The hands, for occasionally both were required, bore grease during the process of eating, were anciently cleaned by rubbing them with the soft part of the bread, the crumbs of which, being allowed to fall, became the portion of dogs (Matt. xv, 27; Luke xxv, 21). But the most common way now at the conclusion of a feast is for a servant to go round to each guest with water to wash, a service which is performed by the menial pouring a stream over their hands, which is received into a strainer at the bottom of the basin. This humble office Ellaha performed to his master (2 Kings iii, 11). See Ewes.

People of rank and opulence in the East frequently give public entertainments to the poor. The rich man in the parable, whose guests disappointed him, dispatched his servants on the instant to invite those that might be found sitting by the hedges and the highways—a measure which, in the circumstances, was absolutely necessary, as the best of the climate would spoil the meats long before they could be consumed by the members of his own household. But many of the great, from benevolence or ostentation, are in the habit of proclaiming set days for giving feasts to the poor; and then, at the time appointed, may be seen crowds of the blind, the halt, and the maimed bending their steps to the scene of entertainment. This species of charity claims a venerable antiquity. Our Lord recommended his wealthy hearers to practice it rather than spend their fortunes, as they did, on luxurious living (Luke xiv, 12); and such invitations to the poor are of necessity given by public proclamation, and female messengers are employed to publish them (Hasselqost saw ten or twelve thus perambulating a town in Egypt). It is probably to the same venerable practice that Solomon alludes in Prov. ix, 3—Kitt, s.v. See FEAST.

Among the Hebrews banquets were not only a means of social enjoyment, but were a part of the observance of religious festivity. At the three solemn festivals, when all the males appeared before the Lord, the family also had its domestic feast, as appears from the place and the share in it to which "the widow, the fatherless, and the stranger" were legally entitled (Deut. xvi, 11). Probably, when the distance allowed and no inconvenience hindered, both males and females went up (e.g. to Shiloh; 1 Sam. i, 9) together to hold the festival. These domestic festivities were doubtless to a great extent retained, after laxity had set in as regards the special observance by the male sex (Neh. viii, 17). Sacrifices, both ordinary and extraordinary, as among heathen nations (Exod. xxxiv, 15; Judg. xvi, 28), included a banquet, and Eli's sons made this latter the prominent part. The two, thus united, marked strongly both domestic and civil life. It may even be said that some sacrificial recognition, if only in pouring the blood solemnly forth as before God, always attended the slaughter of an animal for son and heir, a marriage, the separation or reunion of friends, and sheep-shearing, were customarily attended by a banquet or revel (Gen. xxi, 8; xxix, 22; xxxii, 27, 54; 1 Sam. xxv, 2, 86; 2 Sam. xiii, 28). At a funeral, also, refreshment was taken in common by the mourners, and this might tend to become a scene of indulgence, but ordinarily abstemiousness seems on such occasions to have been the rule. The case of Archelaus is not conclusive, but his inordinate gorging and alien usages was doubtless shared by the Herodianising Jews (Jer. xi, 5—7; Ezek. xxiv, 17; Hos. ix, 4; Eccl. vii, 2; Josephus, War, ii, 1). Birthday-banquets are only mentioned in the cases of Pharaoh and Herod (Gen. xi, 20; Matt. xiv, 6). A leading topic of prophetic rebukes is the abuse of festivals to an occasion of drunken revelry, and the growth of fashion in favor of drinking-parties. Such was the invitation typically given by Jeremiah to the Rechabites (Jer. xxxvi, 5). The usual time of the banquet was the evening, and to begin early was a mark of excess (Isa. v, 11; Eccl. x, 10). The slaughtering of the cattle, which was the preliminary of a banquet, occupied the earlier part of the same day (Prov. i, 2; Isa. xxii, 13; Matt. xxii, 4). The most essential materials of the banquet—room, next to the viands and wine, which last was often drugged with spices (Prov. i, 2; Cant. viii, 5), were garlands or loose flowers, exhibitions of music, singers, and dancers, riders, jesters, and merriments (Isa. xxviii, 1; Wisd. ii, 6; 2 Sam. xix, 85; Isa. xxxv, 6; 12; Judg. xiv, 12; Neh. viii, 10; Eccl. x, 19; Matt. xxi, 11; Amos vi, 5, 6; Luke xvi, 20). Seven days was a not uncommon duration of a festival, especially for a wedding, but sometimes fourteen (Tob. viii, 19; Gen. xxix, 27); and perhaps the more the merrier (Isa. xxviii, 1; Wisd. ii, 6; 2 Sam. xix, 85; Isa. xxxv, 6; 12; Judg. xiv, 12; Neh. viii, 10; Eccl. x, 19; Matt. xxi, 11; Amos vi, 5, 6; Luke xvi, 20). Seven days was a not uncommon duration of a festival, especially for a wedding, but sometimes fourteen (Tob. viii, 19; Gen. xxix, 27); and perhaps the more the merrier (Isa. xxviii, 1; Wisd. ii, 6; 2 Sam. xix, 85; Isa. xxxv, 6; 12; Judg. xiv, 12; Neh. viii, 10; Eccl. x, 19; Matt. xxi, 11; Amos vi, 5, 6; Luke xvi, 20). Seven days was a not uncommon duration of a festival, especially for a wedding, but sometimes fourteen (Tob. viii, 19; Gen. xxix, 27); and perhaps the more the merrier (Isa. xxviii, 1; Wisd. ii, 6; 2 Sam. xix, 85; Isa. xxxv, 6; 12; Judg. xiv, 12; Neh. viii, 10; Eccl. x, 19; Matt. xxi, 11; Amos vi, 5, 6; Luke xvi, 20) Seven days was a not uncommon duration of a festiva... they called the "first water" and the "last water" (εἰκ. κ.ο. ἐστ' ὁ πρώτος καὶ ὁ περ. ἐστ' ὁ τελευταίος); but washing the feet seems to have been limited to, the case of a guest who was also a traveller. See ABLUTION.

In religious banquets the wine was mixed, by rabbinical regulation, with three parts of water, and four short forms of benediction were pronounced over it. At the Passover four such cups were mixed, blessed, and brought forward by the mistress of the feast (γρηγορίως). It is probable that the character of this official varied with that of the entertainment; if it were a religious one, his office would be quasi-priestly; if a revel, he would be the mere symposiarch (συμποσιαρχὸς) or arister biberomman. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Symposiarchus; Chadwick.)—Smith, s. v. See ENTERTAINMENT; EATING; HOSPITALITY, etc.

Ban′uas (בַּאֹוָא, Vulg. Bauea), a name of a Le- vite occurring in the list of those who returned from captivity (1 Esdr. v. 29); this, with the following answers, is HODAVIAH (q. v.) or Hodevah in the parallel list of Ezra (ii, 40) and Nehemiah (vii, 48).

Baphomet (בּוֹפֶּה מְרֵות, baptism of Mētis, or of Ñē, the Gnostic baptism), the name given to certain symbolic figures, half male and half female, carved in stone, etc., which are said by some to have belonged to the stigmata of the Knight Templars. Specimen of them are to be found in the collections of antiques of Weimar and Vienna. These figures have generally two heads or faces, one of which is bearded; they are surrounded by serpents, and bear various inscriptions and representations of the sun, moon, truncated crosses (otherwise called Egyptian key of life and death), etc. Some have covered them as images of the devil, others as representing Mētis (Wisdom), the Gnostic divinity, and others, seeing in them busts of Mohammed, considered them as proofs of the apostasy of the Templars. It seems more probable, however, that they were merely some alchemico-theosophical symbols. See Josephus, Friedenhammer, Fundgruben d. Orients (6 vols.); Von Nell, Baphometische Accotnætstücke, etc. (Vienna, 1819); Same, Essay on a Cosmological Interpretation of the Phenomenical Worship of the Cabiri, etc.

Baptism, a rite of purification or initiation, in which water is used; one of the sacraments (q. v.) of the Christian Church. The word baptism is simply an Anglicized form of the Greek βαπτισμός, a verbal noun. It is so used (likewise in English "baptize"), and this, again, is a derivative from βαπτίζω, the predominant signification of which latter is to wash or "dye," Lat. tinge. Not being a verb implying motion, βαπτίζω is properly followed in Greek by the preposition in, denoting the means or method (with the "instrumental dative"), which has, unfortunately, in the Eng. Ver. been often been rendered by the ambiguous particle "in," whereas it really (in this connection) signifies only with or by, or at most merely designates the locality where the act is performed. The derivative verb and noun are sometimes used with reference to ordinary laundering, and occasionally with respect to merely some secular action, having a figurative sense. In certain cases it is followed by the preposition εἰς, with the meaning "to," "for," or "unto," as pointing out the design of the act, especially in phrases (comp. παρακώπω εἰς) expressive of the covenant or relation of which this rite was the seal. (In Mark i, 10, it depends upon ἠμαρτ. preceding; and in Mark xiv, 30, there is a conspicuous example by which some other verb of motion is to be supplied before the preposition.) On these and other applications of the Greek word, see Robinson's Lex. of the N. T. s. v.; where, however (as in some other Lexicons), the statement that one of the primary forces of the verb is "to dip, immerse," etc., is not sustained by its actual usage and grammatical construction. This would always require εἰς, "into," after it; which occurs in 15 examples only out of the exhaustive list (175) adduced by Dr. Conant (Meaning and Use of Baptism, N. Y. 1860); and a closer and more critical examination will show that it is only the context and association of the word that in any case put this signification upon it, and not in any case more closely identify the verb, which is to assign the proper sense of the term. The significations "plunge," "submerge," etc., are here strictly discerned, as cognates, from the more general and primitive one of that complete envelopment with a liquid which a thorough wetting, saturation, or dyeing usually implies. In like manner, Dr. E. Beecher (in a series of articles, first published in the "Christian Remembrancer" during 1840 and 1841) has insisted that the alluded or inferential signification of purification for the primitive sense of the word, whereas it is only the result expected or attendant in the act of washing. See further below.

As preliminary to the theological discussion of this subject, it will be proper here to discuss, more fully than can be conveniently done elsewhere, the classical and Biblical uses of the word, and some subordinate topics. We here make use chiefly of Kittô's Cyclopaedia, s. v.

I. Philological Usage of the Word βαπτισθανον.—1. By Classical Writers.—No instance occurs in these writers of the use of βαπτισθανον, and only one in a very late author (Antyllus) of the use of its equivalent βαπτισθανον; but the verb occurs frequently, especially in the later writers. It is used to designate:

(a) The washing of an object by dipping it into water, or any other fluid, or quam fluid, for any purpose whatever: as βαπτισθανον σιαυνον εις θαλασσαν, "bathe yourself by going into the sea" (Plut. Mor, p. 166 A.); βαπτισθανον των διωνουν προ των θαλασσων (Ibid. p. 914).

(3) The covering over of any object by the flowing or pouring of a fluid on it; and metaphorically (in the passive), the being overwhelmed or oppressed: thus the Pseudo-Aristotle speaks of places full of bulrushes and sea-weeds, which, when the tide is at the ebb, are not baptized (i.e. covered by the water), but at full tides are flooded over (Mirobil. Auscul. § 122; p. 56). In Westernmann's ed. of the Script. Rer. Mnr. Gr., Diodorus Siculus (bk. i) speaks of land animals being destroyed by the river overrunning them (γαθηθησαντες παρακολουθησον); Plato and Athenaeus describe men in a state of as late as baptism (Συμπαρακολουθησον. p. 176 B.; and Deipnous. v.), and the former says, the same of mankind overwhelmed with sophistry (Euthyd. 277 D.). Plutarch denounces the forcing of knowledge on children beyond what they can receive as a process by which the soul is baptized (De Lib. educ.); and he speaks of men as baptized by debts (L cheaper, c. 21); Diodorus Siculus speaks of men being drowned by people with tears (uk. i, c. 78); and Libanius says, "He who hardly bears the burden of tears, bears, would be baptized by a little addition" (Epist. 310), and "I am one of those baptized by that great wave" (Ep. 25).

(4) The complete drowning of an object, whether by aspersio or immersion; as ἀπεκταθη βαπτισθανον, ἀπεκταθη βαπτισθανον, ἀπεκταθη βαπτισθανον, ἀπεκταθη βαπτισθανον.
BAPTISM

As a bladder thou shalt be washed (I. e. by the waves breaking over thee), but thou canst not go down" (Orac. Sigele. de Athene, sp. Plutarch, Thuc. ii. 7).

From this it appears that in classical usage βαπτίζω is not fixed to any special mode of applying the baptizing element to the object baptized; all that is implied by the term is, that the former is closely in contact with the latter, or that the latter is wholly in the former.

3. In the Septuagint.—Here the word occurs only four times, viz. 2 Kings vi, 14: "And Naaman went down and baptized himself (ιβαπτιζε) seven times in the river Jordan," where the original Hebrew is הנִּבְּרָנָה, from הנְבּרָנָה, to dip, plunge, immerse; Isa. xxx. 4, 9; "Iniquity baptizes me" (ινικία μα μπαπτιζε), where the word is plainly used in the sense of overwhelm, answering to the Heb. מָטָע, to come upon suddenly, to terrify; Judith xii, 7, "She went out by night . . . and baptized herself (ιβαπτιζε) at the fountain;" and Ecclus. xxxi, [xxix]., 30, "He who is baptized from a corpse" (ιβαπτιζε μονος απω μνεασα), etc. In these last two instances the word merely denotes overpowered, without indicating any special mode by which this was done, though in the former the circumstances of the case make it improbable that the act described was anything more than simple comp. Num. xix. 19.

In the Greek, then, of the Sept., βαπτιζε signifies to plunge, to bathe, or to overwhelm. It is never used to describe the act of one who dips another object into a fluid, or the case of one who is dipped by another.

5. In the New Testament.—Confining our notice here simply to the phylology of the subject, the instances of the use of this word may be thus classified thus:

(1.) The verb or noun alone, or with the object baptized merely as βαπτιζε, Matt. iii, 13, 14; βαπτιζεως, Mark xvi, 16; βαπτιζεως, Mark iv, 1, 4; βαπτισουνται, vii, 4; βαπτιζεως, John i, 25; ιβαπτιζεως, 1 Cor. i, 14, etc.; βαπτισεως αιων, Matt. iii, 7; ιβαπτισεως, Eph. iv, 5; βαπτισμα, Col. ii, 12; 1 Pet. iii, 21, etc.; βαπτισματων νουτριωμα, Mark vii, 4, 8; βαπτισματων ιπαται, Heb. vi, 2; διαφορας βαπτισματων, ix, 10.

(2.) With addition of the element of baptism; as, ινοις, Mark i, 8, etc.; ινοις, Luke xii, 16, etc. The force of ινοις in such formulae has by some been pressed, as if it indicated that the object of baptism was in the element of water, by which it is usually meant the water, and may be regarded as the natural and more simple interpretation. Many, however, have held the water to be the element of baptism, and the water, and came up out of it. But, on the other hand, it is contended that the phrase do not necessarily imply more than that they went to (i.e. the margin of the water and returned thence.

(3.) With specification of the end or purpose for which the baptism is effected. This is usually indicated by τοις, as τοις ου, Matt. viii, 11, and frequently; ιβαπτισθης εις Χριστον . . . εις τοις θανατω αυτων, Rom. vi, 8, 3, 13; εις τοις Μωυση ιβαπτισθηαν, 1 Cor. x, 8; εις τοις ου μηιβαπτισθηαν, xii, 18; βαπτισθης εκατος . . . εις τοις ου αμαρτων, Acts ii, 38, etc. In these cases εις retains its proper significance, indicating the reception of the grace and forgiveness typologically, that for which, or with a view to which the thing is done, modified according as this is a person or a thing. Thus, to be baptized for Moses, means to be baptized with a view to following or being subject to the rule of Moses; to be baptized for Christ means to be baptized in order to become a Christian, a disciple of Christ; to be baptized for his death means to be baptized with a view to the enjoyment of the benefits of his death; to be baptized for the remission of sins means to be baptized with a view to receiving this; to be baptized for the name of any one means to be baptized with a view to the realization of all that the meaning of this name implies, etc. In one passage, Paul uses αναστατωσα to express the end or design of baptism, βαπτησαναι αναστατωσα εις τοις ου, 1 Cor. x, 29; but here the involved idea of substitution justifies the use of the preposition. Instead of a preposition, the genitive of object is sometimes used, as βαπτιστηρια μεροες, Luke iii, 8, 10 = βαπτιστηρια τοις προσωποις, the baptism which has meros as its end and purpose.

(4.) With specification of the ground or basis on which the baptism rests. This is expressed by the use of εις in the phrases ινοις ου τοις, and once by the use of εις with the dative, Acta ii, 28: "to be baptized on the name of Christ, i. e. so that the baptism is grounded on the confession of his name" (Winer, p. 469). Some regard these formulae as identical in meaning with those in which εις is used with αναστατωσα, but the more exact scholars view them as distinct.

The two last-mentioned usages are peculiar to the N. T., and arise directly from the new significance which this term attached to baptism, in opposition to the ceremonial and symbolic idea attached to it. The reference to the "annunciation, circumcision, and baptism" is not accidental, nor is the term at all foreign to the New Testament.

11. Non-ritual Baptisms mentioned in the N. T.—These are:

1. The baptism of sacerdotes and articles of furniture, Mark vii, 4, 5.
2. The baptism of persons, Mark vii, 5, 4; Luke xi, 38, etc.

These are the only instances in which the verb or noun is used in a strictly literal sense in the N. T., and there may be some doubt as to whether the last instance should not be regarded as the natural case.

These instances are chiefly valuable as bearing on the question of the mode of baptism; they show that no special mode is indicated by the mere use of the word baptized, for the washing of cups, of coucher, and of persons is accomplished in a different manner in each case: in the first by dipping, or immersing, or rinsing, or pouring, or simply wiping with a wet cloth; in the second by aspiration and wiping; and in the last, as already mentioned, by a ring being thrown into the bath.

3. Baptism of affliction, Mark x, 38, 38; Luke xii, 50. In both these passages our Lord refers to his impending sufferings as a baptism which he had to undergo. Chrysostom, and some others of the fathers, understand this objectively, as referring to the purification which his sufferings were to effect (see the passages in Suicer, Thes. s. v. βαπτισμα, i, 7); but this does not seem to be the idea of the speaker. Our Lord rather means that his sufferings were to come upon him as a mighty overwhelming torrent (see Künon on Matt. xx, 22, 23; Blomberg, l. c.). Some interpreters suppose there is an allusion in this language to the kirk baptism which the Christian is to undergo; but this is not acc. to l. c.; Meyer on Mark x, 38); but nothing more seems to be implied than simply the being overwhelmed in a figurative sense, according to what we have seen to be a common use of the word by the classical writers.

4. Baptism with the Spirit, Matt. iii, 11; Mark i, 6; Luke iii, 16; John i, 33; Acts i, 6, 10; 1 Cor. xii, 13. In the first of these passages it is said of our Lord that he shall baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire. Whether this be taken as a hendiads = the Spirit as fire, or as pointing out two distinct baptisms, the one by the Spirit, the other by fire; and whether, on the latter assumption, the baptism by fire meant the destruction of the Temple and the miraculous endowment of his apostles, it does not concern us at present to inquire. Respecting the import of baptism by the Spirit, there can be little room for doubt or difference of opinion; it is obviously a figurative mode of describing the agency of the Divine Spirit given through baptism, as in the case of Noah and his family, with all the circumstance of influence and in purifying and sanctifying the heart of man. By this Spirit the disciples were baptized on the day of Pentecost, when "there appeared unto them cloven tongues of fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts ii, 3, 4); by this Spirit men are saved when they are "born again of water and of the Spirit" (John iii, 5); when they receive "the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost" (Tit. iii, 5); and when there is the putting away from them of the filth of the flesh, and they have the answer of a good conscience toward God (1 Pet. iii, 21); and by this Spirit believers are baptized for one body, when through his gracious agency they receive that Spirit, and those impulses by which they are led to realize their unity in Christ Jesus (1 Cor. xii, 13). Some refer to the Spirit's baptism also, the apostle's expression, ἐν πνεύματι, Eph. iv, 5; but the context contains nothing which would justify this reference here to is baptismal rite as the outward sign of that inner unity which the ἐν Κόσμοι και τὰς μιας χείρες secure and produce (see Alford, Ellicott, Matthies, Mathies, etc. loc. in). In this figurative use of the term "baptism" the territum comparati-um is found by C. F. Schwartz in his view that baptism is that in which the believer is made to live, and in which he receives the transforming influence; while others find it in the biblical representation of the Spirit as coming upon men, as poured upon them (Isa. xxxii, 15; Zech. xii, 10; Joel ii, 28; Acts ii, 17), and as sprinkled on them like clean water (Zech. xxxvi, 25). 5. Baptism for Moses.—In 1 Cor. x, 2, the apostle says of the Israelites, "And they all received baptism (the middle voice is selected to express a receptive sense, 'Meyer') for Moses (ἰς τὸν Ἡπείριον Ἰσραήλ) in (or by, i.e. in) the cloud and in (or by) the sea." In the Syr. σὺν τῷ ἐλλατένι μετά, and is translated "by the hand of Moses"; and this is followed by Beza and others. Some render "cum Moses; others, auspiciis Mosis; others, in Mose, i.e. "sub ministerio et ductu Mosis" (Calvin), etc. But all these interpretations are precluded by the proper meaning of ἐν, and the fixed significance of the phrase βάπτισεν τόν τίτων in the N. T. and in commonwealth. "For their baptism was wrought after Moses, i.e. with a view to, in reference to, in respect of him. They were baptized for Moses, i.e. they became bound to fidelity and obedience, and were accepted into the covenant which God then made with the people through Moses" (Rückert in loc. ; see also Meyer and Alford on the passage). III. The Types of Baptism.—1. The apostle Peter (1 Pet. iii, 21) compares the deliverance of Noah in the Deluge to the deliverance of Christians in baptism. The apostle had been speaking of those who had perished "in the days of Noah when the ark was a-preparing, in which few, that is eight souls, were saved by water. And with them likewise also, as Lot, who had righteousness, (he being a figure whereunto baptism doth now save us). The Greek, in the best MSS., is 'Ο καὶ οἰκίαν ἐν τῷ ναῷ σώζεται. Gottfried well expands ἐν τῷ ναῷ by ἐν τῷ ναῷ, "accurately corresponding." The difficulty is in the relative ὅπως. There is no antecedent to which ὅπως refers, and A. V. render uncertain. Consequently it seems as if βάπτισμα must be put in opposition with ὅπως, and as an explanation of ἐν. Noah and his company were saved by water, "which water also, that is, the water of baptism, correspondingly saves us." Even if the reading were φυσικόν, it would mean "natural," or "natural means," or "natural ends." Certainly it could not refer to ἐκκλήσεως, which is feminine. We must, then, probably interpret that, though water was the instrument for destroying the disobedient, it was yet the instrument ordained of God for floating the ark, and for so saving Noah and his family; and it is in correspondence with this that water also, viz. the water of baptism, saves us also. Augustine, commenting on these words, writes that "in the days of Noah were a figure of things to come, so that they who believe not the Gospel, when the church is building, may be considered as like those who believed not when the ark was preparing; while those who have believed and are baptized (i.e. are saved by baptism) may be compared to those who were formerly saved in the ark by water" (Epist. 164, tom. ii, p. 579). "The building of the ark," he says again, "was a kind of preaching." "The waters of the deluge presignified baptism to those who believed—punishment to the unbelieving" (ib.). It would be impossible to give any definite explanation of the words "baptism doth now save us" without entering upon the theological question of baptismal regeneration. The apostle, however, gives a caution which no doubt may itself have need of an interpreter, when he adds, "not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the new man (ποιμανία) of a good conscience toward God." Probably we will again have to come here to warn us against resting on the outward administration of a sacrament, with no corresponding preparation of the conscience and the soul. The connection in this passage between baptism and "the resurrection of Jesus Christ" may be compared with Col. ii, 12. 2. In 1 Pet. iii, 21, the passage ends with the shadowing of the miraculous cloud are treated as types of baptism. In all the early part of this chapter the wanderings of Israel in the wilderness are put in comparison with the life of the Christian. The being under the cloud and the passing through the sea resemble baptism; eating manna and drinking of the rock are as the spiritual food which feeds the church; and the different temptations, sins, and punishments of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan are held up as a warning to the Corinthian Church. It appears that the Rabbins themselves speak of a baptism in the cloud (see Wetstein in loc., who quotes Pitcke R. Eliezer, 44; see also Lightfoot in loc.). The passage from the condition of bondmen in Egypt was through the Red Sea, and with the protection of the luminous cloud. When the sea was passed the people were no longer subjects of Pharaoh, but were, under the guidance of Moses, forming into a new commonwealth, "eating manna and drinking of the rock". It is sufficiently apparent how this may resemble the enlisting of a new convert into the body of the Christian Church, his being placed in a new relation, under a new condition, in a spiritual commonwealth, with a way before him to a better country, though surrounded with dangers, subject to temptations, and with enemies on all sides to encounter in his progress. 3. Another type of, or rather a rite analogous to, baptism was circumcision. Paul (Col. ii, 11) speaks of the Colossian Christians as having been circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, when they were buried with Christ in baptism, in which they were also "Buried with him in baptism, whether in the washing of regeneration, i.e. in baptism. The sorit participle, as often, is contemporary with the preceding past verb."—Alford in loc.). The obvious reason for the comparison of the two rites is that circumcision was the entrance to the Jewish Church and the ancient bi-circumcision, baptism, was the entry into the church and to the new covenant; and perhaps also that the spiritual significance of circumcision had a resemblance to the spiritual import of baptism, viz. "the putting off the body of the sins of the flesh," and the purification of the heart by the grace of God. Paul therefore speaks of the whole Church as "baptized" and washed by Christ, "baptized" without hands, and speaks of the putting off the sins of the flesh by Christian circumcision (ἐν τῷ ἐπικοροποίην τῷ Ἑρωτοῖ), i. e. by baptism.
4. Before leaving this part of the subject, we ought perhaps to observe that in more than one instance dead persons are treated as if alive. In Acts xvi. 12; Mark x, 39, our Lord speaks of the cup which he had to drink, and the baptism that he was to be baptized with; and again, in Luke xii, 50, "I have a baptism to be baptized with." It is generally thought that baptism here means an inundation of sorrows; that, as the baptized went down in the water, and water was to be poured over him, so our Lord meant to indicate that he himself had to pass through "the deep waters of affliction" (see Kunoil on Matt. xx. 22; Schleusner, s. v. βαπτισθ). In after times martyrdom was called a baptism of blood. But the metaphor in this latter case is evidently different; and in the above words of our Lord, the word is used without qualification, whereas in passages adduced from profane authors we always find some words explanatory of the mode of the immersion. Is it not then probable that some deeper significance attaches to the comparison of death, especially of our Lord's death, to baptism, when we consider, too, that the connection of baptism with the death and resurrection of Christ is so much insisted on by Paul?

IV. Names of Baptism.—1. "Baptism" (βαπτισμός: the word βαπτισμός occurs only three times, viz. Mark vii, 8; Heb. vii, 2, ix, 10). The verb βαπτίζων (from βαπτίζω, to wet) is the rendering of βάπτizo, to plunge, by the Sept. in 2 Kings v. 14; and accordingly the Rabbins used בַּרְפַּל for βαπτίζων. The Latin fathers render βαπτίζων by tinger (e. g. Tertull. adv. Prax. c. 26, Novissimae mandavit ut tingerent in Patrem Filium et Spiritum Sanctum); by mergere (as Ambros. De Sacramentis, lib. ii, c. 7, "Interrogatus es, Credita in Deum Patrem Omnipootentem? Dixisti Credo; et meriti, hoc est septiturn es"); by mergère (as Tertullian, De Coron. Mūlimi, c. 8, "Dehinc ter mergitumur"); see Sucerz, s. v. mergere. By the Greek fathers the word βαπτίζων is often used figuratively for overwhelming with sleep, sorrow, sin, etc. Θυμίῳ μισθοῖς βαπτισμῶν εἰς ἐννόμον, buried in sleep through drunkenness. Σοὶ μισθοῖς βαπτισμῶν φόρονται, absorbed in thought (Chrysost.). Ταῖς βαπτιστικαῖς ἀμαρτίαις βαπτισμῶν, steeped in sin (John Chrysost.). Sucerz, s. v. mergere.

2. "The Water" (τὸ ὕδωρ) is a name of baptism which occurs in Acts x, 47. After Peter's discourse, the Holy Spirit came visibly on Cornelius and his company; and the apostle asked, "Can any man forbid the water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost?" In ordinary cases the water was the first administred after the baptism laid on their hands, and then the Spirit was given. But here the Spirit had come down manifestly, before the administration of baptism; and Peter argued that now no one could then reasonably withhold baptism (calling it "the water") from those who had visibly received that of which baptism was the sign and seal. With this phrase, τὸ ὕδωρ, "the water," used of baptism, compare "the breaking of bread" as a title of the Eucharist, Acts i, 42.

3. "The Washing of Water" (τὸ λουτρόν τοῦ ἰδίω- ρος, "the bath of the water") occurs Eph. v, 26. There appears clearly in these words a reference to the bridal bath; but the allusion to baptism is clearer still, baptism of which the bridal bath was an emblem, a type, or mystery, signifying to us the spiritual union betwixt Christ and his church. For as the bride was wont to bathe before being presented to the bridegroom, so washing in the water is that initiatory rite by which the Christian Church is betrothed to the Bridegroom, Christ.

There is some difficulty in the construction and interpretation of the qualifying words, in ἰδίῳ, by the word." According to the more ancient interpretation, they would indicate that the outward rite of washing is insufficient and unavailing without the added potency of the Word of God (comp. 1 Pet. iii, 21), the word: the purifying power of salvation, etc.); and as the λουτρόν τοῦ ιδίῳ had reference to the bridal bath, so there might be an allusion to the words of betrothal. The bridal bath and the words of betrothal typified the water and the words of baptism. On the doctrine so expressed the language of Augustine is famous: "Detrahe verbum, ut quid est aqua nisi adventu verbi. nec de baptismate, si ad elemosynam, et fit sacramento" (Tract. 80 in Joham.). Yet the general use of βαπτίζων in the New Testament and the grammatical construction of the passage seem to favor the opinion that the Word of God preached to the church, rather than the words made use of in baptism, is that of baptism, and is the companion of the water without which it would be imperfect (see Eliboct, in loc.).

4. "The washing of regeneration" (λουτρόν παλιγ- γενεσίας) is a phrase naturally connected with the foregoing. It occurs Tit. iii, 5. All ancient and most modern commentators have interpreted it of baptism. Controversy has made some persons unwilling to admit this interpretation; but the question, probably should be, not as to the significance of the phrase, but as to the degree of importance attached in the words of the apostle to that which the phrase indicates. Thus Calvin held that the "bath" meant baptism; but he explained its occurrence in this context by saying that there was no need of the seal of the Holy Spirit in Christ bath obtained for us." The current of the apostle's reasoning is this. He tells Titus to exhort the Christians of Crete to be submissive to authority, showing all meekness to all men: "for we ourselves were once foolish, erring, serving our own lusts; but when the kindness of God our Saviour, and His love toward man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we performed, but according to His own mercy He saved us by (through the instrumentality of) the bath of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost (ἐν λουτρόν παλιγγενεσίας καὶ ἀνακοσμήσεως Πνεύματος ἁγίου), which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour, that being justified by His grace, we might be made heirs of eternal life through hope (or according to hope, κατ' ἐλπίδα)."

The argument is, that Christians should be kind to all men, remembering that they themselves had been formerly disinherited, but that by God's free mercy in Christ Jesus their sins were transplanted from their heads, even a state of salvation (ἐνακοσμεῖσθαι), and that by means of the bath of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy Spirit. If, according to the more ancient and common interpretation, the latter means baptism, the whole will seem pertinent. Christians are placed in a new condition, made members of the Church of Christ by baptism, and they are renewed in the spirit of their minds by the Holy Ghost.

There is so much resemblance, both in the phraseology and in the argument, between this passage in Titus and 1 Cor. vii, 11, that the latter ought by all means to be compared with the former. Paul tells the Corinthians that, since their heathenism, they have been stained with heathen vices; "but," he adds, "ye were washed" (lit. ye washed or bathed yourselves, ἀπλύσωσθείτε), "but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the Spirit of our God." It is generally believed that here is an allusion to the being baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ; though some think it "sanctified" and "justified," as well as "washed," with the words in the name, etc. (see Stanley, in loc.). But, however this may be, the reference to baptism seems unquestionable.

Another passage containing very similar thoughts, clothed under the same words, is Acts xxii, 16, where Ananias says to Saul of Tarsus, "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord." (ἀναστάς βαπτίζεται καὶ ἐφανερώσεται)

5. "Illumination" (φωτισμός). It has been much questioned whether φωτισμός, "enlightened," in Heb. vi. 4; x. 32, be used of baptism or not. Justin M. I. 64. 2 c. 2, and Eusebius, xii. 10, and some fathers, use φωτισμός as a synonym for baptism. The Syriac version, the most ancient in existence, gives this sense to the word in both the passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and other Greek commentators so interpret. Even the very learned and highly respected Michelis and many modern interpreters of the highest authority (Weinstein cites from Orac. Sidyll. I., ἡ ἐκκλήσια) on the other hand, it is now very commonly alleged that the use is entirely ecclesiastical, not scriptural, and that it arose from the undue esteem for baptism in the primitive church. It is impossible to enter into all the merits of the question here. If the usage be scriptural, it is to be found only in the two passages in Hebrews above mentioned; but it may perhaps correspond with other figures and expressions in the New Testament. The patristic use of the word may be seen by referring to Sulpici, s. v. φωτισμός, and to Blingham (Chap. II. 19). The proper use of the word, according to Justin Martyr, is, that the catechumens, before admission to baptism, were instructed in all the principal doctrines of the Christian faith, and hence "this laver is called illumination, because those who learn these things are illuminated in their understanding." (Quoted in Euseb., xxxii. 94.) But if this word be used in the sense of baptism in the Epistle to the Hebrews, as we have no mention of any training of catechumens in the New Testament, we must probably seek for a different explanation of its origin. It will be remembered that φωτισμός was a term for admission into the ancient mysteries. Baptism was without question the initiation into the Christian mysteries. The baptism of the catechumens as such was called "mystical baptism" (τὸ μυστικόν βάπτισμα), and the ceremony itself as such was called "mystical baptism" (τὸ μυστικόν βάπτισμα), of the λάθρεια ματίας, ζούμας. (3) Now that Christian faith is more than once called by Paul the Christian "mystery." The "mystery of God's will" (Eph. i. 9), "the mystery of Christ" (Col. i. 25), "the mystery of the Gospel" (Eph. vi. 19), and other like phrases, are common in his epistles. A Greek could hardly fail to be reminded by such language of the religious mysteries of his own former heathenism. But, moreover, seeing that "in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," it seems highly probable that in three memorable passages Paul speaks, not merely of the Gospel or the faith as a whole, but in a special and peculiar sense of God or of godliness. (1) In Col. i. 27, we read, "the glory of this mystery, which is Christ in you," τοῦ μυστηρίου τοῦτον, ὡς ἐστιν Ἰησοῦς συμμετέχει (2) In Col. ii, 2, Lachmann, Tregelles, and Ellicott, as we think on good grounds, adopt the reading τοῦ μυστηρίου, where ὡς ἐστιν Ἰησοῦς, rightly compared by Bp. Ellicott with the preceding passage occurring only four verses before it, and interpreted by him "the mystery of God, even Christ." (3) It deserves to be carefully considered whether the above usage in Colossians does not suggest a clear exposition of 1 Tim. iii. 16, τοῦ ἱερού τούτου τοῦτον, ὡς ἐστιν Ἰησοῦς, καθορισμός τοῦ καθορισμοῦ τοῦ καθορισμοῦ, or ὡς ἐστιν Ἰησοῦς, ὡς ἐστιν Χριστός. For, if Christ be the "Mystery of God," he may well be called also the "Mystery of godliness," and the masculine relative is then easily intelligible, as being referred to Χριστός and implied in μυστήριον. For, in the words of Hilary, "Deus Christus est Sacramentum Dei." If all this be true, as baptism is the initiatory Christian rite admitting us to the service of God and to the knowledge of Christ, it may not improbable have been called φωτισμός, and afterward φωτισμός, as having reference, and as admitting to the mystery of the Gospel, and to Christ himself, who is the Mystery of God.

V. We pass to a few of the more prominent passages, not already considered, in which baptism is referred to.

1. John iii. 4-5. "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—has been a well-established battle-field from the time of Calvin to our own day. Hooker at one time, and in the first fifteen centuries no one had ever doubted its application to baptism (Exeget. Pol. vi. 11). Zuylgius was probably the first who interpreted it otherwise. Calvin understood the words "of water and of the Spirit" as τοῦ νεούς και τοῦ Πνεύματος, "the washing or cleansing of the Spirit" (or rather as τοῦ νεούς και τοῦ νεούς, "as water," referring to Matt. iii. 11 ("He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire"). But it is a parallel usage. Stier (Words of the Lord Jesus, in loc.) observes that Luke has rightly said that we may regard this interpretation by means of a hendiadys, which erroneously appealed to Matt. iii. 11, as now generally abandoned. Stier, moreover, quotes the entire paraphrase the words of Meyer (on John iii. 5), "Jesus speaks here concerning a spiritual baptism, as in chap. vi, concerning a spiritual feeding; in both places, however, with reference to their visible auxiliary means." That our Lord probably adopted expressions familiar to the simple believer, it is obvious that the Lord's words may be seen by reference to Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in loc.

2. The prophecy of John the Baptist just referred to, viz. that our Lord should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Matt. iii. 11), has usually been interpreted by that rhetorical figure (hendiadys) which designates Jesus, by the double epithet Holy and strong, and paraphrases it: "The Holy Spirit, with which Christ baptizes, has a fiery force, and this was once even manifest to human sight." (Acts ii. 9). The fathers, indeed, spoke of a threefold baptism with fire: first, of the Holy Ghost in the shape of fiery tongues at Pentecost; secondly, of the fiery trial of affliction and temptation (1 Pet. i. 7); thirdly, of the fire which at the last day is to try every man's work (1 Cor. iii. 13). It is, however, very improbable that there is any allusion to either of the last two in Matt. iii. 11. There is an antithesis in John the Baptist's language between his own lower mission and the divine authority of the Saviour. John baptized with a mere earthly element, teaching men to repent, and pointing them to Christ; but He that should come after, ὁ ἀληθινὸς, was empowered to baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. The water of John's baptism could but wash the body; the Holy Ghost, with which Christ was to baptize, should purify the soul as with fire. See Barnes on Mar. iii. 11.

held under the tutelage of the law, like children, kept as in a state of bondage under a pedagogue. But after the preaching of the faith, all who are baptized into Christ clothe themselves in him, so to speak, as adult sons of his Father, and by faith in him they may be justified from their sins, from which the law could not justify them (Acts xiii, 37). The contrast is between the Christian and the Jewish Church: one bond, the other free; one infant, the other adult. The transition point is naturally when by baptism the service of Christ is undertaken and the promise from the Gospel are claimed. This is represented as putting on Christ and in him assuming the position of full-grown men. In this more privileged condition there is the power of obtaining justification by faith, a justification which the law had not to offer. For by one Spirit (or in one spirit, iv ivi πνεύματι) we all were baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free, and were all made to drink of one Spirit. The resemblance of this passage to the last is very clear. In the old dispensation there was a marked division between Jew and Gentile under the law of Moses. As in Gal. iii, 16, Christ is the seed (ὁ σπόρος), so here he is the body (ὁ σώμα) into which all Christians become incorporated. All distinctions of Jew and Gentile, bond and free, are abolished. By the grace of the same Spirit (or perhaps in one spirit) of Christian love and fellowship (comp. Rom. xii, 13, 14) we are joined in baptism to the one body of Christ, his universal church. Possibly there is an allusion to both sacraments. "We were baptized into one body, we were made to drink of one Spirit" (iv πνεύμα ἐν συνάγωγῇ: Lachm. and Tisch. omit τδ). Both our baptism and our partaking of the cup in the communion are tokens and pledges of Christian unity. They mark our union with the one body of Christ, and they are means of grace, in which we may look for one Spirit to be present with blessing (comp. 1 Cor. x, 3, 17; see Waterland on the Eucharist, ch. x, and Stanley on 1 Cor. xii, 19).

5. Rom. vi, 4, and Col. ii, 12, are so closely parallel that we may notice them together. As the apostle in the two last-considered passages views baptism as a joining to the mystical body of Christ, so in these two passages he goes on to speak of Christians in their baptism as buried with Christ in his death, and raised again to life in him. The natural body of Christ was laid in the ground and then raised up again, so his mystical body, the church, descends in baptism into the waters, in which also (iv τδ, sc. βαπτίσματα, Col. ii, 12) it is raised up again with Christ, through "faith in the mighty working of God, who raised him from the dead." Probably, as in the former passages Paul had brought forward baptism as the symbol of Christian unity, so in those now before us he refers to it as the token and pledge of the spiritual death to sin and resurrection to righteousness; and moreover of the final victory over death in the last day, through the power of the resurrection of Christ. This view was in keeping with the sentence of this passage in Colossians that the early Christians so generally used trine immersion, as signifying thereby the three days in which Christ lay in the grave (see Suicer, s. v. ἄνατομος, 11. a.)—Smith, Append. s. v.

2. JEWISH BAPTISM.—Purifications by washing (Gekleidung) among the Jews. See ABD-ABRUT. In the language of the prophets, cleansing with water is used as an emblem of the purification of the heart, which in the Messianic age is to glorify the soul in her innermost recesses, and to embrace the whole of the theocratic nation (Ezek. xxxvi, 25 sq.; Zech. xiii, 1 sq.). But the antiquity of liturgies by water among the Jews there can be no question. Though still a disputed point whether baptism was practised, as an initiatory rite, in connection with circumcision, before the coming of Christ. It is well established that, as early as the second century of the Christian era, this proselyte baptism was established rite among the Jews; and their councils, as well as many Christian theologians (e. g. Lightfoot, Wetstein, Wall, and others), claim for it a much greater antiquity. But this opinion is hardly tenable, for, as an act which strictly gives validity to the admission of a proselyte, and is no mere accompaniment to his admission, baptism certainly is not alluded to in the New Testament; while, as the exercise proper to the persons who received it (the proselyte) writers of that period, they are all open to the most fundamental objections. Nor is the utter silence of Josephus and Philo on the subject, notwithstanding their various opportunities of touching on it, a less weighty argument against this view. It is true that mention is made in the Talmud of that circumcision as already existing in the first century A.D.; but such statements belong only to the traditions of the Gemara, and require careful investigation before they can serve as proper authority. This Jewish rite was probably originally only a purifying ceremony; and it was raised to the position of an initiating and indispensable rite, corresponding with that of circumcision, only after the destruction of the Temple, when sacrifices had ceased, and the circumcision of proselytes had, by reason of public edicts, become more and more impracticable. See PROSLEYTE.

2. JOHN'S BAPTISM. It was the principal object of John to contrast his baptism with that of Jesus, and in doing so to claim that the performance of external ceremonies was sufficient to secure participation in the kingdom of God and his promises; he required repentance, therefore, as a preparation for the approaching kingdom of the Messiah. That he may have possibly had baptism of the Cenaeans also seems to follow from his censuring the Pharisees for confiding in their descent from Abraham, while they had no share in his spirit; yet it should not be overlooked that this remark was drawn from him by the course of the argument (Matt. iii, 8, 9; Luke iii, 7, 8). We must, on the whole, assume that John considered the existing Judaism as a stepping-stone by which the Gentiles might be brought to the kingdom of God in its Messianic form. The general point of view from which John contemplated the Messiah and his kingdom was that of the Old Testament, though closely bordering on Christianity. He regards, it is true, an alteration in the mind and spirit as an indispensable condition of the reception of the kingdom of Mis-be apt to infer from Luke and Matthew that there had been an acquaintance between Christ and John prior to the baptism; and that hence John declines (Matt. iii, 14) to baptize Jesus, arguing that he needed to be baptized by him. This, however, has been thought to be at variance with John i, 31, 33. Lücke (Comment. i, 416 sq., 5th edit.) takes the words "I knew him not" in their strict and exclusive sense. John, he says, could not have known Jesus in this manner; he had known him; and he could not, as a prophet, have failed to discover, even at an earlier period, the but too evident "glory" of the Messiah. On the other hand, the narrative of the first three Gospels presupposes John's personal acquaintance with him, since, although the herald of the Messiah, he conveys nothing about him in the manner of an all known Jesus; and had he known him, he could not, as a prophet, have failed to discover, even at an earlier period, the but too evident "glory" of the Messiah. On the other hand, the narrative of the first three Gospels presupposes John's personal acquaintance with him, since, although the herald of the Messiah, he conveys nothing about him in the manner of an all known Jesus; and had he known him, he could not, as a prophet, have failed to discover, even at an earlier period, the but too evident "glory" of the Messiah.

With regard to the object of Christ in undergoing baptism, we find, in the first instance, that he ranked this action among those of his Messianic calling. This object is still more defined by John the Baptist (John i, 31), which passage Lücke interprets in the following words: "Only by entering into that community which was to be introductory to the Messianic, by attaching himself to the Baptist like any other man, was it possible for Christ to reveal himself to the Baptist, and therefrom let the Baptist know him. Here Christ had an object for a moment could doubt his own mission, or the right period when his character was to be made manifest by God; but John needed to receive that assurance, in order to be the herald of the Messiah who was actually come. For all others whom John baptized, either before or after Christ, this act was a mere preparatory consecration to the kingdom of the Messiah; while for Jesus it was a direct and immediate consecration, by means of which he manifested the commencement of his career as the founder of the new theocracy, which began at the very moment of his baptism, the initiatory character of which constituted its general principles and tendency. See Jesus.

Baptism of the Disciples of Christ.—Whether our Lord ever baptized was doubted. (See Schenk, De lectione a Christo administrata, Marb. 1745.) The only passage which may distinctly bear on the question is John iv, 1, 2, where it is said "that Jesus made another disciple of John than those who followed him himself baptized not, but his disciples." We necessarily infer it from that, as soon as our Lord began his ministry, and gathered to him a company of disciples, he, like John the Baptist, admitted into that company by the administration of baptism. Normally, however, to say the least of it, the administration of baptism was by the hands of his disciples. Some suppose that the first-called disciples had all received baptism at the hands of John the Baptist, as must have pretty certainly been the case with Andrew (see John i, 35, 37, 40), and that they were not again baptized with water after they joined the company of Christ. Others, however, argue that Christ himself for the baptism of his earlier disciples, who were afterward authorized to baptize the rest. But in any case the words above cited seem to show that making disciples and baptizing them went together; and that baptism was, even during our Lord's earthly ministry, the formal mode of appointing his service and becoming attached to his company.

After the resurrection, when the church was to be spread and the Gospel preached, our Lord's own commission conjures the making of disciples with their baptism. The command, "Make disciples of all nations by baptizing them" (Matt. xvi, 19), is merely the extension of his own practice, "Jesus made disciples and baptized them" (John iv, 1). The conduct of the apostles is the plainest comment on both; for so soon as ever men, convinced by their preaching, asked for guidance and direction, their first exhortation was to repentance and baptism, that thus the convert should be at once one of the fathers of the church. Acts ii, 38; viii, 12, 36; ix, 18; x, 47; xvi, 15, 38, etc. (See Zimmermann, De Baptismo oriunde et usu, Gott. 1816.) See Disciple.

3. Christian Baptism is a sacrament instituted by Christ himself. When he could no longer personally and immediately choose and receive members of his kingdom, when he left a space of time all of which was accomplished which the founder thought necessary for its completion, he gave power to the spiritual community to receive, in his name, members by baptism. The authority and obligation of baptism as an universal ordi- nance of the Christian Church is derived from the commission of Peter with the keys of the kingdom (Matt. xvi, 28). It is the same in all nations, baptizing them in (to, o/é) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost (Matt. xxviii, 19). See Disciple.

1. Design and Benefits of Baptism.—As to the design and benefits of baptism there are various views held. The principal are the following: 1. That it is a direct instrument of grace; the application of water to the person by a properly qualified functionary being regarded as the appointed vehicle by which God bestows regenerating grace upon men. This is the view of the Roman and Eastern churches, and of one (the "High-Church") party in the Protestant Episcopal and the Lutheran Churches. 2. It is a token of regeneration, to be received by all who give evidence of being really regenerated. This is the view adopted by the Baptists. 4. That it is a symbol of purification, the use of which simply announces that the religion of Christ is a purifying religion, and intimates that the party receiving the rite assumes the profession, and is to be instructed in the principles of that religion. This opinion is extensively entertained among the Congregationalists of England. 5. That it is the rite of initiation into the visible church, and that, although not absolutely necessary, it is such a rite of great power in conferring great spiritual blessings being thereby confirmed and obligated to the individual. This is the doctrine of the Confessions of the majority of the Reformed churches. The Augsburg Confession states, Art. 9: "Concerning baptism, our churches teach that it is a necessary ordinance; that it is a means of grace, and ought to be adminis- tered also to children, who are thereby dedicated to God, and received into his favor. They condemn the Anabaptists who reject the baptism of children, and who affirm that infants may be saved without baptism." The Westminster Confession, Art. 28: "Bap- tism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Christ himself for the signifying of the death and resurrection of the party baptized into the visible church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remis- sion of sins, and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life; which sacra- ment is, by the ordinance of Christ, to be administered in his church until the end of the world. The outward element to be used in this sacrament is water, wherewithal the party to be baptized is to be named in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, by a minister of the Gospel lawfully called thereunto. ..." be baptized. Although it be a great sin to contemn or neglect this ordinance, yet grace and salvation are not so inseparably annexed unto it as that no person can be disfranchised of that happy state unto which all that are baptized are undoubtedly regenerated. The efficacy of baptism is not tied to that moment of time wherein it is administered; yet, notwithstanding, by the right use of this ordinance the grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Spirit of Christ (whether of the parent or the infant) as in those who are really regenerate, that grace begeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time. The sacrament of baptism is but once to be administered to any person. In the 17th article of the Methodist Episcopal Church it is declared that "Baptism is not only a sign of profession and mark of difference whereby Christians are distinguished from others that are not baptized, but it is also a sign of regeneration, or the new birth. The baptism of young children is to be retained in the church." The same formula appears in the Articles of the Church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, with certain additions, as follows: "Art. 27. Baptism is not only a sign of profession and mark of difference whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened, but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the church; the profession of sins, and of the death and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ to be remitted; and of the seals of the son of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed: faith is confirmed, and grace increased by virtue of prayer unto God. The baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the church as most agreeable with the institution of Christ." The following excellent summary of the benefits of baptism is given by Watson (Jastrow's ii, 648): "Baptism introduces the adult believer into the covenant of grace and the Church of Christ, and is the seal, the pledge to him on the part of God of the fulfillment of all its provisions in time and in eternity, while on his part he takes upon himself the obligations of steadfast faith and obedience. To the infant child it is a visible reception into the same covenant and church—a pledge of acceptance through Christ—the bestowment of a title to all the grace of the covenant as circumstances may require, and as the mind of the child may be capable, or made capable of receiving it, and as it may be fit for life by prayer, when the period of reason and moral choice shall attain a stage of maturity. It is also, the present 'blessing' of Christ, of which we are assured by his taking children in his arms and blessing them; which blessing cannot be merely nominal, but must be substantial and efficacious. It secures, too, the gift of the Holy Ghost in those secret spiritual influences by which the actual regeneration of those children who die in infancy is effected, and which are a seed of life in those who are spared, to prepare them for instruction in the Word of God, as they are taught it by parental care, to incline their will and affections to good, and to begin and maintain in them the war against sin, and to move them to resist the devil, and be divinely assisted, as reason strengthens, to make their calling and election sure. In a word, it is, both to infants and to adults, the sign and pledge of that inward grace which, though modified in its operations by the difference of their circumstances, has respect to, and flows from, the covenant relationship of each of the three persons in whose one name they are baptized—acceptance by the Father, union with Christ as the head of his mystical body, the church, and the communion of the Holy Ghost. To these advantages must be added the respect which God bears to the believing act of the parents, and to their solemn prayers on the occasion, in both which the child is interested, and the solemn engagement of the parents which the rite necessarily implies to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

Exaggerated ideas of the necessity and efficacy of baptism developed themselves as early as the second and third centuries (see references in Hagenbach, *Hist. Bapt. ii, 270). But the efforts of the church to offer baptism as long as possible (a practice recommended, e.g. by Tertullian, De Bapte. c. 18). Many would not be baptized until just before death; e.g. Constantine. They supposed that baptism removes all previous sins in a sort of magical way; but that sins after baptism are the result of apostasy. Hence the baptism of new converts was delayed, entirely contrary to the spirit and practice of the apostles, who baptized converts immediately (Acts ii, 41; xv, 15). See Baumgarten, De Procreatione Baptismi op. Vetere, Halle, 1747. After Augustine, through whom the doctrine of "no salvation for the church" came to be held that infants dying without baptism were lost, and the baptism of very young infants became the common rule, while the baptism of adult converts was hastened (Knapp, Theology, i, 141).

The Church of Rome continues to teach that original sin is effaced by the sacrament of baptism. The Anglican Church holds that "this infection of nature doth remain in them that are regenerated." The Russian Catechism declares that in holy baptism the believer "dies to the carnal life of sin, and is born again of the Holy Ghost to a life spiritual and holy;" which makes the infant baptism of the church needful. See GRACE; REGENERATION; SACRAMENTS.

II. Obligation and Perpetuity of Baptism.—That baptism is obligatory is evident from the example of Christ, who by his disciples baptized many that, by his miracles and discourses, were brought to profess faith in him as the Messiah; from his command to his apostles after his resurrection (Matt. xxviii, 19); and from the practice of the apostles themselves (Acts ii, 38). But the Quakers assert that water baptism was never intended to continue in the Church of Christ any longer than while Jewish prejudices made such an external ceremony necessary. They argue from Eph. iv, 5, in which one baptism is spoken of as necessary to Christians, that this must be a baptism of the Spirit. But, from comparing the texts that relate to this institution, it will plainly appear that water baptism was instituted by Christ in more general terms than will agree with this explanation. That it was administered to all the Gentile converts, and not confined to the Jewish congregation (Matt. xxviii, 19, 20; Acts xv, 29), is evident from Acts x, 47; and that the baptism of the Spirit did not supersede water baptism appears to have been the judgment of Peter and of those that were with him; so that the one baptism spoken of seems to have been that of water, the communication of the Holy Spirit being only called baptism in a figurative sense. As for any objection which may be drawn from 1 Cor. i, 17, it is sufficiently answered by the preceding verses, and all the numerous texts in which, in epistles written long after this, the apostle speaks of all Christians as baptized, and argues from the obligation of baptism, that Christ wished to call his people "new creations" in every new heart that entered his church. See Acts xv, 29; Doddridge, Lectures on Divinity, Lect. 201. For a clear view of the obligation of baptism, see Hübner on Christian Baptism, pt. ii, ch. 2. See ANTI-BAPT. III. Mode of Baptism.—The ceremonies used in baptism have varied in different ages and countries; a brief account of them is given below (VII). Among Protestants baptism is performed with great simplicity; all that is deemed essential to the ordinance being the administration of water, and in that part of the service is the immersion, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

1. The Baptists (q. v.) maintain, however, that im-
BAPTISM

Baptism is the "only valid baptism," in this point separating itself from all the rest of Christendom. To maintain their justification, they advance the following arguments: (1) That the word βαπτίζω means, literally, "to immerse," and nothing else; while its figura eburnea uses always include the idea of "burying" or "overwhelming;" (2) that the terms washing, purifying, bathing in baptism, so often mentioned in the Scripture, allude to this mode of water (3) that the places set fourth for this in the New Testament show that (4) that immersion only was the practice of the apostles, the first Christians, and the church in general for many ages, and that it was only laid aside from the love of novelty and the coldness of climate. These positions, they think, are so clear from Scripture and the history of the church that they stand in need of but little argument for their support. (5) Further, they also insist that all positive institutions depend entirely upon the will and declaration of the institution; and that, therefore, reasoning by analogy from previously abrogated rites is to be rejected, and the express command of Christ respecting baptism ought to be our rule. See IMMERSION.

2. The Christian Church generally, on the other hand, denies that immersion is essential to the ordinance of baptism, and admits any of the three modes, sprinkling, pouring, or immersion. The Greek Church requires trine immersion in its rubrics, but in Russia baptism is by immersion. The same is true in the New Testament; and, therefore, the Church of England was driven to use a middle point. The Roman ritual favors affusion thrice repeated, but admits also of immersion. In the "Office for the Public Baptism of Infants" in the Church of England it is directed that the "priest shall dip the child in the water if the sponsors shall certify him that the child may well endure it;" but "if they certify that the child is weak, it shall suffice to pour water upon it." In the "Office for the Private Baptism of Infants" it is directed that the baptism shall be by affusion, the infant in such cases being always certified to be weak. In the "Office for the Baptism of Adults," it is left altogether to the discretion of the minister to dip the person to be baptized in the water or to pour water upon him. The framers of the Office evidently, by the discretionary power left to the officiating minister, have decided that the mode in this respect is immaterial. The ritual of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in like manner, leaves the administration of baptism to the individual; but in the Protestant Churches the substantial question, therefore, between the Baptists and the Christian Church generally, is whether immersion is essential to baptism or not. The negative is maintained by the following arguments (besides others for which we have not space), viz.: (1) As to the meaning of βαπτίζω, it is allowed, on all hands, that it is (at least sometimes) applied to acts involving the process of immersion both by profane and sacred writers (see above). But the best lexicographers agree that this is not its exclusive meaning, and none but a daring controversialist would assert that it is. The Greek βαπτίζω, the verbal adjective of βαπτίζω, goes thoroughly, and its etymological meaning is to put into a drenched or imbued condition (Math. Quar. Rev. 1850, p. 406). In the New Testament it generally means to purify by the application of water. (See Beecher on Baptism, Boston, Oct. 1850, on the Syrian words for baptism.) "As the word βαπτίζω is used to express the various ablutions among the Jews, such as sprinkling, pouring, etc. (Heb. ix. 10), for the custom of washing before meals, and the washing of household furniture, pots, etc., it is evident from hence that it does not exclude the idea of pouring water over a person, whether by immersion or affusion, but only the thing done—that is, washing, or the application of water in some form or other. It nowhere signifies to dip, but in denoting a mode of, and in order to, washing or cleansing; and the mode or use is only the ceremonial part of a positive institute, just as in the Lord's Supper the time of day, the number and posture of the communicants, and the quantity and quality of the wine, are circumstances not accounted essential by any part of Christians. If in baptism there be an expressive emblem of the descending influence of the Spirit, pouring must be the mode of administration, for that is the spiritual term most commonly and properly used for the act of distribution (Matt. iii. 11; Mark i. 8, 10; Luke iii. 16, 22; John i. 33; Acts i, 5; ii. 38, 39; viii. 12, 17; xi. 15, 16). The term sprinkling, also, is made use of in reference to the act of purification (Isa. iii. 15; Ezek. xxxvi. 25; Heb. ix. 18, 14); and therefore cannot be inapplicable to baptism. Wherever water is channelled, or poured, then, as the word βαπτίζω is concerned, there is no foundation for the exclusive theory of the Baptists. (2) As for the fact that John baptized "in Jordan," it is enough to reply that to infer always a plunging of the whole body in water from this particle would, in many instances, be false and absurd. Indeed, if immersion were intended, the preposition should be εἰς and not ἐν. The same preposition, εἰς, is used when it is said they should be "baptized with fire," but few will assert that they should be plunged into it. The apostle, speaking of Christ, says he came not, εἰς, "by water only," but, ἐν, "by water and blood." Thereupon, if the same is true of baptism, it is only proper and propertly, for we know no good sense in which we could say he came in water. Jesus, it is said, came up out of the water, but this is no proof that he was immersed, as the Greek term ἁρπαξ properly signifies from; for instance, "Who hath warned you to flee from," not out of, the wrath to come. With many others that might be mentioned. Again, it is urged that Philip and the eunuch went down both into the water. To this it is answered that here also is no proof of immersion; for if the expression of their going down into the water necessarily includes dipping, then Philip was dipped as well as the eunuch. The preposition εἰς, translated into, often signifies no more than to or unto, see Matt. xxv. 24; Rom. x. 10; Acts xxviii. 14; Matt. iii. 11; xvii. 27; so that from none of these circumstances can it be proved that there was one person of all the baptized who went into the water ankle deep. As to the apostle's expression, "baptized with him in the Holy Ghost," it is no more than a figure of speech, the equivalent of saying that the imprecatory generality of the baptism, since it does not allude to a custom of dipping, any more than our baptismal crucifixion and death has any such reference. It is not the sign, but the thing signified, that is here alluded to. As Christ was buried and rose again to a heavenly life, so we by baptism signify that we are separated from sin, that we may live a new life of faith and love. (See above.) (3) It is urged further against immersion that it carries with it too much of the appearance of a burdensome rite for the Gospel dispensation; that it is too indecent for so solemn an ordinance; that it has a tendency to aggitate the spirits, often rendering the subject sick and faint, and unfit for the performance of the ordinances of religion, and, indeed, utterly incapable of them; that in many cases the immersion of the body would, in all probability, be instant death; that in other situations it would be impracticable for want of water: hence it cannot be considered as necessary to the ordinance of baptism, and therefore it is inapplicable to the case. It has been universally practised in the times of the New Testament, or in the earliest periods of the Christian Church; indeed, the allegation of the exclusiveness of this mode is far from being adequately supported by ancient testimony, while in many instances (e. g. that of the Philippians jailor), Acts xxvii. 32, this thing is decisively the most unlikely suppositions. See above (I-V).

IV. Subjects of Baptism.—The Christian churches generally baptize infants as well as adult believers, and this is believed to have been the practice of the church from the apostolic age. The Roman and Lutheran churches teach that baptism admits children into the church and makes them members of the body of Christ. The Reformed churches, generally, teach that the children of believers are included in the covenant, and are therefore entitled to baptism. The Methodist Church holds that all infants are redeemed by Christ, but not by the church; therefore, they are not baptized, but are entitled to baptism, whenever they can receive the instruction and care of a Christian church or family.

(i.) As to the antiquity of infant baptism, it is admitted by Baptist writers themselves that it was practised in Tertullian's time (A.D. 200); but they insist that the infant baptism practised by the early churches was not that of infant baptism as it is practised by the church, but that of the private baptism of the apostles, which was given to the children of believers. The principal passages cited in the controversy are from Origen, Tertullian, Ireneus, and Justin Martyr.

1. Origen (A.D. 185-254) speaks in the most unequivocal terms of the baptism of infants, as the general practice of the church in his time, and as having been received from the apostles. His testimony is as follows: "According to the usage of the church, baptism is given even to infants; when, if there were nothing in infants which needed forgiveness and mercy, the grace of baptism would seem to be superfluous" (Homil. VIII in Levit. c. xii). Again: "Infants are liable to the same sin as adults. Of whose sins? Or, when they have sinned? Or, can there be any reason for the laver in their case, unless it be according to the sense which we have mentioned above, viz. that no one is free from pollution, though he has lived but one day upon earth? And because by baptism native pollution is taken away, therefore infants are baptized" (Homil. in Luc. xiv). Again: "For this was the cause that it was the church that received a tradition from the apostles (παρακαθιστών ἀποστόλων) to give baptism even to infants" (Comm. on Rom. lib. v, cap. 9). Neander (Ch. Hist., p. 514) deprecates this testimony, but without any real ground. On any ordinary subject it would be taken as decisive, at least as to the prevalence of infant baptism in Origen's time, and long before.

2. Tertullian (A.D. 160-240), in his treatise De Baptismo (c. 18), opposes infant baptism on the ground (1) "that it is too important; not even earthly goods are intrusted to infants;" (2) that "sponsors are imperilled thereby"; (3) that they finally "terrible, Tertullian adopted the superstitious idea that baptism was accompanied with the remission of all past sins, and that sins committed after baptism were peculiarly dangerous. He therefore advised that not merely infants, but young men and young women, and even young women who have been married, should postpone their baptism until the period of their physical and pastoral life should have passed. In short, he advised that, in all cases in which death was not likely to intervene, baptism be postponed until the subjects of it should have arrived at a period of life when they would be no longer in danger of being led astray by youthful lusts. And thus, for more than a century after the age of Tertullian, we find some of the most conspicuous converts to the Christian faith postponing baptism till the close of life. Further, if he could have said that infant baptism was "an innovation," he would; no argument was surer or weightier in that age; and he constantly appeals to it on other subjects. All attempts to invalidate this testimony have failed. If any fact in history is certain, it is that infant baptism was practised in Tertullian's time, and long before. For the Baptist view, however, on this point, see an able article in the Christian Review, xvi, 510. See also Bible Dictionary, Christ, 307.

3. Ireneus (c. A.D. 125-190) has the following passage (lib. ii, cap. 89): "Omnis venit per semetipsum sum salvare; omnes, inquam, qui per eum renuereuntur in Deum, infinites et parvulos et puseros," etc. i.e. "He came to save all by himself; all, I say, who, by him, are born again unto God, infants, and little children, and youth," etc. All turns here on the meaning attached by Ireneus to the word renuere; and this is clear from a passage (lib. iii, c. 19) in which he speaks of the Gospel commission. "When," he says, "[Christ] gave this commission of regenerating to God [renuere], he said, 'Go, teach all nations, baptizing them, etc.' Neander (whose loose admissions as to the whole of the entire question are largely the cause of the Baptists' remarks of this passage) that it is difficult to conceive how the term regeneration can be employed in reference to this age (i.e. infancy), to denote anything else than baptism" (Ch. Hist., i, 314).

4. Justin Martyr, who wrote his "Apology" about A.D. 130, states that, as soon as the child was born, and was circumcised, in his time, "many persons of both sexes, some sixty and some seventy years old, who had been made disciples to Christ from their infancy" (οἱ ἰκαίων μοι πασὶ ημέρας τοῦ Ἱσραήλ), Apol. 2), and who must therefore have been baptized during the lifetime of some of the apostles. In his Trypko he says, "We are circu-mcirculated by baptism, with our Christian circumcision." If ἰκαίων means from infancy, which is probable, but not absolutely certain, this passage is conclusive.

These citations seem clearly to carry back the practice of infant baptism to a date very near the apostles' time. If it were then "an innovation," we should have had the opinion of his time; but there is none. Up to the rise of the Anabaptists in the 16th century, the practice of infant baptism existed in the church without opposition, or with only here and there an occasional word of question.

(ii.) At the present day the Greek Church, the Roman Church, and all Protestant churches (except the Baptists) hold to infant baptism. The united voice of the following grounds (among others), viz.: 1. If the practice of infant baptism prevailed at the early period above mentioned, and all history is silent as to the time of its introduction, and gives no intimation of any excitement, controversy, or opposition to an innovation so remarkable as this must have been, had it been obstructed on the churches without aposto-tical authority, we may fairly conclude, even were Scripture silent on the subject, that infant baptism has invariably prevailed in the church as a new Testament institution.

2. From the very nature of the case, the first subjects of the baptism of Christ and his apostles were adults converted from Judaism or heathenism. But although there are no express examples in the New Testament of Christ and his apostles baptizing infants, there is no proof that they were excluded. Jesus Christ addressed little children as members of the church, it is not difficult to believe that such received his blessing, and yet were not to be members of the Greek church. If Christ received them, and would have us "receive" them, how can we keep them out of the visible church? Besides, if children were not to be baptized, it is reasonable to expect that they would have been expressly forbidden. As whole households were baptized, it is also probable there were children among them.

3. Infants are included in Christ's act of redemption, and are entitled thereby to the benefits and blessings of his church. Moreover, they are specifically embraced in the Gospel covenant. The covenant with Abraham, of which circumcision was given to his natural descendants. (3.) The promise of Canaan; and this included the higher promise of the eternal inheritance (Heb. xi, 9, 10). (4.) God would be "a God to Abraham and to his seed after him," a promise connected with the highest spiritual blessing, and which

The ultimate authority for infant baptism in the bosom of a regular Christian community and under a sufficient guarantee of pious education—for only on these terms do we advocate it—lies in the universal import of Christ's person and work, which extends as far as humanity itself. Christ is not only able, but willing to save mankind and all classes, in all circumstances, of both sexes, and at all stages of life, and consequently to provide for all these the necessary means of grace (comp. Gal. iii, 28). A Christ able and willing to save none but adults would be no such Gospel as the present. In the significant parallel, Rom. v, 17, 18, the apostle declares the fact and the point that the reign of righteousness and life is, in its divine intent and intrinsic efficacy, fully as comprehensive as the reign of sin and doubt, to which children among the rest are subject—nay, far more comprehensive and availing; and that the blessing and gains by the second Adam far outweigh the curse and the loss by the first. When the Lord, after solemnly declaring that all power is given to him in heaven and earth, commands his apostles to make all nations disciples (μαθητεύειν) by baptism and instruction, there is not the least reason for limiting this to those of mature age. Or do nations consist only of men, and not of youth also, and children? According to Ps. cxvi, 1, 'all nations,' and according to Ps. cl, 6, 'every thing that hath breath,' should praise the Lord; and that these include babes and sucklings is explicitly told us in Ps. vii, 2, and Matt. xxi, 16. With this is closely connected the beautiful idea, already clearly brought out in Acts, the object of the Church, as of a people, is to have all the world taught and baptized. Eph. iv, 12. In Paul's field of labor—the idea that Jesus Christ became for children a child, for youth a youth, for men a man—and by thus entering into the various conditions and stages of our earthly existence, sanctified every period of life, infancy as well as manhood. The Baptist view robs the Saviour's infancy of its profound and cheering significance. —Schaff, Apost. Ch., § 143.

The Baptists reject infant baptism, and maintain that the ordinance is only to be administered to persons making a profession of faith in Christ. The arguments by which they seek to maintain this view are the following:

1. The commission of Christ to the disciples (Mark xvi, 15, 16) fixes instruction in the truths of the Gospel and belief in them as prerequisites to baptism.

2. The instances of baptism given in the N. T. are adduced as confirming this view. "Those baptized by John confessed their sins (Matt. iii, 6). The Lord Jesus commanded his disciples to ‘go and make disciples of all nations’ (Matt. xxviii, 19; Mark xvi, 16). At the day of Pentecost, they who gladly received the word were baptized, and they afterward continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship (Acts ii, 41, 42). At Samaria, those who believed were baptized, both men and women (Acts viii, 12). At Corinth, those who opened their hearts to Philip's message (Philip vii, 12) avowed their faith (in reply to Philip's statement, if thou believest with all thine heart thou mayest), and went down into the water and was baptized (Acts viii, 38). Simon of Samaria, after he had seen the power of the Spirit, was baptized (Acts x, 32). Cornelius and his friends were baptized by Peter (Acts x, 47), and Lydia and her household by Philip (Acts xvi, 14-15). Lydia heard Paul and Silas, and was baptized (Acts xvi, 31). Lydia heard Paul and Silas; the Lord opened her heart, and she was baptized, and her household." not to answer in their names, but to admonish and in-struct them, both before and after baptism. In many churches this office was chiefly imposed upon the deacon. The only persons excluded from this office by the ancient Church were catechumens, energeumens, heretics, and penitents; also persons not confirmed are excluded by some canon. Anci-ently one sponsor only was required for each person to be baptized, who was to be of the same sex as the latter. But in the case of infants the sex was indifferent. The origin of the pro-hibition of sponsors marrying within the forbidden degree of spiritual relationship appears to have been a law of Justinian, still extant in the Codex (lib. v, tit. 4, De Nuptiis, leg. xxvi), which forbade a godfather to marry his godson, and a godmother for whom he acted at baptism. The council in Trullo extended this prohibit-10n to the marrying of the mother of the baptized infant (can. 58); and it was subsequently carried to such an extent that the council of Trent (Sess. xxiv, De Reform. Matrimon. cap. ii) was compelled to relax it in some degree.—Bingham, xi, vii. See Sponsors.

VIII. Ceremonies, Places, and Times of Baptism.—1. In the earlier ages of the Church there were several peculiarities in the mode of baptism which have now fallen into disuse, except, perhaps, in the Roman Catho-lic and Greek churches. Among these usages were trine immersion (i.e. dipping three times, once at the name of each person in the Trisagion of Trullo, Const. Pres. xxvi), anointing with oil, giving milk and honey to the baptized person, etc. After the council of Nice, Christians added to baptism the ceremonies of exorcism and adjuration, to make evil spirits depart from the persons to be baptized. They made several signings with the cross, they used lighted candles, they gave salt to the baptized person to taste, and the priest touched his mouth and ears with epistle, and also blew and spat upon his face. At that time also baptized persons wore white garments till the Sunday following.

Three things were required of the catechumens imme-diately before their baptism: (1.) A solemn renunci-ation of the devil; (2.) A profession of faith in the words of some received creed; and (3.) An engagement to live a Christian life. The form of renun-ciation is given in the Const. Apost. lib. vii, cap. 41. 6. The time of administering the rite was subject to various changes; at first it was without limitation. Saint Ephraim and Whitmaundes were at the time of their baptism en-aged and sixty years, and Easter-aeve deemed the most sacred; afterward, Epiphany and the festivals of the apostles and martyrs were selected in addition. From the tenth century the observance of the stated seasons fell into disuse, and children were required to be bap-tized within a month of their birth (Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xi, ch. vi; Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. xix). See IMPOSITION OF HANDS.

Until the time of Justin Martyr there appears to have been no fixed place for baptism, which was adminis-terated wherever it best suited; but in after times baptisteries were built near the churches, in which also they were trained up, and administered. Baptism was not permitted to be conferred in private houses without the bishop's express license, and persons so bap-tized could never be received into priest's orders (Council of Nicaea, can. 2). Such private bap-tisms were called npafla.niyarvari. Afterward the font appears to have been set up in the church porch, and the water was removed into the church itself. See BAPTISTER.

2. The following are the baptismal ceremonies of the Church of Rome, though not all of universal ob-li-gation: (1.) The child is held without the Church, to signify an actual exclusion from heaven, which is synony-mous with death. (2.) The child is not drowned three times in the face of the child, signifying thereby that the devil can be displaced only by the Spirit of God. (3.) The sign of the cross is made on the fore-head and bosom of the child. (4.) The priest, having exorcised the salt (to show that the devil, until God prevents, avails himself of every creature in order to injure the child), pours over the head of the child water, signifying by it that wisdom shall preserve him from corruption. (5.) The child is exorcised. (6.) The priest touches his mouth and ears with salvia, pronouncing the word Epiphka. (7.) The child is unclothed, signifying the laying aside the old man. (8.) He is washed with the water and oil of baptism. (9.) The priest washes the hands of the deacon. (10.) He is anointed with oil. (11.) The profession of faith is made. (12.) He is question-ed whether he will be baptized. (13.) The name of some saint is given to him, who shall be his example and protector. (14.) He is washed with the water; then with the oil. (15.) He receives the kiss of peace. (16.) He is anointed on the head, to show that by baptism he becomes a king and a priest. (17.) He receives the lighted taper, to mark that he has be-come a child of light. (18.) He is folded in the alb, to show his baptismal purity (Elliott, Delineation of Romanism, i, 94).

The practice of exorcising water for baptism is kept up in the Roman Church to this day. It exhibits a thoroughly pagan spirit. The following formula, taken from the Estudile Romana nun, is used at the ceremony of exorcising the water: "I exorcise thee, creature of the living God, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God + the holy; by God who, in the beginning, sepa-rated thee by a word from the dry land, whose Spirit over thee was borne, who from Paradise commanded thee to flow." Then follows the rubric: "Let him with his hand divide the water, and then pour some of it over the edge of the font toward the four quarters of the globe, and then proceed thus: I exorcise thee also by Jesus Christ his only Son, our Lord, who, in Cana of Galilee, changed thee by his wonderful power into wine; who walked upon thee on foot, and who was baptized in thee by John in Judea, etc., etc., etc., that thou mayest be made water holy, water blessed, water which washes away our filth, and cleanses our guilty stain. Thee therefore I command—every soul spirit—every phan-tasm—every lie—be thou eradicated, and put to flight from the creature of water; that, to those who are to be baptized in it, may it become a fountain of water springing up into life eternal, regenerating them to God the Father and the Son, by the Holy Ghost, in the name of the same our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall come again to judge the living and the dead, and the whole world by fire, Amen." Then follows a prayer, in which the priest supplicates the Almighty to send down the "ANGEL OF SACRIFICE" over the water thus prepared for the purpose of purification. Afterward the rubric directs that "he shall throw three times upon the water, in three different directions, according to a prescribed figure, \( \Psi \)." In the next place, he is to deposit the increase upon the center, and to increase the force. Afterward, pouring of the Oil of the Catechumens into the water after the form of a Cross, he says, with a loud voice, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost +, Amen." Then follows another rubric: "Next, he pours in of the CHRIsm after the manner above mentioned, saying, Let this infusion of the Chriasm of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Ghost, be the comforter, he baptizes in the name of the sacred Trinity, Amen." Again: "After-ward he takes the two vessels of the before-mentioned holy Oil and Chriasm, and in pouring from each in the form of a Cross, he says, Let this mixture of the Chriasm of Sanctification, of the Oil of Unction, and of the Wa-ter of baptism, be the comforter, he baptizes in the name of the Father +, of the Son +, and of the Holy Ghost +, Amen." Finally, the rubric again directs as follows: "Then the vessel being put aside, he mingleth with his right hand the holy Oil and the infused Chrium with the water, and sprinkles it all over the font. Then he wipeth his hand upon (what is termed) medulla passis; and if any one is to be baptized, he baptizeth him as above. But if there is no one to be baptized, he is forthwith to wash his hands, and the minister must be purified of the consecrated Oil of the Sacrament, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Ritual services are fixed in the Church of England, and the same (or nearly the same) are used in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America (see Prayer-book, Ministry of Baptism). The same forms, omitting the sign of the cross, and the parts which imply baptismal regeneration (ex spre) and the use of sponsors, is used in the Methodist Episcopal Church (Discipline, pt. iv, ch. 1). The Presbyterian Church prescribes no complete ritual, but gives certain rules in the Directory for Worship, ch. vii. The Reformed Dutch Church prescribes a simple and scriptural form (Constitution of R. D. Church, 1576) much of which may be adopted by any congregation. The Church admits sponsors, but they must be "in full communion with some Christian church (Constitution, pt. iv); and a form approaching to that of the Methodist Episcopal Church is given in the Provisional Liturgy of 1838, p. 204. The Lutheran Church prescribes forms of baptism (Liturgy, § 4), and admits sponsors, who may be the parents of the child. The sign of the cross is used in baptism in the Greek and Roman churches, and in the Church of England; it is optional in the Protestant Episcopal Church. See CROSS IN BAPTISM.

BAPTISM, LAY, baptism administered by unordained persons. In ordinary practice, the Christian Church has always held that baptism should be performed by ordained ministers (see above, Ministers of Baptism). Nevertheless, in case of necessity, baptism can be performed by any competent person. This can be authorized by any competent minister, or performed according to Christ's order in Matt. xxviii, 19. It would be clearly wrong to assert that lay baptism is, under all circumstances, as regular as that by a minister; but it is also very difficult to decide that lay baptism is invalid where the services of a minister cannot be procured. The principle upon which this view of the case rests has been thus fairly stated by Hooker (Exod. I. 3, liii, 15): "The grace of baptism cometh by donation from God alone. That God hath committed the ministry of baptism unto special men, it is for order's sake in his church, and not to the exclusion of all others. But that authority might well be, and add force to the sacrament itself. That infants have right to the sacrament of baptism we all acknowledge. Charge them we cannot as guilty and wrongfull possessors of that whereunto they have right, by the manifest will of the donor, and are not parties unto any defect or disorder in the manner of receiving the same. And, if any such disorder be, we have sufficiently before declared that, 'delicium cum capitam semper ambulant, men's ownfaults are their own harms.' From this reasoning (which appears to be just), the inference is, that in the case of lay baptism, infants are not deprived of whatever benefits and privileges belong to that sacrament, it is administered by one alone responsible for the urgency of the circumstances under which he performs the rite. By the rubrics of the second and of the fifth of Edward VI it was ordered thus: "The pastors and curates shall often admonish the people, that without great cause and necessity they baptize not children at home in their houses; and when great need shall compel them so to do, that then they minister it in this fashion: First, let them that be present call upon God for his grace, and say the Lord's Prayer, if the time will suffer; and then one of them shall name the child and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying these words: I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But in the revision of the Prayer-book after the Hampton Court Conference (1554), the rubrics were altered so as to exclude entirely this authority for lay baptism. Still, such baptism is not decided to be invalid. The Roman Catholic, Romanist, and Romanists, see Bingham, Orig. Exe. l. xvi, ch. i, § 4. On the practice of the Church of England with regard to lay baptism, see Bingham, Scholastical History of Lay Baptism (1712, 2 vols.), ch. iii, § 5, extracted in Henry, Compendium of Christian Antiquities, appendix, p. 544; Waterland, A Defence of the Old Baptism (Works, vol. x); Hagemann, History of Doctrines, § 137; Summers On Baptism, ch. iv. BAPTISM rian Directory for Worship declares that "baptism is not to be unnecessarily delayed; nor to be administered, in any case, by any private person, but by a minister of Christ, to be the steward of the mysteries of God" (ch. vii. § 1). The Reformed Confessions, so far as they speak on this point, generally oppose lay baptism: see Conf. Helvet. ii. 20; Conf. Scotiae, xxii. Comp. also Calvin, Institutes, bk. iv, ch. xv. § 20.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (ταφικὸς ἁρματικός. 1 Cor. xv, 29). This difficult passage has given rise to multitudinous expositions. Among them are the following (see also Am. Presb. Rev. Jan. 1865):

1. The Corinthians (according to Suicer), and after them the Marcionites and other heretics, practised a sort of vicarious baptism in the case of those who had died unbaptized: that is, they caused a relation or friend of the dead person to be baptized in his stead, in the belief that such baptism would operate to obtain the remission of the sins of the deceased in the other world (Chrysostom, Hom. xi in 1 Cor., and Tertullian contra Marcion, lib. v, cap. 10). The apostle then drew an argument from the heretical practice to prove his own doctrine.

2. Chrysostom, however, declares that Paul refers to the declaration made by each catechumen at his baptism, of his belief in the resurrection of the dead, meaning to say this: "If there is, in fact, no resurrection of the dead, why, then, art thou baptized for the dead?" (1 Cor. xv, 38). For, upon this interpretation would be to consider the ancient martyrs to be referred to, ever whose remains the churches were often built (probably, however, not as yet), in which such vows were taken.

3. Among the best interpretations is that of Spanheim (see Wolf, Gesch. in N. T. in loc.), which considers "the dead" to be martyrs and other believers, who, by firmness and cheerful hope of resurrection, have given in death a worthy example, by which others were also animated to receive baptism. Still, this meaning would be almost too briefly and enigmatically expressed, when no particular reason for it is known, while also the allusion to the exemplary death of many Christians could chiefly apply to the martyrs alone, of whom there were as yet none at Corinth. This interpretation, however, may perhaps also be improved if Christ be considered as prominently referred to among these deceased, by virtue of whose resurrection all his followers were raised. (1 Cor. xv, 20, 22.)

4. Olshausen's interpretation is of a rather doubtful character. The meaning of the passage he takes to be, that "all who are converted to the church are baptized for the good of the dead, as it requires a certain number (Rom. xi, 12-25), a 'fulness' of believers, before the resurrection can take place. Every one, therefore, who is baptized is for the good of believers collectively, and of those who have already died in the Lord." Olshausen is himself aware that the apostle could not have expected that such a difficult and remote idea, which he himself calls "a mystery," would be understood by his readers without a further explanation. But the interpretation of his commentator is that he therefore proposes an explanation, in which it is argued that the miseries and hardships Christians have to struggle against in this life can only be compensated by resurrection. Death causes, as it were, vacations in the full ranks of the believers, which are again filled up by ascents in the individual. "If they who are baptized in the place of the dead (i.e. they put up their place in the community) if there be no resurrection?"—Kitto, s. v.

5. None of these explanations, however, well suits the signification of ταφικὸς ἁρματικός, "for," i.e. in behalf of, on account of, i.e. at the same time, consistent in other respects. Dr. Trimmer (Priede, Phil. Theol. Gr. Text, p. 216) has proposed a slight emendation of the text that appears to obviate the difficulty almost entirely.

It consists simply in the following punctuation: "Else what shall they do which are baptized? [It is] for the dead, if the dead rise not at all," i.e. we are baptized merely in the name of (for the sake of, out of regard to) dead persons, namely, Christ and the prohers who testified of him. This interpretation renders No. 3 above more easy of adoption.

Treatises entitled De baptismo ταφικὸς ἁρματικός have been written by Schmidt (Argent, 1656), Calom (Vlethe, 1664), Teutsch (Reformed, 1803), Grade (Griyph, 1690), Brem, (1726), Müller (Lips, 1794), Reichmann (Vlethe, 1659), Schenck (France, 1667), Zschender (Cfr. a. v. 1706), Facius (Coll. 1729), Neumann (Jen. 1740), Nolling (Sus. 1784), Richter (Zwe. 1803), Heumann (Isem. 1710, Jen. 1740), Stercius (Jen. 1780).

BAPTISM OF THE DEAD, a superstition custom which anciently prevailed among the people in Africa of baptizing the dead. The third council of Carthage (canon vi) speaks of it as a matter of which ignorant Christians were fond, and forbids "to believe that the dead can be baptized." Gregory Nazianzen also observes that the same superstition opinion prevailed in the East, among whom it was believed to be hallowed by the special mention of Philastrius (De Har. cap. 2) as the general error of the Montanists or Cataphrygians, that they baptized men after death. The practice seems to be founded on a vain opinion that when men had neglected to receive baptism during their life, some compensation was made at death by receiving it after death. See Burton, Baptist Lectures, art. 78; Bingham, Orig. Ecc. bk. xi, ch. iv, § 8.

BAPTISM OF FIRE. The words of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 11), "He that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire," have given occasion to various interpretations. Some of the fathers (e. g. Chrysostom) hold it to mean the everlasting fire of hell. Others of the fathers (as Chrysostom, Hom. 11 in Matt.) declare that by fire in this passage the Baptist means the Holy Spirit, who, as fire, should destroy the pollutions of sin in the regeneration conferred by holy baptism. Others again, as Hilary and Ambrose, as well as Origen, believe it to mean a purifying fire through which the faithful shall pass before entering Paradise, thus giving rise to the Roman doctrine of purgatory. Others think that it means the fire of tribulations and sorrows; others, the abundance of graces; others, the fire of penitence and mortification. (Isthm. Or. 629.) Some old heretics, as the Seleucians and Hermians, understood the passage literally, and maintained that material fire was necessary in the administration of baptism; but we are not told either how, or to what part of the body they applied it, or whether they obliged the baptized to pass through or over the flames. Valentinius rebaptized those who had received baptism out of his sect, and drew them through the fire; and Heraclion, who is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus, says that some applied a red-hot iron to the ears of the baptized, as if to impress on them some mark.

The simplest and most natural view is that the passage is not to be interpreted of any separate form of baptism from that "with the Holy Ghost;" but the expression "with fire" is epexegetical, or explanatory of the words "with the Holy Ghost." Such a mode of expression, in which the connecting particle and only introduces an amplification of the formula, is very common. The passage will therefore be, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, through the outward symbol of fire," viz. the "clenched tongues like as of fire" (Acts ii, 3). See PENTECOST; HOLY GHOST. It must be admitted, however, against this view, that "fire" elsewhere is the symbol of vengeance and destruction, and that in all the parallel passages it has this import (see Kuinöl in loc.). It would therefore be more appropriate to understand the fiery baptism to be the temporal and eternal punishments to which the Jews were exposed, in contrast with the spiritual baptism offered as the alternative (comp. the context in Matt. and Luke; also the parallel passages in Acts). See FIRE.

Baptistery, a place or room set apart for performing baptism. We have no account in the New Testament of any such separated places. John and the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ baptized in the Jordan. But baptism could be administered in other places (see Acts vii, 36, 37; xvi, 13-16). There was a public baptism of three thousand converts on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii, 41), but no account is given of the place. Examples also occur in the Acts of the Apostles of baptism in private houses. Passages in the writings of Justin Martyr, Clement, and Tertullian show that, during their time, there were no baptisteries. In later times the baptistery was one of the eudrom, or buildings distinct from the church itself, and consisted of the porch, where the person about to be baptized made the confession of faith, and an inner room, where the ceremony was performed. Thus it remained till the sixth century, when the baptistery was taken into the church porch, and afterward into the church itself. The ancient baptisteries were sometimes called ψυχαντήρια (illuminautoria), either because baptism was sometimes called ψυχαρίζω, illumination, or because they were places of illumination or light before or preceding baptism, where the catechumens were taught the first principles of the Christian faith. We occasionally meet with the word κοιλούμενος, or piscina (the font). The octagonal or circular form was adopted, surmounted with a dome, and the baptistery was situated at the entrance to the principal or western gate. These edifices are of considerable antiquity, since, once set up, was prepared for the ceremonial of the baptism of Clovis. It is not possible to decide at what period they began to be multiplied, and at length united to, or changed into parish churches; yet it appears that the alteration took place when stated seasons of baptism ceased, and the right of administration was devoted to all presbyters and deacons. The word baptistery is now applied also to the baptismal font.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. viii, ch. vii, § 1-4; Farrar, s. v.

Baptists, a name given to those Christian denominations which reject the validity of infant baptism, and hold that the ordinance of baptism can be administered only to those who have made a personal profession of faith in Christ. The Baptist churches also, in general, maintain that the entire immersion of the body is the only Scriptural mode of baptism; yet the Mononites, who are generally regarded as Baptists, use sprinkling. The name Baptist, as assumed by the Baptist denominations, of course implies that they alone maintain the Christian doctrine and practice of baptism; and in this sense their right to this denominative name is denied by all other Christian denominations, as well as by the similar claims of the Unitarians and (Roman) Catholics to their respective names. But, as established by usage, without having regard to its original signification, it is now generally adopted. The name Anabaptist is rejected by the Baptists as a term of reproach, because they protest against being identified with the Anabaptists of Munster, and also as incorrect, because most of their members receive the rite for the first time on their admission to a Baptist church.

1. History. 1. Before the Sixteenth Century.—All Baptists, of course, claim that the apostolic church was essentially Baptist, and that infant baptism is an innovation. But Baptist writers differ concerning the time of the introduction of infant baptism, and also as to the question whether it is possible to trace an uninterrupted succession of Baptist churches from the apostles' time down to the present. Some Baptist writers have this succession from the first: (History of Foreign Baptists, Lond. 1888), who gives, as the summing up of his researches, that "all Christian communities during the first three centuries were of the Baptist denomination in constitution and practice. In the middle of the third century the Novatian Baptists established separate and independent societies, which continued until the end of the sixth century, when these communities were succeeded by the Paterines, which continued to the Reformation (1517). The Oriental Baptist churches, with their successors, the Paulicians, continued in their purity until the tenth century, when they visited France, rescissating and extending the Christian profession in Langendreko, where they flourished till the crusading army scattered, or drowned in blood, one million of unoffending professors. The Baptists in Piedmont and Germany are exhibited as existing under different names down to the Reformation. These churches, with their genuine successors, the Mononites of Holland, are connected and chronologically detailed to the present." This view is, however, far from being shared by all Baptists. The leading Baptist Quarterly of America, The Christian Review (Jan. 1855, p. 29), remarks as follows: "We know of no assumption more arrogant, and more destitute of proper historic support, than that which claims to be able to trace the distinct and unbroken existence of a church substantially Baptist from the time of the apostles down to our own." Thus also Cutting (Historic Vindications, Boston, 1859, p. 14) remarks on such attempts: "I have little confidence in the results of any attempt of that kind which have met my notice, and I attach little value to inquiries pursued for the predetermined purpose of such demonstrations." The non-Baptist historians of the Christian Church almost unanimously assert that infant baptism was practised from the beginning of Christianity [see BAPTISM], and generally maintain that no organized body holding Baptist principles can be found after the period of the Anabaptists (q. v.), about 1520. See PAULICIANS; LOLLARDS; WALDENSEES. Soon after the Anabaptists, Menno (q. v.) renounced the doctrines of the Roman church, and organized (after 1560) a Baptist denomination, which spread widely, especially in Germany and Holland, and still exists. See Mennonites.

2. Great Britain.—Whether and to what extent Baptist principles were held in Great Britain before the sixteenth century is still a matter of historic controversy. In 1550 Henry VIII ordered sixteen Dutchmen to be put to death for being Anabaptists, and in 1558, 30 persons were exiled because they rejected infant baptism. The general pardon of 1560 excepted the Baptists. Elizabeth commanded all Anabaptists to depart out of the kingdom within 21 days. King James refused all concessions to Baptists, as well as to Nonconformists in general. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, under Charles I, Mr. Valentine, a Baptist minister among the Baptists, published a work against persecution, but it called forth a new proclamation against the Baptists and their books, and in 1611, another Baptist, Mr. Wightman, was burned. Cromwell protected the Baptists, but they were again persecuted by Mr. John Campbell, under Charles II. The Act of William III, 1689, recognised them as the third dissenting denomination. The first Baptist churches were Armenian; a Calvinistic Baptist church was established about 1658. In 1641 there were 7 Baptist congregations in London, and about 40 more in the country. Those who held Arminian views received the name General, those who held Calvinistic views, the name Particular Baptists. Many General Baptists adopted Ariasianism and Socinianism; and in 1770, the orthodox portion seceded, and formed what is known as the "New Connection of General Baptists." In 1772 a William Grant, a resident of New York, was one of the commissioners of the Baptist Missionary Society, an event of the utmost importance in the history of the Christian church in general, for from it dates the awakening of a new zeal in the European and American churches for the conversion of the pagan world. In 1774 the Baptist Missionary Society published its "Jubilee" that it had translated the Scriptures, wholly or in part, into forty-four languages or dialects of India, and printed, of the Scriptures alone, in foreign languages nearly half a million.

Among the earliest writers of the Baptist denomination in England were Edward Barker, Samuel Richardson, Christopher Blackwood, Hansard Knollys, Francis Cornwall, and in the latter half of the seventeenth century, Jeremiah Ives, John Tombs, John Norcott, Henry D'Anvers, Benjamin and Elias Keach, Edward Hutchison, Thomas Grantham, Nehemiah Cox, D.D., Thomas de Launne, and Dr. Russell Colby. The best known of the colonial American writers is John Bunyan. John Milton also is claimed by the Baptists, though not as a member of their denomination, at least as a professor of their distinctive principles; for they say he "composed his two most elaborate, painstaking volumes to prove from the Scriptures the divinity and necessity of the distinguishing principles of Baptists." Among the Baptist writers in the early part of the eighteenth century were Samuel Ewen, John Brine, Benjamin Beddome, the three Stennetts (Joseph Stennett, Joseph Stennett, Jr., D.D., Samuel Stennett, D.D.), John Evans, L.L.D., J. H. Evans, Dr. Gales, the famous Dr. Gill, Joseph Barrow, William Zost, Caleb Evans, D.D., Abraham Booth, and Joseph Jenkins. Toward the close of the last and the beginning of the present century, the Baptist denomination had a large number of writers, among whom were William Jones, Thomas Llewellyn, William Richards, Robert Hall, John Foster, Andrew Fuller, Christopher Anderson, and Joseph Ivimey. The Rev. F. A. Cox (a Baptist writer) states (Encyc. Metrop.), however, that, "ill of late years, Baptist literature must be regarded as, on the whole, somewhat inferior." Cox enumerates among the great men of the English Baptists, "Gale and Cartridge for the accuracy of speech; Gill for Hebrew knowledge and rabbinical lore; Carey for the alertness of theological wisdom and controversial acuteness; Hughes for the union of elegant taste and public zeal in the formation of the Bible and Tract Societies; Foster for the reach and profundity of his mind; and Hall as the most chaste and beautiful of writers, and, perhaps, the greatest of English preachers." More recently, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon acquired the reputation of being one of the most popular preachers of the nineteenth century. Sir Morton Peto has become a prominent member of the House of Commons. See Crowell, Literature of American Baptists in Missionary Journeys (p. 406).

3. United States.—The Baptist churches in the United States owe their origin to Roger Williams (q. v.), who, before his immersion, was an Episcopalian minister. He was persecuted for opposing the authority of the state in ecclesiastical affairs and for principles which "tended to Anabaptism." In 1638 he came to Virginia, the land of liberty. In turn he was packed and imprisoned and hundreds were packed and imprisoned and others, who with him or organized a Baptist Church at Providence, Rhode Island. A few years before (1635), though unknown to Will-liams, a Baptist preacher of England, Hansard Knoll-ly, had settled in New Hampshire and taken charge of a plantation near Dover, but he resigned in 1639 and returned to England. Williams obtained in 1644 a charter for the colony which he and his associates had founded in Rhode Island, with full and entire freedom of conscience. Rhode Island thus became the first Christian state which ever granted full religious liberty. In the other British colonies the persecution against the Baptists continued. In 1662 the Baptist Missionary Society was organized in Massachusetts issued laws against them in 1644, imprisoned several Baptists in 1651, and banished others in 1669. In 1680 the doors of a Baptist meeting-house were nulled up. In New York laws were issued against them in 1692, in Virginia in 1694. With the begining of the American Revolution, the Baptists became more and more prominent. They were released from tithes in 1727 in Massachusetts, in 1729 in New Hampshire and Connecticut, but not before 1785 in Virginia. The spread of their principles was greatly hindered by these persecutions, especially in the South, where in 1776 they counted about 100 societies. After the Revolution they spread with extraordinary rapidity, especially in the South and South-west, and were inferior in this respect only to the Methodists. In 1817 a triennial general convention was organized, which, however, has since been discontinued. In 1845 the discussion of the slavery question caused alienation between the Northern and Southern Baptists. The Baptists, like the Presbyterian, in consequence of the failure of the Great Rebellion and the adoption of the constitutional amendment in 1865, led to efforts to reunite the societies of the Northern and Southern States. The Northern associations generally expressed a desire to co-operate again with their brethren in the South in the discharge of Christian labor, but they demanded from the Southern associations a profession of loyalty to the United States government, and they themselves deemed it necessary to repeat the testimony which, during the war, they had, at each annual meeting, borne against slavery. The Southern associations that met during the year 1865 were unanimous in continuing their former separate societies, and against fraternization with the Northern societies. They censured the American Baptist Home Missionary Society for proposing, without consultation or co-operation with the churches, associations, conventions, or organized boards of the Southern States, to send missionaries to preach and raise churches within the bounds of the Southern associations. Some of the Southern associations, like that of Virginia, consequently advised the churches "to decline any co-operation or fellowship with any of the missionaries, ministers, or agents of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society." A number of the Baptists in the Southern States separated from the Southern associations, and either connected themselves with those of the North, or organized, with the co-operation of the Northern missionaries, independent associations. Divisions among the American Baptists commenced early to take place; see Six-Principle Baptists; Seventh-day German Baptists; Anti-Mission Baptists; Free-will Baptists; Disciples; Church of God. Some divisions have become extinct, as the Rogersens, organized in 1860 in Connecticut, and called after Jonathan Rogers. They observed the seventh day instead of Sunday, and believed in spiritual marriage. The Free or Open Communion Baptists, who were organized about 1810, united in 1841 with the Free-will Baptists. The Baptist literature of the United States begins in the seventeenth century with the pleas of Roger Williams and his companion, John Clarke, for religious liberty. The first English reprint of the New Testament were also made by the Wightmans, of Connecticut (Valentine, Timothy, and John Gano), the two Abel Morgans, John Callender, and Benjamin Griffith. The first Baptist book on Systematic Theology was published in 1708 by the Rev. John Watts. About the middle of the eighteenth century, the Rev. Isaac Backus commenced his literary career. He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Stillman, Rev. Morgan Edwards,

4. CONCLUSION.—The incorporation of the Anabaptists, the Baptist principles were represented on the European continent almost exclusively by the Mennonites (q. v.). In 1884 a Baptist society was organized in Hamburg by Oncken, a native German, who was immersed in the Elbe in 1833 by Dr. Sears, since which time the society has spread to the rest of western Europe. In several states, as Sweden and Denmark, they met with cruel persecution, but in Hamburg they were recognized by the state in 1859. Besides the independent churches organized by them, Baptist doctrine, or at least the rejection of paedobap- tism, has found some adherents in several other church- es, e. g. some pastors in the Free Evangelical churches of France, in the Reformed State Church of France, and in the Free Apostolic Church, founded in 1856 in Norway. Among the missions established by the Baptists in Asia, Africa, and Australasia, those in India, especially those among the Kares in Burmah (q. v.), have been the most successful. The Kares, multitudes of the only country in the East, have numerous congregations, but is already the nucleus of a Christian nation.

II. DOCTRINES AND GOVERNMENT.—The Baptists have no standard Confession of Faith. As their churches are independent, each adopts its own articles of re- ligion. In England, as has been stated above, the "Old Connection" are chiefly Socinians; the "New Connection," evangelical Arminians; the "Particular Baptists," Calvinists of various shades. In the United States, the regular Baptists are for the most part Cal- vinists, perhaps of a stricter order than their British brethren. The Baptists generally form "Associations," which, however, exercise no jurisdiction over the churches. They recognize no higher church offi- cers than pastors and deacons. Elders are sometimes ordained as evangelists and missionaries. Between clergy and laity they recognize no other distinction but that of office.

The regular Baptists accept of no authority other than the Bible for their faith and practice, yet nearly all of the societies have a confession of faith in pamphlet form for distribution among its members. The following form, generally known as the "New Hampshire Confession of Faith," is perhaps in more general use among the societies in the North and East, while the "Philadelphia Confession of Faith" is that generally adopted in the South. We give both:

Confession of Faith of Regular Baptists (Northern).

1. The Scriptures.—We believe that the Holy Bible was written by men divinely inspired, and is a perfect treasure of heavenly instruction: that it has God for its author, salvation for its end, truth without any mixture of error; that it reveals the holy will of God; that it teaches us, and is sufficient for our complete edification, in all that is necessary to salvation. We believe the Holy Bible to be a com- plete canon of Christian doctrine, and to be a perfect rule of faith and practice, by virtue of which all men shall stand at the last judgment.

2. The True God.—We believe the Scriptures teach that there is one, only one, living and true God, an infinite, intelligent Spirit, whose name is Jehovah, the Maker and Supreme Ruler of heaven and earth; inconceivably glorious in holiness, and worthy of all possible honor, confidence, and love; that in the unity of the Godhead there are three persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; the Holy Ghost, every divine perfection, and executing distinct but harmonious offices in the work of redemption.

3. The Full Man.—We believe the Scriptures teach that man was created in holiness, under the law of his Maker; but by voluntary transgression fell from the estate of grace into that of sin; in consequence of which all mankind are now sinners, not by constraint, but by choice; being by nature utterly void of that holiness without which no man shall see the Lord, by the law of God his conscience is indicted to evil, and therefore under just condemnation to eternal ruin, without defence or excuse.
4. The Way of Salvation.—We believe the Scriptures teach that salvation is wholly obtained through the intercession of the mediator, Jesus Christ, by seeking the law by which we are saved, and by his death, made a full atonement for our sins; that, having risen from the dead, he is now enthroned in heaven; and that he is now present by his Spirit, and by his Spirit he is ever interceding with God for us, and that he is present with us in all the privations of this world, and in all the perfections of heaven, and by his presence he is so ordered as to be the comfort of the saints, and the strength of the people of God.

5. Civil Government.—We believe the Scriptures teach that civil government is of divine appointment, for the interest and good order of human society; that it is instituted by God for the peace and happiness of the people, and that it is to be used only for the purposes of maintaining the outward ordinances of God, the worship of God, and the support of the churches.

11. Righteous and Wicked.—We believe the Scriptures teach that there is a radical and essential difference between the righteous and the wicked, that all the promises of the gospel of Christ, concerning eternal life, are applicable only to those who believe on him, and that all the threatenings of the gospel are applicable only to those who reject him. This is the only true and sound interpretation of Scripture, and it is necessary for all those who are called to salvation, and for those who are called to judgment.

12. Sanctification.—We believe the Scriptures teach that sanctification is the process by which, according to the will of God, the believer is separated from the world, and consecrated to the work of God, and that it is progressive work; that it is begun in regeneration; and that it is carried on in the hearts of believers by the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, the Sealer of the Spirit, and in the continual use of the appointed means—especially the word of God, self-examination, self-denial, watchfulness, and prayer.

13. A Church.—We believe the Scriptures teach that a church is a body of baptized believers, associated by covenant in the faith and fellowship of the Gospel, observing the ordinances of Christ, and governed by his laws. The church is the one true church, not various denominations, all of which are intended to be delivered from ungodliness and unrighteousness, to the obedience of Christ until the establishment of the visible church.

14. Baptism and the Lord's Supper.—We believe the Scriptures teach that baptism is the outward sign of the inward salvation of baptized believers, associated by covenant in the faith and fellowship of the Gospel; observing the ordinances of Christ, and governed by his laws. The church is the one true church, not various denominations, all of which are intended to be delivered from ungodliness and unrighteousness, to the obedience of Christ until the establishment of the visible church.

20. The God the Trinity.—The Lord our God is but one living and true God, infinite in being and perfection. In this divine and infinite being there are three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; of one substance, power, and eternity.

23. Confession of Faith of Baptist Churches (Southern).

1. Holy Scripture.—The holy Scriptures are the only sufficient, certain, and infallible rule of all saving knowledge, faith, and obedience; the supreme judge by which all controversies of religion are to be determined, and all decrees of councils, opinions of ancient writers, doctrines of men, and private spirits, are to be examined, and in whose sentence we are to rest.

2. The God the Trinity.—The Lord our God is but one living and true God, infinite in being and perfection. In this divine and infinite being there are three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; of one substance, power, and eternity.

2. The God the Trinity.—The Lord our God is but one living and true God, infinite in being and perfection. In this divine and infinite being there are three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; of one substance, power, and eternity.

3. The Fall of Man and Sin.—Although God created man in his image and in his likeness, yet through the sin of our first parents, man fell from his original state of innocency, and through the fall came into a state of sin and misery, which, by the interposition of the grace of God, and the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, may be escaped through faith in his atoning blood.
all becoming dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body. They being the root, corrupting all that is in them, have no power of escape from them by ordinary generation, being now conceived in sin, and by nature children of wrath.
6. Christ the Mediator. — The Son of God, the second person of the Trinity, the eternal Son of the living God, the brightness of the Father's glory, of one substance, and equal with him, who made the world, who upbodeth and governeth all things, being himself a man, and the only Mediator between God and man.
7. Redemp tion. — The Lord Jesus by his perfect obedience and sacrifice of himself, which he, through the eternal Spirit, once offered up unto God, hath fully satisfied the justice of God, procured reconciliation, and purchased an everlasting inheritance in the kingdom of heaven for all those whom the Father hath given unto him.
8. Redemption. — From Christ hath obtained eternal redemthon doth certainly and effectually apply and communicate the same; making intercession for them; uniting them to himself by faith; bringing unto them, by the word, the mystery of salvation; persuading them to believe and be reconciled to God and governeth their hearts by his word and Spirit, and overcometh all their enmities by his love and power, wisdom, in such manner and ways as are most consonant to his nature and the nature of his people. He liveth for all of them, and with amazed admiration, and absolute grace, without any condition foreseen in them to procure it.
9. Corrupt Will. — Man, by his fall into a state of sin, hath wholly lost all will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation; so that a natural man, being altogether averse from that good, and not willing of itself, nor by his own strength to convert himself, or to prepare himself thereunto.
When God converts a sinner, and translateth him into a state of grace, he worketh in man by his Spirit and word under the power of the Holy Spirit and by his grace alone enables him freely to will and to do that which is spiritually good.
10. Justification. — Those whom God effectually calleth he also freely justifieth, accounting and accepting their persons as righteous; not for anything wrought in them or done by them, but for Christ's sake alone.
11. Adoption. — All those that are justified, God vouchsafeth, in and for the sake of his only Son, Jesus Christ, to make partakers of all the blessings of his grace, to be taken in the number, and enjoy the liberties and privileges of children of God.
12. Sanctification. — They who are united to Christ, effectuately called and regenerate, having a new heart and a new spirit created in them, through the virtue of Christ's death and resurrection, are also to be renewed wholly and personally, through the same virtue, by his word and Spirit dwelling in them.
13. Spiritual Grace. — The grace of faith, whereby the elect are enabled to believe to the saving of their souls, is the work of the Spirit of Christ in their hearts, and is ordinarily wrought by the power of the word.
14. Repentance. — Saving repentance is an evangelical grace, whereby a person, being by the Holy Spirit made sensible of the manifold evils of his soul and the insufficiency of all his works, and being convinced of guilt by faith in Christ, humbles himself for it, with godly sorrow, detestation of it, and self-abhorrence.
15. Good Works. — Good works, done in obedience to God's commandments, are the fruits and evidences of a true and living faith.
16. Perseverance. — Those whom God hath accepted in the Beloved, effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit, shall certainly perseverance thereof unto the end, and be eternally saved.
17. Moral Law. — The moral law doth forever bind all, as well justified persons as others, to the obedience thereof, and the performance of the ten commandments; and by these men are judged, in it, but also in respect of the authority of God the Creator who gave it; neither doth Christ in the Gospel any wise discharge it, but much strengthens thereby this obligation.
18. The Sabbath. — God, by his word, in a positive, moral, and perpetual commandment, binding all men, in all ages, hath appointed one day in the week, the day called the Sabbath, to be kept holy unto him, which, from the beginning of the world to the resurrection of Christ, was the last day of the week; and so after the resurrection of Christ, ended in the first day of the week, which he called the Lord's day.
19. The Lord's Supper. — The Lord Jesus Christ, as Head of the church, in whom, by the appointment of the Father, all power for the calling, institution, order, or government of the church is invested in a supreme and sovereign manner. In the execution of this power, the Lord Jesus calleth out of the world unto himself, through the ministry of his word, by his Spirit, those that are saved by grace, and by this means, minister and apply the same before him in all the ways of obedience, which he prescribeth to them in his word.
20. Churches. — A particular church gathered, and completely organized according to the mind of Christ, consists of officers and members: and the officers appointed by Christ to the church and set apart by the church are bishops, or elders, and deacons.
21. Ministers, their Duty and Support. — The work of pastors being that of a holy ministry, it is necessary to the churches, in the ministry of the word, and prayer, with watching for their souls, as they that must give an account to him, it is incumbent upon all Christians to whom the states belong, not only to give them all due respect, but to communicate to them all the ends of the office, according to their ability.
22. Baptism. — Baptism is an ordinance of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ to be unto the party baptized a sign of the things promised in the Old Testament and resurrection; of his being ingrafted into him; of remission of sins; and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to live and walk in newness of life. Those who do actually judge the dispensation toward God, and obedience to our Lord Jesus Christ, are the only proper subjects of this ordinance. The outward element to be used in the performance thereof is to be immersed, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.
23. Lord's Supper. — The Supper of the Lord Jesus was instituted by him, the same night wherein he was betrayed, to be observed in his churches unto the end of the world, for the remission of sins; especially strengthening for the sacrifice of himself in his death.
24. The Resurrection. — The bodies of men after death return to that state from whence they came, being by incorporating an immortal substance, immediately return to God who gave them being thereupon annointed with righteousness, being then made perfect in holiness, are received into paradise, and stand before Christ and behold the face of God, in light and glory, waiting for the full redemption of his hands and resurrection of the wicked are cast into hell, where they remain in torment and utter darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day.
25. The Judgment. — God hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the world in righteousness, by Jesus Christ, to whom he hath given power and authority over all the works of creation, to judge the quick and the dead, and to put all in submission unto him. The souls of the righteous, being then made perfect in holiness, are received into paradise and stand before Christ and before God, who created them, and behold the face of God, in light and glory; and the souls of the wicked are cast into hell, where they remain in torment and utter darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day.

The American Baptists differ also from the British in a more general adoption of "close communion." See COMMUNION.

111. American Baptists. — The American Baptists, 1. United States. — According to the Baptist Almanac for 1866, there were, in 1856, 592 associations, 12,702 churches, 7867 ordained ministers, and 1,040,808 members. Of the latter, 5244 were members in German and Dutch, 600 in Swedish, and 1400 in Welsh churches. The number of Baptist colleges in 1857 was 18. The Baptists have colleges at Providence, Rhode Island, which was founded in 1764. The next in age, Madison University, at Hamilton, New York, was founded in 1819. Fifteen were organized from 1855 to 1869. The oldest theological school was organized in connection with Madison University in 1820. The whole number in 1855 was 12. The Baptists, in 1856, published 28 weekly papers, 14 monthlies, and 2 quarters — the Christian Review, at New York, and the Southern Review and Eclectic, at Nas-ville, Tenn. Two of the monthlies were published in foreign languages — one in German, one in Welsh. During the Civil War (from 1860 to 1864) nearly all the Baptist colleges, and record belonging to the Southern Confederacy were suspended, but after the close of the war were gradually revived.
The general benevolent associations are (1.) American Baptist Missionary Union, established in 1814. The receipts in 1865 were $169,793. The Board has auditted in the following countries: 3 in Central Asia; 1 in North America, 2 in Europe, and 14 in South-eastern Asia. The Asiatic missions have 15 stations, and more than 400 out-stations. There are now connected with the missions, including those in this country and exclusive of Europe, 84 American laborers — 41 males and 43 females — together with over 500 native helpert, of whom about 50 are ordained. Of native laborers in Europe there are 200. According to incomplete returns, there are about 36,000 members. See Misisons.

(7.) American Baptist Publication Society, established in 1824. In 1865 its receipts amounted to $158,954 93. Twenty-eight new publications were issued during the year, making 99,997,150 pages 18mo.

The total number of pages printed since the society's organization is about 531,000,000. The Register has a circulation of over 108,000. Twenty-six colporteurs were in commission, distributed in the different states and in Sweden.

Connected with the American Baptist Publication Society is the American Baptist Historical Society, which was established in 1853.

(8.) American Baptist Home Mission Society, established in 1832. Total receipts in 1865, $122,519. Missionaries and agents employed during the year, 296.

(9.) American and Foreign Bible Society. See Bible Societies.

(10.) American Baptist Free Mission Society, established in 1848. Total receipts for the year 1865, $26,031.

(11.) Southern Baptist Convention, established in 1845. Its Foreign Mission Board is located at Richmond, Va., and reported in 1855, receipts, $39,824 88; expenditures, $31,024 63.

The Domestic and Indian Mission Board is located at Marion, Ala. Receipts, $47,698 27; expenditures, $41,869 70. There have been under commission during the last year 10 Baptists, 10 the Creek Indians, 10 among the Chocawas, and 6 among the Cherokees.

The Bible Board is located at Nashville, Tenn.

(12.) Southern Baptist Publication Society, established in 1847. Receipts in 1858, $794 25; expenditures, $9159 89. The amount of volumes issued by the society from the first is 222,175, containing 82,775,666 pages.

2. Great Britain.—According to the English Baptist Manual for 1858, there were in Great Britain and Ireland 33 associations of Particular Baptists, 1917 church-ers (of which 1123 were associated), 101,397 members, 137,524 pupils of Sunday-schools. The annual report of the secretary of the Baptist Union in 1865 contained the following statistical statements: “All the country and district associations in England but one were now affiliated with the Union, and in all Great Britain and Ireland but four. Twenty churches had joined the Union during the year. The total number of churches in 1863, was 1338; the number of Baptist churches in the kingdom (England and Wales) being about 2400.

Returns had been ob-

ained from 1898 churches, and these showed a total of 198,295 members, or an excess of 22,063 over the preceding year. In Scotland there were, in 1865, 97 Baptist churches, 95 ministers, and 6000 members.
In Ireland, 87 churches, 24 ministers, 950 members. The Particular Baptists have 6 colleges: Bristol (founded in 1770); Horton College, Bradford (1804); Regent's Park, London (1810); Pontypool (1807); Haverford West (1841); and Edinburgh. The first five had to-goers, 933 pupils. The English Baptists have a college at Nottingham (since 1758), with 693 students; the New Connection of General Baptists a college at Leicester.
The religious and benevolent soicities are very numerous; the Baptist Year-book for 1869 mentions 17. The Baptist Missionary Society had in 1865 an income of $26,516, and missions in India, Ceylon, and the West Indies. In Africa the Baptists Union strives to be a bond of union for the independent Baptist churches and institutions throughout the world, and to prepare an annual report on the state of the denomination. The General Baptist Missionary Society has a mission of its own in the Sandwich Islands, and Baptist mission work obtains a mission in India. (A complete list is also given in Schem's Ecclisiasical Year-book for 1859, p. 120.) According to the Baptist Year-book, the periodi-Feet," which had produced no small excitement among this denomination, was discussed, and it was agreed that the churches of the denomination should be at full liberty to retain the ordinance or not. It is now not generally retained, nor even in denominations.

The ecclesiastical bodies among Free-will Baptists are,
the church, the quarterly meeting conference, the annual meeting, and the general conference. The officers in the church are two—elders and deacons. Each church elects its own pastor, and exercises discipline over its members; but, as a church, it is accountable to the yearly meeting, and the latter is accountable to the quarterly meetings to which they belong, and not to the churches over which they are pastors.
A council from the quarterly meeting organizes churches and ordains ministers. The quarterly meetings consist of ministers and such brethren as the churches may select. The general conference meets every three years, and consists of delegates chosen from the annual conferences.

Confession of Faith.

1. The Scriptures.—The Holy Scriptures, embracing the Old and New Testaments, were given by inspiration of God, and constitute the Christian's perfect rule of faith and practice.

2. God.—There is only one true and living God, who is a spirit—eternal, omniscient, omnipotent, omnipresent, independent, good, wise, just, and merciful; the creator, preserver, and governor of the universe; the redeemer, sanctifier, and judge of the world; the only proper object of divine worship. He exists in three persons, orthodoxly called the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which mode of existence is above the understanding of finite men.

3. Christ.—The Son of God possesses all divine perfections, which are proven from his title: true God, great, mighty, God, over all, etc.; his attributes: eternal, unchangeable, omnipotent, omnipresent, etc., and from his works. He is the only incarnation of the Divine Being.

4. The Holy Spirit.—He has the attributes of God ascribed to him, and is God, eternally possessed of the souls of men, and is the third person in the Godhead.

5. Creation.—God created the world and all it contains for his own pleasure and the enjoyment of his creatures; and the angels, to glorify and obey him.

6. Man a Primitive State, and his Fall.—Our first parents were created in the image of God, holy, and upright, and free; but, by yielding to temptation, fell from that state, and all their posterity with them, they then being in Adam's image; and the whole human family became exposed to temporal and eternal death.

7. The Atonement.—As sin cannot be pardoned without a sacrifice, and the blood of beasts could never actually wash away sin, Christ gave himself a sacrifice for the sins of the world, that they might be forgiven, and the salvation of all possible believers. Through the redemption of Christ man is placed on a second state of trial; this second state so far differing from the first, that now men are disposed to try the试验 of the living and dead Hands of God, and will not regain the Image of God in holiness but through the atonement by the operation of the Holy Spirit.
All who believe in the atonement are rendered sure of eternal life. Through the provisions of the atonement all are afloated to repent of their sins and yield to God; the Gospel is a declaration of the spirit enlightens all, and men are agents capable of choosing or refusing.

8. Regeneration is an instantaneous renovation of the soul by the Spirit of God, whereby the soul is cleansed, believing in and giving up all for Christ, receives new life, and becomes a child of God. This change is produced by true conviction, repentance, and persistent sorrow for sin. It is called in Scripture being born again, born of the Spirit, passing from death unto life. All who are justified with Christ are then justified with

9. Sanctification is a setting apart the soul and body for holy service, an entire consecration of all our ransomed powers and faculties to the service of God and his will.

10. perseverance, as the regenerate are placed in a state of trial during life, their future obedience and final salvation are thereby dependent or certain; it is, however, their duty and privilege to be steadfast in the truth, to grow in grace, persevere in holiness, and make their election sure.

1. The Church.—A Christian church is an assembly of believers, both in Christ, and worship the true God according to his word. In it is more generally taught the whole body of real Christians throughout the world.
The church being the body of Christ, none, but the regenerate, are obey the laws, the real members are recived into a particular church on their giving evidence of faith, covenanting to walk according to the Christian rule, and believing the truth of the Gospel.

12. Baptism.—Baptism is an immersion of the candidate in water, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and confers upon the candidate being one who gives evidence of a change of heart.

13. Confirmation.—Confirmation is a solemn partaking of the bread and wine, and acknowledgment of the death and suffer-

The denomination has a printing establishment at Dover, N. H.; two colleges—Bates, at Lewiston, Me., with 400 students, and Hillsdale, Mich., with 500 students; two theological seminaries, one in New Hampton, N. H., with 16 students, the other at Hillsdale, Mich., with 21 students (1867). In 1866 the following statistics were reported: Yearly meetings, 51; quarterly meetings, 147; ordained preachers, 1076; licensed preachers, 104; churches, 1204; total membership, 52,238. The Foreign Missionary Society has a mission at Orissa, India (receipts for 1866, $12,165); they have also a Home Miss. Society and an Education Society. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia they have about 4000 members, and a journal, the Religious Intelligence, published at St. John's, N. B. See Stewart, Concordia Seminary, and the New School of Redakciones in the United States; Belcher, Religious Denominations; Cox, The Baptists (in the Encyclopedia Metropolitana); Schoen, Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859; Free-will Baptist Register.

BAPTISTS, GERMAN, a denomination of American Baptists who are commonly called Dunkers, who call themselves Brethren. They originated at Schwarzenau, in Germany, in 1708, but were driven by persecution to America between 1719 and 1729.
They purposely neglect any record of their proceedings, and are opposed to statistics, which they believe to be dishonorable. They have an original church in Pennsylvania, but are now most numerous in Ohio. In 1760, a party of Universalists, led by one John Ham, separated from the Dunkers, since which time there has been no connection between them. The seceders are to be found in Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa.
The whole denomination has been believed to hold Universalist views, but they have always protested against the charge. With the Mennonites, they appeal to the Confessions of Faith published in Holland two centuries ago. They practise trine immersion, with laying on of hands while the person is in the water. They lay their candidate forward in the water instead of laying him backward, as Dunkers do. They are divi-sed into congregations or churches, and are either are bishops (or ministers), elders, teachers, and deacons (or visiting brethren). They also have deaconesses—aged women, who are allowed to exercise their gifts staidly. Bishops are chosen from the teachers, after they have been fully tried and found faithful.
It is their duty to travel from one congregation to another, to preach, to officiate at marriages and funerals, to set in order whatever may be wanting, to be present at love-feasts and communions, when a bishop is to be ordained, when teachers or deacons are chosen or elected, and when any officer is to be excommunicated. An elder is the first or eldest chosen teacher in a congregation, and it is his duty to appoint meetings, to assist in excommunication, to exhort and pray, to baptize, to travel occasionally, and, where no bishop is present, to perform all the duties of the latter. Teachers are chosen by vote. It is their duty to exhort and preach at any of their stated services, and, when so ordained, to be a bishop or elder, to perform the ceremonies of matrimo-y and of baptism. It is the duty of deacons to keep a constant oversight of poor widows and their children, and give them such aid from time to time as may be necessary; to visit all the families in the congregation once a year, and exhort, comfort, edify them, as well as to reconcile all offenses and misunderstandings that may occur from time to time.

time; and, when necessary, to read the Scriptures, pray, and exhort at the regular meetings. An annual meeting is held about Whitsonnende, and attended by bishops and teachers, as well as by such other members as may be delegated by the congregations. A committee of five of the oldest bishops hears those cases which may be referred to them by the teachers and representatives from the congregations. Their decisions are published in English and German. In plainness of speech and dress they resemble the Societies. Baptists are not generally engaged in war, and seldom take interest for the money which they lend to their poorer brethren. The Baptist Almanac for 1860 estimates the number of their preachers at 200, of congregations at 150, of members at 8,000. The census of 1850 gives them only 62 church edifices, which indicates that a large number of their congregations worship in school-houses. See Belcher, Religious Denominations; Baptist Almanac for 1860. See Dunkers.

BAPTISTS, OLD-SCHOOL. A name assumed by those Baptists who, in the second half of the past century, opposed the formation of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, and similar institutions, which they considered to detract from the simplicity and solemnity of Christian worship. They sought to preserve the ordinances of the church from being corrupted by the introduction of foreign customs, and from being reduced to mere formalities. They wished the church to be a community of those who had been regenerate, and who had been associated in religious worship. They were also opposed to the use of instrumental music in the worship of God. The name was adopted in accordance with the wish of the majority of the members of the church, and was used in preference to the name of the New School. The name was adopted in 1823, and the church was called the Old School. The name was retained, and the church was called the Old School. The name was adopted in accordance with the wish of the majority of the members of the church, and was used in preference to the name of the New School. BAPTISTS, SEVENTH-DAY. A denomination of Baptists who keep the seventh day of the week instead of the first day of the week as Sabbath. In England they assumed, soon after the Reformation, the name of Sabbatarian; but in 1818 this term was rejected by the general conference in America, and the term Seventh-day Baptists adopted. They believe that the first day was not generally used in the Christian Church as Sabbath before the reign of Constantine. Traces of seventh-day keepers are found in the times of Gregory I, Gregory VII, and in the twelfth century in Lombardy. In Germany they appeared late in the fifteenth, and in England in the sixteenth century. In 1558, a work advising the observance of the Sabbath in England was published by one Nicholas Bound, D.D., and several of their members suffered imprisonment. They assumed a denominational organization in 1650, and counted at the end of the seventeenth century eleven churches, of which now only three remain. In America the first Seventh-day Baptists were connected with First-day Baptist churches. A separate organization was commenced in 1671. Yearly meetings commenced at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and a general conference was organized at the beginning of the nineteenth century, which held its meetings at first annually, later (since 1846) triennially. In 1840 they divided themselves into five associations (Eastern, Western, Central, Virginia, and Ohio). They have repeatedly taken action against slavery, and in favor of temperance and other reforms. A foreign missionary society was established in 1842, and supports missionaries in China and Palestine. Besides, they have a Tract and Publishing Society. The latter issues a weekly, monthly, and quarterly periodical. Their literary institutions are De Ruyster Institute and Alfred University, both in the State of New York, besides several smaller academies. The Baptist Almanac for 1860 gives the following statistics: 67 churches, 70 ministers, 7.150 converts, 7,500 members. See Belcher, Religious Denominations.

BAPTISTS, SEVENTH-DAY (GERMAN), a denomination of Baptists which arose by secession from the German Baptists (q. v.) or Dunkers. In 1725 Conrad Beisels published a tract against the celebration of the first day, and, when this created some disturbance in the society at Mill Creek, he, as a member, retired to a cell on the banks of the Co-calic, and lived there for some time unknown to the people he had left. When discovered, some other members of the society at Mill Creek settled around him, and in 1728 introduced the seventh day into public worship. In 1732 the colloquy was changed into a conventual one, and a monastical society was established in May, 1738. The establishment received the name Ephraim. The habit of Capuchins was adopted by both the brethren and the sisters, and monastic names given to all who entered the cloister. No monastic vows were taken, none was made, none had they any written covenant. The property which belonged to the society was common stock, yet none were obliged to give up any of their possessions. Celibacy they recommend as a virtue, but do not require it. Governor Penn, who visited them frequently, offered to them five thousand acres of land, but they refused it. At an early time they established a seminary, a Sabbath-school, and a printing-office, and greatly cultivated music. Branches of the society of Ephraim were established in 1756 in York county, and in 1768 in Bedford county. Their principal settlement at present is at Snowhill, near the Antietam Creek, in Franklin county, Pa. The congregations do not believe to exceed a few hundreds in numbers, and their ministers may be as many as ten or twelve. See Belcher, Religious Denominations; (Winetrenner) Hist. of Denom. in the U.S.

BAPTISTS, SIX-PRINCIPLE. The six principles which distinguish this section of Baptists from all others are those mentioned in the Epistle to the Hebrews vi, 1, 2, viz.: 1. Repentance from dead works; 2. Faith toward God; 3. The doctrine of baptism; 4. The laying on of hands; 5. The resurrection of the dead; 6. Eternal judgment. They distinguish four baptisms: 1. John's "baptizing with the baptism of repentance;" 2. The baptism of the Holy Ghost and with fire on the day of Pentecost; 8. The baptism of Christ's sufferings. But after the resurrection of Christ there is only one kind of baptism to remain, viz., 4. The baptism of the believers in Christ in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Their rite of "laying on of hands" corresponds with the Episcopalian and Presbyterian "laying on of hands," the system on which they insist. They refuse communion as well as church-fellowship with churches who do not practise it. The Six-Principle Baptists are Armenians, holding to a general atonement. Their ministry generally has not been liberally educated nor adequately supported. They are almost confined to Rhode Island, out of which they have only a few congregations in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. They originated as a separate organization in 1839, and at no period of their history counted more than 89 churches. In 1835 they formed two yearly conferences, the one in Rhode Island, the other in New York and Pennsylvania. The Baptist Almanac for 1860 gives the following statistics: 18 churches, 16 ordained ministers, 8,000 members. Bar (properly בָּרָא, ber' a·ch) chiefly occurs in the following senses: 1 that whereby a door is bolted and made fast (Neh. iii, 8); a narrow cross-board or rafter wherewith to fasten other boards (Exod. xxvi, 26); a rock in the sea (Deut. ii, 3); the bank or shore of the sea, which, as a bar, shuts up its waves in their own place (Job xxxviii, 10); strong fortifications and powerful impediments are called bars, or bars of iron (Isa. xiv, 3; Amos i, 5). See Door.

Barabba (Barabjia, for the Chald. barabja, son of Abb.), Simoniz, Nom. N. T. p. 88; a common name in the Talmud, Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 489, a robber (Arapic, John xviii, 40) who had committed murder in an insurrection (Mark xv, 7; Luke xxii, 19) in Jerusalem, and was lying in prison at the time of the trial of Jesus before Pilate, A.D. 29. The procurrator, in his anxiety to save Jesus, proposed to release him to the people, in accordance with their demand that he should release one prisoner to them at the Passover. As a rebel, he was subject to the punishment laid down by the Roman law for such political offences, while as a murderer he could not escape death even by the civil code of the Jews. But the latter were so bent on the death of Jesus that, of the two, they preferred pardoning this double criminal (Matt. xxvii, 16-26; Mark xv, 7-15; Luke xxiii, 18-25; John xviii, 40), who was set free (Acts iii, 14). There appears to have been a usage in Jerusalem, at the paschal feast, for the governor to release to the people a prisoner whom they might particularly desire. This custom does not appear to have been ancient; it was probably derived either from the Syrians or from the Greeks and Romans, the former of whom had such a custom at their Themophoria, the latter at their Lecfasternia. Some think the policy of this provision was obviously to conciliate the favor of the Jews toward the Roman government. See Passover.

Origen says that in many copies Barabba was also called Jesus (Ioseph Barajja, see the Darmst. Lex.
Bib., 1843, p. 530). The Armenian version has the same reading; "Who will you that I shall deliver unto you, Jesus Barabba, or Jesus that is called Christ?" Griesbach, in his Comment., considers this as an interpolation, while Fritzsche has adopted it in his text (so also Tischendorf in Matt. xxxvi, 16, 17, but not his last ed.). We can certainly conceive that a name afterward so sacred may have been turned out by the text by some bigoted transcriber. On the other hand, the contrast in ver. 20, "that they should ask Barab-ba and destroy Jesus," seems fatal to its original point in the text. See Jesus.

Barak (Heb. Barak, "lighting," Sept. and N. T. Baq, Joseph. Ant. v, 5, 2, Baqaros; comp. the family name of Hannibal, Barea, "lightning of war"), son of Abinoam of Kedesh-naphtali, a Galilean city of refuge in the tribe of Naphtali (Judg. iv, 6; comp. Josh. xxxii, 32); he was summoned by the prophetess Deborah to take the field against the hostile army of the Canaanitish king Jabin (q. v.), commanded by Sisera (q. v.), with 10,000 men from the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulon, and to encamp on Mount Tabor, probably because the 900 chariots of Iron would be in the way. The Chaldean army of England, whose force comprises all the British Windward Islands, and had, in 1859, 88 clergyman, including two

Bidding, on condition that she would go with him, which she readily promised. At a signal given by the prophetess, the little army, seizing the opportunity of a providential storm (Joseph. Ant. v, 4) and a wind that blew the camp of the enemy bodily raised down the hill, and utterly routed the unwieldy host of the Canaanites in the plain of Jezreel (Esraelon), "the battle-field of Palestine." From the prominent mention of Taanach (Judg. v, 19, "sandy soil") and of the river Kishon, it is most likely that the victory was partly due to the suddenly swollen waves of that impetuous torrent, particularly its western branch called Megiddo. The victory was decisive, Haroeth taken (Judg. iv, 16), Sisera murdered, and Jabin ruined. A peace of forty years ensued, and the next danger came from a different quarter. The victors composed a splendid epiphanic ode in commemoration of their deliberative (Judg. v). See Deborah. Barak's faith is commended among the other worthies of the Old Test. in Heb. xi, 32. See also Bene-barak.

From the incidental data apparently given in Judg. v, 6, some have regarded Barak as a contemporary of Shamgar. If so, he could not have been so late as 1270 B.C., 78 years after the departure of the Israelites. Lord A. H. Sayce supposes the narrative to be a repetition of Josh. xi, 1-12; (Genealogies, p. 228 sq.). A great deal may be said for this view: the names Jabin and Hazor; the mention of subordinate kings (Judg. v, 19; comp. Josh. ii, 2 sq.); the general locality of the battle; the prominence of chariots in both narratives, and especially in the name Minrahitim: min, which seems to mean "burning by the waters," as in the margin of the A. V., and not "the flow of waters." Many chronological difficulties are also thus removed; but it is fair to add, that in Stanley's opinion (Palest. p. 592 note), there are geographical difficulties in the way (see also p. 647). Thomas Long and Book, ii, 141 sq. There appears, therefore, on the whole, no good reason for departing from the regular order of the judges, which places his rule B.C. 1400-1389. —Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See Judges.

Baratier, John Philip, an eminent boy-scholar, was born January 19th, 1721, at Schwebach, in Anspaach. His father, Francis, was pastor of the French Protestant church in Schwebach, and gave his son careful instruction from infancy. At the age of 11 he could speak Latin, French, and German, and at seven he knew by heart the Psalms i. Hebrew. In his tenth year he composed a Hebrew Dictionary of rare words, and in his thirteenth he translated the Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela (Anst. 1734, 2 vols. 8vo). He afterward applied himself to ecclesiastical studies, the fathers, and theology, and answered a Unitarian work which Crellius published (under the name of Artemo-nius) in a book entitled Adversaria Mortuorum (Nuremb. 1735). In 1735, on his way to Berlin, he passed through Halla, where he was made M.A.; upon which occasion he composed, impromptu, fourteen times in the essence of the orators, and on the following day defended them for three hours before a public audience with entire success. At Berlin he was received with honor by the king, and was enrolled among the members of the Royal Society. At the king's request he established himself at Halla to study law, and died there October 4th, 1740, being only nine years of age. He also published Dequisitio Chronologica de Succeisione antiquissima Rom. Pontificum (Utrecht, 1740, 4to), and some other works. His life, by Formey, was published at Halla, 1741 (2 ed. Frankfort, 1755).—Bun.-Cree. iii, 222; Landon, Ecc. Dict. s. v.

Barbara, Sr., whose day is observed in the Greek and Roman churches December 4th, is said to have suffered martyrdom at Helicopolis, Egypt, under Ga-

Barbarian (βαρβάρος), a term used in the New Testament, as in classical writers, to denote other nations of the earth in distinction from the Greeks (Serv. av. Virg. En. ii, 504). "I am debtor both to the Greeks and Barbarians" (Rom. i, 14). (Comp. Plato Polit. p. 260; Erat. p. 388; Theod. p. 175; Pliny, xxix. 7; Aristot. De Celo, i, 8; Polyb. v, 33, 5.) In Colosseans iii, 11, "Greek nor Jew—Barbarian, Scythian"—βαρ-βάρος seems to refer to those nations of the Roman empire who did not speak Greek, and ἐξ ἔθεως to nations not understanding Roman. In 1 Cor. xiv, 11, the term is applied to a difference of language: "If I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me." Thus Ovid, "Barba-rus hic ego sum, quia non intelligor ulli" (Trist. v, 10, 37). In Acts xxviii, the inhabitants of Malta are called βαρβάρως, because they were originally a Carthaginian colony, and chiefly spoke the Punic language. In the Sept. βαρβάρος is used for the Hebrew דָּגָּד, קָזִּז, "a people of strange language" (Psa. cxiv, 1); Chaldee קַזְזֵי. In the rabbinical writers the same Heb. word is applied to foreigners in distinction from the Jews; and in the Jerusalem Talmud it is explained as meaning the Greek language; Rabbi Solomon remarks that whatever is not in the holy tongue is called by this term (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v.). According to Herodotus, the Egyptians called all men barbarians who did not speak the same language as themselves (ii, 158). Clement of Alexandria uses it respecting the Egyptians and other nations, even when speaking of their progress in civilization, as in his Stromata, v, 26. The barbarians at his arrival in inventors not only of philosophy, but likewise of almost every art. The Egyptians, and, in like manner, the Chaldeans, first introduced among men the knowledge of astrology." In a singular passage of Justin Mar-tyris' first Apology the term is applied to Abraham and other distinguished Hebrews: "We have learned and whether in the same sense (Thucyd. i, 5). The word appears to have acquired a reproachful sense during the wars with the Persians; their country was called ἀρβαρος (αρβαρος) (Demosth. Philipp. iii). In 1 Cor.
v, 18, 1 Tim. iii, 7, we have "those outside" (οἱ ἐξω), and Matt. vi, 32, "the nations" (ὁι ἀνθρώποι), used He-bristically for "the Gentiles" (τοιούτους, ἔν πάντι, in very much the same sort of sense as that of ἀρβαρος), to distinguish all other nations from the Jews; and in the Talmudists we find Palestine opposed to "the lands" (τῆς Φυλλᾶς), just as Greece was to Barbaria or αρβαρος (comp. Cic. Fin. ii, 15; Lightfoot, Cassius Chorograph. ad init.). And yet it completely was the term ἀρβαρος accepted, that even Josephus (Ant. xi, 7, 1; xiv, 10, 1; xxvi, 6, 8; War, intro.; Apion, i, 11 and 22) and Philo (Ipp. i, 29) scruple to little to reckon the Jews among them as the early Romans did to apply the term to themselves ("Demophilus scripsit, Marcus verit barbara"), Plaut. Amul. pro. 10). Very naturally, the word, after a time, began to involve notions of cruelty and contempt (βαρβαρος βαρβαρος, 2 Marc. iv, 28; xv, 2, etc.), and then the Romans exccepted themselves from the scope of its meaning (Cic. de Rep. i, 37, § 68). Afterward only the savage nations were called barbarians, though the Greek Constantinopolitans called the Romans "barbarians" to the very last (Gibbon, ii, 533, ed. Smith). See Iken, given to the Gnostics. See GNOSTICISM.

Barber (בָּזרָר), gollab. "Son of man, take theo a sharp knife, take thee a barber's razor, and cause it to pass upon thine head and upon thy beard" (Ezek. v, as an act of mourning. See GRIEF. Sometimes, for the same reason, the hair of the beard was also shaven.

at Jerusalem on finding that the Hebrews had intermixed with the nations among them, and plunged into all their idolatries (Ezra ix, 3). See HAIR. The operation of shaving the head was probably performed much in the same manner as is now usual in the East. The Barcelona, one of the chief cities of Spain, and see of a Roman Catholic archbishop. Councils were held there in 540, 599, 906, 1054, and 1068. Bar-cephna, Moses, a Jacobite bishop and author, who early in life entered the convent of Sergius, on the island of Cappadocia, and rose to the episcopal order under the name of Severus, and is sometimes called bishop of Beth-Ceno, sometimes of Bethraman. He is said to have died in 913. He composed a "Commentary on Paradise" in Syriac, which was translated into Latin by And. Masius, and printed at Antwerp in 1662 in the Bibliotheca Varia, and in the Critica Sacra. This work is divided into three parts. Part I inquires whether there was both a terrestrial and a spiritual paradise, and concludes that there was but one. Part II gives the mystic signification of all the passages of Holy Scripture relating to the terrestrial paradise. Part III answers the objection of heretics, e.g., that of Simon Magnus, who accused the Almighty of the want of power to preserve Adam from the fall.—Clarke, Sacred Literature, ii. 655.

Barckhausen, Conrad Heinrich, a German theologian of the 18th century. He was professor, and later rector of one of the Berlin colleges. He had with his colleague Volckmann an animated controversy on the subject of divine grace, Volckmann advocating universal grace, and Barckhausen maintaining particularism. The title of the work of Barckhausen, which he published under the name of Pacificus Verinus, is Amica Colloatio doctrinae de gratia quam vera reformata confecit ecclesiae, cum doctrinae quam Volckmannus publicavit... fecit (Furt, 1714). The controversy was joined in St. Petersburg. Both sides in this controversy, and Barckhausen himself is said to be the author of another work on the subject, published in the German language (Abgebildete Ehr- und Lehr-Rettung der Reformierten Kirchen [1714]). In 1719, a royal edict of King Friedrich Wilhelm I imposed silence upon both parties.—Herzog, Suppl., i. 167.

Barclay, Barkley, or De Barkly, Alexander, a poet and prose writer, born toward the end of the 16th century, but whether English or Scotch by birth is uncertain. He was certainly at Oriel College, Oxford, about 1495, and, after finishing his studies, he travelled in Holland, Germany, Italy, and France, and studied the languages and literature of those countries. Returning to England, he became one of the priests or prebendaries of the college of St. Mary Ottery, Devonshire, and was afterward a monk of the Benedictine monastery of Ely, where he continued till the suppression of the monastery in 1539. In 1546 he obtained the vicarage of Great Barrow and that of Wokey. On 9th April, 1559, he fled to Ely to avoid the horrors of Allhallows, but died in June of that year at Croydon. His character as a priest is dubious, but of his merit as a writer there is no dispute. If there were no other proof of it than his famous Ship of Fools, partly a translation and partly an imitation from the German of Sebastian Brandt, the old title being The Ship of Fools of the World (London, 1695).—New Gen. Biog. Dict., ii. 47; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, s.v.

Barclay, Henry, D.D., was born in 1714, and graduated at Yale in 1724, serving for some years as missionary among the Mohawks. He went to England in 1737 to be ordained, and on his return assumed the charge of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Albany. In 1746 he became rector of Trinity Church, New York, which position he held till his death; and the degree of D.D. was made D.D. by the University of Oxford in 1760. Dr. Barclay was zealous and indefatigable, his disposition engaging, and his life most exemplary.—Sprague, Annals, v. 91.

Barclay, John, was born at Pont-l'Mousson, in Lorraine, where his father, William Barclay (q.v.), was law professor, in 1662. He studied at the college of the Jesuits there, and the brethren, observing his genius, attempted to draw him into their order. This offended his father, who left the college with his son in 1683 and returned to England. He wrote verses in praise of King James, and would doubtless have succeeded at court had he not been a Romanist. His works were repressed by the Banished Act (in several English and many French editions since), which had an immense popularity, and was translated into various languages. We mention him here for the following works: Series pastorali diecinis patriardici, etc. (A History of the Gunpowder Plot, Amst. 1605, 12mo); Petus, etc. (a defense of his work against Bellarmine; Paris, 1611, 4to); Parmenta auctri accepsit hujus temporis (Rome, 1617, 12mo; an appeal to Protestants in favor of Romanism). He died at Rome, Aug. 12, 1621.—New Gen. Biog. Dictionary, ii. 49; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i., 117.

Barclay, John, founder of the "Bereans" (q.v.), was born at Muthill, Perthshire, Scotland, in 1734, and studied at the University of St. Andrews, where he graduated A.M. in 1759; he was licensed by the presbytery of Auchterarder, and became assistant minister of Errol, and in 1763 assistant minister of Fettercairn in Forfarshire. Here he began to act the religious leader, and attracted crowds of hearers by his novels of doctrine. In 1766 he published a Paraphrase of the Book of Psalms, with a dissertation on interpretation, which was censured by the presbytery. On the death of the clergyman to whom he was assistant in 1773, the presbytery refused him the necessary testimonials for accepting a benefice elsewhere, and then he left the Church of Scotland, and became the leader of the sect called Bar- reans, or Allocauts. His account of their religious system was preached for some time in Edinburgh, and subsequently in London and Bristol. In London he kept open a debating society, where he supported his doctrines against all impugners. He died on the 29th of July, 1798.—Penney Cyclopaedia, s.v. See Bereans.

Barclay, Robert, of Ury, the eminent Quaker, was the son of Colonel David Barclay, and was born at Gordonstone, Morayshire, Scotland, December 23, 1648. His elementary education over, he was sent to the Scotch college at Paris, where his uncle was rector, and there he imbued a strong predilection for Romanism. His uncle offered to make him a heir if he would stay in France and enter the Roman Church; but, though his quakers' formation had been impressed by the splendid services of the church, he refused, and returned to England in 1664. It is said that even at this time (when he was only sixteen) he was an excellent scholar, and could speak in the Latin language with wonderful fluency and correctness. His father joined the Quakers, and his example was soon followed by his son, who thenceforward became an indefatigable propagator of their opinions both at home and in Holland. He gives an account of his change, in substance, as follows (in his Treatise on Universal Love), viz.: that "his first edocation fall among the strictest sort of Calvinists, those of his country 'surpassing in the heat of zeal now to the meanest of the other sects, as if they had never been introduced into the world; but all the other so-called reformed churches; that shortly afterward, his transition to France had thrown him among the opposite 'sect of pepists, whom, after a time, he found to be no less deficient in charity than the other; and that consequently he had refrained from joining any, though he had listened to several. The ultimate effect of this was to liberalize his mind by convincing him of the folly and wickedness of religious strife. In both Calvinists and Catholics he found an absence of 'the principles of love, 'a strictness of doctrine,' and a 'practice of persecution,' which offended his idea of Christianity, as well as himself. He therefore allied himself gladly to this new sect, whose distinguishing feature was its charity and pure simplicity of Christian life, and soon became one of its most devoted adherents and its ablest advocate. In the course of his life he made several excursions into England, Holland, and Germany, earnestly propagating his peaceful views wherever he went, and occasionally enjoying the companionship of William Penn."

Barclay believed, as the Society of Friends now do, that divine revelation is not incompatible with right reason, yet he believed, as orthodox Friends also now do, that the faculty of reasoning alone, unassisted by divine illumination, is unable to comprehend or receive the sublime truths relative to that redemption and salvation which came by Jesus Christ. To show that the tenets held by the society were capable of a rational vindication, Barclay employed all the powers of his intellect, and produced a succession of works in explanation and defence of Quakerism. The first was "Truth cleared of Cummines" (1670), especially in reply to Mitchell, a minister near Aberdeen, who reiterated his slanders in a pamphlet, which was answered by Barclay in his "William Mitchell unmasked," etc. (Ury. 1671).

Then followed an exposition of the doctrines and principles of the Quakers, bearing the title "A Collection and Confession of Faith," approved of and agreed unto by the General Assembly of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles, Christ himself chief Speaker in and among them; in which the answers are all given in the language of the Bible" (1675); translated into Latin; "Confessio quakerorum" (Rotterdam. 1676, 8vo); "The Anarchy of the Ranters" (1676, 12mo); "A Vindication of the same (1679); Theseologica, comprising, in fifteen propositions, the doctrines maintained by the Quakers. This was sent abroad, in various languages, to the principal clergymen, and made the greatest work, "Theologicae Christianae Apologiae" (Amsterdam. 1676, 4to); translated into English, "An Apology for the true Christian Divinity," etc. (London. 1678; often reprinted, and translated into German and other languages). The Apology was dedicated to King Charles II, and had the misfortune to receive the private objections of various opinions. It could not be denied that in their forms of worship, of marriage, and of burial there was a wide departure from the customary ceremonial, and it was generally understood that the society carried its interference to a great extent in the private concerns of those who belonged to its communion. These regulations were vindicated by Barclay in a work wherein he contrasts the internal government of the Quakers with the anarchy of the Ranters and the hierarchy of the Romanists, justifying the discipline of his sect, and defending its members from those who accuse them of confusion and disorder, and from such as charge them with tyranny and imposition. The publication of this treatise on discipline, which runs through the whole took is, that divine truth is made known to us not by logical investigation, but by intuition or immediate revelation; and that the faculty, if it can be technically defined, by which such intuition is rendered possible, is the 'inner light,' the source of which is God, or, more properly, Christ, who is the 'light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.' The identity of this doctrine with that held by Mr. Maurice and others of the Broad Church in the present day has been more than once remarked."

"Holy Writ," according to Barclay, is "a declarato fomina, not the original source of knowing the truth; it is that which is fallible, without exception, which is not a representation of the original source of knowledge. It is subordinate to the Holy Spirit, from whom it derives its excellence. It is worthy of notice, that he argues for the substitution of Scrip-purest spirit of Christian benevolence and peace. His last literary work was his Possibility and Necessity of the immediate Revelation of the Spirit of God (1866, 8vo). He afterward enjoyed so high a reputation that in 1862 he was appointed governor of New Jersey, in America, by royal commission, liberty being granted to him of appointing a deputy, which he did, and never visited his government in person. Barclay, William, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, about 1546, was a Roman Catholic, and a favorite of Mary Queen of Scots. After her fall he went to France, studied law, and was made professor of that branch at the new University of Pont-à-Mousson. Finding that the Jesuits were likely to draw his son John into their ranks (see Barclay, John), he left the University, returned to England, and was offered a professorship in the civil law at Oxford. He desired to go abroad, if he would conform to the Anglican Church. This, however, he refused to do, and returned to France, where he was made professor at Angers, and died in 1605 (or 1609). He wrote (besides other works on law, etc.) De Populata Papae, an e deantum in Regna et Principes seculararum Jesu et Imperium habeat (London, 1608, 8vo), Pontà-Mousson, 1670, 8vo; translated into French, Pont-à-Mousson, 1611; Cologne, 1688, 8vo). In this work he vindicates the independent rights of princes against the usurpations of the pope.—Bayle, Dictionary, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 471.

Bar-cocheba (Chal. ברא-חושبة "son of the star") or Simeon Bar-cocheba, a Jewish impostor, who applied to himself the prophecy of Balaam (Num. xxiv, 17), and incited the Jews to revolt against the emperor Hadrian (A.D. 130). He passed himself off for the Messiah, and his pretensions were supported by Akiba (q. v.), the chief of the Sanhedrim. The better to deceive the credulous Jews, according to Jerome, he pretended to vomit flames, by means of a piece of lighted tow which he kept in his mouth. Bar-cocheba profited by the sedition in which he found the Jews, and took Jerusalem, A.D. 132. He issued coins having on one side his own name, and on the other "Freedom of Jerusalem." In the British Museum is a coin ascribed by some to Simon the Maccabee (q. v.), of some after it appears to have been modelled, corresponding to the description given by Tychen and others of a coin of Bar-cocheba. One side of this coin represents a portion of four columns, in the midst of which is a lyre; a serpentine stroke below is said to represent the brook of Kidron, and a star seems to allude to Numbers xxiv, 17. The other side has a vesel of maize and a leaf. Münster concluded, from a similar coin, that Bar-cocheba had commenced the rebuilding of the Temple; but microphone Calixtus, (Hist. Eccl. iii, c. 24) and Credenrus (Script. Bys, xii, 244) say only that the Jews intended to rebuild the Temple. All the thieves, murderers, and disorderly characters in the country quickly repaired to his standard, and he was soon strong enough to vanquish, in several engagements, J. Annianus Rufus, the Roman commander in Judaea. On this the emperor Hadrian ordered his most able commander, Julius Severus, to leave his post in Britain and repair to Palestine; but the time which elapsed during his journey was favorable to the rebels. After his arrival, Julius Severus prudently planted garrisons in Judaea, but took the chief fortified places before he marched against Jerusalem, which he took and destroyed after sustaining great losses.

The Jews, after the capture of the city, concentrated their forces in the mountain-fortress of Bethar, in the neighborhood of Jerusalem. While Julius Severus was gradually reconquering the country, Bar-cocheba still played the king in Bethar for three years, and, on the unfounded suspicion of treason, executed the learned Eleazar of Modain, who, having prayed for the welfare of the fortress, was slain by a Cuthite (that is, a Samaritan), as if he intended to betray Bethar to Hadrian. According to Talmudic statements, Bethar was taken in 182 by the Romans, on the 9th day of the month of Ab, the anniversary of the burning of the Temple under Titus. It has been stated that on this occasion 588,000 Jews perished, but this must be greatly exaggerated. Bar-cocheba fell in the combat, and his head was brought into the Roman camp. Akiba (according to most accounts), and many others, who were considered authors of the rebellion, were put to a cruel death. The new city, "E militia Callotina (q. v.)," was founded on the site of Jerusalem.—Jost, Gesch. d. Isr. Volkes, vol. ii; Mosheim, Ch. Bar-sanes, a Gnostic heresiarch, scholar, and poet of the second century at Edessa, in Mesopotamia (about A.D. 170). Lucius Verus, it is said, tried to induce him from the Christian faith, and at last threatened him. He replied "that he feared not death, from which he should not escape, even if he complied with the emperor's desire." According to Ephraim, he defended the faith against Apollonius, a Stoic, and wrote against Marcion; but afterward he fell into the errors of the Valentinian Gnostics, though in some points he differed materially from Valentinian. Jerome speaks highly of the style in which his works were written, and Eusebius speaks of his recantation of error before his death. His treatise On the Creation, which was first translated in Cureton's Syriacus (Lond. 1855). See Eusebius, Prep. Evang. lib. vi, ch. x. Bar-sanes left a son called Harmonius, and many other disciples, who added to the errors which he had sown. He maintained that the supreme God, being free from all imperfection, created the world and its inhabitants pure and incorrupt; that the Prince of Darkness, who is the fountain of all evil and misery, enticed men to sin; in consequence of which, God permitted them to be divested of those eternal bodies with which he had endued them, and to fall into sluggish and abject lives, formed for nothing, and that Jesus descended from heaven, clothed with an unreal or aerial body, to recover mankind from that body of corruption which they now carry about them; and that he will raise the obedient to mansions of felicity, clothed with aerial vehicles, or celestial bodies. The errors of Bar-sanes arose chiefly from his attempt to exalt the origin of evil, to depreciate the beneficent Supreme Being, he could not believe him the source of evil. He sought that source in Satan, whom he described, not as the creature, but the enemy of God, and as endowed with self-existence (γι̣ αν ὁν ἄνθι βολον αὐτοκρυς λογισμον, ἀν αὐτοκροτομον, is the phrase of Bar-sanes in Origine, Dial. haer. iii, 39, 20). Yet he represents God alone as immortal, and therefore probably held Satan to be the product of matter (which he supposed eternal), and that... would perish on the dissolution of his component particles. He taught that the soul, created pure, was not originally clothed with flesh, but after the fall was imprisoned in flesh, the "cost of skin" of Gen. iii. 24 (comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 466). Hence a perpetual conflict; the union of soul and body is the cause of all existing evils, and hence the apostle's desire to be freed from the "body of this death" (Rom. vii. 24). To deliver man, Christ came, not in sinful flesh, but with an ethereal body; through the Virgin, but not formed of her substance (Gal. iv. 4). Fasting and subjection of the body are the means of becoming like Christ; and his followers at the resurrection will have a body like his (1 Cor. xv. 37), with which, and not with "flesh and blood," they shall inherit the kingdom (1 Cor. xv. 50).

Bardesanes was the first Syrian hymn-writer, and his hymns, being very attractive, were popular, and contributed largely to diffuse his opinions. As a poet, his fame rested upon the 150 psalms which, in imitation of David, he composed for the edification of his countrymen. The popularity of this work was immense, and when Ephrem Syry started to create a book of liturgical forms, he adopted the majority of Bardesanes' hymns. Although his hymns were not as popular as those of St. Ephrem, they were widely used in the churches of the East. His melodies and rhythms were simple, yet expressive, and his use of the Syriac language made his works accessible to all believers, regardless of their social status.

Bardesanes' works were widely translated and spread throughout the Roman Empire. His influence on Christian liturgy and poetry was significant, and his hymns were sung in churches throughout the Syrian region. He is remembered as a great hymn-writer and a significant figure in the development of Christian literature.

Barker, Thomas, an English theological writer, was born in 1721, and died in 1809. He was a grandson of the celebrated Thomas Whiston. Among his theological works is a work on baptism (1773); The Messiah (1780); The Demonicse of the Gospel (1780).—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, p. 121.

Bar’kon (Hebr. Bar’ko, בָּרוֹכָו, prob. for בָּרֹכָי, Bârokı̂, a painter; Sept. Βαρκός, Bârokos), the head of one of the families of Nethinim that returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii, 53; Neh. vii, 55). B.C. ante 536. Schwarz, however, regards it as the name of a place, identical with the modern village Barkko, about three miles west of Beli (Pestudiosi, Chron. II, 416).—Barlaam, a martyr of Syria or Cappadocia (mentioned by Basil and Chrysostom), who was forced to hold his hand, filled with incense, over the fire of an idol altar, in order that the pain might compel him to open his hand, and so let the incense fall upon the flames. In the course of this torment he died.—Basil, Hom. xviii; Chrysost. Hom. Ixxiii; Butler, Lives of Saints, Nov. 19.

Barlaam, a Calabrian monk of St. Basil. He was educated among the Latins, but afterward went over to the Greeks. He is chiefly known for his attack upon the Hesychasts or Quietsists, as the monks of Mount Athos were styled, who held certain very peculiar views. The question was brought before a synod at Constantinople in 1341, but nothing was definitively determined. In 1389 Barlaam went to Pope John, at Aivignon, to induce him to take up the case, but in vain. He was afterward condemned in various synods. He then forsook the Greek side, and took part with the Latins, strenuously opposing the dogmas peculiar to the Greek Church; in which service he was rewarded with the see of Giorcace, in Naples. He was the Greek tutor of Petrarch. He died about A.D. 1398. He wrote a number of controversial books, and among them a Liber contra Primatum Pape (Oxford, 1589; Hanov. 1608). Also Ethica secundum Stoicam, lib. 2 (Bib. Mag. Pat. xxvi, 4). See Cave, Hist. Lit. ann. 1840; Hoefer, Biog. Crit. Litt. iv, 575; London, Eccl. Dict. ii, 36. See HESTHRAS.

Barletta, Gabriel, a Dominican monk of Barletta, in Naples, who was living in 1480. He became so distinguished as a preacher that it was a saying in his time, "Qui nescit Barlettre nescit predicande." He published an extraordinary edition of the happiness of the Holy Seraph, and he was rewarded with the see of Giorcace, in Naples. He was the Greek tutor of Petrarch. He died about A.D. 1398. He wrote a number of controversial books, and among them a Liber contra Primatum Pape (Oxford, 1589; Hanov. 1608). Also Ethica secundum Stoicam, lib. 2 (Bib. Mag. Pat. xxvi, 4). See Cave, Hist. Barley (βαλάς, bálas), from its bristling beard; the plur. βάλαι, βαλάνια, designates the gramineous; Gr. epišs, a grain mentioned in Scripture as cultivated and used in Egypt (Exod. ix, 26), and in Palestine (Lev. xix, 15; Deut. viii, 5; 2 Chron. li, 10; Ruth ii, 17; 2 Sam. xix, 25; Isa. xxxiii, 25; Jer. xii, 8; Joel i, 11; etc.). Barley was given to cattle, especially horses (1 Kings iv, 26), and was, indeed, the only corn grain given to them, as oats and rye were unknown to the Hebrews, and are not now grown in Palestine. Although Volney affirms (ii, 117) that small quantities are raised in some parts of the Negeb for horses (comp. Homer, Il. v, 196). Hence barley is mentioned in the Mishna (Pessach, fol. 3) as the food of horses and asses. This is still the chief use of barley in Western Asia. Bread made of barley was, however, used by the poorer classes (Judg. vii, 18; 2 Kings vii, 11; John vi, 18). In Palestine barley was for the most part sown at the time of the autumnal rains, October—November (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xii, 1), and again in early spring, or rather as soon as the depth of winter had passed (Mishna, Berachoth, p. 18). This later sowing has not hitherto been much noticed by writers on this part of Biblical illustration, but is confirmed by various travellers who observed the sowing of barley at this time of the year. Russell says that it continues to be sown to the end of February (Nat. Hist. Alessio, i, 74); see his meaning evolved in Kitto's Phys. Hist. of Palestine, p. 114; comp. p. 229). The barley of the first crop was ready by the Passover, in the month Abib, March—April (Ruth i, 22; 2 Sam. xxi, 9; Judg. viii, 2); and if not ripe at the expiration of a (Hebrew) year from the last celebration, the year was intercalated (Lightfoot, ut supra) to preserve that connection between the feast and the barley-harvest which the law required (Deut. xii, 15, 16; Lev. xvi, 11). Accordingly, travellers concur in showing that the barley-harvest in Palestine is in March and April—advancing into May in the northern and mountainous parts of the land; but April is the month in which the barley-harvest is chiefly gathered in, although it begins earlier in some parts and later in others (Pict. of Palestine, p. 214, 229, 230). At Jerusalem, Niebuhr found barley ripe at the end of March, when the later (autumnal) crop had only been lately sown (Beschreib. von Arabien, p. 160). It was earlier than wheat (Exod. ix, 31), and less prized (Thomson, Land and Book ii, 138), although reckoned among the valuable products of the promised land, and in Deut. xxvii, 17. We read of barley-breeds in Judg. vii, 13, and barley-cakes in Ezek. iv, 12. It was measured by the ephah and homer. The jealousy-offering (Num. vi, 15) was to be barley-meal, though the common mincha was of fine wheat-flour (Lev. vii, 1), the meaner grain being appointed to denote that the condition of the person on whose behalf it was offered. The purchase-money of the adulterers in Hos. iii, 2, is generally believed to be a mean price. See Cereals.

The passage in Isa. xxiii, 20, has been supposed by many to refer to rice, as a mode of culture by submergence of the land after sowing, similar to that of rice, is indicated. The celebrated passage, "Cast thy bread upon the waters," etc. (Eccles. xi, 1), has been by some supposed to refer also to such a mode of culture. But it is precarious to build so important a conclusion as that rice had been so early introduced into the Levant upon such slight indications; and it now appears that the rice culture is in some parts of the same submergence after sowing as rice, as was particularly noticed by Major Skinner (i, 320) in the vicinity of Damascus. In Exod. ix, 31, we are told that the plague of hail, some time before the Passover, destroyed the barley, which was then in the green ear; but not the wheat or the rye, which were only in the blade. This is minutely corroborated by the fact that the barley soon after the inundation is reaped, some after ninety days, some in the fourth month (Wilkinson's Thebes, p. 395), and that it there ripens a month earlier than the wheat (Sonlini, p. 395).—Kitto, s. v. See Agriculture.

Barlow, Thomas, Bishop of Lincoln, born in Westmoreland in 1667; educated at Appleby, and removed thence to Queen's College, Oxford. Although no favorer of the Parliamentary party, he retained his fellowship through the Commonwealth, and in 1654 was appointed keeper of the Bodleian. Afterward he was made provost of his college, Lady-Margaret professor, and became Bishop of Pavia in the year seventy years of age. He never removed to his see. He died in 1691, on the 8th of October. He was of the Calvinistic school of theology, and left, among other writings, the following, viz. : (1) The Case of Toleration in Matters of Religion (1669); (2) The Originality of Prophecy, or the True and Bible Principles and Opinions of the Church of Rome: (3) Brutiam, or the Bull of Pope Pius V, etc. (London, 1681), his death, Sir Peter Pett published a polem.
have been given to Barnabas on account of his mild and gentle disposition (In Act. Apoth. Hom. xxii). He is described as a "good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith" (Acts xi, 24). He was a native of Cyprus, but the son of Jewish parents of the tribe of Levi; he was possessed of land (whether in Judea or Cyprus is not stated), and generously disposed of the whole for the benefit of the Christian community, so that he had a large sum of money at the apostles' feet, (Acts iv, 36, 37). A.D. 29. As this transaction occurred soon after the day of Pentecost, he must have been an early convert to the Christian faith (comp. Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii, i, 819 sq.). According to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii, c. 20, vol. ii, p. 192, ed. Klots), Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i, 12), and Epiphanius (Hær. xxxii, 4), Barnabas was about seventy years of age (A.D. 1). It has been maintained that Barnabas is identical with Joseph Barnabas, whose name occurs in Acts i, 23. Most modern critics, however, embrace the contrary opinion, which they conceive is supported by the circumstantial manner in which Barnabas is first mentioned. However similar in sound, the meanings of the names are very different; and if no further notice is taken of Barnabas (a circumstance which Ullmann urges in favor of his identity with Barnabas), the same may be affirmed of Matthias (see Chrysostom, In Act. Apoth. Homil. xi, i). From the incident narrated in Acts xiv, 8-12, Chrysostom infers that the personal appearance of Barnabas was dignified and commanding. "When the inhabitants of Lystra, on the cure of the impotent man, imagined that the gods were come down to them in the likeness of men, they called Barnabas Zeus (their tutelary deity), and Paul Hermes, because he was the chief speaker" (In Act. Apoth. Hom. xxxii).

When Paul made his first appearance in Jerusalem after his conversion, Barnabas introduced him to the apostles, and attested his sincerity (Acts ix, 27). A.D. 30. This fact lends some support to an ancient tradition (Theod. Lector, Hist. Eccl. ii, 587, ed. Vales), that they had studied together in the school of Gamaliel; that Barnabas had often attempted to bring his companion over to the Christian faith, but hitherto in vain; that, meeting with him at this time in Jerusalem, not aware of what had occurred at Damascus, he once more renewed his efforts, when Paul threw himself weeping at his feet, informed him of "the heavenly vision," and of the happy transformation of the persecutor and blasphemer into the obedient and zealous disciple (Acts xxvi, 16). Though the conversion of Cornelius and his household, with its attendant circumstances, had given the Jewish Christians clearer views of the comprehensive character of the new dispensation, yet the accession of a large number of Gentiles to the Church at Antioch was an event so extraordinary that the apostles and brethren at Jerusalem resolved on deputing one of their number to investigate it. Their choice was fixed on Barnabas. After witnessing the flourishing condition of the Church, and adding fresh converts by his personal exertions, he visited Tarsus to obtain the assistance of a man who had returned with him to Antioch, where they labored for a whole year (Acts xi, 23-26). A.D. 84. In anticipation of the famine predicted by Agabus, the Antiochian Christians made a contribution for their poorer brethren at Jerusalem, and sent it by the hands of Barnabas and Saul (Acts xi, 29-30). Saul, after a speedily returned, bringing with them John Mark, a nephew of the former. By divine direction (Acts xii, 2), they were separated to the office of missionaries, and as such visited Cyprus and some of the principal cities in Asia Minor (Acts xiii, 12). Soon after their return to Antioch, Barnabas' family house at Jerusalem was disturbed by certain zealots from Judaea, who insisted on the observance of the rite of circumcision by the Gentile converts. To settle the controversy, Paul and Barnabas were deputed to consult the apostles and elders at Jerusalem (Acts xv, 1, 2); they returned to communicate the result of their conference (ver. 22) accompanied by Judas Barsabas and Silas, or Silvanus, A.D. 47. On preparing for a second mission to the Gentiles, Paul and Silas went through Syria and Cilicia, while Barnabas and his nephew revisited his native island (Acts xv, 8-41). A.D. 47-51. In reference to this event, Chrysostom remarks, "What then? Did they pass as equals? Far from it. For you see that after this Paul bestows in his Epistles many commendations on Barnabas." If we may judge from the hint furnished by the notice that Paul was commended by the brethren to the grace of God, it would seem that Barnabas was in the wrong. At this point Barnabas disappears from Luke's narrative, which to its close is occupied solely with the labors and sufferings of Paul. From the Epistles of the latter a few hints (the only authentic sources of information) may be gleaned relative to his early friend and associate. From 1 Cor. ix, 5, 6, it would appear that Barnabas was unmarried, and supported himself, like Paul, by some manual occupation. From him they obtained the advice and direction which John Mark perceived was necessary to Barnabas the apostle at Jerusalem, probably on the occasion mentioned in Acts xv. In the same chapter (ver. 18) we are informed that Barnabas so far yielded to the Judaising zealots at Antioch as to separate himself for a time from communion with the apostle, and make his residence at Seleucia on the Lycus, about A.D. 47. See Paul. It has been inferred from 2 Cor. viii, 18, 19, that Barnabas was not only reconciled to Paul after their separation (Acts xv, 39), but also became again his coadjutor; that he was "the brother whose praise was in the Gospel through all the churches." Chrysostom says that some suppose the brother was Luke, and others Barnabas. Theodoret asserts that it was Barnabas, and appeals to Acts xili, 8, which rather serves to disprove his assertion, for it ascribes the appointment of Paul and Barnabas to an express divine injunction, and not to an elective act of the Church; and, besides, the brother alluded to was chosen, not by a single church, but by several churches, to travel with Paul (2 Cor. viii, 19). In Coloss. iv. 10, and Philemon, ver. 24, Paul mentions Mark as his fellow-laborer; and at a still later period, 2 Tim. iv. 11, he refers with strong approbation to his services, and requests Timothy to bring him Mark with him to Laodicea. As to his mission to Mark (excepted) nothing is said. The most probable inference is that he was already dead, and that Mark had subsequently associated himself with Paul. Barnabas seems not to have possessed Paul's thoroughness of purpose. For the years of his last days we have no better guides than the Acta Paschali Barnabae in Cypro (first complete edition, from a Paris codex of the 9th cent., in Tischendorf's Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Lpz. 1841), a forgery in the name of John Mark, and, from the acquaintance it discovers with the localities of Cyprus, probably written by a resident in that island; and the legends of Alexander, a Cyprian monk, and of Barnabas, commonly called Lector (that is, an ádvarywtrj, or reader), of Constantinople; the two latter belong to the sixth century. According to Alexander, Barnabas, after taking leave of Paul, landed in Cyprus, passed through the whole island, converted numbers to the Christian faith, and died at Paphos, where he preached in the synagogue with great success. Thither he was followed by some Jews from Syria (the author of the Acta names Bar-jesus as their leader), who stirred up the people against him. Barnabas, in anticipation of his approaching end, celebrated the Eucharist, and had a vision of Samuell. He gave his nephew directions respecting his testament, and charged him to go after his decease to the apostle Paul. He then entered the synagogue, and as an usual to preach Christ. But the Jews at once laid hands on him, shut him up till night, then dragged him forth, and, after stoning him, endeavored to burn his unhallowed body. The corpse, however, the action of the flames; Mark secretly conveyed it to a cave about five stadia from the city; he then joined Paul at Ephesus, and afterward accompanied him to Rome. A violent persecution, consequent on the death of Barnabas, scattered the Christians at Salamis, so that a knowledge of the place of his interment was lost. This account agrees with that of the pseudo Mark, excepting that, according to the latter, the corpse was reduced to ashes. Under the emperor Zeno (A.D. 474-491), Alexander goes on to say, Peter Fullo, a noted Monophysite, became patriarch of Constantinople. He aimed at bringing the Cyprian church under his patriarchate, in which attempt he was supported by the emperor. When the Bishop of Salamis, a very worthy man, but an indifferent debater, was called upon to defend his rights publicly at Constantinople, he was thrown into the greatest perplexity. But Barnabas took compassion on his fellow-countryman, appeared to him by night no less than three times, assured him that his situation was nearly hopeless, and told him how to supply the absence of the dead; he was to find his body, with a copy of Matthew's gospel lying upon it. The bishop awoke, assembled the clergy and laity, and found the body as described. The sequel may easily be conjectured. Fullo was expelled from Antioch; the independence of the Cyprian church acknowledged; and a transgression against the church at Rome, deposited in the palace at Constantinople, and at Easter lessons were publicly read from it; and by the emperor's command a church was erected on the spot where the corpse had been interred. These suspicious visions of Barnabas are termed by Dr. Cave "a mere addition to the story, designed only to serve a present turn, to gain credit to the cause, and advance it with the emperor." Neither Alexander nor Theodore is very explicit respecting the copy of Matthew's gospel which was found with the corpse of the Cyprian. The former represents Barnabas as saying to Anthemius, "There my whole body is deposited, and an autograph gospel which I received from Matthew." Theodore says, "Having on his breast the Gospel according to Matthew, an autograph of Barnabas." The pseudo Mark omits the latter circumstance. If we believe that, as Alexander reports, it was read at Constantinople, it must have been written, not in Hebrew, but in Greek. If then theVISION OF BARNABAS (comp. d. 840, d. 897) makes no allusion to Barnabas when speaking of the bishops who preceded himself (see Heftel, Das Sendeschreiben des Apostels Barnabas, Tubing. 1840, p. 42-47). His festival is celebrated throughout the Roman Church on the 11th of June. The Church of Toulouse is said to possess, where, at least, eight or nine other churches lay claim to the possession of his head. See the Acta Sancctorum, tom. iii.; Baronius, Martyr. from what the knowledge we possess of the character of Barnabas would lead us to expect, if it proceeded from his pen. From the hints given in the Acts, he appears to have been a man of strong attachment to the ties of kindred and fatherland. We find that on both his missionary tours, his native island and the Jewish synagogues claimed his first attention. But throughout the epistle there is a total absence of sympathetic regard for the Jewish nation; all is cold and distant, if not contemptuous. It remains yet that I speak to you (the 18th verse) being comforted continually in the Temple; how those miserable men, being deceived, have put their trust in the house.' How unlike the friend and fellow-laborer of him who had 'great heaviness and continual sorrow in his heart for his brethren, his kindred according to the flesh' (Rom. ixi. 2).

8. Barnabas was not only a Jew by birth, but a Levite. From this circumstance, combined with what is recorded in the Acts of the active part he took in the settlement of the points at issue between the Jewish and the Gentile converts, we might reasonably expect to find, in a composition bearing his name, an accurate acquaintance with the Mosaic ritual, a clear comprehension of the true views of the Dispensation, and a just relation to the New Dispensation, which marked the Christians of the Alexandrian school in the second and succeeding centuries. But the following specimens will suffice to show that exactly the contrary may be affirmed of the writer of this epistle; that he makes unauthorized additions to various parts of the Jewish Cultus; that his views of the Old Economy are confused and erroneous; and that he adopts a mode of interpretation countenanced by none of the inspired writers, and at utter variance with every principle of sound criticism, being to the last degree puerile and absurd.

1. He mentions in two passages the fact recorded in Exod. xxxiii, 19, of Moses breaking the two tables of stone, and infers that Jehovah's covenant was thereby annulled. The falsity of this statement need not be pointed out to the Biblical student. He says, 'They (the Jews) have forever lost that which Moses received. For thus saith the Scripture: And Moses . . . . . . . received the covenant from the Lord, even two tables of stone, etc.' But, having turned themselves to idols, they lost it; as the Lord said unto Moses, Go down quickly, etc. And Moses cast the two tables out of his hand, and broke them. And he said, that the love of Jesus might be sealed in your hearts unto the hope of his faith.' The second passage, in ch. xiv, is very similar, and need not be quoted.

2. On the rite of circumcision (Acts xv, 1, 2) we find in this epistle equal incorrectness. The writer denies that circumcision was a sign of the covenant. 'You will say the Jews were circumcised for a sign, and so are all the Syrians and Arabs, and all the idolatrous priests.' Herodotus (ii. 87), indeed, asserts that the Syrians in Palestine received the practice of circumcision from the Egyptians; but Josephus, both in his Against Apion and Against the Jews, remarks that he must have alluded to the Jews, because they were the only nation in Palestine who were circumcised (Ant. viii. 10, 8; Apion, i. 23). 'How,' says Hug, 'could Barnabas, who travelled with Paul through the southern provinces of Asia Minor, make such an assertion respecting the heathen priests?'

On the language (ch. viii.) he remarks of Num. xix. 4, &c; 'The priest and the Levite' (ch. vii.) rather than those who were circumcised: &c; 'He means that the love of Jesus might be sealed in your hearts unto the hope of his faith'. person appointed to convey the goad into the wilderness took away the scarlet wool and put it on a thorn-bush. And when they saw that in the field, we are wont to eat; so the fruit of that thorn only is sweet. On all these particulars the Scriptures are silent.

"(5.) In ch. viii. the author's fancy seems to grow more fruitful and luxuriant. In referring to the red heifer (Heb. רעה, rō'áh), the sentiment that marks the in- come to perfection (יוֹכֵא יִזְמַרְתָּא וְלִכְסָא) were to bring the heifer and kill it; that three youths were to take up the ashes and put them in vessels; then to tie a piece of scarlet wool and hyssop upon a stick, and so sprinkle every one of the people. "This heifer is Jesus Christ; the wicked men that were to offer it are the children of the covenant; the three young men signify those to whom the Lord gave authority to preach his gospel, being at the beginning twelve, because there were twelve tribes of Israel." But why (he asks) were three year old men appointed to sprinkle? To denote Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And why was wool put upon a stick? Because the kingdom of Jesus was founded upon the cross, etc.

"(6.) He interprets the distinction of clean and unclean animals in a spiritual sense. 'Is it not ('אֲדֹנָי פֶּסַח—see Dr. Hefele's valuable note, p. 86) the command of God that they should not eat these things? (Yes.) But Moses spoke in spirit (יוֹנָפְּרָא), He taught the people in order to say, 'Thou shalt not join those men who are like swine, who, while they live in pleasure, forget their Lord,' etc. He adds, 'Neither shalt thou eat of the byena; that is, thou shalt not be an adulterer.' If these were the views entertained by Barnabas, how must he have been astonished at the want of spiritual discernment in the apostle Peter, when he heard from his own lips the account of the symbolic vision at Joppa, and his reply to the command, 'Arise, Peter, slay and eat. But I said, Not so, Lord, for nothing common or unclean hath at any time entered into my mouth' (Acts xi, 8).

1. It will be observed that the writer hastily assumes (from Gen. xiv, 14) that Abraham circumcised only thirty persons, that being the number of "the servants born in his own house," from whom he added "four kings," but he circumcised his household nearly twenty years later, including not only those born in his house (with the addition of Ishmael), but all that were bought with money (Gen. xvii, 22). The writer evidently was unacquainted with the Hebrew Scriptures, and has committed the blunder of supposing that Abraham was familiar with the Greek alphabet some centuries before it existed.

The probable opinion is that this epistle existed anonymously in the Alexandrian Church, and was ignorantly attributed to Barnabas. It was probably written by a Jewish Christian, who had studied Philo, and who being the C. T. in many places, is the most likely of his view of Christianity. Its date is assigned to the first century by Hilgenfeld, Die App. Vater (Halle, 1853); Reuss, Geschichte der Schriften des N. T. i, 223; Ewald, Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, vi, 138; and to the ear-Among his pupils were President Wayland, Bishop Potter of Pennsylvania, and Drs. E. Mason, W. H. Williams, and John Macaulay. He was elected president of several colleges, but declined. Mr. Barnes was a contributor to several periodicals. He was thrown from a coach and killed, Oct. 27, 1818.—

Barnes, John, an Englishman, who entered the Benedictine order at Douai partly from fear of the Inquisition. In 1625 he published at Paris a Disseratio contra Exequioones, which received the approbation of the faculty at Paris. In 1630 his Catholico-Romanus Pacificus appeared at Oxford. His works gave great offense to the puritan party, and, at the request of Pope Urban VIII, Barnes was sent to Rome by Louis XIII in 1627. He was at once confined in the Inquisition, and, after thirty years of imprisonment, died there. In his Catholico-Romanus Pacificus his design was to induce the pope to receive Anglicans to his communion, without requiring them to acknowledge dependence on the Holy See, until such time as a free and ecclesiastical council could be convoked to settle all differences.—Boug. Barnes, Robert, chaplain to Henry VIII, and one of the English Reformers, who began his career by preaching against the pride and display of Wolsey. In 1535 he was sent to Wittenberg by Henry VIII to confer with the theologians there about the king's divorce, and he imbued Luther with the errors of his teachings on his return to England, he began to preach. Some time after, finding himself in danger, he escaped into Germany, and there formed the acquaintance of Luther, Melanchthon, and other Protestant leaders. In 1586, as the reformers were in favor with Henry VIII, he returned to England; but preaching improperly against Gardiner and against the royal supremacy, he incurred the king's displeasure, and was compelled to recant. Subsequently he retracted his recantation, and was seized and condemned unheard by the Parliament of 1540. On the 8th of July in that year he was burnt, with William Jerome and Thomas Gerard. They all suffered with the patience and fortitude of the old martyrs. His published writings are A Treatise containing a Profession of Faith (first published in Latin, 1581).—Visa Romani. Barnes, William, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near Cockatook, Tynrone county, Ireland, about Easter, 1795. At an early age he came with some relatives to America, and resided for some time at Baltimore, where, at nineteen, he was converted, and was admitted into the church. Soon after, his talents attracted the attention of the Rev. S. G. Roszel, and he was called out to labor on a circuit. He was admitted into the Baltimore Conference in 1817, and for nearly fifty years preached, almost without intermission and with extraordinary success, as an itinerant minister, in Virginia, Maryland, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. Nearly forty years of this time he spent within the bounds of the Philadelphia Conference, the rest in the Baltimore and Pittsburg Conferences. His mind was active and imaginative to a rare degree, and his preaching was very original and striking; few men of his time were more popular or useful. A poetical vein was manifest in his style, which was a number of pieces of verse in manuscript. He died suddenly November 24, 1865. Among his manuscript remains are a number of sermons and controversial writings, which are now preparing for the press. The Rev. Dr. Castle, in a discourse at the funeral of Mr. Barnes, thus spoke of him: "In the world he was not of the world. He was a chosen vessel, called of God and sanctified, and sent to bear his Master’s message to his fellow-men. For this he bowed his neck to the yoke. For this he consecrated his own body, the gratings feelings of a generous heart, and the energies of his whole life. Equal ability, fidelity, and perseverance, devoted to any earth-born calling, would have led to fame and fortune. But, like the Italian painter, he worked for eternity, and in eternity he receives his rich reward."—Christian Adv. and Journ. No. 2950.

Baro or Baron, Przems, was born at Etampes in France, and was educated at Bourges. Having embraced Protestantism, he came over into England in the time of Elizabeth to avoid persecution. Here he entered himself at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1575 was made Lady Margaret professor of divinity on the recommendation of Lord Burghley. Dr. Whitel-aker, then professor of divinity, and several of the heads of houses, were strong Calvinists. Baro, in his lectures, opposed the doctrine of predestination, and about 1581 he was charged with heresy. From that time on he suffered many vexations and annoyances, but he held his ground until 1585, when his opponents, desiring to support their Calvinistic views by authority, entered his name in the celebrated articles, as the Lambeth Articles (q. v.), which were confirmed by Archbishop Whitgift and others. These articles Baro opposed in a sermon, whereupon he was ordered by the vice-chancellor to give in a copy of his sermon, and to abate thenceforward from all controversy on articles of faith. This restriction was not long enforced, for in 1596 he resigned his professorship and removed to London, where he died about 1600. He wrote, among other things—1. In Ioann Prophetiae Propheticae 80, etc. (London, 1579)— 2. De Fide, ejusque Ortu et Natu-

Baro dispos (Baroçie, Vulg. Rakočie), a name inserted in the list of those "servants of Solomon" whose "sons" returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esdr. vi, 54); but there is no corresponding name in the genuine list of Ezra (ii, 57) or Nehemiah (vii, 90).

Baronius or Baronio, Caesar, the eminent Roman ecclesiastical annalst, was born at Sora, in Naples, Oct. 30 or 31, 1538. He pursued his first studies at Veroli, and theology and jurisprudence at Naples. In 1557 he went with his father, Camillo Baronio, to Rome, where he placed himself under the direction of Philip Neri, who had, at that period, just founded the Congregation of the Oratory, whose chief pursuit was to be the study of ecclesiastical antiquity. The rules of the order, requiring a portion of each day to be given to the study and discussion of points in church history, antiquities, and bibliography, gave the bent to Baronius’s pursuits for life. Clement VIII made him his confessor and secretary, and made him cardinal, by the name of S. Mar-tyrum Nerei and Achillei, 5th June, 1566. Soon after he was made librarian of the Vatican Library and member of the Congregation of Rites. On the death of Clement, and again upon the death of Leo XI, he was within a little of being elected pope; but his own strong opposition, and the opposition of the Spaniards, who could not forgive his De Monarchia Siciliae, in which he opposed the claim of Spain to Sicily, prevented it. He died June 30th, 1567. His Annales Ecclesiastici was undertaken in obedience to the injunction of his superior, Philip Neri, to defend Rome against the Magdeburg Oratins (q. v.). For thirty years he labored at this immense work, and in 1586, in order, as it were, to try his strength, he put forth the Notes on the Roman Martyrology. This was shortly after (in 1588) followed by the first volume of the Annals; and the rest of the work, continued down to the year 1198, appeared at different intervals. This work is distributed under the several years, so that under the head of each year is given every event of that year, in every thing in any way relating to the history of the church. Baronius himself informs us that this work was deemed necessary to oppose the Magdeburg Centurions; and he also says that he was unwilling that the task should be given to him; and that he desired the French Friburgh should have been charged with it. Though every elaborate and accurate as it is throughout a partisan work, and must be studied as such. The first edition appeared at Rome under the title Annales Ecclesiastici a Chr. nato ad annum 1198 (Rome, 1588-1607, 12 vols. fol.). It was followed by editions at Antwerp, 1589 sq., and Paris, 1609. The edition of Mentz (1601-1605, 12 vols. fol.) was revised by Baronius himself, and designated as a standard for future editions. Many Protestant authors, as Casaubon, Basnage, Korthold, and others, wrote against him. He was defended by the Franciscan Pagi in his work Critica historico-chronologica in universos annales C. Bar-\n onii (Antwerp, 1617, 2 vols. fol., rev. edit. 1618, 2 vols. fol.)—er, himself corrected many chronological errors of Baronius. The most complete edition of the Annales is by Manel (Lucca, 1578-1759, 38 vols.), which contains the Crítica de Pagi printed under the corresponding passages of Baronius, the Continuation of Raynaldus, the learned Apparatus of the editor, and very valuable indexes in three languages. When Benedictional Polnican, published a Continuation of Baronius down to the year 1571 (Rome, 1616 sq. 8 vols.). another was published by Henry Sponndanus, at Paris, in 1640, 2 vols. fol., and Lyons, 1678; but the best Continuation (from the year 1198 to 1566) is perhaps that by Odericus Raynaldus, of the Congregation of the Oratory (Rome, 1646-1668, 9 vols.). The work of Raynaldus was far ther continued by Laderchi (Rome, 1728-1737, 3 vols.). The last addition to the work is that of Theiner (Rom. 1566, 3 vols. fol.), bringing the history down, in a par-sian style, to 1566. The Epitome of Baronius, his Vita St. Gregotrii Nasi, together with a brief life of Baronius, were published by Albericus (Rome, 1679). There are lives of Baronius in Latin by the Oratorian Barnabeanus (translated into German by Fritz, Wien, 1718, an abridgment of which translation was published, Augsburg, 1845), and in French by La Croze. See Dupin. Edinburgh Rev., xxxi, 170; Schaff, Apostolic Church, p. 56; Chlamis. Remembrances, xxiv, 232; London, Ecc.

Barre, Joseph, a French priest and writer, born 1698, entered early into the congregation of St. Géné-vieve, at Paris, and became eminent for his historical and ecclesiastical knowledge. He was made chancellor of the University of Paris, where he died, 1704. His principal works are Medit. Libr. des Ord. de l’Enpereurs. Afterward De La Barre published a new edition of the Spicilegium of Luc d’Achery (3 vols. fol. 1723), with corrections and notes. He also had a large share in the edition of Moret’s Dictionnaire Historique, published in 1710. He was a member of the “Academy of Inscriptions.”

Barrel (נ] kod [k"focad, codur], a pitchcr or oil, a vessel used for the keeping of flour (1 Kings xvii, 12, 14, 16; xviii, 33). The same word rendered "pitcher," as the same vessel appears to have been also used for carrying water (Gen. xxiv, 11).

Barren (when spoken of persons, properly נָבָר, 'otyqoq). Barrenness is, in the East, the hardest lot that can befall a woman, and was considered among the Hebrews as dishonorable punishment with which the Lord could visit a female (Gen. xvi, 2; xxx, 1-23; 1 Sam. i, 6, 29; Isa. xlvii, 9; xliv, 21; Luke i, 25; Niebuhr, p. 76; Volney, ii, 559; Lane's Egyptian, i, 74). In the Talmud (Yeramoth, vi, 6) a man was bound, after ten years of childless conjugal life, to marry another woman (with or without repudiation of his wife), and even if a third of the second proved also barren. Nor is it improbable that Moses himself contributed to strengthen the opinion of disgrace by the promises of the Lord of exemption from barrenness as a blessing (Exod. xxiii, 26; Deut. vii, 14). Instances of childless wives are found in Gen. xii, 20; xxxvii, 21; Judg. xiii, 2, 3; Luke i, 7, 86. Some cases of unlawful marriages, and more especially with a brother's wife, were visited with the punishment of barrenness (Lev. xx. 20, 21); Mi- chaelis, however (Mosisches Recht, vi, 290), takes the word לֹא בָּרְנָה (lō'ā bār'nah, 'childless') here in a figurative sense, implying that the children born in such an illicit marriage should not be ascribed to the real father, but to another, thus the second husband of the second became the father of the children which would otherwise have fallen to his lot if the first brother had died childless. The reproach attached to sterility, especially by the Hebrews, may perhaps be accounted for by the constant expectation of the Messiah, and the hope that every woman cherished that she might have the promised Messiah. This constant hope seems to account for many circumstances in the Old Testament history which might otherwise appear extraordinary or exceptional (Gen. iii, 15; xxx, 6, 7; xxxv, 19-29; xxvii, 13; xxxviii, 14; xxxviii, 11-18; Deut. xxxi, 9). This general notion of the disgrace of barrenness in a woman may early have given rise, in the patriarchal age, to the custom among barren wives of introducing to their husbands their maidservants, and of regarding the children born in that consanguine as their own, by which they thought to cover their own disgrace of barrenness (Gen. xxi, 2; xxx, 9).—Elito, s. v. See Child.

Barrington (John Sutte), Viscount, was born 1678, educated at Eton, created Viscount Barrington 1720, and died 1724. He was a friend and disciple of Locke, and greatly devoted to theological pursuits. In the year 1725 he published, in two volumes octavo, his Miscellanea Sacra, or a New Method of considering so much of the History of the Apostles as is contained in Scripture, with four Critical Essays: 1. On the Witness of the Holy Spirit; 2. On the connexion between the Apostles, Elders, and Brethren; 3. On the Time when Paul and Barnabas became Apostles; 4. On the Apostolical Decrees. In this work the author traces the methods taken by the apostles and first preachers of the Gospel for propagating Christianity, and explains the great distinction, that is, the gifts of the Spirit by which they were enabled to discharge that office. A new edition of his Theological Works was published in London in 1829 (3 vols. 8vo).—Jones, Christ. Biography, p. 27; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, s. v.

Barrow, Isaac, D.D., one of the most eminent of English divines, and a distinguished mathematician. He was born in London, October 1630, and was educated at the Charter House, and at Felsted in Essex. Afterwards went to Cambridge, and was a pensioner of Trinity College in 1645. In 1649 he was elected fellow of his college; but the religious and political troubles of the time greatly checked his progress, and induced him to leave England to travel abroad. He visited France and Italy, and proceeded as far as Smyrna, in the course of which voyage he signalized himself by his conduct in a combat with an Algerine pirate. At Constantinople he remained some time, and returned to England, through Germany and Holland, in 1659. He was ordained by Bishop Browning, and in 1660, after the restoration, obtained the Greek chair at Cambridge. In 1662 he was made Gresham Professor of Geometry, and in 1668 was made Dean of Manchester, and President of Mathematicians, in which capacity he had Newton as a pupil. In 1670 he was made D.D., and in February, 1672, was nominated to the大师的ship of Trinity College. In his later years he gave up mathematics for divinity, feeling himself bound to this course by his duties as Canon of Trinity. He died in London on the 4th of May, 1677, and is buried in Westminster Abbey. His moral character was of the highest type, resting upon true religion. Tillotson says that he "came as near as is possible for human frailty to do to the perfect man of St. James."

Barrow's intellect was of the highest order. As a mathematician he was "second only to Newton," according to English writers, though this is rather too high praise. Of his numerous mathematical writings this is not the place to speak; his fame as a theologian rests chiefly upon his Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, his Exposition of the Creed, and on his Ger erms of the Supremacy, which remarks upon the moment, may hardly any consideration properly belong to the subject, has escaped Barrow's comprehensive mind. He has said enough to silence the controversy forever, and to deter all wise men, of both sides, from meddling any further with it." See Til-лотсон, Preface to the Theological Works of Dr. Barrow (Lond. 1688. 8 vols.) and Holy Barrow was an Arminian, and his writings are, in many respects, an illustration of the Arminian system, though not controversially so. "His sermons," as Le Clerc observes, "are rather treatises and dissertations than harangues, and he wrote and rewrote them three or four times. They are always cold and cold as exact and comprehensive arguments, the produce of a grasp which could collect and of a patience which could combine all that was to be said upon the subject in question. But, in addition to this, Barrow was an original thinker. From his desire to set the whole subject before his hearers, he is often prolix, and his style is frequently redundant. But his sermons are store-houses of thought, and they are often resorted to as store-houses by popular preachers and writers. Nor are they wanting in passages which, as examples of a somewhat redundant, but grave, powerful, and exhaustive eloquence, it would be difficult to parallel in the whole range of English pulpit literature." The best edition of his theological writings is that published at Cambridge (1859, 8 vols. 8vo); a cheaper and yet good one, with a memory by Hamilton, London, 1829 (3 vols. 8vo), reprinted N. Y. 1846 (3 vols. 8vo). They include seventy-eight sermons on various topics; an Exposition of the Apostles' Creed; 24 papers discourses; explanations of the Lord's Supper, the Incarnation, the Sacraments; The Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy; with his Opuscula Theolonica, including a number of Latin dissertations, etc. See Methodist Quarterly Review, 1846, p. 165 sq.; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 130 sq.; Hook, Eccle-Biography, i, 555.

BARSAMIA or BARSHAMAS, bishop of Nisibis, a zealously orthodox and diligent churchman. Having been ejected from the school of Edessa, he was made bishop of Nisibis A.D. 435, and devoted himself earnestly for nearly half a century to the establishment of Nestorianism in Persia. He founded the school of Nisibis, a prolific source of Nestorianism. He advocated the right of priests to marry, and himself married a nun. The Syriac version has Artak, a name which recalls that of Artachus (Arapardos), who is named by Herodotus (vii, 22, 117) as being in a high position in the Persian army under Xerxes, and a special favorite of that king (Simons, G. T. IV, 243; Smith's Dict. of Christ. Dogm., i, 11). See Apame.

BARTH, CHRISTIAN GOTTLOB, D.D., an eminent German divine and philanthropist, was born at Stuttgart, July 31, 1799, obtained his academical education at the Gymnasium there, and from 1817 to 1821 studied theology at Tubingen. He early manifested strong religious feelings, and during all his life kept himself free from the prevailing rationalism. In 1824 he became pastor at Mottingen, Wurttemberg, and in 1888 retired to Calw, in order to devote himself to the missionary cause, and to the production of books of practical religion, to which objects he had already given much of his attention. He had, with the flourishing missionary institute at Basle, formed the first (Calwer) missionary society in Wurttemberg, published a periodical, "The Calwer Mission Sheet," and was the means of exciting a wide-spread interest in the cause of missions.

From this period his life became still more active. The interests of the mission led him to travel far and near, sometimes to England, to France, and to the interior of Switzerland; and he was brought into friendly relationship with the courts of Wurttemberg, Baden, Bavaria, Austria, Russia, England, Prussia, etc. His house became a sojourn for persons from all parts of the world. He founded a conference of evangelical pastors, and a training-school for poor children. Among his untituludious publications of practical reading, both for adults and children, are: Kinderbücher (Calw, 1836); Christ. Kinderariften (Stutt. 4 vols.); Christ. Gedichte (Stutt. 1836); Kirchengeschichte für Schulen und Familien (Calw, 1835); Bildliche Geschichte für Schulen und Familien. The sale of these books has been unparalleled. Of the Bible History and Bible Stories more than a million copies have been published in ten or twelve languages of the Christian and heathen world. He was also a ready versifier, and wrote many hymns and short poems for children; and several of these hymns, especially the "Children's Hymns," have found their way into the later German collections of hymns. In 1838, the University of Tubingen conferred upon him the de:ree of Doctor of Theology. His health was feeble during his later years, but he continued to work up to the last day, and was only induced to lie down about half an hour before his death, Nov. 12, 1859. — Pierer, Universal-Lexicon, a. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. Supp. i, p. 186.

BARTELOMEO, BARTHEL, JOHANN CAMPA, a German canonist, born in 1687 at Kitzingen. He studied at Würzburg with the Jesuits, and subsequently at Rome under Cardinal Lambertini, afterwards Benedict XIV. In 1727 he was made professor of canon law in the University of Würzburg, which he afterwards left as a canon. To intense hatred of Protestantism Barthel united a steadfast resistance to all papal claims unauthorized by law. He died in 1771, having greatly improved the teaching of the canon law, which before his time consisted simply in repeating the decreets and commentaries of Rome. Barthel followed zealously in the path of De Marca, Thurm, and other great theologians of France, and reduced the canon law to a form suited to the wants and peculiar circumstances of Germany. The following are his chief works: 1. Historia Provinciatiwn Imperii circa Religionem consacrata (Würzburg, 1736, 4to); 2. De Jure Reformandae Ecclesiae et noto (ibid. 1744, 4to); 3. De residuati canonum in Germaniae electionem polit. (ibid. 1749)—Tractatus de eo quod circa libertatem exercitii religionis ex lege divina et ex lege imperii justum est (ibid. 1764, 4to).—Landon, Eccl. Dict. ii, 47.

Barthélemy. See Hilaire, St.

Bartokh, Baptopvay, for Chald. Βατοκα, Καθωλικος, i. e. son of Tolmai; the latter being a name that occurs in Joth. xv. 14, Sept. Θωλικος and Θωλικος; Auth. Vel. Tolmai; 2 Sam. xii. 37, Sept. Θωλικος and Θωλικος. In Josephus we find Θωλικος, Ant. xx, 1, 1. The Θωλικος in Ant. xiv, 8, 1, is called Παπακιους in War. i, 9, 8, not improperly by an error of the transcriber, as another person of the latter name is mentioned in the same context (John.xvii, 20). One of the twelve apostles of Christ (Matt. x, 8; Mark iii, 18; Luke vi, 14; Acts i, 13), generally supposed to have been the same individual who in John's Gospel is called Na\nthanak (q. v.). The reason of this opinion is that in the first three gospels Philip and Bartholomew are constantly named together, while Nathanael is nowhere mentioned; on the contrary, in the fourth gospel the names of Philip and Nathanael are similarly combined, but nothing is said of Bartholomew (see As\nsemanni, Biblioth. Orient. III. i, 106; ii, 4 sq.; Nahr, De Nath. et Bartho. in Testament. Libr. 1740). Na\nthanak, therefore, must be considered a name assigned, while Bartholomew merely expresses his filial relation (see Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. p. 325). If so, he was a native of Cana in Galilee (John xxii, 2). Bernard and Abbot Rupert were of opinion that he was the bridegroom at the marriage of Cana. (For traditions respecting his parentage, see Cotelerius, Patr. Apost. 872.) John seems to have been selected by Philip in selecting his companion, at once pronounced that eulogy on his character which has made his name almost syn\nonymous with sincerity, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile" (John i, 47). A.D. 26. He was one of the disciples to whom our Lord appeared after his resurrection, at the Sea of Tiberias (John xxni, 2); he was also a witness of the ascension, and returned with the other apostles to Jerusalem (Acts i, 4, 12, 13). A.D. 25. On his character, see Niemeyer, Charak. i, 111 sqq. See APOSTELO.

Of the subsequent history of Bartholomew, or Na\nthanak, we have little more than vague traditions. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. xiv, 10) and many other writers, he returned from India to Greece, and thence to Rome. His name occurred in the Acts of the Martyrs. It is supposed that he returned to Alexandria with him. See Matthew, Gosp. of. But the title of "Indians" is applied by an\ncient writers to so many different nations that it is dif\fcult to determine the scene of Bartholomew's labors. Mehoem (whom Neander agrees) is of opinion that it was a part of Arabia Felix, inhabited by Jews, to whom alone a Hebrew gospel could be of any service. Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i, 10) says that it was the Indian bishop of Eliba, and Suidas reports that Barathomew preached the gospel of Christ to the inhabitants of India Felix (Ἰνδίας Φίλιξ Χαλκομένους Μακαρίους). This apostle is said to have suffered crucifixion with his head downward at Allanopolis, in Armenia Minor (Assemani, Bibli. Orient. iii, 1, 20), or, according to the pseudo-Chrysostom (Opp. vili, 622, ed. Paris, 1829), Bartholomew, according to Nicomedia, to Urbanopolis, in Cilicia (see Abdias, in Fabricius, Cod. Apost. ii, 685 sq.; Baronius, ad Martyrol. Rom. p. 500 sq.; Periorm. Vita Apostolor. p. 127 sq.). See Bartholomew's Day.

A spurious Gospel which bears his name is in the case of the apocryphal books condemned by Pope Gelasius (Fabric. Cod. Apost. N. T. i, 841 sq.).—Kittie, s. v. See Gospels (Spurious).

Bartholomew of Edessa, a monk, probably a Syrian, but of what date is totally unknown. According to Cave, he displays considerable learning and a profound knowledge of the writings and ceremonies of the Chaldees, Arabians, and Mohammedans. He wrote in Syriac, and Chrestological treatises, in which he exposes the follies of the Koran, and the origin, life, manners, rites, and dogmas of the false prophet Mohammed. This work, in Greek, with a Latin version, is given by Le Moyne at p. 302 of his Collection (Lyons, 1685).—Landon, Eccl. Dict. ii, 49.

Bartholomew of Cotton, a monk of Norwich, who flourished about 1297. He wrote a History of England, divided into three parts. Part I contains an account of the Britons; Part II treats of the Saxons and Norman kings down to the year 1222; Part III gives much information concerning the archbishops and bishops of England from 1132 to 1292, and may be found in Wharton, Anglia Sacra, i, 397. See Cotton, Bibliotheca Sar. Ac. ii, 746, 1137.

Bartholomew of Glanville (also called Anglicus), an Englishman, of the family of the earls of Suffolk, and a Franciscan. He applied himself to the discovery of the morals hidden behind the outward appearance of natural things, on which he composed a large work, entitled Opus de Proprietatibus Rerum, in nineteen books: (1) Of God; (2) of angels and devils; (3) of the soul; (4) of the body; (Argent. 1468; Nuremb. 1492; Strasb. 1505; Paris, 1574). He flourished about 1360, and a volume of Sermons, printed at Strasbourg in 1495, is attributed to him. See Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1680; Dupin, Eccl. Writers.

Bartholomew or Bartolomeo dos Martyres, so called from the name of the church of "Our Lady of Martyrs" at Lisbon, in which he was buried, was one of the best men in the Romish Church of the 16th century. He was born at Lisbon in May, 1514, and assumed the habit of St. Dominic at Lisbon, 11th December, 1528. Having been for twenty years professor of philosophy and theology, his high reputation caused him to be selected as preceptor of the son of Dom Louis, infant of Portugal. It was only at the point of death that he accepted the archbishopric of Braga (1558), and that with such reluctance as threw him upon a bed of sickness. He entered upon his see on the 4th of October, 1559, and commenced at once the execution of his design of teaching his flock by his own example and that of his household. He selected one small room out of all the magnificent apartments of the palace; he furnished it like a cell; he went to bed at eleven at night, and rose at three in the morning; his bed was hard and scanty; his body always covered with the hair cloth; his table always poorly supplied. Of the usual attendants of great houses, such as maître d’hôtel, etc., he had none, contenting himself with a few necessary domestics. As soon as he had thus set his own house in order, he hastened to endeavor to do the same with the city of Braga and his diocese in general. He established schools and hospitals, and devoted himself to the establishment and support of the clergy. As one of the delegates to the Council of Trent, he especially signalled himself there by his zeal on the subject of the reform of the cardinals. On one occasion he delivered those well-known words on this subject, "Eminentissimi Cardinaleis eminentissimae regni reformatione," and expressed his strong condemnation of the delay which had marked the work of their predecessors, and he was also who first induced the council to begin their sessions with the question of the reform of the clergy. In 1582 Pope Gregory XIII allowed him to resign his see, and he retired to a convent at Viana, where he died in 1600. His life was written by Isaac de Sacry, and his writings among which the Summula Pastoralium, a guide for bishops, has had the largest circulation, were published by P. d'Ingoumbert at Rome, 1734-52 (2 vols. fol.), and by Fessiel (Einsiedeln, 1685, 8vo).

Bartholomew's Day, 1, a festival celebrated on the 24th day of August (or 26th at Rome) in the Church of Rome, and on the 11th of June in the Greek Church, in commemoration of the apostle Bartholomew, who is said to have been martyred at Antioch, in 23 AD.

2. The day has been rendered infamous in history in consequence of the massacre of the Protestant sects in France in 1572. The principal Protestants were invited to Paris, under a solemn oath of safety, to celebrate the marriage of the King of Navarre with the sister of the Queen of Navarre. The Queen of Navarre, a zealous Protestant, died before the marriage was celebrated, not without suspicion of poison. The massacre commenced about twilight in the morning on the tolling of a bell of the church of St. Germain. Admiral Coligny was basely murdered in his own house, and then thrown out of a window, to gratify the malice of the Duke of Guise. His head was afterward cut off and sent to the king (Charles IX) and the queen-mother, the bloody Catherine de Medicis; his body, after a thousand indignities offered to it, was hung up by the feet on a gibbet. The murderers then ravaged the whole city of Paris, and put to death more than ten thousand of all ranks. De Thou says, "The very streets and passages resounded with the groans of the dying and of those who were about to be murdered. The bodies of the slain were thrown out of the windows, and with them the courts and chambers of the houses were filled. The dead bodies of others were driven through the streets on the blood flowed down the channels in such torrents that it seemed to empty itself into the neighboring river. In short, an innumerable multitude of men, women, and children were involved in one common destruction, and in all the gates and entrances to the king's palace were besmeared with blood." From Paris the massacre spread through the kingdom. The total number that fell during this massacre has been estimated by De Thou at 80,000, by Sully at 60,000, and by Persefax, a popish historian, at 100,000. The news of this atrocious murder was received at Rome with unrestrained joy and delight; a national jubilee was proclaimed in the basilica of St. John Lateran, the name of princes was engraved on the column of St. Peter, and the bells were rung and brightly lighted on the streets. A medal was struck in the pope's mint, with his own head on one side, and on the other a rude representation of the massacre, with an angel brandishing a sword, and bearing the inscription "Hugomotorum atroces." See Hucb. Ann. 1572.

Romanists writers treat this massacre in three ways: (1) Some, like Caveirac, De Falloux, and Robrachèz, justify it; (2) others affirm that the Romanists were only following the example set by Protestants; (3) others again, like Theiner, in his new volumes of the Acta Sanctorum, hostile not only to the politics of the re- ligion. Theiner's view is refuted, and the complicity of the Roman Church, with the pope at its head, in this great crime is shown in the Christian Remem-

BARTON, Elizabeth, the "holy maid of Kent," first becomes known to us in 1525, when, while a servant at an inn at Aldington, in Kent, she began to acquire a reputation for sanctity and miraculous endowments. She was subject to epileptic fits, and in the paroxysms vented incoherent phrases, which Richard Master, parson of Aldington, took advantage of to make people believe that she was an instrument of divine revelation. A successful prediction lent its aid to the general delusion. A child of the master of the inn happened to be ill, and Elizabeth was attacked by one of her fits. On recovering, she inquired whether the child was dead. She was told that it was still living. "It will not live, I announce to you; its death has been revealed to me in a vision," was the answer. The child died, and Elizabeth was immediately regarded as one favored by heaven with the gift of prophecy. She soon after entered the convent of St. Sepulchre's at Canterbury, and became a nun. In this new situation her revelations multiplied, and she became generally known as the "holy maid of Kent." Bishop Fisher and Archbishop Warham were induced by her pretensions. Lord Rivers, who was more probably worked upon by others, she boldly prophesied in reference to the divorce of Henry VIII from Catherine and his marriage with Anne Boleyn, "that she had knowledge by revelation from heaven that God was highly displeased with our said sovereign lord, and that if he proceeded in the said divorce and separation and married again, he should no longer be king of this realm; and that, in the estimation of Almighty God, he should not be king one hour, and that he should die a villain's death." The prediction was widely diffused, and caused great popular excitement. In November, 1533, the nun, with five priests and three lay gentlemen, her accomplices, were brought before the Star Chamber, and sentenced to do public penance as impostors at St. Paul's Cross. But the nun's confession, whatever were its motives, availed her nothing. From the pillory she and her companions were led back to prison, where they lay till the following January, when they attained the high treason. On the 21st of April, 1534, the nun was beheaded at Tyburn, together with the five priests.—English Cyclopedia; Burnet, History of Reformation, i, 243-249.

Barton, John B., a Methodist Episcopal minister and missionary, was born in Savannah 1806, converted 1881, entered the Itinerant ministry in the Georgia Conference 1884, and was sent as missionary to Africa, where he arrived in August, 1885, and was appointed to Basa, where he returned in 1887. In 1888, he returned to the United States, and married Eleanor Gilbert, of Charleston, S. C. In 1888 he went back with his family to Af and was stationed at Monrovia until his death, which occurred March 19, 1868. He was much loved and honored by the people among whom he labored.—Annals of Conferences, iii, 61.

Barton, Thomas, M.A., an early Episcopal minister in America, was born in Ireland 1720, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. Soon after he came to America, and after teaching two years in the Academy of Philadelphia, he went to England for ordination, and in 1755 was appointed missionary to Huntington. He extended his field of labor to Carlisle, Shipton, and the New York, and was specially interested in the Indians. He served the Church in Lancaster twenty years, travelling largely to preach at destitute points. When the Revolution broke out he refused the oath of allegiance, and had to pass to the British lines at New York. He died 1780.—Sprague, Ammulet, v, 169.

Baruch (Hebr. Baruk, בָּרוּךָ, blessed; Sept. Baroc, Ἰωσσάφος, Josephus Ἰωσσάφος), the name of three men.

1. The faithful friend of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xxxii, 12; xxxvi, 4 sq.) was of a noble family of the tribe of Judah (Jer. ii, 59; Bar. i, 1; Joseph. Ant. x, 6, 2; 9, 1), and generally considered to be the brother of the prophet Seraiah, both being represented as sons of Neriah; and to Baruch the prophet Jeremiah dictated the last chapter of the Jeremiah (B.C. 605), Baruch was directed to write all the prophecies delivered by Jeremiah up to that period, and to read them to the people, which he did from a window in the Temple upon two solemn occasions (Jer. xxxvi). He afterward read them before the counsellors of the king at a private interview, when Baruch, being asked to give an account of the manner in which the prophecy had been composed, gave an exact description of the mode in which he had taken it down from the prophet's dictation. Upon this they ordered him to leave the roll, advising that he and Jeremiah should conceal themselves. They then informed the king of what had taken place, upon which he had the roll read to him; but, after hearing a part of it, he cut it with a penknife, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his counsellors, threw it into the fire of his winter parlor, where he was sitting. He then ordered Jeremiah and Baruch to be seized, but they could not be found. The said Baruch and Jeremiah went into the court of that king, and were publicly adorned with a paper roll by an annual fast. See Calendar (Jewish). Another roll was now written by Baruch from the prophet's dictation, containing all that was in the former, with some additions, the most remarkable of which is the prophecy respecting the ruin of Jehoiachin and his house as the punishment of his impious act. This is the prophecy of Jeremiah which we now possess. Baruch, being himself terrified at the threats contained in the prophetic roll, received the comforting assurance that he would himself be delivered from the calamities which should befall Judah and Jerusalem (Jer. xlvii). During the siege of Jerusalem Baruch left the city with the deposit of the deed on the condition which Jeremiah had made of the territory of Hanameel, to which deed he had been a witness (Jer. xxxii, 12 sq.). B.C. 589. His enemies accused him of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans (Jer. xlii, 8; comp. xxxvii, 15); and he was thrown into prison. The prophet, when threatened with the capture of Jerusalem, B.C. 588 (Joseph. Ant. x, 9, 1). By the permission of Nebuchadnezzar he remained with Jeremiah at Maspetha (Joseph. 1. c.); but in the fourth year of Zedekiah (B.C. 595) Baruch is supposed by some to have accompanied Seraiah to Babylon, when the latter attained the throne of the prophetic king in Judah, ch. 1 and 11, which he was commanded by Jeremiah to read on the banks of the Euphrates, and then to cast the prophetic roll into the river, with a stone attached to it, to signify the everlasting ruin of Babylon (Jer. ii, 61). At least Baruch, in the book which bears his name (the Apocalypse), is said to have read these prophecies in Babylon, in the hearing of King Jebusachim and the captive Jews, in the fifth year of the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (see below), which must have been the same taking of it in which Jebusachim was made prisoner; for after the other taking of Jerusalem, in the eleventh year of the reign of King Zedekiah, he be

2. Hebrev.—Considerable discussion has been raised as to the original language of the book. Those who advocated its authenticity generally supposed that it was first written in Hebrew (Hust, Dereezer, etc.; but Jahn is undecided: Bertholdt, Emd. 1743), and this opinion found many supporters (Oudin, Gesenius, Movers, Hitzig, De Wette, Emd. § 329). Others again have maintained that the Greek is the original text (Richborn, Emd. 888 sq.; Bertholdt, Emd. 1757; Haver- nick, ap. De Wette, l. c.). The truth appears to lie between these two extremes. The two divisions of the book are distinguished by marked peculiarities of style and language. The Hebraic character of the first part (1-iii, 8) is such as to mark it as a translation, and not as the work of a Hebraizing Greek: e. g. i, 14, 15, 22; ii, 4, 9, 25; iii, 8; and several obscurities seem to be mistranslations: e. g. i, 2, 8, ii, 18, 29. The second part, on the other hand, which is written with greater exactness, is not Hebraism, and makes the Alexandrine type. The imitations of Jeremiah and Daniel which occur throughout the first part (comp. i, 15-18 = Dan. ix, 7-10; ii, 1, 2 = Dan. ix, 12, 13; ii, 7-19 = Dan. ix, 18-19) give place to the tone and imagery of the Psalms and Isaiah. The most probable explanation of this transition is to be sought in the language and style of the Sept. translation of Jeremiah and the first part of Baruch seem too great to be accounted for in any way (for instance, the use of εὐθανασίας, ἀποστολὴς, βυζίμος [βυζίμη], ἀποκρίνομαι, μάνα, ἀποστροφίαν [σχ.], ἠγερθήμεναι τινα, ὦμα ἡκατερισθαι ἰτι τινα), and the great discrepancy which exists between the Hebrew and Greek texts to the arrangement of the last chapters of Jeremiah, increases the probability of such an addition having been made to the canonical prophecies. These verbal coincidences cease to exist in the second part, or become very rare; but this also is distinguished by characteristic words: e. g. ὁ πιστεύων ὁ ὑπέκυψαν τίνι, ὄσα καὶ ὅτι. At the same time, the general unity (even in language, e. g. γαλαζύμαν) and coherence of the book in its present form point to the work of one man. (Fritzsch, Emd. § 5; Hitzig, Psalm. ii, 119; Ewald, Gesch. d. Volker letzter iv, 232 n.). Ber- tholdt appears to be quite in error (Emd. 1743, 1767) in ascribing the book to Justinus, a view now completely passed. (See Siebenberger's Heb. Comm. Warsaw, 1840.)

3. The Epistle of Jeremiah, which, according to the authority of some Greek MSS., stands in the English version as the 6th chapter of Baruch, is probably the work of a later period. It consists of a rhetorical declamation against idols (comp. Jer. x, xxv), in the form of a letter addressed by Jeremiah "to whom they were to be led captive by Babylon." The letter is divided into clauses by the repetition of a common burden: they are no gods; fear them not (vv. 16, 23, 29, 66): how can a man think or say that they are gods? (vv. 40, 44, 55, 54). The condition of the text is closely analogous to the general condition of the same chapter of partial reception in the Church. The author shows an intimate acquaintance with idolatrous worship; and this circumstance, combined with the purity of the Hellenistic dialect, points to Egypt as the country in which the epistle was written.—Smith, s. v.

4. A Syrian first Epistle of Baruch (to the nine and a half tribes" (comp. 4 Esdr. xili, 40; Arab. Vers.) is found in the London and Paris Polyglots. This is made up of commonplaces of warning, encouragement, and exhortation. Fritzsch (Emd. § 8) considers it to be the production of a Syrian monk. It is not found in any other language. Whitton (A Collection of Authentic Records, etc., London, 1757, 1 sq., 25 sq.) endeavored to trace in it the authenticity. For this, and the "Apocryphal Epistle of Baruch," see REVELATIONS, SPURIOS.

III. WRITER. The supposed author of the book is undoubtedly the companion of Jeremiah, but the details are inconsistent with the assumption. If Baruch be the author of this book, he must have removed from Egypt to Jerusalem at a very early age, for Jeremiah, inasmuch as the author of the book lived in Babylonia in the fifth year after that event, unless we suppose, with Eichhorn, Arnold, and others, that the reference (Baruch i, 1) is to the fifth year from the captivity of Jehoiachin. Jahn (Introductio in Epistolam redacta, § 237, etc.) attaches the book to the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and argues against the passage in question, since the destruction of Jerusalem is there spoken of as having already taken place. De Wette (Lehrbuch zur Einleitung in das A. und N. T.) ingeniously conjectures that in (year) is a mistake or correction of some scribe for (year); and there is no question that the present reading, which mentions the year, and the time of the month, without naming the month itself, is quite unaccountable. If the reading in i, 1, be correct (comp. 2 Kings xxv, 8), it is impossible to fix the fifth year in such a way as to suit the contents of the book, which exhibits not only historical inaccuracies, but also evident traces of a later date than the beginning of the captivity (iii, 9 sq.; iv, 22 sq.; i, 3 sq. Comp. 2 Kings xxv, 27). Its so-called Epistle of Jeremiah, however, is confessedly more ancient than the second book of Maccabees, for it is there referred to (2 Macc. ii, 3, comp. with Baruch vi, 4) as an ancient document. In the absence of any certain information as to the time of the composition of Baruch, Ewald (i. c. p. 290) assigns it to the close of the Persian period, and this may be true as far as the Hebrew portion is concerned; but the present book must be placed considerably later, probably about the time of the war of liberation (B.C. cir. 180), or some other period (B.C. cir. 104). IX. AS CREDITED. The book was held in little esteem among the Jews (Jerome, Prof. in Jerem. p. 834 . nec habetur apud Hebraeos; Euphranius, de mens. oth eis tov eis tivoi inotanov). Thus, though it is stated in the Greek text of the Apostolical Constitutions (v. 20, 11) that it was read, together with the Lamentations, "on the tenth of the month Gorpaius" (i. e. the day of Atonement). But this reference is wanting in the Syriac version (Bunsen, Anst. Ante-Nic. ii, 187), and the assertion is unsupported by any other authority. There is no trace of the use of the book in the New Testament, or in the Apostolic Fathers, or in the Rabbinic Literature. In the time of Jerome it was not infrequently quoted both in the East and in the West, and generally as the work of Jeremiah (Irenaeus, c. v. 55, 1, "significavit Jeremias, Bar. iv, 86, v.; Tertullian, Gnost. 8, Hieremia, Bar. [Eiplat.] vi, 3; Clement, Procli, 1, 9, 21, "die Ieremia, Bar. iv, 4;" ld. Pseudo- II, 2, 8, 56, "diva gratia, Bar. iii, 16, 19;" Origens, ap. Eun. II, IV, 26, "Ieremia in num. et vel inotanov [?]"; Cyrilian, Test. Lib. ii, 6, "apud Hieremia- miam, Bar. iii, 55, etc.). It was, however, "abolished" throughout the Sept. as deficient in the Hebrew (Cod. Chis. ap. Daniel, etc., Rome, 1772, p. xxii). On the other hand, it is contained as a separate book in the pseudo-Lausiac Catalogue, as one of the canonical books in the Revised Catalogue of Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, and Nicephorus; but it is not specially mentioned in the Conciliar catalogues of Carthage and Hippo, probably as being included under the title Jeremiah. (Comp. Athanasii Syn. Sym. S. Script. ap. Credner, Zur Gesch. des Kan. 108; Hilary, Prod. in Psalm. 15). It is omitted by those writers who reproduced in the main the Hebrew Canon (e. g. Melito, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius). Augustine quotes the words of Baruch (iii, 16) as attributed more commonly to Jeremiah (die C. xviii, 33, and elsewhere uses them as such (Philon xlii, 48). At the Council of Trent Baruch was admitted into the Roman Canon, but the 1514 version has had it unassumingly placed among the apocryphal books, though Whitton maintained its authenticity (Authent. Records, i, 1, sq.). Calmet observes that its "canonicity had been denied not only by the Protestants, but by several Catholics," among whom he instances Driodo, Lyranus, and Dionysius of Carthage. He considers that Jerome treats the book with harshness when (Preface to Jeremiah) that other observes part of the book. Most modern writers of the Roman Church, among whom are Du Pin (Canon of Scripture), Calmet (Commentary), and Allber (Hermeneutica Generalis), reckon this a genuine epistle of Jeremiah's. Jahn, however, after Jerome, maintains its spurious and pseudepigraphal character. This he conceives sufficiently attested by the difference of style and its freedom from Hebraisms. He considers it to be an imitation of the Epistle of Jeremiah (ch. xxiii). Grothus, Elchhorn, and most of the German writers favor the idea of a Greek original. They conceive that the writer was some unknown person who, in the name of Pseudo-Jeremiah South, confirm in the true religion the Jews then residing in Egypt, attributed his own ideas to Baruch the scribe. There appears, however, no reason, on this latter hypothesis, why the author should speak of the return from Babylon. Grothus conceives that the book abounds not only in Jewish but even in Christian interpolations (see Elchhorn's Erscheinung in der Apokryph. Schrift.).

2. The son of Caleb and his father of Massah, the descendents of Peres, son of Judah (Neh. iii. 5), B.C. ante 536.

3. The son of Zabdi; he repaired (B.C. 446) that part of the walls of Jerusalem between the north-east angle of Zion and Eliahhu's house (Neh. iii. 20), and joined in Nehemiah's covenant (x. 6). B.C. 410.

Barulli, heretics of the twelfth century that revived the heresy as well as the name of the sound of all men were created at the same time with the world itself, and that they sinned all together after the creation. These heretics seem to have derived their name from their leader, Barulus,—Moréri, who cites Sanderson, Her. 149; Landen, Eccl. Dict. ii. 56.

Barnaili (Heb. Barzillay), בָּרִצֵל , of iron, i. e. strong; Sept. בֶּרֶזִילֵי, but in Ezra בֶרֶזִילָא, Josephus Barzillai, i. ex. viii, 8, the name of three men. In Ezra, the father of Adriea, which latter was the second husband of Meriah, Saul's daughter (2 Sam. xix. 8), B.C. ante 1062.

2. A wealthy old Giladite of Rogelim, who distinguished himself by his loyalty when David fled beyond the Jordan from his son Abesom, B.C. 1028 (see 1 Chron. iii. 603, 3). He furnished a liberality supply of provisions, beds, and other conveniences for the use of the king's followers (2 Sam. xvii. 27). On the king's triumphant return, Barnaili attended him as far as the Jordan, but declined, by reason of his advanced age (and probably also, from a feeling of indepen- dence), to proceed to Jerusalem and end his days at the court. He discharged (his son had committed a suitable person to receive the royal favors (2 Sam. xix. 92, 93). On his death-bed David recalled to mind this kindness, and commended Barnaili's children to the care of Solomon (1 Kings ii. 7).

3. A priest who married a descendant of the preceding, and assumed the same name; his genealogy in consequence became so confused that his descendants, on the return from the captivity, were set aside as unfit for the priesthood (Ezra ii. 61). B.C. ante 586.

Basaloth (בֶּרֶזִילָא ṭו, בֶּרֶזִילָא, Vulg. Basaloth), one of the heads of "temple-servants" whose "sons" are stated (1 Esdr. v. 81) to have returned from Babylon; evidently the Bazyleth or Bazilith (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 52; Neh. viii, 44).

Basan. See SALLUTH.

Basan's Gate (בָּשָׁן, בָּשָׁנָה, Josephus Boerii), a place in Gilgeb where Jonathan Maccabaeus was killed by Trypho, and from which his bones were afterward disinterred and conveyed to Modin by his brother Simon (1 Macc. xiii. 28; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 6). Schwarcz supposes it to be the Talmudic yeshivə (תֶּשׁוֹבָה) or Bagor (בָּגוֹר) "of Arabia" (Polest. p. 286, 287). The route of the Syrian murderer is given with ro much confusion (see Fritzsche, in loc.) that some have even supposed the Bazyleth of Joshua to be meant.

Bascom, Henry B. D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Hancock, N. Y., May 27, 1876. He united with the Methodist Church in Western Pennsylvania in 1881, and was licensed to preach in 1818. His preaching soon began to attract attention, and before many years his fame as a pulpit orator was widely spread. In 1823 he was elected chaplain to Congress. In 1827 he was called to the presidency of Madison College, Pa., which he held till 1829, when he accepted the agency of the American Colonization Society. In 1828 he became Professor of Morals in Augusta College, and in 1844 President of Transylvania University. He edited the Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church South from 1846 to May, 1850, when he was elected bishop. Worn out with toil, he died Sept. 8, 1850. Bishop Bascom's course of labor thus embraced almost every extreme of human life. In his early career he is said to have preached in one year 400 times, travelled 5000 miles, and to have received as salary during that time, $12 10. At one period he was unquestionably the most popular pulpit orator in the United States. His sermons seemed invariably delivered memoriter, though usually long enough to occupy two hours; if he did not purposely committ them to memory, yet their frequent repetition fixed in his mind their language as if of themselves, and he would, without preparation, and yet with the utmost labor. The paragraphs often seem to be separate but irreducible masses of thought, written at intervals, and without very close relations. His published Sermons (Nashville, 1848-50, 2 vols. 12mo) give no just idea of the grandeur of his pulpit orations; many of his brilliant passages seem to have been omitted in preparing the volumes for the press. Some of his other productions, in which his poetical propensities had no room to play, show that if his education had been such as to effectually discipline his imagination, his real ability would have been greatly enhanced. His most important writings, besides those prepared for the press, are his "Preliminary Letters," written on behalf of the "reform" movement of 1828; the "Protest of the Minority," in the memorable General Conference of 1844; the "Report on Organization," at the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; and a subsequent elaborate volume in defense of the Southern Church, entitled Methodism, its Sources and Slavery. His Works, containing Sermons, Letters, and Lectures, are collected in 4 vols. 12mo (Nashville, 1856). See Henke, Life of Bascom (Nashville, 1864, 12mo); Meth. Quart. Rev. 1852; Sprague, Annals, vii, 534.

Base (as a noun) is the rendering in the Author. Vers. of two Heb. words: 1. בֹּשֶׁה, the foundation or pedalae, e. g. of the laver (q. v.) in the temple-court ("foot," Exod. xxx, 18, etc.); then, the "base over the ledges" (לְטָלֶה, joina) of the brazen sea (q. v.), in 1 Kings vii, 29, apparently explained in ver. 31 as a "work of the base" (לְטָלֶה), perhaps a pediment-like cornice covering the joints; but the whole description is exceedingly obscure. See Ledge. 2. רְפֵּלָה, mekonah, or רְפֵּלָה, mekonah, a foot-piece or stand upon which to place the lavers in the temple-service (1 Kings vii, 27-45, etc.). See Laver.

Bashan, כָּבֶשׁ, or כָּבֶשָׁ (see Bashan).

Ba'shan (Heb. Bashan, בָּשָׁן), usually with the art., בֵּשֶׁנֶּ, light sandy soil; Samaritan Ver. בֵּשֶׁנֶּ; Targum, Psa. lxviii, 13, also בֵּשֶׁנֶּ, the latter, Buxtorf [Lett. Talm. col. 870] suggests, may have originated in the mistake of a transcriber, yet both are found in Targ. Jon., Deut. xxxiii, 22; Sept. Bavaqin, and Basaquin, Josephus [Ant. ix, 8] and Eusebius [Onomast. s. v. Barabim], a district on the east of Jordan, the modern el-Battein or el-Dethmeyk (Abulfeda, p. 97). The name is not, like Argoth and other districts of Palestine, distinct in pronunciation, but is sometimes spoken of as the "land of Bashan" (1 Chron. vi, 11; and comp. Num. xxvi, 38; xxxii, 39), and sometimes as "all Bashan" (Deut. iii, 10, 18; Josh. xii, 12, 90), but most commonly without any addition. The word probably denotes the peculiar fertility of the soil; by the ancient verb "to pasture, instigated by the use of it as a proper name, a word meaning fruitful or fat is adopted. Thus, in Psa. xxiii, 13, for Bashan, we find in Sept. παραβάσσω; Aquila, λήσσομαι; Symmachus, στερεω; and Vulg. Pastum (Psa. lviii, 16), for hill of Bashan; Sept. ἐποίησα πυρός; Jerome (see Bochart, Hierosol., pt. i, col. 306), means the pastoral-land of Bashan, and the superior fertility of its breed of cattle, are frequently alluded to in the Scriptures. We read in Deut. xxii, 14, of "rams of the breed (Heb. sons) of Bashan." (Ezek. xxviii, 18), "Rams, lambs, bulls, goats, all of them failings of Bashan." The oaks of Bashan are mentioned in connection with the cedars of Lebanon (Isa. ii, 13; Zech. xi, 2). In Ezekiel's description of the wealth and magnificence of Tyre it is said, "Of the oaks of Bashan have they made their oars" (xxvi, 6). The ancient commentators on Amos iv, 1, "the king of Bashan," Jerome, Theodoret, and Cyril, speak in the general term, "the king of the Philistines," A king of Bashan (Bochart, Hierosol., pt. i, col. 306), and modern travellers corroborate their assertions. See Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, p. 384-388; Buckingham's Travels in Persia, ii, 112-117.

The first notice of this country is in Gen. xiv, 5. Chedorlaomer and his confederates "smote the Rephaim in Ashtaroth Karmnamin." Now Og, king of Bashan, dwelt in Ashtaroth, and "was of the remnant of the Rephaim" (Auth. Ver. giants), Joshua xii, 4. When the Israelites invaded the Promised Land, Argoth, a province of Bashan, contained "sixty fenced cities, with walls, and gates, and brazen bars, besides unwalled towns a great many" (Deut. iii, 4, 5; 1 Kings iv, 18). All these were taken by the children of Israel after their conquest of the land of Sihon from Armon to Jabbock. They "turned" from their road over Jordan and "went up by the way of Bashan,"—probably very much the same as that now followed by the pilgrims of the Reformed Churches to the Holy Land. As Edrei, on the western edge of the Lejah. See Edrei. Here they encountered Og, king of Bashan, who "came out" probably from the natural fastnesses of Bashan only to meet the entire destruction of himself, his sons, and all his people (Num. xxxi, 33-35; Deut. iii, 5, 9); and with 1,700 sturdy fortified cities, evidently formed a principal portion of Bashan (Deut. ii, 4, 5), though still only a portion (ver. 18), there being besides a large number of unwalled towns (ver. 5). Its chief cities were Ashtaroth (i. e. Beeshterah, comp. Josh. xx, 27 with 1 Chron. vi, 71), Edrei, Golan, Salcah, and possibly Mahaanim (Josh. xiii, 30). Two of these cities, Golan and Beraant, were allotted to the Levites of the family of Gershon, the former as a "city of refuge" (Josh. xxi, 27; 1 Chron. vii, 71). The important district was bestowed on the half tribe of Manassesh (Josh. xiii, 29-31), together with "half Gilead." After the Manassites had assisted their brethren in the conquest of the country west of the Jordan, they went to their tents and to their cattle in the possession which Moses had given them in Bashan (xxii, 7, 8). It is doubtful, however, whether the limits of this tribe ever extended over the whole of this region. See Manaseh. Solomon appointed twelve officers to furnish the monthly supplies for the royal household, and allotted the region of Argoth to the son of Geder (1 Kings iv, 18). Toward the close of Jehu's reign, Hazael invaded the land of Israel, and smote the whole eastern territory, "even Gilead and Bashan" (2 Kings x, 8; Joseph. Ant. i, 8, 1); but after his death the cities he had taken were recovered (2 Kings xii, 20). In the wars with Syria, the Syrians in three battles, at Elahra had predicted (2 Kings xiii, 19; Joseph. Ant. ix, 8, 7). After this date, although the "oaks" of its forests and the wild cattle of its pastures—the "strong bulls of Bashan"—long retained their proverbial fame (Ezek. xxvii, 6; Psa. xxii, 13), and the beauty of its high downs and heathen temples, it was now and then the heart of a poet (Amos iv, 1; Psa. lxviii, 15; Jer. i, 19; Mic. vii, 14), yet the country almost disappears from history; its very name seems to have given place as quickly as possible to one which had a connection with the story of the founder of the nation (Josh. xiv, 14-15, 47-48), and is rarely used. Even so early as the time of the conquest, "Gilead" seems to have begun to take the first place as the designation of the country beyond the Jordan, a place which it retained afterward to the exclusion of Bashan (comp. Josh. xvii, 9, 15, 22; Judg. xii, 1; Psa. ix, 7; evii, 9; 1 Chron. xxvii, 21; 2 Kings xv, 29). Indeed "Bashan" is most frequently used as a mere accomplishment to the name of Og, when his overthrow is alluded to in the national poetry. After the captivity the name Batanea was applied to only a part of the ancient Bashan; the three remaining sections being called Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Gaulanitis (Lightfoot, Anc. sac. Hist. xxxix, 18). The city of Trachonitis was granted by Augustus to Herod the Great, and on his death Batanea formed a part of Philip's tetrarchy (Joseph. War, ii, 6, 3; Ant. xviii, 4, 6). At his decease, A.D. 34, it was annexed by Tiberius to the province of Syria; but in A.D. 57 it was given by Caligula to Herod Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus, with the title of king (Acts xxi, 1; Joseph. Ant. xviii, 6, 10). From the time of Agrippa's death, in A.D. 44, to A.D. 53, the government again reverted to the Romans, but it was then restored by Claudius to Agrippa II (Acts xxv, 18; Joseph. Ant. xx, 7, 1). The ancient limits of Bashan are very distinctly defined by Bochart from the "hill of Gilead" on the south to Mount Hermon on the north (Deut. iii, 5, 10, 14; Josh. xii, 5; 1 Chron. v, 23), and from the Arakah or Jordan valley on the west to Salcah and the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites on the east (Josh. xiii, 5-8; Deut. iii, 10). The sacred writers denote these cities, with 1,700 fortified towns, as "the pathway of the house of Bashan," and speak of it as the allotment of the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Num. xxxii, 39). Of the four post-exilian provinces, Gaulanitis, Auranitis, Trachonitis, and Batanea, all but the third have retained almost perfectly their ancient names, the modern Le-jah alone having superseded the Argob and Trachonitis of the Old and New Testaments. The province of Jaulin is the western third of the four; it abuts on the Sea of Galilee and the Lake of Merom, from the former of which it rises to a plateau nearly 8000 feet above the surface of the water. This plateau, though now almost wholly uncultivated, is of a rich soil, and its north-west portion rises into a range of hills almost everywhere clothed with oak forests (Porter, ii, 265). No less than 127 ruined villages are scattered over its surface. See GOLAN. The Haoran is the southeast of the last named province and south of the Lejah; like Jaulin, its surface is perfectly flat, and its soil esteemed among the most fertile in Syria. It too contains the number of ruined hamlets, and also many inhabited villages. See HAURAN. The contrast which the rocky intricacies of the Lejah present to the rich and flat plains of the Haoran and the Jaulin has already been noticed. See ANGON. The remaining district, though not much smaller in extent than the ancient Bashan, still retains its name, modified by a change frequent in the Oriental languages. Ardal el-Bakawiyeh lies on the east of the Lejah and the north of the range of Jebel Haoran or ed-Druze (Porter, ii, 57).

It is a mountainous district of the most picturesque character, abounding with forests of evergreen oak, and with soil extremely rich; the surface smooth, with very remote detached hills, deserted, but it is true, yet standing almost as perfect as the day they were built. For the boundaries and characteristics of these provinces, and the most complete researches yet published into this interesting portion of Palestine, see Porter's Danmascus, vol. ii; comp. Bash’ah-havoth-Jair (Heb. hab-Bashan 'Chavoth Yair,' יִבְשָׁן חָוֹת יָאִיר, the Bashan of the villages of Jair; Sept. Βασιλείας τῶν Ἀβδός τῶν Ιαήρων), the general name imposed by Jair, the son of Manasseh, upon the region of Argob (q. v.), conquered by him in Bashan (Deut. iii, 14), containing sixty cities, with walls and brazen gates (Josh. xiii, 30; 1 Kings iv, 13). It is elsewhere (Num. xxxii, 41) called simply Havoth-Jair (q. v.).

Bash'math (Heb. Basmuth, בַּשָּׁם, elsewhere more correctly Anglicized “Basmath,” q. v.), the name of two females.

1. A daughter of Ishmael, the last married (B.C. 1292) of the three wives of Esau (Gen. xxxvi, 9, 4, 13), from whom, Reuel, four tribes of the Edomites were descended. When first mentioned, she is called Mahalath (Gen. xxxvii, 9); while, on the other hand, the name Bashmath is in the narrative (Gen. xxxvi, 34) given to another of Esau’s wives, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. It is remarkable that all Esau’s wives receive different names in the genealogical table of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi), from those by which they have been previously mentioned in the history.

GELOGE

1. Adah, daughter of Elon.

2. Tohloram, daughter of Anah.

4. Judith, d. of Beer.

5. Mahalath, d. of Ishmael.

Whatever be the explanation of this diversity of names, there is every reason for supposing that they refer to the same persons respectively, and we may well conclude with Hengstenberg that the change of all the names cannot have arisen from accident; and, farther, that the names in the genealogical table, which is essentially an Edomitic document, are those of which these women respectively bore as the wives of Esau (Hengstenberg, Arch. d. Pent., ii, 277; English transl. ii, 226). This view is confirmed by the fact that the Seirite wife, who is called Judith in the narrative, appears in the genealogical account under the name of Abiodemam (q. v.), a name which appears to have belonged to a district of Idumea (Gen. xxxvi, 41). The reason of this error in the text is the occurrence of this name Bashmath both in the narrative and the genealogy, though applied to different persons. The Samaritan text seeks to remove this difficulty by reading Mahalath instead of Bashmath in the genealogy. We might with more probability suppose that this name (Bashmath) has been assigned to the wrong person in one or other of the passages; but if so, it is impossible to determine which is erroneous.—Smith, s. v. See Esa.

2. A daughter of Solomon and wife of one of his officers (1 Kings iv, 15, A. V. "Basmath").

Basil (from Basilios, Βασιλιος, St., "the Great," one of the most eminent of the Greek fathers, was born about the end of the year 326, probably at Necaisea. He began his studies at Cæsarea, in Palestine, whence he proceeded to Constantinople to hear the famous Libanius, and thence to Athens, where he contracted an intimate friendship with Gregory Nazianzen. About 355 he returned to his own country, but soon after left his home again and travelled into Libya, visiting the famous monasteries of those countries. Upon his return he turned his thoughts to church reform, and afterward ordained deacon. But about the year 356 he retired into a solitude of Pontus, where he built a monastery near that of his sister Macrina (q. v.), and with his brothers, Peter and Naucratius, and several others, he followed an ascetic life, and, drawing up a rule for his community, became the founder of the monastic life in those regions. In 364 (or 362) he was ordained priest by Eusèbius, and in 360 or 370, on the death of Eusèbius, was elected bishop of Cæsarea, after great opposition, which was finally overcome only by the personal efforts of the aged Gregory of Nazianzus. But the emperor Valens soon began to persecute him because he refused to embrace the doctrine of the Arians, of which he and Gregory of Nazianzus were strenuous opponents. The death of Valens’s son gave freedom of action to Basil, who devoted his efforts to bring about a reunion between the Eastern and Western churches, which had been divided upon points of faith, and in the year 379, Bishops Eustathius and Paulinus of Antioch. The Western churches acknowledged Paulinus for the legal bishop; Meletius was supported by the Eastern churches. But all his efforts were ineffectual, this dispute not being terminated till nine months after his death. Basil was also engaged in some other division which the emperor had made of Cappadocia into two provinces. Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, had been a friend of Basil, and had planted monasticism in Asia, a pursuit in which Basil fully sympathized; but Eustathius openly embraced Arianism, and Basil in 378 broke with him and wrote against him. He also wrote against Apollinaris; in fact, he took a part in most of the controversies of his age. He died Jan. 1, 379, with these words on his lips: "O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." Basil was a man of great piety, profound learning, and great eloquence. During the Arian controversy he was an unfinishing champion of the orthodox doctrine. At first, through fear of Sabellianism, he preferred the homoousian formula; but in the strife which followed, he was brought to clearer apprehension of the question, and acknowledged the Nicene Creed, which he ever afterward steadfastly maintained. For a statement of his view of the Trinity, see Dörner, Dogmengeschichte, Vol. iii, 2nd Ed., Div. I, vol. ii, p. 302 sqq. See also ARIANISM. The Greek Church honors him as one of its most illustrious saints, and celebrates his festival January 1st. The works of Basil were first published, with a preface of Erasmus, at Basle, 1552; a better edition, with Letii translating and notes, was published by the Jesuits Fronton le Duc and Morel (Paris, 1618, 2 vols. fol., and again 1688, 3 vols. fol.). Valuable contributions to a more correct edition were made by the Dominican Cozzens (in Paris, 1721-1730, 3 vols. fol.) reprinted in the excellent Paris edition of 1889 (6 vols. royal 8vo). The contents of the Benedictine edition (1721-31, 3 vols. fol.) are as follows:

The best selection from his works, containing, indeed, that original theological studies need, is that of Leipzic, 1804, forming the second volume of Thilo's Bibliotheca Patrum Gregorianum Dogmatica. His writings are divided into, (1) polematic, (2) liturgical, (3) exegetical, (4) ascetic. Among his polemical, bodily, and of the Holy Spirit, that the same books against the Eunomians, are the most important. His exegetical writings are of great value, and some of his services are still, in abridged forms, in use in the Greek Church. Both by his example and his writings he was the substantial founder of monasticism in the East, so that it is common, though erroneous, to call all monastics after him. In praying the Office in the Basilian Church in the Slavonic language means "God have mercy upon us." In their votes they resembled the Manichaeans and Paulicians, which last sect arose about the same time. They denied the Trinity; held that the body of Jesus was a phantom, and that Michael the archangel was incarnate. The great hereticks was the Virgin, of the saints, and of images. They affected an appearance of extreme sanctity, and wore the monastic Basil or Basilus, some time a physician, was ordained bishop of Ancona by the bishops of the Eusebian party in the room of Marcellus, whom they had deposed; but Basil was himself excommunicated, and his ordination annulled, in the council of Sardica in 347, though he still retained the see. He was an opponent of Athanasius, but was still considered as the head of the semi-Arians. This opinion Basil procured to be established by a council held at Ancona in the year 388, and subsequently defended itself both at Seleucia and Constantinople against the Eudoxians and Arians, by whom it was deposed in 390. Jerome (De Viria Mag. 399) infers from that Basil wrote a book against Marcellus, his predecessor, De Virginitate, and some other smaller pieces, of which no remains are extant. Basil is warmly commended by Theodoret for his exemplary life, which was probably the secret of his influence with the emperor Constantinus; and Sozomen speaks of him as celebrated for learning and piety. See Cavet, 177; Novum, 387: Dupin, Eccl. Writera, cent. iv; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. ii, 47; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. bk. ii; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. bk. ii; Lardner, Works, i, 389.

Basil, bishop of Seleucia in Isauria (not to be confused with the Basil who was the intimate friend of Chrysostom). At the Council of Constantinople in 448, he gave his vote for the condemnation of Eutyches; but in the following year, at the second Council of Ephesus, through fear of the threats and violence of Dlucas, or from actual weakness and fickleness of judgment, he took precisely the opposite ground, and anathematized the doctrine of two natures in Jesus Christ. In the Council of Chalcedon, 451, Basil, together with the other leaders in the assembly at Ephesus, was deposed, but in the fourth session of the council he was restored to his dignity. He wrote Forty-three Homilies; seventeen on the Old, and twenty-six on the New Testament (Dupin reckons only forty). These were published in Greek at Heidelberg (1556, 8vo); Greek and Latin, with notes, by Dusquesne, Heidelb., 1604, 8vo, together with the Oratio in Trans. Inaugurationem Domini, in Greek and Latin. The following are supposed to be spurious: 1. A Demonstration of the Coming of Christ, against the Jews, in Latin, ed. by Turrinianus (Ingolstadt, 1616, 4to); Greek, in the Heidelberg edition of the Homilies (1596). This is clearly, from its style, not the work of Basil, and is not found in any MS. of his writings. 2. Life and Miracles of St. Thecla, virgin and martyr, which, according to Cave, is evidently the work of some Greek monk of a late age, edited by Pantinus, Antwerp (1608, Gr. and Lat.). All the above were published in Greek and Latin (Paris, 1622, fol), with the same works of the Tholos. See Cavet, 177; Novum, 448; Dupin, Eccl. Writera, cent. v, p. 28; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Basil or Basilius, chief of the Bogomilics of the twelfth century. This sect took its rise in Bulgaria. Though it is likely that their enemies laid false charges against them, it is clear that they held many corrupt ideas and practices. From their habit of incessant fasting, and their practice of praying the Office in Basilian liturgy in the Slavonic language means "God have mercy upon us." In their votes they resembled the Manichaeans and Paulicians, which last sect arose about the same time. They denied the Trinity; held that the body of Jesus was a phantom, and that Michael the archangel was incarnate. The great hereticks was the Virgin, of the saints, and of images. They affected an appearance of extreme sanctity, and wore the monastic Basil was a physician, and had twelve principal followers, whom he designated his apostles, and also some women, who went about spreading the poison of his doctrine everywhere. When before the council called by the patriarch John IX in 1118 to examine into the matter, Basilius refused to deny his doctrine, and declared that he was willing to endure any torment, and death itself. One peculiar notion of this sect was that no torment could affect them, and that the angels would deliver them even from the fire. Basilius himself was condemned in the above-mentioned council, and burnt in this year. Several of his followers, when seized, retracted; others, among whom were some of those whom he called his apostles, were kept in prison and died there. Several councils were held upon this subject. See Neander, Ch. Hist., iv, 555 sq.; Landon, Eccl. Dict., ii, 67.; See BOGOMILES.

Basil (St.), Liturgy of, one of the three liturgies used in the Greek Church, the other two being those of St. Gregory and St. Chrysostom. They are read at distinct seasons of the year; that of Basil being read on the five Sundays of the Great Lent, on the Thursdays and Saturdays of the Holy Week, on the eves of Christmas and the Epiphany, and on the first day of the year. —Palmer, Orig. Liturgy, i, 46 sq. See BASIL; LITURGIES.

2. A cursive MS. of the entire N. T. except the Apocalypse, numbered 1 of the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles (technically designated as K, iii, 3; formerly B, vi, 27). It was known to Erasmus, who, however, used it but little and did not attempt to correct it. The reason for these discordant opinions is doubtless to be found in the character of the MS. itself, which differs greatly in the several portions. The Acts and Epistles contain a text of no great importance; but the text of the Gospels (now bound at the end of the vol.) is very remarkable, adhering very closely to the oldest class of uncials. The last has recently been collated (independently) by Tregelles and Dr. Roth. There are 88 lines in each page, elegantly and minutely written, with breathings, accents, and iota subscripta, and a few illuminations. It has, apparently on good grounds, been assigned to the tenth century. Codex 118 of the Bodleian Library seems to be a copy from it. —Tregelles, ut sup., p. 308 sq.; Scrivener, p. 142.

Basilian Manuscript (Codex Basilianus), an uncial copy of the whole Apocalypse (of which it is usually designated as B), found among ancient manuscripts of Basil and Gregory of Nyssa, and valuable from the scarcity of early MSS. of the Apocalypse. It derives its name from having formerly belonged to the Basilian monastery at Rome (then designated as No. 105), but it is now deposited in the Vatican Library (where it is known as 2066). It was first known from a notice and fac-simile by Blanchini (Ecclesiasticae Quadruplæ, 1743, i, 493). Wotton requested a collation of it from Cardinal Quirini, but the extracts sent came too late for publication in his N. T., and proved very loose and defective. When Tischendorf was at Rome in 1843, although forbidden to collate it anew, he was permitted to make a few extracts, and improved the text by partial emendation of the whole text with a Greek Text. He published the result in his Monumenta Sacra Inedita (1846, p. 407-432), which Tregelles, who was allowed to make a partial examination of the codex in 1845, has since somewhat corrected. Card. Mai has published it, in order to supply the text of the Apocalypse in his edition of the Cod. Vaticanus, but the work is very imperfectly done. In form this MS. is rather an octavo than a folio or quartino. The letters are of a peculiar kind, simple and unornamented, leaning a little to the right; they hold a sort of middle place between the square and the oblong character. Several of them indicate that they belong to the latest uncial fashion. The breathings and accents are by the first hand, and pretty correct. It probably belongs to the beginning of the 6th century. —Tregelles, in Horne’s
BASILICANS

BASILICA

A basilica, monks and nunns following the rule of St. Basil the Great, first published A.D. 383. The order spread with such great rapidity that it is said to have numbered at the death of the founder about 90,000 members. In the West it established convents in Spain, Italy, Germany, and Sarmatia, and the Basilian rule, up to the time of St. Benedict, was the basis of all monastic institutions. After the separation of the Greek Church from the Roman, the Basilian order remained the only one in the Greek churches of Russia (where there are about 400 monasteries of monks with about 6000 monks, and about 110 monasteries of nuns with some 3000 nuns), Austria (which in 1849 had 44 monasteries of monks with 271 members, but no nuns), and Greece, and in the Armenian Church. In Turkey, where especially the monastic establishments of Mt. Athos (q.v.) are celebrated, all the convents of the Greek Church follow the rule of St. Basil, with the exception of those on Mt. Sinai and Lebanon.

In the Roman Church, the monks of St. Basil, formerly constituting several independent communities, were placed by Pope Gregory XIII, in 1578, under an abbot-general. They were divided into the provinces of Rome, Calabria, Sicily, Spain, Germany, and Poland, and followed partly the Greek, partly the Roman rite. A congregation of Reformed Basilians (Tardosles) was established by Matteo de la Fuente in Spain in 1557, and joined by a part of the Spanish convents. In Germany and Spain they disappeared with the other convents. In Russia, large numbers of Basilians, together with the whole body of United Greeks, separated from the Roman Church in 1839. At present only a few convents of Basilians acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Pope. They are divided into four congregations: (1.) the Ruthenian, in Russia, Poland, and Hungary, with 24 houses; (2.) the Italian, the principal conven of which is that of St. Saviour at Messina, in Sicily, which still preserves the Greek rite; (3.) the French, which has its principal house at Viviens; (4.) the Mit哲学, in the United Greek Church of Asia Minor, which held, a few years ago, a general chapter under the presidency of the papal delegate in Syria. According to the historians of the order, it has produced 14 popes, numerous patriarchs, cardinals, and archbishops, 1805 bishops, and 11,805 martyrs. One house of Basilians is at Toronto, Canada. Altogether there are about fifty houses with 1000 members. See Helvot, Rec Fre de Religion, 1, 379 sq.

Basilica (from σταν básilika, one of the porches or colonnades facing the Agora at Athens), the name of an ancient secular building, afterward applied to Christian church edifices. On the overthrow of the kings at Athens, their power was divided among several archons. The remains of the old power were, however, long to be swept all away, and the charge of the Eleusinian mysteries, of the flower-feasts of Bacchus, of all legal processes concerning matters of religion, and of all capital offences, was referred to the ἀρχων Basilois (comp. with rex sacrum in the republic of Rome). This archon held his court in the έσω basilika. Basilicas for similar purposes were built in all the chief cities of Greece and her colonies, and later in Rome and the Roman colonial cities. They were built with great splendor and architectural merits as the temples themselves. Those in Italy were devoted to purposes of business (like our modern bourses or exchanges), and to general legal processes. They had a central nave, separated from two side aisles by grand colonnades. This space was devoted to business. Above the side aisles were galleries for spectators and others. At the rear end was a semi-circular space, separated from the main part by gratings when court was held. In Rome there were 29 (others say 22) of these basilicas.

When Christianity took possession of the Roman empire, these basilicas were taken as models for church edifices. The pagan temples were built for residences of the deities, not for holding large bodies of people; and also, being given to unholy purposes, could not be used or copied in Christian churches. The basilicas, on the other hand, had been polluted by no heathen rites, and corresponded with the traditional synagogue in much of their interior construction. Some of the basilicas were given to the Church, and devoted to sacred purposes; and the same plan of building was followed in new church edifices. The plan included a broad central nave with a pointed roof (instead of the arched roof of the classic Roman basilica or the open nave of the Grecian), and on each side were one or two side aisles, covered by a single roof. In the semicircular apse opposite the entrance, the seats of the judges were appropriated by the bishops. In front of this, and under the round arched tribune, was the high altar over the crypt (q.v.). Beyond this were two pulpits, one on each side of the nave, for reading the Scriptures and preaching. The pillars in the colonnades separating the aisles were joined by round arches instead of beams, as in the Roman basilicas. During the basilicas period (A.D. 800 to A.D. 700-800) no towers or spires were built. In Rome the oldest basilicas are those of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. John Lateran, St. Clement, Sta. Maria in Trastevere, and St. Lawrence. Others, as Sta. Maria Maggiore, Sta. Agnes, Sta. Croce in Jerusalem, were built after the true basilican period, as were also the present edifices of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John Lateran. St. Clement, and SS. Nereo and Achilleo, preserve most distinctly the features of the original basilica. Out of
BASILIDES

Rome, the best preserved ancient basilicas are those of St. Apollinari in Classe (near Ravenna), and of St. Apollinari in Ravenna. Basilican churches were built extensively in Asia Minor, other parts of Italy, and South Europe, and in these last two this style has ever exercised almost a controlling influence on ecclesiastical architecture. It gave also the general ground-plan and many other elements to the succeeding Romanesque, and even to the contemporary Byzantine styles. In the same general style are the churches of the St. Cathedrals of Lorraine, and of St. Jacob (Prosperit) in Berlin, both built within the last twenty years. There is no prospect, however, that the style will ever be generally adopted in the erection of modern churches. See Zestermann, De Anti- c. et Christ. Basilides, the chief of the Egyptian Gnostics in the second century. The place of his birth is unknown; but he is known as a Syrian, or others an Egyptian. According to Clemens Alex. (Strom, vii, 17) he appeared in the reign of Hadrian; Baroinus and Pearson suppose him to have begun his heresy in the latter part of the first century. The probable date of his death is A.D. 150-150. He published a book called the "Gospel," and wrote also 24 books exegetical of the Gospel, but whether it was a comment upon his own "Gospel" or upon the four evangelists is uncertain. He left a son, Isidorus, who defended his opinions. Fragments of both Basilides and Isidorus are given in Grabe, Spicil. sac., ii, p. 87, 84. (Burton, Eccles. Hist. Lect. xv; Bunse, Sammlung Lectorum, note 12.) Our knowledge of Basilides is chiefly derived from Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. i, 24), Epiphanius (Haer. xxiv), and the newly-discovered Philosophoumena (bk. vii) of Hippolytus (q. v.). Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv, 7) speaks of a refutation of Basilides by Agrippa Castor.

He taught that the supreme God, perfect in wisdom and goodness, the unbegotten and nameless Father, produced from his own substance seven sons of a most excellent nature. According to Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. i, 24), from the self-existent Father was born Nois, Intelligence; from Nous, Aion, the Word; from Logos, Stogia, Wisdom and Power; from Phronemone and Apo- logone, Wisdom and Power; from Daimonia and Sophia, Powers, Principalities, and Angels, by whom the first heaven was made; from these sprang other angels and other heavens to the number of three hundred and sixty-five each, whence are so many days in the year. These angels, which uphold the lower heaven made all things in this world, and then divided it among themselves; the chief of which is the God of the Jews, who wished to bring other nations into subtraction to His people, but was opposed. The self-existent Father, seeing their danger, sent his first-begotten Son, the Christ, for the salvation of such as believed in Him. He appeared on earth as a man, evangelized the Gentiles, wrought miracles, but He did not suffer. The man Jesus suffered, but not in any vicarious sense; the divine justice will not allow one being to suffer for another. It seems, therefore, that the modern rationalistic views as to the expiation of Christ are derived, not from the apostles, but from the Gnostics. (See Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 205.) Irenaeus charges Basilides with holding that Simon of Cyrene was compelled to bear Christ's cross, and was crucified for Him; that he was transformed into the likeness of Jesus, and Jesus took the form of Simon, and looked on, laughing at the folly and ignorance of Jews; after which He ascended into heaven. But it is not certain, or even likely, that the charge is well-founded. Basilides farther taught that men ought not to confess to him who was actually crucified, but to Jesus, who was sent to destroy the works of the makers of this world. The soul only was to be saved, not the body. The prophecies are from the makers of the world; the body was given by God to the author of creation, the people of Egypt. It is said that the following of Basilides partook of things offered to idols without scruple, and all kinds of lewdness were esteemed indifferent, and that they practiced magic and incantations.

Of the most marked features of the system of Basilides was his distribution of the local positions of the three hundred and sixty-five heavens, according to the theories of mathematicians, the prince of which is called Abraxas, a name having in it the number three hundred and sixty-five. See Abraxas.

The system has been thus briefly stated: "Basilides placed at the head of his system an incomprehensible God, whom he called non-existent (oiow), and the ineffable (aiprop), the attributes of whom he made living personified powers, unfolded from his per- fection; as the Spirit, Reason, Thought, Wisdom, and Power, so also were the executors of his wisdom. To these he added the seven planets, and the efficacy of the Deity's almighty power, namely, Holiness and Peace. The number seven was a holy number with Basilides; besides these seven powers, in accordance with the seven days of the week, he supposed seven similar beings in every stage of the spiritual world in the figure of a seven-headed seven-angled dragon. The three hundred and sixty-five such stages or regions, which were represented by the mystical number Abrax- as, the symbol of his sect. From this emanation-world sprang the divine principles of Light, Life, Soul, and God; but there was an empire of evil, which assault the divine principles, and forced a union of un- divine principles opposed to each, namely, Darkness to Light, Death to Life, Matter to Soul, Evil to Good. The Divine Principle, to obtain its original splendor, must undergo a process of purification before it can effect its reunion with its original source; hence arose a kind of metempsychosis, in which the soul passed through various human bodies, and even through animals, according to its desert, and this by way of punishment. Basilides also supposed the passage of the soul through various living creatures, in order to a gradual development of spiritual life. The Creator of the world he supposed to be an angel acting as an instrument of the divine will. The struggle between good and evil is the struggle of the soul against its capacity and the world of spirits. He sent down the highest Eon (Nous) for the fulfillment of the work of redemption, who united himself to the man Jesus at his baptism in Jordan; but the Nous did not suffer, only the man Jesus. The sect flourished for a long time, and did not become extinct till the fourth century. The newly-discovered MS. of Hippolytus (q. v.) gives quite a thorough account of the doctrines of Basilides, which is set forth by Jacob, in Basilides Philo.

BASIN

BASIN (in the old editions "baron"). The following words in the original are thus rendered in the English version of the Bible: See also 1Cor; Bowl; Dist, etc.

1. Hpogom, prop. a trough for washing, a laver (Exod. xxiv, 4); rendered "goblet" in Cant. vii, 2, where its shape is compared to the human navel;
"cup" in Isa. xxii. 24. In the New Test. (John xiii, 5), μυτρίγη, a censer (q. v.).

2. ρύπα, kephor, from the etymology, a covered dish or urn, spoken of the golden and silver vessels of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxviii, 17; Ezra i, 10; vii, 27).

3. τρύγανος, misrac, a vase from which to sprinkle any thing; usually of the sacrificial bowls (and so occasionally translated); twice of wine-goblets ("bowl," Amos vii, 13, 15). It seems to indicate a metallic vessel. The basins for the service of the tabernacle were of brass (Exod. xxvii, 8), but those of the Temple were of gold (2 Chron. iv, 8).

4. The term of the most general significatio is ποτηρία, a vessel of uncertain etymology; The sept. renders variously, spoken of the utensils for holding the blood of victims ("bason," Exod. xii, 22; Jer. ili, 19; "bowl," 2 Kgs. xii, 1 Kings v, 50); also of "basons" for domestic purposes (2 Sam. xviii, 26), and specially a drinking-cup ("bowl") (Zech. xii, 2). The Targum of Jonathan renders it by בור, an earthenware pot, but in some of the above passages it could not have been of this material.

(a) Between the various vessels bearing in the Auth. Vers. the names of basin, bowl, charger, cup, and dish, it is scarcely possible now to ascertain the precise distinction, as very few, if any, remain s known up to the present time, to exist of Jewish earthen or metal ware, and as the same words are variously rendered in different places. We can only conjecture their form and material from the analogy of ancient Egyptian or Assyrian specimens of works of the same kind, and from modern Oriental vessels for culinary or domestic purposes. Among the smaller vessels for the tabernacle or temple service, many must have been required to receive from the sacrificial victims the blood to be sprinkled for purification. Moses, on the occasion of the great ceremony of purification in the wilderness, put half of the blood in the basins, κρασέως, or bowls, and afterward sprinkled it on the people (Exod. xxiv, 6, 8; xxi, 21; Lev. i, 5; ii, 15; iii, 2, 8, 13; iv, 5, 8; viii, 23, 24; xiv, 14, 25; xv, 16, 19; Heb. ix, 19). Among the vessels cast in metal, whether gold, silver, or brass, by Hiram for Solomon, besides the laver and great sea, mention is made of basins, bowls, and cups. Of the first (κύριος, 2nd marg. bowls) he is said to have made 100 (2 Chron. iv, 8; 1 Kings vii, 46, 46; comp. Exod. xxv, 28 and 1 Chron. xxviii, 14, 15). Josephus, probably with great exaggeration, reckons of χρυσόν and σμοκόνον 20,000 in gold and 40,000 in silver, besides an equal number in each metal of κρασέως, for the offerings of flour mixed with oil (Ant. viii, 2, 7 and 8; comp. Birch, Hist. of Pottery, i, 152).—Smith, s. v.

6. The "basin" from which our Lord washed the disciples' feet, μυτρίγη, was probably deeper and larger than the hand-basin for sprinkling, λαμπρίς (Jer. li, 18), which, in the Auth. Vers. "caldrons," Vulg. lobetas, is by the Syr. rendered basina for washing the feet (John xiii, 5).

See WASHING (OF FEET AND HANDS).

Ancient Egyptian Bread-baskets of Gold.

Ancient Egyptian Grape-baskets.

3. ΤΕΣΕΝ, καιρίς, in which the first-fruits of the harvest were presented (Deut. xxvi, 2, 4). From its being coupled with the kneading-bowl (A. V. "store;") Deut. xxviii, 5, 17), we may infer that it was also used for household purposes, perhaps to bring the corn to the mill or to the oven. The equivalent term in the Sept. for this and the preceding Hebrew words is κάρπολος, which specifically means a basket that tapers downward (κύριος ἀγένας καὶ κατερωμένος), similar to the Roman corbus. This shape of basket appears to have been familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii, 401).

4. ΚΕΛΕΝ, ρύπιν, so called from its similarity to a bird-cage or trap (κάρπολος) is used in the latter sense in Ecclus. xi, 80, probably in regard to its having a lid. From the etymology, this appears to have been passed from its strict etymological meaning to any vessel applied to the purpose. In Judg. vi, 19, meat is served up in a κελεν, which could hardly have been of wicker-work. The expression "white baskets," κύριος καιρίς (Gen. xi, 16), is sometimes referred to the material of which the baskets were made (Symmachus, κελεν βατίνοι), or the white color of the peeled sticks, or lastly to their being "full of holes" (A. V. margin), i. e., pecten-work baskets. The name Sausellus (Neh. xi, 8; xii, 20) seems to indicate that the manufacture of baskets was a recognised trade among the Hebrews.

BASIRA, ISAAC, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in the island of Jersey in 1607, and educated at Cambridge. He was made prebendary of Durham 1648, archdeacon of Northumberland 1644. When the rebellion broke out he sided with the king, but was afterwards ordered to quit England, and he then traveled to the Levant, etc., to recommend the doctrine and constitution of the English Church to the Greeks. In the Morea he twice preached in Greek, at an assembly of the bishops and clergy, at the request of the metropolitan of Athens. He made acquaintance with the patriarch of Constantinople, visited Jerusalem, where he was respectfully received by the Latin and Greek clergy, and was allowed to visit the church of the Holy Sepulchre in the character of a priest. On his return he was honored with a chair of divinity in Transylvania, and on reaching England was restored to his preferments. He died in October, 1676. His principal works are 1. Lect. de Rarae Horum, or Sacrorum, arraigned and condemned by St. Paul, Rom. vii, ii (22 Oct., 1668, 8vo);—2. Diatriba de Antiqua Ecclesia Britannica Libertate;—3. The ancient Liberty of the British Church (Lond. 1661, 8vo). A memoir of Basirae, with his correspondence, by Dr. Darnell, was published in 1831 (Lond. 8vo).—London, Ecc. Dict. ii, 73. an interwoven basket, made of leaves or rushes. In Jer. v, 37, however, it is used for a bird-cage, which must have been of open work, and probably not unlike our own wicker bird-cages. The name is applied to fruit-baskets (Amos viii, 1, 2, where the Sept. gives ἄγαλμα, Symm. more correctly όγαλμα, Vulg. αὐτοκεφάλα), Egyptian examples of which are presented in figs. 2 and 4 (which contain pomegranates) of the annexed cut.

5. Δευτ., δευτ., or deday, δευτ., used like the Greek κάλαθος (so the Sept.) for carrying figs (Jer. xxvii, 1, 2), as well as on a larger scale for carrying clay to the brick-yard (Psa. lxxxi, 6; Sept. κώμος, Auth. Vers. potts.), or for holding bulky articles (2 Kings x, 7; Sept. κύροσ τον θάλασσαν) the shape of this basket and the mode of carrying it usual among the brickmakers in Egypt is delineated in Wilkinson, ii, 19, and aptly illustrates Psa. lxxxi, 6. See BRICK. In fact, very heavy burdens were thus carried in Egypt, as corn in very large baskets from the field to the threshing-floor, and from the threshing-floor to the granaries. They were carried between two men by a pole resting on the shoulders. See AGRICULTURE. In 1 Sam. ii, 14; 2 Chron. xxxv, 10; Job xli, 10, however, the same word evidently means potts for boiling, and is translated accordingly.

In most places where the word basket occurs, we are doubtless to understand one made of rushes, similar both in form and material to those used by carpenters for carrying their tools. This is still the common kind of basket throughout Western Asia; and its use in ancient Egypt is shown by an actual specimen which was found in a tomb at Thebes, and which is now in the British Museum. It was, in fact, a carpenter’s basket, and contained his tools (fig. 1 above). Some of the Egyptian baskets are worked ornamental with colors (figs. 3, 5, above; also the modern examples, figs. 2, 7, below). And besides these the monuments exhibit a large variety of hand-baskets of different shapes, and so extensively employed as to show the numerous applications of basket-work in the remote times to which these representations extend. They are mostly manufactured, the stronger and larger sorts of the fibres, and the finer of the leaves of the palm-tree, and not infrequently of rushes, but more seldom of reeds.—Kitt. s. v.; Smith, s. v.

BASLE (Basile), the capital of canton of the same name in Switzerland, with a university. In 1565 the people of Basle entered into the Swiss alliance, and, having declared themselves in favor of the Reformation, drove out John Philip, their bishop, from which time the Roman bishops of Basle made Porencrüt their residence, and the chapter was at Freiburg; in Breisgau. At present the bishops of Basle have their residence at Solfthurn. The cathedral church contains the tomb of Erasmus. The University was founded in 1459 by Pope Pius II, and has a fine library. It is the seat of an active and prosperous Protestant Missionary Society. See MISSIONS. The bishop was a prince of the German empire. See SWITZERLAND.—Landon, Hist. Dict. s. v.

BASLE, CONFESSION OF, a Calvinistic confession adopted by the Protestants of Basle in 1534. Geo- lampadius, a short time before his death, introduced a short confession of faith in a speech he delivered at the opening of the synod of Basle in Sept. 1531. This short confession became the basis of the Confession of Basle, which latter was prepared, probably by Myconius (q. v.), between 1522 and 1534. It was officially promulgated Jan. 27, 1535. In order to placate Strasbourg to refute some objections of the theologians of that place on the articles concerning the Eucharist (Letter of Myconius to Bullinger, Oct. 14th, 1534). The title of the oldest edition, probably printed in 1534, reads, Bekanntum unseres heyligen christlichen glaubens, wozu die deutsch Christen kommen (1) libertatem elationis confitentis, (2) die christliche unverderbliche (3) ewige kraft der kirchen (4) die christliche vermutung in den kirchen und (5) die christlichen seelen in den kirchen. It was published in small commentaries in Latin, which had their origin probably in the different changes the Confession underwent before its final adoption and publication. These commentaries are omitted in the editions after 1547. After the official adoption of the Confession, an order was issued to all citizens to assemble in the corporations, and to declare whether they were prepared to accept and uphold this Confession by all means in their power. Afterward it became a practice in the city to have the Confession read every year in the corporations on the Wednesday of Holy Week. Mühlhausen adopted the same Confession, from whence it also received the name of the Council of Mühlhausen (q. v.). Thus was created the first Helvetic Confession (q. v.) received, on account of its having been prepared at Basle, the name of the second Confession of Basle. It is also found in Augusti, Corpus Librorum Symbolicorum, p. 108 sqq.; Hagenbach, Krisische Gek. d. Estatehung u. d. Schick- sal Ursprungs d. helv. Kirche d. Gewissensw. Kire., p. 82 sqq.; Basle, Council of, called by Pope Martin V, and continued by Eugenius IV. It was opened on the 23d of July, 1431, by Cardinal Julian, and closed on the 16th of May, 1438, forty-five sessions in all having been held, of which the first twenty-five are acknowledged by the Gallican Church. The Ultramontanes rejected the decree of this council; was it rejected, or was it rejected by the Pope? In any case, the design of transferring the council from Basle, upon pain of being pronounced contumacious. In return, Eugene, irritated by these proceedings, issued a bull, annulling all the decrees of the council against himself. Later in autumn, the Pope, in fear of the council, supported as it was by the Emperor, was compelled to an accommodation. He chose four cardinals to preside with Julian at the council; he revoked all the bulls which he had issued for its dissolution, and published one according to the form sent him by the council (session xiv.). It was to the effect that, although he had broken up the Council of Basle lawfully assembled, nevertheless, in order to bring about peace, which had arisen, he declared the council to have been lawfully continued from its commencement, and that it would be so to the end; that he approved of all that it had offered and decided, and that he declared the bull for its dissolution which he had issued to be null and void; thus, as Bossuet observes, setting the council above himself, since, in obedience to its order, he revoked his own decree, made with all the authority of his see. In spite of this forced yielding Eugene never ceased plotting for the dissolution of the council. In subsequent sessions earnest steps were taken toward reform; the annates and taxes (the pope's chief revenue) were stopped, and the process of canonization, after elections was restricted; citations to Rome on minor grounds were forbidden, etc. These movements increased the hatred of the papal party, to which, at last, Cardinal Julian was won over. The proposed reunion of the Greek and Roman churches made it necessary to choose a proper place of conference with the Greeks. The council proposed Basle or Avignon; the papal party demanded an Italian city. The latter, in the minority, left Basle, and Eugene called an opposition council to meet at Ferrara (q. v.) in 1437. After Julian's departure the Cardinal Archbishop of Avignon was chosen. In the 21st session, Jan. 24, 1438, the council declared the Pope Eugene contumacious, suspended him from the exercise of all jurisdiction either temporal or spiritual, and pronounced all that he should do to be null and void. In the 96th session, June 25, 1439, sentence of deposition was pronounced against Eugene, making use of the strongest possible terms of condemnation, was confirmed, and annulling all the acts of the council approved of this sentence. On October 30, Amadeus (q. v.), duke of Savoy, was elected pope, and took the name of Felix V. Alphonso, king of Aragon, the Queen of Hungary, and the Dukes of Bavaria and Austria, recognized Felix, as also did the Universities of Germany, Paris, and Cracow; but France, England, and Scotland, while they acknowledged the authority of the Council of Basle, continued to recognize Eugene as the lawful pope. Pope Eugene dying four years after, Nicholas V was elected in his stead, and recognized by the whole Church, whereupon Felix V renounced the pontificate in 1449, and thus the schism ended. Bassamat (Heb. Basamat, בַּעַמָּת, fra gm.), the name of two women.
1. (Sept. Basamás.) One of the wives of Esaun (Gen. xxvi, 84; xxxvi, 3, 4, 10, 13, "Basmatam").
2. (Sept. Basamás.) A daughter of Solomon, and wife of Ahimeaas, the viceroy in Naphtali (1 Kings iv, 15). B.C. post 1014.

Basnage, the name of a French family which has produced several distinguished men. (See Haag, La France Protestantise, ii, 5-13.)

1. Benjamin, was born at Carentan in 1580, and during fifty-one years was pastor of the church which his father had held at Carentan. He attended, as provincial deputy, nearly all the synods of the Protestants, and was held during his lifetime in high esteem. He presided over the assembly held at Rochelle in 1622, which decided on resisting the king. He also signed the project of defence under the title of "Moderateur Ajoint," and went to England to solicit aid. On the termination of hostilities, Basnage returned to France, and was appointed deputy to the synod at Charenton, 1625. The zeal with which he maintained the reformed religion rendered him an object of increasing suspicion to the court. The king, by a decree, forbade him to take part in the synod of Charenton in 1631. This synod made remonstrances against this decree so forcibly that the court yielded, and Basnage was admitted to the synod, in which he exercised great influence. He was elected president of the national synod at Alençon in 1637. He died in 1652. His principal work was a treatise on the Church (De l'état viable et invincible de l'Eglise, etc., Rochelle, 1619, 8vo). He left imperfect a work against the worship of images.

2. Antoine, eldest son of Benjamin, was born in 1610. He was minister at Bayeux, and during the renewed persecutions of the Protestants he was, at the age of sixty-five, placed in the prison of Havre de Grace; but his firmness remained unshaken. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he escaped to Holland in 1655, and died in 1691 at Zutphen, in which place he had held a pastoral charge.

3. Samuel (le Flottmannville), son of Antoine, was born at Bayeux in 1638. He preached at first in his native place, but escaped with his father to Holland in 1655. He died a preacher at Zutphen in 1721. His principal work were—1. L'histoire du siège de l'eglise de France, 1660, 4 vols. (reprinted 1806); 2. Révocation du parlement des Églises Réformées, Rotterdam, 1660, 2 vols. (reprinted 1899);—De Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis exercitationibus Historico-crítica (Trajet, 1692, 1717, 4to);—Annales Politico-Ecclesiasticorum anno 1651 v usque ad annum 1716, 8 vols. (Rotterdam, 1706, 3 vols. folio). Both these works contain masterly criticisms on Baro.

4. Jacques, de Beauval, eldest son of Henri, was born at Rouen, August 8th, 1653. He was early sent to study at Saumur under Le Fèvre; thence he went to Geneva and Sedan, where his master was the celebrated Jérusalem. In 1676 he became a minister, and married in 1684 a daughter of Pierre Dumoulin. Upon the revocation of the Edict of Nantes he went to Rotterdam, and in 1691 he was appointed a minister at the Hague. Voltaire declared him fit to be minister of state for the kingdom. He died December 22d, 1728. His principal works are—1. Histoire de l'Eglise depuis l'Édification jusqu'à son établissement à Paris (Rotterdam, 1699, 2 vols. fol.);—2. Histoire des Églises Réformées (ibid. 1690, 24 vols. fol). These two works were published, together with great additions and alterations, at Rotterdam, 1721, 5 vols. 8vo; and with still greater augmentations in 1725, in 2 vols. 4to. The latter work is a reply to Bossuet's objections. See Bossuet's objections. See Bossuet's objections.

Bassus, the name of several Romans mentioned by Josephus.
1. Cæcilius, a knight, and probably austerum in B.C. 59 (Cicero, ad Att. lii, 4). He espoused Pompey's cause in the civil war, and, after the battle of Pharsa.

2. Bassus (Bassus, βάσσος), the son of Basso, the heir of Basso, and in 1690 was elected Licop, and consecrated in 1737. His episcopal duties, with those of his parish at Newburyport, were diligently discharged until he became enfeebled by disease. He died Sept. 10, 1808.—Sprague, Annals, v, 144.

Bassus (Barso), the name of several Romans mentioned by Josephus. prator in Apamea (B.C. 46), which he defended against Antistius Vetus, but was finally brought to submission by Cassius, B.C. 43.—Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

2. Lucilius, commander of the fleet of Vitellius B.C. 70, which he betrayed to Vespasian, by whom he was sent to quell some disturbances in Campania (Tac. Ann. ii. 79; ii. 100; iii. 12, 14, 96), on which he was the successor of Crescius Vitellianus in Roman legate in Judea, where he reduced the fortresses of Herodion and Machærus (Joseph. Ant. vii. 6, i. and 4).

3. See Ventidius.

Bassâ'tai (Barâzôn), one of the family-heads of the temple-servants whose "sons" are said to have returned from the exile (1 Esdr. v. 31); evidently the Bersâi (q. v.) of the genuine texts ( Ezra ii. 49; Neh. vii. 52).

Bastard (nautus, one born out of wedlock), (i) the rendering in the Author. Vers. of the Heb. נערו (numær, polluted), which occurs only in Deut. xxiii. 2 and Zech. ix. 6. But Michaelis ( Mos. Recht, ii, § 183) reads the word with a different pointing, so as to make it a compound of two words, נערו, meaning stain, defect of a stranger; implying the stain that would be cast upon the nation by granting to such a stranger the right to be a native. Some understand the word to mean the impurities of prostitutes; but they forget that prostitutes were expressively forbidden to be tolerated by the law of Moses (Lev. xix. 29; Deut. xxiii. 17). The most probable conjecture is that which applies the term to the offspring of heathen prostitutes in the neighborhood of Palestine, since no provision was made by Moses against their toleration (Potter, Archæol. i, 354), and who were a sort of priestesses to the Syrian goddess Astarte (comp. Num. xxv, 1 sqq.; Gesenius, Comment. ub. Juxta, ii, 339; Hoe., iv. 14; Kings xiv. 24; xv. 12; xxii. 47; 2 Kings xii. 7; Herodot. i, 190). That there existed such bastard offspring among the Jews is proved by the history of Jephthah (Judg. xi. 1-7), who on this account was expelled and deprived of his patrimony (Kittel). It seems (Heb. xii. 8) that natural children (νόμον) among the Jews received little attention from the father. In the former of the above passages (Deut. xxiii. 2), illegitimate offspring in the original is not distinguished from bastard offspring, i.e. χαράβας, de seculo natus, and so the Oriental interpreters, as also the rabbis); but so severe a curse could hardly with justice rest upon such, and there is no countenance for such a view in the Jewish custom of concubination. See CONCUBINE.

In the latter passage (Zech. ix. 6; Sept. Λατονόμον) it is doubtless used in the sense of forger, predicting the conquest of Ashdod by the Jews in the time of the Maccabees, or perhaps more appropriately by subsequent heathen invaders.

Bæstholm, Christan, was born at Copenhagen in 1740, and died there in 1819. He was for a time a noted preacher in Denmark, and wrote several works in a rationalistic and whimsical vein, e.g. Die Nationliche Religion (Copenhagen 1784);—Jüdische Geschichte (Copenhagen 1777-92, 6 parts).—Flod. Untersuchungen über die relig. u. philos. Meinungen d. altesten Völker (Copenhagen 1802).—Hertzog, Real-Encyclop. i, 718.

Bastiano (or Beistano) has always been of universal application as a punishment of miscreants in the East, and especially in Egypt. It appears to be designated by the Heb. phrase נערו נערו, še'bet mowar, "rod of correction" (Prov. xxii. 15). See Rop. The punishment of beating with sticks or rods, termed "scourging" (Levit. xix. 20) and "chantasing" (Deut. xxii. 18), was very common among the Jews, and is ordained in the law for a variety of offences. Thus stripe, the rod, is frequently used in the punishment of any kind (Prov. x. 18; xxvi. iii). The dignity or high standing of the person who had rendered himself liable to this punishment could not excuse him from its being inflicted. He was extended upon the ground, and blows not exceeding forty were applied upon his back in the presence of the judge (Deut. xx. 3, 5). This punishment is very frequently practised in the East at the present day, with this difference, however, that the blows were formerly inflicted on the back, but now on the soles of the feet. China has aptly been said to be governed by the stick. In Persia, also, the stick is in continual action. Men of all ranks and ages are constantly liable to be beaten, and a dispensation means a rare occurrence for the highest and most confidential persons in the state, in a moment of displeasure or caprice in their royal master, to be handed over to the beaters of carpets, who thrash them with their sticks as if they were dogs (Dict. Bibl., note on Exod. vi. 14). Among the ancient Egyptians, in military as well as civil cases, minor offences were generally punished with the stick—a mode of chastisement still greatly in vogue among the modern inhabitants of the valley of the Nile, and held in such esteem by them that, convinced of (or perhaps by) its efficacy, they relate its descent from heaven as a blessing to mankind. If an Egyptian of the present day has a government debt or tax to pay, he stoutly persists in his inability to obtain the money till he has withstood a certain number of blows, and considers himself compelled to produce it; and the ancient inhabitants, if not under the rule of their native princes, at least in the time of the Roman emperors, gloated equally in the obstinacy they evinced in defying the (as it was) comparatively slight country experience in extorting from them what they were bound to pay; whence Ammiannus Marcellinus tells us, "an Egyptian blushes if he cannot show numerous marks on his body that evince his endeavors to evade the duties." The bastinado was inflicted on both sexes, men and women, Jews and Gentiles. Men laid prostrate on the ground, and frequently held by the hands and feet while the chastisement was administered; but women, as they sat, received the stripes on their back, which was also inflicted by the hand of a man. Nor was it unusual for the superintendents to stimulate laborers to their work by the persuasive powers of the stick, whether engaged in the field or in handicraft employments; and boys were sometimes beaten without the ceremony of prostration, the hands being tied behind their back while the punishment was applied. It does not, however, appear to have been from any respect to the person that this less usual method was used, nor is it probable that the majority of the community enjoyed a peculiar privilege on these occasions, as among the modern Moslems, who, extending their respect for the Prophet to his distant descendants of the thirty-sixth and ensuing generations, scruple to administer the stick to a šerif until he has been polled and furnished with a mat to soften and protect his guilty person. Among other amusing privileges in modern Egypt is that which is granted to the grandees, or officers of high rank. Ordinary culprits are punished by the hand of persons usually employed on such occasions; but a boy, or the governor of a district, can only receive his chastisement from the hand of a pacha, and the aristocratic dasos (mace) is substituted for the vulgar stick. This is no trifling privilege: it becomes fully impressed upon the sufferer, and renders him, long after, sensible of the peculiar honor he has enjoyed; nor can any one doubt that an iron mace, in form not very unlike a chocolate-mill, is a distinguished mode of punishing men who are proud of their rank (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg., i, 210 sq. Alcoran.).

See Flagellation.

The punishment of tympanum, tympanovagis, or beating upon the tympanum, was practised by Antichrist toward the Jews (2 Mac. vi. 19, 28; comp. ver. 30. Auth. Vers. "torment"); and is referred to by Paul (Heb. xi, 35; Auth. Vers. "tormented"). The "tympanum" was a wooden frame, probably so called from resembling a drum or timbrel, on which the sufferer was fastened, and then beaten to death with sticks.

Bastoin, Guillaume-André-René, a French Romanist divine, was born at Rouen, Nov. 29, 1731. After completing his studies, he became professor of theology at Rouen, emigrated during the Revolution, and on his return became grand-vicar of Rouen. In 1812, he was made bishop of Sées, but had to give up his see on the return of the Bourbons. He died at St. Laurent, Sept. 26, 1825. Among his published works are Cours de Théologie (Paris, 1773-1784); Les Entrevues du Pape Ganganelli (1777, 12mo); Premiere journée de M. Voltaire dans le Treport Moline (1779, 12mo); L'Essai de France contre M. le Maistre (2 vols. 8vo, 1821-1824).

Bastwick, John, M.D., was born at Writtle, Essex, 1598, and studied at Cambridge. He took his degree of M.D. at Padua, and settled at Colchester, as physician, in 1624. During the rest of his life he seems to have devoted all his leisure time to theological study and controversy. His first publication was Elenchus reloq. popisriac, in qua probatur neque Apostolicon, neque Catholicum, in quo neque Romanum esse (Leiden, 1624). His next was Flagellum Pontificum et Episcoporum (Lond. 1638, and again 1641). This work greatly offended the bishops: he was fined £1000, forbidden to practice medicine, and imprisoned. In prison he wrote Apokolysica ad Praetens (1638, 8vo), and The New Lexicon, in which he sharply censured the bishops. This made matters worse, and he was condemned to a fine of £6000, to the pillory, and to lose his ears. He was kept in a prison in the Scilly Islands till 1640, when the Commonwealth Parliament released him. He afterward wrote several bitter pamphlets against Independency, such as Independency not God's Oracles (Lond. 1645); Routings of the Army of Sectaries (1646). He died about 1650 (?).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographia, i, 196; Hoefer, Biog. Générale, iv, 726; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 139.

Bat (βατ, atalēp; Sept. νεκτρίς; Syriac Vers. peacock) occurs in Lev. xi, 19; Deut. xiv, 18; Isa. ii, 20; and Baruch vi, 22. In Hebrew the word implies "flying in the dark," which, taken in connection with the sentence, "Moreover, the bat and every creeping thing that fliteth is unclean unto you; they shall not be eaten," is so clear, that there cannot be a mistake respecting the order of animals meant, though to modern zoology neither the species, the genus, nor even the family is thereby manifested: the injunction merely prohibits eating bats, and may likewise include some tribes of Insectora. At first sight, as a rule, so diminutive, lean, and repugnant to the senses must appear scarcely to have required the legislator's attention, but the fact evidently shows that there were at the time men or women who ate animals classed with bats, a practice still in vogue in the great Australasian islands, where the fragvorous Pteropii of the harpy or godlin family, by seamen denominated flying-dogs, and erroneously vampires, are caught and eaten; but where the insectivorous true bats, such as the genera common in Europe, are rejected. Some of the species of harpies are of the bulk of a rat, with from three to four feet of expanse between the tips of the wings; they have a fierce dog-like head, and are nearly all marked with a space of rusby hair from the forehead over the neck and along the back (Kitto). For a description of the various kinds of bats, see the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Chiropteræ.

In the foregoing enumeration of unclean animals, the bat is reckoned among the birds, and such appears to be the most obvious classification; but modern naturalists have shown that it has no real affinity with birds. It is now included in the class of mammiferous quadrupeds, characterized by having the tegumentary membrane extended over the bones of the extremities in such a manner as to constitute wings capable of sustaining and conveying them through the air. The name of Chiropteræ, or hand-winged, has therefore been bestowed on this order. It comprises a great number of genera, species, and varieties; they are all either purely insectivorous or insect-frugivorous, having exceedingly sharp cutting and acutely tuberculated jaw teeth, and the whole race is nocturnal. They vary in size from that of the smallest common mouse up to that of the vampire, or gigantic ternate bat, whose body is as large as that of a squirrel. The smaller species are abundantly distributed over the globe; the larger seem to be confined to warm and hot regions, where they exist in great numbers, and are very destructive to the fruits. The purely insectivorous species render great service to mankind by the destruction of vast numbers of insects, which they pursue with great eagerness in the morning and evening twilight. During the daytime they remain suspended by their hinder hooked claws in the lobes of barns, in hollow or thickly-leaved trees, etc. As winter approaches, in cold climates, they seek shelter in caverns, vaults, ruinous and deserted buildings, and similar retreats, where they cling together in large clusters, and remain in a torpid condition until the returning spring recalls them to active exertions. In the texts of Scripture, where allusion is made to caverns and dark places, true Vesperilionidae, or insect-eating bats, similar to the European, are clearly designated.

The well-known habits of the bat afford a forcible illustration of a portion of the fearful picture drawn by Isaiah (li, 20) of the day when the Lord shall arise "to shake terribly the earth." "A man shall cast his idols of silver and his idols of gold to the moles and to the bats," or, in other words, carry his idols into the dark caverns, old ruins, or desolate places, to which he himself shall flee for refuge; and so shall give them up, and relinquish them to the filthy animals that frequent such places, and have taken possession of them as their proper habitation. Bats are very common in the East (Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Isa. ii, 20). Layard (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 307) describes his visit to a cavern on the banks of the Khabour swarming with bats. "Flying toward the light," he adds, "these noblest beasts compelled us to retreat. They clung to our clothes, and our hands could scarcely prevent them settling on our faces. The rustling of their wings was like the noise of a great wind, and an abominable stench arose from the recesses of the cave." They are also found delicately upon the Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, i, 282, 284, abridg.). Several species of these animals are found in Egypt, some of which occur doubtless in Palestine. Molossus Dupetitii, Vesperillo pipistrellus var. Egyptus, V. auritus var. Egyptus, Taphozous perforatus, Nycteris Thebaica, Rhinolophus Neuctalus, and Retio, are frequently seen in the tombs and pyramids of Egypt. See Zoology.

Batchelder, George W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, June 15, 1836. He was educated at the Pennington Seminary, N. J., and afterward was engaged as classical teacher at Caseville, Pa., and New Egypt, N. J. In 1857 he entered the itinerant ministry and was appointed to Princeton, N. J. Here his preaching made an extraordinary impression, and Princeton College conferred upon him the degree of A.M. His next appointment was State Street, Trenton, and his last Bayard Street, N. Brunswick. He died of consumption at Princeton, March 30, 1865. He was a young man of rare promise, of deep piety, of fine culture, and kind of extraordinary eloquence. —Minutes of Conference, 1864, p. 20.

Batchelder, William, born at Boston, March 23, 1768, was a Baptist minister of considerable note. His parents dying when he was but 18, he began a roving life, in the course of which he had many remarkable adventures; among others was the being elected captain, captain of a ship of the line, and to the officers, before he was 16. Becoming connected with the Baptist Church, after some years spent in preaching, he was, in 1796, ordained pastor of a church at Berwick, which place he chose, it is said, "as the least attractive, where the greatest good could be done." In 1803 Mr. Batchelder removed to Haverhill, where he labored, dying April 3, 1819, which was caused by over-exertion in raising funds for Waterville College. Mr. Batchelder was a man of fine presence and of great popularity.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 319.

Bate, James, an English divine, was born 1708, educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and in 1731 became rector of Donnington. He died 1773, having published A Rational of the Literal Doctrines of Original Sin (Long. 1766, 8vo), with a number of occasional sermons. —Darling, Cyc. Bibl. i, 197.

Bate, Julius, brother of James, born about 1711, and educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. He became rector of Sutton, and died 1771. He was an intimate friend of Hutchinson, whose ethical principles he imbibed and defended. He wrote An Inquiry into the Similitudes of God in O. T. (Long. 1756, 8vo): —The Integrity of the Hebrew Text vindicated against Kemissott (Long. 1754, 8vo): —A New Translation of the Pentateuch, with Notes (Long. 1773, 4to), "so literal as to be nearly unintelligible" (Monthly Rev.); with several controversial essays against Warburton, and minor tracts. —Darling, s. v.; Allibone, s. v.

Batemann, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maryland 1775, converted in 1800, entered the itinerant ministry in the Philadelphia Conference in 1806, located in 1814, re-entered in 1817, and preached until his death in 1830. As a man he was amiable, urbane, and generous; as a Christian, gentle, candid, and full of charity; as a preacher, sound, earnest, and wise; and as a presiding elder, discreet, firm, and wise. His life was useful and loving, and his death triumphant. —Minutes of Conference, ii, 218.

Bates, Lewis, an American Methodist minister, died in Taunton, Mass., March 24, 1863, aged 85 years. He was a descendant in the seventh generation of John Rogers, the martyr. At the age of thirteen he was converted, and in 1801 he, with two others, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in Springfield, Vt., thus originating the church in that place, and on December 5, 1803, he consecrated himself to the ministry. In 1804 he was admitted on trial in the New York impaired at the period of his death. His language was always neat and fine, but unaffected. His method in all he wrote, he confided to Dr. Bates was one of the most eminent theologians of his time; his Harmony of the Divine Attributes in the Work of Man's Redemption is still deservedly popular, and, in fact, all his writings are in demand. They are collected in his Whole Works, with a Memoir, by Farmer (London 1815, 4 vols. 8vo.).—Jones, Christ. Biol. p. 30; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 141.

Bath. See Bate.

Bath (Heb. and Chald. id., יָבָט, Sept. χώρας, corolla; occurs 1 Kings vii, 26, 88; 2 Chron. ii, 10; iv, 5; Isa. v, 10; Ezek. xiv, 10, 14; Ezra vii, 22), a Hebrew word for Bosom, and hence used of the EPHAIR for things dry (Ezek. as above), each being the tenth part of a HOME (Ezek. as above). In Luke xvi, 6, the Greek form βασικός occurs, where it is rendered "measure." According to Josephus (βασικός), it contained 72 sextarii (Ant. viii, 2, 9). Its ordinary capacity appears to have been 8 galls. 5 qts. See Measures.

Bathos (Bathoniæ) and Wells (Wells, Fontoma, anciently Ted noget), a diocese of the Church of England, combining the two ancient sees of Bath and Wells, which were united in the beginning of the twelfth century. The episcopal residence and chapter are now at Wells; the chapter consists of the dean, four canons residentiary, a precentor, treasurer, three archdeacons, one sub-dean, forty-four canons non-resident, and two minor canons. The united dioceses, which contain the whole county of Somerset except Bedminster and Abbots-Leigh, contain four hundred and forty-seven benefices. The present bishop is Lord Auckland, appointed in 1854.

Batho (in Heb. בַּת, בּוּס, Gr. ἐνοικίον). The bath is in the East, on account of the hot climate and abundant dust, constantly necessary for the preservation of health, especially the prevention of cutaneous disorders; hence it was among the Hebrews one of the first purificative duties (Neh. iv, 23), and in certain cases of Levitical uncleanness it was positively prescribed by the Mosaic law (Lev. xiv. 8 sq.; xv. 3, 13, xvii. 10; xxii. 6; Num. xix. 19; Deut. xii. 11), being treated as a part of religion, as with the ancient Egyptians (Herod. ii, 52) and modern Mohammedans (Niebuhr, iv. 17; Besch. p. 39). The Jews bathed not only in streams (Lev. xv. 13; 2 Kings v. 10; on Exod. i. 5, comp. St. Irwin's Trans. p. 272 sq.), but also in the houses, the court-yard of which always contained a bath (2 Sam. xi. 2; Susan. ver. 15); and in later times, in the modern Turkish baths (Pot. Gr. Arch. iii. 654 sq.; Adam's Rom. Amiq., ii. 214 sq.; comp. Fabric. Bibl. Antiq. p. 1006), there were likewise public baths (Talmud בֶּתְאָלוּבִּי) in the cities of Judæa (Josephus, Ant. xii. 7, 5; Mishna, Nedar, v. 5; comp. Mikraoth, vi. 15; Sheviit, 8, 5; Baba Bathra, iv. 6), as at the East present universally are (see the descriptions in Martini, i. 125; Arvieux, ii. 42; Trollo, p. 672; Russell, i. 172 sq.; ...

BATH-SHEBA

D'Othson, i. 864 sq.; Lane, Mod. Egb. Chr. xvi., and palaces had bathing-rooms (Joseph, Ant. xiv, 15, 19). In places of a mixed population the Jews resorted to the heathen baths (Mishna, Aboda Sura, iii. 4; see Circumcision, and comp. Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 78). Besides water, persons (females) sometimes used broom for ceremonial cleansing (Mishna, Pesek, ii. 7). In like manner in modern Arabia, the use of water, universally perform their lustrations by rubbing themselves with _sund_ a usage that has been thought (Rosenmuller, Morgen. iii, 228 sq.) to explain Naaman the Syrian's request of some of the sacred soil of Palestine (2 Kings v, 17). — Winer, i. 130. The ceremonial law also prescribed a bath for mourning, with which it was a common affliction (e.g. Ruth iii, 8; 2 Sam. xii, 20). The high-priest at his inauguration (Lev. xii, 6) and on the day of atonement, once before each solemn act of propitiation (xxvi, 4, 24), was also to bathe. This the rabbis have multiplied into tens times on that day. Malmon (Conot. de Yavae Sancta, v, 8) gives rules for the strict privacy of the high-priest in bathing. There were bath-rooms in the later Temple over the chambers Abimele and Happarrah for the priests' use (Lightfoot, Descr. of Temp. 24). With sanitary bathing anointing was customarily joined; the climate making both these essential alike to health and pleasure, and also the use of which was popular in Persia (Susaan, 17; Jud. x, 8; Enoch, ii, 12). The "poole," such as that of Silosam and Hezekiah's (Neh. iii, 15, 16; 2 Kings xx, 20; Isa. xxi, 11; Job i, 7), often sheltered by porticoes (Job v, 2), are the first indications we have of public bathing accommodation. Ever since the time of Jason (Prideaux, ii, 165) the Greek usages of the bath probably prevailed, and an allusion in Josephus ( Λαύροις των Ἰουδαίων, War, i, 17, 7) seems to imply the use of the bath (hence, no doubt, a public one, as in Rome) by legionary soldiers. We read also of a castle luxuriously provided with a volume of water in its court, and of a Herodian palace with spacious pools adjoining, in which the guests continued swimming, etc., in very hot weather from noon till dark (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 11; xv, 3, 8). The hot baths of Tiborias (Pilny, v, 15), or more strictly of Emmaus (Euseb. Onomast. Albus, quary Albus) Bonifretius near it, and of Calirrhoe, near the mouth of the River Jaffa, were much used by (Reland, i, 46; Joseph. Ant. xviii, 2; xvi, 6, 5; War, i, 33, 5; Amm. Marcell. xiv, 8; Stanley, p. 875, 290). The parallel customs of ancient Egypt, and Rome are too well known to need special allusion. (See Smith's Dict. of Or. and Rom. Ant. s. v. Bath; Leaurée, A. Anc. Bes. Bath, 1864.)—Smith, v. See also Water.

Bath, Edward, A.M., an English divine, born in 1779, educated at Oriel College, Oxford; became vicar of Meole Brace 1804, and afterward archdeacon of Salop. Died in 1847. He published Sermon, chiefly practical (London, 3 vols. 8vo, 1840), which are praised in the British Critic (iii, 185).

Bath-Gallim (בַּת גָּלִים), "daughter of Gallim," Isa. x, 30. See Gallim.

Bath-Kol (בַּת קֹל, daughter of the voice), a rabbinic name for a supposed oracular voice, which Jewish writers regard as inferior in authority to that of the direct revelation (Vitringa, Observ. Sacrae ii, 338), although the Targum and Midrash affirm that it was the actual medium of divine communication to Abraham, Moses, David, Nebuchadnezzar, etc. (Reland, Ant. Sacra, pt. ii, ch. ix). Neither are the Jewish authorities agreed as to what the Bath-Kol itself was, many maintaining that it was merely the female part of the divine utterance (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. צו). Some scholars have incorrectly rendered the term "daughter-voice," "daughter's voice" (Horne, Introd. iv, 149; Jennings, Jewish Antiqu. bk. i, ch. vi). It has been supposed that Josephus alludes to the Bath-Kol in the announcement to Hyrannus that his son had conquered Antiochus (Ant. xii, 10, 9) and the awful warning voice in the Temple prior to its destruction (War, v, 5, 9); but there and other instances seem to fall short of the dignity required. Pridaix, however, classes them with all the heathen specimens of divination called Sortes Vigilantes (Connection, ii, 554), and Lightfoot even considers them to be either Jewish tables or devices of the devil (Hor. Hierosol. iii, 17). Yet instances of voices from heaven very analogous occur in the history of the early Christian Church, as that which was instrumental in making Alexander bishop of Jerusalem, and that which exorted Polycarp to be of good courage (Euseb. Hiat. Eccl. vi, 11; iv, 10). See Dana, De fide sibic (Jen. 1766; also Bachusen's Nov. Inst. Histor. utr. p. 351-378); Hanner, De VD. (Jen. 1673); Metzler, De fide sibic (Jen. 1675). Bath-rab'lim (Heb. Bath-rabbim, בַּת רַבִּים, daughter of many; Sept. translates literally שָׁנָר וּפּוֹלָל, the name of one of the gates of the ancient city of Heshbon, by  צָלֶל which were two "poole," to which Solomon likened the eyes of his beloved (Canx, vii, 4 [5]). The "Gate of Bath-rab'lim" at Heshbon would, according to the Oriental custom, be the gate pointing to a town of that name. The only place in this neighborhood at all resembling Bath-rab'lim in sound is Rablah (Ammomao), but the mention of which we gain in Revelation, as remaining at Heshbon is on the opposite (S) side of the town to Ammon (Porcher, Handb. p. 298).—Smith, v. s. v.

Bath-sheba (Heb. Bath-sheba, בַּת שֵׁבָה, daughter of the oath, or of seren [as years]; Sept. translates literally שַעֲרֵי פִּולָל, another form of the same name; Sept. as before; 1 Chron. iii, 5; in ch. ii, 8, this form is translated "daughter of Shua" in the English version), daughter of Eliah (2 Sam. xi, 5) or Ammiel (1 Chron. iii, 5), the granddaughter of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xxiii, 8), and wife of Uriah. She was seduced by King David during the absence of her husband, who was then engaged at the siege of Rabbah (2 Sam. xi, 4, 5; Psa. lii, 2). B.C. 1033. The child thus born in adultery became ill and died (2 Sam. xii, 15-18). After the lapse of time and of mourning, David married her, and when she was about to give birth, by the contrivance of David (xi, 15), she was legally married to the king (xi, 27), and bore him Solomon (xii, 24; 1 Kings i, 11, 12; comp. Matt. i, 6). It is probable that the connivance of Ahitophel toward David was increased, if not caused, by the dishonor brought by him upon his family in the person of Bath-sheba, the granddaughter of Ahitophel. The younger children of Bath-sheba were Shimea (or Shammual), Shobal, and Nathan, named in 2 Sam. v, 14; 1 Chron. iii, 5. When, in David's old age, Adonijah, an elder son by Haggith, attempted to set aside in his own favor the succession promised to Solomon, Bath-sheba was employed by Nathan to inform the king of the conspiracy (1 Kings i, 11, 15, 25). After the succession of Solomon, she, as queen-mother, requested permission of her son for Adonijah (q. v.) to take in marriage Abihag (q. v.), the Shunammite. B.C. 1015. This permission was refused, and became the occasion of the execution of Adonijah (1 Kings ii, 24, 25).

Bath-sheba is said by Jewish tradition to have composed and recited Proph. xxxi by way of admonition or reproof to her son Solomon on his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter (Calmet, Dict. s. v.; Corn. a Lapid. on Prov. xxxi). The rabbins describe her as a woman of vast information and a highly-cultivated mind, to whose education Solomon owed much of his wisdom and intelligence, and even a great part of the practical philosophy embodied in his Proverbs (q. v.). A place is still shown at Jerusalem, called "the Pool of Bath-sheba," as being the spot where she was seen bathing by David, but it is an insignificant pit, was very great, and on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861, he was called to serve as a pastor to the military camps. He was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of West Virginia, and to him, more largely than to any other man, is due the abolition of slavery in that region. In November, 1861, he was chosen chaplain of the 1st Va. Regiment, and continued in the service till his death of typhoid fever, Aug. 7, 1862. — Minutes of Conferences, 1868, p. 83.

Battering-ram (גֶּשֶׁם, a lamb, Ezek. iv, 2; xxii, 22; and so Josephus, θηρός, War, iii, 7, 19, where the instrument is described; but Sept. in the above passages distinctively balbōræn; Targ. and Rimach, בָּלֶבֶת בָּלֶבֶת אֶת), a military engine for forcing a breach in walls (comp. I Macc. xiii, 48), of very high antiquity, being in use by the Babylonians (Ezek. i. c.), and apparently still earlier by the Israelites in the siege of Abel-Beth-Macah (2 Sam. xx, 15); it may have been one of the "engines" of war employed by Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxvi, 10). This machine was a long beam of strong wood, usually oak. One end was made of iron, shaped like a ram's head, and when driven repeatedly and with great force against the wall of a city or fortress, either pierced it or battered it down (see Diod. Sic. xii, 26; Pliny, vii, 57, p. 416, ed. Hard.; Vitruv. x, 19 [18], 2). There were three kinds of battering-rams: (1) One that was held in suspension, like a scale-beam, by means of cables or chains in a frame of strong timber. This must have been easy to work and of great power, as a very heavy body suspended in the air requires no great strength to move it with much force. (2) In another kind of ram, the mighty instrument acted upon rollers, and its power appears to have been very great, although it must have been worked with more labor than the preceding. (3) There was another ram, which was not suspended or mounted on rollers, but borne and worked by manual strength. The machine was generally covered by a movable shed or roof, which protected the men by whom it was worked. It has been calculated, that the momentum of a battering-ram 28 inches in diameter, 180 feet long, with a head of a ton and a half, weighing 41,112 pounds, and worked by a thousand men, would only be equal to a point-blank shot from a thirty-six-pounder. The ram was used by Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem, and also by Titus, with terrible force, in the final destruction of that city (Ezek. and Josephus, ut sup.). It was a favorite method of attack by the Romans (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Aries), and no less so with the Babylonians (Layard's Nineveh, ii, 271).

Battle (properly מִלְחָמָה, milchamah, πέλαγος). Though the Hebrews in their mode of conducting warlike operations varied somewhat in the course of ages, and are elsewhere shown to have been swayed by the practice of greater and more military nations, still, from the period when the institution of royalty gave rise to an organized system, it was a maxim to spare the soldiers all unnecessary fatigue before an engagement, and to supply them liberally with food. Their arms were enjoined to be in the best order, and when drawn up for battle they formed a line of solid squares of a hundred men, each square being ten deep, and with sufficient interval between to allow of facility in movement. Moreover, the archers to pass in between, the archers may have occupied the two flanks, or formed in the rear, according to the intentions of the commander on the occasion; but the slingers were always stationed in the rear until they were ordered forward to impede a hostile approach, or to commence the engagement, somehow or other, on the enemy's side.

Meanwhile, while the trumpets waited to sound the last signal, the king, or his representative, appeared in his sacred dress (rendered in our version "the beauty of holiness"), except when he wished to remain unknown, as at Megiddo (2 Chron. xxxv, 22); and proceeded to make the final dispositions, in the middle of his chosen bravos, attended by priests, who, in their portraits, animated the ranks within hearing. It was now we may suppose, when the enemy was at hand, that the slingers would be ordered to pass between the intervals of the line of solid squares, open their order, and with shouts, let fly their stone or leaden missiles, until, by the gradual approach of the opposing fronts, they would be hemmed in, and be recalled to the rear or to cover a flank. Then would come the signal to charge, and the great shout of battle; the heavy infantry, receiving the order to attack, would, under cover of their shields and levelled spears, press direct upon the front of the enemy; the rear ranks might then, if so armed, cast their second darts, and the archers from the rear shoot high, so as to pitch the arrows over their own main line of spearmen into the dense masses beyond them. If the enemy broke through the intervals, we may imagine that a line of charioteers in reserve, breaking upon their position, might drive an charge among the disordered ranks of the foe, drive them back, and facilitate the restoration of the oppressed masses, or, wheeling round a flank, fall upon the enemy, or be encountered by a similar manoeuvre, and perhaps repulsed. The king, meanwhile, surrounded by his princes, posted close to the rear of his line of battle, and in the middle of the line of missiles, would watch the enemy and remedy every disorder.

In this position it was that several of the sovereigns of Judah were slain (2 Chron. xviii, 33, and xxv, 28), and that such an enormous waste of human life took place; for the shock of two hostile lines of masses, at least ten in depth, advancing under the confidence of breastplate and shield, when once engaged hand to hand, had difficulties of no ordinary nature to retreat; because the hindermost ranks, not feeling personally the first slaughter, would not, and the foremost could not, fall back; neither could the commanders disengage the battalion of being defeated. The fate of the day was therefore no less within the control of the chief, and nothing but obstinate valor was left to decide the victory. Hence, from the stubborn character of the Jews, battles fought among themselves were particularly sanguinary, such, for example, as that in which Jeroboam, king of Israel, was defeated by Ahijah of Judah (2 Chron. xiii, 3, 17), where, if there be no error of copyists, there was a greater slaughter than in ten such battles as that of Leipele, although on that occasion three hundred and fifty thousand combatants were engaged for three successive days, provided with all the implements of modern destruction in full activity. Under such circumstances, defeat led to irretrievable confusion; and where either party possessed superiority in cavalry and chariots of war, it would be materially increased; but where the infantry alone had principally to pursue a broken enemy, that force, laden with shields, and preserving order, could overtake very few who chose to abandon their defensive armor, unless they were hemmed in by the locality. Sometimes a part of the army was posted in ambush, but this manoeuvre was most commonly practised against the garrisons of cities (Josh. viii, 12; Judg. xx, 38). In the case of Abraham (Gen. xiv, 16), when he led a small body of his own people suddenly collected, and fell upon the guard of the captives, released them, and recovered the booty, it was a surprise, not an ambush; nor is it necessary to suppose that he fell in with the main army of the enemy. At a later period, there is no doubt that the Hebrew armies, in imitation of the Romans, formed into more than one line of masses; but there is ample evidence that they always possessed more stubborn valor than discipline.

Battle-axe (נָשַׁל, mygges), breaker in pieces; Sept. and Vulg. render as a verb, διακοπτεῖν, κολλῖν, a mallet or heavy war-club (Jer. ii, 20; comp. the cognate מְשָׁל, mephisti, "maul," Prov. xxv, 18).

The ancient Egyptian battle-axes were of two kinds, both answering to this description, being adapted to inflict a severe blow by the weight no less than to cut with the edge. Each was broad at one end, with a semi-circular blade, that of the one being usually in two segments both attached to the handle as a back, and that of the other projecting beyond the handle, with a large ball attached to give it momentum (see figs. 12 and 7 in the first series of cuts under the art. Armor, and compare Wilkinson's Anc. Eg. i, 362, 363, 467.). See Axe, Mace.

Battle-bow (נֶשָׁל, ke'shet milchamah, bow of battle) occurs in Zech. ix, 10; x, 4, for the war-bow used in fighting. See Armor.

Among the Egyptians, on collected, and fell in open field, at a signal made by sound of trumpet, the archers drawn up in line first discharged a shower of arrows on the enemy's front, and a considerable mass of chariots advanced to the charge; the heavy infantry, armed with spears or clubs, and covered with their shields, moved forward at the same time in close array, flanked by chariots and cavalry, and pressed upon the centre and wings of the enemy, the archers, followed by the hostiles with their arrows, and endeavoring to create disorder in their ranks (Wilkinson, i, 406, abridg.). See Battle.

Bauer, Georg Lorenz, a distinguished German theologian in the second half of the eighteenth century, was born Aug-14th, 1750, at Hiltholtstein, near Nürnberg; became in 1787 conrector at Nürnberg, in 1789 Professor of Eloquence, Oriental Languages, and Ethics at the University of Altdorf; and in 1803 Professor of Exegetical Theology and Oriental Literature at Heidelberg. He was also made a Church councillor by the government of Baden. He died Jan. 12th, 1806. Among his numerous writings, the following are the most important: Einleitung in die Schriften des Alten Testamentes (Nürnberg, 3d ed.
1806); Hermeneutica sacra V. T. (Leipzig, 1797); Biblische Theologie des Neuen Test. (Leipzig, 1803, 1805); Lehrbuch der Hebräischen Überhümer (2d edition, by Rosen-

In CHRIST. SCH., V. 1 (1803-94, vol. iv to viii) and Glassius's Philologia Sacra (Leipzig, 1798-97).

Baumgarten, Siegmund Jacob, an eminent German theologian, was born March 14, 1706, at Wollmirstedt. His early education was conducted by his father, James B., pastor at Wollmirstedt. He then studied at Halle, and, after filling several minor offices, was made professor of theology at Halle, 1724.
His lectures were very popular, and he secured a still wider reputation by his writings. Educated in the school of Spener and Francke, he retained the forms of orthodoxy, but imbued Wolf's philosophy, and taught in a far more scientific spirit than had characterized the previous school. He is regarded in Germany as the forerunner of rationalism, which, indeed, found its first free exponent among theologians in his disciple Semler. He died 1757. His writings, some of which are posthumous, are chiefly historical and exegetical; among these are: Unterricht v. d. Ausein. zung d. heil. Schrift (Halle, 1742, 8vo); Ausein. zung d. Briefe Pauli (Halle, 1742, 8vo); Begeisterung der Umkreisungen, ed. Semler (Halle, 1755, 69, 3 vols. 4to); Begriffs d. L. Streitig-keiten, ed. Semler (Halle, 1771, 8vo); Theol. Bedränken (Halle, 1742-50, 7 vols. 8vo); Geschichte d. Reli-ogemparteien (Halle, 1765, 3vo); Bibliothecum. istorum Christ. in unum sciol. (Halle, 1754, 8vo).
Semler wrote a short sketch of the life of Baumgarten, which contains a full list of his writings (Halle, 1758, 8vo).

Baumgarten-Crusius, Ludwig Friedrich Otto, an eminent German theologian, was born July 31, 1728, at Lippstadt. He studied at the University of Leipsic, and in 1752 became professor extraordiaries of theology at Jena, after which his rise was steady.
After a life of unwearied activity, both as lecturer and writer on various branches of theological science, he died suddenly, May 31, 1843, leaving a great reputation for talent, breadth of view, and industry. His principal works are: Einleitung in das Stud. d. Dogmatik (Leipzig, 1810, 8vo); Christliche Sittenlehre (Leipzig, 1826, 8vo); Grundzüge d. Bibl. Theologie (Jena, 1828, 8vo); Gerechtigkeit, Rationalismus, etc. (Berlin, 1830, 8vo); Lehrbuch d. christl. Dogmengeschichte (Jena, 1832, 8vo); Compendium d. Dogmengeschi-

2 vols. 8vo); also, posthumous, Exegelische Schriften

Baur, Ferdinand Christian, a German theol-gian of marked influence on the German theology of the nineteenth century, was born June 21st, 1792; became, in 1817, Professor at the Theological Seminary of Blaubeuren, and in 1826 Professor of Evangelical Theology at the University of Tübingen. He died at Tübingen, Dec. 3d, 1860. Baur is the author of numerous works on systematic and historic theology.
At first he was regarded as a follower of Neander and Schleiermacher. But he afterward embraced Hegelian-ism, developed it into Pantheism, and for many years devoted the powers of his great intellect to the subversion of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. He went, step by step, farther from the positive Christian faith into Gnostic idealism, and in a series of writings endeavored to give an entirely new form to the representation of primitive Christianity. On his death-bed, the Pantheist, who had looked upon the idea of a personal God with contempt, prayed, "Lord, grant me a peaceful end." Baur is the founder of the so-called Tübingen school of theology, which further developed his views, and gained a sad notoriety by its attacks on the authenticity of the books of the New Testament. Among his works on the New Testament, the following are the most important: Die sogenannten Pastoral Briefe des Apostels Paulus (Stutt. 1835), in which he demonstrated the authenticity of all Pauline epistles except those to the Galatians, Corinthians, and Romans; Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi (Stutt. 1845); Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanon. Exeget. (Tüb. 1847), in which, in particular, the authenticity of the Gospel of John is attacked; Das Marcus Evangelium nach dem Horten (Tüb. 1851). "In these and other works of a similar nature, Baur maintains that we must extend our notions of the time within which the canonical writings were composed to a period considerably post-apostolic, and which can only be determined approximately by a careful investigation of the motives which apparently actuated their authors." Another class of his works treat of the history of Christian doctrines and the history of the ancient church. Here belong: Das Mausschische Religions-System (Tüb. 1831; one of his best works); Apologia von Tyana und Christus (Tüb. 1832); Die christliche Gnosis die christliche Religion (Tüb. 1835); The Christian Philosophy of Religion, a work which makes the Christian Gnosis of the 2d and 3d centuries the starting-point of a long series of religio-philosophical productions traceable uninterruptedly down through Middle-age mysticism and theosophy to Schelling, Hegel, and Fechner. - Untermacherung der Epoche zu der christlichen Kirche (Tüb. 1838); Die" chr"istliche Lehre von der Verhängung (Tüb. 1839); Die" chr"istliche Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit und Menschenervoudung Gottes (Tüb. 1841-43, 3 vols.); Die Epoche der Kirchlichen Geschichtsschreibung (Tüb. 1852); Das Christentum und die" chr"istliche Kirche der drei ersten Jahrhunderte (Tüb. 1863; 2d edit. 1860); Die" chr"istliche Kirche vom Anfange bis zum Ende der sechsten Jahrhunderte (Tüb. 1859); Lehrbuch der christlichen Dogmengeschichte (Tüb. 2d ed. 1888). Against the famous Symbole of Möhler, he wrote, Der Gegensatz des Katholizismus und Protestantismus (Tüb. 2d ed. 1864), and Erweiterung gegen Möhlers unmittelbare Deutung (Tüb. 1884). On the results of the works of the Tübinger school in general, he wrote an epistle to Dr. Hase of Jena, An Dr. K. Hase (Tüb. 1855), and Die" Fool"schule (Tüb. 1859). Professor Baur left behind him several works on the church history of the Middle Ages, which have, in nearly all cases, and they have been published by his son, F. F. Baur, and Prof. E. Zeller, viz.: Die" christliche Kirche des Mittealters in den Hauptmomenien ihrer Entwicklung (ed. by F. F. Baur, Tüb. 1861); Kirchengeschichte des 18ten Jahrhunderts (ed. by E. Zeller, Tüb. 1862); Kirchengeschichte des 19ten Jahrhunderts (ed. by E. Zeller, Tüb. 1868). Together with the two volumes published by Prof. Baur himself on the history of the Christian Church, from its beginning to the end of the 6th century, these three posthumous works constitute a complete course of historical works, extending over the entire history of the Christian Church. His latest volumes of church history gave great offense by his severe criticism on the different schools of German theology since Schleiermacher. Another work left by Professor Baur and published by his son is a course of Lectures on the Theology of the New Testament (Vorlesungen über neutestamentliche Theologie, 1864), in which the author has said more than in any of his other works develops his views of the teaching of Jesus, and of the doctrinal difference which he assumes to have existed between the different apostles. The latest of these posthumous issues is Vorlesungen über die Christliche Dogmengeschichte (Tüb. 1872), in which he has tried to carry the church history of the Middle Ages, the first of which will consist of three volumes, from the first of which will consist of the doctrines of the ancient church, the second those of the Church of the Middle Ages, and the third those of the Church of modern times. Part I extends over the period from the apostolical age to the Synod of Nice. In point of extent and completeness this work of Baur will take rank among the foremost works in this department of German church history. Bauwset. Louis François de, a French cardinal, born at Pondicherry Dec. 14, 1748, died June 21, 1824. Having finished his theological studies in the seminary of Saint Sulpice, he obtained an appointment in the diocese of Strasbourg. In 1770 he was deputed to the assembly of the clergy, and in 1784 consecrated bishop of Alais. He was sent by the Estates of Languedoc to the two assemblies of notables in 1787 and 1788. In 1791 he adhered to the protest of the French bishops against the civil constitution of the French clergy. Soon after his emigration, but in 1792 he returned to Paris, where he was put in prison. Being set free on the 9th of Thermidor, he devoted himself entirely to literature. In 1806 he obtained a canonry at the chapter of St. Denys. Abbé Emery having handed over to him all the manuscripts of Fénelon, he undertook to write the history of Fénelon. This work (Histoire de Fénelon, 1808-9, 8 vols.) established the editor's literary reputation, and in 1810 procured for him the second decennial prize. Bauwset compiled on the same plan the Histoire de Bousset (Paris, 4 vols. 1806-14), which, however, did not meet with an equally favorable reception. When the Council of the University of Paris was reorganized, Bauwset was appointed a member. On the return of Louis XVIII he was appointed president of this council, but this position he lost during the "Hundred Days." After the second restoration he entered the Chamber of Peers; in 1816 he became a member of the French Academy; in 1817 he received the cardinal's hat, and was minister of state. Besides the histories of Fénelon and Bousset, Bauwset wrote biographical essays on the Cardinal of Bologne (1840); on Abbé Legris-Duval (1820); on Archbishop Taillyrand, of Paris (1821); and on the Duke of Richelieu, the latter of which was read in the Chamber of Peers by the Duke of Pastoret on June 8, 1822. Against the civil constitution of the clergy, he complied, in 1790, conjointly with Abbé Emery, a pamphlet entitled Réflexions sur la Déclaration exigit des Ministres du culte par la loi du 7 Vendémiaire en IV. In 1797, this pamphlet, with additions, was again published under the title Exposé du principe sur le Sermont du 7 Vendémiaire de la déclaration (Marseille, 1801; See Hoefer, Biographie Générale, iv, 834; M. de Villeneuve, Notice historique sur le Cardinal de Bauwset (Marseille, 1824); G., Notice sur Bauwset (Marseille, 1824, 8vo); De Quelen, Discours sur Bauwset.

Bavari (Hab. Berovog, "βαβώρι", of Persian origin; Sept. Beor), a son of Henadad, and ruler (βαβώρειον, prefect) of the half (βαβώριον, district) of Kellab, mentioned as rearing a portion of the branch wall along the eastern brow of Zion, on the return from Babylon ( Neh. iii, 14). B.C. 446.

Bavaria, a kingdom in South Germany. Its area in 1864 was 29,557 square miles, and its population 4,807,440. In consequence of the war with Prussia in 1866, Bavaria was compelled to cede to that power a district containing about 83,000 inhabitants. See GERMANY.

I. Church History.—As the Romans had numerous settlements near the Danube, Christianity was introduced into that part of the modern Bavaria earlier than into most of the other German countries. In the second century, a certain Bishop Lucius, of Rhaeti, is said to have been consecrated at Augsburg. In 304 St. A. suffered martyrdom at Augsburg, which shows the existence of a Christian congregation at that city. Under the rule of the Christian emperors Christianity soon gained the ascendency, but pagans were found as late as the second half of the fifth century. In the fifth and sixth centuries St. Severin, an itinerant bishop of the two Rhettias, is known to have preached and labored as a missionary at Passau, and to have been driven away by the pagans and Arians. About the same time St. Severin (454-487), a zealous combatant against Arianism, preached at Passau, and the pagans and pagans and people to whom he was sent, according to the testimony of his disciple and biographer Eugippius, nearly all Catholics; but the tribes of the Alemanni, Herculeans, and others, which, after the death of Attila, roamed through the Danubian countries, were either pagans or Arians. Severin established, in many of the places where he worked, as a missionary, monasteries. Another part of Bavaria, which belonged to the Roman province of Noricum, early had a centre of missionary operations in the celebrated convent of Lorch. St. Maximilian, probably an itinerant bishop, who died about 288, and St. Florian, a Roman officer, who suffered martyrdom in 304, and both of whom still lives a certain amount of information. Among the missionaries who, in the seventh and eighth centuries, labored there, were Boniface, Rupert, Emmeran, Sturm, Corbinian, and Willibald. In the eighth century, Passau, Freising, Würzburg, Regensburg, Augsburg, Eichstätt, and Nördlingen, the see of the bishops of whom, the archbishop of Salzburg. A large number of rich cloisters arose. The Reformation found early adherents. Many priests, and also the diet, declared themselves in favor of it. But after Luther had been put under the ban at the Diet of Worms in 1521, the Duke of Bavaria was foremost among the princes of Germany in opposing and persecuting it, and a number of clergymen and laymen were put to death. The dukedom remained ever after, in the councils of the German princes, the foremost champions of the Roman Church. In 1549 the Jesuits were called to Bavaria, though the number of Protestants was still so great that the diet demanded again, in 1553, "the introduction of their pure doctrine." The dukes, in order to suppress Protestantism more effectually, demanded from everyone of the state a confession of faith. In 1608 Duke Maximilian founded the "Catholic League," whose influence was so disastrous to the Protestant cause in southern Germany. A better era for Protestantism and religious liberty commenced under Maximilian Francis I, who took from the Jesuits the censorship of books, reformed the convents, and improved the educational system. At the close of the 18th century Maximilian Joseph II and his minister Montgelas introduced religious toleration and suppressed a large number of convents. At this time Bavaria received a number of possessions which, from the beginning of the Reformation, had been wholly or predominantly Protestant. Among these were the margraviates of Anspach and Baircourt, and the free cities of Nürnberg, Nördlingen, Augsburg, and other large towns. The diet of 1812 declared the Protestants equal rights with the Roman Catholics. The year before the king had concluded a concordat with the pope, by which the Roman Catholic Church was divided into 2 archbishoprics and 6 bishoprics. See Concordat. Under the reign of Louis I (1825-1849) the ultramontane party made many attempts to curtail the constitutional rights of Protestants, and were partly successful under the ministry of Abel (1837 to 1847). The Protestants complained especially of a decree by which all soldiers, without distinction of religion, were ordered to kneel before the Host. Their resistance against this decree was repeatedly supported by the members of the diet, and finally prohibited by the Upper Chamber (Reichsrath). In 1846 the controversy was ended by a compromise, a military salute of the Host being substituted for kneeling. The ultramontane party lost the favor of the king when the ministry resisted the demand for conferring the rank of nobility upon Lola Montez, and nine of the professors of Missions were dismissed from the teaching of the party (Döllinger, Philips, Hößler, Lassaulx, etc.), were removed. The successor of Louis, Maximilian II (1849-1861), never favored the schemes of the ultramontane party. In 1856 a great excitement sprang up in the Lutheran Church in consequence of several decrees of the synod concerning changes in the liturgy, mode of confession, catechism, hymn-books, etc., in which a large number of the laity feared Romanizing tendencies, and the supreme consistory had to allay the excitement by concessions and compromises. Against the German Catholic and Free congregations the government was for many years very severe. At the beginning of the movement the government instructed the police to treat it as high treason. Some rights were granted to them in 1848 and 1849, but revoked in 1851. In the Palatinate a union between the Lutheran and Reformed Church was introduced in 1818. Then Rationalism prevailed among the clergy, and subsequently we have a number of persons who gained the ascendency, and introduced orthodox books (catechism, hymn-book, etc.) instead of the former rationalistic ones. In 1860 the government removed, however, the orthodoxy heads of the Church (among who was the celebrated theologian, Dr. Ebrard), and the Palatinate Church was restored to the influence of the Liberal (Rationalistic) party. At the General Synod held in 1868 the Liberals had a five-sixths majority, and a revised Church Constitution proposed by them was adopted by all save six votes. At the annual meeting of the Liberal "Protestant Association" (Protestantischer Verein), it was reported that the association counted 18,000 members.

11. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The Roman Catholic Church has 2 archbishoprics (Munich and Bamberg) and 6 bishoprics (Passau, Augsburg, Regensburg, Würzburg, Eichstätt, and Speirs). The diocesan chapters consist of 1 provost, 3 dean, and 8 or 10 canons. The king nominates all the archbishops, bishops, and deans; the pope appoints the provosts. Convents are very numerous: there were, in 1866, 63 convents of monks with 951 members 40 convents of nuns with 882 persons. Besides 45 houses of sisters of mercy, and 63 houses of poor school-sisters. The Jesuits have not been persecuted, and the theological school was recognized by the universities of Munich and Würzburg, and every diocese has a theological seminary. Many of the state colleges are under the management of religious orders, especially of the Benedictines. There is still among the clergy a school which is strongly opposed to ultramontanism, and has friends among the Catholics for all evangelical Protestants (see SAILER), but it is decreasing in number and influence. But, though less conciliatory toward Protestants, the Roman Catholic scholars continued to be liberal for Rome. When, in 1883, Dr. Döllinger and Dr. Haneberg called a meeting of Roman Catholic scholars of Germany, their council was opposed by the Protestant clergy and such meetings should only be called by the bishops. Two other members of the same faculty, Dr. Frohschammer, a writer on philosophical subjects, and Dr. Pichler, the author of the best Roman Catholic work on the history of the Eastern Church, had their works put on the Index. Dr. Frohschammer refused to submit, and openly defied the authority of the Congregation of the Index. The two archbishops and one bishop are members of the Upper Chamber (Reichsrath), and the lower clergy elects eleven members of the Chamber of Deputies. Romanist newspapers and journals are not very numerous, yet among them is one of the most important periodicals of the Roman Catholic Church, the Historisch-Politische Blätter, founded by Görrtes and Phillips. Among the Roman Catholic theologians and scholars of Bavaria in the nineteenth century, Dollinger, Haneberg, Franz von Baxder (q.v.), and Görres (q.v.), are best known. The Roman Catholics form about two thirds of the total population, numbering about 3,300,000 souls, while the number of Protestants amounts to about 1,320,000.

The king, though a Roman Catholic, is regarded as the supreme bishop of the Protestant Church. He exercises the episcopal power through a supreme consistory at Munich, which consists of a president, four clerical and one lay council; the Subordinate to it are two Lutheran provincial consistorys, at Ansbach and Baireuth, consisting of one director, two clerical and one lay councillors, and one consistory of the United Evangelical Church at Spire. The district of the former comprises the seven provinces on the other side of the Rhine, and contains 27 deaneries and 1056 par-lakes, of which seven are Reformed. The district of the latter is the Palatinate, with fourteen dioceses.
In all the three consistorial districts the diocesan synods meet annually. The laity is represented at them, but not by deputies of their choice. The ecclesiastical boards select them from a number presented by the election of the people for each year, and a general synod meets in each of the three districts. The two Lutheran general synods of Ansbach and Baireuth were united into one in 1849 and 1858, but in 1857, the government, fearing excitement in discussion, ordered them again, contrary to the general wish of the clergy, to be separated. The Reformed faculty is connected with the University of Erlangen.

The present faculty (1860) is known for its attachment to High Lutheran principles, and publishes one of the leading theological magazines of Germany, the Zeitschreib für Protestantismus und Kirche. The Palatinate has a few old Lutheran congregations. The highest court for the adjudication of the marriage affairs of Protestants is a commission (senate) of Protestant members of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Bamberg.
The president of the supreme consistory of Munich is a member of the Upper Chamber of the Diet, and the lower clergy elect five deputies for the House of Representatives. Among the great Protestant theologians and scholars of the present century we mention Harless, Hofmann, Thomasius, Delitzsch, Schubert.

BAXTER, George Addison, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian, was born in Virginia, Jan. 22, 1772, and educated at Liberty Hall, Lexington, of which institution he became principal in 1799. Having been licensed to preach two years before, he also became pa-tor of the Presbyterian congregation at the same place, which post he filled for over thirty years. He conthined his connection with Liberty Hall, afterward Washington College, until 1826, and received the degree of D.D. in 1812. In 1832 he became Professor of Theology in the Union Theological Seminary, and there labored until his death, April 24, 1841. Dr. Baxter was the author of various sermons and essays.—Sprague, Amada, iv, 192.

BAXTER, Richard, a celebrated Nonconformist divine, born at Rowton, in Shropshire, Nov. 12th, 1615, of pious and excellent parents. His early education was obtained under indifferent masters, so that he never in after life became an accurate scholar, although his unrivaled industry and talent made him a widely-learned man. Though not a graduate of either university, he was ordained by Mornborouh, bishop of Worcester, and in 1640 became vicar of Kidderminster.
He devoted himself to his work, and his labors were eminent and extensive. Not satisfaction with the more flagrant offences of the inhabitants, he visited them at their houses, gave them religious instruction in private, and became their friend as well as their pastor. By these means he wrought a complete change in the habits of the people. His preaching was acceptable to all ranks. Wherever he went, his attendants were large and devoted; and during his feeble health, he preached three or four times a week. During the civil wars Baxter held a position by which he was connected with both the opposite parties in the state, and yet was the partisan of neither.
His attachment to monarchy was well known; but the undoubted character of some of the Puritans made him and others, who were sincerely attached to the crown, objects of jealousy and persecution. During an abduction of party excitemex Baxter spent a few days in the Parliamentary army, and was preaching within sound of the cannon of the battle at Edge Hill. Not considering it safe to return to Kidderminster, he retired to Coventry, where he lived two years, preaching regularly. After the battle of Naseby in 1645, he passed a night on a visit to some friends in Cromwell's army, a circumstance which led to the chaplaincy of Colonel Whalley's reignment being offered to him, which, after consulting his friends, he accepted. In the same year he was present at the taking of Bridgewater, the sieges of Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester, by Colonels Wha-ley and Rainsborough. He lost no opportunity of moderating the temper of the champions of the Commonwealth, and of restraining them within the bounds of restraint. His republican sentiments and his check proceeded from one who was unfriendly to the ulterior objects of the party, his interference was coolly received. After his recovery from an illness which compelled him to leave the army, we find him again at Kidderminster, exercising himself to moderate conflicting opinions. The conduct of Cromwell at this crisis exceedingly perplexed that class of men of whom Baxter might be regarded as the type. For the sake of peace they yielded to an authority which they condemned as a usurpation, but nothing could purchase their approbation of the measures by which it had been attained and was supported. In open conference Baxter did not scruple to denounce Cromwell and his adherents as guilty of treason and rebellion, though he afterward doubted if he was right in opposing him so strongly (see Baxter's Petitions Confessions, quoted in Orme). The reputation of Baxter rendered his countenance to the new order of things highly desirable, and accordingly he was spared to procure it.
The protector invited him to an interview, and entered to reconcile him to the political changes that had taken place; but the preacher was unconvinced by his arguments, and boldly told him that 'the honest people of the land took their ancient monarchy to be a blessing and not an evil.' In the disputes which prevaled about this time on the subject of episcopate one of the two parties he was to be classed. Had all impositions and restraints been removed, there is every reason to suppose that he would have ventured on a moderate episcopacy to any other form of church government; but the measures of the prelatical party were so grievous to the conscience that he had no choice between sacrificing his opinions or quitting their communion. He was, however, compelled to quit the army of the independent party. He remained, however, in Worcester. From that place he went to London to have medical advice. He was advised to visit Tunbridge Wells; and after continuing BAXTER 702 BAXTER

at that some place time, and finding his health improved, he visited London just before the deposition of Cromwell, and preached to the Parliament the day preceding its voting them Parliament or Refuging. He also preached occasionally about the city of London, having a license from Bishop Sheldon. He was one of the Tuesday lecturers at Pinners' Hall, and also had a Friday lecture at Fetter Lane. In 1662 he preached his farewell sermon at Blackfriars's, and afterward returned to Acton. In 1670 he built a meeting-house in Oxendon Street, and, when he had but once preached there, the congregation was disturbed, and Mr. Sedden, then preaching for him, was sent to the Gatehouse, instead of Baxter, where he continued three months. In 1662 Baxter was seized, by a warrant, for coming within five miles of a corporation, and his goods and books were sold as a penalty for five sermons he had preached. Owning to the bad state of his health, he was not at that time imprisoned, through the kindness of Mr. Thomas Cox, who went to five justices of the peace and made oath that Baxter was in a bad state of health, and that such imprisonment would make his health worse. In 1664 he was sent to the King's Bench by a warrant from the Lord Chief Justice Jeffries for some passages in his Paraphrase on the New Testament; but, having obtained from King James, through the good offices of Lord Powis, a pardon, he retired to Charterhouse Yard, occasionally preached to ladies and devoted congregations, and at length died, December 8th, 1691, and was interred in Christ Church.

Baxter's intellect was rather acute than profound. He was one of the most successful preachers and pastors the Christian Church has seen. His mind was rich, discursive, and imaginative; qualities which fitted him admirably, in conjunction with his deep and ardent piety, to write books of devotional and practical religion. His Stain's Rest abounds in eloquent and powerful writing; perhaps no book except Kemps and Pilgrim's Progress has been more widely read or more generally useful.

Baxter's theology was of no school, but, on the whole, eclectic and undecided. In his Methodus Theologica and Universale Redemption he sets forth a modified scheme of the Calvinistic doctrine of election. But the real author of the scheme, at least in a systematized form, was Camero, who taught divinity at Saumur, and was unfolded and defended by his disciple, Elwell, whom Baxter, with Byngham, Settle, and others, devoted to its development. Baxter, and his preface to his Stain's Rest, The middle way which Camero, Crocius, Martinus, Amyraldus, Davenant, with all the divines of Britain and Bremen in the Synod of Dort, go, I think is nearest the truth of any that I know who have written on these points."

(1.) Baxter first differs from the majority of Calvinists, though not from all, in his statement of the doctrine of satisfaction: "Christ's sufferings were not a fulfilling of the law's threatening (though he bore its curse material), but a satisfaction for our not fulfilling the law's covenant, to prevent God's fulfilling the threatening on us. Christ paid not, therefore, what was due to God, but our sins, in our stead, and paid not the debt of the law, but the debt of our sin; and that题主, as well as a satisfaction, is regarded as a satisfaction (the rendering of an equivalent): and (it being improper to call the paying of a debt, but properly a suffering for the guilt of it), and it is said in the same sense of the law's delinquents [the punishment of the guilty individual]. In criminalis, dum eius solvit simul aliqui servos [when another suffers, it is another thing also that is suffered]. The law knoweth no vicarious persons [substitute in punishment]; though the law itself knoweth that there were no place for pardons, if the proper debt be paid and the law not relaxed, but fulfilled. Christ did neither obey nor suffer in any man's stead, by a strict, proper representation of his person in point of law, so as that the law should take it as done or suffered by the party himself; but only as a third person, as a mediator, to secure the restoration of his (not his own) debt, and also of man's, and then to bring in the result, not according to the law, but according to the will of God. To assert the contrary (especially as to particular persons considered in actual sin) is to overthrow all Scripture theology, and to introduce all Antinomianism; to overthrow all possibility of pardon, and assert justification before we sinned or were born, to make our righteousness perfect, but not (as a faith) be content that only a forgiveness of sins should have borne. So as to pervert us, or represent our persons in law sense, but only to bear what else we must have borne." (2.) This system explicitly asserts that Christ made a satisfaction by his death equally for the sins of every man; and thus Baxter essentially differs both from the higher Calvinists, and also from the Sublunarians, who, though they may allow that the reprobate derive some benefits from Christ's death, so that there is a vague sense in which he may be said to have died for all men, yet, they, of course, deny to such the benefits of Christ's satisfaction or atonement which Baxter gives to the reprobate. Baxter contends that Christ bore, nor God, as the legislator to be satisfied, did distinguish between men as elect and reprobate, or as believers and unbelievers, de presenti vel de futuro [with regard to the present or the future]; and to impose upon Christ, or require from him satisfaction for the sins of one more than another, but for mankind in general. God the Father, and Christ the Mediator, now dealeth with no man upon the more rigorous terms of the first law (obey perfectly and live, else thou shalt die), but giveth to all mankind, which, according to the tenor of that violated law, they could not receive, and calleth them to repentance in order to their receiving further mercy offered them. And accordingly he will not judge any at last according to the mere law of works, but as they have obeyed or not obeyed his conditions or terms of grace. It was not the sias of the elect only, but of all mankind fallin, which lay upon Christ satisfying; and to assert the contrary injuriously disemphatheth the honor of his sufferings, and hath other desperate ill consequences."

(3.) The benefits derived to all men equally, from the satisfaction of Christ, he thus states: "All mankind, iamedi tely upon Christ's satisfaction, are redeemed and delivered from that legal necessity of perishing which they were under (not by remitting sin or of sin, but by bearing the punishment of sin) but were not hindered from sinning; for it is unjust, and it is unjust. But it is, in justice punisment [right of punishing] into the hands of the Redeemer; nor by giving any right directly to them, but per rem ammum con lonicum [by mere consequence] this happy change is made for them in their relation, upon the said remitting of God's right and advantage of justice against them), and they are given up to the Redeemer as their owner and ruler, to be dealt with upon terms of mercy which have a tendency to their recovery. God the Father and Christ the Mediator hath freely, without any prerequisite condition on man's part, enacted a law of grace of universal extent in regard of its tenor, by which he giveth, as a dead or given to death, to them (for the purpose of both things) which he becometh (as benefactor and legislator); and this to all alike, without excluding any, upon condition they believe and accept the offer. By this law, testament, or covenant, all men are conditionally pardoned, justified, and reconciled to God already, and if no man ascribes the work of grace to himself, nor does any person take notice of any, till men's performance or non-performance of the condition makes a difference. In the new law Christ hath truly given himself with a conditional pardon, justification, and conditional right to salvation, to all men in the world, without exception."

ing himself to all alike in the conditional covenant, yet he never properly intended or purposed the actual justifying and saving of all, nor of any but those that come to be justified and saved; he did not, therefore, die for all, nor for any that perish, with a degree of resolution to save him; nor did he actually die for him, nor give himself up to the Father, nor give himself to the world and worldlings:—6 to this intent. Christ hath given faith to none by his law or testament, though he had revealed that to some he will, as benefactor and Dominus Absolutor [absolute Lord], give that grace which shall inalienably produce it; and God hath given some to Christ that he might prevail with them accordingly; yet he never did give it to the world nor the worldlings; for he was in himself ever the more to it, nor can any lay claim to it as their due. It belongeth not to Christ as satisfactor, nor yet as legislator, to make wicked refusers to become willing, and receive him and the benefits which he offers; therefore he may do all for them that is fore-expressed, though he cure not their unbelief. Faith is a fruit of the death of Christ (and so is all the good which we do enjoy), but not directly, as it is satisfaction to justice; but only remotely, as it proceedeth from that jus dominii [right of dominion] which Christ has received to send the Spirit in what measure and to whom he will, and to succeed to that sovereignty; and as it is necessary to the attaining of the farther ends of his death in the certain gathering and saving of the elect."

(5.) Thus the whole theory amounts to this, that although a conditional salvation has been purchased by Christ for all men, and is offered to them, and all legal difficulties are removed out of the way of their pardon as sinners by the atonement, yet Christ hath not purchased for any man the gift of faith, or the power of performing the condition of salvation required; but gives this to some, and does not give it to others, by virtue of that absolute dominion over men which he has purchased for himself, so that, as the Calvinists refer the decree of sovereignty to the Son of God, the Father, Baxter refers it to the sovereignty of the S.o; one makes the decree of reprobation to issue from the Creator and Judge, the other from the Redeemer himself. The Baxterian theory, with modifications, is adopted by many of the English and American Congregationalists, New School Presbyterians, and United Presbyterians of Scotland.

Baxter's chief English works are, 1. A Narration of his own Life and Times. 2. The Sermon Preaching. 3. A Paraphrase on the New Testament. 4. A Call to the Unconverted (of which twenty thousand copies were sold in one year, and which has been translated into most European tongues. 5. Lyrical Thoughts. 6. The Poor Man's Family Book. 7. The Reformed Pastor. He also wrote several books in Latin—among them—1. Epistola de generali omnium Protetendarum unione adversee Populorum. 2. Discorssio de baptismo infantum & scripturis demonstrata. 3. Catechismus Quakerorum. 4. De Regimine Ecclesiae. 5. De Republia Sacra (against the Occa of Harrington.) 6. De Universali Redempt, contra Calvinum et Bezamin. 7. Historia Conciliarii, etc. In all, he is said to have composed one hundred and forty-five works in folio, and sixty-three in 4to, besides a multitude of more trifling writings. The list prefixed to Oratio pro Rege (Baxter's last volume) includes three hundred. In his Practical Works were reprinted in 1890 (London, 23 vols. 8vo); his controversial writings have never been fully collected, and many of them are very scarce. His fame chiefly rests on his popular works, and on his Methodus Theologiae and Catholica Theologia, in which his opinions are embodied. He left behind him a Narrative of the Most Memorable Passages of his Life and Times, which was published in a folio volume after his death (1696) by Sylvester, under the title Reliquiae Baxterianae. It is here that we find that review of his religious opinions written in the latter part of his life, which Coleridge speaks of as one of the most remarkable pieces of writing that have come down to us. Bay (βαί, laskon, tonga; Sept. λασίον) is spoken of the cove or estuary of the Dead Sea, at the mouth of the Jordan River, in xv, 19, 20, xvii, 19, 20. It is in southern extremity of the same sea (xv, 2), forming the boundary points of the trite of Judah. De Sauley, however, contends (Narration, i, 250) that by this term are represented, respectively, the two extreme points of the peninsula jutting into the lake on the opposite shore, which he states still bears the corresponding Arabic name Lasis. But this would confine the territory of Judah to very narrow limits on the east, and the points in question are expressly stated to be portions of the sea (and not of the land, as the analogy of our phrases tongue of land, etc., would lead us to suppose), one of them being in fact located at the very entrance to the sea. Moreover, the word Lasis (in the original) is used with reference to the forked mouths of the Nile (the tongue of the Egyptian Sea). Isa. xi, 15 as affording an impediment to travellers from the East. See DEAD SEA.

Bay is the color assigned in the English version to one of the span of horses in the vision of Zechariah (vi, 3, 7). The original has בִּנְיָם (binyamin), strong (Sept. בִּנְיָהוּ), and evidently means feet or spirited. In ver. 7 it appears to be a corruption for בִּנְיָם, adummin, red, as in ver. 2.

Bay-tree (πυρωσίς, cerasch, native; Sept. αἰ cίδωρο ἄκυσον, apparently by mistake for πυρωσίς) occurs only once in Scripture as the name of a tree, namely, in Ps. xxxvii, 25: "I have seen the wicked in great power, spreading himself like a green bay-tree"; where some suppose it to indicate a specific tree, as the laurel; and others, supported by the Sept. and Vulg., the cedar of Lebanon. It is by some considered to mean an evergreen tree, and by others a green tree that grows in its native soil; but it has not such a characteristic, as the tree spreads itself luxuriantly (so Gesenius, Thea. Heb. s. v. in accordance with the etymology). Others, again, as the unknown author of the sixth Greek edition, who is quoted by Celsus (i, 184), consider the word as referring to the "indigenous man," in the sense of self-sufficiency; and this opinion is adopted by Celsus himself, who states that recent interpreters have adopted the laurel or bay-tree for no other reason than because it is an evergreen. Sir Thomas Browne, indeed, says, "As the sense of the text is sufficiently answered by this, we are unwilling to exclude that noble plant from the honor of having been mentioned in Scripture." Isaac Barrow, on the contrary, concludes that the laurel is not mentioned in Scripture because it has been profaned by Gentile fables. But the abuse of a thing should not prevent its proper use; and if such a principle had been acted on, we should not have found in Scripture mention of any trees or plants employed by the Gentiles in their religious ceremonies as the vine, the olive, and the cedar.—Kitto. Bayer, Gottlieb Siegfried, was born in 1694 at Königsehren, where he acquired his first knowledge of the Oriental languages under Altraham Wolf. In 1726 he was called to St. Petersburg to fill the chair of Greek and Roman antiquities. He died Feb. 21, 1728. Among his numerous works are the following:

Subsequently, he was an itinerant preacher, and, at the organization of the Conference in 1834, was returned supernumerary. He died at Monrovia in great peace in Oct., 1839. "Father Bayley was a good preacher. His language was good, his doctrine sound, and his manner forcible; his conversation was a blessing, and his reward is on high." — Metc. Sketches of Persons of Color; Minutes of Conferences, iii, 62.

Bazaar, an Oriental "market-place." In the earlier times of the Jewish history it appears that the markets were near the gates of the city, within, sometimes without, where the different kinds of goods were exposed for sale, either in the open air or in tents. See Market. But we learn from Josephus that in the time of our Saviour the markets, at least in cities, had become such as they now are in the East. These establishments are usually situated in the centre of the towns, and do not by any means answer to our notion of a "market"—which is usually appropriated to the sale of articles of food—for in these bazaars all the shops and warehouses of the town are collected, and all the trade of the city carried on, of whatever description it may be. In these also are the workshops of those who expose for sale the products of their skill or labor, such as shoemakers, cap-makers, basket-makers, smiths, etc.; but every trade has its distinct place to which it is generally confined. Hence one passes along between rows of shops exhibiting the same kinds of commodities, and sometimes extending to the length of a moderate street, such rows make up the "markets" of other sorts. The bazaar itself consists of a series of avenues or streets, with an arched or some other roof, to afford protection from the sun and rain. These avenues are lined by the shops, which are generally raised two or three feet above the ground upon a platform of masonry, which also usually forms a bench in front of the whole line. The shops are in general very small, and entirely open in front, where the dealer sits with great quietness and patience till a customer is attracted by the display of his wares. No one lives in the bazaar: the shops are closed toward evening with shutters, and the bazaar itself is closed by long gates, after which the inhabitants have descended to their original homes in the town. It sometimes happens that a part of the bazaar consists of an open place or square, around which are shops under an arcade. When this occurs the shops are generally those of fruit vendors, green-grocers, and other dealers in vegetable produce, the frequent renewals of which seem to have been so accosted that their shops should be placed in the thronged and narrow avenues. In these bazaars business begins very early in the morning—as soon as it is light. During the day it seems to be the place in which all the activities of the town are concentrated, and presents a scene remarkable in contrast with the characteristics of solitude and quietness of the streets, which seem exhausted of their population to supply the teeming con-

the Scriptures, and that they are both mentioned as belonging to the productions of the land Havilah. But if this meaning were intended, the reading ought to be, "there is the stone of the onyx, and of the bdellium," and not "there is the bdellium and the stone of the onyx," expressly excluding bedolah from the mineral kingdom. Those who translate bedolah by "pearl" refer to the later Jewish and Arabian exponents of the Bible, whose authority, if not strengthened by valid arguments, is but of little weight. It is, moreover, more than probable that the pearl was as yet unknown in the time of Moses, or he would certainly not have excluded it from the costly contributions to the tabernacle, the priestly dresses, or even the Urim and Thummim, while its fellow shoham, though of less value, was variously used among the sacred ornaments (Exod. xxxv, 7; xxxv, 9, 27; xxxviii, 20; xxxix, 13). Nor do we find any mention of pearl in the times of David and Solomon. It is true that Luther translates בֵּיתָל, penemim (Prov. iii, 15; viii, 11; x, 25; xxxi, 10), by pearls, but this is not borne out by Lament. iv, 7, where it is indicated as having a red color. The only passage in the Old Test. where the pearl really occurs under its true Arabic name is in Esth. i, 6 (בֶּיתל, dar); and in the N. T. it is very frequently mentioned under the Greek name μορφός. See Pearl. It is therefore most probable that the Hebrew bedolah is the aromatic gum bdellium, which issues from a tree growing in Arabia, Media, and the Indies. Dioscorides (i, 80) informs us that it was called μῦκλαν or баслітъ, and Pliny (xxi, 77), not it bore the names of brochos, matalchum, or baldaxion. The frequent interchange of letters brings the form very near to that of the Hebrew word; nor is the similarity of name in the Hebrew and Greek, in the case of natural productions, less conclusive of the nature of the article, since the Greeks probably retained the ancient Oriental names of productions that had never been known in the East. Pliny's description of the tree from which the bdellium is taken makes Kempfer's assertion (Amoen. Exot. p. 668) highly probable, that it is the sort of palm-tree (Borassus flabelliformis, Linn. cl. 6, 3, Trigynia) so frequently met with on the Persian coast and in Arabia Felix.

The term bdellium, however, is applied to two gummy-resinous substances. One of them is the Indian bdellium, or false myrrh (perhaps the bdellium of the Scriptures), which is obtained from Amyris (balsamodendron?) Commiphora. Dr. Roxburgh (Flor. Ind. i. 210) says that the trunk of the tree is covered with a light-colored pole, as in the common birch, which peels off from time to time, exposing to view a smooth green coat, which, in succession, supplies other similar exfoliations. This tree diffuses a grateful fragrance, like that of the finest myrrh, to a considerable distance around. Dr. Royle (Illustr. p. 176) was informed that this species yields bdellium; and, in confirmation of this statement, we may add that many of the specimens of this bdellium in the British Museum have a yellow pellicle adhering to them, precisely like that of the common birch, and that some of the pieces are perforated by spiny branches, another character serving to recognise the origin of the bdellium. Indian bdellium has considerable resemblance to myrrh. Many of the pieces have hairs adhering to them. The other kind of bdellium is called African bdellium, and Be'aloth (Heb. Be'aloth), be'aloth, the plur. fem. of Baal, signifying prob. citiea; Sept. Baalokia v. r. Baaloks and Baalmaon), the name of two places.

1. A town in the southern part of Judah (Isa. xix. in Simon), mentioned in connection with Temel and Hazor (Jer. xv. 24); evidently different from either of the two places called Baalath (ver. 2, 9), but probably the same as the Baalath-beer (q. v.) of chap. xii, 8. Schwartz (Palest. p. 100) thinks it is an "Kulat el-Baale travelled 74 English miles S.E. of Temel and N.W. of Zapha," but no such names appear on any modern map, and the location indicated is entirely outside the bounds of Palestine.

2. A district of Asher, of which Baashan ben-Hushai was Solomon's commissariat (1 Kings iv. 16, where the Auth. Vera. renders incorrectly "in Alloth," Sept. iv Baalass, Vulg. in Baaloth); apparently it is "adjacent cities," i.e., the sea-coast, where the river Beleen (Ble- lapse, Joseph. War, ii, x) may be a trace of the name. See BELEUS. Schwarz (Palest. p. 237) unnecessarily identifies it with Baal-gad or Laish.

Beam, the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following words: *nêm, e reg' a web, Judg. xvi, 14; "shut- tile," Job ii, 6; *te'el, tana', a pole, hence a weaver's frame, or its principal beam, 1 Sam. xvii, 2; 2 Sam. xxvii, 16; 1 Chron. xii, 22; xx, 5, 5; 29, to, a board, 1 Kings vi, 9; *kuf'âs, kapâs; a cross-beam or girder (Sept. kavâwh, Habad. ii, 11; *tâ, teelâ, a rib, hence a joint, 1 Kings vii, 3; "board," vi, 15, 16; "plank," vii, 15; *kuf'âs, karkâ; a cross-piece or rafter, 2 Kings vi, 2; 5; 2 Chron. iii, 7; Cant. i, 17, 23, ab, a projecting step, or architectural ornament like a moulding, answering for a threshold, 1 Kings vii, 6, 2; "thick plank," Ezek. xxii, 25; *kurfâth, hewed sticks of timber, 1 Kin, vi, 26, 37, vii, 12; 12, 7; 13 (in Piel), to fix beams, hence to frame, Neb. ii, 3, 6; Ps. civ, 3; of no Hebr. word (being supplied in italics) in 1 Kings vi, 6; *ôeq, a stick of wood for building purposes, Matt. vii, 3, 4, 5, John vii, 41, 42. In the latter instance, Lightfoot shows that the expressions of our Lord were a common proverb among the Jews, having reference to the greater sins of one prone to censure the small faults of another. The "mote," *ôeq, may be understood as any very small dry particle, which, by lodging in the eye, causes distress. It is here given as an illustration of lesser faults in opposition to a beam for the greater, as also in the parallel proverb, "Strain [out] a gnat and swallow a camel" (Matt. xxiii, 24).

Bēn (bēn, pol; Sept. êmâs) occurs first in 2 Sam. xxvii, 28, where beans are described as being brought to David, as well as wheat, barley, lentils, etc., as is the custom at the present day in many parts of the East when a traveller arrives at a village. So in Ezek. iii, 5, the prophet is directed to take wheat, barley, beans, lentils, etc. and make bread thereof. This meaning of the Heb. word is confirmed by the Arabic fid, which is applied to the beans in modern times, as ascertained by Forskal in Egypt, and as we find in old Arabic works. The common bean, or at least one of its varieties, we find noticed by Hippocrates and Pliny, bearing the appropriate names of émâs dâlam, or "Greek bean," to distinguish it from émâs aiyâmân, the "Egyptian bean," or bean of Pythagoras, which was no doubt the large farinaceous seed of Nelumbium speciosum (Theophr. Plant. iv, 9; Athen. iii, 73; comp. Link, Urons. i, 224; Billerbeck, För. Ganz. iii. 157), where it is employed as a staple article of diet by the ancients, as they are by the moderns, and are considered to give rise to flatulence, but otherwise to be Beach, Abraham, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Cheshire, Conn., 1740, graduated at Yale College 1757, passed from the Congregational to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was ordained by the Bishop of London 1767. His first service was as missionary at Piscataqua, N. J., where he served up to the Revolution, when his church was shut up on account of the troubles of the time. In 1784 he was appointed assistant minister at Trinity Church, N.Y. In 1789 he was made D.D. by Columbia College. In 1813 he resigned his charge and retired to his farm on the Raritan, where he died, Sept. 14, 1815. In 1790 he published a strict Episcopal and in 1783 opposed Dr. (afterward Bishop) White's proposal to organize the Church and ordain ministers without a consecrated bishop.—Sprague, Amnels, v, 265.

Beach, John, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in 1700, and graduated at Yale College in 1721. For several years he served in the Congregational Church at Newtown, Conn., but in 1725 he first occurred at_SPECIAL. The Church of England, and was ordained by the Bishop of London in that year. He served as missionary at Newton and Reading for 50 years, and died March 8, 1782. He published several tracts in favor of the Church of England, and a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Amnels, v, 84.

Beacon (mâbâ'ah, to ron), Isa. xxx, 17, in the margin in that, and in the text in chap. xxi, 26, and Ezek. xxvii, 5, rendered "mast." It probably signifies a pole used as a standard or "ensign" (D3, nec), which was set up on the tops of mountains as a signal for the assembling of the people, occasioned by the invasion of an enemy, and sometimes after a defeat (Isa. v, 26; xi, 12; xviii, 3; lix, 10). See BANNER.

Beans. Strings of beans are used in the Roman Church on which to count the number of paters or oases recited. They are generally supposed to have been introduced by Peter the Hermit. The Saxon word bede means a prayer; it is the past participle of bidan, to bid. Head-roll was a list of those to be prayed for in the Church, and a bedelman one who prayed for another. From this use beans obtained their name.

Bealer, Oliver, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Bridgewater, Mass., Oct. 13, 1777, converted 1800, and entered the itinerant ministry at Lynn, Mass., 1801. After filling several of the most important stations, he was presiding elder from 1806 to 1818; and during the next ten years very effective, he was missionary at Piscataqua, and also presiding elder. He was made "superannuate" in 1838, and died at Baltimore Dec. 30, 1836. He was a devoted and successful minister, "and did more to plant Methodist in Maine than any other man" (Rev. T. Merriam). And, during his long and faithful service, became well known to the Church as a wise man and discreet counsellor. He was five times a delegate to the General Conference.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 495.

wholesome and nutritious (comp. Pliny, xviii, 30). Beans are cultivated over a great part of the Old World, from the north of Europe to the south of India; in the latter, however, forming the cold-weather cultivation, with wheat, peas, etc. They are extensively cultivated in Egypt and Arabia. In Egypt they are sown in November, and reaped in the middle of February (three and a half months in the ground); but in Syria they may be had throughout the spring. The stalks are cut down with the scythe, and these are afterward cut and crossed to fit them for the food of camels, oxen, and goats. The beans themselves, when sent to market, are often deprived of their skins. Basmage reports it as the sentiment of some of the rabbins that beans were not lawful to the priests, on account of their being considered the appropriate food of mourning and affliction; but he does not refer to the authority; and neither in the sacred books nor in the Mishna (see Sheb. ii, 9) can be found any traces of the notion to which he alludes (see Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 225). So far from attaching any sort of impurity to this legume, it is described as among the first-fruit offerings; and several other articles in the latter collection prove that the Hebrews had beans largely in use after they had passed them through the mill (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palestine, p. ccxxiv). The paintings on the monuments of Egypt show that the bean was cultivated in that country in very early times (comp. Strabo, xv, 222), although Herodotus states (ii, 37) comp. Diog. Laert. vili, 54) that beans were held in abhorrence by the Egyptian priesthood, and that they were never eaten by the people (but see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i, 323 abridg.). But as they were cultivated, it is probable that they formed an article of diet with the poorer classes (comp. Horace, Sat. ii, 4, 127; ii, 6, 65); and beans with rice, and dhal or bread, are the chief articles of food at this day among the Fellah population. They are usually eaten steeped in oil. Those now cultivated in Syria and Palestine are the white horse-bean and the kidney-bean, called by the natives masah.—Kitto, s. v. PoL

Bo'ean, Children of (vai lo Baud; Josephus, vó roí Baiscov, Ant. xii, 8, 1), a tribe apparently of predatory Bedouin habit, retreating into "towers" (xiphoi) when not plundering, and who were destroyed by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac. v, 4). The name has been supposed to be identical with Beoa (Num. xxiii, 2); but this is a mere conjecture, as it is very difficult to tell from the context whether the residence of this people was on the east or west of Jordan.

Bear (πηρ or που, δου, in Arabic daw, in Persic död, and död; Greek ἄροι) is noticed in 1 Sam. xvii, 84, 86, 87; 2 Sam. xvii, 8; 2 Kings ii, 24; Prov. xvii, 12; xxvii, 15; Isa. xi, 7; lxx, 11; Lam. iii, 10; Hos. xii, 8; Amos v, 19; Dan. vii, 5; Wisd. xi, 17; Ecclus. xlvi, 2; Rev. xiii, 2. Although some moderns have denied the existence of bears in Syria and Africa, there cannot be a doubt of the fact, and of a species of the genus Ursus being meant in the Hebrew texts above noted (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 373). David defended his flock from the attacks of a bear (1 Sam. xvii, 84, 85, 36), and bears destroyed the youths who mocked the prophet (2 Kings ii, 24). Its hostility to cattle is implied in Gen. xi, 7—its behavior in Gen. xlix, 11—its habit of ranging far and wide for food in Prov. xxvii, 15—its lying in wait for its prey in Lam. iii, 10; and from 2 Kings ii, 24, we may infer that it would attack men. See Elisha.

The genus Ursus is the largest of all the plantigrade carnivores, and with the faculty of subsisting on fruit or honey implies a higher order of existence for or less power of the species to slaughter and animal food. To a sudden and ferocious disposition it joins immense strength, little vulnerability, considerable sagacity, and the power of climbing trees. The brown bear, Ursus arctos, is the most sanguinary of the species of the Old Continent, and Ursus Tygrinus, or the bear of Palestine, is one very nearly allied to it, differing only in its stature being proportionally lower and longer, the head and tail more prolonged, and the color a dull buff or light gray, often clouded, like the Pyrenean variety, with darker brown (Forskal, Descr. Anim. iv, 5, No. 21). On the back there is a ridge of long semicircular erect hair, to which the neck is parallel. It is yet found in the elevated woody parts of Lebanon (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palestine, p. ccxvii). In the time of the first Crusades these beasts were still numerous and of considerable ferocity; for during the siege of Antioch, Godfrey of Bouillon, according to Math. Paris, shot a female with the defense of a poor woodcutter, and was himself dangerously wounded in the encounter. See Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.

The sacred writers frequently associate this formidable animal with the king of the forest, as being equally dangerous and destructive; and it is thus that the prophet Amos sets before his countrymen the succession of calamities which, under the just judgment of God, was to befall them, declaring that the removal of one would but leave another equally grievous (v. 18, 19). Solomon, who had closely studied the character of the several individuals of the animal kingdom, compares an unprincipled and wicked ruler to these creatures (Prov. xxvii, 15). To the fury of the female bear when robbed of her young there are several striking allusions in Scripture (2 Sam. xvii, 8; Prov. xvii, 12). The Divine threatening in consequence of the numerous and aggravated iniquities of the kingdom of Israel, as uttered by the prophet Hosea, is thus forcibly expressed. "I will meet the remover of the bear's whelps" (xiii, 8; see Jerome in loc.), which was fulfilled by the invasion of the Assyrians and the complete subversion of the kingdom of Israel. The she-bear is said to be even more fierce and terrible than the male, especially after she has cubbed, and her furious passions are never more fiercely ex-of prey, whose qualities resembled the character of these several states, the Medo-Persian empire is represented by a bear, which raised itself up on one side, and had between its teeth three ribs, and they said thus unto it, "Arise, devour much flesh!" (vii, 5). All the four monarchies agreed in their fierceness and rapacity; but there were several striking differences in the subordinate features of their character and their mode of operation, which is clearly intimated by the different character of their symbolical representatives. The Persian monarchy is represented by a bear to denote its cruelty and greediness after blood. Bochart has enumerated several points of resemblance between the character of the Medo-Persians and the disposition of the bear (Hieros, i, 806 sq.). The variety of the Asiatic bear which inhabits the Himalayas is especially ferocious, and it is probable that the same species among the mountains of Armenia is the animal here referred to. The bear with seven heads and ten horns (Rev. xiii, 2) is described as having the feet of a bear. The bear's feet are his best weapons, with which he fights, either striking or embracing his antagonist in order to squeeze him to death, or to trample him under foot.

Beard (par, saknu; Gr. πώμα). The customs of nations in respect to this part of the human countenance have differed and still continue to differ so widely that it is not easy with those who treat the beard as an incumbrance to conceive properly the importance attached to it in other ages and countries.

I. The ancient nations in general agreed with the modern inhabitants of the East in attaching a great value to the possession of a beard. The total absence of it, or a sparse and stunted sprinkling of hair upon the chin, is thought by the Orientals to be as great a deformity to the features as the want of a nose would appear to us; while, on the contrary, a long and bushy beard, flowing down in luxuriant profusion to the breast, is considered not only a most graceful ornament to the person, but as contributing in no small degree to respectability and dignity of character. So much, indeed, is the possession of this venerable badge associated with notions of honor and importance, that it is almost constantly introduced, in the way either of allusion or appeal, into the language of familiar and daily life. In short, this hairy appendage of the chin is most highly prized as the attribute of manly dignity; and hence the energy of Ezekiel's language when, describing the severity of the Divine judgments upon the Jews, he intimates that, although that people had been as dear to God and as fondly cherished by him as the beard was by them, the razor, i.e. the agents of his angry providence, in righteous retribution for their long-continued sins, would destroy their existence as a nation (Ezek. x, 1-5). With this knowledge of the extraordinary respect and value which have in all ages been attached to the beard in the East, we are prepared to expect that a corresponding care would be taken to preserve and improve its appearance; and, accordingly, to dress and anoint it with oil and perfume, with the better classes at least, an indispensable part of their daily toilet (Psa. cxix, 2). In many cases it was dyed with variegated colors, by a tedious and troublesome operation, described by Moirier (Journ. p. 247), which, in consequence of the action of the air, requires to be repeated once every fortnight, and which, as that writer informs us, has been from time immemorial a universal practice in Persia. That the ancient Assyrians took equally nice care of their beard and hair is evident from the representations found everywhere upon the monuments discovered by Botta and Layard. From the history of Mephobesheth (2 Sam. xix, 24), it seems probable that the grandees of ancient Palestine trimmed their beards with the same fastidious care and by the same elaborate process; while the allowing these to remain in a foul and dishevelled state, or to cut them off, was one among the many features of sordid negligence in their personal appearance by which they gave outward indications of deep and overwhelming sorrow (Isa. xxv, 2; Jer. xlii, 6; comp. Herod, ii, 36; Suet. Calig., 5; Theocr. xiv, 8). The custom was and is to shave or pluck it and the hair out in mourning (Isa. i, 6; Jer. xlviii, 87; Ezra ix, 8; Bar. vi, 81). David presented the treatment of his ambassadors by Hanun (2 Sam. x, 4) as the last outrage which enormity could inflict (comp. Lament, Copsic. 14). The dishonourable by David to the beard of letting his spindle fall on it (1 Sam. xxii, 18) seems at once to have convinced Achish of his being insane, as no man in health of body and mind would thus defile what was esteemed so honorable. It was customary for men to kiss one another's beards when they saluted, for the original of 2 Sam. xx, 9, literally translated, would read, "And Joab held in his right hand the beard of Amasa, that he might give it a kiss;" indeed, in the East, it is generally considered an insult to touch the beard except to kiss it (comp. Homer, IIiad, i, 501; x, 454 sq.). Among the Arabs, kissing the beard is an act of respect; D'Arvieux observes (Contes des Arabes, i, 233) that the women kiss their husbands' beards, and the children their fathers', when they go to salute them" (see Harmar, Obs. ii, 77, 85; iii, 179; Bohlen, Indian, ii, 171; Deyling, Obs. ii, 14; Lakemacher, Oe. x, 145; Tavernier, ii, 100; Niebuhr, Besch., p. 817; Kittto, Dict. Bibl., notes on 1 Sam. xxxi, 18; 2 Sam. x, 4; xiv, 24; xx, 9; 1 Chron. xix, 4; Volney, ii, 118; Burchhards, Arabia, p. 61; Lane, Ed. Egyptian, ii, 322). See HAIR.

The Egyptians, on the contrary, sedulously, for the most part, shaved the hair of the face and head, and compelled their slaves to do the like. Herodotus (i, 56) mentions it as a peculiarity of the Egyptians that they let the beard grow in mourning, being at all other times shaved. Hence Joseph, when released from prison, "shaved his beard" to appear before Pharaoh (Gen. xii, 14). Egyptians of low cast or mean condition are found from the early Ptolemaic period in the spirit of caricature apparently, with beards of slovenly growth (Wilkinson, ii, 127). The enemies of the Egyptians, including probably many of the nations of Canaan, Syria, Armenia, etc., are represented near-ly always bearded. The most singular custom of the Egyptians was that of wearing a false beard from the chin, which was made of plastered hair, and of a peculiar form, according to the person by whom it was worn. Private individuals had a small beard, scarcely two inches long; that of a king was of considerable length, square at the bottom; and the figures of gods were distinguished by its turning up at the end (Wilkinson, iii, 862). No man ventured to assume, or affix to his image, the beard of a deity; but after their death, it was permitted to substitute their divine beards on the statues of kings, and all other persons who were judged worthy of admissitance to the Elysium of futurity, in consequence of their having assumed the character of Osiris, to whom the souls of the pure returned on quitting their earthly abode. The form of the beard, therefore, readily distinguishes the figures of gods and kings. It is a sacral attribute of the temples; and the allegorical connection between the sphinx and the monarch is pointed out by its having the king's beard, as well as the crown and other symbols of royalty (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. suppl. plate 77, pt. ii).

From the above facts, it is clear that the Israelites maintained their beard and the ideas connected with it, by the abode of the gods among the Egyptians, who were a shaven people. This is not unimportant as one of the indications which evince that, whatever they learned of good or evil in that country, they preserved the appearance and habits of a separate people. As the Egyptians shaved their beards off entirely, the injunction in Lev. xix, 27, against shaving "the corners of the beard" must have been levelled against the practices of some other bearded nation. The prohibition is usually understood to apply against rounding the corners of the beard where it joins the hair; and the reason is supposed to have been to counteract a superstition of certain Arabian tribes, who, by shaving off the corner way the beard would grow back the hair of the head, devoted themselves to a certain deity who held among them the place which Bacchus did among the Greeks (Herodot. iii, 8; comp. Jer. ix, 26; xxxv, 23; xlix, 32). The consequence seems to have been altogether to prevent the Jews from shaving off the edges of their beards. The effect of this prohibition in establishing a distinction of the Jews from other nations cannot be understood unless we consider the extravagant diversity in which the beard was and is treated by the nations of the East. See COINERS. The removal of the beard was a part of the ceremonial treatment proper to a leper (Lev. xiv, 9). There is no evidence that the Jews compelled their slaves to wear beards otherwise than they wore their own; although the Romans, when they adopted the fashion of shaving, compelled their slaves to cherish their hair and beard, and let them shave when manumitted (Liv. xxxiv, 52; xlv, 44).—Kitto; Smith; Winer.

In 2 Sam. xix, 24, the term rendered "beard" is in the original אֶפֶן, ephenn, and signifies the mustache (being elsewhere rendered "upper lip"), which, like the beard, was carefully attended to. II. The 44th canon of the council of Carthage, A.D. 388, according to the most probable reading, forbids clergymen to suffer the hair of their heads to grow too long, and at the same time forbids to shave the beard. Clarece nec commum mutrit nec barbam radat. According to Gregory VII, the Western clergy have not worn beards since the first introduction of Christianity; but Bingham seems to be incorrect.—Bingham, Orig. Ecc. bk. vi, ch. iv, § 15.

Beard, Thomas, the "promontory of Methodism," was one of Mr. Wesley's first assistants. In 1744, during the fierce persecutions waged against the Methodists, he was torn from his family and sent away as a soldier. He maintained a brave spirit under his sufferings, lost his health. He was sent to the hospital at Newcastle in 1744, "where he says Wesley, 'he still praised God continually.' His fever became worse, and he was bled, but his arm festered, mortified, and had to be amputated. A few days later he died. Charles Wesley wrote the hymn Soldier of Christ, adieu! as a tribute to the memory of Beard.—Wesley, Works, iii, 817; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, i, 210; Atmore, Memorial, p. 46.

Beasley, Frederick, D.D., was born in 1777, near Edenton, N. C. After graduating at Princeton, 1797, he remained there three years as tutor, studying theology near the same time. In 1801 he was ordained deacon, in 1802 priest; in 1803 he became pastor of St. John's, Elizabethtown; in the same year he was transferred to St. Peter's, Albany, and in 1806 to St. Paul's, Baltimore. He was sometime provost of the University of Pennsylvania, which office he filled with eminent fidelity and dignity until 1828. He served St. Michael's, Trenton, from 1829 to 1826, when he retired to Elizabethtown, where he died, Nov. 1, 1845. His principal writings are, American Dialogues of the Dead (1815).—Search of Truth in the Science of the Human Mind (vol. i, 8vo, 1822; vol. ii left in MS.). He also published a number of pamphlets and sermons, and was a frequent contributor to the periodicals of the time.—Sprague, Annals, v, 473.

Beast, the translation of בָּשָׁם, besamah, 'dumb animals, quadrupeds, the most usual term; also of יַרְדָנ, yarzan, 'grazing animals, flocks or herds,' Exod. xxii, 5; Num. xx, 4, 8, 11; Psa. lxxxviii, 48; once beasts of burden, Gen. xlv, 17; כַּפַּי, chaldei כַּפַּי, caphai, a wild beast, frequently occurring; וָאַפָּשֵׂה, waapasheh, creature or soul, only once in the phrase "beast for beast," Levit. xxiv, 18; וָאַפָּשֵׂה, vaapashe, 'a beast, slaughtered, once only for edible beasts,' Prov. ix, 2; and יָפָשֵׂה, yaphasheh, kirkoroth, 'a swift beast,' i.e. dromedaries, Isa. i, 20 [see CATTLE]; in the New Test. properly גואל, an animal; גואל, a wild beast, often; פֶּסְכָּה, peskach, a domestic animal, as property, for merchandise, Rev. xviii, 13; for food, 1 Cor. xv, 39; or for service, Luke x, 34; Acts xxiii, 24; and פָּשֹׁי, an animal for sacrifice, a victim, Acts vii, 42. In the Bible, this word, when used in contradistinction to man (Psa. xxxvi, 6), denotes a brute creature generally; when in contradistinction to creeping things (Lev. xi, 2-7; xxvi, 26), it has reference to four-footed animals; and when to wild mammalia, as in Gen. i, 25, it means domesticated cattle. כִּיּוֹם, kiyyom ("wild beasts," Isa. xxiii, 21; xxxiv, 14; Jer. xi, 89), denotes wild animals of the upland wilderness. כִּיּוֹם, kiyyom ("doleful creatures," Isa. xlii, 21), may, perhaps, with more propriety be considered as "poisonous and offensive reptiles." סָרֵים, sarim, shaggy ones, is a general term for apes—not סָיָּה (Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 14; much less "devils," 2 Chron. xi, 15), a pagan poetical creation unit for Scriptural language: it includes שִׂיחִים, shehyim ("serpents," Deut. xxxii, 17; Psa. cv, 57), as a species. See APES. כִּיּוֹם, kiyyom, are monsters of the deep and of the wilderness—beasts, serpents, crocodiles, dolphins, and sharks. See ANIMAL.

The zoology of Scripture may, in a general sense, be said to embrace the whole range of animated nature; but, after the first brief notice of the Creation of animals recorded in Genesis, it is limited more particularly to the animals found in Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, Syria, and the countries eastward, in some cases to the boundaries of the Empire comprehended by those limits. Mammalia, birds, reptiles, fishes, and invertebrate animals. In each animal in its alphabetical order. Thus, in the animated nature, beginning with the lowest organized in the watery element, we have first ἡγήρις, the "moving creature that hath life," animalcula, crustacea, insects, etc.; second, ἄρον, ἀρκότος, ἄλογον, "flying creatures" (Gen. i, 20); and, still advancing (cetaceans, pinnipeds, whales, and seals being excluded), we have quadrupeds, forming three other orders or classes: (1st.) cattle, πανδέλφια, θάλαμος, embracing the ruminant herbivora, generally gregarious and of domesticity; (2nd.) wild beasts, ἄγρυπνα, θανάτικα, carnivora, including all beasts of prey; and (3rd.) reptiles, ἱδρομένοι, ἱππατοειδες, minor quadrupeds, such as creep by means of many feet, or glide by means of the skin, scorpions, anoles, etc.; finally, we have man, ἀνάμνησις, Ἀδάμ, standing alone in intellectual supremacy. The classification of Moses, as it may be drawn from Deuteronomy, appears to be confined to Vertebrata alone, or animals having a spine and ribs, although the fourth class might include others. Taking man as one, it forms five classes: (1st.) Man; (2d.) Beasts; (3d.) Birds; (4th.) Fishes; (5th.) Insects. It is thus named in Leviticus xi, where beasts are further distinguished into those with hoofs, the sheep of systematics, and those with cloven feet (butiel), or ruminants. But the passage specially refers to animals that might be lawfully eaten because they were clean, and to others prohibited because they were declared unclean, although some of them, according to the common belief of the time, might ruminante; for the Scriptures were not intended to embrace anatomical disquisitions aiming at the advancement of human science, but to convey moral and religious truth without disturbing the received opinions of the time on questions having little or nothing to do with their main object. The Scriptures, therefore, contain no minute details on natural history, and notice only a small proportion of the animals inhabiting the regions alluded to. Notwithstanding the subsequent progress of science, the observation of Dr. Adam Clarke is still true, that "of a few animals and vegetables we are comparatively certain, but of the great majority we know nothing." Guessing and conjecture are endless, and they have on these subjects been already sufficiently employed. What learning—deep, solid, extensive learning and judgment could do, has already been done by the incomparable Bochart in his Hierozoom. The learned reader may consult this work, and, while he gains much general information, will have to regret that he can apply so little of it to the main and grand question. The chief cause of this is doubtless the general want of a personal and exact knowledge of natural history on the part of those who have written concerning these questions (Ritse). See Zoology.

The Mosaic regulations respecting the sacred animals exhibit a great superiority over the enactments of other ancient nations (for those of the Aegypcons, see Quintill. Opt. v. 9, 13; for those of the Zend-avesta, see Rhode, Ἰδ. Σχετ., p. 438, 441, 445), and contain the following directions: 1. Beasts of labor must have rest on the Sabbath (Exod. xx. 10; xxii. 2, 3), and in the sabbatical year cattle were allowed to roam free and eat whatever grew in the untilled fields (Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 7). See Sabbath. 2. No animal could be castrated (Lev. xxiv. 24); for that is the sense of the passage (which Le Clerc combats) that it is evil to have left-handed creatures. (Ant. v. 8, 10), but also from the invariable practice of the Jews themselves. See Ox. The sacrifices that may have led to the disuse of mutilated beasts of burden are enumerated by Michaelis (Mon. hebr., iii, 161 sq.). The prohibition itself must have greatly subserved a higher and different object, namely, the prevention of impieties: but its principal ground is certainly a religious, or, at least, a humane one (see Hottinger, Leps. Hebr. p. 374 sq.). 3. Animals of different kinds were not to be allowed to mix in breeding, nor even to be yoked together to the plough (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xx. 10). See Divorce. 4. Oxen in threshing were not to be muzzled, or prevented from eating the provender on the floor (Deut. xix. 4; 1 Cor. ix. 9). See Thrashing. 5. No (domestic) animal should be killed on the same day with its young (Lev. xxii. 29), as this would imply barbarity (see Jonathan's Targum in loc.; Philo, Opp. ii, 398). The Jews appear to have understood this enactment to apply to the slaughtering of "living" animals for food, as well as for sacrifice (Mishna, Chol. ch. v). Respecting the ancient law referred to in Exod. xxii, 19, see Victuals. (Comp. generally Schwabe, in the Kirchenzeit. 1834, No. 20). Other precepts seem not to have had the force of civil statutes, but to have been merely injunctions of compassion (e. g. Exod. xiii, 5; Deut. xxiv, 4, 5, 7). The sense of the former of these last prescriptions is not very clear in the original (see Rosenmüller in loc.), as the Jews apply it to all beasts of burden as well as to the asa (see Josephus, Ant. iv. 8, 80; comp. Philo, Opp. ii, 59). Deut. vii. 7 sq., however, appears to be analogous to the other regulations under this class (Winer, ii, 610). See Fowl.

The word "beast" is sometimes used figuratively for brutal, savage men. Hence the phrase, "I fought with wild beasts at Ephesus," alluding to the infuriated multitude, who may have demanded that Paul should be thus exposed in the amphitheatre to fight as a gladiator (1 Cor. xv. 32; Acts xix. 29). A similar use of the term is found in Psa. xxxvii. 23, in Eccl. iii. 18; Isa. xi. 6-8; and in 2 Pet. ii. 12; Jude 10, to denote a class of wicked men. A wild beast is the symbol of a tyrannical, usurping power or monarchy, that destroys its neighbors or subjects, and preys upon all about it. The four beasts in Dan. vii, 5, 7, 22, represent the four kings or kingdoms (Ezek. xxii. 29; Jer. xii. 4). Whose are generally considered to be understood of enemies, whose malice and power are to be judged of in proportion to the nature and magnitude of the wild beasts by which they are represented; similar comparisons occur in profane authors (Psa. lxix. 14). In like manner the King of Egypt is compared to the crocodile (Psa. lxxvi, 31). The rising of a beast signifies the rise of some new dominion or government; the rising of a wild beast, the rise of a tyrannical government; and the rising out of the sea, that it should owe its origin to the commotions of the people. So the waters are interpreted by the angel (Rev. x, 20). In the visions of the four great beasts, the symbols of the four great monarchies, are represented rising out of the sea in a storm: "I saw in my vision by night, and behold, the four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea, and four great beasts came up from the sea" (Dan. vii, 2, 8). In various passages of the Revelation (iv, 6, etc.) this word is immensely used by our translators for living creatures (ζώα) that symbolize the providential agencies of the Almighty, as in the vision of Ezekiel (ch. 1). The "beast" elsewhere spoken of with such denunciatory emphasis in that book doubtless denotes the heathen political power of persecuting Rome. See Wenny's Symbol. Dict. s. v.
BEATIFICATION

Beatification, an act by which, in the Romish Church, the pope declares a person blessed after death. It is to be distinguished from canonization (q.v.), in which the pope professes to determine authoritatively on the state of the person canonized; but when he beatifies he only gives permission that religious honors not proceeding so far as worship should be paid to the deceased. The day of their office cannot be made a feast until the time of the canonization. Before the time of Alexander VII beatification was performed in the church of his order if the person to be beatified was a monk; and in the case of others, in the church of their country, if there was one at Rome. Alexander, however, ordered that the ceremony should in future be always in the basilica of the Vatican; and the first so solemnized was the canonization of Francis de Sales on the 28th of September, 1659. At present the custom is not to demand the beatification of any one until fifty years after his death. See Lamberini (afterward Benedict XIV.), De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonisatione, lib. 1, cap. 24, 39. —Farrar, Eccl. Dict. s. v.; Christ. Examiner, Jan. 1835, art. vii.

Beatific Vision, a theological expression used to signify the vision of God in heaven permitted to the blessed. See Beatitude.

Beauties, the name frequently given to the first classes for Saviour’s, and called the Mount (q.v.), beginning with the phrase “Blessed,” etc. (Matt. v. 3–11). The present “Mount of the Beatitudes” on which they are said to have been delivered is the hill called Kurun Hattin, or “Horns of Hattin,” on the road from Nazareth to Tiberias—a not unlikely position (Hackett, Illust. of Script, p. 319).

Beaton, Beaton, or Bethune, Cardinal David, archbishop of St. Andrew’s, notorious as a persecutor, was born in 1494, and educated at the University of Glasgow. He studied the canon law at Paris. In 1528 he was made abbot of Arbroath, and in 1529 lord privy seal. His life was now devoted to politics, which he endeavored to make subservient to the views of the Papal Church. In 1537 he was appointed to the see of St. Andrew’s, and in 1538 was made cardinal by Pope Paul III. In 1543 he obtained the great seal of Scotland, and was also made legate a latere by the pope, thus combining civil and ecclesiastical dominion in his own person. In the beginning of 1545–46 he held a convention of the clergy at St. Andrew’s, at which Wishart was condemned for heresy, and adjudged to be burnt—a sentence which was passed and put into effect by the cardinal and his clergy, in defiance of the regent, and without the aid of the civil power. The cardinal afterward procured to the abbey of Arbroath the marriage of his eldest daughter with Mrs. Marion Ogilvy of the house of Airly, with whom he had long lived in concubinage, and there gave her in marriage to the eldest son of the Earl of Crawford, and with her 4,000 merks of dowry. He then returned to St. Andrew’s, where, on Saturday, May 29, 1546, he was put to death in his own chamber by a party of Beaton’s, headed by Norman Leslie, heir of the house of Rothes, who, we find, had on the 24th of April, 1545, given the cardinal a bond of “manrent” (or admission of feudal homage and fealty), and who had a personal quarrel with the cardinal. The death of Cardinal Beaton was fatal to the ecclesiastical oligarchy which under him trampled alike on law and liberty. Three works of the cardinal’s are named: De Legis: Salus Suia, De Primatu Petri, and Epistola ad Dierum: See Eng. Cyclopedia; Burnet, Hist. of Eng., Reformatio, i, 491–540; Hetherington, Church of Scotland, i, 42 52.

Beatrix or Beatrice, Sr., sister of Simplicius and Faustinus, who were beheaded in 308, and their bodies thrown into the Tiber. Beatrix rescued the bodies from the river and buried them, and for her good act was condemned; but for seven months she escaped the fury of her persecutors. She was eventually arrested and strangled in prison. The Roman Church honors these martyrs on the 29th of July.—London, Eccl. Dict. ii, 155; Butler, Lives of Saints, July 29.

Beattie, James, poet and moralist, was the son of a small farmer, and was born at Laurencekirk, in Kincardineshire, October 23, 1735. After pursuing his studies with brilliant success at Marischal College, Aberdeen, he was appointed usher to the Grammar School of that city, 1758, where he enjoyed the society of many distinguished men, by whose aid he was appointed professor of moral philosophy in Marischal College in the same year. In the same year he made his first public appearance as a poet in a volume of original poems and translations. With these poems he was afterward dissatisfied, and he endeavored to suppress them. His Essay on Truth, written avowedly to confute Hume, and published in 1770, became highly popular, and procured him the degree of LL.D. from the University of Oxford, and a private interview and a pension from George III. Solicitations were also made to him to enter the Church of England; but he declined, in the fear that his motives might be misrepresented. In the same year he gave to the world the first book of the Minstrel, and the second in 1774. This work gained him reputation as a poet. He subsequently produced Disquisitions, Moral and Critical (1783, 4to; 1787, 2 vols. 8vo)—Evidences of the Christian Religion (1786; 4th ed. 1795, 2 vols. 2mo)—Elements of Moral Science (3d ed. with Index, 1817, 2 vols. 8vo); and An Account of the Life and Writings of his Eldest Sis., 2 vols. 8vo, by a friend at Aberdeen, A. G. Hume. His Life and Letters, by Sir William Forbes, appeared in 1807 (3 vols. 8vo). It is honorable to Beattie that, long before the abolition of the slave-trade was brought before Parliament, he was active in protesting against that iniquitous traffic; and he introduced the subject into his academical course, with the express hope that such of his pupils might be called to reside in the West Indies would recollect the lessons of humanity which he inculcated. Of his writings, the Minstrel is that which probably is now most read. It is not a work of any very high order of genius; but it exhibits a strong feeling for the beauties of nature; and it will probably long continue to hold an honorable place in the collections of minor poetry. Beattie’s metaphysical writings have the reputation of being clear, lively, and attractive, but not profound. The Essay on Truth was much read and admired at the time of its publication.—Eng. Cyclopedia, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 147.

Beauchamp, William, an early and distinguished Mather, visiting English minister. He was born in Kent County, Del., April 26th, 1772; joined the M. E. Church about 1788. In 1790 he taught a school at Monongahela, Va., began to preach in 1791, and in 1798 he travelled under the presiding elder. In 1794 he joined the itinerancy; and in 1797 he was stationed in New York, and in 1799 in Boston. In 1801 he was located at Salem, Mass., the health of Mrs. Beauchamp being "one of the most excellent of women." In 1807 he settled on the Little Kenawha, Va. Here he preached with great success until 1815, when he removed to BEAUMONT

Chillothe, Ohio, to act as editor of the Western Christian Monitor, which he conducted "with considerable ability," "preaching meanly" with "eminent success." In 1817 he removed to Mount Carmel, Ill., and engaged in founding a settlement, in every detail of which, civil, economical, and mechanical, his genius was pre-eminent. He was pastor, teacher, lawyer, and engineer. In 1822 he re-entered the itinerancy in the Missouri Conference; in 1829, was appointed presiding elder on Indiana District," then embracing nearly the whole state. In 1834 he was a delegate to the General Conference at Baltimore, "and lacked but two votes of an election to the episcopacy" by that body. He died at Paoli, Orange County, Ind., Oct. 7th, 1834. Mr. Burton, of Piqua, Ohio, in his account of his acquaintance with him in his later years, says: "Mr. Beaumont was one of the best lights in his frontier life, he made himself master of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. "His preaching was chaste and dignified, logical, and sometimes of overwhelming power." He possessed a great and organizing mind, and a peculiar and almost universal genius, and, with adequate advantages for study, would certainly have influenced widely the history of the country. His Essays on the Truth of the Christian Religion is "a work of decided merit." His Letters on the Itinerancy, with a memoir by Bishop Soule, were published after his death, and he left several fine MSS., which remain unpublished.

Beaumont, Joseph, M.D., one of the most eminent preachers in the Methodist Church of England, was the son of the Rev. John Beaumont, and was born at Castle Donington, March 19, 1744. He received his education at Kingswood school, and was there converted to God. After some years spent in the study of medicine, he determined to enter the ministry; and though his health did not permit him to be appointed to the Established Church by the kindness of friends, he preferred to remain with the Wesleyan Methodists, and was received on trial by the Conference of 1813. He was soon recognized as a preacher of more than common promise. An impediment in his speech appeared likely to hinder his success, but by great resolution he surmounted it, and became a fluent and effective speaker. His preaching was characterized by brilliancy of illustration, by repeated bursts of impassioned eloquence, and an earnestness of manner and delivery often amounting to impetuosity. For many years he was one of the most popular pulpits and platform speakers in Great Britain. His last appointment was Hull, where he died suddenly in the pulpit, January 21, 1855. A number of his occasional sermons and speeches are published; a specimen of them will be found in the English Pulpit, 1849, p. 123. His J. F. written by his son, appeared in 1856. Beaourbo, Isaac De, born at Nort, March 8th, 1659, of an ancient family, originally of Limousin. His parents both Methodists, and educated at Sau- mur. In 1688 he was ordained minister at Châtillon-sur-Indre, in Touraine. The French government caused his church to be sealed up, and Beaourbo was bold enough to break the seal, for which he was compelled to flee, and at Rotterdam he became chaplain to the Prior, 1688. In 1689 he published his Doctrine of the Reformers (De fave de la dot. des Reform. sur la Providence, etc.), in which he treats the Lutherans with some severity, and defends the Synod of Dort. In 1694 he went to Berlin, where he received many appointments, and was charged, together with L'Enfant, with the work of translating the N. T. The new version, with ample prefaces and appendices, appeared at Amsterdam in 1748 (2 vols. 4to), and again in 1741, with emendations. The Epistles of St. Paul were the only part of the work which fell to the share of Beaourbo. The notes are tinged with Socinianism. He labored during a large portion of his life at a History of the Reformation of the Church of England, to the period of the publication of the Confession of Augsburg, and it was this undertaking which drew from him his Critical History of Manichaeism (Histoire critique du Manichéisme, Amst. 1734-59, 2 vols. 4to), of which vol. ii was posthumous. The work is written with vast ability, and shows that many of those who are charged with Manichaeism in the Middle Ages by the Fathers are falsely charged. The Protestant congregations of Utrecht, Hamburg, and the Savoy, at London, endeavored to induce Beaourbo to become their pastor, but the King of Prussia valued him too highly to permit him to leave Berlin. His Sermons on the Resurrection of the Dead (Amst. 1743, 4 vols. 8vo), and on the Mystery of the Holy Eucharist (Amst. 1743, 4 vols. 8vo). He died June 6th, 1758. He left, besides the works above mentioned, Remarks critiques et philologiques sur le N. T. (Hague 1742, 2 vols. 4to);—Histoire critique du Culte des Mortz parmis les Chrestiens et les Païens;—A Supplement à L'Englant's History of the Hussites (Laumesme, 1745, 4to);—A History of the Reformation, from 1517 to 1630 (Berlin, 1735, 4 vols. 8vo).—Landor, Ecl. Dict. ii, 110; Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 123-127.

Beautiful Gate (παντεία γειων), the name of one of the gates of the Temple (Acts iii, 2). It was the entrance of the Court of the Women, immediately opposite the Gate of Shushan, and over against the outer wall into Solomon's Porch (see Strong's Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, App. II, p. 123, and Map.) It is evidently the same described by Josephus as immensely massive, and covered with plates of Corinthian bronze (Ant. xv. 11, 5; War, v. 5, 3; vi, 5, 9). (See Journ. Soc. Lit. Oct. 1867.) See Temple.

Beauty (represented by numerous Hebrew terms, which in our version are frequently rendered by "comeliness," etc.). The Song of Solomon, particularly the sixth and seventh chapters, gives us some idea of what were then the notions of beauty in an Eastern bride, and by comparing these statements with modern Oriental opinions, we may perceive many points of agreement. Roberts says, "A handsome Hindoo female is compared to the sacred city of Seedambaram. Her skin is of the color of gold; her hands, nails, and soles of the feet are of a reddish hue; her limbs must be smooth, and her gait like the stately swan. Her mouth is small, like the mouth of a swan; her waist as slender as the lightning; her arms are short, and her fingers resemble the five petals of the kantha flower; her breasts are like the young coconut, and her neck is as the trunk of the areca-tree. Her mouth is like the ambar flower, and her lips as coral; her face is like a beautiful pearl; her nose is high and lifted up, like that of the chamelone (when raised to sniff the wind); her eyes are like the sting of a wasp and the Karungu-valley flower; her brows are like the bow, and nicely separated; and her hair is as the black cloud." Corpulency and stateliness of manner are qualities which the Orientals admire in their women; particularly so the women, which is well known to be one of the most distinguishing marks of beauty in the East. Niebuhr says that plumpness is thought so desirable in the East, that women, in order to become so, swallow every morning and every evening three insects of a species of tenonbiros, fried in a glass of butter. The men of India have美女 (long and abundant) as an emblem of Solomon (Cant. i, 9), and Theocritus, in his epithalamium for the celebrated Queen Helen, describes her as plump and large, and compares her to the horse in the chariots of Thessaly. The Arab women whom Mr. Wood saw among the ruins of Palmyra were well shaped, and, although very swarthy, yet had a soft, swelling, plumpness which was known to be one of that renowned city, was reckoned eminently beautiful, and the description we have of her person answers to that character; her complexion was of a dark brown, her eyes black and sparkling, and of an uncommon fire; her countenance animated and sprightly in a very high degree; her person graceful and stately; her teeth white as pearl; her voice clear and strong. Females of distinction in Palestine, and even farther east, are not only beautiful and well shaped, but in consequence of being kept from the rays of the sun, are very fair, and the Scripture bears the same testimony of them, of Rebekah, and of Rachel, that they were "beautiful and well-favored." The women of the poorer classes, however, are extremely brown and swarthy in their complexions, from being much exposed to the heat of the sun. It is on this account that the prophet Jeremiah, when he would describe a beautiful woman, represents her as one that keeps at home, because those who are destitute to preserve their beauty go very little abroad. Stateliness of the body has always been held in great estimation in Eastern courts; nor do they think any one capable of great services or actions to whom nature has not vouchsafed to give a beautiful form and aspect. It still is and has always been the custom of the Eastern nations to choose such for their principal officers, or to wait on princes and great personages (Dan. 1, 4). Sir Paul Rycaut observes that "the youths that are designed for the great offices of the Turkish empire must be of admirable features and looks, well shaped in their bodies. It affects the Turks that any are unacquainted for it is conceived that a corrupt and sordid soul can scarce inhabit a serene and ingenuous aspect; and I have observed not only in the seraglio, but also in the courts of great men, their personal attendants have been of comely lusty youths, well habited, deporting themselves with singular modesty and respect in the presence of their masters; so that when a pashaлага-справочник travels, he is always attended with a comely equipage, followed by flourishing youths, well mounted."

BEAUTY OF HOLLINESS. See HOLINESS, BEAUTY OF.

Be'ba', the name of one or two men, and a place. 1. (Heb. Bebəy, יבּ, from the Pehlevi bebeba, fishe; Sept. Bebaï, בּבָא, Baï, and βαβ, the head of one of the families that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (B.C. 536) to the number of 625 (Ezra ii, 11; 1 Esdr. v, 13), or 628 by a different mode of reckoning (Neh. vii, 16), of whom his son Zechariash, with 28 males, returned (B.C. 450) under Ezra (Ezra vii, 11; 1 Esdr. viii, 57). Several other of his sons are mentioned in the narrative of the visit of the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Ezra x, 15). B.C. 410. Four of this family had taken foreign wives (Ezra x, 28; 1 Esdr. ix, 29).

2. (Alex. Bejai, Vat. omits; Vulg. omits.) A place named only in Judith xv, 4. It is, perhaps, a mere repetition of the name Chornai (q. v.), occurring next to it.

Be'cher (Heb. Be'zer, בּ, Persian, first-born, but, according to Gesenius, a young camel; so Simonis, Onomast. p. 399), the name of one or two men.

1. (Sept. Beqoz, and Beqoq.) The second son of Benjamin, according to the list both in Gen. xxvi, 21, and 1 Chr. vii, 6; but omitted in the list of the sons of Benjamin in 1 Chr. vii, 1, 2, as now stands, unless, as seems on the whole, most probable, he is there called Noah, the fourth son. There is also good reason to identify him with the In of 1 Chr. vii, 12. B.C. 1856. No one, however, can look at the Hebrew text of 1 Chr. vii, 1 (דְּנָן תֵּבָשׁ לְבָשָׁן וַיַּלְעָה יָשִּׂרְאֵל), without at least suspecting that יָשִּׂרְאֵל, Becher, and that the suffix ־וֹ תֵּבָשׁ is a corruption of וַיַּלְעָה, and belongs to the following לְבָשָׁן, so that the genuine sense, in that case, would be, Benjamin begat Bela, Becher, and Ashbel, in exact agreement with Gen. xlv, 21. The enumeration, the second, the third, etc., must then have been added since the corruption of the text. There is, however, another view which may be taken, viz., that 1 Chr. vii, 1, is right, and that in Gen. xlv, 21, and 1 Chr. vii, 8, יָשִּׂרְאֵל, as a proper name, is a corruption of יָשִּׂרְאֵל, first-born, and so that Benjamin had no son of the name of Becher. In favor of this view, it may be said that the position of Becher, immediately following Bela the first-born in both passages, is just the position it would be in if it meant "first-born;" that Becher is a singular name to give to a fourth son; and that the discrepancy between Gen. xlv, 21, where Ashbel is the third son, and 1 Chr. vii, 1, where he is expressly called the second, and the omission of Ashbel in 1 Chr. vii, 6, would all be accounted for on the supposition of יָשִּׂרְאֵל having been accidentally taken for a proper name instead of in the sense of "first-born.") It may be added farther that, in 1 Chr. vii, 58, the name is changed in the case of the sons of Azel, of whom the second is in the Anth. Vera., called Bokerus, in Heb. בּ, but which in the Sept. is rendered πρῶτον αὐτός, another name, "Anu, being added to make up the six sons of Azel.

And that the Sept. is right in the rendering is made highly probable by the very same form being repeated in ver. 39. "And the sons of Eshek his brother were Ulam his first-born (יָשִּׂרְאֵל), Jehosh the second," etc. The support, too, which Becher, as a proper name, derives from the occurrence of the same name in Jeremiah (which is somewhat weakened by the fact that Jeremiah v.) seems to be substituted for Becher in 1 Chron. vii, 20, and that the latter is omitted altogether in the Sept. version of Num. xxvi, 35. Moreover, which is perhaps the strongest argument of all, in the enumeration of the Benjamite families in Num. xxvi, 36, there is no mention of Becher or the Bachrites, but Ashbel and the Aschbites immediately follow Bela and the Bala-ites. This last supposition, however, is decidedly negated by the mention (1 Chron. vii, 8) of the distinctive sons of Becher as an individual. Becher was one of Benjamin's five sons that came down to Egypt with Jacob, being one of the fourteen descendants of Rachel who settled in Egypt. See Jacob.

As regards the posterity of Becher, we find nevertheless the singular fact of there being so family named after him at the numbering of the Israelites in the plains of Moab, as related in Num. xxvi. But the less less singular fact is, that there being a family of Bachrites, among the sons of Ephraim (ver. 35) has been thought to suggest an explanation. The slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the men of Gath, who came to steal their cattle out of the land of Goshen, in that border affray related in 1 Chron. vii, 21, had sadly thinned the house of Ephraim of its males. The daughters of Ephraim must therefore have sought husbands in other tribes, and in many cases must have been heiresses. It is therefore possible that Becher, or his heir and head of his house, married an Ephraimite heiress, a daughter of Shutebah (1 Chron. vii, 20, 21), and that this reckoned the tribe of Ephraim, just as Jair, the son of Segub, was reckoned in the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. ii, 29; Num. xxxii, 40, 41). The time when Becher first appears among the Ephraimites, viz., just before the entering into the promised land, when the people were numbered by genealogies for the express purpose of dividing the inheritance equally among the tribes, is evidently highly favorable to this view. (See Num. xxvi, 52-56; xxvii.) The junior branches of Becher's family would of course continue in the tribe of Benjamin. Their names, as given in 1 Chron. vii, 8, were Zemira, Josah, Elezer, Eloenai, Omri, Jerimoth, and Abiah; other branches were the field of the same. Joshi and Almalm (called Alemeth vi, 60, and Almon Joshe, xxii, 18). As the most important of them, being ances- tor to King Saul, and his great captain Abner (1 Sam. xlv, 50), the last named, Abiah, was literally Becher's soj, it would seem that the rest (with others not there named) were likewise. See Jacob. The generations appear to have been as follows: Becher—Abishel—a brother to the Becket’s devotion to the king. But, once consecrated, it devolved upon him to decide whether he would serve the Church or the state, and he declared for the former without hesitation. The bishops and his late minister were equally matched for their inflexibility, quickness of resolution, undaunted courage, and statesmanlike abilities; and both were influenced, farther than their own consciences extended, by the spirit of the age. Three years of strife led to the council of Clarendon, convoked by Henry in 1164, which Becket fled to the realm, and the baronial influences of the barons, and signed the famous "Constitutions of Clarendon" [see CLARENCE], by which the differences between the Church and state were regulated. These articles, which were, in reality, nothing but a formal statement of the ancient usages of England, not only rendered the state supreme in all that concerned the general government of the nation, but virtually separated England from Rome, so far as the temporal authority of the pope was concerned. The pope, therefore, refused to ratify them, and Becket, seeing his opportunity, and really repenting of the compliance that had been wrung from him, refused to perform his office in the Church, and even renounced the kingdom. But last, he succeeded, only to draw down the vengeance of Henry upon his connections. The progress of the quarrel belongs rather to the history of the times than to a single life. Becket remained in exile six years, and, matters being in some measure accommodated, returned to England, shortly after the death of the king’s son, which had been designed by Henry as a means of securing the succession. Becket’s refusal to remove the censures with which the agents in this transaction had been visited, his haughty contempt of the crown, and the sentences of excommunication which he continued to fulfillmnats from the altar of Canterbury cathedral, provoked anew the indignation of the king. It is idle to judge the actions of men in those iron times by the formulas of the present day. The question, stripped of all disguise, was simply this; whether the pope or Henry Plantagenet was henceforth to be king in England; whether the canon law or the ancient usages should govern the realm. The Norman lords resolved the matter in their own rude way, when at length four of them left the royal presence in hot anger, after hearing of some fresh indignity, and determined on bringing the controversy to a bloody close. Becket was murdered during the celebration of the Eucharist on the plains of Porchester, on Thursday, 29th December, 1170. He was canonized by Alexander III in 1174. The pope excommunicated the murderers and their accomplices, and the king, who was generally looked upon as implicated, purchased absolution by conceding to Rome the freedom of its judicial proceedings, and by doing penance at the grave of Becket. Becket soon became one of the most popular English saints, and his shrine the richest in England. Four centuries later Henry VIII, 1538, had proceedings instituted against him for treason, his bones burned, and the gold and jewels which adorned his shrine carried to the royal treasury. His life may be found in all the English and French writers, which give various accounts of his character, according to the ecclesiastical views of the writers. In 1859 Prof. Hippeau, of Caen, published "La Vie de Saint Thomas le Martyr," by Garnier de Pont Saint Mayence, a poem of the 12th century, now issued for the first time. The introduction by the editor is full of interest. Rice, W. V. "Giles of the Land."" A. A. Becket (Lond. 1846, 2 vols. 8vo); Opera, ed. BECON, THOMAS, D.D., prebend of Canterbury, was born 1511 or 1512, place unknown. He graduated at St. John’s College, Cambridge, 1530, was ordained 1538, and obtained the vicarage of Bremness, Kent. He had imbibed the principles of the Reformation from Stafford and Latimer at Cambridge, but was cautious in expressing his views, publishing under the name of Theodore Basil. Nevertheless, he was imprisoned, and in 1541 recanted at Paul’s Cross, and burned his books. On the accession of Edward V1 he was made rector of St. Stephen’s, Walbrook, 1547, and chaplain to the queen. He lived through Queen Mary’s time, but escaped in 1554 and went to Strasburgh. His writings were denounced in a royal proclamation of 1555. On the accession of Elizabeth he was restored to his old rectory, but the strong Protestant principles which he professed hindered his advancement under a government which persecuted Puritanism. He died in 1563. He was a very voluminous writer in the Reformation controversy, and his vigor, earnestness, and erudition have kept his books in demand. They were collected in 3 vols. fol. (Lond. 1563-4), and have been recently reprinted by the Parker Society (Camb. 1843-4, 2 vols. 8vo), with a sketch of Becon’s life. —Princeton Rev. v. 504.

Beoctileth, the plain of (of peicov Baucraalai) v. r. Beoctileth = Heb. יָפֶן הָנַחֲלָה, house of slaughter), mentioned in Judith ii, 21, as lying between Nineveh and Cilicia. The name has been compared with Bac-talla (Bacrabilia), a town of Syria named by Ptolemy (ix, 33) as situated in Cissiota (v, 15); Bacitlial in the Peutinger Tables, which place it 21 miles from Antioch of Pisidia (in Frontinianus). The most important plain in this direction is the Bekaa, or valley lying between the two chains of Lebanon; and it is possible that Beccithil is a corruption of that well-known name, if, indeed, it be a historical name at all. See Mannert, All. Geog. vi, 466.—Smith, a. v.

Beed, properly יָפֶן, miluah, #region; either for rest at night, Exod. xvi. 5; 1 Sam. xiii. 15, 16; 1 Kings xvii. 2; 2 Kings xi. 10, 21, xi. 2; 2 Chron. xxii. 11; Psa. vi. 6; Prov. xxvi. 14, Mark iv. 21; Luke viii. 16; xvii. 84; or during illness, Gen. xlviii. 31; xlviii. 2; xlix. 33; 1 Sam. xxvii. 23; 2 Kings i. 4, 6, 16; iv. 82; Mark vii. 30; Rev. ii. 22; often simply a soft for ease and quiet, 1 Sam. xxviii. 23; Esther vii. 8; Amos iii. 12; vi. 14; and, not the object of the preceding, Psa. xxvii. 5. It is in 3d m. "rest;" in the Test. frequently a mere rest, consisting of a litter and coverlet, Matt. ii. 2, 6; Luke v. 18; Acts v. 15 (for which more properly the diminutive κόλπος, "couch," Luke v. 19, 24; or ἐρείπισσα, frequently occurring, usually "bed," once "couch," Acts v. 15; and once in the sense of a more permanent resting place, 1 Chron. viii. 39; Ezek. xxiv. 18; for dead bodies, 2 Sam. iii. 31; and specially of the triclinium, or dinner-bed, Esther i. 6; Ezek. xxxii. 41; "table," Mark vii. 4. Another term of frequent occurrence is יִשָּׁר, mishkab, κοίνη, which almost always has the signification of marriage-bed, or some analogous idea (except in the Chaldean equivalent, יְשָׁרָם of Dan.), and is often translated by terms expressive of that sense. To these may be added the poetic יִשָּׁר, gyn’a, Job xvii. 13; Psa. lxix. 6; cxxxii. 3; signifying the same as the preceding in Gen. xlix. 4; 1 Chron. v. 1; and "chamber" in prose, 1 Kings iv. 5, 6, 10; also יָפֶן, mateca, Isa. xxxvii. 20; and, finally, יָפֶן, or, signifying, as the derivation shows, a covered bed of more imposing style, for whatever purpose. Job vii. 13; Psa. xii. 3; cxxxii. 3; (in the original); Prov. vii. 16; Cant. i. 10; "couch" in Psa. vi. 6; Amos iii. 12; vi. 4, and properly rendered "bedestent" in Dent. iii. 11. In this last-named passage a coffee is thought by some to be meant. See GIANT.

We may distinguish between the Jewish and the Christian idea of the sleeping quarters of a bed. 1. The bedstead was not always necessary, the divan, or platform along the side or end of an Oriental room, sufficing as a support for the bedding. See Bedchamber. Yet some slight and appaorable frame seems implied among the senses of the word בַּדָּא, bedā, which is used for a "blier" (2 Sam. iii, 81), and for the ordinary bed (2 Kings iv, 10), for the litter on which a sick person might be carried (1 Sam. iii, 20; 1 Macc. vii, 28) for Jaoab's bed (2 Sam. xlvii, 31), and for the couch on which guests reclined at a banquet (Esth. i, 6). See Couch. Thus it seems the comprehensive and generic term. The proper word for a bedstead appears to be בַּדָּשׁ, bedash, used Deut. iii, 11, to describe that on which lay the giant Og, whose vast bulk and weight required one of iron. See Bedstead. 2. The substratum or bottom portion of the bed itself was limited to a mere mat, or one or more quilts. 3. Over this a quilt finer than those used for the under part of the bed. In summer, a thin blanket, or the outer garment worn by day (1 Sam. xix, 13), sufficed. This latter, in the case of a poor person, often formed the entire bedding, and that without a bedstead. Hence the law provided that it should not be kept in pledge after sunset, that the poor man might not lack his needful covering (Deut. xxiv, 13). 4. The bed-clothes. The only material mentioned for this is that which occurs 1 Sam. xix, 13, and the word used is of doubtful meaning, but seems to signify some fabric woven or plaited of goat's hair. It is clear, however, that it was something softer and adapted to lying on, than those described above. 5. In Ezra xiii, 18, occurs the word בַּדָּט, bedat (Sept. παπρικάδων), which seems to be the proper term. Such-pillows are common to this day in the East, formed of sheep's fleece or goat's skin, with a stuffing of cotton, etc. We read of a "pillow," also, in the boat in which our Lord lay asleep (Mark iv, 38) as he crossed the lake. The block of stone, such as Jacob used, was used, perhaps, for softness, but not unusual among the poorer folk, shepherds, etc. See Pillow. 6. The ornamental portions, and those which luxury added, were pillars and a canopy (Judith xiii, 9); ivory carvings, gold and silver (Joseph. Ant. xii, 21, 14), and probably mosaic work, purple and fine linens, are also mentioned as constituting parts of beds (Esth. i, 6; Cant. iii, 9, 10), where the word בַּדָּא, bedā, appears (Sept. παπρικόν), seems to mean "a litter" (Prov. vii, 16, 17; Amos xi, 4). So also are perfumes. —Smith. See Sleep.

Be'dad (Heb. בֵּיתָד, bētād, separation, otherwise for בַּדָּא, son of A'dad; Sept. Bopōd), the father of Hadad, a king in Edom (Gen. xxxvi, 33; 1 Chr. i, 46). B.C. auto 1098.

Be'dan (Heb. בֵּיתָד, bētād, signifi. doubtful; see below), the name of two men.

1. In 1 Sam. xii, 11, we read that the Lord sent as deliverers of Israel Jerubbaal, Bedan, Jephthah, Samuel. Three of these we know to have been judges of Israel, but we nowhere find Bedan among the number. The Targum understands it of Samson, and so Jerome and the generality of interpreters; but this interpretation goes on the supposition that the name should be rendered in Dan, i.e. one in Dan, or of the tribe of Dan, as Samson was. In this sense, as Kimchi observes, it would have the same force as Ben-Dan, a son of Dan, a Danite. Such an intermixture of proper names and appellatives, however, is very doubtful; and it is to be noted that Bedan is mentioned before Jephthah, whereas Samson was after him. The Septuag.

Be'deh (Heb. בֵּיתָד, bētād), the "Venerable," one of the most eminent fathers of the English Church, was born in the county of Durham, England, in 673 (between 672 and 677). His early years were spent in the monastery of St. Paul at Jarrow, and his later education was received in that of St. Peter at Wearmouth. In these two monasteries, which were not above five miles apart, he spent his life, under the rule of Benedict and Ceolfrid, who was the first abbot of Jarrow, and who, after the death of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 17), and Josue, followed by some others, thinks that the judge Jair is meant, and that he is here called Bedan to distinguish him from the more ancient Jair, the son of Manasseh. The order in which the judges are here named is not at variance with this view (1 Sam. xxxii, 41; Judg. x, 8, 4); but surely, if Jair had been really intended, he might have been called by that name without any danger of his being, in this text (where he is called a deliverer of Israel, and placed among the judges), confounded with the more ancient Jair. It is therefore most probably that Bedan is a contracted form for the name of the judge ANDOS (q.v.).

2. (Sept. Bady.) The son of Ullam, the great-grandson of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii, 17). B.C. post 1856. See the foregoing.

Bedchamber (בַּדָּא רָע, room of the bed), 2 Kings xi, 2; 2 Chron. xxiii, 11; elsewhere בַּדָּא רָע, sleeping-room, Exod. viii, 8; 2 Sam. iv, 7; 2 Kings vi, 12; Eccles. x, 20). Bedrooms in the East consist of an apartment furnished with a divan, or das, which is a slightly elevated platform at the upper end, and often along the sides of the room. On this are laid the mattresses on which the Western Asiatics sit cross-legged in the daytime, with large cushions against the wall to support the back. At night the light bedding is usually laid out upon this divan, and thus beds for many persons are easily formed. The bedding is removed in the morning, and deposited in recesses in the room made for the purpose. This is a sort of general sleeping-room for the males of the family and for guests, none but the master having access to the inner parts of the house, where alone there are proper and distinct bedchambers. In these the bedding is either laid on the carpeted floor, or placed on a low frame or bedstead. This difference between the public and private sleeping-room, which the arrangement of an Eastern household renders necessary, seems to explain the difficulties which have perplexed readers of travels, who, finding mention only of the more public dormitory, the divan, have been led to conclude that there was no other or different one. See Divan.

Oriental Sleeping Apartment.

Josephus (Ant. xii, 4, 11) mentions the bedchambers in the Arabian palace of Hycamus. The ordinary furniture of a bedchamber in private life is given in 2 Kings iv, 10. The 'bedchamber' in the Temple where Joash was hidden was probably a store-chamber for keeping beds, not a mere bedroom, and thus better adapted to conceal the fugitives (2 Kings xi, 2; 2 Chron. xxii, 11). The position of the bedchamber in the most remote and secret parts of the palace seems marked in Exod. viii, 8; 2 Kings vi, 12. See Ben. of Benedict, presided over both houses. At nineteen years of age he was made deacon, and was ordained to the priesthood, as he himself tells us, at thirty years of age, by John of Beverley, Bishop of Hagustaid (St.
Asaph), who, during the last years of his life, resided in Rome to assist him with his advice; but Bede, it appears, excused himself, and spent the whole of his tranquil life in his monastery, improving himself in all the learning of his age, but directing his more particular attention to the compilation of an Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation (Historia Ecclesiastica, etc.), the materials for which he obtained partly from chroniclers, partly from annals preserved in contemporary convent, and partly from the information of prelates with whom he was acquainted. Making allowance for the introduction of legendary material, which was the fault of the age, few works have supported their credit so long, or been so generally consulted as authentic sources. Bede published this history about the year 734, when, as he informs us, he was in his fifty-ninth year, but before this he had written many other books on various subjects, a catalogue of which he subjoined to his history. So great was his reputation, that it was said of him, "bonum est, in extremo orbis angulo nasci, et in finem orbis loco mortui." He had a multitude of scholars, and passed his life in study, in teaching others, and in prayer, thinking, like his master, John of Beverley, that the chief business of a monk was to make himself of use to others. In the year 735, shortly before Easter, he was seized by a slight illness, and died on the 26th of May. His body continued to grow worse until the 26th of May (Ascension day). He was continually active to the last, and paricularly anxious about two works: one his translation of John's Gospel into the Saxon language, the other some passages which he was extracting from the works of St. Isidore. The one he finished in due season much the worse, and his feet began to swell, yet he passed the night as usual, and continued dictating to the person who acted as his amanuensis, who, observing his weakness, said, "There remains now only one chapter, but it seems difficult to you to speak." To which he answered, "I am easy; take your pen, mend it, and write quickly." About nine o'clock he sent for some of his brethren, priests of the monastery, to divide among them some incense and other things of little value which he had preserved in a chest. While he was speaking, the young man, Wilberch, who wrote for him, said, "Master, there is but one sentence wanting to complete this chapter of St. Isidore, which you have written, and then the whole will be finished." After the scribe said, "Now it is finished.", To which he replied, "Thou hast said the truth—consummatum est.
Take up my head; I wish to sit opposite to the place where I have been accustomed to pray, and where now sitting I may yet invoke my Father." Being thus seated, according to his desire, upon the floor of his cell, he said, "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost;" and as he pronounced the last word he expired (Neander, Light in Dark Places, 162). He died, according to the best opinion, May 26th, 735, though the exact date has been contested.
The first catalogue of Bede's works, as we have before observed, we have from himself, at the end of his Ecclesiastical History, which contains all he had written before the year 731. This we find copied by Leland, who also mentions some other pieces he had met with of Bede's, and points out likewise several that passed out of his hands, though not without some document, spurious (Leland, De Script. Brit. ed. Hall, Oxford, 1709, i, 115). Bale, in the first edition of his work on British writers (4to, Gipsaw, 1548, fol. 50), mentions ninety-six treatises written by Bede, and in his last edition (fol. 1559, p. 94) swells these to one hundred and forty-five works; and declares at the close of both catalogues that there were numberless pieces besides of Bede's which he had not seen. The following is the catalogue of his writings given by Cave: 1. De Rerum Naturâ liber:—2. De Temporum Natione:—3. De Sex Etatibus Mundi (separately, at Paris, 1567; Cologne, 1587):—4. De temporibus ad Heligolandom et Anglom (Cologne, 1587);—5. De Sententia ex Cicerone et Aristotele:—6. De Proverbii:
7. De substantia elementorum:—8. Philosophia lib. IV:— de divinazione mortis et viti:—11. De Arcâ Noâ:—12.
De iniquitâ gentium:—13. Orcusia Sibyllina:—14. Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum libri v, a primo Jutae Consilii et ordinis Anglicani dictâ:—15. De gentes (Antwerp, 1550; Heidelberg, 1587; Cologne, 1601, svo; Cambridge, 1644; Paris, with the notes of Chifflet, 1611, 4to):—15. Vita S. Cuthberti:—16. Vita
S. Felicis, Vedani, Colombani, Attale, Patricii, Eus-chii, Bertalji, Arnoldi (or Arnoldi), Burgundiofora.
Of these, however, three are wrongly attributed to Bede: the life of St. Patrick is by Probus; that of St.

of 1612 is very faulty. There is also a pretty com-of bedstead is also used upon the house-tops during the season in which people sleep there. It is more than likely that Og's bedstead was of this description (Deut. iii. 11). In the times in which he lived the palm-tree was more common in Palestine than at present, and the bedsteads in ordinary use were probably formed of palm-sticks. They would therefore be incapable of sustaining any undue weight without being disjointed and bent awry, and this would dictate the necessity of making that destined to sustain the vast bulk of Og rather a rods of iron than of the middle ribs of the palm-ponds. These bedsteads are also of a length seldom more than a few inches beyond the average human stature (commonly six feet three inches), and hence the propriety with which the length of Og's bedstead is stated to convey an idea of his stature—a fact which has perplexed those who supposed there was no other bedstead than the divan, seeing that the length of the divan has no determinate reference to the stature of the persons reposing on it. There are traces of a kind of portable couch (1 Sam. xix. 15), which appears to have served as a sofa for BEE (דבורה, deborah, Gr. μίλησσα, a great various insect, of the family Apidae, order Hymenoptera, species Apis mellifica, commonly called the honey-bee, one of the most generally-diffused creatures on the globe. Its instincts, its industry, and the valuable product of its labors, have attained for it universal attention from the remotest times. A prodigious number of books have been written, periodical publications have appeared, and even learned societies have been founded, with a view to promote the knowledge of the bee, and increase its usefulness to man. Poets and moralists of every age have derived from it some of their most beautiful and striking illustrations.

The following is a mere outline of the facts ascertained by Swammerdam, Maraldi, Reaumur, Schirach, Bonnet, and Huber:—Its anatomy and physiology, comprehending the antennae, or tactors, by which it exercises at least all the human senses; the eye, full of lenses, and studded with hairs to ward off the pollen or dust of flowers, and the three additional eyes on the top of the head, giving a defensive vision upward from the cups of flowers; the double stomach, the upper performing the office of the crop in birds, and regurgitating the honey, and the lower secreting the wax into various sacklets; the baskets on the thighs for carrying the pollen; the hooked feet; the union of chemical and mechanical perfection in the sting; its organs of progressive motion; its immense muscular strength:—the different sorts of bees inhabiting a hive, and composing the most perfect form of insect society, from the stately venerated queen-regnant, the mother of the whole population and their leader in migrations, down to the drone, each distinguished by its peculiar form and occupations:—the rapidity of their multiplication; the various transitions from the egg to the perfect insect; the amazing deviations from the usual laws of the animal economy; the means by which the loss of a queen is repaired, amounting to the literal creation of another; their architecture (taught by the great Geometrician, who made all things by number, weight, and measure), upon the principles of the most refined geometrical problem; their streets, magazines, royal apartments, houses for the citizens; their care of the young, consultations and precautions in sending forth a new colony; their military process, fortifications, and discipline; their attachment to the hive and the common interest, yet patience under private wrongs; the subordination of labor, by which thousands of individuals co-operate without confusion in the construction of magnificent public works; the use they serve, as the promoting of the fructification of bed from sitting furniture among the Orientals; the same article being used for nightly rest and during the day. This applies both to the divan and bedstead in all its forms, except perhaps the litter. There was also a garden-watcher's bed, יְשָׁבוּת, melunah, render-flowers; the amazing number and precision of their \textit{insulae}, and the capability of modifying these by circumstances, so far as to raise a doubt whether they be not endowed with a portion, at least, of intelligence resembling man.

The bee is first mentioned in Deut. 1, 44, where Moses alludes to the irresistible vengeance with which bees pursue their enemies. A similar reference to their fury in swarms is contained in Psa. cviii, 12. The powerlessness of man under the united attacks of these insects is well illustrated. Pliny says that bees were driven away from hives in some parts of Crete that the inhabitants were compelled to forsake their homes, and Zelian records that some places in Sicthia were formerly inaccessible on account of the swarms of bees with which they were infested. Mr. Park (\textit{Tranels}, ii, 87) relates that at Doofroo, some of the people, being in search of honey, unfortunately disturbed a swarm of bees, which came out in great numbers, attacked both men and beasts, obliged them to fly in all directions, so that he feared an end had been put to his journey, and that one ass died the same night, and another the next morning. Even in England the stings of two exasperated hives have been known to kill a horse in a few minutes.

In Judg. xiv, 5-8, it is related that Samson, aided by supernatural strength, rent a young lion that warred against him as he would have rent a kid, and that "after a time," as he returned to \textit{take his wife}, he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion, "and, behold, there was nothing but the head, and the legs, and the hands, and the carcass of the lion." It has been hastily concluded that this narrative favors the mistaken notion of the ancients, possibly derived from misunderstanding this very account, that bees might be engendered in the dead bodies of animals (Virgil, \textit{Georg.}, iv), and ancient authors are quoted to testify to the aversion of bees to flesh, unclean meats, and filthy places. But it may readily be perceived that it is not said that the bees were \textit{bred} in the body of the lion. Again, the frequently-recurring phrase "after a time," literally "after days," introduced into the text, proves that at least sufficient time had elapsed for all the flesh of the animal to have been removed by birds and beasts of prey, ants, etc. The Syriac version translates "the bony carcass." Bochart remarks that the Hebrew phrase sometimes signifies a \textit{whole year}, and in this passage it would seem likely to mean this, because such was the length of time which usually elapsed between espousals and a marriage contract; ver. 7, 8. Compare Gen. iv, 3; xxv, 35; Lev. xxv, 29, 30; Judg. xi, 4; comp. with ver. 40; 1 Sam. i, 8; comp. with ver. 7, 20; and 1 Sam. ii, 10; and 1 Sam. xxvii, 7. The circumstance that \textit{honey} was found in the carcass as well as bees shows that sufficient time had elapsed since possession of it for all the flesh to be removed. Nor is such an abode for bees, probably in the skull or thorax, more unsuitable than a hollow in a rock, or in a tree or in the ground, in which we know they often reside, or those clay nests which they build for themselves in Brazil. Nor is the fact without parallel. Herodotus (v, 14) relates that a swarm of bees took up their abode in the skull of one Silius, an ancient invader of Cyprus, which they filled with honey-combs, after the inhabitants had suspended it over the gate of their city. A similar story is told by Aldrovandus (\textit{De Insectis}, i, 110) of some bees that inhabited and built their combs in a human skeleton in a tomb in a church at Verona.—In Esclus, xi, 3, the production of honey by bees was already esteemed as food. Honey must have been very common in Palestine to justify the title given to it of a land flowing with milk and honey. They are still abundantly there (\textit{Shaw, Tran.}, p. 292 sq.; Oudemans, \textit{Samml.}, vi, 156), and mentioned in the Talmud (\textit{Chethim}, xi, 7; \textit{Sabb.}, xxiv, 3). See Philo, \textit{Opit.,} ii, 633; Bochart, iii, 552. See \textit{Honey}.

The reference to the bee in Isa. vii, 18, has been misunderstood: "The Lord shall ha\textit{a} for the fly that is in the uttermost parts of the river of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria." Here the fly and the bee are no doubt personifications of those infernal minions of Israel, the Egyptians and Assyrians, whom the Lord threatened to excite against his disobedient people. But the \textit{hissing} for them has been interpreted, even by modern writers of eminence, as involving "an allusion to the practice of calling \textit{out the bees from their hives}, by a hissing or whistling sound, to their labor in the fields, and summoning them to return when the beehives begin to lower, or the shadowless evenings of evening to fall" (\textit{Dr. Harris's Natural History of the Bible, London}, 1825). No one has offered any proof of the existence of such a custom, and the idea will itself seem sufficiently strange to all who are acquainted with the habits of bees. The true allusion is, no doubt, to the custom of the people of the East, and even of many parts of Europe, of calling the attention of any one in the street, etc., by a significant \textit{hiss}, or rather \textit{hata}, as Lowth translates the word both here and in Isa. v, 26, but which is generally done in this country by a short significant \textit{km!} or other exclamations. Of the \textit{hissing}, it is rather the idea of setting a bug on any object. Hence the sense of the threatening is, I will direct the hostile attention of the Egyptians and Assyrians against you.—KITTO.

In the Septuagint version there is an allusion to the bee, immediately after that of the ant (Prov. vi, 9), which may be thus rendered—"Or go to the bee, and learn how she builds her cells; and she work she produces; whose labors kings and common people use for their health. And she is desired and praised by all. And though weak in strength, yet prizing wisdom, she prevails." This passage is not now found in any Hebrew copy, and Jerome informs us that it was wanting in his time. Neither is it contained in the Septuagint version except the Arabic. It is nevertheless quoted by many ancient writers, as Clem. \textit{Alex. Strob.}, lib. i; \textit{Origen, in Num. Hom.}, 27, and in \textit{Iust. Hier.}, ii, 2; \textit{Basili, Hexameron, Hom.}, 8; \textit{Ambrose}, v, 21; \textit{Jerome, in Exe. iii.; Theodoret, De Proistor.}, \textit{Orat.} 3; \textit{Antiochus, Abbas Sabas, Hom.}, 38; and \textit{John Damascenus}, ii, 89. It would seem that it was in the Heb. copy used by the Greek translators. The ant and the bee are mentioned together by many writers, because of their similar habits of industry and economy. For the natural history and habits of the bee, see the \textit{Penny Cyclopedia, x. v.} See \textit{Swarm}.

\textbf{Beecham, John D.D.,} an eminent English Methodist minister, was born in Lincolnshire, 1787. Converted at an early age, he united with the Methodists, and thereby lost the patronage of some friends who designed to educate him for the ministry in the Established Church. In 1815 he entered the Wesleyan ministry, and for sixteen years he labored in circuits with growing usefulness and esteem. His studious habits enabled him early to lay deep foundations in theological knowledge, and his fidelity in his work was equal to the breadth of his acquisitions. In 1831 he was appointed one of the general secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and in this highly responsible office he continued to labor, with the entire confidence of the Church, up to the time of his death. In administering foreign missions he conducted large masses of business with careful attention to detail; and it is not too much to say that the wonderful success of the Methodist missions during the last quarter of a century is due largely to his skill and diligence. In 1850 he visited the eastern provinces of British North America, and died April 22, 1856. He wrote many of the missionary sermons, and also the \textit{Constitution of Wesleyan Methodism} (Lond. 1850, 8vo.), \textit{Wesleyan Ministry}; (Lond. 1856), p. 30; \textit{Wesleyan Maga-}\textit{zine,} July, 1856.

formed Church, was born near Peters burg, Adams Co., Penn., May 2d, 1799, and studied first at an academy in Hagerstown, Md., and afterward in Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, Penn.; pursued his theological studies first at Princeton Seminary, and afterward continued at the University of the State of Pennsylvania. He studied the language, in the newly-established Theological Seminary of the German Reformed Church, then located at Carlisle, Penn. He was licensed and ordained in 1826. He immediately took charge of the German Reformed Church of Shepherdstown, Va., together with several affiliated congregations. His health was always feeble, and in 1831, he spent the winter of 1830-31 in the South, in the service of the American Sunday School Union. He died July 15th, 1831. Though his life and the period of his labors were brief, such were his piety and zeal that few ministers are more sac圣地 remembered in the German Reformed Church. He preached both in the German and English languages.

Beecher, Lyman, D.D., an eminent Presbyter-ian minister, was born at New Haven, Conn., October 12th, 1775. His father, David Beecher, was a blacksmith, "a strong, positive character, whose energy and great dark head gave him a celebrity in all the country round. As boy he was placed with his uncle, Lot Benton, to learn farming, but it was soon found that his bent did not lie that way, and he was sent to Yale College, where he graduated A.B. in 1797. During his college career he earned no distinction by scholarly acquirements, but was early noticed as a remarkably vigorous and original thinker and reasoner. In a debate on baptism, started among the students, he took the Baptist side, 'because, as he said, 'no one else would take it.' He studied theology with Dr. Dwight for one year, and was licensed to preach by the New Haven West Association, and was ordained in 1799. He was installed as pastor at East Hampton, Long Island, where he remained eleven years, at a salary of $800 a year. In 1810 he removed to Litchfield, Conn., then the seat of a famous law-school, in which many of the statesmen of the last generation were trained. Here he spent sixteen years of indefatigable pastoral labor, and here, too, he wrote his famous 'Six Sermons on Intemperance,' which were suggested by the sudden downfall of two of his most intimate friends. In 1826 he accepted a call to the Hanover Street Church, Boston, where he spent six years of immense activity and popularity, distinguished also by the boldness and apostolic power which for him was characteristic. In 1832 he accepted the presidency of Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, in which service, and that of the Second Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, he remained during twenty eventful years. In 1833 seventy students withdrew from the seminary on account of a stupid rule, adopted by the trustees in Dr. Beecher's absence, with regard to the discussion of slavery, and this succession laid the foundation of Oberlin College. Oddly enough, Dr. Beecher, himself an abolitionist, and the father of Abolitionists, was one of those who first hesitated to accept the title. The doctrine of views of Dr. Beecher has always been moderately Calvinistic, and he was charged by some of the stronger Calvinists with heresy. A trial ensued, ending in 1835, by the adoption of resolutions to which Dr. Beecher assented; but the controversy went on until last the Presbyterian Church (q. v.) was finally divided. In 1838 he resigned the presidency of the seminary and returned to Boston. His declining years were spent in Brooklyn, where he died Jan. 10th, 1863. He was three times married, and was the father of thirteen children, of whom several have risen to eminence: Edward, Henry Ward, Charles, and Thomas as preachers, and Catharine and Harriet (Mrs. Stowe), the author of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin') as writers. He had a vigorous organization, both physical and mental, and was equally noted for boldness and kindness. As an orator, he was one of the most peculiar, brilliant, and effective of his day. By nature he was a strong reasoner, yet he reasoned out of the style of his orator, however.

ing energy of a commissioned prophet. The prevalence of dangerous energy depressed and vexed his spirit till it found relief in plans, protests, and movements which were felt through New England. As a theologian he was eminently practical, and his views were moulded by a constant reference to its manifest adaptation to the great end for which a revelation was given to man." His autobiography and life, edited by the Rev. Charles Beecher, appeared in 1864-5 (N. Y. 2 vols. 12mo). His writings, chiefly sermons, temperance essays, lectures, and review articles, were edited substantially, and published under his own supervision, in the Works of Lyman Beecher, D.D. (Boston, 1852, 3 vols. 8vo; vol. i, Lectures on Political Atheism; vol. ii, Sermons; vol. iii, Views in Theology).—Wilson, Prebysternon Almanac, 1861; Amer. Bee. See Ox; Food.

In the parallel lists (1 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 8) he is called by the equivalent name Eliada, Εἰλας, being, perhaps, originally in the name rather than Eliada, as Bēshilada is. See Eliada.

Bēsīl’aros (Bēsilrapo, one of the chief Israelites ("gilders") that returned from Babylon with Ezra and the remnant to Jerusalem (1 Esdr. i. 8); evidently the Bishilas (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii; Neh. vii. 7).

Besīlth’smus (Bēsilthumus, Vulg. Balsilthum), given as the name of an officer of Artaxerxes residing in Palestine (1 Esdr. ii, 16, 25); evidently a corruption of בְּשִׁלְתָּם, lord of judgment, A. V. "chancellor," the title of Rehum, the name immediately before it (Ezra iv. 8).

Bezīzub (Bēzizōba, Belezkelt) is the name assigned (Matt. x. 25; xii. 24; Mark iii. 24; Luke xi. 15 sq.) to the prince of the demons. It is remarkable that, amid all the demonology of the Talmud and rabbinical writings, this name should be exclusively confined to the New Testament. There is no doubt that the reading Beelzebul is the one which has the support of almost every critical authority; and the name Beelzebub of Isaiah (xxvi. 21) (if indeed it is not a corruption, as Michaelis thinks, Suppl. p. 205), and of the Vulgate, and of some modern versions, has probably been accommodated to the name of the Philistine god Baalzebul (q. v.). Some of those who consider the latter to have been a reverential title for that god believe that Beelzebul is a wild corruption of it, in order to make it contemptible. It is a fact that the Jews are very fond of turning words into ridicule by such changes of letters as will convert them into words of contemptible signification (e. g. Sarch, Beth-aven). Of this usage Lightfoot gives many instances (Hor. Hebr. ad Matth. xii. 24). Beelzebul, then, is considered to mean בֵּשִׁלְתָּם, i. q. dang-god. Some connect the term with בְּשִׁלְתָּם,habitation, thus making Beelzebul = בְּשִׁלְתָּם (Matt. x. 25), the lord of the abode, whether as the "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2), or as the prince of the world (Paulus quoted by Olshausen, Comment. in Matt. x. 25), or as inhabiting human bodies (Schleusner, Lex. s. v.), or as occupying a mansion in the seventh heaven, like Satan in Oriental mythology (Moore, Plants, 1:27). He supposed that which Baalzebul represented, was the Scarrhemos pellidularus, or daughett beetle, in which case Baalzebul and Beelzebul might be used indifferently. — KITTO, s. v.; Smith, s. v. Be’er (Heb. Beer, בֵּית, a well), a local proper name, denoting, whether by itself or in composition, Beer-, the presence of an artificial well of water. See WELL. It was thus distinguished from the frequent prefix Ex- (q. v.), which designated a natural spring. There were two places known by this name simply. See the compounds in their alphabetical order.

1. (With the art., בֵּית נֶגֶר; Sept. או φιλιπός.) A place in the desert, on the confines of Moab, where the Hebrew princes, by the direction of Moses, dug a well with their staves, being the forty-fourth station of the Hebrews in their wanderings from Egypt to Canaan (Num. xxxi. 16-18). It seems to have been situated in the extreme north of the plain Arnon far north-east of Diben. See EXODE. The "wilderness" (בֵּית נֶגֶר), which is named as their next starting-point in the last clause of ver. 18, may be that before spoken of in 13, or it may be a copyist's mistake for בֵּית נֶגֶר. So the Sept., who read καὶ παρὰ φιλιπός— "and from the well," i. e. "from Beer." Probably the same place is called more fully Beer-elim in Is. xv. 8. (See Ortolb, De fonte balsae fuso, Lpz. 1718.) According to the tradition of the Targumists—a tradition adopted by the apostolical Church (1 Cor. x. 4), this was one of the appearances, the last before the entrance into the Holy Land, of the water of which had "followed" the people, from its first arrival at Rehobim, through their wanderings. The water, so the tradition appears to have run, was granted for the sake of Miriam, her merit being that at the peril of her life, she had watched the ark in which lay the infant Moses. It followed the march over mountains and into valleys, encircling the entire camp, and furnishing water to every man at his own tent door. This it did till her death (Num. xxx. 11), at which time it disappeared for a season, apparently rendering a special act necessary on such future occasions for its evocation. The striking of the rock at Kadesh (Num. xxx. 10) was the first of these; the digging of the well at Beer by the princes of the tribes, the second. Miriam's well at last found a home in a gulf or recess in the sea of Galilee, where at certain seasons its water flowed, and was resorted to for several purposes (Targums of Onkelos and Pseudo-Jon., Num. xxx. 11; xx. 18, and also the quotations in Lightfoot on John vi. 4,)—Smith, s. v.

2. (Sept. Vat. Baisip.) The Alex. entirely alters the passage—καὶ ἐγ关键是 μὲν ἀνθρώπῳ ἐν δῶμα καὶ ἐγ关键是 μὲν ἂν ἀνθρώπῳ "Papai; Vulg. in Benv.) A town in the tribe of Judah, to which Jotham fled for fear of Abimelech (Judg. ix. 21). Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Baisip, Bero) place Beer near eight Roman miles (about 12 English) from Eleutheropolis; perhaps the well near Deir Dabban. By many this place is identified with Beeroth (q. v.).

Beu’ra (Heb. Beera, בֵּית נֶגֶר, a Chaldaic form = the well; Sept. Beroi), the last son of Zophah, a descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37). B.C. long post 1612.

Be’er-thah (Heb. Beera, בֵּית נֶגֶר, l. q. Beera, the well; Sept. Beroi v. Beroi), the son of Daal, a prince (בֵּית נֶגֶר) of the tribe of Reuben, carried into captivity by the Assyrian Tiglath-Pileser (1 Chron. vi. 7). B.C. cir. 738.

Be’er-e’lim (Heb. Be’er E’lim, בֵּית עֵמֶל, well of heros; Sept. τοῦ φιλιπός τοῦ Αἰλίσσα; Vulg. puteus E’lim), a spot named in Is. xv. 8, as on the "border of Moab," apparently the south, Egilam being at the north end of the Dead Sea. The name points to the well dug by the chiefs of Israel on their approach to the promised land, close by the "border of Moab" (Num. xxxi. 16; comp. Deut. xiii. 13). It corresponds with the suggestion of Gesenius (Jes. p. 533). See Beer simply. Beer-Elim was probably chosen by the prophet out of other places on the boundary on account of the similarity between the sound of the name and that of הַעֵמֶל—the "howling," which was to reach even to that remote point (Ewald, Prop. p. 283).—Smith, s. v.

Be'eri (Heb. Beer'î, בֵּאֵרִי, font., according to Gesen.; אֶלֶפְה'רֵן, according to Forst.; Sept. Beirô in Gen., Beirô in Hos.), the name of two men.

1. The father of Judith, one of the wives of Esaü (Gen. xxvi, 34). B.C. ante 1693. See Esaü. Judith, daughter of Beerit, is the same person that is called in the genealogical table (Gen. xxxvi, 2) Abihalama, daughter of Anah, and consequently Beerit and Anah must be the same person. See Anah. Yet Beerit is spoken of as a Hittite, while Anah is called a Horite and also a Hivite. See Anah. It is agreed on all hands that the name Horite (הָרִית) signifies one who dwells in a hole or cave, a Troglodyte; and it seems in the highest degree probable that the inhabitants of Mount Seir were so designated because they inhabited the numerous caverns of that mountainous region. The name, therefore, does not designate them according to their race, but merely according to their mode of life, to whatever race they might belong. Of their race we know nothing, except, indeed, what the conjunction of these two names in reference to the same individual may teach us; and from this case we may fairly conclude that these Troglodytes had longed in part, at least, to the widely-extended Canaanitish tribe of the Hittites. On this supposition the difficulty vanishes, and each of the accounts gives us just the information we might expect. In the narrative, where the stress is laid on Esaü's wife being of the race of Canaan, her father is called a Hittite; while in the genealogy, where the stress is on Esaü's connection by marriage with the previous occupants of Mount Seir, he is most naturally and properly described under the more precise term Horite.—Smith, s. v. See Horte; Hivite; Hittite.

2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. i, 1). B.C. ante 725.

Be'ēr-lahā'-roi (Heb. Beer' laha' ro', בֵּאֵר לָחָהָרֹי, signifying, according to the explanation in the text where it first occurs, well of [or, life of] vision [or, of the living and seeing God], i.e. survivorship after beholding the theophany; but, according to the natural derivation, well of the check-bone [rock] of vision; Sept. in Gen. xvi, 14, φαντασμόν οὐκ εἰσοδον τινὸς; in Gen. xxiv, 62, τὸ φαντασμὸν τῆς ὑπάρχουσας; Vulg. puteus evenista et evenista me), a well, or rather a living spring (A. V. "fountain," comp. ver. 7), between Beer-sheba and Beer-naamah, in the desert area of Shur," therefore in the "south country" (Gen. xxiv, 62), which seems to have been so named by Hagar because God saw her (הָרִית) there (Gen. xvi, 14). From this the etymology not being in agreement with the formation of the name (more legitimately, בֵּאֵר לָחָהָרֹי), it has been suggested (Gesenius, Thes. p. 176) that the origin of the name is Lehî (q. v.) (Judg. xv, 9, 19). the scene of Samson's adventure, which was not far from this neighborhood. By this well Isaac dwelt both before and after the death of his father (Gen. xxiv, 62; xxv, 11). In both these passages the name is given in the A. V. as "the well Lahai-roi." Mr. Rowland announces the discovery of the well Lahai-roi at Moqil or Molaohi, a station on the road to Beer-sheba, ten hours south of Rübêibeh, near which is a hole or cavern bearing the name of Beit Heger (Williams, Holy City, l. 465); but this requires confirmation. This well is possibly the same with that by which the life of Ishmael was preserved on a subsequent occasion (Gen. xxi, 19), but which, according to the Moslems, is the well Zem-zem at Mecca.—Smith.

Be'roth (Heb. Beer'óth, בֵּרֹת, wells; Sept. Βορώθ, Βορώζη, Βορώζης), one of the four cities of the Hivites who subdued Joshua into a treaty of peace with them, the other three being Gibeon, Chephirah, and Kirjath-jearim (Josh. ix, 17). Beeroth was with the rest of these towns allotted to Benjamin (Josh. xiii, 25), in whose possession it continued at the time of David, the murderers of Ishbosheth being named as belonging to it (2 Sam. iv, 2). From the notice in this place (ver. 5), it would appear that the original inhabitants had been forced from the town, and had taken refuge in Kirjath-jearim (Josh. xii, 41), perhaps near the Hittite city. Beerot is once more named with Chephirah and Kirjath-jearim in the list of those who returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 25; Neh. vii, 29; 1 Esdr. v. 19). Besides Baanah and Rechab, the murderers of Ishbosheth, with their father Rimmon, we find Nahash and "the Berethites" (2 Sam. xxiii, 57), or "the Berethite" (1 Chron. xvi, 39), one of the "mighty men" of David's guard.—Smith, s. v. See also BEEROTH-BEN-JAANAN.

The name of Beerot (see Berot) is the plural of Beer, and it has therefore been taken by many for the same place. Eusebius and Jerome, however, both distinguish it from Beer (Oromasce, s. v. Bura), although there has been much misunderstanding of their language respecting it (see Roland, Palest. p. 618, 619). The former says that it could be seen in passing from Jerusalem to Nicopolis, at the seventh mile; a description that to this day is true of a place still bearing the corresponding name of el-Bireh, which, since Maundrell's time, has been located on this site near the locality named in the Bible (pp. 25).

According to Robinson (Researches, ii, 132), the traveller in that direction sees el-Bireh on his right after a little more than two hours from Jerusalem. Jerome, on the other hand, apparently misconceiving Eusebius as meaning that Beeroth was on the road from which he says it is visible, changes "Neopolis" to "Neapolis," which still leaves the distance and direction sufficiently exact. Bireh is mentioned under the name of Birz or Brocard (vii, 278), in whose time it was held by the Templars. By the Crusaders and the later ecclesiastics it was erroneously confounded with the ancient Michmash. Bireh is situated on the ridge, running from east to west, which bounds the northern prospect, as beche'd from Jerusalem and its vicinity, and may be seen from a great distance north and south. It is now a large village, with a population of 700 Moslems. The houses are low, and many of them have but one room. Many local tradition and various substructions evince the antiquity of the site; and there are remains of a fine old church of the time of the Crusades (Richter, Wallfahrten, p. 54). According to modern local tradition it was the place at which the parents of "the child Jesus" discovered that he was not among their "company" (Luke ii, 45-46); and it is a short distance of el-Bireh that the children of Israel, on this day the customary resting-place for caravans going northward, at the end of the first day's journey from Jerusalem (Stanley, Pict. p. 215; Lord Nugent, ii, 112).

Be'roth-be'ne-Ja'akan (Heb. Beroth' bene'-Yaanak', בּרֹת בְּנֵי יָאָנָא, wells of the sons of Jaakan; Sept. Βορώθων ἡμών τοῖς ζητημένοις, a place through which the Israelites twice passed in the desert, being their twenty-seventh and thirty-third station on the way from Egypt to Canaan (Num. xxxiii, 31, 32; Deut. x, 7). See EXOD. From here they compassed theDesert of Kadesh-barnea, thence to Zin, and presented the tract including the modern fountains in that region, called Ain el-Ghamr, Ain el-Weibeh, el-Hufeyli, el-Bweiridah, etc., lying within a short distance of each other. Jaakan (or Akan) was a descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi, 7, 8; 1 Chron. i, 42), and the territory designated by the name of...

children may therefore naturally be sought in this vicinity (see Brown's Ordo Secularum, p. 270). Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 588) inclines to identify this place with the one of the same name in the journeys of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) that Beeroth Bene Jaakan was extant in their day ten Roman miles from Petra, on the top of the mountain—probably a conjectural tradition. Schwartz's conjecture of Wady and Jebel Arasf es-Nabak in the interior of the desert east of this place, under the name of Anaka (Palest. p. 219), is unworthy of farther notice.

Be'erotith (Heb. Be'erotith, ירבדות; Sept. δυσσυνίας κτ. Βορδοτίας), an inhabitant of Beznor (q. v.) of Benjamin (2 Sam. iv. 2; xxiii. 37).

Be'er-sheba (Heb. Beer-Sheba, בֵּית-שֶׁבֶת, בְּתקָ֣ב, well of meaking, or well of seven; Sept. in Gen. φίλαι τοῦ φριδαμίου τοῦ φρι-زان σ; in Josh. and later books, דבשא; Josephus, Ant. i, 12, 1, דבשא; which he immediately interprets by δομος φίλαι), the name of one of the oldest places in Palestine, and which formed the southern limit of the country. There are two accounts of the origin of the name. According to the first, the well was dug by Abraham, and the name given, because there with Moserael, on the road to Mamre, the king of his shecaltines, the arens "saw" (בֶּן) both of them (Gen. xxii. 18). But the compact was ratified by the setting apart of seven ewe lambs; and as the Hebrew word for "seven" is בֶּן, Beersheba, it is equally possible that this is the meaning of the name. The other narrative ascribes the origin of the name to an occurrence almost precisely similar, in which both Abimelech, the king of the Philistines, and Phichol, his chief captain, are again concerned, with the difference that the person on the Hebrew side of the transaction is Isaac instead of Abraham (Gen. xxvi. 81-83). Here there is no reference to the "seven" lambs, and we are left to infer the derivation of שבעה (בֶּן), Shabath, not "Shebah," as in the Auth. Vers.), from the mention of the "sawing" (בֶּן) in ver. 31. These two accounts, however, appear to be adjusted by the statement in ver. 18 that this was one of the wells originally dug by Abraham, to which Isaac, on reopening them, assigned the same name as a token of his father's. Beersheba appears to have been a favorite abode of both these patriarchs. After the digging of the well Abraham planted a "grove" (בֶּן, K'eshel) as a place for the worship of Jehovah, such as constituted the temples of those early times; and here he lived until the sacrifice of Isaac, and for a long time afterward (xxi. 33-xxii. 1, 19). This seems to imply the growth of the place into a considerable town. Here also Isaac was dwelling at the time of the transference of the birthright from Esau to Jacob (xxvi. 33; xxviii. 10), and from the patriarchal encampment round the wells of his grandfather Jacob set forth on the journey to Mesopotamia which changed the course of his whole life. Jacob does not appear to have revisited the place until he made it one of the stages of his statement to Egypt. He then halted there to offer sacrifice to "the God of his father," doubtless under the sacred grove of Abraham. From this time till the conquest of the country we only catch a momentary glimpse of Beersheba in the lists of the "cities" in the extreme south of the land (20) given to the tribe of Simeon (xxx. 2; 1 Chr. iv. 28). Samuel's sons were appointed deputy judges for the southernmost districts in Beersheba in the 1 Sam. vii. 2), its distance no doubt including its among the number of the "holy cities" (Sept., to which he himself went in circuit every year (vii. 16). By its position on the boundary and the trade routes, as most the southerly place of the country. Its position, as the place of arrival and departure for the caravans trading between Palestine and the countries lying in that direction, would naturally lead to the formation of a town round the wells of the patriarchy, and the great Egyptian trade began quite at once. increased its importance. Hitherto Jacob's census extended (2 Sam. xxiv. 7; 1 Chr. xxi. 2), and here Elias bade farewell to his confidential servant (וֹדַּ֣ע בֵּית-שֶׁבֶת) before taking his journey across the desert to Sinai (1 Kings xix. 3). From Dan to Beersheba (Judg. xx. 1, etc.), or from Beersheba to Dan (1 Chr. xxi. 2, 2; 2 Sam. xxiv. 2), saw the place of the Promised Land; just as from Gaba to Beersheba (2 Kings xxiii. 8), or from Beersheba to Mount Ephraim (2 Chr. xix. 4), was that for the southern kingdom after the disruption. After the return from the captivity the formula is narrowed still more, and becomes "from Beersheba to the Valley of Hinnom" (Neh. xi. 30). One of the wives of Haziah, king of Judah, Ziliah, mother of Josiah, was a native of Beersheba (2 Kings xii. 1; 2 Chr. xxiv. 1). From the incidental references of Amos, we find that, like Bethel and Gilgal, the place was, in the time of Uzziah, the seat of an idolatrous worship, apparently connected in some intimate manner with the northern kingdom (2 Kings xvi. 14). These references are so slight that nothing can be gathered from them, except that, in the latter of the two passages quoted above, we have perhaps preserved a form of words or an adjection used by the worshippers, "Live the way of Beersheba!" After this, with the mere mention of the Beersheba villages round the place, they were reinhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 30), the name dies entirely out of the Bible records. In the New Testament it is not once mentioned; nor is it referred to as then existing by any writer earlier than Eusebius and Jerome, in the fourth century, who describe it as a large village (Onomast. οἰκία πρώτης, παράδεισος, and the seat of a Roman garrison. The latter class, where (Quast. ad Gen. xvii. 20) calls it a "town" (οπιδιομ). In the centuries before and after the Moslem conquest it is mentioned among the episcopal cities of Palestine (Relland, Palest. p. 620), but none of its bishops are anywhere named. The site seems to have been almost forgotten (see Deir el-Hirigs, Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 1070) till the fourteenth century, when Sir John Maunideville, Rudolf de Suchem, and William de Baldensel recognised the name at a place which they passed on their route from Sinai to Hebron. It was then uninhabited, but some of the churches were still standing. From that time Dr. Robinson's first visit of Dr. Robinson the place remained unvisited and unknown, except for the slight notice obtained by Secten from the Arabe (Zach's Mom. Corresp. xvii. 143). Dr. Robinson gives a clear idea of the southernmost district of Palestine, in which is Beersheba, and with which the book of Genesis has connected so many interesting associations. Coming from the south, he emerged from the desert by a long and gradual ascent over swelling hills scantily covered with grass. The summit of this ascent afforded a view over a broad barren tract, bounded on the horizon by the mountains of Judah south of Hebron: "We now felt that the desert was really over, and the rocks and sand led us out upon an open unendling country; the shrubs ceased, or nearly so; green grass was seen along the lesser water-courses, and almost greensward; while the gentle hills, covered in ordinary seasons with grass and rich pasture, were now burnt over with drought. In three hours we ascended the little narrow valley, a wide water-course or bed of a torrent, running here W.S.W., upon whose northern side, close upon the bank, are two deep wells, still called Bir el-Saba, the ancient Beersheba. We had entered the borders of Palestine!" (Researches, i, 801). There are at present considerable springs on the spots of the ancient wells, and the valley is now all one. The former, apparently the only ones seen by Robinson, lie just a hundred yards apart, and are so placed as to be visible from a considerable distance (Bonar, BEETSHERAH

Land of Prom. p. 1). The larger of the two, which lies to the east, is, according to the careful measurements of Dr. Robinson, 15½ feet diam., and at the time of his visit (Apr. 12) was 444 feet to the surface of the water; the mosaicry which encloses the well reaches downward for 24 feet. The smaller well is 10½ feet diam., and was 42 feet to the water. The curb-stones round the mouth of both wells are worn into deep grooves by the action of the ropes of so many centuries, and "look as if frilled or fluted all round." Round the larger well there are nine, and round the smaller five large stone troughs, some much worn and broken, others nearly entire, lying at a distance of 10 or 12 feet from the edge of the well. There were formerly ten of these troughs at the larger well. The circle around is carpeted with a sward of fine short grass, with crocuses and lilies (Bonar, p. 5, 6, 7). The water is excellent, the best, as Dr. Robinson emphatically records, which he had tasted since leaving Sinal. The five lesser wells, apparently the only ones seen by Van de Velde, are, according to his account and the casual notice of Bonar, in a group in the bed of the wady, not on its north bank, and at a great distance from the other two. No rains are at first visible; but, on examination, foundations of former dwellings are discovered, dispersed looses over the low hills, to the north of the wells, and in the hollows between. They seem to have been built chiefly of round stones, although some of the stones are squared and some hewn, suggesting the idea of a small straggling city. There are no trees or shrubs near the spot. The site of the wells is nearly midway between the southern end of the Dead Sea and the Mediterrenean at Raphae, or twenty-seven miles south-east from Gaza, and about the same distance south west by west from Hebron (20 Roman miles in the Onomast.; comp. Josephus, Ant. viii, 13, 7). Its present Arabic name, Bir ez-Sela, means "well of the seven," which some take to be the explanation of the name of Ez-Zeila, in allusion to the seven ewe-lambs which Abraham gave to Abimelech in token of the oath between them. There is no ground for rendering it by "seven wells," as some have done.—Smith, s. v.; Kitt, s. v. See SEBAH.

BEETSHERAH (Heb. Beetsheerah, בְּשֶׁהֶר, prob. house of Astarte; Sept. Ἠ βουταπι ν ῶ. r. Buthaba; Vulg. Bosra), one of the two Levitical cities allotted to the sons of Gershom, out of the tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan (Num. xxxiv. 26; Josh. xvi. 57). In the past (Chron. vi, 71) it appears to be identical with Ashtaroth (q. v.). In fact, the name is merely a contracted form of Beth-Ashtaroth, the "temple of Ashtaroth" (Genesis, xxv. 196; comp. 175).—Smith, s. v.

BEETLE (בֵיתֵל charbol, q. d. "leaper") occurs only in Lev. xi. 22, where it is mentioned as one of four flying creeping things, that go upon all four, which have legs above their feet to leap upon the earth, which the Israelites were permitted to eat. The other three are the locust, the bald locust, and the grasshopper, respectively rendered by the Sept. βυσσόνα, μέντη, and χρις, while they translate charbol by φαρμάκων (q. d. "serpent-fighter"), which Suidas explains as being a wingless locust (ἄνθρωπος, μη ἵππος περικεί). Pliny (x. 29) and Aristotle (Hist. Anim. ix. 0) mention locusts that swing about in the air. This is the true definition of the beetle. No species of scarabaeus was ever used as food by the Jews, or perhaps any other nation. Nor does any known species answer to the generic description given in the preceding verse: "This ye may eat of every winged creeper which goeth upon four (Beets); etc., which hath two wings at the hind legs, to leap with them upon the earth." (comp. Niebuhr, Descrip. d. Arabie, Copenhagen, 1778, p. 83. Hence it is plain that the charbol is some winged creeper, which has at least four feet, which leaps with its two hind jointed legs, and which we might expect, from the permission, to find actually used as food. This description agrees exactly with the locust-tribe of insects, which are well known to have been eaten by the common people in the East from the earliest times to the present day. This conclusion is also favored by the derivation of the word, which signifies to gallop like the English grasshopper and French sauterelle. Although no key is given, the locust answers the above description of Pliny and Aristotle, and indeed, the existence of any such species is denied by Cuvier (Grand- saque's ed. of Pliny, Par. 1828, p. 451, note), yet a sort of insecnum locust is found in the genus Truxalis (scourge or cruel), inhabiting Africa and China, and comprehending many species, which hunts and preys upon insects. It is also called the Truxalis nauticus, or long-nosed. May not, then, this winged, leaping, insectivorous locust, and its various species, be "the charbol, after its kind," and the φαρμάκων of the Septuagint? or might the name have arisen from the similarity of χρις and χορός, which is striking, between Scarabaeus nauticus and the ichneumon; just as the locust generally is, at this time, called canalete by the Italians, on account of its resemblance in shape to the horse? We know that the ancients indulged in tracing the many resemblances of the several parts of locusts to those of other animals (Pomart, lier, pt. ii, lib. iv. 5, p. 476). It may be observed that it is no objection to the former and more probable supposition, that a creature which lives upon other insects should be allowed as food to the Jews, contrary to the general principle of the Mosaic law in regard to birds and quadrupeds, this having been unquestionably the case with regard to many species of fishes coming within the regulation of having "fins and scales," and known to exist in Palestine at the present time—as the perch, carp, barbel, etc. (Kitto's Physical History of Palestine, article Fishes). The fact that the charbol is never made the means of the divine chastisement (for which no locust preying upon insects could scarcely be used), concurs with this speculations. —Kitto; Smith. See LOCUST.

The beetle, however, was very common in Egypt, and is the species called by Linneaus Blatta Ephesiacus, thought by many to be mentioned in Exod. viii, 21, etc., under the name םב תב, "arab," where the A. V. renders it "swarms of flies." See FLY. Beetles are, by naturalists, styled coleopterous insects, from their horny upper wings, or "shard;" the species are exceedingly numerous, differing greatly in size and color, and being found in almost every country. The order of Coleoptera is divided into many families, of which the scarabaeidae and blatere, or common beetles and cock-chaffers, are known to every one. These creatures, like many others in the insect world, deposit their eggs in the ground, where they are hatched, and the appearance of their progeny rising from the earth is by some writers supposed to have suggested to the Egyptian priesthood the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. Certain it is that beetles were very common in Egypt, and one of them, thence styled by naturalists Scarabaeus scarab, was an object of worship; and this fact gives strength to the conjecture that this creature is meant in Exod. viii, as the sacred character of the object would naturally render its employment as a plague doubtfully terrible. Besides its being worshipped as a divinity, stones cut in the form of the beetle served as talismans among the Egyptians.
The under surface was filled with figures cut in intaglio of solar, lunar, and astral symbols and characters. They were held, according to Pliny, to inspire the soldier with courage, and to protect his person in the day of battle, and also to defend children from the malignt influence of the evil eye. There is little reason to doubt that the Hebrews learned the use of these things in Egypt, but they were prohibited by the Mosanic law. The Gnostics, among other Egyptian superstitions, adopted this notion regarding the beetle, and gems of gnostic origin are extant in this form, especially symbolical of Isis (q. v.).

_Beeve_ (בֵּכֶז, bakan), horned animals, Lev. xxii. 19, 21; Num. xxx. 28, 30, 33, 38, 44; elsewhere rendered "ox," "bullock," "herd," etc.; in Arabic, _ab_ _bakan_, cattle, herds, applicable to all Ruminantia, the camels alone excepted; but more particularly to the Bovidae and the genera of the larger antelopes. See Ox; Bull; Deer; Goat; Antelope, etc.

_Begg_ (בֵּכֶז, bakan), so rendered Psal. xxxvii. 25, elsewhere "seek," etc.; בֵּכֶז, skēz, Psal. cxix. 10; Prov. xx, 4; elsewhere "ask," etc.; _inquiri_, Luke xvi. 8; _specinere_, Mark x, 46; Luke xviii. 35; John ix. 8); _Beggar_ (בֵּכֶז, bakan), 1 Sam. ii. 8; παναγωγή, Luke xvi, 20, 22; Gal. iv. 9; both terms elsewhere "poor," etc.). The laws of Moses furnish abundant evidence that great inequality of condition existed in his time among the Hebrews, for recommendations to the rich to be liberal to their poorer brethren are frequently met with (Exod. xxiii. 11; Deut. xv. 11), but no mention is made of persons who lived as mendicants. The poor were allowed to glean in the fields and to gather whatever the land produced in the year in which it was not tilled (Lev. xix. 10; xxv. 5, 6; Deut. xxiv. 19). They were also invited to feasts (Deut. xii. 12; xiv, 29; xxxvi. 12). The Hebrew could not be an absolute pauper, his land was inalienable, except for a certain term, when it reverted to him or his posterity. And if this resource was insufficient, he could pledge the services of himself or his family for a valuable sum. Those who were indigent through bodily infirmity were usually taken care of by their kin. See Poor. In the song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 8), however, beggars are spoken of, and such a fate is predicted to the posterity of the wicked, while it shall never befall the seed of the righteous, in the Psalms (xxxvii. 35; cix. 10); so that the practice was probably then not uncommon. In the New Testament, also, we read of beggars that were blind, diseased, and maimed, who lay at the doors of the rich, by the waysides, and also before the gate of the Temple (Mark x. 46; Luke xvi. 20, 21; Acts iii. 2). But we have no reason to suppose that there existed in the time of Christ that class of persons called vagrant beggars, who present their supplications for alms from door to door, and who are found at the present day in the East, although less frequently than in the countries of Europe. That the custom of seeking alms by sounding a trumpet or horn, which prevails among a class of Mohammedan monastics, called kalender or kurnedal, prevailed also in the time of Christ, has been by some inferred from the peculiar construction of the original in Matt. vi. 2. There is one thing characteristic of those Orientals who follow the vocation of mendicants which is worthy of being mentioned; they do not appeal to the pity or to the almsgiving spirit, but to the justice of their benefactors (Job xxii. 7; xxxi. 16; Prov. iii. 27, 28). Roberts, in his _Oriental Illustrations_, p. 564, says on Luke xvi, 8 ("I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed.") "How often are we reminded of this passage by beggars when we tell them to work. They can scarcely believe their ears; and the religious mendicants, who swarm in every part of the East, look upon you with the most sovereign contempt when you give them such advice. 'I work! why, I never have done such a thing; I am not able.'" See Alms.

_Beghards_ or _Beggars_, a religious association in the Roman Church, which formed itself, in the 13th century, in the Netherlands, Germany, and France, after the example of the Beguines (q. v.), whom they closely imitated in their mode of life and the arrangement of their establishments. They supported themselves mostly by weaving, but became neither so numerous nor so popular as the Beguines. More generally than the Beguines they associated with the heretical Fraticelli (q. v.), and the "Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit." They were suppressed by the council of Vienna in 1311. Most of them joined the third orders of St. Francis and St. Dominic, but yet retained for a long time their name and mode of life. For a time they found a protector in the Emperor Louis, but new decrees were issued against them by Charles IV (1867) and Pope Urban V (1869). In 1467 they became, by taking the usual solemn vows, a monastic association, which gradually united with several congregations of the Franciscan order. Their last convents and the name itself were abolished by Pope Innocent X in 1650.

The name _Beghards_ was commonly given in the 13th and 14th centuries (just as "Pietist" and "Methodist" were afterward used) to persons who opposed or revolted from the worldly tendencies of the Roman Church. The Waldenses, Wickliffites, and Lollards, in France and England, were so named. See Neander, _Ch. Hist. iv._ 303; Mosheim, _De Beghardo et Bega._ (Lips. 1730); Mosheim, _Ch. Hist. cent. xiii. pt. ii., ch. ii, § 40. Other treatises on these orders have been written by Beier (Jen. 1710), Bruhns (Lub. 1719), Götze (ib. 1719), Ithoust (Antw. 1628). See Beguines; Beeve.

_Begging_ (בֵּכֶז, "in the beginning," literally at the head, Gen. i, 1; Sept. and New Test. _iv depyq_), besides its ordinary import, was with the Hebrews an idiomatic form of expression for eternity, q. d. _originally_. In this sense it is employed alike by Moses and (in its Greek form) by the evangelist John (i, 1). See Creation.

Our Lord is also emphatically styled the _Beginning_ BEGUARDS (Apy)c both by Paul and John (Col. i. 18; Rev. i. 8; iii. 14), and it is worthy of remark that the Greek philosophers expressed the First Cause of all things by the same word. See Loos.

Béguin, Lambert, a French heretic, lived toward the close of the 12th century. Man, he said, is able to attain to the highest degree of perfection, and may then accord to his body all he wants. He also denied the adoration of the consecrated wafer. He is also said to have preached against the corrupt life of the clergy. See BÉGUARDS and BÉGUENEAU.-Hoefler, Biographie Générale, v. 157.

Béguinage (Béguinarum domus), the residence of a society of BÉGUINAE (q. v.).

Béguine, a female association in the Roman Church. The origin of both the name and the association is doubtful. A Belgian writer in the beginning of the 13th century attributes it from a priest of Liege, Lambert Béguin. Later some beguines traced their origin to St. Begga, daughter of Pipin of Landen, though without historical grounds. Other writers have derived the name from beggen, to beg, though the Beguines have never been mendicants. A document found in the 17th century at Villedon gives the establishment of a beguinage at 1056, and seems to overthrow the hypothesis of priest Lambert being their founder; but more thorough investigations have proved it to be spurious. The pretended higher age of some German beguines rests on their being confounded with similar institutions. The Beguines, whose number at the beginning of the thirteenth century amounted to about 1500, spread rapidly over the Netherlands, France, and Germany. There were often as many as 2000 sisters in their beguinages (beguiniae, beguinerie), occupying in couples a small separate house. A hospital and church form the central points of the beguinage. The Beguines support themselves, and also furnish the chest of the community, and the support of the priests, the officers, and the hospitals, by their own industry. The president of a beguinage is called magistras, and is assisted by curators or tutors, usually mendicant friars. The vows are simple, viz., chastity and obedience to the statutes; and any beguine can be freed by leaving the community, after which she is at liberty to marry. As to dress, each beguinage chooses its particular color, brown, gray, or blue, with a white veil over the head. Black has become their general color, and to their former habits is added the shade of an inverted shell, with a long black tassel. The association made itself useful by receiving wretched females, by nursing the sick, and by educating poor children. In Germany they were therefore called aelbi-womes. Like all the monastic orders, their community was invaded by great disorders, and the synod of Fritzlar in 1244 forbade to receive any sister before her fortieth year of age. Many were also drawn into the heresies of the Fraticelli, and the whole community had to atone for it by continued persecution. Clement V, on the council of Vienna, in 1311, decreed by two bulls the suppression of the Beguines and Beghards infected with heresy; but John XXII explained these bulls as referring merely to the heretical Beghards and Beguines, and interfered in favor of the orthodox Beguines in Germany (1318) and Italy (1826). The Reformation put an end to nearly all the beguinages in Germany and Switzerland; but all the larger towns of Belgium except Brussels have still beguinages, the largest of which is that at Mechelen, which is now called Counting about 700 inmates.-Moscheim, De Beguarden et Beguinismus (Lipsia, 1790); Hallmann, Geschichte des Ursprunges der Belgischen Beguinen (Berlin, 1843). Béhead (אָרָפָק, apapk), applied to an animal, to break the neck, Deut. xxv. 6; like παλαίμων, Rev. xx. 4; but properly פְּלַשְ׀נִי, פְּלַשְׁנָאָלִים, to take off the head, 2 Sam. iv. 7; Matt. xiv. 10; Mark vi. 16, 27; Luke ix. 9), a method of taking away life, known and practised among the Egyptians (Gen. xi. 15) and Persians (Herod. ii. 74 sq.), and was also employed by the Jews as a mode of punishment, and, therefore, must have been known to the Hebrews, and there occur indubitable instances of it in the time of the early Hebrew kings (2 Sam. iv. 12; xx. 21, 22; 2 Kings iv. 5–8). It appears, in the later periods of the Jewish history, that Herod and his descendants, in a number of instances, ordered decapitation (Matt. xiv. 6–12; Acts xii. 2). The apostle Paul is said to have been martyred by beheading, as it was not lawful to put a Roman citizen to death by scourging or crucifixion. See PUNISHMENT.

Behemoth. See Böhémich.

Béheun (Heb. bekemoth, בְּהֵמוֹת, Job xl, 15; Sept. Sinopia; in Coptic, according to Jablonski, Pehemout) is regarded as the plural of בְּהֵמוֹת, behemah (usually rendered "beast" or "cattle"); but commentators are by no means agreed as to its true meaning. Among those who adopt the plural are Drusius, Grotius, Schultens, Michaei, etc., while among the advocates of the singular are Beza, Blume, S. Raphael, and Pusey. The word is used in Job (xl. 15; ver. 17; xxvii. 20), (3:8) It seems certain that an ambigulous animal is meant from the contrast between ver. 15, 20, 21, 22, and ver. 23, 24, in which the argument seems to be, "Though he feedeth upon grass," etc., like other animals, yet he liveth and delighteth in the waters, and nates are set for him there as for fishes by his great strength he placeth through. (4.) The mention of his tail in ver. 17 does not agree with the elephant, nor can any, as some have thought, signify the trunk of that animal; and (5.), though בְּהֵמוֹת may be the plural "majestatis" of בְּהֵמוֹת, beast, yet it is probably an Egyptian word signifying ecusor, put into a Semitic form, and used as a singular.

The following is a conclusion of the translation given in Job (xl, 15–24) describing the animal in question:

Lo, now, Behemoth that I have made [alike] with thee! Grass like the [meat] cattle will be eat. Lo! now, his strength [is] in his bones, Even his force [in] his sinews of his body. He can curvus his tail [only] like a cedar; The tendons of his haunches must be interlaced: His bones are as tubes of copper, His frame like a welding of iron. He is the master-piece of God: He is the one that supplieth his sword [i. e. tines]. For produce will [the] mountains bear for him; Even though [all] the animals of the field may roar Behind [his] horns will [the] wild oxen [there]. In the covert of [the] reedy marsh; Lions shall entice him his shade, Oxes of [the] brook shall enucleate him.
Behistun or Bisitun (Lat. Bagistanae; Persian, Baghistan, Place of Gardens), a ruined town of the Persian province of Irak-Ajemi, 21 miles east of Kirmaneshah, lat. 34° 18' N., long. 47° 30' E. Behistun is chiefly celebrated for a remarkable mountain, which on one side rises almost perpendicularly to the height of 1700 feet, and which was in ancient times sacred to Jupiter or to Ormuzd. According to Diodorus, Sirmias, on her march from Babylon to Ecbatana, in Media Magna, encamped near this rock, and, having cut away and polished the lower part of it, had her own likeness and those of a hundred of her guards engraved on it. She further, according to the same historian, caused the following inscription in Assyrian letters to be cut in the rock: "Semiramas having piled up one upon the other the trappings of the beasts of burden which accompanied her, ascended by these means from the plain to the top of the rock." No trace of these inscriptions is now to be found, and Sir Henry Rawlinson accounts for their absence by the supposition that they were destroyed by Khusrav Parvis when he was preparing to form this long scarped surface the back wall of his palace. Diodorus also mentions that Alexander the Great, on his way to Ecbatana from Susa, visited Behistun. But the rock is especially interesting for its cuneiform inscriptions (q. v.), which within recent years have been successfully deciphered by Sir H. Rawlinson. The principal inscription of Behistun, executed by the command of Darius, is on the north extremity of the rock, at an elevation of 300 feet from the ground, where it could not have been engraved without the aid of scaffolding, and can now only be reached by the adventurous antiquary at considerable risk to his life. The labor of polishing the face of the rock, so as to fit it to receive the inscriptions, must have been very great. In places where the stone was defective, pieces were fitted in and fastened with molten lead with such extreme nicety that only a careful scrutiny can detect the artifice. "But the real wonder of the work," says Sir H. Rawlinson, "consists in the inscriptions. For extent, for beauty of execution, for uniformity and correctness, they are perhaps unequalled in the world. After the engraving of the rock had been accomplished, a coating of silicious varnish had been laid on, to give a surrounding seas and deserts, it conveys a more sublime conception than if limited to the crocodile, an animal familiar to every Egyptian, and well known even in Palestine."—Kitt, s. v. See Hippopotamus.

But in some respects this description is more applicable to the elephant, while in others it is equally so to both animals. Hence the term behemoth, taken intensively (for in some places it is admitted to designate cattle in general), may be assumed to be a poetical personification of the great Pachydermata, or even Herbivora, wherein the idea of hippopotamus is predominant. This view accounts for the ascription to it of characters not truly applicable to one species; for instance, the tail is likened to a cedar (provided 22; really denotes the tail, which the context makes very doubtful; see Zedekiel, Iter. z. Bibl. Zool.), which is only admissible in the case of the elephant; again, "the mountains bring him forth food;" "be trusted that he can draw up Jordan," a river which elephants alone could reach: "his nose pierceth through shares," certainly more indicative of that animal's proboscis, with its extraordinary delicacy of scent and touch, ever cautiously applied, than of the obtuse perceptions of the river-horse. Finally, the elephant is far more dangerous as an enemy than the hippopotamus, which numerous pictorial sculptures on the monuments of Egypt represent as fearlessly spurred by a single hunter standing on his float of log and reeds. Yet, although the elephant is scarcely less fond of water, the description referring to manners, such as lying under the shade of willows, among reeds, in fens, etc., is more directly characteristic of the hippopotamus. The book of Job appears, from many internal indications, to have been written in Asia, and is full of knowledge, although that knowledge is not expressed according to the precise technicalities of modern science; it offers pictures in magnificent outline, without condescending to minute and labored details. Considered in this light, the expression in Psa. 1, 10, "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle (behemoth) upon a thousand hills," acquires a grandeur and force far surpassing those furnished by the mere idea of cattle of various kinds. If, then, we take this plural noun in the sense here briefly indicated, we may, in like manner, consider the Leviathan (q. v.) its counterpart, a similarly generalized term, with the idea of crocodile most prominent; and as this name indicates a twisting animal, and, as appears from various texts, evidently includes the great pythons, cetea and sharks of the clearness of outline to each individual letter, and to protect the surface against the action of the elements. This varnish is of infinitely greater hardness than the limestone rock beneath it." Washed down in some places by the rain of twenty-three centuries, it lies in consistent flakes like thin layers of lava on the footledge; in other places the time has honey-colored the rock; now and then it adheres to the larger flakes, still showing with sufficient distinctness the forms of the characters. The inscriptions—which are in the three forms of cuneiform writing, Persian, Babylonian, and Median—set forth the hereditary right of Darius to the throne of Persia, tracing his genealogy, through eighty-five generations, from the Achemenian dynasty. They then enumerate the provinces of his empire, and recount his triumphs over the various rebels who rose against him during the first four years of his reign. The monarch himself is represented on the tablet with a bow in hand, and his foot upon the prostrate figure of a man, while nine rebels, chained together by the neck, stand humbly before him; behind him are two of his own warriors, and above him, another figure [see cut].

The Persian inscriptions which Sir H. Rawlinson has translated are contained in the five main columns numbered in cut 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. The first column contains 10 paragraphs, and 95 lines. Each paragraph after the first, which commences, "I am Darius the Great King," begins with, "Says Darius the King." The second column has the same number of lines in 16 paragraphs; the third, 92 lines and 14 paragraphs; the fourth has also 92 lines and 18 paragraphs; and the fifth, which appears to be a supplementary column, 55 lines. A transcription, in Roman characters, of the Persian part, with a translation in English, is given in Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 490 sq.

The second, fourth, and fifth columns are much injured. Sir H. Rawlinson fixes the epoch of the sculpture at 515 B.C. See Jour. of Asian Society, vol. 4; Norris, Behistun Inscription.

Bel (Heb. id. באל, contracted from ב אל, the Aramaic form of ב אל; Sept. Βαϊλ and Βαλος) is the name under which the national god of the Babylonians is cursorily mentioned in Isa. xlv. 1, 1; Jer. I. 2, 2; li. 44. The only passages in the (apocryphal) Bible which contain any further notice of this deity are Bar. vi, 46, and the addition to the book of Daniel, in the Sept., xxiv. 1, sq., where we read of meat and drink being daily offered to him, according to a usage occurring in classical idolatry, and termed LECTISTERNIA (Jer. ii. 47 47). But a particular account of the pyramidal temple of Bel, at Babylon, is given by Herodotus, i. 181-183. See BABEL. It is there also stated that the sacrifices of this god consisted of adult cattle (ποίόντα), of their young, when suckling (which last class were the only victims offered up on the golden altar), and of incense. The custom of providing him with Lectisternia may be inferred from the table placed before the statue, but it is not expressly mentioned. Diodorus (ii. 2) gives a similar account of this temple; but adds that there were large golden statues of Zeus, Hera, and Rhea on its summit, with a table, common to them all, before them. Gesenius, in order to support his own theory, endeavors to show that this statue of Zeus must have been that of Jupiter, while that of Rhea represented the sun. Hitzig, however, in his note to Isa. xviii. 8, more justly observes that Hera is the female counterpart to Zeus-Bel, that he is called so solely because it was the name of the chief Greek goddess, and that she and Bel are the moon and sun. He refers for confirmation to Berosus (p. 50, ed. Richter), who states that the wife of Bel was called Omores, which means moon; and to Ammian. Marcell. xxiii. 5, for a statement that the moon was, in later times, zealously worshipped in Mesopotamia. The classical writers generally call this Babylonian deity by their names, Zeus and Jupiter (Herod. and Diod. i. c.; Plin. Hist. Nat. vi. 30), by which they assuredly did not mean the planet of that name, but merely the chief god of their religious system. Cicero, in his De Nat. Deor. iii. 16), recognizes Hercules in the Belus of India, which is a loose term for Babylonia. This favors the identity of Bel and Melkart. See Baal. The following engraving, taken from a Babylonian cylinder, represents, according to Munter, the sun-god and one of his priests. The triangle on the top of one of the pillars, the star with eight rays, and the half moon, are all significant symbols. See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

Ancient Worship of Bel.

Bel AND THE DRAGON, HISTORY OF, an apocryphal and uncannonal book of Scripture. See ApOCrYPHA. It was always rejected by the Jewish Church, and is extant neither in the Hebrew nor the Christian language. Jerome gives it no better title than that of "the fable" of Bel and the Dragon; nor has it obtained more credit with posterity, except with the divines of the Council of Trent, who determined that it should form part of the canonical Scriptures. The design of this fiction was to render idolatry ridiculous, and to exalt the true God; but the author has destroyed the illusion of his fiction by transporting to Babylon the worship of animals, which was never practised in that country. This book forms the fourteenth chapter of Daniel in the Latin Vulgate; in the Greek it was called the prophesy of Hebrew; the son of Zeus, of the tribe of Levi; but this is evidently erroneous, for that prophet lived before the time of Nebuchadnezzar, and the events pretended to have taken place in this fable are assigned to the time of Cyrus. There are two Greek texts of this fragment; that of the Septuagint, and that found in Theodotion's Greek version of Daniel. The former is the most ancient, and has been translated into Syriac. The Latin and Arabic versions, together with another Syriac translation, have been made from the text of Theodotion.—Davidson, in Horne's Introd. new ed. i, 639. See Daniel (APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO).

Be'la (Heb. id. בֵּל, a thing swallowed), the name of one place and three men.

1. (Sept. Belœk.) A small city on the shore of the Dead Sea, not far from Sodom, afterward called Zoar, to which Lot retreated from the destruction of the cities of the plain, it being the only one of the five that was spared at his intercession (Gen. xix. 20, 30). It lay at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, on the frontier of Moab and Palestine (Jerome on Isa. xxv.), and on the route to Egypt, the connection in which it is found (Isa. xx. 6; Jer. xl. iii. 54; Gen. xiii. 10). We first read of Bela in Gen. xiv. 2, 8, where it is BELA 730  BELGIUM

gamed with Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, as forming a confederacy under their respective kings, in the vale of Siddim, to resist the supremacy of the King of Shinar and his associates. It is singular that the King of Bela is the only one of the five whose name is not given, and this suggests the probability of Bela having been his own name, as well as the name of his city, which may have been so called from him. The tradition of the Jews was that it was called Bela from having been repeatedly insulted by earthquakes; and in the passage Jer. xiv., 34, "From Zoar even unto Horon, they are more at ease, and the heifer of three years old," and Isa. xxv, 5, they absurdly fancied an allusion to its destruction by three earthquakes (Jerome, Quast. Heb. in Gen. xiv.). There is nothing improbable in itself in the supposed allusion to the swallowing up of the city by an earthquake, which $\exists 2\exists$ exactly expresses (Num. xvi, 30); but the repeated occurrence of $\exists 2\exists$ and words compounded with it, as names of men, rather favors the notion of the city having been called Bela from the name of its founder. This is rendered yet more probable by Bela being the name of an Edomitic king in Gen. xxxvi, 32. For further information, see De Saulcy's Narratives, i. 457-481, and Stanley's Palestine, p. 285.-Smith, s. v. See ZOAB.

2. (Sept. Bela, Bala.) The eldest son of Benjamin, according to Gen. xvi, 21 (where the name is Anglicized "Belah"); Num. xxvi, 38; 1 Chron. vii, 6; viii, 1, and head of the family of the Belaites. B.C. post 1566. The houses of his family, according to 1 Chron. vii, 8-4, were Addar, Gera, Abihud (read Akkub, Abihu), Naamah, Ahoah, Shupham, and Huram. The exploit of Ehud, the son of Gera, who shared the peculiarity of so many of his Benjamite brethren in being left-handed (Judg. xxi, 16), in slaying Eglon, the king of Moab, and delivering Israel from the Moabite yoke, is related at length, Judg. xlii, 14-30. It is perhaps worth noticing that as we have Husham by the side of Bela among the kings of Edom, Gen. xxxvi, 34, so also by the side of Bela, son of Benjamin, we have the Benjamite family of Hushim (1 Chron. vii, 12), sprung apparently from a foreign woman of that name, whom a Benjamite took to wife in the land of Moab (1 Chr. v, 8-11). See BECHEM.

3. (Sept. Bakor.) A king of Edom before the institution of royalty among the Israelites. He was a son of Beor, and his native city was Diblahab (Gen. xxxvi, 32, 33; 1 Chron. i, 43). B.C. perhaps cir. 1618. Bernard Hyde, following some Jewish commentators (Simon, Onomast. p. 142, note), identifies this Bela with Edom, the son of Beor; but the evidence from the name does not seem to prove more than identity of family and race. There is scarcely any thing to guide us as to the age of Beor, or Bosor, the founder of the house from which Bela and Balaam sprung. As regards the name of Bela's royal or native city Dinhabah, which Furst and Gesenius render "the place of Diblah," it may possibly be a form of דבַּל, the Chaldee for gol, after the analogy of the frequent Chaldee resolution of the dageash forte into nun. There are several names of places and persons in Idumea which point to gold as found there—such as Dizahah, Deut. i, 1, "place of gold;" Mezahah, "waters of gold;" or "gold-streams." Gen. xxxvi, 32.

Compare Debria, the ancient name of the Tiber, famous for its yellow waters; or the derivation for Diblahab to be true, its Chaldee form would not be difficult to account for, and would supply an additional evidence of the early conquests of the Chaldees in the direction of Idumea. The name of Bela's ancestral Beor is of a decidedly Chaldee or Aramean form, and may be connected with Pethor, Babel, and Pethor, of the Hebrews; and we are expressly told that Balaam, the son of Beor, dwelt in Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, i.e. the Euphrates; and he himself describes his home as being in Aram (Num. xxiii, 5; xxiii, 7). Saul again, who reigned over Edom after Samlah, came from Rehoboth by the river Euphrates (Gen. xxxvi, 57). We read in Job's time of the Chaldeans making incursions into the land of Uz, and carrying away Gershom, Job i., 17. In the time of Abraham we have the King of Shinar apparently extending his empire so as to make the kings on the borders of the Dead Sea his tributaries, and with his confederates extending his conquests into the very country which was afterward the land of Edom. Putting all this together, we may conclude with some confidence that Bela, the son of Beor, who reigned over Edom, was a Chaldean by birth, and reigned in Edom by conquest. He may have been contemporary with Moses and Balaam. Hadad, of which name there were two kings (Gen. xxxvi, 38, 39), is probably another instance of an Aramean king of Edom, as we find the name Ben-hadad as that of the kings of Syria or Aram in later history (1 Kings xx). Compare also the name of Hadad-ezer, king of Zobah, in the neighborhood of the Euphrates (2 Sam. viii, 5, 3, etc.).—Smith, s. v.

See EDOM; CHALDEAN.

4. A son of Azaz, a Reubenite (Gen. ch. v, 8). B.C. post 1618. It is remarkable that his country too was "in Aroer, even unto Nebo and Baal-meon; and eastward he inhabited unto the entering in of the wilderness from the river Euphrates" (Gen. ch. v, 9, 9). Bela'ah, a less correct mode of Anglicizing (Gen. ch. vi, 21) the name of Bela (q. v.), the son of Benjamin.

Belaites (Heb. with the art., beh-balah, בֵּרָלָה; Sept. τὰ Βηλαῖα), the patriarchal of the descendents of Bela (q. v.), the son of Benjamin (Num. xxxvi, 38).

Belgic Confession (Confessio Belgica), a confession of faith framed by Guido de Bres, of Durbant, and others, about A.D. 1561 in French, and based on Calvinistic principles. It was translated into the vernacular in 1568, and received as a symbolical book by the synod of Antwerp in 1566, of Dort in 1571, 1576, 1579, 1581, and 1619; and is recogised by that of the Hague in 1651. The copy recognised by the synod of Dort at Middelburg in 1641 is an abridgment of the original by Fustus Husted, which was afterwards the base of the Synod of Dort. Both have the same number of articles, and differ only in form, not in spirit. The shorter form is given by Augusti, Corpus Librorum Symbolicorum. (Elberf. 1627, 8vo); the longer in NIEMEYER, Coll. Confessionum (Leips. 1840, 8vo). See Confessions.

Belgium, a minor state of Europe, situated between France, Holland, and Prussia. See Europe. 1. Church History. Christianity is said to have been introduced into Belgium as early as A.D. 42, through Eucharius, one of the seventy disciples; but Maternus (died 130) is generally honored as the apostle of Belgium, through the whole extent of which he planted Christian churches. During the Crusades the Belgian nobility distinguished themselves by their zeal (see Godfrey of Bouillon). In the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, Belgium was the chief seat of the reformatory movements within the Roman Catholic Church, and produced several religious communities, whose discipline and life formed, by their more Biblical and spiritual character, a favorable contrast to the gross superstitions of the majority of monastic institutions. To these belonged the Beghards and Beguines, the Lollards, and especially the Fraters Communis Vite (Brothers of the Common Life). The Reformation of the sixteenth century was opposed by the University of Louvain, and later also by Erasmus, but found many adherents among the people; and its first martyrs, John Esch and Henry Vos, who were burned at Brussels July 1, 1523, were Belgians. The Inquisition introduced by Philip I was unable to crush out the Reformation, and led to the revolution of the seven northern provinces. See Holland. In the southern provinces the predominance of the Roman Church was secured by Alexander of Parma, and fortified by the Jesuits. Jansenism (q. v.) arose in Belgium, but did not long survive as a distinct organization, the first condemning decree of the pope. The edict of toleration (Oct. 18, 1781), by which Joseph II restrained the spiritual authority of the pope, declared marriage a civil contract, and suppressed all monastic societies, merging them into one "Fraternity of Charity," met with a violent opposition. The states were against him and refused to pay taxes, and the emperor had to make important concessions. The union of Belgium with Holland after the overthrow of the Napoleonic rule greatly dissatisfied the Roman Catholic party, which united with the Liberal opposition for the overthrow of the Dutch rule and the establishment of an independent kingdom of Belgium (1830). The new Constitution, a compromise between the two parties, gave to the Roman Catholic party the greatest BELGIUM

Independence of the state and a liberal support, but compelled it, on the other hand, to consent to the establishment of an unlimited liberty of religion. The subsequent history of Belgium is a strife of these parties especially with regard to the support which the state is to give both in ecclesiastical and political nature (education, charitable institutions, etc.). The "Catholic" party is numerically stronger than in any other European Parliament. Among its distinguished men belong De Merode, Count de Téthe, Decamps, Malou, Dedeker. It split, however, itself into two parties, one of the constitutional, the other the ultraconservative, wished to overthrow the compromise with the Liberals and put an end to religious toleration, while the other, the Constitutional, declared themselves for a faithful adherence to the Constitution. This latter view is by far the most prevailing.

11. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The total population of Belgium was, at December 31, 1894, 4,026,106. In 1846 the non-Catholic population was stated as 10,822 (of a total population of 4,387,196), among whom were 6678 Protestants, Lutherans, and Reformed, 790 Anglicans, 1336 Jews, 1019 prosperous, and 600 of no religious persuasion. Since, the number of Protestants has increased slightly than the Roman Catholics, and a number of Protestant congregations have been formed, consisting entirely of converts from the Roman Catholic Church (one in Brussels alone counts more than one thousand converts). Helfferich (see below, the literature on Belgium) estimated the Protestant population in 1848 at about 25,000, which statement may have been a little too high, though there can be no doubt that the Protestant population at present amounts to over 20,000 souls. There are two different nationalities in Belgium, the Flemish (German) and Walloon (French). The Roman Catholic Church has her strong-hold among the former. Of the many fond, Louvain, and Ghent are Catholic, established and controlled entirely by the bishops; one, Brussels, is Liberal and anti-Catholic; two, Ghent and Liege, are state universities, in which, therefore, professors of both parties are to be found. There is one archbishop at Mechlin, and five bishops (Bruge, Namur, Tournay, Liege, and Ghent). There are six larger and six smaller seminaries for the training of the clergy. The approbations made for all religious denominations acknowledged by the state amounted in 1859 to 4,051,942 frs. 75 cts. The religious orders are very numerous, and many of them, especially the Jesuits, very rich. The Jesuits at Brussels continue the same secular work as they used to do by the order, the Acta Sanctorum (q. v.). The religious orders conduct a large number of boarding-schools, and the primary instruction is almost everywhere in their hands (in particular, in the hands of the Brothers of the Christian Schools). The number of the members of the religious associations was, in 1856, 14,583, viz., 2523 men and 12,980 women, and it is rapidly increasing. The leading periodicals of the Roman Catholics are, Revue Catholique de Louvain; Prièes historiques et littéraires, a semi-monthly, published by the Jesuits in Brussels; the Journal historique et littéraire, a monthly, published at Liege by Kersten. The most influential among the many political organs of the Catholic party is the Journal de Bruxelles.

The largest body of Protestants is the Protestant Union, which is recognised and supported by the state, and in 1854 embraced fourteen congregations, two of which (Mary Hoorbecke, near Ghent, and Dour, in Heneghem) have been since the time of the union. The number of preachers in 1890 was sixteen. The annual synod consists of all the preachers and two or three lay delegates of every congregation. The Evangelical Society (Sociedé Evangelique Belge), which formed itself in Brussels in 1835, after the model of the evangelical societies of Paris and Geneva, has established a considerable number of congregations, which increases annually. It had, in 1864, 20 churches and stations, 18 pastors and evangelists, 12 schools attended by 675 children, and a membership of from 6000 to 7000. The Episcopate of England has four congregations, the Lutherans one, at Brussels, in which city there are also two independent religious associations. The Bible Society had distributed (up to 1890) about two hundred thousand copies of the Bible.

Boelland stands often, in the Auth. Vers. (after the Vulg.), as a proper name for the Heb. word בֶּן-יִשָּׂרָאֵל (Benja'al, Sept. usually translates בֹּלֶל, בֹּלֶל), in accordance with 2 Cor. vi, 15. This is particularly the case where it is connected with the expressions בּּוֹלֶל, man of, or בּּוֹלֶל, son of; in other instances it is translated by "wicked," or some equivalent term (Deut. xix, 9; 2 Sam. xii, 8; 13; Prov. vi, 12; xvi, 27; xii, 26; Nah. ii, 11, 15). There can be no question, however, that is to be regarded as a proper name in the O. T.; its meaning is worthless, and hence rootlessness, lawlessness. Its etymology is uncertain: the first part, בּּוֹלֶל, means "without;" the second part has been variously connected with בּּוֹלֶל, yoke, in the Vulg. (Judg. xix, 22), in the sense of "unbridled, rebellious," with בּּוֹלֶל, to ascend, as = without ascent, that is, of the lowest condition; and lastly with בּּוֹלֶל, to be useful, as = without usefulness, that is, good for nothing (Genesius, Thesaur. p. 200). The latter appears to be the most probable, not only in regard to sense, but also as explaining the unusual fusion of the two words, the " at the end of the one and at the beginning of the other leading to a change, originally in the pronunciation, and afterward in the writing. The expression son or men of Belial must be understood as meaning simply a worthless, lawless fellow (Sept. παραδόχος). It occurs frequently in this sense in the historical books (Judg. xix, 22; xx, 13; 1 Sam. i, 16; li, 12; x, 27; xxv, 17, 20; xxx, 22; 2 Sam. xvi, 7; xx, xx, 1 Kings xix, 10) and only once in the prophetic books (Deut. xiii, 18). The adj. בּּוֹלֶל is occasionally omitted, as in 2 Sam. xxiii, 6, and Job xxxiv, 18, where בּּוֹלֶל, stands by itself, as a term of reproach. The later Hebrews used יִשָּׂרָאֵל and וּזוֹלִית in a similar manner (Matt. v, 22); the latter is perhaps the most analogous; in 1 Sam. xxv, 25, Nabul (בּּוֹלֶל) is described as a man of Belial, as though the terms were equivalent.

In the N. T. the term appears (in the best MSS.) in the form Believan, and not Belial, as given in the Auth. Vers. (So in the Tynd. and P. Patr. p. 589, 587, 619, etc.) The change of λ into ρ was common; we have an instance even in Biblical Hebrew, Mattathath (Job xxxviii, 82) for mazzathath (2 Kings xxiii, 5); in Chaldee we meet with מָשָׂא for מָשָׂא, and various other instances; the same change occurred in the Doric dialect (φιλόκοοι for φιλότητοι), with which the Alexandrine writers were most familiar. The term, as used in 2 Cor. vi, 15, is generally understood as an appellative of Satan, as the personification of all that was bad; Bengel (Gnomon, in loc.) explains it of Antichrist, as more strictly the opposite of Christ. By some it is here explained as referring to a demon (Castell, Leg, s. v., Beliar), or Satan himself (comp. Ephes. ii, 2); but in the O. T. the word has this meaning (Michaelis, Suppl., p. 1129; Smith, v. Belia).

Belief, in its general acceptance, denotes a persuasion or an assent of the mind to the truth of any proposition. "In this sense belief does not relate to any particular kind of means or arguments, but may be produced by any means whatever: thus we are said to believe our senses, to believe our reason, to believe a witness. Belief, in a more restricted sense, denotes that kind of assent which is grounded only on the authority or testimony of some person. In this sense belief stands opposed to knowledge and science. We do not say that we believe snow to be white, but that we know it is white.

In the original structure of our mental constitution, a foundation is laid for an inclination of the mind towards truth. We set out in our intellectual career with believing, and that, too, on the strongest of all evidence, so far as we are concerned—the evidence of consciousness. Dr. Reid, in his Inquiry into the Human Mind, seems to think that we have been endowed with two original principles—a principle of veracity and a principle of credibility—both of which he regards as original instants. The first of these is a propensity to speak and to use the signs of language, so as to convey our real sentiments.

"When I reflect upon my actions most attentively," says Dr. Reid, "I am not conscious that, in speaking truth, I am influenced on ordinary occasions by any principle higher than a belief. I oral only that there is always in the door of my lips, and goes forth spontaneously if not held back. It requires neither good nor bad intention to bring it forth, but only that I be artless and undesigning. There may, indeed, be temptations to falsehood which would be too strong for a principle of veracity, unless supported by the principles of honor and virtue; but where there is no such temptation, we speak truth by instinct. That there is such an original tendency both to speak the truth and to believe, we readily admit; and it is the possession of such a principle which fits us for appreciating evidence and feeling the force of argument.

If by the word instinct we mean the original principle of our nature, we are not disposed to object to the use of the expression by Dr. Reid in speaking of our tendency to believe; but there seems to be no necessity for the assertion of two original principles, the one leading us to speak, and the other to believe the truth. It is enough, surely, that we set out at first with a tendency to believe dogmatically and firmly, and are thus far unacquainted with doubt or error.

If such be the original framework of our constitution, truth will ever, while we retain our nature, be our native element, and therefore always more familiar to us than falsehood. May not there be temptations to forget this characteristic element of nature, and to press the boundary of truth; but in doing so we are violating the original law of our mental structure, and the moment that the unnatural pressure is removed, the mind will return to its former tendency to speak truth honestly. Thus formed, we are prepared to believe, in the first instance, every thing indiscriminately; but when reluctantly compelled to admit the existence of falsehood, we do not, because we cannot, part with the original tendency to believe. Hesitation and doubt are introduced, not so, however, as to destroy our nature; but, still retaining our partiality for the truth, we are of which he speaks, a situation which is the best fitted for balancing probabilities, and weighing the evidence for and against any statement which is presented to us. We still incline decidedly toward the truth, and yet we are aware of the existence of falsehood, and to some extent, therefore, guarded against it. There is no necessity, however, for an original principle of credibility in addition to that of veracity. It is sufficient that truth is the rule, falsehood the exception; and if the inclination predominate in favor of the rule, we require no more than a simple knowledge that there are exceptions. Thus it is that man has been provided by his Creator with a standard by which he may judge of the truth and reality of things. And while, therefore, we define belief to be the agreement or disagreement of objects and qualities with this state of things, it must be borne in mind that the primary laws of consciousness, the ultimate conditions of thought, are the means according to which this agreement or disagreement is ascertained. The mind is concentrated in the constitution of man, and if he fails to judge rightly in reference to any statement, the error is to be found, not in the standard, but in a perverse misapplication of the standard. And herein lies the difference in the opinions of men. They are each of them provided with an unerring standard of what they are concerned. They do not, because they cannot, disbelieve the primary laws of thought or self-consciousness; but in the application of these they commence a system of error, and therefore of doubt, leading at length to disbelief. The original belief is certain, because the standard is certain on which it is grounded; and could all other facts and events be brought back to the same standard, the judgment, as to their truth or falsehood, would, so far as we are concerned, be unerring. Now the great design for which, in every case of doubt or dispute, evidence and arguments of every kind are adduced, is that the appeal may be made to that which is the highest, the purest, the most certain of all earthly tribunals—the reason, not of an individual man, but of humanity. This is the common platform on which men of all characters, of all sects, of all opinions, may meet in cordial agreement. The principles by which we are governed are not the same as those by which the conditions in which they assert their position in the world as rational and intelligent creatures. Without such common principles all evidence would be powerless, all argument unavailing. Without an original standard of truth in his own breast, this world would have become a state of universal skepticism; nay, rather, for such a state of things is impossible, there would have been no ground for either belief or doubt, affirmation or denial" (Gardner, Cyclopaedia).

On the relation of the will to belief we cite the following from Hopkins (Lovelace Lectures, 1844).

"It is true within certain limitations, and under certain conditions, and with respect to certain kinds of truth, that we are not voluntary in our belief; but then these conditions and limitations are such as entirely to sever from this truth any consequence that we are not perfectly ready to admit. We admit that belief is in no case directly dependent on the will; it is entirely independent of it; but he must be exceedingly blind to the truth of what passes around him, who should affirm that the will has no influence. The influence of the will here is analogous to its influence in many other cases. It is as great as it is over the objects which we see. It does not depend upon the will of any man, if he turns his eyes in a particular direction, whether he shall see a tree there. If the tree be there he must see it, and is compelled to believe in its existence; but it was entirely within his power not to turn his eyes in that direction, and thus to remain unconvinced, on the highest of all evidence, of the existence of the tree, and of mathematical truth. Beauty is presented to the eye by his will directly that man has any control over his thoughts. It is not by willing a thought into the mind that he can call it there, and yet we all know, through attention and habits of association, the subjects of our thoughts are to a great extent directed by the will. It is not only so in respect to belief; and he who denies this, destroys the value of the influence of party spirit, and prejudice, and interest on the mind. So great is this influence, however, that a keen observer of human nature, and one who will not be suspected of leaning unduly to the doctrine I now advocate, has supposed it to extend even to our belief in mathematics. Men," says Hobbes, "bear their decisions from custom to reason, and from reason to custom, as it serves their turn, receding from custom when their interest requires it, and setting themselves against reason as oft as reason is against them, which is the cause that the doctrine of right and wrong is perpetually disputed about, and that the three angles of a triangle should be equal to two angles of a square, that doctrine should have been, if not disputed yet by the burning of all books of geometry, suppressed, as far as he whom it concerned was able." "This," says Hallam, from whose work I make the quotation, "does not exclude the probability of mankind in retaining the evidence of truth when it thwarts the interests or passions of any particular sect or community." Let a man who hears the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid announced for the first time trace the steps of the demonstration, and he must believe it to be true; but let him know that as soon as he does perceive the evidence of that proposition, so as to believe it on that ground, he shall lose his right eye, and he will never trace the evidence, or come to that belief which results from the force of the only proper evidence. You may tell him it is true, but he will reply that he does not know—he does not see it to be so. So far then, from the experience of belief, which is necessitated on condition of a certain amount of evidence perceived by the mind, an excuse for any who do not receive the evidence of the Christian religion, it is in this very law that I find the ground of their condemnation. Certainly, if God has provided evidence as convincing as that for the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid, that all men have to do is to examine it with candor, then they must be without excuse if they do not believe. This, I suppose, God has done. He asks no one to believe except on the ground of evidence, and such evidence as ought to command assent. Let a man examine this evidence with entire candor, laying aside all regard for consequences or results, simply according to the laws of evidence, and then, if he is not convinced, I believe God will so far forth acquit him in the great day of judgment. But if God has given man such evidence that a fair, and full, and perfectly candid examination is all that is necessary to all men, and belief that he do not believe, it will be in this very law that we shall find the ground of their condemnation. The difficulty will not lie in their mental constitution as related to evidence, nor in the want of evidence, but in that moral condition, that state of the heart, or the will, which prevented a proper examination. "There seems," says Butler, "no possible reason to be given why we may not be in a state of moral probation with regard to the exercise of our understanding upon the subject of religion, as we are with regard to our behavior in common affairs. The former is a thing as much within our power and choice as the latter." On the relations of Belief to Faith, see Faith.

BELIEVERS. In the early Church this term (μυροφόροι, fideles) was applied strictly to the believing or baptized laity, in contradistinction to the clergy or the catechumens. They had many titles, honors, and privileges, which raised them above the catechumens. They were called "the illuminates," "the initiated," "the perfect," "the favorites of heaven." They alone could partake of the Lord's Supper; the catechumens being previously dismissed; they joined in all the prayers of the Church; they alone used the Lord's Prayer, for the catechumens were not allowed to say "Our Father;" and they were auditors of all discourses made in the church.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. 1, ch. 8 and 4.

Belknap, Jeremy, D.D., was born at Boston, June 4, 1744, and graduated at Harvard in 1769. In 1767 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church at Dover, N.H., where he labored for over 20 years. In 1797 he became pastor at Boston, where he died, June 30, 1798. He was the father of one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and devoted much of his time to the promotion of its objects. Among his writings are the History of New Hampshire (1784-1792, 8 vols.); American Biography (1794-1798, 2 vols.); and a number of political and religious tracts, besides occasional sermons.—Allen, Bibl. Dict. s. v.

Bell (παύσας, păsás), something struck; Sept. παύσας; Vulg. tinumtulium; Exod. xxvii, 38, 84; xxxix, 25, 26; also ἑως ἕως, metallis; linking; Sept. θεὸς, Zech. ii, 20.

The first bells known in history are those small golden bells which were attached to the lower part of the blue robe (the robe of the ephod) which formed part of the dress of the high-priest in his sacerdotal ministrations (Exod. xxvii, 84, 84; comp. Exod. xxi, 11). They were there placed alternately with the pomegranate-shaped knobs, one of these being between every two of the bells. The number of these bells is not mentioned in Scripture; but tradition states that there were sixty-six (Clem. Alex. Stromata, p. 568), or, according to the Jews, seventy-two (Jarchi, in loc.) We need seek any other reason for this rather singular use of bells than that which is assigned: "His sound is heard before he goeth; and the place prepareth before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not" (Exod. xxviii, 35); by which we may understand that the sound of the bells manifested that he was properly arrayed in the robes of ceremony which he was required to wear when he entered the presence-chamber of the Great King. It is said that no minster can enter the presence of an earthly potentate abruptly and unannounced, so he (whom no human being could introduce) was to have his entrance harbingered by the sound of the bells he wore. This sound, heard outside, also notified to the people the time in which he was engaged in his sacred ministrations, and during which they remained in prayer (1 Kings x, 1). No doubt they answered the same purpose as the bells used by the Brahmins in the Hindoo ceremonies, and by the Roman Catholics during the celebration of mass (comp. Luke i, 21). To this day bells are frequently attached, for the sake of their pleasant sound, to the headdresses of the Egyptian women. The Egyptians also used anklets of bells which they hung from their ankles and let ring in the breeze. The Egyptians and Carthaginians wear strings of them round their feet (Lane, Mod. Egypt, ii, 370), and at Koojmar Munuo Park saw a dance "in which many performers assisted, all of whom were provided with little bells fastened to their legs and arms."

"BELLS OF THE HORSES" are mentioned in Zech. xiv, 20, and may have been such as were attached to the bridles or foreheads, or to belts around the necks of horses trained for war, that they might thereby be accustomed to noise and tumult, and not by their alarm expose the riders to danger in actual warfare. Hence a person who had not been tried or trained up to any thing was by the Greeks called δεδομένος, "one not used to the noise of a bell," by a metaphor taken from horses. The mules employed in the funeral pomp of Alexander had at each jaw a golden bell. It does not appear, however, that this was a use of horse-bells with which the Jews were familiar. The Hebr. word is almost the same as בַּשָּׁם הָאָמֵר, meta'ta'yi'm, "a pair of cymbals;" and as they are supposed to be inscribed with the words "Holiness unto the Lord," it is more probable that they are not bells, but "concentric or cut pieces of metal which were sometimes fastened to horses for the sake of ornament" (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 96). Indeed, they were probably the same as the בַּשָּׁם הָאָמֵר, sakaromin, "ornaments;" Sept. μυροφόροι (Isa. iii, 18; Judg. viii, 21), tanula of gold, silver, or brass used as ornaments, and hung by the Arabians round the necks of their camels, as we still see them in England on the harness of horses. They were not only ornamental, but useful, as their tinkling tended to enliven the animals; and in the case of some, to serve the purpose of our modern sheep-bells. The laden animals, being without riders, have bells hung from their necks, that they may be kept together in traversing by night the open plains and deserts, by paths and roads unconfined by fences and boundaries, that they may be cheered by the sound of the bells, and that, if any horse strays, its place may be known by the sound of its bell, while the general sound from the caravan enables the traveller who has strayed or lingered to find and regain his party, even in the night (Rosenmuller, Morgeln, iv, 441). That the same motto, Holiness to the Lord, which was upon the mitre of the high-priest, should, in the happy days foretold by the prophets, be engraved even upon the bells of the horses, manifestly signifies that all things, from the highest to the lowest, should in those days be sanctified to God (Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 77). - Kitto. It is remarkable that there is no appearance of bells of any kind on the Egyptian monuments. Quite a number of bronze bells, with iron tongues, were discovered, however, among the Assyrian ruins in a cal-} which it appears that small portable bells were in use in the Church in very ancient times, and that the large church-bells were not introduced until a later period.

Certain it is, however, that there were bells in the church of St. Stephen, at Sens, in 610, the ringing of which frightened away the besieging army of King Clothaire II, which knew not what they were. Yet Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History (lib. iv. c. 28), about 670, says, "auld latto subito in ære notum campamine somnum quo ad orationes excelsi sollevat." A form of speaking which would imply that there were at that period in general use; and Stavelry refers to Speelman's Concil. tom. i., fol. 62, 64, where it is stated that Odou- cenus, bishop, or archbishop, of Llandaff, about A.D. 650, took down the bells and crosses of his church as part of a sentence of excommunication. Insulphus relates how Turketul, abbot of Croyland, who died about 679, gave one notable great bell to the abbey-church, which he called Guthiac, and afterward abbot Egelric gave six more, named Bartholomew, Bettleum, Terketul, Tatgew, Pegai, and Bega; and he adds, "Non erat tunc tanta consonantia campanarum in tota Anglia." (See Maitland, Dark Ages, p. 261.) Proofs ex- ist that bells were common in France in the seventh and eighth centuries. During the reign of Charlemagne they became common in France and Germany. Bells were first hung in towers separate from the church (campanili); later, the tower was joined to the church. In Italy, Greece, the Ionian Isles, and Sweden, the towers are yet usually separate. As early as the eighth century bells were dedicated with religious ceremonies very similar to those used in baptism. They were sprinkled with holy water; exorcism was spoken over them, to free them from the power of evil spirits; a name was given them (as early as the tenth century); a blessing was pronounced; and they were anointed. Later, their ringing was supposed to drive away evil spirits, pestilence, and thunder-storms. Being thus made objects of religious faith and affection, they were ornamented in the highest style of the sculptor's art with scenes from the Bible and other religious subjects. The largest bells are: the one at Moscow, 496 inches in length, and 24 tons 65 pounds, 66,000 lbs.; at Vienna, 40,000 lbs.; at Paris, 38,000 lbs.; at Westminster Abbey, 37,000 lbs. The usual composition of bells is four parts of copper and one of tin. The proportions are sometimes varied, and bismuth and zinc added. Legends of large parts of silver in certain bells, as at Rouen, have been found by chemical analysis to be fabulous. Strength of tone in bells de- pends upon the weight of metal, depth of tone upon the shape. By varying these chimes are produced. (See Thiers, Des Cloches [Paris]; Harzen, Die Glocken- geschichten [Weimar, 1845]; Otto, Glockenkunde [Leipzig, 1837]; Chrysander, Historische Nachrichten von Kirchenglocken.)

The Blessing of Bells in the Roman Church is a most extraordinary piece of superstition. They are said to be consecrated to God, that he may bestow upon them the power, not of striking the ear only, but also of touching the heart. When a bell is to be blessed, it is hung up in a place where there is room to walk round it. Beforehand, a holy-water pot, another for salt, napkins, a vessel of oil, incense, myrrh, cotton, a basin and ewer, and a crumb of bread, are prepared. There is then a procession from the vestry, and the officiating priest, having seated himself near the bell, instructs the people in the holiness of the act to perform, and then sings the Missere. Next, he blesses some salt and water, and offers a prayer that the bell may acquire the virtue of guarding Christians from the stratagem of Satan, of breaking the force of tempests, and raising devotion in the heart, etc. He then mixes salt and water, and, crossing the bells thrice, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, pronounces over each, “God be with you.” This being done, he dips the supergillum, or sprinkler, in the holy water, and with it washes each bell; during the operation he sings a versal. After that, a versal is sung. The versal consists of a vessel, containing what they call oil for the inferm, is opened by the deacon, into which the officiating priest dips the thumb of his right hand, and applies it to the middle of the bell, signing it with the sign of the cross. The twenty-eighth psalm being then sung, the versal is poured on the bell, during which time, which the priest honors the bell with a sort of baptism, consecrating it in the name of the Trinity, and naming some particular saint, who stands godfather to the bell, and from that time it bears his name. It is then perfumed with incense and myrrh, which, in a prayer used on the occasion, is called the dew of the Holy Ghost. For the full forms, see Migne, Liturgie Catholique, p. 863; Boissonnet, Dict. des Ceremonies, i, 886. The practice of consecrating and baptizing bells is a modern invention. Baronius refers the origin to the time of John XIII, A.D. 956, who consecrated the great bell of the Lateran Church, and gave it the name of John. This practice, however, is said to have prevailed at an earlier period; for in the capitularies of Charles the Great it is censured and prohibited. The rituals of the Romanists tell us that the consecration of bells is designed to represent that of pastors; that the ablation, followed by anunction, expresses the sanctification acquired by baptism; the seven crosses show that pastors should exceed the rest of Christians in the graces of the Holy Ghost; and that the smoke of the perfume rises in the bell, and fills it, as a pastor, adorned with the fulness of God’s spirit, receives the perfume of the vows and prayers of the faithful.

The tolling of bells at funerals is an old practice. It was a superstitious notion that evil spirits were hovering round to make a prey of departing souls, and that the tolling of bells struck them with terror. In the Council of Cologne it is said, “Let bells be blessed, as the trumpets of the church militant, by which the people are assembled to hear the word of God, the clergy to announce his mercy by day, and his truth in their nocturnal vigils; that by their sound the faithful may be invited to prayers, and that the spirit of devotion in them may be increased.” The fathers have also maintained that demons, affrighted by the sound of bells calling Christians to prayer, would either be scattered, or, whenever they entered the faithful would be secure; that the destruction of lightnings and whirlwinds would be averted, and the spirits of the storm destroyed. Durand says, in his Rationale of the Roman Church, “that for expiring persons bells must be tolled, that people may put up their prayers. This must be done twice for a woman and thrice for a man; for an ecclesiastic as many times as he had orders; and at the conclusion a peal of all the bells must be given, to distinguish the quality of the persons for whom the people are to offer up their prayers.” The uses of bells, according to the Romish idea, are summed up in the following distich, often inscribed on bells:

“I praise the true God; I call the people; I assemble the clergy; I lament the dead; I drive away infection; I honor the festivals.” The following are the names of kinds, and offices of bells used in churches and “religious habitations.” 1. Special bells, little bells hung in the refectory, near the abbot’s seat, which he rang to signify the end of the repast. It was also used to procure silence when there was too much noise. 2. Cymbalum, used in the cloister. 3. Nola, in the choir. 4. Campano, in the Campanile (q.v.); perhaps used when there was only one church-bell. 5. Simula, in the church-tower. The Campana sancta, vulgarly called in the country the “Sanse-bell,” was rung when the priest said the Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus, Dominus Deus Sabaoth. Matthew Paris says that it was forbidden to ring the bells during a period of mourning; and the Church of Rome retains to this day a mark of notation for omitting the bells to sound during the period from Good Friday to Easter Day. For an amusing paper on “Bells,” see Southey’s Doctor, vol. i. — Bergier, s. v. “Cloche”; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. viii, ch. vii, § 18; Martine, De Ant. Eccles. Rituali, t. ii; Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v. “Bells”; Coho- risman, Antiquities, vol. iii, ch. xiii, § 9; Quarterly Re- view (London), Oct. 1854, art. ii. Bell, Andrew, D.D., inventor of what is called the Lancasterian School System, was born at St. Andrew’s, 1752, and educated at the University there. Taking orders in the Church of England, he was appointed chaplain at Fort St. George, and minister of St. Mary’s church at Madras. Here he commenced instructing gratuitously the orphan children of the military assign- ment, and made the first attempt at the system of mu- tual instruction. On his return to England he published in London, in 1797, An Experiment made at the Male Asylum at Madras, suggesting a System by which a School or Family may teach itself under the superintendence of the Master, etc. The practice was carried on, however, but little attention until, in the following year, Joseph Lancaster opened a school in Southwark for poor children, supported by subscription, and conducted upon this system. It was so successful that similar schools were established elsewhere. The education of the poor being undertaken on so large a scale by a secta- rian, the subscribers being also in the main dissenters from the Church of England, caused some alarm in the leading members of that church. Bell was opposed to Lancaster, and in 1807 was employed to establish schools where the Church doctrine would be taught, and to prepare books for them. Funds were provided, and the rivalry, by stimulating both parties to exertion, resulted in nothing but good; though the par- ticular feature, that of mutual instruction with the help of a master only, has been found to require very material modifications. Dr. Bell, as a reward for his labors, was made a prebendary of Westminster. He died at Cheltenham, January 28, 1832, leaving one of the most important of all English educational works — English Cyclopedia.

Bell, William, D.D., an English divine, was born about 1731, and was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge. He became prebendary of St. Paul’s, and throughout a long life was noted for his piety, learning, and benevolence. In 1810 he founded eight new scholarships at Cambridge for the benefit of sons of poor clergymen. He died at Westminster in 1816. His writings include An Inquiry into the divine Mission of John the Baptist and of Christ (Lond. 1761, 8vo; 3d ed. 1810); Defence of Revelation (1756, 8vo); Authori- taty, Nature, and Design of the Lord’s Supper (1780, 8vo); Sermons on various Subjects (Lond. 1817, 2 vols. 8vo). —Darling, Cyclopedia Bibliographica, i, 293; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 161.

Bell, Book, and Candle. In the Romish Church the ceremony of excommunication was formerly attended with great solemnity. Lamps or candles were extinguished by being thrown on the ground, with an impression that those against whom the excom- munication was pronounced might be extinguished by the judgment of God. The summons to attend this cere- mony was accompanied by ringing of a bell, which, accompanying it were pronounced out of a book by the priest. Hence the phrase of “cursing by bell, book, and candle.” The following account, from the articles of the General Great Curse, found at Canterbury A.D. 1662, as it is set down by Thomas Becon, in the Reliques of Rome, is taken from Eadie, s. v. solemnly thundered out ones in every quarter—that is, as the old Doocots sing, "The Father of all the Holy Saints," the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ: 'The first Sunday of Lenten: The Sunday in the Feste of the Trynyte: and Sunday within the Utas (Octaves) of the Blessed Virgyn our Lady St. Mary.' At which Action the Prelate stands in the Pulpit in his Aube, the Cross being lifted up before him, and the Candles lighted, and then he reads it, and begins thus, 'By Authority God, Fader, Son, and Holy-Ghost, and the glorious Mother and Mayden, our Lady St. Mary, and the Blessed Apostles Peter, and Paul, and all Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors, Vyrgyne, and the hallowes of God; All thos bym assured that purchases Writts, or Let- ters to be sent to Rome, to giveth to the Bishop of Rome, by the Law of Holy Church of Causes that longeth skilfully to Christen Court, the which should not be demed by none other Law: And all that maliciously bereaven Holy Church of her right, or maken Holy Church lay fe, that is, hallowed and Blessed. And then concludes all with the Curse it self, thus, 'And now by Authoritie aforesaid we De-nounce all thos assured that are so fouen guyltie, and all thos that maintaine hem in her Sins or gyven hem hereto either help or counsell, see they be depart-ed free God, and all holl Chirch: and that they have noe part of the Passyon of our Lord Jesu Crist, ne no part of the Prayers among Christen Folk: But that they be assured of God, and of the Chirch, fro the sole of her Foot to the crown of her hes, sleeping and waking, sitting and standing, and in all her Words, and in all her Werks: but if they have noe Grace of God to amend hem here in this world, then shall they in the next by dition, paye for every sin that they have committed, withouthen End: Fiat: Fiat. Bellamy, Joseph, D.D., an eminent New Eng- land divine, was born at New Chehshire, Conn., 1719, and graduated at Yale College 1736. He began to preach at 18, and in 1740 was ordained pastor of the church in Bethlehelm, Conn. In the great revival which soon after spread over New England, he was of widely useful. He died March 6, 1790. His later years were spent (in addition to his pastoral labors) in teaching theology to students, who resorted to him in numbers. He was accustomed to give his pupils a set of questions, and also lists of books on the subjects of the questions; they were afterward made topics of ex- amination on the part of the teacher, and of essays or sermons by the pupil. Many of the most prominent divines of New England in the last generation were Bellamy's students. He was less successful as a writer than as a teacher, though some of his books are still published. His Thesaurum theologiam (Boston, 1750) went through many editions in this country and in Great Britain. He also published Them, Paulinus, and Aspasia, or Letters and Dialogue upon the Nature of Love to God, etc. (1750); an Essay on the Nature and Glory of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, etc. (1762); The Half-covy Covenant (1769); and a number of occasional sermons, as a writer. Controversial, he wrote, all of which may be found in his Works (N. Y. 1821, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed. Boston, 2 vols. 8vo), with memoir. A careful review of his writings, by Dr. Woodbridge, is given in the Literary and Theological Review, ii, 88.—Sprague, Ann. i, 504. See New England Theology.

Bellarmine, Robert (Roberto Francesco Romulo Bellarmine), was born at Monza, Juliano, Tuscany, Oct. 14, 1542, being nephew, on his mother's side, of Pope Marcellus II. His father, intending him for civil life, sent him to the University of Padua; but the bent of his mind was toward theology, and in 1560 he entered the society of the Jesuits. His remarkable talents and progress of knowledge induced the Pope to allow him to preach while as yet he was only a deacon; and at Mondovi, Florence, Padua, and Louvain, his talents as a preacher were first known. In 1569 he was ad- mitted to the priesthood, and in the year following lectured on theology at Louvain, being the first Jesuit who had done so. He preached also in Latin with great reputation. Upon his return to Rome in 1576, Pope Gregory XIII appointed him lecturer in controversial divinity in the new college (Collegium Romanum) which he had just founded; and Sixtus V sent him with Cardinal Cajetan into France, in the time of the League, to act as theologian to that legation, in case any con- ceptual controversy (of deadly sin) should come by the ordinance of Man, but both in the old Law, and also in the new Law, for to pay truley to God and holy Church the Tyth part of all manner of encrease that they winnen truley by the Grace of God, both with her travell, and also with her craftes whatsoever they be truly gotten.' And then concludes all with the Curse it self, thus, 'And now by Authoritie aforesaid we De-nounce all thos assured that are so fouen guyltie, and all thos that maintaine hem in her Sins or gyven hem hereto either help or counsell, see they be depart-ed free God, and all holl Chirch: and that they have noe part of the Passyon of our Lord Jesu Crist, ne no part of the Prayers among Christen Folk: But that they be assured of God, and of the Chirch, fro the sole of her Foot to the crown of her hes, sleeping and waking, sitting and standing, and in all her Words, and in all her Werks: but if they have noe Grace of God to amend hem here in this world, then shall they in the next by dition, paye for every sin that they have committed, withouthen End: Fiat: Fiat. BELLAGE

Of the Council and the Church: among general Councils he reckons eighteen approved, eight disapproved, and six only partially approved (among which are Frankfort, Constance, and Basle), and one (Pisa, 1569) neither approved nor disapproved. He gives to the pope the authority to convene and approve these Councils, prior to the Emperor. In the third book he treats of the visibility and indefectibility of the Church, and of the Notes of the Church. (2.) Of the Members of the Church, viz., clerks, monks, and laymen. (3.) Of the Church in Purgatory: in this he states, and endeavors to prove, the Roman doctrine of purgatory. (4.) Of the Church Triumphant, relating to the beatitude and worship of the saints. Vol. iii relates to the sacraments in general and in particular; and vol. iv treats of original sin; the necessity of grace, free-will, justification; the merit of good works, especially of prayer, fasting, and almsgiving; various matters disputed among the scholastic theologians, etc. Besides these works, we have of Bellar- mine 3 vols. fol. of Opera Diversa, published at Cologne in 1617, containing, 1. Commentaries on the Psalms, and Sermons:—2. A Treatise of Ecclesiastical Writers (often reprinted):—3. Treatises on the Translation of the Empire; on Indulgence and ship of the Pope of Paris); and on the judgment on a book entitled the Concord of the Lutherans. Also, 4. The Writings of the Affairs of Venice:—5. Two Writings against James I of England:—6. A Treatise, De positate summi Pontificis in rebus temporibus, against William Barley, condemned in 1610 by the Parliament:—7. Some Devotional Pieces:—8. Treatises on the Duties of Bishops (reprinted at Wurzburg in 1749, 4to):—9. His Catechism, or Christian Doctrine, which has been translated into many different languages: it was suppressed at Vienna by the Emperor Maria Theresa. In his treatise De positate summi Pontificis centra Barileatum (Rom. 1610, 8vo), he also lays the in- direct foundation of the authority of the pope over princes and governments. The best edition of his whole works is that of Cologne, 1620 (7 vols. fol.). The De Controversiis was reprinted at Rome, 1682-40 (4 vols. 4to). A good Life of Bellarmino is given in Rube's Cele- brated Saints (Lond. 1664, 8 vols. 16mo). An Italian biography of Bellarmino, based on his autobiography, was published by Fulgatti (Rome, 1624). See also Frison, Via del Cardinal Bellarmino (Nancy, 1708, 4to); Niceron, Memoires, vol. xxxi; Bavl, Dict. Crit. s. v.; Bellarmino's Notes of the Church Refuted (Lond. 1840, 8vo); Hoefler, Biogr. Générale, v. 223, Herzog, Real- Encyklopädie der Vaterländischen Geschichte und Landeskunde, etc. (Lond. 1828, 12mo). Soult, Jean du, an eminent French cardinal, was born in 1492; was made bishop of Bayonne, and in 1532 bishop of Paris. In 1533 he returned from England, whither, in 1527, he had been sent as ambassador to Henry VIII, who was then on the point of a rupture with the court of Rome, but who promised Du Bellay that he would not take the final step provided that he were allowed time to defend himself by his pror. Du Bellay hastened to Rome, where he ar- rived in 1534, and obtained the required delay from Clement VII, which he sent instantly by a courier to England; but the courier put back during the day; the pope, sentence of excommunication was pronounced against Henry, and his kingdom laid under an interdict, in spite of the protestations of Du Bellay, at the instigation of the agents of Charles V. The courier arrived two days afterward. In 1535 the bishop was made cardinal, and served as Francis I court- fey (Antoine de Foisy), who made him successively bishop of Limoges (1541), archbishop of Bordeaux (1544), and bishop of Mals (1546). After the death of Francis Du Bellay was superseded by the Cardinal de Lorraine, and retired to Rome, when he was made bishop of Ostia, and died February 16th, 1560. Bellay was a friend of letters, and united with Budes in urging Francis I to establish the College de France. He wrote Poèmes, printed by Stephens (1560); Epitaphs Apologetica (1543, 8vo); and many letters.—Biog. Univ., tom. iv, p. 94; Niceron, Memoires, tom. xvi; Hoefler, Biogr. Générale, v., 227. Bellarde, Gabriel du Bao de, a French theologian, was born Oct. 17, 1717. He was early made chaplain to Louis, but his Port-Royalism and his severe principles shut him out from prebendary and lost him his canonry. He retired to Holland, where he collected Memoirs on the History of the Bull Unigenitus in the Pays Bas (4 vols. 12mo, 1755). He also wrote L'Histoire abrégée de l'Église de France (1765, 12mo); Van Eschen, with a Life (Lyons, 5 vols. fol., 1778), and a complete edition of the works of Arnauld (Lausanne, 1773-82, with pre- faces, notes, etc., 45 vols. in 4to).—Hoefler, Biogr. Générale, v., 238. Bellarde, Jean Baptist, Morvan de, a laborious French writer, known as the Abbé de Bellarde, was born at Pharsay, August 30th, 1648. He was a Jesuit 16 years, but was obliged to leave the society on account of his Cartesianism. He translated the Letters and Sermons of Basil, the Sermons of A. zierian, the Moralia of Ambrose, many of the works of Leo, Gregory Nazianzen, and Chrysostom, the Instruc- tions of Christ, and the synod of the Councils of Rome, and various other writings. His translations betray great negligence. He died April 26, 1734.—Hoefler, Biogr. Générale, v., 39. Bellarde, Octave de, a French prelate, was born in 1656, and nominated to the archbishopric of Sens in 1681. He maintained with firmness the immunities of the French clergy at the Assembly of Mantes in 1610, and was exiled by the offended court. In 1693 he subscribed the condemnation of the two works entitled Traité des Droits et Libertés de l'Église Gallicane, and Preuves of the same rights and liberties. He approved and defended the sentiments of Arnauld expressed in his book De la fréquentation des masses. He wrote St. Augustinas per se ipsum doctra Catholicos et rinceas Pelagianos, and died in 1646.—Hoefler, Biogr. Générale, v., 299. Bellermann, Johann Joachim, a German theologian, was born at Erfurt on Sept. 23, 1754. After finishing his studies at the University of Göttingen, he accepted a position as a professor in Russia. On his return in 1782 he became professor of theology in the University of Erfurt. After the suppression of this university he was called to Berlin as director of one of the colleges ("gymnasia"), and was at the same time appointed extraordinary professor at the University and conservator of the prince. He died Oct. 17, 1790. He is the author of numerous philological and theological works. The most important of the latter are Handbuch der biblischen Literatur (Erfurt, 1787, 4 vols.); Verzeichniss der Lehre der Hebräer (Berlin, 1813); Nachrichten aus dem Altrömische über Words and Therapeutik (Berlin, 1821); Ursus und Thammus, die ältesten Gemenen (Berlin, 1824); Ueber die Gemenen der Alten mit den Abraxabulic (3 pamphlets, Berlin, 1817-19).—Brockhaus, Conversationslexicon, s. v.; Hoefler, Biographie Générale, v., 251. Belle-veue, Armanc de, a Dominican, who took his doctor's degree in theology about 1325, and was made master of the Sacred Palace in 1327. He died in 1325, and left ninety-eight Hymns to the Psalms (Paris, 1519; Lyons, 1559; Brixen, 1610), with the title, "Sermones plane Divini." Also a collection of Prayers, and Meditations on the Life of our Lord (Mayence, 1505).—Landen, Eclat. Dict. s. v. Bellows (βελλος, mappa, 'ach, blower; Sept. φωτιστηριον) only occurs in Jer. vi. 29, and with reference to the casting of metal. As fires in the East are always of wood or charcoal, a sufficient heat must be attained by blowing. This is often raised by the help of fans, and the use of bellows is confined to the workers in metal. Such was the case anciently; and in the mural paintings of Egypt we observe no bellows but such as are used for the forge or furnace. They occur as early as the time of Moses, being represented in a tomb at Thebes which bears the name of Thothmes III. They consisted of a leathern bag secured and fitted into a frame, from which a long pipe extended for carrying the wind to the fire. They were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them, with one under each foot, and pressing them alternately, while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string he held in his hand. In one instance, it is observed from the painting that when the man left the bellows they were raised as if filled with air, and this would imply a knowledge of the valve. The earliest specimens seem to have been simply of reed, tipped with a metal point to resist the action of the fire (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, iii, 388).

Bell (usually βῆλλον, βέλτινα, especially the comb; also βύτιον, meina), especially the bone (λέγε). Among the Hebrews and most ancient nations, the bell was regarded as the seat of the carnal affections, as being, according to their notions, that which first partakes of sensuous pleasures (Titus i, 2; Phil. iii, 9; Rom. xvi, 18). It is used likewise of the stench for the heart, the innermost recesses of the soul (Prov. xviii, 8; xx, 27; xxii, 18). The expression embitter-ment of the belly signifies all the train of evils which may come upon a man (Jer. iv, 19; ix, 15; comp.
Num. xviii, 27). The "bell of hell" signifies the glare, or the under world. It is a strong phrase to express Jonah's dreadful condition in the sea.
(Ion. ii, 2).

Bell'main (Βαλημία v. r. Βαλαμία, Vulg. Belma), a place which, from the terms of the passage, would appear to have been south of Dothan (Judith vii, 9).
Possibly it is the same as Belmen (q. v.), though whether this is the case, or, indeed, whether either of them ever had any real existence, it is at present impossible to determine. See JUDITH. The Syriac has Abel-necholaka.

Bel'mas, Louis, bishop of Cambray, was born at Montréal (Aude). At the time of the Revolution he was one of the priests who took the oath demanded by the 'Civil Constitution of the Clergy.' In 1801 he was appointed coadjutor to the 'constitutional' bishop of Carcassonne, and in 1802 bishop of Cambray.
When Napoleon was crowned, Belmas signed a formula of retraction. His pastoral letters during the reign of Napoleon showed him to be a very devoted partisan of imperialism. When, according to the Concordat of 1817, Cambray was to be made an archbishopric, the pope opposed its on account of the former views of Bel-mas. After the Revolution of 1850 the government again intended to make him an archbishop, but the design was once more abandoned on account of the op-oposition of Rome. In 1841 he issued a pastoral letter strongly urging sincere submisson to and recognition of the government of the French state. This letter made a profound sensation in France, and greatly aided the Legitimists. Belmas died on July 21, 1841, at Cambray.
He was the last of the "constitutional" bishops.—See Hoefer, Biographie Générale, v, 290.

Bel'men (Βαλίμιν v. r. Βαλλίμιν and Βαλλίμια; Vulg. omits), a place named among the towns of Samaria as lying between Bethoron and Jericho (Judith iv, 4). The Hebrew name would seem to have been Abel-maım, but the only place of that name in the O.
T. was far to the north of the locality here alluded to.
See Abel-maim. The Syriac version has Abel-meholab, which is more consistent with the context. See Abel-meholab; Belmaim.

Belpage, Henry, D.D., a minister of the Secession Church of Scotland, was born at Falkirk, May 24, 1774, where his father was minister of the Associate Church. He entered the University of Edinburgh in 1786, and made his theological studies under Dr.
Lawson, at the secession seminary in Selkirk. He was licensed to preach in 1791. He was ordained as a colleague to his father in 1794, whom he succeeded as full pastor in 1798. His pulpit labors were very successful; he was one of the most popular and useful ministers of the day in Scotland. In 1814 he published Sacred Addresses and Meditations (12mo, 5th edition, 1841, Edinb.); in 1817, Practical Discourses for the Young (8vo; several editions issued); in 1821, Sacramental Discourses, 2d series; 1822, Sketches of Life and Character; 1823, Discourses on Domestic Life (12mo); 1826, Discourses to the Aged; besides a number of smaller works, catechisms, etc. He died Sept. 15, 1834. —Jameison, Cyclopedia of Relig. Biography, p. 42.

Belsham, Thomas, a Socinian divine of note, was born at Bedford, England, April 15, 1750. In 1776 he obtained a pastorate of a dissenting congregation at Worcester, from which, however, he removed in 1781 to take charge of the Daventry Academy. Here his sentiments underwent a change so far that, in 1788, he avowed himself a Unitarian of the school of Priestley. He resigned his station, and immediately took charge of Hackney College, a Unitarian institution, which was then, and, for some years, sunk in want of funds. In 1805 he became minister of Essex Street Chapel, London, where he remained during the rest of his life. He died at Hampstead, Nov. 11, 1829. After Dr. Priestley he was regarded as the leader of Universalism in England. The Unitarian Society for promoting Christian Knowledge was founded at his suggestion. He aided largely in preparing the Improved Version of the N. T. (Unitarian; Lond. 1806, 8vo). His principal writings are, A Calm Inquiry into the Scripture Doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, etc. (Lond. 1811, 8vo): —Evidences of Christ's Divinity: Exposition of the 14th Chapter in the Expositor, with Notes (Lond. 1822, 2 vols. 4to); Discourses Doctrinal and Practical Review of American Unitarians (1815, 8vo): Letters to the Bishop of London in Vindication of the Unitarians (1815, 8vo). His Life and Letters, by J. Williams, was published in 1833 (Lond. 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. Belshazzar (Heb. and Chald. Belshatatar or [on the signif. see below], בּלֶשָׁזָר; Sept. Belšαζαρ) is the name given in the book of Daniel to the last king of the Chaldeans, under whom Babylon was taken by the Medes and Persians (chap. v. 1; vii. 1; viii. 1). B.C. 538. Herodotus calls this king, and also his father, Labynetus, which is undoubtedly a corruption of Nabonidus, the name by which he was known to his enemies, in Joseph. contr. Apion, i. 20. Yet in Josephus (Ant. xii. 11, 2) it is stated that Baltasar was called Nabonidus by the Babylonians. Nabonidus in the Canon of Ptolemy, Nabonides in Euseb. Chron. Armen. i, 69 (from Alexander Polyhistor), and Nabonidocesus in Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 41 (from Megasthenes), are evidently the names of this king, which the circumstances recorded of him in Scripture are his impious feast and violent death (Dan. v.). During the period that the Jews were in captivity at Babylon, a variety of singular events concurred to prove that the sins which brought desolation on their country, and subjected them for a while to the Babylonian yoke, had not dissolved that covenant relation which, as the God of Abraham, Jehovah had entered into with them; and that any act of indignity perpetrated against this afflicted people, or any insult cast upon the service of their temple, would be regarded as an affront to the Majesty of Heaven, and not suffered to pass with impunity. The fate of Bel-hazzar affords a remarkable instance of this. He had had an opportunity of seeing in the case of his ancestors how hateful pride is, even in royalty itself; how instantly God can blast the dignity of the brightest crown, and consequently, how much the threathened sense of the dignity and stability of their thrones depend upon acknowledging the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth to whomsoever he will.

But this solemn lesson was lost upon Belshazzar. According to the views of some, Isaiah, in representing the Babylonian dynasty as the scourge of Palestine, styles Nebuchadnezzar a "Revolver," Nebuzaradnah a "Cocatrice," and Belshazzar a "fiery flying serpent," the worst of all (Isa. xlv, 4-29); but there is no reason for supposing the prophet in this passage to allude to any other event than the overthrow of the Philistines in the time of Hezekiah (see Henderson, Comment. in loc.).

The Scriptural narrative states that Belshazzar was warned of his coming doom by the handwriting on the wall. He was entertained by Daniel, who interpreted his dream during a splendid feast in his palace. Similarly Xenophon (Cyrop. vii, 5, 3) tells us that Babylon was taken by Cyrus in the night, while the inhabitants were engaged in feasting and revelry, and that the king was killed. On the other hand, the narratives of Herodotus (in Jos. xiv. 4) and of Herodotus and Megasthenes differ from the above account in some important particulars. Berosus calls the last king of Babylon Nabonnedus or Nabonidus (Nab-niit or Nab-na-maat, i.e. Nebo blesses or makes prosperous), and says that in the 17th year of his reign Cyrus took Babylon, the king having retreated to the neighborhood of Beno, in Syria. Berosus (Birs-i-nimrud), called by Niebuhr (Lect. or Anc. Hist. xi) the Chaldean Benares, the city in which the Chaldeans had their most revered objects of religion, and where they cultivated their science. Being blockaded in that city, Nabonnedus surrendered, his life was spared, and a principality or estate given to him to be held as a fief, where he died. According to Herodotus, the last king was called Lathybenus, a name easy to reconcile with the Nabonnedus of Berosus, and the Nabonidocesus of Megasthenes (Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix. 41). Cyrus, after defeating Lathybenus in the open field, appeared before Babylon, within which the besieged defied attack and even blockade. The wall had walls 800 feet high and 75 feet thick, forming a square of 15 miles to a side, and had stored up previously several years' provision. But he took the city by drawing off for a time the waters of the Euphrates, and then marching in with his whole army along its bed, and making a great Babylonian festival, while the people, feeling perfectly secure, were assailed over the whole city in reckless amusement. These discrepancies have latterly been cleared up by the discoveries of Sir Henry Rawlinson; and the histories of profane writers, far from contradicting the scriptural narrative, are shown to explain and confirm it. In 1854 he deciphered the inscriptions on some cylinders found in the ruins of Um-Kir (the ancient Ur of the Chaldees), containing memorials of the works executed by Nabonnedus (Journ. Soc. Lit. 1854, p. 252; Jan. 1862). From these inscriptions it appears that the eldest son of Nabonnedus was called Bel-shar-ezer, and admitted by him to the succession. The earliest king called Belshazzar by name is compounded of Bel (the Babylonian god), Skhr (a king), and the same termination as in Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, etc., and is contracted into Belhazzar, just as Neriglissar (again with the same termination) is formed from Nergal-shar-ezer. In a communication to the Athenaeum, No. 1577, Sir Henry Rawlinson says, "We can now understand how Belshazzar, as joint king with his father, may have been governor of Babylon when the city was attacked by the combined forces of the Medes and Persians, and may have perished in the assault which followed; while Nabonnedus leading a force to the relief of the place was defeated, and obliged to fly on refuge in Borsippa. Belshazzar, after a short resistance, and being subsequently assigned, according to Berosus, an honorable retirement in Carmania. In accordance with this view, we arrange the last Chaldean kings as follows: Nebuchadnezzar, his son Evilmerodach, Neriglissar, Labrooecharchas, etc.; the son of Osip, king of Borsippa, was called Nabonnedus or Lathybenus, and Belshazzar. Herodotus says that Lathybenus was the son of Queen Nitociris; and Megasthenes (Euseb. Chr. Arm. p. 60) tells us that he succeeded Labrooecharchas, but was not of his family. In Dan. v. 2, Nebuchadnezzar is called the father of Belshazzar. This, of course, need only mean grand-father or ancestor. Now Neriglissar usurped the throne.

on the murder of Evilmerodach (Beroe, op. Joseph. Apion, i.): we may therefore well suppose that on the death of his son Labrosarchad, Nebuchadnezazar's family was restored in the person of Nabonnedus or La-bynetus, possibly the son of that king and Nitosiris, and father of Belshazzar. The chief objection to this supposition would be, that if Neriglissar married Nebuchadnezazar's daughter (Joseph. c. Ap. i. 21), Nabonnedus would through her connection be linked with Labrosarchad. This difficulty is met by the theory of Rawlinson (Herod. Essay viii, § 35), who connects Belshazzar with Nebuchadnezazar through his mother, thinking it probable that the Nabu-nahhah, whom he does not consider related to Nebuchadnezazar, would strengthen his position by marrying the daughter of that king, who would thus be Belshazzar's maternal grandfather. A totally different view is taken by Marcus Niebuhr (Geschichte Assyr. und Babyl. seits Phäl., p. 51), who considers Belshazzar to be another name for Evilmerodach, the son of Nebuchadnezazar. He identifies their characters by comparing Dan. vi with the language of Berosus about Evilmerodach (φοιάει των πραγμάτων ἁνίμως καὶ ἀσάλειας). He considers that the capture of Babylon described in Daniel was not by the Persians, but by the Medes, under Astyages (i.e. Astiages), and that between the reigns of Evilmerodach or Belshazzar, and Neriglissar, we must insert a brief period during which Babylon was subject to the Medes. This solves a difficulty as to the age of Darius (Dan. vi, 31; comp. Rawlinson, Essay iii, § 11), but most people will probably prefer the actual facts discovered by Henry Rawlinson to the theory (though doubtless very ingenious) of Niebuhr. On Rawlinson's view, Belshazzar died B.C. 538, on Nebu-bur's B.C. 559 (Göbel, De Belasariot, Laba. 1757.).—Smith. See BABYLONIA.

Beltesh'azzar (Heb. Belshathazzar, ܢܪܐ ܫܠܝܚܐ, Bel's prince, that is, whom Bel favors; Sept. Belkhaṣṣar), the Chaldean or Assyrio-Babylonian name, given to Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezazar, in Babylon (Dan. i. 7, etc.). See DANIEL.

Belus (Βῆλος). 1. According to classical mythology, a son of Poseidon by Lilova or Eurynome. He was twin brother of Agenor, and father of Egyptus and Danaus. He was believed to be the ancestral hero and national divinity of several Eastern nations, from which the legends about him were transplanted to Greece, and his name mixed up with Greek myths. (See Apollod. ii. 1, 4; Diod. i. 96; Servius, ad Æn. i. 733.) See BAAL.

2. The father of the Carthaginian queen Dido, otherwise called Pygmalion. He conquered Cyprus and then gave it to Teucer. (See Virgil, Æn. i. 621; Servius, ad Æn. i. 626, 645.) By some he was thought to be the Tyrian king Ethbaal (q. v.), father of the Israelitish queen Jezebel (1 Kings xvi, 31), from whose period (she was killed B.C. 883) this does not much differ, for Carthage was founded (according to Joseph. Apion, i. 18) B.C. 861.

Belus (Βῆλος), called also Pogida by Pliny (v. 19), a small river of Palestine, described by Pliny as taking its rise from a lake called Cendevia, at the roots of Mount Carmel, which running five miles, enters the sea near Tpolemais (xxxxi, 26), or two stadia from the city according to Josephus (War, x. 2). It is chiefly celebrated among the ancients for its vitrified sand; and the accidental discovery of the manufacture of glass (q. v.) is ascribed by Pliny to the banks of this river. It is related, as a proverbial tale, that its wholesome water, but consecrated to religious ceremonies (comp. Tacitus, Hist. v. 7). It is now called Nahor Nunsan, but the Lake Cendevia has disappeared. It is an ingenious conjecture of Relland (Pollet. p. 290) that its ancient appellation may be connected with the Greek name for glass (αἰθέρ), and it is possible that the name appears in the Scriptural one, Bealoth (q. v.), incorrectly rendered "in Aloth" (1 Kings iv, 16). For the temple of Belus, see BAAL.

Bema (βῆμα, rostrum), the third or innermost part of the ancient churches, corresponding to what we now call the chancel. The bema was the whole space where stood the altar, the bishop's throne, and the seats of the priests; in which sense Bingham understands the fifty-sixth canon of Laodicea, which forbids priests to go into the bema and take their seats there before the bishop comes (see Chrysost. Hom. 35, de Pentecost. tom. v, p. 533). The name bema arose from its being more exalted than the rest of the church, and raised upon steps. As the bema was especially devoted to the clergy, they were called sometimes ων ρου βημαρος; and recte ρου βημαρους the Orans and the Bemae. —Bingham, Orig. Ecc. bk. viii, ch. vi; Sueton, The- seans, i, 682; Land, Ecc. Dict. ii, 143.

Bemo, John, a Seminole Indian, converted to Christianity, and afterward instrumental in great good to his tribe. He was born in the year 1825, in Florida. When quite young he was brought to St. Augustine by his father, who perished there through the brutality of the whites. Bemo was kidnapped by a ship's crew, and carried on a several years' voyage, visiting Europe, Asia, and Africa. During this voyage he was thoroughly converted, through the agency of a pious sailor. After other voyages he attended school a year with the "Friends" in Philadelphia, and then commenced laboring with great success among his people, at their new home in the State of Florida, and in the Eastern cities he kept them alive when threatened with starvation. Further facts are wanting. He was a greatly wronged boy, but an apostolic and blessed man.—Thomson, Biographical Sketches, p. 138.

Ben (Heb. וָט; son; Sept. omit; Vulg. Ben), a Levite of the "second degree," one of the porters appointed by David to the service of the ark, apparently as an assistant musician (1 Chr. xxv, 16). B.C. 1043.

Ben—("ן, son of") is often found as the first element of Scriptural proper names (see those following), in which case the word which follows it is always to be considered dependent on it, in the relation of our genitive. The word which follows Ben—may either be of itself a proper name, or be an appellative or abstract, the principle of the connection being essentially the same in both cases. Comp. An.—As to the first class, the Syro-Arabian nations being all particularly addicted to genealogy, and possessing no surnames, nor proper names in our sense, there is no means of attaching a definite designation to a person except by adding some accessory specification to his distinctive, or, as we would term it, Christian name. This explains why so many persons, both in the Old and New Testaments, are distinguished by the addition of the names of their father. The same usage is especially frequent among the Arabs; but they have improved its definiteness by adding the name of the person's child, in case he has one. In doing this, they always observe this arrangement—the name of the child, the person's own name, and the name of his father. Thus the designation of the patriarch Isaac would in Arabic run thus: ‘Abel of Isaac, Isaac, son of Abraham (Abu Ja'qib, Ishaq, ben Ibrahim). As to the latter class, there is an easy transition from this strict use of son to its employment in a figurative sense, to denote a peculiar dependence of derivation. The principle of such a connection not only explains such proper names as Ben-Chesb (son of Cherub), but applies to many striking metaphors in other classes of words, as sons of the bow, a son of seventeen years (the usual mode of denoting age), a hill, the son of oil (Isa. vii, 2), and many others, in which our translation effects the Oriental type of the expression. All proper names which begin with Ben belong to one or the other of these classes. Ben-Aminadab, Ben-Gaber, and Ben-Chedid (1 Kings iv, 10, 11), illustrate all the possibilities of combination noticed above. In these names "Ben" would, perhaps, be better not translated as "son," although the Vulgate has preserved it, as the Sept. also appears to have once done in ver. 8, to judge by the reading there.—Kitto.
BEN-ABINADAB

These remarks apply also in part to Bar—(q. v.), the Aramaic synonyme of Ben—, as in the name Bar-Abbas.

The following are instances in which our transliteration has shown whether the prefix Ben— should not be transliterated, and have therefore placed it in the margin, giving "son" in the text: Ben-Hur, Ben-Dekar, Ben-Hesed, Ben-Abinadab, Ben-Geber (1 Kings iv, 8—13) [for each of these, see the latter part of the name]. Of the following the reverse is true: Ben-Hanan, Ben-Zopheth (1 Chron. iv, 20; Ben-o (1 Chron. xxiv, 26, 27); Ben-jamite (Psa. vii, title; Judg. ii, 13; xix, 16; 1 Sam. ix, 1, 4; 2 Sam. xx, 1; Esth. ii, 5).

2. Jehoiada the chief priest—(1 Chron. xxvii, 5), and therefore of the tribe of Levi, though a native of Kabzeel (2 Sam. xxiii, 20; 1 Chron. xii, 22), in the south of Judah; set by David (1 Chron. xii, 24) over his body-guard of Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. viii, 16; 1 Kings i, 88; 1 Chron. xviii, 17; 2 Sam. xx, 23), and occupying a middle rank between the first three of the Gibborim, or "mighty men," and the thirty "valiant men of the army") (2 Sam. xxiii, 22, 80; 1 Chron. xi, 24; xxvii, 6; and see Kennicott, Diss. p. 177). The exploits which gave him this rank are narrated in 2 Sam. xxiii, 20, 21; 1 Chron. xi, 22: he overcame two Moabish champions ("lions of God"), slew an Egyptian giant with his own spear, and went down into an exhausted cistern and destroyed a lion which had fallen into it when covered with snow. He was captain of the host for the third month (1 Chron. xxvii, 5). B.C. 1046. Beniah remained faithful to the king during Adonijah’s attempt on the crown (1 Kings i, 80, 10, 26), a matter in which he took part in his official capacity as commander of the king’s body-guard (1 Kings i, 82, 86, 88, 44); and after Adonijah and Joab had both been put to death by his hand (2 Kings ii, 25, 29, 30, 34), as well as Shimei (2 Kings ii, 40), he was raised by Solomon into the place of Joab as commander-in-chief of the whole army (ii, 35, iv, 4).

B.C. 1015. See DAVID. Beniah appears to have had a son called, after his grandfather, Jehoiada, who succeeded Abihphel after the person of the king (1 Chron. xxvii, 34). But this is possibly a copyist’s mistake for "Beniah, the son of Jehoiada." See also BENAIAH, "the son of Zerubbabel." 2. A Pirathonite of the tribe of Ephraim, one of David’s thirty mighty men (2 Sam. xxxi, 30; 1 Chron. xxi, 31), and the captain of the eleventh monthly course (2 Sam. xxvii, 14). B.C. 1044. See DAVID.

3. A Levite in the time of David, who "played with a harp on Alamoth" at the removal of the ark (1 Chron. xv, 18, 20; xvi, 5). B.C. 1018.

4. A priest in the time of David, appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark when brought to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv, 24; xvi, 6). B.C. 1048.

5. The son of Jeel, and father of Zechariah, a Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chron. xx, 14). B.C. 948.

6. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, one of the "overseers (בְּנֵי־אָה) of offerings" (2 Chron. xxxi, 13). B.C. 726.

7. One of the "princes (בְּנֵי־אָה)" of the families of Simeon who dispossessed the Amalekites from the pastures of Gedor (1 Chron. iv, 30). B.C. cir. 712.

8. The father of Pelasgus, which latter was "a prince of the people" in the time of Ezekiel (xi, 1, 13). B.C. ante 671.

9. One of the "sons" of Parosh, who divorced his gentle wife after the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 20). B.C. 456.

10. One of the "sons" of Bani, who did likewise (Ezra x, 85). B.C. 458.

11. A fourth of the "sons" of Hebo, who did the same (Ezra x, 48). B.C. 458.

Ben-am'ni (בֵּנֵי־נָמִי, son of my kindred, i. e. born of incest; Sept. repeat, λιποῦμεν, γίνομαι γίνομεν), the original form of the name AMNON (q. v.), the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix, 38).

Ben-bê'arak (Heb. Beni-'berak, בֵּנֵי־בֶּרְאָק, sons of Berak or lightning [comp. Boanerges]; Sept. Bâvîsâpâr v. r. Bâvîsâvâr; Vulg. et Bane et Baruch), one of the cities of the tribe of Dan, mentioned only in Josh. xiii, 46, between Jelud and Gath-rimmon. The pacity of information which we possess regarding this tribe (omitted entirely from the lists in 1 Chron. ii—viii, and only one family mentioned in Num. xxxvi) makes it impossible to say whether the "sons of Berak," who gave their name to this place, belonged to Dan, or were, as we may perhaps infer from the name, earlier settlers dispossessed by the tribe. The reading of the Syriac, Bâd-lêbârak, favors this latter foreign origin, but is not confirmed by any other version. It is evidently the Baraka, a "village in the tribe of Dan near Azotus," mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (in the Onomasticon, s. v. Barth, Baraka), although they speak confusedly of its then existing name (Baraka, Barqa). It is one of the present Moslem village Baraka (Robinson, Researches, p. 377, iii, App. p. 118), a little north of Ashdod (Van de Velde, Map). The same place appears to be referred to in the Talmud (Sanhedr. xxxiii, 1), and was the residence of the famous Rabbi Akiba (q. v.). Schwar, however, assigns this location to Pataei (p. 141).

Bénédict. See Benezef.

Benedictite, or the "song of the three Hebrew children," is a canticle appointed by the rubric of the Church of England to be said or sung at the morning service, instead of the hymn Te Deum, whenever the minister may think fit. It is a paraphrase of the forty-eighth Psalm. In the Book of Common Prayer published under the sanction of Edward VI, it was ordered that the Te Deum should be said daily throughout the year, except in Lent, when the Benedictite was to be used. The minister had no choice according to this appointment; but in the subsequent revision of the Prayer Book, the choice was left to the option of the minister of the Te Deum or the Benedictite. This hymn was sung as early as the 3d century. Chrysostom speaks of it as sung in all places throughout the world.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xiv, ch. xi, § 6; Procter, On Common Prayer, p. 224.

Benedict I, Pope, surnamed Romulus, a Roman, elected to the papal see after John III, June 3, 574. He occupied the see about four years, dying in 578. He was buried in the pontifical Rotunda of St. Peter, surrounded gloriously by the inroads of the Lombards and from famine. Like his predecessors, he confirmed the fifth ecumenical council. An epistle to the Spanish blab—op David, which has been ascribed to him, is not genuine.

II. Pope, also a Roman, succeeded Leo II, 29th June, 684, and died 7th May, 685. His incumbency was marked by nothing of note.

III. Pope, elected July 17, 855. His title was disputed by Anastasius, who was supported by the emperors Lothaire and Louis, whose deputies entered Rome, deposed Benedict, and imprisoned him. Rome was thrown into consternation at these acts; and the bishops, assembling in spite of the threats of the emperor's deputies, refused to recognise Anastasius. Benedict, removed from the church where he had been imprisioned, was carried in triumph by the people to the Lateran. In 858, the king of the Anglo-Saxons, who established an English school at Rome. He confirmed the deposition of Bishop Gregory of Syracuse, pronounced in 854 by a synod of Constantinople, which occasioned soon after the Greek schism. There are still extant four of his epistles (Manz. xv, 110-120). He held the see only two years and a half, and died April 8, 858.

IV. Pope, succeeded John IX, April 6, 900, and held the papacy nearly four years, dying Oct. 29, 903. He crowned, in 901, Louis, King of Provence, as Roman Emperor. There are still extant two of his epistles, one addressed to the bishops and princes of Gaul, and the other to the clergy, and people of Langres, whose exiled bishop he reinstated (Manz. xviii, 235-286).

V. Pope, elected in 964. John XII, his predecessor, who had been protected by the Emperor Otto the Great against Berenger and Adalbert, ungratefully took the part of the emperor's enemies. Otto, justly irritated by this conduct, convoked a council at Rome in 968, where John was deposed and Leo VIII elected. John soon after repaired to Rome, held another council in 964, and in his turn deposed Leo; but soon after this John was assassinated, and his party elected Benedict V to succeed him. Otto soon appeared again on the scene, laid siege to Rome, and carried away Benedict (who consented to his deposition) captive into Germany. Leo VIII died at Rome in April, 965; the people demanded Benedict as his successor, and the emperor would probably have granted their request, but Benedict died July 5 of the same year. The historian, who is the Church of Rome are naturally very much puzzled in deciding whether Benedict was a lawful pope or not; but the question is generally compromised by recognising both Leo and Benedict.

VI. Pope, son of Hildebrand, supposed to have been elected pope on the death of John XII, A.D. 974. On the death of the Emperor Otto, he was strangled or poisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, 974. The papacy about this time was in a most degraded condition.

VII. Pope, son of a count of Tuscumum, ascended the pontifical throne in 976, and died July, 984. He held two councils in Rome; in the one he communicated the antipope Boniface VIII; in the other, all those guilty of simony. A letter in which he confirms certain prerogatives of the bishop of Lorch is found in Lambecii, Biblioth. Cens. lib. ii. Several other bulls on the privileges of certain diocesan churches are given by Manz., tom. iii.

VIII. Pope, son of Gregory, count of Tuscumum, succeeded Sergius IV, June 17, 1012. He was driven from Rome by his competitor Gregory, who in turn was expelled by Henry, King of Germany. In 1014 Benedict crowned Henry Roman Emperor, and presented him with a globe surmounted by a cross, which became the emblem of one of the emblems of the empire. The emperor confirmed to the Church of Rome all the donations made by Charlemagne and the Otho, declared that the election of a pope would not require any longer the confirmation of the emperor, and reserved for himself and his successors only the right of sending commissaries to the consecration of the pope. At the request of the emperor, Benedict ordered the recital of the Constantinopolitan symbol during the mass, hoping that it would facilitate a reunion with the Greek Church. In 1016 the Saracens made an irruption into Italy, but were defeated by a host collected by Benedict's energy. He died July 10, 1024—Gieseler, Ch. Hist. period iii, div. ii, § 22.

IX. The boy-pope, one of the worst monsters that ever held the papal throne. He was elected at Rome, 1088, but his vile conduct excited the Romans to expel him in 1045, and Silvester III was elected, who held it for about three months, when Benedict, by the influence of his family, succeeded for a time in recovering his dignity. However, he was again compelled to flee, and Johannes Gratianus was, A.D. 1045, put into his place, who took the style of Gregory VI. It is said, indeed, that Gratian bought his elevation from Benedict, who wished to marry an Italian princess. But there were the usual actuality living at the same time, and Rome was filled with brawls and murders. To remedy this, Henry the Black, king of Germany, convoked a council at Sutri, near Rome, in December, 1046, where Gregory VI was deposed, and, by the common consent of Germans and Romans, Sutuius was elected pope, and consecrated under the title of Benedict VII. He held the see under the end of nine months, i.e. October 9th, 1047; upon which Benedict came to Rome for the third time, where he held his ground till July, 1048, when he was replaced by Damasus II, the nominee of the emperor. Nothing is known for certain concerning him after this period, but he is believed to have died in 1054.—Bibl. Univ. iv, 188.

X. (Giovanni di Velletri), was raised to the papacy by a faction in March, 1308, the instant Pope Stephen IX had closed his eyes. Benedict was so ignorant and obtuse that he obtained the surname of Minuto, stupid, Hildebrand, upon his return from Germany in 1050, caused Gerard to be elected under the name of Nicholas II, to whom Benedict quickly yielded. He died in confinement in 1059.—Bibl. Univ. iv, 183.

XI. Pope (Niccolò Bessacini), was born at Trevia in 1340, entered, at the age of fourteen, the order of Dominicans, and became later the general of his order. Under Boniface he was made cardinal and bishop of Ostia. He was elected pope October 27, 1303, upon the death of Boniface VIII. When elected to the papal throne he was cardinal-bishop of Ostia. His pontificate was of the longest and most interesting periods only to terminate in disasters. He took off the sentence of excommunication pronounced against the King of Denmark, and the interdict laid upon his kingdom, and annulled the bulls of Boniface VIII against Philippo-Joel of France. He died of poison at Perugia on the 6th or 7th of July, 1304, and was enrolled among the synops by Pope Clement XII, April 24th, 1736, his festival being marked on the 7th of July. He left Commentaries on Job, the Psalms, the Apocalypse, and Matthew, besides some volumes of Sermons and his Bulls.

XII (originally Jacques de Nouveau), a native of Savardun, and monk of Citeaux, afterwards bishop of Pamiers and of Mirepoix, pope from Dec. 1334, to April 1342, was the third of the Avignon (q. v.) popes, the friend of Petrarch, and one of the most virtuous of the pontiffs. Scarcely was he elevated to the pontificate when a deputation was sent to him from Rome pressing him to return to the ancient seat; but circumstances induced Benedict to resign. But the Castilian clergy on the necessity of reforming their lives, and endeavored, though with little success, to correct some of the more glaring evils of the Roman system. He died April 20, 1342, at Avignon. See his life in Baluze, Vie des Papes d'Avignon.
cardinal by Gregory IX. On the death of Gregory XI he began the great Western schism, by the election of Urban VI at Rome and of Clement VII at Avignon. Pedro de Luna took part with the latter, who made him his legate in Spain. Upon the death of Clement, Pedro was chosen by the cardinals attached to the party at Avignon to succeed him on the 28th of September, 1394, and in the mean time Boniface VIII had ascended the throne at Rome. To put an end to the schism, it was agreed by all the sovereigns of Europe, except the king of Aragon, that a cession of the papal dignity should be made to the party by which Benedict and Boniface refused to resign; whereupon, in a national council held at Paris May 22d, 1398, it was agreed to withdraw from the obedience of Benedict. This example having been followed in almost all the countries of Europe, sixteen of the cardinals who had adhered to Benedict deserted him. He was besieged at Avignon by the Marquis de Boucicaut, and with difficulty escaped. After this the aspect of his affairs for a time brightened; but at length, in the council of Pisa, convoked in 1409, both Benedict and Gregory XII were excommunicated and deposed. Benedict, driven from Avignon, retired to the little castle of La Roche-en-Ardenne on the borders of Aragon, Castile, and Scotland. Thus the schism still remained; and it was necessary to call another council, which met at Constance in 1414, where Ottone Colonna was elected pope under the name of Martin V, who anathematized Benedict, but without producing any effect, since he continued in his rebellion till his death, which happened at Pefiscola November 17th, 1424. So far did he carry his resolution to prolong the schism, that he exacted a promise from the two cardinals who continued with him that they would elect another pope to succeed him after his death: this was done in the presence of a special legate of the Pope. (Hist. of the Popes, p. 280.)

XIII (5). Pope, originally Pietro Francisco Orsini, was born in 1459, and was raised to the papal chair May 29th, 1724. He was pious, virtuous, and liberal; but, unfortunately, too much confusion in Cardinal Cesiola, his minister, who shamefully oppressed the people. A fruitless attempt which he made to reconcile the Roman, Greek, Lutheran, and Calvinist churches bears honorable testimony to his tolerant spirit. His theological works, including Homilies on Exodus, etc., were published at Rome (1728, 3 vols. fol.). He died in 1730. His Life was written by Alessandro Borgia (Rom. 1741).—Mosehun, Eccl. Hist. (v. 4.)

XIV. Pope, originally Prospero Lambertini, of a noble family of Bologna, was born in 1675, became in 1727 bishop of Ancona, in 1728 cardinal, in 1731 archbishop of Bologna, and succeeded Clement XII August 17th, 1746. He was a man of great ability, learning, and industry, and was especially distinguished in the canon and civil law. He died May 5, 1758, after having signalized his pontificate by the wisdom of his government, and his zeal for the propagation of Romanism. During the eighteen years of his reign Rome enjoyed peace, plenty, and prosperity, and half a century after his death the position of the pontificate was still remembered and spoken of at Rome as the last period of unalloyed happiness which the country had enjoyed. His tolerance was remarkable; indeed, he exposed him to the censure of the rigorists among the college of cardinals. Without exhibiting any thing like indifference to the doctrines of the Church of which he was the head, he showed a kind and friendly disposition toward all Christians of whatever denomination, whether kings or ordinary travellers, who visited his capital; and in Germany, France, and Naples his influence was constantly exerted to discourage persecution, and to restrain the abuse of ecclesiastical power. Benedict XIV was a learned man; not only in theology, in the classical writers, and in elegant literature, and he had a taste for the fine arts. His works were published at Rome in 12 vols. 4to (1747). The most remarkable are his treatise De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonisatione, in four books, a work full of historical and theological learning.—De Synodo Diocesano, which also appeared in the Acta Romana Eclesiastica.—De Missa Officio, libri iii; besides his Bullarium, or collection of bulls issued by him, and several letters and dissertations in Italian. Benedict was always opposed to the Jesuits, and, when he died, was preparing to suppress the order. —Vie du pape Benoit XIV (Paris, 1775); Ranke, Hist. of Popes, ii, 287. devoted to worship and to study." "In the Rule, Benedict distinguishes four sorts of monks: (1) Canonibles, living under an abbott in a monastery; (2) Anchorites, who retire into the desert; (3) Sarbacanes, dwelling two and three in the same cell. (4) Gyrages, monks of the monastery, who dwell in the last two kinds he condemns. His Rule is composed for the Canons-bites. First he speaks of the qualifications of abbots. Then he notes the hours for divine service, day and night, and the order of it. After this he treats of the different punishments, i. e. separation from the monastery, the cloister, and the church. He directs that a penitent shall be received, after expulsion, as far as the third time; that the monks shall have all things in common, and that every thing shall be at the disposal of the abbots. The monks are to work by turns in the refectory and kitchen; to attend and be kind to the sick; to perform manual labors at stated hours, and to wear the same dress."—Cave,

Benedict, Bishop, St., was born of noble parentes in Northumberland about the year 526. He was originally bred to the profession of arms, and served under king Oswy, who made him his minister, with an estate suited to his rank; but at the age of twenty-five he took leave of the court, and made a voyage to Rome, and upon his return home devoted himself to study and exercises of piety. About six years afterward he again travelled to Rome with Alfred, king Oswy's son, and subsequently retired into the monastery of Lerins in France, where he took the vows.
Having spent two years in this retirement, he returned to England, upon occasion of Theodore's journey thither, who had been nominated to the see of Canterbury, and upon his arrival was made abbot of St. Augustine's at Canterbury. In 621 we find him again at Rome, when he brought back to England many liturgical works. Soon after this, i. e. in 674, he retired into the county of Northumberland, and there founded the monastery of St. Peter at Wemerton, and, ten years later, that of St. Paul at Jarrow. After this he again visited Rome and many of the Italian monasteries, seemingly for the purpose of collecting books, etc., and learning the customs and discipline of those houses.
He is also said to have introduced into England the Gregorian method of chanting, and for that purpose to have brought with him from Rome the abbott John, regarded him as their father and superior, and he took advantage of this feeling toward him to introduce the needful reforms into the various houses, and thus became the celebrated renovator of religious discipline in France. He collected a large library, and encouraged his monks to multiply copies of the books; and many of the secular clergy, induced by the fame of the establishment, repaired to the monastery; among them the Aniane, to learn the duties of their calling. He obtained great influence with Charlemagne, and used it to promote monasteries. In 779 and 780 Charlemagne sent him, with Leobaldus of Lyons and Nephridius of Narbonne, to Felix of Urgel, and he composed several treatises on the Adoration of the Virgin (c. vi. 10) (ed. by Baluze, Miscell. v, 1-62). In 814 he became abbey of the monastery of Ida, built by Louis near Aix-la-Chapelle on purpose to have Benedict at hand. He used his clerical and political influence in behalf of monastery up to his death in 821. His principal writings are: 1. Codex Regularam, ed. by Holsteinus at Rome (1561; Paris, 1646, 4to).—2. Concordia Regu-larum, ed. Menard (Paris, 1688).—3. Modus diversarum penitentiarum (ed. Baluze, at the end of the Capitular ria of Charlemagne).—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 801; Mos-

Benedictus, a monastic order of the Roman Catholic Church, founded by Benedict of Nursia in 515 (according to others, 529) in Monte Cassino. The leading idea of this monastic rule of life was to [see BENEDICT OF NURSIA], that the monks should live in common a retired life, remain poor, and render unlimited obedience to their superiors. Benedict states explicitly (ch. lxiii) that his rule can lead only to the beginning of a holy life, while he refers his monks for perfectness to the Scriptures and the fathers. His aim was to give to repentant and religious men of the world a house of refuge, but he had no projects for a universal mission in the Church such as those entertained by the latter mendicant orders. He received children into his convents, who, under the common superintendence of all the monks, and clothed in the monastic habit, were educated for the holy ministry.

The spread of the order was very rapid. As early as 541 it was introduced into Sicily, and in 548 into France. The order began to take extraordinary diensions through the exertions of Pope Gregory the Great, who lent the whole weight of his vast influence to its diffusion. Augustine introduced it into England and Ireland, and the followers of Cassian and Columban in large number exchanged their former rules for those of Benedict. When, in the eighth century, the bulk of the Germanic world entered into connection with the Roman Catholic Church, the prominent influence of the monks himself and of Benedictine secured for the principles of his order almost general adoption by the rising monastic institutions of Germany. As its wealth and power advanced, the Benedictine order by degrees almost monopolized the science and learning in the Christian Church, and established a large number of distinguished schools. Their many Irish and English monasteries and parishes were the first to lay the foundation of the scholastic theology. As many of the convents amassed great riches, the strict rule and primitive purity of morals disappeared, and attempts at reform were called forth.
The most remarkable among these were those of Benedict of Aniane (q. v.) in the eighth century, of Abbot Benno at Clugny 910, at Hirschat 1069, at Val-

in Spain, Portugal, and Sardinia, reduced also the number of Benedictine convents greatly. In Austria, however, the order was restored in 1892, and at present more than one half of its members are living in Austrian convents. In Bavaria, the order received, by a rescript of 1834, the charge of several state colleges. In France an attempt at reviving the congregation of St. Maur was made in 1835 by the establishment of a Benedictine community at Solesmes. These new St. Maurines have already developed a great literary activity, but have as yet neither been able to extend themselves nor to attain the celebrity of their predecessors. In Switzerland the order has, besides several other convents, the convent of Einsiedeln, one of the most famous places of pilgrimages in the Roman Catholic Church. The order has also been re-established in England and Belgium. In the United States they have St. Vincent's Abbey, in the diocese of Pittsburgh, which in 1858 elected for the first time an abbot for lifetime. Most of the Austrian abbeys followed, until very recently, a mitigated rule; and the endeavors of papal delegates, aided by the state government, to force a stricter rule upon them, led in 1854 to protracted and serious disturbances. At the general chapter of the congregation of Monte Cassino in 1858, to which also the convent of St. Paul's in Rome belonged, it was resolved to re-establish, for the benefit of all the monks of the Benedictine family who wish to study in Rome, the college of St. Anselm, such as it had been under the foundation of Pope Innocent XI.

According to the calculation of Fesseler, the Benedictines count among their members 15,700 authors, 4000 bishops, 1600 archbishops, 200 cardinals, 24 popes, and 1560 canonized saints. Among the great literary names that adorn the order are those of D'Ancher, Mabillon, and Montfaucon, all St. Maurines. The principal sources of information on the Benedictines are, Mabillon, Annales Ord. S. Benedicti (Paris, 1708-39, 6 vols. [carries the history up to 1157?]); Ziegelauber, Historia rei Benedicti Ord. S. Benedict. (Aug. Vind. 1764, 4 vols. fol.). See also Helyot, Ordres Religionz, i. 425 sq.; Montalembert, Les Moinz d'Occident (Paris, 1860).

Benedictine Nuns, nuns following the order of Benedict. They claim St. Scholastica, the sister of Benedict, as their founder, but without historical grounds. All previous orders were gradually forced to adopt the Benedictine rule, and so it spread widely throughout Christendom. In France they possessed one hundred and sixteen priories and abbeys in the gift of the king alone, and in England seventy-four houses. In some of these houses the nuns followed the strictest rules, never touching meat, wearing no lombrosa in the eleventh century, at Burghenal in 1425. These reforms introduced among the followers of Benedict the congregational system, combining several convents into a congregation, with a common government. The congregation of English Benedictines founded by Augustine was reformed by St. Dunstan in 900, again by Lanfranc in 1072, and finally suppressed by Henry VIII. The congregational government has since remained that of the Benedictines, who have never had a general and central government like the other orders. The efforts to introduce a greater centralization led, from the end of the tenth century, to the establishment of new orders. Thus arose, on the basis of the rule of St. Benedict, but with many alterations, the orders of Camaldoli [see CAMALDULI]. Fontevrault (q. v.), Chartreux (q. v.), Citeaux [see CISTERCIANS], Humiliates, Olivetans, Tironians [see BERNARD OF TROY], and others.

liven, and sleeping on the bare boards. Others admitted some relaxation of this severity. The Benedictine nunneries were rarely united in congregations, but remained single, under the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishops, rarely under that of the Benedictine motherhouse, and disorderly and disconnected among them earlier and more generally than among the monks; a great preference was given to the nobility, and some of the richest monasteries even changed themselves into secular institutions of ladies of nobility, which retained of the Benedictine order nothing but the name and coat of arms; a congregation of reformers, the Benedictine nuns were founded, among which the most important were the congregation of Mount Calvary, founded in 1617, and the congregation of the Perpetual Adoration of the Sacred Sacrament, who, in addition to other austerities, are obliged to have perpetually one of their number kneeling day and night before the sacrament. They were founded by Catherine de Bar, a native of St. Dié, in Lorraine, in 1615, and ratified by Innocent XI in 1667. Both have in recent times re-established several monasteries in France; the latter also in Italy, Austria, and Poland.

Benediction. (1.) In the Romish Church, an ecclesiastical ceremony, whereby a thing is rendered sacred or venerable. It differs from consecration, in which uncreated grace is infused. The Romanists consecrate the chalice and bless the pyx. Superstition in the Romish Church has introduced benedictions for almost everything. There are forms of benediction for wax candles, for breads, for ashes, for church vessels and ornaments, for flags and ensigns, arms, first-fruits, houses, vessels, paraschal eggs, haircloth of penitents, churchyards, etc. In general, these benedictions are performed by aspersions of holy water, signs of the cross, and forms of prayer, according to the nature of the ceremony. The forms of benediction are found in the Roman Pontifical and in the Missal. The beatit benediction (benedictio beatissima) is the vaticinium given to dying persons. For the history of the benedictio beatissima, see Boissoneau, Dict. des Cérémonies, i. 246 sqq. Migne, Liturgie Catholique, p. 149 sqq.

(2.) In the Protestant Church, the blessing of the people by the minister during divine service and at its close. In the Church of England it is given at the end of the common service as well as at the conclusion of worship. The minister does not pretend to impart any blessing, but in effect prays that the "peace of God" may keep the "hearts and minds" of the people. Christ says to his Church, "My peace I give unto you." (John xiv. 27): the officiating minister, the Church's organ, proclaims the gift in general, and prays that it may descend upon the particular part of Christ's Church then and there assembled. The benediction most used, at the close of worship, in Protestant churches, is taken chiefly from Scripture; the first part of it from Phil. iv. 7, and the latter part being a paraphrase upon Num. vi. 24, 25, viz.: "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keep your heart and minds in the knowledge and love of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord; and the blessing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be amongst you and remain with you always. Amen." The great Christian benediction is that of Theodoret: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." (2 Cor. xiii. 14). In the ancient church, short benedictions, such as "Blessed be God," "Blessed be the name of the Lord" (neevent the Ave Maria, q.v.), were often used before sermon. After the Lord's Prayer, in the Eucharist, the benediction of Theodoret of Cyrus, in the benediction of benediction of grace of God be with you all," was pronounced. See Bingham, Orig. Ecclesi. bk. xiv. ch. iv. § 16; bk. xvi. ch. iii. § 29; Coleman, Primitive Church, ch. xiv.; Bibliotheca Sacra, 1863, p. 707.

Benefactor (σωτήρ). "The kings of the Gene-

bles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors." (Luke xxii. 25). This word was employed as a title of honor to kings and princes, corresponding to the Latin pater patriae. Titus Flavius Vespasianus, king of Egypt, afforded a striking instance of its use in this sense. According to Josephus and Philo, it was freeuently applied to the Roman emperors (see Josephus, War, iii. 8, 8; Dio Cassius xii. 26; Xen. Anab. vii. 6, 30).

Benefice. I. Definition.—Benefice is defined by the canonists to be "just perpetuum percipiendi fructus ex locis ecclesiasticis, eadem re, eandem mensae, eandem officio aliquod spiritualiter." This term was, in its origin, applied to the lands which were given by the Romans to deserving soldiers out of the territories acquired by conquest. These soldiers were called militae beneficiarii, and the lands so given beneficio. Hence the term came in time to be applied to the possessions of the Church, when certain portions were appropriated to individuals to enjoy during their life as a recompense for their services. The word is now applied to all preferments in the Church of England except bishoprics, though more commonly used to signify such churches as are endowed with a revenue for the permanent support of the incumbent; it is also applied to a revenue itself. The incumbents are said to enjoy the revenue of a living ex mero beneficio (from the pure kindness) of the patron.

II. In the Roman Church benefices are divided by the canon law (1.) into secular and regular. "Secular" benefices are held by secular clerks, e.g. bishops, and the dignities in cathedral chapters, viz., the offices of dean, archdeacon, chancellor, precentor, canon, prebend, etc.; also perpetual vicarages, simple cures, chapels, etc. All benefices are held to be secular in the absence of proof or long possession to the contrary, and secular benefices may be held by regulars elevated to the episcopal dignities. Regular benefices are conferred only on monks. Such are titular abbeys, all clausal offices enjoying an appropriated revenue, e.g. those of titular conventual prior, almoner, hospitalier, sacristan, cellarer, etc. (2.) Into double (duplicia) and simple (simplicia). "Double" benefices are those which are annexed the cure of souls, or any pre-eminance or administration of the property of the Church, e.g. pope, cardinal, dean, etc. "Simple" benefices are such as only carry the obligation to say the breviary or celebrate masses, such as secular priories, chapterels, etc. (3.) Into benefices titulars (titularia) and benefices in commendam. The former are those which have spiritual property; the latter are secular only, until a clerk, capable of discharging the duties, can be found. There are, however, perpetual commendam, i.e. where the temporal revenues of a regular benefice are given to a secular clerk to hold perpetually. There are six lawful ways of obtaining a benefice, viz.: 1. By the representation of the patron, and subsequent institution; 2. By election, and the subsequent confirmation of the person elected; 3. By postula-

III. In the Church of England parochial benefices with cure are defined by the canon law to be a distinct portion of ecclesiastical rights, set apart from any temporal interest, and joined to the spiritual function, and to these no jurisdiction is annexed; but it is otherwise as to archdeaconies and deans, for they have a jurisdiction, benefice in quibus benevolunt, which is the subject of the chapter, and visited them. It is essential to a parochial benefice that it be bestowed freely (reserving nothing to the patron), as a provision for the clerk, who is only a servofructuarii, and has no inheritance in it; that it have something of spirituality annexed to it, for where it is given to a layman it is not properly a benefice; that in its own nature it be perpetual.

—thet is, forever annexed to the church; and all manner of contracts concerning it are void.

BENEFIELD, SEBASTIAN, D.D., an eminent Calvinistic divine, was born Augst 12th, 1559, at Prestonbury, Gloucestershire, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He died a 10th Oct. 1608 he was chosen Margaret professor of divinity in the university. Dr. Benefield was well versed in the fathers and schoolmen, and was remarkable for strictness of life and sincerity. He died Augst 24, 1630. His principal writings are, Doctrina Christiana (Oxford, 1610-40;—Sermons (Oxford, 1614-15; 2 vols. 4to;—Exposition of Amos (Oxford, and London, 1618, 4to;—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, 1664.

Benefic or Clergy, a privilege by which, in countries where popery prevailed, persons in holy orders were exempted, either wholly or partially, from the jurisdiction of lay tribunals. The privilege was created out of regard to the clerical order, but it was soon abused. It was originally designed for clerics (clerks), and at first none could be admitted to it but such as had the usual distinction of clericalita; but subsequently, in England, all persons who could read were by law declared to be clerks, and the number of claimants almost indefinitely increased. It was abolished by the 7th and 8th of Geo. IV. c. 28.

In America this privilege has been formally abolished in some of the states, and allowed only in one or two cases in others; while in Ireland it appears to have been known at all. By the act of Congress of April 30, 1790, it is enacted that 'benefit of clergy shall not be used or allowed, upon conviction of any crime for which, by any statute of the United States, the punishment is or shall be declared to be death.' See Blackstone, Commentaries, iv. 28.

Be-ne'-ja'akan (Heb. Beney Yaaikan', בֵּנוֹי יָאָקָן, בֵּנוֹי יָאָקָן Children of Jakon; Sept. Buxsia v. r. Buxsia; Vulg. Buxsia) the tribe whose name gave rise to certain wells in the desert which formed one of the halting-places of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan (Num. xxxiii, 31, 32). See BEEROTH-BENJA-JAKAN.

The tribe doubtless derived its name from Jakon, the son of Ezor, son of Seir the Horite (1 Chr. 1, 42). See AKAJA, JAKAN. At the time of Josabah and Jeromo (Onomast. s. v. 'Isaith, Berod fil Jabin), the Sept. word is shown ten miles from Petra, on the top of a mountain. Robinson suggests the small fountain et-Taibibeh, at the bottom of the pass er-Rubay under Petra, a short distance from the Arabah (Recherches i, 583). The word 'Beeroth,' however, suggests, not a spring, but a group of springs, a valley. In the name of Pseudo-Josephus the name is given in Numbers as Aita (אִיתā). The assemblage of fountains near the northern extremity of the Arabah is no doubt referred to. See EXODE.

Ben-Kedem (Heb. Beney-'Kedem, בֵּנוֹי-קֶדֶם, בֵּנוֹי-קֶדֶם "Children of the East"), an appellation given to a people, or to peoples dwelling to the east of Palestine. It occurs in the following passages of the O. T.: (1) Gen. xxix, 1, "Jacob came into the land of the people of the East," in which it was therefore reckoned Haran. (2) Job i, 3, Job was "the greatest of all the men of the East." See JOB, iii 33, viii, 12, viii, 10. In the first three passages the Ben-Kedem are mentioned together with the Midianites and the Amalekites; and in the fourth the latter peoples seem to be included in this common name: "Now Zerah and Cushan were [were] in Karkom and they went with them, about fifteen thousand [men], all that were left of all the hosts of the children of the East." In the events to these passages of Judges relate, we find a curious reference to the language spoken by these Eastern tribes, which was understood by Gideon and his men, and which enabled them to the talk in the camp; and from this it is to be inferred that they spoke a dialect intelligible to an Israelite—an inference bearing on an affinity of race, and thence on the growth of the Semitic languages. (4) 1 Kings iv, 30, "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the East country." (5) From Isa. xi, 24; it is difficult to deduce an argument, but in Ezek. xxv, 4, 10, Ammon is delivered to the "men of the East," and its city, Rabbah, is prophesied to become "a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks" referring, apparently, to the habits of the wandering Arabs; while "palaces" and "dwellings," also mention deduced; thus rendered, but in Auct. Vets., may be better read "camps" and "tents." The words of Jeremiah (xxiii, 28) strengthen the supposition just mentioned: "Concerning Kedar, and concerning Hazor, which Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, shall smite, thus saith the Lord, Arise ye, go up to Kedar, and set up the men of the East. Their tents and their flocks shall they take away; they shall take to themselves their curtiains [i. e. tents], and all their vassels, and their camels."

Opinions are divided as to the extension of the appellation of Beno-Kedem; some (as Rosenmüller and Winer) holding that it came to signify the Arabs generally. Bonn considers it in connexion to the genealogy cited and that which makes mention of the land of Kedem, Gen. xxxv, 6 [see ISHMAEL], we think (with Gesenius) that it primly signified the peoples of the Arabian desert (east of Palestine and Lower Egypt), and chiefly the tribes of Ishmael and of Keturah, extending perhaps to Mesopotamia and the borders of Babylonia (to which we may apply the Kedem to apply in Num. xxiii, 7, as well as in Isa. ii, 6); and that it was sometimes applied to the Arabs and their country generally. The only positive instance of this latter signification of Kedem occurs in Gen. x, 30, where "Sephar, a mount of the East," is by the common agreement of scholars situates in Southern Arabia. See ARABA; SEPHR.

In the O. T., "Arabia," with its conjunctive forms, seems to be a name of the peoples otherwise called Beno-Kedem, and with the same limitations. The same may be observed of גָּאוֹר, "the East," in the N. T. (Matt. ii, 1 sq.). The Heb. word "Kedem," with its adjuncts (in the passages above referred to), is translated by the Sept. and in the Vulg. and sometimes transcribed (Kerdem) by the former, except the Sept. in 1 Kings iv, 30, and Sept. and Vulg. in Isa. ii, 6, where they make Kedem to relate to ancient time.—Smith, s. v. See EAST.

A considerable number of councils have been held there, among which the following are the most important: 1067, at which the Antipope Gilbert was excommunicated, and the investiture by laymen forbidden; 1106, which again pronounced against the investiture by laymen; and 1117, at which Bishop Mauritius Verdinus (later Gregory VIII) was excommunicated.

Bénédzet, or Bénézet, St., born at Hermillon; a shepherd. The popes, during their residence at Avignon, authorized his worship. "Bénézet is said to have been directed by inspiration to proceed to the church of St. Bénézet in Avignon, in September, 1309, on a journey to Rome that his mission was to build the bridge of that city over the Rhone. The bishop, very naturally thinking him out of his mind, ordered him to be whipped. Bénézet, however, is said to have shown his divine mission by supernatural proofs; and the bridge was commenced in 1177, and finished in 1184, and placed on the bridge, where afterward a little chapel was built over his remains. Subsequently a hospital was added, and a confraternity established for the care of his worship and of the repair of the bridge. These things are said to be 'amplly verified by the Acts drawn up at the time.' When the tomb was opened in 1670, owing to its ruinous state, the body was newly wound in a perfect condition. The body was but four feet and a half long.' This is a specimen of the so-called "lives of the Saints!"—Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Benezet, Anthony, an eminent philanthropist and opponent of slavery, was born at St. Quentin, Picardy, France, January 31, 1713. His parents, driven from France by Popish persecution, removed to London in February, 1715, and during their residence there the family came to Philadelphia in November, 1731. Benezet began a mercantile career early; but soon after his marriage, in 1740, when his affairs were in a prosperous situation, he left the mercantile business, and in 1742 he accepted the appointment of head of the Friends' English school of Philadelphia, which he held till 1782, when he resigned it to devote himself to teaching a school of colored children. "So great was his sympathy with every being capable of feeling pain, that he resolved toward the close of his life to eat no animal food. This change in his mode of living is supposed to have been the cause of the loss of his strength and of the decay of his mind which did not yield to the debility of his body. He persevered in his attendance upon his school till within a few days of his decease, May 3, 1784." Men of all classes of society, and of all churches, as well as many hundred negroes, followed his remains to the grave. An officer who had served in the army during the war with Britain observed at this time, "I would rather be Anthony Benezet in that coffin than George Washington, with all his fame." "Few men since the days of the apostles ever lived a more disinterested life; yet upon his death-bed he expressed a desire to live a little longer, 'that he might bring down self.' The last time he ever walked across his room was to take from his desk six dollars, which he gave to a poor widow whom he had long assisted to maintain. By his will he devised his estate, after the decease of his wife, to certain trustees, for the use of the African school." The chief object of Benezet's life, for many years, was the excite public opinion against slavery and the slave-trade. On the return of his estate in 1788, he addressed a letter to the queen of Great Britain to solicit her influence on the side of humanity. At the close of this letter he says, "I hope thou wilt kindly excuse the freedom used on this occasion by an ancient man, whose mind, for more than forty years past, has been distracted from the contemplation of the world, and long painfully exercised in the consideration of the miseries under which so large a part of mankind, equally with us the subjects of redeeming love, are suffering the most unjust and grievous oppression, and who sincerely desires the temporal and eternal felicity of the queen and her royal consort." He published many tracts on the subject, and also an Account of that Part of Africa Inhabited by Negroes (1762); A Caution to Great Britain and her Colonies, in a short Representation of the Calamitous State of the Enslaved Negroes in the British Dominions (1767); Historical Account of Guinea, with an Inquiry into the Real and Punitive Slaves familiarly Account of the Religious Society of Friends (1780); Dissertation on the Plainness and Simplicity of the Christian Religion (1782); Observations on the Indian Natives of this Continent (1781). It is said that Benezet's writings first awakened Thomas Clarkson's attention to the question of slavery. Allen's Biographical Dictionary: Al- bane, Dictionary of Authors, 1, 165; Le Bas, Dict. Ben-Gebur. See BEN-Bengel, Johann Albrecht, a German theologian of profound critical judgment, extensive learning, and solid piety. He was born June 24, 1687, at Winne- den, Württemberg, where his father was pastor; and from him the boy received his early education. After the death of his father he was received into his tutor's house; and from 1693 to 1700 he studied at the Gym- nasiwm of Stuttgart. Then admitted thoroughly prepared in philological elements, he entered the University of Tübingen in 1708, and devoted himself especially to the study of the sacred text. From his childhood he had been earnestly pious; and his fa- vorite reading, while at the university, apart from his severer studies, consisted of the principal works of Le- Spencer, and Francke. At the same time, he did not neglect philosophy. According to his own account, he studied Spinoza thoroughly, and it was not without mental struggles that he arrived at clearness of view on the relations of philosophy to faith. In 1706 he was brought very low by a severe illness at Maul- bron; but he was strengthened against the fear of death by Ps. cxvii, 17, 'I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord.' He returned to his studies with greater zeal, and with a deeper religious life. After a year spent in the ministry as vicar at Metzingen, he became theological reprentant at Tübin- gen; and in 1707 he was appointed a tutor in the cloister-school of Denkendorf, a seminary for the early training of candidates for the ministry. During this year he made a literary journey, visiting several of the schools of Germany, and among them those of the Jesuits. His theological culture, by all these means, became manifold. An illustration, indeed, of both, of his studies and of his teaching, is afforded by the theme chosen for his inaugural at Danendorf, viz. 'True godliness the surest road to true science.' He remained in this post for twenty-eight years—years of labor, zeal, and success as teacher, preacher, student, and publisher; he published, for the use of his pupils, an edition of Oeconomo Epistolas, with notes (Stuttgart, 1719); also, Gregorii Thama- turgi Panegyricus ad Originem, Gr. et Lat. (1722); andy Crisostomi lb. vi. de Sacerdote (1725). But his chief toil was given to the New Testament; for the results of which, see below. In 1749 he was appoint- ed councillor and prelats of Alpirsbach, with a resi- dence in Stuttgart, where he died, Nov. 2, 1751.

Bengel was the first Lutheran divine who applied to the criticism of the New Testament a grasp of mind which embraced the subject in its whole ex- tent, and a patience of investigation which the study required. He was assisted by the various readings, which led him to form the determination of making a text for himself, which he executed in a very careful and scrupulous manner, ac- cording to very rational and critical rules, excepting that he would not admit any reading into the text which had not been previously printed in some edition. In the book of Revelation alone he deviated from this rule. His conscientious piety tended greatly to ally the fears which had been excited among the clergy with respect to various readings, and to him belongs the honor of having struck out that path which has since been followed by Wetstein, Griesbach, and others. His Gronovius and Zedler were so highly valued by Bengel that he translated most of its notes and incorporated them into his Explanatory Notes on the N. T. The least valuable part of Bengel's exegetical labors is that which he spent on the Apocalypse. His chief works are: 1. Apparatus Crucicis ad N. T. ed. secundum, cur. P. D. Burkki (Tubing. 1737, 4vo) — 2. Index Criticalis Testamentorum, 8d ed. adjev. Steudel (Tubing, 1850, 2 vols. 8vo). — 3. An Exegesis of the Book of the Revelation of St. John (Stuttg. 1710, 1746, 8vo); translated by Robertson (Lon. 1757, 8vo). — 4. Harmony of the Gospels (Tubing. 1736, 1747, 1768, 8vo). — 5. Ordo temporum à principiis, ad incrementum doctrinarum propheticae (Ulm, 1748, 8vo). His chronological works, endeavoring to fix the "number of the beast," the date of the "millennium" (he was positive in fixing the beginning of the millennium at the year 1830), etc., have rather detracted from his reputation for solid judgment. His fame will permanently rest on his Gnomon, which, as a brief and suggestive commentary on the New Testament, remains unrivaled. New editions, both in Latin (Berlin, 1860; Tübingen, 1860; Stuttgart, 1860) and German, have recently appeared, and an English translation was published in Clarke's Library (Edinburgh, 1857-58, 6 vols. 8vo), of which a greatly improved and enlarged edition has been issued in this country by Professors Lewis and Vincent (Philadelphia, 1860-61, 2 vols. 8vo). His Life and Letters, by Burk, translated by Walker, appeared in 1837 (London, 8vo); and a brief biography, by Fausset, is given on the 4th to Damascus of the English translation of the Gnomon. An able article on his peculiar Significance as a Theologian was published in the Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, 1861, and translated in the British and Foreign Evangelical Review, April, 1862. A new Life has just appeared (1865) under the title of A. Bengel's Leben, Gesellschaft, Charakter, Werke, D. V. by Dr. Sturler (8vo), which gives a large amount of new material, found in Bengel's MS. diary and other papers, which have only recently been given up by his family for publication. Among other curious facts, it appears that Bengel had the use of one eye during his life-long studies, and that he never tasted a piece of meat that his wife had not prepared for him, or seen delivered to his wife! In a supplement to the volume are given a number of Bengel's sermons, addresses, and poems. Dr. Wächtler also published a volume containing "Remarks on Bengel as an exegetical writer, and in particular on the Gnomon" (Beiträge zu J. A. Bengel's Schriftenverzierung, etc., Leipzig, 1864). See Hagenbach, German Runologie, 114; Hervey, Engl. Ezech. period, ii, 57.

Ben-hadad (Heb. Ben-hadad', בֵּן-חַדָּד, "son of Hadad"); Sept. γενεάς Ἀδαθ', the name of three kings of Damascus-Syria. As to the latter part of this name, Hadad, there is little doubt that it is the name of the Syrian god Hadad (q. v.), probably from the Sun (Macrob. Saturnalia, i, 23), still worshipped at Damascus in the time of Josephus (Ant. i, 4, 6), and from it several Syrian names are derived, as Hadadenezer, i. e. Hadad's house. The god hadad is mentioned in the OT address dependence and obedience, not only accords with the analogies of other heathen names, but is also supported by the existence of such terms as "sons of God" among the Hebrews (comp. Psa. lxxxii, 6). On account of the nationality of this name, the term "palaces of Ben-hadad" came to be applied to Damascus itself (Jer. xxxii, 27; Amos i, 4). See DAMASCUS.

1. The king of Syria, who was subsidized by Ahab, king of Judah, to invade Israel, and thereby compel Baasha (who had invaded Judah) to return to defend his own kingdom (1 Kings xv, 18). B.C. 928. See AHA. This Ben-hadad has, with some reason, been supposed by some to be identical with Hadad, the god who was worshipped against Solomon (1 Kings xi, 25). Damascus, after having been taken by David (2 Sam. vili, 5, 6), was delivered from subjection to his successor by Rezon (1 Kings xi, 24), who "was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon." This Ben-hadad was either son or grandson to Rezon, and in his time Damascus was supreme in Syria, the various smaller kingdoms which had been surrounded it being gradually absorbed into its territory. Ben-hadad must have been an energetic and powerful sovereign, as his alliance was courted by Baasha of Israel and Ahab of Judah. He finally closed with the latter on receiving a large amount of treasure, and conquered a great part of the north of the kingdom, thereby enabling Ahab to pursue his victorious operations in the south. From 1 Kings xx, 34, it would appear that he continued to make war upon Israel in Omri's time, and forced him to make "streets" in Samaria for Syrian residents. "Kitto; Smith. See AHA.

2. Another king of Syria, son of the preceding. Some suppose, on the ground that it was unusual in antiquity for the son of a father's name. But Ben-hadad seems to have been a religious title of the Syrian kings, as we see by its reappearance as the name of Hazael's son, Ben-hadad III. Long wars with Israel characterized the reign of Ben-hadad II, of which the earlier campaigns are described (2 Kings iii). The city of Damascus, which he held with his dominion are proved by the thirty-two vassal kings who accompanied him to his first siege of Samaria. B.C. cir. 906. He owed the signal defeat in which that war terminated to the vain notion which assimilated Jehovah to the local deities worshiped by the nations of Syria, desiring "a God of the hills," but impotent to defend his vassals in "the plains." (1 Kings xx, 1-80). Instead of pursuing his victory, Ahab concluded a peace with the defeated Ben-hadad. Some time after the death of Ahab, probably owing to the difficulties in which Jehoram of Israel was involved by the policy of his father, Ben-hadad renewed the war with Israel; but all his hopes were now frustated, being made known to Jehoram by the prophet Elisha (2 Kings vi, 8). B.C. cir. 894. After some years, however, he renewed the war, and besieged Jehoram in his capital, Damascus, until the inhabitants were reduced to the last extremities and the city was almost starved; the people then unexpectedly raised, according to a prédiction of Elisha, through a panic infused into the besiegers, who, concluding that a noise which they seemed to hear portended the advance upon them of a foreign host procured by Jehoram from Egypt or some Canaanitic cities, as Tyre or Raphen, thought only of saving themselves by flight. Jehoram seems to have followed up this unlooked-for deliverance by successful offensive operations, since we find from 2 Kings ix, i that Ramoth in Gilead was once more an Israelitish town. See AHA. The next year Ben-hadad, learning that Elisha, through whom so many of his designs had been brought to naught, had arrived at Damascus, sent an officer of distinction, named Hazael, with presents, to consult him as to his recovery from an illness under which he then suffered. The prophet answered that his disease was not mortal, but that he would die nevertheless certainly die, and he announced to Hazael that he should be his successor, and that he should be thought of the misery which he would bring on Israel. On the day after Hazael's return Ben-hadad was murdered, as is commonly thought, by this very Hazael, who snuffed the sick monarch in his bed, and mounted the throne in his stead (2 Kings viii, 7-15). See ELISHA; JEHORAM. The attributing of this murder to Hazael himself has been imagined by some to be inconsistent with his character and with Elisha's suggestion of the act. Ewald, from the Hebrew text and a general consideration of the chapter (Gesch. des V. F. lili, 523, note), thinks that one or more of Ben-hadad's sons killed him by his own orders while he was asleep against. Calmet) believes that the wet cloth which caused his death was intended to effect his cure, a view which he supports by a reference to Bruce's Travels, iii, 33. There appears, however, to be no good reason for departing from the usual and more natural interpretation (so Josephus, Antiq. Ant. iv, 4, 6) which assigns the deed to Rezon, who succeeded him perhaps because he had no natural heirs, and with him expired the dynasty founded by Rezon. Ben-hadad's death was about B.C. 890, and he must have reigned some thirty years. See SYRIA. The Scriptural notices of this king are strikingly confirmed by the evidence of archaeology, which has shown that the obelisk found among the Assyrian monuments at Nimrud (see Rawlinson's Hist. Evidences, p. 119), and translated by Dr. Hincks (Dublin Univ. Magazines, Oct., BEN-HAIL

(1858). According to these annals, the Assyrian king Shalmaneser (reigned apparently B.C. cir. 900-860 or 880) had several campaigns against the nations of Palestine and its vicinity (in his 6th, 7th, 14th, and 16th years), among which the Hittites (Khita) and Bendri (i.e. Ben-hader; comp. the Sept. v'ok "Ashp, for Ben-hadad), king of Damascus, are particularly named, the latter being represented as defeated, although allied with at least twelve neighboring princes, and at the head of an immense army, consisting largely of cavalry and archers (Ravilious's Notes (pp. 217-218)).

3. A third king of Damascus, son of the above-mentioned Hazael, and his successor on the throne of Syria. His reign was disastrous for Damascus, and the vast power wielded by his father sank into insignificance. In the striking language of Scripture, "Jeho-ahaz (the son of Jehoahaz) besought the Lord, and the Lord hearkened unto him, for He saw the oppression of Israel, because the King of Syria oppressed them; and the Lord gave Israel a savior" (2 Kings xiii, 4, 5).

This saviour was Jeroboam II (comp. 2 Kings xiv, 27), but the prosperity of Israel began to revive in the reign of his father Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz. When Ben-hadad II had escaped to the three kings of Aram, Jehoahaz, in accordance with a prophecy of the dying Eliaba, recovered the cities which Jehoahaz had lost to the Syrian, and beat them in Aphek (2 Kings vii, 17), in the plain of Edreanal, where Ahab had already defeated Ben-hadad II. B.C. 835. Jehoash gained two more victories, but did not restore the dominion of Israel on the east of Jordan. This glory was reserved for his successor Jeroboam. The misfortunes of Ben-hadad III in war are noticed by Amos (i, 4). - Smith, s. v.

Ben-ha'l (Heb. Ben-Cha'yu, בֵּן חַיָּ, son of strength, i.e. warrior; Sept. translates οἰκός τῶν ἐν ἐνvarwv), one of the "princes" of the people sent by Je-hoashaphat to teach the inhabitants of Judah, and cary out the reformation begun by him (2 Chron. xvii, 7). B.C. 910.

Ben-ha'nan (Heb. Ben-Cheman, בֵּן חֵמָן, son of one generous; Sept. vioic Αυδίν v. Φιλία, the third named of the four "sons" of Shimmon (2 Shammal), of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 20). B.C. prob. post 1612. Perhaps the name ought to be translated "son of Hanan." See Ben-

Ben-Hesed, Ben-Hur. See Ben-

Ben'nu (Heb. Beninnu, בֵּנִי נֵעֶ, our son; Sept. con-founds with Banni preceding, and translates both vioii Bawawel v. Bawawael), one of the Levites which seced the covenant on the return from Babylon (Neh. x, 15). B.C. 410.

Benitier, the French name for the vessel for holding the so-called holy water, placed at the entrance of Romanist places of worship. See Holy Water.

Ben'jamin (Heb. Simgamin, בֵּנִי גָּם, i. q. Felix [see below]; Sept., Joseph., and New Test. Bawawel), the name of three men.

1. The youngest son of Jacob by Rachel (Gen. xxxix, 18), and the only one of the thirteen (if indeed there were not more; comp. "all his daughters," Gen. xxxviii, 35; xiv, 7) who was born in Palestine. His birth took place on the road between Bethel and Bethlehem, "a land of corn and wine," at a distance "a length of earth"—from the latter. B.C. 1889. His mother died immediately after he was born, and with her last breath named him יִשְׂרָאֵל, Ben-Or ("son of my pain"), which the father changed into Benjamin, a word of nearly the same sound, but portending comfort and consolation, "son of my right hand," probably alluding to the support and protection he promised himself from this, his last child, in his old age. See JACOB. This supposition is strengthened when we reflect on the reluctance with which he consented to part with him in very trying circumstances, yielding only to the pressure of famine and the most urgent necessity (Gen. xlii). This interpretation is inserted in the text of the Vulgate and the margin of the A. V., and has the support of Gezenius (Thee. p. 210). On the other hand, the Samaritan Codex gives the name Ben-jamin (בֵּנֵי יָמִין), "son of days," i.e. "son of my old age" (comp. Gen. xxxiv, 20), which is adopted by Philo, Aben- Ezra, and others. Both these interpretations are of comparatively late date, and it is notorious that such explanatory glosses are not only often invented long subsequently to the original record, but are as often at variance with the literal meaning of that record. The meaning given by Josephus (Jüd. 1, xvi, 1, p. 8) has reference only to the name Ben-Or. However, the name is not so pointed as to agree with the usual signification, "son of," being "22, and not "12. But the first vowel have here probably superceded (for "22 merely because of the perfect coalescence of the two elements into a single word. Moreover, in the adjectival forms of the word the first syllable is generally suppressed, as יִשְׁרָאֵל, יַשְׁרִי, יָשִׁר, i.e. "sons of Yemi'nu for sons of Benjamin; יַשְׁרִי, יָשִׁר, "man of Yemi'nu" for man of Benjamin (1 Sam. ix, 1; Esth. ii, 5); יִשְׁרִי, יָשִׁר, "land of Yemi'nu" for land of Benjamin (1 Sam. ix, 4); as if the patriarch's name had been originally יִשְׁרִי, Yemi'nu (comp. Gen. xiv, 10), and that of the tribe Yeminites, as the objective form of יִשְׁרִי, בָּשׂ, preserved in the Sept. The prefix Ben seems to be merely mitely omitted in them for brevity, as being immaterial to the reference. Usually, however, the posterity of Benjamin are called Benjami'tes (Gen. xxxvii, 18; xxvi, 21-28; 1 Kings xii, 16-24; Judg. iii, 15; xix, 16, etc.).—Smith, s. v. See Ben-

Ben-jam'in. Until the journeys of Jacob's sons and of Jacob himself into Egypt we hear nothing of Benjamin, and, so far as he is concerned, those well-known narratives disclose nothing beyond the very strong affection termed toward him by his father and his whole-brother Joseph, and the relation of fond endearment in which he was, as if a mere darling child (comp. Gen. xxiv, 20), to the whole patriarchs relaxed toward him.

In Gen. i, 21 sq., the immediate descendants of Benjamin are given to the number of ten, whereas in Num. xxvi, 38-46, only seven are enumerated, and some even in different names. The difference may probably be owing to the circumstance that some of the direct descendants of Benjamin had died either at an early period or at least childless. Considerable difficulty occurs in the several Biblical lists of the sons and grandsons of Benjamin (Gen. xiv, 21; Num. xxvi, 38-49; 1 Chron. vii, 6-21; xii, 1-7), which may be removed by the following explanations. As Benjamin was quite a youth at the time of the migration to Canaan (Gen. xiii, 20, 22), the list in Gen. xiv.
cannot be merely of Jacob's descendants at that time, since it contains Benjamin's children (comp. the children of Phares, ver. 12), who was at that time a mere child, see ch. xxxviii, 13), but rather at the period of his death, seventeen years later (ch. xlvii, 28). See JACOB. Yet the list could not have been made up to a much later period, since it does not contain the grandchildren of Benjamin subsequently born (1 Chron. vii, 9 sq.). The sons of Benjamin are expressly given in 1 Chron. viii, 5 sq., as being five, in the following order: Bela (the same in the other accounts), Ashbel (otherwise perhaps Jediah), Abarah (evidently the same with Abiran of Num., and probably the Aber of 1 Chron. viii, 12, since this name and Ir are given apparently in addition to the three of ver. 6, and probably also the Eleh of Gen.), Nobah (who is therefore possibly the same with Ithar, and probably also with Ir, since Shupham [Shuppim or Mappim of the other] and Hupham [Huppmim], enumerated as the sons of the latter, although they do not appear in the list of Heber's sons, must be such under other names, but—like Bela's in the same list—undistinguishable, as Jediael had but one son, and the rest are otherwise identified, and finally Rapha (who can then be no other than Rosh). See all the names in their alphabetical place.

The Promised land. The history of Benjamin to the time of the entrance into the Promised Land is a meagre as it is afterward full and interesting. We know indeed that shortly after the departure from Egypt it was the smallest tribe but one (Num. i, 36; comp. verse 1); that during the march its position was on the west of the tabernacle, with its brother tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (Num. ii, 19). In the desert it counted 35,400 warriors, all above twenty years of age (Num. i, 36; ii, 22), and, at the entrance of Israel into Canaan, even as many as 45,600. We have the names of the "captain" of the tribe when it set forth on its long march (Num. ii, 22); of the "ruler" who went up with his fellows to spy out the land (xiii, 9); of the families of which the tribe consisted when it was marshalled at the great halt in the plains of Moab by Jordan-Jericho (Num. xxxvi, 38-41, 63), and of the "prince" who was chosen to assist in the dividing of the land (xxxiv, 21). But there is nothing to indicate what were the characteristics and behavior of the tribe which, in Palestine, bore the name of the father and brothers. No touches of personal biography like those with which we are favored concerning Ephraim (1 Chr. vii, 20-23); no record of zeal for Jehovah like Levi (Exod. xxxii, 26); no evidence of special bent as in the case of Reuben and Gad (Num. xxxii). The only fore-shadowing of the tendencies of the tribe which was to produce Ehud, Saul, and the perpetrators of the deed of Gibeon, is to be found in the prophetic gleam which lighted up the dying Jacob, "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil" (Gen. xliv, 27). From this passage some have inferred that the figure of a wolf was the emblem on the tribal standard.

1. Geography.—The proximity of Benjamin to Ephraim during the march to the Promised Land was maintained in the territories allotted to each. Benjamin lay immediately to the south of Ephraim, and between him and Judah. The situation of this territory was highly favorable. It was almost a peninsula of the great plain of the Arabah, a famous Commercial route of 26 miles in length by 12 in breadth. Its eastern boundary was the Jordan, and from thence it mainly extended to the wooded district of Kirjath-jezaim, about six miles west of Jerusalem, while in the other direction it stretched from the valley of Hinnom, under the "City of the Valley" on the north, to Bethel on the north. Thus Dan intervened between this tribe and the Philistines, while the communications with the valley of the Jordan were in its own power. On the south the territory ended abruptly with the steep slopes of the hill of Jerusalem; on the north it almost melted into the possessions of the friendly Ephraim. See Tribe. In Josh. xviii, from verse 12 to 14, is sketched the northern boundary-line (mostly repeated in chap. xvi, 1-5), and from 15 to 20 the southern (repeated in chap. xv, 6-9, in a reverse direction). Within the boundaries described in these few verses lay a district rather small, but highly cultivated and natural for the culture of the wheat of Benjamin, Am. i, 12-13, and p. 637, containing twenty-six chief towns (with their villages, in two main sections), which are named in Josh. xviii, 21-28; and the principal of which were Jericho, Beth-hogla, Bethel, Gibon, Iram, and Jebus or Jerusalem. This latter place subsequently became the capital of the whole Jewish empire, but was, after the division of the land, still in possession of the Jebusites. The Benjamites had indeed been charged to possess them, and occupy that important town; but (Judg. i, 21) the tribe are reproached with having neglected to drive them from thence, that is, from the upper, well-fortified part of the place Zion, since the lower and less fortified part had already been taken by Judah (Judg. i, 8), who in this matter had almost a common interest with Benjamin. The Jebusite citadel was finally taken by David (2 Sam. v, 6 sq.). A trace of the pasture-lands may be found in the mention of the "herd" (1 Sam. xi, 8); and possibly others in the names of some places in Benjamin—Zamir, Benjamim, Jerahmeel, Parah, the cow; Zela-ha-lepheth, "the thicket of trees." (Josh. xv, 23, 28).

In the degenerate state of modern Palestine few evidences of the fertility of this tract survive. But other and more enduring natural peculiarities remain, and claim our recognition, rendering this possession one of the most remarkable among those of the tribes.

(2.) No less important than these eminences are the torrent beds and ravines by which the upper country breaks down into the deep tracts on each side of it. They formed then, as they do still, the only mode of access from either the plains of Philistia and of Sharon on the west, or the deep valley of the Jordan on the east—the latter steep and precipitous in the extreme, the former more gradual in their declivity. Up these western passes swarmed the Philistines on their incursions during the time of Samuel and of Saul, driving the first king of Israel right over the higher district of Judah and Benjamin, a famous Commercial route of 150 miles in length. But all the passes were thwarted by Jerusalem, which, while it controlled the passes, also controlled the best communications of the Arabah, and establishing themselves over the face of the country from Michmash to Ajalon. Down these same defiles they were driven by Saul after Jonathan's victorious exploit, just as in earlier times Joshua had chased the Canaanites down the long hill of Gibbethon to Bethel on the north, and again were chased by Judah Maccabaeus (1 Macc. iii, 16-24).

It is perhaps hardly fanciful to ask if we may not account in this way for the curious prevalence among the names of the towns of Benjamin of the titles of tribes. Harkivin, the Avites; Zemaraim, the Zemarites; Ha-ophel, the town of Ophrah; Chephar ha-Ammoni, the village of the Ammonites; ha-Jebus, the Jebusite, are all among the names of places in Benjamin; and we can hardly doubt that in these names is preserved the memory of many an ascent of the wild tribes of the desert from the sultry and open plains of the low level to the fresh air and secure fastnesses of the upper district.

The passes on the eastern side are of a much more difficult and intricate character than those on the western. The principal one, which, now unfrequented, was doubtless in ancient times the main ascent to the interior, leaves the Ghur behind the site of Jericho, and, breaking through the many a wild bend and steep slope, extends to and indeed beyond the very central ridge of the table-land of Benjamin, to the foot of the eminence on which stand the ruins of the ancient Beeroth. At its lower part this valley bears the name of Wadi F'zur, but for the greater part of its length it is called Wady Sueimin. It is the main access, and from its central ravine branch cut side valleys, conducting to Bethel, Michmas, Gibeah, Anathoth, and other towns. After the fall of Jericho this ravine must have stood open to the victorious Israelites, as their natural line of retreat. At its lower end must have taken place the repulse and subsequent victory of Ai, with the conviction and stoning of Achan, and through it Joshua doubtless hastened to the relief of the Gibeonites, and to his memorable pursuit of the Canaanites down the pass of Beth-Horon, on the south side of the territory of Benjamin. Another of these passes is that which since the time of our Saviour has been the regular road between Jericho and Jerusalem, the scene of the parable of the Good Samaritan. Others lie farther north, by the mountain which bears the traditional name of Quarantania; first up the face of the cliff; afterward less steep, and finally leading to Bethel or Taitivel, the ancient Opprah. These intricate ravines may well have harbored the wild beasts which, if the derivation of the names of several places in this locality are to be trusted, originally haunted the district—zobor, hymnas (1 Sam. xiii, 18), alaud and shaalib, foxes or jackals (Gen. i, 35; 1 Sam. xii, 7), gazelles. (See Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, ch. iv.)

Such were the limits and such the character of the possession of Benjamin as fixed by those who originally divided the land. But it could not have been long before they extended their limits, since in the early lists of 1 Chron. vii we find mention made of Benjaminites who built Lod and Ono, and of others who were founders of Aljalon (12, 13), all which towns were beyond the spot named above as the westernmost point in their boundary. These places, too, were, in their possession after the return from the captivity ( Neh. xi, 25).—Smith, s. v.

2. History.—In the time of the Judges the tribe of Benjamin became involved in a civil war with the other eleven tribes for having refused to give up to justice the miscreants of Gibeah that had publicly violated and caused the death of a concubine of a man of Ephraim, who had passed with her through Gibeah. This war terminated in the almost utter extinction of the tribe, leaving no hope for its regeneration from the circumstance that not only had nearly all the women of that tribe been previously slain by their foes, but the eleven other tribes had engaged themselves by a solemn oath not to marry the daughters to any man belonging to Benjamin. When the thirst of revenge, however, had abated, they found means to evade the letter of the oath, and to revive the tribe again by an alliance with them (Judg. xix, 20, 21). That frightful transaction was indeed a crisis in the history of the tribe; the narrative undoubtedly is intended to convey that the six hundred who took refuge in the cliff Rimmon, and who were afterward provided with wives partly from Jabesh-gilead (Judg. xxvi, 10), partly from Shiloh (xxxi, 21), were the only survivors. The revival of the tribe, however, was so rapid that, in the time of David, it already numbered 58,494 able warriors (1 Chron. vii, 6, 12); in the reign of Solomon, 288,000 (2 Chron. xiv, 8); and in that of Jehoshaphat, 200,000 (2 Chron. xviii, 17). See under CHENNAH.

This tribe had also the honor of giving the first king to the Jews, Saul being a Benjamite (1 Sam. i, 1, 2). After the death of Saul, the Benjamites, as might have been expected, declared themselves for his son Ish bosheth (2 Sam. ii, 8 sq.), until, after the assassination of that prince, David became king of all Israel. David having at last expelled the Jebusites from Zion, and made it his own residence, the close alliance that seems to have previously existed between the tribes of Benjamin and Judah (Judg. 4, 9) was cemented by the circumstance that, while Jerusalem actually belonged to the district of Benjamin, that of Judah was immediately contiguous to it. Thus it happened that, at the division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, Benjamin espoused the cause of Judah, and formed, together with it, a kingdom by themselves. Indeed, the two tribes stood in such a relationship as often to be included under the single term Judah (1 Kings xi, 13; xii, 20). After the exile, also, these two tribes constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony in Palestine (comp. Ezra xi, 1; x, 9).—Kitto.

3. Characteristics.—The contrast between the war-like character of the tribe and the peaceful image of its progenitor has been already noticed. That fierce-ness and power are not less out of proportion to the smallness of its numbers and of its territory. This comes out in many scattered notices. (a) Benjamin was the only tribe that seems to have pursued archery to any purpose, and their skill in the bow (1 Sam. xx, 29, 30; 2 Sam. i, 22; 1 Chron. viii, 40; xii, 2; 2 Chron. xvii, 17) and the sling (Judg. xx, 16) are celebrated. (b) When, after the first conquest of the country, the nation began to groan under the miseries of a foreign yoke, it is to a man of Benjamin, Ehud, the son of Gera, that they turn for deliverance. The story seems to imply that he accomplished his purpose on Eglon with less risk, owing to his proficiency in the peculiar practice of using his left hand—a practice apparently confined to Benjaminites, and by them greatly employed (Judg. iii, 15, and see xx, 16; 1 Chron. xii, 2). (c) Baanah and Rechab, the sons of Rimmon the Beeroite, of the children of Benjamin, were the only Israelites west of the Jordan named in the whole history as captains of marauding predatory "bands" (נְזָכָה; and the act of which they were guilty—the murder of the head of their house—hardly needed the summary vengeance inflicted on them by David to testify the abhorrence in which it must have been held by all Orientals, however warlike. (d) The dreadful deed recorded in Judg. xix, though repelled by the whole country, was unhesitatingly adopted and defended by Benjamin with an obstinacy and spirit truly extraordinary. Of their obstinacy there is a remarkable trait in 1 Sam. xxvi, 7-18. Though Saul was not only the king of the nation, but the head of the tribe, and David a member of a family which had as yet no claims on the friendship of Benjamin, yet the Benjaminites resisted the strongest appeal of Saul to betray the movements of David; and after those movements had been revealed by Doeg the Edomite (worthy member—as he must have seemed to them—of an accursed race!) they still firmly refused to lift a hand against those who had assisted him (see Niemeyer, Charakterist., iii, 566 sq.).

Several circumstances may have conduced to the relative importance of this small tribe (see Pleißen, De Benjamin parte, Wittenb. 1720). The Tabernacle was at Shiloh, in Ephraim, during the time of the last judge, but the ark was near Benjamin, at Kirjath-jearim. Ramah, the official residence of Samuel, and containing a sanctuary greatly frequented (1 Sam. ix, 12, etc.), Mizpah, where the great assemblies of "all Israel" took place (1 Sam. vii, 5), Bethel, perhaps the most ancient of all the sanctuaries of Palestine, and Gibeah, specially noted as "the great high place" (2 Chron. i, 3), were all in the land of Benjamin. These must gradually have accustomed the people who resorted to these various places to associate the tribe with power and sanctity, and they tend to elucidate the anomaly which struck Saul so forcibly, "that all the desire of Israel" should have been fixed on the house of the smallest of its tribes (1 Sam. ix, 21).

The struggles and contests that followed the death of Saul arose from the natural unwillingness of the tribe to relinquish its position at the head of the nation, especially in favor of Judah. Had it been Ephraim, the case might have been different; but Judah had as yet no connection with the house of Joseph, and was, besides, the tribe of David, whom Saul had pursued with such unrelenting enmity. The tact and sound sense of Abner, however, succeeded in overcoming these difficulties, though he himself fell a victim in the very act of accomplishing his purpose; and the proposal that David should be "king over Israel" was one which "seemed good to the whole house of Benjamin," and of which the tribe testified its approval and evinced its good faith by sending to the distant capital of Hebron a detachment of 3000 men of the "brethren of Saul" (1 Chron. xii, 28). Still, the insults of Shimei and the insurrection of Sheba are indications that the soreness still existed, and we do not hear of any cordial co-operation or firm union between the two tribes until a cause of common quarrel arose at the disruption, when Rehoboam assembled "all the house of Judah, with the tribe of Benjamin, to fight against the house of Israel, to bring the kingdom again to the son of Solomon" (1 Kings xii, 21; 2 Chr. xi. 1). Possibly the seal may have been set to this by the fact of Jeroboam having just taken possession of Bethel, a city of Benjamin, for the calf-worship of the northern kingdom (1 Kings xii, 29). Bethel, however, was on the very boundary-line, and centuries before this date was inhabited by both Ephraimites and Benjaminites.
BENJAMITE

(Judg. xix. 16). On the other hand, Rehoboam fortified and garrisoned several cities of Benjamin, and wisely dispersed the members of his own family through them (2 Chron. xi, 10-12). The alliance was farther strengthened by a covenant solemnly undertaken (2 Chron. xv. 9), and by the employment of Benjamites in high positions in the army of Judah (2 Chron. xvi. 17). But what, above all, must have contributed to strengthen the alliance, was the fact that the Temple was the common property of both tribes. True, it was founded, erected, and endowed by princes of the house of Judah, but the city of the "Jews" (Josh. xviii. 28), and the whole of the ground round of the Valley of Hinnom, was in the lot of Benjamin. In this latter fact is literally fulfilled the prophecy of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 12): Benjamin "dwelt between the" "the shadras of the" the ravines which encompass the Holy City on the west, south, and east (see a good treatment of this point in Blunt's "Undes Coincidentes," pt. ii, § xvi).

Although thereafter the history of Benjamin becomes merged in that of the southern kingdom, yet the tribe still retained its individuality is plain from the constant mention of it in many of the covenants taken of the tribes, and on the occasion of their division also from the lists of the men of Benjamin who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii; Neh. vii), and took possession of their old towns (Neh. xi. 31-35). At Jerusalem the name must have been always kept alive, if by nothing else, by the name of the "high gate of Benjamin" (Jer. xx, 2). (See below.) That the ancient memories of their house were not allowed to fade from the recollections of the Benjamites, is clear also from several subsequent notices. The genealogy of Saul, to a late date, is carefully preserved in the lists of 1 Chr. (viii. 33-40; ix. 39-44); the name of Kish recurs as the father of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5), the honored deliverer of the nation from the presence of the women than threatened by Nabal the Ammonite. The royal name once more appears, and "Saul," who also is called "Paul," has left on record under his own hand that he was "the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin." It is perhaps more than a mere fancy to note how remarkably the chief characteristics of the tribe are gathered up in his one person. There was the fierceness in his persecution of the Christians, and there was the obstinacy and persistence which made him proof against the tears and prayers of his converts, and "ready not to be bound only, but also to die for the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xxi. 12, 13). There was the strength and vigor to which difficulties and confined circumstances formed no impediment; and, lastly, there was the keen sense of the greatness of his house in his proud reference to his forefather "Saul, the son of Cis, of the tribe of Benjamin."—Smith.

GATE OF BENJAMIN (Jer. xxxvii. 13; xxxviii. 7; "Benjamin's gate," Zech. xiv. 10; "high gate of Benjamin," Jer. xx, 2) was doubtless on the northern side of Jerusalem, probably the same elsewhere called the gate of Ephraim" (1 Kings xiv, 13), and apparently coinciding nearly in position with the present "Damasce Gate" ("Strong's Harmony and Expo. of the Gospels," App. ii, p. 432). See Jer. ii. 20. As a part of the tribe of Benjamin, second named of the seven sons of Bilhan, and the head of a family of warriors (1 Chron. vii, 10). B.C. per. cir. 1016.

3. An Israelite, one of the "sons of Harim," who divorced his foreign wife after the exile (Ezra x, 32). B.C. 438. He seems to be the same person who had previously been rebuilding in rebuilding in rebuilding in Jerusalem (in connection with Hashub), opposite his house on Zion (Neh. iii, 23).

Benjamite (Heb. prop. Ben-emin, יֶבְנֵי-אָמִין, son of Emmin, 1 Sam. ix. 21; xxii. 7; 2 Sam. xvi. 11; xix. 17; 1 Kings ii. 8; 1 Chron. xxvii. 12; "of Benjamin," Psa. vii, title; but simply Emmin, יֶמְיָן, in Judg. iii. 15; xix. 16; 1 Sam. ix. 14; 2 Sam. xx. 1; Esth. ii. 5; elsewhere the usual name Benjamin with some other prefix, see Benjamite), the patronymic title of the descendants of the patriarch Benjamin (q. v.).

Bennet, Benjamin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wellesbourne, Leicestershire, 1674, and was for many years pastor of a Presbyterian church at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He was an able, successful pastor, and still more eminent as a writer. He published Memorials of the Reformation (London 2d ed. 1721, 8vo); Irenicum, a Review of Controversies on the Trinity, Church Authority, etc. (1722, 8vo); Christian Oratory, or the Decisions of the Court (many editions); Discourses on the 1688 Peace (1714, 8vo); Sermons on Inspiration (1730, 8vo);—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographiae, i, 243; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 165.

Bennet, Thomas, D.D., an eminent English divine, was born at Salisbury in 1678. He took his M.A. degree at Cambridge in 1694. He was made rector of St. James's in Colchester 1700, and in 1716 vicar of St. Giles's in London, where he died in 1738. He was highly esteemed by Hoadley, although he differed from him in his opinions. He wrote various works against the Romanists and Dissenters, An Essay on the Thirty-Nine Articles (London, 1715, 8vo), A Paraphrase on the Book of Common Prayer (London, 1709, 8vo), Brief History of Forms of Prayer (Camber, 1708, 8vo), etc.—Biog. Britannica.

Benno, Sr., descended from the counts of Woldenburg, lived in Rostock 1525, and was at Hildesheim in 1010, and became, in 1060, bishop of Meissen. He eagerly exerted himself for the conversion of the pagan Slavonians. In the struggle between the Emperor Henry IV and Gregory VII he was an unshackling adherent of the latter, and therefore expelled by the emperor from his see in 1065, but afterward reinstated. He died June 16, 1107. His canonization, in 1229, called forth the spicy pamphlet of Luther, Against the New Idol and Old Devil who is to be set up in Meissen. His Life was written by Emser (Leipzig, 1512). See also Seyffarth, Beschreibung Worms (Munich, 1763); Ranke, History of the Reformation, i, 90.

Be'no (Heb. Beno, בֵּנְוָו, his son; Sept. vioi Bovvi or Bovvi in ver. 26, and translates literally vioi avrov in ver. 14), is the name of a son of Saul, or the son of Jaaizah the Levite, of the family of Merari, in 1 Chron. xxiv. 26, 27; but there is much confusion in the whole passage. B.C. perh. 1014. See Beno.

Benoit, Elise, a Protestant French theologian, was born at Paris on Jan. 20, 1840. Having studied theology at Paris and Montauban, he became, in 1856, minister at Alençon. Here he had repeatedly theological disputations with Roman Catholic priests, especially the Jesuit La Rus, who tried to excite the mob against the Protestants. In consequence of the re-occupation of the Edict of Nantes he had to leave France; he went to Holland, and became pastor at Delft, where he died Nov. 15, 1728. He was highly esteemed as a moeck, peaceable man, who did not seek controversies, but did nothing to provoke them when he could avoid it. His chief work is the History of the Edict of Nantes (Histoire de l'Edict de Nantes, Delft, 1693-95, 5 vols. 4to). This work is distinguished for its accuracy, and still remains a chief source for the history of the Reformed Church of France. Among his other works are the following: Histoire et Apologie de la Religieuse des Pasteurs (1696, 8vo); Apologie, Francfort, 1698, 12mo); Melange de Rarites critiques, historiques, philosophiques, et theologiques contre deux ecrits de Ludolf (Delft, 1712, 8vo).—Herzog, Supplement, i, 174; Hoefer, Biog. Generale, v, 394.

Benoit, Bade, René, curate of the church of St. Eustache at Paris, was born a near relation in 1521. In 1566 he distinguished himself by a French translation of the Bible, published in that year at Paris in fol., and in 1588 in 2 vols. 4to. He was accused of having pretended to make his translation from the Greek and Hebrew, of which languages he knew nothing, and of having, in fact, followed the Geneva Bible, making a few verbal alterations. In spite of his defence, he was expelled from the faculty of theology by the faculty of the University of Louvain, October 1st, 1579, and his work was suppressed by the Faculty of Divinity of the university at Leyden; he was subsequently compelled to submit, was readmitted into the faculty, and made dean. Benoît had been confessors to the unhappily Mary, Queen of Scots, whom he accompanied into Scotland, on her way to the Marian wedding, May 8th, 1558. He published an immense number of works, among which may be specified, 1. Stromata in Universa Bibliâ (Cologne, 1598, 8vo).—2. A Catholic Apology (showing that the profession of the Protestant faith was not a sufficient and lawful reason for excluding the heir from the throne of France).—3. Examen parvis de la Doctrine des Huguenots. (This curious work was printed at Caen in 1590, and is intended to show that the Council of Trent, not having been fully received in France, was not of sufficient authority there to condemn the Huguenots.)—Hoefler, Biog. Gen. v., 385.

Ben-ôri (Heb. Ben-Oni), “son of my sorrow,” or rather, of my strength, i.e. of my last effort, in the Hebrew, Omonas. p. 306; Sept. translates αἰκὸς οὖν αὐτοῦ, the name given by his father in his aspiring breath, in token of the death-pangs that gave him birth (Gen. xxxvi, 18); afterward changed by his father to Benjamin (q. v.).

Benson, George, D.D., a learned and eminent English Dissenter, was born at Great Salkeford 1659; studied at Glasgow, and settled as pastor at Abingdon about 1721. In 1729 he went to London, and in 1740 was chosen pastor of the church in Bond Street, where he remained until his death in 1763. He was trained a Calvinist, but his views in later years were tinged with Arminianism. He published The Design and End of Prayer (London, 1737, 8vo, 2d ed.)—Paraphrases and Notes on Paul's Epistles, after Locke's Manner (London, 1725-56, 2 vols. 4to, best ed.).—History of the first Planting of the Christians Religion (London, 1758, 2 vols. 4to, best ed.).—After his death, his Life of Christ, with a memoir of the author by Amore, appeared (London, 1764, 4to).—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 166.

Benson, Joseph, one of the most eminent of the early Methodist ministers in England, was born at Melmerby, in Cumberland, Jan. 29, 2484. His father designed him for the ministry in the Established Church, but he obtained a training in Latin and Greek by the Rev. W. Dean, of Parkhead, under whom he made great proficiency. At sixteen he fell in for the first time with the Methodists and was converted. In 1766 Mr. Wesley appointed him classical master at Kingswood School. He devoted himself closely to philosophy and theology, studying constantly and zealously. In 1769 he was made head-master of Lady Huntingdon's Theological College at Trevecca; but in 1771 he left it, because of its becoming a thoroughly Calvinistic school. Mr. Benson was then, and always after, a decided Arminian. While engaged in these severities he still regularly kept his terms at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford. In October, 1771, he was admitted into the Methodist Conference, and soon became one of the ablest preachers in the body. He filled the chief stations, such as Edinburgh, Newcastle, Sheffield, Hull, Birmingham, and London, and crowds attended his preaching wherever he went. After a life of great clerical and literary activity, he died at London, Aug. 23, 1813. Dr. Clarke calls him "a sound scholar, a powerful and able preacher, and a profound theologian." Besides editing for many years the Methodist Magazine, he published A Defence of the Methodists (London, 1798, 12mo).—A Further Defence of the Methodists (1794, 12mo).—Vindication of the Methodists (London, 1800, 8vo).—A Commentary on Various Occasions (London, 1856, 2d edit. 2 vols. 12mo).—A Commentary on Holy Scriptures (London, 1848, 6th edit. 6 vols. 8vo).—Life of John Fletcher (New York, 1 vol. 8vo). His life has been twice written, once by Macdowall, and by J. R. Treffry (New York, 1852).—Biog. Brit.; Hook, Eccl. Hist. ii, 290.

Bentham, Edward, was born at Elly, 1731, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, from whence, in 1728, he removed to Corpus Christi College, and in 1731 was chosen fellow of Oriel. In 1743 he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Hereford. In 1749 he proceeded to D.D., and in 1754 he was made canon in his cathedral. On the death of Dr. Fazamshaw he was elected to the chair of divinity at the university of Cambridge, but declined the offer. He died in 1776. Besides some single sermons, Dr. Bentham published, 1. An Introduction to Moral Philosophy, 8vo.—2. A Letter to a young Gentleman in Study; with a Letter to a Fellow of a College, 8vo.—3. A Letter to a Young Man of Rank upon coming to the University, 8vo.—4. Observations on the Defections on the Catholics with a Vindication of the same, 8vo.—5. Funeral Discourses upon Military Men, from the Greek, 8vo.—6. De Studiis Theologici Profectio;—7. Reflections upon the Study of Divinity, with Heads of a Course of Lectures, 8vo.—8. De Vita et Mortibus Johannis Barts, S. T. P. —9. An Introduction to Logic, 8vo.—10. De Tollitudinibus Aeternis;—11. De la condition et des moyens de la fin de l'amer publici mediocris moralis mediation.—Biog. Brit.; Hook, Eccl. Hist. ii, 290.

Bentham, Jeremy, was born in London, February 15, 1748. He received his early education at Westminster School, and when yet a boy, being little more than twelve years of age, he went to Owen's College, Oxford, where he took his master's degree in 1765. He studied law, and was called to the bar in 1772, but devoted himself entirely to study, and became an able and voluminous writer on government and legislation. His name is mentioned here in view of his writings on morals, which, however, are less original and valuable than those on government. In all his writings, utility is the leading and pervading principle; and his favorite vehicle for its expression is the phrase, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," which was first coined by Priestley, though in prominence in politics has been owing to Bentham. "In this phrase," he says, "I saw delineated for the first time a plain as well as a true standard for whatever is right or wrong, useful, useless, or mischievous in human actions; and to it I have ever been the first inclinations of my political opinions. Accordingly, the leading principle of his ethical writings is, "that the end of all human actions and morality is happiness. By happiness, Bentham means pleasure and exemption from pain; and the fundamental principle from which he starts is, that the actions of sentient beings are wholly governed by pleasure and pain. He held that happiness is the 'summum bonum,' in fact, the only thing desirable in itself; that all other things are desirable solely as means to that end; that therefore the production of the greatest possible amount of happiness is the only fit object of all human exertion." He died in Westminster, June 6, 1832. See Etches; Moral.

Bentham, Thomas, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, was born in Yorkshire about 1518. He became a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1548, and distinguished himself in Hebrew. He early sided with the Reforms party, and became prominent as a zealous opponent of the superstitions of popery. On the accession of Mary, he disclaimed his oratory, and retired to his estates at Westcote, near Oxford. He died in 1553, and was interred at the Boleyn family church in Lichfield Cathedral.

created in 1559. Had Bentham been supreme, the English Reformation would have been far more thorough than it was, and the Protestant Church would have avoided much evil. He died Feb. 19, 1578. He translated the Psalms, Ezekiel, and Daniel in the "Bishop's Bible."—Hook, Eccles. Biography, ii, 249.

Bentley, Richard, D.D., called, in philological criticism, "the British Aristarchus," was born at Cullun, in 1685, and entered St. John's College 1676. He accepted the mastership of the grammar-school of Spalding, in Lincolnshire, early in 1683. In 1688 he became private tutor to the son of Dr. Stillington, afterward bishop of Worcester. He accompanied his pupil to Oxford, where he was admitted to Jesus College, and he became a fellow of the Bodleian Library. At this time he mediated two very laborious undertakings—a complete collection of Fragments of the Greek Poets, and an edition of the three principal Greek lexicographers, Hesychius, Suidas, and the Etymologicum Magnum, to be printed in parallel columns on the same page. Neither scheme, however, was carried into effect. To the edition of Callimachus, published by Grevius in 1697, Bentley contributed a collection of the fragments of that poet. But his reputation for scholarship was established by a dissertation on the obscure chronicler named Malalas, which was considered an able dissertatio medita, and Mill's edition of the author in 1691. This showed such an intimate acquaintance with Greek literature, especially the drama, that it drew the eyes of foreign as well as British scholars upon him, and obtained a warm tribute of admiration from the great critics Grevius and Spanheim to this new and brilliant star of British literature. Bentley was ordained deacon in March, 1690. In 1692, having obtained the first nomination to the Boyle lectureship, he chose for his subject the confession of atheism, directing his arguments more especially against the system of Hobbes. In these lectures Bentley applied the principles and discoveries of Newton's Principia to the confirmation of natural theology. "The Principia had been published about six years; but the sublime discoveries of that work were yet little known, owing not merely to the obstacles which oppose the reception of novelty, but to the difficulty of the preceding the progress they are established. To Bentley belongs, as bishop Monk remarks, the undoubted merit of having been the first to lay open these discoveries in a popular form, and to explain their irresistible force in the proof of a Deity. This constitutes the subject of his seventh and eighth sermons—pieces admirable for the clearness with which the whole question is developed, as well as for the logical precision of their arguments. Among other topics, he shows how contradictory to the principles of philosophy is the notion of matter contained in the solar system having been once diffused over a chaotic space, and afterward combined into the large bodies of the sun, planets, and secondary by the forces of mutual gravitation; and he explains that the planets could never have obtained the transverse motion, which causes them to revolve round the sun in orbits nearly circular, from the agency of any cause except the arm of an Almighty Creator. From these and other subjects of physical astronomy, as well as from the discoveries of Boyle, the founder of the lecture, respecting the nature and properties of the atmosphere, a conviction is irresistibly impressed upon the mind of the wisdom and benevolence of the Deity. We are assured that the effect of these discoveries was such that atheism was deserted as untenable ground; or, to use his own expression, "the 'ailemen' since that time, and sheltered themselves under desis."

This work gave him great reputation, and in 1692 he was made canon of Worcester by bishop Stillington. In 1699 he was appointed master of Trinity College, Cambridge; and in the following year the archdeaconry of Ely was conferred upon him. Of his contributions to Greek literature we have no room to speak; but, in the midst of personal quarrels, his literary activity for many years was wonderful. In 1713 he published, under the signature of Philoleutheros Lippensias, a reply to Collins's Discourse of Freethink- ing; and in none of his writings are his accurate learning and matchless faculty of disputation more signally displayed. In 1717 he was chosen regius professor of divinity at Cambridge. In 1720 he issued proposals for a new edition of the N.T. in Greek, with the Latin version of Jerome. Taking up that father's observation that in the translation of the Holy Scriptures "the very order of the words is mystery," he conjectured that if the most ancient Greek manuscripts were compared with Jerome's Latin, they might be found to agree with that version both in the words and order; and, upon trial, his ideas were realized even beyond his expectations. He stated also in these proposals that he believed he had recovered, with very few exceptions, the exemplar of Origen, the great standard of the most learned fathers for more than two hundred years after the Council of Nice; and observed that, by the aid of the Greek and Latin manuscripts, the text of the original might be so far settled that, instead of thirty thousand different readings, found in the best modern editions, not more than two hundred would suffice. But the pious and wise man who desired an abridgment of a work intended for the use of the clergy and for the support of the poor position was made to his plan that he dropped it. Bentley died July 14, 1742. His Works, collected and edited by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, were published in London in 1836 (3 vols. 8vo), but unfortunately the collection is incomplete. His Life and Writings, by bishop Meikle, were published in London in 1830; and his Correspondence, edited by Wordsworth, in 1842 (2 vols. 8vo). See Foreign Quarterly Review, July, 1830; North American Review, xliii, 488; Edinburgh Review, ii, 821; Allibone, i, 169; Hook, Ecclesiastical Biography, ii, 255.

Benzel, Erich, a prominent Swedish theologian, was born in 1642 at Bengtby; became in 1665 Professor of History and Ethics, and in 1666 Professor of Theology, at Upsala; in 1667 bishop of Stregnas, and in 1700 archbishop of Upsala, where he died in 1709. He wrote, among other works, Reseriam historis ecclesiasticis V. et N. Testament. (Ups. 1677). He also superintended the printing of the Swedish Bible translation. In 1665 he also wrote a Latin poem on the same name was likewise Erich, became in 1726 bishop of Gothenburg, and died as archbishop of Upsala in 1744.

It is elsewhere more properly called Berth-Baal-Mezon or Mezon (Num. xxxii, 38), and Berth-Mezon (Jer. xlvii, 23), for which this name may be a contraction.

Ber'eha (Bopia), a place in Judea apparently not very far from Jerusalem, where Bacchides, the general of Demetrius, encamped shortly before the engagement at Jacobus. Marcababorus was slain (1 Macc. ix, 4). Other copies, however, read Berath (Bapaios, Bapaios, Bapaios, etc., etc., see Grimm, in loc.), from which Reland conjectures (Palæst. p. 264) that it may be the Bezeth (q. v.) of 1 Macc. vii, 19, especially as Josephus, in his parallel account (Ant. xii, 11, 4), calls the place in question Sibateko (Bapaios, Ant. xii, 11, 1; comp. 10, 2). See also BEREACH.

Bereanas, a small sect of dissenters from the Church of Scotland, who profess to follow the example of the ancient Bereanas (Acts xvii, 11) in building their system upon the Scriptures alone, without regard to any human authority. The sect was founded in 1778 by a clergyman named Barclay, who was excluded from the Church of Scotland. They hold the Calvinistic creed, with the following peculiarities:—They reject natural religion as undermining the evidences of Christianity. They consider faith in Christ and assurance of salvation as inseparable, or rather as the same thing, because (say they) "God hath expressly declared, he that believeth shall be saved; and therefore it is not only absurd, but impious, and in a manner calling God a liar, for a man to say I believe the Gospel, but have doubts, nevertheless, of my own salvation." They say that the sin against the Holy Ghost is nothing else but unbelief; and that the expression, "It shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor in the world to come," means only that a person dying in unbelief would not be forgiven, neither under the former dispensation by Moses, nor under the Gospel dispensation, which, in respect of the Mosaic, was a kind of future world, or world to come. They interpret the Old Testament prophecies, and especially the Psalms, as typical or prophetic of Christ, and never apply them to the experience of private Christians. There are still some congregations of Bereanas in Scotland, and a few, it is believed, in America. See HUTCHINSONS.

Berech'ia (Heb. Berechjah, בַּרְכָּה, blessed by Jehovah; also in the prolonged form Berechjahu, בַּרְכָּה, in 1 Chron. vi, 39; xv, 17; 2 Chron. xxviii, 12; Zech. i, 7; Sept. Bapaios, often Bapaios), the name of six men. See also BARACHIAH and BAREH.

1. The son of Shimea and father of Asaph, the celebrated musician; he was one of the Levites who bore the ark to the tent prepared for it by David (1 Chron. vi, 38, where the name is Anglicized "Barachiah"); xv, 17, 29). B.C. 1438.

2. The son of Meshillemoth, and one of the seven Ephraimite chieftains who enforced the prophet Oded's prohibition of the enslavement of the Judaeans captive by the warriors of the northern kingdom (2 Chron. xxviii, 12). B.C. 739.

3. The father of the five brothers of Zerubbabel (q. v.), of the royal line of Judah (1 Chron. iii, 20; see Strong's Harmony and Expos. of the Gospels, p. 17, note m). B.C. 536.

4. A son of Asa, and one of the Levites that dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites on the return from Babylon (1 Chron. ix, 16). B.C. post 536.

5. The son of Iddo and father of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i, 1, 7). B.C. ante 500.

6. A son of Mesheshbaal and the father of Meshullam, which last repaired a part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 4, 30; vi, 18). B.C. ante 446.

Ber'ed (Heb. id. בַּרְעֵד, hail, in pause Bar’ead, בַּרְעֵא, Gen. xvi, 14; Sept. always Baqai), the name of a place and of a man.

1. A town in the south of Palestine, between which and Kadesh lay the well Labairoi (Gen. xvvi, 14; comp. ver. 15): the name is variously given in the ancient versions: Syriac, Gudar [the Aramaic Ibrar] ; Arab. Ijred, probably a mere corruption of the Hebrew name; Onkelos, Chagra, נֵחֵגְּרָא (elsewhere employed in the Targums for "Shur"); Psa-Jonathan, Chalatu, נַחֲלָעַשׁ, and the ecclesiastical writers, now el-Khâlia, on the Hebron road, about 12 miles south of Beer-sheba (Robinson, i, 296; Stawart, p. 205; Reland, p. 755). We have the testimony of Jerome (Vita S. Hieronymi) that Elusa was called by its inhabitants Barre, which would be an easy corruption of Bered, "being read for ." Chalaza is the name elsewhere given in the Arabic version for "shur" and for "Garar"—Smith. See ELUSA.

2. A son of Shuthelah and grandson of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii, 20); supposed by some to have been identical with Becker in Num. xxvi, 35, by a mere change of letters (בַּרְעֵא for בַּרְעֶד), but with little probability from the context. B.C. post 1856.

Berengarians, the followers of Berengarius, who taught, in the eleventh century, that the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper were not really and essentially, but figuratively, changed into the body and blood of Christ. See BERENGARIUS.

Berengarius or Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, was born at Tours in the beginning of the eleventh century, and studied first in the school of St. Martin, and subsequently at Chartres, under the celebrated Fulbert. Upon his death Berenger left Chartres and returned to Tours, where he taught publicly at its cathedral. He very early manifested a liberal spirit of inquiry, and was distinguished for his plenity as well as for his industry in study. He quit Madrid this city again and repaired to Angers, where he was well received by Hubert de Vendôme, who administered the church of Angers at that period, and who made Berenger archdeacon. Scholars flocked to him from all parts of France. Situated time between 1040 and 1050 he began to publish his sentiments on the fascinist, in which he opposed the doctrine of Paschalisus on transubstantiation. Lanfranc, who was then in Normandy, and who had been the intimate friend of Berenger, entered into a controversy with him on the subject. Berenger answered Lanfranc in a letter (see Gieseler, Ch. Hist. per. iii, § 29), in which he blamed him for charging Scotus with heresy for his opinion that the bread and wine are not changed in substance by consecration in the Eucharist, and declared that in doing so he equally condemned Ambrose, Jerome, Augustin, and others of the fathers. This fell into the hands of Pope Leo IX, who convened a council at Rome in April, 1056, when Berenger was excommunicated. He was also, in this year, condemned in the synods of Brienne and Vercelli. In this last council, which was held in September, the books of Scotus were burned. In October in the same year he was excommunicated by the fourth time, at Paris. Berenger appears to have adhered to his views until 1055, when, being cited before a synod held at Tours, where Hildebrand acted as legate to Victor II, he signed a confession of faith, which, though not a complete retraction, was satisfactory to the prelates present, who accordingly received him into communion. He had not, however, changed his opinions, and still continued to defend in writing his real views, whereupon he was again cited before a council, held at Rome in 1059, where he again retracted, and signed a confession drawn up by Cardinal Humbertus. Upon his return into France he again retracted his recantation, and continued to write in another work in his original opinion. This work Lanfranc endeavored to answer, but without any effect so far as Berenger was concerned, who also, by letter, assured Pope Alexander II that his opinion was unalterable. Thus another synod was held against him at Rouen in 1063, another at Poitiers in 1073, another at St. Maxent in 1075, and another at Rome in 1078, where he confessed the doctrine of transubstantiation to save his life, but withdrew his confession as soon as he was safe in France. He died in communion with the Church in the island of Côte, near Tours, January 5th, 1088, at the age of ninety. Berenger was greatly in advance of his age both intellectually and morally, though his doctrine was physical to equal his moral courage. The injustice with which he was treated at Rome caused him to use the following language of Leo IX.: "In him I found by no means a saint, by no means a lion of the tribe of Judah; not even an upright man. To be declared a heretic by him I account as nothing." He styled the doctrine of transubstantiation an "incepta recordia eulgi." From his great reputation as a teacher, his views were widely diffused, not only in France, but in other countries. Much light has been recently thrown upon the history and character of Berenger by the publication of "Beren- garius: Brief, for Aider oder eine Synod," also "Briefen," heraus, von Dr. H. Sudendorp (Berlin, 1859). This collection of his letters shows him as a worthy man, a loving Christian, and a man of tender and placable nature. It shows also that his learning embraced a wide range: he was a most zealous student of the fathers, he practised medicine as a physician, and was much admired as an orator. It shows farther, what was not before known, that he was in intimate relations with some of the foremost men in France; and that, in particular, Godfrey of Anjou was his friend and protector. We also learn a great deal from this book of Gregory's conduct during his stay in France, and find that his sympathy general to the Berenger- rius's views existed among the chief clergy of France and of the neighboring German border. Dr. Suden- dorfer's historical explanations are both acute and thorough.—Neander, Ch. Hist. lit, 503-522; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. lit, 385-291; Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, lit. 79-88; London, Eccl. Dict. ii, 189.

Berenice. See BERINICE.

Bergler, Nicolás SILVESTRE, D.D., was born at Durnay, in Lorraine, December 31, 1718, and became successively canon of St. Trophime, canon of Notre-Dame de Paris, and cardinal. He was one of the most formidable opponents of the modern philosophical spirit. In 1768 he published "La Certitude des Preuves du Christianisme," which passed through three editions in one year, and was translated into Italian and Spanish. Voltaire replied to it by his "Conseils raisonnables," and Bergler rejoined. Anna- lisa Chasteau's pamphlet in opposition to the views of Bergler, his "Certitude des Preuves de Mahometisme," Bergler afterward published "Le Dieu refusé par lui-même" (Paris, 1765-66-68, 2 vols. 12mo), which contains an examination of the opinions of Rousseau:—Apologie de la Religion Chrétienne (against J.Holtbach; Paris, 1769, 2 vols. 12mo);—Examen du Matérialisme (Paris, 1771, 2 vols. 12mo);—La Religion Chrétienne (Paris, last ed. 1854, 8 vols. 8vo);—L'Origine des dieux du paganisme (Paris, 1774, 2 vols. 12mo). He also wrote for the Encyclopédie his Dictionnaire de Théologie (best ed. Paris, 1864, 6 vols. 8vo, edited by Archibishop Gousset), to which the editors of this Cyclopædia are much indebted. Bergier died April 15, 1790. His works above named are constantly appearing in new editions in Paris.—Hoefker, Biogr. Gen. v, 515.

Bergius, Johannes, a Reformed theologian, was born at Steetin 1587, and studied at Heidelberg, Stras- burg, and Dantzic. In 1616 he was made professor of theology at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In theology he opposed Supralapsarian Calvinism, and declined to attend the Synod of Dort, whose cruel treatment of the Arminians he deplored. (See Limpert, loc. cit., p. 910.) He taught "free grace" in his treatise Der Wille Gottes u. aller Menschen Selbst (1638). He represented Brandenburg at the Leipsic Conference (1631) and at the Thorn Colloquium (1642). He died 1658.—Hersog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Be'ri (Heb. Beri,'בֵּרי, q. d. fentumus, for בֵּרוֹי, Beori; Sept. Bapii v. r. Bapio), a chief warrior, the fourth named of the eleven sons of Zophah, a descend- ant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 86). B.C. perh. 1016.

Ber'ia'h (Heb. Beria'h), on the signif. see below), the name of four men.

1. (Sept. Bapio.) The last named of the four sons of Asher, and the father of Heber and Machiel (Gen. xlv. 17). B.C. 1856. His descendants were called Benites (Num. xxvi, 44, 45).

2. (Sept. Bapio v. r. Bapio.) A son of Ephraim, so named on account of the state of his father's house when he was born. "And the sons of Ephraim; Shothelah, and Bered his son, and Tahath his son, and Zuteh his son, and Eldah his son, and Ezer and Eked, whom the men of Gath [were] born in [that] land slew [lit. "and the men ... slew them"], "because they came down to take away their cattle. And Ephraim their father mourned many days, and his brethren came to comfort him. And when he went in to his wife, she conceived, and bare a son, and he called his name Beriah, because it went evil with his house" [lit. "because in evil" or "a gift," "was to his house:" יִנְשָׁמָה נְקָרָה תֵּאָב לְצָרִי הַיּוֹם]. Sept. ἡ διὰ ημῶν ἡ ἐπικαλούµενη πρὸς ὑµᾶς; Vulg. "et quod in malis domus ejus ortus esset:" (1 Chron. vii. 20-23). With respect to the meaning of the name, Gesenius prefers the rendering "in evil" to "a gift," as probably the right one. In this case, בְּרֵי in the explanation would be, according to him, בּרֵי with Beth esse (Thes. s. v.). It must be remarked, how- ever, that the supposed instances of Beth esse being prefixed to the addition in the case of the former "in evil" are found only in 1075, O. T. 1 and 1075, T. 1, conclusive, and that it is disputed by the Arabic grammarians if the parallel "redundant Bô" of the Arabic be ever so used (comp. Thes. p. 174, 175, where this use of "redundant Bô" is too arbitrarily denied). The Sept. and Vulg. indicate a different construction, with the addition of an adverb, with the prefix "in my house" (for "his house"), so that the rendering "in evil" does not depend upon the construction proposed by Gesenius. Michaelis suggests that בְּרֵי may mean a spontaneous gift of God, beyond expectation and the law of nature, as a son born to Ephraim now growing old might be called (Sups. p. 224, 225). In favor of this meaning, which, with Gesenius, we take in the simple sense of "gift," it may be urged that it is unlikely that four persons of the same family would have borne the same name, and that a case similar to that here supposed is found in the naming of Seth (Gen. iv, 25). Fürst (Hdb. Handw. s. v.) suggests what appears a still better derivation, namely, a contraction of Ἰαγγελος Ἰαγγελος, son of evil, i. e. unlucky. This short notice is of no slight historical importance, especially as it refers to a period of Hebrew history respecting which the Bible affords us no other like information. The event must be assigned to the time between the death of the fathers and the beginning of the oppression. B.C. post. 1856. The indications that guide us are, that some of Ephraim's sons must have attained to manhood, and that the Hebrews were still free. The passage is full of difficulties. The first question is, What sons of Ephraim were killed? The persons do not all seem to be his sons. Shuthelah occupies the first place, and a genealogy of his descendants follows as far as a second Shuthelah, the words "his son" indicating a direct descent, as Houngvant (ap. Barrett, Synopsis, in loc.) remarks, although he very needlessly proposes conjecturally to omit them. A genealogy of the persons of this form is given in ver. 25-27. As the text stands, there are but three sons of Ephraim mentioned before Beriah—Shuthelah, Ezer, and Elad, all of whom seem to have been killed by the men of Gath, though it is possible that the last two are alone meant, while the first of them is stated to have left descendants. In the enumeration of the Israelite families in Numbers four, the tribe of Ephraim are mentioned, sprung from sons Shuthelah, Becher, and Tahan, and from Eran, son or descendant of Shuthelah (xxvi, 35, 86). The second and third families are probably those of Beriah and a younger son, unless the third is one of Beriah, called after his descendant Tahan (1 Chron. vii, 26); or one of them may be that of a son of Joseph, since it is related that Jacob determined that sons of Joseph who might be born to him after Ephraim and Manasseh should "be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance" (Gen. xlviii, 6). See, however, becher. There can be no doubt that the land in which the men of Gath were born is a part of the territory of Lower Egypt, if not of Goshen itself. It would be needless to say that they were born in their own land; but as this was not Gath itself, they must have been called "men of Gath" (q. d. Gittites) as being descended from natives of that place. At this time very many foreigners must have been settled in Egypt, especially in and about Goshen. Indeed, Goshen is mentioned as a non-Egyptian country in its inhabitants (Gen. xlv, 34), and its own name, as well as nearly all the names of its cities and places mentioned in the Bible, save the cities built in the oppression, are probably Semitic. In the Book of Joshua, Shiloh, the Nire, here the Pelassic boundary of Egypt, on Canaan, the Philistine territories apparently being considered to extend from it (Josh. xiii, 2, 3). It is therefore very probable that many Philistines would have settled in a part of Egypt so accessible to them and so similar in its population to Canaan as Goshen and the tract adjoined. As the men of Gath may have been mercenaries like the Cherethim (in Egyptian "Shayratan") who were in the Egyptian service at a later time, as in David's, and to whom lands were probably allotted as to the native army. Some suppose that the men of Gath were the aggressors, a conjecture not at variance with the usage in the relation of the cause of the death of Ephraim's sons, since we may read "when ("κατὰ") they came down," etc., instead of "because," etc. (Bagster's Bible, in loc.), but it must be remembered that this rendering is equally consistent with the other explanation. There is no reason to suppose that the Israelites at this time were sometimes engaged in predatory or other warfare. The warlike habits of Jacob's sons are evident in the narrative of the attack taken by Simeon and Levi upon Hamor and Shechem (Gen. xxxvi, 25-29); and that the same traits existed in their posterity appears from the fear which the Pharaoh who began to oppress them entertained lest they should, in the event of war in the land, join with the enemies of his people, and thus escape out of the country (Exod. i, 8-10). It has been more than once supposed that the events occurring in this verse as it now stands must have been those to which reference is made in Judges, in which it is said that the Gittites descended upon the Ephraimites in a predatory excursion from Palestine, or that the Ephraimites made a raid into Palestine. Neither of these explanations is consistent with sound criticism, because the men of Gath are said to have been born in Egypt, as already shown, and the second one, which is adopted by Bunsen (Egypt's Place, i, 177, 178), is inadmissible on the ground that the verb used, ἔκαστον, "he went down," or "descended," is applicable to going into Egypt, but not to coming from it. The rabbinical idea that these sons of Ephraim went to take the promised land needs no refutation. (For these various views see Poole's Synopsis, in loc.) Smith, s. v.

3. (Sept. Bapau v. r. Bapau.) A Benjaminite; or, as parelyly son of Elpaal; he, with his brother Shimeun, were founders of Ajalon, and expelled the Gittites (1 Chron. viii, 15). B.C. prob. 1612. His nine sons are enumerated in ver. 14-16.

3. (Sept. Bapau v. r. Bapau.) The last named of the four sons of Shimeun, a Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. xxiii, 10). B.C. 1614. His posterity was not numerous (ver. 11).

Be'ri'tte (Heb. with the art., hab-Beri'tte, Sept. ὁ Βερεττῆς, the patronymic title of the family of Beriah (q. v.), the son of Asher (Num. xxxi, 44).

Berington, Joseph, one of the most prolific Roman Catholic writers of Great Britain, was born in 1748 in Shropshire, and died in 1827. He was sent by his parents for education to the College of St. Omer, in France. For many years he exercised the priestly functions in France, and in 1814 was appointed pastor at Buckland, near Oxford. He wrote a number of works on the history, present state, and rights of his co-religionists. He was regarded as a liberal Romanist, and his views were more liberal than those of his superiors as little orthodox. His principal work is a Literary History of the Middle Ages—from the reign of Augustus to the fifteenth century (Lond. 1814; new ed., with index, by D. Bogue, Lond. 1846).

Be'rite (Heb. only in the plur., and with the art., hab-Ber'îm, בֵּרִית, a derivation uncertain [Gesenius and Fürst both overlook the word altogether], if indeed the text be not corrupt; Sept. ὁ Βερεττῆς, but most copies omit it), a tribe or place named with Abel of Beth-maccon, in the territory of the tribe of Joseph, only as having been visited by Joab in his pursuit after Sheba, the son of Bichri (2 Sam. xx. 14). The expression is a remarkable one, "all the Berites" (comp. "all the Bithron.") The Vulgate has a different rendering—omeris eves electi—apparently for בֵּרִית, i. e. young men, and this, is, in Ewald's opinion, the correct reading (Tir. Geschi. iii, 240, note). Schürer is inclined to reject it as a collective term for several places of similar name mentioned in Josephus and the Talmud as lying in the vicinity of Lake Merom (Palest. p. 208); and Thomson (Land and Book, i, 425) conjectures that it may specially designate the Berath (Baphon) of Upper Galilee, where, according to Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 16), the Roman forces encamped against Joshua (comp. Josi. xi, 5). and which he identifies with Boria, a short distance north of Safed (Van de Velde, Map).

Be‘rit (Heb. Berith, בְּרִית, covenant; Sept. unites the three terms, "the house of the god Berith," into one, Βαλδήρις,遂 dependable), stands alone in Judg. ix. 46, for Baal-Berith (q. v.).

Berkeley, George, bishop of Cloyne, was born at Kilkenny March 12, 1684, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1707 he published Arithmetica abequa Algebra et Exeile demonstrata; and in 1709 appeared his Essay Towards a New Theory of Vision, the first work in which an attempt was made to deduce the immediate operations of the senses from the deductions which we habitually draw from our sensations. In 1710 appeared his Principles of Human Knowledge, in which he propounded the novel doctrine that what we call sense has no actual existence, and that the impressions which we believe that we receive from it are not, in fact, derived from any thing external to ourselves, but are produced within us by a certain disposition of the mind, the immediate operation of God. In 1724 he was made dean of Derry, and in the year following published his propositions for the conversion of the Indians in the Bermudas by means of a college in the Bermudas. He designed it as a place of refuge for the government and by individuals, and great promises of money were made to him, such as to induce him to resign his living, worth £1100 a year, and to embark with his wife in order to purchase land for the intended college. He continued to study, and to prepare for its foundation. Landing at Newport, R. I., he remained there for two years, and, finding all his expectations of assistance vain, he was compelled to return to England, and thus ended a noble scheme, to complete which he had spent seven years of his life, resigned his actual prebend, and refused a bishopric, declaring that he would rather be one of St. Paul’s students than bishop of the new college of St. Paul than be primate of all England, this superiority being actually worth to him £1000 a year. In 1792 he published Alciphron, 2 vols. 8vo, the design of which work was to refute the various systems of atheism, fatalism, and scepticism. At length, in 1734, he was raised to the see of Cloyne. He continued to put forth to the world at large the conclusions he had arrived at, from time to time when writing and preaching, because of Christianity and his country, refused to exchange his see for that of Clogher, although the income was twice as great, and died at Oxford in 1703. His Works, with a Life of the Author, by Wright, were reprinted, with a translation of the Latin essays, in 1843 (London, 2 vols. 8vo). Mackintosh says that Berkeley’s writings afford the finest models of philosophical style since Cicero. His style is very clear, and his bold method of thinking, and absence of all adhesion to great authorities, makes his works even now valuable to the student. These same qualities make them difficult to describe, and the peculiar nature of the subjects which he treated have caused them to be mis-represented, so that their true scope is less understood than that of any other writings of his day.—Landon, Eccl. Dict. ii. 168; New Englishman, vii. 474; Eng. Cyclopedia; Sprague, Annals, v. 63; Tennemann, Manual of English Phil., § 481; Mackintosh, History of Eiches, p. 130, North Amer. Rev. Jan. 1855; J. T. Berkhemeyer, William Christopher, a Lutheran minister, of whose parentage and early life little is known. He arrived in America in 1725, and became minister to the Lutheran congregation of Quassaick Parish. His residence was at Livingston (now Athens, N. Y.), but his itinerant labors extended over a large part of the country of New York. He was regarded as a man of great learning in his time, and tradition still speaks of his great zeal and industry as a minister. He gave special care to the negro race.—Evang. Rev. April, 1862; Doc. Hist. of N. Y. vol. iii.

Berliner Bible (Berliner Bibel), an edition of the Bible published at Berlim, Germany, 1727-29, by anonymous editors. It gives an entirely new translation, with a running exposition, giving the literal, spiritual, and hidden, or mystical interpretation. It was edited in the spirit of Pietism of a mystical tendency (Walch, Biblioth. Theol. iv. 187).

Bernard of Mentone (of Ostoja), St., was born in 923, near Annecy. He is memorable as the founder of two establishments of Hospitalitators, where for more than nine hundred years successive travellers have found an asylum against the perils of the Alps. He was archdeacon of Ostoja, and grand-vicar of the diocese. In his journeys he had opportunities of seeing the sufferings to which the pilgrims were exposed in crossing the Alps, and he conceived the project of establishing two hospitals, one on Mount Joux (Mont Jovis), the other in a pass in the Greek Alps, called Colom Jovis, on account of a pile of stones raised on the spot to point out the road to travellers. Upon these sums he raised the two hospitals known as the Great and Little St. Bernard, which he confided to the regular order of St. Augustine, who, from that time down to the present, have continued to fulfil with zeal and charity beyond all praise the merciful intentions of the founder. The chief monastery is on the Great St. Bernard, which is supposed to be the highest dwelling in Europe, and there, amid perpetual snows, the monks have devoted themselves to the hospitalities. Bernard died at Nevosa May 29, 1008. His feast is observed on June 15, the day of his interment. His life is given in the Acta Sanctorum, June 15.—Landon, Eccl. Dict. ii. 189; Butler, Lives of Saints, June 15.

Bernard of Tiron, St., founder of a new congregation of Benedictines (q. v.), viz. the Tironcensians (q. v.), was born at Ponthieu about A.D. 1046. He and his companions, inspired by St. Cyrilian’s, but in 1100 founded the abbey of Tiron and the new congregation named from the place. The monks gave themselves to silence, manual labor, prayer, and psalmody, and their dress was of the commonest material. Bernard, before long, found himself surrounded by more than five hundred disciples of both sexes. Each one was set to perform whatever art or work he was best suited for, and were found carpenters, smiths, goldsmiths, painters, vine-dressers, agriculturists, writers, men of all callings, glad to exercise their talents in obedience to their superior. A noble monastery soon arose in the solitude. Congregations were soon established in France, Britain, Germany, and Italy. Eleven of these congregations, subject to the chief of the order at Tiron, and of these eight were in France, one in Wales, in the diocese of St. David’s, called the abbey of St. Mary de Cameis, and one in Scotland, at Roxburgh. Bernard died on the 14th of April, 1116. He has not been canonized by the Church, but the Martyrologies of the Benedictines and of France mention him on the 14th of April. His life is given in the Acts Sanctorum, April, i. ii.—Baillet, Vies des Saints, 14 Aprilis; Helyot, Ordres Religieux, iii. 674.

Bernard of Clairvaux, St., one of the most eminent names in the Mediæval Church, was born of noble parents near Dijon, in the year 1091. He had five brothers and one sister, all of whom he persuaded to the same course of religious life with himself; and, after having lived for some time in seclusion in their father’s house, the brothers all left it together in 1118, and repaired to Citeaux, where they demanded of the abbot Stephen to be admitted. Besides his brothers, he took with him other confidants, making in all thirty. Having distinguished himself by his piety, devotion, and learning, he was commissioned, in 1114, to conduct a colony of monks to Clairvaux, where, having built their monastery, he was appointed the first abbot. His learning and consummate abilities could not be long concealed in the cloister, and very soon he was called upon to take part in all the important affairs of the Church. In 1128 he was present in the Synod of Troyes, convoked by the legate Matthew, cardinal bishop of Albano, where, by his means, the order of the Knights Templars was confirmed, as well as the convention by which they observed the sche-sis between Innocent II and Anacletus, Bernard took the side of the former. In 1140 we find him strenuously opposing Abelard (q.v.), whom, both by word and by his writings, he resisted, especially in the Council of Sens held in that year. His arbitrary and persevering persecution of Abelard is one of the greatest stains upon his memory. After about the year 1140, Bernard was involved in an important controversy concerning what was called the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. Several churches in France began about that time to celebrate the festival consecrated to this pretended conception. It is reported by some authors that it had been introduced into the Church of England before this period, in consequence of the exportations of archbishop Anselm. The Church of Lyons was the first which adopted this new festival in France, which no sooner came to the knowledge of St. Bernard than he severely censured the canons of Lyons on account of this innovation, and opposed the immaculate conception as being contrary to the national religion, as it supposed her to be honored with a privilege which belonged to Christ alone. Upon this warm contest arose, some siding with the canons of Lyons, and adopting the new festival, while others adhered to the more orthodox sentiments of St. Bernard. The controversy, notwithstanding the zeal of the contending parties, was carried on during this century with a certain degree of decency and moderation. But in after times, as Mosheim remarks, when the Dominicans were established in the Academy of Paris, the contest was renewed with the greatest vehemence, and the same subject was discussed on both sides with the un-most animosity and contension of mind. The Dominicans declared for St. Bernard, while the Academy patronized the canons of Lyons, and adopted the new festival. (See IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.) It was in the year 1145 that information was received in Europe of the perilous condition of the newly-established kingdom in the East. Edessa was taken by the Saracens, Antioch and Jerusalem were threatened. The news excited universal sorrow. Louis the Seventh, king of France, in a penitential spirit, was the first who prepared to arm in defence of the Holy Sepulchre. The French king's determination was approved by the pope, and Bernard, as archbishop of Liege, was commis-sionated to travel through France and Germany for the purpose of raising an army of crusaders. The success of Bernard was marvellous. The unwilling emperor, Conrad III, yielded at length to his impassioned eloquence. In his management of Conrad, the tact and good taste of Bernard were conspicuous. It was at Frankfort-on-Main that he had his first private audience. When the emperor then gave him to understand how little interest he took in the matter, Bernard pressed the subject no further, but awaited another opportunity. After having succeeded in making peace between several of the princes of the empire, he preached with great fervor and industry, exhorting the emperor and princes to participate in it, at the diet held at Christmas in the city of Spires. Three days after he again addressed the emperor in private, and exhorted him, in a friendly and affectionate manner, not to lose the opportunity of so short, so easy, and so honorable a mission. Conrad, already disposed to the undertaking, replied that he would advise with his councillors, and give him an answer on the following day. The next day Bernard officiated at the holy communion, to which he unexpectedly added a sermon in reference to the crusade. Toward the conclusion of his discourse, he turned to the emperor, and addressed him frankly, as though he had been a private man. He described the day of judgment, when the men who had received such innumeratible benefits from God, and yet had refused to minister to Him the utmost of their power, would be left without reply or excuse. He then spoke of the blessings which God had in store for those who, like himself, were immodestly laden upon the head of Conrad—the highest worldly do-mension, treasures of wealth, gifts of mind and body—till the emperor, moved even to tears, exclaimed, 'I acknowledge the gifts of the divine mercy, and I will no longer remain ungrateful for them. I am ready for the service which He Himself hath exhorbed me.' At Abbeville the assembly of the emperor, the advice of the early clergy and nobles, and the advice of the eassembled, and several of the nobles followed his example. On this occasion he went so far as to claim inspiration, and to prophesy the success of the undertaking. This is the most reprehensible part of his career, and he attempted to cover the failure of his prophecy by a poor quib.
In the same year a council was held at Chartres, where the Crusaders offered Bernard the command of the army, which he refused. In 1147, at the Council of Paris, he attacked the doctrine of Gilbert de la Porée, bishop of Poitiers, on the Trinity; and in the following year, at the Council of Ithome, procured its condemnation. He afterwards became a most ardent adversary of practical religion, and was undoubtedly one of the holiest men of his time. But it must be confessed that he was misled by the love of ecclesiastical conformity to false pretensions and persecuting principles. All ecclesiastical dignities he constantly refused; but his virtues and talents gained him a higher influence in the Christian world than was possessed even by the pope himself, and the disputes of the Church were often referred to his arbitration. Luther says of him,
"If there has ever been a pious monk who feared God, it was St. Bernard; whom alone I hold in much higher esteem than all other monks and priests throughout the globe." His devotional Meditations are still read and admired, even among Protestants. They were translated into English by Stanhope. There can be no question but that he saw with sorrow many of the errors, corruptions, and defections of the Church of Rome, nor did he hesitate to do all in his power to correct them. In 1144, he put forth his Libri de Consideratione, addressed to Pope Eugenius III, in which he handles the subject at large, and strongly urges it. In the first book of this work he inveighs against the abuses of the ecclesiastical courts. In the second he admonishes Eugenius to confine the temporal jurisdiction of the empire to the commissioners of his office, what is. He reminds him that he is not set over others to dominate over them, but to minister to them and watch over them; that he had indeed given him to the charge of all the churches, but no arbitrary dominion over them, which the Gospel disallows. "To you," he says, "indeed the keys of heaven have been intrusted, but there are other door-keepers of heaven and other pastors besides you; yet are you so much the more above them as you have received the title after a different manner. They have every one a particular flock, but you are superintendent over them all; you are not only supreme pastor and protector of the Church but master of the archbishopric. In the third book he treats of his duty toward inferi-ors, and complains heavily of the grievance caused by the appeals to Rome, which, he says, were the occasion of incalculable mischief, and, justly, a source of murmuring and complaint. He further inveighs against the multitude of exemptions which deprived the Church of its independence. In the fourth book he admonishes the pope to mind his duty toward the clergy, cardinals, and other officers of his court, and to press their intriguers, luxury, and sumptuousness. He advises him as to the qualifications of those whom he should retain near his person, and, lasts, makes a recapitulation of the qualities requisite for the due fulfilament of the papal office: "Consider that the Church of Rome, over which God hath placed you as supreme, is the mother, and not the mistress of other churches; and that you are not a sovereign lord over the other bishops, but only one among them; that you are a brother of those that have been, and are, and will be, as many as there are of such a company; let no one fear him," etc. "His meditations have been translated by Dean Stanhope. His sermons have been the delight of the faithful in all ages. They are," says Sixtus of Sienna, "at once so sweet and so ardent that it is as though his mouth were a fountain of honey, and the heart of a whole multitude of doctrine and morals. St. Bernard differs on some material points from that of the modern Church of Rome; he did not hold those refinements and perversions of the doctrine of justification which the school divinity afterward introduced, and the Reformers denounced; he rejected the notion of supererogatory works; he did not hold the modern purgatorial doctrines of the Church of Rome; neither did he admit the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin. He maintained the doctrine of the real presence, as distinguished from the Romish doctrine of transubstantiation. In his discourse on the Lord's Supper, he joins together the outward form of the sacrament, the real presence as a rational efficacy of grace, and the kernel, the sacred sign, and the thing signified; the one he takes out of the words of the institution, and the other out of Christ's sermon in the sixth of St. John. And in the same place explaining that sacraments are not things absolute in themselves without any relation, but mysteries, wherein, by the gift of a visible sign, an invisible and divine grace with the body and blood of Christ is given, he saith 'that the visible sign is as a ring, which is given, not for itself or absolutely, but to invest and give possession of an estate made over to one.' Now, as no man can fancy that the ring is substantially changed into the inheritance, we may say that the sacrament is, with truth or without absurdity, that the bread and wine are substantially changed into the body and blood of Christ. But in his sermon on the Purification he speaks yet more plainly: 'The body of Christ in the sacrament is the food of the soul, not of the belly, therefore we eat Him not corporally; but in the manner that Christ is made, in the same manner we understand that He is eaten.' Also in his sermon on St. Martin: 'To this day,' saith he, 'the same flesh is given to us, but spiritually, therefore not corporally.' For the truth of things spiritually present is certain also." Bernard died August 20, 1153, leaving one hundred and sixty manuscripts which he had written or founded; besides numerous letters. The brief character of him given by Erasmus is this: "Christiane doctus, sanctus facundus et pie festivus." He was canonized, with unexampled splendor, twenty years after his death, by Alexander III, and the Roman Church celebrates his memory on the 29th of August. Of all the editions of his works, by far the best is that by Mabillon (Paris, 1690, 2 vols. fol.; reprint ed., with additions, Paris, 1839, 4 vols. imp. 8vo.)—Hook, Eccles. Biography, ii, 308 sq.; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. i, 301-333; Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. iv, passim; Neander, Der heilige Bernard und sein Zeitalter (Berlin, 1813, 8vo); Neander, Leben und Briefe, ed. by Matilda Wrench (Lond. 1843, 12mo); Ellendorf, Der heil. Bernard (Essen, 1837); Ratlabonae, Hist. de St. Bern (Paris, 2 vols, 1843, 4th ed. 1860); Morison, Life and Times of Bernard (1863, 8vo); and Niedner, Zeit- schrift (1862, pt. ii, art. i, by Pflitt); Böhringer, Kirche Chrestia, i, 496, Lond. Of the writings of Bernard, one of his manuscripts, a kind of poem, followed by verse and prose, and divided into two parts, the one called Megacosmus (great world), and the other Microcosmus (little world; a treatise on man). The system of Bernard was a Platonism, sometimes interpreted according to the genius of the Alexandrians.—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, v, 575; Cousin, Introduction aux fragments inédits de l'Absalard.

Bernard of Thuringia, a German visionary who lived toward the close of the 12th century, but of whose life nothing else is known. On the ground of some passage in the Revelation he announced the end of the world as close at hand, and produced a wonderful commotion throughout the whole of Europe. Many were induced to believe that they had as much to do in Palestine, where Christ was to descend from heaven to judge the quick and the dead. The secular authority had great difficulty in checking this movement.—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, v, 558.

Bernard, Ptolemei, St., founder of the Olivetans (q. v.), was born at Sienna 1272, died August 20, 1548. He descended from one of the first families of Sienna, and had many advantageous positions in life. The consequence of a vow to leave the world if he should be cured from a sore eye, he sold all he had, distributed the money among the poor, withdrew to a desert ten miles from Sienna, and then practiced extraordinary austerities. He was soon joined by some followers; and when the pope counselled him to connect himself with one of his spiritual orders, his father, who was a Reformed minister, sent him to Geneva to pursue his theological studies. On his return he was himself ordained minister, and preached publicly, notwithstanding the prohibitive laws. He was soon compelled to flee, and went first to Lausanne, where he remained until the revolution of the Edict of Nantes. Then he went to Holland, where he established a school of belles lettres, philosophy, and mathematics. He undertook, in 1691, to continue the publication of the Bibliothèque Universelle, begun by Jean Leclerc. In 1693 he succeeded Bayle as editor of the journal La République des Lettres. Besides a number of historical works, Traité de la Repentance tardive (Amsterdam, 1712, 12mo), and Traité de l'Excellence de la Religion (Amsterdam, 1714).—Hoefer, Biog. Générale, v, 584.

Bernard, Jacques, a Reformed minister of France, born between Nîmes and Dauphiné, September 1, 1658, and died April 27, 1718. His father, who was a Reformed minister, sent him to Geneva to pursue his theological studies. On his return he was himself ordained minister, and preached publicly, notwithstanding the prohibitive laws. He was soon compelled to flee, and went first to Lausanne, where he remained until the revolution of the Edict of Nantes. Then he went to Holland, where he established a school of belles lettres, philosophy, and mathematics. He undertook, in 1691, to continue the publication of the Bibliothèque Universelle, begun by Jean Leclerc. In 1693 he succeeded Bayle as editor of the journal La République des Lettres. Bernard, Richard, a Puritan divine, was born 1566 or 1567, died in 1641. Among his numerous works are the following: Plain Evidence that the Church of England is Apostolical (Lond. 1610); A Key for Opening the Mysteries of the Revelation of St. John (Lond. 1617); The Monument of the Founders of the Church of England; showing that St. Peter was never at Rome (Oxford, 1619); and several other works against the Church of Rome; The Isle of Man, or legal Proceedings in Menehre against Sin (Lond. 1627, 10th edit. 1635), supposed by some to have been the germ of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; A Guide to Grand Jurymen with regard to Witches and Witchcrafts (Lond. 1627, 1702); Hoefer, Biog. Générale, v, 592; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 179.

Bernardin (Ital. Bernardino), Sr., of Sienna, descended from the distinguished family Albucchi, was born Sept. 8, 1380, at Massa-Carrara, and entered the Franciscan order in 1404. He became one of the boldest and most famous preachers against the prevailing corruptions of the times; was appointed 1408 vicar-general of his order, and successfully exerted himself for the restoration of the strict monastic discipline.
rule. He died in 1444 at Aquila, where his relics are still kept, and was canonized in 1450. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on May 20. His works are mostly of a mystical character; among them is a commentary on the Revelation. His complete works have been often published (Ven. 1591, 4 vols. 4to; Paris, 1636, 5 vols. fol.; Ven. 1745, 5 vols. fol.).

Bernard de Sahagun, a Spanish Franciscan, lived in the second half of the 16th century. He spent many years in the West Indies and Mexico, and composed a grammar and dictionary of the language of the latter country, and many other works for the use of the natives of Mexico and North America. She wrote in Spanish a history of the religion, the government, and the customs of the natives of the West Indies, and an essay on the conquest of New Spain or Mexico.—Hoefer, Biogr. Générale, v. 606.

Bernardine Monks (the same with the Cistercians), so called after Bernard of Clairvaux, who greatly extended the order. See Bernard and Cistercians.

Bernice, conference of disputation of, a name given especially to a conference held in 1528, which led to the establishment of the Reformation in that city. The soil of Bern, not originally favorable to the reform, was suddenly prepared for it by the juggling doings of the Dominicans (1507-1509), and by Sarum. There were no inquirers in the Indulgences (Mosheim, Cl. Hist., iii, 18, 27). The reform movement was earnestly preached by Kolb, Haller, etc. (q. v.). The bishop of Lausanne demanded the indictment of the heretical preachers, but the council of the city refused to interfere. Great excitement arose (D'Aubigné, Hist. of Reformation, bk. viii). The mandate of Viti et Modest (June 15, 1529) were intended to meditate between the parties, and the council forbade any preaching, "whether of doctrine given out by Luther or other doctors, in the way of disputation, apart or aside from proof out of the Word of God." For two years the cause of reform fluctuated between advance and retreat. In 1528 the "Baden Disputation" was held, and its issue seemed likely to be fatal to the reformers. But the decisions of Baden were too severe and partial for the patience of the Bernese, to whom Haller and Kolb were still preaching. On November 17th, 1527, the great council decided to hold a conference at Bern to settle disputes by "beautes to the word of God." They invited the bishops of Constance, Basel, the Valais, and Lausanne, and the Leagues of both parties were requested to send "delegates and learned men." The bishops declined the invitation, and the emperor, Charles V, sent a dissuasive, advising trust and recourse to the anticipated general council. Nevertheless, there was a large assembly that opened on the 6th of January, 1528, the majority being reformers, and among them Bucer, Capito, Ėcclomipadius, and Zuingle. A graphic account of the discussion is given by D'Aubigné (History of Reformation, bk. xv). Among the results of this disputation were the abrogation of the pastoral insignia, the suppression of images, etc., in the church, and the Reformation Edict of Feb. 7th, 1528, annulling the authority of the bishops, setting questions of Church order, etc. For Bern, and, in fact, for Switzerland, this conference was the turning-point of the Reformation. See D'Aubigné, as above cited, and Förstner, Geschichte d. Reformation u. Reformation in Bern (Bern, 1895); Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, ii, 81; Ruckhart, Reformation in Switzerland, ch. iv.

Bernes, Synod of, an assembly of the clergy of Bern, Switzerland, to consolidate the work of the Reformation, held in 1532. It was the first of the Reformed synods of Bern, and was attended by 290 of the clergy, June 9-14, 1532. A Church Directory and Manual for Pastors were adopted, containing many excellent regulations, and full of the Christian spirit, as are the Acts of the Synod. They were published in Basle, 1532; and again enjoined in 1728 and 1775; re-published, Basle, 1830, 8vo, with a German version.—Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, ii, 87.

Bernoulli (Biography in Acts, also in Josephus; Bernouilli = Βερνούλλης, see Sturz, Dial. Med. p. 51; the form Bernoulii was adopted by Berner and his comp. Egenolff.). See Valenciennes, Ad Herod. p. 477; Niebuhr, Hist. Selker 1, 273, the name of several Egyptian princesses (see Smith's Dict. of Clas. Biog. s. v. Bernice), and also of several Jewish females of royal connection named in Josephus, and one of them in the New Testament.

1. The daughter of Costabares and Salome, and niece of Herod the Great and wife of Aristobulus, the son of Herod, who, proud of his descent from the Maccabees through his mother Mariamme, is said to have taunted her with her comparatively low origin; and her consequent complaints to her mother served to increase the feud, which resulted in the death of Aristobulus (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4; xxi, 1, 2; 4, 1, 7, 3; War, i, 29, 13; 24, 8). See Aristobulus. After his execution B.C. 6, Bernice became the wife of Theudon, maternal uncle to Antipater, the eldest son of Herod—Antipater having brought about the marriage, with the view of conciliating Salome and disarming her suspicions toward himself (Josephus, Ant. xxi, 5, 1; 29, 1). Josephus does not mention the death of Theudon, but it is probable that he suffered for his share in Antipater's plot against the life of Herod (Ant.* xiv, 7, 4; War, i, 30, 5). See Antipater.

2. The eldest daughter of Agrippa I (q. v.) by his wife Cypros; she was espoused at a very early age to Marcus, son of Alexander the Abalarch; but he died before the consummation of the marriage, and she then became the wife of her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had two sons (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5, 14; xxiv, 3, 7; War, ii, 2; 7, 3; Ant. xvi, 8, 3). After the death of this Herod, A.D. 48, Bernice, then but 20 years old, lived for a considerable time with her own brother, Agrippa II (q. v.), and not without just suspicion of an incestuous commerce with him, to avoid the scandal of which she induced Polemon, king of Cilicia, to marry her; but she soon deserted him and returned again to her brother (Josephus, Ant. xx, 7, 3; Jewish vi, 156), in connection with whom she is mentioned Acts xxv, 13, 23; xxvi, 50, as having visited Festus at Caesarea on his appointment as procurator of Judea, when Paul defended himself before them all, A.D. 55. About A.D. 55 we hear of her being at Jerusalem (whither she had gone in musings of a vow), and interceding for the Jews with the procurator Florus, at the risk of her life, during his cruel massacre of them (Josephus, War, ii, 15, 1). Together with her brother she endeavored to divert her countrymen from the purpose of rebellion (Josephus, War, ii, 15, 6); but she shared the Roman wrath at the outbreak of the final war, she gained the favor of Vespasian by her munificent presents, and the love of Titus by her beauty. Her connection with the latter continued at Rome, whither she went after the capture of Jerusalem, and it is even said that he wished to make her his wife; but the fear of offending the Bo-mans by such a step compelled him to dismiss her, and, though she afterward returned to Rome, he still avoided a renewal of their intimacy (Tacitus, Hist. ii, 2, 81; Sueton. Vital. 7; Dio Cass. liv, 15, 18). Quin- tilian (Inst. Orat. iv, 1) speaks of having pleaded her cause on some occasion not otherwise alluded to, on which she herself sat as judge. See Nolde, Hist. Jud. p. 504 (soq).

3. The daughter of Archelaus son of Cleophas, and Malthace daughter of Herod Agrippa I (Josephus, Ant. xxi, 7, 1).

Bero'da-balad'ân (Heb. Bero'da-baladân; Heb. Bero'da-baladân; Vulg. Bero'da-baladânu); the city of the king of Babylon who sent the friendly depotation to Hesekiah (2 Kings xx, 12), called in the parallel passage (Isa. xxxix, 1), apparently more correctly, Merodach-baladânu (q.v.).

Bero'as (Bô- การ, also written Bô-agar according to Vossius, Theog. i, 61, the Macedonian for Pho- as), the name of two cities mentioned in Scripture.

A city in the north of Palestine, mentioned in 2 Macc. vii, 18, in connection with the deposition of Judas by Antiochus Epiphat as the scene of the miserable death of Menelaus. This seems to be the city in which Jerome says that certain persons lived who possessed and used Matthew's Hebrew Gospel (De Vir. Illust. c. 2). This city (the name of which is written also Berois, Beros; see Beroëmen, Ptol. v, 29) was situated in Syria (Strabo, xvi, 751), about midway between Antioch and Hieropolis (Ptol. v, 15), being about two days' journey from each (Julian, Epist. xxvii; Theodor. ii, 22). Chosroes, in his incursion upon Syria, A.D. 640, demanded a tribute from Beroia, which he remitted afterward, as the inhabitants were unable to pay it (Procop. Bell. Pers. ii, 7; Le Beau, Histoire de l'Empire, i, 18); but in A.D. 611 he occupied this city (Gibbon, vii, 225). It owed its Macedonian name Beroas to Seleucus Nicator (Nephot. Hist. Excl. xiv, 39), and continued to be called so till the conquest of the Arabs under Abu Obelaid, A.D. 628, when it resumed its ancient name, Chalde or Chaldon (Schulten, Index Geogr. s. v. Haleb). It afterward became the capital of the sultans of the race of Hamadan, but in the latter part of the tenth century was united to the Greek empire by the conquests of Zimisces, emperor of Constantineople, with which city it at length fell into the hands of the Turks. It is now called by the moderns Aleppo (Hardouin, ad Plin. ii, 267), but by the natives still Ilahâl, a famous city of the modern Orient (Mannert, vi, i, 514 sq.; Büsching, Erdbeob. v, i, 285). The excavations a little westward of the town are the only vestiges of ancient remains in the neighborhood; they are very extensive, and consist of suites of large apartments, which are separated by portions of solid rock, with massive pilasters left at intervals to support the mass above (Cheyne, Euphr. Exped. i, 435). Its present population is somewhat near to 100,000 souls (see Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Haleb; McCulloch, Geogr. Dict. s. v. Aleppo; Russel's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, passim). See HALEB.

2. A city of Macedonia, to which the apostle Paul retired with Silas and Timotheus, in the course of his first visit to Europe, on being persecuted in Thessalonica (Acts xvii, 10), and from which, on being again perse-} ecuted by emissaries from Thessalonica, he withdrew to the sea for the purpose of proceeding to Athens (ib. 14, 15). The community of Jews must have been considerable in Beroea, and their character is described in very favorable terms (ib. 11; see Comp. Beros. Liv. xcvii, 39). Sopater, one of Paul's missionary companions, was from this place (Baptaiois, Acts xxx, 4; comp. Berosa, Liv. xcvii, 39). Beroea was situated in the northern part of the province of Macedonia (Plin. iv, 10), in the district called Emathia (Ptolem. iii, 18, 58), on a river which flows down into the sacred lake, and upon one of the lower ridges of Mount Bermius (Strabo, vii, p. 380). It lay 20 Roman miles from Pella (Perr. Tab.), and 51 from Thessalonica (Itin. Antonin.), and is mentioned as one of the cities of the district of Thessalonica (Constant. De Theb. ii, 2). Coins of it are rare (Rasch. v. 1492; Eckhel. 50). Beroea was attacked, but unsuccessfully, by the Athenian forces under Callias, B.C. 482 (Thucyd. i, 61). It surrendered to the Roman consul after the battle of Pydna (Liv. xiv, 45), and was assigned, with its territory, to the third region of Macedonia (Liv. xiv, 29). B.C. 168.

It was called a chief and populous town (Lucian, Anax. 54), being afterward called Irorsea (Procop. Brev. Pers. i, 1038), and is now known as Ferria or Karda-Vera, which has been fully described by Leake (Northern Greece, iii, 200 sq.) and by Courbin (Voyage dans la Macedoine, i, 69 sq.). Situated on the eastern slope of the Olympus mountain range, with an abundant supply of water, from the springs, and a broad and deep valley of the plain of the Axius and Haliacmon, it is regarded as one of the most agreeable towns in Chalcis, and has now 15,000 or 20,000 inhabitants. A few remains still exist here. Two roads are laid down in the itineraries between Thessalonica and Beroea passing by Pella. Paul and his companions may have traveled on either of them. Two roads also connect Beroea with Diim, one passing by Pydna. It was probably from Diim that Paul sailed to Athens, leaving Silas and Timotheus behind; and possibly 1 Thess. iii, 2 refers to a journey of Timotheus from Beroea, not from Athens. See TIMOTHY.

Beroath; Beroth. See FIN.

Bero'bitsa (perhaps from Bar-Omas, the son of Oseas), a priest of Beroe and historian at Babylon, lived, according to some, to 250 B.C., according to others, at the time of Alexander the Great. He wrote a history of Chaldaeæ, which he compiled from the temple archives of Babylon, of which he was the keeper. This work, which was highly valued by the ancients, was still extant in the time of Josephus, who used it to a considerable extent for his Antiquitates. Other fragments may be found in the writings of Eusebius and others. Fabricius, in his Bibloth. Graec. (tom. xiv), has collected the least doubtful fragments of Berosus. Other collections of these fragments were made by Richter, Beroës Chaldaeorum historiae qua superavit (Leips. 1795), and by Dusart (1845). A work with the title Antiquitates littera quae cimn sunt antea默契n, Aeneas Annis, which first appeared at Rome 1498 (again Heldelb. 1599, Wittenb. 1612), is a forgery of the Dominican Giovanni Nanni, of Viterbo. Whether the historian Berosus is the same person as the astronomer is still a controverted question. The astronomer Berosus, who is likewise called a Chaldæan and a Babylonian, was at Babylon, left his native country, and established a school on the island of Cos. See Vossius, De Hist. Berridge, John, one of the Methodist reformers of the Church of England, was born at Knightsbridge, 1714, and ministered in a small Hall, 1784, at which period he became vicar of Everton. In 1758 he invited Wesley to visit his parish, and a wide-spread reformation broke out, attended by some irregularities and excesses. Berridge soon began to loathe, and Everton was for some years the centre of a wide sphere of evangelical labor. He preached in ten or twelve sermons, often in the open air. His theological opinions allied him with Whitefield, and he became a notable champion of Calvinistic Methodism. He was rich, but liberal to excess, and rented preaching-houses, supported lay preachers, and aided poor societies with an unsparking hand. His sermons were laborious studies familiar with the classical languages as with his native tongue. Like most good men whose temperament renders them zealous, he had a rich vein of humor, and his ready wit played freely but harmlessly through both his public and private discourse. He died 1798. His Christian World Unmasked, with his Life, Letters, etc., was reprinted in 1824 (Lond. 8vo).—Stevens, History of Methodism, i, 362; Wesley, Works, iv, 25.

Berrigan, William, D.D., an English divine, was born in London 1688, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford. He became rector of St. Andrews' Undershares and Fellow of Eton 1729. His studies were extensive, especially in the Oriental languages. He died 1749. His principal writings are, Eight Sermons on the Ten Commandments, translated by the Gospel (Boyle Lectures for 1720, 1731, 1732);—Sermons on Christian Doctrines and Duties (Lond. 1751, 2 vols. 8vo).—Hook, Eccl. Biol. ii, 330.

Bettuyer, Joseph Isaac, born November 7th, 1681, at Rouen; became a Jesuit, and died at Paris in 1758, after having made much stir in the world by his History of the Church. Part of the T. T. appeared in 1728 (7 vols. 4to). The work is shocking not only from its almost infidelity, but from its style, the T. T. history being, in fact, turned into a romance, in many cases irreconcilable with decency and propriety. The general of the order commanded the writer to put forth a new edition, which appeared in 1738 (8 vols. 4to), but it was still very far from satisfactory. The second part, containing the N. T., or, at least, part of it, in style and matter even worse than the first, appeared in 1753 (4 vols. 4to). The superiors of the three Jesuit establishments at Paris, seeing the storm which the book had raised, immediately put forth a declaration against the work in general, and in their knowledge, and compelled the author to sign an act of submission to the episcopal mandate. A formal censure on the part of the faculty of theology, and then a papal brief, and, lastly, a bull of Benedict XIV, prescribing the book in whatever language it might appear, followed. The third part appeared in 1768 at Lyons, containing a paraphrase of the epistles, filled with absurdities, and even outraging the doctrine of the Trinity. Clement XIII condemned it in 1758. The publication of this work produced a violent commotion among the Jesuits. Father Tourennine, the head of the opposition party, denounced the work as false and impious, and urged the Holy See to suppress it, and the party replied; the dispute waxed hotter and hotter, but ultimately, by the death of Tourennine, the party of Bertuyer gained the upper hand, and his infamous book is still reprinted.—Landon, Eccl. Dict. ii, 204.

Berry, Lucien W., D.D., an eminent Methodist Episcopalian, was born at Amherst, Mass., in 1815. He began to preach in 1833, and by his diligence as preacher, pastor, and student, he gradually acquired wide reputation and influence. He entered the traveling ministry in the Ohio Conference, and succeeded Dr. Simpson in the presidency of the Indiana Asbury University. After remaining for about 15 years in charge of this institution, he accepted the presidency of the Iowa Wesleyan University at Mount Pleasant. He remained in connection with this institution for about three years. In the summer of 1857 he resigned his place at Mount Pleasant, and took charge of the university of Missouri at Jefferson City. He labored with great zeal and energy to build up the university; but in November, 1857, he was attacked by erysipelas, which was subsequently followed by paralysis. He died July 23, 1858, at Cincinnati, Ohio. He was "a profound divine, a critical scholar, an orator of uncommon power, and an eminently holy man." —Minutes of Conferences, 1859, p. 126.

Berthier, Guillaume François, a Jesuit writer, born April 7th, 1704. He was first professor of the Humanities at Bologna, and afterward of theology at Paris. The talent which he displayed caused him to be appointed to succeed Brumoy in 1745 as continuing historian of the Gallican Church (Histoire de l'Eglise Gallicane), of which he published six volumes, carrying the history to A.D. 1529. In 1745 his superiors intrusted him with the direction of the Journal de Trionca, which he edited until the suppression of the company, and he thus employed he was necessarily brought into collusion with Voltaire, whose works he freely criticized and stigmatized. In 1764 the ex-Jesuits was banished from court, whereupon he retired beyond the Rhine, and died at Bourges December 15th, 1762. After his death appeared his Evangélia Scripturae Christianae Historia (1811); —Passions et Vie, trad. with Réflexions et Notes (Paris, 1788, 5 vols. 12mo). —Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, v. 507.

Berthold, a Calabrian who went to Mount Carmel about the middle of the 11th century and founded the order of Carmelites (q. V.).

Berthold, the apostle of Livonia, died in 1138. After the death of the first missionary and bishop of the Livonian church (1161), who was also that time abbot of the Cistercian convent Loccum, was ordained missionary bishop for the Livonians by Archbishop Hartwig of Bremen and Hamburg. Having arrived at Yxkill on the Duna, he at first tried to win over the Letts by clemency, but was forced to leave the country. He then returned at the head of an army of crusaders from Lower Saxony, and tried to conquer the Letts, and compel them by force of arms to submit to baptism. In a battle in 1196, Berthold was slain; but the crusaders were victorious, and the Letts had for a time to submit; but as soon as the crusaders had left their country they returned to paganism. —Conradus, Christiana, v. 2.

Berthold of Ratibon, also called Berthold the Franciscan, a Franciscan monk, and one of the most powerful preachers that ever spoke in the German tongue. He is supposed to have been born about 1225 in Regensburg, where he died in 1272. His theological education he received chiefly in the Franciscan convent of Ratibon, where a pius and learned mystic, Brother David of Augsburg, was professor of theology and master of the novitiate. It is doubtful whether, as has been asserted by some (Dr. Schmidt, in Studien und Kritiken, see below), he continued his studies in Paris and Italy. His first public appearance, as far as we know, was in the year 1246, when the papal legate, Philippus of Ferrara, charged him, Brother David, and two canons of Ratibon, with the visitation of the convent of Niedermünster. His labors as a travelling preacher began in 1250 (according to others in 1251 or 1252) in Lower Bavaria, and extended to Alsace, Swabia (Baden), Styria, Bohemia, Moravia, Silicia, Thuringia, Franconia, and perhaps Hungary. When he was unacquainted with the language of the country he used an interpreter. Rudelbach, in the Zeita für Luth. Thed. 1859, calls Berthold "the Chrysostom of the Middle Ages." No church was large enough to hold the multitudes that docked to hear him; from a pulpit in the fields he often addressed 60,000 hearers. He fearlessly rebuked sinners of all ranks. He was especially severe against the preachers of indulgences, whom he styled "penny preachers" and "the devil's agents." A volume of his sermons, edited by Kling, was published at Berlin in 1824 (B. des Franciscaner's Predigten). The first complete edition of his sermons was published by F. Pfeifer (Vie der Predigt, 1825). A large number of sermons from medieval into modern German was published by Göbel, with an introduction by Alban Stoiz (2 vols. 8vo). Recently the German jurists have found that the sermons of Berthold are of the greatest importance for the history of the German law. The passages in these sermons which agree with the popular law of Germany, the Schlaubenspiegel, have been considered so obvious that some (as Laband, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Schlaubenspiegels, Berlin, 1861) have regarded Berthold as its author. The best treatise on Berthold is by Schmidt, B. der Franciscaner in Studien und Kritiken (1864, p. 7-82). Berthold of Rohrbach, a layman who preached at Würzburg about 1856 against the bad practices of the clergy. Having been arrested by the Inquisition, he recanted and was released. As Spises, he was condemned and burnt in 1356. His teachings seem to have been of a mystical and extravagant tendency; e. g., that man can reach such a degree of perfection in this life that prayer and fasting are no longer necessary for him. Ithemiuss calls him a St. John of the Lateran (q. v.). W. Mohrmann classes him with the "Brethren of the Free Spirit" (q. v.). See Mohrmann, De epigraphia, p. 323 sq.; Landon, s. v.

Berthold, bishop of Chiemsee, who bore original name was Firstinger, was born in 1465, at Salzburg. He was for some time a canon at St. Gall, and in 1498 was elected bishop of Chiemsee, where he was indefatigable in the reformation of the clergy. He died at Saalfelden, July 15, 1540. He is the author of Teutsche Diakoni, one of the best and most important of the Middle Ages on scientific theology (Latest edition, with notes, a dictionary, and a biography of Berthold, ed. by W. Reithmeier, with a preface by Dr. Fr. Windisham, Munich, 1862). He is probably also, the author of the Opus Exegetica, a description of the corruption of the Church, which was printed at Basle in 1524; last ed. 1620. —Pfifer, Univ. Lex. xiv, 811.

Bertholdt, Leonhard, D.D., a German theologian, was born May 8, 1774, at Emskirchen, in Bavaria. He became in 1805 professor in the philosophical, and in 1806, in consequence of his commentary on Daniel (Erlangen, 2 vols. 8vo, 1806-08), in the theological faculty of the University of Erlangen. He was a prominent author of the Bavarian Academy. His foremost works are an Introduction into the Bible (Hist. und Kritische Einleitung in die sämtlichen kom. und apokryphen Schriften des A. u. N. Testamen- tums, 5 vols. Erlangen, 1812-19, 8vo); Theolog. Wissensch. handb. ed. in the theor. Wissensch., 1821-22 2 vols. 8vo); A Geschichte der Farnanz. (Hermobuch der Dogmengeschichte, Erlangen, 1822-28, 2 vols. 8vo). He died on March 31, 1822. In 1814 Berthold became editor of the Kritische Journal der neuesten deutschen Theologie, of which he published vol. v. to xiv. A collection of his Oecumen Academica was published by his successor Winer (Leipzic, 1824, 8vo). —Herzog, Supplement, i, 155.

Berti, Giovanni Lorenzo, an Augustinian monk, born 1666, in Tuscany. He was called by the Grand-duke of Tuscany to the chair of theology at Pisa, where he died, May 26, 1786. His principal work is a course of Discourses printed at Rome, from 1724 to 1727, under the title "Bibliotheca Institutionum Christianarum" (i.e., the former, on the Byzantine and Oriental travel, 2 vols. 4to.); he repeated the same course, and denounced him to Pope Benedict XIV. He wrote the work, in Opusculum Inscriptum J. J. Langlet, Judicum de operibus Theologiae Belli et Ber- tii, expressato (Lebrgn, 1756). Berti also wrote an Ecclesiastical History (7 vols. 4to.; afterward abridged, Naples, 1748); and a work on the life and writings of Augustine (De Bobo gregis St. Augustini quattuor codices censcripsit, Venice, 1752).—Biographie Universelle, iv. 361.

Bertius, Peter, born in Flanders, November 14, 1565, became regent of the college of the States at Leyden, and professor of philosophy. Having embraced the opinions of Arminius, he drew upon himself the enmity of the Galatians, and was stripped of his teaching post. He left this university and went to France, where, in 1629, he joined the Roman Catholic Church, and was nominated to the professorship of eloquence in the college of Boncourt. He afterward became historiographer to the king, and died October 3, 1629. Among his works are, 1. Notitia Episcopatuum Galli (Paris, 1623, fol.);—2. Theorium Geographicorum veterum (Amst. 1619-19, 2 vols. fol.). See Mosheim, Ch. Hist., iii, 800.

Bertram, monk of Corbie. See Ratramnus.

Bertram, Cornelius Bonaventura, professor of Hebrew at Geneva and Lausanne, was born at Thouars in 1551, and died at Lausanne in 1594. He published a translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew into French, which is in high repute among the French Calvinists. He also published De Republica Hebraeorum (Lugd. Bat., 1641), which is given in the Corp. Sacri, vol. v.—London, Ecl. Dict. ii, 212.

Bérulle, Pierre de, instituted and first superior general of the "congregation of priests of the Oratory" in France, was born in the neighborhood of Troyes, in Champagne, February 4, 1575. After establishing the Carmelites in France, he laid the foundation of the "Congregation of the Oratory," which raised a great storm on the part of the Jesuits. He, however, had the concurrence of the pope and of the king, Louis XIII, and on the 4th of November, 1611, the Oratory [see Oratorians] was established. In 1627 Urban VIII made him cardinal. He died suddenly at the altar, Oct. 2, 1629, without suspicion of having been poisoned by Bichelieu. He left many controversial and devotional works, published at Paris (1644, 1657, 2 vols. fol.). His Life was written by Hubert (Paris, 1746) and Tabaradu (new ed. Paris, 1817, 2 vols.).—Boug. Univ. iv, 379-384; London, ii, 214.

Beryl is the uniform rendering in the Auth. Vers. only of the Heb. גֶּרֶב, Tarshish (so called, according to Geæenius, as being brought from Tarshish), and the Gr. βρύλος, a precious stone, the first in the fourth row on the breastplate of the high-priest (Exod. xxvii, 20; xxxix, 13). The color of the wheels in Ezekiel's vision was as the color of a beryl-stone (Ezek. i, 10, 16; x, 9); it is mentioned among the treasures of the King of Tyre in Ezek. xxviii, 13, where the marginal reading is chrysolite; in Cant. v, 14, as being set in rings of gold; and in Dan. x, 6, the body of the man whom Daniel saw in vision is said to be like the beryl. In Rev. xxi, 19, the beryl is the 8th foundation of the city, the chrysolite being the 7th. In Tobit xiii, 17, is a prophetic prayer that the streets of Jerusalem may be paved with beryl. In Exod. xxvii, 20, the Sept. renders tarshish by "chrysolite," χρυσολίθος; while they render the 11th stone, אֶבְרִים, Akedah, by "beryl," βρύλον. In Ezek. i, 16, they have γατο-στείς, in x, 9, λίθος ἀβαρόστος; and xxviii, 18, ἀβαρος; in Cant. v, 14, and in Dan. x, 6, στέις. This variety of rendering shows the uncertainty under which the old interpreters labored as to the stone actually meant. See Gem. Josephus takes it to have been the chrysolite, a golden-colored gem, the topaz of more recent authors, found in Spain (Plin. xxxvii, 109), whence its name tarshish (see Braun, De l'est. Sacc. Heb. lib. ii, c. 18, § 126). Luther suggests turquois, while others have thought that amber was meant. Kaliisch, in the two passages of Exodus, translates tarschis by chrysole, which he describes as usually green, but with different degrees of shade, generally transparent, but often only translucent—harder than glass, but not so hard as quartz. The passage in Rev. ii, xx, 20 is adverse to this view. Schlesinger (i, 446) says the βρύλας is aqua-marina. "The beryl is a gem of the genus emerald, but less valuable than the emerald. It differs from the precious emerald in not possessing any of the oxide of chrome. The colors of the beryl are grayish-green, bluish-grey, yellow, and white" (Humble, Dict. Gr. p. 80).—Pennsylvania Cyclopaedia, s. v.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Beryllus. See Onyx.

Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, 3d century. Our only definite knowledge of him is derived from a passage in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi, 33), which says that he held that "our Lord did not exist, in the proper sense of existence, before he was among men; neither had he a proper divinity, only that divinity which dwelt in him from the Father." Eusebius goes on to say that Origen, by discussion with Beryllus, brought him back to the faith. There has been much discussion of late as to the real nature of the heresy of Beryllus. See an article of Schliermacher, translated in the Biblical Repository, vi, 14; see also Nander, Ch. Hist. i, 593 sq.; Dorner, Doctrine of the Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 35.

Berytus (Berga), a town of Phoenicia (Dionys. Per. v, 911; Pomp. Mela, i, 12, § 5; Amm. Marc. xiv, 8, § 9; Tacit. Hist. ii, 81; Anton. Itin. and Pict. Top.). which has been (apparently without good foundation) identified with Phyrghes (q. v.) or a place of Scripture (2 Sam. xvi, 8; Ezek. xlvii, 16; comp. 2 Chron. vii, 8). It lay on the sea-shore, about twenty-five miles north of Sidon (comp. Poltern, v, 15; Strabo, xvi, 755; Mannert, V, i, 578 sq.). After its destruction by Tryphon, B.C. 140 (Strabo, xvi, 750), it was reduced by the Romans into a colonized city, and colonized by soldiers of the fifth of the Macedonian legion, and seventh "Augustan," and hence became a Roman colonia (Pliny, v, 17), under the name of Julius Felix (Orelli, Inserv. n, 514; Eckhel, Num. iii, 356; Marquardt, Hamb. d. Rom. Alt. p. 199), and was afterward endowed with the rights of an Italian city (Ulpian, Ed. xxv, i, § 1; Pliny, v, 10). It was at this city that Herod the Great held the pretended trial of his two sons (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 11, 1-6). The elder Agrippa greatly favored the city, and adorned it with a splendid theatre and amphitheatre, besides baths and porticoes, inaugurating them with games and spectacles of every kind, including shows of gladiators (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 7, 5). Here, too, Titus celebrated the birthday of his father Vespasian by the exhibition of similar spectacles, in which many of the school of Greek learning, particularly of law, to which scholars repaired from a distance. Its splendor may in the rock outside the south-western wall. The city lies on a gradual slope, so that the streets have a descent toward the sea; but back of the town the ground toward the south rises, with more rapidity, to a considerable elevation. Here, and indeed all around the city, is a succession of gardens and orchards of fruit and of countless mulberry-trees, sometimes sur-rrounded by hedges of prickly-pear, and giving to the gardens of Beirut an aspect of great fertility and beauty, though the soil is perhaps less rich and the fruits less fine than in the vicinity of Sidon."

Besoseg, Jerome, a French Jansenist theologiaian, was born in Paris in 1866, and became professor of theology at the college Du Fieslès. He was one of the appellants (q. v.) against the bull Unigenitus, and thereby drew upon himself many persecutions from the Jesuit party. He died in Paris January 25, 1763. His writings were very numerous; among them are Histoire de l'abbaye de Port Royal (Cologne, 1756, 8 vols. 12mo), including also lives of Arnaud, Nicole, and other Jansenists; Concordes des épîtres de St. Paul et des Épîtres de S. Pierre (Paris, 1747, 12mo); Précis de la perfection Chrétienne (Paris, 1748, 12mo); Principes de la Pénitence et de la Conversion (Paris, 1762, 12mo).

Besold, Christopher, was born in Tübingen 1577, and educated for the law, but combined theological with legal studies. In 1610 he became professor of law at Tübingen, and lectured with great acceptance. When, after the battle of Nördlingen, 1684, Protestantism in Württemberg seemed likely to be overthrown, he went over to Rome publicly. It is said, however, that he had privately joined the Roman Church four years before. He became professor at Ingolstadt 1637, and died there Sept. 15, 1688, crying,
"Death is a bitter herb,"—Moehl, Ch. Hist. c. xvi, § 2, pt. i., ch. 1; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. ii., 111.

Besom (בּסֶה, mouse, a sweeper), occurs only in the phrase "besom of destruction," i. e. desolating broom, with which Babylonia is threatened (Isa. xiv., ruin (Roberts, Orient. Illustr. in loc.).

Be'sor (Heb. only with the art., hab-Besor, בְּשֵׁז, the cool; Sept. בּשְׁוִי; Josephus, Βήσορος, Ant. vi. 14, 6), a torrent-bed (בּשׁוֹר, "brook") or ravine in the extreme south-west of Judah or Simeon, where two hundred of David's men stood behind, being faint, while the other four hundred pursued the Amalekites, who had burned the town of Zikklag, not far distant (1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21). Sanatus derives its source from the interior Carmel, near Hebron, and states that it enters the sea near Gaza (Liber Secretorum, p. 275). For no other slight, see Reland, Palest. p. 286. It is, without doubt, the same that Richardson crossed on approaching Gaza from the south, and which he calls "Oa dia Gaza" ("Wady Gaza"). The bed was thirty yards wide, and its stream was, early in April, already exhausted, although some stagnant water remained. The upper part of this is called Wady Sheriah, and is doubtless the brook Besore, being the principal one in this vicinity (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 293; Schwartz, Palest. p. 62, 78).

Bessarion, Johannes, patriarch of Constantinople, and cardinal, was born at Trebizond in 1389 (or, according to Bandini, in 1386). He studied under Gemalinus Platho, who was one of the first to introduce the study of Plato in the West. He took the habit of St. Basil, and spent twenty-one years in a monastery in the Peloponnesus, occupied with his literary and theological studies, becoming one of the most eminent scholars of the age. When the emperor John Palaeologus invited him to attend the Council of Ferrara (q. v.), he withdrew Bessarion from his retreat, made him archbishop of Nicaea, and took him to Italy, with Marcus Eugenius, archbishop of Ephesus, and others. At the Council of Ferrara, and also at its adjourned session at Florence, the two most distinguished speakers present were Bessarion and Arius, and the former argued and resolute against any union with Rome on the terms proposed; the latter, at first vacillating, at last declared for the Latinis. He was immediately employed by the pope to corrupt others; and by rewards, persuasions, threats, and promises, eighteen of the Eastern bishops were induced to sign the decree made in the tenth session, declaring that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and the Son; that the Sacrament is validly consecrated in unleavened as well as in leavened bread; that there is a purgatory; and that the Roman pontiff is primate and head of the whole church. The patriarch of Constantinople (who died at the council), Mark of Ephesus, the patriarch of Heraclea, and Athanasius, remained uncorrupted. The Greek deputies returned to Constantinople, and were received there with a burst of indignation. The Greek Church indignantly rejected all that had been done, and in a council at Constantinople, held, according to their own account, a half after the expiration of that at Florence, all the Florentine proceedings were declared null and void, and the synod was condemned. Bessarion was branded as an apostate, and found his native home so uncomfortable that he returned to Italy, where Eugenius IV created him cardinal; Nicolas Vitalis was made archbishop of Siponto and cardinal-bishop of Sabina; and in 1468, Pius II conferred upon him the rank of titular patriarch of Constantinople. He was even thought of as the successor of Nicholas, and would have been elevated to the papal throne but for the intrigues of cardinal Alam. He was again within a month of being elected pope, the death of Pius. He was twice refused the papal seat by the college of cardinals, and died at Ravenna, November 19, 1472, and his body was transported to Rome. His writings are very numerous, and, for the most part, remain unpublished. A catalogue of them is given by Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca, xi. 424. His life was written by Bandini (Rome, 1777, 4to). Among his published writings is a treatise De Sacramentis Eucharistiae given in Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xvi. In this he asserts that the bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ, not through the prayer of the priest, but by virtue of the words, and the invocation of letters. The last authority on the subject of Bessarion may be found in the acts of the Council of Constance by Labbe and Hardouin.—Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, ii. 222; Hook, Eccles. Biography, ii. 946.

Bessarion, Gottfried von, a learned Benedictine, was born Sept. 5, 1672, at Buchheim, Mayence. In 1692 he entered the Benedictine convent of Gottweich, near Vienna, where he died, Jan. 20, 1748. Being called to the court of Lothar Franz, he was employed for diplomatic missions to Vienna, Rome, and Wolfenbuttel. He prevailed in 1710 upon the old and vain Duke Anton Ulrich, of Brunswick, to go over to the Church of Rome, the latter having previously urged his granddaughter Elizabeth to take the same step in order to become the wife of the Emperor Charles VI. On this occasion Bessarion compiled the work Quisquisgenti Romanaecatholicum sedem omnibus aliis praeferti motu; also, in German, Fürstfug Bedenken, etc. (Mayence, 1708). The work purports to be written by a former Protestant, and has, therefore, been wrongly ascribed—for instance, by Augustin Theurer—to Duke Anton Ulrich himself. He also began the publication of the Chronicon Codicesian, a work of great importance for the early church history of Austria; but he finished only the 1st vol. of it (Tegernsee, 1792, fol.).—Herzog, Real-Encyklop., ii. 114.

Bessin, Guillaume, a French Romanist theologian, was born at Glos-la-Ferté, in the diocese of Evreux, France. He died in 1674 he was called to the order of Benedictines, and afterward taught philosophy and theology in the abbey of Bec, Séez, and Fécamp. He was also made synodal of the monasteries of Normandy. He died at Rouen, October 18, 1736. He wrote Réflexions sur le nouveau système du R. P. Lamart, who maintained that our Lord did not celebrate the Jewish Passover on the night of his death. "He is, however, chiefly known by the Concilia Romanae provincie, 1717, fol. It was first printed in 1677, and was work of Dom Pommery. Dom Julien Bellaise undertook a new edition, which he greatly enlarged, but died before its completion, and Bessin finished it, added-to it, and published it under the title of his death."

He was one of the editors of the works of Gregory the Great (1705, 4 vols. fol.).—Landon, Ecclesiastical Dictionary, ii. 224; Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, v. 419.

Besson, Joseph, a French Jesuit missionary, was born at Carpentras in 1607, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1623. He became professor of philosophy, and rector of the college at Nièmes; but finally offered himself as a missionary, and was sent to Syria, where he spent many years. He died at Aleppo, March 17, 1651, leaving La Syrie Sainte, ou des Missions des Perses de la Compagnie de Jésus en Syrie (Paris, 1660, 8vo).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, v. 821.

Best, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, born in Ireland, who emigrated to America at the age of 22, and joined the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1801. He filled various appointments, with honor to himself and profit to his people, until in the spring of 1835 he took a supernumerary relation. He was a man of strong mind, sound judgment, and unfinishing firmness, and, as a preacher, a power. He died in Dec., 1841, in the 41st year of his ministry and 67th of his age.—Minutes of Conferences, iii. 250.

Bêteau, an old English word, signifying to place in certain circumstances good or ill, and used once in the Auth. Vers. ("hardly bestead, Isa. viii. 21) for the Heb. קִשַׁא, kishkah, to oppress."

Bata, a city belonging to Hadadezer, king of Zobah, mentioned with Berothai as having yielded much spoil of brass to David (2 Sam. viii. 8). In the parallel account (1 Chron. viii. 3) the name is personified. The invasion of letters, Bimmáh (q. v.). BETANE Bet'âne (Be'tân, v. r. Bar'ân; l. e. prob. Barârâ'-n, Vulg. omitted), a place apparently south of Jerusalem (Judith i, 9), and, according to Ralond (Palest. p. 625), identical with the Ain (q. v. of Josh. xxii, 16, and the Beth-anin (Be'tânîn) of Eusebius (Onom. Apû. Apâ), that of the oldest (Augustine and Bede) and that of the latest (Mena). The name also occurs in the neighboring Beth-barâh, but Bethany (Bethânia), a reading which Origin states (Opp. ii, 130, ed. Huet) to have obtained in almost all the copies of his time (συγκεκαλυμμένος τοῦ αὐτοῦ χάριτος), though altered by him in his edition of the Gospel on topographical grounds (see Kuinöl, in loc.). In favor of the former (a) the place has the peculiarity of having a name similar to Bethany being changed by copyists into one so unfamiliar as Bethabara, where the reverse—change from an unfamiliar to a familiar name—is of frequent occurrence. (b) The fact that Origen, while admitting that the majority of MSS. were in favor of Bethany, decided, notwithstanding, for Bethabara. (c) That Bethabara was still known in the days of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon, Be'saânaqâ, Bethabara, which is expressly stated to have been the scene of John’s baptism), and greatly resorted to by persons desirous of baptism. Still the fact remains that the most ancient MSS. have the name Bethan'y, and that the form has been accordingly altered in the text by Lachmann, Tischendorf, and other modern editors. The locality must, therefore, be sought by this name on the east shore of the Jordan. —Smith, s. v. Bethany.

Beth-anab (q. d. בֵּית אֱ-נָב, house of fog) is probably the correct name of a village mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon, Bâwîsâ, Anab), under the form Mîtnâwâs or Bethanâbâ, as being close to the Pharanites miles east of Diospolis (?), while Bethene (בֵּית אֵנָא) speaks of still another name, Bethanâna, as belonging to a village eight miles in the same direction. Van de Velde (Memour, p. 293) ingeniously reconciles these statements by assigning the first locality as that of the modern Anabath, and the second as Beire-Naba, which is respectively at the required distances south-east of Ludd. Comp. Anab.

Beth-anath (Heb. Be'tânâth, בֵּית-אַנָת, house of response; Sept. Be'sânaqâ v. v. Bâsânâqâ and Bašôaâqâ), one of the “fenced cities” of Naphath, named with Bethemesh (Josh. xix, 88); from neither of which were the Canaanites expelled, although made tributaries (Judg. i, 88). It is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon s. v. Bâbâqâ, Bethnath), who, however, elsewhere (s. v. Bâsânâqâ, Bethanâ) speak of a village between Maarrath and Beit-Ennon (which are respectively on the high and low ridges of high and low Mesopotamia, 2 Sam. xxvii, 8, 9), called Bethanâ, in which Bethany, Bethanesth, Bùsânâ, Bhtanâ, fifteen miles eastward of Caesarea (Diocesara or Sepharea), and reputed to contain medicinal springs. It is perhaps the present village Amidah, north of Bint-Jebel (Van de Velde, Memour, p. 235). Schwarz (Palest. p. 184) confounds it with the site of Beten.

of in the fourth century, in the Itinerary of the Bourdeaux Pilgrim, and the Onomastica of Eusebius and Jerome, and they continue to exist, with a variety of buildings and of ecclesiastical establishments in connection therewith, down to the sixteenth century, since which the place has fallen gradually into its present decay (Robinson, Researches, ii, 102, 105).

By Mandeville and other medieval travellers the place is spoken of as the ‘Castle of Beth any, which had its origin in castellum being employed in the Vulgate as the translation of kasty in John xi, 1. —Smith, s. v. See JERUSALEM.

Beth-ar’abah (Heb. Beth ha-Araba), Beth ha-’Arabah, house of the desert; Sept. *Bĕth softly v. r. 'Arabathâ and 'Arabathâ in Jos. xviii, 22, Bāʾṣaphâ v. r. Bāṣaphâ), one of the six cities of Judah which were situated in the Arabah, 1. e. the sunk valley of the Jordan and Dead Sea (‘wilderness’), Jos. xxxvi, 19, on the north border of the tribe, and apparently between Beth-hoglah and the high land on the west of the Jordan valley (xv, 6). It was afterward included in the list of the towns of Benjamin (xviii, 21). It is elsewhere (Jos. xviii, 18) called simply Arabah (q. v.). It seems to be extinct in the ruins called Ar-Megh or a little south-west of the site of Beth-hoglah (q. v.).

Beth-’aram (Heb. Beth haram), [Image -6x1 to 428x689] house of the height [for the syllable hara is prob. merely the def. art.,] q. d. mountain-house; Sept. Bĕth softly v. r. Bāṣaphâ v. r. Bāṣaphâ and Bāṣaphâ), one of the towns (‘fenced cities’) of Gad on the east of Jordan, described as in “the valley” (q. v.), not to be confounded with the Arabah or Jordan valley), Josh. xiii, 27, and no doubt the same place as that named Beth-a’ram in Num. xxxii, 36. Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) refers that in his compilation (‘the Syriac’) was Bethamatha (Βηθαμαθα) [prob. for the Chaldaic form Bethamath] (Jerome, Betharam), and that it was also named Livias (Alestich, Libias; Jerome adds, “by Herod, in honor of Augustus”). Josephus’s account (Ant. xviii, 2) is that Herod (Antipas), in taking possession of his tetrarchy, fortified Sepphoris and the city (σταθμός) of Bethamathia (Βηθαμαθαία), building a wall round it, and calling it Betharnath and Bethamath (Ταμαθί; different from the Julias of Gallonitis, War, ii, 9, 1), in honor of the wife of the emperor. As this could hardly be later than B. C. 1, Herod the Great, the predecessor of Antipas, having died in B. C. 4, and as the Empress Livias did not receive her name of this city (which was likewise that of the month of August), it is probable that Josephus is in error as to the new name given to the place, and speaks of it as having originally received that which it bore in his own day (see Ant. xx, 4, 4; War, ii, 13, 3). It is curious that he names Livias (Alestich) long before (Ant. xiv, 4, 4) in such connection as to leave no doubt as to the allusion to the same place. Under the name of Amathia (Βηθαμαθα) (q. v.) he again mentions it (Ant. xvii, 10, 6; comp. War, ii, 4, 2) and the destruction of the royal palaces there by insurgents from Persea. At a later date it was an episcopal city (Reland, Palest. p. 874). For Talmudical notices, see Schwartz, Pilgr. p. 251. Proboscis gives the locality of Livias (Alestich) to the west of Bethamathia, 67° 7' lat. (7° 67' long. (Ritter, *Edutk. xiv, 573); and Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Βηθαμαθα) (Betharnatham) state that it was five miles south of Bethabara or Bethamath (i. e. Beth-nimrah); see Josephus, War, iv, 4 and 7.

This agrees with the position of the Wady Seir (Seer) in the map, which is the Chor opposite the return from Beth-hoglah and Saba, the character of the descent of these remains is at present no information to guide us. Schwartz maintains el-Asaryeh to be Azal, and would fix Bethany at a spot which he says, the Arabs call Beth-hanan, on the Mount of Offence above Siloam (p. 263, 130). These traditional spots are first

BETH-ARABEL

BETH-ARABEL (Heb. Beth Arbel, בֵּית אַרְבֶּל, house of God's court or courts), a place only alluded to by the prophet Hosea (x, 14) as the scene of some great military exploit known in his day, but not recorded in Scripture: "All thy [Israel's] fortresses shall be spoiled, as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel (Sept. ὡς ἀρχαὶ Ζαλμοὰν ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου Ἰσραήλ [v. r. Ἰσραὴλ and Ἀβαβά]) in the day of battle." In the Vulgate, Jerome (following the Sept.) has translated the name "e domo ejus qui judicavit Baal," i.e. Jerubbaal, understanding Samuel as Zalmanah, and the whole passage as a reference to Gideon's victory (Judg. viii); but this is fanciful. Most modern commentators follow the Jewish interpreters (see Hengstenberg, in loc.) in understanding the name as belonging to Shalman (q. v.), or Shalmanezer, as having gained a battle at Beth-arbel against Hoshea, king of Israel. As to the locality of this massacre, some refer it to the Arbelas of Assyria (Strabo xvi, 1, 5), the scene of Alexander's famous victory; but there is no evidence of any such occurrences as here alluded to in that place. It is conjectured by Hitzig (in loc.) to be the place called Arbel (אָרֶב) by Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon (s. v.), where it is placed near Pella, east of Jordan; but as it is spoken of in Hosea as a strong fortress, the probability is rather that the noted locality in N.W. Palestine, called Arbelas (v. אַרְבָּלָה) by Josephus, the Apocrypha, in which there was a village in Galilee, near which were certain fortified caves. They are first mentioned in connection with the march of Bacchides into Judaea, at which time they were occupied by many fugitives, and the Syrian general encamped there long enough to subdue them (Josephus, xii, 11, 1; 1 Mac. ix, 2). At a later period these caves formed the retreats of bands of robbers, who greatly distressed the inhabitants throughout that quarter. Josephus gives a graphic account of the means taken by Herod to extirpate them. The caves were situated in the midst of precipitous cliffs, overhanging a deep valley, with only a steep and narrow path leading to the entrance; the attack was therefore exceedingly difficult. Parties of soldiers, being at length let down in large boxes, suspended by chains from above, attacked those who defended the entrance with fire and sword, or dragged them out with long hooks and dashed them down the precipice. In this way they were taken at length during the years 15, 16, 5; War, i, 16, 2-4). These same caves were afterward fortified by Josephus himself against the Romans during his command in Galilee. In one place he speaks of the caves of the Arbelas, and in another as the caves near the Lake of Gennesaret (II, 27; War, ii, 20, 6). According to the Tal- mud, Arbelas lay between Sepphoris and Tiberias (Lightfoot, Chorog. Cent. c. 85). These indications leave little doubt that Arbelas of the present, with its fortified caves, may be identified with the present Kolut ion Maan and the adjacent ruins now known as Irbid (perhaps a corruption of Arbelas, the present form of the name). The latter is the site of the ancient Pococce (ii, 58) supposed to be that of Bethsaida, and where he found columns and the ruins of a large church, with a sculptured doorcase of white marble. The best description of the neighboring caves is that of Burckhardt (p. 251), who calculates that they might afford refuge to about 600 men.—Kiiio, s. v. See Arkelas.

BETH-AVEN (Heb. Beth Aven, בֵּית אַמָּן); house of nothingness, i. e. wickedness, idolatry; Sept. usually by a name of the same form as that of Benjamin, east of Bethel (Josh. vii, 2, Sept. Bażibâ), xviii), and lying between that place and Michmash (1 Sam. xiii, 5; Sept. Bażibâw v. r. Bażibâwov; also xiv, 23, Sept. niv.Bażibb). In Josh. xvii, 12, the "wilderness" (מִדָּר = pastureland) of Beth-aven is mentioned. In Hosea iv, 15; v, 6; x, 6, the name is transferred, with a play on the word very characteristic of this prophet, to the neighboring Bethel—once the "house of God," but then the house of idols, of "naught." The Talmudists accordingly everywhere confound Beth-aven with Bethel (comp. Schwartz, Palæst., p. 89), the proximity of which may have occasioned the employment of the term as a nickname, after Bethel became the national symbol of the golden calves. See Bethel. The name Beth-aven, however, was properly that of a locality distinct from Bethel (Josh. vii, 2, etc.), and appears to have been applied to a village located on the rocky eminence Burz Betin, twenty minutes south-east of Beitin (Bethel), and twenty minutes west of Tell el-Hajar (Ali) (Van de Velde, Memoire, P. 294).

BETH-AMMATH (Heb. Beth-āmāth, בֵּית אָמָת; house of Amanath; Sept. Baṣimōw v. r. Baṣimāth; Vulg. oppidum Baalnana, a village in the possession of Reuben, on the Mischor (םִכְשָר) or downs (Auth. Vett. 4 plain)) east of Jordan (Josh. xiii, 17). At the Israelites' first approach its name was Baal-meon (Num. xxxii, 38, or in its contracted form Beon, xxxii, 3), to which the Beth was possibly a Hebrew prefix. Later it would seem to have come into possession of Nasa, and to be known either as Beth-meon (Jer. xlvi, 29) or Baal-meon (Ezek. xxv, 9). It is possible that the name contains a trace of the tribe or nation of Meon—the Moanites or Meumim. See MOAN; MEUMIM. The name is still attached to a ruined place of considerable size a short distance to the south-west of Heshbon, and bears the name of "the fortress of Miṭim according to Burckhardt (p. 865), or Main according to Seetzen (Reisen, i, 405), which appears to give its appellation to Wady Zerka Main (ib. p. 402).—Smith. See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-BASARAH (Heb. Beth Bara'ah, בֵּית בֶּזָּרָה, prob. for בֵּית בֶּזַּרְעָה, Beth-Abarah, i. e. house of crossing, q. d. ford; Sept. Baṣarātha v. r. Baṣarāth), a place named in Judg. vii, 24 as a point apparently south of the scene of Gideon's victory (which took place at about Bethshan), and of which the name "Bara'ah (בְּזָרָה)" was taken by the Ephraimites against Midian, i. e. the latter were intercepted from crossing the Jordan. Others have thought that these "waters" were the wadys which descend from the highlands of Ephraim, presuming that they were different from the Jordan, to which river no word but its own distinct name is supposed to be applied. But there can hardly have been any other stream of sufficient magnitude in this vicinity to have needed guarding, or have been capable of it, or, indeed, to which the name "fordingplace" could be at all applicable. Beth-barah seems to have been the locality still existing by that name in the time of Origen, which he assigned as the scene of John's baptism (John ii, 28), since, as being a crossing rather than a ford, the word seemed more applicable to both sides of the river. See BETH-ABARA. The pursuit of the Midianites may readily have reached about so far south as the modern upper or Latin pilgrims' bathing-place on the Jordan. The fugitives could certainly not have been arrested any nearer to the Jordan, where so many of the little crossings of Benjamin, east of Bethel (Josh. vii, 2, Sept. Bahibib), xvi, 12, and lying between that place and Michmash (1 Sam. xiii, 5; Sept. Bahibib w. r. Bahibibov; also xiv, 23, Sept. niv. Bahibb). In Josh. xvii, 12, the "wilderness" (מִדָּר = pastureland) of Beth-aven is mentioned. In Hosea iv, 15; v, 6; x, 6, the name is transferred, with a play on the word very characterisfore have been that by which Jacob crossed on his return from Mesopotamia, near the Jabbok, below Succoth (Gen. xxxii, 22; xxxviii, 17), and at which Jehoshaphat saw the Ephraimites as they attempted to pass over Jordan Giladeh (Jugl. xii, 6). This can hardly have been the other than that very torrent opposite Kurn Surtaleh, being indeed the lowest easy crossing-place. The water is here only knee-deep, while remains of an ancient bridge and of a Roman road, with other ruins, attest that this was formerly a great thoroughfare and place of transit (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 124). See Beth-shean.

Beth-shean (Beit-shean), a town which, from the extent of its decays (אָדָהּ שֵׁנָּא), must have been originally fortified, lying in the desert (יד יַרְדֵּן), and in which Jonathan and Simon Maccabbeus took refuge from Bacchides (1 Macc. ix, 62, 64). Josephus (Ant. xiii, 1, 5) has Bethalgae, בֵּיתַלַגַא (Beit-hogla), but a reading of the passage quoted by Ralean (Palest. p. 682) presents the more probable form of Beth-shean. Either alternative fixes the situation as in the Jordan valley not far from Jericho. —See Kiesz.

Beth-bir'i-e (Heb. Bith Birin), בֵּית בִּירִין, house of my creation or citzen; Sept. Βεθβηρίας v. r. Βεθ βηρίας [by inclusion of the next name], Vulg. Betherri; a town in the extreme south of Sameon, inhabited by the descendants of Shimei (1 Chr. iv, 31); by a parallel list in Josh. xix, 6, it appears to have had also the name of Beth-Ederon (q. v.), or Beeroth simply (Josh. xv, 32). —See Beth-zur.

Beth-car (Heb. Bith Kar), בֵּית קָר, i. e. pasture; Sept. Βασαύορ v. r. Bechaip, a place named as the point to which the Israelites pursued the Philistines from Mizpeh on a memorable occasion (1 Sam. vii, 11), and therefore west of Mizpeh; apparently a Philistine guard-house or garrison. From the unusual expression "under (הִבַּד) Beth-car," it would seem that the place itself was on a height, with the road at its foot. Josephus (Ant. vi, 2, 2) has "as far as Cambra" (אֲלֵי קָרַב), and goes on to say (in accordance with the above text) that the stone Ebenezer was set up at this place to mark it as the spot to which the victory had extended. —See Eben-ezer; Cambra.

Beth-da'gon (Heb. Bith Dogon), בֵּית דֹּגוֹן, house [i.e. temple of] Dogon, the name of at least two cities, one or the other of which may be the place called by this name in the Apocalypse (Beit Dogon, 1 Macc. x, 63; comp. Josephus, Ant. xiii, 4, 4), unless this be simply Dogon's temple at Askhad (1 Sam. v, 2; 1 Chron. x, 10). The corresponding modern name Beth-Dejim is of frequent occurrence in Palestine; in addition to those noticed below, one was found by Robinson in Researches, iii, 102) east of Nablous. There can be no doubt that in the occurrence of these names we have indications of the worship of the Philistine god having spread far beyond the Philistine territory. Possibly there were a number of towns founded at the time when this warlike people had overrun the country to "Michmash, eastward of Bethaven" on the south, and Gilboa on the north—that is, to the very edge of the heights which overlook the Jordan valley—driving "the Hebrews over Jordan into the land of Gad and Giladeh" (1 Sam. xiii, 17-18; comp. 17, 18; xxxix, 1; xxxix, 1). —See Beth-horon (house of). 4. (Sept. Βασαύορ v. r. Bechaip.) A city in the low country (Shfehlah) of Judah (Josh. xxv, 41), where it is named between Gederoth and Naaman; and therefore not far from the Philistine territory, with which its name implies a connection. From the absence of the copulative conjunction before this name, it has been suggested that it should be taken with the preceding, "Gederoth-Beth-dagon;" in that case, probably, distinguishing Gederoth from the two places of similar name in the neighborhood. But this would leave the enumeration "sixteen cities" in ver. 41 deficient; and the conjunction is similarly omitted frequently in the same list (e. g. between ver. 38 and 39, etc.). The indications of site and name correspond quite well to those of two others marked on Van de Velde's Map about 3½ miles S.E. of Ashkelon.

2. (Sept. Βασαύορ v. r. Bechaip.) A city near the S.E. border of the tribe of Asher, between the mouth of the Shihor-libnath and Zebulon (Josh. xix, 27); a position which agrees with that of the modern ruined village Bethel, marked on Van de Velde's Map about 3½ miles S.E. of Atlit. —See Tzas. The name and the proximity to the coast point to its being a Philistine colony. Schwartz's attempt at a location (Palest. p. 192) is utterly destitute of foundation.

3. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Betlava, Betladao, Betladao, and Betlada, speak of a "large village" by this name (Παραβάρης, Κυπαρίσσιον) as extant in their day between Diospolis (Lydda) and Jamnia; without doubt the present Betlada (Robinson, Researches, iii, 30; Toliier, Topos, ii, 405; yet Schwartz says [Palest. p. 104], "not a vestige can be found!").

Beth-diblathia'im (Heb. Bith Diblathia im, בֵּית דִּבְלַתְיָאִים, house of Diblathaim; Sept. Βεθ διβλαθαίμ [v. r. Βαιτ διβλαθαίμ], a city of Moab upon which the prophet denounces destruction (Jer. xlvi, 22). It is called Almon-Diblathaim in Num. xxxiii, 46. It is the place of Diblathaim of Ezek. vii, 14. See Diblhathaim; Ribilah.

Beth-de'en (Heb. Bith Edan, בֵּית אָדָן, house of pleasantness; Sept. confusedly translates Αἰδάνος Ναάριας; Vulg. domus voluptatis), apparently a city of Syria, situated on Mount Lebanon, the seat of a native king, threatened with destruction by the prophet (Amos i, 5, where the Auth. Vers. renders it "house of Eden"); probably the name of a country residence of the kings of Damascus. Michaelis (Sulp. of Leg. Heb. s. v.), following Loaroque's description, and misled by an apparent resemblance in name, identified it with Edem, about a day's journey from Baalbek, on the eastern slope of the Libanus, and near the old cedars of Baalshar. Baur (Amos p. 224), in accordance with the Mohammedan tradition that one of the four pillars of the temple was in the valley between the ranges of the Libanus and Anti-Libanus, is inclined to favor the same hypothesis. But Grotius, with greater appreciation of probability, pointed to the Paradise (Παραδίσου, park) of Peolmy (v. 15) as the locality of Eden. The village Ash-sil Kadiimak, a site near Bijbeharr, about 13 miles south of Diblathaim, near the Orontes, but now a paradise no longer, is supposed by Dr. Robinson (Later Researches, p. 566) to mark the site of the ancient Paradise; and his suggestion is approved by Mr. Porter (Habana, p. 377), but doubted by Ritter (Erdv. xvii, 997-999).

Again, it has been conjectured that Beth-Eden is no other than Beth-Jerm, "the house of Paradise," not far to the south-west of Damascus, on the eastern slope of the Hormon, and a short distance from Medjel. It stands on a branch of the ancient Pharpar, near its source (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Alt., ii, 291; Hiizig, Amos, in loc.; Porter, Damascus, i, 311).

Beth-e'ked (Heb. Bith E-ed, בֵּית אֶדֶּק, house of the binding, sc. of sheep; Sept. Basaxev; Vulg. cameris; Targum נְעָרָה, נְעָרָה, place of shepherd's gathering), the name of a place near Samaria, being the "shearing-house" at the pit or well (מַקָּה) of which the forty-two brethren of Abahiah were slain by Jehu (II Kings ii, 12, 14, in the form which occurs it is fully Beth-E'ked-Haro'm, having the addition דְּבַדְוָה, דְּבַד, of the shepherd, Sept. רַבֵּה יָשָׁה, for which no equivalent appears in the Auth. Vers.). It lay between Jezreel and Samaria, according to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Bethsach, Bethchadad), 15 miles from the town of Legio, and in the plain of Esdraelon. It is doubtless the Beit-Kad noticed by Robinson (Researches, iii, 157) on the edge of the "great plain," east of Jenin, and located on Van de Velde's Map. About 8 miles south from Hebron, 15 miles west of Beisan, at the exact distance (in Roman miles) from Lejnin indicated in the Onomasticon.

Bethel (Heb. Bethel, בֵּיתֶל, house of God [see below]; Sept. usually Bašttha; Josephus [τὸν] Baštthana, the name of one or two towns.

1. A city of central Palestine, memorable as a holy site from early times. Many have inferred (from Judg. i, 28, 26; Josh. xviii, 18) that it was the same place originally called Luz (עָלָע), but from other passages it appears that they were different, although contiguous (see below). Of the origin of the name Bethel there are two accounts extant: 1. It was bestowed on the spot by Jacob under the awe inspired by the nocturnal vision of God when on his journey from his father's house at Beersheba to seek his wife in Haran (Gen. xxviii, 19). He took the stone which had served for his pillow and put (גָּלְתֶּה) it for a pillar, and anointed it with oil; and he called the name of that place (סֵאָר לֹּעֵז בֵּיתֶל), but the name of "the city of God" at Luz (עַלְשָׁה) was translated Luz. The expression in the last paragraph of this account is curious, and indicates a distinction between the early Canaanite "city" Luz and the "place," as yet a mere undistinguished spot, marked only by the "stone" or the heap (יוֹסֶף הִלְדָּה עֶמְפוּרִים) erected by Jacob to commemorate his vision. 2. But, according to the other account, Bethel received its name on the occasion of a blessing bestowed by God upon Jacob after his return from Padan-aram, at which time also (according to this narrative) the name of Israel was given him. Here again Jacob erects (גָּלְתֶּה) a "pillar of stone," which, as before, he anoints with oil (Gen. xxxv, 14, 15). The key of this story would seem to be the fact of God's "speaking" with Jacob. God went up from him in the place where He 'spake with him';—"Jacob set up a pillar in the place where He 'spake with him,'" and "called the name of the place where God spake with him Bethel." Although these two narratives evidently represent distinct events, yet, as would appear to be the case in other instances in the lives of the patriarchs, the latter is but a developed and orthodoxized version of the original tradition. It exhibits as a phenomenon of importance close on their own frontier. Jeroboam made it the southern seat (Dan being the northern) of the worship of the golden calves; and it seems to have been the chief seat of that worship (1 Kings xii, 28-33; xiii, 1). The choice of Bethel was probably determined by the consideration that the spot was already sacred in the estimation of the Israelites, not only from patriarchal consecration, but from the more recent presence of the ark; which might seem to point it out as a proper seat for an establishment designed to rival that of Jerusalem. This appropriation, however, completely altered by descendants of the original tribe as a place of importance close on their own frontier. Jeroboam, at which place Samuel held in rotation his court of justice (1 Sam. xii, 7). After the separation of the kingdoms Bethel was included in that of Israel, which seems to show that although originally, in the formal distribution, assigned to Benjamin, it had been actually possessed by Ephraim in right of conquest from the Canaanites, a fact that may have been held by that somewhat unscrupulous tribe as a claim of right extended over its original territory. The town was taken by Abijah, king of Judah (2 Chron. xiii, 19); but it again reverted to Israel (1 Kings xiv, 20). It was taken by Baasha (2 Chron. xvi, 1). It then remains unmentioned for a long period. The worship of Baal, introduced by the Phœnician queen of Ahab (1 Kings xvi, 31), had probably alienated public favor from the simple creences of Jeroboam to more gorgeous shrines (2 Kings xii, 2). The temple of Jeroboam was built till the ascension of the Lord to Solomon. See Moab. The actual stone of Bethel itself is the subject of a Jewish tradition, according to which it was removed to the second Temple, and served as the pedestal for the ark, where it survived the destruction of the Temple by the Romans, and was restored to the Jews in their lamentations (Rav. Palest. p. 680). At a still earlier date the ark was brought to Mount Moriah, 10 miles west of Hebron, at the exact distance (in Roman miles) from Lejnin indicated in the Onomasticon."

of the kingdom. It was during this period that Elijah visited Bethel, and that we hear of "sons of the prophets" as resident there (2 Kings ii, 2, 5), two facts apparently incompatible with the calves, and Bethel comes once more into view (2 Kings x, 29). Under the descendants of this king the place and the worship must have greatly flourished, for by the time of Jeroboam II, the great-grandson of Jehu, the rude village was again a royal residence with a "king's house" (Amos vii, 14). Amos both the "great houses" and the "houses of ivory" (iii, 15), and a very high degree of luxury in dress, furniture, and living (iv, 6-9). The one original altar was now accompanied by several others (iii, 14; ii, 8); and the same "incense" of its founder had developed into the "burnt-offerings" and "meat-offerings" of "solemne assemblies", hall the ingrants "peace-offerings" of "fat beasts" (v, 21, 22).

Bethel was the scene of the paradoxical tragedy of the prophet from Judah, who denounced the divine vengeance against Jeroboam's altar, and was afterward slain by a lion for disobeying the Lord's injunction. By the false prophecy of another prophet residing there, by whom his remains were interred, and thus both were eventually preserved from profanation (1 Kings xiii; 2 Kings xxi, 16-18).

Josephus gives the name of the prophet from Judah as Jeda, and adds an extended account of the character of the old Bethelite prophet -(Ant., viii, 9), which he paints in the darkest hues (see Kito's Daily Bible Illust.; Patrick's and Clarke's Comment., in loc.) The lion probably issued from the grove adjoining Bethel (comp. 2 Kings ii, 28, 24). (See Kell, Com. on Jos. p. 180-182; Steielitz, De prophetia a leone nascito, Hal. 1783).

After the desolation of the northern kingdom by the King of Assyria, Bethel still remained an abode of priests, who taught the wretched colonists "how to fear Jehovah," "the God of the land" (2 Kings xvii, 28, 29). The buildings remained till all traces of this illegal worship were extirpated by Josiah, king of Judah, who thus fulfilled a prophecy made to Jeroboam 350 years before (1 Kings xii, 30, 31). The place was still in existence after the captivity, and was in the possession of the Benjamites (Ezra ii, 28; Neh. vii, 82), who returned to their native place while continuing their relations with Nehemiah and the restored worship (Neh. xi, 31). In the time of the Maccabees Bethel was fortified by Baccidies for the King of Syria (Joseph. Antig. xiii, 1, 13). It is not named in the New Testament, but it still existed and was taken by Vespasian (Josephus, War, iv, 9, 9).

Bethel is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon (s. v. Besith), as 12 miles from Jerusalem, on the right hand of the road to Sichem.

Bethel and its name were believed to have perished until within these few years; yet it has been ascertained by the Protestant missionaries at Jerusalem that the name and a knowledge of the site still existed among the people of the land. The name was indeed preserved in the form of Beith—"he Arabic termina-in for the Hebrew of being not unusual change. Its identity with Bethel had been recognised by the Oriental Christian priests, who endeavored to bring into use the Arabic form Beith, as being nearer to the original; but it had not found currency beyond the circle of their influence. The situation of Beith corresponded with that of the Arabic above afforded by Eusebius and others, the distance from Jerusalem being 33 hours. The ruins cover a space of "three or four acres," and consist of "very many foundations and half-standing walls of houses and other buildings."

"They lie upon the front of a low hill, between the heads of two hollow wadys, which unite and run off into the main valley es-Suwemi" (Robinson, Researches, ii, 122, 123). In his other travels since his visit, have remarked on the "stony" nature of the soil at Bethel as perfectly in keeping with the narrative of Jacob's slumber there. When on the spot little doubt can be felt as to the localities of this interesting place. The round mount S.E. of Bethel must be the "mountain" on which Abram built the altar, and on which he and Lot stood when they made their division of the land (Gen. xii, 7; xiii, 10). It is still thickly strewed to its top with stones formed by nature for the building of an "altar" or sanctuary. (See Stanley, Sinai and Palest. p. 217-223).

The spot is shut in by higher land on every side. The ruins are more considerable than those of a "large village," as the place was in the time of Jerome; and it is therefore likely that, although unnoticed in history, it afterward revived and was enlarged. The ruined churches upon the site and beyond the valley evince that it was a place of importance even down to the Middle Ages. Besides these, there were standing walls of houses and other buildings: on the highest part are the ruins of a square tower, and in the western valley are the remains of one of the largest reservoirs in the country, being 914 feet in length by 217 in breadth. The bottom is now a green grass-plain, having in the midst a large spring of water. (See Hackett's Illustra, of Script. p. 171-175).

Professor Robinson (Biblioth. Sac. 1843, p. 456 sq.) thinks that Bethel may be identical with the Betha, not far from Jerusalem, where the revolt under Barcocheba (q. v.) in the time of Adrian, was finally extinguished (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv, 6); the Betharsas, which lay 18 Roman miles from Cesarea toward Lydda (Ant. p. 150), and differently named and located by other ancient notices. This place, he shows, is once called Bethel (Jerome, Comment. in Zach. iii, 13); and Bethel is once called Bethar (Bourdeaux Pilgrimage, Ann. Hieros. p. 566). See Bethem.

2. A town in the south part of Judah (1 Sam. xxx, 27, where the collection of the name is decisive against its being the well-known Bethel; many copies of the Sept. read Badesoep, i. e. Bethurz). Perhaps the same city is denoted in Josh. xii, 16; but comp. ch. vii, 17.

By comparison of the lists of the towns of Judah and Simeon (Josh. xv, 80; xix, 4; 1 Chron. v, 29, 30), the place is found to have borne also the names of Cenw, Bethel (q. v.), and Bethuel.

Beth'el'site (Heb. Betha ha-Ein, בֵּיתא הַאֵין, Sept. Badesoeph, a designation of a Hiil, who rebuilt Jeri-Bethe'e'mek (Heb. Betha ha-E'mek, בֵּיתא הַאֵּמֶק, house of the valley; Sept. Badesoeph v. r. Badesoep), a city of the tribe of Asher, apparently near its S.E. border (Josh. xix, 27). Dr. Robinson found a village called Amoeh about eight miles N.E. of Akka (Burkitt, 1826, p. 211, 212), which is probably the place in question, although he suggests that the above text seems to require a position south of the "valley of Jiphthah-el" or Jefst (Latter Bib. Researches, p. 103, 106). The identification proposed by Schwarz (Pictor, p. 192) with the modern Amudah (according to him also no-

Beth'er (Heb. id. "בֵּיתא"). the name of certain "mountains" mentioned only in Cani. ii, 17. The name is rendered "mountain" in the word translated "the mountains of Brass" (Gen. vi, 10; Jer. xxxiv, 18, 19, "pieces"); the mountains of Bethar may therefore be "mountains of disposition, of separation," that is, mountains cut up, divided by ravines, etc.

The Sept. gives όνοματαν, mountains of Betha.
In this sense. They may be the same with those rendered "mountains of spices" in viii, 14, from the growth of trees from which odorous gums distilled. See Brinton. If it be the name of a place, it may possibly be identical with the Bather which was the Impostor Barcocheba (q. v.), was at last overcome by Hadrian (see the Zechariah David, cited by Eisenmenger, Entdeck. Judenth. ii, 656), a strongly fortified city (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 371, where the Heb. form is given בְּקָהָר, Beker, Chald. בֶּקֶחֶר, Bécher; the correct pointing being perhaps בְּקָהָר, i. e. Baecher, for בֶּקֶחֶר, Beth-Tar, Lat. Bather, Biter, etc.), not far from Jerusalem (Bk3291ṣa, Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv, 6). For the history of the campaign at this place, see Münter, Jud. Krieg, § 20, translated under the title "Jewish War with Adrian" in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1843, p. 283 sq.; and for notices of the place, see the editor's remarks appended to the translation, p. 456 sq. The locality is thought by Dr. Robinson (Later Bib. Researches, p. 263-271) to be identical with that of the Benjamite Bethel (q. v.), the modern Beitin; but Williams (Holy City, ii, 210) and Stewart (Tent and Khan, p. 44) assign another reason, fix it in the present village Bittir, two hours W.S.W. of Jerusalem (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 295). This latter position also agrees with that of a Bather (Bn31ṣa, i. e. Bether, v. r. Gna31ṣa) mentioned by the Sept. in Josh. xv, 60, among the names of an additional group of eleven towns near Bethlehem, in the tribe of Judah (q. v.), thought by some to have accidentally dropped from the Heb. text (see Keil, Commentary, in loc.).

Evidently different from this place was a Bather (with the same orthography) mentioned in the Talmud as lying four Roman miles from the sea (see Reland, Palæst. p. 630), the Baterum (of the Ibn. Anton. and Hieros.) on the way from Cæsarea to Antipatris; now probably the village of Harin, about 1½ hour south of Kakun (Schwarz, Palest. p. 144; Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 295).

Bethes'da (בֵּיתָּסָדָא, for Chald. בֵּיתָּסָדָא, house of the merciful, q. d. charity-hospital; or, according to others, for Chald. בֵּיתָּסָדָא, place of the flowing, sc. of water), the name of a reservoir or tank (מְכוֹר יָבָה, i.e. swimming-pool), with five "porches" (πρόβατος), close upon the sheep-gate or "market" (ἐν τῷ πρὸβατεῖ), it will be observed that the word "market" is supplied in Jerusalem (John v, 2). The porches—i. e. extensions—were extensive enough to accommodate a large number of sick and infirm people, whose custom it was to wait there for the "troubling of the water." One of these invalids is recorded to have been cured by Christ in the above passage, where also we are told that an angel went down at a certain season into the pool and troubled the water, and then whoever first stepped in was made whole. There seems to have been no special medicinal virtue in the water itself, and only he who first stepped in after the troubling was healed. It may be remarked that the evangelist, in giving the account of the descent of the angel into the pool and the effects following, does not seem to do any more than state the popular legend as he found it, without vouching for its truth, except so far as it explained the invalid's presence there.

Eusebius and Jerome—though unfortunately they give no clue to the situation of Bethesda—describe it in the Onomasticon (c. v. Beqash, Bethesda) as existing in their time as two pools, the one supplied by the periodical rains, while the water of the other was of a reddish color, due, as the tradition then ran, to the fact that the flesh of the sacrifices was annually washed there before offering, on which account the pool was also called "the Sheep-pool" (Peculis, Ἰησοῦς, Ἰησοῦς). See, however, the comments of Lightfoot on this view, in his Exercit. on St. John, v, 2. Eusebius's statement is partly confirmed by the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 388), who mentions in his Itineraries "two fish-pools, having five porches, which are called Bethsaida" (quoted in Barclay, p. 292). The large reservoir called by the Mohammedans Ḍerē Ḫayl, within the walls of the city, close by the St. Stephen's gate, and under the north-east wall of the Haram area, is generally considered to be the modern representative of Bethesda. This tradition reaches back certainly to the time of Sæculwulf, A.D. 1102, who mentions it under the name of Bethsaida (Early Trans. p. 41). It is also named in the Cité de Jerusalem, A.D. 1187 (sect. vii), and in more modern times by Maundrell and all the late travellers. The pool measures 860 feet in length, 130 feet in breadth, and 75 in depth to the bottom, besides the rubbish which has accumulated in it for ages. Although it has been dry for above two centuries, it was once evidently used as a reservoir, for the sides internally have been cased over with small stones, and these again covered with plaster; but the workmanship of these additions is coarse, and bears no special marks of antiquity. The west end is built up like the rest, except at the south-west corner, where two lofty arched vaults extended westward, side by side, under the houses that now cover this part. Dr. Robinson was able to trace the continuation of the work in this direction under one of these vaults for 100 feet, and it seemed to extend much farther. This gives the whole a length of 160 feet, equal to one half of the whole extent of the sacred enclosure under which it lies. Mr. Wolcott, writing since, says, "The southern vault extends 130 feet, and the other apparently the same. At the extremity of the former was an opening for drawing up water. The vaults are stucced" (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1843, p. 33). It would seem as if the deep reservoir formerly extended farther westward in this part, and that these vaults were built up in and over it in order to support the structures above. Dr. Robinson considers it probable that this excavation was anciently carried out through the ridge of Bezetha, along the northern side of Azeka. On its northern W., corner, stood the remains of a deep trench which separated the fortress from the adjacent hill (Bib. Researches, i, 433, 434). The little that can be said on the subject, however, goes nearly as much to confirm as to invalidate the traditionary identification. (1) On the one hand, the most probable position of the sheep-gate is at the east part of the city. See Sumer- gar. On the other hand, the Birket Israil exhibits none of the marks which appear to have distinguished the water of Bethedia in the records of the Evangelist and of Eusebius; it certainly is neither pentagonal nor double. (2) The construction of the Birket is such as to show that it was originally a water-reservoir, and not the moat of a fortress. See Jerusalem. (3) There is certainly a remarkable coincidence between the name as given by Eusebius, Bethatha, and that of the north-east suburb of the city at the time of the Gospel history—Bezeith (q. v.). (4) There is the difficulty that the Birket Israil be not Bethedia, which of the ancient "pools" does it represent? On the whole, however, the most probable identification of the ancient Bethedia is that of Dr. Robinson (i, 608), who suggests the "fountain of the Virgin," in the valley of the Kidron, a short distance above the Pool of Siloam. In favor of this are its situation, opposite the sheep-gate to be at the south-east of the city, as Lachish and others say, and the strange and intermittent "troubling of the water" caused by the periodical ebbing and flowing of the supply. Against it is the confined size of the pool, and the difficulty of finding room for the five storeys. (See Barclay's detailed account, City of the Great King, p. 418-24, and 825, 6.) See Jerusalem.

The place has been described more or less fully by nearly every traveller in Jerusalem. (See especially De Saulcy, Dead Sea, ii, 244 sq.)

Beth-ez'el (Heb. Beth e-Eziel, בֵּיתוֹזֵעֶל, house of the firm root, i.e. fixed dwelling; Sept. translates αὐτὸς ἑποίημένου, "neighboring house," as our margin), a town in Judæa, mentioned Mic. i, 11, where there is an allusion to the above etymology. Ephraem Syrus understands a place near Samaria; but the context seems to locate it in the Philistine plain, perhaps as far afield as Bethsa'afa (Robinson's Researches, ii, 206 note), 54 miles S.E. of Ashdod (Van der Velde's Map).

Beth-ga'der (Heb. Beth-Geder, בְּית-גֶּדֶר, house of the guest), one of the Ba'ashan v. r. B'ashan), a place in the tribe of Judah, of which Bahr (Birket Geder) is named as "father" or founder (1 Chron. ii, 61); apparently the same with the Gedor (q. v.) of Josh. xii, 18, and probably identical also with the Sedon (q. v.) of Josh. xii, 58, as it seems (from the associated names) to have been in the mountains.

Beth-ga'mul (Heb. Beth Gamul, בְּית-גָּמוּל, house of the weeded, or possibly camel-house; Sept. ἀνθρώπων Σιμών), a city, apparently in the "plain country" of Moab, denounced by the prophet (Jer. xlviii, 29). Dr. Smith suggests Jedediah Residences (iii, Append. p. 153) that it is the modern Um-Jnala, a ruined site on the road (south according to Burckhardt, p. 106) from Burash to Dera (his Edret), which is probably correct, although it is difficult to believe that Moab ever extended so far north. See Bozrah.

Beth-gan. See Beth-haggan.

Beth-gilgal (Heb. Beth-hog-gilgal, בֵּיתוֹגֵילֶגֶּלָּאָל, house of the Gilegs; Sept. omits, but some copies have בְּיתוֹג הָוָם, בְּיתוֹג הָוָם), a place from which the inhabitants gathered to Jerusalem for the purpose of celebrating the reapers of the wheat harvest from Babylon (Neh. xii, 29, where the name is translated "house of Gilgal"); doubtless the same elsewhere called simply Gilgal (q. v.), probably that near Bethel (2 Kings ii, 2).

Beth-hac'cerem (Heb. Beth hak-Kerem, בֵּיתוֹהָכָרֶם, house of the vineyard; Sept. בְּיתוֹחָכָרֶם, בְּיתוֹחָכָרֶם, and בְּיתוֹחַה, בְּיתוֹחַה, a place in the tribe of Judah, not far from Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 14), where the children of Hezekiah came to set up an altar. N. T. says: "Bedeacarum" blew the trumpet of warning at Tekoa against the invading army of Babylonians (Jer. vi, 1). From the notice in Nehemiah, it appears that the town, like a few other places, was distinguished by the application to it of the word pellek (πυλῆκ, Auth. Ver. "part"), and that it had then a "ruler" (Ῥυπατε). According to Jerome (Comment. in loc. Jer.), there was a village called Bedeacarum, situated on a mountain between Jerusalem and Jericho. The name also occurs in the Tal- mud (Nidda ii, 7; Middoth, iii, 4) as belonging to a valley containing a quarry. Hence Pococke (East. ii, 42) suggests that this was the fortress Herodium (Ὑρόθειον or Υρόθειον), founded by Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 2, 1; War, i, 13, 8, 21, 10), and where he died (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 8, 3), being 390 stadia from Jericho, Josephus, War, i, 3, 3; comp. iii, 8, 5), and identical with the modern "Frank Mountain," or Jebel Fu'ad, (Woolcott, in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1843, p. 69, 70); but this is denied by Robinson (Researches, ii, 174), although affirmed by Wilkes (Lands of Bible, i, 896), Bonar (Misfortunes to Jews, p. 97). The place is marked on the map of Van der Velde (Narratie, ii, 89). See Herodium.

Beth-haccerem (i.e. i. e. Beth-Kerem) appears also to be identical with Carem (q. v.), one of the towns added in the Sept. to the Hebrew text of Josh. xvii, 59, as is the mountains of Judah, in the district of Bethel.

Beth-haggan (Heb. Beth-hag-Gan, בְּיתוֹהָגָנָא, house of the garden; Sept. Bahayvath; Auth. Ver. "the garden-house," 2 Kings ix, 27), one of the special marks the flight of Ahaziah from Jehu. It is doubtless the same place as En-Gannim (q. v.) of Isaiah (Isa. xix, 21), "spring of gardens," the modern Jeisim, on the direct road from Samaria northward, and overlooking the great plain (Stanley, Palæt. 349, note).

Beth-hanan. See Elonbeth-hanan.

Beth-ha'ran (Heb. Beth Har'am, בֵּית-הָרָעָן, a variation of Beth-Haram; Sept. ἐν Ηραμαι), one of the "fenced cities" on the east of Jordan, "built" by the Gadites (Num. xxxii, 58). It is named with Bethnimrah, and therefore is no doubt the same place as Bithpa'rah (q. v.), the modern Betharam (Josh. xiii, 27). The name is not found in the lists of the towns of Moab in Isaiah (xxv, xvi), Jeremiah (xviii), and Ezekiel (xxv, 9).

Beth-hog'lah (Josh. xv, 6) or Beth-hog'lah (Heb. Beth Choglah, בְּיתוֹחָגָל, parturient-house; though Jerome [Onomast. s. v. Area-ataed, where he states that Betagla was three miles from Jericho and two from the Jordan gives another interpretation, locus gyrri, reading the name הַבֵּיתָלָע, and connecting it with the funeral races or dances at the mourning of Jacob [see A T A D]; Sept. בֵּיתָלָע v. בֵּיתָלָעַה, a place on the border of Judah (Jos. xv, 6) and of Benjamin (xxviii, 20), to which latter tribe it was reckoned according to the numbering (xxviii, 21). Eusebius and Jerome speak (Onomast. s. v. בֵּיתָלָע, Betagla) of two villages of this name, but they assign them both to the vicinity of Gaza. Josephus (Ant. xiii, 1, 5) reads Betagla (בֵּיתָלָע, doubtless for בֵּיתָלָעַה) instead of the Bethshean (q. v.) of 1 Macc. ix, 62. Dr. Robinson found a ruined site, doubled by the modern name, called by the Arabs -Al-Hajla, twenty minutes S.W. by W. of a fine spring in this region called by the same name (Al-Hajla), although he saw no ruins at the spring itself (Researches, ii, 265).

It was also visited by M. de Saulcy, who states that he picked up large cubes of primitive masonry at the place, indicating, in his opinion, the existence of a Biblical city in the neighborhood (Narrative, ii, 35); comp. Wilson, Lands of Bible, ii, 15; Schwartz, Palestine, p. 94.

Beth-horon (Heb. Beth Horom', בֶּת הָעֵר), once [1 Kings ix, 17] הָעֵר, in Chron. fully הָעֵר, house of the hollow; Sept. בֵּית הָעִר or בֵּית הָעֵר; Vg. BETHUR, Bethor, and BETHUR); the name of two villages or regions (2 Kings xii, 5; 2 Chron. viii, 5); "upper" and a "nether" (Jer. xvi, 5, 6; 1 Chron. vii, 24), on the road (2 Chron. xvii, 13; Judith iv, 4) from Gibeon to Azekah (Jos. x, 10, 11) and the Philistine Plain (1 Sam. xiii, 18; 1 Macc. iii, 24). Beth-horon lay on the boundary-line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Jos. xvi, 6, 5, and xviii, 14), was counted to Ephraim (Jos. xxi, 22; 1 Chron. vii, 28), but returned to Benjamin (xxi, 22; 1 Chron. vii, 68 [53]). In a remarkable fragment of early history (1 Chron. vii, 24) we are told that both the upper and lower towns were built by a woman of Ephraim, Shibah, who in the present state of the passage appears as a granddaughter of the founder of the name, on whose account the place is so closely connected with Beth-horon. The name Beth-horon in the N.W. corner of Benjamin; and between the two places was a pass called both the ascent and descent of Beth-horon, leading from the region of Gibeon (el-Jib) down to the western plain (Jos. xxi, 14; x, 10, 11; 1 Macc. iii, 16, 24). Down this ascent the army of the Philistines was driven by Joshua (Jos. x, 11; Ex. xlv, 6). The upper and lower towns were both fortified by Solomon (1 Kings x, 17; 2 Chron. vii, 5). At one of them Nicanor was attacked by Judas Maccabaeus; and it was afterward fortified by Bacchides (1 Macc. vii, 39 sq.; ix, 50). Josephus, Ant. xii, 10, 5; xiii, 1, 3).

Cestius Gallus, the Roman proconsul of Syria, in March from Caesarea to Jerusalem, after having burned Lydda, ascended the mountain by Beth-horon and encamped near Gibeon (Joseph. War, ii, 19, 1); and it was near this place that his army was totally cut up (Joseph. War, ii, 19, 8 and 9). In the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Бет сук, Bethoron) the two Bethorons were small villages, the upper Bethoron being 12 Roman miles from Jerusalem; according to Josephus (comp. War, ii, 12, 2, with Ant. xx, 4, 4) it was 100 stadia from thence, and 50 stadia from Gibeon. From the time of Jerome (Spit. Paul. xviii, 8) the place appears to have been deserted, which fact was noted by Dr. E. D. Clarke, who recognized it in the present Beth-hor (Travels, vol. i, p. ii, p. 626); after which it appears to have remained unvisited till 1838, when the Rev. J. Paxton, and, a few days after, Dr. Robinson arrived there. The lower Beth-hor is upon the top of a low ridge, which is separated by a wady, or narrow valley, from the foot of the mountain upon which the upper Beth-hor stands. Both are now inhabited villages. The lower is very small, but foundations of large stones indicate an ancient site—doubtless that of the Nether Beth-horon. The Upper Beth-hor is likewise small, but also exhibits traces of ancient walls and foundations. In the steep ascent to the rock it is necessary to cut away and lay out steps, indicating an ancient road. On the first offset or step of the ascent are foundations of huge stones, the remains perhaps of a castle that once guarded the pass. It is remarkable that the places are still distinguished as Beth-ur el-Foka (the Upper), and Beth-ur el-Loweir (the Lower), and there is no question that they represent the Upper and Lower Beth-horon. "In the name," remarks Dr. Robinson (iii, 59), "we find the rather unusual change from one harshe Hebrew guttural to one still deeper and more tenacious in Arabic; in all other respects the name, position, and other circumstances agree." Compare Schwarz, Palestine, p. 140, 146.) See Gibeon.

The importance of the road on which the two Beth-horons are situated, the main approach to the interior of the country from the hostile districts on both sides of Palestine—Philistia and Egypt on the west, Moab and Ammon on the east—must be obvious and justifies the frequent change of the position of these two important posts of the period of the kings (1 Kings ix, 17; 2 Chron. vii, 5; 1 Macc. iii, 60; Judith iv, 4, 5). The road is still the direct one from the site which must have been Gibeon (el-Jib), and from Michmash (Micmaks), to the Philistine plain on the one hand, and Antipatris (Joseph. War, ii, 12, 9) on the other. On the mountain which gives title to the southward of the latter village is still preserved the name (Yalde) and the site of Ajalon, so closely connected with the most ancient memories of Beth-horon; and the long "descent" between the two remains unaltered from what it was on that great day, "which was like no day before or after it." From Gibeon to the upper Beth-horon is a distance of about a dina; the ascent and descent. The ascent, however, predominates, and this therefore appears to be the "going up" to Beth-horon which formed the first stage of Joshua's pursuit. With the upper village the descent commences; the road rough and difficult even for the mountain-pass, and on going down the slope the track flattens out as the flagstones of a city pavement; now over the upturned edges of the limestone strata and then among the loose rectangular stones so characteristic of the whole of this district. There are in many places steps cut, and other marks of the path having been artificially improved. But, though redone, they are hardly called "precipitous," still less is it a ravine (Stanley, p. 206), since it runs for the most part along the back of a ridge or water-shed dividing wadys on either hand. After about three miles of this descent, a slight rise leads to the lower village standing on its hill-top—the last outpost of the Benjamite hills, and characterized by the date-palm in the enclosure of the village mosque. A short and sharp fall below the village, a few undulations, and the road is among the dura of the great corn-growing plain of Sharon. This rough descent from the upper to the lower Beth-ur is the "going down to Beth-horon" of the Bible narratives.

Standing on the high mound and looking over the wild scene, we may feel assured that it was over this rough path that the Canaanites fled to their native lowlands. This road, still, as in ancient times, "the great road of communication and heavy transport between Jerusalem and the sea-coast" (Robinson, vol. i, p. 390), is now used by travellers with light baggage, leaves the main north road at Tuelil el-Ful, 13 miles from Jerusalem, due west of Jericho. Bending slightly to the north, it runs by the modern village of el-Jib, the ancient Gibeon, and then proceeds by the Beth-horons in a direct line due west to Jimzu (Gimus) and Ludd (Lydda), at which it parts into three, diverging north to Caphar-Saba (Antipatris), south to Gaza, and west to Jaffa (Joppa).

Beth-jeshimoth or (as it is less correctly Anglicized in Num. xxxii, 49) Beth-jeshimoth (Heb. Beth-jeṣhimoth, בְּתֵי-יִשְׁמֹהָ),בערי ישמה, [in Num. xxxii, 49, הַיִּשְׁמֹהָ, house of the wasters; Sept. 'Aṣmōv [v. r. 'Aṣmow], but Ḫiṣmōv in Jos. xiii, 20, and Ḫiṣmōv in Ezek. xxv, 9, a town or place not far east of Jordan, near Abel-Shittim, in the "deserts" of Moab—that is, on the lower level at the south end of the Jordan valley (Num. xxxii, 49) and named before Ashtaroth-pa-gam, as it was one of the limits of the encampment of Israel before crossing the Jordan. It lay within the territory of Siron, king of the Amorites (Josh. xii, 3), and was allotted to Reuben (Josh. xiii, 20), but came at last into the hands of Moab, and formed one of the cities which were "the glory of the country" (Ezek. xxxii, 9). According to Eusebius and Jerome (Inomast. s. v. Ḫiṣmōv, Βηθησιμώθ, Bethisimoth) it was still called by the same name (ῥωμῆ-γενής Ἰσαάκ, Βηθησίμωθ, Domus Inimith), being "opposite Jericho, 10 miles to the south, near the Dead Sea," meaning apparently south-east, and across the Jordan. It is evidently the Beisimoth (Beisimoth) captured by Baalaam, the general of Vessania (Josephus, War, iv, 7, 6). Schwarz (Palest. p. 229) states that there are still "the ruins of a Beth-Jisimoth situated on the north-easternmost part of the Dead Sea, half a mile from the Jordan; a locality which, although reported by no other traveller, cannot be far from correct" (Van de Velde, Memori, p. 296).

Beth-Joab. See Avaroth (Beth-Joab).

Beth-leaphrah (Heb. Beṣeph la-Aphrah, בֵּית-לֶעָפְרָה, house [of] the flood; Sept. and Vulg. falsely translate οἰκος κατὰ γεγονότα φῶς, domus pulsera; Auth. Vers. "house of Aphrah"), a place named (only in Josh. xii, 10, where they are evidently a play upon the word for as if "for, δαυν, in connection with other places of the Philistine coast (e.g. Gath, Accho ["weep ye"], Saphir, etc.), and not to be confounded (as by Henderson, in loc. after Gesenius and Winer) with the Benjamese Ophrah (Josh. xviii, 23), but probably identical with the present village Bet-Aife, 6 miles south-east of Ashdod (Robinson's Researches, ii, 369 note; Van de Velde, Mop).

Beth-lebaath (Heb. Beṣeph le-Bath, בֵּית-לֶבֶת, house of lionesse, Sept. Beṣeph la-Bath v. Beṣeph le-Bath and Beṣeph, a town in the lot of Simeon (Josh. xvi, 6), in the extreme south of Judah (xx, 32, where it is called simply Lebaath (q. v.), probably in the wild country in which its name bears witness. In the parallel list in 1 Chron. iv, 31, the name is given Beith-iriel. Reland (Palest. p. 648) conjectures that it may have been the "toparchy of Bethlepshene" (Bēthlepshene), mentioned by Josephus (War, iv, 8), and Pliny (Bethlepshene, v. 15), south of Jerusalem; but this is hardly probable (see also the improbable surmise of Korb in Jahn's Jahrb. f. Philol. iv, 114 sq.).

Beth-lehem (Heb. Beṣeph le-Chem, בֵּית-לֶחֶם, house of bread, perh. from the fertility of the region; Sept. and N. T. Beṣeph le-Chem [but v. v. Beṣeph in Jos. xix, 15; Beṣeph in Ezra xi, 21; Beṣeph in Neh. vii, 26]; Josephus, Beṣephlem; Steph. Byz. Beṣephlem), the name of two places.

1. One of the towns in Palestine, already in existence at the time of Jacob's return to the country, when its name was Ephrath or Ephratah (see Gen. xxxv, 16; xlvii, 7; Sept. at Josh. xv, 59), which seems not only to have been the ancient name of the city itself, but also of the surrounding region; its inhabitants being likewise termed Ephrathites (Ruth i, 2). It is also called "Beth-lehem-Ephratah" (Mic. v, 2), and "Beth-lehem-Judah" (1 Sam. xvii, 12), and "Beth-lehem of Judea" (Matt. ii, i), to distinguish it from another town of the same name in the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix, 16), and also "the city of David" (iv, 20; John vii, 4); four villages of inhabitants are called Beth-lehemitah (1 Sam. xvi, 1; xvii, 56). It is not, however, till long after the occupation of the country by the Israelites that we meet with it under its new name of Bethlehem. Here, as in other cases (comp. Bethmeon, Bethshiblathaim, Bethparah), the new name appears to mark the beginning of a Hebrew appellation, and the different sections of the lexicons are to be trusted, the name in its present shape appears to have been an attempt to translate the earlier Ephrata into Hebrew language and idiom, just as the Arabs have, in their turn, with a further slight change of meaning, converted it into Beit-loha (house of flesh). However this may be, the ancient name lingered as a familiar word in the mouths of the inhabitants of the place (Ruth i, 2; iv, 11; 1 Sam. xvi, 12), and in the poetry of the psalmists and prophets (Psa. cxxxii, 6; Mic. v, 2) at a late period. In the genealogical lists of 1 Chron. it recurs, and Ephrathah appears to be a son of Caleb and the father of Hur ("Ur") (i, 19, 51; iv, 4); the title of "father of Bethlehem" being bestowed both on Hur (iv, 4) and on Salma, the son of Hur (ii, 51, 54). The name of Salma recalls a very similar name intimately connected with Bethlehem, namely, the father of Baaz, Salmah (Ῥωμης, Ruth iv, 20; Auth. Vers. "Salmon" or Salamon (Ῥωμῆ-γενής, ver. 21). Hur is also named in Exod. xxxi, 2, and 1 Chron. ii, 20, as the father of Uri, the father of Bezaleel. In the East a trade or calling remains fixed in one family for generations, and if there is any foundation for the tradition of theargue that Jesse, the father of David, was "a weaver of the veil of the sanctuary" (Targ. Jonathan on 2 Sam. xx, 19), he may have inherited the accomplishments and the profession of his art from his forefather, who was "filled with the Spirit of God," "to work all manner of works," and among them that of the embroiderer and the weaver (Exod. xx, 19). At the date of the visit of Benjamin of Tudela there were still, according to various authorities, the "twelve Jews, dyers by profession, living at Beth-lehem" (Benj. of Tudela, ed. Asher, i, 75). The above tradition may possibly elucidate the allusions to the "weaver's beam" (whatever the "beam" may be) which occurs in the names of many cities of mighty men of olden David or his heroes; but not in any unconnected with him. After the conquest Bethlehem fell within the territory of Judah (Judg. xvii, 7; 1 Sam. xvii, 12; Ruth i, 5). As the Hebrew text now stands, however, it is omitted altogether from the list of the towns of Judah in Joshua xv, though retained by the Sept. in the eleven names which that version inserts between verses 19 and 60. Among these it occurs between Thoko (Tekoa), Θέκο (comp. 1 Chron. iv, 4, 5), and Thager (P Φερ, Φερωμος). This omission from the Hebrew text is certainly remarkable, but it is quite in keeping with the obscurity in which Bethlehem remains throughout the whole of the sacred history. Not to speak of the activity, which has made the name of Bethlehem so familiar to the whole Christian and Mussulman world, it was, as the birthplace of David, a place of the most important consequence to ancient Israel. And yet, from some cause or other, it never rose to any eminence, nor ever became the theatre of any act of business or politics, or place of public assembly or Jerusalem, with no special associations in their favor, were fixed as on capitals, while the place in which the great ideal king, the hero and poet of the nation, drew his first breath and spent his youth remained an "ordinary Judean village."

No doubt this is in part owing to what will be noticed presently—the isolated nature of its position; but that circumstance did not prevent...
Gibeon, Ramah, and many other places situated on ominences from becoming famous, and is not sufficient to account entirely for such silence respecting a place so strong by nature, commanding one of the main roads, and the excellence of which as a military position may be safely inferred from the fact that at one time it was occupied by the Philistines as a garrison (2 Sam. xxiii, 14; 1 Chron. xi, 16). Though not named as a Levitical city, it was apparently a residence of Levites, for from it came the young man Jonathan, the son of Abinadab, who became the future king of the House of David at their new northern settlement (Judg. xvii, 7; xviii, 30), and from it also came the concubine of the other Levite, whose death at Gibeon caused the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin (xix, 1–9). The Book of Ruth is a page from the domestic history of Bethlehem; the names, almost the very persons of the Bethlehemites are there brought before us; we are allowed to assist at their most peculiar customs, and to witness the very springs of those events which have conferred immortality on the name of the place. Many of these customs were doubtless common to Israel in generall, but one thing must have been peculiar to Bethlehem.
What more manifestly of this view, after the view of the general picture has lost its first hold on us, is the inte-mate connection of the place with Moab. Of the origin of this connection no record exists, no hint of it has yet been discovered; but it continued in force for at least a century after the arrival of Ruth, till the time of her grandson, Boaz, who secured a safe recess for his parents from the fury of Saul than the house of the King of Moab at Mizpeth (1 Sam. xxii, 8, 3, 4). But, whatever its origin, here we find the connection in full vigor. When the famine occurs, the natural resource is to go to the country of Moab and “continue there;” the surprise of the city is occasioned, not at Naomi’s going, but at her return. Ruth was “not like” the handmaids of Boaz: some difference of feature or complexion there was, doubtless, which distinguished the “children of Lot” from the children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but yet she gleans after the reapers in the field without molestation or remark; and when Boaz, in the public manner possible, proclaims his intention of taking the stranger to be his wife, no voice of remonstrance is raised, but loud congratulations are expressed; the parallel in the life of Ruth occurs at once to all, and a blessing is invoked on the head of Ruth the Moabitess, that she may be like her. The laws of the Moabite Nabor, “like Rachel and like Leah, the two mothers of Israel.” This, in the face of the strong denunciations of Moab contained in the law, is, to say the least, very remarkable (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 550 sq.).
Moab appears elsewhere in connection with a place in Judah, Judah Haleem (1 Chr. iv, 22). We might be tempted to believe the name merely another form of Beth-lehem, if the context—the mention of Marreshah and Chohobla, places on the extreme west of the place—did not forbid it.

The elevation of David to the kingdom does not appear to have affected the fortunes of his native place.
This, however, is not that of a place especially estimated from him, by which it was called even down to the latest time of Jewish history (2 Sam. xxii, 6; Josephus, War, v, 2, 1, 1αυτάτασεναλη, but David did nothing to dignify Bethlehem, or connect it with himself.
The only touch of recollection which he manifests for it is that recorded in the statement of his sudden longing for the water of Bethlehem during his childhood (2 Sam. xxiii, 15). Bethlehem was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. x, 6), but it does not appear to have been a place of much importance; for Michal, exhibiting the moral pre-eminence of Bethlehem, says, “Thou, Bethlehem-ephraim, through thou be little among the tribes of Israel, yet shall thou be great among the tribes of Israel” (vs. 26). Michal, nay, even David, quotes this as, “And thou, Bethlehem of Judah, art not the least of the cities of Judah,” etc. (Matt. ii, 6), which has the appearance of a discrepancy. But it is answered that a city may be little without being the least, or that the evangelist may have quoted from memory, and hence the slight difference in expression, while the sense remains the same. The position of the captivity, the inn of Chimham by (2 Sam xi, 16) close to Bethlehem appears to have become the recognised point of departure for travellers to Egypt (Jer. xii, 17)
—a caravanserai or khan (2018 ; see Stanley, App.
§ 90), perhaps the identical one which existed there at the time of our Lord ( Ταῦτα ἄντι, like those which still elevate all over the East at the stations of travellers.
Lastly, “children of Bethlehem” to the number of 128 returns from the exiles in the time of Ezra ii. 2 (Ezra vii, 26). The place was, however, only 56 feet from the neighboring Netophah, slightly differs from the sum 188 of the parallel passage (Neh. vii. 26). In the New Testament Bethlehem retains its distinctive title of Bethlehem-judah (Matt. ii, 1, 5), and once, in the announcement of the angels, the “city of Da-vip” (Luke ii, 1; and comp. John vii, 42; ροιμα; θα-tellum). Its connection with the history of Christ is also too familiar to all to need any notice here; the remark should merely be made, that as in the earlier history less is recorded of the place after the youth of David than before, so, in the later, nothing occurs after the birth of our Lord to indicate that any additional importance or distinction was fastened on its name. In fact, the passages just quoted and the few which follow exhaust the references to it in the N.T. (Matt. ii, 6, 8, 16; Luke ii, 15).

After this nothing is heard of it till near the middle of the 2d century, when Justin Martyr speaks of our Lord’s birth as having taken place “in a certain cave very close to the village,” which cave he goes on to say was specially pointed out by Isaiah as “a place to be esteemed” (Justin. Dial. c. Tryph., § 78, 70). Such is the earliest supplement we possess to the meagre indications of the narrative of the Gospels; and while it is not possible to say with certainty that the tradition is true, there is no certainty in discounting it. There is nothing in itself very probable—nor certainly is there in most cases where the traditional scenes of events are laid in caverns—in the supposition that the place in which Joseph and Mary took shelter, and where was the “manger” or “stall” (which have since been), was a cave in the limestone rock of which the eminence of Bethlehem is composed. Yet it is not neccessary to assume that Justin’s quotation from Isaiah is the ground of an inference of his own; it may equally be an authority happily adduced by him in support of the existing tradition. Still the step from the belief that the nativity may have taken place in a cavern, to the belief that the present subterraneous vault or crypt is that cavern, is an equally doubtful one. (See below.)

Even in the 150 years that had passed when Justin wrote, so much had happened at Bethlehem that it is difficult to believe that the true spot could have been otherwise preserved. In that interval not only had the neighborhood of Jerusalem been overrun and devastated by the Romans at the destruction of the city, but the Emperor Hadrian, among other desecrations, is said to have planted a grove of Adonis at the spot (lucus innumeralbus Aedumdia, Jerome, Ep. Fami.). This grove remained at Bethleham for some time, as the text of Ps. Cxxxv. 15, 16. But it was not preserved in the present church (Euseb. Vit. Const. 3, 40. See Tobler, p. 102, note). The brief notice of Eusebius in the Onomasticon (s. v. Βηθλεεμ) locates it 6 miles S. of Jerusalem, to which Jerome (ib. s. v. Bethlem) adds a reference to the “tower of Edar” and his own cell in the locality. The Crusaders, on their approach to Jerusa lem, first took possession of Bethlehem, at the entreaty of its Christian inhabitants. In A.D. 1110, King Baldwin I erected it into an episcopal see, a dignity it has since retained, but the cathedral in this was confirmed by Pope Paschal II, and the title long retained in the Romish Church, yet the actual possession of the see appears not to have been of long continuance. In A.D. 1224, Bethlehem, like Jerusalem, was desolated by the wild hordes of the Khairamians. There was formerly a Mohammedan quarter, but, after the latter, this was occupied by order of Ibrahim Pasha (Tobler, Bethlehem, Bern, 1849).

There never has been any dispute or doubt about the site of Bethlehem, which has always been an inhabited place, and, from its sacred associations, has been visited by an unbroken series of pilgrims and travellers. The modern town of Bethlehem lies to the E. of the main road from Jerusalem to Hebron, 4½ miles from the former. It covers the E. and N.E. parts of the ridge of a "long gray hill" of Jura limestone, which stands nearly due E. and W., and is about a mile in length. The hill has a deep valley on the N. and another on the S. The west end shelves down gradually to the valley, but the east end is bold and steep, and overlooks a plain of some extent. The slopes of the hill are in many parts covered by terraced gardens, shaded by rows of olives with figs and vines, the terraces sweeping round the contour of the hill with great regularity. The many olive and fig orchards, and wadi beds, round about, are marked by industry and thrift; and the adjacent fields, though stony and rough, produce, nevertheless, good crops of grain. On the top of the hill lies the village in a kind of irregular triangle, at about 150 yards from the apex of which, and separated from it by a vacant space on the extreme eastern part of the ridge, spreads the noble basilica of St. Helena, "half church, half fort," now embraced by its three convents, Greek, Latin, and Armenian. It is now a large and struggling village, with one broad and principal street. The houses have not doored roofs like those of Jerusalem and Ramleh; they are built for the most part of clay and bricks; and every house is provided with an apsary, the bee-hives of which are constructed of a series of earthen pots ranged on the house-tops. The inhabitants are said to be 8000, and were all native Christians at the time of the most recent visits; for Ibrahim Pasha, finding that the Moslem and Christian inhabitants were always at strife, caused the former to withdraw, and the latter to evacuate the quiet place, the houses of whose numbers had always greatly predominated (Wilde's Narrative, ii, 411). The chief trade and manufacture of the inhabitants consists of beads, crosses, and other relics, which are sold at a great profit. Some of the articles, wrought in mother-of-pearl, are carved with more skill than one would expect to find in that remote quarter. The people are said to be remarkable for their ferocity and rudeness, which is indeed the common character of the inhabitants of most of the places accounted holy in the East. Travellers remark the good looks of the women, the substantial, clean appearance of the houses, and the general air of comfort, which is in contrast to that of Gerasa. p. 246, Biblical Researches.

At the farthest extremity of the town is the Latin convent, connected with which is the Church of the Nativity, said to have been built by the Empress Helena. It has suffered much from time, but still bears manifest traces of its Grecian origin, and is acknowledged to be the oldest Church building long since remaining in Palestine. It is a spacious and handsome hall, consisting of a central nave amid aisles separated from each other by rows of tall Corinthian pillars of gray marble. As there is no ceiling, the lofty roof is exposed to view, composed (according to some) of the cedars of Lebanon, and befits the majesty of this fine specimen of the architecture of that age. Two spiral staircases lead to the cave called the 'Grotto of the Nativity,' which is about 20 feet below the level of the church. This cave is lined with Italian marbles, and lighted by numerous lamps. Here the grinning is conducted with due solemnity to a star inlaid in the marble, marking the exact spot where the infant Jesus was born, and corresponding to that in the firmament occupied by the meteor which intimated that great event; he is then led to one of the sides, where, in a kind of recess, a little below the level of the rest of the floor, is a block of white marble, hollowed out in the form of a nest, and here he is enshrined by the clergy of the church, and in the chapel dedicated to Joseph and other saints. There has been much controversy respecting the claims of this cave to be regarded as the place in which our Lord was born. Tradition is in its favor, but facts and probabilities are against it. It is useless to deny that there is much force in a tradition regarding a locality (more than it would have in the case of a historical fact), which can be traced up to a period not remote from that of the event itself, and the event was so important as to make the scene of it a point of such un-remitting attention, that the knowledge of that spot was not likely to be lost. This view would be greatly strengthened if it could be satisfactorily proved that Adrian, to castodium under the mysteries of the Christian religion, reproached God with the absence of Venus over the holy sepulchre and on Calvary, but placed one of Adonis over the spot of the Nativity at Bethlehem. But against tradition, whatever may be its value, we have in the present case to place the utter improbability that a subterraneum cavern like this, with a deep descent, should ever have been used as a stable for cattle, and, what is more, for the stable of a * الواحد* or carmeserai, which doubtless the "inn" of Luke ii, 7 was. Although, therefore, it is true that cattle are, and always have been, stabled in caverns in the East, yet certainly not in such caverns as this, which appears to have been originally a tomb. Old empty tombs often, it is argued, afford shelter to man and cattle; but such was not the case among the Jews, who held themselves ceremonially defiled by contact with sepulchres. Besides, the circumstance of Christ's having been born in a cave would not have been less remarkable than his being laid in a manger, and was more likely to have been noticed by the evangelist, if it had actually occurred; but it is also certain that this grotto is at some distance from the town, whereas Christ appears to have been born in the town; and, whatever may be the case in the open country, it has never been usual in towns to employ caverns as stables for cattle. To this we may add the suspicion which arises from the fact that the local traditions seem to connect with caverns almost every interesting event recorded in Scripture, as if the ancient Jews had been a nation of troglodytes. See Cave. All that can be said about the "holy places" of Bethlehem has been well said by Lord Nugent (I, 12-23), and Mr. Stanley (p. 439-442). (See also, though interspersed with much that is false, the admirable account of Mr. de Kay's visit, p. 141, 459). Tobler, p. 104 note, adds the authority of Eutychius that the present church is the work of Justinian, who destroyed that of Constantine as not sufficiently magnificent. One fact is associated with the portion of this church, namely, that here, "beside the cave, there is a rock resembling a small mud-brick arch of the Christian faith," St. Jerome lived for more than 30 years, leaving a lasting monument of his sojourn (as is com-

On the north-east side of the town is a deep valley, called to be that in which the angels appeared to the shepherds announcing the birth of the Saviour (Luke ii. 8). It is situated in the plain below and east of the convent, about a mile from the walls; and adjacent is a very small, poor village, called Beth-Sahur, to the east of which are the unimportant remains of a Greek church. These buildings and ruins are surrounded by olive trees. The mode in which Arculf's time, "by the tower of Ader," was a church dedicated to the three shepherds, and containing their monuments (Arculf, p. 6). But this plain is too rich ever to have been allowed to lie in pastureage, and it is more likely to have been then occupied, as it is now, and as it doubtless was in the days of Ruth, by corn-fields, and such to have been kept on the hills. — Smith, s.n.; Kittel, s.v.

In the same valley is a fountain, said to be that for the water of which David longed, and which three of his mighty men procured for him at the hazard of their lives (2 Sam. xxii, 15-18). Dr. Clarke stopped and drank of the delicious water of this fountain, and from its constant contact with the lips of an ancient sacred historian and of Josephus (Ant. vii, 12, 4), as well as from the permanency of natural fountains, he concludes that there can be no doubt of its identity. (See Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 294-300.) Others find the traditional well of David in a group of three cisterns, near a church half a mile in turn from the present town, on the other side of the wady near the bath. A few yards from the western end of the village are two apertures, which have the appearance of wells; but they are merely openings to a cistern connected with the aqueduct below, and, according to Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii. 159), "there is now no well of living water in or near the town." — See Bethlehem.

Bethlehem has been more or less fully described by most travellers in Palestine (comp. also Reland, Palest. p. 618 sq.; Rosenmüller, Alterth. ii, 276 sq.; Verpoorten, Fisci. Disser. Coburg. 1789; Spanheim, De præsens Dom. nostr. Berlin. 1820; Wernsdorf, De Bethleemano ap. Hieron. Viteb. 1769). Treatises on various points connected with the place, especially as the scene of the Nativity, have been written by Ammon (Gott. 1779), Buddeus (Jen. 1727), and others (Lips. 1776), Feuerlein (Gott. 1744), Frischmuth (Jen. 1662), Königsmann (Schlesw. 1807), Krause (Lips. 1859), Müller (Jen. 1652), and others (Oetker, Nürnberg 1774), Osiander (Tub. 1729), Reitzel (Zeit. der heil. Gesch. 1772, 2nd ed., theol. p. 795 sq.), Scherf (Lips. 1704), Schwarz (Cob. 1728), same (ib. 1728), same (ib. ed.), Strauss (Viteb. 1661), same (ib. 1688), Vogel (Regiom. 1700), Wegner (Brandeb. 1690), Zielich (Viteb. 1751); Cundis (Jen. 1780).

2. A town in the portion of Zebulun, named only in connection with Idolah in Josh. xix. 15. It has been discovered by J. Robinson (Biblical Researches, 1853, p. 212) at Beit-Lahun, about six miles west of Nazareth, and lying between that town and the main road from Akka to Gaza (comp. Schwarz, Palest. p. 172). Robinson characterizes it as "a very miserable village, none more so in the country, and without a trace of antiquity except the name." (Bib. Res. new ed. ii, 118.)

Bethlehem, COUNCIL OF, held at Bethlehem in March, 1672, but known under the name of the Council of Jerusalem. It seems to have been the first council held by French influence, with the aim of procuring from the Greeks a confession of the doctrine of transubstantiation (Covel, Greek Church, p. 146). Dionysius, patriarch of Constantinople, at the suggestion of Dositheus, patriarch of Jerusalem, in January, 1672, prepared an evangelical council, which was sent to various prelates for the approval of those who should be unable to attend the council. It asserts, in the first place, the seven sacraments, and declares an unequivocal belief that the living body of our Lord Jesus Christ is invisibly present with a real presence in the blessed Eucharist, and that the bread is really, truly, and properly changed into the very body of our Saviour Christ, and that it, the holy Eucharist, is a sacrifice for all Christians, both quick and dead. It then asserts the doctrine of baptism; denies the doctrine of final perseverance; maintains the necessity of episcopacy to a church, the superiority of virginity to matrimony, the infallibility of the Catholic Church, the invocation of saints, and the use of holy water; and the necessity of fasting. This letter received the signature of forty-six metropolitans and bishops, including that of Dionysius. In March the council assembled at Bethlehem, Dosithoeus of Jerusalem presiding. The first act of the council was an ineffectual attempt to excommunicate Cyril Luccar from the charge of Calvinism brought against him, and to deny the authenticity of the confession attributed to him. They then proceed to declare that the confession, whoever its author, was never that of the Greek Church, and they repeat and authenticate the symbols of Constantinople and Jassey, concluding with a confession of faith founded on that of the Roman Church, though differing from it. Its contents are: Art. 1. On the Trinity and the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone. 2. On the authority of the Church to interpret Holy Scriptures. 3. Against the doctrine of irrespective predestination. 4. Against those who call for the abolition of the evil. 5. On the same; and on Divine Providence in the work of man. 6. On original sin. 7. On the incarnation and passion. 8. That there is but one Mediator, Jesus Christ; nevertheless, that the Church may and ought to have recourse to the intercession of the blessed Virgin and other saints. 9. That faith working by love, i.e. by the fulfilment of the commandments, justifies. 10. That there is a visible Catholic Church; that episcopacy is essential to it, and that it is an order entirely distinct from the priesthood. 11. Of members of the church living in sin. 12. Of the teaching of the Holy Ghost by the fathers and by the ecumenical Church. 13. Of good works. 14. Of free will. 15. That there are seven sacraments. 16. Of the necessity of regeneration in baptism. 17. Of the Holy Eucharist; asserts the doctrine of transubstantiation, and condemns consubstantiation. 18. Clearly admits the Latin doctrine of purgatory. As to the canon of Scripture, the council admitted the title of the apocryphal books (except those which are canonized), and declared that they are not to the doctrine of the second Council of Nicaea with regard to images. The acts are signed by Dositheus, the patriarch of Jerusalem, Nectarius, the ex-patriarch, seven other prelates, and the proxy of one absent; also by sixty-one other ecclesiastics; ten signed in Arabic, the rest in Greek; the date is March 20, 1672.—Neale, History of the Oriental Church; Landau, Manual of Councils, p. 80 sq.; Palmer, Dissertations on the Orthodox Communion (Lond. 1855); Christian Remembrancer, July, 1853, p. 90.

Bethlehem ( Heb. Beth ha-Lachmi, בֵּית הַלַּחְמִי, bekhet ha-lachmi, Sept. Βῆθη λαχμίς or βῆθη λαχμίς, occasionally καὶ βῆθη λαχμίς or καὶ βῆθη λαχμίς), an inhabitant of Bethlehem (Num. v. v.) in Judah (1 Sam. xvi, 1, 18; xvii, 58, 59; 2 Sam. xx, 19).

Bethlehemites. 1. An order of knights, established by Pope Pius II. on Jan. 18, 1459. The chief mission of this order was to fight against the Turks, and to oppose their further advance in Europe. Their chief seat was to be at Lemnos. They were to have an elective grand master, and to embrace knights and priests. Their costume was to be white, with a red cross, and for their support the pope assigned to them the property of the mediaeval order, which was approved. As the Turks soon after retook Lemnos, the order of the knights of Bethlehem was suppressed. See Dictionnaire des Ordres Religieux, i, 472.
An order of English monks. Our information of this order is very meagre. According to Matthew Paris (Hist. Anglic. p. 639), they obtained in 1257 a residence at Cambridge, England, and had a costume similar to that of the Dominicans, with the only exception that they wore on the breast a red star with five rays and a small disc of blue color, in memory of that star which, according to the Scriptures, guided the Eastern magi to Bethlehem at the birth of the Saviour. The time of the foundation of the order, its subsequent development, and its specific object are not known. All the authors which speak of it confine themselves to a description of the costume, and even with regard to this there is a discrepancy in their statements, as Schoonebeek (Histoire des Ordres Religion) reports that it was black. One author (Hadradi-"An Dammand) speaks of star-wearing knights, and it has therefore been doubted whether the "star-wearing knights" and the Bethlemites were the same order (with different costumes), or two different orders. —Wetzler und Welte, i, 687.

Beth-lehem-Ju’dah (Heb. Bryth Le’chem Yeda-dah, יְדֵדָה, Sept. Baשדתא מ’יינדא), a more distinctive title (Judg. xvii. 7, 8; 9.; xix. 1, 18; Ruth i, 1; 1 Sam. xvii. 12) for the place usually called simply Bethlehem (q. v.), in the tribe of Judah.

Beth-lepethpha (Reland, Palest. p. 648), the capital of Bethlehephene (Pliny, v. 15), a district opposite Pella, on the west of the Jordan (Josephus, War iv, 8, 1); perhaps identical with the ruined site Bel-Iafa, at the north base of Mt. Gilboa (Van de Ville, Narratives, ii, 366). See Bethulia.

Bethio’mon (Baש’ומון), an incorrect form (1 Esdr. v, 17) of the name Bethlehem in Judah (comp. Ezra ii, 21).

Beth-ma’âchah (Heb. Bryth Ma’âchah "or ham-Ma’âchah"); [or רַמְאָן רַמְאָן], house of [the Ma’âchah]: always with the prefix Abel or Abaleh; Sept. Baשאֲצָא, or Baשאֲצָאִי ו. y. Θεοκλάτιον, etc.), a place named in 2 Sam. xx., 14, 15, and there occurring more as a definition of the position of Abel than for itself; more fully called Abel-beth-Ma’âchah (q. v.) in 2 Kings xv., 29. In the absence of more information, we can only conclude that it is identical with Ma’âchah, or Aram-Ma’âchah, one of the petty Syrian kingdoms in the north of Palestine. See Aram.

Beth-mar’cábóth (Heb. Bryth Marbáboth, מָרְבָּבִים, house of chariots, in Chron.; Sept. Baשאָצַיְא אוּו v. Baשאָצַיְא; or with the art. in Josh. Beth-mar’cábóth, מָרְבָּבִים הַעֲמָלֵי הַכַּרְיָה; Sept. Baשאָצַיְא אוּו v. Baשאָצַיְא, and Baשאָצַיְא, one of the towns of Simeon, situated to the extreme south of Judah, with Ziklag and Hormah (Josh. xix., 5; 1 Chron. iv., 51). What "chariots" can have been in use in this rough thinly-inhabited part of the country, at a time so early as that at which these lists of towns purport to have been made out, we know not. At a later period—that of Solomon—"chariot cities" are named, and a regular trade with Egypt in chariots was carried on (1 Kings ix. 19; 2 Chron. viii. 6; 1 Kings x. 29; 2 Chron. i. 17), which would naturally require depôts or stopping-places near the principal routes. Hence the name Beth-mé'ôn (בֵיתָמֶּונּ), which is usually identified with a place on the road to Hebron, and to which the mention of its name in the Orakel of Ben-hadad (1 Kings xiv. 33) may be taken as an authority. See also Beth-aph".}

Beth-me'ôn (בֵיתָמֶּונּ), יִשָּׂרָאֵל הָיָה, house of habitation or of Baal-Meon; Sept. ὅτες Ἰσραήλ, v. r. Μωάβ, a place in the tribe of Reuben (Jer. xxviii. 28); elsewhere (Josh. xiii. 17) given in the form Beth-mé'ôn (בֵיתָמֶּונּ). See also Bethma'nah.

Beth-mer'nah (בֵית מֶרֶן), הָיָה תֵּסָרָה, house of the remonstrance; Sept. translates ὅτες μερήν, Vulg. procédal a domo; A. V. "a place that was far off," apparently the proper name of a locality near Jerusalem, and not far from the brook Kidron, where King David first hailed in his exit from the city on the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 17); doubtless a designation of the environs outside the city walls, in the valley of Jehoshaphat, as being the extreme limit of the road "up" to Palestine (Stanley, M. M. and R.).

Beth-mil'lo (בֵית מִלְלוּ), מִלָּה, שֵׂדֶר, or מִלֹלָה, wall-house; Sept. ὕπαλλος Μαλαίας; Vulg. oppidum [or domus] Mello; Auth. Vera. "house of Millo," the name of two localities. See Millo.

1. A fortress (or, according to the Targum, a village) near Shechem (Judg. ix. 20); apparently connected with the citadel (בֵית מֶלֶם, tower) of the place (Judg. ix. 46-49). See SHECHEM.

2. A castle or fortification of Jerusalem, where King Jehoshaphat was slain (2 Kings xx. 20), where as being described "on the descent to Sille," (q. v.) probably in the quarter of the same name. See JERUSALEM.

Beth-mîn'ráh (בֵית מִינְרָה), מִינְרָה, house of the waters; Sept. מְשַׁאֵל וּבְשַׂרְעָדָה, with many var. readings), one of the "fenced cities" on the east of the Jordan taken and "built" by the tribe of Gad (Num. xxxii. 36), and described as lying "in the valley" by the side of Beth-haran (Josh. xiii. 27). In Num. xxxii. 3, it is named simply Nîmrah (נִימְרָה) (q. v.). The "Waters of Nimrim," which are named in the denunciations of Moab by Isaiah (xv. 6), and Jeremiah (xl. 3), must, from the context, be in the same locality. See Nimrim. By Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. p. 252) the village (called by them Bethnabria, Bethnammaris) is said to have been still standing five miles north of Livas (Beth-haran). The Talmudists call it also Bethnînăm (בְּנַי נִנְרָה, comp. Targum on Num. xxxii. 3) or Beth-Ne'mer (בְּנָן נֵהֶר, "a panther-house," Pah. iv. 5; comp. Schwarz, p. 232). The name still survives in the Nabi-Ninîr, the Arab appellation of the lower end of the Wady Shoba, where the waters of that valley discharge themselves into the Jordan close to one of the regular fords a few miles above Jericho (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 355). It has been seen by Seetzen (Reisen, 1854, ii, 318) and Robinson (Researches, ii, 279), but does not appear to have been existent.
at which he arrived on the road. Dr. Robinson argues (Researches, i, 103) from the order of the names in these passages that Bethphage lay to the east of Bethany instead of westward, as the local tradition states; but his view has evidently been blasted by his arrangement of the gospel narrative at that point, by which he places this event on the way from Jericho instead of as late in Bethany as Strong's Harmony of the Gospels compared with Strong's Harmony and Exposition.

The name of Bethphage occurs often in the Talmud (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 1631); and the Jewish glossariists misread (see Hug, Einl. i, 18, 19) Lightfoot (Chorony, Cent. ch. xii) and Otho (Lex. Rab. p. 101 sq.) to regard it as a district extending from the foot of Bethany to the plain of Jericho and including the village of the same name (comp. Schwartz, Palest, p. 257). By Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.), and also by Origen (see Buschung, Harmonie d. Evang. p. 50), the place was known, though no indication of its position is given; they describe it as a village of the priests, possibly deriving the name from "Beth-phace," signifying in Syriac the "house of the jaw," as the jaw in the sacrifices was the portion of the priests (Rendel, p. 653). Schwartz (p. 263 sq.) appears to place Bethphage on the southern shoulder of the "Mount of Offence," above the village of Siloam, and therefore west of Bethany. No remains which can be connected with such a position have been found (Robinson, ii, 103), and the traditional site is above Bethany, half way between that village and the top of the mount (see Feustel, De Bethphage, Lips. 1866). Dr. Olin mentions (Trum., i, 257) having seen foundations of houses and a cistern hewn in the rock at that place. Dr. Barclay, however (City of the Great King, p. 66), identifies Bethphage with traces of foundations and cisterns on the rocky S.W. spur of Olivet, a few hundred yards to the south of the Jericho-Jerusalem road, between Bethany and the Kidron (comp. Stewart, Tent and Khan, p. 392). The name of Bethphage, the significance of which, as given above, is generally accepted, is, like those of Bethany, Capernaum, Bezaetha, and the Mount of Olivet itself, a testimony to the ancient fruitfulness of this district (Stanley, p. 187).

Beth-rapha (Heb. Beth Rapha, דֶּבֶת רַפָּה, נֶבֶת רָפָה, house of Rapha, or of the giant; Sept. Bathsepta v. r. Baasapha), a name occurring in the genealogy of Judah as apparently the eldest of the three sons of Edom, "men of Rechab" (1 Chron. iv, 12). B.C. post 1618. There is a Rapha in the line of Benjamin and elsewhere a connection exists between those and this, nor has the name been identified as belonging to any place.—Smith, s. v. See REPHEIM.

Beth-rechob (Heb. Beth-Rechab, דֶּבֶת רְכָב, נֶבֶת רֶכָּב, house of Rechab; Sept. σεβασίου Poioi [v. r. Pagoj] and Baasaphoa [v. r. Poioj, Baasapha, and even Taff], a place mentioned as having near it the valley in which lay the town of Lath or Dan (Judg. xviii, 28). It was one of the little kingdoms of Aram or Syria, like Zobah and Ish-tob, in company with which it was hired by the Ammonites to fight against David (2 Sam. x, 6). See ARAM. In ver. 8 the name occurs in the shorter form of Rechob, in which form it is doubtless again mentioned in Num. xiii, 21. Being, however, "far from Sidon" (Judg. xviii, 28), this place must not be confused with the town of the name of Rechah in the territory of Asher. See RETH. Robinson conjectures (Later Researches, p. 87) that this ancient place is represented by the modern Hivim, a fortress commanding the plain of the Huleh, in which the city of Dan (Tell el-Kady) lay. See CAESAREA-PHILIPPI.

Hadadezer, the king of Zobah, is said to be the son of Rechab (2 Sam. xvii, 12).—Smith.

Bethsaida (בְּשָׁפַּדְאָה, for the Aramaic בְּשֶׁפַדָא, בְּשֶׁפַדָא), Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 1894), a name which nearly all writers on Palestinian geology since Reland have assigned to two places, one to the west of each other, on the opposite shores of the head of Lake Tiberias (see Ramer, Palästina, p. 106) but which there appears to be no good reason for distinguishing from each other (see Thomson, Land a Book, ii, 81 sqq.).

AC, John i, 45) in Galilee (John xii, 21), apparently on the western side of the sea of Tiberias, being in "the land of Gennesaret" (q. v.), as yet toward the northern extremity of the lake (Mal. vi, 45). It was the native place of Peter, Andrew and Philip, and the frequent resort of Jesus (John i, 44; xii, 21, etc.). It was evidently in near neighborhood of Capernaum, as is seen from Mark vi, 57; and John vi, 16, and, if the interpretation of the name is to be trusted, close to the water's edge. By Jerome (Comm. in Exc. i, 1) and Eusebius (Onom.) these towns and Tiberias are all mentioned together as lying on the shore of the lake. Epiphanius (Cath. Hier. in loc. Biblical. Syn. I. of Bethsaida and Capernaum that they were not far apart. Wil- bald (A.D. 722) went from Magdala to Capernaum, thence to Bethsaida, and then to Chorazin. These ancient notices, however, though they fix its general situation, none of them contain any indication of its exact position, and as, like the other two towns just mentioned, these towns have perished, no positive identification can be made of it. It is true that Pococke (ii, 99) finds Bethsaida at Irbeh, Seetzen at Khan Minyeh (Zach's Mash. Corresp. xviii, 248); Nau at Mejdel (Voyage, p. 578); Qaresmus, ii, 860), apparently between Khan Minyeh and Mejdel; and others at Tababakh (so Robinson)—all different points on the western shore of the lake. The Christians of Nazareth and Tiberias are indeed acquainted with the name, as well as that of Capernaum, from the New Testament; and they have learned to apply them to different places according to the opinions of their monastic teachers or as may best suit their own convenience in answering the inquiries of travellers. It is thus that Dr. Robinson (Etabl. Researches, iii, 295) accounts for the fact that travellers have sometimes heard the names along the lake. Whenever this has not been the consequence of direct leading questions, which an Arab would always ask, the names have only been heard from the monks of Nazareth, or from the Arabs in a greater or less degree dependent upon them. The position of this Bethsaida mainly depends upon that of Capernaum, from which it was not far distant, to the north, on the shore (Robinson, new ed. of Researches, i, 360). If Capernaum is moved, then Bethsaida was probably at 'Ain el-Tebkah; but if (as on some accounts is more likely) Capernaum is to be located at 'Ain el-Mudawarah, then Bethsaida itself must be placed at Khan el-Minjeh; and in that case it may have sprung up as a restoration of the more ancient Canaerah, but nearer the shore.

See CAPERNAUM.

2. Christ fed the 5000 near to a city called Bethsaida (Luke i, 10); but it has been thought from the parallel passages (Matt. xiv, 18; Mark vi, 32-44) that this event took place, not in Galilee, but on the eastern side of the lake. This was held to be one of the chief signs of Christ's divinity in the sacred geography (Cran. Notii. Orig. ii, 636) till the ingenious Reland seemed to have afforded materials for a satisfactory solution of it by distinguishing two Bethsaidas, one on the western and the other on the north-eastern border of the lake (Palest. p. 635). The former was undoubtedly the "city of Peter;" and, although Mr. Robinson did not himself think that the other Bethsaida is mentioned in the New Testament, it has been thought by later writers to be more in agreement with the sacred text to conclude that it was the Bethsaida near which Christ fed the 5000, and also, probably, where the blind BETHSAIDA was restored to sight. This appears also to have been the Bethsaida of Gaulonitis, afterward called Julias, which Pilpay (Hist. Nat. v, 15) places on the eastern side of the lake and of the Jordan, and which Josephus describes as situated in Lower Gaulonitis, just above the entrance of the Jordan into the lake (War, ii, 9, 1; iii, 10, 7). It was originally only a village, called Bethsaida (Bybdis), but was rebuilt and enlarged after the birth of Christ, and received the name of Julias in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 2, 1). Philip seems to have made it his occasional residence; and here he died, and was buried in a costly tomb (Ant. xviii, 4, 6). At the northern end of the lake stood a town called Bethsaida Julias (Mark vi, 22, comp. with 10 and 27). (4.) Such a position readily reconciles the statements in the accounts of Christ recrossing the lake after both miracles of the loaves: (1.) In Mark vi, 32 (comp. John vi, 1), the passage was directly across the northern end of the lake from Capernaum to a retired spot on the shore somewhat S.E. of Bethsaida; thence the disciples started to cross merely the N.E. corner of the lake to Bethsaida itself (Mark vi, 45), but were driven by the head-wind during the night to a more southerly point, and thus reached Capernaum (John vi, 17, 21, 24), after having traversed the plain of Gennesareth (Matt. xiv, 34; John vi, 21). In Mark vi, 45, the phrase "the lake of Gennesareth" likewise directly across the upper portion of the lake, but in an opposite direction, from the Decapolis (ver. 31) to the vicinity of Magdala (Matt. xv, 38), thence along the shore and around the N.W. head of the lake to Bethsaida (Mark viii, 22), and so onwards to the scene of the transfiguration in the region of Caesarea-Philippi (Matt. xvi, 18). (3.) The position of et-Tell is too far from the shore to correspond with the notices of Bethsaida and Livias, which require a situation corresponding to that of the modern ruined village el-Araj, containing some vestiges of antiquity (Robinson, Researches, iii, 304), immediately east of the dewehbure of the Upper Jordan. (See Forger, Sitia desertorum Bethisrais, Lips. 1749.)

Beth-samous (Bosqamaw v. r. Baqisamaw), a place of which 42 inhabitants are stated to have returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 18); evidently the Beth-azmaveth (q. v.) of the genuine text (Neh. vii, 28; simply Azmaveth in Ezra ii, 24).

Beth-an (Bethaw), a Grecized form (1 Macc. v, 52; xii, 40; 41) of the name of the city Beth-shan (q. v.).

Beth-shan (Heb. Bethshaph), ḫeḇṱ ṯšān, Sept. Baqisamaw v. r. Baqisamaw), an abridged form (1 Sam. xxi, 10, 12; 2 Sam. xxii, 12) of the name of the city Beth-shan (q. v.).

Beth-šaphen (Heb. Bethshaphen), ḫeḇṱ ṣʰān, house of security: Sept. Baqisamaw, also [in 1 Kings iv, 12] Baqisamaw, and ḫeḇṱ ṣ̄āna, and [in Chron. viii. 29] Baqisamaw v. r. Baqisamaw; in Samuel Beth-shan, in the Apocalypse Beithshaphen, in Josephus Beisamaw or Baqisamaw; in the Talmud Beisamaw, יבשנה [but see also Yeb. 28a, a. p. 103b; in Step. Bev. 575c; in Onomasticon, Euseb. Basiaw, Jerome Bethsan; also according to Schwartz, Palaest. p. 148, note] in 1 Kings xiii, 39, the "ivory-house" of Solomon, יבשנה, Beith sheen, "house of the tooth; Sept. ḫeḇṱ ṣ̄ānaw, a city which, with its "daughter" towns, belonged to Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 29), though within the original limits of Issachar (Josh. xxvii. 11), and therefore of Jordan (comp. 1 Macc. v, 52). It was not subdued, however, by either tribe, but remained for a long time in the hands of the Canaanites and Philistines (Judg. i, 17). The corpses of Saul and his sons were fastened up to the wall of Bethshan by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi, 10, 12) in the open "street" or space (םבנ), which—then as now—form the gate of an Eastern town (2 Sam. xxii. 12). In Solomon's time it seems to have given its name to a district extending from the town itself to Abel-meholah; and "all Bethshean" was under the charge of one of his commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 12). From this time we lose sight of Bethshean till the period of the Maccabees, in connection with whose exploits it is mentioned more than once in the Hasmonean manner (1 Macc. v. 59; comp. 1 Macc. xii. 40, 41). Alexander Jannaeus had an interview here with Cleopatra (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 18, 8; Pompey marched through it on his way from Damascus to Jerusalem (ib. xiv. 8, 4); Gabinius fortified it (ib. xiv. 6, 5); and in the Jewish war was taken and slain by Scythopolitans (War, ii. 18, 8). It was 600 stadia from Jerusalem (2 Macc. xii. 29), 120 from Tibersias (Josephus, Life, 65), and 16 miles from Gadara (Sueton. Anton. c. 83, Ammian. Marc. xix. 12). In the Middle Ages the place had become desolate, although it still went by the name of Metropolis Palestinae veteris (Will. Tyr. p. 1704; Vitry, p. 1110). We find bishops of Scythopolis at the councils of Chalcedon, Jerusalem (A.D. 438), and others. During the Crusades it was an archbishopric, which was afterward transferred to Nazareth (Raumer's Palastina, p. 147-149).

Bethshean also bore the name of Scythopolis (Σκυθωπόλις) in the Roman period, perhaps because Scythians had settled there in the time of Josiah (B.C. 631), in their passage through Palestine to Egypt (Herod. i. 205; comp. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi, 16, 20; Georg. Syncellus, p. 214). This hypothesis is supported by 2 Macc. xii. 30, where mention is made of "the Jews who lived among the Scythians (Σκυθομανία) in (Bethshan)"; and by the Septuagint version of Judg. i. 27 (Беотраіα ἡ εἰς Σκυθωπολίς). In Judith ii. 2, the place is also called Scythopolis (Σκυθωπόλις), and so likewise by Josephus (Ant. v. 1, 22; xii. 8, 5; xiii. 6, 1) and others (Strabo, xvi. 763; Plut. Pompey, v. 13, 28). The supposition that these were descendants of the Scythians in Palestine (comp. Ezek. xxxix. 11) renders more intelligible Coloss. iii. 11, where the Scythian is named with the Jew and Greek; and it also explains why the ancient rabbin did not consider Scythopolis (Beisan) as a Jewish town (comp. Joseph. Life, 8), but as one of an unholy people (Havercamp, Observ. ad Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 22). On coins the place is called Scytopholis or Scythopolis (Pliny, v. 16, 23), of Pliny or Pallas and the panther (Eckhel, p. 438-440; comp. Reland, p. 993 sq.). As Succoth lay somewhere in the vicinity east of the Jordan, some would derive Scythopolis from Succoth (Reland, p. 992 sq.; Gesenius, in Burckhardt, p. 1053, German edit.). It has also, with, as it were, the same name, the same and Beth-shittim (Judg. vii. 22). Josephus does not acc.

Scythopolis as belonging to Samaria, in which it was located, but to Decapolis, which was chiefly on the other side of the river, and of which he calls it the largest town (War, iii. 9, 7). See SCYTOPIAS.

The ancient native name, as well as the town itself, still exists in the Beisan of the present day (Robinson, Researches, iii, 174). It stands on a rising ground somewhat above the valley of the Jordan, or in the valley of Jezreel where it opens into the Jordan valley. It is on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus, and close to the road on the south bank of the river of the Shephelah, from the southern end of Lake Gennesareth, and sixteen from Nazareth. The site of the town is on the brow of the descent by which the great plain of Esdraelon drops down to the level of the Ghôr. A few miles to the west are the mountains of Gilboa, and close to the town, on the south bank of the water of the Ain-falud, the fountain of which is in Jezreel, and is in all probability the spring by which the Israelites encamped before the battle in which Saul was killed (1 Sam. xxix. 1). Three other large brooks pass through or by the town; and in the fact of the abundance of water, and the exuberant fertility of the soil consequent thereon, as well as in the use of their chariots, which the level nature of a country near the town conferred on them (Josh. xvi. 16), resides the secret of the hold which the Canaanites retained on the place. So great was this fertility, that it was said by the rabbins that if Paradise were in a land of Israel, this would be it (B.C. 631); and fruits were the sweetest in all the land (see Litt. foot, Chor. Cent. 1x). If Jabesh-Gilead were where is Robinson conjectures—at Ed-Deir in Wady Yabis—the distance from thence to Beisan, which it took the men of Jabesh "all night" to traverse, cannot be much beyond twenty miles. The modern Beisan is a poor place containing not more than sixty houses. The inhabitants are Molems, and are described by Richardson and others as a set of inhospietable and lawless fanatics. The ruins of the ancient city are of considerable extent. It was built along the banks of the river which waters the town and in the valleys formed by its several branches, and must have been nearly three miles in circumference. The chief remains are large heaps of black hewn stones, with many foundations of houses and fragments of a few columns (Burckhardt, p. 243). The principal object is the theatre, which is quite distinct, but now completely filled up with earth. It is thirty feet in diameter, and has the singularity of possessing three oval recesses half way up the building, which are mentioned by Vitruvius as being constructed to contain the brass sounding-tubes. Few theatres had such an apparatus even in the time of this author, and those are scarcely ever met with now. The other remains are the tombs, which lie to the north-east of the Acropolis, without the walls. The sarcophagi still exist in some of them; triangular niches for lamps have also been observed in them; and some of the doors continue hanging on the ancient hinges of stone in remarkable preservation. Two streams run through the ruins of the city, almost insulating the Acropolis. There is a fine Roman bridge over the one to the south-west of the Acropolis, and beyond it may be seen the paved way which led to the ancient Potemelais, now Acra. The Acropolis is a high circular hill, on the top of which are traces of the walls which encompassed it (Robinson, Bib. Travels, p. 182, in J. R. S.; Robinson, Later Bib. Res. p. 329 sq.; Van de Velde, Narrative, ii, 308-368; Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 172 sq).

Beth-she'mesh (Heb. בֵּית שֵׁמֶשׁ, Bēth-shē'mesh, house of the sun; in pause Be'th-shē'mesh, Bēth-shē'mesh).—Sept. in Josh. xv. 10, πῶλος ἥλιον, elsewhere in Josh. and Judg. Bēthāsiam, in Sam. and Chron. Bēthāsiam, in Kings Bēthāsiam, in Jer. Ἱλωσίας; Josephus Bēthāsiam, Ant. vii, 1, 3), the name of four places. See HELIOPOLIS.

1. A sacerdotal city (Josh. xxi. 15, 1 Sam. vi. 15; 1 Chron. vi. 60) in the tribe of Dan, on the northern border (between Chisalon and Timnath) of Judah (Josh. xvi. 10), toward the land of the Philistines (1 Sam. vi, 9, 12), probably in a lowland plain (2 Kings xiv. 11), and placed by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Bēthāsiam, Baselhams) ten Roman miles from Ecletes, in the direction of the road to Nicopolis. The expression "went down" in Josh. xvi. 10; 1 Sam. vi. 21, seems to indicate that the position of the town was lower than that of Kirjath-jearim; and it is in accordance with the situation that there was a valley (πέδης) of corn-fields attached to the place (1 Sam. xvi. 15). It was a "suburb city" (Josh. xxi. 15, 1 Chron. vi, 66), and a city of refuge, and the inhabitants were permanent in their home under the charge of Ben-Decar (1 Kings iv. 9). It was the scene of an encounter between Jehoshah, king of Israel, and Amaziah, king of Judah, in which the latter was worsted and made prisoner (2 Kings xiv. 11, 18; 2 Chron. xvi. 11, 25).
Later, in the days of Ahaz, it was taken and occupied by the Philistines, together with several other places in this locality (2 Chron. xxviii, 18).

From Ekron to Beth-shemesh a road (תַּחַּת, ḫāqā) existed along which the Philistines sent back the ark by milk-kine after its calamitous residence in their country (1 Sam. vi., 9, 12); and it was in the field of this city that the Ark of the Lord (q. v.) was called "the great Abiezer" (whatever that may have been, prob. a stone, see Abiezer-) on which was the ark set down (1 Sam. vi., 18). On this occasion it was that, according to the present text, "five thousand and threescore and ten men" were miraculously slain for irreverently exploring the sacred shrine (1 Sam. vi., 19). This number has been mentioned much discussion (see Schram: De plagia Bethscheimiturba, Herb. 17,.). The numeral in the text has probably been erroneously seen. See ABBREVIATION. The Syriac and Arabic have 5070 instead of 5070, and this statement agrees with 1 Cod. Kennicott (comp. Gesenius, Gesch. der Hebr. Sprache, p. 174). Even with this reduction, for a provincial town like Beth-shemesh would still be great. We may therefore suppose that the number originally designated was 570 only, as the absence of any intermediate denomination between the first two digits would seem to indicate. The fact itself has been accounted for on natural principles by some German critics at a später time in that Beth-shemesh, which is older than that of Hebrew antiquity, and in which the miraculous part of the event has been explained away by ungrammatical interpretations. See NUMBER.

By comparison of the lists in Josh. xv, 10; xix, 41, 43, and 1 Kings iv, 9, it will be seen that in IN-SHEMESH (q. v.), "city of the sun," must have been identical with Beth-shemesh, it being probably the older form of the name; and again, from Judg. i, 35, it appears as if Har-cheres, "mount of the sun," were a third name for the same place, suggesting an early and extensive worship of the sun in this neighborhood.—Kitt. v. s.; Smith, s. v. See HEBERS.

Beth-shemesh is no doubt the modern Ain-shemas, found by Dr. Robinson in a position exactly according to the indications of Scripture, on the north-western slopes of the mountains of Judah—"a low plateau at the junction of two fine plains" (Later Researches, p. 158)—about two miles from the great Philistine plain, and seven from Ekron (Researches, iii, 17-20; comp. Schwarz, Palest. p. 98). It is a poor Arab village constructed of ancient materials. To the west of the village, upon and around the plateau of a low swell or mound, are the vestiges of a former extensive city, consisting of many foundations and the remains of ancient walls of hewn stone. With respect to the exchange of Beth for Ain, D. Robinson remarks (iii, 19): "The words Beis (Beth) and Ain are very common in the Arabic names of Palestine, that it can excite no wonder there should be an exchange, even without an obvious reason. In the same manner the ancient Beth-shemesh (Helipolis of Egypt) is known in Arabic writers as Ain-shemas" (see below). See BEITH-

2. A city near the southern border of Issachar, between Mount Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. xix, 22); probably the same with the present village Kaukab ("the star") el-Huswa (Schwarz, Palest. p. 167), which is also identical with the Betvair of the Crusaders (see Robinson: Researches, iii, 226).

3. One of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, named (Josh. xix, 33), in connection with Beth-shemesh, from neither of which places were the Canaanite inhabitants expelled, but became tributaries to Israel. Jerome's expression (Onom. Bethsmeas) in reference to this is perhaps worthy of notice, "in which the original inhabitants (cultores, i.e. worshippers) remained," possibly glancing at the worship from which the place derived its name. Keil (Comment on Josh. p. 440) confounds this place with the foregoing. M. De Saulcy suggests (Narratives, ii, 429) that it may have been identical with a village called Medjef elshamed, seen by him on the brow of a hill west of the road from Banias to Lake Phalas; it is laid down on Van de Velde's Map at 2½ miles north of the latter.

4. By this name is mentioned (Jer. xliii, 13) an isolated tower of the fortress Sitron, mentioned in the narrative of thespeech of Zypolos (q. v.) or On (Gen. xlii, 45). In the Middle Ages Heleopolis was still called by the Arabs Ain-Aishemesh, which is the modern name (Robinson: Researches, iii, 36). See AVEST; ON.

Beth-shemite (Heb. Beth shach-Shimshir), 117. Beth-shemite, s. v. A Heb. place-name, an inhabitant (1 Sam. vii., 14, 18) of the BETH-SHEMESHEM in Judas.

Beth-sit-tah (Heb. Beth shach-Shitshir), 117. Bethsitah, s. v. A place near the Jordan (comp. Josephus, who only names it as a "valley encompassed with torrents" Ant. v, 6, 5), apparently between Bethshean and Abel-shaphah, or at least between the vicinity of (Heb. toward) Zerarath, whither the flight of the Midianites extended after their defeat by Gideon in the valley of Edraelon (Judg. vii, 20); probably the village of Shuttah discovered by Robinson (Researches, iii, 219) south-east of Jebel Duby (Schwarz says, incorrectly, on the coast), Palest. p. 163, and east of Jessreel (De Saulcy, Dead Sea, li, 307); although this is west of Beth shean, and farther from the Jordan than we should expect. See SHITTIM.

Bethso (Beth so), a place mentioned by Josephus (War, v, 4, 2) as "so named" (εὐαλώκιον), through which the old wall of Jerusalem ran southward from the Gate Gomorrath around Mount Zion, and before reaching the Kedron near the Essenes. It is apparently for the Heb. בֵּיתסַעַ כֹּהִי, Beth-sah, house of dung, q. d. dunghill; probably from the adjoining Dunggate (q. v.), through which ordure seems to have been carried to the valley of Hinnom. Schwarz (Palest. p. 254) incorrectly locates it on the north-east part of the city. See JERUSALEM.

Bethshu (Beth so), a Gerecized form (1 Macc. iv, 29, 61; vi, 7, 26, 31, 40, 50; ix, 15, x, 61, xii, 4, 5; 2 Macc. xi, 5; xiii, 9, 22) of the BETH-SEMAH (q. v.) of Judith (Josh. xv, 59).

Beth-tappuah (Heb. Bith-tappu ah, Beth-tap puah), apple-house, i.e. orchard; Sept. Bēth-tappuah: a town of Judah, in the mountainous district, and near Hebron (Josh. xv, 62; comp. 1 Chron. xi, 43), where it has been discovered by Robinson (Researches, ii, 428) under the modern name of Tefjūah, 11 hour, about five miles, west of Hebron, on a ridge of high table-land. The terraces of the ancient cultivation still remain in use; and though the "apples" have disappeared, yet olive-groves and vineyards, with fields of cereals, form the principal soil (Schwarz, Palest. p. 106).—Smith, s. v. See APPLE.

The simple name of Tappuah was borne by another town of Judah, which lay in the rich lowland of the Shefela (Josh. xiv, 34). See TAPPAH. Also by one on the border between Manasseh and Ephraim (Josh. xvi, 9). See EN-TAPPAH.

Bethuel (Heb. Bethuel', בֵּיתוּל), the name of a man and also of a place.

1. (For בֵּיתוּל, individual of God [see METHOD]; Sept. Bēth'ulo, Josephus Bēth'uloa.) The son of Nahor by Milcah, nephew of Abraham, and father of Rebekah (Gen. xxii, 22, 23; xxv, 14, 24, 47; xxviii, 2). In xxv, 20, and xxviii, 5, he is called "Bethuel the Syrian" (i.e. Aramite). Though often referred to as above in the narrative of Rebekah's marriage, Bethuel only appears in person once (xxvi, 50), for her brother Laban takes the leading part in the transaction. Upon this an ingenious conjecture is raised by A. Coincidence, i., 4) that he was the subject of some imbecility or other incapacity. The Jewish tradition, as given in the Targum Ps.-Jonathan on Gen. xxiv, 65 (comp. 88), is that he died on the morning after his marriage, and that his servant's sending eaten a sauce containing poison at the meal the evening before, that on that account Laban requested that his sister's departure be delayed for a year or ten months. Josephus was perhaps aware of this tradition, since he speaks of Bethuel as dead (Ant. i., 16, 2). B.C. 2020.—Smith. See Statius.

2. For בְּתוּל, house of God; Sept. בְּתוּלָא, v. Bethuel. A southern city of Judah, i.e. Simeon (1 Chron. iv, 20), elsewhere (Josh. xix, 4) called Bethul (q. v.).

Bethul (Heb. בְּתוּל, בְּתוּלָא, contracted for Bethu-d; Sept. בְּתוּלָא v. בְּתוּלָא, a town of Simeon in the south, named with Eتل and Hormah (Josh. xix, 4). In the parallel lists in Josh. xv, 30, and 1 Chron. iv, 9, the name appears under the forms of BETHUL and BETHUEL, and probably also under that of BETHELEH in Josh. xii, 15. Calmet incorrectly supposes it to be also derived from the word BETHUL (v. 6). He has some what greater probability, however, in identifying it with the Bethelaha (בֵּית הלַחֶא) of which Sozonou speaks (Eccl. Hist. v, 15), as a town belonging to the inhabitants of Gaza, well-peopled, and having several temples remarkable for their structure and antiquity; particularly a panteon (or temple dedicated to all the gods), situated on an eminence made of earth, brought thither for the purpose, which commanded the whole city. He conjectures that it was named (house of God) from this temple. Jerome (Vita S. Hilarioum, p. 84) alludes to the same place (Betalas); and it is perhaps the episcopal city Betulam (בֵּיתルー), and Poestaeum, p. 639). There is a BeJul far east a little south of the road from Jerusalem towards Gaza (Robinson's Rea. li, 342 note), about seven miles N.W. of Hebron (Van de Velde's Map); but this is entirely too far north for the region indicated, which requires a location in the extreme S.W., possibly at the present water-pits caUed El-Hisna (Clavijo, i, 229), or just south of them, and four miles south of Beersheba (Van de Velde, Map). According to Schwartz (Palest. p. 113), it is identical with a hill (Jebel Hazeiy, Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 295) S.W. of Eleutheropolis, which he says is still called Bethulaha; but this lacks confirmation, and is also too far north.

Bethul (or rather Bithon, Bitholos, for the Heb. בְּתוּל, בְּתוּלָא, Simonia, Nom. T. p. 41) or בְּתוּלָא (house of God Johova), a place mentioned only in the apocryphal book of Judith (iv, 6; vi, 10, 11, 14; vii, i, 3, 6, 18, 20; viii, 5, 11; x, 6, vi, 19; xii, 7, xiii, 10; xv, 3, 6; xvi, 21, 23), of which it was the principal scene, and where its position is minutely described. It was near Dothan (iv, 6), on a hill which overlooked (ואנה) the plain of Esdraelon (vi, 11, 13, 14; vii, 7, 10; xii, 10), and commanded the passes from that plain to the hill country of Manasseh (iv, 7, iii, 3), in a position so strong that Dr. Holofemes abandoned the idea of taking it by attack, and determined to reduce it by possessing himself of the two springs or wells (מַיִי) which were "under the city," in the valley at the foot of the eminence on which it was built, and from which the inhabitants derived their chief supply of water (vi, 11; vii, 7, 13, 21). Notwithstanding this disadvantage, the identification of the site of Bethulia has hitherto been so great a puzzle as to form an important argument against the historical truth of the book of Judith (see Cellaril. Notit. iii, 13, 4). See Judith. In the Middle Ages the name of Bethulia was given to "the Frank Mountain," between Bethlehem and Jerusalem (Robinson, li, 127), but this is very much too far to the south to suit the narrative. Modern tradition has assumed it to be Safed in North Galilee (Robinson, iii, 152), which again, if in other respects it would agree with the story, is too far north. Von Raumner (Polier, p. 130) suggests Samir, which is perhaps nearer to the probable site of Bethulia (q. v.), which is probably meant by the Dothan of Judith (see Schubert, iii, 161; Stewart, p. 421; Van de Velde, Narrative, i, 367). The ruins of that town are on an "isolated rocky hill," with a plain of considerable extent to the east, and, so far as situation is considered, extremely well suited but impracticable (Robinson, iii, 325). It is about three miles from Dothan, and some six or seven from Jenin (Engannim), which stand on the very edge of the great plain of Esdraelon. Though not absolutely commanding the pass which leads from Jenin to Sebaste, and forms the only practicable ascent to the high country, it is yet sufficiently near to bear out the somewhat vague statement of Judith iv, 6. Nor is it unimportant to remember that Sanur actually endured a siege of two months from Dzejzor Pasha without yielding, and that on a subsequent occasion it was only taken after a three or four months' investment by a force very much out of proportion to the place and situation. On the other hand, Dr. Robinson, p. 357, with his usual pertinacity, disputes this conclusion. See Beth-Lephthah.

Bethune, George W., D.D., a Reformed Dutch minister and eminent orator, was born in New York City, March 18, 1803. His father, Divie Bethune, was an eminent merchant, noted for his piety and philanthropy. His mother was the daughter of Isabella Graham (q. v.), whose saintly virtues she inherited. After an academical education in New York, he pursued his collegiate studies at Dickinson College, Carlisle, and Mivard, and was a student of journalism, at that time under the personal guidance of Dr. Maxwel. After graduating he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton in 1822. In 1825 he was licensed by the New York Presbytery, and ordained to the ministry. After serving a year as naval chaplain at Savannah, he accepted the pastoral charge of the Reformed Protestant Dutch church at Rhinebeck, which he held until 1830, when he was called to Utica; from there he went to Philadelphia (1834) as pastor of the Crown Street church. He resigned his charge in the latter city in 1849, and removed to Brooklyn, where a new church was built expressly for him, and in which he ministered until 1859, when illness compelled him to resign, and spend one year in Europe. On his return he became associate pastor of Dr. Van Nest's church in New York, but, his strength continuing to decline, he was again compelled to go to Europe in search of health. On this tour he died at Florence, Italy, April 27, 1862, of congestion of the brain. Bethune was one of the leading men of the Reformed Dutch church, which shared his sympathies and labors, but, in particular, he devoted himself to the service of the Board of Publication. He was of opinion that a sound religious literature, doctrinal as well as practical, was needed, and must be brought down to the means of the masses. To do this, however, the societies which could not publish, should be prepared and issued. To show his interest in this work, he made over to the board several of his own works of high character. Though always a conservative in politics, he was a determined opponent of slavery, and it was primarily due to him that the General Synod declined receiving Beth-zechariah. See Bath-Zacharias.

Beth-'zur (Heb. Bith-Yehur, יִבְּתֵי-יְהוּד, house of the rock; Sept. Βηθσορώ, in 2 Chron. Βησσορώ, in 1 Chron. v. Βῆσσωροι; Apocrypha and Josephus Βησσορα, a town in the mountains of Judah, named between Halful and Gedor (Josh. xv. 58). So far as any interpretation can, in their present imperfect state, be made of the genealogical chron. 42-49, Beth-zur would appear from verse 45 to have been founded by the people of Maon, which again had derived its origin from Hebron. However this may be, Beth-zur was "built," i.e. probably fortified, by Rehoboam, with other towns of Judah, for the defence of his new kingdom (2 Chron. xiii. 13). After the capture the people of Beth-zur assisted Nebuchadnezzar in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 16). the place had a "ruler" (חָשֵׁב), and the peculiar word פֶלֶק (פִּלֶּק) is employed to denote a district or circle attached to it, and to some other of the cities mentioned here. See Topographical Terms. In the wars of the Maccabees, Beth-zur or Beth-auru (then not a large town, πολιτικος, Joseph. War, i. 1, 4) played an important part as a "stronghold," i.e. the strongest part (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 3, 6), having been fortified by Judas and his brethren "that the people might have a defence against Idumeas," and they succeeded in making it "very strong, and not to be taken without great difficulty" (Josephus, Ant. xii, 3, 4); so much so that it was able to resist for a length of time the attacks of Simon Mac. (1 Macc. i. 63) and of Lysias (2 Macc. ii. 5), the garrison having in the former case capitulated. Before Beth-zur took place one of the earliest victories of Judas over Lysias (1 Macc. iv. 29), and it was in an attempt to relieve it when besieged by Antiochus Eupator that he was defeated in the passes behind Hebron, containing a certain "foot of a hill, said to be that where Philip baptized the officer of queen Candace. The distance of five stadia from Jerusalem in 2 Macc. i. 5, is too small (Callari Novi, ii. 565). The traditional Beth-zur of the Crusaders, near Bethlehem, where the fountain of St. Philip is pointed out (Cotovio, p. 247; Pococke, ii. 67; Maudrell, p. 116), cannot be the real place, for Esau- bis places it much more to the south, and is in this supported by its history, which shows that it lay on what was the southern border of the Jordan in the time of the Maccabees, when the Idumaeans had taken possession of the southernmost part of the country and made Hebron their chief town. In those times, indeed, Beth-zur of the Maccabees appears as one of the most distinguished ornaments of the American puppet. It was exceedingly effective, and always popular on the platform and before a leucyten; but the place in which, above all others, he loved to appear, was the puppet, and the scenes on which he delighted to expatiate were, as a rule, marks of the history of Scotland and Holland. As a writer he was luminous and vigorous, with a rare grace of style. His theological acquirements were large and solid, and his general culture rich and varied. As a belles-lettres scholar he had few superiors. Himself a poet, he had rare critical taste, as was shown in his British Female Poets, with Biographical and Critical Notices. He also edited Walton's Complete Angler with a loving devotion. His works also include Lays of Love and Faith (12mo); Early Lost, Early Saved (Phila. 18mo); History of a Peninsula (18mo); Fruits of the Spirit (Phila. 1860); Sermonas (Phila. 1860). Bettelius, a German pastor, noted for fervent piety in a time of spiritual declension, was born in Berlin 1601, studied at Wittenberg, and was pastor of the village of Linum for 80 years. He died 1683. He was one of the few German pastors of his time (before the rise of Pietism [q. v.]) who preached and enjoyed a deep religious life. His favorite ejaculation was, "Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." He published Christianismus Ethicus (Berlin, 1683).—Mysticum crucis (Berlin, 1683).—Sacerdotium, i. e. N. T. Kingly Priesthood (Berlin, 1684, 4to).—Meine Chris- tianismen und Missions-Germany (Measure of the Chris- tianity and Missions of Germany by the standard of the German standard; Berlin, 1684, 6th ed.).—Antichristentum (Amst. 1650).—Irenicum, seu fortitudo pacis (Amst. 1670).—Eccidium Germanicum (Amst. 1676). He charged the religion of his age as being anti-Christian, partly from the faults and negligence of the pastors, and partly from the preaching of justification as if there were no sanctification. He was, Real Encyclopædia, ii. 123.

is near Dothaim" (Judith iv, 6), and in the vicinity of "Bebai, Chobai, and Cola, in the coasts of Israel" (xx, 4). From the manner of its mention, it would seem to have been of equal importance with Bethulia (q. v.) itself; but it is doubtful whether it indicates any historical locality whatever. See JUDITH.

Bet'onim (Heb. Betonim, בֵּית אוֹמִים, piastachio-nuts [comp. the betain, Gen. xiii, 11, and the Arabic batim = "a great number", in the tribe of Gad, mentioned in connection with Ramath-mizpeh and Mahanaim (Josh. xiii, 26), probably identical with a ruined village Batnach (Robinson, Researches, iii, Append. p. 169).) Betray (παραδίδωμι), a term used especially of the act of Judas in delivering up his Master to the Jews (Matt. x, 4; xxvii, 4, etc.). See JUDAS. Monographs on several circumstances of the transaction have been written by Cracknawitz (Rost. 1709), Oeder (in his Miscell. Sacr. p. 505-20), Opitius (Kilon. 1710), Sommel (Lund. 1796), Gurllitt (Hamb. 1805).

Betroth (properly גבר, גברת, μνηστικον). A man and woman were betrothed or espoused, each to the other, when they were engaged to be married. See ENGAGE. Among the Hebrews this relation was usually determined by the parents or brothers, without consulting the parties until they came to be betrothed. The engagement took place very early, as is still the case in Oriental countries, though it was not consummated by actual marriage until the spouse was at least twelve years of age. The betrothling was performed a twelvemonth or more before the marriage, either in writing, or by a piece of silver given to the espoused before witnesses, as a pledge of their mutual engagements. Sometimes a regular contract was made, in which the bridegroom always bound himself to give a certain sum as a portion to his bride. From the time of betrothal, however, the woman was considered as the lawful wife of the man to whom she was betrothed; the engagement could not be ended by the man without a bill of divorce; nor could she be unfaithful without being considered an adulteress. Thus Mary, after she was betrothed to Joseph, might, according to the rigor of the law, have been punished if the angel of the Lord had not appeared to Joseph, and explained the mystery of the incarnation (Deut. xxviii, 8; Judg. xiv. 2, 8; Matt. i, 18-21). Be'l'lah (Heb. Bethlaih, בֶּית לֵה, married; Sept. paraphrases αἰνοῦμι) occurs in Isa. lxii, 4, metaphorically of Jeshua, as of a land desolated, but again filled with inhabitants, when "the land shall be married (בָּנים)," referring to the return from Babylon; or it may be applied to the Jewish Church to denote the intimacy of its relation to God.

Be'van, Joseph Guernsey, one of the ablest writers of the Society of Friends. He is the author of a number of theological works, among which the following are the most important: 1. A Refutation of some of the most modern Misrepresentations of the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, with a Life of James Nagger (London, 1820). 2. The Line of the World's End (London, 1807). The latter work is highly recommended in Horne's Introduction, and the geographical notes are said to stamp a real value on the book.

The latter work is directed against the objections of the editors of the Unitarian version of the New Testament.

Beveridge. The ordinary drink of the Jews was water, which was drawn from the public wells and fountains (John iv, 6, 7), and which was to be refused to no man (Matt. xxv, 45). Water also was the usual beverage of the Egyptians. Modern travellers attest that the water of the Nile, after it has been deposited in jars to settle, is particularly wholesome and pleasant, and is drunk in large quantities; while that from the few wells which are to be met with in that country is seldom palatable, being unpleasant and insalubrious. When the modern inhabitants of Egypt desire refreshment for any time, they speak of nothing but the pleasure they shall find on their return in drinking the water of the Nile. The knowledge of this circumstance gives a peculiar energy to the words of Moses, when he announced to Pharaoh that the waters of the Nile should boil, even in the midst of the swimming vessels; and that the Egyptians should "lose the drink of the water of the river" (Exod. vii, 17-19); that is, they should lose the drink of that water which they used to prefer and so eagerly to long for. The common people among the Mohammedans drink water, the more noble drink a kind of a胡夢卜, which was formerly used in Egypt (Gen. xli, 11), where something like our ale or beer, termed barley-wine, was also used, though probably not so far back as the time of Moses. The strong drink, מים, sheker, or sikhara, of Luke i, 15, mentioned Levit. x, 9, means any sort of fermented liquors, whether prepared from corn, dates, apples, or any other kind of fruits and roots. The people of Canaan drank wine of different sorts, which was preserved in skins. Red wine seems to have been the most esteemed (Prov. xxxii, 8). In the time of Solomon spiced wines were used, mingled with the juice of the pomegranate (Cantic, viii, 2), and also with myrrh. Wine was also diluted with water, which was given to the buyer instead of good wine, and was consequently used figuratively for any kind of adulteration (Isa. i, 29). Wine in the East was frequently diluted after it was bought, as may be inferred from two Arabic verbs, which still remain to indicate its dilution. From the pure wine there was made an artificial drink, מְבַקְשׁ, chamosa', which was taken at meals with vegetables and bread. It was also a common drink with the Romans (Num. vi, 8), and was used by the Roman soldiers (Matt. xxvii, 48). Medicinal wines, it seems, were given to those who were to be crucified, in order to blunt the edge of pain and lessen the acuteness of sensibility, which may explain the passage in Matthew xxvii, 34. See WINE.

The vessels used for drinking among the Jews were at first cups. Bowls were afterward used only for the purpose of performing the ceremony of anointing. The other drinking vessels were cups and bowls. See CUP. The cup was of brass covered with tin, in form resembling a lily, though sometimes circular; it is used by travellers to this day, and may be seen in both shapes on the ruins of Persepolis. The bowl in form generally resembled a lily (Exod. xxxv, 33), although it may have varied, for it had many names. Some had no cover, and were probably of a circular shape, as the Hebrew names seem to indicate. Bowls of this kind which belonged to the rich were, in the time of Moses, made of silver and gold, so speaks from Num. vii, 84. The larger vessels from which wine was poured out into cups were called urns, bottles, small bottles, and a bottle of shell, מים, קדש, with a small orifice. —Jahn, Archaeology, §144. See DRINK.

Beveridge, Thomas H., a Presbyterian divine, was born in March, 1830. He was the eldest son of Dr. Thomas Beveridge, professor in the Theological Seminary of the United Presbyterian Church in Xenia, Ohio. He graduated at Jefferson College, and was ordained to the ministry in 1853 by the Associate Presbytery of Philadelphia, and in Dec. 1854, installed pastor of the Third Associate Congregations of Philadelphia. He was clerk of his presbytery from the time of his ordination, assistant clerk of the general assemblies of the United Presbyterian Church in 1859 and 1860, a member of the Board of Foreign Missions of his denomination, as also of the executive committee of the Presbyterian Historical Society. He was a man of fine literary attainments, and for several years the able editor of the Evangelical Repository, a United Presbyterian monthly. He died suddenly of congestion of the brain, Aug. 15, 1860. See Evangelical Repository, Sept. 1860.
BEVERIDGE

Beveridge, William, D.D., bishop of St. Asaph, was born at Barrow, Leicestershire, in 1868. He was educated at Oakham, and entered the College of St. John's, Cambridge, in 1875. He was not ordained until after the Restoration, an interval during which he probably employed in the investigation of the subject to which the temper and tumult of the times directed so many others—the primitive records and history of the Church. He applied himself in the first instance to the Oriental languages; and his first publication, when he was only twenty years of age, was an essay entitled De Linguarum Orientalium, etc., presented to the Lond. Grammar Soc. (1858, again in 1864, 8vo). In 1861 he was appointed to the vicarage of Ealing, and in 1872 to the living of St. Peter's, Cornhill. In 1869 he published Institut. Chronol. libri duo (Lond. 1869, 4to). In 1873 he was made archdeacon of Chester, and in 1891 he was offered the see of Bath and Wells, from which Ken had been expelled by the government. This see Beveridge refused; but in 1704 he accepted that of St. Asaph, which he held till his death, March 5th, 1708. In every ecclesiastical station which he held he exhibited all the qualifications and virtues which ought to distinguish an ecclesiastic. He was a man of a very religious mind, and has been styled "the great reviver and restorer of primitive piety." His profound erudition is sufficiently evidenced by his works, which include, besides those named above, 4 vols. Novelae sive Pandectae Canonum SS. Apostolorum et Conciliorum, necnon Novocomum SS. Postrum episcoporum, cum schola (Oxf. 1672, 2 vols. fol.). Vol. i. contains the Prolegomena, canons apostolical, and those of the ancient councils, together with the Commentaries of Balsamon, Zonaras, and Aristenes, in Greek and Latin, in double columns; the Arabic paraphrase of Joseph the Egyptian on the first four councils, and a translation by Beveridge. Vol. ii. contains the Canons of Dionysius, Peter of Alexandria, St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. Athanasius, St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, together with the Scholia of the Greek Canonists, the Synagoga of Matthew Blasius, and the works of Pachymer, etc. of Beveridge:—1. Codex Canonum Excl. Primitiae vindicatus (Oxf. 1678):—2. An Exegesis of the Church Councils (5th ed. 1714, 12mo):—3. Pecvete Thoughts (Lond. 1709: written in his youth, but not printed until after his death):—4. Sermons (2 vols. 1720); and besides many other editions, in 1847, Oxf. 8vo:—5. Theocurus Theologicus (Lond. 1711, 4 vols. 8vo):—6. Theocurus Theologicus (Lond. 1711, 4 vols. 8vo). His writings were collected into a new edition by T. Hartwell Horne (Lond. 1854, 9 vols. 8vo), also in a more complete edition in the "Anglo-Catholic Library" (Oxf. 1844-1848, 12 vols. 8vo).

Bexley, Lord (Nicholas Vansittart), was the son of Henry Vansittart, Esq., governor of Bengal. He was born April 29, 1766, was educated at Oxford, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1791. He entered Parliament for Hastings in 1798. In 1801 he was sent to Denmark as minister plenipotentiary, and after his return he was appointed secretary of the treasury in Ireland, and in 1805 secretary to the lord lieutenant, and also a member of the Privy Council. He was chancellor of the exchequer under Lord Liverpool until January, 1828, when he was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord Bexley, of Bexley, Kent. Lord Bexley was a constant supporter of many of the institutions of our age. He was a liberal contributor to the Religious Tract Society, and his services to the British and Foreign Bible Society, especially amid its early difficulties, were of pre-eminent value. On the decease of Lord Teignmouth, February, 1834, he was chosen by the unanimous vote of the committees of the British Bible Society, an office which he held until his death in 1856, giving constant vigilance to the interests of the institution. A few weeks before his decease he presented to it a donation of £2000.—Timpson, Bible Trumps, p. 379.

Beyond. The phrase "beyond Jordan" (צֶֽלֶשׁ, צֶֽלֶשׁ, פָּרַס וּרְודָוֵ֫הָ֖ז) frequently occurs in the Scriptures, and to ascertain its meaning we must, of course, attend to the situation of the writer (see Kuhl, Comment in John i, 29). With Moses it usually signifies the country on the western side of the river, and he wrote upon its eastern bank (Gen. i, 10, 11; Deut. i, 15; ii, 8, 9, 46); but with Joshua, after he had crossed the river, it means the reverse (Josh. i, 1; xii, 7; xxii, 7). In Matt. iv, 15, it means "by the side of the Jordan." See Atad.

Beza (Théodore de Bèze), one of the most eminent of the Reformers, the friend and coadjutor of Calvin, was born at Vezelay, in the Nièvre, June 24, 1519. He passed the first years of his life with his uncle, Nicholas de Beza, counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, who sent him, before he was ten years old, to study at Orleans, where his preceptor was Melchior Woomar, a convert to Protestantism. Beza accompanied Woomar to the University of Bourges, and remained, in the wake of several others under his tutelage. During this time he became an excellent scholar, and he afterward acknowledged a deeper obligation to his tutor for having "imbued him with the knowledge of true piety, drawn from the limpid fountain of the Word of God." In 1538 Woomar returned to Germany, and Beza repaired to Orleans to study law; but his attention was chiefly devoted to the classics and the composition of verses. His verses, published in 1548, under the title Jenificia, were chiefly written during this period of his life, and their indecency caused him many a bitter pang in after life. Beza obtained his degree as licentiate of civil law in 1539, upon which he went to Paris, where he spent nine years. He was young, handsome, and of ample means; for, though not in the priesthood, he enjoyed the proceeds of two good benefices, amounting, he says, to 700 golden crowns a year. The death of brother added to his income, and an uncle, who willed Froidmont, expressed an intention of resigning that prebendum, valued at 15,000 livres yearly. Thus, in a city like Paris, he was exposed to strong temptation, and his conduct incurred grave censure. That his life was grossly immoral he denies; but he formed a private marriage with a woman of bad repute, he says, inferior to his own. He was to marry her publicly as soon as the obstacles should be removed, and in the mean time, not to take orders, a thing expressly forbidden by his confessor. But his relations pressed him to enter into the Church; his wife and her conscience made him vow his marriage, and his real belief; his inclination made him conceal both and stick to the rich benefices which he enjoyed; and in this divided state of mind he remained till illness brought him to a better temper. On his recovery he fled to Geneva, at the end of October, 1546, and there publicly solemnized his marriage and avowed his faith. After a short residence at Geneva, and subsequently at Tübingen, Beza was appointed Greek professor at Lausanne. During his residence there he took every opportunity of going to Geneva to hear Calvin, whose sermons were, he says, complete in Marot's translation of the Psalms into French. Marot had translated 50, so that 100 Psalms remained: these were first printed in France, with the royal license, in 1561. Beza, at this time, employed his pen in support of the right of purchasing heresy by the civil power. His work De Hereticis, De Magistratus, De Miseria Praelati, De Magistratus Punicae is a defence of the execution of Servetus at Geneva in 1553. Beza was not singular in maintaining this doctrine; the principal churches of Switzerland, and even Melancthon, concurred in justifying by their authority that act which has been so fruitful of reproach upon its perpetrators by whom it was perpetrated. His work De Jure Magnatuum, published at a later time in his life (about 1572), presents a curious contrast to the work De Hereticis, etc. In this later work he asserted the principles of civil and religious liberty, and the rights of conscience; but, though he may be considered as before most men of his age in the boldness of his opinions as to the nature of civil authority, his views of the sovereign power are confused and contradictory. During his residence at Lausanne, Beza published several controversial treatises, which his biographer, Antoine la Faye, confesses to have been written with a freer pen than was consistent with the gravity of the subject. One part of Beza's life belongs to the translation of the N. T. into Latin, completed in 1557, and printed at Paris by R. Stephens in 1557. It contains the commentary of Camerarius, as well as a copious body of notes by the translator himself. For this edition he used a manuscript of the four Gospels, which in 1581 he gave to the University of Cambridge. It is generally known as Beza's Codex, and a face-simile edition of it was published in 1783. After ten years' residence at Lausanne, Beza removed to Geneva in 1559, and entered into holy orders. At Calvin's request he was appointed to assist in giving lectures in theology; and when the University of Geneva was founded he was appointed rector upon Calvin declining that office. At the request of some among the French Protestants, he undertook a journey to Nérac in hope of winning the King of Navarre to Protestantism. His pleading was successful, and he remained at Nérac until the beginning of 1561, and, at the King's request, attended the Conference of Poissy, opened in Aug. of that year, with the object of effecting a reconciliation between the Catholic and Protestant churches of France. Beza was the chief speaker on behalf of the French churches. He managed his cause with temper and ability, and made a favorable impression on both Catherine of Medicis and Cardinal Lorraine, who said, "I could well have wished either that this man had been dumb or that we had been Catherine requested him to remain in France on the plea that his presence would tend to maintain tranquillity, and that his native country had the best title to his services. He consented, and after the promulgation of the edict of January, 1662, often preached publicly in the suburbs of Paris. He soon after greatly disappointed the expectations of the Romanists and Protestants divines to discuss the subject of images. In a memorial to the queen, he discussed the question with a force and vigor never surpassed. "In reply to the customary argument that honor is due to the image, the issue has not yet been answered why then is any local superiority admitted? Why is one image considered more holy and more potent than another? Why are pilgrimages made to distant images, when there are others, perhaps of better workmanship, near at hand? Again, is it tolerable that in a Christian Church an image of the Virgin Mary should be addressed in terms appropriate solely to the Almighty Father, "omnis nos omnium"? If the Virgin were yet alive and on earth, how would the humility and lowliness of heart, which she ever so conspicuously evinced, bear up the insolence of those who implored her supposed maternal authority over her blessed Son: "Rega Patrem, jube Naturam!" "Jure Matris impera!" Then, advertising to the reputed miracles performed by images, he contended that, by the evidence of judicial inquiries, most of them had been indisputably proved impostures; and even with regard to such as remained undetected, it was detracting honor from God, the sole author of miracles, to attribute any hidden virtue or mystic efficacy to wood or stone. Passing on to a review of the long controversy about images maintained in the Greek Church, he concluded by affirming that not less idolatry might be occasioned by images than by images themselves. The propositions appended to this document were that images should be altogether abolished; or, if that measure were thought too sweeping, that the king would consent to the removal of all representations of the Trinity or its separate Personages; of all images which were indecorous, as for the most part the representations of them, such as were profane, as those of beasts and many others, produced by the fantastic humors of artists; of all publicly exhibited in the streets, or so placed at altars that they might receive superstitious veneration; that no offerings or pilgrimages should be made to them; and finally, as a concession, he would, so that the only representation of the passion of our Lord might be that lively portrait engraved on our hearts by the word of Holy Scripture.

"Beza had converted the king of Navarre so far as to make him a partisan of Calvinism; but the royal convert remained as profligate when a Calvinist as he had been when he professed Romanism, and the court soon found means to bring him back once more to the established church. His hostility to Beza was shown at an audience Beza had with the queen-mother, when deputed by the Huguenot ministers to lay their complaint before her with reference to the violations which had occurred of the edict of January, to which allusion has been made before. The king of Navarre, sterner regarding Beza, accused the Huguenots of now attending worship with arms. Beza replied that arms, when borne by men of discretion, were the surest guarantee of peace; and that, since the transactions at Vassy (where were a place between the retainers of the duke of Guise and a Huguenot capitaine, the duke's people being the aggressors), their adoption had become necessary till the church should receive a surer protection—a protection which he humbly requested, in the name of those brethren who had hitherto placed so great dependence on his majesty. The cardinal of Ferrara here interrupted him by some incorrect representation of the tumult at St. Medard, but he was silenced by Beza, who spoke of those occurrences as an eye-witness, and then reverted to the menacing advance of the duke of Guise upon Paris. The king of Navarre declared with warmth that whoever should touch the little finger of his brother, the duke of Guise, would touch his own body. Beza replied with gentleness, but with dignity; he implored the king of Navarre to listen patiently, reminded him of their long intercourse, and of the special invitation from his majesty in consequence of which he had returned to France in the hope of assisting in the establishment of Protestantism. "It belongs, in truth, to the church of God, in the name of which I address you, to suffer blows, not to strike at them. But at the same time I set it as my pleasure to remember that the church is an entity which has wrought out many a hammer. Well would it have been if Beza and his partisans had always remembered this, and, instead of taking up arms to defend their cause, had maintained it like the primitive Christians by patient suffering. Perhaps they would then have led to the gradual reformation of the Church of France, whereas now they took the sword, and perished by the sword. Each party armed. With the leaders of the Huguenots, he was kept by the prince of Condé near his person; but the leaders, for the most part, abstained from encouraging the cruelties of their followers, although they excited the people to rise up in arms against the government. Beza continued with the insurgents, following the prince of Condé in all his marches, cheering him by his letters when in prison, and reanimating the Huguenots in their defeats, until his career as a herald of war was terminated by the battle of Dreux. At that battle, fought on the 19th of December, 1662, in which the Huguenots were defeated, Beza was present; but he did not engage in the battle; he was merely at hand to advise his friends.

"In the following February the duke of Guise, the lieutenant general of the kingdom, was assassinated before Orleans. When the assassin was seized, he accused Beza, among other leading Huguenots, as having been privy to his design. Beza declared that, notwithstanding the great number of people aroused against the duke of Guise on account of the massacre at Vassy, he had never entertained an opinion that he should be proceeded against otherwise than by the methods of ordinary justice. He admitted that since the duke had commenced the war, he had exhorted the Huguenots from both hands, so that the only representation of the passion of our Lord might be that lively portrait engraved on our hearts by the word of Holy Scripture.

After the peace of 1668, Beza returned to Geneva, and in 1664, upon the death of Calvin, was called to succeed to all his offices. Beza did not return to France till 1588, when he repaired to Veziere on some family business. He visited his native country again to attend and preside over a Huguenot synod which assembled at La Rochelle in 1571. Never had any Huguenot ecclesiastical meeting been attended by so many distinguished persons as gathered under the presidency of the deputies who were members of the Church of God. At this assembly the Huguenot confession of faith was confirmed, and two copies of it were taken, one of which was deposited at Rochelle, the other in the archives of Geneva. After the execrable massacre of St. Bartholomew's Eve, Beza honorably exerted himself self to support those of the French whom the fear of death drove from their native land; he interested in their behalf the princes of Germany. He also founded a French hospital at Geneva.

In 1572 he assisted at an assembly of the Huguenots at Nîmes, where he opposed John Morel, who desired to introduce a new discipline. The prince of Condé forbade him to come to Strasbourg in the year 1574, to send him to prince John Casimir, administrator of the palatinate. In 1588 he was employed in the campaign of Montbéliard against John Andreas, a divine of Tübingen. He died at the age of eighty-six, October 19th, 1605. Among his numerous works we may mention:—1. Commentaire, f. 1570.—2. Histoire Ecclésiastique des Eglises Réformées du royaume de France, from 1521 to 1568, 3 vols. 8vo.—3. Icones virorum illustrium (1580, 4to).—4. Traictato de religio et divinitu, accesit tractatus de polygenia (Geneva, 1599, 8vo).—5. Novum D. N. Jesu Christi Testamentum (often reprinted).—6. Annotationes ad Novum Testamentum (best edition that of Cambridge, 1645, fol.).

Beza was a man of extraordinary quickness and fertility of intellect, as well as of profound and varied learning. His life has been often written, e. g. by Bolzec (Paris, 1577); Taittelped (Paris, 1577); Ziegenhein (Hamb. 1789); Schlosser (Heidelberg, 1805); the former of the two last elaborates is Theodor Beza's hand-schriftlichen und anderen gleichzeitigen Quellen, by Professor Baum, of Strasburg (1848-1851, 2 vols.), but it only extends to 1563. See also Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 292-284. Perhaps no one of the reformers has been more fully and constantly calumniated by the Romanists than Beza.

Beza took a lively interest in the affairs of the Church of England, and his letters were (and still are) very unpalatable to the High-Church party there. Dr. Hook quotes largely from his letters to Bullinger and Grindal to prove that Beza "regarded the Church of England in Elizabeth's time as Popish." In his letter to Grindal, dated June 27, 1586, he complains that he has heard of "divers ministers discharged their parishes by the queen, the bishops consenting, because they refused to subscribe to certain new rites; and that the sum of the queen's commands were, to admit again not only those garments, the signs of Beza's principles, but also certain rites, which also were degenerated into the worst superstitions—as the signing with the cross, kneeling in the communion, and such like; and, which was still worse, that women should baptize, and that the queen should have a power of superintending other rites, and that all power should be in the bishop, in regarding the matters of the Church; and no power, not so much as that of complaining, to remain to the pastor of each church; that the queen's majesty, and many of the learned and religious bishops, had promised far better things; and that a great many of those matters were, at least as it seemed to him, feigned by some evil meaning men, and vesting some other way; but withal he beseeched the bishop that they two might confer a little together concerning these things. He knew, as he went on, there was a twofold opinion concerning the restoration of the Church: first, of some who thought nothing ought to be added to the apostolic simplicity; and so that, without the样板, whatsoever the apostles did ought to be done by us; and whatsoever the Church that succeeded the apostles added to the first rites were to be abolished at once; that, on the other side, there were some who were of opinion that certain ancient rites besides ought to be received, partly as profitable and necessary, partly, if not necessary, yet to be taken for record sake; that he himself was of opinion with the former sort; and, in fine, that he had not yet learned by what right (whether one looks into God's Word or the ancient canons) either the civil magistrate of himself might superinduce any new rites upon the churches already constituted, or aberrate ancient ones; or that it was lawful for bishops to appoint any new things wither the judgment and will of their prebendary."—Eng. Bo'sai (Heb. Bonesi, אֶבֶּסִי, probably the same name as Bessai; Sept. Beosei, בֹּזֶאֶסִי, v. v. Beosei, בֹּזֶאֶס, בֹּזֶא, and Beosei), the head of one of the families who returned from the Babylonian captivity to the number of 324, including himself (Ezra ii, 17; Neh. vii, 70). He was perhaps one of those that sealed the covenant (Neh. x, 18). B.C. 410.

Beza's MS. (Heb. Bezelet, בְּזֶאֶל, is [otherwise son, of q. d. "ג"], the shadow of God, i. e. under his protection; Sept. Bezelél, בֵּזֶלֶל, v. [in Ezra] Bazelìa and Bezelìa), the name of two men.

1. The artificer to whom was confined by Jehovah the design and execution of the works of art required for the tabernacle in the wilderness (Exod. xxx. xi, 2; xxxiv, 30; xxxvii, 1, 2 Chron. i, 5). B.C. 1657. His charge was in regard to the works of metal, wood, and stone, Aholiab being associated with him for the textile fabrics; but it is plain from the terms in which the two are mentioned (xxvii, 1, 2; xxviii, 22), as well as from the enumeration of the works in Bezeel's name in xxxvii and xxxviii, that he was the chief of the two, and master of Aholiab's department as well as his own. Bezeel was of the tribe of Judah, the son of Uri, the son of Hur (or Chur). Hur was the offspring of the marriage of Caleb (one of the chiefs of the great family of Pharez) with Ephrath (1 Chron. ii, 20, 50), and one of his sons, or descendants (comp. Ruth iv, 20), was Salma or Salmon, who is handed down under the name of of Bethlehem, and who, i.e. the great-grandfather of Beza, was the great-grandfather of the king of David (1 Chron. ii, 51, 54; Ruth iv, 21).—Smith, s. v. See BETHLEHEM; HUR.

2. One of the sons of Pabath-moah, who divorced the foreign wife whom he had taken after the exile (Ezra x, 30). B.C. 458.

Bezek (Heb. Id. בּצֶק, lighting; Sept. Bizk and Bizk), the name apparently of two places in Palestine.

1. The residence of Adoni-bezek, l. e. the "lord of Bezek" (Judg. 1, 5), in the "Is to (25) of Judah" (verse 8), and inhabited by Canaanites and Perizzites (verse 4). The place may have been in the midst of the forests, far from Jerusalem (ver. 7); possibly on the elevation near Deir el-Ghafir, marked by Van de Velde (Map) at four miles S.W. of Bethlem (comp. Robinson, Researches, i, 387, 388). Sand (Jenner, p. 182) mentions a village Bezek two miles west of the site of Beth-zur, but this lacks confirmation. Others propose other identifications, even the Bezekh on the north of Jerusalem. See Bezekh.

2. The rendezvous where Saul numbered the forces of Israel and Judah before going to the relief of Jabez-glised (1 Sam. xi, 8). From the terms of the narrative this cannot have been more than a day's march from Jabez, and was therefore doubtless somewhere in the central part of the country, near the Jordan valley. In accordance with this is the mention by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Bezeia, Bezec) of two places of this name seventeen miles from Nepolis (Shechem), on the road to Beth-shean. This would place it at Khudet-Malek, on the descent to the Jordan, near Succoth. The Septentronitets Bessai from some other "high place" at this solemn muster took place. This Josephus gives as Bala (Balad, Ant. vi, 5, 8). Schwartz (Palest, p. 158) says that "Bezek is the modern village Abbek, five English miles south of Beth-shean," but no other traveller speaks of such a name.
Bezer (Heb. Be'zer, "בזֶר, one of gold or silver, or as Psa. Ixxvi, 13), the name of a place and also of a man.

1. (Sept. בזֶר or בּוֹצֶר). A place always called "Bezer in the wilderness (בְּגַזֶר), being a city of the Reubenites, with "suburb," in the Mishor or downs, set apart by Moses as one of the three cities of refuge on the east of the Jordan (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx, 8), and allotted to the Merarites (Josh. xxii, 8; 1 Chron. vi, 78). In the last two passages the exact specification, בְּגַזֶר, "in the plain country," of the other two is omitted, but traces of its former presence in the text in Josh. xxii, 16 are furnished us by the reading of the Sept. and Vulg. (τὸν Βηζερ ὰν τῷ Ἰςπαγ, τὸν Ἐβραῖκον τῷ πνεύμα, Bezer in solitude, Micsor el Jaser). Bezer may be the Bezer (q. v.) of 1 Macc. v, 26, 36. Reland rashly identifies it with the Bostra of Arabia Deserta (Palest. p. 661); and Schwarz (Palest. p. 229) makes it to be a Talmudical Kenethritha (םנתריתא), which he finds in an isolated high mound called Jebel Kubarta, S.E. of Aroer, near the Arnon, meaning doubtless Jebel-Ghubweiteh, which lies entirely without the bounds of Reuben. Bezer seems to correspond in position and name with the ruined village Būnasin, marked on Van de Velde's Map at 12 miles N. of E. from Heshbon (comp. Robinson, Researches, iii, Annex, p. 170).

2. (Sept. בָּזֶר or בּוֹזֶר). The sixth named of the eleven sons of Zophah, of the descendants of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 26). B.C. post 1636.

Bezeth (בעélection), a place at which Bacciched encamped after leaving Jerusalem, and where there was a "great pit" (τὸ φαταρ τῷ μέγα, 1 Macc. vii, 19). By Josephus (Ant. xii, 10, 2) the name is given (in the account parallel to 1 Macc.) to a village, Beth-zetho (בְּהֵזֶר בְּהֵזֶר, כּוֹם בְּהֵזֶר בְּהֵזֶר), which recalls the name applied to the Mount of Olives in the early Syriac recension of the N. T. published by Mr. Cureton—Beth-Salath (which, however, is simply a translation of the name = Heb. בֹּזֶר בֹּזֶר, οἶκω-χώρα). The name may thus refer either to the main body of the Mount of Olives, or to the eminence opposite it to the north of Jerusalem, which at a later period was called Bezetha (q. v.). Pococke (East, ii, i, 19) speaks of seeing "a long cistern" in this quarter of the city, and several tanks are delineated here on modern plans of Jerusalem.—Smith, s. v.

Bezetha (בְּזֶתָה, the name of the fourth hill on which a part of Jerusalem was built, situated north of Antonia, from which it was separated by a deep fosse, but not enclosed till the erection of the third wall by Agrippa, according to Josephus (War, v, 4, 2), who interprets the name as equivalent to "New City" (גאֵלִית פֶּלֶך), perhaps regarding it as the Heb. גָּהְנַית; but as this can hardly be considered a representative of the name, and as Josephus elsewhere (War, ii, 19, 4) seems expressly to distinguish Bezetha from Cenomalla or the New City (רֵיֶשׁ בְּזֶתָה פֶּרְאָה), unless, as Roland suggests, Palest. p. 655, we should read רֵיֶשׁ בָּעָה כַּעֲרָה, making them identical), we may perhaps better adopt the derivation given above under the Bezeth (q. v.) of 1 Macc. vii, 19. The general position of the hill is clear; but it has been nevertheless disputed whether it should be regarded as the eminence north of the present Damascus gate (Robinson, Bib. Sac. 1846, p. 330 sq.) or (as is more probable) that immediately north of the present Haram enclosure (Williams, Holy City, ii, 60). See Jerusalem.

Beziæ, one of the earliest episcopal sees in France. Quite a number of synods have been held at Beziæ: A.D. 586, on account of the Arians; 1234 and 1243, against the Albigeenses; and in 1272, 1292, and 1351, on account of other ecclesiastical controversies.

Bì'tānas (Φακάνος v. r. Φακάνις, Vulg. Phitanus), one of the Levites that expounded the law to the Jews at Jerusalem, as stated by Ezra (1 Esdr. ix, 40); evidently a corruption for the Pelaian (q. v.) of the genuine text (Neh. viii, 7).

Blíthanākt (from σίν, violence, and διάσωσις, rescue), Among other reproachful epithets applied by the pagans to Christians in the first centuries we find Bithanautai, self-murderers, imposed in consequence of their contempt of death, and cheerful endurance of all kinds of suffering for Christ's sake. We also meet with the term Bithanautai (Bith, life), men who expect to live after death. The enemies of the Christians might employ this phrase to ridicule the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. It is recorded in Bede's Martyrology that when the seven sons of Symphoros were martyred under Hadrian, their bodies were cast into one pit together, which the temple-priests named from them Ad septem Bithanautos.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. i. ch. ii, § 8; Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Bilibghaus, Henry, D.D., a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Bucks County, Penn., Aug. 22, 1777. He was first merchant, then farmer; later, organist, and teacher of a parochial school in Philadelphia. He studied theology privately; was licensed and ordained in 1824. He was born in the eighth year of his age. He became pastor of the German Reformed Salem Church, Philadelphia, where he continued to labor with great zeal and success till his death, Aug. 20th, 1853. He is remembered as a mild, modest, venerable father in the Church. He was a good preacher, a faithful pastor, and also exerted a strong and happy influence in the judicatures of the Church. He preached only in the German language.

Bibbins, Eliasha, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Hampton, N. Y., July 16, 1790; was converted November 8, 1805; was licensed to preach in January, 1812, and was admitted on trial in the Genesee Conference in July of the same year. He served for twelve years of his ministry in the effective ranks, three years a supernumerary, and thirty-two years a supernumerated preacher. Mr. Bibbins was a man of good natural abilities. His powers of perception were quick, and his reasoning faculties vigorous. His moral sensibilities were strong, and his principles of discipline and conduct were strong; and a strong sense of the ludicrous. He was always in earnest, a quality which gave almost overwhelming power to his sermons, exhortations, and prayers. He was a good theologian, but a better preacher. In his best moods he poured out a torrent of eloquence which was very effective. He was a man of noble impulses, of a genial nature, of a lofty spirit, of a strong will, and of inexhaustible patience. He died at Scranton, Penn., on the 6th of July, 1859, of disease of the heart.—Peck, Early Methodism (N. Y. 1860, 12mo, p. 489).

Bibbins, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, one of the fathers of the Black River Conference. He was born about 1708, preached for about fifty years, and died in Brutus, N. Y., Jan. 3, 1836. As a preacher he was eminently owned of God, and revivalists generally attended his ministry. His death was especially triumphant.—Minutes of Conferences, ii, 410.

Bible (Anglicized from the Greek Βίβλιον, i. e. little books, libelli; Lateinized Biblius), the popular designation (usually in the phrase "Holy Bible") now everywhere current for the Sacred Scriptures of the Old and New Testament in their present collected form. The sacred books were denominated by the Jews the אֲבָנָיִם, kethibh, "written," and the מִקְרָיָה, recension, a name of the same character as that applied by the Mohammedans (Koran) to denote their sacred volume. See Scriptures, HOLT.
The Bible is divided into the Old and New Testaments, הַבָּيֵת הַזֶּה, καὶ καὶ τοῦ νεωτάτου. The name Old Testament is applied to the books of Moses by Paul (2 Cor. iii. 14), inasmuch as the former covenant comprised the whole scheme of the Mosaic revelation, and the history of this is contained in them. This phrase, "book of the covenant," taken probably from Exod. xxiv. 7; 1 Mac. i. 57 (βιβλία τῆς διαθήκης), was transferred in the course of time to a mononymy to signify the writings themselves. The word ἡ διαθήκη signifies either a testament or a covenant, but we now render it testament, because the translators of the old Latin version have always rendered it from the Sept., even when it was used as a translation of the Hebrew, בְּרית (covenant), by the word Testamentum. The name Testament, applied to the Old Testament, are the Scriptures (Matt. xxii. 42), Scripture (2 Pet. i. 20), the Holy Scriptures (Rom. i. 2), the sacred letters (2 Tim. iii. 15), the holy books (Sacerd. xii. 1), the law (John xii. 34), the law, the prophets, and the psalms (Luke xxiv. 44), the law and the prophets (Matt. v. 17), the law, the prophets, and the other books (Prov. Ecclus.), the books of the old covenant (Neh. viii. 18), the books of the covenant (1 Mac. i. 57; 2 Kings xxiii. 2) —Kit., to. s. v. See Testament.

The other books (not in the canon) were called apocryphal, ecclesiastical, and deuterocanonical. The term New Testament has been in common use since the early part of the 4th century, and is employed in the same sense in which it is now commonly applied (Hist. Eccles. iii. 28). Tertullian employs the same phrase, and also that of "the Divine Instrument" in the same significance. See Antilegomena; Apocrypha.

1. Appropriation of the term "Bible."—I. In Its Greek form.—The application of the word Bibliothek, the books, especially to the collected books of the Old and New Testament, is not to be traced farther back than the 5th century. The term which the writers of the New Testament use of the Scriptures of the Old are ἡ γραφή (2 Tim. iii. 16; Acts viii. 32; Gal. iii. 22), αἱ γραφαί (Matt. xxii. 42; Luke xxiv. 27), τὰ ἐκ τῆς γραφῆς (2 Tim. iii. 15). Bibliothek is found (2 Tim. iv. 13; Rev. 1. x. 1; 21, 1) with no distinctive meaning; nor does the use of τὰ λογικὰ τῶν βιβλίων for the Hagiographa in the Preface to Ecclesiastica, or of τῶν ἐκ τῆς βιβλίας in Josephus (Ant. i. 6, 2), indicate any thing as to the use of τὰ βιβλία alone as synonymous with ἡ γραφή. The words early Christian writers were naturally derived from the language of the New Testament, and the old terms, with epithets like θεία, ἀιώνια, and the like, continued to be used by the Greek fathers, as the equivalent "Scriptura" was by the Latin. The use of ἡ γραφή διαθήκη in 2 Cor. iii. 14, for the law as read in the synagogues, and the prominence given in the Epistle to the Hebrews (vii. 22; viii. 6; ix. 16) to the contrast between the παλαιόν and the καινόν, led gradually to the extension of the former to include the other books of the Jewish Scriptures, and to the application of the latter as of the former to a book or collection of books. Of the Latin equivalents which were adopted (Institutionum divinarum Doctrinæ), the last latter met with the most general acceptance, and perpetuated itself in the language of modern Europe. One passage in Tertullian (ad. Marc. iv. 1) illustrates the growing popularity of the word which eventually prevailed, "instrumenti vel quod magis in usu est dicere, testamentum." The word was naturally used by Greek-speaking Christians with the meaning of "above the latter" of the two collections. They enumerate (e. g. Athan. Synag. Sac. Script.) τὰ βιβλία of the Old and New Testament; and as these were contrasted with the apocryphal books circulated by heretics, there was a natural tendency to the appropriation of the word as limited by the books of the collection called the canonical Scriptures. Jerome substitutes for these expressions the term Bibliotheca Divina (see Hieronymi Opera, ed. Martianus, vol. i, Proleg.) a phrase which this learned father probably borrowed from 2 Macchabees, i. 18, where Nehemiah is said, in "founding a library" (βιβλιοθήκην), to have "gathered together the acts of the kings, and the prophets, and of David, and the epitaphs of the kings concerning the holy gifts." But although it was usual to denominate the separate books in Greek by the term Bibliothek, which is frequently so applied, we first find it simply applied to the entire collection by St. Chrysostom in his Homily, "The Jews have the books (βιβλία), but we have the treasure of the books; they have the letters (γραμματα), but we have both spirit and letter." And again, Iose. ix. in Epist. ad Coloss., "Provide yourselves with books (βιβλία), the medicine of the soul, but to the Lord, the spirit, the soul (ενέργεια), the Apostolos, the Acts, the Gospel." He also adds to the word βιβλία the epithet διδωσε in his Titel Homily on Genesis: "Taking before and after the meals the divine books" (τα βιβλία, βιβλία), or, as we should now express it, the Holy Bible. It is thus applied in a way which shows this use to have already become familiar to those to whom he wrote. The liturgical use of the Scriptures, as the worship of the Church became organized, would naturally favor this application. The MSS. from which they were read would be emphatically the books of each church or monastery. When this use of the word was established in the East, it was naturally transferred gradually to the Western Church. The terminology of that Church bears witness throughout (e.g. Episcopus, Presbyter, Diaconus, Litania, Liturgia, Monachus, Abbas, and others) to its Greek origin, and the history of the word Bibliothek has followed the analogy of those that have been referred to. Here, too, there was less risk of its being used in any other than the higher meaning, because it had not, in spite of the introduction even in classical Latinity of Bibliotheca, Bibliopola, taken the place of libri, or libelli, in the common speech of men.

2. The English Form.—It is worthy of note that «Bible» is not found in Anglo-Saxon literature, though Bibliothec is given (Lye, Anglo-Sax. Dict.) as a name of books. Du Cange and Adelung, s. v. If we derive from our mother-tongue the singularly happy equivalent of the Greek Βιβλιοθήκη, we have received the best word for the books which stand in the same relation to the Christian Church as the "pearl" as one of the later importations consequent on the Norman Conquest and fuller intercourse with the Continent. When the English which grew out of this union first appears in literature, the word is already naturalized. In R. Brune (p. 290), Piers Plowman (1375, 4271), and Chaucer (Pro. 48), it appears in its distinctive sense, though the latter, in at least one passage (House of Fame, bx. iii.), uses it in a way which indicates that it was not always limited to that meaning. From that time, however, the higher use prevailed to the exclusion of any lower; and the choice of it, rather than the books of the translation of the Scriptures, Wickliffe, Latun, Coverdale, fixed it beyond all possibility of change. The transformation of the word from a plural into a singular noun in all the modern languages of Europe, though originating probably in the solecisms of the Latin of the 15th century (Du Cange, s. v. Bible), has made it fitter than it would otherwise have been for its high office as the title of that which, by virtue of its unity and plan, is emphatically the Book.

II. The Book as a Whole.—The history of the growth of the collections known as the Old and New Testament respectively will be found fully under Canon. It falls within the scope of the present article to indicate the general views of the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches as to the canon of the Bible. This came to be looked on as of co-ordinate authority, and therefore as parts of one whole—how, i.e. the idea of a completed Bible, even before the word came into use, presented...
The arrangement must rest upon some principle of classification. The names given to the several books will indicate in some instances the view taken of their contents, in others the kind of notation applied both to the greater and smaller divisions of the sacred volumes. The existence of a classification analogous to that adopted by the later Jews and still retained in the printed Hebrew text, is indicated even before the completion of the O. T. Canon (Zech. vii. 12). When the Canon was looked upon as settled, in the period covered by the books of the Apocrypha, it took a more definite form. The Prologue to Ecclesiastes mentions "the law and the prophets and the other books." In the N. T. there is the same kind of recognition. "The Law and the Prophets" (Matt. xi. 26; xxii. 40; Acts xiii. 16, et cetera); "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms" (Luke xxiv. 44), the fuller statement of the division popularly recognised. The arrangement of the books of the Hebrew text under these three heads requires, however, a farther notice.

1. The Law, Torah, הָרֵדַשׁ, νόμος, naturally continued to occupy the position which it must have held from the first as the most ancient and authoritative portion. Whatever questions may arise as to the antiquity of the whole Pentateuch in its present form, the existence of a book bearing this title is traceable to a very early period in the history of the Israelites (Josh. i. 8; vii. 34; xxiv. 26). The name which must at first have attached to those portions of the whole book was applied to the earlier and more continuous history connected with the giving of the law, and ascribed to the same writer. The marked distinctness of the five portions which make up the Torah shows that they must have been designed as separate books; and when the Canon was completed, and the books in their present form made the object of study, names for each book were found and recorded. In the Hebrew classification the titles were taken from the initial words, or prominent words in the initial verse; in that of the Sept. they were intended to be significant of the subject of each book, and so we have—

(2.) בָּאְדָּא עֵדָא . . . Exodus
(3.) אָנֵּחַּה תְּרֵצַש . . . Leviticus (4.) דַּעֲשַהְוָא . . . Numbers
(5.) יִתְנְאָס הַגּוֹיִם . . . Deuteronomy.

The Greek titles were adopted without change, except as to the fourth, in the Latin versions, and from them have descended to the Bibles of modern Christendom.

2. The Prophets.—The next group presents a more singular combination. The arrangement stands as follows:

[Diagram:]

The Hebrew titles of these books corresponding to those of the English Bibles; so also in the Septuagint, except that this version (like the Vulgate) regards 1 and 2 Sam. as 1 and 2 Kings, and 1 and 2 Kings as 3 and 4 Kings.

The grounds on which books simply historical were classed under the same name as those which contained the teaching of prophets, in the stricter sense of the word, are not, at first sight, obvious, but the O. T. presents some facts which may suggest an explanation. The sons of the prophets (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 Kings y. 22; vi. 1), living together as a society, almost (Amos vi. 14), trained to a religious... sacred minstrelsy, must have occupied a position as instructors of the people, even in the absence of the special calling which sent them as God's messengers to the people. A body of men so placed naturally become historians and annalists, unless intellectual activity is absorbed in asceticism. The references in the historical books of the O.T. show that they actually were such. Nathan the prophet, Gad, the seer of David (1 Chron. xxvii, 29), Ahijah and Iddo (2 Chron. ix, 20), Isaiah (2 Chron. xxvi, 22; xxxii, 22), are cited as chroniclers. The greater antiquity of the earlier historical books, and perhaps the traditional belief that they had originated in this way, were likely to co-operate in raising them to a high place of honor in the arrangement of the canonic books. They were looked upon as having the prophetic character which was denied to the historical books of the Hagiographa. The greater extent of the prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, no less than the prominent position which they occupied in the history of Israel, led naturally to their being recognised as the Prophetic Minors. The exclusion of Daniel from this subdivision is a more remarkable fact, and one which has been differently interpreted. The Rationalistic school of later criticism (Eichhorn, De Wette, Bertholdi) seeing in it an indication of later date, and therefore of doubtless authenticity, the orthodox school on the contrary, as represented by F. Hengstenberg (Dict. on Don. ch. ii. 4, v.), maintaining that the difference rested only on the ground that, though the utterer of predictions, he had not exercised, as the others had done, a prophet's office among the people. Whatever may have been its origin, the position of this book in the Hagiographa led the later Jews to think and speak slightly of it, and Christians who reasoned with them out of its predictions were met by remarks disparaging to its authority (Hengstenberg, I. c.). The arrangement of the Prophetic Minors does not call for special notice, except so far as they were counted, in order to bring the whole list of canonical books within a memorial number, answering to that of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet, as a single volume, and described as τὰ ἑκατοντάρατα.

3. THE HAGIOGRAPHA.—Last in order came the group known as Kethubim, γένεσις τῆς γραμματείας (from בָּנָה, to write), γραφή, αὐγογραφή, i. e. "holy writings," including the remaining books of the Hebrew canon, arranged in the following order, and subordinate divisions: (a) Psalms, Proverbs, Job; (b) The Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther; (c) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles.

Of these, (a) were distinguished by the memorial word הָעָנָב, "truth," formed from the initial letters of the three books; (b) as הָעָנָב הַיָּנָב, "the fire rolls," as being written for use in the synagogues on special festivals on five separate rolls. Of the Hebrew titles of these books, those which are descriptive of their contents are: בְּנֵי צֶדֶק, Tobilhim, the Psalms; בְּנֵי מִשְׁחָר, Mishley, Proverbs; בְּנֵי נַחֲלָה, Eysak, Lamentations (from the opening word of wailing in 1, 1); the Song of Songs, בְּנֵי לֵיל הָעָנָב, Shir ha-shirim; Ecclesiastes, בְּנֵי כּוֹכֶב, the Preacher; 1 and 2 Chronicles, בְּנֵי דַּעְיָה, דָּבְעֵר יָאָזְגַיָמִין, "words of the days = records."

The Sept. presents the following titles of these three last: Παλαιοί, Paroxymia, Θρόνος, "λαμάρια, Eκκλησίων, Παραδοτώνομα (i. e. things omitted, as being supplementary to the books of Kings). The Latin version presents some of the titles, and translates others, as Psalms, Proverbia, Threni, Canticum Canticorum, Ecclesiastes, Paralipomenon, and these in their translated form have determined the received titles of the book in our English Bibles—Ecclesiastes, in which the Greek title is retained, and Chronicles, in which the Hebrew and not the Greek title is translated, being exceptions. The Sept. presents also some striking variations in the order of the books (we follow the Sixth ed.—MSS. differ greatly). Both in this and in the insertion of the διδασκόμενον, which we now know as the Apocrypha, among the other books, we trace the absence of that strong reverence for the Canon and its traditional order which distinguished the Jews of Palestine. The Law, it is true, was not interrupted by the greater and lesser prophets, between the Prophets and the Hagiographa, is no longer recognised. Daniel, with the Apocryphal additions, follows upon Ezekiel; the Apocryphal 1st or 3d book of Esdras comes in as a 1st, preceding the canonical Ezra. Tobit and Judith are placed between the prophetic and Ecclesiastical (Σωτιός Σωτόρ) after Canticles, Baruch before and the Epistle of Jeremiah after Lamentations, the twelve lesser prophets before the greater, and the two books of Maccabees at the close of all. The common Vulg. follows nearly the same order, inverting the relative position of the greater and lesser prophets. The separation of the doubtful books under the title of Apocrypha in the Protestant versions of the Scriptures left the others in the order in which we now have them. See Septuagint; Vulgate.

4. The history of the arrangement of the books of the New Testament presents some variations, not without reference to local and historical destinies and to different modes of thought. The four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles uniformly stand first. They are thus to the New what the Pentateuch was to the Old Testament. They do not present, however, in themselves, as the books of Moses did, any order of succession. The actual order does not depend upon the rank or function of the writers to whom they are assigned. The two not written by apostles are preceded and followed by one which was, and it seems as if the true explanation were to be found in a traditional belief as to the dates of the several Gospels, according to which Matthew's, whether in its Greek or Hebrew form, was the earliest, and John's the latest. The arrangement once adopted would naturally confirm the belief, and so we find it assumed by Ireneas, Origen, Augustine. The position of the Acts as an intermediate link, the sequel to the Gospels, the prelude to the Epistles, was obviously a natural one. After the Gospels, and with some stratification, the order in the Alexandrian, Vatican, and Ephraem MSS. (A, B, C) gives precedence to the catholic Epistles, and as this is also recognised by the Council of Laodicea (Can. 60), Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. iv, 35), and Athanasius (Epist. Fest. ed. Bened. i, 261), it would appear that this arrangement has been characteristic especially of western churches. Lachmann and Tischendorf (7th ed.) followed this arrangement. (The Sinaitic MS. places Paul's Epistles even before the Acts.) The Western Church, on the other hand, as represented by Jerome, Augustine, and their successors, gave priority to the Pauline Epistles, and in the order in which these were given presents, (1.) those addressed to churches arranged according to their relative importance, (2.) those addressed to individuals, the foremost place was naturally occupied by the Epistle to the Romans. The tendency of the Western Church to recognise Rome as the centre of authority may perhaps, in part, account for this departure from the custom of the East. The order of the Pauline Epistles themselves, however, is generally the same, and the only conspicuously different arrangement was that of Marcion, who aimed at a chronological order. In the four MSS. above referred to, Hebrews comes after 2 Thessalonians (in that order); but elsewhere it is placed after Galatians and Ephesians. In those followed by Jerome, it stands, as in the English Bible and the Textus Receptus, after Philemon. Possibly the absence of Paul's name, possibly the doubt which existed as to his being the sole author of it, possibly its approximation to the character of the catholic Epistles, may have determined the arrangement. The Apocalypse, as might

e be expected from the peculiar character of its contents, occupied a position by itself. Its comparatively late date may have determined the position which it has uniformly held as the last of the sacred books.

IV. Division into Chapters and Verses.—As soon as any break is made in the continuous writing which has characterized in nearly all countries the early stages of the art, we get the germs of a system of division.

But these germs may be for two distinct purposes. So far as they were used to exhibit the logical relations of words, clauses, and sentences to each other, they tended to a recognised punctuation. So far as they are used for greater convenience of reference, or as a help to the memory, they answer to the chapters and verses of our modern Bibles. At present we are concerned only with the latter.

1. The Hebrew of the Old Testament.—It is hardly possible to conceive of the liturgical use of the books of the Old Testament without some kind of recognised division. In proportion as the books were studied and commented on in the schools of the rabbins, the division would be changed from that based on technical and complete, and hence the existing notion which is recognized in the Talmud (the Gemara ascribing it to Moses [Hupfeld, Stud.

und Krit. 1880, p. 827]) may probably have originated in the earlier stages of the growth of the synagogue ritual. The New Testament quotations from the Old are for the most part cited without any more specific reference than to the book from which they come.

The references, however, in Mark xii, 26, and Luke xx, 37 (i.e. της βαρύν) Rom., xi, 2 (i.e. Προφ., and Acts viii, 32 (i.e. παρακαταγέντος γραφής), indicate a division which had become familiar, and show that some, at least, of the sections were known popularly by titles taken from their subjects. In this sort and manner, the existence of some cycle of lessons is indicated by Luke iv, 17;

Acts xiii, 15; xv, 21; 2 Cor. iii, 14; and this, whether identical or not with the later rabbinic cycle, must have involved a harmonious analogy to that subsequently adopted.

(1.) The Talmudic division is on the following plan.

[1.] The Law was, in the first instance, divided into fift five-four חנים, parshiyoth = sections, so as to provide a lesson for each Sabbath in the Jewish intercalary year, provision being made for the shorter year by the combination of two of the shorter sections. Coexisting with this, there was a subdivision into lesser parshiyoth designed to determine the portions of the sections taken by the several reading of the synagogues. The lesser parshiyoth themselves were classed under two heads—the "open" (יִתְנָעָתָה, pethahoth), which served to indicate a change of subject analogous to that between two paragraphs in modern writing, and began accordingly a fresh line in the MS., and the "closed" (יוֹת תֵּבֵּשָׁת, sethathoth), which corresponded to minor divisions, and were marked only by a space within the line. The initial letters ד and נ served as a notation, in the margin or in the text itself, for the two kinds of sections. The threefold initial דדר or דדר was used when the commencement of one of the parshiyoth coincided with that of a Sabbath lesson (comp. Keil, Anleitung in das A. T. 470, 171).

[2.] A different terminology was employed for the Prophetic Priors and Posters, and the division was less uniform. The tradition of the Jews that the Prophets were first read in the service of the synagogue, and consequently divided into sections, because the reading of the Law had been forbidden by Antiochus Epiphanes. This rests upon a very slight foundation; but its existence is, at any rate, a product of the Law was believed to have been systematically divided before the same process was applied to the other books.

The name of the sections in this case was יִתְנָעָתָה

(Heb. from יִתְנָעָתָה, to dismiss). If the name were applied in this way because the lessons from the Prophets came at the close of the synagogal service, and so were followed by the dismissal of the people (Vitrings, De Synag. ii, 2, 20), its history would present a curious analogy to that of "Massa," "Mass," on the assumption that this also was derived from the Ιτανοράθος by which the congregation was informed of the conclusion of the earlier portion of the service of the Church. The peculiar use of Missa shortly after its appearance in the Latin of ecclesiastical writers in a sense equivalent to that of hapharoth ("sex Missas de Prophétae Exsul facite," Cesar Arelat.

and Aurelius, Bingham, Ant. xiii, 1) presents at least a singular coincidence. The terms themselves were intended to correspond with the larger parshiyoth of the Law, so that there might be a distinct lesson for each Sabbath in the intercalary year as before; but the traditions of the German and the Spanish Jews, both of them of great antiquity, present a considerable diversity in the length of the divisions, and show that they had never been determined by the same authority as that which had settled the parshiyoth of the Law (Van der Hooght, Proefst.

in Bib. § 35).

(2.) Of the traditional divisions of the Hebrew Bible, however, which has exercised most influence in the received arrangement of the text, there is a division of the larger sections into verses (תַּנִית, peshiyn). These do not appear to have been used until well after the post-

Talmudic recension of the text by the Masoretes of the 9th century. They were then applied, first to the prose, and afterward to the poetical books of the Hebrew Scriptures, superseding in the latter the arrangement of εικονις, κοινις, τιμωρα, lines and groups of lines, which had been based upon the composition of the text. The verses of the Masoretic divisions were preserved with comparatively slight variations through the Midd e Age, and came to the knowledge of translators and editors when the attention of European scholars was directed to the study of Hebrew. In the Hebrew MSS.

the notation had been simply marked by the "Sogh-

Pašu" (ק) at the end of each verse; and in the earlier printed Hebrew Bibles (Sablonetta's, 1557, and Plan-tin's, 1666) the Hebrew numericals which guide the reader in referring are attached to every fifth verse only.

The Concordance of Rabûn Nathan, 1456, however, had rested on the application of a numeral to each verse, and this was adopted by the Dominicans, and was used in his Latin version, 1528, and carried throughout the whole of the Old and New Testament, coinciding substantially, as regards the former, with the Masoretic, and therefore with the modern division, but differing materially, as to the New Testament, from that which was adopted by Robert Stephens, and through his widely circulated editions passed into general reception.

(3.) The chief facts that remain to be stated as to the verse divisions of the Old Testament are that they were adopted by Stephens in his edition of the Vulgate, 1555, and by Frenell in that of 1566; that they appeared, for the first time in the English translation, in the Geneva

Bible of 1560, and were thence transferred into the Bishop's Bible of 1568 and the Authorized Version of 1611.

In Coverdale's Bible we meet with the older notation, which was in familiar use for other books, and retained, in some instances (e.g. in references to Plato), to the present time. The letters A B C D E are placed at equal distances of an inch on the margin of each page, and the reference is made to the page (or, in the case of Scripture, to the chapter) and the letter accordingly.

2. The Septuagint translation, together with the Latin versions based upon it, have contributed very little to the received division of the Bible. Made at a time when the rabbinic subdivisions were not enforced, hardly perhaps existing, and not used in the worship of the synagogue, there was no reason for the scrupulous care which showed itself in regard to the Hebrew text. The language of Tertullian (Scorp. ii) and Jerome (in Mv. vi. 9; Zeph. iii. 4) implies the existence of "capitula" of some sort; but the word does not appear to have been used in any more definite sense than "locus" or "passage." The liturgical use of portions of the Old Testament would lead to the employment of some notation to distinguish the dividenda from lectiones, and individual students or transcribers might adopt a system of reference of their own, not corresponding to the fully organized notation which originated with the Talmudists or Masoretes. It is possible, indeed, that the general use of Lectionaria—in which the portions read in the Church services were written separately—may have hindered the development of such a system. Whatever traces of it we find are accordingly scanty and fluctuating. The stichometric mode of writing (i.e. the division of the text into short lines generally with very little regard to the sense) adopted in the 4th or 5th centuries (see Prolegomena to Breitinger's Septuag. G. 6), though it may have facilitated reference, or been useful as a guide to the reader in the half-chant commentaries on the A.D.G. services, was too arbitrary (except where it corresponded to the parallel clauses of the Hebrew poetical books) and inconvenient to be generally adopted. The Alexandrian MSS. present a partial notation of κεφάλας, but as regards the Old Testament these are found only in portions of Deuteronomy (in Codex. Eber. in Breitinger, Proleg. ii. 356) of a like division in Numbers, Exodus, and Leviticus, and Latin MSS. present frequently a system of division into "tituli" or "capitula," but without any recognized standards. In the 15th century, however, the development of theology as a science, and the more frequent use of the Scriptures as a text-book for lectures, led to the general adoption of a more systematic division, traditionally ascribed to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury (Triveti Annal. p. 182, ed. Oxon.), but carried out by Cardinal Hugh de St. Cher (Gibbon Genealogy, Chronol. iv. 544), and passing through his Commentary (Postilla in Librum Ebracia, and Concordance, cl. 1240) into general use. No other subdivision of the chapters was united with this beyond that indicated by the marginal letters A B C D, as described above.

3. As regards the Old Testament, then, the present arrangement grows out of the union of Cardinal Huchard's division, and the Masoretic verses. It should be noted that the verses in the authorized English Bible occasionally differ from those of the Heb. Masoretic text, especially in the Psalms (where the Heb. reckons the titulus as ver. 1) and some chapters of the Chronicles (perhaps through the influence of the Sept.). A tabular exhibit of these variations may be found at the end of the Englishman's Heb. Concordance (London. 1845). Such discrepancies also (but less frequently) occur in the N. T. The Apocryphal books, to which, of course, no Masoretic division was applicable, did not receive a versicle division till the Latin edition of Pagninus in 1538, nor the division now in use till Stephen's edition of the Vulgate in 1555. The adoption of such a division for the marginal notes "A B C D" in the Bible of St. Cher led men to adopt an analogous system for the New Testament. In the Latin version of Pagninus accordingly, there is a versicle division, though differing from the one subsequently used in the greater length of its verses. The division of an authoritative standard like that of the Masorets left more scope to the individual discretion of editors or printers, and the activity of the two Stephens caused that which they adopted in their numerous editions of the Greek Testament and Vulgate to be generally received. In the preface to the Concordance, published by Hul, another case from the same press in 1555. It was used for the Vulgate in the Antwerp edition of Hentenius in 1559, for the English version...
BIBLE, ATTRIBUTES OF

published in Geneva in 1569, and from that time, with slight variations in detail, it has been universally recognised. The convenience of such a system for reference is obvious; but it may be questioned whether it has not been purchased by too great a sacrifice of the perception of the readers connected with the connexion of the books of the Bible. In some cases the division of chapters separates portions which are very closely united (see, e.g., Matt. ix. 88, and x. 1; xix. 30, and xx. 1; Mark ii. 28-38, and iii. 1-5; vili. 38, and ix. 1; Luke xx. 44-47, and xxi. 1-4; Acts vii. 60, and viii. 1-5; Matt. xxvii. 53, and xxi. 1; 2 Cor. iv. 16, v. 1; 1, v. 16, and vii. 1), and throughout gives the idea of a formal division altogether at variance with the continuous flow of narrative or thought which characterized the book as it came from the hand of the writer. The separation of verses has moreover conducted largely to the habit of building doctrinal systems upon isolated texts. The advantages of the received method are united with those of an arrangement representing the original more faithfully in the structure of the Paragraph Bibles, lately published by different editors, and in the Greek Testaments of Lloyd, Lachmann, and Tischendorf. The student ought, however, to remember that in the paragraphs belonging to the editor, not the writer, and are therefore liable to the same casualties rising out of subjective peculiarities, dogmatic bias, and the like, as the chapters of our common Bibles. Practically the risk of such casualties has been reduced almost to a minimum by the care of editors who have taken pains to avoid the errors into which their predecessors have fallen, but the possibility of the evil exists, and should therefore be guarded against by the exercise of an independent judgment. Bible, Attributes of (Affectioens Scripturai), a title by which, in the 16th century, Protestant theologians designated certain views of Scripture as opposed to Roman, Socinian, and other errors. They are divided into two classes:

1. Primary attributes (affectioens primariae), i.e. such as directly flow from the divine origin and canonicality of the Scriptures. They are, (1) Authority (auctoritas), which is ascribed to the one hand to the Socinian undervaluing of the O.T., and to the other to the Romish doctrine that the Church settles the authority of Scripture. It is divided into (a) auctoritas normativa, i.e. the authority of the Bible to bind men to believe and do whatever it teaches or commands; (b) auctoritas judiciatica, as the Bible is the final appeal in questions of faith and practice (sufficientia or perfectio), as the Bible contains all things necessary for faith and practice, opposed to the Quaker doctrine of special inspiration or the "inner light," and to the Roman demand for traditional and Church teaching in addition to Scripture. (2) Intellectibleness (perspicuitas), opposed to the Romish doctrine that the Bible cannot be understood without the Church's exposition of it. (4) Efficacy, i.e. of its doctrines and principles for the salvation of men.

2. Secondary attributes, such as flow indirectly from the same sources: (1) Necessary of Scripture, as the truth cannot be known, held down neither by tradition nor by the "inner light." (2) Integrity, i.e. that no part essential to the canon has been lost. (3) Purity, i.e. the uncorrupted preservation of the text. (4) Freedom (legendi omnibus concessa licentia), i.e. the unrestrained reading of the Bible by all Christians, lay as well as clerical.—Knapp, Theology, § 31. See BIBLE, Usage by the LAITY.

Bible Societies, associations for the printing, translation, and circulation of the Word of God. They are given in this article in the following order, viz.:

(I.) Bible Societies of Great Britain; (II.) Bible Societies on the Continent of Europe; (III.) American Bible Society; (IV.) American and Foreign Bible Society (Baptist); (V.) American Bible Union (Baptist); (VI.) Bible Revision Association (Baptist).

1. Bible Societies of Great Britain.—By far the most important among the Bible Societies of Great Britain is the British and Foreign Bible Society, founded March 7th, 1804.

1. Preparation.—A number of societies with cognate design had preceded it, e.g. (1) The Society for promoting Christian Knowledge (1680), which included among its purposes the spreading of Bibles, tracts, and missions, especially in India: it printed Bibles in English, Welsh, Manks, and Arabic; (2) The Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign Parts (1701), with similar objects in special reference to the American colonies; (3) the Scottish Society for propagating Christian Knowledge (1729), whose field included the Highlands, the Scottish Islands, and part of North America; (4) the Society for promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor (1756); (5) Naval and Military Bible Society (1780); and, in the same year, (6) the French Bible Society, for publishing French Scriptures, which soon died out. Timpson (Bible Triumphs, p. 102 sq.) mentions the latter society (including French books and above), all anticipatory of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

2. Origin.—The idea of a general and comprehensive Bible Society was first suggested in December, 1802, when an attempt was made to found a Bible Society for Wales, where the demand for Bibles was then extremely urgent. This was in London, Dec. 1802. The question was under discussion in a committee of the Tract Society, when suddenly the Rev. Joseph Hughes (Baptist), one of the secretaries of the Tract Society, remarked, "Certainly such a society might be formed; why not in Wales, why not in England?" This broad idea took deep hold of the minds of the men who were, with its author, laboring for the salvation of the world. It was at once made public in a call by Mr. Hughes for a meeting to consider the subject, which was attended on March 7th, 1804, at the London Tavern, by about 300 persons of all denominations, save the Church of England clergy refused at first to co-operate with dissenters. But, persuaded by the pathos of the Rev. C. F. A. Steinckoff, the Rev. John Owen first gave in his adhesion, which step was soon after approved by Bishop Porteus. Organization was at once effected; Lord Teignmouth was chosen president, the Bishop of Chester (Dr. Tertullian), the Bishop of Oxford (Dr. John Hughes (Baptist)), and Rev. Joseph Hughes (Baptist) were appointed secretaries. Bishop Porteus and other prelates became members; and Wilberforce, Granville Sharp, and other distinguished public men gave their names and influence to the undertaking. Dr. Steinckoff was afterward added to the number of secretaries. The object of the society was declared to be "to promote the circulation of the Holy Scriptures, without note or comment, both at home and in foreign lands." An executive committee was formed consisting of 86 laymen, viz., 15 members of the Established Church, 15 dissenters, and 6 resident foreigners. To this committee is intrusted the management of the business of the society. The annual membership fee is one guinea, and clerical members, whether of the Established Church or Dissenting churches, have a seat and vote in sessions. This organization was first framed in "the counting-room, Old Swan Stairs, Upper Thames Street, belonging to the London Missionary Society, whose plans of benevolence, as well as those of the Religious Tract Society, and the Hibernian Society, were formed in the same room." (Timpson, Bib. Triumphs, p. 128).

3. Operations.—The attention of the society was first turned to Wales, and 25,000 Bibles and Testaments were printed in Welsh and distributed there.
BIBLE SOCIETIES

From England it turned its energy to Continental Europe, where multitudes of Bibles were distributed. Bible Societies were soon formed on the Continent; an account of them will be found under the next head of this article. In longitude progress was made, and the seven apostolic churches, in which the Bible was almost forgotten, were visited once more by the Word of God. In India the Bible Society found permanent foothold, and extended its operations to a very wide field. Much had been undertaken here by various denominations and societies, and several translations were in progress; but the vigor of the London Society soon changed the state of affairs, and a comprehensive and effective work began. Even Romanists co-operated, and eight auxiliary societies soon sprung up, some of them in Oceanica and Africa. The great Bible Societies of America were also its legitimate though indirect result, and active auxiliaries were organized in the Canadas. In South America it was less successful, but "no society ever spread so rapidly or so far." The work of translation was begun at an early period: its extent will be seen from the table below marked b.

The work of the B. and F. B. Society has not been without vigorous opposition. The first attack came from the High-Church clergy of the Establishment, especially Dr. Worsworth, Bishop Randolph, and afterward Bishop Marsh. These assaults had no other effect than to diminish the interest of the Established Church in the society; in spite of which, there was a great increase in the number of its members. The most zealous evangelical clergy and laity in that body. In India, after the return of Lord Wellesley (1806), the governors general for a series of years opposed the society; but all they could do was to impede, not to prevent the work of translating and circulating the Scriptures. About 1811 a dispute arose at home concerning the publication of the Apocrypha, which was circulated on the Continent with the Bibles issued by the society. This dispute agitated the society until 1826, when, by a final decision, the printing and circulation of the Apocrypha was stopped. This decision caused above 50 of the societies on the Continent to separate from the B. and F. B. Society; but agencies were substituted for auxiliaries, and the work went on. At the semi-centennial jubilee in 1835, the devoted Dr. Steinkopf alone remained of all the men who were so active in its foundation. Others, however, had succeeded to their places, and the enterprise was still more ably conducted.

This exhibit does not, however, show the real ratio of growth, as the receipts of the society for some of the years were much greater than for other subsequent years here mentioned, but it shows the relative periodic statistics. It is clear that its receipts always exceeded its expenditures.

(b.) Versions. — The B. and F. B. S., from its organization until 1866, caused the translation, publication, or circulation of the Holy Scriptures, entire or in parts, in languages and dialects as follows, viz.:}
4. The Berlin Bible Society obtained the sanction of the King of Prussia Feb. 11, 1806. It was merged into the greater Prussian Bible Society in 1814, which had circulated, up to the year 1855, about two million copies of the Bible. A number of other German Bible Societies have since been established, as the Bible Society of Saxony, in 1813, which had in 1859 thirty-two branch associations; the Bible Society of Sleswick-Holstein, since 1826; the Hessian Bible Society, and many others. Most of the German societies retain the Apocrypha in their editions of the Bible.

5. The Russian Bible Society followed in 1812, 1813, and in a few years many organizations sprang up in Switzerland.

6. The formation of the Danish Bible Society took place at Copenhagen, May 22, 1814. The King of Sweden, in a full council of state, July 8, 1814, consented to become the patron of the Swedish Bible Society.

7. The Russian Bible Society was authorized by an imperial ukase, Jan. 14, 1813. The Greek, the Roman Catholic, the Lutheran, the Reformed, and the Armenian churches were represented in this society, in order to spread the Bible in the entire Russian empire. In 1838 the number of branch associations amounted to 293, the number of copies of the Scriptures, which had been circulated in thirty-two different languages, to 411,000. The translation of the Bible into the modern Russian, and the large circulation of this translation among the country people, aroused an opposition on the part of the Russian government, which succeeded in the suppression of the society by the Emperor Nicholas (1826). In its place a Protestant Russian Bible Society was organized at Petersburgh, which had to restrict its operations to the Protestant population. It has existed ever since, and circulated more than 200,000 Bibles. The Emperor Alexander II has shown himself more favorable to the circulation of the Scriptures than his father, and the hope is generally entertained that the Bible colporteurs will soon have again free access to the members of the Greek Church.

8. In Finland a society was formed at Abo, 1812, and Norway followed in 1815.

9. The United Netherlands Bible Society, formed in 1813, soon had auxiliaries in most parts of Holland.

10. In 1818 the Paris Protestant Bible Society was authorized by the French government, and it went on in spite of great opposition from the Abbé de la Menais and others. Other French Bible Societies are at Calais (founded in 1820) and at Strasbourg (founded in 1816).

11. In Southern Europe, the Malta Bible Society was founded May 26, 1817, and became highly important as the station for supplying the Scriptures to various people, from the isles of the Archipelago to the banks of the Euphrates. These objects were promoted by the travels of the Rev. Mesers. Jowett, Connor, and Burchardt. Farther detail can be found in the Reports of the B. and F. B. S.; Owen's Hist. of the B. and F. B. S. (3 vols. 8vo); Timpson, Bible Triumphs (Lond. 1853, 8vo).

3. American Bible Society. "A voluntary association which has for its object the circulation of the Holy Scriptures in the commonly received version, without note or comment." Its centre is in the city of New York, but it is ramified by means of auxiliaries over the entire United States and Territories.

I. Organization.—This society was suggested by the superintendence of the first Bible distributees. In 1776 that society had been found to supply a great want in the mother country, and a similar association was perhaps still more needed in America. During the Revolutionary War, such was the scarcity of Bibles that Congress in 1777 voted to print 50,000 copies; and when it was found impracticable, founded by type and paper, the Committee on Commerce imported 20,000 from Europe, giving as a reason that "its use was so universal and its importance so great." When this, too, in consequence of the embargo, was found impracticable, Congress passed a resolution (1782) in favor of an edition of the Bible published by the private enterprise of Mr. Robert R. Livingston, of Philadelphia, which it pronounced "a pious and laudable undertaking, subservient to the interests of religion." Such was the language of the Congress of the United States in reference to the Bible in the year 1782. But the work of printing the Holy Scriptures went on very slowly. It did not meet the demand. Besides, the books were sold at prices which were beyond the reach of the poor. Other means were required to supply this deficiency. The older society in Great Britain had led the way in 1804, and kindred associations were soon organized in different parts of this country. The societies first formed were local, independent bodies, having no connection nor intercommunication; they could therefore take no measures to supply the destitute beyond their immediate localities. The inconvenience was still greater when missionary societies were formed, and the living teacher was sent to preach the Gospel in pagan lands. The remedy was first suggested by the Rev. Samuel J. Mills, who proposed uniting all the Bible Societies into one general institution. In 1822, the Bible Society of New Jersey, prompted by the venerable Elias Boudinot, issued a circular to the several Bible Societies in the country, inviting them to send delegates to meet in the city of New York the ensuing year. The New York Bible Society entered cordially into the measure.

A convention was held in New York on the second Wednesday in May, 1816, composed of sixty delegates, representing thirty-five Bible Societies in ten states and the District of Columbia. Joshua Wallace, of Burlington, N.J., was chosen president; Joseph C. Hornblower, L.L.D., of Newark, vice-president; Rev. Lyman Beecher, D.D., and Rev. John B. Romeyn, secretaries. Gentlemen of nearly all Christian denominations were present as members.

II. Constitution and Officers.—A constitution was adopted and officers of the society were elected. The Hon. Elias Boudinot, L.L.D., though not at the convention, was chosen president, and twenty-three vice-presidents were chosen from various states in the Union; the Rev. Dr. J. M. Mason was elected secretary for foreign correspondence, Rev. Dr. J. B. Romeyn domestic secretary, and Richard Varick, Esq., treasurer. The labors of these gentlemen were all given gratuitously.

III. Manuscripts.—The board of managers was composed of thirty-six laymen, it being provided that every minister of the Gospel becoming a life-member should be an honorary manager, as well as every life-director, lay or clerical. They were entitled to meet with the board, and vote, and have the same power as a manager. The thirty-six managers were divided into four classes, each of which was to go out of office each year, but were re-eligible. It resulted, as was no doubt intended, in securing a permanent body, members going out actually only by death, resignation, or removal for cause, as is the case generally with kindred institutions. From these managers, honorary or elect, standing committees were appointed, on whom were conferred, in great measure, the actual doings of the board, the latter confirming or annulling their transactions.

IV. Committees.—The standing committees, as now existing, are on publication, finance, versions, distribution, agencies, legacies, nominations, anniversary, and auditing the titles and accounts, and performing other functions. The committee on nominations, composed of one member from each of the principal denominations represented in the board, was designed to secure impartiality in nominations to office or otherwise, the denominations being unequally represented in the board, but standing on a par to the committee which has the power to nominate and recommend to election. This is, therefore, a provision for the safety of the smaller bodies, or those having the feebler representation in the board. These committees, as well as the board, usually meet once a month, though some of them, as those on legacies and finance, oftener, and the sessions are from one to two hours long, or sometimes times longer. These services are rendered without compensation, only the officers who give their entire time and labor to the society receiving any salary.

V. Text circulated.—The constitution declares that "the sole object of this society shall be to encourage a wide and freer circulation of the Holy Scriptures, without sect or comment;" and "the only copies in the English language to be circulated by the society shall be of the version now in common use," meaning by that what is commonly called King James's Version. And as this was then, as it is now, the version universally received by the Christian churches using the English tongue, so it was to be the common bond of the churches combined in this association. When the society extended its labors into foreign countries, and was called on to appropriate funds to print the Scriptures as translated into other languages, the same general rule was adopted. The principles of the English Bible were to be followed as far as this, that they were satisfied should be catholic, so that all denominations might use it as they do our English Bible. It is the duty of the committee on versions to see that this rule is followed in every new version for the printing of which funds are solicited from this society. It also devolves on this committee to see if any verbal inaccuracies that may crop into the society's editions, or to determine on the correct reading when the several editions differ. This is, of course, a very delicate and difficult function, requiring great judgment and wisdom as well as competent scholarship.

VI. Auxiliaries.—It was soon found that the central society could do but little by its own unaided efforts toward supplying the wants of the country. Accordingly, arrangements were made for receiving auxiliaries into connection with the parent society. Circumstances were issued calling on the friends of the Bible in different parts of the country to organize auxiliary societies, but circulations and letters did not accomplish the object. Auxiliaries were not organized in sufficient numbers; whether for want of interest on the part of pastors, the want of knowledge and experience, or want of appreciation of the work, is of no use to attempt to decide: such was the fact.

VII. Agents.—To accomplish this work, it became necessary to appoint agents. In 1815 the Rev. R. D. Hall was appointed agent for this purpose, and from that time others have been added, as the work of the society has extended over a wider region of country. In 1865 there were thirty-seven agents, extending over the entire United States and Territories, including California, Oregon, Washington, Kansas, and Minnesota. An agent has been sent also to Utah. Besides these, several agents are employed in foreign countries. Under the labors of these agents auxiliary Bible Societies have been organized in every part of the land, the number of which, with their branch societies, now amounts to over one hundred. These societies are those into which the books are distributed, each being expected to supply the wants of its own territory. The effort of the agents is continually directed to keeping them engaged in this work.

VIII. Paid Secretaries.—The original executive office of the society consisted of a secretary, without any compensation for their service. The first paid officer was Mr. John Mitchie, agent and accountant from 1810, clergymen of New York rendering voluntary service as secretaries until 1826, when Mr. John C. Brigham, now the Rev. Dr. Brigham, was employed first as assistant secretary, and subsequently as corresponding secretary. Such he remained, in connection with the New York committee, with great diligence and success until 1840, at which time the society had made great advancement. This year its receipts amounted to $97,355.09, and its issues to 157,261 volumes. The Methodist Episcopal Church, at their General Convention of 1856, agreed to disband their denominational Bible Society and unite with the national institution in its, or some other, form. The New York society was employed, selected in 1840 from that body, and no man could better have served the purpose than the Rev. E. S. Janes, afterward bishop of the church which he has served with such faithfulness and distinguished ability. In 1844 the Rev. N. Levings was chosen his successor, and after this the society's successful work was done. In 1849, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Joseph Holdich, D.D., at an Annual Meeting in 1837, Joseph Hyde, Esq., was made general agent, and Mr. Ritchie was made treasurer. The latter died in 1838, and was succeeded by Abraham Keyser, Esq. The treasurer in 1866 was William White, Jr., Esq. In 1866 the society had three secretaries, Rev. Dr. Holdich, Rev. Dr. Taylor, and Rev. T. Ralston Smith; an assistant treasurer, Henry Fish, Esq.; and Mr. Caleb Rowe, general agent. The other officers and members of the board, not devoting all their time to the society, receive no pay.

IX. Buildings, &c.—The business of the society was conducted at 37, Park Row, and at the Astor Homeopathic Hospital. From the latter it was removed to the National homeopathic Hospital. The present building is in the 61st Street at Astor Place. It was erected partly by special subscriptions, chiefly in the city of New York, and partly by the proceeds of the sale of the old premises. The building contains by a loan, the rent of the rooms not immediately wanted for the society's purposes paying the interest and gradually liquidating the debt. The whole debt will be probably paid off before the society will require the use of the entire building. Not a dollar was drawn from the regular income of the society for erecting the Bible House. There are at present 17 power-presses employed, with about 400 persons. With the present force the society makes from 3000 to 4000 volumes a day, and issues from 700,000 to 800,000 volumes per annum of the Holy Scriptures.

X. Finances and Issues.—The receipts of the society vary somewhat with the state of the times and according to the legacies received. In 1865 the receipts from the public were $64,000, and the total receipts, with expenses, were upward of $642,000. These funds are expended in supplying the destitute at home, and in printing and circulating the Holy Scriptures in foreign parts. The number of volumes issued by this society in the year 1865, as shown in the annual report, was over 561,000, while over 40,000 were expended on printing and circulating the Scriptures in foreign countries, besides what was expended in preparing Bibles at home for foreign use.

XI. The Baptist Difficulty.—In 1885 a serious difficulty arose in the society. The Baptist missionaries in Burma published, with funds drawn from the society, a book in which the Greek words βαπτίζων and βαπτίζεων were rendered by words signifying immersion and to immerse. When this came to the knowledge of the managers they refused to make appropriations for publishing such versions, on the ground that to take the funds in question to construct a version which did not give the doctrine taught, to circulate what they held to be error, would have been a violation of truth. Besides, the constitution forbids the publication of any other than a catholic Bible, or such a Bible as all Christians can use in common. The new rendering had the force of a comment. This decision gave great offence to many of the Baptist agents, and controversy arose. Into the merits of this controversy we do not enter. It ended in the alienation of a large portion of this influential and numerous body of Christians from the interests of the society. It is understanding that the leading members of the Church, the men of remained, and still continue fast friends of the A. B. S.

It is to be hoped that some modes of reconciliation may be discovered and adopted, as the division of the Bible Society cannot but be regretted by all who value Christian love and harmony. The Bible is the common bond between the Protestant Churches, and there ought to be but one general Bible Society.

XII. The Revision Difficulty.—In 1857 a new difficulty arose in regard to the English version. About 1848, the managers, learning that numerous discrepancies and typographical errors existed in the various editions of the Bible issued by them, referred the subject to the committee on Versions for investigation. It was finally resolved that the committee should make corrections according to a set of rules submitted by them to the board. This was accomplished by a very learned and able body of men in about three years, and was approved by the board, who directed that as fast as the old stereotype plates were worn out, they should be replaced by new ones containing the corrections.
The work seemed to give general satisfaction, and many of the plates were recast according to the new "standard." Six years after the "standard" was finished, it was objected that unwarranted changes had been made: many of the headings of the chapters, and in the running heads of the columns. Those in the text were confessed to be very few and of small account. The changes in the headings were more numerous and important. It may seem strange that what was in itself so small a matter should have creded difficulty, but such was the fact. Many auxiliaries, some covering entire states, refused to receive or circulate the new standard. The managers were puzzled. The subject was debated long and earnestly, until at length the board resolved to refer the matter to a special committee of able and distinguished men, of different professions and various ecclesiastical relations, for their mature and ample consideration. The result was the adoption by the board of the following resolutions, passed January 28th, 1858:

"Resolved, That this society's present standard English Bible be referred to the standing committee on versions for examination; and in all cases where the committee shall consider it necessary or desirable to amend the Bibles previously published by the society, the committee are directed to correct the same by conformance with previous editions printed by this society, or by the authorized British preference, reference being also had to the original edition of the translators printed in 1611. In the event of such corrections being adopted by the board, to the end that a new edition, thus perfected, may be adopted as the standard edition of the society.

"Resolved, That until the completion and adoption of such new standard edition, the English Bibles to be issued by this society shall be such as conform to the editions of the society anterior to the late revision, so far as may be practicable, and excepting only where the persons or auxiliaries applying for Bibles shall prefer to be supplied from copies of the present standard edition now on hand or in process of manufacture." See Authorized English Version.

Accordingly, the committee on versions is now engaged in their work of revision on the plan adopted by the board. It is hoped that, as all the valuable corrections made in the late standard edition that were the result of simple collations of the editions published by the society will be retained, the final result of the new revision will be a Bible more generally acceptable to the Christian community than any former edition.

4. American Bible Society (New York, N. Y. 1866—7).—This society grew out of the difficulty mentioned above (American Bible Society, § 11). The resolution of the A. B. S. passed in May, 1866, was as follows:

"Resolved, That in appropriating money for the translating, printing, or distributing of the sacred Scriptures, the American Bible Society is committed to liberty to encourage only such versions as conform in the principle of their translation to the common English version, at least so far as all the religious denominations represented in this society can consist-tently use and circulate said versions in their several schools and denominations.

The Rev. S. H. Cone, D.D. (q. v.), an eminent Baptist, had once been a secretary of the board, and was at this time a manager. He resisted this resolution ably and strenuously (see Sprague, Annals, vi, 649).
In April, 1867, a large convention, held in Philadelphia, formed a company under the name of "The American and Foreign Bible Society." Then the society took the ground that aid for the translating, printing and distributing of the Scriptures in foreign languages should be afforded to "such versions only as are conform as nearly as possible to the original text in the Hebrew and Greek." The special aim here was the rendering of πανταρρίλα by "immeasurably" instead of "kappote." On the other hand, in the distribution of the Scriptures in the English language, it was agreed that the commonly received version should be used until otherwise directed by the society. The latter point led to a new split in 1865, one party demanding that the principle of circulating for practical use should be "conformed to the original" should be applied to the English versions also, and that, consequence, the common English version should be revived. Resolutions rejecting this principle were adopted in the meeting of the society in 1856, and led to the resignation of Dr. Cone, who, until then, had been the president. A new society was formed, which undertook the revision of the English version on the above principle (see American Bible Union). According to the constitution of the A. and F. B. S., a contribution of $8 constitutes one a member, a contribution of $20 a life member, and a contribution of $150 a life director. Up to 1869 the number of life members and life directors had been 6515, of whom 104 were made such in the financial year 1865—6. The society publishes a monthly, entitled The Bible Advocate.
For the year 1865—6 the total receipts were $40,896 40.
The Scriptures were printed and circulated in fifty dif-fersent languages and dialects from the Bibles previously published by the society, the committee are directed to correct the same by conforming with previous editions printed by this society, or by
the authorized British preference, reference being also
had to the original edition of the translators printed in 1611. It is the object of this society to procure and circulate the most faithful versions of the sacred Scriptures in all languages throughout the world." A special aim of the society was consequently to revise the common English version. The most striking point in their revision thus far is the rendering of βασιλεία by "immersion," and of πανταρρίλα by "immeasurably." In this general majority of American churches believe to have been the real object of the organization. The society has met with strong opposition even among the Baptists. Its plan provided for a revision of the New Testament by scholars acting, in the first instance, independently of each other, each working on a separate portion, then under contract by the board. In this way, one set of scholars were employed in Europe and another in America. All books needed for the work were provided at the expense of the Union. The revisers chose from their supposed fitness, upon recommendation of those to whom they were known. These schol-ard in this way, that the scholars were responsible to no ecclesiastical body. The revisions were to be subjected to general criticism, and for this purpose the Gospels, Acts, Galatians, Ephesians, Hebrews, Thessalonians, mon, Timothy, Titus, Epistles of John, Jude, lation, have been printed with the common English version and the Greek text in parallel columns, with the authorities for the proposed changes, and the remaining portions of the New Testament are rapidly appearing. The revisions are placed in the hands of a final college of revisers for the perfecting of the work designed for popular use. The plan provides for five or more members in the final college. Rev. T. J. Conant, D.D., Rev. H. B. Hackett, D.D., in America, and Prof. Rödiger, of the University of Halle, Germany, have been announced as members of the final college. The revision of the Old Testament is mainly committed to Rev. T. J. Conant, D.D., Rev. G. R. Bliss, D.D., and Rev. H. B. Hackett, D.D. Proverbs, Job, and part of Genesis have been published, and much of the remaining portion is maturing for the press. The Union has done much for foreign Scripture distribution, aiding largely the German, Karen, Spanish, Italian, Burman, and Siamese departments. It has prepared and published new revisions of the Italian and the Spanish New Testament. The membership of the Union embraces about thirty thousand persons, and it has had in the English-speaking world with it through the "Bible Revision Association" of Louisville, Kentucky, having the same objects and acting in concert with it. Thirty dollars constitute a person a member, and one hundred dollars a director for life. The Union meets annually in October, in New York. Its business is conducted by a board of thirty-three members, who meet the board assembles monthly, and occupies the Bible Rooms, No. 350 Broome Street, N. Y. The receipts of the year 1866 exceeded $40,000.00. Four octavo volumes, 500 pages each, containing a republication of the official documents of the Union, bring down its history to the present date (1866). The organ of the society is "The Bible Union Quarterly." On a controversy about the management of the society, see Judd, Review of the American Bible Union (N. Y. 1857, 8vo), and the replies by the organs of the Union.

Bible, Use of by the Laity. The Word of God is intended for the use of all classes of men. In the early ages of the Church its universal perusal was not only allowed, but urged by bishops and pastors. It is said that the generation who read the Bible was found to interfere with the claims of the papacy that its "perils for the common mind" were discovered. As the use of Latin disappeared among the people, the Vulgate Bible became less and less intelligible to them, and this fact was early welcomed as an aid to the schemes of the Roman hierarchy. In the 11th century Gregory VII (Epist. vii. 11) thanks God for it, tending to save the people from misunderstanding the Bible. The reforming and heretical sects (Cathari, Albigenses, Waldenses, etc.), of the 12th and 13th century appealed to the Bible in all their disputes, thus furnishing it an additional veneration for shattering up the Word of God. In 1229, the Council of Toulouse, in its 14th canon, "forbids the laity to have in their possession any copy of the books of the Old and New Testament, except the Psalter, and such portions of them as are contained in the Breviary, or the Hours of the Virgin; and most strictly forbids these works in the vulgar tongue, including those the Council (1220) ordered all vernacular versions to be brought to the bishop to be burnt. Similar prohibitions were issued from time to time in the next two centuries by bishops and synods, especially in France and Germany, though with little direct effect. In the "Ten Rules concerning Protestantism" of the German Council of Trent, and approved by Pius IV (Buckley, Canons and Decrees of Trent, p. 284), we find the following: In Rule III versions of O. T. may be "allowed only to plains and learned men at the discretion of the bishop;" in Rule IV it is stated that "if the sacred books be permitted in the vulgar tongue indiscriminately, more harm than utility arises therefrom by reason of the tameness of many. The bishop or inferior clergy grant permission to safe persons to read them; all book-sellers selling to unauthorized persons are to be punished. The Jansenist movement in the 17th century, and especially the publication of Quesnel's N. T. in French (Paris, 1699), gave rise to a new stringency, in which the bishops of which Roman to be read. In the 18th century there was a reaction, and the publication and reading of vernacular versions was even encouraged by the better class of Roman bishops. The establishment of the Bible Societies (q. v.) in the beginning of this century gave new alarm to the Roman hierarchies. The last patriarch of Jerusalem, who died in 1821, was silenced. The diffusion of Protestant Bibles were issued by Pius VII (1816), Leo XII (1824), and Gregory XVI (1832). Though the animus of these encyclicals is hostile to the free use of the Bible, they yet do not, in terms, prohibit it. At this day it is well understood, and admitted by all intelligent Romanists themselves, that the contents of the Bible are equally read, but for the sake of reading the Word of God for themselves by the Roman Church. For the earlier history of the question, see Arnould, De la lecture de l'ecriture sainte; Hegelmayr, Geschichte des Bibelverbrechens (1783); Van Enn, Van d. notwerdigen u. nützliche Bibeldeuten (Leips. 1808, 8vo); and for the same period, later, Elliott, DELIMINATION OF ROMANISM, I, ch. xvi.

Biblia Pauperum (Bible of the Poor). (I.) The title given to a Bible Manual, or Picture-Bible, prepared in the Middle Ages for the use of children of the poor, whence its name. It consisted of forty to fifty pictures, giving the events of the life of Christ, and some O. T. events, each picture being accompanied by an illustrative text or sentence in Latin. Nicolas of Hanapia, the last patriarch of Jerusalem, who died in 1201, is said to have written the first of the Latin texts for pictures. A similar work on a more extended scale, and with the legend or text in rhymed, was called Speculum Humanae Salvationis, i.e. the "Mirror of Human Salvation." Before the Reformation, these two books were used in schools. They were in books made of wood, which were held by monks, in preaching, and took the place of the Bible with the laity, and even clergy. The lower orders of the regular clergy, such as the Francisca, Carthusians, etc., took the title of "Pauperes Christi," Christ's poor. Many manuscripts of the Biblia Pauperum are preserved in various countries, several as old as the thirteenth century, are preserved in different languages; but they are nearly all imperfect. The pictures of this series were copied in sculptures, in wall and glass painting, altar-pieces, etc., and thus became of importance in the art of the Middle Ages. After the discovery of printing, the Biblia Pauperum was perhaps the first book that was printed in the Netherlands and Germany, first with wooden blocks, and then with types. (II.) The name of Biblia Pauperum is also given to a work of Bonaventura, in which the Biblical events were alphabetically arranged, and accompanied by notes—some of them very eccentric—for the benefit of preachers, thus attempting to give their intellectual shortcomings. Biblouander, Theodore, a Swiss divined of the Reformation period, whose proper name was Buchmann. He was born in Thurgau about 1500. After studying theology he became assistant to Myconius at Zurich, and afterward, in 1532, professor of theology in the University of Zurich and Bishop of the Council of Trent, and in 1536 Bishop of Zurich. He was eminently noted for his zeal in his faith, and for his reforming zeal in the Church of Zurich. He was also noted for his learning and eloquence, and for his ability to defend the truth against all its foes. Biblical Introduction. See INTRODUCTION TO THE SCRIPTURES.

Biblical Theology is the name given, especially in Germany, to a branch of scientific theology, which has for its object to set forth the theology of the Bible without reference to ecclesiastical or dogmatical formulas or creeds. (We make large use in this article of Nitzsch's article in Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie, vol. i.)

The name Biblical theology can be taken (as is the term theology in general) in a narrower and a wider sense, the narrower including only the sum of religious doctrine contained in the Old and New Testament Scriptures; the wider comprehending the science of the Bible in all its respects in which it may be made the object of investigation. Usually it is taken in the narrower sense, and some writers prefer, therefore, the name Biblical dogmatics.

As may be seen from the definition, Biblical theology has a very clearly defined relation to exegetical and historical theology no less than to systematic theology. It is the flower and quintessence of all exegetical investigations, for the very object of exegesis is to find out, with such an eye as the true teaching of the word of God with regard to His own nature and the relations of man to Him. Its relation to historical theology is that of the foundation to the superstructure, for both the History of Doctrines and the History of the Church must set out with a fixed view of the teaching of the Scriptures as to the fundamental questions of religion. So, too, Systematic Theology, while it includes the statements of doctrine made in the creeds and formulas of the Church, must yet rest ultimately upon the authority of the Scriptures.

The beginning of Biblical theology may be said to be the Bible itself, for Scripture proofs were always needed and made use of against heathens, heretics, and Jews. But when tradition came to be recognized as a rule of faith, equally important as the Scripture, and the Church claimed for her doctrinal decisions and her interpretations of the Bible the same infallibility as for the authority of the Bible itself, the cultivation of strictly Biblical theology fell into disrepute. The Reformation of the 16th century undertook to purify the Church by the restoration of the Christianity of the Bible, and the catechisms and confessions of the Reformed churches may therefore be regarded as attempts to arrange the doctrines of the Bible into a system. The early Protestant works on systematic theology sought to prove the doctrines of the several churches by Biblical texts; at the head of each article of doctrine a Biblical text was placed and thoroughly explained.

Zacharius (1777), professor of theology in the University of Kiel, wrote Biblische Theologie, eine systematische Darstellung der vormuthen theologischen Lehren (Göttingen, 1777-78; last part edited by Vollholt, 1786). Zacharias understood by Biblical Theology, "not that theology the substance of which is taken from Scripture, for in this sense every theological system must be biblical, but more generally a precise definition of all the doctrines treated of in systematic theology, the correct meaning which, in accordance with Scripture, should be applied to them, and the best arguments in their defence." His was accordingly the first attempt to treat Biblical theology as a separate branch of theological science, independently of systematic theology. He was followed by Hoffnagel (Bibl. Theologie, Erlangen, 1785-86), Ammon (Bibl. Theologie, Erlangen, 1786), Baumgarten-Crusius, among the Rationalists; and by Storr and Flatt (1805), translated by Schmucker (Andover, 1836, 2d edition, 8vo), Supernaturalist. The position which Biblical theology now generally occupies in German theology was first defined by Gabler (De justo discrimine Theologiae, Ad gentes, 3d ed., 1808, 4to), Tholuck (M.S. Lectures, translated by Park, Biblische Sacra, 1844, 552) remarks as follows on the state of Biblical theology up to that time: "In this department we have no satisfactory treatise for students. The older writers, as Zacharias, are prolix and devoid of taste. Storr and Knapp have given us, on the whole, the best textbook of Biblical theology in the proper sense of the phrase. Since the beginning of the 19th century, the name Biblical Dogmatic Theology has been applied to the science which is more properly called Dogmatic History. Certain theologians, who take a Rationalistic view of Christian doctrine, have developed the work of the seventeenth century in the Bible, from the time of Abraham to that of Jesus and the apostles, as the product of human reason in its course of gradual improvement; and, in this view, Biblical theology has for its object to exhibit the gradual development of reason in its application to religion, as it kept pace with the advance of the times in which the writers of the Bible lived. The Biblical Dogmatics of Von Ammon, De Wette, Baumgarten-Crusius, and Von Collin are written in this Rationalistic spirit" (see De Wette, Biblische Dogmatik d. Alten u. Neuen Testaments (Berlin, 1813, and often); Baumgar ten-Crusius, Grundzüge der Bibl. Theologie (Jena, 1829); and Collin, Bibl. Theologie (Leips. 1842)).

Nitzsch, in his Christliche Lehre (6th ed. 1851; translated, badly, Edinburgh, Clark's Library), develops its own view of the doctrines of the Bible in systematic form, apart from all dogmatical creeds. But he distinguishes (§ 4) "Christian doctrine" from "Biblical theology" in this, that the former seeks to interpret "the period of completed revelation, and of Christian faith and life in its finished form, as set forth by the apostles, finally and for all time; while the latter ought to take note of the development of revelation, in its various stages, from the time of Abraham to that of the apostles. He therefore makes the theology of the Church bear the same relation to the "system of Christian doctrine" that the History of Doctrines bears to dogmatics. The work of S. Lütz (Bibl. Dogmatik, 1847) is valuable for systematic method no less than for a thorough understanding of the contents of the Bible.

Biblical theology, in the narrower sense, has been again subdivided into the theology of the Old and the theology of the New Testament. Works on the former have been published by Vatke (Die Religion des A. T. 1st vol. Berl. 1835) and Bruno Bauer (Die Religion des A. T. 2 vols. 1838). Both are strongly influenced by Hegel's Philosophy of Religion. A better work is Hävernick, Vorlesungen über d. Theologie des Alten Bundes (posthumously; Frankfort, 1868). From the Roman Catholic side we have Scholz, Handbuch d. Theologie des Alten Bundes (Regensburg, 1862, 2 vols. 8vo). On the theology of the New Testament we have G. Schlicher, die biblischen Grundzüge der vormuthen theologischen Lehren (Göttingen, 1863; 2d ed., published by Weizsäcker, 1859), G. L. Hahn (Die Theologie des N. T. Leipzig, 1864, 1st vol.), and a posthumous work by F. C. Baur (Vorlesungen über neutestamentliche Theologie, Leipzig, 1861). The teachings of the different writers of the N. T. have been made the subjects of special works. The Pauline system has been treated of by Unertl (Entwicklung des a disciple was interrogated, and the verse he read was examined. In the first school the following words of the prophet Isaiah were read: "There is no peace at the wicked" (Isa. xlviii, 22); in another, these words of the Psalmist: "Unto the wicked, God said, etc." What he said to the Bishop of Milan, "You are my Bishop. Do not you take my covenant in my mouth?" (Ps. 1, 16). Similar sentences being heard in all the synagogues against Acher, it was concluded that he was hated by God (Barnage's Hist. of the Jews, p. 165). See BARTHELEMY.

In former times, among the common people in England and Scotland, the Bible was consulted on matters of the most vital importance, such as the hour of his death, or the number of the house, before he had partaken of food, walking up to open it, and placing his finger at random on a verse—that verse declaring his fortune for the next twelve months. The Bible, with a sixpence inserted into the book of Ruth, was placed under the pillows of young people, to give them dreams of matrimonial divinities. In some parts of Scotland the sick were fanned with the leaves of the Bible, and a Bible was put under the head of women after childbirth, and into the cradle of newborn children. A Bible and key were sometimes employed to detect a thief; nay, more than all, a respected witch was taken to church, and weighed against the Bible. If she outweighed the Bible, she was acquitted; but if the Bible outweighed her she was condemned (Brand's Popular Antiquities, iii. 22).

Some well-meaning people among the Protestants practise a kind of bibliomancy in order to determine the state of their souls or the path of duty. It prevailed among the Moravians, along with the use of dice; and John Wesley sometimes made use of it. But the Word of God was never meant to operate as a charm, nor to be employed as a lot-book. It can only truly guide and edify when rightly and consistently understood. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. uk. xvi, ch. iv.; Buck, Thol. Dict. s. v.; Edie, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Wesley, Works, v. 816, 818.

THEOCA PATRUM.

Bibliotheca Patrum, a collection of the works of the early ecclesiastical writers.

(1.) The title was first applied to the work which originated with M. de la Bigne, who formed the idea of a collection of the fathers with a view of opposing the doctrines of the French Protestants. This scheme met with the approbation of his superiors in the Sorbonne, and the first eight volumes appeared at Paris in 1575, and the 9th in 1579. It is entitled Bibliotheca Patrum, hoc est, a collection intended to draw the lives and writings of sanctissimorum Latine, and it contained about 200 writers. The 2d ed., somewhat improved, was published at Paris in 1598, 9 vols. fol. The 3d ed. (Paris, 1679, 11 vols. fol.) has the addition of an Auctarium. In these editions the writers are classed according to subjects. The 4th ed. or, rather, a new work by the professors of Cologne, has the writers arranged in chronological order. It was printed at Cologne 1608, in 14 vols. fol., to which in 1622 a supplement in one vol. was added. The 5th ed. (or 4th of De la Bigne) was published at Paris in 1624, in 10 vols. fol., with the addition of an Auctarium Graeco-Latinum compiled by Le Duc (the Jesuit Fronto Dacier). If she outweighed the Bible, she was acquitted; but if the Bible outweighed her she was condemned (Brand's Popular Antiquities, iii. 22).

After this gigantic undertaking, no similar work appears until that of André Galland was published, under the title of Bibliotheca veterum Patrum caritatisquorumque Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum postremum Lugdunense multo locupletior apte accuratus, in 14 vols. fol. (Venice, 1678, 1781). Galland omits many authors given in the Bibli. Max., but adds also 180 not given in it.

Bichri (Heb. Bikri, בִּכְרִי, first-born or youthful, perhaps Becherith; Sept. Beqon; Vulg. Bichry), apparently a Benjamite, father of Sheba, the revoler from David (2 Sam. xx, 1 sq.). B.C. ante 1016. See Becher.

Bickell, Johann Wilhelm, a learned writer on ecclesiastical law, was born at Marburg in 1799, became in 1820 privy-counsel, and in 1824 professor of law at Marburg. In 1846 he was the representative of Hassa-Cassel at the Protestant General Conference of Berlin, and soon after was placed at the head of the ministry of justice in the Electorate of Hesse. He died at Cassel in 1848. He is the author of a history of ecclesiastical law (Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1848). Among his other works are Über die Reformation in den Kirchenstaaten (Munich, 1831), and Über die Verpflichtung der evangelisch Geistlichen auf die symbolischen Schriften (Marb. 1839).

Bickersteth, Edward, was born March 19, 1786, at Kirkby Lonsdale, Westmorland. He received his early education at the grammar-school of Kirkby Lonsdale, then spent five years in an attorney's office in London, and commenced business as a solicitor at Norwich in 1812. While yet in business he took a peculiar interest in religious subjects. He wrote and published in 1814 A Help to the Study of the Scriptures, which in its enlarged form has had an enormous circulation. His strong religious feelings led him to devote himself to the ministerial office, and in 1815 he was ordained deacon; the Bishop of Norwich having been induced to dispense in his case with the usual university training, in consequence of its being represented to him that the Church Missionary Society were anxious to obtain his services to reorganize the stations of the society in Africa, and to act afterward as their secretary. A fortnight later the Bishop of Norwich appointed him to full ordination, and immediately departed with his wife to Africa. He returned in the following autumn, having accomplished the purposes of his visit. He continued in the secretariatship for fifteen years, and in the course of his official journeys he acquired great influence and popularity. In 1820 he resigned his office, and accepted the rectory of Watton, in Norfolk, where he spent the rest of his life. He was during the whole of that time in constant request as the advocate, by sermons and speeches, not only of the missionary, but of almost every other religious society connected with the Church of England, or in which, as in the Bible Society, he appeared until that of the Evangelical Alliance (of which he was one of the founders), Church of England men and members of other churches associate. He also produced during his residence at Watton a constant succession of religious publications, which were for the most part read in the circles to which they were chiefly addressed. His greatest activity was in denouncing the spread of Tractarian opinions in the Church of England. In his later years he manifested a growing interest in the study of prophecy. The unfulfilled prophecies were made the frequent subject of his discourses, and he published several treatises on these subjects. Among his literary labors might be mentioned the Christian Family Library, which he edited, and which extended to 50 vols. Mr. Bickersteth was in 1841 attacked by paralysis, but recovered.

In 1846 he was thrown from his chaise under a laden cart, the wheels of which passed over him; but, though dreadfully injured, he was after a time restored to health and activity, and survived till Feb. 28, 1850, when he died of congestion of the brain. His writings are characterized by earnest religious feeling rather than by power or depth of thought. They are collected in an edition published in 1853 (16 vols. 8vo). See Birk's Memoirs of Rev. E. Bickersteth (New York, 1861, 2 vols. 12mo); Eng. Cyclop. s. v.

Bidding Prayer. One of the offices of deacons in the early Church, which was to direct the people in the exercise of their public duties. They were accustomed to use certain forms of words, to give notice when each part of the service began, and to exhort the people to join attentively. This was called by the Greeks προειρύσσει and by the Latins predicatio, which means performing the office of a prooip or præce. By some writers the deacons are called τοποριεχοντες, the holy eiers of the Church, as those who gave notice to the church or congregation to pray and join in the several parts of the service. The form, "Let us pray," repeated before several prayers in the English liturgy, is derived from this ancient practice in the Church. Burren gives the form as used before the Reformation as follows: After the preacher had named and opened his text, he called on the people to go to their prayers, and told them for what they should pray. Ye shall pray, says he, for the king, the pope, etc. After this, all the people said their beads in a general silence; and the minister also knelt down and said his. They then said a paternoster, an ave maria, etc., and then the sermon proceeded (Burren, Hist. of Reformation, ii, 20).

Not only did the deacons call the people to pray, but they gave direction as to the particulars they were to pray for. In the apostolical constitutions we have a bidding prayer for the communicants, in which are specified the prayers of two subjects: the prayer at the commencement of the communion service, and also the litany of the Common Prayer-Book, bear a close affinity to the bidding prayers in the apostolical constitutions. The formulary which the Church of England, in the 5th can, directs to be used, is called the bidding prayer, because in it the preacher is directed to bid the people to pray for certain specified objects. —Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, ch. xx, § 10, and bk. xv, ch. i; § 1; Proctor on Common Prayers, p. 171; Buck, Theol. Dict. s. v.

Biddle, John, one of the first preachers of Socinianism in England, and cruelly persecuted on that account. He was born at Wotton, Gloucestershire, in 1615. He took the degree of D.C.L. at Oxford, and was appointed master of the grammar-school of Gloucester. He soon began to exhibit his Socinian bias, and was, in consequence, imprisoned and examined by commissioners appointed for the purpose. He published, in 1647, Twelve Arguments, etc., against the Deity of the Holy Spirit (Lond. 4to), which was burned by the hangman; and in 1648 he put forth a Confession of Faith concerning the Trinity, for which he was a second time imprisoned. In 1654 he issued a Brief Scripture Catechism (Lond. 8vo), which was answered by John Owen in his Visiæ Evangelicæ. Cromwell banished him, in 1665, to the Scilly Islands, but after three years he was recalled, and became the leader of some congregation of Independents. In the reign of Charles II he was in trouble again, and was a third time put into prison, where he died in 1662. See Toulmin, Life and Character of Biddle (Lond. 1789, 12mo).

Biddulph, Thomas T., M.A., was born in Worchestershire, England, 1758, studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and became minister of St. James's, Bristol, 1798. He was a noted poet and author, and died 1808. Among his published works are Practical Essays on the Liturgy (Lond. 3d ed. 1822, 3 vols. 8vo):—Baptism a Sice of the Covenant (Lond. 1816, 8vo):—

patriarch (Gen. xxxvii, 24) was probably the distant ancestor to Shuah, the sixth son of Abraham by Keturah, and called by his name (Gen. xxxvii, 2). This was apparently in Arabia Petraea, as Shuah settled in the same quarter as his brothers, of which there can be little doubt; and to this region we are to refer the town and district to which he gave his name, and in which Biledah was doubtless a person of consequence, if not a prince, to which place a son of Biledah belonged, and consequently Bileam, who probably Belaites. The occurrence of Bilhan as well as Bala in the tribe of Benjamin—names both imported from Edom—is remarkable.—Smith, s. v. See Benjamin.

Bill (בִּל (bīl), ãspher, ãßhôvô; any thing written, and usually rendered book. The passage in Job xxxvi, 35, "Oh! that one would hear me! . . . that mine adversary had written a book," would be more properly rendered, "that mine adversary had given me a written accusation," or, in modern phraseology, "a bill of indictment." In other places we have the word "bill," as "bill of divorce" (Deut. xxxiv, 1, 8; Isa. 1, 1; Jer. iii, 8; Matt. xix, 7; Mark x, 4 [see Divorce]); and in Jer. xxix, 16-17, 44, "the evidence," in the margin. "the writing," the latter which implies a legal conveyance of landed property.

In the New Testament, the word γράμμα (properly a written mark) is translated "bill" in the parable of the unjust steward (Luke xvi, 6, 7). Here, too, a legal instrument is meant, as the lord's "debtors" are presumed to have been tenants who paid him rent in kind. The steward, it would appear, sought their good-will, not merely by lowering the existing claim for the year, but by granting a new contract, under which the tenants were permanently to pay less than they had previously done. He directed the tenants to write out the contracts, but doubtless gave them validity by some written mark, like the Hebrew term, signifies a "letter" or written communication (1 Kings xxxi, 8; 2 Kings v, 5; x, 1; xix, 14; xx, 12; 2 Chron. xxix, 17; Esther i, 22; iii, 13; viii, 5, etc.; Acts xxviii, 21; Gal. vi, 11).

Bilhan (Bilhanes of Bilianaes, Theobald), was born at Billigheim near the end of the fifteenth century. His real name was Gerlach, but he took his surname from his birthplace. He was born in the year 1452. In 1519 he was at Heidelberg, 1519. In 1518 (April 26) Luther disputed in the schnecken of the Augustinians at Heidelberg with several Romish orators. Bilhcan attended, with Brentz (q. v.) and Schnepf, and was so impressed by Luther that he at once joined his side of the controversy. His lectures in the university, as well as those of Brentz, found great favor with the students, but an inquisitor into his teaching was soon ordered by the authorities. He left Heidelberg in 1522 for Weil, and was driven from thence to Nördlingen, where he remained as pastor till 1535. His preaching was very useful to the Reformation. In the controversy about the Eucharist he sided with Luther against Zwingli. In 1536 he returned to Heidelberg, where he was allowed to lecture on the Decretals and on the Judaeans till 1544, when he was driven away from the university, and imprisoned for a time at Dilsberg. His last years were spent as Professor of Hebrew at Marburg, and he died there August 8th, 1564.—Herzog, Real-Encykl. ii, 288.

Billroth, Johann Gustav Friedrich, a German theologian, was born in 1808 at Lübeck, became in 1834 professor of biblical theology at Halle, and died there in 1863. He wrote, among others, the following works: Beiträge zur wissenschaftlichen Kritik der herrschenden Theologie (Leipsic, 1813); Commentarii in die Briefe des Apostolis Paulus om die Korinthian (Leipsic, 1833); Vorlesungen über Religionsphilosophie, published after his death by Erdmann (Leipsic, 1837).

Bilney, Thomas, one of the English reformers and martyrs, was born at Norfolk about 1500, and educated

at Cambridge. From his boyhood he was remarkable for his pains bent, and he sought aid in the way of holiness, modesty, and the exercise of other parts in the Bom-siah Church. But he sought in vain until, by reading the N. T. in the translation of Erasmus, he was deli-ivered from the errors of popery and the bondage of sin; and, leaving the study of human law, devoted himself wholly to the study of divinity. He soon began to preach in the metropolis. His industry was working successfully. Many towns, among whom was Latimer, were led by his instrumentality to the Saviour. He continued his labors with great effect until Wosley, alarmed by his success, arrested him, Nov. 25, 1537, and brought him to trial for preaching the doctrines of Luther.
After a appearance before his was overcin by the pecus of his friends from that of from conviction, and he signed a recantation, Deember 7, 1529. After this he returned to Cambridge; but the consideration of what he had done brought him to the brink of despair. Being restored, however, by the grace of God to peace of conscience, he resolved to give up his life in defense of the truth he had sinfully abjured. Accordingly, in 1531, he went to Norfolk, and there preached the Gospel, at first privately and in houses, afterward openly in the fields, bewailing his former recantation, and begging all men to take warning by him, and never to trhe counselsof friends, so called, as his object is to deposit his from the true religion. Being thrown into prison, Drs. Call and Stokes were sent to persuade him again to recant; but the former of these divines, by Bilney's doctrine and conduct, was greatly drawn over to the side of the Gospel. Finding him inextinguishable, his judges condemned him to be burned. At the stake he rivaled the noblest martyrs of antiquity in courage and constancy.
His friend Dr. Warner, who had accompanied him, in taking his last leave of his beloved friend, was so much affected that he could say but little for his tears.
Bil-
ney accosted him with a heavenly smile, thanked him kindly for all his attentions, and, bending toward him, whispered, in a low voice, his farewell words, of which it is hard to say whether they convey more of love to his friend or faithfulness to his Master: "Peace greg-em tuam, peace gregem tuum; ut cum venerit Dominus, innescet ei sic fasciatem: Feed your flock, feed your flock; that the Lord, when he cometh, may find you sheep." And the body of the martyr was consumed to ashes, Sept. 6, 1531.

Bil'son, Thomas, Bishop of Winchester, was of German descent, but was born at Winchester about 1536. He was educated at Winchester, and was elected in 1565 to New College, of which he afterward became warden. In 1585 he published his True Difference between Christian Subjection and unchristian Rebellion; and in 1593, his Perpetual Government of Christ his Church (reprinted Oxford, 1812, 8vo). He was elected to the see of Winchester in 1596, and transferred to that of Winchester May 13th, 1597, when he was made a privy councilor. His most celebrated work is the Survey of the Sufferings of Christ for the Redemption of Man, and of his Descent into Hell for our Deliverance (Lond. 1604, fol.), which is a learned work against Calvin and the Puritans. To him, in conjunction with William Nicholson, who was in the care of revising the new translation of the Bible made in the reign of James I. He attended the Hampton Court conference, and was one of the most zealous advocates of the prerogatives of the Church. He was a person of great learning, and specially well read in the fathers and schoolmen. He died June 18, 1616. His perpetual government is considered by high Churchmen as one of the ablest defences of apostolical suc-

Bind (represented by numerous Heb. words). To bind and to loose (ζέων and λαβων) are figurative expressions, used as synonymous with command and forbids:
they are also taken for condemning and absolving (Matt.
xx. 19, 20). Binding and loosing, in the New Testament, the Jews, expressed permitting or forbidding, or judicially declaring any thing to be permitted or forbidden (comp.
John xx. 23, xvi. 19). In the admission of their doctors to interpret the Law and the Prophets, they put a key and a table-book into their hands, with these words:
"Receive the power of binding and loosing," which there seems to be an allusion in Luke xi. 52. (See Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in loc.) So Christ says, "I am not come to destroy, to unloose or dissolve, " the law, but to fulfill it; that is, to confirm and establish it (Matt. v. 17). The expression "to bind the law upon one's hand for a sign," etc., is figurative, and implies a taking for a sign or argument of the truths and precepts; but the Jews construed the phrase literally, and bound parts of the law about their wrists; hence the custom of wearing phylacteries. Rolls or volumes of writing were tied up; hence the expression in Isa.

descendants of King Saul (1 Chron. viii. 37; ix. 49). B. C. cir. 850.

Bingham, Joseph, one of the most learned and laborious divines the Church of England has ever produced, was born in 1668 at Wakefield, in Yorkshire. He studied at Oxford, and became a fellow of University College, where he had for his pupil John Pott, who afterward was archbishop of Canterbury.
When called upon to preach before the university, he chose for the subject of his sermon the mystery of the Trinity, and some expressions which were thought to be heretical raised a great storm, which eventually induced him to quit the university.
He receded to the rectory of Havant, in Hampshire, and died Aug. 17, 1723, the victim of excessive toil in pursuing his literary labors, which, owing to his large family and narrow income, were necessary to his support.
In 1708 he published the first volume of his celebrated work, Origins Ecclesiastic, or Antiquities of the Chris-ian Church, which was completed in eight vols. 8vo, the last of which appeared in 1722. He was employed in correcting and amending this work at his death, which amended edition was afterward contained in the collection of his works published at London in two vols. fol., 1726. His Origins was translated into Latin by J. H. Grichow, with the concurrence of J. F. Buddeus, and published at Halle in 1724-38, and again in 1751-61 (10 vols. 4to). This great work is a perfect repertory of facts in ecclesiastical archæology, and has not been superseded or even approached in its own line by any book since produced. Its High-Church views make it very acceptable to the Romanists, and it is highly esteemed as a work of valuable use for their own use (Augsburg, 1788-96, 4 vols. 8vo). A very convenient and cheap edition of Bingham for the use of students was published in London in 1852 (Bohn, 2 vols. royal 8vo). The best complete edition is that of Pitman (Lond. 1840, 9 vols. 8vo), which gives the citations in full from the originals, together with a life of the author. See ArchEology.

Binusius (commonly Binius), Severin, born in Juliers, was a canon and professor of theology at Cologne, where he died in 1641. He is known by his "Collection of Councils," Concilia Generalia et Provinciales Graecae et Latinae (Cologne, 4 vols. fol., 1606; 9 vols., 1618; 10 vols., Paris, 1656). The notes appended to it are of great importance. Barbourius, Bellarmino, and Suarez, and are strongly imbued with the ultramontane views of those writers. Usher, in his Antiq. Brit., calls him Contaminator Conciliorum, from the fact of his permitting himself to make alterations, which he calls corrections, in many places of the old councils, under his own name. For having been the first of the modern editors of the early collections, those are to a large extent superseded by those of Labbe and others.—Biog. Univ. iv, 501. See CounCils.

1. (Sept. Beorit.) The head of one of the families of Israelites, whose followers to the number of 648 returned from Babylon (Neh. vii, 15). In Ezra ii, 10 he is called Ban'it (q.v.), and his returnees are numbered at 642.

2. (Sept. Bovi, Baviav, and Beorvit.) A Levite, son of Henadad, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon, B.C. 536 (Neh. xii, 8); he also (if the same) assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem, B.C. 446 (Neh. iii, 24), and joined in the religious covenant, B.C. 410 (Neh. x, 9).

3. (Sept. Baviav.) The father of the Levite Noah-diah, who was one of those who assisted in weighing the silver and gold designed for the divine service on the restoration from Babylon (Ezra viii, 33). B.C. 469.

4. (Sept. Beorvit.) One of the "sons" of Pahath-moab (Neh. xi, 39), who assisted in keeping the cattle and sheep on the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 50). B.C. 456.

5. Another Israelite, one of the "sons" of Ban'it, who did the same (Ezra x, 38). B.C. 456.

Binterim, Anton Joseph, a very prolific Roman Catholic writer, was born at Dusseldorf, entered the order of Franciscans in 1756, and became in 1805 pastor at Bilk, a suburb of Dusseldorf, which office he retained until his death in 1855. In 1808 he was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment, on account of his sermons the Prussian law respecting mixed marriages. The most important of his numerous works is Die vorzüglichsten Denkwürdigkeiten der christlich-katholischen Kirche (Mentz, 1821-23, 7 vols.), an enlarged translation of Pelliccia's work on Christian antiquities. See ArchEology. Among his other works are a history of all the German councils (Geschichte der deutschen Nationalen, Provinzialen, und Diözesenconcilien, Mentz, 1833-43, 7 vols.), and a history of the archidioce.se of Cologne.

Birch, Thomas D.D., was born in London Nov. 24, 1763, of Quaker parents. For several years he acted as usher in different schools, and pursued his studies assiduously. He was ordained deacon in 1790, priest in 1791, by Bishop Hoadly, without having attended either of the universities. He owed his advancement to the patronage of Lord-chancellor Hardwicke, to whom he had been recommended early in life. In 1794 he became vicar of Ulting, in Essex; rector of Mill Mores, in N. T. Bend, Essex, 1761. In 1794 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1792 he became one of its secretaries. In 1758 the University of Aberdeen made him D.D. Dr. Birch was indefatigable in literary pursuits. The first work of importance in which he was engaged was the General Dictionary, Historical and Critical, in which he was assisted by Lockman, Ber-Birds are mentioned as articles of food in Deut. xiv, 11, 20, the intermediate verses containing a list of unclean birds, which were not to be eaten. There is a similar list in Lev. xi, 13-19. From Job vi, 6; Luke ix, 12, we find that the eggs of birds were also eaten. Quails and pigeons are edible birds mentioned in the O. T. Our Saviour's mention of the hen gathering her chickens under her wing implies that the domestic fowl was known in Palestine. The art of raising wild birds is referred to in Ps. xix, 7; Prov. i, 17; vii, 22; Amos iii, 5; Hos. v, 1; vii, 12. See Fowling. The cage full of birds in Jer. v, 27, was a trap in which decoy-birds were placed to entice others, and furnished with a trap-door which could be dropped by a fowler watching at a distance. See CAGE. This practice is mentioned in Exsul. xi, 50 (ἀγάθῳ θηρίῳ ἰν ἐκατερούς εἶπεν); Ps. ix, 13 (περὶ Ὀρέθρου). In Deut. xxi, 6, it is commanded that an Israelite, finding a bird's nest in his path, might take the young or the eggs, but must let the hen-bird go. By this means the extirpation of any species was guarded against (comp. Phocyl. Curm. p. 80 sq.). The nests of birds were sometimes followed by the Orientalists to remain in their temples and sanctuaries, as though they had placed themselves under the protection of God (comp. Herod. i, 159; Eilam, V. II. v, 17). There is probably an allusion to this in Ps. lixxiv, 3. See Nest. The seasons of migration observed by birds are noticed in Jer. viii. 7. Birds of song are mentioned in Ps. civ, 12; Excl. xii, 4. See ZOOLOGY.

Birds eye, Nathan, a Congregational minister, was born in Stratford, Conn., Aug. 19, 1714, graduated at Yale 1736, and became pastor of the church in West Haven 1742. He resigned June 1758, and retired to a farm in the town, where he spent the rest of his life. Once, after he was a hundred years old, he conducted devotional services in the church. He died Jan. 28, 1818.—Sprague, Amm. i, 416.

Bit'sha (Heb. בירסה, בירסה, for בירסנה, son of wickedness; Sept. Βοραδα, a king of Geomorrah, succorced by Abraham in the invasion by Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv, 2). B.C. cir. 2090.

Birth. (The act of parturition is properly expressed in the original languages of Scripture by some form of the verbs יאש, יאש את, rendered "bear," "travail," "bring forth," etc. In the East (q. v.) childbirth is usually attended with much less pain and difficulty than in more northern regions, although Oriental females are not to be regarded as exempt from the common dooms of woman, "in sorrow shall they bring forth children" (Gen. iii, 15). It is, however, uncertain whether the difference arises from the effect of climate or from the circumstances attending advanced civilization; perhaps both causes operate, to a certain degree, in producing the effect. Climate must have some bearing; many have observed that the difficulty of childbirth, under any climate, increases with the advance of civilization, and that in any climate the class on which the advanced condition of society most operates finds the pangs of childbirth the most severe. Such consideration may probably account for the fact that women, after they had long been under the influence of the Egyptian climate, passed through the childbirth pangs with much more facility than the women of Egypt, whose habits of life were more refined and self-indulgent (Exod. i, 19). There were, however, already recognised Hebrew midwives while the Israelites were in Egypt; and their office appears to have originated in the habit of calling in some manner of experience in such matters as chance in cases of difficulty. A remarkable circumstance in the transaction which has afforded these illustrations (Exod. i, 16) will be explained under STOOL.

The child was no sooner born than it was washed in a bath and rubbed with salt (Exek. xvi, 4); it was then immediately dressed, and brought to the mother, to whom the relations to which the tender frame of an infant is so much exposed during the first days of life (Job xxxviii, 9; Exek. xvi, 4; Luke ii, 7, 11). This custom of bandaging or swathing the new-born infant is general in Eastern countries. It was also a matter of much attention with the Greeks and Romans (see the citations in Wetzelin at Luke ii, 7), and even in our own country was not abandoned till the last century, when the repeated remonstrances of the physicians seem to have led to its discontinuance.

It was the custom at a very ancient period for the father, while music celebrated the event, to clasp the newborn infant in his bosom. In Jud. xiii, 25, when it was understood to declare it to be his own (Gen. i, 23; Job iii, 8; Ps. xxii, 11). This practice was imitated by those wives who adopted the children of their handmaids (Gen. xvi, 2; xxx, 3-5). The messenger who brought to the father the first news that a son was born to a new wife brought with him presents which he was rewarded with presents (Job iii, 8; Jer. xx, 15), as is still the custom in Persia and other Eastern countries. The birth of a daughter was less noticed, the disappointment at its not being a son subduing for the time the satisfaction which the birth of any child naturally occasions.

Among the Israelites, the mother, after the birth of a son, continued unclean seven days; and she remained at home during the thirty-three days succeeding the seven of uncleanness, forming altogether forty days of seclusion. After the birth of a daughter the mother was on the days of uncleanness and seclusion at home was doubled. At the expiration of this period she went into the tabernacle or temple, and presented a yearling lamb, or, if she was poor, two turtle-doves and two young pigeons, as a sacrifice of purification (Lev. xii, 1-8; Luke ii, 22). On the eighth day after the birth of a son the child was circumcised, by which the male issetuated to God (Gen. vii, 18; Acts ii, 38; comp. with Rom. iv, 11).—Kitt. s. v. See Child.

Roberts says, "When a person has succeeded in gaining a blessing which he has long desired, he says, 'Good! good! the child is born at last.' Has a person lost his lawsuit in a provincial court, he will go to the capital to make an appeal to a superior court; and should he there succeed, he will say, in writing to a friend, 'Good news! good news! the child is born.' When a man has been trying to gain an office, his friend, meeting him on his return, does not always ask, 'Is the child born?' or 'Did it come to the birth?' but, 'Is it a male or a female?' If he says the former, he has gained his object, if the latter, he has been disappointed. The birth of a son is always a time of great festivity in the East; hence the relations come together to congratulate the parents, and to present their gifts to the little stranger. Some bring the silver anklets; others the bracelets or ear-rings, or silver cord for the loin; others, however, take gold, and a variety of needful articles. When the infant son of a king is shown, the people make their obeisance to him (Orient. Illus.). This illustrates the offerings of the Magi, who came to Bethlehem to worship the infant Messiah, as recorded in Matt. ii, 11: 'When they had opened their treasures, they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.' The disease called Cæpnumatosa, or false conception, does not appear to have been so uncommon among the Hebrew women as among those of Europe. If it had been so, it probably would not have made its appearance on the pages of Hebrew writers in the shape of a figure of speech. The Hebrews were accustomed to expect, after severe calamities, a season of prosperity and joy. They accordingly compared a season of normal, drought, to the calamiy of the land in war; but the better destiny which followed the contrast to the joy which commonly succeeds child-birth (Isa. xiii, 8; xxi, 17; 2 Kings xix, 8; Jer. iv, 31; xiii, 21; xxi, 23; xxx, 6; Mic. iv, 9, 10; John xvi, 21, 22). But they carry the comparison still farther. Those days of adversity, which were succeeded by adversity of another and more severe kind, the calamity, which followed by sorrow yet more acute, were likened to women who labored under that disease of the system which caused them to exhibit the appearance and endure the pains of pregnancy, the result of which was either the production of nothing—to use the words of the prophet Isaiah, when it is "brought forth wind," or when it terminated in the production of a monster (Isa. xxxvi, 18; Ps. vii, 14). On this disorder, which is well known to medical men, see Michaelis's "Symptoms Comment," ii, 165. See "Discease of the *birth" (גא'ל יבּה, Matt. xiv, 6; Mark vi, 21). The observance of birthdays may be traced to a very ancient date; and the birthday of the first-born son seems in particular to have been celebrated with a degree of festivity proportioned to the joy which the event of his actual birth occasioned (Job i, 4, 13, 18). The birthdays of the Egyptian kings were celebrated with great pomp as early as the time of Joseph (Gen. xi, 20). These days were in Egypt looked upon as holy; no business was done upon them, and all parties indulged in festivities suitable to the occasion. Every Egyptian attached much importance to the preservation of his life and his birth; and it is probable that, as in Persia (Herodot. i, 133; Xenoph. Cyrop. i, 3, 9), each individual kept his birthday with great rejoicings, welcoming his friends with all the amusements and festivities of the day. The people have more than usual profusion of delicacies of the table (Wilkinson, vi, 290). In the Bible there is no instance of birthday celebrations among the Jews; but (see Jer. xx, 15). The example of Herod the tetrarch (Matt. xiv, 6), the celebration of whose birthday cost John the Baptist his life, can scarcely be regarded as such, the family to which he belonged being notorious for its adoption of heathen customs. In fact, the later Jews at least in the latter part of the 2nd century had ceased to celebrate any idolatrous worship (Lightfoot, "Hor. Hebr. ad Matt." xiv, 6), and this probably on account of the idolatrous rites with which they were observed in honor of those who were regarded as the patron gods of the day on which the party was born. —Kitto, s. v.

The proper Greek term for a birthday festival is το ηρεμία (and hence in the early writers the day of a martyr's commemoration), but το γενέστακα seems to be used in this sense by a Hellenism, for in Herod. iv, 26, it means a day in honor of the dead. It is not impossible, however, that in Matt. xiv, 6, the feast to commemorate Herod's accession is intended, for we know that such feasts were common (especially in Herod's family, Josephus, Antiq. xi, 3; see Blunt's "Conciones," Appendix, vii,) and were called "the day of the king" (Hos. vii, 5). The Gemaristas distinguish especially between the תֵּכֵּנ הָיִּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה (Dia γενέστακα, and אֶלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה הָאֵּֽלֶּֽה Hec. "Hor. Hebr. 1. c."). —Smith, s. v.

Treatises on birthday celebrations have been written in Latin by Braun (Hafn. 1702), Ebsenbrot (Aldorf, 1782), Funcke (Gorlitz. 1777), same (ibid. 1695), Hildebrand (Helms. 1611), Rhode (Regiom. 1716), Roa (Ludg. Bat. 1604), Spangenberg (Gothe, 1722), Weber (Vinar. 1731), Wend (Viehe. 1897).

Birthright (גא'ל יבּה, bekorah); Sept. and N. T. μητρικώ ροιον (μητρικώ ροιον) denotes the special privileges and advantages held by the first-born among the Hebrews. These were not definitely settled in the patriarchal times, but gradually became defined to include the following peculiar rights:

1. The functions of priesthood in the family. The eldest son naturally became the priest in virtue of his priority of descent, provided no blemish or defect attached to him. The theory that he was the priest of the family rests on no scriptural statement, and the rabbins appear divided on the question (see Hortinger's "Note on Goodwin's Moses and Aaron," i, 1; Ugelini, iii, 53). Great respect was paid to him in the household, and, as the family widened into a tribe, this grew into a sustained authority, undefined save by custom, in all matters of common interest. Thus the "princes" of the congregation had probably rights of primogeniture (Num. vii, 2; xxii, 18; xxv, 14). Reuben was the first-born of the twelve patriarchs, and therefore the honor of the priesthood belonged to his tribe. God, however, transferred it from the tribe of Reuben to that of Levi (Num. iii, 12, 18; viii, 19). Hence the first-born of the other tribes were redeemed from serving God as priests by a sum not exceeding five shekels. Being presented before the Lord in the temple, they were redeemed immediately after the thirtieth day from their birth (Num. xviii, 15, 16; Luke ii, 22). It is to be observed that the first-born who were sold for the priesthhood (i.e., such as had no defect, spot, or blemish) were thus presented to the priest.

2. A "double portion" of the paternal property was allotted by the Mosaic law (Deut. xxi, 15-17), nor could the caprice of the father deprive him of it. There is some difficulty in determining precisely what is meant by a double portion. Some suppose that half the inheritance was to be transmitted to the eldest son, and that the other half was equally divided among the remaining brethren. This is not probable. The rabbins believe that the elder brother received twice as much as any of the rest, and there is no reason to doubt the correctness of this opinion. When the first-born died before his father's property was divided, and left children, the right of the father descended to the children, and not to the brother next of age. Such was the inheritance of Joseph, his sons receiving with his brethren, and becoming heads of tribes. It seems to explain the request of Elisha for a "double portion" (2 Kings ii, 9). In Elijah's testament the first-born, through his unlawful conduct, was deprived of the birthright (Gen. xlix, 4; 1 Chron. v, 1). It is likely that some remembrance of this lost pre-eminence stirred the Reubenite leaders of Korah's rebellion (Num. xxvi, 1, 2; xxxvi, 5-9). Esau's act, transferring his right to Jacob, was allowed valid (Gen. xxx, 30).

3. The first-born son succeeded to the official authority possessed by his father. If the latter was a king, the former was regarded as his legitimate successor, unless some unusual event or arrangement interfered (2 Chron. xxii, 3). After the law was given through Moses, the right of primogeniture could not be transferred from the first-born to a younger child at the father's option. In the patriarchal age, however, it was in the power of the parent thus to convey it from the eldest to another child (Deut. xxi, 15-17; Gen. xxvi, 31, 82). David, nevertheless, by divine appointment, excluded Adonijah in favor of Solomon, which deviation from rule was indicated by the anointing (Goodwin, i, c. 4, with the notes). The first-born of the same line is often noted in the early scriptural genealogies, e.g. Gen. xxii, 21; xxiv, 13; Num. xxvi, 5, etc.

4. The Jews attached a sacred import to the title of primogeniture (see Schöttgen, "Hor. Hebr. i, 922"). This explains the peculiar significance of the terms "first-born" and "first-begotten" as applied to the Messiah. Thus in Rom. viii, 29, it is written concerning... ing the Son, "That he might be the first-born among many brethren;" and in Coloss. 1, 18, "Who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence." Thus the first-born had a double portion, so the Lord Jesus, as Mediator, has an inheritance superior to his brethren; he is exalted to the right hand of the Majesty on high, where he reigns until all his enemies shall be subdued. The universe is his rightful dominion in his mediatorial character. Again, he alone is the Proprietor of all the functions of the sacred civil and ecclesiastical office; and the Levites, to whom, under the law, the priesthood was transferred from all the first-born of Israel, derived the efficacy of their ministrations from their connection with the great high-priest (Jahn's Biblical Archæology, § 165). — Kittô, s. v.

Bir'zavith (Heb. בירצ'ווית, בִּיר צ'וֹית, prob. in pause for בִּיר צ'וֹית, בִּיר צ'וֹית, as in the margin, or בִּיר צ'וֹית, as would point, meaning apparently מֵאֵמוּד, Sept. Bîr'zâvîth, from a root Bîlûg, a name occurring in the genealogies of Asher (1 Chron. vii, 31), as the 7th son of Malchiel, being the son of Beriah and great-grandson of Asher (B.C. c. 1658); and perhaps also, from the mode of its mention, the founder of a place in Palestine known by the same name, the name being expanded in the father of Bethlehem, "father of Tekoa," etc., in chaps. ii. and iv.). Schwarz (Paletet, p. 158) identifies it with the ruined village Bezitz ("well of oil"), still extant and inhabited by Christians, a short distance N. of Jufna or Ophir (Robinson, Researches, iii, 79); but, striking as is the agreement in name, the position (near the south border of Ephraim) and the fact that it seems to precede the identity, notwithstanding the support claimed by Schwarz in the possible coincidence of the adjoining Japhlet (1 Chron. vii, 32, 33) with Japhleti (Josh. xvi, 8).

Bish'lam (Heb. בִּשְׁלָם, בִּשְׁלָם, for בִּשְׁלֶם, son of peace, i.e. peaceful; Sept. translates εὐπαίστη σο, no more other versions, but Vulg. Beschelam), apparently an officer or commissioner (comp. 1 Esdr. ii, 16) of Artaxerxes (i.e. Smerdis) in Palestine at the time of the return of Zerubbabel from captivity, and active in the remonstrance sent to the Persian court against the Jews in their efforts to rebuild their temple (Ezra iv. 7). B.C. 522.

Bishop, a term derived through the Saxon (biscop) from the Greek (ἱεραρχος, episcopus, overseer) as a title of office in the Christian ministry. In the Septuagint the word designates a holder of public office, whether civil or religious (e. g. 2 Chron. xxiv, 12, 17; Isa. xxi, 17). In classical use the word ordinarily has a political meaning; Cicero is called episcopus urbis and compisarum. "The inspectors or commissioners sent by Athens to her subject states were ierarxous (Aristoph. Ar. 1022), and their office, like that of the Spartan harmost, authorized them to interfere in all the political arrangements of the state to which they were sent. The title was still current and beginning to be used by the Romans in the later days of the republic ( Cic. ad Att., vii, 11). The Hellenistic Jews found it employed in the Sept., though with no very definite import, for officers charged with certain functions (Num. iv, 16; xx, 14, i Kings xi, 16, 19; Judg. ii, 24; for Heb. נוּפֵר, etc. see in Wisd. i, 6; 1 Macc. i, 53; comp. Joseph. Ant. xii, 5, 4). When the organization of the Christian churches in Gentile cities involved the assignment of the work of pastoral superintendence to a distinct class, the title ierarxous presented itself as at once convenient and familiar, and was therefore adopted as readily as the word elder (πρεσβυτερος) had been in the mother church of Jerusalem" (Smith, Dictionary of the Bible, s. v.).

In the early Church, the title was employed either in relation to the pastor of one church or assembly of Christians, or to the superintendent of a number of churches. The former is the meaning attached to the word by Presbyterians and Congregationalists, and the latter by the various Episcopal churches of Christendom, viz., the Roman Church, the Greek Church, the other Oriental churches (Armenian, Coptic, Jacobite, Nestorian, Abyssinian), the Episcopal Church of England and Ireland, the Episcopal Church of Scotland, the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, the Methodist Episcopal church, the Lutheran Church (in Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Russia, and several German states), the Moravians, the Methodists. In some Protestant churches, those of Prussia and Nassau, where the consistorial constitution prevails, the name designates more a title of honor conferred on the superintendents generally than a distinct office.

Episcopalian, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists agree in one point, viz., that it is lawful for Christians to take a step for which they have no clear precedent in the Scripture, that of breaking up a Church, when it becomes of unwieldy magnitude, into fixed divisions, whether parishes or congregations. The question as to whether the organic union is to be still retained at all. To this (1) Congregationalists reply in the negative, saying that the congregations in different parts of a great city no more need to be in organic union than those of two different cities; (2) Presbyterians would keep up the union by means of synods; (3) Episcopalians would not unite the separate churches by retaining them under the supervision of a single head — the bishop. It seems impossible to refer to the practice of the apostles as deciding in favor of any one of these methods, for the case had not yet arisen which could have led to the discussion. The city churches had not yet become so large as to make subdivision positively necessary, and, as a fact, it did not take place. To organize distant churches into a fixed and formal connection by synods of their bishops was, of course, a much later process; but such unions are by no means rejected, even by Congregationalists, so long as they are used for deliberation and advice, not as assemblies for ruling and commanding. The spirit of Episcopacy depends far less on the episcopal form itself than on the size and wealth and dioceses, and on the union of bishops into synods, whose decisions are to be authoritative on the whole Church, to say nothing of territorial establishments, or the civil government ("Kitte, Cyclopedia, s. v."). For the controversy as to the office of bishops, see Episcopacy; here we simply give, first, Biblical applications of the word in connection with πρεσβυτερος; and, secondly, the names, classes, insignia, duties, election, and consecration of bishops in ancient and modern churches.

1. New Testament Use of the Term "Bishop." — 1. Origin of the Office. — The apostles originally appointed men to superintend the spiritual, and occasionally even the secular wants of the churches (Acts xiv, 22; xx, 80; see also 2 Tim. ii, 2), who were ordinarily called πρεσβυτερος, elders, from their age; sometimes χριστοφορος, from their travels (bishops), from their labors. They are also said πρεσβυταριος, to preside (1 Thess. v, 12; 1 Tim. v, 17); never αρχιερες, to rule, which has far too despotical a sound. In the Epistle to the Hebrews (xii, 7, 17, 24) they are named πιστωματος, leading men (comp. Acts xx, 22), and figuratively πιστωματος, shepherds (Ephes. iv, 11). These presbyters were the regular teachers of the Church, expounding Scripture, administering the sacraments, and exercising pastoral care and discipline. They were to be married men with families (1 Tim. iii, 4), and with converted children (Tit. i, 6). In the beginning there had been no time to train teachers, and teaching was at first regarded far too much as the right of a gift than as an art. The New Testament places "ability to teach" among episcopal qualifications (1 Tim. iii, 2; Titus i, 9; the latter of which passage... should be translated, "That he may be able both to exhort men by sound teaching, and also to refute opposers*. That teachers had obtained in Paul's day a fixed official position is manifest from Gal. vi. 6, and 1 Cor. ix. 14, where he claims for them a right to worldly maintenance: 'And if any provide not for his own, and especially for them that are of the household,' and as a 'follower of Christ,' and as a 'servant of God,' and as a 'teacher of the congregation,' he is to be observed, and to be esteemed. The leaders also, in Hebr. xiii. 7, are described as 'speaking unto you the word of God.' Ecclesiastical history joins in pointing out the credit of this official position. The men of the Church, like the bishops of the Church, had been looked upon by all with respect. The use of the term "bishop" in the epistles has developed itself out of wandering evangelists any more than out of the apostles.

On the other hand, it would seem that the bishop began to elevate himself above the presbyter while the apostles were still living. In the apostles' time, the bishop was not yet, and in churches to which he is believed to have peculiarly belonged himself. The meaning of the title "bishop" in the opening chapters of the Apocalypse has been mystically explained by some, but its true meaning is clear, from the nomenclature of the Jewish synagogues. In them, as we are told, the minister who ordinarily led the prayers of the congregation, besides acting as their chief functionary in matters of business, was entitled in the nomenclature of the congregation, and is here represented by the Greek ἀρχιερεύς. The substantive ἀρχιερέας also (which by analogy would be rendered ἀρχιερεία, as ὕπατος is ἡγεμόνας) has the ordinary sense of work, service, making it almost certain that the 'angels of the churches' are nothing but a harsh Hebrewism for 'ministers of the churches.' We therefore see a single officer in these rather large Christian communities in a peculiarly prominent which has been justly regarded as episcopal. Nor does it signify that the authorship of the Apocalypse is disputed, since its extreme antiquity is beyond a doubt; we find, therefore, the germ of episcopacy here planted, as it were, under the eyes of an apostle.

Nevertheless, it is difficult but a germ. It is vain to ask whether these angels received a second ordination, and had been promoted from the rank of presbyters. That was the case, it is possible, but there is no proof of it; and while some will regard the question as deeply interesting, others will think it unimportant. A second question is whether the angels were overseers of the congregation only, or of the presbyters too, and whether the Church was formed of many local unions (such as we call parishes) or of one. Perhaps both questions unduly imply that a set of fixed rules was already in existence. No one who reads Paul's own account of the rebuke he uttered against Gal. iii. 13, to his zealous elder (2 Tim. ii) would afterward have been called episcopal, it was not by virtue of a second ordination, nor, therefore, of episcopal rank.

The apostles themselves, it is held by some, were the real bishops of that day, and it is quite evident that they performed many episcopal functions. It may well be true that the only reason why no bishops (in the modern sense) were then wanted was because the apostles were living; but it cannot be inferred that in any strict sense prelates are *co-ordinate in rank with the apostles, and can claim to exercise their powers. The later 'bishop' did not come forward as a successor to the apostles, but was developed out of the presbyter, and in the Church, much less can it be proved, or alleged with plausibility, that the apostles took any measures for securing substitutes for themselves (in the high character of apostles) after their decease. It has been with many a favorite notion that Timothy and Titus exhibit the episcopal type even during the life of Paul; but this is unwarranted. The apostles, as such, addressed the person of the apostle, and not to any one church. In the last epistle written by him (2 Tim. iv. 9), he calls Timothy suddenly to Rome in words which prove that the letter was not, at least yet, bishop, either of Ephesus or of any other Church. That Timothy was an *evangelist is distinctly stated (2 Tim. iv. 5), and that he had received spiritual gifts (1, 6, etc.); there is then no difficulty in accounting for the authority vested in him (1 Tim. v. 1; xix. 22), without imagining him to have been a bishop, which is, in fact, disproved even by the same epistle (i, 3). That Titus, moreover, had no local attachment to Crete, is plain from Titus i. (2) to say that he was to find in the power flock,' and be its 'oversoers' (1 Pet. v. 2), to feed them with knowledge and instruction, will never be disputed, except to support a hypothesis. The leaders also, in Heb. xiii. 7, are described as 'speaking unto you the word of God.'

2. The title Bishop, as compared with Presbyter, or Elder.—That the two titles were originally equivalent is clear from the following facts: (1) ἡσυγκοινος and πρεσβύτερος are nowhere named together as being the same. (2) Terms like καθηγητής, ἐπίσκοπος, and ἄρχων and ἀρχιερεύς are named as apparently an exhaustive division of the officers of churches addressed by Paul as an apostle (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1, 8). (3) The same persons are described by both names (Acts xx. 17, 18; Tit. i. 5, 8). (4) πρεσβύτεροι discharge functions which are essentially episcopal, i. e. involving pastoral superstition (1 Tim. v. 17; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2). The age which followed that of the apostles witnessed a gradual change in the application of the words, and in the epistles of Ignatius, even in their least interpolated or most mutilated form, the bishop is recognised as distinct from, and superior to, the prophets (Ep. ad Smyrn. viii; ad Trall. ii, iii, viii; ad Magn. vi). In those of Clement of Rome, however, the two words are still dealt with as interchangeable (Clement vii). The origin of an ἱεραρχία in addition to the πρεσβύτεροι and διάκονοι in Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians (c. v), and the enumeration of ἀποστολία, episcopi, doctores, ministri, in the Shepherd of Hermas (i, 3, 5), are less decisive, but indicate a transition stage in the history of the Church. The present identity of the bishops and elders of the N. T., we have farther (in this connection) only to inquire into, 1, the relation which existed between the two titles; 2, the functions and mode of appointment of the men to whom both titles were applied; 3, their relations to the general government and discipline of the Church. See also EIDEN.

"(1) There can be no doubt that πρεσβύτερος had the priority in order of time. The existence of a body bearing that name is implied in the use of the correlatives οἱ μέγατοι (comp. Luke xii, 26; 1 Pet. v, 1, 5) in the narrative of Ananias (Acts vi, 6). The order itself is traced to Acts vi, 30, and takes part in the act of deliberations of the Church at Jerusalem in Acts xv. It is transferred by Paul and Barnabas to the Gentile churches in their first missionary journey (Acts xix, 23). The earliest use of ἵεραρχα, on the other hand, is in the address of Paul to the elders at Miletus (Acts xx, 18), and there it is rather descriptive of functions than given as a title. The earliest epistle in which it is formally used as equivalent to πρεσβύτερος (except on the improbable hypothesis that Timothy belongs to the period following on Paul's departure from Ephesus in Acts xx, 1) is that to the Philippian, so late as the second half of the first century. It was not natural, indeed, that they should be the order; that the word derived from the usages of the synagogue of Palestine, every one of which had its superintending elders (Συναγωνία); comp. Luke vii, 3), should precede that borrowed from the constitution of a Greek state. If the latter was afterward felt to be the more adequate, it may have been because there was a life in the organization of the Church higher than that of the synagogues, and functions of pastoral superintendence devolving on the elders of the Christian congregation which were unknown to those of the other periods. It had the merit of being descriptive as well as titular; a 'nomen officii' as well as a 'nomen dignitatis.' It could be associated, as the other could not be, with the highest and holiest part of the superintendence of Christ himself as the πατὴρ καὶ ἱεραρχα (1 Pet. ii, 25).

"(11) Of the order in which the first elders were appointed, as of the occasion which led to the institution of the office. There is at any rate probable that they were chosen by the members of the Church collectively (possibly to take the place that had been filled by the seven; comp. Stanley's 'Apost. Age, p. 64), and then set apart to their office by the laying on of the apostles' hands. In the case of Timothy (1 Tim. iv, 14; 1 Tim. i, 6), the πρεσβύτερος, probably the body of the elders at Lystra, had taken part with the apostle in this act of ordination; but here it remains doubtful whether the office to which Timothy was appointed was that of the bishop-elder or one derived from the special commission with which the two epistles addressed to him show him to have been intrusted. The connection of 1 Tim. v, 22, is, if anything, against our referring the laying on of hands there spoken of to the ordination of elders (comp. Hammond, in loc.), and the same may be said of Heb. vi, 2. The imposition of hands was indeed the outward sign of the communica-
"Collectively at Jerusalem, and probably in other churches, the body of bishop-elders took part in deliberations (Acts xv. 6-22; xxi. 18), addressed other churches (ibid. xxv. 28), were joined with the apostles in the work of ordaining by the laying on of hands (2 Tim. i. 6). It lay in the necessities of any organized society that such a body of men should be subject to a power higher than their own, and that its authority should be derived from some external source; and we find accordingly that it belonged to the delegate of an apostle, and, as a fortiorti, to the apostle himself, to receive accusations against them, to hear evidence, to admonish where there was the hope of amendment, to depose where this proved unavailing. The crimes (1 Tim. i. 1; Tit. iii. 10) (Smith, Dictionary of the Bible, s. v.).

It seems therefore to be certain that not only were the titles "bishop" and "presbyter" uniformly interchangeable in the New Testament, but also that but one office was designated by these two names. The "bishop" of the N. T. is not to be thought of as a diocesan bishop, such as those of the Roman or other churches of later times, but only as an authorized officer of the Church and congregation. "The identity of presbyters and bishops in the Apostolic Church was acknowledged by the most learned Church fathers, even on exegetical grounds, even after the Catholic episcopal system was established; and modern theologians maintain that bishops and presbyters were identical in the church of the Hebrew temple. They are also called patres, patres ecclesiae, patres clericorum, and patres patriam, fathers, fathers of the Church, fathers of the clergy, and fathers of the fathers. In early times they were called patriarches, as being the superiors of the presbyters; afterward the title became equivalent to archbishop. In allusion to their appointment by Christ, they were called vicars of Christ. This title was assumed by many bishops before its exclusive appropriation by the bishop of Rome. In some early writers we meet with the term ἀρχιεπίσκοπος ἐκκλησιῶν, governors or rulers of the churches. Various other epithets are applied to them, such as koinonikos, or church royal blood. In the Roman Church, the English Church, and the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, bishops are now styled right reverend. In England they belong to the House of Lords, and are styled lord. In the Methodist Episcopal Church they are simply styled reverend, like other ordained ministers.

2. Classes.—The episcopal order in some churches is divided into four degrees, the same as to order, but differing in jurisdiction, viz.: (1) Patriarcha of Rome, Constantiopolis, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, etc.; (2) Primates, as the Archbishop of Canterbury, etc.; (3) Metropolitans, bishops of capital cities; and (4) Simple bishops. The Roman Church recognizes in the pope a fifth order, that of sovereign pontiff, or head of the whole Church. We meet also with classes of inferior bishops. Among these may be mentioned vacati, vacantiz, bishops without cures. Some of these had vacated their office in times of persecution or religious controversy. Hence the term "vacantiz," which is applied to vacant bishops, or bishops without cure, or in paribus infidelium, are invested with office, but without any stated charge or diocese. Suffragans are such as are appointed to act as the assistants or substitutes of the metropolitans. They derive their name either from the fact that they cannot be consecrated without the Metropolitan, or because they possess the right of suffrage in the synods (see Dufresne, s. v. Suffragio). Diocesan bishops who are impeded by sickness or old age from discharging their duties receive a coadjutor, and as long as he has not received the episcopal consecration, is called episcopus designatus. The term country bishop, and its synonym country, rural bishop, occurs in the older writers. They appear to have been subject to a city bishop, and to have acted as his colleagues. The derivation of the word is disputed; some derive it from choros, χώρος, a choir of singers; others from the appellation cor episcopi, heart of the bishop, as the archdeacon was sometimes called. The true origin of this last name is undoubted, from the Roman Catholic stand-point, the only tenable derivation of the episcopate. Among Protestant interpreters and historians, this identity has always been asserted; and this even by many learned Episcopalians, e. g. Dr. Whitby, who, on Phil. i. 1, admits that the Greeks and Latin fathers do with one consent declare that bishops were called presbyters and presbyters bishops in apostolic times, the names being then common. See also, as a recent authority, Bloomfield on Acts xx. 17 (Grk. Test. Eng. Notes, et al., vol. i. p. 560, Phil. ed.)."

II. Ecclesiastical Usages respecting Bishops.—1. Names and Titles.—In the early centuries the following titles were employed with reference to the bishops: the scriptural appellations προσεπισκόπων, προστάτων (see 1 Thess. v. 12; 1 Tim. v. 17) were translated into Latin by praepositus (where the word proper), and were retained by the Greek fathers. They have also antistes and protesutes, used in the same signification. In nearly the same sense was the term πρεσβύτερος, presbyters, presidents, used; ἱερος, inspectors; ἀγγέλια ecclesiae, angels of the churches. Summi sacerdotes and pontifices massimi owe their origin to the practice of deposing the highest clergy. The word presbyter, derived from a root existing in the Hebrew temple. They are also called patres, patres ecclesiae, patres clericorum, and patres patriam, fathers, fathers of the Church, fathers of the clergy, and fathers of the fathers. In early times they were called patriarches, as being the superiors of the presbyters; afterward the title became equivalent to archbishop. In allusion to their appointment by Christ, they were called vicars of Christ. This title was assumed by many bishops before its exclusive appropriation by the bishop of Rome. In some early writers we meet with the term ἀρχιεπίσκοπος ἐκκλησιῶν, governors or rulers of the churches. Various other epithets are applied to them, such as koinonikos, or church royal blood. In the Roman Church, the English Church, and the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, bishops are now styled right reverend. In England they belong to the House of Lords, and are styled lord. In the Methodist Episcopal Church they are simply styled reverend, like other ordained ministers.
al staff, bent or crooked at the top; the mire or fillet, sometimes called crown, diadem, tara; gloves, chirodicoes, always worn during the performance of any religious office; sandals—no one could celebrate the Eucharist without these; calyces or fonts for baptism; they were a part of the soldier's equipments, and, when worn by a bishop, pointed out the spiritual warfare on which he had entered; pallium, the pall; pectoral, the breastplate. The pallium was so peculiar and distinctive that its name was often used to denote the person or office of a bishop. It was first given by bishops, but later by archbishops, metropolitans, and patriarchs only. The form of the pallium in the earliest times is not known; subsequently it was made of white linen, without seam, and was worn hanging down over the shoulders. In the twelfth century it was made of wool. Previous to the eighth century it had four purple crosses on it, and was fastened by three gold pins. The cros, like the Hebrew pectoral, was worn on the neck or breast, and was also carried in public processions, and thus became a twofold badge of the bishop's office. Most of these insignia are still used in the Greek and Roman churches. —Farrar, s. v.

The ancient Church included the celebration of Divine worship and the discipline and government of the Church. His principal duties, though not performed by him exclusively, were catechising and preaching. Others, exclusively belonging to him, were the confirmation of baptized persons, by which they were admitted as acknowledged members into the Church, the ordination of presbyters and inferior ministers, the restoration of penitents, and various acts of consecration and benediction. As to discipline, while at times the prerogatives of the bishop were restricted, he remained the source and centre of ecclesiastical authority within his diocese. The discipline clergy were dependent upon him, and the regulations of the church were directed by him. His authority was seen in the following particulars: In the superintendence of religious worship; in the oversight of all the members of the Church throughout a diocese in spiritual and ecclesiastical matters; in the control of all subordinate spiritual persons and ecclesiastical officers; in the visitation of the clergy, churches, schools, and religious houses; in the presidency over all synods within the diocese, and even in the management and distribution of all the property of the Church (Farrar, s. v.).

Most of these powers have been retained in the Greek and Roman Church down to this day. The bishop of the Roman Church assume some special duties toward the pope by the oath of obedience which is administered to them before their consecration (see below). The most important of the duties enumerated in the formula of a bishop's oath are, to be faithfully attached to the pope and to his successors, not to enter into any plot against him, not to divulge a plan which the pope may communicate to him; to preserve, defend, increase, and promote the rights, honors, privileges, and authority of the Roman See; to observe, and to have observed by others, the entire canonical law; to persevere and continue in ability, the efficacies, and all who may rebel against the pope or his successors ("haretics, schismatics et rebellis eodem domino nostro vel successoribus praedicto pro posse perseverat et impugnabo"); and to visit Rome in person every third year, in order to give an account of the state of the diocese. In the Church of England and in the Protestant Episcopal Church, these duties and powers also have the power to ordain and to confirm, and their authority is confined to their proper dioceses. The powers and duties of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church are those of a general itinerant superintendence, including ordination, appointment of ministers, and the exercise of pastoral care, etc., as specifically defined in the Methodist "Discipline," pt. ii, ch. ii, § 13.

5. Election of Bishops. — The right of election to a vacant see, in the early ages, was with the clergy and people of the diocese (Balsam, ad Conc. 13 Conc. Laud. p. 834), who, having made their choice, referred it to the bishops of the province, the consent of all of whom was necessary to the election. When the bishop elect was confirmed and consecrated by the metropolitan. In the Roman Church bishops are nominated by the chapter of the Cathedral; in some countries by the clergy of the diocese, and in others by the prince of the country (this case, however, is restricted to the appointment of bishops by the pope), and the council of bishops confirm the nomination and grant his bull for the consecration (Conc. Trid. sess. xxiv, de Ref. ch. i). At consecration the bishop elect must take the oath of allegiance to the pope. In England the election of bishop lies theoretically with the chapter, but the choice is practically vested in the crown. In the Methodist Episcopal Church bishops are elected by the General Conference (Discipline, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 13), and in the Protestant Episcopal Church by the Diocesan Convention (Canon II, 1844). All the bishops of the Lutheran churches are appointed by the princes of their several countries.

6. The Bishops in Rome. — In the Roman Church three bishops are required for the rite; one (who must always be a bishop) to consecrate, the two others (who may be mitred abbots, and, in cases of emergency, other prelates, or simply priests) to assist. [1.] After the consecrator has examined the elect and administered the oath of obedience, the candidate is habited in the pontifical vestments, and the litany having been said, the three bishops place upon the head and shoulders of the elect the Book of the Gospels open, nothing being spoken. [2.] The three bishops then lay their hands upon the head of the elect, saying, "Receivest thou the Holy Ghost." [3.] The consecrator prays for grace for the newly-ordained. [4.] He anoints him with the chrism on the head and hands, saying, "Unget et consecrar et copum tuum," etc. [5.] He places in his hands the pastoral staff, ring, and Book of the Gospels, saying, "Accipe Baculum..." etc. [6.] Mass is completed, and the new bishop communi- cates in both kinds. Of these ceremonies, the imposition of hands and accompanying prayer are the only parts which are considered essential to episcopal ordination. See Boissinot, Dict. des Ceremonies, i, 1294.

(2.) In the Greek Church the following is the order, as given in Goar's Euchologium: Mass having commenced, the elect, accompanied by the priests and other clergy, took the place of the three consecrating bishops, who must be three at least, in their pontifical vestments, sit in their stalls, the chief celebrator sitting between the assistants. The gospel-caller cries "Attendamus" upon which one of the clerks ("pra religa licetiam"") makes the first presentation of the elect, who is led by the clergy as far as the tail of an eagle delineated on the floor of the church. The consecrator then asks him what he has come to request, to which the elect replies that he seeks the laying on of the hands of the bishops. He is then questioned concerning his faith. After this, the consecrating bishop gives him the benediction with the cross, and then follows a solemn blessing of the elect having advanced to the middle of the eagle. He now gives a fuller account of his faith, is again blessed by the bishop, and then advances to the head of the church. Here the consecrator, for the third time, demands an explanation of his faith, desiring him now to explain clearly and distinctly the nature of the Substance of the Son and Word of God, and how many Natures there are in Christ. After his reply he receives the benediction, the consecrator saying "Gra- tia S. Spiritus per meam mediocratatem promovet te Deo sanctissimium Sacerdotem et electum X..." In the Episcopate, 822 Bishop, as finally defined in the Methodist Discipline, pt. ii, ch. ii, § 13.
Gospels on his head, the other bishops at the same time holding it. The consecrator declares him to be bishop, and, while the others continue to hold the Gospels, makes three crosses on his head, blessing him in the name of the Holy Trinity; then, laying his hand (all the rest of the bishops doing the same), he prays:

"O Lord God, who rulest over all, who by Thy holy apostles Paul hast ratified the series of orders and degrees appointed for those who wait at Thy holy altar and minister in Thy spotless and venerable mysteries, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers: do Thou also, O Lord, consecrate him, anointed with the grace of Thy holy Spirit, confirm him who has been elected and counted worthy to receive the evangelical yoke and pontifical dignity at the hand of me a sinner, and of the ministers and bishops who stand with me, as Thou didst strengthen the holy apostles and prophets, as Thou didst anoint the kings, and as Thou didst consecrate the priests. Exhibit in him a blameless pontificate; and, adorning him with every virtue, grant to him such holiness that he may be worthy to ask of Thee whatsoever the salvation of his people requires, and to receive it from Thee." This form differs little from the order of consecrating archbishops found in the P Denys, in the Canon arch, according to the form printed at St. Petersburg in 1725.

(3.) In the Protestant churches the form of consecration is simple. That of the Methodist Episcopal Church may be found in the Discipline (pt. iv, ch. vi); that of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Prayer-book. And it is important to note that among the instructions of the Church of England, we give the latter (omitting the Sermon lessons, collectes, etc.).

When all things are duly prepared in the church and set in order, after morning prayer (concluded), the archbishop (or some other bishop) shall begin: "The Lord be with you." In which case, in this shall be the collect (here the collect is said). After the collect, and the Nunc Dimittis, and the sermon are ended, the elected bishop (robed with his robes) shall be presented by two bishops unto the archbishop of that province (or of some other province, if not present), and shall say: "Archbishop sitting in his chair near the holy table, and the bishops that present him saying: "Most reverend father in God, we present unto you this godly and well-learned man to be ordained and consecrated bishop."

Then shall the archbishop demand the queen's mandate for the consecration, and all the reasons and reasons of the acknowledgment of the queen's supremacy being ministered to the person elected, as it is set down before the consecration. And the archbishop shall say, addressing himself unto the oath of due obedience to the archbishop, as follows: "In the name of God, Amen. I, X., archbishop of the church of Y., consecrate unto the office of bishop, with all due reverence and obedience to the archbishop and to the ministry, for the service of God, to the ends above named to help my lord, the same, the son of God through Jesus Christ." This oath shall not be made at the consecration of an archbishop.

Then the archbishop shall move the congregation present to pray, saying thus to them (here the address). And then shall be said the Litany, as before in the ordination of deacons, save only that after the place elided, it may please thee to illumine all bishops, etc., the proper sursum there following shall be omitted, and this inserted instead of it: "That it may please thee to bless this brother newly elected, and to send by thy grace upon him, that he may duly execute the office whereunto he is called, to the edifying of thy church, and to the honor, praise, and glory of God, and to allow him to hear us, good Lord." Then shall be said this prayer following hereafter:"

Then the archbishop, sitting in his chair, shall say to him that is to be consecrated: "Brother, henceforth as the holy Scriptures do tell us, we must not doubt that we should not be hasty in laying on hands, and admitting any person to government in the church of Christ, which he hath purchased with his own blood; before I admit you to this administration I will examine you in certain articles, to the end that the congregation present may be assured that you have yourself in the Church of God. Are you persuaded that you are truly called to this ministration, according to the will of God? And do you desire to be thereunto called, and the like? As- surer, I am so persuaded. The archbishop. Are you persuaded that the holy Scriptures contain sufficiently all doctrine required to be taught for eternal salvation in the Church of Jesus Christ? And are you determined out of the same holy Scriptures to instruct the people committed to your charge; and to teach or maintain nothing as required of necessity to salvation but that which you shall be persuaded may be concluded and proved by the same? Answer. I am so persuaded and determined, by God's grace. The archbishop. Will you then faithfully and sincerely seek the same in the same holy Scriptures, and call upon God by prayer for the true understanding of the same, so as to teach and to be taught in all things according to the wholesome doctrine, and to withheld and confess the gallsayers? Answer. I will so do, by the help of God. The archbishop. And you first of all faithfully and sincerely seek the same in the grace of Thy holy Spirit, and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrine contrary to God's word; and both privately and openly to call upon and declare the errors, and promptly to correct them? Answer. I am ready, the Lord being my helper. The archbishop. Will you deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; and in all things having respect to the things of this world, things that weigh upon your conscience, things that etc., within your diocese correct and punish, according to such authority as you have by God's word, and as to you shall be committed by the ordinance of this realm? Answer. I will do so, by the help of God. The archbishop. Will you be faithful in ordaining, sending, or laying hands upon others? Answer. I will do so by the help of God. The archbishop. Will you show yourself gentle, and be merciful for Christ's sake to poor sinners, and not to the needy, and to strangers, to pray? Answer. I will so show myself by God's help. Then the archbishop, standing up, shall say: "Almighty God, our heav- enly Father, who hast sent forth thy holy Spirit from heaven, to guide, comfort, and direct all them that obey thee, even as many as shall cast their care upon thee, and knowing beforehand all the things, grant also unto you strength and power to perform the same; that, he accomplishing you in the good work which he hath begun, may he be for you so perfect and so effectual a strength, as to bring you to that latter day, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." Then shall the bishop elect put on the rest of the episcopal habit, and take his staff, and put on the ring, and that bishop who was present, or one who was present, from whom he was consecrated, shall lay his hands upon him, the preceding bishop blessing, and the bishops, with others that are present, anointing with anointing oil, as follows: Come, Holy Ghost, our soul inspire, And lighten with celestial fire; Temptations anointing with ambrosia art. What dost thou see? See gifts impart, Thy blessed unction from above, Life, and fire of love: etc. Then follow prayer. Then the archbishop and bishops present shall lay their hands upon the head of the newly consecrated bishop, and on his knees, the archbishop saying: "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a bishop in the Church of God, now committed unto you by the hands of the same, the apostles of the Lord and of the Son of God, Amen. And remember that thou stir up the grace of God which is given thee by this imposition of our hands; for God hath not given us as the spirits of fear, but of power, and love, and soundness. Then the archbishop shall deliver him the ring, saying: Take this ring, and lay it upon thy right hand, and seal with it all doctrine. Think upon the things contained in this book. Be diligent in them, that the increase coming thereby may be manifest unto all men. Take this book, and read it, and meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do all the words written therein, and that thou mayest do them, and not forget them, neither turn aside from any of the words of this book, that thou mayest live long. And you, my lord, may bring again to the church all that shall help men to live God through Jesus Christ. This oath shall not be made at the consecration of an archbishop.

In the Supplication a complete list of all the bishops throughout the world will be given. See ARCHBISHOP; EPISCOPACY; METROPOLITAN.

Bishop, Robert Hamilton, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, born in Scotland in 1777, was licensed to preach in 1802, and emigrated to America in the same year, where he was ordained to the ministry. He settled at Ebenezer, Ky., at the same time accepting a professorship in Transylvania University. In consequence of difficulties with his synod, Mr. Bish- op, in 1819, joined the West Lexington Presbyterian, in connection with the Central Assembly, and in 1824 accepted the presidency of Miami University, receiving at the same time the degree of Doctor of Divinity.
BISHOP

In 1841 he resigned the presidency of the university, but retained a professorship until 1844, in which year he removed to Pleasant Hill, near Cincinnati, where he died in 1855. In addition to various sermons, Dr. Bishop's works are Memoirs of David Rice, 1824; Elements of Logic, 1838; Philosophy of the Bible, 1838; Science of Government, 1839; Western Pecosmancer, 1839.—Sprague, Anna, iv, 326.

Bishop, Samuel, M.A., a Church of England minister, was born in London, 1731, and educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and at St. John's College, Oxford. He entered Merchant Tailors' School as master in 1758, and was made head-master in 1783. He also held the rectory of Ditton, Kent, and of St. Martin Outwich, London. He died in 1755. He wrote a number of poems, collected in his Poetical Works, with his Life by Clare (Lond. 1796, 2 vols, 4to); and left also Sermons on Practical Subjects (Lond. 1798, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 222; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 194.

Bishop, William, bishop of Chalcedon in peristram infidelum, and vicar apostolic of the pope in England, the first English Romanist bishop after the Reformation, was born at Brayles, in Warwickshire, in 1567, and was educated at Oxford and Rome. He was then sent missionary to England, but was arrested at Dover, and confined in London till the end of 1584. On his release he retired to Paris, but returned to England in 1591. The Romanist party in England had long desired a bishop, but the Jesuit Parma was not about to resign to ruin his (v. a. x.) as archbishop, and it was not till Parsons's death that the pope agreed to appoint Dr. Bishop to the episcopacy. After his ordination as bishop (1625) he created a chapter and nominated a great vicar, archdeacon, and rural deans in most of the counties. He died April 15, 1654, and left an edition of the work of Pits, or Piria, De Secus Structurae Angliae (1636), and others, named in Wood, Athenae Oxoni, vol. ii.—London, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biog., ii, 452.

Bishops' Bible. See Authorized Version.

Bishops' Book, a book compiled by a commission of bishops and ministers of the English Church, in 1587, otherwise called The Institution of a Christian Minst. It contains an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and of the doctrines of justification and purification. It may be found in Formularies of Faith put forth by authority during the reign of Henry VIII (Oxford, 1625).—Hardwick, Reformation, ch. iv.; Burnett, Reformations in England, i, 471, 485.

Bishopric (ιερωστη, νοστηρια), see episcopate, Acts i, 20, ministerial charge in the Church. In later times it came to mean (1) the office and function of a bishop (q. v.), and (2) the district over which he has jurisdiction. See Diocese; Episcopacy.

Bisae, Thomas, a Church of England divine, was born at Oldbury, Gloucestershire, about 1675, and was educated at Oxford, where he passed M.A. in 1698 and D.D. in 1712. In 1715 he was appointed preacher at the Church of St. Mary, Templetown, Hereford, and prebendary in the cathedral there. He gave great attention to the choral service of the cathedral, and advocated chanting and intoning, with great skill of argument. His writings include The Beauty of Holiness in the Common Prayer (Lond. 1728, 8vo, 6th ed. 1745), and Sermons on Decency and Order in Worship (Lond. 1723, 8vo); Sermons on the Lord's Prayer (Oxford, 1740, 8vo). He died April 22, 1731.—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 324; Hook, Eccles. Biography, ii, 464.

Bit (βητ), of me'theg, Psa. xxii, 9; γολκλια, Jas. iii, 8; both elsewhere "bridle"), the curb put into horses' mouths to guide and restrain them. See BIRDL.

Bith'nah (Heb. Bithah, ביתנה, prob. for בז'נה, daughter [1. e. worshipper] of Jehovah; Sept. Beßha.v. r. Beria), daughter of a Pharaoh, and wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 18), by whom she bore JERICHO (see Note). The title, but to be or represent a Hebrew name; but the name Bithah probably implies conversion, and the other wife of Mered seems to be called "the Jewess." Unless we suppose a transposition in the text, or the loss of some of the names of the children of Mered's wives, we must consider the name of Bithah understood before "she bare Miriam" (ver. 17), and the latter part of ver. 18 and ver. 19 to be recapitulatory; but the Sept. does not admit any except the second of these conjectures. See MERR.

Bithron (more accurately "the Bithron," Heb. hab-Bithron, הַבִּיתְרִון, the broken or divided place, from בִּית, to cut up; Sept. η παραστεφνων; Vulg. Bethoron), a place—from the form of the expression, "all the Bithron," doubtless a district—in the Arabah or Jordan valley, on the east side of the river (2 Sam. ii, 29). The spot at which Abner's party crossed the Jordan not being specified, we cannot fix the position of the Bithron, which lay between that and the Mahanaim. So far as we know, the whole of the country in the Ghor, on the other side of the river, is of the broken and intersected character indicated by the derivation of the name. It appears, therefore, to be the designation of that region in general rather than of any specific locality. See BIRTHON.

Bithynia (Bithynia, derivation unknown; for an attempted Semitic etymology, see Bochart, Cosmam, i, 10; Sickler, Handb. p. 544), a province of Asia Minor, on the Euxine Sea and Propontis (Plin. v, 40; Pol. v, 1; Mel. i, 19), bounded on the west by Mysia, on the south and east by Phrygia and Galatia, and on the east by Paphlagonia (see Mannert, vi, i, iii, 55, seq.). See Asia (Minor). The Bithynians were a rude and uncivilized people, Thracians who had colonized this part of Asia, and occupied no towns, but lived in vil tejas (gymnopheles, Strabo, p. 566). On the east its limits underwent great modifications. The province was originally inherited by the Roman republic (B.C. 74) as a direct consequence of the Perusine settlement. It was dependent line of monarchs, one of whom had invited into Asia Minor those Gauls who gave the name of Galatia to the central district of the peninsula. On the death of Mithridates, king of Pontus, B.C. 68, the western part of the Pontic kingdom was added to the province of Bithynia, which again received further ac cessions on this side under Augustus A.D. 7. Thus the province is sometimes called "Pontus and Bithynia" in inscriptions; and the language of Pliny's letters is similar. The province of Pontus was not con tituted till the reign of Nero. It is observable that in Acts ii, 9, Pontus is in the enumeration and not Bithynia, that in 1 Pet. i, 1 both are mentioned. (See Marquardt's continuation of Becker's Rom. Alter thümer, i, i, 146.) For a description of the country, which is mountainous, well wooded, and fertile, Hamilton's Researches in Asia Minor may be consulted; also a paper by Ainsworth in the Bag. Geog. Journal, vol. ix. The course of the River Rhynacicus is a marked feature on the western frontier of Bithynia, and the snowy range of the Myssian Olympus on the south-west. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s.v.) That Christian congregations were formed at an early period in Bithynia is evident from the apostle Peter having addressed the first of his Epistles to them (1 Pet. i, 1). The apostle Paul was at one time inclined to go into Bithynia with his assistants Silas and Timo-

Bitter (always some form of the root מָרָא, marar, מַרָא; מַרְעָא, merom.). Bitterness (Exod. i. 14; Ruth i. 20; Jer. ix. 15) is symbolical of affliction, misery, and servitude. It was for this reason that, in the celebration of the Passover, the servitude of the Israelites in Egypt was typically represented by bitter herbs (see below). On the day of bitterness in Amos viii, 10, comp. Isaiah, ii, 4: 'Nunc et amara dies, et nocis amatorum umbra est.' In Hab. ii, 6, the Chaldeans are called 'that bitter and swift nation,' which Schultens illustrates by remarking that the root merer in Arabic (answering to the Hebrew word for bitter) is usually applied to strength and courage. The gall of bitterness (Acts viii. 23) describes a state of extreme wickedness, highly offensive to God and hurtful to others. A root of bitterness (Heb. xiii. 15) expresses a wicked or scandalous person, or any dangerous sin leading to apostasy (compare John vi. 63, Gal. v. 4, etc.). The 'waters made bitter' (Rev. viii. 11) is a symbol of severe political or providential events. See WOMWOOD. On the bitter waters of jealousy, or what may be termed the ordeal oath (Num. v. 11-24), see ADULTERY (trint of). On the 'bitter clusters' of Sodom (Deut. xxxii. 32), see APPLE; HEMLOCK.
Bittern, as quoted by Rosenmüller, states that the Egyptians used bitter herbs in every meal; so in India soma, or bittern, as he terms it, are constantly employed as food. See Gourd. It is curious that the two sets of plants which appear to have the greatest number of points in their favor are the fragrant and also bitter labiate plants. It is important to observe that the artemisia, and some of these fragrant species, exist in many parts of Arabia and Syria—that is, in warm, dry, barren regions. The onidove also is found in similar situations, but requires, upon the whole, a greater degree of moisture. Thus it is evident that the Israelites would be able to obtain suitable plants during their long wanderings in the desert, though it is difficult for us to select any one out of the several which might have been employed by them. See Botany; Herb.

Bittern (טיון or תינון, kippot; Sept. ἱπποῦς, i.e. hedgehog) occurs but three times in Scripture, in connection with the desolations of Babylon, Idumæa, and Nineveh (Isa. xiv. 23; xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14), and has been variously interpreted owl, osprey, tortoise, porcupine, otter, and, in the Arabic, bustard. Bochart, Schulze, and other authors have supported the opinion that it refers to the porcupine (see especially Keith, Evidence, ed. 1840, p. 435, 490), making the first syllable to be derived from הַנְּכָה, kanēk, "spine;" in confirmation of which, Bochart, with his wonted learning, cites the Chaldee, Hebrew, Arabic, and Ethiopian names of the porcupine and hedgehog; which apparently confirm his opinion, while Gesenius defends the same identification, although by a different derivation, from הָנָפָד, kaphad, "to contract," i.e. into a ball; but this meaning is utterly irreconcilable with the context. In Isa. xiv. 23, "I will make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water," etc., the words are plain and natural. Marshes and pools are not the habitation of hedgehogs, for they shun water. In Is. xxxiv. 11, it is said, the coromant and the bittern shall possess it, the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it," etc., that is, in the ruins of Idumæa. Here, again, the version and a hedgehog, most surely would be out of place. Zeph. ii. 14, "Both the coromant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it, and their voice shall sing in the windows," etc., would be equally without meaning in a hedgehog, a nocturnal, gorgelling, worm-eating animal, entirely or nearly mute, and incapable of climbing up walls; one that does not haunt ruins, but earthy banks in wooded regions, and that is absolutely solitary in its habits. The arguments respecting the Heb. term itself, drawn from the significations of many of the several texts contain, are, on the contrary, positive, and leave no doubt that the animal meant is not a hedgehog, nor even a mammal, but a bird, and that of some aquatic species. Hence the word must bear an interpretation which is applicable to one of the feathered tribes, probably to certain wading species, which have, chiefly on the neck, long pointed feathers, more or less speckled. This is confirmed by the Arabic version, which has Al-houbara, the name of a bird which, according to Shaw, is of the size of a capon, but of a longer habit of body. The bittern answers these conditions, and is a solitary bird, loving marshy ground. Its scientific name is Botaurus stellaris, and it belongs to the Gruidæ, or cranes. The Arabian bustard, Dîsâ houbara, might be selected if it were not that bustards keep always in dry deserts and uplands, and that they never roost—their feet not admitting of perching—but rest on the ground. The term seems most applicable to the heron tribes, whose beaks are formidable spikes that often kill hawks—a fact well known to Eastern hunters. Of these, Nycticorax Ericerus, or common night-heron, with its pencil of white feathers in the crest, is a species not uncommon in the marshes of Western Asia; and of several species of bittern, the Ardea (botaurus) stellaris has pointed long feathers on the neck and breast, freighted with black, and with a pointed bill. After the breeding-season it migrates, and passes the winter in the south, frequenting the marshes and rivers of Asia and Europe, where it then roosts high above ground, uttering a curious note before and after its evening flight, very distinct from the booming sound produced by it in the breeding-season, and while it remains in the marsh. Though not building, like the stork, on the tops of houses, it resorts, like the heron, to ruined structures, and is said to have been seen on the summit of Tânk Kesra at Ctesiphon. The common bittern is a bird nearly of the size of the common heron, but differing from it greatly in the color of its plumage. The crown of the head is black, with a black spot also on each side about the angle of the mouth; the back and upper part are elegantly variegated with different colors, black, brown, and gray, in beautiful arrangement. This species of bird is common only in fenny countries, where it is met with skulking about the reeds and sedge; and its sitting posture is with the head and neck erect, and the beak pointed directly upward. It permits persons to approach near to it without rising. It flies principally toward the dusk of the evening, and then rises in a very singular manner, by a spiral ascent, till quite out of sight. It makes a curious noise when among the reeds, and a very different, though sufficiently singular one, as it rises on the wing in the night. (See Fenny Cypselodiscus, a.v.) See Porcupine.

Bitumen is doubtless denoted by the Heb. term נפתל, chemar (Aeth. Vers. "slime," only occurs in Gen. xi. 3; xiv. 10; Exod. ii. 8), so called from its being used as a fuel or fire-light. It contains not far from Babylon, also anciently in the vale of Siddim, and occasionally from the bottom of the Dead Sea, which is thence called Lacus Assyriatics—the lakes of bitumen. There are two or three kinds, but each have nearly the same component parts. It is usually black, or brown or black, and harder as one is exposed more or less to the air. In its most fluid state it forms naphtha; when of the consistence of oil, it becomes petroleum; at the next stage of induration it becomes elastic bitumen; then melâha; and so on until it becomes a compact mass, and is then called asphaltum. All these substances are remarkable for their inflammable character; the bituminous oils are of late extensively used for illumination and lubrication, that naturally produced being commonly called "petroleum," while that manufactured from this is termed "kerosene." Neither the inventions of art nor the researches of science have discovered any other substance so well adapted to exclude water and to repel the injuries of worms as the mineral pitch or bitumen. According to Gen. xi. 3, bitumen was used instead of lime or cement for the building of the tower of Babel. "Hit, the ancient Is, upon the Euphrates, says Mr. Ainsworth, "has been celebrated from all antiquity for its never-failing fountains of bitumen, and they furnished the imperishable mortar of the Babylonian structures" (Researches, p. 89). Prof. Robinson, in 1836, examined the shores of the Dead Sea. He says: "In the same plain were lime-pits, that is to say, wells of bitumen or asphaltum, the Hebrew word being the same as the word used in describing the building of the walls of Babylon, which we know were cemented with bitumen (Gen. xiv, 10; xi, 8). These pits or fountains appear to have been of considerable extent. The valley in which they were situated is indeed called Siddim; but it is said to have been adjacent to the salt sea, and it contains the “Dead Sea” (Gen. xiv, 2, 3, 10, 12). The streams that anciently watered the plain remain to attest the accuracy of the sacred historian, but the pits of asphaltum are no longer to be seen. Did they disappear in consequence of the catastrophe of the plain? (Bib. Researches, li, 603). In ancient times bitumen was a valuable article of commerce, and formed a part of the talmudic colors, in Egypt, where it was used to decorate the four great empires of the world in successions: the Assyrian or Babylonian, the Persian, Grecian, and Roman, distinguishable both by their order and attributes; the black horses in that case seeming to denote the Persian empire, which, by subduing the Chaldeans, and being about to inflict a second heavy chastisement on Babylon, quieted the spirit of Jehovah (v. 8) with respect to Chaldea, a country always spoken of as lying to the north of Judea. But the color here is probably, as elsewhere, only symbolic in general of the utter devastation of Babylon by the Persians (see Henders. and Overton. Hebr. and Chalas. of the Bible. 274). It is worn on a black horse, with the balance to weigh corn and the other necessaries of life, is employed in Rev. vi, 5 to signify great want and scarcity, threatening the world with famine, a judgment of God next to the sword. Also, “The sun became black as sackcloth of hair” (Rev. vi, 12) is a figure employed, as some think, to describe the state of the Church during the last and most severe of the persecutions under the heathen Roman empire. Great public calamities are often thus figuratively described by earthquakes, eclipses, and the like, as if the order of nature were inverted. In connection with this subject it may be remarked that black is studiously avoided in dress by all Orientals, except in certain garments of hair or wool, which are naturally of that color. Black is also sometimes employed as a mark of humiliating distinction by dominant nations upon subject or tributary tribes, the most familiar instance of which is the oblation laid upon the Jews in Turkey of wearing black turbans (see Color).

Blacksburn, Francis, an English divine, was born in 1706, at Richmond, Yorkshire, educated at Cambridge, and ordained 1739, when he became rector of Richmond. In 1740 he was made archdeacon of Cleveland, and it was after that period that he began to be known as the advocate of what is called "religious liberty." In 1766 he wrote his Confessional against subscriptions to articles and creeds, a work which elicited a hot controversy, and called forth more than seventy pamphlets. Blackburn was a bitter opponent of the Romanists against them. He died in 1787. He was for some time engaged in the controversy concerning the intermediate state. His writings are collected under the title Works, Theological and Miscellaneous (Camb. 1804, 7 vols. 8vo), with a life of the author by his son in vol. 1.

Blackburn, Gideon, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, born in Augusta Co., Va., in 1772, and instructed by Judge R. K. In 1830, he was licensed to preach in 1792, and labored actively in various parts of the West until 1827, when he became president of Centre College, Ky. He left this post in 1830, however, and employed himself in collecting funds, with which, after his death, the Blackburn Theological Seminary at Carlinville, Ill., was established. In the division of the Presbyterian Church Dr. Blackburn went with the New School. He died in 1888, at Carlinville. As an educator and disciplinarian he stood in the first rank, and few excelled him in power of extemporaneous preaching. — Sprague, Annals, iv, 48.

Blackfriars, a name given to the Dominicans in England from the color of their garments. A parochial district in London in which they established their second English house still bears the name. See Dominicans.

Blacklock, Thomas, D.D., a divine and poet, was born at Annan, Scotland, in 1721, and lost his sight by the small-pox when he was about six months old. To amuse and instruct him, his father and friends used to read to him, and by this means he acquired a fund of information, and even some knowledge of Latin. Through the kindness of Dr. Stevenson, of Edinburgh, he studied several years at Edinburgh, and became well acquainted with Greek, Latin, French, and Italian. In 1762 he was ordained minister of Kirkcudbright, but on the day of his induction by the Presbytery, he retired after two years on an annuity, and received students at Edinburgh as boarders, and assisted them in their studies. He died July 7, 1791. His poems will be read or referred to on account of the peculiar circumstances under which they were written; but, although marked by a vein of placid elegance, they are wanting in all vigor of the soul of imagination. Dr. Blacklock published an Essay toward Universal Elyomy (Edin. 1756); — Paracelsus, or, Conclusions deduced from Natural and Revealed Religion (1767). — A Panegyric on Great Britain, a poem (8vo, 1778). — The Graham, a heroic poem, in four cantos (4to, 1774). In 1780 a posthumous edition of his poems was published by Mackenzie, author of the "Man of Feeling," with a life. There is also an edition of his poems, with life, by Professor Spence (Lond. 1756, 4to, 2d ed.). — Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 136.

Blackman, Learner, an eminent pioneer of American Methodism, was born in New Jersey, and entered the ministry in 1800 at about 19 years of age. After a few years spent in itinerant labors in the Eastern States, he went in 1806 on a mission to the Iroquois, then a wild country, inhabited by Indians and frontiersmen. His labors laid the foundations of Methodism through a large region of country. He was drowned in the Ohio River in 1815. — Minutes of Conferences, i, 274; — Sprague, Annals, vi, 824.

Blackmore, Sir Richard, was born in 1650, and died in 1729. He was active in the revolution which elevated William III, whose physician he was, to the throne. Besides several medical and poetical works, he wrote Just Prejudices against the Arian Hypothesis (1725), Natural Theology (1728), Creation, a philosophical poem (1712, 4th ed. 1718), which Addison pronounced one of the noblest productions in English verse; as well as paraphrases on the Songs of Moses, Deborah, and David, on four select psalms, on chapters of Isaiah, and the third chapter of Habakkuk.

Blackwall, Anthony, an industrious author, was born in Derbyshire, 1764, educated at Cambridge, and was appointed minister of All-Saints, Derby, about 1808. In 1722 he was made master of the Grammar-school of Market-Bosworth, which he left to take the parish of Shapwick, in Somerset; but in 1783 he was returned to Market-Bosworth, where he died in 1731. His chief work is The Sacred Classics Defended and Illustrated (Lond. 1727—81, 2 vols. 8vo), in which he defends certain passages in the N. T. usually held to be barbarisms. — Allibone, Dict. of Auth. i, 199; — Landow, Ecc. Dict. s. v.

Blades stands in the Auth. Ver. for the following words: 2723, lahab, a flame, applied to the glittering point of a spear (Job xxxii, 28) or sword (Nah. iii, 8), and hence to the "blade" of a dagger, Judg. iii, 22; 2726, aššōmāk, the "shoulder-blade," Job xxxi, 22; 2795, the "shoulder-blade." — Judg. iii, 22; — Gen. iv, 26; — Matt. xiii, 26; — Mark iv, 26.

Blain, George W., A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, and professor in Randolph Macon College, Va., was born in Albemarle county, Va., 1815, converted at a camp-meeting in 1835, graduated at Randolph Macon College in 1837, entered the ministry in the Virginia Conference in 1839, was elected Professor of mathematics in Randolph Macon College in 1840, superannuated on account of pulmonary disease in 1842, and died in great peace in 1848. In college his talents, industry, and piety won him golden opinions, while as a minister his zeal and devotion were conspicuous. — Minutes of Conferences, iii, 460.

Blains (בַּלַּי, בַּלַּיִּים, בַּלַּיִּים) occurs only in the account of the sixth plague of Egypt (Exod. ix, 9, 10), where it is described as "a boil breaking forth into blains," i.e. violent ulcerous inflammations (from בַּלַּי to boil up). The aches from the furnaces or brick-kilns were taken by Moses, a handful at a time, and scattered to the winds; and wherever a particle fell, on man or beast, it caused this troublesome and painful disease to appear. It is called in Deut. xxvii, 27, 28, "the botch of Egypt" (comp. Jev. xxvii, 27), to which some refer 3128, yōpi, or black leprosy, a fearful kind of elephantiasis (comp. Plin. xviii, 5). It must have come with dreadful intensity on the magicians whose art it baffled, and whose scrupulous cleanlinesses (Herod. ii, 86) it rendered nugatory, so that they were unable to stand in the presence of it, because of the burning of their fingers.

Other names for purulent and leprous eruptions are בַּלַּי, בַּלַּיִּים (Morphea alba), בַּלַּיִּים (Morphea nigra), and the more harmless scab, Gynaec., Lev. xiii. passim (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 189). See Leprosy.

Blair, Hugh, D.D., was born at Edinburgh April 7, 1718. After highly distinguishing himself at the University of Edinburgh, he was in 1742 made minister of Colleyse in Fife-shire, and soon after of Canongate in Edinburgh. In 1768 he was appointed chief minister of the High Church in that city. In 1777 he published the first volume of his Sermons, which, while in MS., met with the approval of Dr. Johnson, and when published acquired an extraordinary popularity. Soon afterward the three following volumes appeared, though at different times. The thought of these sermons was prodigious, and, except that their moral tone was felt to be an improvement upon the metaphysical disquisitions which in the way of sermons had preceded them, inexplicable. For the later volumes he was paid at the rate of £600 per vol. Numerous editions have been printed at London, in 5 vols. 8vo and 12mo. They have been translated into French (Lau- sanne, 1791, and Paris, another translation, 1807, 5 vols. 8vo), Dutch, German (by Sack and Schliefer- macher, Leipsic. 1781-1802, 5 vols.), Sciolovian, and Italian. Blair’s Lectures on Rhetoric and the Belles-Lettres, first published in 1783, attained the like undeserved success. The discipline of the age, as the bowed down will rise, was felt when the elegant and polished style, which is their chief characteristic, was less common than at present; and to this merit, such as it is, they chiefly owed their success. They are still read by many people with pleasure, on account of their clear and easy style, and the very sense which, not very profound observation which runs through them; but they have no claim to be ranked among the best specimens of ser- mon-writing, while they are lamentably deficient in evangelical thought and feeling. The Lectures have not been less popular than the Sermons, and were long considered as a text-book for the student. They are, however, like the Sermons, feeble productions, and show neither depth of thought nor intimate acquaintance with the best writers, ancient and modern, nor do they develop and illustrate, as a general rule, any sound practical principles. Dr. Blair died Dec. 21, 1806.—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 200.

Blair, James, D.D., was born in Scotland 1656, and died at Williamsburg, Va., 1743. He was one of the most eminent of the earlier Episcopalian ministers in America. Being born in the same year as Virginia in 1685, he rendered himself highly acceptable, and in 1689 was appointed commissary—the highest ecclesiastical office in the province. He was the founder and first president of William and Mary College, receiving the latter appointment in 1692. Dr. Blair was for some time president of the council of the colony and rector of Williamsburg. Many traditions are ex- tant which testify to the excellence of his character and the usefulness of his life. In 1722 he published an Exposition of the Sermon on the Mount (4 vols. 8vo; also London, 1724, 5 vols. 8vo). It was again printed 1740 (4 vols. 8vo), with a commemorative notice by Wat- ten, a work of highly commendable Soddridge.—Sprague, Annals, v. 7; Hawks, Ecclesiastical Contributions, vol. 1; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 201.

Blair, John, a native of Edinburgh, and relative of Hugh Blair (q. v.), he removed at an early age to London, where he received some valuable prefer- ments, and became at last prebendary of Westminster. He died in 1782. He is the author of an important work on The Chronology and History of the World from the Creation to A.D. 1758 (Lond. 1784, fol.), which has passed through a large number of editions (a recent ed. Lond. 1844, with additions and corrections by Sir E. Ellis; again, Lond. 1851), and is still considered a very valuable book. He also wrote Lectures on the Canon of the Old Testament, published after his death (Lond. 1785), and comprehending a learned dissertation on the Septuagint version.—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 202.

Blair, Robert, remembered as the author of The Grave, a poem, was born at Edinburgh in 1699, and educated there and on the Continent. In 1731 he was ordained minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, where he died in 1746. His Grave is still reprinted.

Blair, Samuel, brother of John, an eminent Pres-byterian divine, was born in Ireland June 14, 1712, and emigrated to America in his youth. After studying at the “Log College,” Neshaminy, he was ordain- ed pastor at Middletown, N. J., 1738. In 1740 he removed to Londonderry (Fagg’s Manor), Pa., where he labored as a pastor and schoolmaster, and also wrote a book, in which a number of ministers were educated. In the “revival” controversy he took sides with Gilbert Ten- tent, and ranked high among the so-called “New Lights.” He died July 5, 1751. His writings, in- cluding a Treatise on Predestination and Repro- duction, with several sermons, were published 1754.—Sprague, Annals, iii. 64.

Blake, John L., a learned divine of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Northwood, N. H., in 1788, and graduated at Brown University in 1812. He was for about twelve years the principal of a young ladies’ school, during which time he published a number of popular text-books. A peculiar feature of his books, and which greatly contributed to their popular- ity, was the introduction of printed questions at the bottom of each page, a plan which has since been frequently adopted. Blake was also the author of many sermons and numerous theological orations and ad- dresses, of a Family Encyclopedia, and a General Bi- graphical Dictionary (9th ed. 1857). He was, in suc- cession, rector of the Protestant Episcopal churches at Providence, Concord, and Boston. He died at Orange, N. J., July 6, 1857.—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, s. v.

Blandina, one of the forty-eight martyrs of Lyons, A.D. 177, was a slave, of weakly body and little natu- ral fortitude; yet she was exposed, tied to a cross, to savage beasts, burned with fire, and at length, being fastened up in a net, was tossed repeatedly by a furious bull, and finally dispatched by having her throat cut. During all her tortures she continued to exclaim, “I am a Christian; we do not allow ourselves in any crime.” She is honored in the Roman Church above the other martyrs of Lyons, and her festival is observed June 2.—Eusebius, Hist. Ecc. v, 1; Butler, Lives of Saints, June 2; Landon, s. v.

Blandrata (or Blandrata), Giono, an Italian physician, one of the first of the modern Aussos, was born at Saluzzo about 1515. He at first practiced medicine with success. Having exposed himself to the Inquisition by his free criticisms upon Roman- ism, he fled to Geneva, where, in his conversations with Calvin, he showed that the germs of Socianism were already in his mind. From there he repaired first to Germany and subsequently to Poland, where he was elected one of the superintendents of the Hel- vetican churches of Little Poland, and successfully spread his Antitrinitarian views. He travelled in Poland, Germany, and Transylvania, and becoming physician to the Queen Bona, of Savoy, he communicated his errors to the King of Poland, Sigismund Augustus. He afterward went to the court of John Sigismund, prince of Transylvania, and in 1566 he held at his court (under the influence of his close friend Adam of the Lutherans, and with such success that he persuaded that prince and many of the nobility of the province to embrace his heresy. See TRANSYLVANIA. After the death of Sigismund he returned once more to Poland, and became physician to the king, Stephen Bathory. Socinus complained that Bladnitsa, in his later years, removed to Transylvania, and that he had been at last strangled by his nephew in a quarrel between 1585 and 1592.—Bügel, Unm. iv. 572; Mosheim, Ch. Blasphemy is an Anglicized form of the Greek word βλασφημία, and in its technical English sense signifies the speaking evil of God (in Heb. יָפָר, וּפָרַע, to curse the name of the Lord), and in this sense it is found Psal. lxxix, 18; Isa. iii, 5; Rom. ii, 24, etc. But, according to its derivation (βλασφημία φίλης quasi βλασφεμίων), it may mean any species of calumny and abuse (or even an unlucky word, Eurip. Ion. 1187); see 1 Kings xi, 10; Acts xviii, 6; Jude 9, etc. Hence in the Sept. it is used to render יָפָר, Job ii, 5; יָפָר, 2 Kings ix, 6; יָפָר, 2 Kings xiv, 4; and יָפָר, Hos. vii, 16, so that it means "reproach," "derision," etc.; and it has even a wider use, as 2 Sam. xii, 16, where it means "to despise Judaism," and 1 Macc. ii, 6, 7, where יָפָר = idolatry. In Sir. iii, 18 we have it applied to filial impiety, where it is equivalent to "accursed" (Schleusner, Thesaur. s. v.). In the Auth. Eng. Vers. "blaspheme," etc., occasionally represent the following Heb. words: יָפָר, barak'; יָפָר, gathph'; יָפָר, charaph'; יָפָר, makab'; יָפָר, nauts'.

I. Among the Israelites injurious language toward Jehovah was punished, like a heathenish and capital crime, with stoning, as in the case of the son of Shelomith (Lev. xxvi, 18; Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 6; comp. Otho, Lex. Rabl. p. 104 sq.). This, however, did not include any prohibition of blasphemy against foreign deities (Exod. xxii, 28; Lev. xvi, 15), as Philo (Opp. ii, 166, 219) and Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 10; Apion, i, 56) supposed. Theopp. ii, 166, 219) and Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 10; Apion, i, 56) supposed. The expression of certain Jews seems to be alluded to by Pliny (xiii, 9: "gens contumelia numinum insignis"). The injunction against disre- spect in Exod. xxii, 28, refers to magistrates (סְרָעַת); comp. Selden, Jus nat et gent. ii, 13; Michaelis, Mos. Recht, v, 158 sq. The Jews interpreted the command in Lev. xxvi, 16 as prohibiting the utterance of the divine name under any circumstance (comp. Num. i, 17; see Hartmann, Verbünd. d. A. u. d. V. 7, p. 49 sq., 434; also Philo, Opp. ii, 166); and hence never pronounced the word יהוה (q.v.), a superstition that still has its analogous customs in the East (see Rosenmüller on Exod. iii, 13; Michaelis, Mos. Recht, v, 163 sq.). They also construed Exod. xxi, 33 so as to hold themselves bound to give nicknames to the heathen gods (see Ps. lxxii, 8), like Beethoven, Beelzebub, Belfalson, Balthazar, for Bethel, Beelzebub for Zealubab, Hos. iv, 5, etc. When a person heard blasphemy he laid his hand on the head of the offender, to symbolize his sole responsibility for the guilt, and, rising on his feet, tore his robe, which might never again be mended. (On the mystical reasons for these observances, see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. Matt. xxvi, 65.)

II. Blasphemy, in the theological sense, consists in irreverent or insulting language toward God or his perfections (Blasphæmæ est locutio contumeliosa in Deum; and Augustine, De Morib. Munic. liii, i, c. 11, Jam vero Blasphæmæ non accipit nisi malo verbo de Deo dicendum: accord to Martin Luther, Blasphemy denotes calumny, defraction, reproachful or abusive language, against whomsoever it be vented.

It is in Scripture applied to reproaches not aimed against God only, but man also (Rom. iii, 8; xiv, 16; 1 Pet. iv, 4, 5). It is, however, more peculiarly re- strained to those who are so far estranged from God. According to Lindwood, blasphemy is an injury offered to God by denying that which is due and belonging to him, or attributing to him what is not agreeable to his nature. "Three things," says a divine, "are es- sential to this crime: 1, God must be the object; 2, the words spoken or written, independently of consequence which others may derive from him, must be injurious in their nature; and, 3, he who commits the crime must do it knowingly. This is real blasphemy; but there is a relative blasphemy, as when a man may be guilty ignorantly, by propagating opinions which dishonor God, the tendency of which he does not perceive. A man may be guilty of this by accident, for if he speak freely against received errors it will be construed into blasphemy." See CAIVL.

There can be no blasphemy, therefore, where there is not an impious purpose to derogate from the Divine Majesty, and to alienate the minds of others from the love of God and the love of God. The blasphemer is no other than the calumniator of Almighty God. To con- stitute the crime, it is also necessary that this species of calumny be intentional. He must be one, therefore, who by his impious talk endeavors to inspire others with the same irreverence toward the Deity, or, perhaps, abhorrence of him, which he indulges in himself. And this is the character of the honor of human and divine. It is hoped that very few arrive at this enormous guilt, it ought not to be dismissed that the habitual profana- tion of the name and attributes of God by common swearing is but too manifest an approach toward it. There is not an entire coincidence: the latter of these vices may be considered as resulting solely from the defect of what is good in principle and disposition, the former from the acquisition of what is evil in the extreme; but there is a close connection between them, and an insensible gradation from the one to the other. To accustom one's self to treat the Sovereign of the universe with irreverent familiarity is the first step, malig- nantly to array his attributes is a revile his prov- idence is the last.—Watson, Theol. Dict. s. v.

As blasphemy by the old law (Exod. xx, 7; Lev. xix, 12; xxiv, 10; Deut. v, 11) was punished with death, so the laws of Justinian also directed that blasphemers should be put to death. The Church ordered their bones to be defiled. In the Church, laws of notorious blasphemy are reserved. By the laws of England and of many of the United States, blasphemies of God, as denying His being or providence, and all contumelious reproaches of the Lord Jesus Christ, profane scoffing at the Holy Bible, or exposing it to contempt, are offences punishable by fine, imprisonment, etc. (Blackstone, Commentaries, i, iv, ch. iv). By the statute of 9 and 10 William III, ch. 82, if any one shall deny either of the Persons of the Trinity to be God, or assert that there are more than one God, or deny Christianitiy to be true, for the first offence, is rendered incapable of any office; for the second, ad- ministers sentence of death by a civil judge, unless the person under sentence of death shall have been before receiving any gift or legacy, and to be imprisoned for years. According to the law of Scotland, blasphemy is punished with death: these laws, however, in the present age, are not enforced; and by the statute of 53 George III, c. 169, the words in italics were omitted, as well as the second part of the short history. The special offences should be left to be punished by the Deity, and not by human statutes.—Buck, s. v.

The early Christians distinguished blasphemy as of three kinds: 1. The blasphemy of apostates and lop- si, whom the heathen persecutors had obliged not only to deny, but to curse Christ. 2. The blasphemy of heretics, such as Basiliscus, Paulus, and Philippus, blas- phemy against the Holy Ghost. The first kind is re- ferred to in Pliny, who, in giving Trajan an account of some Christians that apostatized in time of persecution, says, "They all worshipped his image, and the image of the gods, and also cursed Christ." That this was the ordinary mode of renouncing the Christian religion appears from the demand which the proconsul made to Polygamy and Polygamy, and by which the revile Christ, to whom Polygamy rebelled, replied, "These eighty-six years I have served him, and he never did me any harm: how, then, can I blaspheme my King and my Saviour?" Here is sometimes reputed blasphemy, and was punished by the same penalty.—Buck, s. v.

III. The blaspemous against the Holy Ghost is variously understood, but is always the same thing, that is to say, an idolatrous, or a denial of the proper Godhead of Christ; or others to a denial of the divinity of the Holy Ghost. Others place this sin in a perverse and malicious ascribing of the works of the Holy Spirit to the power of the devil. Augustine resolves it into obstinacy in opposing the methods of divine grace; and continuing in this obduracy to the end of life. The passages in the N. T. which speak of it are Matt. xii, 31, 82; Mark iii, 86, 29; Luke xxi, 10. These passages are referred by many expositors to continued and obstinate resistance of the Gospel, which issues in final unbelief. This, they argue, is unpardonable, not because the love of Christ in this cannot convert such a sin, nor because there is any thing in its own nature which separates it from all others sins, and places it beyond the reach of forgiveness, but simply because so long as a man continues to disobey he voluntarily excludes himself from mercy. In this sense, every sin may be styled unpardonable, because forgiveness is incompatible with an obstinate continuance in sin. One principal objection to this view is that it generalizes the sin, whereas the Scripture represents it as specific, and disownments the idea that it is of frequent occurrence. The case referred to by Christ is this: He had done a demoniac deceived and blind and dumb. The Pharisees who stood by and witnessed the miracle, unable to deny the fact, ascribed it to the agency of the devil. Not only did they resist the evidence of the miracle, but they were guilty of the wicked and gratuitous calumny that Christ was in league with the powers of darkness. It was not only a sin of thought, but one of open speech. It consisted in attributing to the power of Satan those unquestionable miracles which Jesus performed by "the finger of God," and the power of the Holy Spirit: nor have we any safe ground for extending it to include all sorts of willing (as distinguished from wilful) offences, besides, which have been committed; and specified; and both the cases referred to, speaking against is mentioned as the sin. "Whoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man;" "Whoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost." The Spirit dwells in Christ, and, therefore, such imputations were calumnies, against the Holy Ghost. The sin bespeaks a state of mind which, by its awful criminality, excluded from all interest in Christ. There is no connection between this awful sin and those mentioned in Heb. vi, 4-8; x, 26-31. There may be dangerous approximations to such a sin. When men can ridicule and contempt religion and its ordinances; when they can sport with the work of the Holy Ghost, when the human heart, which can persist in a wilful disbelief of the Holy Scriptures, and cast contemptuous slanders upon Christianity, which is "the ministration of the Spirit," they are approaching a fearful extremity of guilt, and certainly in danger of putting themselves beyond the reach of the arm of mercy. It is one of the reasons, when first aware of the awful nature and aggravations of their own sins, have been apprehensive that they have fallen into this sin, and in danger of giving themselves up to despair. This is a device of the devil to keep them from Christ. The very fear is a proof they are free from the awful crime. The often misunderstood expression, "It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world," etc., is, a direct application of a Jewish phrase in allusion to a Jewish error, and will not bear the inferences so often extorted from it. According to the Jewish school notions, the person blaspheming the name of God could not be pardoned by sacrifice, nor even the day of atonement atoned for only by the blood of death and repentance. In refutation of this tradition, our Lord used the phrase to imply that "blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven; neither before death, nor, as you say, in heart, by dreams of death." (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad loc.). It is difficult to discover the "sin unto death" noticed by the apostle John (1 John v, 16), although it has been declared by the Church to be the ultimate act of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit; but the language of John does not afford data for pronouncing them one and the same. The first three Gospels alone describe the blaspemous which shall not be forgiven: from it the "sin unto death" stands apart. (See Locke, Briefe d. Apostel Johannes, 9 ed. 305-317; Campbell, Preliminary Diss. Diss. ix, pt. ii; Olshausen, Com. 978. sq. Am. ed.; Watson, Theol. Dict. s. v.; Princeton Rev. July, 1846, art. ii). See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

Blasphemy, as a noun (in the sense of current of air), is the rendering in the Author. Vers. of ναναίια, nanaamhê (2 Sam. xxii, 16; Ps. xviii, 15), "breath," as elsewhere, or of νεαν, νεανική (Exod. xv, 6; Josh. vi, 5; 2 Kings xix, 7; Job iv, 9; Isa. xxxv, 4; xxvii, 7), "wind," or "spirit," as elsewhere; or as a verb, etc. (in the sense of blighting), it represents the Heb. roots נָחַשׁ, נָחַשׁ, נָחַשׁ, always spoken of the blasting of crops (Deut. xvii, 22; 2 Kings viii, 37; 2 Chron. vi, 28; Amos iv, 3; Hag. ii, 17), especially of grain (Gen. xii, 6, 23, 27), often rufled (2 Kings xxix, 27; Isa. xxxvii, 20), apparently by a hot wind (Hackett, Illustra. of Script. p. 135).

Blas-tare, Mattheus, a Basillian monk, who, in the year 1335, made a collection of ecclesiastical canons and constitutions, to which he added another of the civil law, and arranged them alphabetically under 303 heads; he called the whole Syntagma. This work is given, Gr. and Lat., by Beveridge, in his Pandecta Canoniaca. Another, written by him, De causis seu quibus fidem matrimonii, is printed in Leunclavius's Jus Graeco-Romannum.—Hoefner, Biog. Generale, vi, 218.

Blatustus (Bla PRODUCTS, a man who was "chamberlain" (cubicularius, οί τοι γυνος, i.e. chief eunuch) to King Herod Agrippa, or who had the charge of his bed-chamber (Acts xxi, 20). A.D. 44. Such persons had usually great influence with their masters, and hence the importance attached to Blatus's favoring the peace with Tyre and Sidon.

Blatchford, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian clergyman, born in England in 1767, became a Non-conformist minister in 1791, four years later emigrated to America, and settled at Bedford, N. Y. From here he removed successively to Greenfield, Conn., Stratford, now Bridgeport, and Lancingburg, N. Y., where he resided from 1804 till his death in 1828, part of the time tending the churches of the Lancingburg Brigade. In 1808 he received the degree of D.D. from Williams College. Dr. Blatchford was the translator of Moor's Greek Grammar, to which he added various notes. "As a preacher, he was distinguished for ease and naturalness, for appropriate and useful thoughts, and an improved and somewhat imposing manner." —Sprague, Am. Dr., iv, 158.

Blau, Felix Anton, professor of theology at Mentz, was born 1754. Though a Romanist, he wrote a powerful work against the pretensions of Rome, entitled "A critical History of Ecclesiastical Infallibility" (Krit. Geschichte d. kirchl. Unfallbarkeit, Frankf. 1791, 8vo). He was imprisoned on account of the part he took at Mentz in 1790 in favor of the French Revolution, was released, and died Dec. 22, 1798, leaving Blauner, or Blarer, Blaerner, Ambrosius, one of the Swiss Reformers, was born at Constance in 1492. He became a Benedictine at an early age, and prior of the monastery-abbey. In 1517 he began to teach the Lutheran doctrines in his monastery. In 1521 he left the monastery and renounced the monastic vows. He labored with Ecolampadius and Bucer in spreading the Gospel, and, in connection with them, organized Protestantism in Ulm. Under the protection of Duke Ulric of Wurttemberg, he was largely instrumental in establishing the Reformation in the empire. In 1538 he removed to Constance, and made that city the centre of his active and disinterested labors. In 1548 he removed to Winterthur, and labored as minister there, and in Biel and other places, until his death at Winterthur, Dec. 6, 1564.—Keim, A. Blayney, Benjamin, D.D., an English divine and professor, was educated at Worcester College, Oxford. In 1878 he took his degree of doctor in divinity, and became regius professor of Hebrew. He was also canon of Christ's Church, and rector of Polshot in Wiltshire, where he died in 1861. Dr. Blayney was eminently learned. He proved and improved the palaeographical and textual Latin and Hebrew; he improved the Oxford Bible (1769, 4to), and greatly improved the marginal references. Among his writings are A Dissertation by Way of Inquiry into Daniel's Seventy Weeks (Oxford, 1775, 4to); —Jeremiah and Lamentations: a new Translation, with Notes (8vo ed. Lond. 1856, 2vo ed. 1869), in the same volume, a new Translation, with Notes, critical, philological, etc. (Oxford, 1837, 4to).

Bleek, Friedrich, a distinguished German theologian, born July 4, 1793, at Arembolk in Holstein, died at Bonn Feb. 27, 1859. He studied theology at the universities of Kiel and Berlin; in the latter place under De Wette, Schleiermacher, and Naesder. In 1818 he commenced giving theological lectures at Berlin, was appointed in 1823 extraordinary professor, and in 1829 ordinary professor at the University of Bonn. His writings are especially distinguished for keenness of investigation. His principal work is Der Brief an die Hebrew, a German translation of and commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Berl. 1828-40, 4 vols). In another work, Beitrdge zur Evangelienliteratur (Berl. 1846), he defended the authorship of the Gospel of John against the attacks of the Tubingean school. Besides these two larger works, Bleek wrote many valuable articles for theological journals. Several important works of Bleek were published after his death, viz.: Intro. to the O. T. (Eindeut. in das A. T.; ed. by J. F. Bleek and A. Ramhauen, Berl. 1860); Intro. to the N. T. (Eindeut. in das N. T.; ed. by J. F. Bleek, Berl. 1862); Comm. on three first Gospels (Syst. Erklarung d. drei ersten Evang.: ed. by H. Holtzmans, Lpz. 1862); Lect. on the Revelation (Verlesungen uber die Apoc.; ed. by Th. Hobsch, Berl. 1862).—Herzog, Suppl. i, 207.

Blemiah (בֵּלֵם), mūmōs; once בֵּלֵם, blear-eyed, Lev. xxvi, 20). There were various kinds of blemishes, i. e. imperfections or deformities, which excluded men from the priesthood, and animals from being offered in sacrifice. Such blemishes are described in Lev. xxi, 17-23; xxii, 19-26; Deut. xvi, 19, 21, after being slain, externally defective, it was not offered in sacrifice. The natural feeling that only that which was in a perfect condition was fit for sacred purposes, or was a becoming offering to the gods, produced similar rules concerning blemishes among the heathen nations (comp. Pompon. Lact. De Sacrific. cap. 6; Herodot. ii, 38; Hild, i, 66; Serv. ad Verg. Aen. ii, 4).—Klotz, s. v.

Bless (בָּרָךְ; bar'akh; ἱεροῦ), sūkōvīyīm. There are three or four points of view in which acts of blessing may be considered.

1. When God is said to bless his people. Without doubt the inferior is blessed by the superior. When God blesses, he bestows that virtue, that efficacy, which renders his blessing effective, and which his blessing expresses. His blessings are either temporal or spiritual, bodily or mental; but in every thing they are productive of that which they import. God's blessings extend into the future life, as his present grace and the promised. The partakers of that blessedness which, in infinite fulness, dwells in himself (Gen. i, 22; xxiv, 35; Job xlii, 12; Ps. xliv, 2; civ, 24, 28; Luke xi, 9-13; James i, 17).

2. When men are said to bless God, as in Ps. ciii, 1; 2; cxlv, 1-3. We are not, then, to suppose the divine Being, who is over all, and in himself blessed for evermore, capable of receiving any augmentation of his happiness from any of the creatures which he has made: such a supposition, as it would imply something of imperfection in the divine nature, must ever be rejected with abhorrence; and therefore, when creatures bless the adorable Creator, they only ascribe to him the praise and dominion that is due to his character, and blessing which it is equally the duty and joy of his creatures to render. So that blessing on the part of man is an act of thanking God for his mercies, or rather for that special mercy which, at the time, occasions the act of blessing; as for food, for which thanks are rendered to God, or for any other good.

3. Men are said to bless their fellow-creatures when, as in ancient times, in the spirit of prophecy they predicted blessings to come upon them. From the time that God entered into covenant with Abraham, and promised extraordinary blessings to his posterity, it appears to have been customary for the father of each family, in the direct line, or line of promise, immediately previous to his death, to call his children around him, and to inform them, according to the knowledge which it had pleased God to give him, how and in what manner the divine blessing conferred upon Abraham was to descend among them. Upon these occasions the patriarchs enjoyed a Divine illumination, and under the assurance of their benediction was deemed a prophetic oracle, foretelling events with the utmost certainty, and extending to the remotest period of time (see Busb, Notes en Gen. in loc.). Thus Jacob blessed his sons (Gen. xlii, 1-28; Heb. xi, 21), and Moses the children of Israel (Deut. xxiii, 1-29). The blessings of men were also good wishes, personal or immediate, and, as it were, a peculiar kind of prayer to the Author of all good for the welfare of the subject of them; thus Melchisedek blessed Abraham (Gen. xv, 19; Heb. vii, 1, 5, 7). The form of blessing prescribed in the Hebrew ritual (Num. vi, 23-27) which Jehovah commanded was to be performed by Aaron and his descendants. To bless the congregation, is admirably simple and sublime: 'The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace' (Häner, De Benedictione sacrae. Jen. 1712). It was pronounced standing, with a loud voice, with both hands raised toward heaven (Deut. xxi, 50). National blessings and cursings were sometimes pronounced (Deut. xxvii, 12-26; xxviii, i, 6).

4. David says, 'I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord' (Ps. cxxv, 13). The phrase appears to be taken from the custom of the Jews in their thank-offerings, in which a feast was made of the body and blood of the sacrifice, and other rites, the master of the feast took a cup of wine in his hand, and solemnly blessed God for it, and for the mercies which were then acknowledged, and gave it to all the guests, every one of whom drank in his turn. See Cor. To this custom it is supposed our Lord alluded in the institution of the cup, which is also called "the cup of blessing" (1 Cor. x, 16). See Passover. At the family feast also, and especially that of the Passover, both wine and bread were in this solemn and religious manner distributed, and God was blessed, and his mercies acknowledged. They blessed God for their present refreshment, in his deliverance and salvation, by the covenant of circumcision and for the law given by Moses; they prayed that God would be merciful to his people Israel, that he would send the prophet Elijah, and that he would render them worthy of the kingdom of the Messiah. In the Mosaic law, the manner of blessing was appointed by the lifting up of hands, and we see that our Lord lifted up his hands and blessed his disciples. See Benediction.

Blessing, Valley of. See Berechiah.

Blind ("şārēr, rūphākîq). The frequent occurrence of blindness in the East has always excited the astonishment of travellers. Volney says that out of a hundred persons in Cairo he has met twenty quite blind, ten wanting one eye, and twenty others having their eyes red, purulent, or blinched (Travels in Egypt, i, 224). This is principally owing to the Egyptian ophthalmia, which is endemic in that country and on the borders of the desert. The box is a prominent one of blindness in the East (Volney, I. c.). Still other causes are the quantities of dust and sand pulverized by the sun's intense heat; the perpetual glare of light; the contrast of the heat with the cold sea-air on the coast, where blindness is specially prevalent; the dews at night which white people sleep on the roofs; old age, etc.; and perhaps, more than all, the Mohammedan fanaticism, which leads to a neglect of the proper remedies in time. Ludd, the ancient Lydda, and Ramleh, enjoy a fearful notoriety for the number of blind persons they contain. The common saying is that in Ludd every man is either blind or has but one eye. Jaffa is said to contain 500 blind out of a population of 5000 at most. There is an asylum for the blind in Cairo (which at present contains 300), and their conduct is often turbulent and fanatic (Lane, Mod. Ep. i, 38, 292).

In the New Testament blind mendicants are frequently met with (Matt. ix, 27; xii, 22; xx, 39; xxii, 24; John vi, 3). Blindness is mentioned in prophecy as a peculiar attribute of the Messiah (Isa. xxix, 18, etc.). The Jews were specially charged to treat the blind with compassion and care (Lev. xix, 4; Deut. xxvii, 18). The blindness of Bar-Jesus (Acts xii, 6) was miraculously produced, and of its nature we know nothing. Some have attempted (on the ground of Luke's profession as a physician) to attach a technical meaning to ἄγλυς and σκώρος (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 201), viz. a spot or "thin tunicle over the corneas," which vanishes naturally after a time: for which the same term, ἁλυκά, is made use of by Lælius (Verr. iv, ii, ed. Kûh, 48), who says that ἁλυκά will disappear properly, if a wondrous power has been inflicted. Before such an inference can be drawn, we must be sure that the writers of the New Testament were not only acquainted with the writings of Hippocrates, but were also accustomed to a stricter medical terminology. In the same way analogies are quoted as deriving from the Maccabees (I Macc. iv, 52) and of fish-gall in the case of the λιθώματα of Tobias; but, whatever may be thought of the latter instance, it is very obvious that in the former the saliva was no more instrumental in the cure than the touch alone would have been (Trench, On the Miracles at Matt. i, 27).

The habit of the blind person is to refer to the sensation of the blind person, or to the appearance of the eye, and in both cases the haziness may have been referrible to any of the other transscription, to raise funds to construct as many churches as the Census Report showed to be needed to meet the wants of the metropolis. His theological writings are Five Lectures on John the Baptist (Lond. 1825, 12mo) and Twelve Lectures on the Acts of the Apostles (Lond. 1829, 8vo), which edition includes also the Lectures on John:—Sermons at St. Botolph's, (Lond. 1829, 8vo):—Sermons on the Church (Lond. 1814, 8vo); besides various occasional sermons, charges, pamphlets, etc. See Biber, Bishop Blomfield and his Times (Lond. 1857); Memoir of Bp. Blomfield, by the Rev. C. J. Christ. Remembrancer; xlv; 386; English Cyclopaedia, s. v.

Blondel, David, one of the most learned theologians of a learned age, was born at Châlons-sur-Marne in 1501, and became a minister among the French Protestants in 1514. In 1619 he published his Modeste déclaration de la sincérité et verité des églises reformées (8vo). In 1631 he was nominated professor at Saumur. The synod of Charenton in 1645 fixed him at Paris with a pension of 1000 livres, in order that he might have means and leisure to write for the Protestant cause. In 1650 he was invited to Amsterdam to succeed Voelius in the chair of history, and there he caught a cold in the eyes, which deprived him of sight for the rest of his days. He died April 8, 1658. His writings in church history and heraldry are still of great value to Protestantism. Among them are, 1. Familiar eclaircissements, etc.; a treatise on the debate on the existence of "Pope Joan," which he decides in the negative (Amsterdam, 1647, 1649, 8vo);—2. Pseudo-Indonis et Turonis responsalia; to prove the identity of the deponents before the ancient popes (Geneva, 1528, 4to);—3. Apologie pro sensu Hieronymi de episcopis et presbyteris; an able defense of Presbyterians (Amsterdam, 1646);—4. De la primauté dans l'Eglise (1641); against Cardinal Duperron, perhaps the greatest of his works:—5. A Traité de l'Episcopat, translated (Lond. fol. 1651). A full list is given by Nieueus, vol. viii, 46; see also Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 306.

Blood (βος, ἄλοξ: both occasionally used, by Hebraism, in the plural with a sing. sense), the red fluid circulating in the veins of men and animals. The term is employed in Scripture in a variety of senses. 1. As Food.—To blood is ascribed in Scripture the mysterious sacredness which belongs to life, and God reserved it to Himself when allowing man the dominion over the lower animals for food, etc. (See Thomson, Land and Book, i, 136.) In Gen. ix, 4, where the use of animal food is allowed, it is first absolutely forbidden to eat "flesh with its soul, its blood," which expression, were it otherwise obscure, is explained by the mode in which the same terms are employed in Deut. xii, 23. In the Mosaic law the prohibition is repeated with frequency and emphasis, although it is generally introduced in connection with sacrifices, as in Lev. iii, 7; vii, 26 (in both which places blood is coupled in the prohibition with the fat of the victims); xvii, 10-14; xix, 2; Deut. xii, 16-28; xv, 20. In the prohibitions introduced in connection with the lawful and unlawful articles of diet, the reason which is generally assigned in the text is that "the blood is the soul," and it is ordered that it be poured on the ground like water. But where it is introduced in reference to the portions of the victim which were to be offered to the Lord, then the text is changed to the former, and it is insisted that "the blood expiates by the soul" (Lev. xvii, 11, 12). This strict injunction not only applied to the Israelites, but even to the strangers residing among them. The penalty assigned to its transgression was the being "cut off from the people," by which the punishment of death is to be understood (comp. Not a, 42, ch. 28), although it is difficult to ascertain whether it was inflicted by the sword or by stoning. It is observed by Michaelis (Mos. Recht, iv, 45) that the blood of fishes does not appear to be interdicted. The words in Lev. vii, 26, only expressly mention that of birds and cattle. This accords, however, with the reasons assigned to the prohibition of blood, and couched in phrases which could not be offered to the Lord, although they formed a significant offering in heathen religions. To this is to be added that the apostles and elders, assembled in council at Jerusalem, when desirous of settling the extent to which the ceremonial observances were binding upon the converts to Christianity, renewed the injunction to avoid the sacrifice of blood, and couched it in phrases which things offered to idols (Acts xv, 29). It is perhaps worthy of notice here that Mohammed, while professing to abrogate some of the dietary restrictions of the Jewish law (which he asserts were imposed on account of the sins of the Jews, Sura iv, 186), still enforces, among others, the abstinence from blood, and makes it an abomination to offer blood of idolatrous sacrifices to idols (Korus, Sur. v. 4; vi, 146, ed. Flugel).

In direct opposition to this emphatic prohibition of blood in the Mosaic law, the customs of uncivilized heathens sanctioned the cutting of slices from the living animal, and the eating of the flesh while quivering with life and dripping with blood. Even Saul's army committed this enormity, as we read in Acts xiii, 22; and the prophet also lays it to the charge of the Jews in Ezek. xxxix., 25. This practice, according to Bruce's testimony, exists at present among the Abyssinians. Moreover, pagan religions, and that of the Phœnicians among the rest, appointed the eating and drinking of blood, mixed with wine, as a rite of idolatrous atonement, especially in the case of those accused of swearing. To this the passage in Ps. xvi, 4 appears to allude (comp. Michaelis, Critica. Colle. p. 106, where several testimonies on this subject are collected).

Among Christians different views have been entertained respecting the eating of blood, some maintaining that its prohibition in the Scriptures is to be regarded as a ceremonial and ceremonial only, while others contend that it is unlawful under any circumstances, and that Christians are as much bound to abstain from it now as were the Jews under the Mosaic economy. This they found on the facts that when animal food was originally granted to man, there was an express reservation in the article of the blood; that this grant was made to the new parents of the whole human family after the flood, consequently the tenure by which any of mankind are permitted to eat animals is in every case accompanied with this restriction; that there never was any reversal of the prohibition; that both Jews and Pagans were guilty of eating blood, as is evidenced in the Jewish code; and that in the New Testament, instead of there being the least hint intimating that we are freed from the obligation, it is deserving of particular notice that at the very time when the Holy Spirit declares by the apostles (Acts xv) that the Gentiles are free from the yoke of circumcision, abstention from blood is explicitly enjoined, and the action thus prohibited is classed with idolatry and fornication. After the time of Augustine the rule began to be held merely as a temporary injunction. It was one of the grounds alleged by the early apologists against the Calvinists of the enemies of Christianity that, so far were they from drinking human blood, it was unprofitable for them to drink the blood even of irrational animals. Numerous testimonies to the same effect are found in later ages (Bingham, Orig. Ecc. bk. xvii, ch. v, § 20). See Food.

2. Sacrificial.—It was a well-established rabbinical maxim (Mishna, Toma, v, 1; Menachoth, xxii, 3) that the blood of a victim is essential to atonement (" 의해נ רשא ובני, i. e. "there is no expiation except by blood"), a principle recognised by the author of the Talmud. It was also the custom of the Epithalami of the Gerizim and Ebal, that the液体 was associated (comp. Deut. xii, 28; τον ἄρπαν, ix, 22). See Bähr, Symbol. ii, 201 sq. See Expiation. The blood of sacrifices was caught by the Jewish priest from the neck of the victim in a bein, then sprinkled seven times (in the case of birds at once shed out) on the altar, i.e. on its horns, its base, or its four corners, or on its side above or below a line running round it, or on the mercy-seat, according to the quality and occasion of the offering; but that of the Passover on the lintel and door-posts (Exod. xii: Lev. iv, 5-7; xvi, 14-19); Ugolini, Thes. vol. x and xillii.

There was a drain from the Temple into the brook Cebron to carry off the blood (Maimon. opud Cramer de Aré Estor. Ugolini, viii). It sufficed to pour the animals' blood on the earth, or to bury it, as a solemn restoration of the life of the offering; but that of the Passover was kept clean, being merely lubricated with moisture on their internal or opposing surfaces, so as to allow of free motion to the heart and lungs.

It is more probable, however, from all the symptoms in the case, that the immediate pathological cause of Christ's death was a proper rupture of the heart.
The chief of these particulars are the following: (1.)
The suddenness of his death, which so surprised Pilate (Mark xv, 44), who was accustomed to see sufferers linger for days upon the cross. See Crucifix. (2.)
The loud cries just before expiring, which usually accompany the sense of suffocation resulting from the congestion of blood in the heart at the moment of death.
(3.) The sanguineous effusion from the pores that occurred in the garden the preceding night during a similar paroxysm of mental and physical tension. (4.) The separation of the serums ("water") from the crassumennum (clotted "blood") in this case, which can only be mediavally accounted for by this supposition. In other wise the blood would have become cagulated in the veins, and no such effusion as above could have occurred.

Wm. Stroud, M.D., London, 1847, p. 399-420.)

The puncture by the soldier's spear was therefore in the lower part of the pericardium itself, on the left side, as would naturally have been the case in a thrust with the right hand of one standing on the ground and opposite; this alone, had not Christ been already dead, would necessarily have been a fatal wound.

BLOOD-BAPTISM.

In the early Church, one devote to martyrdom without baptism was reckoned among the catechumens; martyrdom, being regarded as a full substitute, was therefore styled blood-baptis-

This notion was derived from several passages of Scriptures (Matt. x, 29; Luke xii, 50). When baptism was reckoned essential to salvation, martyrdom was also considered a passport to heaven. It was therefore made a substitute for baptism. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. x, ch. ii, § 50.

BLOOD, ISSUE OF (in Heb. נוּֽם נוּם), is in Scripture applied only to the cases of women under menstruation or the flux uteri (Lev. xv, 19-30; Matt. ix, 20, VMware "אֵין רֵאֵשׁ בַּגָּדֶד"; Mark v, 25, and Luke viii, 43, סֵנַה הַּיֵּן יָבִּישׁוּךָ). The latter caused a permanent legal uncleanness, the former a temporary one, mostly for seven days; after which the woman was to be pu-

The "bloody flux" is also mentioned in (Exodus 30:15; 21), when the soldier pierced him on the cross. The only natural explanation that may be offered of the fact is to suppose that some effusion had taken place in the cavity of the chest, and that the spear penetrated beneath the level of the fluid.
Supposing this to have happened, and the wound to have been inflicted shortly after death, then, in addition, the blood would also have trickled down, or,
at any rate, have made its appearance at the mouth of the wound, even though none of the large vessels had been wounded. It is not sufficient to suppose that the pericardium was pierced; and, if effusion had taken place there, it might also have taken place in the cavities of the pleura; but, during health, neither the pericardium nor the pleura contains fluid, being merely lubricated with moisture on their internal or opposing surfaces, so as to allow of free motion to the heart and lungs.

3. Homocidal.—In this respect "blood" is often used for life: God "will require the blood of man;" he will punish murder in whatever manner soever committed (Gen. ix, 5). "His blood be upon us" (Matt. xxvii, 25), let the guilt of his death be imputed to us. The voice of thy brother’s blood crieth; the murder committed on him crieth for vengeance (Gen. iv, 10).
"The avenger of blood;" he who is to avenge the death of his relative (Num. xxxv, 24, 27). The priests under the Mosaic law were constituted judges between "blood and blood," that is, in criminal matters, and when the life of the injured party was at stake; certain matters and the murder were casual or voluntary;
whether a crime deserved death or admitted of remision (Deut. xvii, 8). In case of human bloodshed, a mysterious connection is observable between the curse of blood and the earth or land on which it is shed, which becomes polluted by it; and the proper expiation is the blood of the slasher, which every one had thus an interest in exacting, and was bound to seek (Gen. iv, 10; ix, 4-6; Num. xxxv, 33; Psa. cxi, 98).
See AVENGER of BLOOD.

In the case of a dead body found and the death not accounted for, the guilt of blood attached to the nearest city, to be ascertained by measurement, till freed by prescribed rites of expiation (Deut. xi, 1-9). The guilt of murder is one for which a satisfaction was forbidden (Num. xxxv, 31).
See MURDER.

4. In a slightly metaphorical sense, "blood" sometimes means race or nature, by virtue of relationship or consanguinity: God "hath made one blood all nations of men" (Acts xvii, 25). It is also used as the symbol of slaughter and mortality (Isa. xxxiv, 8; Ezek. xiv, 19). It also denotes every kind of premumary death (Exek. xxxii, 6; xxxix, 18). "The bold imagery of the prophet," says Archbishop Newcome.
"is founded on the custom of invitations to feasts after slaughter, where the guests, and tyrant princes, and tyrants, are represented by rams, bulls, and boe-gaots." Blood is somettimes put for sanguinary purposes, as in Isa. xxxiii, 15, "He that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood," or, more properly, who stoppeth his ears to the proposal of bloodshed. To "wash the feet in blood" (Psa. viii, 10) is to gain a victory with much slaughter. To "build a town with blood" (Hab. ii, 12) is by causing the death of the oppressed laborers as slaves.

Wine is called the blood of the grape; "He washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes" (Gen. xiii, 11). Here the figure is easily understood; any thing of a red color may be compared to blood. See Wenyrs, Symbol. Dict. s. v.

FLESH and BLOOD are placed in opposition to a superior or spiritual nature: "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. xvi, 17). Flesh and blood are also opposed to the glorified body: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. xv, 40). FLESH is opposed to evil spirits: "We wrestle not against flesh and blood," against visible enemies composed of flesh and blood, "but against principalities and powers," etc. (Eph. vi, 12). See ECHEARISt.

BLOOD and WATER (John xix, 34) are said to have issued from the side of Jesus when the soldier pierced him on the cross. The only natural explanation that may be offered of the fact is to suppose that some effu-

20, the disease alluded to is hemorrhoage; but we are not obliged to suppose that it continued unceasingly for twelve years. It is a universal custom, in speaking of the duration of a chronic disease, to include the intervals of comparative health which may occur during its course; so that when a disease is merely stated to have lasted "for a great many years", it is not certain whether it was of strictly a continuous type, or whether it intermitted. In the present case, as this point is left undecided, we are quite at liberty to suppose that the disease did intermit, and can therefore understand why it did not prove fatal even in twelve years. It is possible in this kind of disease, and hence the delicacy of the woman in approaching Christ, and her confusion on being discovered. See Flex.

BLOOD-REVENGE, or revenge for bloodshed, was regarded among the Jews, as among all the ancient and Asiatic nations, not only as a right, but even as a duty, which devolved upon the nearest relative of the murdered person, who on this account was called Βασιλικος, the reclaimer of blood, or one who demands restitution of blood, similar to the Latin sanctorum sanguinis. See AVENGER OF BLOOD.

1. Jewish.—The Mosaic law (Num. xxxv, 31) expressly forbids the acceptance of a ransom for the forfeited life of the murderer, although it might be saved by his seeking an asylum at the altar of the tabernacle in case the homicide was accidentally committed (Exod. xxii, 13; 1 Kings i, 50; II, 28). When, however, the slayer had fled from his home, no other sanctuary was tolerated but that of the Temple at Jerusalem, the chances of escape for such a homicide from the hands of the avenger ere he reached the gates of the Temple became less in proportion to the distance of the spot where the murder was committed from Jerusalem; six days of refuge were in consequence appointed for the personal safety of the murderer in various parts of the kingdom, the roads to which were kept in good order to facilitate his escape (Deut. xix, 8). But the avenger durst not follow him, and there he lived in safety until a proper examination had taken place before the authorities of the place (Josh. xx, 6, 9), in order to ascertain whether the murder was a wilful act or not. In the former case he was instantly delivered up to the goel, against whom not even the altar could protect him (Exod. xxii, 14; 1 Kings ii, 29); in the latter case, though he was not actually delivered into the hands of the goel, he was notwithstanding not allowed to quit the place, however small, as long as he remained there all his lifetime, or until the death of the high-priest (Num. xxxv, 6; Deut. xix, 8; Josh. xx, 1-6), if he would not run the risk of falling into the hands of the avenger, and be slain by him with impunity (Num. xxxv, 26; Deut. xix, 6). That such a voluntary exile was considered more in the light of a punishment for manslaughter than a provision for the safe retreat of the homicide against the revengeful designs of the goel, is evident from Num. xxxv, 32, where it is expressly forbidden to release him from his confinement on any condition whatever. That the decease of the high-priest should have been the means of restoring him to liberty was probably owing to the general custom among the ancients of granting free pardon to certain prisoners at the demise of their legitimate prince or sovereign, whom the high-priest represented, in a spiritual sense, among the Jews. These views are supported both by the Mosaic law itself, as far as the spirit of the age allowed it, prevented all family hatred, persecution, and war from ever taking place, as it was inevitably the case among the other nations, where any bloodshed whatever, whether wilful or accidental, laid the homicide open to the duty of revenge by the relatives and family of the slain person, who again, in their turn, were similarly watched and hunted by the opposite party, until a family-war of extermination had legally settled itself from generation to generation, without the least prospect of ever being brought to a peaceful termination. Nor do we indeed find in the Scriptures the least trace of any abuse or mischief ever having arisen from these regulations (comp. 2 Sam. ii, 19 sqq.; iii, 36 sqq.). The spirit of all legislation on that subject is to learn whether it was of strictly a continuous type, or whether it intermitted. In the present case, as this point is left undecided, we are quite at liberty to suppose that the disease did intermit, and can therefore understand why it did not prove fatal even in twelve years. It is possible in this kind of disease, and hence the delicacy of the woman in approaching Christ, and her confusion on being discovered. See Flex.

(1.) The wilful murderer was to be put to death without any compensation. The nearest relative of the deceased became the avenger of blood (בָּאָרְלָם, the reclaimer, or avenger, as next of kin. Gesen. s. v. p. 234, who rejects the opinion of Michaelis, giving it the sign. of "polluted," i.e. till the murderer was avenged; Sept. δὲ ἀναγκαίως; Vulg. próprīa-sæmiss, Num. xxxv, 19), and was bound to execute retaliation himself if it lay in his power. The king, however, in later times appears to have had the power of restoring the life of the criminal. The shedding of blood was thus regarded as impious and polluted (Num. xxxv, 16-17; Deut. xix, 11; 2 Sam. iv, 7, 11; vii, 8, and iii, 29, with 1 Kings ii, 81; 38; 1 Chron. xxiv, 22-25).

(2.) The law of retaliation was not to extend beyond the immediate offender (Deut. xxiv, 16; 2 Kings iv, 6; 2 Chron. xxiv, 4; Jer. xxxix, 29, 30; Ezek. xviii, 20; Josh. xxxiv, 27, 8, 89).

(3.) The involuntary shedder of blood was permitted to take flight to one of six Levitical cities, specially appointed out of the 48 as cities of refuge, three on each side of the Jordan (Num. xxxv, 22, 23; Deut. xix, 4-6). The cities were Kedesh, in Mount Naphtali; Shechem, in Manasseh; Hebron, in the hill-country of Judah; on the east side of Jordan Bezer-reuen; Ramoth, in Gad; Golam, in Manasseh (Josh. xx, 7, 8). The elders of the city of refuge were to hear his case and protect him till he could be tried before the authorities of his own city. If the act were then decided to have been involuntary, he was taken back to the city of refuge, round which the roads proceeded with a radius of 2000 (2000, Patrick) cubits was assigned as the limit of protection, and was to remain there in safety till the death of the high-priest for the time being. Beyond the limit of the city of refuge the avenger might slay him, but after the high-priest's death his life was safe until his return to his home with impunity (Num. xxxv, 25, 28; Josh. xx, 4, 6). The roads to the cities were to be kept open (Deut. xix, 5).

To these particulars the Talmudists add, among others of an absurd kind, the following; at the cross-roads posts were erected bearing the word הָעְפָּלֶת, refuge, to direct the fugitive. All facilities of water and situation were provided in the cities; no implements of war or chase were allowed there. The mothers of high-priests used to send presents to the detained persons to prevent their wishing for the high-priest's death. If the fugitive died before the high-priest, his bones were sent home after the high-priest's death (P. Flagius in Targ. Onk. Ap., Rittersh. de Jure Angl. in the Civ. Stat., vili, 339; Lightfoot, Cent. Chron. c. 50, Op. ii., 208).

(4.) If a person were found dead, the elders of the nearest city were to meet in a rough valley untouched by the plough, and, washing their hands over a beheaded heifer, protest their innocence of the deed, and deplore the anger of the Almighty (Deut. xxii, 1-9).

See H.

2. Other Ancient Nations.—The high estimation in which blood-revenge stood among the ancient Arabs may be judged of from the fact that it formed the subject of their most beautiful and elevated poetry (comp. the Schol. on the 13th poem in Sullivan's Excerpt. Homaeus). Mohammed did not abdicate, but modified, that rigorous custom, by allowing the acceptance of a ransom in money for the forfeited life of the murderer (Koran, ii, 175-176), and at the worst forbidding the infliction of any cruel or painful death (Qur. xvii, 21). The practice among nations of patriarchal habits, that the nearest of kin should, as a matter of duty, avenge the death of a murdered relative. The early impressions and practice on this subject may be gathered from writings of a different though very early age and of different countries (Cassius, ii, 29 sq.; Horace, Epode iv, 14; xxiv, 480, 482; O. d. xvi, 270, 276; Muller on Zoroast. Zoro. c. ii, A and B). Compensation for murder is allowed by the Koran, and he who transgresses after this by killing the murderer shall suffer a grievous punishment (Sale, Koran, ii, 21, and xvii, 280). Among the Mohammedans and other Arab tribes, should the offer of blood-money be refused, the "Thar," or law of blood, comes into operation, and any person within the fifth degree of blood from the homicide may be legally killed by any one within the same degree of consanguinity to the victim. Frequently the homicide will wander from tent to tent over the desert, or even rove through the towns and villages on his luck, with a chain found his neck and in rags, begging contributions from the charitable to pay the apportioned blood-money. Three days and four hours are allowed to the persons included within the "Thar" for escape. The right to blood-revenge is never lost, except in compensation. It descends to the latest generation. Similar customs, with local distinctions, are found in Persia, Abyssinia, among the Druses and Circassians (Niebuhr, Descr. de l'Arabie p. 28, 30; Voyage, ii, 350; Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins, p. 66, 83; Travels in Arabia, i, 405, ii, 280; Smyth, p. 540, 548, 549; Layard, Nin. and Bab., p. 805, 807; Chardin, Voyages, vi, 107-112). Money-compensations for homicide are appointed by the Hindoo law (Sir W. Jones, vol. iii, chap. vii); and Tacitus remarks that among the German nations "a homicide is atoned by a certain number of sheep or cattle" (Germ. xxi). By the Anglo-Saxon law also, money-compensation for homicide, "wer-gild," was sanctioned on a scale proportioned to the rank of the murdered person (Lappenberg, ii, 386; Lingard, i, 411, 414).

Of all the other nations, the Greeks and Romans alone seem to have possessed cities of refuge (Serv. ad Aen. viii, 942; Liv. i, 8; Tac. Ann. iii, 60), of which Damsacus andtheta, Susa, and Ephesus to Samos, were some of the most prominent (2 Macc. iv. 34; comp. Potter's Greek Arch. vol. i, 480), and have to serve as a refuge even for wilful murderers. The laws and customs of the ancient Greeks in cases of murder may be gathered from the principle laid down by Plato on that head (D. Ph. Q. iv. x, in t. i; p. 28 sq.): "Since, according to tradition, the murdered person is greatly irritated against the murderer during the first few months after the perpetration of the deed, the murderer ought therefore to inflict a punishment upon himself by exiling himself from his country for a whole year, and if the murdered be a foreigner, by keeping away from his country. If, on the other hand, a subject be punished, it is but fair that the nearest relative should be appeased and grant pardon; but in case he does not submit to that punishment, or dares even to enter the temple while the guilt of blood is still upon his hands, the avenge shall arraign him before the bar of justice, where he is to be punished with the infliction of a double fine. But in case the avenger neglects to proceed against him, the guilt passes over to him (the avenger), and any one may take him before the judge, who passes on him the sentence of banishment for five years."—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See ASYLUM.

3. In Christianot.—That such institutions are altogether an alien spirit must be judged from the fact that revenge, so far from being counted a right or duty, was condemned by Christ and his apostles as a vice and passion to be shunned (Acts vii, 60; Matt. v, 44; Luke vi, 28; Rom. xii, 14 sq.; comp. Rom. xiii, where the power of executing revenge is vested in the authorities alone).

In Egypt, the average practice of blood-revenge is still prevalent in Corsica and Sardinia, where, however, it is more the consequence of a vindictive character than of an established law or custom. A Corsican never passes over an insult without retaliation, either on the offender or his family, and this cruel and un-Christian custom might be termed "barbarous retribution" or "barbarous retribution" is the source of many assassinations. The celebrated General Paoli did his best to eradicate this abominable practice, but his dominion was of too short duration for the effective cure of the evil, which has gained ground ever since the first French Revolution, even amongst the female sex. It is calculated that about four hundred persons yearly lose their lives in Sardinia by this atrocious habit (Simonet, Lettres sur la Corse, p. 314). See MURDER.

BLOODY SWEAT. According to Luke xxiii, 44, our Lord's sweat was "as great drops of blood falling to the ground." Michaelis takes the passage to mean nothing more than the invisible drops of sweat in the forehead (Amerk. fur Ung-lehrte, ad loc.). This, which also appears to be a common explanation, is liable to some objection. For, if an ordinary observer compares a fluid which he is accustomed to see colorless, to blood, which is so well known and so well characterized by the color, it descends to a particular point of resemblance, he would more naturally be understood to allude to the color, since it is the most prominent and characteristic quality.

There are several cases recorded by the older medical writers under the title of bloody sweat. With the exception of one or two instances, not above suspicion of fraud, they have, however, all been cases of general hemorrhagic disease, in which blood has flowed from different parts of the body, such as the nose, eyes, ears, lungs, stomach, and bowels, and, lastly, from various parts of the skin. The greater number of cases described by authors were observed in women and children, and sometimes in infants. The case of a young lady who was afflicted with cutaneous hemorrhage is detailed by Messopirit in a letter to Vallierini. She is noticed to have been cheerful, although she must have suffered greatly from debility and fibrous symptoms (Phil. Trans. No. 803, p. 2114). The case of an infant, only three months old, affected with the same disease, is related in the Phil. Trans. (No. 109, p. 193). A similar case is described in the Nov. Act. Acad. Nat. Cur. iv. 193. See also Eph. Acad. Nat. Cur. obs. 41; and, for other references, Copland's Dict. of Med. ii, 72. Where hemorrhagic diathesis exists, muscular exertion, being a powerful exciting cause of all kinds of hemorrhage, must likewise give rise to the cutaneous form of the disease.—Kitto, s. v.

The above are all instances of a chronic nature, resulting from a general diseased state of the blood-vessels, and are therefore little in point as illustrating the case of our Saviour, whose emotions were the cause of this temporary phenomenon. To such a case of punishment, it is but fair that the nearest relative should be appeased and grant pardon; but in case he does not submit to that punishment, or dares even to enter the temple while the guilt of blood is still upon his hands, the avenge shall arraign him before the bar of justice, where he is to be punished with the infliction of a double fine. But in case the avenger neglects to proceed against him, the guilt passes over to him (the avenger), and any one may take him before the judge, who passes on him the sentence of banishment for five years.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v. See ASYLUM.

The physical cause of the Death of Christ, by Wm. Stroud, M.D., London, 1847, thus maintains the possibility of proper bloody sweat, under strong mental exertion, especially in cases of anxiety and terror. The author states, gives us the result of this phenomenon, and then cites a number of cases in which it has actually occurred: "Perspiration, both sensible and insensible, takes place from the mouths of small regularly organized vessels, which perforate the skin in all parts of the body, terminating in blind extremities and extremely minute openings and the outer surface. These tubes are surrounded by a net-work of minute vessels, and penetrated by the ultimate ramifications of arteries which, according to the force of the local circulation, depending chiefly on that of the heart, discharge either the watery parts of the blood in the state of vapor, its grosser ingredients in the form of a glutinous liquid, or, in extreme cases, the entire blood itself. The influence of the invigorating passions, more especially in exciting an increased flux of blood, is faintly indicated by the process of blushing, either from shame or anger; for during this state the heart beats strongly, the surface of the body becomes hot and red, and, if the emotion is very powerful, breaks out into a warm and copious perspiration, the first step toward a bloody sweat." (Physical Crisis, p. 85, 86). See SWEAT.

The following instances of instances of disfavoring sweating of blood, show that the author's philosophy is not without its accompanying brevities. Frevity allows us only a condensed statement of a few of the instances as cited by him (p. 379 eq). An Italian officer, in 1552, threatened with a public execution, "was so agitato at the prospect of an ignominious death that he sweated blood from every part of his body." A young Florentine, unjustly ordered to be put to death by Pope Sixtus V, when led to execution, "through excess of grief, was observed to shed bloody tears, and to discharge blood instead of sweat from his whole body; in which case the precipitation which is a manifest proof that nature condemned the severity of a sentence so cruelly hastened, and invoked vengeance against the magistrate himself, as therein guilty of murder." In the Ephemerides, it is stated that "a young boy, who, having taken part in a crime for which two of his elder brothers were hanged, was exposed to public view under the gallows on which they were executed, and there observed to sweat blood from his whole body." Maldonato mentions "a robust and healthy man at Paris, who, on hearing sentence of death passed upon him, was covered with a bloody sweat." Other instances of the same kind also are on record. Schonck gives the case of a man who, in a in whom fell into the hands of soldiers; and on seeing herself encompassed with swords and daggers, threatening instant death, was so terrified and agitated that she discharged blood from every part of her body, and died of hemorrhage in the sight of her assailants." The case of a sailor is also given, who "was so alarmed by a storm that through fear he fell down, and his face sweated blood which,
during the whole continuance of the storm, returned like ordinary sweat." Catharine Merlin, of Chambery, at the age of forty-six, being strong and hale, received a kick from a bull in the pit of the stomach, which was followed by omitting blood, his having been suddenly stopped by her muscular resistance, the blood made its way through the pores of various parts of her body, the discharge recurring usually twice in twenty-four hours. It was preceded by a prickly sensation, and pressure on the skin would accelerate the flow and increase the quantity of blood. The Medico-Chirurgical Review for Oct. 1831, gives the case of a female subject to hystria, who, when the hysterical paroxysm was protracted, was also subject to this bloody perspiration. And in this case she continued at different times to be affected with it for three months, when it gave way to local bleeding and other strong restorative measures. But the case of this wretched Charles IX of France is one of the most striking that has as yet occurred. The account is thus given by De Mezeray: "After the vigor of his youth and the energy of his courage had long struggled against his disease, he was at length reduced by it to hisl, a case of at least eighteen, before the 8 of May, 1574. During the last two years, he had been his constitution made strange efforts. He was affected with spasms and convulsions of extreme violence.
He tossed and agitated himself continually, and his blood gushed from all the outlets of his body, even from the pores of his skin; so that on one occasion he was found bathed in a bloody sweat." From these and other instances that might be cited, it is clearly evident that the sweating of blood may be produced by intense mental emotion. The instances of it are comparatively rare, it is true, but, nevertheless, perfetly well authenticated. See BLOOD AND WATER.

BLOOM (usually \( \gamma, \) sese, the flower of a tree ( Gen. xi, 10 ). The almond rod of Aaron, which, by the miraculous power of God, was made to bad and bloom and bring forth almonds (Num. xvii, 8 ), was used as the special incense burner, the emblem of Him who first arose from the grave; and as the light and warmth of the eternal sun seems first to affect this symbolical tree (Jer. i, 11), it was with great propriety that the bowls of the golden candlestick were shaped like almonds. Most commentators think that the rod of Aaron contained the leaves of the leaves after it was laid up in the tabernacle; and some writers are of opinion that the idea of the thyrus, or rod encircled with vine branches, which Bacchus was represented to bear in his hand, was bor-rrowed from some tradition concerning Aaron's rod that bloomed. See AARON; Rod.

BLOT. To blot out (\( ???? \), markah) signifies to ob-iterate; therefore to blot out living things, or the name or remembrance of any one, is to destroy or to abolish, without leaving any trace of it. Exodus xlix, 15 ( where vii, 6 ), where we should read, as in the margin, "blot out." Also a sinful stain, a reproach, is termed a blot in Job xxxi, 7; Prov. ix, 7. To blot out sin is fully and finally to forgive it (Isa. lxiv, 22). To blot men out of God's book is to deny them his providential favors, and to cut them off by an unremittently deadly (Exod. xxxii, 38; Ps. lxxix, 28). When Moses says, in the passage referred to above, "Blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written," we are to understand the written book merely as a metaphorical expression, alluding to the records kept in the courts of justice, where the deeds of criminals are registered, and which signifies the same as in the purpose of God. (Exod. xxxii, 33; Ps. lxxix, 28). To blot out of future events; so that to be cut off by an unmitigable death is to be blotted out of this book. The blotting the name of the saints out of the book of life (Rev. iii, 5) denotes their final happiness in heaven.

BLOUNT, CHARLES, a noted English Deist, born in Upper Holloway in 1654. In 1679 he published his Anima mundi, containing a historical account of the opinions and sentiments concerning the resurrection of the soul after death. This pamphlet created a violent stir, and was condemned by Compton, bishop of London. In 1680 he published his most celebrated work, viz., the first two books of Philostratus, containing the life of Apolloius of Tyana, with philological notes.
This work was afterwards taken into use by Lord Herbert of Cherbury, was suppressed as soon as it appeared, but it was translated into French and pub-ished in that country. In 1683 his Religio Livci appeared anonymously. Blount was a vulgar man, of limited learning, and a great plagiarist. He shot himself in 1698, in despair at the refusal of his first wife's sister to marry him. His Miscellanea Works, with a biography, appeared in 1856 (Lond. 12mo).—Macau-

BLUE (\( ???? \), teile'chek), almost constantly associated with purple, occurs repeatedly in Exoz. xxy-xxxi; also in Num. iv, 6, 7, 9, 11, 12; xv, 38; 2 Chron. ii, 7, 14; iii, 14; Esth. i, 6; viii, 15; Jer. x, 9; Exx. xxiii, 6; xxiv, 7, 24; Sept. generally binaevog, bin hew, and in i. viii, 41, 41, 21; "1 Mac. iv, 23; and so Josephus, Philo, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Vulgate, and Jerome. (In Esth. i, 6, the word translated "blue" is the same elsewhere rendered "linen.") This color is supposed to have been obtained from a purple shell-fish of the Mediterranean, the consanguinity of the ancients, the Hekz kodkass of Linneus (Syst. Nat. t. i, pt. vii, p. 8645; and see Forskal’s Descriptio Animal. p. 127), called chisum (חיסון) by the ancient Jews. Thus the Pseudo-Jonas-than, in Deut. xxxiii, 19, speaks of the Zebulunites, who dwell at the shore of the great sea, and caught chisum, with whose juice they dye thread of a hya-ckinthis color. The Scriptures afford no clue to this color; for the only passages in which it seems, in the English version, to be applied to something that might assist our conceptions are mistranslated, namely, “The blueness of a wound” (Prov. xx. 20), and “A blue mark upon him that is beaten” (Ecclus. xxiii, 10), there being no reference to color in the original of either. The word in the Sept. and Apocrypha refers to water; but both the hebrew and grecian noun so named by the ancients are disputed, especially the former. Yet it is used to denote dark-colored and deep purple. Virgil speaks of ferruginesa hyacintho, and Columella compares the color of the flower to that of clotted blood, or deep, dusky red, like rust (De Re Rust. x. 305). Hebschylus defines ἰακώβινον ὡμολαγετος, ἱεροσειρός. It is plainly used in the Greek of Ecclus. xl. 4, for the royal purple. Josephus evidently-takes the Hebrew word to mean “sky-color;” for in explaining the colors of the vail of the Temple, and referring to the blue (Exod. xxvi, 81), he says that it represented the air or sky (War, v. 4); he similarly explains the vestment of the high-priest (Amit. iii. 7, 7; and see Philo, Vita Mosis, iii. 148; i. ii. (ed. Mangny).) These statements may be reconciled by the fact that, in proportion as the sky is clear and serene, it assumes a dark appearance, which is still more observable in an Eastern climate. See Purpl.

The chief references to this color in Scripture are as follows: The robe of the high-priest’s ephod was to be all of blue (Exod. xxviii. 81); so the looms of the curttains to the tabernacle (xxvi. 4); the ribbon for the breastplate (xxviii. 28), and for the plate for the mitre (ver. 37; comp. Ecclus. xiv. 10); blue clothes for various sacred uses (Num. iv. 6, 7, 9, 11, 12); the people commanded to wear a ribbon of blue above the fringe of their garments (Num. xv. 38); it appears as a color of furniture in the palace of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 6), and part of the royal apparel (xii. 15); array of the idols of Babylon (Jer. x. 9); of the Assyrian nobles, etc. (Ezra xxii. 6; see Braunsch, De Vestibus, i. 9 and 18; Bochart, iii. 670). Wild Boar.
Sea of Galilee, no domesticated swine were reared. In Egypt, where swine-herds were treated as the lowest of men, even to a denial of admission into the temple, the wild boar was brought to the house of a swine filder the person nearly as much as it did a Hebrew, it is difficult to conjecture for what purpose these animals were kept so abundantly as it appears by the monumental pictures they were; for the mere service of treading down seed in the deposited mud of the Nile when the inundation subsided, the primary purpose alleged, cannot be admitted as a sufficient explanation of the fact. Although in Palestine, Syria, and Phenecia hogs were rarely domesticated, wild boars are often mentioned in the Scriptures, and they were frequent in the time of the Crusades; for Richard Courc-de-Loine encountered one of vast size, reared throughout with his lance, and when the animal was still endeavoring to gore his horse, he leaped over its back, and slew it with his sword. At present wild boars frequent the marshes of the Delta, and are uncommon on Mount Carmel and in the valley of Ayalon. They are abundant about the sources of the Jordan, and lower down, where the river enters the Dead Sea. King Herod's antelope is a sort of wandering tribe of Mesopotamia, and on the banks of both the great rivers, hunt and eat the wild boar, and it may be suspected that the half human satyrs they pretend sometimes to kill in the chase derive their cloven-footed hind-quarters from wild boars, and their upper made of cotton fibres, in order to attract women and public that the nutritive flesh they bring home is a luxury forbidden by their law. The wild boar of the East, though commonly smaller than the old breeds of domestic swine, grows occasionally to a very large size. It is passive while un molested, but vindictive and fierce when roused. The ears of the species are small, and rather rounded, the snout broad, the tusks very prominent, the tail distichous, and the color dark ash, the ridge of the back bearing a profusion of long bristles. It is doubtful whether this species is the same as that of Europe, for the farrow are not striped; most likely it is identical with the wild hog of India. The wild boar roots up the ground in a different manner from the common hog; the one turns up the earth in little spots here and there, the other ploughs it up like a furrow, and does irreparable damage to the cultivated lands of the farmer, destroying the roots of the vines and other plants. The chief difference between the two boars is said by Fowke in his Oriental Memoirs, "is in the forests and jungles; but when the grain is nearly ripe, he commits great ravages in the fields and sugar plantations. The powers that subverted the Jewish nation are compared to the wild boar, and the wild beast of the field, by which the vine is wounded; and no figure could be more happily chosen (Psa. lxxx, 13). That ferocious and destructive animal, not satisfied with devouring the fruit, lacerates and breaks with its sharp tusks the branches of the vine, or with its stout digs it up by the roots and tramples it under its feet." Dr. Pococke observed very large herds of wild boars on the side of the road near, where it flows out of the Sea of Tiberias, and several of them on the other side lying among the reeds of the sea. The wild boars of other countries delight in like moist retreats. These shady marshes, then, it would seem, are called in the Scripture "woods," for it calls these animals "the wild boars of the woods," which had been touched by the hand of the Lord. This herb of the sea was known to the Assyrians, and sculptured on their monuments (see Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 109). The Heb. ינש is from an unused root יעש (chazar), to roll in the mire. The Sept. renders it σικος or ισιος, but in the N.T. χοριος is used for swine. See Swine.

Board is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following words: ינק, lv'ak (a tablet, usually "table"), spoken of the enclosing materials of the altar, Exod. xxvii, 8; xxviii, 7; of sculptured םב, 3 Kings vii, 36 ("ledge"); of writing tablets ("table") Isa. xxx, 8; Jer. xvii, 1; Hab. ii, 2; of the scribes of folding-doors, Cant. viii, 9; of the deck of a ship, Ezek. xxvii, 27 ("hull"); of boards, Lk. iv, 2. 1 Kings vi, 15, 16; ינק, ke'rekh, a plank, i.e. of the tabernacle, Exod. xxvi, 15-29; xxv, 11; xxviii, 20-94; xxxix, 12, 13; Num. iii, 36; iv, 31; "bench," i.e. deck, Ezek. xxviii, 6; ינק, sederak, a row, e.g. of stones, 1 Kings vi, 9; of soldiers ("rangers"). 2 Kings vi, 8, 15; ינק, a plank of a vessel, Acts xxvii, 44.

Boaz.

Boardman, George Dana, A. M., an American Baptist missionary, called the "apostle of the Karens," was born at Livermore, Maine, where his father was pastor of a Baptist church, Feb. 8, 1801. He entered at Waterville College, where he was converted in 1820. His attention while in college was strongly turned to the work of foreign missions, and he offered himself to the Baptist Board in April, 1823, and was accepted. After a period spent in study at Andover, he was ordained, and sailed from Philadelphia for Calcutta, July 10, 1826. The voyage was spent in Calcutta, on account of the war inBurmah, he reached his destined port, Maulmain, in 1827. In 1828 he was chosen to found a new station at Tavoy, and in three years he gathered a Christian Church of nearly 100 converted Karens. He died Feb. 11, 1831. On his last furlough he made a tour among the Chinese villages of yonder mountain, Who taught you to abandon the worship of demons? Who raised you from vic to morality? Who brought you your Bibles, your Sabbaths, and your words of prayer? Let THE HEIFH BYE HILP IT.—King, Memoir of Boardman (Boston, 1836, 12mo); Sprague, Annals, vi, 723.

Boats. Richard, one of the first Methodist ministers in America, was born in England in 1738, and became a Wesleyan preacher in 1763. In 1768, in answer to a call from Mr. Wesley, he volunteered as missionary for America. After several years' faithful service, he returned to England in 1774, and continued his itinerant labors in England and Ireland till his death at Cork, Oct. 2, 1792. He was a very successful preacher.—Sandford, Wesley's Missionaries in America, p. 22; Myles, Chronolo al History, p. 294; Wakely, Heroes of Methodism, p. 178; Stevens, Hist. of M. E. Church, i, 95, 197; Sprague, Annals, vii, 8.

Boat (usually πολυποια, a small ship [see Ship]; the word does not occur in the Old Test. except in the translation above); see Fenn. Abbot, 235. The word is derivative of the shipwreck of Paul, recorded in the 17th chapter of the Acts, it is stated v. 17, "We had much work to come by the boat" (αρα, a skiff). Every ship had a boat, as at present, but it was not taken up at the commencement of the voyage and secured on the deck, but left on the water, attached to the stern by a rope; the difference may be thus accounted for: The modern navigator bids adieu to land, and has no further need for his boat; but the ancient mariner, in creeping along the coast, maintained frequent intercourse with the land, for which the boat was always kept ready. When, however, a storm arose, and danger was apprehended, and that the boat might be dashed to pieces against the sides of the ship, it was drawn close up under the stern. In the above passage we are to understand that this was done, and that there was much difficulty in thus securing the boat. See Shipwreck.

Bo'a'k (Heb. ld. גפס, alacrit)'the name probably of two men.

1. (Sept. and N. T. Bo'k, Josephus Bo'ac') A waif, suppliant, kinsman to Elisheba, husband of Naomi. See Rutt. Finding that the kinsman of Ruth, who stood in a still nearer relation than himself, was unwilling to perform the office of gold, he had those obligations publicly transferred with the usual ceremonies to his own discharge; and hence it became his duty by the "levirate law" (q. v.) to marry Ruth (although it is hinted, Ruth iii, 10, that he was much her senior, and indeed this fact is evident in whatever system of chronology we adopt), and to redeem the estates of her deceased husband Mahlon (iv, 1 sq.; Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 157). B. prob. cir. 1860. He gladly undertook these responsibilities, and their happy union was blessed by the birth of Obed, from whom in a direct line our Lord was descended. No objection seems to have arisen on the score of Ruth's Moabitish birth; a fact which has some bearing on the date of the narrative (comp. Ezra ix, 1 sq.)—Smith, s. v. See BETHLEHEM.

Boaz is mentioned in the genealogy, Matt. i, 5 ("Boaz"), as the son of Salmon by Rahab, but there is some difficulty in assigning his date. The genealogy in Ruth (iv, 18-22) only allows ten generations for the 833 years from Judah to David, and only four for the 565 years between Salmon and David, if (as is almost certain from Matthew and from Jewish tradition) the Rahab mentioned is Rahab the harlot. If Boaz married Ruth with the judge Jathan (q. v.), as is stated with little shadow of probability by the Jerusalem Talmud and various rabbinic, several generations must be inserted. Dr. Kennicott, from the difference in form between Salmah and Salmon (Ruth v, 20, 21), supposes that by mistake two different men were identified (Dissert., i, 643); but we seem to want at least three generations, and this explanation is not the only one. Hence, even if we interpolate two generations between Boaz and one after Obed, still we must suppose either the youngest son of his father, and that they did not marry till an advanced age (Dr. Mill, On the Genealogies; Lord Hervey, ii, p. 262, etc.; Brown's Oriental Dictionary, s. v. Boaz). See GEOMETRY; DAVID.

2. (Sept. Beth-hêq, and in the latter passage translates लेजिय, lezech, lough). The name given to the left-hand one of the two brazen pillars which Solomon erected in the court of the Temple (1 Kings vii, 21; 2 Chron. iii, 17); so called, either from the architect (or if it were a votive offering) from the donor. It was hollow, and surmounted by a chapter five cubits high, ornamented with net-work and 100 pomegranates. The apparent discrepancies in stating the height of it arise from the including or excluding of the ornament which united the shaft to the chapter, etc. See JACHIN.

Boo'cas (Boōkaz), the son of Abielam, and father of Samias, in the genealogy of Ezra (1 Esdr. vii, 2); evidently the same elsewhere (Ezra vii, 4, etc.) called Boo-kas (Boo'kas). See ABIELAM.

Boocold, John (otherwise called Bockhold, Bocket, Boccol, or John of Leyden), was born at Leyden in 1510. He was first a tailor, afterward an actor. He joined the Anabaptists in Amsterdam, and went in 1533 to Münster, where he usurped, after the death of Matthias, the dignity of prophet, and later that of King of Zion. After Münster had been taken by the bishop in 1538, Boocold was put to death on Jan. 25, 1536. See ANABAPTISTS.

Boch'art, Samuel, one of the most eminent scholars of the Protestant Church, was born at Rouen in 1599, and was nephew on his mother's side to the celebrated Pierre Dumonil. He studied at Sedan and Leyden, and his talent and proficiency showed itself very early. In September, 1628, he held disputations with Vincent de Jeuj, before a number of learned and noble men. Soon after appeared his Geographia Sacra (1646), which obtained for him such a high reputation that Queen Christina of Sweden wrote to him to invite him to come to Stockholm, and, when there, loaded him with distinctions. It is of little value to be identical with the return sent to Caen (1658) he married, and had one daughter, who was attacked with a slow disorder; this affected Bochart so fearfully that he died suddenly on the 16th of May, 1667. He was a man of almost unrivaled erudition, acquainted with Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Aramaic. When old, he endeavored to acquire a knowledge of the Ethiopian tongue under Ludolf. His other most important work is Hierarchicon, sine Historia Animarum S. Scripturarum, of which a modern edition was printed at Leipsic 1784-1796, in 8 vols. 4to, with notes by Rosenmüllcr, 3 vols. 4to. His complete works have been edited at Leyden by Johannes Leusden and Petrus de Villemandy, under the title Opera omnia, hoc est, Phal. et Hierarch. con Historia, divisa accurrente Dissertationum Variae, etc. Promittitur Vita Autoriae ad Stephano Morino scripta, editio quarta (1712, 3 vols. fol.). See "Life and Writings of Bochart" in Essays on Biblical Literature (N. Y., 1829); Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 318.

Boch'ceru (Heb. 'Bokeru, הֲבּ֖קֶרֻ, the first-born is he; Sept. translates πρωτότοκος οὗτος), one of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of King Saul (1 Chron. viii, 80; ix, 44). B. C. much poet 1058. See BECHER.

Bo'chim (Heb. 'Bokim, בּוֹכִ֑ים, weeping, in the first occurrence with the art, בּוֹכִ֖ים, hab-Bokim, where the Sept. translates ὁ Κάνωσμος, in the other passages Κανωσμος ή Κανώσμως), the name given to a place (apparently the graveyard of an altar) which was the home of the "Lord" reproved the assembled Israelites for their disobedience in making leagues with the inhabitants of the land, and for their remissness in taking possession of their heritage. This caused a bitter weeping among the people, from which the place took its name (Judg. li, 1, 5). "Angel" is here usually taken in the ordinary sense of "messenger," and he is supposed to have been a prophet, which is strengthened by his being said to have come from Gilgal; for it was not usual to say that an angel came from another place, and Gilgal (q. v.) was a noted station and resort of holy men. Most of the Jewish commentators regard this personage as Phinehas, who was at that time the high-priest. There are many, however, who deny that any man or created angel is here meant, and affirm that no other than the Great Angel of the Covenant is to be understood—the same who appeared to Moses in the bush, and to Joshua as the captain of Jehovah's host. This notion is grounded on the fact that "the angel," without using the usual formula of delegation, "Thus saith the Lord," says at once, "I made you to go up out of Egypt," etc. As the Gilgal near the Jordan is doubtless meant, and the place in question lay on higher ground ("came up"), probably near the place where the tabernacle was, we may conjuncturally locate Bochim at the head of one of the valleys running up between them, possibly at the present ruins of Khurbet Jeradeh, a little south-east of Sellum (Van do Velde, Mapp). See CARMEL.

Bodenstein. See CARMEL.

Body (represented by numerous Heb. terms; Gr. σῶμα), the animal frame of man as distinguished from his spiritual nature. Body is represented as opposed to shadow or figure (Col. ii, 17). The ceremonies of the law of figures and shadows realize the Jewish and the Christian religion. "The body of sin" (Rom. vi, 6), called also "the body of this death" (Rom. vii, 24), is to be understood of the system and habit of sin before conversion, and which is afterward viewed as a farothing burden. The apostle speaks of a spiritual body in opposition to the animal (1 Cor. xv, 44, 45), and this term also applies to the Church; the Church with its different members (1 Cor. xii, 20-27). See BOHEM.

Boeheim. See BÖHEIM.

Boeheimer, Peter, an eminent Moravian minister, was born Dec. 9, 1712, at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and was educated at Jena. On the 16th of December, 1757, Boeheimer received ordination as a minister from the hands of Count Zinzendorf, with whose benefactions and instructions he was dispatched, via London, on a mission to the negro population of Carolina and Georgia. On reaching London he met John Wesley, and here began an intimacy which had great results in fixing Wesley's religious experience. See Wesley. Boehler's mission was not very successful in Georgia; and the colonists, under his direction, removed to Pennsylvania about 1740. At the forks of the Delaware he was joined by Count Zinzendorf, Bishop Nitzschmann, David Nitzschmann, and his daughter Anna, who were engaged in the visitation of the North American churches, and whom he accompanied in their peregrinations. In the toils and privations peculiar to the earliest missionary settlements among the savages of North America, Boehler took his full share. His most peaceful labors were those in Bethlehem, where he labored as pastor with great diligence and success. Returning to England, he received ordination as a bishop. He had already been recognised as one of the superintendents of the North American congregations, and at the time of his death he was a director of the Brethren's "Union"—offices of no ordinary trust and responsibility. His episcopal visitations were extensive, and his oversight of the Brethren's congregations in England, Ireland, and Wales. He also attended, officially, several foreign synods, and took part in their important deliberations. The archives of several settlements contain affectionate mention of the holy influence by which his public ministrations and pastoral counsels were attended. The March and April of 1767, in which he died, can be traced in visitation of the settlement at Fulneck. A stone in the Moravian cemetery at Church road bears the following inscription: "Petrus Boehler, a Bishop of the Unitas Fratrum, departed April 27th, 1775, in the sixty-third year of his age."— Wesleyan Magazine, Aug. 1854; Stevens, History of the Moravians, 1:100; Wesley, Works, ii, 61, 62, etc.; Moravian (newspaper), Nov. and Dec. 1861; Stevens, Hist. of M. E. Church, i, 34.

Boehme, Christopher Frederick, a German theologian, was born in Eisenberg in 1766; in 1798 he became preacher of the gymnasium at Altenburg; in 1808 he was made pastor of the Church of Magdalen, and in 1810 head pastor of Lucka. He died in 1844. Among his numerous works are, Die Suchte d. rationalen Supernaturallums (Nast, ab. Oder 1823); Die Religion Jesu (Halle, 1825, 2d ed. 1827); Die Religion d. Apostel J. H. (Halle, 1820); Die Religion d. christlichen Kirche unserer Zeit (Halle, 1832); Die Lehre v. d. göttlichen Eigenschaften (1821, 2d ed. 1825); Briefe Pauli u. d. Römer (Leipsic, 1866); and a. d. Hebräer (Leipsic, 1829).

Boehme, Jacob (German, Boehe; often written Boheme in English), a theosophist or mystic enthusiast, was born at Old Seidleburg, a short distance from Görlitz, in Upper Lusatia, 1755. His parents being poor, he was employed in tending cattle from a very early age, and afterward apprenticed to a shoemaker, a business which he continued to follow after his marriage in 1794. He had the good fortune, for once in his life, that period, to learn reading and writing at the village school, and that he filled the education he received; the terms from the dead languages introduced into his writings, and what knowledge he had of alchemy or the other sciences, being acquired in his own rude way subsequently, chiefly, perhaps, from conversation with men of learning, or a little reading in the translations of Fludd. He tells several marvellous stories of his boyhood: one of them is, that a stranger of a severe but friendly countenance came to his master's shop while he was yet an apprentice, and warned him of the great work to which God should appoint him. His religious habits soon became conspicuous among his profane fellow-townsmen; and he carefully studied the Bible, especially the Apocalypse and the writings of Paul. He soon began to believe himself inspired, and about 1660 deemed himself the subject of special revelations. Acquiring a knowledge of the doctrines of Paracelsus, Fludd, and the Rosicrucians, he devoted himself also to practical chemistry, and made good progress in natural science. Revealed visions of a divine origin, and believing himself commissioned to reveal the mysteries of nature and Scripture, he imagined that he saw, by an inward light, the nature and essences of things. Still he attended faithfully to the duties of his humble home, publishing none of his thoughts until 1610, when he had a fresh "revelation," the substance of which he communicated in the "Diary," which was continued in the "Morning-Red," which was handed about in MS. until the magistrates, instigated by Richter, dean of Göt- litz, ordered Boehme to "stick to his last" and give over writing books. In seven years he had another season of "inward light," and determined no longer to suppress his views. In five years he wrote all the books named below, but only one appeared during his life, viz. Der Weg zu Christo (1624, translated into English, The Way to Christ, Lond. 1759, 12mo). Richter renewed his persecutions, and at last the magis- trates requested Boehme to leave his home. To avoid further trouble, he took refuge in Brandenburg, and the day before his death he wrote his "Diary," of which he had not been there long before the Elector of Hanover assembled six doctors of divinity and two professors of the mathematicians, who, in presence of the elector, examined Boehme concerning his writings and the high mysteries therein. "They also proposed to him many profound queries in divinity, philosophy, and other sciences with which he appeared more than accustomed; his meekness of spirit, depth of knowledge, and fulness of matter, that none of these doctors and professors returned one word of dislike or contradiction."

Soon after Boehme's return to Görlitz, his adversary Richter died; and three months after, on Sunday, November 18, 1624, in the morning, Boehme asked his son Tobias if he heard the excellent music. The son replied "No," "Open," said he, "the door, that it may be better heard." Afterward he asked what the clock had struck, and said, "Three hours hence is my time." When it was near six he took leave of his wife and sons, blessed them, and said, "Now go I hence into Paradise;" and, bisecting his son to turn him, he fetched a deep sigh and departed. His writings (all in German) are as follows: 1. Aurora:—2. Of the Love of Christ (1619):—3. Of the Threefold Life of Man (1620):—4. Answers to the Forty Questions of the Professor of Leipzig (1621):—5. Of the Incorruptibility of Jesus Christ and the Suffering, Death, and Resurrection of Christ;—6. Of the Treed of Faith:—7. Of the Six Points, great and small:—7. Of the Heavenly and Earthly Mystery;—8. Of the Last Times, to P. K.:—9. De Signatura Rerum:—10. A Consolatory Book of the Four Compliments:—11. An Apology to Bablaas Tolen, in two parts:—12. The Disclosures upon Janua Sibylla's Book:—13. Of True Re- pentance (1622):—14. Of True Resignation:—15. A Book of Renovation:—16. A Book of Predestination and Election of God (1623):—17. A Compendium of Repentance:—18. Mysterium Magnum, or an Exposure upon Genesis:—19. A Table of the Principles, or a Key of His Writings:—20. A Table of the Mysterium Magnum:—21. The Holy Weeks, or the Prayer-Book:—22. A Table of the Divine Manifestation:—23. Of the Errors of the Sect of Eusebius Mehta and Itzias Steres, or Anisticelli:—24. A Book of the Last Judgment:—25. Letters to Divers Persona, with Keys for Hidden Words. These works certainly contain many profound philosophical truths, and some passages resembling the Biblical are singular and extravagant dreams respecting the Deity and the origin of all things. He delivered these as Divine revelations. Swedenborg, St. Martin, and Baader are his legitimate successors. A large part of the matter of his books is sheer nonsense. After his death his opinions spread over Germany, Holland, and England. Even a son of his persecutor Richter edited them. At his own expense an epitome of Boehme's works in eight volumes was made. The first collection of his works published by Heinrich Betke (Amst. 1675, 4to). They were translated into Dutch by Van Beyerland, and published by him (12mo, 8vo, and 4to). More complete than Betke's is the edition by Gichtel (10 vols. 8vo, Amst. 1682). This was reprinted with a new introduction by Gichtel's manuscripts Marginalia (Altona, 1715, 2 vols. 4to), and augmented (1720) by new additions as well as some additions from Gichtel's Memorials (1730). More recently an edition of his complete works was published by Schiebler (Leipzig. 1831-47, 7 vols.; new ed. 1859 sq.). The best translation of his works into English is that by the celebrated William Law (London. 1764, 2 vols. 4to). Several accounts of his views were published about the end of the 17th century; among these the following may be mentioned: Jacob Boehme's Theosophical Philosophy, unfolded by Edward Taylor, with a Short Account of the Life of J. B. (London. 1691-4). The preacher and physician John Pordage, who died in London in 1730, endeavoured to explain the doctrines of Boehme in Metaphysica vera et divina, and several other works. The Metaphysica was translated into German in three volumes (Francf. and Leipzig, 1725-28). Henry More also wrote a Censura Philosopliae Theosoticae on the mystical views of Boehme. Among the most zealous supporters of Boehme's theosophy in England were Charles and Durant Hotham, who published Ad Philosopherum Theosoticon, a Carlo Hotham (1648); and Mysteriwm Magnum, with Life of Jacob Boehme, by Durant Hotham, Esq. (1654, 4to). We have also Memoirs of the Life, Death, Burial, and Wonderful Writings of Jacob Boehme, by Francis Okey. (London, 1704). The same John's College, Cambridge (Northampton, 1789, 8vo). Claude St. Martin published French translations of several of Boehme's writings. Sir Isaac Newton, William Law, Schelling, and Hegel were all readers of Boehme. William Law, in the app. to the 2d ed. of his Appeal to all that Doubt or Disbelieve the Truths of the Gospel (1756), mentions that among the papers of Newton were found many autograph extracts from the works of Boehme. Law conjectures that Newton derived his system of fundamental powers from Boehme, and that he avoided mentioning Boehme as the originator of his system, lest it should come into disrepute; but this may well be doubted. It is asserted by Schelling that Schelling himself wrote his works without acknowledgment. Boehme's writings have certainly influenced both theology and philosophy to a considerable extent. In Germany he has followers still. For modern expositions of his system, more or less correct, see Hegel, Grach. d. Philosophie, iii. 202-237; Bozzi, Christ, p. 538 sq.; Pouqué, J. Boerner Manuscript (Codex Bornerianus), an important uncial MS. of the Greek Text, containing (with a few epitomes) Paul's epistles (it is generally designated as cod. G), with an interlinear Latin version. It belonged to Paul Junius, of Leyden, at whose death (1670) it became the property of Peter Francius, professor at Amsterdam; at the sale of his books in 1708, it was bought at a high price by C. F. Boerner, professor at Leipzig, from whom it takes its name. He lent it in 1719 to Bentley, who kept it for five years, endeavoring in vain to purchase it. It is now deposited in the library of the king of Saxony at Dresden. Ritteg has proved that, as it is exactly of the same size and style with the Codex Sangallensis (Δ of the Gospels), the two once formed one volume together, being probably written toward the end of the 7th or beginning of the 8th century. It was in possession of the monks of St. Gall by some of the Irish monks who flocked thither, one of whom has left a curious Celtic epigram on one of the leaves. See Gall (St.) Manuscript. Scrivener has likewise shown its remarkable affinity with the Codex Angilensis (F of the Pauline Epistles), implying that they were both copied from the same venerable archetype; but whether either received any defects, or fall at the same passages. Küster first published readings from it in his reprint of Mill's Gr. Text. Among Bentley's papers has been found a transcription of the whole of it, but not in his own handwriting. It was very accurately published in full by Matthaeus in 1791, in consequence of it, with two fac-simile pages. Anger, Tischendorf, Trügell, Böttiger, and Scrivener have since carefully collated it. It betrays certain marks of having been copied with a polemical view, but, in connection with the two MSS. named above, it forms a valuable aid to textual criticism.—Trügell, in Horne's Mill, 1893, xv, 246; Scrivener, Introd. p. 185 sq. Boštěchius (Amicius Manlius Torquatus Severianus), a celebrated Roman statesman and philosopher. Sprung from an illustrious house, he was born at Rome about 470, and went (according to one account) to study at Athens in 480. His father's death compelled him, in 490, to return to Rome. He was once elected consul (A.D. 510), was happily married, and had two sons, who in 522 were elevated to the consular dignity. He for some time enjoyed the high favor of Theodoric; but about 522, having been accused of treasonable attempts against the emperor, and of sacrilege and magic, he was condemned to exile and sent to Pavia, where he was cast into prison. Here he spent his solitary hours, amid the muses and confinement of his cell, in literary labors, and during this period were composed his De Consolatione Philosophiae. In the following year he was beheaded in his prison. Baronius relates, upon the authority of Julius Marcianus, that after the head of Boethius had been struck off, he took it up in his two hands and carried it to an adjoining church, where he was buried with reverence before the sacred stones. Well may Cavo add, "Nugatur planus infr vulnerable virtudis, spectatrixque suse dignitatem Card. Baro- nium!" His works are—1. In Porphyrium a Victorisi translatum dialogi ii.;—2. In Porphyrion et a Latine versum libri ii.;—3. In Categorios Aristotelis libri ii, and other Commentaries on Aristotle.—4. Introducitu Catholicos syllogismos, etc.—5. De Consolatione Philosophiae libri ii (Lyons, 1502, 4to, with the commentaries of St. Thomas Aquinas; ibid. 1514; Basle, 1536, 8vo, by Murmellius; Antwerp, 1607, 8vo, Lyons, 1688, and with the Annotations of Renatus Vallinus, 1666; Riga, 1734, by Freytag; Linz, 1827, by Weingartner; Jena, 1843, by Oehlschlagel). The Saxon version, by King Alfred, was published at Oxford, by Rawlinson, in 1698, from a modern transcript of the Cottonian MS., of which a few fragments only were saved. A number of theological treatises (especially three on the Trinity) are attributed to Boethius; but they were probably written by one of his disciples. The whole of the De Consolatione is not even satisfactorily established that he was a Christian at all. The De Consolatione was translated into English by Preston (1695), and into German by Freytag (Riga, 1794). The works of Boethius were collected and published at Venice, 1491; Basle, 1546, and, with several commentaries, in English, 1639; Leyden, 1671; Paris, 1680.—Landon, Exe. Dict. ii, 900.

was born at Jankow, Silesia, Sept. 7, 1690. His father designed him for the army; but, having been taught by a pious mother, his religious life was decided at an early age, and he refused to be a soldier. He studied law at Jena and theology at Halle. In 1718 he returned to Silesia, and lived for several years in noble families, everywhere leading men to Christ. He finally returned to Halle, and remained there, doing works of charity, and writing hymns and books of devotion, until his death, June 15, 1774. He is chiefly remembered for his hymns, and for his Goldenes Schutz- kästlein d. Kinder Gottes (Breslau, 1718), which has had an immense circulation. It is translated into English—hymn No. 74 of the German Hymnal (York, 1872—and many editions—one by the American Tract Society, N. Y.). His autobiography was published by Knapp (K. II. von Bogatzky's Lebenslauf von ihm selbst beschrieben, Halle, 1801). See also Loderhose, Das Leben K. II. von Bog stiege (Heidelberg. 1846).

Bogermann, JAN, a Dutch theologian, noted as president of the Synod of Dort, was born in 1576, at Oplevret, in Friesland. "He took a violent part in the religious disputes which then raged, wittingly or unwittingly, the Dutch mind at the beginning of the seventeenth century. His hatred of Arminianism extended itself (as theological hatred generally does) to the persons who upheld it, and his zeal was on various occasions gratified by securing the punishment of those who were supposed to suffer in him from him." He translated Beza's book, De la Punition des Heretiques (Punishment of Heretics), and assailed Grotius in a polemical treatise, Annotat'ones contra H. Grotium. In 1618 he was elected president of the Synod of Dort: "but his conduct there does not seem to have given satisfaction to the Frieslanders who had delegated him, for he was accused on his return of having exceeded his instructions." His most useful work was the translation of the Bible. Four other persons were associated with him in the task, but the translation of the Old Testament is chiefly his work, and is characterized by terseness, fidelity, and purity of language. It is still used in the Dutch churches. He died Sept. 11, 1637, at Franeker, in the university of which he was professor of divinity.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, vi. 870; Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v.

Bogomiles, an important sect of the twelfth century, kindred to the Massilians (q. v.), or perhaps the same. They seem to have represented parts, at least, of the Paulicians (q. v.) heresy. Their names is derived by some from their constant use of the prayer, Bog Mirola (God of the Poor); by others from the Slavonic word Bogomil (Beloved of God). Our knowledge of them rests chiefly on the Panoplia of Euthymiou Zigmabus, published by Gieseler (Göttingen, 1822). Issuing from Thrace, they obtained a footing in the patriarchate of Constantinople and in some dioceses of Egypt (Nestle, Eastern Church, ii. 244). Their theological system was a modified or quasi-dualism; admitting, indeed, but one Supreme principle, the good, but holding that the Supreme had two sons, Satanael and Jesus. Satanael, the first-born, had the government of the world, but, becoming intoxicated with the pride of power, he rebelled, in order to wrest the kingdom of his own, and many celestial spirits joined him. Driven from heaven, he formed the earth from pre-existing elements, and also created man. The human soul, however, was inspired directly by the Lord of Heaven, Satanael having sought in vain to animate the works without help from the Author of all Good. The very excellencies now apparent in mankind inflamed the envy of Satanael. He seduced Eve; and Cain, their godless issue, became the root and representative of evil; while Abel, the son of Adam, testified to the better principle in man. This principle, however, was comparatively ineflicacious, owing to the craft of the Tempter; and at length an act of mercy on the part of God was absolutely needed for the rescue and redemption of the human soul. The agent whom he singled out was Christ. A spirit, called the Son of God, or Logos, and identified with Michael the Archangel, came into the world, put on the semblance of a body, baffled the apostate angels, and, divesting their malignant leader of all superhuman attributes, reduced his title from Satan to Satan, and curtailed his empire in the world. The Saviour was then taken up to heaven, where, after occupying the chief post of honor, he is, at the close of the present dispensation, to be reabsorbed into the essence out of which his being is derived. The Holy Spirit, in like manner, according to the Bogomils, is an emanation only, destined to revert hereafter to the aboriginal source of life.

The authors of this scheme had many points in common with the other mediaval sects. They looked at all the Church as anti-Christian, and as ruled by fallen angels, arguing that no others, save their own community, were genuine "citizens of Christ." The strong repugnance which they felt to every thing that savored of Mosaic urged them to despoil the ritual system of the Church: for instance, they contended that the only proper baptism is a baptism of the Spirit. A more healthy feeling was indeed expressed in their hostility to property, generosity and charity, and in an effort to rid their faith of those relics of the saints, though even there the opposition rested mainly on Docetic views of Christ and his redemption. These opinions had been widely circulated in the Eastern empire when Alexius Comnenus ceased inquiries to be made respecting them, and, after he had singled out a number of the influential mediaval believers, doomed them to imprisonment for life. As aged monk, named Basil (q. v.), who came forward as the leader of the sect, resisted the persuasions of Alexius and the patriarch. He ultimately perished at the stake in Constantinople in 1119. His creed, however, still finding a number of adherents, more especially in minds alive to the corruptions of the Church and mystic in their texture.—Hardwick, Ch. hist. p. 502-505; Neander, Ch. Bogue, DAVID, D.D., an Independent minister of Engeland, one of the founders of the London Missionary Society, was born at Halidaytown, Berwickshire, March 1, 1750. He was sent in 1762 to the University of Edinburgh, where he remained nine years, and graduated A.M. in 1771. Soon after, he was licensed to preach in the Kirk of Scotland, and he was ordained at Gosport June 18, 1772. He remained twenty years the Independent congregation in that place for fifty years. In 1789 he opened a theological school at Gosport, which was afterward adopted as the training-school for missionaries sent out by the London Missionary Society. Besides his share in founding the London Missionary Society, he was one of the chief originators of the London Tract Society, and one of the first tract published by that institution. He died at Brighton Oct. 25, 1825. He wrote, in conjunction with Dr. Bennett, a History of the Dissenters from the Revolution of 1688 to 1808 (2d ed. Lond. 1833, 2 vols. 8vo); Essay on the Divine Authority of the New Testament (Lond. 1809); and on the Millet Discourses (2d ed. 1816). His Life was written by Dr. Bennett, and there is also a full memoir in Morrison, Missionary Fathers, p. 216.

Script. p. 144), mentioning Baburim, says that near to it, in the valley, is a stone called Bokem, of extraordinary size, and shining like marble; but this wants confirmation (yet comp. Böheim (or Böhem), Hans, a forerunner of the Peasant War in Germany, was born at Niklashausen, in Baden, about the middle of the fifteenth century. In his youth he was a farm-servant and a drummer at wakes and fairs. Awakened by the preaching of a Franciscan, he burnt his drum. He believed that the Virgin appeared to him, and revealed to him ascetic and extravagant doctrines to him, which about 1476 he began to preach. He soon gained influence among the lower classes by preaching against the vices of priests and princes, and against Purgatory. He probably had heard the teachings of the Hussites. Multitudes stirred to enthusiasm by his preaching. He was burnt at the stake in 1482. Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, 1, 384 sq.

Bohemia (Bohemum, Bohemyum, Roemia; Germ. Böhm, Böheim), a kingdom of Germany, in the Austrian dominions, bounded on the north by Misnia and Luastia, east by Silesia and Moravia, south by Austria, and west by Bavaria. Two thirds of the inhabitants are Slavonians, and call themselves Czechs; the remainder are chiefly Germans. As early as 845, many Bohemians had embraced Christianity through the medium of the Germans and Romans, in consequence of the wars of the German king Lewis. In 871, Duke Borzivoj, upon a visit to Svatopluk, ruler of the Moravians, became acquainted with the Christian faith. Later, the Moravians, and their attendants, received baptism, probably at Olmütz. On that occasion he became acquainted with Methodios, a monk and painter, who had been sent in 862 from Constantinople to Moravia as missionary, with his brother monk Cyrilus, who invented the Slavonic alphabet. Methodios accompanied the Bohemian duke to his own country, where many were converted and several churches built. The good work which Borzivoj had begun, Drahomira, the heathen wife of his son Vratissl, sought afterward to destroy. Ludmila, Borzivoj's widow, and her grandson, Duke Wenceslas, fell under her fury. It is the reign of Wenceslas the Pious (987-999) that Christianity obtained security and peace in Bohemia.

In 968 a distinct bishopric was formed at Prague for Bohemia, which until that period had been subject to the Bishop of Regensburg; and Hatto, archbishop of Mayence, consecrated the Saxo-Dothmar bishop of Bohemia. Then the pope required (though the Christianity brought in by Methodios was properly derived from the Greek Church, and the Slavonian liturgy had been introduced in several places) that every thing should be arranged in conformity with the Roman ritual. The use of the Latin language in divine service, the caliby of the priests, and the Lord's Supper without the cup, were especially enforced. But the Bohemians made great resistance, and in 977 the Bohemian delegates obtained a temporary permission for the use of the liturgy in the Slavonic language. But it was soon afterward resolved at Rome that the vulgar tongue should be expelled from the churches. An order to that effect by Pope Gregory VII, 1075, asserts that "it is the pleasure of Almighty God that divine worship should be held in a private language, though all do not understand it; for, were the singing general and loud, the language might easily fall into contempt and disuse; whereas, both liturgies continued in use up to the middle of the 14th century.

In 1583, under the archbishop of Prague, Ernst de Pardubitz (commonly called Arnostus), the commission without the cup was again insisted upon. Foreign professors and students, who had been accustomed in their native country to the Lord's Supper under one form, promoted this innovation in Prague. Nevertheless, in 1390, the communion under both forms was for some time allowed. But it was not long before it became obligatory and because these mountain-dweller had been always treated with much forbearance. Under Archbishop Ernst, Moravian customs were generally adopted in Bohemia. But there were many opponents of Roman Perversions in the 14th century. Wycliff's writings had impressed many of the noblest minds, both clergy and laity. Prominently among them were men like Nicholas of Cusa, cathedral preachers at Prague, Matthias Janow (q. v.), confessor to Charles IV, all of whom were expelled. After them arose Huss (q. v.), martyred 1415, and Jerome of Prague (q. v.), 1416, whose bloody deaths aroused the spirit of the Bohemians. In 1420, the Hussites, having thrown off arms, were communed by the pope; the Emperor Sigismund sent an army into Bohemia. The bravery and terrible deeds of Ziska, the Hussite leader, protracted the contest for many years. Fearful cruelties were practised on both sides. The painful division of the Reformers into Caesareans and Lituitians, or Ultra-Quasi, as they were called, but not the Taborites, who were, in the main, thorough Protestants. They continued unmoved by arguments or threats, by flatteries or sufferings, and, having gradually remodelled their ecclesiastical discipline, became known by the name of the Bohemian Brethren. The peculiarities of their religious belief are exhibited in their Confession of Faith (A.D. 1504), especially their opinion as to the Lord's Supper. They rejected the idea of transubstantiation, and admitted only a mystical spiritual presence of Christ in the Eucharist. On all points they professed to take the Scriptures as the ground of their doctrines; and for this, and more especially for the establishment and discipline of their churches, they received the approbation of the reformers of the 16th century. They distributed their members into three classes, the beginners, the proficients, and the perfect. To carry on their system they had clergy of different degrees: bishops were chosen by the consistory of the brethren, and not till the convents of the hierarchs and deacons: and, of lay officers, elders and acolytes, among whom the civil, moral, and ecclesiastical affairs were judiciously distributed. Their first bishop received his ordination from a Waldensian bishop, though their churches held no communion with the Waldenses in Bohemia. They numbered 200 churches in Bohemia. Persecution raged against them even up to the middle of the 17th century, and thousands of the best citizens of Bohemia were driven into Poland and Prussia. They subsequently obtained toleration, and entered into agreement with the Polish Lutherans and Calvinistic churches. Those who remained in Bohemia and Moravia recovered a certain degree of liberty under Maximilian II, and had their principal residence at Fulneck, in Moravia, and hence have been called Moravian Brethren. See Moravia. Though the Old Bohemian Brethren must be regarded as now extinct, this society deserves ever to be had in mind, for one of its principal guides, the pioneers of Christian truth and piety in times just emerging from the barbarism of the Dark Ages, and as the parent of the United Brethren. Their Catechism has been reprinted by Dr. Von Zeitschitz (Die Catechismen der Waldenser u. Böhmsischen Brüder, Erlangen, 1865). The Jesuits, supported by Ferdinand II, carried through the "counter-Reformation" in Bohemia.

effectually in the 17th century. Protestantism was crushed at the expense of civilization. There was no legal toleration for it until the philosophic emperor Joseph II issued his "Edict of Tolerance," Oct. 18, 1781 (Peasechek, ii. 355). Protestant congregations, both Lutheran and Reformed, soon sprang up.

The Roman Church is now very powerful in Bohemia. Its hierarchy includes one archbishop (Prague), three bishops (Leitmeritz, Königgrätz, and Budweis), a titular bishop, and twelve prelates of the rich orders of Knights of the Cross and Premonstratensians. The regular clergy have 76 monasteries and 6 convents of nuns. The Protestant element found chiefly in the eastern Bohemia; they number from 75,000 to 100,000, of whom 87 churches follow the Reformed confession, and 17 the Lutheran; and there are perhaps 7,000 to 10,000 Mennonites and smaller sects. Boles, Artemas, a Congregational minister, was born at Blanchard, Mass., Sept. 8, 1799, and graduated at Willoughby College 1816. In 1819 he was ordained pastor in Wilmington, N. C. In 1821 he accepted a call from Charleston; on account of ill health, he resigned 1823. In 1824 he was ordained pastor of the church in South Hadley, Mass. In 1884 he went to Boston as pastor of Pine Street Church, which position he resigned in 1840, and in 1841 removed to New London, where he remained until his death, Sept. 25, 1844. He published a Thanksgiving Sermon, Characteristics of the Times (1828), and an Address before the Society of Inquiry in Amherst College (1844).—Sprague, Annals, ii. 664.

Boll (בּל), shechin', rendered "botch" in Deut. xxviii. 27, 35, a burning sore or inflamed ulcer of an aggravated description, either local (as in the case of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx. 7; Isa. xxxix. 21), or covering an extensive surface (as in the case of the Egyptians, Exod. ix. 9, 10, 11; Deut. xxviii. 27, 35). See BLAIS.

It is also applied to the ulcerated spots indicative of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 18, 10, 20, 23), and is the term used to designate the disease of Job (Job ii. 7), probably the elephantiasis, or black leprosy. See LEPROSY.

Bolivia, a republic of South America. Its area is about 350,000 square miles. Population in 1855, 1,447,000, exclusive of about 700,000 Indians. The Roman Catholic Church is recognised as the state church, yet other denominations are tolerated. The convents have the right of receiving novices only on condition that they are at any time at liberty to leave again the monastic life. The chamber of senators exercises the right of superintending the ecclesiastical affairs. At the head of the Church is the archbishop of Caracas, and vicearchbishops, and three bishops, at Santa Cruz de la Sierra, Cochabamba, and Cochabamba. There is a university at Chuquisaca, besides several colleges. A large majority of the entire population are of Indian descent, and still show a strong attachment to the Jesuits, who were expelled from their missions March 27, 1767. In the eastern plains several are found together in the missions. There were in 1830, among the Chipiteo, ten missions, with 15,816 inhabitants; among the Mojoe, thirteen, with 23,931 inhabitants. See AMERICA.

Bolland or Bollandus, John, born in Brabant Aug. 13, 1596, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1612. He was chosen by his fraternity to carry into effect Rosewein's plan of the Acta Sanctorum, or Lives of the Saints. See ACTA SANCTORUM. He died Sept. 12, 1655. A memoir of his life is prefixed to the first volume of the Acta Sanctorum for March.

Bollandists, a society of Jesuits at Antwerp, so called as the continuators of the Acta Sanctorum after the death of Bolland. From 1655 to 1782, twenty-two editors in succession were engaged, and published one hundred and seventy-three volumes. These were all Jesuits; and after the suppression of that order, canons regular, Benedictines, and others devoted themselves to the prosecution of this work. It was undertaken in 1688 by several Jesuits at Brussels. Some idea of the vast extent of this work, still in progress, may be gathered from the fact that the lives of more than two thousand saints remain to be completed the year, and more than fifty additional volumes in folio must be published before the completion of the work. See ACTA SANCTORUM.

Bolled (בּולְדֶד), giblot, the calyx or corolla of flowers, a participial adjective from the old word boll, signifies pod or capsule; applied to the blossoms of flax (q. v.) in Exod. ix. 31.

Bolsec, Jérôme Hermès, a French Carmelite of the 16th century, who appears to have embraced the reformed opinions, and fled from Paris to Ferrara, where he was made aINNER to the duchess. From thence he went to Lyons, and there, at his own request, was admitted as a Protestant, and began to practise as a physician. In 1551 he declaimed against predestination in a public assembly. Bolsec was imprisoned, convicted of sedition and Pelagianism, and banished (Dec. 28, 1551). He returned to France and again embraced Romanism. In 1577 he published Histoire de la Vie, Moeurs, etc., de Jean Colom, a violently abusive book, which he followed with a slanderous Life of Beza in 1582. He died about 1585.—Moheim, Ch. Hist. iii. 196; Haag, La France Protestante, ii, 860.

Bolster (בּולָסָה), meroskoth, something at the head which occurs Gen. xxviii. 11, 18, where it is rendered "pillow;" 1 Sam. xix. 18, 16; xxvi. 7, 11, 16, a pillow. These were stuffed with straw or a spongy substance (Ezek. xiii. 21), the poorer classes, instead of these, made use of skins. The "pillow of goats' hair for his bolster," placed by Michael (1 Sam. xix. 13), seems to convey the impression that in those remote times it was not usual for any but sick persons to use bolsteros or pillows to support the head when in bed; and that, accordingly, they were stuffed with animal skin. In 1618 he was ordained as the head of the Teraphim, to confirm the notion she wished to convey that David lay there sick. She would then cover the head and bolster with a cloth, it being usual in the East for people to cover their heads while in bed. The Septuagint and Josephus make out that it was a goat's skin, the use of which, as explained by the latter (4 M. vi. 11, 4), was, that the liver of a goat had the property of motion some time after being taken from the animal, and therefore gave a motion to the bed-clothes, which was necessary to convey the idea that a living person lay in the bed. The Targum says that it was a goat-skinned bottle; if so, it was most likely inflated with air, and served as a pillow. It is possible, however, that the term "bolster" is merely an adverbial phrase, and should be rendered literally in all cases, as it actually is in 1 Sam. xxvi. 7-16. See BED.

Bolton, Robert, a Puritan divine, was born in 1572, and died in 1631. He was especially famous as a reliever of afflicted consciences. He professed on his death-bed that he never in his sermons taught anything that was not in the Bible, first sought to work in his own heart. He is the author of A Discourse on Happiness (Lond. 1611. 4to; 6 editions during the author's lifetime); Instructions relative to afflicted Consciences (1611, 4to); Help to Humiliation (Lond. 1631, 8vo); On the four last Things (Lond. 1633. 4to); Devout Prayers (1638. 8vo).—Middleton, Ecclesiastical Biography, ii, 18.
BOMBAY, the capital of a British presidency in India of the same name, had in 1845 a population of 285,000 souls, of which two thirds were Hindoos, 20,000 Parsees, and the rest Mussulmans, Jews, and Christians. It is the see of a bishop of the Church of England, whose diocese comprised in 1839 38 clergymen, including one missionary. It has the see of a Roman Catholic bishop.—Clergy List for 1860 (Lond., 1860, 8vo). See India.

BONAVENTURA, Giovanni, an Italian writer, and cardinal of the Romish Church, was born at Mondovi, in Piedmont, Oct. 10, 1699. Having distinguished himself in his studies, he entered, in 1625, the order of the Fuggians, and in 1631 he was made general of his congregation. In 1636 he was made a cardinal, and in many ways, and made him Consultant of the Congregation of the Index, Qualifier of the Holy Office; and in 1669 Clement IX made him cardinal. He died at Rome Oct. 27, 1674, after he had made a revision of all his works, the chief of which are—1. De Divina Pulchra, ejusque causa, mysteria, et disciplina, which treats of all matters relating to the holy office (Rome and Paris, 1669, 4to):—2. Manuductio ad calum.—8. Via compendi ad Deum.—4. Tractatus ascetics de discretione Spiritu.—5. De Sacrificio Masse.—8. Horologium asceticum.—7. De principiis sal Christianis.—8. De rebus litter.—24. containing all information concerning the rites and ceremonies of the mass (Rome, 1671, fol.: Paris, 1672, 4to): it was afterward revised and augmented by a dissertation on the use of fermented bread at the mass. All his works (except his poems and letters) have been collected in 5 vols. 8vo. The best edition of his works is that of Sala (Turin, 1747-58, 4 vols. 12mo.).

Concllusion among themselves, and unanimously agreeing to leave the matter in the hands of Bonaventura, who named Theodore, archdeacon of Liege, known as Pope Gregory X. This pope, in gratitude, made him cardinal-bishop of Albano in 1274. He attended the first session of the Council of Lyons, but died before its conclusion. He died at Rome, April 1, 1274. He was, in 1274, Pope Sixtus IV in 1492. In philosophy, as well as theology, he was pre-eminent in his time. His special aim was to reconcile Aristotle with the Alexandrians. "In his commentary on Lombardus he contracts the sphere of speculation, and studies to employ the principles of Aristotle and the Arabians, and to bring about the satisfaction of a minute and idle curiosity, as for the resolution of important questions, and to reconcile opposite opinions, especially in the important inquiries respecting individuation and free-will. Occasionally he restated his arguments rather on the practical destination of man than on theoretical notions—for instance, respecting the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. The Supreme Good he affirms to be union with the Deity, by which alone mankind can attain a perception of truth, and the enjoyment of happiness. This leads him to ascribe all knowledge to illumination from on high (Reductio actionis ad Theologian), which he distinguishes from the immediate exterior light, which he calls a vision and superior. He defines also degrees whereby man may approximate the Deity, and refers to these six as many distinct faculties of the soul—an ingenious idea, and copiously detailed, but in a great degree arbitrary and forced (Itinerarium mentis ad Deum). Finding speculation insufficient for the attainments of the Supreme Good, he abandoned himself with all his heart to Mysticism." "In the scholastic theology, Bonaventura ranks after Thomas Aquinas in point of fertility and of speculative acuteness; while, as a mystic, he lacks the independence of the school of St. Victor. His characteristic features are his austerity, his asceticism, both of thought and feeling, and his imaginative power, which, however, was always united with strict logical facility. According to his scholastic principle, he set out with the purpose to bring the whole of human knowledge within the sphere of theology (De reductione artium in theologiae)" (Herzog, Real-Encyclopaedia, i, 291). The worst feature of Bonaventura's influence was the impulse he gave to Marcolatriy (Elliott, Delin. of Romaniacism, &c. iv. ch. iv, p. 763, Lond. ed. 8vo). The beautiful hymn, Recordare sancta crucis, was written by him; it is given, with a translation, by R. H. Harkness, in Call, 1858, p. 480. Bond ("oraear, or "oraear", a moral obligation; "oraer", a physical means of restraint) is used for an order of men in many kins in Nauru, xxi, 2, 4, 12 [see Voy]; metaphorically, the word signifies oppres- sion, captivity, affliction (Pra. cxxi, 16; Phil. i, 7). See CAPTIVITY. The influences of the Holy Spirit are called the bond of peace (Ephes. iv, 3). Charity or Christian love is called the bond of perfectness, be- cause it completes the Christian character (Col. iii, 14).

Bonds are also bands or chains worn by prisoners (Acts xx, 28; xxy, 14) bound or subjected to slavery (1 Cor. xii, 13; Rev. vi, 15). See PAIN.

Bond, John Wesley, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore, Dec. 11, 1784, entered- the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1818, and was appointed successively to Calvert, Baltimore, and Greensville Circuits, after which he travelled as companion to the venerable Bishop As- aury until the death of the latter. In 1816 he was ap- pointed to Severn Circuit, and in 1817 to Harford. Here he contracted the fever of which he died, Jan. 22, 1819. Mr. Bond was a man of clear understanding and sound judgment, and diligent in all the duties of his Christian and ministerial profession. Minutes of Conferences, i, 294.

Bonds, Thomas Emerson, M.D., distinguished as physician, editor, and preacher, was born in Balti- more in February, 1782. His parents removed to Buckingham county, Va., and his early education was received there and in Baltimore. After studying medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, he re- turned to Baltimore to practise medicine, becoming M.D. of the University of Maryland. He was rapid- ly to distinction in practice, and was called to a profes- sorship in the university, which, from a failure of his health, he never occupied. From his boyhood he had been a diligent student of the English classical writers, and had modelled upon them a chaste, masculine, and nervous declamation. He was fond of theological questions, and brought to their study a mind of singular acuteness, disciplined to severity by his studies in physical science. At an early age he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in Harford county, Maryland; and, while practising medicine in Baltimore, was called to be their pastor. From 1816 to 1830 the Church was engaged in a successful agitation for reform in its government, and Dr. Bond took a very active part in the discussion. In 1827 he published an Appeal to the Methodists (8vo), in opposition to the proposed changes, and in (1828 A Narrative and Defence (8vo) of the course of the Church authorities. From 1828 to 1831 he edited the Independent, a newspaper pub- lished in Baltimore for the defence of the Church. In all these publications Dr. Bond showed himself a mas- ter of the subject, as well as of the art of controversy, and his writings contributed signaly to the overthrow of the so-called Radical reformers. In 1840 he was appointed to the chair of Greek in the University of Baltimore, which he occupied until his death, published in New York, the chief weekly organ of the Church. Here for twelve years he found his greatest field of activity, and achieved the greatest success of his life. In skill of editorial writing he has yet surpassed, it is thought, by no person engaged on the public press in America. The Methodist Quarterly also contains several important contributions from his pen. He died in New York 14th March, 1856.

Bondage (some form of the root "abod, to- till, or of "abod, to till," to subjugate; Gr. "douleioi," a state of slavery (Exod. i, 14), servitude or captivity (Ezra xix, 9). See SLAVERY; CAPTIVITY.

Bondage in Egypt.—The pretended fear of Pha- raoh, lest in the event of war the Hebrews might make common cause with the enemy, was a sufficient pretext with his own people for oppressing the Jews, at the same time that it had the effect of exciting their preju- dice against them. Affecting them with this idea, at their numbers, he suggested that so numerous a body might avail themselves of the absence of the Egyptian troops, and endanger the tranquillity and safety of the country, and that prudence dictated the necessity of obviating the possibility of such an occurrence as was too likely to happen. With this view they were treated like the captives taken in war, and were forced to under- go the gratuitous labor of erecting public granaries and other buildings for the Egyptian monarch (Exod. i, 11). These were principally constructed of crude brick; and that such materials were commonly used in Egypt we have sufficient proof from the walls and other buildings of great size and solidity in various parts of the country, many of which are of a very early period. The bricks themselves, both at Thebes and in the vicinity of Memphis, frequently bear the names of the monarchs who ruled Egypt during and prior to this epoch. The crude brick remains about Memphis are probably pyramids of clay. The Thebes consist of walls enclosing sacred monuments and tombs, and some are made with and others without straw. Many have chopped barley and wheat straw, others bean haulm and stubble (Exod. v, 12). In the tombs we find the process of making them represented in the tombs. But it is not to be sup- posed that all of these bricks are the work of the Pharaohs, who were never occupied at Thebes; and though Josephus affirms they were engaged in building pyra- mids, as well as in making canals and embankments, it is very improbable that the crude brick pyramids of Memphis, or of the Arisinoite nome, were the work of the Hebrew captives (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians). See BONE.

BONE (prop. בון, 'to eat; גוס), the hard parts of animal bodies (Exod. xii, 46). The expression "bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. ii, 29), "of his bone," and "of his bones," may be understood as implying the same nature, and being united in the nearest relation and affection. Inquiries are said to be metaphorically in men's bones when their body is polluted by them (Job xx, 11). The "valley of dry bones" in Ezekiel's vision represents a state of utter hopelessness, apart from repentance and aid (Ezek. xxxvi, 1-14). The Psalmist says, "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth" (Psalm cxii, 7). This appears to be a strongly figurative expression; but that it may be strictly true, the following extract from Bruce demonstrates: "At five o'clock we left Garigana, our journey being still to the eastward, and at a quarter past six in the evening arrived at the site of a village whose inhabitants had all perished with hunger the year before; their wretched bones being all unburied, and scattered upon the surface of the ground where the village formerly stood. We encamped among the bones of the dead; no space could be found free from them. The morning of the Lord is denominated against the King of Moab, "because he burnt the bones of the King of Edom into lime" (Amos ii, 1, or, as the Chaldean paraphrase explains it, "to plaster the walls of his house with it," which was a cruel insult. A piece of barbarity resembling this is mentioned by Sir Paul Rycaut, that the wall of the city of Philadelphia was made by the bones of the besieged by the prince who took it by storm. The passage in Amos vi, 9, 10, Roberts says, "alludes to the custom of burning human bones, and to that of gathering up the half calcined bones, and to the putting them into an earthen vessel, and then to the carrying back these fragments to the house, to the home out-building, where they are kept till conveyed to a sacred place. In India this is done by a son or a near relation; but in case there is not one near akin, then any person who is going to the place (as to the Ganges) can take the fragments of bones, and thus perform the last rites."

Boniface I, elected pope, or rather bishop of Rome, Dec. 29, 418, as successor of Zosimus. Eulalius, elected Dec. 29, 418, is an invention, and was appointed by the Emperor Honorius, but Boniface was finally established in the see, which he held till his death in 422. During his short tenure he used every means to extend the influence of the Roman see. He is commemorated by the Roman Church as a saint on Oct. 25.

II, a Goth, succeeded Felix IV on Oct. 15, 590, though it is said that his rival, Dioscorus, was as well entitled to the see as he. The deacon Vigilius was bishop, in fact, from his great influence. Boniface died Nov. 8, 592. He is the first bishop of Rome whose name does not occur in the Roman Martyrologium.

III, died Dec. 16, 607. Through his influence the Emperor Phocas decreed that the title of "universal bishop" should be given only to the Pope of Rome. In a synod held at Rome, he forbade, under anathema, that a bishop should appoint his own successor. He died Nov. 12, 607.

IV, elected pope in 607 or 608. He obtained of the Emperor Phocas that the Pantheon which Agrippa had built in honor of all the gods should be converted into a Christian church under the invocation of the Virgin, and called Sancta Maria Rotunda. He died in 618.

V, Pope, elected Dec. 14, 618, on the death of Deodatus, and died Oct. 25, 625. He enacted the decree by which the churches became places of refuge for criminals.

VI, Pope, a Roman, elected after the death of Formosus, April 11, 896. He was an abandoned charac-

Boniface, or Bonifacius, archbishop of Mayence, the papal Apostle of Germany. His baptismal name was Winfrid. He was born at Crediton, England, about 680. At thirty years of age he was ordained priest, and in 716 he passed over into Friesland, to assist the aged Wilfrid, then at Utrecht. He returned shortly after to England, but in 718 departed a second time for Hessen and Friesland, taking with him letters of recommendation from Daniel, bishop of Ross (afterward Paderborn), in Westphalia; Wurtzburg, in Franconia; Eichstadt, in the Palatinate of Bavaria; and re-established Jumièges, or Salzburg. In 749 he was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Mayence. Ten years after this he returned to his apostolical labors in Friesland, where he preached, and converted many thousands; but, while he was preparing to give to them the rite of confirmation, he was suddenly attacked by a furious troop of pagans at a place called Dockum, where he perished, together with fifty-two of his companions, June 5, 755. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on June 5. The biographies of Boniface are abundant. The chief of them are Giesebrecht, Bonifacius (Erlangen, 1800); Löffler, Bonifacius, hist. Nachr., v. seinen Leben (Gotha, 1812); Schmerbach, Bonifacius, Apostel der Deutschen (Erfurt, 1827); Seiter (R. C.), Bonifacius, Apostel der Teutschen (Mainz, 1845, 8vo). A graphic and genial popular sketch of him is given by Giesebrecht in his Dark Places and primitive Church (1817). The writings ascribed to Boniface are collected in Opera quae exstant omnia, ed. J. A. Giles, L.L.D. (Lond. 1844, 2 vols. 8vo).—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. ii, vi; Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 46-119; Böhleringer, Kirche Christi, ii, 68; Soames, Lat. Ch. in Angl.-Sum. Boni Homines or Bons-hommes. (I.) Monks established in England by Prince Edmund in 1259. They professed to follow the rule of St. Augustine, after the model of the Câtes of John Lech, of Valenciennes. There is not much satisfactory information respecting them. They are said to have worn a blue dress, and to have had two houses in England: Easery in Buckinghamshire, and Edington in Wiltshire. (11.) In France, the Minims founded by Francis de Paul, who, in addition to the two first vows, added a third, to observe the perpetual Lent, were called Bons-hommes; some say, because Louis XI was accustomed to give the title bon-hommes to the founder. (III.) The Albigenses, Cathari, and Waldenses were at different periods called Boni homines.

Bonner, Edmund, bishop of London, and styled, from his persecuting spirit, "Bloody Bishop Bonner," and the "ecclesiastical Nero of England," was the son of humble parents at Hanley, in Worcestershire, and was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford. He at first favored the Reformed views, and advocated the divorce of the king. Henry VIII made him his chaplain, bishop of Hereford, and then of London, and employed him on embassies to France, Germany, and the pope. But when death had removed the despot whose ungodly doctrine he so carefully seemed to have gained submission even from men of virtue and of ordinary firmness, Bonner's Protestantism ceased; he protested against Cranmer's injunctions and homilies, and scrupled to take the oath of supremacy. For these offences he was committed to the Fleet, from which, however, he was soon after released. From this time Bonner was so negligent in all that related to the Reformation as to draw on himself in two instances the censure of the Privy Council; but as he had committed no offence which subjected him to prosecution, the council, according to the bad practice of those times, required him to do an act extraneous from his ordinary duties, knowing that he would be reluctant to perform it. They made him preach a sermon at St. Paul's Cross on four points. One of these Bonner omitted, and commissioners were appointed to try him, before whom he appeared during seven days. At the end of October, 1550, he was committed to the Marshalsea, and deprived of his bishopric. After the death of Edward VI Bonner was restored by Queen Mary. His first acts were to deprive the married priests in his diocese, and set up the mass in St. Paul's before the queen's ordinance to that effect. It would be tedious to follow him in all the long list of executions for religion which make the history of that reign a mere narrative of blood. Fox enumerates 125 persons burnt in his diocese, and through his agency, during this reign; and a letter from him to Cardinal Pole (dated at Fulham December 26, 1556) is copied by Holinshed, in which Bonner justifies himself for proceeding to the condemnation of twenty-four heretics who had been sent up to him from Colchester. These persons were saved by the influence of Cardinal Pole, who checked Bonner's sanguinary activity. When Queen Elizabeth succeeded to the throne, Bonner was made the single exception to the favorable reception given to the bishops. In May, 1559, he was summoned before the Privy Council, and died in confinement, Sept. 5, 1568. Bonner was a learned man, skilled in the canon law and in scholastic theology, but a man of a severe and cruel nature, and of a base and mean spirit. Maitland endeavors to vindicate his memory from some of the charges which stain it in his Essays on Subjects connected with the Reformation (London, 1840). See Burnet, Hist. of Ref. i, 190; ii, 430; Life and Def. of Bp. Bonner (London, 1682).

Bonnet. There are two Heb. words thus rendered in the authorized version. See also CROWN, HEAD-DRESS.

1. בֵּן (pēr), literally an ornamenl, and so transliterated in Isa. ixi, 10; "beauty" in ver. 8; "goodly" in Exod. xxix, 28; "tire" in Ezek. xxiv, 17, 23) was a simple head-dress, tiara, or turban, worn by females (Isa. iii, 20), priests (Exod. xxix, 28; Ezek. xliv, 18), a bridegroom (Isa. xvi, 10), or generally in gala dress (Isa. vii, 20). It appears to have consisted merely of a piece of clothe tastefully folded about the head. In the case of females it was probably more compact and less bulging than with men. See TURBAN.

2. יִשְׂרָאֵל (migdalith), literally convivexity is spoken only of the sacred cup or turban of the common priests (Exod. xxviii, 40; xxix, 7; xxix, 8; Lev. viii, 13), in distinction from the mitre of the high-priest, for which another term is used. See PARVET.

Bonney, Isaac, a Methodist Episcopal minister of the New England Conference, born in Hardwick, Mass., Sept. 26, 1782; converted 1800; entered the itineracy 1868; superannuated 1850; died 1865. He was a devoted Christian, an eloquent and useful minister, and an able theologian. He was several times elected a member of the General Conference. Minutes of Conferences, vi, 186; Sprague, Amer. Cycl., vii, 452.

Bonosius, bishop of Sardica in the latter half of the fourth century, opposed the worship of the Virgin and other Roman novelties, and was, in consequence, unjustly branded as a heretic. His followers seem to have embraced Arianism. Welsh published a treatise, De Bonoso Harlecio (Gotting. 1716).—Mosheim, Ecc. Hist. cent. iv, pt. ii, ch. v, § 25, note; Lardner, Works, iv, 244.

Bonzos, priests of Buddha or Fo, particularly in Japan. They live together in monasteries under a vow of celibacy, and the system agrees in many respects with that of the Romans. They do penance, and pray for the sins of the laity, who secure them from want by endowments and alms. The female bonzes may be compared to the Christian nun, as the religious orders admit of no priestesses, but allows of the social union of pious virgins and widows, under monastic vows, for the performance of religious exercises.—Buck, Theol. Dictionary, s. v. See BUDDHISM; CHINA; JAPAN.

Book (βιβλίον, e'pher; Gr. βιβλιον, Lat. liber). This Heb. term is more comprehensive than the corresponding English word with us. It signifies properly a writing, either the art (Isa. xxii, 11, 12) or the form (Dan. i, 4); then whatever is written, e.g. a bill of sale (Deut. xxviii, 89), or a book of divorce (Deut. xxiv, 1, 2); hence a letter or epistle (2 Sam. xvi, 14, 2 Kings x, 6, xix, 14, etc.) and finally a volume (Exod. xvii, 14; Lev. xxvii, 58; xxix, 26; 1 Sam. x, 25; Job xix, 23, and often), i. e. a roll (Jer. xxxvi, 2, 4; Ezek. xii, 9), often with reference to the contents (e. g. of the law, Job. i. 8; viii, 84; 2 Kings xxii, 8; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 14; of the covenant, Exod. xxiv, 7; 2 Kings xxiii, 21; of the kings, 2 Chron. xvi, 11; xxiv, 27; of annals, or of an individual reign or personal history), especially and by way of eminence of the sacred Word or Law (q. v.).

Books are mentioned as known so early as the time of the patriarch Job (xix, 28). They were written on skins, or linen, or cotton cloth, or the Egyptian papyrus; the latter is commonly supposed to be the oldest material for writing on, whence our word papyrus is derived. Tablets of wood, of lead, and of brass were also employed, the latter of which were considered the most durable. See Writing.

If the book was large, it was, of course, formed of a number of skins, etc., connected together. The leaves were generally written in small columns, called סֵלָה, selah, or סָלָה, selah (Jer. xxxvi, 28), and were rarely written over on both sides (Ezek. ii, 10), except when the inside would not contain all the writing.

Books, among the Hebrews, being usually written on very flexible materials, were rolled round a stick or cylinder; and if they were very long, round two cylinders from the two extremities. The reader therefore unrolled the book to the place which he wanted (see fig. 1), and rolled it up again when he had read it (Luke iv, 17-20), whence the name שביל, shivil, (Isa. xxxiv, 4). The leaves thus rolled round the stick, and bound with a string, could be easily sealed (Isa. xxix, 11; Dan. xii, 4). Those books which were inscribed on tablets (see fig. 2) were sometimes connected together by rings at the back, through which a red was passed to carry them by.

At first the letters in books were only divided into lines, then into separate words, which by degrees were marked with accents, and distributed by points and stops into periods and paragraphs. Among the Orientals the letter was written from the right to the left, with the left hand; with the Northern and Western nations, from the left to the right hand; but the Greeks sometimes followed both directions alternately, going in the one and returning in the other, which they termed βουστροφόδοκος, because it was after the manner of oxen turning when at plough; an example of this occurs in the Sibylline and some of the Etruscan inscriptions. In Chinese books the lines run from top to bottom. See Bible.

The Orientals took great pleasure in giving figurative or enigmatical titles to their books. The titles prefixed to the 50th, 60th, and 80th Psalms appear to be of this description; nor can there be a doubt that David's eulogy upon Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. i, 18) is called the bow in conformity with this peculiar taste. See Psalms.

In times of war, devastation, and rapine, it was necessary to bury in the earth whatever was thought desirable to preserve. With this view Jeremiah ordered the writings which he delivered to Baruch to be put into an earthen vessel (Jer. xxxii, 14). In the same manner the ancient Egyptians made use of earthen pots of a proper shape, hermetically sealed, for containing whatever they wanted to bury in the earth, and which, without such care, would have been soon destroyed. From the paintings on the monuments, it would appear that the Egyptian scribes wrote on tablets composed of some hard material (perhaps wood), though it cannot be precisely determined what it was.

The remark of the wise man in Eccl. xli, 12, on the subject of making books, is supposed to amount to this: That the propriety of some men to write books, and of others to collect and amass them for libraries, is insatiable; that it is a business to which there is no end. Innumerable treaties have been written on all kinds of subjects, and no one subject is yet exhausted; the designation of one leading to that of another, and that again of another, and so on interminably; and that the much study connected with this endless labours and weariness of the flesh may render its votary a fit subject of the admonition, that the conclusion of the whole matter, or the great end of life, is to fear God and keep his commandments. (See Clarke, Comment. in loc.)

A sealed book (Isa. xxix, 11; Rev. v, 1-3) is a book whose contents are secret, and have for a very long time been so, and are not to be published till the seal is removed. A book or roll written within and without, i.e. on the back side (Rev. v, 1), may be a book containing a long series of events, it not being the custom of the ancients to write on the back side of the roll, unless when the inside would not contain the whole of the writing (comp. Horace, Ep. i, 20, 3). To eat a book signifies to consider it carefully and digest it well in the mind (Jer. xv, 16; Ezek. xi, 8-10; iii, 1-3, 14; Rev. x, 9). A similar metaphor is used by Christ in John vi, where he repeatedly proposes himself as "the Bread of life" to be eaten by his people.

Book of the Generation signifies the genealogical history or records of a family or nation (Gen. v, 1; Matt. i, 1). See Genealogy; History; Chronicle.

Book of Judgment. The allusion here (Dan. vii, 10) is probably either to the practice of opening books of account to settle with servants or laborers, or to a custom of the Persians, among whom it was a constant practice every day to write down the special services rendered to the king, and the rewards given to those who had performed them. Of this we see an instance in the history of Ahasuerus and Mordecai (Esth. vi, 1-5). It also appears to be an allusion to the methods of human courts of justice (Rev. xx, 12), referring to the proceeding which will take place at the day of God's final judgment.

BOOK OF THE WARS OF THE LORD. This appears to have been an ancient document known to the Hebrews in the time of Moses, which he used in the compilation of some parts of the Pentateuch. The inspired author of the Pentateuch is in no wise affected by this idea; he does not himself write in Moses' name, but uses the documents as of such a nature that they could have been derived only from immediate revelation; and the whole, being compiled by an inspired writer, have received the sanction of the Holy Spirit in an equal degree with his original productions. See Moses; also the Name of the five books of Moses. Similar ancient and also later documents, by unknown writers, were used in the compilation of other parts of the sacred volume, such as the book of Jasher (Josh. x, 13; 2 Sam. i, 18) and the books of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel and of Judah (1 Kings xiv, 19, 29).

See Jasher; Enoch; Chronicles.

BCHASE TO THE SEA. In Phil. iv, 8, Paul speaks of Clement and other of his fellow-laborers, "whose names are written in the book of life." On this Heinrichs (Annalat, in Ep. Philipp.) observes that, as the future life is represented under the image of a ποιμαντιον (citizenship, community, political society) just before (iii, 20), it is in agreement with this to suppose (as usual) a catalogue of the citizens' names, both natural and adopted (Luke x, 20; Rev. xx, 15; xxi, 27), and from which the unworthy are excluded (Rev. iii, 5).

See Citizenship. Thus the names of the good are often represented as registered in heaven (Matt. iii, 5). But this by no means implies a certainty of salvation (nor, as Doddridge remarks, does it appear that Paul in this passage had any particular revelation), but only that at that time the persons were on the list, from which (as in Rev. iii, 5) the names of unworthy members might be erased. This explanation is sufficient and satisfactory for the other important passage in Rev. xiii, 4. It is God who "translated" that lamb which "overcometh" that he will not blot his name out of the book of life. Here, however, the illustration has been sought rather in military than in civil life, and the passage has been supposed to contain an allusion to the custom according to which the names of those who were cashiered for misconduct were stricken from the roll.

When God threatened to destroy the Israelites altogether, and make of Moses a great nation, the legislator implored forgiveness for them, and added, "If not, blot me, I pray thee, out of the book which thou hast written" (Exod. xxxii, 94). By this he meant nothing so foolish or absurd as to offer to forfeit eternal life in the world to come, but only that he, and not they, should be cut off from the world, and brought to an untimely end. This has been regarded as an allusion to the records kept in the courts of justice, where the deeds of criminals are registered, and hence would signify no manner of promise or reference to future events; so that to be cut off by an untimely death is to be blotted out of this book.—Kitto, s. v.

BOOK OF THE CANONS (βιβλιον κανώνων, Codex Canonum), a collection of the various canons enacted in the councils of Nicea, Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Laodicea, Gangra, Antioch, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, which were ratified and confirmed in a council of seventy-eight canons. Its date is uncertain, but it was probably never universally authoritative. It was published by Justellus in 1610 (Codex Canonum Eccles. Univ. Paris, 8vo), with a Latin version and notes. For a fuller account, see Canons, ii.

BOOZE, WILLIAM JONES, D.D., bishop of the American Mission of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Shanghai, China. He was born in South Carolina, July 1, 1811; graduated at the university of that state, and then studied law under chancellor De Saussure. After taking his degree, he entered the Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Alstead, Va., and after completing his theological course and after studying medicine, to prepare himself more fully for the mission field. He then offered himself to the Foreign Committee for the work in China. He was appointed January 17, 1837, and sailed from Boston in July. Under his incessant toil in the study of the language, literature, and art of the Chinese, his health failed, and in 1844 he returned to China. He left Macao for Amoy in February, 1842, and settled with his family on the island of Kulangsu; and in August, 1842, his wife died, and was buried on that island. He returned to this country, and was consecrated missionary bishop to China in October, 1844. In December, 1844, he sailed for Canton. In 1846 the city of Shanghai was selected as the seat of the mission. In 1846 the bishop began the translation of the Prayer-book, and engaged in a revision of the N.T.; and in 1847 was chosen one of the committees of delegates from the several missions to review the translation of the Bible. It was in this work, and in the discours de la Grace ow out of the great and extraordinary ability as a scholar was displayed; so eminent, indeed, as to challenge the admiration of those most competent to judge in such matters. He returned to the United States in 1853, and again in 1857, where he remained, prostrated in health, until 1859. He sailed from New York July 13, 1859, and died at Shanghai on the 17th of July, 1864,—Church Review, 1865; Stevens, Memorial Sermon on Bishop Boone, Phila., 1865.

BOOS, MARTIN, an evangelical divine in the Church of Rome, who was the instrument of a religious awakening in Germany similar to those of Whitfield and Wesley in England and America, was born at Ittenried, Bavaria, Dec. 23, 1722, and educated for the service of the Church at the University of Dillingen, where Sailer had already introduced an evangelical movement. He imbibed the doctrine of justification by faith, and found peace in believing. His first charge was Grünbach, in the province of Kempten, and there he began to preach. "His voice was like the voice of a lion and in us." The impression produced by the simple exhibition of this Gospel truth was as life from the dead. Those who had been agitated by doubts had their difficulties dispelled; those who had been harassed by fear attained peace in believing. The excitement spread like an epidemic; many gross sinners suddenly found themselves included in the love of Christ and the happiness of his service. The Romish authorities regarded Boos as a fool or a fanatic, and deprived him of his pastoral charge. The day on which he was thrust out of his parsonage he remained a long time on the highway, uncertain what to do or whither to go; and at length spying an unoccupied lodge on the roadside, he entered it, and, throwing himself down on the floor, prayed earnestly for light and guidance from heaven. The calamities circulated against his character and ministry having been proved groundless, he was recalled from his retirement, and appointed to the curacy of Wiggensheim, sitting adjoining his former lodge. As his faith became stronger, his zeal in preaching the Gospel increased, and produced a great and extensive religious awakening. A discourse which he preached on New Year's day, 1797, on repentance, was accompanied with such penetration and energy that "forty persons, whose consciences were alarmed, were seized and roused, fasting away in a great and multipli". While many revered the preacher as a man of God, the opposition of others was violently roused. This latter party secretly influenced the vicar, who was himself disposed to be the friend of the pious curate, but whose kindly intentions were overborne. The simple converts, in admiration of Boos, spread so widely the story of his character and doctrines that the clergy joined in clamors against him as a heretic.
From that moment persecution raged, and Boos was obliged to leave Wigenenbach. In a friend's house he obtained shelter; but his retreat having been discovered, he was surprised one day by the sudden appearance of an agent from the Inquisition at Augsburg, who, after rifing his writing-desk, carried away all his sermons and letters. On the 10th of Feb. 1577, he appeared before the Inquisition, where he refuted all the calumnies cast against him, and with such success that he was sentenced to a year's confinement in the clerical house of correction; but the keeper of that prison, like the Philippinan jailer, was, with his whole family, converted by the pious conversation of Boos. Released from prison at the end of eight months, Boos, after passing through many vicissitudes, obtained permission to enter into the diocese of Lintz in Upper Austria, where the bishop, Joseph A. Gall, welcomed him, and gave him the populous parish of Peyerbach, where for five years “he ceased not to warn every man day and night.” In 1606 he removed to the still more populous parish of Gallneukirchen, where, howev'ever, he found that his labors were still but very visible fruits of his ministry appearing. Surprised and pained by the deadness of the people, he gave himself to earnest prayer for the influences of the Spirit. His own fervor was kindled, and he dwelt more prominently on the justifying righteousness of Christ. One sermon preached in Gallneukirchen produced an excitement more extraordinary than ever.
In that discourse having declared that there were few real Christians in the parish, some, who were offended by the statement, accused him at the tribunal of Councillor Bergten (1810). That magistrate, having, in the conference of private conversation with Boos, been brought to know something of the truth of the official protection over the pious preacher; and, although he died shortly after, another came to the aid of Boos in the person of professor Sailer (1811). But the excitement in the parish was not allayed till Boos preached a sermon on Trinity Sunday from Matt. xxviii, 18–20, in which he brought out such views of the reality and power of religion that multitudes came to eagerly asking what they must do to be saved. Persecution again followed. He was, in 1815, confined in a convent; and, although his parishioners petitioned the emperor for his release, it was secretly determined that he should leave the Austrian dominions. After some time of wandering he was permitted to return to his native Bavaria, prematurely gray with care and hardships. After residing for some time as tutor in a family of rank near Munich, he was appointed by the Prussian government professor at Dusseldorf, which, however, he soon resigned for the vicarage of Sayn, to which he was elected by the magistrates of Coblenz.
Boos was engaged in the same work, and brought to it the same lion-like spirit as Luther, though he remaind in the Church of Rome until his death, Aug.
29, 1825. See Jameson, Religious Biography, p. 60; Gossner, Life and Persecution of Martin Boos (Boos, 1836, 12mo).

Booth (םוקָה, suk'kah), often rendered "tabernacle" or "pavilion"; a hut made of branches of trees, and thus distinguished from a tent properly so called. Such were the booths in which Jacob sojourned for a while on his return to the borders of Canaan, whence the children of Israel spent the Sanhedrin (Gen. xiv. 17); and such were the temporary green sheds in which the Israelites were directed to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. xxiii, 42, 48). See Succoth; Tabernacles, Feast of. As this observance was to commemorate the abode of the Israelites in the wilderness, it has been rather unwisely concluded by some that they there lived in such booths. But it is evident from the narrative that, during their wanderings, they dwelt in tents; and, indeed, where, in that treeless region, could they have found branches with which to construct their booths? Such structures are only available in the well-wooded regions; and it is obvious that the direction to celebrate the feast in booths, rather than in tents, was given because, when the Israelites became a settled people in Palestine and ceased to have a general use of tents, it was easier for them to erect a temporary shed of green branches than to provide a tent for the occasion.—Kitto. See COTTAGE.

Booth, or booth, an eminent Baptist minister, born at Blackwell, Derbyshire, 1734. His parents were poor, and he had no early opportunities of education.
He became a Baptist when quite young, and in early manhood was received as a preacher among the General (Arminian) Baptists. He afterward imbued Calvinistic views, and took charge of a congregation of Particular Baptists in London 1769, in which charge he continued till his death in 1806. The most important of his miscellaneous writings are his Reign of Grace and Essay on the Kingdom of Christ, both to be found in his collected works (London, 1818, 3 vols.
8vo). In the Baptist controversy he wrote Probab-tion Examined (London, 1782), and An Amniss (1782):
—An Apology for the Baptists, collected into 3 vols.
8vo (1828). Booth is regarded by the Baptists as one of their most able and important writers.

Boothroyd, Benjamin, L.L.D., a learned English Dissenting minister, born in 1728. He was a minister and bookseller at Pontefract from 1754 to 1818, when he was called to Highfield Chapel at Huddersfield, which he served till his death in 1824. He was a respectable Hebrew scholar, and in his commentary happily blended critical decision with practical interpretation. His publications are: 1. A New Family Bible and Improved Version, from corrected texts of the original, with notes critical and explanatory (Pon-tefract, 1809, 2 vols. 4to); 2. Biblical Observations on Hebrew Scriptures of the O. T., without points, after the text of Kennicott, with the chief various readings, and accompanied with English notes, critical, philological, and explanatory, etc. (Pontefract, 1810–16, 2 vols. 4to).

BooTy (בּוּט, bo, Jer. xlix, 32, elsewhere usually "prey"); מלקוּבָּך, malko·eb; Num. xxxi, 32, elsewhere usually "prey"; מֶשֶׁבָּך, Mesheshach; Hab. ii, 6; Zeph. i, 13, elsewhere "spoil"). This consisted of captives of every sex, slaves, cattle, and whatever a captor city might contain, especially men, women and braccials, Mos. Recht, iii, 235 sq.). Within the limits of Canaan no captives were to be made (Deut. xx, 14 and 16); beyond those limits, in case of warlike resistance, all the women and children were to be made captives, and the men put to death. A special charge was given to destroy the pictures and images of the Canaanites, as tending to idolatry (Num. xxxix, 29).
The case of Amalek was a special one, in which Saul was bidden to destroy the cattle. So also was that of the expedition against Arad, in which the people took a vow to destroy the cities, and that of Jericho, on which the four years' siege seems to have lasted, and the gold and silver, etc., of which were viewed as being reserved wholly for Him (1 Sam. xvi, 2, 3; Num. xxii, 2; Josh. vi, 19). See ACCURSED. The law of booty was that it should be divided equally between the army who won it and the people of Israel, but of the former half one head in every 500 was reserved to God, and appropriated to the Levites (Num. xxxi, 45, 52); and what was similarly reserved and appropriated to the Levites (Num. xxxi, 26–47). As regarded the army, David added a regulation that the baggage-guard should share equally with the troops engaged. The present made by David out of his booty to the elders of towns in Judah was an act of grateful courtesy merely, though perhaps suggested by the law, Num. i, c.
the spoils devoted by him to provide for the Temple must be regarded as a free-will offering (1 Sam. xxx, 24-26; 2 Sam. vii, 11; 1 Chron. xxvi, 27). These doubts are the best of the booties [see AKRÖTHI-MION] (of which John died Dec. 20, 1552). While still quite young, she was placed in the convent of Nimpach, where she became deeply interested in the writings of Luther. She asked the aid of Luther in liberating her-selves and eight of her friends from the convent, and at the request of Luther, Leonhard Kopp aided their escape in the night of April 4, 1526. Luther wrote to the parents of the nuns to take them back, and, when this was refused, he provided for them otherwise.
Catharina found a home with the burgomaster of Reichenbach, and on June 13, 1526, she married Luther. The writings of Luther are a conclusive proof that the marriage was a very happy one. After the death of Luther, Catharina received support from the elector John Frederick of Saxony and Christian III, king of Denmark. See Walch, Geschichte der Cath.

rale, v. 673.

Borbortes or Borborianians (Borborita and Borborianus, so called from ἄγαλλος, I. q. dort-cater), a sect of the Gnostics of the second century, said to be followers of the Nicolaianists. They held to Dualism and Antinomianism, and denied the last judgment and the resurrection. Epiphanius charges them with the vilest crimes.—Epiphanius, Hieroz. p. 25, 26; Landon,

Bordeas-Dumoulin, Jean-Baptiste, a French philosopher, and stanch advocate of the rights and liberties of the Gallican Church, was born, Feb. 17, 1779, at Laon, Oise, and died 1789. He endeavoured to reconcile all the political and social consequences of the French Revolution with the religious traditions of Gallicanism. His principal works are:
1. Lettre sur l'électionce et le dogmatisme (Paris, 1833);—2. Le Caricatisme, ou la Véritable rénovation des sciences (Paris, 1843; 2 vols.), a prize essay, which was declared by the French Academy of Moral and Political Sciences one of the most remarkable phisophical writings of the age;—3. Mélanges philosophiques et religieux (Paris, 1845), containing also an Éloge de Pascual, to which a prize had been awarded (in 1812) by the French Academy:
—4. Essai de réforme catholique (Paris, 1850), in which he severely attacks the condition of the Roman Church in the nineteenth century,—5. Huet, Hist. de la Vie et des Oeuvres de D.-D.
(Paris, 1860).

Bordeaux, the see of a Roman archbishop in France. The establishement of an episcopal see reaches probably as far back as the year 900; later, the bishopric was changed into an archbis-phric. In 1441 the city received a university. Four councils (Concilia Burgidigalaena) have been held at Bordeaux: in 884, against the Priscillanists; in 670, for the restoration of peace and for the improvement of Church discipline; in 1086, against Berenger; and the last in 1255.

Border is generally the rendering of some form of the Heb. בַּבָּר, gebul, Gr. πρόσκοπος, a boundary-line, es-specially in the plural; also of several other Heb. words in a similar sense; but in Exod. xxv. 25, 27; xxxvi.
12, 14, it represents גַּלְגַל, miqye'oth, a marina, e. g. ornaments on the breast stands or pedestals of the lavers, apparently square shields decorated with sculptures on the sides, 1 Kings vii., 28-36; 2 Kings xvi.
17; and in Num. xv. 38, it stands for גַּלְגַל, kósmáki, a wing, i. e. hem or fringe of a garment, like σπαραξίων in Matt. xxiii. 5; while in Cant. i. 11, it is רָּח֣ם, a row or string of pearls or golden beads for the headdress.

Boreeli's Manuscript (Códex Boreeli), an important uncial MS. of the N. T., containing (with many fashions) the Gospels, of which it is generally designated as Cod. F. It derives its name from having once belonged to John Boreel, Dutch ambassador to the court of king James I. Soon after Boreel's death in 1629, some man of learning, whose name is unknown, made extracts from this MS. as far as Luke x; this collation was communicated to Weusten by Isaac Verburger in 1720, and Weusten used it in his Critical Apparatus, but could not discover where the MS. was at that time. In 1880 it was discovered at Arnhem, and Prof. Herings speedily made a careful collation of its text, which appeared in 1843, after his death, with a description and fac-simile, under the editor-torial care of Vinke (Disputatio de Codice Boreelio).
Some of the sheets, however, appear in the meanwhile to have been lost. It is now in the University library at Utrecht. It consists of 204 leaves and a few fragments, written in two columns of about nine-ten lines to a page, in a tall, oblong form, with large, upright, compressed character. It has the usual indications of the Ammonian sections in the margin, but without the Eusebian canons. The breathings and accents are fully and not incorrectly given. In Luke there are no less than twenty-four gaps; in Weusten's collation it began with Matt. vii, 5, but now with Matt.
ix, 1: other hiatuses are Matt. xii, 1-44; xiii, 55-69;
xx, 29-37; xxi, 40; Mark i, 5, 22; ii, 24-ll; Mark iii, 5; iv, 6-26; xiv, 54-59, 5; xv, 39-xvi, 19; John iii, 5-14; iv, 23-38; v, 18-38; vi, 39-63; vii, 28-58; 10, x, 32-xi, 3; xi, 40-xii, 3; xii, 14-25: it ends at John xiii, 34. It is supposed to belong to the ninth or tenth century.—Tregelles, in Horne's Intro. iv, 200; Scrivener, Introductions, p. 104 sq. See Man-scripts, Biblical.

Borgia, Caesar, was "one of the greatest monsters of a time of depravity, when the court of Rome was the scene of all the worst forms of crime. He was the son of Alexander VI and Catharine Va nierz, who made him archbishop of Valencia at an early age, and afterward cardinal in 1489. He un acceptably used his position to gain favors for himself and to control things as means to the most iniquitous ends. His father hav ing conferred upon his brother Giovanni the duchy of Benevento, with the counties of Terracina and Ponte corvo, Caesar, as was believed, moved with envy, caused his brother to be assassinated. He obtained the papal crown for himself by hounding his brother first and then, according to one story, he succeeded by his father to resign the purple and to devote him self to the profession of arms. He was sent in 1498 to France, to convey to Louis XI a bull of divorce and dispensation from his marriage with Anne of Brittany. Louis rewarded him for the pope's compliance with the duchy of Valentinois, a body-guard of 100 men, 20,000 livres of yearly revenue, and a promise of support in his schemes of ambition. In 1499 Caesar mar ried a daughter of the king of Navarre, and accompa nied Louis XII to Italy, where he undertook the conquest of the Romagna for the Holy See. The right ful lords of that country, who fell into his hands, were murdered, notwithstanding that their lives had been guar anteed by his oath. In 1501 he was named by his father duke of Romagna. In the same year he wrest ed the principality of Plombino from Jacopo d'Appia no, but failed in an attempt to acquire Bologna and Florence. He took Camerino, and caused Giulio di Varano, the lord of that town, to be strangled along with his two sons. By treachery as much as by vio lence he made himself master of the duchy of Urbino. A league of Italian princes was formed to resist him, but he kept them in awe by a body of Swiss troops, till he succeeded in winning some of them over by ad vantageous offers, employed them against the others, and then treacherously murdered them on the day of the victory, 31st December, 1502, at Sinigaglia. He now seized their possessions, and saw no obstacle in the way of his being made king of Romagna, of the March, and of Umbria, when, on August 17th, 1503, his father died, probably of poison which he had prepared. His Caesars, who was a party to the design (and who, like his father, had long been familiar with that mode of dispatching those who stood in the way of his ambition, or whose wealth he desired to obtain), had himself partaken of the poison, and the consequence was a severe illness, exactly at a time when the utmost activity and energy might have been needed for his affairs. Enemies rose against him on all hands, and one of the most seditious of them ascended the papal throne as Julius II. Caesar was arrested and conveyed to the castle of Medina del Campo, in Spain, where he lay imprisoned for two years. At length he contrived to make his escape to the king of Navarre, whom he accompanied in the war against Castile, and was killed on the 12th of March, 1507, by a missile from the castle of Biano. With all his baseness and cruelty, he loved and patronized learning, and possessed a ready and persuasive elo quence. Machiaveli has delineated his character in his "Principi." —Chambers, Cyclopædia, s. v.; Hoefer, Biog. Générale, vi, 711; Ranke, History of the Popes.

Borgian Manuscript (Codex Borgianus), a valuable uncial fragment of some thirteen leaves of the Greek Gospels (of which it is usually designated as Cod. T), with a Thebais or Sahidic version on the op posite (left) page. It derives its name from having belonged to the Velitum Museum of "Presul Steph.

Borgia, collegi urbani de propaganda sive a secretis," and is now deposited in the library of the Propaganda at Rome. Each page consists of two columns; a sin gle point indicates a break in the sense, but there are no other divisions. The breathings, both rough and smooth, are present. It contains the following pas gages: Luke xxii, 20–xxiii, 20; John vi, 28–67; vii,

6–8; viii, 1–11 (which latter, with John vii, 53–63, is wanting). The portion belonging to John, both in Greek and Egyptian, was carefully edited at Rome in 1789 by Giorgi, an Augustinian eremite, with a fasc simile. Birch had previously collated the Greek text.

The Greek fragment of Luke was first collated for the 4th ed. of Alford's Commentary by his brother, in ac cordance with a supposition by Tregelles, from a hint by Zoega (Catal. codi. cop. qui in Museo Borgiano Velirivas adinsertum, Rom. 1810, p. 184). A few leaves in Greek and Thebaic, which once belonged to Wolde, and were printed with his other Thebaic fragments (in Ford's Appendice al Codex Alexandrinus, Oxford, 1779), ev idently once formed part of the Codex Borgianus (Tienschendorf, New Test. ed. 1859, p. cxlvii). They con tain 85 additional verses: Luke xii, 15–xiii, 22; John vii, 88–92. The Borgian MS. has been referred to the fourth or fifth century. It appears that the ignorant monk who brought it from Egypt to Europe carelessly lost the greater part of it, so that what is left is but a sample. —Wycliffe, in "Bible of Hebreum." —Scrivener, Introduction, p. 116. Bor-Hass'sirah (Heb. Bor hass-Sirah), מִישָׁרִים, a place in the southern part of Palestine, where Joab's messengers found Abner (2 Sam. iii, 26, where our version renders "well of Sirah"), probably the same as Beera (Biryon) of Judges xiv, 14, and Am. vii, 1, 50; twenty stadia from Hebron. Bo'rich (Lat. Bo'rick, for the Gr. text is not extant) is given (2 [Vulg. 4] Exod. i, 2) as the son of Ahabel, and father of Oziad, in the genealogy of Ezra; evidently a corruption of Buki (q. v.), as in Ezra vii, 4.

Borre or Borrius, Adrian van den, a distin guished Remonstrant. On the death of Arminius (q. v.), he and many others gave him up, and were among the followers of that great man. He was one of the six Remonstrants ministers who took part in the conference at the Hague, 1611; he also assisted at the Delft Conference, 1613. When subscription to the decrees of the Synod of Dort was enforced, he gave up all his worldly interests, for conscience' sake, and joined Episcopists and others at Antwerp, where he was one of the directors of the affairs of the Remonstrants. He wrote the Expiation delicius cap. IX ad Rom., con tained in pt. ii of Acta et Scripta Ministeriorum Remon

Borrelia, a Dutch sect, named from their leader, Adam Borrell, and spread in Zeeland in the years 1660, 1662, 1665, and 1667. They lived an austere life, and laid great stress upon abstaining malmgiving; they also decreed all the outward forms of the Church, denied the efficacy of the sacraments, and maintained that the Bible should be read without any commentary whatever. They taught that private worship is more important than public. Borrel wrote a treatise, Ad Lepem et testimoniam, main taining that the written Word of God, without human exposition, is the only means and the adequate means of awakening faith in the heart of man. See Arnold, Kirchen- u. Ketzehistorie, pt. iii, ch. vi.

abandoned himself to a life of extreme irregularity and viciousness, which he cloaked under the appearance of extreme seriousness and devotion. He pretended even that he was inspired by God to effect a reformation among men; declaring it to be the will of God that there should be but one fold on earth, under the pope, and that all who refused to enter it should be put to death. He included the most brilliant beggars, miles, declaring the Virgin to be the daughter of the Father, as Christ is his Son, and in all things equal to the Son; that the Holy Spirit is incarnate in her, etc. The Inquisition took proceedings against him, and sentenced him to be burned January 8, 1601; but he escaped to Strasbourg, and afterward to Amsterdam and Brussels, where he inspired himself with Queen Christina of Sweden, who spent large sums under his dictation in the search for the philosopher’s stone. Thence he went to Copenhagen, where Frederick III patronized him. On the death of that prince he determined to go to Turkey, but was arrested on the way at Goldingen, in Moravia, and handed over to the pontifical government, on condition that his punishment should not be capital. The Inquisition kept him in prison till the day of his death, Aug. 10, 1605.—Beg. Univ. tom. v, p. 128; Hoefer, Biog. Generale, v, 756.

Borromeo, Carlo, cardinal of the Roman Church and Archbishop of Milan, was born of noble parents at the castle of Arona, on the banks of the Lago Maggiore, Oct. 2, 1538. His family was one of the most ancient in Italy, tracing its origin to the family of Anicius in ancient Rome. His mother was a sister of Fies IV. He studied at Milan and at Pavia, and at both was distinguished for personal virtue and for diligence in study. His youth was devoted, not to the ordinary pleasures of that age, but to religion and charitable exercises; and the great wealth at his command did not in the least affect his moral or religious character injuriously. Fies IV, his uncle, adopted him as a son, and made him archbishop of Milan in 1560. But, on the death of his brother Frederick, his relations, and even the pope himself, besought him to marry in order to preserve the line of the family, which seemed in danger of extinction. His mind, however, was made up; and, to escape farther importunity, he was pressed to marry in 1566, and at last devoted himself to the reform of abuses in his diocese. The Council of Trent (Sess. xxiv, de ref. 7) having recommended the preparation of an authoritative Catechism, Fies intrusted the work to his nephew, who, associating with himself three eminent ecclesiastics, completed in 1566 the celebrated Catechismus Tridinitatis, Catechismus Summis et Pius IX. See Catechismus; Credos. To carry out his plans of reform, he gave up every other benefit, abandoned his patronal property, and divided his diocesan revenues into three portions: one for the poor, another for the Church, and the third for himself, of the use of which he gave a rigid account to his synod. In his palace he made a like reformation. In the enforcement of discipline, he held, at different periods, six provincial councils and eleven diocesan synods; and, to see that the regulations of these councils were enforced, he regularly visited in person the churches of his vast province. These plebeian excited powerful resistance. The Humilitatis, (q. v.) indeed, a couple of the order named Farina, to attempt the life of Borromeo. The assassin fired at the archbishop as he was at prayers before the altar, but the bullet only grazed the skin. The assassin and his two accomplices were put to death, and the order of the Humilitatis was suppressed by Fies V. The cloister at Milan, 1576, threw him self into the danger, giving service in every form to the bodies and souls of the dying, at the peril of his life. He died Nov. 8, 1584. On the whole, his life is singularly remarkable for purity in the midst of a corrupt and degraded Church. His talents, property, and life were entirely consecrated to the service of Christ- ianity through the Church, whose interests were always to him more sacred than any earthly considerations. In 1610 he was canonized by Paul V. His works were published at Milan in 1747 by Jos. Ant. Saxius, containing his Instructions to Confessors, his Sermon, and the Acta Ecclesiae Mediolanensis (3 vols. fol.). The latter work was originally printed at Augsburg in 1599 (2 vols. fol.). In 1758 there was published at Augsburg, in two vols. fol., an edition of the Homilies, Discourses, and Sermons, together with the Noctes Vaticanæ, notes by Saxius, and a Life, translated into Latin from the Italian of Giussano. His life has been several times written: see Godau, Vie de C. Borromee (Paris, 1716, 3 vols. 12mo); Sailer, Der heil. Karl Borromee (Augsburg, 1823); Giussano, Leben des heil. Karl Borromee (Augsburg, 1836, 3 vols.); Dieringer, Der heilige Karl Borromee (Cologne, 1846).—Biog. Univ. v, 187; Butler, Lives of Saints, x, 306; Landon, Encyc. Dictionary, a. v.

In Germany an Association of St. Borromeo was founded in 1846 for promoting the circulation of Roman Catholic books. It counted, in 1857, 697 branch associations, and its receipts amounted to 51,000 thalers.

Borromeo, Federico, cousin of Cardinal Borromeo, was born at Milan in 1544. He was educated at Bolzano and at Pavia, and afterward went to Rome, where he was made a cardinal in 1587. He was both a classical and Oriental scholar, and was intimately at Rome with Baronio, Bellarmine, and the pious philanthropist Filippo Neri. In 1595 he was made archbishop of Milan, where he adopted the views of his cousin and predecessor St. Charles, and enforced his regulations concerning discipline with great success. He used to visit by turns all the districts, however remote and obscure, in his diocese, and his zealous labors have been recently eloquently eulogized by Manzoni in his 'Prometeo Spot.' He was the founder of the Ambrosian Library, on which he spent very large sums; and he employed various learned men, who went about several parts of Europe and the East for the purpose of collecting manuscripts. About 9000 manuscripts were thus collected. Cardinal Borromeo established a printing-press, annexed to the library, and appointed several learned professors to examine and make known to the world these literary treasures. He also established several academies, schools, and charitable foundations. His philanthropy, charity, and energy of mind were exhibited especially on the occasion of the famine which afflicted Milan in 1627-28, and also during the great plague of 1630. He died September 22, 1631.—English Cyclopædia, a. v.

Borrowing. On the general subject, as a matter of law or precept, see Loan.

In Exod. xii, 35, we are told that the Israelites, when on the point of their departure from Egypt, "borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment;" and it is added that "the Lord gave the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they let them go with such things as they had. And they spoiled the Egyptians." This was in pursuance of a divine command which had been given to them through Moses (Exod. iii, 22; xii, 2). This has suggested a difficulty, seeing that the Israelites had certainly no intention to return to Egypt, or to restore their creditors the value of the things which they thus obtained from the Egyptian "neighbors." (See Justi, Ueber den Gegenstand der Anweisung von den Israeliten bei ihrer Abreise abgeforderten Geräte, Frfr. a. M. 1777; Danville Rev. Sept. 1864; Enq. Rept. [Gettysburg] Jan. 1865.) It is admitted that the general acceptance of the word here (but not usually elsewhere) rendered borrow (נָאָב, shakal), to request or demand; although there are places (Exod. xxii. 14; 1 Sam. 1, 28; 2 Kings vi, 5) where borrowing is certainly denoted by it. Some therefore allege that the Israelites did not borrow the valuables, but demanded them of their Egyptian neighbors, as an indemnity for their services, and for the hard and bitter bondage which they had endured. But this does not appear to us in the least matter much; for the Israelites had been public servants, rendering certain onerous services to the state, but not in personal bondage to individual Egyptians, whom nevertheless they, according to this account, mulcted of much valuable property in compensation for wrongs committed by the state. These individual Egyptians also were selected not with a view to their being injured, but for others in the wrong treatment of the Israelites: they were those who happened to be their "neighbors," and, as such, open more than others to the exaction. Hence we incline to the interpretation (Clarke, Comment. on Exod. iii, 22) that the Israelites simply repeated the valuables of the Egyptians, without any special (except a tacit) understanding on the part of the latter that they were to be restored. This agrees with the fact that the professed object of the Hebrews was not to quit Egypt forever, but merely to withdraw for a few days into the desert, that they might there celebrate to the Lord their God, and keep solemnities, such as those among all nations to appear in their gayest attire, and decked with many ornaments; and this suggests the grounds on which the Israelites might rest the application to their Egyptian neighbors for the loan of their jewels and rich raiment. Their avowed intention to return in a few days must have made the request appear very reasonable to the Egyptians; and, in fact, the Oriental are, and always have been, remarkably ready and liberal in lending their ornaments to one another on occasions of religious solemnity or public ceremony. It would seem, also, as if the avowed intention to return precluded the Hebrews from any other ground than that of borrowing; for if they had required or demanded these things as compensations or gifts, it would have amounted to an admission that they were quitting the country altogether. Turn which way we will in this matter, there is but a choice of difficulties; and this leads us to suspect that the previous statements of the narrative bearing on the case, in the absence of which we spend our strength for naught in laboring to explain it. One of the difficulties is somewhat softened by the conjecture of Professor Bush, who, in his Note on Exod. xi, 2, observes, "We are by no means satisfied that Moses was required to command the people to practice the device suggested. We regard it so far as they were concerned, as the mere prediction of a fact that should occur." It will further relieve the difficulty if we consider that it was a principle universally recognized in ancient times, that all property belonging to their opponents in the hands of any nation against which war was declared became forfeited; and, in accordance with this supposed right, the jewels, precious vases, etc., which were borrowed by the Hebrews from the Egyptians, became, when Pharaoh commenced war upon them, legal spoil. It is evident that the Egyptians were but too glad to get rid of their dangerous captives at last to besituate, or even stipulate for restoration of the ornaments; nor did the Hebrews themselves at the time positively know that they should never return them.—Hengstenberg, Pentat. ii, 417 sq.

Bos, Lambert, an eminent scholar, was born at Workum, in Friesland, Nov. 23, 1670, and studied at the University of Franeker, where he devoted himself to Greek. His progress was so great that in 1697 he was made professor of the subject by the university. He died in 1717. His chief work is the Ellipses Graecae, which appeared first in 1702; but the fullest and best edition is that of Schaefer (Leipsic, 1809). Among his other works are his Exercitationes philologicae ad loca nominatae Novi Testamenti (Franeker, 1777, 1780, and 1813, with additions).—Observationes miscellaneae ad loca quaedam, etc. (ibid. 1717, 1780, and 1791).—Vetus Testamentum ex vers. LXX interpretationem cum variis lectionibus, etc. (Franeker, 1709, 4to).—Bibl. Unice, v. 206.

Bos'cath (2 Kings xxii, 1). See BOZKATH.

Bosem; Boser; Boshah. See BALSAM; GRAPE; COCKLE, respectively.

Boskoi (Bozkoii), monks in Syria and Mesopotamia who lived upon roots and herbs. They inhabited no houses, nor ate flesh or bread, nor drank wine. They professed the monastic vows; but in their time in the temple of God, in prayers and in hymns, till eating-time arrived; then every man went, with his knife in his hand, to provide himself food of the herbs of the field. This is said to have been their only diet, and constant way of living. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. vii, ch. ii, § 11.

Bosom (properly בּוֹסֵם, בּוֹסָה, בּוֹסָה). It is usual with the Western Asiatics to carry various sorts of things in the bosom of their dress, which forms a somewhat spacious depository, being wide above the girdle, which confines it so tightly around the waist as to prevent any thing from slipping through. Aware of this, Harmer and other Biblical illustrators rather hastily concluded that they had found an explanation of the text (Luk. vii, 39). "Good morrow, sister!" Good morrow. Let us stand together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom." All these expressions obviously apply, in the literal sense, to corn; and it is certain that corn and things measured in the manner described are never carried in the bosom. They could not be placed there, or carried there, nor taken out, without serious inconvenience, and then only in a small quantity. The things carried in the bosom are simply such as Europeans would, if in the East, carry in their pockets. Yet this habit of carrying valuable property may indicate the origin of the image, as an image, into the bosom, without requiring us to suppose that every thing described as being gone into the bosom really was deposited there.—Kittel, x. v. See DRESS.

To have one in our bosom implies kindness, secrecy, intimacy (Gen. xvi, 5; 2 Sam. xiii, 8). Christ is in (in, into) the bosom of the Father; that is, possesses the closest intimacy with, and most perfect knowledge of, the Father (John i, 18). One of the terms which his lamb ascribes to his master, λαβάνθος τοῦ σωτῆρος, which touchingly represents his tender care and watchfulness over them (Isa. xi, 11). See ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.

Bo'sor (Bosor), the Græcoized form of the name of a place and of a man.

1. A city, both large and fortified, on the east of Jordan, in the land of Gilead (Galad), named with Bozrah (Bozor), Carmaim, and other places, in 1 Mac. v. 26, 36. It is probably the Bezer (q. v.), mentioned (Num. iv. 43) as one of the cities of Gilead, or see Genesis, Thes. p. 1144.

2. The Aramaic mode of pronouncing the name of BOR (q. v.), the father of Balaam (2 Pet. ii, 15), in accordance with the substitution, frequent in Chaldee, of 2 for z (see Gesenius, Thes. p. 1144).

Bozon'a (Bozonā and Bozonāp), a strong city in Gilead, taken by Judas Machabeus (1 Mac. v, 26, 36); doubles the same as the Bozon (q. v.) of (Jcr. xviii, 24). But see Schwarz, Palest. p. 223.

Boz, Gab, literally the back or gibbos part of any thing, spoken elsewhere of earthen bulwarks ["bodies"] or ramparts, Job xii, 12; the noun ["eminent place, etc."] of a brothel, Ezek. xvi, 24; xxx; 39; the eye-"brown," Lev. xiv, 9; the rim or "navo" of a wheel, 1 Kings vii, 33; the exterior convex part of a bucket. Job xii, 26 (comp. Schultens, Comed., in loc.). See SHELL.

Bosuet, Jacques Bézine, bishop of Meaux, was born at Dijon, Sept. 27, 1627, of an eminent legal family. He studied first at Dijon, under the Jesuits, and thence proceeded to Paris, where he soon surpassed his teachers by his acquirements. He took the doctor’s bonnet May 16, 1692, and in the same year was received into priest’s orders. He passed some time in retreat at St. Lazare, and afterward removed to Metz, of which cathedral he was canon.
During his frequent visits to Paris on affairs connected with the Synod of his diocese, he became involved in various church disputes.
The dissertation in which he博事 his high peak of eminence among the divines of the Gallican Church. During that period he composed his discourse De la doctrine catholique, which he had to wait nine years for the pope’s "imprimatur." The points on which he chiefly lays stress are the antiquity and unity of the Catholic Church; the accuculated authorities of fathers, councils, and popes; and the necessity of a final umpire in matters of doctine and discipline. On all these points, however, he was ably answered by the venerable John Claude and other ministers of the French Calvinists, as well as by Archbishop Wake, who, in his "Exposition of the Doctrine of the Church of England, " exposes much management and artifice in the suppression and alteration of Bossuet’s doctrine. In 1688 he was nominated to the see of Condé, and it was about this time that his celebrated funeral discourses were delivered. These sermons are only six in number, but, according to Laharpe, "ce sont des chefs-d’œuvre d’une eколюевії, qui ne pouvait pas avoir de modèle dans l’antiquité, et que personne n’a ęgalée depuis." But, in truth, these "orations are rather masterpieces of rhetorical skill than specimens of Christian preaching."
The king having, in 1670, appointed him preceptor of the dauphin, Bossuet resigned his bishopric, his duties at court being incompatible with his ideas of what the episcopal office demanded of him.
His office with the dauphin being completed in 1681, he was presented to the see of Meaux, and in the following year produced his Traité de la communion sous les deux espèces. In 1688 appeared the Histoire des Variations de l’église protestante. The first five books narrate the rise and progress of the Reformation in Germanny; the 6th treats of the supposed sanction given by Luther and Melanthon to the abominable marriage of the Landgrave of Hesse; the 7th and 8th books contain the ecclesiastical history of England during the reigns of Henry VIII and of Edward VI, and a continuation of that of Germany. The French Calvinists are discussed in book ix, and the assistance afforded to the protestants in France by the French monarchy.
In book x, Bossuet argues that subjects might levy war against their sovereign on account of religious differences (a doctrine which Bossuet asserts to have been inculcated by the reformers), forms the groundwork of book x. Book xi treats of the Albigenenses and other sects from the 5th to the 12th centuries, who are usually esteemed precursors of the reformed. Books xii and xiii continue the Hugenius history till the synod of Gap. Book xiv gives an account of the dissensions at Dort, Charenton, and Geneva; and book xv and last endeavors to prove the divine authority, and therefore the infallibility of the true Church, and to exhibit the marks by which Rome assumed that title. In book xvi, the title of Bishop Burnet to the Variations, but perhaps the sharpest reply is Archibald Wake’s (given in Gibson’s Preservative against Popery), in which Bossuet is convicted not merely of inaccuracy, but also of false assertions. In 1689 Bossuet published the Explictions de l’Apocalypse, and in the same year the first of the Histoire des Variations aux Protestants; the five others followed in the subsequent year. These Averissemens are replies to the pastorial letters of Jurieu, attacking the Histoire des Variations. While the bishop was writing these replies the general answer to the Variations by Basnage appeared, to which he rejoined in his Déci-

Bostra, an ancient epicopal see of Arabia, whose first bishop is said to have been one of the seventy disciples. In 244 (according to others, 247) a celebrated council was held there, under the presidency of Origen, against Beryllus, a Monarchian (q. v.) and Patristian (q. v.). Origen not only refuted him, but brought him back from his errors. See BOZRAH.

BozraCN (Bozrnpovu), the "graceful" river upon whose banks Sidon was situated (Dionys. Per. p. 913); being the modern Nahar el-Ashk, a stream rising in Mount Lebanon from fountains an hour and a half beyond the village el-Baruk; it is at first a winding torrent, and its course is nearly south-west (Burchhard, Syria, p. 206; Robinson, Researches, iii, 429; Chesney, Euphr. Exped. i, 467).

Bostwick, Shadrich, an early Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born in Maryland, educated as a physician, and entered the itinerancy in 1791. For fourteen years he travelled extensively in Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Massachussets, and Ohio, where in 1798-9 he was the leading elder on New London District, Conn. In 1808 he became the pioneer of Methodism on the Western Reserve, Ohio, then a wilderness, where his labors were of great and permanent value. In 1805 he located, and resumed the practice of medicine. The "intellectual and evangelical power of his person" gave him great popularity wherever he travelled. His plenity was deep, and his bearing noble.—Minutes of Conferences, vol. i (appointments); Bangs, History of Methodism, ii, 80; Stevens, Memorials of Methodism, vol. i, ch. xxvi; Sprague, Annals, vii, 200.

Botany, the science that treats of the vegetable kingdom. The only trace of a systematic classification on this subject is to be found in the Scripturn, in the account of the creation (Gen. i, 11, 12), where the following distinctions are made: 1. De’ sir, or "grass," i.e. the first shoots of herbage; 2. E’ser, or "herb," i.e. green or tender plants; 3. E’si, or "tree," i.e. woody shrubs and trees. These divisions correspond in general to the obvious ones of grassy, herbaceous, and arboreal forms of vegetable growth, the two former comprising annuals and those destined of a firm stem. Solomon is said to have written, or, at least, discarded on botanical ground, the following "from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop that springseth out of the wall" (1 Kings iv, 33); but of his treatise or effusions nothing is now extant or further added to, if indeed this be any thing more than a hyperbolic mode of representing his general compass of knowledge (comp. Josephus, Ant. viii, 2, 5) according to the then unscientific standard. See SCIENCE.

A large number and considerable variety, however, of trees and plants are more or less referred to in the Bible, but of many of these there exist very slight means of identifying the exact species according to modern botanical systems. The following is a list of all the individuals of the vegetable kingdom of scriptural occurrence, in the alphabetical order of their Hebrew or Greek names, with their probable modern equivalents, and renderings in the Authorized English Version. See these last in its proper place in this work.

Bottles were first made of the skins of animals. According to the fourth book of the Book of Genesis (1:27), the attendants were represented as bearing water in skin bottles made of goat-skin (gōryôs ayvês). In Herodotus also (ii, 121) a passage clearly indicates that it was customary among the ancient Egyptians to use bottles made of skins; and from the language employed by him it may be

When good, impart no flavor to the wine (Voyages, iv, 75). Skins for wine or other liquids are in use to this day in Spain, where they are called borrachas.

2. It is an error to represent bottles as being made exclusively of dressed or undressed skins among the ancient Hebrews (Jones, Biblical Cyclopaedia, s. v.). Among the Egyptians ornamental vases were of hard stone, alabaster, glass, ivory, bone, porcelain, bronze, silver, or gold; and also, for the use of the people generally, of glazed pottery or common earthenware. As early as Thothmes III, only two centuries later than the Exodus, B.C. 1490, vases are known to have existed of a shape so elegant and of workmanship so superior as to show that the art was not, even then, in its infancy (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii, 59, 60). Glass bottles of the third or fourth century B.C. have been found at Babylon by Mr. Layard. At Cairo many persons obtain a livelihood by selling Nile water, which is carried by camels or asses in skins, or by the carrier himself on his back in pitchers of porous gray earth (Lane, Mod. Eg. ii, 155, 156; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 611; Maundrell, Journey, p. 407, Bohn). See Glass.

Modern Oriental Water-skims. When the animal is killed, they cut off its feet and its head, and they draw it in this manner out of the skin without opening its belly. In Arabia they are tanned with acacia bark, and the hairy part is used for making saddles. If not tanned, a disagreeable taste is imparted to the water. They afterward sew up the places where the legs were cut off and the tail, and when it is filled they tie it about the neck. The great leathern bottles are made of the skin of a he-goat, and the small ones, that serve instead of a bottle of water on the road, are made of a kid's skin. These bottles, when rent, are repaired sometimes by setting in a piece, sometimes by gathering up the wounded place in the manner of a purse; sometimes they put in a round flat piece of wood, and by that means stop the hole (Chardin, ii, 465; vili, 409; Wellsted, Arabia, i, 89; ii, 79; Lane, Mod. Eg. ii, c. 1; Harmer, ed. Clarke, i, 284). Bruce gives a description of a vessel of the same kind, but larger. "A gerba is an ox's skin squared, and the edges sewed together by a double seam, which does not let out water. An opening is left at the top, in the same manner as the bung-hole of a cask; around this the skin is gathered to the size of a large handful, which, when the gerba is full of water, is tied round with whip-cord. These gerbas contain about sixty gallons each, and two of them are the load of a camel. They are then all besmeared on the outside with grease, as well to hinder the water from oozing through as to prevent its being evaporated by the heat of the sun upon the gerba, which, in fact, happened to us twice, so as to get us in danger of thirst" (Travels, iv, 334). Chardin says that wine in Persia is preserved in skins saturated with pitch, which, when good, impart no flavor to the wine (Voyages, iv, 75). Skins for wine or other liquids are in use to this day in Spain, where they are called borrachas.

Ancient Assyrian Glass Bottles. From the British Museum.

Among the Israelites, as early as the days of the Judges (iv, 19; v, 23), bottles or vases composed of some earthy material, and apparently of a superior make, were in use; for what in the fourth chapter is termed "a bottle," is in the fifth designated "a lordly dish." Isaiah (xxx, 14) expressly mentions "the bottle of the potter's vessels," as the reading in the margin gives it, being a literal translation from the Hebrew, while the term which the prophet employs shows that he could not have intended any thing made of skin: "He shall break it as the breaking of the potter's vessel that is broken in pieces, so that there shall not be found in the bursting of it a sherd to take fire from the hearth, or to take water out of the pit." In Jeremiah xii, 1, he is commanded, "Go and get a potter's earthen bottle;" and (ver. 19) "break the bottle." "Even so, saith the Lord of Hosts (ver. 11), will I break this people and this city as one breaketh a potter's vessel, that cannot be made whole again" (see also Jer. xiii, 12-14). Metaphorically the word bottle is used, especially in poetry, for the clouds considered as pouring out and pouring down water (Job xxxviii, 37), "Who can stay the bottles of heaven?" The passage in the Psalms (Ivi, 8), "Put thou my tears in a bottle," is, "treasure them up," "have a regard to the something precious," is illustrated by the custom of tying up in bags or small bottles, and secure with a seal, articles of value, such as precious stones, necklaces, and other ornaments.— Kittö; Smith. See Tear.

Boucher, Jonathan, one of the early Episcopal ministers in America, was born at Blencogo, England, 1736. At sixteen he came over to America, and was nominated to the rectoryship of Hanover parish, Va., in 1761.
He served in succession the parishes of St. Mary’s, St.
Anne’s, and Queen Ann’s in Maryland; and from this last he was ejected in 1775 for refusing to omit from the service the prayers for the king. Returning to England, he became vicar of Elspom 1784. In 1799 he removed to Carlisle, where he died in 1804. He published A View of the Causes and Consequences of the American Revolution. (Lond. 1797, 8vo), and some pamphlets. His later years were spent on a Glossary of Provincial and Archæological Words, which remained in Ms., and was purchased in 1881 by the English publishers of Webster’s Dictionary.— Sprague, Annuals, became its chairman in 1782, in which capacity he signed the Declaration of Independence, and the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain. In 1789 he was again called to Congress, where he served for six years in the House of Representatives.

In 1796 Washington appointed him superintendent of the mint, an office which he held until 1805. In 1812 he became a member of the American Board of Commis­sioners for Foreign Missions, and in 1816 the first president of the American Bible Society (q. v.) These two, as well as many other religious societies, received from him rich donations. He died Oct. 24, 1821, at Burlington. He wrote: Age of Religions, or the Age of Reason an Age of Inability (1790) Second Adven. of the Messiah (1815). Star in the West (1816). In the last work he tried to show that the North American Indians are the lost tribes of Israel. He also published (anonymously in the Evangelical Intelligence (1806) a memoir of the remarkable William Tennent (q. v.).

Bough is the rendering in the Author. Vers. of several words that require no special elucidation, but in
Isa. xvii. 6, 9, it stands as the representative of נסיך Amir. (Sept. ἐπὶ ἐπους μισθους in ver. 6, and of Ἀμύπην in ver. 9; Vulg. Amo vers. "uppermost bough"), a word that occurs no where else, and is usually derived from an Arabic root signifying a general or emir, and hence, in the present text, the higher or upper branches of a tree. Gesenius (Comment. in loc.) admits that this interpretation is unsatisfactory; and Lee, who repays it as very fanciful, endeavours to establish that it denotes the caul or sheath in which the fruit of the date-palm is enveloped. According to this view, he translates the verse thus: "Two or three berries in the head (or upper part) of the caul (or pod, properly sheath), four or five in its fissures." This is at least ingenious; and if it be admitted as a sound interpretation of a passage confusively difficult, this text is to be regarded as affording the only scriptural allusion to the fact that the fruit of the date-palm is, during its growth, contained in a sheath, which reeds as the fruit ripens, and at first partially, and afterward more fully exposes its precious

Pod of the Date-palm.

contents. See Palm. Nevertheless, First (Lex. s. v.) and Henderson (Comment. in loc.) adhere to the other interpretation.

Bouligne, Etienne Antoine, a prominent pulpit orator, and bishop of the Roman Church in France, was born at Laon. He early displayed a remarkable oratorical talent. In 1808 he was appointed bishop of Troyes. At the Episcopal Synod of Paris in 1811 he was elected one of the four secretaries, spoke with great decision against the appointment of the bishops by the government without a papal confirmation, and was deposed with two other bishops to prevent the admission of the council to the emperor. He was therefor imprisoned, and could not return to his episcopal see until the restoration of the Bourbons.
In 1821 the pope conferred on him the title of archbishop.
He died in 1826. His complete works (Paris, 8 vols.
1827 sq.) comprise four volumes of sermons, one volume of pastoral letters and instructions, and three volumes of miscellaneous essays, with a biographical notice

Bourdoulous, Louis, "the prince of French preachers, was born at Bourges, Aug. 20, 1682, and, having at sixteen entered the Society of the Jesuits, soon so distinguished himself in the provinces that his supehiors selected him to return to Paris. He showed in that city a prodigious success, and he was ordered to preach before the court at ten different seasons between 1670 and 1698, a thing altogether without precendent. "He possessed every advantage, physical and mental, that is required for an orator. A solid foundation of reasoning was joined with lively imagination, and a facility of giving interest and originality to common truths was combined with a singular power of making all he said to bear the impress of a strong and earnest spirit in the spiritual life. His was not the beauty of style or art; but there is about his writing a body and a substance, together with a unity and steadiness of aim, that made the simplest language assume the power and the greatness of the highest oratory." At the revocation of the edict of Nantes he was commissioned to preach to the Protstants. Toward the close of his life he abandoned the pulpit, and confined his ministrations to houses of charity, hospitals, and prisons. He died May 13, 1704. His Works, collected by Bretonneau, a Jesuit, appeared in two editions, one in 14 vols. 8vo (Paris, 1707), the other in 15 vols. 12mo (Ligue, 1784). The best modern edition is that of Paris (1822-25, 17 vols. 8vo). A series of his sermons was translated into English and published in London in 1776 (4 vols. 12mo). His Journal of his journal has been published by Pringy (Paris, 1705).

brancer, July, 1854; Etdcilit Review, xxiv, 277; Fish,

Bourges, the see of a Roman archbishop in France.
Bourges was one of the earliest episcopal sees of France. A metropolitan of Bourges is mentioned for the first time in the beginning of the sixth century.
An archdiocese was established there in 465. Councils (Cconcilia Bituricancis) were held at Bourges in 1081, 1225, 1276, 1286, 1326, with regard to church discipline; another, the most important of all, in 1488 [see Bourges, Pragmatic Sanction of]; and the last, in 1528, against Luther and the Reformation.—Wiltz, Geogr.
Statist. of the Church.

Bourges, Pragmatic Sanction of, a settlement drawn up at the Synod of Bourges, 1438 (convoked by Charles VII, and to which Pope Eugene IV and the fathers of the Council of Basle sent legates), for the purpose of remedying abuses in the matter of election to bishoprics. The French clergy had sent petitions to the Council of Basle (1431), which in return sent several decrees to the King of France on the subject. These decrees form the basis Confusion of the Builders of Babel (Lond. 1708, 8vo).

Bourne, George, Rev., was born and educated in England. After emigrating to the United States he became a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church in 1838. He held no pastoral charge, but was chiefly engaged in literary and theological pursuits in connection with publishing houses and the press. An ardent and learned controversialist, he was the author of works on Romanism and slavery, an earnest preacher, and a faithful champion of the Protestant cause. He died in 1845, in New York, at an advanced age.

Bourne, Hugh, founder of the "Primitive Methodist Connection," was born April 84, 1772, in Staffordshire, England. He was brought up a Wesleyan Methodist, and became an active and zealous preacher. When about thirty years of age he associated himself with William Clowes and some other preachers of the Wesleyan body in reviving open-air religious services and camp-meetings. These proceedings, although common enough in the early days of Methodism, and found very useful in America, were denounced by the Conference, which in 1807 passed a resolution to the following effect: "It is our judgment that, even supposing such meetings (camp-meetings) to be allowed in America, they are highly improper in England, and likely to be productive of considerable mischief, and we disclaim all connection with them." This led to Mr. Bourne's separation from the Conference, and the establishment of the Primitive Methodist Connection, the first class of which was formed at Standley, Staffordshire, in 1810. The difference between the Primitive Methodists and the Wesleyan Methodists consists chiefly in the free admission of laymen to the Conference of the former body. See Merton loves, Primitive. In 1844 Mr. Bourne visited the United States of America, where his preaching attracted large congregations. From his youth he was a rigid abstainer from intoxicating drinks, in which respect many of the preachers and members of the Primitive Methodist Connection have followed his example. He died at Bromley, in Staffordshire, October 11, 1852.

Bow (bow, bo' heuth; rē' os), one of the most extensively employed and (among primitive nations) efficiently implements of missile attack. See Armor. It is met with in the earliest stages of history, in use both for the chase (Gen. xxii, 20; xxvii, 8) and war (Ex., 22). In later times archers accompanied the armies of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi, 8; 1 Chron. x, 3), and of the Syrians (2 Kings v, 5). Its use was not confined to the common soldiers, but captains high in rank, as Jehu (2 Kings ix, 24), and even kings' sons (1 Sam. xviii, 4), carried the bow, and were expert and sure in its use (2 Sam. i, 22).
The tribe of Benjamin seems to have been especially addicted to archery (1 Chron. viii, 40; xii, 2; 2 Chron. xiv, 8; xvii, 7), but there were also bowmen among Reuben, Gad, Manasseh (1 Chron. v, 18), and Ephraim (Psa. lxviii, 9). The bow seems to have been bent with the aid of the foot, as now, for the word commonly used for it is יִתָּנָה, to tread (1 Chron. v, 18; vii, 40; 2 Chron. xiv, 8; Isa. v, 18; Psa. vii, 12, etc.).

Bowls of steel (or perhaps copper, מַגֵּרָן) are mentioned as if specially strong (2 Sam. xxii, 5; Psa. xviii, 34). The string is occasionally named (נַעַשׂ, ye’tzer, or נַעַשֶּה, mayṭhar). It was probably at first some kind of a bow, where the bow-string is used in Jude. vii, 7, to fight for “green withes.” In the allusion to bows in 1 Chron. xii, 2, it will be observed that the sentence in the original Hebrew is not as above both its word-order and its literal rendering: the words “hurling” and “shooting” being intertranslated by the translators. There is a kind of a bow for shooting bullets or stones here alluded to, like the pellet-bow of India, or the “lone-bow” in use in the Middle Ages, and to which allusion is made in the seraphic Verse (Isa. xlii, 5; xliii, 6), which in Wisd. v, 22, is employed as the translation of הַנַּעַשֶּה. This latter word occurs in the Sept. text of 1 Sam. xiv, 14, in a curious variation of a passage—which in the Hebrew is hardly intelligible—אֵלְבָּשׁ, καὶ εἰς πετρελόας; καὶ εἶναι κυλίζα τον πεταλίαν: “with the bow, and with the sword, and with curses.” If this be accepted as the true reading, we have here, by comparison with xiv, 27, 43, an interesting confirmation of the statement (xiii, 19-22) of the degree to which the Philistines had deprived the people of arms, leaving to the king himself nothing but his faithful spear, and to his son no sword, no shield, nothing but a stone-bow and a staff (Auth. Vers. “rod”). See BOWMAN.

The Arrows (בָּדָן, chîṣa’tim) were carried in a quiver (בֵּחָשׁ, telî, Gen. xxvii, 3; or בָּדֵנָה, asbak’h, Psa. xxii, 6; xlix, 2; cxvii, 5). From an allusion in Job vi, 4, they would seem to have been sometimes poisoned; and the “sharp arrows of the mighty with coals of juniper” in Psa. cxx, 4, may point to a practice of using arrows with some burning material attached to them. See ARCHERY. Among the Archers were “a section of triumphs.”

—Minutes of Conferences for 1858, p. 235.

Bowen, John, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Bedford county, Pa., June 8, 1789, was licensed to preach in 1820. In 1823 he was admitted on trial in the Baltimore Conference; ordained a deacon by Bishop Soule, April 10, 1825, and an elder by Bishop Roberts, April 15, 1827. During the next seven years he failed for the ministry which he sought. In 1830 he had received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God; twenty-three in Pennsylvania, fourteen in Maryland (including nearly four years of superannuation), and five in Virginia. Twenty-six of these years were on large circuits, and twelve in stations. He died in Phila., March 26, 1858. See Minutes of Conferences, 1865, p. 11; Christian Advocate, May 11, 1865.

Bowen, Nathaniel, D.D., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in South Carolina, was born in Boston June 29, 1779, and educated at Charleston College, where he graduated in 1794. In 1801 he became chaplain to the Orphan House in Charleston; whence he removed to Providence, R. I., as rector of St. John’s. Subsequently he became rector of St. Michael’s, Charleston, and afterward of Grace Church, New York, where he remained from 1809 to 1818. Early in 1818 he accepted the episcopate of South Carolina, “without,” as he expresses himself, “pride of distinction,” and solemnly impressed with the responsibility of the independence and the insignificance of the elevated station in the ministry.” In 1831 he visited England, not merely for purposes of relaxation, but... with a view to promote the interests of the Church. After his return his duties were fully discharged, as far as falling health would allow, until his death, Aug. 23, 1838. He published Christian Conversion (1831) Private Prayers (Charleston, 1837), and several occasional sermons and addresses. After his death a selection from his Sermons appeared (N. Y., 2 vols 8vo).

—Sprague, Amahl, v. 471.

Bower, Archibald, was born at Dundee 1866, and educated at Douay. In early life he went to Rome and became a Jesuit; came to England 1728, and soon after joined the Established Church; became a Jesuit again in 1744, and again turned Protestant. He died in 1766. He wrote the most copious History of the Popes that has ever appeared in English, but, unfortunately, his volatilising character has deprived it of its just reputation (Lond. 1750, 7 vols 4to). Bishop Douglas, of Salisbury, wrote a very severe review of Bower, showing that he had borrowed largely from Tillemont without acknowledgment (Bower and Tillemont compared, Lond. 1757, 8vo).

Bowing (some form of the verb פֹּלָל pōlāl, πολύ.) This was a very ancient mode of showing respect. "Abraham stood up, and bowed himself towards the people of the land, even to the children of Heth" (Gen. xxiii. 7). So also Jacob, when he came to meet his brother Esau, "bowed himself to the ground seven times, until he came near to his brother" (Gen. xxviii. 3); and the brethren of Joseph bowed themselves before him as the governor of the land (Gen. xlviii. 28). The attitude of bowing is frequently represented in the paintings on the tombs of Egypt, particularly of captives brought before a king or conqueror. The gestures and inflections of the body used in salutation differ at different times, varying with the dignity (Josh. v. 14; Psa. xxxiii, 29; lxii, 9; Mic. vi, 6; Psa. xcv, 6; Eph. iii, 14). See Attitudes.

Bowing at the Name of Jesus, a practice derived from the Romish, and still remaining in the English Church. It is practised in the repetition of those parts of the Mass in which the name of Jesus Christ occurs, though the 18th canon of the rubrics allows the more general use of the practice. The practice is sometimes made to rest upon scriptural authority, but erroneously, the expression (Phil. ii, 10) "that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow" being purely figurative; enjoining, therefore, inward submission, as authority, not outward token of such a feeling.—Eden, Theol. Dict. s. v.

Bowing Toward the East, a practice in the early Christian churches. "Its origin is thus stated: The sun being a symbol of Christ, the place of its rising was a fitting though imaginary representation of heaven, whence Christ descended, and to which he ascended in glory as the mediator between God and man. The heathens charged the Christians with worshipping the rising sun; but St. Augustine repudiates such an idea when he says, 'We turn to the east, whence the heavens, or the light of heaven arises, not as if God was only there, and had forsaken all other parts of the world, but to put ourselves in mind of turning to a more excellent nature, that is, to the Lord.' Turning towards the East is a symbol of Christian hope, and has reference to some of the ceremonies connected with baptism in ancient times. When the persons to be baptized entered the baptistery, where they were to make their renunciation of Satan and their confessions of faith, they were placed with their faces toward the west, and commanded to renounce Satan, and to make some gesture or rite; this they did by striking their hands together as a token of abhorrence, by stretching out their hands against him, by exsufflation, and by spitting at him as if he were present. They were then turned round to the east, and desired to lift up their hands and eyes to heaven, and enter into covenant with Christ, the Sun of Righteousness. The west, says Cyril of Jerusalem, 'is the place of darkness, and Satan is darkness, and his strength is in darkness. For this reason ye symbolically look toward the west when ye renounce that prince of darkness and horror.' To this we add from St. Jerome, 'First we renounce him that is in the west, who dies to us with our sins; and then, turning about to the east, we make a covenant with the Sun of Righteousness, and promise to be his servants.' Bowing toward the east is practised in those churches of the Establishment where the congregations are instructed to turn their faces in that direction at the recital of the creed. This custom has been revived of late by some of the so-called Puseyites in England and America. It is the practice in the Romish Church to bow toward the altar, that is, toward the east, in entering or leaving the church.—Chambers, Encyclopædia, s. v.; Eadie, Eccles. Encyclopædia, s. v.

Bow is given in the Authorized Version as the rendering of several Heb. words, the distinction between which is lost and not clear, and which are often translated by words expressive of different forms. Compare Bæst. It most frequently occurs in connection with the golden candlestick of the tabernacle, the sockets for the separate lamps of which are designated by גָּבֹד (gēbôd), a cup, Exod. xxxv, 31, 38, 34; xxxviii, 17, 19, 20; elsewhere a drinking-"cup," Gen. xlix, 2, 12, 16, 17; or wine-"pot," Jer. xxxiv, 5, taken by some to mean ornaments in the shape of the cyme of a flower, a sense confirmed by the usage of the term in the cognate languages, and by its expressed resemblance to an almond blossom (in the passage last cited).

The words בָּשַׁם (basam) and גְּדִיר (gēdir), used by the prophet Zechariah (iv, 2, 3) in his vision of the bowl, William Libell, M.A., poet and preacher, was born at King's Sutton 1672, an educated at Cambridge, and became in 1704 the chaplain in ordinary to Trinity College, Oxford. He became vicar of Chicklade 1792, rector of Dumbleton 1797, vicar of Bremhill and prebendary of Salisbury 1804, canon residentiary 1828. He died 1850. His sonnets are among the best in the English language; and he is of note in the history of English literature as the harbinger of the "natural" style in poetry, as opposed to the artificial school of Pope and Dryden. His "Sonnets" have appeared in many editions. The "Mizer" is perhaps the best of his longer poems. He published also Ten Plain Parochial Sermons (10o, 1814).—Paulus pachulis; or, a plain View of the Objects of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (Bath, 1826, 12mo):—The Life of Bishop Ken.

Bowman (F. S. A., a master of the box, archer, Jer. iv. 29), Bow-shot (F. A., drawes of the box, archers, Gen. xxix. 16).—See Bow.

Bowman, Samuel, assistant bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese of Pennsylvania, was born at Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, on May 21, 1800. He first studied the law, but his sudden death of his father was led to prepare for the ministry. He was ordained deacon August 25, 1828, and soon afterward took charge of two country churches in Lancaster county. In 1824 he was ordained priest. In 1828 he accepted a call to Easton, but soon returned to his old charge in Lancaster county. In 1827 he accepted a call to the associate rectorship of St. James's Church, Lancaster, a charge which he continued to hold for 24 years, and which was terminated only by his death. Some years afterward he received the honorary degree of doctor of divinity from General College, and was elected bishop of Indiana, but declined the office. He was afterward strongly urged to consent to be a candidate for the office of provisional bishop of New York, but positively refused to allow his name to be used. He was greatly attached to his church in Lancaster, which by uniting energy he made one of the most flourishing parishes in the diocese of Pennsylvania. He established, in particular, an orphan asylum, parochial schools, a church home, and a free church. In 1858 Dr. Bowman was elected assistant bishop of Pennsylvania. He died suddenly in July, 1861, while on a tour through the western part of the diocese, of a thrombosis of the heart. But he was highly esteemed for purity of life, sauntly of manners, and amiability of character. These qualities gave him a great influence in deliberative bodies, and, though he spoke rarely in Conventions, such was the weight of his reputation that his vote was worth more than men's speeches. In his theological opinions Bishop Bowman was ranked as a moderate High-Churchman. But while in doctrine he never departed from his original position, yet in some points of practice he was disposed of late years to be less rigid than he had been. This appeared in particular in a sermon preached before the Convention of Pennsylvania in 1856, and published by request. A few weeks before his death Bishop Bowman published an American edition of a short Life of Sargent, the biographer of Henry Martyn, by Bishop Wilberforce, of Oxford.—American Church Review, Jan. 1867, p. 499-521.

Bowyer, William, F.S.A., the "last of the learned English printers," was born in London 1699, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He entered into business as a printer with his father 1722, and died in 1777. Besides editing a great deal of the important works in classical and general literature, he published Critical Conjectures and Observations on the New Testament, collected from various Authors (4th ed. Lond. 1812, 4to).

Ancient Egyptian Bowls and Vases.

(see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. abridgm. i, 147-158).

Bottle. The favorite form of the Egyptian bowl was the lotus, while that of the Hebrews resembled a lily (Num. vii. 13; 1 Kings x. 21; Judg. v. 25). Bowls would probably be used at meals for liquids, or broth, or pottage (2 Kings iv. 40). Modern Arabs are content with a few wooden bowls. In the British Museum are deposited several terra-cotta bowls with Cilician inscriptions of a superstitious character, expressing charms against sickness and evil spirits, which may possibly explain the "divining-cup" of Joseph (Gen. xlv. 5). The bowl was filled with some liquid and drunk off as a charm against evil. See a case of Tippoo Sahib drinking water out of a black stone as a charm against misfortune (Oleig, Life of Murro, i, 218). One of the British Museum bowls still retains the stain of a liquid. These bowls, however, are thought by Mr. Birch not to be very ancient (Birch, Anc. Pottery, i, 154; comp. Shaw, Trav. p. 251). A modern traveller informs us that the bowls and dishes of the modern Arabs are of wood; those of their emirs are not infrequently of copper, very neatly tinned. At a collation given by the grand emir of the Arabs whom he visited, there were large painted basins and bowls of wood placed before him; their being painted was, without doubt, a mark of honor to distinguish them from the ordinary wooden bowls. The "lordly dish" mentioned in Judg. v. 25 was probably something of this kind. Similar dishes of the most elegant construction, in bronze, have lately been discovered in the Assyrian ruins at Nimroud (Layard's 2d Expedition, p. 181 sq.). There are also curios relics of this kind found at Babylon, containing Hebrew inscriptions that seem to date them at the time of the Talmudists (ix. p. 513 sq.). See Vessel.

There is no philological proof of this conclusion, but yet there is nothing in the tree indicated unsuitable to the several contexts. Thus, with reference to the future Temple, it is said (Isa. lx, 23), "The glory of Lebanon shall be unto thee, the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box (Sept. cedropec) together; and at xii, 19, "I will set in the desert the fir-tree, and the pine, and the box (Sept. confounds with several interpolated kinds) together." Further, in Ezek. xxvii, 6, in the account of the arts and commerce of Tyre, we read, "(All the tree of Bashan have they made shine oars, and the benches of the rowers are made of boxwood (עַלְגָּרָא עַלְגָּרָא; Sept. translates unintelligibly); Engl. Ver. "Ashurites" [q. v.], inlaid with ivory," as it is now usually interpreted. The box wood, moreover, is said to have been brought from the isles of Chittim, that is, of Greece. According to most, however, who argue from the derivation of the word (from עַלְגָּרָא, 'to be erect'), the teashah is a species of cedar called sherub (so the Syriac), to be recognised by the small size of the cones and the upward tendency of the branches (see Niebuhr's Arach. p. 149). Robinson, in his latest volume of Researches in Palestine, mentions a grove near el-Hadith which only the natives speak of as Arse (Heb. עַלְגָּרָא, 'ars, cedar), though the tree bears a general resemblance to the cedar, and is probably identical (see Castali Hieros. 174, 79; Freytag-Lenz, ii, 408; Robinson, iii, 526). See CEDAR.

The box (Burzus sempervirens) is an evergreen, which in our gardens is generally seen only as a dwarf shrub. In the East, however, its native country, it attains the size of a forest-tree, and often forms a very beautiful feature in the landscape. It is a native of most parts of Europe. It grows well in moderate climates, while that from the Levant is most valued in commerce, in consequence of being highly esteemed by wood-engravers. Turkey box is yielded by Burzus Bolarica, a species which is found in Minorca, Sardinia, and Corsica, and also in both European and Asiatic Turkeyst, and is imported from Constantinople, Smyrna, and the Black Sea. Box is also found on Mount Caucasus, and a species extends even to the Himalaya Mountains. Hence it is well known to Asians, and is the shamash of the Arabs. It is much employed in the present day by the wood-engraver, the turner, the carver, and instrument-makers, in the instrument-maker, and fluite maker. It was cultivated by the Romans, as described by Pliny (xvi, 83). Virgil (Aen. x, 135) alludes to the practice of its being inlaid with ivory (comp. Theocrit. xxiv, 108; Athen. v, 207; Pliny, xvi, 65; Virg. Georg. ii, 449; Juv. xiv, 194). The box-tree, being a native of mountainsous regions, was peculiarly adapted to the calcareous formations of Mount Lebanon, and therefore likely to be brought from thence with the coniferous woods for the building of the Temple, and was as well suited as the fir and the pine trees for changing the face of the desert (see Pennyc Cropdairies, &c. Buxus). See BOTANY.

Boy (בָּנוֹן), 'a lad, one born; Joel iii, 5; 2 Chron. vii, 5; elsewhere usually "child;" "בָּנוֹת, a youth, Gen. xxv, 27; elsewhere "lad," "young man," etc. See CHILD.

Boy Bishop, "the principal person in an extraordinary sacred title of the Middle Ages, and down to the period of the Reformation. On St. Nicholas' day, the 6th of December, the boys forming the choir in cathedral churches elected one of their number to the honor of bishop, and robes and episcopal symbols were provided for him, while the other boys, assuming the dress of priests, took possession of the church, and went through all the ecclesiastical ceremonies but that of mass. This strange reversal of power lasted till Inno- cents' day, the 28th of the same month. On the eve of that day, the boy went through a caricature of procession, chanting.
tive ceremonies. Dean Colet, in his statutes for St. Paul's School, London, ordains that the boys should come to St. Paul's Church and hear the 'chylde' bishop's sermons, and each of them present him with a penny. By a proclamation of Henry VII, 1424, this show was abolished; but it was revived under Mary, and in 1556 the boy bishops still maintained some popularity. The similar scenes in France were yet more extraordinary, and often indecent. The Council of Paris, in 1212, interdicted the pastime, and the theological faculty of the same city, in 1414, made loud complaints of the continuance of the custom. In Scotland similar saturnalia also prevailed, as Scott has described in his Abbot, connected with 'those jocular personages, the pope of fools, the boy bishop, and the abbot of unreason.' This custom is supposed to have given rise to the ceremony of the Moniem at Eton. Bishop Hall, in his Triumphs of Rome, says, 'What merry work it was in the days of our holy fathers (and I know not whether, in some places, it may not be so still), that upon St. Nicholas, St. Catharine, St. Clement, and Holy Innocents' day, children were wont to be arrayed in chimeras, rochettes, surplices, to counterfeit bishops and priests, and to be led, with songs and dances, from house to house, and the people joyfully grinning, in the way to expect that ridiculous benediction. Yes, that boys in that holy sport were wont to sing masses, and to climb into the pulpit to preach (no doubt learnedly and edifyingly) to the simple auditory.'—Edie, Eccles. Cyclopedia, s. v. See MYSTERIES.

Boyd, Robert, a Scotch divine, was born in 1578, and studied at the University of Edinburgh. Passing over to France, he was made professor at the Protestant Seminary of Montauban, and in 1608 professor at Saumur. Returning to Scotland, he became professor of theology at Glasgow 1615, and died in 1627. He wrote In Epist. ad Ephe. Prelectiones (London, 1692, fol.).—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 281; Darling, *Cyclopaedia of Biog.*s., i, 403.

Boyd, Zachary, a Scotch divine, was born early in the 17th century. Having studied theology, was appointed minister of the Barony parish, and professor in Glasgow College in 1623. He distinguished himself as an opponent both of Prelacy and Independency. During Cromwell's invasion of 1650, when the ministers, magistrates, and other officials fled in consternation from Glasgow, he had the courage to continue in his post, and preaching as usual, to use the words of Baillie, 'he railed at Cromwell and his men to their very faces in the High Church, who,' adds the historian, 'took it all in very good humor.' Boyd possessed some poetical gifts, and being desirous to employ them in the service of the Church, he had prepared a metrical version of the whole Book of Psalms, which was examined by order of the General Assembly, and found unfit for publication. Notwithstanding this great disappointment, Mr. Boyd persevered in rendering the whole Bible into a sort of metrical version, a copy of which, in manuscript, is deposited in the library of Glasgow College. It is a curiosity in its way, full of grotesque images and rhymes. Mr. Boyd wrote many devotional works, among them The Last Bottle of the Soul in Death, in Eight Conferences (1629, 2 vols.). During the troubles in Scotland in the 17th century Mr. Boyd went over to France, where, having been appointed professor in one of the colleges, he resided for sixteen years. He died in 1654, leaving some valuable bequests to the College of Glasgow, with which he was long connected.—Jameson, Cyclop. of Relig Biography, s. v.

Boyle, John Alexander, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born May 13, 1816, at Baltimore, Md. His early years were spent in Philadelphia, and he entered the ministry in the Philadelphia Conference in 1838. He soon became marked as a preacher of vigor and promise; but his health failed, and in 1845 he was compelled to abandon itinerancy. He then studied law, and was admitted to the bar of New Jersey; but as soon as his health would justify it he returned to the ministry, laboring in a city mission in Philadelphia from 1864 to 1866, when a hemmorrhage compelled him to retire to Maryland. In 1868 he became editor of a newspaper in Elk county, Pa., and was very useful in planting the Church in that region. When the rebellion broke out in 1861, he enlisted a company and entered the army as captain. He served through the campaign in Virginia with great distinction, and rose to the rank of major. After the war he settled in Chattanooga, Oct. 29, 1868, his regiment held a post which was considered the key of the field against 6000 of the enemy, and he was shot through the head.—Christian Advocate, Dec., 1864.

Boyle, Robert, one of the most eminent philosophers and Christians of modern times, was the seventh son and fourteenth child of the "Great Earl of Cork," and was born at his father's seat, Lismore Castle, in the province of Munster, Ireland, January 25, 1627. After studying for four years at Eton, and subsequently at Geneva, he travelled over various parts of the Continent, and finally settled in England, and devoted himself to chemistry. After the accession of Charles II, in 1660, he was urged to enter the Church, but he declined on the ground that he had no divine call to the ministry. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society, but he declined the office of provost of Eton College in 1666 his name appears as attesting the miraculous cures (as they were called by many) of Valentine Greatrakes, an Irishman, who, by a sort of animal magnetism, made his own hands the medium of giving many patients almost instantaneous relief. At the same time, in illustration of what we shall presently have to say on the distinction between Boyle and Descartes, and Boyle and a judge of evidence, we find him in 1660 not disposed to receive, and that upon the hypothesis implied in the words, the 'true relation of the things which an unclean spirit did and said at Macon in Burgundy,' etc. That he should have been inclined to prosecute inquiries about the transmutation of metals needs no excuse, considering the state of chemical knowledge in his day." Much of his leisure was given to theological studies and to the advancement of religion, for which latter object he expended very considerable sums. He "had been for years a director of the East India Company, and we find in 1676 pressing upon that body the duty of promoting Christianity in the East. He caused the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles to be translated into Malay, at his own cost, by Dr. Thomas Hyde, and he promoted an Irish version. He also gave a large reward to the translator of Grotius's 'De Veritate,' etc., into Arabic; and would have been at the whole expense of a Turkish Testament had not the East India Company relieved him of a part. In the year 1680 he was elected president of the Royal Society, a post which he declined, as appears by a letter to Hooke (Works, i, p. 74), from scruples of conscience about the religious tests and oaths required. In 1688 he advertised the public that some of his manuscripts had been lost or stolen, and others mutilated by accident; and in 1689, finding his health declining, he refused most visits, and set himself to repair the loss." In his critical and theological studies he had the assistance of Pococke, Hyde, and Clark, all eminent Orientalists. In view of the poverty to which Sanderson had been reduced by his attachment to Boyle, this last-named gentleman gave him a stipend of £50 a year. This stipend was given as an encouragement to that excellent master of reasoning to apply himself to the writing of "Cases of Conscience;" and accordingly he printed his lectures, De Obligatione Conscientiae, which he read at Oxford 1647, and dedicated them to his friend and patron. Among his pious acts was the founding of a lecture for the defence of natural and revealed religion. See BOYLE LECTURES. The characteristics of Boyle as a theological writer are much the same as those of his works on natural philosophy. He does not enter at all into disputed articles of faith, and preserves a quiet and argumentative tone throughout; but the very great prolixity into which he falls renders him almost unreadable. The treatises On Scropean Law, Considerations on the Style of the Scriptures, and on the Allegorical Interpretation that Most Belong to God, have a place in the Index librorum prohibitorum of the Roman Church. Boyle was never married. He died on the 30th of December, 1691. Bishop Burnet, in his funeral sermon on Boyle, declares that "his knowledge was of so vast an extent that, if it were not for the variety of vouchers in their several sorts, I should be afraid to say all I know. He carried the study of Hebrew very far into the rabbinical writings and the other Oriental tongues. He had read so much of the fathers that he had formed out of it a clear judgment of all the eminent ones. He had read a vast deal on the Scriptures, had gone very nicely through the various controversies in theology, and was assured of it to be the whole body of divinity. He read the whole compass of the mathematical sciences; and, though he did not set himself to spring any new game, yet he knew even the abstrusest parts of geometry. Geography, in the several parts of it that related to navigation or travelling, history, and books of novels, were his diversions. He did not go down even through all the obstinacy of the only tenderness of his nature made him less able to endure the exactness of anatomical dissections, especially of living animals, though he knew these to be most instructing. But for the history of nature, ancient and modern, of the productions of all countries, of the virtues and improvements of plants, of ores and minerals, and all the varieties that are in them in different climates, he was by much,—by very much,—the readiest and the perfectest I ever knew." The best edition of his works is that of 1772 (Lond. 6 vols. 4to), the first volume of which contains his Life by Birch. —Jones, Relig. Biography; English Cyclopaedia, s. v.; New General Dictionary, ii. 974.

Boyle lectures, a foundation under the will of the Hon. Robert Boyle in 1691, which charged upon his dwelling-house in St. Michael's, Crooked Lane, London, an annual stipend for "a divine or preaching minister to preach eight sermons in the year for providing the church in religion against apostates, Pagans, Jews, and Mohammedans, not descending to any controversies among Christians themselves." The lecturer is to be "assisting to all companies, and encouraging them in any undertaking for propagating the Christian religion, and is farther to be ready to satisfy such real scruples as any have concerning such matters." This provision shows that Boyle desired to make England's then increasing colonies a means of extending Christianity. The preacher is elected for a period not exceeding three years. A collection of the lectures delivered up to 1732 was published in 1739 (Lond. 8 vols. fol.) and over five hundred have been printed of those since preached. The most important are, Bentley, Confutation of Atheism (1692); Kidder, Demonstration of Messiah (1694); Williams, On Divine Revelations (1697), and on Certainty and Necessity of Religion (1697); Harris, Refutation of Atheism (1698); Bradford, Credibility of Revelations (1700); Blackhall, Short Dissertation on the Christian Religion (1709); Clarke, Demonstration of Being of God (1705); Hancock, Being of God (1707); Turner, Wisdom of God in Redemption (1709); Woodward, Divine Excellency of Christianity (1712); Derham, Physico-Theology (1711-12); Benjamin, On Free-will (1712); Benjamin, On the Difficulties no Excuse for Infidelity (1725); Burnet, Demonstration of True Religion (1728); Berriman, Gradual Revelation of the Gospel (1733); Riceo, On the Acts (1738-8; reprinted 1829); Stebbing, Controversy, between Christians and Deists (1747-9); Heathcote, Against Atheists (1753); Worthington, Evidence of Christianity (1756-6; Owen, On Scripture Miracles (1769-71); Williamson, Compendium of Revelations with Operation of the Human Mind (1778-80); Van Mildert, Rise and Progress of Infidelity (1802; reprinted 1838); Harness, Connection of Christianity with Happiness (1821); Maurice, Religions of the World in their Relations to Christianity (1840).—Darling, Cyclopaedia Biblica, i., 407.

Boys, John, a church of England divine, was born at Nettlestead, Suffolk, Jan. 8, 1650. He was so precocious that at five years old he could read the Bible in Hebrew. At fourteen he entered St. John's, Cambridge, of which college he became fellow and studied medicine. Fascinating himself to have every disease he read of, he quitted medicine for theology, and in 1683 was ordained priest, becoming some time afterward rector of Boxworth. When the new translation of the Holy Bible was resolved on, under King James I, Boys was fixed upon to undertake the Apocalypse, which he completed, together with the portion assigned to some other party whose name is not known. He was about to be Sir H. Savile largely in his edition of Chrysostom, and in 1615 was requested by Bishop Andrews with a stilt in Ely Cathedral, which he held till his death, Jan. 14, 1648. He left many MSS., but his only published work was Veterum Interpretationem cum Bets aliqua recent. collatio. London, 1655, 8vo, a vindication of the Vulgate version of the New Testament.—Hook, Ecclesiastical Biographees, p. 27; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographicæ, i., 407.

Boys, John, dean of Canterbury, was born in 1571, and was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. In 1597 hew as presented by his uncle to the livings of Betchanger and Tilmanstone. Archbishop Abbot made him rector of Great Mongeham in 1619, and in 1619 James I made him dean of Canterbury. He died Sept. 26, 1625, leaving a great reputation both as preacher and scholar. He was especially noted for his stanch Protestantism. He wrote an Exposition of the Scriptures used in the Liturgy; An Exposition of the Epistles and Gospels in the Liturgy; An Exposition of the Psalms; Lectures and Sermons, all collected in his Works (Lond. 1629, fol.). A new edition of his Exposition of the Psalms was published by his friend, John Mead, in Philadelphia (1849).—Hook, Eccl. Biography, ii. 27; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographicæ, i., 407.

Boys, Joseph, a dissenting minister, was born at Leeds, Yorkshire, 1860, and was educated at Stepney Academy. In 1663 he became pastor of a congregation in Dublin, and died 1728. He wrote A Vindication of the Deity of Christ (Lond. 1708, 8vo); A Clear Account of ancient Episcopacy, which, with other writings and a number of sermons, are collected in his Works (Lond. 1728, 2 vols. fol.).

Bozzez (Heb. Bozets), a rock, shining, according to Gesenius, but height according to Fürst; Sept. Baasij v. Boreri, the name of one of the two "sharp rocks" (Heb. "teeth of the cliff") between the passages by which Job ascended Mount Karkar in the Book of Judges apparently a range on the north side of the ravine between Michmash and Gibeah (1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5). Robinson noticed two hills of blunt conical form in the bottom of Wady Susinvjac, just below Mukmas (Researches ii., 116, also new ed. iii., 289), which are doubtless those referred to, although Stanley could not make them out (Pales., p. 205, note).

Bozkath (Heb. Bozakath), a rocky region or hill; Sept. in Josh. Berezoth3 v. Borezoth3 and Mon- zeh3; in Kings Bereze3 v. Berezoth3; Josephus Borezi3, Am. x. 4, 1, a town "in the plain" of Judah, in the vicinity of Lachish and Eglon (Josh. xv. 30); it was the native place of Adahah, the maternal grand-was an important place, and was called by them Bostra (Gr. ὑστα Ὑστρα). Cicero mentions it as having an independent chieftain (ad Q. F. ii, 12). The city was ransacked by Trajan, who made it the capital of the Roman province of Arabia, as is commemorated on its coins of a local era then arising, and dating from A.D. 102 (Chron. Pasch. p. 258, ed. Paris; p. 472, ed. Bonn; Eckhel, Doctr. Num. iii, 500). Under Alexander Severus it was made a "colony" (Damascius, op. Phot. Cod. p. 275). The Emperor Philip, who was native to it, had it conferred upon the city of "moprolès," it being at that time a large, populous, and well-fortified city (Amm. Marc. xiv, 8). It lay 24 Roman miles north-east of Adra (Edrei), and four days' journey south of Damascus (Eusebius, Onomast. s. v.; Hieroc. Notit.); Polyeuct (v. 17; viii, 20, 21) mentions it among the cities of Amida Petrea, or the surname of Legio (Asiæi), in allusion to the "Legio III Cyrenaica," whose head-quarters were fixed here by Trajan; it is also one of that geographer's points of astronomical observation. Ecclesiastically, it was a place of considerable importance, being the seat first of a bishopric and afterward of an archbishopric. It was the metropolis of the 21 dioceses (Achaia, Cyzicus, Ætolia, Epeus, Chalcidion, etc.), and forming apparently the centre of Nestorian influence (Assemani's Bibl. Orient. III, ii, 695, 780). See Bostra. The site still contains extensive vestiges of its ancient importance, consisting of temples, theatres, and palaces, which have been described by Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 570) as lying about six miles south of Tophel, and "now a village of about fifty houses, situated on a hill, on the top of which is a small castle."

2. In his catalogue of the cities of the land of Moab, Jeremiah (xlvi, 24) mentions a Bostra as in "the plain country" (ver. 21, הַמֵּדְבָּר הַרְּמָל), i.e. apparently the high level down on the east of the Dead Sea and of the lower Jordan, that is, a part of the modern Moab, Aran, Heshbon, Neso, Kirjathaim, Diblahaim, and the other towns named in this passage. Yet Bostra has been sought at Bostra, the Roman city in Bashan, full sixty miles from Heshbon (Porter's Damascus, ii, 163, etc.), since the name stands by itself in this passage of Jeremiah, not being mentioned in any of the other lists of the cities of Moab, e.g. Num. xxxii; Josh. xiii; Isa. xvi; Ezek. xxxv; and the catalogue of Jeremiah is expressly said to include cities both "far and near" (xlvii, 24). See Keboth.

Some weight also is due to the consideration of the improbability that a town at a later date so important and so situated should have been forgotten and interpolated from the Scripture. Still, in a country where the very kings were "sheep-masters" (2 Kings iii, 4), a name signifying a sheepfold may have been of common occurrence. This Bostra is also mentioned in the Talmud (see Schwartz, Palest. p. 223), and is apparently the Bososa (q. v.) of 1 Macc. v, 29-30 (comp. by Rit. Erck. iv, 127; xvi, 205, 101 sq.; Schwartz, Palest. p. 209). Irby and Mangles mention it under the name of Ispeyras and Basida (ch. viii.). The "goats" which Isaiah connects with the place were found in large numbers in this neighborhood by Burckhardt (Syria, p. 405). It is described by Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 570) as lying about six miles south of Tophel, and "now a village of about fifty houses, situated on a hill, on the top of which is a small castle."

rypha (Judith x. 4; Ecclus. xxi. 21). These are, (1.) נְשֶׁץ, ešetāsh (properly a step-chain or anklet), which occurs in Num. xxxi, 60; 2 Sam. i, 10, and with reference to men only. (2.) פַּדַּש, tāmaš (literally a fasten r.), which is found in Gen. xxiv, 22, 80, 47; Num. xxxi, 60; Ezek. xvi, 11; xxiii, 42. Where these two words occur together (as in Num. xxxi, 50), the first is rendered by "chain," and the second by "bracelet." (3.) פַּדַּש, shērōth, chains (so called from being wreathed), which occurs only in Isa. iii, 19; but compare the expression "wreathen chains" in Ex. xxxviii, 14, 22. Bracelets of fine twisted Venetian gold are still common in Egypt (Lane, ii, 368, Append. A and plates). The first we take to mean armlets worn by men; the second, bracelets worn by women and sometimes by men; and the third, a peculiar bracelet of chain-work worn only by women. It is observable that the first two occur in Num. xxxi, 50, which we suppose to mean that the men offered their own armlets and the bracelets of their wives. In the only other passage in which the first word occurs it denotes the royal ornament which the Amalekite took from the arm of the dead Saul, and brought with the other regalia to David. There is little question that this was such a distinguishing band of jewelled metal as we still find worn as a mark of royalty from the Tigris to the Ganges. The Egyptian kings are represented with armlets, which were also worn by the Egyptian women. These, however, are not jewelled, but of plain enamelled metal, as was in all likelihood the case among the Hebrews. (4.) פַּדַּש (chōāh, properly a hook or ring), rendered "bracelet" in Exod. xxxvii, 22, elsewhere "hook" or "chain," is thought by some to designate in that passage a clamp for fastening the dress of females, by others more probably a nose-ring or jewel. See EAR-ING. (5.) פַּדַּש (p̄āṣīl, a thread), rendered "bracelet" in the account of Judah's interview with Tamar (Gen. xxxviii, 18, 25; elsewhere rendered "lace," "line," etc.), probably denotes the ornamental cord or soft-chain with which the signet was suspended in the bosom of the wearer. See SIGNET. Men as well as women wore bracelets, as we see from Cant. v, 14, which may be rendered, "His wrists are circles of gold full set with topazes." Layard says of the Assyrian kings, "The arms were encircled by armlets, and the wrists by bracelets, all equally remarkable for the taste and beauty of the design and workmanship. In the centre of the bracelets were stars and rosettes, which were probably inlaid with precious stones" (Nisibis, ii, 323). The ancient ladies of Rome were likewise accustomed to wear bracelets, partly as amulets (q. v.) and partly for ornament; the latter chiefly by women of considerable rank, whose jewels of this kind were often of immense value, being enriched with the most costly gems. Bracelets were also occasionally given among the Romans to soldiers as a reward of extraordinary prowess (see Smith's Dict. of Coins. Ant. s. v. Armilla).

Modern Oriental Bracelets, each half the real size: 1. A side View of a Diamond Bracelet, with a front View of the same; 2. Front and side View of the most fashionable kind of gold Bracelet, formed of a simple Twist; 3. A very common kind of twisted Gold; 4. A Band of Gold.

of such considerable weight and bulk as to appear more like manacles than ornaments. Many are often worn one above the other on the same arm, so as to occupy the greater part of the space between the wrist and the elbow. The materials vary according to the costume of the wearer, but it is safe to say that the rule that bracelets of the same material are better than none. Among the higher classes they are of mother-of-pearl, of fine flexible gold, and of silver, the last being the most common. The poorer women use plated steel, horn, brass, copper, beads, and other materials of a cheap description. Some notion of the size and value of the bracelets used both now and in ancient times may be formed from the fact that those which were presented by Eliezer to Rebekah weighed ten shekels (Gen. xxiv. 22). The bracelets are sometimes flat, but more frequently round or semicircular, except at the point where they open to admit the hand, when they are flattened. They are frequently hollow, giving the show of bulk (which is much desired) without the inconvenience. Bracelets of gold twisted rope-wise are those now most used in Western Asia; but we cannot determine to what extent this fashion may have existed in ancient times. See Attire.

Brackenbury, Robert Cave, an English gentleman of wealth and family, one of the earliest Wesleyan Methodist ministers, was born in Lincolnshire, England, in 1752. After studying at St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge, with the intention of entering the Established Church, he was converted, and joined the Methodist Society. He frequently itinerated in company with Mr. Wesley, who esteemed him highly, and in 1782 was sent as preacher to the Channel Islands. In 1789 he returned to England, and continued his eminently useful ministry in different parts of the country until his death in 1818. See Railly Hall, or Memorial Sketches of Robert Cave Brackenbury, Esq. (Lond. 1850).

Bradburn, Samuel, a distinguished Wesleyan minister, was born at Gibralter, where his father's regiment was stationed, October 5, 1751, and settled at Chester, England. He became a local preacher in 1778, and an itinerant in 1784. He soon became remarkably popular, and was considered one of the first preachers of the land. Adam Clarke says of him, "I have never heard his equal; I can furnish you with no parallel. The full force of his powers, and the extent of his work, have not a man among us that will support any thing like a comparison with him." After a long and pre-eminently popular career, he died on the 24th of July, 1816.—Wesleyan Mag. 1816; Wakeley, Heroes of Methodism, p. 209; Life of Sam. Bradburn, by his daughter (Lond. 1816, 12mo).

Bradburn, Thomas, an English Dissenting minister, was born at Wakefield in 1677, was educated at Leeds, and became pastor in Fetter Lane in 1709. In 1727 he succeeded Daniel Burgers in Carey Street Chapel, and was said to be an imitator of that eminent preacher's style of pulpit eloquence. He died 1759. He wrote The Mystery of Godliness, 61 Sermons on 1 Tim. (2 vols. 12mo. 1730, 2 vols. 8vo.), and the Oratory, or Effect of Decoration Explained (Lond. 1716, 12mo).—Duty and Doctrine of Baptism (Lond. 1749, 8vo)—Sermons (10 vols. 8vo, n. y.).

Bradford, John, an English divine and martyr, was born at Manchester soon after the accession of Henry VIII. He received a good education, and about 1547 began to study in the Temple, intending to pursue the law. In 1548 he proceeded to Cambridge, and entered at Catharine Hall. In 1552 he received the appointment of chaplain to Edward VI. He held this post only a short time, the king's death following soon after. Upon Mary's accession, he, together with all those who espoused the cause of Edmund Grindal, fell into disgrace, and, upon a trumped-up charge of raising a tumult at Paul's Cross, he was committed to the Tower. Here he remained, but not in strict confinement, until 1554, when he was removed to Southwark, and examined before Gardiner, Bonner, and some others. Condemned to death, his life was for some time spared, under the hope that he might be induced to recant. But the rules of the Church did not admit of this, however, he steadfastly refused to listen to, preferring death to a dishonorable profession. He was cruelly burned at Smithfield, July 1, 1555, as a heretic, together with John Lyse. His writings, edited by Townend, have been republished by the "Parker Society" (Camb. 1844, 8vo). See also Stevens, Memoirs of the Life and Ministry of John Bradford (Lond. 1832, 8vo); Burnet, Hist. of Reformation, ii. 379, 438.

Bradford, John M., D.D., was born in Danbury, Conn., May 15, 1781, graduated at Brown University, and studied theology with Rev. Dr. Ashbel Green of Philadelphia. He was pastor of the North Ref. Dutch church at Albany from 1805 to 1820. Dr. Bradford was one of the most eloquent and distinguished pulpit orators of his day. Two sermons are all of his productions now in print, one entitled The Word of Life, and the other The School of the Prophets. They are masterpieces of pulpit eloquence. He died in 1827 at the age of forty-six years.

Bradford, Joseph, the travelling companion of John Wesley, was for 88 years an itinerant Methodist minister, dying at Hull in 1808. He was a man of integrity and personal power, and a very successful preacher. He was honored in 1803 by being chosen president of the British Conference.—Wakeley, Heroes of Methodism, p. 211.

Bradford, Samuel, a divine of the Church of England, was born in 1652, became bishop of Carlisle in 1715, was translated to Rochester in 1728, and died in 1781. He published a work on The Credibility of the Christian Religion (3 vols. 1700, 12mo.—the Boyle Lectures, 1699, 4to; 1703, fol.)—and a number of sermons and also assisted in the publication of the works of Archbishop Tillotson (q. v.).

Bradford, William H., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cooperstown, N. Y., August, 1814. He was educated for the law, but was led to change his purpose; and, having studied divinity at the Theological Seminary, Auburn, he was licensed by the Cayuga Presbytery. His only charge was the church at Berkshire, N. Y., where he remained two years. In 1840 he became connected with the New York Evangelist as assistant, and at times sole editor. This position he held for seventeen years, proving himself an accomplished and able writer, and a most courteous gentleman. He died April 1st, 1861, of heart disease.—Wilson, Presbyterian Almanac, 1862.

Bradish, Luther, president of the American Bible Society, was born at Cumington, Mass., in 1783, graduated at Williams College in 1804, and was shortly afterward admitted to the New York bar. He served as a volunteer in the war of 1812. In 1820 he rendered very efficient aid to the government in the negotiation of the treaty with Turkey. For the purpose of ascertaining information for the government preparatory to this negotiation, he travelled through the greater portion of the dominions of the sultan. Shortly after his return to this country, after an absence of six years, he was honored with a seat in the State Legislature, and again in 1835. In 1838 he was Speaker of the Assembly, and in the same year was chosen lieutenant governor of the state, and again in 1840. In 1842 he was the Whig candidate for governor, but failed of election. During the administration of president Fillmore Mr. Bradish received the appointment of United States assistant treasurer for New York. From that time he took no active part in political life, but devoted his ample leisure to literary and benevolent institutions. In 1844 he was elected

First vice-president of the New York Historical Society, and on the death of Mr. Gallatin in 1849, was elected president. He was chosen vice-president of the American Bible Society in 1847, and succeeded Dr. Burdick in the presidency of that institution on the death of Mr. Fleschhuysen in 1861. He died at Newport on August 20, 1863. He was a prominent member of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Bradley, Joshua, a Baptist minister, was born in Randolph, Mass., July 5, 1778. He joined the Baptist Church in 1790, was graduated at Brown University in 1795, and was ordained pastor of the Second Baptist Church in Newport in 1801. In 1807 he removed to Mansfield, Conn., and two years later opened an academy in Wallingford, in the same state. Mr. Bradley removed in 1818 to Windsor, Vt., and thence in succession to various places in the states of N. Y., Ohio, Penn., Ill., Mo., Ky., Ind., Va., and Minnesota, teaching, preaching, and establishing seminaries, colleges, and churches, which course he continued till his death in 1855, at St. Paul, Minn. Mr. Bradley was the author of two small volumes on "Revivals" and "Free-masonry," besides various pamphlets.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 400.

Bradshaw, William, a distinguished Puritan divine, was born in 1571, became minister to the Manor of Kent, in 1601, and was the leader of Christ Church, London, and died in 1618. His work on English Puri tanism (London, 1605) is valuable as showing the differ ence between the principles of the ancient and modern Nonconformists. He also wrote, besides other works, a Treatise of Justification (London, 1613; in Lat., Loyd, 1616). He died at Christ Church in 1618. In the pulpit he "seemed like one of the old prophets risen again with the commission of God to deplore the desolations of Zion, and to denounce the sin of the people, urging the alternative of penitence or peril. Many mistook this for unnecessary severity. The mistake was in not fully knowing his ambassador of God. They did not see that he forgot that he was anything; that God's honor was to him everything, and that the deep effects of his soul in him rose to indignation that God's honor and claims should be so flagrantly violated."—

Bragdon, Edmund E. E., D.D., was born in Shapleigh, Maine, Dec. 1, 1812. He was educated at the Cazenovia and Wesleyan universities, and at Wesleyan University, where he passed A.B. in 1841. After spending three years in teaching, he entered the itinerant ministry, and was appointed to Wolcott, N.
York. He was successively principal of the Mexico Academy and of the Fulton Academy; pastor of Vest ry Street Church, New York; professor of languages in Ohio University; in Indiana, Asbury University.
He held this latter post from 1864 to 1856, when he was appointed professor of languages in Genesee College, N. Y., which post he held till the day of his death, March 20, 1862. "He was a constant and faithful servant of God. Whether engaged in the regular work of the ministry, or that of an educator, one object only was in view—the salvation of souls.
His preaching and teaching were always to this end, and scores, both of parishioners and pupils, can date their first religious impressions to the faithful dealings of brother Bragdon with their souls, and his earnest pleading with God in their behalf. His death made a vacancy in the college with which he was con nected, and in the Church and Conference, of which he was a most valued member, that cannot be easily fill

Brahm (the absolute, the supreme) is the name of the highest purely spiritual divine essence in the religion of India, of whom the other gods are but ser vants. He is the object of worship, and his image in the trinity—Brahma, the creator; Vishnu, the pre server; and Siva, the destroyer. The Indians glorify him by innumerable surnames, such as Abyagion (creator of the clouds and the seas), Anadi (he who had no beginning), Narayana (mover of the original waters), Parabrama (the endless), Parama (the ineffable), So-aya (Brahm is moved by himself), etc.

Brahma is the first manifestation of Brahman, and represents the creative power which created the world and man, and is the first lawgiver and teacher of the Indians (therefore the author of the Vedas). According to the work of Manu, God's will first created the sky, and then the earth, containing all the elements and gold (Brahmamda), from which Brahm himself was born as Brah. His will broke the shell of the egg, and from it he created all other things, men, spirits, and gods, after which he retired again into identity with Brah. He lived 100 years of 865 days and as many nights, each of 1000 sadhyugams; but every four jugas are equivalent to 4,620,000 human years, consequently his life lasted 315,360,000,000,000 of our years. The destruction and reconstruction of the world are connected with his loss of activity at the end of his period of life and his awakening hereafter. Finally, his death will result in universal destruction, until a new Brahma will be created, who, in his turn shall create another universe. Thus far Brahma has died and come to life again 1001 times. Brahm is his daughter and mate. Brahma is represented with four heads and the same number of arms, each bearing a different symbol, as those of his immortality, omnipotence, and knowledge of past and future. The swan is his constant companion, and his usual steed. His Paradise (Brahmalogha) is on Mount Mountu; here he receives his true followers, and they bathe in the sea of Bhr, whose waters endow them with perpetual youth. It is also the site of the city of Brahma, Brahmastrapatnam, out of the four doors of which flow the streams Sadasam, Sadassen, Patram, and Acagvey. Brahman is also called Attimabho (the good spirit), Bhisheshrik (flower of creation), Kamalasana (sitting under the lotus), Wibhata (father of fate), etc. For a fuller treatment of the subject, see HINDUISM; INDIA.

Brahmins. The sons of Brahma, the divines, are the priests of India, and form the highest caste; they are considered as having sprung from the head of Brahma, and, as such, consider holy, inviolable, and the only ones worthy of fulfilling the priestly offices. Their distinctive marks are the jagnapavan or puja, a shoulder-girdle composed of nine threads long enough to go 10 yards around the neck, and to form a small bunch of hair which is left at the back of the head when shaving it. On the forehead, breast, and arms they wear the holy sign of Siva, $\equiv$, or, in honor of Vishna, the simple sign kuri, $\equiv$, on the forehead. They have two rules; the exterior (Yama) contains five duties: always to speak the truth; not to take the life of any creature; never to steal anything; to observe the most rigorous chastity; not to marry after the death of their wife. The inner rule (Viem) also enjoins five duties: to preserve the utmost inward purity; to aim at inward peace; to live in continual penitence and contemplation of the truths of the Vedas; to know the most of the laws of God, and to make use of that knowledge; continually to think of Siva as the highest god. Their occupations consist in reading and teaching the Vedas, to officiate in the temples, particularly in offering sacrifices, to give alms, to sit in judgment, and to act as physicians. Their decisions are in all cases final, and the punishment known is most severely punishing; the king himself must show them the greatest respect, even when they follow the humblest callings. The life of the Brahmin is divided into four parts: 1st, Brahmacari, or scholar, when the Brahmin, by the application of the puja, is received into the caste. 2dly, Grihastha, when he is appointed priest of a paga and of the private family, or else devotes himself to other occupations, principally to agriculture; in the 3d part he becomes Vanaprashma, from 40 or 50 up to 72. The Brahmin must then leave his home and prepare to the woods, there to live as a hermit, laying aside all comforts or mental enjoyments; he must fast, and wear a dress of bark or of the skin of the black antelope, and let his hair and nails grow without ever cutting them. He takes only the sacred fire with him, and partakes of roots and fruit. From 72 years of age the Brahmin becomes Bhikshu or Sannyasi, and is then to devote himself to the contemplation of God, previous to going back to him after death. He therefore renounces all that belongs to him, and leaves all his goods to his family. His hair is all cut off, his dress consists only of a white cloth, and he receives a brass vessel in which he is to keep some water for the purpose of washing what food he may get; he also receives a stick called dandam, with seven natural knots, to remind him of the seven great saints. He thus lives on alms, batters three times every day, and covers his forehead and breast with ashes; he is in the highest odor of sanctity, and any one who approaches him must respectfully bow before him. After his death, he is buried sitting in a quantity of salt; his head is broken with a coconutt, and his brains distributed among those present. See HINDUISM; INDIA.

Brainerd, David, a celebrated missionary to the Indians, was born at Haddam, Conn., April 20, 1718. From his earliest years he had strong impressions of religion. In 1739 he entered Yale College, where he was distinguished for general propriety and devotion to study. An indiscrict remark that one of the tutors was as "dissolute as the Time chair," led, in 1742, to Brainerd's expulsion. He continued without interruption the study of divinity, and, having been licensed to preach, he received from the Scotch Society for promoting Christian Knowledge an appointment as their missionary to the Indians. In 1743 he labored among a Kamasneek tribe and the Delaware Indians. Receiving ordination in 1744, he settled in Crossweeks, N. J. His Indian interpreter, having been converted, proved a most valuable assistant. Deep impressions were made on his savage hearers, so that it was no uncommon spectacle to see the whole congregation weep. In 4 years, and the consequent death of a year more than seventy-seven Indians were baptized, of whom thirty-eight were adults, and maintained a character for Christian consistency. Leaving this little church under the care of William Tennent, Brainerd repaired, in the summer of 1746, to the Susquehanna tribe of Indians, but his previous labors had so much impaired his health that he was obliged to relinquish his work. In July, 1747, he returned to Northampton, where he found a hospitable asylum in the house of Jonathan Edwards, and died there, October 9, 1747. Such was the brief but active career of Brainerd the missionary. The love of Christ, and a heart full of benevolence for the knowledge and happiness of his breast with the ardor of an unquenchable flame. No opposition could daunt, no difficulties overcome his resolution or exhaust his patience. Obstacles that would have cooled the zeal of any ordinary mind proved no discouragement to him. And perhaps no one in the list of the most devoted missionaries that ever walked the earth knows the Christian life more than Brainerd, and submitted to so severe privations and self-denial as Brainerd. He was a man of great natural powers of mind, an acute and penetrating understanding, a fertile imagination, a retentive memory, and no common powers of easy, artless, persuasive eloquence. A man of great self-denial, he sacrificed himself to God, but the best life is that by Dwight, including Brainerd's Journals (New Haven, 1829).—Sparks, Amer. Biog.
Brainerd, John, brother of David, was born in Haddam, Conn., Feb. 28, 1720, and, like his brother, was brought up in a strictly religious household, and was educated at Yale College. David, before his death, requested John to take his place in New Jersey as missionary to the Indians. Accordingly, he was licensed in 1748 as a preacher by the Presbytery of New York, and entered the missionary service (under the Scottish Society) in New Jersey, in which labor he spent eight years. During this period he was pressed by pecuniary trouble, his salary being too small to provide even the necessities of life. In 1752 he married. An attempt to transfer his Indian flock to Wyoming, on the Susquehanna, failed. In 1754 he was elected a trustee of Princeton College, and the year after the Scotch Society dismissed him, because the Indians, having parted with their lands, would soon be obliged to move. Soon after he received a call as an organized presbytery to a church in the church at Newark, accepted it, again engaged with the Scotch Society for the Indians, was dismissed a second time, in September, 1757, and then finally resolved to accept the call of the congregation at Newark. In the summer of 1759 he was at Crown Point, during the French and Indian war, and succeeded in preserving in that capacity for a short time in 1756. He was moderator of the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, at Philadelphia, in May, 1762. He took charge of the church at Deerfield, N. J., in 1777, after the church at Mount Holly had been burned down by the British. From the time of his settlement at Newark in 1757 until his death, he never lost sight of his poor Indians or their spiritual and temporal welfare, and "his Indians clung to him with affectionate attachment to the last." He died at Deerfield, N. J., March, 1781. —Brainerd, Life of John Brainerd (Phila. 1865).

Brainerd, Thomas, D.D., a divine of the New School Presbyterian Church, was born in 1804, in Weston, New York, and while a child lived near Rome, Oneida County. After graduating at Hamilton College, after a special study of law, he devoted his life to the ministry, and studied theology at the Theological Seminary at Andover, Mass. After graduating, he removed to Philadelphia, and at times preached for the Rev. Dr. Patterson in the First Presbyterian church of the Northern Liberties. Subsequently removing to Cincinnati, Dr. Brainerd became an assistant of the Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher. In addition to these labors, he edited with ability a child's paper, a youths' magazine, the weekly Christian Herald, published at Cincinnati, and the Presbyterian Quarterly Review, in which the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, then a young man, assisted, and thus a mutual friendship was founded on affection and esteem between the two great families of divines. In 1836, Dr. Brainerd, in response to an earnest call from the congregation of the Pine Street Presbyterian church, as successor to the Rev. Dr. E. S. Ely, became their pastor. During his ministerings, for over thirty years, he endeavored himself to the successive generations who worshipped in this time-honored church by his benignant love and devotedness. Dr. Brainerd, while conscientiously fulfilling every demand upon his time, labored industriously and well in contributing to literary monthlies. He published various sermons and tracts. In addition, some months before his death, he was made a member of the brotherhood of David Brainerd, the brother of David Brainerd, and his successor as Missionary to the Indians of New Jersey (Philadelphia, 1865), which was most favorably received. He died suddenly from apoplexy at the house of his son-in-law, in Scranton, Pennsylvania, in August, 1866. Dr. Brainerd was one of the most active and persevering pastors in the Church, and inspired his people with the same spirit. As a platform speaker upon anniversary occasions he was always happy and effective, and as a Christian gentleman he was respected and loved by all with whom he came in contact. He was a member of the committee of conference appointed on the part of the New School Assembly at its meeting in May, 1866, to meet a similar committee from the Old School. —American Presbyterian (newspaper).

Bramble is, in Isa. xxxiv, 13, the rendering of the Heb. חֶתֶל, 'chatel, a thorn in general (rendered elsewhere 'thistle' or 'thorn'), as in Luke vi, 44, it stands for the Greek βιάζω, in the similar sense of any prickly shrub; but in Judg. ix, 14, 15, it represents the term יַזָּקַע, yazak, 'or Christ's thorn, from the tradition that it furnished the thorny crown for our Saviour before his crucifixion), the Eikonos paidaros of Linn, a brier-bush indigenous in Egypt (Cynereus according to Pliny, xiii, 88) and Syria, shooting up from the root in many branches (10 to 15 feet high), armed with spines, and bearing leaves resembling those of the olive, but light-colored and more slender, with little whitish blossoms that eventually produce small, black, bitter berries (see Prosop. Alpin. Flacc. Ep. c. 6). The Arabs still call it yaz (more commonly ayaz), a name that appears to have been in use among the Africans (i.e. Carthaginians), according to Dioscorides (Gloss. i, 119, ποῦρος, Ἀφοι Ἀρακίν). Rauwolf (Trav. p. 460) found it growing at Jerusalem.

Southern Buckthorn (Paliurus aculeatus), or 'Spina Christi.'

It was employed for hedges: the Hebrews used it for fuel (Psa. lxxxvii, 10). In the apologue or fable of Jotham (q. v.), which has always been admired for its spirit and application (Judg. ix, 8-15), and has been considered the oldest allegory of the kind extant, this thorn-bush is the emblem of a tyrant. The word elsewhere occurs only in the name Atad (Gen. i, 10, 11). See generally Celso Hierosol., i, 190 sq.; Speenigel, ed Dioecor., ii, 397; Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Palest. p. cxxxvii; Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v. Paliurus. See THORN.

Bramhall, John, archbishop of Armagh, was born at Pontefract, in Yorkshire, in 1598, and studied at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where he passed A.B. 1612, and A. M. 1616. In the same year he was presented to a living in York. In 1623 he held two disquisitions with a Romish priest and a Jesuit at Northallerton, in which he obtained so unquestionable a victory that archbishop Matthews, having heard it, called him to his side, and made him his chaplain, adding to that other ecclesiastical preferments. While in this situation he became known to Sir Thomas Wentworth (afterward Earl of Strafford), deputy of Ireland, who induced him, in 1638, to go over into Ireland to be his chaplain, deeming him well fitted to assist him in his schemes for the restoration and improvement of the Church in that country. In 1634 he was raised to the see of Lomond, which he greatly improved, so great was even to double the yearly profits of the bishopric. He likewise did great service to the Irish Church by his exertions to get such improvisations as remained in the crown, vested by Charles I on the several incumbents, after the expiration of the leases, as well by his vast purchases of appropriate manors with his own funds by remittances from England. About the same time he was mainly instrumental in obtaining the reception by the Irish clergy of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Synod of London, A.D. 1652. He also chiefly compiled a book of canons for the Church of Ireland. Bishop Bramhall was not, however, left undisturbed to pursue his labors, and was soon involved in the troubles of the kingdom. On the 4th of March, 1640–41, articles of impeachment were exhibited against him in the Irish House of Lords, to answer which, reckless of the cautious advice of his friends, who dissuaded him from it, he repaired to Dublin, and was there made a chosen prisoner, which he greatly improved, so far as even to double the yearly profits of the bishopric. The controversy between Bramhall and Hobbes took its rise from a conversation that passed between them at an accidental meeting, in 1645, at the house of the Marquis of Newcastle in Paris. It appears that the bishop subsequently committed his thoughts upon the subject to writing, and transmitted his 'discourse' through the marquis to Hobbes. This called forth an answer from the latter, in a letter addressed to the marquis (dated Rouen, Aug. 20, 1645), to be communicated 'only to my lord bishop,' to which Bramhall replied in a second paper, not, however, until the middle of the following year. The controversy rested for more than eight years, having been hitherto carried on with perfect courtesy on both sides. In 1654, however, a friend of Hobbes procured without his knowledge a copy of his letter, and published it in London with Hobbes's name, but with the omission of the date. In 1655 for 1645; upon which Bramhall, finding himself thus deceived, published an answer the next year by the publication of the Defence, etc. (London. 1655, 8vo), consisting of his own original 'discourse,' of Hobbes's answer, and of his own reply, printed sentence by sentence, with a dedication to the Marquis of Newcastle, and an advertisement to the reader explaining the circumstances under which it was published. His works were collected in one vol. fol., and published at Dublin in 1676, again in 1677, and lately at Oxford in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology (Oxford, 1842–45, 5 vols. 8vo). They are distributed into four volumes, viz.: 1. Discourses against the Romanists; 2. His Writings against the Anglican Sectaries; 3. His Writings against Mr. Hobbes; 4. Miscellanies. A sketch of his life, with a list of his writings, is given in vol. i. of the late Oxford edition of his works. Jeremy Taylor, in his funeral sermon on Bishop Bramhall, says of him: 'To sum up all, he was a wise prelate, a learned doctor, a just man, a true friend, a great reformer, and a great supporter of our English Reformed Church, and sufficiently distinguished among them to be selected as a deputy and secretary to the Assembly of the Church of England, and to embrace the Roman Catholic religion: with the said Millietière's epistle prefixed.' This was first published at the Hague in 1654, 12mo, but not by the author. It was occasioned by the fact that the Romanists endeavored to persuade King Charles II, during his exile, to expect his restoration by embracing their religion, and for that purpose employed Millietière, councillor in ordinary to the king of France, to write him this epistle. We may here mention that Théophile Brachet, Sieur de la Millietière, was originally a French Protestant, converted to the French Reformed Church, and sufficiently distinguished among them to be selected as a deputy and secretary to the Assembly of the Church of England in 1621. He entered subsequently into the plans of Cardinal Richelieu for the union of the Roman Catholic and Reformed churches in France; published a great number of letters, pamphlets, and treatises upon the doctrines in dispute between them, assimilating gradually to the Roman Catholic tenets; was suspended in consequence by the Synod of Alençon in 1637, and expelled by that of Charenton in 1645 from the Reformed communion; and finally became a Roman Catholic, although he might retain his former religion. He was a vain and shallow man, full of himself, and persuaded that nothing approached to his own merit and capacity; and, after his change of religion, was perpetually playing the missionary and seeking conferences, although he was always handled in them with a severity sufficient to have dampened his courage, had he not been endowed with a pertinacity which nothing could conquer (Benol, Hist. de l'Édit de Nantes, tom. ii, liv. x, p. 514–516). The work to which Bramhall replied seems fully to bear out the truth of this sketch of his character' (Hook). In June, 1660, we find him again in London; and in January, 1660–61, he was translated to the see of Armagh, which after his consecration in one day two archbishops and ten bishops. As archbishop, he exerted all his powers for the good and welfare of the Church. A little be-dation of working-people; he became a class-leader, and by his instrumentality such a religious interest was excited in Preston that the Methodist Society was quickly doubled. He entered upon the Itinerant ministry in 1785, and in the following year was recognised by the Conference. For thirty years he then labored as a Methodist preacher, and was a "revivalist" in the best sense of the word. It is said that few men, perhaps no man of his day, gathered more converts into the communion of Methodism. In 1791 he was the instrument of a widespread revival in Dewsbury circuit, which followed him, 1792, to Bristol circuit, where about 500 souls were added to the societies. He labored with similar success on the other circuits to which he was successively appointed, reporting at almost every conference additions to the societies of not merely 50, but hundreds. He died, suddenly, while attending the Conference at Leeds in 1818. "The records of Methodism are crowded with examples of saintly living, but from among them all no instance of profound piety can be cited than that of William Bramwell. His energy was tireless, his understanding of the language of Christ surpassing, his voice and actions, and his voice singularly musical, his command over the passions of his hearers absolute. He was ascetic: an early riser for study and prayer; reading some, studying more, and praying most. He acquired a knowledge of the Greek and the French, and translated from the one into the other. Of the sacred furniture a bundle of twigs, called bawm in the old Persian language, which they hold in their hands while praying. Michaelis says that they held it before the face, opposite to the holy fire. Spencer also observes that the heathen, in the worship of their deities, held forth the branches of a fir tree which were dedicated to them. An abominable branch (Isa. xiv, 10) means a tree on which a malefactor has been hanged. In Ezek. xxvii, 3, Jehoiachim is called the highest branch of the cedar, as being a king. Branches are mentioned in many other places in Scripture; in some cases as symbols of prosperity, in others of adversity (Gen. xlix, 22; Job xv, 13; Isa. xi, 11, 15; Isa. xxv, 5; Ezek. xvii, 6). See BOUG.

Brand, in Zech. iii, 2, "wash, a wooden poker for stirring the fire, hence a burnt piece of wood or fire-branch (as rendered elsewhere, Isa. vii, 4; Amos iv, 11); in Judg. xv, 4 (ver. 5 "fire-branch"), a lamp or torch, as elsewhere rendered. On the practice of branding slaves (Rev. xiii, 10), see MARK.

Brandenburg, Confession of, a formulary or confession of faith, drawn up in the city of Brandenburg by order of the elector, with a view to reconcile the tenets of the Church of Sweden with those of the Elector, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the Confession of Augsburg. See AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

Brandenb, a term used by ecclesiastical writers of the Middle Ages to signify the covering, of silk or linen, in which the bodies of the saints or their relics were wrapped. The name was also applied to linen clothes which had been simply laid on the bodies. Before the time of Gregory the Great (A.D. 600) it was the custom to give away no part of the relics of the saints, but simply to send in a case a portion of one of these Brandenb or Corporals.—Berger, s. v. Brelage; Landon, Eccles. Dict. ii, 385.

Brant, the name of a family in Holland eminent for learning and piety. They were all Arminians, and have contributed greatly to our knowledge of the Arminian and Remonstrant controversy.

2. Gerard, Professor of Divinity, was born at Amsterdam in 1610. After a thorough educational training, he became pastor of the Remonstrant church in Nienkoo; in 1660 he removed to Hoorn, and to Amterdam 1667. Here he continued in pastoral and literary labors till his death, Dec. 11, 1685. His great work is the Hist. der Reformatiue in Onontent der Nieder-landen (Rot. 1672-1704), of which the last two volumes were edited by J. Brandt. It was translated into English by Chamberlayne, History of the Re-formations in the Low Countries (Lond. 1720-23, 4 vols. fol.); abridged in French (Amst. 1730, 3 vols. 12mo).
He published also a Life of Barabœus, a Life of De Ruyder, etc. His Reformation is a magazine of facts, and the candor and truthfulness of the book, as well as its value, are now generally acknowledged.—Winer, Theol. Literatur., i., 824; Haas, Life of Brentano (in Dutch, 1708), with a new introduction and bibliographical promenades.

3. Caspar, son of Gerard, was born in Rotterdam June 25, 1653. After a careful training under his father and at the university, he became pastor of the Remonstrant church at Amsterdam, where he died Oct. 5, 1696. He wrote Hist. Vita Jac. Arminiani (Amst. 1724, 8vo), enlarged and corrected by Moenne (Brussel. 1789, 8vo), and translated by Guthrie, Life of Arminius (London, 1684, 18mo); Hist. e. h. Loeven d. Hag. De Groot (Groönia), (Dort, 1732, 2d ed., 2 vols. 8vo).—Winer, Theol. Lit. i., 765, 862.

4. John, youngest son of Gerard, was born at Nien-koop 1660, and was successively minister at Hoorn, the Hague, and Amsterdam, and died 1706. He wrote Vita S. Pauli (4to), and edited the Epistola Protestantiora Fivorum (Amst. 1684), which throws great light on the history of Arminianism.

5. Gerard, son of Caspar, minister at Amsterdam, edited the Vita Arminiani written by his father and published in 1724.

Brantly, William Theophilus, D.D., a distinguished Baptist minister, was born in Chatham Co., N.C., Jan. 28, 1807, and graduated at the University of South Carolina in 1828. After some time spent in teaching at Augusta, Ga., he became in 1811 pastor of the Baptist Church at Beaufort, S.C. In 1819 he returned to Augusta, and established a Baptist Church there. In 1826 he was called to the First Baptist Church in Philadelphia, where he labored till his health compelled him to resign in 1836, when he settled as pastor at Charleston, S.C., also accepting the presidency of the college at that place. In 1844 he was attacked by paralysis, but lingered till March 28, 1845, when he died, after having been removed to Augusta. Mr. Brantly received the degree of D.D. from Brown University in 1831. He was the author of a volume of sermons published in 1837.—Sprague, Annals, vi, 497; Funeral Sermon by Dr. Fuller, Christian Review, x, 591.

Brass occurs in the Auth. Ver. as the rendering of כְּפֶלָה (k e f e l a h ) (i.e. the shining), and other kindred forms, but doubtless inaccurately, as brass is a factitious metal, and the Hebrews were not acquainted with the compound of copper and zinc known by that name. In most places of the O. T. the correct translation would be copper, though it may sometimes possibly mean bronze (γάλαξιν εσθηρούμος), a compound of copper and tin, as in the Chaldee form (כְּפֶלָה, n e c h a k h a c h ) used by Daniel. Indeed, a simple metal was obviously intended, as we see from Deut. viii, 9, "out of whose hills thou mayst dig brass;" and Job xxxviii, 2, "Brass is molten out of the stone;" and Deut. xxxiii, 22, "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass," which seems to be a promise to Asher should he have a district rich in mines, which we know to have been the case, since Eusebius (viii, 15, 17) speaks of the Christians being condemned to work in them (ροις καρδι θαυμ τις Παλαιστίνης χαλκοε μετάλλων, Lightfoot, Cent. Chorog. c. 99). Such a alloy as bronze is probably also the metal denoted in the N. T. by χαλκός, as was used for coin, the είς of the Romans. The "fine brass" of Rev. i, 15; ii, 18, however, is χαλκολίβανος, the chalchol (χαλκός) of the Hebrews, a brilliant compound, probably of gold and silver, like the famous "Corinthian brass." See Amber.

Copper was known at a very early period, and the invention of working it is attributed to Thubal-Cain (Gen. iv. 24; comp. Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., iii, 248; comp. "Flia seria erat quam ferri cognitum usus." Lucr. v. 1292). Its extreme ductility (χαλκός) made its application almost universal among the ancients (see Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Σήμι). See Copper.

The word is used for money in both Testaments (Ezek. xvi, 86; Matt. x, 9, etc.). See Coin.

Brass (to render the word) is in Scripture the symbol of insolubility, baseness, and presumption or obstinacy in sin (Isa. lxxiv, 4; Jer. vi, 28; Ezek. xxii, 18). It is often used in metaphors, e. g. Lev. xxxvi, 9, "I will make your heaven as iron and your earth as brass," i.e. dead and hard. This expression is reversed in Deut. xxviii, 28 (comp. Coleridge's "All in a hot and copper sky," etc., Anc. Mar.). "Is my flesh of brass," i.e. invulnerable, Job vi, 12. Brass is also a symbol of strength (Ps. cvi, 16; Isa. lxxiv, 4; Mic. iv, 18; Zech. vi, 1, etc.). So in Jer. i, 18, and xv, 24, brasses signify a strong and lasting adversary or opponent. The description of the Macedonian empire as a kingdom of brass (Dan. ii, 38) will be better understood when we recollect that the arms of ancient times were mostly of bronze; hence the figure forcibly indicates the warlike character of that kingdom. Hence the "brazen thighs" of the mystic image. Nebuchadnezzar's dream were a fit description of the "brazen-coated Greeks" ("Αγαμνον ιεροχρήτων, as Homer usually styles them). The mountains of brass, in Zech. vi, 1, are understood by Vitringa to denote those firm and immutable decrees by which God governs the world, and it is difficult to affix any other meaning to this passage. Braunius, John, D.D, professor of theology and Hebrew in the University of Groningen, was born at Kaiserslautern 1628, died at Groningen 1709. His works discover an extensive and accurate knowledge of Jewish rites and customs, and great rabbinical learning. Little notice is given in the story he followed were his five books on the "Times of the Jews," a work on the ancient Jewish historian, and two other works on the "Times of the Jews," a work on the ancient Jewish historian, and two other works on the "Times of the Jews," a work on the ancient Jewish historian, and two other works on the "Times of the Jews," a work on the ancient Jewish historian, and two other works on the unknown. Bravery, a term used in the Auth. Ver., only in its early sense of finery for the Heb. נֶפֶפָה, tipe reticule. Female ornament, Isa. iii, 18. So in the Apocalypse (Judith x, 4) "decked herself bravely" stands for ἄρωμα as a rendering of ἀρωμάτωρα, presented a fine appearance.

Bray, signifying in Old English to pound, stands in the Auth. Ver. as Prov. xxvii, 22, for לְחַלָּה, n e c h a k h a c h , to beat to pieces in a mortar (q. v.). This punishment is still in use among Oriental nations. Roberts observes, "Crue as it is, this is a punishment of the state; the poor victim is thrust into the mortar, and beaten with the pestle. The late King of Kandy compelled one of the wives of his rebellious chief to beat her own infant to death. Hence the saying, 'Though you beat that loose woman in a mortar, she will not leave her ways;' which means, though you
BRAZEN SERPENT

The author of the text is discussing the brazen serpent, a biblical object that was a representation of a bronze serpent. The passage provides a detailed description of the physical characteristics of the brazen serpent, including its dimensions and uses in religious and historical contexts. The text also includes references to other biblical passages and historical events related to the serpent. The author uses a formal and scholarly tone, providing extensive background information and citations to support their arguments. The text is written in a style that is typical of academic writing, with clear and concise language. The overall theme of the passage is the historical and religious significance of the brazen serpent in the context of biblical stories.

(comp. Wisd. xvi, 7) as the result of a lively faith in Jehovah on the part of the beholders (see Onkelos, the Targuma, Jerome, and the rabbinis, in the younger Buxtorf's Hist. serpentum en. v, 5, in his Exercit. p. 456 sq.), while others of them regard this serpent-form as a talisman which Moses was enabled to prepare, from his knowledge of astrology (see Rabbi Sam. Zira in Deuling's Observatu. ii, p. 210). From the notice in the Gospel (John iii, 14), most Christian interpreters have rightly inferred that the "brazen serpent" was intended as a type of Christ as the Redeemer of the world (see Menken, Ueb. die echere Schlangen, Brem. 1812; Kerns, in Bengal's Archiv, v, 77 sq., 360 sq., 598 sq.). For various futile attempts to explain this miracle on natural principles, see Bauer, Hebr. Gesch. ii, 329; also Ausfähr. Erklär. der Wunder des A. T. i, 229; Paulus, Comment. IV, i, 198 sq.; Hoffmann, in Schott's Schriften, i, 568 sq. See Moses.

Parallels or more or less complete have been traced between the brazen serpent and similar ideas among other nations, which, although not strictly illustrative of the Biblical narrative, are yet interesting, as showing that the fact was not at variance with the notions of antiquity. From 2 Kings xviii, 4, it would seem to have been found naturally looked upon by the forefathers of the Jews themselves as a symbol of curative power (comp. Ewald, Jr. Gesch. ii, 177); as among the ancients the figure of a serpent appears to have been derived from the East as a type of Esculapius, i.e. health (Macrob. Sat. i, 20; see Juncker, in Meusel's Museum, i, 127 sq.; Müller, Ireland, p. 597). In the Egyptian theology the (innocuous) serpent was early an emblem of sanitary virtue; such were worshipped in the Thebaid (Herod. ii, 74), and they appear on the monumental delineations in various connections, sometimes with the beneficent Isis, sometimes ingraven upon the figure of Serapis (as a benign deity) (Creuzer, Symbolik, i, 185). I. Church History.—In 1500 Brazil was taken possession of by a Portuguese admiral, who was soon followed by a Franciscan monk, among whom were however, killed by the Indian tribes. In 1549 the first Jesuits came to Brazil, who succeeded in establishing a large number of missions. The most celebrated among them were Anchieta (q. v.) and Vieira (q. v.). The Inquisition never gained a firm footing in Brazil. In the eighteenth century, the Jesuits found many adherents, and even among the clergy a party was formed, led by Father Peiso, which demanded the abolition of celibacy and other religious reforms. The government nominated a member of this party, Dr. Moura, for the bishopric of Rio de Janeiro, but the pope refused to confirm the appointment, and, as the time was sustained by the Brazilian Chambers, the government had to yield. Of late years the Roman party has gained in strength, and several Roman Catholic (ultramontane) newspapers have been printed. Still a majority of the Brazilian papers are liberal, and oppose all extreme ultramontane views.

The first Protestants settled in Brazil in the 16th and the beginning of the 17th century, while a part of the country was under the rule of the French and the Dutch, but after the re-establishment of the Portuguese dominion (1641) Protestantism was entirely exterminated. From that time until 1806 Protestants were forbidden to settle in Brazil. They then received the liberty to build churches, but only on condition of making no procelytes. Greater rights were conceded to the German and Swiss emigrants, who were invited and encouraged by the government to settle in the agricultural districts. The government promised to pay to the Protestant clergymen and teachers a salary, and to establish a Supreme Consistory at Rio. The number of the Protestant immigrants is already considerable—the whole immigration amounted in 1858 to about 30,000 souls in 44 colonies—and forms, next to the British and Dutch possessions in Guiana, the largest nucleus of a native Protestant population in South America.

II. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The area of Brazil is about 4,000,000 square miles; its population in 1856 amounted to 7,677,800, of which only 29 per cent. are of European descent. The entire native population, except the free Indians (about 4 per cent. of the total population), belong to the Roman Catholic Church, which has one archbishop, viz. of Bahia, and 11 bishops, viz. of Ceara, Cuybas, Diamantes, Goyas, Maranho, Minas, Para, Pernambuco, S. Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, and Rio Grande do Sul. The Church has no property of her own, but bishops and priests are paid by the state. The number of priests is very small, and all the bishops complain of the difficulty of finding a sufficient number of suitable candidates. The number of convents is limited. There are eleven theological seminaries, and the erection of two theological faculties has been resolved upon. The ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the bishops, which was formerly very extensive, is now (since 1834) very limited.

The English congregation in Rio dates with the century, and numbers 4000 to 5000. There are English congregations at Bahia and Pernambuco. The German Protestants in Rio in 1863 had a school, and numbered about 2500 members. The largest Protestant congregation is in San Leopoldo, which has 12,000 (German) members, under the leadership of the Protestant ministers. The O. S. Presb. Church occupies an important position. The English Congregational Church, organized in 1855, at stations in San Paulo and Rio Clara. In Dec., 1863, the members of the mission formed the "Presbytery of Rio de Janeiro," which in Sept., 1866, was connected with the Synod of Baltimore. Altogether, in 1863, Brazil had 24 Protestant clergymen (3 English, 5 American, and 12 German) in 26 congregations (3 English, 5 American, and 17 German). Bread (Γρατί, le chem; ἄφρος), a word of far more extensive meaning than the Hebrews at least present with us. There are passages in which it appears to be applied to all kinds of viands (Luke xi, 3), but it more generally denotes all kinds of baked and pastry articles of food. It is also used, however, in the more limited sense of bread made from wheat or barley, for rye is little cultivated in the East. The preparation of bread as an article of food dates from a very early period: it must not, however, be inferred from the use of terms that the first time was known at the time of the fall, the word there occurring in its general sense of food: the earliest undoubted instance of its use is found in Gen. xviii, 6.

1. Materials.—The corn or grain (ἄλη, ἀλή, ἀλών, ἄλων, ἄλων) employed was of various sorts: the best bread was made of wheat, which, after being ground, produced the "flour" or "meal" (ἄλη, ἄλη, ἀλυρος; Judg. vi, 19; 1 Sam. i, 24; 1 Kings iv, 22; xxvii, 12, 14), and when sifted the "fine flour" (ἀλος, sooth, more fully ἄλος, ἄλος, ἄλος, ἄλος, Exod. xxix, 2; or παράρος, Gen. xviii, 6; ἐπιπαυλάδ) usually employed in the sacred offerings (Exod. xxix, 40; Lev. ii, 1; Exod. xxxix, 33; xxv, 16; xxii, 22; 2 Kings vii, 1; Exod. xvi, 18, 19; Rev. xviii, 19). "Barley" was used only by the very poor (John vi, 34).
9, 15), or in times of scarcity (Ruth iii, 15, compared with i, 1; 2 Kings iv, 38, 42; Rev. vi, 6; Joseph. War, v, 10, 2); as it was the food of horses (1 Kings iv, 29). It was considered a symbol of wealth and ingenuity (significant (Judg. vii, 13; comp. Joseph. Ant. xvi, 7, 6, 4; and liv. xvi, 13), as well as what of was a mere animal character, and hence ordered for the offering of Jealousy (Num. v, 15; comp. Hos. iii, 2; Philo, ii, 387). "Spelt" (αληθης or ολυπηθης, αληθης or ολυπηθης, ζογα; A. V. γεγενηθης, γεγενηθης) was also used both in Egypt (Exod. xvi, 28 and Palestine (Isa. xxii, 25; Exod. iv, 9; 1 Kings xix, 6; Sept. ιεωποιαθης or ιεωπαθης) Herodotus indeed states (i, 66) that in the former country bread was made exclusively of ollyra, which, as in the Sept., he identifies with ζαρ; but in this he was mistaken, as wheat was also used (Exod. i, 32; comp. Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii, 327). Occasionally the grains above mentioned were mixed, and other ingrediets, such as beans, lentils, and millet, were added (Exod. iv, 9; comp. 2 Sam. xvii, 28); the bread so produced is called "barkley cakes" (Exek. iv, 12; A. V. "as barkley cakes"), insomuch as barkley was the main ingredient. The amount of meal required for a single baking was of a pound of meal and three measures of water (Gen. 15, 19; Judg. vi, 19; 1 Sam. i, 24; Matt. xii, 33), which appears to have been the smallest size of the ordinary oven. Grass is molded daily in the East. See MILL.

2. Preparation.—After the wheat flour is taken from the hand-mill, it is made into a dough or paste in a small wooden trough. See Kneading-Trough. The process of making bread was as follows: the flour was first mixed with water, or perhaps milk (Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, i, 58); it was then kneaded (τοισιν) with the hands (in Egypt with the feet also; Herod. ii, 30; Wilkinson, ii, 386) in a small wooden bowl or "kneading-trough" (πινακιαν, μικρην, a term which may, however, rather refer to the leathern bag in which the Bedouins carry their provisions, and which served both as a wallet and a table; Niebuhr's Voyages, i, 171; Harmer, iv, 269, the Sept. translates this view, giving λευκοταλαιπωρα [A. V. "store"] in Deut. xxviii, 5, 17; the expression in Exod. xii, 34, however, "bound up in their clothes," favors the idea of a wooden bowl), until it became dough (πιστανεται, ςτοιλη, Exod. xii, 34, 39; 2 Sam. xiii, 8; Jer. vii, 18; Hos. vi, 4; the term "dough" is improperly given in the A. V. for πισταιναι, grata, in Num. xvi, 20, 21; Neh. x, 5; Ezek. xlv, 80). When the kneading was completed, leaven (σημερον or ζωμα) was generally added; but when the time for preparation was short, it was omitted, and unleavened cakes, hastily baked, were eaten, as is still the prevalent custom among the Bedouins (Gen. xviii, 6; xix, 3; Exod. xii, 39; Judg. vi, 19; 1 Sam. xxviii, 24). See LEAVEN.

Such cakes were termed (πιστανεται, ματασεκθηθαν) (Sept. αστανηθα) a word of double sense, variously supposed to convey the ideas of thinness (First, Lex. s. v., sweetness (Genan. Theeou, p. 816), or purity (Knobel, Comm. in Exod. xii, 20), while leavened bread was called (τοισιν, χαμητας) (lit. sharpened or sharpened (Exod. xii, 39; Hos. vii, 4). Unleavened cakes were ordered to be burnt at the Passover to commemorate the baseness of the departure (Exod. xii, 15; xiii, 3; Deut. xvi, 8), as well as on other sacred occasions (Lev. ii, 10; vi, 15; Num. vi, 15). The leavened mass was allowed to stand for some time (Matt. xii, 33; Luke xii, 21), sometimes for a whole day (Matt. xiv, 23). The night before, leaven, (Hos. vi, 6), exposed to a moderate heat, was allowed to ferment ("he ceased from stirring" (Hos. vii, 4). The dough was then divided into round cakes (πισταιναι, τσαρας, lit. circles of bread; ἀποστολή; A. V. "loaves") Exod. xxix, 23; Judg. viii, 5; 1

Sam. x, 8; Prov. vi, 26; in Judg. vii, 13, ἀποστολή; παίκη) not unlike flat stones in shape and appearance (Matt. vii, 9; comp. iv, 8), about a span in diameter and a finger's breadth in thickness (comp. Lane's Modern Greek Lexicon, i, 164): three of these were required for the meal of a single person (Luke xi, 3), and consequently one was barely sufficient to sustain life (1 Sam. ii, 86, A. V. "morsel"); Jer. xxxvii, 21, A. V. "piece"); whence the expression γαμήλιον, "bread of affliction" (1 Kings xxii, 27; Isa. xxxix, 20), referring not to the quality (ἡ ποταμία, Grotius), but to the quantity; two hundred would suffice for a party for a reasonable time (1 Sam. xvi, 18; 2 Sam. xvi, 1). The cakes were sometimes punctured, and hence called κακυλάξ (κακυλαξ, κακυλαξ); Exod. xxix, 2, 23; Lev. ii, 4; vi, 26; xxiv, 26, 11; Nu. vi, 20; 2 Sam. vi, 16), and mingled with oil. Similar cakes, sprinkled with seeds, were made in Egypt (Wilkinson, i, 386). Sometimes they were rolled out into wafers (πισταιναι, ῥαβδον, ὁ λατος; Lightowen); Exod. xxix, 2, 23; Lev. ii, 4; Nu. vi, 15-19; and merely coated with oil. Oil was occasionally added to the ordinary cake (1 Kings xvii, 12). A more delicate kind of cake is described in 2 Sam. xii, 6, 8, 10; the dough (A. V. "flour") is kneaded a second time, and probably from 4 to 5 a., as seems to be implied in the name γαμήλιον, λευκοθος, q. d. dough-nuts (from τους, to be fat, kindred with λαχανικον, heart; compare our expression herry Food; Sept. ολοκλεισας; Vulg. sorbitiscaule). (See below.)

Leaves of Bread found at Pompeii.

3. Baking.—The cakes were now taken to the oven; having been first, according to the practice in Egypt, gathered into "white baskets" (Gen. xi, 16), ἀποστολας, κακυλας, a doubtful expression, derived by some to the whiteness of the bread (Sept. κακυλας χωροςαν; Aquil. κωροςαν γαροσαν; Vulg. conisura farinae), by others, as in the A. V., to the whiteness of the baskets, and again, by connecting the word γαμήλιον with the idea of a hole, to an open-work basket (margin, A. V.), or, lastly, to bread baked in a hole. The baskets were placed on a tray and carried on the baker's head (Gen. xi, 16; Herod. ii, 33; Wilkinson, ii, 386). See BASKET.

The baking was done in primitive times by the mistress of the house (Gen. xviii, 6) or one of the daughters (2 Sam. xiii, 6); female servants were, however, employed in large households (1 Sam. viii, 10); it appears always to have been the proper business of women in a family (Jer. vii, 18; xiv, 19; Matt. xxii, 33; comp. Plin. xvi, 11, 28). Baking, as a profession, was carried on by men (Hos. vii, 4, 6). In Jerusalem the bakers congregated in one quarter of the town, as we may infer from the name "bakers' street" (Jer. xxviii, 11), and "a tower of the ovens" (Neh. iii, 11; xii, 38; A. V. "furnaces"). In the time of the Herods, bakers were scattered throughout the towns of Palestine (Joseph. Ant. xv, 9, 2). As the bread was made in thin cakes, which soon became dry and unpalatable, it was usual to bake daily, or when required (Gen. xviii, 6; comp. Harmer's Observations, i, 483): reference is perhaps made to this in the Lord's prayer (Matt. vi. 11; Luke xi. 8). The bread taken by persons on a journey (Gen. xiv. 28; Josh. ix. 12) was probably a kind of biscuit. See BAKE.

The methods of baking (πάσης οἰκίας) were, and still are, very various in the East, adapted to the various styles of life. In the towns, where professional bakers resided, there were no doubt fixed ovens, in shape and style differing according to those in using themselves; but more usually each household possessed a portable oven (τησσεράκης; εἰλαμπροῖς), consisting of a stone or metal jar about three feet high, which was heated inwardly with wood (1 Kings xviii. 12; Isa. xxii. 15; Jer. vii. 18) or dried grass and flower-stalks (φυτροποιήματα, Matt. vi. 30); when the fire had burned down, the cakes were applied either inwardly (Herod. ii. 82) or outwardly; such ovens were used by the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii. 386), and by the Easterners of Jerome's time (Comment, in Lam. v. 10), and are still common among the Bedouins (Wellstel's Travels, i. 350; Niebuhr's Descript. de l'Arabie, p. 45, 46). The use of a single oven by several families only took place in time of famine (Lev. xxvi. 20). Another species of oven consisted of a hollow dug in the ground, the sides of which were coated with clay and the bottom with pebbles (Hamer, i. 487). Jahn (Archad. i. 9, § 140) thinks that this oven is referred to in the term ἔσπερος, kira γίμ (Lev. vi. 35); but the dual number is an objection to this view; the term "איב (Gen. xi. 16) has also been referred to it. See OVEN.

Other modes of baking were specially adapted to the migratory habits of the pastoral Jews, as of the modern Bedouins; the cakes were either spread upon stones, which were previously heated by lighting a fire above them (Burckhardt's Notes, i. 58) or beneath them (Belzoni's Travels, p. 84); or they were thrown into the heated embers of the fire itself (Wellstel's Travels, i. 350; Niebuhr, Descript. p. 40); or, lastly, they were roasted by being placed between layers of dung, which burns slowly, and is therefore specially adapted for the purpose (Ezra iv. 12, 15; Burckhardt's Notes, i. 57; Niebuhr's Descript. p. 46). The terms by which such cakes were described were πόκα, ugaθ (Gen. xviii. 6; Exod. xii. 59; 1 Kings xviii. 13; Ezra iv. 12; Ios. vii. 8), πόκα, μούδι (1 Kings xvi. 12; Ps. xxxv. 16), or more fully πόκα μούδι, ugaθ retsapkin (1 Kings xix, 6, lit. on the stones, "coals," A. V.), the term πόκα referring, however, not to the mode of baking, but to the rounded shape of the cake (Genen. Thesaurus, p. 997): the equivalent terms in the Sept. ἅγιακας, and in the Vulg. subcinerius pans, have direct reference to the peculiar mode of baking. The cakes required to be carefully turned during the process (Hos. vii. 8; Harmer, i. 488). Other methods were used for other kinds of bread; some were baked on a pan ( senators; zartago: the Greek term survives in the tijen of the Bedouins), the result being similar to the khubs still used among the latter people (Burckhardt's Notes, i. 58), or like the Greek τρυπτόμενα, which were baked in oil, and eaten warm with honey (Athen. xiv, 55, p. 64); such cakes appeared to have been chiefly used as sacred offerings (Lev. ii. 5, vi. 14, vii. 9, 1 Chron. xxiii. 29). A similar cooking utensil was used by Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 9, μέγας; τρυπτόμενα), in which she baked the cakes and then emptied them out in a heap ( γάτα, not "poured," as if it had been broth) before Ammon. A different kind of bread, probably resembling the fība of the Bedouins, a pasty substance (Burckhardt's Notes, i. 57), was prepared in a saucepan ( γάτα; ἑλειο�ν; croutaculæ A. V.), yoppom; none of the fragments, however, are connected with the etymological sense of the word, which is connected with boiling); this was also preserved for sacred offerings (Lev. ii. 7, 9). As the above-mentioned kinds of bread (the last excepted) were thin and crisp, the mode of eating them was by breaking (Lev. ii. 6; 1sa. xvi. 7; Lam. iv. 4; Matt. xiv. 19; xv. 38, xxxvi. 26; Acts xx. 11; comp. Xen. Hell. vii. 5, 9, 25, ὕποποικία εἰσκαλά, whereas the term ἐποίησεν ὕποποικίαν "goes of bread (Jer. xvi. 7); the pieces broken for consumption were called ἁλεμματα (Matt. xiv. 20, John vi. 12). Old bread is described in Josh. ix. 5, 12, as crumbled (ἀκολοθίαν, κινδυνώμα, Aquil. i. ἀκολοθίαν, in juvete commutation: A. V. "moldy," following the Sept. εὐφυπολογος και βιδομυον, a term which is also applied (1 Kings xii, 4) to a kind of biscuit, which easily crumbled (εὐφυπολογος: A. V. "cracknels").—Smith, s. v. See CAKE.

4. The bread of the Lord's Supper: the term "bread."—As the Hebrews generally made their bread very thin, and in the form of little flat cakes (especially their unleavened bread), they did not cut it with a knife, but broke it, which gave rise to that expression so usual in Scripture of breaking bread, to signify eating, sitting down to table, taking a repast (Lam. iv. 4; Matt. xiv. 19; xv. 36). In the institution of the Lord's Supper Saviour broke the bread: whence to break bread, and breaking of bread, in the New Testament, are used sometimes for the celebration of the Eucharist (Matt. xxvii. 30), and also the celebration of the eucharist, or love-feast (Acts ii. 12, 47). See below.

"Cassetta" is the bread "upon the waters" (Ecc. xi, 1), may allude to the custom practised in some countries of sewing bread-corn or rice upon a soft well irrigated, or, as some think, against the rainy season: or, in a figurative sense, it may be an exhortation to disinterested liberality, with a promise of receiving its due recompense.

The figurative expressions "bread of sorrows" (Ps. cxxii, 2) and "bread of tears" (Ps. xiii, 3) mean the portion of every day as one's daily bread. So the "bread of wickedness" (Prov. iv. 17) and "bread of deceit" (Prov. xx. 17) denote not only a living or estate obtained by fraud and sin, but that to do wickedly is as much the portion of a wicked man's life as to eat his daily bread. See DAILY BREAD; LIFE (BREAD OF).

SHEW-BREAD is the rendering in the Auth. Vera. of the Heb. שִׁבָּה בְּנָחִים, le'chem panim," the bread of the face, or of the presence, because it was set forth before the face or in the presence of Jehovah in his holy place. It is also called "the bread arranged in order on the table of the showbread," because it was always absent from the table (Lev. xxiv, 6, 7; 1 Chron. xxiii. 29). In the outer apartment of the tabernacle, on the right hand, or north side, stood a table made of acacia (shittim) wood, two cubits long, one bread, and one and a half high, and covered with lamine of gold. The top of the leaf of this table was encircled by a border or rim of gold. The frame of the table immediately below the leaf was encircled with a piece of wood of about four inches in breadth, around the edge of which was a rim or border similar to that around the leaf. A little lower down, but at equal distances from the top of the table, there were four rings of gold fastened behind the stand, through which gold were inserted for the purpose of carrying it (Exod. xxx. 23-28; xxxviii. 10-16). These rings were not found in the table which was afterward made for the Temple, nor indeed in any of the sacred furniture, where they had previously been, except in the ark of the covenant. The leaf of the table was encircled upon this table, which were sprinkled with frankincense (the Sept. adds salt; Lev. xxiv. 7). The number twelve represents the twelve tribes, and was not diminished after the destruction of ten of the tribes from the worship of God in his sanctuary, because the covenant with the sons of Abraham was not formally abrogated; but there were so many tribes of the descendants of Jacob, that even the remaining tribes might be represented among the apostatising tribes. The twelve leaves were also a constant record against them, and served as a standing testimonial that their proper place was before the forskain altar of Jehovah. The loaves were placed in two piles, one above another, and were changed every Sabbath day by the priests. The frankincense that had stood on the bread during the week was then burned as an oblation, and the remains of bread became the property of the priests, who, as God's servants, had a right to eat of the bread that came from his table; but they were obliged to eat it in the holy place, and nowhere else. No others might lawfully eat of it; but, in a case of extreme emergency, the priest incurred no blame if he imparted it to persons who were in a state of ceremonial purity, as in the instance of David and his men (1 Sam. xxii, 4-6; Matt. xii, 4).—Kitto.

Wine also was placed upon the "table of shew-bread" in bowls, some larger and some smaller; also in vessels that were covered and in cups, which were probably employed in pouring in and taking out the wine from the other vessels, or in making libations. Genesius calls them "paterne libatoria," and they appear in the Authorized Version as "spoons" (see generally Exod. xxv, 29, 30; xxxvii, 10-16; xl, 4, 24; Lev. xxiv, 3-5; Num. iv, 7). See SHEW-BREAD.

BREAD IN THE EUCHARIST. Whether leavened or unleavened bread should be used in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper has been the subject of a spirited dispute between the Greek and Latin churches. The former contended for the use of leavened, the latter for that of unleavened bread. See AZYMITE.

In the Romish Church bread is called the host, hostia. It consists of cakes of meal and water, made small, circular, and thin like wafers, and by this name it is frequently called. This form seems to have been adopted at the time of the controversy with the Greek Church in 1053. One of the ceremonies used in the consecration of the elements was breaking the bread. This was done in conformity with our Lord's example. Many ancient authors have alluded to this custom.

In times of superstition the Greeks began to break it into four parts, the Latins into three. The Mosarabic Liturgy directs that it be broken into nine parts.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xv, ch. ii, § 5-8.

Breakfast. See MEAL.

Break. (prop. בָּרָאשׁ, 'shad, or בְּרָאשׁ, 'shad, the female testa; occasionally the cognate בַּרְאשׁ, dadda'gim, the two pops, Ezek. xxiii, 3, 8, 21; Prov. v, 19; but בר כה, chiske, the breast or front part of an animal, as first seen, Exod. xxix, 26, 27; Lev. vii, 30, 31; ix, 20, 21). See BOSOM. Females in the East are more desirous than those of colder climates to have a full and swelling, so as to answer for a position or degree unusual among northern nations. This was also the case among the ancient Hebrews (Cant. viii, 10). See BEAUTY.

In Nah. ii, 7, it is said that the women of Nineveh shall be led into captivity "tabering upon their breasts"—that is, beating their breasts in token of anguish, as if they were playing on the tambour. See GRIEF. The waving of the breast of the animal offered in sacrifice (Lev. vii, 30) is supposed to be typical of giving up to God the heart and the affections. See SACRIFICE.

Breastplate, a term applied in the Anth. Vers, to two very different pieces of equipment.

1. Sacerdotal. The official pectoral of the Jewish high-priest is called בְּרָאשׁ, cho 'shen, prop. ornament, being a gorget adorned on the outside with twelve gems, and hollow within, where were deposited the sacred lots "Urim and Thummim" (q. v.); hence more fully called the breastplate of judgment (Exod. xxviii, 15 sq.; Lev. viii, 8; Sept. λιχθον: Philo, λιχθόν: but fully λιχθον κιστίου in Eccles. xi, 10). See EPHOD. It was a piece of very rich embroidered work, about ten inches square, and made double with a front and lining, so as to answer for a pouch or bag, in which, according to the rabbins, the Urim and Thummim were enclosed. The front of it was occupied by the twelve precious stones, on each of which was engraved the name of one of the tribes. They were placed in four rows, and divided from each other by the little golden squares or partitions in which they were set. The two upper corners of the breastplate were fastened to the ephod, from which it was never to be loosed (Exod. xxviii, 28), and the two lower corners to the girdle. The rings, chains, and other fastenings were of gold or rich lace. It was called the memorial (Exod. xxviii, 12, 29), inasmuch as it reminded the priest of his representative character in relation to the twelve tribes. Josephus repeats the description (Ant. iii, 7, 5), Graecizing the Heb. term by λαισμος, and transliterating it by λιχθον. A full discussion of the subject may be found in Brannin, Fratitl Sanctum Sacramentum Hebraorum, pt. ii, ch. vii.—Calmet. See HIGH-PRIEST.

2. Military. As a piece of defensive armor "breast-plate" is the rendering in the Auth. Vers, only of בְּרָאשׁ, shiryon', prob. gleaming (Isa. lix, 17; "harness," 1 Kings xxii, 34; 2 Chron. xviii, 38), apparently a full coat of mail (q. v.), but according to the Sept. οὐρανός, which is the term thus rendered in Eph. vi, 14; 1 These. v, 8; Rev. ix, 9), a breastplate. Kindred and probably equivalent are the terms בְּרָאשׁ, shiryon' ("coat of mail," 1 Sam. xvii, 5, 38; "harpagon," 2 Chron. xxiv, 11; Neh. iv, 16 [10]); בְּרָאשׁ, shiryon' ("harpagon," Job xii, 28 [16]); and בְּרָאשׁ, shiryon' ("coat of mail," literally a "breast-plate of scales" (1 Sam. xvii, 5); comp. ver. 38). See MAIL. It may be noticed that this passage contains the most complete inventory of the furniture of a warrior to be found in the whole of the sacred history. Goliath was a Philistine, and the minuteness of the description of his equipment may be due either to the fact that the Philistines were usually better armed than the Hebrews, or to the impression produced by the contrast on this particular occasion between this fully-armed champion and the wretchedly appointed soldiers of the Israelite host, stripped as they had been very shortly before both of arms and of the means of supplying them so completely that no smith could be found in the country, nor any weapons seen among the people, and that even the ordinary implements of husbandry had to be repaired and sharpened at the forges of the conquerors (1 Sam. xiv. 19–22). The passage in 2 Chron. xxviii. 38 is very obscure; the A. V. follows the Syriac translation, but the real meaning is probably “between the joints and the breastplate.” Ewald reads “between the loins and the chest;” Sept. and Vulgate, “between the lungs and the breastbone.” This word has furnished one of the names of Mount Hermon (see Deut. iii. 9; Stanley, Palest. p. 408), a parallel to which is found in the name θυρεώς given to Mount Sipylus in Lydia. It is thought by some that in Deut. iv. 48, Sion (สถ) is a corruption of Shiryon. See Armor.

A similar piece of defensive armor was the tachard’ (ταχαρδ’), which is mentioned but twice—namely, in reference to the σέλη or gown of the priest, which is said to have had a hole in the middle for the head, with a hem or binding round the hole “as it were the mouth of an habergeon” (ταχαρδ’), to prevent the stuff from tearing (Exod. xxviii. 32). The English “habergeon” was the diminutive of the “habeurk,” and was a quilted shirt or doublet put on over the head.—Smith.

See Habergeon.

In its metaphorical application, as the breastplate is a piece of defensive armor to protect the heart, so the breastplate of God is righteousness, which renders his whole conduct unassailable to any accusation (Isa. lx. 17). A similar form appears here, as they may refer to themselves as “the breastplate of righteousness” (Eph. vi. 14), and “the breastplate of faith and love” (1 Thess. v. 8). Being clothed with these graces, they will be able to resist their enemies, and quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one; a beautiful simile.

Brechin (Brecheinum), Scotland (Angusshire), the seat of a bishopric, founded about 1150 by David I. The cathedral church is now ruined, but part of it is still used for divine service. The revenues at the Reformation amounted to about £700 per annum. The Culdees had here a conventual house, the ruins of which are said still to exist. The present incumbent is Alexander Forbes, D.C.L., consecrated 1847.

Breck, Robert, a Congregational minister, was born in Newburyport, Mass., in 1827, and graduated at Harvard 1849. After preaching on Long Island, he settled as pastor in Marlborough, Mass., Oct. 25th, 1854, and remained until his death, Jan. 6th, 1871. He published an Election Sermon (1728); and a sermon, The Danger of Failing away after a Profession (1729).—Sprague, Annals, i. 256.

Breck, Robert, Jr., a Congregational minister, was born at Marlborough, Mass., July 25th, 1718, and graduated from Harvard 1730. He was ordained pastor of a church in Springfield July 26, 1726, and died April 26, 1784. He published several occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, i. 385.

Breckenridge, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cabell’s Dale, Ky., July 4th, 1757. He was educated at Princeton in 1778, and was a tutor in the college and student in the theological school there from 1819 to 1821. He was licensed to preach in 1822, and was chaplain to the House of Representatives, Washington, 1822–23. In 1823 he was ordained pastor of a Presbyterian church in Lexington, Ky.; removed to Baltimore in 1826, and in 1828 became secretary of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church (Philadelphia). From 1838 to 1840 he was professor of theology at Princeton; 1840 to 1844, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. He died while on a visit to his friends in Kentucky, Aug. 4, 1841. He was a man of great vigor of mind and force of will, and was pre-eminent as an extemporaneous preacher. His published sermons were few; among them are, Controversy with Bishop Hughes (1826); Memorial of Mrs. Breckenridge (1839).

Breeches is the uniform rendering in the Auth. Vers. solely of the Heb. בַּעַרְנָא, מִשְׁגָּלְתָא, תְּרוּאָבָא (from בִּקָרָה, to work up), Sept. παρασκευή (= Exod. xlv. 8) or παρασκευήν, Vulg. feminina, made of linen, and worn by the Jewish priests to hide the parts of shame while ministering at the altar (Exod. xxviii. 42; xxix. 28; Lev. vi. 10; xvi. 4; Ezek. xxviii. 32). The English “habergeon” was the diminutive of the “habeurk,” and was a quilted shirt or doublet put on over the head.—Smith.

Breithaupt, Joachim Justus, a German theologian, born at Nordheim 1658, and educated privately at Helmsdæt. A visit to Spener deepened his religious convictions and gave character to his whole life. In 1685 he went to Meningen as court-preacher and consistorial councillor. Here his labors were eminently useful, and in 1687 he went to Erfurt to be appointed a professor of theology in the university. In 1691 he removed to Halle as professor of theology in the new university, where he taught in happy union with Francke. He died March 16, 1732. His writings include Instit. Theolog. lib. ii (Halle, 1685, 8vo); De Credenda et Agenda (Halle, 1716–18, 3 pt. 4to), besides minor writings. His influence all went to prove the value of pietist; and he is ranked with Spener and Francke as a pietist.—Baumgarten, Memoria Breithaupti; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, ii, 349.

Bremen (Brema), a free town of Germany, and situated on both sides of the Weser. See Germany.

I. Church History.—Originally it was the seat of a bishopric, founded by Charlemagne in 767, and suffragan to the metropolitan of Cologne; but about 890 the archbishopric of Hamburg was removed hither, the prelate, Anacar, being driven from that city by the Normans. Hermann, archbishop of Cologne, opposed this infringement of his rights, and in the Council of Tribur, 896, obtained a decree that both the united church of Bremen and the cathedral church of Bremen were subject to him, but was, however, afterward annulled by Pope Sergius. In 1294 the city of Bremen threw off the rule of the archbishop and became a free city, while the archbishop remained the sovereign of the duchy of Bremen (now a part of the kingdom of Hanover), and, as such, a prince of the German empire. The united archbishopric became, under Otho II and his successors, one of the most powerful in Germany, and was loaded with gifts and privileges. Under Archbishop Christopher (1511–1558) the Reformation found many adherents, and when the archbishop opposed it he was deposed by the cathedral church, all the bishops, in a convention held in succession, George (died 1566), joined the Lutheran Church himself, and Bremen remained a Lutheran archbishopric until 1648, when its whole territory was ceded to the Swedes, and the archbishopric suppressed.

II. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The city of Bremen, with a small territory comprising a space of 106 square miles, had a population of 104,631 souls, the large majority of which are Lutherans, about 15,000 Reformed, 2,000 Roman Catholics, 100 Jews. The Methodist Church had, in 1866, within the territory of Bremen about 483 members. Only recently the members of the Lutheran Church have received equal rights with the other denominations, but the clergy were not alone eligible to public offices. The senate of the republic exercises the supreme episcopal rights through a commission, and only occasionally delegates clergymen for this purpose. There are six Lutheran clergymen in the city and eleven in the country. The ministors in the city constitute the Venerandum Ministerium, which was set up to examine and ordain those devoted for the ministry. The Roman Catholics are under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Münster, Prussia. Bremen has a large number of religious associations, and is the centre of the North German Missionary Society.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has established there a book concern, which issues 5 periodicals, and a Missionary Institute for the training of young Methodist dieters. Bremen is thus the centre of the flourishing Methodist missions in Germany.—Reports of Brethren, Andreas. See Althamer.

Brethren or Brenz, Johann, one of the German reformers, was born at Well, in Suabia, May 24, 1699.
He received his education at Heidelberg, and was led by the perusal of Luther's writings, and especially by the impression made on him by Luther at the Heidelberg disputation of 1518, to espouse the Reformation.
He became a very popular preacher, and was appointed pastor at Halle in his twenty-third year. In 1530 he attended the Diet of Augustburg. The emperor Charles V having declared that he would destroy the city of Halle, the pope, in 1531, he was compelled to seek safety in flight. He found an assembly with duke Ulrich of Württemberg and his successor Christopher at Stuttgart, and at the request of the latter drew up the Confession of Württemberg.

In 1537 he attended the conferences at Worms, and died at Stuttgart, Sept. 11, 1570. He taught the doctrine of the ubiquity of the body of our Lord; hence his followers were called Ubiquitarians (q. v.). His opinions, the main, agreed with those of Luther. Brenz was a man of immense capacity for work, as preacher, reformer, administrator, and author. His works were printed at Tübingen in 1578-1606 (8 vols. fol.), and again at Amsterdam (1666). They consist chiefly of commentaries on the O. and N. T. in the form of lectures or sermons, and are still held in great esteem.

oration, i, 11; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. der iv. pt. ii, § 97.

Brenton, Samuel, was born in Gallatin county, Ky., in 1810. He was converted in early life, and was admitted into the Illinois Conference of the M. E.
Church in 1830. In 1834 he located because of ill health, and continued as a local preacher until 1841, during which time he studied law and was admitted to the bar. In 1841, his health having been restored, he returned to the itinerant ministry, and in 1848 was a delegate to the General Conference. During this year he lost the use of the right side of his body by palsy, resigned his work, and was appointed register of the land-office at Fort Wayne. In 1851 he was elected representative in Congress from the tenth Congressional district of Indiana, and served one term; in 1853 elected president of the Fort Wayne College, and served with great acceptability; in 1854 elected again to Congress, and served two sessions; and in 1856 was again re-elected to Congress. Mr. Brenton died on the 29th of March, 1857.—Minutes of Conference, vi, 249.

Brethren (die Brethren), one of the common appellations of Christians. It occurs frequently in the N.
T., and was current at the date of the apostolic episopal. Subsequently it became a title of respect and affection by which the baptized, or faithful, or complete members of the Church were distinguished from the catechumens. They were accosted or described by other titles, such as "the enlightened," "the sanctified,"
"the perfect," "elect," "beloved," "sons of God,""beloved in Christ," etc. See Brother.

Brethren, Bohemian. See Bohemia.

Brethren of the Common Life (Fratres Vita Com-munita), a religious fraternity which arose about the end of the fifteenth century. It was formed by Gerard de Groot at Deventer (1574 ?), and began to flourish after it had obtained the sanction of the Council of Constance. It was divided into two classes, the lettered brethren, the clerks, and the clerics, the latter living in separate habitations, but maintained the closest fraternal union. The former devoted themselves to preaching, visiting the sick, circulating books and tracts, etc., and the education of youth, while the latter were employed in manual labor and the mechanical arts. They lived under the rule of St. Augustine, and were eminently useful in promoting the cause of religion and education. Thomas a Kempis was one of the luminaries of the order. On the death of Gerard, his disciple Florentius Radewins became head of the order (1564). More active than Gerard, he spread the order widely, founding a central college of regular canons, at Windisheim, another in St. Agnes-berg, near Zwoll, to which Kempis belonged, and additional ones at Deventer. He was greatly assisted by Zerbolt (died 1598), who labored earnestly to introduce the use of the vernacular Bible among the common people, and the use of the mother tongue instead of Latin in the liturgical services. The theory of the Brethren was that unity should be sought rather in the inward spirit than in outward statutes. Vows were not binding for life. Property was surrendered, not on compulsion, but voluntarily. All the brother-houses were kept in communion with each other, and the heads of houses met annually for consultation. Particulars of their rule, domestic arrangements, etc., may be found in Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, ii, 89 sq. Luther and Melanchthon spoke with approval and sympathy of the brotherhood in their time. Its flourishing period extended from 1400 to 1500. Most of their houses were built between 1420 and 1500, and they had, in all, some thirty to fifty establishements.

During the sixteenth century the Reformation broke them down, in common with other monkish establishments, or, rather, they crowded to pieces as needless amid the new developments of the age. By the middle of the seventeenth century the brotherhood was ended. Many of the brother-houses became conventual, and the rest were absorbed by the Roman orders, especially the Jesuits.—Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, i, 57, 184; Böhringer, Kirchen-Geschichte in Biographien, vol. ii, pt. iii; Delprat, Die Brüderschaft des gemeinwohl-Lebens (Leips. 1849); Bibl. Sacra, ii, 201.

Brethren of the Free Spirit, a fraternity which sprung up in the sixteenth century, and which received many adherents in Italy, France, and Germany.
They took their designation from the words of St. Paul, Rom. viii. 2. 14, and maintained that the innumerable children of God were invested with perfect freedom from the jurisdiction of the law. In their principles they were Pantheists, and in practice they were enthusiasts. In their aspect, dress, and mode of life they resembled the Beghards, and were sometimes called after them.
In their extreme pantheistical creed they held that every-things (even formalities) is God; that rational souls are a portion of God; that sin has separated man from God, but by the power of contemplation man is reunited to the Deity, and acquires thereby a glorious and sublime liberty, both from sinful lusts, and from the common laws of nature. Having accepted this doc-ment of nature, it was held that every thing appeared as homines intelligentes. Many edicts were published against them; but, notwithstanding the severities which they suffered, they continued till about the middle of the fifteenth century. They were called by various names, such as, Picards, Adamites, and Turalups. Gieseler traces the sect to Amalaric of Bena (q. v.); Mosheim (De Begerardis) assigns their origin to Italy.—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. ii, 351, 354; Gieseler, Ch. Hist. per. iii, div. iii, § 87.

Brehren, White, the followers of an unknown leader, said by some writers to be from Scotland, who appeared in the neighborhood of the Alps about the year 1899, and proclaimed himself commissioned to preach a new crusade. He named his followers Pentenists, but from their white dresses they were more commonly called Fraures Albati, or White Brothers, or White Pentenists (Ital. Bianchi). Boniface IX, suspecting the leader of insidious designs, caused him to be apprehended, committed to the hierarchy, and upon whose approval his followers dispersed, and the sect became extinguished.—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. ii, 467.

Bretscheider, Karl Gottlieb, a German rationalistic divine, was born in Gersdorf, Feb. 11, 1776, and educated at Chemnitz and the University of Leipzig. He was designed for the Church at an early age, but he inclined more to belles-lettres, and showed a strong sceptical turn at the university. In 1807 he became pastor at Schneeberg, in 1808 superintendent in Annaberg. In 1812 he disputed on Capita theologie Juseorum dogmatica, and from this time devoted himself more completely to theology. In 1816 he was made general superintendent at Gotha, which office he held till his death, Jan. 22, 1848. His activity as a writer was very great, and covered the fields of exegesis, text of Scripture, dogmatics, and history. From 1824 he shared in the editorship of the Theol. Literaturblatt, and contributed largely to other periodicals. His most important publications are the Corpus Reformatorum, a collection of the writings of the Reformers, continued after his death by Binsfell (the first 28 vols., Halle, 1834 1860, comprise the works of Melanchthon):—*Lexicon in V. fourteenth century there was a reserve granted in favor of bishops, who were allowed, on particular occasions, to pass three days without rehearsing the Breviary. One of the best editions of the Breviarium Romanum is that of Mechlin, 1806 (4 vols. 12mo). For a full account of its history and contents, see Lewis, Bible, Missal, and Breviary (Edinb. 1853, 2 vols. 8vo).

The Breviary of the Greeks, which they call by the name Ἱερολογίον (hierologium), diai, is the same in almost all the churches and monasteries which follow the Greek rites. The Greeks divide the Psalter into twenty-four parts, called σελίδα (seilida) seats, because they are a kind of pages or seats. In general, the Greek Breviary consists of two parts, one containing the office for the evening, the other that for the morning, divided into matins, lauda, first, third, sixth, ninth, vespers, and the compline; that is, of seven different hours, on account of that saying of David, Seven times in the day will I praise Thee.” The compline is the last office at night, by which the work of the day is complete (Fr. compline, Lat. complenum).—Bergier, s. v. Brevent, Daniel, D.D., was born at Jersey in 1616, and studied first at Saumur, and afterward at Oxford, where he became a fellow of Jesus College 1638. Being ejected for refusing the Covenant, he went to France, and was employed in the negotiations for conciliating the members of the Church of Rome and Protestants. After the Restoration, he became prebendary of Durham 1661, and dean of Lincoln 1681. He died in 1695. Brevent was a learned divine, especially in the Romish controversy. He wrote Miscellaneorum, or the Depth and Mirey of the Roman Mass laid open (Oxford, 1672, 8vo):—The Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice (1672); both these are reprinted under the title Brevent on the Mass (Oxford, 1838, 8vo):—Ecclissiam Prima. Sacramentum et Sacrificium aut postea corripit, etc., etc., Liberum. Waterland (Works, viii, 167) speaks in the highest terms of Brevent.

Bribe (בָּרָב, shokkāh), a present, i. e. gift or reward, as often rendered, especially in the corrupt sense, a ‘bribé,’ also “בָּר, ko'per, a ransom or satisfaction, as generally rendered, once “bribe,” 1 Sam. xii, 3, a valuable consideration given or taken for perverting justice; a frequent practice in the East, both by judge and witnesses. See GIFT.

Bric (ברך, lebaḵ), so called from the whitish clay of which bricks are made, as described by Vitruvius, ii, 9; rendered “tile” in Ezek. iv, 1; hence the denom. verb הָ לְבַ חַ, to make brick, Gen. xi, 5; Exod. v, 7, 14). Bricks compacted with straw and dried in the sun are those which are chiefly mentioned in the Scriptures. Of such bricks the Tower of Babel was doubtless composed (Gen. xi, 3, and the making of such formed the chief labor of the Israelites when bondsman in Egypt (Exod. i, 18, 14).—Ancient Babylonian.—Herodotus (i, 179), describing the mode of building the walls of Babylon, says that the clay dug out of the ditch was made into bricks as soon as it was carried up, and burnt in the kilns, καταβιωται. The bricks were cemented with hot bitumen (δαραλος), and at every thirty row craters of reeds were stuffed in. This account agrees with the history of the building of the Tower of Confusion, in which the builders used bricks instead of stone, and slime (ギュり, δαραλος) for mortar (Gen. xi, 3; Joseph, Ant. i, 4, § 8). In the alluvial plain of Assyria, both the material for bricks and the cement, which bubbles up from the ground, and is collected and exported by the Arabs, were close at hand for building purposes; but the Babylonian bricks were more commonly burned in kilns than those used at Nineveh, which are chiefly sun-dried, like the Egyptian. Xenophon mentions a wall called the wall of Media, not far from Babylon, made of burned bricks set in bitumen, 20 feet wide and 100 feet high; also another wall of brick 50 feet wide (Diod. ii, 7, 8, 12; Xen. Anab. ii, 4, 12; iii, 4, 11; Diod. iii, 14; Layard, Nineveh, ii, 46, 232, 278). While it is needless to inquire to what place or to whom the actual invention of brickmaking is to be ascribed, there is perhaps no place in the world more favorable for the process, none in which the remains of original brick structures have been more largely used in later times for building purposes. The Babylonian bricks are usually from 12 to 10 in. square, and 3 to 3½ in. thick. (American bricks are usually 9 in. long, 3½ to 4 wide, and 2½ thick.) They most of them bear the name inscribed in cuneiform character of Nebuchadnezzar, whose buildings, no doubt, replaced those of an earlier age (Layard, Nin. and Baby., p. 505, 531). They thus have more of the character of tiles (Ezek.

Ancient Babylonian Brick, with Cuneiform Inscriptions.

iv, 1). They were sometimes glazed and enamelled with patterns of various colors. Semiramis is said by Diodorus to have overlaid some of her towers with surfaces of enamelled brick bearing elaborate designs (Diod. ii, 8). Enamelled bricks have been found at Nimroud (Layard, ii, 312). Pliny (vii, 56) says that the Babylonians used to record their astronomical observations on tiles (coelitibus latericulis). He also, as well as Vitruvius, describes the process of making bricks at Rome. There were three sizes: (a), 1½ ft. long, 1 ft. broad; (b), 4 (Greek) palms long, 12.135 in.; (c), 5 palms long, 15.16875 in.; the breadth of these latter two the same. He says the Greeks preferred brick walls in general to stone (xxxv, 14; Vitruv. ii, 8, 9). Bricks of more than 8 palms length, and of less than 1½ palm, are mentioned by the Talmudists (Baba Mez., c. x, fol. 1176; Baba Bathra, i, 3 a). See TILES.

2. Egypt.—The use of crude brick, baked in the sun, was universal in Upper and Lower Egypt, both for public and private buildings; and the brick-field gave abundant occupation to numerous laborers throughout the country. These simple materials were found to be particularly suited to the climate, and the ease, rapidity, and cheapness with which they were made afforded additional recommendations. The Israélites, in common with other captives, were employed by the Egyptian monarchs in making bricks and in building

(Exod. i. 14; v. 7). Kiln-bricks were not generally used in Egypt, but were dried in the sun, and even without straw are as firm as when first put up in the reigns of the Amunophs and Thotmes whose names they bear. The usual dimensions vary from 20 in. or 17 in. to 14½ in. long; 8½ in. to 64 in. wide; and 7 in. to 4½ in. thick. When made of the Nile mud or alluvial deposit, they required (as they still require) straw to prevent cracking; but those formed of clay taken from the torrent beds on the edge of the desert held together without straw; and crude brick walls had frequently the additional security of a layer of reeds and sticks, placed at intervals to act as binders (Wilkinson, ii. 194, abridg. ; Birch, Ancient Pottery, i. 11; comp. Herod. i. 179). Baked bricks, however, were used chiefly in places in contact with water. They are smaller than the sun-dried bricks (Birch, i. 23). A brick-kiln is mentioned as in Egypt by the prophet Jeremiah (xliii. 9). A brick- pyramid is mentioned by Herodotus (i. 136) as the work of King Asyachis. Sesostris (ii. 136) is said to have employed his captives in building. Numerous remains of buildings of various kinds exist, constructed of sun-dried bricks, of which many specimens are to be seen in the British Museum with inscriptions indicating their date and purpose (Birch, i. 11, 17). Among the paintings at Thebes, one on the tomb of Ikhabara, an officer of the court of Thotmes III (B.C. cir. 1400), represents the enforced labors in brick-making of captives, who are distinguished from the natives by the color in which they are drawn. Watching over the laborers are "task-masters," who, armed with sticks, are receiving the "tale of bricks" and urging on the work. The processes of digging out the clay, of moulding, and of arranging, are all duly represented; and, though the laborers cannot be determined to be Jews, yet the similarity of employment illustrates the Bible history in a remarkable degree (Wilkinson, ii. 197; Birch, i. 19; see Aristoph. Ντ. 1133, Αἰγύπτιος μελαθρόφος; Exod. v. 17, 18). Enclosures of gardens or granaries, sacred courts encompassing the courts of temples, walls of fortifications and towns, dwelling-houses and tombs, in short, all but the temples themselves, were of crude brick; and it was a great demand of the Egyptian govern-ment, observing the profit which would accrue from a monopoly of them, undertook to supply the public at a moderate price, thus preventing all unauthorized persons from engaging in the manufacture. And in order the more effectually to obtain this end, the seal of the king or of some privileged person was stamped upon the bricks at the time they were made. This fact, though not positively mentioned by any ancient author, is inferred from finding bricks so marked both in public and private buildings; some having the oval of a king, and some the name and titles of a priest, or other influential person; and it is probable that those which bear no characters belonged to individuals who had obtained a license or permission from the government to fabricate them for their own consumption. The employment of numerous captives who worked as slaves enabled the government to sell the bricks at a lower price than those who had recourse solely to free labor; so that, without the necessity of a prohibition, they speedily became an exclusive manufacture; and we find that, independent of native laborers, a great many foreigners were constantly engaged in the brickfields at Thebes and other parts of Egypt. The Jews, of course, were not excluded from this drudgery; and, like the captives detained in the Thebaïd, they were condemned to the same labor in Lower Egypt. They erected granaries, treasure-cities, and other public buildings for the Egyptian monarch: the materials used in their construction were the work of their hands; and the constant employment of brick-makers may be... accounted for by the extensive supply required and kept by the government for sale (Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, ii, 97, 98). See Bondage.

Captives foreigner being thus forced engaged in brick-making, Biblical illustrators (e.g. Hawkes, Egypt and its Monuments, p. 225 seq.), with their usual slavacy, jumped to the conclusion that these captive foreigners were Jews, and that the scenes represented were those of their actual operations in Egypt. Sir J. G. Wilkinson satisfactorily dispose of this inference by the following remark: "The quantity of mud in the sculptures cannot reasonably be expected, since the remains in that part of Egypt where they lived have not been preserved; but it is curious to discover other foreign captives occupied in the same manner, and overlooked by similar 'task-masters,' and performing the very same labors as the Israelites described in the Bible; and no one can look at the paintings of Thebes representing brick-makers without a feeling of the highest interest. . . . . . . It is scarcely fair to argue that, because the Jews made bricks, and the persons here introduced are so engaged, they must necessarily be Jews, since the Egyptians and their captives separated in different occupations. The quantity required for the sacred task; and the great quantity made at all times may be justly inferred from the number of buildings which still remain constructed of these materials; but it is worthy of remark that more bricks bearing the name of Thotmes III (who is supposed [by some] to have been the king of the 18thb. of Egypt, 15th. of the Exode) than at any other period, owing to the many prisoners of Asiatic nations employed by him, independent of his Hebrew captives." See Exode.

The process of manufacture indicated by the representations in the foregoing cuts does not materially differ from that which is still followed in the same country. The clay was brought in baskets from the Nile, thrown into a heap, thoroughly saturated with water, and worked up to a proper temper by the feet of the laborers. And here it is observable that the watering and tempering of the clay is performed entirely by the light-colored laborers, who are the captives, the Egyptians being always painted red. This labor in such a climate must have been very fatiguing and unwholesome, and it consequently appears to have been shunned by the native Egyptians. There is an allusion to the severity of this labor in Nahum iii, 14, 15. The clay, when tempered, was cut by an instrument resembling the agricultural hoe, and moulded in an oblong shape; then dried in the sun, and some, from their color, appear to have been baked or burned, but no trace of this operation has yet been discovered in the monuments (Dr. W. C. Taylor's Bible Illustrated, p. 82). The writer just cited makes the following pertinent remarks on the order of the king that the Israelites should collect in the straw with which to compact (not burn) their bricks: 'It is evident that Pharaoh did not require a physical impossibility, because the Egyptian reapers only cut away the top of the grain. See Agriculture. We must remember that the tyrannical Pharaoh was a slave driver: the Israelites labored in the straw about two months before the time of harvest. If, therefore, the straw had not been usually left standing in the fields, he would have shown himself anilot as well as a tyrant; but the narrative shows us that the Israelites found the stems of the last year's harvest standing in the fields; for by the word of the Lord they were employed in diminishing the Nile, and clearly means the stalks that remained from the last year's harvest. Still, the demand that they should complete their tale of bricks was one that scarcely could be fulfilled, and the conduct of Pharaoh on this occasion is a perfect specimen of Oriental despotism.'—Kennedy.

8. Jewish Bricks.—The Jews learned the art of brick-making in Egypt, and we find the use of the brick-kiln (תַּמְלֵק) in David's time (2 Sam. xii, 31), and a complaint made by Isaiah that the people built altars of brick instead of unhewn stone as the law directed (Isa. lxv, 8; Exod. xx. 25). See Pottery.

Brisonnet, Denis, son of the cardinal of St. Malo, was made successively bishop of Toulon and of St. Malo. He was a member of the Council of Pisa, 1511, and of that of the Lateran, 1514. His reputation for virtue and kindness was very great; and toward the end of his life he gave up his episcopal office, for fear that he should not be able faithfully to fulfill his duties in his old age. He died in 1536.—Hoefser, Biog. Générale, vii, 578.

Brisonnet, Guillaume, cardinal of St. Malo, began his career under Louis XI, who, on his death-bed, commended him to his son Charles VIII. Under this monarch he became finance minister, and almost ruler of France. Having lost his wife, he added to his other honors the episcopacy, taking orders, it is said, with the understanding that he should be made cardinal. At Rome he brought about a reconciliation between Charles and his son, and the cardinal's hat was his reward. On the death of Charles VIII, he was placed in the French cabinet by Cardinal d'Ambes, and retired to Rome; but Louis XII employed him to get up a council at Pisa composed of the cardinals opposed to Pope Julius II, in order to "reform the Church in its head and members." He obeyed, but was excommunicated by the pope, and had his property confiscated and his person taken in purple. Leo X restored him. He died archbishop of Narbonne, 14th December, 1514.—Hoefser, Biog. Générale, vii, 577.

Brisonnet, Guillaume, a French bishop and Guerri Reformer, was the son of the foregoing, and was born in Paris in 1470. His father trained him for the clerical state, and he was priestly ordered and became archbishop of Lyons, whence he was transferred to the see of Metz, a busy and important town in Brionnais, nearly thirty miles eastward of Paris, of which Bes- suet was, at a later day, bishop. Brisonnet was a man of considerable learning, of singular fondness for the subtleties of a refined mysticism, and of a kind and gentle temper. While at Rome, whither he went as royal ambassador, just before entering upon his duties as bishop of Metz, he had become more and more convinced of the thorough reform which was needed throughout the whole Church. His first acts in his diocese were those of a reformer. He called upon the ecclesiastics who, neglecting their charges, had been in the habit of spending their time in pleasure at the capital, to return to their pastoral duties. He took steps to initiate a reformation of manners and morals among the clergy. He forbade the Franciscan monks to enter the pulpit of the churches under his supervision." He invited from Paris, in 1521, Jacques Le- favre, of Etaples (q. v.), and Farel (q. v.), who were employed in disseminating the N. T. and in preaching, throughout the diocese for nearly two years. Brisonnet himself was very active; and once, preaches to his people, warned them in these words: 'Even should I, your bishop, change my teaching, beware that you change not with me.' But his perseverance was not equal to his zeal. The Franciscans, whom he had offended, "called several times on the University and Parliament to interpose; and the bishop, who at first had given tokens of courage, and had ventured to denounce the doctors of theology as Pharisees and false prophets, at length waivered and trembled before the storm he had raised. Three years (1523-1526) without a word, but seven days before his death, apostasy from the profession of his convictions. Beginning with the mere withdrawal of his permission accorded to "the evangelical doctors," as they were called, to preach within his diocese, he ended by presiding over a synod of his own clergy, in which the reasons for the Lute were exhibited on pain of excommunication, and by giving a public sanction to the abuses against which he had so loudly protested.

The rapid advance of his conformity with the requisitions of the Papal Church was doubtless owing not a little to fresh complaints against his orthodoxy, and a surmise that before an inquiry was put in train by the Government appointed by the Parliament, which, however, he succeeded in satisfying in respect to his future, if not to his past course.

Meanwhile, although himself the instrument of persecution in the hands of the fanatical portion of the French clergy, it is probable that Briçonnet still retained his early sentiments. Such, at least, was the belief of the early reformers." He died at his castle in Aincarn, Jan. 25, 1534. See Bretonneau, Hist. General de la Maison de Briçonnet; Dyer, Life of Colvin, p. 20; Ranke, History of the Reformation, i, 190; Baird, in Methodist Quarterly Review, 1864, p. 489.

Bride or Brydane, Jacques, a celebrated French preacher, was born March 21, 1701, at Chuslan (department of the Gard). He first studied at the Jesuits' College at Avignon, and afterward at the Congregation of the Mission of Saint-Sulpice. His teachers soon saw that he gave indications of extraordinary eloquence, and they exercised his talent by causing him to catechize the children. After receiving first orders, he was sent to Aiguemorte to preach during Lent.

Finding the people slow in attending church on Ash-Wednesday, he rallied forth in his surplice, ringing a bell; and no sooner had he gathered a crowd than he commenced to pour upon them the thunders of his eloquence, which soon produced silence, attention, and terror. At that time he had written but three sermons; and he began to extemporise with such great success that he finished his Lent series in that way. His great sermons and ripostes made a great stir among the mercenary clergy. In 1774 he came to Paris, where, by his eloquence, he caused the rich and powerful to tremble. Cardinal Maury has preserved the famous oration of this preacher on the subject of eternity, in the church of St. Sulpice, before an imposing congregation: "Est-ce que c'est que l'eternité? C'est une pente dont le balancier fait d'aller, sans cesse, ces deux mots seulement, dans le silence des tombeaux, 'Toujours; Jamais!'—'Jamais; Toujours!' Et toujours pendant ces essuyages révolution, un repoussé, une heure est aux yeux d'une autre; l'impitoyable lui répond, 'L'eternité!'" -- "Do you know what eternity is? It is a pendulum, ever swinging, and, as it vibrates, speaking, among the silence of the tombs, Forever, never; forever, never. And ever, as these vibrations keep their ceaseless motion, a whetted voice may be heard from the condemned, What hour is it? and another condemned soul replies, Eternity." But Poujoulat (in his Cardinal Maury, sa vie et ses œuvres, Paris, 1859) asserts that this famous oration is not Briçonnet's after all, but that it can be clearly proved to be Maury's own composition! Briçonnet died of the stone, Dec. 22, 1757. He has left some Contes Spirituels à l'usage des missions du diocèse d'Alaise, which in 1812 had gone through forty-seven editions. The abbé Carron wrote his life under the title Le Modele des Prêtres (Paris, 1804, 12mo). His Sermons appeared at Avignon (1823, 5 vols. 12mo).

Bridal Crown or Wreath (στρώφαλων). To crown a pair about to be married with a garland of flowers, or even of metals and precious stones, is a very ancient practice in the marriage ceremony, and both in pagan and Christian times. The usage was adopted in the early Church, but not without opposition. Tertullian called it "an idolatrous rite" (De cor. milit. c. 13-15. See also Justin, Apol. c. ix). At a later period it became general, and it is spoken of with approval by the fathers of the 4th and 5th centuries. Chrysostom mentions the ceremony as follows: "Crows and laurels are the crowns which are usually put upon their heads as symbols of victory;" i.e. it was supposed that the betrothed persons had, before nuptials, striven virtuously against all manner of uncleanness (Chrysostom, Hom. IX in 1 Tim.). It appears, therefore, that the honor of crowning was not given to fornicators when they married; nor was the ceremony used in second or third marriages, because, though not held to be unlawful, they were not reckoned as honorable as first marriages. "The chaplets were usually made of myrtle, olive, amaranth, rosemary, and evergreens, intermingled with cypress and vervain. The crown, appropriately so called, was made of olive, myrtle, and rosemary, variegated with flowers, and sometimes with gold and silver, precious stones, etc. These crowns were constructed in the form of a pyramid or tower. Both the bride and the bridegroom were crowned in this manner, together with the groomsmen and the bride-maid. The bride frequently appeared in church thus attired on the day when she reached the banns were raised. The chaplets were not worn by the parties in case of second marriage, nor by those who had been guilty of impropriety before marriage. In the Greek Church the chaplets were imposed by the officiating minister. He placed the nuptial crowns, which had been lying on the altar, first upon the head of the bridegroom and then upon that of the bride, saying, in the one case, 'May the Lord hereby crown this handmaid of the Lord in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen.' This ceremony was followed by prayers, doxologies, and the reading of the Scriptures, particularly Ephes. v, 22-33, and John ii, 1-5, and the alternate prayers of the priest and the deacon. Upon the eighth day the married pair present themselves again in the church, when the minister, with appropriate prayer, lays off the nuptial crown, and dismisses them with a blessing." In the Western Church veils gradually took the place of bridal crowns, though both are sometimes used. In Germany the wreaths are still very generally used. -- Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. xxiv, § 4; Bingham, Orig. Bride-chamber (יוֹפָר), a bridal room (Suid. καμαρή) where the nuptial bed was prepared, usually in the house of the bridegroom, whither the bride was brought in procession. See Wedding. It occurs only in the New Testament, in the phrase "sons of the bride-chamber" (Matt. ix, 15; Mark ii, 19; Luke x, 24). These were the companions of the bridegroom, bridesmen, called by the Greeks paroxympa (Rabbin. נַעְרוֹת, just as the bride had also her companions or bridesmaids (Matt. xxxv, 1-12). See Marriage.

Bridegroom (יוֹפָר, chachan), also "son-in-law" (יוֹפָר). In the typical language of Scripture, the love of the Redemer to the Church is vividly alluded to in the expression "the bride, the Lamb's wife" (Rev. xxi, 9). Christ himself is also called "the bridegroom" in the same sense (John iii, 29). The turns of phrase, and the frequent occurrence in the O. The Chaldee paraphrase renders "gates." in Nahum ii, 6, "bridges," where, however, dikes or weirs are to be understood, which, being burst by inundation, destroyed the walls of Nineveh (Udod, ii, 27). Judas Maccabeus is said to have intended to make a bridge in order to besiege the town of Caesphor or Caspia, situated near a lake (2 Macc. xii, 13). Josephus (Ant. v, 1, 0), speaking of the bridge of the Jordan at the time of the passage of the Israelites, says it had never been bridged before (on χωρίται προφυσι), as if in his own time bridges had been made over it, which under the Roman was the case. Bridge, Jonathan D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Northfield, Mass., 1812, converted at seventeen, and entered the itinerant ministry in the New England Conference 1834. After filling a number of important stations, he was made a presiding elder in 1854, and died 1856. By his energy, industry, and ability, he made up to a large extent for a deficient education, and rose to be a good scholar, and was "long an honor and ornament" to the Conference. As a preacher he was earnest and ardent to a degree beyond his physical strength. His sustained and unflagging industry made him also a vigorous, though not always a careful writer. He wrote largely for periodicals.—Minutes of Conference, vi, 241; Sherman, New England Divines, p. 350.

Bridge, William, a Non-conformist divine, was born in 1600, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. After preaching in Essex and Norwich, he was silenced for non-conformity and went to Rotterdam, where he was pastor in Robinson's Congregational church. Returning to England, he obtained a church at Yarmouth in the time of the Long Parliament, but was ejected in 1662. He died 1670. He was a learned and industrious man: in theology a Calvinist. His Works, consisting chiefly of sermons, were first collected in 1649 (4 vols, 4to), before his death. A new and complete edition has recently appeared (Lond. 1845, 5 vols. 8vo). Bridge Brethren (Fratres pontifices, Frères pontifes), the name of a fraternity founded toward the end of the 12th century by St. Benedict after his building the bridge of Avignon. They were known as bridge men, and served in hospitals when needed, but were especially intended to devote themselves to the building of bridges and roads. In this capacity they did great service in the south and east of France, directing the of the Sea of Galilee. Not far from this region still exists the most noted artificial stone bridge in Palestine. It is mentioned by B. de la Broquiere A.D. 1432, and a portion of one by Arculf, A.D. 700 (Early True, in Pall. p. 5, 300; Burchhardt, Syria, p. 515; Robinson, Scotson's ii, 361). It crosses the Upper Jordan about two miles below the lake Huleh. The river here flows rapidly through a narrow bed; and here from the most remote ages has lain the high-road to Damascus from all parts of Palestine, which renders it likely that a bridge existed at this place in very ancient times, although of course not the one which is now standing. The bridge is called "Jacob's Bridge" (Jissur Yakoub), from a tradition that it marks the spot where the patriarch Jacob crossed the river on his return from Padan-Aram. But it is also sometimes called Jarr Beni Yakoub, "the Bridge of Jacob's Sons," which may suggest that the name is rather derived from some Arab tribe called the Beni Yakoub. It is still often termed, however, Jarr Benat Yakoub, "Bridge of Jacob's Daughters." The bridge is a very solid structure, well built, with a high curve in the middle like all the Syrian bridges, and is composed of three arches in the usual style of these fabrics. Close by it on the east is a khan much frequented by travellers, built upon the remains of a fortress which was erected by the Crusaders to command the passage of the Jordan. A few soldiers are now stationed here to collect a toll upon all the laden beasts which cross the bridge.

Permanent bridges over water do not appear to have been used by the Israelites in their earlier times, but we have frequent mention made of fords, and of their military importance (Gen. xxxii, 22; Josh. ii, 7; Judg. iii, 28; vii, 24; xii, 5; Isa. xvi, 2). West of the Jordan there are few rivers of importance (Amm. Marcs. xiv, 8; Beland, p. 294); and perhaps the policy of the Jews may have discouraged intercourse with neighboring tribes, for it seems unlikely that the skill of Solomon's architects was unable to construct a bridge. Though the arch (q. v.) was known and used in Egypt as early as the 15th century B.C. (Wilkinson, ii, 302 sq.; Birch, i, 14), the Romans were the first constructors of arched bridges. They made bridges over the Jordan and other rivers of Syria, of which remains still exist (Stanley, Palest. p. 296; Irby and Mangles, p. 90, 91, 92, 142, 145). There are traces of ancient bridges across the Jordan above and below the mouth of Gennesareth, and also over the Arnon and other rivers which enter the Jordan from the east; and some of the winter torrents which traverse the westernmost plain (the plain of the coast) are crossed by bridges, also the Litany, the Ovelly, etc. But the oldest of these appears to be of Roman origin, and some of dig for water, is rendered by the Sept. "to bridge," γυρίσαι ριβυς. The bridge (γυρίσαι) connecting the Temple with the upper city of which Josephus speaks (War, vi, 6, 2; Ant. xvi, 11, 5) seems to have been an arched viaduct (Robinson, i, 425; also new ed. iii, 224). See Jerusalem. Herodotus (i, 180) describes a bridge consisting of stone piers, with planks laid between, built by Nitocris B.C. c. 600, connecting the two portions of Babylon (see Jer. li. 31, 32; 1, 38), and Diodorus speaks of an arched tunnel under the Ephrathites (ii, 9). Bridges of boats are described also by Herodotus (iv, 68; vii, 36; comp. Easch. Pers. 69, ιναθείσοντας σχίτα) and by Strabo (v, 4, 12). The bridge at Nablus, made of wicker-work connecting stone piers, is described by Layard (i, 192), a mode of construction used also in South America.—Kitto; Smith.
workmen, working themselves, and often defraying the expenses out of their own funds or by collections. They were officially recognised by Pope Clement III, ordained a member of the knighthood of the Holy Sepulchre, and each of the brother was distinguished by wearing a small hammer on the breast. They did not altogether disappear before 1789, although their efficiency ceased long before that time. See Recherches hist. sur les Frères pontifes (Par. 1818).

Bridge (Brec or Brige), a Romish saint, and the patroness of Ireland, was born about the middle of the 6th century. Marvellous and absurd accounts of her miracles are given in the modern lives of her. Her festival is observed on Feb. 1, on which day, A.D. 521 or 522, she is said to have died. See Mart's History of the Irish Church, vol. i, p. 58; vol. ii, p. 145.

Bridge (Brigitta or Brigitta), a saint of the Romish Calendar, and daughter of Birgir, prince of Sweden. She was born in 1304, and married Ulpho, prince of Nericia, in Sweden, by whom she had eight children. After the birth of these Bridge and her husband resolved to lead a life of continence. They undertook a pilgrimage to Compostella; and Ulpho died shortly after their return to Sweden, in 1344. Bridge then built the great monastery of Wasten, in the diocese of Stockholm, in which the aged sixty-six nuns, and, separated from them entirely, thirteen friars, priests, in honor of the twelve apostles and St. Paul, four deacons, representing the four doctors of the Church, and eight lay brothers. See Bridgetines. Bridge, having made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land and to the shrine of her patroness, in her return to Sweden, in 1372. She was canonized by Bonifacius IX, Oct. 7, 1391, and her festival appointed to be kept on the day following. Her Romish biographers tell of many revelations which she is said to have had concerning the sufferings of our Saviour, and about political affairs. John de Torquemada, by order of the Council of Basle, examined the book of Bridge's revelations, and declared it to be profitable for the instruction of the faithful (?). It was consequently confirmed by the Council of Basle and the popes Gregory XI and Urban VI, but Benedict XIV explained this confirmation as meaning only that the book contained nothing contrary to the doctrines of the Roman Church. Her Revelations were published, Löbeck, 1492, and Rome, 1488—Butler, Lives of Saints, Oct. 8; Hammerich, Leben Brigittas (1863).

Bridgewater Treatises. The last Earl of Bridgewater (who died in 1829), by his will, dated February 25, 1825, left £8000 to be at the disposal of the president of the Royal Society of London, to be paid to the person or persons nominated by him to write, print, and publish 1000 copies of a work on "On the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in the creation; illustrating such work by all reasons arguments, as, for instance, the beauty and the formation of God's creatures in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, the effect of digestion, the construction of the hand of man, and an infinite variety of other arguments; as also by discoveries, ancient and modern, in arts, sciences, and the whole extent of literature." He also desired that the profits arising from the sale of the works so published should be paid to the works of the authors. The then president of the Royal Society, Dr. Davie Gilbert, requested the assistance of the Archibishop of Canterbury and of the Bishop of London in determining on the best mode of carrying out the intentions of the testator. Acting with their advice, he appointed eight gentlemen to write separate treatises on the different branches of the subject, which treatises have been published, and are as follows:—1. Thomas Coke, D. D., The Adaption of External Nature to the Physical Condition of Man (London, 1837, 8vo); 2. By the Rev. William Whewell, Astronomy and General Physics considered with Reference to Natural Theology (London, 1839, 8vo); 3. By Sir Charles Bell, The Hand, its Mechanism and Vital Endowments, as Evincing Design (London, 1837, 8vo); 4. By Peter Mark Roget, M.D., Animal and Vegetable Physiology, considered with Reference to Natural Theology (London, 1840, 2 vols. 8vo); 5. By the Rev. Dr. Buckland, Con Geology and Mineralogy (London, 1837, 2 vols. 8vo); 6. By the Rev. William Kirby, On the History, Habits, and Instincts of Animals (London, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo); 7. By William Prout, M.D., Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion, considered with Reference to Natural Theology (London, 1884, 8vo). All these treatises have been reprinted in a cheaper form as a portion of Bohn's "Standard Library," and the most of them had before this been republished in America (Phil. 7 vols. 8vo). A German translation of them has been published at Stuttgart (1836-1838, 9 vols.).

Bridle (prop. πορφω, re'sen, a halter, Isa. xxxi, 28; hence generally a rein, Ps. xxxii, 9; Job xxxi, 11, specially the jags, Job xili, 5 [13]; also μετέχει, μεχεϊ, 2 Kings xii, 28; Prov. xxxvi, 3; Isa. xxxii, 29; strictly the bit, as rendered in Ps. xxxii, 9; so χαλικος, Rev. xiv, 20; 1 Esdr. iii, 6; 2 Macc. x, 28; 'bit,' James iii, 5; likewise χαλικονικον, to curb, James i, 26; iii, 2; once μυρμηγα, μυρμηγον, a mule, Ps. xxix, 2), the headstall and reins by which a rider governs his horse (Ps. xxxii, 9). In connection with Isa. xxxviii, 20, it is remarkable to find from Theodoret that it was customary to fix a sort of bridle or muzzle of leather on refractory slaves. Even freemen were thus treated when they became prisoners of war. See Zedekiah. Thus, when Cambyses conquered Egypt, the son of the Egyptian monarch, with ten thousand other youths of the highest rank, were condemned to death, and were conducted to execution in procession with ropes around their necks and bridles in their mouths (Herodotus, iii, 14). Compare the act of Benhadad's "princes" in putting halters about their heads in token of submission to Ahab (1 Kings xx, 32). According to Layard (ii, 275), the Assyrians ornamented their bridles in a high degree; but in their trappings and harness the Kouryunjik horses differ completely from those represented in the bas-reliefs of Nimroud: their heads were generally surmounted by an arched crest, and bells or tassels were hung around their necks; or, as at Khorsabad, high plumes, generally three in number, rose between their ears. See Horse.

Head-dress of an ancient Assyrian Riding-Horse.

The restraints of God's providence are metaphorically called his "bridle" and "hook" (2 Kings xix, 28). The "bride in the jaws of the people causing them to err" (Isa. xxx, 28) is God's permitting the Assyrians to be directed by foolish counsels, that they might never finish their intended purpose against Je-BRIGGLES (BRIGGITIES OR BRIDGEITIES), a monastic order in the Roman Church, also called Ordo Salentorius, founded in 1684 by Briggities (BRIGGITY or BRIDGEITY) at Vadeston, in Sweden, and confirmed in 1670 by Ulivis Y. The monks and nuns lived together under one roof, yet without seeing each other. There were to be in every convent 60 nuns, 13 priests (in honor of the twelve apostles and St. Paul), four deacons (to represent Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory, and Jerome), and 6 lay brothers. They lived on alms, were principally devoted to the worship of the Virgin Mary, and were conducted by an abbot assisted by a confessor chosen among the priests. Both sexes wore gray gowns; the nuns a crown of three white stripes with five red spots, the monks red and white crosses. Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands, Germany, Portugal, and several other countries had convents of Briggities, most of which were suppressed by the Reformation. England had only one convent, the Sion House, founded by Henry V in 1413, suppressed by Henry VIII, restored by Queen Mary, and again suppressed by Elizabeth. The most celebrated member of this order was John Ecclamadidus, the celebrated reformed of Switzerland. At present the Briggitine monks are entirely extinct, while a few convents, inhabited by nuns only, were still found in 1860 in Bavaria, Poland, Holland, and England. A congregation of Briggity (or Birgitian) nuns of the Recollection was founded in the seventeenth century by Maria of Escobar at Valladolid, in Spain, which, in the eighteenth century had four convents.—Fehr, Gesch. der Mönchsröder, i. 418 sq.; Butler, Lives of Saints, Oct. 8; Helyot, Orb. Brim, "kaster," the extremity or edge of the water, Josh. iii. 15; "gophre," the lip or rim of a cup or basin, 1 Kings vii. 23, 26; 2 Chron. iv. 2, 5; "dru," up to the top of a vessel, John ii. 7.

BRISTON ("Tatwet", gophrit; "Taw", sulphur). The Hebrew word is connected with "ts, go pher, rendered "gopher-wood" in Gen. vi. 14, and probably signified in the first instance the "gun" or "resin" that exuded from that tree; hence it was transferred to all inflammable substances, and especially to sulphur—

BRIEL (Lat. brees, used in later Latin for a writing or letter). Briefs apostolical are pontifical letters from the court of Rome, subscribed by the secretary of briefs, who is usually a bishop or cardinal. They differ in many respects from bulls. Briefs are issued from the Roman court by the apostolic secretary, sealed by the fisherman's ring with red wax; bulls are issued by the apostolic chancellor, under a seal of lead, having on one side impressed the likeness of St. Peter and St. Paul, and on the other the name of the reigning pope. Briefs are written on fine and white skins; bulls on those that are thick and coarse. Briefs are written in Roman character, in a legible and fair manner; bulls, though in Latin, are in old Gothic characters, without line or stop. Briefs are dated "dia nativitatis"; bulls, "dia incarnacionis." Briefs have the date abbreviated; bulls have it at full length. Briefs begin with the name of the pope, thus, "Clement, Papa XIII," etc.; bulls begin with the words "Clement Episcoporum," by way of distinct signature. Briefs may be issued before the pope's coronation, but bulls not till afterward. Both are equally acts of the pope; but a greater weight is generally attached to the bull, on account of its more formal character. See Bull.

BRIER is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of the following words in several passages, most of them being rendered "thorn" in others. See Thorn.

BRISEUS, "the winged," from its winging, Mic. vii. 4; "thorns," Prov. xxv. 19; apparently the Arabic shadd, thought to be the Melonion epinou, i.e. Solanum inasum of Linn., or "prickly mad-apple" (Abu-Lacidi, op. Celsi Hierob. ii. 40 sq.). From both passages it appears that the Hebrew word denotes a species of thorn shrubs which were used for enclosures or hedges. Yet this characteristic is much too general to determine from it any particular species of the thorns mentioned by the Hebrew word. But the plant whose fruit is the love-apple or mad-apple (a species of small melon) is part of the family of night-shades (solanaceae), and not at all suitable for making a hedge.

BRIDGES

well-known simple mineral substance, crystalline and fusible, but without a metallic basis. It is exceedingly inflammable, and when burning emits a peculiar suffocating smell. It is found in great abundance near volcanoes and mineral wells, more particularly near; and it is spread nearly over the whole earth. In Gen. xix, 24, 25, we are told that the cities of the plain were destroyed by a rain (or storm) of fire and brimstone. There is nothing incredible in this, even if we suppose natural agencies only were employed in it. The soil of that region abounded with sulphur, and the burning of such a mass of combustible materials through volcanic action or by lightning from heaven, would cause a confirmation sufficient not only to engulf the cities, but also to destroy the surface of the plain, so that the smoke of the country would go up as the smoke of a furnace, and the sea, rushing in, would convert the plain into a tract of waters. See Sodom. Small lumps of sulphur are still found in many places on the shores of the Dead Sea. See SULPHUR. The word brimstone is often figuratively used in the Scriptures (apparently with more or less reference to the above signal example) to denote punishment and destruction (Job xlvii, 15; Isa. xlvii, 9; Deut. xxxiii, 29; Ps. xx, 6; Ezek. xxviii, 22). Whether the word is used literally or not in the passages which describe the future and everlasting punishment of the wicked, we may be sure that it expresses all which the human mind can conceive of excruciating torment (Rev. xiv, 10; xix, 20; xx, 10; xxi, 6). See HELL.

Brink, some Heb. words elsewhere rendered sometimes "brim" (q. v.).

Brisbane, a town of Eastern Australia, New South Wales, was the bishop of the Church of England, which was erected in 1859. The town ceased to be a penal settlement in 1842, and has since become a thriving place. The number of the clergy in 1859 was seven. See Clergy List for 1890 (London, 1860, 8vo). See AUSTRIA.

Brison, Samuel, born in Frederick county, Virginia, in 1797, entered the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1821, and labored in its ranks with great acceptance and success until his death at Baltimore, Oct. 13, 1853. He was twice presiding elder: 1838-1841 of the Rockingham district, and 1845-1848 of the Northumberland district. His personal character was noble and elevated, and his ministry eminently acceptable and useful. —Minutes of Conference, v, 331.

Bristol, in Gloucestershire, England, the seat of a bishopric of the Church of England, founded by Henry VIII, who in 1542 converted the abbey-church of the Augustinian monks into a cathedral, dividing the abbey lands between the bishop and the chapter, which he made to consist of a dean and six secular canons or prebendaries. The church was also served by an archdeacon, six deaners canons, a dean, and subdean, six lay clerks, and six choristers. This see is now united to that of Gloucester, and the bishop is styled of Gloucester and Bristol. The last bishop of Bristol, Dr. Allen, was transferred to Ely in 1838. The present bishop of Gloucester and Bristol (1861) is Charles Baring, consecrated 1856.

Broads, Andrew, a Baptist minister, was born in Caroline county, Virginia, in 1770. At eighteen, against his father's commands, he joined the Baptists and began to preach. Being ordained in 1791, he labored for the rest of his life (except six months in Richmond) in the counties of Caroline, King and Queen, and King William, in Virginia, though often called to other and more important fields. In 1832, and for many years afterward, Mr. Broads was chosen moderator of the Dover Association of Baptist Churches. He died Dec. 1, 1848. His publications are: A History of the Bible, 5vo; A Catechism; A Form of Church Discipline; The Dover and Virginia Collection of Hymns; and various Letters and Sermons. —Sprague, Annales, v, 390; Jeter's Memoir.

Brocardo, Jacopo, a native of Venice, who became a Protestant in the beginning of the sixteenth century. He was a visionary turn, and sought to show that the principal events of his time had been predicted in the Bible. He labored to effect a union of all Protestant states, at the head of which his plan was to place the pope in France. He wrote A Prerogative Interpretation of Genesis (Leyden, 1584, 4to), and a similar Interpretatio of Leviticus (8vo). He died at Nuremberg in 1600. —Landon, Ecclesiastical Dictionary, ii, 416.

Brook, John, a Congregational minister, was a native of Stratford, Suffolk Co., Eng. His parents came to New England when he was about 17. He graduated at Harvard in 1666. He preached at Rowley and the Isle of Shoals, which place he left to be ordained pastor at Redding, 1602, where he lived until his death, June 18, 1688. He was eminently for piety and usefulness. —Sprague, Annales, i, 124.

Brookhead, Jacob, D.D., a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, was born at Marblehead, New York, in 1782. He graduated at Union College, where he was born, in 1802. In 1804 he was president of the Reformed Dutch Church at Rhinebeck, and was afterward successively one of the pastors of the Congregational Church of New York City in 1809, pastor of the First Reformed Dutch Church of Philadelphia, which he established in 1813, and of the church in Brooklyn Street, Philadelphia in 1818. He became pastor of a church at Flatbush; in 1841 he removed to Brooklyn as minister of the Central Reformed Protestant Dutch Church of that city. He relinquished pastoral service in 1847, and died at Springfield, Mass., Jan. 5th, 1855. Great tenderness of feeling characterized his preaching and his pastoral intercourse.

Brookhead, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister of importance, born at Loundsboro, Penn., Oct. 22, 1779, travelled two years, from 1794, in N. J. and Md., emigrated to New England in 1796, and was a pioneer and founder of Methodist there and in Canada. In 1811 he settled at New Market, N. H. He was several times elected member of Congress from N. Hampshire. He was a "good man." He was a "real prince in Israel." —Minutes of Conference, vi, 579; Steven's Memorials; Sprague, Annales, vii, 240.

Brodered, prep. ἐγέραττος, rikmah', variegated work or embroidery; once (Exod. xxviii, 4) ἐγέραττος, (ραβαται, tesselated stuff, i. e. cloth (bysmus), woven is checker-work. See EMBROIDERY.

The "broderied hair" (ἅλυγα, τειλα), of 1 Tim. i, 9, refers to the fashionable custom among the Roman ladies of wearing the hair plaited, and fixed with cri- ping, a hair tenet (cf. 2 Pet. ii, 22). "The Eve of the first Chrysostom" says Sir J. Chardin, "wear their hair very long," and divided into a number of tresses. In Barbary, the ladies have their hair hanging down to the ground, which, after they have collected into one lock, they bind and plat with ribbons. The women nourish their hair with great care, and they endeavor to keep on tufts of silk, down to the heels." See HEAD-DRESS.

Brooksey, Francis, an English Non-juror, was born at Stoke in Leicestershire 1657, and educated at Cambridge. He afterward received holy orders, and became rector of Rowley in Yorkshire. He followed the fortunes of the Non-jurors, and died in 1715. His works are, A Life of Jesus Christ; A History of the Government of the Christian Church from the 18th Century and the Beginning of the Fourth (1712, 8vo); On Education (1710, 8vo) —A Life of Henry Doddered Bromley, Thomas, one of the English followers of Jacob Böhme (q. v.), was born in Worcester 1699, and died at All-Soul's, Oxford, in Cromwell's time. On the Restoration, he was deprived for non-conformity, and lived afterward with Pondage (q. v.), with whom he joined the Philadelphia (q. v.) Society of Mystics established by Jane Lead (q. v.). He wrote many mystical works, especially The Way to the Sabbath; or the Children of Israel, etc. He went beyond Böhme in pronouncing marriage unfit for perfect Christians. Bromley died in 1691. His works, in German, were published at Frankfort, 1719-29 (2 vols. 8vo).—Mosheim, Ch. Hist. iii, 481.

Brood, vonnias, a nest of young birds, e. g. of chickens (q. v.), Luke xii, 31.

Brook (very generally پنکا, nakkal; Sept. and N. T. χωρίον), rather a torrent. It is applied, 1. to small streams arising from a subterraneous spring and flowing over thin or deep valleys, such as the Arnon, Jordan, Kidron, Sorek, etc., and also the brook of the willows, mentioned in Isa. xvii, 7; 2. to winter-torrents arising from rains, which are soon dried up in the warm season (Job vi, 15, 19). Such is the noted river (brook) of Egypt so often mentioned as at the southern extremity of Palestine (Num. xxxiv, 5; Josh. xiv, 4, 47); and, in fact, such are most of the brooks and streams of Palestine, which are numerous in winter and early spring, but of which very few survive the beginning of the summer. 3. As this (Heb.) word is applied both to the valley in which a brook runs and to the stream itself, it is sometimes doubtful which is meant (see Genesis, Thee, p. 878). See STREAM.

To deal "deceitfully as a brook," and to pass away "as the stream of brooks" (Job vi, 15), is to deceive our friend when ho most needs our help and comfort; because brooks, being temporary streams, are dried up in the heats of summer, and thus the hopes of the traveller are disappointed (see Hackett's Illustra. of Scripture, p. 16). See RIVER.

Broth, پنک, porak, soup, Judg. vi, 19, 20; پنک, porak, fragments of bread over which broth is poured, Isa. lxv, 4. See EATING.

Brother (Heb. פן, ἀδελφός [see ACH-]; Gr. ἀδελφός), a term so variously and extensively applied in Scripture that it becomes important carefully to distinguish the different acceptations in which it is used. 1. It denotes a brother in the natural sense, whether the offspring of the same father only (Gen. xiii, 18; xiii, 9; Judg. ix, 21; Matt. i, 2; Luke i, 19, 10), or of the same mother only (Judg. viii, 19), or of the same father and mother (Gen. xiii, 4; xiv, 20; Luke vi, 14, etc.). 2. A near relative or kinsman by blood, e. g. a nephew (Gen. xvi, 18; xiii, 8; xxiv, 12, 15), or in general a cousin (Matt. xii, 46; John vii, 5; Acts 1, 13, 18; 1 Cor. xii, 25). One of the same tribe (2 Sam. x, 18), e. g. a fellow-Levite (Num. viii, 26; xv, 10; Neb. iii, 4). 1. One born in the same country, descended from the same stock, a fellow-countryman (Judg. xiv, 8; Ezek. ii, 11; iv, 18; Matt. v, 47; Acts iii, 22; Heb. vii, 5), or even of a common people (Gen. ii, 25; xvi, 12; xxv, 28; Num. xx, 14). 5. One born in the same state (Prov. xvii, 4; Matt. xii, 38). 6. Disciples, followers, etc. (Matt. xxvii, 40; Heb. xi, 12). 11. One of the same faith (Isa. lxvi, 10; Acts ix, 30; xi, 29; 1 Cor. v, xvi); from which and other texts it appears that the first converts to the faith of Jesus were known as "brethren" (Acts xi, 26). All the above were Christians was given to them at Antioch (Acts xi, 26).

8. An associate, colleague in office or dignity, etc. (Ezra ii, 2; 1 Cor. i, 1; 2 Cor. i, 1, etc.). 9. One of the same nature, a fellow-man (Gen. xiii, 8; xxxi, 31; Matt. v, 22, 29, 24; vii, 5; Heb. ii, 17; viii, 11). 10. One beloved, i.e. as a brother, in a direct address (Acts ii, 29; vii, 15; Heb. ii, 13). 11. A brother's pl. one associated with his brother, e. g. of the cherubim (Exod. xxv, 20; xxxviii, 9). The term is still used in the East with the same latitude (Hackett's Illustra. of Scripture, p. 118). The Jewish schools, however, distinguish between "brother" and "neighbor"; "brother" meant an Israelite by blood, "neighbor" a proselyte. They allowed neither title to the Gentiles; but Christ and the apostles extended the name "brother" to all Christians, and "neighbor" to all the world, 1 Cor. v, 11; Luke x, 29, 30 (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. ad Matt. v, 22).

BROTHERS OF OUR LORD.—In Matt. xiii, 35, James, Joses, Simon, and Judas are mentioned as brothers of Jesus, and in the ensuing verse sisters are also ascribed to him. The Protestant spirit of opposition to the Popish notion about the perpetual virginity of Mary has led many commentators to contend that this must be taken in the literal sense, and that these persons are to be regarded as children whom she bore to her husband while after the virginity of her whole, we incline to this opinion, seeing that such a supposition is more in agreement with the spirit and letter of the context than any other, and as the force of the allusion to the brothers and sisters of Jesus would be much weakened if more distant relatives are to be understood. Nevertheless, there are some grounds for the other opinion, that these were not natural brothers and sisters, but near relations, probably cousins of Christ.

In Matt. xxvii, 56, a James and Joses are described as sons of Mary (certainly not the Virgin); and again a James and Judas are described as sons of Alpheus (Luke vii, 15, 16). Which Alpheus is probably the same as Cleophas, husband of Mary, sister of the Virgin (John xix, 25). If, therefore, it were clear that this James, Joses, and Judas were the same that are elsewhere described as the Lord's brothers, this point would be beyond dispute; but as it is, much doubt must always hang over it. See Jour. Soc. Bibl. Literature, July, 1856, pp. 70, 71; Keil, Crat., 1842, i, 71 sq. I. It should be observed that in arguing at all against their being the real brethren of Jesus, far too much stress has been laid on the assumed indefiniteness of meaning attached to the word "brother" in Scripture. In all the adduced cases (see above), it will be perceived that, when the word is used in any but its proper sense, the context prevents the possibility of confusion; and, indeed, in the only two exceptional instances (not metaphorical), viz. those in which Lot and Jacob are respectively called "brothers" of Abraham and Laban, the word is only extended so far as to mean "nephew," and it must be remembered that these cases are quoted from a single book, seven centuries earlier than the Gospels. If, then, the word "brethren," as repeatedly applied to James, etc., really mean "cousins" or "kinsmen," it will be the only instance of such an application in which no data are given to correct the laxity of meaning. A single really parallel case can be adduced from the N. T. except the metaphorical, so much rhetorical and tropological passages; whereas, when "nephew" are meant, they are always specified as such, as in Col. iv, 10; Acts xxiii, 16 (Kitt, The Apostles, etc. p. 165 sq.). There is therefore no adequate warrant in the language alone to take "brethren" as meaning more relatives than brothers. "BROTHERS" was an appellation for Christians was given to them at Antioch (Acts xi, 26).

8. An associate, colleague in office or dignity, etc. (Ezra ii, 2; 1 Cor. i, 1; 2 Cor. i, 1, etc.). assumed that no importance is to be attached to the mere fact of their being invariably called Christ's brethren, whereas this consideration alone goes far to prove that they really were so.

II. There are, however, three traditions respecting them. They are first mentioned (Matt. xiii, 56) in a manner which would certainly lead an unbiased mind to conclude that they were our Lord's uterine brothers. "Is not this the carpenter's son? is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren James, and Joseph, and Judas, and Simon? and are they not all with us?" But since we find that there was a "Mary, the mother of James and Joseph" (Matt. xxviii., 86), and that a "James and Judas (?)" were sons of Alphæus (Luke vi, 15, 16), the most general tradition is, (I.) That they were all our Lord's first cousins, the sons of Alphæus (or Clopas—not Cleopas, see Alford, Gk. Text. Matt. x, 3) and Mary, the sister of the Virgin. This tradition is fully accepted by Jerome (Cat. Script. Ecc. 2), Augustine, and the Latin Church generally, and is now the one most commonly received. Yet there seem to be forcible arguments against it: for (1.) The reasoning depends on three assumptions, viz. a. that "his mother's sister" (John xix, 25) must be in apostolic position with "Mary, the wife of Cleophas," which, in case sisters-german-are-german would be improbable, if only on the ground that it supposes two sisters to have had the same name, a supposition substantiated by no parallel cases [Wieseler (comp. Mark xv, 40) thinks that Salome, the wife of Zebedee, is intended by "his mother's sister"]. b. That "Mary, the mother of James," was the wife of Alphæus, i.e. that the James intended is "James [the son of Alphæus]" (Ἰάκωβος ὁ Ἀλφαίος). c. That Cleophas, or, more correctly, Clopas, whose wife Mary was, is identical with Alphæus; which, however possible, cannot be positively proved. See Alphæus. (2.) If his cousins only were meant, it would be signally untrue that "neither did his brethren believe on him" (John vii, 5 sq.), for in all probability three out of the four (viz. James the Less, Simon i.e. Zelecas, and Jude, the brother [?] of James) were actual apostles. (3.) It is quite unaccountable that these "brethren of the Lord," if they were only his cousins, should be always mentioned in conjunction with the Virgin Mary, and never with their own mother Mary, who was both alive and in constant attendance on our Lord. (4.) They are generally spoken of as distinct from the apostles; see Acts i, 14; 1 Cor. ix, 15; and Jude (17) seems almost to imply that he himself was not an apostle.

(II.) A second tradition, accepted by Hilary, Ephianius, and the Greek fathers generally, makes them the sons of Joseph by a former marriage with a certain Euseba or Salome, of the tribe of Judah; indeed, Ephianius (Heres. 29, § 4) even mentions the supposed order of birth of the four sons and two daughters. But Jerome (Comm. in Matt. xii, 40) slighted this as a mere conjecture, borrowed from the "deliberante Apostrophorum," and Origen says that it was taken from the Gospel of St. Peter. The only ground for its possibility is the apparent difference of age between Joseph and the Virgin.

(III.) They are assumed by many to have been the offspring of a Levirate marriage between Joseph and the wife of his deceased brother Clopas. This, although a mere hypothesis, is the only one that actually meets all the conditions of the problem. For the discussion of the details of this adjustment, see James; Mary. The accompanying table exhibits the whole subject in one view, with the passages bearing upon it, and the adjustment proposed of this difficult question (see Medh. Quart. Review, 1851, p. 671-672).

See Brethren. In the Roman Church it came to be especially applied to monks. When those monks who were priests assumed the name of Fathers (Patres), the name brothers was reserved to the members who were not ordained. Since the 18th century this title has also been given to the begging monks, in distinction from the other orders of monks. In the Protestant churches it is common for ministers to address each other by the name brother.

BROTHERS, Richard, an enthusiast and pretended prophet, was a lieutenant in the British navy, which he quitted in 1789. Declining to take the oath required on receipt of half pay, he was very near dying of hunger, and was ultimately taken to a workhouse. From the year 1790 Brothers dates his first call. On May 12, 1792, he sent letters to the king, ministers of state, and speaker of the House of Commons, stating that he was commanded by God to go to the Parliament-house on the 17th of that month, and inform the members for their safety that the time was come for the kingdom. On the 7th chapter of Daniel. Accordingly, on the day named, he presented himself at the door of the House of Commons, and, according to his own account, met with a very scurvy reception. Having some time after prophesied the death of the king, the destruction of the monarchy, and that the crown should be delivered up to him, he was committed to Newgate, where, if his statement be true, he was treated with great cruelty. On his liberation, he continued that he denounced his ministry with renewed energy, and obtained many followers. While the more rational part of the community were laughing at the prophet, there were some persons of liberal education and of good ability who maintained the divinity of his mission. Among these, Nathaniel Braasey Halbed, Esq., M. P. for Lyminster, and Mr. Sharp, an eminent engraver, were the most zealous: they published numerous pamphlets and testimonials in his favor, and others to the same effect appeared by Bryan, Wright, Mr. Webber, and an apothecary by the name of Mrs. Green. Among other things, Halbed bore testimony to his prophesying correctly the death of the three emperors of Germany. Among several strange letters which Brothers published was one entitled "A Letter from Mr. Brothers to Miss Cott, the recorded Daughter of King David, and future Queen of the Hebrews, with an Address to Members of the House of Nobility and of the Council." (1798.) Such an effect had these and other similar writings on people of weak understanding, that many persons sold their goods and prepared themselves to accompany the prophet to his New Jerusalem, which was to be built on both sides of the River Jordan, and where he was to arrive in the year 1785. Jerusalem was then to become the capital of the world; and in the year 1798, when the complete restoration of the Jews was to take place, he was to be revealed as the prince and ruler of the Jews, and the governor of all nations, for which office he appears to have had a greater predilection than for that of president of the council or chancellor of the exchequer, which he said God offered for his acceptance. Taken altogether, the writings of Brothers are a curious jumble of reason and insanity, with no small number of contradictions. He was placed in a lunatic asylum, from which he was released in 1806, and died in 1824. One of his disciples, Finlayson, published in 1849 a book, "The Last Trumpet," more fanciful, if possible, than Brothers' own book. There are still a few of his disciples left in England.—English Cyclop. s. v.

Broughton, Hugh, was born at Oldbury, Shropshire, 1549, and educated at Cambridge, where he became conspicuous for his knowledge of Hebrew. He afterward proceeded to London, where he became a popular preacher. In 1588 he published his Concern of Scripture, a kind of Scripture chronology and genealogies. Broughton was desirous of translating the New Testament into Hebrew, but received no encouragement. Lightfoot pronounces a high eulogium on his rabbinical learning. He was certainly one of the best Hebrew scholars of his time, and had translated the Apocrypha into Hebrew; but his pride and ill temper hindered his advancement in the Church. He died in London, Aug. 4, 1612. Most of his works were collected under the title, The Works of the great Alburnian Divine, renowned in many Lands for rare Skill in Salem's and Athens' Tongues, etc. (London, 1622, fol.)—New Gen. Biog. Dict. v, 97; Allibone, i, 255; Darling, Cyclopædia Bibliographica, i, 447.

Broughton, Richard, a Romanist, born at Stukeley, Huntingdonshire, and educated at Rheims. He took priest's orders in 1593; was sent into England as a missionary, and died in 1634. His principal works are, An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, from the Notivity to the Conversion of the Saxons (Douay, 1638, fol.); A Monitory to the Church of Great Britain in the Time of the Brioms (1650, 8vo); —Monasticum Britannicum (1655, 8vo).—New Gen. Biog. Dict. v, 97; London, Ecl. Dict. ii, 418.

Broughton, Thomas, a learned divine, born in London July 5, 1704, and educated at Eton and Cambridge, received orders in 1727. After various preferments he became vicar of Bedminister, 1744, and prebendary of Salisbury. He died Dec. 2, 1774. Among his works is Christianity distinct from the Religion of Nature, a reply to the infidel work "Christianity as old as the Creation" (Lond. 1732, 8vo); various lives in the Biographia Britannica, and the Bibliotheca Historica-Sacra, a historical dictionary of all religions (Lond. 1757-62, 2 vols. fol.).—New Gen. Biog. Dict. v, 97; London, Ecl. Dict. ii, 418.

Brousson, Claude, a French Protestant advocate and martyr, born at Nimes 1647. In his house at Toulouse the deputies of the Protestant churches assembled in 1688, when it was resolved that the religious meetings of the Protestants should be continued after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Brousson retired to Geneva and Lausanne, and, having been ordained, proceeded to places in Spain, Belgium, Poland, and Germany. His labors led finally to the establishment of the "Churches of the Desert." See Court, Anthony. Being arrested at Oleron in 1698, he was broken on the wheel at Montpellier. He left, among other writings, L'état des Réformés de France (Switzerland, 1684; Hague, 1685)—Lettres au clergé de France.—Lettres des protestants de France à tous les autres protestans de l'Europe (Berlin, 1688)—Relation sommaire des merveilles que Dieu fait en France dans les Cevennes (1684, 8vo). Brow, Alexander Blaine, D.D., a Presbyteri-Brown, Francis, D.D., was born at Chester, N. H., Jan. 11, 1784. He graduated at Dartmouth College 1806, and a year after his graduation became tutor in the college, where he remained till 1809. He was ordained pastor in North Yarmouth, Me., in 1810. In 1815 he was elected president of Dartmouth College, and remained in this position until his death, July 2, 1859. He died at Cambridge, Mass., on a journey home from Frankfort, Va., where he had attended the deathbed of his daughter, he was taken sick at Lewisburg, and there died, June 8, 1862.——Wilson, Presbyterian Almanac, 1863.

Brown, Isaac V., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Somerset Co., N. J., Nov. 4, 1784; graduated at Nassau Hall, Princeton, and studied theology with Dr. Woodhull, of Freehold; was ordained by the New Brunswick Presbytery as pastor at Lawrenceville, N. J., where he established the now celebrated Lawerenceville Classical and Commercial Boarding-school. He remained at its head until 1838, when he removed to Mount Holly. He passed the remainder of his life in that vicinity, preaching, but especially devoted to literary labors. He died April 19, 1861. He was one of the founders of the American Colonization Society, and labored for it earnestly. He published Life of Robert Finley, D.D., a work on The Unity of the Human Race, and A Historical and Vindication of the Abrogation of the Plan of Union by the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A.—Wilson, Presbyterian Almanac, 1862.

Brown, James Caldwell, D.D., a minister of the Presbyterian Church (O. S.), was born at St. Clairsville, Ohio. In his 16th year he entered Jefferson College, Pa., as a freshman, and while there converted with the Baptist Church. From Jefferson College he passed to the Western Theological Seminary at Alleghany, Pa., where he remained two years, and finally graduated at the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Harmony, S. C. He went in 1830 to Indiana, to do missionary work in the wild countries lying along the southern end of Lake Michigan. He settled at Valparaiso, Porter County, where he preached for twenty-one years, and built up the largest Presbyterian Church in Northern Indiana. In fact, nearly every Presbyterian Church within a circuit of thirty miles was organized by him, and he received 110 members in the thirteen years, 1837-1849, simultaneously from Jefferson and Hanover colleges. In 1860 he resigned his charge in Valparaiso to become the general agent of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest at Chicago, Illinois. Before resigning his charge, he initiated measures which resulted in the establishment of a Presbyterian institution. The nine years of the rebellion prevented him from accomplishing anything as general agent of the Theological Seminary. In the winter of 1861 he preached as a supply to the church in South Bend, Ind., and while there he was elected chaplain of the 48th Indiana Volunteers. He joined his regiment in May, 1862, and served in Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama. Being attacked with camp diarrhea, he was ordered home to recruit his health, but was only able to reach Paducah, Ky., where he died July 14, 1862.——Wilson, Presbyterian Almanac, vol. v, 1863.

Brown, James Moore, D.D., a clergyman of the Old School Presbyterian Church, was born in the Valley of Virginia, Sept. 13, 1729. He was educated at Washington College, Lexington, Va., where he also studied theology under Dr. Geo. A. Baxter. He was licensed by Lexington Presbytery at Mossy Creek Church, Rockingham County, Va., April 13, 1824. On Sept. 30, 1826, he was ordained and installed pastor over the churches at Geradstown, W. Va., and Falling Waters, in Berkeley County, Va., within the bounds of Westchester Presbytery. The bounds of his congregation extended about thirty miles along the base of North Mountain, and there he labored, like an apostle, faithfully and successfully, exploring and establishing preaching places in destitute places around him, until, in 1835, at the earnest solicitation of the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, he undertook an agency for the cause of missions, and removed to Prince Edward County as a more central location for his work. In April, 1837, he received and accepted a call to the church of Kanawha, West Virginia, where he labored for four or five years. On a journey home from Frankfort, Va., where he had attended the deathbed of his daughter, he was taken sick at Lewisburg, and there died, June 8, 1862.——Wilson, Presbyterian Almanac, 1863.

Brown, John, D.D., Vicar of Newcastle, born in Northumberland 1715, and educated at Cambridge, was made rector of Great Horkesley, Essex, 1715, and vicar of St. Nicholas, Newcastle, 1758. He committed suicide, in a fit of insanity, 1768. He was an ingenious writer, of more talent than learning. He wrote An Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times (Lond. 1751—58, 2 vols. 8vo), which was very popular; Sermons on Various Subjects (Lond. 1754, 4vo); and Observations shewing the Characteristics (Lond. 1764, 8th ed.); and other minor works.

Brown, John, of Haddington, was born at Kerpoo, Perthshire, Scotland, 1722. His early education was neglected, and he taught school to support himself during his preparatory studies. In the Burgher (q. v.) schism in the Secession Church he joined the moderate party; and, after studying under the Reverend Erskine, he was licensed in 1760. His parochial duties being limited, he adopted a plan of daily study to which he kept rigidly by life. By patient industry he became acquainted with the Oriental languages, as well as the classical and modern: but he applied himself especially to divinity and ecclesiastical jurisprudence. In 1768 he became professor of divinity to the Associate Synod, and held the office till his death in 1787. His chief works are Dictionary of the Bible (Lond. 1769, 2 vols. 8vo; often reprinted)—Self-interpreting Bible (Lond. 4to; often reprinted)——Comprehensive History of the British Churches (Edinb. 1825, new ed. 2 vols. 8vo)——Concordance to Scripture (Lond. 1816, 18mo)——Harmony of Prophecies (Lond. 1800, 12mo, new ed.); besides minor writings.—Jameison, Relig. Biog. p. 71; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, 1, 251.

Brown, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Co. Antrim, Ireland, June 16, 1763. His father emigrated to South Carolina, and the son's early education was limited. At 16 he entered the military service as a volunteer. After the war he studied theology, and in 1783 was licensed to preach, and became pastor of Waxhaw Church, S. C. In 1809 he was appointed professor of Moral Philosophy in the College of S. C., and in 1811 president of the University of Georgia. He was made D.D. by Princeton College. He was a member of the university for many years, and on retiring he devoted himself again to pastoral work in Georgia. He died Dec. 11, 1842.—Sprague, Annals, lli, 536.

Brown, John, D.D., a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born near Bremen, July 21st, 1771. He was early pious, and from boyhood had a strong desire to go to America, and emigrated in 1797. He studied theology with Rev. Philip Steoek, in Chambersburg, Penn., was licensed by the Synod of the German Reformed Church in 1800, and ordained in 1802. He was one of the prime preachers of long-settled congregations in the Valley of Virginia. His labors extended over a wide field, including six counties, and in the earlier part of his ministry he travelled to his appointments on foot, staff in hand. Though often tempted by calls from abroad, he labored in the same field—having been relieved of parts of it from time to time—by the arrival of preachers coming in to the time of his death, Jan. 26th, 1850, almost half a century. In 1818 he published, in the German language, a volume of 400 pages, being a kind of Pastoral Address to the Germans of Virginia, which exerted a happy influence on the minds and hearts of those for whose soul it was intended. Dr. Brown was possessed of fine talents, earnestly pious, mild, affectionate, and patriarchal in his spirit, widely useful and greatly beloved wherever he was known. He preached only in the German language.

Brown, John, D.D. (grandson of Brown of Haddington), one of the most eminent of Scotch divines, was born July 23, 1784, at Whithburn, Scotland, and educated in literature and theology in the “Secession School.” Soon after he was licensed as a preacher, and he received a call from the Burgher congregation at Biggar, to the pastoral charge of which he was ordained in 1806. In 1821 he became pastor of the United Secession Church, Rose Street, Edinburgh, and, on the death of Dr. James Hall, he succeeded that minister as pastor of Broughton Place Church, Edinburgh. The Burgher and Anti-burgher Seceders having united in 1820 under the name of the United Associate Synod, Dr. Brown was chosen one of their professors of divinity in 1822. The body to which he belonged was merged in 1849 in the United Presbyterian Church (q.v.). He held his post as professor, with the pastoral charge of the United Presbyterian Church, Broughton Place, Edinburgh, till his death, Oct. 19th, 1858. Dr. Brown was greatly respected and loved as an eminent pulpit orator, and his stellar Christian character and mild, manly, and polished manner of speaking and affection of all the people of God who knew him, however separated among men by different names. What Dr. Chalmers was in the Free Church, what Dr. Wardlaw was among Congregationalists, what Dr. Bunting was among Wesleyans, that was Dr. Brown among United Presbyterians. All these felt men belonged, in one sense, specially to their respective denominations, but in another and far higher sense they belonged to the Christian world, and were equally esteemed and beloved by Christians of all denominations. He was a very voluminous writer, as he was in the habit of publishing his Divinity Lectures, and also many of his congregational lectures. In theology he is probably to be classed with moderate Calvinists or Baxterians, and this type of doctrine prevails in the United Presbyterian Church. His writings include The Law of Christ respecting Civil Obedience (Lond. 1839, 8d ed. 8vo) — Expository Lectures on 1 Peter (Edin. 1839, 8v. 8vo) — Acts and Sayings of our Lord Jesus Christ (Edin. 1850, 3 vols. 8vo; N. Y. 1854, 2 vols. 8vo) — Exposition of Lord’s Prayer (Lond. 1850, 8vo) — Sufferings and Glories of Messiah (N. Y. 1855, 5 vols.), besides a number of practical treatises. — Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. p. 424; Meth. Qu. Rev. 1854, p. 494; N. Brit. Rev. Aug. 1860.

Brown, Matthew, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Northumberland Co., Pa., in 1776. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, in 1794, commenced the study of theology about 1796, and was licensed by the presbytery of Carlisle Oct. 8, 1797. After having for some time had the charge of the congregation of Millfin and Lost Creek, he became in 1805 pastor of the congregation of Washington, Pa., and principal of the Washington Academy, the latter being in 1806 merged in the Washington College. Mr. Brown was elected first president of the college, which situation he filled until Dec., 1816, still remaining pastor of his congregation. After leaving Washington College, he declined the presidency of Centre College, Danville, Ky.; yet in 1822 he accepted that of Jefferson College at Cannonsburg, which college he filled with distinguished success for three years. In 1823 he was made D.D. by the College of N. J., and subsequently LL.D. by Lafayette and Jefferson colleges. After a time he became also pastor of the congregation at Cannonsburg, and continued as such until his health compelled him to tender his resignation of the presidency of the college in 1849; yet his labors as a pulpit did not wholly cease till near the close of life. He died at Pittsburg July 29, 1853. He published A Memoir of the Rev. Obadiah Jennings, D.D. (1832) — Extracts from Lectures by Dr. Chas. Niblet, President of Dickinson College, with Remarks from other Writers (1840), with a number of occasional sermons and addresses. — Sprague, Annals, iv, 256.

Brown, William Lawrence, D.D., an eminent Scotch divine, born in 1755, was educated at St Andrew’s, Aberdeen, and at Utrecht. In 1778 he became minister of the English Church in Utrecht; in 1795 he removed to Scotland and became professor of divinity at Aberdeen, and afterward principal of Marischal College. He died in 1830. His writings include Sermons (Edinb. 1803, 8v. 8vo) — Comparison of Christianity with other Forms of Religion (Edinb. 1826, 2v. 8vo) — Essay on the Existence of a Supreme Creator (Edinb. 1816, 8vo), which obtained the Burnet prize of £250.

Brown, Arthur, the only Episcopalian minister in New Hampshire till after the Revolution, was born in Drogheda, Ireland, in 1739, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and emigrated as missionary to America in 1729, becoming rector of King’s Chapel in Providence, R. I., in the following year. In 1736 he removed to Portsmouth, N. H., where he labored for 37 years. He died in 1773 much lamented. — Sprague, Annals, v, 76.

Brown, George, D.D., archbishop of Dublin, the first prelate who embraced the Reformation in Ireland. He was originally a friar of the order of St. Augustine, took the degree of D.D. in 1534, and in 1555 was made archbishop of Dublin. When Henry VIII. ordered the monasteries to be destroyed, Archbishop Browne immediately ordered that every vestige of superstitious relics, of which there were many in the two cathedrals of Dublin, should be removed. He afterward caused the same to be done in the other churches of his diocese, and supplied their places with the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord’s Prayer. In 1540 the Archbishop was ordained priest, and has been issued that the Liturgy of King Edward the Sixth should be compiled, it was violently opposed, and only by Browne’s party received. Accordingly, on Easter day following, it was read in Christ Church, Dublin, in the presence of the mayor and the bailiffs of city; when the archbishop delivered a judicious, learned, and able sermon against keeping the Bible in the Latin tongue and the worship of images. In October, 1553, the house of all saint was discontinued on Browne. On account of his zeal in the Reformation, he was deprived of his see by Queen Mary in 1554. He died in the year 1556. — Jones, Christian Biog. p. 71; Hook, Eccl. Biog. iii, 175.

Browne, Simon, a Dissenting minister of England, was born in 1690 at Shepton Mallet, Somerset. He observed the orthodox congregations of Bristol and Bath, and, after a residence of seven years at the latter town, he settled at London, where he remained as a practitioner during the rest of his life. His famous work, the Reliquia Medici, was first published surreptitiously 1642, but afterward given to the world in a new edition by the author himself. This work, on its first appearance, drew down upon the author many grave charges against his orthodoxy and even his Christian belief, which were triumphantly refuted by Browne, who was the most sincerely religious of men. It has been very often reprinted. The Reliquia Medici was followed by the Treatise on Vulgar Errors (1646), the Hydriotaphia, or a Treatise on Urns Burials (1648), and the Garden of Cyrus (1658). His Christian Morals was published after his death by Dr. Jeffrey (1716). Browne died in 1682. The works of Sir Thomas Browne are marked with the odd conceits and errors of his age, but are remarkable for their majestic eloquence and wealth of illustration. His life by Dr. Johnson was prefixed in 1745 to the first edition of Johnson's Dictionary of the English Language.

Browne, Sir Thomas M.D., the distinguished author of the Religio Medici, was born in London 1605. His early education was received at Winchester and Oxford. He studied medicine subsequently, and took his degree of M.D. in 1633. In 1635 he settled at Norwich, where he remained as a practitioner during the rest of his life. His famous work, the Religio Medici, was first published surreptitiously 1642, but afterward given to the world in a new edition by the author himself. Brownell, Thomas C., D.D., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Connecticut, was born at Westport, Mass., October 13, 1779. He entered Yale College in 1795, and was graduated in 1799. In 1802 he was ordained to the presidency of Union College, but in 1809 he removed to the presidency of Union College, and in 1810 to the presidency of Union College, and in 1816 he was ordained deacon and priest, and some time after became one of the ministers of Trinity Church, New York. In 1819 he was elected bishop of Connecticut, and was consecrated on the 27th day of October, 1821. In his early career he was a zealous and efficient worker, and in still later life he was a consistent and active advocate of the religious and moral improvement of his denomination. He was a man of large intellect, and possessed a singular power of self-control and self-restraint. He was a man of great personal influence, and was beloved and respected by all who knew him. Brownists, a sect of Puritans so called from their leader, Robert Brown. He was born, it is supposed, at Totton, Rutland, and educated at Bennett College, Cambridge. His Puritanism was first of the school of Cartwright, but he soon went far beyond his master. He went about the country inveighing against the discipline and ceremonies of the Church of England, and exhorting the people by no means to comply with the requirements of the Liturgy Book. He was at first called the "Brownist," and it was supposed he had taken custody, but he was soon released. In 1582 he published a book entitled The Life and Manners of true Christians, to which was prefixed, A Treatise of Reformation without tarrying for any. He was again taken into custody, but released on the intercession of his relative the lord treasur. For many years afterward he traveled through various parts of the country, preaching against bishops, ceremonies, ecclesiastical courts, ordaining of ministers, etc., for which, as he afterward boasted, he had been committed to thirty-two prisons, in some of which he could not see his hand at noon-day. At length he formed a body of his own discipline, but, being forced to leave the kingdom by persecution, they accompanied Brown to Middleburg in Holland.

BRUCE

In 1825 he was installed as one of the ministers of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church in New York. About 1849 Dr. Brownlee was prostrated by an apoplectic stroke, which paralyzed one side of his body. From this he slowly and gradually recovered, resuming his home and his clerical duties, and maintaining a certain degree of mental activity. But he was never after able to engage in active duty. He died in New York, Feb. 10, 1860. Dr. Brownlee was a very earnest exponent of Romanism, and was engaged in the controversy with Bishop Hughes and others for years. Among his publications are a Treatise on Popery (N. Y., 1815); The Revolting Controversies of the Church of England; The Rights of Christian Liberty (N. Y., 1819); Light and Shadows of Christian Life (N. Y., 12mo); Inquirv into the Principles of the Quakers (12mo); Christian Youth's Book (18mo):—Brownlee on Baptism (24mo);—Christian Father at Home (12mo);—On the Duty of Christ (24mo), etc., and several pamphlets and premium tracts, besides editing the Dutch Church Magazine through four consecutive volumes. Stored with knowledge, familiar with almost every department of learning, he possessed a ready facility in bringing his enlarged resources to bear on matters of practical utility with great effect. And, pioneer in the Catholic controversy, he was mainly instrumental in restoring the attention of the community to a system then regarded by him, and now regarded by many, as fraught with danger to our cherished liberties. In this cause his zeal was ardent, his courage indomitable, his efforts unmeasured, and his ability and eloquence admitted by all. His sermons and lectures were from year to year listened to by eager crowds. Dr. Brownlee usually preached without being trammeled by the use of notes, either extemporaneously, or having written and committed his discourses to memory. The general character of his preaching was argumentative, but enlivened and illustrated by flashes of fancy, brilliant and beautiful. His views on Christian instruction were not far from those of the "Calvinistic school."—Dr. Knox, in the Christian Intelligencer, Feb. 16, 1860; Memorial of the Rev. Dr. Brownlee (N. Y. 1860).

BROWNING, RALPH (Lat. Brunius), bishop of Exeter, was born at Ipswich in 1592, and educated at Cambridge, where he became master of Catharine Hall. In 1621 he became prebendary of Ely, and in 1631 archdeacon of Canterbury, and appointed to the see of Exeter, and elected March 31, 1642. In 1645 he was ejected from his mastership on account of a loyal sermon which he preached before the university; and having been also deprived by the Parliament of the free exercise of his episcopal powers, and of the revenues. In this state, he was obliged to remove to the house of Mr. Rich, in Berkshire, where he lived in private until the year before his death, when he was permitted to preach at the Temple. He died Dec. 7, 1659. He was an excellent scholar and preacher; his sermons were edited by his successor, Bishop Gauden, with a life of Browning (Lond. 1655, 2 vols. 8vo.), reprinted with 22 other sermons (1674; 3 vols. fol.).—Hook, Excl. Bio, iii, 184; Landon, Eccl. Dict, ii, 429.

Bruce, Philip, a native of North Carolina, of Huguenot descent, a soldier of the Revolution, entered the Methodist ministry in 1781, and travelled extensively, filling the most important stations until he became superannuated in 1817. He closed his useful life in Tennessee, May, 1826, the oldest travelling preacher in the United States, with one exception. While in the ministry he was very efficient as a preacher, presiding elder, and in many important positions in the Church. The Virginia Conference, of which he was one of the fathers, delighted to honor him while he lived, and delegated one of its members to build his tomb when in 1817 Minutes of Conferences, i, 541; Sprague, Annals, vii, 73.

Bruce, Robert, an eminent Scotch preacher, was born 1598, and educated at St. Andrews. In 1598 he BRUCKER, Johann Jakob, a German divine, was born at Augsburg, Jan. 22, 1696, and educated at Jena. After serving as pastor at Kaufbeuren, he died minister at St. Ulric’s, in his native city, in 1770. He is considered the father of the science called “the History of Philosophy,” as, before his Historia Critica Philosophiae (2d ed., Lips. 1767, 5 vols. 4to), no work of the kind existed. Dr. Enfeld published an English abridgment of it. It is an elaborate and methodical work, and, though surpassed by later writers in method, it is still pre-eminent for learning. As a collection of materials it has great value. Among his other publications are, Ehrenpreis der Deutschen Gelehrsamkeit (1747, 4to); Miscellanea Philosophica (1748, 4vo); Die Heilige Schrift in der Geschichts- und Literatur-Exk gatherung (1758, fol.).—Hoefer, Biog. Generale, iv. p. 567; Tennemann, Hist. Philos. Intro. ch. 1.

Brugglers, a sect of enthusiasts founded in the village of Bruggle, canton of Bern, Switzerland, in 1746, by two brothers, Christian and Jeremias Koler. These impostors, while yet more boys, succeeded in gaining large adherents among the lower people. They prophesied the coming of the last day for Christmas, 1748, and then claimed to have obtained its postponement by their prayers. The disorders they occasioned by their teachings led to their being banished, and Jerome having been caught, underwent capital punishment at Bern in 1755. His followers awaited his return; on the third day, and the sect disappeared soon after, to be reproduced in the Buchanites (q. v.), and Millereits (q. v.) of later times.

Brun, Matthias, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Newark, N. J., April 11, 1733. After an excellent religious and academical education, he graduated at Columbia College in 1812. In 1816 he was licensed to preach, but, on account of ill health, he went to Europe, where he remained nearly three years, during six months of which he preached at the “American Chapel of the Oratory” in Paris. Returning in 1819, he again visited Europe in 1821. In 1822 he entered on home missionary work in New York, and under his labors a church grew up in Bleeker Street, of which he became pastor in 1825. He died Sept. 8, 1829, after a short illness. He prepared Essay on the Scripture of Scenes in Italy and France (Edinburgh), and contributed to various periodicals. A memoir of him by Mrs. Duncan, of Scotland, was published in 1831.—Sprague, Annals, iv., 544.

Bruis, Pierre de. See Petrobrusianus.

Bruit (the rendering of several Heb. words) is used in Scripture in a variety of significations, but implies figuratively doubts, fears, anguish on account of the prevalence of sin. Satan is said to bruise the heel of Christ (Gen. iii. 15). Christ is said to bruise the head of Satan when he crushes his designs, despises him of his power, and enables his people to tread his temptations under their feet (Rom. xvi. 20). Our Lord was bruised when he had inflicted on him the fearful punishment due to our sins (Isa. liii. 5). The King of Egypt is called a bruised reed, to mark the weak and broken state of his kingdom, and his inability to help such as depended on him (2 Kings xviii. 21). Weak saints are bruised reeds which Christ will not break (Isa. xlii. 3; Luke iv. 18). See Reed.

Bruit, a French word signifying noise, is the rendering in Jer. x. 22; Nah. iii. 19, of סֶּפֶךְ or סֶפֶּךְ a sound.

Brulius (Pierre Brilly or Brusdy), succeeded Calvin as pastor of the church in Strasbourg, on the Rhine, and was much esteemed by the people. There prevailed at this time throughout the Netherlands the most earnest desire to be instructed in the Reformed religion, so that in places where the truth was not dared not to be preached, private invitations were sent to the ministers who resided in towns where the protestant Goepel was preached openly. Some people in Ternay accordingly invited Brulius from Strasbourg. He complied with their request, and came to Ternay. September, 1544, and was most joyfully received. After some time, he made an excursion to Lille for the same object, and returned to Ternay in October. The governors of the city ordered strict search for him, and his friends let him over the wall by a rope, Nov. 2, 1544. On his reaching the ground, a stone fell on his leg and broke it. He was seized with a new and, notwithstanding the efforts of the senate of Strasbourg and of the Protestant princes, he was put to death, Feb. 19, 1545. He suffered terribly, being burned in a slow fire! But nothing could triumph over his faith, and he testified to the truth to the very last.—Middleton, Evangelical Biog, p. 154.

Brunoy, Pierre, a Jesuit writer, was born at Rouen in 1688, and settled at Paris, where he took part in the Journal de Trévoux. He undertook, at the command of his superiors, a continuation of the Histoire de la France, and finished it in 1720. He lived but to write two volumes (the 11th and 12th) and died April 16, 1742. He is perhaps best known by his Théâtre des Grèces, containing transl. of the Greek tragedies, with observations, etc. (last edit. much enlarged, Paris, 1825, 16 vols. 8vo).—Biog. Uni. vi, 90; Landon, Eccles. Dict. ii, 425.

Bruno, archbishop of Cologne and duke of Lorraine, son of the Emperor Henry the Fowler, and Bruno, archbishop of Cologne, was born in 926. He was well read in classical literature, and was a patron of learned men and of education generally. Having been employed by his brother in many important negotiations, he died at Rheims Oct. 11, 965. His life, written by Rootger, a Benedictine who lived with him, is given in Survé, Oct. 11, and in Pertz, Monum. Germ. Hist. iv, 252. The Commentary on the Pentateuch and the Lives of the Saints, sometimes attributed to him, were probably the work of Bruno of Segni. More recently his life has been written by the Bollandists in the Acta Sanctorum, Oct., tom. v (Brunus, 1786), and by Pieler, Bruno i, Einleuchter von Köln (Arnaburg, 1851).

Bruno, called also Boniface, apostle of the Frisians, called Saxo, was a Saxon nobleman who was born 270, and was called by the Emperor Otho III to his court, and appointed his chaplain about 990. Romualdus the monk (founder of the Camaldulens) came to court, and Bruno, at his own request, was admitted into his order, and departed with him (A.D. 1000). Having spent some time at Monte Cassino, and at Pisa, near Ravenna, he was sent forth to preach to the infidels, and the pope made him “Archbishop of the Heathen.” He labored incessantly, exposed to every peril and privation, among the Poles and Prussians; but, after meeting with some success and converting a prince of the country, he was martyred, together with eighteen companions, in 1009. He is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on the 15th Oct., and again as St. Boniface on the 19th June. See his life in Mabillon, Soc. Bolland. vii, 79.—Pertz, Monum. Germ. vii, 577 sqq.: Butler, Lives of Saints, June 19, ii, 600: Mohr, Ch. Hist. ii, 130: Voigt, Geschichte der Propheten, i, 588 sqq.

Bruno, founded the order of Carthusians, was born at Cologne about 1040, of rich parents. In 1073 he became chancellor of the Church at Rheims and professor of divinity, having direction of the studies in all the great schools of the diocese. Among his pupils was Odo, afterward Urban II. About 1077 he joined in an accusation against Manasses, the simoniacal archbishop of Rheims, who deprived him of his canonicalry. Disgusted with the corruptions of the clergy and of the times, Bruno retired into solitude and built a hermitage, which afterward became the celebrated monastery of Chartreuse. Bruno lived but six years at the Chartreuse; at the end of that period he was called to Rome by Urban II; and, having refused the bishopric of Reggio, retired, in 1095, into Calabria, where he died, Oct. 6, 1101, at La Torre. He was canonized by Pope Leo X in 1514, and his festival is kept on the 6th of October. The works attributed to him are the Dialogus de iis claris, 1584, and again at Cologne (1611, 3 vols. fol.); —Hook, Exel. Bizog. iii, 185; Mosheim, Ch. Hist. ii, 178 note; Hoefer, Nouv. Bizog. Gémile, vii, 630. See CATHARSIANS.

BRUNO, GIORDANO, a philosopher of great boldness and genius, was born at Nola about 1550. Having entered the Dominican order, he soon began to doubt the Romish theology, and had to quit his convent. He fled to Geneva in 1586, where he lived two years, and then went to the court of Calvin, and, to suit his sceptical temper, and he departed for Paris. Here he gave lectures on philosophy, in which he openly attacked the Aristotelians. Having made himself many enemies among the professors, as well as among the clergy, he went to England in 1589, where he gained the friendship of Sir Philip Sidney. In 1590 he dedicated his Spazio della beatissima istanza, an allegorical work against the court of Rome, with the Cosa delle Ceneri, or "Evening Conversations on Ash-Wednesday," a dialogue between four interlocutors. He also wrote Della causa, principio ed uno, and Dell' infinito universale, in which he developed his ideas both on natural philosophy and metaphysics. His system is a form of pantheism: he asserted that the universe is infinite, and that each of the worlds contained in it is animated by the universal soul, etc. Spinoza borrowed some of his theories from Bruno. Duhle (History of Modern Philosophy) gives an exposition of Bruno's system; see also Jacob's Preface to the "Letters on the Doctrine of Spinoza." In his next work, Colaba del caval Pegaso con l'aggiunta dell' asino Cileno, he contends that ignorance is the mother of happiness, and that "he who promotes science increases the sources of grief." Bruno's language is symbolic and obscure; he talks much but the content of his thoughts and his style is harsh and inegalent. After remaining about two years in England, during which he visited Oxford, and held disputations with the doctors, he passed over to Paris, and thence to Wittenberg, and lectured there and in Frankfort till 1592, when he returned to Padua, and thence to Venice. The Inquisition arrested him, and retained him in prison for six years, vainly attempting to reduce him to recantation. On the 9th of February, 1600, he was excommunicated, and delivered to the secular magistrate. He was burnt Feb. 16, 1600. Bruno wrote very largely. His Italian writings were collected and published at Leipzig in 2 vols. 8vo. His writings in Latin were collected by Strigel, under the title Jordanis Brunii Scripta qua Lat. vel omnia (1834, 8vo). The best works on the life and the writings of Bruno are by Bartholomius (Par. 1846, 2 vols.), and by Clemens (Bonn. 1847). —Tennemann, Man. Hist. Brunswick, a German duchy, with an area of 72 German square miles, and a population, in 1864, of 229,708 souls. In the city the Reformation was introduced as early as 1526, but in the country districts not until 1568, after the death of duke Henry, one of the most violent opposers of Luther. The Reformed Church has 3 churches and 2 other meeting-places, with (in 1861) 993 souls. They form a synod con-jointly with several congregations of Hanover and Lippe-Schaumburg. The Roman Catholics have 3 churches, with 2638 souls (in 1861); they belong to the diocese of Hildesheim, Hanover. The Jews count about 1000 souls, and have 4 synagogues. The rest are Lutherans. Subordinate to the consistory are 7 superintendents general, 70 superintendents, 253 clergymen. The number of congregations is 224, besides which there are 200 chapels. Schoolmasters and superintendents were reorganized in 1846, and rectories established in all congregations in 1851. See Hertzog; Schem, Ecoles. Year-book for 1859, p. 115 sqq. See GERMANY.

BRYANT, JACOB, was born at Plymouth in 1715, and graduated at King's College, Cambridge, 1740. The Duke of Marlborough gave him a lucrative place in the Ordnance Department. He settled at Cypenham, in Berkshire, and died Nov. 12, 1789. The edition of a mortification in the log, occasioned by falling from a chair in getting a book in his library. Bryant was an indescribable and a learned writer, but fond of paradox. His writings are often acute, but at the same time eccentric and fanciful. He wrote one work to maintain the authority of the pseudo Rowlhey's poems (1781, 2 vols. 12mo), and another to prove that Troy never existed (1796, 4to). His principal production is a New System or Analysis of Ancient Mythology (Lond. 1774, 1776, 3 vols. 4to; 3d ed. Lond. 1807, 6 vols. 8vo), and among his other works are Observations relative to Ancient History (Camb. 1787, 4to).—A Treatise on the Authors and Ethnography of the Archipelago (Lond. 1794, 8vo).—Observations on the Plagues of Egypt (Lond. 1794, 8vo).—Observations on the Prophecy of Balzam, etc. (Lond. 1808, 4to).—Davenport, s. v.; Darling, s. v.

BUCCER, MARTIN, an eminent convert of Luther, was born at Schlettstadt, in Alsace, in 1491. His real name was probably Butzer, but some say that it was Kuhhorn, for which, according to the taste of his age, he substituted the Greek synonym Bucur (βουκορ). He assumed the habit of the Dominicans when only fifteen years of age, and studied at Heidelberg for several years. He was converted to the doctrines of Erasmus, adopted the faith in Romanism, and afterward, falling in with some of Luther's writings, and hearing Luther himself disputing with the Heidelberg doctors, April 26, 1518, he was so impressed as to adopt the doctrines of the Reformation. To escape persecution, he took refuge, in 1519, with Franz von Sickingen; and in 1520 the elector palatine Frederick made him his chaplain. In 1529 he was freed from the obligations of the Dominican order by the archbishop of Speyer, on the ground that, joining so at an early age as fifteen, he had been per vic et metum compulsa. In 1522 he became pastor at Landstuhl, in Sickingen's domain, and in the same year married Elizabeth Pallast, thus, like Luther, condemning in his own practice the unscriptural Romanist notion of clerical celibacy. In 1524 he became pastor of St. Aurelia's, in Strasbourg, and for twenty years he was one of the great leaders of the Reformation in that city, and indeed throughout Germany, as preacher and professor. His great object throughout life was to promote union among the different Protestant bodies. In 1529 he was deputed by the four towns of Strasbourg, Memmingen, Landau, and Constance to the conferences appointed by Philip, landgrave of Hesse, to be held at Marburg. Here Butzer exhibited all the astonishing subtlety and fertility of his mind, equaling the most refined of the scholastic theologians in subtlety and ingenuity. He succceeded in effecting a kind of conciliation between the Lutheran and Zwinglian on the question of the real presence in the Lord's Supper. He afterward attended other conferences on the same subject, and drew up the concordat of Wittenberg in 1536, but endeavored in vain to bring over the Swiss churches. In 1548, at Augsburg, he refused to sign the celebrated Interim of Charles V. This act, exposing him to many difficulties and dangers, made him the more ready to accept the invitation sent to him by Cranmer of Canterbury to come over into England, where he was appointed divinity professor at Cambridge. When Hooper, although he had accepted the bishopric of Gloucester, refused to wear the vestments ordered for the episcopal order, Bucer wrote to him a wise and moderate letter, which incidently gives a deplorable picture of the state of the Anglican Church at this period.
The services, he says, were said in so cold and unintelligibale a manner that they might as well have been said in the Indian tongue; neither baptism nor marriage were celebrated with decency and propriety; there were no liturgical invocations to private adorations, no public censures. In 1550 he wrote his Censura, or Animadversiones on the Book of Common Prayer, Cranmer having desired to have his opinion of the book, which was for that purpose translated into Latin by Ales (q. v.). Although in the beginning of his life he refused the edicts that banished him from the book which was not either plainly taken out of Holy Writ, but at least agreeable to it, he urges pretty large alterations to avoid Romanist perverisons, many of which were happily carried into effect. Bucer died Feb. 28, 1551, at Cambridge, and was followed to the grave by 8000 persons. Five years afterward (in Mary's time) his body was dug up and publicly burned as that of a heretic. He was a very prolific writer. A full list of his works is given by Haag, La France Prot. iii, 68.
A bitterly prejudiced account of him is given by Hook, Eccl. Biog. iii, 190-218. His Scripta Anglicana, published at Basel (1557, fol.), contains a biography of him. An edition of his works, which was to comprise 10 volumes, was commenced by K. Hubert (Basel, 1577), but only one volume appeared. The first good biography of Bucer was published by Baum, Capito

Buchanan, Claudius, D.D., vice-provost of the College of Fort William, in Bengal, well known for his exertions in promoting an ecclesiastical establishment in India, and for his active support of missionary and philanthropic labors, was born on the 12th of March, 1766, at Cambuslang, a village near Glasgow.
At the age of twenty-one he made his way to London, where he succeeded in attracting the attention of the Rev. John Newton, by whose influence he was sent to Cambridge, where he was educated at the expense of Herbert of Bagworth. He then proceeded to Paris, where he became a student in the Jesuit seminary.
He returned to India in 1796 as one of the East India Company's chaplains, and, on the institution of the College of Fort William in Bengal in 1800, he was made professor of the Greek, Latin, and English classics, and vice-provost. During his residence in India he published the Christian Researches in India (5th ed. Lond. 1812, 8vo), a book which attracted considerable attention at the time, and which has gone through a number of editions. In 1804 and 1805 he gave various sums of money to the universities of England and Scotland, to be awarded as prizes for essays on the difficult questions of Christianity. He returned to India in 1808, and during the remainder of his life continued, through the medium of the pulpit and the press, to enforce his views. His reply to the statements of Charles Buller, Esq., M.P., on the worship of the idol Guggernaut, which was addressed to the East India Company, was laid on the table of the House of Commons in 1813 and printed. He died at Broxbourne, Herts, February 9, 1815, being at the period of his death engaged in superintending an edition of the Scriptures for the use of the Syrian Christians who inhabit the coast of Malabar. He published also The Colonial Ecclesiastical Establishment (2d ed. Lond.
1808, 8vo);—Sermons (Edinb. 1812, 8vo).—An Apology for priests (Edinb. 1814, 8vo).—His Life, by the Rev. Hugh Pearson, was published in 1819 (Lond. 2 vols. 8vo; 5th ed. 1846).

Buchanan, George, was born in 1506 at Kil-lairn, in Dumfriethshire, and, after having studied at the University of Paris and served for a year in the army, he passed A.B. at St. Andrew's in 1525. In 1532 he was appointed tutor to the Earl of Cassillis, with whom he remained in France during five years. Returning from Paris with the earl, he was made tutor to the natural son of James V. Two satires, Palmoidea and Franciscana, which he wrote on the monks, soon drew down their vengeance upon him, and he was imprisoned, but was fortunate enough to escape. Once more was he imprisoned, and then, being suspected at Paris, at Bescamps, and at Coimbra, at which latter city the freedom of his opinions again caused his imprisonment. He next spent four years at Paris as tutor to the Marshal de Brissac's son. During this Continental residence he translated the Medea and Alce-stra of Euripides, and began his Latin Version of the Psalms. In 1560 he returned to his native land, and embraced Protestantism. In 1566 he was made principal of St. Leonard's College at St. Andrew's, and in 1567 was chosen as preceptor to James VI. When subsequently reproached with having made his royal pupil a pedant, Buchanan is said to have replied that it was not within the power of his degraded country and nation to correspond the honor of the spirit with which he was endowed, and which was on all sides dreaded, in 1582. His principal work is Historia Re-rum Scotiaeum (Edinb. 1582, fol.; in English, Lond.
1690, fol.). As a Latin poet, he ranks among the highest of the modern, especially for his version of the Psalms. All his writings are given in Opera omnia, historica, etc., curante Rudolfino (Edinb. 1715, 2 vols.
4to); another complete edition was published by Burnham (Lugd. Bat. 1785, 2 vols.).

Buchanites, a fanatical sect which arose in Scotland 1788. An ignorant but shrewd woman, named Elspeth Buchanan (born 1738), gave out that she was the Spirit of God, the mysterious woman in Rev. xii in whom the light of God was restored to men. She professed to communicate the Holy Spirit, and maintained that she had brought forth a man-child, "who was to rule with a rod of iron," in the person of the Rev. Hugh White, minister of the Relief Presbyterian at Irvine, who, though an educated man, gave him-selvelf up to this delusion. A number of persons joined them. Driven from Irvine by a popular tumult, they made a settlement at New Campile, enjoying community of goods, and living in concubinage and adultery.
Mrs. Buchanan promised her deluded followers "translation" instead of death, but unfortunately died herselvelf March 29, 1791. The community held together for a while, but Mr. White left them in 1792 and went to Virginia, where he became a Universalist preacher.
The establishment was removed to Crockettford, where its last survivor, Andrew Innes, died in 1845.—Train,

Buck, Charles, an English Independent minister, was born in 1771. He served the churches at Sheerness, Hackney, and London, and died in 1815.
He is the author of A Theological Dictionary (Lond.
1802, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1811), which was afterwards enlarged by Dr. Henderson (Lond. 1847, 8vo), and has had a wide circulation both in England and America.

Buckland, William, D.D., an eminent English geologist. Dr. Buckland was born at Axminster, in Devon, in the year 1784. He received his early education at Winchester, and in 1801 obtained a scholarship in Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He took his degree of B.A. in 1803, and was elected a fellow of his college in 1809. At this time Oxford was the most unpromising school in the world for natural science. The tastes of young Buckland led him to the study of mineralogy, and in 1813 we find him appointed to the readership of mineralogy, and in 1818 to the readership of geology. In these positions he succeeded in attracting attention to the departments of physical science which he taught. But as he excited interest he also excited opposition, and every onward step that he made toward giving the science of geology a position in the University, raised an opponent to its claims. Through his long life he had to fight for his science in his Alma Mater. But he gained the victory, and Strickland and Phillips, his successors, have obtained a universal recognition of the value and importance of their teachings. In 1820 Dr. Buckland delivered a lecture at the University of Oxford, which was afterward published under the title of ‘Lindicium Geologicum; or, the Connection of Religion with Geology explained’ (Lond. 1823). In this work he showed that there could be no opposition between the works and the word of God. In 1823 he published Religione Divinariae; or, Observations on the Organic Remains attesting the Action of a universal Deity; and communications to the Proceedings of the Geological Society were very numerous, and in the first volume of the ‘Bibliographia Geologica et Zoologica,’ published by the Ray Society in 1848, we find references to sixty-one distinct works and memoirs. In 1825 Dr. Buckland accepted from his college the living of Stoke Charity, near Whitchurch, Hants; in the same year he was promoted to a canonry in the cathedral of Christ Church, and married Miss Mary Morland, of Abingdon. In 1818 he had been elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and in 1829 he was chosen a member of the council of that body, and was re-elected on each successive occasion till his illness in 1849. In 1818 he became a fellow of the Geological Society, and was twice elected president of that body. He took an active interest in the foundation of the British Association for the advancement of science, and was one of those who took the bold step of inviting this body to hold its second meeting in the University of Oxford. On this occasion he was president of the association. From that time to 1848 he was constantly present at the meetings of the body, and read many of his papers before them. In 1847 Dr. Buckland was appointed a trustee of the British Museum, and took an active part in the development of that department more especially devoted to geology and palaeontology. His only contribution to any branch of theology is his Bridgewater treatise on Geology and Mineralogy considered with reference to Natural Theology (Lond. 1857, 2d ed. 2 vols. 8vo; Philad. 1 vol. 12mo; also in Bohn’s Library, 12mo). His brain gave way from excessive labor in 1850, but he lingered till Aug. 14, 1856, when he died at Clapham. —London Athenaeum, No. 1504.

Buckley (πόρση), a clasp or brooch, in this instance of gold, sent by Alexander Balas to Jonathan Maccabees as a present of honor in conformity with the usage of royal courtesy (1 Macc. x, 89; xi, 58; comp. xiv, 44; so Josephus, πόρση, Ant. xiii, 4, 4; 5, 4). A similar usage is referred to by Trebellius Pollio (in Claud.), and the use of such ornaments is illustrated by Pliny (xxiii, 3); comp. Schlesner, Lex. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Fibula.

Buckley, a Church of England divine and prelate, was born near Marlborough, date unknown. He was educated at Cambridge, and was made D.D. there in 1596. He was afterward rector of North Farnbridge, and prebendary of Hereford; in 1604 he became archdeacon of Northampton, and vicar of St. Giles’s, Cripplegate. Becoming chaplain to the king, he grew rapidly in favor; became president of St. John’s College, 1605; canon of Windsor, 1606; bishop of Rochester, 1611, whence he was translated to Ely in 1626, and died May 23, 1631. He was a man of great learning and piety. His writings include De postestate Papae in rebus temporibus sie in regionis deponentes unaquaeque, etc. (Lond. 1614, 4to); a Discourse on Knocking at the holy Commination, and Sermones (1618).

Buckett (_completion, deli’, or _completion, deli’, from hanging down), a vessel to draw water with (Isa. xi, 15); so αὐντηλαμα, in John iv, 11; spoken metaphorically of a numerous issue (Num. xxiv, 7). See Water.
BUCKLER

(Psa. xci. 4). 3. γυμνός, tenumá (a coavering), a large shield protecting the whole body ("buckler," Ps. xxxv, 2; Ezek. xxiii, 74; xxxv, 8; xxxviii, 4; xxxix, 9; elsewhere "shield" or "target," the δανίς of Ecclus. xxxvii, 5). 4. ὅρμα, 'ro'mac (from its piercing), a lance or spear (as it is often rendered, improperly "buckler") in 1 Chron. xii, 8). See ARMOR.

The buckler or shield was a principal piece of protective armor with ancient warriors, being worn in connection both with the spear and the bow (2 Chron. xiv, 8; 20; Jer. vi, 3). The above names for this implement, the σαρκοθήρ (according to Jahn, designates the large or round form (see Geissen, Thes. p. 947). Two of these terms (combined in Ezek. xxxix, 9; Jer. xlvi, 3) appear to denote respectively the small (μαγεν) and the large (τειναμά) kind, the latter screening the entire person (Virg. Aen. ii, 227; Tyrtaios Com. ii, 23 sq.), as is evident from 1 Kings x, 16, 17; 2 Chron. ix, 15. The Mishna (Chelina, xxiv, 1) names three species of shield, the large (טנומא טנומא מגד), the middle, used in discipline, and the small (טנומא גלוס שלבית). The larger kind probably protected even the head (Josephus, Ant. vi, 5, 1; comp. Dio. Sic. v, 30). In like manner, among the Greeks and Romans a small shield was called ζώκεια (ζωκεια in Homer), κεβαμ (comp. Josephus, War. iii, 5, 5). It is certain, however, that the shield of the Hebrew, as of the Greek, was of the same form; we only know that the later Jews in the time of the Romans carried oval shields (see Jahn, Archäol. ii, ii, pl. ii, 8, 8; those of the Egyptians being rounded only at the top, Wilkinson, i, 286 sq.). The word שְּקֵל, which the old translators give very variously, designates probably the shield, and indeed those used on state occasions (Jer. ii, 11; Ezek. xxvii, 11; Can. i, 20; 20). The quarried shields were generally of wood (comp. Pliny, xvi, 77; Virg. Aen. vii, 632), and covered with thick leather (especially hippopotamus hide, Pliny, viii, 39); but the skins of other pachydermatous animals are still employed in Africa; see Rüppell, Arab. p. 94; Tafelme, Beschreib.

The Kordofan, p. 42) or metal. Leather shields (illud, iv, 492; xii, 425) consisted either of simple undressed ox (or elephant) hide (Herod. vii, 91; Strabo, xvii, p. 820, 828), or of several thicknesses of leather, sometimes also embossed with metal (illud, vii, 210 sq.; xii, 294 sq.)—hence those captured from foes might be incised with the name of the conqueror (xix, 9). The leather shields were enriched by oiling (2 Sam. i, 21; Isa. xxi, 5; comp. "leaves clypei," Virg. Aen. vii, 620), so that they should not injure by moisture; but they gleamed in the distance, sometimes they were even smeared with blood (Nah. ii, 4 [7]), so as to present a frightful appearance. Copper ("brazen") shields were, as it appears (1 Sam. vii, 6; 1 Kings xiv, 27), also in use (comp. χαλκαστίς for heavy-armed troops, in Ioph. iv, 69, 4; v, 91, 7); as even gold ones in the equipment of the general (1 Macc. vi, 29), i.e. probably studded with gold; although those named in 1 Kings x, 16 sq.; xiv, 26, as shields of parade (comp. the silver shields of Pliny, iv, 89), borne before the king in festive processions (1 Kings xiv, 26), may well have been of massive metal (comp. the golden shields of the Carthaginians, Pliny, xxxv, 3; on theoverlaying of shields [with gold, ivory, etc., see Athen. xii, 594]; among the Romans every shield was inscribed with the soldier's name (Vezet. Mith. ii, 18). The same custom appears also on the gold shields sent as gifts of honor to Rome (1 Macc. xiv, 24; xv, 18; comp. 1 Macc. vi, 2; Josephus, Ant. xiv, 8, 5; Sueto. Calig. 10). During a march the soldiers carried their shields covered (with a leather case, τηντυριαν, introducta, as a protection from dust; Isa. xx, 6; comp. the Scyth. ad Aristoph. Acharn. 574; Plutarch, Lucull. 26; Cesar. Bell. Gall. ii, 21; Cicero, Nat. Deor. ii, 14) hanging on their shoulder (Iliad, xvi, 808); but in the camp by a strap on the left arm (Iliad, xvi, 802; Virg. E. ii, 671 sq.; Pliny, xxxiii, 4; Elian, Vari. Hist. x, 9; hence the phrase in ãσνια, Xenoph. Cyrop. vii, 5, 6; Arrian, Alex. i, 6, 2, means on the shield side, or left, comp. Arist. iv, 3, 6). See generally Orelli and Thoms. De accep. (Lips. 1718); Caryophylhus, De clipeis vet. (Lugd. Bat. 1751); Spanheim, ad Julian, p. 241; Jahn, Archäol. ii, ii, 401 sq.; on the Homeric shield, Köpke, Kriegswesen der Griech. p. 108 sq. The decoration of the Jewish palaces (1 Kings x, 16; xiv, 26; Cant. iv, 4; comp. Philo. Opp. iii, 411) and Temple (1 Macc. iv, 13); comp. Strabo, xiii, 600; Arrian, Alex. vi, 9, 6; Pliny, xxxv, 3) with golden shields was a peculiar practice. In the Temple at Jerusalem the shields of David were suspended as mementoes (2 Kings x, 10); see Ezech. De clipeis in loco sacro suspensis (Lips. 1737). The suspension of the shields of Tyre in Ezek. xxvii, 10, 11, is a military allusion, by way of ostentation, to the envoys of foreign nations displayed as allies (see Henderson, Comment. in loc.). See Shield.

Buckley, Theodore William Aldis, an English clergyman and writer, was born in 1829, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he became chaplain. Being inclined to dissent from the principles of the church, he was removed to London, where his life was chiefly spent in writing books, and in preparing editions of the classics for the booksellers, and in making translations. He also published a History of the Council of Trent (Lond. 1862, small 8vo—the best small manual on that subject extant: the Omones und Decrees of the Council of Trent (Lond. 1853, sm. 8vo). He died in 1856. See Gentleman's Magazine, March, 1856; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 728.

Buckminster, Joseph, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born at Rutland, Mass., Oct. 14, 1751, and graduated at Yale in 1770. He spent three years in study, and was then chosen tutor in the college, which position he filled for four years, and in 1773 he was ordained pastor of the "North Church," Portsmouth, N. H., which station he occupied until his death, June 10, 1812. He was made D.D. by the College of New Jersey, 1803. His publications consist of a memoir of Dr. M'Cintosh and a number of occasional discourses. He was a noble spirit, very organize, but yet of a kindly temper. His writings, from disorder of which he suffered intensely at several periods of his life. His Life was written by his daughter.

Buckminster, Joseph S., D.D., son of Joseph, was born at Portsmouth, N. H., 1784. He was carefully educated, first by his father, afterward at Harvard, and studied for the ministry. In 1808 he became pastor of a Congregational Church at Boston; in 1811 he was appointed lecturer in Biblical Criticism at Harvard. His early death, June 8, 1812 (two days before his father's death), was deeply lamented throughout the country. In his theology he was a man of deep, religious feeling and of singularly pure and gentle manners. His Sermons (1826, 8vo) were reprinted in London; they were reprinted, with additions, in his Works (Boston, 1839, 2 vols. 12mo). His Life is briefly told in Memoirs of the Buckminsters, Father and Son, by his sister, Mrs. Lee (Boston, 1851, 12mo).

Budæus. See Budé.

Budæus, Johann Franz, one of the most universally learned theologians of his time, was born at Anclam, Pomerania, June 25, 1657. After studying at Greifswald, he was called to the University of Wittenberg, 1683, where he became assistant professor of philosophy in 1687. In 1699 he went to Jens, and 1629 to Coburg as professor of Greek and Latin. In 1693 he became professor of moral and political philosophy in the new University of Halle, and professor of theology at Jena in 1765. He died Nov. 19, 1729. His vast studies ranged over the fields of law and morals as well as of theology. His theology was Biblical, tending rather toward Pietism than rationalism; his philosophy was eclectic and moderate. His principal works are, Elementa philosophiae practice (Halle, 1679):—

- Institut. Philosophiae Ecclesiast. (Halle, 1705, 2 vols.);
- Historia ecclesiastica. Vet. Test. (Halle, 1726–29, 2 vols. 4to);
- Isagoge ad Thesæum. (Lips, 1769, 2 vols. 4to);
- Isagoge ad Thesæum Lipp. (Lips, 1772, 2 vols. 4to);
- Théol. Moral. (Lips, 1771, 4to);
- Miscellanea Sacra (Jena, 1727, 2 vols. 4to);
- Théol. Atheisme et Superstitione (Jena, 1716);
- Hist. Crit. theolog. dogm. et mor. (Frkft. 1725, 4to);
- Compendium Historiae Philosophicae (Halle, 1731, 8vo).

He was a distinguished contributor to the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig. His writings in the way of disputations, etc., are very voluminous, and may be counted by the hundred.—Hoefer, Bibl. Générale, vii, 718; Brucker, Hist. Phil. vol. v; Herzog, Real-Encyklop., ii, 428.

Buddha, Buddhism. Buddha, the "sage," the "enlightened" (from the Sanscrit buddha, to know), is the great teacher of the Buddhist faith. (Gautama) or Sakyamuni (the "hermit of Sakya"), the founder of Buddhism, the prevailing form of religion in Eastern Asia.

I. His life, the system of his doctrines, and the history of their diffusion are still involved in great obscurity. Until recently the sources of information respecting both Buddha and the early history of Buddhism were almost exclusively of secondary rank, the original authentic documents which are written in Sanscrit not having even been fully examined. Another cause of difficulty lies in the apparently insoluble differences between the statements of the Buddhists of different nations. A thorough investigation of some of the most important authentic documents has of late corrected many errors and shed much light on the subject. Still greater results are expected from the future, especially respecting the evolution of the historic truth from the religious myths of a number of conflicting traditions. In India, Buddha was regarded as the ninth incarnation of Vishnu as a sage, or the continuation of his incarnation as Krishna. According to others, he was an emanation from Brahma, for the reformation of Brahmanism and the abolition of the differences of caste. He is regarded as the supreme ruler of the present period of the world, and receives as such divine honors under different names in India, Tibet, China, Japan, Burmah. Some Buddhas appeared before him; others will appear after him; the total number of Buddhas, until the dissolution of the world into nothing, being assumed by some as one thousand, by others as only twenty two. The founder of Buddhism is counted as the fourth. According to the traditions of the Tibetans, he left the divine residence Dambha Topar, and came into the kingdom of Magadha, in Southern Behar, where, in the following year, he entered as a five-colored ray the womb of Maha-Maya, the virgin wife of Suddodana, and was born on the left side of Lomla, through the right horn of his mother. According to others he was from Ceylon, according to others from an unknown country. From his seventh (according to others, tenth) year he received instruction in all sorts of knowledge; at the age of sixteen (others say twenty) he married a noble virgin, but repudiated two children and two daughters. In the twenty-ninth year of his life the four great spirit kings carried him off to the most holy temple, where he consecrated himself to a clerical life. Then he lived six years as a penitent hermit, and obtained, under the name of Sakyamuni (i.e. the devotee of the house of Sakya), as a full Buddha, the highest degree of sanctity. Henceforth he worked without interruption for the propagation of his doctrines. The name of the disciple who principally assisted him was Mahakaksajja. Buddha died in the eighty-fifth year of his age. The time of his life falls, according to the chronology of the Tibetans and Mongols, in the years B.C. 2214 to 2134; according to the Japanese, he was born B.C. 1027; according to other statements, he died B.C. 548. The last statement is the one now generally adopted.

The main facts which the recent investigations, after comparing the discrepant traditions, have established as highly probable, are the following: Sakyamuni was the son of an Indian king, in the 6th century B.C., educated in the luxury of an Oriental court. Yet he ignored the pleasures of life, and preferred to wander about as a beggar, in order to get the instruction of the Brahmins. He assumed the preaching of a new religion as the great task of his life, and carried it through with great perseverance, notwithstanding the incessant persecution of the Brahmins. He combated principally against the hierarchy and the dogmatic formula of Brahmanism, in the place of which he made a simple ethical principle the central doctrine of his system, while at the same time he recognised the equal rights of all men, without distinction of birth, rank, and sex. He addressed the people in the language of the people, and taught that the suppression of passion was the only road to a union with the world-soul. The aim of life, according to him, is to remove from one's own life, as well as from the lives of others, the obstacles to a suppression of passions, and by love and meekness to assist others in the work of self-deliverance. When he died his bones were scattered all over India, and a religious worship rendered to them. His teachings and rules of wisdom were collected in writing at first in India (Nepaul), in Sanscrit, and afterward in Ceylon, in the Pali language. His disciples and successors have given to his teachings more and more of a dogmatic shape, in which the original simplicity is lost. Gotama, or the Buddha, is generally represented in statues as seated, with his legs crossed, as if in contemplation, as contemplative thought is one of the highest virtues in the system, and is one of the best means of obtaining nirvana (see below), the Buddhist heaven.

II. System of Buddhism. (a) Theology.—Buddhism rejected Brahma as the ruling spirit of the world, and admits no Almighty creator. It admits no beings with greater supernal power than man can reach by virtue and knowledge; in fact, several of the Buddhist nations have no word in their languages to express the idea of God." Buddha takes the place of God, for all practical purposes, in the worship and life of the people. In India, Buddhism is so mixed with Brahmanism that it is hard to discern the truth, but wherever it is pure it recognizes no God, no Supreme Intelligence—the primary idea of Gotama being that to predicate any Self, any Ego, is an absurdity—no soul, no future life, except as one among a myriad stages of terminable existence. It is not revealed, but discovered by man, any human being who can so see, understand, and believe, with heart, mind, and body, fears, and wants—as to attain to perfect calm, being capable of 'intuitions' which are absolute truth; wherefore Gotama, though he argued against other creeds, never proved his own by argument, simply asserting 'I know.' Its sole motors are upadana, the 'attachment to sensuous objects,' as the Sutras call it, or, as we should describe it, nature, and kamma, literally, work, the aggregate action which everything in existence must by virtue of its existence produce, and which ex rerum natura cannot die. For example: fruit comes because there is a tree; not because the tree wills it, but because its karma, its inherent aggregate of qualities, necessitates fruit, and its fruit another tree in infinite continuity. There is a final cause, but it is not sentient. All existences are the result of some cause, but in no instance is this formative cause the working of a power inherent in any being that can be exercised at will. All beings are produced and cause, attaching themselves to some previous being; the manner of its exercise, the character of its consequences, being controlled, directed, or apportioned by kamma; and all sentient existences are produced from the same causes, or from some cause dependent on the results of these causes; so that spuddana and kamma, meditately or immediately, are the cause of all causes, and the source whence all beings have originated in their present form."

Buddhism recognizes most of the lower gods of the Indian religions, especially the incarnation of Vishnu, without, however, rendering them a particular worship. (b) Cosmology, Pneumatology, and Androphylology, Logos, being the empty space according to unchangeable natural laws. The precipitate of it forms matter, an evil, from which springs a constant change of birth, according to unalterable laws grounded in that evil. Thus the germs of good and evil were developed. Each found its reward or punishment in a circular course of innumerable births, which, according to the present state of development, are divided into six realms or degrees of birth, viz., those of the pure spirits (whose head is Khorningsa), of impure (the greatest of which is Beematcher Lakrees), of men, animals, limbo-monsters, and others. Each of the six divisions has again subdivisions, through which all beings have to wander until their reunion with the divine essence (migration of souls). The seventh highest degree is the dignity of a Buddha, who is above all change of birth. The aim of the appearance of Buddha is to perfect the dignity of the empty space which has been disturbed by this development, and gradually to raise the beings of all classes to the Buddha degree. Then all that is now separate will be united, and even Buddha be dissolved in the great unity, which, however, will only take place after many millions of years. Those who are elevated above the earth are called Nats, in three divisions: 1. Jampas, who have coarse bodies, with sexual distinction and propagation; 2. Rupa, with finer bodies, without sexual distinction and propagation; and 3. Arupa, bodiless beings. Above the earth are twenty-six heavens, corresponding to the orb of the earth and of equal size. Six of these heavens are inhabited by the Nat Zatamaharit, the duration of whose life is nine millions of years. Their heaven is divided into four realms, each of which has a king. These four kings are the tutelary gods of the world. The life of the inhabitants of each of the succeeding heavens is as long again, and as happy again, as that of the preceding. The Rups have sixteen, the Arupa four heavens. Men who observe the moral law are received into the lowest heaven, and can continue to ascend until they attain the final goal of Buddhistic salvation, i.e., until they pass into nirvana. The signification of this term became early a source of hot controversy among the various schools of Buddhists. It comes not only from the Sanscrit nirvanah, which signifies nothingness, from the ending of the cycle of existence (and from); and all agree that it means the highest enfranchisement from evil; but the schools disagree whether this liberation of the soul takes place by absorption into God or into naught. The prevalent view seems to be that nirvana is not only an emanation from suffering, as the Sanscrit view, but necessitates a liquidation of the idea of existence, in line with the idea that existence, though a natural consequence of a natural law, is mere misery—that the natural man is wretched as well as evil—Gotama declared that if man, by subduing all the natural affections, could, as it were, break the chain, kill the spuddana, or attachment to sensuous things, he would, as a reward, pass out of existence—would either cease to be, or—for this is doubtful—cease to be conscious of being. The popular notion that nirvana is absorption is incorrect, for there is nothing to be absorbed into, no supreme spirit, no supreme universe, nothing, and into this nothing the man who has attained nirvana can no longer be needed. To exist is necessary; there must be a life through a myriad states or forms, each less attached to sense than the last, hence transmigration; but when it is reached the perfect result is simply annihilation, or, rather, the loss of being, for the components of being, if we understand Buddha, could not die. A dreamer system of thought was never devised, and we can account for its rapid spread only by assuming what we believe to be the fact, that the Asiatic who was below philosophy understood by nirvana not annihilation, but that state of suspended being in which one exists, but neither hopes, fears, thinks, nor feels" (Spectator, March 10, 1866). (c) Ethics.—The prominent characteristic of Buddhism is the law of causation. From Brahmanism was the importance attributed to morality. The main object of a Buddhist was to acquire merit. For the great germinating power (karmasa), which determines whether the new being to be produced shall be an insect or a worm, a foul, a beast, a man, or a devil (the highest of sentient beings), is the sum of merit and demerit. Each soul inherits the fruits of the karma, and the office of liberating and purifying its predecessors. As evil was considered to be connected with all passing phenomena, asceticism (celibacy, poverty, mortification of the senses) was inculcated as indispensable for salvation. The Five Commandments, to avoid the following: not to steal; not to destroy; not to steal; not to commit adultery; not to lie, slander, or swear; to avoid drunkenness. These five commandments are obligatory upon all men; there are other five, specially binding upon nonmoms (i.e., upon persons who give themselves up to a religious life in order to a religious end (nirvana), viz., "to abstain from food out of season—that is, after midday; to abstain from dances, theatrical presentations, songs, and music; to abstain from personal ornaments and perfumes; to abstain from a lofty and luxurious couch; to abstain from taking gold and silver. For the regular ascetics or monks there are a number of peculiar observances of a religious character. They are to dress only in rags, sewed together with their own hands, and to have a yellow cloak thrown over the rags. They are to eat only the simplest food, and to possess nothing except what they get by collecting alms from door to door in their wooden bowl. They do not speak in pairs, and must not sit on the carpet even during sleep, to lie down being forbidden. They are allowed to enter the nearest village or town to beg food, but they must return to their forests before night." (Chambers' Encyclopedia, s. v.) As to the nature and tendency of the Buddhist system of ethics, the Spectator (March 10, 1866) has the following just remarks: "Strictly speaking, the Buddhist creed, by reducing every thing to the natural law of cause and effect, should kill morals, but it does not. Of sin, in the sense of a personal transgression, and the final and everlasting punishment of the Buddhist lawet knows nothing. There is no authoritative lawgiver, nor can there possibly be one; so that the transgression of the precepts is not an iniquity, and brings no guilt. It is right that we should try to get free from its consequences, in the same way in which it is right for us to appease hunger or overcome disease, but the scenes of the act remain; and the necessity of being tranquil, subdued, and humble, it is that our minds may go out with the less eagerness after those things that unsettle their tranquillity. If we injure no one by our acts, no wrong has been done; and if they are an inconvenience to ourselves only; no one else has any right to regard us as transgressors. Nevertheless self-denial is the sum of practical ethics, and Gotama, having set up the killing of attachment to sense as the object, and self-denial as the means, has produced a noble theoretic system of ethics. No act is in the Buddhist system sin—the very idea is unknown—but then a bad act produces a bad condition of the soul in after-life. But there is no death, no stench, and bad acts are therefore to be avoided. As to what is good, everything is good, because in se everything is indifferent; but, nevertheless, that is bad relatively to its consequence which produces injury to another. If it produces injury to one’s self, no matter, because each existence is its own irresponsible lord; but if to another, then nirvana is by that injurious act postponed, and he who commits it is lower than he who does not. There is no sin, but there is unkindness, and unkindness produces fruit just as a tamarind produces fruit. It would be a crime to hurt any living thing, and strict Buddhists still refuse to swallow animal—maliciously; but it would not be a crime to commit adultery if the husband consented, a deduction formally drawn and acted on in Ceylon, because no one is injured. In practice the idea works in two ways: the really devout pass lives of the monastic kind, absorbed in themselves, and apart from the world; and the worldly follow one rule, or another, as a deviation. If the idea ever got to the extent of the situation of a great deal too distant and too shadowy—a hunt after nothing. So keenly, indeed, is this felt, that in most Buddhist countries there is a sub-creed, not supposed to be at variance with the Established Church, but to work in a less refined but quicker way. When a Sinaese, for example, feels that he has an itch, and before the Christian he has a devil to get it, not as disbelieving Buddhism, but as supposing that devils may exist as well as any thing else, and may, if kindly treated, be as useful as any other allies. Of course the race which holds such a system has, as a race, a better chance of being decent than a really pagan one, for it only half understands its own creed, and the stock texts being all very benevolent and philosophical, it takes them for a theoretic rule of life, and, though it does not fully obey the rule, it is decidedly better than if the rule were a bad one. The Burmese, for example, are on the whole distinctly a better people than the Hindoos, more especially because as human affairs must go on, they make rules for holding society together, which are quite independent of any divine rule at all, and which happen in Burmah to be decently wise." The commandments enjoined upon man to refrain from ten deadly sins, which are again divided into three classes. Five deadly sins (patricidal, altruistic, self-murder, corporeal, and imitable priest"), wounding the person of Buddha, and causing a schism among the priesthood) shut a man forever out of nirvana. Charity or self-sacrifice for the good of others is specially inculcated.

III. Worship. - The Buddhists retain many of the ceremonies of Brahmaism, but do not recognise the precepts of the Vedas. The sanctuary in their temples, which contains the relic of a saint, is called dagoba. Prayers are directed to Buddha, to the hermit Gotama, and, in general, to those who have attained the dignity of a Buddha. Sacrifices, consisting of flowers, fruits, and grains, are offered to Buddha, the Bodhisattvas, and the lower gods. "The adoration of the statues of the Buddha and of his relics is the chief external ceremony of the religion. The centres of the worship are the temples containing statues, and the topes or tumuli erected over the relics of the Buddha or of his distinguished apostles, or on spots consecrated as the scenes of the acts of Buddha; and the site of a Buddhist temple, corresponding to the altar in a Roman Catholic church, is an image of the Buddha, or a dagoba or shrine containing his relics." Sacred is the mystic word Om. The priests are called lamas among the Mongols, bonzes in China and Japan, rahans in Burmah, talapins in Siam. They wear the tonsure, live in celibacy, and frequently in monastic communities. The visible head of Buddhism lived formerly in China, but since the fourteenth century in Tibet, where he is called Dalai Lama (see Lamaism). The sacred books of Buddhism treat of cosmogony, dogmatism, ethics, asceticism, and liturgy, and are very numerous. The best are in Sanscrit. The Benares or Hindi, and the Gujerati. The English translations are very copious, and contain many stories of the life of Buddha, the other lives of the Bodhisattvas, the life of the other Gautamas, etc. The Collected Canon consists of 116 volumes, and with the commentaries (Dandour), of 288 volumes. They were originally composed in Sanscrit, but were later translated into the languages of the other Buddhist nations. The form of religious worship contains many points (veneration of relics, suricular consecration, beads, processions, etc.) which bear a striking resemblance to practices of the Roman Church, acknowledged by all, but explained differently. The fullest information on these points will be found in Hardy, Eastern Monachism (London, 1850).

IV. History. — St. Hilaire (Du Bouddhisme, Paris, 1850, 8vo), following principally M. Eugène Burnouf, fixes a minimum date for the birth of the Buddha in the 7th century B.C. It is true that the contents of the Buddhist works themselves supply no dates, and the inferences are uncertain by which any date of the lifetime of Sakyamuni himself can be determined. If we adopt the indications of the literature, it is to be supposed that the death of the Buddha was placed in the 564 B.C. According to deductions from Chinese authorities, it might have taken place much earlier; and if the Buddhist character of the rock inscriptions at Guinhar, Delhi, and Bhahra be acknowledged, the spread of the religion in those countries from 200 to 400 years before the Christian era is theoretically possible. Moreover, the earliest date for the spread of Buddhism in the original seat in Central India, for its expulsion as a heresy from the bosom of Brahmaism, in its development as a specific religion, and its distribution, not in a line, but on an immense arc of countries contiguous with India proper. The creed of Buddhism was fixed and developed by eccumenical councils, the first of which was held by Casyapa, a disciple of Buddha, and largely attended. "The Buddha had written nothing himself; but his chief followers, assembled in council immediately after his death, proceeded to reduce his teaching to writing. The writings are divided into three classes, forming the Tripitaka, or 'triple basket.' The first class consist of the Sutras, or discourses of the Buddha; the second contains the Vinaya, or discipline; and the third the Abhidharma, or metaphysics. The first is evidently the fundamental system, and out of which the other commentaries and writings have been elaborated. The other two councils probably revised and expanded the writings agreed upon at the first, adding voluminous commentaries. As to the dates of the other two councils there are irreconcilable discrepancies in the accounts; but, at all events, the third was not later than 240 B.C.

the Buddhist canonical Scriptures, as they now exist, were fixed two centuries and a half before the Christian era. The Buddhist religion early manifested a zealous missionary spirit, and princes and even princesses became devoted propagandists. It also established foreign missions, most of which were highly successful. In consequence of its great extension, Buddhism split into a northern and a southern branch, the former of which, embracing the Buddhist churches of Nepal, China, Corea, Japan, Tartary, Mongolia, and Tibet, admitted much of the former mythologies of these countries into their creed; the southern Church extended from Ceylon over the whole of Farther India. In the land of its birth, India, Buddhism had to endure a long-continued persecution, and was at last entirely driven out, after it had flourished there about twelve hundred years. The time of its introduction into the other countries is as uncertain as its early history in general. It is said to have made its first appearance in China about B.C. 217, but it was not actually established before about A.D. 60. It suffered several persecutions, in the third of which, in 485, 4600 monasteries were destroyed, together with 40,000 smaller establishments. In the fourth century of our era, it is stated the number of temples at 42,918, of priests and monks at 213,418. In Japan it spread in the fifth or sixth century after Christ. Into Tibet it was introduced in the fifth century, and, after several persecutions, re-established in the tenth. Among the Mongols it gained a firm footing in the thirteenth century. It was also adopted by several tribes in Asiatic Russia. It has for many centuries become stationary in most countries, only in Russia it is visibly on the decline. It still counts about 300,000,000 of adherents.

V. Monuments and Remains.—Scattered through India are numerous remains of caves, funeral monuments, and stupas, or religious edifices, none of which last are believed to be of later date than the third century B.C. The cave temples were probably constructed during the persecutions of the first eight centuries of our era. As remains are found in Afghanistan, near the Indus and the Ganges, and around Bhilsa, in Central India. These last are described in The Bihil Monophs, or Buddhist Monuments of Central India, by Major Cunningham (Lond. 1853).

A general idea of one of these singular monuments may be gained from the following extract from Cunningham: “The great Sântâ Topâ is situated on the western edge of the hill. The ground has once been carefully leveled by cutting away the surface rock on the east, and by building up a retaining wall on the west. The court (as it now exists) averages one hundred and fifty yards in length, and is exactly one hundred yards in breadth. In the midst stands the Great Chaitya, surrounded by a massive colonnade. The bold appearance of the solid dome is relieved by the lightness and elegance of the highly picturesque gateways. On all sides are ruined temples, fallen columns, and broken sculptures; and even the top itself, which had withstood the destructive rancor of the fiery Saivas and the bigoted Mussulmans, has been half ruined by the blundering excavations of armateur antiquaries. . . . The great top itself is a solid dome of stone and brick, 106 feet in diameter, and 42 feet in height, springing from a plan of 144 feet in a projection of 44 feet from the base of the building, and a slope of 23 feet. The plinth or basement formed a terrace for the contemplation of worshippers of the enshrined relic; for, on the right pillar of the north gateway there is a representation of a top of and two of worshipping worshippers walking round it, with their hands. The terrace was reached by a double flight of steps to the south, connected by a landing 10 feet square. The apex of the dome was flattened into a terrace 34 feet in diameter, surrounded by a stone railing of that style so peculiar to Buddha monuments that I will venture to call it the ‘Buddhist Railings.’ . . . Many of the pillars of this colonnade are now lying at the base of the monument, and several portions of the coping or architrave prove that the enclosure was a circular one. . . . Within the upper enclosure there was a square altar or pedestal, surrounded by pillars of the same description, but much taller, some of which were all that remained on the plan of this colonnade. The total height of the building, including the cupolas, must have been upward of 100 feet. The base of the top is surrounded by a massive colonnade, 144 feet in diameter from west to east, and 151 feet in diameter from north to south. This enclosure is therefore nearly square, and the colonnade measures by 7 feet. By this arrangement a free passage is obtained round the southern staircase, and a greater breadth at the foot of the ascent. The breadth of the colonn on the north-west and north-east sides averages 9 feet 7 inches, the several measurements only differing by a few inches. From east to south the colonnade increases rapidly in width; the breadth at the east being only 9 feet 11 inches, and at the foot of the staircase 13 feet 8 inches.”

VI. Sources of Information.—From reasons stated above, the former works on Buddhism have lost much of their worth by the more thorough and comprehensive study of the Buddhist literature during the last few years. The best among the older works are Bob- (Professor at Königsberg), De Baudismi origine et atate (1827); Holmgren, Sketch of Buddhism (in the Trans. of the Royal Asiatic Society, ii. 1); Burnouf, Introduction à l’histoire du Budhisme Indien (Paris, 1844). The fullest account of the doctrines and worship of Buddhism in the English language, is given by the Rev. G. Spence Hardy (for more than 20 years Wesleyan missionary in Ceylon) in his Eastern Monarchies (London, 1831), his A Manual of Buddhism (London, 1852), and his Legends and Theories of the Buddhists (London, 1885). Among the recent works, based on a more comprehensive knowledge of the sources, are Nève, Le Bouddhisme, son Fondement et ses Ecritures (Paris, 1851); Köppen, Die Religion des Buddha (1st vol. Berlin, 1857, 2nd vol. (in Lamière) 1863); Barthelemy St. Hilaire, Le Bouddhisme et sa Religion (Paris, 1859); and a Russian work by Wassiliev, on Buddhism: its Doctrines, History, and Literature (St. Petersburg, 1850 sq.; German transl. Der Buddh- ismus, etc., Leipzig, 1860 sq.). A copious list of books on Buddhist literature is given by Schlagintweit, Bibliography of Buddhism (London, 1874). Buddismo, Robert Pedder, a learned clergyman of the Church of England, studied at Cambridge, where he graduated as eighth wrangler, 1806. After passing some time as fellow of Queen's College, he became Incumbent of St. George's, Everton, 1814, and principal of St. Bee's College, 1840. He died in 1846. His writings include Friendship with God illustrated in the Life of Abraham (London, 1839, 2 vols. 12mo); —The Christian Ekdotus (2d ed. Liverpool, 1859, 2 vols. 12mo); —Sermons, chiefly practical (London, 2 vols. 12mo, n. d.); —The Atonement (Liverpool, 1889, 3 vols.).

Budneus, or Budny, Simon, a Polish theologian in the second half of the 16th century, was minister at Kleténiec, and afterward at Lost. Becoming a disciple of Servetus, he denied the divinity of Christ and his miraculous conception, and anticipated in many respects the later rationalism. Being a man of talents, he made many discipies, especially in Lithuania. In 1582 he was excommunicated by the Synod of Lucnay; and this, with other causes, led him to greater moderation of language, if not of sentiment, and he united with the Pnecovians, a Socinian sect. He published a Polish translation of the Bible; also Libellus de dubius natura in Christo: Apologia Polonica. See Boch, Historiae Antitrinitariorum; Hefier, Nova Bibl. Generale, vii, 729.

Buell, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Coventry, Conn., Sept. 1, 1716, entered Yale College in 1737, and graduated in 1741. He was ordained in 1743, and, after laboring for some time as an evangelist, received a call from the church at East Hampton, L. I., and was installed there as pastor September 12, 1746. He was made D.D. by Dartmouth College in 1791, and died on the 19th of July, 1798. The great characteristic of his preaching was fervor. There were three periods of great religious awakening in his congregation—1764, 1785, and 1791. As a theologian, he belonged to the school of Edwards and Bellamy. During the Revolutionary War his urbane-ness and discretion gained him influence with some of the British officers, and operated to the advantage of the town and neighborhood. A few years before his death he was instrumental in establishing Clinton Academy, East Hampton, which is still considered there as a monument of his public spirit and philanthropy. Dr. Buell published a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, iii, 112.

Buffalo (Bos bison), an animal of the ox kind, but different from the American Bison, usually termed "buffalo," being distinguished by the shape of the horns and of the head, as well as of the body generally, and being also found in very different situations. (See Brade, Cyclop. s. v.) This animal is often regarded as the same with the wild bull (C. n. texns, or C. a. reyns) of Scripture (Num. xxiii, 22; Psa. xcvii, 11; Job xxxix, 9; Isa. xxxiv, 7, etc.). See UNICORN. This opinion is lately advocated in extenso by Dr. Conant (Book of Job, in loc.) while Dr. Thomson (Land and Book, 1, 284 sq.) prefers to identify the Oriental "Berench," with the Bethlehem of q. v.) of Job (xli, 15), on account of his wallowing in the mire and reeds of Jordan. See Ox; BULL.

Buffet (colosz'w), to box about or slop with the hand or fist, whether in derision (Matt. xxvi, 67; Mark xiv, 64), opposition (2 Cor. xii, 7), affliction (1 Cor. iv, 11), or punishment (1 Pet. ii, 20).

Buffler, Claude, a Jesuit philosopher and voluminous writer, was born of French parents in Poland May 25, 1695, and brought up at Paris. He died at Paris May 17, 1757. He was associated with the writers of the Memoires de Trévoux, and left an immense number of other works on a variety of subjects, of which the most important is Cours des Sciences (Par. 1732, fol.), a work of vast learning, and showing a luminous power of philosophical thought. Sir James Mackintosh (Progress of Ethical Philosophy, § 5) speaks of the just reputation of Buffler's Treatise on First Truths (contained in the Cours des Sciences), and adds that his philosophical writings are remarkable for perfect clearness of expression.—Hefier, Bibl. Generale, vii, 735.

Bugenagen (Bugenagenus), Johann (called also Dr. Eurusmus), was, perhaps, next to Melancon, the most active and useful coadjutor of Luther in spreading the principles of the Reformation. He was born at Wollin, in Pomerania, June 24, 1485. His education in theology and classics was obtained at Greifswald, and his proficiency in classical studies was so great that at twenty he was appointed master of the school at Treptow, where he taught with great reputation. The writings of Erasmus, to which, as a classical student, he was naturally drawn, led him to see the need of a reformation in the Church. He lectured, in his school, on the Psalms, Matthew, Timothy, and the Creed; and in 1519 he was invited by the neighboring abbot of Belbbeck to teach the monks in a Collegium Prebendariorum which he had established for their culture; and here he compiled a Gospel Harmony. Called by prince Bogislas X to prepare an account of Pomerania, he wrote Pomerania in IV lib. dietus (Greifswald, 1729, 4to), full of learning, and showing a zeal for religious liberty. In 1520, Luther's book of the "Babylonian Captivity" reached Treptow. Having looked over a few leaves, he said, "There never was a more pestilent heretic than the author of that book." But a few days after, having read it with great diligence and attention, his mind was changed, and he made this recantation: "What shall I say of Luther? All the world hath been blind and in darkness; only this one man has found out the truth." The new views of Bugenagen respecting the law and gospel, justification by faith, etc., being publicly preached with great success, the prince and the bishop stirred up a persecution. Upon this Bugenagen went to Wittenberg, and formed a personal acquaintance with Luther in 1521. Here he was soon employed to lecture on the Psalms, and the course was afterward printed (Bassel, 1524). In the dispute with Karlstadt (q. v.), Bugenagen sustained Luther and Melancthon. In 1528 he was chosen pastor of the church in Wittenberg, and held his post, through many vicissitudes, for 36 years. He aided Luther in translating the Bible, and himself translated it into the Low Saxon dialect (Lubeck, 1538). But perhaps his chief service to the Reformation was that of organizing churches, for which he had a special talent. He may regret, however, that in Brunswick, Hamburg, Lubeck, and in many parts of Pomerania and Denmark, he reorganized the University of Denmark.
In 1538, and served a while as its rector. The death of Luther and the disputes of the Interim (q. v.) saddened his later years, and he died April 10, 1558. Besides the numerous practical writings of Bugenhausen, and his many directories for worship, Christian life, etc., he wrote Historie des Leidens und der Auferstehung J. C. (1530; often reprinted):—Vom dem Christen Glauben und rechten guten Werken (Wittenb. 1526):—Anmerk. zu den Buch. Hist. Deut.., etc., Aemot in Epitap, ad Fasten und Festum (Stralburg, 1534);—Epistolar. Psalmbuch (Basil, 1524), with regard to which, Luther declared that Bugenhausen was the first that deserved the name of "commentator on the Psalms." On the influence of Bugenhausen on the development of the Church constitutions of Germany, see Richter, Die evangelische Kirchenordnung (Berlin, 1894).[2] Geschichte d. evang. Kirchenverfasungen (Leipzig, 1851, and 14th edition, 1859);—Bayer, Bedeutung der alten Bugen- hausensch kirchenordnungen (in Theol. Studien, 1858). A sketch of him by Melanchthon is given in the Corpus Reformatorum, xii, 295. See also Adam, Vite Germ. Theol.; *Moschini, Chr. Bugg, Francis, a member of the Society of Friends, which he left in later life, and whose principles he then combated in a number of treatises. Among them are: New Rome arrenged (Lond. 1634);—Picture of Quakerism (Lond. 1637, 2dmo);—Quakerism Withering and Christianity Benefiting (Lond. 1634);—Quakerism Being the True Light (Lond. 1696);—The Pilgrim's Progress from Quakerism to Christianity (Lond. 1696), etc.—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 279.

Building (properly some form of the verbs בָּנָן, bānān, וֹאָס, o'asoph). Historical and monumental data do not exist to enable us to trace accurately the gradual improvement and peculiar character of Jewish architecture. (See Bardwell, Temples Ancient and Modern, Lond. 1857.) Its style was probably borrowed in the first instance from the Egyptians, next from the Phoenicians (comp. Michaelis in the Comment. nov. Soc. Goticum, i, 1771; Stieglitz, Gesch. der Baukunst bei den Alten, Leipz., 1792; Müller, Archäol., p. 289 sq);—Schamaas, Gesch. der bild. Künst, i, 248 sq); and finally from the Greeks and Romans. Of building tools, besides common implements such as the axe, saw, etc., there are mentioned the compass (רְבִּיָּה, rē'īyāh) and plum-line (מַגָּל, māgal), Amos vii, 7 sq., the rule or measuring-line (בָּשָׁל, bashal), the awl (מַשָּׁל, mēšal), etc. (see the Mishna, Chel. m. xiv, 8). See these instruments in their place. (See Schröder, Bibl. Mathematicus, p. 217 sq;—Bellemann, Handbuch, i, 189 sq;—See House.

Besides its proper and literal signification, the word "building" is used with reference to children and a numerous posterity (Exod. i, 21; Ruth iv, 11). The prophet Nathan told David that God would build his house, that is, give him children and successors (2 Sam. vii, 27). Any kind of building implies the settlement of a family, or the acquisition of some new honor, kingdom, city, etc., and its peace and government (Psa. 4, 7; Mic. v, 4). God's Church is called a building, and the architect is the master-builder (1 Cor. iii, 9-17). So also the heavenly home of Christians is compared to a building in contrast with the temporary tabernacle of the earthly body (2 Cor. v, 1).

Bul (Heb. בּוּל, בּוּל, 市教育, otherwise a contracted form of Bukhah), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Beesi v. r. Barqojo.) Son of Jagli and prince of the tribe of Dan, appointed by Moses as one of the commissioners to partition the land of Palestine (Num. xxxiv, 22). B.C. 1618.

2. (Sept. Beesi v. r. Boesi.) Son of Abihuah and father of Uzzi, being great-grandson of Aaron (1 Chron. vi, 5, 51). B.C. cir. 1460. Compare the genealogy of Ezra (vii, 4, Sept. Beesi) and the apocryphal Boccar (1 Esdr. viii, 2) or Borit (2 Esdr. i, 2).—Ephraim, Sons of Israel (Num. xxxiv, 22).—The name of a place, the territory of which was given to Judah (Gen. xxxv, 18).—A town in the territory of Judah, the name of which is of unknown origin. The Samaritans, however, have traced it back to יִצְרָאֶל, yitsrē'ēl, the son of Jacob, from whom they suppose it to have been named. Bulgaria is a country of European Turkey, named from the Bulgarians, who, in the fifth century, quitting Asiatic Sarmatia, crossed the Danube and settled here, subjugating the Slavic (q. v.) inhabitants, and in process of time adopting their language. Later Slavic writers claim that the Bulgarians originally belonged in the Slavic family, and the modern Bulgarians claim to be Slavonians. Through the missionary labors of Methodius, brother of Cyril (q. v.), a prince of the court named Bogorits or Boris, was baptized about A.D. 861, and took the name of Michael; upon this many of the Bulgarians received the faith. This Michael sent to Pope Gregory, a number of letters, pouring forth his prayers to the Holy See. Benzig, De monstros, etc., 251;—Tischner Heraus (loc. cit.), to Marchesia (q. v.). According to Benzig (ibid. De monstros einiger alten Völk*, p. 18), it may have derived its name from the worship of Basil (comp. the Sept. rendering), as other months appear to have been in like manner named after the special deities to which they were dedicated.

Bulgarians is one of the most prominent scholars of the modern Greek Church, and has exercised a lasting influence upon the progress of Eastern Europe in both secular and religious literature. His works, mainly in the ancient Greek language, are numerous. His Manual of Logics has ever since remained a favorite textbook in the Greek schools. Among his theological writings are several volumes of funeral sermons and eulogies on saints. He also published a translation of the work of Adam Sarmacinius on the Procurement of the Holy Ghost. The latter work is one of the standard works of the Greek Church on the much disputed doctrine, and the Roman Congregation for the Union of the Eastern churches with the Church of Rome (Sacra Congregatio de Propaganda Fide pro negotis vitis Orientalis) specially instructed one of its consultors (a subsequently appointed professor at Breslau) to refuse it. Dr. Laemmert consequently undertook the publication of the Scriptorum Graecia orthodoxa bibliotheca selecta (Freiburg, vol. i, 1865: contains Prolegomena; two sermons by Nicephorus Blemmida; the work of the Patriarch Johannes Vuccas, of Constantinople, De unione Ecclesiarum, as well as that of the Apologist of the same name).—See Pierer, iii, 445; Lasser, Script. Greec. orth. bibl. sel., vol. i.

Bulkeley, Charles, a Dissenting minister, was born in London 1719, and educated under Doddridge at Northampton. His first pastoral service was among the Presbyterians, but he finally joined the General Baptists, and was for a time a member of a congregation in London, where he died 1797. He published Discourses (London, 1752, 8vo).—Notes on Bulfgrove’s Writings (London, 1755, 8vo).—The Economy of the Gospel (London, 1764, 4to).—Discourses on the Parables and Miracles (London, 1771, 4 vols., 8vo).—Notes on the Bible (London, 1771, 4 parts, 12mo).—Cyc. Bull, a distinguished from “Ox,” occurs but once in the Bible (Job xxii, 10), as the translation of את (ash, from his strength), which elsewhere denotes any animal of the ox species, and is variously translated accordingly. See Bulllock, etc. Other terms occasionally thus rendered are בָּקָר (bakar, a beeve), Jer. iii, 20; עִז (a bull), Gen. xxxii, 15; Ps. xxii, 12; and in the New Test. τιμός, Heb. 10, 15; αὐτός "ox" in Matt. xxii, 16. See Barne. Bull (or).—See Antelope. The NM (or "wild ox") of Is. li, 20, is but another form of נְח (no), a large species of oryx or ox-deer. See Antelope.

The rearing of horned cattle was encouraged by the people of Israel. These animals were protected in some cases by express provisions of the law; they were held clean, being the usual sacrifice of congratulation, and the chief article of flesh diet of the population. No animal, however, was more strongly condemned than the omission of any animal was practised among the Hebrews (Josephus, Ant. iv, 8, 40). If that was the case, other methods than those generally alluded to must have been adopted to break oxen to labor; for the mere application of a metal ring through the cartilage of the nostrils, although it might have greatly increased the fertility of the beasts, would not necessarily have rendered them sufficiently docile to the yoke and goad of a people whose chief dependence for food was in the produce of the plough. See Ox.

Judging from the breed remains, there were two great breeds of straight-backed cattle, the long-horned and the short-horned; and in Upper Egypt at least, there was one without horns. Another humped species existed, which served to draw chariots, yoked in the same manner as the Brahminic bulls of India are at present. It is still abundant in Nubia, and the name of Bos aegyptiaca, or indicus, by which it is branded with the common species, is yet considered distinct. Its calf is born with teeth; and, although in Central Africa, India, and China it is mixed with the other species, and when low in flesh is almost deprived of its hunch, the natural characteristics nevertheless continue. The evidence of the existence of this Egyptian picture and written documents it must have been propagated for above 8000 years. In Egypt the straight-backed or common cattle appear, from the same evidence, to have formed a very handsome breed with lustre horns. They were generally spotted black or red upon a white ground, and there were, besides, others white, red, or black. They all served for common use, but those without red were selected when new sacred bulls, Apis or Mnevis, were to be supplied; for they alone had the colors which could show the marks made by chance or by art, and required to fit the animal for the purpose intended. See Aries. In Palestine the zebu was mostly of the ancient species, as it still is, inferior in size to the Egyptian; and proverb must have been abundant indeed if the number of beasts sacrificed at the great Jewish festivals, mentioned in Josephus, be correct, and could be sustained for a succession of years. See Sacrifice.

Unless the name be taken synonymously with that of other species, there is not in the Bible any clear indication of the buffalo. See Unicorn. The Asiatic species was not known in Greece till the time of Aristotle, who first speaks of it by the name of the Arachosian ox. No species of Bos bubalis is known even at this day in Arabia, although travellers speak of meeting them in Palestine in a domesticated state [see Buffalo]; but in Egypt the Asiatic species has been introduced in consequence of the Mohammedan conquests in the East. The indigenous buffaloes of Africa, amounting, at least, to two very distinct species, appear to have belonged to the south and west of that country, a later period having introduced Egypt as far as the present Borno; for none are figured on any known monument in either Upper or Lower Egypt. With regard, however, to wild oxen of the true Taureau genus, some name, at a very remote period, have been found in Bashan, evidently the origin of the name, a region where mountain, wood, and water, all connecting the Syrian Libanus with Taurus, were favorable to their existence; but the wild bulls of the district, mentioned in Ps. xxi, 12, and in various other passages, appear, nevertheless, to refer to domestic species, probably left to propagate without much human supervision, except annually to be slaughtered for the consumption, in the same manner as is still practised in some parts of Europe. For although the words "fat bulls of Bashan close me in on every side" are an indication of wild manners, the word "fat" somewhat weakens the impression; and we know that the half-wild white gregarious breed had the character of encompassing objects that excite their distrust. It was therefore natural that in Palestine wild gregarious instincts should have still remained in operation, where real dangers beset herds, which in the time of David were still exposed to lions in the hills around. See Camel. (v. s.) is said to have been worshipped in the form of a bull and Moloch to have had a calf's or steer's head.—Kitto, s. v.

Bull, in a figurative sense, is taken for powerful, fierce, insolent enemies. "Fat bulls (bulls of Bashan) surrounded me on every side," says the Psalmist (Ps. xxi, 12, and lxxxi, 30). "Rebuke the beasts of the reeds (Assy. Vev, "harmers"), the multitude of the bulls;" Lord, smite in thy wrath these animals which feed in large pastures, these herds of bulls (Ps. lxxxi, 30). Isaiah says (xxxiv, 7), "The Lord shall cause his victims to be slain in the land of Edom; a terrible slaughter will he make; he will kill the unicorns and the wild beasts of the beyond, and underset precious princes who oppressed the weak. See Cattle.

Bull, George, D.D., bishop of St. David's, was born in Wells, Somersetshire, March 25, 1634, and entered at Exeter College, Oxford, 1648. His first living was that of St. George's, near Bristol, and in 1658 he was presented to Suddington. In 1669 he publish his excellent, and one of the last of this kind, "The Church of England; or, the Scripture Evidence of this Church", which was to explain and defend, in Part I, the doctrine of St. James, and in Part II, to demonstrate the agreement with him of St. Paul, it being more particularly the aim of the first dissertation to show "that good works, which proceed from faith, and are conjoined with faith, are a necessary condition required from us by God, to the end that by the New Evangelical Covenant, obtained by and sealed in the blood of Christ, the mediator of it, we may be justified according to his free and unmerited grace." In the second, "having, in the first place, established this one point for his foundation, That St. Paul is to be interpreted by St. James, and that he is to be held in no less respect by us than many of the ancients (and particularly of St. Augustine himself), who are of the opinion that the General Epistle of St. James, the first of St. John, and the second of St. Peter, with that of St. Jude, were written against those who, by misinterpreting St. Paul's epistles, had inferred a fond notion, as if without works' were sufficient to save them, he sheweth whence this obscurity and ambiguity in the terms of St. Paul might probably arise, which was the occasion that persons not well-grounded came to mistake or pervert the same." Bull attempts to prove that where St. Paul speaks of justification by faith, he intends the whole condition of the Gospel covenant; that the faith required implies obedience; that it cannot be separated from obedience; and that obedience is made necessary to justification. The publication raised much dispute among divines. The first open antagonist was Mr. John Truman, a Non-conformist minister. Dr. Morley, his former colleague, took an active part in the controversy, rising from the divinity chair at Oxford, and the other in a charge to his clergy, forbade the reading of the book as a rash intrusion into things too high for such discussion. In 1675 Bull issued his Examen cumus and Apologia pro Harmonia; and in 1680, at Oxford, his Defensoris fidclis Nomen (also at Pavia, 1674, with notes by Zola). Preferrment flowed in upon Bull after 1684; and the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D., although he had never taken any other academical degree. In 1694 appeared his Judicium Ecclesiae Catholic, in defence of the anathema decreed by the Council of Nicaea, for which he received the thanks of the whole body of the Catholic Church, with those of Germain's. His last treatise was his Primitiva et Apostolica Traditior, against David Zuiker, Leclerc, and others, who held that the apostles and their immediate successors taught that our blessed Lord was merely a man. In theology he was an Arminian. His defence of the Trinity is one of the most interesting of his theology not likely to be superseded. Graft collected all his Latin works (Lond. 1708, fol). His Sermons were edited, with a Life, by Nelson (Lond. 1708, 8 vols. 8vo). He was seventy-one years of age when the see of St. Da- vid's was offered to him. He at first refused it, but was at length persuaded to consent, and was consecrated at Lambeth on July 10, 1696. He died at Oxford on Dec. 14, 1702. A new translation of the Defensio appeared in the "Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology" (Oxford, 1851, 2 vols. 8vo). Bull's Works have been collected anew.

Bull (Papal). Bulls are pontifical letters from the Pope of Rome, written in old Gothic characters upon stout and coarse skins, and issued from the apostolic chancery, under a seal (bulus) of lead, which seal gives validity to the document, and is attached, if it be a "Bull of Grace," by a cord of silk, and if it be a "Bull of Justice," by a cord of hemp. The word is from Lat. bulla, a drop or bubble, used in later Latin to signify a pendent metallic seal. It is properly the pendant seal which is the bull: it is impressed on one side with the beasts of St. Peter and St. Paul, and on the other with the name of the pope and the year of his pontificate. The bull is divided into five parts: the narrative of the fact, the conception, the clause, the date, and the salutation, in which the pope styles himself servus servorum servanti, servant of servants. All bulls bear the name and title of the pope—for example: Gregorius Episcopus servus servorum dei, etc., is prefixed; then follows a general introduction, of which the initial words are used to give a distinct name to the bull, as in the examples: the bull Erexurge Domine, issued by Pope Leo X against Luther in 1520; the bull In Cena Domini, the celebrated bull against heretics, often reissued in the 16th century; the pastoral bull against Queen's writings, 1513; the Dominus ac Redemptor Nostrae, or bull for the abolition of the order of Jesuits; the Ecclesia Christi, or the bull which completed the Concordat with France in 1801; the De Statu Antoninis, or the bull for the regulation of the Catholic Church in Prussia. The instruments, besides the language belonging to them, have a crest with some text of Scripture or religious motto around them. Those issued by Lucius III have this device, Adjutor nos, Deus salutis nostrae; the device of Urban III was, Ad te, Domine, levavi animam meam; and that of Alexander III, Iam tueas, Domine, demonstra mihi. Bulls are granted for the consecration of bishops, the promotion to benefices, the celebration of jubilees, etc.

Bullarium is a collection of papal bulls. The bull is dated from the "day of incarnation," but briefs are dated from the "nativity."—Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v. See Brief; Bullarium.

BULL IN CENA DOMINI. The name given to a bull in the Church of Rome which is publicly read on the day of the Lord's Supper, viz., Thursday, by a cardinal deacon in the pope's presence, accompanied with the other cardinals and the bishops. It excommunicates all that are called, by that apostate Church, heretics, stubborn and disobedient to the holy see. After the reading of this bull the pope throws a burning-torch into the public place, to denote the thunder of this anathema. It is declared expressly, in the beginning of the bull of Pope Paul III of the year 1558, that it is the ancient custom of the sovereign pontiffs to publish this excommunication on Holy Thursday, to preserve the purity of the Christian religion and to keep the union of the faithful; but the origin of this ceremony is not stated in it. The principal heads of this bull concern heretics and their upholders; pirates, imposters of new customs; those who falsify the bulls and other apostolic letters; those who abuse the privileges of the Church; those that trouble or wound strangers with ecclesiastical jurisdiction, etc.; and, in short, of preventing some violence, though they might be counsellors or advocates, generals to secular princes, whether emperors, kings, or dukes; those who usurp the goods of the Church, etc. The contents of the bull have been inserted by degrees. Luther's name was inserted 1561. For a fuller statement, see In Cena Domini.

Bull, William, an English Independent minister, was born Dec. 22, 1738, in Irlinghamborough, Northamptonshire, and was educated at the Dissenting academy at Daventry. In 1764 he became pastor of the Independent church at Newport-Pagnell, where he was the intimate of Cowper and of John Newton. A training academy for children was founded in 1776 through Mr. Bull's activity, and he superintended it for years. He died in 1814. "He was an excellent preacher, his sermons being at once original, fervid, and impressive."—Memorials of the Rev. W. Bull (London 1864).

Bullard, Artemas, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Brittany, Mass., June 15, 1778. He graduated at Amherst College, where he graduated in 1808, and thence went to the Theological Seminary at Andover. He was licensed in May, 1828, and ordained April 20, 1831. In 1830 he visited the West in the employ of the Massachusetts Sabbath School Union, going as far as Illinois, and while there was appointed secretary of the "American Board" for the Valley of the Mississippi. He removed to Cincinnati in October, 1832. In 1838 he became pastor of the Presbyterian church at St. Louis. He was made D.D. in 1841 by Marion College. He attempted in 1845, with the concurrence of the Synod, to raise a fund of $10,000 for the erection of churches in Missouri. His name was eventually enfeebled, he was chosen by his fellow-citizens as their representative at the World's Peace Convention, and spent six months travelling in Europe in 1830. After his return he was the chief promoter of the institution of Webster College at St. Louis. Dr. Bullard was killed in the accident which occurred at the inauguration of the Pacific Railroad, Nov. 1, 1865. He published three or four occasional sermons. He was a preacher of great power, and was very useful and influential in St. Louis.—Sprague, Annals, iv, 748.

Bullarium Romanum Magnum, a collection of papal bulls from the time of Leo the Great, begun (1586) by Cherubini, and continued by various editors. The Bullarium Magnum of Maynardus (Luxemb. 1728 to 1758, 19 vols. fol.) contains the bulls from Leo the Great to Benedict XIV. Simultaneously with it appeared the collection of Coecelines (Rom. 1737 sqq., 14 vols. fol.). A continuation of these collections is Benedicti IV Bullarium (Rom. 1754 sqq., 4 tom. fol.; new ed. Merc. 1826, 19 vols.). A continuation, which comprises the bulls of Clement XIII and the following popes, was commenced by Barberi (Rome, 1835); of it 15 vols. fol. have appeared, bringing the work down to the year 1821. A new complete collection of all the bulls from Leo the Great to the present time has been commenced by Tommassetti (Turin, vol. i, 1807).—Landon, Ecclesiastical Dictionary, s. v.

Bullinger, Heinrich, one of the most important of the Swiss reformers, was born at Bremgarten, near Zurich, where his father was parish priest, July 18, 1504. In 1516 he was sent to school at Emmerich, in Cleves, where Morellan was one of the masters. In order to train the boy to careful habits, his father gave him no money, and he was compelled to working in the streets for his bread. He was inclined, while at Emmerich, to enter the order of Carthusians; but his brother kept him from doing so, and in 1519 he went to Cologne, where he became bachelor of arts in 1520. He began to study the scholastic theology, but was soon disgusted, and even wrote against the scholastics. He then studied the classics, especially Greek and Latin, and St. Augustine, and finding that they drew their premises from Scripture, he set himself earnestly to study the N. T. The writings of Erasmus led him to the study of the classics. He was thus quite ready to be impressed by Luther's writings when they fell in his way; and the De Capitulis Habemus and De Sir Opusculus of Luther, with the Loci Compendii of W.
thorn, satisfied him that the Roman Church needed reformation. In 1522, after taking his master's degree, he returned to Switzerland, and was called by Wolfgang Röpfl, abbot of Cappel, to teach in the cloister school of his abbey. Here he lectured on the N. T. and on the Loca Communes of Melanchthon. In 1527 he was elected to the chapter at Bern and there he attended for five months the preaching and lectures of the celebrated Zuingli, while he perfected his knowledge of Greek, and commenced the study of Hebrew under Pellicanus. On his return to Cappel, the abbott and his monks adopted fully the reformation, to which they had been before inclined. In 1528 he went with Zuingli to the capitulation at Bern. In 1529 he was made pastor at Brengarten, his native place, and married Ann Adlachweiter, a nun retired from the convent at Zurich. At Brengarten he engaged in controversy with the Anabaptists, against whom he wrote six books. In 1531, after the battle of Cappel, with Zuingli fell, and with him, for a time, the cause of reform, Bullinger was compelled to leave Brengarten, and was elected successor to Zuingli at Zurich as antistes, or chief pastor. He began his work with a conflict. The Council of Berne, on the very day of his election, demanded a pledge that the clergy of Berne should from all further discussion. Bullinger defended the freedom of the pulpit so much that the council yielded. His supremacy as a leader of the reform was only acknowledged in 1536. Luther attacked Zuingli and his doctrine of the sacraments with great bitterness; Bullinger defended both with calm but earnest arguments, in a series of writings on the sacraments extending over many years. Bucer's (q. v.) attempts to reconcile Luther's views with those of the reformed at first met with Bullinger's sympathy and approval; but he came at last to doubt Bucer's sincerity, or, at least, his thoroughness of conviction. In the midst of all his controversies he continued his faithful pastoral labors, and by these, with his powerful and popular preaching, he established the Reformation firmly in Zurich. His theology was Augustinian, but of a milder type than Calvin's. When division was threatened (1547) between the Reformed churches of Zurich and Geneva on the sacramental question, Bullinger met with Calvin, by correspondence and personal conference, came to an agreement of views, which was expressed in the Consensus Tigurinus (1549), in which the corporal presence is denied, but a real and spiritual communication in the Supper of Christ to the believer is admitted. Bullinger was long in close correspondence with many men of virtue in the English Church, with whom he became acquainted during their sojourn abroad while the Marian persecution lasted, and his influence contributed greatly toward settling the doctrines of the English reformers. Many of their letters and of his own are preserved in the library of the city of Zurich. One of the most important labors of his latter life was the preparation of the Consensus et Expositio brevis et amplius (See Consessions.) After severe suffering from calculus, he died Sept. 17, 1575, repeating the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and several of the Psalms just before his departure. His son-in-law, Simler, printed his sermons, afterward printed (De Vita et Obita Bullingeri). Many of his works have been translated into English, viz., One hundred Sermons on the Apocalypse (1561, 4to); Twenty-six Sermons on Jeremiah (1563, 4to); Exhortation to Ministers (1575, 4to); Commonplaces of Christian Religion (1572, 4to); The Sacraments of the Church (1577, 4to), and Learning Sermons (1577, 4to). His works as collected and published amounted to ten folio vols. (Zurich). Such was the reputation of his writings in England that Archbishop Whitgift obtained an order in convocation that every clergyman should procure a copy of his sermons and read one each week. from ฤๅษ, agat, to roll. The (fem.) word is used of a trained heifer (Hos. x. 11), of one giving milk (Isa. vii, 21, 22), of one used in ploughing (Judg. xiv, 18), and of one three years old (Gen. xv, 9).

4. Par, ฤๅษ, almost synonymous with the last, and signifying generally a young bull of two years old, though in one instance (Judg. vi. 25) possibly a bull of seven years old. It is the customary term for bulls offered in sacrifice, and hence is used metaphorically, in Hos. xiv, 3, "so will we render, 'as bullocks,' our lips."—Smith, s. v. See Ox.

* Bulrush is used synonymously with "Rhiz" in the A. V. as the rendering of two Heb. words. See Reed.

1. Akmon, ฤๅษ, in Isa. ix, 13; xiii, 15, in the proverbial expression "branch and rush," equivalent to high and low alike (the Sept. has μηγεν και μεθρον in one passage, δηνδύν και δηλοκ in the other), and in Isa. lxv, 6, the Heb. term is rendered "bulrush." The word is derived from έν αγαμ, a marsh, because the bulrush grows in marshy ground. The bulrush was platted into ropes (A. V. "hook"), as appears from Job xli, 2 (see Bochart, Hieroz. ii, 772; comp. Plin. Nat. Hist. xii, 2). The Sept. has αβικος in the latter passages. See Rush.

2. Gomar, ฤๅษ (from άγαμ), to drink up, referring to the porous nature of the plant, as absorbing moisture, hence, the "breathe" which protects the trench (Isa. xxvi, 1; elsewhere "trench," "rampart," "wall," etc.): also ฤๅษ, ฤๅษ, the same (Ps. xlviii, 14; ฤๅษ, ฤๅษ, matted (once ฤๅษ, matted, prob. by an error of transcription, Ecclus. ix, 14), lit. straitness, hence the mound erected by the besiegers (Deut. xx, 20; elsewhere "sieve," etc.); ฤๅษ, a pinnacle or turret (2 Chron. xxvi, 15; elsewhere "corner"). The "bulwarks" spoken of in Scripture appear to have been mural towers, which answered the purposes of the modern block. Bulwarks were erected at certain distances along the walls, usually at the corners, and upon them were placed the military engines. The wall between the bulwarks, instead of running in a straight line, curved inward, thus giving the greatest possible extent in flanking the enemy from the projections. They are said to have been introduced by King Ussur (2 Kings xxv, 20; Zech. i, 6; Ps. lxviii, 13; Isa. xxvi, 1). See Fortification.

Bunch, ฤๅษ, agadi, a bundle of hyssop (Exod. xii, 22; elsewhere "burden" or γορ, Isa. lvii, 6; "troop" of men, 2 Sam. ii, 25): ฤๅษ, τιμαπ, a bunch of dried raisins (2 Sam. xvi, 1; 1 Chron. xii, 40; elsewhere "cluster of raisins"); ฤๅษ, dobbel'sheth, the hump of a camel (Isa. xxx, 6), so called from the softness of the flesh, being a mere lump of fat (see Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins, ii, 82 sq.).

Bundle (ฤๅษ, teror; ฤๅษ, έν αγαμ), signifies any thing bound together and tied up for future disposal (Isa. xiii, 15; Matt. xxiii, 30; Job xiv, 17). It is also used of a sum of money (Gen. xliii, 35; Prov. vii, 20). See Bao. The speed of Abimelech, 2 Chron. xiii, 22 (1 Sam. xxx, 29) may be thus rendered: "The life of my master is bound up in the bundle of the living by Jebovah," or written in the book of the living. In Acts xviii, 3, the original word is άγαμος, an armful, literally a "multitude," as elsewhere rendered.

Bunn, Selyx, one of the most notable of the pioneer Methodist preachers in America, was born in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1765. His parents removed to Berkely Co., Va., where he was converted and became a Methodist in 1789. He entered the ministry in 1792, and for 20 years labored incessantly, enduring the great fatigues and perils of frontier work with equanimity and patience; risking his life by exposure to the savages and by night-sleeping among the uncivilized.

In 1814 he became superannuated. His death was occasioned by a fall from his gig in the year 1838.—Minutes of Conference, ii, 279.

Bunney, Edmund, a divine of the Church of England, was born in 1840, educated at Oxford, became probationer fellow of Magdalene College, and later chaplain to Archbishop Glendinning. He died in 1867.

Among his works are, The whole sum of the Christian Religion (Lond. 1576, 8vo):—An Abridgment of Calvin's Institutions (Lond. 1580, 8vo), and several controversial pamphlets against the Jesuit Parsons.

Bunni, the name of two Levites.

1. (Heb. בּוּנֵי, Buni, either considerate, or the same name as Binnui; Sept. Βούνι). The great-great-grandfather of one Shemariah, which latter was appointed an overseer of the Temple after the captivity (Neh. xi, 15). B.C. long ante 596.

2. (Heb. בּוּנֵי, Buni, built; Sept. translates νίον, νιόν). One of the two who pronounced the public prayer and thanksgiving, and delineated the covenant between the Lord and his people, return from Babylon (Neh. ix. 4; x, 15). B.C. 410.

3. Buni is said to have been the Jewish name of Nicodemus (Lightfoot on John iii, 1; Ewald, Isr. Gesch. v, 233). See Nicodemus.

Bunsted, Christian Karl Josiah, was born at Korbach, in the German principality of Waldeck, Aug. 23, 1791, and studied at Marburg and Göttingen. In the latter university he came especially under the influence of the great philologist Heyne, whose instructions and example gave a bent to the youthful studies of Bunsted, and affected his career through life. At twenty he had so distinguished himself that he obtained a professorship in the gymnasium of Göttingen. In 1818 he published a dissertation, De Jure Atheniensium hereditarium, which made his name known widely among the savans of Germany. Soon after he undertook a journey to Holland and Denmark, in which latter country he made the acquaintance of a disciple, if not a descendant, of Magnusen, who taught him the Iceland language. After a while, Bunsted made his way to Berlin, and there commenced his first acquaintance with Niebuhr, who was afterward to be his best patron and friend. Niebuhr suggested to the young man to visit Paris, where he studied, under the celebrated Orientalist De Sicco, Arabic, Persian, and Sanscrit. In 1825 he went to Rome, where Niebuhr was Prussian ambassador. In 1831 he appointed him his private secretary, and speedily procured him the place of secretary of embassy. A couple of years after his appointment, King Frederick William III arrived at Rome, and Bunsen became his cicerone. The king was struck with the erudition of his young official, and made him his deputy for promotion. In 1824 he made him his chargé d'affaires at Rome, and in 1827 his minister resident. While enjoying this almost sinecure, Bunsen devoted himself to philological and antiquarian studies, and formed an enduring friendship with Chalmers and his own countrymen Lepsius and Gerhard. He devoted himself alternately to Egyptian hieroglyphics, to the topography of ancient Egypt, and to ancient Greek literature, more especially to the study of Plato. He also took a great interest in the Protestant Church and worship at Rome. In 1888 he was recalled, on account of a difficulty between the papal court and that of Prussia about certain evangelines of the Archbishop of Cologne. In 1841 Bunsen was appointed ambassador to England, and remained in that post until 1854. His political ideas being too liberal for the times, he was recalled home in that year, and spent the remainder of his life in his favorite studies, chiefly at Heidelberg, where he had a charming home, in which the best literary and artistic English and American travellers, who were received with delight and cordial hospitality. He died at Bonn on Nov. 28, 1880. As a fruit of his residence in Italy, he furnished a large part of the material for Cotta's Beschreibung von Rom, and in 1843 he published, under his own name, Die Basiliken des christlichen Roms (Munich, 8vo). His Vergleichung der Kirchen der Zeit der Zedern (3 vols., 1845) was translated into English, and published, both in London and New York, under the title of The Church of the Future (12mo). In 1845 he commenced the publication of Sehns, stelle in der Weltgeschichte, the fifth and last volume of which appeared in 1857. Part of this work has been translated into English as Society and Solitude (London, 1857), and in this volume Bunsen presented the title Egypt's Place in Universal History. It is a vast repository of facts and fancies, not a thoroughly digested book of science. He issued his Igazhias von Antiochen v. seine Zeit in 1847, and his Brieffe des Igazhias in the same year. A Zeichen der Zeit appeared in 1855-6, and was translated into English as The Signs of the Times (London and New York). This work is a powerful plea in behalf of the principle of religious liberty, and was principally directed against the intolerant views of Stahl and Hengstenberg. It led to a very violent controversy with Stahl, in which a number of the leading theologians of Germany took part. His Hippolyt in English (1851) has not, we think, been translated. His most important work of later years is his Hippolytus (Lond. 1851, 4 vols. 8vo), afterward republished in 1854 in a fuller form, as Christianity and Mankind: their Beginnings and Prospects (Lond. 7 vols. 8vo), which contains, indeed, a vast deal of learned lumber, and of vague and conjectural dissertation, but is yet a very valuable contribution to our knowledge of early Church history. At the time of his death he was engaged upon his Vollstândiges Bibliowerk für die Gemeinde, of which the first half volume appeared in 1858. The preface shows the character of the work fully. It was to be completed in five volumes, of which two only have been completed. It consists of his new version of the Bible in German, three of Bible Documents, and one of Bible History. It abounds in proofs of learning, but, like the other theological writings of Bunsen, it is entirely wanton in subtility and discrimination, and has called forth very decided criticisms and denunciation amongst evangelical theologians of Germany as well as of other countries. M. Presseisen, in the Revue Chrétienne Dec. 1860, gives a touching description of the last days and the death of Bunsen, which has been translated in many English and American journals. See also Getzer, Bunsen als Staatsmann (Gotha, 1861).

Bunting, Jarit, D.D., the most eminent of modern English Wesleyans, was born at Manchester, May 24th, 1779. His parents early resolved that he should have the best education they were able to procure. At the excellent school where he was consequently placed, he was for a time exposed to annoyances as a Methodist, but his father's own example and the respect of his schoolfellows, especially of a son of Dr. Percival, of Manchester, into whose family he was received without premium as a student of his school. His parents made it an essential condition that his nights and Sundays should be spent at home. Dr. Percival was an anti-Trinitarian, and they feared to guard their son from influences which might have weakened his attachment to evangelical truth. He had thus a twofold education, adapted to prepare him for a great career. In his Christian home he received a training of the conscience and the heart, which by grace had an abiding influence on his religious course; while, by liberal studies and good society, his intellect was exercised, and his social habits were formed in a way which fitted him for the high position to which he was early raised by his talents and virtues. His faith in the great truths of the Gospel was determined by his conversion when he was about sixteen. At nineteen he entered Oxford as a student of Christ Church. He received his first appointment from the Conference (Oldham). He was not long in gaining a power and influence among his brethren which he maintained through life. He regarded Methodism as a great work of God, formed to be of signal benefit to the world, and he gave himself, with all his powers, to promote its efficiency. He was Moderator of the General Conference in 1824, and wrote a beneficial results those principles would lead if vigorously carried out; and his youthful mind very early set itself to clear away obstructions, and to create new facilities for its successful action. To Bunting's practical wisdom mainly due the organization of the Westminster Missionary Society and the universal eloquence aroused and sustained the ardor with which it was supported. For some eighteen years he was one of the secretaries of the society. He was four times chosen president of the Conference, and from the foundation of the Wesleyan Theological Institution in 1834 till his death he was president of that seminary. For many years his word was law in the Wesleyan Conference, and he achieved this distinction by purity of character, devotion to Christ's work, and pre-eminent organizing and administrative talent. Though Dr. Bunting gave himself devotedly to Methodism, he did not restrict his affectionate regards nor his services to his own society; he was to the Wesleyan Methodist Church with Christian men of other names to advance objects of Christian philanthropy, and promote the conversion of the world to Christ. How those of other denominations generally regarded him may be gathered from an entry in one of the journal-letters of Dr. Chalmers, written when on his last visit to London, not quite a month before his death. Dr. Bunting heard Dr. Chalmers preach on Sunday morning, May 9th, 1847, and called to see him in the afternoon. Dr. Chalmers writes: "Delighted with a call after dinner from Dr. Bunting, with whom I and Mr. Mackenzie were left alone for an hour at least. Most exquisite intercourse with a man of great erudition and learning, and in love with the utmost joy, who both love him to the uttermost." A considerable part of the last year of his life was passed in weakness and pain. His mind retained its clearness, and his spirit was humbly resigned, but the flesh was weak. His feelings were depressed, but his faith prevailed. As death approached, he desired that nothing should come rich and satisfying. When the power of speech was almost gone, he was heard to say, "Perfect peace." His last words were, "Victory, victory, through the blood of the Lamb!" He died June 16, 1868. The first vol. of his Life, by his son, T. P. Bunting, Esq., appeared in 1859; his posthumous work, Bryan's (2 vols. 12mo) in 1861.— *London Rev. July, 1859, p. 447; Westminster Rev. Swift observes in his 'Letter to a young Divine,' 'I have been entertained and more informed by a few pages in the 'Pilgrim's Progress' than by a long discourse upon the will and intellect, and simple and complex ideas;' but we apprehend the remark was designed rather to depreciate metaphysics than to exalt Bunyan. For précis of the plot of Bunyan's prose with D'Urfo's doggerel, and in the 'Spiritual Quixote' the adventures of Christian are classed with those of Jack the Giant-killer and John Hickthrift. But the most curious evidence of the rank assigned to Bunyan in the eighteenth century appears in Cowper's couplet, written so late as 1783: "The grave of Bunyan hee doth not, lest so deeply a name was buried. Should move a sinner at thy deserved fame."

It was only with the growth of purer and more catholic principles of criticism toward the close of the last century and the beginning of the present that the popular verdict was affirmed, and the 'Pilgrim's Progress' registered among the choicest of English classics. With almost every Christmas there now appears one or more editions of the Pilgrim, sumptuous in typography, paper, and binding, and illustrated by favorite artists. Ancient editions are sought for by collectors; some say, but few know that the original is known to be extant. Originally published for one shilling, it was bought a few years ago, in its old sheepskin cover, for twenty guineas. It is probable that, if offered again for sale, it would fetch twice or thrice that sum." — _Book of Days_. Of recent editions, perhaps that by Southey, with his gracefully written _Life of Bunyan_ prefixed, is one of the best. The 'Pilgrim's Progress' has been translated into every language and almost every dialect of civilized Europe, and it has been a favorite exercise of missionaries to translate it into the languages of the people to whom they have been sent; hence the 'Pilgrim' of the Elstow tinkerman is more readable to many than any other uninspired writer. And it deserves all the labor that has been expended upon it. Beyond dispute it is the first in rank of its class. Written by a plain, uneducated man for plain, uneducated people, it has ever found its way straight home to the hearts and imaginations. But it has not less delighted and instructed the most highly educated and intellectual. Macaulay, in his 'Essay on Southey's Bunyan' (written in 1831, _Edinb. Rev._ iv, 450), affirmed that he 'was not afraid to say that, though there were many clever men in England during the latter half of the 17th century, there was no one so great a creator of popular poetry as those minds produced the 'Paradise Lost,' the other the 'Pilgrim's Progress.'" This is high, it might almost seem extravagant praise; yet twenty years later the same great authority reiterates in his "History" (ch. vii) the eulogy which he might be thought to have carelessly thrown out in the pages of a review: "Bunyan is as decidedly the first of allegorists as Demosthenes is the first of orators, or Shakespeare the first of dramatists. Other allegorists have shown great ingenuity, but no other allegorist has ever been able to so touch the heart, and to make abstractions objects of terror, of pity, and of love."

There are many lives of Bunyan. Besides Southey's, see Philip's _Life and Times of Bunyan_ (London, 1830, 8vo); _Eng. Cyclopædia_; Cheever, _Lectures on Pilgrim's Progress_; North Amer. Burch, Robert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Tyrone county, Ireland, about 1777, and emigrated to America with his parents when very young. He entered the itinerant ministry in the Baltimore Conference in 1804; from 1811 to 1815 he was presidents elder on Carlisle District, and in 1816 was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, and stationed in Philadelphia. While in the Baltimore Conference he was repeatedly stationed in the
and was for some time the travelling companion of Bishop Ashley. After filling the most important appointments in the Philadelphia Conference, he was set off with the new Genese Conference, where he filled the principal districts and stations until 1837, when he took the superannuated relation. He died at Canandaigua, N. Y., July, 1855. He was a man of commanding powers and devout piety, and one of the most laborious, efficient, and influential preachers of American Methodism.

Burch, Thomas, one of the earlier Methodist preachers in America, was born in Tyrone county, Ireland, August 30, 1778. In 1801 he was awakened and converted under the preaching of Gideon Ouseley, the great Irish missionary. In 1803 he emigrated to the United States, and about a year after was licensed to preach, and in 1805 was admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference. He regularly graduated in the office of deacon and elder, and soon became eminent as a preacher. He was elected a member of the first delegated General Conference of 1812, held in New York. He was afterward stationed in Montreal, Lower Canada, as a missionary, distinguished Quebec during the war with Great Britain. At the close of the war he returned to the United States, and continued in the itinerant ranks, filling some of the most important appointments, until disease prevented him from laboring efficiently, when, in 1835, he took a supernumerary relation in the New York Conference. In the recent death he was born until 1840, when he had resumed his efficient service, but was able to continue in it only four years, when he was again returned supernumerary. Mr. Burch died suddenly Aug. 22, 1849.—Minutes of Conferences, iv, 444 ; Sprague, Annuals, vii, 421.

Burchard (Burchardus), St., first bishop of Wurtzburg (Herzogtum), in Franconia, was born in England, and about 732, together with Lullus, went over fromuest Bishop Boniface of Mayence, upon his invitation to labor for the conversion of the Germans. He was sent to Rome by Pepin, king of France, to plead his cause before the pope; and, in consequence of his success, Pepin gave him the new see of Wurtzburg, in Franconia, where St. Kilian had preached about fifty years previously. Having at the expiration of ten years entirely exhaust his strength by his labors, he resigned his see in 752, and retired to Hoenburg, on the Mayne, where he died shortly after. He was afterward canonized and is celebrated in the Romish Church on the 14th of October.—Butler, Lives of Saints, Oct. 14; Baillet, Vies des Saints, Oct. 16.

Burchardt, John Lewis, an enterprising Afri- can traveller, is mentioned here because of the value of his travels to Biblical geography. The following account is taken from Chamber's Encyclopædia. He was born at Lausanne, in Switzerland, Nov. 24, 1784. In 1806 he came to London, and was introduced by Sir Joseph Banks to the African Association, which accepted his services to explore the route of Hermann into the interior of Africa, and he embarked for Malta, Feb. 14, 1809. He had previously qualified himself for the undertaking by a study of Arabic, and also by inuring himself to hunger, thirst, and exposure. From Malta he proceeded, under the disguise of an Oriental dress and name, to Aleppo, where he studied about the end of the year, at which time he had become so proficient in the vulgar Arabic that he could safely travel in the disguise of an Oriental merchant. He visited Palmyra, Damascus, Lebanon, and other remarkable places, and then went to Cairo, his object being to proceed from thence to Fezazan, and thence to the Sahara to Sudan. No opportunity of offering itself at the time for that journey, he went into Nubia. No European traveller had before passed the Derr. In 1814 he travelled through the Nubian desert to the shore of the Red Sea and to Jeddah, whence he proceeded to Mecca, to study Islamism at its source. After staying four months in Mecca, he departed on a pilgrimage to Mount Arafat, and there acquired the language and ideas of his fellow-pilgrims that, when some doubt arose respecting his Mohammedan orthodoxy, he was thoroughly examined in the Koran, and was not only accepted as a true believer, but also highly commended as a great Moslem scholar. In 1815 he returned to Cairo, and in the following year ascended Mount Sinai. The Fezzan campaign by which he had waited so long, was at last about to depart, and Burchardt had made all his preparations for accompanying it, when he was seized with dysentery at Cairo, which terminated his life in a few days, Oct. 15, 1817, at the early age of 38. As a holy sheik, he was interred with military honors by the great Moslem burial-ground. His collection of Oriental MSS., in 350 volumes, was left to the University of Cambridge. His journals of travel, remarkable alike for their interest and evident truthfulness, were published by the African Association. Burchardt was a man born to be a traveller and discoverer; his inherent love of adventure was accompanied by an observant power of the highest order. His personal character recommended him to all with whom he came in contact, and his loss was greatly deplored, not only in England, but in Europe. His works are: Travels in Nubia, 1819;—Travels in Syria and the Holy Land, 1822;—Travels in Arabia Deserta, 1829;—Notes on the Berberism and Wahhabis, 1830;—and Masters and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, 1830.

Burden (Nýγος, main, a lifting up, i. e. of the voice; Sept. usually λαμμα), this term, besides its common meaning of a load (for which several other terms were also used), frequently occurs in the prophetic writings in the special signification of an oracle from God. It was sometimes understood in the sense of "a burden, a yoke, a load" (Isa. xiii, 1; Nah. i, 1); yet it did not exclusively imply a grievous and heavy burden, but a message, whether its import were joyous or afflicting (Zech. ix, 1; xii, 1; Mal. i, 1).

Burder, George, was born in London May 25 (O. S.), 1752. About 1773 Mr. Burder became a student in the Royal Academy; but shortly afterward he began to preach, and at length determined to relinquish his profession of artist, and to devote himself to the Christian ministry. In 1778 he became pastor of an Independent Church at Lancaster; in 1783 he removed to Coventry, during his residence in which city he took an active part in the formation of the London Missionary Society; and in 1803 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Congregational Church in Fetter Lane, London, and also to undertake the office of secretary to the London Missionary Society and editor of the Evangelical Magazine. The duties of these offices were performed by Burder with much zeal and talent, until increasing years and infirmities compelled him to resign them. He died May 29, 1832. His numerous publications consisted chiefly of essays and sermons. His works include Voyage to Abyssinia, Visit to Seræna, and Visit to Galla. Six volumes appeared at various times between 1792 and 1812 (new ed. Lond. 1838, 8 vols.), and which have been repeatedly reprinted and translated into several European languages, are perhaps the best known. Of forty-eight Cottage Sermons, Sea Sermons, and Sermons in the Field, six volumes were accepted for the Religious Tract Society for gratuitous distribution on a wholesale basis. The aggregate circulation during his life amounted to little short of a million copies. Among his other publications were Evangelical Truth. BURGESS, Daniel, an Independent divine, was born at Staines, Middlesex, 1645; was educated at Oxford; from 1667 to 1674 he lived in Ireland as chaplain and schoolmaster, and afterward was an exceedingly popular minister for many years in London. He died in 1713. "His pietie and learning were alloyed by too much of humor and drollery. In one sermon he declared that the reason why the descendants of Jacob were named Israelites was that God would not have his chosen people called Jacobites. In another he exclaimed, if you want a cheap suit, you will go to Monmouth Street; if a suit for life, you will go to the Court of Chancery; but for an eternally durable suit you must go to the Lord Jesus and put on his robe of righteousness."—Darling, Cyclop. BURGESS, George, D.D., Protestant Episcopal bishop of Maine, was born at Providence, Rhode Island, Oct. 31, 1809; graduated at Brown University, and studied afterward for two years in the Universities of Göttingen, Bonn, and Berlin. He was rector of Christ Church, in Hudson, N. Y., from 1834 to 1847, when he was consecrated bishop of the diocese of Maine. He published The Book of Psalms in Eng. Verse (N. Y. 12mo); Pages from the Ecclesiastical History of New England (Bost. 1847, 12mo); The Last Enemy conquering and conquered (Philad. 1850, 12mo); and Sermons on the Christian Life (Philad. 1857, 12mo). In certain departments of literature Bishop Burgess was second to no other man in his Church. In his later years his health declined. He died while on a voyage to the West Indies, undertaken in hopes of its restoration, on board the brig Jane, April 23, 1866.—Amer. Church Rev., July, 1866.

BURGESS, Thomas, D.D., bishop of Salisbury, was born at Olitham, Hampshire, 1756, and educated at Corpus Christi, Oxford, of which college he became a fellow in 1783. After various academic performances, he was made bishop of St. David's 1803, and transferred to Salisbury 1825. He died 1837. Diligent as pastor and bishop, he was also very industrious as a writer. His publications number over a hundred, most of them sermons and small tracts. See Harford, Life of Bishop Burgess (Lond. 1841).

BURGH, James, was born at Maddrick, Perth, in 1714, and was educated at St. Andrew's. After an unsuccessful attempt at the linen trade, he went up to London, and became corrector of the press. In 1746 he became assistant in a grammar-school at Marlow, and in 1747 set up a school at Stoke Newington. In 1771 he retired to Islington, where he died in 1775. He published An Essay of the Dignity of Man (Lond. 1767, 2 vols. 8vo); Brittain's Remembrancer (Lond. 1745, often reprinted); Thoughts on Education (Lond. 1747, 8vo); A Hymn to the Creator (Lond. 1750, 2nd ed.); Practical Disquisitions (Lond. 1753, 3 vols. 8vo); Cries, or Essays (Lond. 1766, 12mo); Warning to Dram-drinkers (1751, 12mo), with other tracts, etc.—Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. s. v. 2nd ed. 1797.

BURGH, William, I. D., was born in Scotland in 1741, and became a member of Parliament. He died in 1806, having published A Scriptural Confutation of Lindsey's Arguments against the One Godhead of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (York, 1779, 3d ed. 8vo); An Inquiry into the Belief of the Christians of the three first Centuries respecting the Godhead of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (York, 1778, 8vo), a work which procured the author the degree of LL. D. from Oxford.—Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. i. 498.

BURGUNDIANS, THEIR CONVERSION TO CHRISTIANITY.—The Burgundians were one of the warlike tribes of Vandal origin which, in the early part of the fifth century, left their abode in Germany and invaded Gaul. They were divided into two great religious systems, one being governed by a high-priest elected for life, and bearing the title of Sinist. They settled in the country extending upward from Mayence as far as the territory of the Alemanni. They soon became converts to Christianity. Orosius mentions them as all Christian (A. D. 421) and the emperor Honorius (423) gave them a military rank (Hist. Excl. i. 7, c. 30) dates their conversion about 430. After the death of their king Gundeuc about 473, Gundobald, one of his sons, having defeated and killed his three brothers, became sole king. He was an Arian, but did not persecute the Catholics. Several conferences took place between the two parties, one of which meets at Aix (A.D. 500) resulted in the conversion of a large number of Arians. The king himself offered secretely to join the Catholic party, but Avitus objecting to this condition, the matter was dropped. Gundobald's son and successor, Sigismund, however, embraced openly the Catholic tenets. A new Arian was held by this order at Aix in 496. He died in 524, and Burgundy was shortly afterward annexed to France.—Wetzer und Welte. See GERMANY.

I. JEWISH.—Abraham, in his treaty for the cave of Machpelah, expressed his anxiety to obtain a secure resting-place in which to bury his dead (Gen. xxxvii, 1). And almost every people has naturally regarded this as the most proper mode of disposing of the dead. Two instances, indeed, we meet with in sacred history of the barbarous practice of burning them to ashes: the one in the case of Saul and his sons, whose bodies were probably so much mangled as to preclude their receiving a decent interment (1 Sam. xxxi, 12); the other, mentioned by Amos (vi, 10), appears to refer to a season of prevailing pestilence, and the burning of those who died of plague was probably one of the sanitary measures adopted to prevent the spread of contagion. Among the ancient Romans there was a similar custom of exposing the dead before burial. But throughout the whole of their national history the people of God observed the practice of burial. It was deemed not only an act of humanity, but a sacred duty of religion to pay the last honors to the departed; while to be deprived of these, as was frequently the fate of enemies at the hands of ruthless conquerors (2 Sam. xxiv, 9-14; 2 Kings xi, 11-16; Psa. lxxxix, 2; Eccles. vi, 3), was considered the greatest calamity and disgrace which a person could suffer. By the ancient Greeks and Romans this was held to be essential even to the peace of the departed spirits (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v. Funus). On the death of any member of the family, preparations were forthwith made for the burial, which, among the Jews, were in many respects similar to those which are common in the East at the present day, and were more or less expensive according to circumstances. After the solemn ceremony of the last kiss and closing the eyes, the corpse was carried from the house, having been laid out and the head covered by a napkin, was subjected to entire aubita in warm water (Acts ix, 87), a precaution probably adopted to guard against premature interment. But, besides this first and indispensable attention, other cares of a more elaborate and costly description were among certain classes bestowed on the remains of deceased friends, the origin of which is to be traced to a fond and natur

Burial, though foolish anxiety to retard or defy the process of decomposition, and all of which may be included under the general head of embalming. Nowhere was this operation performed with so religious care and in so scientific a manner as in ancient Egypt, which could boast of a class of professional men trained to the business; and such adepts had these "physicians" become in the art of preserving dead bodies, that there are mummies still found which must have existed for many thousand years, and are probably the remains of subjects of the early Pharaohs. The bodies of Jacob and Joseph underwent this eminently Egyptian preparation for burial, which on both occasions was doubtless executed in a style of the greatest magnificence (Gen. 1, 2, 26). Whether this expensive method of embalming was imitated by the earlier Hebrews, we have no distinct accounts; but we learn from their practice in later ages that they had some observance of the kind, only they substituted a simpler and more expeditious, though it must have been a less efficient process, which consisted in merely swathing the corpse round with numerous folds of linen, and sometimes a variety of stuffs, and anointing it with a mixture of aromatic substances, of which aloes and myrrh were the chief ingredients. A sparing use of spices on such occasions was reckoned a misplaced and discreditable economy; and few higher tokens of respect could be paid to the remains of a departed friend than a profuse application of costly perfumes. Thus we are told by the writers of the Talmud (Massachusetts) waste in lavishing such a quantity of costly perfumes on a person in the circumstances of Jesus, the liberality of those pious disciples in the performance of the rites of their country was unquestionably dictated by the profound veneration which they cherished for the memory of their Lord. Nor is this only. Certain but they intended to use the great abundance of perfumes they provided, not in the common way of anointing the corpse, but, as was done in the case of princes and very eminent personages, of preparing "a bed of spices," in which, after burning them, they might deposit the body (2 Chron. xxv. 14). Un patriotic and wicked princes, however, the people made no such burnings, and hence the honor was denied to Jehoram (2 Chron. xxvi. 19). See Embalming.

Modern Oriental Grave-clothes.

The corpse, after receiving the preliminary attentions, was enveloped in the grave-clothes, which were sometimes nothing more than the ordinary dress, or folds of linen cloth wrapped round the body, and a napkin about the head; though in other cases a shroud was used, which had long before been prepared by the individual for the purpose, and was plain or ornamental, according to taste or other circumstances. The body, thus dressed, was deposited in an upper chamber in solemn state, open to the view of all visitors (Acts ix, 27).

From the moment the vital spark was extinguished, the members of the family, especially the females, in the violent style of Oriental grief, burst out into shrill, loud, and dolorous lamentations, and were soon joined by their friends and neighbours, who, on hearing of the event, crowded to the house in such numbers that Mark describes it by the term σεραμενος, a tumult (v. 37). By the better classes, among whom such liberties were not allowed, this duty of sympathizing with the bereaved family was, and still is, performed by a class of females who engaged themselves as professional mourners, and who, seated amid the mourning circle, studied, by vehement sobs and gasps, and by singing dirges in which they eulogized the personal qualities or virtues and benevolent actions of the deceased (Acts ix, 39), to stir the source of tears, and give fresh impulse to the grief of the afflicted relatives. Numbers of these singing men and women lamented the death of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 25). The effect of their melancholy diries was sometimes heightened by the attendance of minstrels (αὐθήραι, properly πιρήπα); and thus in solemn silence, broken only at intervals by vocal and instrumental strains suited to the mournful occasion, the time was passed till the corpse was carried forth to the grave. See Mourning.

The period between the death and the burial was much shorter than custom sanctions in our country;

Semachoth, viii) that not less than eighty pounds weight of spices were used at the funeral of Rabbi Gamaliel, an elder; and by Josephus (Ant. xviii, 8, 8) that, in the splendid funeral procession of Herod, 500 of his servants attended as spice-bearers. Thus, too, after the crucifixion, Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathaea, two men of wealth, testified their regard for the sacred body of the Saviour by "bringing a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds weight" (John xix, 39, 40); while, unknown to them, the two Marys, together with their associates, were prepared to render the same office of friendship on the dawn of the first day of the week. Whatever cavils the Jewish doctors have made at their extravagance and unnecessary for a long delay in the removal of a corpse would have been attended with much inconvenience, from the heat of the climate generally, and, among the Jews in particular, from the circumstance that every one that came near the chamber was unclean for a week. Interrment, therefore, where there was no embalming, was never postponed beyond twenty-four hours after death, and generally it took place much earlier. It is still the practice in the East to have burials soon over; and there are two instances in sacred history where consignment to the grave followed immediately after death (Acts v, 6, 10).

Persons of distinction were deposited in coffins. Among the Egyptians, who were the inventors of them, these chests were formed most commonly of several layers of paste-board glued together, sometimes of stone, more rarely of ycamore wood, which was reserved for the great, and furnished, it is probably, the materials of the coffin which received the honored remains of the vizier of Egypt. There is good reason to believe also that the kings and other exalted personages in ancient Palestine were buried in coffins of wood or stone, on which, as additional marks of honor, were placed their insignia when they were carried to their tombs: if a prince, his crown and sceptre; if a warrior, his armor; and if a rabbi, his books. See COFFIN.

But the most common mode of carrying a corpse to the grave was on a bier or bed (2 Sam. iii, 31), which in some cases must have been furnished in a costly and elegant style, if, as many learned men conclude from the history of Asa (2 Chron. xvi, 14) and of Herod (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 8, 3), these royal personages were conveyed to their tombs on their own beds. The bier, however, in use among the common and meaner sort of people was nothing but a plain wooden board, on which, supported by two poles, the body lay concealed only by a slight coverlet from the view of the attendance (Hackett's Illustr. of Script, p. 112). On such an humble vehicle was the widow's son of Nain carried (Luke vii, 14), and "this mode of performing funeral obsequies," says an intelligent traveller, "obtains equally in the present day among the Jews, Mohammedans, and Christians of the East." The nearest relatives kept close by the bier, and performed the office of bearers, in which, however, they were assisted by the company in succession. For if the deceased was a public character, or, though in humble life, had been much esteemed, the friends and neighbors showed their respect by volunteering attendance in great numbers; and hence, in the story of the affecting incident at Nain, it is related that "much people of the city were with the widow." In cases where the expanse could be afforded, hired mourners accompanied the procession, and by every now and then lifting the covering and exposing the corpse, gave the signal to the company to renew their shouts of lamentation. A remarkable instance occurs in the splendid funeral ca calade of Jacob. Those mercenaries broke out at intervals into the most passionate expressions of grief, but especially on approaching the boundaries of Canaan and the site of the sepulchre; the immense company halted for seven days, and, under the guidance of the mourning attendants, indulged in the most violent paroxysms of sorrow. See SORROW.

Sepulchres were, as they still are in the East—by a prudential arrangement sadly neglected in our country—situated without the precincts of cities. Among the Jews, in the case of Levitical cities, the distance required was 2000 cubits, and in all it was considerable. Nobody was allowed to be buried within the walls, Jerusalem forming the only exception, and even there the privilege was reserved for the royal family of David and a few persons of exalted character (1 Kings ii, 10; 2 Kings xiv, 20). In the vicinity of this capital were public cemeteries for the general accommodation of the inhabitants, besides a field appropriated to the burial of strangers. See ACELDA-BURIAL

It remains only to notice, that during the first few weeks after a burial, members of a family, especially the females, paid weekly visits by the tombs. This affecting custom still continues in the East, as groups of women may be seen daily at the graves of their deceased relatives, strewn with flowers, or pouring over them the tears of fond regret. And hence, in the interesting narrative of the raising of Lazarus, when Mary rose abruptly to meet Jesus, whose approach had privately announced to her, it was natural for her assembled friends, who were ignorant of her motives, to suppose "she was going to the grave to weep there" (John xi, 31; see Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 111).—Kitto, s. v. See SEPULCHRE.

II. CHRISTIAN.—(1.) Ancient Usages. Among the complex of usages observed by the Christians in reference to the tombs, it is remarkable care for the dead, and a becoming gravity and sorrow in conducting the funeral solemnities. The Christian Church manifested from the first a decided preference for the custom of burying the dead, though the practice of burning the dead prevailed throughout the Roman empire. The Romans used to cut off the relations of the deceased in mourning; but the Christians, on the contrary, preferred the daytime, retaining, however, the custom of carrying lighted torches in the funeral procession. In times of persecution they were often compelled to bury their dead in the night, for the sake of security (Euseb. Ch. Hist. vii, 16; 24; 25; Irenaeus, Adv. haeres. ii, 24). Friends, or persons appointed for that purpose, clothed the eyes and mouth of the dying, and to dress them in proper grave-clothes (usually made of fine linen). Eusebius tells us that Constantine was wrapped in a purple robe, with other magnificence (Vit. Const. iv, 66). Jerome adds, with indignation, to the custom of burying the rich in costly clothes, as gold and silk (Vita Pauli). Augustine, in several passages, commends the practice of decently and reverently burying the bodies of the dead, especially of the righteous, of whose bodies he says, "the Holy Spirit hath made use, as instruments and vessels, for all good works" (De Civ. Dou, lib. 1, cap. 13). He says further, in another passage, that we are not to infer from the authorities given in Holy Scripture for this sacred duty that there is any sense or feeling in the corpse itself, but that even the bodies of the dead are under the providence of God, to whom such pious offices are pleasing, through faith in the Resurrection. The body was watched and attended to, fixed for the place where it was carried to the grave by the nearest relatives of the deceased, or by persons of rank or distinction, or by individuals appointed for that purpose. Appropriate hymns were sung; and the practice of singing on such occasions was explained and defended by Chrysostom, who says (Hom. iv in Heb.), "What mean our hymns? Do we not glorify God, and give him thanks that he hath crowned him that is departed, that he hath delivered him from trouble, and hath set him free from all fear? Consider what thou singest at that time: 'Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath appointed it.' And again, 'I will fear no evil;' for thou art with me. And again, 'Thou art my refuge from the affliction that encompasseth me.' Consider what these psalms mean. If thou believest the things that thou sayest to be true, why dost thou weep and lament, and make a mere mock and pageantry of thy singing? If thou believest them not to be true, why dost thou play the hypocrite?"—Chrysostom, Hom. on Heb.

Notice of the moving of the funeral procession was sometimes given by the tuba; or boards, used before the introduction of bells, were struck together; and in later times bells were tolled. As early as the fourth century it was usual to carry in the procession palm and olive branches, the symbols of peace, and grains of incense. Rosemary was not used till a later period; laurel and ivy leaves were sometimes put into the coffin; but crypsis was rejected, as being symbolic of sorrow and mourning. It was also customary to strew flowers on the grave. Funeral orations, in praise of those who had been distinguished during life by their holiness, were the business of the priests, and the language of some of these orations is extant. In the early Church it was not uncommon to celebrate the Lord's Supper at the grave, by which it was intended to intimate the communion between the living and the dead, as members of one and the same mystical body, while a testimony was given by the fact that the deceased had departed in the faith. Prayers for the dead were offered when it became customary to commend the souls of the deceased to God at the grave, and into this serious error some eminent men fell. Chrysostom and Jerome have both been quoted as adopting this unscriptural practice (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. xvi, iii, 17). The custom of "the church-yard" is, as seems a certain, to have obtained in some part of the parish church-yard is a common law right, without even paying for breaking the soil, and that right will be enforced by mandamus. But the body of a parishioner cannot be interred in an iron coffin or vault, or even in any particular part of a church-yard, as, for instance, the family vault, without the sanction of the incumbents. To acquire a right to be buried in a particular vault or place, a faculty must be obtained from the ordinary, as in the case of a pew in the church. But this right is at an end when the family cease to be parishioners. By the canons of the Church of England, clergymen cannot refuse to delay the interment of the body, or interdict the burial of the deceased in the church-yard; on the other hand, a conspiracy to prevent a burial is an indictable offence, and so is the wilfully obstructing a clergyman in reading the burial service in a parish church. It is a popular error that a creditor can arrest or detain the body of a deceased debtor, and the doing so is indictable as a misdemeanor. It is also an error that permitting a funeral procession to pass over private grounds creates a public right of way. By the 3 Geo. IV. c. 126, § 32, the inhabitants of any parish, township, or place, when going to or returning from attending funerals of persons in England who have died and are to be buried there, are exempted from any toll within these limits. And by the 4 Geo. IV. c. 49, § 86, the same regulation is extended to Scotland; the only difference being that in the latter case the limitation of the district is described by the word parish alone. The 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 86, regulates the registry of deaths. The 4 Geo. IV. c. 49, § 86, is extended to Scotland, when the person persons found to be felo de se, and directs that their burial shall take place, without any marks of ignominy, privately in the parish church-yard, between the hours of nine and twelve at night, under the direction of the coroner. The burial of dead bodies cast on shore is enforced by 48 Geo. III. c. 76 (see Wharton's Justinian Tomes). In Scotland, the right of burial in a church-yard is an incident of property in the parish; but it is a mere right of burial, and there is not necessarily any corresponding ownership in the solum or ground of the church-yard. In Edinburgh, however, the right to special burial places in church-yards is recognized (Chambers, Encyclopedia).

As to the place of burial: for the first three centuries it was without the cities, generally in vaults or catacombs, made before the city gates. The Emperor Theodosius, by an edict, expressly forbade to bury within a church or even within a town. Chrysostom (Umm. in iv in Heb.) refers to this edict.

In cases where the Donatists had buried their martyrs (circumcelliones) in churches, we find that the bodies were afterward removed. This is the first instance we find of burials within the church, and it was, as we see, declared to be irregular and unlawful. The first thing which seems noticeable in this custom of burying in churches, was the practice which sprang up in the fourth century of building oratories or chapels, called Martyria, Propeitia, Apostolatia, over the remains of the apostles, prophets, or martyrs. Still, however, the civil canon law forbade any to be buried within the walls of a church; and, although kings and emperors latterly had the privilege given them of burial in the atrium, or in the church-yard, it was not until the beginning of the sixth century that we seem to have been admitted to the same privilege; and even as late as the time of Charlemagne, canons were enacted (as at Mentz, 818, chap. 52), which forbade the burial of any persons within the church except on special occasions, as in the case of bishops, abbots, priests, and lay persons distinguished for sanctity; and, also, in the canons which accompany the Ecclesiastical Canons of King Edgar, and which were probably made about 960, we find, Can. 29, that no man might be buried in a church unless he had lived a life pleasing in the sight of God. (See Spelman, Conc. I, 451.) Eventually, it seems to have been left to the discretion of the bishops and priests (Council of Meaux, 845, Can. 72). By the ecclesiastical laws of England no one can be buried within the church without the licence of the incumbent, whose consent alone is required. See CATACOMBS.

(II.) Modern Usages. 1. Romani.—The ceremonies of the Roman church at burials are the following: When the time is come, the bell tolls, and the priest, vested, with the exorcist and cross-bearer, proceeds to the house of the deceased, where the corpse is laid out with its feet toward the street, and, when it can be surrounded by four or six wax tapers. The officiating priest then prays over the body twice in succession, which is called De Profundis: he then blesses a chalice of water in which the psalm Kyrie eleison is chanted, and a prayer for the rest of the soul pronounced; this is followed by an anthem, and then the Missæres is commenced, after which they proceed with the body to the burial-ground, with the tapers carried. When the body is arrived at the church door, the Requiem is sung and the anthem Eundem Domine ostende. In the church, the body of a clerk is placed in the chancel, that of a layman in the nave, and the clergy range themselves on either side; then the office for the dead and mass are said. After further prayers and chanting, the body, having been thrice sprinkled with holy water, and thrice incensed, is carried to the grave, the officiating clerks chanting psalms. The priest blesses the grave, sprinkles and incenses both it and the body, sings the anthem Kyrie eleison, and concludes with the Requiem. Some other minor ceremonies conclude the service. The poor are exempted from every charge, and the body is usually buried in the churchyard of the tapers for their burial. All ecclesiastical persons are buried in the vestments of their order. (Biblia Roman., p. 178, de Exequiis.)

2. In the Greek church, the priest, having come to the house, puts on his episcopos, or stole, and incenses the dead body and all present. After this, a brief litany having been sung for the repose of the soul of the deceased, the priest again begins the benediction "Blessed be our God;" and the Triasgion having been said, the body is taken up and carried to the church, the priest going before with a taper, and the deacon with the censer. The body is then set down in the church (Russia has a peculiar custom of lifting it into the church, and the ninety-first psalm chanted, which is followed by a succession of prayers and hymns, the Beatitudes, and the epiistle and gospel (1 Thess. iv. 13-18, and John v, 24-31). Then follows the astantes or kiss, the priests first, and afterward the relatives and friends, kissing either the body or the coffin, as their last respect to the dead. He who kisses the body is divided into stanzas, relating to the vanity of human life. Then follows the elevation of the body by the priest; after which the body is carried to the grave, the priests singing the Triasgion, Lord's Prayer, etc. When the body is laid in the grave, the priest again says the Triasgion upon it, saying, "This earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof," etc. Then he pours some oil from a lamp, and scatters some incense upon it, after which troparia for the rest of the soul are sung, and the graves are filled up.

3. In Protestant lands the forms of burial are generally simple. The order of the Church of England is observed by the Methodist Episcopal and Protestant Episcopal churches in America, and in the college he came to Bilton Hall, in Suffolk, and was chaplain there. In 1671 he was settled in Milden, in Suffolk, where he remained twenty-one years, as curate and rector, eminently acceptable and useful. In 1692 he became vicar of Dedham, in Essex, where he died 1703.

Burmah, kingdom (formerly called an empire) of Farther India. Before the English conquests in 1826, it included Burmah Proper, Cathay, Arracan, Pegu, Tenasserim, and the extensive country of the Shan tribes. By those conquests and the subsequent treaty of 1825, and the war of 1852 with Persia, and Tennasserim, the whole entire coast of the country, have been incorporated into the British territory. The population of the entire country probably amounts to five or six millions, and belongs to various tribes, among which the Burmans, the Karenis, the Peguans or Taingies, and Shans are the principal.

I. Religion.—Buddhism (q.v.) is the prevailing religion of Burmah, where it has been preserved in great purity. Its monasteries, temples, pagodas, and monasteries are innumerable; its festivals are carefully observed, and its monastic system is fully established in every part of the kingdom. While directing the reader to the special article on Buddhism for an account of its doctrines, history, etc., we may here glance at its development, institutions, and edifices among the Burmans. The members of the monastic fraternity are known in Burmah as pon-g yees, meaning 'great glory;' but the Pali word is rukh, or holy man. The pon-gyees, or holy men, are in a degree independent of the term, but rather monks. Their religious ministrations are confined to sermons, and they do not interfere with the worship of the people. They are a very numerous class, living in monasteries, or kyongas, and may at once be known by their yellow robes (the color of mourning), shaven heads, and bare feet. They sub sist wholly by the charity of the people, which, however, they well repay by instructing the boys of the country. The kyongas are thus converted into national schools. The vows of a pon-gye include celibacy, poverty, and the renunciation of the world; but from these he may at any time be released and return to the world. He is also allowed to wear the yellow robe for a time, as a meritorious act, or for the purpose of study, and the ceremony of making a pon-gye is one of great importance. The ostensible object of the brotherhood is the more perfect observance of the laws of Buddha. The order is composed of five classes—viz., young men who wear the yellow robe and are not yet ordained, those who are ordained but are not confessed members; those on whom the title and character of pon-gyees have been solemnly conferred with the usual ceremonies; the heads or governors of the several communities; provincials, whose jurisdiction extends over their respective provinces; and, lastly, a priest of superior grade, or master, who directs the affairs of the order throughout the empire. No provision is made for religion by the government, but it meets with liberal support from the people. A pongyee is held in profound veneration; his person is sa-cered, and he is addressed by the lordly title of pra or phra; nor does this reverence terminate with his death. On the decease of a distinguished member his body is embalmed, while his limbs are swathed in linen, var-nished, and finally encased in a splendid coffin on a highly-decorated caskets, and preserved, sometimes for months, until the grand day of funeral. The Burman rites of cremation are very remarkable, but we cannot here enlarge upon them. On the whole, a favorable opinion may be passed on the monastic fra-ternity that rules the land, although an ill wind does not blow out a candle, and the discipline is more lax than formerly, and many doubtless assume the yellow robe from unworthy motives. In Burmah, the last Buddha is worshipped under the name of Gotama. His images crowd the temples, and many are of a gigantic size. The days of worship are at the new and full moon, and seven days after each; but the whole time, from the full moon of July to the full moon of October, is devoted by the Burmans to a stricter observance of the ceremonies of their religion. During the latter month several religious festivals take place, which are so many social gatherings and occasions for grand displays of dress, dancing, music, and feasting. Much publicized, and full of gay-dressed people, the women dancing to the monotonous dissonance of a Burman band, may be seen gliding along the rivers to some shrine of peculiar sanctity. The worship on these occasions has been described by an eye-witness, in 1857, as follows: 'Arrived at the pagodas and temples, the people suddenly turn from pleasure to devotion. Men bearing ornamental paper umbrellas, fruits, flowers, and other offerings, crowd the image-houses, present their gifts to the favorite idol, make their spek-ko, and say their prayers with all dispatch. Others are gazing more gold-leaf on the face of the image, or saluting him with crackers, the explosion of which in nowise interferes with the sereni-ty of the worshippers. The women for the most part remain outside, kneeling on the sward, just at the entrance of the temple, where a view can be obtained of the image within.' On another occasion we read: 'The principal temple, being under repair, was much crowded by the bicker and flagging, and new pillars being put up, each bearing an inscription with the name of the donor. . . . The umbrellas brought as offerings were so numerous that one could with difficulty thread a passage through them. Some were pure white, others white and gold, while many boasted all the colors of the rainbow. They were made of pa-per, and were variously colored and trimmed with numerous altars and images, and numberless little Go-tamans; but a deep niche or cave, at the far end of which was a fat idol, with a yellow cloth wrapped round him, seemed a place of peculiar sanctity. This recess would have been quite dark had it not been for the numberless taper of yellow wax that were burn-ing before the image. The closeness of the place, the smoke from the candles, and the fumes from the quant-ity of crackers constantly being left off, rendered res-piration almost impossible. An old pongyee, how-ever, the only one I ever saw in a temple, seemed quite in his element, his shaven bristly head and collar, all that remained of his ugly and ungodly favourite idol, and he seemed a fitting embodiment of so senseless and degrading a worship. Offerings of flowers, paper ornaments, flags, and candles were scattered about in profusion. The beating a bell with a deer's horn, the explosion of crackers, and the rapid muttering of prayers, made up a din of sounds, the suitable accompaniment of so misdirected a devotion.' The rosary is in general use, and the Pali words Ani-ta! doka! amata! expressing the transitory nature of all sublinary things, are very often repeated. The Burman is singularly free from fanaticism in the ex-ercise of his religion, and his most sacred temples may be freely entered by the stranger without offence; in-deed, the impartial observer will hardly fail to admit that Buddhism, in the absence of a purer creed, poss-esses considerable influence for good in the country under consideration. Reciprocal kindnesses are pro-moted, and even the system of merit and demerit—the very essence of a perfect world—may be punished by a degrading metempsychosis—has no doubt some moral effect. The religious edifices are of three kinds: 1. The pagoda (Zaide or Ta-de), a mon-ument erected to the last Buddha, is a solid, bell-shaped mass of plastered brickwork, tapering to thesummit and terminating in a spire of open ironwork. 2. The temple, in which many images of Gotama. The most remarkable specimens of Burman temple-architecture is the Amenda of Pa-gan. The ground-plan takes the form of a perfect Greek cross, and a tapering spire, with a gilded tee at the height of 168 feet from the foundation, crowns the whole. 3. The image is generally constructed with a roof of several diminishing stages, and is often adornaed with elaborate carved work and gilding. Burman architecture differs essentially from that of India is the frequent use of the pointed arch, not only for doors and windows, but also in the vaulted coverings of passages. The church of St. Mary's Burmah, is of the other grade—which the ruins of Pagan would almost seem to indicate—is stationary and stereotyped, like that of China. All the wealth of the country is lavished on religious edifices, $10,000 sterling being sometimes expended on the gilding and beautifying of a single pagoda or temple, while roads, bridges, and works of public utility are neglected. The permanence of the tenor of Burman belongs to the monosyllabic class of lan-guages, and is without inflection; the character is formed of circles and segments of circles. It is es-graved on prepared strips of palm-leaf, and a number of these form a book. Printing is unknown, except where introduced by missionaries. Poli is the "language of the religious literature" (Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v.). II. Missions. Burmah has become in the nineteenth century the seat of one of the most flourishing Protestant missions. In 1816 the Rev. Adoniram Judson (q. v.) published in Burmah a Baptist tract and the Gospel of Matthew. In 1819 he baptized and received into the mission church the first Burman convert, Moung Nan. In the winter of the same year he went to Amara-pura (or Emmers-poors), the seat of the imperial government, to obtain, if possible, a general permission for public worship. There was no prospect of such a permission being contemp-tuously rejected. The arrival of Dr. Price, a physician as well as a minister, procured to him and Dr. Price an invitation from the king to re-side at Ava. The war between Burmah and England (1824 to 1829) led to the conquest of a considerable part of Burmah by England. This part became the centre of the Burman mission, though a little church was maintained at Rangoon. In 1828 the first convert from the tribe of the Kares, who are found in great numbers in all parts of Burmah and the neighboring kingdom of Siam, was baptized. A Karen mission was then founded, which has outgrown in extent the Burman missions, and has become the first of the two missions. The Karen language has been so far as scarcely been equalled by any other of modern times. The Karen language at this time had not been reduced to writing, and one of the missionaries, Mr. Wade, un-dertook in 1882 to make an alphabet of its elemental sounds, to compile a spelling-book, and to translate two principal portions of the Scripture into the Karen language. In 1889 there were fourteen American missionaries in Burmah, and the reception of two additional printing-presses, with a large font of types and the materials for a type foundry, enabled them to print tracts and portions of the Scriptures in the Burman, the Karen, and the Taung or Pegans.
languages. In 1834 Mr. Judson completed his Burman translation of the Bible, which was carefully reviewed and published in 1835. The successful attempt to unite the scattered Karens into compact villages greatly advanced the prosperity of the mission. In Burmah proper a new persecution broke out against the Christian Karens in 1848, and many of them sought refuge in the British possessions.
Attempts have been repeatedly made to settle the missionaries on a permanent basis following in Burmah Proper, or at least to secure toleration, but without success.
In the British part of Burmah the work was very prosperous. Mr. Abbott, on his return from the United States in 1847, was met by thirty-three native preachers, who reported not less than 1200 converts in their several congregations. In 1851 they received the marks of the royal favor, and were allowed to com-ence a mission at Ava, which was interrupted by the war between Burmah and Great Britain in 1852.
On December 20, 1852, the entire southern portion of Burma, including the ancient province of Pegu, was incorporated with British India, and thus laid open to the free influence of Christianity. The missions in Burmah, till recently, were maintained by the American Baptist Missionary Union. In 1855 a deputation from the Union visited Burmah, and eventually some differences arose respecting the measures then adopted, and the reports subsequently made in America, the result of which was that some of the agents of business broke off their connection with the Baptist Union. They were, in 1866, in connection with the "American Baptist Free Mission Society." In 1859 the American mis-ionaries were again invited by the king to come and live with him. Commissioner Phayre, of Pegu, in the same year stated in a report to the government of India that the Karens, whose number he estimates at about 50,000, over 20,000 souls are either professod Christians, or under Christian instruction and influence. At the 50th annual meeting of the Missionary Union, held in 1864 in Philadelphia, a paper was read on the "Retrospective and Prospective Aspects of the Missions," which was suggested as among the agencies of the future the formation of a general convention for Burmah, corresponding with similar associations in the United States, the body to be without disciplinary power, purely missionary in its character, to be established and conduct the correspondence, and care of many details hitherto devolved on the executive committee; the membership to be made up of the missionaries and delegates from native churches and local associations, the latter being much more numerous than the former, and occupying a prominent place in its transactions, the annual object and aims being to conduct on the field an agency that should in time assume the sole responsibility of evangelizing the country. The proposal received the cordial indorsement of the Missionary Union, and the executive committee accordingly addressed a circular to the missionaries, recommending the formation of a Burmah Association. Summaries of the results which attended the meeting of the missionaries and native helpers until Oct. 15, 1865, when it assembled in Rangoon.
Nearly all the American missionaries (including three not connected with the Missionary Union) were present, together with seventy native preachers and "elders."
The Constitution adopted for permanent organization is as follows:

PREAMBLE.—We, Christians of various races residing in British Burmah and now assembled in Rangoon, in gratitude to God for his saving grace, and with the glad commission to his Church to preach the Gospel to every creature, and with unfeigned love and compassion to our fellow-men, with the blessed hope of the Gospel, do now, in humble reliance upon the promised grace of Christ, form ourselves into a society for the more effectual advancement of his kingdom in this land, to this purpose we unite in adopting the following Constitution:

Art. I. This society shall be called the Burmah Baptist Missionary Convention.

Art. II. All missionaries, ordained ministers, and authorized preachers of the Gospel, who are in the fellowship of our denomination, and who in good standing are members of the Convention, together with such lay delegates as may be appointed by the churches, in the ratio of one delegate to each church, with an additional delegate for every fifty members.

Art. III. The object of this Convention shall be to strengthen and unite the churches of Burmah mutually and the Christian faith, and to extend the work of evangelization to all regions within our reach which do not receive the Gospel from other sources.

Art. IV. The attainment of this twofold object shall be sought by bearing up the growth of the kingdom of God in the midst of our churches; by the collection of reports and statistics set-ing forth the state of the churches and the results of Christian labor in the different branches of our work; by sending representatives to Christians in this and other lands of the religious and educational wants of the various races and sections of Burmah; and, lastly, by calling for and promoting the use of the prayer book among the native Christians in the common object of saving their brethren, the heathen, from sin and everlasting death by the Gospel.

Art. V. This Convention shall assume no ecclesiastical or disciplinary power.

Art. VI. Money which may at any time be confided to the disposition of this Convention shall be faithfully applied in accordance with the objects of the Convention and the expressed wishes of the donors.

Art. VII. The officers of this Convention shall be a president, four vice-presidents, recording and corresponding secretaries, and treasurer. The president, who, together with the memers, shall be a committee of management to conduct the af-airs of the Convention by giving the intervals of the annual meeting. Seven members of the Convention present at any meeting regularly called by the chairman and one of the secretaries shall be a quorum.

Art. VIII. This Convention shall meet annually, at such time and place as it shall appoint, for prayer, conference, and preaching, and for the transaction of business. At these meetings the committee of management shall present a faithful report of the financial and general condition of the Convention, and for the transaction of its business. At these meetings the committee of management shall present a faithful report of the financial and general condition of the Convention, and for the transaction of its business. At these meetings the committee of management shall present a faithful report of the financial and general condition of the Convention, and for the transaction of its business. At these meetings the committee of management shall present a faithful report of the financial and general condition of the Convention, and for the transaction of its business. At these meetings the committee of management shall present a faithful re-report.

4 missionaries, 6 native assistants, 1 church, 180 members, 2 Anglo-vernacular boys' schools, containing altogether about 130 pupils, and 2 girls' schools, with about 100 pupils. The mission has one out-station and a church. 3. Mountain Karen Mission. Having 14 out-stations, 2 missionaries, 9 ordained native assistants, 836 members, 10 village schools, and 1 normal school. 4. Taroy Mission had 19 native assistants, 19 churches, 790 members, 1 normal school. There is also again, a Burmese department, with 1 church and 1 school. 5. Saugeyemv Karen Mission.—The Burmese department consisted 2 preaching-places in Rangoon and 6 in villages, together with about 157 communicants, and a small vernacular school for girls. Rangoon has also an English church, and a Chinese mission with about 25 members. The Karen Theological Seminary numbered, in 1865 (its 19th term), 45 scholars. The mission press at Rangoon, issued from 1863 to 1865, 8,751,900 pages; and from 1855 to 1865, 10,615 Scriptures and parts of Scriptures. The Pwo Karen Department had 12 churches, 567 members, 1 normal school. 7. Baikin Mission.—The district has an area of 63 quadrangle miles, and about 27,250 persons. Of these, 176,555 are Burmese, and 83,295 Karen. Of the latter, about 40,000 are Pao Karens. The Srau Karen department had, in 1865, 52 churches, 5572 communicants, 50 pastors, 11 native missionaries, 2039 Christian families, 33 village schools, 767 scholars. This department came into connection with the American Baptist Free Mission Society, but the Missionary, Mr. Becher, in 1865, joined the Burmese Baptist Mission Association. The Pwo Karen department had 15 churches, 600 communicants, 13 pastors, 12 native missionaries, 169 converts (during the past year) from heathenism, 10 village schools, 219 scholars. The Burmese department, which was established in 1854, had 50 church members, 1 school, 25 scholars, 4 licentiates, 1 ordained pastor, 2 out-stations. 9. Promoe Mission, 6 missionaries, 298 members, 205 scholars. 10. Mission to the Shan.—This mission was begun in 1861. According to a report presented by the mission, in October, there were ten different tribes or races which had been visited, and a few converts gathered from nearly all of them. Three mountain tribes—the Geikhos, Saaouks, and Padoungs—called Shan Karens, living north-east of Toungoo, on the borders of Shanland, were building churches, and already six young men had been stationed among them. Three churches had been gathered from the Burmese Shans, and mountain tribes, containing an aggregate membership of 102. The mission had 10 churches, 10 assistants, and as many primary schools, with about 200 pupils. In Toungoo there were two schools of a higher grade: one in the Burmese town, taught by a European, and the other in the vicinity, taught by a native, who was under the care of Toungoo for general education were partially met. The school received 500 rs. annually from the government. The other is a training-school for teachers and preachers, in which instruction is given in the Burmese language, and mainly in the Scriptures. More than 50 pupils reside in this school. In 1855, Matrices for casting type in the Shan language were, in 1856, manufactured in the United States and sent to Rangoon.—Newcomb, Cycleopedia of Missions; Mrs. Wylie, The Gospel in Burmish (N. BURNEH

BURNEH, Francis, son of a Protestant minister, was born in 1627 at Leyden, where he received his education. Having officiated to a Dutch congregation at Haanu, in Hessen, he returned to his native city, and was nominated regent of the college in which he had before studied. Not long afterward he was elevated to the professorship of divinity at Utrecht, where he died in 1675, having acquired considerable reputation as a linguist, preacher, and a philosopher. His works include (in Dutch) Commentaries on the Pentateuch (Utrecht, 1660, 8vo, and 1689, 4to); Commentaries on Job, Ruth, and Judges (Utrecht, 1675, 4to); Commentaries on Kings, Chronicles. Zora, Nemahik, and Esther (Amst, 1683, 4to); Commentaries on the Books of Isaiah and Hosea (Amst, 1687, 4to). He also wrote, in Latin, Synopsis Theologicae Gnaecaie (Amst, 1699, 2 vols. 4to), and other works.—Bie. Univ. v., 827; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Burmarn, Francis, Jr., son of the preceding, born at Utrecht in 1671, where he taught theology until his death in 1719. He wrote, among other works, De deo quod ad terram et consensum tam theologum requiruntur (Utrecht, 1715, 4to).—De persecutione Diocletiani (Uit, 1719, 4to).

Burn, Richard, LL.D., a distinguished English writer on ecclesiastical law, was born in 1720 at Winton, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford. He was for forty-nine years rector at Orton, where he died in 1770, 1785. He was a deacon of the diocese of Carlisle. His Ecclesiastical Law (London, 1760, 2 vols. 4to; 9th ed. enlarged by R. Phillimore, London, 1842, 4 vols. 8vo) is recommended by Blackstone as one of the "very few publications on the subject of ecclesiastical law on which the reader can rely with entire confidence. Equally celebrated is his work upon the Duties of the Presbytery and Parish Officer (London, 1755, 2 vols. 8vo; 29th ed. by Bere and Chitty, London, 1845, 6 vols.; suppl. by Wise, 1892).—Hook, Eccl. Bib, iii, 272.

Burnaby, Andrew, an English clergyman and traveller, was born at Ashfordly, 1782, and was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he passed M.A. in 1757. In 1759 and 1760 he travelled in North America, and afterward published Travels through the Middle Settlements of North America (London, 1775, 4to). He then became British chaplain at Leghorn, and travelled in Corsica, of which he wrote an account in Journal of a Tour in Corsica (London 1766 and 1804). In 1760 he became vicar of Greenwich, and archdeacon of Dorset. He died in 1804. Besides the works above named, he published occasional Sermons and Charges (Depford, 1805, 8vo).—Rose, New Bib. Dictionary. Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 296.

Burnap, George Washington, a Unitarian divine and writer, was born in Merrimac, New Hampshire, Nov. 80, 1802, graduated at Harvard College in 1824, was ordained pastor of the Unitarian church in Baltimore April 22, 1828, and continued its pastorate until his death, Sept. 8, 1859. In 1849 he received the degree of D.D. from Harvard College. He was a frequent contributor to various periodicals, and the author of a large number of books, among which the following are the most important:—1. Lectures on the Doctrine of the Trinity, between Unitarians and Arianism (Cambridge, 1835).—2. Lectures to Young Men on the Cultivation of the Mind (Baltimore, 1840, 12mo).—3. Expository Lectures on the principal Texts of the Bible which relate to the Doctrine of the Trinity (Boston, 1845).—4. Popular Objections to Unitarian Christianty considered and answered (1848).—5. Christianity, its Essence and Evidence (1855).

Burnet, Gilbert, bishop of Salisbury, was born in Edinburgh, Sept. 18, 1643, his father being an Episcopalian, and his mother a Presbyterian. He was educated at Aberdeen, and was licensed to preach in the Scotch Church 1661. After travelling in England, Holland, and France, he returned to Scotland in 1666. In 1672 he was licensed priest by Witsch, bishop of Edinburgh, and appointed to the parish of Saltoun, where he sooner gained the good-will of the people by his faithful labors both as pastor and preacher. Here he published an attack upon the remissness and wrong-doings of the bishops of the Scotch Church, which brought him the ill-will of Archbishop Sharp. In 1669 he was made professor of divinity at Glasgow, and in that year he published his Modest and Free Conferences between a Dr. Hole, a Presbyterian, and the Reverend Mr. G. II. In 1675, Charles II made him his chaplain; but he soon afterward, through the misrepresentations of Lauderdale, fell into disgrace, and his appointment was cancelled, whereupon he resigned his professorship at Glasgow and settled in London, where he was made preacher at the Canongate Church. In 1677 he published vol. I of his History of the Reformation of the Church of England, which was received with much favor, and had the extraordinary honor of the thanks of both houses of Parliament. In 1680 appeared the most carefully prepared of all his writings, entitled Some Passages in the Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester, being an account of his conversation with that nobleman in his last illness. In 1681 he published vol. II of his History of the Reformation, and in 1682 his Life of Sir Matthew Hale. Overtures were now again made to him by the court, and he was offered the bishopric of Chichester by the king "if he would entirely redeem the house for the costs," remained steady to his principles. About this time also he wrote a celebrated letter to Charles, reproving him in the severest style both for his public misconduct and his private vices. His majesty read it twice over, and then threw it into the fire. At the execution of Lord Russell in 1688, Burnett attended him on the scaffold, immediately after which he was dismissed both from his preacher's stall at the Rolls and his lecture at St. Clement's by the order of the king. In 1685 he published his Life of Dr. William Burnet, bishop of Kilmarnock, in Ireland. In 1688, upon the accession of James II, he passed through France to Rome, where he was at first favored by the court. But on the arrival of Pope Innocent XI, he was soon afterward ordered to quit the city. Invited by the Prince of Orange, he settled down at the Hague, where he devoted his time chiefly to English politics, and was entirely in the confidence of the Protestant party. In 1688 he accompanied the Prince of Orange to England, and upon his accession to the crown as William III, Burnett was appointed to the bishopric of Salisbury, an appointment which appeared so objectionable to Sancroft, the archbishop of Canterbury, that he refused to consecrate him in person, but authorized his ordination by a commission of bishops, March 31, 1689. In his letter of acceptance he declared that he believed in the predestination and reprobate of all men, he tended his flock with a diligence and disinterestedness worthy of the purest ages of the Church. Finding the general character of his clergy to be not such as became their high office, he devised the plan of forming a community of young clergymen, whom he clothed and kept at his own expense, and instructed them and prepared them for the exercise of the sacerdotal office. Unhappily, the University of Oxford took offence at this institution, and he was compelled to break it up. He died March 17, 1715. He was a man of great learning, and even violent in his zeal against Romanism. Yet, when he opposed him, he used him of maintaining that bishops and priests hold their jurisdiction from the sovereign as supreme head; that these two orders were originally one; that ordination is simply an edifying ceremony; and that the submission of the first Christians to the apostles was altogether voluntary. The truth and exactness of his great work, the History of the Church of the Reformed, has been testified to by the most learned Protestant divines. He not only censured the clergy, but applauded by Charles Blount, compelled him to resign his place and retire from court. He also wrote De fide et officii Christianorum, and De statu mortui et resurrectionum, two posthumous publications (London, 1728, 8vo.). He died Sept. 27, 1715. Few works have called forth contemporary eulogy than the Sacred Theory (translated from the Latin).—Memories of the Duke of Hamilton (London, 1673, fol.).—Pastoral Care (1692):—Four Discourses to his Clergy (1698);—Sermons (1706 8 vols. 4to).—Exposition of the Church Catechism:—Sermons, and an Essay toward a new book of Homilies (1719). The most remarkable of his works appeared after his death, viz. History of his Own Times, from the Restoration of King Charles II to the Conclusion of the Treaty of Peace at Utrecht (2 vols. fol.). It was published by his son Thomas, who prefixed to it an account of his father's life. At the end of subsequent editions there is given a Chronological and particular Account of Burnett. This list contains 58 published sermons, 13 discourses and tracts in divinity, 18 tracts against popery, 26 tracts polemical, political, and miscellaneous, and 25 historical works and tracts. Burnett's works in general do honor both to his head and heart. He was not, in general, a good writer; but, besides his want of taste, he rarely allowed himself sufficient time either for the collection and examination of his materials, or for their effective arrangement and exposition. Yet, with rarely any thing like elegance, there is a fluency and sometimes a rude strength in his style which makes his works, upon the whole, readable enough. Dryden has introduced him in the Prologue to the Hind and the Panther, as the author of the letter of King Buzzard, and sketched him personally, morally, and intellectually in some strong lines. The delineation, however, is that of a personal as well as a political enemy. The best editions of the History of the Reformation are those published at Oxford, in 7 vols. 8vo (the index forming the last), in 1859, with a valuable preface by Beilby, and a new edition (republished, London, 1889, 4 vols. 8vo); in 1852 by Dr. Rush, and in 1865 (7 vols.) by Pocock, who has verified the references throughout, and collated the records with their originals. Of the History of his Own Times there is a new ed. (Oxford), 1865. History of the Reformation in the United States (N. Y. 3 vols. 8vo).—Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles (N. Y. 8vo). See Macaulay, Hist. of Eng., iii, 60, 61; English Cyclopedia. Burnett, Matthias, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bottle Hill, N. J., Jan. 24, 1749, and graduated 1769 at the College of New Jersey. In April, 1775, he was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church. His sympathies were with the king, and during the Revolutionary War rendered him unpopular, and he resigned May, 1785. On the 2d of November he was made pastor of the church in Norwalk, Conn., where he labored until his death, June 30, 1806. He was made D.D. by Yale College 1785. He published a few sermons in the American Preacher, 1791. —Sprague, Annals, ii, 92. Burnett, Thomas, LL.D., was born at Croft, Yorkshire, 1656, and educated at Cambridge, where he became fellow of Christ's, 1677. In 1680 he published the first part of his Telluria Theoria Sacra (4to; best ed. 1699), treating of the physical changes the earth has gone through, etc. Burnett himself translated it into En.ish, and in 1726 this translation had gone through six editions. The work was attacked by Herbert in 1685, Warton in 1696, and by Dr. Kell, Savilian professor, in 1698. Archibald Tillotson, who was a great patron of Burnett, procured for him the office of chaplain to the king; but the general dissatisfaction occasioned by the publication of his Archaeologia philosophica, sive doctrina antiqua de rerum originibus, in 1683, in which the Mosaic account of the Fall has treated of, has trespassed upon the boundaries of proper claims; but it now stands in higher credit than ever. It was translated into Latin (by Mittalborner, fol. Gene- va, 1686) and into other languages. His Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles was published in 1699, in folio, and was condemned by the Lower House of Convocation (best ed. Pope's, London, 1645, 8vo). He also published, among other works, History of the Death of Persecutors of the Earth. It will not indeed stand the test of being confronted with the known facts of the history of the Earth; and it is therefore possible that the world may overthrow its doctrine on one sheet of paper, and that there went more to the making of the world than a fine-turning period. Its mistakes arise from too close adherence to the philosophy of Des Cartes, and an ignorance of those facts without a knowledge of which such an attempt, however ingenious, can only be considered as a visionary system of cosmogony; but, whatever may be its failure as a work of science, it has rarely been exceeded in splendor of imagination or in high poetical conception" (Eng. Cyclopaedia). Addis- son wrote a Latin ode in praise of the book (1699), which is prefixed to most editions of it. War ton, in his edition, says that Addison's praises Besse Burnett, whom the three great faculty, viz. judgment, imagination, and memory, have been found united. As a theologian, Burnett is not distinguished. In his treatise De Statu Mortuorum he advocates Millenarian doctrines, and also the limited duration of future punishment.—Hook, Eccl. Biography, iii, 500; Retrospective Review, vi, 133; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 298.

Burnett Prizes, The, are two theological premiums, founded by Mr. Burnett, of Denz, Aberdeenshire. This gentleman (born 1729, died 1784) was a merchant in Aberdeen, and for many years during his lifetime spent £800 annually on the poor. On his death he bequeathed the fortune he had made to found funds, as well as for the establishment of funds to relieve poor persons and pauper lunatics, and to support a jail-chaplain in Aberdeen. He directed the prize-fund to be accumulated for 40 years at a time, and the prizes (not less than £1200 and £400) to be awarded to the authors of the two best treatises on the evidence that there is a Being all-powerful, wise, and good, by whom everything exists; and particularly to obviate difficulties regarding the wisdom and goodness of the Deity, and this independent of written revelation and of the revelation of the Lord Jesus, and from the whole to point out the inferences most necessary and useful to mankind. The competition is open to the whole world, and the prizes are adjudicated by three persons appointed by the trustees of the testator, together with the ministers of the Established Church of Aberdeen, and the principal and professors of King's and Marischal Colleges, Aberdeen. On the first competition, in 1815, 50 essays were given in; and the judges awarded the first prize, £1200, to Dr. William Lawrence Brown, principal of Marischal College and University of Aberdeen, for an essay entitled The Existence of a Supreme Creator; and the second prize, £400, to the Rev. John Bird Summer, afterward archbishop of Canterbury, for an essay entitled Records of Creation. On the second competition, in 1855, 208 essays were given in; and the judges, Rev. Bden Powell, Mr. Henry Rogers, and Mr. Isaac Taylor, awarded the first prize, £800, to the Rev. Robert Anchor Thompson, Lincolnshire, for an essay entitled Christian Theism; and the second prize, £500, to the Rev. Dr. John Tulloch, principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews. Of these essays on the above four subjects have been published in accordance with Mr. Burnett's deed.—Chambers, Encyclopaedia, Thompson, Christian Theism (preface).

Burnham, Abraham, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Dumbarton, N. H., Nov. 18, 1775, and graduated at Dartmouth, 1804. He became pastor of N. P. Presbytery, N. H., in 1806, and remained in the same charge until he resigned on account of feeble health. He died Sept. 24, 1862. He was for sixteen years secretary of the New Hampshire Missionary Society.—Sprague, Annales, ii, 514.

Burnning (the representative of many Heb. words). Burning alive is a punishment of ancient date, which was not originated, though retained by Moses. Thus, when Judah was informed that his daughter-in-law Tamar was pregnant, he condemned her to be burned (Gen. xxxviii, 34), although he presently excused. Burning was commanded to be inflicted as the daughters of priests who should prove unchaste (Lev. xxii, 9), and upon a man who should marry the mother and the daughter (Lev. xx, 14). The ribbons suppose that this burning consisted in pouring molten lead upon some part of the body, which was considered as merely one of their dreams. Many ages afterward we find the Babylonians or Chaldeans burning certain offenders alive (Jer. xxix, 22; Dan. iii, 4), and this mode of punishment was not uncommon in the East, even in the seventeenth century. Sir J. Chardin says, "During the death in 1688. I saw very few executions, and very few personswho are generally the bakers, and deter them from deriving advantage from the general distress." See Punishment.

Burning at the stake has in all ages been the frequent fate of Christian martyrs (q. v.). See Anti-

Burnning-Bush was that in which Jehovah appeared to Moses at the foot of Mount Horeb (Exod. iii, 2). Such was the splendor of the Divine Majesty that its effulgence dazzled his sight, and he was unable to behold it, and, in token of humility, submission, and reverence, "Moses hid his face." When the Hebrew lawgiver, on account of his uncleanness, pronounced his blessing upon the chosen tribes, he called to mind this memorable event, and supplicated in behalf of the posterity of Joseph "the good-will of Him that dwelt in the bush" (Deut. xxiiii, 16); words which seem to indicate in this transaction something of an allegorical or mystical import, though there are various opinions as to the particular thing it was destined to shadow forth. "The fire," says Bishop Patrick, "might be intended to shew that God would there meet with the Israelites, and give them his law in fire and lightning, and yet not consume them." Burnt-offering (תְּחִלָּה, olah, from תֹּהַל, olah, to ascend; Chal. נָהַל, a sacrifice which owed its Hebrew name to the circumstance that the whole of the offering was to be consumed by fire upon the altar and to rise, as it were, in smoke toward heaven. There was in use also the poetical term בּוּרֶל, kalif, perfect (Deut. xxxiii, 10; 1 Sam. vii, 9; Psa. li, 21; comp. Judg. xx, 40); Chal. נָהַל; Gr. οἶκονομία (Mark xii, 38; Heb. x, 6; also οἶκονομίας, seldom οἶκονομίως or οἶκονομίαν, in Philo οἰκονομοῦν, οἰκονομεῖν), entire burnt-offering, alluding to the fact that, with the exception of the skin, nothing of the sacrifice came to the owner. For its preparation the priest or priests in the way of emolument it being being; consumed; as by fire. Such burnt-offerings are among the most ancient (Philo, ii, 241) on record (Hesiod, Theog. 535 sq.). We find them already in use in the patriarchal times. Therefore the opinion of some that Abel's offering (Gen. iv, 4) was a burnt-offering as regarded the firstlings of his flock, while the pieces of fat which he offered were a thank-offering, just in the manner that Moses afterward ordained, or, rather, confirmed from ancient custom (Lev. i, 5). It was a burnt-offering that Noah offered to the Lord after the Deluge (Gen. viii, 20). Throughout the whole of the book of Genesis (see xv, 3; xlii, 36) and in many parallels to the only sacrifice referred to; afterward it became designated one of the regular classes of sacrifice under the Mosaic law. As all sacrifices are divided (see Heb. v, 1) into "gifts" and "sacrifices for sin" (i.e., eucharistic and propitiatory sacrifices), of the former of these the burnt-offering was the choicest specimen. Accordingly (in Psa. xi, 8, 9, quoted in Heb. x, 5), we have first (in ver. 8) the general opposition above as sacrifices of θυσία, propitiatory and offerings (προσφοραί), and then (in ver. 9) "burning-offering," as representing the one, is opposed to "sin-offering," as representing the other. Similarly, in Exod. x, 25 (less precisely), "burnt-offering" is contrasted with "sacrifice." (So in 1 Sam. xv, 22; Psa. i, 5; Mark xii, 38.) On the other hand, it is distinguished from "meat-offerings" (which were unbloody) and from "peace-offerings" (both of the eucharistic kind), because only a portion of them were consumed (see I Kings iii, 15; vii, 55, etc.). Upon this principle, it was enacted that with the burnt-offering a "shew-bread" (a cake of flour and oil) and "drink-offering" of wine should be offered, as showing that, with themselves, men dedicated also to God the earthly gifts with which He had blessed them (Lev. vii, 15, 22; 26: ix, 15, 17; xiv, 50; Exod. xxix, 40; Num. xxvii, 4, 5.) See each offerer himself).

Engagingly and generally all offerings from the animal kingdom seem to have passed under the name of olah, since a portion at least of every sacrifice, of whatever kind—nay, that very portion which constituted the offering to God—was consumed by fire upon the altar. In process of time, however, when the sacrifices became divided into numerous classes, a more limited sense was given to the term "olah," it being solely applied to those sacrifices in which the priests did not share, and which were intended to propitiate the anger of Jehovah for some particular transgression. Only oxen, male sheep or goats, or turtle-doves and young pigeons, all without blemish, were fit for burnt-offerings. The offerer in person was obliged to carry this sacrificed first of all into the fore-court as far as the gate of the tabernacle or temple, and there the animal was examined by the officiating priest to ascertain that it was without blemish. The offerer then laid his hands upon the victim, confessing his sins, and dedicated it as his sacrifice to propitiate the Almighty. The animal was then killed (which might be done by the offerer himself) toward the north of the altar (Lev. vi, 11), in allusion, as the Talmud alleges, to the coming of inclement weather (typical of the Divine wrath) from the northern quarter of the heavens. After this began the ceremony of taking up the blood and sprinkling it around the altar, that is upon the lower part of the altar, not immediately upon it, lest it should extinguish the fire thereon (Lev. iii, 2; Deut. xii, 27; 2 Chron. xxix, 22). See Sacrifice. In the Talmud (tract Zebahim, ed. by Sch. i, ch. 1) was prescribed concerning this sprinkling of the blood of the burnt-offering; among others, that it should be performed about the middle of the altar, below the red line, and only twice, so as to form the figure of the Greek Σ; also, that the priest must first take his stand east of the altar, sprinkling in that position first to the east and then to the west, and finally to the south; and lastly, to shift his position to the west, sprinkling again to the east and west; and, lastly, only round about the altar, as prescribed in Lev. i, 5. The next act was the skinning or flaying of the animal, and the cutting of it into pieces—actions which the offerer himself was allowed to perform (Lev. i, 6). The skin alone belonged to the officiating priest (Lev. vii, 8). The dissection of the animal began with the head, legs, etc., and it was divided into twelve pieces. The priest then took the right shoulder, breast, and entrails, and placing them in the hands of the offerer, he put his hands behind them. He then, taking the shoulder, placed the sacrifice upon the altar and down several times in acknowledgment of the all-powerful presence of God (tract Cholin, 1, 5). The officiating priest then retracted his steps to the altar, placed the wood upon it in the form of a cross, and lighted the fire. The entrails and legs being cleansed with water, the separated pieces were placed together upon the altar in the form of a thin animal. Poor people were allowed to bring a turtle-dove or a young pigeon as a burnt-offering, these birds being very common and cheap in Palestine (Maimonides, Moreh Nevochim, lii, 46). With regard to these latter, nothing is said about the sex, whether they were to be males or females. The mode of killing them was by slipping off the head with the nails of the hand. The following kinds of burnt-offering may be distinguished.

1. Stating public burnt-offerings were those used daily morning and evening (Num. xxviii, 8; Exod. xxix, 50), and on the three great festivals (Lev. xxiii, 27; Num. xxvii, 5); compare Exod. xxix, 12-15. Thus the words were: (1) The daily burnt-offering, a lamb of the first year, sacrificed every morning and evening (with an offering of flour and wine) for the people (Exod. xxix, 38-42; Num. xxvii, 3-8). (2) The Sabbath burnt-offerings, according to the order of the day (Num. xxviii, 8-10). (3) The offering at the new moon, at the three great festivals, the great Day of Atonement, and feast of trumpets: generally two bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs. (See Num. xxviii, 11-xxix, 8, 9.)

2. Private burnt-offerings were appointed at the consecration of priests (Exod. xxix, 15; Lev. viii, 18; ix, 12), at the purification of women (Exod. xxix, 5, 6), at the cleansing of lepers (Lev. xiv, 19), and several times of other ceremonial uncleanness (xxv, 15, 80), on any accidental breach of the Nazarite vow, or at its conclusion (Num. vi; comp. Acts xxii, 26, etc).

3. But free-will burnt-offerings were offered and accepted by God on any occasion. Thus, as for example, at the dedication of the tabernacle (Exod. xvii, 1) and of the Temple (1 Kings viii, 64), when they were offered in extraordinary abundance. But, except on such occasions, the nature, the extent, and the place of the sacrifice were expressly limited by God, so that, while all should be unblemished and pure, there should be no idea (as among the heathens) of a penalty for the payment of a sacrifice by costliness of sacrifice. Of this law Jephthah's vow (if, as some think, his daughter be the sacrifice meant) was a transgression, consistent with the semi-heathenish character of his early days (see Judg. xi, 5, 34). The sacrifice of cows in 1 Sam. vi, 14 was also a formal infraction of it, excused by the probable ignorance of the people and the special nature of the occasion. In short, burnt-offerings were in use almost on all important occasions, events, and solemnities, whether private or public, and often in very large numbers (comp. Judg. xx, 26; 1 Sam. vii, 9; 2 Chron. xxxi, 2; 1 Kings iii, 4; 1 Chron. xxix, 21; 2 Chron. xxix, 21; Ezra vi, 17; vii, 85). Hearths also were allowed to offer burnt-offerings in the temple, and Augustus gave orders to sacrifice for him every day in the temple at Jerusalem a burnt-offering, consisting of two lambs and one ox (Philo, Opp. ii, 692; Josephus, War, ii, 17, 2; Ap. id., ii, 17). Belzoni, Ant. Soc. xxxii, 2, p. 294 sq.; Lightfoot, Minister, Temp. viii, 1; Baer, Gottess. Verf. i, 174 sq.; Sperbach, De Hebraeo holocaustum (Viteb. 1769).—Kitto.—Smith. See OFFERING.

BURNT-OFFERING, ALTAR OF. It does not appear that any peculiar form of altar had been delivered to the true worshippers of God down to the period of the giving of the law; and, as far as can be gathered from the records of the patriarchal religion, the simplest structures seem to have been deemed sufficient. But at the institution of the tabernacle worship specific instructions were given for the erection of the altar, or of the two altars, that of burnt-offering and that of incense, in the manner of these two former, that was emphatically called the altar, as it was on it that all sacrifices of blood were presented, while the other was simply placed as a stand or table within the tabernacle for the officiating priest to use in connection with the pot of incense. With regard to this altar, prior to any instructions concerning the erection of the tabernacle, and immediately after the delivery of the ten commandments from Sinai, the following specific directions were given: "An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings," etc.; "And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not make it of hewn stone; for if thou lift up thy tool upon it thou hast polluted it; neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon" (Exod. xx, 24-26). There is here an evident repudiation of all pomp and ornament in connection with this altar of burnt-offering—the preferable material to be used in it being earth, or, if stone, yet stone unhewn, and consequently not graven by art or man's device. The reason of this cannot be sought in any general dislike to the costly and ornamental in divine worship, for in the structure of the tabernacle itself, and still more, afterward, in the erection of the temple, both the richest materials and the most skilful artisans were employed. It is rather to be sought in the general purpose and design of the altar, which was such as to consist best with the simplest form, and materials of the plainest description; for it was peculiarly the monument and remembrance of man's sin—the special meeting-place between God and his creatures, as such; on which account it must be perpetually receiving the blood of slain victims, since the way to fellowship with God for guilty beings could only be found through an avenue of death (Fairbairn, Typology, ii, 286).

But the directions afterward given (Exod. xxvii, 1-8) for the construction of the altar that was to be placed in the outer court of the tabernacle, it may seem strange that no explicit mention is made either of earth or of stone. It was to be made of shittim or acacia wood, overlaid with brass; to be in form a square of five cubits, in height three cubits, and with a "proportionate" base at the four corners. It was to be made "hollow with boards," and Jewish writers have held that this hollow space between the boards was to be filled with earth or stones when the altar was fixed in a particular place; so that the original direction applied also to it, and the boards might be regarded as having their chief use in holding the earth or stones together, and supporting the fire; place, with the fuel and the sacrifice. Having an elevation of no more than 4½ or 5 feet, no steps could be required for the officiating priest; a mere ledge or projecting border on the side would be quite sufficient, with a gentle incline toward it, formed of earth or stones. This seems really to have been provided by the original construction of the altar according to the now commonly received interpretation of Exod. xxvii, 4, 5, 6, where it is said, "And thou shalt make for it [the altar] a grate of net-work of brass; and upon the net shalt thou make four brazen rings in the four corners thereof; and thou shalt put it under the compass [קַּנים, karboq', circuit or border, as the word seems to mean] of the altar beneath, that the net may be even to the midst of the altar;" that is, as Von Meyer has explained (Biblische u. theologische Wörterbuch, p. 291), there was a sort of terrace or projecting board half way up the altar and compassing it about, on which the priests might stand, or articles connected with the sacrifice might be laid; and this was to be supported by a grating of brass underneath, of net-like construction, as exhibited in the preceding cut. See GRATE. This pattern probably approaches, nearer than any other that has been presented, to the altar originally formed to accompany the tabernacle. The older and still very prevalent idea of its structure differs chiefly with regard to the network of brass, which it regards as the grating for the fire, and as furnished with four rings, that it might be sunk down within the boards and at some distance from them; as exhibited, for example, in the annexed cut, which is essentially the representa—

Altar of Burnt-offering—according to Friedrich (Symbolik).

description of the altar is only reproduced with little variation. The chief objection to this form is that it places the net-work of brass near the top and within the boards, instead of making it, as the description seems to require, from the ground upward to the middle, and consequently outside—a support, in short, for the projecting karboq', or margin, not for the fire and the sacrifice. The articles connected with the fire are not minutely described; so that the exposition given at ver. 8: "And thou shalt make his pans to receive his ashes, and his shovels, and his basins, and his flesh-hooks, and his fire-pans; all the vessels thereof thou shalt make of brass." The probability is that there was no grating upon the top, but simply the pans for fire and ashes resting upon stones or earth within the boards; and thus these might...

easily be scraped or removed for cleaning, as occasion required.—Fairbairn. See Pan.

In the arrangements made for adapting the instruments of worship to the larger proportions of the temple, the altar of burnt-offering necessarily partook of the same character. According to Solomon, as we have seen, the temple was made now a square of 20 cubits instead of 5, and was raised to the height of 10 cubits; it was made also entirely of brass, but in other respects it was probably much the same. The altar attached to the temple of Herod, which we learn from Josephus, again greatly exceeded in dimensions that of the temple of Solomon. "Before the temple," says he (War, v. 5, 6), "stood the altar, 15 cubits high, and equal in length and breadth, being each way 50 cubits. It was built in the figure of a square, and it had corners like horns (literally, jutting up into horn-shaped corners—πορευόμενος προς η ημέρα), and the passage up to it was by an insensible ascendency."

This was, no doubt, with the view of meeting the requirement in Exod. xx, 26; and in like manner, for the purpose of complying with the instruction to avoid any hewn work, it was, we are told, "formed without any iron tool, nor was it ever so much as touched by such iron tool."

In this latter statement Josephus agrees with Nehemiah, but the latter differs materially as to the dimensions, making the base only a square of 32 cubits, and the top of 26, so that it is impossible to pronounce with certainty upon the exact measurement. But there can be little doubt it was considerably larger than Solomon's, as it was a larger edifice, and it might have been costlier to repair the temple, to make all his external proportions superior to that which had preceded. It also had, we are informed, what must in some form have belonged to the altar of the first temple, a pipe connected with the south-west horn, for conveying away the blood of the sacrifices. This discharged itself by a subterranean passage into the brook Kidron. De sacer.

Burr, Aaron, a distinguished Presbyterian divine, and father of the Vice-president of the same name, was born at Fairfield, Conn., Jan. 4, 1716, graduated at Yale College, 1735, and was licensed to preach in the following year. Having labored eleven years in Hanover and Newark, he became president of the College of New Jersey in 1747. He discharged the duties of both president and pastor until 1755, when the pastoral relation was dissolved, and he gave his whole time to the service of the college. In 1752 he married a daughter of Jonathan Edwards, who survived him about a year. He died Sept. 24, 1757. Mr. Burr entered warmly into the great revival that took place in the early part of his ministry, and was in intimate relations with Whitefield, the Tennents, and many other promoters of the work. He was the author of a "Life Grammar," and of several pamphlets.—Sprague, Anns., iii, 68.

Burr, Charles D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Itchaca, N. Y., 1833, of pious parents. In 1841 he entered the Wesleyan University, and distinguished himself there for thoroughness, especially in the exact sciences. In 1844 he was made an instructor of pupils for one year, and a half with great success. In 1845 he entered the itinerant ministry in the Oneida Conference; but his health, never vigorous, failed, and in 1855 he took a superannuated relation. In the same year he was elected president of the Ohio Wesleyan Female College, in which office he remained until his health failed in Feb. 1856. He resigned and returned to Itchaca, N. Y., where he died in May, 1856. "As a preacher he was able and eloquent, but peculiarly for his unpretending, unaffected, inoffensive—"Minutes of Conferences, vi, 98; Peck, Early Methodism (N. Y. 1860, 12mo).

Burrough, Edward, a persecuted Quaker, was born at Kendal, Westmoreland, in 1624, and was educated in the Church of England, but became first a Presbyterian and afterward a Quaker. He devoted himself earnestly to the propagation of the principles of the Freethinkers, and was imprisoned in 1654. On regaining his liberty, he went to Ireland and labored there, and afterward returned to London. During Cromwell's time, though he did not spare the Protector, he was unmolested; but the government of Charles II, as is usual with monarchial governments, was less generous, and Burrough was put into Newgate, and kept there until his death. His book, The Trumpet of the Lord, and numerous controversial tracts, were collected in 1672 (1 vol. fol.).—Rose, New Biographical Dictionary.

Burroughes, Jeremiah, a learned Puritan divine, was born 1599, and educated at Cambridge, whence he was ejected for nonconformity. In 1631 he was made rector of Titchhall, but was deprived in 1656, when he went to Rotterdam, and became pastor of an English congregation there. Returning to England, he became pastor of two of the most important independent congregations in London. He died 1656. His chief work is Exposition of Hosea (Lond. 1643-51, 4 vols. 4to; new ed. Lond. 1642, imp. 8vo). Besides this he published in London his Breviloquia, The Choice of Mosa (Lond. 1650, 4to).—Gospel Remission (Lond. 1657, 4to).—Sermons on Gospel Worship (Lond. 1658, 4to).—Gospel Remission (Lond. 1654, 4to).—The Priest's Happiness, Lectures on the Beatitudes (Lond. 1669, 4to); and several other excellent practical treatises.

Burroughs, George, a Congregational minister, the time and place of whose birth is unknown, graduated at Harvard 1670. He became pastor in Salem Village, Nov. 25, 1680, having previously preached in Falmouth, Me. He resigned in 1665, and returned to Falmouth, where he remained until 1660, after which his place of residence is not certainly known. On the 84 of August he was killed by an ox which was going for water, and executed on "Gallows Hill," Aug. 19, Cotton Mather aiding and abetting!—Sprague, Anns., i, 186.

Burrsfeld, a Benedictine abbey near Göttingen, Germany, founded in 938. The abbot, John von Hagen (1469), organized a congregation here for the stricter Benedictine observance, and the rules of his congregation were received by 136 convents and many nunneries. The congregation was approved by the Council of Basle in 1440, and finally by Pius II. After this it achieved great distinction. It existed until 1669, when the last convents belonging to it were suppressed. Since the Reformation the abbey of Burrsfeld has had a Lutheran go.

Burton, Asa, D.D., a Congregational minister, born at Stoughton, Conn., Aug. 25, 1752, graduated at Dartmouth 1777. In 1779 he was installed pastor in Thetford, where he labored with signal success until his death, May 1, 1836. He was made D.D. by Middlebury College, 1804. He published Essays on some of the First Principles of Metaphysics, Ethics, and Theory (1814), and a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Anns., ii, 140.

Burton, Henry, a Puritan divine, was born at Birsall, Yorkshire, 1579, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was appointed clerk of the closet to prince Charles, but was dismissed in 1625 for criticizing Land's popish tendencies. In 1626 he became master of his college, and was, in December, 1626, summoned before the Star-Chamber for two "seditious sermons." He was suspended, sentenced to be imprisoned for life, to lose his ears in the pillory, and to pay a fine of £5000. Burton bore his sufferings in the pillory with great firmness and distress of mind. He was released from imprisonment in 1640 by the Long Parliament, which restored him to the exercise of his orders and to his benefice. He afterward became an Independent, and died Jan. 7, 1648. His controversial writings were very numerous; a list of seventy is given by Anthony Wood. See Life of Burton (1696), p. 165.

Burton, Hesekiah, D.D., an English divine, was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and tutor. In 1667 he was made chaplain to lord-keeper Bridgman, who also appointed him prebendary of Norwich and rector of St. Mary's, Southwark. In 1669 he shared with Tillotson and Smythson the prebend of Bridgman that had been occupied to comprehend dissenters in the Church of England. The plan, though favored by the more enlightened churchmen, and also by Bates and Baxter, fell through from the bigotry of extreme partisans on both sides. In 1680 he became rector of Barnes, Surrey, and died in 1684, leaving Discourses (2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1684), published by Tillotson, with an introduction, after Burton's death. Hook, Eccl. Biography, ii. 304; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i. 520.

Burton, John, an English divine, was born at Wembworthy, Devonshire, in 1686, and studied at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he became tutor in 1713. In 1718 he became fellow of Eton, and successively living of Magdalen, in Oxfordshire. He became rector of Wrpleston in 1766, and died Feb. 11, 1771. His works include Sermons (2 vols. 8vo):--Discourses on Samuel:--Opuscula Miscellanea Theologica.--Genuineness of Lord Clarendon's History, against Oldmixon (Lond. 1744):--Papists and Papismes compared, in opposition to Philip's Life of Pole (Lond. 1725). His name is also given to an excellent edition of five Greek plays, called The Pentalogia (2 vols. 8vo): but it was really by Bingham, one of his pupils, who died early, and was brought out after his death by Burton. Hook, Eccl. Biography, ii. 312.

Burton, Robert, was born at Lindley, Feb. 8, 1756, studied at Oxford, and died Jan. 25, 1839; he was student of Christ Church, vicar of St. Thomas, in Oxford, and rector of Seagrave, in Leicestershire.

He is only known as the author of the celebrated Academy of Melancholy, first published in 1627, 4to, of which many editions have been printed, and which still holds a foremost place in literature. Storrs often bore from it without acknowledgment.

Burzy, Arthur, D.D., was born in Devon, and was educated at the College, Oxford, of which he became principal. He was ejected by the Parliament, but at the Restoration he was reappointed, and also made prebendary of Exeter and chaplain to Charles II. When William III was seeking to unite the different Protestant bodies, Burzy wrote a book called The Union of Church and State (Lond. 1690, 4to), in which he reduced both doctrine and practice to their simplest forms, in order to furnish a common platform for all parties. As is usual with mediators, he pleased nobody; and besides, having asserted in his book that a belief in the divinity of Christ was not essential to salvation, he brought a storm upon himself which drove him from his prebendaries. His book was burnt by order of the University. He afterward had a bitter controversy with Jurieu. The date of his death is unknown.---Rose, New Biog. Dictionary.

Bussy, Richard, D.D., was born at Lutton, in Lincolnshire, Sept. 22, 1606. He was educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford. So low was his estate when he first came to the University, that the degrees of bachelor and master of arts were defrayed by donation from the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, £5 having been given him for the former, and £6 13s. 4d. for the latter. This favor he gratefully acknowledged in his will by leaving £50 to the poor housekeepers in that parish, having already been the founder of a scheme for charitable purposes an estate of £455 per annum, and very nearly £5000 in personal property. In 1639 he was admitted to the prebend and rectory of Cudworth in the church of Wells, and on the 18th of December in the following year he was appointed head master of Westminster School, in which occupation he labored more than half a century, and by his diligence, learning, and assiduity has become the proverbial representative of his class. In July, 1660, he was installed as prebendary of Westminster, and in the following August he became canon residiary and treasurer of Wells. At the coronation of Charles II in 1661, Bussy was chosen the king's scholar and publicor. His benefactions were numerous and most liberal, and he was a man of great personal pitty. He died April 6, 1695, full of years and reputation, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His works were principally for the use of the school, and consist for the most part either of expurgated editions of certain classics which he wished his boys to read in a blameless form, or grammatical treatises, chiefly in a metrical form. The severity of his discipline is traditional, but it does not appear to rest upon any sound authority; and, strange as it may appear, no records are preserved of him in the school over which he so long presided.---English Cyclopædia; Hook, Eccl. Biography, i. 229.

Busenbaum, Hermann, a Jesuit writer on moral theology of great repute in the Roman Church, born 1600, in Westphalia, and died in 1688. His Metodia Theologiae Moralis (Paris, 1669) carried out the true ultramontane theory of the pope's authority over human governments and over the lives of kings so fully that it was burnt in 1761 by order of the Parliament. It passed through 50 editions, and is still reprinted. It was enlarged by Lacroix to 2 vols. fol. (Col. 1758).

But Pococke observesthat the bramble does not at all grow in these regions.

BUTLER

Butler, George, D.D., was born in Norwich, Vt., June 17, 1796. He entered Dartmouth College at the age of eighteen, passed through a course of theological study at Princeton, in 1824 was appointed a missionary in the West, and became settled as the pastor of a Presbyterian church in Indiana. In 1831, he resigned this charge and came to New York in 1829. In 1831 he was elected professor of Hebrew and Oriental literature in the University of New York, and immediately entered upon a literary career which won for him the reputation of profound scholarly ability. His first published work was prepared from the new editions of his Hebræan. In 1832, was a Life of Mohammed (18mo). In the same year he published a Treatise on the Millennium (reprinted, Salem, 1842, 12mo). In 1840 he began a series of Bible commentaries, which, under the title of Notes on Genesis, Exodus, etc., down to Judges, still remains an acknowledged authority (N. Y. 1840-1852, 7 vols.). In 1844 the publication of another of his works (Apostasies, or the Doctrine of the Resurrection), in which, by arguments drawn from reason and revelation, he denied the existence of a material body in future life, raised a vigorous opposition against him. Unbowed by the menace of his critics, he replied to their assaults by the issue of a large work on the Resurrection of Christ, in answer to the question, "Did Christ rise with a body spiritual and celestial, or terrestrial and material?" and The Soul; an Inquiry into Scriptural Psychology (N. Y. 1845, 12mo). In these later works it was very apparent that his mind had become unsettled, and all confidence in his early beliefs had forsaken him. About this time he became enamored of the vagaries of mesmerism and animal magnetism. He at last became a Swedenborgian, and edited The New Church Repository with decided ability. He also published, in the interest of his new faith, New Church Miscellanea (N. Y. 1845). Among his other Swedenborgian works are, Statement of Reasons; Letters to a Trinitarian; Memorabilia; Menemer and Swedenborg (a partial defence of Mesmerism, giving rise to a long discussion with Tayler Lewis about the "Poughkeepsie seer," Davis, etc.); A Reply to Dr. Woods on Swedenborgianism and Priesthood and the Clergy unknown to Christianity (1857), which in his day was very read by the Swedenborgians. "He was an enthusiastic scholar and a popular author. His ardent and versatile temperament led him to frequent changes of opinion; but no one ever doubted that he was conscientious in his convictions, and willing to make any sacrifice for the cause of truth. He was the life of a scholar." He died at Rochester, N. Y., Sept. 19, 1866.—Men of the Time, p. 74; N. Y. Observer; Fernald, Memoirs and Reminiscences of the late Prof. G. Bush (Bost. 1860), consisting to a great extent of letters and contributions from friends of the deceased, vix., Rufus Choate, W. S. Haydon, Dr. Bellows, and others.

Buschel is used in the Auth. Vers. to express the Greek μονος, a solitary man, a Romanic measure for dry articles, and also to one sixth of the Attic measure (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. Modius), and containing 1 gall. 7.8576 pints, or nearly one peck English gallon (Matt. v, 15; Mark iv, 21; Luke xi, 38). See MEASURE.

But, Thomas H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Washington, D. C., 1814, and plenously educated. In 1837 he entered the itinerant ministry in the Baltimore Conference, in which he continued until the year of his death, filling a number of the most important circuits and stations. He died in Washington, April 19, 1866. He was a man of earnest and courageous nature, a zealous, faithful, and successful preacher.—Minutes of Conference, vi, 202.

Bussy-body (πτυριον, officiosus, 1 Tim. v, 13; "curious," Acts xix, 19; παραφράγκυς, to be once-burr, 2 Thess. iii, 11; ἀλλοτριωτικός, interfering in other people's concerns, 1 Pet. iv, 15), a person of meddlesome habits, emphatically condemned in the above texts of the N. T. as being akin to the tattler and scandalmonger.

Butler, an honorary officer in the household of Pharaoh, king of Egypt (Gen. xi, 1, 13). The original word rendered mayshak, properly signifies cup-bearer, as it is elsewhere translated (1 Kings xi, 6, 2 Chron. ix, 4). The Sept. renders it ἐκπυρωσθεὶς, "chief wine-pourer," implying who had the charge of the rest, which, as appears from ver. 2, is the true meaning. It was his duty to fill and bear the cup or drinking-vessel to the king. Nehemiah was cup-bearer (q. v.) to King Artaxerxes (Neh. i, 11; ii, 1). See RASQUET.

Butler, Alban, a Romanist writer, born in 1710, and educated at Douai, where he early attained in succession to the offices of professor of philosophy and theology. Returning to England, he was appointed to a mission in Staffordshire, where he commenced The Lives of the Saints, which was completed during his subsequent sojourn at Paris, and there published (1745, 5 vol., 8vo). Another edition in 1779 or 1780, in 12 vols. 8vo, was published at Dublin; and in 1799, 1800, another edition, by Charles Butler, his nephew, appeared at Edinburgh. An edition appeared at Derby in 1848, in 12 vols, 12mo, and an American edition in 1846 (New York, 12 vol. in four, 8vo). He died May 15, 1778.

Butler, Charles, a Romanist writer, was born in London 1750, educated at Douai, and practised law in London for many years. Besides writing and editing a number of law books, he wrote Hora Biblias (2 vols. 8vo), containing an account of the literary history of the Old and New Testament, and of the sacred books of the Mohammedans, Hindoos, Chinese, Parsees, etc. It has gone through many editions. After 1806 the pen was largely employed on subjects regarding his own Church, which are collected in his general works. Among them are lives of Bossuet, of Fénelon, of Abbé de Rancé, abbot of La Trappe; of St. Vincent de Paul, of Erasmus, of Grotius, of Henri Marie de Boudon, of Thomas a Kempis, of the Chancellor L'Hospital, etc., and of his own. Among them are Lives of the Saints, a work which Mr. Butler himself continued. He was a strenuous advocate of Roman Catholic emancipation, and much of the progress of that measure is to be attributed to his Historical Memoirs of the English, Irish, and Scottish Catholicks (1818). Hiitherto he had abstained from controversy, but the appearance of Dr. Southey's Book of the Church engaged him in a series of letters to that writer, and afterward in two replies to Bishop Blomfield (q. v.) of Chester and to the Rev. George Townsend, Book of the R.C. Church (Lond. 1828, 8vo); Vindication of the Book of the R.C. Church (Lond. 1828, 8vo). His principal writings are gathered in five vols. 8vo (Lond. 1817). An argument for Romanism and the worster and the worster, throughout, against arguments for Romanism are held in no great repute among Roman theologians. He died June 2, 1852.

Butler, David, D.D., was born at Harwinton, Conn., in 1763; served as a soldier in the Revolution, and afterward entered into business. He was bred a Congregationalist, but became an Episcopalian, and studied for the ministry under the Rev. Asbell Bell, who ordained him deacon in 1782, and priest in 1783. In 1794 he became rector of St. Michael's, Litchfield, and in 1804 of St. Paul's, Troy. He continued in this parish, laboring also as a missionary, and very useful in spreading the principles of his denomination, until 1834, when ill health compelled him to resign his charge. He was born in Suffield, Conn., February 7, 1825. He engaged in mercantile business in New York in an early age, and was marked for his piety and for his active services in all benevolent enterprises. At 29 he abandoned business and entered Yale College, where he graduated in 1857. He was ordained deacon at Princeton, N.J., in 1828. He became the chaplain of the 29th N.J. Volunteers. His labors were unprecedentedly successful. He organized a flourishing regimental church. To this, during the last three months of his life, no less than thirteen were added on confession of their faith, while a still larger number were seeking Christ. Some of these cases were of great interest, and it is only the want of space that prevents their insertion here. His whole time and thoughts were given to the men, in caring both for their temporal and eternal interests. He believed it his duty to go wherever the men were called to go. In the battle of Fredericksburg he was at his post caring for the wounded, though the bullets were flying thick around him. About noon he learned that some of his own men, wounded while skirmishing at some distance from the place occupied by the chaplains and surgeons were suffering for the want of immediate care. He volunteered to go with a surgeon to their relief. On his way he was requested to do this duty, to cross an open field which was exposed to the fire of the enemy's sharp-shooters. He was told of the danger, but his sense of duty was not to be overcome by the fear of death. While crossing this field a minish-ball struck him and passed through his body. In twenty-four hours he was dead.—Wilson, Prebys. Historical Almanac, vol. vi, p. 100.

Butler, Joseph, LL.D., bishop of Durham, was born at Wantage, in Berkshire, May 18, 1692, and brought up as a Presbyterian, his father being a respectable shopkeeper of that persuasion. He was educated by a Presbyterian named Jones, who kept a school first at Gloucester and afterward at Tewkesbury, and who numbered among his students, at the same time, Secker, at Eton. He afterward studied and theological speculations and accuracy of judgment first manifested themselves. He finally determined to conform to the Church of England, and on the 16th of March, 1714, removed to Oriel College, Oxford. In 1718 he was appointed preacher at the Rolls, where he continued until 1720. At this time he was also in the rectory of Houghton, near Darlington, and to that of Stanhope (in 1725), to which he retired when he resigned the prebendary of the Rolls Chapel, and lived there seven years. About 1732 the Lord Chancellor Talbot, at the instigation of Secker, appointed Butler his chaplain, and four years afterward he became clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline, in which year he presented to her his celebrated work, The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature, previously to its publication. In 1736 he was raised to the see of Bristol; and, after various other preferments, was translated to Durham in 1765. He was one of Chandler, who also had his pupil at the Dissenting academy at Tewkesbury. Owing to a charge which he delivered to his clergy of the diocese of Durham, in which he exhorted them to be careful to maintain the outward form and face of religion with decency and reverence, he was foolishly charged with "Romanizing tendencies," and one anonymous writer did not scruple, fifteen years after the good bishop's death, to slander him as having died in the Romish communion. He died June 16, 1772. Besides the immortal "Analogy," he left a volume of Sermons, in which the true theory of ethics was first fully set forth. His contributions to a correct theory of morals consist, 1. In his distinction between self-love and the primary appetites; and, 2. In his clear exposition of the existence and supremacy of conscience. The objects of our appetites and passions are outward things, which are sought simply as ends; thus food is the object of hunger, and drink the object of thirst. The object of the primary appetites is directly to our private good, and others to the good of the community. Hunger and thirst, above cited, are instances of the former; the affection for one's child is an instance of the latter. They may be considered as so many simple impulses which are to be guided and controlled by our higher powers. Pleasure is the common motive for our gratification, but, in the highest state, is no separate part of the aim of the agent. All these primary impulses are contemplated by self-love, as the material out of which happiness is to be constructed. Self-love is a regard for our happiness as a whole: such a regard is not a vice, but a commendable quality. Self-love is not selfishness. Selfishness is destructive of human happiness, and, as such, self-love condemns it. The so-called benevolent affections are consequently disinterested, as likewise are (in their complex manifestations) our physical appetites and malevolent feelings. But, besides these principles of our nature, there is one which is supreme to all others—this is conscience. Shaftesbury had before pointed out the emotional character of conscience under the term moral sense, but its distinguishing attribute of supremacy he had failed to notice. Butler, acknowledging the correctness of his lordship's partial view, combined, with it the slightest necessary part of the entire character of conscience, as the highest tribunal of man's nature, "which surveys, approves, or disapproves the several affections of our mind, and passions of our lives." The practical weakness of conscience does not destroy its authority, and, though its mandates are often disregarded, yet the obligations to render it obedience remain unimpaired,
In this view of the several principles within us, and their relations to each other, virtue may be said, in the language of the ancients, to consist in following nature; that is, nature correctly interpreted and understood.

In the Analogy of Religion, Butler vindicates the truths both of natural religion and of Christianity by showing that they are paralleled by the facts of our experience, and that nature, considered as a revelation of God, teaches (though to a more limited extent and in a more imperfect way) the same lessons as the Scriptures. He proves that the evidence is the same as that upon which we act in our temporal concerns, and that perhaps it is left as it is, that our behavior with God may be part of our preparation for a future life. Nor does the aim of the "Analogy" stop here. The opinion has very extensively prevailed that the utility of the work consists solely in answering objections. Dr. Reid, the Scotch philosopher, has so expressed himself. Of a like purport is the haphazardly-conceived language of Dr. Campbell: "Analogical evidence is generally more successful in silencing objections than in evincing truth. Though it rarely refutes, it frequently repels refutation; like those weapons which, though they cannot kill the enemy, will ward his blows." The outward form of the "Analogy," to be sure, gives some countenance to this view, for the argument is followed through till the root of his error. But, besides the effect of particular analogies, there is the effect of the "Analogy" as a whole—of the likeness so beautifully developed between the system of nature and the system of grace. Every one who has received the total impression of the argument is conscious that he has derived therefrom new convictions of the truth of religion, and that these convictions rest on a basis peculiarly their own. On this point Butler's own language is quite definite: "This treatise will be, to such as are convinced of religion upon the proof arising out of the two last-mentioned principles [liberty and moral fitness], an additional proof, and a confirmation of it; to such as do not admit those principles, an original proof of it, and a confirmation of that proof. Those who believe will here find the scheme of Christianity cleared of objections, and the evidence of it in a peculiar manner strengthened; those who do not believe will at least be shown the scheme by all attempts to overthrow it by force of nature, false, the plain, undoubted credibility of it, and, I hope, a good deal more" (part ii, chap. viii.).

Butler, William, was born in the county of Antrim, Ireland, in 1788, and in 1786 emigrated with his father's family to the United States, and settled in Cumberland county, Penn. Having joined the Methodist Church, he was received into the office of deacon in the Baltimore Conference in 1807, and travelled in its bounds for nearly 30 years, his last appointment being to Lewistown Circuit in 1845, from which time till the day of his death he sustained a supernumerary relation to the Conference. It appears from his own diary that under his ministry nearly four thousand souls were added to the Church. Mr. Butler was a man of deep piety, and of great consistency of character. He died Jan. 11, 1852, at Carlisle, Penn., where he had been converted fifty years before.—Minutes of Conference, 1855, p. 8.

Butler, William Archer, M.A., was born at Annerville, Ireland, 1814, and brought up a Romanist. Convinced of the errors of Rome, he became a Protestant, and entered Trinity College, Dublin, where his eminence talents were so conspicuous that in 1837, when a professorship of Moral Philosophy was established, he was appointed to the chair. His lectures were greatly applauded, and his pupil talents and zeal at the same time gave him great popularity. He died in 1848. After his death appeared Sermons, Devotional and Practical, with Memoir by Woodward (Dublin, 1849, 1850, 2 vols.; Phil. 2 vols.; 12mo.—Letters on Development, in Reply to Newman (Dublin, 1850, 8vo); 2nd ed. Cambridge, 1858, 8vo).—Lectures on History of Philosophy (Dublin and Cambridge, 1856, 2 vols.; Phil. 1857, 2 vols.; 12mo.). The sermons are among the best that have been printed in the last 30 years. On his work on Development, see London Review, Oct. 1859.

BUTTER. See LINEN.

Butter is the rendering in the Auth. Vers. of מִים, chemah (after the Sept. בֵּין, Vulg. bu- grammum), wherever it occurs (in Job xxxix, 6, the form is מים; in Psa. iv, 21, it is מים, makcamahád); but critics agree that usually, at least, it signifies curdled milk (from an obsolete root, מים, chemah, to grow thick). Indeed, it may be doubted whether it denotes butter in any place besides Deut. xxxii, 14, "butter of kine," and Prov. xxxi, 8, "the churning of milk bringeth forth butter," as all the other texts will apply better to curdled milk than to butter. In Gen. xviii, 7, "butter and milk" are mentioned among the things which Abraham set before his heavenly guests (comp. Judg. v, 25; 2 Sam. xviii, 20). Milk is generally offered to travellers in Palestine in a curdled or sour state, "lebben," thick, almost like butter (comp. Josephus's rendering in Judg. iv, 19, γάλα διαφορίας φρέν). In Deut. xxxii, 16, we find among the blessings which Israelurud had enjoyed milk of kine contrasted with milk of sheep. The two passages in Job (xx, 17; xxix, 6) where the word chemah occurs are also best satisfied by rendering it milk; and the same may be said of Psa. iv, 21, which should be compared with Job xxix, 6. In Prov. xxx, 30, Gesenius thinks that cheese is meant, the associated word יִשְׁלָמָה signifying pressure rather than "churning," while Gen. iii, 9 explains chemah to be cream, and Vitringa and Hitzig this meaning to the word in Isa. vii, 15—22. See MILK.

Butter was, however, doubtless much in use among the Hebrews, and we may be sure that it was prepared in the same manner as at this day among the Arabs.
and Syrians. Butter was not in use among the Greeks and Romans except for medicinal purposes, but this fact is of no weight as to its absence from Palestine. Robinson mentions the use of butter at the present day (Bib. Res. ii, 127), and also the method of churning (ii. 180; iii. 315); and from this we may safely infer that the art of butter-making was known to the ancient inhabitants of this land, so little have the habits of the people of Palestine been modified in the lapse of centuries. Burckhardt (Travels in Arabia, i, 52) mentions the different uses of butter by the Arabs of the Hejaz. The milk is put into a large copper pan over a slow fire, and a little lebes or sour milk (the same as the curdled milk mentioned above), or a portion of the discarded milk of a sheep or lamb, is thrown into it. The milk then separates, and is put into a goat-skin bag, which is tied to one of the tent poles, and constantly moved backward and forward for two hours. The butter substance then coagulates, the water is pressed out, and the butter put into another skin. In two days the butter is again placed over the fire, with the addition of a quantity of burgoul (wheat boiled with leaven and dried in the sun), and allowed to boil for some time, during which it is carefully skimmed. It is then found that the burgoul has precipitated all the foreign substances, and that the butter remains quite clear. This is the process followed by the Bedouins, and it is also the one employed by the settled people of Syria and Arabia. The chief difference is that, in making butter and cheese, the townspeople employ the milk of cows and buffaloes, whereas the Bedouins, who do not keep these animals, use that of sheep and goats. The butter is generally white, of the color and consistence of lard, and is not much relished by English travellers. It is eaten with bread in large quantities by those who can afford it; not spread out thinly over the surface as with us, but taken in mass with the separate morsels of bread. See Food. The butter of the Hebrews, such as it was, might have been sometimes clarified and preserved in skins or jars, as at the present day in Asia, and, when poured out, resembles rich oil (Job xx, 17). By this process it acquires a certain rancid taste, disagreeable, for the most part, to strangers, though not to the natives. All Arab food considered well prepared swims in butter, and last qualities of it are not derived independently. The place of butter, as a general article of food in the East, was supplied in some measure by the vegetable oil which was so abundant. Butter and honey were used together, and were esteemed among the richest productions of the land (Isa. vii, 15); and travellers tell us that the Arabs use cream or new butter mixed with honey as a principal delicacy. See Oil.

Butterworth, John, an English Baptist minister, was born in Lancashire, Dec. 18, 1727. At an early age he was converted under the preaching of John Nelson, the Methodist Evangelist, but he afterward became a Calvinistic Baptist. In 1751 he accepted the call of the Baptist Church in Coventry, and there labored till his death in 1808. He prepared a Concordance to the Bible (8vo), which is cheap and accurate, and has passed through many editions. There is a Memoir of him by his wife. See Baptist Register.

Buxa, in the Roman Church, a pyx or reliquary containing the relics of a saint.

Buxton, Jarvis Barry, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Newbern, N. C., Jan. 17, 1792. Though educated in the Episcopal Church, he was for some time strongly inclined to Methodism, but a change in his connection recalled him to his own Church. He was ordained in 1827 at Elizabeth City, where he continued till 1831, when he removed to Fayetteville, the scene of his after labors. He was a zealous preacher and revivalist. He died on the 80th of May, 1851. His works, containing Discourses, were published by his son, with a brief Memoir (1853, 8vo).—Sprague, Anecdotes, v. 679.

Buxton, Sir Thomas Fowell, was born April 1st, 1766, at Castle Hedingham, in Essex, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he highly distinguished himself. His uncles were large brewers, and he entered the business in 1811. His first appearance in public was at a meeting of the Norfolk Auxiliary Bible Society, in September, 1812. In 1816 he took a prominent part in the meeting held in St. Stephen's House, to relieve the distresses of Spitalkfields; and about £44,000 were collected for the Spitalfields weavers. His attention was also directed to prison discipline; he inspected many prisons, and published an Inquiry into the subject, illustrated by descriptions of several jails, and an account of the proceedings of the Ladies' Committee in Newgate, the most active of whom was Mrs. Elizabeth Fry, his sister-in-law. In 1818 he was elected member of Parliament for Weymouth; and in 1819 he took a prominent part in the debates on prison discipline, the amelioration of the criminal law, the suppression of lotteries, and the abolition of the practice of trial by jury in India. He represented Weymouth for nearly twenty years, during which period he was assiduous in the performance of his parliamentary duties, and always active in every humane enterprise. On the death of Wilberforce, Buxton succeeded him as the acknowledged leader of the emancipationists. On the 14th of May, 1833, Mr. Buxton brought forward a resolution to the effect "that the state of slavery is repugnant to the principles of the British Constitution and of the Christian religion, and that it ought to be gradually abolished throughout the British colonies with as much expedition as may be found consistent with a due regard to the wishes of the parties concerned." Mr. Canning, on the part of government, carried certain amendments, one of which asserted the anxiety of the House for the emancipation of the slaves "at the earliest period that shall be compatible with the well-being of the slaves themselves, with the safety of the colonies, and with a fair and equitable consideration of the rights of private property." During the struggles and agitations, both at home and in the colonies, for the ensuing ten or twelve years, Mr. Buxton was steadily engaged in the prosecution of the cause of freedom, encouraged and supported by the moral feeling of the country, and in Parliament by Brougham, Lushington, and a few only of the members of the Opposition. The overthrow of the system of slavery. At length, when, in 1833, the secretary for the colonies, Mr. Stanley (now Earl of Derby), brought forward his plan for the abolition of slavery, Mr. Buxton, although dissatisfied with the apprenticeship and compensation clauses, gladly accepted the measure, and he had very soon the additional satisfaction of finding the apprenticeship abandoned by the slaveholders themselves. In 1837 he lost his election for Weymouth, and from that time refused to be again put in nomination. In 1838 he was chiefly occupied with the preparation of a work entitled The African Slave-trade and its Remedy (London, 1840, 8vo). In 1839-40 the state of his health caused a temporary re-laxation in a Continental tour. At Rome he visited the prisons, and suggested improvements. On his return in 1840 he was knighted. On the 1st of June a public meeting in behalf of African civilization was held in Exeter Hall, at which Prince Albert presided, and the work of Buxton was moved by the Earl of Buxton. The result of this movement was the well-meant but disastrous expedition to the Niger in 1841. During 1843 and 1844 his health declined, and he died February 19, 1845. See Memoirs of Buxton, by his son (London, 1849, 2d ed. 8vo); Quarterly Rev. ixxii, 127; English Cyclopedia, N. Amer. Rev. ixxi, 1; Westminster Rev. xci, 235; N. Brit. Rev. ix, 259.

Buxtorf, Johann, the head of a family which for... more than a century was eminent in Hebrew literature. He was born at Cannan, in Westphalia, Dec. 28, 1564, of which place his father was minister. He studied first at Marburg and Hebron under Piscator, and afterward at Basle, Zurich, and Geneva, under Grynaeus, Bullinger, and Beza. In 1590 he became Hebrew professor at Basle, and filled the chair of Hebrew literature until his death, Sept. 18, 1620. He was as high a classicist and theologian as he was a Hebrew scholar, and his contributions to Hebrew literature were of vast importance. His works are numerous, but the following are the chief: Synopsis Judaica, in German (Basle, 1603), Lat. (Hanov. 1604)— Epitome radicum Hebraicorum— Commentaria in Chaldee (Basle, 1607)— Lexicon Hebraicum et Chaldaicum (Basle, 1607, 8vo; the best edition is that of 1676)— Thesaurus Grammaticus (Basle, 1618, 1619; Amst. 1619, 1620, 1629, etc.)—De abbreviis Hebraeorum (Basle, 1618 and 1640; the ed. of Hebr. 1706, is the best) — Biblia Hebraica rubrissima (Basle, 1618, 1619, 4 vols. fol.)—Tiberius, a Commentary on the Massarab (1665)—Lexicon Chaldæicum Palæstinae et Robini (Basle, 1628, fol.)—Concordantia Bibliorum Hebraicorum, finished and published by his son John (Basle, 1632 and 1636; Frankfort [abridged], 1676; Berlin, 1677).— Log. Unii. vi. 406; Landen, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Buxtorf, Johann, Jr., son of the preceding, and, like him, an eminent Hebraist, was born Aug. 15, 1599. Taught by his father, he made great proficiency in youth. In 1630 he was made Hebrew professor at Basle, 1647, professor of controversial theology; and 1654, of Old Testament literature. He is best known for his defence of his father's notions on the antiquity of the vowel points in Hebrew, which appeared in his Tractatus de punctatorum, vocolium, et accentuum origin et auctoritate (Basle, 1648), and other works. On this subject he had a bitter controversy with Capellus (q. v.). Besides other works, he published Teix. sem. et Syriacum (Basle, 1622, 4to). He died Aug. 16, 1644.

Buxtorf, Johann Jakob, son of the last, was born Sept. 4, 1645. He made rapid progress in his studies under Hoffman and Wetzstein, and learned Hebrew under his father, whom he succeeded in the professor's chair at Basle. In 1664 he was appointed his father's assistant, and afterward Hebrew professor. Travelling through England and Scotland, he was everywhere received with distinction. He published in the course of his pan, but he edited the Tiberias and Synopsis of his grandfather, and died in 1704. Landen, s. v.

Buxtorf, Johann, 3d, nephew of the preceding, was born Jan. 8, 1663, and became Hebrew professor at Basle in 1704, and held the office with great credit till his death, 1782. He published Cataloga Philologico-theologica, containing epitaphs from Casaubon, Usher, Walton, and other eminent Hebraists, to the Buxtorfs (Basle, 1707, 12mo).

Bux (Heb. id. 112, contemp), the name of two men. 1. (Sept. 57, but Pac in Joseph 28). The second of Nahor and Milcah, and brother of Huz (Gen. xxii. 21). B.C. 2650. Elisha, the Buxet (q. v.), one of Job's friends, who is distinguished as an Arab, Elisha or a Syrian (Job xxxii. 2), was doubtless descended from this Bux. Judgments are denounced upon the tribe of Bux by Jeremiah (xxv. 29; and from the context it appears to have been the tribe of Basal in Arabia Deserta, being mentioned in connection with Tema and Dedan: this may render it uncertain whether the descendants of Naor's son are intended, although a migration south of the Euphrates is by no means unlikely, and had perhaps already occurred in the time of Elisha. Some connect the beryt of Bux with Berytus, but it is not mentioned in Ammon. Marc. xviii. 10, and others with Basta in Arabia Petraea (see Schwartz, Palest. p. 209), which, however, has only the first letter in common with it. See Arabia.

The paranomasia (as found in both the above connections) of the names Hues or Ues and Bas is by no means to appear in the Hebrew (Perez, 777), but it is quite in the Oriental taste to give to relate these rhyming appellatives; comp. Isaiah and Ishai (Gen. xlix. 17), Mebaruq and Methusael (Gen. iv), Uziel and Uzzi (1 Chron. vii. 7), and among the Arabians, Harud and Marud, the rebel angels, Hasan and Hosen, the sons of Ali, etc. The Koran abounds in such homoeoteleuton, and so pleasing to the Arabs that they even call Cain and Abel Kabil and Habil (Well's Bibl. Legenda, p. 28; also Southey's Note to Thalaba, or Habil and Habil (see Stanley, p. 418). The same idiom is found in Mahra and the modern languages of the East.—Smith, s. v. See Uz.

Buusi (Heb. Buusi), Ahi-Bux, prop. a Buxite; Sept. Boosii, a priest, the father of the prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. i, 8). B.C. ante 598.

Buusite (Heb., with the art, Abu-Busi; Sept. Buusi), the patronymic of Elihu, one of Job's interlocutors (Job xxixii. 2, 6); prob. as being a descendant of Bux (q. v.), the relative of Abraham (Gen. xxii. 21).

Byblus (BoBlos) in Steph. Byzr, BiBlos in Zo. xim. i. 56, a city of Phoenicia, seated on a rising ground near the sea, at the foot of Lebanon, between Sidon and the promontory Theoproposon (Strabo, xvi, 75). 24 miles from Berytus (Plynt, v, 20; Pomp. Mel, i, 12, 8; according to Polensy (v, 15, 4), 47° 40' and 38° 50'. It was celebrated for the birth and worship of Adonis (q. v.). the Syrian Tammuz (Eustath. ad Dionis. v, 912; Lukan, Des Sacra p. 6; Nonnus, Dionysos iii. 109). It seems to be mentioned in Scripture as "the land of the Gibbals," which was assigned to the Israelites (Josh. xiii. 5), but of which they never took possession. Its inhabitants were famous as "stone-squarers" (1 Kings v, 18), and supplied "calkers" for the Tyrian fleet (Ezek. xxvii. 5). Elymus, king of Byblus, when he learned that his town was in possession of Alexander, came up with his vessels and joined the Macedonian fleet (Arrian, *Anab. ii. 15, 8; 20, 1). Byblus seems afterward to have fallen into the hands of a petty tyrant, since Pompey is described as giving it freedom by beheading the tyrant (Strabo, xvi, 759). This town, then called Gibal (Abulfed. Tog. Syr. p. 94; Schultens's *Index Vet. S. H. v. *Sibilia), after having been the see of a bishop (Roldan, Palest. p. 216), fell under Moslem rule (see Richter, Walf. p. 214; Reise einer Wienerin, ii, 201; Michaeis, Suppl. p. 251 sq. ; Hamelweld, P. 275). The modern town is named Jabel, and is enclosed by a wall about a mile and a half in circumference, apparently the time of the Crusades (Chesney, Exk. Exp. t. 453). It contains the remains of an ancient Roman theatre; the "caeva" is nearly perfect, with its concentric ranks of seats, divided by their "precinctiones," "cunei," etc., quite distinguishable (Thomson, in the Bibliothee Classi). Many columns and other granite columns are lying about (Burckhardt, Syrria, p. 180). Byblus was the birthplace of the Philo who translated Sanchoniathe into Greek. The coins of Byblus bear frequently the type of Astarte; also of Isis, who came hither in search of the body of Osiris (Eckhel, iii, 353; Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscr., iv, 28 and 30). Another city of the same name in Ladicla (Abulf. Syria, p. 100 sq.) must not be confounded with the above, as it lay entirely beyond the region of Palestine. See Giblite.

Byfield, Nicholas, a Puritan divine, was born in Warwickshire, 1579, and entered Exeter College, Oxford, 1596. After serving as rector of St. Peter's, Chester, he became vicar of Isleworth in 1615, and died in 1622. "He had an excellent character for learning, sound judgment, quick invention, and success in the ministry." He published A Commentary on the Psalms (1622, 8vo. — See also: Bibliotheca Christiana, i. 349; and Dictionary of Authors, i. 817.)

Bysfield, Richard, an English Nonconformist, brother of Nicholas, was born in Worcestershire, studied at Cambridge, and became curate of Islavorth. He held the living of Long-Ditton during the Commonwealth, and was ejected at the Restoration. He was a member of the Assembly of Divines, and a vigorous opponent of prelacy and superstition. He died 1654. Among his writings were The Light of Faint (1618, 8vo.) — The Doctrine of the Sabbath (1632, 4to.) — The Power of the Christ of God (1641, 4to.) — The Gospel's Glory without Prejudice to the Law (1659, sm. 8vo.) — Darlington, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i. 535; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 817.

Byles, Mather, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, March 28, 1706, graduated at Harvard 1729, and was installed pastor of the Hollis Street church Dec. 20, 1738. He was made D.D. at Aberdeen 1765. He was a Tory in politics, and was therefore dismissed from his charge in 1776. He spent the remainder of his days in private life, and died July 5, 1788. Dr. Byles was distinguished for literary taste and exuberant wit. He published a Poem on the Death of George II. (1772) — an Elegy on the Death of Hon. Daniel Oliver (1782) — a Poetical Epistle to Gov. Belcher on the Death of his Lady (1786) — a Poem on the Death of the Queen (1786) — Poems: The Conflagration, The God of Tempest and Earthquake (1744) — and a number of essays and occasional sermons. — Sprague, Annals, i. 376.

Byzantia, Anthony, a Dutch divine and scholar, was born at Utrecht, Aug. 6, 1664, and studied the ancient languages under Gravius. After his ordination to the Protestant ministry he devoted himself to the Oriental languages, and became an eminent scholar in Hebrew and Syriac. He died at Deventer, Nov. 8, 1698. Among his works are De Calceata Hierosolymitana (1705). De Origine Id. Evang. de Naturate Christi (Dort, 1688, 4to.) — De Natali Jesu Christi (Amst. 1689, 4to.) — with sermons and commentaries in the Dutch language. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vii. 931.

Bythner, Victorinus, a native of Poland, who came to England, matriculated at the University of Oxford, and read lectures on Hebrew there for years. He then passed some time in Cambridge, and about 1654 settled in Cornwall, where he practised medicine. He died in 1670. Among his writings are Lethergy of the Soul (1636, 8vo.) — Tabula Directoris Linguae Sanctae (Oxford, 1637, 8vo.) — Manipulus Memorum Fugae (London, 1630, 8vo.) — Clarus Linguæ Sanctæ (Cambridge, 1649, 8vo.) — Pro eo litteris, Chalcis (London, 1667, fol.) — Pro eis litteris, Chalcis (London, 1685, 12mo.) — Pro eis litteris, Chalcis (London, 1660, 8vo.), containing a grammatical explanation of all the Hebrew words in the Psalms; often reprinted; translated into English by Dee, under the title The Lyre of David (London, 1636, 8vo.; 1647, 8vo.). Horne calls it the "most valuable help to the critical and grammatical study of the Psalms." — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vii. 566; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 824.

Bzkovius (Bzowx), Abraham, a Polish Romanist divine, was born at Przecyzil in 1667. He studied at Cracow, where he became a Dominican. He subsequently taught philosophy at Milan, and theology at Bologna. On his return into Poland he became prior of the Dominicans at Cracow, and contributed greatly to the extension of the order. Pius V called him to Rome, where he was employed on a continuation of the Annals of Baronius from A.D. 1198 to 1522; and he completed nine volumes (xii to xxii), which were printed at Cologne, from 1616 to 1630, and at Rome in 1672. Among his other writings are Historia Ecclesiastica de Baronii annibalsibus historiar exserpta (Col. 1617, 3 vols. fol.) — XL Sermones super Canticum Salutis Regina (Venice, 1598) — Sacram Pompapiurn (Lemov. 1617). — De rebus gestis Summorum Pontificum (Col. 1619 and 1622, 4to.). He died at Rome, Jan. 81, 1637. — Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, vii. 909.
