with strie, slender, and variously inflected, according to the subdivision or group to which they belong. They have usually large, soft, and beautiful eyes, tear-pits beneath them, and round tails. They are often provided with tufts of hair, or brushes, to protect the fore-knees from injury; they have inguinal pores; and are distinguished by very great powers of speed. Among the first of the subordinate groups is the subgenus oryx, consisting of five or six species, of which we have to notice at least three. The oryces are all about the size of the stag of Europe, or larger, with long, annulated, slender horns, rising in continuation of the plane of the forehead, slightly divergent, regularly but not greatly curved, entirely straight or lyrate, and from three feet to three feet eight inches in length. The head is rather clumsy, and more or less pied with black and white; the neck ewed, or arched, like that of the camel; the carcass bulky, compared with the legs, which are slender, firm, and capable of sustaining great action; the tail extends only to the heel, or hough; the hair on the shoulders and neck is invariably directed forward, thus, no doubt, keeping the animal cool in flight (see Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.; Henglin, Antelope Nordost-Afrikas, Jen, 1864).

1. The jackal or "the fallow-deer" (Sept. Ἰωκανίας, Vulg. caprea), but the oryx leucoryx of the moderns, the true oryx of the ancients, and of Niebuhr, who quotes E. Jonas, and points out the Chaldean jackal, and describes it as a great goat. The Eastern Arabs still use the name jaouar. The leu-

Oryx Leucoryx, or White Antelope.

Oryx Taeo, or Nubian Antelope.

Oryx, as the name implies, is white, having a black mark down the nose, black cheeks and jowl, the legs, from the elbow and heel to the pasterial joints, black, and the lower half of the thighs usually, and often the lower flanks, bright rufous. The species now resides in pairs, in small families, and not as frequently singly, on the mountains ranges along the sandy districts in the desert of Eastern Arabia, and on the banks of the Lower Euphrates; and may extend as far eastward as the west bank of the Indus, feeding on shrubby scacias, such as tortilia and Eirenebergii. It was, no doubt, formerly, if not at present, found in Arabia Petraea, and in the eastern territories of the people of Israel; and from the circumstance of the generic name of wild cow or bull being common to this, as to other allied species, it was equally caught with nets and with the noose, and styled נון (tau, to, thee). To this species may be referred more particularly some of the notions respecting unicorns, since, the forehead being narrow, and the horns long and slender, if one be broken at the root, the remaining one stands so nearly on the medial line, that, taken in connection with its white-colored hair, to uncrirical inspection, a single-horned animal might appear to be really present. By nature vicious and menacing, from what may be observed in the Egyptian paintings of the industry which impose exercised, we may conclude that human art, even in a very early age, may have contributed to make artificial unicorns; and most probably those seen by some of the earlier European travellers were of this kind. See FALLOW DEER.

2. The teo (Nepi, Deut. xiv. 5, "wild ox"); Sept. ἡσπαργος, Vulg. oryx) or to (Nepi, Isa. ii. 20, "wild bull"); Sept. σπαργος, Vulg. oryx; the oryx taeo, or Nubian oryx, of Ham. Smith) is either a species or distinct variety of leucoryx. The male, being more noted high at the shoulder, is taller than that of the leucoryx; the horns are longer, the body comparatively lighter, and every limb indicative of vigor and elasticity; on the forehead there is a white spot, distinctly marked by the particular direction of the hair turning downward before the inner angle of the eye to near the month, leaving the nose rufous, and forming a kind of letter A. Under the eye, toward the cheek, there is a darkish spot, not very distinct; the limbs, belly, and tail are white; the body mixed white and red, most reddish about the neck and lower hams. It is possible that the name taeo or teo is connected with the white spot on the chest. This species resides chiefly in the desert west of the Nile, but is most likely not unknown in Arabia; certain it is that both are figured on Egyptian monuments (the Antelope defassa of Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. iii, 18, cut 327), the leucoryx being distinguished by horns less curved, and by some indications of black on the face. See WILD Ox.

3. The oryx addax has been known to the Hebrews by the name of נון (dahon), Deut. xiv. 5, "pygarg," Sept. πυγαργος, Vulg. pygargus. It is three feet seven inches at the shoulder, has the same structure as the others, but is somewhat higher at the croup; it has a coarse beard under the gullet, a black scalp and forehead, divided from the eyes and nose by a white bar on each side, passing along the brows and down the face to the cheek, and connected with one another between the eyes. The general color of the fur is white, with the head, neck, and shoulders more or less liver-color gray; but what distinguishes it most from the others are the horns, which modern times the word is used in a more confined sense, being applied to certain passages, usually taken out of the Scriptures, and adapted to particular solemnity. Anthems were first introduced in the reformed service of the English Church in the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Anthimus (Martyr), bishop of Nicomedia, in Bithynia; beheaded in 303 by order of Diocletian, who at the same time put to death, in various ways, many others of the Christians. To the Latins the commemorations on September 27th.—Eusebius, Hist. lib. viii, cap. 4 and 6.

Anthimus, bishop of Trebizond, and, in 535, patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed by Emperor Justinian as a Monophysite, and his works burned.

Anthologion (Ἀνθολογία), in Latin, Florilegium, a term used figuratively, like the classical word Anthology (Ἀνθολογία, floral discourse), literally "a garland of flowers," hence a collection of short sentences from celebrated authors. It is the technical name of one of the Church books in use among the Greeks. It contains principally the offices which are sung on the festivals of our Lord, the Virgin, and the chief saints; then those called "communia," appointed for the festivals of the prophets, apostles, martyrs, pontiffs, etc.—Sulzer, Thesaurus, p. 945.

Anthony, St., the patriarch of Comesolites, and virtuous founder of monasticism, was born A.D. 253, at Coma, in Egypt. His parents left him large possessions, but the words of our Lord to the rich young ruler so impressed his mind that he sold his possessions, gave the money to the poor, and retired into the desert, where he led an ascetic life. For more than four years he dwelt apart, first in a cave, and then in a ruinous house, having no communication with mankind but by a messenger, who brought him the necessaries of life. The fame of his sanctity attracted crowds of disciples, and he left his solitude to gather them into a fraternity. At the time of his death they numbered 15,000. He was visited by heathen philosophers, and Constantine the Great wrote to him, entreating his prayers. "Only in exceptional cases did Anthony leave his solitude, and then he made a powerful impression on both Christians and heathens with his hair dress and his emaciated, ghost-like form. In the year 311, during the persecution of Maximianus, Anthony was in Alexandria, in the hope of himself gaining the martyr's crown. He visited the confessors in the mines and prisons, encouraged them before the tribunal, accompanied them to the scaffold; but no one ventured to lay hands on the saint of the wilderness. In the year 356, at the hundred years old, he showed himself for the second and last time in the metropolis of Egypt to bear witness for the orthodox faith of his friend Athanasius against Arianism, and in a few days converted more heathen and heretics than had otherwise been gained in a whole year. He declared the Arian denial of the divinity of Christ worse than the venom of the serpent, and no better than heathenism, which worshipped the creature instead of the Creator. He would have nothing to do with heretics, and warned his disciples against intercourse with them. Athanasius attended him to the gate of the city, where he cast out an evil spirit from a girl. An invitation to stay longer in Alexandria he declined accepting. "As a fish out of water, so a monk out of his solitude dies," Imitating his example, the monks afterward forewook the wilderness in swarms whenever orthodoxy was in danger, and went in long processions, with wax tapers and responsive singing, through the streets, or appeared in little circles contending for the orthodox faith with all the energy of fanaticism, often even with physical force." (Hook). In his last hours he retired to a mountain with two of his disciples, whom he desired to bury him like the patriars, and keep secret the place of his burial, thus rebuking the superstitious passion for relics. His words are thus reported by Athanasius: "Do not let them carry my body into Egypt, lest they store it in their churches, for I have reasons for coming to this mountain was to hinder this. You know I have ever reproved those who have done this, and charged them to cease from the custom. Bury, then, my body in the earth, in obedience to my word, so that no one may know the place, except yourself. Let no one, therefore, be restored to me incorruptible by the Saviour. Distribute my garments as follows: let Athanasius, the bishop, have the one sheepskin and the garment I sleep on, which he gave me new, and which has grown old with me. Let Serapion, the bishop, have the other sheepskin. Let each of them keep it for himself, to remember me. And now, my children, farewell: Anthony is going, and is no longer with you." He died in 856, being one hundred and five years old, and unburdened by old age. His whole conduct indicates the predominance of a glowing and yet gloomy fancy, which is the proper condition of religious asceticism. Like many of the mystics, he affected to despise human science; one of his reported sayings is, "He who has a sound mind has no need of learning." At the same time, Athanasius states that he was a diligent student of the Scriptures. "The whole Nicene age venerated in Anthony a model saint. This fact brings out most characteristically the vast difference between the ancient and the modern, the old Catholic and the evangelical spirit of Protestant conception of the nature of Christian religion. The specifically Christian element in the life of Anthony, especially as measured by the Pauline standard, is very small. Nevertheless, we can but admire the miserable magnificence, the simple, rude grandeur of this hermit sanctity, even in its abflection. Anthony concealed under his sheepskin a childlike humility, an amiable simplicity, a rare energy of will, and a glowing love to God, which maintained itself for almost ninety years in the absence of the comforts and pleasures of natural life, and triumphed over all the temptations of the flesh. By piety alone, without the help of education or learning, he became one of the most remarkable and influential men in the history of the ancient church. Even heathen contemporaries could not withhold from him their reverence, and the celebrated philosopher Synesius, afterward a bishop, before his conversion reckoned Anthony among those to whom he addressed his letters. He called the place of reasonings, and natural power of mind makes schooling needless" (Hook). Although the father of monachism, St. Anthony is not the author of any monastic "rules," those which the monks of the Eastern schismatic sects attribute to him are the production of St. Basil. A council of his life and miracles are given in the Acta Synodorum of the Bollandists, under the date of the 17th of January, on which day his festival is kept. Many marvelous stories are told of him. The principal source of information concerning him is his life by Athanasius (Opera, vol. 1, ed. Benedict), which is the one work ever to be much censured. On this biography Isaac Taylor remarks, "It may be read with edification, taken for just as much as it is worth; but as an exemplar of the Christian character one may find as good, nay, some much better, among the monkish records of the worst times of Romanism. In all these fifty-four pages, scarcely so much as one sentence of the life of St. Anthony is subject to the sentiments which are distinctively Christian. There is indeed an unimpassable orthodoxy and a thoroughlygoing submissiveness in regard to church authority; and there is a plenty of Christianized scoffing, and there is more than enough of dogmatism, and quite enough of pride, to form a kind of sublimation of the prophylactic work of Christ; barely a word indicating any personal feeling of the ascetic's own need of that propitiatio as the ground of his hope. Not a word of justification by faith; not a word of the gracious influence of the Spirit in renewing and cleansing the heart; not a word responding to any of those signal passages of Scripture which make the gospel 'glad tidings' to guilty man. Drop a very few phrases borrowed from the Scriptures, and substitute a few drawn from the Koran, and then this memoir of St. Anthony, by Athanasius, might serve, as to its temper, spirit, and substance, nearly as well for a Mohammedan derivation as for a Christian saint" (Taylor, Ancient Christianity, i, 275). His seven epistles to the different monasteries in Egypt, translated out of the Egyptian tongue into Greek, are given with the commentaries of Dionsius the Carthusian upon Dionysius the Areopagite, printed at Cologne, 1850, and in the Bibl. Pa- trum, iv, 85—Bibliotheque Sacra, vol. i, 408 sq.; Giese- ler, Ch. Hist., 2, 27; Grund, Ch. Hist., ii, 228 sq.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, i, 165; Newman, Church of the Fathers (London, 1849); Hook, Eccles. Biography, i, 229; Schaff, in Meth. Quart. Rev. 1864, p. 29 sq.

St. Anthony's Fire.—Butler, in his Lives of the Saints, gives the following account of the origin of this name: "In 969 a pestilential erysipelas distemper, called the sacred fire, swept off great numbers in most provinces of France; public prayers and processions were ordered against this scourge. At length it pleased God to grant many miraculous cures of this dreadful distemper to those who implored his mercy through the intercession of St. Anthony, especially before his relics at La Mothe St. Didier, near Vienna, in Dauphiné, in which there were deposited was resorted to by great numbers of pilgrims, and his patronage was implored over the whole kingdom against this disease." The "order of Canons Regular of St. Anthony," a religious fraternity founded about 1140 for the relief of persons afflicted with the fire of St. Anthony, survived in France till 1790. See St. Anthony, St. ORDER OF. Anthony, St., of Padua, born at Liebon in 1195, was at first an Augustinian monk; joined in 1220 the Franciscans, went in 1221 as missionary to Africa, lived for some time as hermit in Sicily, labored with great effect as preacher of repentance throughout Italy, and was the leader of the right party in the Franciscan order against the mitigations introduced by the general Elias. See Franciscans. Tradition ascribes to him the most astounding miracles, e. g. that the fishes came to listen to his open-air sermons, etc. He died at Padua in 1231, and was canonized in 1232. He was born on June 13. He is patron saint of Padua, and also venerated with great distinction in Portugal. His works (sermons, a mystical explanation of the Scriptures, etc.) are of no great importance. They have been published, together with those of St. Francis of Assisi, by De la Heye, Antwerp, 1628. See Wadding, Annales minores; Treibich and Bellarm, De Script. eccles. ; Dirka, Life of St. An- thony of Padua (transl. from the French, N. Y. 1866). Anthony De Dominis. See Dominus. Anthony De Roselli, of Arezzo, about the year 1450 was made secretary of the Emperor Frederick III. He died at Padua in 1467, leaving a work entitled Monarchia, in five parts, on the powers of the emperor and the pope, in which he endeavors to show that the pope has not authority in temporal matters, and that in this respect he is subject to the great emperors. This remarkable work was printed at Venice in 1483, 1587, and is to be found in Goldastus, Monarchia, i, 592—556. It is, of course, placed upon the Index Expurgatorius.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1450; Landon, s. v.

Anthony of Lellia, of, with a Latin name, Antonius Nebrodiensis, a Spanish theologian and historian, born in 1442, died in 1522, was at one time secretary by Cardinal Ximenes professor at the university Al- cala de Henares, and colaborer at the Complutensian Biblia Polyglota. He was also biographer of Ferdinand the Catholic. He wrote, besides a number of works on classical antiquity, a Dictionarium quadruplex (Alcalá, 1382, fol.); Quinquaginta locorum S. Scripturae non vulgaris marvarum (Paris, 1590; BSB) remarks about Anthony in an exegetical point of view, because it takes the original text for its basis.—Prescott, Ferdinand and Isabella, i, 456.

Anthony, St. Orders of. 1. The monastic orders of the Eastern (Greek, Armenian, Jacobite, Coptic, Abyssinian) churches call themselves either after St. Anthony or St. Basil. Neither Anthony himself nor his disciples had founded a religious order, but when the rule of Basil began to spread in the Eastern churches, and most of the monks called themselves after him, some, out of veneration for Anthony, preferred to assume his name. Among the Eastern churches, in union with Rome, the Greeks, Maronites, and United Armenians have orders of Antonian monks. The Chaldeans have only one convent, Mt. Hormes, called after St. Hormisdas. The Maronite Antonians are subdivided into three classes: the Aleppines, who have their monasteries in the cities, and the Baladites and Libanenses, whose monasteries are on the Lebanon. Together, they have about 60 monasteries, with 1500 monks. The Armenian Antonians are divided into two classes—an older branch on the Lebanon, and a younger one established by Mekitar. See Mekitar. The Antonians of the Eastern churches together number about 3000.—Helyot, Ordo Religii, i, 604; P. Karl vom hell. Alten, Jahrbuch, 1869, p. 70.

2. A military order, founded by Albert of Bavaria, count of Hainault, Holland, and Zeeland, in 1382, when he was about to make war on the Turks, and styled it "The Order of the Knights of St. Anthony." They wear a collar of gold, fashioned like the girdle of a hermit, to which is appended a bell and crutch, such as are represented in pictures of St. Anthony.—Helyot, Ordo Religii, i, 606; Landon, s. v.

3. A congregation of Regular Canons, founded in 1055 at Vienna (see Reinbold, De Antonianis, Lips. 1787). The so-called "relics of St. Anthony" were brought from the East in 1079 by Josselein of Tournai, who founded for their reception the "Church of St. Anthony," in La Mothe St. Didier, of which town he was lord. The disease vulgarly called "St. Anthony's fire" was then very prevalent; and it is reported that wonderful cures were wrought at the shrine of St. Anthony. The Canons, assuming the character of Anthony, voted all their property to the work, assisted by seven others, built, for their accommodation, a hospital in the town. One account says that Gaston's son had been cured, and that this charity was the fulfillment of a vow. It is to these hospitalers that the order of St. Anthony owes its origin. The order soon took root in most of the kingdoms of Europe, and even in Asia and Africa. Gaston was made grand-master of the order, and all the other establishments recognised that at La Mothe, or, as it came now to be called, St. Anthony, as their chief. Eventually, all these houses became so many commanderies, which were divided into (1.) Regular commanderies, which were subject to the city of St. Antony; and (2.) Subalterm, i. e. dependent on one or other of the general commanderies. The hospitalers were bound to a uniform and common mode of life, and bore a figure resembling the Greek Tnu on their dress. In 1227, Aimon de Montagni, the seventeenth master, prescribing that the malady which had been the origin of the order was fast disappearing, and fearing lest, with the cessation of the disease, the order itself should cease, demanded of Pope Boniface VIII a new form of constitution. This the pope granted, and the new hospitalers of St. Anthony became Regular Canons, following the rule of St. Augustine; and the church built by Josselein, being united to the priory of Benedictines, which previously existed there, and which was ceded to the new order, together formed the abbey-in-chief of the order of St. Anthony, which in after ages received vast possessions and privileges. As many as thirty new hospitals fell into decay in the 18th century, and was united in 1775 to the order of Malta, which it enriched by the addition of 42 houses. The Antonians soon repeated of having entered this union, and reclaimed against it in 1780, but in vain. A single commandery, Hoechst, in Germany, existed until 1808, when the order became entirely extinct.—Helyot, Ordo Religii, i, 604; Landon, s. v.

Anthropology (ανθρωπολογία, a discourse on man) is that part of scientific theology which treats of man, his nature, relations, etc., as distinguished from theology proper (the doctrine of God) and Christology (the doctrine of Christ). Theological anthropology distinguishes itself from physiological anthropology by viewing man not as a natural being, but in his relation to God. It may be divided into two chief parts: the doctrine of the original condition of man before the fall, and the doctrine of the fall, the latter of which through the fall came into the human race, propagated itself, and took effect in every individual. It must be admitted that a scientific anthropology is not possible in theology without physiological anthropology, that is, without a knowledge of the natural organism of man. Its object is to prove, first, that anthropology is only the basis of the theological, and the complete knowledge of man in an anatomical, physiological, and even psychological point of view is unable to disclose the religious nature of man. All that we may learn of the latter in a psychological way is a view of man in his individualism, as a sample of the race; but only the history of mankind in connection with the revelations of God can open to us a full look upon his religious nature. It is therefore safe to assert that, as theology must be anthropological, thus anthropology must be theological; and Harless (preface to his *Manual of Ethical Theor.) is right in recognizing the community of language, who do not hesitate to call psychological researches on the nature of man. The question of body and soul (or, according to the Trichotomists, body, soul, and spirit), as well as the question on the origin of the soul (pre-existence, traducianism, and creationism), belong to theological anthropology only in so far as they may contribute to an understanding of man's religious nature. History knows as little of the original condition of man (state of innocence) as natural history knows of paradise. The true procedure of the dogmatic theologian will be to comprehend in his own mind the few but grand hints of the Scriptures on the subject (image of God), and then by means of scriptural interpretation and exegesis, which is the expositor of the original intentions intended in the Scriptures to elaborate them as to show, behind the figurative expressions, the higher idea of humanity; for upon the correct comprehension of this idea depends the correct conception of sin, whether it is to be viewed as a mere negation, a natural deficiency, or both as a privation and deprivation, demoted from the condition of origin. In Genesis we find the biblical narrative of the origin of sin, and this narrative is reproduced daily in the experience of mankind. Even when the full Augustinian idea of original sin may not be adhered to, the consciousness of an aggregate guilt of the race, in which the individual man has his part, is deeply impressed, and is both by Scripture and experience. Psychological observations, and the study of the Scriptures, complete and illustrate each other nowhere so fully as in the doctrine of sin. Paul, Augustine, and Luther spoke from their personal experience as well as from the depths of human nature. The abstract intellect may always lean toward Pelagianism, but religious experience attests that the intellect alone cannot comprehend the depth of sin (Hun deshagen, Weg zu Christo, I, 136 sq.).—Hagbenach, Exegesikunde, 7th ed., p. 508 sq. See THEOLOGY.

Anthropomorphism (from ανθρωπος, a man, and μορφη, a form), 1. a term introduced by the Greeks to "representation of divinity under a human form;" and the nations or sects who have followed this practice have been sometimes called Anthropomorphites (q. v.). The Egyptians represented deities under human forms, as well as those of animals, and sometimes under a combination of the two. The same practice on the part of the Semitic divinities of the Arabian peninsula and of the Persians, Herodotus tells us (I, 131), adored the Supreme Being under no visible form of their own creation, but they worshipped on the tops of mountains, and sacrificed to the sun and moon, to earth, fire, water, and the winds. The Hebrews were forbidden (Exod, xx, 4, 5) to make any image or the representation of any animated being whatever. The Greeks were essentially anthropomorphists, and could never separate the idea of superior powers from the representation of them under a human form; hence, in their mythology and in their arts, each deity had its distinguishing attributes and a characteristic shape. Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans revere God as a spirit, and therefore respect all representations of Deity in human form.

2. The term is also used to denote that figure of speech by which the sacred writers attribute to God parts, states, actions, and affections which properly belong to man; as when they speak of the eyes of God, his kind, etc. Anthropomorphism (ανθρωπομορφos) differs from anthropopathy (ανθρωποπαθos) in this: the first is the attributing to God any thing whatever which, strictly speaking, is applicable to man only; the second is the act of attributing to God passions which belong to man's nature. Instances of both are found in the Scriptures, by which they adapt themselves to human modes of speaking, and to the limited capacities of men (see Klingel, Ueb. d. Anthropomorphisms d. Bib., Danz, 1806; Gelpke, Apologia d. anthropomorph., u. anthropopath. Darstellung Gottes, Leipzig, 1842). These anthropopathies we must, however, interpret in a manner suitable to the majority of the future. Thus, when the members of a human body are ascribed to God, we must understand by those perfections of which such members are in the instruments. The eye, for instance, represents God's knowledge and watchful care; the arm his power and strength; the body as a whole his care and protection, and to the cry of oppression and misery, etc. Further, when human affections are attributed to God, we must so interpret them as to imply no imperfection, such as perturbed feeling, in him. When God is said to repent, the antecedent, by a frequent figure of speech, is put for the consequent; and in this case we are to understand a second and allegorized mode of perceiving a part of God, which in man is the effect of repenting.

Anthropomorphic phrases, generally considered, are such as ascribe to the Deity mixed perfections and human imperfections. These phrases may be divided into three classes, according to which we ascribe to God: 1. Human actions (ανθρωπωμορφον); 2. Human affections, passions, and sufferings (ανθρωποπαθον); 3. Human form, human organs, human members (anthropomorphism). A rational being, who receives impressions through the senses, can form conceptions of the Deity only by a consideration of his own powers and properties (Jesucal Sac. Lit., 1848, p. 9 sq.). Anthropomorphic modes of thought are unavoidable in the religion of mankind; and although they can furnish no other: than corporeal or sensible representations of the Deity, they are nevertheless true and just when we guard against transferring to God qualities pertaining to the human senses. It is, for instance, a proper expression to assert that God knows all things; it is improper, that is, tropical or anthropomorphic, to say that he sees all things. Anthropomorphism is thus a species of accommodation (q. v.), insomuch as by these representations the Deity, as it were, lowers himself to the comprehension of men. We can only think of God as the archetype of our own spirit, and the idea of God can no longer be retained. We see little of this analogy. Anthropomorphism must be supplanted by Christianity; anthropopathism is not supplanted, but spiritualized and refined. Only what is false must be rejected—that crudeness which transfers to God human passions (widdy) and defects, for want of recollecting the elevation of the human mind (mind the Supreme Being, as well as his relationship to man. Christianity must teach us to distinguish what is owing to the corrupting influence of sin from what constitutes the true analogy between God and man. In heathenism a false anthropopathism prevailed, since polytheism presented in its gods the apotheosis of human qualities, not only of virtues, but of vices, and withal a degradation of the power manifested in Nature. Among the common, carnally-minded Jews there was a corresponding crudeness in their views of the Divine attributes; for omnipotence was represented as unlimited caprice, and punitive justice as perfectly analogous to human wrath. McCosh remarks that in Panteism, long the most apt, in our times, to land in Anthropomorphism, "If God and his works be one, then we shall be led to look on humanity as the highest manifestation of the divinity, and the natural devotions of the heart will find vent in hero-worship, or the foolish raving about great men, which has been so common among the eminent literary men of the age now passing away, the issue of the Panteism which rose like a vapor in Germany, and came away like a fog into Britain and America" (Intimations of the Mind, pt. iii, § 5). See Selicr, Bibl. Hellenesth., p. 56; Penny Cyclopedia, s. v.; Horne, Introduction, i, 462; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, i, 102 sq.; Tappe, De Ananthropopathia (Dorp, 1821).

Anthropomorphites [see ANTHROPOMORPHISM], a sect of ancient heretics, who were so denominated because they understood every thing spoken in Scripture in a literal sense, and particularly that passage of Genesis in which it is said "God made man after his own image." Hence they maintained that God had a human shape (see Fleming, De Anthropomorphitis, Lond., 1787), and was called Audhian, from Audius, a Syrian who originated their sect. The orthodox bishops prevailed on the emperor to banish Audius to Syria, where he labored for the propagation of Christianity among the Goths, built convents, and instituted several bishops, and died about 372. In consequence of repeated persecutions, the sect ceased to exist about the close of the 6th century. Origin wrote against certain monks in Egypt who were Anthropomorphites; but whether they inherited their views from Audius, or professed them independently of him, is still doubtful. Anthropomorphism appeared again in the 10th century, and in the 17th under Paul Felgenhauer (1628-1703). Anthropomorphism has been recently revived by the Mormons. In Elder Moffat's Latter-Day Saints' Catechism, God is described as an intelligent material personage, possessing body, parts, and passions, and unable to "occupy two distinct places at once." (Williams, Note on "Aristotle on Aristotle," p. 19).—Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 690, 705-6; Landon, s. v.

Anthropopathy. See ANTHROPOMORPHISM.

Anth baptists [from αποβαπτισμος, to baptize], those who oppose baptism. Of this description there are two sorts: (1) Those who oppose it altogether, as the Friends, usually called Quakers, who have from the beginning rejected it as an ordinance, declaring it to be superseded by the baptism of the
ANTICHRIST

Spirit, under whose peculiar administration Christians live, and whose influences can be and are received (as they maintain) without any sacramental medium for their conveyance. But though these are Antiaphists essentially, they are not so technically. (2.) The class of persons to whom that name properly belongs are those who deny the necessity of baptism to any except new converts. "Baptism," they tell us, "is a proselyting ordinance, to be applied only to those who come over to Christianity from other religions, and not to their descendants, whether infant or adult." This they infer from the words of the commission, and from the practice of the apostles and first Christians. It has been stated that there are in Ireland several growing societies of Antiaphists. See Baptism.

Antiburghers, a branch of seceders from the Church of Scotland, who differ from the Established Church chiefly in matters of church government; and from the Burghers (q. v.), with whom they were originally united (in the Erskine secession), respecting the lawfulness of taking the Burgess oath, while they held that: "I profess and conscienciously bear the true religion presently professed within this realm and authorized by the laws thereof; I shall abide thereat and defend the same to my life's end; renouncing the Roman religion called Papistry." The seceders could not agree in their interpretation of the Cavalier oath, but in the conclusion of the convention with the Church of Scotland, they obtained a virtual approval of the National Church, others maintaining that it was merely a declaration of Protestantism and a security against Popery. The contest was soon embittered by personal aspersities, and in 1747 a schism took place. Those who rejected the oath were called the General Associate Synod, and the others were known as the Associate Synod, or Burghers. The former party were, in matters of church government, rigid adherents of the old Presbyterian system. (Marden, Churches and Sects, i. 289; Edie, U. P. Church, in the Encyc. Metrop.) Antichrist (ἀντικρισίασθαι, against Christ; others, instead of Christ [see below]), a term which has received a variety of interpretations. Although the word Antichrist is used only by the Apostle John (Epist. I. ii) and yet has been generally applied (1) to the "Little Horn" of the "King of Fierce Countenance" (Dan. vii. vii); (2) to the "false Christ" predicted by our Saviour (Matt. xxiv); (3) to the "Beasts" of the Apocalypse (Rev. xiii, xvi).

1. Meaning of the word.—Some maintain (e.g. Greswell) that Antichrist can mean only "false Christ," taking ἀλλιος in the sense of "instead." But this is undue refinement: ἀλλιος bears the sense of "against" as well as "instead." Hence, both in classical and N. T. usage. So δύνασθαι means to gain instead of while δυνάω means to speak against. The word doubtless includes both meanings—"pseudo-Christ" as well as "opposed to Christ," much as "anti-pope" implies both rivalry and antagonism. According to Bishop Hurd, it signifies "a person of power actuated with a spirit opposite to that of Christ." For, to adopt the illustration of the same writer, "as the word Christ is frequently used in the apostolic writings for the doctrine of Christ, in which sense we are to understand as put on Christ, to 'grow in Christ,' or to 'learn Christ,' so Antichrist, in the abstract, may be taken for a doctrine subversive of the Christian; and when applied to a particular man, or body of men, it denotes one who sets himself against the spirit of that doctrine." It seems, however, that the Scriptures employ the term both with a general and limited signification. In the general sense, with which Bishop Hurd's idea mainly agrees, every person who is hostile to the authority of Christ, as Lord or head of the Church, and to the spirit of his religion, is called Antichrist; as when the Apostle John, referring to certain false teachers who corrupted the truth from its simplicity, says, "Even now are there many Antichrists" (1 John ii. 18; iv. 3), many who corrupt the doctrine and blaspheme the name of Christ, I. e. Jewish sectaries (Liske, Comment. in loc.).

II. Types and Predictions of Antichrist in O. T. —1. Balaam. As Moses was the type of Christ, so Baalam, the opponent of Moses, is to be taken as an O. T. type of Antichrist (Num. xxviii. 16; comp. Jude 9-11; 2 Pet. ii. 14-16; Rev. xii. 14). See Balaam.

2. Antiochus Epiphanes, the "King of Fierce Countenance," is called Antichrist in 23-28 Dan. xii. He is one of their kings, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand." (Comp. also ch. xi. xii.) Most interpreters concur in applying this passage to Antiochus Epiphanes as a type of Antichrist. Antiochus is here set forth (ch. viii) as a theocratic anti-Messiah, opposed to the true Messiah, who, it will be remembered, is generally described in O. T. as a king. Jerome (quoted in Smith, Dictionary, s. v.) argues as follows: "All that follows (from ch. xi, xii) to the end of the book applies particularly to Antiochus Epiphanes, brother of Seleucus, and son of Antiochus the Great; for, after Seleucus, he reigned eleven years in Syria, and possessed Judaea; and in his reign there occurred the persecution about the Law of God, and the wars of the Maccabees. But our people consider all these things to be spoken of Antichrist, who is to come in the last time. ... It is the custom of Holy Scripture to anticipate in types the reality of things to come. For in the same way our Lord and Saviour is spoken of in the 72d Psalm, which is entitled a Psalm of Solomon, and yet all that is there said cannot be applied to Solomon. But in part, this is the history and image of things to come. And these things are foretold of Solomon, to be more perfectly fulfilled in our Lord and Saviour. As, then, in Solomon and other saints the Saviour has types of His coming, so Antichrist is rightly believed to have for his type that wicked king Antiochus, who persecuted the saints in the Temple, which is called the Temple of Heron (prop. iii. 1127, Par. 1704). See Antiochus Epiphanes.

3. The Little Horn (Dan. vii). Here the four beasts indicate four kings: their kingdoms are supposed to be the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Syrian (some say Roman) empires. The last empire breaks up into ten, after which the king rises up and masters three. It is declared that "he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time"—indicating a person, as well as a power or polity. It is likened also to Antiochus as the type of Antichrist, at least primarily. See Horn, Little.

III. Passages in N. T.—1. In Matt. xxiv, Christ himself foretells the appearance of false Messiahs; thus, ver. 5: "For many shall come in my name, saying, 'I am Christ,' and shall deceive many," also ver. 28, 29: "Then shall many be led astray. Here is Christ or there, believe it not: for there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if that were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." (Comp. Mark xiii, 21, 22.) In these passages consi-
ANTICHRIST

Christians teachers and their works are predicted. Christ teaches "that (1) in the latter days of Jerusalem there should be so great distress, that in the midst of it there should arise impostors who would claim to be the promised Messiah, and would lead away many of their countrymen after them; and that (2) God would see in their false prophet a great tribulation and persecution of the saints, and that there should arise at the same time false Christians and false prophets, with an unparalleled power of leading astray. In type, therefore, our Lord predicted the rise of the several impostors who excited the fanatical ideas of their time, and their fall. He predicted the future rise of impostors in the last days, who should beguile all the elect into the belief of their being God's prophets, or even his Christ. Our Lord is not speaking of any one individual (or polity), but rather of those forerunners of the Antichrist who are his servants and actuated by his spirit. They are ψεύδομενοι (false Christians), and can deceive almost the whole, but they are not specifically οὐ αὐτίκους (the Antichrist); they are ψευδοσοφοί (false prophets), and can show great signs and wonders, but they are not οὐ ψευδοσοφοί (false prophets) (Rev. xvi, 14)" (Smith, s. v.).

The Obedience (τὸ καρίγων).—Before leaving the apotostolic passages on Antichrist, it is expedient to inquire into the meaning of the "obedience" alluded to in the last paragraph: that which "κίνητος ἐν αὐτῷ (τὸ καρίγων, 2 Thess. ii, 6); described also in ver. 7 as a person: "he who now letteth" (οὐ καρίγων). The early Christian writers generally consider "the obedience" to be only another name for the Roman Empire; so Ignatius, "De Recurr. Carn. c. 24, and Apol. c. 39;" St. Chrysostom and Theophylact on 2 Thess. ii, Hippolytus (De Antichristo, c. 49); St. Jerome on Dan. vii; St. Augustine (De Civ. Dix, xix, 19); St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xxv, 6); see Dr. H. More's Works, l. k. ii, ch. xix, p. 680; Mede, l. k. iii, ch. xiii, p. 650; Alford, Gr. Text, iii, 57; Wordworth, On the Apocalypse, p. 520). Theodore and Theodore of Mopoeastia hold it to be the determination of God. Theodore's view is embraced by Pelt; the Patriarchal interpretation is accepted by Wordsworth, Eliott and Alford so far modify the Patriarchal interpretation as to explain the obedience to be the restraining power of human law (τὸ καρίγων) wielded by the empire of Rome (οὐ καρίγων) when Tertullian wrote, but now by the several governments of the civilized world. The explanation of Theodore is untenable on account of Paul's further words, "untill he be taken out of the way," which are applied by Pelt to the Pope.

The Obedience of John. The Apostle John also personifies Antichrist, alluding, as St. Paul does, to previous oral teaching on the subject, and applying it to a class of opponents of Christ; ch. ii, 18: "Little children, it is the last time; and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many Antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time; and to a spirit of opposition;" ch. iv, 8: "And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. And this is the spirit of Antichrist, whereby he believeth that it should come, and even now already is in the world." The Apostle here teaches "that the spirit of the Antichrist could exist even then, though the coming of the Antichrist himself was future, and that all who denied the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus were Antichrists, as being types of the final Antichrist who was to arise in the last days of John. Comp. l. k. iv, 5; 2 Tim. iii, 1-5. See Mark of Six.

8. The Antichrist of John. The Apostle John also personifies Antichrist, alluding, as St. Paul does, to previous oral teaching on the subject, and applying it to a class of opponents of Christ; ch. ii, 18: "Little children, it is the last time; and as ye have heard that Antichrist shall come, even now are there many Antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time; and to a spirit of opposition;" ch. iv, 8: "And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. And this is the spirit of Antichrist, whereby he believeth that it should come, and even now already is in the world." The Apostle here teaches "that the spirit of the Antichrist could exist even then, though the coming of the Antichrist himself was future, and that all who denied the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus were Antichrists, as being types of the final Antichrist who was to arise in the last days of John. Comp. l. k. iv, 5; 2 Tim. iii, 1-5. See Mark of Six. would appear, then, that the obstacle was probably the Roman empire, and on its being taken out of the way there did occur the ‘falling away.’ Zion the beloved city became Sodom the bloody city—still Zion though Sodom, still Sodom though Zion. According to the view given above, however, that would be the description of the church in her present estate, and this will continue to be our estate, until the time, times, and half-time, during which the evil element is allowed to remain within her, shall have come to their end’ (Smith, s. v.).

4. Passages in the Apocalypse.—(1) The Beast from the Sea. The Apocalypse symbolizes the final opposition of the Antichrist, or the Beast, by the sea (Rev. xiv. 7).

“And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them;” out of the sea (xiii.): “And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his head the name of blasphemy. And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority (comp. the whole chapter, and chap. xvii, 12).”

The almost identical Little Horn (Rev. xii. 20) of Daniel. “The Beast whose power is as the bear is the Beast of Daniel. “The Beast whose power is as the bear is the Beast. The Little Horn has here similar (Dan. vii. 20) to the same period (Dan. vii. 7, 8), the Apocalyptic Beast has ten horns (Rev. xii. 3, 1), and rises from the sea (Dan. vii, 3): the Apocalyptic Beast has ten horns (Rev. xiii. 1), and rises from the sea, (ibid.). The Little Horn has a mouth speaking great things (Dan. vii. 8, 11, 20): the Apocalyptic Beast has a mouth speaking great things (Rev. xiii. 5). The Little Horn makes war with the saints, and prevails (Dan. vii. 21): the Apocalyptic Beast makes war with the saints, and overcomes them (Rev. xii. 7). The Little Horn speaks great words against the Most High (Dan. vii. 18, 20): the Beast came up out of the bottomless pit blasphemy against God (Rev. vii. 3). The Little Horn bears out the saints of the Most High (Dan. vii. 25): the woman rides on, i. e. directs, the Apocalyptic Beast, is drunken with the blood of saints (Rev. xvi. 6). The persecution of the Little Horn is to last a time, and times and a dividing of times, i.e. a three and a half times (Dan. vii. 25) to the power given to the Apocalyptic Beast for forty-two months, i.e. three and a half times (Rev. xii. 5)” (Smith, s. v.).

These and other parallelisms show that as the Little Horn was typical of an individual that should stand to the church as the leading type of Antichrist, so John’s Apocalyptic Beast is the embodiment of a class of men, who should embody the elements of a similar Antichristian power with respect to the Christians.

(2) The Second Beast and the False Prophet (Rev. xxi. 11–18; xix. 11–21). In these passages we find described a second beast, coming up out of the earth, who is accompanied by (or identical with) “the False Prophet.” The following views are from Smith, s. v.:

“His characteristics are [1] ‘doing great wonders, so that he maketh fire to come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men’ (Rev. xiii. 13). This power of miracle-working, we should note, is not attributed by 4 Qohelet to the First Beast; but it is one of the chief attributes of Paul’s Antichrist (2 Thess. ii. 9).”

[2] “He deceived them that dwell upon the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the Beast” (Rev. xiii. 14). “He wrought miracles with which he deceived them that received his sign and worshiped the Beast” (Rev. xix. 20). In like manner, no special power of beguiling is attributed to the First Beast; but the Adversary is possessed of ‘all deceptiveness of unrighteousness in those that perish because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved’ (2 Thess. ii. 10).

[3] He has horns like a lamb, i. e. he bears an outward resemblance to the Messiah (Rev. xiii. 11); and the Adversary sits in the temple of God showing himself that he is God (2 Thess. ii. 4).

[4] His title is the False Prophet, τὸ θεότοκος τῆς φροντίδος (Rev. xvi. 18; xix. 20); and our Lord, whom Antichrist counterfeits, is emphatically the Prophet, ὁ προφήτης (Rev. xi. 3). The False Prophet, or Ἰωάννης (Rev. 22, 8, 16; John the Baptist of the True Church).’ It would seem that the Antichrist appears most distinctly in the Book of the Revelation by this Second Beast or the False Prophet, especially in the more general or representative character. He is not, however, necessarily a person, but rather a power, and the name of Beast (Rev. xvi. 13) signifies that he will ally itself with a corrupt religion (for the two Apocalyptic beasts are designated as distinct), represent itself as her minister and vindicator (Rev. xiii. 12), compel men by violence to pay reverence to her (xiii. 14), breathe a new life into her decayed frame by his use of the secular arm in her behalf (xiii. 15), forbidding civil rights to those who renounce her authority and reject her symbols (xiii. 17), and putting them to death by the sword (xiii. 15).” See BEAST.

IV. Interpretation. — Who or what is Antichrist? The answers to this question are legion. The Edinburgh Encyclopedia (4th ed. v.) enumerates the following interpretations of the name and the list might be greatly enlarged. We give (1) a brief summary of the Scripture testimony; (2) the views of the early Christians; (3) the views held in the Middle Ages; (4) from the Reformation to the present time. In this sketch, we make use, to a considerable extent, of the article in Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, to which references have already been made.

1. Scripture Teaching.—The sum of Scripture teaching with regard to the Antichrist, then, appears to be as follows: Already, in the times of the apostles, there was the mystery of iniquity, the spirit of Antichrist, existing in the world, and at work (1 Jn. 2). The Gnostic heretics of John’s days; in the Jewish impostors who preceded the fall of Jerusalem; in all heretics and unbelievers, especially those whose heresies had a tendency to deny the incarnation of Christ; and in the great persecutors who from time to time afflicted the church. But this Antichristian spirit was not original with the Second Beast, but it has only at times concentrated itself in certain personal or distinct forms of persecution, which may thus be historically enumerated: 1. Antiochus Epiphanes, the consummation of the Hellenizing policy of the Greek-Syrian monarchy, and denoted by the Little Horn and fierce king of Daniel (Dan. vii. 24). 2. The Antichristian delusion especially in its representatives who opposed Christianity in its early progress, and at length caused the downfall of the Jewish nation, as represented by the allusions in our Saviour’s last discourse and in John’s epistles.

2. The Roman civil power (the first beast of Revelation) allating the pagan mythology (the second beast, or false prophet) in its violent attempts to crush Christianity, at first insidious, but finally open, as culminating in Nero and Domitian. It is this phase which seems incidently alluded to by Paul. All these have again their fulfilment (so to speak) in the great apostacy of the papal system. (Compare especially the chapter on the Papacy, especially in its representatives who opposed Christianity in its early progress, and at length caused the downfall of the Jewish nation, as represented by the allusions in our Saviour’s last discourse and in John’s epistles.) will reign over the Saracens in Bagdad ([In Apoc. c. xiii].)" (Smith, s. v.)

3. Middle-Age Jews.—In the Middle Age it was the prevailing notion that Antichrist would either be brought forth by the Virgin, or be the son of a bishop and a nun. About the year 960, Ado, a monk in a monastery of Western Franconia, wrote a treatise on Antichrist, in which he assigned a later time to his coming, and also to the end of the world (see Schröckh, Kirchengesch. xxii, p. 248). He did not distinctly state whom he meant to mean by Antichrist (Hagenbich, Hist. of Doctrines, § 283). "A Frank king," he says, "will reunite the Roman Empire, and alidicate on Mount Olivet, and, on the dissolution of his kingdom, the Antichrist will be revealed." The same writer supposes that he will be born in Babylon, that he will be educated at Bethsaida and Chorazin, and that he will proclaim himself the Son of God at Jerusalem (Tract. in Ant. opus Aug. Opera, ix. 454, Paris, 1687). In the singular predictions of Hildegarde († 1197), Antichrist is foretold as the spirit of doubt. She states that the exact season of Antichrist is not revealed, but describes his manifestation as an impostor, and impudently imitates the Divinity, in order to seduce the people of the Divine Word" (Christian Remembrancer, "lix. 50.
See Hildesgearde. But "the received opinion of the twelfth century is brought before us in a striking manner in the interview between Richard I and the abbot Joachim of Floris († 1202) at Messina, as the king was passing by on his way to the Holy Land, 'I am weak,' said the king, 'that Antichrist would be born in Antioch, or in Babylon, and of the tribe of Dan, and would reign in the temple of the Lord in Jerusalem, and would walk in that land in which Christ walked, and would reign in it for three years and a half, and would dispute against Elijah and Enoch, and would kill them, and would afterward die; and that after his death God would give six days of repentance, in which these might repent which should have erred from the way of truth, and have been seduced by the preaching of Antichrist and his false prophets.' This seems to have been the view defended by the archbishops of Rouen and Auxerre, and by the bishop of Bayeux, who were present at the interview, but it was not Joachim's opinion. He maintained the seven heads of the Beast to be Herod, Nero, Constantius, Mohammed, Melancthon, who were past; Saladin, who was then living; and Antichrist, who was shortly to come, being already born in the world. The power of Rome was to decay also, and to the apostolic see (Roger de Hoveden, in Richard I, ann. 1100). In his own work on the Apocalypse, Joachim speaks of the second Apostolic Beast as being governed by 'a great pretate who will be like Simon Magnus, and, as it were, universal pontiff throughout the world, and be that very Antichrist of whom St. Paul speaks.' These are very noticable words. Gregory I had long since (A.D. 680) declared that any man who held even the shadow of the power which the popes of Rome soon after his time arrogated to themselves would be the precursor of Antichrist. Arnulfus, bishop of Orleans (or perhaps Gerber), in an invective against John Xv at the Council of Constantinople D. 591, had declared, that if the Roman pontiff was deemed of such authority and puffed up with knowledge, he was Antichrist; if destitute both of charity and of knowledge, that he was a lifeless stone (Mansi, ix, 182, Ven. 1774); but Joachim is the first to suggest, not that such and such a pontiff was Antichrist, but that the Antichrist would be a Universum Papa, that is to say, the pope is the apostolic see. Still, however, we have no hint of an order of men being the Antichrist; it is a living individual man that Joachim contemplates." Amalrich of Bena († 12th century) seems to have been the first to teach explicitly that the pope (i.e. the papal system) is Antichrist. Guibert of Nogent in the Chroniques of Guibert and his papal see and Babylon and Iep sedec in monte Oliveti, i.e. in pinguedine postestatis (according to Cassarius of Heisterbach; comp. Engelhardt, Kirchenhistorische Abhandlungen, p. 256, quoted by Hagenbach). The German emperors, in their contests with the popes, often applied the latter to the former, and even find instances of this as early as the times of the Hohenstaufen. Emperor Louis, surnamed the Bavarian, also called Pope John XII the mystical Antichrist (Schröck, xxxi, p. 108). John Aventinus, in his Annalium Bosorum, libri vii, p. 651, Lips. 1710, himself the Romish writer, speaks of it as a received opinion of the Middle Age that the papacy is the Antichrist, and that of Hildebrand († 1085), and cites Eberhard, archbishop of Salzburg (12th century), as asserting that Hildebrand had, "in the name of religion, laid the foundation of the kingdom of Antichrist 170 years before his time." He can even name the ten horns. They are the "Turks, Greeks, Egyptians, Africans, Spaniards, English, French, Germans, Sicilians, and Italians, who now occupy the provinces of Rome; and a little horn has grown up with eyes and mouth, speaking great things, which is reducing three of these kingdoms—i.e. Sicily, Italy, and Germany—to suberviciency; is persecuting the people of Christ, and the saints of God. On the other hand, it is the composition, it is confounding things human and divine, and attempting things unutterable, excercable" (Smith, s. v.). Pope Innocent III (A.D. 1218) designated Mohammed as Antichrist; and as the number of the beast, 666, was held to indicate the period of his dominion, it was supposed that the Mohammedans were to fall (Schröck, xxxix). The Waldenses have a treatise (given in Leger, Hist. des Eglises Vaudoises) concerning Antichrist of the 12th century (Gieseler, Maitland, and others, dispute the date, but the best authorities now agree to it). It treats of Antichrist as the whole anti-Christian principle concealing itself under the guise of Christianity, and calls it a "system of falsehood adorning itself with a show of beauty and piety, yet (as by the names and offices of the Scriptures, and the sacraments, and various other things may appear) very unsuitable to the Church of Christ. The system of iniqutiy thus completed, with its ministers, great and small, supported by those who are induced to follow it with an evil heart, and blindfold—this is the congregation which, taken together, comprises what is called Antichrist or Babylon, the fourth beast, the whore, the man of sin, the son of perdition. It originated, indeed, "in the times of the apostles, but, by gaining power, with the help of the world, it had reached its climax in the corruption of the Papal Church.

"Christ never had an enemy like this; so able to pervert the way of truth into falsehood, incomuch that the true church, with her children, is trodden under foot. The worship that belongs alone to God he transfers to Antichrist himself—to the creature, male and female, deceased—to images, carasses, and relics. The sacrament of the Eucharist is converted into an object of adoration, and the worshipping of God alone is prohibited. He robs the Saviour of his merits, and the sufficiency of his grace in justification, regeneration, sanctification, sanctification, and regeneration. He is in the faith, and spiritual nourishment; ascribing all these things to his own authority, to a form of words, to his own works, to the intercession of saints, and to the fire of purgatory. He seduces the people from Christ, drawing off their minds from seeking those blessings in him, by a lively faith in God, in Jesus Christ, as in the Father; teaching his followers to expect them by the will, and pleasure, and works of Antichrist.

"He teaches to baptize children into the faith, and attributes to this the work of regeneration; thus confounding the work of the Holy Spirit in regeneration with the act in baptism, and teaching his followers by this to baptize children against the laws of the church, and against popery. King James holds it (Apol. pro Juram. Fidell. Lond. 1600) as strongly as Queen Elizabeth (see Jewell, Letter to Bulling. May 22, 1559, Zurich Letters, ceremonies, Jewish, heathen, and Christian—and by means thereof, the people are deprived of spiritual food, seduced from the true religion and the commandments of God, and brought to the lowest and most ignominious of all destines. All his works are done to be seen of men, that he may glut himself with insatiable avarice, and hence every thing is set to sale. He allows of open sins without ecclesiastical censure, and even the impenitent are not excommunicated" (Neander, Church History, iv, 605 sq.).

The words of the Waldenses in this theory of Antichrist, applying it to the papal system. So did Wickliffe and his followers: Wickliffe, Triadogus (cited by Schröck, xxxiv, 509); Janow, Liber de Antichristo (Hist. et Monum. J. Huss, vol. i.). Lord Cobham (Sir John Oldcastle), executed as a Wickliffe, 1417, declared to King Henry V that, "as sure as God's word is true, the pope is the great Antichrist foretold in Holy Writ" (New Gen. Dict. s. v. Oldcastle).

4. From the Reformation downwourd.—One of the oldest German works in print, the first mentioned by Panzor in the Annalen der älteren deutschen Literatur, is the 1520 edition of the Heilige Schriften ubrigens zur Antichrist, or, also, "Bisch'n von dem Ende Christi Lebens". The following rudiment was reprinted by Heinrich Julius, Biicher und Umsturz durch verheimlichen Gottes, wie er die Welt u. w. verkennt mit seiner falschen Lehre und Rats des Teufels," etc. —"Little Book concerning Antichrist's Life and Rule through God's Providence, how he doth pervert the World with his false Doctrine and Counsel of the Devil," etc. (Ueber, 1516). After this Luther began to doubt whether the pope were not Antichrist. In a letter to Spalatin, Feb. 28, 1520, he says, "Ego sic angor ut prope non dubitem papam esse proprie Antichristum." In the same year, when he heard of Eck's success in obtaining the bull against him from the pope, Luther exclaimed, "At length the mystery of Antichrist must be unveiled" (Ranko, Hist. of Reformation, i. ii. cc. iii.). In the Reformation era the opinion that the papal system is Antichrist was generally adopted; and it is the prevalent opinion among Protestants to this day, although, as will appear below, some writers make Rome only one form of Antichrist. The various classes of opinion, and the writers who maintain them, are given by Smith, s. v., as follows: Bullinger (1564), Chychtea (1571), Aretins (1578), Foxe (1586), Napier (1598), Mede (1602), Ju-"..."
ANTICHRIST

First Series, p. 83, Camb. 1849); and the theologians of the 17th century did not repudiate it, though they less and less dwelt upon it as their struggle came to be with Puritanism in place of popery. Bishop Andrews maintains it as a probable conclusion from the Epistle to the Thessalonians (Revi. of Bellarm., p. 304, Oxf. 1645); significantly suggests that there are marks of Antichrist which apply to the man of Sin, 2 Thess. ii. 3; as well as to the pope or to the Turk (ibid. iii, 267), and declines to make the Church of England responsible for what individual preachers or writers had said on the subject in moments of exasperation (ib. ii, 585).

From this time onward, in the Church of England, the less evangelical divines are inclined to abandon the theory of the Reformers, while, of course, the Romanists oppose it. Yet it appears, from the list above, that some of the best interpreters in that church, as well as in other branches of Protestantism, maintain the old interpretation of the prophecies of Daniel, Paul, and John. The works which have gone back to the old idea of an Antichrist yet to come, e. v.: "The conclusion, and its sequel, the Church of Rome and the Papacy," are Lactantius and Bossuet (1810), Burgh, Samuel Maitland, Newman (Tracts for the Times, No. 83), Charles Maitland (Prophetic Interpretation). Other prefers looking upon him as long past, and fix upon one or another persecutor or heresarch as the man in whom the predictions as to Antichrist found their fulfillment. There seems to be no trace of this idea for more than 1000 years in the church. But it has been taken up by two opposite classes of expounders—by Romanists who were anxious to avert the application of the Apocalyptic prophecies from the papacy, and by others, who were disposed, not indeed to deny the prophetic import of the Apocalypse, but to confine the seer's ken within the closest and narrowest limits that were possible. Acalaz, a Spanish Jesuit, taking a hint from Victorinus, seems to have been the first (A.D. 1604) to have suggested that the Apocalyptic prophecies did not extend farther than to the overthrow of paganism by Constantine. The theory, which with variations is still current, is taken up and enfolded by Bossuet, Calmet, Des Stycy, Eichhorn, Hug, Herder, Ewald, Moses Stuart, Davidson. The general view of the school is that the Apocalypse describes the triumph of Christianity over Judaism in the first, and over heathenism in the third century. Many sees Antichrist in Nicol; Bossuet in Diocletian and in Julian; Grotius in Calvista; Wetstein in Titus; Hammond in Simon Mago (Works, iii, 626, Lond. 1617). Whitby in the Jews (Comm. ii, 426, Lond. 1700); Lo Clerc in Simon, son of Giora, a leader of the rebel Jews; Schott in the Philætes; Newton and Krause in the Jewish zealot; Haradin in the High-priest; F. D. Maurice in Vitiatus (On the Apocalypse, Camb. 1680)." (Smith, s. v.)

Antichrist—Of these we take the following account from Smith, s. v.: 1. "The name given by the Jews to Antichrist is (καταβαστας, ־καρπων) Armillius. There are several rabbinical works in which a circumstantial account is given of him, such as the Book of Zerubbabel, and other parts of the Chronicles: and the book of the king of Persia, which gives an abridgment of their contents in his Lexicon, under the head 'Armillus,' and in the fifteenth chapter of his Synagoga Judaica (p. 717). The name is derived from Isa. xi, 4, where the Targum gives "by the word of his mouth the wicked Armillius shall die, for 'with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.' There will, say the Jews, be twelve signs of the coming of the Messiah: (1.) The appearance of three apostate kings who have fallen away from the faith, but in the sight of men appear to be worshippers of the true God. (2.) A terrible heat of the sun. (3.) A dearth of blood. (4.) A dearth of bread. (5.) A darkness will be cast upon the sun (Joel ii, 31) for thirty days (Isa. xxiv, 22). (6.) God will give universal power to the Romans for nine months, during which time the Roman chieftain will afflict the Israelites; at the end of the nine months God will raise up the Messiah Ben-Joseph—that is, the Messiah of the tribe of Joseph, named Nebuchadnezzar—who will defeat the Roman chieftain, and slay him. (7.) Then there will arise Armillus, whom the Gentiles or Christians call Antichrist. He will be born of a marble statue in one of the churches in Rome. He will go to the Romans and profess himself to be their Messiah, in the name of their God, and that he has been sent down from heaven to him and accept him for their king. Having made the whole world subject to him, he will say to the Idumaeans (i. e. Christians), 'Bring me the law which I have given you.' They will bring with their book of prayers; and he will accept it as his own, and will exhort them to persevere in their belief of him. Then he will send to Nebuchadnezzar, and command the Jewish Law to be brought him, and proof to be given from it that he is God. Nebuchadnezzar will go before him, guarded by 80,000 warriors of the tribe of Ephraim, and will read, 'I am the Lord thy God: thou shalt have none other gods but me.' Armillius will say that there are no such words in the Law, and command the Jews to confess him as God of the other nations had confessed him. But Nebuchadnezzar will give orders to his followers to seize and bind him. Then Armillius, in rage and fury, will gather all his people in a deep valley to fight with Israel, and in that battle the Messiah Ben-Joseph will fall, and the angels will bear away his body to the rest of the patriarchs. Then the Jews will be cast out by all nations, and suffer afflictions such as have not been from the beginning of the world, and the residue of them will fly into the desert, and will remain there forty and five days, during which time all the Israelites who are not worthy to see the redemption shall die. (8) Then the great angel Michael will rise and blow three mighty blasts of a trumpet. At the first blast there shall appear the true Messiah Ben-David and the prophet Elias, and they will manifest themselves to the Jews in the desert, and all the Jews throughout the world shall hear the sound of the trump, and those that have been captive shall be released; and with great gladness they shall come to Jerusalem. Then Armillius will raise a great army of Christians, and lead them to Jerusalem to conquer the new king. But God shall say to Messiah, 'Sit thou on my right hand,' and to the Israelites: 'Stand still and see what God will work for you to-day.' Then God will pour down sulphur and fire from heaven (Ezek. xxxviii, 22), and the impious Armillius shall die, and the impious Idumaeans (i.e. Christians), who have destroyed the house of our God and have led us away into captivity, shall perish in misery, and the Jews shall avenge themselves upon them, as it is written: 'The house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau (i.e. the Christians) for stubble, and they shall kindle in them and devour them: there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau, for the Lord hath spoken it' (Oudad. 16). (9) On the same day the trump shall be opened, and Messiah Ben-David, the Messiah Messiah Ben-Joseph from the dead. (10) The ten tribes shall be led to Paradise, and shall celebrate the wedding-feast of the Messiah. And the Messiah shall choose a bride among the fairest of the daughters of Israel, and children and children's children shall be born to him, and his sons shall reign over Israel after him, as it is written: 'He shall prolong his days' (Isa. iii, 10), which Rambam explains to mean, 'He shall live long, but he too shall die in great glory, and his son shall reign in his stead, and his sons' sons in succession.' (Buxtorfii Synagoga Judaicae, p. 271, Basel, 1673.)

2. Musulmans, as well as Jews and Christians, expect an Antichrist. They call him Al Dajjal, from a name which signifies an impostor, or a liar; and they hold that their prophet Mohammed taught one of his disciples, whose name was Tammim Al-Dari, every thing relating to Antichrist. On his authority, they tell us that he was sent to Rome at Constantine's time, and that he will make his entry into Jerusalem, like Jesus Christ, riding on an ass; but that Christ, who is not dead, will come at his second advent to encounter him; and that, after having conquered him, he will then die indeed. That the beast described by John in the Revelation will appear as an Antichrist, is manifest; and see what the saints say against him: that Imam Mahadi, who remains concealed among the Musulmans, will then show himself, join Jesus Christ, and with him engage Dajjal; after which they will unite the Christians and the Musulmans, and of the two religions will make but one (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. Daggial, etc.).

Calmet.

"These Mohammedan traditions are an adaptation of Christian prophecy and Jewish legend, without any originality or any beauty of their own. They too have their signs which are to precede the final consummation. They are divided into the greater and the lesser signs. The lesser signs are connected with the coming of the Jews from the west (comp. Matt. xxiv. 29). The next is the appearance of a beast from the earth, sixty cubits high, bearing the staff of Moses and the seal of Solomon, with which he will inscribe the word 'Believer' on the face of the faithful, and 'Unbeliever' on all who have not accepted Islamism (comp. Rev. xiii). He will divide all other places, but will not be allowed to enter Medina, which will be defended by angels. Lastly, he will be killed by Jesus at the gate of Lud. For when news is received of the appearance of Antichrist, Jesus will come down to earth, alighting on the white tower at the east of Damascus, and will slay him; Jesus will then embrace the Mohammedan religion, marry a wife, and leave children after him, having reigned in perfect peace and security, after the death of Antichrist, for forty years. (See Pococke, Porta Mosia, p. 258, Oxon. 1655; and Sale, Koran, Preliminary Discourse.)" (Smith, s. v.)

ANTICHRISTIANISM

Antichristianism, a term that conveniently designates, in a collective manner, the various forms of hostility which Christianity has met with at different times. It is in effect "the spirit of Antichrist" (Vóóri, "Aantikkivóó") in the apostolic age (1 John iv, 3). See Antichrist. Indeed it exhibited itself against the true religion in the persecutions which the Jews underwent from Antiochus Epiphanes (q. v.), and may be traced in the history of the proto- saint Abel (q. v.). It was this that Enoch (q. v.) and Noah (q. v.) preached against. 2 Pet. ii, 5-7; that "vexed the righteous soul" of Lot; and that, in fine, has broken forth in all ages as the expression of the world's malignity against the good (comp. John xv, 18-21; 2 Tim. iii, 12). Since the days of persecution it has been confined chiefly to intellectual modes of opposition, and has received the names of In- fidelity, Deism, Rationalism, etc. See Ant testimonies. The Scriptures, however, appear to point to a time when the Antichristian elements shall again array themselves in forms of palpable violence. See Gog. For "the carnal mind" (Vóóri, Vóóri, Vóóri, Vóóri) is no less than ever opposed (fyóóri) to the divinity and purposes (Rom. viii, 7). It is the same "mystery of iniquity" already foreseen by Paul as then "working" to successive developments (2 Thess. ii, 7); that òóóá in the hearts and lives, in the speeches and writings of men, which only awaits the removal of the hindering power to issue in that concentrated manifestation of òóóá, which shall usher in the times of the end (Al. Test., prop. to vol. iii, p. 68). A stream of Antichristian sentiment and conduct pervades the whole history of the world. The power of evil which we see at work calls forth Antichristian formations, now in one shape, now in another; and so, according to the prophets, it will be until the final triumph of the kingdom of Christ (Olahusen, Commentary, x, 321 sqq., Am. ed.). See MÉYÉRRY OF INQUITY; INFIDELITY.

Antidomicarianites or Antimarianites, a sect of Christian disciples who appeared in Arabia at the end of the fourth century, and taught that Mary had children by Joseph after the Lord's birth. They were not heretics, but doubtless honest opponents of the growing Mariolatry of the time. —Gieseler, Ch. Hist. div. i, § 97; Walch, Hist. der Ketzeren, iii, 578; Ephiphanius, Heres, 78, § 19.

Antidóron (antidóropov, a gift in return or exchange), the title given to the bread which, in the Greek Church, is distributed to the people after the mass. It receives its name from its being received instead of the òóóá, or holy communion, by those who were not prepared to receive the latter, though also by those who were. It was also called euóópia, or the "blessed" bread, and was sometimes sent by the bishop of one church to him of another in tokens of intercommunio. —Goar, Rúl. Grac. p. 154.

Antígínum (antigíóyn, a frequent Greek name, signifying apparently against his parent), the name of two members of the Antímanes family.

1. A son of John Hyrcanus, and grandson of Simon Maccabeus. His brother, Aristobulus, made him his associate in the kingdom, but was at length prevailed upon by their common enemies to put him to death, B.C. 165 (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 18 and 19).

2. A brother of Hyrcanus and Alexandra), sent as a prisoner to Rome, with his father and brother, by Pompey, who had taken Jerusalem. After remaining in Italy for some time, he returned to Judea, and, after a variety of fortunes, was established king and high-priest, Herod being compelled to fly to Rome, B.C. 60. Having obtained as-considered as the compositions of orthodox men, written with good intentions, but calculated by their titles to mislead the ignorant, who might be disposed to account them as apostolical productions, to which honor they never at any time claimed themselves (Suidaeus, Hist. Eccl. iii, 5, 25.). The same historian has also preserved the testimony of Origem, who, in his Commentary on John (cited by Eusebius), observes: "Peter, upon whom the Church of Christ is built, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, has left one epistle undisputed; it may be, also, a second, but of this I am not positive. What shall I say of him, who reclin'd on the breast of Jesus, John, who has left one Gospel, in which he confesses that he could write so many that the whole world could not contain them? He also wrote the Apocalypse, being commanded to conceal, and not to write, the voices of the seven thunders. He has also left us an epistle consisting of a few lines (eiggio); it may be also a second and third are from him, but all do not concur in their genuineness; both together do not contain a hundred stichoi" (for the signification of this word, see Christian Remembrancer, iii, 405 sq.). And again, in his Homilies, "The epistle with the title 'To the Hebrews' has not been submitted to which one confesses that it is but rude in specific, that is, in his phraseology. But that this epistle is more pure Greek in the composition of its phrases, every one will confess who is able to discern the difference of style. Again, it will be obvious that the ideas of the apostle are more difficult to understand in this book as it is known to be apostolic. Every one will confess the truth of this who attentively reads the apostle's writings. . . . I would say, that the thoughts are of the apostle's, but that the diction and phraseology belong to some one who has recorded what the apostle has said, and as one who has noted down at his leisure what he had said. If there is any man who considers this epistle as coming from Paul, let him be commenced for this, for neither did those eminent men deliver it for this without cause: but who it was that really wrote the epistle God only knows. The account, however, that has been current before our time is, according to some, that Clement, who was bishop of Rome, wrote the epistle; according to others, that it was written by Luke, who wrote the Gospel and the Acts (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi, 25.).

Upon other occasions Origem expresses his doubts in regard to the antilegomena, as, where, in his commentary on John, Gospel, he speaks of the report (eiggio) on the subject of James, and another commentary on Matthew, where he uses the phrase, "If we acknowledge the Epistle of Jude;" and of the Second and Third Epistles of John he observes, that "all do not acknowledge them as genuine;" by which epithet, we presume, he means written by the person to whom they are ascribed. It is remarkable that Eusebius (ii, 23; iii, 25) classifies the Epistle of James, the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Epistle of Barnabas, at one time with the spurious, and at another with the antilegomena. By the word spurious, in this instance at least, he can mean no more than that the general character of which books was disputed; for instance, the Gospel of the Hebrews, which was received by the Eulonitae as a genuine production of the Evangelist Matthew. This is the work of which Jerome made a transcript, as he himself informs us, from the copy preserved by the zeal of Pamphilus in the Constantinopolitan edition. He has also informs us that he translated it into Greek, and that it was considered by most persons as the original Gospel of Matthew (Dialog. contra Pelag. iii, 2, and Comment. in Matt. xii.). Whether the Shepherd of Hermas was ever included among the antilegomena seems doubtful. Eusebius informs us that "it was disputed, and consequently not placed among the homologomena. By others, however, it is judged most necessary, especially to those who need an elementary introduction; hence we know that it has been already in public use in our churches, and I have also understood, by tradition, that some of the most ancient writers have made use of it (iii, 5)." Origem speaks of The Shepherd as "commonly used by the Western Church, and received as divine by the unanimous consent of all." He therefore cites it, not as authority, but simply by way of illustration (lib. x, in Epist. ad Roman.). Eusebius further informs us that in his own time there were some in the Church of Rome who did not regard the Epistle to the Hebrews as the production of the Apostle Paul (vi, 25; iii, 8). Indeed, it was through the influence of Jerome that the Church of Rome, at a much later period, was with much difficulty brought to acknowledge it as canonical. The most ancient Latin or Western Church did not rank it among the canonical writings, though the epistle was well known to them, for Clement of Rome has quoted from it many passages. It is true that some Latin writers in the fourth century received it, among whom was Jerome himself; yet even in the time of Jerome the Latin Church had not placed it among the canonical writings (Marcellis Michaelis, iv, 260). The rejected books, the Latin Church therefore, in the lists of, was disposed not to be Paul's on account of the difference of style, but it is believed to have been written by Barnabas, according to Tertullian, or by Luke the Evangelist; according to others, by Clement, afterward bishop of the Roman Church, who is said to have reduced them to canon, and to have published books in his own language; or at least that Paul, in writing to the Hebrews, had purposely omitted all mention of his name, in consequence of the edict attached to it, and wrote to them eloquently in Hebrew, as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, and that what he thus eloquently wrote in Hebrew was still more eloquently written in Greek. If there is any doubt that this was the case, the Church cannot be in the "true style" (Ex Catalog.). And again, in his epistle to Dardanus, "I must acquaint our people that the epistle which is inscribed 'To the Hebrews' is acknowledged as the Apostle Paul's, not only by the Churches of the East, but by all the Greek ecclesiastical writers, although most of the Latins do not conceive it to be either written by Barnabas or Clement, and that it matters nothing by whom it was written, as it proceeds from a churchman (ecclesiastical viri), and is celebrated by being daily read in the churches. But if the custom of the Latins does not receive it among canonical Scriptures, not because the Churches that are attached to John, if not regarding, receive them both, not following the custom of the present age, but the authority of ancient writers; not referring to them as they are in the habit of doing with respect to apocryphal writings, and citations from classical and profane author, but as canonic and ecclesiastical. Peter also," says Jerome, "wrote two epistles called Catholic; the second of which is denied by most on account of the difference of style (Ex Catalog.). Jude is rejected by most in consequence of the citation from the apocryphal book of Enoch. Notwithstanding, it has authority by use and antiquity, and is accredited to him (the Holy Fathers say); and in his letter to Polycarp: "Paul wrote to seven churches, but the Epistle to the Hebrews is by most excluded from the number;" and in his commentary on Isaiah, he observes that "the Latin usage does not receive the Epistle to the Hebrews among the canonical Scriptures." The high repute which origin Ruffinus, who reckons fourteen epistles of Paul, two of Peter, one of James, three of John, and the Apocalypse. It seems doubtful whether, antecedent to the times of Jerome and Ruffinus, any councils, even of single churches, had settled upon the canon of Scripture, and decided the question respecting the antilegomena, for the removal of doubts among their respective communities; for it seems evident that the general or eccumenical council of Nice, which met in the year 325, formed no catalogue. The first catalogue, indeed, which has come down to us is that of an anonymous writer of the third century. He reckons thirteen epistles of Paul, and the revelation of the Apocalypse, as the work of an Alexandrian Marcionite, mentions the Epistle, Jude, two of John, and the revelations of John and Peter, saying, with respect to them, that "some among us are opposed to their being read in the church" (see Heng's Introduction, § xlv). But soon after this catalogue was adopted the pauline books, in gradually in favor of the antilegomena, or controverted books: for we then find them for the first time cited without any marks of doubt as to their canonicity. Thus, in the year 348, Cyril of Jerusalem enumerates fourteen epistles of Paul and seven Catholic epistles. Gregory of Nazianzus, who, according to Cave (Historia Literaria), was born about the time of the Nicene Council, and died in 389, enumerates all the books now received except the Apocalypse. Epiphanius, who was chosen bishop of Constantia in A.D. 367 or 368, and composed his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers in 392, cites, in his Panarion, the different number of Nicean canonicity, which shows that he received all that are in the present canon. Of the Apocalypse he says that it was "generally or by most received;" and, speaking of the Almsgans, who rejected all John's writings, he observes, "If they had rejected the Apocalypse only, it might have been supposed that they had acted from a critical judgment, as being in some book, as it is known, or mysterious book; but to reject all John's writings was a sign of an anti-Christian spirit." Ambrose also, bishop of Iconium, in Lycaonia, who was contemporary with Epiphanius, and is supposed to have been a heretic, in the year 394, after citing the fourteen epistles of Paul, in his Panarion, says: "But some say the Epistle to the Hebrews is spurious, not speaking correctly, for it is a genuine gift. Then the Catholic epistles, of which some receive seven, others only three, one of James, one of Peter, one of John; while others receive three of John, two of Peter, and Jude's. The Revelation of John is approved by some, while many say it is spurious." The eighty-fifth of the Apostolical Canons, a work falsely ascribed to Clement of Rome, but written at latest in the fourth century, enumerates fourteen epistles of Paul, one of Peter, three of John, one of James, two of Jude, two of Clement, two of Philemon, and among the canonical books of Scripture. This latter book, adds the pseudo-Clement, it is not fit to publish before all, "because of the mysteries contained in it." The first council that is supposed to have given a list of the canonical books is the much ascribed council of Laodicea, supposed to have been held about the year 369 or 364 by thirty or forty bishops of Lydia and the neighboring parts; but the fifty-ninth article, which gives a catalogue of the canonical books, is not generally held to be genuine. Its genuineness, indeed, has been questioned by both Roman Catholic and Protestant historians. In his Introduction to the Old Testament, James版 accounts the work of "an anonymous framez." Among the canonical books included in the pretended fifty-ninth canon of this council are the seven Catholic epistles, viz., one of James, two of Peter, three of John, one of Jude; fourteen of Paul, in the following order, viz., Romans, 1 and 2, Corinthians, Ephesians, Colossians, 1 and 2, Thessalonians, Philippians, 1 and 2, Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. The Apocalypse is not named. Jerome and Augustine, whose opinions had great influence in settling the canon of Scripture, essentially agreed in regard to the books of the New Testament. Augustine was present in the year 393 at the council of Hippo, which drew up a catalogue of all the books of Scripture, agreeing in all points, so far as the New Testament was concerned, with the canon universally received, with the exception, perhaps, of the Hebrews, for the ancient doubt still appears through the writing of the acts of this council. They commence this catalogue with enumerating only thirteen epistles of Paul, and then add "one, every one, of the apostles, to the Hebrews." They then mention two of Peter, three of John, one of James, and the Apocalypse, as a proviso that the churches beyond the sea be consulted with respect to this canon. And to the same effect the council of Carthage, held in the year 397, having adopted the preceding catalogue, the same council adds, "But let this be known to our brother and fellow-priest (consacratini) Boniface [bishop of Rome], or to the other bishops of those parts, that we have received those [books] from the fathers to be read in the church." The same catalogue is repeated in the epistle of Innocent I, bishop of Rome, to St. Exupere, bishop of Toulouse, in the year 404, which, by those who acknowledge its genuineness, is looked upon as a confirmation of the decree of Hippo and Carthage. It was still more formally confirmed in the Roman synod presided over by Pope Gelasius in 494, "if, indeed, to use the words of the learned Roman Catholic historian, 'this is the conclusion of this introduction' (see his Introduction). But, however this may be, the controversy had now nearly subsided, and the antilegomena were henceforward put on a par with the acknowledged books, and took their place beside them in all copies of the Scriptures. Indeed, subsequently to the era of Hippo, the canonical status of the Epistles of John was no longer disputed, and a voice was raised in the churches and the schools against the genuineness of the antilegomena. Theodorus, bishop of Mopanesta, for instance, the celebrated Syrian commentator and preacher, who died about A.D. 428, is accused by Leo of Byzantium of having "abrogated the epistles of John after antiquity," while he has "rejected other Catholic epistles" (see Canalis Thesaurus, i, 577). And Cosmas Indicopleustes, so called from the voyage which he made to India about the year 585 to 547, in his Christian Topography, has the following observations in reference to the authority of these books: "I forbear to allege arguments from the Catholic epistles, because from ancient times the Church has looked upon them as of doubtful authority. . . . . . . . . Eusebius Pamphilus, in his Ecclesiastical History, says that at Ephesus there are two monuments, one of John the Evangelist, and another of John, an elder, who wrote two of the Catholic epistles, the second and the third inscription of this monument being in the words, 'The elect lady,' and 'The elder to the beloved Gaius,' and both he and Ireneus say that but two are written by the apostles, the first of Peter, and the first of John. . . . . . Among the Syrians are found only the three before mentioned, viz., the Epistle of James, the Epistles of Peter, and the Epistle of John; they have the rest. It does not become a perfect Christian to confirm any thing by doubtful books, when the books in the Testament acknowledged by all (homologomeno) have sufficiently declared all things to be known about the heavens, and the earth, and the elements, and all Christian doctrine." The most ancient Greek manuscripts which have come down to our times contain the Antilegomena. From this circumstance it is extremely probable that the copies from which they were transcribed were written after the controversies respecting their canonicity had subsided. The Alexandrian manuscript in the British Museum (one of the oldest, the text of which has been written in the fourth or early in the fifth century) contains all the books now commonly received, together with some others, with a table of contents, in which they are cited in the following order: 'Seven Catholic epistles, fourteen of Paul, the Revelation of John, the First Epistle of Clement, the Second Epistle of Clement, and the Psalms of Solomon (which latter have, however, been lost from the MS.).' (It is observe that Eusebius classed the First Epistle of Clement among the Homologomena, or universally-received books: but by this he probably meant no more than the brevity of his article, which he alleged to be the genuine work of Clement. The order of all the epistles is the same as in our modern Bibles, except that the Epistle to the Hebrews is placed after the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians. In the Vatican manuscript B, which, in respect of antiquity, disputes the precedence with the others, the Apocalypse is wanting, but it contains the remaining epistles. The omission of this last book may be owing simply to the loss of the last part of the codex, in consequence of which the concluding chapters of the Hebrews, and the whole of 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and Philemon are likewise missing. The Syrian canon of the New Testament did not include all the antilegomena. All the manuscripts of the Syrian version (the Peshito, a work of the second century) which have come down to us omit the Second Epistle of Peter, the Second and Third of John, that of Jude, and the Apocalypse. Nor are these books received to this day either by the Jacobite or Nestorian Church. They are all written and copied in the Vatican and Medicean copies, written in the years 548 and 586, and in the beautiful manuscript of the Peshito, preserved in the British Museum, and the writing of which was concluded at the monastery of Bethokhi, A.D. 768, on 197 leaves of vellum, in the Estrangalo character.

In the inquiring age immediately preceding the Reformation the controversy respecting the antilegomena was revived, especially by Erasmus and Cardinal Cajetan; but, by the latter, however, upon principles so questionable as to expose him to the charge of assailing the authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews with the same weapons which the Emperor Julian had employed to impugn the authority of Matthew's Gospel. The doubts thus raised were in a great measure silenced by the decree of the council of Trent, although there have not been wanting learned Roman Catholic divines since this period who have ventured to question at least the Pauline authenricity of the Epistle to the Hebrews. It is well known that Luther, influenced in this instance not so much by his humanistic, as by his dogmatical views, called the Epistle of James "an epistle of straw" (epistola stramoniana). He also wished the antilegomena to be distinguished from the other books by his translation of the Bible. In consequence of this, the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistles of James and Jude, and the Apocalypse have neither numbers attached to them in the German copies of the Bible up to the middle of the seventeenth century; and it is observed by Tholuck (Commentary on Hebrews, in Biblical Cabinet) that "the same plan should have been adopted with respect to second Peter and second and third John, but it did not seem proper to detach them from the Homologomena which belonged to them. Thus he wished at the same time to point out what were the "right noble chief books of Scripture." We are informed by Father Paul Sarpi (Hist. of Reformation, p. 274, col. 2, ch. xlvii, p. 240) that one of the charges collected from the writings of Luther in this council was "that no books should be admitted into the canon of the Old Testament which were not in the canon of the Jews, and that from the New should be excluded the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistle of James, the Second Epistle of Peter, and the Second and Third of John, and the Apocalypse." Tholuck states that the "Evangelical Churches, both Lutheran and Reformed, adopted the same canon with respect to the New Testament as that of the council of Trent" (Commentary on Hebrews, vol. i, Introd., ch. i, § 5, note b). Some, or all, of the antilegomena (as 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, and 3 John, and Jude, which are not included in the official church to this day), are admitted by some of the churches, especially in Germany. See each in its place. —Kitto, s. v. Compare Canon of Scripture.

Antilibanus (Ἀντιλίβανος, opposite Libanus, Antilibanous, the eastern of the two great parallel ridges of mountains that enclose the valley of the Celys, or proper (Strabo, xvi, 764; Ptol., v, 16, § 5; Pliny, v, 20). It is now called Jebel en-Sheikh. The Hebrew name of Lebanon (Sept. Aijovec, Vulg. Libamius), which signifies "white," from the gray color of the limestone, comprehends the two ranges of Libanus and Antilibanun, as they are distinguished in classical usage. The general direction of the Antilibanun range is north and south. Nearly opposite Damascas it bifurcates into diverging branches. The easternmost of these, the Helmons of the O. T. (Jebel en-Sheikh), continues its south-west course, and attains, in its greatest elevation, a point about 10,000 feet above the sea. The other ridge takes a more westerly course, is lower and less, and at length unites with the other bluffs and spurs of Libanun. The former of these branches was called by the Sidonians Sirion, and by the Amorites Shemir (Deut. iii, 9), both names signifying "a coat of mail" (Rosenmuller, Alkach, i, 254). In Deuteronomy (iv, 9) it is called Monat Shenir, "an elevation." In the latter books (Can. iv, 8; 1 Chron. xxviii, 23) Shenir is distinguished from Hormus, the seaport so called; and in its Arabic form, Shenir, this was applied, in the Middle Ages, to Antilibanun, north of Hormus (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr. p. 164). The geological formations seem to belong to the Upper Jura classification of rocks, oolite and Jura dolomite prevailing. The popular description of its vegetation. The only prominent mountains, in common with those of Libanus, supplied the Phenicians with abundance of timber for ship-building. —Grote, Hist. of Greece, iii, 358; Ritter, Erdkunde, Xv, ii, 156 sq.; 494; Raumer, Pakist. p. 29-35; Burchhardt, Syria; Robinson, Researches, iii, 244. Antimemism (from Αντί, instead of, and μεμερισμός, a table), the compartmented table-cloth, occasionally used in the Greek Church, in places where an altar is not. It answers to the Latin altare portabile, or portable altar. The origin of this cloth is said to be the following: When the bishop consecrated a church, a cloth, which had been spread on the ground and over the communion-table, was torn in pieces and distributed among the priests, who carried away each a fragment to serve to cover the tables in their churches and chapels; not that it was necessary such cloths should be laid on all tables, but only on those which either were not consecrated or whose consecration was doubtful.

Antinomians (from Αντί, against, and νόμος, the law), those who reject the moral law as not binding upon Christians. Some go farther than this, and say that good works hinder salvation, and that a child of God cannot sin; that the moral law is altogether abrogated as a rule of life; that no Christian believing or working any good, but that Christ only believes and worketh, etc. Wesley defines Antinomianism as "the doctrine which makes void the law through the faith." (Works, vol. i, p. 399). It is the opinion of some that its view of the imputation of Christ's righteousness implies that he performs for men the obedience which they ought to perform, and therefore that God, in justice, can demand nothing further from man. As consequences of this doctrine, Antinomianism affirms that if Christ is charged with the moral law, that Christians are therefore not obliged to observe the same, that they are not obliged to use the ordinances, and is freed from "the bondage of good works;" and that preachers ought not to exhort men unto good works: not unbelievers, because it is hurtful; not believers, because it is needless (Wesley, Works, vol. iv, 196).
Augustine on the divine law; and that, consequently, they have no occasion either to confess their sins or to break them off by repentance.

4. Antinomianism arose also, in the 17th century, from ultra-Calvinism, especially as taught by Dr. Crisp (1642). It is true he acknowledges that, "In respect of the righteousness of obedience, we are under the law still, or else," as he adds, "we are lawless, to live every man as seems good in his own eyes, which no true Christian dares so much as think of."); The following sentiments, however, among others, are taught in his sermons:

"The law is a thing impossible, requiring what is naturally impossible.

The sins of the saints were so imputed to Christ, as, that though he did not commit them, yet they became actually his transgressions, and ceased to be theirs."

"The feelings of conscience, which tell them that sin is theirs, arise from a want of knowing the truth."

"It is but the voice of a lying spirit in the hearts of believers that saith they have yet sin wasting their consciences, and lying as a burden too heavy for them to bear."

"Christ's righteousness is so imputed to the elect, that they, ceasing to be sinners, are as righteous as he was, and all that he was."

"An elect person is not in a condemned state while he believes; and it is useless to die before God calls him to believe, he would not be lost."

"Repentance and confession of sin are not necessary to forgiveners. A believer may certainly conclude before confession, yea, as soon as he hath committed sin, the interest he hath in Christ, and the love of Christ embracing him." (Crisp, Works, ii, 261-273; Orne, Life of Baxter, ii, 292.)

This form of High Calvinism, or Antinomianism, absolutely "withers and destroys the consciousness of human responsibility. It confounds moral with natural impotency, forgetting that the former is a crime, the latter only a misfortune; and thus treats the man dead in trespasses and sins as if he were already in his grave. It prophecies smooth things to the sinner going on in his transgressions, and soothes to slumber and the repose of death the souls of such as are at ease in Zion. It assumes, that because men can neither believe, repent, nor pray acceptably, unless aided by the grace of God, it is useless to do what is needful to save so. It maintains that the Gospel is only intended for elect sinners, and therefore it ought to be preached to none but such. In defiance, therefore, of the command of God, it refuses to preach the glad tidings of mercy to every sinner. In opposition to Scripture, and to every rational consideration, it contends that it is impossible to believe that he who believes is conscious of the obvious inference that it is not a sin to reject it. In short, its whole tendency is to produce an impression on the sinner's mind that, if he is not saved, it is not his fault, but God's; that, if he is condemned, it is more for the glory of the Divine Sovereignty than as the punishment of his guilt. So far from regarding the moral cure of human nature as the great object and design of the Gospel, Antinomianism does not take it in at all, but as it exists in Christ, and becomes ours by a figure of speech. It regards the grace and the pardon as every thing, the spiritual design or effect as nothing. Hence its opposition to the sacrament of baptism as imputed sanctification: the former is intelligible and tangible, but the latter a mere figment of the imagination. Hence its delight in exalting the eternal decrees, which it does not understand, but which serve to amuse and to deceive, and its dislike to all the sober realities of God's present dealings and commandments. It basely conceives the contemplation of a Christ who is a kind of concretion of all the moral attributes of his people, to the over-looking of that Christ who is the Head of all that in heaven and on earth bear his likeness, and while unconscious of possessing it. It boasts in the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints, while it no saint but one, that is Jesus, and neglects to persevere" (Orme's Life of Baxter, ii, 245).

The chief English writers of the 17th century who have been charged as favoring Antinomianism, besides Cripps, are Richardson, Salter, Blake, Hayton, Eaton, Town, etc. These were answered by Gataker, Witsius, Bull, Ridgely, and especially by Baxter and Williams. For Baxter's relation to the controversy, see Orme, Life of Baxter, vol. ii, chap. ix, where it is stated that "Baxter saw only the commencement of the controversy. He addressed the Dissenters for no more than seven years after he had gone to his rest († 1691). He was succeeded by his friend Dr. William († 1716), who, after incredible exertion and no small suffering, finally cleared the ground of the Antinomians."

In the eighteenth century Antinomianism again showed itself, both in the Church of England and among the Dissenters, as an offshoot of what was called High Calvinism. Its most powerful opponents were John Fletcher, in his Checks to Antinomianism (Works, N. Y. ed. 4 vols. 8vo) and John Wesley, Works (N. Y. ed. 7 vols. 8vo). The error of Antinomianism lies chiefly in the connection it draws between the law and the Gospel. Wesley saw this, and dwells, in many parts of his writings, on the relation and connection of law and Gospel. We give an instance: "There is no contradiction at all between the law and the Gospel. Indeed, neither of them supersedes the other, but they agree perfectly well together. Yes, the very same words, considered in different parts of the Gospel, are part of the law and of the Gospel. If they are considered as commandments, they are part of the law; if as promises, of the Gospel. Thus, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart,' when considered as a commandment, is a branch of the law; when regarded as a promise, is an essential part of the Gospel—the Gospel being no other than the commandments of the law proposed by way of promise. There is, therefore, the closest connection that can be conceived between the law and the Gospel. On the one hand, the law continually makes way for, and points us to the Gospel; on the other, the Gospel continually leads us to a more exact fulfilling of the law. The law, for instance, requires us to love God, to love our neighbor, to be meek, humble, or holy. We feel that we are not sufficient for these things; yes, that 'with man this is impossible.' But we see a promise of God to give us that love. We lay hold of this Gospel, of these glad tidings, and make it our aim to secure the 'righteousness of the law is fulfilled in us' through faith which is in Christ Jesus. The moral law, contained in the Ten Commandments, and enforced by the prophets, Christ did not take away. It was not the design of his coming to revoke any part of this. This is a law which never can be broken, which 'stands fast as the faithful witness in heaven.' The moral stand on an entirely different foundation from the ceremonial or ritual law, which was only designed for a temporary restraint upon a disobedient and stiff-necked people; whereas this was from the beginning of the world, being written upon the hearts of all men" (Sermone, i, 17, and 228). The heresy showed itself at a later period, especially through the influence of Dr. Robert Hawk- er (q. v.), vicar of Charles the Martyr, Plymouth, who was a very popular preacher, and 'poisoned the surrounding region' with Antinomian tendencies. Against him Cobden wrote in his Theological System of the Plymouth Antinomians, and Burt, Observations on Haverick's System of Theology. See Robert Hall, Works (N. Y. ii, 458); Bennett, History of the Dissenters, p. 344. A full account of the Antinomians of the Crippian type, and of the controversy about, is given in Nelson, Life of John Cripps, ed. of 1843. Antioch (Ἀντίοχος, from ἀντιόχησις, the name of two places mentioned in the New Testament.

1. Antioch in Syria.—A city on the banks of the Orontes, 800 miles north of Jerusalem, and about 30 from the Mediterranean. This metropolis was situated where the chain of Lebanon, running northward, and the chain of Taurus, running eastward, are brought together in an abrupt meeting; the city is surrounded on each side by mountains. Antioch was placed at a bend of the river, partly on an island, partly on the level which forms the left bank, and partly on the steep and craggy ascent of Mount Silpius, which rises abruptly on the south. It was in the province of Seleucia, called Tetrapolis, from containing the four cities of Antioch, Seleucia, Apamea, and Laodicea; of which the first was named after Antiochus, the father of the founder; the second after himself; the third after his wife Apama; and the fourth in honor of his mother. The same appellation (Tetrapolitana) was given also to Antioch, because it consisted of four towns or quarters, separated by a separate wall, and all four by a common wall. The first was built by Seleucus Nicator, who peopled it with inhabitants from Antigonia; the second by the settlers belonging to the first quarter; the third by Seleucus Callinicus; and the fourth by Antiochus Epiphanes (Strabo, xvi, 2; iii, 356, ed. Tauch.). Its suburb Daphne was celebrated for its grove and fountains (Strabo, xvi, 2; iii, 356, ed. Tauch.), its asylum (2 Mac. iv, 35), and temple dedicated to Apollo and Diana. The temple and the village were deeply beloved in a thick grove of laurels and cypresses which reached as far as a circumference of ten miles, and formed in the most sultry summers a cool and impenetrable shade. A thousand streams of the purest water, issuing from every hill, preserved the verdure of the earth and the temperature of the air (Gibbon, ch. xxiii). Hence Antiochus Epiphanes called it Epiphanes (Apopfanes of stones, Josephus, Ant. xvi, 2, 1; Epiphanes cognomtis, Plin. Hist. Nat. v, 18). It was very populous; within 150 years after its erection the Jews slew 100,000 persons in it in one day (1 Mac. xii, 47). In the time of Chrysostom the population was computed at 200,000, of whom one half, or even a greater proportion, were of the Jewish race (Theod. Jud. i, 588; Hom. in Ignat. ii, 597; In Matt. Hom. 85, vii, 810). Chrysostom also states that the Church at Antioch maintained 3000 poor, besides occasionally relieving many more (In Matt. Hom. viii, 658). Ciceron speaks of the city as distinguished by men of learning and art (De Fin. i, 79). The dialect of Judea resided in it. Seleucus Nicator granted the rights of citizenship, and placed them on perfect equality with the other inhabitants (Josephus, Ant. xii. 3, 12). These privileges were continued to them by Vespasian and Titus—an instance (Josephus remarks) of the equity and generosity of the Romans, who, in opposition to the wishes of the Alexandrians and Antiochenes, protected the Jews, notwithstanding the provocations they had received from them in their wars (Apion, ii. 4). They were also allowed to build an archon or estarch of their own (Josephus, Wars, vii. 3, 8). Antioch is called íbera by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 18), having obtained from Pompey the privilege of being governed by its own laws (see Smith, Dict. of Class. Geog., s. v.).

The Christian faith was introduced at an early period into Antioch, and with great success (Acts xi. 19, 21, 24). The name "Christians" was here first applied to its professors (Acts xi. 26). No city, after Jerusalem, is so intimately connected with the history of the apostolic Church. One of the seven deacons or almoners appointed at Jerusalem was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts vi. 5). The Christians who were dispersed from Jerusalem at the death of Stephen preached the Gospel at Antioch (xi. 19). It was from Jerusalem that Agabus and the other prophets who foretold the famine came to Antioch (xi. 27, 28); and Barnabas and Saul were consequently sent as missionaries of charity to the latter city to the former (xi. 30; xii. 25). It was from Jerusalem, again, that the Judaizers came who disturbed the Church at Antioch (xv. 1); and it was at Antioch that Paul rebuked Peter for conduct in which he had been betrayed through the influence of emissaries from Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 11, 12). Antioch soon became a central point for the diffusion of Christianity among the Gentiles, and maintained for several centuries a high rank in the Christian world (see Semler, In\is societ\ia Christ. Antiochiae, Hal. 1767). A controversy which arose between certain Jewish believers from Jerusalem and the Gentile converts at Antioch respecting the permanence of the oblation of the rite of circumcision was the occasion of the first apostolic council or convention (Acts xv.). Antioch was the scene of the early labors of the Apostle Paul, and the place whence he set forth on his first missionary labors (Acts xi. 26; xii. 2). Ignatius was the second bishop or overseer of the Church, for about forty years, till his martyrdom in A.D. 107. In the third and following centuries a number of councils were held at Antioch [see Antiocoh, Councils of], and in the course of the fourth century a new theological school was formed there, which, having derived the name School of Antioch [see Antiocoh, School of]. Two of its most distinguished teachers were the presbyters Dorotheus and Lucas, the latter of whom suffered martyrdom in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 312 (Nennander, Aligemeine Geschicht, 1, 3, p. 1257; Gieseler, Lehrbuch, 1, 373; Lardner, Credibility, pt. ii. ch. 65, 58). Lianius (born A.D. 314), the rhetorician, the friend and paeanyist of the Emperor Julian, was a native of Antioch (Lardner, Testimonies of Ancient Heathens, ch. 49; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, etc. ch. 24). It had likewise the lessequefocal honor of being the birthplace of his illustrious pupil, John Chrysostom, born A.D. 347, died A.D. 407.

Antioch was founded, B.C. 800, by Seleucus Nicator, with circumstances of considerable display, which were afterward embellished by failure. The situation was well chosen, both for military and commercial purposes. Antioch grew under the successive Seleucid kings till it became a city of great extent and of remarkable beauty. Some of the most magnificent buildings were on the island. One feature, which seems to have been characteristic of the great Syrian cities—a vast street with colonnades, intersecting the whole from end to end—was added by Antiochus the Great to the city.

Some lively notices of the Antioch of this period, and of its relation to Jewish history, are supplied by the books of Maccabees (see especially 1 Macc. iii. 37; xi. 13; 2 Macc. iv. 7-9; v. 21; xi. 36).

The early emperors raised there some large and important structures, such as aqueducts, amphitheatres, and baths. Herod the Great contributed a road and a colonnade (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 5, 3; Wars, i. 21, 11).

In A.D. 260 Sapor, the Perisan king, surprised and pillaged it, and multitudes of the inhabitants were slain or sold as slaves. It has been frequently brought to the verge of utter ruin by earthquakes (Lardner, 394, 396, 458, 526, 528), by that of A.D. 556 no less than 250,000 persons were destroyed, the population being swelled by an influx of strangers to the festival of the Ascension. The Emperor Justinian gave forty-five centenaries of gold ($600,000) to restore the city. Scarcely had it resumed its ancient splendor (A.D. 540) when it was again taken and delivered to the flames by Chosroes.

In A.D. 658 it was captured by the Saracens. Its "safety was ransomed with 300,000 pieces of gold, but the throne of the successors of Alexander, the seat of the Roman government in the East, which had been decorated by Caesar with the titles of free, and holy, and inviolate, was degraded under the yoke of the caliphs to the secondary rank of a provincial town" (Gibbon, ii.). In A.D. 975 it was retaken by Nicephorus Phocas. In A.D. 1080 the son of the governor Philaretus betrayed it into the hands of Soliman. Seventeen years after the Duke of Normandy entered it at the head of 30,000 men and a fleet; but, as the citadel still held out, the victors, in their turn besieged by a fresh host under Kerboga and twenty-eight emirs, which at last gave way to their desperate valor (Gibbon, viii.). In A.D. 1268 Antioch was occupied and ruined by Bosochar or Bilears, sultan of Egypt and Syria; this first seat of the Christian name being depopulated by the slaughter of 17,000 persons, and the captivity of 100,000. About the middle of the fifteenth century the three patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem convoked a synod, and denounced all connection with the Latin Church (see Cellar. Notit. ii. 417 sq.; Richter, Wallfahrt, p. 281; Mannert, VI, i, 467 sq.).

authority for all that is known of ancient Antioch is Möller's Antiquitates Antiochenae (Göttingen 1839). Modern Antakya is a shrunken and miserable place. Some of the walls, shattered by earthquakes, are described in Chessney's account of the Expedition of the Engravés (i, 810 sq., comp. the history, St. ii, 452 sq.), where also is given a view of the gateway which still bears the name of St. Paul.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

ANTIOCH, COUNCILS OF. Among the more important of the councils held at Antioch are the following:

In 252, by the patriarch Fabius, or Fabianus, his successor, Demetrius, concerning the Novatian heresy (Labbe, i, 719). In 264, against Paul of Samosate (ibid. p. 843). In 269, when Paul was deposed and anathematized (ibid. p. 883). In 380, against the patriarch Eustathius, who was falsely accused of Sabellianism and adultery, and deposed. In 411 (Conc. in Encirca), on occasion of the dedication of the great church of Antioch; ninety-seven bishops were present, of whom forty at least were Arians. This synod was probably orthodox in its commencement, but degenerated into a pseudo-synod, in which, after the departure of the orthodox majority, the remaining Arians condemned the church; and, in all probability, the "Three Chapters" [see Chapters] were then composed. In 424, by the Armenian bishops, in which the μακεδονιας, or long confession of faith, was drawn up. In 384, by thirty Armenian bishops, who again condemned Athanasius, because he had returned to his see without being first synodically declared innocent (Soz. lib. iv, cap. 8). In 556, at which Homousianism and Homoioasianism were both condemned. In 363, in which Acacius of Cæsarea and other Arians admitted the Nicene faith (ibid. ii, 825). In 367, in which the word "consubstantial" was rejected (ibid.). In 380, in which Melitius, at the head of one hundred and forty bishops, who confirmed the faith of the council of Rome in 387 (Vales. ad Theod. lib. v, cap. 3). In 438, in which John of Antioch and Cyril were reconciled (Labbe, iii, 1285). In 485, in which the memory of Theodorus of Mopsuestia was defended and Proclus's work on him approved. In 440, against Theodorus of Mopsuestia. In 451, on the conversion of the Eutychians (Labbe, iv). In 560, in defence of the council of Chalcedon. In 761, for the worship of images, under Theodorus. In 1806 the bishops of the united Greek Church held, under the presidency of the papal patriarch, a synod, known under the name synod of Antioch, in the convent of Carmen in the diocese of Beyrut, and endorsed the Gallican and anti-papal resolutions of the synod of Pistoja (q.v.). Nevertheless, their proceedings received the approbation of the papal delegate, and were published, with his approbation, in 1810, in the Arabic language. But in 1834 Pope Gregory XVI ordered the Melchite patriarch to furnish an Italian translation of the proceedings, and then condemned them by a brief of Sept. 16, 1835.—Landon, Manual of Councils; Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

ANTIOCH, PATRIARCHATE OF. Tradition reports that St. Peter was the first bishop of Antioch, but there is no historical proof of it. It is certain, however, that the Church of Antioch stood prominent in the early ages of the Church, and its see was held by Ignatius and other eminent men. Its bishops ranked in the early Church only after those of Rome and Alexandria. When the bishop of Constantinople received the title patriarch, St. Peter was next to that of Rome, and he occupied the fourth rank among the episcopal sees. In the fifth century the bishop of Antioch received, together with the bishops of the other prominent sees, the title patriarch (q.v.). In the fourth century this powerful Church included not less than a hundred thousand persons, three thousand of whom were supported out of the public donations. It is painful to trace the progress of declension in such a church as this. But the period now referred to, namely, the age of Chrysostom, toward the close of the fourth century, may be considered as the brightest of its history subsequent to the apostolic age, and the from which the Church at Antioch may date its fall. It continued, indeed, outwardly prosperous; but superstition, secular ambition, the pride of life; pomp and formalism in the service of God in place of humility and sincerity; the growth of faction and the decay of the older religious feeling, and a new religious excitation, and that the foundations were laid of that great apostasy which, in two centuries from this time, overspread the whole Christian world, led to the entire extinction of the Church in the East, and still holds dominion over the fairest portions of the West. For many years, up to the accession of Theodosius, the Arians filled the see; and after the council of Chalcedon Peter Fullo and others who refused to acknowledge that synod occupied the patriarchal throne; but of them all the worst was Severus, the abettor of the Monophysite heresy (A.D. 512-518). His followers were so many and powerful, that they were able to appoint a successor of the same opinions; and from that time to the present there has been a Monophysite or Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, who, however, fixed its see, not at Antioch itself, like all the former, but at Tarsus, in Mesopotamia, and at the present day in Diarbekir. The rest of the patriarchate of Antioch was separated between the Eastern and Western Churches, and constituted a part of the Greek Church. In it is still a patriarch of Antioch, yet with only a small district, and subordinate to the patriarch of Constantinople. For those Greeks and Jacobites who were prevailed upon to enter into a union with the Roman Church, two patriarchs, bearing the title patriarch of Antioch, are appointed, one for the united Greeks, and one for the united Syrians.

The provinces of the ancient patriarchate were as follows:

1. Syria Prima.
2. Phoenicia Prima.
3. Phoenicia Secunda.
4. Arabia.
5. Iulia Prima.
6. Iulia Secunda.

The province of Theodoria, composed of a few cities in the two Syrias, was afterward formed by the Emperor Justinian. It is a question whether the region of Persia, which in the time of Constantine the Great was filled by the Arians, was made a part of the patriarchate of Antioch. Peter, patriarch of Antioch in the eleventh century, William of Tyre, and the Arabic canons, assert that such was the case. The Christians now in Persia are Nestorians, and disclaim any subjection to the see of Antioch. It was the ancient custom of this patriarchate for the patriarch to consecrate the metropolitans of his diocese, who in their turn consecrated and overlooked the bishops of their respective provinces; in which it differed from the Church of Alexandria, where each individual diocese depended immediately upon the patriarch, who appointed every bishop. The patriarch of the Syrian Jacobites styles himself "Patriarch of Antioch, the city of God, and of the whole East." —Lardner, Works, iv, 558 sq.; Historia Patriarcharum Antich. in Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. ii; Boschil Tract. hist. chronol. de Patriarchis Antioch. (Venet. 1746). See also Brooks, and George Calum lai.

ANTIOCH. SCHOOL OF, a theological seminary which arose at the end of the fourth century, but which had been prepared for a century before by the learned presbyters of the Church of Antioch. It distinguished itself by diffusing a taste for scriptural knowledge, and aimed at a middle course in Biblical History and dogma; and the method of interpretation, the theological tendencies, and the literary method of interpretation (see Münzer, Urb. d. Antiochier. Schol. in Siduolin, Archiv, i, 1, 1). Several other seminaries sprung up from it in the Syrian Church. As distinguished from the school of Alexandria, its tendency was logical rather than intellectual or mystical. The term school of Antioch is used also to denote the theological tendencies, over which the Church in Antioch was prominent, as the school of Alexandria was famous for the logical method of interpretation (see Münzer, Urb. d. Antiochier. Schol. in Siduolin, Archiv, i, 1, 1). Several other seminaries sprung up from it in the Syrian Church.

2. ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA, being a border city, was considered at different times as belonging to different provinces (see Cellar. Notit. ii, 187 sq.). Ptolemy, (v, 5) places it in Pamphyla, and Strabo (xii, 577) in Phrygia (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Geoog. s. v.). It was founded by Seleucus Nicator and its first inhabitants were from Magnesia on the Meander. After the defeat of Antiochus III the Great by the Romans, it came into the possession of Eumenes, king of Pergamos, and was afterward transferred to Amyntas. On his death the Romans made it the seat of a proconsular government, and invested it with the privileges of a Colonia Julia Iulia, which included a freedom from taxes and a municipal constitution similar to that of the Italian towns (Ulpianus, lib. 50). Antioch was noted in early times for the worship of Mithras, and was called also Munius or Lunus. Numerous slaves and extensive estates were annexed to the service of the temple; but it was abolished after the death of Amyntas Aracno (xii, 8; iii, 72). When Paul and Barnabas visited this city (Acts xii, 14), they found a Jewish synagogue and a considerable number of proselytes, and met with great success among the Gentiles (ver. 48); but, through the violent opposition of the Jews, were obliged to leave the place, which they did in strict accordance with their Lord's injunction (ver. 51, compared with Matt. x, 14; Luke ix, 5). On Paul's return from Lystra, he revisited Antioch for the purposes of the mind of the Lord (Acts xiv, 21). He probably visited Antioch again at the beginning of his second journey, when Silas was his associate, and Timothy, who was a native of this neighborhood, had just been added to the party (2 Tim. iii, 11). See PAIX.

Till within a very recent period Antioch was supposed to have been situated where the town of Ak-Sheker now stands (Olivieri, iv, 596); but the researches of the Rev. F. Arundell, British chaplain at Smyrna in 1833 (Discoveries, i, 281), confirmed by the still later investigations of Mr. Hamilton, secretary of the Geographical Society (Researches, i, 472), have determined it to be adjoining the town of Yolda-hech; and consequently that Ak-Sheker is the ancient Philomelium described by Strabo (xii, 8; iii, 72, ed. Tauch).: "In Phrygia Parorea is a mountainous ridge stretching from east to west; and under this on either side lies a great plain, and cities near it; to the north Philomelium, and on the other side Antioch, called Antioch near Pididia; the one is situated altogether on the plain; the other on an eminence, and has a colony of Romans." According to Pliny, Antioch was also called Cesarea (v, 24). Mr. Arundell observed the remains of several temples and churches, besides a theatre and a magnificent aqueduct; of the ancient city itself, nothing remains in a perfect state. Mr. Hamilton copied several inscriptions, all, with one exception, in Latin. Of one the only words not entirely effaced were "Antiochae
ANTIOLUS

On the dates, see Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, vol. iii, Appendix, ch. iii. The reigns are as follows:

2. Seleucus I, Soter, his son, 290-261.
3. Antiochus II, the son of his son, 261-246.
4. Seleucus II, Callinicus, his son, 246-220.
5. (Alexander, or Seleucus III, Ceramynus, his son, 252-223.
6. Antiochus III, the Great, his brother, 223-177.
7. Seleucus IV, Philopator, his son, 187-150.
9. Antiochus V, Epiphanes, his son (a minor), 164-162.
11. Alexander Balas, a usurper, who pretended to be son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and was acknowledged by the Romans, 155-153.

On the date of his death, see infra, 176-175.

Antiochus VI, Dionysus (a minor), son of the preceding. He was murdered by the usurper Trypho, who contested the kingdom, 146-143.

Antiochus VII, Sidetes, his brother, 143-141.

Antiochus VIII, Eusebeus, his son, 141-115.

Antiochus IX, Cyzicenus, his half-brother, 116-96.

Antiochus XI, Epiphanes, his half-brother, 101-75.

Antiochus XII, Seleucus, his son, 101-75.

Antiochus XIII, Theos, his son (a minor), 75-69.

Antiochus XIV, a minor, 69-66.

Antiochus XV, Philometor, dynasty, 66-54.

Antiochus XVI, Seleucus, his son, 54-36.

Antiochus XVII, Seleucus, his son, 36-19.

Antiochus XVIII, Seleucus, his son, 19-15.

The following (Nos. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, of the above) are the only ones of the name of Antiochus that are important in sacred literature. (See Fröhlich, Antiochia Syriae; Vaillant, Seleucidar. Imp.)

The following:

1. Antiochus I (Taurus) (Oecus, god), so surnamed "in the first instance of Milisiana, because he overthrew their tyrant Timarchus," Apian, Syr. 65), the son and successor of Antiochus I (Soter) as king of Syria, B.C. 261. He carried on for several years the war inherited from his father with the Egyptian king Ptolemy (II) Philadelphus, who subdued most of the territory of the Seleucids, but at last length (B.C. 250), in order to secure peace, he married Ptolemy's daughter (Berenice) in place of his wife Laodice, and appointed the succession in the line of his issue by her (Polyb. op. Athen. ii, 45); yet, on the death of Ptolemy two years afterward, Antiochus recalled his former wife Laodice, and Berenice and her son were soon after put to death at Daphne. Antiochus himself died, B.C. 246, in the 40th year of his age (Porphyry, in Euseb. Chron. Ant. i, 346), of poison administered by his wife, who could not forget her former divorce (Justin, xxvii, 1; Appian, Syr. 65; Val. Max. ix, 14, 1).

The above alliance of Antiochus with Ptolemy, by the marriage of Berenice to the former, is prophetical-ly referred to in Dan. xi, 6, as "the joining of themselves together" by "the king of the south and the king of the north," through "the king's daughter;" and its failure is there distinctly characterized, through the triumph of Laodice over "him that strengthened her," i.e. her husband Antiochus (see Jerome, Comment. in loc.). After the death of Antiochus, Ptolemy Eregetes, the brother of Berenice ("out of a branch of her root"), who succeeded his father Ptol. Philadelphus, exacted vengeance for his sister's death by an invasion of Syria, in which Laodice was killed, her son Seleucus Callinicus dying for a time from the crown, and the whole country plundered (Dan. xi. 7-9; hence his surname "the benefactor"). The hostilities thus renewed continued for many years; and on the death of Seleucus, B.C. 226, after his "return into his own land" (Dan. xi. 9), his sons Alexander (Seleucus) Ceraunos and Antiochus "assembled a great multitude of forces" against Ptol. Philopator, the son of Evergetes, and one of them (Antiochus) threatened to overthrow the power of Egypt (Dan. xi. 10).—Smith, s. v.

2. Antiochus (III) the Great, Seleucid king of Syria. Son of Seleucus I Nicator, brother of Callinicus, but afterwards declared son of Seleucus (II) Ceraunos, B.C. 229 (Polyb. iv. 40; comp. Euseb. Chron. Arm. i. 847; ii. 230; see Gaebelein, in the Theol. Stud. u. Krit. 1881, iv. 713). In a war with the weak king of Egypt, Ptolemy Philopator, in order to regain Cæle-Syria and Phoenicia, he twice (comp. Polyb. v. 49) penetrated as far as Dura (two miles north of Cesarœa), and on the second occasion he concluded a four-months' truce with his adversary, and led his army back to the Orontes (Polyb. v. 60; Justin, xxxv. 1. 2; Athen. xiii. 577; comp. Dan. xi. 10). On the breaking out of hostilities again, he drove the Egyptian land-forces as far as Zidon, desolated Gidion and Samaria, and took up his winter-quarters at Ptolemais (Polyb. v. 68-71). In the beginning of the following year (B.C. 217), however, he was defeated by the Egyptians (Polyb. v. 79, 80, 82-86; Strabo, xvi. 759; comp. Dan. xi. 11) at Raphia (near Gaza), with an immense loss, and compelled to retreat to Antioch, leaving Cæle-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine to the Egyptians. Thirteen [14] years afterward, Antiochus (in connection with Philip III of Macedon, Liv. xxxii. 24) opened another campaign against Egypt, then ruled over by a child, Ptolemy (V) Epiphanes. He had already conquered three above-named countries, when a war between him and Attalus, king of Pergamus, diverted him to Asia Minor, and in his absence Ptolemy, aided by Scopas, obtained possession of Jerusalem; but, as soon as he had secured peace there, he returned through Cæle-Syria, defeated the Egyptian army at Paneas, and obtained the mastery of all Palestine, B.C. 198 (Polyb. xv. 20; Appian, Syr. 1; Liv. xxx. 19; Joseph, Ant. xii. 3, 8; comp. Dan. xi. 13-16). Ptolemy now formed an alliance with Antiochus, and married his daughter Cleopatra (Polyb. xxviii. 17, 11), who received as a dowry (comp. Dan. xi. 13-16) Cæle-Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine (Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, 1). Antiochus undertook in the following year a naval as well as land expedition against Asia Minor, in which he subdued the greater part of it, and even crossed the Hellespont into Europe. By this means he became (B.C. 192) involved in a war with the Romans (Liv. xxxv. 15; Justin, xxxvi. 1), in which, after many reverses, he was finally compelled, by an unfortunate battle at Magnesia, in Lycia (B.C. 190), to conclude a disgraceful treaty. B.C. 180 (Appian, Syr. 33-89; Polyb. xxi. 14; Liv. xxxvii. 40, 48, 45, 55; Justin, xxi. 8, 18, 1; Macc. vii. 6 sq.). See EUMENES. He lost his life soon afterward (B.C. 187), in the 36th year of his reign, according to Euseb. Chron. ii. 256, 285, but after 34 full years, according to Porphyry. Excerpt. i. 847) in a popular insurrection excited by his attempt to plunder the temple at Elymais, in order to obtain means for paying the tribute imposed upon him by the Romans (Strabo, xvi. 744; Justin, xxxii. 2; Diod. Sic. iv. 257; Porphyry. in Euseb. Chron. Arm. i. 848; comp. Dan. xi. 19). During the war of Antiochus with Egypt, the Jews and inhabitants of Cæle-Syria suffered severely, and the suspense in which they were for a long time kept as to their ultimate civil relations operated injuriously for their interests (Joseph. Ant. xii. 3, 5); but, as this quickly adopted the course of war, after the battle at Paneas, he granted them not only full liberty and important concessions for their worship and religious institutions (Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, 4, 8), but also planted Jewish colonies in Lydia and Phrygia, in order to secure the doubtful fidelity of his subjects there. Two sons of Antiochus II, Seleucus (heir to the throne after him), Seleucus Philopator, his immediate successor, and Antiochus IV, who gained the kingdom upon the assassination of his brother. (See, generally, Flutus, Gesch. Macdon. ii. 226 sq.—Winer, s. v.

3. Antiochus (IV) Epiphanes (Epiphany, illustrious; comp. Michaelis on 1 Macc. i. 10, and Eckhel, Doctr. num., i. iii. 228; nicknamed Epiphanes, Epiphany, madman, Athen. x. 438 sq.; on coins Theos, Oinoigod, see Fröhlich, Amm. tab. 6. 7), a Seleucid king of Syria, second son of Antiochus the Great (Appian, Syr. 45; 1 Macc. i. 11), ascended the throne on the death of his brother, Seleucus Philopator (on his enumeration, the 11th of the Seleucids, Dan. vii. 8, 24; see Lengerke, Daniel, p. 318 sq.; B.C. 175 (see Wernsdorf, De fide libri Macc. p. 28 sq.), and attained an evil notoriety for his tyrannical treatment of the Jews (comp. Dan. vii. 8 sq.), who have described him in the second book of the Maccabees) as barbarous in the extreme (see Eichhorn, Apokr. p. 265). He had been given as a hostage to the Romans (B.C. 188) after his father's defeat at Magnesia. In B.C. 175 he was released by the intervention of his brother Seleucus, who substituted his own son Demetrius in his place. Antiochus was at Athens when Seleucus was assassinated by Heliodorus. He took advantage of his position, and, in the name of Fortune, expelled Heliodorus, who had usurped the crown, and himself "obtained the kingdom by fluctuations" (Dan. xi. 21; comp. Liv. xlii. 20), to the exclusion of his nephew Demetrius (Dan. vii. 8). The accession of Antiochus was immediately followed by desperate efforts of the Hellenizing party at Jerusalem to assert their supremacy. Jason (Jesus; Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, 1; see Jason), the brother of Onias III, the high-priest, persuaded the king to transfer the high-priesthood to him, and at the same time bought permission (2 Macc. iv, 9) to carry out his design of habituating the Jews to Greek customs (2 Macc. iv, 7, 20). Three years afterward, Menelaus, a member of the tribe of Benjamin [see Simaoth], who was commissioned by Jason to carry to Antioch his letters of commission, was appointed by Jason by offering the king a larger bribe, and was himself appointed high-priest, while Jason was obliged to take refuge among the Ammonites (2 Macc. iv, 25-26).

From these circumstances, and from the marked honor with which Antiochus was received at Jerusalem very early in his reign (B.C. cir. 173-171), it appears that he found no difficulty in regaining the border provinces which had been given as the dower of his sister Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes. He undertook four campaigns against Egypt, in order to possess himself of Cæsarea-Syria and Phoenicia, which he had claimed since Cleopatra's death (see the Antiochus preceding); the first B.C. 171, the second B.C. 170 (2 Macc. v, 1; 1 Macc. i, 17 sq.), the third B.C. 169, the fourth B.C. 168. On his return from the second of these campaigns, in the prosecution of which he had overrun the greater part of Egypt, and taken prisoner the Egyptian king, Ptolemy Philometor (comp. Dan. xi, 4-6), he decided on the larger manner of proceedings in Jerusalem, on occasion of the above-mentioned quarrel among the priests [see Menelaus], which had been carried on by open force of arms (comp. Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 1), and vented his rage especially on the temple, which he plundered and desecrated with great bloodshed (1 Macc. i, 20-42; 2 Macc. v, 1-28). Being checked by the Romans in his fourth campaign against Egypt, and compelled in a very peremptory manner to retire (Liv. xiv, 12; Polyb. xxix, 11; Appian, Syr. 66; Diod. Sic. Eclog. xxxi, 2; comp. Dan. xi, 29 sq.), he detached (B.C. 167) from his army a large force of psychopomps, by assault, slaughtered a large part of the inhabitants, and gave up the city to a general sack (1 Macc. i, 30 sq.; 2 Macc. vi, 24 sq.; comp. Dan. xi, 81 sq.). The Jewish worship in the Temple was utterly broken up and abolished (1 Macc. i, 43 sq.). At this time he availed himself of the assistance of the ancestral enemies of the Jews (1 Macc. iv, 61 sq.; 8 sq.; Dan. xi, 41). The decree then followed which has rendered his name infamous. The Greek religion was forcibly imposed upon the Jews, and there was set up, for the purpose of desecrating (Diod. Sic. Eclog. xxxiv, 1) and desecrating the Temple, on the 10th of Kisleu, the so-called "altar of burnt-offerings"; the first victim was sacrificed to Jupiter Olympus, on the 20th of the same month. Many timidly submitted to the royal mandate (1 Macc. i, 49), being already inclined to Gnosticism (1 Macc. i, 12), and sacrificed to the pagan gods (1 Macc. i, 45); but a band of bold patriots united (comp. Dan. xi, 84) under the Asmonian Mattathias (q. v.) and after his death, which occurred shortly afterward, under his heroic son, Judas Maccabaeus (q. v.), and, after acting for a long time on the defensive, at length took the open field in (1 Macc. iv, 19), and gained their freedom (comp. Dan. ix, 25 sq.). Meanwhile Antiochus turned his arms to the East, toward Parthia (Tac. Hist. v, 6) and Armenia (Appian, Syr. 45; Diod. ap. Müller, Fregusii, ii, 10; comp. Dan. xi, 40). Hearing not long afterward of the riches of a temple of Nanaea ("the desire of women," Dan. xi, 87) in Elymais (1 Macc. vi, 1 sq.; see Wernsdorf, De fide Maccab. p. 68 sq.), hung with the gifts of Alexander, he resolved to plunder it. The attempt was defeated; and, though he did not fall like his father in the act of sacrilege, the event hastened his death. He retired to Babylon, and thence to Tarshish in Persia (not in the vicinity of Ecbatana, as in 2 Macc. ix, 3, the traditionary burial-place of this king, see Wernsdorf, ut supr. p. 104 sq.), where he died in the year B.C. 164 (see Hofmann, Winckell, i, 810), in the twelfth year of his reign (Appian, Syr. 66; Polyb. xxi, 11; see Wernsdorf, p. 26 sq., 61 sq.; comp. Dan. xi, 8; xil, 25), the victim of superstition, terror, and remorse (Polyb. xxi, 2; Josephus, Ant. xii, 8, 1 sq.), having first heard of the successes of the Maccabees in restoring the temple-worship at Jerusalem (1 Macc. vi, 1-16; comp. 2 Macc. i, 7-177). "He came to his end, and there was none to help him" (Dan. xi, 45). Comp. Liv. xii, 24-25; xili, 6; xilv, 19; xiv, 11-13; Josephus, Ant. xii, 5, 8. See Jacob ben-Napperthali, הַטִּירָֹּּוֹזֵעֵּרּוֹז (Mantua, 1557). Compare Maccabees.

The prominence given to the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes in the Book of Daniel accrues with its representative character (Dan. vii, 8, 25; viii, 11 sq.). The conquest of Alexander had introduced the forces of Greek thought and life into the Jewish nation, which was already prepared for their operation. See Alexander the Great. For more than a century and a half these forces had acted powerfully both upon the faith and upon the habits of the people; and the time was come when an outward struggle alone could decide whether Judaism was to be merged into a rationalized paganism, or to rise not only victorious from the conflict, but more vigorous and more pure. There were many symptoms which betokened the approaching struggle. The position which Judea occupied on the borders of the conflicting empires of Syria and Egypt, exposed equally to the open miseries of war and the treacherous favors of rival sovereigns, rendered its national condition precarious from the first, though these very circumstances were favorable to the growth of freedom. The terrible crimes by which the wars of "the North and South" were stained, must have allured the Jews to the city, and to the arms of the Grecian lords, even if persecution had not been superadded from Egypt first and then from Syria. Politically nothing was left for the people in the reign of Antiochus but independence or the abandonment of every prophetic hope. Nor was their social position less perilous. The influence of Greek literature, of foreign travel, of extended commerce, had made itself felt in daily life. At Jerusalem the mass of the inhabitants seem to have desired to imitate the exercises of the Greeks, and a Jewish embassy attended the games of Hercules at Tyre (2 Macc. iv, 19-20). Even their religious feelings were yielding; and before the rising of the Maccabees no position was offered to the execution of the king's decrees. Upon the first attempt of Jason the "priests had no courage to serve at the altar" (2 Macc. iv, 14; comp. 1 Macc. i, 48); and this not so much from wilful apostasy as from a disregard to the vital principles involved in the conflict. Thus it was necessary that the final issue of a false Hellenism should be openly seen that it might be discarded forever by those who cherished the ancient faith of Israel. The conduct of Antiochus was in every way suited to accomplish this end; and yet it seems to have been the result of passionate impulse rather than of any deep-laid scheme to extirpate a strange creed. At first he initiated the liberal policy of his predecessors, and the occasion for his attacks was furnished by the Jews themselves. Even the motives by which he was finally actuated were personal, or, at most, only political. Able, energetic (Polyb. xiii. 57), and liberal in his views, Antiochus was reckless and unscrupulous in the execution of his plans. He had learned at Rome to court power and to dread it. He gained an empire, and he remembered that he had been a hostage. Regardless himself of the gods of his fathers (Dan. xi. 57), he was incapable of appreciating the power of religious sentiment, and, like Nero in later times, he became a type of the enmity of God, not as the Roman emperor, by the perpetration of unnatural crimes, but by the disregard of every higher feeling. "He magnified himself above all." The real deity whom he recognised was the Roman war-god, and fortresses were his most sacred temples (Dan. xi. 86 sq.; Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Isr. iv. 340). Confronted with such a persecutor, the Jews realized the spiritual power of his faith. The evils of heathendom were seen concentrated in a personal shape. The outward forms of worship became invested with something of a sacramental dignity. Communion was purified and enhanced devotion. An independent nation asserted the integrity of its hopes in the face of Egypt, Syria, and Rome. Antiochus himself left behind him among the Jews the memory of a detestable tyrant (Titus, 22, contemptible, Dan. xi. 21; μειναντίαν διονυσίου, 1 Macc. i. 10), although Diodorus Siculus (Elog. 34) gives him the character of a magnanimous prince (διοικητικος μεγεθυνόμενος εις ρέματα) and indeed it cannot be denied that the portraiture of the Jewish writers are likely to have been exaggerated, but they could not well have fabricated the facts in the case, while the nature of the reaction (in the times of the Maccabees) shows an intolerable civil pressure preceding; accordingly Antiochus is depicted even in Diodorus (ii. 602 sq.) and other historians as a violently eccentric (almost atrocity) monarch, whose character is composed of contradictory elements (comp. Athen. x., 480). His attempt to extirpate the Jewish religion could certainly hardly have arisen from despotist bigotry, but he probably sought by this means to render the Jews somewhat more tractable, and to conciliate other nations—a purpose to which the predilection for foreign customs, already predominant among the prominent Jews (1 Macc. i. 12; 2 Macc. iv. 10 sq.), doubtless contributed. The Jews, no doubt, by reason of their position between Syria and Egypt, were subject to many hard laws and usages on the part of Antiochus, and his generals may often have increased the severity of the measures enjoined upon them by him, on account of the usual rigid policy of his government toward foreigners; yet in the whole conduct of Antiochus toward the Jews an utter contempt for the people themselves, as well as a relentless hardness of disposition, is quite evident.—Smith, s. v. See Horn (Little).

4. Antiochus (V) Eupator (Ewdravw, having a noble father) succeeded, in B.C. 164, while yet a child (of nine years, Appian, Syr. 66; or twelve years, according to Porphyry. In Euseb. Chron. Arm. i. 346), his father Antiochus Epiphanes, under the guardianship of Lyais (Appian, Syr. 46; 1 Macc. ii. 22 sq.), although Antiochus Epiphan, on his deathbed had designated Philip as regent and guardian (1 Macc. vi. 14 sq.; 55; 2 Macc. ix. 29). Soon after his accession (B.C. 161) he set out with a large army for Judaea (1 Macc. vi. 39), where Lyais already was, but hard pressed by his heirs. In the end, 33 sq. vi. 39, on the route that he took and the issue of the engagement which he fought with Judas Maccabaeus, the accounts do not agree (1 Macc. vi. and 2 Macc. xiii.; comp. Wernsdorf, De fide Maccab. p. 117; Eliechorn, Apok. 255 sq.); that victory, however, was not on the side of Judas, as of one of these states (2 Macc. xili. 29, 30), appears evident from all the circumstances. The statement (1 Macc. vi. 47) that the Jews were compelled to retreat on account of the superiority of their enemies, is very probable, and corroborated by Josephus (War. i. 1, 5; comp. Ant. xii. 9, 5). Antiochus repelled Jechudiel Bethzachi, and subjected the tributary Bethsura (Bethsuer) after a vigorous resistance (1 Macc. vi. 31-50). But when the Jewish force in the temple was on the point of yielding, Lyais persuaded the king to conclude a hasty peace that he might advance to meet Philip, who had returned from Persia and made himself master of Antioch (1 Macc. vi. 51 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xii. 9, 5 sq.). Philip was speedily overpowered (Joseph. i. c.); but in the next year (B.C. 162) Antiochus and Lyais fell into the hands of Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, who now appeared in Syria and laid claim to the throne. Antiochus was immediately put to death by him (together with Lyais) in revenge for the wrongs which he had himself suffered from Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. vii. 1 sq.; 2 Macc. xiv. 1 sq.; Appian, Syr. 46; Justin, xxxiv. 8), after a reign (according to Eusebius) of two (full) years (Polyb. xxxi. 19; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10, 1).
5. Antiochus (VI), surnamed Epiphanes Dionysus (Efpwμαfl' Δίνυμος, 1λιστρος Μακκαύας, on coins, see Eckhel, i. iii. 231 sq.; but Theos, θεος, god, by Josephus, Ant. xii. 7, 1), son of Alexander (Balas) king of Syria (Αλλδεσορος Αλδαναρος τω νωβα, App. Syr. 68). After his father's death (B.C. 146) he remained in Arabia; but, though still a child (War. i. c.; πατέρα φόροντα, 1 Macc. xi. 54), he was soon afterward brought forward by Diodotus or Trypho (Strabo, xvii. 752), who had been one of his father's chief ministers at Antioch, as a claimant of the throne against Demetrius Nicator, and (through his generals) quickly obtained the succession by force of arms (1 Macc. xi. 39, 54), B.C. 145-144 (comp. Eckhel, Doctr. Vum. i. iii. 331; Justin, xxxvi. 1; Appian, Syr. 68). Jonathan Maccabaeus, who joined his cause, was laden with rich presents and instated in the high-priesthood, and his brother Simon was appointed commander of the royal troops in Palestine (1 Macc. xi. 57 sq.). Jonathan now reduced the whole land to subjection from Damascus to Antioch (1 Macc. xi. 62), defeated the troops of Demetrius (1 Macc. xi. 63 sq.), and even successfully repelled a fresh incursion of Demetrius into Palestine (1 Macc. xii. 24 sq.); but hardly was Antiochus establisused on the throne when Trypho began to put into execution his long-concealed plan of seizing the royal power for himself (1 Macc. xii. 59),
In order to this, Trypho first of all advised the young prince to get the powerful Jonathan out of the way, and having succeeded by stratagem in confining him in prison, he soon after (B.C. 145) put him to death (1 Macc. xii, 40 sq.). He then returned to Syria, caused Antiochus to be murdered, and seized upon the crown (1 Macc. xiii, 81 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xiii, 5, 6; App. Syr. 68; Livy, Epit. 55 [where the decem annos admodum habens is incorrect]; Diod. ap. Müller, Fragm. ii, 12; Just. xxxvi, 1).—Smith, s. v.

6. Antiochus (VII) Sidetes (Zebida), from Sida in Phrygia, where he was born, Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 949, and not from his great love of hunting, Plutarch, Apophth. p. 34, ed. Lips., comp. "(72), called also Eusebes (Eōsēbēs, pious, Josephus, Ant. xiii, 8, 2); on coins Evertetes (Eēvētrētēs, benefactor, see Echelon, Doctr. Num. iii, 235), second son of Demetrius I. After his brother Demetrius (II) Nicator had been taken prisoner (B.C. cir. 141) by Mithridates I (Arsaces VI, 1 Macc. xiv, 1), king of Parthia, he married Demetrius’s sister (wife) Cleopatra, B.C. 110 (Justin. xxxvi, 1), recovered the dominion of Syria (B.C. 137, comp. Niebuhr, K. Schr. i, 251) from the atrocious Trypho (Strabo, xiv, 668), and ruled over it for nine years (1 Macc. xv, 1 sq.). At first he made a very advantageous treaty with Simon, who was now “high-priest and prince of the Jews,” but when he grew independent of his help, he withdrew the concessions which he had made, and demanded the surrender of the fortresses which the Jews held, or an equivalent in money (1 Macc. xv, 26 sq.; Josephus, Ant. xiii, 7, 5). As Simon was unwilling to yield to his demands, he sent a force under Cendebeus against him, who occupied a fortified position at Cedron (?) 1 Macc. xv, 41, near Azotus, and harassed the surrounding country. After the defeat of Cendebeus by the sons of Simon and the destruction of his works (1 Macc. xvi, 1-10), Antiochus, who had returned from the pursuit of Trypho, undertook an expedition against Judaea in person. In the fourth year of his reign he besieged Jerusalem, and came near taking it by storm, but at length, probably through fear of the Romans, made peace on tolerable terms with John Hyrcanus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 8, 3, 4; comp. Euseb. Chron. Arm. i, 949). Antiochus next turned his arms against the Parthians, and Hyrcanus accompanied him in the campaign; but, after some successes, he was entirely defeated by Phaorites II (Arsaces VII), and fell in the battle (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 8, 4; Justin. xxxviii, 10; Diod. Sic. Euc. 149, p. 117 sq.), B.C. cir. 127-126 (App. Syr. 63; comp. Niebuhr, K. Schr. i, 251 sq.; Clinton, P. H. ii, 332 sq.). According to Athenaeus (v, 210; x, 430; xii, 540), this king, like most of his predecessors, was entirely given to the pleasures of the table (comp. Justin. xxxviii, 10).—Smith. See Cleopatra 8.

7. Antiochus (VIII) Grypus (Γρύπος, from his aquiline nose), and on coins Epiphanes, was the second son of Demetrius Nicator and Cleopatra. After the murder of his brother Seleucus by his mother, she placed him on the throne, as being likely to submit to her dictation, B.C. 125; but with the assistance of Ptolemy Philus, his father-in-law, he not only succeeded in ejecting the usurper Alexander Zebina from Syria (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 3, but eventually com-
he succeeded, B.C. 95, and defeated Seleucus of the rival portion of Syria, as well as the two brothers of the latter; but the Syrians, worn out with the continuance of the civil broil, at length offered the crown of all Syria to Tigranes, before whose full accession Antiochus perished in battle with the Parthians (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 4).

10. Antiochus (XI), who also assumed the title of Epiphanes (II), was one of the above-named sons of Antiochus Grypus and brothers of Seleucus, who contended with Antiochus Cyzicenus; he was defeated and lost his life, B.C. cir. 94 (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 4), leaving the contest to his surviving brother Philip, assisted by another brother, Demetrius, till the dispute was finally terminated by Tigranes (q. v.) assuming supreme power of all Syria, thus putting an end to the Seleucid dynasty.

11. Antiochus (XII), the youngest son of Antiochus Grypus, aurnamed likewise Dionysus (II), and as coins (Eckhel, ii, 246) Philopator Callinicus (καλλινικος, finely victorious), assumed the title of king after his brother Demetrius (see above) had been taken prisoner by the Parthians. He fell in battle against Aretas, king of the Arabs, after a brief exercise of power at Damascus, in opposition to his surviving brother Philip, B.C. cir. 90 (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 1).

Antiochus was likewise the title of several kings of the petty province of Commagene, between the Euphrates and Mount Taurus, having the city of Samosata for its capital, and originally forming part of the Sackid kingdom of Syria, from which it appears to have been independent during the contests between the later kings of that dynasty—a circumstance that probably explains the recurrence of the name Antiochus in this fresh dynasty. The only one of these mentioned even by Josephus is the FOURTH of the name, surnamed Epiphanes, apparently a son of Antiochus II of the same line. He was on intimate terms with Caligula, who gave him his paternal dominion, A.D. 38, but afterward withheld it, so that he did not succeed to it till the accession of Claudius, A.D. 51. Nero added part of Armenia to his dominions in A.D. 61. He was one of the richest of the kings tributary to the Romans (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.). His son, also called Antiochus Epiphanes, was betrothed, A.D. 43, to Drusilla, the daughter of Agrippa (Josephus, Ant. xix, 9, 1). He assisted Titus in the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, v, 11, 3; Tacitus, Hist. v, 1). But in A.D. 72 he was accused by Petrus, governor of Syria, of conspiring with the Parthians against the Romans, and, being deposed from his kingdom, retired first to Lacedaemon and then to Rome, where he spent the remainder of his life in great respect (Josephus, War, vii, 7).

Antiochus, bishop of Polematis in Palestine, a Syrian by birth. At the beginning of the fifth century he went to Constantinople, where his eloquent preaching gained him a great reputation among the Christians. He died not later than 408. Besides many sermons, he left a large work "against Avarice," which is lost.—Theodoret, Dial. ii; Phot. Cod. 288; Act. Concil. Episca. iii, 118; Labbe, Catal. Cod. Vindob. pt. 1, p. 116, No. 58.

Antiochus, monk of St. Sabas, near Jerusalem, at the time of the conquest of Jerusalem by the Persians (A.D. 614), and author of an "Epitome of Christian Faith" (Πανειρισμὸς τῆς Ἀγίων Τριάδος), first published in Latin by Tilman (Paris, 1548, 8vo); reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum (Paris, 1579; Colon. 1618; Lngd. 1677); in the original Greek, first by Ducasus, in the Asceticon Patrum (Far. 1624), reprinted in Morell's Bibl. Patrum (Far. 1624), and in considerable fragment in Fabricius's Bibl. Græc. x, 501.

Antiprodobaptists (from ἀντί, against, τοις, child, and βαπτιντοι, to baptize), persons who object to the baptism of infants, on the assumption that Christ's commission to baptize appears to them to restrict this ordinance to such only as are taught, or made disciples; and that, consequently infants cannot be thus taught, ought to be excluded. The Baptists, Campbellites, and Mennonites are Antiprodobaptists. See those titles.

Antipas (Ἀντίπας, for Ἀντίπαρος, Antipater; comp. Josephus, Ant. xiv, 1, 3), the name of three men.

1. A son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samarian (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 1, 9; War, i, 28, 4). He inherited of his father's dominions only Galilee and Perea (B.C. 5), as tetrarch (q. v.), with a yearly income of 200 talents (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 8, 1; 11, 4); Jesus was thus within his territorial jurisdiction (Luke xvii, 7). He first married the daughter of the Arabian king Aretas, but afterward became enamored with Herodias, half-sister of Philip's son. He contracted a clandestine marriage with her, on which account the Arabian princess indignantly returned to her father (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 1). Herodias inveigled her new husband into the execution of John the Baptist (Matt. xiv, 4). His former father-in-law, Aretas, not long afterward (according to Josephus about one year before the death of Tiberius, i. e. A.D. 36) declared war against him, on pretense of a dispute about boundaries, but probably in reality to avenge the insult to his daughter, and entirely routed his army (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 1), but was obliged to desist from farther steps by the intervention of the Romans. Antipas visited Rome on the accession of Caligula, although fond of ease, at the instance of his vain and ambitious wife, in order to secure the same royal title (which is derivatively ascribed to him in Mark vi, 14) that his nephew Herod Agrippa had just acquired (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 7, 1); but upon the accusation of the latter he was deposed by the emperor (A.D. 39); see Ideler, Chronol. ii, 309 sq.; comp. Joseph. Ant. xviii, 6, 11; 7, 2), and, together with Herodias, who would not desert him in his misfortune, banished to Lyons in Gaul (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 2), not to Vienna (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i, 11), but died in Spain (Joseph. War, ii, 9, 6), whether he eventually removed. (See Koch, De cano natali J. C. per mun. et fata Antipa demonstrato, Helmet. 1721; comp. ...
Coin of Herod Antipas, with the Title "Tetrarch;" the Recurve bearing the Name of "Tiberias," one of the Cities Improved by him.

Zorn, Biblioth. Antiq. i, 1021.) Although Josephus relates no great series of infamous acts on the part of Antipas, it is yet very evident that he was a frivolous prince (comp. Mark viii, 15; Luke xii, 42), abandoned to the pleasures of life (comp. Joseph. Ant. xvi, 4, 5), destitute of firmness of character (comp. Luke xxiii, 11), aware of his faults (Luke ix, 7 sq.), yet not disinclined to arbitrary acts (Luke xii, 38), whom Luke (iii, 19) charges with many crimes (προφανῆ), as likewise Jewish tradition paints in the most disadvantageous light (Noble, Hist. Isma. p. 251 sq.).—Winer, i, 484. See Herod.

2. A person "of royal lineage" in Jerusalem, and city treasurer, the first man seized by the assassins during the last war with the Romans, and soon after butchered in prison (Josephus, War, iv, 3, 4 and 5).

3. A noble martyr in Egypt, mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. ii, 15. A.D. ante 100. He is said to have been one of our Saviour's first disciples, and a bishop of Pergamus, and to have been put to death in a tumult there by the priests of Esculapius, who had a celebrated temple in that city (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv, 5). Tradition relates that he was born in a broken huln under Domitian (Acta Sanctorum, ii, 3, 4). His day in the Greek calendar is April 11 (Mened. Gr. iii, 51).

Antipater (Αντίπατρος, instead of his father), the name of several men in the Apocrypha and Josephus.

1. The son of Jason, and one of the two ambassadors sent by the Jews in the time of the Maccabees to renew the league with the Romans and Lacedaemonians (1 Macc. xii, 16; xiv, 22).

2. The father of Herod the Great (q. v.) was, according to Josephus (Ant. xiv, 1, 3; for other accounts of his parentage, see Nicolas of Damascus, ap. Joseph. in loc.; Africanus, ap. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i, 6, 7; Photius, Bibl. 76 and 238), the son of a noble Idumean, to whom the government of that district had been given by Alexander Jannaeus (q. v.) and his queen Alexanderia, and as their court the young Antipater was brought up. In B.C. 65 he persuaded Hyrcanus to take refuge from his brother Aristobulus II with Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, by whom, accordingly, an unsuccessful attempt was made to replace Hyrcanus on the throne (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 2; War, i, 1, 6, 2). In B.C. 64 Antipater again supported the cause of Hyrcanus before Pompey in Coele-Syria (Ant. xiv, 3, 2). In the ensuing year Jerusalem was taken by Pompey and Aristobulus deposed; and henceforth we find Antipater both zealously adhering to Hyrcanus and laboring to ingratiate himself with the Romans. His services to the latter, especially against Alexander, the son of Jannaeus, who fled to Egypt, and Archelaus (B.C. 57 and 56), were favorably regarded by Scaurus and Gabinius, the lieutenants of Pompey; his active zeal against Mithridates of Pergamus in the Alexandrian war (B.C. 48) was rewarded by Julius Caesar with the gift of Roman citizenship; and, on Caesar's coming into Syria (B.C. 47), Hyrcanus was confirmed by him in the kingdom through Antipater's influence, notwithstanding the complaints of Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, while Antipater himself was appointed procurator of Judea (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 5, 1 and 2; 6, 2-4 and 8; War, i, 8, 1 and 7; 9, 3-5). After Caesar had left Syria to go against Pharnaces, Antipater set about arranging the country under the existing government, and appointed his sons Phasaelus and Herod governors respectively of Jerusalem and Galilee (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 9, 1 and 2; War, i, 10, 4). In B.C. 46 he dissuaded Herod from attacking Hyrcanus, and in B.C. 43 (after Caesar's death) he regulated the tax imposed by Cassius upon Judea for the support of the Roman troops (Ant. xiv, 3, 5; 11, 2; War, i, 10, 9; 11, 11). But during the last-mentioned year, he was carried off by poison which Malichus, whose life he had twice saved, bribed the cup-bearer of Hyrcanus to administer it to him (Ant. xiv, 11, 2-4; War, i, 11, 2-4).

3. The eldest son of Herod the Great (q. v.) by his first wife, Doris (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 12, 1). Josephus describes him as a monster of crafty wickedness (Mem. iii, 16, 9). He was married to Mariamne, B.C. 88, betrothed Antipater from court (War, i, 22, 1), but recalled him afterward, in the hope of checking the supposed resentment of Alexander and Aristobulus for their mother Mariamne's death. Antipater now intrigued to bring his half-brother under the suspicion of their father, and with such success that Herod altered his intentions in their behalf, recalled Doris to court, and sent Antipater to Rome, recommended to Augustus (Ant. xvi, 3; War, i, 23, 2). He still continued his machinations against his brothers, in concert with Salome and Pheraeus, and aided by a coterie of eunuchs (comp. Josephus, Ant. xiii, 9, 476), till he succeeded in accomplishing their death, B.C. 6 (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 4, 11; War, i, 23-27). See Alexander. Having thus removed his rivals, and been declared successor to the throne, he entered into a plot with his uncle Pheroras against the life of his father; but this being discovered during his absence to Rome, whether he had gone to carry out a part of the scheme, he was remanded to Judea by his father, and then tried before Varus, the Roman governor of Syria. The sentence against him being confirmed by Augustus, although with a recommendation of mercy, he was executed in prison by the order of his father's successor in his last illness (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 1-7; War, i, 28-33; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i, 8, 12).

4. The eldest of the three sons of Phasaelus by Salamisio, the daughter of Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5, 4). See Herod.

5. The son of Salome, Herod's sister; he married his cousin, by whom he had a daughter Cypros (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 5, 4). He was an able orator, and in an extended speech opposed the confirmation of Archelaus (q. v.) in his royal legacy before the Emperor Augustus (Ant. xvii, 9, 5). See Herod.

6. A Samaritan, steward of Antipater the son of Herod the Great, who tortured him in order to procure evidence against his master (Josephus, War, i, 30, 5). See No. 5.

Antipatris (Ἀντίπατρις, from Antipater; in the Talmud בְּרֵאשֵׁית, see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 109 sq.), a city built by Herod the Great, in honor of his father (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5, 2; War, i, 21, 9), on the site of a former place called Caphar-saba (קַפַּר-סַבָּה) or Kassetepher, Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 1; xvi, 5, 2). The spot (according to Ptolemy, lat. 32° long. 66° 2' north was well watered and fertile; a stream flowed round the city, and in its neighborhood were groves of large trees (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5, 2; War, i, 21, 9). Caphar-saba was 120 stadia from Joppa; and between the two places Alexander Balas drew a trench, with a wall and wooden towers, as a defense against the attacks of Hyrcanus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 1; War, i, 4, 7). Antipatris also lay between Cesarea and Lydda (Itin. Hieros. p. 600). It was not exactly on the sea (Schleuener, Lex. s. v.), but two miles inland (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 1) on the road leading to Galilee (Mishna, Gittin, vii, 7; comp. Ereland, Palest. p. 405, 417, 444). These circumstances indicate that Antipatris was in the midst of a plain, and not at Aegeum, where the Crusaders supposed they had found it (Will. Tyrr. ix, 10; xiv, 16; Vitruvius, c. 23; Ihrocard, c. 10; comp. Reland, Palæst. p. 569, 570). On the road from Ramlah to Nazareth, north of Ras el-Ain, Proskes (Reise im Heilige Land, Wien, 1831) came to a place called Kaffir Saba; and the position which Berthelot assigns to this place and his map is in exact agreement with the position assigned to Antipatris in the Itin. Hieros. Perceiving this, Raumer (Palaestina, p. 144, 462) happily accepted that this Kefr Saba was no other than the reproduced name of Caphar-saba, which, as in many other instances, has again supplanted the for-eral name and later name of the place. It comp. the Hall, Lit.-Zeit. 1845, No. 290). This conjecture has been confirmed by Dr. Robinson, who gives Kefr Saba as the name of the village in question (Researches, iii, 46-48; see also later ed. of Researches, iii, 158, 159; and Biblioth. Sac. 1833, p. 502 sqq.). Paul was brought from Jerusalem to Antipatris by night, on his route to Cesarea (Acts xxiii, 31; comp. Thompson's Land and Book, i, 258). Dr. Robinson was of opinion, when he published his first edition, that the road which the soldiers took on this occasion led from Jerusalem to Cesarea by the pass of Beth-Horon, and by Lydda or Discopolis. This is the route which was followed by Cestius Gallus as mentioned by Pliny (Hist. nat. vi, 19, 1), and it appears to be identical with that given in the Jerusalem Itinerary, accordin to which Antipatis is 42 miles from Jerusalem, and 26 from Cesarea. Even on this supposition it would have been quite possible for troops leaving Jerusalem on the evening of one day to reach Cesarea on the next, and to start thence, after a rest, to return to (it is not said that they arrived at) their quarters at Jerusalem before nightfall. But the difficulty is entirely removed by Dr. Smith's discovery of a much shorter road, leading by Gophna direct to Antipatris. On this route he met the Roman guards, in his and gain, and indeed says "he does not remember observing anywhere before so extensive remains of a Roman road" (Biblioth. Sac. 1843, p. 478-498). Van de Velde, however (Mec-naur, p. 395 sqq.), contends that the position of Myjedet Yaba corresponds better to that of Antipatris. In the time of Jerome (Epist. Fratres, 100) it was a half-ruined town. Antipatris, during the Roman era, appears to have been a place of considerable military importance (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 1), Vespasian, who while engaged in prosecuting the Jewish war, halted at Antipatris two days before he resumed his career of desolation by burning, destroying, and laying waste the country all around, was there met by two emperors and howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii, (269). This city is supposed to have been the same with Capecharmona (or Capcharmona, perhaps also Caparsarmona; see Reland, Palæst. p. 690, 691), where a battle was fought in the reign of Demos-tius between Nicanor, a man who was an implacenemy of the Jews, and the army of Pharaoh, when five thousand of Nicanor's army were slain, and the rest served themselves by flight (1 Macc. vii, 26-32).

Antiphilus (Ἀντίφιλος, instead of a friend), a friend of Antipater, charged by the party of Phoeras with bringing from Egypt a poisonous draught for leros (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 4, 2; War, i, 80, 5); a suspicion confirmed by a letter intercepted between Antiphilus and Antipater (Ant. xvii, 5, 7). See Ant-

Antipater.

Antiphon (from αὐτός, in her, and φωνή, sound), the singing or chanting of one person of a choir in reply to another. The verses are sung or chanted in the "responsorium" the verse is spoken only by one person on either side, or by one person on one side, though many on the other: whereas, in antiphony, the verses are sung by two parts of the choir alternately. Antiphonal singing is supposed to have been brought into use in the Western Church by An-bruce, who, about the year 874, is said to have introduced it into the Church of Milan, in imitation of the Eastern Church, where it appears to have been of greater antiquity, though as to the time of its institution au-torities are not agreed. The chanting of the psalms in this antiphonal style was practiced in Spain, and it is said that some of these were actually composed in alternate verses, with a view to their being used in a responsive manner. In the English Church, where there is no choir, the reading of the Psalter is divided between the minister and the people; and in the cathedral service the psalm is chanted, the verses of the different choirs being provided, stationed on each side of the church. One of these, having chanted one of the verbs, remains silent while the opposite choir replies in the verse succeeding; and at the end of the psalm the Gloria Patri is sung by the united choirs, accompanied by the organ.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xiv,
ch. i, § 11; Farrar, Ecc. Hist. s. v. See ANTHEM.

Antiphonary or Antiphonary, a Roman service-book containing the antiphons, collects, and whatever else was said or sung in the choir, except the lessons. It is sometimes called the responsorium, from the responses contained in it. The author of the Roman antiphonary was Gregory the Great. We read of nocturnal and diurnal antiphon-aries, for the use of daily and nightly offices; of summer and winter antiphonaries, also for the various ser-ceremonies of the churches and for country churches. These and many other popish books were forbidden to be used by the 3 and 4 Edward VI.—Farrar, Ecc. Hist. s. v. See ANTHEM.

Antipope (from αὐτός, against, i.e. a rival pope), a pontiff elected by the will of a sovereign, or the intrigues of a faction, in opposition to one canonically
gle. The emperors of Germany were the first to set up popes of their own nomination against those whom the Romans had elected without consulting them. Otho the Great displaced two popes of Rome; and when Sylvester III had expelled from the capital of Christendom Benedict IX, whose profligacy had compromised in the eyes of all men the honor of the sovereign pontificate, Conrad II, king of Germany, brought back this worthless pastor, who had hastened to seek the security of his dignity in the pontificate of Benedict, and when the latter fell, two bishops of Rome; and when Sylvester III had expelled from the capital of Christendom Benedict IX, whose profligacy had compromised in the eyes of all men the honor of the sovereign pontificate, Conrad II, king of Germany, brought back this worthless pastor, who had hastened to seek the security of his dignity in the pontificate of Benedict, and when the latter fell, two new pope, under the name of Clement VII, who was recognised by France, Spain, Savoy, and Scotland; while Italy, Germany, England, and the whole north of Europe, supported Urban VI. These three popes excommunicated each other; nor did they even fear to compromise their sacred character by the most cruel outrages and the most odious insults. The schism continued after their death, when three popes made their appearance "in the field," all of whom were deposed by the Council of Constance in 1415, and Cardinal Cobham, one of their number, styled himself Martin V. The last antipope was Clement VIII. With him the schism ceased; but the evil was done, and nothing could remedy it. The dogma of papal infallibility had received a mortal wound "in the house of its friends," and the scepticism induced on this point rapidly extended to others.—Chambers, Encyclopaedia, e. v. See POPE; PAPACY.

Antiquities, Sacred, a term that may be considered as embracing whatever relates to the religious, political, social, domestic, and individual life, not only of the Hebrew race, but also of those kingdoms, tribes, and persons that were connected with, or more or less closely united to, the Hebrew people; even (except in the case of history and biography) in the several stages of its development prior to the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans, and to the usages of the Christian Church during the earlier ages.

1. Biblical. — The Scriptures themselves are the repository of knowledge of Hebrew and Christian antiquities may be drawn therefrom, and whoever wishes to have an accurate and thorough acquaintance with the subject must, with this express purpose in view, make the holy record the object of a careful, sustained, and systematic study. Much of the Old Testament is, in the best sense of the term, picture-writing; and the history of the Saviour carries us into the very bosom of domestic life. The knowledge, which is acquired from these sources is peculiarly valuable, from the stamp of truth which every part of it bears. Few, however, have the disposition, the leisure, or the ability for the requisite study; and therefore the aid of the scholar and divine is desirable, if not indispensable. But besides what may be learned from the Scriptures themselves, much remains to be known which they do not and cannot teach; for, like all other books relating to ages long by-gone, they contain allusions, phraseology, modes of thought and speech, which can be understood either not at all, or but imperfectly, without light derived from extraneous sources; and that the rather because the Hebrews were not a literary people, and the aim of the sacred penmen was far higher than to achieve intellectual reputation. The heathen writers afford very scanty materials for illustrating biblical antiquities, so ignorant or prejudiced were they on topics of that kind. Indirect information and undesigned testimonies may be here and there extracted from their writings, but in general they communicate no useful information except on geographical and kindred subjects. The least barren of them is the earliest writer extant, Herodotus, who, in his second book and part of the third, furnishes snatches of information which may be of service, especially in conjunction with the light which recent discoveries in Egyptian antiquities have so happily thrown on the biblical records (The Egypt of Herodotus, by John Kenrick, M.A. 1841; Herodotus and the Country of the Ancient Egyptians, by Sir J. G. Wilkinson, 1837, 1841).

The study of biblical antiquities, viewed as an aid in the interpretation of the books of the Old Testament, began probably on the return from the Babylonian exile, when a lengthened past already stretched out to the Israelitish nation as they looked back to it, and from that period the circumstances in which they were placed, and the new modes of thought and action to which they had become habituated, they must have found many things in their sacred books which were as difficult to be understood as they were interesting to their feelings. The ideas, views, and institutions of the Old Testament were held, taught, transmitted, and from age to age augmented by Jewish doctors, whose professed duty was the expropounding of the law of the fathers; and after having passed through many generations by oral communication, were at length, in the second and some subsequent centuries of the Christian era, committed to writing by the pen of the scribes. Thus there arose in consequence, as being traditionary in its origin, and disfigured by ignorance, prejudice, and superstition, must, to be of any service, be used with the greatest care and discrimination. It seems, however, to have fallen into somewhat undue depreciation, but has been successively and historically elaborated by recent writers in delineating a picture of the age in which our Lord appeared (Das Jahrhundert des Heils, by Grüber, Stuttgart, 1888).

In the first century Josephus wrote two works of unequal merit, on The Jewish War and The Antiquities of the Jews, which, notwithstanding some credulity and bad facts in the war, is a valuable work. The celebrated Alexandrian teacher, who, which were also produced in the first century, have their value too much abated by his love of the same allegorical method; which he was led to pursue mainly by his desire to bring the mind of the Hebrew nation into harmony with Oriental, and especially Grecian systems of philosophy, of which he was a diligent student and great admirer. Little advantage is to be gained by the study of writers among the modern Jews; for, till a very recent period, no sound intellectual activity was found among this singular and most interesting race. Inspired, however, by the spirit of the eighteenth century, Mendesohn opened the Hebrew language to his countrymen, and a new era of pure, sensible, and sound manner of thinking and writing which prepared the way for many valuable Jewish productions, and gave an impulse to the mind of the nation, the best outward results of which are only beginning to be seen. The study of classical antiquity, which commenced at the revival of letters, was not without an influence on biblical archeology; but this branch of knowledge is chiefly indebted for its most valuable results to the systematic study of the Bible, and the cultivation of the long-neglected Hebrew language, which the interests of the Reformation both needed and called for. It was not, however, till within the last century that the intelligent spirit which had been applied to the examination of classical antiquity in Germany so directed the attention of Oriental scholars to the true way of prosecuting and developing a knowledge of Hebrew and Christian antiquities as to bring forth treatises on the subject which can be regarded as satisfactory views of the most advanced researches in scholarship. In no one thing has the mental activity of recent times contributed more to the science of biblical antiquities than by leading well-informed travellers to penetrate into eastern countries, especially Syria, since, by communicating with the world the frui ts of their enterprise, to a small extent a picture of what these lands and their inhabitants must have been of old, permanence.
being one of the chief characteristics of the Oriental mind. From Shaw (Travels in Barbary and the Le- mak) and Harmer (Observations on various Passages of Scripture) down to the valuable work by Prof. Robinson (Biblical Researches in Palestine, 1841, 1866), a numerous literature has been put forth, which have contributed to throw very light on Jewish and Christian antiquity.

The earliest treatise in the English language expressly on the subject of Jewish antiquities was written by Th. Godwyn, B.D. (Moses and Aaron, Civil and Military, 1626) and was observed, etc. 4to, 1614). This work passed through many editions in England; was translated into Latin by J. H. Reis (1679); furnished with a preface and two dissertations by Witsius (1680); was illustrated, amended, and enlarged by Hottinger (1710); and further annotated on by Carpzovius (1748). In 1794-95, Thomas Lewis gave to the public his Origins Hebrew, or Antiquities of the Hebrew Republic, 4 vols. 8vo, which is a very elaborate and carefully compiled treatise, composed of materials drawn from the best authorities, both Jewish and Christian. A work of much value, as affording fuller views on some topics, and written and published in a very amiable spirit, by Dr. Jennings, entitled Jewish Antiquities, or A Course of Lectures on the three First Books of Godwin's Moses and Aaron, London, 1768; edited, with a preface of some value, by Philip Furneaux. Fleury's work (Dr. Adam Clarke's edition) on The Manners of the Hebrews, containing an Account of the principal Customs, Laws, Policy, and Religion of the Israelites, offers a pleasing and useful introduction to the study of the Old Testament Scriptures. A valuable and (for ordinary purposes) complete treatise may be found by the English student in Biblical Antiquities, by John Jahn, D.D., translated by T. C. Upham (Andover, 1830), and reprinted by the University of New York, and recently amplified and greatly improved, for the benefit of the subject by J. M. A. Scholz's Hanbuch der Bibl. Archäologie (Bonn u. Wien, 1834); De Wette (Lehrbuch der Hebr.-Jüd. Archäologie, Leipzig, 1830), translated by Rev. Theodore Parker, Boston. Heaton's Pilgrimage to Jerusalem may serve as a connecting link between Jewish and Christian antiquities, being almost equally useful for both, as it presents a picture of Judaism in the century which preceded the advent of our Saviour. The English translation (by the Rev. John Kenrick, M.A.) from the German original is accompanied by valuable notes and a preface, in which may be found a concisely written history of the sources of biblical archaeology. The work is conceived and executed in the form of a story or novel, and possesses no ordinary interest, independently of its high theological value, as affording a living picture of the customs, opinions, and laws of the Jewish people. In 1817, a similar work by the Rev. John Monbrow, under the unsuitable title of Essai sur la Littérature des Hébreux (4 tomes, 12mo, Paris, 1819), in which a number of short tales illustrative of ancient Hebrew usages and opinions are prefaced by a large and elaborate Introduction, and followed by a great number of learned and curious notes.

II. Ecclesiastical Antiquities.—Among the fathers of the Christian Church, Jerome, who was long resident in Palestine, has left in various works very important information respecting the geography, natural history, and customs of the country. Most of the fathers, indeed, furnish, directly or indirectly, valuable notices respecting Christian antiquity, and in a body constitute the source whence those who have been put forth, which have contributed to throw very light on Jewish and Christian antiquity.

For a long period after the revival of the learning of the subject of Christian antiquities received no specific attention, but was treated more or less summarily in general histories of the Church of Christ; as, for instance, in the great Protestant work, Ecclesiast. Historia per aliquot viros in urbe Magdeburg (1559-74); and on the part of the Catholics, by Baronius, Annales Ecclesiastici a prim. ort. ad annum 1714 (Venet, 1714). If any exception is to be made to this general statement, it is on behalf of Roman Catholic writers, whose works, however, are too inaccurate and prejudiced to be of any great value in these times. The first general treatise on Christian antiquity proceeded from the pen of an Englishman, the Bingham, Origins Ecclesiastic, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church (London, 1708-22, 10 vols. 8vo); which was translated into Latin by Grischow (1788), and into German (1778). The work corresponds in no slight degree to the learning, care, and time bestowed upon it; but, besides being somewhat in the rear of the learning of the day, it has its value, augmented by the comments of the writer, as well as by the strength of his prejudices against the Roman Catholics. A useful compendium, written in a liberal spirit, and compiled chiefly from German sources, has lately been published in English (A Manual of Christian Antiquities, by Rev. J. E. Riddle, M.A., London, 1889), in which (Preface, § 2, and Appendix II) may be found a concise but detailed account of the literature of Christian antiquities. A more complete catalogue of works, embracing such particular branch, is given in Winer's Handbuch der Theologischen Literatur. Among the best Continuous Collections of noteworthy and important Christian antiquities may be mentioned those of Augusti, Handbuch d. Christl. Archäol. (Leipzig, 1836-7, 3 vols. 8vo); Böckh, Die christl.-Kirch. Alterthums- Wissenschaft (Breil, 1836, 8vo); Siecle, Handbuch der Christl.-Kirchl. Alterthümer (Leipzig, 1843, 6-7, 8 vols. 8vo).—Kittel, u. ANTITRUCTAE

ANTITRINITARIANS

(q. d. incoarcari, from incoarcaw, to rest, the Antinomian branch of the Gnostics. Gnosticism regarded matter as absolutely evil, and the body as the seat of sin, and as an obstacle to the soul; Gnostic morality, therefore, consisted in the mortification of the body. One class of Gnostic sects tried to attain this end by means of rigorous asceticism [see ENCARTATES], the other by wilfully abusing it for debauchery. The latter class bore the collective name Antitecte, as they considered it as an obligation to them, and intended to show their contempt of the Law, and of the Demiurgos, the author of matter and, consequently, of evil, by purposely transgressing the commandments of the law. To this class belong the Carpocratians, Basililians, and others. Whether any particular sect ever bore the name Antitecte is still controverted.—Neander, Ch. Hist., i. 451. See Gnosticism.

ANTITRINITARIANS, a general name either applied to all who oppose the doctrine of the Trinity (q. v.), or, in a more restricted sense, to the opponents of the Trinity in the first three centuries of the Christian Church and to those of the 18th century.

The Antitrinitarians of the antipope, before the Council of Nice, were generally called Monarchians (q. v.). They may be divided into two classes: the rationalistic or dynamic, who denied the divinity of Christ, regard him merely as a man filled with divine power, and the Patrissans (q. v.), who identified the Son with the Father, or admitted at most only a moral Trinity. The first represented even in the Apostolic Church, for Cincinnati (q. v.) taught that the origin of Jesus was merely human; and the Ebonites, though differing on some doctrinal points, agreed in denying the divinity of Christ, on: class regarding him as the son of Mary and Joseph, while the other, although looking upon him as born of the Virgin through the Holy Ghost, and acknowledging him to be a superhuman being, yet denied his divinity. The Magi (about 170) rejected the doctrine of the Logos and the Gospel of John. Theodotus the Elder, or the Tanner, was excommunicated about 203 by Bishop Victor, of Rome, for teaching that Christ was begotten in a miraculous way, but otherwise a man, without any superiority to others except that of right-oueness. From the sect founded by him proceeded Theodotus the Younger, or the money-broker, who advocated, but at the same time modified, the views of the elder Theodotus. He maintained the "Logos" dwelt at a higher degree in Christ, and thus became the founder of the Melchizekeleons. Of greater influence than the heretics thus far named was Artemon (q. v.), who was also excluded from the Church of Rome for maintaining that the established doctrine of the church had always been that Christ was only a man, until Bishop Zephyrinus, of Rome, had introduced the newer doctrine of his divinity. Artemon also admitted the superhuman origin of Christ, but denied that he was superior to the prophets except by virtue. The most important of the representatives of this class of early Antitrinitarians was the author of the "Apology of Antioch," who was deposed for heresy in 268. He maintained that Christ, as a man, was begotten by the Holy Ghost; that the "Logos" which then began personally to exist dwelt in Christ as a divine power, by the use of which he rose above all other men, and became the cause of all things; which, therefore, was for him a moral, not a natural dignity.

The first representatives of the second class of the early Antitrinitarians were Praxias (q. v.), a confessor in the time of Marcus Aurelius, and a prominent opponent of the Montanists. He taught that the faith itself descended into the Virgin, that he was born from the Holy Spirit, and that his inner self was Christ; that only in so far as he assumed flesh in Jesus he was called Son; that he was not, personally or otherwise, different from the Son, "but made himself the Son" (see see abid filium fecit), and that he suffered in the Son (poter commerso est filio). His adherents, therefore, were called "Patrissans." Noetus (q. v.), the apostate bishop of Ephesus, was excluded about 290 from his church as a Patrissian. He denied this charge, and we are not fully informed about the peculiar kind of Monarchianism to which he was attached. Callistus, bishop of Rome, is also said to have belonged to this class. Beryllus (q. v.) and Blandina of Botges, who preserved her existence before her incarnation, or that there was in Christ a divine nature distinct from that of his Father, but he conceded that the Godhead of the Father dwelt in the person of Jesus. Under the instruction of Origen, he repudiated his views at the Synod of Brescia in 244. The views of Beryllus were further developed by Sabellius (q. v.), a presbyter of Ptolemais (305-309). According to him, God is an absolute, undivided unity (povoe), and the "Logos" is the self-revelation of God in the world. The Father reveals himself as God when he gives the law, as Son when he becomes man in Christ, and as Holy Spirit when he inspires the hearts of men.

II. The Middle Ages.—There are few traces of Antitrinitarian doctrines in the church history of the Middle Ages. Amalric of Bena, and his disciple, David of Dinanto, regarded the names of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost as expressions for three different ages of the world. The Paulicians, the Cathari, and some other religious sects, are regarded as Antitrinitarians in the Manichean heresies, also those concerning the Trinity.

III. The Time of the Reformation.—The rationalistic element, concealed and suppressed by the Church of Rome, came to the surface naturally at the period of the Reformation. The Anabaptist attack on practical points coincided in time, and partly in the men themselves, with the theoretical attack on the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. To the first Antitrinitarians of this period belongs Johannes Denk (died 1528), who regarded the "Logos" as the totality of all human souls, which received its highest development in Jesus. He denied consistently the pre-existence of the Logos, the divinity of Christ, and the Trinity. Hetzer, who was executed at Basel in 1529, seems to have been a disciple of Denk. Campanus, who died in prison at Cleves, was more attached to Arius views. He regarded the relation of the Father to the "Logos" as a kind of marital relation, and the Holy Ghost as an impermanent being. David George or Joris, of Delft, in Holland, were intermediate between Sabellianism and the Pantheism of Amalric of Bena. He regarded God as an undivided unity and as impersonal, but as having become man in three persons, Moses, Elias, Christ or Moses, Christ, David (himself), corresponding to three ages of the world. Servetus, who was burned in 1552, sought to unite Sabellianism with the teachings of Paul of Samosata. God, as undivided unity, is the Father; as descending upon the man Jesus, he is the "Logos"; Jesus, pervaded by the "Logos," is the Son; God, as impression on the man Jesus, is called the Holy Ghost. Later he modified his views, and represented God as the essence of all things; the Logos as the self-revelation of God, and including within himself the ideas of all other things; and the Holy Ghost as the self-communication of God to the creatures, and as identical with the words of Jesus. With the Antitrinitarians of the time he thus far mentioned were more or less addicted to a pantheistic mysticism, and in their views concerning the Trinity agreed more with Sabellius than with Arius. One of the first prominent representatives of a rationalistic Antitrinitarianism was Gribaldio, a learned Italian of the 13th century, who held that there is another God of the same nature, but derived from the Father. This doctrine of three gods of unequal rank was completed by Gentilis, a Calabrian. The ade-pects of Antitrinitarian views in the Reformed Church of Poland were expelled in 1566, and have since been known as Unitarians (q. v.). They honored Jesus simply as a man, but one who was richly endowed by God, and exalted for dominion over the whole world. Most of them paid adoration to him. The Unitarians were organized as a community, and received a comple- tion in the Old Testament, and in Judaism. The first was at the hand of Jesus, who carried out the views first set forth by his uncle, Lelias Socinus, an Italian nobleman. The principal article of his system was an attack at an accommodation between different parties by the doctrine that, although Jesus was born a mere man, he was nevertheless without sin, and was wonderfully endowed by God; was taken up into heaven, and the reward of his life was his, that he might be a mediator to bring man, alienated from God by sin, to the knowledge and grace of God, and that he might reign as the king of his people in all periods of time. The Freethinkers, Deists, and Rationalists were, of course, all Antitrinitarians. In Germany, Seelbach and Dietz were prominent by their opposition to the doctrine of the Trinity; in England, Whiston, Clarke, Lindsey, and Priestley. Owing especially to this influence, Unitarian congregations were organized in England at the close of the 18th century. In the United States the spreading of Antitrinitarianism, especially among the Congregationalists, led, in 1815, to a formal separation, and the organization of a Unitarian denomination. With them another religious denomination, which simply called themselves Christians, as well as the Universalists, and a seceding portion of the Society of Friends (the "Hickites"), agree in the distinctive article of their faith. Swedenborg substituted for the doctrine of the Trinity a threefold revelation of the one God, who was obliged to become man that he might give a human character to the doctrines of faith, and drive back the powers of hell. Several denominations, as the Disciples of Christ, Methodists, and others, generally rejecting the divinity of Christ, or explaining his relationship to the Father, are opposed to the expression Trinity, as not being used by the Bible.

In Germany, Sabellianism has found many admirers in the school of speculative theology. Schleiermacher, in particular, was of opinion that Sabellianism both avoided the difficulties of the church doctrine, which he regarded as insoluble, and yet satisfied the natural desire of the Christian to attribute to Christ the highest predicate without endangering Monothelism (Christliche Grundbegriffe, 2d ed. ii, 582). Many new attempts were made to advocate a Trinitarian idea of God in a sense entirely different from that of the church doctrine. We refer to them more fully in the article Trinity. Antitype, that which answers to a type or figure. The corresponding Greek word, διανυσίσχος, occurs twice in the New Testament (Heb. ix. 24; 1 Peter iii, 21), where it is rendered "figure" (q. v.). A type is its primary and literal meaning, simply denotes a rough draft, or less accurate model, from which a more perfect image is made; but the notion of a physical and theological sense of the term, a type may be defined to be a symbol of something future and distant, or an example prepared and evidently designed by God to prefigure that future thing. What is thus prefigured is called the antitype. See Typ.

Antoine, NICOLAS, an apostate from Christianity to Judaism, was born at St. Brieux in 1600, and joined early the Reformed Church. A few years later he was applied for admission among the Jews, but in vain. Having returned to Geneva, he became a teacher, and afterward Reformed pastor, at Divonne, where he preached only on texts from the Old Testament, rarely mentioning the name of Jesus, and professing strange opinions about him. He fell for some time into insanity, and, having recovered, acknowledged again his faith in the crucified Jesus. He wrote a number of tracts in Latin, and died in 1632. — Pierer, Universal-Ency., s. v.

Antonia (a frequent Ruman name, fem. of Antonius), the name of two females mentioned by Josephus.

1. The mother of Germanicus and Claudius (afterward emperor); she loaned Herod Agrippa money to retrieve his credit with Tiberius (Josephus, Ant. xvii, iii, 4, 6). She was killed about A.D. 61.

2. A daughter of the Emperor Claudius by Petina (Josephus, War, ii, 12, 7). Nero had her put to death on a charge of treason, after her refusal to marry him (Suet. Claud. 27; Ner. 35; Tacit. Ann. xii. 2; xiii. 29; xv. 58; Dio Cass. ix. 5).

Antonia (Ἀντωνία, from Antónos), a fortress in Jerusalem, on the north side of the area of the Temple, often mentioned by Josephus in his account of the later wars of the Jews. It was originally built by the Maccabeus, under the name of Barius, and was afterward rebuilt with great strength and splendor by the first Herod (Josephus, Ant. xv. 11). In a more particular description Josephus states (War, v. 5, 8) that the fortress stood upon a rock or hill fifty cubits high, at the north-west corner of the temple area, above which its wall rose to the height of forty cubits. Within it had the extent and appearance of a palace, being divided into apartments of every kind, with galleries and baths, and broad halls or barracks for soldiers; so that, as having every thing necessary within itself, it seemed a city, while in magnificence it resembled a palace. At each of the four corners was a tower. Three of these were fifty cubits high; but the fourth, at the north-west corner, was fifty cubits high, and overlooked the whole temple, with its courts. The fortress communicated with the northern and western porticoes of the temple area, and had flights of stairs descending into both, by which the garrison could at any time enter the courts of the Temple and prevent tumults. On the north it was separated from the hill Bezetha by a deep trench, lest it should be approachable from that quarter, and the depth of the trench added much to the apparent elevation of the towers (War, v. 4, 2).

This fortress is called ἴππος βιοτοχία in the New Testament (Acts xxii, 14, 47), and is the "castile" into which Paul was carried from the Temple by the soldiers, from the stairs of which he addressed the people collected in the adjacent court (Acts xxii, 31-40). Dr. Robinson (Researches, i. 422) conceives that the deep and otherwise inexplicable excavation called "the pool of Bethesda" was part of the trench below the north wall of this fortress; in which case, he remarks, its extent must have been much more considerable than has usually been supposed. — Kitto. See Jerusalem.

Antonians. 1. A sect of Antinomians in Switzerland, followers of Anton Unternäher, born a Roman Catholic at Entlenbach, 1761, whose mind seems to have been unsettled. In 1798 he began to hold meetings, and soon after announced himself as the Son of Man.
This he tried to demonstrate in the most singular manner from a number of scriptural passages, from his name, and from circumstances of his body and life. On Good Friday, 1802, he appeared, with a number of adherents, before the minister of Berne, proclaiming an apocalypse. He also summoned the government of the canton to appear before him. This led to his arrest and to an investigation, in consequence of which he was sentenced to two years imprisonment. As soon as dismissed from the prison, he again held assemblies in the neighborhood of Thun, was again arrested, and sentenced (April 3, 1805) to life-long banishment from the canton. He next went to Schöpfheim in the canton of Lucerne, where he was visited by many of his adherents. The government was first inclined to treat him as a monomaniac, but subsequently arrested him, and kept him in prison until his death in 1824. Unternährer published fifteen small volumes, several of which were printed secretly. All are written in the tone and language of the Bible. He combined the passages of the Bible without any regard to sense and connection, and justified this arbitrariness by saying that the Scriptures were only "fragments," and that, as the Man of God, had the mission to put these fragments together in the proper way. Of God he became the personal being, had all the attributes given to him in the Scriptures. Still, his conception is unconsciously pantheistic, inasmuch as he regards him merely as a natural being, without the idea of concrete holiness. He also accepted the doctrine of the Trinity, but thought himself to be the God who became man the second time. Everything created by God, inclusive of man, with all his natural instincts, was regarded by him as good; the making of any distinction, as between good and evil, he declared to be the work of the devil. According to him, the man who recognizes all such distinctions as opposed to the will of God. The redemption of mankind was begun by Christ, and completed by himself (Unternährer). All institutions of church and state, marriage, property, religious service, sacraments, he denounced and cursed as distinctions taught by the devil. The only religious service he taught consisted in the cultivation of love—in particular, sexual love, without any restraint or distinction whatever. He found adherents in several places, and many continued to believe in him even after his death, expecting that his spirit would appear again in another form. In Amoldingen, his former place of residence, the sect was suppressed in 1805. In Wohlen, near Berne, and several other communities, a certain Louis Schori became the centre of the sect. They were summoned before the courts in 1805, but dismissed with a moderate fine, and still exist. Another branch of the sect existed in the community of Gsteig, near Interlaken, under the leadership of Christ. Michel. The courts several times proceeded against this branch (1828, 1830, and 1840), and in 1841 Michel and others were sentenced to five years imprisonment. Traces and branches of this sect, it is said, may also still be found in the cantons of Lucerne, Aargau, and Zurich. (See Zyto, Chr. Michel und seine Anhänger, in Trechel's Beiträge zur Geschichte der Schweiz. reform. Kirche.)—Herzog, l. 410.

Antoniewicz, Charles Bolaz, a Polish poet and pupilator, born at Lemberg; Nov. 6, 1807, died at Obra, Nov. 14, 1862. He early distinguished himself by an acting with the Polish revolution of 1830. After the death of his wife he entered, in 1833, the order of Jesuits, and at once obtained the reputation of being the most distinguished among the living Polish patriots. His countrymen compared him with Lacaodire (q. v.) and Ventur (q. v.). He had, in particular, great success as an apostle of temperance. Antoniewicz contributed many poetical and theological articles to Polish journals, and also published a number of books, as Soteska (1828), Biodaniek (1829), Reminiscences of Polok Convent, etc. A biographical sketch of Antoniewicz, in Polish ("Reminiscences of the Life and the Writings of Antoniewicz," by Prof. Poplawski (Warsaw, 1861).—Unserze Zeit, vii., 77 vq.

Antoninus, Titius Aurelius Fulvius Boionis Pius, a Roman emperor, born Sept. 19, A.D. 68, at a villa near Lanuvium (now Civita-Lavinia), and died at Lorium (now Castel di Guigo), March 7, 161. He was first one of the four administrators of Italy, afterward procurator of Asia. Adrian having adopted him, he became successor to the Roman emperor; as Roman emperor, he crowned from 183 to 161. He showed himself in every respect one of the greatest and noblest emperors pagan Rome ever had. He was just, mild, liberal, a supporter of science and art, and averse to carrying on war. Under Adrian he saved the lives of many senators whose execution had been ordered, and he prevailed on Adrian himself to desist from committing suicide. The Roman empire greatly prospered under his administration, and neighboring nations frequently chose him as an umpire of their feuds. From him are the celebrated sayings: "I prefer saving one citizen to slaying a thousand enemies," and "A prince must not be only the property of his own, but devote every thing to the common weal." He protected the Christians when the pagans arrested several public calamities, as the inundation of the Tiber, the earthquake in Greece, confiscations, etc., to the wrath of the gods, in consequence of the Christians being tolerated. Antoninus forbade all towns in Greece, and especially Larissa, Patras, and Athene, to persecute the Christians. Enseilius (Hist. Eccles. iv. 15) gives a rec

Antoninus, Marcus Annius Verus Aurelius. See Aurelius.

Antoninus, archbishop of Florence: his real name was Antonius, but he was called by the diminutive Antoninus on account of his small stature. Born at Florence in 1892, he entered at sixteen years of age the order of St. Dominic, and soon acquired such a reputation that, even when yet quite young, he was instructed with the government of various houses of his order, at Cortona, Rome, Naples, Florence, etc., and contributed greatly to its reformation. In 1439 he took part in the Council of Florence. In 1446, Pope Eugenius IV appointed him to the archbishopric of Florence. He has been in Florence in 1450, and during a plenary indulgence of seven years to all persons who kissed his body before it was placed in the tomb! He was canonized in 1523. His works are: 1. Summa Historica, seu, Chronicon Tripartitum; from the creation to the year 1450 (Venice, 1456); Basle, 1451, 5 vols. 2. De Usum Thesauri, in domum, etc. (Venice, 1474), part 4 distinctum (Venice, 1477, 4 vols.; a new edition, with very copious notes by Father Mamachi, Venice, 1751, 4 vols. 4to).—3. Summa Concinuationis (Argent. 1492, Venice, 1572).—4. Annotaciones de Donacione Constanatitis M. —5. Trialogia de Dierpalea Eummiusiacia; with his De La Virtud de Virtutibus Liber. His life is given by Echard, De Scriptor. Ord. Prerent. i. 818, and the Acta Sanctorum, vol. i. — Cave, Hist. Litt. anno 1444 —
ANTONIUS

Antonius, a martyr, who is said to have suffered either in the fourth or in the seventh century. He has been commemorated at Pamiers, France, since the eleventh century, on the 25th of September.—Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, 431.

Antonius, a priest and martyr of Palestine, who is said to have been present at Cæsarea with Zebinus and Germanus, and, together with them, reproached the governor Firmilianus for sacrificing to idols, for which they were put to death. This happened under Galerius Maximianus. They are commemorated as priests in the Roman Church on the 28th of November.—Ruinart, p. 327; Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, i, 482.

Antonius Honorable, bishop of Constantinople, or of Cirta, in Africa. He is chiefly known by a letter of his (A.D. 457) to a Spanish bishop named Arcadius, and three others, banished by Genseric, king of the Vandals, because they would not embrace Arianism. He exhorts them to remain faithful to the cause of Christ. The letter is short, but written in vigorous and even elevated language. It is given in Baronius, Ansataes, A.D. 457, and in the B. M. Patrum, viii, 655.—Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 338; Dupin, Hist. Ecc. Writers, i, 447; Hoefer, Biog. Generale, ii, 839.

Antonius, son of Augustine, who, according to Jerome, son of the vice-chancellor of that kingdom; studied at Salamanca, whence he passed into Italy, and made himself master of law, ecclesiastical history, languages, etc. At twenty-five years of age he published Exami nations et Opinionum Juris Civilis. Paul III made him auditor of the Rota; and Julius, his successor, sent him as legate into England, and when Philip of Spain went there to marry Queen Mary. He was made successively bishop of Alfa in 1556, and Lerida in 1551, and lastly, in 1567, archbishop of Tarracona, which dignity he held till his death in 1566. Baluze has given a list of his works at the end of his Treatise on theCorrection of Gratian, which is the most considerable of his writings.—Dupin, Hist. of Ecc. Writers, iii, 743; Landon, Eccles. Dict, s. v.

Antonio, Juan, a Franciscan of Salamanca, ex-definitor and ex-guardian of the Franciscan Discalcedas of St. Paul, also censor of the supreme tribunal of the Inquisition, and general historian of the entire order. He wrote: Monarcho Minorum Discalceatorum (Salaman. 1728, 4to);—Christus de Francisco della Provincia de S. Paulo en Castilla (tom. i, Salaman. 1727; tom. ii, Madrid, 1729, fol.);—Bibliotheca Universae Franciscana (9 toms. Madrid, 1732).—Richard and Giraud, Biblioth. Sacr., cited by Landon, s. v.

Antonio de Cordova, an Observantine monk of the order of St. Francis, who was looked upon in his time as an oracle in theology. He refused the bishopric of Placentia, which was offered to him, and died at Guadalaxara, in New Castle, in 1578, aged ninety-three. Among his works are De Potestate Papa (Venice, 1578); De Ecclesiis Regul. s. Francisci (Paris, 1621, 8vo); Quaestiones de Determini, etc. (Alecia, 1553); Quaestiones Theologicae lib. e (Venice, 1604, fol.); Commentarios in 4 libros Magistri Sent. de In dulgentiis (Alecia, 1554); De Conceptione B. Virginis.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio de Santa Maria, a Franciscan monk and missionary, born at Placentia, Spain, about 1619. He went as missionary to the Pala painted Islands, where he taught theology in the monastery of the Discalcedas. In 1633 he went to China, and was made superior of the missionaries of his order in that country. For thirty-seven years he labored with great zeal, suffering chains and imprisonment. He preached first in the province of Fukien, then at Nankin, and lastly in Xantung, where he founded a church. He died in 1670. Among the works which he has left may be mentioned Relatio Sinensium Sectorum; De Controversis Præsumptorum Defensatorum; Confessio Cultus; An Apology for Christianity, in Chinese; A work in Spanish on the Chinese rites (translated into French by the Board of Foreign Missions, and printed at Paris, 1701); A Catechism, in Chinese (Canton, 1688); An Apology for the Dominican and Franciscan Missionaries in China; History of the Venerable Brother Gabriel, of Madeira, and the Seven Discalceate Franciscans, murdered in Japan; De modo Evangelizandi regionem Dei in Sinico imperio; Tractatus de Sinicum Conversione; Relationes et de Conversations Progressus, ac Fratrum Missionariorum discalceatorum in Sinico imperio; and many other works, chiefly relating to the Chinese missions.—Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Antonio of the Holy Spirit, a Portuguese monk, of the order of Barefooted Carmelites, and a famous theologian and preacher, who died bishop of Angola, in Upper Guinea, in 1667. He left many treatises, printed at Lyons, in five vols. fol.—Richard and Giraud, Biblioth. Sacr., cited by Landon, s. v.

Antonius (a frequent Roman name), the name of several men in Josephus. See also ANTONY.

1. Lucius, third son of Marcus Antonius Creticus, and younger brother of Marc Antony, became tribune in B.C. 44, and consul in B.C. 41. Upon the death of Julius Caesar, he actively supported his brother's cause as triumvir (Dion Cass. xlvii, 5); but in the issue he was besieged in Perusia, and forced to surrender, B.C. 40. He was shortly afterward appointed to the command of Iberia, after which we hear no more of him (Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. Antonius, 14). Clee- ro describes him as a famous orator (Phil. iii, 12, 7; iv, 7, 11, 12, 8, etc.), but with exaggeration (Drumann, Gesch. Roma, p. 527). His decree as "Roman vice-questor and vice-preator" to the Sardians in favor of the Jews is recited by Josephus (Ant. xiv, 10, 17).

2. Marcus (surnamed Primus), a native of Tolosa, in Gaul, received in his boyhood the epithet of Bero, i.e. in Gallic a boy's name (Suetonius, Jul. 18; Martial, ix, 10). He afterward went to Rome, and rose to the dignity of senator; but, having been degraded for forger-y, he was banished (Tacit. Ann. xiv, 40). After the death of Nero (A.D. 68), he was restored to his former rank by Galba, and appointed to the command of the seventh legion in Pannonia. When the fortunes of Vitellius began to fail (A.D. 69), Antonius was one of the first generals of Europe to declare in favor of Vespasian, to whom he subsequently rendered the most important military services (Smith's Dict. of Clsus. Biog. s. v. Primus). His dispossesement of the forces of Vitellius from Rome is related by Josephus (War, iv, 11, 2 and 3). His haughty behavior in consequence, however, appears thenceforth to have left him in comparative obscurity (Tacit. Hist. ii, 86; Dio Cass. 1ixv, 9-18).

3. A captain of the Roman garrison at Ascalon, attacked by the Jews in the beginning of the final struggle (Josephus, B. J. ii, 11, 8). It is uncertain whether he was the same with the centurion who lost his life during the siege of Jotapata by the treachery of one of the Jews who had fled into the neighboring caves (ib. iii, 7, 45).

ANTONIUS, a martyr of the 14th century, who, with his brother, abandoned Paganism for Christianity in Lithuania. The grand-duke Olga made vain efforts to induce the brothers to abjure Christianity, and finally ordered them to be tortured and hung. They are celebrated as martyrs in the Roman Church April 14.—Acta Sanctorum, April 14; Hoefer, Biogr. Générale, ii, 828.

ANTONIUS Melissa, a Greek monk toward the end of the eighth century (?). He made a collection (something after the manner of Stobaeus) of passages from the classics and from the church fathers, ranging the latter under seventy heads. It was first printed by Gesner (Zürich, 1546, fol.), and is given also at the end of Stobaeus (Franç. 1581), and also in the Bibliotheca Patrum, t. v.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, i, 823.

ANTONIUS Nebriacensius. See ANTHONY OF LEHRIJA.

ANTONIUS or Anton, Paul, a German theologian, born at Hirschfeld in 1661. He became professor at Halle, and was for many years the friend and collaborator of Francke (q. v.) in the revival of religion known as Pietism. He died at Halle in 1780. Among his writings are De sermo processionum gentium (Leipzig, 1684, 4to);—Concilii Tridentini doctrinae publicae (Halle, 1757, 8vo, and often);—Elementa Homileticae (Halle, 1759, 8vo);—other writings of his are named in Walch, Bibliotheca, ii.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, i, 824.

ANTONY, Marc (properly Marcus Antonius), the triumvir, son of M. Antonius Creticus and Julia, the sister of Julius Caesar, was born apparently B.C. 83, for he was chosen consul as early as B.C. 64. His father was a senator, and he was young, and his mother having married again, he was left in his youth to all sorts of dissipation, and early became distinguished for profligacy, which continually afterward involved him in want and danger. To escape from his creditors, he served in the army in Syria under Gabinius, where he acquired a reputation for intrepidity (Josephus, Ant. xiv, 5, 3; War, i, 8, 5). He took part in the campaigns against Aristobulus in Palestine (B.C. 57, 56), and also in the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt (in B.C. 55). In the following year he followed J. Caesar into Gaul, through whose influence he was elected questor in B.C. 52, and whose legate he became during the contest with the party of Pompey (B.C. 49-47). On the murder of Caesar, Antony was left in supreme power, but a rival soon appeared in the young Octavianus, with whom, after a defeat in battle, he at length formed the first triumvirate, in connection with Lepidus, the chief in command of the consular troops, B.C. 43, the death of Cicero being one of the terms of the compact. Antony now vigorously prosecuted the war against the opponents of the late dictator Caesar, and defeated Brutus and Cassius in a pitched battle at Pharsalia, B.C. 42. Then, after an interval spent in Rome, he passed over to Asia, in order to procure funds for paying his troops, and in Egypt he became enamored of the famous Cleopatra (q. v.), and, neglecting his affairs in dalliance with her, at last became involved in insurrectionary reverses, which terminated in the disastrous battle of Actium, B.C. 31, by which Octavianus became master of Egypt. Antony fled to Alexandria, and when Octavianus appeared before the place, he committed suicide. B.C. 30 (Smith’s Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.). Several of the events in the later part of his career are referred to by Josephus (Ant. xiv, 18, 1; War, i, 16, 4), who speaks in detail of his connection with Herod (Ant. xiv, 13–18, 4), and recites his decrees to various countries in favor of the Jews (Ant. xiv, 10, 9 and 10). See HEROD THE GREAT. Flutarch wrote a Life of Antony. See Liddell’s Hist. of Rome, p. 674–726.

Antothiti’ah (Heb. Anathothiyyah, Ἀναθώθι, v. r. Anathō, answers from Jehovah; Sept. Αναθωσία v. r. Αναθώσια), a descendant of Shashak, a chief Benjaminite of Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii, 24). B.C. apparently ante 538.

Antothite, the rendering in the Auth. Ver. in two passages (1 Chron. xi, 28; xiii, 3) of the name more properly, or at least more analogically, Anglicized ANATHOTHITE, i.e. an inhabitant of Anathoth (q. v.). It is observable that while the city is invariably written Anathoth (see Gen. xxxi, 18; 1 Chron. vi, 60 [45]; vii, 8; Ezra ii, 23; Neh. vii, 27; x, 19 [20]; xi, 32; Isa. x, 30; Jer. i, 1; xi, 21, 23; xxii, 8; with the art., Άναθώθι), as a var. read. in Jer. xxiii, 7; “defectively,” Ἰανώθι, in I Kings ii, 26, as a var. read. in Jer. xxiii, 9; Sept. Αναθωσία v. r. Ναθωσία in 1 Chron. vii, 8; Vulg. Anathoth, but Anathoth in Neh. vii, 27), the derivative is written very variously as follows: 2 Sam. xxiii, 27, Heb. Ammethoth, יָמְמוֹת, Sept. Αναθώσια, Vulg. de Anathoth, Auth. Ver. “Anathothite;” 1 Chron. xi, 28, Anothkhi, יָמְמֵה, גְּמוֹת, Anathothites, “Antothite;” 1 Chron. xii, 3, Anothkhi, יָמְמֵה, גְּמוֹת, Anathothites, “Antothite;” 1 Chron. xxiv, 12, Anothkhi, יָמְמֵה [v. r. Anothi, יָמְמֵה], i.e. Αναθώσια, Anathothites, “Antothite;” Jer. xxix, 27, Anothkhi, יָמְמֵה, גְּמוֹת, i.e. Αναθώ, Anathothites, “of Anathoth.”

Ar’um (Heb. Am, ἁρμός, bound together; Sept.Ἐρωθις v. r. Ερωθί), the first named of the two or three sons of Coz of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 8). B.C. post 1618.

Antibus (Ἀντίβους, derivation unknown), the name of an Egyptian deity, who had a temple in Rome, where Mardus, by personating the god, through the concurrence of a freed-woman and the collusion of the priests, secured the gratification of his passion for Paulina, a chaste matron (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 3, 3). His worship in Egypt is referred to by Herodotus (ii, 60), and was widely disseminated during the Roman Empire (Appian, Bell. Civ. iv, 47; Apul. Met. xi, 262; Lamprid. Commod. 9; Spartan, Pescenn. Nig. 6; Anton. Caec. 9). He appears to have been adored under the figure of a dog-headed man, a myth of which the ancients gave various interpretations (see Smith’s Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v.). In the

ed. Still, as they are from different dies, yet all referring to Apamea, it seems that their authors had a knowledge of the tradition of commemoration respecting the ark preserved in this city. See Anx. Many more such commemorations of an event so greatly affecting mankind were no doubt maintained for many ages, though we are now under great difficulties in tracing them. In fact, many cities boasted of these memorials, and referred to them as proofs of their antiquity. See Arrarat.

Apathy (απαθής, want of feeling) or affectuum sordacia, a term formerly used to denote the entire extinction of the vicious passions, so that the smallest movement of them is felt. It implies the utter rooting out of conceitulence, and the annihilation of all sin within. This was a favorable doctrine with the Stoics; and some of the fathers, as St. Clement of Alexandria, St. Macarius, and others, have used expressions which, at first sight, seem to imply that they had themselves attained to this state; but, in fact, they mean only that a perfect Christian keeps all his passions and desires in perfect subjection, so that they have not in any degree the mastery over him. The

mals from Ophir. Now neither peacocks nor pheasants are indigenous in Africa; they belong to India and the mountains of high Asia, and therefore the version "peacocks." If correct, would decide, without doubt, not only that koph denotes none of the Simiae above noticed, but also that the fleet of Tarshish visited India or the Australasian islands. For these reasons we conclude that the Hebrew koph, and names of some root, were, by the nations in question, used generally in some instances and specifically in others, though the species were not thereby defined, nor on that account identical. For the Assyrian Monuments, natural history of the ape family, see the Penry Cyclopaedia, s. v. For some attempts to identify the various kinds of quadrupeds which were known to the ancients, see Lichtenstein's Commentatio philologica de Simiurum quoquequod veteribus innominatis forma (Hamb. 1791), and Tyson's Homo sylvestris, or the Anatomy of a Pignic (Lond. 1699), to which he has added a philosophical essay concerning the Cynocephali, or Satyrs, and Satyric Monuments. Aristoph. (De Anim. Hist. ii, 5, ed. Schneider) appears to divide the quadrupeds of mammalia into three tribes, which he characterizes by the names πίθηκος, κυνόγαλον, and κυνοκλεφός. The ancients were acquainted with several kinds of tailed and tailless apes (Plin. Hist. Nat. viii, 60; xi, 106; Elian. Anim. xvii, 23), and obtained them from Ethiopia to India (Tuscul. ix, 13, ed. sup.) and India (Ctes. in Phot. Cod. Ixxiii, p. 66; Arrian, Ind. 15; Elian. Anim. xvii, 25, 89; Philostr. Apoll. iii, 4), but in Mauritania they were domesticated (Strato, xvii, 587), as now in Arabia Felix (Niebuhr, Bed. p. 167). Some species of babo are may be denoted by the term ἄνθρωπος, sainx, or demons ("devils") in Deut. xxiii, 17; Psa. cvi, 37; and perhaps by the βιαίω, πληκτρον, or hairy ones (goats, "satyrs") of the desert (Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 14), since these animals (see Rich's Baboon, p. 30) are still found in the ruins of the Mesopotamian plains, under the name Sirh Azdak (see generally Bochart, Hieroz. ii, 596 sqq.) It is some confirmation of this last interpretation that the Egyptians are said to have worshipped apes, and they are still adored in many places in India. See SATYRS.

Apel, Johann, a German theologian, was born at Nuremberg in 1486. After having studied theology at the university of Wittenberg, he became canon at Wurzburg, where he married a nun in 1528, in consequence of which he was expelled. He was one of the most ardent adherents of Luther, and eagerly labored for the spreading of the Reformation. He died in 1536 at Nuremberg, where he had been, during the last years of his life, jurist of the republic and councillor of the elector of Brandenburg. He wrote, among other works, Definatio pro suo concupisc aut proplet. Lutheri (Wittenb. 1528, 4to); Brachylogia juris civilis: a work long sacered to the Emperor Justinian. Hoefner, Bioy. Gernale, ii, 875.

Apelles, followers of Apelles, q. v. Apelles (Ἀπέλλης, from the Lat. appellare, to call), a Christian at Rome, whom Paul salutes in his epistle to the church there (Rom. xvi, 10), and calls "approved" (ἀνακεκοίτησα), i.e. "proved in." Origen doubts whether he may not have been the same person with Apollo; but this is far from certain.
APPELLES
likely. See APOLLO. According to the old Church traditions, Apelles was one of the seventy disciples, and bishop either of Smyrna or Hieraclea (Epiph.
Cont. Hier. p. 20; Fabricius Lice Ecclesiast., p. 115, 116, and ed., 120). The Greeks observe his festival on Oct. 31. The name is itself not remarkable from Herodotus’ "Erechth.
Judas Apella, non ego" (Suid. i, 5), by which he less probably means a superstitious Jew in general, as many think, than a particular Jew of that name well known at Rome.—Kitto, s. v.

Apelles, surnamed, from his length of life, SENEX,
a heretic, and disciple of Marcion, who, having been false, was perhaps the seduction of a young girl of Alexandria, subscribed in Philadelphene, set up his own, and became a critic of his former master. He taught that the Lord, when descendin z from heaven, formed to himself a body of particles of air, which he allowed to resolve itself into air again as he ascended.
He taught that there was one God, the Creator of all things created, and that the human form, not even set up, in trusted to one of them the formation of the world.
He denied the resurrection of the flesh, and repudiated
the law and the prophets.—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 188; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v, 13; Mosheim, Comm. i, 487, 488; Lardner, Works, viii, 589 sq.; London, s. v.

 Aphipica (το 'Αφιπια, according to the ancients,
from the Heb. Πηγός, Απήκ, to embrace, with reference to the loves of Venus and Adonis, Lysim. Magn. s. v.; see her, Art. i, 192), a town of Cati-Syria, near Arelate between Hippos and Bologna, where, as we learn from Irenaeus, Hist. Eccl. i, 50, a position, as Reland thinks (Palaeis. p. 515), not inconsistent with the other notices of the place as being situated on Lebanon. It was notorious for its province of Temple, where all the abominations of an improvident idolatry were practised to such a degree that Constantine destroyed it (Eusebius, Eccl. vii, 13; Comm. iii, 55; Sosomcn, Hist. Eccl. i, 6). Near it was a lake celebrated for certain marvellous properties (Seneca, Cons. Nat. iii, 25). It has been regarded as identical with the APHE (q. v.) of Josh. xix, 30, and the Apik of Judg. i, 81. Sectsien first observed the probability of its identity, who of Aphares with the present A.,
the village of the region indicated, and containing ruins (Roien, i, 245), which have since been described by Thompson in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1888, p. 5. The lake has been identified with that now called Limos, three hours distant (Burckhardt, Travels, p. 59), but Robson thinks it is rather the neighboring spring
(new ed. of Burckhardt, p. 319). Aphares or Aphares (Ἀφιπίς in the Apocrypha) or Aphithemis (Ἀφιθεμίς in Josephus), one of the three "governmental" (πολιτικάς) added to Judaea from Samaria (and Galilee, 1 Macc. x, 30) by Demetrius Soter, and confirmed by Nicander (1 Macc. xi, 84; comp. Josc.
Ant. xiii, 4, 9; and see Reland, Palaeis. p. 178). It is perhaps, he says, the same as the Euphrates of the New Test. (John xii, 51) and the Orphimae (q. v.) of the Old.

Apharachites (Chald. Aparakeshaye, אבּרתכּה, Sept.
'Αφαρασχίτες, Ezra vi, 5; viii, 7) or Apharesuchi-tes (Chald. Aparakeshaye, אבּרתכּה, Sept.
'Αφαρασχίτες, Ezra iv, 9), the name of the nation (or one of the nations) to which belonged one portion of the colonists whom the Assyrian king planted in Samaria, in place of the expatriated northern tribes,
and who violently opposed the Jews in rebuilding Jerusalem. Schulthees (Parad. p. 802) identifies the "Apharachites" with the Persian, or rather Median, Parasaconoi of Greek geography (Strabo xi, 522; xv 772; Herod. i, 101; Plin. xvi, 29), the A being pros-thetic (as in Strabo, xv, 764, Mardi and Amardi are interchanged). They, together with the Apharases
(q. v.), for whose name this would seem only another form, appear to be the alien tribes of the Easter Asia, conquered by the Assyrians, and removed (according to well-known usage, see 2 Kings xviii, 32)
the other region for security and political extension. Ewald (Israel, Gesch. iii, 375), following Gesenius, regards the name as another for the Persians themselves, adopted out of hostility to the Jews (ib. p.
120), and in a three-fold form to enhance their own importance.

Apharites (Chald. Aparakeshaye, אבּרתכּה, Sept.
'Αφαραπτής, Ezra vi, 5), the name of a tribe removed along with the Aphanesites (q. v.) to Samaria by the king of Assyria, and forming one of the opposite nations after the captivity (Ezra iv, 9). Hiller (Onomast.) regards them as the Parnnaxi, a tribe of Eastern Media, and Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 148) thinks they are the Persians, to whose name theirs certainly bears a much greater affinity, especially in the prolonged form of the latter found in Dan. vi, 29 (Chald. Paraptye, אבּרתכּה). The presence of the proper name of the Persians in Ezra i, 1; iv, 8, must throw some doubt upon Gesenius' conjecture; but it is very possible that the local name of the tribe may have undergone alteration, while the official and general name was correctly given.

Aphok (Heb. אָפָכָה, אָפָכ, prob. strength; with the directive, Josh. xiii, 4; 1 Kings xx, 26; 1 Sam.
xxix, 1; hence not to be confused with Aphenah, the name of at least three cities (Schwarz, Palest. p. 90).
1. (Sept. 'Aphar and Apok). A city of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix, 30), apparently near Phoenicia (Josh. xiii, 4), doubtless the same with Apher (q. v.), which the Israelites were unable to capture from the Canaanites (Judg. i, 31). This has been thought (see J.
D. Michaelis, Suppl. p. 114; Rosenmüller, Althebr. II, ii, 96; Gesenius, Thes. Heb. i, 140; Raumer, Palast. p. 120, and others) to be the Amnon of the Aphok (אָפָכָה) which Eusebius (Constant. iii, 55)
and Sozomen (Hist. ii, 5) place in Lebanon, on the river Adonis (Zozim. i, 58), where there was a famous temple of Venus (Theophanes, Chron. p. 18). A village called Aptos is still found in Lebanon, situated at the bottom of a valley, and probably marks the site of this latter place (Burckhardt, p. 25; Richter, p. 107).
It is situated in the south-east bank of the great basin
of Akuran, where are the sources of the Nahr Iribah,
the Adonis of the ancients, and an amphitheatre of verdant beauty. Here a fine fountain bursts forth in cascat es from a cavern; and directly in front of these are the shadowy vales of a large temple—the ancient Venus of Aphok, still containing massive columns of syenite granite (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1858, p. 150).
(For the history and description of this place, see Robinson's Bibl. Res. new ed. iii, 304 sq.) But Roland (Palest. p. 572) correctly observes that this place is situated too far north to have been included in the bounds of the twelve tribes (see Keil, Comment. on Josh. xix, 30). It is possible, nevertheless, that the Aphok of Josh. xiii, 4, is identical with this Aphok in Lebanon (Schwarz, Palest. p. 63, 90), and this may, perhaps, be the Canaanitah royal city mentioned in Josh. xii, 18; but even if of doubtfulness, it and it cannot have been the city in the tribe of Asher near Bethel (Josh. xiv, 20; Jud. i, 31). From this last circumstance Schwarz thinks (Palest. p. 124) that the Aphok in question may be the En-Fid (which he says is also called En-Fid) three miles south-west of Banias (see Zimmermann's Map); but this is beyond the bounds of belief. It may be that the opposition of the two names is not due to any difference from the Syrian city of the same name. See RHIV. Kiepert (in his last Wortkarte von Pald-stein, 1807) gives this Aphok a conjectural location south-east of Acco, apparently at Tell Kioxon (Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 105). See AfficH.

2. (Sept. of the Apherites, Ezra vi, 5), a city in the Philistines twice encamped before battles with the Israelites (1 Sam. iv, APHEKAH 288 APIS

1; xxix, 1; comp. xxviii, 4). Either this or the preceding, but most probably this, was the Aphek (Sept. 'Aphä'ē'ē) mentioned in Josh. xii, 18, as a royal city of the Canaanites. Belland (Palest. p. 572) and others (e. g. Schwartz, Palest. p. 136) assume that the Aphek of 1 Sam. iv, 1, must have been in the tribe of Judah, because presumed to be near Mizpeh (comp. 1 Sam. vii, 12); but this is unnecessary. See APHEKAH. Josephus calls it Ἀφηκα (Ἀφηκα, Ant. v, 11, 1; viii, 14, 2). The commentaries on (Om. ομ. ) omit it in 'Aphek, one of its vicinities. Schwartz (Palest. p. 168), concerning this Aphek with that of 1 Kings xx, 26, seeks it in the village of Fûkah, two miles east of En-Gannim; but this is beyond the territory of Issachar. Kiepert (Wanderb. von Palast. 1856) locates it between the river Kishon and Shunem, apparently at El-Fuleh, where the Crusaders placed it (Van der Veude, Memoir, p. 266), or, rather, at the neighboring El-Fuleh, a ruined village (Robinson's Researches, iii, 163, 176, 181).

3. (Sept. 'Αφέκα). A town near which Benhadad was defeated by the Israelites (1 Kings xx, 26), evidently on the military road between Damascus and Palestine (which was walled (1 Kings v, 10) and was apparently a common spot for engagements with Syria (2 Kings xii, 17). The use of the word אפֵּה (Auth. Vers. "the plain") in 1 Kings xx, 25, fixes the situation of Aphek to have been in the hilly down-country east of the Jordan [see Mision], and it seems to correspond to the Ἀφνακα of Eschusl (Onomast. Ἀφνακα), a large city situated near Hippos, east of the Sea of Galilee. Josephus also (Ant. vii, 14, 4) calls it Ἀφνακα (Ἀφνακα), and it appears to have been in the tower of this place (πύργος Ἀφνακα) that some of the insurgent Galileans threw themselves during the war with Cestius Gallus (Joseph. War, ii, 19, 1). The same place is probably mentioned by Burchhardt, mentioned, and others, under the name of Fik or Afık (see Gesen. in Burchhardt, Reisen, i, 539). It is a village on the top of a mountain, containing about two hundred families, who dwell in huts built out of the ruins of the ancient city, which appears to have been peculiarly situated so as to cause the ruin of the Syrian army by an earthquake (Thomson's Land and Book, ii, 59, 61).

Aphekah (Hab. Aphekah, אפקרה, fem. of Aphek; Sept. 'Aphä'ē'ē v. r. 'Aphä'ē'ē, a city in the mountain tract of Judah, mentioned between Beth-tappuah and Humnah (Josh. xv, 53). Raumer (Palest. p. 170) and others confound this with the Aphek of Josh. xii, 18; but the chief accentuation of the name breaks it up, and, if the Schwartz and others' account is correct, it falls in the village Afık, 4 miles east of Jabneh; but this position is entirely out of region of the associated names, which require a locality near Horbon, perhaps between that place and Tappuah (Keil, Comment. in loc.), possibly at the ruined site Shibat (Van der Veude, Aphek).

Aph'è'num. See APEHEMA.

Aph'è'num (Aph'è'num), one of the servants of Solomon whose sons are said to have returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 84); but the genuine text ( Ezra ii, 61) has no such name.

Ap'hi'ah (Hab. Ap'hi'ah, אפיה, known upon; Sept. 'Api'ah v. r. 'Aphi', the father of Beechorath, a Benjamite, ancestor of King Saul (1 Sam. i, 1). B.C. considerably ante 955.

Ap'hi'ah (Hab. Ap'hi'ah; אפיה, strong; Sept. 'Aphä'ē'ē), one of the cities from which the Asherites were unable to expel the Canaanites (Judg. i, 31); doubtless the same as the Aphek (q. v.) of Jos. xiii, 4; xix, 30.

Ap'rhah (Hab. Ap'rhah, אפרחה), another form of the name Ophrah (Mic. i, 10). See BETH-LE-PHRH.
A sacred court or yard was set apart for the residence of Apis in the temple of Ptah at Memphis, where a numerous retinue of priests waited upon him, and sacrifices of red oxen were offered to him. His movements, choice of places, and changes of appetite, were religiously regarded as oracles. It was an understood law that Apis must not live longer than twenty-five years. When he attained this age he was secretly put to death, and buried by the priests in a sacred well, the popular belief being that he cast himself into the water. If, however, he died a natural death, his body was embalmed, and then solemnly interred in the temple of Serapis at Memphis. The burial-place of the Apis bulls has lately been discovered near Memphis (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, abidugm. i, 292).

As soon as a suitable animal was found for a new Apis, having the required marks—black color with a white square on the brow, the figure of an eagle on the back, and a knot in the shape of a canthus under the tongue—he was led in triumphal procession to Nipopolis at the time of the new moon, where he remained forty days, waited upon by nude women, and was afterward conveyed in a splendid vessel to Memphis. His Thoth-day, or day of discovery, and his birthday were celebrated as high festivals of seven days' duration during the rise of the Nile (Herod. iii, 28). The worship of the golden calf by the Israelites in the wilderness, and also the employment of golden calves as symbols of the Deity by the Jews, have been generally referred to the Egyptian worship of Apis. Smith's Dict. of Class. Mythol. s. v. See Calf (Golden).

Apoacrpha, the Greek name of the Book of Revelation (q. v.).

Apocalypse, KNIGHTS of THE, an association founded in 1692 at Rome by Agostino Goebri, for the purpose of defending the Catholic Church against the pope, whom it considered to be the Antichrist. The members always went out armed, and their chief was called Monarch of the Most Holy Trinity. The Inquisition suppressed the association in 1697.

Apocrypta (q. d. ἀπόκρυπτα, from ἀπόκρυπτο, to separate), a sect, in the third century, who asserted that the human soul is part of God, a portion of His substance joined to man. They ranked among the Manichaeans (q. v.).

Apocatastasis, a term used in Acts iii, 21, in the combination apocatastasis paxion (ἀποκαταστάσις πάσιον), i.e., the restoration of all things. Origen, and, after him, many theologians and sects of ancient and modern times, put upon this passage the construction that at one time, evil itself, sin, condemnation, and Satan, would be reconciled through Christ with God. See Restitution; Restorationists.

Apocrisia (Ἀποκρίσια; Lat. Responsalia), literally a respondent, the title of a legate to negotiate concerning matters ecclesiastical. Justinian (Novel. 6) calls the Apocrisaries those "who administer the affairs of the churches." At first they were bishops, but afterward priests or deacons were substituted, and the term seems to have been applied to any one acting as locum-tenens for a bishop (or even monastery) in ecclesiastical matters; but the name was generally applied to the pope's nuncio at Constantinople, who resided there to receive the pope's instructions and to report the answers of the emperor. This custom ended with the Iconoclast divisions. After Charlemagne had been crowned emperor, the popes conferred the name and the office of apocrisarius upon the imperial arch-chaplains and the name apocrisarius became a mere title, which the arch-chaplains of the palace bore, without being any longer representatives of the pope. —Sulzer, Thes. p. 456; Collier, Hist. Diet. vol. iii, Suppl.; London, Ecd. Dict. i, 446.

Apoacrpha (ἀπόκρυφα, sc. βιβλια, hidden, mysterious), a term in theology, applied in various senses to denote certain books claiming a sacred character. The word occurs in the N. T. in its ordinary sense (Mark iv. 22). It is first found, as denoting a certain class of books, in Clements Alexandrinus (Stromata, 13, c. 4, Íκα των ἀπόκρυψεων).

1. Definition and Application of the Term.—The primary meaning of ἀπόκρυφος, "hidden, secret" (in which sense it is used in Hellenistic as well as classical Greek, see Eschylus. xxiii, 19; Luke viii, 17; Col. ii, 18), seems, throughout the rest of the 2d century, to have been associated with the signification "spurious," and ultimately to have settled down into the latter. Tertullian (de Anim. c. 2) and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 1, 19, 69; iii, 4, 29) apply it to the forged or spurious books which the heretics of their time circulate as authoritative. The first passage referred to from the Stromata, however, may be taken as an instance of the transition stage of the words. The followers of Prodicus, a Gnostic teacher, are said there to boast that they have the βιβλια ἀπόκρυφων of Zoroaster. In Athanasius (Ep. Fest. ii, 68; Synopsis Sac. Script. ii, 154, ed. Col. 1638), Augustus (Joseph. xxi, 2; Civ. Dei, xvi, 28), Jerome (Ep. ad Latam, and Prol. Gal.) the word is used uniformly with the bad meaning which had become attached to it. The writers of that period, however, do not seem to have seen clearly how the word had acquired this secondary sense; and hence we find conjectural explanations of its etymology. The root of the word in Athenodorus (ὁ ἀσβηστικός), from ἄσβηστος, "not hidden," is considered in the Vulgate by Jerome to mean that such books are ἀποκριφής μᾶλλον ἢ ἀναγνώσις ἁμόρα, is probably meant rather as a play upon the word than as giving its derivation. Later conjectures are (1), that given by the translators of the English Bible (ed. 1655, Pref. to Apoc.), "because they were wont to be read not according to their common, but as it were in secret and apart;" (2), one, resting on a misapprehension of the meaning of a passage in Epiphanes (de Mens. ac Poud. c. 4) that the books in question were called because, not being in the Jewish canon, they were excluded from the scriptures from the ark in which the true scriptures were preserved; (3), that the word ἀποκρυφα answers to the Heb. דַּבָּר קָדָם, "libri absconditi," by which the later Jews designated those books which, as of doubtful authority or not tending to edification, were not read publicly in the synagogues; (4), that it originates in the κατανόiatori or secret books of the Greek mysteries. Of these it may be enough to say, that (1) is, as regards some of the books now bearing the name at variance with itself; that (2), as has been said, rests on a mistake; that (3) wants the support of direct evidence of the use of ἀποκρυφα as the translation for the Hebrew word; and that (4), though it approximates to what is probably the true history of the word, is so far only a conjecture. —Smith, s. v.

In the early ages of the Christian Church this term was frequently used to denote books of an uncertain or anonymous author, or of one who had written under an assumed name. Its application, however, in this sense is far from being distinct, and, strictly speaking, would include canonical books whose authors were unknown or uncertain, or even pseudopigraphical. Origens, on Matt. xxi, had applied the term apocryphal in a similar way: "This passage is to be found in no canonical book." (2) those which we have from the Latin translation by Rufinus, "but in the apocryphal book of Elias" (secretis Elia). And, "This is plain, that many examples have been added by the apostles and evangelists, and inserted in the New Testament, which we do not read in the canonical Scriptures which we possess, but which Origens calls the "Apostolic History" (Origins, Profil. in Cant.). So also Jerome, referring to the words (Eph. v. 14), "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead," observes that "the apostle cited this from hidden (reconditissima propheta, and such as seem to be apocryphal, as he has done in several other instances." (3) Epiphanius, thought that this term was applied to such books as were not placed in the Ark of the Covenant, but put away in some other place (see Suerus's Theaurus for the true reading of the passage in this father). Under the term apocryphal have been included books of a religious character, which were in circulation among private Christians, but which were not read in the church assemblies; such as 3 and 4 Esdras, and 3 and 4 Maccabees. (See Sare, De apocrifaph, apollata, Greifsw. 1766.)

In regard to the New Testament, the term has been usually applied to books invented by heretics to favor their views, or by Catholics under fictitious signatures. This, we have seen, was the case for both the apocryphal and apocryphal gospels (see below). It is probably in reference to such that Basil, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Jerome gave cautions against the reading of apocryphal books; although it is possible, from the context, that the last named father alludes to the books which were also called "secrets," that is, the Sibylline and other apocryphal canons and apocryphal gospels (see above). It is probably in reference to such that Basil, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Jerome gave cautions against the reading of apocryphal books; although it is possible, from the context, that the last named father alludes to the books which were also called "secrets," that is, the Sibylline and other apocryphal canons and apocryphal gospels (see above).

The following passage from his epistle to Leta, on the education of her daughter, will serve to illustrate this part of our subject: "All apocryphal books should be avoided; but if she ever wishes to read them, not to establish the truth of doctrines, but with a reverential feeling for the truths they signify, she should be told that they are not the works of the authors by whose names they are distinguished, that they contain much that is faulty, and that it is a task requiring great prudence to find gold in the midst of clay." And to the same effect Philastrius: "Among whom are the M.niches, Gnostics [etc.], who, having some apocryphal books, for we have Origens's work only in the apocryphal canons, are accustomed to despise the canonical Scriptures; but these secret Scriptures—that is, apocryphal—though they ought to be read by the perfect for their morals, ought not to be read by all, as ignorant heretics have added and taken away what they wished." He then proceeds to say that the books to which he refers are the Acts of Andrew, written by "the disciples who were his followers," etc.

In the Bibliothèque Sacrée, by the Dominicans Richard and Giraud (Paris, 1822), the term is defined to signify (1) anonymous or pseudopigraphal books; (2) those which are not public reading, although they may be read with edification in private; (3) those which do not pass for authentic and of divine authority, although they pass for being composed by a sacred author or an apostle, as the Epistle of Barnabas; and (4) dangerous books composed by ancient heretics to favor their opinions. (a) That is, the Gospels, as in the sense of the title of the Apocryphon of Theodot. It has also been reduced to certain books not found in the Hebrew canon, but yet publicly read from time immemorial in the Christian Church for edification, although not considered of authority in controversies of faith. These were also termed ecclesiastical books, and have been denominated, for distinction's sake, the deuterocanon- ical books, inasmuch as they were not part of the original or Hebrew canon. In this sense they are called by some the Antilegomena of the Old Testament. "The uncanonical books," says Athanasius, or the author of the Synopsis, "are divided into antilegomena and apocrypha."—Kirk, E. T. See Antilegomena.

Even the Church Fathers admitted that the great number of pseudonymous productions palmed off upon the unwary as at once sacred and secret, under the great names in Jewish or Christian history, brought this entire class of works into disrepute. Those whose faith rested on the teaching of the Christian Church, and who looked to the O. T. Scriptures either in the Hebrew or the Septuagint, were not slow to perceive that these productions were destitute of all authority. They applied in scorn what had been used as a title of honor. The secret books (cibiri se- cretorius, Orig. Comm. in Matt. ed. Lom. iv, 257) were rejected as spurious. The word apocryphal was soon degraded to a name for the abomination of all that was false. The apocryphal books were not by the Hellenistic Jews; but were not in the Hebrew text or in the canon acknowledged by the Jews of Palestine. The history of this difficulty, and of the manner in which it affected the reception of particular books, being rather to the subject of the project than to that of the present article, the following facts may be stated as bearing on the application of the word:

1. The teachers of the Greek and Latin Churches, accustomed to the use of the Septuagint, or versions resting on the same basis, were naturally led to quote freely and reverently from all the books which were incorporated into it. In Clement of Alexandria, Orig- en, Athanasius, we find quotations from the books of the present Apocrypha, as "Scripture," "divine Scriptures," "prophecy." They are very far from applying the term apocrifaph to these writings. If they are conscious of the difference between them and the other books of the O. T., it is only so far as to lead them to apply to them the epithets "pseudonymous," "not in the list of the canonical," etc. As the former in the list of the former class is generally given, it is probable that these books, which were of more use for the ethical instruction of catechumens than for the edification of mature Christians. Augustine, in like manner, applies the word "Apocrypha" only to the spurious books with false titles which were in circulation among heretics, admitting the others, though with some qualifications, under the title of canonical (de doctr. Chr. ii, 8).

(2) Wherever, on the other hand, any teacher came into contact with the feelings that prevailed among the Christians of Palestine, there the influence of the rigor- ous limitation of the old Hebrew canon is at once conspicuous. The most public reading, and a great portion of the history of the canon in the list given by Melito, bishop of Sardis (Euseb. H. E. iv, 26), and obtained by him from Palestine. Of its effects on the application of the word, the writings of Cyril of Jerusalem and Jerome give abundant instances. The former (Catech. iv, 26) gives the canonical list of the 22 books of the O. T. Scriptures, and rejects the introduction of all "apocryphal" writings. The latter in his Epistle to Leta warns the Christian mother in educating her daughter against "omnia apocrifaph." The Prologues of the Gelasians show that he did not shrink from including under that title the books which formed part of the Septuagint list, and he was doubtless known to the bishops of the Greek and Latin Churches. In dealing with the several books he discusses each on its own merits, admiring...
some, speaking unhesitatingly of the "dreams," "fables" of others. (8.) The teaching of Jerome influenced, though not decidedly, the language of the Western Church. The old spurious heretical writ-ges, the "Apocrypha" of Tertullian and Clement, feared to be seen in the books then in the churches were almost utterly forgotten. The doubtful books of the Old Testament were used publicly in the service of the Church, quoted frequently with reverence as Scripture, sometimes, however, with doubts or limitations
as to the authority of individual books according to the knowledge or critical discernment of the reader (smaller as the "Christian Scholastic History of the Canon"). During this period the term by which they were commonly described was not apocryphal but "ecclesiastical." So they had been described by Rufinus (Ex-
pag. in Synch. Apocr. p. 26), who practically recognised the distinction drawn by Jerome, though he would not apply the more opprobrious epithet to books which were held in honor. (4.) It was reserved for the age of the Reformation to stamp the word Apocrypha with its present significance. The two views which had hitherto existed together, side by side, concerning which the Church had pronounced no authoritative decision, stood out in sharper contrast. The Council of Trent, instead of seeing which the Church had worked, and deprived its theologians of the liberty they had hitherto enjoyed, by extending the Canon of Scripture
so as to include all the hitherto doubtful or deuterocanonical books, with the exception of the two books of Eadras and the Prayer of Manasses, the evidence against which seemed too strong to be resisted (Stev. IV de Can.
Script.). In accordance with this decree,
the editions of the Vulgate published by authority contained the books which the Council had pronounced canonical, as standing on the same footing as those which had never been questioned, while the three which had been doubtful were printed commonly in the smaller type and stood after the New Testament.
The Reformers of Germany and England, on the other hand, influenced in part by the revival of the study of Hebrew and the consequent recognition of the authority of the Hebrew Canons, and consequently by the reaction against this stretch of authority, maintained the opinion of the Church and pushed it to its legitimate results. The principle which had been asserted by Carlowitz dogmatically in his "De Canonicis Scripturis libellus" (1590) was acted on by Luther.
He spoke of individual books among those in question with a freedom as great as that of Jerome, judging them "prudent, but not inspired," "of divine, but not inspired origin." He considered the Prayer of Manasses as a "good model for penitents," and rejecting the two books of Eadras as containing worthless fables. The example of collecting the doubtful books into a separate group had been set in the Strasbourg edition of the Septuagint, 1526. In Luther's complete edition of the German Bible, accordingly (1534), the books (Judith, Wisdom, Tobias, Sirach, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Additions to Esther and Daniel, and the Prayer of Manasses) were grouped together under the general title of "Apocrypha, i. e. Books which are not of like worth with Holy Scripture, yet ancient and useful to be read." In the Cappelion's English Church, Whicoff showed himself in this as in other points the forerunner of the Reformation, and applied the term Apocrypha to all but the "twenty-five" Canonic Books of the Old Testament. The judgment of Jerome was formally asserted in the sixth Article. The disputed books were grouped in the year 1550, so that it has been frequent as to the application of the word (Smith). See Deutero-canonical.
II. Biblical Apocrypha. —The collection of books to which this term is popularly applied includes the following. The order given is that in which they stand in the English version.

I. The Apocrypha.
II. Deutero-canonical.
III. Nice. — The rest of the chapters of the Book of Esther, which are found neither in the Hebrew nor in the Chaldee.
VI. Helian. — VI. The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus.
VII. Baruch. — VII. The Prayer of Manasses, King of Judah.
IX. The Song of the Three Holy Children.
X. The History of Susanna.
XI. The History of Bel and the Dragon.
XII. The Prayer of Manasses, King of Judah.
XIV. 1 Maccabees.
XIV. 5 Maccabees.

The separate books of this collection are treated in four distinct articles. Their relation to the canonical books of the Old Testament is discussed under Canon.
We propose here to consider only the history and character of the collection as a whole in its relation to Jewish literature.

Whatever questions may be at issue as to the authority of these books, they have in any case an interest, of which no controversy can deprive them, as connected with the literature, and therefore with the history, of the Jews. They represent the period of transition and decay which followed on the return from Babylon, when the prophets, who were then the teachers of the people, had passed away, and the age of scribes succeeded. Uncertain as may be the dates of individual books, few, if any, can be thrown farther back than the beginning of the third century B.C.

The latest, the 22 Book of Eadras, is probably not later than 80 B.C., 2 Ead. vii, 28 being a subsequent interpolation. The alterations of the Jewish character of the different phases which Judaism presented in Palestine and Alexandria, the good and the evil which were called forth by contact with idolatry in Egypt, and by the struggle against it in Syria, all these preserve themselves to the reader of the Apocrypha in a greater or less distinctness. In the midst of the diversities which we might naturally expect to find in books written by different authors, in different countries, and at considerable intervals of time, it is possible to discern some characteristics which belong to the entire collection. (We quote from Smith, s. v.)

1. The absence of the prophetic element. From first to last the books bear testimony to the assertion of Josephus (Ap. i, 8), that the אָדָם הָאָדָם of prophets had been broken after the close of the O. T.
canon. No one speaks because the word of the Lord had come to him. Sometimes there is a direct confusion that the gift of prophecy had departed (1 Macc.
ix, 27), or rather misunderstanding of what it might one day return (ibid. iv, 46; xiv, 41). Sometimes a teacher asserts in words the prophecy of the gift (Wisd. vii, 27),
and shows in the act of asserting it how dif-
f erent the illumination which he had received was from that bestowed on the prophets of the canonical books. When a writer simulates the prophetic character, he repeats with slight modifications the language of the older prophets, as in Baruch, or makes a mere prediction the text of a dissertation, as in the Epistle of Eranias, or plays arbitrarily with combinations of dreams and symbols, as in 2 Eadras. Strange and perplexing as the last-named book is, whatever there is in it of genuine feeling and instruction may not be at case with itself, distracted with its own sufferings and with the problems of the universe, and it is accordingly very far removed from the utterance of a man who speaks as a messenger from God.

2. Connected with this is the almost total disappa-rance of the Old Testament allusion, which had shown itself in the poetry of the Old Testament. The Song of the Three Children lays claim to the character of a psalm, and is probably a translation from some liturgical hymn;
but, with this exception, the form of poetry is altogether absent. So far as the writers have come under the influence of Greek cultivation, they catch the taste for rhetorical ornament which characterized the literature of Alexandria. Fictional speeches become almost indispensable additions to the narrative of a historian, and the story of a martyr is not complete unless (as in the later Acta Martyrum of Christian traditions) the sufferer decides in set terms against the persecutors (Song of the Three Children, 3:22; 2 Macc. 8:16, 7:13). The Jews were no doubt influenced by them, but the invention of excellent in minstrelsy, and were called on to sing the songs of Zion (Psa. xxxxxvii). The trial of skill between the three young men in 1 Esdr. iii, iv, implies a traditional belief that those who were promoted to places of honor under the Persian kings were conspicuous for gifts of a somewhat similar character.

The transition from this to the practice of story-telling was, with the Jews, as afterward with the Arabs, easy and natural enough. The period of the Captivity, with its strange adventures, and the remoteness of the scenes connected with it, offered a wide and attractive field to the imagination of such narratives. Some of these, in Bel and the Dragon, or in the account of such stories would be the love of the marvellous mingling itself with the feeling of scorn with which the Jew looked on the idolater. In other cases, as in Tobit and Susanna, the story would gain popularity from its ethical tendencies. The singular variations in the text of the former book indicate at once the extent of its circulation and the liberties taken by successive editors. In the narrative of Judith, again, there is probably something more than the interest attaching to the history of the past. There is indeed too little evidence of the truth of the narrative for us to look on it as history at all, unless we place it in the region of historical romance, written with a political motive. Under the guise of the old Assyrian enemies of Israel, the writer is covertly attacking the Syrian invaders, against whom his countrymen were contending, stirring them up, by a story of imagined or traditional heroism, to follow the example of Judith, as she had followed that of Jael (Ewald, Greek. Israel, iv, 541). The development of this form of literature is, of course, compatible with a high degree of excellence, but it is true of it at all times, and was especially true of the literature of the ancient world, that it belongs rather to its later and feebler period. It is a special sign of decay already, and it takes its place in the region of historical romance, written with a political motive. The germ of such of the books under fictitious names is, as the later Jewish history shows, a very dangerous one. The practice becomes almost a trade. Each such work creates a new demand, to be met in its turn by a fresh supply, and thus the prevalence of an apocryphal literature becomes a sure sign of want of truthfulness on one side, and want of discernment on the other.

The absence of honesty, and of the power to distinguish truth from falsehood, shows itself in a yet more serious form in the insertion of formal documents purporting to be authentic, but in reality falling altogether to establish any claim to that title. This is obviously the case with the decrees of Artaxerxes in Esth. xvi. The letters with which 2 Macc. opens from the Jews at Jerusalem betray their true character by their historical inaccuracy. We can hardly accept as genuine the letter in which the king of the Lacedaemonians (1 Macc. xii, 20, 22) writes to Onias that "it is fitting that in the temple where there are the treasure is of Abraham." The letters in 2 Macc. ix and xi, on the other hand, might be authentic so far as their contents go, but the recklessness with which such documents are inserted as embellishments and make-weights throws doubt in a greater or less degree on all of them.

The loss of the simplicity and accuracy which characterise the history of the Old Testament is shown also in the errors and anachronisms in which these books abound. Thus, to take a few of the most striking instances, Haman is made a Macedonian, and the purpose of the Wisdom of Solomon to the Macedonians (Esth. xvi, 10); two contradictory statements are given in the same book of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. I, 15-17; ix, 5-29); Nabuchodonosor is made to dwell at Nineve as the king of the Assyrians (Judith i, 1). In their relation to the religious and ethical development of Judaism during the period in which these books embosom, we find (1.) the influences of the struggle against idolatry under Antiochus, as shown partly in the revival of the old heroic spirit, and in the record of the deeds which it called forth, as in Maccabees, partly again in the tendency of a narrative like Judith, and the protests against idol-worship in Baruch and Wisdom. (2.) The growing hostility of the Jews toward the Samaritans is shown by the confession of the Son of Sirach (Eccles. i, 25, 26). (3.) The teaching of Tobit illustrates the prominence then and afterward assigned to alma-giving among the duties of a holy life (Tob. i, 4-7; ix, 9). Theaclassical part of Tobit is found in the three elements of prayer, fasting, alms, in x, 8. Illustrates the traditional ethical teaching of the Sibbes, which was at once recognized and purified from the errors that had been connected with it in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. vi, 1-18). (4.) The same book indicates also the growing belief in the individual guardianship of God in the persons of his saints, the germs of a grotesque demonology, resting in part on the more mysterious phenomena of man's spiritual nature, like the cases of demoniac possession in the Gospels, but associating itself only too easily with all the frauds and superstitions of vagabond exorcists. (5.) The great Alexandrian book of the collection, the Wisdom of Solomon, is of a different character. It is a strain of higher mood; and though there is absolutely no ground for the patriotic tradition that it was written by Philo, the conjecture that it might have been was not without a plausibility which might well commend itself to men like Basil and Jerome. The personification of Wisdom as the unsputtered mirror of the power of God and the image of his goodness" (vii, 26), as the universal teacher of all "holy souls" in "all ages" (vii, 27), as guiding and ruling God's people, approaches the teaching of Philo, and foreshadows that of the Apostle John as to the manifestation of the unseen God through the medium of the Law and the office of that One who lights the lighteth every man. In relation again to the symbolic character of the Temple as "a resemblance of the holy tabernacle" which God "has prepared from the beginning" (ix, 5), the language of this book connects itself at once with that of Philo and with the teaching of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. But that which is the great characteristic of the book, as of the school from which it emanated, is the writer's apprehension of God's kingdom and the blessings connected with it as eternal, and so as independent of men's conceptions of time. Thus chapters i, ii, contain the strong protest of a righteous man against the formalism which then, in the form of a sensual selfishness, as afterward in the developed system of the Soddenese, was corrupting the old faith of Israel. Against this be asserted that the "souls of the righteous are in the hands of God" (iii, 1); that the blessings which the popular belief connected with the duration of years, seeing that "wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unsputted life old age." (6.) In regard to another truth also this book was in advance of the popular belief of the Jews of Palestine. In the midst of its strong protests against idolatry, there is the fullest recognition of God's universal love (xi, 23-26), of the truth that His power is but the instrument of His righteousness (xii, 16), of the difference between those who are the "less to be blamed" as "seeking God and desirous to find Him" (xiii, 6), and the victims of a darker and more debaseing idolatry. Here also the writer is true to the Wisdom of Solomon seems to prepare the way for the higher and wider teaching of the New Testament. See Loos. III. Nupharl and Pseudepigraphal Books as distinct from Antilegomena or Ecclesiastical. Among this class are doubtless to be considered the 3d and 4th books of Esdras, and it is doubtless in reference to these that, in his letter to Vigilantius, Athanasius speaks of a work of Esdras which he says that he had never even read. Of the same character are also the book of Enoch, the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Assumption of Moses, etc.; which, as well as 3 and 4 Esdras, belong to many of the apocryphal fictions of Christians of the second and third centuries, it is doubtful whether they ought to be classed in the Apocrypha of the Old or of the New Testament. Origen, however, believed the New Testament to have contained citations from books of this kind written before the times of the apostles, as is evident from his reference to such in his works against the Gnostics. The great exegesis to Apocryum, he observes that there were many things kept from the knowledge of the public, but which were preserved in the hidden or apocryphal books, to which he refers the passage (Heb. xi, 57), "They were assworn under. Origen probably alludes here to that description of the Jews given by Josephus, οἱ ἑξ ἁπάντων, a word of the same significan with apocyphrps, and applied to locks laid aside, or not permitted to be publicly read or considered, even when divinely inspired, not fit for indiscriminate circulation: among the latter were the first chapter of Genesis, the Song of Solomon, and our last eight chapters of the prophet Ezekiel. The books which we have here enumerated, such as the books of Enoch, etc., in comparison to the ancient fathers, have descended to our times; and, although incontestably spurious, are of considerable value from their antiquity, as throwing light upon the religious and theological opinions of the first centuries. The most curious are the 3d and 4th books of Esdras, and the book of Enoch, which has been but recently discovered, and has acquired peculiar interest from its containing the passage cited by the apostle Jude. See Enoch. Nor are the apocryphal books of the New Testament institute of interest. Although the spurious Acts extant have no longer any defenders of their genuineness, they are not devoid of value to the learned student, and have been applied with success to illustrate the style and language of the genuine books, to which they bear a close analogy. The American translator of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History terms them "harmless and ingenious fictions, intended either to gratify the fancy or to silence the enemies of Christianity." Some of the apocryphal books have been without their defenders in modern times. The Apocryphal Canons and Constitutions, and the various Liturgies ascribed to St. Peter, St. Mark, etc., and published by Fabricius in his Codex Apocryphas Novi Testamenti, were considered by the learned and eccentrics William Whiston, and the less learned Grabes, to be of equal authority with any of the confessedly genuine apostolic compositions (see Whiston's Primitive Christianity and Grabes' Episcopiam). They are, however, regarded by most as originally not of an earlier date than the second century, and as having been adaptations which were many degrees inferior to the fifth; they can, therefore, only be considered as evidence of the practice of the Church at the period when they were written. They have generally been appealed to by the learned as having preserved the traditions of the age immediately succeeding the apostolic; and, from the remarkable coincidence which is observable in the most essential parts of the so-called Apostolic Liturgies, it is by no means improbable that, notwithstanding their interpolations, they contain the leading portions of the most ancient Christian forms of worship. Most of the apocryphal Gospels and Acts noticed by the fathers, and condemned in the catalogue of Galæsus, which are generally thought to have been the fictions of heretics in the second century, have long since fallen into oblivion. Of those which remain, although some have been composed by learned men in the apostolic age, yet nearly all the rest of the third century. The authorship of the Epistle of Barnabas (q.v.) is still a matter of dispute; and there appears too but too much reason to believe that there existed grounds for the charge made by Celsus against the early Christians, that they had interpolated or forged the ancient Scriptures. In the letter of Pope Innocent I. to St. Exupere, bishop of Toulouse, written about the year 405, after giving a catalogue of the books forming the canon of Scripture (which includes five books of Solomon, Tobit, and two books of Maccabees), he observes: "But the others, which are written under the name of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamthe, or of Jamth
APOLLINARIANS

The following works are on the apocryphal additions to the Old Testament: Schmid, Corpus apocryphorum Biblia (Hadam. 1894); Beauvoir, De N. T. apocrypha (Berol. 1784); Kleuker, D. Apokr. d. N. T. (Hamb. 1798); Lorschach, D. heiligen Bücher d. Johannesjünger (Marb. 1807); Bartholomae, Uebers. d. Apokr. d. N. T. (Dinkelbühl, 1822); Beauvoir, in Cranmer's Bibl. ii., 251-314; Reuss, De N. T. apocr. (Argent. 1829); Sackow, over the Corpus apocryphon (Copenhagen, 1841); Eliott, Cambridge Essays for 1856; Toland, Collection of Pieces, i, 860. Many of these spurious works are translated in Houe's Apocryphal N. T. (Lond. 1820; N.Y. 1849, 8vo), and Aps. Wacke's Apost. Fishers (Lond. 1830; Harf. 1834, 8vo).

Apollinarians, followers of Apollinaris, or Apollinarians (q. v.).

Apollinaris or Apollinaris Claudius, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, in the second century, an apologist (q. v.) of Christianity, and an opponent of Montanism (q. v.). He was well acquainted with the classic literature of the Greeks, and a prolific writer; but his works, which are mentioned by Eusebius and Photius, are lost; only two fragments of his work on the Passover are extant.—Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv, 27; Fabricius, Biblioth. Græc. vii, 160; Tillemont, Mémoires, t. i, pt. ii.

Apollinaris or Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, the son of Apollinaris the elder, who taught first at Berytus, in Phœnicia, and afterward at Laodicea, where he became a presbyter and married. Both father and son were on terms of intimacy with Epiphanius, the bishop of Salamis, the Sophist of Laodicea, Thaddeus, having warned them to beware of this friendship, they were excommunicated, but afterward, upon expressing penitence, they were restored. Julian the Apostate forbade the Christians to read the works of any heathen author, upon which the two fathers (father and son) composed many works in imitation of the style of Homer and other ancient Greek works. Among others, they turned the books of Moses into heroic verse; indeed, Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. v, 18) says, the whole of the Old Testament as far as the account of Saul; they also composed dramatic pieces on scriptural subjects, after the style of Manander (Socrat. Hist. Eccles. iii, 16). The younger Apollinaris is mentioned (in Athanasius, Apollinaris; tom. i, Oratio, supra, 57), and held his position at Laodicea A.D. 312, while Pelagius was bishop of the Arians in that city. He was esteemed by Athanasius, Basil, and other great men of that age, who continued to speak respectfully of his merits even after he was suspected of heresy. Apollinarians distinguished themselves particularly by the immutability of the Word, and by their equally firm and unyielding faiths; for instance, by his work on Truth, against the Emperor Julian. He also wrote thirty books against Porphyry, against the Manicheans, Arians, Marcullus, and others. Jerome himself, during his residence at Antioch, A.D. 575 and 576, enjoyed the instructions of Apollinarius, then bishop of Laodicea. The interpretations of Apollinarius, quoted in the commentaries of Jerome, were peculiarly valuable in those days on account of his knowledge of the Hebrew tongue. Basil mentions a work of Apollinaris on the Holy Ghost. In the year 1552 was published at Paris a Metaphysicae Theologiae Apollinaris, and re-edited by Sylvæus at Heidelberg. Apollinaris was an ardent supporter of the Church, and suffered in the works of Gregory of Nazianzus, were ascribed to Apollinarius; but it is difficult to say what share in those works belongs to the father, and what to the son.

Late in life, Apollinaris, who had strenuously defended the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity in his youth, himself incurred the reproach of heresy because he taught that the divine Logos occupied in the person of Christ the place of the human rational soul. The greatest difficulty in the doctrine of the Trinity appeared to him to consist in the union of the divine person of the Logos with a perfect human person. Two perfect wholes could not be united in one whole (Gregory, Antirrh. cap. xxix, p. 328: 8 ἀγράφητος ἡμών ἡ ὑπεράνων οὐκ ἦτο ἡ ὑπεράνων). Setting out from Anthropology, he asserted that the essence of the rational soul consists in its self-determination. If this characteristic were retained in connection with the divine nature, there could be no true personal union, but only such a divine influence on Jesus as might be experienced by any other man. On the other hand, if the soul forfeited this characteristic, it would renounce its essential peculiarity (ibid. p. 246: δόξα τοῦ αὐτογενοῦς ὄνομα τοῦ μὲν εἶναι αὐτογενοῦς δοκεῖ, τοῦ ἄνωτερος τοῦ ὄντος αὐτογενοῦς). On the first point he objected to the school of Origen, that it admitted no true union of the divine and the human, but made instead two Sons of God, the Logos and the man Jesus (L. c. xii: τοις ἐν υἱόις θεοὶ τοῖς, το οὐκ ἔσται τοις ὧν). Hence he thought the rational human soul must be excluded from the God-man, and, in this, the old undefined doctrine was on his side. For the human soul he substituted the Logos himself as the Logos of Logos. He developed this doctrine with originality and acuteness. The scheme of human nature which he made use of was the common trichotomical one, of the ψυχή λογική (νοοῦ), δόξος, and the σώμα. That a soul in the fullness of life, a ψυχή, might be admitted to exist in human nature, he thought might be proved from Paul's Epistles, in the passages where he speaks of the flesh lusting against the Spirit; for the body in itself has no power of lust, but only the soul that is connected with it. It is not self-determined, but must be determined by the Logos λογικός, which with it ought to govern the body. But this result is frustrated by sin, and, conquered by it, the reason succumbs to the power of the irrational desires. In order to free man from sin, the unchangeable Divine Spirit must be united with a human nature, control the σώμα, and present a holy human life (σωτηρία).

APOLLO

APOLLINARIS. t.i, cap. xii, p. 786). Thus we have in Christ, as man, the three component parts, and can call him the άνθρωπος και θεός, only with this difference, the Divine occupies the place of the human όντος (Neander, Hist. of Doctrines, i, 928). Athanasius distinctly separated the Divine from the human (comp. especially lib. ii), but he did not admit that he taught the existence of two Christ. Comp. Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 483; Möhler, Athan. a. a. ii, 329 sq., compares the doctrine of Apollinaris with that other Anthropians of the 5th century, Gregory of Nyssa, entitled λόγος ἄνθρωπος πρὸς τὸ Ἀπολλινάριον (which was probably composed between the years 374 and 380), may be found in Zacagni, Collect. mem. vet., and Galland, Bibl. Patr. vi, 517; comp. Gieseler, Ch. History, i, § 78, note 50. He opposed the followers of Apollinaris, the

As the Manichaeans would have us believe, Christ must possess an irrational, animal soul, e. g. that of a horse or an ox, but not a rational human soul: Gregory himself seems to have drawn such inferences from the premises of Apollinaris. On the other hand, he accused his opponents in a similar manner of believing in two Christ, two Sons of God, etc. (comp. dorner, i. c., and his Notes 68-69, 84; Ullmann, Metaph. Bucher, i, 216, 222, 232; er. d. Dreiszweck, i, 585 sq.). Athanasianus maintained, in opposition to Apollinaris (contra Apollinaris, libri ii, but without mentioning him by name: the book was written after the death of Apollinaris), that it behoved Christ to be an example in every respect, and that his life must be a real, not a sampled one; which is conspiringly connected with the development of man, is not a necessary attribute of human nature, as the Manichaeans would lead us to suppose.

Man, on the contrary, was originally free from sin, and Christ appeared on that very account, viz., in order to show that God is not the author of sin, and to prove that it is possible to live a sinless life (the contrivance of the Christian exegesis of the anthropological nature). Athanasius distinctly separated the Divine from the human (comp. especially lib. ii), but he did not admit that he taught the existence of two Christ. Comp. Neander, Ch. Hist. ii, 483; Möhler, Athan. a. a. ii, 329 sq., compares the doctrine of Apollinaris with that other Anthropians of the 5th century, Gregory of Nyssa, entitled λόγος ἄνθρωπος πρὸς τὸ Ἀπολλινάριον (which was probably composed between the years 374 and 380), may be found in Zacagni, Collect. mem. vet., and Galland, Bibl. APOLLODORUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος, Apollo-given), a general of the inhabitants of Gaza, who made an effetual sally against the Jews besieging the city under Alexander Jannaeus, but was at length slain through the treachery of his brother Lysimachus (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 15, 3).

APOLLODORUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος, from Apollo), a city of Macedonia, in the province of Mygdonia (Plin. iv, 17), situated between Amphipolis and Thessalonica, thirty Roman miles from the former, and thirty-six from the latter (Strab. p. 329, 520; Pompon. cap. vi, 6, 257; Tab. Vict., 17). It was south of the lake Bolbe and north of the Chalidcian mountains (Athen. viii, 324). According to Stephen of Byzantium, it was founded by a colony of Corinthians and Corcyrians. The Apostle Paul passed through Amphipolis and Apollonias on his way to Thessalonica (Acts xvi, 1; see Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii, 820, 821). It must not be confounded with a noted Apollonia in Illyria (see Kyrie, Obs. Sacr. ii, 81 sq.). The city here spoken of was situated on the "Egnatian Way" in the interior of the district of Chaldices (Scylax, p. 27; Xen. Hist. Gr. v, 2). The ruins are called Apollonias Grammer's Anc. Gr. i, 264sq.

APOLLONIA (Ἀπόλλωνια, a frequent Greek name of cities, probably given in this case by one of the Seleucidae), a town of Palestine, between Cesarea and Joppa (Stephen of Byz.; Ptol. v, 16; Pliny, v, 14; Pute. Taur.), one of those on the sea-shore taken by the Jews under Alexander Jannaeus (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 15, 4), and afterward reprieved by Gabinius (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 15, 6). It is now a deserted village at the mouth of the Nahr Arsuf (Irby and Mangles, Trav. p. 189; Robinson, Research. iii, 46; Chesney, Exped., p. 490), a place famous under the Crusaders (Wilken, Kreuz u. Kreuz, ii, 17, 89, 192; iv, 166; vii, 325, 400, 420), by whom it was confounded with Antipatris (Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 590).

APOLLONIA, a martyr of Alexandria, suffered with Metra, Quinta, and a man in the year 249, when she was seized, and some one by a violent blow on the face knocked out many of her teeth; whence, in the Middle Ages, she was held to be the patroness against the toothache. Soon she was brought before the burning pile, and, on being asked to recant, reflected a moment, and then leaped into the fire. She is commemorated in the Roman Church on Feb. 9.—Eusebius, Ch. Hist. vi, 41; London, Eccl. Dict. i, 450.

APOLLONIUS (Ἀπόλλωνιος, from Apollo), the name of several men in the history of the Maccabees and Josephus.

1. The son of a certain Thrasaeus, and viceroy of the Syrian king Seleucus (IV) Philopator (B.C. 187) over southern Syria and Phoenicia (2 Macc. iii, 5, 7). At the suggestion of Simon, the temple governor, he instigated the king to plunder the Temple at Jerusalem, and generally took the severest measures against the Jews (2 Macc. iv, 4). The writer of the Declaration on the Maccabees, printed among the works of Josephus (De Macr. 4) relates of Apollonius the circumstances which are commonly referred to his ecclesiastic Heliodorus (2 Macc. iii, 7 sqq.).

2. A son of Mamæus, and ambassador of King Antiochus Epiphanes to the Egyptian king Ptolemy Philometor, B.C. 178 (2 Macc. iv, 21). Perhaps he was the same as the "chief commissioner of tribute" (ἀρχηγὸς φορολογίας) for Judea, at the command of Antiochus Epiphanes on his return from Egypt (B.C. 178), committed such bloodshed in Jerusalem (2 Macc. v, 24; comp. 1 Macc. i, 9 sqq.); next was governor in Samaria (Joseph. Ant. xii, 7, 1, which Michaelis, on 1 Macc. iii, 10, regards as a misinterpretation), and finally lost his life in an encounter with Judas Maccabeus, B.C. 166 (1 Macc. iii, 10 sqq.). An ambassador of the same name was at the head of the embassy which Antiochus sent to Rome (Liv. xiii, 6).

3. A son of one Apollonius Gennaeus, and a Syrian governor under Antiochus (V) Eupator (2 Macc. xii, 2). B.C. 163. If, however, we understand the surname as an ironical epithet (Ἀρνοῦτος, noble), this Apollonius (who, whether the father of whose son would still be doubtful) may be identical with No. 2.

4. Surnamed by Josephus (Ant. xiii, 4, 8) Δαὶς (Δαὸς, from a people called Daeae or Dai in Sogdiana), a Syrian viceroy in Cæle-Syria, who, taking sides with the usurper Demetrius (B.C. 147), attacked Jonathan, the ally of Alexander (Belaus), but was utterly defeated by him (1 Macc. x, 69 sqq.). According to the Greek text in 1 Macc. xvi, 69, he was originally governor of Cæle-Syria under Alexander, from whom he revolted to the party of Demetrius. Josephus only speaks of him as an officer of Alexander, without alluding to his connection with Demetrius (cfr. Fleischer, De filiis Maced. p. 186). There may have been early error crept into 1 Macc., or the expression in the Heb. original may have been ambiguous (see Grimm, Ill. Amc. in loc.). If this Apollonius be the same mentioned by Polybius (xxxi, 21, § 3), as foster-brother and confidant of Demetrius I, his interest in the affairs of Demetrius would scarcely admit of doubt.—Winer, v. v.

5. The son of one Alexander, and one of the ambassadors sent by the Jews to procure an alliance with the Romans in the time of Hyrcanus (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 9, 2).

APOLLONIUS, a Roman senator, against whom one of his slaves, called Severus, preferred an accusation of holding the Christian faith, in the time of Commodus (B.C. 182 or 180). Before the senate to defend himself, he delivered an admirable discourse on the faith, and was condemned to be beheaded. He is commemorated in the Roman Church on the 10th of April. His acts are in Reimart., p. 83, 84,—Eusebius, Ch. Hist. v, 21; London, Eccl. Dict. i, 462.

APOLLONIUS of Tyana, an impostor and professed magician, born three or four years before the vulgar era, at Tyana, a town in Cappadocia. His life by Philostor us (Ἀπόλλωνιος τοῦ Τοιαίως Μάγος, best ed. by Olearius, Lips. 1709, fol.) abounds with fabulous stories, apparently in imitation of the account of Christ's life in the Gospels. [Dupin wrote "The History of Apollonius of Tyana convinced of falsehood and imposture" (Paris, 1706). The life by Philostorus was translated into English by Charles Blount, who added some impious notes (1886). A French translation has recently been published by A. Chassang (Apollonius de Tyana, ses vie, ses voyages, ses prodiges, par l'histoire, Paris, 1864).] It is from this source that our Apollonius, chief of the following sketch is taken from Frazz (Claud. Hist. of Free Thought, lecture ii). Apollonius was a Pythagorean philosopher, born in Cappadocia about four years before the Christian era. After being early educated in the circle of philosophy, and in the practice of the ascetic discipline of his predecessor Pythagoras, he found himself pregnant with a new portion of his life in travel. Attracted by his mysticism to the farthest East as the source of knowledge, he set out for Persia and India, and in Nineveh, on his route, met Damis, the future chronicler of his actions. Returning from the East instructed in Brahminic lore, he travelled over the Rhaetic world, the course of his days was spent in Asia Minor. Statues and temples were erected to his honor. He obtained vast influence, and died with the reputation of sanctity late in the century. Such is the outline of his life, if we omit the numerous legends and prodigies which attach themselves to his name. He was partly a philosopher, partly a prophet, and partly a god. In the popular mind he was the reaper of the sick, the sudden disappearance and reappearance of Apollonius, the sacred voice which called him at his death, and his claim to be a teacher with authority to reform the world, form some of the points of similarity. If such was the intention of Philostratus, he was really a controversialist under the form of a writer of romance, employed by those who at that time were laboring to introduce an eclecticism largely borrowed from the East into the region both of philosophy and religion. Without settling this question, it is at least certain that at about the beginning of the next century the heathen writers adopted this line of argument, and sought to exhibit a rival ideal. One instance is the life of Pythagoras by Iamblichus; another, the attack on Christianity by Hierocles (λόγος φαλαλής πρὸς Οὐκρατιαῦνον), in part of which he used Philostratus's untrustworthy memoir for the purpose of extricating in a general manner and Apollonius and Christ. The sceptic who referred religious phenomena to fanaticism would hence avoid himself of the comparison as a satisfactory account of the origin of Christianity; while others would adopt the same view as Hierocles, and deprive the Christian mind of the force of the doctrine he had adopted by the English Deist Blount (see above). The work of Hierocles is lost, but an outline of its argument, with extracts, remains in a reply which Eusebius wrote to a portion of it (cont. Hierocles, ed. Olearis, Lips. 1795). Eusebius states (bk. I) that he refutes only that portion of the work which referred to Apollonius of Tyre, retranscribing Origen's answer to Celsus for a reply to the remainder of it, and discusses only the parallel of Apollonius and Jesus Christ. In bk. i he gives an outline of the argument of his opponent with quotations, and states his own opinion about Apollonius, throwing discredit on the veracity of the sources of the memories, and proceeds to criticize the prodigies attributed to the teaching that the statements are incredible, or borrowed, or materially contradictory. Discussing each book in succession, he replies in bk. i to the statements respecting the early part of Apollonius's life; in bk. ii, to that which concerned the journey into India; in bk. iii, to that which concerned the journey to the Mediterranean; in bk. iv, to his journey to Greece; in bk. v, to his introduction to Vespasian in Egypt; in bk. vi and vii, to his miracles; and in bk. viii to his pretence to foreknowledge. He adds remarks on his death, and on the necessity of faith, and repeats his opinion respecting the character of Apollonius. Lardner and Ritter think that Philostratus did not write with a polemical reference to Christianity. Dean Trench has made a few remarks in reference to this question (Notes to miracles, p. 62). Bauer maintains that Apollonius, as represented in the work of Philostratus, is meant to be the pagan counterpart of Christ. Bauer finds in this parallel a connection to the history of his days—his claim to paganism was offered by Christianity. Dr. Rieckher, on the other hand (in Studien der Württem. Gesellschaft, 1847), tries to prove that the picture drawn by Philostratus is not a guiltless invention of a pagan personality to match the historical character of the founders of Christianity, but that it was the production of a text conceived by a circle of educated men, whom the Empress Julia Domna had assembled around herself, and that it was intended not for the usual class of readers of a sophist, but for the mass of the people.

Appoloph'anæs (Ἀπολόφηναι, Apollon-appearing), a Syrian slave by Judas Maccaesus in a pit near the stronghold Gazarah (2 Macc. x, 37).

Apollo's (Ἀπόλλων, comp. Szom. Hist. Ev. iv, 29, either for Apollonius, as in Codex D, or Apollodoros, see Heumann on Acts xxiii, 20, a Jew of Alexandria, described as a learned, or, as some (see Bleek, Br. a. d. Heb. i, 424) understand it, an eloquent man (διδασκαλός), well versed in the Scriptures and the Jewish religion (Acts xxiii, 24). About A.D. 49 he went to Ephesus, there, in the synagogue, he boldly said the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John (ver. 25); by which we are probably to understand that he knew and taught the doctrine of a Messiah, whose coming John had announced, but knew not that Jesus was the Christ. His fervor, however, attracted the notice of Aquila and Priscilla, whom Paul had left at Ephesus; and they instructed him in this higher doctrine, which he thenceforth taught openly, with great zeal and power (ver. 26). Having heard from his new friends, who were much attached to Paul, of that apostle's proceedings in Achasia, and especially at Corinth, he resolved to go to them, and was encouraged in this design by the brethren at Ephesus, who furnished him with letters of introduction (Acts xxvii, 27; xix, 1). On his arrival there he was very useful in water which Paul had spoken, and was instrumental in gaining many new converts from Judaism (1 Corv. ii. 2). (See Sommel, De Apollone, London, 1717; Schlesius, Schlesius, xvii, 1717.) There was perhaps no apostle or apostolic man who so much resembled Paul in attainments and character as Apollo. His immediate disciples became so much attached to him as well-nigh to have produced a schism in the church, some saying that "I am of Paul," others, "I am of Cephas" (1 Cor. iii, 4-7, 22). There must indeed have been some difference in their mode of teaching to occasion this; and from the First Epistle to the Corinthians it would appear that Apollo was not prepared to go so far as Paul in abandoning the figures of Judaism, and insisted less on the (to the Jews) obnoxious position that the Gospel was open to the Gentiles. (See Dähne, Die Christenpauper in Ko-rinth, Hal. 1841, p. 82; Goldhorn, in Ilgen's Zeitschr.
1840, ii, 192 sq.; Neander, Planting and Training, I, 298 sq., and De Apostolica Gentilium Missione, 1718; Hofp, De Apostolae pseudo-doctoris, Hag. 1782; Heymann, in the Säcua. exeg. Stud. ii, 213.) There was nothing, however, to prevent these two eminent men from being perfectly united in the bonds of Christian affection and brotherhood. When Apollon heard that Paul was again at Ephesus, he went thither to see him. It was in this passage that the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written (A.D. 52), there can be no doubt that the apostle received from him his information concerning the divisions in that church, which he so forcibly reproves (see Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, ii, 18 sq.). It strongly illustrates the character of Apollon and Paul, that the former, doubtless in disgust at those divisions with which his name had been associated, declined to return to Corinth, while the latter, with generous confidence, urged him to do so (1 Cor. xvi, 12). Paul again mentions Apollon kindly in Tit. iii, 13, and recommends him and Zenas the lawyer to the attention of Titus, knowing that the latter was to visit Crete. Here Tertullian speaks. Jerome is of opinion (Comment., in loc.) that he remained at Crete until he heard that the divisions at Corinth had been healed by means of Paul's letter, and that he then returned to that city, of which he afterward became bishop. This has an air of probability; and the authority on which it rests is better than any we have for the different statements which make him bishop of Duras, of Colophon, of Iconium (in Phrygia), or of Cesarea (Munolog. Grac. ii, 17). He has been thought by many to have been the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Allford, Comment. iv, Pro-leg. p. 98 sq.).—Kitt., v. e.

Apoll'yon (Apollogov), the Greek equivalent (Rev. ix, 11) of the Heb. title Abraddion (q. v.).

Apologetic, a branch of theology which has for its object the science of defending Christianity against the assaults of its enemies. A system of Christian doctines (dogmatics), as such, presupposes the truth of Christianity; the proof of the truth of this presupposition is not a part of the system, and a separate science is needed to establish this proof. Apologetics, as a science, is not identical with apology (q. v.), which is an actual defence of Christianity; but it seeks and tests the method of apologistics. The word is often used in practice to denote the apology itself, as well as the method. The name was first used in German theology (probably by Flück). The scope of apologetics in German theology is nearly the same as that of the evidence (q. v.) of Christianity in English theology, with this difference, that the definition of apologetics lays a greater stress on its position as a separate branch of scientific theology.

1. Relation to Theology.—The true place of apologetics in the circle of theological sciences is not yet definitively settled. Schleiermacher makes it a branch of philosophical theology (Thet. Stud. § 92-42). Thoroughly as he has thus apologetics, he makes his work related with systematic theology (Vermachte Schriften, i, 576). There is some reason for the view of other writers, who place it under the head of biblical criticism, as apologistics must show the genuineness and credibility of the Scriptures; but yet this is only part of its object. Falscher gives it the general term of systematic theology, as the science of first principles (Encyklopädie, § 62, where also a valuable history of apologistics may be found). Kienlen puts it under the head of practical theology (Encyklop. der Theol. Wisenschaften, § 74). Hagenmühler contends that the study of apologetics cannot be pursued before the student has acquired the elements of exegetical and historical theology. He therefore places it in the third branch of theological science, viz., systematic theology (Eng-klopädie, § 81). “Apologetics is treated by Prof. Do-ner as an integral part of the system of Christian doctine, as the first part of dogmatic theology. In their proper sense, they are additions to the dogmatical truth—lies in Christianity itself. It is the justification of Christianity in its claim to be the final, absolute religion. It is the justification of Christianity to think; it shows, or tries to show, that there cannot be conceived a more perfect religion. Christian doctine, it attempts to prove, are to be received not merely as very probable, but as certain, because the impressing power of truth is an axiom of apologetics.
It seeks to reconcile the Logos of the first creation with the historical work of the Logos in his absolute Revelation. Apologetics thus conceived differs from Christian apologies. It started, indeed, with repelling attacks. But these attacks were merely the historical occasion of its existence. It exhibits the Christian religion as self-grounded—self-dependent. It has an offensive as well as defensive work. It seeks to show the inner lack of truth in all thinking which is not Christian. It differs also from a mere philosophy of religion, inasmuch as it draws from historical monuments.” (A. Prof. Reuß, in Deutsches Jahrbuch.) whose Apologistik (1819) was one of the first to distinguish between apologetics and apology, considers the science properly to be an apologetical handling of systematic theology. “Dogmatism,” he says, “is Christian doctrine set forth for Christian thinkers, who look at it as friends; Apologetics (or more properly Apology) is Christian doctrine set forth for non-Christian thinkers, who look at it as enemies.” The English writers, who have not generally been careful of scientific form but look more directly to practical uses, have generally made apologetics a separate branch of study under the name of Evidence of Christianity. Thus, Watten ([Institutes]) divides the whole circle of theological sciences into—1. The Evidences; 2. The Doctrines; 3. The Morals; 4. The Institutions of Christianity; and thus makes apologetics the portal to the whole. So also does Hill, Lectures on Divinity (N. Y., 1847, 2nd ed.), who gives the following as the principles of Apologetic: 1. General methods, the historical and the philo-osophical. The first method seeks to vindicate Christianity on the grounds (a) of criticism, by showing the genuineness and authenticity of its sacred books; (b) of history, by showing that the great facts of Christianity are part of the history of the world (chronological). The two points, by arguing the credibility of the sacred books and (d) their divine authority, and hence (e) the binding power on the human intellect of their statements of fact and doctrine. Most English writers on evidence follow the historical method, and divide their ground into the two main classes, (a) internal evidence (miracles and prophecy); (b) internal evidence (philosophical). A line of evidence called presupposition is formed in this way: admitting the existence and attributes of God, it is unlikely that He would leave His creatures in ignorance and wretchedness; and it is likely, also, that, if He should communicate with them, His revelation would not be made manifest only to be interpreted as the Bible. This is the line of Butler's Analogy, of Ellis, and of Waton, in the first part of his Evidences. A convenient and scientific method is proposed by Warren (Symatische Theologie, Einleitung, § 1), viz., that the task of the science is to show (1) that Christianity is a fact of history, (2) that Christianity is the only true religion; (3) that Christianity is the power by which unto salvation. "Instead of attempting to deduce
the truth of every part of Christianity from the external evidences alone, we have at last learned to begin with Christianity as an undeniable complex of phenomena, needing for its explanation nothing less than
of the nineteenth century as for those of the apostolic age. I should not be startled if I were told it was greater. But it does not follow that this equally holds good of each good component part. An evidence of the most cogent clearness, unknown to the primitive Christians, may compensate for the evanescence of some evidence which they enjoyed. Evidence comparatively little waxed into prominence and the comparative wane of others, once effulgent, is more than indemnified by the synopsis of παραγωγας, which we enjoy, and by the standing miracle of a Christendom commensurate and almost synonymous with the civilized world. I make this remark for the purpose of warning the divinity student against the disposition to play upon particular points, to the diminution of the credibility of the Gospel too exclusively on some one favorite point" (Works, N. Y. ed. v. 292). Fisher, in his Supernatural Origin of Christianity (N. Y. 1866), has some excellent remarks on the method of Apologetica (Essays I and Xl). See Bishop Butler's admirable discussion of the "particular" evidence for Christianity in his Apology of Religion, pt. ii, ch. vii; and compare New York Review, ii. 141 sq. Mansell, in Aids to Faith (Lond. 1861, 8vo), Essay I; Fitzgerald, On the Study of the Evidence (Aids to Faith, Essay 11); Princeton Review, xvii, 359; and the whole subject further treated, with special reference to English methods, in the Cyclopaedia under Evidence.

III. Of books properly to be called Apologetics, as defined above, there are none in English, though Farrar, Critical History of Free Thought (1863), covers the ground generally. Many manuals of apologetics have been issued in Germany, of which the following are the most important: Stein, Die Apologetik des Christenthums, als Wissenschaft dargestellt (Leipsic, 1824, 8vo); Sack, Christliche Apologetik (Hamburg, 1829, 8vo); Steudel, Grundzüge einer Apologetik für das Christentum (Tübingen, 1830, 8vo); Drey (Rom. Cath.), Apologetik als wissenschaftliche Nachweisung des Christenthums in seiner Erscheinung (Mainz, 3 vols. 1838-47, 8vo).

On the relation of apologetic to other branches of theology, see Lecher, Uber den Eingriff der Apologetik (Studien und Kritiken, 1839, part iii); Kienlen, Die Stellung der Apologetik (Studien und Kritiken, 1846). Wissenschaften, § 81; Heubner, art. Apologetik, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie; McCoy, The Supernatural in relation to the Natural, ch. iii (Cambridge, 1862, 12mo); Hampden, Introduction to the Philosophical Evidence of Christianity; Conybeare, Lectures on Theology, ch. i; Hill's Divinity, ch. i; Steele, Philosophy of the Evidences (Edinb. 1824, 8vo); Shedd, Hist. of Dogmatics, bk. ii; Van Senden, Geschichte der Apologetik (transl. from the Dutch, 1866, 8vo); Hayer, Evidentialism, §§ 28, 29, 117, 152, 288; Beck, Dogmengeschichte, §§ 32 sq.; Barnes, Refutation of Christianity (Prob. Rev. July, 1862). See also Apology; Deism; Evidences; Rationalism.

the writers themselves are styled Apologists. The same name was afterward given to defences of Christianity against pagan writers and other opponents, and the science of defending Christianity is called Apologetics (q. v.). In this article we propose to give a brief history of the apologies or defences of Christianity from the beginning down to the close of the Christian era.

1. The Early Age (down to the sixth century).—The Jews, from their affinity to the new religion, seem to have opposed it most bitterly in the beginning. The grounds of their unbelief are stated in the N. T. itself, and are the same now, in substance, as then. The apologists argue apologetically with the Jews when they undertake to show by the prophecies and types of the O. T. that Jesus was Messiah. Later writers in this age are, Justin Martyr (dialogue with Trypho, the Jew) and Origen (against Celcus, who personates a Jewish opponent). The Judaizing teachers in the church had been driven out of the way, and the ground was cleared for a new attempt. If they had arisen, as in the second century, it is probable that the church would have been divided. It is true that controversy on the same subject again arose, and was even carried on in the church. But the ground was cleared for a new attempt. The age is known as the Christian Age, and the Christian religion is the religion of the age. The age is known as the Christian Age, and the Christian religion is the religion of the age.

2. The Middle Age (about A.D. 250 to 500).—The Christian apologists of this age are, Tertullian and Minucius Felix. Tertullian was the first to write in Latin, and Minucius Felix is the first Latin writer on the subject. It is probable that the church would have been divided. But the ground was cleared for a new attempt. The age is known as the Christian Age, and the Christian religion is the religion of the age.

3. The Later Age (about A.D. 500 to 1200).—The Christian apologists of this age are, Augustine, Athanasius, and John Chrysostom. Augustine was the first to write in Latin, and Athanasius is the first Latin writer on the subject. It is probable that the church would have been divided. But the ground was cleared for a new attempt. The age is known as the Christian Age, and the Christian religion is the religion of the age.

The apologists say that they are not writing for the sake of their own generation, but for those who are to come after them. The apologists say that they are not writing for the sake of their own generation, but for those who are to come after them.

APOLOGY
by as realizing the idea of a divine plan and order for the world, as containing the imminent idea of the world and its history (Smith's Hagenbach, § 117). Augustinian theology can properly be called a science of philosophy and religion, with a skill that has never been surpassed (Shedd, Hist. of Doctrines, i. 162 sq.). The Commentarii of Vincentius Lirinensis († 1450) is also, in part, apologetic. On this period, besides the works already cited, see Reeves, The Apologies of the Seven Ecclesiastical Writers (Lond. 1818); Houbigant, Les Apologies des Apologistes du IIe et IIIe siècle (Paris, 1841, 2 vols., 8vo); and Tertullian, De Apologiae Libri Quattuor (Lond. 1790, 2 vols., 8vo); Semisch, Life of Justin Martyr, trans. by Ryland (Edinb. 1845, 1860); Woodham, Tertullian Liber Apologeticae, with Essay on the early Apologists (Camb. 1848, 8vo); Freppel, Les Apologistes Chretiens du IIe et IIIe Siecles (Paris, 1861, 2 vols., 8vo); Houtteville, La Religion propre aux païens de la Grèce (Paris, 1732); one part of which, translated, is, A Critical and Historical Discourse on the Method of the Authors for and against Christianity (Lond. 1739, 8vo); Bolton, The Existence of Christianity in the Writings of the Apologists down to Augustus (New York, 1804, 8vo); Kaye, Ecclesiastical History (Edinb. 1842, 8vo); Kaye, Clement of Alexandria (Lond. 1835, 8vo); Kaye, Clement of Alexandria (Lond. 1835, 8vo); Lardner, Works (vol. ii); Farrar, Cr. Hist. of Free Thought (note 49); Passenée, Histoire des Trois Premiers Siecles de l'Eglise (vols. i and ii); Otto, Corpus Apologistarum christianorum a sancto Iulio aedificat. (Paris, 1840); containing the works of Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus (Jena, 1847-81); and other works named under Apologetics.

II. The Middle Age (seventh century to the Reformation)—In this period we find little to note for the first four centuries. In the Dark Ages, the public mind and thought were nominally Christian, or, at least, were not sufficiently educated to admit of doubts that might create a demand for apologetic works. The external conflict now was only with Judaism and Mohammedanism. Against the Jews, Agobard († 840) wrote his treatise De Inscelis Judaeorum; at a later period Gisbert, or Gilbert, of Westminster († 1117), wrote Disput. Judi et cuus Christiani de fide Christiani, in Anselmi Opera: Abelard († 1142), Dialogus inter Philo, Judaeum et Christianum (Rheinwald, Anecdota, Berlin, 1833, t. i). Against the Mohammedans, Eu- thymius Zigabenus († 1118), Pamoplia (in Sylburgii Saracensica, Heidelb. 1866); Richardus Confusio (1210, ed. Hainaut, 1855); Rebecius († 1453); Stephen de Podium, († 1496); Pepin Fides; Peter of Clugny, Ades. Nymphi. Sermo III. Saracensum (Martene, Monumenta, i. 2). See Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 144; Farrar, Critical History of Free Thought, p. 887 sqq. In the ninth century, Scotus Erigena († 875) treated of the relations of revelation and philosophy in his De Divinis Natura (ed. by Gale, 1651, Oxford, and again in 1888, Munster); but the seeds of Pantheism lay in his teaching. The strife between Nominalism and Realism in the 11th century led to a more thorough discussion of fundamental principles as to the relations between faith and reason, and between God and nature; and the orthodox theology of the 12th century contended against the scholastics as a fundamental axiom the precept of St. Augustine: non quero intelligere, ut credam, sed credo ut intelligam. Aquinas's De veritate fides contra Gentiles was directed against the Jews and Mohammedans. Abelard, having given reason to a greater share in his arguments, and gone so far as to point out the contradictions contained in the fathers, (Cr. Hist. of Doctrines, v. 3d ed.), was pursued by the church, although he did not, in principle, differ from the scholastics. As to the grounds of Christianity, be distinguished between credere, intelligere, and cogitare: "through doubt we come to inquiry, by inquiry to truth;" in this anticipating Descartes. But after the Council of Constance (1415), this work was continued in contradiction not only with faith, but also with reason. The newly-learned system of Aristotelian began, in the Middle Age, to be applied to the sciences, and among them to theology. Alexander de Hales († 1245) was the first to give regular theological prolegomena, in which he considered the question whether theology can properly be called a science, or is, as it is contained in the Bible; he ascribed to it experimental, not speculative certainty. The same line was followed by Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus. The latter recognises eight grounds of certainty: praecocii prophetic, scripturarum consecration, consuetudinis sanciorum, iudiciorum, praetextationum, pietatum, rationabilium contentorum, irrationabilium singularum errorum, ecclesiae stabilitatis, et miraculae claritatis. Among the later scholastics we find Durand de St. Poucain († 1386); Gerson, who wrote against the Hussites his Propositiones de sensu literalis S. Scr. et de causis errorum; Raymond de Sabunde († 1435), who, in his Liber creatorum seu theologia naturalis, and Violá animar (often reprinted, as, for instance, at Lyons, 1648, 8vo), asserted that the love of God is the highest knowledge. The controversy with the Molesmes produced in the 14th century John Cantacuzenus († 1378), Oratio ou assertiones pro fide Christiana contra St. Bernard. (ed. by T. d'Ever, Basil, 1548, fol.). In the Western Church more important works appeared, such as Nicholas de Cusa's Crisostom Aelcimus, in which he sought to prove the divinity of Christ by the Koran itself, and Zeuxis Christi contra Judaeos, Saraceos, et Infidelis, written about 1450 by the Spanish poet Góngora. The same time appeared a system of Christian philosophy due to the thought of the Middle Age, and which we find already foreshadowed in Anselm and Hugo de St. Victor. Its principal object was to establish the relation and differences between faith and reason, as well as to reconcile them. In the first rank of these, so to say, philosophical apologists, we find the De Christiana religione et fidei pietae (Paris, 1641) of Marsilius Ficinus († 1499), in which the same views originally advanced by Thomas Aquinas in De veritate Catholicae fides contra Gentiles are easily recognised. To the same class belong the Triumphus crucis secu de veritate religiosis Christiana de Savonarola († 1498), and the Solstitium inueris mei of the same author. A sentence we find in his works may be considered as the distinguishing principle of that whole school of philosophical apologists: gratia praeveritam naturam (Pelt, Theologische Encyclopaedie, § 65).

III. From the Reformation to the Present Time.—The era of modern speculation followed the discovery of printing, the revival of letters, and the Reformation. Europe was filled with a spirit of restless inqu"inity. The Roman corruptions of Christianity led many to doubt Christianit itself. Leo X, himself a sceptic, fortified the pride of letters and of freethinking. Cultivated men seemed likely, on the one hand, to go back to classical paganism, or, on the other, to fall into philosophical pantheism. In the early times the Reformation difficulties in the church itself engrossed the attention of the Christian writers. But soon after apologists received a new impulse from the spirit of free inquiry, which became the dominant note in the fundamental questions of Christianity were again examined. This is the time when appeared the clear and comprehensive De veritate Religionis Christianae (1643) of the Spaniard Ludovicas Vives († 1640). Among the Protestants, the evidence derived from the Testamentum, sp. Sacri internum to a new and fruitful body of arguments, which we find in Philip Neri's De Plessis Traite de la verite de la Religion Chrétienne (1657, 1651); and a Latin trans. by Breithaupt, Jena, 1698, i. 4to), and Hugo Grotius's De veritate Religionis Christianae (1637, etc.; last edit. Amsterdam, 1861).

Among Roman Catholic apologists we notice Melchior Canus († 1570), whose book was not so successful in theological logic than dogmatics; it enumerates the different grounds of evidence recognised by his church. The differences between the Lutheran and Reformed Churches led also to apologetic as well as controversial works. Among these, one of the earliest and most important is the Dialogus de fundamentis doctrinae Christianae (Viteb, 1626, etc., last ed. 1660). In the Roman Church the differences between the Jansenists and the Molinists, and afterward the Jesuits, led Blaise Pascal to write his Pensées, which, although unfinished, is one of the ablest and most complete apologetic works of any time.

In the 17th century arose the so-called deism of England, in the leadership of Herbert of Cherbury († 1649) and Hobbes († 1649), contemporaneously with Descartes on the Continent. Spinoza followed with his destructive criticism and with his pantheistic philosophy. These were followed by crowds of less important deists, freethinkers, etc. The grounds, both of attack and defence, were now very different from those of the early ages. Then the advocates of Christianity had to defend it against pagan attacks, and, in turn, to show the absurdity and wickedness of polytheism; now, on the other hand, the deistic unbelievers not only professed to believe in one God, but also sought to show that no special revelation is necessary, and that he can be known both God and duty from the light of nature. The English deism passed over into France and Germany, and, coming in aid of the movement in philosophy and criticism led by Descartes and Spinoza, gave origin there to the movement which finally culminated in the so-called Rationalism, and Pantheism (see the three heads; see also D’Ailly). We shall briefly sketch the history of apologetics in this period, first, on the Continent of Europe, leaving the English and American apologists to the close of this article.

1. Germany.—In Germany the Wolffian philosophy prepared the way for the English deism, which soon took root. The first open infidelity of the period we find in such writers as J. C. Dippel († 1734), author of Democritus Christianus, and J. C. Edelmann († 1767), who rejected all revealed religion to attack himself exclusively to conscience. Between these two extremes appeared Leibniz, whose attempt at a reconciliation between philosophy and Christianity, by making reason the judge between them, had prepared the way for the Wolffian school. Among the German apologetists of that period we find Illiellent (Die gute Seele d. göttl. Offenbarung, 1772–82), Köppen (Die Bibel als ein Werk d. göttl. Weisheit, 1857, 1857), A. F. W. Sack (Verehrterter Glaube d. Christen, 1718, 2 vols.), Nüssel (Unterredung z. h. Götz. Religionslehre, 1724), J. J. von Fürstenau (Die Bekenntniss von Wolkenbüttel (Betracht. u. d. Wahrheiten d. chr. Relig. 1776), G. Less (D. Religion, etc., 2d ed. 1786, 2 vols.), and J. G. Töllner († 1744). But the most important of all the German apologists of that time was Friedrich Kleuker, who defended Christianity as the scheme of man’s salvation, while the contemporary theologians chiefly defended the doctrines and morals of the Gospel. His principal works are, Wahrheit u. göttl. Ursprung d. Christenheit (Riga, 1787–94); Ueber die Gründe für d. Aehnlichkeit u. Glaubw. d. herzföll. Christen d. Christenheit (Hamberg, 1751, 2d ed. 1792 in 3 vols.); Ueber die Weisheit u. d. Religion d. Menschen (2d ed. 1792). In the German Roman Catholic Church we find the Wolffian B. Stattler (1771), P. Oppermann (1779), Beda Mayer (1791), and S. von Storchenu, author of the Philosophie der Religion (1772–93). The German theologians, however, allowed themselves to be led into a sort of Biblical deism, which was more and more clearly by J. C. Lavater († 1801), who considered faith as the result of the inward feeling of the power of the Gospel, not to be attained by learned demonstrations. The further development of theology in Germany led to the strife between Rationalism and Supranaturalism, and thus apologetics were merged into a meta-philosophy in which the fundamental questions of the Christian faith were freely discussed. This is the time of Reinhard's Ge-and stands at the head of a large class of apologetic literature. In 1863 Renan's "Vie de Jésus" appeared in France, followed, in Germany, by a new work from Strauss on the same subject, by Schenkel's "Charakterbild Jesu," and by Schleiermacher's posthumous "Leben Jesu," which, as apologetic literature on this subject sprang up in France, Germany, and England, for the literature of which, see Jesus. L. Feuerbach, in his work on the "Essence of Christianity" ("Wesen des Christentums," 1841), went even beyond Strauss, to the extreme limit of nihilism. He rejected religion and Christianity as mere dreams which, when man awakes, he finds only himself. He became the founder of a new school of materialism, which showed an extraordinary literary productivity, and gained considerable influence. See MATERIALISM.

Among the most important apologies of Christianity against this school belong the Letters on Materialism from Feuerbach ("Briefe über den Materialismus"), and the works of Böhmer. An "Apologetic of Christianity from the stand-point of national psychology" was written by R. T. Grau ("Seminul und Indogermanen in ihrer Beziehung zur Religion und Wissenschaft.") An Apologie des Christentums vom Standpunkte der Philosophie (1854) was published without the purpose of refuting the objections made by Renan, Strauss, and others, to the universal character of the Christian religion on account of its Semitic origin. As Strauss, Renan, Feuerbach, and many other modern opponents denied the possibility of miracles, and made this their chief argument against the truth of supernatural Christianity, a considerable number of works was called forth in defence of miracles, all of which are intended to be more or less apologies of Christianity. See the most important works of this class under MIRACLES.

One of the ablest German apologetic works of modern times is Auberlen's "Göttliche Offenbarung" (Basil, vol. 1, 1861, 8vo). It is a work of which each part is a complete essay in itself, left incomplete by the death of the author in 1864. See AUBERLEN. Among the recent works which are more popular than science, none has produced a more profound sensation than Guizot's "Méditations sur l'Essence de la Religion Chrétienne" (Paris, 1864; translated into English, German, and most of the European languages). Guizot undertakes an apology of those fundamental doctrines of Christianity which are common to both evangelical Protestants and Roman Catholics, and he treats, in succession, of creation, revelation, inspiration, the essence of God, the person and the work of Christ, and the particularity of the belief on the part of the church. Louis Leopold Feuerbach ("Lips. 1864") are ten lectures, held at Leipsic, to show the fundamental difference between the two views of the world ("Werlesschauung") which now dispute with each other the control of modern society, and the ability of Christianity alone to furnish a satisfactory solution of the problem of human life with all its mysteries. Similar is a posthumous work by Thom. Wisenmanna (died 1877, q. v.). Zur Philosophie und Geschichte der Offenbarung (Basil. 1864). The author was a contemporary of Kant, Jacobi, Hermann, Hamma, and Lavater, by all of whom he was highly extolled. Auberlen, in his Apologie, has paid especial attention to his importance as an apologist in the "Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie" for 1864. Other apologetic works recently published in Germany are Gess and Riggenbach's "Apologetische Beiträge" (Basil.; 1868); a collection of ten lectures by Auberlen, Gess, Peter, Riggenbach, Stahelin, Stockmeyer, under the title "Zur Geschichte des Christentums" (Freiburg, 1861, 8vo); Vossen (Rom. Cath.), Das Christentum und die Eintracht seiner Gegner (Freiburg, 1861, 8vo); Hittinger (Rom. Cath.), Apologie des Christentums (vol. i, Freiburg, 1863, 8vo); Hillen (Rom. Cath.), Apologie des Christentums (Warendorf, 1865); Zeeschitz, Zur Apologie des Christentums nach Geschichte und Lehre (Leips. 1866, 8vo). A new monthly, entitled "Bessa" dei Cultus," devoted entirely to apologetics, was commenced in 1866 at Gütersloh. It has the services of Andreas, Zöckler, and Grau, the two latter of whom are authors of apologetic works mentioned above.

2. French.—At the head of modern French apologists, of course, stands Pascal (q. v.); Huet's "Demonstratio Evangelica" (2d ed. 1860) followed; also Houtteville, mentioned above (1722). Among the Roman Catholics, Ficinclus, "Lettres sur la Religion" (1718); Le Vassor (1718); Lamy (1715); D'Aguerreau (1771); among Protestants de Bèze (1727); Jacquesot (1796); in answer to the French encyclopedists especially, Abbé Guénée, the author of "Moïse véru" (1769); Bergier, in his "Tracté historique et Dogmatique de la vraie Religion" (Paris, 2d ed. 1780, 12 vols.; Bamberg, 1781, 12 vols.). F. A. Chateaubriand also sought to prove the heavenly origin of Christianity in his "Génie du Christianisme" (Paris, 1802; often reprinted and translated), and in his Les Martyrs. The deficiencies of French apologetics are sharply noted by Chassay, "Introduction aux Demonstrations Evangeliques" (Migne, Paris, 1858, 8vo). The Romanist reactionary school, headed by de Maistre (1763-1821), mingled apologetics with destruction of the absolute authority of the church (see Morel, "History of Modern Philosophy," chap. vi. § 2). A school of ultra Rationalists has lately sprung up in France, of which Colani and Rovillé are types. See RATIONALISM. The Evangelical school, on the other hand, has sunk a great deal in the second century in Civet (q. v.); Pressensé (see the "Revue Chrétienne"); and Astiat, "Les Deux Théologies" (Geneva, 1868).

Among modern French apologists we notice the Roman Catholic R. de la Mennais (1864) and Prayssinus (1841). They, however, like de Maistre, so identify Christianity with Roman Catholicism that they cannot, until they are washed in the blood of the church. In the Reformed Church, E. Diodati of Geneva, addresses his "Essai sur le Christianisme" especially to the will. For the numerous writers in answer to Renan, see the bibliography under Jesus.

The Abbé Migne has published a vast collection of the Christian apologists in 18 vols., with an introductory volume, and a concluding volume on the present state of apologetic science and of scepticism, making 20 vols. in all. We deem it worth while to give the whole title of this great work, which is a repository of apologetics: "Démonstrations Evangeliques de Terrail, Origène, Eusebe, S. Augustin, Montalembert, Basil, con, Grotius, Le Métaphysicien, S. Thomas, S. crociant; avec Introduction aux Démonstrations évangéliques, et Conclusion du même ouvrage (20 vols. Imp. 8vo, Paris). It is proper to say that the word isthmus in this place is not correct, as penitences in the Protestant writers which impugn Romanism are often omitted.

3. English and American.—The English Deists of the 17th century, Herbert, Hobbes, and Blount, were answered by numerous writers; the literature is given in Leland, Deistical Writers (1706, 8vo), and in Lecheler, Entretiens sur les Evangelistes (1720). Richard Baxter was probably the earliest original writer on Evidences in the English language. His first publication on the subject was The Unreasonableness of Infidelity (1685, 8vo; Works, vol. xx.) followed by The Reasons of the Christian Religion (1667, 4to; Works, xx.) and More Reasons (1667, in answer to Herbert; Works, xx.). In these books Baxter shows his usual acuteness, and anticipates many of the arguments of later writers. Farrar (Critical Hist. of Free Thought), strangely enough, omits Baxter from his list of writers given in note 49, from which the following statement is taken. Locke in his Essay wrote The Reasonableness of Christianity (Works, vol. i.; Waterland, Reply to Tindal; Boyle (1626-1691) not only wrote himself on the evidences, but founded the Boyle Lectures [see Boyle], a series which was mainly composed of works written by men of real ability, and contains several treatises of value. Among the series may perhaps be noticed the Benevento (1698), of Bishop Williams (1695); Gassett (1697); Dean Stanhope (1701); Dr. Clarke (1704-5); Derham (1711); Dod (1713); Gardon (1721); Berriman (1780); Wotton (1706); Owen (1769). Other series of lectures in defence of Christianity followed, both in England and on the Continent, viz., the Moyer Lecture (1719); the Leyden (1758); the Warburton (1772); the Basle (1775); the Bampton (1780); the Hague (1785); the Haarlem (1876); the Hulsean (1820); the Congregational (1835). See each of these heads. The Lowell Lecture (Boston) has similar objects. Among separate treatises of this period, Leslie († 1792), Short Method with the Deists; Jenkins, Reasonableness of Christianity (1721); Foster, Usefulness and Truth of Christianity, against Tindal; Sherlock, Trial of the Witnesses, against Woolston; Lyttleton, on St. Paul's Conversion; Conybee, Defence of Revelation (1787); Warburton, Divine Legation of Moses; Addison, Evidences (1729); Spence, Zeno (1774); Bills, Ancients (1791), may also be mentioned. The great work of Bishop Butler, The Analogy of Religion, etc., was the recapitulation and condensation of all the arguments that had been previously used, but possessed the largeness of treatment and originality of combination of a mind which had not so much borrowed the thoughts of others as had been educated by them. Balgry's Discourses (84 ed., 1790, 2 vols.), and his Tracts, Moral and Theological (1784, 8vo), are very valuable. In the latter half of the century, the historical rather than the moral evidences were developed. First, the religion of nature was proved: at this point the Deists halted, the Christian writers embarked. The further problem and the revealed religion was bridged at first by probability; next by Butler's argument from analogy, put as a dilemma to silence those who objected to revelation, but capable of being used as a direct argument to lead the mind to revelation; thirdly, by the historical and philosophical methods discussed in the 17th century, there was a development of the revelation, even without other evidence. The argument in all cases, however, whether philosophical or historical, was an appeal to reason—either evidence of probability or of fact—and was in no case an appeal to the authority of the church. Accordingly, both the Evidences of Sumner, Hell (1784, 8vo, an admirable book); Alexander, Christ and Christianity (N. Apostasy (διώρροια, resol, a forsaking or renouncing religion, either by an open declaration in words, or a virtual declaration by actions. The Greek term is employed by Paul to designate the "falling away" (διώρροια), which in his time was held in check by some obstacle (vō καρίων, διώρροιαν), 2 Thess. ii, 3, 10. Evidence of two religious defection (Gen. xiv, 4, Sept.; 2 Chron. xiii, 6, Sept.; Acts v, 37); Religious defection (Acts xxi, 21; 1 Tim. iv, 1; Heb. iii, 12). The first is the common classical usage of the word. The second is more usual in the N. T.; so St. Ambrose understands it (Comm. in Luc. xx, 20). This διώρροια (apostasy) implies διώρρεω (apostate). An organized religious body being supposed, some of whose members should fall away from the true faith, the persons so falling away would be διώρρηται, though still formally unserved from the religious body; and the body itself, while, in respect to its faithful members, it would retain its existence, and the attitude of two religious defection (Gen. xiv, 4, Sept.; 2 Chron. xiii, 6, Sept.; Acts v, 37); Religious defection (Acts xxi, 21; 1 Tim. iv, 1; Heb. iii, 12). The antitype may be found in the corrupted Church of Christ in so far as it was corrupted. The same body, in so far as it maintained the faith and love, was the bride and the spouse, and in so far as it "fell away" from God, was the διώρρεεα διώρροια (apostate) body of old was the beloved city, and Sodom the bloody city—the church of God and the Synagogue of Satan. It is of the nature of a religious defection to grow up by degrees. We should not, therefore, be able to lay the finger on any special moment at which it commenced. St. Cyril of Jerusalem considered that it was already existing in his time (Catech. xvii, 5). "None," he says, "are called Christians, for men have fallen away (διώρροιαν) from the right faith. This, then, is the διώρροια, and we must begin to look out for the enemy; already he has begun to send his forerunners, that the prey may be ready for him at his coming" (Catech. xv, 9). See Man of Sin. The primitive Christian church had several kinds of apostasy: the first, of those who went entirely from Christianity to Judaism; the second, of those who complied so far with the Jews as to communicate with them in many of their unlawful practices, without making a formal profession of their religion; thirdly, of those who mingled Judaism with Christianity together; and, fourthly, of those who voluntarily relapsed into paganism. See Libellatii; Sacrificat; Traditors (Parrhes., s. v.).

At an early period it was held that the church was bound, by the passages of Scripture in which the sin of apostasy is referred to, either entirely to refuse absorption, or to continue in the same communion. APOSTATE ascribed. The term "apostasy" is perverted when it is applied to a withdrawal from any system of mere polity; it is, in fact, usually employed only in connection with a departure from the written truth of God in some form, public or personal.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xvi, ch. VI, s. v. See BACKSLIDING.

APOSTATE (ἀπόστατος, from ἀπόστασις, to send forth). In Attic Greek the term is used to denote a "flee or natural armament." It occurs only once in the Sept. (I Kings xiv, 6), and there, as uniformly in the New Testament, it signifies a person sent by another, a messenger. It has been asserted that the Jews were accustomed to term the collector of the half shekel which every Israelite paid annually to the Temple an apostle; and we have better authority for asserting that the Jews employed agents who carried about encyclical letters from their rulers. Cæcennius states that it is even yet a custom among the Jews to call those who carry about circular letters from their rulers by the name of apostles. To this use of the term Paul has been supposed to refer (Gal. I, 1), when he asserts that he was "an apostle, not of men, neither by man—by man, an apostle not like those known among the Jews by that name, who derived their authority and received their mission from the chief priests or principal men of their nation. The import of the word is strongly brought out in John xix, 16, where it occurs along with its correlate, "The servant is not greater than his Lord, neither he that sent the servant is greater than he who sent him."

It is the opinion of Suicer (Thæsauri, art. ἀπόστολος) that the appellation "apostle" is in the N.T. employed as a general name for Christian ministers as "senti by God," in a qualified use of that phrase, to point out the word or the person whose word is of loose sense by the fathers. Thus we find Archippus, Philumemon, Apphia, the seventy disciples (Luke x, 17, 17), termed apostles; and even Mary Magdalene is said γεννησθαι τοις ἀπόστολοις ἀπόστολος, to become an apostle to the apostles. No evidence, however, can be brought forward of the term being thus used in the N.T. Andronicus and Junia (Rom. xvi, 7) are indeed said to be ἰησοῦς ἐν τοις ἀπόστολοις, of note among the apostles; but these words by no means imply that they were apostles, but only that they were well known and esteemed by the apostles. The early workers of the apostles are, by Chrysostom denominated ἀπόστολοι. The noun, the appellation of an apostle, is, by Chrysostom denominated ἀπόστολος. The use of the term has been thus restricted. The term, however, is still, in some cases, employed. In the Apoc.

which admits, to say the least, of being plausibly accounted for in another way. We know that, on the occasion referred to, "the prophets and teachers, when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, sent them away (ἀπέσταλς); so that, in the sense in which we will immediately find the word "apostle" used, they were called "apostles" by the church, and the name of "apostle" came to be used by them for their designation. In the Acts x, 23, 24, 25, 26; xvi, 7, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 26; xvi, 27, 28; xvi, 4, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28; xvi, 4, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28. Before his ascension he, on the day of Pentecost, communicated to them those supernatural gifts which were necessary to the performance of the high functions he had commissioned them to exercise; and in the exercise of these gifts they, in the Gospel history and in their epistles, with the Apocalypse, gave complete view of the will of their Master in reference to that new order of things of which he was the author. They "had the mind of Christ." They spoke "the wisdom of God in a mystery." That mystery "God revealed to them by His Spirit," and they spoke it, "not in words which man's wisdom teacheth," but which the Holy Ghost teacheth. They were "ambassadors for Christ;" and bought men, "in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God." They authoritatively taught the doctrine and the law of their Lord; they organized churches, and required them to "keep the traditions," i.e. the doctrines and ordinances delivered to them (Acts ii; 1 Cor. ii; 16; ii; 7, 10, 18; 2 Cor. v; 20; 1 Cor. xi; 2). Of the twelve originally ordained to the apostleship, one, Judas Iscariot, "fell from it by transgression," and Matthias, "who had companied with the other apostles," all the time that the Lord Jesus went out and in among them, was by lot substituted in his place. The apostles, complete view of the will of the mystic, Paul, was also miraculously added to the number of these permanent rulers of the Christian society (Acts ix; xx; 4; xxvi; 15-18; 1 Tim. i; 12; ii; 7; 2 Tim. i, 11). See Disciples (Twelve).—Kitto, s. v.

The number twelve was probably fixed upon after the analogy of the tribes of Israel; and Peter, usually prominent among them (Matt. xix, 28; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 323; comp. Tertull. c. Marcion. iv, 415), and was so exact that the apostles are often termed simply "the Twelve" (Matt. xxvi, 14, 47; John vi, 67; xx, 24; 1 Cor. x, 5). Their general commission was to preach the gospel. (See generally Cave, Hist. of the Apostles. Lond. 1677; Spenheim, in his Dissert. actu apostolorum, Lngld. B. 1679; Budde Eccles. apostol. Jen. 1729; Burman, Exercit. acad. ii, 104 sq.; Hes, Grisch. u. Schrift. d. Apostel,Tur. 1821; Plancz, Grisch. des Christen, Gott. 1818; Wilhelm, Chris. Gott. 1758; Rullmann, De Apostolis, Rint. 1789; Stanley, Sermons on the Apostolic Age, Oxz. 1847, 1852; Renan, Les Apotres, Paris, 1866.) They were undedicated persons (F. Lami, De eruditione apostolorum, Flor. 1730) taken from common life. Of these twelve, three were sons of Zebedee; of them, James and John, and the favorite of them, had been his disciples of John the Baptist (John i, 35 sq.). Some of them appear to have had relatives of Jesus himself. See Brother. Our Lord chose them early in his public career, though some of them had certainly partly attached themselves to him before; but never in their call as apostles they appear to have been continuously with him or in his service. They seem to have been all on an equality, both during and after the ministry of Christ on earth; and the prelatial supremacy of Peter, founded by the Romish Church upon Matt. xvi, 18, is nowhere alluded to in the apostolic period. We find one indeed, Peter, from fervor of personal character, the first to speak, and distinguished by having the first place assigned him in founding the Jewish and Gentile churches [see Peter]; but we never find the slightest trace in Scripture of any superiority or primacy being in consequence accorded to him. We also find that he and two others, James and John, are the only ones who are admitted to the inner privacy of our Lord's acts and sufferings on several occasions (Mark v, 37; Matt. xvii, i sq.; xxvi, 57; but this is no proof of superiority in rank or office. Early in our Lord's ministry, he sent them out two and two to preach repentance, and take with them the key of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xvi, 19). This their mission was of the nature of a solemn call to the children of Israel, to whom it was confined (Matt. x, 5, 6). There is, however, in his charge to the apostles on this occasion not a word of their proclaiming his own mission as the Messiah of the Jewish people; their preaching was at this time strictly of a preparatory kind, resembling that of John the Baptist, the Lord's forerunner. But Jesus early informed the apostles respecting the solemn nature, the hardships, and even positive danger of their vocation (Matt. x, 17), but he never imparted to them any exoteric instruction, nor even intimated them into any special mysteries, since the whole tendency of his teaching was practical; but they constantly accompanied him in his training of preaching and to the festivals (being unhindered by their domestic relations, comp. Matt. vii, 14; 1 Cor. ix, 5; see Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii, 30; Schmid, De apostolis woraritis, Helmst. 1704, Viteb. 1734; comp. Deyling, Liber. iii, 439 sq.; Paff, De circulatione nov. &ev. multarum apostolarch, Tuling. 1724; Schultheisses, Neueste theol. Nachricht. 1829, i, 180 sq.), beheld his wonderful acts, listened to his discourses addressed to the multitude (Matt. v, 1 sq.; xxiii, 1 sq.; Luke iv, 15 sq.), or his discussions with learned Jews (Matt. xix, 15 sq.; Luke x, 26 sq.); occasionally (especially in the case of John and Stephen), when he favored them, he lowered them in private (Matt. xvii, 1 sq.), and conversed freely with him, eliciting information (Matt. xv, 15 sq.; xvii, 1 sq.; Luke viii, 9 sq.; xii, 41; xvii, 5; John ix, 2 sq.) on religious subjects, sometimes with respect to the sayings of Jesus, sometimes in general. We hear nothing of a special commission, nor even on one occasion themselves inclined to make attempts at a prophetic instruction of the Gospel (Matt. vi, 7 sq.; Luke ix, 6 sq.), and with this view performed cures (Mark vi, 18; Luke ix, 6), although in this last they were not always successful (Matt. xvii, 16). They had, indeed, already acknowledged him (Matt. xvi, 16; Luke ix, 20) as the Messiah (i.e., the anointed, endowed with miraculous powers (Luke ix, 64), yet they were slow in apprehending the spiritual doctrine and aim of their Master, being impeded by their weak perception and their national propensities (Matt. xv, 16; xvi, 22; xvii, 20 sq.; Luke ix, 54; John xvi, 12), inasmuch that they had to say him (or, according to the obvious import of the plainest parables (Luke xii, 41 sq.), and, indeed, they themselves at times confessed their want of faith (Luke xv, 5); nor even at the departure of Jesus from the earth, when for two or three years they had been his constant and intimate companions (John x, 17; comp. John xvi, 12), they did not fail to love and value the last suppers and by their witness to the love which Jesus had to his own. So also at the last supper, and by their witness to the love which Jesus had to his own. So also at the last supper, in so solemn circumstances (Matt. xxvi, 26 sq.; Mark xiv, 22 sq.; Luke xii, 17 sq.) neither served to awaken their enthusiasm, nor indeed to preserve them from outright faithlessness at the death of their Master (Matt. xvii, 14 sq.; Luke xxiv, 38 sq.; John xxi, 9 sq.), or the time of his restoration (Matt. xxviii, 18 sq.). The number of Jesus and a number of females charged themselves with the interment of his body, and it was only his incontestable resurrection that gathered together again his scattered disciples. Yet the most of them returned even after this to their previous occupation (John xxi, 24 sq., as if in wonderment of it), and then followed a fresh command of the Master (Matt. xxviii, 28 sq.) to direct them to their mission, and collect them at Jerusalem (Acts i, 4). Here they awaited in a pious association the advent of the Holy Spirit (John xii, 22), which Jesus had promised them (Acts i, 8) as the Paraclete (John xiv, 26; xvi, 13); and soon after the ascension of their teacher, on the Pentecost established at the founding of the old dispensation, they felt themselves surprised by an extraordinary phenomenon (see Schultess, De Charismatibus. Spirit. Sancti, Leips. 1809; Schulz, Geographia der ersten Christen, Leips. 1813; Raeder, Planckingen, i, 11 sq.), resulting in an internal influx of the power of that Spirit (Acts ii); and thereupon they immediately began, as soon as the vacancy occasioned by the defection of Judas Iscariot had been filled by the election of Matthias (Acts i, 15 sq.), to publish, as witnesses of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, in the Holy City with ardor and success (Acts ii, 41). Their course was henceforth decided, and over much that had hitherto been dark to them now beamed a clear light (John ii, 22; xii, 16; see Henke, in Pott's Episogie, i, 19 sq.).—Winer, s. v.

5. Under the eyes of the apostles, and not without personal sacrifices on their part, the original Christian membership at Jerusalem erected themselves into a community within the pale of Judaism, although irrespective of its sacred rites, with which, however, they maintained a connection (Acts iii, vii, viii); and the apostolic activity soon disseminated the divine word among the people (Acts vii, 1 sq., liii), while already Jesus had gained some followers (John iv). In the mother Church at Jerusalem their superior dignity and power were universally acknowledged by the rulers and the people (Acts v, 12 sq.). Even the persecution which arose about Stephen, and put the first check on the spread of the Gospel in Judea, does not seem to have brought peril to the apostles (Acts vii, 1). Here ends, properly speaking (or rather, perhaps, with the general visitation hinted at in Acts ix, 32), the first period of the apostles' agency, during which its centre is Jerusalem, and the prominent figure is that of Peter. Agreeably to the promise of our Lord to him (Matt. xvi, 18), which we conceive it impossible to understand otherwise than in a personal sense, he among the twelve foundations (Rev. xxi, 14) was the stone on whom the Church was first built; and it was his privilege first to open the door of heaven to the Gentiles (Acts x, 42) and to Gentiles (Acts x, 11). The next successive step was taken by Peter, who, not without misgivings and even disapproval on the part of the primitive body of Christians, had published the Gospel on the sea-coast (Acts x, 21); and this led to the establishment of a second community in the Syrian metropolis (Acts xii, 21), while by connection with the Church at Jerusalem (Acts xi, 22 sq.), and constitutes the centre of this second period of the apostolic history.

But all that had hitherto taken place was destined to be cast into the shade by the powerful influence of one individual, a Pharisee, who received the apostolate in a most remarkable manner, namely, Paul. Treated at first with suspicion, he soon acquired influence and consideration in the circle of the apostles by his enthusiasm (Acts xii), but, betaking himself to Antioch, he carried forth thence in every direction the Gospel into distant heathen lands, calling out and employing active associates, and resigning to others (Peter; comp. Gal. ii, 7) the conversion of the Jews. His labors form the third apostolic period. From this time Paul is the central character of the apostolic history; even Peter gradually disappears, and it is only after Paul had retired from Asia Minor that John appears there. He even takes his departure from the apostleship, and accomplished more for Christianity than all the directly-appointed apostles, not only in extent, measure.

uring his activity by the geographical region traversed, but also in intensity, since he especially grasped the comprehensive scope of the Christian remedial system, and sought to harmonize the heavenly doctrine with sound learning. It is not a little remarkable that a Pharisee should thus most successfully comprehend the world-wide spirit of Christianity.

4. Authentic history records nothing concerning the apostles' return home, except that Peter, John (Acts viii, 14), and the two James's (Acts x, 17; xvi, 18). Traditions, derived in part from early times (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii, 1), have come down to us concerning nearly all of them (see the Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, which have been usually looked upon as the acts of the Twelve Apostles, or the Geog- raphy, i, 402 sq.; and Cave's Antiquitates Apost. ut sup.; also Peronius Vitis Apostolorum, Par. 1551, Rec. 1774; comp. Ludwigt, Die Apost. Jes. Quedlinb. 1841; Heringa, De vitis apostolorum, Tiele, 1844), but they must be cautiously resorted to, as they sometimes conflict with one another, and their gradual growth can often be traced. All that can be gathered with certainty respecting the subsequent history of the apostles is that James (q. v.), after the martyrdom of James the greater (Acts xii, 2), usually remained at Jerusalem as the acknowledged head of the fraternity (comp. Acts xii, 17) and president of the college (Gal. ii, 9); Peter (Acts ii, 29; Acts viii, 25; Gal. ii, 9); while Peter travelled mostly as missionary among the Jews ("apostle of the Circumcision," Gal. ii, 8), and John (all three are named "pillars" of the Christian community, Gal. ii, 9) eventually strove at Ephesus to extend the kindly practical character of Christianity, which had been endangered by Gnostical tendencies, and to win disciples in this temper. From this period it certainly becomes impossible to determine the sphere of these or the other apostles' activity; but it must ever remain remarkable that precisely touching the evangelical mission of the immediate apostles no more information is extant, and that the memory of the services of most of them survived the very first century only in extremely unreliable stories. We might be even tempted to consider the choice of Jesus as in a great measure a failure, especially since a Judas was among the select; but we must not forget, in the first place, that it was of great importance for the future to form a narrow circle of disciples, i. e. at a time when there was small opportunity for selection (Matt. ix, 37 sq.); in the second place, that, in making the choice, he could only have regard to moral and intellectual constitution, in which respect the apostles chosen probably equalled the Pharisees, or at least, finally, that, even if (as some infer from John ii, 25) the ultimate results had been clearly foreseen by him, they did not (especially after the new turn given to the Christian enterprise by Paul) strictly depend upon this act of his, since, in fact, the successful issue of the scheme justified his sagacity as the instrumentalities by which it was on the whole carried forward. Some writers (Neander, Heb. p. 228 sq.) have tried quite an argument for the selection of the apostles from their various idiosyncrasies and marked traits of character (Gregorii Dion. de temperamentis sive scriptorum N. T. Lips. 1710; comp. Haas, Heb. Jes. xxix, 1 sq., 11 sq., xxii, 1 sq.); but finally they understood that they should all have an equal career or mission; the founding of the Church in Palestine and its vicinity was their first and chief work, and their services in other countries, however important in themselves, were of secondary interest to this. See generally respecting the apostles, the history Mr. Neander's (especially in the N. T.), Neander's Planning and Training of the Prim. Ch. (Hamb. 3d ed. 1841, Edinb. 1848); D. F. 5. The characteristic features of this highest office in the Christian Church have been very accurately delined by M'Lean, in his Apostolick Commission. "It was essential to their office—(1.) That they should have seen the Lord, and been eye and ear witnesses of what they testified to the world (John xv, 27). This is the condition of every world in all places, that the apostles are to be the successors of Jesus to succeed Judas (Acts i, 21, 22), that he should have been personally acquainted with the whole ministerial course of our Lord, from the baptism of John till the day when He was taken up into heaven. He himself describes them as 'those that had continued with Him in the temptation in the wilderness' (Luke xxii, 26). By this close personal intercourse with Him, they were peculiarly fitted to give testimony to the facts of redemption; and we gather, from his own words in John xvii, 28; xv, 26, 27; xvi, 13, that an especial bestowal of the Spirit's influence was granted them, by which their memories were quickened, and their powers of reproducing that which they had heard from him increased above the ordinary measure of man. Paul is no exception here; for, speaking of those who saw Christ after his resurrection, he adds, 'and last of all he was seen of me' (1 Cor. xv, 8). And this he elsewhere mentions as one of his apostolic qualifications; 'I am not worthy to be called an apostle' (1 Cor. ix, 1). So that his saying that Just One and hearing the word of his mouth' was necessary to his being 'a witness of what he thus saw and heard' (Acts xxii, 14, 15). (3.) They must have been immediately called and chosen to that office by Christ himself, or he must have been impossible. Matthew, Mark, Luke, Peter, and John (Luke vi, 13; Gal. i, 1), Matthias not excepted; for, as he had been a chosen disciple of Christ before, so the Lord, by determining the lot, declared his choice, and immediately called him to the office of an apostle (Acts i, 24—26). (3.) Infallible inspiration was also essentially necessary to that office (John xvi, 13-15; Acts ii, 10; Gal. i, 11, 12). They had not only to explain the true sense and spirit of the Old Testament (Luke xxiv, 27; Acts xxii, 22, 23; xxvii, 28), which were hid from the Jewish doctors, but also to give forth the New Testament revelation to the world, which was to be the unalterable standard of faith and practice in all succeeding generations (1 Pet. i, 25; 1 John iv, 6). It was therefore absolutely necessary that they should be secured against all error and mistake by unerring instruction. Accordingly, Christ bestowed on the Spirit to teach them all things, to bring all things to their remembrance whatsoever he had said (John xvi, 13), to make them into all truth, and to show them things to come (John xvi, 13). Their word, therefore, must be received, 'not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God' (1 Thess. ii, 13), and as that whereby we are to distinguish 'the spirit of truth from the spirit of error' (1 John iv, 6). (4.) Another qualification was the power of working miracles (Mark xvi, 20; Acts ii, 43), such as speaking with divers tongues, caring the lame, etc. (1 Cor. xii, 8). These were the credentials of their divine mission. 'Truly, says Paul, 'the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs and wonders, and mighty deeds' (1 Cor. xii, 29). Miracles were necessary to confirm their doctrine at its first publication, and to gain credit to it in the world as a revelation from God, and by these 'God bare them witness' (Heb. ii, 4). (5.) To these characteristics may be added the universality of their mission. Their charge was, not only to the Jewish church, but to the Gentile, like that of ordinary pastors, but being the oracles of God to men, they had the care of all the churches (2 Cor. xi, 28). They had power to settle their faith and order as a model to future ages, to determine all controversies (Acts xvi, 4), and to exercise the rod of discipline over all (1 Pet. v, 2). They were the primary teachers or flock (1 Cor. v, 2-6; 2 Cor. x, 8; xiii, 10). 6. It must be obvious, from this scriptural account of the apostolical office, that the apostles had, in the strict sense of the term, no successors. Their qualifications were supernatural, and their work, once performed, remains in the infallible record of the New Testament, for the advantage of the Church and the world. They held the keys of the Church, and were the pillars on the porch of historic teachers of Christian doctrine and law. All official men in Christian churches can legitimately claim no higher place than exponents of the doctrines and administrators of the laws found in their writings. Few things have been more injurious to the cause of our Christianity than the assumption by all the latter-day officers in the Church of the peculiar prerogatives of the holy apostles of our Lord Jesus. Much that is said of the latter is not at all applicable to the former; and much that admits of being applied can be so, in truth, only in a very secondary and extenuated sense. See Succession. The apostolical office seems to have been pre-eminently that of founding the churches, and upholding them by supernatural power specially bestowed for that purpose. It ceased, as a matter of course, with its first holders; all continuation of it, from the very conditions of its existence (comp. 1 Cor. ix, x), being impossible. Not from any defect in the ancient churches coexisted with, and did not in any sense succeed, the apostles; and when it is claimed for bishops or any church officers that they are their successors, it can be understood only chronologically, and not officially. See Succession. 7. In the ecclesiastical Writers we find the term δاءωντολογος, "the apostle," used as the designation of a portion of the canonical books, consisting chiefly of the Pauline Epistles. "The Psalter" and the "Apostle" are often mentioned together. It is also not uncommon with these writers to call Paul "the Apostle" by way of emulation. The several apostles are usually represented in medieval pictures with special badges or attributes: St. Peter, with the keys; St. Paul, with a sword; St. Andrew, with a cross; St. James the Less, with a fuller's pole; St. John, with a cup and a winged serpent flying out of it; St. Bartholomew, with a knife; St. Philip, with a long staff, whose lower end is formed into a cross; St. Thomas, with a lance; St. Matthew, with a hatchet; St. Matthias, with a battle-axe; St. James the Greater, with a pilgrim's staff and a gourd-bottle; St. Simon, with a saw; and St. Jude, with a club. (See Lardner, W. H. 2, 22.) For the history of the several individual apostles, see each name (Mant, Biog. of the Apostles, Lond. 1840). 8. Further works on the history of the apostles, besides the patriotic ones by Dorotheus of Tyre (in Hammer's Eusebius, Lond. 1663), Jerome (in append. of his Opera, ii, 945), Hippolytus (of doubtful genuineness, given with others in Fabricus God. Apostolic, Apostolical, belonging or relating to the apostles, or traceable to the apostles. Thus we say, the apostolic age, apostolical character, apostolical doctrine, constitutions, traditions, etc. The title, as one of honor, and likely also to imply authority, has been freely bestowed in various ways. Thus the pretended succession of bishops in the prelatical churches has been called Apostolical Succession. See Succession. The Roman Church calls itself the Apostolical Church (q. v.), and the see of Rome the Apostolic See (sedes apostolitca). The pope calls himself the Apostolical Bishop. At an early period of the church, every bishop's see was called by courtesy an apostolic see, and the term implied, therefore, no pre-eminence. The first time the term apostolical was applied to bishops is in a letter of Clovis to the council of Orleans, held in 511, though that king does not in it express any claim himself to have received them as sede dignissimi, highly worthy of the apostolic see. In 581 Guntram calls the bishops assembled at the council of Macon apostolical pontiffs. In progress of time, the bishop of Rome increasing in power above the rest, and the three patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem having fallen into the hands of the Saracens, the title apostolical was restrained to the pope and his church alone. At length, some of the popes, and St. Gregory the Great, not content to hold the title by this tenure, began to insist that it belonged to them by another and peculiar right as the successors of St. Peter. In 1014 the council of Elmlen declared that the pope was the sole apostolical primate of the universal church. Hence a great number of apostolical: apostolical see, apostolical nuncio, apostolical notary, apostolical chamber, apostolical brief, apostolical vicar, apostolical blessing, etc., in all of which phrases the name apostolical is identical with papal.—See Elliott, Delinication of Romantism, bk. iii, ch. v; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, ch. ii and iv; D. L. 19, 2.4; D. E. 16, 4.2.

Apostolic Age, that period of church history which extends from the day of Pentecost to the death of the last surviving apostle (John).

With the rise of Rationalism in Germany the authenticity of several books of the New Testament, and consequently the history of the apostolic age, became a matter of doubt, and the subject of critical investigation. The first who undertook to reconstruct the history of the apostolic age was Semler, who, in a number of treatises, insisted on a distinction being made between that which is of permanent value in the primitive church and that which is transitory, and pointed to the great influence which the opposition between Jewish Christianity and the Pauline school had upon the formation of the church. Under the treatment of Semler the early Christian Church was eviscerated of all life, and nothing left but a dry abstraction. The same may be said of the works of Pufendorf, Planck, of Göttingen (especially his Geschichte der christlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung), though they are in some respects valuable. From the degradation of the apostolic age by these and many other writers of similar views, it was rescued by the theologians of the new evangelical movement, especially Neander (Geschichte der Pfamanung und Leitung der christlichen Kirche durch die Apostel, Hamburg, 1832, 4th edition, which reviews all the works that had been published since the appearance of the first edition), who shows throughout as deep piety as critical acumen. In the mean time, however, the entire new view of the apostolic age was developed by Professor F. C. Baur and his disciples, the so-called Tübinger School (q. v.), the first and most important manifesto of which was the Life of Jesus by Strauss, while the entire theory was most completely exhibited in Baur's Paulus der Apostel Jesus Christi (1846, 8vo), and in Schweiger, Nacktsorgelsthes Zentralter (Tübingen, 1846, 2 vols.). This school rejected the authenticity of most of the books of the New Testament, and regarded them only as sources of information for the "Post-apostolic Age." The essential points of this new theory are: (1) that, in the minds of Christ and the first apostles, the new religion was only a sect or an atavistic form of Judaism. Thus the nascent church had no need of the apostles; it was at once the same with what was later called Ebionism; (2), that Paul, in opposition to the other apostles, founded Gentile Christianity, quite a distinct system; (3), that Ebionism and Paulinism were reconciled in the 2d century by a number of men of both parties who then wrote Luke's Acts of the Apostles and several of the apocryphal epistles; and on the basis of this reconciliation the Christian Church was built. (For an account of it, see Saalh, Apostolic Age, § 86; London Eclectic Review, June, 1853.) See Tübingen School. The subject called forth a very animated discussion and a numerous literature, and the theologians of Tübingen have become more moderate in their destructive criticism. The work of Ritschl on the Origin of the Old Catholic Church (Entstehung der altkatholischen Grohne, Bonn, 1850) deserves especial credit in this respect. Among the works on the orthodox side which were called forth by this discussion were those of Baumgarten (Das Apostolische Wachtglied, Tübingen, 1852, 2 vols.), Trautmann (Die apostolische Kirche, 1848), and G. V. Kochler, Das apostolische und nachapostolische Zeitalter (Tübingen, 1857, 24 ed.). As the critics of the Tübingen school greatly differed in their views respecting the authenticity of the New Testament, they have been called the "vitalist" and the "verbalist" schools. But the New Testament scholars arose what parts of the history of the apostolic age can be established with certainty by the books of the New Testament considered separately? The Tübinger school did not reject the authenticity of the Epistle.

ties to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians. Its opponents therefore showed that we find in these epistles the basis (1) of the historical appearance and the divine-human nature of Christ, which is more fully developed in the Gospels; (2) of a congregation which the Lord Jesus Christ formed wholly of his Apostles, of which was afterward transferred to the apostles, who were fitted out for their office through the Holy Spirit and the appearances of the risen Lord; (3) of the additional vocation of Paul to the apostolic office, and, more specially, to the office of apostle of the Gentiles; (4) of the communion of the Church. The Acts of the Apostles were regarded by the Tübingen school as an untrustworthy novel, invented for the purpose of reconciling the schools of Peter and Paul, and irreconcilable in many of its statements with the epistles of Paul. Those who combated this view showed that the essential points of the book are in the best harmony with the epistles.

An important work proving the authenticity of the Acts is Wieseler's Chronologie des apostolischen Zeitalters (Göttingen, 1848). The Johannine (and, in general, apostolic) origin of the Revelation was even denied by men like Lücke and Neander, on the ground that the passages which do not mention the name of Christ were not written in the spirit that must have proceeded from the same author. Professor Baur and the Tübingen school rejected, on the same ground, the authenticity of the fourth Gospel, while they defended the Johannine origin of the Revelation. The Book of Revelation agrees with John's Gospel in respect to the higher, divine nature of Christ.

The first three Gospels shed but little light on the different tendencies of the apostolic age, though it is generally agreed that the first is of a decidedly Jewish-Christian character, while the third clearly shows the Paulinism of its author. The other books of the New Testament are partly looked upon as leaning on the Pauline tendency (the Epistle to the Hebrews), partly on the Jewish Christians (Epistle of James), and partly on both (Epistles of Peter and Judas). From them, as well as from the earliest apostolic fathers (Barnabas, Clement of Rome, etc.), additional details on the difference of views in the apostolic age were derived.

The apostolic age begins with the time when the apostles themselves began to take an active part in the building of the Christian church; that is, in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost. It coincides, therefore, with the beginning of the Acts. It closes with the death of the apostles and the immediate guidance of the apostles. For the churches in different countries, the apostolic age therefore lasts as long as their immediate guidance through one of the apostles was possible.

The name of apostles is given, 1, to the original twelve, to whom, after the fall of Judas, another was added, to keep up the correspondence with the number of the tribes of Israel; 2, to Paul, and some of his companions. All these had a divine authorization to found congregations and to establish doctrine and institutions. They possessed this authority because they were sent by the Lord himself, not because they were exclusively filled by the Lord with the Spirit, which, on the contrary, was to remain with the church forever.

Gentile and Jewish Christianity must be regarded as two forms of one spirit, which are in inner harmony with each other, and supply each other, and together represent the Anoum of God in the minds of at least the chief apostles. The union was fully cemented at the apostolic council at Jerusalem, at which the apostles for the Jewish Christians and those for the Gentiles mutually recognized each other. The accounts of this council do not conflict, but supply each other.

The question has been frequently discussed to what extent the arrangements made by the apostles can be ascribed to the Saviour himself. With regard to this point, it is safe to ascribe to him the principle, but not the details of execution. The Spirit whom the Saviour left with his disciples organized the church in the name and the power of Jesus. The primitive church had no officers and the development of the church, which is pre-eminently a product of the apostolic age. This subject is ably treated by Rithe in his work on the Origin of the Old Catholic Church (Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche), with particular reference to the works of Roth (Anfänge der christlichen Kirche), Baur (Über den Ursprung der Episkopate), Brunten (Ignatius von Antiochiens), and Schwetzer (Neuapostolische Zeitalter).

The form of worship was undoubtedly very plain, leaving much to the free choice of individual persons and churches; yet its principal features, with regard to the celebration of the Sabbath, the church festivals, and the sacraments, were fixed, and the entire life of the Christian was surrounded with pious customs, partly of new origin and partly derived from Judaism.

In the doctrine of the apostolic age we already find several tendencies, which, however, do not appear as so many different systems, but as different evolutions of one substance. In the fourth century the church recognizes three phases of doctrine in this period, viz., the Jewish Christian, springing directly from the teaching of Christ and from the circle of his disciples; secondly, the Pauline, as given in his own Epistles, and, in a developed form, in the Epistle to the Hebrews; and thirdly, that of the Johannine Gospel and Epistles. This subject is thoroughly discussed by Matthai (Reformationsgeschichte der Apostel Zeit), Usteri (Paulinischer Lehrbegriff), Hilgenfeld (Johanneischer Lehrbegriff), and others.

The chief opposing systems, in conflict with which the apostolic age developed, both its doctrine and its life, were Ebonitism and Gnosticism, each claiming to be the Philadelphia of the apostles and the Pharisian confidence in man's own works, and the other a spiritualistic contempt of all works.

The apostolic age is commonly divided into three periods, one extending from the outpouring of the Holy Spirit until the beginning of the public appearance of Paul (about the year A.D. 41), the second until the death of Paul (about 67), and the third, the Johannine age (until the end of the first century). It must, however, be understood that a tendency began in a former period continued and was further developed in the subsequent one (Herzog, Real-Encyklop. 1, 444).

This very important period has received special attention in the more recent church history. The best books are: Neander, Planting and Training of the Christian Church by the Apostle (trans. by Ryland, Lond. 1851, 2 vols. 12mo); Schaff, History of the Apostolic Church (New York, 1858, 8vo); Stanley, Sermons on the Apostolic Age (Oxford, 1847, 8vo); Davidson, The Ecclesiastical Polity of the New Testament unfolded (24 ed. Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States claim to be apostolic churches, but not exclusively so, as they admit the "Apostolicity" of the Greek and Roman churches, while they deny the title to all non-prelatical churches. The ground of this arrogant assumption is the ecclesiastical theory known as the Apostolic Succession (q.v.). See Duns, Theologia, t. II, § 78: Palmar, On the Church, pt. I, ch. vii; and, for the refutation, Elliott, Delimitation of Romanism, bk. 4, ch. 8; Liddon, On the Church, pt. II. See APOST- TOLIC; APOSTOLIC AGE; (CHURCH) APOSTOLIC; ARCHEOLOGY. Apostolic Church Directory (αἱ διάταγματα ἢ διὰ Κυρίου καὶ ἐνώνων ἐκκλησιαστικῶν τῶν ἡμῶν) a work which originated at the beginning of the 3rd century, and is extant in several Ethiopic and Arabic manuscripts, and in one Greek. Although it agrees in many points with the seventh and eighth books of the Apostolic Constitutions, as well as with the Epistle of Barnabas, it is yet independent of both. It seems to have originated in a work connected with the Epistle of Barnabas, and which, at the same time, was probably made use of by the author of the seventh book of the Constitutions. The Church Directory is divided into 35 articles, and contains prescriptions of John, and ecclesiastical rescripts of the other apostles on bishops, elders, readers, deacons, and the conduct of widows and orphans. Is it possible whether women are to take part in conducting religious services. It concludes with an exhortation of Peter to observe these prescriptions. Bickell (Ge- schiehe des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843, p. 87 sq.) has been the first to call again attention to this collection, which had almost wholly been forgotten. He has also given (p. 107-182), from a Venetian manuscript, the Greek text with German translation, and added various readings of the Latin translation of the Ethiopic text (from Hobb Ludolf's Commentarius in historiam Athiopicam, p. 314 sq.), the only one which had heretofore been printed. There are important, although not decisive, reasons for the assumption that the "Σύνταγμα τῶν Αποστόλων" mentioned by Euse- bius (Hist. Eccl. i. iii. ch. xxv), are identical with the Apostolic Church Directory (Bickell, p. 98).—Her- zog, Real-Encyclopddie, i, 492.

Apostolic Council is a title properly applied to the first convention or synod of the Christian Church authorities, an account of which is given in Acts xv, A.D. 47. The conversion of Cornelius having thrown open the church to Gentiles, many uncircumcised persons were soon gathered into the communion formed at Antioch under the labors of Paul and Barnabas; but, on the latter's departure, the Jewish church, and especially the city church at Jerusalem, a dispute arose as to the admission of such Gentiles as had not even been proselytes to Judaism, but were brought in directly from paganism. To set- tle this question, the brethren at Antioch deputed Paul and Barnabas, with several others, to lay the matter before the Jewish church at Jerusalem, and elders at the mother church at Jerusalem, and obtain their formal and final decision on a point of so vital importance to the progress of the Gospel in all heathen lands. On their arrival and presentation of the sub- ject, a similar opposition (and of a warm character, as one finds from the notices in Gal. ii) was made by Christians formerly of the Pharisaic party at the men- tropolis ; so that it was only when, after considerable dispute, Peter had rehearsed his experience with reference to Cornelius, and the signal results of the Apostolic Church, properly, a church framed upon the principles of the apostles. Of these principles the essential one is the doctrine taught by the apostles; and the principle next in importance the order established by them, so far as it can be gathered from their writings. The apostolicity of the church is an attribute which belongs to it as a Christian society; for no community can establish its claim to the title of church unless there be a substantial agreement between its doctrines and institutions and those of the inspired men whom Christ commissioned to establish his church upon earth" (Littin, On the Church, bk. iii. ch. i). As to the nature of this essential agreement with the apostles, the Christian churches differ with each other.

In the primitive Church, the term apostolic was naturally and properly used to designate those particular churches which had been founded by the personal ministry of any one of the apostles, viz., the churches of Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome. Not unnaturally, too, those churches whose members had superior culture and Christian knowledge, and it therefore became customary for churches in their neighborhood to refer disputed questions of discipline, etc., to them for advice. From these simple beginnings grew up claims to authority, for which the apostles themselves had no foundation either in their writings or in their personal administration (Moisheim, Commentaries, § 21).

The Church of Rome claims to be exclusively the apostolic church. The Church of England and the bors of Paul and Barnabas among the Gentiles had been recounted, that James, as president of the council, pronounced in favor of releasing those received into the church from Gentile without requiring circumcision, thus indicating the importance for the observance of the Mosaic ceremonial law. This conclusion was generally assented to, and promulgated in a regular ecclesiastical form, which was sent as an encyclical letter by Paul and Barnabas back to Antioch, to be thence circulated in all the churches in pagan countries. For an elucidation of the subject, see the notes in the document. See DECREES. For a discussion of the chronological difficulties connected with the subject, see PAUL.—Neander, Planting and Training, i, 133 sq.; Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, i, 212 sq.; Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrat, viii, 263 sq. See COUNCIL.

Apostolic Fathers, a name used to designate those Christian writers (of whom any remains are now extant) who were contemporary with any of the apostles; that is to say, who lived and wrote before A.D. 120. Historically, these writers form a link of connection between the apostles and the Apologists (q. v.). Of the works of these men, we have the following. They are given as those of the Apostolic Fathers, i. e. there are five men who lived during the age of the apostles, and who did converse, or might have conversed with them, to whom writings still extant have been ascribed, viz. Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Justin. The following are the authentically recognized only counseled to these writers: 1. The epistle of Barnabas [see Barnabas]; 2. Two epistles of Clement, bishop of Rome, to the Corinthians [see Clement of Rome]; 3. Several epistles of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch [see Ignatius]; 4. An epistle of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, to the Filippians [see Polycarp]; 5. The epistle of Justin to the Smyrnaeans [see Diognetus]; 6. The book entitled Pastor Hermas [see Hermas]. Certain fragments of Papias are also commonly included among the Apostolic Fathers.

Of the writings attributed to these fathers, some at least are of doubtful genuineness (on this point, see the individual titles referred to). There can be no question of the value of these writings to church history, and even to our knowledge of Scripture, not so much for the facts they contain, for these are of slight importance, or for their critical or doctrinal contents, but on account of the illustrations they afford of the practical religious life of the period, and the testimony they contain from the N. T. Scriptures. "It has often been remarked that there is no period of the Christian church in regard to which we have so little information as that of above thirty years, reaching from the death of Peter and Paul to that of John. There is no good reason to believe that any of the writings of the apostolic fathers now extant were published during that interval. Those of them that are genuine do not convey to us much information concerning the condition of the church, and add but little to our knowledge upon any subject; and what may be gleaned from later writers concerning this period is very dependant and not much to be accepted. It is enough that God has given us in His Word every thing necessary to the formation of our opinions and the regulation of our conduct; and we cannot doubt that He has in mercy and wisdom withheld from us what there is too much reason to think would have been greatly abused. As matters stand, we have two valuable works newly published: first, that we have no certain information—nothing on which, as a mere question of evidence, we can place any firm reliance—as to what the inspired apostles taught and ordained but what is contained in or deduced from the canonical Scriptures; and, secondly, that, at least, are no mean authorities of the books of Scripture, to whom there is anything like a plausible pretense for calling upon us to look up to as guides or oracles" (Cunningham, Historical Theology, vol. i, ch. iv).

It is obvious that the writings of men so near to the time of the writers of the N. T. must be of great importance for the criticism of the N. T., and for the settlement of the canon. Lardner, after giving lists of the citations and allusions to be found in the Apostolic Fathers severally, sums up as follows: "In these writings there is all the notice taken of the books of the New Testament that could be expected. Barnabas, through the influence which he had acquired with the Gospel of St. Matthew, Clement, writing in the name of the Church of Rome to the Church of Corinth on occasion of some discussion there, desires them to "take into their hands the epistle of the blessed apostle Paul," written to them, and refers them particularly to a part of that epistle in which he admonished them against strife and contention. He has likewise, in his epistle, divers clear and undeniable allusions to St. Paul's epistle written to the church over which he presided, and in whose name he wrote, not to mention at present other things. 5. Quotations there could not be, as we have often observed, in the N. T. hastily, but cautiously, there are given to the books of the New Testament such as were suitable to his design. 6. Ignatius, writing to the Church of Ephesus, takes notice of the epistle of Paul written to them, in which he "makes mention of them in Christ Jesus." 7. Lastly, Polycarp, writing to the Philippian fathers, refers to the epistle of Paul "so much esteemed by us"; the word "esteemed" is rendered "worn Paul," written to them, if not also, as I imagine, to the epistles sent to the Thessalonians, Christians of the same province, not to mention now his express quotations of other books of the New Testament, or his numerous and manifest allusions to them.

From these particulars here mentioned, it is apparent that they have not omitted to take notice of any book of the New Testament which, as far as we are able to judge, their design led them to mention. Their silence, therefore, about any other books can be no prejudice to their genuineness, if we shall hereafter meet with credible testimonies to them. And we may have good reason to believe that these Apostolic fathers were some of those persons from whom succeeding writers received that full and satisfactory evidence which they appear to have had concerning the several books of the New Testament" (Lardner, Works, ii, 113 sq.).

The importance of the subject justifies the insertion here of the following elaborate examination of all the citations from the N. T. made by the apostolic fathers, prepared for this work by the Rev. Wolcott Calkins, of Philadelphia. The second epistle of Clement and the larger recension of Ignatius, being regarded as spurious, are not used. The text used is the Vulgate. The abridgments are Clem., for First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians; Bar., Cath. Epistle of Barnabas; Igm. Eph., for Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians; Igm. Magn., Ignatius to the Magnesians; Igm. Tral., Ignatius to the Trallians; Igm. Rom., Ignatius to the Romans; Igm. Phil., Ignatius to the Philippians; Igm. Smyr., Ignatius to the Smyrneans; Igm. Pol., Ignatius to Polycarp; Igm. Polyc., for Epistle of Polycarp to the Filippians; Her. V., for the Visions of Hermas; Her. Mom., the Commands of Hermas; Her. Sim., the Similitudes of Hermas.

1. These fathers bear direct testimony to three of St. Paul's Epistles: Tit. ii, 47; "Take in your hands the epistle of Saint Paul the apostle. What did he write to you when the Gospel first began to be preached? (in aρχην τον ευαγγελιον. Comp. Hefele's Latin version). Truly he was moved of the Spirit to write you concerning himself and Cephas and Apostle, because even after he had begun to form churches of all sorts, this fact did not lead you into the worst sins, because you yielded to apostles so illustrious, and to a man approved by them." Here the reference to 1
Cor. i. 12, is unmistakable. Paul's inspiration is also claimed. (2.) Igm. Eph. 12: "Ye are partakers of the sacred mysteries with Paul, ... who also, throughout his whole epistle (1 Cor. vi. 7), is not every epistle. Credner, Einleit. i, 956, has no ground to claim that this passage has been interpolated from the larger [spurious] recension), makes mention of you in Christ Jesus." Here the reference to Eph. i. 9; ii. 8, is very striking. (3.) Pol. 8: "Neither I, nor any other like me, can snatch unto me a share of the wisdom of Paul, who, when he was with you in the presence of men then living, taught most fully and forcibly the word of truth; and, when absent from you, wrote a letter (1 Tim. iii. 15, 20), which you may be built up in the faith, if you study it attentively." Compare Phil. i. 27. — Pol. 11: "But I have neither perceived nor heard anything of the kind among you, with whom St. Paul labored, who are [praised] in the beginning of his epistle." (Hefele endorses the conjecture that "laudari" has been lost from the text, with the loss of the Greek in ch. x. 11, and Cor. iii. 5. — Her. xii. 4. — Her. xiii. 1.)

11. A few passages of the N. T. are distinctly quoted, either as the language of the Lord, the apostles, or of "Scripture." — Bar. 4: "Let us beware, therefore, lest we be found as it is written, Many are called, few are chosen" (Matt. xx. 16, 22, 14. The signs of quotation in this and the next instance, scriptum est, inquit, are omitted by Barrow, and often from O. T.). — Bar. 7: "So they, inquit, who desire to see me and be received into my kingdom, must reach me through afflictions and sufferings" (Matt. xvi. 24. Compare Hefele, Sendschreiben des Ap. Barn. p. 66 +.).

— Clem. 84: "For, he says, eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man, what things he hath prepared for that which is to come for him" (1 Cor. ii. 9, almost exactly; while both Paul and Clement differ in synonyms, arrangement, and every thing but sentiment, from the Sept. of Is. lxxv., 4, whence Paul quotes). — Clem. 46: "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus: for he said, Woe to that man; it had been good for that man if he had not been born (Matt. xxvi. 21); rather than offend one of my elect (Matt. xviii. 6), it were better for him that a millstone was hanged about him, and that he were drowned in the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones" (Mark i. 42; Luke xvii. 2). Similar examples of citing from various sources over the general divisions of Acta scaurouropov may be found in Clem. Alex. Strm. i. 18, especially frequently in Iren. and Justin Martyr. — Pol. 2: "Mindful of what our Lord said when he taught, 'Judge not, that ye be not judged (Matt. vili. 11, lit.), forgive, and ye shall be forgiven (Luke vi. 67); be merciful, that ye may obtain mercy (Luke vi. 86); in what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again (Matt. vii. 2); and blessed are the poor, and those who suffer persecution, for theirs is the kingdom of God'" (Matt. v. 8; Luke vi. 20). — Pol. 7: "The Lord said, 'The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak'" (Luke xvi. 19). — Pol. 11: "Do we not know that the saints shall judge the world, as St. Paul teaches?" (1 Cor. vi. 2, apparently literal, but the Greek is lost. Credner's ground for suspecting the last clause is singular enough—because Polycarp never gives the name of an author cited! Einl. i. d. N. T. p. 445.)

— Pol. 12: "As is said in these Scriptures, Be ye therefore perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect (Matt. v. 48), without acknowledgment); and, let not the sun go down upon your wrath" (Eph. iv. 26; 0. and N. T. blended as "scriptures"). These are believed to be the only examples of explicit citations with marks of quotation, except such as may have been taken from the Septuagint. Alleged misquotations will be discussed in the sequel.

111. Many passages are cited with substantial accuracy, but without indications of quotation. — Bar. 19: "Give to every one that asketh thee" (Luke vi. 30, itt., if, with MSS. B K L, 181-57, &c, omitted, and ἦν with B; Matt. v. 42, nearly). — Igm. Rom. 8: "For the things which are not seen, but hoped for, which are not seen are eternal" (2 Cor. iv. 18, lit. But the passage is doubtful; not found in anc. Lat. vers., Syrian fragm., nor Syr.). — Clem. 2: "Ready for every good work" (Titus iii. 1, i.e, for πρόγονος). — Clem. 36: "Who being the brightness of his majesty (μετ' ουλαφλογειος for ουλαφλογειος), is so much better than the angels, who has obtained a more excellent name" (Heb. i. 4, 8). — Igm. Rom. 6: "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" (Matt. xvi. 26, slight change in arrangement). — Pol. 1: "In whom, not having seen, ye believe; and believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable" (1 Pet. i. 8, with slight omission). — Pol. 2: "Believing on him that raised our Lord Jesus Christ from the dead, and gave him glory" (1 Pet. i. 21, slight change in arrangement). — Her. Sim. 8: "They denied the name by which they were called" (Ias. ii. 7, far more exact than appears in Eng. versions; quod super eum erat invocatum = τινι Ιουνιους Ιωανας. — Pol. 2: "If ye resist him, he will flee from you with confusion" (Ias. iv. 7). — Pol. 5: "Lust warreth against the spirit (1 Pet. ii. 11); and neither fornicators, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, shall inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. vi. 9, 10: the passage is remarkable, because, while many words in Paul are omitted, and others altered, and things acquired a scandalously technical signification, are retained. Comp. the long list of sins in Clem. iii. and Rom. i. 29-32. The resemblance is remarkable).

— Pol. 4: "The love of money is a beginning of all evil. Knowing, therefore, that we brought nothing into this world, but neither can we carry anything out, let us," etc. (1 Tim. vi. 7, the order of clauses transposed. Compare Pol. 8; 1 Pet. ii, 22, 24). — Pol. 2: "Not rendering evil for evil, nor railing for railing" (1 Pet. iii. 9, lit.). — Pol. 7: "For whoever confeseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is Antichrist" (1 John iv. 8). The following list embraces accurate quotations and very striking resemblances.

Her. Matr. 8 = Eph. iv. 30. 4 = Luke xvi. 12. "1 = Matt. v. 27. "12 = 12, 6 = Jas. iv. 7. Pol. 1 = 1 Cor. xi. 19. 2 = 1 Pet. ii. 6. 1 = 1 Pet. i. 6. 2 = 2 Cor. iv. 9. 3 = Heb. xiv. 25. 5 = Heb. xi. 22. 6 = Heb. xiv. 12. 3 = Cor. viii. 21. 8 = 1 John vi. 4. 6 = Matt. xii. 19. 10 = 1 Pet. ii. 29. 11 = 1 Thess. xi. 15. 7 = Gal. i. 7.

IV. Many extended passages in the Ap. Fathers are close imitations of similar passages in N. T. — Clem. 9-12: The examples of the ancient worthies is adduced on the model of Heb. xi. The list not only corresponds —Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Lot, Rahab— but many expressions agree. And the magnificent close of the chap. 11, in which Rahab is reported as being crowned in Clem. 45. He then begins ch. 46, like Heb. xii, with a reference to these examples for our encouragement. Heb. xii. 1, is, however, reproduced still more accurately in ch. 19. — Clem. 36 is a close imitation of the beginning of Heb. i. — Her. Sim. xiv. 21: A parallel phrase is found in the beginn. of the sent. 23. (Comp. Herm. Vis. iii. 6. Also, Sim. ix. 20, and Clem. xiii. 7; xix. 23. Also, Vis. iv. 8, and 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. — Pol. 5: The advice to deacons is a remarkable imita-

of Paul's charge to Timothy (ch. iii.).—Clm., 49: The praise of charity, closely imitating 1 Cor. xiii.; following also Col. iii., 14; 1 Pet. iv., 8; Jas. v., 20; Gal. i., 4; John iii., 16; 1 John iv., 9, 10. There is not a thought in the whole chapter which is not to be found in N. T. Besides the above, there are many expressions apparently taken from the N. T.; also allusions and references too inexact to be called quotations, which singly might appear insignificant, but occurring on every page are weighty arguments. Westcott (Casson N. T., p. 38, 40, 41) gives many examples of coincidence in language which prove the N. T. the source of the N. T. (1) Peculiar to Clement and St. Peter: ἐγκλαυτίως, ποιμήν. (2) Peculiar to Clement, St. Peter, and St. Paul: ἀγάθη συνίδρυσις, ἀγάμος, ἱλιον, εὐδοκία, ἐπισκόπωσις, ταυτοφορία, εὐσεβία, ἱππόφωνος, φιλελεύθερος, φιλοσοφικός, φιλόποις. (3) Peculiar to Peter and Paul: ἀμαραρχός, ἀυγοφόρως, λαογράφος, λαογραφία, λατρευτός, μανοχαος, στυχων, ποιητής, ποιοτότατος. (4) Peculiar to Ignatius and St. Paul, very numerous, e. g.: ἀδικός, ἰδιώτης, ἰδιάρρηχος, συνιδρύω, etc. (5) Peculiar to Ignatius and St. John: ἀγάθη, ἀγάμος, ὁ ἀγάμος, ἡ ἀγάμη, ὁ ἅγιος, ὁ ἅγιος ἄγιος, etc.— Clm. iv., 5, 6. (6) Peculiar to Polycarp and St. Paul: ἀναπλαξα, ἀργοβόλο, ἀφαντώματος, τὸ καλὸν, μεταφορά, προφήτης. Of the allusions and references no enumerations need be given, as they will be found indicated in the foot-notes of every page of Hefele's edition, and massed together in his index.

VI. In a few instances these fathers appear to make misquotations; i. e. they cite as "words of the Lord," or of "Scripture," what is nowhere to be found in the N. T.—So Bar. 4: "The Son of God says let us resist all iniquity, and hold it in hatred." This is not to be found in the N. T., nor, as far as is known, in any apocryphal gospel. It must have been taken from some tradition, or the more sentiment may have been cited from Jas. iv., 7, or 2 Tim. ii., 19—ἀποτίμητος ἀξίας; and Ps. cxix., 163—ἀτίμων ῥήμασις.—Bar. 6: "Belshith, saith the Lord, I will make the last things like the first." This may be a loose quotation of Matt. xx., 16, Comp. Ps. liii., 23. Therefore this was a text in this scripture which saith, Wretched are they who are double minded and doubtful; saying, we have heard these things even from the time of our fathers, and, behold, we have grown old, and none of these things have happened to us." This is supposed by some to be taken from the Sept. which they knew; but this is not probable, and does (at least) fail to indicate the precise source). Others regard it as a careless citation of Jas. i., 8, and 2 Pet. iii., 4. Both explanations are unsatisfactory. It may be a mere blunder of Clement.—Igm. Smpr. 3: "And when he came to those who were with Peter, he said unto them, Take, hand me, and see that I am not a disembodied spirit." Probably this passage would never have been suspected as it has been but for the remark of Eusebius (Hist. Ec., cxvi, 26) that he did not know whence Ignat. cited, and the conjecture of Jerome (De Vir. Il. i. 16) that it was from the Gospel of the Nazarenes. Pearson suspects an oral tradition. (Comp. Codd. Bezae, i. 407.) But the imitation of Luke, xxiv, 39, is quite as close as many unchallenged quotations. But the most remarkable fact about these false citations is yet to be mentioned: they are not confined to the N. T. Thus, Bar. 9: "The Scriptures relate that Abraham circumcised three hundred and seventy-five young men and built an altar.; it is doubtful if he would have found it to be a sufficient answer for their purpose, merely from recollection. The unrolling of immense parchments, even if they carried them, was a useless trouble in hurried writing, amid the pressure of missionary journeys. If Strauss had made a candid examination of these facts, he would not have found it to be a sufficient answer to the present charge to say that it was written by eye-witnesses, or even by persons nearly contemporaneous with the events narrated." (Leben Jesu, i, § 13.)

Apostolical Men; a name often given to the apostles and disciples of the apostles. Those among them who left writings received the name Apostolical Fathers (q. v.).

Apostolical Succession. See SUCCESSION.

Apostolici, or Apostolicko Brothers, (1.) a sect of heretics mentioned by St. Augustine (De Haeres. xi), who says that they arrogated to themselves the title of apostolici, because they refused to admit to their communion all persons using marriage, or having property of their own, not that they were heretical, but because they desired to free themselves from those under whom they held that those persons had no hope of salvation who did not so do. They were similar to the Encriates, and were also called Apostolici. (2.) A sect with this same arose in the twelfth century, who condemned marriage and infant baptism, also purgatory, privy, and the public fast of Ash Wednesday, and the power. They were of the pope, etc. Many of them were put to death at Cologne (Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xii, pt. ii, ch. v, § 15). (3.) Another apostolic brotherhood was founded by Gerhard Segarelli, of Parma, about A.D. 1290. This brotherhood Pope Nicolas IV endeavoured to suppress by various decrees of 1286 and 1290. No history of this sect is preserved, and no account of the pope; but they held there were a cloack of gray cloth, with a little hood. They afterward united with the monks of St. Ambrose, at a period named, then dissolved the connection, then renewed by Sixtus V, and finally both were suppressed by Innocent X in 1656.—H. Berth, Ord. Monast. i, 1; Brüll, Gesch. der Mönche, Dichononary.

Apostolici, Michaelis, a learned Greek of the 15th century. He delivered the funeral oration over the body of the Emperor Constantin Paleologus, who was killed in the storming of the city of Constantinople by the Turks. When the city was taken by the Turks in 1483 he escaped to Italy, where, to please Cardinal Bessarion, he wrote against Theodore of Gaza. But his abuse of Aristotle displeased the cardinal, and Apostolus retired into Crete, where he gained a hard livelihood by copying MSS. and teaching children. He died about 1480 at Venice, leaving many manuscripts, which are still extant in European collections.—Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graec., 1 xi; Hoefer, Neue Biog. Générale, ii, 914.

Apostolus, Samuel, a Mennonite, was born in 1688, and was minister of a church of the Waterlander (a branch of the Dutch Baptist) at Amsterdam. In 1692 he distinguished himself by his opposition to Hans Galenus, who taught that Christianity is not so much a body of opinions as a practical life. Apostolus, on the contrary, insisted on the necessity of doctrine, and also of the especial views of the Mennonites. Galenus was charged with Socinianism and acquitted, and Apostolus and his friends had to form a separate church. His followers were called Apostolians. He lived up to nearly the end of the century.—Schyn, Hist. Mennon. p. 327; Hoefer, Biog. Générale, ii, 914; Moesheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xvii, ch. v, § 7. See GALENUS; Mennonites.

Apostolic or Apolostistic (from ἀπόστολος, a sent or an apostle), an ancient sect, who, affecting to follow the evangelical counsels of poverty and the example of the primitive Christians, renounced all their possessions. They seem to have been the same as the Apostolic or the Tatianites. During the persecution of Diocletian they had many martyrs; and subsequently adopted the errors of the Euchites, who deemed marriage and unchastity to be the same thing.

Apothecary (ἀποθηκαῖον, robi, ἀσεμονία, 1. c. with aromatics; Sept. μαρφάος, Exod. xxx, 26; xxxvii, 29; Ex. x, 1), correctly rendered in the margin “perfumer,” so also in Eccles. xxxviii, 8; xlii, 1; the word means also anything spiced (1 Chron. ix, 30); hence, ointment, confection (Exod. xxx, 35). The holy oils and ointments were probably prepared by one of the priests who had properly qualified himself in Egypt, where unguents were in great use. See ANointing. Roberts (Oriental Illustrations, p. 80) states that in Hindoo temples there is a man called Thuk-Karan, whose chief business it is to distil sweet waters from sweets, and to extract oils from wood, flowers, and other substances. From our version having rendered the word “apothecary” it would seem to indicate that the business of a perfumer was not distinguished from that of an apothecary in the time of the translators. Thus Shakspeare, a contemporary writer, says,

An ounce of eves, good apothecary,
To sweeten mine imagination.

Indeed perfumery is almost inseparable from a druggist’s stock in trade. Sacred oil appears to have been as copiously used by the heathen nations as it was in the Jewish tabernacle and temple, and during the patriarchal economy; the Sanscrit writers prove its retention in the present religious services of India, and that it was adopted in the more ancient we have the authority of Strabo (lib. xv), where he refers to a ceremony which calls to the mind the words of the psalmist, that it ran down upon Aaron’s beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments (Psa. cxxxiii, 2). Sir William Ouseley, also (Trans. of Persia, i, 301), mentions the statue of a man at Shapur, which, according to the Nozhat al-Colib, princes went on pilgrimages to visit and anoint with oil. See PERFUMES.

 Apparel (Heb. ἀρρύτημα, ἡ νυφίν, the nootri; Sept. ἀρρυτήμα τοῦ ἀρρυτοῦ, the second named of the two sons of Nadab, and the father of Ishi, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 30, 31). B.C. ante 1638.

Apparel (usually designated in Heb. by יָפָה, ἱδνύος, “dress,” or some form of ἀρρυτήμα, ἱδνύος, “clothing,” ἰδύος, ἵματος, etc.), especially Hebrew. See GARMENT; CLOTHING; RAIMENT, etc.

This was usually, as the eastern climate necessitated, wide and flowing (comp. Olear, Reisen. p. 307), but concerning its precise cut we find nothing indicated in the O. T. books, except with regard to that of the priesthood. See PRIEST. But as customs change but little among Orientals, we may probably get a pretty exact idea of the ancient Hebrew fashion from a comparison with modern Eastern, especially Arabic costume (see especially Ar- vieux, Trav. iii, 241 sq.; Niebuhr, Bevölker. p. 62 sq.). See DRESS. The dimensions of dress upon the Oriental monuments (such as the ruins of Babylon, Persepolis, Nineveh, and, to some extent, Egypt) are useful for this purpose, especially for the later period (namely, during the exile, when the Jews wore Chaldean garments, Dan, ii, 21). For the earlier period see the Gemara (Shabbath, xvi, 4).

Male and female apparel then, as now, did not essentially differ; but a lady was easily recognised.
for the most part by single pieces of female attire, and especially by ornaments, and moreover the costliness of material in the head-dresses made a distinction between the sexes sufficient to meet the demands of the law (Deut. xxii, 5) forbidding men to wear women's garments and the reverse. (See, however, Josephus, War, iv, 9, 10. The reason usually assigned for this statute is the prevention of confusion, and especially licentiousness, see Mill, Dissert. p. 203 sq.; Michaelis, Mos. Recht. iv, 249 sq. Others, as Le Clerc after Maimonides, regard the prohibition as a preventive of certain forms of idolatry which required men to sacrifice in female apparel, and the reverse, see Macrobi. Saturn. ii, 8, 22, ed. Bip.; Philochor. Fragm. ed. Siebelis, p. 19 sq.; comp. Jul. Firmic. De errort profan. ref. c. 4; also Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 54 sq.; and generally Pezold, De promiscua vestium utrinque sexu usurpatione, Lips. 1702, and in Ugolini, Theaur. xxix. This interpretation is sustained by a statement of Maimonides, More Nevicken, iii, 27; comp. Movers, Pönic. i, 445 sq. Many Jews, however, understand the textual expression יִרְבּוּשָׁנָא, literally "utensil of a man," to signify male weapons, so Onkelos in loc.; a view which is adopted by Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 43.) The subject of female apparel has been especially treated by Schröder (De vestitiis mulier. Ieb. Lugd. B. 1740) and Hartmann (Hebräeram am Pasteische, Amst. 1849). The manufacture of garments was in all ages the business of the women, especially the females of the family, and even distinguished ladies did not excuse themselves from the employment (1 Sam. ii, 10; Prov. xxxi, 22 sq.). See Wife. The only legal enactment on the subject was that wool and linen should not be used in the same article of apparel (Lev. xix, 19; Deut. xxii, 11), a prescription probably not designed (as thought by Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 11) to forbid the priests any intermixture of materials, but to be explained after the analogy of the foregoing prohibition of heterogeneity (see Michaelis, Mos. R. iv, 319 sq.) See Diverse. The articles of clothing common to men and women, then, were: (1) The under garment, קֶּשֶׁ- נֶחַ, κέσον, χύρων, or תּוּנִית [see Coat], which was held together by the girdle (q. v.), and besides which a linen shirt, כַּנָּן, καδίν, is sometimes mentioned (Isa. iii, 28; Judg. xiv, 12; Prov. xxix, 24). In common language of the ancients, a person who had only this under garment on was called "naked" (1 Sam. xix, 24; Job xxxiv, 10; Isa. xx, 2; comp. Virg. Geor. i, 229), a term that is sometimes applied also to one poorly clad (Job xxiii, 6; Isa. xi, 7; 2 Sam. vi, 20; see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1071). Those in high station or travellers (comp. Joseph. Ant. xxii, 5, 7) sometimes wore two under garments, like a double shirt, the other (which was always longer than the inner) one being then called לַבְּשָׁנָא, met, a robe or "upper garment" (1 Sam. xv. 27; xviii, 4; xxxiv, 5; Job. i. 20. The Greeks and Romans likewise, as perhaps also the Persians, were acquainted with this habit (comp. Herod. i, 195; Ovid, Fasti, ii, 819; Salmas. ad Tertull. pafl. p. 71); but the custom appears to have been always regarded by the Jews as luxurious (Matt. x, 10; Luke iii, 11; 1x, 8; comp. Lightfoot, p. 33; and Groebel, in the Miscell. Lipp. xii, 137 sq.). A Chaldean costume was the לִבְּשָׁנָא, pattič, or mantle (Dan. ii, 8, 21), probably a flowing under-dress (see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1101). (2) An outer garment [see Romes], which was thrown around the person, called הַנִּמְלָח, simlah, and לַמְלָח, lamlah, or mantle, also לַבְּשָׁנָא, bez' ged, a piece of cloth generally, jugaev, especially with females the לַבְּשָׁנָא, mitpach'ath, or cloak, pallia, otherwise לִבְּשָׁנָא, ma'daphak, or mamilla (Ruth iii, 15; Isa. iii, 22), also לִבְּשָׁנָא, adde' retch, or wide mantle, paullion (Josh. vii, 21; 1 Kings xix, 18; 2 Kings ii, 13), the last designating a particular kind of very loose and flowing robe, sometimes (Gen. xxv, 20; Zach. xiii, 4) lined with fur, such as the Orientals (Turks) even wear in summer (see Thevenot, Voyages, i, 284; Russel, Allepo, i, 127; Harmer, Observ. iii, 4 sq.). Poor people and travellers also used the outer garment as night clothes. See Couch. Both sexes made, out of the superabundant folds in front, a pocket or lap, לִבְּשָׁנָא, cheyk, or "bosom," sinaw (Ruth iii, 15; Psa. lxxix, 12; Prov. xvii, 28; 2 Kings iv, 89; Hag. ii, 12; Luke vi, 38; comp. Liv. xvi, 18; Horace, Serm. ii, 3, 171 sq. ; Senec. Ep. 19; Joseph. War, v, 7, 4; vi, 8, 3; see Wetstein, i, 996; Kype, Observ. i, 288), into which the hand was thrust by the eloquent (Psa. lxxix, 11), Variegated (on the μαλακόι or fine purple and byzous garments of Matt. xi, 8, see Biel, in the Symbol. Danis. i, 79 sq.) and embroidered raiments were reserved for occasions of ceremony (Josh. vii, 21; Judg. v, 49; 2 Sam. i, 24; xiii, 18; Prov. xxxi, 22; Esth. viii, 15; Ezek. xvi, 10; see Harmer, iii, 189 sq.; Rosenmüller.

Morgell, iii, 140), although even children (Gen. xxvii.; 3; comp. Kauff., Reisen, p. 89) were habited in them (for so the wont, bethokethpassim, Gen. xxvii., 25, 32: 2 Sam. xiii, 18, 19, is probably to be understood, with the Sept., Onkelos, Saadia, and others; but the Hebrew verbs do not seem properly to fit the feet, ankles, as Josephus explains, Am. vii., 8, 1; but see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 1117; on the וִיָּמִד, pashghih, or brodered festive garment of Isa. iii, 24, see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 1157), and were sometimes part of the prey taken from enemies (Zeph. i, 8). See MERCHANT; WEAVING. White (byssus and linen), however (see PRIEST), was naturally in most esteem for garments (comp. as a mother of hallowed things, 1 Sam. xxvii, 1; 2 Sam. xix, 12; xvi, 11; Luke xxii, 11; Josephus, War, ii, 1, 1; Dougtauel Analext. ii, 57; Schmid, De usu vestium albor. in Ugolino Tlescher. xxiv. See LINEN; FULLER. Generals especially wore red (scarlet) robes (Judg. viii, 26; Nah. ii, 4; Isa. lxviii, 1; see below). Luxurious apparel was no doubt increasing in fashion under the later kings (Jer. iv, 30; Ezek. xvi, 10 sq.; Zeph. i, 8; Lam. iv, 5), and prevailed among the Jews down to the apostles' times (1 Tim. ii, 9; 1 Pet. iii, 1, 3; see Dougtauel Analext. ii, 23 sq.). A form of delicate raiment in use by pius (sanctionless) persons is mentioned (Luke xxi, 46; comp. Matt. xxi, 5). See SEAM. On rendering a garment to its owner, see PRIEST; on the way, see COURTESY. Shaking the garments in the presence of any one (Acts xviii, 6) was a symbolical declaration that the party would have nothing more to do with him (see Heumann, Parerga, p. 213 sq.).

(5) Priests alone wore drawers [see BREACHES], but they are now in almost universal use in the East by men and women (Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 62, 65; Reisen, i, 158; so also among the ancient Medes and Persians long trousers were worn, Herod. vii, 40; Xen. Cyrop. viii, 3, 13; Strabo, ii, 52; and so many understand τὸ κεφαλίνον, "coats," of Dan. iii, 21, 27, see Lengeri in loc., while others understand mantles, as being altogether more agreeable to Babylonian usage, see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 960 sq. (4) Both sexes covered the head with a turban. See HEAD-DRESS. Women likewise wore net-caps (reticulated hoods), frontlets (forehead bands), and probably veils. See CALT; BONNET; FRONTLET; VEIL. (5.) On the covering of the head, see SANDAL; SHOE. Gloves (Πάντας or Πάντων) were not unknown, yet they appear not to have been used as a part of the attire, but by workmen as a protection of the hands from innumerable soiling agents (Cic. Nat. D. i, 22, 145; Domit. ii, 15, xvi, 3; see an essay on the gloves of the Hebrews, in the Winer Zeitschr. f. Kunst und Literatur. 1877. No. 71 sq. a man's glove, τὰ χειλάτια, scartâ, is mentioned in the Targum on Ruth iv, 7).

The Orientals are still very fond of changes (q. v.) of raiment, especially of robes of state on holidays or festive occasions (Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 102; Burckhardt, Am. iv, 272; Herder, ii, 447), hence rich Hebrews had their change-suits of apparel (יוֹךְּנָאָכָא), like the Greek φιλόποι, φιλοπόιοι, Odys., vii, 316; γιγαντίας, γιγαντιαίοι, xiv, 514), and to a super-residence there always appertained a goodly wardrobe (יוֹךְָנָאָכָא, mellaκhah, clothes-press, 2 Kings xix, 22; see Prov. xxxi, 16; Job xxviii, 1; Prov. xiv, 22); Comp. Bochart, Hieroz. iii, 517; Rosenmüller, Morgell. iii, 350; Jacob, ad Lucian Tocax. p. 160). Especially did kings and nobles possess a stock of state and ceremonial dresses (יוֹךְָנָאָכָא,Delegate,Pashghih, or festive garments, for special occasions, Isa. iii, 22; Zech. iii, 4) for presents (Gen. xxiv, 22; Esth. iv, 4; vi, 8, 11; 1 Sam. xviii, 4; 2 Kings v, 5; x, 22; comp. also Judg. xiv, 12, 19; see Tavernier, i, 207, 272; Harmer, ii, 112; iii, 447; among the Persians head-dresses appear to have been likewise royal presents, Esth. vi, 8; x comp. Heeren, Ideen, i, i, 216); hence among the court officers is mentioned a custodian of the wardrobe (יוֹךְּנָאָכָא, shomer 'ab-beygamim, keeper of the clothes, 2 Chron. xxxiv, 22). See GIFT. Persons changed their clothes for religious reasons, when they had become ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi, 27, 29; xiv, 11, 26; xv, 18, etc.; comp. Gen. xxxvi, 2). Those in eminent stations and females adorned and perfumed their garments (Psa. xlv, 9; Cant. iv, 11). See ATTIRE.

Mourning apparel (יוֹכְָנָאָכָא, sakkîm, weeds, i. e. sackcloth) were of coarse stuff (as still in the East), narrow and without sleeves. See MOURNING; SACKCLOTH. Prophets and ascetics also wore these garments (Jer. ii, 34; Matt. iii, 7; 4; see Gesenius, Comment. ad. Jesa. i, 644). Court officers (1 Kings x, 5; Isa. xxii, 21) wore a distinctive dress. See KING; PRIEST. (Comp. generally J. H. Sopran, De re vestium Heb. in his Comment. de Davide, Lugd. 1645.) See ATTIRE.

The malignant leprosy (יוֹכְָנָאָכָא, tarzasakh, meneh, retting scar), which attacked not only clothing, but also skin and leather, consisted of green and reddish spots; but its true character has not yet been explained. It was probably some form of mould engendered by dampness or confinement. Michaelis (Mind. R. iv, 265 sq.) supposed it to be the so-called wool-rot (i. e. wool from diseased sheep; see Hebenstreit, Curem, op. cit., exc. exemplum, p. 24); others explain it of small insects, not cognizable by the eye, that appear green or red, and corrode the wool (Jahn, i, ii, 165). That also linen stuff (ver. 48, יוֹכְָנָאָכָא) might be similarly affected, is improbable (comp. Michaelis, in Berthold's Journ. iv, 965 sq.); and to understand cotton material to be meant is very arbitrary. See LINEN. This subject can only be cleared up by an investigation in the East.

Among Greek and Roman articles of apparel mentioned in the Bible are the χαλαµής, or cloak, a wide overcoat or mantle, which hunters (Lucian, Dial. deor. xi, 8), soldiers, especially horsemen (Böckh, Staatsbautz. i, 118), and their officers wore (2 Macc. xii, 50); the φαλαµής or φαλαινή, penda (Talm. Melakh. 15b), travelling or rain-coat (2 Tim. iv, 13), which was worn by the Romans over the tunic (Suet. Ner. 48), and was furnished with a hood for the protection of the head (Cic. Mil. 20; Juven. vii, 77; Senec. Ep. 67, p. 529, ed. Bip.; Horace, Ep. i, 11, 18; comp. Wetstein, ii, 366; Stosh, De pullo Pauli, Lugd. 1760), according to others a portmantain or book-satchel (see the comments of Strabo, v, 3, 10 sq.; comp. H. von Horn, De χαλαµῆς κοσκίνῳ, χιαµάς purpurae, Donat.) or purple robe (Matt. xxvii, 28), a woolen scarlet mantle, bordered with purple, which Roman generals and officers (Liv. i, 26; Tac. xii, 56; Hirt, Hirt. Afr. 51) wore (Larat. polisamentum) at first (Eutrop. ix, 20)—Winer, i, 661.

APPELLAR, or MINISTERS. See CALT, DRESSES OF.

APPARITION (ἐναπαύνεια, 2 Macc. v, 4; ἐναλαμπέω, Wisd. xvii, 3; φανεράμβω, Wisd. xvii, 15, 14), the sudden appearance of a "ghost" or the spirit of a departed person (comp. Luke xxiv, 37), or some other preternatural object. See SPECTRE. The belief in such occurrences has always been prevalent in the East; and among the modern Mohammedans the existence and manifestation of effects is held an undoubted reality (Lane's Mod. Eg. i, 944). See SUPERSTITION. Such a belief, however, has no sanction in the canonical Scriptures beyond the doubtful case of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii, 14). See WITCHCRAFT. The visits of Christ to his disciples in his resurrection come under altogether a different category. See APPEARANCE.

APPARTOR, an officer who summons others to appear. Among the Romans this was a general term to comprehend all attendants of judges and magistrates appointed to receive and issue their orders (Smith's Christ, we have some clearer knowledge from Josephus and the Talmudists. After the institution of the Sanhedrim the final appeal lay to them, and the various stages through which a case might pass are thus described by the Talmudists—from the local consistory before which the case was first tried to the consistory that sat in the neighboring town; thence to the courts of Jerusalem; and finally, in the year 29, that sat in the gate of Shushan, proceeding to the court that sat in the gate of Nicamor, and concluding with the great council of the Sanhedrim that sat in the room Gazith (Carpzov, Appar., p. 571). The Jews themselves trace the origin of these later usages up to the time of Moses: they were, at all events, based on Jewish law, and early popular定制; and they were therefore based upon the intimations respecting the right of appeal which we find in the sacred books (Mishna, De Synedr. x; Talm. Hieros. xviii; Talm. Bab. iii. x; Maimon. De Synedr. x; Selden, De Synedr. iii. 10; Lewis, Origines Hébraées, i, 6; Pastorel, Législation des Hébreux, x). See TRIAL.

II. Roman.—The most remarkable case of appeal in the New Testament is that of the Apostle Paul from the tribunal of the Roman procurator Festus to that of the emperor, in consequence of which he was sent as a prisoner to Rome (Acts xxv, 10, 11). Such an appeal having been once lodged, the governor had nothing further to do with the case, as it was one of law only. Paul, however, dismisit, although he might be satisfied that the matter was frivolous, and not worth forwarding to Rome. Accordingly, when Paul was again heard by Festus and King Agrippa (merely to obtain materials for a report to the emperor), it was admitted that the apostle might have been liberated if he had not appealed to Caesar (Acts xxvi, 22). Paul might therefore seem to have taken a false step in the matter, did we not consider the important consequences which resulted from his visit to Rome (see Conybeare and Howson, i, 102). But, as no decision had been given, there could be no appeal, properly speaking, in his case: the language used (Acts xxv, 9) implies the right on the part of the accused of electing either to be tried by the provincial magistracy or by the emperor. Since the procedure in the Jewish courts at that period was of a mixed and undefined character, the Roman and the Jewish courts were co-existing and carrying on the course of justice between them, Paul might have availed of his undoubted privilege to be tried by the pure Roman law. It may easily be seen that a right of appeal which, like this, involved a long and expensive journey, was by no means frequently resorted to. In lodging his appeal Paul exercised one of the high privileges reserved to the Roman citizens, and submitted him by lictor (Acts xxvi, 28). See CIVILIZATION.
