The right of appeal connected with that privilege originated in the Valerian, Porcian, and Sempronian laws, by which it was enacted that if any magistrate should order flagellation or death to be inflicted upon a Roman citizen, the accused person might appeal to the judgment of the people, and that meanwhile he should suffer nothing at the hands of the magistrate until the people had judged his case. But what was originally the prerogative of the people had in Paul's time become that of the emperor, and appeal therefore was made to him (see Smith's Dictionary of Classical Antiquities, s. v. Appellatio, Roman). Hence Pliny (Ep. vii. 9) mentions that he had sent to Rome some Christians, who were Roman citizens, and had appealed unto Caesar. This privilege could not be disallowed by any magistrate to any person whom the law entitled to it. Indeed very heavy penalties were attached to any refusal to allow such an appeal, whatever might be the consequences for going to Rome. See, generally, Kroghi, De proceretio Pauli ad Caesarum (Lips. 1785); Santorocelli, Dita. de Pauli ad Caesarem appellazione (Marburg, 1721).

III. Ecclesiastical.—In the early Church all ecclesiastical matters were originally determined by the bishops with their court, from whose decision an appeal lay to the provincial synod (see council of Africa, 418). The case of Apollinaris, priest of Siccæ, in Mauritania, is supposed to have been about the first instance of an appeal to Rome, on which occasion the African Church resolutely resisted this papal encroachment on her independence. In the Middle Ages it often occurred that those whose doctrines had been censured by the pope appealed from his decision to an ecumenical council. Such, e.g., was the case with Wycliffe. Reports to the dean and chapter (of the bishopric) fall in doing justice), so that the condemnation be ended in the archbishop's court by a precept from the king, and so that it go no further without the king's consent." These appeals were from time to time further prohibited, but they continued to be practiced until the time of the final rupture with Rome in the fifteenth century, when the synods were entirely abolished (24 Hen. VIII, cap. 12, and 28 Hen. VIII, cap. 19). The Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, can. 12, and that of Chalcedon, declare that no royal or imperial decree can have any force in ecclesiastical matters against the canons. Such indeed has ever been the discipline of the Church.

During the appeal the sentence of the inferior court is suspended; and it is usual for the superior court, at the instance of the appellant, to grant an inhibition to stay the execution of the sentence of the inferior court until the appeal shall be determined (Bingham, Orig. Ecl.
II., ch. xvi, § 16).

In the Methodist Episcopal Church, the right of appeal from lower to higher courts, both for ministers and laymen, is carefully guarded by a constitutional provision (Discipline, pt. i, § 4).

In Presbyterian churches there are formal modes of appeal from a lower to a higher court, or from a session to presbytery, and from it to a synod, and from the synod to the general assembly.

Appearance (ἐπίθεν, Mark xvi, 9; ἐπιθέσθαι, Mark xvi, 12, 14; ἐπιθέσθη, Luke xxiv, 8; 1 Cor. xv, 5; ἐπιθέσθην εἰς τοὺς, John xxi, 1, παρεστάθην εἰς τοὺς), a term usually applied to the interviews afforded by Christ to his disciples after his resurrection (q. v.).

The circumstances of these instances indicate that his body, although not yet glorified, had already undergone such a change as to give it extraordinary powers of locomotion, even through closed doors, and of becoming visible or invisible at pleasure, while yet it retained the palpable characteristics of matter, and was even capable of taking food in the ordinary way; traits that ally it strongly to the "spiritual body" of the angels (q. v.). Monographs on these occurrences and their peculiarities have been written by Fecht (Rost .1699), Langsdorff (Vital. 1710), Alberty (Lipsi. 1695), Appearance to Mary Magdalen. There is a difficulty connected with the first of these appearances.

The gospel narratives (Matt, xxviii, I-15; Mark xvi, 2-11; Luke xvi, 11-20; John xx, 11-20) are separately adjusted in their several incidents to each other, distinctively indicate that Mary the Magdalene was not among the Galilean women at the time they were favored with the first sight of their risen Master, she having just then left them to call Peter and John; and that Peter and John went to the sepulcher to see it apartly. Mark, however, uses one expression that seems directly to contradict this arrangement: "Jesus ..... appeared first to ἡ παρασκευή of Mary Magdalen" (xxvi, 9). Several methods of reconciling this discordance have been devised, but they are all untenable, and the best of them (that of Dr. Robinson [after Hengstenberg]) in the Bibliotheca Sacra, Feb. 1846, p. 178) is not at all satisfactory (see Davidson, Introd. to the N. T., i, 169), which consists in considering the "first" as put by Mark relatively (q. d. πρῶτος), to denote the first of the three appearances related by him simply, the "after that" of verse 12 introducing a second appearance and the "afterward" of verse 14 serving to mark the last of Mark's series. Any reader, taking the words in their natural construction, would certainly understand Mark as meaning to say absolutely that Christ's first public appearance was made to Mary, and two of his subsequent ones to other persons. Moreover, the question is, how does Mark single out this appearance to Mary, rather than the previous one to several women? A closer inspection of the facts will assist in clearing up the difficulty. Independently of this "first" of Mark, the incidents may naturally be arranged as in the following scheme (see Strong's Harr. of the Gospels, § 138-141).

By this it is seen that Christ's appearance to the other women could not well have preceded that to Mary, for the time for the other women's return be so lengthened as to make the appearance to Mary precede that to them, the interval in this direction cannot be made to exceed fifteen minutes, as any one may see by making the corresponding changes in the above table. Mark, in speaking in this general, his narrative, would not be likely to distinguish between two appearances so nearly coincident; the very parties who witnessed them, or heard them reported, would not themselves have noticed so slight a priority without instituting some such calculation as the above, which they were in no condition of mind at the time to make, nor likely to concern themselves about afterward. In the verse under consideration, therefore, Mark designs to refer to both these appearances as one, and he mentions Mary's name particularly because of her prominence in the whole matter, just as he places her first in the list in verse 1 (comp. Matt. xxvii, 56, 61; xxviii, 1; and see on John x, 17). This identification is confirmed by the fact that none of the evangelists mention both of these appearances, Matthew and Luke narrating the events just as if Mary had been with the other women at the time of their meeting with Christ, while Mark and John speak of the appearance to her only; yet they all obviously embrace in their accounts the twofold appearance. Luke also explicitly includes Mary among the women who brought the tidings to the apostles (verse 10), evidently not distinguishing her subsequent report from that of the others with whom she at first went out. This idea, is, in fact, the key to the whole plan of the gospel according to Mark, as he does not design to be a parallel to Luke's account of the same event, but, on the contrary, to furnish each a complete narrative of all the incidents in their exact order, but to show that those Galilean women were, as a company, the first witnesses of Christ's resurrection.

According to the astronomical formula, the duration of distinct twilight at that time of the year in the latitude of Jerusalem (supposing the unchanging refracting influences in the atmosphere) is 1 hour 40 minutes, which would make extreme daybreak occur about four o'clock, as it was near the time of the vernal equinox. The light of the full moon would enable the women to see their way even before dawn. Mark says "even" (ὥστε, xvi, 4), and in the visit of the women he says "very early" (λίγον ώραν, xvi, 2); but the descent of the angel must have occurred first, because the women found the stone rolled away on their arrival. The guard had probably just before been relieved (i. e. at the "dawn-watch," which began at this time of the year about three o'clock A.M.), and corresponded in its Greek title to the term here used by Mark), so that they had time to recover from their fright sufficiently to report their disaster without being surprised in their plight by the arrival of a relay. See GIRD. The distance the women had to go was not great. See MARY MAGDALENE.

Appellant (1), a legal term, denoting one who requests the removal of a cause from an inferior to a superior court; often, he thinks himself aggrieved by the sentence of the inferior judge. See APPEAL.

(2.) The word appellant is particularly applied to those among the French clergy who appealed from the bull Unigenitus, issued by Pope Clement in 1718, either to the pope "better informed," or to a general council. The whole body of the French clergy and the several monasteries were divided into Appellants and Non-Appellants; a signal instance of the unity of the Romish Church! See UNIGENITUS. BULL.

Apphia (pron. Ἀφη'α, Ἀφι'α, prob. for 'Aphi'a), the Greek form of the Lat. name Aphro), the name of a female affectionately saluted by Paul (A.D. 57) as a Christian at Colosse (Philemon 2); supposed by Chrysostom and Theodoret to have been the wife of Philemon, with whom, according to tradition, she suffered martyrdom. See PHILEMON.

Apphus (pron. Ἀφ'ος, Ἀ'φως [and so Josephus, Ant. xii, 6, 1) v. r. Σφωνοι or Σφωνοι), the surname of Jonathan Maccabaeus (see Ewald, Gesch. Isr. III, ii, 853), apparently (Frankel, Virchow, zur LXX, p. 96) from the Syro-Chal. ܡܫܚܢܐ, ܕܕܟܐ, ܟܟܐ, crafty (Grimm, Hombl. In loc.).

App'i-fo'rum (Ἀπι'ψωρον, φοῖνον, for the Lat. Appius Forum, "market-place of Appius"), a market-town (with a so-called mansio) in Italy, 43 Roman miles from Rome (Itiner. Anton. p. 107, ed. Wessel; Imer. Horace, p. 411), on the great road (via Appia) from Rome to Brundunum, constructed by Appius Claudius (Suet. Tib. 2), and leading from Rome (by the Porta Capena) through the Pontine marshes (Hor. Sat. 1, 5, 3; Cic. Att. ii, 10; Plin. iii, 9; xiv, 9). The remains of an ancient town, supposed to be Appi-Forum, are still preserved at a place called Casaurio di Senita Maria, on the border of the Pontine marshes (codex Strabo, v, 233), and the 43d milestone is still extant (Chaupy, Maison d'Horace, iii, 387-462; Pratelli, Via Appia, p. 99, 100). Its vicinity to the marshes accounts for the badness of the water, as mentioned by Horace (Sat. i, 5, 7), who describes it as full of taverns and bostings. The journal of the voyage along the Appian Way, remains of which are still extant, describes the "Three Taverns," where it was known the advancing party would rest, while some others went on as far as Appi-Forum to meet Paul on the road (Conybeare and Howson, ii, 219). The character and scenery along the Appian Way, by the way, are the same as those of the journey by the Via Volatina, and the westward journey by the Via Salaria," an account of which is given in the preceding voyages. See generally BARTAUS, De foro Appii et trib. tabernae (Aldgate, 1745).

Apple is the translation in the Auth. Ver. of the Heb. ʾappul (tappuʿakh, so called from its fragrance), which is mentioned chiefly in the Canticles, ii, 3, "as the apple-tree among the trees of the wood;" vers. 5, "Comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love;" vers. 8, "The apple-tree among the trees of love." Solomon describes its esthetic influence (Prov. viii, 11), "A word is not out of the mouth of the apple of gold in baskets of silver." Joel i, 12, it is enumerated with the vine, the fig-tree, the palm, and pomegranate, as among the most valuable trees of Palestine. Tappuṣ (q. v.) also occurs as the name of two places (Josh. xii, 13; xv, 84; xvi, 8), probably from the abounds of fruit in the vicinity of the place.

It is a difficult matter to say with any degree of certainty what is the specific tree denoted by the Hebrew word tappuʿakh. The Sept. and Vulg. afford no clue, as the terms μηδεμία, μαλβα, have a wide significance, being used by the Greeks and Romans to represent almost any kind of tree-fruit; at any rate, the use of the word is certainly generic. Many interpreters (after Celsius, Hierobol. i, 555) have supposed the citron (citrum medico), some the ordinary orange-tree (Credner, Joel, p. 136), to be meant, as each of these were celebrated favorites among the ancients, and have many qualities agreeing with the Scriptural notices. The citron was the "apple" of the biblical citation of the ciremola of the Romans (Theophr. Hist. 4), and was cultivated even in Europe (Baunin, Pinax). That it was well known to the Hebrews appears from the fact mentioned by Josephus, that at the Festival of Taber-naces Alexander Jannasch was pelted with citrons, which the Jews had in their hands; for, as he says, "the law required that at that feast everyone should have branches of the palm-tree and citron-tree" (Ant. xiii. 18, 5). It is still found in Palestine (Kitto, Phys. Hist. p. 233). As, however, the Sept. and Vulgar.-

both seem to understand the apple (μήλον, malum), and the Arabic stil connected by the same name (אַפָּלָךְ), which, according to the Talmud (Mishna, Kel. i. 4; Mas. i. 4) and Josephus (Ant. xvii. 7), was anciently cultivated in Palestine, as it is still to some extent (Robinson, ii. 856; ii. 856, 716; iii. 295), and was celebrated in antiquity for its agreeable smell (Ovid, Met. vii. 670), it is more likely to be the tree designated rather than the citron, which is a small, comparatively rare tree, with a hard, inedible fruit (Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 328, 329). See Citron.

On the other hand, Celsus (Hierob. i. 255) asserts that the quince-tree (Fuyrus cypsilo) was very often called by the Greek and Latin writers malus, as being, from the esteem in which it was held ("primary malus species"), the malus, or μήλον κατ' εξον. Some, therefore (Rosenmüller, Allerth. IV, i. 808; Ray, Hist. of Plants, II, 11, 1453), have endeavored to show that the tappusach denotes the quince; and certainly this opinion has some plausible arguments in its favor. The fragrance of the quince was held in high esteem by the ancients; and the fruit "was placed on the heads of those images in the sleeping apartments which were reckoned among the household gods" (Rosenmüller, Botany of Bible, in the Bib. Cad. p. 811; Yona, On Virgil, Eclog. ii. 51). The Arabians make special allusion to the restorative properties of this fruit; and Celsus (p. 261) quotes Abü'l Fadili in illustration of Cant. ii. 5, "Its scent," says the Arabic author, "cheers my soul, reneweth my strength, and restoreth my breath." Phylarchus (Histor. III. vi), Caleb Solomon (in Cant. ii. 3), Poly (II. N. xxv. 11), who uses the words odoris praestantissimi, bear similar testimony to the delicious fragrance of the quince. It is well known that among the ancients the quince was sacred to the goddess of love, whence statues of Venus sometimes represent her with the fruit of this tree in her hand. In her honor the quince being the ill-fated "apple of discord" which Paris appropriately enough presented to that deity. Hence the act expressed by the term μηλοδοξια (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nath. p. 180; Theocr. Id. iii. 10, v. 88, etc.; Virgil, Eclog. iii. 64) was a token of love. For numerous testimonies, see Celsus, Hierob. i. 265, See Botany.

Although it is so usual to speak of the forbidden fruit of paradise as an "apple," we need hardly say that there is nothing in Scripture to indicate what kind of tree was "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." But in the fabled "apples of discord," and in the golden apple which Paris gave to the goddess of love, thereby Kindling the Trojan war, it is possible that the primaeval tradition reappears of

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death to the world, and all our woe.

See Tree.

The Heb. for the "apple" of the eye is פִּסְפָּן (izqim), פָּסִפָּן, pupil, Deut. xxxii. 10; Prov. vii. 2), otherwise פָּסִפָּן (babach, hole, gate, Zach. ii. 12), or פָּסִפָּן (bath, daughter), i. e. by an idiomatic use, the pupil, Psal. xvii. 5.

The same figure occurs in the Apocalypse (euip, Eccl. viii. 92 [17]). It is curious to observe how common the image ("pupil of the eye") is in the languages of different nations. Gesenius (Theor. p. 86) quotes from the Arabic, the Syriac, the Ethiopic, the Coptic, the Persian, in all of which tongues an expression similar to the English "pupil of the eye" is found. See Eye.

APPLES OF SODOM is a phrase associated with the Dead Sea, as the name of a species of fruit extremely beautiful to the eye, but bitter to the taste and full of dust. Tacitus (Hist. v, 7) alludes to this singular fact, but in language so brief and ambiguous that no light can be derived from his description: "Black and empty, they vanish as it were in ashes." Josephus also, speaking of the conflagration of the plain, and the yet remaining tokens of the divine fire, remarks, "There are still to be seen ashes reproduced in the fruits, which indeed resemble edible fruits in color, but on being plucked with the hands are dissolved into smoke and ashes" (War, iv. 8, 4). The supposed fruit has furnished many moralists with allusions; and also Milton, in whose infernal regions

"A grove sprung up—laden with fair fruit—

Greenly they plucked

The fruits, all fair to sight, like that which grew Near that liminous lake where Sodom flamed.

This, more delusive, not the touch, but taste

Deserted. They, fondly thinking to elude

Their appetite with gusto, instead of fruit

Chewed bitter ashes, which the offended taste

With spattering noise rejected.

Some travellers, unable to discover this singular production, have considered it merely as a figure of speech, depicting the deceitful nature of all vicious enjoyments; but Kitt (Phys. Hist. of Palest. p. xxv. sq.) adds the definite testimony of many modern travellers to show that these allusions are based upon truth, especially the statements of Seetzen (in Zach's Monatl. CORPUS, xvi. 443) and Burckhardt (Syrac. p. 392), who accounts of the fruit of the Oshar (prob. Aecipis gigantea) remarkably coincide with the ancient descriptions. This plant is figured and described by Prosper Alpinus under the name Brux el-Usar (Hist. Nat. 3 Egypte, Lugd. Bat. 1735, pt. i. 48). See also Irby and Mangles (Travel. ch. viii). Has-sequist, however, finds the "apples of Sodom" in the Sodomum Sodomumum, which he identifies with the Sodoma melornanum, or mad-apple, growing in great abundance in the plain of the Jordan (Rose, c. 151). But Dr. Robinson thinks the other the most probable plant. His description of it is as follows: "We saw here [on the shore of the Dead Sea] several trees of the kind, the trunks of which were 6 or 8 inches in diameter, and the whole height from 10 to 15 feet. It has a grayish, cork-like bark, with long oval leaves, and in its general appearance and character it might be taken for a gigantic perennial species of the milk-weed or elicweed found in the northern parts of the American states. Its leaves and flowers are very similar to those of the latter plant, and when broken off it in like manner discharges copiously a milky fluid. The fruit greatly resembles externally a large smooth apple or orange, hanging in clusters of three or four together, and when ripe is of a yellow color. It was now fair and delicious to the eye, and soft to the touch; but on being pressed or struck it exploded with a puff, like a bladder or puff-ball, leaving in the hand only the shrivelled thin rind and a few fibres.

It is, indeed, filled chiefly with air like a bladder, which greatly increases the round form; and the centre of a small slender pod runs through it from the stem, and is connected by thin filaments with the rind. The pod contains a small quantity of fine silk with seeds, precisely like the pod of the silk-weed, though very much smaller, being indeed scarcely the tenth part as large. The Arabs collect the silk and twist it into matches for their guns, preferring it to the common match, because it requires no sulphur to render it combustible. In the accounts of Tacitus and Josephus, after a due allowance for the marvellous in all popular reports, I find nothing which does not apply almost literally to the fruit of the Osar, as we saw it. It must be pricked and handled with great care in order to preserve it from bursting. We attempted to carry some of the fruits and seeds with us to Jerusalem, but without success. Hasselquist's apples of Sodom (the fruit of the Solanum melongena) are much smaller than those of the Osar, and when ripe are full of small black grains. There is here, however, nothing like exploding, nothing like 'smoke and ashes,' except occasionally, as the same naturalist remarks, 'when the fruit is punctured by an insect (Tenthredo), which converts the whole of the inside into dust, leaving nothing but the rind entire, without any loss of color.' We see the Solanum and the Osar growing side by side; the former presenting nothing remarkable in its appearance, and being found in other parts of the country, while the latter immediately arrested our attention by its singular accordance with the ancient story, and is, moreover, peculiar in Palestine to the shores of the Dead Sea (Bib. Researches, ii. 236 sqq. comp. Wilson, Bible Lands, ii. 593). It should be observed that the Bible speaks only of the "vine of Sodom," and that metaphorically (Deut. xxxii. 82), as a synonym of a poisonous berry. See HEMLOCK.

Appleton, Jesse, D.D., president of Bowdoin College, was born at New Ipswich, Hampshire, Nov. 17, 1772, and was graduated at Dartmouth College in 1792. Having spent two years in teaching at Dover and Amherst, he studied theology under Dr. Lathrop, of West Springfield, and in February, 1797, was ordained pastor at Hampton, New Hampshire. His religious sentiments at this period were Arminian. By his faithful, affectionate service, he was very much endeared to his people. At his suggestion the Piscataqua Evangelical Magazine was published, to which he contributed valuable essays, with the signature of Leighton. In 1807 he was chosen president of Bowdoin College, in which office he served faithfully until his death, Nov. 12, 1819. He was sometimes anxious, in a high degree, in regard to the college; but in his sickness he said, in cheerful confidence, "God has taken care of the college, and God will take care of it." Among his last expressions were heard the words, "Glory to God in the highest! the whole earth shall be filled with his glory." In 1830 a volume of his addresses was published, with a sketch of his character, by Rev. Dr. Nichols, of Portland. In 1822 his lectures and occasional sermons were published, with a memoir, by Rev. B. Tappan. These and other writings are collected in "The Works of Jesse Appleton, D.D.," with memoir (Andover, 1836, 2 vols. 8vo).—Bibl. Repository, Jan. 1836, p. 19; Sprague, Annals, ii. 282.

Appleton, Nathaniel, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born at Ipswich, Mass., Dec. 9, 1685, graduated at Harvard in 1712, ordained at Cambridge in 1717, in which year he was also elected a fellow of Harvard, which 84 years afterward conferred upon him the second degree it had ever granted of Doctor of Divinity, Increase Mather, 80 years before, being the first so honored to that honor. He took a colleague in 1788, and died in 1784. He published a number of occasional sermons.—Sprague, Annals, i. 301.

Approbation of books, the act by which books were recommended or declared harmless by persons authorized to judge of them. The Council of Trent (sess. 4) forbids, on penalty of excommunication, the publication of books without the approbation of the bishop of the diocese. In England the right of approbation formerly belonged to those who were appointed to grant licenses and imprimitures. By an act of Charles II, long since expired, books were subjected to a licenser in England, and the practice itself ceased with the introduction of the principles of the Revolution of 1688. See INDEX.

Appropria, in the canon law, is the setting apart of an ecclesiastical benefice to the peculiar and permanent use of some religious body. Appropriations sprung originally from the monastic orders, who purchased all the advowsons within their reach, and then appropriated the larger proportion of the proceeds of such benefices to the use of their own corporations, which they intended were not only institutions for pious purposes, but religious bodies; leaving the small remainder for the support of the incumbent. The appropriations now annexed to bishoprics, prebends, etc., in England, had all of them the above origin, if traced to their source; and at one period similar appropriations were made to religious houses, nunneries, and certain military orders, which were regarded as spiritual corporations.—Blackstone, vol. i.

Aprica. See HOPHRA.

Apron stands in one passage of the Auth. Vers. for the Heb. עִפְרָון (chogarak, a girdle, as usually), the fig-leaf bands which our first parents made to hide their shame (Gen. iii, 7); also for the Greek ἄφραντος (Acts xix, 12), a term borrowed from the Lat. semicinctum, i.e. half-girdle or belt covering half the person, an article of apparel worn by artisans and servants. See ATTIRE; NAPKIN.

Apsa or Apsa (ἄφα, Lat. absis, prob. for ἄφας, a juncture orvaulted arch), is a term used by ecclesiastical writers to designate (1) that part of the interior of ancient churches where the bishop and clergy had their seats. The form of the apse was hemispherical, and it consisted of two parts: one, the choir or presbytery; the other, the sanctuary. The choir always terminated toward the east in a semicircle, round which were the seats of the clergy, having in the middle the throne of the bishop or superior, which was raised above the others. The term came into Church with Apsa at Deliorty.
use in the 8th century to denote the deepest recess behind the altar in the Eastern Churches. (2.) It was also commonly used for the bishop's throne, called \textit{apex prostration}, being raised by means of steps. (3.) The name Aquila denotes the chief ministers in which the relics of saints were kept, which was round or arched at the top, and commonly placed on the altar: it was usually of wood, sometimes also of gold and silver, and occasionally beautifully sculptured. (4.) In later church architecture, it is used to denote any semicircular or polygonal termination of the choir, or other part.

Aptophr, East, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was born at Boston in 1738, died in England April 16, 1816. Having been educated at Cambridge, he was settled as missionary at Cambridge, Mass., in 1761. Four years after he returned to England, and was appointed to the vicarage of Cyndon, afterward receiving high dignities in the Church, and even an offer of the bishopric of Killare. About 1793 he retired to Cambridge, where he spent the remaining years of his life. Dr. Aputhor published a Letter on the Prevalence of Christianity before its civil Establishment, with Observations on a Late History of the Decline of the Christian Empire (London, 1778); Discourses on Prophecy (2 vols. 1786); and several writings, chiefly sermons, which show him to have been a man of vigorous intellect and sound scholarship.—Sprague, Annals, v., 174; Gentleman's Magazine, 1816.

Aquila, a sect of the third century, so called because they refused to offer any thing but water at the Eucharist, and pretended to consecrate with water only. Also in Africa the name is given by some who, during times of persecution, forfioore to use wine at the Eucharist in the morning, lest the smell should discover them. Epiphanius calls them \textit{Eucratites}, and Theodoret (De fab. her. i, 20) Tatianites.—Epiphanius,

Aquila, Claudius, the fourth general of the Jews, was born Sept. 14, 1548, joined the Jews in 1568, and was elected in 1581, as their leader. His ordiner considerably gained, under his administration, in influence and extension. He wrote \textit{Epitola XVI}, and \textit{Industria ad cunado amice moribus} (Ven. 1606). He also composed the popular work of society, and the \textit{diratorium studiorum} and the \textit{directorium exercitiorum St. Ignatius}, which have ever since been regarded as standard works of the order. He died Jan. 31, 1615. See JARUR.

Aquila (\textit{Aelis}), for Lat. \textit{aquilla}, an eagle, see Simon. \textit{Onomast. O. T.} p. 588 sqq., a Jew with whom Paul met on his first visit to Corinth: a native of Pontus, and by occupation a tent-maker (Acts xviii).

Wolf, Carp, on Acts xvii, 2, shows the name not to have any Hebrew origin, and to have been adopted as a Latin name, like Paulus by Saul. He is there described as a Pontian by birth (\textit{Ponticus, vulg. \textit{vulgi}}), from the connection of which description with the fact that we find more than one Pontia Aquila in the Pontian gens at Rome in the days of the Republic (see Cic. ad Fam. x, 33), designates that it has been imagined that he may have been a freedman of a Pontius Aquila, and that his being by Pontian by birth may have been merely an inference from his name. But besides that this is a point on which Luke could hardly be ig-lorant, Aquila, the translator of the O. T. into Greek, was a Roman citizen by birth (Acts xvi, 3). After the death of Paul he found Aquila at Corinth, he fled with his wife Priscilla, from Rome, in consequence of an order of Claudius commanding all Jews to leave Rome (Suet. Claud. 25—\textit{"Judaeos impellere Christo adsumere tumultuosae Roma expulit"; see CLAUDIUS). He became acquainted with Paul, and they abode together, and wrote at their common trade of making the

Cilician tent or hair-cloth. See Paul. This decree was made, not by the senate, but the emperor (A.D. 50 or 61), and lasted only during his life, if even so long. Comp. Neander, \textit{Planting and Training}, I, 281; Lardner, \textit{Testimonies of Heathen Authors}, ch. viii.

Whether Aquila and Priscilla were at that time converted to the Christian faith cannot be determined; Luke's expression, \textit{"came unto them"} (\textit{κονομικός αὐτοῖς}), Acts xviii, 2, rather implies that

Paul sought their society on grounds of friendship than for the purpose of persuading them to embrace Christianity. On the other hand, if we suppose that they were already Christians, it is probable that Paul's "joining himself to them" is highly probable; while, if they were still adherents to Judaism, they would have been less disposed than even unconverted Gentiles to form an intimacy with the apostle. But if Aquila had been converted before his first meeting with Paul, the word \textit{αὐτοῖς}, "disciple," would have hardly been omitted.

At all events, they had embraced Christianity before

a year and six months after, Priscilla and Aquila accompanied him to Ephesus on his way to Syria. Thre they remained; and when Apollo came to Ephesus, he \textit{knew only the baptism of John," they instructed and baptized of God many persons, who were Acts xvi, 25, 26). From that time they appear to have become zealous promoters of the Christian cause in that city (1 Cor. xvi, 19). Paul styles them his "helpers in Christ Jesus," and intimates that they had exposed themselves to imminent danger on his account (\textit{who have for my name shed their own blood," Rom.

xvi, 3, 4), though of the time and place of this transaction we have no information. At the time of writing 1 Cor., Aquila and his wife were still in Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi, 19); but in Rom. xvi, 8 sqq., we find them again at Rome, and their house a place of assembly for the brethren after the two years that have since to have returned to Ephesus, for Paul sends salutations to them during his second imprisonment at Rome (2 Tim. iv, 19), as being with Timothy. Their occupation as tent-makers probably rendered it necessary for them to keep a number of workmen constantly resident in their family, and to these (to such of them, at least, as had embraced the Christian faith) may refer the remarkable expression, \textit{"the church that is in their house," τὴν εκκλησίαν αὐτῶν εἰςκήςασιν} (see Biscoc, quoted in Lardner's \textit{Credibility}, ii, 11). Origen's explanation of these words is very similar (In \textit{Ep. ad Rom. Comment. x} ; \textit{Opera}, vili, 405, Berol. 1897).

Neander supposed that, as Aquila was a man of a tensive premises for his manufacture, he perhaps set apart one room for the use of a section of the Church in whatever place he fixed his residence, and that, as his superior Christian knowledge and piety qualified him for the office of a "teacher" (\textit{didaskale}, he gave religious instruction to this small assembly. The salutations to individuals which follow the expression in Rom. xvi, 6, show that they were not referred to in it, and are quite inconsistent with the supposition that the whole Church met in Aquila's house. Nor is it probable that the collective body of Christians in Rome or Corinth would have altered the place of assembly Aquila's return (see Neander, \textit{Gesch. der \textit{Rel.

u. Kirche}}, I, ii, 402, 568; comp. Justini Martyr \textit{Opera}, Append. ii, p. 586, Par. 1742). Tradition reports that he and his wife were beheaded.

The Greek Church call Aquila bishop and apostle, and honor him on July 12 (\textit{Martyr. Gr.}, ii, 185). The festival of Aquila is held on the 12th of July. Aquila has been called martyr, where he is denoted bishop of Heraclea, on July 8 (\textit{Martyr. Roman.}). See

PRISCILLA.

Aquila, author of a Greek version of the O. T., was originally a heathen, born at Sipone, a city of Pontus. Having seen the professors of the Christian religion work many miracles, he became a convert to it, probably on the same ground with Simon Magus.

Aquila, or Adler, Caspar, one of the Reformers, was born at Augsburg, Aug. 7, 1488. After the ordinary training of the gymnasium of his native city, he spent his early manhood in travel and study, chiefly in Paris, where he became a student of law. After a time he became pastor at Berne, and in 1514 in Leipzic, in 1515 he became chaplain to Franz von Sickingen. In 1516 he became pastor at Jena, near Augsburg, and soon after married, and openly professed Lutheranism. Arrested by order of the bishop of Augsburg (Stadion), he was condemned to death, but during his imprisonment (at Delfingen, 1519-20) the queen of Hungary interceded for him, and he was released, but banished. He went at once to Wittenberg, and became A.M. of the University in 1521. For two years he was tutor to Sickingen's children. In 1524 he became tutor in Hebrew at Wittenberg, and was employed in translating the Bible. In 1527 he became pastor at Saalfeld. In 1547 he wrote violently against the Interim (q. v.), and a price was set upon his head by Charles V. He died Nov. 12, 1560. His life was written by Avenarius, Lesebuch. Aquila's (Meiningen, 1719, 8vo); Schlott, Leben Aquilas' (Leipzic, 1773, 4to); and by Gesell, Vita Aquilae (Jena, 1816), who enumerates twenty writings of his—Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, s. v.; Hoefer, New Biog. Aquiléia, a town in Italy 15 miles northeast of Venice, formerly so important in ecclesiastical matters as to be called a second Rome. (I.) The bishops of Aquileia assumed the patriarchal dignity from the 5th century, and the title was granted by Pope Honorius I simply to save the appearance of supremacy. Severus, patriarch of Aquileia in the time of Pope Gregory II, renounced the schism; upon which that pope, while he refused to give him the title of patriarch, permitted him (A.D. 729) to act as metropolitan over the empire of the Lombards; but the patriarchs of Aquileia continued to hold that title, which was soon recognized by the court of Rome. The patriarchs of Aquileia had metropolitan authority over the states of Venice, Istria, and the neighboring provinces; and their diocese was of large extent, including besides a great part of Friuli, Carniola, Gorizia, and part of Carinthia and Styria. As a great part of the diocese was in the states of Austria, the queen of Hungary claimed the right of nominating alternately with Venice; and such disputes arose from the circumstance that in 1753 the patriarchate was suppressed, and the two archbishoprics of Udine and Gorizia erected in its stead. The church, which was the cathedral, is dedicated in the name of the Assumption. See De Rubia, Mommsen, Echternach (1740) for a complete history of the claims of the Greek Church; but he was taken ill and died on the way, near Terracina, March 7, 1724. He was canonized in 1828 by John XXIII, and the rank of fifth Doctor of the church was assigned to him. His writings at once assumed, and have contined to maintain, an immense authority; the popes have repeatedly declared his works to be perfect, without any error (Landon, Ecl. Dict. i, 475).

Of his theological writings, the most famous is his "Summa Theologica" (best ed. Antwerp, 1673, 1 vol.), which is still a favorite authority in the Catholic Church. The "Summa Theologica" is one of the grandest attempts at a complete science of theology ever planned by a human intellect; and, as such, it deserves here a brief analysis, which we give from Hardwick ("CH. Hist. of the Middle Age, 1855, iv, 80"). The "Summa" is divided into three great parts: (1) the Metaphysics, (2) the Moral, (3) the Sacramental. In the first of these the writer ascertains the nature and the limits of theology, which he esteems a proper science, based upon a supernatural revelation, the contents of which, though far transcending all the powers of human thought, are, when communicated, subjects for devout inquiry, and admit of argumentative defence. Accordingly, the writer next discusses the existence and the attributes of God, endeavoring to elucidate the nature of his will, his providence, the ground of his predestination, and the constitution of the blessed Trinity in unity—a doctrine which, although he deems it incapable of a priori demonstration, finds a counterpart in man. Descending from the cause to the effects, he analyzes the constituent parts of the creation, angels, the material world, and men, enlarging more especially upon the functions of the human soul, its close relation to the body, and the state of both before the fall. The second part is subdivided into the "Prima Secunda" and the "Secunda Secunda." The former carries on the general subject, viewing men no longer from the heavenly, but the earthly side, as moral and responsible agents gifted with a vast complexity of passions, sentiments, and faculties. The way in which these particular topics are treated, resting by themselves, is first considered, and the author then proceeds to show how they are modified by supernatural agencies or coextant gifts of grace. This leads him to compare the state or position of mankind in reference to the systems (or economies) in grace and nature, and, as the immediate consequence, to treat of our original righteousness, free-will, original sin, justification, and the original rules of life. In the Secunda Secunde, the several virtues are discussed in turn, as they exist under the operation of divine grace, or that of nature only. They are seven in number. Three of them are "theological," or supernatural: God, glory, and love—while the remainder are the four cardinal virtues of justice, prudence, fortitude, and temperance, and are "ethical," or purely human. The discussion of these virtues forms an admirable work on Christian morals. The third part of the Summa is devoted to an exposition of the mysteries of the Incarnation, and the efficacy of the sacraments—a class of topics which, according to the principles of all the medieval writers, are essentially spiritual. Aquinas traces every supernatural influence to the Person of the Word made flesh, who, by the union of our nature with the Godhead, has become the Reconstructor of humanity and the Divinitator. This is the aliment by which it is sustained, descends to man through certain outward media, or the sacramental ordinances of the church; their number being seven, viz., Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penitence, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. In the last, he deals with the known and the unknown, with the plausibility of expiation, under the representations of it contained in the doctrines and ritual of the Church of Rome, and in which the Aristotelian philosophy is made to justify all the traditional teachings of that church, we find the grounds of the mighty influence of Aquinas in a great age. In all the certain doctrines which afterward threatened to obtain complete ascendancy in all the Western churches, But with all the learning, the piety, and the dialectic skill of Aquinas, he did not avoid the puerilities of the so-called scholastic spirit. Some of the questions treated in the Summa are trivial, others scandalous; e.g. Quare Christus non assumptus femineum sexum, and others even worse.

The following summary of the doctrines of Aquinas is chiefly condensed from Neander, History of Dogmas, vol. ii. (1) As to the necessity of revelation, Aquinas inferred it from the super-terrestrial destiny of man, which goes beyond the limits of human reason. He has developed the doctrine of natural law, philosophical and theological truth; the truths of natural reason cannot be at variance with those given by revelation, since God is also the author of reason. What opposes reason cannot proceed from God. If we admit such a contradiction, it would follow that something false might be the object of faith, which would be an absurdity. In his inquiries respecting the relation of faith to knowledge, he says: A faith of authority resting on human opinion is the weakest of all things; but it is otherwise with divine revelation. Yet theology makes use of human reason, not, indeed, to prove the truths of revelation, but to deduce other truths from it. As proper sciences obtain their data from other sources, and then draw inferences from them, so theology proceeds from those which are made known by a higher light. But since grace does not nullify nature, but perfects it, and as the natural inclinations of the will serve the divine principle of the Christian life, so also will reason serve the truths of faith. (2) As to the knowledge of God, he asserts that it is, in a certain confused manner, implanted in all men (sub quodam confusione est nobis naturaliter inerunt). Since man is so created that he finds in God his highest good, so, in striving after happiness, striving after God is at the same time the foundation of the operation, resting by themselves, first considered, and the author then proceeds to show how they are modified by supernatural agencies or coextant gifts of grace. This leads him to compare the state or position of mankind in reference to the systems (or economies) in grace and nature, and, as the immediate consequence, to treat of our original righteousness, free-will, original sin, justification, and the original rules of life. In the Secunda Secunde, the several virtues are discussed in turn, as they exist under the operation of divine grace, or that of nature only. They are seven in number. Three of them are "theological," or supernatural: God, glory, and love—while the remainder are the four cardinal virtues of justice, prudence, fortitude, and temperance, and are "ethical," or purely human. The discussion of these virtues forms an admirable work on Christian morals. The third part of the Summa is devoted to an exposition of the mysteries of the Incarnation, and the efficacy of the sacraments—a class of topics which, according to the principles of all the medieval writers, are essentially spiritual. Aquinas traces every supernatural influence to the Person of the Word made flesh, who, by the union of our nature with the Godhead, has become the Reconstructor of humanity and the Divinitator. This is the aliment by which it is sustained, descends to man through certain outward media, or the sacramental ordinances of the church; their number being seven, viz., Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penitence, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. In the last, he deals with the known and the unknown, with the plausibility of expiation, under the representations of it contained in the doctrines and ritual of the Church of Rome, and in which the Aristotelian philosophy is made to justify all the traditional teachings of that church, we find the grounds of the mighty influence of Aquinas in a great age. In all the certain doctrines which afterward threatened to obtain complete ascendancy in all the Western churches, another method of redemption was possible, but none so suitable as this. The union of God with man must give man the strongest assurance of attaining the highest happiness, which consists in an immediate union with God. But, since redemption has been effected, men have acquired a new consciousness of the dignity of their nature. In these ends Aquinas found the importance of the work of redemption. As he here joins his own ideas with those of Anselm, he agrees also with him in the opinion that the satisfaction rendered by Christ furnished that which was requisite from its intrinsic worth. Like Anselm, he proceeds on the principle that for an injury something must be given which the injured party would value as high as, or higher than what had been lost by the injury. Christ's satisfaction is not only sufficient, but superabundant. Aquinas was perhaps the first to raise the question "afterward so earnestly discussed in the Calvinistic and Arminian controversies of the 17th century—the question, namely, whether Christ did not earn for the believer a title to eternal life, as of freedom from condemnation to eternal death. Aquinas answers this question in the affirmative, and makes the technical distinction between 'active' and 'passive' righteousness (Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 310). If we find elsewhere the various instrumentalities of grace scattered, such as the offices of Law-giver, Priest, and King, all these are united in Christ, the fountain of all grace. He is the Mediator between God and man, as far as he communicates what is divine to them, instead of for them, and makes satisfaction for their sins. Christ is the mystical head of the members which belong to him, inasmuch as what he has done is for their benefit (unio mystica). (5) As to justification, the Schoolmen, after Augustine, conceived of it not as objective, but as a subjective sanctification, of which faith is the instrument, and which is realized in love. Aquinas thought the infans gratia justificandi (infusion of justifying grace) necessary for the forgiveness of sins on the part of God, and allowed successive steps in justification: first of all the communication of grace—then the tendency of the free will to God—then by which it departs from sin, and upon this there are differences. He thought it to a certain extent, justification with sanctification, as all the later Romanists do. In the act of faith is contained the admission that man is made righteous by the redemption of Christ. As to the relation of faith to justification, he admitted it, but vitiated it by adopting the scholastic distinction between condition and consequence, or merit from desert and merit from fitness. This distinction is thus defined by Aquinas, with his usual acuteness and clearness: "A meritorious work of man may be considered in two aspects: first, as proceeding from the free will of man, and, secondly, as proceeding from the grace of the Holy Spirit. If it be considered from the first point of view, there can be no merit of condescension or absolute desert, because of the inequality between man and God, whereby it is impossible for the creature to bring the Creator under absolute obligation. But if it be considered from the second point of view as proceeding from the influence of the Holy Spirit, the work of sanctification, or the merit of condescension, may be considered as a thing excellent in itself" (Shedd, History of Doctrines, ii, 330). (6) As to the sacraments, he taught that they are the necessary media of the application of Christ's merits to men. He endeavored to secure the necessity of seven sacraments on the principle that the whole life should be consecrated to God's grace; its gradual development from birth to death was surrounded by the sacraments. (i) The birth of the spiritual life takes place in baptism; (ii) the growth to maturity is through confirmation; (iii) the nourishment of the spiritual life is through the Lord's Supper. If the body and spiritually soul are united, the need of nourishment is not need of nourishment for the healing of his sickly state he requires (iv) penance; (v) the promotion of his recovery by certain means is signified by extreme unction. (7) As to the future state of man, he goes into details on the resurrection body. According to quest. 81 (Summa, pt. iii), those who are raised from the dead will have their "juvenialis, qua inter decrementum et incrementum". The difference of sexes will continue to exist, but without sensual appetites. All the organs of sense will still be active, with the exception of the sense of taste. It is however possible that even the latter may be rendered more perfect, and fitted to adequate functions and enjoyments. Hair and nails are one of the ornaments of man, and are therefore quite as necessary as blood and other fluids. The resurrection bodies will be exceedingly fine, and be delivered from the heavy weight which is now to burdensome to them; nevertheless they will be tangible, as the body of Christ was. Aquinas agrees, however, that this is true only in reference to the bodies of the blessed. The bodies of the damned are ugly and deformed; they are incorruptible, but capable of suffering, which is not the case with the bodies of the saints" (Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 204). The Pagan Doctrine of the Immanence in Aquinas. He rendered real service to the Aristotelian philosophy by the pains he took to effect a translation of the works in which it was contained, and by his commentaries on them. He was a Realist, inasmuch as he maintained that the ideas of things after the pattern of which the world was made pre-existent eternal in the Divine mind (although not independent of God), and regarded them as the proper objects of knowledge, and as the forms which determine the nature and properties of all things. This system he endeavored to place on a firmer basis by extending the theory of thought propounded by Aristotle, to which he superadded some ideas of the system of Plato and of the Alexandrians. With this is connected his explanation of the conceptions of matter and form, as elements of compound substances, as also his explanation of the principle of individuation. The rational soul, the nature of which he discusses after Aristotle's system, he regards as efficient and indestructible. The aim of Aquinas, as a Christian philosopher, was to prove the rationality of Christianity, which he attempted to accomplish by showing, 1st, that it contains a portion of truth; 2d, that it falls under the cognizance of reason; and, 3d, that it contains nothing contrary to reason. In connection with the latter argument he starts from the assumption that the truths of reason are essentially one with Divine truth, because reason is derived from God. Philosophy consists, according to him, in science searching for truth with the instrument of human reason; but he maintains that it was necessary for the science of man that mere opinion should not disclose to him certain things transcending the grasp of human reason. He regarded theology, therefore, as the offspring of the union of philosophy and religion (Tennemann, Hist. of Philosophy). The Dominican monks, especially, naturally proud of their scions, expounded Thomism, as the doctrines of Aquinas have been named. The Franciscans, on the other hand, have always opposed Thomism; one of their greatest doctors, Bias Ventura (q. v., doctor seraphicus, 1274), opposed Aquinas on mystical grounds, and Duns Scotus (q. v., doctor seraphicus, 1277) seven sacraments, who were enrolled in solid body against it. Their Thomists were Aristotelians, generally Realists; followed Augustinists as to sin, grace, etc.; opposed the immanuacktes conception, and that the sacraments convey grace physically. The Scotists were Nominalists, were opposed to Augustine's doctrines of grace and predestination, maintained the immaculate conception, and held that the sacraments produce grace as moral causes, not as physical. The Jesuits held the contrary view, and were not naturally inclined to favor the doctrines of the Scotists, but the praxis of Aquinas was so great that the Thomists, to a great extent, ruled the theology of the church up to the time of the controversy between the Molinists (q. v.) and the Jansenists, when the views of the Scotists substantially prevailed.

The chief writings of St. Thomas fill twenty-three folio volumes. The following is the list of them, as given by Cave: 1. Expositio in Aristotelis libros, etc. (Venice, 1496) — 2. Comment. in 4 lib. ARABA

ARABA (Aravah, prob. for Arabah), a city mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) as lying near Diosarea (now Safuriah), apparently the same mentioned by Josephus (Life, 51, where the text now has του τῶν ἄραβων, τοῦ ἀραβαίου γειτονίου, τής ἀραβαίας χώρας, τῆς ἀραβαίας περιοχῆς, τῆς ἀραβαίας πόλεως) 10 stadia from Sagone; now the village Arrabah, about 4 hours north of Nazareth (Schultze, in Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 768), containing Jewish graves, with other remains of antiquity (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 287).

Arrabah (Heb. Arrabah, מַרְבָּא, desert; Sept. ἄραβα, also ἄραβος, ἀραβός, and ἄραβη, but in Josh. iv, 49; 19: 1, 26: 9, 192), the phenomenon usually translated "plain," the name of a region or tract and of a town.

1. This word, with the article (הַהַרְבָּא, the Arabah), is applied directly (Deut. i, 1; ii, 8; iii, 13; iv, 49; Josh. iii, 16; xii, 3; 2 Kings xiv, 25; Am. vi, 14) as the proper name of the great valley in its whole extent lying between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah. Indeed it may be said to reach, with a partial interruption, or rather contraction, from Danises, at the beginning of the Jordan, to the Gulf of Akabah, which is nowhere less than 10 miles. It thus includes toward the north the lake of Tiberias; and the Arabah (plain) of Jericho and Moab form part of it.

The surface of the Arabah proper is said to be almost uninterrupted a desert. The northern continuation is watered by the Jordan, which, during the rains, fills it to the level of Tiberias, and is at length lost in the bitter waters of the Dead Sea; this latter occupying the middle point of the great valley nearly equidistant from its two extremities. The Scriptures distinctly connect the Arabah with the Red Sea and Elath; the Dead Sea itself is called the sea of the Arabah. In the Authorized Version it is rendered "plain." The Greek name of this tract was ἀραβά, Aulon, described by Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.) as extending from Lebanon to the desert of Paran. Abulfeda speaks of it under the name el-Ghor, and says correctly that it stretches between the lake of Tiberias and Allah or Akabah (Tab. Syr. p. 8, 9). At the present day the name el-Ghor is applied to the northern part, from the lake of Tiberias to an offset or line of cliffs just south of the Dead Sea; while the southern part, quite to the Red Sea, is called Wady el-Arabah, the ancient Hebrew name. The extension of this valley to the Dead Sea appears to have been given from the geographic views of modern times was first discovered by Burckhard (Travel in Syria, p. 441; Robinson's Palæst. ii, 594-600). The importance of this great mediastinal valley to the topography and natural features of Palestine (s. v.), as well as in the history of the Exode (s. v.), requires a full discussion of its peculiar designation and characteristics. See TOPOGRAPHICAL TERMS.

I. Name.—1. If the derivation of Gesenius (Thes. p. 1066) is to be accepted, the fundamental meaning of the term is "arid" or "waste," and hence "sterile," and in accordance with this idea it is employed in various places of Scripture to designate a barren, uninhabitable district, "a desolation, a dry land, and a desert," a land wherein man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby" (Jer. ii, 48; see a striking remark in Martinu, p. 396; and, among other passages, Job xxiv, 5; xxxix, 6; Is. xxvi, 9; xxxix, 1; xxxix, 21). See DESERT.

2. But within this general signification it is plain, from even a casual examination of the topographical records in the earlier books of the Bible, that the word has a also more special and local force. In these cases it is found with the definite article (הַהַרְבָּא, the Arabah), "the Arabah," and is also so mentioned as clearly to refer to some spot or district familiar to the then inhabitants of Palestine. This district, although nowhere expressly so defined in the Bible, and although the peculiar force of the word "Arabah" appears to have been disregarded by even the earliest commentators and interpreters of the Sacred Books, has within our own times been identified with the deep-sunken valley or trench which forms the most striking feature, in many an extraordinary manner, of Palestine, and which extends with great uniformity of formation from the slopes of Hermon to the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea; the most remarkable depression known to exist on the surface of the globe (Humboldt, Cosmos, i, 360, ed. Bohn; also p. 301). Through the north end of which of this extraordinary fissure the Jordan rushes through the lakes of Huleh and Genesareth down its tortuous course to the deep chasm of the Dead Sea. This portion, about 150 miles in length, is known among the Arabs by the name of el-Ghor (the depression), an appellation which it has borne from the days of Abraham. The southern boundary of the Ghor has been fixed by Robinson to be the wall of cliffs which crosses the valley about 10 miles south of the Dead Sea. Down to the foot of these cliffs the Ghor extends; from their summits, southward to the gulf of Akabah, the valley changes its name, or, it would be more accurate to say, retains its name among the Arabs.

Looking to the indications of the Sacred Text, there can be no doubt that in the times of the conquest and the monarchy the name "Arabah" was applied to the valley in the entire length of both its southern and northern portions. Thus in Deut. i, 1, probably, and certainly in Deut. xii, 1, 3, 26, both the Dead Sea and the sea of Cinnereth (Genesareth) are named in close connection with the Arabah. The allusions in Deut. xi, 30; Josh. viii, 14; xii, 18, 2 Sam. ii, 29; iv, 7; 2 Kings xxv, 4; Jer. xxxix, 4; lii, 7, become at once intelligible when the meaning of the Arabah is known, however puzzling they may have been to former commentators. In Josh. xi, 16, and xii, 8, the Arabah takes its place with "the mountain," "the lowland" plains of Philistia and Edomelae, "the south" and "the valley" of Cisle-Syria, as one of the great natural divisions of the conquered country. See PLAIN.

3. But farther, the word is found in the plural and without the article (הַהַרְבָּא, the Arabah), always in connection with the name Joab or Moab, doubtless denoting the portion of the Arabah near Jericho; in the former case on the west, and in the latter on the east side of the Jordan; the Arabah-Moab being always distinguished from the Sadeh-Moab — the bare and burnt-up soil of the sunken valley from the cultivated pasture or corn-fields of the downs on the upper level — with all the precision which would naturally follow from the essential difference of the two spots. (See Num. xxi, 1; xxvi, 3, 63; xxxi, 12; xxxii, 45-50; xxxv, 1; xxvi, 13; Deut. xxiv, 1; 8; Josh. iv, 13; v, 10; xii, 32; 2 Sam. xviii, 28; xvii, 16; 2 Kings xxv, 5; Jer. xxxix, 5; lii, 8.) See JORDAN II. See also MACCABEES, for a map of the region, see EXODE.

II. Description.—The direction of the Ghor is nearly due north and south. The Arabah, however, slightly changes its course about X.N.E. and S.S.W. (Robinson, ii, 240). But its plains present the striking contrast of its course, and the general character of the region is not dissimilar to that of the Ghör (Irbey, p. 184) except that the soil is more sandy, and that, from the absence of the central river and the absolutely desert character of the highland on its western side (closed by the uplands now being the desert in summer, and nothing but raging torrent in winter), there are very few of these lines and "circles" of verdure which form so great a relief to the torrid climate of the Ghör. The whole length of the Arabah proper, from the cliffs south of the Dead Sea to the mountains south of the wady, is probably more than 100 or more than 100 miles (Kiespert's Map). In breadth it varies. North of Petra—that is, about 60 miles from the gulf of Akabah—it is at its widest, being perhaps from 10 to 12 miles across; but it contracts gradually to the south till at the gulf the opening to the sea is but 4, or, according to some travellers, 3 miles wide (Robinson, i, 340; Martineau, p. 392).

The mountains which form the walls of this vast valley or trench are the legitimate successors of those which shut in the Ghör, only in every way grader and more desert-like. On the west are the long horizontal lines of the limestone ranges of the Tih, "always faithful to their tabular outline and blanched details," (Stanley, p. 77) and mounting up from the valley by huge steps with level barrens on the tops of each (Robinson, ii, 508), and crowned by the vast plateau of the "Wilderness of the Wanderings." This western wall ranges in height from 5000 to 1000 feet above the floor of the Arabah (Robinson, i, 240), and through it break the wadys and passes from the desert above—unimportant toward the south, but farther north larger and of a more permanent character. The chief of these wadys is the W. el-Jerashem, which emerges about sixty miles from Akabah, and leads its waters, when any are flowing, into the W. el-Jeih (Robinson, ii, 500, 506), and through it to the marshy ground under the cliffs south of the Dead Sea. Two principal passes occur in this range. First, the very steep and difficult ascent close to the Arabah, by which the road of the Mecca pilgrims between the Arabah and Suez mounts from the valley to the level of the plateau of the Tih. It is a very narrow passage, but known as "Nor" or "the Pass" (Robinson, i, 257). The second—is-Sofah—has a more direct connection with the Bible history, being probably that at which the Israelites were repulsed by the Canaanites (Deut. i, 44; Num. xiv, 48-49). It is on the road from Petra to Hebron, above Ain el-Welbeh, and is not, like the former, from the Arabah to the plateau, but from the plateau itself to a higher level 1000 feet above it. See the descriptions of Robinson (ii, 587), Lindsay (ii, 46), Stanley (p. 113).

The eastern wall is formed by the granite and basaltic (Schubert, in Kitter, Erdk. xiv, 1013) mountains of Edom, which are in this respect a contrast to the range opposite to them. At the foot of these are low hills of limestone and argillaceous rock like promontories jutting into the sea, in some places thickly strewed with blocks of phophyry; then the lofty masses of dark phophyry constituting the body of the mountain; above these sandstone broken into irregular ridges and great steps from the sea, and farther and higher than all long elevated ridges of limestone without precipices (Robinson, ii, 505, 551; Laborde, p. 209, 210, 262; Lindsay, ii, 43), rising to a height of 2000 to 2900 feet, and in Mount Hor reaching an elevation of not less than 5000 feet (Kitter, Erdk. xiv, 1389, 1140). On the east, according to the range of the Arabah, these mountains are covered with vegetation, in many parts extensively cultivated and yielding good crops; abounding in the fatness of the earth and the "plenty of corn and wine" which were promised to the forefather of the Edomite as a compensation for the loss of his birthright (Robinson, ii, 552; Laborde, p. 205, 290). In these ranges there is the striking alternation, from which again rise the mountains—or rather the downs (Stanley, p. 87)—of es-Sherah. Though this district is now deserted, yet the ruins of towns and villages with which it abounds show that at one time it must have been densely inhabited (Burckhardt, p. 486, 1496). The long wadys whose wings give access to the interior of these mountains are in strong contrast with those on the west, partaking of the fertile character of the mountains from which they descend. In almost all cases they contain streams which, although in the heat of summer small, and lost to the sight of man, are within a few feet of their banks. The Arabah "in a few paces" after they forsake the shade of their native ravines (Laborde, p. 141), are yet sufficient to keep alive a certain amount of vegetation, rushes, tamarisks, palms, and even oleanthers, lilies, and anemones, while they form the resort of the numerous tribes of the children of Esau, who still "swall (Stanley, p. 87; Laborde, p. 141; Martineau, p. 286) in Mount Seir, which is Edom" (Gen. xxxvi, 8). The most important of these wadys are the W. Ithm and the W. Abû Kasheishab. The former enters the mountains close above Arabah, and leads by the back of the range to Petra, and thence by Shobek and Tufs to the western end of the Dead Sea. At this point of a Roman road exist along this route (Laborde, p. 203; Robinson, ii, 161); by it Laborde returned from Petra, and there can be little doubt that it was the route by which the Israelites took their leave of the Arabah when they went to "compass the land of Edom" (Num. xxxiv. 4). The second, the W. Abû Kasheishab, is the most direct access from the Arabah to Petra, and is that up which Laborde and Stanley appear to have gone to the city. Besides these are Wady Tu'al, in which the traveller from the south gains his first glimpse of the red sandstone of Edom, and W. Ghrundel, not to be confounded with those of the same name north of Petra and west of Sinai.

To Dr. Robinson is due the credit of having first ascertained the spot which forms at once the southern limit of the Ghör and the northern limit of the Arabah. This boundary is the line of chalk cliffs which sweep across the valley at about six miles below the south-west corner of the Dead Sea. They are from 50 to 150 feet above sea-level, and form a continuous ground at their feet, and level with their tops the Arabah begins (Robinson, ii, 494, 448, 501). Thus the cliffs act as a retaining wall or buttress supporting the higher level of the Arabah, and the whole forms what in geological language might be called a "fault" in the floor of the great valley. Through this wall breaks in the embouchure of the great main drain of the Arabah—the Wady el-Jeih—in itself a very large and deep water-course, which collects and transmits to their outlet at this point the torrents which the numerous wadys from both sides of the Arabah pour along it in the rainy seasons, when the cataracts of the wadys are burst, and higher than all long elevated ridges of limestone without precipices (Robinson, ii, 505, 551; Laborde, p. 209, 210, 262; Lindsay, ii, 43), rising to a height of 2900 feet, and in Mount Hor reaching an elevation of not less than 5000 feet (Kitter, Erdk. xiv, 1389, 1140). The farthest point south to which the range of the Arabah is known to reach is the southern Wady Ghrundel (Robinson, ii, 508), which descends from the eastern mountains about 40 miles from Akabah and 60 from the cliffs just spoken of. The Wady el-Jeih also forms the most direct road for penetrating into the valley of the Arabah, which, when the wady was in full spate, was 100 feet in depth, Dr. Robinson (ii, 498) notes that the sides are "of chalky earth or marl," but beyond this there is no information. The surface is dry and desolate in the extreme. According to Dr. Robinson
ARABATENE 334 ARABIA

(II, 529). "A lone shrub of the gbdhah is almost the only trace of vegetation here." This was the ascent which from the Wady el-Seib to the floor of the great valley itself. Farther south, near Ain el-Weibeh, it is a rolling gravelly desert, with round naked hills of considerable elevation (III, 580). At Wady Ghurandel it is "an expanse of shifting sands, broken by innumerable undulations and low hills" (Burckhardt, p. 442), and "counterbalanced by ravines and water-courses" (ibid., p. 47). Hence the southern portion has a considerable general slope from east to west quite apart from the undulations of the surface (Stanley, p. 85), a slope which extends as far north as Petra (Ritter, xiv, 1007). Nor is the heat less terrible than the desolation, and travellers, almost without exception, bear testimony to the difficulties of journeying in a region where the evisco appears to blow almost without intermission (Ritter, xiv, 1016; Burckh. p. 444; Martineau, p. 894; Robinson, ii, 505). However, in spite of this heat and desolation, there is a certain amount of vegetation, even in the open Arabah, in the driest parts of the year. Schulten in March found the Aria (Calligonum com.), the Anthia varigata, and the Coelocunta (Ritter, xiv, 1014), also ramarz-bushes (tarjmu) lying thick in a torrent bed (p. 1016); and on Stanley's road "the shrubs at times had almost the appearance of a jungle," though it is true that they were so thin as to disappear when the "waste of sand" was overlooked, and even veiled (p. 85; and see Robinson, i, 240, 268). See ARABIA.

It is not surprising that after the discovery by Burckhardt in 1812 of the prolongation of the Jordan valley in the Arabah, it should have been assumed that this had in former times formed the outlet for the Jordan to the Red Sea. Lately, however, the levels of the Jordan and the Dead Sea have been taken, imperfectly, but still with sufficient accuracy to disprove the possibility of such a theory; and in addition there is the universal testimony of the Arabs that at least half of the district drains northward to the Dead Sea—a testimony fully confirmed by all the recorded observations of the conformation of the ground. A series of accurate levels from the Akabah to the Dead Sea, up the Arabah, are necessary before the question can be set at rest, but in the mean time the following may be taken as an approximation to the real state of the case. (See the profiles on Petersmann's Map.)(1)

(1) The levels of the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean are very nearly at one level. See DEAD SEA.

(2) The depression of the surface of the Sea of Galilee is 652 feet, and of the Dead Sea 1316 feet, below the level of the Mediterranean, and therefore of the Red Sea. Therefore the waters of the Jordan can never in historical times have flowed into the gulf of Akabah, even if the formation of the ground between the Dead Sea and the gulf would admit of it. But,

(3) All testimony goes to show that the drainage of the northern portion of the Arabah is toward the Dead Sea, and therefore that the land rises southward from the latter. Also that the south portion drains to the gulf, and therefore that the land rises northward from the point of junction between it and the Dead Sea. The water-shed is said by the Arabs to be a long ridge of hills running across the valley at two and a half days, or say forty miles, from Akabah (Stanley, p. 85), and it is probable that it is not far wrong. By M. de Bertou it is fixed as opposite the entrance to the Wady Talt, apparently the same spot.—Smith, s. v.

Arabattine (1 Macc. v, 8). See ACRAEATTINE.

Araba (Hob. Arab., 'isb, 2 Chron. ix, 14; Isa. xxii, 13; Jer, xxiv, 24; Ezek. xxvii, 21; Aqapia, Gal. i, 17; iv, 23; also 2 Esdr. xv, 29; 1 Macc. xi, 16; 2 Macc. xii, 11), the name of an extensive region occupying the south-western extremity of Asia, having on the west the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea (called from the Arabians Gulf), which separates it from Africa; on the south the Indian Ocean; and on the east the Persian Gulf and the Euphrates. The boundary to the north has never been well defined, for it is that direction it spreads out into interminable deserts, which meet those of Palestine and Syria on the west, and those of Irak-Arabi (i.e. Babylonia) and Mesopotamia on the north; and includes that entire wilderness in Arabia. The form of the peninsula is that of a trapezoid, whose superficial area is estimated at four times the extent of France. It is one of the few countries of the south where the descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants have neither been exterminated nor dispersed elsewhere. They have not only retained possession of their ancestral homes, but have sent forth colonies to all the adjacent regions, and even to more distant lands, both in Africa and Asia (Ritter, Erdkunde, ii, 172).

With the history of no country save that of Palestine are there more connected so many hallowed and impressive associations as with that of Arabia. Here lived and suffered the holy patriarch Job; here Moses, "when a stranger and a shepherd," saw the burning, unconsuming bush; here Elijah found shelter from the rage of persecution; here was the scene of all the marvellous displays of Divine power and mercy that follow upon one of great oblation for Egypt's yoke, and accompanied their journeyings to the promised land; and here Jehovah manifested himself in visible glory to his people. From the influence of these associations, combined with its proximity to Palestine, and the close affinity in blood, manners, and customs between the northern portion of its inhabitants and the Jews, Arabia is a region of peculiar interest to the student of the Bible; and it is chiefly in its relation to subjects of Bible study that we are now to consider it. See ASIA.

1. Names.—1. In early times the Hebrews included a great part what we call Arabia, among the countries they variously designated as ?eb, Ke-dem, "the East," the inhabit.nts being numbered among the Bney Ke-dem, "sons of the East," i.e. Orientals. But there is no evidence to show (as is asserted by Rossmoller and some other Bible geographers) that these phrases are ever applied to the whole of the country known to us as Arabia. They appear to have been compounds of the personal name of those peoples speaking of those countries, and meaning due east of Palestine, or on the north-east and south-east; though occasionally they do seem to point to tracts which lay indeed to the south and south-west of that country, but to the east and south-east of Egypt. Accordingly we find that whenever the expression befit what has obviously a reference to Arabia, it invariably points to its northern division only. Thus in Gen. xxxv, 6, Abraham is said to have sent away the sons of Hagar and Keturah to the E'retsa Ke-dem—Kedma, i. e. the "East country, eastward;" and none of them, so far as we know, were located in peninsular Arabia; for the story which represents the migration of the children of Mecca as an act of tradition. The patriarch Job is described (Job i, 3) as "the greatest of all the men of the east," and though opinions differ as to the precise locality of the land of Ur, all are agreed that it was in some part of Arabia, but certainly not in Arabia Felix. In the Book of Judges (vi, 8; vii, 12; viii, 10) among the allies of the Midianites and Amalekites (tribes of the north) are mentioned the "Bena-Kedem," which Josephus translates by Aposa'arac, the Arabs. In Isa. xi, 14, the parallelism requires that by "sons of the east" we understand the nomades of Desert Arabia, as corresponding to the "sons of the west" with these are the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, who were all northern Arameans. The command was given (Jer. xlix, 28) to the Babylonians to "smite the Bena-Kedem," who are there classed with the Kedarenes, descendants of Ishmael (comp. 1 Kings iv, 30). In more modern times a name of similar import was applied to the Arabs generally; they were called Saracens (Sharakiyun, i.e. Oriental), from a corruption of the Arabic name Sarama, i.e. derived the term al Ent, the east wind. The name of Saracen came into use in the West in a vague and undefined sense after the Roman conquest of Palestine, but does not seem to have been adopted as a general designation till about the eighth century. It is to be remarked here that though in Scripture Arabian is used as the generic term for all the inhabitants of Northern Arabia, it is also used of countries farther east, e.g. of the native country of Abraham (Isa. xlii, 2; comp. Gen. xxxix, 1), of Balaam (Num. xxiii, 7), and even of Cyrus (Isa. xlvi, 11); and, therefore, though the Magi who came to Jerusalem (Matt. ii, 1) were πόροι διανομής, "from the east," it does not thence follow that they were natives of Arabia. See Bene Kedem.

2. We find the name "Arab," first beginning to occur about the time of Solomon. It designated a portion of the country, an inhabitant being called Arab, an Arabian (Isa. xiii, 20), or, in later Hebrew, "אָרָב, Arab" (Neh. vii, 19), the plural of which was "אָרָב, Arim" (2 Chron. xxvi, 16), "בֵּית אָרָב, Beth-Arim" (2 Chron. xvi, 11). In some places these names seem to be given to the nomadic tribes generally (Isa. xiii, 20; Jer. iii, 2) and their country (Isa. xxvi, 20), in others of Arabia from whom Solomon (2 Chron. ii, 14) and Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii, 11) received gifts were probably Bedouin chiefs; though in the place parallel to the former text (1 Kings x, 19), instead of Arab we find מָרְב or מְרָב, rendered in Jer. xxvii, 20, 24, "mingled people," but which Gesenius, following the Chaldean, understands to mean "foreign allies." It is to be remarked, however, that in the passages in the Bible in which the word Arab occurs it designates only a small portion of the territory known to us as Arabia. Thus, in the account given by Ezekiel (xxvii, 21) of the Arabian tribes that traded with Tyre, mention is specially made of Arab (comp. Jer. xxxvii, 24). In 2 Chron. xxvi, 16, xxii, 1, xxi, 7; Neh. iv, 7, we find the Arabsians classed with the Philistines, the Ethiopians (i.e. the Asiatic Cushites, of whom they are said to have been neighbors), the Mhenim, the Ammonites, and Ashdodites. At what period this name Arab was extended to the whole region it is impossible to ascertain. From it the Greeks formed the word Arabia, which occurs in the New Testament; in Gal. i, 17, in reference probably to the tract adjacent to Damascus, Syria, and in Gal. iv, 25, in reference to the peninsula of Mount Sinai. Among the strangers assembled at Jerusalem at the Pentecost there were "Ἀραῖος, Arabs (Acts ii, 11), the singular being Ἀραίος.

3. The modern name, Jesir el- Arab, i. e. "the peninsula of the Arabs," applies to the southern part of the region only. Another native appellation is Belad el-Arab, i. e. "the land of the Arabs;" the Persians and Turks call it Arabistan. Mr. Lane informs us that in Egypt the term Arab is now generally limited to the Bedouins, or people of the desert; but formerly it was used to designate the towns-people and villagers of Arabian origin, while those of the desert were called Aarab; the former now call themselves Oulad el-Arab, or sons of the Arabs.

II. Geography.—1. The early Greek geographers, such as Eratosthenes and Strabo, mention only two divisions of the region, the Ascension, or Caravan, desert, and the region, or interior, of the sea. But after the city of Petra, in Idumea, had become celebrated as the metropolis of a commercial people, the Nabateans, it gave name to a third division, viz. Arabia Petraea (improperly translated Stony Arabia); and this threefold division, which first occurs in the geographer Ptolemy, who flourished in the second century, has obtained throughout Europe ever since.

It is unknown, however, to native or other Eastern geographers, who reckon Arabia Deserta as chiefly belonging to Syria and to Irak-Arab, or Babylonys, while they include a great part of what we call Arabia Petraea in Iran. See Petraea.

a. Arabia Felix (in Gr. Ἀραβία ἡ Ἑβδομάς, the Arabia Eudaimon of Pliny), i. e. Happy Arabia. The name has commonly been supposed to owe its origin to the variety and richness of the natural productions of this portion of the country, compared with those of the other two divisions. Some, however, regard the epithet "happy" as referring to a region of the desert which the Greeks and Romans knew by the name Yemen, which, though primarily denoting the land of the right hand, or south, also bears the secondary sense of "happy, prosperous." This part of Arabia lies between the Red Sea on the west and the Persian Gulf on the east, the boundary to the north being an imaginary line drawn between the respective northern extremities, Akabah and Basra or Bussora. It thus embraces by far the greater portion of the country known to us as Arabia, which, however, is very much a terra incognita: for the accessible districts have been but imperfectly explored, and but little of the interior has been as yet visited by any European traveller.

d. Arabia Deserta, called by the Greeks Σκεύητις 'Αραβία, or ή "Γυναίκα Ἀραβία, and by the Arabs El-Badieh, i. e. the Desert. This takes in that portion of the country which lies north of Arabia Felix, and is bounded on the north-east by the Euphrates, on the north-west by Syria, and on the west by Palestine and Arabia Petraea. The Arabs divide this "great wilderness" into three parts, so called from their proximity to the respective countries, viz. Badieh es-Shem (Syria), Badieh el-Jesikah (the peninsula, i. e. Arabia), and Badieh el-Irak (Babylonia). From this word Badieh comes the name of the nomadic tribes by whom it is inhabited, the Bedawin, viz. the Bedouins (from us by the French corruption of Bedouine), who are not, however, confined to this portion of Arabia, but range throughout the entire region. So far as it has yet been explored, Desert Arabia appears to be one continuous, elevated, interminable steppe, occasionally intersected by ranges of hills. Sand and salt are the chief elements of the soil, which in many places is entirely bare, but elsewhere yields stunted and thorny shrubs or thinly-scattered saline plants. That part of the wilderness called El-Hammad lies on the Syrian frontier, extending from the Hauran to the Euphrates, and is one of the most remote and least known, being unwatered, except near the banks of the river, where the fields are irrigated by wheels and other artificial contrivances. The sky in these deserts is generally cloudless, but the burning heat of the sun is moderated by cooling winds, which, however, raise fearful tempests of sand and dust. Here, too, as in other regions of the East, occasionally prevails the burning, suffocating south-east wind, called by the Arabs El-Harir (the Hot), but more commonly Samem, and by the Turks Samyeli (both words meaning "the Polsonous"), the effects of which, however, have by some travellers been greatly exaggerated. This is probably the "suffocating heat wind" and the "burning wind from desert" spoken of in Scripture. Another phenomenon, which is not peculiar, indeed, to Desert Arabia, but is seen there in greatest frequency and perfection, is what the French call the mirage, the delusive appearance of an expanse of water, created by the tremulous, undulatory movement of the vapours of the excessive heat of a meridian sun. It is called in Arabic serab, and is no doubt the Hebrew shekurah of Isa. xxxv, 7, which our translators have rendered "the parched ground." See Mirage.

c. Arabia Petraea (Gr. Ἰπποσιάδα) appears to have derived its name from its chief town Petra (i.e. a rock), in Hab. Sela; although (as is remarked by Burckhardt) the epithet is also appropriate on account of the rocky mountains and stony plains which compose its surface. It embraces all the north-western portion of the country; being bounded on the east by the Desert and Happy Arabia, on the north by Palestine and the Mediterranean, on the west by Egypt, and on the south by the Red Sea. This division of Arabia has been of late years visited by a great many travelers from Europe, and is consequently much better known than the other portions of the country. Confiding ourselves at present to a general outline, we refer for details to the articles Sinaï, Edom, Moab, etc. Beginning at the northern frontier, there meets the elevated plain of Belka, to the east of the Dead Sea, the district of Kerak (Kir), the ancient territory of the Moabites, their kinsmen of Ammon having settled to the north of this, in Arabia Deserta. The north border of Moab was the brook Amon, now the Wady-el-Milgh, to the south of Moab, separated from it by the Wady-el-Ashy, lay Mount Seir, the dominion of the Edomites, or Idumæa, reaching as far as to Elath on the Red Sea. The great valley which runs from the Dead Sea to that point consists, first, of El-Ghor, which is comparatively low, but gradually rises by a succession of limestone cliffs into the more elevated plain of El-Arabah above mentioned. "We were now," says Dr. Robinson (Biblical Researches, ii, 502), "upon the plain, or rather the rolling desert, of the Arabah; the surface was in general loose gravel and
stones, everywhere furrowed and torn with the beds of brooks. A more delightful desert it hardly be true to say, but the more so because the sentiment most uninviting and hideous aspect: preci-pices and naked conical peaks of chalky and gravelly formation rising one above another without a sign of life or vegetation." This mountainous region is divided into two districts: that to the north is called Jebel
(i. e., the mountain of the wandering), a hard, dry, rocks bounded by the south to Eeb-Sherah, which has erroneously been supposed to be allied to the Hebrew "Seir;" whereas the atter (written with a y) means "hairy," the for-der name denotes "a tract or region." To the district of Eeb-Sherah belongs Mount Hor, the burial-place of Aaron, towering above the Wady Mouse (valley of Moses), and which, together with Petra (the celebrated ancient capital of the Nabathaei-Idumeans), brought to light by Seetzen and Burckhardt, and now familiar to English readers by the illustrations of Isby and Mangels, Laborde, etc. As for the mountainous tract immediately west of the Arabah, Dr. Robinson describes it as a desert limestone region, full of precipitous ridges, through which no traveller has ever passed. See ARABAH. To the west of Idumea extends the "great and terrible wilderness" of Et-Tib, i.
"the Wandering," so called from being the scene of the wanderings of the children of Israel. It consists of sand plains, a gravelly soil, and irregular ridges of limestone hills. The researches of Robinson and Smith furnish new and important information respecting the geography of this part of Arabia and the adjacent peninsula of Sinai. It appears that the middle of this desert is occupied by a long central basin, extending from Jebel-et-Tib
(i. e., the mountain of the wandering, a chain partly far south) to the shores of the Mediterranean. This basin descends toward the north with a rapid slope, and is drained through all its length by Wady-el-Arish, which enters the sea near the place of the same name on the borders of Egypt. The soil of the Sinaisic peninsula is in general very unproductive, yielding only palm-trees, acacias, tamarisks (from which exudes the gum called mastic), colQuintida, and dwarfish, thorny shrubs. Among the animals may be mentioned the mountain-goat (the beden of the Arabs), gazelles, leopards, a kind of marmot called secked (by Col. Hamilton Smith) to be a species of wild wolf-dog, etc.; etc. There are: of birds there are:
eagles, partridges, pigeons, the katta, a species of guine, etc. There are serpents, as in ancient times (Num. xxii, 4, 6); and travellers speak of a large lizard called diok, common in the desert, but of unusually frequent occurrence here. The peninsula is inhabited by Bedouins Arabs, and its entire population was estimated by Burckhardt at not more than 4000 souls.
Though this part of Arabia must ever be memorable as the scene of the journey of the Israelites from Egypt to the Promised Land, yet very few of the spots mentioned in Scripture have been identified; nor after 1820 has cartography continued enough to be occasion of surprise.—Kitto, s. v. See EXOD.
2. Modern geographers find it more convenient to divide the country, agreeably to the natural features and the native nomenclature, into Arabia Proper, or Jebzel-el-Arab, containing the whole peninsula as far as the limits of the northern deserts; Northern Arabia, or El-Badiat, bounded by the Tigris, the Euphrates, Syria, and the desert of Petra, constituting properly Arabia Deserta, or the great desert of Ara-bias; and Western Arabia, the desert of Petra and the peninsula of Sinai, or the country that has been called Arabia Petraea, bounded by Egypt, Palestine, Northeast Africa, etc. (For the domestic customs and physical details, see the Penny Cyclopæd. s. v.; M'Colloch's Gaz. s. v.; on Aden, see Wilson, Bible Londo, i, 9 sqq.).
(1.) Arabia Proper, or the Arabian peninsula, constitutes of high table-land, declining toward the north:
head of the gulf just named; the great central country of Nejd and Yemanehe; and the Hejaz and Tahmehm on the Red Sea. The Arabs also have five divisions, according to the opinion most worthy of credit (Marais, ed. Juyboll, s. v. Hejaz; comp. Strabo): Tehemehm, the Hejaz, Nejd, El-Arud (the provinces lying toward the head of the Persian Gulf, including Yemen), Nejd (the Yemen and the intervening tracts). They have, however, never agreed either as to the limits or the number of the divisions. It will be necessary to state in some detail the position of these provinces, in order to the right understanding of the identifications of Biblical with Arab names. The various Arab tribes.

[1.] The Yemeni embraced originally the most fertile districts of Arabia, and the frankincense and spice country. Its name, signifying "the right hand" (and therefore "south", comp. Matt. xil, 42), is supposed to have given rise to the appellation Nablouwm (Felix), which the Greeks applied to a much more extensive region. At present it is bounded by the Hejaz on the north and Hadramaut on the east, with the sea-board of the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean; but formerly, as Fresnel remarks (comp. Sale, Preclm. Dic.); it appears to have extended at least as much as to include Hadramaut and Mahre (Yakut's Mshunkar, ed. Wustenfeld, s. v. Mahre, and our passage in the Hadramaut, on the coast east of the Yemen, is a cultivated tract contiguous to the sandy deserts called El-Ahkhaf, which are said to be the original seats of the tribe of Ad. It was celebrated for its frankincense, which it still exports (El-Idrlsi, ed. Jaubert, i, 64), and formerly it carried on a considerable trade. Its principal ports are Yez Zari and Karawan, which is now composed of a series of villages (Fresnel, 4e Lettre, Journ. Asiat. liii serie, v. 521). To the east of Hadramaut are the districts of Sh ihr, which exported ambergris (Marais, s. v.), and Mahre (so called after a tribe of Kudanah [id. s. v.], and which is very extensive), extending far into the peninsula of Karwan (Fresnel, 4e Lettre, p. 510). Oman forms the easternmost corner of the south coast, lying at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. It presents the same natural characteristics as the preceding districts, being partly desert with large fertile tracts. It also contains a considerable lead-mine.

[5.] The highest province on the Persian Gulf is El-Bahrein, between Oman and the head of the gulf, of which the chief town is Hejer—according to some, the name of the province also (Kaimos, Marais, s. v.). It contains the towns (and districts) of Katif and El-Ahba (El-Idrlsi, i, 371; Marais, s. v.; Mshunkar, s. v. El-Ahba), the latter being a province, as has been erroneously supposed. The inhabitants of El-Bahrein dwelling on the coast are principally fishermen and pearl-divers. The district of El-Ahba abounds in wells, and possesses excellent pastures, which are frequented by tribes of other parts.

The weighty province of Nejd, and that of Yemen, which bounds it on the south, is little known from the accounts of travellers. Nejd signifies "high land," and hence its limits are very doubtfully laid down by the Arabs themselves. It consists of cultivated table-land, with numerous wells, and is celebrated for its pastures; but it is intersected by extensive deserts. Yemen seems to be generally very similar to Nejd. On the south lies the great desert called Er-Rubu el-Khalhi, uninhabitable in the summer, but yielding pastureage in the winter after the rains. The camels of the tribes inhabiting Nejd are highly esteemed in Arabia, and the breed of horses is the most famous in the world. In this province there are also numerous different animal and plant species, similar to those of the Jordan.

The Hejaz and Tahmehm (or El-Ghor, the "low land") are bounded by Nejd, the Yemen, the Red Sea, and the desert of Petra, the northern limit of the Hejaz being Eileh (El-Makram's Akiht, s. v. El-Eileh), on the holy land of God. The holy cities being Mekekb and El-Medinah; and it was also the first seat of the Ismaelites in the peninsula. The northern portion is in general sterile and rocky; toward the south it gradually merges into the Yemen, or the district called El-Aisir, which is but little noticed by either eastern or western geographers (see Jomard, 245 sq.). The southern portions extend between the mountain chain of the Hejaz and the shore of the Red Sea; and is sometimes divided into the Hejaz of the Hejaz and Tahmehm of the Yemen. It is a parched, sandy tract, with little rain, and few pastures and cultivated portions than the mountainous portions.

Northern Arabia, or the Arabian desert, is divided by the Arabs (who do not consider it as strictly belonging to their country) into Badiet cah-Shen, "the desert of Syria," Badiet el-Jezireh, "the desert of Mesopotamia" (not "of Arabia," as some suppose), and Badiet el-Irak, "the desert of El-Irak." It is, so far as it is known to us, a high, undulating, parched plain, of which the Euphrates forms the natural boundary from the Persian Gulf to the frontier of Syria, whence it is bounded by the latter country and the desert of Petra on the north-west and west, the peninsula of Arabia forming its eastern limit. It has few cases, the water of the wells is generally either brackish or unpotable, and it is visited by the sand-wind called Samoom, of which, however, the terrors have been much exaggerated. The Arabs find pasture for their flocks and herds after the rain, and in the more depressed plains; and the desert generally produces by year's and year's crop, on which the camels feed. The inhabitants were known by the ancients as onot anir , or "in tents," or perhaps so called from their town ai ophrai (Strab. xvi, 74, 767; Diod. Sic. ii, 24; Amm. Marc. xxiii, 6; comp. Isii. xxii, 20; Jer. xi. 21; Ezech. xxxviii, 11; and the passage from the Mediterranean). It is the Arabian peninsula. Num. xxi. 7; 2 Chron. xxii. 16; Isa. ii. 6; xili. 20) to the borders of Egypt on the west (Strab. xvi. 748; Pinn. xii; Amm. Marc. xiv, 4; xiii, 15). These tribes, principally descended from Ishmael and from Keturah, have always led a wandering and pastoral life. Their pastoral habits are strictly maintained in the T. (2 Chron. xxii. 16, 17; xxvi. 7; Job i. 15; Jer. iii. 2). They also conducted a considerable trade of merchandise of Arabia and India from the shores of the Persian Gulf (Ezech. xxi, 20-24), whence a chain of ones still forms caravans-stations (Burckhardt, Arabis. Appendix vi); and they likewise traded from the westernmost shores of the pea."

from 2 Chron. xvii, 11; and elsewhere there are indications of such tribute (comp. the passages referred to above.

(3.) Western Arabia includes the peninsula of Sinai (q. v.) and the desert of Petra, corresponding generally with the limits of Arabia Petraea. The latter name is probably derived from that of its chief city; not from its stony character. It was in the earliest times inhabited by a people whose genealogy is not mentioned in the Bible. The name, however, is found in Josephus (Gen. xiv. 6; xxxvi, 20; 21; Deut. ii. 12, 22; xxxvi, 20-22). See Horita.

Its later inhabitants were in part the same as those of the preceding division of Arabia, as indeed the boundary of the two countries is arbitrary and unsettled; but it was mostly peopled by descendants of Cush, and was generally known as the land of Edom, or Idumea (q. v.), as well as by its older appellation, the desert of Seir, or Mount Seir (q. v.).

The common origin of the Idumeans from Edom and Ishmael is found in the marriage of the former with a daughter of the latter (Gen. xxxviii, 9; xxxvi, 5). The name seems to have been transferred to the Idumeans, and is therefore a more ancient designation than the Jews, as the result of the residence of the Ishmaelites after the time of Josephus. The Nabataeans have always been identified with Nebaioth, son of Ishmael (Gen. xxvii, 13: Isa. i. 7), until Quatremere (Mémories sur les Nabathéens) advanced the theory that they were of another race, and a people of Mosopotamian origin, and that the term applied to the western caravan-traffic of Arabia, and of the merchandise brought up the Elanitic Gulf.—Smith, x. v. See Elath; Ezion-geber; Petra, etc.

III. Inhabitants.—1. Scriptural Account.—There is a prevalent notion that the Arabs, both of the south and north, are descended from Ishmael; and the passage in Gen. xvi, 12, "he (Ishmael) shall dwell in the possession of all his brethren," is often cited as if it were a prediction of that national independence which, upon the whole, the Arabs have maintained more than any other people. But this supposition (in so far as the true meaning of the text quoted is concerned) is founded on a misconception of the original Hebrew, which runs literally, "he shall dwell before the faces of all his brethren," i.e. (according to the idiom above explained, in which "before the face" denotes the east), the habitation of his posterity shall be "to the east" of the settlements of Abraham's other descendants. This seems to be the meaning of Gen. xxviii, 18, where, in reference to Ishmael, it is said in our version, "he died in the presence of all his brethren;" but the true sense is, "the lot of his inheritance fell to him before the faces (i. e. to the east) of all his brethren." These prophecies found their accomplishment in the fact of the sons of Ishmael being located, generally speaking, to the east of the other descendants of Abraham, whether by Sarah or by Keturah. But the idea of the southern Arabs being of the posterity of Ishmael is entirely without foundation, and seems to have originated in the tradition invented by Arab historians to explain the gradual decay of the houses of Edom and Judah, and the idea that the sons of Ishmael—descendants of Abraham—a fanatic which, besides disfiguring and falsifying the whole history of the patriarch and his son Ishmael, has transferred the scene of it from Palestine to Mecca. If we go to the most authentic source of ancient ethnography, the book of Genesis, we there find that the vast tracts of country known to us under the name of Arabia were originally peopled by a variety of tribes of different lineage, though it is now impossible to determine the precise limits within which they fixed their permanent or nomadic abode. See Ethnology.

2. Hamites, i. e. the posterity of Cush, Ham's eldest son, whose descendants appear to have settled in the south of Arabia, and to have sent colonies across the Red Sea to the opposite coast of Africa; and hence Cush became a general name for the south, and especially for Arabian and African Ethiopia. The sons of Cush (Gen. xvi, 7) were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah or Ragama (his sons Sheba and Dedan), and Sabatai. See Cush.

b. Shenmites, including the following: (a) Joktanites, i. e. the descendants of Joktan (called by the Arab tradition, Kuhatan), the second son of Eber, Shem's great-grandson (Gen. x, 25, 26). According to Arab tradition, Kuhatan (whom they also regard as a son of Eber), after the confusion of tongues and dispersion at Babel, settled in Yemen, and reigned among the Poblemys speaks of an Arab tribe called Kalatimis, who may have derived their name from him; and the richest Bedouins of the southern plains are the Kuhatins tribe on the frontiers of Yemen. Joktan had thirteen sons, some of whose names may be obscurely traced in the designations of certain districts in Arabia Felix. Their names were Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth (preserved in the name of the province of Hadramaut, the Hebrew and Arabic letters being the same), Jereb, Hadoram, Uzai (believed by the Arabs to have been the founder of Sanam in Yemen), Diklah, Obal, Abimiel, Sheba (father of the Sabaeans), whose chief town was Marib or Meb, and the queen, Balak, supposed to be the queen who visited Solomon, Ophir (who gave name to the district that became so famous for its gold), Havilah, and Jobab.

(b) Arabamites, divided into: [1.] Hagarenes or Hagaries, called from Hagar, the mother of Ishmael, and Idumeamites from her son; and yet in course of time these names appear to have been applied to different tribes, for in Psalm xxxiii, 6, the Hagarenes are expressly distinguished from the Idumeamites (comp. 1 Chron. x, 19, 22, and the apocryphal book of Baruch, i, 35; iii, 29). The twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxvii, 19-25), who gave names to separate tribes, were Nebaioth (the Nabataeans in Arabia Petraea), Kedar (the Kedarites, sometimes also used as a designation of the Bedouins generally, and hence the Jewish rabbins call the Arabic language "the Kedarese"). Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadad or Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish (the Iturians and Nabateans near the tribe of Gad; 1 Chron. x, 19, 20), and Kedemah. They appear to have been for the most part located near Palestine on the east and south-east.

[2.] Keturahites, i. e. the descendants of Abraham and his concubine Keturah, by whom he had six sons (Gen. xxvii, 2). Zimran, Jokshan (who, like Raamah, son of Cush, was also the father of two sons, Sheba and Dedan), Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. Among these the posterity of Midian became the best known. Their principal seat appears to have been in the neighborhood of the Moabites, but a branch of them must have settled in the peninsula of Sinai, for Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was a priest of Midian (Exod. iii. 1; xviii, 5; Num. x, 29). To the posterity of Shuah belonged Biledad, one of the friends of Job.

[3.] Edomites, i. e. the descendants of Edom, who possessed Mount Seir and the adjacent region, called from them Idumaea. They and their neighboring tribes in later times a flourishing commercial state, the capital of which was the remarkable city called Petra.

(c) Nahorites, the descendants of Nahor, Abraham's brother, who seem to have peopled the land of Uz, the country of Job, and of Duz, the country of his friend Elihu the Buzite, these being the names of Nahor's sons (Gen. xxii, 21).

(d) Lotites, viz.: [1.] Moabites, who occupied the northern portion of Arabia Petraea, as above described, and their kinsmen, the [2.] Ammonites, who lived north of them, in Arabia Deserta.

c. Besides these the Bible mentions various other tribes who resided within the bounds of Arabia, but whose descent is unknown, e. g. the Amalekites, the Kenites, the Horites, the inhabitants of Maon, Hazor, Vedan, and Javan-Meuzaz (Ezek. xxvii, 19), where the English version has, "Dan also and Javan going to to.

In process of time some of these tribes were perhaps wholly extirpated (as seems to have been the case with the Amaulekites), but the rest were more or less mingled together by intermarriages, by military conquests, political revolutions, and other causes of which we have preserved no record; and, thus amalgamated, they became known to the rest of the world as the "Arabs," a people whose physical and mental characteristics are very strongly and distinctly marked. In both respects they rank very high among the nations; so much so that some have regarded them as furnishing the prototype—the primitive model—of the standard figures of the human family and species. This was the opinion of the famous Baron de Larrey, surgeon-general of Napoleon's army in Egypt, who, in speaking of the Arabs on the east side of the Red Sea, says (in a Memoir for the Use of the Scientific Commission to Algiers, Paris, 1838), "They have a physiognomy and character which are quite peculiar, and which distinguish them generally from all those which appear in other regions of the globe." In his dissections he found "their physical structure in all respects more perfect than that of Europeans; their organs of sense exquisitely acute; their size, bulk, and tunics of the body men in general their figure robust and elegant (the color brown); their intelligence proportionate to that physical perfection, and, without doubt, superior, other things being equal, to that of other nations."—Kitto, s. v.

2. Native History.—The Arabs, like every other ancient nation of any celebrity, have traditions representing their country as originally inhabited by races which became extinct at a very remote period. These were the tribes of Ad, Thamud, Umeyl, Abil, Tasm, Jedla, Emilk (Amaulek), Jurhum (the first of this name), and Webari: some omit the fourth and the last two, but add Jasim. The majority of their historians derive these tribes from Shem; but some from Ham, though not through Cush. Their earliest traditions that have any obvious relation to the Bible refer the origin of the existing nation in the first instance to the first of this list, whom they and most European scholars identify with Joktan; and secondly to Ishmael, who is said to have been the descendant of Kahtan, though they only carry up their genealogies to Adman (said to be of the 21st generation before Mohammed). They are silent respecting Cushite settlements in Arabia; but modern research, we think, proves that Cushites were among its early inhabitants. And though the Bible name "the Cushites" corresponds to Cushites of Ethiopia, certain passages seem to indicate Cushite peoples in Arabia; and the series of the sons of Cush should, according to recent discoveries, be sought for in order along the southern coast, exclusive of Seba (Meroë), occupying one extreme of their settlements, and Nimrod the other. The great ruins of Mareth or Seba, and other places in the Yemen and Hadramaut, are not those of a Semitic people; and farther to the east, the existing language of Mahreh, the remnant of that of the inscriptions found on the ancient remains just mentioned, is in so great a degree apparently African as to be called by some scholars Cushite; while the settlements of Bamaah and those of his sons Sheba and Dedan, are probably to be looked for toward the head of the Persian Gulf, bordered on the north by the descendants of Keturah, bearing the same names as the two latter. In Babylonia also independent proofs of this immigration of Cushites from Ethiopia have, it is thought, been lately obtained. The ancient cities and buildings of Southern Arabia, in their architecture, the inscriptions they contain, and the native traditions respecting them, are of the utmost value in aiding a student of this portion of primeval history. Indeed they are the only important archaic monuments of the country; and they illustrate both its earliest people and its greatest kingdoms. Mareth, or Seba (the Maritime of the Greek geographers), is one of the most interesting of these sites (see Michaelis's Questions, No. 94, etc., in Niebuhr's Arabia). It was founded, according to the general agreement of tradition, by Ab-esh-Shema Seba, grandson of Yaarab the Kahanite (Mushattar, in the text), the son of Joktan, in the 26th year of the Tribes of Ishmael, P. 127, and the Dike of El-Arim, which was situated near the city, and the rupture of which (A.D. 150-170, according to De Sacy; 120, according to Caussin de Perseval) formed an era in Arabi history, is generally ascribed to Lukman the Greater, the Adite, who founded the dynasty of the second Ad (Isn-el-Wabar, Ms. Hariri, Jojihat, ib.). It is also mentioned by El-Mesudi, cited by De Sacy, Mem. de l'Acad. xlviii, 484 sq; and Ibn Khaldun in Caussin's Essai, i, 16). Adites (in conjunction with Cushites) were probably the founders of this and similar structures, and were succeeded by a predominantly Joktanite population, their physical characteristics being more pronounced in the Yemen (by these writers inerrantly identified with the Arabs), but unchanged, with Seba the Kahtanite, or the Hebrew skin being, if by the greater number of instances, sin in Arabic); and it necessitates the existence of the two Biblical kingdoms of Seba and Sheba in a circumscribed province of Southern Arabia, a result which we think is irreconcilable with the present sense of the passage of the passage of the Book of Genesis bearing on this subject. See Cush; Seba; Sheba.

Neither is there evidence to indicate the identity of Ad and the other extinct tribes with any Semitic or Hamitic people: they must, in the present state of knowledge, be classed with the Rephaim and other peoples whose original sages are not known to us. See Adites. The only one that can possibly be identified with a scriptural name is Amaulek, whose supposed descent from the grandsons of Ean seems inconsistent with Gen. xiv, 7, and Num. xxxiv, 20. See Amaulek.

The several nations that have inhabited the country are divided by the Arabs into extinct and existing. The former include all those races that correspond to the "Arab of the Arabs."; comp. Paul's phrase, "Hebrew of the Hebrews," Phil. iii, 5), the pure or genuine Arabs; 2. El-Arab el-Mutasarrif; and, 3. El-Arab el-Mustarbeh, the insitutions or naturalized Arabs. Of many conflicting opinions respecting these races, two only are worthy of note. According to the first of these, El-Arab-el-Mustarbeh denotes the extinct tribes, with whom some confound Kahtan; while the other two, as synonymous appellations, belong to the descendants of Ishmael. According to the second, El-Arab el-Aribi denotes the extinct tribes; El-Arab el-Mutasarrif the unmixed descendents of Kahtan; and El-Arab el-Mustarbeh the descendants of Ishmael by the daughter of Madad the Joktanite. That the descendants of Joktan occupied the principal portions of the south and south-west of the peninsula, with colonies in the interior, are attested by the Arabs, and fully confirmed by historical and philological researches. It is also asserted that they have been gradually absorbed into the Ishmaelites; but it is not unlikely that the ish-masulite element has been exaggerated by Mohammadan influence.

Respecting the Jotkanite settlers we have some certain evidence. In Genesis (x, 80) it is said, "and their dwelling was from MesoBeth, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east [Kedem]." The position of MesoBeth is very uncertain; it is most reasonably supposed to be the southern coast of the Persian Gulf. The "mount of the east" must be the great seaport on the south coast near Mabat, the other, now in ruins, is supposed to be Marduk, the chief city of the Lime- mance of the Himyarite kings (Musarrak, s. v.; Mu- raid, ib.; El-Idrisi, i, 148). Fresnel (4th Lettre, p. 516 sq.) prefers the seaport, as the Himyarite capital, and is followed by Jomard (Etudes, p. 367). He informs us that the inhabitants call this town "Isfar." Considering the position of the Jotkanite races, this is probably Sephar; it is situated near a thuriferous mountain (Marrarid, s. v.), and exports the best frankincense (Niebuhr, p. 146); Zafari in the Yemen, how- ever, is also among mountains. See Sephar. In the district indicated above are distinct and undoubt- ed traces of the names of the sons of Jotkan mentioned in Genesis (x, 80). Les Jotkani, Azal for Usal, Seba for Sheba, etc. Their remains are found in the existing inhabitants of (at least) its eastern portion, and their records in the numerous Himyarite ruins and inscriptions.

The principal Jotkani kingdom was probably Sana, formerly called Azal, and ass, son of Jotkan (Yakut, ut sup.). See Usal. The other capitals were Mareb, or Seba, and Zafari. This was the Biblical kingdom of Sheba (Jer. iv, 11). Its rulers, and most of its people, were descendants of Seba (Seb), whence the classical Sabaei (Diod. Sic. iii, 38, 46).

Among its rulers was probably the queen of Seba who came to hear the wisdom of Solomon (2 Kings x, 2). The Arabs call her Balsis, a queen of the later Himyarites, and their traditions respecting her are astonishingly similar to this. The dominant family was apparently that of Himyar, son (or descendant) of Seba. A member of this family founded the more modern kingdom of the Himyarites. The testimony of the Bible and of the classical writers, as well as native tradition, seems to prove that the latter kingdom succeeded the former, probably before the Christian era; i. e. after the foundation of the later kingdom. "Himyarite," however, is now very vaguely used. Himyar, it may be observed, is perhaps "red," and several places in Arabia whose name is reddish derive their names from Afaq, "red." The proper title Himyar (the red mon) is given to Ophir, respecting whose possessions, the territory of the country called Ophir, the opinion of the learned is widely divided. See Ophir. The similarity of spelling with opin and ispondos lends weight to the tradition that the Phenicians came from the Egyptian Sea (Herod. vii, 89). The maritime nation of the Pheniciai was in all probability founded by some branch of the Egyptians—which as the Philistines, and possibly the primitive Cretans and Carians—appear to have been an offshoot of an early immigration from Southern Arabia which moved northward, partly through Egypt. See Carfaves. It is noticeable that the Shephard is in- vaded by the Phenicians, and that the Semitic language of the Phenicians was adopted by the north. But Memetho, who seems to have held this opinion, also tells us that some said they were Arabs (Maneto, op. Cory, Anc. Fragments, 2d ed. p. 171), and the hiero- glyphic name has been supposed to correspond to the common appellation of the Arabs, Shana, the "camel-riding Sham."

(Seleucus Papias, pl. llii), an identification entirely in accordance with the Egyptian histori- the opposite direction, an early Arab domination of Chal- des is mentioned by Berosus (Cory, p. 80), as pre- ceding the Assyrian dynasty. All these indications, slight as they are, must be borne in mind in at-temping a reconstruction of the early history of Southern Arabia. The first kings of the Yemen were con- tinual feud with the descendants of Kahlia (brother of Himityar) until the fifteenth in descent (according to the majority of native historians) from him united the kingdom. This king was the first Tubba, a title also distinctive of his successors, whose dynasty represents the same family as the Heryites or the Homerites (Ptol. vi, 7; Plin. vi, 26). Their rule probably extended over the modern Yemen, Hadra- maut, and Mahre. The fifth Tubba, Dhu-l-Ahadr, or Zu-l-Azar, is supposed (Cassius, i, 79) to be the Harsurus of Zellus Gallus (B.C. 24). The kingdom of Himyar lasted until A.D. 297, when it fell before an Abyssinian invasion. Already, about the middle of the fourth century, the kings of Azum appear to have become masters of part of the Yemen (Cassius, Esai, i, 114; Poly. afr. iv, 35); adding to their titles the names of places in Arabia belonging to Himyar. After four rulers more were added, the last of them being the princes, vassals of Persia, the last of whom submitted to Mohammed. Kings of Hadramaut (the people of this district are the classical Chatrnamociti, Plin. vi, 26; comp. Adromaciti) are also enumerated by the Arabs ( Ibn-Khalid, op. Cassius, i, 188 sq.), and distinguished from the descendants of Yatab, an in- dication, as is remarked by Cassius (1 c.), of their separate descent from Hazarmaveth (q. v.). The Greek geographers mention a people four in conjunction with the Sabaei, Homerites, and Chatrnamociti— the Minei (Strab. xvi, 768; Plut. v, 7, § 26; Plin. vi, 82; Diod. Sic. ii, 42), who have not been identified with any Biblical or modern name. Some place them as high as Mekkeh, and derive their name from Mina (the sacred valley north-east of that city), or from the goddess Minah, worshipped in the district between Mekkeh and El-Medinah. Fresnel, however, places them in the Wady Doan in Hadramaut, arguing that they included all the Yemen south of it. The Minei were the same as the Hemesites or Rham- hanite (Plin. vi, 7, § 24; Strab. xvii, 782), and that (Harmantil was a copyist's error for Imauritii.

The other chief Jotkani kingdom was that of the Hejaz, founded by Jurhum, the brother of Yarub, who left the city and settled in the western part of Mekkeh. The Arab lists of its kings are inextri- cably confused; but the name of their leader and that of two of his successors was Musad (or El-Musad), who probably represents Almoda (q. v.). Ishaem, according to the Arabs, married a daughter of the first Musad, whence sprang Adnan the ancestor of Mo- hammed. This kingdom, situated in a less fertile dis- trict than the Yemen, and engaged in conflict with aboriginal tribes, never attained the importance of that of the south. It merged, by intermarriage and conquest, into the tribes of Ishaem. (Kutib-ud-Din, ed. Wustenfeld, p. 85 and 89 sq.; comp. authorities quoted by Cassius.) In the time of the author who identifies Jurhum with Hadrorn (q. v.).

Although these were the principal Jotkani king- doms, others were founded beyond the limits of the peninsula. The most celebrated of these were that of El-Hireh in El-Irak, and that of Ghassan on the banks of the Arman. Both originally resided on the shores of the Flood of the Arman. El-Hireh soon became Is- maelite: Ghassan long maintained its original stock. Among its rulers were many named El-Harith. Re- specting the presumed identity of some of these with kings called by the Greeks and Romans Arebas, and with the Aretas mentioned by Paul (2 Cor. vi, 82), see ARETAS.

The Ishmaelites appear to have entered the peninsula from the north-west. That they have spread over the whole of it (with the exception of one or two districts on the south coast which are said to be still inhabited by uncircumcised Bedouin) and that the modern inhabitants are predominantly Ishmaelite, is asserted by the Arabs. They do not, however, carry up their genealogies higher than Adnan (as we have already said), and they have lost the names of most of Ishmael's immediate and near descendants. Such as have been identified with existing names will be found in the articles of those persons in the sacred books. See also HAGARENE. They extended northward from the Hejaz into the Arabian desert, where they mixed with Keturahites and other Abrahamic peoples; and westward to Edom, where they mixed with Edomites, etc. The tribes sprung from Ishmael have always been governed by petty chiefs or heads of families (sheikhs and emirs); they have generally followed a patriarchal life, and have not originated kingdoms, though they have in some instances succeeded to those of Joakimites, the principal one of these being that of El-Hireh. With reference to the Ishmaelites generally, we may observe, in continuation of what has already been said, that the earliest settlements in the Hejaz, and their spreading over a great part of the northern portions of the peninsula, are sufficiently proved, there is doubt as to the wide extension given to them by Arab tradition. Mohammed derived from the Jews whatever tradition he pleased, and silenced any contrary, by the Koran or his own dicta. This religious element, which does not directly affect the tribes of Joakim (whose settlements are otherwise unquestionably identified), has a great influence over those of Ishmael. They, therefore, can not be certainly proved to have spread over the peninsula, notwithstanding the almost universal adoption of their language (which is generally acknowledged to have been the Arabic commonly so called), and the concurrent testimony of the Arabs; but from these and other considerations it becomes at the same time highly probable that they now form the predominant element of the Arab nation.

They appear to have settled chiefly north of the peninsula in Desert Arabia, from Palestine to the Persian Gulf; and the passages in the Bible in which mention is made of Dedan (except those relating to the Cushite Dedan, Gen. x, 7) refer apparently to the tribe spoken of in Joseph and the Medes, xxvi, 22. Ezek, xxvii, 9, perhaps with an admixture of the Cushite Dedan, who seems to have passed up the western shores of the Persian Gulf. Some traces of Keturahites, indeed, are asserted to exist in the south of the peninsula, where a king of Himyar is said to have been a Midianite (Isa-Meshi, ap. Schultes, p. 198-9); and where one dialect is said to be of Midian, and another of Jokshan son of Keturah (Monjum); but these traditions must be ascribed to the rabbinical influence in Arabia history. Native writers are almost wholly silent on this subject; and the dialects mentioned above are not, so far as they are known to us, used by the inhabitants of the desert. See also AMALK.

In Northern and Western Arabia are other peoples which, from their geographical position and mode of life, are sometimes classed with the Arabs. Of these are AMALEK, the descendants of Esau, etc. Arabia, in ancient times, generally preserved its independence, unaffected by those great events which changed the destiny of the surrounding nations; and in the sixteenth century of our era, the decline of the Roman empire and the corruptions and distractions of the Eastern Church favored the impulse given by a wild and warlike fanaticism. Mohammed arose, and succeeded in gathering around him the standard of the madic tribes of Central Arabia; and in less than fifty years that standard waved triumphant from the straits of Gibraltar to the hitherto unconquered regions beyond the Oxus. The caliphs transferred the seat of government successively to Damascus, Kufa, and Bagdad; but amid the distractions of their foreign wars, the chieftains of the Arabia generally shook off their feeble allies, lance, and resumed the independent habits of independence, which, notwithstanding the revolutions that have since occurred, they for the most part retain (Crichton, Hist. of Arabia, Lond. 1882).

3. Religion.—The most ancient idolatry of the Arabs we must conclude to have been fetishism, of which we find traces there and elsewhere in the sacred books. See also HAGARENE. They extended northward from the Hejaz into the Arabian desert, where they mixed with Keturahites and other Abrahamic peoples; and westward to Edom, where they mixed with Edomites, etc. The tribes sprung from Ishmael have always been governed by petty chiefs or heads of families (sheikhs and emirs); they have generally followed a patriarchal life, and have not originated kingdoms, though they have in some instances succeeded to those of Joakimites, the principal one of these being that of El-Hireh. In Northern and Western Arabia are other peoples which, from their geographical position and mode of life, are sometimes classed with the Arabs. Of these are AMALEK, the descendants of Esau, etc. Arabia, in ancient times, generally preserved its independence, unaffected by those great events which changed the destiny of the surrounding nations; and in the sixteenth century of our era, the decline of the Roman empire and the corruptions and distractions of the Eastern Church favored the impulse given by a wild and warlike fanaticism. Mohammed arose, and succeeded in gathering around him the standard of the
the one speaking Hebrew and the other Chaldee. It seems also (Judg. vii, 9-15) that Gideon, or Phurah, or both, understood the conversation of the "Midianites, and the Amalekites, and all the children of the East." It is probable, therefore, that down to the 12th century B.C. the Semitic languages differed much less among themselves than they do now. Thus it appears from 2 Kings xviii, 26, that in the 8th century B.C. only the edicated classes among the Jews understood Aramaic. With these evidences before us, and making a due distinction between the archaic and the known phases of the Aramaic and the Arabic, we think that the Himyaritics are to be regarded as a sister to the Aramaic, and that the Arabic (commonly called) as a sister of the Hebrew and the Aramaic, or, in its classical phase, as a descendant of a sister of these two, but that the Himyaritic is mixed with an African language, and that the other dialects of Arabia are in like manner, though in a much less degree, mixed with an African language. The inferred differences between the older and later phases of the Aramaic, and the presumed difference between those of the Arabic, are amply confirmed by comparative philology. The division of the Ishmaelite language into many dialects is to be attributed chiefly to the separation of tribes by uninhabitable regions, and to the fact that each of those dialects to the pilgrimages and the annual meetings of Okaz, a fair in which literary contests took place, and where it was of the first importance that the contending poets should deliver themselves in a language perfectly intelligible to the mass of the people who congregated, in order that it might be critically judged by them; for many of the meanest of the Arabic, utterly ignorant of reading and writing, were of the highest of the authorities consulted by the lexicologists when the corruption of the language had commenced, i.e., when the Arabs, as Mohammedans, began to spread among foreigners. See ARABIC LANGUAGE.

Respecting the Himyaritic until lately little was known; but monuments bearing inscriptions in this language have been discovered in the southern parts of the peninsula, principally in Hadramaut and the Yemen, and some of the inscriptions have been published in recent years; the present writer has already, while Frenzel has found a dialect still spoken in the district of Mahre, and westward as far as Kishim, that of the neighborhood of Zafari and Mirbat being the purest, and called "Ekhill," and this is supposed with reason to be the modern phase of the old Himyaritic. The Himyaric alphabet has been accepted by the learned. The dates found in the inscriptions range from 30 (on the dike of Mabidi) to 691 at Hian Ghorab, but what era these represent is uncertain.

Ewald (Über die Himyarische Sprache in Hölzer's Zeitschrift, i, 235 sq.) thinks that they are unable to understand the Rupture of the Dike, while acknowledging their apparent high antiquity; but the difficulty of supposing such inscriptions on a ruined dikes, and the fact that some of them would thus be brought later than the time of Mohammed, make it probable that they belong rather to an earlier era, perhaps that of the Himyarite empire, though what point marks its commencement is not determined. The Himyarite in its earliest phase probably represents the first Semitic language spoken in Arabia.—Smith, s.v. See HIMALAYA; SIBERIAN LANGUAGES.

3. The manners and customs of the Arabs are of great value in illustrating the Bible; but supposed parallels between Scripturs and the state of the modern Arabs must not hastily be drawn. It should be remembered that this people are in a degraded condition; that they have been influenced by Jewish contact, especially by the adoption through Mohammed of parts of the ceremonial law and of rabbinical observances; and that they are not of the race of Israel. The inhabitants of Arabia have, from remote antiquity, been divided into two great classes, viz. the townspeople (including villages), and the men of the desert, such being, as we remarked, the meaning of the word "Bedawees" or Bedouins, the designation given to the "dwellers in the wilderness." From the nature of their country, the latter are necessitated to lead the life of a pastoral and nomad shepherd; and since the days of the patriarchs (who were themselves of that occupation) the extensive steppes, which form so large a portion of Arabia, have been traversed by a pastoral but warlike people, who, in their mode of life, their food, their dress, their dwellings, their manners, customs, and government, have always been common, and still continue to be alternately the same. They consist of a great many separate tribes, who are collected into different encampments dispersed through the territory which they claim as their own; and they move from one spot to another (commonly in the neighborhood of pools or wells) as soon as the stunted pasture is exhausted by their cattle. It is only here and there that the ground is susceptible of cultivation, and the tillage of it is commonly left to peasants, who are often the vassals of the Bedouins, and whom (as well as all "townsmen") they regard with contempt as an inferior race. Having constant wars with each other, there is no nation without at least a few cities of movable tents (comp. Isa. xiii, 20; Jer. xlix, 29), from which circumstance they received from the Greeks the name of Euxynas, i.e., dwellers in tents (Strabo, xvi, 747; Dion. Sic. p. 254; Ammian. Marcell. xxiii, 6). The tents are of an oblong figure, not more than six or eight feet high, twenty to thirty long, and ten broad; they are made of goats' or camel's hair, and are of a brown or black color (such were the tents of Kedar, Cant. i, 5), differing in this respect from those of the Turcomans, which are white. Each tent is divided by a curtain or carpet into two apartments, one of which is appropriated to the women, who are not, however, subject to so much restraint and seclusion as among other Mohammedans. The tents are arranged in an irregular circle, the space within serving as a fold to the cattle at night. The heads of tribes are called sheiks, a word of various import, but used in this case as a title of honor; the government in the majority of the deposed, is either absolute, but elective as to the particular individual appointed. Their allegiance, however, consists more in following his example as a leader than in obeying his commands; and, if dissatisfied with his government, they will depose or abandon him. As the independent lords of their own domain, the Bedouins have from time immemorial demanded tribute or present from all travellers or caravans (Isa. xvi, 13) passing through their country; the transition from which to robbery is so natural that they attach to the latter no disgrace, plundering without mercy all who are unable to resist them, or who have not secured the protection of their tribe. Their watching for travellers "in the ways," i.e., the frequented routes through the desert, is alluded to Jer. iii, 2; Ezra viii, 31; and the neatness of their horses in carrying them into the "depths of the wilderness," beyond the reach of their pursuers, seems what is referred to in Isa. lxix, 18, 14. Their warlike incursions into more civilized districts are often noticed (e.g. Job i, 15; 2 Chron. xxii, 16; xxvi, 7). The acuteness of their bodily senses is very remarkable, and is exemplified in their astonishing sagacity in tracing and distinguishing the footsteps of men and cattle, a faculty which is known by the name of "nab." The law of their blood-range (q.v.), sows the seed of perpetual feuds, and which was predicted (Gen. xvi, 12) of the posterity of Ishmael, the "wild-ass man" (a term most graphically descriptive of a Bedouin), holds true of the whole people. Yet the very dread of the consequences of shedding blood prevents their frequent conflicts from being very sanguinary; they show bravery in repel-

ling a public enemy, but when they fight for plunder they behave like cowards. Their bodily frame is spare, but athletic and active, inured to fatigue and capable of undergoing great privations; their minds are acute and inquisitive; and, though their manners are somewhat grave and formal, they have a lively and pleasant disposition. Of their moral virtues it is necessary to speak with caution. They were long held up as models of good faith, incorruptible integrity, and the most generous hospitality to strangers; but many recent travellers deny them the possession of these qualities; and it is certain that whatever they have, they do not keep. The Bedouins, on the other hand, the most unpolished and the most simple of the inhabitants of the south does not appear to be made in the Bible, but it seems to have passed to Palæstine principally through the northern tribes. So early as the days of Jacob (Gen. xxxvii, 28) we read of a mixed caravan of Arab merchants (Ishmaelites and Midianites) who were engaged in the conveyance of various foreign articles to Egypt, and made no scruple to add Joseph, "a slave," to their other purchases. The Arabs were doubtless the first navigators of their own seas, and the great carriers of the produce of India, Abyssinia, and other remote countries, to Western Asia and Egypt. Various Indian productions thus obtained by the Arab traders of the second and third period of their history (Exod. xxx, 23, 25). The traffic of the Red Sea was to Solomon a source of great profit; and the extensive commerce of Sabæa (Sheba, now Yemen) is mentioned by profane writers as well as alluded to in Scripture (I Kings x, 10-15). In the description of the foreign trade of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii, 13-24) various Arab tribes are introduced (comp. Isa. lx, 6; Jer. vi, 20; 2 Chron. ix, 14). The Nabathæan Idumeans became a great trading people, their capital being Petæa (q. v.). The Joktanite people of Southern Arabia have always been, in contradiction to the Ishmaelite tribes, addicted to a seafaring life. The Joktanites were regarded as the chief traders of the Red Sea, carrying their commerce to the shores of India, as well as to the nearer coasts of Africa. Their own writers describe these voyages; since the Christian era especially, as we might expect from the modern character of their literature. (See the curious Accounts of India and China by two Mohammedan Travellers of the ninth Cent., trans. by Renaut, and amply illustrated in Mr. Lane's notes to his translation of the Thousand and One Nights.) The classical writers also make frequent mention of the commerce of Southern Arabia (see Smith's Dict. of Cities, Geography). It was evidently carried on by two great caravan routes from the head of the Red Sea and from that of the Persian Gulf; the former especially taking with it African produce, the latter Indian. It should be observed that the wandering propensities of the Arabs, of whatever descent, do not date from the promulgation of Islamism. All the time that Arabia was separated from the peoples of Arabia formed colonies in distant lands, and have not been actuated solely either by the desire of conquest or by religious impulse in their foreign expeditions, but rather by restlessness and commercial activity. The transit-trade from India continued to enrich Arabia until the discovery of the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope; but the invention of steam navigation has now restored the ancient route for travellers by the Red Sea. See COMMERC.

The most important native works are, with two exceptions, still untranslated, but a few of them are edited. Abul- beda’s Hist. Antelumica has been edited and translated by Flescher (Lips. 1881); and El- idrissi’s Geography translated by Jaubert, and published in the Recueil de Voyages et de Memoires, by the Geogr. Soc. of Paris (1836); of those which have been, or are in the course of being edited, are Yäkut’s Homonymous Geographical Dictionary, entitled El- Misktar al-Wad’in, wa-l-Mugtar al-‘Ud’ân (ed. Was- tentfeld, 1846). For a copious list of editors, and an appendix, see Abgour’s Dictionary of Arabic and kindred literature, see Zenker’s Bibliotheca Orientalis (Lips. 1846 sq.). Compare ARABIA.

ARABIA, CHURCH OF. — The Apostle Paul, on his conversion, retired into Arabia for some two years (Gal. i, 27), but whether this time was spent in preaching or in private exercises is doubtful; nor is there any authentic record of the fruits of his labours during that period. Several other apostles, as Peter, Thomas, Bartholomew, Judas Thaddaeus, are mentioned by tradition as having preached there (see Wilttsch, i, 21 sq.). It is certain that Arabia received Christianity rather. According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi, 10), an Arab named Joseph, named Demetrius, is said to have travelled to Alexandria, in the beginning of the 3rd century, asking for Origen as a teacher. Between 247 and 252 a synod was held, under the presidency of Origen, for the condemnation of a certain heresy. Arabia was originally a province of the patriarchate of Antioch, having Bostra for its metropolitan see; but it was separated from the Oriental diocese and added to that of Jerusalem, according to William of Tyre (De Belllo Sacro, xiv, 14), in the 6th Ecumenical Council. Metropolitans of Bos- trata, and bishops of Philadelphia and Ephas are still mentioned about the middle of the seventh century. The conversion of a Himyarite king occurred in the 1st century; and that of King Badr in the 5th. In the sixth century. Among the Saracens and Byzantines numerous conversions took place in the fifth century. Several important bodies, as the Bahrites, Tauchautes, Tagelulates, and others were entirely Christian, and Cosmas Indicopleustes reports in the sixth century that he found everywhere in Arabia Christian churches. Both Nestorian and Monophysite statements are met with, and various adherents in Arabia; the former principally in the north and north-west, the latter in the south. The Jacobites of Arabia have been under the rule of the Marphians since the time of the Marphian Marutas, i. e. since about 629, and contained two bishoprics, viz.: one of Arabia, so called of which the seat was at Akula; the other of the Taalababensis Soimite Arabi- ans, of which the seat was at Hira Naamans. But Christianity in Arabia was nearly, if not quite, destroyed by Mohammedanism; nor has it risen since that country to any extent. The only place where it has gained a firm footing is Aden, which, in 1839, was ceded to the British by the Sultan of Hayn. A separate Roman Catholic congregation has been collected; the membership of the latter is given by the missionaries as about 1000 (Schem. Eccles. Year-book for 1859, p. 18, 19). In fact, Christianity in Arabia had become very early corrupted by an admixture of Sabean idolatry and Persian dualism, so that Origen, in the middle of the 3rd century, declared Arabia to be a “country most fruitful in heresy.” The tribes which professed Christianity when Mohammed first began to promulgate Islamism appear to have paid but little attention to rabbinical legends and monkish fables as to the Scriptures. It is indeed pretty certain that the Koran contains a tolerably fair representation of the religious belief of the Arabian Christians in Mohammed’s age, and from this it appears that the idle stories in the apocryphal gospels were received with as much reverence as the books of the evangelists; it is even doubtful whether an early version of any of the canonical books of the Bible, and this may seem to explain the facility with which they received the creed of Mohammed.—Wittsche, Handbook of the Geogr. and Statistics of the Church, transl. by Leitsch (Lond. 1859, vol. i. 8vo). See MOHAMMED.

ARABIA, ECCLESIA OF [Concilium Arabicem], was held in 247 (?) again under Elkesiates (q. v.), who held that the soul, dying with the body, was to be raised to life at the resurrection. Origin was invited to this council, and boldly combated the Psychopann- chites (Hypocypichetes), Enus. vi, 37; tom. i. conc. p. 550.—Smith, Tables of Church Hist.; Landon, Manual of Councils.

Arab’ian (Heb. ‘Arabi‘, אֶרֶבִי, Is. xiii, 20; Jer. iii, 2; or Or’bi‘, עָרִיבִי, 2 Chron. xviii, 11; xxv, 16; xxvi, 1; xxvii, 7; Neh. ii. 19; iv, 7 (T); vi. 1; Gr. ‘Apoa, 1 Mac. vii. 39; xi. 17, 39, xii. 31; 2 Mac. vii. 8, xii. 10), the national designation of an inhabitant of that general district designated Arabia, i.e. the nomadic tribes inhabiting the country to the east and south of Palestine, who in the early times of Hebrew history were known as Ishmaelites and descended of Keturah. Their roving pastoral life in the desert is alluded to in Is. xiii, 20; Jer. iii, 2; 2 Mac. xii, 11; their country is associated with the country of the Dedanites, the travelling merchants (Is. xxi, 15), with Deiian, Tema, and Buz (Jer. xxv. 24), and with De- dan and Kedar (37), all of whom are supposed to have occupied the norther part of the peninsula later known as Arabia. During the prosperous reign of Jehoshabath, the Arabsians, in conjunction with the Philistines, were tributary to Judah (2 Chr. xvii, 11), but in the reign of his successor they revolted, ravaged the country, plundered the royal palace, slew all the king's sons with the exception of the youngest, and carried off the royal harem (2 Chr. xxii, 16; xxii, 1). The Arabians of Gush-baal were again subdued by Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi, 7). During the Captivity they appear to have spread over the country of Palestine, for on the return from Babylon they were among the foremost in hindering Nehemiah in his work of restoration, and plotted with the Ammonites and others for that end (Neh. iv, 7). Gashem, or Gashtm, one of the leaders of the opposition, was of this race (Neh. ii, 19; vii, 1). In later times the Arabians served under Timotheus in his struggle with Judas Maccabaeus, but were defeated (1 Macc. v, 89; 2 Macc. xii, 10). The Zabadeans, an Arab tribe, were routed by Jonathan, the brother and successor of Judas (1 Macc. xii, 31). The chieftain or king of the Arabians bore the name of Aretas as far back as the time of Antiochus Epiphanes and Jason the high-priest (2 Macc. v, 8; comp. 2 Cor. xi, 32). Zacchiel, the assassin of Alexander Balas (1 Macc. xi, 17), and Simalcios, who brought up Antiochus, the young son of Alexander (1 Macc. xi, 39), afterward Antiochus VI, were both Arabians. In the time of the N. T. the term appears to have been used in the same manner (Acts ii, 11).—Smith, Append. v. See ARABIA.

Arabians or Arabici, a sect of heretics who sprang up in the third century in Arabia during the reign of the Emperor Severus. They held that the soul of man dies with the body; and will be resuscitated with it in the day of resurrection. Origen contested this opinion in a council held in the year 247, called 'the council of Arabia.'—Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi, 57; Mosheim, Comm. ii, 242.

Arabic Language, the most perfectly formed, most copious in vocabulary, most extensively spoken, and most perfectly preserved of all the Semitic family of languages. It therefore presents peculiar points of interest to Biblical scholars. See SEmitic LAnguages.

I. Distribution and Dialects.—Originating in Arabia, the Arabic language spread itself, by the conquests of the Arabs [see Mohamm.,] in the sixth and seventh centuries, so extensively as to become not only prevalent in the countries adjoining Arabia, but even the religious and learned language of Irak, Cyprus, Palestine, Egypt, and Northern Africa, where, by the influence of Islamism and the supreme authority of the Koran, it has finally supplanted the original languages of those countries, and become the mother tongue of the inhabitants. It has even penetrated to the interior of Africa, as well as to islands itself, in all which Arabic words have crept into Occidental languages, not excepting the English; while the scientific researches of the mediaval Arabs caused many technical terms to be introduced into general literature. The cipher s in use among all Christian nations are but modified forms of those used in Arabic notation.

Long before the Mohammedan era, two dialects were prevalent in Arabia: 1, the Himyaric, which was spoken in Yemen, or Arabia Felix, and had its closest affinities partly with the Hebrew or Aramaean languages (q. v.), and partly with the Amharic (q. v.); 2, the Koreishic, or pure Arabic, as found in the Koran, and through its influence preserved from all vagaries and provincialisms, as the language of state and literature; in other words, the spoken differed somewhat from the written language. The Arabic had attained its flourishing period after the composition of the Koran. With the restoration of Arabic literature under the Abbasid caliphs, scientific prose took the place of the earlier poetry, and the language was philologically illustrated and protected from oblivion; but at the same time it gradually became deteriorated in respect to flexibility and variety, and circumlocutions were employed instead of idiomatic formations. Since the fourteenth or fifteenth century the Arabic language has undergone no change. There still prevailed, however, certain dialects with considerable variations; e. g. the Moorish, or that of Morocco (see Bombay, Grammat. Lingue Mauro-Arabica, Vienna, 1880), the altogether peculiars Malais (Genesius, Verzuch iib. d. malaiische Sprache, Lpz. 1810), the Melinda, Mapulian, and others. In Aleppo, Arabic is spoken in the softest and purest form.

II. Elements and Structure.—The letters of the alphabet are twenty-eight, and, as in Hebrew, they are all consonants, and read from right to left. They differ, however, entirely in form from the Heb., more closely resembling the Syriac, and their order is almost wholly different from either of those languages. The form, too, of most of them undergoes a considerable change when connected with a preceding or following letter, or when final. Several of them differ from each other only by the addition of a diacritical point (as ُ from ُ). Their peculiar power is such that many of them can hardly be accurately represented either by the Heb. or by English characters; the sound of some of them, indeed, is described as altogether foreign to European tongues. Such words as these are also often compounded in writing into ligatures. The "weak letters" (corresponding to ُ, َ, and ُ) are also used to prolong a vowel sound, or (as in Syriac) to form a diphthong. The vowel points are far more simple than in Heb., but this is fully made up, in point of difficulty to the learner, by the peculiar marks or signs frequently employed in connection with certain letters, or in certain positions, to indicate an implied, developed, prolonged, or connected sound. In ordinary writing (and printing) this whole system of vocalization is omitted. Several of the letters (called "salts") are doubled in pronunciation when initial after the article, the final letter of which is then silent (like the dogagogh forte of the Heb. after ꝏ). A similar system of prepositions and suffixes (for prepositions, pronouns, particles, etc.) exists to that in Heb., but with somewhat more variety in application. Vaw "conversive," however, disappears in the Arabic, as in the Chaldee. Numbers are expressed by peculiar characters for the digits, or the ordinary letters, as in Gr. and Heb., may be used with a numerical value. The accent is never written, but stands, in dissyllables, upon the penult, in polysyllables upon the antepenult, unless the penult has a long vowel, which then takes the tone. An extended system of prosody and versification belongs to the language, and forms a marked contrast with the simple poetry of the Hebrew.

The Arabic is rich in grammatical forms. In nouns, as well as pronouns and verbs, the dual is customary; and for the plural the noun has a large store of collective forms. The singular has three (so-called) cases, distinguished chiefly by the pointing, and corresponding to the nominative, genitive, and dative (besides forms for the accusative, and the interrogative mark of the vocative), together with the "numination"; the dual and plural only two (the nominative and objective). To the verbs (which, as in Heb., afford trilleral roots of all the words) belong thirteen forms or conjugations, somewhat answering to those of the Heb.; which either have a factitive, reciprocal, passive, and desiderative force, or else modify the ground-meaning of the root. Each of these, except the ninth and eleventh, has a passive as well as an active voice. The tenses, properly so called, are the same in number, use, and method of formation, as in Heb. Other relations of time are expressed by employing the substantival verb as an auxiliary. A nearly like series of weak or defective verbs is found as in the Heb. Apocopated, paragogic, and intensified forms of the tenses exist, almost having the force of moods. Verbal nouns are used as infinitives, and verbal adjectives as participles; or these forms may be regarded as the relational infinitives and participles of the several conjugations and voices. There are various inflections to express gender, place, instrumentalty, authorship, diminutiveness, etc. The comparative and superlative have appropriate forms.

The formation of sentences is simple, but syntactical. A tense vigor is characteristic of the language; yet the style of Arabic writers is various: in some, for example the more ancient, extremely natural and plain; in those of later date, more artificial and ornate. The language of the common people (vulgar Arabic) differs from the written in the omission of the final vowels of words, in certain ungrammatical flexions and terminations, and in the use of some archaic and local terminations. (On the pronunciation of the Palestinian Arabs, see Dr. E. Smith's appendix to the first ed. of Robinson's Biblical Researches, vol. iii.)

III. Relations to Hebrew.—"The close affinity, and consequently the incaulculable philosophical use of the Arabic with regard to the Hebrew language and its other sisters, may be considered partly as a question of theory, and partly as one of fact. 1. The following are the theoretical grounds: First, the Arabic of Yemen are derived from Kabíth, the Jotkan of Gen. x. 25, whom the Arabs make the son of Eber (Pococke's Specimens Hist. Arab. p. 39 sq.) These form the pure Arabs. Then Isma'il intermarried with a descendant of the line of Kabíth, and became the progenitor of the tribes of Hejaz. These are the initsiites or Arab. These two roots of the nation correspond with the two great dialects into which the language was once divided: that of Yemen, under the name of the Himyarites, of which all that has been shown to us (except what has been preserved in the Ethiopic) is a few inscriptions; and that of Hejaz, under that of the dialect of M'dhar, or, descending a few generations in the same line, of Khoreish—the dialect of the Koran and of all their literature. Next, Abraham sent away his sons by Keturah, and they also became the founders of the Arabic tribes. Also, the circumstance of Esau's settling in Mount Seir, where the Idumees descended from his loins, may be considered as a still later medium by which the idioms of Palestine and Arabia preserved their harmony. See ARABIA. Secondly, Olaus Celsius (in his Hist. ling. et Erudis. Arab. p. 10) cites the fact of the sons of Jacob conversing with the Ishmaelites caravan (Gen. xxxvii. 29), and that of Moses with his father-in-law the Midianite (Exod. iv. 18). To these, however, Schelling (in his Abhandl. v. d. Gebrauch. der Arab. Sprache, p. 14) objects that they are not conclusive, as the Ishmaelites, being merchants, might have acquired the idioms of the nations they traded with, and as Moses might owe an acquaintance with Arabic to his residence in Egypt. Nevertheless, one of Celsius's inferences derives considerable probability from the only instance of mutual intelligibility which Michaelis has adduced (Beitreibung der Mittel die ausge- stomberne Hebr. Sprache zu verstehen, p. 156), namely, that Gibeon was a servant of the Amelekite tribe, and in the camp of "Midian, Amalek, and all the Beoen Ke- dem," to overhear their conversation with each other, and understand what they heard (Judg. viii. 9-14). Lastly, Schultens (Orazi de Reg. Sabban. in his Opp. Minor.) labors to show that the visit of the queen of Sheba to Solomon is a strong proof of the degree of proximity in which the two dialects then stood to each other. These late traces of resemblance, moreover, are rendered more striking by the notice of the early diversity between Hebrew and Aramaic (Gen. xxxi, 47). The instance of the Ethiopian chamberlain in the 3rd verse is not based on evidence, if Heinrichs, in his note ad loc. in Nov. Text. Edit. Kopp, is right in asserting that he was reading the Septuagint version, and that Philip the deacon was a Hellenist. Thus springing from the same root as the Hebrew, and possessing such traces of affinity to a past period of their language, this dialect was further enabled, by several circumstances in the social state of the nation, to retain its native resemblance of type until the date of the earliest extant written documents. These circumstances were the almost insular position of the country, which prevented conquest or commerce from debasing the language of its inhabitants; the fact that so large a portion of the nation adhered to a mode of life in which every impression was, as it were, stereotyped, and knew no variation for ages (a cause to which we may also in part ascribe the comparatively unimportant changes which the language has undergone during the 1400 years that have elapsed), and the great and just pride which they felt in the purity of their language, which, according to Burchhardt, is still a characteristic of the Beduins (Notes on the Beduins, p. 211). These causes preserved the language from foreign influences at a time when, as the Koran and a national literature had not yet given it its full stature, such influences would have been most able to destroy its integrity. During the interval, nevertheless, the language received a peculiarly ample development in a certain direction. The limited incidents of a desert life still allowed valor, love, generosity, and satire to occupy the keen sensibilities of the chivalrous Bedouin. These feelings found their vent in ready verse and eloquent prose; and thus, when Islam first called the Arabs into the more varied activity and more perilous collision with foreign nations, which resulted from the union of their tribes under a common interest to hold the same faith and to propagate it by the sword, the language had already received all the development which it could derive from the pre-eminently creative spirit of the Koran.

2. "But great as may be the amount of resemblance between Arabic and Hebrew which a due estimate of all the theoretical grounds for the affinity and for the diversity between them would entitle us to assume, it is certain that a comparison of the actual state of both in their purest form evinces a degree of proximity which exceeds expectation. Not only may two thirds of the Hebrew roots (to take the assertion of Aurivillius, in his Dissertationes, p. 11, ed. Michaelis) be found in Arabic under the corresponding letters, and either in the same or a very kindred sense; but, if we ask for the changes of the weak and cognate languages, we are not at all disposed to discover great disproportion. To this great fundamental agreement in the vocabulary (the wonder of which is somewhat diminished by a right estimate of the immense disproportion between the two languages as to the number of roots) are to be added those resemblances which relate to the mode of inflexion and constructions. Thus, in the verb, its two wide tenses, the mode by which the rhymes of the sentences are denoted at the end in the past, and at the beginning (with the accessory distinctions at the end) in the future tense, its capability of expressing the gender in the second and third persons, and the system on which the conjugations are formed; and in the noun, the correspondence of the case, the number of words, the genders, and in all the essential characteristics of construction; the possession of the definite article; the independent and suffixed pronouns; and the same system of separable and attached particles—all these form so broad a basis of community and harmony between the two dialects as could hardly be anticipated, when we consider the many centuries which separate the earliest written extant documents of each. The diversities between them, which consist almost entirely of fuller developments on the side of the Arabic, may be explained by the slighter evidence, if Heinrichs, in his note ad loc. in Nov. Text. Edit. Kopp, is right in asserting that he was reading the Septuagint version, and that Philip the deacon was a Hellenist. Thus springing from the same root as the Hebrew, and possessing such traces of affinity to a past period of their language, this dialect was further enabled, by several circumstances in the social state of the nation, to retain its native resemblance of type until the date of the earliest extant written documents. These circumstances were the almost insular position of the country, which prevented conquest or commerce from debasing the language of its inhabitants; the fact that so large a portion of the nation adhered to a mode of life in which every impression was, as it were, stereotyped, and knew no variation for ages (a cause to which we may also in part ascribe the comparatively unimportant changes which the language has undergone during the 1400 years that have elapsed), and the great and just pride which they felt in the purity of their language, which, according to Burchhardt, is still a characteristic of the Beduins (Notes on the Beduins, p. 211). These causes preserved the language from foreign influences at a time when, as the Koran and a national literature had not yet given it its full stature, such influences would have been most able to destroy its integrity. During the interval, nevertheless, the language received a peculiarly ample development in a certain direction. The limited incidents of a desert life still allowed valor, love, generosity, and satire to occupy the keen sensibilities of the chivalrous Bedouin. These feelings found their vent in ready verse and eloquent prose; and thus, when Islam first called the Arabs into the more varied activity and more perilous collision with foreign nations, which resulted from the union of their tribes under a common interest to hold the same faith and to propagate it by the sword, the language had already received all the development which it could derive from the pre-eminently creative spirit of the Koran.

The Arabic alphabet also presents some remarkable differences from that of the Hebrew. In the formation of the full forms of the consonants, it contains all the Hebrew letters; but, in consequence of the greater extent of the nation as a source of dialectal varieties of pronunciation, and also in consequence of the more developed and refined state of the language, the value of some of them is not exactly the same, and the characters that correspond to יִרְבָּאָמָא רְבָּאָמָא are used in a double capacity, and represent both halves of those sounds which exist in the full forms. The present order of the letters also is different, although there are evidences in their numerical value when so used, and in the memorial words (given in Edward's Grammatica Critica Ling. Arab. § 67), that the arrangement was once the same in both. In a paleographical point of view, the characters have undergone many changes. The earliest form was that in the Hymynite alphabet. The first specimens of this character (which Arabic writers call al-Musnad, i.e. stilled, co'munari) were given by Seetzen in the Fundgruben der Orientis. Since then Professor Rödiger has produced others, and illustrated them in a valuable paper in the Zeitschr. f. d. Kultur und die Geschichte Aegypt. i. 382. The letters of this alphabet have a striking resemblance to those of the Ethiopic, which were derived from them. In Northern Arabia, on the other hand, and not very long before the time of Mohammed, the Syrian character called Estrangela became the model on which the Arabic alphabet called the Kufic was formed. This heavy, angular Kufic character was the one in which the early copies of the Koran were written; and it is also found in the ancient Mohammedan coinage as late as the seventh century of the Hegira. From this, at length, was derived the light, neat character called Naskhi, the one in which the Arabic was now written in most of the Mohammedan countries, which is represented in our printed books. The introduction of this character is ascribed to Ibn Muklis, who died in the year 527 of the Hegira. See Alphabet. Lastly, it is worthy of notice that all the letters of the Arabic alphabet are only consonants; that, in an unpointed text, the long vowels are denoted by the use of Alif, Waw, and Ye, as mother terms. The short vowels are not denoted at all, but are left to be supplied according to the sense in which the reader takes the words; whereas, in a pointed text, three points only suffice to represent the whole vocalization, the equivalents to which, according to the way in which the tongue is thus expressed, are α, i, u, pronounced as in Italian.

The many uses of the Arabic language in Biblical philology (exclusive of the advantages it affords for comparing the Arabic versions) may in part be gathered from the degree of its affinity to the Hebrew; and, indeed, chiefted to the Hebrew before the exile, after which period the Aramaic is the most fruitful means of illustration (Mahn, Darstellung der Lexicographie, p. 391). But there are some peculiarities in the language of the two dialects which considerably enhance the value of the aid to be derived from the Arabic. The Hebrew language of the Old Testament has preserved to us but a small fragment of literature. In the limited number of its roots (some of which even do not occur in the primary sense) and of its formations, which constitutes a part of the antiquity rudimentary mode in which some of its constructions are denoted, are contained those difficulties which cannot receive any other illustration than that which the sister dialects, and most especially the Arabic, afford. For this purpose, the resemblances between them are as useful as the diversities. The former enable us to feel certain on points which were liable to doubt; they confirm and establish an intelligent conviction that the larger portion of our knowledge of the meaning of words, and of the force of constructions in Hebrew, is on a sure foundation, because we recognise the same in a kindred form, and in a literal or interpretative sense. It affords an opportunity of testing our notions by every variety of experience. The diversities, on the other hand (according to a mode of observation very frequent in comparative anatomy), show us what exists potentially in the rudimentary state by enabling us to see how a language of the same genus has, in the farther progress of its development, felt the necessity of denoting externally those relations of formation and construction which were only dimly perceived in its antique and uncultivated form. Thus, to adduce a single illustration from the Arabic cases in the noun: The precise relation of the words soul and life, in the common phrase 'if he call my name he will not impute him his life' (Ewald's Ehrbar, Gram. § 482), is easily intelligible to one whom Arabic has familiarised with the perpetual use of the so-called accusative to denote the accessory descriptions of state. Another important advantage to be derived from the study of Arabic is the opportunity of seeing the grammar of a Syro-Arabian language explained by native scholars. Hebrew grammar has suffered much injury from the mistaken notions of men who, understanding the sense of the written document by the aid of the versions, have been exempted from obtaining any independent and critical acquaintance with the genius of the language, and have consequently not hesitated to accommodate it to the grammar of our Indo-Germanic idioms. In Arabic, however, we have a language, every branch of the philosophical study of which has been successfully cultivated by the Arabs themselves. Their own lexicographers, grammarians, and philosophers (to whom the Jews also are indebted for teaching them the grammatical treatment of Hebrew) have placed the language before us with such elaborate explanation of its entire character, that Arabic is not only by far the best understood of the Syro-Arabian dialects, but may even challenge comparison, as to the possession of able men of letters, with the Greek history (Kitto). IV. Literature. — The native works in Arabic are exceedingly numerous and varied, embracing philology, philosophy, natural science, poetry, history, etc. Many are still unpublished. A compendious view of the literary productions of Arabic authors may be found in Pierier's Universal Lexicon (Amiens, 1557 sqq.), a work which contains many of the literary authorities of N. American Encyclopaedia, s. v. "Arabic Language and Literature." Comp. also an article on the "Arabic, Language, and Literatire" by Prof. Packard, in the Am. Bib. Rep., Oct. 1836, p. 492-448. Zenker's Bibliotheca Orientalis (Lpz. 1840-62, 2 vols. 8vo) gives a full list of Arabic books hitherto issued.

European works expressly on the history and usage of the Arabic language are by the following authors: Fococke (Oxf. 1661), Celsius (in Barkey's Bibl. Brev., iv, 1-2, 8), Hyde (in his Synagt. Dia. ii, 450), Schultens (in his Orig. Heb. Lugd. B. 1761, p. 615), De Jenaisch (Vieen 1780), Eichhorn (introd. to Richardson's Arabia, Aba. H. H. 1795, 2 vols. 8vo), Hirt (Jen. 1770), Vriendt (Franq. 1782), Hezel (Jen. 1776, etc.), Id. ARABIC VERSIONS arab1ic versions of the Bible has been discovered. But, as political events at length made the Arabic language the common vehicle of instruction in the East, and that to Jews, Samaritans, and Christians, printed texts of his independent versions of single books were often undertaken, according to the zeal of private persons, or the interests of small communities. The following is a classified list of only the most important among them. (See the Einleitungen of Eichhorn, Berthold, and De Wette.)

I. Arabic versions formed immediately on the original texts.

a. Rabbi Saadah Haggagôn (usually called Saa-dûas), a native of Fayûm, and rector of the academy at Sora, who died A.D. 342, is the author of a version of the Pentateuch published in the year 2483. He was a native of the Provincia Palestina, and an inhabited the whole (Walton's Prolegomena, ed. Wrangham, ii, 546); but subsequent inquirers have not hitherto been able, with any certainty, to assign him to more than a version of the Pentateuch, of Isaiah, of Job, and of a portion of Hosea.

(1) That of the Pentateuch first appeared, in Hebrew characters, in the folio Tetraglot Pentateuch of Constantinople, in the year 1546. The exact title of this exceedingly rare book is not given by Wolf, by Masch, nor by De Rossi (it is said to be found in Adler's Bibliothek-kritische Reise, p. 221); but, according to the title of it which he has given from Rabbinical (i.e., Eichhorn's Repertorium, x, 90), Saadah's name is expressly mentioned there as the author of that Arabic version. Nearly a century later an Arabic version of the Pentateuch was printed in the Polyglot of Paris, from a MS. belonging to F. Savary de Breves; and the text thus obtained was then reprinted in the London Polyglot, with a collection of the various readings of the Constantinopolitan text, and of another MS. in the appendix. For it was admitted that Saadah was the author of the Constantinopolitan version; and the identity of that text with that of the Paris Polyglot was maintained by Breves (who nevertheless acknowledged frequent interpolations in the latter), and had been confirmed even by the collation which Hottinger had instituted to establish their diversity. The identity of all these texts was thus considered a settled point, and long remained so, until Michaelis published (in his Oriënt. Bibl. ii, 156 sq.) a copy of a Latin note which Jos. Aschari had prefixed to the very MS. of De Breves, from which the Paris Polyglot had derived its Arabic version. That note ascribed the version to "Saidus Fajumensis, Monachus Copitès;" and thus Saadah's claim to be considered the author of the version in the Polyglot was again liable to question. At length, however, Schnurrer (in his Dissert. de Pentat. Arab. Polyglot. in his Dissert. Philologico-critica) printed the Arabic preface of that MS., proved that there was no foundation for the "Monachus Copitês," and endeavored to show that Saadah was the Arabic equivalent to the Hebrew Saadah, and to re-establish the ancient opinion of the identity of the two names. The error that had been retained appear (with the exception of a feeble attempt of Tychsen to ascribe the version to Abu Sa'id in the Repertorium) to have convinced most modern critics; and, indeed, they have received much confirmation by the appearance of the version of Isaiah. This version of the Pentateuch, which is an honorable monument of Arabic scholarship, is the only one in which the Chaldee, tenth century, possesses, in the independence of its tone and in some peculiarities of interpretation, the marks of having been formed on the original text. It leans, of course, to Jewish exegetical authorities generally, but often follows the Sept., and as often appears to express itself in a cursive, rather than classical, style. Numerous examples of its mode of interpretation are given in his Crit. Sacr. p. 646 sq. It is also marked by a certain loose and paraphrastic style of rendering, which makes it more useful in an exegetical than in a critical point of view. It is difficult, however, to determine how much of this diffuseness is due to Saadah himself. For, not only is the printed text of his version more faulty in this respect than a Florentine MS., some of the readings of which Adler has given in Eichhorn's Einleit. in A. T. ii, 245, but it has suffered a systematic interpolation. A comparison of the Constantinopolitan text with that of the Polyglot shows that wherever it contains those forms of the Hebrew in which action or passion is ascribed to God—the so-called ἀνθρωποκράτια—the latter has the "Angel of God," or some other mode of evading direct expressions. These interpolations are ascribed by Eichhorn to a Samaritan source; for Morinus and Hottin, as well as theabarbaatigeu, H. E. G. Paulus (fasc. ii, Jena, 1791, 8vo). The text was copied from a MS. written in Hebrew characters, and the difficulty of always discovering the equivalent Arabic letters into which it was to be transposed has been one source of the inaccuracies observable in the text. Gesenius (in his Jewish-Latin dictionary, x, 365) gives a summary view of the characteristics of this version, and has shown the great general agreement between them and those of the version of the Pentateuch in a manner altogether confirmatory of the belief in the identity of the authors of both. (2) Saadah's version of Job exists in MS. at Oxford, where Gesenius took a copy of it (Jewish, x, 365). (4) That of Hosea is only known from the citation of ch. vi, 9, by Kimchi (Po-ucce's Theolog. Works, ii, 280).

b. The version of Joshua which is printed in the Paris and London Polyglots, the author and date of which are unknown.

c. The version of the whole passage from 1 Kings xii to 2 Kings xii, 16, inclusive, which is also found in the same Polyglot. Professor Rödiger has collected the critical evidences which prove that this whole interval is translated from the Hebrew; and ascribes the version to an unknown Damascens Jew of the early eighth century, Jerome the Deacon, about 740, and Nehemiah, from i to ix, 27, inclusive, as it exists in both Polyglots, which he asserts to be the translation of a Jew (resembling that of Joshua in style), but with subsequent interpolations by a Syrian Christian. (See his work De Origine Arabicae Librorum. V. T. Hist. Intercal. Hebraica, 1829, 8vo.)

d. The very close and almost literal version of the Pentateuch, by some Mauritanian Jew of the thirteenth century, which Erpenius published at Leyden in 1622—the so-called Araba Erpeni.

ea. The Samaritan Arabic version of Abu Said. According to the author's preface affixed to the Paris Polyglot (no. 4) this MS. of the Samaritans (the most ancient of which is given in Eichhorn's Bibl. Bibl. iii, 6, Abu Sa'd was induced to undertake it, partly by seeing the corputate state to which ignorant copyists had reduced the version then used by the Samaritans, and partly by discovering that the version which they used, under the belief that it was that of Abu'l Hasan of Tyre, was in reality none other than that of Saadah Hag-gan. His national prejudice being thus excited against an accused Jew, and the "manifest impiety" of some of his interpretations, he applied himself to this translation, and accompanied it with notes, in order to justify his renderings, to explain difficulties, and to dispel the enmity which the new version created. His version is characterized by extreme fidelity to the Samaritan text (i. e., in other words, to the Hebrew text with the differences which distinguish the Samaritan recension of it),

b. That of the Psalms (according to the Syrian recension) which is printed in Justinian's Psalt. octap. (Genoa, 1516), and in Liber Psalmar. a. Gobur. Sioniaca et Victor. Sciolae. (Rome, 1614).
c. That version of the Psalms which is in use by the Malikites, or Orthodox Oriental Christians, made by 'Abdallah ben al-Fadhl, before the twelfth century. It has been printed at Aleppo in 1766, in London in 1775, and elsewhere.
d. The version of the Psalms (according to the Egyptian recension) found in both the Polyglots.

III. Arabic versions formed on the Peshito.
a. The Polyglot version of Job, of Chronicles, and (according to Rödiger, who ascribes them to Christian translators), of the thirteen and fourteenth centuries of that of Judges, Ruth, Samuel, 1 Kings to xi, and 2 Kings xii, 17, to xxv.
b. The version of the Psalms printed at Kaffaha, near Mount Lebanon, in 1610.—Kitt. s. v.

Ar'ad (Heb. 'Arad, "w'rg, perf. flight), the name of a city and of a man.
1. (Sept. 'Arad, but in Josh. 'Adap.) An ancient city (see also upharsim from wild avene in the vicinity, comp. "w'rg, omegar) on the southernmost borders of Palestine, whose inhabitants drove back the Israelites as they attempted to penetrate from Kadesh into Canaan (Num. xxii. 1; xxxiii, 40, where the Auth. vers. has "King Arad," instead of "King of Arad"), but were eventually subdued by Joshua, along with the other southern Canaanites (Josh. x. 34; 14; also Judg. i. 16). It lay within the original limits of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xii. 14) north (north-west) of the desert of Judah (Judg. i, 16). Eusebius ("Apopai) and Jerome place Arad twenty Roman miles from Hebron, and four from Malath, in the neighborhood of the desert of Kadesh (see Reland, Palest. p. 481, 501, 579).

2. (Sept. 'Arad, r. "spilpet.) One of the "sons" of Beriah, the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 15), B.C. apparently 536.

Arad. See WILD AS.

Ar'adus ("Ardtua), a city included in the list of places to which the decree of Lucius the consul, protecting the Jews under Simon the high-priest, was addressed (1 Macc. xv, 29). It is no doubt the Ar'ad (q. v.) of Scripture (Gen. xv. 17).

Ar'ah (Heb. Ar'ak, "m'rg, prob. for ?w'rg, war-faring), the name of two men.
2. (Sept. "Opix, "spilpet.) An Israelite whose posterity (variously stated as 775 and 662 in number) returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel ( Ezra ii. 5; Neh. vii. 10). B.C. ante 586. He is probably the same with the Arph (Sept. Hprha) whose son Shechaniah was father-in-law of Tobiah (Neh. vi. 18).

Aram (Heb. Aram, אֲרָם, prob. from מִשְׁפָּה, high, q. d. highlands; Sept. and N.T. Apólyia: see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 151; Forbiger, Alle Geogr. ii. 641, Anm.), the name of a nation or country, with that of its founder and two or three other men. See also Barhîn Arâm. Comp. CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

1. ARÂMAEA (Sept. and later versions SYRIA) was the name given by the Hebrews to the tract of country lying between Phoenicia on the west, Palestine on the south, Arabia Deserta and the River Tigris on the east, and the mountain range of Taurus on the north. Many parts of this extensive territory have a much lower latitude than Palestine; but it is said to have been designated as “highlands,” because it does rise to a greater elevation than that country at most points of immediate contact, and especially on the side of Lebanon. Aram, or Aramæa, seems to have corresponded generally to the Syria (q. v.) and Mesopotamia (q. v.) of the Greeks and of M. S. v. The term “high” divisions expresly expressed in Scripture. See CANAAN.

1. ARÂM-DAMMESEK, אֲרָם-דָּמְמֶסֶק, the “Syria of Damascus” conquered by David (2 Sam. viii. 8, 9), where it denotes only the territory around Damascus; but elsewhere “Aram,” in connection with its capital “Damascus,” appears to be used in a wider sense for Syria Proper (Isa. vii. 1, 6; xlvi. 8, 9; Amos i. 5). At a later time, Aram Damascus is distinctly the district, the Aram Damascus of Pliny (v. 13). To this part of Aram the “land of Hadrack” seems to have belonged (Zech. ix. 1). See DAMASCUS.

2. ARÂM-MAAKÁH, אֲרָם-מַאֲקָה (1 Chron. xix. 6), or simply Maakah (2 Sam. x. 6, 8), which, if formed from מַאֲקָה, to “press together,” would describe a country enclosed and hemmed in by mountains, in contradistinction to the next division, Aram-beth-Rehob, i.e. Syria the wide or broad, מַאֲקָה being used in Syria for a “district of country.” Aram-Maakah was not far from the northern border of the Israelites on the east of the Jordan (comp. Deut. iii. 14, with Josh. xiii. 11, 12), but it does not follow that it was the “land of Maakah,” but it is to be corrected from the parallel passage in 1 Chron. xix. 7, “king of Maakah.” See MAACAH.

3. ARÂM-BETH-RECHOB, אֲרָם-בֵּית-רֶכֶב, the meaning of which may be that given above, but the precise locality cannot with certainty be determined (2 Sam. x. 5). Some connect it with the Beth-rechob of Judg. i. 29, which Rosenmüller identifies with the Rechob of Num. xiii. 21, situated “as men come to Hamath,” and supposes the district to be that now known as the Arakh el-Huleh at the foot of Anti-Libanus, near the sources of the Jordan. A place called Rechob is also mentioned in Judg. i. 31; Josh. xix. 28, 30, 31, 36, but it is doubtful whether it is the same. Michaels thinks of the Rechoboth-han-Nahar (lit. streets, i.e. the village or town on the River Euphrates) of Gen. xxxvii. 7; but still more improbable is the idea of Bellermann and Jahn that Aram-beth-Rechob was beyond the Tigris in Assyria. See RECHOB.

4. ARÂM-TSBHÁN, אֲרָם-תְּבוֹא, or, in the Syriac form, ARAM-TSIOBA (2 Sam. x. 6). Jewish tradition has placed Zobah at Aleppo (see the Itinerary of Benjamius Targum, whereas Syriac Targum identifies it with Nisibis, a city in the north-east of Mesopotamia. Though the latter opinion long obtained currency under the authority of Michaelis (in his Dissert. de Syria Sobatae, to be found in the Comment. Soc. Gotting. 1769), yet the former seems a much nearer approximation to the truth. We may gather from 2 Sam. viii. 9; x. 16, that the eastern part of Aram-Zobah was the Euphrates, but Nisibis was far beyond that river; besides in the title of the six.

doth Psalm (supposing it genuine) Aram-Zobah is clearly distinguished from Aram-Naharam, or Mesopotamia. It is true, indeed, that in 2 Sam. x. 16, it is said that Hadarezer, king of Zobah, brought against David “Aram-Zobah through the river,” but these were auxiliaries, and not his own subjects. The people of Zobah are uniformly spoken of as near neighbors of the Israelites, the Damascus, and other Syrians; and in one place (2 Chron. viii. 8) Hamath is called Hamath-Zobah, as pertaining to that district. We therefore conclude that Aram-Zobah extended from the Euphrates westward, perhaps as far as Aleppo. It was long the most powerful of the petty kingdoms of Aramea, its princes commonly bearing the name of Hadadezer or Hadarezer. See ZOBAY.

5. ARÂM-NAHARAÍM, אֲרָם-נַחֲרָאיִם, i.e. Aram of the Two Rivers, called in Syriac Beth-Naharin, i.e. “the land of the rivers,” following the analogy by which the Greeks formed the name Mesopotamia, “the country between the rivers.” For that Mesopotamia is here designated is admitted universally. The rivers which enclose Mesopotamia are the Euphrates on the west and the Tigris on the east; but it is doubtful whether the Aram-Naharin of Scripture embraces the whole of that tract or only the northern portion of it (Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxiii. 4; Judg. iii. 8; vi. 3, 4). Psa. iv. 13, xxvi. 6, the most of this region of Aram is also called Paddan-Aram, פַּדְדָן-אָרָם, the plain of Aram (Gen. xxv. 20; xxviii. 2, 6, 7; xxxvi. 18; xxxviii. 18, 19), and once simply Paddan (Gen. xlviii. 7), also Sedek-Aram, שדֶכָּא-אָרָם, the field of Aram (Hos. xii. 3), whence the “Cami Mesopotamie” of Quintus Curtius (iii. 2, 3, iii. 8, 1, iv. 9, 6). See PADDAN; SADAH. But that the whole of Aram-Naharin did not belong to the flat country of Mesopotamia appears from the circumstance that Balaam, who (Deut. xxiii. 4) is called a native of Aram-Naharin, says (Num. xxiii. 7) that he was brought “from Aram, out of the mountains of the east.” The Septuagint, in some of these places, has Μεσοποταμία Ἐρημός, and in others Σαρπίνια, which the Latin assigns to Syria interior. See MESOPOTAMIA. See ISRAEL.

6. But though the districts now enumerated be the only ones expressly named in the Bible as belonging to Aram, there is no doubt that many more territories were included in that extensive region, e.g. Gesarh, Hul, Arpad, Riblah, Hamath, Helbon, Betheden, Berditho, Tadmor, Hauran, Abilene, etc., though some of them may have formed part of the divisions already specified. See ISHTOB.

A native of Aram was called מָרָם, Arammi, an Aramman, used of a Syrian (2 Kings v. 20), and of a Mesopotamian (Gen. xxv. 20). The feminine was מָרָמיה, Arammiath, an Aramite (1 Chron. vii. 14), and the plural מָרָםים, Arammin (2 Kings viii. 29), once (2 Chron. xxiii. 5) in a shortened form בְּרָם, Rammin. See ARAMAN LANGUAGE. Traces of the name of the Arameans are to be found in the Arapias and Apapaios of the Greeks (Strabo, xiii. 4, 6, xvi. 4, 27; comp. Homers Iliad, ii. 783; Hesiod, Theog. 304). See ASSYRIA. The religion of the Syrians was a worship of the powers of nature (Judg. x. 6, 2; Chron. xxviii. 25; see Creuzer, Symbol. ii. 55 sq.). They were so noted for idolatry, that in the language of the latter Jews מָרָם was used as synonymous with heathenism (see the Mischau of Surenhusius, ii. 401; Onkelos on Levit. xxvii. 47), Castell, in his Lexic. Heptapoliot. e.v. 299, saw in the same the name of which prevails in Syria and Ethiopia. The Hebrew letters , , and , are so alike, that they were often mistaken by transcribers; and hence, in the Old Testament, בֵּית, Bâth, or, is sometimes found instead of בֵּית, Beth, and vice versa. Thus in 2 Kings vii. 6, 28.
ARAMEAN LANGUAGE 354 ARAMEAN LANGUAGE

according to the text, the Arameans are spoken of as possessing Elath on the Red Sea; but the Masonic mantle of the Edomites, which is also found in many manuscripts, in the Septuagint and Vulgate, and it is obviously the correct reading (Gen. 36. 23; Heb. s. v.).

It appears from the ethnographic table in the tenth chapter of Genesis (ver. 22, 23) that Aram was a son of Shem, and that his own sons were Uz, Hal, Gether, and Mehujael. It then goes on to tell us that Uz was in the north of Arabia Deserts, unless its name was derived rather from Huz, son of Nabor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxiii, 21). Hal was probably Celes-Syria; Mash, the Moons Masius north of Nialbis in Mesopotamia; Gether is unknown. Another Aram is mentioned (Gen. xxiii, 21) as the grandson of Nahor and son of Kemuel, but he is not to be thought of here. The descent of the Arameans from a son of Shem is confirmed by their language, which was one of the branches of the Semitic family, and nearly allied to the Hebrew.

Many writers, who have copied without acknowledgment the words of Calmet, maintain that the Arameans came from Kir, appealing to Amos ix, 7; but while that passage is not free from obscurity, it seems evidently to point, not to the aboriginal abode of the people, but to the country whence God would recover them when banished. The prophet had said (Amos i, 5) that the people of Aram should go into captivity to a country beyond the river Euphrates (which Aramaeans call Ararat, Altaria, I, 1, 292 sqq.; Ritter, Erdkunde, x, 16; Lengerke, Kenau, i, 218 sqq.). See SYRIA.

2. The first named son of Kemuel and grandson of Nabor (Gen. xxiii, 21), B.C. cir. 2000. He is incorrectly thought by many to have given name to Syria, hence the Sept. translates סֶפֶן. By some he is regarded as same with Ram of Job xxxii, 2.

3. The last named of the four sons of Shamer or Shomer of the tribe of Asher (1 Chron. viii, 94), B.C. cir. 1018.

4. The Greek form among the ancestors of Christ (Matt. i, 4; Luke iii, 38) of the Heb. Ram (q. v.), the son of Hezon and father of Amminadab (1 Chron. ii, 9, 10).

Aramean Language (Heb. ארמֵנִית; transliteration: Arami, Aramiak, עֲרָמִית; transliteration: 'Arma, 'Aram, 'Aramîy; transliteration: 'Armaîy; transliteration: 'Aramîy). The Aramean language is the northern and least developed branch of the Syro-Arabian family of tongues, being a general term for the whole, of which the Chaldean and Syriac dialects form the parts, these last differing very slightly, except in the forms of the characters, in which they are now written (see the Introduction to Winer's Chaldee Grammar, ed. tr. by Prof. Hackett, N. Y. 1851). See CHALDEE LANGUAGE. Its cradle was probably on the banks of the Euphrates, according to the best interpretation of Amos ix, 7; but Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Syria form what may be considered as its home sphere. Political events, however, subsequently caused it to supplant Hebrew in Palestine, and then it became the prevailing form of speech from the Tigris to the shores of the Mediterranean, and, in a transverse direction, from Armenia down to the confines of Arabia. After obtaining such a wide extension, it was finally forced, from the ninth century onward, to give way before the encroaching ascendency of Arabic; and it now only survives as a living tongue among the Syrian Christians in the neighborhood of Mosul. According to historical records which trace the migrations of the Syro-Arabians from the east to the south-west, and also according to the comparatively ruder form of the Aramaic language itself, we might suppose that it represents, even in the state in which we have it, some image of that aboriginal type of language which is also found in the two other favorable social and climatical influences, subsequently developed into fulness of sound and structure. But it is difficult for us now to discern the particular vestiges of this archaic form; for, not only did the Aramaic not work out its own development of the original elements common to the whole Syro-Arabian sisterhood of tongues, but the Semitic race was continually exposed both by neighborhood and by conquest, to harsh collision with languages of an utterly different family. Moreover, it is the only one of the three great Syro-Arabian branches which has no fruits of a purely national literature to boast of. We possess no monumental records, not even the names of the principal men or states; and it is not clear whether this branch of speech may be considered the product of the political and religious culture of the nation, and characteristic of it —as is so emphatically the case both with the Hebrews and the Arabs. The first time we see the language it is used by Jews as the vehicle of Jewish thought; and although, when we next meet it, it is employed by native authors, yet they write under the literary impulses of Christianity, and under the Greek influence on thought and language which necessarily accompanied that religion. These two modifications, which constitute and define the so-called Chaldee and Syriac dialects, are the only forms in which the northern branch is used. It is evident, from these circumstances, that up to a certain period the Aramaic language has no other history than that of its relations to Hebrew.

The earliest notice we have of its separate existence is in Gen. xxxi, 47, where Laban, in giving his own name to the memorial heap, employs words which are genuine Aramaic both in form and use. The next instance is in 2 Kings xviii, 26, where it appears that the educated Jews understood Aramaic, but that the common people did not. A striking illustration of its prevalence is found in the circumstance that it is employed as the language of official communication in the edict addressed by the Persian court to its subjects in Palestine (Ezra iv, 17). The later relations of Aramaic to Hebrew consist entirely of gradual encroachments on the part of the former. The Hebrew language was indeed always exposed, particularly in the north of Palestine, to Aramaic influences; whence the forms of the book of Judges, and their adaptation of colonists chiefly of Syrian origin, generated a mixed Aramaic and Hebrew dialect (the Samaritan) in central Palestine; and on the other the exile of the remaining two tribes exposed them to a considerable, although generally overrated, Aramaic influence in Babylonia, and the successive restorations, by placing them in contact with the Samaritans, tended still further to dispossess them of their vernacular Hebrew.

The subsequent dominion of the Seleucids, under which the Jews formed a portion of a Syrian kingdom, appears to have completed the series of events by which the Aramaic supplanted the Hebrew language entirely. The Aramaic forms in form and lexicon easily distinguish the Aramaic from the Hebrew language are the following: As to the consonants, the great diversity between the forms of the same root as it exists in both languages arises principally from the Aramaic having a tendency to avoid the sibilants. Thus, where א, ו, and ז are found in Hebrew, Aramaic often uses א, וי, and ז, and even א for ז. Letters of the same organ are also frequently interchanged, and generally so that the Aramaic, consistently with its characteristic roughness, prefers the harder sounds. The number of vowel-sounds generally is much smaller; the verb is reduced to a monosyllable, as are also the seg-ulate forms of nouns. This deprives the language of some distinct forms which are marked in Hebrew, but the number and variety of nominal formations is also in other respects much more limited. The verb pos-esses no vestige of the conjunction Niphal, but forms all its passives by the prefix פּ. The third person plural of the perfect has two forms to mark the difference of gender. The use of Vas as 'conversive' is unknown. There is an imperitive mood in all the passives. All the active conjugations (like Kal in Heb.) possess two participles, one of which has a passive signification. The participles are used with the personal pronoun to form a kind of present tense.
The classes of verbs רג and רג, and other weak forms, are almost indistinguishable. In the noun, again, a word is rendered definite by appending מ— to the end (the so-called emphatic state); but thereby the distinction between simple feminine and definite masculine is lost in the singular. The plural masculine ends in י.
The relation of genitive is most frequently expressed by the prefix י, and that of the object by the preposition ב.

The Aramean introduced and spoken in Palestine has also been, and is still, often called the Syro-Chaldesian dialect, by analogy to its mixture of feature of both the eastern and western dialects; or perhaps the distinction between the two had not yet arisen in the age of our Lord and his apostles. So long as the Jewish nation maintained its political independence in Palestine, Hebrew continued to be the common language of the country, and, so far as we can judge from what has come down to us, although not entirely pure, it was yet free from any important changes in those elements and forms by which it was distinguished from other languages.
But at the period when the Assyrian and Chaldean rulers of Babylon subdued Palestine, every thing assumed another shape. The Jews of Palestine lost with their political independence the independence of their language also, which they had till then asserted. The Babylonian Aramean dialect supplanted the Hebrew, and became by degrees the prevailing language of the people, until this in its turn was in some measure, though not entirely, supplanted by the Greek. See HELLENISM. Josephus (De Marc. 16) and the New Testament (Acts xxvi, 14) call it the Hebrew (י' Ἰουδαίας dιάλεκτος). Old as this appellation is, however, it has one important defect, namely, that it is too indefinite, and may mislead those who are unacquainted with the subject to confound the ancient Hebrew and the Aramean, which took the place of the Hebrew after the Babylonia captivity, and was the current language of Palestine in the time of Christ and the apostles, as is evinced by the occurrence of proper names of places

SUMMARY OF LITERATURE.
The following may be specified as the different Aramean dialects in detail:

1. THE EASTERN ARAMAIC OF CHALDEE.—This is not to be confused with "the language of the Chaldees" (Dan. i, 4), which was probably a Medo-Persic dialect; but is what is denominated Aramaie (אַרָמְאָי e in Dan. ii, 4. This was properly the language of Babylonia, and was acquired by the Jews during the exile, and thence they returned to their own land.
See Chaldean.

The existence of this language, as distinct from the Western Aramaic or Syriac, has been denied by many scholars of eminence (Michaelis, Abhandl. über d. Syr.
Sprache, § 2; Jahn, Aramäische Sprachkunde, § 1; Hupfeld, Theol. Stud. und Krit. 1880, p. 290 sq.; De Wette, Einf. § 20); but from the use of the language in Dan. vi, 7, it is evident that the Chaldeans knew who think that in what is called the Chaldean we have only the Syriac with an infusion of Hebrews.
The answer to this, however, is that some of the peculiarities of the Chaldean are such as are not Hebrewic, so that it cannot have derived from them itself. Thus the praemisses in the future of the third person masc. sing., and of the third pers. masc. and fem. plur. in Chaldean is כ, while in Syriac it is כ; and in Heb. the last is כ; the pron. this in Chaldean is כ, 1 while the Syr. has כ and the Heb. כ; the Chaldean has the status empliastic plur. in כ, while the Syr. has a simple כ; and to these may be added the use of peculiar words, such as כ, כ (Dan.
v. 7, 16), כככ (Exra iv. 8; v. 9, 11; vil. 18), כככ (Exra iv. 10, 11, etc.), כככ (Dan. v. 2, 29); the use of כ for כ in such words as כככ, etc. There are other differences between the Chaldean and Syriac, such as the formation from the former of olit consonants and diphthongs, the use of dageš-forte in the former and not in the latter, the formation of the infinit. in the prefixed of כ except in Peal; but as these are common to the Chaldean with the Hebrew, they cannot be used as proofs that the Chaldean was a dialect independent of the Hebrew, and not the Syriac modified by the Hebrew; and the same may be said of the difference of pronunciation between the Syriac and Chaldee, such as the prevalence of an sound in the latter where the former has the o sound, etc. It may be added, however, to the evidence above adduced, as a general remark, that when we consider the wide range of the Aramaic language from east to west, it is in the highest degree probable that the dialeicts are mingled while using it at the one extremity should differ considerably from that of those using it at the other. It may be further added that not only are the alphabetical characters of the Chaldean different from those of the Syriac, but there is a much greater prevalence of the scriptio plena in the former than in the latter. As, however, the Chaldee has come down to us only through the medium of Jewish channels, it is not probable that we have it in the pure form in which it was spoken, by the Semitic Babylonians. The rule of it of a Semitic origin, of the languages in the Greek at

The Chaldee, as we have it preserved in the Bible (Exra iv, 8, 18; vii, 12-26; Dan. ii, 4-21, 28; Jer. x, 11) and in the Targums, has been, as respects its dialectic character, divided into three grades: 1. As it appears in the Targums of Onkelos, where it possesses most of a peculiar and independent character; 2. As it appears in the biblical sections, where it is less free from Hebraisms; and 3. As it appears in the other Targums, in which, with the exception to some extent of that of Jonathan ben-Uzziel on the Prophets, the language is corrupted by the influence of the Greek

The language which is denominated in the N. T. Hebrew, and of which a few specimens thereof have given so far as can be judged from the scanty materials preserved, to have been substantially the same as the Chaldee of the Targums (Pannkhute, On the Language of Palestine in the Age of Christ and his Apostles, translated in the Bib. Repository, Apr. 1831, and reprinted in the Bib. Cabinet, vol. ii.) In this language some of the apocryphal books were written (Jerome, Pref. in Tobit, Judith, 1 Macc.), the work of Josephus on the Jewish war (De Bello Jud., part. § 1), and, as some suppose, the original Gospel by Matthew. It is designated by Jerome the Syro-Chaldaic (contr. Pelag. iii, 1), and by this name it is now commonly known. The Talmudists intend this when they speak of the Syriac or Aramaic (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Matt. v, 18). See HEBREW LANGUAGE.

The Chaldee is written in the square character in which the Hebrew now appears. This seems to have been the proper Chaldee character, and to have superseded the old Hebrew or Samaritan character after the exiles from the Babylonian and the Egyptian-Aramaic letters (see Alphabet) much more closely resemble the square character than the ancient Hebrew of the coins (Kopp, Bilder und Schriften, ii, 164 sqq.). See CHALDEE LANGUAGE.

2. THE WESTERN ARAMAIC OF SYRIAC.—Of this in its ancient form no specimens remain. As is known to us, it is the dialect of a semi-Christianized people, and its oldest document is the translation of the N. T., which was probably made in the second century. See SYRIAC VERSIONS.

As compared with the Arabic, and even with the Hebrew, Aramaic is a poor language, it is also harsher and flatter than the Hebrew. As it is now extant, it abounds in foreign adulterations, having received words successively from the Persian, the Greek, the Latin, the Arabic, and even, in its more recent state, from the Crusaders.

The Syriac of the early times is said to have had dialects. This is confirmed by what has come down to us. The Syriac of the sacred books differs from that preserved in the Palmyrene inscriptions, so far as those can be said to convey to us any information on this point, and the later Syriac of the Maronites and of the Nestorians differs considerably from that of the Persians. What Adler has called the Hieronarabian dialect is a rude and harsh dialect, full of foreign words, and more akin to the Chaldee than to the Syriac. The Syriac is written in two different characters, the Estrangelo and the Peshito. Of these the Estrangelo is the more ancient; indeed, it is more ancient apparently than the characters of the Palmyrene and the Egyptian-Aramaic inscriptions. Assennini derives the word from the Greek θραγματος, round (Bibl. Orient. iii, pt. ii, p. 378) but this does not correspond with the character itself, which is angular rather than round. The most probable derivation is from the Arabic ετραγμος, εισραγμος, writing, and υαγος, gospel. The Syriac Estrangelo is not in general use, and is simply the Estrangelo reduced to a more readable form. See SYRIAC LANGUAGE.

3. THE SAMARITANS.—This is a mixture of Aramaic and Hebrew. It is marked by frequent permutations of the gutturals. The character used is the most ancient of the Semitic characters, which the Samaritans retained when the Hebrews adopted the square characters. This is the case in the Rabbinical and the Egyptian-Aramaic inscriptions. Besides the translation of the Pentateuch (see SAMARITAN VERSIONS), only some liturgical hymns used by Castell, and cited by him as Liturgia Damascenorum, and the poems collected and edited by Gesenius (Carmina Samaritana) in the first fasciculus of his Aevocologiae

4. THE SABIAN OF NAZARENE.—This is the language of a sect on the banks of the Euphrates and Tigris who took to themselves (at least in part) the name of Sabians or Jews (see Jews) or Nazareans, but were called Sabians by the Arabians. Some of the Sabian writings are extant in the libraries at Paris and Oxford. Their great book (aveled to Adam), the Liber Adami, has been edited with a Latin translation by Matthias Norberg, Prof. at Lund, who died in 1826, under the title Codex Nazaraeus, Liber Adami Appellatus (3 parts 4to, Lund, 1815-16); this was followed by a Latin translation (1816) and an English translation (1817) on the book by the same name. The language is a mixture of Syriac and Chaldee; it uses great freedom with the gutturals, and indulges in frequent corruptions of other letters; and in general is harsh and irregular, with many grammatical improprieties, and a large infusion of Persian words. The MSS. are written in a peculiar character, the letters are formed like those of the Nestorian Syriac, and the vowels are inserted as letters in the text.

5. THE PALMYRENE.—On the ruins of the ancient city of Palmyra or Tadmor have been found many inscriptions, of which a great part are bilingual, Greek, and Aramaic. A collection of these was made by Robert Wood, and published by him in a work entitled The Ruins of Palmyra (Lond. 1758); they were soon afterward made the object of learned examination by Barthélemy at Paris and Swinton at Oxford, especially the latter (Explication of the Inscriptions in the Palmyrene Language, in the 40th vol. of the Philosophical Transactions, p. 690-706). These inscriptions are of the first, second, and third centuries, and of little intrinsic importance. The language closely resembles the Syriac, and is written in a character akin to the square character, but a little inclining to a curved mode of writing.

6. THE EGYPTO-ARAMAIC.—This is found on some ancient Egyptian monuments, proceeding probably from a tribe that came from Palestine or Mesopotamia. Among these is the famous Carpenters inscription, so-called from its present location in the south of France: this, Gesenius thinks, is the production of a Syriac from the Seleucid empire residing in Egypt; but this is less probable than that it is the production of a very few inclining to the Egyptian worship. Some MSS. on papyrus also belong to this head (see Gesenius, Monumenta Phoen., i, 226-245). The language is Ara-A’ran (Heb. ‘Arūn, אָרֻן, wild goat; Sept. Αριή, v. r. Ἀριή, Ἀρίη), the second named of the two sons of Dishan, and grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 28; 1 Chron. i. 42). B.C. cir. 1968.

Ararat (Heb. Ararat, אָרָרָת, accord. to Bohlen and Benfey from Sanscrit argaratva, sacred land; Sept. Αραράτ; v. r. in 2 Kings xix, 37, Ἀραρᾶτ; in Isa. xxxvii, 38, Ἀρανία; v. r. in Jer. ii, 27, Ἀραρᾶτ, Ἀρασίς, etc.), occurs nowhere in Scripture as the name of a mountain, but only as the name of a country, upon which the “mountains” of which the ark rested during the subsidence of the flood (Gen. viii. 4). In 2 Kings xix, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 38 (in both which it is rendered “Armenia”), it is spoken of as the country whither the sons of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, fled, after they had murdered their father. The apocryphal book of Tobit (i, 21) says it was τὰ ὄρη Ἀραμαῖα ἀραράτου, “to the mountains of Ararat.” This points to a territory which did not form part of the immediate dominion of Assyria, and yet might not be far off from it. The description is quite applicable to Armenia, and the tradition of that country bears that Sennacherib’s sons were kindly received by King Parowy, who allotted them portions of land bordering on Assyria, and that in course of time their posterity also established an independent kingdom, called Vaspurakan (Advall’s Tr. of Chamich’s Hist. of Armenia, 1, 38, 56). The only other Scripture text where the word occurs (Jer. ii, 27) mentions Ararat, along with Minni and Aashkenaz, as kingdoms summoned to arm themselves against Babylon. In the parallel place in Isa. xiii, 24, the invaders of Babylonia are described as “coming from the mountains;” and if by Minni we understand the Minus in Armenia, mentioned by Nicholas of Damascus (Josephus, Ant. i. 5, 6), and by Aashkenaz some country on the Euxine Sea, which may have had its original name, Azenos, from Aashkenaz, a son of Gomer, the progenitor of the Cimmerians (Gen. x, 2, 8), then we arrive at the same conclusion, viz. that Ararat was a mountainous region north of Assyria, and in all probability in Armenia. In Ezek. xxxviii, 6, we find Togarmah, another part of Armenia, connected with Gomer, and in Ezek. xxvii, 14, with Meshach and Tubal, all tribes of the north. With this agree the traditions of the Jewish and Christian churches (Josephus, Ant. i. 1, 3, 6; Euseb. Prep. Eclog. ix. 12, 19; Jerome on Isa. i. 1, c.), and likewise the accounts of the native Armenian writers, who inform us that Ararad was the name of one of the ancient provinces of their country, supposed to correspond to the modern pachalics of Kars and Bayazid, and part of Kurdistan. According to the tradition preserved in Moses of Chorene (in his Hist. Armen. p. 361, ed. Whiston, Lond. 1785), the name of Ararat was derived from Aral, the eighth of the native princes, who was killed in a battle with the Babylonians about B.C. 1750; in memory of which the whole province was called Aravj-arat, i.e. the ruin of Aral. (See Michaelis, Synops. i, 180 sq.; Tuch, Gen. p. 170 sq.) Rev. E. Smith, who made an exploring tour in Persia and Armenia in 1859 and 1861, remarks in the Biblical Repository, 1862, p. 205: “The name of Ararat occurs but twice in the Old Testament (Gen. viii. 1, and Jer. ii, 27), and both times as the name of a country, which in the last passage is said to have a king. It is well known that this was the name of one of the fifteen provinces of Armenia. It was situated nearly in the centre of the kingdom; was very extensive, reaching from a point above seven or eight miles east of the modern Erzroom, to within thirty or forty miles of Nakhchewan; yielded to none in fertility, being watered from one extremity to the other by the Araxes, which divided it into two nearly equal parts; and contained some eight or ten cities, which were successively the residences of the kings, princes, or governors of Armenia from the commencement of its political existence, about 2000 years B.C. according to Armenian tradition, until the extinction of the Paganian dynasty, about the middle of the eleventh century; with the exception of about 280 years at the commencement of the Asrian dynasty, when Nisibis and Oria were the capitals. It is therefore not unnatural that this name should be substituted for that of the whole kingdom, and thus become known to foreign nations, and that the king of Armenia should be called the king of Ararat.” See Cuneiform Inscriptions.

But though it may be concluded with tolerable certainty that the land which has thus become intimately connected with the name Ararat is to be identified with

a portion of Armenia, we possess no historical data for fixing on any one mountain in that country as the resting-place of the ark. It probably grounded on some of the lower peaks of the chain of mountains enclosing the Ararat basin, and the aspect of these is calculated from the nature of the circumstances, and does not conflict with the language of the text when properly weighed. See Deluge. If our supposition be correct, then, for any thing that appears to the contrary, the ark did not touch the earth until the waters were abated to a level with the lower valleys or plains, and, consequently, did not rise above the barometer mark for a day or two. An elevation of 16,000 or 17,000 feet, never till of late deemed accessible to human footsteps, and their safe descent from which, along with all the "living creatures" committed to their care, would have been a greater miracle than their deliverance from the flood. By this explanation also we obviate the geological objection against the mountain, now called Ararat, having been submerged, which would imply a universal deluge, whereas by the "mountains of Ararat" may be understood some lower chain in Armenia, whose height was not incompatible with the notion of a great unflooded region above it. See also on the question: If the descendants of Noah settled near the resting-place of the ark in Armenia, how could they be said to approach the plain of Shinar (Gen. xi, 2), or Babylon, from the East? For, as we read the narrative, the precise resting-place of the ark is nowhere mentioned; and though for a time stationary "there upon the mountains of Ararat, it may, before the final subsidence of the waters, have been carried considerably to the east of them. (See Raumer, in the Hertha, 1829, xliii, 333 sq.; comp. Hoff, Gesch. d. Erd-} derfläche, Gotha, 1884, iii, 589.) See Ark.

The ancients, however, attached a peculiar sacredness to the tops of high mountains, and hence the belief was early propagated that the ark must have rested on some such lofty eminence. The earliest tradition fixed on one of the chain of mountains which separate Armenia from the south from Mesopotamia, and which, as they also enclose Kurdistan, the land of the Kurds, obtained the name of the Kardu or Carduchian range, corrupted into Cordian and Cordyean. This opinion prevailed among the Chaldeans, if we may rely on the testimony of Berosus as quoted by Josephus (Ant. i, 3, 6): "It is said there is still some part of this ship in Armenia, at the mountain of the Cordyean people, and that people carry off pieces of the bitumen, which they call the mountain of Noah's animal. (See Orelli, Suppl. not. ad Nicol. Damasc. p. 88; Rit- ter, Erdh. x, 355 sq.) The same is reported by Aby- denus (in Euseb. Prep. Evang. ix, 4), who says they employed the wood of the vessel against diseases. Hence they are prepared to find the tradition adopted by the Chaldean paraphrases, as well as by the Syriac translators and commentators, and all the Syrian churches. In the three texts where "Ararat" occurs, the Targum of Onkelos has נַבָּה, Kardu; and, according to Buxtorf, the term "Kardyan" was in Chaldean synonymous with "Armenian." At Gen. viii, 4, the Arabic of Erpenius has Ḡebel el-Kārid (the Mount of Kardar) which is likewise found in the "Book of Adam" of the Zabams. For other proofs that this was the prevalent opinion among the Eastern Churches, the reader may consult Euchianus (An- nals) and Epiphanius (Haeres. 18). It was no doubt from this source that it was borrowed by Mohammed, who in his Koran (xi, 46) says: "The ark rested on the mountains of the Cardian, probably a corruption of Glori, i. e. Cordian (the designation given to the entire range), but afterward applied to the special locality where the ark was supposed to have rested. This is on a mountain a little to the east of Jezirah dûn Omar (the ancient Bezaible) on the Tigris. At the foot of the mountain there was a village called Kargh Tchamin, i. e. the Village of the Eighty—that being the number (and not eight) saved from the flood according to the Mohammedan belief. (Abulfeda, Anteislam. p. 17.) The historian Elmacin mentions that the Emperor Heracleus went up, and visited this place, and hence the notion that the neighborhood, was once a famous Nestorian monastery—"the Monastery of the Ark," destroyed by lightning in A.D. 776 (see Assemani, Bibli. Or. ii, 118). The credulous Jew, Benjamin of Tudela, says that a mosque was built at Mount Judi, "of the remains of the ark," by the Caliph Omar. Kindel, in describing this journey, says: "A distance of 14 li to the Tigris to Nahr Van, says (Trav. p. 453). "We had a chain of mountains running parallel with the road on the left hand. This range is called the Judah Dag (i. e. mountain) by the Turks, and one of the inhabitants of Nahr Van assured me that he had frequently seen the remains of Noah's ark on a lofty peak behind that village." (Comp. Rich's Kurdistan, ii, 124.) A French savant, Eugenio Bord, who visited those parts, says the Mohammedan dervishes still maintain here a perpetually burning lamp in an oratory (Revue Franaise, vol. xii; or the Semeur of October 2, 1889). The selection of Mount Ararat as the resting-place of the ark was, in the eyes of the Nestorians, the most important of the Mesopotamian plain; for it presents an apparently insurmountable barrier on that side, hemming in the valley of the Tigris with abrupt declivities so closely that only during the summer months is any passage afforded between the mountain and river (Ainsworth's Travels in the Ten Thousand, p. 154). Just as soon as the Armenians discovered the effect that a mountain named Baris, beyond Min- yas, was the spot. This has been identified with Varaz, a mountain mentioned by St. Martin (Mem. sur l'Ar- menie, i, 265) as rising to the north of Lake Van; but the only important mountain in the position indicated is described by recent travellers under the name Sezela- Tshag; and we are therefore inclined to accept the emendation of Schroeder, who proposes to read Misic, the indigenous name of Mount Ararat, for Böpec. After the disappearance of the Nestorian monastery, the tradition which fixed the site of the ark on Mount Judi appears to have been superseded, or at least chiefly confined to Mohammedans, and gave place (at least among the Christians of the West) to that which now obtains, and according to which the ark rested on a great mountain in the north of Armenia—to which (so strongly did the idea take hold of the popular belief) was, in course of time, given the very name of Ararat, as if no one had thought of the name of the mountain of Ararat of Scripture. We have seen, however, that in the Bible Ararat is nowhere the name of a mountain, and by the native Armenians the mountain in question was never so designated; it is by them called Micity, and by the Turks Aykesur-tabagh, i. e. "The Heavy or Great Mountain" (see Kämper, Armenia, ii, 428 sq.). The I'trape and Jerome, indeed, render Ararat by "Armenia," but they do not particularize any one mountain. Still there is no doubt of the antiquity of the tradition of this being (as it is sometimes termed) the "Mother of the World." The Persians call it Kukh-e-Yak, "Noah's Mountain." The Armenian name of the mountain, its city and district of Nakhchevan (which lies east of it) is said to be "first place of descent or lodging," being regarded as the place where Noah resided after descending from the mount. It is mentioned by Josephus (Ant. i, 3, 5) under a Greek name similar import, viz. . Aυρατηρίου "(meaning)." It is described by Pococke (Poly. Arm. ii, 184) as Narwana (Nafstown, see Chesney, Exped. to the Euphrat, i, 145).

25° west of Erivan (Researches in Armenia, p. 267); and remark, in describing it before the recent earthquake, that in no part of the world had they seen any mountain whose imposing appearance could please half so powerfully as this a claim to the honor of having once been the stepping-stone between the old world and Asia. (See also p. 314.) But the writer, observing if the highest mountains of the world had been piled upon each other to form this one sublime immensity of earth, and rocks, and snow. The icy peaks of its double heads rose majestically into the clear and cloudless heavens; the sun blazed bright upon them, and the acrid vapor of countless ice, spewed forth and arched over them, seemed to be the rainbow of life, where in its dazzling rays it came in contact with the pure, fresh air. My eye, not able to rest for any length of time upon the blinding glory of its summits, wandered down the apparently interminable sides, till I could no longer trace their vast lines in the mists of the horizon, when an irresistible impulse immediately carrying my eye upward again reflected my gaze upon the awful glare of Ararat! (Truev. i. 182 sq.; ii. 636 sq.)

5 To the same effect Morier writes: "Nothing can be more beautiful than its shape, more awful than its height. All the surrounding mountains sink into insignificance when compared to it. It is perfect in all its parts; no hard rugged feature, no unnatural prominence, but all in having the purest form and grace, suitable to the nature of the whole! (Journey, c. xvi; Second Journey, p. 312.) Several attempts had been made to reach the top of Ararat, but few persons had got beyond the limit of perpetual snow. The French traveller Tournefort, in the year 1700, long persevered in the face of many difficulties, but was foiled in the end. About a century later the Pacha of Bayazid undertook the ascent with no better success. The honor was reserved to a German, Dr. Parrot, in the employment of Russia, who (in his Reise zum Ararat, Berl. 1853; translated by W. T. Cooley, Lond. and N. Y.) gives the following particulars: "The summit of the Great Ararat is in 39° 42' north lat., and 61° 55' east long. from Ferro. Its perpendicular height is 16,254 Paris feet above the level of the sea, and 18,850 above the plain of the Araxes. The Little Ararat is 12,284 Paris feet above the sea, and 9361 above the plain of the Araxes. And as the ascent, which had failed, the second was successful, and on the 27th of September (O. S.), 1829, they stood on the summit of Mount Ararat. It was a slightly convex, almost circular platform, about 200 Paris feet in diameter, composed of eternal ice, unbroken by a rock or stone; on account of the great distances, nothing could be seen down to the horizon. Observations made by Parrot have been fully confirmed by another Russian traveller, H. Abich, who, with six companions, reached the top of the Great Ararat without difficulty, July 29, 1846. He reports that, from the valley between the two peaks, nearly 8000 feet above the level of the sea, the ascent can with facility be accomplished. It would appear even that the ascent is easier than that of Mont Blanc; and the best period for the enterprise is the end of July or beginning of August, when there is annually a period of atmospheric quiet, and a clear unclouded sky. Another Russian, M. Antonovoff, has also ascended to the top; and an Englishman, named Seymore, accompanied by a guide named Orvione, and escorted by four Cossacks and three Armenians, claims likewise to have ascended the mountain, and to have reached the level summit of the highest peak on the 12th September, 1846. (See extract from a letter in the Cevenese, a St. Petersburg Journal, Adven- tures and Discoveries in the Central Asia, p. 314.) That Mount Ararat has a volcanic origin is evidenced by the immense masses of lava, cinders, and pumphy, with which the middle region is covered; a deep cleft on its northern side has been regarded as the site of its crater, and this cleft has been the scene of a terrible catastrophe. An earthquake, which in a few moments changed the entire aspect of the country, commenced on July 3, 1840, and continued, at intervals, until the 1st of September. Traces of fissures and land-slips have been left on the surface of the earth, which the eye of the scientific observer will recognise after many ages. Clouds of reddish smoke and a strong smell of sulphur, with a peculiar odor, immediately followed the earthquake, seem to indicate that the volcanic powers of the mountain are not altogether dormant. The destruc- tion of houses and other property in a wide tract of country around was very great; fortunately, the earthquake having happened during the day, the loss of life was not so great as it might have been. The scene of greatest devastation was in the narrow valley of Arziv, where the masses of rock, ice, and snow, detached from the summit of Ararat and its lateral points, were thrown at one single bound from a height of 6000 feet to the bottom of the valley, where they lay scattered over an extent of several miles. (See Major Voskoboin- koff's Report, in the Advenrues for 1841, p. 157.) Par- rot describes the secondary summit about 400 yards distant from the highest point, and on the gentle de- pression which connects the two eminences he sur- mises that the ark rested (Journey to Ararat, p. 179). The region immediately below the limits of perpetual snow is a great desert; the vegetation seems to be univariate. Wagner (Reise, p. 168) describes the silence and solitude that reign there as quite overpowering. Arguni, the only village known to have been built on its slopes, was the spot where, according to tradition, Noah planted his vineyard. Lower down, in the plain of Araxes, is Nakhchevan, where the patriarch is reputed to have been buried (see Am. E. B. Rep. April, 1886, p. 390-415).—Kitto, s. v. See Noah.

2. Returning to the broader significations we have assigned to the term "mountains of Ararat," as co-extensive with the Armenian plateau from the base of Ararat in the north to the range of Kurdistan in the south, we notice the following characters of that region as illustrating the Bible narrative: (1.) Its elevation. It rises as a rocky islet out of a sea of plain to a height of from 6000 to 7000 feet above the level of the sea, presenting a surface of extensive plains, whence, as from a fresh base, spring important streams and lakes, and about them has a general parallel direction from east to west, and connected with each other by transverse ridges of moderate height. (2.) Its geographical position. The Armenian plateau stands equidistant from the Euxine and the Caspian seas on the north, and between the Persian Gulf and the Mediterranean on the south, and with the first it is connected by the Accampia, with the last by the Araxes, with the third by the Tigris and Euphrates, the latter of which also serves as an outlet toward the countries on the Mediterranean coast. These seas were the high roads of primitive colonization, and the plains watered by these rivers were the seats of the most powerful nations of antiquity, the Assyrians, the Babylonians, the Medes, and the Chaldeans. Viewed with reference to the dispersion of the nations, Armenia is the true centre (μαθηματικός) of the world; and it is a significant fact that at the present day Ararat is the great boundary-stone between the empires of Russia, Turkey and Persia. (8.) Physical formation. The Armenian plateau is the result of volcanic agencies: the plains as well as the mountains supply evidence of this. Armenia, however, differs materially from other regions of similar geological formation, as, for instance, the neighboring range of Caucasus, insomuch as it does not rise to a sharp, well-defined central cone, nor is it one mass of the same age. The region is divided and separated by a graduated series of subordinate ranges. Wagner (Reise, p. 265) attributes this peculiarity to the longer period during which the volcanic powers were at work, and the room afforded for the expansion of the molten masses into the surrounding districts. The result of this expansion is that Armenia is far more accessible, both from without and within its own limits, than other districts of similar elevation: the passes, though high, are comparatively easy, and there is no district which is shut out from communication with its neighbors. The fall of the ground in the centre of the plateau is not decided in any direction, as is demonstrated by the early courses of the rivers—the Araxes, which flows into the Caspian, rising westward of either branch of the Euphrates, and taking at first a northerly direction—the Euphrates, which flows to the south, rising northward of the Araxes, and taking a westerly direction.

(4.) The climate is severe. Winter lasts from October to May, and is succeeded by a brief spring and a summer of intense heat. The contrast between the plateau and the adjacent countries is striking: in April, when the Mesopotamian plains in Asia are yet covered with snow, and on the Euxine shore the azaleas and rhododendron are in bloom, the Armenian plains are still covered with snow; and in the early part of September it freezes keenly at night.

(5.) The vegetation is more varied and productive than the climate would lead us to expect. Trees are not found in the western part of the plateau, but grow luxuriantly, and furnishes abundant pasture during the summer months to the flocks of the nomad Kurds. Wheat and barley ripen at far higher altitudes than on the Alps and the Pyrenees: the volcanic nature of the soil, the abundance of water, and the extreme heat of the sun are concomitants of the harvest, which is reaped with wonderful speed. At Erzrum, more than 6000 feet above the level of the sea, the crops appear above ground in the middle of June, and are ready for the sickle before the end of August (Wagner, p. 255). The vine ripens at about 5000 feet, while in Europe its limit, even south of the Alps, is about 2500 feet. See ARMENIA.

The general result of these observations as bearing upon the Biblical narrative would be to show that, while the elevation of the Armenian plateau constituted it the natural resting-place of the ark after the Deluge, its geographical position and its physical character secured an impartial distribution of the families of mankind to the various quarters of the world. The climate furnished a powerful inducement to seek the more tempting regions on all sides of it. At the same time, the character of the vegetation was remarkably adapted to the nomad state in which we may conceive the early generations of Noah’s descendants to have lived.—Smith, a. v. See ECHINOCHYCE.

Aratna (Arapoq), the author of two astronomical poems in Greek, and 2 B.C. 270, fragments and Latin translations of which are alone extant (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iv. 87; Schaubach, Gesch, d. græch. Astronomie, p. 215; Delambre, Hist. d’l’Astron. Ancienne). (For an account of his works and their editions, see Smith’s Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.) From the opening of one of these poems, entitled Phenomena (Σημεία), the Apostle Paul is thought to have made the quotation indicated in his speech at Athens (Acts xvii. 28), “As certain also of your own poets have said, ‘For we are also his offspring,’ ” since the words precisely agree (Τόι γάρ καὶ γάρ γεγονέναι εἰμί). Others, however (see Kühnol, Comment. in loc.), adduce similar sentiments from Cleanthes (εἰ τά οὖν γεγονότα εἰμί, Hymn. in Jocem, 5) and Pindar (in Ίων γέγονεν, Nm. 5).

A few brief and casual quotations of this kind have been made the foundation of the hasty conclusion that Paul was well read in classic poetry; but this, from his Jewish education, is extremely improbable. See Paul. In this, the most direct instance, he appears rather to refer to the general sentiment of the Greek mythology, of which the passages adduced (alluded to in a general way by Paul, as if taken second-hand and by recollection merely) are the frequent expression (note the plur. “poets”). See Schmid, De Arato (Jen. 1691).

Aravan (Heb. Aramaw, Aramat, 2 Sam. xxiv. 16-24 [and 16 1116 c, ver. 216 1116 c, perhaps another form of Orman; Sept. ‘Ovva) or Ornan (Heb. Ornan), הָרַון, wimbe; 1 Chron. xxii. 2; 2 Chron. iii. 1; Sept. μηδέν), a man of the Jebusite nation, which possessed Jerusalem before it was taken by the Israelites. The angel of pestilence, sent to punish King David for his presumptuous vanity in taking a census of the people, was stayed in the work of death near a plot of ground belonging to this person, used as a threshing-floor, and situated on Mount Moriah; and when he understood it was required for the site of the Temple, he liberally offered the ground of David as a free gift; but the king insisted on paying the full value for it (50 shekels of silver according to 2 Sam. xxiv. 18, but 600 shekels of gold according to 1 Chron. xxii. 18). B.C. cir. 1017. See David. Josephus, who calls him Ormona (Ormona, Antiq. viii, 14, 4), adds that he was a wealthy man among the Jebusites, and states that the site was chosen in the east of the land of Canaan. See MAHIAH.

Arba (Heb. Arba, אִרְבָּה, four, but see Simonis, Onom. V. T. p. 312 sqq.; Sept. Apoq Esr.v. r. Apoq Esr), a giant, father of Anak (q. v.), from whom Hebron (q. v.) derived its early name of KIJIATH-ARBA, i.e. city of Arba (Josh. xiv. 15; xv. 13; xxii. 11). B.C. ante 1618. See Giant.

Arbatith (Heb. Abbatith, אֶבָּתִית, Sept. Apoq Esr, but in Chron. 2Pepi22vii. r. Apoq Esr), an epitaph of Abiel, one of David’s warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chr. xi. 22), probably as an inhabitant of ARASH (Josh. xvi. 51; xxii. 31).

Arbatâtsis (only in the dat. plur. Apóbatos, with many var. readings, see Grimm, Handb. in loc.), a city or region named in connection with Galilee as being despoiled by Simon Maccabaeus (1 Mac. 23, 25). Ewald (Jr. Gesch. iv. 359 note) thinks (from the Syriac reading Arbat-bed that the district now called Arad el-Hab, north of the sea of Galilee, is intended, and others have conjectured the Arabah, Arabia, etc.; but the most probable supposition is that of Roland (Pa. p. 192), that the name is a corruption (comp. 2 Mac. 8, 9) of that of the toponymy called by Josephus (War, iii, 4, 6 and 4) ACRABATIEN (q. v.).

Arbâh. See LOUST.

Arbel. See BETH-ARBEL.

Arbelâ (at Ahabh), mentioned in 1 Mac. ii. 2, as afflicting the situation of Masathoth, a place besieged and taken by Bacchides and Alcimus at the opening of the campaign in which Judas Maccabaeus was killed. According to Josephus (Antiq. xii. 11, 11) this was at Arbel of Galilee (in Ahabh), a place which he elsewhere states to be near Sephoris, on the lake of Gennesaret, and remarkable for certain impregnable caves, the resort of robbers and insurgents, and the scene of more than one desperate encounter (comp. Antiq. xiv. 15, 4 and 5; War, i, 16, 2, 3; iv, 20, 6; Life, 37). These topographical requirements are fully met by the existing Irbid, a site with a few ruins, west of Mejdal, on the south-east side of the Wadi el Daab, in a small plain at the foot of the hill of Kurun Idratt. The caverns are in the opposite face of the ravine, and bear the name of Kulun Ibn Maim (Robinson, ii, 398; Burtch. 331; Huy. 91). As to the change in the name, the Arbel of Alexander the Great is called Irbul by the Arabic historians (Robinson, ii, 331). Moreover, the present Irbul is undoubtedly mentioned in the Talmud as Arbel (see Schwarts, Palest., 189; Reland, Palest., 328; Robinson, iii, 345 note). There seems, therefore, no reason to doubt the soundness of this identification (first sug-
ARBELA

Arbela (Argyropolis), another city mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) as situated beyond Jordan, near Pella; doubtless the present 'Irribi, a large village with extensive ruins near Wady Shelekh, visited by several travellers (Ritter, Erdk. xvi, 1864 sq.).

Ar'bita (Heb. Arb., אֲרֵבָּת, Sept. 'Aḇīṯ), an epitaph of 'Ararai or Naarai, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii, 35; comp. 1 Chron. xi, 37), probably being a native of the town Arab (Josh. xvi, 59). In the list of Chronicles it is given as Ben-'Ezri or, by a change in letters not unfrequently occurring. See Ezerai. (See Kennicott, Dissert. on 2 Sam. xxiii, p. 210.)

Arbo'nai (Gr. Ἀρβοναίς, Ἀρβοναίας v. r. Ἀρβοναών, see Fritzsche, Comment. in loc.), a stream, as it would seem, in Mesopotamia, having several considerable cities on its banks which were destroyed by Holophernes (Judith ii, 34). Some regard it as being the same with the Habor (q. v.) or Chaboras of Scripture (2 Kings xvii, 16). But it is probably a false rendering of a bungling translator for the original Heb. יְבַרְוָא, beyond the river, i.e. Euphrates (see Movers, in the Bonner Zeitschr. xiii, 23).

Arbrissel or Arbriselles, Robert D', the founder of the order of Fontevrault, was born in 1047 at Arbrissel or Arbrresses, a village in the diocese of Rennes, and died Feb. 25, 1117. In 1085 he was appointed vicar-general of the bishop of Rennes, in which diocese he labored successfully for the restoration of church discipline. In 1089 he became professor of theology at Angers; but after two years he retired to the forest of Craon, on the frontier of Anjou and Breteagne. There soon a number of hermits gathered around him, and Robert founded the first establishment of the order of Fontevrault, the celebrated abbey De Bota. Robert himself was appointed its first prior at the Council of Tours in 1056, where he preached the same year. The number of the followers of Robert rapidly increased, and he established several monasteries; the most important was the celebrated abbey of Fontevrault, near Poitiers, after which the entire order was named. The abbey consisted of two different monasteries, one for men and one for women, which together counted soon more than 2000 in number. According to the letters of Maribod, bishop of Rennes (cited by P. de la Mainferme, Clipes, t. i, p. 60), and Geoffroy, abbot of Vendome (Recueil des Lettres de l'Abbé Geoffroy, publiées par M. le P. Sirmond in 1610), Robert, to crushify his flesh, had recourse to the most immoral kind of mortification; he used, for instance, to sleep in the cells of the nuns. These facts, denied or excused by some, and affirmed or confessed by others, were the subject of the most lively controversy among the Roman Catholic theologians of France in the 17th and 18th centuries. A monk of Fontevrault, P. de la Mainferme, wrote a large work, entitled Clipes successor ordinis Fontebudolnatis, in defense of the founder of the order. Robert was present at the Council of Beaucaire and Paris, at the latter of which he prevailed upon Bertrado to separate from King Philip. He died in the monastery of Oran. His remains were, in 1638, placed in a magnificient marble tomb, made by order of Louise of Bourbon, abbess of Fontevrault.—Mainferme, Dissertationes in Epitola contra Robertum de Arbrisello (Saumur, 1682); Horst, Nouv. Biographie Générale, iii, 23.

Arbuthnot, Alexander, a Scotch divine, was born in 1658. He was educated in the University of St. Andrew's, and then went to France and prosecuted his studies under Cujas. Being declared licentiate of law, he came home in 1666 to follow that profession; but he soon left the bar for the pulpit. In 1668 he was made principal of the University of Aberdeen. He took an active part in the various controversies of the time, and was employed in the preparation of the "Book of Discipline." In 1688 he received a presentation to one of the churches of St. Andrew's, but was prohibited by a royal warrant, or "horning," from accepting it. The cause of the royal indignation against him was not exactly known; but while the controversy as to his appointment was pending he died, October 10, 1689. He left behind him the character of a moderate and honest man, a man of learning, and a poet.—McCrie's Life of Melville, i, 114; Biological Britannica.

Arcade. In church architecture, a series of arches supported by pillars or shafts, whether belonging to the construction or used in relieving large surfaces of masonry; the present observations will be confined to the latter, the series ornamental arcades which were introduced early in the Norman style, and were used very largely to its close, the whole base story of exterior and interior alike, and the upper portions of towers and high walls, being often quite covered with them. They were either of simple or of intersecting arches; it is needless to say that the latter are the most elaborate in work, and the most ornamental; they are accordingly reserved in general for the richer portions of the fabric. There is, moreover, another, and perhaps more effective way of ornamenting the arcades, by placing an arcade within and behind another, so that the wall is doubly recessed, and the play of light and shadow greatly increased. The decorations of the transitional, until very late in the style, are so nearly those of the Norman, that we need not particularize the semi-Norman arcade. In the next style the simple arcade is, of course, most frequent. This, like the Norman, often covers very large surfaces. Foil arches are often introduced at this period, and greatly vary the effect. The reduplication of arcades is now managed differently from the former style. Two arcades, perfect in all their parts, are set on the one behind the other, but the shaft of the outer is opposite to the arch of the inner series, the outer series is also more lofty in its proportions, and the two are often of differently constructed arches, as at Lincoln, where the outer series is of trefoil, the inner of simple arches, or rice verris, the two always being different. The effect of this is extremely beautiful. But the most ex-quise arches are those of the Geometrical period, where each arch is often surmounted by a crocketed pediment, and the higher efforts of sculpture are tasked for their enrichment, as in the glorious chaîne of stonework, of the south wall, and Yew, etc., however, usually confined to the interior. In the Decorated period partially, and in the Perpendicular entirely, the arcade gave place to panelling, greatly to the loss of effect, for no delicacy or intricacy of pattern can compensate for the bright light and deep shadows of the arcades of the early English arcades (Hook, Church Dictionary, s. v.).

Arcæ Custodes, keepers of the chest, a name occasionally given in the early church to the arcade-cons (q. v.). The bishop was not required to care personally for the widows, orphans, and strangers, but to commit them to his archdeacon, who had the keys of the church’s treasures, and the care of dispensing the oblations of the people. The ordinary arcades were the actual treasury, but from the archdeacon, who was the chief manager, they received their instructions and orders.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii, ch. xxi, § 8; Farrar, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Arcæni Disciplina (discipline of the mysteries, or system of secret instruction), a term first introduced by Meier in his De Recondita set. Eccles. Theologia (1677), to denote the practice of the early church of concealing from unbelievers, and even from catechumens, certain parts of worshipping, especially of the sacraments. The subject is curious in itself, and receives additional importance from the use made of it by the Romanists (see below). The disciplina arcæni is not to be confounded with the system of reserve, or concealment in theology (æcieæ arcæni, μυστικὰ σωφροσύνη), which sprang up in Egypt in the second century, viz., the system adopted by the heretical sects of non-believers of certain parts of Christian knowledge (γνώσις) to Christian people generally, but only secretly to such as they deemed capable and worthy. Clement of Alexandria is the first to mention this system, and he pretends that it was instituted by Christ himself (Stromat. lib. i, c. 1; anath. Minheim, Hethe monumentaliores, cent. ii, § 34). But the arcæni disciplina proper referred to worship rather than to doctrine. It is fully treated by Bingham, from whom the following statement is condensed.

1. Tertullian (4 220) is the first writer who mentioned the existence of this mystery, and blames the practitioners for not observing it (De Presecrpt., ad. Hor. cap. 41). From him, and from later writers, it appears that the secret system at first covered only Baptism and the Lord’s Supper (i. e. the forms and ritual of the sacraments, not the doctrine concerning them). At a later period, confirmation, ordination, and unction were also made matters of concealment; and parts of the prayers of the church were enjoyed only by the “faithful,” while unbelievers and catechumens were excluded from them. The system seems to have reached its height during the fourth century. At that time catechumens were taught the Ten Commandments, a creed, or summary confession of faith, and the Lord’s Prayer, with suitable expositions; but, prior to baptism, the nature of the sacraments was carefully concealed. Even the time and place were not on any account to be divulged. To relate the manner in which the sacrament was administered, to mention the words used in the administration, to describe the simple elements in which it consisted, were themes on which the initiated were as strictly forbidden to touch as if they had been laid under an oath of secrecy. Even the ministers, when they were led in their public discourses to speak of the sacraments or the higher mysteries of faith, contended with remote allusions, and dismissed the subject by saying "Iænav òi μυστήριον, The initiated know what is meant.

So also of confirmation. Basil (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 27) says that the “holy oil used in this ceremony is not to be looked upon by the uninstructed.” As to the public prayers of the church, all those which had reference to the communication of grace were considered as belonging to the sècles. The highest class of penitents, called consistentes, or co-standers, were allowed to be present at the communion prayers, and see the oblation offered and received by the faithful, though they might not partake with them. But catechumens of all ranks were wholly excluded from all this. They were always kept at a distance from these prayers. The doors of the church were locked and guarded by propor officers, to the intent that no uninstructed person should indulgently rush in upon them. We shut the doors, says Chrysostom (Hom. xxiii, in Matt.), when we celebrate the holy mysteries, and drive away all uninstructed peoples. This was one of the secrets of the church, as we heard St. Austin before (in Psal. ciii) speak of it; one of the things which a catechum-ens might not look upon, according to St. Basil (De Spiritu, Sanct. c. 27). Therefore the author of the Apo-tolical Constitution (lib. ii, c. 57; viii, c. 11) makes it a part of the deacon’s office not only to command their followers, but also to keep the doors, that none might come in during the time of the oblation.
Ephesians (I Hores. 42, n. 8) and St. Jerome (Comm. in Galat. c. vi) bring it as a charge against the Marcion-ites that they despised this discipline, and admitted catechumens indiscriminately with the faithful to all their services. And he of whom we read: (7 Chrys.
vi. 8) forms a like charge against the enemies of Chryso-ston, that in the tumult they raised against him, they gave occasion to the uninstructed to break into the church, and see those things which it was not lawful for them to set their eyes upon. Nay, so strict was the church then in the observation of this discipline, that we read of the excommunication of certain members of the Meletians for false wise-ness against him when they pretended to prove by the testimony of some catechumens that Macarius, one of their presbyters, had overturned the communion table in the time of the oblation; he argued that this could not be so, because (Athanasius, Apol. 2), if the catechu-mens were present, there could then be no oblation.— Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. x, ch. xvi.

2. The disciplina arcæni gradually fell into disuse; no precise date of its end can be given. Rothe (Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, i, 471) remarks that so long, on the one hand, as the church stood in the midst of a heathenized, unenlightened population, and on the other within the church, delay of baptism (the procerat nosc baptismis) to an advanced age, or even to the dying hour, was practised, the arcæni disciplina might have been a useful system; but just in proportion as infant baptism became more general, and the pagan world was christianized, the secret discipline lost its significan-ces; for, in consequence of these changes, the class of persons for whom it had been instituted no longer existed. In a general way, we may name the end of the sixth century as the period when it passed away.
The Western Church gradually stripped its liturgy of all secret usages; and Bona (Lur. Liturgicar. 1. 1, 16, 4) assured that about 700 AD, the system was entirely gone. The Eastern Church, however, holds on to her antiquated formulas, by which the catechu-mens are dismissed from divine worship, notwithstanding that church has no catechumens, and practises infant communion.

3. It is the ancient grounds for the adoption of the arcæni disciplina cannot be known; but conjectures, and even plausible sources, are not wanting. The reasons for it were, according to Bingham, first, that the plain-ness and simplicity of the Christian rites might not be contamed by the catechumens, or give scandal or offence to them, before they were through with themselves with the nature of the mysteries; secondly, to conciliate a reverence in the minds of men for the mystaries so concealed; and, thirdly, to make the catechumen more desirous to know them, or to excite their curiosity. Augustine says, 'Though the sacraments are not disclosed to the catechumens, it is not because they cannot bear them, but that they may so much the more ardently desire them, by how much they are more'. Some such partakes, to some extent, of their own, and so not to be outdone by heathenism, which set great store by them. Rothe disputes this, on the ground of the bitter opposition of the Anti-Nicene Christians to all heathen ideas and usages. But he forgets that mysteries are congenial to human nature in all ages; a spirit akin to that which preserves Freemasonry could very well have existed in the early church. With less probability, certain writers, e. g.
Froemmann (De Disciplina Arcaei, Jena, 1838), find the origin of the secret system in Judaism, which did not admit professedly at once to all sacred services. Had been so be, we should find traces of it in the N. T. and the Apocalypse, in spite of the fact that the mysteries were quite foreign to apostolic usage, which practiced the strictest openness. Moreover, during that early period of Christianity when the church borrowed from Judaische, the disciples' did not yet exist; and besides, the Jewish custom appears to be of so late an age that it may itself be an imitation of a Christian institution. Augustin (Hist. des Christ. Archäologie, i, 93 sq. ; De laur'Isis, iv, 397) thinks that the early Christians adopted the secret discipline because their public worship was forbidden by law, and that this compulsory secrecy grew into a usage. But if this were true, all parts of the law were not shared in the church; whereas only certain portions were made mysteries of. Credner (Jen. Literatur-Zeit-ungs, 1846, Nos. 164 and 165) traces the origin of the secret discipline back to the apostolic age, and finds the ground of it in the natural unwillingness of Jewish Christians to admit heathen converts at once to baptism. He finds confirmation of his theory in the fact that Clement of Alexandria (Quis Dives, c. 42), Irenaus (adv. Haer. iv, 23, 24), and Tertullian (De Baptism. c. 18) trace the origin of the catechumenate back to the apostles. But even this would not prove his point; there might be, and for some time were, cate-chumens in the church, whereas there is ample proof of openness in ritual usages up to the second century. But yet the true origin of the discipline is doubtless to be found in the cate-chumenate (see Rothe, 1. c.). The catechumens were probationers in the church, not full members; and this novitate was designed, first of all, to keep every person out of the church, and, secondly, to train new converts in Christian doctrine and morals. At this day the Methodist Episcopal Church has such a cate-chumena (Discipline, ch. ii, § 1), but without any secret discipline. But in the early church, during the period of persecution, it was dangerous at once to admit professed converts, who might be spies, into the assembly of the faithful. They were accordingly taught not to. But the tendency of the state of things would naturally be to make two kinds of Christianity, the toxic, or that of the baptized believers (fideles), and the 'temerite, or that of the unbaptized catechumens.
The figure of the Superchrist is very conspicuous in the latter. Here is a plain starting-point for making mysteries of the two sacraments in liturgical practice as well as in theory. What was at first accidentally grew into a rule.
4. The Romanists, as remarked above, have at-tempered to press the disciplina arcaei into their service to account for the silence of the early church writers as to penance, image-worship, and other of their corruptions. The Jesuit Schelstrate first attempted this in his Antiquitas illustratae (Ant. 1678), but was fully refuted by Tenzel in Exercitatio Se-lecta (Francof. 1692, 4to). Other Roman Catholics works on the subject are, Schollner, De Disciplina Ar-caniae (Venet. 1736) ; Lienhardt, De Script. Liturg. et de Disciplina Arcaei (Argentor. 1829). When pressed hard by Protestants with the argument that no traces of the corruptions named above, or of the invocation of saints, the seven sacraments, or transubstantia-tion, are to be found in the early ages of the church, they

Arch

Arch (only in the plur. ἁρχῆς, archên, mas., and ὁ ἄρχων, ἀρχηγός, fem.), an armctural term occurring only in Ezek. xl, 16, 22, 26, 29, and difficult of definition, but prob. allied with ἀρχή, a 'pr., hence a column or pillar (1 Kings vi, 23 ; Ezek. xxi. iv). Most interpreters understand the term (sing. ἀρχή, arch) to be the same as ἀρχή, ἀρχιτέκτων, a vestibule or porch, following the Sept., Vulg., and Targums (Aluj, vestilum, apolis ; ) but it is manifestly distinguished from this (Ezek. xl, 7, 8, 9, 89, 40), since the latter contained windows (ver. 16, 29), whereas this carried round the building, even in front of the ascent to the gate (ver. 22, 26), and is usually associated with pillars.
Of the other ancient interpreters Symmachus and the Syr.
occasionally time surrounds column sometimes threshold.
The word appears either to denote a portico with a colonnade, or (according to Rabbi Menahem) is about equaλόμα, ἀρχή, a temple or building. See chapter 8, p. 47.

Arches with vaulted chains and domed temples are a sym-the figure so conspicuously in modern Oriental architecture, that, if the arch did not exist among the ancient Jews, their towns and houses could not possibly have offered even a faint resemblance to those which now exist; and this being the case, a great part of the analagous illustrations of Scripture which modern travellers and Biblical illustrators have obtained from this source must needs fail to the ground. Nothing against its existence is to be inferred from the fact that no word properly signifying an arch can be found in the Hebrew Scriptures (see above). The architectural notices in the Bible are necessarily few and general; and we have at this day histories and other books, larger than the sacred volume, in which no such word as "arch" occurs. There is certainly no absolute proof that the Israelites employed arches in their buildings; but if it can be shown that arches existed in neighboring countries at a very early period, we may safely infer that so useful an invention could not have been unknown in Palestine.

Until within a few years it was common to ascribe a comparatively late origin to the arch; but circumstances have come to light one after another, tending to throw the date more and more backward, until at length it seems to be admitted that in Egypt the arch already existed in the time of Joseph. The observations of Rosellini and of Wilkinson (who carries back the evidence from analogy and probability to about B.C. 2020, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 116; iii, 316) led them irresistibly to this conclusion, which has also been recently adopted by Cockerell (Lect. iii, in Athenauns for Jan. 28, 1845) and other architects. Wilkinson suggests the probability that the arch owed its invention to the small quantity of wood in Egypt, and the consequent expense of roofing with timber. The evidence that arches were known in the time of the first Osirites is derived from the drawings at Beni-Hassan (Wilkinson, ii, 117). In the secluded valley of Deir el-Medineh, at Thebes, are several tombs of the early date of Amenoph I. Among the most remarkable of these is one whose crude brick roof and niche, bearing the name of the same Pharaoh, proves the existence of the arch at the remote period of B.C. 1540 (Wilkinson, Topography of Thebes, p. 61). Another tomb of similar construction bears the oval of Thothmes III, who is supposed by many to have reigned about the time of the Exode (Anc. Egyptians, iii, 319). At Thebes there is also a brick arch bearing the name of this king (Hoskins, Travels in Ethiopia). To the same period and dynasty (the 18th) belong the vaulted chambers and arched doorways (fig. 4, above) which yet remain in the crude brick pyramids at Thebes (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, iii, 317). In ancient Egyptian houses it appears that the roofs were often vaulted, and built, like the rest of the house, of crude brick; and there is reason to believe that some of the chambers in the pavilion of Rameses III (about B.C. 1346), at Medinet Habu, were arched with stone, since the devices in the upper part of the walls show that the fallen roofs had this form (fig. 5). The most ancient actually existing arches of stone occur at Memphis, near the modern village of Sakkara. Here there is a tomb with two large vaulted chambers, whose roofs display in every part the name and sculptures of Psammeticus II (about B.C. 600). The chambers are cut in the limestone rock, and this being of a friable nature, the roof is secured by being, as it were, lined with an arch, like our modern tunnels. To about the same period—that of the last dynasty before the Persian invasion—belong the remarkable doorways of the enclosures surrounding the tombs in the Assalf, which are composed of two or more concentric semicircles (fig. 2) of brick (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, iii, 319). Although the oldest stone arch whose age has been positively ascertained does not date earlier than the time of Psammeticus, we cannot suppose that the use of stone was not adopted by the Egyptians for that style of building previous to his reign, even if the arches in the pyramids in Ethiopia should prove not to be anterior to the same era. Nor does the absence of the arch in temples and other large buildings excite our surprise, when we consider the style of Egyptian monuments; and no one who understands the character of their architecture could wish for its introduction. In some of the small temples of the Oasis the Romans attempted this innovation, but the appearance of the chambers so constructed fails to please; and the whimsical caprices of Osirei (about

ARCHAEOLOGY

B.C. 1885) also introduced an imitation of the arch in a temple at Abydos. In this building the roof is formed of single blocks of stone, reaching from one architrave to the other, which, instead of being placed in the usual manner, stand upon their edges, in order to allow room for hollowing out an arch in their thickness; but it has the effect of inconsistency, without the plea of advantage or utility. Another imitation of the arch occurs in a building at Thebes, constructed in the style of a tomb. The chambers lie under a friable rock, and arecased with masonry, to prevent the fall of its crumbling stone; but, instead of being roofed on the principle of the arch, they are covered with a number of large blocks, placed horizontally, one projecting beyond that immediately below it, till the uppermost two meet in the centre, the interior angles being afterward rounded off to form the appearance of a vault (fig. 1, above). The date of this building is about B.C. 1500, and consequently many years after the Egyptians had been acquainted with the art of vaulting (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, ii, 321). Thus, as the temple architecture of the Egyptians did not admit of arches, and as the temples are almost the only buildings that remain, it is not strange that arches have not oftener been found. The evidence offered by the paintings, the tombs, and the pyramids is conclusive for the existence and antiquity of arches and vaults of brick and stone; and if any remains of houses and palaces had now existed, there is little doubt that the arch would have been of frequent occurrence. We observe that Wilkinson, in portraying an Egyptian mansion (Anc. Egyptians, ii, 181), makes the grand entrance an archway. After this it seems unreasonable to doubt that the arch was known to the Hebrews also, and was employed in their buildings. Palestine was indeed better wooded than Egypt; but still that there was a deficiency of wood suitable for building and for roofs is shown by the fact that large imports of timber from the forests of Lebanon were necessary (2 Sam. vii, 2, 7; 1 Kings v, 6; 1 Chron. xxii, 4; 2 Chron. ii, 8; Ezra iii, 7; Cant. i, 17), and that this imported timber, although of no very high quality, was held in great estimation.—Kitto, s. v.

Mr. Layard found evident traces of the arch among the Assyrian ruins. He first discovered a small vaulted chamber, the roof of which was constructed of baked bricks placed sideways, one against another, in the usual manner of an arch (Nineveh, i, 38). He afterward came upon several vaulted drains beneath the palace of Nimroud, built of sun-dried bricks, and finally a perfect brick arch; showing the knowledge of this architectural element among the Assyrians at a very early date (Babylon and Nineveh, 2d ser. p. 163, 164). See Architecture.

That the Greeks likewise understood the principle of the construction of the arch in very ancient times is evident from monuments as early as the Trojan war (Smith's Dict. of Glass, Art. A. v. Arceus), a cut of one of which is subjoined.

Triumphal arches were frequently erected by the Roman emperors to commemorate signal conquests, and several such are yet standing. The most noteworthy of these is that of Titus, on the interior of which are delineated the spoils of the Jewish temple.

Archeology (ἀρχαιολογία, the knowledge of antiquity, antiquarian lore). This word is used by different writers in three senses: 1st, as including all the elements of public and private life of ancient peoples, together with their language, history, and the geography of their lands; 2d, as embracing only a scientific knowledge of the material, and especially monumental remains of ancient civilizations (in this sense, see Antiquities); or, 3d, as synonymous with the history of the formative arts of the ancients (in this sense see art, Christian).

We use the word in the first or more general sense, omitting history and geography, however, from the definition. Sacred Archaeology naturally divides itself into (1) Jewish and (2) Christian.

1. Jewish.—This has been defined as the science that makes us acquainted with the physical nature and social condition of those countries where the Hebrew Scriptures originated and to which they relate (Gesenius, in the Hall. Encyclop. x, 74; comp. De Wette, Arch. Hist. § 1). Some (as Jahn) regard it as including history and geography, but it is usually considered as embracing only such subjects as are involved in the apostolic and, perhaps, also social and religious) of the nations of the Bible, especially the Jews (Hagenbach, Encykl. § 45; Schleiermacher, Darstell. d. theolog. Studien, § 140). For the general history and the best treatises on the whole subject, see Antiquities; it is the object of the present article to indicate more in detail the principal original materials and sources of Biblical archaeology (comp. Rosenmüller, Altarbuch. I, i, 6–130; Duncker, Gesch. des Alterthums. (Berlin, 1852, 4 vols.)

2. Sources of archaeological Knowledge.—a. Remains of Ancient Hebrew Art. These are unfortunately few, and but imperfectly understood, and are confined almost entirely to Egypt. Many of the reputed monuments of Old Testament times owe their authority to mediaval (Mohammedan or Christian) tradition. A most important monument illustrating the Jewish service is the triunphal arch (q. v.) of Titus at Rome, containing in relief a delineation of the spoils of the Temple of Jerusalem (Plin., Nat. Hist. xiv, 27; Trajan, Rh. 1716, 2d ed. by Schulze, 1776). Besides these, the only genuine monuments in artistic relics are the Jewish "Samaritan" coins (q. v.), especially those of the Maccabees (see Bayer, De nummis Heb. Samar. Valenc. 1784). The monumental remains of neighboring countries are also useful in the study of Jewish archaeology, especially the sculptures of Egypt (see Description de l'Egypte, Paris, 1808; Rosellini, Monumenti dell'Egitto, Par., 1834; Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, Lond., 1847; N. Y. 1845; comp. Lane's Mod. Egyptians, Lond., 1842), the Phoenician inscriptions and coins (see Levy, Phönitzische Studien, Breislaw, 1855–62; Gesenius, Phön., monumenta, Lips., 1837; also the numismatic works of Vaillant, Par., 1862; and Fröhlich, Vindob. 1744), the ruins and sculptures of Persepolis (see the Travels of Ker Porter, Chardin, and Ousely and Petra (see the Travels of Labarde and Olin), and the monuments of Nineveh and Babylon recently discovered (see A. J. A.). The Bible itself stands first in value as the chief source of Jewish archaeology. Next are the works of Josephus and Philo, which are of great service; then follow the Talmud (q. v.), and the Rabbins (q. v.), whose statements must be used carefully (see Meuschen's N. T. in Tal. illustr. 1766; Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. Cantab., 1658; Schützenn, Hor. Heb. 1733–1792; Wetstein, Annot. in N. T. Amst., 1753). To these may be added notices respecting Egypt, Persia, Judea, etc., found occasionally in Greek and Roman writers, especially Herodotus (see Hufeld, Ezeritz. Heidelberg, i; int. next, Xenophon, Diog. Sicula, Strabo, Pliny, Plutarch, Tacitus, and others; a few of these writers are especially useful for the elucidation of the N. T., although they are very much given to misrepresentation of the Jews.

b. Oriental Treatises, such as geographical and works on natural history, like those of Erasistratus, Ioh. Hauk, Arbuthnot, Abbéma, Arminius; which make up the second a firm foundation to be derived from Eastern sacred books, such as the Koran, Zendavesta, Hamasa, and likewise the old historical and poetical productions of the East.

c. Travels in Oriental countries, particularly Egypt, Arabia, and Palestine, with itineraries, maps, and observations, from the 7th century, through the Middle Ages, down to modern times, constitute an immense fund of information, and affording reports not only on the geography, but also the natural history, and particularly the customs and social condition of the lands of the Bible, which have been proverbial for their uniformity. See a list of these at the end of the art. Palestine. The archaeological knowledge acquired by the Crusaders during the Crusade of Boncompagni, entitled Gesta Dresper Francos (Hanov. 1611); many of the early travels are collected in the Bewahrten Reisebuch d. Heil. Landes (1609), the most valuable of which were published with notes by Paulus (Jena, 1792). For a fuller view of the literature of the subject, see the Meno's Bibl. Notit. 8, p. 72b; Winckel's Handb. d. theolog. Lit. 1, 151, 8d ed.; and Ritter's Erdein. Xv, i.

a. The Geography of Bible lands, including not only Palestine and its immediate neighborhood, but also Egypt, the high interior of Asia, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, and to some extent Greece and Italy, with an elucidation of the ethnographical table in Gen. x (see Gesenius, in the Hall. Encyclop. x, 84 sq.). The most comprehensive work on this subject is that of Bochart, entitled Phalieg (Cadam. 1646, Frankf. 1715, comp. Phil. de Stod. (Got. 1780); this may be added as an accompaniment to Knobel's Volkertafel (Giese, 1850). On Palestine and vicinity alone may be named, as well-nigh exhaustive of the ancient materials, Reid's Palestina (Utrecht, 1614, etc.); the most comprehensive and convenient is Ramusio's Hol. Terra Sancta (Lips., 1850); and the most complete and exact modern handbook of travels is Robinson's Researches (2d ed. N. Y. 1856).

g. General works on the subject are especially Hamesveld's Bibl. Geographica (2d ed. Hamb. 1733–1796), Ritter's Erdkunde (Berl. 1817 sq.), and Robinson's Physical Geography of the Holy Land. The best maps are those of Berghaus (Zepplinmann, Berl., 1850); Tiepken (Berlin, 1857); and Van de Velde (Gotha, 1839).

h. On the Natural History of the Bible there are principally Schuchzer's Physica Sacra (Augsp. 1781); Oedmann's Vernichtige Samml. (Rost. 1786; Th. M. Harris, Natural Hist. of the Bible (Lond. 1824); J. B. Friedrich, Tar Borealis (Lips., 1850); while on Biblical zoology and botany separately the only complete treatises are still respectively Bochart's Hierocotonum (Lond. 1669), and Celsius's Hierobotanicum (Upsala, 1746). On the Domestic Habits of the Hebrews may be named Selden, Usur Ebr. (Lond. 1645); C. F. Schönheit, Göttingen 1746; Benary, De Hebr. curran (Berl. 1835); Schöpf, De reutil mulier. Hebr. (Leyd. 1745); Hartmann, Hebräer am Putzische (Amst. 1809).

d. On Biblical Agriculture, Paulsen, Ackerbau m. Morgenkönder ( Helmst. 1748); and the two prize essays by Bühl and Walk, Cultivarium Palus. (Göt. 1786).

e. The Social Relations of the Hebrews are treated in works on their political and judicial institutions, especially Michaelis, Mes. Recht (Frkft. 1775–1780); Hulmann, Staatsreiformung d. Isr. (Lpz. 1834); Selden, De jure naturali (Lond. 1640); Saalschutz, Das Mes. Recht (Berlin. 1846–48, 2 vols.). On Jewish and Christian law and the custom of the times, particularly useful for the elucidation of the N. T., although they are very much given to misrepresentation of the Jews.

f. On Poetry, see Bleich. (Lpz. 1834); Selden, De jure naturali (Lond. 1640); Saalschutz, Das Mes. Recht (Berlin. 1846–48, 2 vols.). On Jewish and Christian law and the custom of the times, particularly useful for the elucidation of the N. T., although they are very much given to misrepresentation of the Jews.

Herzog, Real-Encyk. s. v.

11. Christum Archæology is that branch of theological science the object of which is to represent the external phenomena of the ancient Church, i. e., its institutions, usages, ceremonies, etc. Theologians are not yet agreed how far the period of the ancient Church extends, nor what matter, consequently, Christian archæology ought to comprise. The prevailing opinion at present is that it ought mainly to extend over the first six centuries, and ought not to include the constitution of the Church. It is also generally agreed that, in representing the external forms of the ancient Church, the subsequent developments of these forms up to the present times ought to be constantly kept in view and referred to.

1. Sources of Christian Archæological Knowledge (a) Remains. The first class of sources consists of ancient remains, such as monuments, works of art [see Art. CHRISTIAN], inscriptions (q. v.), and designs on tombs, and also the ancient coins (q. v.). The second class contains the remains of burial (q. v.). (b) Written Memorials. The New Testament, of course, gives the beginnings of the most important Christian usages, such as Baptism, the Lord's Supper, Ordination, Prayer, etc. Next in importance come the writings of the apostolic fathers (q. v.), and of contemporary pagan writers, e. g. Pliny, Tacitus, Celsus, Julian, etc. After these come the fathers (q. v.) generally, and at a later period, liturgies, decrees of councils, etc.

2. Christian archæology, as a science, cannot be said to have fairly arisen before the 18th century. Nevertheless, in the struggles of the Reformation, both parties appealed to primitive usage, and this appeal made the study of antiquities a necessity. The church historians, therefore (the Magdeburg centurions, 1569-1574, 10 vols. fol., on the Protestant side, and Baronius († 1607), in his Annales Ecclesiastici, on the Catholic side), treated of the polity, worship, usages, etc., of the ancient church. As early as 1645 Casarius wrote his Christianorum Ritus Veteres (Rom. Catholic), who was followed by Cardinal Bonal († 1694), Claude Fleury (1682), and by Edm. Martene, whose work De antiquis eccles. ritibus (Antv. 1786-89, 8 vols. fol.) is still valued. But two early investigations are worthy of note. The first was in the art, the second in the literature. The former was made by Bingham's massive work, the Origines Ecclesiasticae, which first appeared in 10 vols. 8vo, 1710-1722. It is divided into twenty-three books, of which the titles are, I. Names and Orders of Men in the Early Church; II. Superior Orders of Clergy; III. Inferior Orders of Clergy; IV. Elections and Ordinations of Clergy; V. Privileges, Immunities, and Revenues of Clergy; VI. Rules of Life for Clergymen; VII. Ascetics; VIII. Church Edifices, etc.; IX. Geographical Divisions of the Ancient Church; X. Catechumens and Creed; XI. Riches of the Church and Dominion and Sacerdotal Monstrances following Baptism; XII. Divine Worship; XIV. Catechumen Service; XV. Communion Service; XVI. Unity and Disciple of the Ancient Church; XVII. Discipline of the Clergy; XVIII. Penitents and Penance; XIX. Absolution; XX. Festivals; XXI. Fasti; XXII. Marriage Rites; XXIII. Funeral Rites. The work was, in the eyes of two-thirds of industry, is full of erudition, especially patristical, and the material is set forth generally with simplicity and discretion. It is a store-house from which all subsequent writers have drawn copiously. But it lacks scientific method, and has the disadvantage of a High-Church stand-point. It is a great arsenal for the upholders of prelacy; the true organization of the original church is not to be gathered from it. But, with all its faults, it is still indispensable to the student of archæology. It was translated into Latin, and the originals of the quotations added, by Griscovich (Halle, 1724-29, 10 vols. fol., 1732). The best English edition now extant is that of Pitman, which adds Bingham's other writings as well as the Origines (Lond. 1840, 9 vols. 8vo). A cheap and good edition of the Origines for students is that of Bohn (London, 1852, 2 vols. imp. 8vo).

3. At the request of Pope Benedict XIV, the Dominican Bonghi composed his work Origines et antiquitatum Christianorum sive xx (Rom. 1749-1756). But of the twenty books into which the matter was to be divided only four appeared in five volumes. Shorter works were published by Selvaggio, Antiquitatum Christianorum institutiones (Naples, 1772-1774, 6 vols.), and by the German Jesuit Mannhardt, Liber Singularis de antiquit. Christianorum (Augsb. 1768). Better than any preceding work by Roman Catholic authors was that of Pelliccia, De Christianis ecclesiae pri. medicae et notissima artis politia (Naples, 1777-1779, 3 vols. 4to; last edition by Ritter and Braun, Cologne, 1829-1838, 3 vols.). On the basis of this work Dr. Nau has written Das Christentum der christlich-kirchen Kirche aus den ersten, mittleren und letzten Zeiten (Mentz, 1821-1841, 7 vols.).

4. Of recent works on Christian archæology, the most extensive is Augustin's Denkwürdigkeiten aus d. r. Christlichen Archäologie (Leipsig, 1816-81, 12 vols.). This work adds immensely to the stock of materials, but is very prolix, and also deficient in arrangement. These faults are mended by the author in his compendium, entitled Handbuch der christl. Archäologie (Leipsig, 1886, 3 vols. 8vo). A scientific and condensed treatise is Rheinwald's Kirchliche Archäologie (Berlin, 1880, 8vo), the best hand-book on the subject existent. Böhm's Christlich-kirch. Altertumskunde (Breisal, 1886-89, 2 vols. 8vo) is equally scientific, and more copious. Gruicke's Lehrbuch der christl. Archäologie (Leipsig, 1847, 8vo; 2d ed. 1859) is a useful manual. Other German manuals are by Locher (Rom. Cath.), Lehrbuch d. christ-l. Kirch. Archäol. (Frankf. 1885, 3 vols. 8vo) and Liebrich (in alphabetical order, Leipsig, 1885-88, 4 vols.). In English we have Henry's Compendium of Christian Antiquities (Philad. 1837, 8vo), which is chiefly extracted from Bingham; Riddle's Manual of Christian Antiquities (2d edit. London, 1848, 8vo), in which large use is made of the ancient history; and another work in English is Coleman's Ancient Christianity Exemplified (Philad. 1858, 8vo), in which the material is carefully wrought over in a truly Protestant spirit. See Hagenbach, Theloc. Encyclopädie, § 77; Coleman, Christian Antiquities (Introduction); Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, I, 421; Biddle, Manual of Antiquities (Appendix H). For works treating more particularly of liturgies, see Liturgy.

Archæologen (άρχαγγελος, chief angel, 1 Thess. iv, 16; Jude 9). These angels are so styled who occupy the highest rank in the celestial order or hierarchy, which consists, according to the apostles, of "thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers" (Eph. i, 21; Col. i, 16; I Peter iii, 22). Of these there are said to be seven, who stand immediately before the throne of God (Luke i, 19; Rev. viii, 2), who have authority over other angels, and are the patrons of particular nations (Rev. xii, 7; Dan. x, 13). In Matt. xxv, 38; 2 Thess. i, 7, these archangels are especially styled human armies. These the Almighty is said to employ in executing his commands, or in displaying his dignity and majesty, in the manner of human princes. These armies of angels are also represented as divided into orders and classes, having each its leader, and all these are subject to one chief, or archangel. The names of two only are found in the Scripture—Michael, the patron of the Jewish nation (Dan. x. 13, 21; xii. 1; Jude 9; Rev. xii. 7); and Gabriel (Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21; Luke i. 19, 26). The apocryphal book of Tobit (iii. 17; v. 4) mentions one, Raphael; and 2 Edeas (iv. 54) another, Uriel; while the book of Enoch names the whole seven (xx. 1–7). So also the Apocrypha.

The fathers are not agreed on the number and order of the celestial hierarchy. Dionysius the Areopagite admits but three hierarchies, and three orders of angels in each hierarchy. In the first are Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones; in the second, dominions, principalities, and powers; in the third, archangels, and angels. These titles of ranks are probably allusions to the customary order of the courts of the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Persian kings; hence Michael the archangel tells Daniel that he is one of the chief princes in the court of the Almighty. Extraordinary powers and functions were conferred on angels by the different Gnostic sects. They all held that angels were the fabricators or architects of the universe, and Cerinthus affirmed they were superior to Christ himself. These opinions were early entertained, and the Apostle Paul thought it necessary to warn the Colossians against such errors. "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffing up his fleshly mind" (Col. ii. 18). They also affirmed, according to Theodoret, that the law was given by angels, and that no one had access to God except through them. Hence we find on the Gnostic gospels the names of numbers of their angels; on one of those of Michael, Gabriel, Uriel, Raphael, Ananael, Prosorael, and Chasael. But the chief and most highly venerated was Michael, inasmuch that oracles were erected in Asia Minor, where divine honors were paid to him. See Michael.

Archbishop (ἀρχιεπίσκοπος), chief of the clergy of a whole province.

I. Epiphanius (Hær. 68) speaks of Alexander of Alexandria, who lived about 320, as archbishop of that see, and this is the first mention of that title on record; nor is at all clear whether Epiphanius in that passage is not rather speaking after the custom of his own time of an archibishop to explain the phrase "archiepiscopus" or archbishop of Alexandria, implied in the title of bishop of Alexandria. He bore the title of archbishop; for the titles of pope and bishop are given to this Alexander in a letter of Arians addressed to him. Be this as it may, Alexandria was the first see which assumed the title, which, however, was at first thought to savour too much of pride; for In the twenty-sixth canon of the Council of Carthage, A. D. 296, there is a primitive form instead of the title to be the first Christian king of England, who, after the conversion of his subjects, erected three archbishops, viz. London, York, and Llandaff (Caerleon). The dignity of archbishop continued in the see of London one hundred and eighty years, and was then, in the time of the Saxons, transferred to Canterbury.

Augustin, the monk who was sent by Pope Gregory to convert the English nation, in the reign of Ethelbert, king of Kent, was the first bishop of Canterbury; but Theodore, the sixth in succession after him, was the first archbishop of that see. The archbishop of Canterbury had archiepiscopate properly so called, not only over England, but over all the provinces, and all the bishops of the latter were consecrated by him. He was styled by Pope Urban II Altearius Orbita Papa; he had a perpetual legatine power annexed to his archbishopric: he had some marks of royalty, such as the power of coinin money, etc. Since the Reformation he is styled the "Archbishop of all England." Before the Reformation Cranmer was the first who bore this title. As to precedence, there have been many contests about it, as also about the oath of canonical obedience between the two archiepiscopals. Some antiquarians will have it that the archbishop of York was originally primate of the British Church; for London never was a Roman colony, or the seat of the Roman emperors, as York was, where both Severus and Constantius Chlorus lived and died, and where Constantine the Great was born; and from hence their infer that where the emperors resided was the most likely place to have pre-eminence above the rest. However it be, in the reign of Henry I, William Corbel, archbishop of Canterbury, obtained from the pope the character of legate, by which he secured to himself a superiority over the see of York, which he visited in legation. But after his death in 1137, and even during his lifetime, the archbishop of Armagh, who is primate of all Ireland, deposed the bishop of Clogher on the latter ground. To the archbishop of Canterbury belongs the honor of placing the crown on the sovereign’s head at his coronation; and the archbishop of York claims the like privilege in the case of the queen-consort, whose perpetual chaplain he is.

The Episcopate of Scotland has as present no archbishop, but the presiding bishop has the title of primus, or metropolitan. In the English colonies, the bishops of Calcutta, Sydney, New Zealand, Montreal, Cape-town, each of whom presides over an ecclesiastical province (a name adopted in England), have the title Metropolitan. See Metropolitan.

The election of an archbishop does not differ from that of a bishop [see Bishop]; but when he is invested with his office he is said to be “enthroned,” whereas a bishop is “consecrated.” He also writes himself “by divine providence,” a bishop being “by divine permission,” and has the title of “Grace” and “Most Reverend Father in God,” while a bishop is styled “Lord” and “Right Reverend Father in God.”

The archbishop is entitled to present to all ecclesiastical livings in the disposal of diocesan bishops, if not filled within six months, and every bishop, whether created or translated, is bound to make a legal conveyance to the archbishop of the next avoidance of one such dignity or benefice belonging to his see as the archbishop shall choose. This is called the archbishop’s option. See Bishop; Episcopacy. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii. ch. 17; Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. viii, § 4.

v. In the Protestant churches of Germany the title archbishop is not customary, yet it was conferred, on April 10, 1829, by order of the king of Prussia, on the superintendent general of the province of Prussia, Baron von der Borowski, with the declaration, “Why not the title of our archbishop? Those of our evangelical provinces have the same claim to this dignity as the clergymen of several other evangelical churches, in which it has been preserved without interruption?” See Nicolaus, Die bischof. Würd. in Preussen’s evangel. Kirche (Königsberg, 1834).

On the Roman Catholic archbishops, see Hübner, Von den Rechten und Pflichten der Erzbischöfe (Utrecht, 1832); and Mast, Dogmat.-histor. Abhandlung über die reichsrechte Stellung der Erzbischöfe (Freiburg, 1847). A list of all archbishops, with their suffragans, throughout the world, will be given in an Appendix.—Hook, Church Dict. s. v.; Chambers’s Encyclopædia, s. v.

Archd. Mervyn, a learned clergyman and antiquary of the Protestant Church of Ireland, was born at Dublin in 1723, filled several ecclesiastical offices, and finally became rector of Slane, in the county of Meath. He died in 1791. After forty years of intense application to the monastic records of Ireland, he published, in 1786, Monastic Hibernicum; a History of the Abbeys, Priorities, and Religious Houses of Ireland—Gentlem. Magazine, xi., 790; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, li. 67.

Archdeacon (chief of the deacon). An ecclesiastical officer whose duty originally consisted chiefly in superintending the temporal affairs of the church.

1. The office was one of great honor in the early church; but how it grew into such importance is matter of dispute. 'The antiquity of this office is held to be so high by many Roman Catholic writers that they derive it from the very foundation of the seven deacons, and suppose that St. Stephen was the first archdeacon; but there is no authority to warrant this conclusion. Mention is also made of Laurentius, archdeacon of Rome, who suffered A.D. 206; but, although he was called archdeacon (according to Prudentius), he was not the bishop of the principal of the seven deacons who stood at the altar. 'Hic primum a septem viris qui stant ad aram proximi!' (Prudent. Hymn. de St. Steph.). Jerome says 'that the archdeacon was chosen out of the deacons, and was the principal deacon in every church, just as the archdeacon presbyter was the principal presbyter.' But even in Jerome's time the office of archdeacon had certainly grown to great importance' (Hook, s. v.). It was usual for one of the deacons to stand by the bishop at the altar, while the other deacons discharged their duty in the assembly. This deacon was called primum, prioriterius diaconum, the first or chief deacon; and he was usually the bishop's man. He took the place of the bishop as necessary to ecclesiastical order in his epistle ad Rusticum; and Optatus, bishop of Milevi, says that it was the rebuke of the archdeacon Caelianus to Lucilla which caused eventually the Donatist schism. It is probable that, at first, the deacon senior both in years and office was elevated to the rank of archdeacon; but, as the number increased in importance, it became necessary to elect the most able and proper person to discharge the duties. Athanasius was made archdeacon while he was yet a young man. This mode of election to office did not, however, prevail universally; for in some places the choice rested solely with the bishop; and when the relation of bishop and archdeacon became very intimate, and the latter was of special importance to his superior in the discharge of his episcopal functions, it was natural that the bishop should have considerable influence in his appointment. The powers of the archdeacons were extensive and influential. They had charge of the instruction and education of the younger clerics, were overseers over the deacons, superintended the support of the poor, and assisted the bishops in matters of administration and jurisdiction. Without his certificate no one was admitted to the orders, and frequently he represented the bishop at synods. Still greater became his power in the church, with the increase of the episcopal power over the priests, and a rank above all the priests, even the archpriest. This is clearly stated by Isidor of Seville, who, in his Epistola ad Evagrium, plainly says: The archpriest must know that he is subordinate to the archdeacon, and must obey his orders, as well as those of his bishop (archipresbyter vero se esse sub archidiacono, ejus praeventia sicet episcopi sui scire obdebat). Until the eighth century every diocese had only one archdeacon, but in 774, Bishop Heddo, of Strasburg, divided his diocese into seven archdeacons (archidiaconatus rurales), and most of the other bishops imitated this institution, with the exception of Italy, where the smallness of the clergy seemed to make a division of the dioceses superfluous. The "rural archdeacons," to whom the deans (archipresbyteri rurales) were subordinate, were mostly priests, while the archdeacon of the cathedral church (archidiaconus magnus) was usually only a deacon. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the archdeacons reached their climax. They received a jurisdiction of their own (jurisdiction proprius), suspended and excommunicated priests, held synods, and in many ways tried to enlarge their rights at the expense of the bishops. As the position had now become a very powerful one, many, by means of the papacy, especially, and even royal families intruded themselves into it, even without having received the ordination of deacons. In many instances their powers even became dangerous to the bishops, and thus a reaction was called forth. Many of the synods of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, as those of Tours (1226) and Sens (1281), took from them some of their powers, reserving them to the bishop and his vicar-general. This limitation of their powers was confirmed by the Council of Trent. Many of the archdeaconsates had already disappeared before the latter synod, and in many others this was the case in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. At some cathedral churches the office of archdeacon still exists, but the former rights are no longer connected with it. In the Greek Church the office of rural archdeacon never existed; the office of cathedral archdeacon was easily displaced by the archpriest, and even the title of archdeacon early disappeared. In Copts the nicle the title was retained, but the archdeacon was an officer of the court, not of the cathedral church. In some of the Protestant state churches of Germany the title archdeacon has been retained for the head ministers of ecclesiastical districts. See Archippus. 2. In the Church of England there are 71 archdeacons—several in each diocese. The archdeacon is a clergyman of the cathedral, and as the income of the office is held, he generally holds a benefice besides. He is appointed to the See, and is himself a sort of vice-bishop. He has the right of visitation every two years in three, to inquire into the repairs and movables belonging to churches; to reform abuses; to suspend; to excommunicate; in some places to prove wills; and to induct all clerks into benefices within his jurisdictions. He has power to keep a court, which is called the Court of the Archdeacon, or his commissary, and this he may hold in any place within his archdeaconry. In this church the war- dean's business is generally decided. The revenue of the archdeacon arises chiefly from pensions paid by the incumbents. These pensions originally bore no contemptible ratio to the whole value of the benefices, and formed a sufficient income for an active and useful officer of the church; but now, by the great change which has taken place in the value of money, the payments are little more than nominal, and the whole income of the archdeacons is very inconsiderable. The office, therefore, is generally held by persons who have also benefices or other preferment in the church. See Grievs, Law Relating to the Church and Clergy (Edinb. 1850).—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. i. ii, ch. xxii; Marsden, Churches and Seta, i. 330.

Archelàis (Ἀρχελάη), a city built by Archelaus, after whom it was named (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 13, 1). It was situated in the plain of the Jordan, near Jericho and Phasalia. It is called by Josephus and other ancient authors (Ant. xx. 2, 2). In the Peutinger Table (p. 454) it is placed twelve miles from Jericho toward Scythopolis. Ptolemy reckons it among the cities of Judea (see Reland, Palest., p. 462; comp. p. 560), and Pliny (xiii, 4) speaks of it as a valley near Phasalit and Livias. Antiochus is named in the Latin version of acts of the council of Chalcedon as bishop of Archelaus in Palestine (Acta concilior. general. iv, 80); but the Greek copies read Arce (Ἀρχελα), which likewise occurs in other notices (ib. iv, 327), as also the name Alcemon (Ἀλκεμων, ib. iv, 460). Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 287) coincides in Schultze's identification of the site with the ruins el-Basileigh, at the eastern base of a hill in the lower section of Wady Farahia.

Archelaùs (Ἀρχέλαος, ruler of the people, Tel-mud דְּרַכְלָא), son of Herod the Great by Mathaca, a Samaritan woman (Josephus, Ant. xvii, i, 8; War, i, 28, 4), and brought up, with his brother Antipas, at Rome (Joseph. War, i, 31, 1). He inherited of his father's dominions (B.C. 4) Idumea, Judea, and Samaria, with the important cities Cesarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, and a yearly income of 600 talents, as etharch (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 11, 4; called king, βασιλεὺς, in Matt. ii, 22, in the sense of “reign,” “comp. the commentators in loc.”). His reign had commenced insuppressibly; for, after the death of Herod, and before Archelaus could go to Rome to obtain the confirmation of his father's will, the Jews having become very tumultuous at the Temple in consequence of his refusing some demands, Archelaus ordered his soldiers to attack them, on which occasion upwards of three thousand were slain (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 9, 3; War, ii, i, 8). On Archelaus going to Rome to solicit the royal dignity (agreeably to the practice of the tributary kings of that age, who received their crowns from the Roman emperor), the Jews sent an embassy, consisting of fifty of their principal men, with a petition to Augustus that they might be permitted to live according to their own laws, under a Roman governor, and also complaining of his cruelty (Josephus, War, ii, 2-7). To this circumstance our Lord perhaps alludes in the parable related by Luke (xix, 12-27): “A certain nobleman (εἰρηναῖος, a man of birth or rank, the χρυσοκοκλών of Herod) went into a far country (Italy), to receive for himself a kingdom (βασιλείαν), and to return. But his citizens (the Jews) hated him, and sent a message (or embassy) after him (to Augustus Caesar), saying, 'We will not have this man to reign over us.' The Jews, however, failed in this remonstrance (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 11, 4). Archelaus returned to Judea, and under pretense that he had countenanced the seditious against him, he deposed Joazar of the highpriesthood, and gave that dignity to his brother Eleazar. He governed Judea with so much violence that, in the tenth (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 12, 2; comp. Life, 1) or ninth (Josephus, War, ii, 7, 8) year of his reign (according to Dio Cass. Ix, 27, under the consulate of M. Em. Lepidus and L. Aruntius, corresponding to A.D. 6), on account of his tyranny, especially toward the Samaritans, he was deposed, deprived of his property, and banished to Vienna in Gaul (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 13, 2), where he died (the year is unknown; Jerome, Onomast., s. v. Bethlehelm, asserts that his grave was shown in this latter place, in which case he must have returned to Palestine as a private person). The parents of our Lord turned aside from fear of him on their way back from Egypt, and went to Nazareth in Gilead, in the domain of his gentle brother Antipas (Matt. ii, 22). He seems to have been guilty of great inhumanity and oppression. This cruelty was exercised not only toward Jews, but toward Samaritans also (Josephus, War, ii, 7, 8). He had illegally married Glaphyra, the wife of his brother Alexander, during the lifetime of the latter, who left several children by her (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 13, 1).—Noldi Hist. Judâm, p. 219 sq.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. See Herod.

Archelaus is also the name of several other persons mentioned by Josephus.

1. The last of the kings of Cappadocia by that name, who received the throne (B.C. 84) from Marc Antony. He afterward held great estates by Augustus and the succeeding emperors, but at length fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, and died at Rome, A.D. 17. (See Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.) He was on intimate terms with Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 10, 6, 7), whose son Alexander married his daughter Glaphyra (ib. 8, 6), and whose intervention was of service in reconciling Herod with his sons and brother (ib. 4, 61; War, i, 26). See Alexander.

2. Julius Archelaus Epiphanes, son of Antiochus and grandson of Cleopatra; he espoused Mariamne, the young daughter of Herod Agrippa I, while yet a girl of ten years; but before she became marriageable she was shamefully deflowered by the soldier (Josephus, Ant. xix, 9, 1).

3. Son of Magadotus, and one of the deserters to the Romans during the final siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, War, vi, 4, 2).

Archelaius, bishop of Carrhae in Mesopotamia, A.D. 278, held a public dispute with a heretic, Manes, an account of which he published in Syriac, soon translated into Greek and Latin (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i, 22; Jerome, De Vir. Illust. 72). The Lat. version has been printed by Zacagnius (Collect. Mon. Vet. Rome, 1696) and Fabricius (in his ed. of Hippolytus).

Archelaius, a bishop of Cesarea in Cappodocia, who wrote a work against the heresy of the Messaliani (A.D. 440), which is referred to by Photius (Cod. 55)—Cave, Hist. Lit. c. s. n.

ARCHITECTURE

Archis (ἀρχιστάρχης), a name denoting "high-priest," and used in the Greek Church for the higher clergy above the rank of presbyter, like the Latin term Prelate.

Archimandrite (ἄρχιμάνδριτος, "master of the horse"), a Christian minister, whom the Apostle Paul calls his "fellow-soldier" (Phil. 2), and whom he exhorts to renewed activity (Col. iv, 17), A.D. 57. As the former epistle, which concerns a private matter, is addressed to Philemon and Aim, jointly addressed to Colossae, and as the Church in their house" is also addressed, it seems necessary to infer that he was a member of Philemon's family. From the latter reference (see Jerome, Theodoret, and Eumenius) it would seem that Archippus had exercised the office of evangelist sometimes at Ephesus, sometimes elsewhere (as Lactantius, De Mort. Persecut., vii, 46), and that he finally resided at Colossae, and there discharged the office of presiding presbyter or bishop when Paul wrote to the Colossian Church (see Dictelmayer, De Archippe, Altdorf, 1731). The exhortation given to him in this epistle has, without sufficient grounds, been construed into a rebuke to the Church of Colossae. Tradition states that he had been one of Jesus' 70 disciples, and that he suffered martyrdom at Chone, near Lousica (Menolog. Gr. i, 206).

Archisynagōgos (ἀρχισυναγωγός, "ruler of the synagogue," called also ἀρχις τῆς συναγωγῆς [Luke viii, 41], and simply ἀρχις [Matt. ix, 16]; Heb. נֵכְסָר נָבָא, chief or ruler of the synagogue). In large synagogues there appears to have been a college or council of elders (בֶּן בֵּית נְבוֹא = בֶּן בֵּית נָבָא, Luke vii, 8) to whom the care of the synagogue and the discipline of the congregation were committed, and to all of whom this title was applied (Mark v, 22; Acts xxii, 15; xvii, 8, compared with ver. 17). Their duties were to preside in the public services, to direct the reading of the Scriptures and the addresses to the congregation (Vitringa, De Synagogae Vetrar. lib. iii, pt. c. 7; Nörr, Komment. ad Matt. xix, 15, etc.), to exact the tribute of alms (Vit. c. 18), and to punish transgressors either by scourging (Vit. c. 11; comp. Matt. x, 17; xxiii, 24; Acts xxii, 19) or by excommunication (Vit. c. 5). In a more restricted sense the title is sometimes applied to the president of this council, whose office, according to Grothus (Antiqu. Matt. ix, 18; Luc. xiii, 14) and many other writers, was different from and superior to that of the elders in general. Vitringa (p. 566), on the other hand, maintains that there was no such distinction of office, and that the title thus applied merely designates the presiding elder, who acted on behalf of and in the name of the whole. —Kito, a. v. See ST RABBINIC.

Archi (Heb. אֲרֵכָה; הָעָרָה; Sept. combines with the following word, 'אֲרֵכָה, Vulg. Archi Atarok; but the Heb. has no connective between the words, where the Author. has prop. supplied the best relation "to"), a city or place on the boundary of Benjamin and Ephraim, between Bethel and Ataroth (Josh. xvi, 2); supposed by some to be the region of Beni-Zeid (Kiri; Comment. loc. loc.), which, however, is too far north [see ATAROT], and rather to be sought in the valley west of Bethel, perhaps at the ruined site called Kffe Mear. See Tribe. It appears to designate (collectively used) a clan inhabiting a district called Erek (different, of course, from that in Babylonia, Gen. x, 10), elsewhere named only as the residence of Hushai the Archite (Heb. Arke, "ארך," Sept. "אריך," Vulg. "harcho"), one of those who adhered to David during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. xv, 32; xvi, 16). See Archite.

Archipallamus, i. e. Archchaplain, was the title of the highest dignitary in the old Frankish empire. His duty was to make a report to the king on all ecclesiastical matters which were brought before the government. Generally an archbishop was charged with this office and generally it has been connected with certain archiepiscopal sees. The office became extinct after a few centuries, and for the discharge of its duties eleemosynarior or amonierior were instituted in the thirteenth century.
fine art, is not purely such in the sense that painting, sculpture, music, and poetry are, but must be ranked rather as an applied art. Buildings erected for dwelling, manufacture, merchandise, public business, education, worship, burial, or defense, serve, first and primarily, their practical purposes. In so far as aesthetics are concerned, they are the chief product of the principles of construction, the choice of material, and the perfect adaptation of the building to its uses, the edifice is a scientific achievement, and from this stand-point architecture is a science. In so far as the laws of taste and the power of the imagination are applied to the grouping of the masses, and the invention and decoration of details, the edifice is a work of art, and, from this aesthetic stand-point, architecture is a fine art. Embodying thus the material and spiritual wants of an age or people with its knowledge of the resources of nature and the power of its imagination, the history of architecture is a most important element in the history of civilization. The genius of a great architect, though largely controlled by the object of the building, the materials at his command, and other considerations of site, country, and climate, and especially by the prevailing styles and tastes, will always be stamped upon his works, and give them a marked individuality. The rise of the Egyptian and the earliest history, architecture is generally supposed to have existed as a fine art before the other formative arts of painting and sculpture.

1. Ancient Architecture.—This period extends from the earliest times of the arts to about the time of Constantine the Great, when Christianity took the place of Paganism as the controlling spirit in architecture.

1. Egyptian.—The earliest authenticated monuments of architecture are to be found in Egypt, where were developed indeed the gorms of all the arts. Of the other styles we can trace the rise, culmination, and decadence. Of the rise of Egyptian art we know nothing, but we are placed suddenly face to face with the Pyramids of Gizeh, the Sphinx, and other works, all executed in true taste, and with so great a degree of scientific knowledge as to indicate a long period of anterior development. This period (in the fourth dynasty) excelled all later periods in some elements of design, though the second (in the twelfth dynasty) gave the column and other elements, all of which were moulded together, and brought to the highest execution and finish in the third period (in the eighteenth dynasty). Egyptian architecture, in many points, such as the majestic disposition of the masses, the sublime massiveness and durability of its walls, the lovely interplay of the columns and spindles, the predominance of the interior over exterior ornament, the universal use of color, the subordination of sculpture and painting to architectural effect, the symbolism of its ornaments and the monumental character of its edifices, was the most perfect the world has yet seen. (See Wilkinson, Architecture of the Ancient Egyptians, Lond. 1866.) The Egyptian public edifices consisted of temples, palaces, tombs, and aqueducts. The earliest Temples and Tombs were doubtless of wood, or were excavated from the solid rock. These two styles of building gave a typical character to the later temples, built mostly above-ground and of cut stone. The temples were built upon a high, often a raised foundation, above the flow of the high waters of the Nile. The entrance-way was paved with broad stones, and often led from the tomb of a deceased king. This entrance opened on the side facing the Nile to an enclosure surrounded by a wall of adobe, diminishing as it rose, and covered like all the Egyptian walls, as those of temples and tombs, with a broad, simple, spreading cornice. This unbroken massive wall was covered, as were the walls of the temple within, with symbolic paintings of the Egyptian religion, hieroglyphic records of history, or figures of deities and kings. With-in the enclosure was the temple, surrounded by rows of trees, and often with an artificial basin of water at one side. From the single opening of the entrance in the wall the way led between two rows of colossal sphinxes or rams to the majestic façade of the temple. Before the door rose two lofty obelisks or sat two colossal figures of gods, and bannisters formed high notes on their side. The walls within and without, and the columns, even when made of costly and polished stones, were covered with religious paintings or hieroglyphics. The door opened to a court within, surrounded by a covered passage-way (sometimes a second similar court followed); in these were erected more statues. Into the series of chambers extending back the courts, covered by stone roofing and lighted by small openings from above, were admitted only priests or sacred persons. In the last chamber was the "sanctum sanctorum," containing the image of the deity. The columns of the Egyptian architecture are of three typical kinds, emblematic of the papyrus, the lotus, and the palm—the fluting, when used, originating in the columns of the under-ground temples. The temples varied in size, and the general disposition of the courts and chambers, often having the rear half cut out of the living rock. See Temples.

The Pyramids were the tombs of the kings of the earliest history; architecture is generally supposed to have existed as a fine art before the other formative arts of painting and sculpture. They were first built small, and then enlarged by successive coverings, as the length and prosperity of the reigns of the monarchs permitted. They were built in terraces, and then were filled out and faced with stone, commencing from the upper terrace and going downward. The interiors of the Pyramids and of the successive layers were often filled with brick or loose stone, but the fa-cing was hard, dressed, often of polished stone. Examination has shown that the interior pyramid was often made with much more care than the subsequent facings. There was only one small chamber (with a narrow passage leading to it), but in the deepest layers of the massive stone sarcophagus, holding the embalmed body of the monarch. Of large and small pyramids there are found in Lower Egypt, where they mostly occur, sixty-seven, counting the finished and unfinished, and those in the different degrees of preservation. They reach from Cairo to Fayoum, along the left shore of the Nile, a distance of about five miles. They are arranged in five principal groups, the chief one being that of Gizeh, situated near ancient Memphis, the seat of the earliest Egyptian monarchy. The largest of them, that of Cheops, is now 450 ft. high, and 746 ft. square at the base. All the great pyramids were built in the short interval between the fourth and fifth dynasties, and the lower pyramids were built mostly of brick, and were much smaller, as were also those of Upper Egypt [see Ethiopia], near Meir, being built about 200 B.C. The private tombs were mostly cut in the living rock, and were often decorated with great taste and labor. See Papyrus.

The vili of the Egyptians were of great extent, and contained spacious gardens watered by canals communicating with the Nile. The house itself was sometimes ornamented with propylae and obelisks, like the temples; it is even possible that part of the building may have been consecrated to religious purposes, as the temples of other countries. A large temple (in ancient paintings of them) a priest engaged in presenting offerings at the door of the inner chambers; and, indeed, it was not for the presence of the women, the form of the garden, and the style of the porch, we should feel disposed to consider it a temple rather than a residence. The existence of large villas were generally through folding gates, standing between lofty towers, as at the courts of temples, with a small door at each side; and others had merely folding gates, with the jambs surmount-ed by a cornice. One general wall of circuit extended round the premises, but the courts of the house, the garden, the offices, and all the other parts of the villa had each their separate enclosure. The walls were usually built of crude brick, and when in damp places, or within reach of the inundation, the lower part was strengthened by a basement of stone.

They were sometimes ornamented with panels and grooved lines, generally stuccoed, and the summit was crowned either with Egyptian battlements, the usual cornice, a row of spikes in imitation of spear-heads, or with some fancy ornament. The plans of the villas varied according to circumstances, but their general arrangement is sufficiently explained by the paintings. They were surrounded by a high wall, about the middle of which was the main or front entrance, with one central and two side gates, leading to an open walk shaded by rows of trees. Here were spacious tanks of water, facing the doors of the right and left wings of the house, between which an avenue led from the main entrance to what may be called the centre of the mansion. After passing the outer door of the right wing, you entered an open court, with trees, extending quite round a nucleus of inner apartments, and having a back entrance communicating with the garden. On the right and left of this court were six or more storerooms, a small receiving or waiting room at two of the corners, and at the other end the staircases which led to the upper story. Both of the inner façades were furnished with a corridor, supported on columns, with similar towers and gateways. The interior of this wing consisted of twelve rooms, two outer and one centre court, communicating by folding gates; and on either side of this last was the main entrance to the rooms on the ground floor, and to the staircases leading to the upper story. At the back were three long rooms, and a gateway opening on the garden, which, besides flowers, contained a variety of trees, a summer-house, and a large tank of water.

The arrangement of the left wing was different. The front gate led to an open court, extending the whole breadth of the façade of the building, and backed by the wall of the inner part. Central and lateral doors thence communicated with another court, surrounded on three sides by a set of rooms, and behind it was a corridor, upon which several other chambers opened. This wing had no back entrance, and, standing isolated, the outer court extended entirely round it; and a succession of doorways communicated from the court with different sections of the centre of the house, where the rooms, disposed, like those already described, around passages and corridors, served partly as sitting apartments and partly as storerooms. (See Wilkinson's Anc. Eg., alividim., i. 24 sq.) See BUILDING.

2. The remains of Persian and Assyrian palaces are important, as suggesting what may have been the predominant features of the palaces of David, and especially Solomon, although this style was doubtless somewhat modified by the Syrian method of architecture, which was probably more lofty, with several stories, quadrangular, and with flat roofs. In Mr. Fergusson's work (The Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis Restored, Lond. 1851) he may be found the latest and most ingenious theory on this subject, with plans and elevations giving a tangible form to his conclusions. The scarcity of wood in the East must have had great effect in architectural style; but stone being abundant in Palestine, there was no occasion for the immense piles and thick walls of sunburnt brick which formed so distinguishing a feature in Assyrian structures. According to Mr. Fergusson, the ground storey alone was faced with stone, the upper story being formed upon a system of beams supported by pillars, and enclosed by a high mud wall (see the Jour. of Soc. Lit. Jan. 1852, p. 492-438). On the numerous points of resemblance between the Assyrian and Jewish palaces, see Layard's Nineveh, 3d vol. p. 641 sq. See ASYRIA.

3. The specimens of the Indian styles are of doubtful date, yet the most remarkable were probably erected about one thousand years B.C. They are exclusively Brahminsical and Buddhist temples and pagodas. Some of the Brahminsical temples are excavations in the rocks, but not closed like the Egyptians, and have columns cut out of the rock without rules or uniformity (e.g. the temple of Ellora and Elephanta); others are provided with cells, with cupolas or pyramidal ceilings, and supported by figures of animals (Kailasa of Ellora). The Buddhist temples are also underground, but closed, and in the shape of a long parallel-octagon; they have a double row of pillars, a vault resembling the interior of a hollow cylinder, and end in a semicircular recess containing the divinity in the form of a soap-bubble (Dagoba), as in the temple of Wissakarma at Ellora. The pagodas are built above-ground, generally pyramidal, and terminated by a cupola (e.g. Madura, Brumbiana of Java). The Indian architecture approaches closely to the Persian and the Assyrian, as exemplified in Persepolis, Nineveh, and Babylon; and also, at a later time, to the Chinese, which adopted the pagoda style in their turrets, but replaced the cupola by a projecting angular roof ornamented with bells (e.g. the porcelain tower at Nan-kin). But it is with the Egyptian style that the Israelite is connected, as exemplified in Solomon's Temple (see article). (See Sleeman's Remains in India, Lond. 1844.)

Entirely independent of foreign sources, yet resembling the Indo-Chinese styles in its forms, is the Mexican style, especially in its temples (Thococalles), whose form is pyramidal, and of which remarkable remains are yet to be found in Testchukan, Tapantla, Eholia, etc.

4. Grecian and Roman. - Greek architecture lacks the size, the majestic grandeur, the long vistas, and the symbolism of the Egyptian, but excels it in freedom of treatment, and in perfection of proportion and execution of detail. It received nearly all its elements from Egypt and Assyria, but moulded them into an original and native style, and influenced powerfully the architecture of the Roman and all subsequent styles. It is marked unequally by two great periods, the heroic and the historic. The heroic period extends from the first immigration of the Greek branch of the Indo-European division of the Indo-European family into Greece and Asia Minor, to about the fall of Troy (1100 B.C.). The works of this period were mostly fortifications or palaces. The walls were built at first of massive, irregular, untrimmed stones (as at Tiryns, Fig. 1), or of irregular but trimmed stones (as at Argos, Fig. 2), and later of stones laid in broken ranges, as in the treasure-house of Atreus at Mycenae. The stones were laid (as was the case till the latest period of Grecian architecture) without mortar, and these massive walls are often termed Cyclopean. In the historic period appeared at first two distinct styles among the two great branches of the Greek people, the Doric and the Ionic. The Doric elements were mostly derived from Egypt, and the Ionic from Assyria.

The Doric order is the most ancient, and is marked by the characteristics of the people from whom it derives its name. It is simple, massive, and majestic. The column is characterized by the absence of a base, by the thickness and rapid diminution of the shaft, and by the simplicity and massiveness of the capital. In the entablature, the architrave is in one surface and quite plain. The frieze is ornamented by triglyphs, so called from the three flat bands into which they are divided by the intervening channels; while the metopes, or the vacant spaces between the triglyphs, are also adorned with sculptures in high relief. The cornice projects far, and on its under side are cut several sets of drops, called mutules. Its principal specimens are the temples at Corinth (Greece), Girgenti (in Sicily), Paestum (in Italy), at Aegina (Greece), and the Theseum, Parthenon, and Propylæum (at Athens).

Doric. The shaft of the column is much more slender, and rests upon a base, while the capital is adorned by spiral volutes. The architrave is in three faces, each slightly projecting beyond the lower; there is a small cornice between the architrave and the frieze, and all three members of the entablature are more or less ornamented with mouldings. The Ionic order was used mostly in temples and theatres. Its finest example is the Erechtheum in the Acropolis.

The Corinthian order is only a later form of the Ionic, and belongs to a period subsequent to that of the pure Grecian style. It is especially characterized by its beautiful capital, which is said to have been suggested to the mind of the celebrated sculptor Callimachus by the sight of a basket, covered by a tile, and overgrown by the leaves of an acanthus, on which it had accidentally been placed. The earliest known example of its use throughout a building is in the monument of Lysicrates, commonly called the Lantern of Demosthenes, which was built in B.C. 335.

In Italy we find at first the Etruscan or Tuscan style partaking of the Greek style of the Heroic period, but inclining afterward to the Doric. The temples were built on a quadrangle, the columns Doric, but weak, smooth, with a plinth below the base, and standing wide apart. The framework was mostly of wood. The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus at Rome was built in that style, of which no specimen now remain, with the exception of a few tombs, such as the Cucumella of Volsi, the so-called tomb of the Horatii near Rome, that of Porsenna near Chiusi, etc. Roman architecture brought forth temples and palaces worthy of a nation which claimed the dominion of the world; among them the most celebrated were the Forum, Basilica, Curie, etc.; and the triumphal arches (e.g. of Titus, Septimius Severus, Constantine, at Rome; Augustus, at Rimini; Trajan, at Ancona and Benevento, etc.), together with amphitheatres, circuses, and baths. These monuments were mostly in the Corinthian style, but on a gigantic scale. Their chief characteristic, however, was the union of the horizontal splendor (as in the temples of Palmyra and Baalbek), losing its characteristic features, as well as its original beauty and elegance. See BAALBEK; TADMOR.

5. Jewish. (1.) Sources of Inspiration. It was once common to claim for the Hebrews the invention of scientific architecture, and to allege that classical antiquity was indebted to the Temple of Solomon for the principles and many of the details of the art. It may here suffice to remark that temples previously existed in Egypt, Babylon, Syria, and Phoenicia, from which the classical ancients were far more likely to borrow the ideas which they embodied in new and beautiful combinations of their own. There has never, in fact, been any people for whom a peculiar style of architecture could with less probability be claimed than for the Israelites. On leaving Egypt, they could only be acquainted with Egyptian art. On entering Canaan, they necessarily occupied the buildings of which they had dispossessed the previous inhabitants; and the succeeding generations would naturally erect such buildings as the country previously contained. The architecture of Palestine, and, as such, eventually that of the Jews, had doubtless its own characteristics, by which it was suited to the climate and condition of the country, and in the course of time many improvements would no doubt arise from the causes which usually operate in producing change in any practical art. From the want of historical data and from the total absence of architectural remains, it is impossible to determine in which these causes operated in imparting a peculiar character to the Jewish architecture cannot now be determined, for the oldest ruins in the country do not ascend beyond the period of the Roman domination. It does, however, seem probable that among the Hebrews architecture was always kept within the limits of a mechanical craft, and never rose to the rank of a fine art. Their usual dwelling-houses differed little from those of other Eastern nations, and we nowhere find any thing indicative of exterior embellishment. See HOUSE. Splendid edifices, such as the palace of David and the Temple of Solomon, were completed by the assistance of Phoenician artists (2 Sam. v, 11; 1 Kings v, 6, 18; 1 Chron. xiv, 1). See PALACE. After the Babylonish exile the assistance of such foreigners was likewise resorted to for the restoration of the Temple (Ezra iii, 7). See TEMPLE. From the time of the Macedonian dynasty the Greek taste began to gain ground, especially under the Hellenic princes (who seem to have been possessed with a sort of mania for building), and was shown in the structure and embellishment of many towns, baths, colonnades, theatres, and castles (Josephus, Ant. xv, 8, 1; xx, 19, 4; xv, 10, 8; Wars, i, 4, 1). The Phoenician style, which seems to have had some affinity with the Egyptian, was not, however, superseded by the Grecian: and even as late as the Mishna (Baba Bathra, iii, 6), we read of Tyrian windows, porches, etc. (Kitto). (2.) History of Biblical Architecture.—The book of Genesis (iv, 17, 20, 22) appears to divide mankind into great divisions: the "pastoralists in tents" and the "dwellers in tents," and the "dwellers in cities," which tells us that Cain was the founder of a city; and that among his descendants, one, Jabacl was "the father of them that dwell in tents," while Tubal-cain was "the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron." It is probable that the workers in metal were for the most part the men of cities. Thus the architecture and architecture and metallurgy became from the earliest times leading characteristics of the civilization as distinguished from the nomadic tendencies of the human race.

To the race of Sem is attributed (Gen. x, 11, 12, 22; xi, 2-9) the foundation of cities in the plain of Shinar, Babylonia, Nineveh, and elsewhere; one of which,
Resen, the ephit of "great" sufficiently marks its importance in the time of the writer, a period at least as early as the 17th century, B.C., if not very much earlier (Rawlinson, Outline of As. Hist. p. 10; Layard, Nineeveh, ii. 221, 235, 238). From the same book we learn the account of the earliest recorded building, and of the materials employed in its construction (Gen. i, 9, 10; and though a doubt rests on the precise site of the tower of Babel, so long identified with the Bira Nimrout (Benjamin of Tudela, p. 100, Bohn; Newton, On Propa. x, 153, 156; Vaux, Nin. and Pers. pass. p. 175, 178; Keight, On Propa. p. 289), yet the nature of the soil and its yielding materials is such that it is possible though bearing mostly the name of Nebuchadnezzar, agree perfectly with the supposition of a city previously existing on the same or a closely neighboring site (Layard, ii. 249, 278, and Nin. and Bab. p. 581; Plin. vil, 56; Ezra iv, 1). In the book of Esther (i, 2) mention is made of the palace at Susa, for three months in the spring the residence of the kings of Persia (Esth. iii, 15; Xen. Cyrop. viii, 6, § 22); and, in the books of Tobit and Judith, of Ecbatana, to which they retired for two months during the heat of summer (Tob. iii, 7; xiv, 14; Jud. i, 12; Herod. i, 58). A branch of the same Syro-Arabian race as the Assyrians, but the children of Ham, was the nation, or at least the dominant caste, of the Egyptians, the style of whose architecture agrees so remarkably with the Assyrian (Layard, ii, 206 sq.). It is in connection with Egypt that the Israelites appear first as builders of cities, compelled, in common with other Egyptian captives, to labor at the buildings of the Egyptian monarchs. Pithom and Rameses were the names given to them by the Egyptians (Layard, ii, 11; Wilkinson, i, 195). The Israelites were by occupation shepherds, and by habit dwellers in tents (Gen. xvii, 3). The "house" built by Jacob at Succoth is probably no exception to this statement (Gen. xxxiii, 17). They had therefore originally, speaking properly, no architecture. Even Hebron, a city of higher antiquity than the Egyptian Zoan (Tanis), was called originally from its founder, perhaps a Canaanite of the race of Anak, Kirjath-Arba, the house of Arba (Num. xxii, 22; Josh. xiv, 15). From the time of the occupation of Canaan they became dwellers in towns and in architectural monuments. The stones of the ancient Palestine supplied a ready material (Lev. xxiv, 42, 43; 1 Kings vii, 10; Stanley, Palest. p. 146 sq.); but the towns which they occupied were not all, nor, indeed, in most cases, built from the first by themselves (Deut. v, 10; Num. xiii, 19).

The peaceful reign and vast wealth of Solomon gave grandeur to the architecture; for besides the Temple and his other great works at and near Jerusalem, he built fortresses and cities in various places, among which the names and sites of Baalhe and Tadmor are usually thought to be represented by the more modern superstructures of Baalbec and Palmyra (1 Kings ix, 15; 2 Kings xxvii, 8). As modern tradition and the results of recent exploration of Judea show, more than one is recorded as a builder: Asa (1 Kings xv, 38), Baasha (xvi. 17), Omri (xvi. 24), Ahab (xvi, 34; xxii, 29); Hezekiah
(2 Kings xx, 20; 2
Chron. xxxii, 37, 80), Jehoash, and Josiah (2 Kings xii, 11, 12; xxii, 6); and, lastly, Jehoakim, whose winter palace has been discovered (Jer. xxii, 14; xxxvi, 22; see also Amos iii, 16). On the rock, above all, the chief cares of the rulers was to build the Temple and the walls of Jerusalem in a substantial manner, with stone, and with timber from Lebanon (Ezra iii, 5; v, 8; Neh. ii, 8; iii, 1, 2). During the government of Simon Maccabaeus, the fortress called Baris, and after the restoration of Jerusalem, was the Temple and the city. But the reigns of Herod and of his sons and successors were especially remarkable for the great architectural works in which they delighted. Not only was the Temple restored to a large portion, if not to the full degree, of its former magnificence but the fortifications and other public buildings of Jerusalem were enlarged and embellished to an extent previously unknown (Luke xxi, 5; Benj. of Tudea, p. 83, Bohn). See JERUSALEM. Besides these great works, the town of Cesarea was built on the site of an insignificant building called Strato's Tower; Samaria was enlarged, and received the name of Sebaste, by the Edomite king, when the Temple was Herod carried his love for architecture so far as to adorn with buildings cities even not within his own dominions, Berytus, Damascus, Tripolis, and many other places (Josephus, War, i, 11, 11). His son, Philip the tetrarch, enlarged the old Greek colony of Panace, and he did much in the way of building. While his brother Antipas founded the city of Tiberias, and adorned the towns of Sepphoris and Bethamph-ta, giving to the latter the name Livias, in honor of the mother of Tiberius (Reland, p. 497). Of the original splendor of these great works no doubt can be entertained; but of their style and appearance we can only conjecture, though with nearly absolute certainty, that they were formed on Greek and Roman models. Of the style of the earlier buildings of Palestine we can only form an idea from the analogy of the Egyptian, Assyrian, and Persian monuments now existing, and from the modes of building still adopted in Eastern countries. The connection of Solomon with Egypt and with Tyre, and the influence of the captivity, may have in some measure successively affected the style both of the two temples and of the palatial edifices of Solomon. The enormous stones employed in the Assyrian, Persepolitan, and Egyptian buildings find a parallel in the substructions of Baalbek, more ancient and grander than any other in the ancient world, and in the stones of so vast a size which still remain at Jerusalem, relics of the building either of Solomon or of Herod (Williams, pt. ii, 1). But, as it has been observed again and again, scarcely any connected monuments are known to survive in Palestine by which we can form an accurate idea of its buildings, beautiful and renowned as they were throughout the East (Plin. v, 14; Stanley, p. 185), and even of those which do remain no trustworthy examination has yet been made. It is probable, however, that the reservoirs known under the names of the Fools of Solomon and Herod, which now exist in the form of one of the original fountains (Stanley, p. 158, 165).—Smith, s, v.

The domestic architecture of the Jews, so far as it may be understood, is treated under HOUSE. Tools and instruments of building are mentioned by the sacrated writers: the plumb-line, Amos vii, 7; the measuring-rod, Ezek. xii, 15; the saw, 1 Kings vii, 9. (See De Vogüé's Architecture des 2°rènes dans l'Antiquité Ancient, II. Medieval Architecture.—1. With the victory of Christianity over Paganism, as the religion of state, commences a new era in the history of architecture.
Still the Greek, or, rather, Roman art exercised a powerful influence, especially in the details of the new style. With the introduction of Christianity, and of the state, the ancient basilicas (q. v.), or halls of justice, were turned into churches. The lower floor was used by the men, and the galleries devoted to the women.
In later edifices the galleries were dispensed with. The church then consisted of a single oblong hall, with one, three, or five aisles, a round apsis at the rear end, an altar, etc. The basilican style prevailed throughout the entire Christian Church throughout the fourth century. It prevailed much later in Syria and Southern France, and remained in Central Italy till the Renaissance period.

2. The Byzantine was the earliest branching off from the basilican style. It had its rise in Constantinople, and was the fruitful parent of nearly all the later styles of Christian and Mohammedan architecture. Its finest example was the Church of St. Sophia, rebuilt by Justinian (A.D. 538), which has the most perfect interior of any church ever built. See St. Sophia. The other best examples of this style are the Church of St. Vitale, in Ravenna, and of St. Mark's, in Venice. The style prevailed in Asia when it gave birth to the Saracenic and the Armenian (and hence to the Russian), and in Western and North-western Italy, as well as in parts of France and Spain. Its chief characteristics are a central flat dome, illuminated by a row of small windows at its base; semicircular "apside" at the ends of the cross, covered with half domes; a profuse use of the round arch in colonnades and galleries within and without, of such varied sizes as to give great apparent size to the edifice; slender windows; a rather low entrance; the walls, and even pillars, covered with mosaic paintings, ornamented and scenic, thus giving the interior the greatest possible brilliancy and dignity; and capitals ornamented by a most remarkably rich interweaving of conventional elements borrowed from the antique or from life, and interspersed with animals fantastically disposed.

3. The different elements of the basilican and Byzantine styles were united first in Lombardy, then on the Rhine, and produced the Romanesque, or round-arch Gothic, which, rising from the 7th to the 10th centuries, and extending to the 12th, spread over most of Europe. Among the finest examples of this style are the Cathedrals of Pisa, Vercelli, Parma, Modena, and Lucca (in Italy), of Worms, Bonn, Mayence, Speyer, and the churches of St. Germain and St. Apostoll in Cologne (on the Rhine). To this style belong the peculiar churches and round towers of North Ireland, Scotland, Scandinavia, and the low round tower of Newport, R.I. In the round-arch style the aisles were covered with long arches instead of open wooden roofs. Bell-towers—round (as in Italy, the north of Europe, and elsewhere), or square, or octagonal, built separate from the church edifice (as in Italy) or joined to the edifice (as north of the Alps)—were added. The pillars broke from the antique rules of proportion, and were moulded into clustered columns. Small arched galleries ran around parts or the whole of the church, within and without. The exterior especially was covered with numerous well-disposed arches, pilasters, and other ornaments; richly-decorated doorways and windows drew the eye to the central part of the façade, and the whole external had a dignity not to be found in any other style of church architecture. The style prevailed throughout all Europe (excepting part of Italy) till the gradual introduction of the pointed arch gave rise to what is usually called the Gothic style.

4. Meanwhile the Saracenic style—another outgrowth of the Byzantine—had spread, with its numerous modifications, over all Mohammedan countries. It was modified largely by the Sassanian style (an outgrowth of the late Roman, as developed by the fire-worshippers of Persia) in the East, by the Spanish Romansque in Spain and Morocco, and by the basilican style in Sicily. It arose in the seventh century, and spread with truly tropical luxuriance and quickness of growth from Persia to the Atlantic. Deprived by the Mohammedan faith of the use of painting or sculpture, it developed an architectural ornamentation unsurpassed in the history of architecture by its richness and purely conventional character. Poetry took the place of the formative arts of sculpture and painting in the inscriptions from the Koran that were interwoven with the luxuriant ornament of the walls and columns. The Byzantine dome remained the principal feature of the roof, but this was hung with myriads of little semi-domes, producing a most fairy-like effect. Under the rich fancy of the Orient, color was used as freely as in the Egyptian style. The minaret was added, and gave a marvellous grace and lightness by its slender form. The pointed arch (adopted perhaps first from the court of a Christian monastery in Sicily erected in the sixth century) was soon adopted, and spread into the horse-shoe arch, finally developing itself into the complicated interwoven arches of the Moorish style. The style arose in the seventh century, and extended to the fifteenth, its culminating period being from the ninth to the eleventh centuries. The Turkish style is more Byzantine than Saracenic.

Among its most important monuments are the mosques and tombs of the sultans at Cairo, and Beja-poor and Delhi (India), the palaces and mosques of the Alhambra and of the Cuba (Palermo), and the Castle of Alcazar at Segovia (Spain). In the twelfth century, Central and Western Europe came into much more intimate contact than formerly with the Orient, especially through the Crusades, and the pointed arch and the spirit of ornamentation of the Saracenic art were borrowed, and added largely to the development of the Gothic from the Romanesque style.

5. The Gothic.—The round-arch or Romanesque style has given the Christian temple its almost complete plan, as far as concerns the disposition of the aisles, altar, choir, etc. The pointed arch began first in France and Normandy to supplant the round arch. The progress of this new feature was then gradual and fluctuating for over a century. The two arches are found used almost promiscuously till 1250, when the pointed arch, and all the constructive changes it induced, were used, purely and solely, for a century. This is hence called the golden period of the Gothic architecture. The use of this arch required, for harmony, a corresponding additional upward tendency in all the parts of the structure. To this was added a richness of conventionalized, foliated ornamentation, not surpassing, perhaps, that of the windows and doorways of some works of the round-arch style, but far more generally diffused and more harmoniously incorporated with the feeling of the entire edifice. The spire was made...

fan-shaped, the choir being encircled by a row of chapels; its principal ornament consists in the three large portals in front; columns replace the pillars; the circles and arches are not connected by chamfers or astylar, the arches of the tiercerons; the towers mostly square, and without the pyramidal apex; the perpendicular ascending tendency is balanced by a horizontal gallery in the façade. Its best specimens are Notre-Dame of Paris, and the cathedrals of Rouen, Dijon, Chartres, Rheims, Amiens, St. Ouen, &c. The Spanish style, on the contrary, tends to the horizontal, looks heavy, and the inside is generally overloaded with ornaments, as, for instance, the cathedrals of Toledo, Barcelona, Xéres, &c. The convent of Batalha is a fine specimen of the Portuguese Gothic, which is of purer style than the Spanish. The Gothic of Holland and Belgium partakes of the French and the German; the former prevails in the inside, and the latter in the outside, where we find large pointed windows, no rosettes, smaller portals, and high towers, as in the cathedrals of Amsterdam, Brussels, Utrecht, the Oude Kerk of Amsterdam, St. Laurentius of Rotterdam, &c. The English cathedrals likewise present the same characteristics. Most of the specimens belong to the so-called Tudor style; for instance, the Chapel of Henry VII. The Italian Gothic is distinguished from the same style as found in more northern countries by inclining more to the antique, and presenting the perpendicular features only in false façades, while in the actual buildings the horizontal predominates; it also preserves the walls in their original massiveness, instead of dividing them by means of pillars and windows; the foundations are broad, the choir ends in a quadrangle; they are surmounted by a cupola, but have no towers, as the cathedrals of Florence, Siena, Orvieto, Assisi, St. Antonio of Padua, St. Petronia of Bologna, St. Maria Novella of Florence, &c., etc. In the 15th and 16th centuries the spirit of the style had died out, though it still gave a tending to the character of the edifices erected in Germany and elsewhere, even as late as the 18th century.

5. The Renaissance.—In Italy the Gothic style had never taken such deep root as in the other countries of Europe. The revival of classical studies, and the tendency of the age to exalt ancient philosophy over Christianity, led to an extensive study of the antique. This spirit, carried into architecture, produced the Renaissance style, which is marked by an adaptation of classical (especially of Roman) architectural principles in the treatment of the church; the Christian (Christus) and the classical (Ceres) were united, and the roof of the arch was again resorted to. A massive dome was built over the centre of the cross. The columns resumed the classical proportions, or were made into massive pilasters. In the 17th century, and more especially in the 18th, architecture seemed to have broken away from all laws of proportion and harmony, and to have lost its predominance in church edifices. The churches seemed more galleries of painting or sculpture than architectural structures. The ornament became first massive, then overpowering, and was broken from its structural lines. It finally became trivial and inexpressive. ornament. Bossides and Fribourg (1527); but the Gothic style of France and Germany.

The most valuable architectural life of medieval times manifested itself in the great epochs of the Basle (4th to 6th centuries), Byzantine (7th to 14th centuries), Saracen (7th to 14th centuries), Romanesque (9th to 12th centuries), Gothic (12th to 19th centuries), and Renaissance (14th to 17th centuries). Puritans, therefore, the inscription leaves the Middle Gothic (1300). After the 16th century all true architecture died out, and the Rococo period (18th century) closed the second great division or history, and was followed by the modern in the 19th century.

III. The Modern.—The chief characteristic difference between the modern, and the ancient, and medieval, architecture, is that it is marked by no style such as is followed by all builders of the period in all lands where a certain civilization prevails. The inconsistencies and absurdities of the Rococo style of the latter part of the 18th century were felt under the purer taste awakened by the study of the history of architecture. A certain class of ancient and modern authors initiated a movement during the last fifty years. Attempts are making to revive the spirit of the pure age—of the Gothic (mostly in England), of the Renaissance (mostly in France), and of the Ancient Classical (mostly in Germany). A few architects and critics feel the necessity of having a new style of architecture, adapted to the wants of modern society, and to the use of the new materials (especially iron and glass) that science has brought within the reach of the builder.

In America the early church edifices had usually no architectural merits or pretensions. This arose from the poverty of the people, the lack of artistic education in the pioneer settlements. Architects and builders did not desire to set an example in the community, or from an honest desire to shun anything that might savour of pompous display in the house of God. Within the last twenty years a different spirit has animated all denominations of Christians, and a most healthy feeling prevails, manifesting itself in honest attempts to make the house of God a building worthy of its high and holy uses. The most important requisite for this is the development of a body of Christian architects from the church itself. These, permeated with the true Christian feeling, knowing the wants of the church, and cultivated in all the required departments of science and art, will be able to give an architecture suited to the wants of the present age. To accomplish this is needed the establishment of academies or departments of architecture in our universities and chairs of the fine arts in the colleges and theological seminaries.

Architecturin (Ἀρχιτεχνητός, master of the trichinus or dinner-bed [see Accubation]), rendered in John ii, 19 and iii, 21. The feast of the feast" is understood by some to refer to the Roman Magna Convivii. The Greeks also noted the same social office by the title of Symposiarch (συμποσιαρχος). He was not the giver of the feast, but one of the guests specially chosen to direct the entertainment, and promote harmony and good fellow-ship among the guests. The company was made up of 886.) In the apocryphal Ecclesiasticus (xxxv, 1, 2) the duties of this officer among the Jews are indicated.

He is there, however, called ἄγγελος: "If thou be made the master [of a feast], lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest; take diligent care for them, and so sit down; and when thou hast done all thy service, take thy place, that the eye of the owner of the feast with thee, and receive a crown for thy well ordering of the feast." (See Walch, De Archiarchis, 1768; Breidel, De loco Io. Eisenb. 1785.) See BASNET.

ARCHON (ἀρχιέρεα, a ruler), the title properly of the chief magistrates or rather executive officers of the Athenians during their democracy (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Ant. s. v.), and applied to various functionaries of a religious or political nature in the Syrian Jews during the Roman empire [see ALABARCH], and (2) technically a title in the Greek Church of several officers, e. g. the church-keeper, keeper of the book of Gospels, etc.

ARCHONTIC, a sect of the second century who rejected baptism, and held that the world was not created by the Almighty God, but by certain powers, seven or eight in number, whom they called Archontes (ἀρχόντες, rulers), to the chief of whom they gave the name of Sabaoth, the god of the Jews and the giver of the law, whom they blasphemously distinguished from the true God. Now, as they pretended that baptism was administered in the name of Sabaoth, and not in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the bishop of Eucharia. They held that woman was a creation of the devil. They were a branch of the Valentinians. —Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xi, ch. x, cap. 2; Tillemont, ii, 295; Landon, Eccl. Dict. i, 493.

Archdeacon or Archpriest, the head of the priests of the archdeacon was originally head of the deacons. Anciently, the minister next in order to the bishop, and generally the senior priest of the diocese bore this title, but Thomasin shows that the bishops frequently chose the ablest and not the senior priest as archdeacon. This was more frequently the case in the Greek than in the Latin Church, and some popes were altogether opposed to appointing any but the senior priest. The archdeacon acted as the representative of the bishop at public worship, while the archdeacon represented him in the government of the diocese. At first there was only one archdeacon in a diocese; but since the 6th and 7th centuries we find, besides one in the diocesan town, several in the country. The title of the County Minstrels of the diocese was divided into a number of archdeaconal districts, called archdeaconates, deaneries, Christianities (Christianitates), rural chapters. The powers of the archdeacon were: He had, in the name of his bishop, to superintend the clergy of his district, to execute the episcopal and synodal decrees, to present the candidates for the priesthood from his district to the bishop, and to settle difficulties between the clergy. On the first day of every month he held conferences with the clergy. He also reported to the archdeacon, and through him to the bishop, the graver offences of the laity. The archdeacon's church was the only church in the district in which baptism was dispensed (ecclesia baptismalium). The whole of the districts was sometimes called plesa, and the archdeacon plebanus, a title which in several countries is still in use. There are still archdeacons in the Greek Church, vested with most of the privileges of choripana, or the title of bishop in some cases. The title is also in use in some dioceses of the Roman Church, corresponding to the more common dean (q. v.). —Bingham, Orig. ARCTURUS (αρκτορύξ), a constellation between the Great Bear and Ophiuchus, the latter being called "son of the Great Bear." See GOAT; OPHIUCHUS; SWEDEN.
tens (Comment. in loc.) derives the Heb. word from an Arabic term signifying the night-beak, because Urs Major never sets; while Kimchi refers to it the Heb. צָעֵב, in the sense of a collection of stars; and Lud. de Dieu compares the Ethiopic name of the constellation Πενες; but the etymology first proposed above is preferable (see Bochart, Hieroz. II, 680; Al- sberg, p. 8, 63; Ideler, Unters. tab. 1. Stern-Namen, p. 8, 19; comp. Abuflada, p. 875; Eutych. p. 277; Schultens, Imp. Joc. p. 10, 82).—Genius, Theos. Heb. p. 895. Arcadius, Peter, a native of Corfu. The Popes Gregory XIV and Clement VIII tried, but unsuccessfully, to elude, about him, a union of the Greek Church in Russia with that of Rome. He died in Rome in 1635. He wrote Concord. eccles. Orient. et Occid. in septem sacramentis, etc. (Paris, 1619, fol.).—Nicetron, Memoires, xi, 56; Hoefer, Biog. Gen. iii, 74.

Ard (Heb. id. יָד, prob. for יַד, i. q. יָד, descend; Sept. ἀπείρον ὑπέραν. of King Agrippa, a grandson of Benjamin through Bela (Num. xxvi, 40). B.C. 1856. See Gen. xlii, 21, he appears as a son of Benjamin, where, however, the Sept. makes him a great-grandson through Gera as a son of Bela. In 1 Chron. viii, 3, he is called Addar. His descendants were called Ardites, Heb. Ar'dîs. יָדִית, Sept. ἀργίτης. (Num. xxvi, 40). See Benjamin. He is possibly the same with Ezron (1 Chron. vii, 7).

Ar'datî (Lat. Ardaith, the Gr. text being no longer extant), the name of a "field" mentioned only in the Aposchrypha (2 Vulg. 4 Esdr. ix, 26) as the scene of the vision of the bereaved woman; no doubt a fanciful appellation.

Ar'dote (Num. xxvi, 40). See Ard.

Ar'dón (Heb. Ar'don, יָדִון descend mt, others fugitive; Sept. ἀπειρον v. r. ὑπέραν. the last-named of the three sons of Caleb by his first wife Azubah (1 Chron. ii, 18). B.C. ante 1593.

Ara'hil (Heb. Ara'il, אֶרֶל, heroic, fr. Ariel; Sept. ἀρρήλις; ἀρέλης), the last-named of the seven sons of Gad (Gen. xli. 16). B.C. 1873. His descendants were called Ar'elites (Heb. id., Sept. ἀρέλες. Num. xxvi, 17).

Are'lite (Num. xxvi, 17). See Arel.

Areeop'agite (Ἀρέσσωπος, a member (Acts xvii, 34) of the court of Areopagus (q. v.). This, as constituted by Solon, consisted of nine archons (chief magistrates) for the year, and the ex-archons.

The latter became members for life; but before their admission, they were submitted to, at the close of their annual magistracy, to a rigid scrutiny into their conduct in office and their private morals. Proof of criminal or unbecoming conduct was sufficient also afterward to expel them. Various accounts are given of the number to which the Areopagites were limited. If there was any fixed number, admission to the council could not have been a necessary discharge from the archonship. But it is more probable that the accounts which limit the number are applicable only to the earlier period of its existence (see the anonymous argument to Demosthenes' Oration against Areopagus, the Latin form of the Greek words (�이 Ἀρέσσωπος), signifying, in reference to place, Mars' Hill, but, in reference to persons, the council which was held on the hill. The council was also termed ἰν ἀρέσσωπος ἡμῶν δουλεία (or η δουλεία ἰν ἀρέσσωπος), the Council on Mars' Hill. Sometimes ἰν δουλεία, the Upper Council, from the elevated position where it was held, and sometimes simply, but emphatically, δουλεία, the Council; but it retained till a late period the original designation of Mars' Hill, being called by the Latins Scopus Martis, Curtia Martis (Juvenal, Sat. ix, 101), and still more literally, Areum Judicium (Tact. Annal. ii, 55). The place was a rocky height in Athens, opposite the western end of the Acropolis, from which it is separated only by an elevated valley. It rises gradually from the northern end, and terminates abruptly on the south, over against the Acropolis, at which point it is about fifty or sixty feet above the valley already mentioned. Of the site of the Areopagus there can be no doubt, both from the description of Pausanias, and from the narrative of Herodotus, who relates that it was a height over against the Acropolis, from which the Persians assailed the latter rock (Paus. i, 28, § 5; Herod. vii, 52). According to tradition, it was called the hill of Mars (Areus) because this god was brought to trial here before the assembled gods by Neptune (Poseidon) on account of his murdering Halirrhothius, the son of the latter. The meetings were held on the south-eastern summit of the rock. There are still sixteen stone steps cut in the rock, leading up to the hill from the valley of the Agora below; and immediately above the steps is a bench of stones excavated in the rock, forming three sides of a quadrangle, and facing the south. Here the Areopagites sat as judges in the open air (κατήματοι Ἰιωννικοῦ, Pollux, viii, 118). On the eastern and western side is a raised block. These blocks are probably the rude stones which Pausanias saw there, and which are described by Euripides as assigned, the one to the accuser, the other to the criminal, in the causes which were tried in the court (Pind. T. 961).—Smith. See Areopagite.

The Areopagus possesses peculiar interest to the Christian as the spot from which Paul delivered his memorable address to the men of Athens (Acts xxiv, 22-31). It has been supposed by some commentators that he was brought before the Council of Areopagus, but there is no trace in the narrative of any judicial proceedings. Paul "disputed daily" in the "market" or Agora (xvii, 17), which was situated south of the Areopagus, in the valley lying between this hill and those of the Acropolis, the Pnyx, and the Museum. Attracting more and more attention, "certain philosophers of the Epicureans and Stoics" brought him up from the valley, probably by the steps already mentioned, to the Areopagus above, that they might listen to him more conveniently. Here the philosophers probably took their seats on the stone benches usually occupied by the members of the council, while the multitude stood upon the steps and in the valley below. The digested bearing of the apostle is worthy of high admiration, the more so from the associations of the spot (see Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 346-379).

Nor does his eloquent discourse appear to have been without good effect; for, though some mocked, and some procrastinated, yet others believed, among whom was a member of the council, "Dionysius, the Areopagite," who has been represented as the first bishop of Athens, and is said to have written books on the "Celestial Hierarchy;" but their authenticity is questioned. The history in the Acts (xvii. 22) states that the speaker "stood in the midst of Mars Hill" (see Robinson's Researches, i. 10-12). Having come up from the level parts of the city, where the markets (there were two, the old and the new) were, he would probably stand with his face toward the north, and would then have immediately behind him the long walls which ran down to the sea, affording protection against a foreign enemy. Near the sea, on one side, was the harbor of Piraeus, on the other that designated Phalerum, with their crowded arsenals, their busy workmen, and their gallant ships. Not far off in the ocean lay the island of Salamis, ennobled forever in history as the spot near which Athenian valor chastized Asiatic pride, and achieved the liberty of Greece. The apostle had only to turn toward his right hand to catch a view of a small but celebrated hill rising within the city near that on which he stood, called the Pnyx, where, standing on a block of bare stone, Demosthenes and other distinguished orators had addressed the assembled people of Athens, swaying that arrogant and sordid democracy, and thereby making

Philip of Macedon trembled, or working good or ill for the entire civilized world. Immediately before him lay the crowded city, studded in every part with memorials sacred to religion or patriotism, and exhibiting the highest achievements of art. On his left, somewhat beyond the walls, was beheld the Academy, with its groves of plane and olive trees, its retired walks and cooling fountains, its altar to the Musea, its statue of the Graces, its Temple of Minerva, and its altar to Prometheus, to Love, and to Hercules, near which Plato had his country-seat, and in the midst of which he had taught, as well as his followers after him. But the most impressive spectacle lay on his right hand; for there, on the small and precipitous hill named the Acropolis were clustered together monuments of the highest art, and memorials of the national religion, such as no other equal spot of ground has ever borne. The apostle's eyes, in turning to the right, would fall on the north-west side of the eminence, which was here (and all round) covered and protected by a wall, parts of which were so ancient as to be of Cyclopean origin. The western side, which alone gave access to what from its original destination may be termed the fort, was, during the administration of Pericles, adorned with a splendid flight of steps, and the beautiful Propylaia, a noble portico of Doric columns, constructed by Mnesicles of Pentelic marble, at a cost of 20 talents. In the times of the Roman emperors there stood before the Propylaia equestrian statues of Augustus and Agrippa. On the southern wing of the Propylaia was a temple of Wingless Victoria, called the Pandroseum, where, from the architecture, the ancient wooden image of Pallas, etc., was the scene of the oldest and most venerated ceremonies and recollections of the Athenians. Between the Propylaia and the Erechtheum was placed the colossal bronze statue of Pallas Promachos, the work of Thaddaeus, and immediately behind it were the buildings of that the plume of her helmet and the point of her spear were visible on the sea between Sunium and Athens. Moreover the Acropolis was occupied by so great a crowd of statues and monuments, that the account, as found in Pausanias, excites the reader's wonder. The work was so difficult for him to understand how so much could have been accomplished. The temple extended from the south-east corner to the south-west only 1150 feet, while its greatest breadth did not exceed 560 feet. On the hill itself where Paul had his station, was, at the eastern end, the temple of the Furies, and other national and commemorative edifices. The court-house of the council, which was also here, was, according to the simplicity of ancient customs, built of clay. There was an altar consecrated by Orestes to Athene Areia. In the same place were seen two silver stones, on one of which stood the accuser, on the other the accused. Near them stood two altars, one to Déméter (Cic. Cont. Clocn.) the other to Shamelessness (Antid. Cloc. Imprud.). See Athen.

The court of Areopagus was one of the oldest and most honored, not only in Athens, but in the whole of Greece, and indeed in the ancient world. Through a long succession of centuries it preserved its existence amid changes corresponding with those which the state underwent, till at least the age of the Cæsars (Tacitus, Ann. ii. 55). The ancients are full ofalogies on its value, equity, and beneficial influence; in consequence of which qualities it was held in so much respect that even foreign states sought its verdict in difficult cases. But after Greece had submitted to the yoke of Rome, it retained probably little of its ancient character beyond a certain dignity, which was itself cold and barren; and however successful it may in earlier times have been in conciliating for its determinations the approval of public opinion, the historian Tacitus mentions a case in which it was charged with an erroneous, if not a corrupt, decision. The origin of the court ascends back into the darkest mythical period. From the first its constitution was essentially aristocratic; a character which to some extent it retained even after the democratic reforms which Solon introduced into the Athenian Constitution. By his appointment the nine archons became for the remainder of their lives Areopagites, provided they had well discharged the duties of their archonship, were blameless in their personal conduct, and had undergone a satisfactory examination. Its power and jurisdiction were still farther abridged by Pericles through his instrument Ephialtes. Following the political destinies of the state, the Areopagus became in process of time less and less aristocratic, and parted piecemeal with most of its important functions. First its political power was taken away, then its jurisdiction in cases of murder, and even its moral influence gradually departed. During the sway of the Third Periclean dynasty its existence, was destroyed. On their overthrow it recovered some consideration, and the oversight of the execution of the laws was restored to it by an express decree. Isocrates endeavored by his Ἀριστοκρατικός λόγος to revive its ancient influence. The precious time when it ceased to exist cannot be determined; but evidence is not wanting to show that in later periods its members ceased to be uniformly characterized by blameless morals.

It is not easy to give a correct summary of its several functions, as the classic writers are not agreed in their statements, and the jurisdiction of the court varied, as his name is various in the decisions which have, however, been divided into six general classes (Real-Encyclopädie von Pauly, s. v.)

(1.) its judicial function embraced trials for murder and manslaughter (φόνου ἱέσιν, τα φώνευς), and was the oldest and most peculiar sphere of its activity. The innocent or the second or king archon (ἄρχον το βασιλική), whose duties were for the most part of a religious nature. The oaths of both parties, accompanied by solemn appeals to the gods. After this the accuser and the accused had the option of making a speech (the notion of the proceedings of the Areopagus being carried on in the darkness and with no particular form). In cases in which, however, they were obliged to keep free from all extraneous matter (έτων τον πράγματος), as well as from mere rhetorical ornaments. After the first speech, the accused was permitted to go into voluntary ben- efitment if he had no reason to expect a favorable issue. Theft, poisoning, wounding, incendiarism, and treason belonged also to this department of jurisdiction in the court of the Areopagus.

(3.) Its police function also made it a protector and upholder of the institutions and laws. In this charac- ter the Areopagus had jurisdiction over novelties in religion, in worship, in customs, in every thing that departed from the traditionary and established usages and modes of thought (παροιμίας ποιμαίας) which regard to their ancestors endarmed to the nation. This was an ancient and well-supported sphere of activity. The members of the court had a right to take oversight of festive meetings in private houses. In ancient times they fixed the number of the guests, and determined the style of the entertainment. If a person had no obvious means of subsistence, or was known to live in idleness, he was liable to an action before the Areopagus; if condemned three times, he was punished with ἀπειρία, the loss of his civil rights. In later times the court possessed the right of giving permission to teachers (philosophers and rhetoricians) to es- tablish themselves and pursue their profession in the city.

(4.) Its strictly religious jurisdiction extended itself over the public creed, worship, and sacrifices, embrac- ing generally every thing which could come under the denomination of ῥα ὑπα—they are things. It was Its special duty to see that the religion of the state was kept pure from all foreign elements. The accusation of impiety (ὕπαξ αἰθέριος)—the vagueness of which admitted almost any charge connected with religious innovations—belonged in a special manner to this tribunal, though the charge was in some cases heard before the court of the Heliasite. The freethinking poet Euripides stood in fear of, and was restrained by, the Areopagus. (Euseb. Prep. Evan. vi. 14; Bayle, s. v. Exerip.) Its proceeding in such cases was sometimes rather of an admonitory than punitive character.

(5.) Not less influential was its moral and educational power. Isocrates speaks of the care which it took of good manners and good order (Tesis eikoneia, eikones). Quintilian relates that the Areopagus condemned a boy for plucking out the eyes of a quail—a sentence which has been both misunderstood and misrepresented (Pewsey Cyclop. s. v.), but which its original author approved, assigning no insufficient reason, namely, that the act was the sign of a cruel disposition, likely in advanced life to lead to beneficent actions (Quintil. v. 5). The court exercised a salutary influence in general over the Athenian youth, their educators and their education.

(6.) Its financial position is not well understood; most probably it varied more than any other part of its administration with the changes which the constitution underwent. It was entrusted to management, on the authority of Plutarch (Themis, c. 10), that in the Persian war the Areopagus had the merit of completing the number of men required for the fleet by paying eight drachmas to each.—Kitto, s. v.

Aretas (Apicis), one of those whose "sons" (to the number of 656) is said (1 Esdr. v. 10) to have returned from Babylon; evidently the Araah (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ex. ii. 5; Neh. vii. 10).

Aretas (Apizes; Arab. charzehh, Prococchi, Spec. Hist. Arab. p. 58, or, in another form, charuzah = "the charizas," guver, Prococchi, i. 70, 77, 87), the common name of several Arabian kings (see also 2 Esdr. Sie. xiv, 70; comp. Wesseling; Michaelis, in Pott's Syll. iii. 62 sq.).

The first of which we have any notice was a contemporary of the high-priest Jason and of Antiochus Epiphanes, about B.C. 170 (2 Macc. v. 8):

"In the end, therefore, he [Jason] had an unhappy return, being accused before Aretas, the king of the Arabians."

2. Josephus (Ant. xiii, 13, 3) mentions an Aretas, king of the Abanians (surnamed Obodas, O'Bayzian, Ant. xiii. 13, 5), contemporary with Alexander Jannaeus (died B.C. 79) and his sons. After defeating Antiochus the Great, be returned over Ceela-Syria; "being called to the government by those who held Damascus (σανεις τος αρχην των την δαμασκηνναν ευχαιριας) by reason of the hatred they bore to Ptolemy Menneus" (Ant. xiii. 15, 2). He took part with Hyrcanus, who had taken refuge with him (War, i. 62, 6), against Herod (Ant. xiv. 2, 2). After the death of Hyrcanus (Ant. xiv. 5, 4) he took the sovereignty with his brother Aristobulus (q. v.), and laid siege to Jerusalem (B.C. 65), but, on the approach of the Roman general Scouras, he retreated to Philadelphia (War, i. 6, 8). Hyrcanus and Aretas were pursued and defeated by Aristobulus at a place called Papyron, and lost above 6000 men (Ant. xiv. 2, 8). After Pompey had reduced Syria to a Roman province, Aretas was submitted to him (Ant. xiv. 18, 4).-Appian, Mith. 166; Plut. Pompeii, 39, 41). Three or four years after, Scouras, to whom Pompey had committed the government of Coele-Syria, invaded Petrea, but, finding it difficult to obtain provisions for his army, he consented to withdraw on the offer of 300 talents from Aretas (Josephus, Ant. xiv. 5, 1; War, i. 8, 1). This expedition is commemorated on a coin. See Scouras. The successors of Scouras in Syria also prosecuted the war with the Arabs (Appian, Syr. 50).—Kitto, s. v.

Probable Coin of Aretas II, with the Greek Inscription, "Of King Aretas Philikoleon" (Lover of the Greeks)—an epithet perhaps assumed by him on acquiring his dominion.

3. Aretas, whose name was originally Aneas (Ae-riac), succeeded Obodas. (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 5, 4). He was the father-in-law of Herod Antipas. The latter made place of marriage, of his half-brother Herod-Philip, Herodias, the daughter of Aristobulus, their brother, and the sister of Agrippa the Great. (On the apparent discrepancy between the Evangelists and Josephus, in reference to the name of the husband of Herodias, see Lardner's Credibility, ii. 5; Wetzi, 1854, i. 408-416.) In consequence of this the daughter of Aretas returned to her father, and a war (which had been fomented by previous disputes about the limits of their respective countries, see Joseph. Ant. xvii, 10, 9) ensued between Aretas and Herod. The army of the latter was totally destroyed; and on his seeing an account of his disaster to Rome the emperor immediately ordered Vitellius to bring Aretas prisoner alive, or, if dead, to send his head (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 1). But while Vitellius was on his march to Petra, news arrived of the death of Tiberius (A.D. 37), upon which, after administering the oath of allegiance to his troops, he disbanded them en masse and returned to Rome (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 3). The Aretas into whose dominions Eliaus Gellius came in the time of Augustus (Strabo, xvi, 781) is probably the same. There is another coin extant inscribed Φυλαξιος, i. e. lover of the Greeks (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. iii. 380), that may have belonged to this Aretas.—Kitto, s. v.

It has been supposed by many that it was at the above junction that Aretas took possession of Damascus, and placed a governor in it (Ibttvpaas), with a garrison, as stated by the Apostle Paul: "In Damascus the governor under Aretas, the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me; and through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands" (2 Cor. xi, 32, compared with Acts ix, 24). In that case we are furnished with a chronological mark in the apostle's history. From Gal. i, 18, it appears that Paul went up to Jerusalem from Damascus three years after his conversion. See Paul. The Emperor Tiberius died March 16, A.D. 37; and, as the affairs of Arabia were settled in the second year of Caligula, Damascus was then most probably reoccupied by the Romans. The city under Augustus and Tiberius was attached to the province of Syria; and we have Damascene coins of both these emperors, and again of Nero and his successors. But we have none of Caligula and Claudius, and the following circumstances make it probable that the rulehip of Damascus was changed after the death of Tiberius. By this occurrence at Rome a complete reversal took place in the situation of Antipas and his enemy. The former was ere long (A.D. 39) banished to Lyons, and his kingdom given to Agrippa, his foe (Ant. xvi, 7), who had been living in habits of intamcy with the new emperor (Ant. xvi, 6, 5). It would be natural that Aretas, who had been grossly injured by Antipas, should, by this change of affairs, be received into favor; and the more so as Vitellius had an old grudge against Antipas (Ant. xviii, 4, 5). Now in the year 38 Caligula made several changes in the East, granting Hurraeus to Zeumius. Lesser Armenia and parts of Aria to Cotsy, the territory of Cotsy to Rhaiaetaces, and giving to Polemon, son of Polemon, his father's government. These facts, coupled with that of no Damascus coins of Caligula or Claudius existing, make it probable that about this time Damascus, which belonged to the predecessor of Aretas (Ant. xiii, 6, 9), was granted to him by Caligula. The other hypotheses, that the ethnarch was only visiting the city (as if he could then have guarded the walls to prevent escape), that Aretas had seized Damascus on Vitellius giving up the expedition against him (as if a Roman governor of a province would allow one of its chief cities to be taken from him merely because he was in uncertainty about the policy of a new emperor), are very improbable (Wieseler, Chron. des apostolischen Zeitalters, p. 174). If, then, Paul's flight took place in A.D. 39, his conversion must have occurred in A.D. 36 (Neander's History of the Planting of the Christian Church, i, 107; Lardner's Credibility, etc., Supplement, ch. x; Works, v, 497, ed. 1855; Schmidt in Keil's Analecti. iii, 186 sqq.; Bertholdt, Einl. v, 270 sq). But it is still more likely that the possession of Damascus by Aretas to which Paul alludes occurred earlier, on the account of his daughter by the es- ophon of Herodes (Luke iii, 19; Matt. xi, 16; Mark vi, 16; Matt. xiv, 3), which stands in connection with the death of John the Baptist (q.v.); and in that case it affords neither date nor difficulty in the apostle's history (see Brown's Ordo Saeculorum, p. 113 n; Conybeare and Howson, i, 62; Smith's Dict. of Class. Bio- grafie, s. v.; See Chronology.

4. One or more other kings of Arabia by the same name are mentioned in history (Strabo, xvi, 781; Dio Cass. xxxv, 15; comp. Assemani, Bibl. Oriental. i, 567; ii, 531; iii, 119; and a coin of one of them is ex- tant (Miwonet, Desc. des medailles antiques, p. 284, 285; comp. Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul, i, 107); but it is not clear that the Aretas whom Josephus names as having a contest with Syllaus (Ant. xvii, 8, 2; War, i, 29, 8) was different from the preceding, and the succeeding kings of that name are unimportant in any Scriptural relation (see Anger, De tempor. ratione, p. 178; Heyne, De Aretae Arabiae rege, Viteb. 1775; Hcmlm, De ethmaarcha Judeorum Paulo obediante, Jen. 1757).

Aretas, or Aretbas, a bishop of Cessarea, in Cappadocia, is supposed to have lived in the second half of the sixth century. He wrote a Commentary on the Revelation (Σελίμπρα ιππεριως), giving a collection of the words of different authors. See Andrew (Bishop of Cessarea).

Aretius, Benedictus, a celebrated Swiss theologian; professor of logic at Marburg, in 1548; ap- pointed professor of languages at Bern, in Switzerland, 1568, and professor of theology of the college, in which office he remained until his death in 1574, leaving many works, among them—1. Examen Theologi- corum, or Leśna Comeniana (Geneva, 1569 and 1618); 2. voluminous work, much sought after at the time—5. Commentarius Ereves in Pentateuchum (Berne, 1692):—

8. Lectiones xii de Cena Domini (Geneva, 1589):—

Areóthai, a king of the Lacedaemonians, whose letter to the high-priest Onias is given in 1 Macc. xii, 20 sq. He is so called in the A. V. in ver. 20 and in the margin of ver. 7; but Omahas in ver. 19, and so in the Greek text Ομαχας (v. r. Όμαχας, Ομαχας) in ver. 20, and so in the LXX (και εγγευθη ἡ Ομαχας) in ver. 2. There is no doubt, however, that these are corruptions of Αρείας. In Josephus (Ant. xii, 4, 10) the name is written (Ἀρείας) as in the Vulgate Aretas. There were two Spartan kings of the name of Aretus, of whom the first reigned B.C. 695-665, and the second, the grandee of the former, died when a child of eight years old in B.C. 257. There were three high-priests of the name of Onias, of whom the first held the office B.C. 323-300. This is the one who must have written the letter to Aretus I, probably in some interval between 309 and 300 (Grimm, Zu Macc. p. 186). See Onias. This Aretus was foremost in the league of the states against Antigonus Gonatus (B.C. 280), and when Pylus- 114 attacked Sparta (B.C. 272) he expelled him by an alliance with the Arcaves. He fell in battle against the Macedonians at Corinth (Smith's Dict. of Class. Bio- grafie, s. v.);—Smith, s. v.

Aretus, Codex (silva manuscipti). a MS. of part of the N. T., so called from the silver letters in which it is written, which was in the possession of the University of Upsal, and is a copy from the Greek version of Ulphilas, which was made in the fourth century. It is of a quarto size, is written on vellum, the leaves of which are stained with a violet color; and on this ground the letters, which are all uncial, or capitals, are painted in silver, except the initial letters, which are in gold, of course now much faded. It contains fragments of the four gospels (in the Latin order, Matth., John, Luke, Mark) on 188 (out of about 820) leaves, so regularly written that some have imagined they were impressed with a stamp. This MS. was first discovered by Ant. Morillon in 1597, in the library of the Benedictines abbey of Werden, in Westphalia, but by some means it was deposited in Prague, and was taken to Stockholm by the Swedes on the capture of the former place in 1648. Queen Christina appears to have given it to her librarian Vossius prior to 1655, and while in his hands a transcript of it was made. Through the agency of Puffendorf, it was purchased by Count de la Gardie for the Swedish library, where it still remains. Vossius had previously placed the MS. in his uncle Junius's hands for publication; and in 1665 the text of the Gothic gospels, so far as contained in this codex, was edited by David De Vries, accompanied by the Gothic Saxon version, edited by Thos. Marshall. This ed- ition was in Gothic characters cut for the purpose, and

states in South America, consisting in 1835, when Britain emancipated her colonies from the British, and had been remitting, of 14 provinces, with a population of about 1,717,800. It constituted itself an independent state in 1816. The population, partly Europeans, partly Africans, partly Indians, partly of mixed descent, belong mostly to the Roman Catholic Church. The inhabitants of the country districts (Tampereos) surround in numbers the other tribes of South America, and show very little interest in religion. The Roman Catholic Church has five bishoprics, Buenos Ayres, Cordova, Salta, Sarana, and Cuyo, all of which are suffragans of the archbishop of Charcas, in Bolivia.
In 1835 religious toleration was granted to all denomi-inations, and in 1835 mixed marriages were allowed, provided that the parents agreed to bring up all the children in the Roman Catholic Church. The tithes were placed under the administration of the government, which uses one part of them for school and other objects of common interest. The convents were suppressed except one convent of Franciscans and two convents of nuns, and their property confiscated.
Later, the Dominicans were again allowed to settle, and the Franciscans to receive new members from Spain. The Jesuits established themselves at Buenos Ayres in 1841. In 1858 there were disturbances at Buenos Ayres in consequence of the bishop prohibiting ecclesiastical rites at the burial of freemen.
Protestant missionaries came to the Argentine Confederation from the United States in 1835, and many copies of the Scriptures were disseminated. A treaty with the United States in 1857 guaranteed freedom of Protestant worship and burial. The Methodist mission in Buenos Ayres, commenced in a flourishing condition. The church and congregation support the pastor and pay the current expenses of the church and parsonage. According to the report of the Rev. William Goodfellow, superintendent of the Methodist missions in South America, there were, in 1864, appointments at Tete, Lobos, Guardia del Monte, Canelones, and Puy, all in the province of Buenos Ayres. At Azul, in the same province, about seventy leagues from the city of Buenos Ayres, where there is a fine region, rapidly filling up with good Protestant settlers, a separate charge has been arranged, holding a quarterly conference.

In the province of Santa Fé, Rosario, Entre Rios, and the aggregate population of 12,000 or more, has a rapidly increasing Protestant population, and already possesses a Protestant cemetery, which was consecrated in 1864.
At Esperanza, also in the province of Santa Fé, there were at that date about 600 Protestants, who were so located as to constitute an important point, reference to further extensions. San Carlos, in the same province, had a Protestant population of 300 Germans and French, whose number bade fair to increase rapidly by immigration. Another settlement of European Protestants was at San José, near Parana, in the province of Entre Rios. It is the seat of a church, and these Protestant colonists would unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1864 the church counted 88 members and 35 probationers, and a flourishing Sabbath-school, with 155 scholars and 20 officers. See

Min. Soc. of the M. E. Church (N. Y. 1866). See Argenzé, Charles de Plessis d', bishop of Talle, was born in the Castle du Plessis, near Vitre, May 16, 1763, and died Oct. 27, 1740. In 1739 he was appointed by Louis XIV to the abbey of St. Cris de Guingamp, and in 1740 he became a doctor of the Sor-bonne. In 1750 he attended the General Assembly of the clergy of France as a deputy of the second order from the province of Tours. In 1707 he was appointed by the bishop of Tréguier vicar general; in 1706, almoner of the king; and in 1723, bishop of Tulle. In 1723 he also attended the General Assem-Argob (Heb. Argob) דּוֹגָב for גָּבָה, with a prosthetic, stem-k n, the name of a place and also of a man.

1. (Sept. Apagab, but in Kings Apagaj). A district in Basban beyond the lake Gennesaret, containing 60 cities (Havorit Jair), originally ruled over by Og (Deut. iv, 14), and eventually formed into a pur-veyorship by Solomon (1 Kings iv, 18). The name may probably be traced in the Ragab (רָגָבּ) of the Mishna (Menachoth, viii, 3), the Rigogad (רִגּוֹגַדּ) of the Samaritan version (see Winer's Diz. de vers.
Samar. index, p. 55), the Rigoba (Payaqot) of Josephus (Ant. xiii, 15, 5), and the Argi or Ergada (Egqaja) placed by Jerome and Eusebius (Onomast. s. v.
Argob) 15 Roman miles west of Gerasa (see Rend.
Palest. ii, 939). Josephus elsewhere (Ant. viii, 2, 5) seems to locate it in Jachin (q.v.) in Gilead, a le-itis, where Burekhardt is disposed to find it in El Hums, a remarkable ruined site (Syria, p. 279), but Mr. Banks (Quar. Rev. xxvi, 389) has assigned this Dr. Robinson identifies it with the modern village with ruins called Rigó, a few miles north-west of the junction of the Jabbok with the Jordan (Steenkirk, iii, Append. p. 166); and Dr. Thomson very properly remarks that it probably denotes rather the whole adjacent region, for the hill on which Om-Keis (somewhat to the north) stands is called Arkub by the Bedouins (Land and Book, ii, 54).—Kitto, s. v.

From this special or original locality, however, the term Argob seems to have been extended in its application to designate a large tract to the north-east; for we find it identified (as Josephus above) with Trachonitis (i.e. the rough country) in the Targums (Onkelos and Jonathan אֹקְלָנָס, Jerusalem אֹקְלָנָס). Later we trace it in the Arabic version of Saadia as Mejeb (with the same meaning); and it is now appartently identified with the Lejb, a very distract south of Tiberias, and to the east of the Sea of Galilee, which has been visited and described by Burekhardt (p. 111-119), Seetzen, and Porter (especially ii, 240-246). This extraordinary region—about 22 miles from north to south, by 14 from west to east, and of a regular, almost oval shape—has been described as an ocean of basaltic rocks and boulders, tossed about in the wildest confusion, and intermingled with fissures and crevices in every direction. "It is," says Mr.
Porter, "wholly composed of black basalt, which appears to have issued from innumerable pores in the earth in a liquid state, and to have flowed out on every side. Before reaching its surface it was coagulated, and it was afterward shattered and rent by internal convulsions. The cup-like cavities from which the liquid mass was extruded are still seen, and likewise the wavy surface a thick liquid assumes which cools while flowing. The rock is filled with little pits and air-bubbles; it is as hard as flint, and emits a sharp metallic sound when struck. As it seems as if it may be called, this ungenius and forbidding region is thickly studded with deserted cities and villages, in all of which the dwellings are solidly built, and of remote antiquity" (p. 238). The number of these towns visited by one traveller lately returned is 50, and there were many others to which he did not go. A Roman road runs through the district from south to north, probably between Bosra and Damascus. On the edge of the Lejik are situated, among others, the towns known in Biblical history as Renath and Edrei. In the absence of more conclusive evidence on the point, a strong presumption in favor of the identification of the site arises from the Aram, or Arber, Halfa, and the word constantly attached to Argob, and in this definite sense apparently to Argob only. This word is בַּלְקַח (Belak), literally “a rope” (שויינא, πεταλογροσ, fumicula), and it designates with striking accuracy the remarkably defined boundary-line of the district of the Lejik, which is spoken of repeatedly by its latest explorer as “a rocky shore”; “sweeping round in a line defined as a rocky shore-line”; “resembling a Cyclopean wall in ruins” (Porter, i, 10, 219, 230, etc.). The extraordinary features of this region are rendered still more striking by the contrast which it presents with the surrounding plain of the Hauran, a high plateau of waving downs of the richest agricultural soil strewn with the Seat ofGalilee, and beyond that to the desert, almost literally “without a stone”; and it is not to be wondered at—if the identification proposed above be correct—that this contrast should have struck the Israelites, and that their language, so scrupulous of minute topographical distinctions, should have perpetuated in the Lejik and Belak (which are severally) once the level downs of Bashan (q. v.), the stony labyrinth which so suddenly intrudes itself on the soil (Argob), and the definite fence or boundary which incloses it.—Smith, s. v. See Hauran.

2. (Sept. 'Aργύρη). A subalturn or alliy of Pekahiah (B.C. 757), as appears from 2 Kings xv. 25, where we read that Pekah conspired against Pekahiah, king of Israel, and “smote him in Samaria, in the palace of the king’s house, with Argob and Ariel.” In giving this version, some think our translators have mistaken the sense of the original, which they therefore render “smote him in the harem of the palace of the king of Argob and Ariel,” as if these were the names of two cities in Samaria. Others, however, maintain, with good reason, that the particle ταξινομητος properly translated with, i.e. these two officers were assassinated at the same time; so the Sept. (μετα). It will hardly bear the other construction: the word strictly denotes near (Vulg. juxta), but that would yield no tolerable sense to the whole passage (see Keil, Comment. in loc.). According to some, Argob was an accomplice of Pekah in this conspiracy against Pekahiah; and this is confirmed by the fact that both Argob and Arieh were two princes of Pekahiah whose influence Pekah feared, and whom he therefore slew with the king. Rashi understands by Argob the royal palace, near which was the castle in which the murder took place. In like manner, Arieh, named in the same connection (“the lion,” so called probably from his daring as a warrior), was either one of the accomplices of Pekah in his conspiracy against Pekahiah, or, as Schmid understands, one of the princes of Pekahiah, who was put to death with him. Rashi explains the latter name literally by a golden lion which stood in the castle. See Pekah.

Argyle (Erugia), an episcopal see in Scotland; the diocese contains the counties or districts of Argyle, Lothian, and Lochar, with the kingdoms of the Western Isles, as Lismore, where the see is. The present title of the see is “Argyle and the Western Isles,” and the incumbent in 1865 was Alexander Ewing, D.D., consecrated in 1847.

Ari. See Lion.

Arialdus, deacon and martyr of the church of Milan in the 11th century. The Roman Church in the north of Italy was then very corrupt; a wide-spread licentiousness, originating from the unnatural institution of priestly celibacy, prevailed. Great numbers of the clergy kept concubines openly. Some earnest men, shocked by this flagrant evil, vainly in- agned the strict enforcement of celibacy the only ef- fectual cure. Chief among these reformers stood Arialdus, whose life was one continued scene of violent controversy. Although successively sanctioned by Pope Stephen III. and Nicholas III., the Reformer found little sympathy among his brethren, and used to complain that he could only get laymen to assist him in his agitation. Having at length succeeded in obtaining a papal bull of excommunication against the archbishop of Milan, a fierce tumult ensued in the city, and the Reformer declined, on the barest pretext, to aid his coadjutors. Arialdus now fled to the country; but his hiding-place being betrayed, he was conveyed captive to a desert island in Lake Maggiore, where he was murdered by the emissaries of the archbishop, and his remains thrown into the lake, June 26, 1066. His cause was at last canonized by Pope Alexander II.—Acta Sanctorum, June 28; Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v.

ARIANISM, a heresy with regard to the person of Christ which spread widely in the church from the fourth to the seventh centuries. It took its name from Arius, a presbyter of Alexandria, said to have been a Libyan, and a man of subtle, but not profound mind. The main part of his doctrine is that the Son was in the school of Lucian the martyr at Antioch; and the doctrinal position of Lucian (scientifically nearer to the subsequent doctrine of Arius than of Athanasius) helps to explain not only how Arius’s view arose, but also how it happened to be so widely received (comp. Dornier, Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 227; See Athanasius). duly, he is said to have favored Meletius (q. v.), who was deposed A.D. 806; but it appears that Peter, bishop of Alexandria, the great enemy of Meletius, ordained Arius deacon (Sozom., Hist. Eccl. i, 15) about A.D. 811; but, so far as we have any account of his disposition, ejected him. When Peter was dead, Arius fled penniless to Egypt; and being pardoned by Achillas, who succeeded Peter, he was by him raised to the priesthood, and intrusted with the church of Baeccalis, in Alexandria (Epiph. Hær. 68, 4). It is said that on the death of Achillas, A.D. 813, Arius was greatly mortified because Alexander was preferred before him, and made bishop, and that he consequently sought every occasion of exciting tumults against Alexander; but this story rests simply on a remark of Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. i, 2) that Arius was envious of Alexander.

1. Ancient Arianism.—1. First Period: to the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. The doctrine of Arius gained currency; and he soon began to teach a doctrine concerning the person of Christ inconsistent with His divinity. “When Alexander had one day been addressing his clergy, and insisting that the Son is co-essential, and co-equal with the Father (μεταυπαραγωγος του Πατερος, αυτο την αυτοτοκον περα ον τον θεον), Arius opposed him, accused him of Sabellianism, and asserted that there was a time when the Son was not (πριν ὤτε ἦν οὔ ἦν), since the Father who begot must be before the Son who was begotten, and the latter, therefore, could not be eternal (Socrat. Hist. Eccl. i, 5). Such is the account, by the early writers, of the origin of the controversy. But if it had not begun in this way, it must soon have begun in some other. The points in question had not arrived at scientific precision in the mind of the church; and it was only during the Arian controversy, and by means of the earnest struggles invoked by it, carried on through many years of hissed convocation of many synods, and employing some of the most acute and profound intellectual the church has ever seen, that a definite and per- manent form of truth was arrived at (Dornier, Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 227). See Arianism. At length, Alexander called a council of his clergy, which was attended by nearly one hundred Egyptian and Libyan bishops, by whom Arius was deposed and excommunicated (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. i, 15). This deci-

den was conveyed to all the foreign bishops by circulars sent by Alexander himself (A.D. 321). Arius replied to Palestine, where by his eloquence and talents he soon gained a number of converts. Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, who had also studied under Lucian, and doubtless held his opinions, naturally induced to favor Arius, who addressed to Eusebius a letter, containing his doctrine, which was composed in Soculum (On Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. i. 5), from which we derive our knowledge of the first stage of Arian opinion. It runs thus: "We cannot assent to these expressions, 'always Father, always Son;' 'at the same time Father and Son;' 'that the Son always co-exists with the Father;' 'that the Father has no pre-existence before the Son, so that the Father and Son have been co-eternal.' We think and teach, that the Son is not unbegotten, nor a part of the unbegotten by any means. Nor is he made out of any pre-existent thing; but, by the will and pleasure of the Father, he existed before time and age, the only begotten God, unchangeable; and that before lie was begotten, or made, or designed, or founded, he was not. But we are persecuted because we say that the Son has a beginning, and that God has no beginning. For this we are persecuted; and because we say the Son is out of nothing. Which we therefore say, because he is not a part of God, or made out of any pre-existent thing." (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i. 6)
"and, "in the midst of this musing, and of this speech, and of this fear, and of this astonishment, I was called, 'Eusebius, look!' 'I was called once more, 'Eusebius!' and a third time, 'Eusebius!'" (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i. 6)

We now bear, for the first time, the name of Eusebius of Cæsarea in connection with the controversy.
He did not accept the Arian formula (μὴ γίνεται οὐκ εἰς ότι); but, as he had been educated in Origen's denial of the eternal Sonship of Christ, he was just in the position suggesting a compromise between the opposing parties.
He wrote letters in this spirit (early in 323) to the patriarch Alexander; but the question at issue was a fundamental one, ready for its final decision, and the day of compromise was past and gone (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl.
1, 15; Epiphanius, Hær. 69. 4; see Eusebius of Cæarea). The controversy had now spread like a flame throughout the Eastern empire, and at last Constantine found it absolutely necessary to bring it to a point. At first he sought to reconcile Alexander and Arius by a letter in which he urged them to drop discussion on unessential points, and to agree together for the harmony of the church. This letter was conveyed by his son, Constans. He cared for no success, and an uproar arose in Cæsarea, in which the effigy of the emperor himself was insulted. As the provincial synods had only helped to fan the flame of strife, Constantine determined to call a general council of bishops, and accordingly the first ecumenical council was held at Nice, A.D. 325, consisting of 218 bishops, most of whom were from the East. (SeeNice, Council of.)
The gist of the question to be settled by the Council of Nice lay in the summary argument of Arius:
"The Father is a Father; the Son is a Son; therefore the Father must have existed before the Son; therefore once the Son was not; therefore he was made, like all creatures, of a substance that had not previously existed." This was the substance of the doctrine of Arius. His intellect, logical, but not profound or intuitive, could not embrace the lofty doctrine of an eternal, unbeginning generation of the Son.
"The Father has a Son and a Son has a Father," he thought, could hardly be argued from the nature of human generation to divine; not seeing that his argument, while insisting on the truth of the Sonship of Christ, ended by alienating Him wholly from the essence of the Father. "The Arian Christ was confessedly lacking in a divine nature, in every sense of the term. Though the Son of God was unreal, it seemed human, at least human like Jesus; yet that Son of God has a στιγμα. He indeed existed long before that birth, but not from eternity.
The only element, consequently, in the Arian construction of Christ's person that was preserved intact and pure was the humanity." (Shedd, History of Doctrines, i. 99.) Of the debates upon these great questions in the Council of Nice no full account is extant.
Athanasius, who was then a deacon under Alexander, bore a prominent part in the council, and contributed largely to its decisions, in defence of which the remainder of his life was chiefly occupied. See Aria-nasius. For an account of the council, see Nice, as above. Eusebius of Cæsarea was also a chief actor in the council, and sought, in harmony with his character and habits, to act as mediator. He proposed, finally, a creed which he declared he had received from the bishops who had preceded him and from the Scriptures (Socrates, Chronicon, i. 9), and the council received it as a condemnation of Constantine. It did not, however, contain the word ὅμοοςοι, which was insisted upon by the orthodox. (It is given in parallel columns with the Nicene Creed in Christian Remembrcsrz, January, 1684, p. 183.) The Creed, as finally adopted, condemned the heresy of Arius, and fixed the doctrine of the person of Christ as it has been held in the church to this day, declaring the Son to be "begotten of the Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made" (see Socrates, Eccl. Hist. i, 8; and article CECUL, NICENES). According to Sozomen (i, 20), all the bishops but fifteen, according to Socrates (i, 8), all but five, signed the Creed. These five were Eusebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nice, Maria of Chalcedon, Thomas of Marmarica, and Secundus of Ptolemais; and of these only the two last held out against the threat of banishment made by the emperor. Arius was excommunicated and banished, and his books were placed on the emperor's list of books to be burned.

2. From the Council of Nice to the Council of Milan.—Soon after the close of the Council of Nice, Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nice, being found to continue their contemnence of the Arian cause by refusing to carry out its anathemas, were deposed, were both subjected to the same penalty of exile by the emperor, and had successors appointed to their see. By imposing upon the cedibility of Constantine, they were in three years restored, and gained considerable influence at court (Sozom. ii, 16, 27). The indulgent emperor, on the statement being made to him (by a presbyter of the household of his sister Constantia, who had been a Christian, and had died in the death-bed recommended this presbyter to Constantine) that Arius had been misrepresented, and differed in nothing that was important from the Nicene fathers, had him recalled from banishment, and required him to present in writing a confession of his faith (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. i, 26). He did this in such terms as, though they admitted a latent reservation, yet appeared entirely orthodox, and therefore not only satisfied the emperor, but offended some of his own friends, who from that time separated from him (see the Creed in Socrates, i, 26). Athanasius, now bishop of Alexandria, was not so easily imposed upon, but was resolute in refusing Arius admission to the communion, since the Nicene Council had openly condemned him, until a similar synod should receive his submission and restore him. The Synod of Tyre, convened A.D. 383 by the emperor, tried Arius; on trumped-up charges of impropriety, and he was banished. The emperor then sent a mandate to the Synod, recommending that his signature to the Nicene Creed, insisted on his being received to communion by Alexander, the bishop of that city. On the day before this reception was to have taken place Arius died suddenly (A.D. 386) (Socrates, i, 26-85).

Constantine died A.D. 337, and the empire fell to his three sons, Constantine II in Gaul; Constantius in the East; Constat in Italy and Gaul. The latter was a friend and protector of Athanasius. The religious question was now greatly mixed up with politics. On the death of the younger Constantine, the emperor of the East, Constantius (340), took the Arians formally in the state, and the Synod of Tyre, his signature to the Nicene Creed, insisted on his being received to communion by Alexander, the bishop of that city. On the day before this reception was to have taken place Arius died suddenly (A.D. 386) (Socrates, i, 26-85).

Arianism originated from Eusebius of Nicomedia, his adherents were called Eusebians. The Council of Antioch (A.D. 341), which deplored Arianism, was deposed. There were two creeds, one of which was considered to be the true creed of the church of the East. These two Arian creeds were extant in Athanasius, De Synodis, § 22-26 (see Gieseler, Ch. History, 1, § 80). As this middle course originate with Eusebius of Nicomedia, its adherents were called Eusebians. The Council of Antioch (A.D. 341), which deplored Arianism, was deposed. measure they brought about at the second synod of Sirimun (A.D. 357). The formula is given in Walford, J. Sym. p. 138). On the other hand, the said, bishop of Ancya, called together a synod at Ancy (358), which established the Semi-Arian creed, and rejected the Arian (see the decrees in Epiphan.
H. 78; the confession of faith adopted by the syn don, in Athanas. de Syn. § 41). Constantius allowed himself to be easily convinced that the Siriumm formula favored the Anomoeans, and the confession of fide adopted at the second was now rejected at a third synod of Sirimun (358), and the anathemas of the Synod of Ancya were confirmed. The Ano moians, for the purpose of uniting in appearance with the Semi-Arians, and yet escape in doctrine from the formula Β ιν α ε π ι ο α τ ρ η τ ρ ε α τ τ η ε ω λ α ρ ι ω ω ω η ω ω η ω ω τ η ε ω λ α ρ ι (τ η is imitated (the Son is similar to the Father in all respects, as the Scriptures say and teach), and succeeded in convincing the emperor that all parties might be easily united in it. For this all bishops were now prepared, and then the Westerns were summoned to a council at Ariminum, the Easterns to another at Seleucia, simultaneously (359). After many efforts, the emperor at last succeeded in getting most of the bishops to adopt that formula. But, along with this external union, not only did the internal doctrinal situation remain the same, but also the forward passion of the Greeks toward the Anomoeans
among such as had been like-minded, whether they had gone in with that union or not. Thus Constan tius, at his death, left all in the greatest confusion (A.D. 360). The new emperor, Julian (361-363), was,
as a Pagan, of course equally indifferent to all Chris tian doings, and restored all the banished bishops to their sees. Jovian also (364), and his successors in the West, Valentinian († 375), then Gratian and Val estian II, maintained general toleration. On the contrary, Valens, emperor of the East (364-378), was a zealous Arian, and persecuted both orthodox and Semi-Arians.

"Various causes had contributed, since the death of Constantius, to increase in the East the number of ad derents to the Nicene Creed. The majority of the Orientalists, who held fast by the emanation of the Son from the Father, were naturally averse to strict Ari nianism; while the Nicene decrees were naturally allied to them. This was not accordingly an easy task.
Moreover, the orthodox were united and steadfast; the Arians were divided and wavering. Finally, the influence of Monachism, which had now arisen in Egypt, and was rapidly becoming general and influ cial, was bound up with the fortunes of Athanasius; and this was all the more likely to be the case, in favor of the Nicene Creed. One of the first of the important converts was Melietos, formerly an Acacian Arian, who declared himself in favor of the Nicene Creed immediately after he had been nominated bis oph of Antioch, A.D. 361. But the old Nicene commu nity, which had still existed in Antioch from the time of Eusebius, and was thereby, according to a prescript Paulinus, refused to acknowledge Melietos as bishop the charge that he was not entirely orthodox (So clat. Hist. Eccl. l II. 44). The Council of Alexandria, assembled by Athanasius (367), sought, indeed, not only to smooth the way generally for the Arians to join their party by mild measures, but endeavored par ticularly to settle this Antiochian dispute; but Luc fer, bishop of Calaris, gave firm footing to the Mele itian schism about the same time by consecrating, as bishop, Paulinus the Eustathian. The Westerns and Egy ptians acknowledged Paulinus, the Oriental Nicenes, Melietos, the orthodox. If the emperor Valens (364-378) had now favored the Semi-Ari nians instead of the Arians, he might, perhaps, have con siderably checked the further spread of the Nicene party; but, since he wished to make Arianism alone pre dominant by horribly persecuting all who thought dif frentely, he drove by this means the Semi-Arians, who did not sink under the persecution, to unite still more with the orthodox. Thus a great part of the Semi-Arians (or, as they were now also called, Mac donianists, from Macedonius, bishop of Constantan potle, who had been deposed in 360, at the instigation of the Arians) declared themselves, at several councils of Asia Minor, in favor of the Nicene confession, and sent an tsoup to the emperor to announce their assent to it (365).
The Arians, supported by the emperor Valens, en davored to counteract this new turn of affairs; yet the Macedonianists were always passing over more and more to the Nicene Creed, and for this the three great masters of the Church, Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa, devoted themselves to work. These latter, the Oriental Niceneans did not believe their faith changed by their assent to the Nicene f rmula, but thought they had merely assumed a more definite expression for it in the rightly-understood μονογενης. Since they supposed that they had un changeably remained steadfast to their faith, they also continued to consider their Eusebian and Semi-Arian fathers as orthodox, although condemned by the old Nicenes. Thus the canons of the Oriental councils held during the schism constantly remained in force, particularly those of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, and of Laodicea (perhaps A.D. 366), which canon safeguarding the free election of the bishop; and forward pass er from the Eusebians toward the Anomoe anists among such as had been like-minded, whether they had gone in with that union or not. Thus Constan tius, at his death, left all in the greatest confusion
(A.D. 360). The new emperor, Julian (361-363), was,
as a Pagan, of course equally indifferent to all Chris tian doings, and restored all the banished bishops to their sees. Jovian also († 364), and his successors in the West, Valentinian († 375), then Gratian and Val
estian II, maintained general toleration. On the contrary, Valens, emperor of the East (364-378), was a zealous Arian, and persecuted both orthodox and Semi-Arians.

"Thus Theodosius, who, as a Spanishier, was a zeal as adherent of the Nicene Creed, found at his accession to the throne of the West (372) universal toleration; In the East, Arianism prevalent, the Homou sousians persecuted, and, besides them, the parties of the Photin as, Macedonians, and Apollinarists, with innumera ob other sects, existing. After conquering the Goths, he seemed to have determined to triumph over all the destructive strife. Accordingly, he summoned a general council at Constantinople (861), by which the schism among the Nicenes was peaceably removed, and the Nicene Creed enlarged, with additions direct ead against heretics who had risen up since its origin (see CREDO, NICEAN)." Valens was the first emperor of the Arians in the West to enjoy freedom of religion some years longer; but the case was quite altered by Theo doisus, and a universal suppression of the sect ensued.
The last traces of its existence in the Byzantine empire appear under the Emperor Anastasius at Con stantinople, 491-518" (Gieseler, Church History, IV. 81).

4. Closer Proximity. — In the East, Arianism maintained itself for a long time among the German tribes, which had received Christianity in the Arian form under the emperor Valens. Arianism was carried by the Ostrogoths into Italy, by the Vis roths into Spain, and by the Vandals into Africa.
The Ostrogoths, though strong enough, did not corate the orthodox. Arianism remained among them till the destruction of the Ostrogoth kingdom by Jus tinian (A.D. 558). More intolerant against the Cath olics were the Visigoths; but Arianism gradually lost hold upon them, and finally, under the guidance of their king, Reccared, they adopted the orthodox creed, and were received into the Catholic Church by the Council of Toledo (A.D. 589). The Arian Vandals, after conquering Africa in 429, under the leadership of Genseric, instituted a furious persecution against the Catholic churches, which did not cease until the destruction of the Vandal empire through Belisarius in 584. The Suevi of Spain became Arians about the middle of the fifth century, following their connection with the Visigoths; they went over to the Catholic Church in 538, under Theodoret. The Burgundians, who came to Gaul as pagans in 417, appear as Arians in 440. The progress of the Catholic Church among this tribe is especially due to Arius of Vienna, who was the son of king Gundedag, Sigismund, who, after his accession to the throne in 517, secured to the Catholic Church the ascendency. Nowhere did the Arian doctrine maintain itself so long as among the Lombards. They invaded Italy (A.D. 568), and founded a new kingdom at Pavia, and their king, Antharis, embraced Arian Christianity in 567; but they were speedily expelled by the allied forces of the Eastern Empire under Theodendila, the Catholic daughter of the duke of Bavaria, the orthodox faith soon found adherents among them, and the son of Theodendila, Adelward, gave all the churches to the Catholics. But this called forth a reaction. An Arian ascended the throne, who, however, was unable to suppress Catholicism; and we now find in every important city in Lombardy both a Catholic and an Arian bishop. Under Luitprand, who died in 744, the Catholic Church was entirely predominant. But, although Arianism was externally suppressed, its long prevalence in Spain, Gaul, and Northern Italy left many vestiges of its influence. The excommunications of the pontiffs of Rome were received and carried out; and this country a fertile soil for the spreading of dissenting doctrines. See Revillon, de l’Arianisme des Peuples Germains (Paris, 1806, 8vo).

II. MODERN ARIANISM. — After the Reformation, the Antitrinitarians, who soon appeared, were chiefly Socinians. In Italy they especially developed themselves, and Alciati (1555) commenced his heretical course with teaching that Christ was divine, but inferior to the Father. His views were adopted by Joh. Val. Gentilis (q. v.), an acute Calabrian, who was beheaded at Berne (1586), after going far beyond Arianism in heresy. The earlier English writers on the Church history of the period tell of Arians put to death in England for heresy under Elizabeth. Plowright († 1579), Lewis († 1588), Cole and Ket († 1588), are named by Fuller, who, as well as Burnet, speak of Arian sentiments as held and propagated by various individuals in England after the Reformation. The vehemence is so much want of attention in the way in which they speak about them that little dependence can be placed on most of the allegations. Arian views were probably held by individuals from time to time; but no important manifestation took place till the beginning of the 18th century, when Arianism made its appearance in the Church of England, and also among Dissenters. Thomas Emlyn (q. v.), an English Presbyterian (but pastor in Dublin), was deposed for Arianism by the Presbytery of Dublin in 1698 (see Reid, Hist. of Presbyt. Ch. in Ireland, iii, 14), and afterward wrote largely on the controversy (Emlyn, Works, ed. by Life, Lond. 1746). In the Church of England Arian views were set forth by Whiston, professor of mathematics at Cambridge, in his Primitivæ Christiani Revivæ (Lond. 1711, 4 vols, 8vo), the last volume of which contains an account of what he considered the primitive faith in the person of Christ, and the doctrine of the Trinity, and the first volume a historical account of the proceedings of the University and Convocation against him. His sentiments were declared heretical, and he was ejected from his chair at Cambridge. He still, however, went on to write, and produced a fifth volume of his Primitivæ Christiani Revivæ, in 1712; his Council of Nice Vindicated from the Athanasian Heresy, in 1718; his Letter to the Earl of Nottingham, on the Eternity of the Son of God and the Holy Ghost, 1719; to which Lord Nottingham replied in 1720. Whiston went on to the end of his life occasionally publishing on the subject. See Whiston.

A far more learned and logical champion of error appeared in Dr. Samuel Clarke, who published in 1718 his Discourse of the Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, which he endeavored to show, in a commentary on forty texts of Scripture, the subordination of the Son to the Father.

"Reason had so strongly the ascendant in Clarke's composition that every thing must be subjected to its rule and measure; that only must stand, in matters of religion, which is not opposed to this leading principle of the Catholic Church, and which the rightly-divined Church, by reason of its authority, presented for the purpose of subserving the true welfare of the Church and the people of God." This book is illustrated by seven plates, containing figures of the Trinity, and of the biblical personages of whom he speaks, with short and comprehensive descriptions. Clarke's later works, as well as a number of his earlier ones, were published in the last two volumes of the Proceedings of the Royal Society, London. These works consist of a treatise on the nature of reason, the divine attributes, the immortality of the soul, and a number of other subjects.

For a more detailed description of each of these works, see the references listed in the text.

Arians worshipped themselves upon it; they make the Son of God a creature! not they; God forbid." The Arian controversy commenced about the same time among the Western Bishops, and as fiercely and as destructively among them than in the Church of England. It began in the west of England with James Pierce, who, and his colleague Joseph Hallet, were learned Presbyterian ministers in Exeter. The flame spread to London, and occasioned the celebrated Baxter's Hall controversy, and raged as fiercely on that side as on the Presbyterian body. The books and pamphlets written on the subject are very numerous. The principal on the Arian side are the following: The Case of the ejected Ministers of Essex; Dr. Calamy, Dr. Clayton, bishop of Clogher, and for a while carried on with considerable warmth. He published in 1751 An Essay on Spirit, in which the doctrine of the Trinity is considered, etc. This pamphlet was not in reality the bishop's, but the production of a young clergyman, who was given aside secretly to 2000 ducats, and identified himself with. See CLAYTON. The most learned of all English Arians was Lardner (q. v.). On the orthodox side were William Jones, in his Full Answer to the Essay on Spirit, and afterward in his Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity (Joun's Works, vol. i.); and Dr. Randolph, in his Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity (1756, 8vo.). At the present day Arianism has almost become extinct in England, having merged into one or other of the various grades of Socinianism, and is only to be found, in any thing like a systematic form, among the Presbyterians in the north of Ireland, especially those of the Synod of Munster (see Henderson's Buck, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.); Bogue and Bennett, History of Disserters, i. 168 sq.; Reid, Hist. of Presbyterian Ch. in Ireland, i. 14, 480). Both in England and America there are doubtless many Arians among those who are called Socinians and Unitarians. See articles on these titles, and also ATHANASIUS; TRINITARIUS.

The sources of information on the early history of Arianism are the church historians, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, and also of Philostorgius the Arian, with the writings of Epiphanius and Athanasius. Ariartha ('Apopa0087; apparently compound of the Persian prefix Ara-, the essential element of the old national Aphus or *Aphos, and the ending -tha, 762; signifying "honorable;" see Dr. Rosen, in the Qurr. Journ. of Educa. i. 386; and the Zend rtaia, "master," Bopp, Vergleichende Grammatik, p. 196; Pot, Etyrnologische Forschungen, p. xxxvi), a common name of the kings of Cappadocia (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.), one of whom is named in the Apocalypse (1 Rev. xcvi., 22), as ruling that country during the time of the Jewish governor Simon, about B.C. 139. See ATTALUS. The king there designated is doubtless Ariarathes V., surnamed Philopator (παλαιτοτάροο).
ambitious order omitted no opportunity to take revenge on so dangerous a foe—the more powerful because his orthodoxy had never been questioned, and was supported by uncommon erudition. He was accused of Judaism because he had inserted in the Polyglott certain Chaldee paraphrases, which tended to confirm the Jews in their errors. He made many voyages to Rome to justify himself, in 1590 was honorably dismissed, and died at Seville in 1598, prior to the convet of St. Jago. Arias's numerous and extensive literary works chiefly belong to theological, but partly also to classical literature, but his Polyglott certainly holds the principal place; it is generally called the "Antwerp Polyglott," or, from the patronage bestowed on it by Philip II., "El Reino." It was the same sometimes after the printer, "Biblia Plantiniana."

Ariath, a city mentioned in the Notitia Ecclesiastica, and thought by Porter (Damascius, ii, 136) to be the present large city Arj, nearly three hours north of Busrah, at the west base of the Hauran mountains (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 268).

Ar'dal (Heb. Arid'yaq, אֲרִדָּל, of Persian origin, perhaps meaning strongly: Sept. Ἀριάδνη), the ninth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews of Babylonia (Esth. iv. 8). B.C. cir. 478.

Ar'dath (Heb. Ar'das, אָרְדָּת, same stem, as Ardes; Sept. Σαρδαία, τ. Σαρδαίδα, the sixth of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews in Babylonia (Esth. x. 8). B. C. cir. 478.

Ar'is (Heb. Ar'is, אַרִיס, only with the art., אַרִיס, the lion; Sept. Ἀρίας), the name apparently of one of the body-guard slain with King Pekahiah at Samaria (2 Kings xv. 25). B. C. 757. See ARGOB.

Ar'til (Heb. Ar'til, אָרְתִּיל, Sept. Ἀρίτηλ), a word meaning "lion of God," and correctly enough rendered "lion-like" in 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chron. xi. 22. It was applied as an epithet of distinction to bold and warlike persons, as among the Arabians, who surnamed All "The Lion of God" (Abulf. Amm. i. 96; Bochart, Hieros. i. 216). Others, as Thenius, Winzer, first, upon look at these passages as a proper name, and translate "two [sons of] Ariel," supplying the word פָּרָש, which might easily have fallen out. See ARELI.

1. One of the chief men sent for by Ezra to procure Levites for the services of the sanctuary (Exra viii. 16). B.C. 459.

2. The same word is used as a local proper name in Isa. xxix. 1, 2, 7, applied to Jerusalem, "as victorious under this latter passage" Gesenius (Thes. Hebr. p. 147) and others, unsatisfied with the Hebrew, resort to the Arabic, and find the first part of the name in Ari, fire-bearth (cognate with Heb. יָרָשׁ, light, i. e. fire), which, with the Heb. אל, God, supplies what they consider a more satisfactory signification (but see Hävernick, Comment. in loc.). It is thus applied, in the first place, to the altar, and then to Jerusalem as containing the altar. Henderson gives the word this etymology also in the passage in Isa. (see Comment. in loc.).

A'rim. See KIRJATH-ARIM.

Arimatea's (Ἀριματεια, from the Heb. Ramthaim, with the art., prefixed), the birth-place of the wealthy Joseph, in whose sepulchre our Lord was laid (Matt. xxvii. 57; John xix, 46). Luke (xxiii, 51) calls it "a city of the Jews;" which may be explained by 1 Mac. xi, 84, where King Demetrius thus writes: "We have ratified unto them (the Jews) the borders of Judæa, with the three governments of Apherema, Lydda, and Ramathen (Ῥαμαθην), that are added unto Judea from the country of Samaria." Eusebius (Onomat. s. v.) and Jerome (Epist. Paules) regard the Arimathæa of Joseph as the same place as the Ramathaim of Samuel, and place it near Lydda or Diospolis (see Reland, Palast. p. 573 sq.), Samuel's birth-place, the Ramah of 1 Sam. i, 19, which is named in the Septuagint Armakaim (Ἀρμακαίμ), and by Josephus Armachia (Ἀρμαχία, Ant. v, 10, 2). Hence Arimatea has by most been identified with the existing Ramleh, because of the similarity of the name to that of the city of Ramah which is already known (םַעַם), and because it is near Lydda or Diospolis. Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, 40, 44; new ed. iii, 141), however, disputes this conclusion on the following grounds: (1.) That Abulfeda alleges Ramleh to have been built after the time of Mohammed, or about A.D. 716, by Sulaiman Abd-al-Malik; (2.) that "Ramah" and "Ramleh" are the same name; and (3.) that this Ramleh is in a plain, while Ramah implies a town on a hill (כרמל). To these objections it may be answered, (1.) That Abulfeda's statement may mean no more than that Sulaiman rebuilt the town, which had previously been in ruins, just as Rehabom and others are said to have built "many" towns that had existed long before their time; for the Moabites seldom built towns on low sites or out of the mountains; so that there is not a town in all Palestine that is with certainty known to have been founded by them. (2.) In such cases they retain the old names, or others re- semblings them in sound, if not in signification, which may account for the difference between Ramah and Ramleh. (3.) Neither can we assume that the place called Ramalah could not be in a plain, unless we are ready to prove that Hebrew names were always significant and appropriate. This they probably were not. They were so in early times, but not eventually, when towns were numerous, and took their names arbitrarily from one another without regard to local circumstances. Further, if Arimatea, by being identified with Ramah, was necessarily in the mountains, it could not have been "near Lydda," from which the hills are seven miles distant (see Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 800; comp. Wilson, Lands of Bible, ii, 288). See RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM.

Ramleh is in north lat. 31° 56', and east long. 28° 28', 8 miles south-east from Joppa, and 24 miles north-west by west from Jerusalem. It lies in the fine undulating plain of Sharon, upon the eastern side of a broad, low swell rising from a fertile sandy plain. Like Gaza and Jaffa, this town is surrounded by olive-gardens and gardens of vegetables and delicious fruits. Occasional palm-trees are also seen, as well as the khurb and the aycamore. The streets are few; the houses are of stone, and many of them large and well built. There are five mosques, two or more of which are said to have once been Christian churches; and there is here one of the largest Latin convents in Palestine. The place is supposed to contain about 2000 inhabitants, of whom two thirds are Moamens, and the rest Christians, chiefly of the Greek Church, with a few Armenians. The inhabitants carry on some trade in cotton and soap. The great caravan-road between Egypt and Damascus, Smyrna, and Constantinople passes through Ramleh, which is the most frequented road for European pilgrims and travellers between Joppa and Jerusalem (Robinson, iii, 27; Raumer, p. 218). The tower is the most conspicuous object in or about the city. It stands a little to the west of the town, on the highest part of the swell of land, and is in the midst of a large quadrangular enclosure, which has much the appearance of having once been a splendid khan. The tower is wholly isolated, whatever may have been its original destination. The town is first mentioned under its present name by the monk Bernard, about A.D. 870. About A.D. 1150 the Arabian geographer Edrisi (ed. Janbert, ii, 899), described Ramleh and Jerusalem as the principal cities of Palestine. The first Crusaders, on their approach, found Ramleh deserted by its inhabitants; and with it and Lydda they endowed the first Latin bishopric in Palestine, which took its denomination from the latter city. From the situation of Ramleh between that city and the coast, it was a post of much importance to the Crusaders, and they held possession of it generally as it came into the pos-79, ed. Asher), who was there in A.D. 1173, speaks of it as having been formerly a considerable city. Belon (Observat. p. 811), in 1547, mentions it as almost deserted, scarcely twelve houses being inhabited, and the fields mostly untilled. This description must have occurred after 1497; for La Grande, l'voyage de l'Israe-lem, fol. xiv, speaks of it as a popolado though together partly ruined), and of the seigneur de Rama" as an important personage. By 1674 it had somewhat revived, but it was still rather a large unvalleied village than a city, without any good houses, the governor himself being lodger in a house, in New-eve, i. 6). A century later it remained much in the same state, the governor being still ill lodger, and the population scarcely exceeding 200 families (Volney, ii. 220). Its recent state must, therefore, indicate a degree of comparative prosperity, the growth of the present century (see Robinson's Researches, iii. 368

Arindela (Arindela), an episcopal city of the Third Palestine of considerable importance, noticed in the early ecclesiastical lists (Reland, Palest. p. 588, 589); identified by Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii. 496) with the site Ghuruddal, near the south-east corner of the Dead Sea, consisting of considerable ruins on the slope near the river for a spring, forsaking his original profession. He presented to the Emperor Adrian, at the same time with Quadratus, an Apology for the Christian Faith, which existed in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, and even as late as that of Ussurados, and Addo of Vienna, if the account given of the passion of St. Dionysius the Areopagite may be relied on. Ari-tides flourished about A.D. 128. Jerome says that his Apology was filled with passages from the writings of the philosophers, and that Justin afterward made much use of it. He is commemorated August 1st.—Cave, sacred history.

1. A Jewish priest (2 Macc. i. 10), who resided in Egypt in the reign of Ptolemy VI Philometer (comp.
Grimm, 2 Macc. i. 9). In a letter of Judas Maccaeus, he is addressed (P. C. 165) as the representative of the Egyptian Jews (Apostolic, . . . κοίτιν μοι ἐκ τοῦ Ἰούδα. 2 Macc. i. c.), and is further styled "the teacher" (τάσσασαρ, i.e. counselor) of the king.
Josephus makes no mention of him; and the genuineness of the letter itself is doubtful (De Wette, Eichh.
1, 418); yet, as they both lived at this time an eminent Jew of this name at the Egyptian court, and have thought them identical with the peripatetic philosopher of the name (Clem. Alex. Str. v. 58; Euseb.
Prop. Eccl. viii. 9), who dedicated to Ptol. Philometer his allegorical exposition of the Ptolemaic textile (Biblioth.
vii. 23, 32); and is even preserved by Clement and Eusebius (Euseb. Prop.
Eccl. vii. 18, 14; viii. 8, 9, 10; xii. 12; in which the Clementine fragments recur); but the authenticity of the quotations has been vigorously contested. It was denied by R. Simon and especially ulo Judeo, Lugd. Bat. 1800); and Valckenier's arguments are now generally considered conclusive (Grüber, Philo, ii, 71 sq.; Dähne, Jud. Ant. Relig. Philo, ii, 25; Rück, der Philo-Forscher iv, 2, 3, 19 sq.; n.). The object of Aristobulus was to prove that the peripatetic doctrines were based (προτεινόντα) on the Law and the Prophets; and his work has an additional interest as showing that the Jewish doctrines were first brought into contact with the Aristotelian and not with the Platonic philosophy (comp. Matter, Hist. de Philos. 158 sq.). Arguments which remain are discussed at length in the works quoted above, which contain also a satisfactory explanation of the chronological difficulties of the different accounts of Aristobulus. (See Elchhorn, Biblioth. d. bibl. Lit. v, 285 sq.)—Smith, a. v. 2. The eldest son of John Hyrcanus, prince of Judea. In B.C. 110, he, together with his brother Antigonus, successfully prosecuted for his father the siege of Samaria, which was destroyed the following year (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 10, 2 and 8; War, i, 2, 7). Hyrcanus dying in B.C. 107, Aristobulus took the title of king, being the first instance of the assumption of that name since the Babylonian captivity (but see Strabo, xvi, 762), and secured his power by the imprisonment of all his brothers except his favorite one Antigonus, and by the murder of his mother, to whom Hyrcanus had left the government by will. The life of Antigonus was soon sacrificed to his brother's ambition; and the remaining members of his family were found in close union with his party, and the remorse felt by Aristobulus for his execution increased the illness under which he was at the time suffering, and thus hastened his own death, B.C. 106. During his reign the Jews were subdued and compelled to adopt the Jewish law. He also received the name of Ἐβδομάδος from the seven days of the week by which he showed the Greeks (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 11; War, i, 8).—Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. a. v. 3. The younger son of Alexander Janneus by Alexandra (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 16, 1; War, i, 5, 1). During the nine years of his mother's reign he set himself against the party of the Pharisees, whose influence she had sought; and after her death, B.C. 70, he made war against his eldest brother Hyrcanus, and obtained from him the resignation of the crown and the high-priesthood, chiefly through the aid of his father's friends whom Alexandra had placed in several forresses of the country to save them from the vengeance of the Pharisees (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 16, 2; xiv, 1, 2; War, i, 6, 6; 11). In B.C. 65 Judea was invaded by ARETAS, king of Arabia Petraea, with whom, at the instigation of Antipater the Idumæan, Hyrcanus had taken refuge. By him Aristobulus was defeated in a battle and besieged in Jerusalem; but Aretas was obliged to raise the siege by Scæurus and Gabinius, Pompey's lieutenants, whose intervention Aristobulus had purchased (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 2; 5; 8; War, i, 6, 2 and 3). In B.C. 63 he pleased his cause before Pompey at Damascus, but finding him disposed to favor Hyrcanus, he returned to Judea and prepared for Pompey's approach, which had led to the return of Hyrcanus, was persuaded to obey his summons and appear before him; and being compelled to sign an order for the surrender of the garrison, he withdrew in impotent discontent to Jerusalem. Pompey still advanced, and Aristobulus again met him and made submission, but, his friends in the city refusing to perform the terms of the capitulation, empeobiuc was besieged and took Jerusalem, and carried away Aristobulus and his children as prisoners (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 8, 4; War, i, 6, 7; Plut. Pompey, 40; Strabo, xvi, 762; Dion Cass. xxxv, 15, 16). Appian (Bell. Mith. 1117) erroneously represents him as having been put to death by Pompey, but after Pompey's death (B.C. 57) he escaped from confinement at Rome with his son Antigonus, and, returning to Judea, was joined by large numbers of his countrymen, and renewed the war; but he was besieged and taken at Machæra, the fortifications of which he was attempting to restore, and was sent back to Rome by Gabinius (Jos. Ant. xiv, i, 2; War, ii, 11, 6; Dion Cass. xxxvii, 56). In B.C. 49 he was again raised by Julius Caesar, who sent him into Judea to forward his interests there, but he was poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 7; War, i, 9, 1; Dion Cass. xli, 18, 10).—6. The grandson of I. 3, and son of Alexander Janneus, B.C. 71, of Antigonus, B.C. 40, of Hyrcanus. His mother Alexandra, indignant at Herod's having bestowed the high-priesthood on the obscure Aanaelus, endeavored to obtain that office for her son from Antony through the influence of Cleopatra. Herod, fearing the consequences of this application, and urged by Marianne's entreaties, deposed Aanaelus, and made Aristobulus high-priest, the latter being only 17 years old at the time. The king, however, still suspecting Alexandra, and keeping a strict and annoying watch upon her movements, she renewed her complaints and designs against him with Cleopatra, and at length obtained the assistance of the Egyptians. On this Herod discovered this, and affected to pardon it; but soon after he caused Aristobulus to be treacherously drowned at Jericho, B.C. 85 (Joseph. Ant. xvi, 8; War, i, 22, 2).—13. One of the sons of Herod the Great of Marianne, and sent with his brother Alexander to Rome, when Vespasian, B.C. 71, seized the throne of Judæa, to take their part with the garrison of Pollias (Josephus, Ant. xv, 10, 1). On their return to Judæa, the suspicions of Herod were excited against them by their brother Antipater (q. v.), aided by Phoreras and their aunt Salome, though Berenice, the daughter of the latter, was married to Aristobulus; the young men themselves suspecting their enemies with a handle against them by the indiscræte expression of their indignation at their mother's death. In B.C. 11 they were accused by Herod at Aquilea before Augustus, through whose mediation, however, he was reconciled to them. Three years after Aristobulus was again involved with his brother in a charge of plotting against their father, but a second reconciliation was effected by Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, the father-in-law of Alexander. A third accusation, through the arts of Euryales, a Lacedæmonian adventurer, proved fatal. By permission of Augustus, the two young men were arraigned by Herod before a council, composed of which they were not even allowed to be present to defend themselves), and, being condemned, were soon after strangled at Sebaste, B.C. 6 (Joseph. Ant. xvi, 1-4; 8; 10; War, i, 23-27; comp. Strabo, xvi, 765).—15. See ALEXANDER. 3. Surname "the younger" (ὁ νεώτερος, Josephus, Ant. xxi, 2), was the son of the preceding Aristobulus and Berenice, and the grandson of Herod the Great. Himself and his two brothers (Agrippa I and Herod, the future king of Chalcis) were educated at Rome, together with Claudius, who was afterward emperor, and who appears to have regarded Aristobulus with great respect. He is also mentioned as being present at the marriage of Herod after Pontius Pilate had married to Jotape, a princess of Emessa, by whom he left a daughter of the same name (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5; War, ii, 11, 6).—18. The son of the son of Alexander Janneus by Alexandra (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 4, 1), was the son of the preceding Aristobulus and Berenice, and the grandson of Herod the Great. Himself and his two brothers (Agrippa I and Herod, the future king of Chalcis) were educated at Rome, together with Claudius, who was afterward emperor, and who appears to have regarded Aristobulus with great respect. He is also mentioned as being present at the marriage of Herod after Pontius Pilate had married to Jotape, a princess of Emessa, by whom he left a daughter of the same name (Josephus, Ant. xvi, 5; War, ii, 11, 6).—18.

7. Son of Herod, king of Chalca, grandson of the Aristobulus who was strangled at Sebaste, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. In A.D. 55 Nero made him king of Armenia Minor, in order to secure that province from the Parthians; and in A.D. 61, the emperor added to his dominion the whole province of Greater Armenia, which had been given to Tigranes (Josephus, Ant. xx, 8, 4; Tacit. Ann. xii, 7; xiv, 26). Aristobulus appears (from Josephus, War, vii, 1, 4) to have also obtained from the Romans his father's kingdom of Chalca, which had been taken from his father. A.D. 65; and it is said that he was appointed, as joining Casenius Pashus, proconsul of Syria, in the war against Antiochus, king of Commagene, in the fourth year of Vespasian, or A.D. 78 (Josephus, ib.). He was married to Salome, daughter of the famous Herodias, by whom he had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Agrippus; of these, nothing further is recorded (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 5, 4.—Jb.

8. A person, perhaps a Roman, named by Paul in Rom. xvi, 10, where he sends salutations to his household. A.D. 55. He is not himself saluted; hence he may not have been a believer, or he may have been absent or dead. Tradition represents him as brother of Barnabas, perhaps justly; but he is not mentioned as such in the ten- leges that he was ordained a bishop by Barnabas, or by Paul, whom he followed in his travels, and that he was eventually sent into Britain, where he labored with much success, and where he at length died (Menag. Gruc. iii, 17 sq.).—Kitto, s. v.

Aristotle (Ἀριστοτέλης), one of the greatest philosophers Greece has ever seen, whose philosophical system has exercised for a long time a controlling influence on the development of Christian philosophy and on Christian literature in general. Aristotle was born in B.C. 384, at Stagira, in Macedonia, whence he received his surname, The Stagirite. He was first instructed by his father, the Greek physician of King Augustus III of Macedonia; afterward by Proxenos in Atenaeus. At the age of 17 years he went to Athens, where he enjoyed for 20 years the instruction of, and intercourse with, Plato. In B.C. 348 he was appointed by Philip of Macedonia teacher of his son Alexander. About 335 he returned to Athens, where he established a new school of philosophy in the "Lyceum" (Λύκειον, so called from an epitaph of Apollo), a gymnasia near the city. There he instructed in the mornings a select circle of disciples (Acroate, Exoteric), while in the afternoons he gave popular lectures to all kinds of readers (Eroteric). At the age of 18 years he was accused of impiety, and compelled to leave Athens. He went to Chalca, and died soon after (B.C. 322). At Stagira an annual festival, called the "Aristotelica," was celebrated in his honor. According to a Jewish legend, he is said to have turned Jew in consequence of a conversation held with a Jew at Athens. He is said to have composed about 800 works, lists of which are given by Diogenes Laertius and others. Many of his works are lost; while, on the other hand, several that bear his name are undoubtedly spurious. The oldest complete edition of his works was published by Aldus Manutius (Venice, 1496-98, 5 vols. fol.); the latest and best by Imman. Bekker (Berlin, 1831 sq. 4 vols.).—Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.

The influence of the philosophical system of Aristotle on the intellectual development of the human race has been more extensive and more lasting than that of any other system except Plato. This supremacy is to a great extent ascribed (1) to his method, which was so restricted the range of human observation and thought, but also fixed the laws of their operation, so far as the field of the outer world is concerned, on principles fundamental to the human mind; (2) to his logic, which grew out of his method and also complemented it; (3) to the practical character of his intellect, and the practical tendency of his speculations, even the most subtle; and (4) to the comparative clearness and simplicity of his system, which arises partly from the really luminous clearness of his own intellect, and partly from the fact that the most profound problems of philosophy do not come within the range of his method when applied to speculative questions. His chief argument is the so-called empirical one, viz., to begin with the observation of phenomena, and to reason upon them. "Art commences when, from a great number of experiences, one general conception is formed, which will embrace all similar cases; experience is the knowledge of the individual; art in the general" (Metaph. i. 3). What Aristotle here calls "art" is plainly what we now call 'induction; and had he adhered throughout to the method here indicated, he would have been, in reality, what Bacon is called, the father of the inductive philosophy. The distinction between Aristotle and Plato is, that while both held that science could only be formed from universals, ὁ μὲν θάλαμος, Aristotle contended that such universals had purely a subjective existence, i. e. that they were nothing more than the inductions derived from particular facts. He therefore made experience the basis of all science, and reason the architect. Plato, on the contrary, made reason the architect, and to direct man to the observation and interro-gation of nature, that of the other was to direct man to the contemplation of ideas" (Lewes, Hist. of Philosophy, ii, 114). In passing from Plato to Aristotle, the thoughtful student observes that he comes into a different if not a lower plane. The end of a society is to show, in opposition to the Sophists, that the mind of man is not its own standard; the tendency of Aristotle's teaching is to show that it is. It has been the fashion, since Hegel's exposition of Aristotle, to deny that his doctrine is substantially realism, in the empirical sense as opposed to Plato's idealism. This is a mistake. Plato and Aristotle could say that "dialectic is that science which discovers the difference between the false and the true. But the false in Plato is the semblance which any object presents to the sensationized mind; the true the very substance and meaning of that object. The false in Aristotle is a wrong affirmation concerning any matter in what the mind takes cognizance; the true a right affirmation concerning the same matter. Hence the dialectic of the one treats of the way whereby we obtain to a clear and vital perception of things; the dialectic of the other treats of the way in which we discourse of things. Words are the one, things the other. The one is the subtest of the apprehension of realities of which there are no sensible exponents. Words to the other are the formulas wherein we set forth our notions and judgments. The one desires to ascertain of what hidden meaning the word is an index; the other desires to prevent the word from transgressing certain boundaries which he has fixed for it. Hence it happened that the sense and leading maxim of Plato's philosophy became not only more distasteful, but positively more unintelligible to his wisest disciple than to many who had not studied in the Academy, or who had set themselves in direct opposition to it. When Aristotle had matured his system of dialectics, he proposed to fix something in it so perfect and satisfactory that he could not even dream of any thing lying outside of its circle, and incapable of being brought under its rules. He felt that he had discovered all the forms under which it is possible to set down any proposition in words; and what there could be besides this, that opening there could be to any form of the government of these forms, he had no conception. At any rate, if there were such a one, it must be a vague, uninhabited world. To suppose it peopled with other, and those mere real and di-lectic forms, was the extravagance of philosophical delirium. Accordingly, when he speaks of the doctrine of substantial ideas, of ideas, that is to say, which are the grounds of all our forms of thought, and consequently cannot be subject to them, he is reduced to the strange, and, for so calling it, most distinct sense, of begging the whole question; of arguing that, since these ideas ought to be included under some of the ascertained conditions of logic, and by the hypothesis are not included under any, they must be fictitious" (Maurice, Moral and Metaph. Philosophy, ch. vi, div. iii, § 2). They may, of course, be denied; but, from the universal from the particular, we must reason; and the theory of reasoning is logical, which, according to Aristotle, is the organon or instrument of all science, phaenomen formam. In this field the pre-eminence of Aristotle is indisputable; he may, indeed, be said to have invented the whole part of logic, and to have made it to this day substantially what he made it. Grote observes that what was begun by Socrates, and improved by Plato, was embodied as a part of a comprehensive system of formal logic by the genius of Aristotle; a system which was not only of extraordinary value in reference to the processes and controversies of its time, but which also, having become insensibly worked into the minds of instructed men, has contributed much to form what is correct in the habits of modern thinking. Though it has now been enlarged and recast by some modern authors (especially by Mr. John Stuart Mill in his admirable System of Logic) the system of Aristotle is in common use with the vast increase of knowledge and extension of positive methods belonging to the present day, we must recollect that the distance between the best modern logic and that of Aristotle is hardly so great as that between Aristotle and those who preceded him by a century—Empedocles, Anaxagoras, and the Pythagoreans—and that the movement in advance of these latter commenced with Socrates" (History of Greece, pt. ii, ch. Ixviii).

In Psychology Aristotle anticipated a great deal of what is called "mental philosophy" at present. The soul, he says, is an entity; not the product of matter or of organization, but distinct from the body, though not separable from it as to its form (De Anima, ii, 1). In this principle he agrees with Plato, and it saves his doctrine from becoming wholly materialistic, a tendency natural to the empirical method. "The faculties (συνείδεσις) of the soul are production and nature (ζωή) and an organic being (ζωοειδής), and an interacted being (ζωονομοποιητικόν), and will or impulse. His remarks are particularly interesting on the manifestations of the cognitive powers (De Animi, ii, 3, 4; De Sensu et Sensibili, 1, 3, 2), on the senses; on common sense (κοινή aίσθησις); the first attempt toward a clearer indication of consciousness (ibid. iii, 1 sq.), on imagination, reminiscence, and memory (ibid. iii, 8, De Memo- ria). The act of intuition and perception is a reception of the forms of objects; and thought is a reception of the forms presupposed by feeling and imagination (ibid. iii, 4). Hence a passive (σώματος, intellectus passus) and an active (σώματος, intellectus agent) first implies receptivity for those forms, therefore it has the closest relation with the faculty of feeling, and hence with the body; to the latter, which elaborates those forms into judging (σώματος δικαίωμα) and inferring (σώματος αναγωγή), and which moreover itself thinks, it appertains indestructibility (immortality without consciousness or memory) (De Animi, ii, 1-6, iii, 2 sq.). Thought itself is a power separate from the body, coming from without into man (De Gener. Anim. ii, 5), similar to the element of the stars (Cic. Acad. Quest, I, 7). Further, the understanding is theoretical or practical; it is the large mass as much as it processes end and aims, and the will (τὸ ὑπόκεισθαι) is an impulse directed toward matters of practice—that is to say, toward good; which is real or apparent, according as it procures a durable or a transient enjoyment (De Animi, iii, 9-11; Eth. iii, vi): ὑπόκεισθαι is subdivided into ἀπατή and ἀκυρωσία—the will, properly so called, and desire. Pleasure is the result of the perceive and the will, the necessary consequence of the power again is perfected. The noblest pleasures spring from reason (Ethic. x, 4, 5, 8)."—Tennemann, § 146.

From Psychology we proceed to Metaphysics, or "the first philosophy," as Aristotle called it, i.e. the attempt to systematize all the sciences at the same time. While adhering strictly to his own empirical method, he would have confined himself to the relative, and not sought the absolute at all. His prima philosophia deals with the unchangeable, while physical science deals with change or movement. "Matter," he said, "exists in a threefold form: first, a substance, perceptible by the senses, which is finite and removable from any substance; either the abstract substance, or the substance connected with form (ἰδιότης). II. The higher substance, which, though perceived by the senses, is imperishable, such as are the heavenly bodies. Here the active principle (ἐνίσχυσις) steps in, which, in so far as it contains that which is to be produced, is understanding (γνώσις). That which it contains is the purpose (τὸ ὑπὸ ἔπαινος), which purpose is realized in the act. Here we have the two extremes of potentiality and agency, matter and thought. The often-mentioned entelechy is the relation between these two extremes. It is the point of transition between ἰδιότης and ἐνίσχυσις, and is accordingly the cause of motion, or efficient cause, and represents the soul. III. The third form of substance is that in which the three forms of power, efficient cause and effect, are united—the absolute substance, eternal unmoved, God himself!" (Lewes, Hist. of Philosophy, ii, 126). As to the relative place of the idea of God in the systems of Plato and of Aristotle, Maurice well remarks that "it cannot be denied that the recognition of an absolute being, of an absolute good, was that which gave life to the whole doctrine of Plato, and without which it is meaningless; that, on the contrary, it is merely the crowning result, or, at least, the necessary postulate of Aristotle's philosophy. In strict consistency with this difference, it was a being to satisfy the wants of man which Plato sighed for; it was a first cause of things to which Aristotle did homage. The first would part with no indication or symbol of the truth it contained; that is to say, (De Animi, ii, 8 sq.), on imagination, reminiscence, and memory (ibid. iii, 8, De Memo- ria). The act of intuition and perception is a reception of the forms of objects; and thought is a reception of the forms presupposed by feeling and imagination (ibid. iii, 4). Hence a passive (σώματος, intellectus passus) and an active (σώματος, intellectus agent) first implies receptivity for those forms, therefore it has the closest relation with the faculty of feeling, and hence with the body; to the latter, which elaborates those forms into judging (σώματος δικαίωμα) and inferring (σώματος αναγωγή), and which moreover itself thinks, it appertains indestructibility (immortality without consciousness or memory) (De Animi, ii, 1-6; iii, 2 sq.). Thought itself is a power separate from the body, coming from without into man (De Gener. Anim. ii, 5), similar to the element of the stars (Cic. Acad. Quest, I, 7). Further, the understanding is theoretical or practical; it is the large mass as much as it processes end and aims, and the will (τὸ ὑπόκεισθαι) is an impulse directed toward matters of practice—that is to say, toward good; which is real or apparent, according as it procures a durable or a transient enjoyment (De Animi, iii, 9-11; Eth. iii, vi): ὑπόκεισθαι is subdivided into ἀπατή and ἀκυρωσία—the will, properly so called, and desire. Pleasure is the result of the perceive and the will, the necessary consequence of the power again is perfected. The noblest pleasures spring from reason (Ethic. x, 4, 5, 8)."—Tennemann, § 146.

Practical philosophy, according to Aristotle, includes ethics, the laws of the individual moral life; economy, those of the family; and politics, those of man in the state. His "inquiry starts from the conception of a sovereign good and final end. The final end (τὸ ἐνίσχυσις) is happiness (εὐδαιμονία) and the result of the energies of the soul (ἐν κυρία τὴν ἐπανεύρεσιν) in a perfect life (Eth. Nic. i, 1-7; x, 5, 6); to it appertains true dignity, as being the highest thing. This perfect exercise of reason is virtue, and virtue is the perfection of speculative and practical reason; hence the subdivision of intellectual virtue (νομική νοηματική) and moral (ὁμοιότης, Eth. Nic. i, 18; iii, 5 sq.), and longs, in its entire plenitude, to God alone, and confers the highest felicity, or absolute beatitude; the second, which he also styles the human, is the constant perfecting of the reasonable will (ἰδιότης, ἀκυρωσία), the effect of a deliberate resolve, and consequently of liberty (σωφροσύνη), of which Aristotle was the first to display its psychological character, and of which the subjective form consists in always taking the mean between two extremes (τά μέσα, μοσχή). Aristotle may be said to have been the father of psychological freedom of choice (Εὐθυ νενίς, ii, 6). Ethical virtue presents itself under six principal characters, having reference to the different objects of desire and avoidance (the cardinal virtues), namely, courage (προφυλάσσω), temperance (σωφροσύνη), generosity (κλητορία), delicacy (μικροκάρδια), magnanimity and a prudent judgment of himself and others (ομούσιον). Not to be discussed, however, are such virtues as gentleness and moderation. To these are added the accessory virtues, such as politeness of manner (ἱεροπάσχλα), amiability, the faculty of loving and being beloved (φιλία), and, lastly, justice (δικαιοσύνη), which comprises and completes all the others, and on that account is called perfect virtue (τελεία). Under the head of justice Aristotle comprehends right also. Justice he regards as the special virtue (applied to the notion of equality, τό τοιόων) of giving every man his due: and its operation may be explained by applying it to the arithmetical and geometrical proportions conformably to the two species, the distributive and comparative, so as to pulse to the right of justice. To these must be added equity, which has for its end the rectification of the defects of law. Under the head of right (δικαιοσύνη) he distinguishes that pertaining to a family (οικείωμα) and that of a city (πολιτεία), dividing the latter into the natural (φυσική) and the positive (καταφυσική). A perfect unity of plan prevails throughout his ethics, his politics, and his economics. Both the latter have for their end to show how the object of man's existence defined in the ethics, viz. virtue combined with happiness, may be attained in the civil and domestic relations through a good constitution of the state (κατάφυσις). To this (εὐτυχία) is a complete association of a certain number of smaller societies sufficient to satisfy in common all the wants of life (Πολ., i, 2). Mental power alone should preponderate. The science of politics is the investigation of means tending to the final end proposed by the state. Its principle is expediency, and its perfection the suitability of means to the end. By this principle Aristotle would prove the lawfulness of slavery. (W. T. Krug, De Aristotele Serenitatis Defensor [Lips. 1819, 4to]): C. G. Gottling, Commentario de Notione Serenitatis apud Aristotelem (Gen. 1821, 4to); Wallon, Hist. de l'Escholot d'Aristote (Paris, 1847, 3 vols. 8vo); Thirlwall, Hist. Grecques (in 6 vols. 4to); Sir G. S. Shedd (History of D'etrines, bk. i, ch. 1) adopts, perhaps too closely, Ritter's reconsideration of Plato and Aristotle, going so far as to say that "Platonism and Aristotelianism differ only in form, not in substance." While we cannot agree to this broad statement, there is yet, as to the points named, reason for what he says, viz. that, in reference to the principal questions of philosophy, "both are found upon the same side of the line that divides all philosophies into the material, the spiritual, the pantheistic, and the theistic. There is a substantial agreement between Plato and his pupil Aristotle in respecting the rationality and immortality of the mind as a principle, and in regarding the nature and origin of ideas, respecting the positive positions and importance of the senses, and of knowledge by the senses. But these subjects which immediately reveal the general spirit of a philosopher system. Let any one read the ethical treatises of Plato and Aristotle, and he will find that both held the same general idea of the Deity as a moral governor, of moral law, and of the immutable reality of right and wrong." But the fundamental difference of the two systems still remains, viz. that Plato regards the "ideas" or eternal archetypes of things as forming the true substance of the latter, and as having their existence in themselves, independent of the material things, their soulless shadows; while Aristotle was of opinion that the individual thing contained the true substance, which forms whatever is permanent in the flux of outward appearances.

For a long time the Aristotelian philosophy remained in Greek as the ideal of thePlatonists, but after this the latter gained the ascendency. In Rome Aristotle found but few adherents. The fathers of the ancient Church were, on the whole, not favorable to Aristotelianism, but it was cultivated with great zeal by several sects, especially those which were inclined toward a kind of rationalism. (Comp. Lecky, History of Racionalism, i, 417.): Nicetas, De fide (in comp.) combined with occupying themselves more with the study of Aristotle than with that of the Scriptures. The Anomoeans of the school of Eunomius were called by the fathers "young Aristotelians" (see, on the opinions of the Greek fathers respecting this point, Launoy, De varia Aristotelis in Acad. Par. fortuna, in his Opera omnia, iv, 175 sq. Col. 1782; Kuhn, Katholische Dogmatik, i, 2, 869). Nevertheless, the influence of Aristotle commenced to spread in Christian philosophy during the 4th and 5th centuries, especially in the West. Previously the Neo-Platonic philosophy, which tried to reconcile Aristotle with Plato, had given a new impetus to the study of ancient philosophy. To call forth a number of commentaries, of which that of Porphyry is the most celebrated. Among the Christian Aristotelians of those times was Nemesium, bishop of Emesa, A.D. 400, whose work on "the Nature of the Soul" is based on the Aristotelian anthropology, and remained long in use and influence in Christian philosophy. Eunomus of Gaza, toward the end of the 6th century, and Zacharias Scholasticus (first half of 6th century), opposed Aristotle, especially with regard to the world, and approached nearer the doctrine of Plato. Of greater significance was Johannes Philoponus, who called himself "Aristotelianus" and was the teacher of many modern writers to have lived in the first half of the 6th century. He combated the Platonist philosophy, and followed Aristotle so closely as even to deviate from the commonly received doctrines of Christianity. Thus, applying the Aristotelian doctrine that individual things are substances, he changed the doctrine of the Trinity into a kind of trinitarian Scholasticism. Johannes Damascenus, the chief theologian of the Greek Church, knew and used the dialectics of Aristotle, but made no attempt to thoroughly blend it with the doctrines of Christianity. A new era in the history of the Aristotelian philosophy within the Christian Church begins after the Council of Chalcedon, and the translations of the Scriptures, for the treatment of which see SCHOLASTICISM.

A very full account of Aristotle's writings and of his system (from the Hegelian point of view), by Prof. Stahr, is given in Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Roman Biog., etc., vol. i. For an excellent sketch of the Life of Aristotle, by Prof. Park, see Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. i. The literature of the subject is curiously given in Stahr's article above referred to. Arithmetic, or the science of numbers, was unquestionably practised as an art in the dawn of civilization; since to put things or their symbols together (addition), and to take one thing from another (subtraction), must have been coeval with the earliest forts of the human mind; and what are termed multiplication and division are only abbreviated forms of addition and subtraction. The origin, however, of the exact and necessary art of the arts and sciences is lost in the shades of antiquity, since it arose long before the period when men began to take special notice and make some kind of record of their discoveries and pursuits. In the absence of positive information, we seem authorized in referring the first knowledge of arithmetic to the East (see Edinburgh Review, xvi, 385). From India, China, Persia, and Egypt the science passed to the Greeks, who extended its laws, improved its processes, and widened its sphere. To what extent the Orientals carried their acquaintance with arithmetic cannot be determined. The greatest discovery in this department of the mathematic, namely, the establishment of our system of cipher, or of figures considered as distinct from the letters of the alphabet, belongs undoubtedly, not to Arabia, as is generally supposed, but to the remote East, probably India. It is to be regretted that the name of the discoverer is unknown, for the invention must be recko ned among the greatest of human achievements. Our number is also known to the Hebrews, and by the Arabians, who, though they were nothing more than the mediums of transmission, have enjoyed the honor of giving them their name. These numerals were unknown to the Greeks, who made use of the letters of the alphabet for arithmetical purposes (see Encyclopedia, s. v.). It was the first attempt at a regular system of cipher, no regularity in the use of symbols could be claimed for the Hebrews, for although they had a symbol for each sound of the Hebrew tongue, this was not a scientific, but a religious and practical nation. What they borrowed from others of the arts of life they used without surrounding it with theory, or expanding and framing it into a system. So with arithmetic, designated by them by some form of the verb תָּבָק, tebak', signifying to determine, limit, and thence to number. Of their knowledge of this science little is known more than what may be fairly inferred from the pur suits and trades which they carried on, for the successful prosecution of which some skill at least in its simpler processes must have been absolutely necessary; and the large amounts which appear here and there in the sacred books serve to show that their acquaintance with the art of reckoning was considerable. See NUMBERS. Even in fractions they were not inexperienced (Genesis, Lev. 252). For figures, the Jews, after the Babylonian exile, made use of the letters of the alphabet, as appears from the inscriptions on the so-called Samaritan coins (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. i, iii, 466); and it is not unlikely that the ancient Hebrews, as well as the Levites, who bore their alphabet from the Phenicians, neighbors of the Israelites, and employed it instead of numerals (Schmidt, Biblischer Mathematicus, Tüb. 1786, 1749).

ARK is used in the Bible to designate three vessels of special importance.

1. Noah's Ark (בֵּית, tebak'; Sept. καιρως, a chest; Josephus Καβακ, a coffer; Vulg. arca, Gen. vi, 14), different from the term תָּבָק, applied to the "ark" of the covenant, and other receptacles which we know to have been chests or coffers, but the same that is applied to the "ark" in which Moses was hid (Exod. ii, 8), the only other part of Scripture in which it occurs. In the latter passage the Septuagint renders it βίβλιον, a ship; but the truth seems to be that aron denotes any kind of chest or coffer. The application of tebak to the vessels of Noah and of Moses would suggest the probability that it was restricted to such chests or arks as were intended to float upon the water, of whatever description. The identity of the name with that of the wicker basket in which Moses was exposed on the Nile has led some to suppose that the ark of Noah was also of wicker-work; or rather it was warded and strengthened by means of bars. (See Auth. "pitch," Gen. vi, 14). This is not impossible, seeing that vessels of considerable burden are thus constructed at the present day; but there is no sufficient authority for carrying the analogy to this extent. The boat-like form of the ark, which, repeated pictorially by the theologians, is so clearly defined in the narratives for progression and for cutting the waves; whereas the ark of Noah was really destined to float idly upon the waters, without any other motion than that which it received from them. If we examine the passage in Gen. vi, 14-16, we can only draw from it the conclusion that the ark was not a boat or ship; but, as Dr. Robinson (in Calmet's Dict. s. v.) describes it, "a building in the form of a parallelogram, 300 cubits long, 50 cubits broad, and 30 cubits high. The length of the cubit, in the great variety of measures that bore this name, it is impossible to ascertain and useless to conjecture. So far as the same affords any evidence, it is seen that the ark was a regular vessel, not built in a regularly-built vessel, but merely intended to float at large upon the waters. We may, therefore, probably with justice, regard it as a large oblong, floating house, with a roof either flat or only slightly inclined. It was constructed with three stories, and had a door in the side, and the three stories were at just the same height, but above, i.e. probably in the flat roof, where Noah was commanded to make them a cubit in size (Gen. vi, 16). That this is the meaning of the passage seems apparent from Gen. viii, 15, where Noah removes the covering of the ark in order to ascertain whether the ground was dry—a labor unnecessary, surely, had there been windows in the sides of the ark. The purpose of this ark was to preserve certain persons and animals from the deluge with which God intended to overwhelm the land, in punishment for man's iniquities. The persons were eight—Noah and his wife, with his three sons and their wives (Gen. vii, 7; 2 Pet. ii, 5). The animals were, one pair of every "unclean" animal, and seven pairs of all that were "clean." By "clean" we understand fit, and by "unclean" unfit, for food or sacrifice. Of birds there were seven pairs (Gen. vii, 2, 3). Those who have written professedly and largely on the subject have been at great pains to fix for us this number; but all the earlier writers for the number of animals in the ark of Noah, showing how they might be distributed, fed, and otherwise provided for. But they are very far from having cleared the matter of all its difficulties, which are much greater than they, in their general ignorance of natural history, were aware of. Of these difficulties, however, some arises from the assumption that the species of all the earth were collected in the ark. The number of such species has been vastly underrated by these writers, partly from ignorance, and partly from the desire to limit the number for which they imagined they were required to provide. They have usually satisfied themselves with a provision for three or four hundred species upon the total. But of the existing mammal considerably more than one thousand species are known; of birds, fully five thousand; of reptiles, very few kinds of which can live in water, two thousand; and the researches of geologists and naturalists are making frequent and important additions to the number. It is certain, in addition, that millions upon millions of animals must be provided for, for they have all their appropriate and diversified places and circumstances of existence" (Dr. J. Pye Smith, On... the relation between the Holy Scriptures and some parts of geological science, p. 285). Nor do these numbers fail to show the difficulty. The Jour observes: "All land animals have their geographical regions, to which their constitutional natures are congenial, and many could not live in any other situation. We cannot represent to ourselves the idea of their being brought into one small spot, from the polar regions, the torrid zone, and all the other climates of Asia, Africa, America, Australia, and the thousands of islands, their preservation and provision, and the final disposal of them, without bringing up the idea of miracles more stupendous than any which are recorded in Scripture." These are some of the difficulties which arise upon the supposition that all the species of the animal world were enclosed together and contained in the ark. And if the object, as usually assumed, was to preserve the species of creatures which the Deluge would otherwise have destroyed, the provision for beasts and birds only must have been altogether inadequate. What, then, would have become of the countless reptiles, insects, and animalcules to which we have already referred? and it is not clear that some provision must not also have been necessary for fishes and shell-animals, many of which cannot live in fresh water, while others cannot live in salt. The difficulty of assembling in one spot, and of providing for in the ark, the various mammalia and birds, and even the innumerable marine, otherwise essential provision for reptiles, insects, and fishes, is quite sufficient to suggest some error in the current belief. We are to consider the different kinds of accommodation and food which would be required for animals of such different habits and climates, and the necessary provision for cleansing the stables or dens. And if so much ingenuity has been required in devising arrangements for the comparatively small number of species which the writers on the ark have been willing to admit into it, what provision can be made for the immensely larger number which, under the supposed conditions, would really have required its shelter? There seems to be no way of meeting these difficulties but by adopting the suggestion of Bishop Stillington, approved by Matthew Poole, Dr. J. Pye Smith, Le Clerc, Rosenmüller, and others. For if, as the object of the Deluge was to sweep man from off the earth, it did not extend to the destruction of the earth which man then inhabited, and that only the animals of that region were preserved in the ark. See DELUGE. Bishop Stillington, who wrote in plain sobriety long before geology was known as a science, and when, therefore, those discoveries were altogether unthought of, by which, in our day, such warm controversies have been excited, expresses his belief that the Flood was universal as to mankind, and that all men, except those preserved in the ark, were destroyed; but he sees no evidence from Scripture that the whole earth was then inhabited; he does not think that it can ever be proved to have been so; and he asks what reason can be to extend the destruction of the Deluge being the sin of man, who was punished in the beasts that were destroyed for his sake, as well as in himself) where the occasion was not, as where there were animals and no men, there seems no necessity for extending the Flood thither (Origenes Sermo, bk. i., ch. iv.) But (though the historian of the Deluge being the sin of man, who was punished in the beasts that were destroyed for his sake, as well as in himself) where the occasion was not, as where there were animals and no men, there seems no necessity for extending the Flood thither (Origenes Sermo, bk. i., ch. iv.) But (though the historian of the Deluge being the sin of man, who was punished in the beasts that were destroyed for his sake, as well as in himself). The main thing looked at in the preservation of them in the ark, that men might have all of them ready for use after the Flood; which could not have been had had the several kinds been preserved in the ark, although we suppose them not destroyed in all parts of the world."

As Noah was the progenitor of all the nations of the earth, and as the ark was the second cradle of the human race, we might expect to find in all nations traditions and reports more or less distinct respecting him, the ark in which he was saved, and the Deluge in general. Accordingly, no nation is known in which such traditions have not been found. They have been very industriously brought together by Banier, Bryant, Faber, and other mythologists. See ARK; NOAH. And as it appears that an ark—that is, a boat or was the one in Flood story, called a go Kado, Kibo, Kibot, which, as we have seen, means an ark or hollow vessel. The medals in question belong, the one to the elder Philip, and the other to Pertinax. In the former it is extremely interesting to observe that on the front of the ark is the name of Noah, NER, in Greek characters. These are the words of the Deluge being the sin of man, who was punished in the beasts that were destroyed for his sake, as well as in himself. The coinage of these medals is a subject of much interest, and is scarcely less illustrative of the prevailing belief to which we refer, if, as it seems, the figures represented are those of Deucalion and Pyrrha (Meiser, De arca Noahi, Witt. 1822) — into. See FLOOD.
2. The Ark of Bulrushes (נֵבֶל, tebah'; Sept. θεμάρης). In Exod. ii, 8, we read that Moses was exposed among the flags of the Nile in an ark (or boat of bulrushes) daubed with slime and with pitch. The bulrushes of which the ark was made were the papyrus reed (Cyperus papyrus), which grows in Egypt in marshy places. It was used for a variety of purposes, even for food. Pliny says, from the plant itself they score boats, and other ancient writers inform us that the Nile wherries were made of papyrus. Boats made of this material were noted for their swiftness, and are alluded to in Isa. xviii, 2. See REED.

3. The Sacred Ark of the Jews (נֵבֶל, tebah'; Sept. θεμάρης, aron'; Sept. and New Test. τό θεμάριον), different from the term applied to the ark of Noah. It is the common name for a chest or cofin, whether applied to the ark in the tabernacle, to a coffin, to a mummy-chest (Gen. i, 26), or to a chest for money (2 Kings xii, 9, 10). Our word ark has the same meaning, being derived from the Latin arca, a chest. The sacred chest is distinguished from others as the "ark of God" (1 Sam. iii, 5), "ark of the covenant" (Josh. iii, 5; Heb. ix, 4), and "ark of the law" (Exod. xxv, 22). This ark was a kind of box, of an oblong shape, made of shittim (acacia) wood, a cubit and a half broad and high, two and a half cubits long, and covered on all sides with the purest gold. It was ornamented on its upper surface with a border or rim of gold; and on each of the two sides, at equal distances from the top, were two gold rings, in which were placed (to remain there perpetually) the gold-covered poles by which the ark was carried, and which continued with it after it was deposited in the tabernacle. The Levites of the house of Kohath, to whose office this especially appertained, bore it in its progress. Probably, however, when removed from within the vail in the most holy place, which was its proper position, or when taken out thence, priests were its bearers (Num. v, 7; x, 21; iv. 5, 19, 20; 1 Kings viii, 3, 6). The ends of the staves were visible without the vail in the holy place of the temple of Solomon, the staves being drawn to the ends, apparently, but not out of the rings. The ark, when transported, was enveloped in the "vail" of the dismantled tabernacle, in the curtain of badgers' skins, and in a blue cloth over all, and was therefore not seen. The lid or cover of the ark was of the same length and breadth as the ark itself, and made of the purest gold. Over it, at the two extremities, were two cherubim, with their faces turned toward each other, and inclined a little toward the lid (otherwise called the mercy-seat). See CHEMISH. Their wings, which were spread out over the top of the ark, formed the throne of God, the King of Israel, while the ark itself was his footstool (Exod. xxxv, 10-22; xxxvii, 1-9). (Comp. Josephus, Ant. iii, 6, 5; Philo, Opera, ii, 150; Koran, ii, 249, ed. Marc. &c.; for heathen parallels, see Apulej, Apol. xi, 262, Bisp.; Pausan. vii, 19, 5; Ovid, Arm. Am. ii, 606 sq.; Catull. ivx, 260 sq. See generally Reland, Antiqu. Sacr. i, 5, 19 sq., 48 sq.; Carpozov, Appar. p. 260 sq.; Schacht, Aminadebr. p. 384 sq.; Buxtorf, Hist. arcae cod. in Ugolini Theodoss. viii; Hoffmann, in the Halil Ezeq. xiv, 27 sq.; Ohbo, Lex. t. $Qa, p. 60 sq.; Bau, Nubes super arcae fod. This ark was the most sacred object among the Israelites; it was deposited in the innermost and holiest part of the tabernacle, called "the holy of holies" (and afterward in the corresponding apartment of the Temple), where it stood so that one end of each of the poles by which it was carried (which were drawn out so far as to allow the ark to be placed against the back wall) touched the vail which separated the two apartments of the tabernacle (1 Kings vii, 8). It was also probably a reliquary for the pot of manna and the rod of Aaron. We read in 1 Kings vii, 9, that "there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone which Moses put there at Horeb." Yet Paul, or the author of Heb. ix, 4, asserts that, besides the two tables of stone, the "pot of manna" and "Aaron's rod that budded" were inside the ark, which were directed to be "laid up" and "kept before the testimony." L. e. before the tables of the law (Exod. xl, 20); and probably, since there is no mention of any other receptacle for them, and some would have been necessary, the statement of 1 Kings vii, 9, implies that by Solomon's time these relics had disappeared. The expression נֵבֶל נֵבֶל, Deut. xxvi, 26, obscurely rendered "is the side of the ark" (Auth. Vers.), merely means "beside it." During the marches of the Israelites it was covered with a purple pall, and borne by the priests, with great reverence and care, in advance of the host (Num. iv, 5, 6; x, 33). It was before the ark, thus in advance, that the waters of the Jordan separated; and it remained in the bed of the river, with the attendant priests, until the whole host had passed over; and no sooner was it also brought up than the waters resumed their course (Josh. iii. iv, 7, 10, 11, 17, 18). We may notice a fiction of the Rabbis that there were two arks, one which remained in the shrine, and another which preceded the camp on its march, and that this latter contained the broken tables of the law, as the former the whole law. The ark was simply conspicuous in the grand procession round Jericho (Josh. vi. 4, 6, 8, 11, 12). It is not wonderful, therefore, that the neighboring nations, who had no notion of spiritual worship, looked upon it as the God of the Israelites (1 Sam. iv. 6, 7), a delusion which may have been strengthened by the figures of the cherubim on it. After that, the ark generally (see xx. 27) remained in the tabernacle at Shiloh, until, in the time of Eli, it was carried along with the army in the war against the Philistines, under the superstitious notion that it would secure the victory to the Hebrews. They were, nevertheless, not only beaten, but the ark itself was taken by the Philistines (1 Sam. iv. 3-11), whose triumph was, however, very short lived, as they were so oppressed by the hand of God that, after seven months, they were glad to send it back again (1 Sam. v, 7). After that it remained apart from the tabernacle, at Kirjath-jearim (vii. 1, 2), where it continued until the time of David, who purposed to take it to Jerusalem; but the old prescribed mode of removing it from place to place was so much neglected as to cause the death of Uzzah, in consequence of which it was left in the house of Obededom (2 Sam. vi. 1-11); but after three months David took courage, and succeeded in effecting its safe removal, in grand procession, to Mount Zion (ver. 12-19). When the Temple of Solomon was completed, the ark was deposited in the sanctuary (1 Kings viii, 9). Several of the Psalms contain allusions to these events (e.g. xxiv, xlvii, cxxxii), and Ps. cv appears to have been composed on the occasion of the first of them. See Psalms. The passage in 2 Chron. xxxiii, 8, in which Josiah directs the Levites to restore the ark to the holy place, is understood by some to imply that it had either been removed by Amon, who put an idol in its place, which is assumed to have been the "treasures" of which he is said to have been guilty (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3), viz., the priests that seem to be referred to, also drawn it during idolatrous times, and preserved it in some secret place, or had removed it from one place to another. But it seems more likely that it had been taken from the holy of holies during the purification and repairs of the Temple by this same Josiah, and that, in this age, it merely directs it to be again set in its place. Or it may have been removed by Manasseh, to make room for the "carved image" that he placed in "the house of God" (2 Chron, xxxiii. 7). What became of the ark when the Temple was plundered and destroyed by the Babylonians is not known, and all conjecture is useless. It was probably taken away by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings v, 22). The Jews believe that it was concealed from the spoilers, and account it among the hidden things which the Messiah is to reveal (see Ambros. Off. iii. 17, 18; Joseph. Goriond. i. 21; Wernsdorf. De fide Maccab. p. 188 sq.; Mishna, Shkal. vi. 3). It is certain, however, from the consent of all the Jewish writers, that the old ark was not contained in the second temple, and there is no evidence that any new one was made. Indeed, the absence of the ark is one of the important particulars in which this temple was held to be inferior to that of Solomon. The most holy place is therefore generally considered to have been empty in the second temple (see Josephus, Antiq. xvi. 14); or at most (as the rabbins allege, Mishna, Yoma, v. 2) to have contained only a stone to mark the place which the ark should have occupied (comp. Tacit. Hist. v. 9). The silence of Ezra, Nehemiah, the Maccabees, and Josephus, who repeatedly mention all the other sacred utensils, but never name the ark, seems conclusive on the subject. But, notwithstanding this weight of testimony, there are writers, such as Fridericus (Connection, i. 207), who contend that the Jews could not properly carry on their worship without an ark, and that if the original ark was not recovered after the Captivity, a new one must have been made (Calmet's Dissertation sur l'Arche d'Aliance; Hane, De lapide cui arca impo- nita fuit, Ezech. et Lxx. n. 4, 440). See Temple.

Concerning the design and form of the ark, it appears that clear and unexpected light has been thrown by the discoveries which have of late years been made in Egypt, and which have unfolded to us the rites and mysteries of the old Egyptians. (See Decr. de l'Egypte, Att. i, pl. 11, fig. 4; pl. 12, fig. 8; iii, pl. 32, 34, 56; comp. Rosenmüller, Moncet. ii. 96 sq.; Heeren, Ideen, ii, ii, 681; Spencer, Leg. rit. iii. 3, p. 1084 sq.; Rahr. Symbolik. 1, 381, 402 sq.) "One of the most important ceremonies was the procession of shrines," which is mentioned Egyptian Ark. From the Rosetta stone, and frequently occurs on the walls of the temples. The shrines were of two kinds: the one a sort of canopy; the other an ark or sacred boat, which may be termed the great shrine. This was carried with grand pomp by the priests, a certain number being selected for that duty, who supported it on their shoulders by means of long staves, passing through metal rings at the side of the sledge on which it stood, and brought it into the temple, where it was deposited upon a stand or table, in order that the prescribed ceremonies might be discharged before it. The stand was also carried in procession by another set of priests, following the shrine, by means of similar staves; a method usually adopted for carrying large statues and sacred emblems, too heavy or too important to be borne by one person. The same is stated to have been the custom of the Jews in some of their religious processions (comp. 1 Chron. xv. 2, 15; 2 Sam. xv. 24; and Josh. iii. 12), as in carrying the ark to its place, into the oracle of the God of Israel to the most holy place, when the Temple was built by Solomon (1 Kings viii. 6)." . . . Some of the arks or boats contained the emblems of Life and Stability, which, when the veil was drawn aside, were partially seen; and others presented the beetle to the sun, overshadowed by the wings of two figures of the goddess Themen, or Truth, which characterizes the cherubim of the Jews." (Wilson's Anc. Egyptians, v. 271, 275). The ritual of the Etruscans, Greeks, Romans, and other ancient nations, included the use of what Clemens Alexandrinus calls καρνακα (Propv. p. 12). The same Clemens (Strom. v. 578) also contains an allusion of a proverbial character to the ark, which shows that they were popularly known, where he says that "only the master (διδάσκαλος) may uncover the ark" (ειδωτος). In Latin, also, the word arca/lena, con-

Arkite (Heb. Ἀρκ, Ἀρκ; Sept. and Joseph. Αρουκαίος, like the Samar. Ἀρουά, Ἀρουά, a designation of the inhabitants of Arka (Pilm. v, 16; Ἀρκεία, Ptol. v, 15), who are mentioned in 1 Chr. 1, 15, as descended from the Phoenician or Sidonian branch of the great family of Canaan. This, in fact, as well as the other small northern states of Phoenicia, was a colony from the great parent state of Sidon. Arka, or Arce (Ἀρκή), their chief town, lay between Tripolis and Antioch, at the western base of Lebanon (Joseph. Ant. i, 6, 2; Jerome, Qued. in Gen. x, 15). Josephus (Ant. vii, 2, 3) makes Ban- nath, who in 1 Kings iv, 16, is said to have been a per- eminent of the tribe of Asher, governor of Arka (Ἀρκή) by the sea; and if, as commonly supposed, the capital of the Arkites is intended, their small state must, in the time of Solomon, have lain under the Hebrew yoke. In the time of Alexander a splendid temple was erected here in honor of Astarte, the Venus of the Phoenicians (Macrobr. sat. i, 21). Subsequently Arka shared the lot of the other small Phoenician states in that quarter; but in later times it formed part of Herod Agrippa's kingdom. Titus passed through it on his return from the destruction of Jeru- salem (Apacias, Joseph. War, vii, 5, 1). In the Midr. Midr. Rabb. 87 it is called "Arkam of Leba- non" (אֶרֶךְ לַחַנָּה). The name and site seem never to have been unknown (Mannert, p. 391), although for a time it bore the name of Casarea Libani (Aurel. Vict. De Cer. xxiv, 1), from having been the birthplace of Alexander Severus (Lampri. Alex. Ser.). Coins are extant of it (Eckhel, Doct. Num. iii, 366), but not of its Phoenician period (Gesenius, Mamm. Phoen. ii, 285 sq.). It was eventually the seat of a Christian bishopric (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. ii, 818, 823). It is repeatedly noticed by the Arabian writers (Michelasi, Specii. ii, 23; also Orient. Bibl. vii, 99; Schweich, Mem. Pont. Rom.; Edrii, p. 19; Rosenmüller, Barbcrh. Chron. p. 282). It is mentioned in all the itineraries of this region, and is conspicuous in early ecclesiastical records. It also figures largely in the exploits of the Crusaders, by whom it was unsuccessfully besieged in 1099, but at last taken in 1109 by Bertrand (see Robinson's Researches, new ed. iii, 578 sq.). In 1292 it was totally destroyed by an earth- quake. It lay 22 Roman miles from Antipatras, 18 miles from Tripoli, and, according to Abulfeda, a par- saging from the sea (Tab. Syriae, p. 11). In a position corresponding to these intimations, Shaw (Observ. p. 270) noticed the site and ruins. Burckhardt, in traveling from the north-east of Lebanon to Tripoli, at the distance of about four miles south of the Nahr-el-kebir (Eleutherus), came to a hill called Tel-Arka, which, from its regularly flattened conical form and smooth sides, appeared to be artificial. He was told that on its top were some ruins of habitations and was guided to an elevation on its east and south side, which commands a beautiful view over the plain, the sea, and the Anzeyrie mountains, are large and extensive heaps of rubbish, traces of ancient dwellings, blocks of hewn stone, remains of walls, and fragments of granite columns. These were no doubt the remains of Arka; and the hill is probably the sacred hill, or the site of a temple (Harms- veld, i, 89 sq.). The present village has 21 Greek and 7 Moslem families—a wretched hamlet amid the Ancient Egyptian Shrine.

The purpose or object of the ark was to contain in- violate the Divine autograph of the two tables, that "covenant" from which it derived its title, the idea of which was inseparable from it, and which may be regarded as the depositum of the Jewish dispensation. The perpetual safe custody of the material tables no doubt suggested the moral observance of the precepts inscribed. The words of the Auth. Vers. in 1 Chr. xiii, 3, seem to imply a use of the ark for the purpose of an oracle; but this is probably erroneous, and "we sought it not" the meaning; so the Sept. renders it (see Gesenius, Lex. s. v. אָרֶךְ). Occupying the most holy spot of the whole sanctuary, it tended to exclude any idol from the centre of worship. And Jeremiah (iii, 16) looks forward to the time when even the ark should be "no more remembered" as the climax of spiritualized religion apparently in Mesianic times. It was also the support of the mercy-seat, materially symbolizing, perhaps, the "covenant" as that on which "mercy" rested. It also furnished a legitimate vent to that longing after a material object for reverential feeling which is so common to all religions. It was, however, never seen, save by the high-priest, and res- ressed in this respect the Deity whom it symbolized, whose face none might look upon and live. That this reverential feeling may have been impaired during its absence among the Philistines seems probably from the case of Uzzah.—Smith. See MERCY-SEAT.

columns of this once splendid city (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1886, p. 16).

Arles (late), an ancient archiepiscopal see in Lower Provence, on the left of the Rhone, seven leagues from its mouth, about one hundred and eighty-six leagues from Paris. It is said to derive its name from Ara data, a high altar raised here in pagan times. A number of councils and synods were held at Arles, of which the following are the chief: (1) In 311, for the purpose of the elimination of Mani and 550 or 633 bishops were present; 22 canons were framed on the Donatists, etc.; (2) in 428 or 429, at which Germanus and Lupus were deputed to England; (3) in 455, under Ravennius, to settle the dispute between Faustus, abbot of Lerins, and the bishop of Frejus; (4) in 475, against Lucidus, accused of predestinationism; (5) in 522, under Caesarius, four canons on ordination were published; (6) in 1234, under John Bauusen, twenty-four canons were published against heretics, chiefly against the Waldenses; (7) in 1275, by Bertrand de S. Martin, twenty-two canons were published, and the clergy forbidden making wills.—Landon, Manual of Councils; Smith, Table of Church Hist.

Arm (usually יַעַר, zero'a, ἀρμονία) is frequently used in Scripture in a metaphorical sense to denote power. Hence, to "break the arm" is to diminish or destroy the power (Psa. x. 15; Ezek. xxx. 21; Jer. xlvii, 25). It is also employed to denote the infinite power of God (Psa. lxxxix, 13; xlviii, 2; Isa. lii, 1; John xii, 38). In a few places the metaphor is, with greater force, extended to the action of the arm, as, "I will redeem you with a stretched-out arm" (Exod. vi, 5), that is, with a power fully exerted. The figure is here taken from the attitude of ancient warriors baring and outsticking the arm for fight. Thus, in Isa. lii. 10, "Jehovah hath made bare his holy arm in the sight of all the nations." Lowth observes, in the Sept. and other versions, that in Isa. ix. 20, "they shall eat every one the flesh of his own arm" should be "the flesh of his neighbor," similar to Jer. xiii. 9, meaning that they should harass and destroy one another. (See Wénning's Chrest Symbolica, p. 23, 24.)

Armaged'don (Ἀρμαγέδών, Rev. xvi, 16), properly "the mountain of Megiddo" (Heb. הַמִּגְדֵּל "ה"), a city on the west of the river Jordan, rebuilt by Solomon (1 Kings ii, 15). See เมืองדדנה. In the mystic language of prophecy, the word mountain represents the Church, and the events which took place at Megiddo are supposed to have had a typical reference to the sorrows and triumphs of the people of God under the Gospel. "In that day," says Zechariah (xii. 11), "shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon;" referring to the death of Josiah (q. v.).

He gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon, is the language of the Apocalypse; and the word has been translated by some as "the mountain of destruction," by others as "the mountain of the gospel"—a passage that probably appears a translation of the name Armageddon, as mentioned in Zechariah. Into a valley ominous of slaughter the unclean spirits (representing the heathen influence of the Roman empire), under the special guidance of Providence (xiv. 17), conduct the assembled forces of the beast and his allies; and there in due time they come to an arm to arm struggle through an almighty conqueror (Stuart, Comment, in loc.). The action is illustrated by comparing a similar one in the book of Joel (iii, 2, 12), where the scene of the divine judgment is spoken of in the prophetic imagery as the "valley of Jehoshaphat," the fact underlying the image being Jehoshaphat's great victory (2 Chron. xx. 20). On the same line of thought is the imagery of the struggle of good and evil is suggested by that battlefield, the plain of Esdraelon, which was famous for two great victories—of Barak over the Canaanites (Judg. iv. v), and Gideon over the Midianites (Judg. vii); and for the great disasters, the death of Saul in the invasion of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 8), and the death of Josiah in the invasion of the Egyptians (2 Kings xxiii, 29, 30; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 32). With the first and fourth of these events, Megiddo (Mayyedd) in the Sept. and Josephus) is especially connected. In the apocryphal "Agg. yeyov," as "the hill of Hagi," the Bähr's Excavation on Herod. ii, 159.) As regards the Apocalypse, it is remarked by Stanley (Sinai and Palæstine, p. 330) that this imagery would be peculiarly natural to a Galilean, to whom the scene of these battles was familiar. See ESDRELON.

Armagh, the seat of an archbishopric in Ireland. This church was founded by St. Patrick in 444 or 445. The chapter is composed of five dignitaries, four prebendaries, eight vicars choral, and an organist. The present cathedral is built of red sandstone, and is uniform—184 by 110 feet. It has recently been repaired and beautified, chiefly at the cost (£10,000) of the present lord primate. A new Gothic Roman Catholic cathedral occupies the principal height to the north, and the primatial palace that to the south of the cathedral, the Abbey a former hospital for pilgrims, is maintained by the present primate, and a lusnicayl for four counties. The archbishop is Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland, and has an income of £12,087 a year. The present incumbent is Lord J. G. Beresford, translated from Dublin in 1822.

Armen'ia (Արմենիա), a country of Western Asia, is not mentioned in the original language of Scripture under that name (on the Harāmov of Amos iv, 5, see Enoch thymiller, in loc.), though that occurs in the English version (2 Kings xix, 37), where our translators have very unnecessarily substituted it for Ararat (comp. marginal reading); but is supposed to be alluded to in the three following Hebrew designations, which seem to refer either to the country as a whole, or to particular districts. See Asia.

1. ARARAT, ܐܪܡܐܛܐ, the land upon (or over) the mountains of which the ark rested at the Deluge (Gen. viii. 4; comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 5, 9); whence the sons of Sem were thither fled after murdering their father (2 Kings xix, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 8); and one of the "kingdoms" summoned, along with Minni and Ashkenaz, to arm against Babylon (Jer. ii, 27). That there was a province of Ararat in ancient Armenia we have the testimony of the native historian, Moses of Chorene (Ctes. phil. Histor. Byz. ed. Whiston. Lond. 1786, p. 361). It lay in the centre of the kingdom, was divided into twenty circles, and, being the principal province, was commonly the residence of the kings or governors. See article ARARAT.

2. Minni, ܡܢܢܐ, is mentioned in Jer. ii, 27, along with Ararat and Ashkenaz, as a kingdom called to arm itself against Babylon. The name is by some taken for a contraction of Armenia, and the Chal. in the text in Jerusalem has Hermia, the "Armenian," appears a translation of the name Minni in a passage quoted by Josephus (Ant. i, 3, 6) from Nicolas of Damascus, where it is said that "there is a great mountain in Armenia, beyond the Mésopotamia (Moesia), called Baris, upon which it is reported that many who fled at the time of the Deluge were saved; and that one who was carried in an ark came on shore upon the top of it; and that the remains of the timber of the great wood were observed. This might be the man about whom Moses, the legislator of the Jews, wrote." Saint-Martin (Mémoires sur l'Arménie, i, 249), has not the very probable conjecture that the word Minni may refer to the Manavazians, a distinguished Armenian tribe, who descended from Minni, son of Melazzer, the capital of whose country was Manavazagerd, now Melazzerd. It contains the root of the name Armenia according to the generally received derivation, Har-Minni, "the mountains of Minni." It is worthy of notice that the spot where Xenophon ascertains that the name of the country through which he was passing was Armenia, coincides with the position here assigned to Minni (Xen. An. iv, 5; Ainsworth, _Tract of 10,000, p. 177_).

In Ps. xlv, 8, where it is said, "out of the ivory palaces whereby they made thee glad," the Hebrew word rendered " whereby" is minni (מִנְנִי), and hence some (e.g. Rosenmüller, in loc.) take it for the proper name, and would translate " palaces of Armenia," but the interpretation is forced and incongruous (Gesenius, _Thes. Heb._ p. 799). See MINNI.

3. Togarmah, תֹּגָרָם, in some MSS. Togarmah, and found with great variety of orthography in the Sept. and Josephus. In the ethnographic table in the tenth chapter of Genesis (ver. 3; comp. 1 Chron. i, 6) Togarmah is introduced as the youngest son of Gomer (son of Japhet), who is supposed to have given name to the Cimmerians on the north coast of the Euxine Sea, his other sons being Ashkenaz and Riphat, both progenitors of northern tribes, among whom also it is natural to seek for the posterity of Togarmah. The prophet Ezekiel (xxxviii, 6) also classes along with Gomer "the house of Togarmah and the sides of the north" (in the Eng. Vers. "of the north quarters"), where, as also at Ezek. xxvii, 14, it is placed beside Meshech and Tubal, probably the tribes of the Moschi and Tibareni in the Caucasus. Now, though Josephus and Jerome find Togarmah in Phrygia, Bochart in Cappadocia, the Chaldee and the Jewish rabbins in Germany, etc., yet a comparison of the above passages leads to the conclusion that it is rather to be sought for in Armenia, and this is the opinion of Eusebius, Theodoret, and others of the fathers. It is strikingly confirmed by the traditions of that and the neighboring countries. According to Moses of Chorene (_Hist. Arm._ ed. Whiston, i, 8, p. 24), and also King Wachtang's _History of Georgia_ (in Klaproth's _Travels in the Caucasus_, ii, 64), the Armenians, Georgians, Lezghians, Mingrelians, and Caucasians are all descended from one common progenitor, called Targamos, a son of Awanan, son of Japhet, son of Noah (comp. Eusebius, _Chron._ ii, 12). After the dispersion at Babel he settled near Ararat, but his posterity spread abroad between the Caspian and Euxine seas. A similar account is found in a Georgian chronicle, quoted by another German traveller, Goldenstein, which states that Targamos was the father of eight sons, the eldest of whom was Aos, the ancestor of the Armenians. They still call themselves " the house of Thorgom," the very phrase used by Ezekiel, the corresponding Syriac word for " house" denoting "land or district" (see Wahl, _Geach. der Morgenl. Spr. u. Lit._ p. 72). From the house or province of Togarmah the market of Tyre was supplied with horses and mules (Ezek. xxvii, 14); and Armenia, we know, was famed of old for its breed of horses. The Satrap of Armenia sent yearly to the Persian court 20,000 foals for the feast of Mithras (Strabo, xi, 18, 9; _Xen._ oph. _Anab._ iv, 5, 24; Herod. vii, 40). See TOGARMH.
The *Apemis of the Greeks (sometimes aspirated, *Apemis, comp. Xen. *Amab. iv, 6, 94) is the *Armenis or *Armenia of the Arabs, the *Armenistan of the Persians. Moses of Chorene (Hist. Arm. p. 85) derives the name from Armenia, which was also given to Aramea or Syria; Hartmann (Aujgähr. i, 84) draws it from *Armenoph, the second of the native princes; but the most probable etymology is that of Bochart (Phalèg. i, 3), viz., that it was originally Ἀρμένιον, *Armi-Minmi or Mount Minni, i.e. the high land of Minyas, or, according to Wahl (Aisien, i, 807), the Heavenly Mountain (i.e. Ararat), for *Artemis and, more rarely, *Armenes means heavenly. In the country itself the name Armenia is unknown: the people are called Haik (Rosenmüller, Alterth. i, i, 267 sq.), and the country Hayvotzor, the Valley of the Haiks—Haik, the fifth descendant of Noah by Japhet, in the traditionary genealogy of the country (comp. Ritter’s Erdkunde, ii, 114).

The boundaries of Armenia (lat. 37°—42°) may be described (Strabo, xi, 526) generally as the southern range of the Caucasus on the north, and the Mesochian branch of the Taurus on the south; but in all directions, and especially to the east and west, the limits have been very fluctuating (Bennell, Geogr. Herod. i, 367). It is an elevated table-land of hills, the Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and Acampes pour down their waters in different directions, the first two to the Persian Gulf, the last two respectively to the Caspian and Euxine seas. It may be termed the nucleus of the mountain system of Western Asia: from the centre of the plateau rise two lofty chains of mountains, which run from east to west, converging toward the Caspian Sea, but parallel to each other toward the west, the most northerly named by ancient geographers the Abus Mountains, and culminating in Mount Ararat; the other named the Niphates Mountains. Throughout these ranges may be traced in Anti-Taurus and Taurus, while in the opposite direction they are continued in the Caspian Mountains. These ranges (with the exception of the gigantic Ararat) are of moderate height, the plateau gradually sinking toward the plains of Iran on the east, and those of Asia Minor on the west. The climate is generally cold (Xen. *Amab. iv, 4, 8), but very curious in the deepest valleys, varying greatly with the altitude of different localities, the valleys being sufficiently warm to ripen the grape. The country abounds in romantic forest and mountain scenery, and rich pasture-land, especially in the districts which border upon Persia (Herod. i, 194; vii, 40, 41; Strabo, iv, 5, 24; Strachey, 168, 167; Ezkh. xxvii, 14; Chardin, Voyages, ii, 158; Tournefort, Rasein, iii, 179 sq.). The latter supported vast numbers of mules and horses, on which the wealth of the country chiefly depended; and hence Strabo (xi, 459) tells us that the horses were held in such high estimation as the celebrated Nisian breed. The inhabitants were keen traders in ancient time as in modern times. Ancient writers notice, also, the wealth of Armenia in metals and precious stones (Herod. i, 104; Pliny, xxvii, 23). The great rivers Euphrates and Tigris both take their rise in this region, as also the Araxes, and the Kur or Cyrus. Armenia is commonly divided into five regions: (1) the plateau, (2) the line of separation being the Euphrates (comp. Prolem. v, 7 and 13); but the former constitutes by far the larger portion (Strabo, xi, 532), and, indeed, the other is often regarded as pertaining rather to Asia Minor. (See, generally, Strabo, xi, 526 sq.; Pliny, vi, 9; Memm. v, 2, 181 sq.; Ritter, *Erdeklein., x, 295 sq.) There was a very considerable commerce between Armenia and its neighbors. The capital of Armenia was Artaxata: it was sometimes an independent state, but most commonly tributary to some more powerful neighbor. Indeed, at no period was the whole of this region ever comprised under one government, but Asiae, Media, Syria, and Cappadocia shared the dominion or allegiance of some portion of it, just as it is now divided among the Persians, Russians, Turks, and Kurds; for there is no doubt that that part of Kurdistan which includes the elevated basins of the lakes of Van and Oorniah anciently belonged to Armenia. The name of *Armenia was first given by Ulric Schuls (who was murdered by a Kurdish chief) discovered in 1287, near the former lake, the ruins of a very ancient town, which he supposed to be that which is called by Armenian historians Shamiramakert (i.e. the town of Semiramis), because he believed to have there the famous building by the Assyrian queen. The ruins are covered with inscriptions in the sacred national character; in one of them Saint-Martin thought he deciphered the words *Khaharka, son of Darieusch (Xerxes, son of Darius). In later times Armenia was the border-country where the Romans and Parthians fruitlessly strove for the mastery; and since then it has been the frequent battle-field of the neighboring states. During the recent wars between Russia and Turkey, large bodies of native Armenians have emigrated into the Russian dominions, so that their number in what is termed Turkish Armenia is now considerably reduced. By the treaty of Turkomanscha (21st Feb. 1828) the cedars of Cilicia were ceded to Russia, and the provinces of Erivan and Nakhchivan. The boundary-line (drawn from the Turkish dominions) passes over the Little Ararat; the line of separation between Persian and Turkish Armenia also begins at Ararat; so that this famous mountain is now the central boundary-stone of these three empires. (See, generally, Smith’s *Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.; Penns Cyclopædia, s. v.; M. Culech’s *Geogr. Dict. s. v.—Kitto, s. v.)

The slight acquaintance which the Hebrew writers had of this country was probably derived from the Phoenicians. There are signs of their knowledge having been progressive. Isaiah, in his prophecies regarding Babylon, speaks of the host as coming from the "mountains" (sili, 4), while Jeremiah, in connection with the same subject, uses the specific names Ararat and Minni (ii, 27). Ezekiel, who was apparently better acquainted with the country, uses a name which was familiar to its own inhabitants, Togarmah. Whether the use of the term Ararat in Isa. xxxvii, 86, belongs to the period in which the prophet himself lived, is a question which cannot be here discussed. In the prophetic passages to which we have referred, it will be noticed that Armenia is spoken of rather in reference to its geographical position as one of the extreme northern nations with which the Jews were acquainted than as any more definite place, and of which they knew anything. Christianity was first established in Armenia in the fourth century; the Armenian Church (q. v.) has a close affinity to the Greek Church in its forms and polity; it is described by the American missionaries who are settled in the country as in a state of great corruption and debasement. The total number of the Armenian nation throughout the world is supposed not to exceed 2,000,000. Their favorite pursuit is commerce, and their merchants are found in all parts of the East.—Kitto.

1. History.—Armenia, it is said, first received Christianity from Bartholomew and Thaddeus, the latter not the apostle, but one of the seventy, who instructed Abgarus of Edessa (q. v.) in the faith, although the Armenians themselves maintain that he was the apostle. The light was very speedily quenched, and was not rekindled until the beginning of the fourth century. About that time Gregory (q. v.) Illuminatio-or (Lucasovich, in their tongue) preached the Gospel throughout Armenia, and soon converted the king, Tyridates. Gregory was consecrated first bishop of the Armenians by Leontius of Cesarra, whence the Armenian Church obtained the title of Catholicos, and bishop consecrated the patriarchs resident on the see of Cesarra, and for a long period the successors of Gregory were consecrated by that primate.
It was to this subjection to the see of Cesarra that the patriarchs of Armenia owed the title of Catholicos (or proctor-general), which was assigned them as vicars of the primate of Cesarra in that country. In the fourth century they received many literary institutions through the Catholicos Sahag (after 406), and a translation of the Bible through Mesrob (q. v.).
The Armenian Church preserved the faith until the end of the reign of Theodosius the younger; and in 487 a synod was held at Ispahan, composed of many Armenian bishops, who addressed a synodal letter to Proculus, of Constantinople, condemning the impieties of Nestorius and Theodore of Mopsuestia. In the following century the Church of Armenia, from an excess of hatred toward Nestorianism, embraced the Eutych-ian (q. v.) heresy, and condemned the Council of Chalcedon. The name commonly given to the Church was Gregorian Church (after Gregory Illuminator).
When, in the fifth century, several kings of Persia made an attempt to force the doctrines of Zoroaster upon the Armenians, many emigrated to various countries of Asia and Europe. About 564 a synod of Armenian bishops was convened at the court of Thevin, or Girod, by the patriarch Niezes II, at the request of the King of Persia, who desired to separate the Armenians from the Greeks. In this synod they renounced the communion of the orthodox churches, anathematized that of Jerusalem, allowed only one nature in Jesus Christ, and added to the Tarsanctus the words Qui crucifecus est. See Monumenta.
An attempt to abolish the schism was made by a synod at Garin in 629, which adopted the resolutions of Chalcedon; but soon the connection between the Armenian and the Greek Church was again dissolved.
The metropolis of the Armenian Church was called Vagharshapat, but the Latins as Araxiata, the capital of the country. In this city was built, A.D. 650, the monastery of Eschemiazin (or Etchmiadzin), which contains the sepulchre of St. Gregory, and is now the see of the patriarch, or catholicos, as he is called, of Armenia Major.
Vaga-
craschlor no longer exists; but the monastery of Eschemiazin, the residence of the patriarch, contains three churches built in a triangle. At first the catholicos of Eschemiazin was the sole patriarch of Armenia; but before the year 1341 there were three, viz. a second at Achatamar, and a third at As. Ri-caut, who wrote an account of "the Greek and Armenian Churches," visited Armenia in 1369, and states, besides these three, a fourth one at Cahanahar. All four had under them 87 archbishops and 100 bishops. By the treaty of Unkia Skesselt (1828) a large portion of Upper Armenia was ceded to the Czar, and thus also the head of the Church, the catholicos of Eschmiazin, became a subject of Russia. The attempts of the Russian government to introduce the Russian Chur-center into a union with the Russian Church have failed.
In Turkey the Armenians shared in general the fate of the other Christian denominations. See Turkey.
In 1848 they elected a council of 12 lay primates, who rule the Church in all its temporal affairs. The patriarchate is the seat of the patriarch, president of the entire union.
At an early period efforts were made to establish a closer connection of the Armenians with the Roman Catholic Church. In consequence of the Crusades, several kings, in the twelfth and following centuries, interested themselves in behalf of a corporate union of the churches with Rome, and the synods of Kromglai (1179), Bis (1360), and Atan (1316) declared themselves in the same way. At the Council of Florence (1439), the Armenian deputies, together with the Greeks, accepted the union, but neither people ratified it. Some churches, however, remained, ever since the fourteenth century, when Pope John XXIII sent a Roman archdiocese. In 1567, the branch obtained a sees in the Church over Rome, and formed the "Armenian Catholic, or United Armenian Church," which in doctrinal points conforms with Rome, but in all other respects agrees with the Gregorian Armenian Church. Through the influence of Mehitar (q. v.) and the Mehitarians, this branch sustained its independence over a long time (though the union, or United body), which, especially in modern times, has worked not a little in favor of Rome. Of late, not only a number of Armenian villages have accepted the union, but in Turkey, among some of the leading men of the national (Gregorian) Armenian Church, a disposition has been created to try anew the accomplishment of a corporate union. See United Armenian Church.

The efforts made by the High-Church Episcopalian for establishing a closer intercommunion between the Church of England and the Eastern churches was favorably received by many Armenians of Turkey. A pamphlet was published in 1860, in Constantinople, with the imprimator of the Armenian patriarch, to show how nearly the Armenian Church is like that of England.
The papal, to this end, quotes from the prayer-book the whole of the twenty-fifth Article of Religion, but so shapes the translation as to make it appear that the Church of England, as well as the Armenian, believe in seven sacraments. Enough of the Pope says, are received only, as they are by the Armenian Church, as secondary sacraments. Several Armenian theologians are quoted in support of this theory.
In the same year (1860), Rev. G. Williams, of Cambridge (England), had an interview with the Armenian archbishop of Tiflis, in Georgia, relative to the scheme of a union between the English and Armenian churches. Mr.
Williams was the bearer of letters from the bishops of Oxford and Lincoln, who, it appears, assumed to speak in the name of the Church of England to the "catholic, patriarch, bishops, etc., of the orthodox Eastern Church." The archbishop was in the presence of the head of the entire Armenian Church, at Eschmiadzin; but, being somewhat unwilling, and his time of absence having almost expired, he abandoned his journey to Eschmiadzin, and spent ten days in Tiflis to confer with the archbishop of that city. He expressed, in the name of the Church of England, his acknowledgment of the Armenian Catholicos, patriarch, and the right of the Catholicos to be head of the entire Armenian Church, at Eschmiadzin;

Theological literature, the chief works of which have been published at Venice by the Mechitarists, and at Constantinople. The translation of the Bible by Mesrob is still regarded as a model of classic language. This monk, and his pupil, Gregory, an enlarged edition of which (Haimanvark, Constantinople, 1847) is still read in the Armenian churches. See Naumann, Vorrede einer Geschichte d. Armanischen. Literatur (Leipzig, 1886). See Mechitarist.

Both are said to be Monophysites, but modern missionaries are generally disposed to regard them as differing more in terminology than in idea from the orthodox faith on that point. They agree with the Greeks and other Oriental churches in rejecting the 'filiot-que' from the Nicene Creed, and maintaining the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father only. With some difference in forms and modes of worship, the religious opinions of the Armenians are mostly like those of the Greeks. The sign of the cross is used on all occasions; but made by the Greeks with three fingers, by the Armenians with two, by the Jews with one—therefore pointing to the Trinity. The Armenians, to the two natures made one in the person of Christ, and the Jacobite to the Divine unity. They profess to hold the seven sacraments of the Latin Church; but, in fact, extreme unction exists among them only in name, the prayers so designated being intermingled with the Latin, of which the Armenian is performed with the 'holy chrism' by the priest at the time of baptism. Infants are baptized, as commonly in the Greek and other Oriental churches, by a partial immersion in the font and three times pouring water on the head. Converted Jews, etc., though adults, are baptized like the children. They readily admit to their communion Romans and Protestants baptized by sprinkling, differing in this from the Greeks, who receive none, however previously baptized, without repudiating them. They believe firmly in the 'real presence' in the Eucharist, and adore the host in the mass. The people partake, however, in both kinds, the wafer or broken bread (unleavened) being dipped in undiluted wine (the Greeks use leavened bread and wine mixed with water), and laid carefully on the tongue. It must be received fasting. They reject the Latin purgatory, but, believing that the souls of the departed may be benefited by the aid of the living, they hold that they pray for the dead. Saint-worship is carried to an extraordinary length, the addresses to saints being often grossly idolatrous, and the mediation of Christ lost sight of in the liturgical services of the church, as it is in the minds of the people. The cross, and pictures of the saints, are also objects of worship, as possessing inherent efficacy. The Supreme Being is likewise represented under the form of an aged, venerable man, with whom, and the Son, under the form of a young man, and the Holy Spirit, symbolized as a dove, the Virgin Mary is associated in the same picture. The perpetual virginity of the latter is held as a point of importance in the priestly orders, in order to holiness, is deemed essential to salvation. Penances are imposed; but absolution is without money, and indulgences are never given. Baptism confers regeneration and cleansing from sin, original and actual; spiritual life is maintained by penances and sacrifices; .and the bread and wine in his hands pass to the heavens. The merit of good works is acknowledged, particularly of asceticism. Monachism, celibacy, fasting, etc., are viewed as in other Eastern churches, but are more lenient and severe; the number of fast-days, when no animal food of any kind can be eaten is 156 in the year. On the fourteen great feast-days the observance of the day is more strict than that of the Sabbath, which last is as in Roman Catholic countries. Minor feasts are even more numerous than the days in the year. The Church services are performed in the ancient tongue, not now understood by the common people, and in a manner altogether perfunctory and painful to an enlightened mind.

"There are n.e. different grades of clergy, each receiving a distinct ordination by the laying on of hands. Four of these are below the order of deacon, and are called porters, readers, exorcists, and candle-liters. After these come the sub-deacons, the deacons, the sub-presbyters, the presbyters, last the bishops and the cardinals. The cardinals do not usually preach. They live together in monasteries, and from these the rule of the church. The law of celibacy is imposed, are taken" (Newcome, Cyclopedia of Missions.).—Bekrana, d. Christl. Gläubige des Armen. Kirche (Peterburg, 1799); Armeniorum Consist. (Viteb. 1750); Lüttig, Armeena (curta G. Andicl. Anen, Ven., 1826); Zweisuisse der armenischen Kirche in Russland (Peterburg, 1799).

There are among the Gregorian (Non-united) Armenians a great number of monks. They follow either the rule of St. Anthony or that of St. Basil. The monks of St. Anthony live in solitude and in the desert, and surpass in austerity almost all the orders of the Roman Church. They are called monks, not as many as a hundred monks in one monastery. The order of St. Basil (introduced into the Armenian Church in 1178) is less strict; their convents are in the towns, and from them the bishops and vardetaks are taken. Their principal convent, called "Three Churches," is at Eschmiadzin. Most of their convents are poor, but they have three very rich ones in Jerusalem.

The United Armenians have the following orders: (1.) A congregation of monks of St. Anthony, still existing, under a general abbot, who resides on Mount Lebanon, while a procurator general represents the order at Rome. (2.) A congregation of Basilians, also called Experiences by the Roman Church. They are called monks, Peter Martin. They obtained many convents in Italy, assumed in 1566 the rule of Augustine and the garb of the Dominican lay brothers, and were suppressed in 1650. (3.) In 1836 a number of Armenian monks and priests were induced by some Dominican friars to join the Church of Rome. A monastic congregation, the United Brethren of St. Gregory Illuminator. They likewise adopted the rule of St. Augustine, and the constitutions and habit of the Dominicans. In 1556 they fused entirely with the Dominican order, and were formed into the province of Nakhchevan. (4.) The most celebrated of the Armenian monks is the Mechitarists (q.v.).

III. Present Condition and Statistics.—The estimates of the present number of Armenians greatly vary. In Turkey they are believed to amount to about 2,000,000 souls. Russia had, in 1851, 872,555 Gregorian (Non-united) and 22,203 Catholic (United) Armenians. The Armenian press is readers, etc., are viewed in as in other Eastern churches, but are more lenient and severe; the number of fast-days, when no animal food of any kind can be eaten, is 156 in the year. On the fourteen great feast-days the observance of the day is more strict than that of the Sabbath, which last is had declared themselves Protestants amounted in 1858 to nearly 6000. The catholics of eschminzian (now in Russia) were still regarded as the chief bishop of the church. He is appointed by the Czar, and has under him a synod, an imperial procurator, and 67 bishops.

Also the bishops of Constantinople and Jerusalem assume the title Patriarch, though they are said not to be strictly such, but rather superior bishops, possessing certain privileges conferred by the patriarch. The united armenians have in European Turkey 1 archbishop at Constantinople; in Asia Turkish 1 patriarch in Cilicia, 1 archbishop at Seleucia, and 9 bishops; in Persia, 1 bishop at Isphahan; in Austria, 1 archbishop at Lemberg, besides whom also the Mechitarist abbeys of Venice and Vienna are archbishops.

IV. Armenian Protestant Missions.—The history of Protestantism among the armenians forms one of the most interesting chapters in the history of modern Protestant missions. As a forerunner in the reformation of the Armenian Church we may regard a priest by the name of Dabaly Ogshish, about 1760. He lived in Constantinople, and wrote a book in which he praised Luther, and castigated both clergy and people with an unsparing hand. His book, though never published, circuluted from hand to hand, and was later used by the protestant missionaries with some effect. The efforts of the Protestant Church in behalf of the Armenians, in the 19th century, is connected with the translation of the Bible. In 1813 the British Bible Society began the publication of the Armenian Bible (the translation made by Mebrob in the fifth century), and in 1815 an edition of 5000 copies was issued at Calcutta. The same society published in 1823 at Constantinople an edition of 2000 copies of the New Testament, and in 1830 an edition of 8000 copies of the four Gospels alone. Simultaneously with the British society, the russian Bible Society undertook the publication of the Armenian Bible, and issued at St. Petersburg, in 1817, an edition of 2000 copies, and soon after an edition of the ancient Armenian New Testament. A great enthusiasm manifested itself in Russia for this work, the emperor Alexander, the archbishops and bishops of the Greek and the Armenian churches, and nearly all the Russian nobility being among its patrons. The Armenian Bibles and New Testaments thus printed were widely circulated through various agencies. But it was soon discovered by some of the prosecution that they did not understand the old Armenian language, and that one portion (perhaps one third, chiefly in the more southern portions of Asia Minor) had even lost the use of the modern Armenian, speaking only Turkish. This led to the translation of the Bible into modern Armenian and into Arameo-Turkish (Turkish written with Armenian characters). The former translation was issued by the Russian society in 1822, the latter by the British society in 1823. These translations, however, called forth the opposition of the Armenian patriarch of Constantinople and the Armenian clergy in gencerally.

A Protestant mission was established among the Armenians by the American Board in 1830, after the way had been previously prepared by the conversion of three Armenian priests (two of whom were bishops) by the American missionaries of syria, and by the famous school of Petstimalyan, a man conversant not only with Armenian, but also with Western literature and theology. The first missionaries were E. Smith and H. G. O. Dwight, who were joined in the following 2 years by W. Goodell, J. B. Adger, B. Schneider, C. Hamlin, and others. The missionaries soon organized several schools at Constantinople, Pera, Brouss, etc., and through these worked successfully for spreading evangelical views in the Armenian Church. In 1831 the mission press was transferred from Malta to Smyrna, and there soon began a most successful operation, printing, up to the 1st of January, 1838, two and a half million pages in the Armenion languages. In the following years Mr. Goodell completed the translation of the New Testament into the Arameo-Turkish language, and W. Adger issued an improved translation of the New Testament into modern Armenian. The missionaries early found devoted co-laborers among the armenians; among whom Sahakyan, who was converted when a student, in 1838, and a pious priest, Der Revork, were prominent. The work was not interrupted, and met with strong opposition, which was generally headed by the patriarchs and the chief Armenian bankers in Constantinople, and sometimes manifested itself as open and cruel persecution. That was especially the case when, in 1844, Matteos, formerly bishop of Brouss, was made an example for the Armenians of Constantinople. The mission used all means within his reach against the favorers of the Protestant mission, and it required the interference of the Christian ambassadors to obtain an order from the sultan, which put an end to further per-suitions (March, 1846). Up to that time the converts had not formally separated from the church; but when they were now formally excommunicated by the patriarch Matteos, and thus also cut off from the civil rights of the Armenian community [see TUR-KEY], they organized independent evangelical Armenian churches. The first churches thus organized were those of Constantinople, Niconmedia, Adabaran, and Marmara. In 1850 the mission was established in Amasya.

In 1850 the Protestants were placed on an equality with the other christian denominations, and, in 1858, even on an equality with the Mussulmans before the law. The report made by the American Board on the Armenian missions in 1859 shows them to be in a very prosperous state. The mission was divided into two separate missions, the Northern Armenian and the Southern Armenian. The Northern Armenian contained, in 1856, 18 stations, occupied by missionaries; 81 out-stations, occupied by native teachers or helpers; 83 missionaries, of whom one is a physician; 1 mission treasurer; 94 female assistant missionaries; 4 native pastors; 21 native preachers; 48 other native helpers (not including 88 teachers). The number of churches was 28, with 602 members; the number of free-schools 44, with 928 pupils. There were also three male high-schools (Bebek, Errzin, and Tocat), with 32 pupils, and one female boarding-school. The number of schools was 33, with 32 pupils. Nearly eleven million pages were issued during the year 1858. The Southern Armenian Mission presented the following statistics: 5 stations; 14 out-stations; 9 missionaries—one a physician; 9 female assistant missionaries; 1 native pastor; 2 other ordained native preachers; 1 licentiate; 87 other helpers; churchmen, 10; communicants, 498; average congregations on the Sabbath, 1851; theological students (at Aintab, Marash, and Antioch), 26; common schools, 18, with 746 scholars. In 1858 the Turkish government appointed an Armenian Protestant censor, in order to relieve the Protestants from the annoyances which they had suffered from the Moslem (Turkish) government, and the civil community of the Protestant Armenians is at present (1860) greatly suffering from pecuniary embarassment, as the Protestants, on account of their poverty, find it difficult to pay the tax, levied on them for supporting their civil organization. Until 1839 the Armenian missionaries had mostly confined themselves to the Armenians of Turkey, but in that year one of the missionsaries visited several Armenian villages of Persia for the purpose of establishing a Protestant mission.

ARMENIAN LANGUAGE

The ancient Armenian or Haikian language (now dead), notwithstanding the great antiquity of the nation to which it belongs, possesses no literary documents prior to the fifth century of the Christian era. The translation of the Bible, begun by Mesrob (q.v.) in the year 410, is the earliest monument of the language that has come down to us. The dialect in which this version is written, and in which it is still publicly read in their churches, is called the old Armenian. The dialect now in use—the modern Armenian—in which they preach and carry on the intercourse of daily life, not only departs from the elder form by dialectical changes in the native elements of the language itself, but also by the great intermixture of Persian and Turkish words which has resulted from the conquer and subjection of the country. It is, perhaps, this diversity of the ancient and modern idioms which has given rise to the many conflicting opinions that exist as to the relation in which the Armenian stands to other languages. Thus Ciribid and Vater both assert that it is an original language; that is, one so distinct from all others in its fundamental character as not to be classed with any of the great families of languages. Eichborn, on the other hand (Sprachkenntnisse, p. 349), affirms that the learned idiom of the Armenian undoubtedly belongs to the Medo-Persian family; whereas Pott (Untersuchungen, p. 52) says that, notwithstanding its many points of relation to that family, it cannot strictly be considered to belong to it; and Gatterer actually classed it as a living sister of the Basque, Finnish, and Welsh languages. As to form, it is said to be rough and full of consonants; possess ess ten cases in the noun—a number which is only exceeded by the Finnish; to have no dual; to have no mode of denoting gender in the noun by change of form, but to be obliged to append the words man and woman as the marks of sex—thus, to any prophet-king for prophetess (nevertheless, modern writers use the syllable ազի to distinguish the feminine; Wahl, Geschichte d. Morgenl. Sprachen, p. 190); to bear a remarkable resemblance to Greek in the use of the participle, and in the whole syntactical structure; and to have adopted the Arabic system of metre.—Kitto, s. v.

The history of its alphabetical character is briefly this: until the third century of our era, the Arméni ans used either the Persian or Greek alphabet (the letter in Syrian characters, mentioned by Diodor. xix, 23, is not considered an evidence that they wrote Ar mecian in Syrian characters, as that letter was probably Persian). In the fifth century, however, the translation of the Bible created the necessity for characters which would more adequately represent the peculiar sounds of the language. Accordingly, after a fruitless attempt of a certain Daniel, and after several efforts on his own part, Mesrob saw a hand in a dream write the very characters which now constitute the Armenian alphabet. The 38 letters thus obtained are choral in form, like the Greek, but bear out their number by deriving some forms from the Zend alphabet. The order of writing is from left to right. Mesrob employed these letters in his translation of the Bible, and thus insured their universal and permanent adoption by the nation (Gezerius, articulo Ptolomaeis, in Ersch und Gruber). See Tromler, Bibliotheca Armeniae spec. (Plenn. 1758); Schröder, Theaurus ling. Armen. antiquo et novo (Amsteld. 1711); Ciribed, Gram. Armeniace (Par. 1822); Petermann, Grammatica Armen. ARMENIAN VERSION. This translation of the Bible was undertaken in the year 410 by Mesrob, with the aid of his pupils Joannes Eclecensis and Josephus Palensis. It appears that the Patriarch Issac first attempted, in consequence of the Persians having destroyed all the copies of the Greek version, to make

Arm-hole (ամբար, ատամե, գակ, կետ, կողակ, ճուղ), joint of the hand; Sept. ἔκρος χειρός. "Woe to the women that sew pillows to all arm-holes" (Ezek. xiii, 18), i.e. elves, although the term has also been taken for the wrist, or for the knuckles of the hand. The true meaning is somewhat doubtful, for it evidently refers to some part of the body with which we are unacquainted. The women spoken of are no doubt the priestesses of Ashtaroth, and the object of the prophet is to denounce the arts they employed to allure God's chosen people to a participation in their idolatrous worship. Orientalists, when they wish to be at their ease, recline on or slide various sorts of rich pillows on their chairs. The advice in the Proverb (vii, 10) alludes to the costliness and richness of those that belonged to her divan or "bed" among the circumstances by which she sought to seduce "the young man void of understanding:" it is therefore not unreasonable to suppose that something of the same kind may be here intended. See PILLOW. The term also occurs in Jeremiah xxxviii, 12, in describing the release of the prophet from the dungeon of Malchiah.

Arminian. See ARMY.

Arminianism, properly, the system of doctrine taught by James Arminius, especially with regard to the Augustinian theory of unconditional predestination, as revived and extended by Calvin and others in the Reformation. It is designated by Guthrie as that \(\text{gigantic} \) recoil from Calvinism, than which no reaction in nature could have been more certainly predicted. Of all the actors in that movement—so fertile of mighty actors—no one played a more conspicuous, important, and trying part than Arminius. To high talent and cultivation, and to consummate ability as a disputant, Arminius added the ornament of spotless Christian consistency (his enemies being judges) and purity, as well as singleness of heart, and of his in- nevitable nature. This, with his conspicuous position, made his personal influence to be very potent and extensive. And yet few names have ever been overshadowed by a deeper and denser gloom of prejudice than his: to utter which, as Wesley remarked, was much the same, in some ears, as to raise the cry of mad dog. This is attributable partly to the latitudinarianism of some of his followers, who, revolting at the dominant faith, and maddened by oppression, resorted to the opposite extreme; and partly to the accidental circumstances of his milder scheme found expression in the political condition of the Netherlands at the time when he stood in hostile relations to the English Puritans and the Scottish Presbyterians. But these were results with which neither the \(\text{m} \) Arminius nor the Arminian principle of conditionalism had anything whatever to do. To trace them to him were not more just than to trace German Neology to Luther and Melanchthon, and Socinianism to Calvin." (Preface to Brander's Life of Arminius.)

1. Life of Arminius and the Controversy in his time.

The following sketch, so far as the facts of the life of Arminius is concerned, is modified from the Bio- graphical Dictionary of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

JAMES ARMINIUS (Lat. Jacobus Arminius; Dutch, Jacob Hermansyon or Van Herman) was born Oct. 10, 1560, at Oudewater, a small town of Holland. As Oudewater means in Dutch "Old Water," Veters Azee, Arminius is sometimes surmised in his works. Veters in Dutch, "a weaver," a cutler, in his in- fancy; but he found a protector in Theodorus Aemilius, who had once been a Roman Catholic priest. Aemilius took Arminius with him to Utrecht, and sent him to the school of that place. In his 15th year Arminius lost his patron by death, but another protector, Rustost von Schnell, took him under his wing, and removed him to Marburg (1575). Arminius had scarcely arrived at Marburg when he heard that his native town had been sacked by the Spaniards. Hurrying back to Oudewater, he found that his mother and his other relatives had been killed. He returned to Utrecht on foot. He went thence to Rotterdam, and was received into the house of Peter Bertius, pastor of the Reformed Church. In the same year (1575) he was sent, with Peter Bertius the younger, to the University of Leyden, which had just been founded. After he had studied at Leyden for six years, "the directors of the body of merchants" of Amsterdam undertook to bear the expenses of his education for the ministry. Amsterdam had already been accustomed to bear his expenses; and so he was ordained he would not serve in the church of any other city without the permission of the burgomasters of Amsterdam. In 1582 he was sent to Geneva, which was then the great school of theology for all the Reformed churches, and where the doctrines of Calvin were taught in their most rigorous shape by Theodore Beza. At Geneva Arminius formed a close friendship which united him through life with Uyttenbogaert of Utrecht. During his residence at Geneva he gave great offence to some of the Aristotelian teachers of the Geneva school by advocating in public and lecturing in private to his friends on the logic of Ramus as a system. But it is said that before he was appointed to the Chair of Philosophy this course created so much commotion that he left Geneva and went to Basle, where the faculty of divinity offered to confer upon him the degree of doctor of gratis; but he declined it, considering himself too young, and in 1583 returned to Geneva, where he continued his theological studies. Among the Aristotelians this fame of Zabarella, professor of philosophy at Padua, induced him to take a journey into Italy. From Padua he proceeded to Rome. After this journey Arminius came back to Geneva, and soon received an order from the burgomasters of Amsterdam to return to that town; he had too much regard for his own knowledge, and rumors had spread abroad that he had kissed the pope's slipper, held intercourse with the Jesuits, and especially with Cardinal Bellarmine—that, in short, he had become a Roman Catholic. The testimony of a friend who had travelled with him cleared him from these charges. Arminius used afterward to say that he derived no little benefit from this journey, as "he saw at Rome a mystery of iniquity much more foul than he had ever imagined." He was ordained at Amsterdam on the 11th of August, 1688, and he soon became distinguished as a preacher. The mild opinions of Melanchthon on predestination, as he saw them held by John Calvin, were very material. In 1589 Theodore Koornhert, of Amsterdam, published several works, in which he attacked the doctrine of predestination, which was taught by Beza and the Geneva school. To obviate Koornhert's objections, some ministers of Delft proposed a change in Beza's doctrine. They agreed with Beza that divine predestination was the antecedent, unconditional, and immutable decree of God concerning the salvation or damnation of each individual; but whereas Beza represented that man, not considered as fallen, or even as created, was the object of this unconditional decree, the ministers of Delft made this preordnary decree dependent on the decree of man's election, and that is to say, they adopted sublappredestination in place of the subapsuapredestination of Calvin and Beza. They thought this hypothesis would do away with Koornhert's objection that the doctrine of absolute decrees represented God as the author of sin—as such decrees make Adam a free agent prior to the fall of man. Their view was published under the title Responsum ad argumenta quaedam Beati et Calvini, ex tractata de Predestinatione, in Cap. IX ad Romanae. The book was sent to Lydiaus, professor at Franeker, who requested Arminius to answer it. He consented; but in studying the subject he began to doubt of which of the two views to adopt, and at length became inclined to embrace the doctrine which he had undertaken to refute. Meanwhile, on the 16th of September, 1590, he married Elizabeth Reael, daughter of Laurent Reael, a judge and senator of Amsterdam. In the course of his sermons at Amsterdam, Arminius commenced an exposition of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, in which some of the new views which he had been found expression. In 1593 he published Lectures in Romans IX, in which he questions the view of that chapter given by Calvin and Beza. Disputes arose, but the consistency of Amsterdam gave an audience to the contending parties, and ordered them to cease all contravention. One way could not be formulated to determine the subject of the dispute. In 1602 a pestilence raged at Amsterdam, during which Arminius showed the greatest courage and kindness in visiting the sick. The disease carried off two of the professors of the University of Leyden, Lucas Trelcatius, the elder, and Francis Junius, professor of divinity. The curators of the university turned their eyes upon Arminius as a fit successor to Junius; but it was only after repeated applications on the part of the university that the authorities of Amsterdam consented to give him permission to leave on the 16th of April, 1608. As he had been charged with holding Pelagian views, and was supposed to have been appointed by his father, he went to the Hague, where a commission appointed him to consult with Franciscus Gomar, who was also professor of divinity at Leyden, and who became afterward his capital enemy, at the Hague, the 6th of May, 1608, and the result was that Gomar declared that the charge that he was a Pelagian to be groundless. At the same time, not only the curators of the university, but the king himself, were thoroughly aware that on the subject of predestination Arminius differed from the Genevan school. He underwent another examination, a private one, conducted by Gomar, for the degree of D.D., which he received 11th July, 1608. Arminius was the first on whom the University of Leyden conferred the Degree of Doctor. One of the first observations of Arminius, after entering on the duties of his chair, was that the students were much more; even to scholastic subtleties and disputations than to the thorough study of Scripture. He determined to cure this evil. With this view he reckoned nothing more important than to foreclose, as far as he could, crabbed questions and the unceasing mass of scholastic assertions, and to inculcate on his disciples that divine wisdom which was drawn from the superlatively pure fountains of the Sacred Word, as was provided for the express purpose of guiding us to a life of virtue and happiness. From his first introduction into the face of the Church, he was deeorat to aim at this mark, and give a corresponding direction to his studies both public and private. But truly this laudable attempt was in no small degree thwarted, partly by the jealousy which some had conceived against him, and partly also by a certain in-honorable curators to select themes of prelection at any time, not only from the Old Testament, but also from the New, provided he did not encroach on the particular subject in which Gomar might be engaged" (Brandt, Life of Arminius, ch. vii.). In 1646, Arminius propounded certain theses on predestination, of which the sum was this: "Divine predestination is the decree of God in Christ by which he has decreed with himself from eternity to justify, adopt, and gift with eternal life, to the praise of his glorious grace, the faithful whom he has revealed in the covenant of grace. On the other hand, reprobation is the decree of the anger or severe will of God, by which he has determined from eternity, for the purpose of showing his anger and power, to condemn to eternal death, as placed out of union with Christ, the unbelieving who, by their own fault and the just judgment of God, are not to believe." On the last day of October Gomar openly attacked these positions, and from this day may be dated the tumults which ensued. In 1605 Arminius was created rector magnificus of the University, which office he quitted February 8th, 1606. Meanwhile the disputes continued. Foggus Homullus, a minister of Leyden, Johannus Kuypers, professor of the Theological faculty, and a nephew of Arminius, were among his warmest adversaries. Deputies from the churches of all the provinces of Holland, and deputies from the Synod of Leyden, required from him a conference on the subject of his opinions. Preachers attacked him from the pulpit as a Pelagian, and worse than a Pelagian. A national synod was demanded to settle the disputes, and both the Synod of Leyden, and the Council of Arminius, were among his warmest adversaries. Deputies from the churches of all the provinces of Holland, and deputies from the Synod of Leyden, required from him a conference on the subject of his opinions. Preachers attacked him from the pulpit as a Pelagian, and worse than a Pelagian. A national synod was demanded to settle the disputes, and both the Synod of Leyden, and the Council of Arminius, were among his warmest adversaries. On 24th May, 1607, an assembly was held at the Hague, at which Arminius was present, to settle the manner in which the synod was to be held. In 1608 Arminius and Uytenbogaert applied to the States of Holland to convocate a synod, that these grave controversies might be settled, the same year Gomar held a conference before the Supreme Court of the Hague, which declared in its report that these two professors differed on points of little importance, and unessential to religion. Arminius gave in an account of his opinions to the States at the Hague on the 8th of October, 1608. (See the Decratorum, in his works.) Before the proposed synod could be held Arminius died. The disease which carried him off at last had long latent. It broke out on the 7th of February, 1609, but he recovered so far as to resume the usual duties of his professorship, though still weak. At last he sunk under his disorder, and expired 19th October, 1609. His death was mourned. A religiously well educated mind, and well imbued with the truths of the gospel, and a singularly interesting kind; he grappled his friends by hooks of steel. The funeral oration delivered by Bertius ends with the phrase, "fuisse in Batavia virum quem qui nant potuente sunt existimare; qui non maturnam, non sitis cognoverunt." His writings, though inferior in point of grace and beauty to those of Calvin and Gasquet, command respect and testimony to his learning, and to his skill in logic. He was so thoroughly versed in the ancient authors, and so much of an adept in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, that his opinions carried along with them a weight among the learned which his antagonists could not well resist. Moreland calls him the "model of a conscientious and zealously investigating theologian" (Hist. of Dogma, ii. 276). His opponents accused him of Pelagianism and Arminianism, but no theologian of any pretense to learning will at present sustain these accusations. The same temper of mind which led him to renounce the peculiarities of Calvinism in order to adopt more widely the general views of church communion than those which had prevailed before his time. While he maintained that the mercy of God is not confined to a chosen few, he conceived it to be quite inconsistent with the genius of Christianity that men of that religion should keep their own, and separate themselves from others. The magistrate, his associates, separate churches, merely because they differed in their opinions as to some of its doctrinal articles. He thought that Christians of all denominations should form one great community, united and upheld by the bonds of charity and brotherly love; with the exception, however, of Roman Catholics, who, on account of their idolatrous worship and persecuting spirit, must be unfit members of such a society. His great disciple, the republican Barneveldt, was perhaps the first European statesman that made religious toleration one of his maxims. In fact, the Arminians of Holland were the real fathers of religious toleration; they were the first to recognize, and, without any prior possession of power, granted the same liberty of conscience to others which they claimed for themselves.

Before setting forth the theological views of Arminius, a brief historical review of the church doctrine as to predestination may not be out of place. Before the time of Augustine (fourth century), the unanimous doctrine of the church fathers, so far as scientifically developed at all, was, that the Divine decrees, as to the fate of individual men, were conditioned upon their faith and obedience, as foreseen in the Divine mind. Augustine, in his controversy with Pelagius, with a view to enhance the glory of grace, was the first to teach that the decree of grace depends upon the bare will of God, and that his decree to save those whom he chooses to save is unconditional. Augustine did not teach the doctrine of unconditional reprobation; that doctrine was first formally taught by Grotius (q. v.) in the nineteenth century. His views were condemned at Ments, A.D. 848. In the Reformation period, Luther and Melanchthon first inclined to Augustine's theory, but, finding that it involved the reception of Grotius's as well, they went back to the primitive doctrine of conditional election. Luther, indeed, never formally retracted some of his characteristic strong expressions made at this early day. But his theory, even though it continued enough that his views coincided with those of Melancthon, who took out of the later edition of his Loci Communes all expressions favoring unconditional predestination. The Lutheran Church to this day follows Melancthon. Calvin, however, adopted unconditional election and reprobation in his strongest form, and built his whole theological system upon it. His genius impressed the age wonderfully, and the Reformed churches generally adopted his doctrines. The churches of the Netherlands were founded partly by Lutherans and partly by Calvinists, and so both sets of opinions had currency there. But the Belgic Confession (q. v.), which was Calvinist in its teaching, was with a quasi national authority from the year 1570. The larger part of the clergy of the Netherlands were undoubtedly Calvinists at the time of the appearance of Arminius, though freedom of thought on the controverted points had not been suppressed before his time. Arminius was, in a way, the first to put a long, calm, and patient study of the Scriptures. His task was to restore the primitive and scriptural view of the relations between God and man in the work of salvation, and of the sole responsibility of man for his own damnation; and nobly did he perform it. The great error which he had to combat consisted in making the Divine efficiency with relation to one temporal phe-
The views of Arminius on the points of predestination and grace are presented in the following articles, drawn up almost entirely in prose which may be found in his writings: (1) God, by an eternal and immutable decree, ordained in Jesus Christ, his Son, before the foundation of the world, to save in Christ, because of Christ, and through Christ, from out of the human race, which is fallen and subject to sin, those who by the grace of the Spirit believe on Christ, his Son, and who, by the same grace, persevere unto the end in that faith and the obedience of faith; but, on the contrary, to leave in sin and subject to wrath those who are not converted and are unbelieving, and to condemn them as aliens from Christ, according to the Gospel, John iii. 16, and 1 John ii. 2. (3) But man has not power of himself, or by the power of his free will, saving faith, inasmuch as in the state of defection and sin he cannot think or do of himself any thing good, which is, indeed, really good, such as saving faith is; but it is necessary for him to be born again and renewed by God in Christ through his Holy Spirit, in his mind, affections, or will, and all his faculties, so that he may be able to understand, think, wish, and perform something good, according to that saying of Christ in John xv. 5. (4) It is this grace of God which begins, promotes, and perfects every thing good, and this to such a degree that even the opposing efforts of the infernal prince cannot subvert it. It is this grace, exciting, consequent, and co-operating, can neither think, wish, or do any thing good, nor even resist any evil temptation: so that all the good works which we can think of are to be attributed to the grace of God in Christ. But as to the manner of the operation of that grace, it is not irresistible, for it is said of many that they resisted the Holy Spirit, in Acts vii. 51, and many other places. (5) Those who are grafted into Christ by a true faith, and therefore partake of his vivifying Spirit, have abundance of means by which they may fight against Satan, sin, the world, and their own flesh, and obtain the victory, always, however contrary the spirit of the world may be. Jesus Christ assists them by his Spirit in all temptations, and stretches out his hand; and provided they are ready for the contest, and seek his aid, and are not wanting to their duty, he strengthens them to such a degree that they cannot be seduced or snatched from the hands of Christ by any kind of conqueror, and according to that saying, John x. 28, "No one shall pluck them out of my hand." But whether these very persons cannot, by their own negligence, desert the commencement of their being in Christ, and embrace again the present world, fall back from the holy doctrine once committed to them, make shipwreck of their grace; this must be more fully examined and weighed by the Holy Scripture before men can teach it with full tranquillity of mind and confidence. This last proposition was modified by the followers of Arminius so as to assert the possibility of falling from grace. In his scheme of theology Arminius became more and more assimilated to the anthropomorphisms of Calvinism, ideas respecting God and respecting man, and then expounded with keen dialectical rigor the only doctrine which could harmonize the two. His mission was to point out how God could be what the church taught that he was, and man what the church declared him to be. In the same manner, the readjustment of the disturbed and abnormal relations of man to God, by justification, is the central thought of Protestant theology; the announcement and exposition of their relations in that readjustment was the work of Arminius. Magnify either of the related terms to the final suppression of the other, and error is the result. Magnify the Divine agency to the complete suppression of the human in that readjustment, and fatalism is inevitable. Magnify the human to the complete suppression of the Divine, and extreme Pelagianism is the result. To Arminius is the church indebted for her first vivid apprehension and scientific statement of the Christian doctrine of the relation of man to God."

The services of Arminius to theology are summed up as follows by Watson (Miscellaneous Works, vii, 476): "They preserved many of the Lutheran churches from the tide of supralapsarianism, and its constant concomitant, Antinomianism. They moderated even the more extreme tenets of the sublapsarianists, by their greater conciliableness and courage to the sublapsarian scheme; which, though logically, perhaps, not much to be preferred to that of Calvin, is at least not so revolting, and does not impose the same necessity upon men of cultivating that hardihood which glories in extremes and laughs at moderation. They gave rise, incidentally, to a still milder modification of the doctrine of the decrees, known in England by the name of Bixterianism, in which homage is, at least in words, paid to the justice, truth, and benevolence of God. They have also left on record, in the beautiful, learned, eloquent, and, above all these, the scriptural system of theology furnished by the writings of Arminius, how truly man may be proved totally and hereditarily corrupt, without converting him into a machine or a devil; how fully secured, in the scheme of the redemption of man by Jesus Christ, is the divine glory, without making the Almighty partial, wilful, and unjust; how much the grace of God in man is drawn out by the doctrine of the freedom of the human will, in connection with that of its assistance by Divine grace; with how much lustre the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ shines, when offered to the assisted choice of all mankind, instead of being confined to the forced acceptance of a few; how the doctrine of election, when it is made condition, on faith foreseen, harmonizes with the wisdom, holiness, and goodness of God, among a race of beings to all of whom faith was made possible; and how repugnance harmonizes with justice, when it has a reason, not in arbitrary will, the sovereignty of a pasha, but in the principles of a righteous government."}

The earliest authority for the life of Arminius is Petrus Bertius, De Vita et Opusia J. Arm.ii Oratio. The fullest account is given by Caspar Brandt, Historia Fidei J. Armii (Amst. 1724, 8vo), a posthumous work, edited by Gerhard Brandt, son of Caspar. It was reprinted and published, with a translation (Brunswijk, 1725, 8vo); and a translation, by Guthrie (Lond. 1854, 18mo). See also Bange, Life of Arminius (N. Y. 1848). The chief sources of information as to the early period of the controversy between the Arminians and Calvinists are as follows: Arminian writers, Uytenbsoort, Kerkelijk geschied, namelijk in de eerste provincien (Rotterdam, 1847, fol.); Gerhard Brandt, Historie der Reformatie, etc., which is the most copious account extant (Amst.
Friederich, duke of Holstein, and built the town of Fiberickstadt in the duchy of Schleswig. After the death of Frederick in 1295 the Arminians were allowed to return, and a decree of 1630 authorized the building of houses and schools. The exiles from France and the Spanish Netherlands came back and established congregations in various places, particularly at Rotterdam and Amsterdam. At Amsterdam they founded a school, in which Simon Episcopius was the first professor of theology, and on the side of the Arminians; and for an account of the fortunes of the Remonstrants party, see Remonstrants.

2. In 1621, Episcopius, at the request of the leading Remonstrants, drew up a formula of faith under the title Confessio seu declaratio sententiae pastorum qui est in Remonstrantia. It was published (Oppenheim, Anno Opp. 8), in 25 chapters, which was widely circulated. A canonicus of this confession was published by Polyaenus and four other Leyden professors, to which Episcopius replies in his Apologia pro Confessione, 1630. The "Confession" disappointed the Gomarists, for it was perfectly sound on the Trinity, thus refusing the charge of Socinianism brought against the Arminians. It was received with great favor by the Lutherans. A number of eminent names adorn the literary history of Arminianism in Holland and France; among them the most prominent, besides Episcopius, are Caroilles, Voissius, Grotius, Casaubon, Limborch, Le Clerc, and Vossius, who translated the works of Arminius (this Cyclopedia). It is to be regretted that in the hands of some of these eminent men Arminianism was corrupted by semi rationalism.

3. The effect of the controversy appeared in France in the modified Calvinism of Amyruldus (q.v.). Nor was the dispute confined to the Reformed churches. During the whole of the sixteenth century the Church of Rome was agitated with the controversy upon grace and free will. The Benedictines and Dominicans had already broken the ground; but the battle raged in its greatest fury between the Jesuits and the Jansenists, the latter being ably represented by the religious of the monastery of Port Royal, near Paris. Here again it happened, as in Holland, that the controversy extended itself from religion to politics. The Jansenists of France became the reformers of the age, the men of free thought and bold discussion, while the Jesuit party were the advocates of the court and the old Church. In the old place of the earlier controversy, in its time, is a curious fact that in Holland the Arminians were the friends of liberty and free discussion. In France the Calvinists; the two parties had changed places. The Jesuits, who were Arminians, were now the persecutors, and the Jansenists, or Calvinists, the patient and afflicted sufferers. See Jansenists.

4. In Germany, the Lutherans, of course, sympathized wholly in the Remonstrant movement. In the Reformed Church the decisions of Dort were admitted as authoritative for a time; but, with the result of victory was really a defeat; for the true elements of Arminianism were not killed at Dort, but grew up after the battle, and ran riot in the Reformed Church. ... In the period of Wofanism the Reformed dogmatics were finally purged from the doctrine of absolute predestination "(Ebrard, Christliche Dogmatik, i, § 88). It is a shrewd remark of Nicholls, that there had been there a great religious body, which had been independent of Calvin's followers, with which all Protestants who did not adopt Luther's doctrine of the sacraments must have united themselves, the doctrines of Calvin would not have been so widely diffused on the Continent between 1640 and 1660 (Calvinism and Arminianism, i, iv).

5. In England, the so-called Arminian doctrines were not so diffused, substance, long before the time of Arminius. The Articles of Religion are regarded by some writers as Calvinistic, by others as Arminian. The truth seems to be that they were meant to be ad-

Armstrong, or, to use a kinder word, comprehensive, so as to leave liberty of opinion in the church on a question so obscure and difficult. On this point, see, on the Arminian side, Burnet, Exposition of Thirty-nine Articles; Laurence, Brampton Lecture; Fletcher, Works, ii, 216; 218; Browne, On Thirty-nine Articles (London, 1664). On the Calvinist side, Cunningham, Reformation and Theology of the Reformation (Edinburgh, 1862, Essay iv; also in Brit. and For. Evang. Rev. No. 83, and reprinted in Amer. Theol. Rev. Oct. 1861, art. v). It is certain that Cranmer had a hand in drawing up the Necessary Eradication of a Chris- tian Man (1543), just before the compilation of the thirty-nine articles. In the preface, he refers to the work (the Erudition of the Pelagians and Cal- vinistic. Latimer, Hooper, Bilton, Andrews, O'vendal, and Hooker "might with propriety have been called Arminians, had Arminianism, as a system of doctrine, prevailed when they wrote" (Nicholls, Cælinism and Arminianism, i, 273)). Baro (q. v.), professor of divinity at Cambridge, taught Arminianism, and his case gave rise to the Lambeth Articles (q. v.). But Arminianism unfortunately became a political question. Two Arminian bishops, Laud and Juxon, became members of his majesty's privy council at the precise juncture when the liberty of the subject and the prerogative of the crown were brought into direct conflict. In 1642, the obstre- perous professor at Cambridge († 1668), published a strong defence of the Arminian doctrine, under the title of An Appeal to the Gospel for the True Doctrine of Predestination (republished in Cambridge Tracts, 1717). Dr. Samuel Hoard, rector of Moreton († 1667), originally a Calvinist, became a strong Ar- minian, and published God's Love to Mankind manifest- ed by disproving his absolute Decrees for their Damnation (London, 1663, 4to), which called forth answers by Dave- rani, Tissawi, and Amyraut. In the civil war the Arminians gradually ranged themselves with King Charles, the Calvinists with Parliament. But John Goodwin (q. v.), who died in 1645, was one of the ablest defenders of Arminianism in his time. See Jackson, Life of Goodwin (1822, 8vo). When the war was over the Church of England was destroyed, and Arminianism seemed to have perished with it. The restoration of Charles II took place (1660); Armin- ianism returned with prelacy, and held for more than half a century, almost undisturbed sway in the Church of England. It must be observed, however, that as the Arminianism of Laud differed from that of the Dutch leader in many points, so did that of the divines of Charles II and their successors in many more. Laud combined it with views of sacramental efficacy which Arminius had repudiated; the Dutch, on the other hand, held the school of divines, though far from Socinianism, threw the doctrines of grace into the shade, and dwelt more on the example of Christ than on his stoning. Among the eminent Episcopalian divines of England are Cudworth, Pierce, Jeremy Taylor, Tille- leon, Chillingworth, Stillingfleet, Wotton, Burnet, Pearson, Sanderson, Haylyn, Whitby, Patrick, Toms- line, Copleston, Whately, etc. Arminianism at last, in the Church of England, became a negative term, implying a negation of Calvinism rather than any ex- act system of theology whatever. Much that passed for Arminianism was, in fact, Pelagianism. In the Church of England, all who have deviated from the golden mean maintained by Arminianism (between Calvinism on the one hand and Pelagianism on the other) have fallen into error as to the Trinity, while those who have adhered to the evan- gelical doctrine of Arminius have retained all the veri- ties of orthodox faith. The pure doctrine of Ar- minianism arose again in England in the great Wesleyan Reformation of the seventeenth century. Its ablest expositors may be found in the writings of John Wes- ley, John Fletcher, and Richard Watson, whose Theo- logical Institutions (best ed. N. Y. 1860, 2 vols. 8vo) is the most complete Arminian body of divinity extant in English. Its system is the same as that of the or- thodox Protestant churches in general, except so far as the question of predestination and the points connected with it are concerned. "As some heterodox writers have called themselves Arminians, and as the true theory of Arminianism has been often grossly misapplied, it may be necessary to state some of the points with regard to which it has been especially mis- represented. If a man hold that good works are neces- sary to justification; if he maintain that faith in- cludes good works in its own nature; if he reject the doctrines of original sin; if he deny that divine grace is requisite for conversion; if he deny that Christ must speak of human virtue as meritorious in the sight of God, it is very generally charged by Calvinists that he is an Arminian. But the truth is, that a man of such sentiments is properly a disciple of the Pelagian and Socinian schools. To such sentiments pure Ar- minianism is as diametrically opposite as Calvinism itself. The genuine Arminians assert the corruption of human nature in its full extent. They declare that we are justified by faith only. They assert that our justification originates solely in the grace of God. They teach that the procuring and meritorious cause of our justification is the righteousness of Christ. Propter gracia Dei donatur nobis justitiam... (Eph. 2:8). They hold that the gift of God is Jesus Christ (Edinb. Encyclopaedia, s. v.). The whole sum and substance of religious doctrine and theory is embraced in these three terms: God's nature, man's nature, and the relation subsisting be- tween the two. Theology is nothing more than the systematic definition, adjustment, and comparison of these three terms. Christian theology, or genuine orthodoxy, is simply a system of theological views upon these three points, which is self-coherent, and harmonious with the teachings of Scripture. For the development of such a system, exhibiting the precise truth relative to the cardinal points of Christian doc- trine, some defect is necessary that each of these three points be made a special object of scrutiny and dis- cussion. An error in respect to either will not only destroy at once the system's self-coherence, but infalli- bly conduct to the gravest heresies. For example, an error respecting the first (Theology) may give us Pan- theism; an error on the second point (Anthropology) may lead to Atheism; while an erroneous theory re- specting the third gives us the two extremes of an iron rod or a groundless chance. True orthodoxy states and maintains a consistent doctrine respecting each, authenticated by the assertions of God's revelations. Cast down a philosophic eye on the doc- trine of the church as developed in history, we cannot fail to be struck by the remarkable fact that the three great controversies which trisect the historic develop- ments of Christian doctrine as a scientific system have followed without deviation the natural order of these three terms, and that development has been successively upon each in order. Athanasius, Augustine, and Arminius represent in themselves the whole sweep of the dogmatic unfoldment of Christianity; these factors being given, we can construct the whole history of Christian doctrine. The first is the repre- sentative of that speculative movement which developed into scientific form and defensible shape the ecclesiastical doctrine respecting God's nature; the second, of the subsequent movement by which the true doctrine of man was brought to a substantial triunity of the Divine essence, under all temporal manifestations of separate hypostases, on which suppositions only the ancient beliefs of the church and the unqualified declarations of Scripture could be true. His mission was the enunciation, exposition, and defence of a great truth respecting the Divine nature, and round that truth was grouped all the Christian thinking of that age. There was no great doctrinal system of the time, heretical or not, which was not logically related to this central thought of the church. It implied in itself all anterior and all subsequent speculations upon the Divine nature, Origenistic,arian, Sabellian, Monophysite, Nucian, or otherwise.

Augustine was commissioned for another work. The church, in the centuries antecedent to his appearance, had vaguely believed in the depravity and helplessness of human nature; but Augustine was raised up to explain with clearness, and to maintain, and to bring forth into suitable prominence the full force and operation of the native corruption and moral ruin of man; his utter hopelessness apart from the remedial agencies of Divine grace, on which supposition only the ancient beliefs of the church and the unqualified declarations of Scripture could be true. His mission was the enunciation, exposition, and defence of a great truth respecting human nature, and round that truth was grouped all the Christian thinking of that age. It is this which gives that age its character. The whole scholastic theology is but the radicating and ramified outgrowth of that vital germ of truth. To him the church indebted for her first vivid apprehension and scientific statement of the Christian doctrine of man. Augustine is the historical representative of that organic evolution. The third of these divinely appointed representative men laid hold of both these truths, which for sixteen centuries had been developing; accepted the church's developed ideas respecting God and the person of Christ, and then exorcised with keen dialectic, rigor the only doctrine which could harmonize the two. His mission was to point out how God could be what the church taught that he was, and man what the church declared him to be, at one and the same time. The readjustment of the disturbed and abnormal relations of man to God by justification is the central thought of Protestant theology; the announcement and exposition of their relations in that readjustment was the work of Arminius. And not until Arminius is placed in this relation to the doctrinal development of Christianity in the church is there attained a true perception of the grand and growing rhythm of its history. The Protestantarians (as remarked above) erred by maintaining that the particular exercise of Divine efficiency, by which the aborning relation of God to a sinner is readjusted, was unconditioned by anything; whatever, and was grounded solely upon the arbitrary good pleasure of the Almighty. Maintaining this unconditioned elective vocation, they naturally demanded an "effectual calling,"" irresistible grace," and "persevering success," for all these were necessary concomitants. The refutation of this error, and the establishment of the opposite view, was the mission of Arminius. His labors gave scientific form to the essential opinion upon that great point, and completed the cycle of Christian theology. As in the development of apostolic doctrine, the Pauline and Petrine elements were unified in John, so, in its uninspired development, after Athanasius had set forth his truth, and Augustine his, Arminius steps forth the later apostle of dogmatic completion (Or.Warren, in Methodist Quarterly Review, 1857, p. 346 sq.). See Wesleyanism.

The Arminian doctrine on predestination is now very widely diffused in the Protestant world. It is, in the main, coincident with that of the Lutherans in Germany; is held by the Wesleyan Methodist churches throughout the world; by a large part of the Church of England, and by many of the clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. It is substantially the doctrine (on the question of predestination) of the Greek and Roman churches; and it is also held by several of the minor sects. Armet (represented by τέθε, tēthē, Num. xxxi, 50; 2 Sam. i, 10; Sept. את없; Aquila βατανχιον; Vulg. pericucula armilla; properly a letter, from τετ'ετ', τετρά-, to step; comp. Isa. iii, 20, and Anklei), an ornament universal in the East, especially among women; worn by princes as one of the insignia of royalty, and by distinguished persons in general. The word is not used in the A. V., as even in 2 Sam. i, 10, they render the Heb. term "by the bracelet on his arm." Sometimes only one was worn, on the right arm (Ecl. xxxi, 21). From Cant. viii, 6, it appears that the signet sometimes consisted of a jewel on the
ARMLET

These ornaments are frequent on the sculptures of Persepolis and Nineveh, and were set in rich and fantastic shapes resembling the heads of animals (Layard, Niniveh, ii, 250). The kings of Persia wore them, and among them a pair, among other ornaments, to Cyprus (Xen. Cyr. i, 8). The Ethiopians, to whom some were sent by Cambyses, scornfully characterized them as weak fetters (Herod. ii, 28). Nor were they confined to the kings, since Herodotus (viii, 113) calls the Persians generally "weavers of bracelets" (σηματοφόροι). In the Egyptian monuments kings are often represented with armlets and bracelets (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. iii, 575, and Plates 1, 2).

10. They were even used by the old British chiefs (Turner, Angl. Sax. i, 383). The story of Tarpeia shows that they were common among the ancient Sabines, but the Romans considered the use of them effeminate, although they were sometimes given as military rewards (Liv. x, 44). Finally, they are still worn among the most splendid regalia of modern Oriental sovereigns, and it is even said that those of the King of Persia are worth a million sterling (Kitto, Hist. of Pal. i, 499). They form the chief wealth of modern Hindu ladies, and are rarely taken off. They are made of every sort of material, from the finest gold, jewels, ivory, coral, and pearl, down to the common glass rings and varnished earthenware bangles of the women of the Deccan. Now, as in ancient times, they are sometimes plain, sometimes enchaîned; sometimes with the ends not joined, and sometimes a complete circle. The arms are sometimes quite covered with them, and if the wearer be poor, it matters not how mean they are, provided only that they glitter. It is thought essential to beauty that they should fit close, and hence Harmer calls them "rather manacles than bracelets," and Buchanan says that "the poor girls rarely get them on without drawing blood, and rubbing part of the skin from the hand; and as they wear great numbers, which often break, they suffer much from their love of admiration." Their enormous weight may be conjectured from Gen. xxiv, 24.—Smith, s. v. See Bracelet.

ARMOR (represented in the Auth. Ver. by several Heb. words, Gr. ὅρμα, properly distinguished from Arms as being military equipment for the protection of the person, while the latter denotes implements of aggressive warfare; but in the English Bible the former term alone is employed in both senses). In the records of a people like the children of Israel, so large a part of whose history was passed in warfare, we naturally look for much information, direct or indirect, on the arms and modes of fighting of the nation itself and of those with whom it came into contact. Unfortunately, however, we find that in the Bible on these points are extremely few and meagre, while even those few, owing to the uncertainty which rests on the true meaning and force of the terms, do not convey to us nearly all the information which they might. This is the more to be regretted because the notices of the history, scantly as they are, are literally every thing we have to depend on, inasmuch as they are not yet supplemented and illustrated either by remains of the arms themselves, or by those commentaries which the sculptures, vases, bronzes, mosaics, and paintings of other nations furnish to the notices of manners and customs contained in their literature. (See, generally, Jahn's Archæology, § 266-282.) In order to give a clear view of this subject, we shall endeavor to show, succinctly and from the best authorities now available, what were the martial implements borne upon the person, whether for attack or resistance, by the ancient Asiatics, leaving for other proper heads an explanation of the composition and tactical condition of their armies, their systems of fortification, their method of conducting sieges and battles, and their usages of war as regards spoil, captives, etc.—Smith, s. v.; Kitto, s. v. See Battle; Fortification; Siege; War; Army; Fight; Fortress, etc.

I. OFFENSIVE WEAPONS. — 1. The instruments at first employed in the chase or to repel wild beasts, but converted by the wicked to the destruction of their fellow-men, or used by the peaceable to oppose aggression, were naturally the most simple. Among these were the club and the throwing-stone. The first consisted originally of a heavy piece of wood, variously shaped, made to strike with, and according to its form, denominated a mace, a bar, a hammer, or a maul. This weapon was in use among the Hebrews, for in the time of the kings wood had already been superseded by metal; and the לְבָנִי בִּנְבָל, "rod of iron" (Psa. ii, 9), is supposed to mean a mace, or gavellock, or crowbar. It is an instrument of great power when used by a strong arm; as when, in modern menagery, a man with one in his hand commands a tiger's treachery to submit to his will. (See Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, i, 927, fig. 3, 4; and mace, fig. 1, 2. The throwing-stick, or liason, occurs p. 329.) See Rod; Sceptre.

The other was also known if, as is probable, עַנָּן, merhaps (Prov. xxv, 18), be a "maul," a martel, or a war-hammer. It is likely metal was only in general use at a later period, and that a heavy crooked billet continued long in use as a mace; a miserable weapon, indeed, the throwing-stick, made of thorn-wood, is the same instrument which we see figured on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. By the native Arabs it is still called gi-
2. Next came the dirk or poniard, which, in the Hebrew word צָרֶב, cherev (usually translated "sword"), may possibly retain some allusion to the original instrument made of the antelope's horn, merely sharpened, which is still used in every part of the East where the material can be procured. From existing figures, the dirk appears to have been early made of metal in Egypt, and worn stuck in a girdle (Wilkinson, i, 319); but, from several texts (1 Sam. xvii, 58; 2 Sam. xx, 8; 1 Kings xx, 11), it is evident that the real sword was slung in a belt, and that "girding" and "loosing the sword" were synonymous terms for commencing and ending a war. The blades were, it seems, always short (one is mentioned of a cubit's length); and the dirk-ax, at least, was always double-edged. The sheath was ornamented and polished. In Egypt there were large and heavier swords, more nearly like modern sabers, and of the form of an English round-pointed table-knife. But, while metal was scarce, there were also swords which might be called quarter-pikes, being composed of a very short wooden handle, surmounted by a spear-head. Hence the Latin tesser and ferrea continued in later ages to be used for blades. In Nubia swords of heavy wood are still in use. See SWORD; KNIFE.

3. The "spear," צָרֶב, ro'mash, was another offensive weapon common to all the nations of antiquity, and varied much in size, weight, and length. Probably the shepherd Hebrews, like nations similarly situated in northern Africa, anciently made use of the horn of an ox, or a lecuroyx, above three feet long, straightened in water, and sheathed upon a thornwood staff. When sharpened, this instrument would penetrate the hide of a bull, and, according to Strabo, even of an elephant: it was light, very difficult to break, resisted the blow of a battle-axe, and the animals which furnished it were abundant in Arabia and in the desert east of Palestine. At a later period the head was of brass, and afterward of iron. Very ponderous weapons of this kind were often used in Egypt by the heavy infantry; and, from various circumstances, it may be inferred that among the Hebrews and their immediate neighbors, commanders in particular were distinguished by heavy spears. Among these were generally ranked the most valiant in fight and the largest in stature; such as Goliath, "whose spear was like a weaver's beam" (1 Sam. xvii, 7), and whose spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron, which by some is asserted to be equal to twenty-five pounds' weight. The spear had a point of metal at the but-end to fix it in the ground, perhaps with the same massive globe above it which is still in use, intended to counterbalance the point. It was with this ferrel that Absner slew Asahel (2 Sam. ii, 22, 23). The form of the head and length of the shaft differed at different times both in Egypt and Syria, and were influenced by the fashions set by various conquering nations. See SPEAR.

ed "spear"), and קְדוֹשׁ, kidoš (variously rendered "spear," "shield," etc.), may have had distinct forms; from the context, where the former first occurs, it appears to have been a species of dart carried by light troops (1 Sam. xiii, 22; Psa. lv); while the latter, which was heavier, was most likely a kind of pilum. In most nations of antiquity, the infantry, not bearing a spear, carried two darts, those lightly armed using both for long casts, and the heavy-armed only one for that purpose; the second, more ponderous than the other, being reserved for throwing when close to the enemy, or for handling in the manner of a spear. This explanation may throw light on the fact of the chusid, being named in connection with the הַצָּר, tsinnah, or larger buckler (1 Chron. xii, 34), and may reconcile what is said of the chidson (Job xxxix, 23; xli, 29, and Josh. viii, 10). While on the subject of the javelin, it may be remarked that, by the act of casting one at David (1 Sam. xix, 3, 10), Saul virtually absolved him from his allegiance; for by the customs of ancient Asia, preserved in the habits of the Teutonic and other nations, the Sackensericht, the custom of the East Franks, etc., to throw a dart at a freeman, who escaped from it by flight, was the demonstrative token of manumission given by his lord or master; he was thereby set out of hand, manusimiaus, well expressed in the old English phrase "scot-free." But for this act of Saul, David might have been viewed as a rebel. See Dart; Javelin; Lance.

4. But the chief offensive weapon in Egypt, and, from the nature of the country, it may be inferred, in Palestine also, was the war-bow, קְדֹשֶׁת, košeth ("bow"), the arrow being denominated קָדָשִׁים, kadasim. From the simple implements used by the first hunters, consisting merely of an elastic reed, a branch of a tree, or rib of palm, the bow became in the course of time very strong and tall, was made of brass, of wood back-
It was carried on the shield arm, where there was frequently also a horn bracer secured below the elbow to receive the shock from the string when an arrow was discharged. The flight or long-range arrows were commonly of reed, not always feathered, and mostly tipped with flint points; but the shot or aimed arrows, used for nearer purposes, were of wood tipped with metal, about thirty inches long, and winged with three lines of feathers, like those in modern use: they varied in length at different periods, and according to the substance of the bows. See Arrow; Quiver; Shoot.

5. The last missile instrument to be mentioned is the "sling," מֶשֶׁק, kes'la (Job xii, 29), an improvement upon the simple act of throwing stones. It was the favorite weapon of the Benjamites, a small tribe, not making a great mass in an order of battle, but well composed for light troops. They could also boast of using the sling equally well with the left hand as with the right. The sling was made of plaited thongs, somewhat broad in the middle, to lodge the stone or leaden missile, and was twirled two or three times round before the stone was allowed to take flight. Stones could not be cast above 400 feet, but leaden bullets could be thrown as far as 600 feet. The force as well as precision of aim which might be attained in the use of this instrument was remarkably shown in the case of David; and several nations of antiquity boasted of great skill in the practice of the sling. See Sling.

Egyptian Slingers and Sling. From the Monuments.

All these hand-weapons were in use at different periods, not only among the Hebrews and Egyptians, but likewise in Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Macedonia; in which last country the sarissæ carried by the heavy infantry of the phalanx differed from the others only in the great length of the shaft. The Roman pilum was a kind of dart, distinguished from those of other nations chiefly by its weight, and the great proportionate length of the metal or iron part, which constituted one half of the whole, or from two and a half to three feet. Much of this length was hollow, and received nearly twenty inches of the shaft within it; the point was never hooked like that of common darts, because, the weapon being nearly indestructible, the soldiers always reckoned upon advancing in battle and recovering it without trouble when thrown; whereas, if it had been hooked or hamate, they could not have wrenched it out of hostile shields or breast-plates without trouble and delay. See Weapon.

II. Defensive Arms.—1. The most ancient protective piece of armor was the Shield, buckler, roundel, or target, composed of a great variety of materials, very different in form and size, and therefore in all variations bearing a variety of names. The Hebrews used the word מָשָׁה, mish'ah (rendered "shield," "target," or "buckler"), for a great shield—defence, protection (Gen. xv, 1; Psa. xlvi, 9; Prov. xxx, 5)—which is commonly found in connection with spear, and was the shelter of heavily-armed infantry; מָגֶן, magen (rendered "shield" or "buckler"), a buckler or smaller shield, which, from a similar juxtaposition with sword, bow and arrows, appears to have been the defence of the other armed infantry and of chiefs; and מָקֶר, masker, a roundel, Psa. xci, 4, "buckler"), pamma, a roundel, which may have been appropriated to archers and slingers; and there was the מֶשֶׁק, kes'.

let ("shield"), synonymous with the magen, only different in ornament. In the more advanced eras of civilization shields were made of light wood not liable to split, covered with bull-hide of two or more thicknesses, and bordered with metal; the lighter kinds were made of wicker-work or osier, similarly, but less solidly covered; or of double ox-hide cut into a round form. There were others of a single hide, extremely thick from having been boiled; their surface presented an appearance of many folds, like round waves up and down, which might yield, but could rarely be penetrated.

We may infer that at first the Hebrews borrowed the forms in use in Egypt, and that their common shields were a kind of parallel-octagram, broadest and arched at the top, and cut square beneath, bordered with metal, the surface being covered with raw hide with the hair on. The lighter shields may have been soaked in oil and dried in the shade to make them hard; no doubt hippopotamus, rhinoceros, and elephant skin shields were brought from Ethiopia and purchased in the Phoenician markets; but small round hand-bucklers of whale-skin, still used by Arabian swordsmen, came from the Erythraean Sea. During the Assyrian and Persian supremacy the Hebrews may have used the square, oblong, and round shields of those nations, and may have subsequently copied those of Greece and Rome. The princes of Israel had shields of precious metals; all were managed by a wooden or leathern handle, and often slung by a thong over the neck. With the larger kinds a tustudo could be formed by pressing the ranks close together; and, while the outside men kept their shields before and on the flanks, those within raised theirs above the head, and thus produced a kind of surface, sometimes as close and fitted together as a pantile roof, and capable of resisting the pressure even of a body of men marching upon it. The term was most likely what in the feudal ages would have been called a corselet, for such occurs on the Egyptian monuments. This weapon was about five feet high, with a pointed arch above and square below, resembling the feudal knight's shield, only that the point was reversed. This kind of large-suited shield, however, was best fitted for men without any other armor, when combating in open countries, or carrying on sieges; for it may be remarked in general that the military buckler of antiquity was large in proportion as other defensive armor was wanting. Shields were hung upon the battlements of walls, and, as still occurs, chiefly above gates of cities by the watch and ward. In time of peace they were covered to preserve them from the sun, and in war uncovered; this sign was poetically used to denote coming hostilities, as in Isa. xxii, 5, etc. In Europe, where the Crusaders could imitate the Saracens, but not introduce their climate, shields were carved in stone upon towers and gates, as at York, etc. The Eastern origin of this practice seems to be attested by the word zimmah, which, in German, still denotes a battlement, something pointed, a summit, and conveys the idea of a pavise with the point uppermost, a shape such as Arabian battlements often assume. See Shield; Buckler.

2. The Helmet was next in consideration, and in the earliest ages was made of osier or rushes, in the form of a beehive or of a skull-cap. The skins of the heads of animals—of lions, bears, wild boars, bulls, and horses—were likewise adopted, and were adorned with rows of teeth, manes, and bristles. Wood, linen cloth in many folds, and a kind of felt, were also in early use, and helmets of these materials may be observed worn by the nations of Asia at war with the conquerors, kings of Egypt, even before the departure of Israel. At that time also these kings had helmets of metal, of rounded or pointed forms, adorned with a figure of the serpent Apis; and an allied nation, perhaps the Canaanite, reported to have first worn a military crest, bears on the skull-cap of their brazen helmets a pair of horns with a globe in the middle—the solar arkte symbol. The nations of farther Asia, however, used the woolen or braided cap still retained, and now called knesek and ker; around which the turban is usually wound. These were almost invariably supplied with long lappets to cover the ears and the back of the head, and princes usually wore a radiated crown on the summit. This was the form of the Syrian, and probably of the Assyrian helmets, excepting that the last mentioned were of brass, though they still retained the low cylindrical shape. The ἐρήμος, ko'ma ("helmet"), some helmet of this kind, was worn by the trained infantry, who were spearmen among the Hebrews; but archers and slingers had round skull-caps of skins, felts, or quilted stuffs, such as are still in use among the Arabs. The form of Greek and Roman helmets, both of leather and of brass, is well known; they were most likely adopted also by the Hebrews and Egyptians during their subjection to those nations, but require no farther notice here. See Helmet.

3. Body Armor. The most ancient Persian idols are clad in shaggy skins, such as the Eages of Jupiter and Minerva may have been, the type being taken from a Cyrenian or African legend, and the pretended red goat-skin may be supposed to have been that of a species of gnu (Catticobræs Gorgon, Ham. Smith), an animal fabled to have killed men by its sight, and therefore answering to the condition both of a kind of goat and of producing death by the sight alone. In Egypt cuirasses were manufactured of leather, of brass, and of a succession of iron hoops, chiefly covering the abdomen and the shoulders; but a more ancient national form was a kind of thorax, tippet, χίλαρος ("coat of mail," "habergeon"), or χίλαρος, χίλαρος.
ARMOR

("harness," "breastplate"), or square, with an opening in it for the head, the four points covering the breast, back, and both upper arms. This kind in particular was affected by the royal band of relatives who surrounded the Pharaoh, were his subordinate commanders, messengers, and body-guards, bearing his standards, ensign-flags, and sun-screens, his portable throne, his bow and arrows. Beneath this square was another piece, protecting the trunk of the body, and both were in general covered with red-colored cloth or stuff. On the oldest MS. vases a shoulder-piece likewise occurs, worn by Greek and Etruscan warriors. It covers the upper edge of the body armor, is perforated in the middle to allow the head to pass, but hangs equal on the breast and back, square on the shoulders, and is evidently of leather. (See the figure of Memnon discovering Helen in the sack of Troy, Millin, Mos. Sedit.) This piece of armor occurs also on the shoulders of Varangii (northern, who were the bodyguards of the Greek emperors); but they are studied with roundels or bosses, as they appear figured in mosaic or fresco on the walls of the cathedral of Ravenna, dating from the time of Justinian. The late Roman legionaries, as published by Du Choul, again wear the tippet armor, like that of the Egyptians, and one or other of the above forms may be found on figures of Danae in illuminated manuscripts of the eleventh century. By their use of metal for defensive armor the Carianians appear to have created astonishment among the Egyptians, and therefore may be presumed to have been the first nation so protected in western Asia; nevertheless, in the tombs of the kings near Thebes, a tegulated hauberck is represented, composed of small three-colored pieces of metal—one golden, the other reddish and green. It is this suit which Denon represents as composed of rings set on edge; but they are all parallelograms, with the lower edge forming the segment of a circle, and each piece, beside the fastening, has a button and a vertical slit above it, giving flexibility by means of the button of each square working in the aperture of the piece beneath it. This kind of armor may be meant by the word נתיות, tachvu' ("habergeon," only Exod. xxviii. 32; xxxix. 29), the closest interpretation of which appears to be decumanio, tregalamo, a tilling. The expression in 2 Chron. xviii. 83, may be that Ahab was struck in one of the grooves or eleits in the squares of such a shiryon, or between two of them where they do not overlap; or perhaps, with more probability, between the metal hooves of the trunk of the shiryon before mentioned, where the thorax overlaps the abdomen. The term עגוז, kuzzasim (one Hebrew "scale"), in the case of Goliah's armor, denotes the squamous kind, most likely that in which the pieces were sewed upon a cloth, and not hinged to each other, as in the tachvu'. hats than in any other, a name once adopted remains the same, though the object may be changed by successive modifications till there remains but little resemblance to that to which the designation was originally applied. The objects above denominated appendages and suits (in the female ages, lambrinques), were strips of leather secured to the lower rim of the barrel of a suit of armor, and to the openings for arm-holes: the first were about three and a half inches in width; the second, two and a half. They were ornamented with embroidery, covered with rich stuffs and goldsmiths’ work, and made heavy at the lower extremity, to cause them always to hang down in proper order; but those on the arm-holes had a slight connection, so as to keep them equal when the arm was lifted. These vittae were rarely in a single row, but in general formed two or three rows, alternately covering the opening between those underneath, and then protecting the thighs nearly to the knee, and half the upper arm. In the Roman service, under the suit of armor, was the scagia, made of red serge or baize, coming down to the cap of the knee and folding of the arm, so that the vittae hanged entirely upon it. Other nations had always an equivalent to this, but not equally long; and, in the opinion of some, the Hebrew arrows served the same purpose. The Roman and Greek suits were, with slight difference, similarly laced together on the left, or shield side; and on the shoulders were bands and clasps, comparatively narrow in those of the Romans, which covered the joinings of the breast and back, between the shoulders, came from behind, and were fastened to a button on each breast. At the throat the suit of armor had always a double edging, often a band of brass or silver; in the Roman, and often in the Greek, adorned with a lion’s or a Gorgon’s head. It was here that, in the time of Augustus, and probably much earlier, the warriors distinguished for particular acts of valor were insignia; a practice only revived by the moderns under the names of crosses and decorations. The Romans, it appears, had phiales and phaleras of honor, terms which have been supposed to signify bracelets and medals; but all opinion on the subject was only conjectural previously to the discovery, on the borders of the Rhine, of a monumental brass-relief, raised by the freedman of Marcus Cellius Lempo, tribune of the (xii)th legion, who fell in the disastrous over-

Army, represented by several Heb. and Gr. words. See War.

1. Israel.—The military organization of the Jews commenced with their departure from the land of Egypt, and was adapted to the nature of the expedition on which they then entered. Every man above 20 years of age was a soldier (Num. i, 8); each tribe formed a regiment, with its own banner and its own leader (Num. ii, 2; x, 14); their positions in the camp of Israel were accurately fixed (Num. ii, 18); the whole army started and stopped at a given signal (Num. x, 6, 6); thus they came out of Egypt ready for the fight (Exod. xiii, 18). That the Israelites preserved the same exact order throughout their march may be inferred from Balaam’s language (Num. xxv, 6). On the approach of an enemy, a conscription was made from the general body under the direction of a muster-master (originally named נְעַרְגָּה, Deut. xx, 5, “officer,” afterward נְעַרְגָּה, 2 Kings xxv, 19, “scribe of the host,” both terms occurring, however, together in 2 Chron. xxvi, 11, the meaning of each being primarily a writer), by whom also the officers were appointed (Deut. xx, 9). From the number so selected some might be excused serving on certain specified grounds (Deut. xx, 5-8; 1 Mac. iii, 55). The army was thus divided into thousands and the tactics turned upon their respective captains (םְבִיאָדָו וְאֶלֶף אָדָו, 2 Kings xxv, 14), and still further into families (Num. ii, 34; 2 Chron. xxv, 5; xxvi, 12), the family being regarded as the unit in the Jewish polity. From this time the Israelites entered the land of Canaan until the establishment of the kingdom, little progress was made in military affairs: their wars resembled border forays and tactics turned upon the stratagems rather than upon the discipline and disposition of the forces. Skillfully availings themselves of the opportunities which the country offered, they gained the victory sometimes by an ambush (Judg. viii, 4), sometimes by surprising the enemy (Josh. x, 9; xi, 7; Judg. vii, 21), and sometimes by a judicious attack at the time of fording a river (Judg. iii, 28; iv, 7; vii, 24; xii, 5). No general muster was made at this period; but the combatants were summoned on the spur of the moment either by trumpet-cry (Judg. iii, 27), by messengers (Judg. vi, 33), by some significant token (1 Sam. xi, 7), or, as in later times, by the erection of a standard (22, Isa. xxxvi, 3; Jer. iv, 21; ii, 27), or a beacon-fire on an eminence (Jer. vi, 1). See Battle.

With the kings arose the custom of maintaining a body-guard, which formed the nucleus of a standing army. Thus Saul had a band of 8000 select warriors (1 Sam. xiii, 2; xv, 12; xxiv, 2), and David, before his accession to the throne, 600 (1 Sam. xxiii, 13; xxiv, 13). This band he retained when he became king, and added the Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. xv, 18; xx, 7), together with another class, whose name, Shalishim (שַׁלִישִׁים, Sept. τριάρχοι, Auth. Vers. “a third part”), has been variously interpreted to mean (1) a corps of veteran guards = Roman triarii (Winer, Zew. Heb. p. 993); (2) chariots-of-war (Mal. i, 4); (3) officers of the guards in number of three in each chariot (Gesen. Thes. p. 1429); (4) officers of the guards in number (Ewald, Gesch. ii, 601). The fact that the Egyptian war-chariot, with which the Jews were first acquainted, contained but two warriors, forms an objection to the second of these opinions (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., i, 580), and the frequent use of the term in the singular (2 Sam. xxi, 19; 2 Kings v, 25) to the third. Whatever be the meaning of the name, it is evident that it indicated officers of high rank, the chief of whom (דִּיוֹן, “lord,” 2 Kings vii, 2, or army — chief of the captains,” 1 Chron. xii, 18) was immediately about the king’s person, as adjutant or secretary-at-war. David farther organized a national militia, divided into twelve regiments, each of which was called out for one month in the year under their respective officers (1 Chron. xxvi, 7), to be at the head of the army when in active service he appointed a commander-in-chief (םְבִיאָדָו, “captain of the host,” 1 Sam. xiv, 50).

Hitherto the army had consisted entirely of infantry (םְבִיאָדָו, 1 Sam. iv, 10; xv, 4), the use of horses having been restrained by divine command (Deut. xvii, 16). The Jews had, however, experienced the great advantage to be obtained by chariots, both in their encounters with the Canaanites (Josh. xvii, 16; Judg. iii, 14), and later periods (2 Sam. viii, 4; x, 18). The interior of Palestine was indeed generally unsuited to the use of chariots; the Canaanites had employed them only in the plains and valleys, such as Jezreel (Josh. xvi, 16), the plain of Philistia (Judg. i, 19; 1 Sam. iii, 5), and the upper valley of Lebanon (Josh. xi, 9; Judg. iii, 27); and the border, both on the side of Egypt and Syria, was admirably adapted to their use; and accordingly we find that as the foreign relations of the kingdoms extended, much importance was attached to them. David had reserved a hundred chariots from the spoil of the Syrians (2 Sam. vii, 4); these probably served as the foundation of the forces which were subsequently enlarged through his alliance with Egypt (2 Kings x, 28, 29), and applied to the protection of his border, stations or barracks being erected for them in different localities (1 Kings ix, 19). The force amounted to 1400 chariots, 4000 horses, at the rate (in round numbers) of three horses for each chariot, the third being kept as a reserve, and 12,000 horsemen (2 Kings x, 26; 2 Chron. i, 14). At this period the organization of the army was complete; and we have, in 1 Kings ix, 22, apparently a list of the various gradations of rank in the service, as follow: (1) מִלְשָׁנָה הָעָם, “men of war” = privates; (2) מְלֵאכָה, “servants,” the lowest rank of officers = lieutenants; (3) נְכֶשֶׁת, “princes” = captains; (4) נְכֶשֶׁת וְגִלָּה, “captains,” already noticed, perhaps = staff-officers; (5) מְלֵאכָה וְנְכֶשֶׁת, “rulers of his chariots and his horsemen” = cavalry officers. See Captains.

It does not appear that the system established by David was modified by the kings of Judah; but in Israel the proximity of the hostile kingdom of Syria necessitated the maintenance of a standing army. The militia was occasionally called out in time of peace, as by Asa (2 Chron. xiv, 8), by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii, 14), by Amaziah (2 Chron. xxx, 5), and lastly by Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi, 11); but these notices prove that such cases were exceptional. On the other hand, the incidental notices of the body-guard lead to the conclusion that it was regularly kept up (1 Kings xiv, 28; 2 Kings x, 4, 11). Occasional reference is made to chariots (2 Kings vii, 21), and it would appear that this branch of the service was maintained until the wars with the Syrians weakened the resources of the kingdom (2 Kings xiii, 7); it was restored by Jotham (Isa. ii, 7), but in Hezekiah’s reign no force of the kind could be maintained, and the Jews were obliged to seek the aid of Egypt for horses and chariots (2 Kings xviii, 23, 24). This was an evident breach of the injunction in Deut. xvii, 16, and met with the disapproval on the part of the prophet Isaiah (xxxvi, 1). See Chariot.

With regard to the arrangement and manoeuvring of the army in the field, we know but little. A division into three bodies is frequently mentioned (Judg. vii, 16; ix, 40; 1 Sam. xi, 11; 2 Sam. xvii, 2), such a division served various purposes: in action there would be a centre and two wings; in camp, relays for the night-watches (Judg. vii. 19); and by the combination of two of the divisions, there would be a main body and a reserve, or a strong advanced guard (1 Sam. xiii. 2; xxv, 18). Jehoshaphat divided his army into five bodies, corresponding, according to Ewald (Ge- stehs. i. 192), to the five seats of government of the kingdom at that time: may not, however, the threefold principle of division be noticed here also, the heavy-armed troops of Judah being considered as the proper army, and the two divisions of light-armed of the tribe of Benjamin as an appendix (2 Chron. xvii, 4-6). The maintenance and equipment of the soldiers at the public expense dates from the establishment of a standing army; before which, each soldier armed himself, and obtained his food either by voluntary offerings (3 Sam. xvii, 28, 29), by forced exactations (1 Sam. xxv, 15), or by the natural resources of the country (1 Sam. xiv, 27); on one occasion only do we hear of any systematic arrangement for provisioning the host (Judg. xx, 10). It is doubtful whether the soldier ever received pay even under the kings (the only instance of pay being mentioned applies to mercenaries, 2 Chron. xxv, 6); but that he was maintained, while on active service, must be considered certain, as is shown from 1 Kings iv, 27; x, 16, 17; 2 Chron. xxvii, 14: notices occur of an arsenal or armory, in which the weapons were stored (1 Kings xiv, 28; Neh. iii, 19; Cant. iv, 4). See ARMOR.

The numerical strength of the Jewish army cannot be ascertained with any degree of accuracy; the numbers, as given in the text, are manifestly corrupt, and the various statements therefore irreconcilable. At the Exodus the number of the warriors was 600,000 (Exod. xii, 38), or 603,850 (Exod. xxviii, 26; Num. i, 46); at the entrance into Canaan, 601,780 (Num. xxvi, 51). In David's time the army amounted, according to one statement (2 Sam. xiv, 9), to 1,900,000, viz. 800,000 for Israel and 500,000 for Judah; but according to another statement (1 Chron. xxi, 5, 6) to 1,470,000, viz. 1,000,000 for Israel and 470,000 for Judah. The militia at the same period amounted to 94,000 x 12 = 288,000 (1 Chron. xxvii, 1 sq.). At a later period the army of Judah under Abijah is stated at 400,000, and that of Israel under Jeroboam at 500,000 (2 Chron. xiii, 8). Still later, Asa's army, derived from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin alone, is put at 530,000 (2 Chron. xiv, 8), and Jehoshaphat's at 1,160,000 (2 Chron. xvii, 14 sq.). See NEMBAH.

Little need be said on this subject with regard to the period of the Exile; the return from the Babylonish captivity until the organization of military affairs in Judsea under the Romans. The system adopted by Judas Maccabeus was in strict conformity with the Mosaic law (1 Mac. iii, 55); and though he maintained a standing army, varying from 8000 to 6000 men (1 Mac. iv, 6; 2 Mac. xviii, 15), yet the custom of paying the soldiers appears to have been still unknown, and to have originated with Simon (1 Mac. xiv, 82).

The introduction of mercenaries commenced with John Hyrcanus, who, according to Josephus (Ant. xiii, 8, 4), rifled the tombs of the kings in order to pay them; the intestine commotions that prevailed in the reign of Agrippa I. greatly increased the number to 6200 men (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 13, 5; 14, 1), and the same policy was followed by Alexander (Ant. xiii, 16, 2), and by Herod the Great, who had in his pay Thracian, German, and Gallic troops (Ant. xvii, 8, 8). The discipline and arrangement of the army was also imitated from that of the Romans, and the titles of the officers borrowed from it (Josephus, War, ii, 20, 7). See SOLDIER.

II. Roman Army.—This was divided into legions, the number of which varied considerably, each under six tribunae (quintarius, chief captain, Acts xxii, 61), who commanded by turns. The legion (q. v.) was subdivided into ten cohors (cretio, band, Acts t, 1), the cohort into three maniples, and the maniple into two centuries, containing originally 100 men, as the name implies, but subsequently from 50 to 100 men, according to the strength of the legion. (See Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. v.) There were thus 60 legions, of which 22 were under the command of a centurion (xxvii, 1, 22; xxvii, 5; xvii, 54). In addition to the legionary cohorts, independent cohorts of volunteers served under the Roman standards; and Biscoe (History of Acts, p. 220) supposes that all the Roman forces stationed in Judsea were of this class. Josephus speaks of five cohorts as stationed at Cæsarea at the time of Herod Agrippa's death (Act. xix, 9, 2), and frequently mentions that the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste served in the ranks (Act. xx, 8, 7). One of these cohorts was named the "Italian" (Act. x, 1), not as being a portion of the Italica legio (for this was not embodied until Nero's reign), but as consisting of volunteers from Italy (Gruter, Sacr. i, 484). This cohort probably acted as the body-guard of the procurator. The cohort named "Augusta" (epita Xystoαρη, Act. xxvii, 1) may have consisted of the volunteers from Sebaste (Josephus, War, ii, 12, 6; Biscoe, p. 228).

Others, however, think that it was a cohors Augusta, similar to the legio Augusta. The head-quarters of the Roman forces in Judsea were at Cæsarea. A single cohort was probably stationed at Jerusalem as the ordinary guard; at the time of the great feasts, however, and on other public occasions, a larger force was sent up, for the purpose of preserving order (Josephus, War, ii, 12, 1; 15, 8). Frequent disturbances arose in reference to the images and other emblems carried by the Roman troops among their military ensigns, which the Jews regarded as idolatrous; deference was paid to their prejudices by a removal of the objects from Jerusalem (Act. xviii, 8; 1, 5, 5). For the sentry duty of the Roman legions, see GADAR. The cocke Augusta, "specimen," noticed in Acts xxi, 28, appear to have been light-armed, irregular troops; the origin of the name is, however, quite uncertain (Alford, Comm. in loc.).—Smith, s. v. Arnaud, Richard, M.A., a divine of the Church of England, born in London about 1666 (?) entered Benedict College, Cambridge, 1714; became fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, 1725; afterward rector of Marceston, Leicestershire, where he died in 1756. He is known chiefly by his Critical Commentary on the Apocrypha (new ed. Lond. 1822, 4to), which is printed together with Patrick's, Louth's, and Whitby's Commentaries (best ed. Tegg, Lond. 4 vols. 8vo)—Darling, Cyclopaedia, i, 99; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 65. See ARNOLD OF BRESCIA.

Arnaud, Henri, pastor and military leader of the Vaudois, was born at La Tour, in Piedmont, 1641. His early history is obscure, but he is said to have been a soldier before entering the ministry among the persecuted Vaudois. In 1689 he led his people in their 14 efforts to obtain liberty, native language, and a right to worship God in peace. William III of England gave him a colonel's commission, and he served with great distinction, at the head of 2000 Vaudois, under Marlborough. When his people were exiled in 1698, he became their pastor at Schönberg, and died there, Sept. 8, 1721. In this retirement he wrote the history of his enterprise, under the title Histoire de la glorieuse Rétrières des Vaucluse dans leurs Villes, printed in 1710, and dedicated to Anne, Queen of Great Britain. The French edition of this work is very rare; it has been translated into English, under the title The glorious Restorers of their Country, by H. D. Ackland (Lond. 1827, 3vol.). See Vaucluse.

Arnaud, Angélique, abbess of Port-Royal, a daughter of Robert Arnaud d'Andilly, was born November 28, 1624. From her earliest years she exhibited an extraordinary force and resoluteness of character, and excited much anxious speculation concerning her future career among her relatives. When not quite twenty years of age she became a nun at Port-Royal des Champs, where she had been educated by her aunt, Marie Jaqueline Angélique Arnauld, sister of the great Arnaud. Nine years after she was made sub-prioress; and on removing some years later to Port-Royal de Paris, she held the same office. During the Revolution Port-Royal des Champs, by her piety and courage, sustained the spirit of the sisterhood. The whole family, male and female, were determined Jansenists, and none more so than Mère Angélique de St. Jean (her conventual name). She had much to endure, but she met misfortune with earnest intrepidity. A royal order was issued to break up the monastery. The police arrested the nuns, who were dispersed in various convents throughout France, and constant efforts were made by the Jesuits to induce them to sign the “Formulary of Alexander VII.” Angélique was alone exempted from listening to their arguments and solicitations, her “obstinance” being supposed invincible. At length, by command of the Archbishop of Paris, the nuns were restored to Port-Royal des Champs; but for some years they were subjected to a strict surveillance by soldiers, who watched all their movements, and allowed them no intercourse with persons out of the convent. In 1669, however, was issued the edict of Clement IX for the peace of the church, which was a kind of compromise on this vexed question of Jansenism and Jesuitism. The nuns received back the privileges of which they had been stripped, and constituted their society anew. Angélique was again elected prioress. In 1678 she was made abbess. The next year her protectress, the Duchess de Lorraine, who had died, and whose position was commenced by the prohibition to receive any more novices. Still Angélique did not despair. She consoled the nuns, and exerted all her influence with persons in power, but with little effect. At last she sank under a complication of griefs, and expired on the 29th of January, 1684, leaving behind her as bright and beautiful a memory as any of her countrywomen. She was learned without being pedantic, pious without bigotry, and gentle to others in proportion as she was severe to herself. Angélique wrote several works. Of these, one, perhaps the most valuable work relative to the nuns at Port-Royal, is entitled Monastère de la Clôture (Lond. 1714, 12mo, 8 vols.). While the Mémories de Du Fossé, Fontaine, and Lançot detail the external history of Port-Royal, these Mémories represent its internal history, with the mind and habits of the community. Among its members was elder Angélique. The Mémories were edited by Barbe de la Bruyère in 1742. The originals, from which Barbeau de la Bruyère printed the Mémories, were preserved in the library of Saint Germain des Prés at Paris. Angélique also took a great part in the compositions of Port-Royal des Champs (Amst. 1725, 4to.), and wrote other works in defence of the monastery. —*Mémories pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, i. 498, etc.; Quérard, La France Littéraire; Rechlin, Geschicht v. Arnall, Y. Antoine, on a visit of the Vaucluse of their father in 1617. Arnaud the younger was educated at Calvi. He originally studied for the law, but was induced by the Abbé de St. Cyran to turn his attention to theology. In 1641 he was made priest and doctor of the Sorbonne, where he had been pupil of Lescot (afterward Bishop of Chartres), who taught him the scholastic theology. In this period of study he imbibed a love for Augustinians and his writings, which he ever after preserved. In 1643 he was made an honorary member of the Society of Sorbonne for his extraordinary merit. In this year, 1648, he published his famous work, De la fréquente Communauté, which is still in use, and was vigorously attacked by the Jesuits. Arnaud now put forth, in reply, his Théologie Morale des Jésuites—the beginning of a fierce and protracted controversy. The Jesuits endeavored to have Arnauld sent to Rome; to escape this peril, he retired from public life for many years, but kept his pen ever busy, at the convent Port-Royal des Champs, near Paris. See Port-Royal. Soon after, he became involved in the disputes about Jansenius (q. v.), bishop of Ypres, and his book Augustinus, several propositions of which concerning the intricate questions of grace and free-will had been condemned by Pope Urban VII (Aug. 1, 1641). Arnauld boldly set out to defend it against the censures of the papal bull. He published several pamphlets, closing with a first and second Apologie de Jansenius. In these years of strife, whenever a moment of armistice permitted, he occupied it in writing such works as Mœurs de l'Église Catholique, La Correction, La Grâce, La Vérité de la Religion, De la Foi, de l'Espérance, et de la Charité, and Le Manuel de Saint Augustin. He also varied these occupations by translating into Latin his Frequent Communation, and by the composition of his Nove oppositiones contra Remon. Descartia Mediationes, and several smaller treatises. In addition to his literary labors, he undertook the direction of the Port-Royal des Champs, and with his friend Marie Jaqueline Angélique Arnauld, was abbess. In his retreat he had the society of such men as Pascal, Nicolle, etc. Here they wrote in common numerous excellent works, e. g. Grammaire Générale Raisonnée, Éléments de Géométrie, and L'Art de Penser. In 1649 the Jansenist controversy broke out more fiercely than ever. The Augustinians of the Bishop of Ypres was again attacked and condemned by the Sorbonne and the pope. Arnauld replied in his Considerations. In 1650 appeared what he conceived to be his best work, L'Apologie pour les Saints Fiers. For the next half dozen years he was engaged in constant and painful disputes with the Jesuits. The vigor of his life, the impression of his piety and earnestness was deepened in the mind of the nation; and, on reading some of his compositions, even Alexander VII is reported to have praised the author, and to have exhorted him for the future to desist the libels of his adversary. Indeed, the strife of the 1650's is called Recorde des Eclesiages et L'Office du Saint-Sacrement. In 1655-56, for prudential reasons, he left his retreat at Port-Royal, and sought a secret place of security. About the same time he was expelled from the Sorbonne and the faculty of theology. Seventy-two descents and Complaints to the minister of the crown were occasioned by him. In 1656, the war with the Jesuits was renewed —not, however, by Arnold in person. Under the name de plume of Louis de Montalto, the great Pascal (q. v.) discharged his scorpion wit against the Jesuits for about a year and a half in the Provincial Letters. Arnauld spent four times a year alienating the Jansenist controversialists, and to which Arnauld contributed by an eloquent memorial to the pontiff, he was presented to the pope's nuncio, and also to Louis XIV, who received him graciously, and invited him "to employ his golden pen in defence of religion." His next work, in which he was associated with his friend Nicole, De la Pér惠州 de la Foi de l'Eglise Catholique touchant l'Éucharistie, was dedicated to the pope. This occasioned a warm controversy between Arnauld and the reformed minister Claude, in the course of which Arnauld wrote Du Res.-

Arnauld, Robert, eldest brother of Antoine Arnauld, was born at Paris in 1618, entered early into public life, and filled several offices at the French court. At fifty-two he retired into the convent of Port-Royal, where he wrote numerous translations, and other works, printed in 8 vols. fol. 1675. He died Sept. 27, 1674. Arnauld, Henri, brother of Antoine, was born in Paris in 1697. He was originally designed for the bar, but, on receiving from the court the abbey of St. Nicholas, he entered the church. He was elected bishop of Toul by the diocesan chapter; but, as the electors were not satisfied with his election, he was impelled to renounce his title. In 1646 he went to Rome to appease the quarrel between the Barberini family and Pope Innocent X; and such was his success that the family had a medal struck and a statue erected in his honor. On his return to France, he was made bishop of Angers in 1649, devoted himself to his duties, and became, like the rest of his family, a zealous Jansenist. He was one of the four bishops who refused to sign the acceptance of the pope's bull condemning the "Augustinus" of Jansenius. He was accustomed to take only five hours' sleep, that he might have time for prayer and the reading of the Scriptures without encroaching on the duties of his episcopal office. He was twice sick, once recovering, the other time being the sick. When there was a scarcity of provisions at Angers, on one occasion, he sent ten thousand livres so secretly that the donation was attributed to another, and the real donor was only discovered by accident some time afterward. His diocese he never left but once, and that was to reconcile the Prince of Taranto to his father, the Duke de la Tremouille. When Angers revolted in 1652, the queen-mother was about to take heavy vengeance upon it, but was prevented by this bishop, who, as he administered the sacrament to her, said: "Take the body of Him who forgave His enemies when on the cross." Some one advising him to take care that his name was not recognized by the rebels, he answered: "Yes, I will, when you find me a day in which I am not bishop." His Négociations à la Cour de Rome (1748, 5 vols.) contain many curious facts and anecdotes. He died at Angers, June 8, 1694.—Memoires de Port-Royal (Uitrecht, 1741), vol. i.; Besoigne, Vie de l'abbé Arnauld d'Andilly (Paris, 1692, 2 vols. 12mo); Hoeffer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, ii, 290.

Arndt, Johann, the first of the Pietists (q. v.), was born December 27, 1555, at Ballenstädt, at the foot of the Harz Mountains. He studied at the University of Helmstädt, and devoted himself at first to medicine, but afterward applied himself to theology at Strasbourg, and founded the famous Latin school. In 1583 he became pastor of the Lutheran church at Badeborn, in Anhalt; in 1598, at Quedlinburg; in 1599, at St. Martin's, Brunswick. His theological learning was varied and accurate; but his chief peculiarity was his heart religion, in which respect he was the Spener of the Voltaire of his time. ARNDT

ARNOBIO, the elder, also called "Afer," lived about 297, and taught rhetoric at Sicca, in Africa. He was ordained by St. Athanasius, but about the time of Diocletian he embraced the Christian faith, and, according to Jerome (De Viris Il·lust. c. 79), in order the more readily to induce the bishops to receive him among the number of the faithful, he composed, before his baptism, about the year 305, several volumes of "Cæsæres, libri vii." This account of Jerome's is followed by many writers (e.g. Tillemont, Cave; Smith, Diction. s. v.); but Lardner's argument against it (iii, 458) seems to be conclusive. Arnobius writes in the tone, not of a catechumen, but of a Christian; and he nowhere hints at any necessity or compulsion for his becoming a Christian. In that beginning of his book, he speaks of it as a task voluntarily undertaken in view of the injurious reproaches cast upon the Christians. The book begins with a vindication of Christianity from the charges brought against it by the pagans. In a few points Arnobius makes statements savouring of Gnosticism, and he does not manifest a complete acquaintance with the Christian system or with the Scriptures. He shows, however, an extensive knowledge of pagan worship and literature, and the book is a valuable source of information on these topics. The marked peculiarity of his Apology, as distinguished from those of his contemporaries, consists in his face to face to the needy repels the charges made against Christianity, but also undertakes to show that Christianity itself is demonstrable by evidence. In his argument for the divinity of Christ and of his religion, he anticipates many of the leading arguments of modern apologists, especially of Paley. For a very clear summary of this work see Woodman, Introduction to Tertullian Libër Apologeticus. ch. iii. Villemain gives Arnobius a very high place among the early writers, in Hoefer, Nouvo. Biog. Générale, iii, 311. See also Dorner, Person of Christ, div. i, vol. ii, p. 190. The works of Arnobius were published, for the first time, by Faustus Sabeus, at Rome, in 1542, but with many faults. Many editions have since been issued, but the best are those of Orelli (Leips. 1816, 8 vols. Svo), of Hülseborn (Halle, 1844, 8vo). See Geret, De Arnobio judicio (Viteb. 1752); Meyer, De ratione Arnobiani (Hafn. 1813); Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 112.

Arnobius, the younger, lived about 460, and is said to have been a part of Gaul, and to have lived in the monastery of Lerins. He wrote a Commentarius in Psalmodias Basiliae, 1522; Paris, 1689), which shows him to have been a semi-Pelagian. His extant remains may be found in Bib. Max. Patr. vol. viii.- Cave, Hist. Lit. cent. v.; Bayle, Dictionary, s. v.; Dupin, Eccl. Writers, cent. v.

Arnold (Arnoldo, Arnoldo) of Brescia was born in the town of Brescia about the beginning of the twelfth century. Our information as to his history is scanty, and depends chiefly upon the accounts of his enemies. The chief sources are Otto of Freisingen, de Gestis Friderici, i., and Günther, Leb. Basilea, 1508, fol.); both printed together, Basilea, 1588, fol.), under Abadell at the desert of Nogent. Having returned to Italy he became a monk. The corruption of the clergy was very great at that time, and Arnold, endowed with an impassioned oratory, began to preach against the ambition and luxury of abbots, prelates, and canons, and to hold meetings and to gain adherents. He gained the confidence of the bishops, and the Bavarian bishops, raised to the dignity of archbishop. Arno presided at several synods, and was, in 813, one of the presidents of the Council of Mentz. He also converted many Huns and Wends, and died January 24, 821. He wrote, together with Deacon Benedict, the Congestum (Indiculus) Armoniae, a list of all the churches, villages, etc., of the archbishopric of Salzburg, which is a very valuable contribution to the early Church history of southwestern Germany. ARNO, archbishop of Salzburg, frequently called, with a Latin, Aquila, was probably a native of Germany, and not, as has been erroneously inferred from some figurative expressions of Alcuin, a brother of the latter. Arno (or, as he calls himself, Arm) was educated at Freising (Bavaria), and was consecrated in the same city deacon in 765, and priest in 776. He was a frequent attendant of Duke Thassilo, of Bavaria, and no less than 23 documents of the church of Freising have his name as a witness. He became, in 789, abbot at Elnon, in the Netherlands, and in the same year began his intimate relations with Alcuin, who at that time was residing near Elnon. In 785 he returned to Bavaria, having been appointed by Duke Thassilo bishop of Salzburg. While sojourning at Rome in 789, he was, in accordance with the wish of Charlemagne and the Bavarian bishops, raised to the dignity of archbishop. Arno presided at several synods, and was, in 813, one of the presidents of the Council of Mentz. He also converted many Huns and Wends, and died January 24, 821. He was a frequent attendant of Duke Thassilo, of Bavaria, and no less than 23 documents of the church of Freising have his name as a witness. He became, in 789, abbot at Elnon, in the Netherlands, and in the same year began his intimate relations with Alcuin, who at that time was residing near Elnon. In 785 he returned to Bavaria, having been appointed by Duke Thassilo bishop of Salzburg. While sojourning at Rome in 789, he was, in accordance with the wish of Charlemagne and the Bavarian bishops, raised to the dignity of archbishop. Arno presided at several synods, and was, in 813, one of the presidents of the Council of Mentz. He also converted many Huns and Wends, and died January 24, 821. He wrote, together with Deacon Benedict, the Congestum (Indiculus) Armoniae, a list of all the churches, villages, etc., of the archbishopric of Salzburg, which is a very valuable contribution to the early Church history of southwestern Germany. ARNOLD 431

other towns, and complaints against the author of all this poured in at Rome. Innocent II had Arnold condemned; the pope's jurisdiction was assumed by Lateran, in 1139. Such, at least, is the positive statement of Otto of Freisingen and other historians of those times, but Arnold's name is not mentioned in the canons of the council; and it is only clear that, by Innocent's order, he was prohibited from preaching, was banished from Italy, and forbidden to return without the pope's permission. He then proceeded to France, where he fell in with an old fellow-student, the papal legate Guido, afterward Pope Celestine II; but he met with an unrelenting adversary in Bernard of Clairvaux, who forced him to seek refuge at Zurich, and afterward at Constance (about 1140). He there resigned his errors; Inquisition was established by the clergy, and found many favorable listeners. But Bernard traced him there also, and caused the Bishop of Constance to banish him. After the death of Innocent II (1148), Arnold returned to Italy, and, hearing that the people of Rome had revolted against the pope, he put himself at the head of the insurrection. Lucius II had died of the wounds received in a popular affray, and Eugenius III, a disciple of Bernard, succeeded him in the papal chair, but was driven away from the city by the people and the senate. The multitude hurried on to excesses which Arnold probably had never contemplated. They attacked the houses of the canon and bishops, and the abbey of St. Mary's. Arnóng, however, still remained poor; he really despised wealth, and his morals were irreproachable. Rome continued for ten years in a state of agitation little differing from anarchy, at war with the pope and the people of Tibur, and at variance within itself. Bernard, in his epistles, draws a fearful picture of the state of the city at that time. Eugenius III died in 1153, and his successor, Anastasius IV, having followed him to the grave shortly after, Adrian IV was elected pope in 1154. He was a man of a more determined spirit than his predecessors. A cardinal having been attacked and seriously wounded in the streets of Rome, Adrian resolved to the bold measure of excommunicating the first city in Christendom, a thing without a precedent. The Romans, who had set at naught the temporal power of the pope, quelled before his spiritual authority. In order to be reconciled to the pontiff they exiled Arnold, who took refuge among the Huguenots and sojourned in Constance.
When the Emperor Frederick I came to Rome to be crowned, the pope applied to him to have Arnold arrested. Frederick accordingly gave his orders, and Arnold was strangled, his body burnt, and the ashes thrown into the Tiber in the year 1155 (Penny Cyclopaedia). See ARNIV. The Roman Catholic writers naturally give Arnold a bad character. In truth, he was a great reforming spirit—the Savonarola or Luther of his time—but driven by the evil circumstances of his age into errors and excesses. Neander is doubtless only in just saying that the inspiring ideas of his movements was that of a holy and pure church, a renovation of the sacraments of the communion of the blessed. If Baptist writers class him among the forerunners of their church, as one of the charges brought against him in 1139 was the denial of infant baptism. Ba-ronius calls him "the patriarch of political heretic" (Anm000, anno 1150). See Köllcr, De Arnoldo Brdozien

ARNOLD OF ULSINGEN. See ARNOLDI, BARTHOLO-MOW.

ARNOLD OF VILLANEUVE, a celebrated physician of the thirteenth century, was born about 1240. He was eminently skilled in natural science and general literature. In 1265 he was made physician to Pedro III of Aragon, and his fire, his science of communication brought on the excommunication of the bishop of Tarragona, and he wandered from place to place for years, until finally he found refuge with Frederick II at Palermo. The monks stigmatized him as a magician, not so much for his science as for his attacks upon their bad lives and principles. He taught that the monks had corrupt the doctrine of Christ, and that the founding of masses and benefits was useless. In 1181, Pope Clement V, being ill of gravel, sought the medical skill of Arnold, who was shipwrecked, and perished on the voyage to Rome. His remains were buried at Genoa in 1184, and his writings were afterward burnt by the church. Inquisition was established by the clergy, which were condemned are the following: 1. that the human nature of Christ is equal to the divinity; 2. that the soul of Christ, immediately after the union, knew as much as the divinity; 3. that the devil has perverted the whole human race, and destroyed faith; 4. that the monks corrupted the doctrine of Jesus Christ; 5. that the study of philosophy ought not to be learned from the schools; 6. that the revelation made to Cyril is more valuable than Holy Scripture; 7. that works of mercy are more pleasing to God than the sacrifice of the altar; 8. that founding benefices and masses is useless; 9. that he who gathers a great number of benefices and foundations of masses, incurs everlasting damnation; 10. that the sacrificing priest and the offerer offer nothing of their own to God; 11. that the passion of Jesus Christ is better represented by the giving of alms than by the sacrifice of the altar; 12. that God is not honored in death in the mass, but in the word only; 13. that the papal constitutions are simply the works of men; 14. that God threatens with damnation, not all those who sin, but all those who afford a bad example; 15. that the dead of the world would happen in 1385, 1384, or 1376.

His works were printed at Lyons in 1520, in one vol. fol.; and 1580; also at Basle.—Niceron, Mem. tom.

Arnold, Gottfried, an eminent German Pietist and Mystic, born at Annaberg, Saxony, September 5, 1665. Educated at Wittenberg, he became a tutor, 1689, at Dresden, where he imbibed an ardent Pietistic tendency from a person who was afterwards secretary of the private tutor at Quedlinburg, where he devoted himself to the study of the mystic writers and of Church history. After condemning marriage, he married in 1700, and lost some of his fanatical views. In 1707 he obtained a pastorate in Perleberg, where he remained until his death, May 80, 1714. In spite of all his errors, Arnold was eminently pious, and was a faithful preacher.
He wrote largely, but his most important work is his Un-persatische Kirchen- und Ketzergeschichte (Frankf.
1788—1790; repub, at Schaffhausen, with additions, 1740—1748, 8 vols.). This "Imperial Church History" was the first written in German instead of Latin. It makes the personal history of the church of Christianity. But, while bent on showing fair play, as no historian before had done, to all sorts of heretics and schismatics, particularly to the Mystics, for whom he had a special predilection, Arnold fell into the most gross wrong toward the representatives of orthodoxy, ascribing to them the basest motives, and aspersing their characters in every possible way. See Schaff, History of the Apostolic Church, § 80; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, i, 548.
The number of works which were published against Arnold is very large. A list of them is given in the preface to the third volume of his works in the Schaffhausen edition. The most important work against him is by Groschius, Notwendige Vertheidigung der evangeli-ischen Kirche wider die Arnoldische Ketzergeschichti (Frankf. 1745). Among the other works of Arnold are, Historia et descriptio theosophia, 1702 (German, Arnold, Nicolaus, a Protestant theologian, was born at Lesnà, in Poland, Dec. 17, 1618; died Oct. 15, 1680. He became, in 1639, rector of the school in Jabłonow, and in 1654 succeeded Coccasius as professor of theology at Franeker, where he became especially known. He was a prolific writer, chiefly polemical, e. g. Religio Sociniana refutata (Franeker, 1654, 4to): — Athaeism Socinianus (1659, 4to): — Dis- cursa theolog. cont. Conmemum (1660, 4to): — a refutation of the Catechism of the Socinians (Athaeism Socimianus F. Biskuli refutatum, Amst. 1659): — a work entitled Lumen Franconiae (Light in Dorset), in which he explains those passages of Scripture which the Socinians use as arguments for their doctrines (Franeker, 1662, 2 vols.): — and a Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews. — Hoefler, Biog. Generale, iii, 925.

Arnold, Thomas, D.D., was born at Cowes, England, June 13th, 1755. In 1803 he was sent to Winchester school, where he remained until 1811. In 1811 he obtained a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and in 1815 a fellowship in Oriol, where he was associated with Coplestone, Whately, and Hampden, a noble band. In 1818 he was ordained deacon. In 1819 settled at Laleham, where he opened a school to fit a few young men for the university. In 1820 he married. In 1825 he was made head master of Rugby school, and ordained priest. It soon became evident that a reform was in progress in Rugby; and the effects of Dr. Arnold's administration of the school are visible to-day, not only in Rugby, but in most schools in England. In this occupation he spent the last fourteen years of his life, and during that period took the deepest interest in all the political questions of the time. He was one of the most decided opponents of the Oxford new school of theology. His idea of a Christian Church was first given in his pamphlet on "Church Reform," which he induced to publish in 1823, in consequence of the apprehensions he entered into at the thought of the dangers which then threatened the Establishment. His theory is given in his last work, "Hooker's Church and State," that the church and state are identical; that a church is a Christian state. His views on this subject are again stated in his Fragment on the Church, subsequently published, in which he hits the keynote of the Tractarian heresy in attacking what he considers to be their false notions of the Christian priesthood.

Arnold, August Wilhelm, a Roman Catholic bishop of Germany, born at Baden, near Trefus, in Prussia, died in 1894. He was ordained priest in 1825, became professor of Oriental languages and eloquence at the seminary of Trefus, and subsequently canon at the Cathedral. He was elected bishop of Trefus in 1839, but the Prussian government refused to ratify the election. He was again elected in 1842, when he was received by the government in new terms, and was at once involved in new difficulties by his refusal to take the constitutional oath. He became widely known, and produced a great commotion in 1845 by ordering the public exhibition of a relic of the Church of Trefus, claimed to be the "holy coat" of Christ. He is the author of several German translations, besides those of Chrysostom and his book on the priesthood. — Pierer, i, 753; Vaperaque, 66. works, chiefly against the Lutherans. He died at Erfurt in 1592.

Arnoldists, followers of Arnold of Brescia (q. v.). Many seem to have adhered to the doctrines of Arnold even after his death, and to have propagated them in Upper Italy. The Arnoldists were condemned by Pope Lucius III at the council of Verona in 1184. The name, however, is in use also in the 13th century against the heretics (1224); but it is doubtful whether the name was merely copied from the condemnation decree, or whether they continued to exist as a sect.

Ar'non (Heb. Armon'), also Ar'marn, a mountain; Sept. Αρμωνί, sometimes Αρμωνίω, a river (377), torrent, Deut. ii, 24, forming the southern boundary of trans-Jordanic Palestine (originally of the Amorites territory. Num. xii, 18, 26), and separating it from the land of Moab (Deut. iii, 5, 16; Josh. xii, 1, Judg. xi, 22; Isa. xvi, 2; Jer. xliii, 19). Josephus speaks of it as issuing from the mountains of Arabia (Ant. iv, 5, 1). Among these hills are probably to be sought the "heights of Arnon" (Num. xxi, 28). See BANNOY.

It is also named in Deut. ii, 86; iii, 12; iv, 48; Josh. xii, 5; Judges vi, 16; Judg. xi, 28, 18. 26. From Judg. xi, 18, it is (i.e. one of its branches) N.E. of Caal, which would seem to have been also the eastern border of Moab (see also 2 Kings x, 33). In many of the above passages occurs the term for the site of Arnon, "which is by the brink of the river Arnon." In Numbers it is called "the Arnon," in Deut. and Joshua generally "the river Arnon" (Deut. ii, 19). It is sometimes "River Ar'non". Isaiah (xvi, 2) mentions its floods; and in Judges xi, 28, a word of rare occurrence (773, hand-comp. Num. xiii, 22) is used for the sides of the stream. In the time of Jerome it was still known as Arnon; but in the Samarito-Arabic version of the Pentateuch by Abū-Salīl (10th to 12th century) it is given as al-Mojib. There can be no doubt that the Wady el-Mojib of the present day is the Arnon of the Bible (Hill, Anc. Arach. 1654, 847; and in Ritter, Erdk. xv, 1195). The ravine through which it flows is still the "locum valles in prærupta demerse satia horribilis et periculosum" which it was in the days of Jerome (Onom.).

The Roman road from Rabbah to Dhibiyan crosses it at about two hours' distance from the town. It is marked by a remnant on the northern edge, directly opposite, those still bearing the name of Ar'ar. See AROER. Burckhardt was the first to give a satisfactory account of this river under the name which it now bears. It rises in the mountains of Gilead near Kafarane, whence it pursues a circuitous course of about forty miles, and reaches the sea. It flows in a rocky bed, and, at the part visited by Burckhardt, in a channel so deep and precipitous as to appear inaccessible (comp. Soesten, Monat. Correspond., viii, 493; yet along this, winding among huge fragments of rock, lies the most frequented road, and, being not far from Dibon, probably not taken by the Israelites. The descent into the valley from the south took Irzy and Mangals (Letters, p. 461) one hour and a half; the descent from the north took Burckhardt (Syria, p. 872) thirty-five minutes. The last-named traveller declares that he had never felt such suffocating heat as he experienced in this valley from the concentrated rays of the sun and their reflection from the rocks. The stream is almost dried up in summer; but huge masses of rock, torn from the banks, and deposited high above the channel, eviscerate its fullness and impotency in the rainy season. Irzy and Mangals suppose that it is this which renders the valley of the Arnon less fertile than that of most other valleys in the country. "There are, however, a few tamarisks, and here and there are cedars growing about it."

On each face of the ravine traces of the paved Roman road are still found, with milestones, and one arch of a bridge, 31 feet 6 inches in span, is standing. The stream runs through a level strip of grass some 40 yards in width, with a few oasises and willows on the margin. Lieut. Lynch describes it as "a considerable stream of water, clear, fresh, and moderately cool, and having some small fish in it" (Expedition, p. 299). Where it bursts into the Dead Sea this stream is 82 feet wide and 4 feet deep, flowing through a chasm with perpendicular sides of red, brown, and yellow sandstone, 300 feet wide. It then runs through the delta in a S.W. course, narrowing as it goes, and is 10 feet where its waters meet those of the Dead Sea (Lynch, Report, May 8, 1847, p. 20).

According to the information given to Burckhardt, its principal source is near Katrane, on the Ha' route. Hence, under the name of Sa'al el-Salibeh, it flows N. W. to its junction with the Wady el-Lejmun, one hour of Asar, and then as W. Mojeb, more directly W. to the Dead Sea. The Wadj el-Lejmub receives on the north the streams of the W. Waleh, and on the south those of W. Sehik and W. Salibeh. At its junction with the Lejm (W. Enkeliah) it is a piece of parture-ground, in the midst of which stands a hill with ruins on it (Burck. p. 574). May not these ruins be the site of the mysterious "city that is in the midst of the river" (Josh. xii, 9, 16; Deut. ii, 86) so often coupled with Arnon?

From the above description of the ravine, it is plain that that city cannot have been situated immediately below Aror, as has been conjectured.

Arnold, bishop of Lisieux, born at the beginning of the twelfth century, died August 8th, 1168. He made fruitless efforts to reconcile V. and F. The earliest style of enthusiasm in England with Archbishop Thomas of Canterbury. In his old age he resigned his bishopric, and retired to the abbey of St Victor of Paris, where he died. We have from him a volume of epistles, of discourses, and epigrams (Epistolae, Consociationes, et Epigrammata, published by J. Meniti, Paris, 1686, 8vo. which contains interesting details on the history of canon law and discipline during his time. He is also the author of some poems, and of an essay on the schism which followed the death of Honorius II (published in the Bibliotheca Francorum, and the Scriptaigum d'Archery).—Hoefer, Biogr. Crit. et lit., iii. 329.

Arzulphus, Sr., bishop of Metz. In 609, at the concord of Trier, he was consecrated bishop. But in 612 his wife took the veil in the monastery of Trier. In 644, the bishopric of Metz becoming vacant, the people insisted on having Arzulphus for their bishop. As bishop he managed his diocese with rare excellence, and was made by King Clotaire prime minister of his son Dagobert, and the one who had associated with him in the empire. Upon the death of Clotaire, Arzulphus retired into a solitude, where he passed the rest of his life in prayer and mortification, and in every work of charity. He died in 641, and his relics are preserved in the abbey of St. Arnoul de Metz. He is commemorated on the 16th of August. —Baillet, Histoire des Saints, Aug. 16; Landon, Eccl. Dictionary, i. 547.

In Isa. xvi, 2, "cities of Aroth" are mentioned; which some think should be translated "ruined cities," as Aroth was not a metropolis, but the name probably stands as a representative of the two towns in that region.

Ar'pad (Isa. xxxvi, 19; xxvii, 13) or Ar'phad (Heb. Ar'pad; גֶּרֶד, perhaps a support; but see below; Sept. in 2 Kings Αρπαδία, elsewhere Αρπαδία, in Isa. x, 9 undistinguishable), a Syrian city, having its own army (2 Kings xiv, 10; Isa. xx, 30), in the neighborhood of Hamath (2 Kings xvii, 34; Isa. x, 9; xxvii, 19) and Damascus (Jer. xlix, 23), with both of which it appears to have been conquered by the Assyrians under Sennacherib. Michaels and others see Arphad in Ἀρφάνα or Ἀρφάνια of the Greek geographers (Ptol. v, 12; Stephan. Byzant. in Ἀρφάνια). Joseph. War, v, i, 3; vii, 5, 1), which was a day's journey west of Hamath (Mannert, VI, 1, 481). Paulus (Comment. in Isa. x, 9) thinks it was a city in the neighborhood of the Tigris and Euphrates. Some, however, are content to find this Arphad in the Arpka (Ἀρπκα) which Josephus (War, iii, 3, 5) mentions as situated near Delos and opposite the island of Aegina, the most probable name of Herod Agrippa's tetrarchy; also called Artka (Ἀρτκα) or Aryba by other ancient writers (Reißen, Palast., p. 564). But it seems best (with Döderlein and others) to refer it to the Phoenician island city Ar'ad or Aradus (q. v.), which was opposite Hamath (the interchange of B and v being very natural).

Arpha. See ARPAD.

Arphrase'd (Heb. Ar'pakhah'd, אֲרַפָּךְ; see below; Sept. and N. T. Arpahc'ad, Josephus Arpach'ath), the name of two men.

1. The first post-diluvian patriarch, son of Semem and father of Shem; born one year after the end of the Deluge, and died B.C. 2675, at the age of 438 years (Gen. xi, 10-13; 1 Chron. i, 17, 18; Luke iii, 38). From Gen. x, 22, 24, it appears that the region settled by this patriarch's descendants likewise took his name. The conjecture of Bochart (Pales., ii, 4) has been adopted by several others (Michaels, Suppl., p. 129; Orient. Bibl. xvii, 77 sq.); Mannert, v, 439), that it is the province Arravakhd (Ἀρράβακχος) in northern Assyria, near Armenia (Ptol. vii, 1), the primitive country of the Chaldeans (Josephus, Ant., i, 6, 4; comp. Sanch. Chron. i, 46), and the province of the same name (κατα Αρραβακχου). The name is also found of the latter part of the name of Arpaxad (Aρράκαδ), the first part being referred by Michaels (Spicileig. i, 73 sq.) to an Arabic root signifying boundary (q. d., border of the Chaldeans), but with as little felicity (see Tuch, Gen. p. 256) as the derivation by Erwald (Jr. Gesch. i, 583) from another Arabic root signifying to bind (q. d., a fortress of the Chaldeans). (See Gesenius, Comment. ad. Jean. xxiii, 13; and comp. N REFERENCES, Gesenius, p. 414, note 4.) Bohlen (Gen. in loc.), with even less probability, compares the Sanscrit ṣr̥paḥkaḥa, a (a land) by the side of Asia; comp. Porusia, l. q. Porus, l. e. near the Russians. (See Schlözer in the Repert. f. bibl. Lit., viii, 173; Lengerke, Karam, i, 211; Knobel, Völker- und Gesch. Griech. Gesch., i, 165).

2. A king of Media at Ecbatan, which city he had fortified during an open campaign and siege by his contemporary Nebuchadnezzar (Judith, i, 1 sq.). From the connection of the name with Ecbatan he has been frequently identified with Deioces (Τασίαζον), the founder of Ecbatan (Herod. i, 6), but as Deioces does not exist, the genealogy is here to look for the original of Arpaxad in his son Phraates (Τασίαζον), who greatly extended the Median empire, and at last fell in a battle with the Assyrians. B.C. 683 (Herod. i, 102). But this would disagree with the date and circumstances of Nebuchadnezzar; moreover, the half-fabulous book of Judith abounds with statements respecting the Median kings scarcely reconcilable with genuine history. See MEDIA; JU ARRAHON. Nebrahr (Georg. Ausser's, p. 32) endeavors to identify the name with the "Arr'aghes" of Ashdodah, the common title of the Median dynasty, and refers the events to a war in the twelfth year of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, B.C. 692 (Ibid. p. 212, 260). See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

Arráhbon (ἀρραβων, earnest or pledge). The early church used a great variety of expressions to describe the elements of bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, and among the rest, the expressions ἀρραβων and ἀρραβῶν τῆς μικρὸνς σωτηρίας, earnest of the life to come, probably with reference to 2 Cor. i, 22; v, 5; and Eph. i, 14. See EARNET. The Arrabhonari were sacramentarians in the 16th century who held that the bread and wine in the Eucharist are neither the real body and blood of Christ, nor the signs of them, but only the pledge and earnest thereof.—Far Arricaga, Pablo José de (a Spanish Jesuit), born at Logroño, Spain, Jan. 17, 1862. At fourteen he entered the order of Jesuits, and afterward taught philosophy and theology at Valladolid and Salamanca. He was sent to Portugal in 1884, and taught theology there till 1887. He was a man of great acuteness of mind, and had deservedly a great reputation in his day for his learning and skill in dogmatic theology. He died at Prague June 16, 1767. Bayle hints that he was inclined to Pyrrhonism. Among his writings are Cursus Philosophicus (Antwerp, 1828, fol.); Disput. Theol. in summam Aquinatis (8 vols. fol., 1643-1655; and again at Lyons, 1689).—Bayle, Dictionnary, s. v.; Walch, Bibliotheca, i, 120; Tottel, Script. Sac., 1729.

Arrow. There are several words thus rendered in the English Bible, namely, properly γιφτος (chetha, from its sharpness), of frequent occurrence (rendered "dart" in Prov. vii, 17; rendered "dagger," Job xxxiv, 6; a stab," by an error of transcription for ταρταρος, the haft of a spear, 1 Sam. xvii, 7), with its derivatives γιφτος (chetha), 1 Sam. xx, 36, 37, 38; 2 Kings ix, 24); and γιφτος (chetha), Psa. Ixxvii, 17; elsewhere "gravel); poetically γιφτας (re'srakh, Psa. Ixxvii, 81, lightning, as it is elsewhere rendered), and γιφτος (ben-shekoth, i. e. son of a bow, Job ii, 28). Among the Hebrews arrows were probably first made of reed, as common among the Egyptians; subsequently they were made from some light sort of wood, and tipped with an iron point. Whether they were ever dipped in poison is not clear from Job vi, 4; Deut. xxxi, 24. They were often composed, in part, of the shrub γιφτος (i.e. the thorn), "juniper," which was discharging from the bow while on fire, kindled upon the baggage or armament of the enemy (Psa. cxx, 4; Job xxx, 17). Hence arrows are sometimes put tropically for lightnings (Deut. xxxxi, 23, 42; Psa. vii, 13; Zech. ix, 14). Arrows were used in war as well as in hunting (Gen. ix, 20; Deut. xxvii, 20, 29). They were kept in a case called a quiver (q. v.), which was slung over the shoulder in such a position that the soldier could draw them out when needed (Psa. xci, 5; cxx, 4). See BOW. They were also used in divination (Ezek. xxii, 21). See DIVINATION. The arrows of the ancient Egyptians varied from 22 to 64 fitches in length; some were of wood, others of reed; frequently tipped with a metal head, and winged with three feathers, gilded longitudinally, and at equal distances, upon the other end of the shaft, as on modern arrows. Sometimes, instead of the metal head, a piece of hard wood was inserted into the reed, which terminated in a long tapering point; but these were of too light and powerless a nature to be employed in war, and could only have been intended for the chase; in others, the place of the metal was supplied by a small piece of flint or other sharp stone, secured by a firm black paste; and, although used occasionally in battle, they appear from the sculptures to have belonged more particularly to the huntsman; while the arrows of archers are generally represented with bronze heads, some barbed, others triangular, and many with three or four projecting blades placed at right angles and meeting in a common point (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 565). The ancient Assyrians appear also to have used arrows made of reeds, which were kept in a quiver slung over the back. The bars of iron and copper, several of which have been discovered among the ruins (Layard, Nineveh, ii, 268). See ARROW.

Metal Heads of Ancient Egyptian Arrows.

The word "arrow" is frequently used as the symbol of calamity or disease inflicted by God (Job vi, 4; xxxiv, 6; Psa. xxxviii, 2; Deut. xxxii, 23; comp. Ezek. v, 16; Zech. ix, 16). The metaphor thus applied was also in use among the heathen (Ovid, Ep. xvi, 275). It derived its propriety and force from the popular belief that all diseases were immediate and special visitations from heaven. Lightnings are, by a very fine figure, described as the arrows of God (Psa. xxviii, 14; exlv, 6; Habak. iii, 11; compare Wisd. v, 21; 2 Sam. xxii, 16). "Arrow" is occasionally used to denote some sudden or inevitable danger, as in Psa. xci, 5: "The arrow that flieth by day." It is also figurative of any thing injurious, as a deceitful tongue (Psa. cxxix, 4; Jer ix, 7), a bitter word (Psa. lxiv, 8), a false testimony (Prov. xxv, 18). As symbolical of oral wrong the figure may perhaps have been derived from the darting "arrowy tongue" of serpents. The arrow, however, is not always symbolical of evil. In Psa. cxxvii, 4, 5, well-conditioned children are compared to "arrows in the hands of a mighty man, i.e. instruments of power and action. The arrow is also used in a good sense to denote the efficient and irresistible energy of the word of God in the hands of the Messiah (Psa. xlv, 6; Isa. xliv, 2; comp. Lwth. note thereon). Arrowsmith, John, D.D., a Puritan divine, was born at Newcastle, March 20, 1602, and died Feb. 1658. He was educated at Cambridge, became minister at Lynn, and afterward in London. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly, and afterward master of St. John's College and of Trinity College, Cambridge. Of his numerous writings, the most important are Armilla Catechetica, a christ of theological apologists (Cambr. 1659, 4to.)—Tacitae Sacrae, de militie episcopii aegyptii pugnante, vincente et triumphanti, dissertatio (Cantab. 1657, 4to). See Brook, Lives of the Puritans, iii, 315; Neal, History of the Puritans, iii, 116; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 71.

Ar'sacidae (Ar'asacidae), prob. of Persian or Armenian origin, Pott, Etymol. Forschungen, ii, 172), the name of the founder of the Parthian empire (Justin. xii, 5, 5), and hence borne by his successors, the Arsacids (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.). The name occurs in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xiv, 2, 3; xv, 22) as that of the king of Parthia and Media (Diod. Sic. Excerpt. p. 567, ed. Wessel), B.C. 158. The Syrian king Darius (12) Nicator, having invaded his country, at first obtained several advantages. Media declared for him, and the Elymean, Persians, and Bactrians joined him; but Arsaces having sent one of his officers to him, under pretence of treating for peace, he fell into an ambush, his army was cut off by the Persians, and he himself fell into the hands of Arsaces (Josephus, Ant. xiii, 5, 11). As Arsaces is the common name of all the Parthian kings (Strabo, xv, 702), and of many Armenian (see Koeggen in the Haiti. Encyclop. v, 408 sq.), the one here intended is probably Arsaces VI, properly named Mithridates (or Phraates) I, a prince of distinguished bravery, who conquered Bactria, penetrated India, reduced the Medes and Persians, and greatly improved the condition of the Parthian empire (Justin. xxxvi, 1; xxxviii, 9; xlii, 6. Oros. v, 4; Strabo, xii, 516, 517, 524 sq.). Mithridates treated his prisoner Demetrius with respect, and gave him his daughter in marriage (App. Syr. 67), but kept him in confinement till his own death, cir. B.C. 150 (App. Syr. 69, 70). See Mithridates IV. The reference to him in the Maccabees is, however, somewhat confused (see Wernsdorf, De did. Maccab. p. 175).

Ar'saroth (Lat. Arsaroth, for the Greek text is not extant), a region beyond the Euphrates, apparently of great extent if the fanciful passage (2 Vulg. 4) Esdr. xiii, 40) where alone it occurs can be relied upon as historical.

Arsenal. The ancient Hebrews had each man his own arms, because all went to the war; they had no arsenals or magazines of arms, because they had no regular troops or soldiers in constant pay. See Amy. There were no arsenals in Israel till the reigns of David and Solomon. See AMOR. David made a large collection of arms and consecrated them to the Lord in his tabernacle (1 Sam. xxvi, 9; 2 Sam. viii, 7-12; 1 Chron. xxvi, 26, 27). The high-priest Jehoiada took them out of the treasury of the temple to arm the people and Levites on the day of the young king Josiah's elevation to the throne (2 Chron. xxiii, 9). Solomon collected a great quantity of arms in his palace of the forest of Lebanon, and established well-provided arsenals in all the cities of Judah, which he fortified (2 Chron. xi, 12). He sometimes compelled the conquered and tributary people to forge arms for him (1 Kings x, 25). Uzziah not only furnished his arsenals with the older son, shield, cuisses, sword, bow, and slings, but also with such machines as were proper for sieges (2 Chron. xxvi, 14, 15). Hezekiah had the same precaution; he also made stores of arms of all sorts (2 Chron. xxxii, 5); comp. 2 Kings xiii, 13). Jonathan and Simon Maccabeus had arsenals stored with the sword, spear, and shield; a large quantity of weapons taken from their enemies, but others which they had purchased or commissioned to be forged for them (1 Macc. x, 21; xiv, 28, 42; 2 Macc. viii, 27; xvi, 21). See ARMOY.

Arseniæ, an anchoret, born at Rome in 350; died in 445. While a deacon of the Church of Rome, he was chosen, in 383, by Pope Damasus as tutor of Arcanæ, the son of Theodosius I, and arcæ, the son of Theodosius II. They did not succeed in the education of this prince, he quit the court, and penetrated into the desert of Said (Thebas), where he remained until his death. Arsenius is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on July 19 (Hoehler, Biographie Générale, ii, 369).

Arseniæ, Antipater, head of a monastery in Nicopolis, near Ephesus. He was a hermit. As a monk, he was pointed Greek patriarch about 1255, and ordained deacon, priest, and patriarch in the same week. On the death of Th. Lascaris II he was charged with the tutelage of his son John. Michael Paleologus, aiming at the sole authority, put out the eyes of the young prince, and Arsenius excommunicated him, and refused to hold the sentence of excommunication in favor of the legitimate heir. Paleologus refused. Arsenius remaining firm, a synod held in Constanti- nople, 1264, deposed him. He died on an island in the Propontis in 1267. Here he wrote his Ecclesiæ Graecæ Monumenta (Paris, 1881, 4to); and also Synopsis Deaconica, published in Justinian's Bibliotheca Jur. Canum vol. ii (Paris, 1601).—Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 1255.

Arsenius of Elasko, a dignitary of the Greek Church, lived toward the close of the 17th century. He is the author of a "History of the Variations of the Greek Church." From the introduction of Christianity into Russia (992) until 1387, this church was governed by metropolitans dependent on the foreign patriarchs. In 1387, Job, the first Russian patriarch, was consecrated by Jeremiah II, patriarch of Constantinople; and this form of ecclesiastical government continued until 1706, when the Czar put himself at the head of the Russian Church. The details which Arsenius gives us on these "variations in the Greek Church" have been printed in 1749, in the first part of the Catalogue of Manuscripts of Turin. A Latin translation was given in 1820 by Wichmann, in his Sammlung kleiner Schriften.—Hoehler, Biographie Universelle, iii, 570.

Art, Sacred.—Art is the embodiment of aesthetic feeling in the religious sphere. The Fine Arts—or the different methods of this embodiment—are classified into two great divisions: (1) those that reach the soul through the channel of the eye, termed the formative arts (in German, the bildende Künste); and (2) those that reach the soul through the channel of the ear (termed in German the redende Künste, but for which we have no exact equivalent word). Art is a form of faith that belongs to all the religious systems that have sought expression in aesthetic or artistic forms. Especially has this been the case with the highest emotions of the heart—the religious. In return, the propagators of all religions have availed themselves of aesthetic forms and modes of presenting their doctrines and creeds to the consciences and hearts of men; some employing all the fine arts, others only a part of them. Thus has been developed religious art, both pagan and sacred. Sacred art, or that of revealed religion, divides itself into (1) Jewish and (2) Christian.

I. Jewish. Under the Old-Testament covenant, the arts of architecture, music, poetry, dancing (and, to a limited degree, sculpture) were tolerated, if not encouraged, in the worship of God. For Architecture, Music, and Poetry, see the separate articles, in which we treat of art mostly in its restricted, popular significance, embracing only the formative arts of painting and sculpture. That the second commandment was not intended to prohibit the use of all artistic representations is as often supposed, as that what referred to the worshipping and worshipping of idols, is shown by the fact that Moses himself had images of churmbim made for the service of the tabernacle, and that in the Temple of Solomon the churmbim retained their place over the mercy-seat, and the molten sea rested upon twelve oxen, and the base of the sea was adorned with figures of churmbim, oxen, and lions, while carvings of churmbim, palms, and flowers covered many of the doors, pillars, and walls of the interior of the temple. The golden candlestick was also adorned with knobs of flowers, and the garments of the priests were richly embroidered. In short, no pains were spared to make the temple glorious, not only by its rich and gorgeous construction, but also by its truly aesthetic character. See Arts, Jewish (below).

II. Christian.—1. First Period (1st to 4th centuries). The earliest Christians made use in their worship, of all the arts, and poetry, and sculpture, and architecture, and by the second and third centuries they availed themselves of painting and sculpture in their retired places of worship and burial in the catacombs. As the societies increased in numbers and wealth, and, by the cessation of persecution, were permitted to build churches above-ground, and more especially on Christianity being declared the religion of the state, architecture was used, and soon, in its most impressive forms, gave dignity and attractiveness to the house of God. The first period of Christian, as of all other arts, was one of symbolism. The letters X ρ and A ω were placed on the tombs and vessels of the sanctuary. Then appeared the mystical cycle of the Passion, as pictured before the eyes of the beholder. The Passion was represented by a fish carved and painted. See Ichthys. Christ was introduced as the Good Shepherd, etc. See Chist, Images of. The parables of the New Testament were introduced with parallel scenes or subjects from the Old Testament, evincing a deep feeling for scriptural types and allegory. Plants and animals were used symbolically, and symbols of Christian doctrine and life were drawn from the pagan mythology of the Greeks and Romans. A study of the doctrine, customs, and spirit of the early church, as shown in its monuments of art, is a most useful complement to the systematic study of the history of art. See Christian Archaeology. The composition and execution of the paintings and sculptures in the catacombs are far superior to those of the immediately succeeding ages; but the artists lived among the finest works of Greek and Roman art, and drew from them their technical knowledge. At the same time, they were inspired by the deep emotions of the new Christian faith.

2. Second Period (4th to 12th centuries).—As church edifices were erected, the arts that had sprang up in the catacombs were transplanted to the stately houses of God, and, though subordinate to the architecture, were never less than consistent with their monumental character and use, but not without remonstrance from some of the synods. See ICONOCLASM. Mosaic painting gradually supplanted the fresco style, and in the Byzantine churches was applied with all the splendor of the Oriental fancy. The Greek Church permitted only the edifices of its capital, but it developed a style of painting marked, in its best periods, by the dignity of its composition, the grandeur of the outlines, and the expressiveness of its figures and the brilliancy of its colors. Later, the composition of the mystic cycles of painting that adorned the walls of the churches, and even of the altar-pieces, was prescribed by the theologians; the colors to be used had their symbolical doctrinal significance, and were also prescribed. This led to the stiffness of drawing, and the deadness of all art feeling, that marks the Byzantine school after the eighth century.

In the Western Church painting and sculpture rapidly grew to a most degraded technical condition. Among the most important works of the period are the mosaic paintings of Ravenna and Rome, and the bronze doors of Amalfi and Verona. Both in its technical knowledge, and in the rules of its composition, the Byzantine school influenced the arts, not only of Italy, but of all Europe, especially that of South France.

3. Third Period (13th to 16th centuries) — The extraordinary activity of the twelfth century in Europe extended to every department of life, and gave a great impulse to the fine arts, as a means in the hands of the church to teach its doctrines. The purest religious feeling still animated the artists, who, for piety of life, were often reckoned superior to many of the priests or other persons in holy orders. Indeed the artists often were themselves of the holy orders. Gradually (first in Tuscany) the sombre color, the formal composition and stiffness of figure of the decadent Byzantine style, gave way to better drawing, freer treatment, and relief. Italy was the first to revive ancient Christian church architecture, and assimilate the religious character and technical merits, reached its highest climax under such artists as Cimabue, Giotto, Orcagna, and Fra Angelico. In Italy fresco painting kept its predominance in the church edifice, and largely modified the architecture. In other parts of Europe, especially during the Gothic period, sculpture gained a large predominance over painting, and was confined mostly to adorning the windows with biblical scenes and subjects. The progress in sculpture was perhaps more tardy than that of painting. Its first works of excellence were carvings in ivory on vessels of the sanctuary (often of complicated composition). The doors, columns, pulpits, altars, and baptismal fonts were covered with bronze or marble works, often of great merit. Giotto and the Pisano (18th century) marked the first great epoch of progress in sculpture, and introduced a perfection of composition and execution hardly excelled in later times, and never surpassed for religious spirit.

During the Gothic period architecture schools of sculpture grew up in most countries of Europe, and sculpture was profusely distributed in every part of the church edifice, especially in the exterior.

4. Fourth Period (16th to 19th centuries). — The introduction of the use of oil in painting, the invention of color photography, and the present revolution of the age, in the adoration of the ancients, the departure from classicism, the decadence of Christian life in the church, all contributed to change the character of Christian art. What was gained in technical knowledge was lost in inspiration. After the sublime compositions of the massive genius of Michael Angelo in the Sistine Chapel and the Transfiguration by Raphael, religious art fell from its pure character of the previous century into a depth of sensuousness and extravagance. For the next century, what then existed that was noble in art was to be sought mostly north of the Alps. During the eighteenth century an almost entire blank marks the history of religious art.

5. Fifth Period (18th century).—At the beginning of this century art had sunk (like the society of the age) to the lowest sensuousness, and was separated almost entirely from its divine mission. Overbeck, Cornelius, and Schnorr, in Germany, tried to stem the tide, and return art to the mission it filled from the first. The second half of the century witnessed a reaction seconded later by such artists as Ary Scheffer and Flandrin in France, and Holman Hunt, and Millais in England. The Cyclos of Revelation, now being prepared by Cornelius at Berlin, is perhaps the most complete work of Christian art ever undertaken. Sculpture has not been imbued as much as painting with the religious feeling of its earlier history.

6. Protestant Art. — The Roman Church has always availed itself of all the fine arts in its worship. The Protestant Church in Germany, while cutting away every work of Roman tendency, has always retained a free use of the arts of painting and sculpture, which were not regarded as necessarily in bad condition. The Netherlands and England as inherently Puritan in nature and tendency, and as opposed to the second commandment. America has inherited this feeling from the two countries (Holland and England) from which she was colonized. The art of engraving, however, is freely used in both countries to illustrate religious books and periodicals, and even the Bible itself, though the same work would give offence if painted upon the walls of a church. In the Church of England there is a strong tendency to return to the use of sculpture and painting in filling up the walls of the cathedral and other churches.

7. The history of religious art has recently been studied with great zeal. In the Roman Church generally the opinion prevails that a return to the art of the Middle Ages, and that alone, can bring back the golden age of art. Art associations are especially numerous in France and Germany, the literature on religious art is becoming very extensive, and periodicals exist in most of the religious countries of both countries. The Protestant churches of Germany are generally in favor of making a more extended use of art for religious purposes than has been the case heretofore. The church diet of Elberfeld, in 1851, discussed the question of Protestant Art Unions, and in 1853 the Evangelical theological societies of the country. In 1858, a paper (Christliches Kunstblatt) devoted to the cultivation of religious art from a Protestant point of view was established by Schnase, the author of the best "History of Plastic Art," in connection with Schnorr von Karolfsfeld, the director of the art-gallery in Dresden, and Grünewein, court preacher at Stuttgart.

8. Literature. — The best work on the history of Christian art, though not extending over the entire field, is Schnase, Geschichte der bildenden Künste (Düsseldorf, 1844-69). Other works: Kugler, Handbuch der Kunstgeschichte (Stuttgart, 3d ed. 1858; English translation [partial] in Bohn's "Manual of Sculpture, Paint, Arch., etc., and mod., Lond. 1850"); Kinkel, Geschichte der bildenden Künste bei den Christlichen Völkern (Bonn, 1843); Lord Lindsay, Sketches of the History of Christian Art (Lond. 1847, 3 vols. 8vo); Geschichte der Malerei (Berlin, 1847, translated into English); Löhrke, Kunstgeschichte (Stuttgart, 2d ed. 1852); Principles of the Art of Painting (London, 1829); Piper, Mythologie und Symbolik der Christlichen Kunst (Weimar, 1851-56); Mrs. Jameson, Legends of Christian Art, etc. (Bost. 1866); Wornum, Epochs of Painting (London, 1865); Jarve, Art Studies (N. Y. 1861).

ART, Jewish (אַרְט, madsh, "work, as elsewhere rendered), Exod. xxxv, 25; 2 Chron. xvi, 14 (רִיבֵה, elsewhere "craft," "occupation"); Acts xvii, 29; Wisdom xiv, 4; xvii, 7 (πηγαν, "work"); Eccles. xlix, 1 (פַּנָּו, to do, "craft"); II Kings xiv, 6. (See Craftsmen, II Hist. of Anc. and Mod. Art, Edinb. 1848; Rochette, Lectures on Anc. Art, Lond. 1854; Gugler, Kunst der Hebräer, Landsbut, 1614; De Saulcy, Histoire de l'Art Judéeque, Par. 1858.) See Artificers.

The rudiments of the arts, which are now among civilized nations brought to such an admirable state of perfection as also among savage nations, whence we infer that they must have originated partly in necessity and partly in accident. At first their processes were doubtless very imperfect and very limited; but the inquisitive and active mind of man, impelled by his wants, soon enlarged and improved them. Accordingly, in the fourth generation from Adam, we find mention made of "Tobal-Cain, an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron;" and also of Jubal, as "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ;" but in the fragments of antediluvian history preserved by Moses, there is nothing more explicit on this subject, as the book of Genesis appears to be describing only the construction of temples and palaces, but the people were unskilled in the art of metal. In the Mosaic legislation. See Antediluvians. The first man undoubtedly kept his children and other descendants about him as long as possible, and exercised paternal authority over them. Cain was the first who separated from his father's society, and he was scourged through a fear of punishment for the murder of his brother. In the course of time various motives, such as a desire to obtain land for cultivation or pasture for cattle, might induce others to follow his example. Thus there arose separate families, which were governed by their own patriarchs. When families had increased to tribes and nations, we find that each tribe, under the direction of a headman, took charge of the improvement of the arts. (See Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, 1st series, 4th week, Sat.) The family of Noah preserved the knowledge of the first principles of civil society and of the infant arts which had existed before the Deluge, and as early as the time of Jacob it appears that the laboring class comprehended husbandmen, mechanics, artists, and merchants. Egypt, in the early ages of the world, excelled all other nations in a knowledge of the arts, as may be sufficiently proved by the extraordinary magnitude and permanency of the Egyptian monuments, the magnificent tombs they erected to their gods, and the splendid obelisks erected in honor of their kings. The learning of the Egyptians has been made known to us by the sacred historian. By this record we have been taught to believe in the wisdom of this ancient people, and to feel astonishment at the nature of their institutions, the extent of their learning, and the perfection they had attained in the arts at so early a period. Moses, it is true, did not enact any special laws in favor of the arts among the Hebrews, nor did he interdict or endeavor to lessen them in the estimation of the people, but, on the contrary, speaks in praise of artificers (Exod. xxxv, 20, 25). The descendants of Jacob having lived in Egypt, they and their neighbors of Mizraim, "until another king arose and new men, Joseph," they undoubtedly borrowed from them many of their instruments of agriculture, of commerce, and of luxury, and as the artists of Egypt descended to depict the minutest particulars of their household arrangements, and every circumstance connected with the life of their kings, whether with honor or with humiliation, represented, we have the means of forming a judgment respecting the arts and usages which prevailed among the Hebrews. See Egypt. No one can pretend to doubt that the scriptural narrative is singularly illustrated and confirmed by the monuments. A rich vein of illustration is thus opened by comparing the various processes depicted on those monuments with the state-

ARTAXERXES

ARTAXERXES, the Greek form (Αρτάκσηρης) of the name, or rather title, of several Persian kings (on each of which see fully in Smith's Dict. of Classical Biog. s. v.), and applied in the Auth. Vs. to several of them occurring in the annals of T. T. The Hebrew form (Ar- tachshat, נְרָטָכָשַת, Ezra vii, 1, 7; or Artach- askath; נְרָטָכָשָׁת, Ezra iv, 8, 11, 26; vii, 14; once Artakshashth, נְרָטָכָשָׁת, Ezra vii, 7; Sept. Αρτακσάς) is a slight corruption of נְרָטָכָשַת, which letters De Sacy has deciphered in the decipherments of Nakhel Perse, and he localizes Artakshat (Antiq. d. L. Persae, p. 100). Geessens pronounces them Artachshat; and, by assuming the easy change of r into s, and the transposition of the s, makes Artachshat very closely represent its prototype (Thee. Heb. p. 155). The word is a compound, the first element of which, arsa—found in several Persian names—is generally admitted to mean great; the latter part being the Zend khahetvîna, king (Lassen, in the Zeitschrift für d. Kunde d. Morgenl. vi, 161 sqq.). Thus the sense of great warrior (gariyaq arijn) which Herodotus (vi, 98) assigned to the Greek form Artaxerxes, accords with that of great orator which (see Lassen, Keilschrift, p. 86) discovers in the original Persian title (particularly when we consider that as the king could only be chosen by a vote—therefore a candidate for the throne, warrior and king are so far cognate terms); although Pott, according to his etymology of Xerxes, takes Artaaxerxes to be more equivalent to Artachastra—to be "magus regum rexem" (Etym. Forsch. i, p. lvii.).

Ancient Assyrian. Hieroglyphs of the name Artaxerxes.

1. The Persian king who, at the instigation of the adversaries of the Jews, obstructed the rebuilding of the Temple, from his time to that of Darius, king of Persia (Ezra iv, 7-24). The monarch here referred to is probably (see Izaburus) not Cambyses (as Josephus says, Ant. xi, 2, 2), but the immediate predecessor of Darius, who was the Magian impostor Smerdis (Sapir), who seized on the throne B.C. 522, and was murdered after a usurpation of less than eight months (Herod. iii, 61-78). Profane historians, indeed, have not been altogether under the title of Artaxerxes; but neither do Herodotus and Justin (the latter of whom calls him Oroastes, § 2) agree in his name (see Bertheau, Gesch. d. Art. p. 207). See Smerdis.

2. As to the second Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of whose reign Ezra led a second council of the Jewish exiles back to Jerusalem (Ezra vii, 1 sqq.), the opinions are divided between Xerxes (with Michaelis in loc.; Jahn, Ezin. ii, i, 276; Archæol. ii, i, 529; De Wette, Ezin., § 105, and others) and his son Artaxerxes Longimanus (so H. Michaelis; Offerhaus; Eichhorn, Ezin., iii, 697; Bertholdt, Ezin. iii, 989; Gesenius, Theosur. p. 166; Kleinhert, in the Dorpat. Beitr. i, 1; Keil, Chron. p. 108; Archard, Chronology, p. 128, and many others). Ant. xi, 5, 6 speaks of Xerxes; but, from various considerations (chiefly because the first portion of the book of Ezra relates to Darius Hystaspis, it does not follow that the next king spoken of must be his successor Xerxes; that Nehemiah's absence of twelve years is ample to allow the confusion in the infant colony under the merely moral sway of Ezra; and that Josephus likewise confounds the Artaxerxes of Nehemiah with Xerxes, while the author of the apocryphal version of Eadras [1 Esr. ii, 17; vii, 4; viii, 8] correctly calls both these kings Arta-xerxes, a name, moreover, more like the Heb. form, and in that case not conflicting with the distinctive title of Xerxes in Ezin., § 105, and in Synell. Chron. p. 251) he is the same with the third Artaxerxes, the Persian king who, in the twentieth year of his reign, considerably allowed Nehemiah to go to Jerusalem for the furtherance of purely national objects, invested him with the government of his own people, and allowed him to remain there for twelve years (Neh. ii, 1 sqq.; x, 14). It is almost unanimously agreed that the king here intended is Artaxerxes Longimanus (Aprapulis; otherwise Apriapiis, Bähr ad Cen. p. 166, 175). See Nehemiah. As this prince began to reign B.C. 466, the restoration under Ezra was in B.C. 459, and the first under Nehemiah in B.C. 446. See Ezra, vii, 1 sqq., viii, 1 sqq.; Artaxerxes, i, 526, 1850, p. 495. Others (as J. D. Michaelis) understand Arta-xerxes Memnon (reigned B.C. 404-359) to be meant (comp. Neh. xiii, 28, with Josephus, Ant., xi, 8, 8 and 4); but Bertholdt (Einds. iii, 1014) shows that the age of Eliasib (q. v.) will not allow this (comp. Neh. iii, 1, with xil, 1, 10); for Eliasib, who was high-priest when Nehemiah reached Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 1), i. e. on this last supposition, B.C. 885, was grandson of Jeshua (Neh. xii, 10), high-priest in the time of Zerubabel (Ezra iii, 3), B.C. 586. We cannot think that the high-priest of the grandfather of Ezra could possibly have continued his rule for 150 years. Besides, as Ezra and Nehemiah were contemporaries (Neh. viii, 9), this theory transfers the whole history contained in Ezra vii, ad fin., and Nehemiah to this date, and it is hard to believe that in this critical period of Jewish annals there are no events recorded between the reigns of Darius Hystaspis (Ezra iv) and Artaxerxes Memnon. If, however, it may be observed, there are again some who maintain that as Darius Hystaspis is the king in the sixth chapter of Ezra, the king mentioned next after him, at the be-inning of the seventh, must be Xerxes, and thus they distinguish three Persian kings called Artaxerxes in the Old Testament, (1) the Memnon in Ezra iv, (2) Xerxes in Ezra vii, and (3) Artaxerxes Longimanus in Nehemiah. But in addition to the arguments above it is almost demonstrable that Xerxes is the Abasaurus of the book of Esther (see Izaburus), and it is hard to suppose that besides his ordinary name he would have been known both as Abasaurus and as Artaxerxes in the O. T. It seems, too, very probable that the policy of Neh. ii was a continuation and renewal of that of Ezra vii, and that the same king was the author of both. Now it is not possible for Xerxes to be the Arta-xerxes of Nehemiah, as Josephus asserts (Ant. xi, 5, 6), for Xerxes only reigned 21 years, whereas Ne-ARTAXERXES I, surnamed Longimanus (Gr. Maγοκες, long-handed), from the circumstance that his right hand was longer than his left (Plutarch. Artax.

1), was king of Persia for forty years, B.C. 465-425 [strictly 466-425] (Diod. xi, 69; xii, 64; Thuc. iv, 50.). As he ascended to the throne (as in Synell. Chron. p. 251) he is the same with the third Artaxerxes, the Persian king who, in the twentieth year of his reign, considerably allowed Nehemiah to go to Jerusalem for the furtherance of purely national objects, invested him with the government of his own people, and allowed him to remain there for twelve years (Neh. ii, 1 sqq.; x, 14). It is almost unanimously agreed that the king here intended is Artaxerxes Longimanus (Apuapulis; otherwise Aroplulc, Bähr ad Cen. p. 166, 175). See Nehemiah. As this prince began to reign B.C. 466, the restoration under Ezra was in B.C. 459, and the first under Nehemiah in B.C. 446. See Ezra, vii, 1 sqq., viii, 1 sqq.; Artaxerxes, i, 526, 1850, p. 495. Others (as J. D. Michaelis) understand Arta-xerxes Memnon (reigned B.C. 404-359) to be meant (comp. Neh. xiii, 28, with Josephus, Ant. xi, 8, 8 and 4); but Bertholdt (Einds. iii, 1014) shows that the age of Eliasib (q. v.) will not allow this (comp. Neh. iii, 1, with xil, 1, 10); for Eliasib, who was high-priest when Nehemiah reached Jerusalem (Neh. iii, 1), i. e. on this last supposition, B.C. 885, was grandson of Jeshua (Neh. xii, 10), high-priest in the time of Zerub-babel (Ezra iii, 3), B.C. 586. We cannot think that the high-priest of the grandfather of Ezra could possibly have continued his rule for 150 years. Besides, as Ezra and Nehemiah were contemporaries (Neh. viii, 9), this theory transfers the whole history contained in Ezra vii, ad fin., and Nehemiah to this date, and it is hard to believe that in this critical period of Jewish annals there are no events recorded between the reigns of Darius Hystaspis (Ezra iv) and Artaxerxes Memnon. If, however, it may be observed, there are again some who maintain that as Darius Hystaspis is the king in the sixth chapter of Ezra, the king mentioned next after him, at the be-

ARTÉMIS. See DIANA.

ARTÉMON. See MAINAIS.

ARTÉMON, a heretic, toward the end of the second century. Little is known of his history; even his name is sometimes given Artemon and sometimes Artemas. The principal sources of our scanty information are Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. v. 26, where he uses the name Artemon, and vii. 30, where it is Artemas; Theodoret, Hist. Fáb. Epist. iv. 4; Epiphanius, Har. lxxxv. 1, 4; Photius, Bibl. 48. Eusebius cites names of writers against Artemon and gives some hints of his doctrine as being the same with that of Theodotus the Tanner, viz. that Christ was a mere man. Theodoret (I. c.) says that Artemon believed in God the creator, but asserted Christ to be a mere man; born of a virgin, however, and superior to the prophets. Eusebius speaks of Artemon and his followers as abandoning the Scriptures for "symbollogies and geometry." He states that Paul of Samosata, in his letter to Artemon, Schleicherer (Thes. Zeitschr. 1822, iii. 295 sq. ; translated by Moses Stuart in Bibl. Repository, v. 384 sq.) goes into a careful examination of the fragments of our knowledge about Artemon, and adopts the view previously given by Gennadius of Marseilles, that Artemon was in reality a Sabellian. Article in Grammar. Of this part of speech, but one kind, the definite article, requires any consideration here, since the indefinite article in those languages where it is grammatically treated as a peculiar form is, after all, but a modification of the numeral for one (Gr. τό, τόν; Lat. unus; French, un; German, ein; Eng. one, etc.). In Hebrew the definite article is denoted by the syllable το prefixed to the noun (or pronomial pronoun) employed, as is seen from the English used in the following letter (whenever this will admit) shows that this was but a contraction for some older form, probably τον (or perhaps a modified form of the demonstrative pronoun ὁν), corresponding to the Arabic ا and א, which in like manner assimilates its last letter to that of many words with which it is joined. In Chaldee and Syriac, however, this prefix is never employed, but in its stead the letter X (or syllable א) is appended to the noun, which is then said to be in the "definite or emphatic state." In the Greek language, on the other hand, the article is pronominial in form and construction, being, in fact, originally (e. g. in Homer) actually a demonstrative pronoun. The point of the greatest importance in biblical criticism, and that for the interest connected with which the subject is here introduced, is the frequent omission of the definite article in the New Testament, where in classical Greek it appears, and grammatically regulated. Bishop Middleton has treated copiously of this peculiarity (Doctrine of the Greek Article, Lond. 1824, and often since); but many of the "canons" that he lays down for its use or dispense, upon which important theological conclusions have often been made to depend, are highly fanciful, and unsupported by general Hel- lenistic usage. The idiom in question is, in fact, nothing more than a transfer of the Hebrew laws for the omission or insertion of the article prefixed, which may be found clearly drawn out in Nordheime's Hebr. Gramm., ii, § 715-724, especially § 717, 718; and depend upon this essence of problems which the author has treated before and on that word which is regarded as being already sufficiently definite, either by reason of being in construction with another noun, adjective, pronoun, or other qualifying term, or by being distinctive in itself, so as not to be specially liable to misinterpretation.

Articles of Faith, statements of the main points of belief of any single church framed by authority of the church, and binding upon its ministers or members, or upon both. Some object to Articles of Faith. Among the grounds of objection are the following, viz. that they infringe Christian liberty, and supersede the Scriptures by substituting in their place a number of humanly-formed propositions; that to exhibit the Christian faith in any limited number of statements is virtually to declare that all besides is superfluous or of no object, also, that the parties are a possession of hypocrisy, and hinder advancement in divine knowledge. "If employed at all," it is said, "they should be in the words of Scripture." The advocates for "articles of faith," on the other hand, affirm that it is not their purpose to sum up the whole of Christianity in any number of propositions, but merely to set forth the belief of a given church upon the leading truths of religion, as well as upon those matters which have at any period been subjects of heretical corruption or of controversy, and respecting which it is necessary that there should be agreement among such as are to be members of the same church; that articles are not intended to be guides through the whole voyage of Christian inquiry, but only beacon-lights to inform the mariner where lie those rocks and shoals on which preceding voyagers have made shipwreck. It is clear that there is a necessity for such articles, because the sense of Scripture upon any one point of faith lies scattered over too large a surface to be ascertained by himself for every individual member of the church; that schismatical truths are as capable as any other of being translated into common language; and that controversies within the church upon the meaning of Scripture would abound, if the church itself should give no interpretation of them (comp. Rom. vi. 17; 2 Tim. i. 12, 13.; Tit. 3. 7; 1 Thes. iii. 13.). See Confessions; Credenda.

ARTICLES, LAMBEITH. The Calvinistic doctrine concerning Predestination, Free-will, etc., which had been the cause of vehement disputes on the Continent, had been brought into England by the refugees, and gained great footing, about the year 1554, at Cambridge, by the influence of Cartwright, the Lady Margaret professor. Barret, a fellow of Caius College, preached ad clerum against Calvin's doctrines. Archbishop Whigfield at first took Barret's part; but at last, urged by the heads of colleges, sent for him to Lambeth, and directed him not to preach such doctrine again. Mr. Whigfield, not satisfied, rejected the novel doctrines; and this party, having stated the controversy to their own liking, drew up nine articles into form, and laid them before Archbishop Whigfield, who called, November 16th, an assembly at Lambeth to consider the question, consisting of Fletcher, the elect of London; Vaughan, elect of Bangor; Dr. Trindall, of Pembroke; and Whigfield, of Cambridge divines. They drew up the following nine articles, known as the "Lambeth Articles": "1. God hath from eternity predestinated certain persons to life, and hath reprobated certain persons unto death. 2. The moving or efficient cause of predestination unto life is not the foresight of faith, or of perseverance, or of good works, or of any thing that is in the persons predestinated, but the alone will of God's good pleasure. 3. The predestinati are a predetermined and certain number, which can neither be lessened nor increased. 4. Such as are not predestinated to salvation shall inevitably be condemned on account of their sins. 5. The true, lively, and justifying faith, and the Spirit of God justifying, is not extinguished, doth not perish, nor wither; nor can it be taken from those that receive it, either finally or totally. 6. A true believer—that is, one who is endued with justifying faith— is certified by the full assurance of faith that his sins are forgiven, and that he shall be everlastinglly saved by Christ. 7. Saving grace is not allowed, is not imparted, is not given, by which means men are saved from sin by what they will. 8. No man is able to come to Christ unless it be given him, and unless the Father draw him; and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to his Son. 9. It is not in the will or power of every man to be saved. The archbishop approved the articles Nov. 20, 1556, and sent them to Cambridge; but the queen ordered them to be recalled, and censured Whigift severely. As the meeting at Lambeth was not a lawful synod, its resolutions cannot be regarded as the act of the church of that day; nor, indeed, in any other light than as declaring the opinion of some of the church authorities of that period upon the doctrine of predestination. The very effect of it seems to show that the Calvinistic bishops of the time were not satisfied that the Thirty-nine Articles were Calvinistic.—Collier, Eccl. Hist. vii, 187; Hardwick, Hist. of 93 Articles, ch. vii, and Appendix, No. vii; Strype's Whigift, p. 402; Browne On 93 Art. p. 379.

ARTICLES OF PARRS, five articles agreed upon at a General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, convened at Perth by command of James VI on the 25th of August, 1618. These articles enjoined kneeling at the Lord's Supper, the observance of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost, and confirmation, and sanctioned the private administration of baptism and of the Lord's Supper. They were highly obnoxious to the Presbyterians of Scotland, not only on their own account, but as part of an attempt to change the whole constitution of the church; and because they were adopted without free discussion in the Assembly, and were given to the church as the laws with the king, which was also regarded as having unduly interfered with the constitution of the Assembly itself. They were, however, ratified by the Parliament on the 4th of August, 1621—a day long remembered in Scotland as Black Saturday—were enforced by the Court of High Commission one of the subjects of that contention between the king and the people which produced results so grave and sad for both in the subsequent reign. The General Assembly of Glasgow in 1638 declared that of Perth to have been "unfree, unlawful, and null," and condemned the Five Articles.—Chambers's Encyclop. e. v. ; Calderwood, History of Church of Scotland, vol. ii; Hetherington, Church of Scotland, i, 329.

ARTICLES OF SCHMALKALD. The Protestants had formed the Schmalkaldic League (q. v.) in 1531, and the emperor, by the Religious Peace of 1532, had agreed to maintain the status quo until a council should meet to settle all questions. The church of 1541 had to have a papal council called in 1537; but the Wittenberg divines, not willing to trust such a body, agreed to certain articles drawn up by Luther, and presented at the meeting of the electors, princes, and states at Schmalkald (Feb. 15, 1537). They were principally directed against the Lutheran doctrine of the Eucharist; were disposed to go in order to avoid a final rupture with Rome, and in what sense they were willing to adopt the doctrine of Christ's presence in the Eucharist. In these articles opposition to the Roman doctrine is very strongly expressed. The articles afterward became one of the authoritative symbolical books of the Lutheran Church. Dr. Murdoch, in his notes to Mosheim (C. H. History cent. xvi, sect. i, ch. iii, § 9), gives the following account of them: "The Augsburg Confession was intended to soften prejudices against the Lutherans, and to conciliate the good-will of the Catholics. Of course, the gentle Melanchthon was employed to write it. The Articles of Schmalkald, on the contrary, were a preparation for a campaign against Rome, and no compromise was deemed possible, and in which victory or death was the only alternative. Of course, all delicacy toward the Catholics was dispensed with, and Luther's fiery style was chosen, and allowed full scope. In words the Articles flatly contradict the Augsburg Confession; in thought they are the same. Thus the Confession (article 24) says: 'We are unjustly charged with having abolished the mass. For it is manifest that, without boasting, we may say the mass is observed by us with greater devotion and earnestness than by our opponents. But in the Articles of Schmalkald, part ii, art. 11, it is said 'that the popish mass is the greatest and most horrid abomination, as militating directly and violently against these articles; and yet it has become the chief and most splendid of all the popish idolatries.' In the Confession they applied the name of the mass to the Lutheran form of the Eucharist, but in these Articles it is a common name for every form of all the ordinary public service among the Catholics. The Articles of Schmalkald cover 28 folio pages, and are preceded by a preface, and followed by a treatise on the power and supremacy of the pope. The first part contains four concise articles respecting God, the Trinity, and the Incarnation, passion, and ascension of Christ, in accordance with the Apostles' and the Athanasian Creeds. On these articles the Protestants proposed to agree together with the Papists. The second part also contains four articles of fundamental importance, but in which the Protestants and Papists are placed to be totally and irreconcilely at variance. They relate to the nature and to the grounds of justification, the mass and saint worship, ecclesiastical and monachic establishments, and the claims of the pope. The third part contains fifteen articles, which the Protestants considered as relating to very important subjects, but on which the Papists laid little stress. The subject of the Mass is one of these, of the Sacrament, the sacrament of the altar, the keys (or spiritual power), confession, excommunication, ordination, celibacy of the clergy, churches, good works, monastic vows, and human satisfaction for sin. When the Protestants subscribed these articles, Melanchthon annexed his name to them as the author. He did not admit of a pope, provided he would allow the Gospel to be preached in its purity, and would give up his pretensions to a divine right to rule, and would found his claims wholly on expediency and human compact. In consequence of this demand from Luther, Melancthon was requested to draw up an article on the power and supremacy of the pope. He did not sign it, because the Protestants were well pleased with it, and subscribed to it. It is annexed to the Articles of Schmalkald." See J. G. Walsh's Introduct. to Bibl. Theol., i, 317, 382.

The first edition of the Articles of Schmalkald appeared in Wittenberg, 1538, 4to, in German; in Latin, 1539, 4to. In 1541, after the Reformation, a new Latin version, which is the one adopted in the collection of Lutheran creeds in Latin. A new edition of the German text, with the literature of the subject, was published by Marheineke (Berlin, 1817, 4to). See also, for the text and history, Francke, Lit., vol. iv, p. 666; EGenz. VIII. which lasted from 1558 to 1554. Gardiner and Tontisi took advantage of this mood of the king's mind, and in the first session of Convocation, June 5, 1536, offer six articles for the abolishing of divers opinions; in reality, a law to punish with death all persons who should adopt the doctrines of the Reformers on the points covered by it. These points were, that in the sacrament of the altar, after consecration, there remains a reality of bread and wine, a real body and blood of Christ; that communion in both kinds is not necessary; that priests, according to the law of God, may not marry; that vows of chastity ought to be observed; that private masses ought to be continued; and that auricular confession is expedient and necessary, and ought to be retained in the church. Convocation was unanimously opposed to the latter of these demands. Latimer and Shaxton resigned their bishoprics. It was under this act that Anne Askew (q. v.), or Ascongh, was executed in 1554.—Burnet, Hist. Expl. ARTICLES, TWENTY-FIVE, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They are as follows:

I. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity. There is but one living and true God, existing, without body or parts, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things visible and invisible. Of the Holy Trinity there are three persons, of one substance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

II. Of the Incarnation. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, was made man and was very man. The Son, who is the Word of the Father, the very eternal God, of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided, whereof is Christ, very God and very man, who truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and for us to be reconciled to God, not for original guilt, but also for actual sin of men.

III. Of the Resurrection of Christ. Christ died truly and again upon the same cross, where he bearing our sins, ascended up into heaven, and there sitteth until he return to judge all men at the last day.

IV. Of the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the Son, and very eternal God.

V. Of the Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for Exposition. The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever there may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be held as an article of faith, or be thought necessary or requisite to the opinion or information of the church; yet we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament the apostles' doctrine was never any doubt in the church.

VI. Of the Old Testament. The Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the same in both; the church of the Old Testament is the church of the New Testament, wherefore they are not to be heard who pretend that the Old Testament did but offer for transitory prophecy. Although the times and manners of the Gospel are different from those of the law, yet the end thereof is one, the same throughout, and even the obedience of the commandments which are called moral.

VII. Of the Holy Ordinances. The institution of all other orders of men after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot and may not exercise himself, by his own natural strength and weakness, to faith, and calling upon God, to Christ, and to the Holy Ghost, and to all other things which are necessary for our salvation and acceptability to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working the same in us. But to the effect that a tree is discerned by its fruit, that is, works of supererogation, which are divided into two branches; one, that which is done for the obtaining of eternal life, and is not necessary to be done, and cannot be taught without arrogancy and impolicy. For by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more and do beyond what is necessary for the obtaining of eternal life; but whereas Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that is commanded you, say, We are unprofitable服役s, we are not thereby committed after justification is the sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable. Wherefore, the grant of repentance is not to be denied to sinners, even after they are fallen into irrevocable sin, after we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given and fall into sin, and, by the grace of God, rise again and amend our lives. And therefore these men condemned who say they can no more sin as long as they live here, or as long as they have grace, and they do not forsake sin, as such because of repentance as such. Again, the visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure Word of God is preached and the Christian sacraments properly administered, according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that are necessary to salvation and with no less form as to the same.

VIII. Of Predestination. The Romish doctrine concerning foreordination, foreknowledge, foredestination, foreordination, and foreknowledge, as well as of relics, and also invocation of saints, is a thing false, vainly invented, and contrary to the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to have public prayer in the church, or to minster the sacraments in a tongue not understood by the people; and in many places, not only the form of the word of God, but also the very thing itself to which it is applied, hath been taken only for a name, and no warrant of scripture, but repugnant to the Word of God.

IX. Of Speaking in Tongues as a Tongue. The Romish doctrine concerning speaking in tongues as a tongue, is a thing false, and contrary to the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to have public prayer in the church, or to minster the sacraments in a tongue not understood by the people; and in many places, not only the form of the word of God, but also the very thing itself to which it is applied, hath been taken only for a name, and no warrant of scripture, but repugnant to the Word of God.

X. Of the Sacraments. Sacraments ordained of Christ are not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, nor are they certain signs given to seal the things which are spoken by way of commandment, but the outward things given by Christ to be a sign and witness to the truth of those things which are spoken by way of commandment, and are the seal of the righteousness of faith.

XI. Of Baptism. As to the confirmation, penance, orders, matrimonio, and extreme unction are not to be counted for sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have partly grown out of the corrupt following of the apostles, and partly are states of life allowed in the scriptures, but yet have not the like nature of baptism and the Lord's supper, because they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

XII. Of the Sacraments not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon or to be carried about, but that we should only use them. And in such only as worthy receive the same, they have, with some effect in the administration; yet, we do not thereby intend, or understand, that they can be worthy purchases to themselves condemnation, as St. Paul saith, Cor. xi. 29. But as to the baptism of infants, it is also a sign of regeneration, or the new birth. The baptism of young children is to be retained in the church.

XIII. AS to the Supper of the Lord. The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death; insomuch that, to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ.

XIV. Of Transubstantiation, that is, the change of the substance of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ by any alchemical or similar transformation. The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner; and the means whereby the body and blood of Christ are received in the Supper is faith.

XV. Of the Ordinance of the Lord's Supper. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

XVI. Of both Kinds. The cup of the Lord is not to be denied to any, but is to be given to all, whether worthy or not, as Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be administered to all Christians alike.

XVII. Of the Perfection of Christ. The perfection of Christ, finished upon the cross. The offering of Christ, once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and is the foundation and satisfaction for sin and that alone. Wherefore the sacrifice of masses, in the which it is commonly said that the priest doth offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, is a blasphemous and dangerous doctrine.
ARTICLES

XXI. Of the Marriage of Ministers.—The ministers of Christ are not commanded by God’s law either to vow the state of single life, or to abstain from marriage; therefore it is lawful for them in all cases, as for all other Christians, to marry according to their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve becometh Christian offices.

XXII. Of the Rites and Ceremonies of Churches.—It is not necessary that rites and ceremonies should in all places be the same; for they have been differently settled, and may be different, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men’s manners, so that nothing be ordained against God’s Word. Whoever, therefore, contemns, judges, or disapproves ceremonies according to common authority, ought to be rebuked openly, that others may fear to do the like, as one that offendeth against the common order of the church, and woundeth the consciences of weak brethren.

Every particular church may ordain, change, or abolish rites and ceremonies, as shall seem to them that all things may be edification.

XXIII. Of the Rules of the United States of America.—The President, the Congress, the General Assembly, the governor, and the Councils of State, as the delinquents of the people, are the rulers of the United States of America, according to the division of power made to them by the Constitution of the United States, and by the constitutions of their respective states. And the said states are a sovereign and independent society, not to be subject to any other. As far as it respects civil affairs, we believe it is the duty of Christians, and especially all Christian ministers, to be patterned after the holy civil authority, wherever there may reside, and to use all lawful means to enjoin obedience to the power that be; and therefore it is expedient that all other Christian countries, people, with the British and other any government, will behave themselves as peaceable and orderly subjects.

XXIV. Of Christian Men’s Goods.—The riches and goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as some do falsely boast. Notwithstanding, every man ought, of such things as he possesses, liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

XXV. Of a Christian Man’s Oath.—As we confess that vain and rash swearing is forbidden Christ’s command, so we judge that the Christian religion doth not prohibit, but that a man may speak the word of God and magistrates reasonably, in seasonable time, of faith and truth and clarity, so it be done according to the prophet’s teaching, in Justice, judgment, and truth.

In this same connection, the Articles of the Church of England, omitting the 3d, 8th, 13th, 15th, 17th, 18th, 20th, 21st, 28d, 26th, 29th, 33d, 34th, 36th, and 87th. On comparison, it will be found that these omissions are nearly all made in order to greater comprehension and liberality in the Creed. The 28th article (adopted in 1801) has been thought to be a gloss, giving the adherence of the church at that early period to the doctrine that the “United States” constitute a “sovereign nation.” The articles, in their present form, are a modification of those originally framed for the church by Wesley, and printed in the Sunday Service of the Methodist Church. They were adopted, with the Liturgy, by the Methodists in 1789; and the check of the Articles in the Methodist Episcopal Church is chiefly verbal, and some of them appear to be due to typographical errors in successive reprints of the Book of Discipline. For a list of the changes in the English form of History of the Discipline, ch. i, § 2. See also Jimeun, Notes on the 25 Articles (Cincinnati, 1853, 12mo); Comfort, Exposition of the Articles (N. Y. 1847, 12mo); Stevens, History of the Methodist Episcopal Church (N. Y. 1865, 3 vols. 8vo). See also Methodist Episcopal Church.

All three of the Articles of the Church of England contain what may be called the “symbol,” “creed,” or “confession of faith” of the Church of England, especially as to the points on which, at the time of the adoption of the articles, disputes existed. They constitute also, substantially, the Creed of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States (see below).

The history of their origin, as nearly as can be ascertained, is about as follows. As early as 1519 Cranmer drew up and circulated a series of articles designed to “test the orthodoxy of preachers and lecturers in divinity.” Hooper objected to them because of the expression that “the sacraments confer grace,” and for other reasons (Hooper, Original Letters, p. 71). About this time three eminent Continental reformers were domiciled in England, viz. John à Lasco or Laski (q. v.), as preacher in London, Bucer (q. v.), as theological lecturer at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr (q. v.), as professor at Oxford. The influence of these three men is still felt. The act of 1548, enacting that a petitioner might be empowered the king to appoint a commission of 32 persons to make ecclesiastical laws. Under this act a commission of 6 bishops, 8 divines, 8 civilians, and 8 lawyers (among whom were Cranmer, Ridley, Hooper, Coverdale, Scory, Pe- ter Martyr, Justice Holles, etc.), was appointed in 1541. Cranmer seems to have laid before this body, as a le- sis, a series of 13 articles, chiefly from the Augsburg Confession (reported in Hardwick, History of the Ar- ticles, App. ii). Finally, the Forty-two articles were laid before the royal council, Nov. 24, 1552 (text given in Burnet, iv, 811). In March, 1553, they were laid before the pope, whether adopted by the king or not is undecided. Strype and others assert that they were; Burnet, that they were not (Hist. Ref. iii, 318). Fuller, speaking in his quaint way of this convocation, declares that it had “no commission from the king to meddle with church business,” and, he adds, “every convocation in itself is born deaf and dumb, so that it cannot either hear nor speak concerning complaints in religion till first Ephraem, ‘be thou opened,’ be pronounced unto it by royal authority. However,” he continues, “this barren convocation is entitled the parent of those forty-two articles which are printed with this title, Articuli de quibus in Synodo Britannica, anno Domini 1552, competit, in iconi Evangelistarii, in capite Pastoralis.” To these articles was prefixed the Catechism, and the preparation of them was chiefly the work of Cranmer and Ridley, on the basis of the Augsburg Confession (Laurence, Hampton Lecture, p. 230). Immediately after their publication Edward died (July 6, 1553). Under Queen Mary, Cranmer and Ridley went to the stake, and Gardner and the Papists took their places as authorities in religion. In 1558 Mary died. Soon after the accession of Elizabeth, Matthew Parker (q. v.) was made archbishop of Canterbury (1559). One of his first tasks was to restore and re- cast the XXLI articles. He expunged some parts and added new ones, and the changed articles were approved by the queen and Wurttemburg Confessions (Laurence, Baptist. Lect. 238; Browne, XXXIX Articles, 15). The revised draught was laid before Convocation, which body made some minor alterations, and finally adopted the Thirty-eight Articles (January, 1563-5). They are given in Hardwick, History of the Articles, p. 124. In 1566 a bill was brought into Parliament to confirm them. The bill passed the Commons, but by the queen’s command was laid in the Lords. In 1571 the Convocation revised the articles of 1562, and made some alterations in them. In the same year an act was passed “to provide that the ministers of the church should be of sound religion.” It enacted that all ecclesiastical persons should subscribe to “all the articles of religion which only contained the confession of the true faith and of the sacraments, comprised in a book imprinted, entitled ‘Articles,’ whereupon it was agreed by the archbishops and bishops, and the whole clergy, to hold in London, as an act of the Church of our Lord God 1562, according to the computation of the Church of England, for the avoiding of diversities of opinions, and for the establishing of consent touching true religion, put forth by the queen’s authority.” In 1628 an English edition was published by royal authori- ty, to which is prefixed the declaration of Charles L.
The following are the Articles in full, as found in the Prayer-book of the Church of England:

I. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.—There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts, or passions; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the Maker and Preserver of all; and, together with the Son and the Holy Ghost, bound up in one Godhead, of one substance and essence.

II. Of the Word or Son of God, which was made meats very Man.—The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from ever-lasting Father, the very and eternal God, and of one substance, power, and eternity with the Father, is God, in the highest sense, the Lord, the Son of the blessed Virgin, of her substance; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, are joined together in one person, whereas one Christ, very God and very Man; who truly suffered, was crucified, and buried, to reconcile his Father, the Father, the Son to the children of Israel, not only for original guilt, but also for actual sins of men.

III. Of the going down of Christ into Hell.—As Christ died for Adam's sins, so also it is to be believed that he went down into hell.

IV. Of the Resurrection of Christ.—Christ did truly rise again from death, and ascended into heaven, and siteth at the right hand of God, and there预备eth for them who shall believe on him in this life and in the life to come.

V. Of the Holy Ghost.—The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and Son; so that whatsoever is not derived therefrom, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believe or confess; and so that whatsoever is contrary thereunto, or not necessary to salvation. In the name of the Holy Scripture we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the church.

VI. Of the Old Testament.—The Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man. Wherefore they are not to be heard which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises. Although the law given from God by Moses, as touching ceremonies and rites, do not bind Christian men, nor the civil precepts thereof ought of necessity to be received by any commonwealth, yet, notwithstanding, no Christian man whatsoever is ever free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral.

VII. Of the Three Creeds.—The Three Creeds, Nicene Creed, Athanasius's Creed, and that which is commonly called the Symbol or Nicene Creed, are to be retained and believed, for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture.

VIII. Of Baptism or Birth Sin.—Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pliigrina do vastly talk), but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that he is naturally disposed to love evil more than good. This sin, by man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of its own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit of God. It was not only when men were born into this world, this is, God's wrath and damnation. All the infection of sin doth remain, yea, in them that are regenerate, whereby the lust of the flesh, is not subject to the law of God. And although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized, yet it is that concurrence and lust hath itself the nature of sin.

IX. Of Free Will.—The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he retains a natural ability and power to choose good, and to turn away from evil, but yet is they pleased and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith: insomuch that by them a man may be as evidently known as a tree discerned by the fruit.

X. Of Works before Justification.—Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, are not to be esteemed as a matter of righteousness, neither hath God always commanded the same: whereas Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that are commanded you, ye shall say, We are unprofitable servants.

XI. Of Christ alone without Sin.—Christ, in the mean while, for the sake of his people, wrought in his own nature, was made like unto us in all things, sin only excepted; so that he might be a faithful high priest, to offer himself without fault unto God for us. He came to be the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of his people, and of all the world, and so should purify them for his own habitation, that he might offer himself without blemish to God, and to all we the rest, although baptized and born again in Christ, yet off end in many things; and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

XII. Of Sin after Baptism.—Not every deadly sin willingly committed after baptism is sin against the Holy Ghost, and Desolation, and therefore the Church is not to be so strict: but that sin which by the law of God may be presumptively concluded to be such as fall into sin after baptism. After we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace; but if we depart, the grace of God shall not be taken away from us. And thereby we are to be condemned which say they can no more sin so long as they live; or that they are of God's grace; or deny that there may be those that are by the grace of God turned again and amend our lives. And therefore they are to be condemned which say they can no more sin so long as they live; or that they are of God's grace; or deny that there may be those that are by the grace of God turned again and amend our lives.

XIII. Of Predestination and Election.—Predestination to life is entirely from the sovereign will of God, issued in and from the foundations of the world. The predestination of the Elect, by whom the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things, as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love toward God, so, for curious and carnal persons, lacking the Spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's damnation, is a most dangerous downfall, whereby the devil doth thrust them either into desperation, or into wretchedness of most unclean living no less pitious than despicable.

Furthermore, we must receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture and, in our doings, that they be not followed which we have expressly declared unto us in the Word of God.

XIV. Of obtaining eternal Salvation only by the Name of Christ.—The name of Christ only is the only necessary assurance of eternal salvation. Every one that saith, That every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he prosetheteth, so that he be diligent to frame his life accordingly to that law, saith, That a light of nature is sufficient to make a man Christ, doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ whereby men must be saved.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's own deliberate reservation, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

XXIX. Of the Wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the use of the Communion. (contd.)

The wicked are not only to be denied to the congregation, but not to be admitted into the church, of God. Forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, whereas all be not governed with the Spirit and Word of God they may never be gathered, even the outward parts pertaining unto God. Wherefore ordinations thereto as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be taken out of the scriptures.

XXX. Of Purgatory. — The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshipping and adoration, as well of images and places, as of persons who are alive, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warrant of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.

XXXI. Of the Sacrament in the Congregation. (In such a tongue as the people understand.) — It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God and the custom of the primitive church to have any awe or terror, or to have the sacrament taken in the congregation, in a tongue not understood of the people.

XXXII. Of the Sacraments. — Sacraments ordained of Christ to be observed in the church are either his own sacrifice in the institution of the Eucharist, or his own ordinance in the ordinance of Baptism; but rather they be certain sure witnesses, and effectual signs of grace and God's good will toward us, by which he doth work faith in our hearts, and doth not in them go about, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him.

There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, to wit, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction, are not to be accounted for sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not the same spiritual efficacy of the sacraments mentioned above; to wit, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of Christ. The sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them. And in such only as willingly receive the same they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves damnation, as St. Paul saith.

XXVI. Of the Unworthiness of the Ministers, which hinders not the effect of the Sacrament. — Although in the visible church the evil be very multiplied with the good, and sometimes the evil have chief authority in the ministration of the word and sacraments, yet foremost as they do not the same in their word and sacraments, and do not hold by their commission and authority, we may use their ministry, both in hearing the Word of God and in receiving the sacraments. Neither is it at all dishonorable or contrary to their ordination by the church to be grieved by their wickedness, nor the grace of God's gifts diminished from such as by faith and rightly do receive the sacraments ministered unto them by them. But if they have not the same spiritual efficacy of the sacraments, because of Christ's institution and promisses, although they be ministered by evil men.

XXVII. Of the Disobedience of the Church to the Supper of Christ: that inquiry be made of evil ministers, and that they be accused by them that have knowledge of their offenses; and finally, being found guilty, by just judgment be deposited.

XXVIII. Of Baptism. — Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discovered from others, but also a sign of regeneration and new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they receive baptism rightly, are grafted into the church; the adoption of children of sin, and sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed; faith is confirmed, and grace increased by virtue of the Lord's ordinance. And so baptism of infants is not against the word of the Lord; nor is it esteemed to be a sacrament.

The recreation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lord cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, either of the institution of a sacrament, or what is given occasion to many superstitions.

The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only in spiritual and figurative sense, whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the supper is faith.
rules all states and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be apostolic or temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil-doers.

The Bishop of Rome hath no Jurisdiction in this realm of England.

The laws of the realm may punish Christian men with death for heinous and grievous offences.

For Christian men, at the commandment of the magistrate, to wear weapons and serve in the wars.

XXXVIII. Of Christian men's Goods, which are not com-mmonly used, and how those goods of Christian men are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as certain Ambuscado de falsely boast. Notwithstanding, every man owns the goods of the other man as it may please him, as he is able to the poor, according to his ability.

XXXIX. Of a Christian man's Oath. As we confess that and make an agreement is forbidden Christian men by our Lord Jesus Christ and James the apostle, so we judge that Christian religion doth not prohibit, but that it is the duty of every Christian to make a true and sure promise in a cause of faith and charity, so it be done according to the prophet's teaching, in justice, judgment, and truth.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States adopted in convention, September 12, 1801, the Thirty-nine Articles, except the 21st, with certain modifications, which are stated as follows by the American editor of Hook's Church Dictionary:

In the eighth article we have left out the words 'three creeds' and 'Athanassian creed,' having entertained the opinion that they are proper as an exponent of our faith.
The 21st article, 'Of the authority of general councils,' is left altogether; and, though the No. xxi and title is retained, an asterisk refers us to a footnote which says, 'the 21st of the former articles is omitted because it is partly of a local and civil nature, and is provided for as to the remaining part of it in other articles.' After the 38th article, 'Of homilies,' our reviewers have inserted the following explanation in bracket: 'This article is received in this church so far as it declares the books of homilies to be an explication of Christian doctrine, and instructive on piety and morals.

But all references to the constitution and laws of England are considered as inapplicable to the circumstances of this church, which also suspend the order for the reading of said homilies in churches, until a revision of them may be conveniently made, for the clearing of them, as well from obsolete words and phrases as from the local references.' The 36th article, 'Of the consecration of bishops and ministers,' is altered to suit the peculiarities of the American Church.
The 87th article 'Of the power of the civil magistrates,' is a new one entirely supersedes that of the Church of England, which sets forth the queen's su-cracy in church and state, the annulling of papal jurisdiction in England, the power of the state in the realm to punish with death, and the lawfulness of wearing weapons and serving in wars at the commandment of the magistrates.

The American article is a biblical statement of a great and fundamental principle, applicable to all men, and under all circumstances.
The American articles were ordered to be set by the General Convention assembled in Trenton, New Jersey, in September, 1801.'

As to the sources of the English articles, besides what has been said above, it may be no amiss to add that the 1st, 2d, 25th, and 31st agree not only in their doctrines, but in the manner of dividing the Kingly, with the Constitution of Augsburg. The 9th and 16th are clearly due to the same source. Some of them, as the 19th, 20th, 25th, and 84th, resemble, both in doctrine and language, certain articles drawn up by a commission appointed by Henry VII, and annotated by the king's own hand. The 11th article, on justification, is ascribed to Cranmer, and in some sort as in the articles of 1552. The 17th, on predestination, has afforded matter of great dispute as to the question whether it is meant to affirm the Calvinistic doctrine or no. On this point, see Laurence, Brampton Lectures; Brown; On 39 Articles, p. 450 sq.; and our articles are largely drawn up from there. The Thirty-nine Articles have been described as 'containing a whole body of divinity.' This can hardly be maintained. They contain, however, what the Church of England holds to be a fair scriptural account of the leading doctrines of Christianity, together with a condemnation of what the Church of Rome and certain Protestant sects. As far as they go (and there are many things unnoticed by them), they are a legal definition of the doctrines of the Church of England and Ireland, though the members of that communion look to the Prayer-Book as well as to the Thirty-nine Articles for the genuine expression of her faith. The articles are far more thoroughly Protestant than the Prayer-book, taken as a whole. Although the articles express so as to assert that the Church of Rome has erred, attempts have repeated been made by the High-Church party of the Church of England to show that there is an irreconcilable difference between the Thirty-nine Articles and the decrees of the Council of Trent, and that a construction can be put upon them fully harmonizing them. To show this was, in particular, the object of Dr. Newman's celebrated tract (Tracts for the Times, No. 90, Oxf. 1830), and more recently of Dr. Pusey's Eirenicon (Lond. 1866; also in Christ. Remember, Jan. 1866, art. vi). The articles were adopted by the Convocation of the Irish Church in 1835, and by the Scotch Episcopal Church at the close of the 19th century.

Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, contains the only copies of the articles in manuscript or print that are of any authority. Among them are an early manuscript transcript of the articles of 1562 and the English manuscript of the articles of 1571, each with the signatures of the archbishops and bishops who subscribed them. See Lamb, Account of the Thirty-nine Articles (Camb. 2d ed. 1853).

One of the best accounts of the origin of the Thirty-nine Articles is given by Hardwicke, History of the Articles of Religion (Lond. 1853, 8vo). For expositions of them, see Burnet On the Thirty-nine Articles (N. Y. 1845, 8vo); Welchman, XXXIX Articles (Lond. 1834, 8vo, 13th ed.); Swordes, The first Seventeen Articles (Lond. 1847, 8vo); Wilson, XXXIX Articles Illustrated (Oxf. 1840, 8vo); Dimock, XXXIX Articles Explained (Lond. 1846, 2 vols. 8vo); Brown, Expositions of Thirty-nine Articles (Lond. 1851, 8vo; N. Y. ed. by Williams, 1865, 8vo); Cardwell, Suedaxis; Palmer On the Church, ii, 242 sq.; Lee, The Articles paraphrased by Sancta Clara (Dr. Davenport) (from the edition of 1646; London, 1865, post 8vo).

Artificer (some form of the verb γεννάω, 'to engrave, as elsewhere'), a person engaged in any kind of trade or manual occupation [see Carpenters, in the dictionary].

In the early periods to which the scriptural history refers, we do not meet with those artificial feelings and unreasonable prejudices against hand-labor which prevail and are so basely influential in modern society. See Lavor. Accordingly, even the cre-tion of the world is spoken of as the work of God's hands, and the firmament is said to show his handwork (Psa. vii. 8; xix. 1; Gen. ii. 2, Job xxxiv. 19).

The primitive history, too, which the Bible presents is the history of our laborers, Adam and his children in which God had placed him (Gen. ii. 15), Abel was a keeper of sheep, Cain a tiller of the ground (Gen. iv. 8), Tubal-Cain a smith (Gen. iv. 22).

See Art. The shepherd-life which the patriarchs previously led in their own pasture-grounds was not favorable to the cultivation of the practical arts, in which less of those arts which we call culture was embiggled. Egypt, in consequence, must have presented to Joseph and his father not only a land of wonders, but a source of rich and attractive knowledge. Another source of knowledge to the Hebrews of handicrafts were the maritime and commercial Phoenicians. Commerce, navigation, agriculture, the arts of all kinds, and science; and the pursuits to which they lead largely increase the skill whence they emanate. See Commerce. It is not, therefore, surprising that the origin of so many arts has been referred to the north-eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea; nor is there any difficulty in understanding how arts and letters should be propagated from the east to the interior, conferring with advantage on the inhabitants of Syria in general, as well before as after the settlement of the Hebrew tribes in the land of promise. At first the division of labor was only very partial. The master of the family himself exercised such arts as were found of absolute necessity; his slaves may have been restricted only those which pasturage and tillage required, but most of those which were of that rough and severe nature which demand strength as well as skill; such, for instance, as the preparation of woodwork for the dwelling, the slaying of animals for food, which every householder understood, together with the art of extracting the blood from the entire carcass. The lighter labors of the hand fell to the share of the housewife; such as baking bread—for it was only in large towns that baking was carried on as a trade (2 Sam. xiii. 8)—such also as cooking in general, supplying the house with water—no very easy office, as the fountains often lay at a considerable distance from the habitation; moreover, weaving, making of clothes for males as well as females, working in wool, flax, hemp, cotton, tapestry, richly-colored hangings, and that not only for domestic use, but for “merchandise,” were carried on within the precincts of the house by the mistress and her maids. (N. T. 25; Job xlii. 19; 2 Kings xxiii. 7; Prov. xxxxi.) See WEAVING.

The skill of the Hebrews during their wanderings in the desert does not appear to have been inconceivable; but the pursuits of war and the entire absorption of the energies of the nation in the one great work of gaining the land which had been given to them, may have led to their falling off in the arts of peace, and from a passage in 1 Sam. (xiii. 20) it would appear that not long after they had taken possession of the country they were in a low condition as to the instruments of handicraft. A comparatively settled state of society, however, soon led to the revival of skill by the encouragement of industry. A more minute division of labor ensued. Trades, strictly so called, arose, carried on by persons exclusively devoted to one pursuit. Thus, in Judg. xvii. 4, and Jer. x. 14, “the founder” is mentioned—a trade which implies a practical knowledge of metallurgy; the smelting and working of metals were well known to the Hebrews (Job xxxviii. 18); brass was in use before iron; arms and instruments of husbandry were made of iron. In Exodus (xxx. 30-35) a passage occurs which may serve to specify many arts that were practised among the Israelites, though it seems also to intimate that at the time to which it refers artificers of the description referred to were not numerous: “See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel, and hath filled him with the spirit of God, in knowledge and all manner of workmanship, and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass (Exod. xix. 21), and he hath filled his heart with his heart, that he may teach; both he and Aholiab: them hath he filled with wisdom of heart to work all manner of work of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer in blue and in purple, in scarlet and in fine linen, and of the weaver.” From the ensuing chapter (ver. 24) it appears that goats' hair was much of that which was used before. The boat in Cant. (v. 12) (Exod. xxxvii. 2) was overlaid with pure gold within and without. The cherubim were wrought (“beaten”), (Exod. xxxvii. 7) in gold. The candlestick was of beaten gold (verses 17, 22). Wire-drawing was probably understood (Exod. xxxvii. 4; xxxix. 5). Coverings of the tabernacle were of beaten silver (Prov. xxvi. 28) was practised. Architecture and the kindred arts do not appear to have made much progress till the days of Solomon, who employed an incredible number of persons to procure timber (1 Kings v. 18 sq.) but the men of skill for building his temple he obtained from Hiram, King of Tyre (1 Kings v. sq.; 1 Chron. xiv. 1; 2 Chron. ii. 7). Without pursuing the subject into all its details (see Scholz, Handb. der Bibl. Archäol. p. 891 sq.; De Wette, Lehrb. der Archäol. p. 115 sq.), we remark that the intercourse which the Babylonish captivity gave the Jews seems to have greatly improved their knowledge and skill in both the practical and the fine arts, and have led them to hold them in very high estimation. The arts were even carried on by persons of learning, who took a title of honor from their trade (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. vi, 42). It was held a sign of a bad education if a father did not teach his son some handicraft: “Whoever does not teach his son a trade, teaches him robbing” (Lightfoot, p. 616; Maimna, Perka Abot, ii. 2; Wagensiel, Sota, p. 597; Otho, Loz. Rabb. p. 491).

In the Apocrypha and New Testament there are mentioned tanners (Acts ix. 45), tent-makers (Acts xviii. 3); in Josephus (War, v. 4, 1), cheese-makers; domesticates (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 11, 5); in the Talmud, glaziers, goldsmiths, plasters. Certain handicraftsmen could never rise to the rank of high-priest (Maimna, Kikuth, lxxxix, 1), such as weavers, barbers, fullers, perfumers, cuppers, tanners; which pursuits, especially the last, were held in disrepute (Maimna, Meqillah, i. 22, 7; Dei, p. 158; Maimna, Teitzel, p. 516). In large cities particular localities were set apart for particular trades, as is the case in the East to the present day. Thus in Jeremiah (xxvii. 21) we read of “the bakers’ street.” So in the Talmud (Maimna, xvi. 169, 225) mention is made of a sheik-market; in Josephus (War, v. 4, 3), of a cheese-market; in Maimna (Teitzel, vii. 4), of a sheep-market, or at least a sheep-gate, which, like several other gates [see JERUSALEM], appears to have been named from some special bazaar (q. v.) adorning. (See Iken, Antiq. Hebr. iii. 1x, p. 578 sq.; Bellermann, Handb. i. 4, 22 sq.—Kitto, ii. 806. See MECHANIC.

Artillery (“bow,” “latter,” apparatus, elsewhere rendered “vessel,” “instrument,” etc.) occurs in 1 Sam. vi. and 40, where it signifies vessels of war, or missile weapons, as arrows and lances. See ARMOR. In 1 Mac. vi, 51, the term so rendered is βιβλαστης, i.e. balista, or “catapult,” a machine for hurling darts or stones. See Engine.

Artomachy (q. d. ἄρτομα κυνηγεῖν, dispute respecting bread, from ἄρτος and μαχῆς), a controversy respecting the bread of the Eucharist, originated in 1567 by Michael Cerularius. This dispute existed between the Greek and Latin churches; the former contending that the bread used should be leavened, the latter urging the necessity of being unleavened bread. Protestant writers have taken part with the Greek Church in this controversy. Early Christian writers make no mention of the use of unleavened bread; the same kind of bread was eaten in the agape that was consecrated for the Eucharist, viz., common bread. Leavened bread appears to have been in use when Epiphanius and Ambrose wrote. Unleavened bread was generally discontinued at the Reformation; but the Lutherans retain it; Farrar, Exel. Dict. s. v. See ALEXYMEN.

Artotyrites (q. d. ἀρτοτρυπηταὶ, from ἄρτος, bread, and τρυπητής, a burrower and robber), so called by Eusebius, who first appeared in the second century. They used bread and cheese in the Eucharist; or, perhaps, bread baked with cheese. The reason assigned was, according to Augustine (Hær. cap. xxviii), that the first men offered to God not only the fruits of the earth, but of their flocks also. The Artotyrites admitted women to the Eucharist, and it is asserted that Philip, who was bishop at Beth- sam, Orig. Exel. xv, 2, 8; Epiphanius, Hær. xlix; Farrar, Exel. Dict. s. v.
ARTS

Arts, one of the faculties in which degrees are conferred in the universities. The circle of the arts was formerly divided into the Triumvira, viz. grammar, rhetoric, and logic; and the Quadrivium, viz. arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. It now includes all branches of technical or professional education, such as Church Dietics, etc. See DEGREES; UNIVERSITIES.

Ar'robat (Heb. Ar'obâth', אֶרֶבָּת; Sept. Ἀρουβάτος, a latticê; Sept. Ἀροβάτος, a city or district, probably in the tribe of Judah (or Simeon), being the third of Solomon's purlievories, under the charge of Hesed or Ben-Hesed, and including Socoh and Hepher within its limits (1 Kings iv. 10). Schwarz (Palest. p. 257) fancies it is represented by the modern village and wady 'Abâth in the northern portion of the valley; but the names of the villages indicate the region Jebel Khâlih, S.W. of Hebron.

Ar'uch (Heb. Arûkh, עַרְוָךְ, arranged, sc. in alphabetical order), the title of a Talmudic lexicon, compiled by El. Nathan ben-Jechiel, who was rector of the synagogue at Rome A.D. 1106, according to the Chro-nicon "Zemach David," and who is usually styled by the Jewish writers הַגָּרָךְ, אָבַט אָוּרְכָּה, Author Aruch (Buxtorf, Lex Talm. coll. 1665). It was first published by Soun-cini (Pesaro, 1537, fol.), and edited by Archinothi (Venice, 1581, 1538, fol.), Ekkendorf (Basle, 1599, fol.), Mu-Ar'umâh (Heb. Arûmâh, אָרֻםָה, prob. for Ru-mâh, with N prosthetic; Sept. Aepmu), a city appartly near Shechem, in which Abimelech the son of Gideon resided (Judg. ix. 41). It has been conjectured that the word in ver. 31, הֶרְמָה, rendered "privily," and in the margin "at Tormam," may signify "at Arumâh" by changing the ה to an N. It seems to be confounded with Rumâh (2 Kings xxi, 36) by Eusebius and Jerome, who state (Onomast. s. v. Rumâa) that it (Aiym, Arimâs) was then called Remâkah or Arimâthês. The suggestion of Van de Velde (Moriair, p. 288) appears to be correct that it is represented by the modern ruin E-Ormâh, on the brow of a mountain S.E. of Shechem.

Arundel, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was second son of Robert Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel and Warwick, and was born at Arundel Castle in 1533. His powerful family connections gave him early promotion; at 20 he was made dean of Tournai, and in 1574 the pope nominated him to the vacant see of Ely, the king and the monks of Ely having, at the same time, respectively nominated two others; but Arundel was consecrated without dispute. In 1588 he was removed to the see of York, and was the first archbishop of that see who was translated to Canterbury, which was the case in 1586. Very shortly after Arundel was forced into banishment by Richard II, as an accomplice of his brother, the earl of Arundel (executed as a partis-nan of the duke of Gloucester), and Roger Walden, was put into the chair of Canterbury, and acted as archbishop for about two years. (Johnson, Eccl. Canon., ii, A.D. 1589.) The archbishop, in the mean time, went to Rome, and afterwards to Cologne. He figured largely in the political intrigues by which Richard was deposed, and on the accession of Henry IV, 1599, he was restored to his see. He was a great persecutor of the Wickliffites, and in 1548 he published, in conversation with some of the Devonshire lawyers," He established in that year an inquisition for heresy at Oxford, and put in force the statute de heresie comburendo (2 Hen. IV, ch. xv), and prohibited the circulation of the English Scriptures. He built the tower called the "Arundel Tower," and gave to the cathedral of Canterbury a chime of bells known as "Arundel's ring," and was a great benefactor in many ways to the cathedral establishments. He died Feb-

Ar'vad (Heb. Ar'āwād, אֲרֹוָד; Sept. Ἀράωδ, but properly Ἀράωδας 1 Mac. xxv, 23, or, as it might be spelt, Arōd, Ἀρῶδ, whence the present name Ruad), a small island and city on the coast of Syria, called by the Greeks Arados (q. v.), by which name it is mentioned in the above passage of the Apocephyra. It is a rocky islet, opposite the mouth of the River Eleutherus (Mel. ii. 7), 50 miles to the north of Tripoli (Sitia Antuna), about one mile in circumference (1/2 ur. 1, 6), and two miles (Plyn, v. 17) from the shore (Rosenmüller, Handb. der Bibl. Alt. ii. 1, 7; Mannert, VI. i. 308; Pococce, Hist. ii. 292 sq.; Hamesveld, iii, 44 sq.). Strabo (xvi. 765) describes it as a rock rising in the sea, 20 fathom deep, and modern travellers state that it is steep on every side. (See Volney, ii. 131; Niebuhr, Reisen, iii. 92; Buckingham, iii, 436; Chenev, Ephraët, Expéd. i. 451; Shaw, p. 282.) Strabo also describes the houses as exceedingly lofty, and they were doubtless so built on account of the scantiness of the site; hence, for its size, it was exceedingly populous (Pomp. Mozia, ii. 7, 6). Those of the Aravdites whom the island could not accommodate found room in the town and district of Antaradus (q. v.), on the opposite coast, which also belonged to them (Targ. Hieron. Gen. x, 18). Arvad is usually regarded as the same as Arpad (q. v.) or Arphad (but see Michaelis, Oriental. Bibl. viii, 45). It is mentioned in Ezek. xxvii, 8, 11, as furnishing mariners and soldiers for Tyre, was situated on the shore not far away. In agreement with this is the mention of "the Aravadite" (q. v.) in Gen. vi, 18, and 1 Chron. i. 18, as a son of Canaan, with Zidon, Hamath, and other northern localities. It was founded, according to Strabo (xvi. 2, § 13), by fugitives from Sidon (comp. Josephus, Ant. i. 6, 2); hence probably the etymology of the name as above. Tarsus was settled by a colony from it (Dion. Chrys. Orat. Tarsen. ii, 20, ed. Reiske). Although originally independent (Arrian, Alex. ii, 90), and, indeed, the metropolis of the strip of land adjoining it, it eventually fell under the power of Persia, but assisted the Macedonians in the siege of Tyre (Arrian, Anat. i, 18, 20). It thence passed into the hands of the Ptolemies (B.C. 320); but, regaining its liberty under Saleucus Callinicus (B.C. 242), it attained such importance as to form an alliance with Antiochus the Great (Eckhel, Doctr. num. i. 386). Antiochus Epiphanes, however, took forcible mastery over it (Jerome in Dan. xi), and after becoming involved in the broils of his successors, it finally became a part of the province of Syria, and with his fall became subject to Rome, into whose triumviral wars its history enters (Appian, Bell. Cir.
v. 69; v. 1). Under the Emperor Constant, Muzi-uyeh, the lieutenant of the Caliph Omar, destroyed the city and expelled its inhabitants (Cedren. Hist. p. 555; Theophylact, p. 227). It was not rebuilt in medieval times (Michaelis, Oriental. Bibl. viii, 45). The site of Arvad was destroyed by the Goths (Amm. Marc. xxvii, 229). The curious subarabian springs from which the ancient city was supplied with water (Strabo, ed. Gros-kund, p. 754 n.) have been partially discovered (Walpole, Annaqrili, iii, 891). The site is now covered, except a small space on the east side, with heavy castles, within which resides a maritime population of about 2000 souls. On the very margin of the sea the remains of double Phenician walls, of huge bevelled stones, which mark it as being anciently a very strong place (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1818, p. 251). The nautical pursuits of the inhabitants, attested also by Strabo (at sup.), remain in full force (see Allen's Dead Sea, ii. 188, at the end of which vol. may be found a plan of the island, from the Admiralty Charts, 2050, “Island of Ruad”). See Coniform Inscriptions.

Arvadite (Heb. Arvads, אֵרַדִּיס, Sept. Ἀράδις, Gen. x. 18; 1 Chron. i. 16), an inhabitant of the island Aradus or Arvad (q. v.) (so Josephus explains Ἀραβάδιος, Ant. i. 6, 2), and doubtless also of the neighboring coast. The Arvadites were descended from one of the families of the Ammonians (Gen. x. 16; xxvi. 781) describes the Arvadites as a colony from Sidon. They were noted mariners (Exek. xxvii. 8, 11; Strabo, vi, 754), and formed a distinct state, with a king of their own (Arrian, Exped. Alex. ii. 90); yet they appear to have been in some dependence upon Tyre, for the prophet represents them as furnishing their contingent of mariners to that city (Exek. xxvii. 8, 11). The Arvadites took their full share in Phenician maritime traffic, particularly after Tyre and Sidon had fallen under the dominion of the Greek-Syrnian kings. They early entered into alliance with the Romans, and Arvadus is mentioned among the states to which Cornelius Lucullus assigned the presidium of the league which had been contracted with Simon Maccabeus (1 Macc. xv. 28).

Axe (Heb. Árš, אָרְשׁ, an Aramman form, the earth; Sept. Qôrî, v. r. ἀρδή), a steward over the house of Eliah, king of Israel, in whose house at Tirzah, Zimri, the captain of the half of the chariots, conspired against Eliah, and killed him during a drinking debauch (1 Kings xvi. 9), B.C. 926.

Assan, an Armenian writer (died A.D. 469), who translated into the language of his country the works of Athanasius, Hecat., Eusebius, Jos., 498.

A'sha (Heb. As'há, אָשָׁה, healing, or physician), the name of two men.

1. (Sept. Asó, Josefhus, Ασανός.) The son of Abjiah, grandson of Rebohoam, and third king of the separate kingdom of Judah (1 Kings xv; 2 Chron. xiv-vi; Matt. i. 7, 8). He began to reign two years before his brother in Jerusalem, in which city he reigned forty-one years (B.C. 983-923). As Aša was very young at his accession, the affairs of the government were administered by his mother, or, according to some (comp. 1 Kings xvi. 1, 10), his grandmother Maachah, who is understood to have been a granddaughter of Abesem. See Maachah. But the young king, on assuming the reins of government, was conspicuous for his earnestness in supporting the worship of God, and rooting out idolatry with its attendant moralities, and for the vigor and wisdom with which he provided for the prosperity of his kingdom. In his zeal against heathenism he did not spare his grandmother Maachah, who occupied the special dignity of "King's Mother," to which great importance was attached in the Jewish court, as afterward in Persia, and to which parallels have been found in modern Eastern countries, as in the position of the Sultana Valide in Turkey (see 1 Kings ii, 19; 2 Kings xxiv, 12; Jer. xxxii, 2; also Orsi, in Proym. xvi; and Bruce's Travels, ii. 337, and iv, 244). She had set up some impure worship in a grove (the word translated "idol" 1 Kings xv, 18, is נֵצֶר, a fright or horrible image, while in the Vulg. we read se caset [Maachah] princes in sacris Pruni); but Aša burnt the symbol of her religion, and threw its ashes into the brook Kidron, as Moses had done to the golden calf (Exod. xxxix, 20), and then deposed Maachah. He also placed: in the Temple certain gifts which his father had dedicated, probably in the earlier and better period of his reign [see Abjiah], and which the heathen priests must have used for their own worship, and renewed the great altar which they apparently had desecrated (2 Chron. xv, 8) during his minority and under the preceding reigns, and only the altars in the "high-places" were suffered to remain (1 Kings xx, 11-13; 2 Chron. iv, 2-5). He neglected no human means of putting his kingdom in the best possible military condition, for which ample opportunity was afforded by the peace which he enjoyed for ten years (B.C. 928-938) in the middle of his reign. His resources were so well organized that his nation had so far fortified cities on his frontiers, and raised an army amounting, according to 2 Chron. xiv, 8, to 680,000 men; but the uncertainty attaching to the numbers in our present text of Chronicles has been pointed out by Kennicott and by Davidson (Introduction to the O. T. p. 888), who consider that the copyists were led into error by the different modes of marking them, and by confounding the different letters which denoted them, bearing as they do a great resemblance to each other. See NUMBER. Thus Aša's reign marks the return of Judah to a consciousness of the bich destiny to which God had called her, and to the belief that the Divine power could not be defeated without her. But much of this was invisible in the 18th year of his reign, when, relying upon the Divine aid, Aša attacked and defeated the numerous host of the Cushite king Zerah (q. v.), who had penetrated through Arabia Petraea into the vale of Zephathah with an immense host, reckoned at a million men, which Josephus states consisted of 900,000 infantry and 100,000 cavalry, Ant. viii, 12,1 and 800 chariots (2 Chron. xiv, 9-15). As the troupant Judahites were returning, laden with spoil, to Jerusalem, they were met by the prophet Azariah, who declared this splendid victory to be a consequence of Aša's confidence in Jehovah, and exhorted him to perseverance. Thus encouraged, the king himself during the ten ensuing years of tranquillity to extirpate the remnants of idolatry, and caused the people to renew their covenant with Jehovah (2 Chron. xv, 1-15). It was this clear knowledge of his dependent political position, as the viceroy of Jehovah, which won for Aša the highest praise that could be given to a Jewish king—that he walked in the steps of his ancestor David (1 Kings xvi. 11). Nevertheless, toward the latter end of his reign (the numbers in 2 Chron. xix, 19, and xvi, 1, should be 25th and 26th) the king failed to maintain the character he had thus acquired. He then exacted tribute from Baasha, king of Israel, and engaged in the war between the two kingdoms, and had taken Ramah, which he was proceeding to fortify as a frontier barrier. Aša, the conqueror of Zerah, was so far wanting to his kingdom and his God as to employ the wealth of the Temple and of the royal treasury to decorate the King of Syria's Damascene (2 Kings xvi. 10), a king, in his favor by invading the dominions of Baasha (see Kitto's Daily Bible Illust. in loc.). By this means he recovered Ramah, indeed; but his treasures were squandered, and he incurred the rebuke of the prophet Hanani, whom he cast into prison, being, as it seems, both alarmed and enraged at the effect his address was calculated to produce upon the people. The people (who had probably manifested their disapprobation) also suffered from his anger (1 Kings xv, 16-22; 2 Chron. xvi, 1-10). The prophet threatened Aša with war, which appears to have been fulfilled by the continuance for some time of that with Baasha, as we infer from an allusion in 2 Chron. xvi. 10, to the wars of Ephraim which he took, and which can hardly refer to any events prior to the destruction of Ramah. In the last three years of his life Aša was afflicted with a grievous "disease in his feet," probably the gout [see DISEASE]; and it is mentioned to his reproach that he had not been troubled with the gout in his days [see DISEASE]. Aša, in a way, died an independent and independent spirit, and without seeking God's blessing on their remedies. At his death, however, it appeared that As'ana (Assyriac, a man (or place) whose "sons" (servants of the Temple) returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 81); evidently the Asnah (q. v.) of Ezra ii, 50, rather than the Abinah (q. v.) of Josh. xv, 38 or 43.

Asaph (Heb. Asaph, Ἀσάφ, asherah; Sept. Ἀσάφ), the names of three persons. See Eneriah.

1. A Levite of the family of Gershom (see below), son of Barachiah (1 Chron. vi, 89; xv, 17), eminent as a musician, and appointed by David to preside over the sacred choral services which he organized (1 Chron. xvi, 5), B.C. 1014. The "sons of Asaph" are afterward mentioned as choristers of the Temple (1 Chron. xxiv, 1, 2; 2 Chron. xx, 14; xxix, 18; Ezra ii, 41; iii, 10; Neh. vii, 44; xi, 22), and this office appears to have been made hereditary in his family (1 Chron. xxiv, 1). Asaph was celebrated in after times as a prophet (777f, seev) and poet (2 Chron. xxxiv, 29; Neh. xii, 46), and the titles of twelve of the Psalms (I, xxxiii, to lxxxxii) bear his name, in some of which he evidently stands as a patronymic, i.e. "Asaph's" (comp. the Homerides). See Psalms. The following is his ancestry (see Reinhard, De Asapho, Vienna, 1742).

2. The "father" of Jahoh, which latter was "recorder" in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 17, 38; Isa. xxxv, 5, 22). B.C. ante 762. Perhaps i. q. No. 1.

3. A "keeper of the king's forests" (prob. in Lebanon), to whom Nehemiah requested of Artaxerxes Longimanus an order for timber to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem (Neh. vi, 8). B.C. 444.

Asaph's, Sr., a bishop's see in Flintshire, Wales, founded in the 6th century. The chapter consists of a dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, three canons, two archdeacons, seven curas, and two minor canons. The present incumbent is Thomas Wylor Short, D.D., transferred from Sodor and Man in 1846.

Asar'eel (Heb. Asareel, Nest. bound by God, sc. under a vow; Sept. Esrae'el v. r. Esæph), the last name of the four sons of Jeheleel, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. xvi, 5). B.C. 1051, post 1688.

Asar'elah (Heb. Asareelah, Nest. upright before God; Sept. Esra'el v. r. Esæph, Asare'lah, Astre'ph), the last name of the four sons or the Levite Asaph, who were appointed by David in charge of the Temple music in connection with others (1 Chron. xxxv, 2); elsewhere (ver. 14) called by the equivalent name Jesharelah (q. v.).

Aubury, Daniel, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Fairfax county, Va., Feb. 18, 1762. He served in the war of the Revolution under its closing operations. In 1786 he entered the itinerant ministry, and continued in it, with an interval of nine years, up to 1824, and during this long service his fidelity and diligence were signal-ly manifest. He died suddenly in 1827. — Minutes of Conferences, i, 506; Sprague, Annals, vii, 127.

Aubury, Francis, the first bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church ordained in America, was born at Handsworth, Staffordshire, England, Aug. 20, 1745. His parents were pious Methodists, and trained him with religious care, so that it is no wonder that he was converted at thirteen. In his youth he sat under the ministry of Ryland, Hawes, and Venn, as well as of the Methodist preachers. He obtained the rudiments of education at the village school of Barre, and in his formative years was addicted to a "tackle of chapels." At sixteen he became a local preacher; at twenty-two he was received into the itinerant ministry by Mr. Wesley. In 1771 he was appointed missionary to America, and landed at Philadelphia, with the Rev. Richard Wright as his companion, on the 27th October in that year. The Methodist Church in America had been built three years before; and in 1771 the whole number of communicants was about 600, chiefly in Philadelphia and New York. The country was disturbed by political agitation, soon to develop into revolution. In 1772 Aubury was appointed Mr. Wesley's "general assistant in America," with power of supervision over all the preachers and societies, but was superseded in the year following by an older preacher from England, Mr. Rankin. When the war broke out Rankin returned to England; but Aubury, foreseeing the great work of the church in America, remained. He thought it would be an eternal disgrace to forsake in this time of trial the thousands of poor sheep in the wilderness who had placed themselves under the care of the Methodists, and, fully sympathizing with the cause of the struggling colonies, he resolved to remain and share the sufferings and the fate of the infant connection and of the country. Among the many religious people of those times, he was from associations, examples, and an anchor, as were all the other Methodist preachers, and also many of the clergy of the Episcopal Church, who yet chose to remain in the country. As their character and motives were not understood, they were exposed to much suffering and persecution. The Rev. F. Garretson and Joseph Hartley were imprisoned on the Western Shore of Maryland; Mr. Chew, also one of the preachers, being brought before the sheriff of one of the counties of the same state, and required to take the oath of allegiance, replied that scruples of conscience would not permit him to do so. The sheriff then informed him that he was bound by law to execute the law, and if he persisted in his refusal, no alternative was left but to commit him to prison. To this the prisoner answered very mildly that he by no means wished to be the cause of perjury, and was therefore perfectly resigned to bear the penalty. "You are a strange man," said the sheriff, "for I cannot bear to pun-ish my own children; therefore my own hand shall go as he has gone to prison." He accordingly formally committed him to his own house, and kept him there three months. In the course of this time this gentleman and his wife were both converted to God, and joined the Methodist Church. On the 20th of June, 1776, Mr. Aubury, notwith-stand ing his religious profession, was arrested by the authorities, tried in the Circuit Court of Baltimore, and fined five pounds; and in March, 1778, he retired to the house of his friend, Thomas White, a judge of one of the courts of Delaware, where he re-

Aubury comparatively secluded for ten months. Although his movements were now circumscribed, yet he was by no means idle, and remarks that it was "a reason of the most severe, the most unceasing, the most suffering part of his life." Indeed, two years elapsed before he presumed to leave his retreat, and to travel extensively in the performance of his duties as superintendent; when, the authorities becoming convinced that there was no treason in the Methodist preachers, that they were not thieves, not of a political nature, and that they were merely intent upon preaching the gospel of peace as humble evangelists, they were permitted to exercise their functions unmolested. At the close of the war in 1783 there were 68 Methodist ministers in the work, with nearly 14,000 members. In 1784 the Methodist societies were organized into an Episcopal Church, four years before the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and Mr. Aubury was elected bishop, and consecrated by Dr. Coke, who had been ordained in England by Wesley. From this time to the day of his death his whole life was devoted to the advancement of the preachers and the strengthening of the churches. His personal history is almost the history of the growth of Methodism in his time. His Journal (3 vols. 8vo) contains a wonderful record of apostolic zeal and fidelity, of a spirit of self-sacrifice rivaling that of the saints and martyrs of the early church; of an industry with which it was vain to contend, of a patience which no privations could exhaust. He remained unmarried through life, that he might not be hindered in his work. His salary was sixty-four dollars a year. His horses and carriages were given by his friends, all donations of money from whom he assigned to his fellow-sufferers and fellow-laborers. At one of the early Western Conferences, where the assembled itinerants presented painful evidences of want, he parted with his watch, his coat, and his shirt for them. He was asked by a friend to lend him fifty pounds. "He might as well have asked me for Peru," wrote the bishop. "I showed him all the money I had in the world, about twelve dollars, and gave him five." In spite of his defective education, he acquired a tolerable knowledge of Greek and Hebrew; but his wisdom was far greater than his learning. As early as 1785 he laid the foundation of the first Methodist college; and some time after he formed a plan for dividing the whole country into districts, and made a tour of inspection. As a preacher, he was clear, ca-est, pungent, and often powerfully eloquent. The monument of his organizing and administrative talent may be seen in the discipline and organization of the Methodist Church, which grew under his hands, during his lifetime, from a feeble band of 4 preachers and 316 members to nearly 700 itinerants, 2900 local preachers, and over 214,000 members. Within the compass of every year, the borders of Canada and the planters of Mississippi looked for the coming of this primitive bishop, and were not disappointed. His travels averaged 6000 miles a year; and this not in a splendid carriage, but by roads, by swamps and the swamps of the railroad, but often through pathless forests and untravelled wildernesses; among the swamps of the South and the prairies of the West; amid the beasts of the Carolinas and the snows of New England. There grew up under his hands an entire church, with fearless preachers and untrained members, but he preached to the Gospel, and they experienced it with a gentle charity and an unfinishing firmness. In diligent activity, no apostle, no missionary, no warrior ever surpassed him. He rivalled Melancthon and Luther in holiness. He combined the enthusiasm of Xavier with the far-reaching foresight and keen discership of Wesley, the great reforming preacher. He was interested near and far; he entered in all the schools, he yet seemed to seize upon truth by intution; and though men might vanquish him in logic, they could not deny his conclusions. His unremar-tling labors exhausted a constitution originally frail; yet, with the old martyr spirit, he continued to travel and preach, even eastward, to the extent that he had to be carried from the couch to the pulpit. He died in Spottsylvania, Va., March 51, 1816.

In Church History Francis Asbury deserves to be classed with the greatest propagators of Christianity in ancient or in modern times; and when the secular history of America comes to be faithfully written, his name must be put to the prominent list of all those who contributed, in no small degree, to the progress of civilization in the United States. In the language of Dr. Stevens, in the Knickerbocker Magazine (January, 1859), "He sent his preachers across the Alleghenies, and kept them in the very van of the westward march of emigration. The first 'ordination' in the valley of the Mississippi was performed by his hands; and it is a grave question what would have been the moral development of the mighty states through that imperial domain, had it not been for the brave 'itinerant' corps of Asbury, which carried and expanded the Bible among its log cabins at a time in our national history when it was absolutely necessary for the American churches to send itinerant regular or educated clergymen in any proportion to the growth of its population. If what is called the 'Methodist itinerancy' has done any important service for the moral salvation of that vast region, now the theatre of our noblest states, it is the greatest thing to the unparalleled energy of Francis Asbury. He not only pointed his preachers thither, but led the way. No records of American frontier adventure show greater endurance or courage than Asbury's travels beyond the mountains. Armed hunters, twenty-five or fifty in number, used to escort him from point to point to protect him from the Indians, and great were the gatherings and grand the jubilees wherever he appeared."

Ascension of Christ, his visible passing from earth to heaven in the presence of his disciples, on the Mount of Olives, forty days after the resurrection (Mark xvi, 19; Luke xxiv, 50, 51; Acts i, 1-11). (1) The ascension was a necessary consequence of the resurrection. Had Christ died a natural death, or simply disappeared from view in obscurity, the resurrection, as a proof of Divine power, would have gone for nothing in the sight of those who had just witnessed his death, so as to demonstrate forever his victory over death, and to give a reality to his resurrection. (2) It was predicted in the O. T. in several striking passages (e. g. Ps. xxiv, lxiii, ciii, cx); and also by Christ himself (John vi, 62; xx, 17). (3) It was prepared for in the patriarchal dispensation by the translocation of Enoch (Gen. v, 24; iv, 8; xvi, 5); and in the Jewish Dispensation, the change of Elisha (2 Kings ii, 11; 2 Macc. ii, 11); so that each of the three dispensations have a visible proof of the immortal destiny of human nature. (4) The fact of the ascension is given by two evangelists only; but John presupposes it in the passages above cited. It is referred to, and doctrines built upon it, in the story of the two disciples on the road to Emmaus (Luke xix, 4; Mark xvi, 11; Acts i, 9). Peter and John speedily demonstrated by the descent of the Holy Ghost (John xvii, 17; Acts ii, 38); and had been prophesied by our Lord himself (Matt. xxvi, 64; John xvii, 21). (5) The time of Christ's ascension was forty days after his resurrection. He continued that number of days upon earth in order that he might give repeated proofs of the fact of his resurrection, and of his immortal life, directing the faith of his followers in every thing of importance respecting their office and ministry, opening to them the Scriptures concerning himself (Mark xvi, 15; Acts i, 5-8). (6) As to the manner of his ascension, it was from Mt. Olivet, not in appearance only, but in reality, and that visibly and gloriously. It was suddenly, swift, glorious, and in a triumphant manner. See GLORIFICATION. He was parted from his disciples while he was solemnly blessing them, and multitudes of angels attended him with shouts of praise (Psa. xxiv, 7-10; xlvii, 5, 6; lxvii, 16); (Watson, Theol. Dictionary, e. v.). (7) Its results to the church are: (a) the assumption of regal dominion by Christ; (b) the completion of the exalted Christ the object of adoration, (see Eph. iv, 10, 16; Psa. xlviii); (c) the gift of the Holy Spirit (John xvi, 17, 14; Acts ii, 38; John xiv, 16-19); (d) the intercession of Christ, as mediator, at the right hand of God (Rom. viii, 34; Heb. vi, 20).

The 3d Article of the Church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America is: "Christ, the true and proper head of the Church, having truly risen again from death, and taken again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth, until he return to judge all men at the last day." The corresponding article of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the same, omitting the words "with flesh, bones, and;" an omission which does not affect the substance of the article. Browne's note on this article is as follows: "It is clear" (from the account in the Gospel) that "our Lord's body, after he rose from the grave, was that body in which he was buried, having hands and feet, and flesh and bones, capable of being handled, and in which he spoke, and ate, and drank (Luke xxiv, 42, 48). Moreover, it appears that our Lord thus showed his hands and feet to his disciples at that very interview with them in which he was parted from them and received up into heaven. This will be seen by reading the narratives of St. Luke (vii, 16) and St. John (xx, 17) verse 26 to the end, and comparing it with the first chapter of the Acts, verse 4-9; especially comparing Luke xxiv, 49, 50, with Acts i, 4, 8, 9. In that body, then, which the disciples felt and handled, and which was proved to them to have flesh and bone, these disciples saw our Lord ascend into heaven; and, immediately after his ascension, angels came and declared to them that the 'same Jesus whom they had seen taken up into heaven should so come in like manner as they had seen him go into heaven' (Acts i, 11). All this, connected together, seems to prove the identity of our Lord's body after his resurrection, at his ascension, and so on, even till his judicial ascension on the day of Pentecost; he suffered, and in which he was buried, and so fully justifies the language used in the article of our church. But because we maintain that the body of Christ, even after his resurrection and ascension, is a true human body, with all things pertaining to the perfection of man's nature, (see why which would be done by the fact that Christ is still perfect man as well as perfect God), it by no means, therefore, follows, that we should deny that his risen body is now a glorified, and, as St. Paul calls it, a spiritual body. But, after his ascension, we have St. Paul's distinct assurance that his body of Christ is a glorious, immortal body, like Christ in heaven (1 Cor. xiii, 8). This assertion is true, and it is a very important truth. But that the assertion that, in the resurrection of all men, the body shall rise again, but that it shall no longer be a natural body, but a spiritual body; no longer a corrupt-ble and vile, but an incorruptible and glorious body (1 Cor. xv, 42-53); and this change of our bodies from natural to spiritual is expressly stated to be bearing the image of our glorified Lord—the image of that heavenly man the Lord from heaven (ver. 47-49). So, again, the glorified state of the saint's bodies after the resurrection, which in 1 Cor. xv had been called the receiving a spiritual body, is in Phil. iii. 21 said to be a fashioning of their bodies to the likeness of Christ's glorified body. This change, which we must have cause to dread, it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body. We must therefore conclude that, though Christ rose with the same body in which he died, and that body neither did nor shall cease to be a human body, still it acquit itself, either at his resurrection or at his ascension, the qualities and attributes of a spiritual as distinguished by the apostle from a natural body, of an incorruptible as distinguished from a corruptible body.

Ascension Day, or Holy Thursday, a festival of the church held in commemoration of the ascension of our Lord in the presence of the apostles, before the Pentecost. Whitinistle. Augustine (Ep. 54), supposed it to be among the festivals instituted by the apostles themselves, but was not observed in the church until the third century. It is also noticed in the Apostolical Constitutions. It is especially observed in the Roman Church, and also, though with less form, in the Church of England. It is one of the six days in the year for which the Church of England appoints special psalms.

Asceticism, Ascetics. The name ascéwgos (from aswgo, to exercise) is borrowed from profane writers, by whom it is generally employed to describe the athletes, or men trained to the profession of gladiators or prize-fighters. In the early Christian Church the name was also given to such as imitated themselves to greater degrees of fasting and abstaining than other men, in order to subdue or mortify their passions. See Exercise. The Christian ascetics were divided into abstinentes, or those who abstained from wine, meat, and agreeable food, and continentes, or those who, abstaining from matrimony also, were considered to attain to a higher degree of sanctity. Many laymen as well as ecclesiastics were subject to a still greater degree of the same practice, without, of course, being monks. The ascetic practice, which was in common use a thousand years before it was originally the same with monks: the monastic life, however, was not known till the fourth century (Pagi, Crit. in Bar. A.D. 62, N. 4). The difference between ascetics and monks may be thus stated: 1. The monks were such as retired from the business and conversation of the world to some desert or mountain, but the ascetics were of an active life, living in cities as other men, and only differing from them in the ador of their devotional acts and habits. 2. The monks were only laymen; the ascetics were of any order. 3. The monks were bound by certain laws and disciplinary regulations; but the ancient ascetics had no such laws or regulations. The later ascetics may nevertheless be regarded as the introduction of monasticism. The root of asceticism in the early Christian church is to be found in a Gnostic leaven, remaining from the early struggle with the church of Gnosticism (q. v.). The open Gnosticism was crushed out in the second or third century; but its influence was great, and to a large extent, even by the best of the church fathers, and remained to plague Christianity for hundreds of years in the forms of asceticism, celibacy, monasticism, and the various superstitions of the same class in the Roman Church. That principle makes the "conditions of animal life, and the common alliances of men in the social system, the atheism of the Divine perfections, and so to be escaped from, and deplored by all who pant after the highest excellence." See Taylor, Ancient Christianity, vol. i, where this subject is treated at length and with great mastery of both history and philosophy. See Abstinence; Fast- ing; Monks.

As soon as the inward and spiritual life of the Christians declined, the tendency to rely on external acts and forms increased; and if the previous bloody persecutions had driven individuals from human society into the deserts, the growing secularization of the church, after Christianity became the state religion, had the effect to introduce into the church a spirit that paved the way for monasticism (q. v.); and the church thought herself compelled by the overwhelming tide of opinion within and without to recognize this form of asceticism, and to take it under her protection and care. From the African Church a gloomy and superstitions spirit spread over the Western Church, intensifying the ascetic tendencies. There were not wanting healthier minds—as Vigilantius (q. v.) and others—to raise their voices against fasting, monstery, and the outward works of asceticism generally; but such protests were vain, and became ever rarer. From the 11th century, Waldenses, and other sects assailed the external asceticism of the Church. The classic Petracchio fought on the same side; and so did Wickliffe, Huss, and Jerome of Prague, in their struggles at reformation. After a preliminary skirmish by Erasmus, the struggle was decided in the Reformation of the 16th century. The fundamental principle of that movement was the godlessness of the practice of asceticism, through faith, and not through dead works, struck at the root of monstery and mortification in general. But the victory has not been so complete as is often assumed. The ascetic spirit often shows itself still alive under various disguises even in Protestantism. See Sin. Further, the practice of fasting that other holds self-denial and suffering to be meritorious in the sight of God, in and for itself. Its germinant principle, in all ages of the church, has been, as stated
ASH

Above, a Gnostic way of viewing the relations between God, man, and nature, tending to dualism and to the confounding of sin with the very nature of matter. Aστήρ (q. d. *astyr, replict) or ASCDROGITY or ASCDROGITY, heretics who appeared in Galatia about 173. They pretended to be filled with the "paraclete" of Montanas, and introduced bacchalian indecencies into the churches, where they brought a skin of wine, and, marching round it, declared that they were the vessels filled with new wine of which the Lord speaks in the Gospels. Hence their name from the Greek ἀστίρ, which means "a skin."—Augustine, Hier.. 62; Landon, Eccl. Dict., i, 666. See Montanists.

Ascough, or, according to Godwin, "William Astcuth, doctor of laws and clerk of the council," was consecrated in the chapel of Windsor, July 20, 1488. The year that the controversy came to arise in sundry parts of the realm, by the stirring of Jack Cade, naming himself John Mortimer. A certain number of law persons (tenants for the most part to this bishop), intending to join themselves to the rest of that crew, came to Evendon, where he was then saying of mass. What was their quarrel to him I find not. But certainly it is, they drew him from the altar in his alb, with his stole about his neck, to the top of a hill not far off, and there, as he kneeled on his knees praying, they cleft his head, spoilt him to the skin, and, rendering his bloody shirt into a number of pieces, took every man a rag to keep for a monument of their work of exploit. The day before they had robbed his carriages of 10,000 marks in ready money. This barbarous murder was committed June 29th, the year aforesaid."—Dr. Fuller supposes that the bishop was attacked because he was "learned, pious, and rich, three capital crimes in a clergyman." He also gives us the following distich, which may be applicable in other places:

"Si consuevo cædit populari mitra tumulo, Protigat optamus nunc diadem Deus."

*By people's fury mitre thus cast down
We pray henceforward God preserve the crown.*

Aṣēs. See Aeser.

Aṣebēθa (Aṣebēθia), one of the Levites who, with him, joined the caravans under Ezra (1 E Break., viii, 47); evidently the Shehemman (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra, vii, 18). See Aeser.

Aṣebēθa (Aṣebēθia), another of the Levites who returned in Ezra's party to Palestine (1 E Break., viii, 48); evidently the Habshiyah (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra, vii, 19).

Aṣēnath (Heb. Aṣēmāth, 'Aṣēmāth), on the signification see below; Sept. *Aṣēbēθ v. r. Aṣēbēθ), the daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, whom the king of Egypt bestowed in marriage upon Joseph (Gen. xii, 24; xlv, 20), with the view probably of strengthening his position in Egypt by this high connection, B.C. 1888. See Joseph. She became the mother of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xii, 50).

No better etymology of Aṣēmāth has been proposed than that by Jahloński, who (Polish Egypcis, II, 56; Osperis, II, 298) regards it as representant of a Coptic compound, Aṣēmāth. The latter part of this word he takes to be the name of Neith, the titular goddess of Sais, the Athene of the Greeks, and considers the whole to mean worshipper of Neith. Gesenius, in his Thesaurus, suggests that the original Coptic form was Aṣēbēth, which means who belongs to Neith. That the name refers to this goddess is the generally received opinion (in modern times V and Bohn alone have, in his Genesis, proposed an unsatisfactory Semitic etymology [see Lepineus, Chrom. d. Aegypti, i, 382]): it is favored by the fact that the Egyptians, as Jahloński has shown, were accustomed to call the Greeks by expressive names related to their gods; and it appears liable to no stronger objection than the doubt whether the worship of Neith existed at so early a period as that of the composition of the book of Genesis (see Champollion, Ponitien Egyptian, No. 6). Even this doubt is now removed, as it appears that she was really one of the primitive deities of Lower Egypt (Bunsen, Egypt's Place, i, 880), for her name occurs as an element in that of Nitocris (Neith-akr), a queen of the sixth dynasty (Wilkinson, in Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 142, note 2).

Aσέρ (Aσίρ), the Graecoized form of Aeser (q. v.), both the tribe (Luke ii, 36; Rev. vii, 6) and the city (Tobit i, 2).

Aσερέρ (Aσζέρ), one of the heads of the temple-servants that returned from the captivity (1 E Break., vi, 82); evidently the Siārha (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra ii, 65).

Asgill, John, member of the Irish Parliament, and author of an ecclesiastical book entitled An Argument proving that, according to the Covenant of Eternal Life revealed in the Scripture, Man may be translated hence into that eternal Life without passing through Death, although the humane Nature of Christ himself could not thus be translated till he had passed through Death (Dub- lin, 1618, 8vo). He voted in the Irish Parliament for the blasphe- mous libel, and expelled Asgill from the House after four days. In 1705 he entered the English Parliament as member for Bramber, in Sussex. But the English House, resolving to be not less virtuous than the Irish, condemned his book to be burnt by the common hangman as profane and blasphemous, and ex- pelled Asgill on the 18th December, 1707. After this his circumstances rapidly grew worse, until at last he found something like peace in the King's Bench and the Fleet, between which two places his excursions were confined for the term of his natural life. He died in November, 1738. See Southey, The Doctor, pt. ii; Coleridge, Works (Harpers' ed.), vol. v; Allibone, i, 78.

Aṣāh (Aṣāh, oren, probably tremulous, from the motion of the leaves) occurs only once in Scripture as the name of a tree, in connection with other trees, of whose timber idols were made, Isa. xlv, 14: "He heweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypress and the oak, which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest; he planteth an oren (oren), and the rain doth nourish it." Others consider pine-tree to be the correct translation; but for neither does there appear to be any decisive proof, nor for the rubus or bramble adopted for oren in the fable of the Cedar and Rubus, translated from the Hebrew of R. Berechiah Hananadak by Celsius (Hierobol. I, 186). Oren is translated pine-tree both in the Sept. (мир and the Vulg., and it has been accordingly interpreted as the most learned critics, and among them by Calvin and Bochart. Celsius (ut sup. p. 191) states, moreover, that some of the rabbis also consider oren to be the same as the Arabic sumur (which is no doubt a pine), and that they often join together aron, oren, and boreshim, as trees of the same nature (ל*ט ה*ש ש*ק ס*ל ר*ש ש*ק)." See cedars and ash-trees and cypresses, *Talmud Bah. Pari., fol. xxvi, 1. Luther and the Portuguese translation read orens, the latter part of this word he takes to be the name of Neith, the titular goddess of Sais, the Athene of the Greeks, and considers the whole to mean worshipper of Neith. Gesenius, in his Thesaurus, suggests that the original Coptic form was Aṣēbēth, which means... pleasant fruit it yields, the Pignole nuts of the Italians (Pinus pinea of Linnæus), and quince Virgil (Ciol. vi, 65; Georg. iv, 112). The English version, in the translation of ores, follows those interpreters who have adopted orumus, apparently only because the elementary letters of the Hebrew are found also in the Latin word. See PINE. Celuius objects to this as an insufficient reason for supposing that the ash was intended; and there does not appear to be any other proof. Ormus Europaeus, or manna ash (Fraxinus oromus, Linneas, Plinuenam, li, 516), does, however, grow in Syria, but, being a cultivated plant, it may have been introduced. See MANNA. The common ash was anctually associated with the oak (Stat. Theb. vii, 102) as a symbol of justice and right; (Cichor. Col. xvi, 2) and durable (Horace, Od. i, 9, 3) tree (Pliny, vii, 80; Vir. Geo. ii, 65 sq.), of hardy growth (Virg. Geo. ii, 111; Aen. ii, 626). Celcius (ut sup. p. 192) quotes from the Arab author 'Abu-l-Fadl the description of a tree called arum, which appears well suited to the passage, though it has not yet been ascertained what tree is intended. The arum is said to be a tree of Arabia Petrae, of a thorny nature, inhabiting the valleys, but found also in the mountains, where it is, however, less thorny. The wood is said to be much valued for cleaning the teeth. The fruit is in bunches like small grapes. The berry is noxious while green and bitter, as it becomes red, then black and somewhat sweetish, and when eaten is grateful to the stomach, and seems to act as a stimulant medicine. Sprengel (Hist. reih. i, 14) supposes this to be the caper plant (Capparia spinosa of Linneas). Faber thought it to be the Rhamnus simul pentaphyllus of Shaw. Link (in Schraeber's Journ. f. Botan. iv, 292) identifies it with Flavocuria sepiaaria of Roxburgh, a tree, however, which has not been found in Syria. It appears to agree in some respects with the Sarcodora Persica, but not in all points, and therefore it requires further investigation by some traveller in Syria conversant both with plants and their Oriental names and uses.—Kita. See BOTANY.

Aab. See Abbey; Mort.

Aab. St. George, bishop of Derry, was born in 1658, became fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, 1679, and provost of Trinity, 1692. He was appointed bishop of Cloyne in 1695, was translated to Clogher, 1697, and thence to Derry in 1716. He died in Dublin in 1717. He was a frequent preacher of separate sermons, and contributed to the papers of the Royal Society, of which he was a member.

Aab, John, LL.D., an independent minister, was born in Dorsetshire in 1724, and died in 1779. At first he pursued mathematics, but afterward studied theology, and entered the ministry. He was associated with Dr. Caleb Evans in founding the Bristol Education Society." He settled as pastor at Pershore, Worcestershire, and devoted a large part of his time to the preparation of A New and Complete Dictionary of the English Language (2 vols. large 8vo, 1775), on an extended plan, and the best work of its class at the time. He also published a work on Education (1777, 2 vols. 12mo) — The Dialogues of Expressions of the Muses. Magazine, xlix, 215; Darling, Cyclop. Biblioth. i, 113.

Ash, Hs. Ashan, g, g, smoke. Sept. 'A'sh; in 1 Chron. iv, 82, 'A'sh v. 'A'sh; in Josh. xv, 42, omites), a Levitical city in the low country of Judah named in Josh. xv, 42 with Libnah and Ether. In Josh. xix, 7, and 1 Chron. iv, 82, it is mentioned again belonging to Simeon, but in company with Ain and Rimele, which seems to have been much more to the south. In Josh. xix, 59, it is given as a priests' city, occupying (perhaps by error of transcription) the same place as the somewhat similar word Ain (A/'N) does in the list of Josh. xxi, 16. In 1 Sam. xxx, 50, the fuller form Chor-ashan is named with Hormah and other cities of the "South."

Euæbusius and Jerome (Orosiust. v.) mention a village named Ashan 2 or 3 mi. 16 miles west of Jerusalem; but this, though agreeing sufficiently with the position of the place in Josh. xvi, 42, is not far enough south for the indications of the other passages; and indeed this is a doubtful intimation (Cellar. Notit. ii, 486). See ASHAN. It appears to have been situated in the southern part of the hilly region adjoining the plain. Such cake is made by possessing one locality, properly in the plain of Judah, but assigned (with Ether, q. v.) to Simeon. See Tribe.

Aah-beel (Heb. Avh-beel, y, y, y, evacuation, otherwise swellling: Sept. 'Evebli, the head of a family mentioned as working in fine linen, a branch of the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chron. iv, 21). B.C. prob. cir. 1017. The clause in which the word occurs is obscure (see Bertheau, Comment. in loc.). Houbigant and Boistredy understand a place to be meant by the expression. The Tangier (ed. Wilkins) paraphrases it "the house of Ebeba."

Aah-bel (Heb. Ashbel, y, y, y, prob. for Eshbaal; Sept. 'A'sh-bili, in Num. 'A'sh-bili v. r. 'A'sh-biq, the second son of Benjamin (Gen. xvi, 21; 1 Chron. vii, 1). B.C. 1586. See JEDARI. His descendants were called Ashbilles (Num. xxxvi, 88). See BECHER.

Aabelito (Heb. with the art. ha-Ashbeli', y, y, Sept. o 'A'sh-bili v. r. 'A'sh-biq, Vulg. Ashbelites. A. V. "the Ashbilles."

Aah-cake (C/-vy, wqal, or y, y, y, y, "cake," "cake baked on the hearth." Gen. xviii, 6; xix, 8; 1 Kings xvii, 13; Exek. iv, 12, etc.; Sept. yapwqin) a thin round pancake baked over hot sand or a slab of stone by means of ashes or coals put over them, or between two layers of hot embers of the dung of cows or camels (see Schubert, iii, 28; Arvieux, iii, 257). Such are still relished in the East (by the Arabs of the desert) as a tolerably delicious dish (see Theronet, ii, 25, p. 286; Schweiger, p. 283; Niebuhr, Besch. p. 62). See CAKE. Ash-cakes are made in large numbers, but it is not much time for baking. It must be turned in order to be baked through and not to burn on one side (Hoax, viii, 6). It was made commonly of wheat flour (Gen. iv, 6). Barley-cakes are mentioned (for the time of scarcity) in Exek. iv, 12.—Winer. See BREAD.

Aachennas (Heb. Aeshennas, y, y, y, y, Vulg. Aenecus), a less correct form (1 Chron. i, 6, 7; Sept. Arv. v. r. A'rsennas; Jer. li, 27, Sept. o A'rsennas v. r. Arv. vsenass, A. V. Arv. usenass, A. V. Aenecus, Aenecus) of Anglicizing the name Askennaz (q. v.).

Ahd (Heb. A'dsh, y, y, a stronghold; Sept. and N.T. A'rhoj, the Aesous of the Greeks and Romans, and so called in 1 Mac. iv, 15; Acts viii, 40 (see also Plin. Hist. Nat. v, 14; Polyb. v, 16) a city of the Philistines Pentapolis, on the summit of a grassy hill (Richardson, Travels, ii, 206), near the Mediterranean coast (comp. Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 4), nearly midway between Gaza and Joppa, being 1 geographical miles north by east from the former (2000 ft.) and 21 south according to Dios. sic. xix, 88, and 21 south from the latter; and, more exactly, midway between Askelon and Ekron, being 1 geographical miles north by east from the former, and south by west from the latter (see Orelli. Notit. ii, 599; Mannert, vi, 1, 261 sq.). Ashdod was one of the chief of the Philistines, and was in the first town of one of their five confederate states (Josh. xiii, 18; 1 Sam. vii, 17). It was the seat of the worship of Dagon (1 Sam. v, 1; 1 Macc. xi, 4), before whose ashdodite in this city it was that the captured ark was deposed and triumphed over the idol (1 Sam. v, 1-9).
Ashdod was assigned to Judah (Josh. xv, 47); but marches of the Canaanites before it and the other Phili-tine towns were subdued (1 Kings iv, 24) [see Philistines]; and it appears never to have been permanently in possession of the Judaeites, although it was dismantled by Uzziah, who built towns in the territory of Ashdod (2 Chron. xxvi, 6). It is mentioned to the reproach of the kings of Judah and their subjects in that they married wives of Ashdod; the result of which was that the children of these marriages spoke a mongrel dialect, composed of Hebrew and the speech of Ashdod (Neh. xiii, 23, 24). It was a place of great strength; and being on the usual military route between Syria and Egypt, the possession of it became an object of importance in the wars between Egypt and the great northern powers. Hence it was secure by the Assyrians under Tarchan (B.C. 715) before invading Egypt (Isa. xx, 1 sq.) ; and about B.C. 680 it was taken by Psaamitcheus, after a siege of twenty-nine years, the longest on record (Herodot. ii, 157). That it recovered from this blow is to be seen in the name which was afterwards given to the city as an independent power in alliance, after the exile, with the Arameans and others against Jerusalem (Neh. iv, 7). The destruction of Ashdod was foretold by the prophets (Jer. xxxv, 20; Amos i, 8; ii, 9; Zeph. ii, 4; Zach. ix, 6), and was accomplished by the Maccabees (1 Macc. v, 98; 7, 77, 8; xi, 4). It is mentioned in the war between the town in the province of Syria (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 4; War, i, 7, 7), and among the cities ruined in the wars, which Gabinius ordered to be rebuilt (Ant. xiv, 5, 8).
It was included in Herod's dominion, and was one of the three towns bequeathed by him to his sister Salome (War, xvii, 8, 1; xi, 5). The evangelist Philip was found at Ashdod after he had baptized the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts iv, 20). Azotus early became the seat of a bishopric; and we find a bishop of this city precent at the councils of Nice, Chalcedon, A.D. 451, Se-leucia, and Jerusalem, A.D. 586 (Ridel. Palestine, p. 629). Ashdod submitted as a small unwalled town in the time of Jerome. It was in ruins when Benjamim of Tudeba visited Palestine (Itin. ed. Asher, i, 79); but we learn from William of Tyre and Vitruvius that the bishopric was revived by the Latin Christians, at least titularly, and made suffragan of Traves. Traves (Traverses, p. 151) describes it "as a place of no repose, in the Faute de morir (Traverses, iv, 188) speaks of it as an Arab village (comp. Van Trollo, 1666, p. 340).
Irby and Mangles (p. 180) describe it as an inhabited site marked by ancient ruins, such as broken arches and partly-buried fragments of marble columns; there is also what appeared to these travellers to be a very ancient hani, the principal chamber of which had obviously, at some former period, been used as a Christian chapel. The place is still called Esedul (Volney, Trav. ii, 251; Schwarz, Palest., p. 120). The name occurs in the cuneiform script (q.v.). The ancient remains are few and indistinct (Hackett, Illustra.
The Script. p. 150). The ruined hani to the west of the village, and Acropolis of the ancient town, and at the grove near it alone protects the site from the shifting sand of the adjoining plain, which threatens, at distant day, entirely to overwhelm the spot (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 319). — KITTO, S. V.

The inhabitants are styled Ashdodites (Ashdodites) (Neh.
iv. 7; 12; Ashdodites). Josh. xiii, 3; the dialect is the Ashdodites (Heb. in the plur. with the art. Ashdodites). "Sept.

tants (Neh. iv. 7 [Heb. 1] of ASHDOD (q. v.).

Ashdodites (Heb. with the art. ko-Ashdodites). The subject of this entry is the city Ashdod, which is mentioned in the Bible as a place of significant historical and religious importance. Its history includes its capture by Psaamitcheus, the destruction during the reign of Uzziah, and its later role as a place of great strength. Ashdod's strategic location between Syria and Egypt made it a valuable asset in the region, and it was eventually given to the Assyrians. The city was also known for its contribution to the spread of the Ethiopian eunuch, and it had a significant religious history, with a bishopric established in the area. The city's ruins were described by various authors, including William of Tyre and Vitruvius, who noted its importance in the Christian community. The city was eventually linked to the Persian and Messianic traditions, and its ruins are still visible today, offering a glimpse into its past.

Asher (Heb. 'Asher), אַשֶּר, happiness; Sept. and Targ. Nasaia, 'Asip, the name of a man and (the tribe descended from him), and of one or more places.

1. The eleventh of the sons of Jacob, and his third and Zilpah, the handmaid of Leah (Gen. xxxv. 26), and founder of one of the twelve tribes (Num. xxvi. 44-47). Born B.C. 1914. The name is interpreted in a passage full of the paronomastic turns which distinguish these very ancient records: "And Leah said, in my happiness am I (קָהָה אָשֶׁר), my daughters have called me happy (רְאֵי אָשֶׁר), and she called his name Asher (אַשֶּר), i.e. "happy" (Gen. xxx. 18). A similar play of words is observable in the blessing of Jacob (Deut. xxxii. 24). God was Zilpah's other and elder son, but the fortunes of the brothers were not all connected. Asher had four sons and one daughter (Gen. xli. xlii. 20; Deut. xxxii. 24).

TRIBE OF ASHER.—Of the tribe descended from Asher no action is recorded during the whole course of the sacred history. The name is four or five times in the various lists of the tribes which occur throughout the earlier books, as Gen. xxxv. xlvi. i. Num. i. ii. xiii. etc., and like the rest, Asher sent his chief as one of the spies from Kadesh-barnaa (Num. xiii.). During the march through the desert his place was between Dan and Naphtali, on the north side of the tabernacle (Num. ii. 27); and after the conquest he took up his allotted position without any special mention. On quitting Egypt the number of adult males in the tribe of Asher was 41,500, which made it the ninth of the tribes (excluding Levi in number—Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin only being below it. But before entering Canaan an increase of 11,900—a addition exceeded only by Manasseh—raised the number to 53,400, and made it the fifth of the tribes in population (comp. Num. i. 40; xxxvi. 47). The genealogy of the tribe appears in some instances to have been preserved till the time of Christ (Luke ii. 26, "Aser").

The limits of the territory assigned to Asher are, like those of all the tribes, and especially of the northern tribes, extremely difficult to trace. This is partly owing to our ignorance of the principle on which these ancient boundaries were drawn and recorded, and partly from the absence of identification of the majority of the places named. The general position of the tribe was on the seashore from Carmel northward, with Manasseh on the south, Zebulin and Issachar on the southeast, and Naphtali on the north-east (Josephus, Ant. v. i. 22). The boundaries and towns are given in Josh. xix. 24-31; xvii. 10, 11; and Judg. i. 51, 82. From a comparison of these passages it seems plain that the limits of Asher were not fixed, but that the boundaries of the tribe, in which case the southern boundary was probably one of the streams which enter the Mediterranean north of that place, apparently the embouchure of Wady Milheb. Crossing the promontory of Carmel, the tribe then possessed the maritime continuation of the plain of Esdraelon, probably for a distance of five or six miles (20-25 miles) along the shore. The boundary then ran northward from the valley of Jiphthah-el (Jefuat) that to the Leontes, and reaching Zidon, it turned and came down by Tyre to Achzib (Eclipsa, now es-Zib). See Tyre. It is usually stated that the whole of the Phoenician territories, including the island of Cyprus, assigned to this tribe (comp. Josephus, Ant. v. i. 22; see Reland, Palast., p. 575 sq.). But there are various considerations which militate against this conclusion (see the Pictorial Bible, Num. xxvii. 24; Josh. xix. 24; Judg. i. 81), and tend to show that the assigned frontier-line was drawn out to the sea south of Sidon. The strongest text for the inclusion of Sidon (Tyre was not then founded) is that in which it is mentioned to the reproach of the Asherites, that they did not drive out the Sidonians (Judg. i. 81). This Michaelis is disposed to reject as an interpolation; but Kitt (Pict. Bibl. loc.) conceives it to denote that the Asherites in fact were unable to expel the Sidonians, who by that time had encroached southward to part of the coast actually assigned to the Asherites; and be strengthens this by referring to the subsequent foundation of Tyre, as evincing the disposition of the Sidonians to colonize the coast south of their own proper territories. The Asherites were for a long time unable to gain possession of the territories actually assigned them, and "dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land" (Judg. i. 82); and, "as it is not usual to say of a larger number that it dwells among the smaller, the inference is that they expelled but comparatively few of the Canaanites, leaving them, in fact, a majority of the population" (Bush, note on Judg. i. 82). See Sidos.

The following is a list of the places within this tribe that are mentioned in the Bible, with the modern localities to which they appear to correspond. Such of the latter as have not been identified by any traveller are enclosed in brackets:

Asher (Judg. v, 17, 18). At the numbering of Israel at Sinai, Asher was more numerous than either Ephraim, Manasseh, or Benjamin (Num. i, 32-41), but in the reign of David, so insignificant had the tribe become, that its name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chron. xxvii, 16-22); and it is with a kind of astonishment that it is related that “divers of Asher and Manasseh and Zebulun” came to Jerusalem at the Passover of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 11). With the exception of Simeon, Asher is the only tribe west of the Jordan which furnished no hero or judge to the nation. “One name alone shines out of the general obscurity—the aged widow, Anna, the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Aser,” who, in the very close of the history, departed not from the Temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day” (Stanley, Palestine, p. 281).

The inhabitants of the tribe were also called Asherites (Heb. Asherti, אֵשֶׁרִית, Sept. v. v. אָסְרִי, Judg. i, 32).

2. A city on the boundary of the tribe of Manasseh, near Michmash and east of Shechem (Josh. xvii, 7): according to Eusebius (Onomast. v. v. Δεσπρων) a village 15, according to the Itin. Hieros., 9 Roman miles from Shechem toward Scythopolis, near the highway. This position nearly corresponds to that of the modern village Yai, containing ruins, about half way between Nablous and Beisan (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 289); the Tayesir suggested by Porter (Henderson, p. 348).

3. A city in Galilee near Tiberias (Tobit i, 2, Eng. Vers. “Asser”), possibly a corruption for Hazor (q. v.), a city in the tribe of Naphtali (see Fritzschte, Comment. loc.), or perhaps identical with the foregoing place.

Asherah (אֶשֶׁרָה; Asherah; Auth. Vers. “grove,” after the Sept. Ἀσσαράς; Vulg. lacus), a Canaanitish (Phoenician) divinity, whose worship, in connection with that of Baal, spread among the Israelites already in the age of judges (Judg. iii. 7; vi. 26) and was more permanently established later by the Queen Jezebel in the land of Ephraim (1 Kings xvi, 33; xviii. 19), but at times prevailed in the kingdom of Judah also (2 Kings xvii, 4; xxi, 8; xxi, 4; 2 Chron. xxxi, 1 sq.). See Asherah. She had prophets, like Baal (1 Kings xviii, 19), and her rites were characterized by licentiousness (2 Kings xxiii, 7; Ezek. xxiii, 42).

Her images, בְּרִיתָא, or בְּרִיתָא, were of wood (Judg. vii, 26), (as appears ever from the words used to express their annihilation, Gesen. Thes. p. 162; Movers, Phöniz. p. 567), which were erected sometimes together with those of Baal, as בְּרִיתָא וּבַיָּתָא, over the altar of the latter (Judg. vi, 26); at one time even in the Temple of Jerusalem (2 Kings xi, 7; xxi, 8); besides, there is mention of בְּרִיתָא (houses), tents or canopies, woven by the women for the idol (2 Kings xxiii, 7), which circumstance in itself would be indicative of a connection with the worship of Baal (Judg. iii. 7; vi. 26; 1 Kings xvi, 18 sq.; xviii. 19). That Asherah is an identical divinity with Ashtoreth or Astarte is evident from the translation of the Sept. at 2 Chron. xxxiv. 15, 17, from that of Symmachus or Aquila at Judg. iii. 7; 2 Kings xvii, 10 (as also from the Syriac at Judg. iii. 7; vi. 25; see Gesen. Thes. p. 163); and this was the prevailing opinion of the Biblical antiquarians up to Movers, who (Phöniz. p. 560) thinks that Asherah should be distinguished from Ashtoreth, and that Asherah to be a seafaring Philitus erected to the Telluric goddess Baalitis (Des Syra, whence the goddess herself was then called Asherah, i. e. סֶפֶל), while Ashtar should be considered a sidereal divinity. See Astarte. It may appear strange that the same divinity is mentioned under two names in the historical books of the O. T., and it remains doubtful in what sense Antiochus and others have been called Asherah; the identity of the two idols, however, is evident from Judg. ii. 13 (see iii. 7); and this invalidates also the objection that there is no men...

tion of obscene rites in the worship of Astarte (2 Kings xxiii, 7). It does not appear from 2 Kings xxiii, that Asherah and Astoreth were two distinct divinities, for the only distinction made here is between the different places of worship; ver. 6 mentions an Asherah eroding the temple in Jerusalem (2 Kings xxvi, 7), and ver. 18 speaks of the idols which were on the high-places before Jerusalem (since the times of Solomon? see 1 Kings xi, 7); ver. 14 is connected with ver. 18, and treats of the same idols, while ver. 16 refers to another locality (see 2 Kings xxiii, 10). Finally, the term Asherah is never expressly called a Sidonian divinity like Astarte, yet she is mentioned (1 Kings xvii, 19; xviii, 19) with the idols introduced by Jezebel (see De Wette, Archdol. p. 822 sq.). Hence Bertheau (Bicht. p. 66 sq.) declares himself also in favor of the identity of Astoreth with Asherah, supposing, however, that the former might have been the name of the goddess, and the latter that of her idol (see Movers, p. 555), and agrees with Movers in thinking that מַשָּד means erect (pillar), and is indicative of the Phallic worship. But though Asherim and Asheroth are so often mentioned separately from statues that we could hardly think these terms have been used likewise to signify carved idols, are rather inclined to suppose they must have been something more rough and simple (the word, perhaps, not a mere tree, as in Deut. xxvi, 21; see Dan. xi, 40); yet from this it does not follow that the word should originally have signified the (wooden) fēṣah; and against the translation with recta we might adduce, that to be erect is more properly expressed in the Hebrew by the verb שָׁן than by שַׁן; and if we would grant the above distinction in such passages as 1 Kings xviii, 19; 2 Kings xxii, 4, undoubtedly שָׁם should have been written. Consequently, we must let the Phallic character of Asherah also rest as it is; and until more correct explanations can be given, we must be content with the result that Asherah is essentially identical with Astarte; and both these are not differing from the Syrian goddess, whose rites were of obscene character, who is certainly reflected in the Cyprian Aphrodite, and is furthermore identical with the Western mythological representations. (See J. van Yperen, Obs. crit. de sacris quibid. fluvialibus et Ashalla dea, in the Bibli. Hugon. iv., 81-122; Gesenius, Comment. s. Jea. ii, 336; Stehr, Relig. d. Orientis, p. 439; Vatke, Relig. d. Ashes (properly נֵבֶט, e'pher, from its whiteness, σπαρός; twice נָבָט, aphar), Num. xix, 17; 2 Kings xxiii, 4, elsewhere "dust;" also נבש, de'sen, lit. fatness, i.e. the fat ashes from the victims of the altar, Lev. i, 16, iv, 12; vi, 10, 11; 1 Kings xi, 8, 9; or of corpse burnt, Jer. xxxi, 40, ashes being used as a manure for land, Pinn. xvii, 9. In 1 Kings xxviii, 48, 49, נבש, aphar, incorrectly rendered "ashes," signifies a covering for the head or turban, Sept. rαμαμ, and so the Vulgate. A. Schol. Method, d. Schultze, p. 207; comp. Augustine, De civ. Dei. iv, 10; ii, 8.) —Winer, a. v. See ASH-CAKE.

In general, respecting the Biblical mention of ashes (נֵבֶט, de'sen; נבש, e'pher), the following things deserve notice: (1) As the ashes of the sacrifices consumed upon the altar of burnt-offerings accumulated continually (Lev. vi, 3 sq.), they were from time to time removed so as to cleanse (נֵבֶט) the altar. For this purpose there were in the sanctuary shovelsh (נֵבֶט) and ash-pots (נֵבֶט) of brass (Exod. xxvii, 8; xxxviii, 5). The performance of this office (by the priests) is not prescribed in the law; but, according to the Mishnah (Tamid, 1 and ii), the scouring of the altar was assigned by lot to a priest, who, after the top of the altar had been cleared of coals, etc., swept the ashes together into a heap (נֵבֶט, apple, from its shape), and (according to the rabbins) took the greatest part of it away (for some of the ashes must always be allowed to remain) in order that the city might not be exposed to the city to a state un disturbed by the wind. Only on high festivals the ashes were suffered to lie upon the altar as an ornament (Mishnah, Tamid, ii, 2). Also upon the altar of incense ashes gradually accumulated; and the removal of these was likewise apportioned among the priests by lot. The priest to whom this function fell was called the tashbeher, or tashbeh, and the tashbeher, or the tashbeh, in the Talmud, and the priest had used a part in cleansing the candlestick, carried out and poured the contents on the floor of the porch (Mishnah, Tamid, iii, 9; vi, 1, i, 4). See ALTAR. (2) On the expiatory ashes of the red heifer (נֵבֶט, Num. xix), see PURIFICATION. (3) In deep affection persons were accustomed, as an act suitable to the violence of internal emotions, to scatter dust or ashes (נבש) on their heads, or in their hair, and to sit, or lie, or even roll in ashes, whence the symbol of intentional mourning (Job xii, 6; Matt. xi, 21). See GRIEF. The Mishnah (Tammith, ii, 1) mentions a custom of covering the ark that contained the law with ashes on fast-days, and the rabbis even allude to a ceremonial sprinkling of persons with ashes on the same occasions (see Baraethon, on Tammith ii). (See generally Reinhardt, De sacco et cinere, Vilnius, 1898; Plado, De cineris usus lugubris, Haifa, 1713; Schmid, De cinerum in sacris usus, Lips. 1722; Carpoz, Cinerum ap. Heb. usus, Rost. 1783; Quantat, De cinere in sacris Heb. Regiom. 1713; Goetz, De cinerum in sacris usus, Lips. 1722.) (4) The ancient Persians had a ceremony of "purifying criminals by stoning them in ashes" (Valerius Maximus, ix, 2). Thus the wicked Menelaus was despatched, who caused the troubles which had disquieted Judea (2 Mac. xiii, 5, 6), being thrown headlong into a tower fifty cubit deep, which was filled with ashes to a certain height. The action of the criminal to disengage himself plunged him still deeper in the whirling ashes; and this agitation was increased by a wheel, which kept them in continual movement till he was entirely choked. —Winer, a. v. See ASH-COOK.

Ashes were a symbol of human frailty (Gen. xviii, 27); of deep humiliation (Ezech. iv, 1; Jon. iii, 6; Matt. xxvi, 39; Mark xiv, 35); solemnized the death of the criminal (Mark xiv, 38); a ceremonial mode of purification (Heb. ix, 13; Num. xix, 17); they are likened to hoar-frost (Psa. cxlv, 16). In Ezek. xxxvii, 30, we find the mourning Tyrians described as wallowing in ashes; and we may remark that the Greeks had the like custom of strewning themselves with ashes in mourning (Homer, Iliad, xviii, 22; Odys. xxiv, 615; comp. Virgil, Æn. x, 844, and Ovid's Metamorph. viii, 526). Job ii, 8, "And he sat down among the ashes." So Ulysses in Odyssey, viii, 158 (see also Iliad, xxv, 35). Psa. cii, 9, "I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping," i.e. I have eaten the bread of humiliation, and drunk the water of affliction; ashes being the emblem of the one, and tears the consequence of the other (see Horne, in loc.). So Isa. lix, 8, "A beautiful crown instead of ashes" (see Latham's note). See 2 Sam. xiv, 2; Judith x, 3; Isa. xvii, 20, 21. "He feedeth on ashes," i.e. on that which affords no nourishment, and is fit only for outward expression, for using ineffectual means, and bestowing labor to no purpose. In the same sense Hosea says (xii, 1), "Ephraim feedeth on wind" (see Latham, in loc.). See MOURNING.

Ashima (Heb. אַשִּׁם, etymology unknown; Sept. ἀσμαῖ, is only once mentioned in the Old Testament as the god of the people of Hamath, whose worship the colonists settled by Shalmanesar introduced into Samaria (2 Kings xviii, 30). The ASHKELON

Babylonian Talmud, in the treatise Sanhedrin (cited in Carpzov's Apparatus, p. 516), and the majority of Jewish writers (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 238), assert that Ashima was worshipped under the form of a goat without a head; the Talmud of Jerusalem (Carpzov, ii. 58) says that a learned rabbi of the sixteenth century, assigns the word the sense of 'ape; in which he was, in all probability, deceived by the resemblance in sound to the Latin simia. Jurieu and Calmet have proposed other fanciful conjectures. Aben Ezra's narration (Prof. ad Esth.) of the worship of Ashima at the Samaritan Epiphany, Gen. i. 1, must be seen in Hottinger's Exercit. Anamorim, p. 40. The opinion, however, that this idol had the form of a goat appears to be the one best supported by arguments as well as by authorities (see Scyrithart, Systema astrum, p. 154 sq.). This agrees with the Egyptian worship of Fan (see Selden, De diea Syl. p. 521, 508 sq.), as well as the appearance of the goat among the sacred animals delineated on the Babylonian relics (Millin, Monum. inedita, i. tab. 8, 9). Some have compared the Samaritan Asma (אֲסֹמָא of Deut. xiv. 5 (see Castell, Annot. Samar.)), a kind of bark. Barkey, on the other hand (in the Biblioth. Brem. nec. i, 1, 125 sq.; ii, iii, 572 sq.), refers to the Phoenician god Es-son (אֶסֹון, Damascus. In Phoeb. Biblioth. p. 242, 579; in Phoenician אסום, Gesenius, Monum. Phan. i, 135; and Arabic عسوم, god of the Gen. i. 19, 529 sq.). Miller (Onomast. p. 609) proposes a Semitic etymology from the Arabic assam, a kind of the lion applied to the sun; and Lette (in the Biblioth. Brem. nec. i, 1, 60 sq.) compares Asam, the Arabic name for a valley or river of the infernal regions. Gesenius (Comm. lib. Jasa. ii, 449) refers to Aššumu, or the genius (star) of Jupiter (the heavens), i. e. Mercury, of the Zodi-Aveta (Bundkesh, ii, 66); but against this Kueker (in loc.) objects that in the Paris edition (ii, 386) the name is Ankhave. (See Schulte, De Asima Hanathaur. idolo, Viteb. 1722.)

Ashkelon (Heb. Ḥeškele̓n, עַשֵּׁקָלון, prob. migration [the usual form would beCHASE, Ḥeshekel; Rödiger (in Gesenius, Thes. p. 1476) suggests that the uncommon termination is a Philistine form]; Sept. and Josephus, Όσκαλων; Auth. Vern. "Ashkelon." in Judg. i, 18; 1 Sam. vi. 17; 2 Sam. i, 20; the Ḥešṣolo of the Greeks and Romans and medieval writers), was one of the five cities of one of their five states (Judg. xiv. 19; 1 Sam. vi. 17; 2 Sam. i, 20), but less often mentioned, and apparently less known to the Jews than the other four. This, doubtless, arose from its remote situation, alone, of all the Philistine towns, on the extreme edge of the shore of the Mediterranean (Jer. vii. 7), and also well to the south. Gaza, indeed, was still farther south, but then it was on the main road from Egypt to the centre and north of Palestine, while Ashkelon lay considerably to the left. The site fully bears out the above inference; but some indications of the fact may be traced, even in the scanty notices of Ashkelon which occur in the Bible. Thus, the name is omitted from the list in Josh. xv. of the Philistine towns falling to the lot of Judah (but comp. Joseph. Ant. v. 1, 22, where it is specified), although Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza are all named; and considerable uncertainty rests over its mention in Judg. i, 18 (see Bertheau in Exeg. Hebr. in loc.). Samson was born in Timnah, where, when he was still the thirty men and took their spoil, as it to a remote place where his exploit was not likely to be heard of; and the only other mention of it in the historical books is in the formulative passages, Josh. xii. 3, and 1 Sam. vi. 17, and in the casual notices of Jud. ii. 28; 1 Mac. x. 86; xi. 60; xii. 23. The other Philistine cities are each distinguished by some special occurrence or fact connect- ed with it, but except the one exploit of Samson, Ashkelon is to us no more than a name. In the poetical passage 2 Sam. i. 20, it is named among heathen foes. The inhabitants were called Ashkelonites (Heb. Ḥes-kele̓nites, עַשֵּׁקָלִים, Sept. Ṣerkhele̓m, Όσκαλόννης, Auth. Vern. "Eshkelonites," Josh. xiii. 8, 9).

It was a port on the Mediterranean coast between Gaza and Ashdod (Josh. xiv. 19; 1 Sam. vi. 11, 12; 2 geogr. miles N. of the former, 10 S. by W. from Ashdod, and 37 W.S.W. from Jerusalem (comp. Reland, Palest. p. 443). Ashkelon was assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xiii. 13; comp. Judg. i. 18); but it was never for any length of time in possession of the Israelites (comp. 1 Kings iv. 24). It is farther mentioned in the denunciation of Jehovah (Jer. xlii. 14; 5, 7; Amos i, 8; Zeph. ii. 4, 7; Zech. ix. 5). The part of the country in which it stood abounded in aromatic plants (Plin. xili, 51), and especially onions (shallots, ascalonum, Plin. xiii, 32; Strabo, xvi, 759; Athen. ii, 68; Theophr. Plant. vii, 4; Dioscor. i, 124; Colum. xii, 10), and vines (Alex. Thrall, viii, 8). The soil around the town was remarkable for its fertility; the wine of Ashkelon was celebrated, and the Alkena plant flourished better than in any other place except Canopus (Kenrick, p. 22). It was also celebrated for its cypresses, for figs, olives, and pomegranates, and for its bees, which gave their name to a valley in the neighborhood of Ashkelon called Beth-gaz. (Ritter, Palestina, 68). It was well fortified (Joseph. War, iii, 21; comp. Mela, i, 11), and early became the seat of the worship of Derecto (Diod. Sic. ii, 4), the Syrian Venus, whose temple was plundered by the Scythians (Herod. i, 105). She represented the passive principle of nature, and was worshipped under the form of a fish with a woman's head (comp. Ovid, Fast. ii, 406). See ATERGATIS.

"The sacred doves of Venus still fill with their cooings the luxuriant gardens which grow in the sandy hollow within the ruined walls" (Stanley, p. 257). After the time of Alexander, Ashkelon shared the lot of Phoenicia and Judea, being tributary sometimes to Egypt (Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, 5), and at other times to Syria (1 Mac. x. 86; xi. 60, 38). Herod the Great was born at Ashkelon, and although the city did not belong to his dominion, he adorned it with fountains, baths, and colonnades (War, i, 21, 11); and after his death Seleucus, his sister, resided in a palace at Ashkelon (Cassius, bestowes "Herculea" on this city in xvii, 11, 5). It suffered much in the Jewish war with the Romans (War, i, 18, 5; iii, 2, 3, 3); for its inhabitants were noted for their dislike of the Jews, of whom they slew 2500 who dwelt there (ii, 18, 5; iii, 2, 1). After this Ashkelon again revived, and in the Middle Ages was noted not only as a stronghold but as a wealthy and important town (Will. Tyr. xxv, 21). In the fourth century it was the see of a bishop, but in the seventh century it fell into the hands of the Saracens. Abulfeda (Tab. Sgr.) speaks of it as one of the famous strongholds of Mohammedanism; and the Origenes call it the Bride of Syria (see Geogr. s. v.; Eredi, ed. Jaubert, i, 240). It shared with Gaza an infamous reputation for the steadfastness of its heathenism and for the cruelties there practised on Christians by Julian (Belard, p. 588, 590). As a sea-port merely it never could have enjoyed much advantage, the coast being sandy and difficult of access. This, however, did not hinder shelter for merchantmen. After the harbor toward the east advanced a little way into the town, and anciently bore, like that of Gaza, the name of Majummas (Kenrick, p. 28). In the time of Origen some wells of remarkable shape were shown near the town which were believed to be those dug by Isaac, or of the time of the Patriarchs. In connection with this tradition may be mentioned the fact that in the Samaritan version of Gen. xx, i, 2, and xxvi, 1, Ashkelon (עַשֵּׁקָלִים) is put for the "Gerar" of the Hebrew text. The town bears a prominent ASHKENAZ part in the history of the Crusades (see Ibn Ferath, in Reinard's Extracta, p. 525). After being several times dismantled and fortifled in the forts of Saladin and Richard, its fortifications were at length totally destroyed by the Sultan Bajacur A.D. 1270, and the port filled up with stones, for fear of future attempts on the part of the Crusaders (Wilkin, Gesch. d. Kreuzzüge, vii, 586). This, no doubt, sealed the ruin of the place (see Celler. Notit. ii, 600 sq. : Rosenmüller, Albertus, ii, 277 sq.). Sandys (Travels, p. 151, A.D. 1610) describes it as "now a place of no great estimation, certainly not then that the Turk rede doth keep there a garrison." Fifty years after (A.D. 1660), Von Troilo found it partially inhabited. But its desolation has long been complete, and little now remains of it but the walls, with numerous fragments of granite pillars (Arveieux, ii, 59; Jo- lliffes, p. 369), some still strongly standing; the thick walls, flanked with towers, were built on the top of a ridge of rock that encircles the town, and terminates at each end in the sea (Robinson's Re- searches, ii, 368 note). The ground within sinks in the manner of an amphitheatre (Richardson, ii, 202-204; Eti Smith, in Missionary Herald for 1827, p. 344). The modern name of the place is Ashmun (Aboulker, ii, 244), a name that is inhabited by Arabs and Christians (Schwarz, Palest. p. 120). The modern village is a little north of the old site, and the houses are built of the fragments of the ancient city. It is situated in a cove formed by a lofty ridge rising abruptly near the shore, running up eastward near the midst of the town, and then running away from the west, and finally to the north-west again. The position, now surrounded with desolate ruins of its former grandeur, is still beautiful, the whole interior being planted with orchards (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 327 sq.). See also Ashmun.

ASHKENAZ (Heb. 'Ashkenaz, עַשְּקֶנָז, signif. unknown [comp. Ashpenaz]; Sept. Ἀσκέναζ, Gen. x, 3, v. r. Ἀσκέναζ in 1 Chron. i, 6; Ἀσκέναζοι in Jer. ii, 27; in both the latter passages Auth. Vers. "Ashkenass") was the first named of the three sons of Gomer, son of Japhet (B.C. cir. 2479), and of a tribe of his descendants. In Jeremiah it is placed at Ararat and Minni, provinces of Armenia; whence it is probable that Ashkenaz was a province of Armenia (q. v.), or, at least, that it lay not far from it. Near the borders of Asia Minor is Ashmun (see Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. i, 1, 238). Among other less probable conjectures may be named the following: Bochart (Phalèg, iii, 9) refers it to the lake Accanites in Bithynia (Strabo, xi, 568 sq.; Plin. v, 43; xxxi, 46, 10), and the city and region of Accanites in Phrygia Minor (Arrian, Alex., i, 80; Plin. v, 40; see Michaels, Spegel, i, 89 sq.); Calmet to the Ascanians at Tanais, and the marsh of Moctis (Plin. vi, 7, where, however, the best editions read "Contacapata" for "Ascanitaceae"); Schultheiss (Parad. p. 178) to the district Aetasnutis (in the vicinity of Ararat) and the neighboring city of As- tanacos. Hease (Endeck, i, 19) regards the word as a corruption for "Pontus Arta- scus," as to designate the inhabitants of the province of Pontus; Josephus (Ant. i, 6, 1) merely says "Aschenan (Ἀσκένανζος) founded the Ashcanhans (Ἀσκένανζοι), whom the Greeks now call Rajgians (Ῥάγιγιας);" but this latter name does not occur in classical geography (Joseph Mede conjectures the Rhetian), 'γιας, but these are as far from probability as the supposition of the modern Jews that the Germanus are meant, see Vater, Com., i, 100). The Tarquin of Jonathan understands Αἰδιάμβρια (Σανταμβρία), a province of Assyria; and the Arabic in Gen. the Scari, in Jer. the inhabitants near the Caspian Sea. Assuming that the Japhetic tribes migrated from their original seats westward and northward (see Jaffé), thus populating Asia Minor in Europe, we might perhaps refer the tribe of Ashkenaz (as having migrated along the northern shore of Asia Minor) in Europe in the name Scandia, Scand-inavia. Knobel (Völkerfel, p. 85) regards the word as a compound (Ὀσιανος, the latter element being equivalent to the Gr. γιας, Lat. gena, genus, Eng. kind, kin; the meaning, therefore, being the As-race. If this were so, it might seem that we here find the origin of the name Asa, which has been repeatedly used as the name of the whole eastern part of the world. The slightness of the foundation, however, of all these identifications is evidently evident. The opinion of Görres (Völkerfel, p. 92) that Ashkenaz is to be identified with the Cumry or Gaelic race seems even less probable than that of Knobel. See Ethnology.

ASHNAD, William, a Presbyterian minister, born at Philadelphia in 1798, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1818. After studying under Dr. J. P. Wilson, he was licensed to preach in 1820. He labored in Lancaster till 1828, when he accepted a call to Charleston, S.C., and entered on his duties there in May, 1829. Returning to the north for his family, he was taken ill, and after one or two relapses, died at Philadelphia, Dec. 2, 1829. He was an accomplished scholar and a devoted minister. After his death appeared Sermons, with Sketch of Life (Phila. 1830, 8vo.)—Sprague, Annals, iv, 643.

ASHNUM, Jerudi, agent of the American Colon- ization Society, was born at Champain, N. Y., in April, 1794. He was educated at Burlington, where he graduated in 1816. After a few years' residence in New York, he became the agent in the “Maine Charity School,” where his stay was brief. He afterward removed to the District of Columbia, where he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and edited the “Theological Repertory.” Being appointed to take charge of a re-enforcement to the colony at Liberia, he embarked for Africa June 19, 1822, and arrived at Monrovia August 6. He remained there for several months after his arrival, while his whole force was 35 men and boys, he was attacked by 800 armed sav- ages, but by his energy and desperate valor the assail- ants were repulsed, and again, in a few days, when they returned with redoubled numbers, were utterly defeated. When ill-health compelled him in 1829 to take a voyage to America, he left behind him in Africa a community of 1200 freemen. He died at New Haven August 25, 1828. He was a person of great energy of character, and most devoted piety, and his services to the infant colony were invaluable.—Gurley, Life of Ashnum (Washington, 1835); Sugg, History of the Ame- rican Mission, vol. ii, 380; North America, xii, 565.

Ashnah (Heb. 'Ashnakh, עַשְּנָה, fortified; otherwise bright; Sept. Ἀσκέναζ), the name of two cities, both in the "plain" of the tribe of Judah.

1. One mentioned between Zorah and Zanoah (Josh. xv, 33), apparently in the region north of Eleu- theropolis and west of Jerusalem (see Keil, Comment. in loc.), and near the boundary-line, almost within the territory afterward assigned to Dan (see Josh. xix, 41), and probably near Beth-shemesh, possibly at the site of the modern "large village Deir A'bin" (Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 154). It probably is the Asi (Ἀσι) or Bethanum (בֵית-נָעַמ) placed by Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v.) at 15 or 16 Ro- man miles west of Jerusalem.

2. Another town, certainly in Judah, mentioned between Jibnah and Nezbib (Josh. xv, 48); apparently in the region immediately south and east of Eleu- theropolis (comp. Keil, Comment. in loc.), probably not very far from this last; possibly the present Dei Alum, a ruined village on a low mound (Robinson, Researches, ii, 400). Eusebius and Jerome also speak of an Aros (Ἀρός) near Aroth without any particulars.

Ashpenaz (Heb. 'Ashpenaz, עַשְּפֶנָאצ, persb. from Persia and Scythian yuan, horse, and scap, nose, i.e. "horse-nose;" Sept. Ἀσκέναζ), the master of the eunuchs, or, rather, one of the principal chamberlains of Nebuchadnezzar (B.C. 604), who was commanded to select certain Jewish captives to be instructed in the literature and science of the Chaldeans (Dan. i. 8).

In this number he included Daniel and his three companions, whose Hebrew names he changed to Chaldean (Dan. i. 7). Their refusal to partake of the provisions sent from the monarch's table filled Ashpenaz with apprehension, for at that time, as in our days, the Assyri- atic despots frequently punished with death the least infraction of their will. He had, however, the generosity not to use constraint toward them. In accordance to the request of the three Hebrew captives they were properly instructed; and the grateful prophet specially records that God had disposed Ashpenaz to treat him with kindness (ver. 8-16). See Daniel.

Ash'e'tiel (1 Chron. vii. 74). See ASHEIEL.

Ash'ataroth (Heb. Astarot', אסתרתא, plur. of Astaroth', Jos. ix. 10; xii. 4; xiii. 25, 31; Sept. Ασταροθ; but Auth. Vers. "Astaroth," in Deut. i. 4; Sept. in 1 Chron. vi. 71, v. r. Ασταροθ and Παμαθοδ, a city on the east of Jordan, in Bashan, in the kingdom of Og, doubtless so called from being a seat of the worship of the goddess of the same name. See ASH'TAROTH. It is generally mentioned as a description or definition of Og, who "dwelt in Astaroth in Edrei" (Deut. vii. 14). "At Astaroth and at Edrei" (Josh. xii. 13), or "who was at Astaroth" (Is. x. 6). It is also mentioned as one of the cities which were given to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 31), and was given with its suburbs or surrounding pasture-lands (לְךָָוּת) to the Geshronites (1 Chron. vi. 71 [56]), the other Levitical city in this tribe being Golan. In the list in Josh. xxi. 27, the name is given as Beersheba ("house of Ashoret"; Reland, p. 621). Nothing more is heard of Ashoret, except that Uziah, an Asherathite, is named in 1 Chron. xii. 44. It is not named in any of the lists, such as those in Chronicles, or of Jeremiah, in which so many of the trans-Jordanic places are enumerated; and hence it has usually been considered the same with the place elsewhere called ASH'ROTHEROTH-KARNAYM (q. v.). Eusebius and Jerome, however (Onomast. s. v. Ashoret, "A'saroth"); mention it as situated 6 Roman miles from Adra and Edar (Edrei), which again was 25 from Bosra; and the former adds that it lay on higher ground (אשִׁרְיָד) than Ashoret-Karnaim, which they farther distinguish by stating (in the next art.) that there were two villages (אִישָּׁמ, אִישָּׁס) lying 9 miles apart, between Adra and Edar; one of these was probably Ashoret simply, and the other perhaps Ashoret-Karnaim. The only trace of the name yet recovered in the region indicated is Tell-Aššaroth or Ašherah (Ritter, Erdb. xvi. 819; Porter, ii. 212); and as this is situated on a hill, it would seem to correspond to the Asharet in question.—Smith, s. v.

Ash'terathite (Heb. Aššarōthîth, אסתרתית; Sept. 'A'sārōwōt), an epithet of Uziah, one of David's braves (1 Chron. xix. 44), as being an Asherathite, or citizen of ASH'ROTHEROTH (q. v.) in Bashan.

Ash'oteroth-Karnaim (Heb. Ashberōth Karna'im, ובְּרֹת אֶום, Ashberoth of the two towns, from the horrid image of Ashberoth, Gen. xiv. 5; Sept. 'Aṣṣarōwōt [xin] Kapavaō), a place of very great antiquity, the abode of the Rephaim at the time of the incursion of Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 5), while the cities of the plain were still standing in their oasis. Its name of Ashberoth appears to be derived from the worship of the moon under that name [see ASHTAROTH]. There is little need to look further than the crescent of that luminary and its symbolical image for an explanation of the addition Karna'im, "horned" (Sanchoanthon, in Euseb. Prep. Ec. i. 10; ed. Orelli, p. 85). In 2 Chron. xxii. 21, 25, mention is made of the temple of this Ashberoth (Ashberoth Kapavaō), which is described as a strongly fortified town of difficult access, but which was taken by Judas Maccabaeus, who slew 25,000 of the people therein. The same place is doubtless that called Carmaim (Kapavaō) in 1 Macc. v. 43 (comp. Kapavaos, Josephus, Ant. xii. 8, 4). These notices, however, give us no indication of its locality beyond that of the "Land of Galad," the inference of Ritter (Erdb. xvi. 822); but the Carmaim of the Apocrypha was in a narrow valley, is not sustained by the passages themselves. It is usually assumed to be the same place as the preceding ASHTAROTH, but the few facts that can be ascertained are all against such an identification. (1) The affix "Karna'im" does not indicate any distinct formation, and which in the time of the Maccabees, as quoted above, appears to have superseded the other name. (2) The fact that Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticom, though not very clear on the point, yet certainly make a distinction between Ashberoth and A-Karna'im, describing the latter (s. v. Kapavropoi, Karnaim) as a "large village" (ἐνωπίων πόλις or ἀρχαίας, vicus grandis in angulo Bataneae). (3) Some weight is due to the rendering of the Samaritan version, and of the Arabic version of Saadia, which give Ashberoth as in the text, but A-Karna'im by entirely different names; the former rendering it Aššākōr, which is the name we should have supposed to be in the text; but the latter, 'Eṣ-Samāin, apparently meaning the still important place which continues to bear precisely the same name, on the Haj route, about 25 miles south of Damascus, and to the N.W. of the Leja (Burckh. p. 56; Ritter, Erdb. xvi. 812), but which seems to be identified by moderns with a place somewhere too far from Edrei. See ASHTAROTH. Ashberoth-Karnaim is now usually identified with Mezara, the situation of which corresponds accurately enough with the distances given by Eusebius (Leake, Preface to Burckhardt's Travels, p. xii). Here is the first castle on the great pilgrim road from Damascus to Mecca. It was built about 540 years ago by the Sultan Solimmon; it is a square structure, about 100 feet on each side, with square towers at the angles and in the centre of each face, the walls being 60 feet high. The interior is an open yard, with ranges of warehouses against the castle wall to contain stores of provisions for the pilgrims. There are no dwellings beyond the castle wall, and within it only a few mud huts upon the flat roofs of the warehouses, occupied by the peasants who cultivate the neighboring grounds. Close to building this lake on the north and east side are a great number of springs, whose waters at a short distance collect into a lake or pond and spread a flat and fairly level basin, and a half of a mile in diameter. In the mid of this lake is an island, and at an elevated spot at the extremity of a promontory advancing into the lake stands a sort of chapel, around which are many remains of ancient buildings. There are no other ruins. (Burckhardt, Travels, p. 241 sq.; Bucking- ham's Arab Tribes, p. 162; Chesney, Euphr. Exped. i. 511; Capt. Newbold, in the Lond. Geog. Jour. xvi. 338; comp. Schwartz, Palest. p. 223, 236.) See also ASHTOROTH; CHALAMISH.

Ashton, Wm. Easterly, a Baptist minister, was born May 18, 1798, in Philadelphia, licensed as a preacher in 1814, and was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church at Hopewell, N. J., the following year. In 1816 he removed to Lockely, Philadelphia County, Pa., where he labored successfully for seven years. Mr. Ashton devoted part of his time to teaching, establishing a female school in Philadelphia, which soon became very popular. In 1823 he accepted a call from the third Baptist Church in Philadelphia, which charge he held for the year before his death in 1824, his health and disease compelled him to relinquish it. He died July 26, 1836.—Sprague, Annals, vi. 631.

Ash'toreth (Heb. Ash'toret, אסתרע, 1 Kings xi. 3; 2 Kings xxiii. 13; Sept. 'Aṣṭā'rāpā'; also in the plur. ASHT'HROTH (Heb. Ashtarot, אסתרות, 1 Kings vii. 5; 2 Sam. vi. 18; 11, 12; 13, 'Aṣṭārāpā; in Judg. ii. 18, 11, 'Aṣṭārāpā; in 1 Sam. vii. 5; xii. 10, rá Ṿaquea; in 1 Sam. xxxi, 10, ῥο ἀεροπρίσιον, the name of a goddess of the Sidonians (1 Kings xi, 6, 23), and also of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi, 10), whose worship was introduced among the Israelites during the period of the judges (Judg. ii, 13; 1 Sam. vii, 4), was celebrated by Solomon himself (1 Kings xi, 5), and was finally put down by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii, 15). She is frequently mentioned in connection with Baal, as the corresponding female divinity (Judg. ii, 18); and, from the addition of the words "and all the host of heaven," in 2 Kings xxiii, 4 [see ASHERAH], it is probable that she represented one of the celestial bodies. There is also reason to believe that she is meant by the "queen of heaven," in Jer. vii, 18; xiv, 17; whose worship is there said to have been solemnized by burning incense, pouring libations, and offering cakes. Further, by comparing the two passages 2 Kings xxiii, 4, and Jer. viii, 2, which last speaks of the "sun and moon, and all the host of heaven, whom they served," we may conclude that the moon was worshiped under the names of queen of heaven and of Ashtoreth, provided the connection between these titles is established. See IDOLATRY.

The worship of Astarte was very ancient and very widely spread. We find the plural Ashuratho joined with the adjective Karmim, as the name of a city, so early as the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv, 5), and we read in a temple of this goddess, apparently as the goddess of war, among the Philistines in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxxi, 10). From the connection of this goddess with Baal or Bel, we should, moreover, naturally conclude that she would be found in the Assyrian Pantheon, and, in fact, the name Ishtar appears to be clearly identified in the list of the great gods of Assur (Tello, Nisr, and Bab. p. 229; Rawlinson, Early History of Babylon, Lond. 1854, p. 23; Rawlinson, Herodotus, i, 634). There is no reason to doubt that this Assyrian goddess is the Astarte of the Old Testament and the Astarte of the Greeks and Romans. The worship of Astarte seems to have extended wherever Phoenician colonies were founded. Thus we find her name in inscriptions still existing in the island of Cyprus, on the site of the ancient Citium, and also at Carthage (Gesenius, Mon. Phæn. p. 125, 449), and not uncommonly as an element in Phoenician proper names, as Ἀσταρσός, Ἀσλασσάρπος, Δαιλασσάρπος (Joseph. Antiq. xiii, 16, 9), and in the name of a city in the northern part of Syria. Moreover, when in Egyptian hieroglyphics, as Asar (Gesenius, Thes. v. s. v.), it is of evidence for her widespread worship, see also Eckel, De nost. iii, 869 sq.). It is of worth of remark that Rödiger, in his recently published Addenda zu Gesenius' Thesaurus (p. 106), notices that in the inscription on the sarcophagus of a king named Emsanazar, discovered in January, 1856 (see Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 86 note), the founding, or at least restoration of the temple of this goddess, at Sidon, was attributed to him and to his mother, Amastretho, who is farther styled priestess of Ashuratho. According to the testimonies of profane writers, the worship of this goddess in Syria was different in all countries and colonies of the Syro-Arabian nations. She was especially the chief female divinity of the Phoenicians and Syrians—the Baalith or female Baal; Astarte the Great, as Sanchoniathon calls her (ed. Orelli, p. 84). She was known to the Babylonians as Mylitta (i.e. possibly ἡ στυρίτης, the emphatic state of the fem. participle act. Aphel of ἡ, generic) (Herod. i, 81); to the Aramaeans as Altith or Altith (Herod. ii, 8) (i.e. according to Pococke's occurrences [see first ed. p. 110], altith, the goddess [which may, however, also mean the crescent moon—see Freytag's Lex. Ar.]; or al-Hildî, the moon; or, according to Kleiser's suggestion, al-Wallid, generic) [see Bergmann, De Relig. Arab. Antelaeolalicis, Argentor. 1884, p. 7]. The supposed Punic name Tkalath, ἡ μήτερα, which Münter, Hamaker, and others considered to mean generatrix, and to belong to this goddess, cannot be adduced here, as Gesenius has recently shown that the name has arisen from a false reading of the inscriptions (see his Mem. Ling. Phænicien, p. 114). But it is not at all open to doubt that this goddess was worshipped at ancient Carthage, and probably under her Phoenician name. The classical writers, who usually endeavored to identify the gods of other nations with their own, rather than to discriminate between them, have recognized several of their own divinities in Ashtoreth. Thus she was considered to be Juno (Augustin, Quast. in Joâ. xiv); or Venus, especially Venus Urania (Ciceri Nat. Div. iii, 28; Theodoret, In Libr. iii, Reg. Quest. i, 1; and the numerous inscriptions of Bona Dea Coelestis, Venus Coelestis, etc., cited in Münter's Religion der Kartagener, p. 78); or Leda (Herodotus, vi, 18, where she is named Ἀσταρτη, Lucian, De Dea Syria, iv). A part of the Phoenician mystic respecting Astarte is given by Sanchoniathon (Euseb. De Prep. Enang. i, 10): "Astarte the most high, and Jupiter Demarus, and Adon, king of the gods, reigned over the country, with the assent of Saturn. And Astarte placed the head of a bull upon her own head, as an emblem of sovereignty. As she was journeying about the world, she found a star wandering in the air, and having taken possession of it, she consecrated it in the sacred island of Tyre. The Phoenicians say that Astarte is Venus." This serves to account for the horned figure under which she was represented, and affords testimony of a star consecrated as her symbol. The fact that there is a connection between all these divinities cannot escape any student of ancient religions; but it is not easy to discover the precise link of that connection. Ashtoret was probably confounded with Juno, because she is the female counterpart to Baal, the chief god of the Syrians—their Jupiter, as it were—and with Venus, because the same lascivious rites were common to her worship and to that of Ashtoreth and her cognate Mylitta (Creuzer, Symbolik, ii, 28). But so great is the intermixture and confusion between the gods of pagan religions, that Münter further identifies Ashtoreth—due allowance being made for difference of time and place—with the female Kibr, Assur, with the Egyptian Isis, with the Paphian Venus, with the Persian and Ephesian Diama, with the Belisha of Commodus, with the Armenian Amndik, and with the Samian, Maltesian, and Libcean June. She has also been considered to be the same as the Syrian Sdva, the Atergatis of 2 Macc. xii, 26, whose temple appears, from 1 Macc. v, 48, to have been situated at Asheroth-Karnaim. See ASHTORETH. Her figure ASHTORETH (in various forms) is certainly found on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments (Layard’s Nimrud, ii, 169); which likewise contain illustrations of most of the attributes ascribed to her in scriptural as well as profane authorities (see Jour. Sot. Lit. Oct. 1862, p. 88 sq.). As a form of the goddess Ashtoreth (Jasus iii, 387), that the original form under which Ashtoreth was worshipped was the moon; and that the transition from that to the planet Venus (which we will immediately notice) was unquestionably an innovation of a later date. It is evident that the moon alone can be properly called the queen of heaven, as also the dependent relation of the moon to the sun makes it a more appropriate symbol of that sex, whose functions as female and mother, throughout the whole extent of animal nature, were embodied in Ashtoreth. See BAAL. Movers (Phin. 567) distinguishes two Astartes, one Carthaginian-Sidonian, a virgin goddess symbolized by the dove; and the other Phoenician, the symbol of the planet Venus. But it seems most likely that both the moon and the planet were looked upon as symbols, under different aspects and perhaps at different periods, of the goddess, just as each of them may in different aspects of the heavens be regarded as the ‘queen of heavens’. The rites of her worship, if we may assume their resembling those which profane authors describe as paid to the cognate goddesses, in part agree with the few indications in the Old Testament, in part complete the brief notices there into an accordant picture. The cove mentioned in Jer. vii, 18, which are called in Hebrew יַסְדֵּר, kadeshim, were also known to the Greeks by the name χασδής, and were by them made in the shape of a sickle, in reference to the new moon. Among animals, the dove, the crane, and, in later times, the lion were sacred to her, and among fruits the pomegranate. No blood was shed on her altar; but male animals, and chiefly kids, were sacrificed to her (Tact. Hist. ii, 3). Hence some suppose that the reason why Judah and other tribes were to give the first-born to the Lord was that she might not lose the sacrifice it to Ashtoreth (see Tuch’s note to Gen. xxxviii, 17). The most prominent part of her worship, however, consisted of those libidinous orgies which Augustine, who was an eye-witness of their horrors in Carthage, describes with such indignation (De Civ. Dei, ii, 3). Her priests were eunuchs in women’s attire (the peculiar name of whom is קדְסֵי, kadeshim, male devotees, sacrí, i.e. cineda, Galli, Kings xiv, 24), and women (CallBack, kessedh, female devotees, sacra, i.e. mereters, Hos. iv, 14, which term ought to be distinguished from ordinary harlots, הרעוג, who, like the Bayaderes of India, prostituted themselves to enrich the temple of this goddess. See SODOMITE. The prohibition in Deut. xxiii, 18, appears to allude to the dedication of such funds to such a purpose. As for the places consecrated to her worship, although the numerous passages in which the Author. Vers. has erroneously rendered ג quint., Asharak, by grove, are to be deducted [see Grove], there are several occasions on which gardens and shady trees are mentioned as peculiar seats of (probably her) lascivious rites (Isa. i, 29; lxx, 3; Kings xiv, 23; Hos. iv, 13; Jer. ii, 20; iii, 13). She also had celebrated temples (1 Sam. xxi, 10). As to the form and attributes with which Ashtoreth was represented, the oldest known image, that in Paphos, was a white conical shape, often seen on Phoenician remains in the figure which Tacitus thus describes, l. c.: “The statue of the goddess bears no resemblance to the human form: you see a round figure, broad at the base, but growing fine by degrees, till, like a cone, it lessens to a point.” In Canaan she was probably represented as a cow. It is said in the book of Tobit, i, 6, that the tribes which revolted sacrificed to the goddess ‘in the fields of Baal’; in Phoenicia she had the head of a cow or bull, as she is seen on coins. At length she was figured with the human form, as Lucian expressly testifies of the goddess of Tyre, which is substantially the same as Ashtoreth; and she is so found on coins of Seve- rus, with her head surrounded with rays, sitting on a lion, and holding a thunderbolt and a sceptre in either hand. What Kimchi says of her being worshipped under the figure of a sheep is a mere figment of the rabbins, founded on a misapprehension of Deut. vii, 13. As the words “flocks (Ascharoth) of sheep” there occurring may be legitimately taken as the love of the flock (Venus and the bacchantes), the whole foundation of that opinion, as well as of the notion that the word means sheep, is unsound.

The word Ashthoreth cannot be plausibly derived from any root or combination of roots in the Syro-Arabian languages. The best etymology, that approved by Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 1083), derives it from the Persian sidār, star, with a prosthetic guttural (i. q. נִשְׂדֵר, Nisder, Esther, *dōrīq). Ashthoreth is feminine as to form; its plural ASHTOROT also occurs (Judg. ii, 13; x, 16; 1 Sam. vii, 4; xii, 10; xxxi, 10), as is likewise the case with Baal, with which it is in this form often associated (Judg. x, 6; 1 Sam. vii, 4; xii, 10); and this peculiarity of both words is thought (by Gesenius, Theos. x. v.) to denote a plurality of images (like the Greek Hermeis), or to belong to that usage of the plural which is found in words denoting lord (Ewald, Hebr. Gram. § 365). Movers, however, contends (Phin. 1, 175, 602) that the plurals are used to indicate different modifications of the divinities themselves. In the earlier books of the O. T. Ashthoreth and Ashtoreth, and it is not until the time of Solomon, who introduced the worship of the Sidonian Asar- tate, and only in reference to that particular goddess, Ashthoreth of the Sidonians, that the singular is found in the O. T. (1 Kings xi, 5, 58; 2 Kings xxiii, 13).—Kittit, Smith. See AŠTARTE.

He had several sons by each of his two wives (1 Chron. iv, 5), and through these he is called (in both passages) the “father” (founder) of Tekoa, which appears to have been the place of their eventual settlement. B. C. cir. 1658. Schwartz suggests (Polest. p. 119) that the name may be connected with the Beth-Zacharia (q. v.) of Josephus (War, i, 1, 5); but this lies at some distance from Tekoa also. See also Aššūr.

The Chaldee paraphrase (Targum of Jonathan) supposes the inhabitants of Asher (אָשֶּר, "of the house of Asher"), which is supported by several MSS. that read גֵּדִיוֹן (Gedidion), Hebr. Text, ad loc.). The "Asherites" will then denote the whole of the country west of the Jordan above Jezreel (the district of the plain of Edromelos), and the tribe, apparently, will predicate regularly from northern Gilead, Asher to Benjamin. The form "Asherites" occurs in Judg. i. 82. See ASHER. By some of the old interpreters—Arabic, Syriac, and Vulgate versions—and in modern times by Ewald (Gesch. I. 11, i. 145), the name is taken as meaning the Gezerites, the members of a small kingdom to the S. or S.E. of Damascus, one of the petty states which were included under the general title of Aram (q. v.). The difficulty in accepting this substitution is that Gezer had a king of its own, Talmai, whose daughter, moreover, was married to David somewhere about this time (1 Chron. iii. 2), compared with 4), a circumstance not consistent with his being the ally of Jabin, or with the latter being made king over the people of Gezer. Talmai was still king many years after this occurrence (2 Sam. xii. 8). In addition, Gezer was surely too remote from Manasseh and from the rest of Jabesheth's territory to be intended here. See GEser. Still others understand that the clan referred to are the same as the Ashterites (Heb. Asherim, Vulg. Asarim, Sept. Asherim, etc.) of the northern tribe (in reference to the "Ashtari", an Arab tribe said (with the Letusim and Leumim) to be descended from Dedan (Gen. xxxv, 8), and who appear from these notices to have settled in the south-western part of the Hauran, where they became somewhat incorporated with the Israelites. See ASHRA.

In Ezek. xxvii. 6, Ashur (אָשֶׁר, plur. See BOX-Tree.

Ash-Wednesday (dies cineris), the first day of Lent. It is so called from the custom observed in the ancient Church of penitent sinners on this holy occasion of appearing in sackcloth and ashes. But it is not certain that this was always done precisely on Ash-Wednesday, there being a perfect silence in the most ancient writers about it. The discipline used toward penitents in Lent, as described by Gratian, differed from their treatment at other times; for on Ash-Wednesday they were presented to the bishop, clothed in sackcloth, and barefooted; then the seven penitential psalms were sung; after which the bishop laid his hands on them, sprinkled them with holy water, and poured ashes upon their heads, declaring to them that as Adam was cast out of paradise, so they, for their sins, were cast out of the Church. Then the inferior ministers expelled them out of the doors of the church. In the end of Lent, on the Thursday before Easter, they were again presented for reconciliation by the deacons and presbyters at the gates of the church. But this method of treating penitents in Lent carries with it a claim of a more modern practice: there was no use of the holy water in the ancient discipline, nor seven penitential psalms in their service, but only one, viz. the fifty-first. Neither was Ash-Wednesday anciently the first day of Lent, till Gregory the Great first added it to Lent to make the number of fasting-days fifty, which became usual; but in both respects it was. Nor does it appear that anciently the time of imposing penance was confined to the beginning of Lent, but was granted at all times, whenever the bishop thought the penitent qualified for it. In Rome the spectacle on this occasion is most ridiculous. After giving themselves up to all kinds of gaiety and licentiousness during the Carnival, till twelve o'clock on Ash-Wednesday morning, the people go on Ash-Wednesday morning into the churches, when the officiating priests put ashes on their head, repeating the word, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." The day is kept in the English Church by proper collections and lectures, but without the ashes ceremony:—See Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xviii. ch. ii. § 2; Pococke, Continuation, p. 276; Burnet,Hist. Antiq. of the Jews, vol. ii. p. 94; Marteno, De Ant. Eccl. Bisdom. lib. iv. cap. xiv. Treatises on this observance have been written by Gleich (Viteb. 1689), Mittwoch (Lips. 1688), Schmid (Helmst. 1702), Sieber (Lips. 1709). See ASHER.

1. Continent of Asia. —The ancient Hellenic writers were strangers to the division of the earth into parts or quarters, and hence we never find the word Asia in a geographical writer's books in the Maccabees, and there in 84.

In its widest application, however, as designating in modern geography a leading division of the globe, it is of the deepest interest in sacred literature. This part of the world is regarded as having been the most favored. Here first the man was created; here the patriarchs lived; here the law was given; here the greatest and most celebrated monarchies were formed; and from hence the first founders of cities and nations in other parts of the world conducted their colonies. In Asia our blessed Redeemer appeared, wrought his salvation for mankind, died and rose again; and from hence the light of the Gospel has been diffused over the world. Laws, arts, sciences, and religions almost all have had their origin in Asia. See ETHNOLOGY.

1. Geographical Description. — Asia, which forms the eastern and northern portion of the great tract of land in the oldest known division of the globe, and is usually called the cradle of the human race, of nations, and of arts. It is separated from Australia by the Indian and Pacific Oceans; from America on the north-east by Behring's Straits, and on the east by the great Eastern or Pacific Ocean; from Europe, by the Mediterranean Sea and the Arabian Gulf, the Red Sea, with the Straits of Babylamaban; from Europe by the Kaskaia Gulf (at the extreme north-west), by the Caspian Sea and the River Ural, by the Black Sea and the Caspian, by the Sea of Marmora and the Dardanelles, and by the Grecian Archipelago. It is united with Asia by the narrow isthmus of the Isthmus of Suez, and with Europe by the lofty Caucasian Mountains and the long Ural range. The area is about 16,175,000 square miles.

The inhabitants of Asia (whose number is variously estimated at from 800,000,000 to 800,000,000) are divided into three great branches: The Tatar-Caucasian, in the West of Asia, the Chinese branch in the East, and the Mongolian branch in the Circassian form; the Mongolian race is spread through Eastern Asia; the Malay in Southern Asia and the islands. The north is inhabited by the Samoidees, Tchouchkites, and others. The following tribes, of different language and origin, may be distinguished, some of which are relics of scattered tribes of nomades: Kamtchatkales, Ositaks, Samoledes, Korkacs, Kurilians, Aleutians, Coreans, Mongols, and Kal- mucks, Manchouchos (Tuongoons, Daurians, and Man- choos Proper), Finns, Circassians, Georgians, Greeks, Syrians and Armenians, Tatars and Turks, Persians and Aghians, Tibetans, Hindos, Siamese, Malays, Assyrians, Khethis, and the Lydians. The Armenians, Chinese and Japanese, besides the indigenous inhabitants of the East Indian islands, Jews and Europeans. The principal languages are the Arabian, Persian, Armenian, Turkish, Tatar, Hindo, Malayen, Mongol, Manchouch, Chinese, and Sanscrit. The principal religions which prevail are Mohammedanism and the worship of the Lama of Tibet in the central region, Buddhism in the Burmese territory, and Hinduism or Brahminism in India. For farther details and statistics of the Asiatic countries, see each in its alphabetical place, especially Turkey, Persia, China, and India.

From this great continent must undoubtedly have issued at some unknown period that extraordinary emigration which plagued America. It cannot be questioned that the inhabitants of the north-eastern parts of Asia, little attached to the soil, and subsisting chiefly by hunting and fishing, might pass either in their canoes in summer, or upon the ice in winter, from their own country to the American shore. Or a passage of this kind may not be necessary, for it is by no means unlikely that the Straits of Behring were formerly occupied by the land, and that the isthmus which joined the old world to the new was subverted and overwhelmed by one of those great revolutions of nature which alter the position, and even the direction of the sea at places where its waters are unknown. Dr. Prichard, in his "Researches into the Physical History of Man," is decidedly of opinion that America was peopled by an Asiatic migration; and in the examples he gives of the coincidences of words, he has fully established the fact of an intercourse between the nations of Northern Asia and those of America, long before the very existence of the latter continent was known to modern Europe. Later investigations have, almost without exception, tended to confirm this conclusion. The Scriptures make no mention of many of the empires and nations of Asia, such as the Chinese empire, the Hindoos, and the ancient Persians, Parthians, and Armenians, as, however, we are enabled to pursue the history of those nations of Minor Asia Minor we have the Phrygians, the Mysians, and the Bithynians. Of the ancient western Asiatic nations, those connected with sacred history are the Elamites, or descendants of Elam; the Assyrians, or descendants of Ashur; Hebrews and Arameans, or Ezionites; Beni-Jakans, or Arabs; the Chaldeans, or Chaldeans; the Assyrians, who inhabited Syria and Mesopotamia; the Phoenicians, or descendants of Canaan; the Mizraim, or the Egyptians; the Cushites, or Ethiopians; and the Philistines. Of the ancient empires mentioned in the Scriptures, the Assyrian is the earliest, so called, according to the Bible, by the deity of Shem. Out of the empire founded by Nimrod at Babylon sprung the Babylonian or Chaldean, the capital of which was Babylon, while that of Assyria was Nineveh. The empire of the Medes also sprung from the Assyrians, and was at length united by Cyrus the Great, who, perhaps, previous to the reign of that great prince, did not contain more than the small province of the present extensive kingdom, and which continued to rule over Asia upward of two centuries, until its power was overthrown by Alexander the Great. Elam, which originally denoted the country of the Elamites in the modern Khuzistan, afterward became the Hebrew term for Persia and the Persians, who were allied to the Medes or Medes. The other nations of Asia mentioned in the Scriptures have each their appropriate designations, such as the Arphaxad, or Araphkach, supposed to be the Chaldeans; the Lud or Ludim, alleged by Josephus and Bochart to be the Medes; the Ezionites and the Lydians, or the Armenians; the Assyrians, Chaldeans, or the Asiatic countries more especially mentioned as the scenes of great events and important transactions are Arabia, Armenia, Assyria, Babylonia, Syria, and Judea or Judaea, Phoenicia and Persia. See each in its alphabetical order.

II. Church History.—Christianity spread rapidly in the first centuries in Western Asia, which, after the times of Constantine, belonged among the Christian countries. The apostolic churches of Antioch (q. v.) and Jerusalem (q. v.) received along with Rome and Alexandria the rank of patriarchates. The diocese of Asia, of which Ephesus was the metropolis, was reckoned next in rank to the four patriarchates up till the council of Chalcedon, which subordinated the diocese to the Patriarch of Constantinople. In the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries the Nestorians and Monophysites were excluded by ecumenical synods from the Church, and organized themselves as independent denominations, which still exist. See NEZORISTI; ARABIANISTS; JACOBITES. Down to the twelfth century the churches of Western Asia were still in a moderately flourishing condition; but about that time the Saracens succeeded in establishing several principalities, which were the cause of sad desolation to the Church. The Turks, who succeeded, completed the wreck. In the early history of the two centuries, we refer, besides to the articles already mentioned, to TURKEY; GREEK CHURCH. Also in other portions of Asia the Gospel was early proclaimed, and Christianity flourished for some time in Persia, till it succumbed to the rising power of Mohammedanism. The outposts of Christianity in China and India, which probably reach back to an early period, were lost sight of by the Latin and Greek churches. The Roman Church, in the Middle Ages and modern times, made great effort to unite with itself the churches of Western Asia, and to convert the pagans in various Asiatic countries. She succeeded in making the Portugese and Spanish possessions, and founded a number of dioceses in other countries. The history of Protestantism begins with the establishment of the rule of the East India Company; and in the nineteenth century its missions have on so large a scale that the time appears to be near when it will have the ascendency in a large part of Eastern Asia. Some of the articles on the history of both the Roman and the Protestant churches, we refer to the articles PERSIA; CHINA; INDIA; FARThER INDIA; INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO; JAPAN.

III. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The following tabular survey of the statistics of the Roman Catholic, Protestant, and total Christian population is taken from Schmem's "Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859."
The Greek Church is the largest Christian body in Asia. Asiatic Russia and Asiatic Turkey, and is at present spreading, together with Russian influence, to Central Asia and China. Armenians are numerous in Russia, Turkey, and Persia, and scattered in India. Nestorians and Jacobites are mostly found in Turkey and India, the former also in Persia. By many it is believed that there are still numerous descendants of Christians in various parts of Asia as yet unknown to the rest of the Christian world. In 1855 a report spread that, at a distance of eighteen days' journey from Cabul, there existed 12,000 Christian villages, and in 1859 it was asserted that 80,000 native Christians had been discovered in the island of Celebes. Buddhism, Brahminism, and the other religious systems of India, China, and Japan, count together a population of about 600 millions. Mohammedanism prevails in Asiatic Turkey, Arabia, Persia, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, and Tartary, and is, in general, professed by a population of about 50 millions. The Jews in Asiatic Turkey are estimated at about 350,000; small numbers live scattered in nearly every country. The rest belong to a great variety of pagan systems.

2. Asia Minor was the name anciently given to the region nearly inclosed by the Euxine, Egean, and Mediterranean Seas, and now forming a part of Turkey. Respecting the Biblical notices of this district we have to remark: (a) Antiochus the Great is called king of Asia in 1 Macc. viii., 5; a title that he assumed as master (not only of Syria, but also) of the greater part of Asia Minor (which had passed over to the Macedonian princes as a Persian province), but was compelled (B.C. 199) to relinquish all the Asiatic districts west of the Taurus to the Romans (Liv. xxxvii., 89; 1 Macc. viii., 8), who committed Mysia, Lydia, and Phrygia to Eumenes (II), king of Pergamus (Liv. xxxvii., 55; xxxviii., 89). Hence (b) the kingdom of Pergamus was called the Asiatic empire, although the Syrian Seleucidae, who only occupied Cilicia, likewise (perhaps only out of empty pretence) assumed this title (1 Macc. xii., 90; xiii., 22; 2 Macc. iii., 8), and so the empires of Egypt and Asia are found in contrast (1 Macc. xiii., 13). (c) By the will of Attalus (III) Philometor (q. v.), the kingdom of Pergamus passed over to the Romans (B.C. 138) as a province into the hands of the Romans, in whose diplomatic phraseology Asia was now termed simply "Asia cæsarea" (comp. Cicero, Pro lael. 37; Nep. Attic. 54; Plin. 40), i.e. including the districts of Mysia, Lydia, Phrygia, and Caria (which last the Rhodians obtained after the conquest of Antiochus the Great). It was governed by a praetor until the Emperor Augustus made it a proconsular province. In this extent it is styled Asia Proper (ἡ Ασία ἑκουσαμένη Asia), Ptolem. v, 2; comp. Strabo, xii, 677). To this connection appear to belong the following passages of the N.T.: Acts vi, 9 (where Asia and Cilicia are names of Roman provinces in Asia Minor): xx, 16; 1 Pet. i, 1 (see Steiger, in loc.); Rev. i, 4; comp. ii and iii, where letters to the Christian communities in the seven cities of proconsular Asia designate those of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea (q. v. severally) (see Locke, Offenbar. Joh. p. 201; comp. T. Smith, Septem Asiae ecclesiastic. notitia, Lond. 1671, Utr. 1694; Arundell, Visit to the Seven Churches of Asia, Lond. 1828). On the other hand, in Acts ii, 9 (comp. xvi., 9; see Wiggers, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1888, i, 169); it appears to denote Phrygia, or, as the commentators will have it, only Ionia (see Kuhnöf, in loc.); but it is not certain that in Roman times Ionia was called Asia by pre-eminence (see Pliny, v, 29; comp. Solin. 48). The extent in 2 Cor. i, 8, is uncertain, and, moreover, the boundaries of Asia Minor varied at different periods (see Mannert, VI, i, 15 sq.; Wetstein, ii, 464). Thus it may be regarded as pretty well settled: (I.) That "Asia" denotes the whole of Asia Minor, in the texts Acts xix, 26, 27; xxi, 27; Aσιαρχός, ruler of Asia Minor, in the plur., Acts xix, 31; Vulg. Asia principes; Auth. Vers. "the chief of Asia"); the title of the ten persons annually chosen in Proconsular Asia as chief presidents of the religious rites (proanides sacratores, Tertull. De Spect., 2), and whose office it was to exhibit solemn games (globiones) in commemoration of the gods and of the Roman Emperor (Cod. Theodos. xv, 3, 7). This they did at their own expense (like the Roman adules), whence none but the most opulent persons could bear the office, although only of one year's continuance (see Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ii, 88). The appointment was much as follows: at the beginning of every year (i.e. about the autumnal equinox), each of the cities of Asia held a public assembly, in order to nominate one of their citizens as asiarch (Spanheim, De usu et praestant. s. m., p. 694). A person was then sent to the general council of the province, at some one of the principal cities, as Ephesus, or Samos, or Smyrna, or Pergamum, or the individual who had been selected (Ep. Arist. p. 844 sq., ed. Jebb; p. 618 sq., ed. Cant.). Of the persons thus nominated by the cities the council designated ten. As the asiarchs are repeatedly mentioned in the plural, some suppose that the whole ten presided as a college over the sacred rites (comp. Strabo, xiv, 649). But it is
ASIA

3. PROCONSULAR ASIA, therefore, seems to be usually that designated in the New Test., being a Roman province which embraced the western part of the peninsula of Asia Minor and of which Ephesus was the capital. This province originated in the bequest of Attalus, king of Pergamum, or king of Asia, who left by will to the Roman Republic his hereditary dominions in the west of the peninsula (B.C. 183). Some rectifications of the frontier were made, and "Asia" was finally defined. Under the early emperors it was a province in which it was flourishing, though it had been severely plundered under the republic. In the division made by Augustus of senatorial and imperial provinces, it was placed in the former class, and was governed by a proconsul. (Hence διοικηταὶ, Acts xix, 88, and coin.) It contained many important cities, among which were the seven churches of the Apocalypse, and it was divided into aëian districts for judicial business. (Hence ἀὐγαπάω, i. e. ἀἰμαπάω, Acts, ibid.) It is not possible absolutely to define the inland boundary of this province during the life of the Apostle Paul; indeed, the limits of the provinces were frequently changed; but it was generally said that it included the territory ancienlly subdivided into Eolus, Ionia, and Doris, and afterward into Myasia, Lydia, and Caria. See MYSIA; LYCIA; BITHYNIA; Phrygia; Galatia. These were originally Greek colonies (see Smith's Smaller Hist. of Greece, p. 40 sq.). Meyer (in his Comment. on Acts xvi, 6) unnecessarily imagines that the divine intimation given to Paul had reference to the continent of Asia, as opposed to Europe, and that the apostle supposed it might have reference simply to "Asia cts Taurum," and therefore attempted to penetrate into Bithynia. The view of Mazzini and De Wette, Acts xxviii, 5 (and of the former on Acts xix, 10, viz. that the peninsula of Asia Minor is intended, involves a bad geographical mistake; for this term "Asia Minor" does not seem to have been so applied till some centuries after the Christian era. married (Tob. vi, 14), but as being put to flight by the charm used by Tobias on his journey with her (Tob. viii, 3). The rabbins have a number of absurd traditions respecting Asmodeus (אָסָמֶדָא) or Ἀσμοθ (Asmuth) (Talm. Gen. xxviii, 1) as a libidinous daemon (comp. Gen. vi, 1), and indeed the Talmudists represent him as the prince of devils, even Satan himself (see Eisenmenger, Endl. Judenth. ii, 440; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Luc. xi, 15). Hence Beelzebub has been supposed to refer to the same daemon. But a similar name (ἀσμόθος, ἀσμοθοῦς) also occurs in the apocryphal book of Daniel, as the destroyer of all mankind; hence some derive the name Asmodeus from the Hebrew אָסָמֶדָא, shamad, to exterminate, which identifies it also with Abaddon (q. v.), the same as Apollyon (Rev. ix, 11, where he is called "a king, the angel of the bottomless pit"), and ὁ ὁσμαθωτός, Wisd. xviii, 23, where he is represented as the "evil angel" (Psa. lixvii, 49) of the plague (Schleusner's Theurz. s. v.), the angel of death (see Ilgen, Zc. Tob. p. 42). Thus the story in Tobit means no more than that the seven husbands died successively on their marriage with Sarah. (For other interpretations, see Fritzsche, Comment. p. 88). Others, however (Gesen. Aengem. Literatur-Zeitschr. 1816, No. 129; De Wette, Bibl. Thk. xii, 545; Veltheim, Ap. Sent. 4, 6) refer it to the Persian word azmadan, to temptation (Castelli L. Pers. col. 24 sq.). In the book of Tobit, this evil spirit is represented as causing, through jealousy, the death of Sarah's seven husbands in succession on the bridal night; gaining the power to do so (as is hinted) through their inconstancy. Tobias, instructed by Raphael, burns on the "ashes of perfume" the heart and liver of the fish which he caught in the Tigris; "the smell which when the evil spirit had smelled, he fled into the utmost parts of Egypt, and the angel bound him" (Tob. viii, 8). It is obviously a vain endeavor to attempt a rational explanation of this passage. It is thoroughly Jewish demonology, and "the loves of the angels," a strange fancy derived from Gen. vi, 2. Those, however, who attempt this task make Asmodeus the demon of impurity, and suppose merely that the fumes deadened the passions of Tobias and his wife. The rabbins (among other odd fables) make this demon the offspring of the incest of Tubalcain with his sister Noema, and say (in allusion to Solomon's many wives) that Asmodeus once drove him from his kin.dom, but, being dispossessed, was forced to serve in building the Temple, which he did noisely, by means of a mysterious stone Siamir (Calmet, s. v., p. 770; this is a great deal of fanciful and groundless speculation). ASMAHAN (Ἀσμαχάν, Ἀσμαχάνος, Joseph. Ant. xii, 6, 1 sqq.; in Joseph. Gorlonid. plur. Asma, Asmāh, Asmath, Asmath, Asmath, Ἀσμάχανος, Ps. lxviii, 32; siut ones, i. e. opulent), the proper designation of the family of the priest Mattathias, whose sons became better known by the surname of the Maccabees. (For the lineage and history of the Asmazans, see the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.) See JUDAS MACCABEUS. With Mattathias (B.C. 167) began the great, but patriarchal, part in the history of the Jewish people from the oppressive yoke of the Syrian Seleucidae, which was accomplished by Jonathan, son of Mattathias, already a high-priest in rank—a dignity that was now attached to that of Syrian "merlurch." Simon, another son of Mattathias, became himself he-editary prince of the Jews. His grandson Aristobulus assumed the diadem, and the royal dignity of the Asmazans continued on the Jewish throne till the interference of Pompey in Jewish affairs. Aristobulus II, the third king of the Asmazan line, was dethroned by the Romans, and upon his sons devolved the perilous endeavor of regaining their ancestral crowns, but without success. The two parties, both pathetically ambitious of the dignities of their lives, the last being Antigonus (whom Antony caused to be beheaded at Antioch, Joseph. Ant. xv, 1, 2), with whom the Asmazan dynasty expired, after a duration of 126 years, in the consulsip of M. Vips. Agrippa and Canin. Gallus, i. e. B.C. 37 (see Joseph. Ant. xiv, 16, 4). The two surviving members of the family of Aristobulus and Marianne, grandchild of the last ruler of the Asmazans, appear, it is true, at first to have striven to maintain a position in life under the Herodian sway suitable to their rank; but they soon fell under the suspicion of King Herod, and, with the assassination of Marianne, the family of the Asmazans was extinguished (apparently after Herod's return from Antioch, where he had met Octavianus on his return from Egypt), B.C. 29; Joseph. Ant. xv, 7, 4). The exploits of the Maccabees under Simon are related in the books of the Apocrypha that bear their name (1 and 2 Macc. among the Jews, מַעַכָּבָא, books of the Megillotza), see Eichhorn, Einl. in die Apokr. Schr. d. A. T. p. 208 sqq.; Jahn, i. ii, 496 sqq.; Berthold, Bibl. ii, 406 sqq.; but the complete history of the Asmazans is given by Josephus (Ant. xii, 6 to xiv, 16), who was himself a descendant of their lineage (Ant. xvii, 7, 1). See MACCABEES.

A'SNAH ( Heb. Assavn, יַסָּנָה, perh. hateful, or thorn, otherwise store-house; Sept. Asanid, the head of one of the families of the Nethinim that returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubabel (Ezra ii, 50). B.C. ante 536.

ASnapper (Chald. Osnappar, עֲנַפַּר; some MSS. עֲנַפַּיָּר, Osenapfar, whence Sept. οἰσεναβδρὶς v. r. Naoph; Vulg. Asenaphor), the name of an Assyrian king or satrap who is said to have planted colonies (probable from the same distant root) in Samaria, or perhaps other parts of Palestine and Syria (Ezra iv, 10). On the supposition that a king of Assyria is meant, and by comparison with 2 Kings xvii, 24, many (with Grotius) identify him with Shalmaneser; others (as Rosenmüller, Alterth., i. ii, 105; Hengstenberg, Gesch. d. alttest. Dom. p. 120) compare Ezra iv, 2, (comp. Ezra iv, 2; so Michaelis; but see on the contrary Herzfeld, Gesch. d. Völker Israel, i, 473); while most of the Jewish interpreters assume Sennacherib to be meant. He was probably, however, only a satrap of some of the Assyrian provinces (B.C. cir. 723), and the epithets applied to him in the passage in Ezra (יְנַפַּר, יֹנָפַר, the great and the excellent, i. e. most magnificent, Luke i, 87; Auth. Vers. "the great and noble") is apparently the usual title of persons in that capacity, being indeed perhaps the translation of the official title Osnapser itself (ןַבַּר = Sanscrit asan, great; = Sanscrit parā, noble; see Luzath, Le Sanscritisme de la langue Assyrique, p. 38-40). Bohlen, on the other hand, compares Sanscrit Senap, leader of an army: according to which the title would become merely a designation of an Assyrian general.

A'SON (Asson), one of the Israelites whose "sons" had taken foreign wives on the return from Babylon (1 Esdr. ix, 33); evidently the HABRIK (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra x, 33).

AEMON (Asson), a plain in Galilee near the Sea of Gennesaret (1 Macc. xi, 67, according to the Vulg. and Syr.; the common Greek has Ναζαν, Auth. Vers. "Naasar;" but the initial s has apparently been borrowed from the preceding πανος), probably Haasar.
ASP

(אָסָפ), which is thus Gracised in the Sept., in the tribe of Naphtali (comp. Joseph. Ant. xiii, 5, 7). See HAZON.

ASP (אָסָפ), pe'lem, so called probably from extending itself, Deut. xxxii, 33; Job xx, 14, 16; Isa. xi, 8; "adder," Psa. iviii, 4; xcl, 13; ἄσαγρος, Rom. iii, 8), a venomous kind of serpent, perhaps correctly designated by this rendering, since the Chald., Syr., and Arabic equivalents appear to denote some member of the Crotalus family (see Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 1140). Bohchart (Hieron. iii, 156, ed. Lips.) incorrectly refers to the Syr. name for dragon (comp. his treatise De cespide surda ad Psa. iviii, 5, ibid. p. 161 sq.). Kitto (Pict. Bible, at Job xx, 16) compares the bosom of the Arabs, called by the Egyptians κόρη (κόρη, def., comp. Psa. iviii, 4). This reptile, which more exactly corresponds in name to the Heb., is thus described by Forskal (Descr. Anim. p. 15): "Spotted all over with black and white; a foot long, and about twice as thick as one's thumb; oviparous; the bite instantly fatal, causing the body to swell." See ADON. The "asp" is often mentioned by ancient authors (see Smith's brown, and closely allied to the celebrated cobra-de-cappello of India in its power of swelling the neck when irritated, and of rising on its tail in striking its prey (see Henry Cyclopaedia, s. v.). It is often figured as a sacred symbol on the Egyptian monuments under the name Κριθα (Rawlison's Herodotus, ii, 106). See SERPENT.

Aspalathus (ἀσπαλάθος), a word which occurs only in Ecles. xxiv, 15, of the Apocrypha, where the substance which it indicates is enumerated with other spices and perfumes to which wisdom is compared. It was no doubt one of the drugs employed by the ancients as a perfume and incense, as it is described by Diocorides (i, 19), as well as enumerated by Theophrastus (ix, 7), and by both among aromatic substances. It forms one of the ingredients of the εὐσπήρ, or compound incense made use of by the Egyptian priests, as related both by Plutarch and Dioscorides. From the notices in the classical authors (comp. Theogn. 1135; Theocr. xxiv, 87; Plin. xii, 24, 52) we can only gather that it was a thorny shrub, whose bark, especially of the roots, yielded a fragrant oil. In the Arabian works on husbandry the plant is stated to have an acid taste, and to bear a purple flower, but no fruit (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v.). Ligum Rhodium is sometimes considered to be one of the kinds of aspalathus described by Dioscorides, but this is a produce of the Canaries Islands, and of the plant called Convulvulus scoparius. By others aspalathus, which has been supposed to be the same thing as Syrian aloe, or that of Rhodes and of Candia, is thought to have been yielded by species of the genus which has been called Aspalathus, and especially by the species A. Cretica, which is now called Anthyllis Hermanniana; but there does not seem to be sufficient proof of this. Others again have held that aspalathus was a kind of agallochum [see ALOE], and Dr. Harris (sub. Ligum.—aloe) seems to have thought that he got rid of a difficulty by suggesting that shafim, which was probably agallochum, should be rendered Aspalathus. Arab authors, as Avicenna and Serapion, give Dar-shishan as the Arabic synonym of aspalathus. They quote some of their own countrymen as authorities respecting it, in addition to Galen and Dioscorides. Hence it would appear to have been a product of the East rather than of the West, as for such they usually give only the Greek name or its translation, and quote only Greek authorities. Avicenna, in addition to his description, says that some think it may be the root of Indian nard. Hence it may justly be inferred that Dar-shishan, which the Arabians thought to be aspalathus, must have come to them from India, or they would not have hazarded this supposition. In India the name Dar-kishan is applied to the bark of a tree which is called kō-reh, or kō-šul. This tree is a native of the Himalayan Mountains from Nepal to the Sutlej, and has been figured and described by Dr. Wallich, in his Tretamen Flora Nepalese, p. 59, t. 46, by the name Myrica squida, in consequence of its fruit, which is something like that of the arbutus, being edible. The leaves, on being rubbed, have a pleasantly aromatic though faint smell. The bark forms an article of commerce from the hills to the plains, being esteemed in the latter as a valuable stimulant medicine. It may also have been the substance named ka-šul in Gladwin's translation of the Persian Uftas-Luvidch, No. 854, as a synonym of Dar-šeshan, which is described as an aromatic bark, while at No. 157 Dar-shishan is considered to be a synonym of ishluza, which seems to be a corruption of aspalathus from the errors of transcribers in the dialectical points. Kōšul has, moreover, been long celebrated.

by Sanscrit authors, and it may therefore have easily formed one of the early articles of commerce from the East to the West, together with nard, and the myrrh gum from these mountains.—Kitto, s. v. See SPICERIES.

Asperellum or Aspersorium, the brush or mop from which holy water (q. v.) is sprinkled in the Roman Church.

Aspersion (1.) a name given by the early writers to baptism by pouring or sprinkling. See BAPTISM.

(2.) In the Melchisedec story, sprinkling of person or things with the so-called holy water is called "asperation." The water is mixed with salt, and blessed by a given form of benediction for use in the church or at the altar.—Boissonnet, Dict. des Ceremonies, p. 105. See HOLY WATER.

Asphaltites. See Dead Sea.

Asphaltum is probably the substance denoted by the Heb. א"ש, chemar; Arab. chomar (Sept. δασώδαις, Auth. Vers. "slime," Gen. xi. 3; xiv, 10; Exod. ii. 3, where the Leather, like the modern rabbits, trample on it and "eat upon it"); Hebrew names probably refer to the reddish color of some of the specimens (Dioscorides, i. 99). (The Greek name, whence the Latin asphaltum, has doubtless given name to the Lake Asphaltites [Dead Sea], whence it was abundantly obtained.) Usually, however, asphaltum, or open bitumen, is of a shining black color; it is solid and brittle, with a conchoidal fracture, altogether not unlike common pitch. Its specific gravity is from 1 to 1.6, and it consists chiefly of bituminous oil, hydrogen gas, and charcoal. It is found partly as a solid dry fossil, intermixed in layers of plaster, marl, or slate, and partly as liquid tar flowing from cavities in rocks or in the earth, or swimming upon the surface of lakes or natural wells (Burckhardt, ii. 77). To judge from Gen. xiv, 10, mines of asphaltum must have existed formerly on the spot where subsequently the Dead Sea, or Lake Asphaltites, was formed, such as Martil (Travele, iv. 27) discovered on the east bank of the Mauretania. The Palestine earth-pitch, however, seems to have had the preference over all the other sorts (Plin. xxxvii, 23; Dacier, i. 100). It was used among the ancients partly for covering boats, paying the bottoms of vessels (comp. Nieuwblt, ii. 336; Gen. vi. 14; Exod. ii. 3; Josephus, War, iv, 8, 4; Burckhardt, p. 136), partly as a substitute for mortar in buildings; and it is thought that the bricks of which the walls of Babylon were built (Gen. xii. 3; Strabo, xvi, 748; Herod. i. 179; Plin. xxxv, 51; Ammian. Marcell. xxiii, 6; Vitruv. viii. 3; comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 4, 3) had been cemented with hot bitumen, which imparted to them great solidity. In ancient Babylon asphaltum was used made of, also for fuel, as the environrs (in the place called Jâs or Hût, see D’Herbelot, Bib. Orient. s. v. Hût) have it from the earliest times been the abundance of that substance (Diod. Sic. ii. 12; Herod. i. 179; Dion. Cass. xivii. 36; Strabo, xiv, 8, 4; Plut. Alex. c. 35; Theodoret, Quast, in Genes. 89; Ritter, Erz. ii. 540; Buckingham, Mesopot. p. 346). Neither were the ancient Jews acquainted with the medicinal properties of that mineral (Josephus, War, iv, 8, 4). Asphaltum was also used among the ancient Egyptians for embalming the dead. Strabo (xvi) and many other ancient medical writers assert that only liquid asphalt of the Dead Sea was used for that purpose; but it has in more recent times been proved, from experiments made on mummies, that the Egyptians employed slaggy mineral pitch in embalming the dead. This operation was performed in three different ways: first, with slagggy mineral pitch alone; second, with a mixture of this bitumen and a liquor extracted from the cedar, called cedoria; and third, with a similar mixture, to which resinous and aromatic substances were added (Hasty, Mineral, ii. 815). See BITUMEN.

Asphaltum is found in masses on the shore of the Dead Sea, or floating on the surface of its waters. Dr. Shaw (Travels in Barbary, etc., i. 322) says that this bitumen, called the asphaltum pleuris, from which the Dead Sea is so famous, rises at certain times from the bottom of the sea in large pieces of semi-globular form, which, as soon as they touch the surface and the external air operates upon them, burst asunder in a thousand pieces with a terrible crash, like the pulvis fulminans of the chemists. This, however, does not continue, only for a short time; for in deep water it is supposed that these eruptions show themselves in large columns of smoke, which are often seen to rise from the lake. The fact of the ascending smoke has been much questioned by naturalists; and although apparently confirmed by the testimonies of various travellers, collected by Gmelin in his Katalog, it is not established by the more observant travellers of recent years. Pococke (Description of the East, etc., ii. 46) pretends that the thick clumps of asphalt collected at the bottom of the lake have been brought up by subterranean fire, and afterward melted by the agitation of the current. Also Strabo (xiv, 764) speaks of subterranean fires in those parts (comp. Burckhardt, Syria, 394). Dr. Robinson, when in the neighborhood, heard from the natives the same story which had previously been told to Seezeen and Burckhardt, namely, that the asphaltum flows down the face of a precipice on the eastern shore of the lake until a large mass is collected, when, from its great weight or some shock, it breaks off and falls into the sea (Seetzen, in Zach's Monat. Correspond. xviii. 441; Burckhardt, p. 394; Robinson, ii. 219). This, however, he strongly doubts for assigned reasons, and it is agreed that nothing of the kind occurs on the western shore. He rather inclines to receive the testimony of the local Arabs, who affirm that the bitumen only appears after earthquakes. They allege that after the earthquake of 1834 huge quantities of it were cast upon the shore, of which the Jezelins Arabs alone took about 60 kuntos (each of 98 lbs.) to market; and it was cor- porately recollected by the Rev. Eli Smith in a mountainous part that year, which has been purchased at Beirut by the Frank merchants. There was another earthquake on January 1, 1857, and soon after a large mass of asphaltum (compared by one person to an island, and by another to a house) was discovered floating on the sea, and was driven aground on the western side near Usedom. The neighboring Arabs assembled, cut it up with axes, removed it by camel loads, and sold it at the rate of four piastres the rubi, or pound; the product is said to have been about $3000. Except during these two years, the sheik of the Jezelins, a man fifty years old, had never known bitumen appear in the sea, nor heard of it from his father, before the Bib. Researches, 1835. This information may serve to illustrate the account of Josephus that "the sea in many places sends up black masses of asphaltum, which float on the surface, having the form and size of headless oxen" (War, ix, 8, 4); and that of Diodorus (ii. 48), who states that the bitumen is thrown up in masses, covering sometimes two or three acres, and having the appearance of islands.—Kitto, s. v. See PRCH.

Asphar (Ἀσφάρ, v. r. Ἀσφαί, I Macc. ix. 33), a "pool" (Trav. not sea, as the Vulg. and some other versions render, but which often stands in the Sept. for "ים, a pis, or מים, a well"); i.e. a fountain or cistern in the south or south-east of Palestine (in the "wilderness of Thecon or Tekoa), where the Jews under Jonathan Maccabeus had an encampment at the beginning of their struggle with Bacchides (see Joseph.

Asplund, Robert, an English Unitarian minister, born in 1742, educated for the Calvinistic ministry at Highgate and Hackney, and afterward at Aberdeen, where he threw up his beneficary scholarship on becoming a Unitarian in 1800. At 20 he was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church at Newport, Isle of Wight, with liberty (Cabinet) of each Unitarianism. In 1800 he was installed at Gravel Pit Chapel, Hackney, where he remained pastor till his death, Dec. 30, 1845. For years he was a leader among English Unitarians, edited the "Monthly Repository" and the "Christian Reformer," and published a number of sermons and pamphlets. His Life, Works, and Correspondence were published at London (1850).

As'ril (Hebr. Avriel), a fuller form of Asriel; Sept. ASS (properly יִשְׂרָאֵל, chamor, from the reddish dun color of the hair of the wild ass; female יִשְׂרָאֵל יִתְנְשָׁה; Gr. ὅῳ), (1) a domestic animal (Gen. xii. 16; xxv. 33; xxx. 43; xxix. 5; Josh. vi. 21; xxv. 24; comp. Exod. xx. 17, xxv. 4; xxix. 4, xxix. 4 sq.; 1 Sam. vii. 14, 18; 2 Sam. xiv. 10, 13), found in the East (comp. 1 Chron. xxviii. 30; for Mosaic precepts respecting the animal, see Exod. xx. 17, xxv. 8; xxix. 10, 11; xxix. 4 sq.; Deut. xxvii. 4 sq.; comp. Mishna, Baba Mez. vi. 8; Baba Batra, v. 2), and very serviceable (particularly in the cultivation of the soil, Varro, R. R. ii. 4; Palladi. xvii. 14), although not to be compared with the true wild ass. Moreover, the wild ass is more stately (Olear. Trav. p. 801; estimates a Persian ass to be worth nearly $100; comp. Plin. viii. 68; see Haseklausen, Trav. p. 67), more active, more malleable, and quicker (according to Niebuhr, Reise, i, 811, an ass of ordinary speed will go over 1700 double paces of a man), and of great use in the East (comp. D'Aubigny, 1737; Sonini, ii. 89 sqq.). Asses were therefore (as still) held in great estimation; so that while with us the word ass is a low term of contempt, with the Orientals anciently as now the very opposite was the case (Gen. xlix. 14; comp. Illiad, ix. 568 sqq.; see D'Herbelot, Bibloth. Gr. s. v. Hsma; Freytag, Ad select. ex histor. Halich., p. 59; Geesner, in the Commentator, Soc. Gottii, ii. 82 sqq.; Jablonski, Panta. Erg. iii. 45; Michal, in the Commentator. Soc. Gott. iv. 6 sqq.). The ass (perhaps the young ass, Job i. 3; Num. xxi. 21; 2 Kings iv. 24; Matt. xxii. 2 sq.) was, on account of his sure step over hilly tracts, the usual animal for riding (Exod. iv. 20; Num. xxi. 21; Judg. x. 4, xii. 14; 1 Kings ii. 40, xii. 27; 2 Sam. xix. 26), even for ladies (Josh. xv. 18; Judg. i. 14; 1 Sam. xxv. 23; 2 Kings iv. 22, 24; comp. Fabric. Cod. Apogr. i. 104; see Niebuhr, Besch. p. 44; Schweiger, Reisen, p. 272; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii. 223) and nobles (2 Sam. xviii. 29; 1 Kings xii. 14, 29; Zech. ix. 5; comp. Matt. xvii. 12; Lact. De nat. div. xii. 3, comp. Horat. Sat. i. 1. 11; Schögsten, i. 169 sqq.; Mark xi. 1 sqq.; Luke xix. 29 sqq.; John xii. 14 sqq.; see Rusell, Allegro, ii. 49; Porocce, East, i. 309). The last preferred dappled asses, i.e. such as had a brownish-red skin marked with white streaks (Judg. v. 10; comp. Morier, Trav. p. 136; Paulus, Samml. i. 244). No saddle, however, was used from the earliest time (Haseklausen, Trav. p. 66), but simply a covering consisting of a piece of cloth or a cushion (hence ישבש יֵשּׁבש, a bound or gilt ass, means a beast saddled and bridled, Gen. xxii. 8; Num. xxii. 21; Judg. xix. 10), so that the driver (Judg. xix. 8; 2 Kings iv. 24; Talm. תָּקָד, chammar), Mishna, Erub. iv. 10, etc.) ran beside or behind the rider (Haseklausen, Trav. p. 66). The ass, moreover, was not only employed for bearing burdens (Neh. xi. 15; Josh. ix. 4; 1 Sam. xvi. 20; 2 Sam. xi. 18), but even for distant journeys (Gen. xlix. 26; xlix. 3, 13; xlvii. 28; comp. Josephus, Life, 24; Mishna, Parah, xii. 9), and also for drawing the plough (Deut. xxii. 10; comp. Exod. xxii, 13; Isa. xxx. 24; xxiii. 20; so, too, among the Romans, Plin. viii. 68; xviii. 2; Verr. R. R. ii. 6; Colum. vii. 1) and in mills (Matt. xxv. 6; Luke xvii. 2; 2 "asinus molaris," Colum. vii. 2).

Buxtorf, Floril. Hebr. p. 308; comp. Brouckhuyssen, ad Tibull. ii. 1, 8). In war they carried the baggage (2 Kings vii. 7; comp. Polluc. Onom. i. 10), but, according to Isa. xxvii. 7, the Persian king Cyrus had cavalry mounted on asses; and not only Strabo (v. 22) assures us that the Caramanians, a people forming part of the Persian empire, rode on asses in battle, but also Vitruvius (De Architect. iv. 122) explicitly states that Darius Hystaspis made use of the ass in a fight with the Scythians (comp. Elian. Anim. xii. 32). See generally, Bochart, Hieros. i. 148 sqq.; ii. 214 sqq.; Lenzecker, Kreuzen, i. 140 sqq., 146, 155; Winer, I. 546.

The domestic ass, being an animal of a patient, laborious, and mild nature, the emblem of peace and of a similar disposition. Isasschar is called a strong ass (Gen. xlix. 14), in reference to his descendants, as being a settled agricultural tribe, who cultivated their own territory with patient labor, emblematized by the ass. We rarely read of Isasschar being engaged in war. If such a war is mentioned in the East, Jehohakim it is said, in Jer. xxvi. 19, "With the burial of an ass shall he be buried, dragged along, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem;" an event mentioned by Josephus, who says that "the king of Hailyon advanced with an army, that Jehohakim admitted him readily into Jerusalem, and that Nebuchadnezzar, not wishing to cut off the城 of Jerusalem, instantly put him to death, and cast his dead body unburied without the walls." It is recorded of Christ in Zech. ix. 9, and quoted tennce in Matt. xxvi. 5, that he should be "humble, and sitting on an ass, even on a colt the foal of an ass." As horses were used in war, Christ may not be supposed to have used them. The ass is a humble and peaceable nature of his kingdom. On the contrary, Ephraim is compared to a wild ass, in Hos. vii. 9, and it is he who was untamed to the yoke, and traversed the desert as earnestly in the pursuit of idols as the οἰκητήρ in quest of his mates.

In the gospel is mentioned the μῶλος ἴννας (Matt. xviii. 6; Mark i. 31), to express a large mill-stone, turned by asses, heavier than that turned by women or by slaves. See John's Archgol. § 128, 139.

(11.) The ass is the Equus Asinus of Linneus; by some formed into a sub-genus, containing that group of the Equidae which are not striped like zebras, and have forms and characters differing from the horses, such as a peculiar shape of body and limbs, long ears, an upright mane, a tail only tufted at the end, a streak along the spine, often crossed with another on the shoulders, a braying voice, etc. To designate these animals the Hebrews used various terms, by which, no doubt, though not exactly with the strict scientific sense, different species and distinct races of the group, as well as qualities of sex and age, were indicated; but the contexts in general afford only slight assistance in discriminating them; and reliance on cognate languages is often unavailing, since we find that similar words frequently point to secondary and not to identical acceptations. The name is assigned by the Auth. Vers. to several distinct Heb. words, viz. מַר (mar), ḫamor, and מָרָא, and the Greek words ἀγαύς and ἀγαῦς. It occurs also in two passages of Eccles. xiii, 19; xxxiii, 24, in the first of which it stands for ἀγαύς; see Hos. xiv, 2; Jer. ii, 7; Joel. ii, 11.

1. The ordinary term מַר (mar, ḫamor) we take to be the name of the common working ass of Western Asia, an animal of small stature, frequently represented on Egyptian monuments with panniers on the back, usually of a reddish color (the Arabic ḫamor and chamara denoting red), and the same as the Turkish ḫamor. It appears to be a domesticated race of the wild ass of Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Southern Persia, where it is denominated gowr. In Scripture this wild original variety is distinguished by the name נָּבָר (nəḇar, Job xxxix, 5; Chald. נָבָר, nəḇar, Dan. v. 21; both rendered "wild ass"), a term most likely derived from the braying voice of the animal. In its natural state it never seeks woody, but upland pasture, mountainous and rocky re- treats; and it is habituated to stand on the brink of precipices (a practice not entirely obliterated in our own domestic races), whence, with protruded ears, it surveys the scene below, blowing and at length braying in extreme excitement. This habit is beautifully depicted by Jeremiah (xvii, 6; xviii, 6). Varieties of this species are designated by the following terms: נָּבָר (nəḇar) is translated in the Auth. Vers. "young ass," "colt," "foal;" but this rendering does not appear on all occasions to be correct, the word being sometimes used for animals that carry loads and till the ground, which seems to afford evidence of at least full growth (Isa. xxx, 6, 21). נָּבָר (nəḇar, usually "ass" simply) is sometimes unsatisfactorily rendered "she-ass," unless we suppose it to refer to a breed of greater beauty and importance than the common, namely, the silver-gray of Africa, which, being large and indocile, the females were anciently selected in preference for riding, and on that account formed a valuable kind of property. From early ages a white breed of this race was reared at Zobeir, the ancient Dasora and capital of the Orcheni, from which place civil dignitaries still obtain their white asses and white mules. It is now the fashion, as it was during the Parthian empire, and probably in the time of the judges, to dapple this breed with spots of orange or crimson, or of both colors together; and this is probably the meaning of the word נָּבָר (nəḇar) rendered "white" in Judges, v. 10; an interpretation which is confirmed by the Babylonian Sankhotum, who, in answer to King Sapor's offer of a horse to convey the Jewish Messiah, says, "Thou hast not a hundred-spotted horse, such as his (the Messiah's) ass." Horses and asses thus painted occur frequently in Oriental illuminated MSS, and although the taste may be plea- surable, we conceive that it is the record of remote conquest achieved by a nation of Central Asia, mounted on spotted or clouded horses, and revived by the Par- thians, who were similarly equipped (see Intro. to the Hist. of the Horse, in the Naturalist's Library, vol. xii). No other primeval invasion from the East by horsemen on such animals than that of the so-called Centaurs is recorded; their era coincides nearly with that of the judges (see Kitt. Fict. Bible, at Judg. v, 10).

Asses have always been in extensive use in the East (Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 407); and they were em- ployed by Joseph's brethren to carry grain from Egypt—a journey to which they are competent, notwithstanding the intervening deserts (Hackett's Illustr. of Script. p. 29). They were abundant in Ancient Egypt (as donkeys still are, Lanc. Mod. Eq. i, 209), where they were employed in treading out grain, and for other purposes (Wilkinson's Anc. Eq. ii, 231). They are not represented on the Assyrian monuments (Lardner's Nineveh, ii, 223), although the onager or wild ass is still celebrated in that region for its swiftness (ib. i, 266).

2. נָּבָר, pe'ere, rendered likewise "wild ass," is a de- rivative of the same root which in Hebrew has pro- duced poræus, horse, and parææus, horsemen, Persians and Parthians. Though evidently a general term, the Scripture uses it in a specific sense, and seems to intend by it the horse-ass or wild ass, which the Greeks denominated hemimoes, and the moderns jug- getai; though we think there still remains some com- mixture in the descriptions of the species and those of the koulan, or wild ass of Northern Asia. Both are nearly of the same stature, and not unlike in the gen- eral distribution of colors and markings, but the hemimoes is distinguished from the other by its relating voice and the deficiency of two teeth in the jaws. The species is first noticed by Aristotle, who mentions nine of these animals as being brought to Phrygia by Pharnaces the satrap, of which they were living in the time of his son Pharnabazes. This was while the onager still roamed wild in Cappadocia and Syria, and proves that it had until then been considered the same species, or that from its rarity it had escaped discrimination; but no doubt remains that it was the gournkar, or horse-ass, which is implied by the name hemiomas. The allusion of Jeremiah, in speaking of the wild ass, suggests that it was a fast and fleet-footed beast, fond of the scorched wild fields when this species, incured to the desert and to want of water, are made the prominent example of suffering. See Mule. They were most likely used in traces to draw chariots. The animals so noticed in Isa. xxii. 7, and by Herodotus, are the hemiomas, or the horse-ass. The most fast and fleet-footed was the Caramanian and Scythian horse, just as the wild as is the most celebrated for its fleetness and velocity. It is actually used as a beast of burden in Egypt, and, therefore, in Alexandria; but among the Arabs and Jews we have the "voice of one crying in the wilderness," a solemn allusion derived from the wild ass, almost the only voice in the desert; and in the distinguishing epithet of Mirvan II, last Ommand, Al-Audar, or the wild ass of Messopomaria—proofs that no idea of contempt was associated with the prophet's metaphor, and that, by such a designation, no insult was intended to the person or dignity of the prince. In more remote ages Tartak or Tarhak was an ass-god of the Avim, and Tawq was the Arabian name of another equine divinity, or a different name for the same Tartak, whose form may possibly be preserved to the present day in the image of the Borak, or mystical camel, which, according to the Koran, bore Mohammed, and is now carried in processions at the Nura. It is shaped like a horse, having a white body with red legs, a passant, and a curved tail. This is the "wild ass" of the ancients. Yet this attribution of the worship of the ass to the Jews (Plut. Symp. iv, 5; Tacit. Hist. v, 4; Diod. Sic. Erc. ii, 225; comp. Josephus, Apion. ii, 7) is a highly ridiculous misconception (see Bernhold, in the Eralog. Anzeig. 1774, No. 92). The historical foundation of this tradition cannot be traced to the well-known legend of a fountain of water discovered in the desert by an ass (Tact. ut sepra), for the arguments adduced by Creuzer (Comment. Herod. i, 270 sqq.) lead to no clear result (see Fuller, Miscell. iii, 8, p. 832 sqq.), and the etymological reference by Hase (De lapide fundamentum, in Ugolini. Theaur. viii) to the Hebrew word Avim, which means "the father" of Arabis and Aramaic "is not the ass, but the tamarin. The same cleavage was traced, in the Stud. u. Krit. 1843, iv. 509 sqq.; Bochart, Hieroz. i, 199 sqq.; comp. Minuc. Fel. ix, 4; and the Talmud, Shabb. v. 1). ASS OF BAALAM—Here we are not sure whether it were a reality or an allegory; an imagination, or a vision of Balaam. Augustine, with the greater number of commentators, supposes it was a certain fact, and takes it literally (Quast. in Gen. 48, 50). He discovers nothing in the whole relation more surprising than the stupidity of Balaam, who heard his ass speak to him, and who replied to it, as to a reasonable person; and adds, as his opinion, that God did not give the ass a reasonable soul, but permitted it to pronounce certain words, to prove the prophet's covenant. Gregory of Nyssa (in Vita Mosia) seems to think that the ass did not utter words, but was speaking by braying as usual, or a little more than usual, the diviner, preferred in drawing presages from the voices of beasts and of birds, easily comprehended the meaning of the ass; and that Moses, designing to ridicule this superstitious art of augury, relates the matter as if the ass really spoke articulately. (See 2 Peter iii. 16). Mark and Lucanus, who also knew Balaam, relate the same thing, as if the ass were a very strange story, but a kind of fiction and allegory, whereby Moses relates what passed only in Balaam's imagination as real history. Philo, in his life of Moses, suppresses it entirely. So most Jewish authors (not Joseph. Ant. iv, 6, 8) consider it, not as a circumstance which actually took place, but as a vision, or some similar occurrence. Le Clerc solves the difficulty by saying Balaam believed...

ASSANNAI. See FARTING.

ASSASSINS, a secret military and religious order in Syria and Persia, a branch of the "Ismaelites" (q. v. or "Shiites"). They were suppressed in the 11th century by the Fatimides, but their existence survived in the "Amerikans" (q. v.). The secret doctrines of the Ismaelites, who had their head-quarters in Cairo, declared the descendants of Ismael, the last of the seven so-called imams, to be alone entitled to the caliphate; and gave an allegorical interpretation to the precepts of Islam, which led, as their adversaries asserted, to considering all positive religious tenets equally right, and all actions morally indifferent. The atrocious career of the Assassins was but a natural sequence of such teaching. The founder of these last, Hassan ben-Sabbah el-Homairi, of Persian descent, about the middle of the 11th century, studied at Nishapur, under the great Arabian poet, and subsequently obtained from Ismaelite dais, or religious leaders, a partial insight into their secret doctrines, and a partial consecration to the rank of dai. But, on betaking himself to the central lodge at Cairo, he quarreled with the sect, and was doomed to banishment. He then sailed from the ship, and reaching the Syrian coast, after which he returned to Persia, everywhere collecting adherents, with the view of founding, upon the Ismaelite model, a secret order of his own, a species of organized society which should be a terror to his most powerful neighbors. The internal constitution of the order, which had some resemblance to the orders of Christian knighthood, was as follows: First, as supreme and absolute ruler, came the Sheikh-al-jebal, the Prince or Old Man of the Mountain. His viceroyalty in Jebal, Kohistan, and Syria were the three Div-al-kebir, or grand priors of the order. Next came the dais and refids, which last were not, however, initiated, like the former, into every stage of the secret doctrines, and had no authority as teachers. To the uninitiated belonged, first of all, the fedavis or fedais—i.e. the devoted; a band of resolute youths, the ever ready and blindly obedient executioners of the Old Man of the Mountain. Before he assigned to them their several tasks, he used to have them thrown into a state of ecstasy by the intoxicating influence of the hasiak (the hemp-plant), which circumstance led to the order being called Hashishim, or hemp-eaters. The word was changed by Europeans into As-sassins, and transplanted into the languages of the West with the signification of murderers. The Laiks, or novices, formed the sixth division of the order, and the laborers and mechanics the seventh. Upon these the most rigid observance of the Koran was enjoined; while the initiated, on the contrary, looked upon all positive religion as null. The etiquette of the order, placed by Hassain, the hands of the viceroy of Saba of seven, one of which the second treated, among other things, of the art of worming themselves into the confidence of men. It is easy to conceive the terror which so unscrupulous a sect must have inspired. Several princes secretly paid tribute to the Old Man of the Mountain. Hassan, who died at the age of 70 (1125 A.D.) inured as his successor, Kiasus-Omid, one of his grand priors. Kiasus-Busrag-Omid was succeeded in 1138 by his son Mohammed, who knew how to maintain his power against Nureddin and Jau- Sal-Salheddin. In 1168, Hassan II was rash enough to extend the secret privilege of the initiated—exemption, not to the society for personal profit to the people generally, and to abolish Islam in the Assassin state, which led to his falling a victim to his brother-in-law's dagger. Under the rule of his so Muhammad II, who acted in his father's spirit, the Syrian Dal-al-kebir, Sinan, became independent, and entered into negotiations with the Christian king of Jerusalem for coming over, on certain conditions, to the Christian faith; but the Templars kept his envoy and rejected his overtures, that they might not lose the yearly tribute which they drew from him. Mohammed was poisoned by his son, Hassan III, who reinstated Islamism, and whence obtained the surname of the New Moelom. Hassan was succeeded by Mohammed II, a boy of nine years old, who, by his effectual efforts, overthrew the sovereignty of Patriarch Chal- doonum and Nestorianus (Rome, 1775, 4to) — Dissertation de Sacris Reiibus (Rome, 1757, 4to): — Comment. de ecclesia, carum revocatia et ango (1766, fol.).

3. Stephen Evodics, another nephew of Joseph Assemani, was born at Tripoli in Syria about 1707. He studied at Rome, and returned to Syria as a missionary of the Propaganda. He was present at the Synod of Lebanon, 1736, at which his uncle acted as legate. Subsequently he spent some months in England, where he was elected a member of the Royal Society. Having established himself at Rome, he was employed as assistant to his uncle, at the Vatican, and on his uncle's death succeeded him as superior keeper of the library. He also became titular Bishop of Apamea. He died Nov. 24, 1782. His literary reputation is not very high. The only works of any consequence which he published are the following: Bibliotheca Medico-Lunarniana et Palatiniana Codicum MSS. Orientalium Catalogus (Florence, 1790); and with notes by his uncle, Bibliothecarum Martirum Orientalium et Occidentalem (Rome, 1748, 2 vols. fol.). To this work, which he compiled from manuscripts in the Vatican, he added the Acts of St. Simon, called "Stylios" in Chaldæa and Latin. He also began a general catalogue of the Vatican manuscripts, divided into three classes, Oriental, Greek and Latin, Italian and other modern languages. He died in 1781, however, he published only the first volume, in 1756, the fire in the Vatican having destroyed his papers. Mal has continued parts of this catalogue in his Scriptorum Veterum nova collectio. — Herzog, i, 560.

Assembly (In Heb. ת入り, "mored", etc.; in Gr. ἀρχαῖος, a term used in the New Testament to denote a congregation or installation of persons legally called out or summoned. See CONGRESSION. (1.) In the universal sense (Acts xvi, 16), and among the Jewish Minor, in the time of the apostles, was divided into several districts, each of which had its own legal assembly. See ASHRAKH. Some of these are referred to by Cicero, and others by Pliny, particularly the one at Ephesus. The regular periods of such assemblies, it appears, were once a year, or at least several times a month; though they were convoked extraordinarily for the dispatch of any urgent business. See ASIA (MINOR). (2.) In the Jewish sense, the word implies a religious meeting, as in a synagogue (Matt. xviii, 17); and in the Christian sense, a congregation of believers (1 Cor. xii, 28); hence the church, the Christian Church, and is used of any particular church, as the Church of Rome (Acts viii, 1) and Antioch (Acts xii, 26). See SYNAGOGUE; CHURCH.

Masters of Assemblies (מְבּוֹרֵּכָה, babîr, "badeyn", or "asaphhoth", lords of the gatherings; Sept. τοις ἀνάφωνοις, Vulg. per magistratos consilium), is a phrase occurring in Eccles. xii, 11, and supposed to refer to the master-spirits or apostles of the meetings of the elders, "sons of the wises" (Prov. viii, 22, of the wise men of Israel), held in Eastern countries, and where sages and philosophers uttered their weighty sayings. See MASTER. The preacher endeavored to clothe the infinitely wise and perfect doctrines which he taught in proper language. They were the words of truth, and were designed to prove quickening to the sluggish soul at goods are, when dwell on (Acts ii, 37). They were received from the one great shepherd or teacher, and...

came with great power as the sayings of the most wise and eloquent of their learned assemblies; and they would take hold of the hearts and consciences of men, holding them to the obedience of the truth, as was done by a sound board firmly bind and fasten it where we will (see Stuart, Comment. in loc.). Hengstenberg, however (Comment. in loc.), fancifully understands the participators in the sacred collection (or apothegms of Scripture) to be seen. See ECCLESIASTES.

Assembly, General, in Scotland, Ireland, and the United States, denotes the highest court of the Presbyterian Church. It differs from the Anglican Convocation at once in its constitution and in its powers, representing as it does both the lay and the clerical elements in the Church, and possessing supreme legislative and judicial authority in all matters purely ecclesiastical. The General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland consists of representatives, clerical and lay, from all the presbyteries of the Church. The royal burghs of Scotland also return elders to the General Assembly of the Established Church, and each of the Scottish universities sends a representative. The Assembly meets once a year in the middle of May, at Edinburgh, and sits for ten days. Its duties are prescribed by law. The Moderator, whose election is the first step in the proceedings, after a sermon by his predecessor. In former times this office was sometimes filled by laymen: among others, in 1567, by George Buchanan. In modern times the moderator is a clergyman. 84 prebendaries, composing 83 synods, return members to the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland. Its relation to the state is represented by a royal commissioner, who exercises no function in the Assembly beyond that of adding by his presence the sanction of the civil authority to its proceedings. The other functionaries are a principal and a deputy clerk, both clergy-men, and an agent, and an amanuensis, who is not dispatched during the session of the Assembly is referred to a commission, with the moderator as convenor, which meets immediately after the dissolution of the Assembly, and again quarterly. The General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, which has 16 synods, comprising 71 presbyteries, and of the Irish Presbyterian Church, are similarly constituted, the principal point of difference being the absence of the royal commissioner. See PRESBYTERY; SYND; FREE CHURCH. For the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, see PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Chambers, Encyclopedia, s. v. Assembly of Divines. See WESTMINSTER.

Asser, or more correctly Asch, the principal author of the Babylonian Talmud. He was born at Babylonia A.D. 553 (A.M. 4113). His Jewish biographers relate that he was appointed head of the college of Sori, in Babylonia, at the age of fourteen! He held this post till his death in 429. Rabbi Abraham ben-Dor asserts, in his Kabbalah, p. 68, that since the days of Rabbi Jeshua-Hannasi, or Rabbeno-Hakkadosh, in no one of the schools had been combined so much knowledge of the law, piety, humility, and magnificence. His fame attracted to his lectures many thousands of students. The expositions of the Mishna which he delivered in his lectures were collected, and form the basis of the Babylonian Talmud. The continuation was ascribed to his discipulus and collator: it was completed seventy-three years after the death of Asche by R. Jose, president of the college of Pumbedita in Babylonia. (Compare the Talmach David, first part, in the years 4127 and 4167; Sheker Jechinu, fol. 117; Halachot Olam, p. 18; Walfi Bibliotheca Hebrew, i, 242.) See TALMUD.

Asser, a learned monk of St. David's, whence (the name of the place in Latin being written Mensapia or Menenia) he obtained the appellation of Asserius Menenensis. Asser was invited to the court of Alfréd the Great, as is generally believed, in about the year 880, but probably earlier, merely from the reputation of his learning. His name is preserved by his Annals Germa (669-821), as well as by the British caves, Hist. Lit. anno 880; Eng. Cyclop. See ALFRÉD.

Asses, Feast of. See FEAST OF ASSES.

Assesment (אכ'סנום או קוקסאמ; also קוקס; יסנום) among the Israelites was of two kinds: (a) ECCLESIASTICAL.—According to Exod. xxxvi, 13, each Israelite (over twenty years old) was obliged to contribute yearly a silver half-shekel (a didrachm, about 55 cents) to the Temple (2 Chron. xxvii, 6). This tax existed still in full force after the Babylonian exile (Matt. viii, 19; Rom. xvi, 26; 2 Cor. xi, 8; 2 Chron. xxxvii, 3). It was levied in the third month after the Passover (Exod. xxvii, 6, 8), and all Jews residing in Palestine were under the obligation of paying it (Josephus, Ant. xviii, 9, 1). See generally the Mishna (Shkedalim, ii, 4), according to which this payment became due between the 15th and 25th of Adar (in March or April). See TEMPLE. After the destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem, the Jews were obliged by a decree of the Emperor Vespasin to pay this sum yearly for the maintenance of the Capitoline at Rome (Joseph. War, vii, 6, 6; Dio Cass. lxvi, 7, p. 1082). An increase of the temple-tax, which the pressure of circumstances appears to have compelled, is mentioned in Neh. x, 29 (see Rashi). Besides this tax there was the tax for the support of the Temple certain definite assessments (2 Kings xii, 4), such as the tithes, first-fruits, and first-born offerings (see each of these in alphabetical order). Yet, on account of the great fertility of the soil and the original proprietorship of each Israelite over these sacred lands, they were certainly not onerous, however much they may resemble direct imports upon the citizens of modern states. (b) CIVIL.—Of these no trace appears prior to the introduction of royalty. But the kings not only required liege duties (1 Sam. viii, 12, 16), but also tribute in kind (1 Sam. vii, 13), from which exemption was allowed only in certain cases (1 Sam. xvii, 22), and likewise personal service (Amos vii, 1), as well as a capitация-tax in extraordinary emergencies (2 Kings xv, 20; xxii, 55). They also received voluntary presents from their subjects and chief vassals (1 Sam. x, 27; xvi, 20; 1 Kings x, 25; 2 Chron. ix, 24; xxvii, 5), as is still customary in the East. See Royal Crowns and Alien Royalties, pri- vate property?) seem also to have been (1 Kings iv, 27 sq.; 1 Chron. xxvii, 26 sq.; xxvi, 10 sq.), as well as tolls on goods in transit (1 Kings x, 15), and even regal privileges and monopolies of a commercial character (1 Kings xix, 28; comp. ix, 26 sq.; xxii, 49). During the exile and later, the Jews of Palestine paid taxes of various kinds to their foreign masters, and of the remnant of the Jews under the Chaldaean regents (see Josephus, Ant. x, 9 and 13). As Persian taxes levied upon the new Jewish colonies are mentioned (Estra iv, 13, 20; vii, 24, 77, tribute, צב, excise, and תַּֽלְמֹךְ, toll (Sept. and Joseph. Ant. xi, 2, 1, in general φόροι, duties; as the Auth. Vers. "tribute" for the first two, "custom" for the last). The distinction between these terms, it is true, is not at all clear; the foregoing text seems to imply that the common term containing the word (Roman law) signifying way-money (from תַּֽלְמֹוכְ, to go), the second (צְבָּא, belo), consumption-tax (from תַּֽלְמֹוכְ, to consume); the first (מַדְלָס, mideleh), the direct (ground or income) tax (apportionment, from תַּֽלְמֹוכְ, to measure out), which individuals had to pay (comp. Lat. demensum), as Grotius and Cocceius have supposed (see Gessius, Hbb. Lez. s. v. several). Aben-Ezra's interpretation of this last by cattle-tax has no good foundation. The governors increased the severe taxation (Neh. vii, 7) by more exacting assumptions of extortion (Neh. vi, 15). We find mention (Estra vi, 5; vii, 20 sq.) of royal exchequers. The priests and Levites were under (Artaxerxes?) exempt from taxes (Exod. vii, 24). In the Ptolemaic period of the Egyptian rule over Palestine instances occur of the farming or leasing out of the collection of the public revenues to private contractors (Joseph. Ant. xii, 4, 1, 4 and 5). The yearly rent of all such dues in Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine amounted under Ptolemy Evergetes to 16 talents of silver; and we may easily imagine what vexation it occasioned when the taxes reached so enormous a sum (Joseph. Ant. xii, 4, 5). The high taxes raise other points of discussion. The tax is named in the levy of duties (φόρον) upon salt (τριγώναν); the royal tribute (στεφάνων, crown dues, comp. the Lat. "cursum coronarium," see Adam's Rom. Ant. i, 250; in a rescript of Antiochus the Great [Joseph. Ant. xii, 3, 5] this assessment is called technically στρυγ-γώναν φόρον). At first the Jews were obliged to bring a gold "crown-piece" as the expected "gift," but afterward it might be rendered in any coin; such a regal due is indicated in 2 Macc. iv, 9; the third of the seed (τριγώνιον τῆς σποράς), and the half of the produce of the trees (ἱμανὰ τοῦ καρποῦ τοῦ ἡλίους), these latter assessments in kind are common to most nations of antiquity (comp. Pausan. iv, 14, 5; see the Hall. Encyclop. xxxi, 90). There existed also tolls and poll-taxes (οἰκομενικὰ φόρα, Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 4; perhaps, however, this refers to Jerusalem only) to the Romans by Pompey; although the country as yet does not seem to have been subject to a yearly payment, but rather to occasional exactations at the caprice of the governor in power at the time. The regular taxes were raised by the native princes (whether yearly is uncertain, comp. Appian, Civ. v, 75; but the Romans were accustomed to impose tribute upon their dependencies, 1 Macc. vii, 2; 2 Macc. vii, 10, and Julius Cæsar ordained this by a special decree [Joseph. Ant. xiv, 10, 5 sq.; comp. 22]). These revenues were not inconsiderable (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 8, 2), and were derived partly from royal lands (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 10, 6) and partly from duties on the ground and buildings (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 9, 1; 10, 4; xv, 2, 1; 8, 4). Josephus, Ant. xiv, 8, 3, likewise mentions a house-tax, either a duty upon the simple dwelling, or the premises in general), and partly from tolls (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 10, 6, 2), and under the Herods were also added very oppressive city taxes (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 7, 5, 4; comp. xiv, 4, 3). In addition to all these, the Jews, in consequence of their partisan warfare against the Romans, were compelled to pay many special war taxes (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 11, 2). As at first single parts of Judea, and finally the whole country, came under the immediate Roman government, the Jews were obliged (Plin. Hist. Nat. xiv, 54 sq., comp. a Acta Romanorum provinciarum mercatus syntagmata in historia, C. H. L. C. L. B. Akad. der Berl. Akademie, 1822 and 1828, Histor. philol. Class. p. 27 sq.), to pay the ground and head tax (Matt. xxiii, 17), with a view to which a census and assessment had already been made out by Augustus (Luke ii, 1, 2; comp. Acts v, 57; see Joseph. Ant. xv, 1, 4), and being under the consular jurisdiction (in Jerusalem) continued still for a long time (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 4, 8), and the tolls (on φόρον and τιμόνα, the Lat. tribunatum et vectigal, Rom. xxiii, 7, see Kypre, Obscr. ii, 183 sq.), which were considerable along the commercial routes (especially between Damascus and Ptolemais, Phoenicia, and the seaports of Jericho and Bethsana, where the expensive balsam and cotton, were exacted as elsewhere. See Custom. These united impose, but especially the taxation (Appian, Syr. 50), severely oppressed the people (Tact. Annales, ii, 45), particularly, no doubt, because they were not apportioned according to an exact ratio of taxation; and, in addition, the procurators of the province, who were responsible for the return of the duties into the imperial treasury, as well as the principal collectors themselves (one such, ψάριον ἡλιοσίαι, under the Emperor Caius, i.e. the name of Capito, is depicted in Philo, ii, 670, comp. 323 sq.), in various ways made use of the collections. Various and remitting taxes, where circumstances rendered it reasonable, demanded, under the long direct Roman rule, only to the President of Syria (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 4, 8). See, generally, P. Aṣšūr (Heb. Aššūr, אָסָכָר, prob. l. q. וַאֶשָּׂר, a nпрp. Sept. Aṣṣūr and Aṣṣwīr; Auth. Vers. "Aššūr," in Gen. x, 11; Num. xxiv, 22, 24; 1 Chron. i, 17; Ezck. xxvii, 22; xxxii, 22; Hos. iv, 20; "Aṣsr" in Exod. iv, 2; Psa. lxxxi, 8; "Aṣṣyr" or "Aṣṣiyans" in Psa. xiv, 25; xix, 23, xxx, 81; xxxi, 8, 11; lam. v, 6; Ezck. xvi, 28; xxiii, 9, 12, 28; Hos. v, 13; xi, 5; xii, 5; Mic. v, 6; elsewhere and usually "Aṣṣyria" in very many occurrences in the O. T., to be understood properly (Gen. x, 11; see Michaelis, Spic. i, 285 sq.; Vater, Comm. i, 125, in loc.) of a state in Western Asia, different from Babylonia (Shinar), of which it was accounted a colony. The metropolis was Nineveh (q. v.), i. c. the Ninus of the Greeks; besides which the cities Rezen, Reshefot, and Calahah (q. v.) severally are named, as apparently included in the same district, although the signification and application of these names are uncertain. (2.) In the books of the Kings (and the prophets) it designates a victorious and tyrannical kingdom, which (according to 2 Kings xviii, 11) included also Mesopotamia, Media (comp. Is. vii, 18; xxiv, 8, 9; xxvii, 26), as well as (according to 2 Kings xvii, 20; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 11) Babylonia, and whose inhabitants are described (Ezck. xxiii, 6, 17, 23) as wealthy (Nineveh being a mart, Nah. iii, 16, the entrepot between the eastern and western trade), but also arrogant (Isa. x, 9 sq.; Zach. x, 11), and occupying himself of the land (Isa. xviii, 2). It is the region also well known to the Greeks as Aṣṣyria (once, Mic. v, 5, called "the land of Nimrod") which, together with its capital Ninus, was destroyed by the Medes and Chaldeans. As in the Bible, we find likewise (a.) in Greek and Roman writers Assyria (Aραπία, Πολ. vi, 1; often Arospin, Strabo, xv, 678, or Aραπία, Dio Cass. lxviii, 29) named as the country shut in on the north by the high mountain range (Mt. Naiphates) of Armenia, on the south almost entirely level, watered by several rivers, and hence very fruitful; which was bounded on the east by Media, on the south by Susiana and Babylonia, on the west (by means of the Tigris) by the Persian empire, and now forms the greater part of the province of Kūrīštan (comp. Pta. v, 13; Strabo, xvi, 736; see Berhard, ad Dionys. Perig. p. 780). (b.) Far often Assyr- ia was the name given by the ancients to the provincial satrapy of the Persian empire, consisting of the joint districts of Assyria and Babylon (Herod. i, 176; comp. 106; Strabo, xvi, 570; Ammian. Mar. xxxii, 20), including Mesopotamia (Arrian, Alc. vii, 21, 2; Ammian. Mar. xxxiv, 5, and even extended at times its name to a part of Asia Minor (Dionys. Perig. 375; comp. mann. V, ii, 424 sq.). Assyria Proper (Herod. i, 102, "the Assyrians who live in Ninus and the Tigris") by the other hand, called the Assyrians (Herod. i, 13, 6; Strabo, xvi, 512; Ammian. Mar. xxxii, 6; in the Syriac, Chethid, Asseamni, Biblioth. Or. lII, 11, 92; by the Talmudists, Chēthid, ʾāṣārī; comp. Dīb, the Arabic name of two streams of this province, Ro-senmiller, Alter. ii, i, 118), which was only a province of Assyria, lying between Arrapachitis and the Syrian coast. It was the seat of Manoe (Diod. Sic., v, ii, 450 sq.). See BABAOLIA: MESOPOTAMIA.

Little is known of the early history of the Assyrian empire, for the ancient accounts are not only scanty, but confused, and in some cases contradictory, so that the most deserving efforts of modern (especially recent) scholars have scarcely availed to clear it up (see Assur, Chron. ad mestum, et Nisii ex monumentis antiquis, Frckl. 1756; Uhland, Chronologia sacra in proc. chron. et hist. Babylon. Assyr. monumenta vindicata, Tubing. 18733).

The Biblical notices, which embrace but a small part of its history, do not form a connected whole with those of profane (Greek) authors. The former, coming into conflict with the kingdom of Assyria was founded by Nimrod (q.v.) of Babylon, but its princes are not named earlier than the Israelite king Menahem (2 Kings xv, 19 sq.), and they appear subsequently in the hostile collisions with the two Hebrew kingdoms (comp. Hos. vi, 13; vii, 11). Those thus mentioned are the following: (1) Pul (2 Kings, as above), who entered tributary (B.C. 769) of Israel (under Menahem). (2) Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xvi, 7-10; 1 Chron. xxviii, 16 sq.), in the time of Abaz of Judah and Pekah of Israel, the latter of whom, with his ally Rezin (of Damascus Syria), was beaten by him (as a mercenary ally of Abaz), and many of their allies came into the king's tribute. (3) Shalmaneser, who (B.C. 720) overthrew the kingdom of Israel, and carried away the rest of the inhabitants into exile (2 Kings xvii, 5 sq.; xviii, 9). Judah was also tributary to him (2 Kings xvii, 7). Media and Persia formed part of this Assyrian king's dominions (2 Kings xvii, 11), and he made successful inroads against Phoenicia (Joseph. Ant. ix, 14). (4) Senacherib, who (B.C. 718) appeared before Jerusalem under Hezekiah after an attack upon Egypt (2 Kings xix, 13 sq.; xix, 30; Isa. xviii). (5) Esarhaddon (B.C. post 722), the son of the preceding (2 Kings xxiv, 37; Isa. xxxvii, 22; Ezra iv, 2). There is, moreover, mention made of Sargon (only Isa. xx, 1), who probably reigned but for a short time between Shalmaneser and Sennacherib (B.C. 715). None of these names except Sennacherib (Sinacherib, Σαναχέριβ, Herod. ii, 141), the contemporary of the Egyptian king Setho (comp. Berossus, in Joseph. Ant. x, 13), is mentioned in the Bible, and it is difficult to connect it more closely with the Biblical notices, although they by no means agree entirely with each other. In the extracts by Alexander Polyhistor from Berossus (in Euseb. Chron. Armen. i, 44 sq.), Assyrian kings (of the later period) are named in the following series: Phil (more than 520 years afterSemiramis); Sanherib, 18 years; Assurban 8 years; Sammughos, 21 years; his brother, 21 years; Nabopolassar, 20 years; Nabucodonosor (Nebuchadnezzar), 43 years. Yet Sardanapal is mentioned (p. 44) as having engaged his son Nabucodonosor in a matrimonial alliance with the daughter of the Median king Ashshages (Assyrages). By the Ctesias, according to Joseph. Ant. x, 13, Sanherib's son became the Assyrian princes in the following order: Sanherib, Nergilus (Adramêles), Axeris, Sardanapalus, Sarus. This last introduced a barbarian army from beyond the sea, and sent his general, Busalsoros (Nabopolassar), to Babylon; but the latter set himself up as the king of Babylon, and married his son Nabucodonosor to the daughter of the Median Prince Assyrages, and thus Nineveh was overthrown. With the position which both these references assign to Sardanapalus (after Sennacherib) essentially agrees Moses Choren- sis (who, however, probably makes Sardanapalus a contemporary of the Median prince), and agrees with the accounts of Herodotus, Ctesias, and Syncellus (see Baumgarten, Allgem. WeltHist. iii, 549), as to lead to the supposition of a second Sardanapalus (see Suidas, s.v.; the name is perhaps rather a royal Leakes (Travel in Asia Minor, p. 128) says: "The ruins of Assos at Behram or Bertian Kalei are extremely curious. There is a theatre in very perfect preservation, and the remains of several temples lying in confused heaps upon the ground. An inscription upon an architrave belonging to one of these buildings shows that it was dedicated to Augustus; but some figures in low relief on another architrave appear to be in a manner worshipping a figure of a deity sculptured upon the hard granite of Mount Ida, which forms the materials of several of the buildings. On the western side of the city the remains of the walls and towers, with a gate, are in complete preservation; and without the walls is seen the cemetery, with numerous sarcophagi of gigantic dimensions. The whole gives, perhaps, the most perfect idea of a Greek city that anywhere exists." See also Fellow’s Asia Minor, p. 46; Wetstein, ii, 592; comp. Assur’tus (Ἀσσύριος v. r. Ἀσσύριος), the Grecized form (Tobit xiv, 15) of the Persian royal title usually Anglicized Assur’bus (q. v.).

Assumption of the Virgin, a festival instituted in the Roman Church in commemoration of the death and pretended resurrection of the Virgin Mary, and her triumphant entry into heaven. The apocryphal tradition upon which this festival is founded is as follows: "That the Blessed Virgin died at the age of seventy-two (one hundred and fifty-nine, according to Nicephorus), and that at her death all the apostles of our Lord, except St. Thomas, were miraculously present, having been conveyed in clouds from the various countries where they were preaching; that they buried her at Gethsemane; and that St. Thomas, upon his return to Jerusalem, went as far as the sea of Galilee and expressed such a longing desire to see her face once again, that they opened her tomb, but found there nothing but the grave-clothes, although the grave had been fastened and watched, day and night, by some of the apostles and many other Christians." The Assumption of the Virgin is not always a point of faith in the Roman Church, but is now universally received. The day of celebration is Aug. 15. It is also celebrated in the Greek Church. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, vii, 867; Landor, Eccl. Dict., s. v.

Assumption of Moses, an apocryphal book so called, said to contain an account of the death of Moses and of the translation of his soul to Paradise. Some scholars identify the part of the book about a vision between St. Michael and the devil, alluded to in the Epistle of Jude (ver. 9), who were contained in this book (Morrer, who cites Calmet).—J. A. Fabric. Cod. Pseud-p. V. T. i, 830–847. See Moses.

Assur’u, a less correct form of two names.

1. (Heb. Ashshur), Ἀσσύριος, Sept. and Apoc. Ασσύριον.) An inaccurate method of Anglicizing ( Ezra iv, 2; Psa. lxxxiii, 8) or Grecizing (2 Esd. ii, 8; Jud. xii, 14; v. 1; vi, 17; vii, 20, 24; xii, 16; xiv, 8; xv, 6; xvi, 4) the original [see Assur’tus] word for Assyria (q. v.).

2. (Ἀσσύριος v. r. Ἀσσύριος), while other copies omit; Vulg. Azir.) One of the heads of the "tempel servants," whose descendants are said to have returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. v, 31), doubtless a corruption for the Haran (q. v.) of the true text (Ezra ii, 31).

Assurance, in theology, is a firm persuasion of our being in a state of salvation.

(1.) The doctrine itself has been matter of dispute among divines, and when considered as implying not only that we are now accepted of God through Christ, but that we shall be finally saved, or when it is so taken as to deny a state of salvation to those who are not considered as to be free from all doubt, it is in many views questionable. Assurance of final salvation must stand or fall with the doctrine of personal unconditional election, and is chiefly held by divines of the Calvinistic school. The 18th article of the Westminster Confession (Of the Assurance of Grace and Salvation) says, 'Although hypocrites, and other unregenerated men, may vainly deceive themselves with false hopes and carnal presumptions of being in a state of grace, yet the scourgings of God's providence in his word, which hope of theirs shall perish; yet such as truly believe in the Lord Jesus, and love him in sincerity, endeavoring to walk in all good conscience before him, may in this life be certainly assured that they are in a state of grace, and may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, of eternal life, and of a perfect deliverance from all sin, and of the总 assurance of their interest in the love of God, and in all the promises of the gospel, and of our vain diligence and faithfulness in the duties of obedience, the proper fruits of this assurance: so far is it from inclining men to looseness. True believers may have the assurance of their salvation divers ways shaken, diminished and intermitted; as by negligence in preserving it; by falling into some special sin, which wounds the conscience, and grieves the Spirit; by some sudden or vehement temptation; by God's withdrawing the light of his countenance, and suffering even such as fear him to walk in darkness and to have no light. Yet are they never utterly destitute of that need of God, and life of faith, that he is Christ and the brethren, that sincerity of heart and obedience of duty out of which, by the operation of the Spirit, this assurance may in due time be revived, and by the which, in the mean time, they are supported from utter despair.'

(2.) On the other hand, that nothing is an evidence of a state of present salvation but so entire a persuasion as amounts to assurance in the strongest sense, might be denied upon the ground that degrees of grace, of all saving grace, are undoubtedly mentioned in Scripture. Assurance, however, is spoken of in the New Testament, and stands prominent as one of the leading doctrines of religious experience. We have 'full assurance of understanding;' that is, a perfect knowledge and entire persuasion of the truth of the faith of Christ. The 'assurance of faith,' in Hebrews ix, 22, is an entire trust in the sacrifice and priestly office of Christ. The 'assurance of hope,' mentioned in Hebrews vi, 11, relates to the heavenly inheritance, and must necessarily imply a full persuasion that we are the children of God, and therefore 'heirs of his glory;' and from this passage it must certainly be concluded that such an assurance is what every Christian ought to aim at, and that it is attainable. This, however, does not exclude occasional doubt and weakness of faith from the earlier stages of his experience.

(3.) A comforting and abasing persuasion of present acceptance, through Christ, and that such assurance must in various degrees follow true faith. In support of this view the following remarks may be offered: If the Bible teaches that man is by nature prone to evil, and that in practice he violates God's law, and is thereby exposed to punishment; that an act of grace and pardon is promised on condition of repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; that repentance implies consideration of our ways, a sense of the displeasure of Almighty God, contrition of heart, and consequently trouble and grief of mind, mixed, however, with a hope inspired by the promise of forgiveness, and which leads to earnest application for the actual pardon of sin so promised; it will follow from the above whether (the feeling of humility passing over which he mentions as real Christians. And I really conceive, both from the Harmonia Confessionum and whatever else I have occasionally read, that all reformed churches in Europe did once believe, 'Every true Christian has the divine evidence of his being in favor with God; 1 Thess. 4:17, 1 Cor. 15:17, 1 Thessalon., and many other (if not all) of the reformers frequently and strongly assert that every believer is conscious of his own acceptance with God, and that by a supernatural evidence' (see below).

Thomas Aquinas supposed (Summ. pt. ii, 1, quest. 112, art. 5) a threefold way in which man could ascribe: there was nothing except: 1. Not the scriptural view when sin is forgiven by the mercy of God through Christ, we are by some means assured of it, and peace and satisfaction of mind take the place of anxiety and fear. The first of these conclusions is sufficiently disproved by the authority of Scripture, which exhibits the loosing of the strait gate of heaven, the rising of the dead, and represents it as actually experienced by true believers.

'Therefore being justified by faith.' 'There is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus.' 'Whosoever believeth is justified from all things.' etc. The quotations might be multiplied, but these are decisive. The notion that, though an act of forgiveness may take place, we are unable to ascertain a fact so important to us, is also irreconcilable with many passages, in which the writers of the New Testament speak of an experience not confined personally to themselves, or to those Christians who were endowed with spiritual gifts, but common to all Christians. 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God.' 'We joy in God, by whom we have received the reconcilation.' 'Being reconciled unto God by the death of his Son.' 'We have not received the spirit of bondage again unto fear, but the spirit of adoption, by which we cry, Abba, Father.' To these may be added innumerable passages, who express the comfort, the confidence, and the joy of Christ's people: 'their' (by their 'access' to him; their entire union and delightful intercourse with him; and their absolute confidence in the success of their prayers. All such passages are perfectly consistent with deep humility and self-diffidence, but they are irreconcilable with a state of hostility between the parties, and with an unaccustomed and only hoped-for restoration of friendship and favor. An assurance, therefore, that the sins which are felt to be a burden intolerable are forgiven, and that the ground of that apprehension of future punishment which causes the penitent to 'despair his manifold sins,' is taken away by restoration to the favor of the offended God, may be readily admitted. Nothing would be more incongruous and impossible than the comfort, the peace, the rejoicing of spirit, which in the Scriptures are attributed to believers.

'Few Christians of evangelical views have, therefore, denied the possibility of our becoming assured of the truth of the propositions which constitute the doctrine of eternal salvation has not been under discussion), by what means the assurance of the divine favor is conveyed to the mind. Some have concluded that we obtain it by inference, others by the direct testimony of the Holy Spirit to the mind' (Watson, a. v.).

(6) With respect to the history of the doctrine of assurance, Wesley remarks: 'I apprehend that the whole Christian Church in the first centuries enjoyed it. For, though we have few points of doctrine explicitly taught in the small remains of the ante-Nicene fathers, yet I think none that carefully read Clemens Romanus, Irenæus, Polycarp, Origen, or any other of them, can doubt for a moment whether (the feeling of humility passing over which he mentions as real Christians. And I really conceive, both from the Harmonia Confessionum and whatever else I have occasionally read, that all reformed churches in Europe did once believe, 'Every true Christian has the divine evidence of his being in favor with God; 1 Thess. 4:17, 1 Cor. 15:17, 1 Thessalon., and many other (if not all) of the reformers frequently and strongly assert that every believer is conscious of his own acceptance with God, and that by a supernatural evidence' (see below).

Sir W. Hamilton, in a footnote to his article on the English Universities (Discussions on Philosophy, etc.), while speaking on religious tests as a term of admission, has the following passage: 'Assurance, personal assurance (the feeling of certainty that God is propitious to me, that my sins are forgiven, fiducia, plerophorion fidei), was long universally held in the Protestant communities to be the criterion and condition of a true or saving faith. Luther declares that he who hath not assurance spews faith out: and Melancthon makes assurance the test of the regenerate. In the Reformation there was much of the pope's heresy, and it was maintained by Calvin, nay, even by Arminius, and is part and parcel of all the confessions of all the churches of the Reformation down to the Westminster Assembly. In that synod assurance was, in Protestantism, for the first time declared not to be a gracious possession, but a test of faith and practice, and condemned the holders of this, the doctrine of of Calvin, and of the older Scottish Church itself. In the English, and more particularly in the Irish Establishment, it still stands a necessary tenet of belief. The doctrine is now, however, disavowed, when apprehended, by Anglican churchmen." These strong statements are controverted in the Brit. and For. Evangelical Review (Oct. 1856), by Cunningham (see the article, and also the remarks of the Reformers, and of the men of the Reformation, Essay iii), who shows that Sir William Hamilton has greatly mistaken the reformed doctrine in representing assurance as, in the opinion of all the reformed churches, an essential part of saving faith. Dr. Cunningham proves, on the contrary, from several of the churchmen who lived before the Reformation, and from the writings of some leading reformers, that, in their opinion, "this assurance was not the proper act of justifying and saving faith, and did not belong to its essence; . . . that it was a result or consequence of faith, posterior to it in the order of nature, and frequently also of time." Regarded as an exposure of Sir William Hamilton's historical inaccuracies, this essay is complete, but as an exhibition of the scriptural doctrine of assurance it is seriously defective. It not only encumbers the doctrine by adding the assurance of final salvation to that of present forgiveness—a mistake full of embarrassment to time and doctrine, and of peril to the interests of practical religion—but it almost puts out of sight that direct and blessed witness of the Spirit to the believer's acceptance which is so prominent a feature of the experimental theology of the Bible, and without which the Christian life must be one of distressing uncertainty and doubt. But Sir William was quite right in saying that the Westminster Assembly was the first Protestant synod that formally declared assurance not to be of the essence of faith. Yet it declares that assurance is practicable and obligatory in very strong language, and calls it "an infallible assurance" [see above (1)].

Wesley, and the Methodist theologians generally, advocate the doctrine of assurance of present (not of eternal) salvation in the sense stated above (2), connecting it with the "witness of the Spirit," as in the following practical passage: "Every man, applying the scriptural marks to himself, may know whether he is one of God's people. Thus, if he know himself, as many as are led by the Spirit of God into all his truth and actions, they are the sons of God" (for which he has the infallible assurance of Holy Writ); secondly, I am thus led by the Spirit of God, he will easily conclude, therefore I am a son of God. Agreeably to this are those plain declarations of John in his first epistle. In verse 1 we know that we do know him, if we keep his commandments (ch. ii, 3). 'Whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him; that we are indeed the children of God (ver. 5). 'If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him' (ver. 9). 'We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren' (ch. iii, 14). 'Hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assured our hearts before him' (ver. 19), namely, because we 'love one another, not in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.' See also ch. iii, 24, and iv, 18. It is the same thing. For the first time it is evident, even of God, from the beginning of the world unto this day, who were more advanced in the grace of God, and the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, than the apostle John at the time when he wrote these words, and the fathers in Christ to whom he wrote. Notwithstanding which, it is evident, both to the apostle himself, and all those pillars in God's temple, were very far from despising these marks of their being the children of God; and that they applied them to their own souls for the confirmation of their faith. Yet all this is no other than rational evidence, the witness of our spirit, our reason, our understanding. It all resolves into this: Those who have these marks as children of God: but we have these marks, therefore we are children of God. But how does it appear that we have these marks? This is a question which still remains. How does it appear that we do love God and our neighbor, and that we keep his commandments? How does it appear to ourselves? not to others. I would ask him, then, that proposes this question, How does it appear to you that you are alive? and that you are now in ease, and not in pain? Are you not immediately conscious of it? By the same immediate consciousness you will know if your soul is alive to God; if you are not relieved from the pain of the body, and have the ease of a meek and quiet spirit. By the same means you cannot but perceive if you love, rejoice, and delight in God. By the same means you must be directly assured if you love your neighbor as yourself; if you are kindly afectioned to all mankind, and full of gentleness and long suffering.

For the Council of Trent (sess. vi, ch. ix, De Justificatione) it decided that "it is on no account to be maintained that those who are really justified ought to feel fully assured of the fact, without any doubt whatever; or that none are absolved and justified but those who believe themselves to be so; or that by this faith only absolution and justification are procured; as if he who does not believe this doubts the promises of God, and the efficacy of the death and resurrection of Christ. For, while no godly person ought to doubt the mercy of God, the merit of Christ, or the virtue and efficacy of the sacraments, so, on the other hand, whoever considers his own finitude and corruption may doubt and find himself in a 'trap,' even in the Catholic faith, since no one can certainly and infallibly know that he has obtained the grace of God." Assyr-in (Aezruim). We must here distinguish between the country of Assyria and the Assyrian empire. They are both designated in Hebrew by עֲבֹר, Asshur, the people being also described by the same term, only that in the latter sense it is masculine, in the former feminine. In the Septuagint it is commonly rendered by Αζρυα (Aeropy) or Αζρυανεος, and in the Septuagint in the A.D. 450 children of the elephant never by Αζρυανεος or Αζρυανα. The Asshirim (Aezruaim) of Gen. xxx, 8, were an Arab tribe; and at Ezek. xxxvii, 6, the word assurim (in our version "Ashurites") is only an abbreviated form of tezkarbox-wood. Assyria derived its name from the progenitor of the Assyrians, or, in the pedigrees of the second son of Shem (Gen. x, 22; 1 Chron, i, 17), a different person from Ashchur, son of Herron, and Caleb's grandson (1 Chron. ii, 24; iv, 5). In later times it is thought that Assur was worshipped as their chief god by the Assyrians (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 587).
ASSYRIA

ASSYRIA

See CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS. The extent of Assyria differed greatly at different periods. Probably in the earliest times it was confined to a small tract of low country between the Jebel Maklih, or Taurus range on the N., and the Lesser Zab (Zab Asfal) toward the S., lying chiefly on the immediate bank of the Tigris. Gradually its limits were extended, until it came to be regarded as comprising the whole region between the Armenian mountains (lat. 37° 30' N.) upon the north, and upon the south the country about Bagdad (lat. 38° 30'). Eastward its boundary was the high range of Zagros, or mountains of Kurdistan; westward it naturally remained the Tigris as its boundary, although, according to the views of some, it was eventually bounded by the Mesopotamian desert, while, according to others, it reached the Euphrates. Taking the greatest of these dimensions, Assyria may be said to have extended in a direction from N.E. to S.W. a distance of nearly 500 miles, with a width varying from 300 to 100 miles. Its area would thus have a little exceed 100,000 square miles, or about equal that of Italy.—Kitto, a.v.; Smith, a.v.

I. ASSYRIA PROPER.—1. Ancient Notice of its Position.—This was a great and powerful country, lying on the east of the Tigris (Gen. ii. 14), the capital of which was Nineveh (Gen. x. 11, etc.). Its exact limits in early times are unknown; but when its monarchs enlarged their dominions by conquest, the name of this metropolitan province was extended to the whole empire. Hence, while Homer calls the inhabitants of the country north of Palestine Arimos (evidently the Aramim or Arameans of the Hebrews), the Greeks of a later period, finding them subject to the Assyrians, called the country Assyria, or (v. also) Syria, a name which it has ever since borne. It is on this account that, in classical writers, the names Assyria and Syria are so often found interchanged (Henderson, On Isa. p. 173; Hitzig, Begriff d. Krit. d. Al. Text. p. 98); but it may be questioned whether in Hebrew "Asshur" and "Aram" are ever confounded. The same, however, cannot be affirmed of those parts of the Assyrian empire which lay east of the Euphrates, but west of the Tigris. The Hebrews, as well as the Greeks and Romans, appear to have spoken of them in a loose sense as being in Assyria, because of the Assyrian empire. Thus Isaiah (vii, 7) describes the Assyrians as those "beyond the river." The part east of the Euphrates, which later, and not the Tigris, is introduced at viii. 7, as an image of their power. In Gen. xxv, 18, the locality of the Ishmaelites is described as being east of Egypt, "as thou goest to Assyria," which, however, could only be reached through Mesopotamia and Babylon, and this idea best reconciles the apparent incongruity of that statement in the same book (ii, 14), that the Hittites, or Tigris, runs "on the east of Assyria," i.e. of the Assyrian provinces of Mesopotamia and Babylon; for there can be no doubt that, not only during the existence of the Assyrian monarchy, but long after its overthrow, the name of Assyria was given to those provinces, as having once formed so important a part of it. For example, in 2 Kings xxiii. 29, Nebuchadnezzar is termed the king of Assyria, though resident at Babylon (comp. Jer. ii. 18; Lament. v. 6; Judith i. 7; ii. 1); even Darius, king of Persia, is called, in Ezra vii, 22, king of Assyria (comp. Plin. Hist. Nat. xix. 110); and it is on a similar principle, even Macro. i. 19, the Jews are said to have been carried captive to Persia, i.e. Babylonia, because, as it had formerly been subject to the Assyrians, so it was afterward under the dominion of Persia. (Comp. Herodotus, i. 106, 172; iii. 5; vii. 63; Strabo, ii. 84; xvi. 1; Arrian, vii. 9; Pliny, Nat. Hist. viii. 9; Ammianus Marcellinus, xxiii. 20; xxiv. 2; Justin, i. 12.) One writer, Dionysius Periegetes (v. 972), applies the designation of Assyria even to Asia Minor, as far as the Black Sea. Yet, ultimately, this name again became restricted to the original province east of the Tigris, which was called by the Greeks Assosia (Ptolemy, vi. 1), and more commonly Armenia (Strabo, xiv. 567), or Armenia (Dion Cassius, lixviii. 28), the latter being only a dialectic variety of pronunciation, derived from the Aramaic custom of changing s into t. A trace of the name is supposed to be preserved in that of a very ancient place, Askor, on the Tigris, from four to six hours N.E. of Dial; in his Description of Asia Minor (ii. 152), describes the ruins as those of the "city of Nimrod," and states that some of the better informed of the Turks at Mosul said that it was Al Askar, or Askur, from which the whole country was denominated.

2. Boundaries.—According to Ptolemy, Assyria was in his day bounded on the north by Armenia, the Gordanian or Carduchian mountains, especially by Mount Nipheates; on the west by the River Tigris and Mesopotamia; on the south by Susiana, or Chuzistan, in Persia, and by Babylonia; and on the east by a part of Media, and Mounts Choutbaras and Zagros (Ptolemy, vi. 1; Pliny, Nat. Hist. v. 13; Strabo, xvi. 786). It corresponded to the modern Kurdistan, or country of the Kurds (at least to its larger and western portion), with part of the pashalic of Mosul.—Kitto.

Toward the north Assyria bordered on the strong and mountainous region of Armenia, which may have been at times under Assyrian dominion, but was never reckoned an actual part of the country (See 2 Kings xix. 37.) Toward the east her neighbors were originally a multitude of independent tribes, scattered along the Zagros chain, who have their fitting representatives in the modern Kurds and Lurs—the real sovereigns of that mountain range. Beyond these tribes lay Media, a country almost entirely contained, and thereby brought into direct contact with Assyria in this quarter. On the south, Elam or Susiana was the border state east of the Tigris, while Babylonia occupied the same position between the rivers. West of the Euphrates was Arabia, and higher up Syria, and the country of the Hittites, which last reached from the neighborhood of Damascus to Anti-Taurus and Amanus.—Smith.

3. General geographical character.—The country within these limits is of varied aspect. " Assyria," says Mr. Alaworth (Researches in Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea, Lond. 1838, p. 17), "including Taurus, is distinguished into three districts: by its structure, into a district of plutonic and metamorphic rocks, a district of sedimentary formations, and a district of alluvial deposits; by configuration, into a district of mountains, a district of hills, and a district of low watery plains; by natural productions, into a country of forests and fruit-trees, of olives, wine, corn, and pastureage, or of barren rocks; a country of mulberry, cotton, maize, tobacco, or of barren clay, sand, pebbly or rocky plains; and into a country of solitude and desolation, the greatest part of which is considerably raised above the level of the rivers. It is covered in spring time with the richest vegetation, presenting to the eye a carpet of flowers, varying in hue from day to day; but as the summer advances it is parched up, and gradually changes to an arid and yellowish appearance, except along the courses of the rivers.
All over this vast flat are found on both sides of the natural grass-covered heaps, marking the site of ancient inhabitations" (Layard, p. 245). Mr. Layard counted from one spot nearly a hundred (Nineveh and its Remain, i, 215); from another above 200 of these lofty mounds (Nineveh and Bab. p. 245). Those which have been excavated have in each instance presented appearances distinctly connecting them with the remain of Nineveh. See Nineveh. It may therefore be regarded as certain that they belong to the time of Assyrian greatness, and thus they will serve to mark the extent of the real Assyrian dominion.

4. Natural Productions.—The most remarkable feature, says Alaworth, in the vegetation of Taurus, is the abundance of trees, shrubs, and plants in the northcern, and their comparative absence in the southern district. Besides the productions above enumerated, Kurdistan yields gall-nuts, gum Arabic, mastic, mahuna (used as sugar), madder, castor-oil, and various kinds of grain, pulse, and fruit. An old traveller, Rauwolf, who passed by Mosul in 1574, dwells with admiration on the finely-cultivated fields on the Ti-gris, so fruitful in corn, wine, and honey as to remind him of the Assyrian Rabshakeh's description of his native country in 2 Kings xvii, 32. Rich informs us that a great quantity of honey, of the finest quality, is produced in the hilly district of the eastern part of the land of Assyria") are kept in hives of mud. The naphtha springs on the east of the Tigris are less productive than those in Mesopotamia, but they are much more numerous. The zoology of the mountain district includes bears (black and brown), panthers, lynxes, wolves, foxes, marmots, dormice, fawls and red deer, roebucks, antelopes, etc., and likewise goats, but not (as was once supposed) of the Angora breed.
In the plains are found lions, tigers, hyenas, beavers, jerboas, wild boars, camels, etc.—Kitto.

5. Subdivisions and Principal Towns.—Assyria in Scripture is generally spoken of indifferently, but the Hutch (2 K. 257) of Nahum (ii, 7) is an essentient for the Adiabene of the geographers, no name of a district can be said to be mentioned. The classical geographers, on the contrary, divided Assyria into a number of regions—Strabo (xvi, 1 and 4) into A A t i-ric, Arbela, Arrowa, Apollonioria, Chalmitis, Dolomene, Calachene, Adiabene, Mesopotamia, etc.; Florovcy (i, 3) into Arrapha, Apollonia, Adiabene, the Hurri, country. Apollonia, Arbela, the country of the Sen-ne, Calache, and Sittacene. These provinces appear to be chiefly named from cities, as Arbelita from Arabela; Calcine (or Calachen) from Calah or Halah (Gen. z, 11); Apollonias from Apolonia; Sittacene from Sistaca, etc. Adiabene, however, the mountainous region of all, derived its appellation from the Zab (Salor) or river on which it lay, as Ammianus Marcellinus informs us ASSYRIA

(xviii, 20). Ptolemy (v, 18) made Mesopotamia (which he understood literally as the whole country between the Euphrates and the Tigris) distinct from Assyria, just as the sacred writers distinguish "Aram-Naharin" from "Asurur." Strabo (xvi, 1) extended Assyrja to the Euphrates, and even across it into Arabia and Syria! Farthest north lay the province Artacacdia, so called, as Rosenmüller conjectures, from Arab Artash (Artass, see on Name on Genesis, i, 151). South of it was Calacene, by Strabo written Calachene; perhaps the Chalash of 2 Kings xvii, 6; xviii, 11. Next came Adiabene, so important a district of Assyria as sometimes to give names to the whole country, see Adiabene. In Assyrian history, in many pages of the South-Western corner of Persia, or in the Northern part of it lay Arbela, in which was Arbela (now Arbil, of which see an account in Rich's Kurdistan, ii, 14; and Appendix, No. i and ii), famous for the battle in which Alexander triumphed over Darius. South of this lay the two provinces of Apolloniatis and Sitacene. The country of Kir, to which the Assyrians transported the Damascene Syrians (2 Kings xvi, 2; Amos i, 6), was probably the region about the river Kur (the Cyrus of the Greeks), i.e. Iberia and Georgia.

The chief cities of Assyria in the time of its greatness appear to be the following: Nineveh, which is marked by the mounds opposite Mosul (Nebbi-Yunu and Kasuni), and Kalach (Ghalab, now Nurnur); Assur, now Kalch Skerygat; Sargina, or Dur-Sargina, now Khorsabad; Arbela, still Arbil; Opis, at the junction of the Tigris with the Tigris; and Sittaca, a little farther down the latter river, if this place should not rather be reckoned to Babylonia. (See the Journal of the Geographe. Soc. vol. i, part 1, p. 36, Lond. 1803.)

The capital of the whole country was Nineveh, the Ninos of the Greeks (Herodot. i, 109), the Hebrew name being supposed to denote "the abode of Ninnus," the founder of the empire. Its site is believed to have been on the east bank of the Tigris, opposite the modern town of Mosul, where there is now a small town called Nebbi Yunus (i.e. the prophet Jonah), the ruins around which were explored by Rich, and are described in his work on Kurdistan. See Nineveh. In Gen. x, 11, 12, three other cities are mentioned along with Nineveh, viz. Rechoboth, i.e. the city of Beohoboth, the locality of which is unknown. Calach (in our version, kalach) was the place in the territory of Calach above mentioned, or the modern Sulwan, called by the Syrians Chalash; and Reen, "a great city between Nineveh and Calach," which Bochart identifies with the Larissa of Xenophon (Anabasis, iii, 47), and Michaelis with a place called Rezina (Risaun, caput fontis?), destroyed by the Arabs A.D. 772. Rich notices an old place and convent of that name near Mosul (ii, 81). At the town of Al-Kosh, north of Mosul, tradition places the birth and burial of the prophet Nahum, and the Jews resort thither in pilgrimage to his tomb. But, though he is styled an El-khohit (Nah. i, 1), his denunciation against Assyria and Nineveh evidently uttered under Palestine, and St. Jerome fixes his birthplace at Halhaan, a village in Galilee.—Kitto; Smith. See Jonah.

6. Present Condition.—The greater part of the country which formed Assyria Proper is under the nominal sway of the Turks, who compose a considerable proportion of the population of the towns and larger villages, filling many of the public offices with nothing from other Osmanis. The Pasha of Mosul is nominated by the Porte, but is subject to the Pasha of Bagdad; there is also a pasha at Sulaymanesh and Akra; a bey at Arbil, a musullim at Kirkuk, etc. But the aboriginal inhabitants of the country, and of the whole marshy region, are divided Turks from Persia, are the Kurds, the Carduchii of the Greeks; from them a chain of these mountains were anciently called the Carduchian or Goyrdean, and from them now the country is designated Klaproth, in his Asia Polyglotta (Paris, 1822, 4to, p. 75), derives the name from the Persian root krap, i.e. strong, brave. They are still, as of old, a barbarous and warlike race, occasionally yielding a formal allegiance, on the west, to the Turks, and on the east to the Persians, but never wholly subdued; indeed, some of the more powerful tribes, such as the Hakkary, have maintained an entire independence. Some of them are stationary in the more fertile parts of the villages, and live a settled life; but elsewhere, beyond the limits of their own country, as nomadic shepherds; but they are all more or less addicted to predatory habits, and are regarded with great dread by their more peaceful neighbors. They profess the faith of Islam, and are of the Sunni sect. All travellers have remarked the sturdy character and hardy appearance of these ancient Highlanders of Scotland. (See Mr. Ainworth's second work, Travels and Researches in Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, etc., Lond. 1842, 2 vols.)

The Christian population is scattered over the whole region, but is found chiefly in the north. It includes Chaldeans, who form that branch of the Nestorians, which adheres to the Church of Rome, a few Jacobites, or monophysite Syrians, Armenians, etc. But the most interesting portion is the ancient Church of the primitive Nestorians, a lively interest which in this has lately been excited in the religious world by the publications of the American missionaries (see, especially, The Nestorians of Persia, by Asaiah C. Good)." The laic of Chaldeans in the north, of whom Dr. E. Robinson, in the Am. Bibl. Repos. Oct. 1841; Jan. 1842; Rev. J. Perkins, ib. Jan. 1843; and Residence in Persia, N.Y. 1843), see Nestorians. Another peculiar race that is met with in this and the neighboring countries is that of the Yezidites (q.v.), who Grant and Ainworth would likewise connect with the ten tribes; but it seems much more probable that they are an offshoot from the ancient Manichees, their alleged worship of the evil Principality amounting to no more than a reverence which keeps them from speaking of him with disrespect (see Home's in the Am. Bibl. Repos. for April, 1842). Besides the dwellers in towns and the agricultural population, there are a vast number of wandering tribes, not only of Kurds, but of Arabs, Turkomans, and other classes of robbers, who, by keeping the settled inhabitants in constant dread of property and life, check every effort at improvement; and, in consequence of this and the influence of the odious government, many of the good country people are either driven to more than unproductive wastes. A copy of a famous history of Kurdistan, entitled Tarikh al-Ikrad (Akrad being the collective name of the people), was procured by Mr. Rich when in the country, and is now, along with the other valuable Oriental MSS. of that lamented traveller, preserved in the British Museum. See Kurdistan.

II. The Assyrian Empire.—No portion of ancient history is involved in greater obscurity than that of the empire of Assyria. Nor is this obscurity in any very great degree removed by the recent remarkable discoveries of the monumental records of the nation by Layard, Boist, and Loftus.

1. Source of Assyrian History.—In attempting to arrange even the facts deducible from Scripture, a difficulty presents itself at the outset, arising from the ambiguity of the account given of the origin of the earliest Assyrian state in Gen. x, 11. After describing Nimrod, son of Cush, "as a mighty one in power to subdue any opposing nation," and the beginning of his kingdom (or, rather, the first theatres of his dominion) was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar," i.e. Babylonia. Then follow the words (as it is in the margin), "Out of that land he (i.e. Nimrod) went out into Assyria and built Nineveh," (quoted Concord. Hebr. Wob. ed. Tynd. p. 225.) Moses is enumerating the descendants of Ham, and it is not likely that he would interrupt the details to give an account of Ashur, a son of Shem, whose posterity are not introduced.
till ver. 21. Besides, in the circumstance of Assur leaving one country to settle in another, there was nothing remarkable, for that was the case with almost all Noah's grandchildren. But if we understand it of Nimrod, then the counsel and the words will be manifest. The design obviously is to represent him as a potent monarch and ambitious conqueror. His brethren, the other sons of Cush, settled in the south, but he, advancing northward, first seized on Babylon, and, proceeding thence into Assyria (already partly occupied by another distant tribe from whom the land took its name), he built Nineveh and the other strongholds mentioned, in order to secure his conquests. This view is confirmed by a passage in Mic. v. 6, where, predicting the overthrow of Assyria by the Medes and Babylonians, the prophet says, "They shall devour the land of Assyria with the sword: and the land of Nimrod in the entrances thereof" (comp. v. 5). It likewise agrees with the native tradition (if we can depend on the report of Ctesias), that the founder of the Assyrian monarchy and the builder of Nineveh was one and the same person, viz., Ninus, from whom it derived its name (q. d. Nin's Abode, and some of the moderns have called it Nin-edin); but it was not his proper name, but an opprobrious appellation imposed on him by his enemies. Modern traditiion likewise connects Nimrod with Assyria; for while, as we have seen, the memory of Ashur is preserved in the locality of Ashur, that place is also termed the "city of Nimrod," and (as the learned dame on Titus (in the styled Nimrod's Castle) Rich informs us) "that the inhabitants of the neighboring village of Derwezah consider him as their founder." He adds, that the village story-tellers have a book they call the Kisheh-Nimirud, or "Tales of Nimrod.*

It is true that the Authorized Version of Gen. x. 11 is countenanced by most of the ancient translators and by Josephus; but, on the other hand, the one we have preferred is that of the Tarqums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and of Jerome; and (among the moderns) of Bochart, Hyde, Marsham, Wells, Faber, Hales, and many others. Yet, though Nimrod's "kingdom" embraced the lands both of Shinar and Assur, we are left in the dark as to whether Babylon or Nineveh became the permanent seat of government, and consequently whether his empire should be designated that of Babylonia or that of Assyria. No certain traces of it, indeed, are to be found in Scripture for ages after its erection. In the days of Abraham, we hear of a king of Babylon (Gen. xiv. 1) and of the same monarch later (2 K. ii. 13) under the name of Chedorlaomer, who had held in subjection for twelve years five petty princes of Palestina (Gen. xiv. 4), and who, in consequence of their rebellion, invaded that country along with three other kings, one of whom was "Amraphel, king of Shinar." Josephus says "the Assyrians had then dominion over Asia," and he styles these four kings merely commanders in the Assyrian army. It is possible that Chedorlaomer was an Assyrian vicerey, and the others his deputies; for at a later period the Assyrians boasted, "Are not my princes altogether kings?" (Isa. x. 8). Yet some have rather concluded from the narrative that by this time the monarchy of Nimrod, which had been broken up, and at least the seat of government had been transferred to Elam. Be this as it may, the name of Assyria as an independent state does not again appear in Scripture till the closing period of the age of Moses. Balaam, a seer from the northern part of Mesopotamia, in the next century, addressed the kings of the Canaanitish cities, a mountain tribe on the east side of the Jordan, "took up his parable," i. e. raised his oracular, prophetic chant, and said, "Durable is thy dwelling-place! yes, in a rock puttest thou thy nest: nevertheless, wasted shall be the Kenite, until Assur shall lead them captive." In this verse, besides the play upon the word ken (the Hebrew for a nest), the reader may remark the striking contrast drawn between the permanent nature of the abode, and the transient possession of it by the occupants. The prediction found its fulfillment in the Kenites being gradually reduced in strength (comp. 1 Sam. xvi. 6), till they finally shared the fate of the Transjordanites, and were swept away into captivity by the Assyrians (1 Chr. v. 26; 2 Kings xvi. 9; xix. 12, 13; 1 Chr. ii. 55.). But, as a counterpart to this, Balaam next sees a vision of retaliatory vengeance on their oppressors, and the awful prospect of the threatened devastations, though beheld in far distant terrors from whom it proceeded. Whose shall live when God doeth this? For ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur, and shall afflict Eber, but he also [the invader] shall perish forever." This is not without obscurity; but it has commonly been supposed to point to the conquest of the regions that once formed the Assyrian empire, first by the Macedonians from Greece, and then by the Romans, both of whose empires were in their turn overthrown.

In the time of the Judges, the people of Israel became subject to a king of Mesopotamia, Churhan-risha-thaim (Judg. iii. 10), who is by Josephus styled King Kushana of the Assyrians; but we are left in the same ignorance as in the case of Chedorlaomer as to whether he was an independent sovereign or only a viceroy for another. The eighty-third Psalm (ver. 9) mentions Ashur as one of the nations leagued against Israel; but as the date of that composition is unknown, nothing certain can be founded on it. The first king of Assyria alluded to in Scripture is Shalmaneser the third, who built Nineveh when the prophet Jonathas was sent thither (Jon. iii. 6). Hales supposes him to have been the father of Pul, the first Assyrian monarch named in Scripture, and dates the commencement of his reign B.C. 821. By that time the metropolis of the empire had become "an exceeding great" and populous city, but one pre-eminent in wickedness (Jon. 1. 2; iii. 8; iv. 11). See Jonathas.

The first expressly recorded appearance of the Assyrian power in the countries west of the Euphrates is in the reign of Menahem, king of Israel, against whom "the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul or Pekah, king of Assyria" (1 Chron. v. 26), who invaded the country, and exacted a tribute of a thousand talents of silver "that his hand," i. e. his favor, "might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand" (2 Kings xix. 19, 20). Newton places this event in the year B.C. 770, in the twentieth year of Pul's reign, the time when Nineveh became the metropolis of the empire.

As to his name, we find the syllable Pul, Pel, or Pul entering into the names of several Assyrian kings (e. g. Pileser, Sardanapal-us); and hence some connect it with the Persian bela, i. e. high, exalted, and think it may have been part of the title which the Assyrian monarchs bore. Hales conjectures that Pul may have been the second Belus of the Greeks, his fame having reached them by his excursions into Western Asia. About this period we find the prophet Hosea making frequent allusions to the practice both of Israel and Judah, of throwing themselves for support on the kings of Assyria. In ch. v. 15; x. 6, our version speaks of their escape from "the hand of the king of Assyria" and of "the king of Assyria" and of "the king of Jareb," but the original there is very obscure; and the next Assyrian monarch mentioned by name is Tiglath-pileser. The suppression of Newton is adopted by Hales, that at Pul's death his dominions were divided between his two sons, Tiglath-pileser and *Nab- or *Naama, king of Damascus. The date of whose government or reign the celebrated era of Nabonassar took its rise, corresponding to B.C. 747. The name of the other is variously written Tiglath and Tiltagh, Pileser and Pilesor: the etymology of the first is unknown (some think it has a reference to the river Tigris; others to the Tigris: Pileser signifies in Persian "exalted prince.") When Azash, king of Judah, was hard pressed by the combined forces of
In whose reign Tartan besieged and took Ashdod in Philistia (B.C. 725) [see Sargon]; and as Tartan is elsewhere spoken of (2 Kings xviii, 17) as a general of Sennacherib, some have supposed that Sargon is but another name of that monarch, while others would identify him either with Shalmaneser, or with Esarhaddon, Sennacherib’s successor. But the correctness of all these conjectures may fairly be questioned; and we adhere to the opinion of Gesenius (Comment. zu Jesu, in loc.), that Sargon was a king of Assyria, who succeeded Shalmaneser, and had a short reign of two or three years. He thinks the name may be equivalent to Ser-jaunish, “Prince of the Sun.” Von Bohlen prefers the derivation of argum, “gold-colored.” His attack on Egypt may have arisen from the jealousy which the Assyrians entertained of that nation’s influence over Palestine ever since the negotiation between its king Shalmaneser and Hoshea, king of Israel. From many incidental expressions in the book of Isaiah we can infer that there was at this time a strong Egyptian party among the Jews, for that people are often warned against relying for help on Egypt, instead of simply confiding in Jehovah (Isa. xxx, 2; xxxi, 1; comp. xx, 6, 6). The result of Tartan’s expedition against Egypt and Ethiopia was predicted by Isaiah while that general was yet on the Egyptian frontier at Ashdod (Isa. xx, 1-4); and it is not improbable that it is to this Assyrian invasion that the prophet Nahum refers when he speaks (iii, 8-10) of the subjugation of No, i.e. No-ammun, or Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, and the captivity of its inhabitants. The occupation of the country by the Assyrians, however, must have been very transient, for in the reign of San...

gon's successor, Sennacherib, or Sancherib, we find Hezekiah, king of Judah, throwing off the Assyrian yoke, and aligning himself with Egypt (2 Kings xviii. 7, 21). Thus brought against him by a mighty host, which, without difficulty, subdued the fenced cities of Judah, and compelled him to purchase peace by the payment of a large tribute. But "the treacherous dealer dealt very treacherously" (Isa. xxxiii. 1), and, notwithstanding the agreement, procceeded to the execution of his purpose. He based his success, in the prayers of the "good king" of Judah, the Assyrian was diverted from his purpose, partly by the "rumor" (Isa. xxxvii. 6), of the approach of Tiribaksh, king of Ethiopia, and partly by the sudden and miraculous destruction of a great part of his army (2 Kings xviii. 13, 17; xix. Isa. xxxvi. and xxxvii.). He himself fled (B.C. 712) to Nineveh, where, in course of time, when worshipping in the temple of his god Nisroch, he was slain by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer, the parricides escaping into the land of Armenia—a fact which is preserved in that country's traditional history. See ANARAT. Regarding the period of Sennacherib's reign from 705 to 681, little is known. The first place where the name of Hezekiah occurs is on the nabonidus cylinder of the British Museum, which contains a copy of the succession of the kings of Babylonia from Nabopolassar to Nebuchadnezzar. Nebuchadnezzar, the last of the dynasty, was in power at the time of the fall of Babylon to the Persians. The capture of Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar was a great event in the history of the world, as it marked the end of the Babylonian empire and the beginning of the Persian empire. Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by his son Belshazzar, who was a tyrant and a昏君, and was overthrown by the Persians under Cyrus the Great. Nebuchadnezzar was a great king, and his reign was marked by the capture of Babylon, the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem, and the scattering of the Jews into captivity. Nebuchadnezzar was a great military commander, and his armies were victorious in many battles. He was also a great statesman, and his reign was marked by the expansion of the Babylonian empire. Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded by his son Belshazzar, who was a tyrant and a昏君, and was overthrown by the Persians under Cyrus the Great. facts militate strongly against the views of Ctesias, whose numbers produce for the founding of the empire the date of B.C. 2192 (Clintor. Fast. Hist. i, 260). The more modest account of Herodotus is at once more probable in itself, more agreeable to Scripture, and more in accordance with the native writer Berosus. Herodotus relates that the Assyrians were "lords of Asia," and that their captive tributary subjects were broken up by a revolt of the subject-nations (i, 90). After a period of anarchy, the length of which he does not estimate, the Median kingdom was formed, 179 years before the death of Cyrus, or B.C. 708. He would thus, it appears, have assigned to the foundation of the Assyrian empire a date not very greatly anterior to B.C. 1250, which is the probable date of the making of the Statues of Lower Zar (Zab Asfal) to the Upper Sea of the Setting Sun." All this he accomplished in the first five years of his reign. At a later date he appears to have suffered defeat at the hands of the king of Babylon, who had invaded his territory and succeeded in carrying off to Babylon various idols from the Assyrian temples (Osterv. Chron. Arm. i, 4), and who in the ninth year of his reign removed the Babylonian captives from Assyria (ii, 172).

The other monarchs of the Kaleb-Sherkat series, both before and after Tiglath-Pilesar, are comparatively insignificant. The later kings of the series are only known to us as the ancestors of the two great monarchs Sardanapalus the first and his son, Shalmaneser or Shalmanesar, who were among the most warlike of the Assyrian princes. Sardanapalus the first, who appears to have been the warlike Sardanapalus of the Greeks (Suidas, s. v.; comp. Hellan. Perg. p. 155), transferred the seat of government from Kaleb-Sherkat to Nimrud (probably the Scriptural Calah), and built out of stones which are magnificent palaces which have recently been unearthed by English explorers. A great portion of the Assyrian sculptures now in the British Museum are derived from this edifice. A description of the building has been given by Mr. Layard (Nin. and its Remains, vol. ii, ch. 1). By an inscription repeated more than a hundred times upon its sculptures we learn that Sar- danapalus carried his arms far and wide through Western Asia, warring on the one hand in Lower Babylonia and Chaldea, on the other in Syria and upon the coast of the Mediterranean. His son, Shalmaneser or Shalmanbar, the monarch who set up the Black Obelisk, is now in the British Museum, to commemorate his victories, was a still greater conqueror. He appears to have overrun Cappadocia, Armenia, Aserbajan, great portions of Media Magna, the Kurdish mountains, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Phoenicia; everywhere making the kings of the countries tributary to him. If we may trust the reading of certain names, or on which we have the consent of the empress, it is agreed, he came in contact with various Scriptural personages, being opposed in his Syrian wars by Benhadad and Hazael, kings of Damascus, and taking tribute from Jehu, king of Israel. His son and grandson followed in his steps, but scarcely equalled his glory. It is thought to be identical with the Biblical Pul, Phul, or Phaltch, who is the first of the Assyrian kings of whom we have mention in Scripture. See Pul.

(4.) The Kings from Pul to Esarhaddon. — The succession of the Assyrian kings from Pul almost to the close of the empire is rendered tolerably certain, not merely by the inscriptions, but also by Jewish records. In the 2d book of Kings we find the names of Pul, Tiglath-Pilesar, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, following one another in rapid succession (2 Kings xv. 19 and 29; xvii. 3; xviii. 13; xix. 6), and in Isaiah we have the name of "Sargon, king of Assyria," (Isa. xx. 1), the king of the prophet, and who must evidently, therefore, belong to the same series. The inscriptions, by showing us that Sargon was the father of Sennacherib, fix his place in the list, and give us for the monarchs of the last half of the 8th and the first half of the 7th century B.C. the probable order of Tiglath-Pilesar II, Shalmaneser II, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. For a detailed account of the series of these kings, see each name in its place.

(a.) Establishment of the Lower Dynasty.—It seems to be certain that at or near the accession of Pul a great change of some kind or other occurred in Assyria. Berossus is said to have brought his grand dynasty of forty-five kings in the 28th year of the reign of Pul (Polen. an. Euseb. i, c.), and to have made him the first king of a new series. By the synchronism of Menahem (2 Kings xv, 19), the date of Pul may be determined to about B.C. 770. It was only twenty-three years later, as we find by the canon of Ptolemy, that the Babylonians considered their independence to have been restored (ibid.), and the date is probably intended to assign nearly to this same era the great comet which (according to him) broke up the Assyrian empire into a number of fragments, out of which were formed the Median and other kingdoms. These traditions may none of them be altogether trustworthy; but their existence is at least remarkable, and seems to show that about the middle of the eighth century B.C. there must have been a break in the line of Assyrian kings—a revolution, foreign or domestic—and a consequent weakening or dissolution of the bonds which united the conquered nations with their conquerors. The theory put forth by Bion and Polyhistor (Agathias, ii, 25), that the original dynasty of Assyrian kings ended with a certain Belochus or Beles, who was succeeded by a usurper (called by them Beletaras or Balatarus), in whose family the crown continued until the destruction of Nineveh. The general character of the circumstances, and a few points of resemblance in the names—for Belochus is close upon Phaloch, and Beletaras may represent the second element in Tiglath-Pileser (who in the inscriptions is called "Tiglath-Palailtara")—induce a suspicion that probably the Pul or Phaloch of Scripture was really the last king of the old monarchy, and that Tiglath-Pileser II., his successor, was placed in a position in which the former had been called the "Lower Empire." It may be suspected that Berossus really gave this account, and that Polyhistor, who repeated it, has been misrepresented by Eusebius. The synchronism between the revolution in Assyria and the era of Babylonian independence is thus brought almost to exactness, for Tiglath-Pileser is known to have been upon the throne about B.C. 740 (Clinton, Fast. Hell. i, 278), and may well have ascended it in B.C. 747.

(b.) Supposed Loss of the Empire at this Period.—Many writers of repute—among them Clinton and Niebuhr—have hesitated to accept the statement of Herodotus with respect to the breaking up of the whole empire at this period. It is evident, however, both from Scripture and from the monuments, that the shock sustained through the domestic revolution has been greatly exaggerated. Niebuhr himself observes (Vor. trage über alte Geschichte, i, 38) that, after the revolution, Assyria soon "recovered herself, and displayed the most extraordinary energy." It is plain, from Scripture, that in the reigns of Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, Assyria was as great as at any former era. These kings all warred successfully in Palestine and its neighborhood, and enjoyed great dominion (Ass. iv, 5), and in their reigns the power of the Medes was recognized (2 Kings xvii, 24; Ezra iv, 9). So far from our observing symptoms of weakness and curtailed dominion, it is clear that at no time were the Assyrian arms pushed back for their efforts more sustained and vigorous. The Assyrians had, during the period in which we are considering, the most complete accordance with these representations. They exhibit to us the above-mentioned monarchs as extending their dominions farther than any of their predecessors. The empire is continually rising under them, and reaches its culminating point in the reign of Esarhaddon. The subjects of the kings of this period are fully borne out by the indications of great ness to be traced in the architectural monuments. No palace of the old monarchy equalled, either in size or splendor, that of Sennacherib at Nineveh. No series of kings belonging to it left buildings at all to be compared with those erected by Sargon, his son, and his grandson. The magnificent remains at Kouyunjik and Khorsabad belong entirely to these later kings, while those at Nimrud are about equally divided between them and their predecessors. It is farther noticeable that the writers who may be presumed to have drawn from Berossus, as Polyhistor and Abdy- neus, particularly, through the interpolations of those later kings. Polyhistor said (ap. Euseb. i, 5) that Sen- nacherib conquered Babylon, defeated a Greek army in Cilicia, and built there Tarass, the capital. Abdy- neus related the same facts, except that he substituted for the Greek army of Polyhistor a Greek fleet; and added that Esarhaddon (his Azerdi) conquered Lower Syria and Egypt (Ibid. i, 9). Similarly Menander, the Tyrian historian, assigned to Shalmaneser an expedition to Cyprus (ap. Joseph. Anti. ix, 14), and Herodotus himself admitted that Sennacherib invaded Egypt (ii, 141). On every ground it seems necessary to conclude that the second Assyrian kingdom was really greater and more glorious than the third. It is clear, however, that it the limits of the empire reached their fullest extent, and the internal prosperity was at the highest.

The statement of Herodotus is not, however, without a basis of truth. It is certain that Babylon, about the time of Tiglath-Pileser's accession, ventured upon a revolution, and a revolution accompanied with a certain decrease in the limits of the empire reached their fullest extent, and the internal prosperity was at the highest.

The statement of Herodotus is not, however, without a basis of truth. It is certain that Babylon, about the time of Tiglath-Pileser's accession, ventured upon a revolution, and a revolution accompanied with a certain decrease in the limits of the empire reached their fullest extent, and the internal prosperity was at the highest. In such a situation did it appear to the Tyrians, who seem to reckon it the commence of her independence. See BABY- LON. The knowledge of this fact may have led Her- rodotus into his error; for he would naturally suppose that, when Babylon became free, there was a general dissolution of the empire. It has been shown that this is far from the truth; and it may further be observed that, even as regards Babylon, the Assyrian loss was not permanent. Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhad- don all exercised full authority over that country, which appears to have been still an Assyrian foist at the close of the kingdom.

(6.) Successors of Esarhaddon.—By the end of the reign of Esarhaddon the triumph of the Assyrian arms had been so complete that scarcely an enemy was left who could cause her serious anxiety. The kingdoms of Hamath, of Damascus, and of Samaria had been successively absorbed; Phenicia had been conquered; Judea had been made a feudatory; Phælia and Idumea had been subdued. By the close of this century the Assyrian arms had covered, cities placed in Median. Unless in Armenia and Susiana there was no foe left to reduce, and the consequence appears to have been that a time of profound peace succeeded to the long and bloody wars of Sargon and his immediate successors. In Scripture it is remarkable that we hear nothing of Assyria after the reign of Esarhaddon; and profane history is equally literal silent until the attacks begin which brought about her downfall. The monuments show that the son of Esarhaddon, who was called Sardanapalus by Abdy- neus (ap. Euseb. i, 9), made scarcely any military ex- ppeditions, but occupied almost his whole time in the enjoyment of those which were created for him by his adorning his residence—as his predecessors had been accustomed to do—with a record and representation of his conquests, Sardanapalus II covered the walls of his palace at Nineveh with sculptures exhibiting his skill and prowess as a hunter. No doubt the military spirit rapidly decayed under such a ruler; and the indi- rect influence of this line of policy, produced the ruin of a power which had for six centuries been dominant in Western Asia.

(6.) Fall of Assyria.—The fate of Assyria, as a description of which we may begin the first Median attack on Nineveh took place, was, as far as it is to be understood, by the growing boldness and inactivity of the Medes, who became more formidable. When we think of the great power of the Assyr.
year B.C. 683. By what circumstances this people, who had so long been engaged in contests with the Assyrians, and had hitherto shown themselves so utterly unable to resist them, became suddenly strong enough to assume an aggressive attitude, and to force the Ninevites to submit to a siege, can only be conjectured. Whether mere natural increase, or the greater fear of the sword from the east, or the mediocrity of the Median nation at this time so far above its former condition, it is impossible to determine. We can only say that soon after the middle of the seventh century they began to press upon the Assyrians, and that, gradually increasing in strength, they proceeded, about the year B.C. 696, to make war against the Assyrians. By the Treaty of 696 (vii. 11, 12), for some time their efforts were unsuccessful; but after a while, having won over the Babylonians to their side, they became superior to the Assyrians in the field, and about B.C. 625, or a little earlier, laid final siege to the capital. See Media. Sargon, the last king—probably the grandson of Esarhaddon—made a stout and prolonged defence, but at length, finding resistance vain, he collected his wives and his treasures in his palace, and with his own hand setting fire to the building, perished in the flames. This account is given in brief by Abydenus, who probably follows Berosus; and its outline so far agrees with Ctesias (ap. Diod. ii. 29), who assigns an important value to that writer's details of the siege. See Nineveh. In the general fact that Assyria was overcome, and Nineveh captured and destroyed by a combined attack of Medes and Babylonians, Josephus (Ant. x. 5) and the book of Tobit (xv. 13) are agreed. Polyhistor also implies (ap. Euseb. i. 5); and these authorities must be regarded as outweighing the silence of Herodotus, who mentions only the Medes in connection with the capture (i. 106), and says nothing of the Babylonians.

(7.) Fulfilment of Prophecy.—The prophecies of Nahum and Zephaniah (i. 13-5) against Assyria were probably delivered shortly before the catastrophe. The date of Nahum is very doubtful, but it is not unlikely that he wrote about B.C. 718, or at the close of the reign of Hosea. Zephaniah is even later, since he prophesied under Josiah, who reigned from B.C. 639 to 609. If B.C. 625 is the date of the destruction of Nineveh, we may place Zephaniah's prophecy about B.C. 630. The facts in connection with the destruction witnessed historically to the complete destruction which had come upon the Assyrians, using the example as a warning to Pharaoh-Hophra and the Egyptians (ch. xxxi. 22).

It was declared by Nahum (q. v.) emphatically, at the close of his prophecy, that there should be "no healing" (iii. 19). This announcement we find that Assyria never rose again to any importance, nor even succeeded in maintaining a distinct nationality. Once only was revolt attempted, and then in conjunction with Armenia and Media, the latter heading the rebellion. This attempt took place about a century after the Median conquest, during the troubles which followed upon the accession of Darius Hystaspis. It failed signally, and appears never to have been repeated, the Assyrians remaining thenceforth submissive subjects of the Persian empire. They were reckoned in the same strata with Babylon (Herod. iii. 92; comp. 1, 192), and paid an annual tribute, the black talent of silver. In the Persian armies, which were drawn in great part from the subject-nations, they appear never to have been held of much account, though they fought, in common with the other levies, at Thermopylae, at Cunaxa, at Issus, and at Arbela.

(8.) General Character of the Empire.—In the first place, like all the early monarchies which attained to any great extent, the Assyrian empire was composed of a number of separate kingdoms. In the East, conquest has scarcely ever been followed by amalgamation, and in the primitive empires there was not even any attempt at that governmental centralization which we find at a later period in the satrapal system of Persia. As Solomon "reigned over all the kingdoms from the river (Euphrates) unto the land of the Philistines and the border of Egypt," so the Assyrian monarchs bore sway over a number of petty kings—the native rulers of the several countries—through the entire extent of their dominions. They had in each empire, so far as we can learn, sole governors of their own kingdom;—were feudatories of the Great Monarch, of whom they held their crown by the double tenure of homage and tribute. Menahem (2 Kings xv. 19), Hoshea (ibid. xvii. 4), Ahaz (ibid. vii. 8), Hezekiah (ibid. xlix. 14), and Manasseh (ibid. xxvi. 13) were all such. For some time their efforts were unsuccessful; but after a while, having won over the Babylonians to their side, they became superior to the Assyrians in the field, and about B.C. 625, or a little earlier, laid final siege to the capital. See Media. Sargon, the last king—probably the grandson of Esarhaddon—made a stout and prolonged defence, but at length, finding resistance vain, he collected his wives and his treasures in his palace, and with his own hand setting fire to the building, perished in the flames. This account is given in brief by Abydenus, who probably follows Berosus; and its outline so far agrees with Ctesias (ap. Diod. ii. 29), who assigns an important value to that writer's details of the siege. See Nineveh. In the East, conquest has scarcely ever been followed by amalgamation, and in the primitive empires there was not even his person (Diod. Sicul. ii. 21, 23; comp. Cephalion, in Syn. pl. 167). Under him there were provisional satraps, called in Isa. x. 8, "princes," of the rank and power of ordinary kings (Diod. Sic. ii. 24). The great officers of the household were commonly eunuchs (comp. Gesenius on Isa. xxxvi, 2). The religion of the Assyrians was, in its leading features, the same as that of the Chaldeans, viz. the symbolical worship of the heavenly bodies, especially the planets. In Scripture there is mention of Nisroch (Isa. xxxvi, 36), Atramnaher, Asammel, Nibha, Tartak (2 Kings xvi, 31), as the names of idols worshipped by the natives either of Assyria Proper or of the adjacent countries which they had subdued, besides planets (see Gesenius, Zu Jeannas, ii. 347). The language did not belong to the Semitic, but to the Medo-Persian family. As Aramian, however, was spoken by a large part of the Western population, it was probably understood by the great officers of state, which accounts for Rabshakeh addressing Hezekiah's messengers in Hebrew (2 Kings xvii, 36), although the rabbins explain the circumstance by supposing that he was an apostate Jew (but see Strabo xvi, 745).--Kitto, s. v.

(9.) Its Extent. -- With regard to the extent of the Assyrian empire very exaggerated views have been entertained by many writers. Ctesias took Semiramis to India, and made the empire of Assyria at least co-extensive with that of Persia in his own day. This false notion has long been exploded, but even Niebuhr appears to have believed in the extension of Assyrian influence over Asia Minor, in the expedition of Memnon—whom he considered an Assyrian—to Troy, and in the derivation of the Lydian Heracles from the first dynasty of Ninevite monarchs (Alte Geschicht. i. 28-9). The information derived from the native monuments tends to contract the empire within more reasonable bounds, and to give it only the expansion which is indicated for it in Scripture. On the west, the Mediterranean and the river Halys appear to have been the extreme boundaries, but the do-
A fuller account of the customs and antiquities of Assyria than has heretofore been possible may be found in the recent works of Rich, Botta, and Layard; see also Mannes, Customs, Arts, and Arms of Assyria, restored from the Monuments, by P. H. Their modes of writing and building, the form and size of their temples, the inscriptions, their religion and worship, in a great measure, were drawn from Babylon, which they always regarded as a sacred land—the original seat of their nation, and the true home of all their gods, with the one exception of Assur. Still, as their civilization developed, it became in many respects peculiar. Their art is of home growth. The alabaster quarries in their neighborhood supplied them with a material unknown to their southern neighbors, on which they could represent, far better than upon enamelled bricks, the scenes which interested them. Their artists, faithful and laborious, acquired a considerable power of rendering the human figure and animal forms with a vivid and striking representation of the principal occupations of human life. If they do not greatly affect the ideal, and do not, in this branch, attain to any very exalted rank, yet even here their emblematic figures of the gods have a dignity and grandeur which is worthy of remark, and which implies the possession of some elevated feelings. But their chief glory is in the representation of the actual. Their pictures of war, and of the chase, and even sometimes of the more peaceful incidents of human life, have a fidelity, a spirit, a boldness, and an appearance of life, which place them high among realistic schools. Their art, it should be also noted, is progressive. Unlike that of the Egyptians, which continues comparatively stationary from the earliest to the latest times, it plainly advances, becoming continually more natural and less uncouth, more life-like and less stiff, more varied and less conventional. The latest sculptures, which are those in the burnished bronze, are in every respect the best. Here the animal forms approach perfection, and in the striking attitudes, the new groupings, and the more careful and exact drawing of the whole, we see the beginnings of a taste and a power which might have expanded under favorable circumstances into the finest excellence of the Greeks. The advanced condition of the art is very evident. It is abundantly evidenced alike by the representations on the sculptures and by the remains discovered among their buildings. They are found to have understood and applied the arch; to have made tunnels, aqueducts, and drains; to have used the lever and the roller; to have engraved gems; to have understood the arts of inlaying, enamelling, and overlaying with metals; to have manufactured glass, and been acquainted with the lens; to have possessed vases, jars, bronze and ivory ornaments, dishes, bells, ear-rings, mostly of good workmanship and elegant forms—in a word, to have attained to a very high pitch of material comfort and prosperity. They were well versed in the art of war, and the most important points barbarians. Their government was rude and inartificial; their religion coarse and sensual; their conduct of war cruel; even their art materialistic and so debasing; they had served their purpose when they had prepared the East for centralized government. Ashur and Assur's scourge to punish the people of Israel (Isa. x. 5-6); they were, therefore, swept away to allow the rise of that Arian race which, with less appreciation of art, was to introduce into Western Asia a more spiritual form of religion, a better treatment of captives, and a superior government.—Smith, s. v.

 astrology, science of the stars), a pretended science, which was said to discover future events. As an astrology (according to the old distinction) was of two kinds, natural and judicial. The former predicted certain natural effects which appear to depend upon the influence of the stars, such as winds, rain, storms, etc. But by the latter, it was pretended, could be predicted events which were dependent upon the human will, as particular actions, events, etc. The former was based upon the predestinarian doctrines of Mohammedanism, and was accordingly cultivated with great ardor by the Arabs from the seventh to the thirteenth century. Some of the early Christian fathers argued against the doctrines of astrology; others received them in a modified form. In its public capacity the Roman Church several times condemned the system, but many zealous churchmen cultivated it. Cardinal D'Ailly, "the eagle of the doctors of France" (died 1420), is said to have calculated the horoscope of Jesus Christ, and maintained that the Deluge might have been predicted by astrology. Regiomontanus, the famous mathematician Cardan, even Tycho Brahe and Kepler could not take off the fascination. Kepler saw the weakness of astrology as a science, but could not bring himself to deny a certain connection between the positions (constellations) of the planets and the qualities of those born under them. The Copernican system gave the death-blow to astrology. Belief in astrology is now only-professed in most of the countries, and the great masses of the people believe in it, as the writers no longer believe in them.

Many passages of our old writers are unintelligible without some knowledge of astrological terms. In the technical rules by which human destiny was foreseen, the heavenly houses played a most important part. Astrologers were by no means at one in the way of laying out those houses. A very general way was to draw great circles through the north and south points of the horizon as meridians pass through the poles, dividing the heavens, visible and invisible, into twelve equal parts—six above the horizon, and six below. These twelve parts, or houses, are numbered, starting from the horizon forward, beginning with that which lay in the east immediately below the horizon. The first was called the house of life; the second, of fortune, or riches; the third, of brethren; the fourth, of relations; the fifth, of children; the sixth, of health; the seventh, of marriage; the eighth, of death, or the upper portal; the ninth, of religion; the tenth, of dignities; the eleventh, of friends and benefactors; the twelfth, of enemies, or of captivity. The position of the twelve houses for a given time and place—i.e., the instant of an individual's birth, for instance, was a theme. To construct such a plan was to cast the horoscope.

The houses had different powers, the strongest being the first; as it contained the part of the heavens about to rise, it was called the ascendant, and the point of the ecliptic cut by its upper boundary was the horizon. Each house had one of the heavenly bodies as its lord, who was strongest in his own house. ASTRONOMY

Asia. Pliny, in his celebrated enumeration (Hist. Nat. vii, 57) of the inventors of the arts, sciences, and commerce, names one of them as the astronomer to Phoenician mariners, and in the same chapter he speaks of astronomical observations found on burnt bricks (coccilium latericium) among the Babylonians, which ascend to above 2200 years before his time. Alexander sent to Aristotle from Babylon a series of astronomical observations, extending through 1900 years. The astronomical knowledge of the Chinese and Indians goes up to a still earlier period (Pline, Hist. Nat. vi, 17-21). From the remote East astronomy travelled in a westerly direction. The Egyptians at a very early period had some acquaintance with it. To them is to be ascribed a pretty near simultaneous conception of the daily apparent motion of the heavenly bodies, the year of 365 days (Herodotus, ii, 4). The Egyptians were the teachers of the Greeks. Some portion of the knowledge which prevailed on the subject would no doubt penetrate to and become the inheritance of the Hebrews, who do not, however, appear to have possessed any views of astronomy which raised their knowledge to the rank of a science, or made it approach to a more correct theory of the mechanism of the heavens than that which was generally held. A peculiarity of the greatest importance belongs to the knowledge which the Israelites display of the heavens, namely, that it is thoroughly imbued with a religious character; nor is it possible to find in any other nation an instance among the Gentiles at any period, so much pure and elevated piety, in connection with observations on the starry firmament, as may be gathered even in single books of the Bible (Amos vi, 8; Psalm xix). This was no doubt owing in part to the fact that the practice of astrology was interdicted to the Hebrews (Deut. xxviii, 10). As early as the time of the composition of perhaps the oldest book in the Bible, namely, that of Job, the constellations were distinguished one from another, and designated by peculiar and appropriate names (Job ix, 9; xxxviii, 31). In the Bible are found, (1) Hesper (Acts ii, 37), "the morning star," the planet Venus (Isa. xiv, 12; Rev. ii, 28); (2) Kimah (Job 40, 2), "Lucifer," "Pleiades;" (3) Seba (Arabian), "Orion," a large and brilliant constellation, which stands in a line with the Pleiades, but is never seen. Oriental sources prove that the name given of Orion as a huge giant who had warred against God, and as bound in chains to the firmament of heaven (Job xxxviii, 31); and it has been conjectured that this notion is the foundation of the history of Nimrod (Gesen. Comment. zu Jer. 5, 457). (4) Ash (Zeb), (Job ix, 9), "Arcturus, the Great Bear," which has still the same name among the Arabeans (Nieuwh, p. 118). See Job xxxvii, 32, where the sons of Arcturus are the three stars in the tail of the Bear, which stand in a curved line to the left. (5) Nachash (Job xxvi, 13, "the crooked serpent"), Draco, between the Great and the Little Bear; a constellation which spreads itself in windings across the heavens. (6) Dioscouri, Dioskouros (Acts xxviii, 11, "Castor and Pollux"), Gemini, or the Twins, on the belt of the Zodiac, which is mentioned in 2 Kings xxiii, 5, under the general name of "the planets" (Job xxxvii, Mazz. lokh), a word which signifies dwellings, stations in which the sun tarries in his apparent course through the heavens; and also by the kindred term "Maazarom" (Isa. viii, 20), Job xxxvii, 82. (Compare Gen. xxxvii, 9.) The entire body of the stars was called "the host of heaven" (Isa. xl, 26; Jer. xxxiii, 22). (See each of the words here enumerated in its alphabetical order.) No trace is found in the Old Testament of a catalogue of the heavenly bodies, fixed stars, and comets; but in Juse 13, the phrase "wandering stars" (astzieus πανανευρα) is employed figuratively. After the Babylonish exile, the Jews were compelled, even for the sake of their calendar, to attend at least to the course of the stars. A complete system of astronomy, and delineations were made of the shapes that they assume (Mishna, Rosh HaShah. ii, 8; Mitchell, Astron. of Bible, N. Y. 1863). See YEAR.

At an early period of the world the worship of the stars arose from that contemplation of them which in every part of the globe, and particularly in the East, has been found in every age of the world, and in every country. See ADORATION. "Men by nature" "deemed either fire or wind, or the swift air, or the circle of the stars, or the violent water, or the lights of heaven to be the gods which govern the world;" "with whose beauty being delighted, they took them to be gods" (Wisdom xiii, 2). Accordingly, the religious notions of the Egyptians, of the Chaldaeans, Assyrians, and the ancients in general, was nothing else than star-worship, although in the case of the first its origin is more thickly veiled. The sun, moon, and seven planets (those, that is, of the fixed stars which shine with especial brightness) excited most attention, and won the greatest observance. We thus find, among the Babylonians, Jupiter (Belus, Gad, "7, Isa. lxv, 11), Venus (7777, Meni), Isa. lxv, 11, where the first is rendered in the common version "that troop," the second, "that number)." Both of these were considered good principles, the Heb. words both signifying fortune, i.e. good luck. Mercury, honored as the secretary of heaven, is also found in Isa. xlv, 1, "Nemo (222) stoopeth;" Saturn (7772, Kyiun), "Chinn;" Amos v, 26; Mars (7777), "Ner- gal," 2 Kings xvii, 80); the last two were worshipped as principles of evil. The character of this worship was formed from the notions which were entertained of the good or ill which certain stars occasioned. Astrology found its sphere principally in stars connected with the birth of individuals. Thus Herodotus (ii, 82) states that among the Egyptians every day was under the influence of some god (some star), and that according to the day on which each person was born, so would be the events he would meet with, the character he would bear, and the period of his death. Astrology concerned itself also with the determination of lucky and unlucky days; so in Job iii, 5, "Let the day perish wherein I was born;" and Gal. iv, 10, "Ye observe days, months, and years." The Chaldeans, who studied the stars at a very early period, were much given to astrology, and were celebrated for their skill in that pretended science (Isa. xxvii, 13). ASTROC. JEAN, an eminent French physician, was born at Sauve, in Languedoc, March 19, 1684. His father was a Protestant minister, who, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, became a Roman Catholic. The son studied in the University of Montpellier, and became M.D. in 1703. In 1710 he was made professor of anatomy and medicine in Toulouse. He was called to Montpellier in 1715, where he remained until 1728. In 1731 he was appointed professor of medicine in the College of France, and he remained in Paris until his death, May 5, 1766. In his profession Astruc was very eminent as teacher, practitioner, and writer; but he is best known to a place for a work published in 1758, entitled Conjectures sur les Memoires originaires dont il parait que Moïse s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse (Brussels and Paris, 1758, 12mo), in which he started for the first time the theory now so prevalent, that the fact that Moses compiled Genesis, in part at least, from pre-existing documents, is evidenced by the distinction between the two names Elohim and Jehovah in the different parts of the book. The work is marked by great skill and ASTYGES (Aṣṭyāges, Diodorus 'Aṣṭyaios') was the son and successor of Cyzares (Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.), and the last king of the Medes, B.C. 595-590 or B.C. 592-588, who was conquered by Cyrus (Bel and Dragon 1). The name is identified by Rawlinson and Niebuhr (Gesch. Achaër's, p. 92) with Deioces = Ashshubach (Arm.), After Dahaka (Pers.), the bātūr of the book of Daniel, the emblem of the Avesta as a earth, and the chief of the Medes under Herodotus. According to Herodotus, he married the daughter of Ablyates (i., 74), ascended the throne B.C. 595, and reigned thirty-five years (i., 189), with great severity (i., 123). The same historian states that his daughter was married to Cambyses, a Persian noble, but that, in consequence of a dream, the king caused her child (Cyrus) to be exposed as a herdsman, who, on the contrary, brought him up, till, on attaining manhood, he dethroned his grandfather (i., 107). The account of Ctesias (who calls him Astyages, 'Aṣṭyaios', makes him to have been only the father-in-law of Cyrus, by whom he was conquered and starved to death. This was treated with contempt at the Persian court and treacherously left to perish by a royal enchanter (Ctes. Ap. Phot. cod. 72, p. 36, ed. Bekker). Xenophon, like Herodotus, makes Cyrus the grandson of Astyages, but says that Astyages was succeeded by his son Cyzares II, on whose death Cyrus succeeded to the vacant throne (Cyr. i., 5, 2). This account tallies better with the notices in the Book of Daniel (v., 31; vi., 1, 10; and Josephus (Ant. x., 11, 4), where "Darius (q. v.) the Mede" appears to be the same with this Cyzares (q. v.). In that case Astyages will be identical with the "Ahasuerus" (q. v.) named as the father of Darius. See Cyrus.

Aspō'pim (Heb. 'Aspōpim', 'Aṣpōmim, מיקלאים, 'Aṣpōmim, "re'fuge"): a place of safety, where it is not permitted to offer violence to, or touch any person, even though a criminal.

I. Such a purpose was served (see Mishna, Maocch, iii, 1-3, 17, 18); and comp. Philo, De profugii, in his Opp. i., 546 sqq. for the unpremeditated murderer, in accordance with a special usage, by the altar (in the Tabernacle and Temple, Exod. xxv, 14; Num. v., 5), the horns of which were seized by the refuge. See ALTAR. Under the Law there were instituted, in order to rescue such mislayers from the (doubtless very barbarous) blood-revenge (Num. xxxix, 6 sqq.; Deut. iv, 41 sq.; xix, 8 sqq.; comp. Exod. xxv, 14; Josephus, Ant. iv, 7, 4, six free cities (בֹּקֶר): "seven, six". See pœlias φυλαγία, "seven places of sanctuary," Vulg. urbes fugitio- rum, Auth. Ver. "seven, six"; seven places, in different parts of the country, and were some of them sacred, others Levitical cities, namely, east of the Jordan, Bezer, Ramoth-Gilead, and Golan; west of the Jordan, Kedesh, Shechem, and (Hebron) Kirjath-Arba (Josh. xx, 7, 8). Here the fugitive, after having undergone a strict investigation to prove that he had not committed the slaughter intentionally, was obliged to remain until the death of the then incumbent of the high-priesthood (comp. the similar exile according to the Athenian statutes, Hetter. Athen. (Geschw. p. 156); if he quit the city earlier, the blood-sweeper might kill him with impunity (Num. xxxvi, 6 sqq.). The privilege extends to the cities of refuge, ii, 2, to be kept in good order (Deut. xix, 8; for other particulars, see Maocch, ii, 5; Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 66; on the boundaries of these cities, see the Mishna, Moasaer. iii, 10). Witful murderers (Num. xxxvi, 12; comp. Mishna, Maocch, ii, 6) were to be put to death, after a legal inquisition, even if they had escaped to a city of refuge (Num. xxxvi, 6 sqq.), which is interpreted by Michaelis (Targ. 494 sqq.; Moel. Disputat. test. p. 105 sqq.; Wichmannhausen, De Præsidialia Levitac. urb. (Vit. 1715); Reis, De urbibus refugii V. T. cornuque fructu (Marburg, 1735); Osland, De eanfia Hebr. ( Tubingen, 1673, also in Ugoilini Lexicon. xxxii). The reason for assigning the Levitical cities for this purpose was probably in part from their connection with the sacredness of Jehovah, and partly because the Levites, as guardians of the Law, were present to decide concerning the murder as to whether it was intentional or not (see Carpzov, Appar. p. 540). It is not easy to explain the connection of the expiration of the blood-revenge (D. 19, 5) with the high-priest of the tabernacle. The thing that was regarded as beginning a fresh era (Tabula nova). Bähr (Symbol. ii, 52), following Maimonides (More Nechohim), advances the not improbable supposition that the high-priest was so eminently the head of the theocracy, and representative of the whole nation, that upon his demise every other death should be forgotten, or, at least, mortal eminities buried (for allegorical significations, see Philo, De profugii, i, 466). See Blood-vengeance.

II. Grecoean and Roman antiquity likewise affords mention of the right of asylum (Serv. ad Æs. viii, 441), not only at altars and temples, and sacred places (Herod. ii, 118; Eurip. Hec. 149; Pausan. iii, 6, 5, 6; Dio Cass. xlv, 14; Strabo, v, 293; Tacit. Annal. iii, 60, 1; Flor. ii, 12), but also in cities and their vicinity (Polyb. v, 14, 4; comp. Potte, Greek Ant. i, 48; see Cramer, De ara extem. templi sec. p. 16 sqq.; Dougal. Annal. i, 102 sqq.), for insolvent debtors (Plutarch. De ostiando aed. 3). Slaves who had fled from the severity of their masters (comp. Philo, Opp. ii, 468), also for murderers. An especially famous city of exemption was Daphne, near Antioch (2 Macc. iv, 33), also as the temple of Diana at Ephesus (Strabo, xiv, 641; Apollon. Ephes. Ep. 60). But as the abuse of the privilege was often intentional, for the purpose of avoiding the civil jurisdiction, it was circumscribed by Tiberius throughout the Roman empire (Suet. Tib. 87; comp. Ernesti Exco. in loc.). On the immunities referred to in Acts xvi, 12, see COLONY. (On cities of refuge in Abyssinia, see Ruppell. ii, 71.)—Winer, i, 379. See CITY OF REFUGE.

III. The privilege of asylum was retained in the Christian Church, probably in imitation of the cities of refuge, under the old dispensation. All criminals who fled to such asylum were held to be safe, and any person violating an asylum was punished with excommunication. All Christian churches, in the early ages, protected the privilege of asylum, with the right of asylum. It was introduced by Constantine, and first regulated by law under the emperors Theodosius the Great, Arcadius, Honorius, Theodosius, and Justinian. The multiplication of these privileged places soon became exceedingly inconvenient, and it was found necessary to circumscribe the privilege in different ways. The abstract right of asylum by various limitations. Bishops and councils became jealous of the interference of the civil power in this matter: they contended strongly for the right of sanctuary, and continued to uphold it to an injurious and demoralizing extent. The privilege was extended by the councils of Orange, A.D. 411; of Orleans, 411; of Arles, 541; of Macon, 566; of Rheims, 630; of Toledo, 681. It was recognised and confirmed by Charlemagne and his successors. The practice long prevailed in popish countries; but the evils at length became so enormous, that even popes and councils were obliged to set limits to the privilege. The custom has now become extinct, or has been greatly reformed.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. viii, ch. xi.

IV. Laws of King Alfred recognised the right of asylum in England. It was not till the year 1867, in the reign of Henry VII, that by a bull of Pope Innocent VIII it was declared that thieves, robbers, and murderers, having taken refuge in sanctuaries, should sally out and commit fresh offences, and then return to their place of shelter, they might be taken out by the king's officers. It was only by an act of Parliament, passed in 1584, after the Reformation, that persons accused of treason were denied the advantage of sanctuary. After the complete establishment of the Reformation, however, in the reign of Elizabeth, neither the churches nor sanctuaries of any other description were allowed to become places of refuge for either murderers or other criminals. But various buildings and precincts in and near London continued for a long time to afford shelter to the poor and destitute. At length, in 1697, all such sanctuaries, or pretended sanctuaries, were finally suppressed by the act 8 and 9 William III, chap. 26.—Fenner Cyclop. s. v.

Atargatis is the name of a Greek goddess, as stated above, for which see the references given at length; Mohrens, Phöniz. i, 584 sq. Atargatis is a name under which some worships which possessed some modification of the same power which was adored under that of Astarte (q. v.). That the 'Atrygría of 2 Macc. xii, 25, was at Ashtaroth-Karnaim, shows also an immediate connection with Astarte (q. v.). Whether, like the latter, she was a local or a universal goddess, or to the planet Venus, is not evident. Macrobius (Sat. 1, 28, p. 822, Bip. ed.) makes Atargatae to be the earth (which, as a symbol, is analogous to the moon), and says that her image was distinguished from that of the sun by the direction of the rays around it (but see Swinburne, i, 641. ibid. 1601. Syme, i, 645 sq.). Creuzer maintained that these representations of this goddess which contain parts of a fish are the most ancient, and endeavors to reconcile Strabo's statement that the Syrian goddess of Hierapolis was Astartes, with Lucian's express notice that the former was represented under the form of an entire woman, by drawing between the forms of different periods (Syme, ii, 68). This fish form shows that Astartes bears some relation, perhaps that of a female counterpart, to Dagon (q. v.), and it is an antitique coin extant representing this goddess (Swinton, in the Philo-soph. Transactions, LXI, ii, 384 sq.).
No satisfactory etymology of the word has been discovered. That which assumes that Atergatis is נָּטַֹרְגָּטָּה concentr'd' dag, is a magnificent fish, which has often been adopted from the Selden down to the present day, cannot be taken exactly in that sense. The syntax of the language requires, as Michaelis has already objected to this etymology (Orient. Biblioth. vi, 97), that an adjectival place before its subject in this manner must be the predicate of a proposition. The word fish, therefore, would mean "the fish is magnificent."
(Ewald's Heb. Gram. 28), and he assumes that the Syriac name of some idol of Haro-was נָּטַֹרְגָּטָּה, which might mean aperture (see Asemma-ni, Bibl. Or. i, 327 sq.), asserts that the Syriac form of Derceto, and brings it into connection with the great farrūs in the earth mentioned in Lucian (ut sup. xxiii) which swallowed up the waters of the Flood (see his edition of Castell's Lex. Syr. p. 973). On the other hand, Gesenius (Theaur. sub voce פַּרְתֹּס) prefers considering Derceto to be the Syriac פַּרְתֹּס פְּרִית, and it is certain that such an intrusion of the Frit is not uncommon in the Aramaic. (For other etyomological derivations, see Alhacen, Desc. de terra Chas-rack, c. 6.) It has been supposed that Atergatis was the tutelary goddess of the first Assyrian dynasty (Dercetades, fr. Derceto; Nebhur, Gesch. Assyris. p. 131, 188), and that the name appears in Tiglath- or Tilgath-Pileser (ibid. p. 97).

A'taroth (Heb. A'tarōth, תְּדִירְתָּה, crowns; Sept. Ἀρατός), the name of several places in Palestine.

1. A city east of Jordan, not far from Gilead, and in the vicinity of Dibon, Jazer, and Aroer, in a fertile grazing district (Num. xxxii, 3), rebuilt by the Gadi-ites (ver. 34), although it must have lain within the tribe of Reuben, probably on the slope of the hill still retaining the name Mura (Burckhardt, ii, 630), where there is a river having the same name (van De Veldt.
Map, p. 290).

2. A city on the border of Ephraim and Benjamin, between Jonabah and Naarath, toward Jericho (Jos. xxvi, 7), and also between Archi and Japhleti (ver. 2).
Professor Robinson discovered a place by the name of Atera, perhaps identical with this, now a large village on the summit of a hill, about six miles N. by W. of Bethel (Researches, iii, 80). The ruins of another place by the same name, nearer Jerusalem to the north, have also been noticed (ibid. iii, Appendix, p.
122), situated at both ends of a defile, leading into the Wady Atera, which extends a distance of 2000 yards, about half way between Beeroth and Mirzap (De Saul-cy, i, 106, ii, 257). This locality agrees better with the Ateroth of Ephraim, than the one mentioned by Schwarz (Palast. p. 146). The Ateroth (ArarotS of Esenhal-(Onomast. s. v.) lay four miles north of Samaria. This Ateroth is also called "Ateroth-Addar" or "Aterroth-Adan" (Heb. A'troth Addar, אֶתְרֹת-ךְּבַרְגָּתָּה, crowns of Addar [greatness]; Sept. Ἀρατός Ἀδάρ and 'Addar') in Jos. xvi, 5; xviii, 18, where, as well as above, it is located between Bethed and Beth-horon (see Schwa-

3. "Ateroth [of] the house of Joab" (Heb. A'troth B'yth-ł̄h, בְּיִתֶּל, crowns of the house of Joab; Sept. Ἀρατός οἴκου Ἰωάβ χωρίς τόπος, a city (nominally) in the tribe of Judah, founded by the descendants of Salma (1 Chron. ii, 54). Schwarz (Palast. p. 148) identifies it with Latrum (for el-Atron) on the road from Jerusalem to Jaffa, west of Saris, which (although slightly beyond the ancient bounds of Judah) appears plausible, as the well Ayub in the immediate vicinity may be a relic of the epithet here applied distinctively to this place.

4. Ateroth-Shophan (Heb. A'troth Sho'phān, מַשְׁפָּן, crowns of Shophan [hidings]; Sept. merely Ἰωάβ), another city (nominally) of the tribe of Gad, mentioned in connection with No. 1 (Num. xxxii, 35).
The English version overlooks the distinction evidently intended by the suffixed word, translating "Ateroth, Shophan," as if two places were thus denoted. The associated names would appear to indicate a locality not far from the border between Gad and Reuben (probably, however, within the latter), perhaps at the head of Wady Esbeh, near Marij-akhkha (Robinson's Map), as the place was famous for pasturage.

Atbakh (בָּהַךְ, "a hundred.

A'tbakh (בָּהַךְ, אָבָּה, every pair making ten.

A thousand. Thus:

Three letters only cannot enter into any of these numerical combinations, י, ת, and י. The first two are nevertheless coupled together; and the last is suffered to stand without commutation. The commutation then takes place between the two letters of every pair; and the term Atbakh thus expresses that N is taken for ם and ת for י, and conversely. To illustrate its aplication, the obscure word יִתְמְמָה, in Prov. xxiv, 21, may be turned by Atbakh into יִתְמָמָה, testimony (Bux-wort, De abbreviatura, s. v.).

Atthash (אַתְּתָשָׁה, is a similar term for a somewhat different principle of commutation. In this, namely, the letters are mutually interchanged by pairs; but every pair consists of a letter from each end of the alphabet, in regular succession. Thus, as the technical term Atbakh shows, N and ת, and ב and י, are interchangeable; and so on throughout the whole series. By writing the Hebrew alphabet twice in two parallel lines, but the second time in an inverse order, the two letters which form every pair will come to stand in a perpendicular line. This system is also remarkable on account of Jerome having so confidently applied it to the word Shekhah, in Jer. xxv, 26. He then propounds the same system of commutation as that called Atbakh (without giving it that name however, and without adding any higher authority for assimulating the commutation) in that place, that it was customary to learn the Greek alphabet first straight through, and then, by way of insuring accurate retention, to repeat it by taking a letter from each end alternately, and makes יִתְמָמָה to be the same as ירָשָׁה. (See Rosenmüller's Scholia, ad loc.)

possessed an entire Pentateuch explained on the

There is also another system of less note, called Albam (אֲלָבָם), which is only a modification of the preceding; for in it the alphabet is divided into halves, and one portion placed after the other in that original order, and the pairs are formed out of those letters which would then stand in a row together. —Kitto, s. v.

All these methods belong to the branch of the Cab-ala (q. v.) which is called רָבָּה, commutation.
ATER (Heb. Ater), "shut up; Sept. 'Arrōp v. r." in Ezra ii. 42; "Arrip", the name of three men.

1. A descendant (7) of one Hezekiah (q. v.), whose family, to the number of 98, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21). B.C. ante 536.

2. The head of a family of Levitical "porters" to the Temple, that returned at the same time with the above (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). B.C. 536.

3. One of the chief Israelites that subscribed the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 17). B.C.
cir. 410.

v. 15) for the phrase "Áter (q. v.) of Hezekiah" (Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21). See HEBREW.

Ása'ch (Heb. ‘Atas̱k), "lodge; Sept. 'Ašāx v.
'Naḥūs", one of the cities of Judah (i. e. Simon) to which David sent a present of the spoils recovered from the Amalekites who had sacked Ziklag (1 Sam. xxxi. 30). According to Schwartz (Polest, p. 118), it is marked by the modern valley Athuco, north of Jebel Madura, on the edge of the Idumean deserts; given on Zimmern's map as Wady Anibari, S. of Hebron. open to the South and to the ruins (with water) marked as Abū Turūfsh on Van de Velde's Map. Others regard the name as an error of transcription for Ether (Josh. xv. 42).

Athyah (Heb. Athayahk, "Αθηαθὰς, the same as Asahel; Sept. 'Aṣaḥîn), a son of Uziah of the tribe of Judah, who returned to Babylon from Jerusalem (Neh. vi. 4). B.C. 536. See UTHAL.

Athyah (Heb. Athayal'ahk, "Αθηαθάλας, 2 Kings xi.

Kings xi. 20, xi. 22, 2 Chron. xxii. 2, 24, xi. 12, 13, 21; xxiv. 7; affected by Jochabed), the name of two men and one woman.

1. (Sept. Ḍechāla, and so Josephus, Ant. ix.
7, 1.)
The daughter of Abah, king of Israel, doubtful by his idolatrous wife Jezebel. She is also called the daughter of Omri (2 Chron. xxii. 2), who was the father of Abah; but by a comparison of texts it would appear that she is so called only as being his granddaughter.
Athyah became the wife of Jehoram, the son of Je-hoashphat, king of Judah. This marriage may fairly be considered the act of the parents; and it is one of the few stains upon the character of the good Jehoashphat that he was so ready, if not too ready, to connect himself with the idolatrous house of Abah. Had he not married the heir of his crown to Athalah, many evils and much bloodshed might have been spared to the royal family and to the kingdom. When Jehoram came to the throne, he, as might be expected, "walked in the ways of the house of Abah," which the sacred writers obviously attributes to this marriage by adding, "for he had the daughter of Abah to wife." (2 Chron. xxii.
6.) Jehoram died (B.C. 864) of wounds received in a war with the Syrians into which his wife's counsel had led him, and was succeeded by his youngest son Atha-iah, who reigned but one year, and was slain by those who arose of the house of David at whatever cost (B.C. 888), availing herself probably of her position as king's mother [see AHA] to carry out her design. Most likely she exercised the regal functions during Athahiah's absence at Jezreel (2 Kings ix.), and resolved to retain her power, especially after seeing the danger to which her son's accession had given rise to the throne of Omri, and of Baal-worship in Samaria.
It was not unusual in those days for women in the East to attain a prominent position, their present degradation being the result of Mahommedanism. Miriam, Deborah, Abigail, are instances from the Bible, and Dido was not far removed from Athaliah, either in birthplace or date, if Carthage was founded B.C.
561 (Josephus, c. Ap. i. 18). In order to remove all rivals, Athaliah caused all the male branches of the royal family to be massacred (2 Kings xi., 1; ) and by thus shielding the blood of her own grandchildren, she undeniably became the instrument of giving compliance to the doom on her father's house, which Jehu had previously accomplished. From the daughter of the royal house one infant named Joash, the youngest son of Ahaziah, was rescued by his aunt Jehosheba, doughter of Jehoram (probably by another wife than Athaliah), who had married Jehoash (2 Chron. xxii.
11), the high-priest (2 Chron. xxiv. 6). The child, under Jehoash's care, was concealed within the walls of the Temple, and there they brought up so secretly that his existence was unsuspected by Athaliah. But in the seventh year (B.C. 877) of her bloodstained and evil reign, Jehoash thought it time to produce the lawful king to the people, trusting to their zeal for the worship of God, and loyalty to the house of David which had been so long connivingly concealed by Athaliah and Jehoshapath. After communicating his design to five "captains of hundreds," whose names are given in 2 Chron. xxiii., 1, and securing the co-operation of the Levites and chief men in the country-towns in case of necessity, he brought the young Joash into the Temple to receive the allegiance of the soldiers of the guards, which was customary on the Sabbath for a third part of them doing duty at the palace, while the two thirds restrained the crowd of visitors and worshippers who thronged the Temple on that day, by occupying the gate of Sur (שָׁם, 1 Kings xi. 6, called of the foundation, "יִשְׁמַע") 2 Chron. xxiii. 5, which Gerlach, in loco, considers the right reading in Kings also), and the gate "behind the guard" (Vulg. porta quae est post portas eorum de-ctorum), which seem to have been the N. and S. entrances into the Temple, according to Ewald's description of it (Geschichte, iii. 866-7). On the day fixed for the outbreak there was to be no change in the arrangement at the palace, lest Athaliah, who did not worship in the Temple, should form any suspicions from missing him long a guaranty, but that the latter third were to protect the king's person by forming a long and closely-serried line across the Temple, and killing any one who should approach within certain limits. They were also furnished with David's spears and shields, that the work of restoring his descendant might be associated in the eyes of the sacred worshippers with the sword that had taken up their position, the young prince was anointed, crowned, and presented with the Testimony or Law, and Athaliah was first roused to a sense of her danger by the shouts and music which accompanied the inauguration of her grandson. She hurried into the Temple, but found Joash already standing "by a pillar," or more properly on it, i. e. on the tribunal or throne apparently raised on a massive column or cluster of columns, which the king occupied when he attended the service on solemn occasions. The phrase in the original is רַכְבָּה-רֹאשׁ, rendered ici τον στέφανον by the Sept., and super tribunal in the Vulgate, while Gesenius gives for the substantia a stego or Τούπια. (Comp. 2 Kings xii. 5, and Ezek. xlv. 2.) She arrived, however, only to behold the as-standing as a crowned king by the pillar of inauguration, and acknowledged as sovereign by the acclaimations of the assembled multitude. Her cries of "Treason!" failed to excite any movement in her favor, and Jehoash, the high-priest, who had organized this bold and successful attempt, was without a pause, ordered the Levitical guards to remove her from the sacred precincts to instant death (2 Kings xi.; 2 Chron. xxvi.
6; xxii. 10-12; xxiii. iii.) The Ty-testing against the judgment. Athanasius went at once to the emperor, and laid his complaint before him, upon which, in 336, Constantine called the leaders of the opposing party before him, who, seeing that some new charge must be trumped up to support their conduct, declared that Athanasius had threatened that he would prevent the yearly export of corn from Alexandria to Tresves. In the year 337, Constantine gave the emperor a commission to send him to Tresves. At the expiration of a year and six months, i.e. in January, Constantine the Great being dead, Athanasius was restored to his see. In 340 Constantine the younger, who was the friend of Athanasius, was killed; and in 341 Athanasius was again deposed in a synod held at Antioch, and Gregory of Cappadoxia was set up in his stead. In 343 Athanasius betook himself to Rome, where Pope Julius declared his innocence in a synod held in 342. At Rome or in the West he remained till the Synod of Sardica, in 347, had pronounced his acquittal of all the charges brought against him; after which the emperor Constantine, at the anxiety of his brother Constans, recalled him to his see (A.D. 349). In the next year Constans was slain by Magnentius in Gaul, and in him Athanasius lost his protector. Constantius, now sole emperor, soon gathered the Arians around him, and the court determined to ruin Athanasius. New accusations were trumped up, and he was convicted of heresy at Milan in 355, and was a third time obliged to flee into the deserts of Thesbaia. His enemies pursued him even here, and set a price upon his head. In this situation Athanasius composed his most important writings to strengthen the faith of believers, and expose the falsehood of his enemies. He returned with the other bishops whom Julian the Apostate recalled from banishment, and in A.D. 362 held a council at Alexandria, where the belief of a consubstantial Trinity was openly professed. Julian soon became alarmed at the energy with which Athanasius opposed paganism, and banished him, even (according to Theodoret) threatening him with death. He escaped to the desert (A.D. 362). The accession of Jovian brought him back in 363; but Jovian died in 364, and Valens, being an Arian, compelled him to retire from his see (A.D. 367). He hid himself in his father's tomb at the gates of Alexandria for four months. At last Valens was slain (August 367), and Martin (who had been澜 from Arianism) who took arms in favor of Athanasius) recalled the heroic bishop, and he was permitted to sit down in quiet and govern his Arian church. He died in 373, perhaps the greatest man in the early church. With the most daring courage and perseverance of purpose, he combined a discreet flexibility, which allowed him after defeats to wait for new contingencies, and prepare himself for fresh exertions. He was no less calm and considerate than determined; and while he shunned useless danger (see his 'Apology for his Flight'), he never admitted the slightest compromise of his doctrine, nor attempted to conciliate by concession even his imperial adversaries. 'In his life and conduct,' says Gregory of Nazianzus, 'he exhibited the model of ecumenical government—in his doctrine, the rule of orthodoxy, in his character, the undying example of which he resisted the will of successive emperors for forty-six years of alternate dignity and misfortune introduced a new feature into the history of Rome. An obstacle was at once raised against imperial tyranny: a limit was discovered which it could not pass over. Here was a refractory subject who could not be disposed of by reason or persuasion but who, if desired by a sovereign, by the exercise of arbitrary power; the weight of spiritual influence, in the skilful hand of Athanasius, was beginning to balance and mitigate the arts of which Con resort, in order to gain a verdict from the councils of Aries and Milan, proved that his absolute power had already ceased to exist. Athanasius did not, indeed, like the Gregories, establish a system of ecclesiastical policy and power that belonged to later ages and to another climate—but he exerted more extensive personal influence over his own age, for the advancement of the church, than any individual in any age, except perhaps Bernard. In all his writings, says Photius, he is clear in expression, concise, and simple; acute, profound, and instructive, in his disputations, with wonderful fertility of invention; and in his method of reasoning he treats no subject with baldness or puerility, but all philosophically and magnificently."

Gregory of Nazianzus has an oration on Athanasius, from which the following passage is given by Cave (Long of the Fathers, vol. ii.): "He was one that so governed himself that his life supplied the place of sermons, and his sermons prevented his corrections; much less need had he to cut or lance where he did but once shake his rod. In him all ranks and orders might find something to admire, something particular for their imitation: one might commend his unwearied constancy in fasting and prayer; another, his courage and indomitable soul in speaking the truth; a third, his admirable care and protection of the poor; a fourth, his resolute opposition to the proud, or his descendence to the humble. The virgins may celebrate him as their bridesman, the married as their governor, the hermits as their monitor, the cenobites as their lawgiver.

He, in the midst of this great multitude, is a divine, the merry as a bridle, the miserable as a comforter, the aged as a staff, the youth as a tutor, the poor as a benefactor, and the rich as a steward. He was a patron to the widows, a father to orphans, a friend to the poor, a harbor to strangers, a brother to burthened, a succor to the sick, and to the helpless, one who 'became all things to all men, that, if not all, he might at least gain the more.'

With respect to his predecessors in that see, he equalled some, came near others, and exceeded others; in some he imitated their discourses, in others their actions; the meekness of some, the zeal of others, the patience and constancy of the rest; borrowing many perfections from some, and all from others; and so making up a complete representation of virtue, like skillful limners, who, to make the piece absolute, do first from several persons draw the several perfections of beauty within the idea of their own minds; so he, insomuch that he absorbed all the eloquence of his discourses outwent those who were most versed in practice; or, if you will, in his discourses he excelled the eloquent, and in his practice those who were most used to business; and for those that had made but an ordinary advance in either, he was far superior to them, as being eminent but in one kind; and for those who were masters in the other, he outdid them in that he excelled in both."

The aptitude of his remarkable intellect for grappling with the deepest problems is shown in all his writings, even in the earliest (Δημοκράτης Ἀθανασίου, Oratio against the Greeks), an apologetic work to prove that the doctrine of the Logos belonged to later ages and to evinces his culture in Greek learning, as well as rare metaphysical acuteness, written as it was before the author was twenty-five (A.D. 318)? The treatise De Incarnatione verbi appeared about the same time, and, indeed, is cited by Jerome as the same work. It treats of the persons of the God, eternal, and Christology. His other most important writings are Epistola de decreto Nicene Synodi contra Arias; Epist. de sententia Dionysii; Oratio contra Ariamnes; Epistola ad Serapionem; Epistola ad Episcopum; Epist. ad Aelaphum; Contro Apollinaris. Besides these are Apologia de Fuga sua (to justify his flight from persecution); Epistola ad Monachos, written by request of certain monks, to give an account of his sufferings and of the Arian heresy. The first, or dogmatical part, is lost. The following passage from this book manifests the modest humility of a grand intellect. Speaking of his attempts to explain the doctrine of the Logos to the heathen, he says: 'I have been told that to the subject, the more incomprehensible it appears to me; and I should abandon it entirely were it not for your importunity and the blasphemy of your opponents. I therefore think it proper to say something on the subject; for, though it be impossible to comprehend the head who is to possess it, I am not to tell him what he is not. In like manner, though it is impossible to explain the nature of the Logos, yet it is easy to condemn and refute what his adversaries have said against him.' After having made this apology, he begs them to return the letter after they had read it, without either copying or permitting it to be copied, as it was at least as bad an inadequate defence of that great truth, and was too inconsiderable to deserve being transmitted to posterity. In this epistle his views on persecution contrast nobly with those of Augustine's later years. "Nothing," he observes, "more forcibly marks the weakness of a bad cause. Satan, who has no truth to propose to men, combines the axe and sword to make it suitable to his purposes. The mote of an eye by Christ to persuade men to receive his beneficent religion is widely different, for he teaches the truth, and says, If any man will come after me, and be my disciple, etc. When he comes to the heart he uses no violence, but says, Open to me, my sister, my spouse; if we open to him, he comes in; if we shut to him, he goes out. For the truth is not preached with swords and spears, nor by the authority of soldiers, but by counsel and persuasion. But of what use can persuasion be where the imperial terror reigns? And what place is there for counsel where resistance to the imperial authority is met with torture? Must we then deny our religion? It is the property of the true religion to have no recourse to force, but to persuasion. But the state makes use of compulsion in matters of religion, and what is the consequence? Why, the church is filled with hypocrisy and impiety, and the faithful servants of Christ are obliged to hide themselves in caves and holes of the earth, or to wander about in the deserts."

The Orationes contra Ariamnes, four in number, were written, it is supposed, during the stay of Athanasius in Egypt. In the first discourse he answers the objections which the Arians brought against what is now commonly termed the Eternal Sonship of Christ. In the second he replies to the arguments on which most of the learned are most desirous to die. It is the property of the true religion to have no recourse to force, but to persuasion. But the state makes use of compulsion in matters of religion, and what is the consequence? Why, the church is filled with hypocrisy and impiety, and the faithful servants of Christ are obliged to hide themselves in caves and holes of the earth, or to wander about in the deserts.

only in rank, but not in nature. "If," say they, "the Holy Spirit be neither an angel nor created being, if he proceed from the Father, he is his Son, and the Logos and he are brothers: if so, how can the Logos be called the only son of God? If they be equal, why is he called the Holy Ghost, and not Son? And if it be not, why is it that he is not also said to have been begotten by the Father? To show them the futility of such objections, which suppose that, in speaking of God and his son Jesus, we must be governed by the ideas of natural generation, Athanasius seeks in his turn, "Who, then, is the Father and Son? Do we speak of the Son, who is the grandchild, seeing, among men, father implies father antecedent, and son implies son consequent, and so on ad infinitum? Son among men is only a portion of his father; but in God, the Son is the entire image of the Father, and always Son, as the Father is always Father; nor can the Father be the Son, nor the Son the Father. We cannot, therefore, speak of God as having brother or ancestor of any kind, seeing the Scriptures speak of no such thing; nor do they ever give the Holy Spirit the name of Son, but only that of the Spirit of the Father and the Spirit of the Son. The Holy Trinity has one and the same godhead or essence, which is one God, and not three, the idea of creature to it; human reason can penetrate no further; the cherubim cover the rest with their wings." In the second letter Athanasius combats those who place the Son in the rank of created beings, and advances the proofs of his divinity. The third letter shows that what the Scriptures say of the Son as to his divine nature, they say the same also of the Holy Spirit; and that the proofs which establish the divinity of the one, establish also the divinity of the other. In the fourth letter he shows how the Holy Spirit cannot be termed Son, and insists on the necessity of saying nothing of God but what he has revealed concerning him; and declares that we should judge of the divine nature by what we see in men; and that the mystery of the Trinity cannot be fathomed by human wisdom. As Serapion had asked his opinion concerning that text, Ilia who blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost hath no forgiveness, neither in this world nor in that which is to come, he employs the conclusion of this letter in discussing this point. Origin and Theognostus, he observes, asserted that the sin against the Holy Ghost was opistasy after baptism. This Athanasius denies, because the words were addressed to the Pharisees, who had not been baptized, and yet are charged with having committed this sin; he then asserts that all those who committed the miracles which they wrought, and attributed them to the power of Beelzebub, thereby denying his divinity, that this alone constitutes the sin against the Holy Ghost. Those, says he, who consider only the human acts of Christ, and suppose him, therefore, to be a man only, are in some sort excusable. Those also who, seeing his miracles, doubted whether he was a man, could scarcely be deemed culpable; but those who, seeing his miracles and divine actions, obstinately attributed them to the power of the devil, as the Pharisees did, committed a crime so enormous that there is reason to fear such a sin is unpardonable, and therefore, is the sin against the Holy Ghost of which Christ speaks when he is treated against Apollinaris and the Episcope to Epistetae treat with unrivalled skill and acumen of the true doctrine of the humanity of Christ.

The Athanasian Creed, so called, is not the work of Athanasius. See CRED, ATHANASIAN. For the doctrine of the Trinity, see SHED, History of Christian Doctrine, bk. iii., ch. iii.; bk. v., ch. vi.; Smith's Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 87-105.; Neander, History of Dogma, ii. 290 sq. Bishop Kaye's Account of the Council of Nicea (Lond. 1853, 8vo) gives a history of the Arian heresy from its rise to the death of Athanasius, and also a digest of the Four Orations against the Arians. See also the articles ARIANISM; TRINITY.

Athanasius brought against the Arian and other heresies three classes of arguments: (1) from the authority of preceding writers and the general sense of the church; (2) from scripture and the Church's experience and practice; (3) by scriptural and exegetical proofs. In each of these fields he showed entire mastery of the material. But the great merit of his position was his assertion of the supreme authority of Scripture as against the assertions or presuppositions of reason. The Arians, Sabellians, Rationalists, and Unitarians all maintained that the mind of man is not, and cannot be, the measure of the universe, still less of God, the creator of the universe. Neander sums up his share in the Arian controversy as follows: "When the Arians maintained that the Son of God was only distinguished from other created beings by the fact that God created him first of all, and then all other beings by him; Athanasius, on the contrary, said, it is a narrow-minded representation that God must require an instrument for creation; it looks as if the Son of God came into existence only for our sakes; and by such a representation religion is degraded to the level of the idea of creature to God, not as participating immediately in the divine essence, but as requiring an intermediate agency for himself. What, then, could that agency be between him and God? Grant that such existed, then that would be the Son of God in a proper sense; nothing else, indeed, than the divine essence communicating itself. If we do not stand in connection with God through the Son of God as thus conceived of, we have no true communion with him, but something stands between us and God, and we are, therefore, not the children of God in a proper sense. For, in reference to our original relation, we are only creatures of God, and he is the only judge of our actions. As before, so now is he our Father as we are placed in communion with the Father through Christ, who is the Son of God by a communication of the divine essence: without this doctrine it could not be said that we are partakers of the divine nature (Orat. contr. Arian. 1, 16).--" reference to God we can speak only of unity or diversity. It belongs to the idea of creation that some-thng is created out of nothing, ἀπ' ἐξωτίας, by the will of God; to the idea of the Son of God belongs derivation from the essence of God. See the Semi-Arians in general, as well as to the Arians, that the Son of God was asserted to maintain his existence not by a direct act of the Father’s will, and both parties urged against the Nicene the dilemma that either God brought the Son into being by his own will, or that Son himself assumed the necessity of Athanasius emphatically maintained the doctrine they impugned. If the will of God be supposed to be the origin of the Son’s existence, then the Son of God belongs to the class of creatures. The existence of the divine Logos precedes all particular acts of the divine will, which are all effectuated only by the Logos, who himself is the living divine will. Our opponents think only of the contrast between will and compulsion; they ignore what is higher, namely, the idea of that which is founded in the divine essence. We cannot say God is good and merciful first of all, by a special act of his will, but all the acts of the divine will presuppose the being of God. The same holds of the goodness of God and the acts of God’s will.”—Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, i, Athanassiis must be classed among the greatest of Christian theologians. Yet in some points he was “weak like other men,” and the ascetic and monastic spirit received a strong impetus from his writings, and especially from his Life of St. Anthony (q. v.). And some other of his writings were doubtless interlaraated by later writers in the interest of Romish corruptions, yet enough remains to show that he shared in some of the Gnostic errors, especially with regard to religious virginity and celibacy. Thus, in his oration Against the Greeks, the following passage occurs:

“The Son of God,” says Athanassiis (i, 698), “made man for us, and having abolished death, and having liberated our race from the servitude of corruption, hath, besides other gifts, granted to us to have upon earth an image of the sanctity of angels, namely, virginity. The maidens possessing this (sanctity), and whom the church catholic is wont to call the brides of Christ, are admired, even by the gentiles, as being the temple of the Logos. Nowhere, truly, except among us Christians, is this holy and heavenly profession fully borne out or perfected; so that we may appeal to this very document as a complete proof of the fact that true religion is to be found.” And thus, in the undoubted tract of the same father on the Incarnation, we meet the very same prominent doctrine spoken of as a characteristic of the Christian system, and even including the Gnostic phrase applied to virginity, that it was an excellence obeying a rule above law.”

Who is there but our Lord and Saviour Christ that has deemed this virtue (of virginity) to be utterly impracticable (or unattainable) among men, and yet he has so shown his divine power as to impel youths, as yet under age, to profess it, a virtue beyond law?” (i, 106). (Taylor, Ancient Christianity, i, 222; see also Taylor’s remarks on Athanassiis’s Life of Anthony, p.
260.)

The most complete edition of the works of Athansiis is that of the Benedictines (Athanassiis Opera omnia quae extant, vel quae eis nominem circumfuerant, etc.
Padua, 1777, 4 vols. fol.). Very convenient for ordiinary students is Athanassiis opera dogmatica selecta, ed.
Thudichum (Oxf. 1796, 2 vols. 8vo), which contains the four really important writings of Athanassiis. The Four Oriations against the Arians were translated by S. Parker (Oxf. 1713, 2 vols. 8vo). We have also in English, Select Treatises in Controversy with the Arians, in the “Library of the Fathers,” vols. vii, xix (Oxf. 1843– 45). The “Festal Letters” of Athanassiis were long lost, but were edited in 1848 by Mr. Cureton, from a newly found Syriac MS., and translated into German under the title Die Fest-Briefe des Heiligen Athanassiis, aus dem Syrischen übersetzet und durch Anmerkungen erläutert von F. Larrow (Leipzig, 1852, pp. 150); also into English by Burgess (Oxf. 1850, pp. 190). See Journal of Soc. Lit. Jan. 1855, p. 255. A complete list of the works of Athanassiis, including the doubtful and supposititious as well as the genuine, is given in Fabriof information as to the life of Athanassiis, besides his own writings, are the church history of Sozomen (lib. ii, iii), Sozomen (ii, iii), Theodoret (i, ii), and the material is well arranged by Montfaucoun, Vita Athanassiis, prefixed to the Benediction ed. of his works. There is also a modern biography by Möhler, Athanassiis d.
Grosse und die Kirche seiner Zeit, which gives a careful analysis of his doctrine and writings. See also Böh-Athanasiis, a priest of Alexandria, was the son of Isidorus, sister of Cyril of Alexandria. He was rob-bbed of his property and degraded by Dioscorus, and, being driven out of Egypt, wandered about in poverty and distress until 451, in which year he carried his complaint before the Council of Chalcedon. This complaint is given in Labbe, iv, 405. Cave, Hist.

Lit. anno 451.

Athanasiis (Junior), or Celentes, surnamed Herniocular, was bishop of Alexandria from about A.D.
490 to 497, and was esteemed a good Biblical scholar, an active bishop, and a devout man. He is supposed to be the author of several works ascribed to Athansiis the senior, in particular the Sacramentary of the Syngasis; Questions et Responses ad Antichorum; two tracts, De Incarnationis Verbi Dei; Syntagma Doctrina ad Clericos et Laicos; de Virginitate sive Aescet.—Penny Athar’iim (Arabic), a name given (1 Esdr. v, 40) in connection with that of Nehemiah (Nehemias), evidently by the translator misunderstanding the title Tsinathath (q. v.) of the original text (Ezra ii, 68; comp.

Neh. vii, 9).

Ath’arim (Heb. Atharim, יָמָה הָעָרִים, regions; Sept.
A’qasip), a place in the south of Palestine near which the Israelites lived on their way through Heshbon, Gen.
1, where the English version improperly renders יִשָּׁבַת, “the way of the spiae” —see Gesenius, Thes.
Heb. p. 171). It was, perhaps, a general designation of the region north of Mount Seir through which the Cananites supposed that the Israelites were about to pass, as indeed they would have done to the Edom-tes’ refusal of a passage to them. See EDOM.

Atheism (from ἀθώς, without God), in popular language, means the negation of the existence of God.
1. Use of the Word.—In all ages the term has been applied according to the popular conception of ὄνομα (God). Thus, the word ἀθώς, atheât, in old Greek usage, meant one who denied “the gods,” especially the gods recognized by the law of the state. In this way several of the Greek philosophers (even Socrates) were called atheists (Cicero, Nat. Deorum, i, 28). Cicero had also ventured the opinion that the existence of any God, or practically refuses to worship any (Athens, qui sine Deo est, impius, qui Deum esse non credit, aut si credit, non colit, Deorum contemptor). This distinction of atheism into theoretical and practical has remained, in popular language, to this day. The ancient word for the term applied to the ancient Greeks or to the early Christian writers. The term was applied, in scientific theology, to such forms of unbelief as that of Pomponazzi (Pomponazzi, *1524) and Vanini (*1619). Bacon (Essay xvi) uses the term to designate infidelity in general, and the denial of God in particular. ("I had rather believe," he says, "all the fabulous tales in the Talmud and the Alcoran, than that the universal frame is without a mind"). So also in De Augmentis (i, 11) he speaks of "a little knowledge inclining the mind of man to atheism." Toward the end of the 17th century the term is not frequently found, e.g. in Kortholt's De Trinitate Impostoria, 1682, to include the names of Hobbes, Pufendorf, and Leibnitz, as well as those of Spinoza's, i.e. of the last as the chief of the Pantheists like Spinoza's, which more justly deserves the name. The same use is seen in Colerou's work against Spinoza, Arcana Athemis Revellita, Tillotson (Serm. i on Atheism) and Bentley (Bougie Lectures) use the word more exactly, and the invention of the term is due in the writers of the 18th century a more limited and exact use of the word atheism. But in Germany, Reimannus (Historia Univ. Athemismi, 1723, p. 431 sq.) and Buddersius (*De Atheismo et Superstiti- sated, 1723, ch. iii. § 2) use it most widely, and especially make it include disbelief of immortality (Farrar, Critical History of Free Thought, 414). Walch (Bibliotheca Theol. Selecta, 1757, i, 616 et seq.) uses it to include Spinoza, Hobbes, and Collins as writers who, if not avowed atheists, are yet substantially such. It is a great mistake, in the interest of truth as well as in view of charity, to extend too far the application of the word atheist. Bayle does it (Bib. Crit.), also Brucker (His- tia Philosophia, 1727) and Pufendorf (Athei Detect. i. Amsterd. 1738) puts Jansenius, Mainebranche, Quezel, and others in his black list. On the other hand, it is both unwise and uncritical to except the extreme Pantheists (e.g. Spinoza) and Materialists from the number of Atheists. Lewes, in his Biographical History of Philosophy, and also in Fortnightly Review, 1866, p. 398, vindicates Spinoza from the charge of spiritual atheism, and states that Spino- za himself emphatically repudiated Atheism; but yet Lewes admits that logically there is little difference between Spinoza's Aca- ism, which makes God the only universal being, and Atheism, which makes the cosmos the only existence. The subject is fully discussed in Brenna, De gen. human. causes in agnoscente Divinitate (Florence, 1773, 2 vols. 4to.). See also Perrone, Protost. Theologic (Paris, 1856, i, 208).

2. In scientific theology, atheism is opposed to the- ology. The doctrine of Christian theology is that God is absolute, self-conscious personal spirit, the beneficent creator and upholder of the universe. Every system of philosophy or religion must be built upon this prin- ciple or its opposite; that is, must be either theistic or atheistic. Hence a great deal of what passes for De- theism and Pantheism is in fact Atheism. Christianity apprehends God not as entirely apart from the world and exerting no providence (Deism), nor as existing only in the world (Pantheism), but as existing apart from creation, but himself creator and controller (i. e. Providence). On this theory of a living and personal God Christianity undertakes to explain the phenomena of the universe. Those who seek to explain these phenomena by substituting other ideas for this idea of God are, in the view of Christian theology, atheists. The term should be applied to none who profess to believe in a personal, self-conscious, spiritual God. Athe- ism is divided into positive or dogmatic, which ab- solutely denies the existence of God, and negative or sceptical, which declares either (a) that, if there be a God, we cannot know either the fact or the nature of his existence, and therefore it is no concern of ours, or (b) that, if there be a God, we can only know of him by tradition or by faith, and can never have proof satisfactory to the intellect of his existence. Some Christians have attempted to stand upon this latter ground. The so- called Positive Philosophy stands upon the first ground (a), but logically leads (in spite of Mr. J. S. Mill's de- nial, in his Exposition of Comte) to dogmatic atheism. To state that we only know, and only can know pheno- mena, is to exclude God; for God is not only no phenomenon, but is, in the Christian sense, the absolut- e ground of all phenomena. The theories which at- tempt to explain phenomena without the idea of God may be classed as (1) the Idealistic, which substitutes for the absolute, self-conscious Spirit, a so-called world-spirit; not a living, personal being, but an unconscious and neutral one. In the conception of reality, or self- nes of ideal being as the abstract totality of all indi- vidual conceptions; (2) the Materialistic, which substi- tutes for a personal God the forces inherent in mat- ter, and holds that these sufficiently explain all pheno- mena; (3) the Subjective-idealistic, which asserts that phenomena are nothing but creations or modi- fications of the thinking mind or subject, and that thinking does not make it, so-called, but God. To the first and third of these classes belong Fichte, Hegel, and (during his early life) Schelling, among the Germans, and their followers in England and America. To the second class belong Comte, and the so- called Positive philosophers in general. It is true that Lewes (Philosophy of the Sciences, p. 24) denies that Comte was an atheist; and Wallace (Art, Scenery, and Philosophy in Europe), while admitting Comte's individ- ual atheism, denies that atheism is a characteristic of Positivism. But these denials are vain, so long as the very same points are tried. For Positivism and the thinking mind and will from the universe. A science of pure phenomenalism cannot ever coexist with Christian the- ism. Perhaps the most open declarations of atheism in modern times are to be found in D'Holbach's Syste- me de la Nature (1770), the ultimate fruit, in athe- ology, materialism, of the sensational philosophy. Even Voltaire pronounced it "abominable" (see note to Broughan, Discourse on Natural Theology; Renouvier, Philosophie Moderne, b. v. § 2). The doctrine of the book is that nothing, in fact, exists but matter and motion, which are inseparable. "If matter is at rest, it is only because hindered in motion, for in essence it is not at rest. Motion is the point of repulsion and repulsion, and the different motions we see are the products of these two; and through these arise the different connections and the whole manifoldness of things, under laws which are eternal and unchangeable. It flows from these positions, first, that man is material, and, secondly, that the body is only its chimera. Another chimera, the belief in the being of a God, is the twofold division of man into body and soul. This belief arises like the hypothesis of a soul-substance, because man, and nature, is thus made twofold. The evil which men experience could not be assigned to a deity which purpose. The first notions of a God they imagined for the second, therefore, in sorrow, fear, and uncertainty. We tremble because our forefathers for thousands of years have done the same. This circumstance awakens no suspicious prepossession. But not only the rite, but also the theological idea of God is worthless, for it explains no phenomena of nature. It is, moreover, full of absurdities; for since it attributes moral attributes to God, it renders him human; while, on the other hand, by a mass of negative attributes, it denies him absolutely to all other human being. The true system, the system of nature, is hence atheistic. But such a doctrine requires a culture and a courage which neither all men nor most men possess. If we understand by the word atheist one who considers only dead matter, or who designates the moving power in nature with the name of God, it is on the contrary an atheist who would be one is a fool. But if the word means one who denies the existence of a spiritual being, a being whose attributes can only be a source of annoyance to men, then are there indeed atheists, and there would be more of them, if a correct knowledge of nature and a sound reason were more widely diffused. But if atheism is true, then should it be diffused. There are, indeed, many who have cast off the yoke of religion, who nevertheless think it is necessary for the common people in order to keep them within proper limits. But this is just as if we should determine to give a man poison lest he should abuse his strength. Every king of beasts has properly the right to live; but it is not possible to continue on the standpoint of pure Deism. With such premises the freedom and immortality of the soul both disappear. Man, like every other substance in nature, is a link in the chain of necessary connection, a blind instrument in the hands of necessity. If any thing should be endowed with self-motion, that is, with a capacity to produce motion without any other cause, then would it have the power to destroy motion in the universe; and this is contrary to the conception of the universe, which is only an endless series of necessary motions spreading out into ever larger circles concentrically. The claim of an individual immortality is absurd. For to affirm that the soul exists after the destruction of the body, is to affirm that a modification of a substance can exist after the substance itself has disappeared. There is no other immortality than the remembrance of posterity" (Schwegler, History of Philosophy, § 288). This is also the opinion of Malthus, edited by Lalande (Paris, 1798), a flagrant specimen of the same kind. The strongest German development is Strauss's identification of God with the universal being of man, in his Dogmatik; and Feuerbach's bald atheism, in his Wesen des Christenthums (Smith's Gap, History of Philosophy, § 5). The so-called English "secularism" is an atheistic doctrine resting on, or similar to that of the Positive Philosopher. It holds the eternity of matter; it knows of nothing greater than nature; its creed is a stern fatalism; its worship is labor; its religion is science; its future is a dark, impenetrable curtain. One of its adherents says: "From the moment a child is born, the curtain; no one within will answer those his he left without; all that you can hear is a hollow echo of your question, as if you shouted into a cavern" (Holyoake, Logic of Death). Such is the wretched atheism which is expounded by itinerant lecturers, and disseminated by the absence of the fine lines of the brute and the breadth of Great Britain, and which is perverting and contaminating the minds of the more thoughtful and inquisitive among the working classes of that country to an unprecedented and incredible extent (London Review, XI. 20). do to demand possession of the chief fortresses of Palestine; which being refused, the envoy, although greatly impressed with what he saw of the splendor of Jerusalem, yet returned enraged to his master (1 Macc. xv, 28-30). Josephus, however, gives a somewhat different account of the negotiation (Ant. xiii, 7, 2; War, i, 2, 2), and does not name Athenobius. See Antiochus.

Athens (Ἀθήναι, plural of Ἀθήνη, Minerva, the tutelary goddess of the place), mentioned in several passages of Scripture (2 Macc. ix. 15; Acts xvii, 15 sq.; xviii, 1; 1 Thess. iii, 1), a celebrated city, the capital of Attica and of the leading Greek republic, and the seat of the Greek literature in the golden period of the nation (Müller, Topog. of Athens, trans. by Lockhart, Lond. 1842; Kruse, Hellas, Lpz. 1826, i, 10 sq.; Leake, Topography of Athens, Lond. 1841, 2d ed.; Forchhammer, Topographie von Athen, Kiel, 1841; Wachsmuth, Hellem. The inhabitants had the reputation of being fond of novelty (Acts xvii, 19; comp. Ælian, Var. Hist. v, 13; Demosth., Phil. i, 4; Schol. ad Theoc. ii, 86; ad Aristoph. Phil. 389; see Wetstein, ii, 557), and as being remarkably zealous in the worship of the gods (Acts xvii, 16; comp. Pausan. i, 74, 3; Strabo, x, 471; Philostr. Apol. vi, 8; iv, 19; Ælian, Var. Hist. v, 17; Himer.

In Phot. cod. 248; see Eckhard, Athenae superstitionum, Viteb. 1618); hence the city was full of temples, altars, and sacred places (Livy, i, 27). In 125 B.C. visited Athens on his second missionary journey from Berea (Acts xvii, 14 sq.; comp. 1 Thess. iii, 1), and delivered in (but not before) the Areopagus (q. v.) his famous speech (Acts xxvii, 22-31).—Winer, i, 111.

The earlier and more obscure period of the Greek province is treated of in the Acts of Philip. The people reaches down nearly to the final establishment of democracy in it, and even then the foundations of its greatness were already laid. The fertile soil and dry atmosphere of Attica, in connection with the slender appetite of the people, have been thought favorable to their mental development; the barrenness of the soil, moreover, prevented invaders from crowding it; so that, through a course of ages, the population remained unchanged, and a moral union grew up between the several districts. To a king named Theseus (whose deeds are too mixed up with fable to be narrated as history) is ascribed the credit of uniting all the country towns of Attica into a single state, the capital of which was Athens. The population of this province was variously called Pelasgian, Achaean, and Ionian, and probably corresponds most nearly to what was afterward called Eeliat (Prichard, Phys. Hist. of Man, iii, 404). When the Dorians, another tribe of Greeks of very different temperament, invaded and occupied the southern peninsula, the greater numbers of its Achaean inhabitants took refuge in Attica. Shortly after, the Dorians repulsed an inroad against Athens, an event

Athenobius (Ἀθηνοβιος), a "friend" of the Syrian king Antiochus (VII) Sidetes, sent by him as a special ambassador to Simon, the Jewish high-priest, has transmitted to legendary renown the name of King Codrus, and thenceforward Athens was looked upon as the bulwark of the Ionian tribes against the barbarous Dorians. Overloaded with population, Attica now poured forth colonies into Asia, some of which, as Miletus, soon rose to great eminence, and sent out numerous colonies of their own. Thereafter the Attic race was reverenced as a mother of nations by powerful children scattered along the western and northern coasts of Anatolia. Dim tradition shows us isolated priesthoods and elective kings in the earliest times of Attica; these, however, gradually gave way to an aristocracy, which in a series of years established themselves as the legitimate custodians of the country "ever unravaged" (such was their boast) could not fail to increase in wealth and numbers; and after two or three centuries, while the highest commoners pressed on the nobles, the lowest became overwhelmed with debt. The disorders caused by the strife of the former were vainly sought to be stayed by the institutions of Draco; the sufferings of the latter were ended, and the sources of violence dried up by the enactments of Solon. Henceforth the Athenians revered the laws of Solon ( νόμοι) as the groundwork of their whole civil polity; yet they retained by the side of them the "loves of Draco (δράκοι) in many matters pertaining to religion. The date of Solon's reforms was probably B.C. 594. The usurpation of Pisistratus and his sons made a partial breach in the constitution; but upon their expulsion, a more serious change was effected by Clisthenes, head of the noble house of the Accamnids (B.C. 508), almost in the same year in which Tarquin was expelled from Rome. An entirely new organization of the Attic tribes was framed, which destroyed whatever remained of the power of the nobles as an order, and established among the freemen a democracy, in fact as well as in form. Out of this proceeded all the good and all the evil with which the name of Athens is associated; and though greatness which shot up so suddenly could not be permanent, there can be no difficulty in deciding that the good greatly preponderated. Very soon after this commenced hostilities with Persia; and the self-denying, romantic, successful bravery of Athens, with the generous affability and great talents of her statesmen, soon raised her to the head of the whole Ionian confederacy. As long as Persia was to be feared, Athens was loved; but after tasting the sweets of power, her sway degenerated into a despotism, and crept also among the Peloponnesian, a coalition of all Dorian and _Eolian_ Greece against her (B.C. 431). In spite of a fatal pestilence and the revolt of her Ionian subjects, the naval skill of Athenian seamen and the enterprise of Athenian commanders proved more than a match for the hostile confederacy; and when Athens at last fell (B.C. 404), she fell by the effects of internal sedition more truly than by Spartan lances or Persian gold, or even by her own rash and over-grasping ambition. The demoralizing effects of this war on all Greece were infinitely the worst result of it, and they were transmitted to succeeding generations. It was a substratum, and a prey provisionally formed the staple of Athenian education. The constitution of Solon admitted and demanded in the people a great knowledge of law, with a large share in its daily administration. Thus the acuteness of the lawyer was grafted on the imagination of the poet. These are the two intellectual elements out of which Athenian wisdom was developed; but it was stimulated and enriched by extended political action and political experience. History and philosophy, as the words are understood in modern Europe, had their birth in Athens about the time of the Peloponnesian war. Then first, also, the oratory of the bar and of the popular assembly was systematically cultivated, so that the orators could be trained. Scientific sciences were admitted into the education of an accomplished man. This was the period of the youth of Plato, whose philosophy was destined to leave so deep an impress on the Jewish and Christian schools of Alexandria. Its great effort was to unite the contemplative mysticism of Eastern sages with the accurate sciences of Greece; to combine, in short, the two qualities—intellectual and moral, argumentative and spiritual—into a single harmonious whole; and whatever opinion may be formed of the success which attended the experiment, it is not wonderful that so magnificent an aim attracted the desires and riveted the attention of thoughtful and contemplative minds for ages afterward. In the imitative arts of sculpture and painting, as well as in architecture, it need hardly be said that Athens carried off the palm in Greece; yet, in all these, the Asiatic colonies vied with her. Miletus took the start of her in literary composition; and, under slight conceivable changes, might have become the Athens of the world. That Athens after the Peloponnesian war never recovered the political place which she previously held, can excite no surprise—that she rose so high toward it was truly wonderful. Sparta and Thebes, which successfully aspired to the "leadership" of Greece, abused their power as flagrantly as Athens had done, and, at the same time, more coarsely. The never-ending cabals, the treaties made and violated, the coalitions and breaches, the alliances and wars, recurring every few years, destroyed all mutual confidence, and all possibility of again uniting Greece in any permanent form of independence; and, in consequence, the whole country was soon swallowed up in the kingdom of Macedonia. With the loss of civil liberty, Athens lost her genius, her manly mind, and whatever remained of her virtue: she long continued to produce talents, which were too often made tools of iniquity, panders to power, and petty artisans of false philosophy. Under the Roman empire, into which it was absorbed with the rest of Greece, its literary importance still continued, and it was the great resort of students from Rome itself. During the Middle Ages it languished under the Ottoman yoke in every respect, but since Greece regained its independence (in 1834) Athens has again (at least, in her tria, lili, 478 sq.) as the capital of the new European kingdom. (For a detailed account of the history and topography of Athens, see the Penny Cyclopaedia, s. v.; McCulloch's Gazetteer, s. v.; Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v. Athen-ii.) See GREECE. In order to understand the localities mentioned in the sacred narrative, it may be observed that four hills of moderate height rise within the walls of the city. Of these, one to the north-east is the celebrated Acropolis, or citadel, being a square craggy rock of about 150 feet high. Immediately to the west of the Acropolis is a second hill of irregular form, but inferior height, called the

A Christian Church existed in Athens soon after the apostolic times, having doubtless been planted by the 1st hour of Paul (although no allusion to it occur in the N. T.), but as the city had no political importance, the Church never assumed any eminent position (see Bar- ronius, Annal. Ecl. an. 584, n. 25, 26). Tradition, however (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii, 4), assigns as its first bishop Dionysius (q. v.) the Arxopagites (Acts xvii, 24). There are two points requiring special elucidation connected with the N. T. mention of Athens (from Winer):

(1) Respecting the "altar on which was inscribed, To the Unknown God," referred to in Acts xvii, 23, various opinions have been expressed by interpreters (see Fabric. Bibliogr. antiq., p. 296; Wolf, CUR ii, 791 sq.; Douagtei Annal. p. 80 sq.; Kiinod, Comment. iv, 608 sq.; comp. also Grube [Segræ], De ara ignotæ dei, Regiom. 1710; Hiler, De deo ignoto Athén. in Gronov. Thes. vii, 228 sq.; Schickendanz, De ara ignotæ deoromacerta, Tervest. 1748; Geliger, De ignoto Ath. deo, Marb. 1704; Wallenius, De deo ignoto, Graphe. 1797; Baden, Dis. ara deo ignoto dicata, Haavn. 1787). It by no means follows from the classical passages usually adduced (Pausan. i, 1, 4; Philost. Apoll. vi, 8; comp. Lucian, Philopat. 9, 29) that any of the single altars mentioned in these writers had the inscription "to unknown gods" (ἀγνωστος τῶν θεῶν), in the plural, but more naturally that each was dedicated separately to an unknown deity (ἀγνωστή δεος); yet these instances in the singular must have been collectively employed with a plural reference, since they unitely speak of all such altars. There appear, moreover, to have been several altars in various parts of Athens with the inscription "to an unknown god," a circumstance that is not invalidated by the mention (Pausan. v, 14, 6) of a single (in Ellis!) "altar of unknown gods (ἱερὸς ἀγνωστῶν θεῶν). One plausible interpretation respecting the altar in question (in Eichhorn's Bibl. d. bibl. Lit. iii, 414) supposes that, as in ancient times the art of writing was not generally known, or but little practised, there were (perhaps several) altars at Athens without any inscription (ὡς, ἀγνωστῶν, Dioq. Laert. i, 10, 3). Eventually these, when found standing thus indefinite by the religious Athenians, would be marked by the words "to some unknown god" (ἀγνωστες θεοὶ). It is simpler, however, to suppose that in spots where some supposed preternatural event had occurred, which persons sought by a memorial to attribute to some distinct deity as author, they erected such an altar, that profane eyes might not approach too near (compare the phrases θεος, δαιμων ibid. used in such cases, Cels. i, 26, 3; Macrobr. Saturn. ii, 9, ed. Bip.; see Douttei Annal. ii, 87) the unrecognised deity (comp. Neander, Planting, 1, 262 sq.). That the expression was intended to designate specially the God of the Jews (comp. the ironical expression "Judæa devoted to the worship of an uncertain god," in Lucian, ii, 592), as Anon testis (Progr. in Act. xvii, 22 eq., Gorlic. 1882), is very unlikely. (The treatise of Welle, De ignoto Judæor. et Athéno deo, Lips. 1777, is without worth; and Moorem, Cogit. in N. T. loc. i, 77 sq. treats the subject in an unantiquarian manner.) See ALTAR.

(2) The "market" (ἐμπόλεμος) at Athens, mentioned (Acts xvii, 17) as the place where Paul spoke to the assembled populace, has (with most modern interpreters since Kiinod) been understood as meaning, not the proper definite market-place called "the Forum in the Ceramicus" (ἐμπόλεμος ἐν Κεραμικῷ), but a so-called new market-place lying much farther north, to which Mousios (Ceramic, gemin. c. 16) was the first to call attention, and which Müller (Hall. Encyclop. vi, 192) located on his plan from the notice in Pausianias (i, 17) and Strabo (x, 447); according to the latter of which, this spot appears to have borne the designation of the Emitria (Εὔρηπια). Pausianias, however, refers to no other market-place than the well-known one lying between the Acropolis, the Pnyx, and the place of holding the Arxopagis (Forchhammer, ut sup. p. 58 sq.); later inquirers have therefore acquiesced in the opinion that the passage in the Acts refers to nothing more than the usual market-place, in the neighborhood of which (see Forchhammer's Plan, opposite the Acropolis on the west), moreover, lay the "miscellaneous porch" (ἐκτός τοῦ ἱεροῦ), of which avail may be made (as has usually been found necessary) for the explanation of Acts xvii, 18 (Cooksey, Map of Athens, Lond. 1852). See MARKET.

Athos, a mountain at the extremity of the promontory of Chalcis, in the province of Salonica, in European Turkey. It was an early resort of monks and anchorites, and is called Monte Sento, or “Holy Mountain,” in the lingua franca, and in Greek άγιος όρος. There are now upon the sides of the mountain between twenty and thirty monasteries, and a vast multitude of hermitages, which contain more than six thousand monks called Caloyers (q. v.), mostly Russian, of the order of St. Basil. Here they live in a state of complete abstraction from the world; and so strict are their regulations that they do not tolerate any female being, not even of the class of domestic animals, among them. They still own considerable possessions in Bulgaria, Servia, the Danubian Principalties, and Russia. They elect annually a common council of administration, called Protokaston. They are now chiefly occupied in carving little images of the saints, which they send down to the market-town of Karesi, where a weekly market is held, and where purchases are made for various parts, especially Russia; but formerly they were occupied with the nobler work of transcription. The libraries of the monasteries are particularly rich in MSS. and other literary treasures. Many of these works have of late years been purchased by travellers, and thus found their way into various libraries of Europe. The monasteries and churches on this mountain are the only ones in the Ottoman empire that have bells. Under the reign of Catherine II of Russia, the learned Eugen Bulgaris took up his abode on Mount Athos as director of an academy founded by Patriarch Cyril of Constantinople. For some time the academy was very flourishing, but at length the patriarch had to yield to the demands of the ignorant portion of the monks and to abolish it. From that time ignorance has generally prevailed among the monks, and only recently (1869) they have set up a printing-press and commenced the publication of a religious newspaper. No complete list of the MSS. extant at Mount Athos has yet been made. See Curzon, Monasteries of the Levant (N. Y. 1861, 12mo); Leake, Trav. in N. Greece, vol. iii; Journ. of Geog. Athrones (Ἀθρόνα), a person of mean extraction, and by occupation a shepherd, who, without any other advantages than great bodily stature and un- daunted hardihood, raised a body of banditti in Judæa, in connection with his four brothers, during the rule of Gratus, so powerful that they at last assumed royalty, and were with difficulty subdued in detail and captured by the successive procurators (Joseph. Ant. xvi, 10, 7). In the parallel account (War, ii, 4, 6) he is called Athronous (Ἀθρούνος).
ATITHA (Αττιθά, Vulg. Agatth.), one of the "temple-servants" whose "sons" received from the captives of the war (Ezra xvi. 18, xii. 36, 42), being the "ATITHA (q.v.)" of the true text (Ezra ii. 54).

Atonement (expressed in Heb. by הַטַּוּת, kaphar, to cover over sin, hence to forgive; Gr. καταλαφων, reconciliation, as usually rendered), the satisfaction offered to divine justice for the sins of mankind by the death of Jesus Christ, by virtue of which all penitent believers in Christ are reconciled to God, and freed from the penalties of sin.

1. Scripture Doctrine.—I. The words used to describe Christ's work.—The redeeming work of Christ, in its several aspects, is denoted in Scripture by various terms, namely, reconciliation, propitiation, expiation, atonement, redemption, satisfaction, substitution, and salvation. The following summary of the uses and meanings of these terms is taken, with slight modifications, from Anglus, Bible Hand-book, § 299. (a) Looking into the English N.T., we find "reconciliation" and "reconcile" in several passages, in all of which (except one) the Greek word is some form of διαλυσω, to produce a change between parties (Col. i. 11, on the Ven. Rev.), for they have been "at variance"; returning to the Sept. we find this word never used in this sense at all, nor have the many passages in the O.T., which speak of "making reconciliation," any verbal reference to these passages in the N.T. The idea is involved in several passages, but it is never expressed by this word, nor by any single word. "To those who are reconciled," i.e., to accept the common expressions, generally forms of μεταξιω = and εν αυτοις (Isa. lxv. 7; Is. 17; Jer. vi. 20; Lev. xiv. 17). Hence the conclusion, that in the word of the N.T. translated "reconciliation" there is reference only to the change or effect produced by some measure of mercy, and not to the nature of that measure itself: it describes merely the change produced in our relation to God; his moral sentiment of displeasure against sin (called his "wrath") is appeased, and the sinner's eminence and misgivings are removed. That there is this double change may be gathered from the following passages: Heb. x. 26, 27; Rom. v. 9; Heb. ix. 26, 28; 2 Cor. v. 18, 19; Eph. ii. 16; 1 Cor. vii. 11; Col. i. 20, 21. (b) The Greek word, variously rendered, has in Greek another word, λειτουργειν, translated also "make reconciliation." Its meaning may be gathered from the passages in the O.T. in which it occurs. It is, in fact, the constant rendering of a word translated in the English version "to make reconciliation" or "to atone for" (Lev. vi. 30; vii. 9; Ezek. xiv. 20; Dan. ix. 24). But it is evident that if it had been so translated elsewhere if the were the only passage in the N.T. where this phrase is found. It occurs again, in fact, in Rom. iii. 23; 1 John ii. 2; iv. 10; but in each of these passages it is translated "propitiation," a word which does not occur in the O.T. EXPiation, again, does not occur in the N.T. but once in the O.T. (Numb. xxvii. 25, marg.) It is the same word, however, as is translated elsewhere "to make reconciliation" or "to atone for." ATONEMENT itself does not occur in the N.T., except in Rom. v. 2, and there it has no connection with the O.T. phrase, but is the same word as is translated "reconciliation" or "reconciliation to the" in either Testament, and the idea is frequently expressed in both: "it shall be accepted upon him" (Lev. i. 4; vii. 8) is the O. T. phrase, and the New corresponds. There we find the familiar word in the "as the former meaning "on behalf of," for," and "instead of" the latter meaning undoubtedly "instead of." Much stress ought not to be laid upon the fact that in these forms, as it is frequently used where it may mean "for the advantage of" (Rom. viii. 31; 2 Cor. i. 2); yet in John xvi, 13, and 1 John iii, 16, it seems to mean "instead of," and this is certainly the meaning of idi (Matt. xx. 28; Mark x. 45; see Matt. xii. 12). Apart from these particular prepositions, three sets of phrases clearly teach this doctrine. (1) Christ was made a curse for us (Gal. iii. 13); so a similar phrase (2 Cor. v. 21).
He gave himself as a sacrifice for our sins (1 Cor. xv, 3; Eph. v, 2; Gal. i, 4; 1 Tim. ii, 6, 14; Heb. vii, 27; v, 3; x, 12; Rom. v, 6, 7, 8; 1 Cor. i, 18; v, 7; xi, 24; 1 Pet. iii, 18, iv, 1). (c) Christ gave his life for our life, or we live by his death (Gal. ii, 20; Rom. xiv, 15; 2 Cor. v, 15). Compare Rom. xviii, 4; Is. liii, 46).

The idea of substitution is in all these passages, and the phrase, though not scriptural, is a convenient summary of them all. (d) "Salvation" is everywhere in the N.T. the representative of σωτηρία or σωτηρίων; σωτηρία is always or very nearly synonymous with "salvation" in the three words Acts ii, 25; xxvii, 34, and Heb. xii, 7, where it refers to temporal deliverance, and the idea included in the term is whatever blessings redemption includes, but without any reference to λίπος, or anything else as the ground of them. It includes present deliverance (Luke xix, 9) or future (Phil. i, 19; Rom. xiii, 11). "Salvation," therefore, is the state into which the Gospel introduces all who believe, and without reference to the means used. On turning to the Sept., however, we find that the idea of propitiation is involved even here; σωτηρίων is very frequently the translation of בֵּית (בֵּית), peace-offering, Savia σωτηρία in Lev. iii, 1-3, iv, 10; viii, 30; xii, 4; Judg. xx, 26; xxxi, 4). בֵּית is the sacrifice or reparation restoring peace, and thus the meaning of σωτηρία touches upon the meaning of propitiation.

"From this comparison, therefore, of the N.T., the Sept., and the Hiebrew, we gather the following conclusions: Propitiation, giving prominence to the secondary meaning of בֵּית, κοπαρ, and the primary meaning of פָּלַשׁ, is an act prompting to the exercise of mercy, and providing for its exercise in a way consistent with justice; Expiation, giving prominence to the primary meaning of פָּלַשׁ and the secondary meaning of פָּלַשׁ, is an act which provides for the removal of sin, and cancels the obligation to punishment; Atone ment, giving prominence to both, and meaning expiation and propitiation combined. Christ’s atonement is said to be by substitution, for he suffered in our stead, and he bears our sin; and it is by satisfaction, for the broken law is vindicated, all the purposes of punishment are answered with honor to the Lawgiver, and eventual holiness to the Christian. It’s result is reconciliation (εἰρήνη), the moral sentiment of justice in God is reconciled to the sinner, and punishment for sin is abolished for the remitted one. The atonement is redemption, or actual deliverance for a price from sin in its guilt and dominion, from all misery, and from death. Salvation is also actual deliverance, but without a distinct reference to a price paid. Atone ment, therefore, is something offered to God; redemption is something bestowed upon man: atonement is the ground of redemption, and redemption is the result of atonement (Isa. liii, 4-9, 10, 12). The design of the first is to satisfy God’s justice, the design of the second to make man blessed; the first was fin ished upon the cross, the second is in daily operation, and will not be completed in the case of the whole church until the consummation of all things (Dan. ix, 24; Eph. iv, 80)."

2. The Scripture doctrine of the vicarious sacrifice of Christ is taught in the passages above cited, and indeed seems to underlie the whole "gospel" of salvation contained in the teaching of Christ and his apostles. It may be stated further (1) that the sacrifices of the Old Testament, such as the burnt-offering, the wave-bread [see this shown under Expiation], and the terms used by Christ and his apostles (ransom, sacrifice, offering, etc.) were necessarily understood by their hearers in the sense which they had been accustomed for ages to attach to them. (2) If this be so, then nothing could be more misleading, and even absurd, than to employ those terms which, both among Jews and Gentiles, were in use to express the various processes and means of atonement and piacular propitiation, if the apostles and Christ himself did not intend to represent his death strictly as an expiation for sin; misleading, because such would be the natural and necessary inference from the terms themselves, which Christ acquired this as their established meaning; and absurd, because if, as Socinians say, they used them metaphorically, there was not even an ideal resemblance between the figures and that which it was intended to illustrate. So totally irrelevant, indeed, will those figures be, if terms are not warranted by the death of Christ which excludes its expiatory character, that to assume that our Lord and his apostles used them as metaphors is profanely to assume them to be such writers as would not in any other case be tolerated; writers wholly unacquainted with the commonest rules of language, and, therefore, wholly unfit to be teachers of others, and that not only in religion, but in things of inferior importance" (Watson, Dict. s. v. Expiation).

Immediately upon the first public manifestation of Christ, John the Baptist declares, when he sees Jesus coming to him, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i, 29). It is obvious that, when John called our Lord "the Lamb of God," he spoke of him under a sacrificial character, and of the effect of that sacrifice as an atonement for the sins of mankind. This was said of our Lord even before he entered on his public office; but if any doubt should exist respecting the meaning of the Baptist’s expression, it is removed by the New Testament passages, in which a similar allusion is adopted, and in which it is specifically applied to the death of Christ as an atonement for sin. In the Acts (viii, 32) the following words of Isaiah (ili, 7) are by Philip the Evangelist distinctly applied to Christ and to his death: "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so opened he not his mouth: in his humiliation his judgment was taken away: and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth." This particular part of the prophecy being applied to our Lord’s death, the whole must relate to the same subject, for it is undoubtedly one entire prophecy; and the other expressions in it are still stronger: "He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed: the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. In the First Epistle of Peter is also a strong and distinct application of the term ‘lamb’ to our Lord, and the sense in which it is applied, can admit of no doubt: "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 Pet. i, 18, 19). It is therefore evident that the prophet Isaiah, seven hundred years before the birth of Jesus; that John the Baptist, at the commencement of Christ’s ministry; and that Peter, his companion and apostle, subsequent to the transaction, speak of Christ’s death as an atonement for sin under the figure of a lamb sacrificed. The passages that follow plainly declare the inestimable character of the sacrifice of Christ’s death: "Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. ix, 26, 28).

After this offer of sacrifice for sin, forever sat down on the right hand of God; for by one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x, 12). It is observable that nothing similar is said of the death of any other person, and that no such efficacy is imputed to any other many-sacrificed lamb. While the world was enduring, Jesus and his servants were yet sinners Christ died for us; much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him; for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being recconciled, we shall be saved by his life" (Rom. v. 8-10).
The words "reconciled to God by the death of his Son" show that his death had an efficacy in our reconciliation; but reconciled to God by his life only in the case of
"he has reconciled us to his Father in his cross, and in the body of his flesh through death" (Col. i. 20, 22).
What is said of reconciliation in these texts is in some others spoken of sanctification, which is also preparatory to salvation. "We are sanctified"—how? "by the offering of the body of Christ once for all" (Heb. ix. 12, 26), which he lived a life holy and unblemished from the day he was born, and by his death for us, and his death and resurrection, or death and ascension, or death and his ascension, are called "the blood of the covenant by which we are sanctified." In these and many other passages that occur in different parts of the New Testament, it is therefore asserted that the death of Christ was effectual in the procuring of human salvation. Such expressions are used concerning no other person; and it is therefore evident that Christ's death included something more than a confirmation of his preaching; something more than a pattern of a holy and patient martyrdom; something more than a necessary antecedent to his resurrection, by which he gave a grand and clear proof of our resurrection, which is the title of the New Testament. He was all these, but it was much more. It was an atonement for the sins of mankind, and in this way only it became the accomplishment of our eternal redemption.

The teaching of the New Testament, and the agreement of the statements of Christ with those of his apostles on this subject, are thus set forth (without regard to theological distinctions) by Dr. Thomson, bishop of Gloucester: "God sent his Son into the world to redeem lost and ruined man from sin and death, and the Son willingly took upon him the form of a servant for this purpose; and thus the Father and the Son made atonement for us. God the Father laid upon his Son the weight of the sins of the whole world, so that he bare in his own body the wrath which men must else have borne, because there was no other way of escape for them; and thus the atonement was a manifestation of divine justice. The effect of the atoment was wrought that is man is placed in a new position, freed from the dominion of sin, and able to follow holiness, and thus the doctrine of the atonement ought to work in all the bearers a sense of love, of obedience, and of self-sacrifice. In shorter words, the sacrifice of the death of Christ is a proof of divine love and of divine justice, and is for us a document of obedience, the great work of the New Testament, Peter, Paul, and John set forth every one of these points. Peter, the 'witness of the sufferings of Christ,' tells us that we were 'redeemed with the blood of Jesus, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot;' says that 'Christ bare our sins in his own body on the tree.' If we 'have tasted that the Lord is gracious,' we must not rest satisfied with a contemplation of our redeemed state, but must live a life worthy of it. No one can well doubt, who reads the two epistles, that the love of God and Christ, and the justice of God, and the duties thereby laid on us, all have their value in them; but the love is less dwelt on than the justice. Christ bare our sin in his own body on the tree. Paul, in another epistle, tells us that he has cleansed us from all sin, for that whoever is born of God does not commit sin: all are put forward. The death of Christ is both justice and love—both a propitiation and an act of loving self-surrender; but the moral effect upon us is more prominent even than these. In the epistles of Paul the three elements are all present: in such expressions as a ransom, a propitiation who was 'made sin for us,' the wrath of God against sin, and the mode in which it was turned away, are presented to us. Yet not wrath alone: 'The love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were they all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again.' Love in him begeteth love in us; and, in our reconciled state, the holiness which we could not practice before becomes easy. Now in which of these points is there the semblance of contradiction between the apostles and their Master? In none of them, so far as the literal meaning of the passages is concerned; but the law of the Gospel is that of the sacrifices and the vic-form upon which the holy nature shrank, feeling in him a sense of desolation such as we fail utterly to comprehend on a theory of human motives. Yet no one takes from him his precious redeeming life; he lays it down of himself out of his great love for men; and men are to deny themselves, and take upon their cross, and trein their steps. They are his friends only if they keep his commands and follow his footsteps' (Aids to Faith, p. 837. See also Storr and Platt, Biblical Theology, II. History of the Doctrine.—(1.) The Fathers.—In the early ages of the church the atoning work of Christ was spoken of generally in the words of Scripture.

The value of the sufferings and death of Christ, in the work of redemption, was from the beginning both held in Christian faith, and also plainly set forth, but the doctrine was not scientifically developed by the primitive fathers. But it is one thing to admit that the atonement was not scientifically apprehended, and quite another thing to assert that it was not really held at all in the sense of vicarious sacrifice. The relation between the death of Christ and the remission of sins was not a matter of much dispute in that early period.
For the apostles are the great authors of the ecclesiological inquiry, and it was not until after this was settled by the general prevalence of the Nicene Credo that anthropological and soteriological questions come up into decided prominence. Baur (in whose Forskaehndene her subject is treated with ample learning, though often with dogmatic assertion of conclusives arrived at hastily and without just ground admits that in the writings of the apostological fathers there is abundant recognition of the sacrificial and re-demptive death of Christ. Thus Barnabas: "The Lord descended to deliver his body to death, that, by remission of our sins, we might be sanctified, and this is the great doctrine of the New Testament." So also Clement quotes Isa. liii. and Psa. xxii., 7, 9, adding, "His blood was shed for our salvation; by the will of God he has given his body for our body, his soul for our soul." Similar passages exist in Ig-натiues and Polycarp, and stronger still in the Epiist. ad Diognet. ch. ix. (See citations in Shedd, History of Doctrine, bk. v. ch. i.; Hagenbech, Hist. of Doctrine, § 68; Thomson, Bampton Lectures, 1858, Lect. vi.) In the second century Justin Martyr (A.D. 147) says that "the Father willed that his Christ should take upon himself the curses of all for the whole race of man" (Dia-
c. Tryph. 88.). "In Justin may be found the idea of himself being offered to God as a sacrifice, being slain, at least lying at the bottom, if not clearly grasped in the form of conscious thought" (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 80; Neander, Ch. History, i. 642). The victory of the death of Christ over the power of the devil begins now to play a prominent part in the idea of the atonement.
Baur (in whose Forskaehndene her subject is treated with ample learning) acknowledges that the ideas taken up into the line of Christian thought;
"that as the relation between the Demiurge and Redeemer was, in the Marcionite and Ophitic systems, especially hostile, so the death of Jesus was a contrivance of the Demiurge, which failed of its purpose and disappointed him." Baur asserts that Trensmus (A.D. 180) borrowed this idea from Gnosticism, only substituting Satan for the Demiurge. But Dornier shows clearly that Ireneaus, with entire knowledge of Gnosticism, repelled all its ideas, and that Baur's charge rests upon a misinterpretation of a passage (Adm. Herr. v. 1, 1) in which, although the Satanic idea is present, the godhead has been mingled with the satanic. (Dorner, Person of Christ, i. 468; see also Shedh, Hist. of Doctrines, ii. 218). Baur's theory that the foundations of the doctrine of vicarious satisfaction were laid in the notion that it was the claims of Satan, and not of God, that were satisfied, fails to the ground; for "in this very realm, in this very sphere, it is in Irenaeus" (Shedd, l. c.). Nevertheless, it is true (though not in the Gnostic spirit) that Irenaeus represents the sufferings of Christ as made necessary by the hold of Satan on man, and in order to a rightful delivery from that bondage. Tertullian (A.D. 200) uses the word satisfaction, but not with reference to the vicarious sufferings of Christ, yet in several of his writings he assumes the efficacious work of Christ's sufferings for salvation. In the Alexandrian fathers we find, as might be expected, the Gnostic influence more obvious, and the idea of ransom paid to the devil comes out fully in Origen (A.D. 230). Yet it is going quite far to say that Origen does not suggest the vicarious suffering of Christ; so (Hom. 24 in Numb.) he says that "the entrance of sin into the world made a propitiation necessary, and there can be no proposition without a sacrificial offering." Dr. Shedh finds the general doctrine of the Alexandrian school inconsistent with vicarious atonement, and interprets the special passages which imply it accordingly; but in this he differs from Thomasius (Origines, Nürnberg, 1887) and Thomson (Bampton Lectures). Origen doubtless held the vicarious atonement, though it was mixed up with speculations as to the value of the blood of the martyrs, and debased by his fanciful views of the immortality of the soul. Reference to the Gnostics was carried to a greater extent by later fathers, e.g. Gregory of Nyssa (A.D. 370), who says in substance that the devil was cheated in the transaction by a just retaliation for his deception of men: "Men have come under the dominion of the devil by sin. Jesus offered himself to the devil as the ransom for which he should release all others. The crafty devil as- sented, because he cared more for the one Jesus, who was so much superior to him, than for all the rest. But, notwithstanding his craft, he was deceived, since he could not retain Jesus in his power. It was, as we were, a deception on the part of God (ἀπό τον Θεόν) to let Jesus yield to the devil, in order that he himself might be brought to the recognised men which the devil would have feared, by means of his humanity, and thus deceived the devil by the appearance of flesh" (Orat. Catech. 22-26). Athanasius (A.D. 370), on the other hand, not only maintained the expiation of Christ, but rejected the fanciful Satan theory (De Incarn. Fihc. vi. et al.), Cyril of Jerusalem (A.D. 380) (Catech. xii, § 33) enters more deeply into this doctrine, developing a theory to show why it was necessary that Jesus should die for man. Similar views were expressed by Eusebius of Cesarea, Gregory of Nazianzen, Cyril of Alexandria, and Chrysostom (see De Doctrina in Christo, p. 733). For the idea of the saviour of those souls as being that of Christ, by his death, he did more than would have been necessary for the redemption of men. They undertook to show that Christ alone was able to achieve redemption, and discussed the qualities which were necessary for his redemptive character. These discussions are especially met with in the writings of Aquinas and Augustine. (A.D. 898) was occupied more, in all his controversies, with anthropology than with soteriology, but the vicarious atonement is clearly taught or implied in his De Preocc. Meritis, i. 56, and in other places; but he called those docta (σωτηρίας) who maintained that God could provide no other means of redemption (De glione Christi, c. 10). Gregory the Great (A.D. 690) taught the doctrine with great clearness, and approached the scientific precision of a later age (Moralia, xvii, 40). Little is to be added to these statements up to the time of Anselm. Enough has been said to show that, although the earlier view may have been misunderstood and mingled with Gnostic ideas, it is wrong to assert, as Baur and his English followers (Jowett, Wardan, etc.) do, that the "doctrine of substitution is not in the fathers, and lay dormant till the voice of Anselm woke it; or that Anselm was the inventor of the doctrine." (Comp. Brit. and For. Er. Renan, Jav. ii. 169.) 2. The Scholastic Period. — Nevertheless, Anselm (1109) undoubtedly gave the doctrine a more scientific form by giving the central position to the idea of satisfaction to the divine justice (Ccr Deus hominem transf. in Bibliotheca Sacra, vols. xi, xii). Nicholas of Methone (11th or 12th cent.), in the Greek Church, developed the necessity of vicarious satisfaction from the nature of God and his relations to man, but it is not certain that he had not seen Anselm's writings. Anselm's view is, in substance, as follows: "The infinite guilt which man had contracted by the diabolous of his sin against the infinitely great God could be expiated only by a more competent one than man, and Christ Jesus could render to God the infinite satisfaction required. God only can satisfy himself. The human nature of Christ enables him to incur, the infinity of his divine nature to pay this debt. But it was incumbent upon Christ as a man to order his life according to the law of God; the obedience of his life, therefore, was not able to render satisfaction for our guilt. But, although he was under obligation to live in obedience to the law, as the Holy One he was under no obligation to die. Seeing, then, that he nevertheless voluntarily surrendered his infinitely precious life to the honor of God, a recompense from God because of his obedience to his command is due, and the triumphs which were won for the sins of his brethren" (Chambers, Encycl. a. v. ; Neander, Hist. of Dogmas, Bohn's éd. ii. 517). Anselm rejects entirely the claims of Satan, and places the necessity of atonement entirely in the justice of God. His theory is defective with regard to the op- propriations of the merits of Christ by the believer; but, on the whole, it is substantially that in which the Christian Church has rested from that time forward. His doctrine was opposed by Abelard, who treated the atonement in its relation to the love of God, and not to his justice, giving it moral rather than legal significance. Peter Lombard seems confusedly to blend Abelard's idea of the nature of Anselm, and has developed Anselm's theory, and brought out also the superabundant merit of his death, while he does not clearly affirm the absolute necessity of the death of Christ (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 181). See Aquinas. Bernard of Clairvaux, in opposition to Abelard, brought into again the idea of the claims of Satan. Duns Scotus, in opposition to Anselm, denied the necessity of Christ's death, and denied also that the satisfaction rendered was an equivalent for the claims of justice, holding that God accepted Christ's sacrifice as sufficient. See Acceptation. On the whole, the scholastic movement left two streams of thought closely allied, yet with an sentiment of difference. One was more deeply developed, viz. the Anselmic, of the satisfaction of divine justice, absolutely considered; and that of Aquinas, that this satisfaction was relative, and also superabundant. The Romish doctrine of supereroga- tion and indulgence doubltless grew out of this.

sole ground of the remission of sin (Conciones, De Justificationes, vii, viii). The Romanists generally adopt the 'acceptation' theory of Scotus rather than that of Aquinas, and hold that the death of Christ made satisfaction only for sins before baptism, while as to sins after baptism only the eternal punishment due to them is remitted; so that, for the temporal punishment due to them, satisfaction is still required by penance and purgatory. Luther does not treat of satisfaction in so explicit a manner; he is occupied with the "representation of salvation by faith alone, though he held fast the doctrine of expiation through Christ. So, in Melancthon's Loci, and in the Augsburg Confession (A.D. 1550), the atoning work of Christ is fully stated, but under the head of justifying faith. "Men are justified gratuitously for Christ's sake through faith when they believe that they are received into favor, and that their sins are remitted on account of Christ, who made satisfaction for our transgressions by his death. This faith God imputes to us as righteousness"(Augsburg Confession, art. iv). The distinction between the active and passive obedience of Christ came later; its first clear statement in the Luther-ian Church is in the Formula of Concord (1576):
"That righteousness which is imputed to the believer simply by the grace of God is the obedience, the suffering, and the resurrection of Christ, by which he has satisfi ed the claims of the law and atoned for our sins. For as Christ is not merely man, but God and man in one person, the Lord of the law is not more exactly to his suffering and death, but also by his righteous fulfilment of the law on our behalf, is imputed to us, and God acquires us of our sins, and regards us as just in his view of his complete obedience in what he did and suffered, in life and in death" (Francke, Lib. Sym. 3,685). Nor did this distinction appear early among the Calvinists any more than among the Lutherans. Calvin joins them together (Institutes, bk. ii, § 16, 5). None of the reformed confessions distinguish between the active and passive obedience before the Formula Con-cordae Helveticae (1675); comp. Guericke, Symbolik, § 47.
The Socinians deny the vicarious atonement entirely. They assert that satisfaction and forgiveness are incompatible ideas; that the work of atonement is subjective, i.e., the repentance and moral renovation of the man; all the more so since the God needs no redeem-man. Christ suffered, not to satisfy the divine justice, but as a martyr to his truth and an example to his followers. Socinus did, however, admit that the death of Christ affords a pledge of divine forgiveness, and of man's resurrection as following Christ's (see Winer, Comp. Ditiriolunl, vili, 1; and comp. Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 268; Shedd, Hist. of Doctrines, bk. vi.).

In opposition to Socinians, Grotius wrote his Defensio fidei Cathol. de Satisfactione (1617), which forms an epoch in the history of the doctrine. He deduced the necessity of satisfaction from the administrative or regulatory justice of God, and not from his retributive justice. In his peculiar view of the expiation, it is said to be ascribed to God, not as an injured party, but as moral governor of the world. So the prerogative of substitution, in place of punishment, belongs to God as moral governor. If, by any other means than punishment, he can vindicate the claims of justice, he is at liberty, as moral governor, to use those means. The alternative, whether Christ is the sinner or just, is his Christ's voluntary offering, the sinner can be pardoned and the law vindicated. The defect of this theory lies in its not referring the work of Christ sufficiently to the nature of God, contemplating it rather in its moral aspects as an exhibition of the evil of sin. The Dutch Atchinian writers, however, while they were not to so The Methodist theology asserts the doctrine of satisfaction strongly, e.g.
Wattson: "Satisfaction [by the death of Christ] by Christ is not to be regarded as a merely fit and wise expedient of government (to which Grotius leans too much), for this may imply that it was one of many other possible expediencies. But what we have seen is that it is everywhere in Scripture represented as necessary to human salvation, and that it is to be concluded that no alternative existed but that of exchanging a righteous government for one careless and relaxed, the dishonour of the divine attributes, and the corruption of the laws of righteousness, or the upbuild-ng of such government by the personal and external punishment of every offender, or else the acceptance of the vicarious death of an infinitely dignified and glorious being, through whom pardon should be offered, and in whose hands a process for the moral resurrection of the sapped should be placed. The humiliation, suffering, and death of such a being must at once obviously demonstrate the righteous character and administration of God; and if the greatest means we can conceive was employed for this end, then we may safely conclude that the righteousness of God in the forgiveness of sin could not have been demonstrated by inferior means; and as God cannot create a righteous governor, man in that case could have had no hope"
The Arminian theology did nevertheless maintain that God is free, not necessitated as moral governor, and that the satisfaction of Christ has reference to the general justice of God, and not to his distributive justices. "The satisfaction of the death of Christ, in eminent the love of God, which is organic and eternal in him—his essential nature—as the source of redemption, and holds that the free manifestation of the divine love is under no law of necessity. Even Ebrard, one of the most eminent modern writers of the Reformed Church, sets forth as a great service rendered to theology by the Arminians (Ebrard, Lehre der stellerntreten den Genugtuung, Königsb. 1857, p. 25; compare also Warren, in Methodist Quarterly, July, 1866, 890 sq.; and, on the other side, Shedd, History of Doctrines, bk.
v, ch. v; and his Discourses and Essays, 294). Hill (Calvinist), in his Lectures on Divinity (bk. iv, ch. iii), appears to adopt the Grotian theory.

Extent of the Atonement.—One of the most important questions in the modern Church with regard to the atonement is that of its extent, viz. whether the benefits of Christ's death were intended by God to extend to the whole human race, or only to a part. The former view is maintained by the great majority of Calvinists and the latter, particular, or limited. What is called the strict school of Calvinists holds the latter doctrine, as stated in the Westminster Confession. "As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Wherefore they who are elect-being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ; are effectually called unto faith by Christ in his Spirit working in due season; are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, the justifying effectual grace, and saved, but the elect only" (ch. iii, § 6; comp. also ch. viii, §§ 5 and 8). The so-called moderate (or modern) Calvinists, the Arminians, the Church of England, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, adopt the doctrine of general or universal atonement. See CALVINISM.
The advocates of a limited atonement maintain that the death of Christ was efficaciously applied to the atonement of only a limited number of men, those for whom Christ died, and therefore excludes from its actual application, or from the intention of the author in regard to its application; that, in strictness of speech, the death of Christ is not an atonement to any until it be applied; that the sufferings of the Lamb of God are therefore truly vicarious, or, in other words, Christ was not the saviour not only of all men, but the saviour of his people, was charged with their sins, and bore the punishment of them, and thus has made a full and complete satisfaction to divine justice in behalf of all who shall ever believe on him; that this atonement will eventually be applied to all for whom in the divine image of God are made. The world, and in all of which the sovereignty has been pleased to decree its application. But they believe that although the atonement is to be properly considered as exactly commensurate with its intended application, yet that the Lord Jesus Christ did offer a sacrifice sufficient in its intrinsic value to extinguish the sins of the whole world, and that it has been the pleasure of God to apply it to everything individual, the whole human race would have been saved by its immeasurable worth. They hold, therefore, that, on the ground of the infinite value of the atonement, the offer of salvation can be consistently and sincerely made to all, and that, as a matter of fact, if they believe they shall be saved; whereas, if they wilfully reject the overtures of mercy, they will increase their guilt and aggravate their damnation.

At the same time, as they believe, the Scriptures plainly teach that the will and disposition to comply with this condition depends upon the sovereign gift of God, and that the actual compliance is secured to those only for whom, in the divine counsels, the atonement was specifically intended. The doctrine, on the other hand, that Christ died for all men, so as to make salvation attainable by all men, is maintained, first and chiefly,是因为 scriptural ground, viz. that, according to the New Testament, the means by which God's grace should be obtained were 'made for all men.' The advocates of this view ad- duce, (1.) Passages which expressly declare the doctrine. (a) Those which say that Christ died "for all men," and speak of his death as an atonement for the sins of the whole world. (b) Those which attribute an equal extent to the death of Christ as to the effects of the fall. (2.) Passages which necessarily imply the doctrine, viz.: (c) Those which declare that Christ died not only for those that are saved, but for those who do or may perish. (d) Those which make it the duty of men to believe the Gospel, and place them under guilt and the penalty of death for rejecting it. (e) Those in which men's failure to obtain salvation is placed to the account of their own opposing wills, and made wholly their own fault. (f) See the argument in full, on the Armenian side, in Watson, Theod. Institutes, ii, 264 sq.; Storr and Flatt, Bibl. Theol. qv. lv. iv. pt. ii; Brewer, Works, ii, 63 et al. The Armenian doc- trine is that Christ's death was intended (impetrvatur) for all men by his death reconciliation and the forgiveness of sins, but upon this condition, that none actually possess and enjoy this forgiveness of sins except believers." (Acta Synod. Reman. pt. ii, p. 280; Nicholls, Arminians and Calvinists, p. 114 sqq.)

The doctrine is supported (e. g., Amory, q. v.) that Calvin himself held to general redemption; and certainly his language in his Comm. in Job, iii, 15, 16, and in 1 Tim. iii, 5, seems fairly to assert the doctrine. Comp. Fletcher, Works (N. Y. ed. ii, 71); but see also Cunningham, The Reformers (Essay viii). As to the variations of the Calvinistic confessions, see Hagen, History of Arminianism. In the Federal Church, the divines of Saumur, Camero, Amy- raldus, and Placeeus maintained universal grace (see the articles on these names). The English divines who attended the Synod of Dort (Hall, Hailes, Deuivants) all advocated general atonement, in which they were followed by Baxter (Universal Redemption; Methodus Theologic; Orna, Life of Baxter, ii, 64). The most able advocate of universal grace in the 17th century was John Goodwin, Redemption Redeemed, 1650 (see Jackson, Life of Goodwin, 1828).

On the other hand, Owen, the so-called strict Cal- vinists of England, and the Old School Presbyterians of the Church in Scotland, adhering to the Westminster Confes- sion, interpreting it as maintaining limited atonement, their doctrine on the whole subject in substance is, that the atonement was made and intended only for the elect; and that its necessity with respect to them arose out of the eternal justice of God, which required that every individual should receive his desert; and, consequently, that the sufferings of Christ, and the endurance of punishment equivalent in amount of suffering, if not identical in nature (as Owen main- tains) with that to which the elect were exposed; and, moreover, that the meritorious obedience of Christ in fulfilling the law imputes a righteousness to those for whom the atonement secured salvation, and so gives them a claim to the reward of righteousness in ever- lasting life. The differences of view in the two divi- sions of the Presbyterian Church in America are thus stated by Dr. Duffield: "Old-School Presbyterians regard the satisfaction rendered to the justice of God by the obedience of Christ as having been given, not on the basis of principles of justice recognized among men in strict judicial procedures. While they concede that there is grace on the part of God in its application to the believer, inasmuch as he has provided in Christ a substitute for him, they nevertheless insist that he is pardoned and justified of God as judge, and as matter of right and strict justice in the eye of the law, inasmuch as his claims against him have all been met and satisfied by his surity. The obligations in the Lord having been discharged by his security, the judge, according to this view, is bound to give sentence of release and acquittal to the original failing party, the church, and the grace shown in the act of Christ's grace. Their ideas of the nature of the divine justice, exercised in the pardon and justification of the sinner because of the righteousness of Christ, are all taken from the transactions of a court of law. New-School Pres- byterians, equally with the Old, concede the grace of God in the substitution of Christ, the whole work of his redemption to be the development of 'the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Jesus Christ'; but they prefer to regard and speak of the atonement of Christ, his obedience and death, by which he satisfied the justice of God for our sins, as the great expedient and governmental proced- ure adopted by the great God of heaven and of earth in his character of chief executive, the governor of the universe, in order to magnify his law and make it honorable, rather than as a juridical plea to obtain a sentence in court for discharging an accused party on trial!" (Bibliotheca Sacra, xx, 016)

The doctrine has been upheld by Pye Smith, and other so-called moderate Calvinists in England, and of many in America, is in substance that the atonement consists in "that satisfaction for sin which was rendered to God as moral governor of the world by the obedience unto death of his son Jesus Christ. This satisfaction is the satisfaction of the atonement, the saving authority of the moral gov- ernment of God, and yet enables him to forgive sinners. That this forgiveness could not be given by God without atonement constitutes its necessity. The entire contents of Christ's earthly existence, embracing both his active and passive obedience—a distinction which is unsupported by the Word of God—must be regarded as contributing to the atonement which he made. As to the 'extent' of the atonement, there is a broad distinction to be made between the sufficien- cy of the atonement and its efficiency. It may be true that Jehovah did not intend to exercise that influence of the Holy Spirit upon all which is necessary to re- cure the salvation of any one soul, but he intended it to be the means of basis of moral government, it was necessary that it should be one of infinite worth, and so in itself adequate to the salvation of all." In New England the younger Edwards (+ 1801) modified the Calvinistic doctrine of the atonement, representing it, as the Arminians do, as a satisfaction to the general justice of God, and not as the basis of particular redemption. Among American Calvinistic divines Dr. D. E. Griff- fin holds a very high place. His 'Humble Attempts to reconcile the Differences of Christiana' was repub- lished by Dr. E. A. Park in 1850, in a volume of essays on the atonement by eminent New England divines. A summary of it is given in the Bibliotheca Sacra for Jan, 1858, and is noticed in the Methodist Quarterly, p. 311. It was held that the atonement was not a literal suffering of the penalty, nor a literal satisfaction of the distributive justice of God, nor a literal removal of our desert of eternal death, nor a literal surp attendance of Christ’s meritorious personal obedience becoming our imputed obedience. On the other hand, the atonement was a divine method by which the moral suffering of the penalty might be dispensed with, by which government could be sustained and honored without inflicting distributive justice, by which the acceptors of the work might be saved without the removal of their intrinsic desert of hell; and all this without imputing Christ’s personal obedience as our personal obedience, but by Christ obtaining a meritorious right to save us, as his own exceeding great reward from God.” The article in the Bibliotheca Sacra contains a valuable sketch of the rise of the “Edwardsian theory of the atonement,” and sums up that theory itself as follows: “1. Our Lord suffered, not in the strict sense of a penalty of the law, and may be called punishment in the moral sense of that word, but were not strictly and literally, the penalty which the law had threatened. The sufferings of our Lord satisfied the general justice of God, but did not satisfy his distributive justice. 2. The humiliation, pains, and death of all mankind was considered as the equivalent of the moral punishment threatened in the moral law, and thus they satisfied Him who is determined to maintain the honor of this law, but they did not satisfy the demands of the law itself for our punishment. 3. The active obedience, viewed as the holiness of Christ, was honor- able to the law, but was not a work of supererogation performed by our substitute, and therefore not imputed to us, so as to satisfy the requisitions of the law for our own active obedience. The last three statements are sometimes comprehended in the more general proposition that the atonement was equal, in the meaning and spirit of it, to the payment of our debts; but it was not literally the payment of either our debt of obedience or our debt of punishment, or any other debt which we owed to law or distributive justice. Therefore, 5. The law and the distributive justice of God, although honored by the life and death of Christ, will yet eternally demand the punishment of sin as acknowledged. 6. Our substitute not only satisfied it consistent and desirable for God to save all who exercise evangelical faith, yet it did not render it obligatory in him, in distributive justice, to save them. 7. The atonement was designed for the welfare of all men, to make the eternal salvation of all men possible, to remove all the obstacles which the honor of the law and of distributive justice presented against the salvation of the non-elect as well as the elect. 8. The atonement does not constitute the reason why some men are regenerated and others not, but this reason is found only in the sovereign, electing will of God.”

As to minor forms of opinion we must be very brief. The orthodox Quakers adopt the doctrine of the atonement, but not the distributive justice of satisfaction; thus W. Penn: “We cannot say the sufferings and death of Christ were a strict and rigid satisfaction for that eternal death and misery due to man for sin and transgression. As Christ died for sin, so we must die to sin, or we cannot be saved by the death and sufferings of Christ.”

Barclay in his Great Redeemer says: “Christ death was to avert the curse of the Law, not the body of Christ upon the cross, the other wrath in man by the spirit of Christ (Apol. Thes. vii, 8). Zinzendorf and the Moravians made the doctrine of atonement, in its more internal connection with the Christian life, the essence of Christianity, but at the same time gave to it a certain sensuous aspect. On mystical grounds, the doctrine of atonement was greatly supported by Swedenborg. Kant assigned to the death of Christ only a symbolico-moral significance: “Man must, after all, deliver himself. A substitution, in the proper sense of the word, cannot take place; moral liabilities are not transmissible like debts. The sinner who reforms suffers, as does the innocent; but the former suffers willingly for the sake of virtue. Now what takes place internally in the repentant sinner takes place in Christ, as the personification of the idea of suffering for sin. In the death which he suffered once for all, he represents for all mankind a grudge against God which was forgiven for the sake of humanity when the old man is dying” (Religio immanis d. Gereas d. blumen Versamin, p. 87, cited by Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, § 380). The Rationalists of Germany lost sight even of the symbolical in the merely moral, but De Wette made the symbolical more prominent. Schleiermacher represented the sufferings of Christ as an analogy to the repentant man, but with a spiritual meaning in his obedience and his obedience as making satisfaction, but not as vicarious. He held that “the redeeming and atoning principle is not the single fact that Christ died, but the vital union of man with Christ. By means of this vital union, man appropriates the righteousness of Christ” (Schleiermacher, Christ, Glanz, ii, 108, 129, cited by Hagenbach, l. c.). The Hegelian speculative school of German theology regards the death of the God-man as “the cessation of being another (Anheben des Andersseins), and the necessary return of the life of God, which had assumed a finite form, into the sphere of the infinite.” Some of the strict supernaturalists (op. cit.) find fault with the theory of Anselm, and endeavor to substitute for it one which they regard as more scriptural; and in 1856, even among the strict Lutherans of Germany, a controversy arose on this doctrine which is at present (1868) not yet ended; Prof. Hofmann, in Erlangen, rejects the idea of vicarious redemption; the view of vicarious redemption is championed by Prof. Philip and others. Schneider, in Stud. u. Kir. Sept. 1860, shows clearly that Anselm’s doctrine is that of the Lutheran as well as of the Reformed Church, in opposition to Hofmann, who maintains that his view accords with the church doctrine as well as with Scripture. See also Smith’s Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 380, and the references there given. The modern Unitarian view may perhaps be safely gathered, in its best form, from the following statement of one of its ablest writers: “There is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus.” This can only refer to unirrediated pre-eminence, not to exalted finite. For according to Butler, another mediator is a necessity, between their lost gifted fellow-creatures and the great realities of the invisible world. This ‘one’ is a human mediator, the man Christ Jesus; not a being from another sphere, an angel, or a God, but a brother from the bosom of our own human family. This man is God and man, who is transfigured in the fullness of God’s offers and will hearken to his voice. He brings from God a general summons to repent, and with that he conveys, through faith, a spiritual power to shake off the bondage of sin, and put on the freedom of a new heart and a new life. He is a deliverer from the power of sin and death, the mediator. This is the redemption of which he paid the price. His death, cheerfully met in the inevitable sequence of faithful duty, was only one among many links in the chain of instrumentalties by which that deliverance was effected. It was a proof such as could be given in no other way of trust in God and immortality, of fidelity to God and of love for mankind. But to those who earnestly contemplated it and saw all that it implied, it awoke a tender response of gratitude and confidence which softened the obdurate heart, and opened it to serious impressions and the quickening influences of a religious spirit" (Taylor, Christian Asspiration). The semi-infidelity which has recently sprung up in high places in the Church of England, so far as it refers to the atonement, may be represented by Jowett as follows: "The only sacrifice, atonement, or satisfaction with which the Christian has to do is a moral and spiritual one; not the pouring out of blood upon the earth, but the living sacrifice 'to do thy will, O God,' in which the believer has part as well as his Lord; about the meaning of which there can be no more question in our day than there was in the first ages." "Heathen and Jewish sacrifices rather show us what the sacrifice of Christ was not, than what it was. It is an endless and unendurable bar, a comparative expression of that want in human nature which has received satisfaction in him only. Men are afraid of something; they wish to give away something; they feel themselves bound by something; the fear is done away, the gift offered, the obligation fulfilled in Christ. Such fears and desires can no more occupy the Christian man's life than his sins or his sorrows. These are at the end of the old world, and at the beginning of a new one. The work of Christ is set forth in Scripture under many different figures, lest we should rest in one only. His death, for instance, is described as a ransom. He will set the captives free. Ransom is deliverance to the captive. 'Whosoever com-mitteth sin is the servant of sin.' Christ delivers from sin. 'If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed.' To whom? for what was the ransom paid? Are questions about which Scripture is silent, to which reason refuses to answer" (Jowett, On st. Paul's Epista-es, ii, 568). See also Essays and Reviews; Replies to Essays and Reviews; Aids to Faith (all reprinted in New York).

Maurice (Theological Essays; Doctrine of Sacrifice; Tracta for Priests and People) is uncertain and obscure in this, as in other points of theology (see Rigg, Anglican Theol; and Bibliotheca Sacra, 1865, 609). The so-called Broad School, in the Church of England, and the modem French and German School of the meaning except as a moral illustration or example. Dr. Bushnell (of Hartford) has set forth some of the old heresies in very attractive style in his God in Christ (1849), and Vicious Sacrifice (1860). In the former work he distinguishes three forms of the doctrine of atonement—"the Protestant form, which takes the ritualistic (objective) side of the Gospel, but turns it into a human dogma; the speculative, or philosophical form, identifying atonement with reconciliation of men unto God, one of the varieties of which is the Unitarian doctrine, which 'pumps out' the contents of these holy forms; and the Romish form, which pan-erizes it, and makes all mankind of every rank and condition participate in it by dealing with blood as a real and mir-cular entity." In the later work he makes "the sacrifice and cross of Christ his simple duty, and not any superlative, optional kind of good, outside of all the common principles of virtue. . . . It is only just as it is, and not a thing that required it to be." He holds that Christ did not satisfy, by his own suffering, the violated justice of God. Christ did not come to the world to die, but died simply because he was there; there was nothing penal in the agony and the cross; the importance of the physical sufferings of Christ to the theistic principle is that the word is true in what they express or morally signify; Christ is not a ground, but a power of justification; and the Hebrew sacrifices were not types of Christ to them who worshiped in them, but were only necessary as types of Christian language (see Methodist Quarterly, Jan. 1861, p. 124; American Presby. Review, Jan. 1861, p. 11). Ad蹻m and Eve (1861, p. 146) is a criticism by a man who had the typical character of those who earnestly contemplated it and saw all that it implied, but who did so in an apparently other way. The idea of atonement is given by Schultz, Begriff d. vermittelnden Leidsen (Bassel, 1861). See also N. S. Rev, June, 1867, art. iii.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF (םַחֲרָתָו תָּהוֹא), yom ha-Kodesh, day of the expiations: See Sept. εἰρήνη θιλαγμοῦ. V. the place of atonement or the day of expiation. The Jewish day of annual expiation for national sin. In the Talmud this day is called יִמְּרוֹת תָּהוֹא, great fasting, and so in Philo, νυρσίας ἱερικής (Lib. de Sept. v. 47, ed. Tauch.). and in Acts xxvii, 9, ὕπερσια. The Talmudic writers, however, often designate it merely as יִמְּרוֹת, the day; a circumstance which has suggested to some commentators the notion that by ἱερική (Heb. vii, 27) the apostle intended this atonement day. Though perhaps originally meant as a temporary day of expiation for the sin of the golden calf (as some would infer from Exod. xxxiii, 3), yet it was permanently instituted by Moses as a day of atonement for sins in general; indeed, it was the great day of national humiliation, and the only one commanded in the Mosaic law, though the later Jews, in commemoration of some disastrous events, especially those incurred at and after the destruction of the two temples, instituted a few more fast days, which they observed with scarcely less rigor and strictness than the one ordained by Moses for the purpose of general absolution (Hotzing, Solen, expiationum dic., Tifer. 1794). See Fast.

In the Talmud it is kept on the 9th of Tishri, that is, from the evening of the ninth to the evening of the tenth of that month, five days before the Feast of Tabernacles. See Festival. This would correspond to the early part of October. See Calendar (Jewish). This great fast, like all others among the Jews, commenced at sunset of the previous day, and lasted twenty-four hours, that is, from sunset to sunset, or, as the rabbins will have it, until three stars were visible in the horizon.—Kitto, s. v. See Day.

II. Commemorative Signification.—Some have inferred from Lev. vi, 1, that the day was instituted on account of the sin and punishment of Nadab and Abihu. Maimonides (More Nechemiah, xviii) regards it as a commemoration of the day on which Moses came down from the mount with the second tables of the law, and proclaimed to the people the forgiveness of their great sin in worshiping the golden calf (q. v.).

III. Scriptural Prescriptions respecting it.—The mode of its observance is described in Lev. xvi, where it should be noticed that in v. 3 to 10 an outline of the whole ceremonial is given, while in the rest of the chapter certain points are mentioned with more details. The victims which were offered, in addition to those strictly belonging to the special service of the day, and to those of the usual daily sacrifice, are enumerated in Num. xxix, 7-11; and the conduct of the people is emphatically enjoined in Lev. xxiii, 26-32. The ceremonies were of a very laborious character, especially for the high-priest, who had to prepare himself during the previous seven days in nearly solitary confinement for the peculiar services that awaited him on the day, arising from all that could render him unclean, or disturb his devotions. It was kept by the people as a solemn sabbath. They were commanded to set aside all work and "to afflict their souls," under pain of being "cut off from among the people." It was on this occasion only that the high-priest was permitted to enter the Holy of Holies.

1. Having bathed his person and dressed himself entirely in the holy white linen garments, he brought forward a young bullock for a sin-offering and a ram for a burnt-offering, purchased at his own cost, on account of himself and his family, and two young goats for a sin-offering and a ram for a burnt-offering, which were paid for out of the public treasury, on account of the people. He then presented the two goats before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle and cast lots upon them. On one lot the word מִנְּחָה (i.e. for Jerubbaal) was inscribed, and on the other מִנְּחָה (i.e. for Azazel). He next sacrificed the young bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his family. Taking with him some of the blood of the bullock, he filled a censer with burning coals from the brazen altar, took a handful of incense, and entered into the most holy place. He then threw the incense upon the coals and enveloped the mercy-seat in a cloud of smoke. Then, dipping his finger into the blood, he sprinkled it seven times before the mercy-seat, eastward. (See Lev. xvi, 14. The English version, "upon the mercy-seat," seems to go beyond the expression of the Septuagint, εἰρήνη, ἱερική. [Drusius in loc. in the Critici Sacri.] It has, however, the support of Ewald's authority. The Vulgate omits the clause; the Sept. follows the ambiguity of the Hebrew. The word eastward must mean either the direction in which the drops were thrown by the priest, or else on the east side of the ark, i.e. the side toward the veil. The last clause of the verse may be taken as a repetition of the command, for the sake of emphasis on the number of sprinklings: "And he shall take of the blood of the bullock and sprinkle it before the mercy-seat, on the east; and seven times shall he sprinkle the blood with his finger before the mercy-seat." The word which the Lord on whom the lot had fallen was then slain, and the high-priest sprinkled its blood before the mercy-seat in the same manner as he had done that of the bullock. Going out from the Holy of Holies, he purified the holy place, sprinkling some of the blood of both the victims on the altar of incense. (That the altar of incense was thus purified on the day of atonement we learn expressly from Ex. xxx. 10. Most critics consider that this is what is spoken of in Lev. xvi, 18 and 20. But some suppose that it is the altar of burnt-offerings which is referred to in those verses, the purification of the altar of incense being implied in that of the holy place mentioned in ver. 16. Aben Ezra was of this opinion [See Drusius in loc.]. That the expression "before the Lord" does not necessarily mean within the tabernacle, is evident from Ex. xxix, 11. If the golden altar is here referred to, it seems remarkable that no mention is made in the ritual of the cleansing of the brazen altar. But perhaps the practice spoken of by Josephus and in the Mishna of pouring what remained of the mixed blood at the foot of the large altar was an ancient one, and was regarded as its purification.) At this time no one besides the high-priest was permitted to be present in the holy place. The purification of the Holy of Holies, and of the holy place, being thus completed, the high-priest laid his hands upon the head of the goat on which the lot "for Azazel" had fallen, and confessed over it all the sins of the people. The goat was then led, by a man chosen for the purpose, into the wilderness, into "a land not inhabited," and was there let loose.

2. The high-priest after this returned into the holy place, bathed himself again, put on his usual garments of office, and offered the two rams as burnt-offerings, one for himself and one for the people. He also burnt upon the altar the fat of the two sin-offerings, while their flesh was carried away and burned outside the camp. Those who took away the flesh and the man who had done this, went away naked and clean, and washed their clothes as soon as their service was performed.

The accessory burnt-offerings mentioned Num. xxix, 7-11, were a young bullock, a ram, seven lambs, and a young goat. It would seem that (at least in the time of the second Temple) these were offered by the high-priest at the evening sacrifice (see below, V. 7).—Smith, s. v.

8. The ceremonies of worship peculiar to this day alone (besides those which are common to it with all other days) were: (1) That the high-priest, in a simples dress, confessed his own sins and those of his family, for the expiation of which he offered a bullock, on which he burnt part of; (2) the high-priest sprinkle the blood of which was by lot sacrificed to Jehovah, while the other (Azazel), which was determined by lot to be set at liberty, was sent to the desert burdened with the sins of the people. (3.) On this day, also, the high-priest gave his blessing to the whole nation; and the remainder of the day was spent in prayers and other works of penance. It may be seen that in the special rites of the Day of Atonement there is a natural gradation. In the first place, the high-priest and his family are cleansed; then atonement is made by the purified priest for the sanctuary and all contained in it; then, if the view to which reference has been made be correct) for the haman alphabet in the court and, lastly, reconciliation is made for the people. — Kitto, s. v.

See SIX-OFFERING.

IV. Statement of Josephus.—In the short account of the ritual of the day which is given by this Jewish writer in one passage (Ant. iii, 10, 3), there are a few particulars which are worthy of notice. His words, of course, apply to the practice in the second Temple, when the ark of the covenant had disappeared. He states that the high-priest sprinkled the blood with his finger seven times on the ceiling and seven times on the floor of the most holy place, and seven times toward it (as it would appear, outside the wall), and round about it. Then he either sprinkled or poured the blood round the great altar. He also informs us that along with the fat, the kidneys, the top of the liver, and the extremities (ai ἑνόμα) of the victims were burned.

V. Rabbinical Details.—The treatise of the Mishna, entitled Yoma, professes to give a full account of the observances of the day according to the usage in the second Temple. The following particulars appear either to be interesting in themselves, or to illustrate the language of the Pentateuch.

1. The high-priest himself, dressed in his colored official garments, used, on the Day of Atonement, to perform all the duties of the ordinary daily service, such as lighting the lamps, presenting the daily sacrifices, and offering the incense. After this he bathed himself, put on the white garments, and commenced the special rites of the day. There is nothing in the Old Testament to render it improbable that this was the scene.

2. The high-priest went into the Holy of Holies four times in the course of the day: first, with the censer and incense, while a priest continued to agitate the blood of the bullock lest it should congeal; secondly, with the blood of the bullock; thirdly, with the blood of the goat; fourthly, after having offered the evening sacrifice, to fetch out the censer and the plate which had contained the incense. These four entrances, forming, as they do, parts of the one great annual rite, are not opposed to a reasonable view of the statement in Heb. ix. 7 (where the apostle tells us that the high-priest entered only once on that day, showing that the veil, not iron, may refer to the one day in the year when such a service alone took place), and that in Josephus (War, v, 5, 7). Three of the entrances seem to be very distinctly implied in Lev. xvi, 12, 14, and 15.

3. It is said that the blood of the bullock and that of the goat were each sprinkled seven times toward the ceiling, and seven times on the floor. This does not agree with the words of Josephus (see above, IV).

4. After he had gone into the most holy place the third time, and had returned into the holy place, the high-priest sprinkled the blood of the bullock eight times on the wall and did pour with both the blood of the goat. Having mingled the blood of the two victims together and sprinkled the altar of incense with the mixture, he came into the court and poured out what remained at the foot of the altar of burnt-offering.

5. Most careful directions are given for the preparation of the high-priest for the services of the day. For seven days previously he kept away from his own house and dwelt in a chamber appointed for his use. This was to avoid the accidental causes of pollution which he might meet with in his domestic life. But, to provide for the possibility of his incurring some uncleanness in spite of this precaution, a deputy was chosen who might act for him when the day came. In the treatise of the Mishna entitled "Pirke Aboth," it is stated that no such mischance ever befell the high-priest.

But Josephus (Ant. xvii, 6, 4) relates an instance of the high-priest Matthias, in the time of Herod the Great, when his relation Joseph, took his place in the sacred office. During the whole of the seven days the high-priest had to perform the ordinary sacred duties of the daily service himself, as well as on the Day of Atonement. On the third day and on the seventh he was sprinkled with the ashes of the red heifer, in order to cleanse him in the event of his having touched a dead body without knowing it. On the seventh day he was also required to take a solemn oath before the elders that he would alter nothing whatever in the accustomed rites of the Day of Atonement. (This, according to the "Jerusalem Gemara" on Yoma [quoted by Lightfoot], was instituted as a consequence of an action by the Sanhedrim, whereby they directed the high-priest to throw the incense upon the censer outside the wall, and to carry it, smoking, into the Holy of Holies.)

6. Several curious particulars are stated regarding the scape-goat. The two goats of the sin-offering were to be of similar age and value. The lots were originally of boxwood, but in later times they were of gold. They were put into a little box or urn, into which the high-priest put both his hands and took out a lot in each, while the two goats stood before him, one at the right side and the other on the left. The lot in each hand belonged to the goat in the correspond ing position; and when the lot "for Azazel" happened to be in the right hand, it was regarded as a good omen. The high-priest then tied a piece of scarlet cloth on the scape-goat’s head, called "the scarlet tongue" from the shape in which it was cut. Malmonides says that this was only to distinguish him, in order that he might be known when he was sent away; for him to be sent away. But in the Gemara it is asserted that the red cloth ought to turn white, as a token of God’s acceptance of the atonement of the day, referring to Isa. 1, 18. A particular instance of such a change, when also the lot "for Azazel" was in the priest’s right hand, is related as having occurred in the time of Simon the Just. It is farther stated that no such change took place for forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem. The prayer which the high-priest uttered over the head of the goat was as follows: "O Lord, the house of Israel, thy people, have trespassed, rebelled, and sinned before thee. I beseech thee, O Lord, forgive thy people, Ibeseech thee, O Lord, forgive thy people, for which the people have committed, as it is written in the law of Moses, thy servant, saying that in that day there shall be 'an atonement for you to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord'" (Gemara on Yoma, quoted by Frischmuth). The goat was then goaded and rudely treated by the people, and driven away on the day by the manner of death as soon as it reached a certain spot, which seems to have been regarded as the commencement of the wilderness, a signal was made by some sort of telegraphic contrivance to the high-priest, who waited for it. The man who led the goat is said to have taken him to the top of a hill and there burnt the goat, and did not pour with both the blood of the goat. If this was not a mistake of the writer of Yoma, it must have been, as Spencer argues, a modern innovation. It cannot be doubted that the goat was originally set free. Even if there be any uncertainty in the words of the Hebrew, the explicit rendering of the Sept. must be better authority than the Talmud (cf. v. εξαστηλλων των χηρων των δεσιματων εις αυτον κ. τ. λ. Lev. xvi, 26).

7. The high-priest, as soon as he had received the signal that the goat had reached the wilderness, read around, according to the law, and offered the prayer. He then bathed himself, resumed his colored garments, and offered either the whole or a great part of the necessary offering (mentioned Num. xxxix, 7-11) with the regular evening sacrifice. After this he washed again, put on the white garments, and entered the most holy place for the fourth time, to fetch one of the censers and the incense-plate. This terminated the special rites of the day.

8. The Mishna gives very strict rules for the fasting of the people. In the law itself no express mention is made of abstinence from food; but it is most likely implied in the command that the people were "to afflict their souls." According to Yoma, every Jew (except invalids, and children under thirteen years of age), is forbidden to eat anything so large as a date, to drink, or to wash from sunset to sunset.—Smith, s. v.

VI. On the Scope-got, see Azael.

VII. Modern Observance of the Day.—The day previous to the day of expiation, the strict class of Jews provide a cock, which they send to an inferior goat to be slain; the person whose property it is then takes the fowl by the wings, and with uplifted hands swings it nine times over the heads of himself and his company, and at the same time prays to God that the sins they have been guilty of during the year may enter into the fowl. This cock, which they call קָּרָבְנָּם (pardon, atonement), seems to be substituted for the scape-got of old. They then take the fowl and give it to the poor to eat, with a donation according to their means. On the 9th, or 10th, day after the week of purification, the first day of the new moon, or before the synagogue service, they partake of a sumptuous feast, which they call taking their fast, after which they go to the synagogue. In the great synagogue in London, the clerk stands up in the midst, where a large stage is erected for the accommodation of the singers, who chant the customary prayers. The clerk offers up a prayer toward the offering. Every man, according to his capacity (but it is not compulsory), gives a sum, which is offered up, and inserted in a book kept for that purpose. Most of the Jews endeavor on this occasion to provide themselves with the best apparel, as they say they appear before the great king. The congregation, after the prayer, breaks up and the congregation, after the prayer, breaks up and the gates of the temple are closed, and the service is ended on the ninth eve, those who return home to their dwellings come again in the morning at five o'clock, and continue until dark, observing the following order: First are said the morning prayers, which commence as soon as they come to the synagogue. After saying the usual prayers and supplications peculiar to the day, they then take forth the Law, and read the portion Lev. xvi; the מְפָרַת (a certain portion of the Law so named by the Jews) is Num. xxix, 7-11; the portion from the prophets from Isa. lvii, 14, to the end of chap. lviii. Then they say the prayer for the prosperity of the government under which they dwell, and then the penitential prayer which ends the morning prayer, after having continued for six hours without intermission. They next say the prayer of the masorah (i. e. "addition"), which makes mention of the additional sacrifice of the day (Num. xxix, 7), and supplicates the Almighty to be propitious to them. They finally say the offering of the day from Num. xxxix, 7-27. They abstain from food altogether during the day. For many more ceremonies observed among the present Jews on the Day of Atonement, see Picart, Vénerommes et Coutumes Religieuses, etc. t. 1, c. 6, p. 19.

VIII. Observance of the Entire Observance.—As it might be supposed, the Talmudists miserably degraded the meaning of the Day of Atonement. They regarded it as an opportunity afforded them of wiping off the score of their more heavy offenses. Thus Yoma (cap. vii) says, "The day of atonement and death make atonement through penitence. Penitence of sins makes atonement for intemperance, and in the case of grosser sins it obtains a respite until the coming of the Day of Atonement, which completes the reconciliation." More authorities to the same general purpose are quoted by Frischmuth. (p. 917), of which some seem also to indicate that the peculiar atoning virtue of the day was supposed to rest in the scape-goat. Philo (Lib. de Speculnario) regarded the day in a far nobler light. He speaks of it as an occasion for the discipline of self-restraint in regard to bodily indulgence, and for bringing home to our minds the truth that man does not live by bread alone, but by whatever God pleased to appoint. The prayers proper for the day, he says, are those for for the sins past and for amendment of life in future, to be offered in dependence, not on our own merits, but on the goodness of God. It cannot be doubted that what especially distinguished the symbolical expiation of this day from that of the other services of the law was its broad and national character, with perhaps a deeper reference to the sin which belongs to the nature of man. Ewald instructively remarks that, though the least uncleanness of an individual might be atoned by the rites of the law which could be observed at other times, there was a consciousness of secret and indefinite sin pervading the congregation at every service, and this great annual fast. Hence, in its national character, he sees an antithesis between it and the Passover, the great festival of social life; and in its atoning significance, he regards it as a fit preparation for the rejoicing at the ingathering of the fruits of the earth in the Feast of Tabernacles. Philo looked upon its position in the Jewish calendar in the same light.

In considering the meaning of the particular rites of the day, three points appear to be of a very distinctive character: 1. The white garments of the high-priest. 2. His entrance into the Holy of Holies. 3. The scape-goat. The writer which was applied by this great annual fast. Hence, in its national character, he sees an antithesis between it and the Passover, the great festival of social life; and in its atoning significance, he regards it as a fit preparation for the rejoicing at the ingathering of the fruits of the earth in the Feast of Tabernacles. part of the rite for the purification of the leper [Lev. xiv. 6, 7], in which a live bird was set free, it must be evident that the bird signified the carrying away of the uncleanness of the sufferer in precisely the same manner.) If we keep in view that the two goats are spoken of as parts of one and the same sin-offering, and that every circumstance connected with them apppears to have been carefully arranged to bring them under the same conditions up to the time of the casting of the lots, we shall not have much difficulty in seeing that they form together but one symbolical expression.

Why there were two individuals instead of one may be simply this—that a single material object could not, in its nature, symbolically embrace the whole of the truth which was to be expressed. This is implied in the reasoning of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews on the office and sacrifice of Christ (Heb. x. 12). Hence some, regarding each goat as a type of Christ, supposed that the one which was slain represented his death, and that the goat sent forth his resurrection (Cyril, Bochart, and others, quoted by Spencer).

But we shall take a simpler, and perhaps a truer view, if we consider the one slain goat to be the same as the act of sacrifice, in giving up its own life for others to "Jehovah," in accordance with the requirements of the divine law; and the goat which carried off its load of sin to an utter distance as signifying the cleansing influence of faith in that sacrifice. Thus, in his degree, the devout Israelite might have felt the truth of the Psalmist’s words: "As far as the east is from the west," so far hath he removed our transgressions from us."

But for us the whole spiritual truth has been revealed in historical fact in the life, death, and resurrection of him who was made sin for us, who died for us, and who rose again for our justification. This Mediator it was who took on himself "in some unsearchable manner, unite death and life." (Maurice, On Sacrifice, p. 86.

Atrium. In ancient churches, between the first porch, called the propyleum, or vestibulum magnum, and the nave itself, was a large square or oblong plot of ground, which the Latin called atrium implemi-um, because it was a court open to the air without any covering. It was surrounded by cloisters. In this place stood the first class of penitents, according to Eusebius, who says it was the mansion of those who were not allowed to enter farther into the church.

The church itself is, in the language of this prayer, the "friend of the faithful."—Bingham, Orig. Ecc. bk. viii, ch. iii, § 6;

A‘troth (Num. xxxiii, 65). See ATAROTH.

A“t“‰ (Heb. At“‰, νηφελογομα, perhaps oportunum, comp. itat), the name of three men.
1. (Sept. 11323i v. r. 132i.) A son of the daughter of Sheshan (of the tribe of Judah) by his Egyptian servant Jaddah, and the father of Nathan I (Chron. ii,

2. (Sept. 1323i v. r. 1i3i.) The sixth of David’s mighty men from the tribe of Gad during his freebooter’s life in the desert of Judaea (1 Chron. xii, 11).
B.C. cir. 1061.

3. (Sept. 11323i v. r. 1i3i.) The second of the four sons of King Rehoboam, by his second and favorite wife Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom (2 Chron.

Attalus (Ἀτταλός), a maritime city of Pamphylia (near Lycia, to which it is assigned by Stephen of Byzantium), in Asia Minor, near the mouth of the river Castractes (see Wesseling, ad Antionius, Hist. p.
570, 670). It derived its name from its founder, Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus (Strabo, xiv, 657), who ruled over the western part of the peninsula from the north to the south, and was in want of a port which should be useful for the trade of Egypt and Syria, as Trosa was for that of the Egean. All its remains are characteristic of the date of its foundation. It was visited by Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey, before the place from which they set out on their return to Antioch from their journey into the inland parts of Asia Minor (Acts xiv, 25). It does not appear that they made any stay, or attempted to preach the Gospel in Attalia (see Conybeare and Howson’s St.
Paul, i, 200). This city, however, though comparatively modern at that time, was a place of considerable importance in the first century. Its name in the twelfth century appears to have been Satalia, a corruption, of which the crusading chronicler, William of Tyre, gives a curious explanation. It still exists under the name of Adalia (Büsching, Erdeboer, xi, 1, 121), and extensive and important ruins attest the former consequence of the city (Leake’s Asia Minor, p.
138). This place stands on the west of the Castractes, where Strabo (xiv, 4) places it; Ptolomy, however (v, 5, 2), places the ancient city on the east of the river, on which accounts Admiral Beaufort (Karamnia, p. 135) held the present Larra to be the representative of the ancient city. A second name of modern Adalite (or Satolite) may be the site of the ancient Olbia, which Mannert (Gree. vi, 130) thought to be the same with Attalia (see Forbiger, Alt Ergoer. ii, 268); but Spratt and Forbes (Ly-cia, i, 217) have found the remains of Olbia farther west, and it is therefore probable that the bed of the Castractes changed at different times (see Smith’s Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.)

A“t“‰ (Ἀταλός), a Macedonian name of uncertain signification, a king of Pergamus in the time of the Jewish prince Simon (1 Macc. xi, 22), and,
as would appear from the connected circumstances, about B.C. 139; a closer determination of the date depends upon the year of the consul Lucius (q. v.), named in the same connection (ver. 16), which is itself doubtful.

As Attalus was the name of three kings of Pergamus who reigned respectively B.C. 241–197, 195–168 (Phil-adelphus), 188–138 (Philometor), and were all faithful allies of the Romans (Liv. xiv, 18), it is uncertain whether the letters sent from Rome in favor of the Jews (1 Macc. xx, 22) were addressed to Attalus II (Polyb. xx, 6; xxxi, 9; xxxii, 5, 6, 6 sq.; Inst. ii, 4, xxxvi, 4; App. ii, 4, 22 sq.), who is called the "friend of the Roman people" (Strabo, xiii, p. 624), or Attalus III (Philometor), the nephew and successor of Attalus II, and son of Eumenes II, who ascended the throne B.C. 188, and by whose testament the kingdom of Pergamus passed over (B.C. 185) into the hands of his brother (Justin, xxxvi, 4; Euseb.
Hist. ix, 20; Strabo, xiii, 624). Josephus quotes a decree of the Pergamene in favor of the Jews (Ad. iv, 10, 22) in the time of Hyrcanus, about B.C. 112 (comp. Rev. ii, 12-17).—Smith, s. v.

Attendant Genius. See Guardian Angel.

Attorney. Francis, bishop of Rochester, was born March 6th, 1662, at Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire, his father was Reeve. See Attentor, Lewish, below. He began his studies at Westminster, and finished his course at Christ Church, Oxford. He first distinguished himself by the publication, at Oxford, in 1687, of a "Reply to some Considerations on the Spirit of Martin Luther," and the Original of the Reformed Religion, written by Wake and of University College. In the same year he took the degree of Master of Arts, and became tutor to the earl of Orrey's son. In 1690 he married, and soon after went to London, and established so high a reputation by his preaching that he was made almoner to the king. In 1700 he published a vindication of the rights, powers, and privileges of the Lower House of Convocation, which occasioned a warm controversy with Archbisho Wake and others, and raised up a host of adversaries (see Hook, Ecclesiastical Biography, i, 358, and Lathbury, History of Convocation). The University of Oxford, to counteract his influence, bestowed the degree of D.D. upon him, with the usual fees. In 1704 he became dean of Carlisle. In 1706 he had a controversy with Hoadley as to "the advantages of virtue with regard to the present life." In a funeral sermon he had asserted that, "if the benefits resulting from Christianity were confined to our present state, Christians would be, of the whole human race, the most miserable." Hoadley, on the contrary, maintained, in a printed letter to Attetor, that it was a point of the utmost importance to the Gospel itself to vindicate the tendency of virtue to the temporal happiness of man. In 1707 he had another controversy with Hoadley concerning "passive obedience." Under Queen Anne, Attetor was in high favor, and in 1713 he was made bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster, and was on the point of being made archbishop of Canterbury, when George I, who had justly conceived a strong prejudice against him, came to the throne. From this time he opposed the house of lords, and used all his energies to secure the return of the Stuarts. In 1715, when an attempt was made to restore the Stuarts, the archbishop of Canterbury drew up an address to the bishops of his province, exhorting them to excite the devotion of the clergy of their dioceses toward the prince who would make a new attempt. In 1719 he retired to Brussels, and afterwar to Paris, where he died, February 10th, 1722.

The fame of Attetor rests chiefly on his sermons, which are all very good, and not a few of them are greatly eloquent, and on his epistolary correspondence with Pope. His familiar letters, for their ease and elegance, are preferred to the more labored efforts of his correspondent, Pope. As a controversialist, his parts were splendid; but his prejudices were too strong, and his judgment not sufficiently clear to enable him to a high rank among the editors after truth. It was, how- ever, thought at the time that no man understood better than he the points in dispute between the Church of England and the Church of Rome, as well as the dissenters of all denominations. Attetor has been somewhat absurdly charged, on the strength of an improbable authority, which Dr. Davis has not been able to verify related to him, with having been, at least in early life, a sceptic; but the whole tenor of his conduct, and every reference in his private as well as public writings, contradict such a supposition. He was a worldly-minded and ambitious man, but that he firmly believed the religion for which he lived and died, there can be no reasonable doubt. (See a refutation of this story, in detail, in the New and General Biographical Dictionary, 1784, i, 388.) The conduct of Attetor with reference to the Stuart dynasty is the great blot on his public career, and though perhaps illegally convicted, he was undoubtedly guilty of the treason for which he was condemned. But it was for no selfish ends that he adhered to its desperate fortunes, nor was his conduct wholly inconsistent with his position as a prelate of the English Church. The plan on which he had fixed his hope of securing the restoration of the Stuarts was that of inducing James Edward to educate his son in the Protestant faith; expectation undoubtedly, but it was characteristic of Attetor to overlook obstacles when he had set his heart on accomplishing a great purpose. (Hook, Ecclesi. Biography, i, 374) calls him "an ecclesiastical politician and intriguer, devoting himself, not to the establishment of a principle, but to the mere triumph of a party. Great principles were injured by his advocacy of them, since he gave to them a party coloring, and made what was heavenly appear earthly." In private life the haughtiness and asperity of the politician and controversialist wholly disappeared, and no man ever succeeded in winning a more affectionate attachment from him. As a speaker, and a writer, he had no rivals; and Lord Mahon (Hist. of Eng. c. xii) hardly exaggerates his literary merits when he says that "few men have attained a more complete mastery over the English language than Attetor; and all his compositions are marked with peculiar force, elegance, and dignity of style." Dodsdo (Doddridge's Lectures on Preaching, iv, 18) calls him the "glory of English pulpit orators." Weley (Works, viii, 420) says that in Attetor "all the qualities of a good writer meet." The Tailor (No. 66), having observed that the English clergy too much neglect the art of speaking, makes a distinction between Attetor and the other great writers of his school, who "has so particular a regard to his congregation that he commits to his memory what he has to say to them, and has so soft and graceful a behavior that it must attract your attention. His person," continues this author, "it is to be confessed, is no small recommendation; but he is highly recommended for not losing that advantage, and adding to propriety of speech (which might pass the criticism of Longinus) an action which would have been approved by Demosthenes. He has a peculiar force in his way, and has many of his audience who could not be intelligent hearers of his discourse were there no action. Weley describes his voice as beautiful, and his use of the modulated style as excellent. He pretends to show the beauty of holiness till he has convinced you of the truth of it." His writings include Sermons (Lond. 1740, 4 vols. 8vo, 5th ed.); Correspondence and Charges (Lond. 1783-87, 4 vols. 8vo); besides many controversial tracts and pamphlets of temporary interest. See Stackhouse, Memoirs of Attetor, 1727, 8vo; Burnet, History of His Own Times;
Atterbury, Lewis, father of Bishop Atterbury, was born about the year 1631. He was the son of Francis Atterbury, rector of Milton, Northamptonshire, who, among other ministers, subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant in 1648. Lewis was entered a student of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1647, took the degree of bachelor of arts February 23, 1649, and was created M.A. by a dispensation from Oliver Cromwell March 1, 1651. He was one of those who submitted to the authority of the visitor appointed by the Parliament. In 1654 he became rector of Great or Broad Rissington, in Gloucestershire, and, after the Restoration, took a presentation for that benefice under the great seal, and was instituted again, to confirm his title to it. On the 11th of September, 1657, he was admitted rector of Middleton or Middleton Keyness in Bucks, and at the return of Charles II. took the same prudent method to corroborate his title to this living. July 26, 1659, he was made chaplain extraordinary, and chaplain extraordinary of Gloucestershire, on the 1st of December, in the same year, was created doctor in divinity. Returning from London, whither the lawsuit he was frequently involved in had brought him, he was drowned near his own house in the beginning of December, 1653. He published three occasional sermons, the titles of which may be seen in Wool. Athem. Oxon. vol. ii., col. 211.—New Gen. Biol. Dict. i, 377.

Atterbury, Lewis, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Caldecott, in Bucks, on the 20th of May, 1666. He was educated at Westminster School under Dr. Bushy, and at Christ Church, Oxford. He was ordained deacon in September, 1739. In 1688 he served as chaplain to Sir William Pritchard, lord mayor of London. In February, 1694, he was instituted rector of Shipling, in Hampshire. In 1681 we find him lecturer of St. Mary Hill, in London. Soon after his marriage he settled at Highgate, where he supplied the pulpit of the reverend Mr. Daniel Latham, on whose death, in June, 1695, he became pastor of the chapel. He had a little before been appointed one of the six preaching hearths of the women of the princesses of Denmark at Whitehall and St. James's, which place he continued to supply after she came to the crown, and likewise during part of the reign of George I. To help the poor of his parish, he studied physic; and after acquiring considerable skill, practiced gratis among his poor neighbors. In 1707 the queen presented him to the vicarage of Sheperton, in Middlesex, and in March, 1719, the bishop of London collated him to the rectory of Hornsey. In 1729, on a report of the death of Dr. Sprat, archdeacon of Rochester, he applied to his brother to succeed him. The bishop giving his brother some reasons why he thought it improper to make him his archdeacon, the doctor replied, "Your lordship very well knows that Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, had a brother for his archdeacon, and that Sir Thomas More's father was a plain judge when he was lord chancellor. And thus, in the sacred history, did God himself appoint that the safety and advancement of the patriarchs should be procured by their younger brother, and that they, with their father, should live under the protection and government of Joseph." In answer to this, the bishop informs his brother that the archdeacon was not dead, but well, and likely to continue so. He died, however, some time after. The prince bishop collided Dr. Brydges, the duke of Chandos's brother, to the archdeaconry, after writing thus in the morning to the doctor: "I hope you are convinced, by what I have said and written, that nothing could have been more improper than the placing you in that post immediately under yourself. Could I have been easier under that thought, you may be sure no man livasphem to come forward for relief, and on no account to give anything to those who made a business of begging. He also recommends that the distribution should be made without any distinction as to religious grounds (Hist. Ecl., vii, 28). Sozomen (Hist. Ecl., viii, 27) describes the Christian portion as less than literary attainments, while he evinced aptitude for the management of affairs, and was as skilful in carrying on intrigues as in evading the machinations of others. His sermons did not rise above mediocrity, and were not accounted by his auditors of sufficient value to be preserved in writing; and asserts that "as Atticus was distinguished alike for learning, piety, and discretion, the churches under his episcopate attained a very flourishing condition." He also wrote to Eusebius concerning the incarnation (Theodoret), and to St. Cyril of Alexandria concerning the restitution of the name of St. Chrysostom in the dipytchy, and another to Peter and Eudesius, deacons of the church of Alexandria, concerning the restoration of peace in that church. A fragment of a homily on the Nativity will be found in Labbe, iii, 116.—Cave, Hist. Lit., i, 684; London, Eccles. Dict., i, 610.

Attila (called by the ancient Germans Etzel, in the Magyar language Atzel), a celebrated king of the Huns, ruled from 434 to 453. He assured his people that he was the sworn god, with which he was to procure for them the dominion of the world. He called himself the Scourge of God, and his subjects looked upon him with superstitious awe. He extended his sway over a large portion of Europe and Asia, and but for his defeat by Theodosius the Great, in 451, would have destroyed the Roman Empire. He spared the city of Rome in consequence, it is believed, of the impression made upon his mind by Pope Leo I. See Leo I, Pope.

Attire (ἀπορριματική, keshurim, girdles, Jer. ii, 38), "headbands," Isa. iii, 20. Under this head we propose to bring together a general description of the various articles of apparel with either sex among the ancient Jews, so far as this can be gathered from the notices of antiquity, leaving a more detailed account to each portion of dress in its alphabetical place, while a comparison with modern Oriental styles will be found under Costume, and a statement of the materials under Clothing. (See generally John's Archaeology, § 118-155.) Compare also Drass.

1. Male garments.—The regular pieces of raiment worn by men were chiefly the following, to which may be added (1) that of royalty or eminence, the sash, crown, and scapery, and (for ornament) the anklet, bracelet, etc. (see severally).

1. The skirt or tunic, in Heb. γυνή, kitto'neath, generally rendered by the Sept. γυνή, which indeed is but a Grecized form of the Heb. word (see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 724). It was the usual under-garment (comp. Lev. xvi, 4) of youths (Gen. xxviii, 9, 20, etc.) and men (2 Sam. xxiv, 30), also of the priests and Levites in their service (Exod. xxviii, 40; Lev. viii, 13; x, 5). Female tunics or "chemises" were also called by the same name (2 Sam. xiii, 18; Cant. v, 8). The kitometh was commonly quite short, scarcely reaching to the knee; but eventually, as a peculiarity kind, there is mentioned (Gen. xxvii, 3; xxiii, 22; Sam. xiii, 18 sq, an ornamental dress of young persons of either sex, the kitomoth passim, ἐκτός, tunic of the extremities, i.e. reaching to the feet (for so the word appears to signify; see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 1117; rather than party-colored tunic, "coat of many colors," as in the Author. Ver. after the Sept. and Vulg.), which was an under-dress with sleeves, and extending to the ankles (Josephus, Ant., vii, 8, 14).—Winer, ii, 383. See Tunic.

2. The mantle or robe, a comprehensive term that appears to include several Hebrew words, signifying not only a long flowing outer garment, but sometimes also a wide under-garment or double tunic. See Robe.

It sometimes approaches the significance of a "veil" (see below), as this was often like a modern cloak, or at least shawl. Wide flowing mantles were a fashion of the ancient Orient, and would introduce the ancient gifts to the Chaldees, Medes, and Persians (Herod. i, 195; Strabo, xi, 520). Such are doubtless referred to in Dan. iii, 21; it only remains uncertain which of the Chaldean terms there employed (נבל, barbela, "AUTH. Vers. "hat," or נלב, barbela, "coat") has this significance. Gesenius (Thes. Heb. in vers.) renders both pallium, or cloak, against the improbability that in a single verse two kinds of mantle would be named. Others, as Lengerke, understand, and the second word to mean abomaera, which would yield a good sense, and one agreeable to etymology, could we be sure that horeia was employed by the ancient Babylonians. The word הָעָרָה, pethigai, (Isa. iii, 24, Auth. Vers. "stomach-er"), which some regard as a cloak, is probably a festive garment or flyny (see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 1137). Ewald separates the word thus: הָעָרָה, breadth of mantle (comp. Syr. מַעֲדוֹת). In the N.T. the mantle is denoted by ζυαμός, a robe, such as the scribes and scribes (Matt. xxvi, 38), a long garment, thrown down, reaching to the feet. For θωράκια and φολίνια, see Apparel.—Winer, ii, 54.

3. The girdle, in Heb. רָבָה, chagor, or הָעָרָה, chagorah (the usual name both for male and female girdles, Isa. iii, 24; whether the same article of apparel is designated by הָעָרָה, genazim, "chests," in Ezek. xxvii, 24, as supposed by Hartmann, is doubtful), Gr. γυμνή, one of the most distinguished articles of attire among the Hebrews and Orientals generally (comp. Ezek. xxvii, 25; Dan. x, 5, except the Phenicians (Auss. Patr. ii, Grat. 14; Tertull. Pall. i; Plaut. Pom. v, 2, 15; see Credner, Joel, p. 146 sq.), being a belt by which the under-garment (tunic) was gathered at the waist, and thus prevented from floating, as well as binding the person in walking (1 Kings xvii, 46; 2 Kings iv, 29; ix, 1) or in any other bodily motion (sometimes dancing, 2 Sam. vi, 14). Hence girdles were often bestowed as presents (2 Sam. xviii, 11; 1 Macc. x, 87), and were an article of fancy goods (Prov. xxxi, 24). The poor and ascetic classes wore girdles of leather (2 Kings i, 8; Matt. iii, 4; Mark i, 6, as they still do in the East, of half a foot in width), with the rich, of gold or ostrich (Av. kiku'; Hayyam. ix, 3), or byssus (Ezk. xvi, 10; the moderns even of silk, of some four fingers' breadth, Mariti, p. 214; Chardin, iii, 68), ornamented (Dan. x, 5; 1 Macc. x, 89; xl, 58; xlv, 44; Curt. iii, 3, 18; comp. Arvieux, iii, 241; a Persian fashion, Xenoph. Anab. i, 5, 9; comp. Briissen, Reg. Pers. p. 109 sq.) in a costly manner with gold, jewels, etc.; this last description was especially valued in female girdles, which, being an indispensable part of household manufacture (Prov. xxxi, 17), was probably the chief article of feminine luxury (Isa. iii, 20, 24; comp. Hidai, xiv, 181; Odyssey, v, 321; Hartmann, Hebrä. ii, 299 sq.). The men wore girdles about the loins (1 Kings ii, 5; xxiv, 66; 2 Kings iv, 29; Jer. xiii, 11; Rev. i, 18; xv, 6, etc.), but the priests somewhat higher around the breast (Josephus, Ant., iii, 7, 2); the women, as still in the East, wore the girdle lower and looser (Niebuhr, Reis. ii, 184, pl. 27; 296, pl. 64; comp. Odys. iii, 154).

The sacerdotal girdle is called עַנְבָּט, onbet, and was tied up in front, so that the two ends hung down to the feet; female girdles were called עַנְבָּת, onbetah. The καμαθρόνιον (Isa. iii, 20; Jer. ii, 22; whitish, especially as, still persons wore it, comp. Ezek.; ecc., etc., see Targ.), and the sword (Daggar, 2 Sam. xx, 8; xxv, 18; Judg. iii, 16; Curt. iii, 8, 18; comp. Arvieux, iii, 241; hence a secure girdle was an essential part of a good equipment of the warrior, 1 Kings ii, 5; Isa. v, 27; and the phrase “to gird one’s self” is tantamount to arming for battle, Isa. viii, 9; Psa. lxxvi, 11; 1 Macc. iii, 88; comp. Herod. viii, 120; Plutarch, Coriol. 9) and the inkstand (Ezek. ix, 2; comp. Shaw, p. 199; Schulz, Lic. v, 890); it also served as a purse (Matt. x, 9; Mark vi, 8; comp. 2 Sam. xvii, 11; Jamblich. Vii. Pythag. 27, p. 121; Liv. xxxiii, 29; Suet. Vit. 16; Plaut. Perna, v, 2, 48 sq.; Juven. xiv, 297; Gell. xv, 12, 4; Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 64; Shaw, p. 199; see Rost, De vet. zona pecuniaria, Jen. 1681). The passing over one’s girdle to another is among friends a mark of great confidence and intimate relation (1 Sam. xviii, 4; see Rosenmüller, Morgel. iii, 108); when it occurs between (high) functionaries it is a symbol of installation into honor (1 Sam. xxii, 21; on Isa. iii, 24, see Gesenius, in loc.; and in general see Credner, Joel, p. 142 sq.).—Winer, i, 448. 4. The turban, of which there were various kinds:

![Ancient Oriental Modes of Attire.]

Modern Oriental Modes of Attire.

a. Bedouin.
b. Mameluck.
c. Bethlehemite Women.

(1.) Among the ancient Hebrews of either sex, coats, formed of folds wound about (comp. 2 Sam. 19:31), the head, were in common use, but nothing distinct is given of the style. Their usual shoes are as follows:—(a) מְנֶפֶךְ, teneiph, which is applied to men (Job xxix. 14), women (Isa. iii. 23), and the high-priest (Zech. iii. 5); but which, according to all the passages, was a prominent distinctive costume. (b) מִשְׁמָעָה, mishma‘ah, simply the bonnet of the ordinary priests (Exod. xxviii. 40; xxix. 9; Lev. viii. 13; see the description of Josephus, under the article SACRED TOWERS). (d) יָֽעַל, pe‘er, which occurs of the head-dress of men (Isa. lx. 8, 10; Ezek. xxiv. 17) and women (Isa. iii. 20), and sometimes stands in connection with the foregoing term (מִשְׁמָעָה יָעַל, Exod. xxix. 28; comp. Ezek. xlv. 18). This was likewise a piece of special apparel. Schroeder (Verst. Mal. p. 94 sq.) understands a high-tower ing turban. The מְנֶפֶךְ, teneiphah (Isa. xxviii. 5), signifies a crown or diadem, and does not belong here (see Gesenius in loc.); on the other hand, Hartmann (Hebräerin, iii, 262) explains it of a chaplet of gorgeous flowers. See Crown. Among the modern Arabs and Persians there are various kinds of turbans (some of them exceedingly costly), which are always wound out of a long piece of muslin (Arvieux, Voyage, ii. 243; Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 159, comp. pl. 14-23). Nevertheless, this species of head attire appears not to have been customary in the ancient East. On the ruins of Persepolis are delineated sometimes caps (flat and pointed), sometimes turbans, which were wholly wound out of strips of cloth, and ended in a point (Niebuhr, Reisen, ii, pl. 21, 22). The latter is the more probable form of the coiffure of the Hebrews. (ordinary Israelites, i.e. Israelites, probably bound the hair about only with a cord or ribbon (Niebuhr, Beobacht. p. 64; Reisen, i, 229; comp. the Persepolitan figures in vol. ii, pl. 22, fig. 9; pl. 23, fig. 5, 6, 11), or wrapped a cloth around the head, as is yet customary in Arabia. The כָּסִי (kasi) mentioned in the Talmud (Mishna, Ched. xxv. 16) were not hoods (of women), but protective caps for the eye-sight. (2) The tares of the Chaldeans (Herod. i, 193) are called תְּבֻנָּה, tebunah (Ezek. xxvii. 18), probably from their colored material; they were, according to the monuments (Münter, Rel. d. Babyl. p. 97), high in form; and such some interpreters (as John Archd. i, ii, 118 sq.) find among the Persians (תְּבֻנָּה, tebunah), Esth. viii. 15; נְקָדָה, karbela, Dan. iii. 21), although both these passages rather refer to cloaks (see Lengerke, in loc.).—Winer, ii, 634. See HEAD-DRESS.

5. The shoes (כּל, nál; ἱλάτα, ἱλάτων, sandal) was among the Orientals (as also among the Greeks and Romans), and still is, a simple sole of leather or wood, which was fastened under the foot (comp. Niebuhr, Beobacht. p. 63, pl. 2; Martini, Trav., p. 214; Harmer, Obs. iii, 304 sq.) by a thong (κόρακος, korakos, Gen. xiv. 23; Isa. v. 27; ἱππότης, Mark i, 7; Luke iii, 16, etc.; comp. Perizonius ad Phleg. Var. Hist. ix, 11) passing over it. This protection for the feet, at once suitable to the climate of the East, and probably cheap (comp. Amos ii, 8; vii, 6), is found very generally represented on the Persepolitan monuments (Niebuhr, Reisen, ii, 189, pl. 28, 6; Ker Porter, Trav., i, pl. 39, 40, 41, 47). Females probably wore a more costly sort of sandals (Jud. xi, 11; comp. Cant. vii, 1 [see the Targ.]; Ezek. xvi, 10), since also among the Syrians ( VIR. xin, i, 566 sq.) the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans (Martin, ii, 29, 8), shoes of variegated (especially purple-colored) leather, and even gilt (calcei aurei), were a favorite article of luxury; and, although a considerable part of this decoration might be expended upon the latchet merely, yet there is also evidence that sandals with a side and upper leather (like slippers) were employed. The (eminent) Persians certainly wore actual shoes (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 1, 41; Strabo, xv, 734), and the monuments represent a kind of half-boot (Ker Porter, Trav. i, pl. 39); the shoes of the Babylonians, according to Strabo (xvi, 746), were no ordinary sandal, and it is possible that the later Hebrews wore a covering for the feet similar to theirs. The task of binding on and unbinding (livos, Aristoph. Thesmoph. 1183; in Heb. בּגָּשׁ, yad; or כָּסִי these soles, and of carrying them about for one’s use, was assigned to (menial slaves (Matt. iii, 11; Mark i, 7; John i, 27; Acts xiii, 25; comp. Talm. Bah. Kiddush, xvii, 9; Kerubimoth, livi, 1; Plutarch, Sympos. vii. 8, 4; Arrian, Epict. iii, 26, 21; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iv, 15; see Kype, Observ. 1, 12; C. W. Volland [A. Plathner], De sandalioperis Hebr. Vet. 1712; also in Ugozini Theaurum. xxiii). Indoors the Orientals wore no shoes, which visitors were required to leave in the outer hall (comp. also Plat. Sym-po. p. 213). Only at the paschal meal were the Israelites to keep their shoes on (Exod. xii, 11), in order to complete their equipment for travelling, since for a journey and on going out persons of course assumed their sandals (Acts xii, 8). It was customary in very early times, however, to walk barefoot (ἐπαναλαμβάνει, nudo pede) in sacred spots, where the Delty was believed to have been disclosed (Exod. iii, 5; Acts vii, 38; Joel v, 15); and, according to Jewish tradition (see Josephus, Ant. ii, 15, 1), which the O. T. by no means contradicts, the Jewish priests performed their sacred services unsandalled (comp. Ovid, Fast. vi, 397; see also Baldwin, De calceo, p. 23; Dougan, Analect. i, 57 sq.; Spanheim ad Catilin. Cerer. 826; Carpzov, De spectatoriis bei Sacri, Lapor. 212). It is in his Aporat. antiq. p. 769 sq.; Walch, De religiosa vesture avturqtoq. Jen. 1765; also in his Daiserit. ad Acta Ap. i; Wichmannhausen, De calceo in Ebror. sacris deponendo, Viteb. 1721; also in Ugolini Theaurum. xxix).

Also, in deep grief, persons went in shock (2 Sam. xvi, 10; Ezek. xxiv, 17, 23; Isa. xx, 2; comp. Blom, Idyll i, 21; Stat. Theb. ix, 572; Kirchmann, De funere, Rom. p. 855; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iv, 280). The pulling off the shoe was a legal act, symbolical, with respect to the Levite marriage (Deut. xxv, 9, 10; Ruth iv, 7; comp. Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 112), that the individual surrendered his title or passed it over to another; it was also used, when a man, who was, stepping into a sudden death (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii, 71 sq.), a usage that seems to be alluded to in Psa. ix, 10; civli, 10 (comp. Castell. Lex. heptagiott. 2842; Baldwin, De calceo, p. 217 sq.; see Ewald, Psalms, p. 313). The generally unavoidable collection of dust and stains upon the covering of the feet among the Israelites rendered frequent washing of the feet necessary. See UNCLEANNESS. Shoemakers are named in the Talmud (see MECHANICS), among the Persians the fabrication of foot-clothing was carried on in manufactories (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 2, 5). On the subject generally, see Bynaus, De calceis vet. Heb. (Dordr. 1862, 1710; also in Ugolini, Theaurum. xxix); Rottboli, De estub. et calceis Israelit. (Hafn. 1758); Baldwin, Calceus antiqu.; and Nigrion, De caliga vet. (L. B. 1711).—Winer, ii, 428. See SANDAL.

II. Female articles of apparel consisted, in addition to the foregoing, of the following pieces of ornament (unless we except the veil) rather than necessity. See also PAINT; ORNAMENT; HEAD-DRESS.

6. The veil (in general perhaps ἑρμά, a covering; in proper art the peπη, below) throughout the East to this day as a most indispensable piece of female attire, and no lady of character and respectability allows herself to be seen without it in public, or even by strangers within doors (comp. the Koran, xxxii, 56). Only female slaves (Niebuhr, Reises, ii, 162), public dancing-girls (who are probably always prostitutes, yet do not usually dispense with the veil, Hasenselquist, Trav. p. 73, but are easily induced to lay it aside, Niebuhr, Reises, i, 184), and in general women of the lowest class constitute an exception to this universal custom. These usages appear, on the whole, to have been prevalent among the Israelites (see Bucher, Antiquit. des Heb. et Grce, du velo de religion, Budisc, 1717), since we cannot suppose the privacy and restraint of females to have been less than in modern Oriental society [see WIFE], although in patriarchal times a less strict etiquette would seem to have prevailed with regard to the use of the veil. Virginas (Gen. xxvi, 18 sq.) and even widows (Gen. xxviii, 14 sq.) of the old Hebrew nobility, especially in domestic employments, appear to have gone unhesitatingly without a veil, as still in Arabia (Wellsed, i, 240) and Palestine (Rusegger, iii, 109); but the betrothed covered herself in the presence of her bridegroom (Gen. xxiv, 65; comp. the phrase nubere evo), and the use of the veil in the act of intimacy the apostle appears to allude to in 1 Cor. xiv, 5 sq. Courtesans were known by their deep veiling (Gen. xxxviii, 15; comp. Petron. 16), and sought the more to decoy by this mark of modesty. That the veil was a principal article of female costume in the Jewish national costume appears from Isa. iii, 22; Cant. v, 7; and ladies of rank may have worn several veils, one over the other, like the modern Egyptian women (Buckingham, lii, 888). The various species of veils designated by the several Heb. terms having this general significance are but uncertainly indicated by the etymologies of the different words: (1) דְּתָרָא, ῥα'āl (Isa. iii, 19), is thought (in accordance with its Arabic synonym roli) to be the large general covering thrown loosely around the head and temples, and hanging down in front, which appears so arranged as to allow the female to see through the folds (see Jahn, pl. 9, fig. 10). In the Talmud (Mishna, Shabb. vi, 6) Arab women are designated (ירעם קטר) from this peculiarity of dress. (2) דְּתָרָא, ῥα'āl (Isa. iii, 23; Cant. v, 7), may denote the thin covering that Oriental females still wear over the entire clothing, and may have been earlier styled a mantle (see Jahn, pl. 8, fig. 12; comp. Schröder, Vestit. mueller. p. 686 sqq.). (3) A still different style of veil, which, indeed, of Egypt (Niebuhr, Reises, i, 166) and Syria (Avreux, Voyages, iii, 247), covered the bosom, neck, and cheek as far as the nose, while the eyes were left free (see Jahn, pl. 10, fig. 1). This form is depicted on the Persepolitan ruins, and may also have been in common among the Hebrews. Yet this import cannot, on intrinsic grounds, be assigned to either of the words דְּתָרָא, ῥα'āl, (Gen. xxiv, 65; xxxviii, 14, 19; Sept. Syr.). דְּתָרָא, (Gen. xxiv, 65; xxxviii, 14, 19; Sept. Syr.), or דְּתָרָא, (Cant. iv, 1; vi, 7; Isa. xvii, 2; and whether this last means in general veil (Hartmann, Hebrariim, iii, 286 sqq.) is doubtful (Ge- semius, Jesu in loc.; Rosenmüller, Cant. in loc.).—Winer, ii, 416. See Veil.

7. The armlet, or band for the wrist (אֶתֶר, teemid, or אֶתֶר, teemidah), was a very favorite ornament, not only of all ancient nations (Plin. xxxi, 10, 12; xxi, 42; vii, 29; Liv. x, 44; Suet. Hetr. 50), but especially of Orientals (so much so that gold and silver are forbidden in the Koran, xviii, 30; xxxv, 20; xxxv, 21; on the forms of ancient Egyptian ones, see Wilkinson, iii, 374), being worn by men as well as women (Xenoph. Cyrop. i, 8, 2; Anab. i, 8, 8; Curt. viii, 9, 21; Petron. Sat. 32; comp. Bartholin, De armilla vet. Atl. 1676; Schroder, De Feitiat. musel. p. 56 sq.). Among the Hebrews the first use of armlets is from the earliest times (Gen. xxiv, 22, 30, 47; comp. Isa. iii, 19; Ezek. xvi, 11; xxiii, 42; Jud. x, 14), but among the men those of rank only appear to have worn it (2 Sam. i, 10; comp. Num. xxxi, 50; see Harmer, i, 126 sq.; Ker Porter, ii, 56). They consisted either of rings of ivory, precious metals, etc.; among the poor probably likewise of horn, as in modern times, Harmer, iii, 368; or of cords and chains, רַעַד (Isa. iii, 19). They were worn on both arms or (more usually) on one arm (the right)? Sirach, xxi, 23, and partly covered the wrist (Xenoph. Cyrop. vi, 4, 2); but (in Persia) they are often so broad as to reach to the elbows (comp. Niebuhr, Reises, i, 164; Hartmann, Heb. ii, 178 sq.; Buckingham, Messop. p. 439). See BRACELET. Like the armlets, the ornamental earrings also generally served as armlets (Plin. xxvii, 47).

—Winer, i, 88. See TALISMAN.

8. The anklet (אֶתֶלֶק, א'קָס; comp. παπρίφυλο, Hor. irod. iv, 168, perioscia; also ἠλος, Lucian, Lexiphan. 9), of metal, horn, ivory, etc., was in ancient times, as still by Eastern ladies, extensively worn about the feet (Isa. iii, 18; see Michaelis, in Pott's Syll. ii, 90; Niebuhr, Reises, i, 164; Russell, Aleppo, ii, 199; Harmer, ii, 400 sq.; Rüppel, Abyss. i, 201; ii, 172); comp. Longi Pastor, i, 2; Aristeneut. Ep. i, 19), being indeed an Oriental fashion (Horace, Ep. i, 17, 56; Plin.
ATTIRE

Children of both sexes (Exod. xxxvii, 2; comp. Buckingham, 7r. p. 241, 342). Travellers have found them sometimes small and closely fitting the ear, sometimes very large and heavy (Mandeleiso, Reisen, p. 21; in North Africa as thick as a good-sized pipe-stem, Host, Marocco, p. 119), four fingers' breadth in diameter; so they enlarge the hole through the lobe of the ear, and put that on top of the first clasp (Hammer, Obz. iii, 314). Luxury has carried the fashion to such a pitch that women puncture as many apertures in the ear-lobe as possible, and hang a ring through each (Arieux, iii, 25); Wellsted (Travelz, i, 244) counted sometimes fifteen in a single ear, and Russegger (11, ii, 180) speaks of even twenty. The ancient Egyptians are said to have pierced this number of holes; but the terms δεκας, μετασ, (e.g. Gen. xxxvii, 4, τενικά, τιχλά, τιλερεία ρηματ, the rings that were in their ears), and μετασ,

9. The necklace, ἱθηκ, ῥαβδ, a still very favorite ornament in the East (Prov. i, 9; ii, 5; xxxvii, 13; Ezek. xvi, 11; Hos. ii, 15), which not only women (Cant. iv, 9; Xenoph. Cyrop. v, 6, 18), but also (eminent sovereigns, even warriors, perhaps the last, however among the Medes and Persians (Xenoph. Cyrop. i, 9, 2; ii, 4, 6; Anaib. i, 5, 8, 8, 29; Curt. iii, 8, 13; Philostr. Apoll. ii, 1; Strabo, iv, 197; comp. Odys. xv, 460; Adams, Rom. Antiq. ii, 198), as among the Belgic Gauls (Strabo, iv, 197), for we find no trace of this as an article of male attire among the Israelites (see Scheffer, De torquibus. Holm. 1858; c. notis a J. Nicolai, Hamb. 1707). Necklaces were made sometimes of metal, at others of stones or pearls, which were strung upon a cord (ὄλαυρα, charaim), Cant. i, 10; comp. Fränk, ad Ibn Forslan, Petropol. 1823, p. 86 sq.; the στήλῆς, torinum, Cant. i, 10, are probably not a necklace [Vulg. murrenusco], but an ornament for the head, most likely strings of pearls entwined in the hair or attached to the head-dress (q. v.) and flowing down, see Michaels, in loc.), and hung down to the breast, or even as far as the girdle (Jerome ad Exez. xvii, 11; Arieux, iii, 253). Persons of rank perhaps wore several such. Other articles of finery were also at times attached to them, such as (in) ἰπώμονα, ἱσορόμενα, haf-moons or crescents, Isa. iii, 18 (Sept. μυραμακ), comp. unam, Plaut. Epid. v, i, 34; see Tertull. Gen. fem. ii, 10; called in Arabic ḥādal; comp. Judg. viii, 21; (v. 28; trinkets: trinkets: trinkets for canes' necks) (2). Schmuck, χρυσός, botrye ne'pher (lit. houses of the soul), Isa. iii, 20 (comp. Le Bruyn, Voyage, i, 217; Chardin, iii, 72); (3) perhaps little studded studs, δεκας, μετασ, skelaim, Isa. iii, 18; and (4) serpente, ἱσορόμενα, leka sm, Isa. iii, 20, probably as amulets (q. v.); but see Gesenius, Comm. z. Jast. i, 209, 211. Ladies may also have worn rings (collars) of metal around the neck (see Niebuhr, Reisen, i, 164; comp. Virg. Aen. v, 560). Among the Persians kings used to invest men with a necklace (τερισ, hamnik, which, however, may mean armlet) as a mark of favor (Dan. v, 7; xxvi, 29; comp. Xenoph. Anab. i, 2, 27; Cyrop. v, 15, and it appears that a higher rank was associated with this distinction (Dan. v, 7). In the Egypt prince the minister of state was adorned with a (state) necklace (Gen. xlii, 42); the chief-justice also wore a golden chain, with the symbol of truth attached (Diod. Sic. i, 48; comp. Henegustenber, Moes, p. 29 sq.). (See generally Schröder, Vestit. mut. arm. Hebræi, i, 172 sq.; 259 sq.; iii, 208, 207 sq.—Winer, i, 456. See Necklace.

10. Ear-rings were universal in the East with women (Exod. xxxvii, 2; Ezek. xvi, 12; Jud. x, 4) and

11. The nose-ring (in general δεκας, μετασ, comp. Prov. xi, 22; Ezek. xvi, 12; more definitely δεκας, μετασ ha-aph, jewel of the nose, Isa. iii, 21; probably also ἱσορόμενα, charoh, Exod. xxxvii, 22), a very favorite adornment among Oriental females from the earliest times (Gen. xxiv, 22, 47; comp. Mishna, Shabb. vi, 1, where it appears that the Jews wore no nose-rings on the Sabbath, but ear-rings only). Eastern women to this day wear in the perforated extremity of the cartilage of the left (Chardin, in Harmer, iii, 310 sq.) or right nostril (see the fig. in Hartmann, Hebræer, pt. 2), or even in the middle partition of the nose (Mariti, p. 216), a ring of ivory or metal (doubtless often decorated with jewels) of two or three inches diameter, which hangs down over the mouth, and through which the men are fond of applying their kiss (Arvieux, iii, 202; see Tavernier, i, 92; Shaw, p. 211; Niebuhr, Reise, p. 65; Jolliffe, p. 35; Rüppel, Arab. p. 208; comp. Hartmann, Hebræer, ii, 116 sq., 292; Bartholin, De annulis narium, in his treatise De morbis Bibl. c. 19; also in his work De insaniae rer. Amstel. 1767). Even among the aborigines of America this ornament has been found. Occasionally men also in the East affect the use of the nose-ring (Russegger, II, ii, 180). But whether it was derived from the practice of treating animals thus (as Hartmann thinks) is not clear; for the female love of decoration might naturally introduce nose-rings as well as ear-rings, since the nose and the ears are such conspicuous parts of the person as readily to lead to a desire to set them off by artificial finery. Wild beasts were led (as still bears and buffaloes are) by a ring through the nose, as the easiest mode of subduing and holding them; the same is sometimes done with large fishes that have been caught and again placed in the water (comp. Bruce, ii, 214). Such a ring is likewise called צוּר, charch, or צוּר, chozur (Job xi, 26 [21]; comp. 2 Kings xix, 28; Isa. xxxvii, 29; Ezek. xix, 4; xxix, 4; xxxii, 2), by the Arabs Chāmūn.—Winer, ii, 187. See NASEJEWEL.

Attitude. From the numerous allusions in Scripture to postures expressive of adoration, supplication, and respect, we learn enough to perceive that the usages of the Hebrews in this respect were very nearly, if not altogether, the same as those which are still practised in the East, and which the paintings and sculptures of Egypt show to have been of old employed in that country. See SALTATION.

1. ADORATION AND HOMAGE. The Moslems in their prayers throw themselves successively, and according to an established routine, into the various postures (nine in number) which they deem the most appropriate to the several parts of the service. For the sake of reference and comparison, we have introduced them all at the head of this article; as we have no doubt that the Hebrews employed on one occasion or another nearly all the various postures which the Moslems exhibit on one occasion. This is the chief difference. (See Lane's Arabian Nights, passim; Mod. Egyptians, i, 108 sq.; Thomson's Land and Book, i, 26.) In public and common worship the Hebrews prayed standing (1 Kings viii, 54; Ezra ix, 5; Dan. vi, 10; 2 Chron. vi, 13); but in their separate and private acts of worship they assumed the position which, according to their modes of doing homage or showing respect, seemed to them the most suitable to their present feelings or objects. It would appear, however, that some form of kneeling was most usual in private devotions. See ADORATION.

1. Standing in public prayer is still the practice of the Jews. This posture was adopted from the synagogue by the primitive Christians, and is still maintained by the Oriental Churches. This appears, from their monuments, to have been the custom also among the ancient Persians and Egyptians, although the latter certainly sometimes knelt before their gods. In the Moslem worship, four of the nine positions (1, 2, 4, 8) are standing ones; and that posture which is repeated in three out of these four (2, 4, 8) may be pointed out as the proper Oriental posture of reverential standing, with folded hands. It is the posture in which people stand before kings and great men.

While in this attitude of worship, the hands were sometimes stretched forth toward heaven in supplication or invocation (1 Kings viii, 22; 2 Chron. vi, 12, 29; Isa. i, 15). This was perhaps not so much the conventional posture (1) in the Moslem series, as the more natural posture of standing adoration with outspread hands, which we observe on the Egyptian monuments. The uplifting of one hand (the right) only in taking an oath was so common, that to say 'I have lifted up my hand' was equivalent to 'I have sworn' (Gen. xiv, 22; comp. xvi, 44; Deut. xxiii, 10). This posture was also common among other ancient nations; and we find examples of it in Ancient Persian and Roman Praying standing. The sculptures of Persia (fig. 1) and Rome (fig. 2, above).

2. Kneeling is very often described as a posture of worship (1 Kings viii, 54; Ezra ix, 5; Dan. vi, 10; 2 Chron. vi, 13; comp. 1 Kings xix, 18; Luke xxii, 41; Acts vii, 60). This is still an Oriental custom, and three forms of it occur (5, 6, 9) in the Moslem devotions. It was also in use, although not very frequent, among the ancient Egyptians; who likewise, as well as the Hebrews (Exod. xxxiii, 18; 2 Chron. xxix, 29; Isa. i, 15), sometimes prostrated themselves upon the ground. The usual mode of prostration among the...
Hebrews by which they expressed the most intense humiliation was by bringing not only the body, but the head to the ground. The ordinary mode of prostration at the present time, and probably anciently, is that shown in one of the postures of Moslem worship (9), in which the body is not thrown flat upon the ground, but rests upon the arms, knees, and head. In order to express devotion, sorrow, compunction, or humiliation, the Israelites thrust dust upon their heads (Josh. vii, 6; Job i, 22; Lam. ii, 10; Ezek. xxiv, 7; Rev. xviii, 19), as was done also by the ancient Egyptians, and is still done by the modern Orientals. Under similar circumstances it was usual to smite the breast (Luke xviii, 13). This was also a practice among the Egyptians (Herod. ii, 85), and the monuments at Thebes exhibit persons engaged in this act while they kneel upon one knee.

8. In 1 Chron. xvii, 16, we are told that "David the king came and sat before the Lord," and in that posture gave utterance to eloquent prayer, or rather thanksgiving, which the sequel of the chapter contains. Those unacquainted with Eastern manners are surprised at this. But there is a mode of sitting in the East which is highly respectful and even reverential. It is that which occurs in the Moslem forms of worship (9). The person first kneels, and then sits back upon his heels. Attention is also paid to the position of the hands, which they cross, fold, or hide in the opposite sleeves. The variety of this formal sitting which the annexed figure represents is highly respectful. The prophet Elijah must have been in this or some other similar posture when he inclined himself so much forward in prayer that his head almost touched his knees (1 Kings xviii, 42). See SIT.

II. SUPPLICATION, when addressed externally to man, cannot possibly be exhibited in any other forms than those which are used in supplication to God. Uplifted hands, kneeling, prostration, are common to both. On the Egyptian monuments suppliants captives, of different nations, are represented as kneeling or standing with outspread hands. This also occurs in the sculptures of ancient Persea (Persepolis). The first of the accompanying figures is of peculiar interest, as representing an Inhabitant of Lebanon.

1. Prostration, or falling at the feet of a person, is often mentioned in Scripture as an act of supplication or of reverence, or of both (1 Sam. xxv, 24; 2 Kings iv, 87; Esth. viii, 3; Matt. xviii, 29; xxviii, 9; Mark v, 22; Luke vii, 41; John xi, 32; Acts x, 25). In the instance last referred to, where Cornelius threw himself at the feet of Peter, it may be asked why the apostle forsook an act which was not unusual among his own people, alleging as the reason, "I myself also am a man." The answer is that, among the Romans, prostration was exclusively an act of adoration, rendered only to the gods, and therefore it had in him a significance which it would not have had in an Oriental. This custom is still very general among the Orientals; but, as an act of reverence merely, it is seldom shown except to kings; as expressive of alarm or supplication, it is more frequent (Hackett's Illustra. of Script. p. 105).

2. Sometimes in this posture, or with the knees bent as before indicated, the Orientals bring their forehead to the ground, and before resuming an erect position either kiss the earth, or the feet, or border of the garment of the king or prince before whom they are allowed to appear. There is no doubt that a similar practice existed among the Jews, especially when we refer to the original words which describe the acts and attitudes of salutation, as רון יבג, to bend down to the earth, יבג רון יבג, to fall prostrate on the earth, יבג יבג, to fall with the face to the earth, and connect them with allusions to the act of kissing the feet or the hem of the garment (Matt. ix, 29; Luke vii, 38, 45).

3. Kissing the hand of another as a mark of affectionate respect we do not remember as distinctly mentioned in Scripture. But as the Jews had other forms of Oriental salutation, we may conclude that they had this also, although it does not happen to have been specially noticed. It is observed by servants or pupils to masters, by the wife to her husband, and by children to their father, and sometimes their mother. It is also an act of homage paid to the aged by the young, or to learned and religious men by the less instructed or less devout. Kissing one's own hand is mentioned as early as the time of Job (xxxvi, 27), as an act of homage to the heavenly bodies. It was properly a salutation, and as such an act of adoration to them. The Romans in like manner kissed their hands as they passed the temples or statues of their gods. See ADORATION. It appears from 1 Sam. ix, 1; 1 Kings xix, 18; Psa. li, 12, that there was a peculiar kiss of homage, the character of which is not indicated. It was probably that kiss upon the forehead expressive of high respect which was formerly, if not now, in use among the Bedouins (Athan, ii, 119). See KISS.

III. BOWING.—In the Scriptures there are different words descriptive of various postures of respectful bowing: as ἀναπλοῦ to incline or bow down the head; ἀνακάμπτω, to bend down the body very low; ἐκφεύγω, to bend the knee, also to bless. These terms indicate a conformity with the existing usages of the East, in which the modes of bowing are equal in diversity, and, in all probability, the same. These are, 1, touching the lips

(is this the kissing of the hand noticed above?) and the forehead with the right hand, with or without an inclination of the head or of the body, and with or without previously touching the ground; 2, placing the right hand upon the breast, with or without an inclination of the head or of the body; 3, bending the body very low, with folded arms; 4, bending the body and resting the hands on the knees: this is one of the postures of prayer, and is indicative of the highest respect in the presence of kings and princes. In the Egyptian paintings we see persons drop their arms toward the ground while being to a sitting position, or standing respectfully with the right hand resting on the left shoulder. See Bowing.

Ancient Egyptian Bowing.

It is observable that, as before noticed, the word ἄρνησις, barak, means to bless and to bend the knee, which suggests the idea that it was usual for a person to receive a blessing in a kneeling posture. We know also that the person who gave the blessing laid his hands upon the head of the person blessed (Gen. xlviii, 14). This is exactly the case at the present day in the East. The picture of the existing custom would furnish a perfect illustration of the patriarchal form of blessing.—Kitto, s. v.

Attributes of God. See God.

Attrition, in the Roman Catholic theology, means imperfect contrition. See CONTRITION. The term was introduced by the schoolmen in the twelfth century, to make a distinction between a perfect and an imperfect contrition, after they had brought penance into the number of the sacraments. By contrition they mean a thorough or complete repentance (contritio cordis), the spirit being crushed under a sense of sin; by attrition they mean an inferior degree of sorrow, such as may arise from a consideration of the turpitude of sin or from the fear of hell (timor servitii). Alexander of Hales distinguishes as follows (p. 4, q. 74, memb. 1): Timor servitii principium est attritionis, timor initialis (i.e. that with which the life of sanctification begins) principium est contritionis. . . Item contritio est gratia gratum facienda, attritio gratia gratum data. Comp. Thom. Aquinas, qu. 1, art. 2; Bonaventura, in lib. iv. dist. 17, p. 1, art. 2, q. 3 (Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, § 198). This distinction is maintained by the Council of Trent as follows: “Imperfect contrition, which is called attrition, commonly arising from a consideration of the turpitude of sin and a fear of hell and punishment, the intention of continuing in sin, the hope of receiving pardon at last being disavowed, not only does not make a man a hypocrite and a greater sinner, but is really a gift of God and an impulse of the Holy Spirit; not that the Spirit does as yet dwell in the soul, but merely excites the penitent, who, thus aided, prepares his way to righteousness. And although it cannot of itself conduct the sinner to justification without the sacrament of penance, yet it disposes him to seek the grace of God in the sacrifice of penance” (Sess. xiv, c. iv.). To Protestant eyes, attrition seems to have been devised to make a way of salvation easier than contrition. If attrition, with penance and priestly absolution, avail before God to deliver him from the punishment of sin, arising from fear, is all the repentance necessary in practice to a sinner, whatever the theory may be. So Denz: “Imperfect contrition is required, and it is sufficient; perfect contrition, though best, is not absolutely required, because this last justifies without the sacrament” (Theologia, t. vi, no. 51). This is one of the weakest features of the Roman theology. “A belief in sacerdotal power to procure acceptance for those who merely feel a servile fear of divine wrath is one of those things that require to be plucked up by the roots,” if human society, in Roman Catholic countries, is to be preserved pure. The better class of divines in that church seek to palliate this doctrine; they would do better to conspire for its subversion.—Elliot, Delinitaion of Romanism, bk. ii, c. x: Bergier, Dict. de Théologie, i, 210; Perrone, Precinct. Theologicae, ii, 387; Gibbon, Prescribers against Popery, ii, 36 (fol. ed.); Soames, Latin Church, p. 88; Ferraris, Promtus Bibliothecae, s. v. Bapstianus.

Atwater, Jeremiah, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at New Haven in 1774; graduated at Yale College in 1793; was tutor in that university from 1795 to 1799; president of Middlebury College from 1800 to 1809; and president of Dickinson College, Carlisle, from 1810 to 1818. From that period he lived in retirement until his death, July 29th, 1858. Dr. Atwater was a man of great reading, and of a retentive memory, especially of historical events, and the lives and characters of men he had known, but he had no fondness for writing, and has left, it is believed, but few literary remains.—Am. Cong. Year-book (vol. vi, 1859, p. 116).

Auberlen, Karl August, an eminent German theologian, was born November 19, 1824, at Fellbach, near Stuttgart. He studied four years, from 1847, at Blaubeuren, and in 1849 entered the University of Tubingen as theological student. F. C. Bauer (q. v.) was then at the height of his glory, and Auberlen for a time was carried away by this brilliant Rationalist; a disciple which probably helped to fit him for his later work in resisting the destructive school of theologians. The lectures of Schmidt and Beck (who came to Tubingen in 1848) helped to save him from the abyss of Pantheism. He had hardly taken his doctor's degree when he published Die Theosophie Oetingers, ein Beitrag z. Dogmengeschichte, etc. (Tubingen, 1847, 8vo), showing the higher sphere into which his studies had ascended. See Öttinger. He had previously (1845) become a pastor; and in 1848 he followed Hofacker (q. v.) in that office. In 1849 he became representative at Tübingen, and in 1861 professor extraordinary at Basel. In the same year he married the daughter of Wolfgang Meunzel. From this time his labors as teacher, preacher, and author were most abundant and successful to the time of his death. He published in 1865 Zehn Predigten (Basel, 8vo); Der Prophet David und die Offenbarung Johannes (Basel, 1864, 2d ed. 1867; translated into French and English, a work which contributed greatly to the revival of sound Biblical theology in Germany; Zehn Vorträge zur Veranschaulichung des Christlichen Glaubens (Basel, 1861, 8vo); Die göttliche Offenbarung, ein apologet. Versuch (vol. I, 1861; vol. II, posthumous, 1864). In part one he undertakes to show that, even in its essence only the New Testament Scriptures which the most destructive of the Tübingen critics grant to be genuine, to wit, the Epistles to the Galatians, Corinthians, and Romans, a strictly scientific and logical method of interpretation forces us to the inevitable conclusion that the extraordinary gifts of the apostolic church, the miracles of the New Testament, the manifestation of himself to Saul on the way to Damascus, as also his continued intercourse with him, are facts. In the gospels he seeks but one concession, to wit, the historical genuineness of Christ's testimony respecting himself when on trial (and this is granted by Bauer, Strauss, etc.), in order to put all the miracles of the divinity of Christ in a very disagreeable position. In the same regressive way he goes back to the Old Testament, and by a sure induction mounts from the patent and undeniable fact-phenomena of the Old Dispensation to a supernatural and divine factor in the whole history. The result of this part of the discussion is this: the miracles of the gospels and of the New Testament, then has the inmost consciousness of all the holy men of old—that is to say, of the noblest and mightiest spirits, the real pillars of human history—reposed upon illusion and mental derangement. The world is either a bedlam, an insane asylum, or it is a temple, a place of divine epiphanies. The second, or historical part, is a succinct history of the long struggle in Germany between rationalism and supernaturalism. A translation of part of vol. I, by Professor Hackett, is given in Bibliotheca Sacra, July, 1865. His career was prematurely cut short by consumption, May 2, 1864. In the last hour he said, in the fullness of Christian faith, "If God will not save me, I am lost; but if He has saved me, Jesus is my light and my rong" (sketch of his life in preface to 2d vol. of Die göttl. Offenbarung).—Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, Suppl. I, 798; Bibliotheca Sacra, 1865, p. 365, 517.

Aubertin, EDM, one of the most learned divines of the French Protestant Church, was born at Chalon-sur-Marne in 1596, and became minister at Chartres in 1616. He was called to Paris in 1618, and died there April 4th, 1652. He wrote Conformité de Croyance de l'Eglise et de St. Augustine sur le Sacrement de l'Eucharistie (1626, 8vo), which attracted great attention, and was afterward enlarged into L'Eucharistie de l'Eglise Catholique, etc. (1633, fol.). This work awakened great attention and controversy. Arnauld answered it, but ineffectively. It was translated by Blondel, De Eucharistia sicco domini libri tres (Deventer, 1654).—Haag, La France Protestant, 1, 149.

Abigné, Théodore-Agrippe n', a French writer and historian, born the 8th of February, 1550, at Saint-Maur-en-Saintonge. He showed at a very early age signs of what he was afterward to become. At six years of age he studied Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; at ten he translated the Critic of Plato, on his father's parting with him. At fifteen, after his father, who was a zealous Protestant, made him swear (upon the scaffold on which some Protestant sects were executed) eternal hatred to Rome. He kept the vow. At fifteen he was a student at Geneva under Bener, but soon quit his studies to serve in the army under the Prince de Conde and the King of Navarre. He soon rose to the first rank of Protestant warriors, and did not lay down his sword till Henry IV was established on the throne. He served his king only too faithfully, and by his plain rebukes often brought down upon his head the wrath of the monarch. After the death of Henry he published L'Histoire universelle de ses tems de l'année 1560 (Paris and Amsterdam, 1616-28, 8 vols. fol.). The book was condemned to be burnt by the Parliament, and the author took refuge at Geneva, where he died the 29th of April, 1630. He was a species of admirable Crichton, combining the statesman's skill, the warrior's intrepidity, the scholar's acumen, and the poet's genius with all the sterling virtues of the Christian. His daughter became afterward the mother of Madame de Maintenon, who inherited many of the qualities of her ancestor, but not his religion. A new Life of D'Abignon, from a MS. found in the library of the Louvre in 1561, was published in 1854 by M. Lalanne (Paris, 8vo), who also published in 1848 the same life (Les Tragiques, 1857; Aventures de Fantast, edited by Merimée, with a sketch of D'Abignon, 1856).—Haag, La France Protestant, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, Suppl. p. 117; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, iii, 576.

Aucher, Pascal, an Armenian monk, born 1771 in Armenia, died 1824. He was, while yet very young, sent, together with his elder brother, J. R. Achuer (born 1760, died 1853), to the Armenian convent of San Lazaro at Venice, where they were educated, and subsequently joined the order of Mechitarists. Both deserved well of the theological literature of Armenia by publishing a number of important works in ancient Armenian (as, g. the Chronicles of Echmiadzin, the Discourses of Philo, etc.). Paschal Aucher also published an Armenian-English Dictionary (2 vols. Venice, 1821).

Audene, Audene, or Audias, followers of Audus or Audius (A.D. 840 or 850), a native of Syria, who boldly castigated the luxury and vice of the clergy, and who finally left the church. He and his followers afterward deviated from the usages of the church, especially on the date of Easter. He was charged with anthropomorphism. He had himself irregularly consecrated as bishop; was banished to Scythia, and died before 872. His personal character was remarkably pure. The sect died out in the fifth century. Audin, J. M. Vincent, a French litérateur, was born at Lyons in 1793, and studied theology at the seminary of Argentière. He soon abandoned theology for the study of the law, but after being admitted to the bar he never practiced. In 1814 he came to Paris and commenced bookseller, at the same time keeping up his literary pursuits. The books for which Audin is most especially celebrated are Histoire de la St. Barthélemy (1826, 2 vols. 12mo); Histoire de la Vie, des Oeuvres, et des Doctrines de Luther (2 vols. 8vo); translated by Turnbull, London, 1854, 2 vols. 8vo); Histoire de la Vie, etc., de Calvin (1843, 2 vols. 8vo); Henry VII et le Schisme d'Angleterre (2 vols. traduit par Brown, Lond. 1852, 8vo). He died February 21st, 1851. His lives of Luther and Calvin are written in a controvers-

Auditories (hearers). The Manichaeans were divided into electi and auditories, corresponding, according to some writers, to clergy and laity, and, according to others, to the faithful and catechumens. By the Manichean rule a different course of conduct was prescribed for electi and auditories. That of the latter might eat flesh, drink wine, bathe, marry, trade, possess estates, etc., all which things were forbidden to the elect.—Mosheim, Comm. ii, 399; Farrar, s. v.

Außia (Àüia), the daughter of Berzeles and wife of Addus (1 Esdr. v, 38), probably a conjecture of the copyists or translator, since her name is not given in either of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 61; Neh. iv, 63), and even in the Vulgate, at the passage in Esdras.

Augsian Manuscript (Codex Augensis), a Greek and Latin MS. of the epistles of Paul, supposed to have been written in the latter half of the ninth century, and so called from Augia major, the name of a monastery at Rheinau, to which it belonged. After passing through several hands, it was, in 1718, purchased by Dr. Leyly for 250 Dutch florins, and it is now in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. This noted MS. F, is contained on 186 leaves of good vellum, 4to (the signatures prove that 7 more arc lost), 9 inches by 7b, with the two languages in paraallel columns of 28 lines on each page, the Greek being always inside, the Latin next the edge of the book. It is written with the same uncial lettering and accents; not continua serie, as is common with most ancient copies, but with intervals between the words, and a dot at the end of each. The Greek text is very valuable. The Latin is a pure form of the Vulgate, but in the style of character usually called the Anglo-Saxon, whence it is clearly clear that it must have been written in the west of Europe, where that formation of letters was in general use between the seventh and twelfth centuries.
The first sheets, containing Rom.
i, 1-iii, 19, are wholly absent; in four passages (1 Cor. iii, 8-16; vi, 7-14; Col. ii, 1-8; Phil. 21-25), the Greek column is empty, although the Latin is given; in the epistle to the Hebrews, the two columns, the Greek being absent. Tischendorf examined it in 1842, and Tregelles in 1845. Scrivener published an edition of this Codex in common type (Lond. 1859, 8vo), with prolegomena and a photograph of one page.—Tregelles, in Horne's Introd. iv, 197, 255; Scriv-ener, Introd. p. 183 sq. See Manuscripts.

Augsburg Confession (Confessio Augustana), the first Protestant confession of faith.

I. History.—After Charles V concluded peace with France, he summoned a German Diet to meet at Augsburg April 8, 1530. The writ of invitation called for aid against the Turks, who in 1529 had besieged Vi-enza; it also promised a discussion of the religious questions then in dispute, and such a settlement of them as both to abolish existing abuses and to satisfy the demands of the pope. Elector John of Saxony, who received this writ March 11, directed (March 14) Luther, Jonas, Bugenhagen, and Melancthon to meet in Torgau (q. v.), and draw up a summary of the most important and necessary articles of faith, in support of which the Roman church and princes and states should combine. These theologians (with whom John Jonas, who joined them somewhat later) drew up a profession of their faith on the ground of the seventeen articles which had been prepared by Luther for the convention at Schwabach (q. v.), and fifteen other articles, which had been drawn up at the theological colloquy in Landau (q. v.). On June 24 they suficiently presented to the Saxon elector John at Torgau. (The original articles were for the first time published by Heppe, in Niedner's Zeitschrift für tur. Theologie, 1848, 1st number.) The first draft made by the four theologians, in seventeen articles, was at once published, and called forth a joint reply from Wimpina, Mensing, Redecker, and Dr. Elpers, which Luther immediately answered. The subject of the controversy had thus become generally known.
Luther, Melancthon, and Jonas were invited by the Saxon elector to accompany him to Augsburg.
Subsequently it was, however, deemed best for Luther's safety to make haste to Coburg, where he arrived on his arrival at Augsburg, completed the Confession, and gave to it the name of Apologia. On May 11 he sent it to Luther, who was then at Coburg, and on May 15 he received from Luther an approving answer. Several alterations were suggested to Melanchthon in letters from Jonas, Nicolaus von Zesen, or Brück, the conciliating bishop Stadion of Augsburg, and the imperial secretary Valdes. To the latter, upon his request, 17 articles were handed by Me-ancthon, with the consent of the Saxon elector, and he was to have a preliminary discussion concerning them with the papal legate Pimpinelli. Upon the opening of the Diet, June 20, the evangelical theologians who were present—Melancthon, Jonas, Agricola, Brenz, Schnepf, and others—presented the Confession to the elector. The latter, on June 23, had it signed by the evangelical princes and representatives of cities who were present. They were the following: John, elector of Saxony; George, elector of Brandenburg; Ernest, duke of Lauenburg; Philip, landgrave of Hesse; John Frederick, duke of Saxe; Francis, duke of Lauenburg; Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt; and the magistrates of Nuremberg and Reulingen. The emperor had ordered the Confession to be presented to him at the next meeting, June 24; but when the evangelical princes asked for permission to read it, their intention was refused, and efforts were made to prevent the public reading of the document altogether. The evangelical princes declared, however, that they would not part with the Confession until its reading should be allowed. The 24th was then fixed for the day of its presentation. In order to exclude the people, the little chapel of the episcopal palace was appointed in the place of the spacious City Hall, where the meetings of the Diet were held. In this episcopal chapel the Protestant princes assembled on the appointed day, Saturday, June 25, 1530, at 3 P.M. The Saxon chancellor Brück (who had held in his hands the Latin, Dr.
Christian Bayer the German copy). They entered into the middle of the assembly, and all the Protestant princes rose from their seats, but were commanded to sit down. The emperor wished to hear first the Latin copy read, but the elector replied that they were on German ground; whereupon the emperor consented to the request, and the German copy was translated by Dr. Bayer. The reading lasted from 4 to 6 o'clock.
The reading being over, the emperor commanded both copies to be given to him. The German copy he handed to the archbishop of Mayence, the Latin he took along to Brussels. Neither of them is now extant.
He promised to have this highly important matter into serious consideration, and make known his decision; In the mean while the Confession was not to be printed without imperial permission. The Protestant princes promised to comply with this; but when, soon after the reading, an erroneous edition of the Confession appeared, it was necessary to have both the Latin and German texts published, which was done through Melancthon. On June 27 the Confession was given in the presence of the whole assembly, to the Roman Catholic theologians to be refuted. The most prominent among them were Eck, Faber, Wimpina, Cochleus, and Dietzenberger. Before they got through with the refutation, it was read by Cardinal Campaspius, who had been asked for his opinion by cardinal Campaigns, recommending caution, and the concession of the Protestant demands concerning the marriage of the priests, monastic vows, and the Lord's Supper.
On July 12 the Roman Catholic "Confutation" was presented, which so little pleased the emperor, that "of 280 leaves, only twelve remained whole." A new "Confutation" was therefore prepared and read to the Diet, August 8, by the imperial secretary Schweiss. No copy of it was given to the evangelical members of the Diet, and it was not published until 1573 (by Fabricius, in his Harmonia Conf. Aug. Cologia, etc.). In 1626, in Chytrnaus's Historie der Augsburg, Conf. Rostock, 1576). Immediately after the reading of the Confutation, the Protestants were commanded to conform to it. Negotiations for withstanding a compromise were commenced by both parties, but led to no result. Negotiations between the Lutherans and the Catholics were finally closed by the law of the Seven Years, the 28th of September 1575, which had sent to the emperor a memorial, dated July 4 (Ad Carolum Rom. Imperatorum comitatus Augustana celebtrantem fidei Huldrychi Zwillingo ratio), and Bucer, Cap-ito, and Hedio had drawn up, in the name of the cities of Strasbourg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, the Confutation, which was presented to the emperor July 11. Neither of these two confutations was read, and both were rejected.
Against the Roman Catholic "Confutation," Me-lancthon, at the request of the evangelical princes and cities, prepared an "Apology of the Confession" (Apologia Confessionis), which was presented by the chancellor Bruck, on Sept. 22, to the emperor, who refused to receive it. Subsequently Melancthon received a copy of the "Confutation," which led to many alterations in the first draft of the Apology. It was then published in Latin, and in a German translation by Jonas (Wittenberg, 1551). A controversy subsequently arose concerning the extent of which Melancthon after 1540 made considerable alterations in the original Augsburg Confession, altering, especially in Art. x, the statement of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper in favor of the Reformed view. Melancthon, who had already before been charged with "crypto-Calvinism, was severely attacked on account of these alterations;
but the "Confessio Variata" remained in the assenscency until 1560, when the Confessio Inevitata was put into the "Concordienbuch" in its place, and thus the unaltered Confession has come to be generally regarded as the standard of the Lutheran churches.
But the altered Confession has never ceased to find adversaries, and became the basis of the "Augsburg Union." Churches have even abrogated the authoritative character of the Confession, and do not demand from the clergy a belief in all its doctrines.

The Apology of the Augsburg Confession contains sixteen articles, which treat of original sin, justification and faith. In the view of the law, persons of the law, presumption of grace, the doctrine of grace, a confession, satisfaction, number and use of the sacraments, human ordinances, invitation of the saints, communion in both kinds, celibacy, monastic vows, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The "Confession," with the "Apologia," may be found in Francke, Biblische Ge-storia der Lutherer (Lips. 1687, 2 vol.); Biblische Formenbuch, (Lips. 1846, 2 vol.), which contains also the papal Augustanae Confessiones Responsio of Faber, in Tittmann, Biblische Symbolik (1817, 8vo).

came a minister of the Bohemian brethren, and subsequently a bishop in the Church. He tried to bring about an understanding among the Protestants at an interview with Luther in 1542. After the Schmalkaldic war many of the Bohemian brethren were burned and some of the Bohemian preachers, who ventured to publish books, were arrested. To recover his liberty, he consented to join again the "Utraquists," to whom he had originally belonged, but he refused to make a public recantation. He was liberated in 1564, but had to pledge himself by an oath not to teach or preach. He is the author of an "Outline of the doctrine of the Bohemian brethren and of two works on "The Duties of the Christian Religion" and on "Temptations."—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii, 642.

Augusti, Johann Christian Wilhelm, a German theologian, was born 27th of October, 1772, at Eschenberg, near Gotha, where his father was pastor. He was educated in the gymnasium of Gotha and at the University of Jena, where, under Griesbach, he devoted himself to theology and philology. In 1798 he began teaching at Jena. In 1800 he was made professor extraordinary, and in 1808 he succeeded Hagen in the chair of Oriental literature, which he exchanged in 1807 for that of theology. In 1812 he accepted the chair of theology in the University of Breslau, in addition to which he was honored with the consistory of the province of Silesia. His influence upon the University of Breslau, and upon all the educational establishments of Silesia, was very great. At the time when the French marched into Russia, Augusti was rector of the university, and it was owing to his intrepidity and patriotic spirit that the property of the university was saved. In 1819 he was appointed professor of theology in the newly-established University of Bonn, and received the title of councillor of the Consistory at Cologne. In 1828 he was appointed director of the Consistory of Coblenz. Notwithstanding his numerous duties, he still continued his lectures in the university until his death, 29th April, 1841. Augusti was one of the most voluminous theological writers of Germany. He was originally led by the influence of Griesbach to join the critical or philosophical school of theology, but this did not suit his natural bias, which was more inclined to maintain things as they are than to speculative investigations; and during the last twenty years of his life he was the most liberal, although not a bigoted advocate of the established form of religion. In doctrine he may be considered an orthodox Lutheran. His writings, most of which are of a historical or archaeological nature, are useful as works of reference, but they are deficient in elegance and style. He is the author of a voluminous work on learning and industry than of the true spirit of a historian. The most important of all his works is the Denkwürdigkeiten aus der christlichen Archäologie (12 vols. 8vo, Leipzig, 1817-1831), which he subsequently condensed into das Handb. d. christl. Archäologie (Leipzig, 1837, 3 vols. 8vo). Among his other works are Lehrbuch d. christl. Dogmengeschichte (Leipzig, 1885, 4th ed. 8vo); Beiträge z. christl. Kunstgeschichte u. Liturgik (Leipzig, 1841-46, 2 vols 8vo); Einleitung in das alte Testament (Leipzig, last ed. 1827); System der christl. Dogmatik (Leipzig, last ed. 1826); Corpus librarium symbol. ecclesiae reform. (Elberfeld, 1827)—English Cyclopaedia, Herzog, Real-Encyklop. Supplement.

Augustinus (Aurelius Augustinus), bishop of Hippo, was born at Tagaste, Algeria, near Sufetula, 13th Nov. 354. His mother, Monica, was a Christian and a woman of plenty, who took care to have her son instructed in the true faith and placed among the catechumens. His father was as yet unbaptized, and appears to have cared more to advance his son in worldly knowledge: he spared nothing for his education; and, after giving him the rudiments of grammar at Tagaste, he sent him to the School of Carthage, a town in the neighborhood, and afterward removed him to Carthage, to learn rhetoric (this was about the end of the year 371); and here he first imbibed the Manichanean errors. He also fell into immoral habits, of which he afterward gave a minute account in his remarkable "Confessions." In 385 he left Carthage, against the will of his mother, and repatriated to Rome; and, still adhering to his sect, he lodged at the house of a Manichean, where he fell ill. After his recovery he was sent by Symmachus, the prefect of the city, to Milan, where the inhabitants were in want of a preacher of rhetoric. Here he came into intimate contact with Ambrose, and was deeply impressed by his convincing by his doctrine that he resolved to forsake the Manichean sect: this design he communicated to his mother, who came to Milan to see him. "Augustine listened to the preaching of Ambrose frequently, but the more he was forced to admire his eloquence, the more he guarded himself against persuasion. He was in seeking truth outside of her only sanctu- rity, agitated by the stings of his conscience, bound by habit, driven by fear, subjugated by passion, touched with the beauty of virtue, seduced by the charms of vice, victim of both, never satisfied in his false delusions, struggling constantly against the errors of his sect and the sciences of religion, an unfortunate running from rock to rock to escape shipwreck, he flees from the light which pursues him—such is the picture by which he himself describes his conflicts in his Confessions. At last, one day, torn by the most violent struggles, his face bathed in tears, which flowed involuntary, he raised his eyes and called his friend Ambrose in his garden. There, throwing himself on the ground, he implored, though confidently, the aid of Heaven. All at once he seemed to hear a voice, as if coming from a neighboring house, which said to him, Tolle: laxe: "Take and read. Never before had such emotion seized him. Surprised, beside himself, he seeks himself in vain, because the thing which he was to read. He was sustained by a force he knew not, and sought his friend Alype. A book was placed before him—the epistles of St. Paul. Augustine opens it at hazard, and falls upon this passage of the apostle: 'Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness... But ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof.' Augustine needed not any further reading. Hardly had he finished this passage before a ray of divine light broke upon him, enlight- ening his understanding, disquieting all his shadows, and kindling the true flame of eternal life. The conversion of Augustine was fully as striking and effec- tive as St. Paul's had been. All the apostle's spirit had passed in an instant into the new prosvlece. He was then in his thirty-second year. When once again with his mother, the virtuous Monica, to whom his wanderings had cost so many tears, he related to her all that had passed, and also communicated his new resolutions, with that peaceful firmness which changes not. Monica heard this consoling recital with lively joy. All these particulars he himself gives in his Confessions, with a charm and simplicity which have, before or since, never been surpassed."

After eight years the space of two years among the catechumens, he was baptized by Ambrose at Easter, 387. Soon after his baptism, having given up his profession, he resolved to return to his own country; and on his way thither, while at Ostia, his mother died. About this time he wrote his treatises De Moribus Eccles. Cathol., De Laude Coelestis, De Quaestione Animae. He arrived in Africa at the end of 388, and removed to Tagaste, where he dwelt for three years with some of his friends, occupied solely with prayer, meditation, and study. At this period he wrote the treatises De Genesi contra Manichaeos and De Vera Religione. In 391 he went to Hippo; and while there, in the capacity of a tutor to Melitius, the son of that city chose him to fill the office of priest in their church, and brought him to Valerius, their bishop, that he might ordain him. When priest, he instituted a monastery in the church of Hippo, where he entirely devoted himself to works of piety and devotion, and to teaching. Valerius, the bishop, contrary to the custom of the African churches, permitted Augustine to preach in his place, even when he himself was present; and in his sermons he startled himself on the ground that, being himself a Greek, he could not so well preach in Latin. After this, the practice became more general. About 389 Augustine wrote the treatise De duabus animis, contra Manichaeos. In 393 he was elected colleague to Valerius in his episcopacy; and in 394 he translated Bishop Blase's declaration to the dissentions of the church. The duties of his office were discharged with the greatest fidelity; but, amid all his labors, he found time for the composition of his most elaborate works. His treatise De Libero Arbitrio was finished in 396; the Confessiones Libri XIII in 398; most of the treatises against the Donatists between 400 and 413; those against the Pelagians between 412 and 428. The De Civitate Dei was begun in 418 and finished in 426. The singular candor of Augustine is shown in his Retractiones (written in 428), in which he explains and qualifies his former writings, and not unfrequently acknowledges his mistakes. Of the Vulgate version, which he himself translated, he was, in the third month of the siege (August 28), Augustine died, in his 76th year. His whole career, after his profession of the Christian faith, was consistent with his high calling; the only faults with which he can be charged are an occasional undue severity in controversy and the share which he bore in the persecution of the Donatists (q. v.). His intellect was acute, vigorous, and comprehensive; his style rapid and forcible, but not remarkable for purity or elegance. "Of all the fathers of the Latin Church" (says M. Villemain, in his Tableau de l'Eloquence de la chose au quatrième siècle, 1849, 8vo), "St. Augustine brought the highest degree of imagination in theology, and the most eloquence and even sensibility in scholasticism. Give him another century, place him in the highest civilization, and a man never will have appeared endowed with a vaster or more flexible genius. Metaphysics, history, antiquities, science, and manners, Augustine had emblazoned throughout his life on the principles of the freedom of the will; he explains the intellectual phenomenon of the memory as well as reasons on the fall of the Roman Empire. His subtle and vigorous mind has often consumed in mystical problems an amount of sagacity which would suffice for the most sublime conceptions. His eloquence, tinged with affection and barbaramism, is often fresh and simple. His austere morality displeased the corrupt casuists whom Pascal had so severely handled. His works are not only the perennial source of that scientific theology which has agitated Europe for so many ages, but also the most vivid image of Christian society at the end of the 4th century, in which he was absorbed and inclosed. Nothing could be more remarkable than to find in the writings of the monks of the 4th century the germ of all that has since been developed in the monasteries of the Benedictines, the Cistercians, the Carthusians, and the Augustinians; the traces of all the different religious orders which have since been founded; the seeds of all the various revivals which the Church has experienced, have been traceable to the same source. He resembled Origen in his turn for speculation, but surpassed him in originality, depth, and subtlety. Both passed through Platonism in the process of their culture; he did not, however, like Origen, mingle the principles of Christianity independently of Platonism and even in opposition to it. But Origen fell in greater mental freedom and erudite culture, while Augustine's mind was betted by Augustine 542 Augustine

In his treatise De Libero Arbitrio, which certainly would have received a good deal of attention from what he has actually been expressed, he may be safely affirmed that no systematic writer of theology seems so completely to have entered into the best views of the bishop of Hippo, or so nearly reconciled the apparent discordances in them, as Armínus has done (Watson, Thol. Dictionary, s. v.). The changes in Augustine’s theology are described as follows by Neander (History of Dogmas, ii. 387). “In his treatises de Lib. Arbitrio and de Vera Religione he supposes everything in man to be conditioned on free will. In his exposition of Rom. ix. (A.D. 894) he expressly opposes the interpretation of that passage as implying predestination and the exclusion of man from the merit divine grace by his works, for, in order to perform works that are truly pious, he must have first a suitable state of heart, the inward justice. But this source of goodness man has not from himself; only the Holy Spirit can impart it to him in regeneration; antecedently to this, no personal estrangement from God; but it depends on themselves whether, by believing, they make themselves susceptible for the Holy Spirit or not. (Cap. 60.—Quod credimus nostrum est; quod autem bonum operamur illius qui credentibus in se dat Spiritum Sanctum.) God has chosen faith. It is written, God works all in all men, but he does not believe all in all. Faith is man’s concern. (Non quidem Deus eleget opera quae ipse largitur quum dat Spiritum Sanctum ut per caritatem bona operemur; sed tamen eleget fidem.) From this point we can trace the gradual revolution in Augustine’s mode of thinking to its later harsher form. Yet in his treatises de Lib. Arbitrio (Augustine, de Genesi ad L. vii. cap. 888), he says, in explaining Rom. i. 18 (‘Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth’). This will of God is not unrighteous, for it is conditioned by the most secret relations of congruity; all men, indeed, are corrupt, but yet there is a difference among them; there is in sinners something antecedent by which they become deserving of justification or of hardening (Questio 68, § 4.—Venit enim de occultisimis meritis, quia et ipse peccatores cum propter generalissima peccatum unam massam fecenter, non tamen nulla est inter illas diversitas. Precedet ergo aliquid in peccatoribus quo, utique quondam, si rectius intelligatur, se solvens et item predecit in aliss peccatoribus quo digni sunt obtusione). The calling of individuals and of whole nations belongs to those high and deep things which man does not understand if he is not spiritually minded. But it must be always maintained. The more original freedom there is, the more there is no being who does not owe everything to God. The more Augustine advanced in a deeper perception of faith, the more he recognized it as a living principle, and not as a mere faith of authority, and he acquired a stronger conviction that faith presupposed a divine operation in the soul of man, and that the Bible referred to this. How far he reconciled his general doctrine is perhaps indicated in the following passage from his book De Graetia et Lib. Arbitrio, c. 17. Speaking of grace, he says ‘that we...’
at his earlier life, he learned more and more to trace everything to his training by divine grace. He now allowed the conditioning element of free human sus-cceptibility to vanish altogether. That theodicy now appeared to him untenable, which made the attainment of faith by individuals or nations, or their remainder stranding in the Gospel, depend on their free wills, and the divine predestination; in opposition to this view, he now sought for a foundation in the secret absolute decree of God, according to which one was chosen and another not. This view was confirmed by the opinion prevalent in the North African Church, that outward baptism was essential to salvation. He now held that one received baptism absolutism and another not, and this seemed to confirm the unconditionality of the divine predestination.
The alteration in his mode of thinking occupied perhaps a space of four years. In the dierae questions ad Sympicarium, written about A.D. 387, this is shown most directly, as he himself says in his treatise de dino persecutatis that he had then arrived at the perception that even the beginning of faith was the gift of God.
In that work (lib. i, quostio 2) he derives all good in man from the divine agency; from the words of Paul,
'What hast thou that thou hast not received?' (1 Cor.
iv. 7), he infers that nothing can come from man himself, that the Gospel had to be explained in another form.
The same stage can be explained, he taught, that by it human nature was totally corrupted, and deprived of all inclination and ability to do good.
Before the age in which he lived, the early fathers held what, in the language of systematic theology, is tered the synergistic system, or the needfulness of human co-operation in the works of holiness; but, though the freedom of the will was not considered by them as excluding or rendering unnecessary the grace of God, yet much vagueness is perceptible in the manner in which they express themselves. In fact, there was no scientific view as yet on these topics. Those who held a purely monistic view of God, for in the language of Scripture, the fertile invention of controversial writers not having as yet displayed itself, except on the divine nature of Jesus Christ, and subsidiary terms and learned distinctions not being then required by any great differences of opinion. But as soon as Pelagius broached his errors, the attention of Christians was naturally turned to the investigation of the doctrine.

The personal experience of Augustine, coinciding with the views of the great body of the Christian Church, who held the freedom of the will as given, led to the necessity of divine grace, or the influence of the Holy Spirit, for our obedience to the law of God.
He ascribed the renovation of our moral constitution not to the free will, but to God's decretive will, and acknowledged the necessity of grace for our sanctification, and that it secured the perseverance of our souls. From this, he was led to a study of the nature of free will, and the manner in which it acts. His view of predestination has been summed up as follows: 1. that God from all eternity decreed to create mankind holy and good. 2. That he foresaw man, being tempted by Satan, would fall into sin, if God did not hinder it; he decreed not to hinder. 3. That out of mankind, seen fallen into sin and misery, he chose a certain number to be the elect of God, and that this election was imputed to his posteriority, and went so far as to reject original sin entirely, and they asserted the freedom of the will, and its capacity for good without supernatural grace. 'It is not,' they said, 'free will if it requires the aid of God; because every one has it within him to do any thing, and it is in our own will, not to do it. Our victory over sin and Satan proceeds not from the help which God affords, but is owing to our own free will.' The unrestricted capability of men's own free will is amply sufficient for all these things, and therefore no necessity exists for asking of God those things which we are able of ourselves to obtain; the gifts of grace being only necessary to enable men to do that more easily and completely which yet they could do themselves though more slowly and with greater difficulty, seeing that they are perfectly free creatures.' These opinions were assailed by St.
Augustine and St. Jerome, as well as by Orsius, a Spanish preacher, and the majority of the heretics in the Council of Carthage and in that of Milan. The eagerness of these to confute these opinions, St. Augustine employed language so strong as made it susceptible of an interpretation wholly at variance with the accountability of man. This led to further explanations and modifications of his sentiments, which were multiplied so that the question could not be settled, and at one time he seems to have received baptism absolutism and another not, and this seemed to confirm the unconditionality of the divine predestination.

The alteration in his mode of thinking occupied perhaps
a space of four years. In the dierae questions ad Sym-

our own free will.' The unrestricted capability of men's own free will is amply sufficient for all these things, and therefore no necessity exists for asking of
to introduce into his system a limitation with respect to baptism, and to preserve the opinions concerning it from interfering with those which flowed from the doctrine of predestination. He accordingly taught that baptism brings with it the forgiveness of sins; that it is so essential that the omission of it will expose us to condemnation; and that it is attended with regeneration. He also affirmed that the virtue of baptism is not in the water; that the ministers of Christ perform the external ceremony, but that Christ accompanies it with its inward spiritual grace, upon which our adoption into a spiritual kingdom, while grace is not so; and that the same external rite may be death to some and life to others. By this distinction he rids himself of the difficulty which would have pressed upon his scheme of theology, had pardon, regeneration, and salvation been necessarily connected with the outward ordinance of baptism, and limits its proper efficacy to those who are comprehend-ed, as the heirs of eternal life, in the decree of the Almighty. Many, however, of those who strictly adhere to him in other parts of his doctrinal system desert him at this point. See Pelagianism. His honest anxiety for the honor of the grace of God led him to attack the side of the question, and make the operation of grace more like physical necessity than moral influence. The traces of his Mani-chæan habit of thought appear plainly here. "Here," says Kling, in his excellent article on Augustine in Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie (t. 28), "is a weak side in Augustine's work. In the free and impulsive intellect to give fixity and stability to the doctrine of Christian anthropology, and to leave no room in his system for self-righteousness, he fell into the labyrinth of unconditional predestination, implying a dualism in the Divine will which has never gained the mind of the Christian Church as a correct interpretation of Scripture as a whole. In fact, the system has been a stumbling-block in the church from Augustine's time till now. As for the better part of Augustine's doctrine, which is, in fact, its true essence, viz. that the entire glory of the renewal of human nature is due to divine grace, and is due in no respect whatever to mere human ability, because the consequences of the fall have left that nature incapable of renewal except by a divine power of renovation, this doctrine has penetrated the heart and intellect of the church, and has found expression in her creeds and confessions in all ages." See Augustinianism.

The Donatist controversy was one of the bitterest controversies in the church, was, perhaps, the least honorable to him. Before this controversy, and even during the earlier period of it, he had always treated heretics with mildness and charity, and opposed the passage of several laws against the Dona-tists. But at a later period, after the Donatists had made alarming progress among the African churches, the urgent representations of his colleagues caused a radical change of his views. He became the most ardent advocate of the compulsory suppression of every heresy, and he based this shocking theory on the passage in Luke xiv, where the master of a house, after the invited guests had declined to come, orders the servants to bring in the poor, the maimed, the blind, from the streets and lanes of the city, and, when there was yet room, to 'go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in.' This interpretation by a church father so profoundly revered, has been, in all following centuries, the source of strife, as, in our own time and place, a principle of national policy, the means for which are in communion with the Church of England, and the government of which, in its turn, have not hesitated to use the coercive power of the state against the Church of Rome, and the people of that Church are now suffering the consequences of the former's error.

Augustine (or Austine), first archbishop of Canterbury, was a monk of the Benedictine monastery of St. Andrew, at Rome, and was sent by Pope Gregory, who had been prior of that convent, soon after his accession to the papal throne, as a missionary into England, together with some of his clergy, to aid also Benedictines, A.D. 597 (Lib. Ecl. I, 28). Augustine and his company became discouraged, and Augustine was dispatched back to Rome to obtain the pope's leave for their return; but Gregory disregarded his remonstrances, and, providing him with new letters of protection, commanded him to proceed. Augustine accordingly proceeded to the isle of Thanet, whence they sent messengers to Ethelbert, king of Kent, to inform him of the object of their mission. Ethelbert's queen, Bertha, daughter of Cherubert, king of the Parisi, was a Christian, and by the articles of her marriage (as early as 570) she introduced Christianity into Kent, and the religious rites of the English church. Ethelbert ordered the missionaries at first to continue in the isle of Thanet, but some time after came to them

St. Augustine's works have been printed in a collected form repeatedly: at Paris, in 10 vols. folio, 1582; by Erasimus, from Frobenius's press, 10 vols. folio, 1540-48; by the d'évines of Louvain, 10 vols. folio, Lutet., 1566; and by the Benedictines of Con- gregatie, M. Murr., 13 vols. folio, 1567-73. Of the 12 vols. folio, 1688-1703, and 12 vols. folio, Antwerp, 1700-1703; reprinted, Paris, 1886-90, 11 vols. 4to. The latest edition (not the best) is that of the Benedic-tines, edited by Migne (Paris, 1842, 15 vols. imp. 8vo). A review of his literary activity is given by Busch, in the Acta Calend. S. Ysidro, 1830. Of his separate works many editions have been published. The Benedictine edition gives a copious Life of Augustine; and the 12th vol. of Tillemont's Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique is a vol. of 1075 pages devoted entirely to his biography. Dupin (Jesuit. Writings) gives a copious and miscellaneous edition of all of Augustine's works. English versions of the Confessions, and of the Expositions of the Gospels and Psalms, may be found in the Library of the Fathers (Oxf. 1839-1856). A translation of the Confessions, with an introduction by Prof. Shedd, has also been published at Andover (1880). M. Poujoult, the au-thor of a life of St. Augustine, and the compiler of a dictionary of classical works, has commenced (1854), in connection with abbé Raulx, a translation of the complete works of St. Augustine. The translators claim that this is the first complete French translation of the great church father. The work will be completed in twelve volumes. (Catholic Press, 1839). Editions (and summaries) of his first five letters of the De Civitate Dei have been published by Bruder (Leipzig, 1838) and Stranece (Cologne, 1850); of the Confessions, by Bruder (Leipzig, 1857), Pusey (Oxford, 1888), Rainmter (Stuttgart, 1856); of the Meditations, by Sintzel (Salzburg, 1844) and Westhoff (Münster, 1854). German translations of the Confes-siones have been published by Rapp (3d edition, Stutt-gart, 1856); Gröninger (4th ed. Münster, 1859), and by several anonymous translators (Passeau, 6th ed. 1856; Ratibon, 1858; Reutlingen, 1858); and of the City of God, by Silbert (1829, 2 vols.)-Neander, Ch. and invited them to an audience in the open air. Although he refused at first to abandon the gods of his fathers, he allowed them to preach without molestation, and assigned them a residence in Canterbury, the town in England which them received before procsion, singing hymns. After the conversion and baptism of the king himself, they received license to preach in any part of his dominions, which Bede assures us (c. 25) extended (probably over tributary kingdoms) as far as the river Humber, and proelytes were now made innumerable, which the historian 597, Augustine, by direction of Pope Gregory, went over to Arles, in France, where he was consecrated archbishop, and metropolitan of the English nation, by the archbishop of that place; after which, returning to Brittain, he sent Lawrance, the presbyter, and Peter, the deacon, to the English, with the promise of the success of his mission, and to desire his solution of certain questions respecting church discipline, the maintenance of the clergy, etc. which Bede (1. i. c. 27) has reported at length in the form of interrogatories and answers. Gregory sent over more missionaries, and directed him to constitute a bishop at York, who might have such dominion over the English bishops, yet in such a manner that Augustine of Canterbury should be metropolitan of all England. Augustine now made an attempt to establish uniformity of discipline in the island, and, as a necessary step, to gain over the Welsh bishops to his opinion. For this purpose a conference was held in Warickshire, at a place since called Augustine’s Oak, and attended by the archbishops of Canterbury and Aberystwyth, and by the bishops of Llandaff, Bangor, and near hundred monks of Bangor were put to the sword. In the year 604 Augustine consecrated two of his companions, Mellitus and Justus, the forner to the see of London, the latter to that of Rochester. He died at Canterbury, probably in 607, but the date of his death is variously given from 604 to 614. The observation of the festival of St. Augustine was first enjoined in a synod held under Cuthbert, arch-

Augustinian Monks are divided into two classes:

1. Canons Regular.—In the year 1058, four can-os of the Church of Avignon, called Arnaldus, Odelo, Pontius, and Durandus, being desirous of leading a more strictly religious life, betook themselves, with the permission of the bishop Benedict, to a solitude, where they led an ascetic life; and having thus originally been under the censured institution before the monastic, they acquired the name of "regular canons."

A large number of canons, both lay and clerical, induced by their example, set themselves to follow this new rule of life, and ere long monasteries were built in various places, but chiefly in solitude, and filled with such a spirit of sanctity and of penitence as was not known in any other life, who differed from the monks in name only. At first they appear to have had no rule peculiar to themselves, and probably followed that of Aix-la-Chapelle (A.D. 816); but subsequently they assumed for their rule that of Augustine (i. e. his letter ad Sanctimoniæs), adding to it various constitutions taken from the rule of Benedict, which had already been arranged before the monastic. They did not take any vows until the twelfth century, nor do they appear to have assumed the name of "Regular Canons of St. Augustine" until Innocent II, at Lateran, in 1139, ordained that all regular canons should be under the rule of St. Augustine, contained in his 105th epistle.
The dress of the regular canons was usually a long black cassock, and a white rochet over it, and over that a black cloak and hood; they also wore beards and caps. They were a numerous body in England, where they were probably first settled at Colchester in 1105. They are said to have had 170 houses in England. They were established in Scotland in 1114, at the desire of Alexander I, and in that country 28 monasteries, of which the chief were Scone, Loch Tay, Inch Colme, St. Andrew’s, Holyrood, Cambuskenneth, and Jedburgh.—Dugdale, Monaconia, vi, 57.

II. Hermits, one of the four great mendicant orders [see MENDICANT ORDERS] of the Roman Catholic Church. The Augustinians endeavor to trace their origin back to the time when St. Augustine, after his conversion, lived for three years in a villa near Ta-gaste, wholly given up to ascetic exercises. But even the Romanist historians generally reject this claim as utterly without foundation. The order originated in 1256, when Pope Alexander IV, in pursuance of a decree, compelled eight minor monastic congregations, between which the John-Bonites (founded in 1168 by John Bon), the Brittannics, and the Tuscan hermits were the most important, to unite. The united order was called the Hermits of St. Augustine, because most of the congregations followed the Rule of Augustine, compilation of precepts taken from two sermons of St.
Augustine on the morals of priests and from his letter to the nuns of Hippo. Though now monks, they retained the name hermits, because all the congregations had been hermits. In 1257 they were exempted from the jurisdiction of the bishops, and divided into four provinces, Italy, Spain, France, and Germany.

Unlike the other mendicant orders, they started with a lax rule, and gross disorders and immorality grew up among them sooner and more generally than among the others.

Since the fourteenth century many attempts at in-roducing a stricter discipline have been made by zealous members, and have resulted in the formation of a large number of special congregations, of which the congregation of Lombardy, with 86 convents, became the most numerous. The congregation of Saxon, which was established in 1498, and with which the convents of Germany generally connected themselves, separated itself entirely from the order, and its superior, John Stauwitz, assumed the title of vicar-general.
Among the friends of Stauwitz was Martin Luther,
The most celebrated of all who ever wore the hal it of Augustine, and through whose influence the majority of the convents of the Saxon congregation seceded from the Roman Catholic Church.

The Barefooted Augustinians (Observants, Recollects) owe their original to the Portuguese monk Thomas a Jesus de Andrade (died in 1582), though their first convent was not organized until after his death, in 1588, by order of the king of Spain. They adopted a rule which in strictness surpasses the primitive one, and were afterward divided into three separate congregations, the Italian, German, and French (1166). The last was divided in 1566, in four provinces, subsequently in seven (2 of Naples, 2 of Sicily, 1 of Genoa, 1 of Germany, 1 of Piedmont), the French in three provinces, and the Spanish, the most rigorous of all, which extended to the East and West Indies, to the Philippine Islands, and to Africa. They also erected a retired convent, with a hermitage close by, in which monks desirous of a particular ascetic perfection may live.

In the sixteenth century, when Pius V conferred on them the privileges of the other mendicant orders, the Augustinians counted 2000 convents of men and 800 of females, together with 85,000 inmates. The order has fallen in the general suppression of convents in Portugal, Spain, France, Northern and Western Germany, and quite recently in Italy. At the beginning of 1600, the Augustinian hermits had 131 convents in Italy, 10 in Germany, 6 in Poland, 1 in France, 10 in Germany, 1 in Switzerland, 3 in Czechoslovakia, 1 in the United States (in the dioceses of Philadelphia and Albany), 13 in South America, and 1 in the Philippine Islands. The Barefooted Augustinians had 6 monasteries in Italy, 1 in Germany, 2 in South America, and 6 in the Philippine Islands. The Augustinians have never been able to gain the same importance as the other mendicant orders, and at present they exert no great influence in the Church of Rome.

The most remarkable men, besides Luther, which the order has produced, are Onuphrius Panvini (of the sixteenth century), Cardinal Norris, Abraham Santa Clara, and Ludovico Leon. The constitution, which was established at the general chapters of 1287, 1290, 1575, and especially at that of 1580, is aristocratic. The general chapters, which assemble every first year, elect a prior-general, and may depose him. His power is limited by the definitoris, who, as his counsellors, reside with him. Every province has a provincial, and there is a general visitation. Every convent has a prior. The Discalced Augustinians have their vicar-generals, while the general of the order is taken from the calced (conventuals).

Augustinian Nuns, a religious order of the Roman Catholic Church following the rule of Augustine. Like the Augustinian monks, they have claimed Augustinian inspiration, but have given rise to many historical proofs. They form lay congregations under the guidance of the Augustinian monks, and partly are placed under the jurisdiction of the diocesan bishops. Congregations of Discalced or Barefooted Augustinian nuns were founded in 1589, 1597, and 1604 in Spain, and one about the same time in Portugal by Queen Leonor, mother of John IV. The most recent congregation of Augustinian nuns is that called Augustines de l'Intérieur de Marie, established on Oct. 14, 1829. It had, in 1889, only one house, at Grand Montrouge. In 1860 the Augustinian nuns had, altogether, 42 establishments in France, and a few others in Italy, Switzerland, Syria, Poland, Canada (at Quebec), and South America. The sources of information are the same as those mentioned at the close of the preceding article. See also Migne, Dict. des Ordres Religieux, tom. iv, p. 105–116.

Augustinism, the theological system of St. Augustine, as developed in opposition to Pelagianism by Ambrose, Jerome, and St. Paul of Tarsus, and later by the Western Church, especially in a compact mass, a collective body, responsible in its unity and solidarity. Carrying out his system in all its logical consequences, he laid down the following rigid proposition as his doctrine: 'As all men have sinned in Adam, they are subject to the condemnation of sin. On account of this heritage of sin and the guilt thereof' (Smith's Hagenbach, History of Doctrines, i, 299). Wiggers (Augustinism and Pelagianism, p. 268) gives the following summary view of the theological system of Augustine: 1. Infant Baptism. — The baptism of infants as well as adults is for the forgiveness of sin. Children have, indeed, committed no actual sins, yet by original sin they are under the power of the devil, from which they are freed by baptism. Hence Christian children who die before baptism no more escape positive punishment in the future life than do all who are not Christians. 2. Original Sin. — By Adam's sin, in its descending order from himself, free will was destroyed, and every positive punishments of Adam's sin, came into the world. By it human nature has been both physically and morally corrupted. Every man brings into the world with him a nature already so corrupt that he can do nothing but sin. The propagation of this quality of his nature is by his own free will. 3. Free Will. — By Adam's transgression, the freedom of the human will has been entirely lost. In his present corrupt state, man can will and do only evil. 4. Grace. — If nevertheless man, in his present state, wills and does good, it is merely the work of grace. It is an inward, secret, and wonderful operation of God upon man. It is a preceding as well as an accompanying work. By preceding grace, man attains faith, by which he comes into an insight of good, and by which power is given him to will the good. He needs co-operating grace for the performance of every individual good act. As man can do nothing without grace, so he can do nothing against grace. There is a general will to evil, but no one is under grace. 5. Redemption and Redemption. — From eternity God made a free and unconditional decree to save a few from the mass that was corrupted and subjected to damnation. To those whom he predestined to this salvation, he gave the requisite means for the purpose. But on the rest, who do not belong to this small number of the elect, the merited ruin falls. Christ came into the world and died for the elect only.

These are the principles of Augustinism. Its aim is to subdue the native corruption of man, and of his utter incapacity to do good apart from divine grace, has remained fixed in the church to this day. Pelagius maintained, on the contrary, that "every man, in respect to his moral nature, is born in precisely the same condition in which Adam was created, and inherits good without God's special aid. It was Augustinian mission to enunciate clearly and to fix forever the Christian doctrine as to the condition of human nature in its fallen state. But the anxiety of Augustine to save the divine glory in the work of man's salvation led him to the doctrine of unconditional election and predestination. It was the heart of the church, as a whole, has never acceded. It has been a stumbling-block from Augustine's day until now. But Augustine, in his combat against Pelagius, was entirely successful. The church of his times sided with him, and Pelagius and his adherents were condemned by a number of synods, and excommunicated, the bishop of Rome. After the death of Augustine, the controversy about the chief points of his system continued for a long time to agitate the entire church. The General Synod of Ephebus (431) condemned the Pelagians, together with the Nestorians; yet, on the whole, the Greek Church did not take any real interest in the controversy and never really grasped the doctrines of absolute predestination and irresistible grace. In Africa and Rome a tendency to Augustine prevailed; and at the synods of Arausio (Orange) and Valentia (529) a decision was obtained in favor of the exclusive operation of divine grace, although predestination was evidently evaded. In Gaul Augustineanism did not exercise the same influence; and although the authority of Augustine was too great to permit an open opposition to his system, Semi-Pelagian tendencies seemed to be for a long time in the ascendency.

The authority of Augustine's name remained unimpaired, although his peculiar doctrines were but little understood by the church of the Middle Ages. The first important controversy concerning Augustine was that called forth by the monk Gottschalk (q. v.), who in the most decided forms of expression announced the doctrine of a double predestination, founded upon the absolute foreknowledge of God, according to which some persons were predestinated to salvation, and others were consigned to destruction. Gottschalk, who pretended to be a strict follower of Augustine, was condemned by the Synod of Mayence (848), and died in prison (869). His doctrine was a development, not of the good side of Augustinianism, viz. its anthropology, but of the false side, viz. its view of the relations between God and man in the work of salvation. Augustine maintained unconditional election, but not reprobation; he held that God chose from the masses perditionis such and such persons to be saved, because he pleased to choose them, and for no other reason whatever; while the rest were lost, not because God chose to damn them, but because they were sinners. Gottschalk was the first to announce in clear terms the doctrine of the divine reprobation of sinners, i.e. that they are damned, not simply because of their sins, but because of God's decree to damn them, for no other reason than because it pleased him so to do. In the subsequent centuries, the controversies between the Roman and mystics and between mystics and orthodox Christians were diverted from the church of Augustine. Anselm, Peter Lombard, and Thomas Aquinas endeavored to retain Augustine's doctrine of an unconditional election, though with many limitations. The current of theological opinion in the church in general was in a direction toward Pelagianism, and the learned Thomist, Thomas de Bradwardine (q. v.), a professor at Oxford, and subsequently archbishop at Canterbury (d. 1249), charged the whole age with having adopted Pelagianism. On the whole, the Thomists claimed to stand on the same ground as Augustine; yet, with the notable exception of S. Tommaso, the revival of the doctrine of original sin and divine grace as predestination, they nevertheless believed that man has some remnants of power by which he may make himself worthy of divine favor (meritum et congruo), and regarded divine grace as dependent upon divine foreknowledge. The Scotists (adherents of Duns Scotus), on the other hand, de- scribed man as being original sin and grace as predestination, the two opposed the two orders of mendicant friars. After the Reformations, the Jesuits, in accordance with the moral system of their school, adopted the views of the Scotists. Augustine found very zealous champions in the professors of the University of Louvain. One of them, Bais (q. v.), was denounced by the Tiscans to Pope Pius V, who in 1567 condemned 79 propositions extracted from the writings of Bais, a sentence which was confirmed by Gregory XIII (1579). In return, the theological faculty of Louvain censured 34 propositions in the works of the Jesuits Lessa and Hamele, as opposed to the teachings of St. Augustine, and to the absolute and unrestricted doctrine of predestination. The controversy was, however, dismissed in 1607, without having accomplished its object, and the antagonism between the Augustinian school and its opponents continued as before. An elaborate representation of the Augustinian and Pela- gian systems was given by Bishop Jansenius of Ypres, in his work Augustinianus s. doctrina Augustini de humana natura et sua conditione (1643), written in defense of the doctrine of predestination, and to the exclusion of the Jansenist controversy, and to the exclusion of the Jan- senists from the church. See JANSENS und JAN- SENISTS. The condemnation of Jansenius and the Jansenists has been a continued controversy in the Roman Catholic Church concerning the Augustinian theology, though the subsequent history of the controversy is not marked by any prominent event. But the Roman Catholic Church, as a whole, rejects that part of Augustinianism which teaches absolute predestination (see Möhler, Symbolism, ch. iii., § 10).

Some of the forerunners of the Reformation during the Middle Ages, as Wickliffe and Savonarola, were strict Augustinians; but others, e.g. Wessel, urged the necessity of a free appropriation of divine grace on the part of man as a conditio sine qua non. Luther was an Augustinian monk, and, as a reformer, he was at first confirmed in his Augustinian views by the context which he had to maintain against the doctrine of the meritousness of works. But his reason to believe that, in common with Melanchthon, he modified his views as to absolute predestination; and, under the guidance of Melanchthon, the Lutheran Church has assumed the doctrine of the consequences of the Augustinian system, asserting that the doctrine of predestination is conditional. Calvin was a strict Augustinian, and even went beyond Augustine, by maintaining reprobation. He, and the early reformed theologians generally, in their religious controversy, not only admitted all the consequences of the Augustinian system, but, having once determined the idea of predestina- tion, went beyond the premises so far as to main- tain that the fall of man was itself predestinated by God (supralapsarianism). This view, however, did not meet with much approbation, and was at last almost entirely abandoned. In opposition to the ultra Augustinianism of the Reformers, according to Augustine's anthropology, defined the true doctrine of the relations between God and man in the work of salvation. In Germany, the Rationalists and the school of Spec- ulative Philosophy discard Augustinianism, while the Pietists, and other theologians who returned to the old faith of the church, and (though with various modifi- cations) were the exponents of the inveterate Augustinianism in its essential points. At present, hardly one of the great theologians of Germany holds the extreme Augustinian doctrine of absolute predestination. The first good work on the Augustinian system was written by Wiggers, Versuch einer systematischen Dar- stellung des Augustinianismus, überliefert und von der zweyen Herausgeber aus dem Lateinischen übersetzt (Leipsic, 1821; Hamburg, 1838, vol. i. translated by Prof. Emer- son, Andover, 1840, 8vo.). See also Gaukant, Psycholo- gie des heil. Augustinus (Augsb. 1862). More philosophical than theological, yet of great value for the history of the theological system of Augustine, is the work of Nourisson on "The Philosophy of St. Augustine" (La Philosophie de Saint Augustin," Parr. 1685, 2 vols.). This work received a prize from the French Academy des Sciences Morales et Politiques. The first volume contains a memoir of the bishop, and a detailed exposition of his philosophical views; the second gives an account of the sources from which Augustine borrowed his ideas, an estimate of the influence which the Augustinian theories exercised, especially during the seventh century, and a critical discussion of the Augustinian theologies. See ARMINIANISM; AUGUSTINE.

Augustus (cænerable, Gracized Agyouwetos), the imperial title assumed by Octavius, or Octavianus, the successor of Julius Caesar, and the first peaceably acknowledged emperor of Rome. He was emperor at the birth and during the lifetime of our Lord (B.C. 30 to A.D. 14), but his name occurs only once (Luke ii, 1) in the New Testament, as the emperor who appointed the enrolment in consequence of which Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, the place where the Messiah was to be born. See JESUS. The successors of the first Augustus took the same name for his title, but it is seldom applied to them by the Latin writers. In the eastern part of the empire the Greek Συμφωνετος (which is equivalent) seems to have been more common, and hence is used of Nero (Acts xxv, 21). In later times (after Diocletian) the title of "Augustus" was given to one of the two heirs-apparent of the empire, and "Caesar" to their younger colleagues and heirs-apparent.

Augastus was descended from the Octavian family (gens Octavia), being the son of a certain prætor, Calvis Octavius, and born in the year of Rome 281, B.C. 62 (Sueton. Octav. 5). His mother was Atia, daughter of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar. He bore the same name as his father, Calvis Octavius. Being adopted and educated by his great uncle Julius Caesar, he changed his name from Octavius to that of Calvis Julius Caesar Octavianus (i.e. ex-Octavine), in accordance with Roman usage. After the assassination of Caesar, he went, although still a youth, into Italy, and soon acquired such political connections and importance (Suet. Caes. 83 sq.; Octav. 8) that Antony and Lepidus took him into their triumvirate (Suet. Octav. 15). After the removal of the weak Lepidus, he shared with Antony the chief power over the entire Roman empire, having special charge of the western provinces, as Antony did over the eastern (Suet. Octav. 16, 54; Appian. Cir. v, 122 sq.). But there was no cordial union between these two ambitious men; their opposition gradually developed itself, and soon reached its crisis in the decisive naval battle of Actium (B.C. 31), in which Octavius was victorious (Suet. Octav. 17; Dio Cass. I. 15 sq.; Vell. Paterc. ii, 85). Two years afterward he was greeted as "emperor" (imperator) by the senate, and somewhat later (B.C. 27), when he desired voluntarily to receive the supreme power, as "Augustus" (Vell. Paterc. ii, 91; Dio Cass. III, 16). Liberality toward the army, moderate toward the people, which he allowed to retain the semblance of its ancient authority, affability and clemency toward the populace, strengthened the supremacy which Augustus, uniting in his own person the highest offices of the republic, maintained with imperial power, but without a regal title. To the Roman people he attached himself to the party of Antony. He was unexpectedly gracious, instated himself as king of Judæa ("rex Judæorum," Joseph. Ant. xv, 7, 8), raising also somewhat later his brother Pheroras to the tetrarchate (Joseph. Ant. xv, 10, 5). In thankfulness for these favors, Herod built him a marble temple near the source of the Jordan (Joseph. Ant. xv, 10, 3), and remained during his whole life a firm adherent of the imperial family. After the death of Herod (A.D. 4) his dominions, almost in exact accordance with the will which he left, were divided among his sons (Joseph. Ant. xviii, ii, 4) by Augustus, who was soon compelled, however (A.D. 6), to exile one of them, Archelaus, and to join his territory of Judea and Samaria to the province of Syria (Joseph. Ant. xxi, 13, 2). Augustus died in the 76th year of his age at Nola in Campania, August 19, in the year of Kome 767 (see Wurm, in Bengel's Archio. ii, 8 sq.), or A.D. 14 (Suet. Octav. 99 sq.; Dio Cass. v. 29 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xviii, 5, 2; War, ii, 9, 3), having some time previously nominated Titubertus as his associate (Suet. Titi, xxi; Tacit. Annal. i, 3). The kindness of Augustus toward the Herods, and the Jews through them (Philo, ii, 888, 591, 592), was founded, not upon any regard for the Jewish people themselves (as the contrary appears to have been the case with all the other Roman emperors), but upon political considerations, and, as it would seem, a personal esteem for Herod. Augustus not only procured the crown of Judea for Herod, whom he loaded with honors and riches, but was pleased also to undertake the education of Alexander and Aristobulus, his sons, to whom he gave a place in his palace.

Coin of Augustus with the head of M. Vipsanius Agrippa that the latter was enabled to exercise a strong influence in favor of the Jews. See AGrippa. After the death of Lepidus, Augustus assumed the office of high-priest, a dignity which gave him the inspection over ceremonies and religious concerns. One of his chief proceedings was an examination of the Sibyl's books, none of which he burnt, and placed the others in two gold boxes under the pedestal of Apollo's statue, whose temple was within the enclosure of the palace. This is worthy of note, if these prophecies had excited a general expectation of some great person about that time to be born, there is reason to suppose that the fact. It should be remembered, also, that Augustus had the honor to shut the temple of Janus, in token of universal peace, at the time when the Prince of Peace was born. This is remarkable, because that temple was shut but a very few times. For further details of the life of Augustus, see Smith's Dict. of Biog. s. v. Aurandt, John Dietrich, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born on Malden Creek, Berks county, Pa., 1760, and in his youth was apprenticed to a miller. In 1728 he enlisted as a soldier in the brigade of the Pennsylvania Regulars under Gen. Wayne. He continued in the army till 1781, when he received an honorable discharge. He now resumed his business as a miller, but after several years turned his attention to farming. Meanwhile his mind had been strongly turned toward the holy ministry. He became a member of the Lvina congregation, and was soon studying privately as best he could. He was licensed to preach in 1806, and ordained in 1809. He settled in Hunting- ton county, Pa. His field of labor extended east and west sixty miles, north and south from forty to fifty miles. Here he labored with apostolic zeal as a pioneer, laying the foundation of numerous congregations. His travelling over these mountain regions of Pennsylvania was done on horseback. This was his first and also his last field of labor. His health failed toward the last, and sometimes for a short period his labors were interrupted; but he continued his work, though often amid much suffering, till near his end. He preached his last sermon the latter part of the summer of 1830, and died April 24th, 1831, in the 71st year of his age. Mr. Aurandt's power of usefulness lay in extraordinary natural gifts, deep and earnest piety, rather than in acquired learning or intellectual polish. He was gifted with a good memory, quick perception, a ready flow of language, and a clear enunciation. He preached only in the German language.

Aur'anus (Αὐρανός), given as the name of the leader in the riots at Jerusalem against Lysimachus (2 Macc. iv, 40), where he is described as "a man far gone in years, and no less in folly." Other MSS., however (followed by the Vulg.), read Τιφανόν, Typeu, which may be taken either as a proper name or appellative, q. d. ringleader.

Aurélius, Marcus Antonius Verus Antoninus, Roman emperor from 161 to 180, was born in 121, and at the age of eighteen adopted by the Emperor Antoninus Pius, whom he succeeded, in 161, on the throne. He was educated by Sextus of Chersonæ, a grandson of Plutarch, and became early in life an ardent ad- mirer and adherent of the Stoic philosophy. On his accession to the throne he most liberally shared the government with his adopted brother Verus. Shortly after a war broke out with the Parthians, which was victorious terminated by the generals of Verus. Both emperors held a triumph, and assumed the title Parthicus. A more dangerous war broke out on the northern frontier of the empire with a number of German tribes, as the Marcomanni, Alani, and others. It was carried on, with many vicissitudes, until 169, when the barbarians sued for peace. In the same year Verus died. Soon the war was renewed; and in the course of it, in 174, a celebrated victory was gained by Marcus Aurelius over the Quadri in consequence of their attack on a fortress which they had destroyed. The septemviri, Verus, Verus, Verus, and Verus, were saved apparently imminent defeat. The emperor ascribed the victory to Jupiter Tonans; but the twelfth legion, composed largely of Christians, ascribed it to their prayers. The statement of Eusebius, that the emperor gave the name Legio Fulminatrix (Thundering Legion), and threatened persecution as accused Christians merely on account of their religion, is generally rejected as inaccurate (Eusebius, CH. Hist. v, 5). See Lardner, Works, vii, 178-198. Avidius Cassius rebelled against Aurelius, but was murdered by his own adherents. Aurelius pardoned the rebels, revisited Rome in 174, celebrated his victories by a tri- umph, and soon after marched again, with his son Commodus, against the Marcomanni; but before the conclusion of the war he died at Vindobona (now Vi- enna), in 180. Aurelius was one of the best emperors the Roman Empire ever had; truthful, just, severe against himself, but mild toward his other men; and in his life, in the main, corresponded to his philosophical principles. The only blot in his reign is the persecution of Christians. The first persecution during his reign seems to have occurred at Lignons in 167, and in it Polycarp, the last surviving disciple of the apostle John, lost his life. In 177, the Christians of Gaul, especially those of Lyons, were subjected to a cruel persecution, in which a great many Christians fell, and among them Pol¬thusius, bishop of Lyons. See PERSECUTIONS. The philosophical emperor acted logically in persecuting the philosophers, who disobeyed the laws of Rome, while he held it his duty to exact those of the Church. He was convinced that a new religion was a superstition, and that it was danger¬ous to the state. This was enough for him. Aue¬rius wrote a work (in Greek entitled Τα iic iavορων (Meditations), from the composition of which he has received the title of " Philosopher." There are editions of it by Casaubonius (London, 1640), Guataller (Cambr. 1654), Schulz (Schles., 1800, and Paris, 1810). It has been translated into the languages of all civilized nations, and even into Persian by Hamler (Vienna, 1881). A new English version by G. Long appeared in 1863 (London).—Smith's Dict. of Class. Aureola or Aureole (gold-colored), the crown of rays used to represent the saintly fire, by the old painters around the figures of saints, investing the whole body, as the nimbus (q. v.) does the head. Its form is generally oval.—Didron, Chr. Iconography, 107 sq.

Auricular Confession, the confession of sin into the ear of the priest, which, as part of penance, is one of the sacraments of the Romish Church.

1. Before the time of Leo the Great (fifth century) it had been the custom for the more grievous offenders to make confession of their sins publicly, in the face of the congregation, or, at least, for the minis¬ ters occasionally to proclaim before the whole assembly the nature of the confessions which they had re¬ ceived. This public act, called exomologesis, included not only public confession, but public mortification in sackcloth and ashes; and, as such, was entirely dis¬ tinct from auricular confession, which is the well¬ known to the ancient Church (see the authorities in Bingham, Orig. Ecc. b. xvii, ch. iii.; Daillè, Crof¬ fes. Auricular. iv, 25). As for the Eastern Church, Sozomen, in his account of the confessional, says that the public confession in the presence of all the people, which forebears the auricular confession, was to be spoken into the ear of the priest (στῆναι στίχον, a well-bred, silent, and prudent presby¬ ter was in charge of it; thus plainly denoting the change from public to auricular confessions. It was this penitential presbyter whose office was abol¬ ished by Nectarius in the fourth century, on account of a rape he committed on a noblewoman; the office was then given to the priest (Sozomen. Hist. Ecc. vii, 16; Sozomen. Hist. Ecc. v, 19).

Pope Leo discouraged the ancient practice of public confession, or, rather, the publication by the priest of flagrant sins confessed, and permitted, and even enjoined with some earnestness, that confession should rather be private, and confined to the priest alone. The impediment which the public prosecution of this relaxation was the general increase, or, at least, the more indelicate practice of the mortal sins, and especially (as Mosheim, Church. Hist. cent. v, pt. ii, ch. iv, has observed) of that of incontinence; unless, indeed, we are to suppose that the original publicity of confession was always conscious of being longer a very small part in the numerous body and a corrupt age. But another consequence which certainly flowed from this measure, and which, in the eye of an ambitious churchman, might counterbalance its demoralizing effect, was the vast addition of influence which it gave to the clergy. When he delivered over the conscience of the people into the hands of the priests, when he consigned the most secret acts and thoughts of individual imperfection to the torture of private inquisition and scrutiny, Leo the Great had indeed the glory of laying the first and corner-stone of the papal edifice—that on which it rose and rested, and without which the industry of his successors would have been vainly exerted, or (if it is more probable) their boldest projects would never have been formed.

2. But Leo made no law requiring private confession before communion. That step was not taken till the fourth council of Lateran, A.D. 1215, when it was decreed that all persons should confess privately, and lists of all under penance were kept. The practice of communicatio (can. xxii; Hard, Conc. t. v.) the doctrine that penance is a sacrament seems to have been first broached by Aquinas (Summa, pt. iii, 2, 84). The Roman system of sacramental penance was completed by the Council of Trent (sess. xiv, cap. 6, 6), which declared that, from the institution of the sacrament of penance already set forth, the Church has always understood that an entire confession of sins was also appointed by the Lord, and that it is of divine right necessary to all who have lapsed after baptism. Because our Lord Jesus Christ, when about to ascend from earth to heaven, left his priests, his vicars, to be, as it were, the presidents and judges, to whom all mortal sins into which Christ's faithful people should fall be brought, in order that, by the power of the keys, they might pronounce sentence of remission or retention. For it is plain that the priests cannot exercise this judgment without knowledge of the cause, nor can they observe effect in obtaining penal dispensations from the Church so simply generally, and not rather particularly and separately. From this it is inferred that it is right that the penitents should recount in confession all the deadly sins of which, upon examination, their conscience accuses them, even though they be most secret, and only against the last two commandments, which not unfrequently grievously wound the soul, and are more dangerous than those which are openly practised," etc. Here an attempt is made to invest the Christian priesthood with the prerogative of the Most High, who is a searcher of the hearts and a discernor of the thoughts, in forgetfulness of the very distinction which most obviously proceeds from the fact that "man looketh to the outward part, the Lord trieth the heart." As Christ has invested his ministers with no power to do this of themselves, the Tridentine fathers have sought to supply what they must needs consider a grievous omission on his part by enjoining all men to come under the second of their two command of their past, as well as of all ages and sexes to submit not only to general questions as to a state of sin or repentance, but to the most minute and searching questions as to their inmost thoughts. Auricular confession is unquestionably one of the greatest corruptions of the Romish Church. It goes upon the ground that the priest has power to forgive sins; it establishes the tympanical influence of the priesthood; it turns the penitent from God, who only can forgive sins, to man, who is himself a sinner; and it tends to corrupt both the confessors and the confessed by a foul and particular disclosure of sinful thoughts and actions of every kind without exception. Special confessors are provided for monks and nuns. For the place of confession, see CONFESSIONAL. The laws of confession may be found in the Roman directories and books of moral theology; and a glance at them is enough to satisfy any candid mind of the fearful dangers of such a system. Any one who may think it necessary to satisfy himself upon the point may consult the cases contemplated and provided for (among others) by Cardinal Cajetan in his Opuscula (Lugd. 1562), p. 114. In the Bull of Pius IV, Contra sollicitantes in confessione, dated Apr. 16, 1561 (Bullarium Magn. Luxemb. 1727, ii, 48), and in a similar one of one Gregory XV, dated Aug. 8, 1622 (Gregory XV, Constit. Rom. 1622, p. 114), there is laid open another fearful scene of danger to female confidants from wicked priests. For a full account of the history of the system, its existing dangers, see Hopkins, History of the Confessional (N. Y. 1850, 12mo).

4. The Protestant churches reject auricular confession. The Lutheran Church, however, allows confession, only with this difference, that while the Catholic Church requires from the penitent the avowal of his particular and single crimes, the Lutheran requires only a general acknowledgment of sin, in every sin which the conscience of the sinner, or, at the option of its members to reveal their particular sins to the confessor, and to relieve the conscience by such an avowal. The Reformed churches of the Continent generally practise only general confession preparatory to the sacrament. There is a tendency, however, in the High Lutheran reaction in Germany, to return to auricular confession. The Church of England, in some cases, exhorts to confession, but she makes it no part of her discipline, nor does she (as the Church of Rome insists upon, or as some of her own members would fondly introduce the practice) prescribe regular, complete, periodical confession. For the doctrine of the Church of England upon the subject of confession to a pastor, see (in the Prayer-book) the former of the two exhortations in giving warning for the Communion, and the order for the Visitation of the Sick. The Church of England has recently been greatly agitated by what appears to be a concerted attempt on the part of the leading men of her church to give it all to auricular confession.—Bingham, l. c.; Hopkins, Hist. of the Confessional; Elliott, On Romanism, i, 612 sq.; Klees, Die Brücke, eine histor. crit. Untersuch. (Frankf. 1829); Kleifow, Die Brücke und Abolition (Schwerin, 1856).—Hook, Ch. Dict. s. v. See PENANCE; CONFESSION.

AUSTIN, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Haven, Conn., 1760, and graduated at Yale College, 1773. After studying with Dr. Bellamy, he spent some time in European travel, and in 1788 was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Elizabethtown, N. J. He labored faithfully till 1795, when he became deranged from fever. On his recovery the derangement continued, and he preached that Christ would appear in May, 1796. The prophecy of the delusion, and he went about preaching the advent with great zeal, and creating great excitement. In 1797 he was dismissed from his pastorate. After some years he recovered his sanity, and was installed in 1815 pastor at Bozrah, Conn., where he remained until his death in 1851. He edited a Commercial and published several millennial pamphlets.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 197.

AUSTIN, Samuel, D.D., was born in New Haven, 1760, graduated at Yale College in 1783. After teaching and travelling a few years, he was ordained, as the successor of Allen Mather, at Fairhaven, Conn., Nov. 9, 1756, where he remained until 1780. He then became pastor of a church in Worcester, Mass., where he labored faithfully nearly 20 years. In 1815 he was elected president of the University of Vermont, which office he resigned in 1821. After preaching a few years in Newport, he fell ill health and melancholy, and died at Glastonbury, Conn., Dec. 4, 1830. He was eminently pious and distinguished as a minister. He published letters on baptism, examining Merrill's seven sermons, 1805; a reply to Merrill's twelve letters, 1806; and a number of occasional sermons.

Australasia, a division of the globe forming a part of Oceania. It comprises the continent of Australia, Tasmania (Van Diemen's Land), New Guinea, and the Louisiade Archipelago, New Britain, New Ireland, and neighboring islands, Solomon's Islands, New Hebrides, New Caledonia, New Zealand, and the isles to the southward, Kerguelen Islands, St. Paul, and Amsterdam, and numerous coral reefs and islets.

Australia, or New Holland, a vast extent of land forming the main portion of Australasia. Its area is about 2,700,000 square miles. The population is divided in the five English colonies, New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, West Australia, and Queensland, was, in 1862, about 1,240,000 souls. The native population is rapidly decreasing. Their numbers are estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000. Toward the close of the last century, the chaplain appointed by the British government in New South Wales, which at that time was a penal settlement. In 1795 the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts commenced its missionary operations. In 1836 the first bishop was consecrated, and in 1847 these new sees were constituted. In 1856 the Anglican Church had in Australia (exclusive of Tasmania, q. v.) seven dioceses, Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, Perth, Brisbane, and Goulburn. The Roman Church has an archbishop at Sydney, and bishops at Perth, Adelaide, Melbourne, mainland, and Brisbane, and a population of about 80,000 souls. The Moravians established a mission to the aborigines in 1849. In 1858 they sustained there two missionaries, but no specific results are yet reported. The Wesleyan Missionary Society opened a mission in New South Wales in 1815, in South Australia in 1834, in Western Australia in 1839. Their missions, both among the English population and the natives, have been blessed with remarkable success. They had, in 1865, 99 circuits, 493 chapels, 256 other preaching places, 115 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 322 subordinate agents, 16,246 members, 2707 on trial for membership, 82,012 scholars in schools, 91,870 attendants on public worship. There are also Congregationalists, Baptists, German Lutherans, and other denominations, though less numerous. The government contributes to the support of the churches and clergy of the Episcopalians, Wesleyans, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. In 1855 there were 618 public Roman Catholic, and private schools, in which 40,000 children received instruction.—Almanac de Gotha; Schem. Ecclesiastical Year-book for 1859.

Austria, one of the principal states of modern Europe (q. v.), with an area of 11,751 geogr. sq. miles, and a population in 1857 of 8,040,810 souls.

1. Church History.—For the introduction of Christianity into those countries which now constitute Austria, and for their early church history, we refer to the articles Germany; Slavonians; and to those on the several provinces of Austria (see below). The Reformation spread at first in Austria with great rapidity. In Bohemia, Moravia, Austria Proper (the archduchy), Styria, Carinthia, and the Tyrol, it soon became very powerful. See Reformation. Even one of the emperors, Maximilian II, favored it, and was believed secretly to belong to it. But Ferdinand II
AUSTRIA (1619–87), the most fanatical adherent of the Church of Rome in the entire series of Austrian rulers, initiated a period of long and costly persecution. In 1629, thousands were frightened into apostasy, and many more thousands expelled from their native land. This rigorous legislation lasted until the accession of Joseph II (1763–90), who not only endeavored to loosen the connection of the Roman Catholic Church with the Pope, but who gave also to the Protestants, by his cabinet decrees, the privilege of holding religious worship and their churches and parishes, and have been permitted to have independent parishes, but they had to pay the fees and tithes, and to submit to the discipline of the Roman Catholic parish priest. In Hungary and Transylvania, they possessed from the time of the Reformation, and preserved unimpaired, much greater rights. The successors of Joseph II revoked a part of his legislation, and, in general, accorded the churches of the Pope abroad, but continued to withhold from the Roman Church in Austria many rights which she possessed in most other states (as holding of councils, connection of the monastic orders with their several superiors in Rome, formations of religious associations, etc.). The year 1848 brought to all the religious denominations the promise of self-government in the province of the provinces, in the church, and the protection of the festivals of the Protestants in the localities in which they are the most numerous; 9. The Synod of Protestant teachers, in granting the right of the Roman Catholic schools in existence in the same locality, as it also against the ordination which forbids Catholic parents placing their children with Protestant foster-parents; 10. The General Synod advances claims on the funds of the Protestant churches in favor of the Protestant schools; 11. It demands the admission of Protestant teachers in the Catholic schools; 12. The incorporation of the Protestant theological faculty into the University of Vienna; 13. The representation of the Evangelical Church in the Diet and in the Municipal Council. All these articles, with one or two exceptions, were very harmonious. A union between the Lutherans and the Reformed churches, as it has been consummated in several German countries, was not resolved upon, but both synods will continue to meet simultaneously, and at the same place, and to deliberate on all subjects not strictly denominational in their character. The nationality question, which produces so much trouble in the politics of Austria, led on some questions to a disagreement between the German majority and the Slavic minority, as the former were unwilling to concede everything the latter demanded, but it produced no open rupture.

II. Ecclesiastical Statistics. — The following table exhibits the membership of the several denominations in every province according to the census of 1867. It appears from this table that the Roman Catholic Church, if we include the United Greeks, has a majority in every province except Transylvania. In Galicia the Greek Catholics excelled the Roman Catholics of the Latin rite. The Roman Catholic Church (Latin rite) had, in 1859, 13 archbishoprics: Agram, Colocz, Erolan, Gran, Gorizia and Gradiska, Lemberg, Olmütz, Prague, Salzburg, Udine, Venice, Zara. The archbishop of Venice has the title patriarch, and the archbishop of Udine is merely not in possession of the see at the present moment, as the diocese is divided into several districts of the Austrian province. The number of bishops since the separation of Lombardy is 53. There were, in 1851, 4,826 parishes and local chaplaincies, and 4,916 priests.
The Greek United Church has two archbishoprics, Lemberg and Fogaras (the latter of recent erection), and 8 bishoprics. The United Armenian Church, 1 archbishop at Lemberg; these two churches together had, in 1831, 4283 parishes and local chaplaincies, and 5098 secular priests. The Greek (non-united) Church has a patriarch-archbishop at Carlovitz, 10 bishops, 3201 parishes or local chaplaincies, and 4036 secular priests. The number of convents is constantly increasing. In 1849, 789 convents of monks and 176 of nuns were counted in the Roman Catholic Church, and 44 convents of monks, with 271 members, in the Greek (non-united) Church. The Protestants of the Confession of Augsburg (Lutherana) were, until 1869, divided into 10 superintendencies, and the Protestants of the Helvetic Confession (Reformed Church) into 8, 4 superintendencies of each church being in Hungary. In a territorial respect the Protestant churches are divided into three groups, which, with regard to church government, are independent of each other: viz., 1. Hungary, with the adjacent countries; 2. Transylvania; 3. the other provinces. The two Protestant churches of the last group are under the jurisdiction of the Consistory of Vienna. Together they had, in 1851, 3162 parishes, which number has since considerably increased. The Unitarians have 1 superintendent at Klausthal and Transylvania. Theological faculties for education of Roman Catholic priests are connected with each of the nine Austrian and 18 Catholic seminaries; the University of Innspruck has been wholly transferred to the order of the Jesuits. Besides these theological faculties there are episcopal seminaries, in which theology and philosophy are taught, in nearly every diocese. In addition to them, seminaria psueorum (seminaries for boys who have the priesthood in view) have, since 1848, been erected in many dioceses. The priests of the United Greeks are educated at Lemberg and Fogaras, those of the Non-united Greeks at Czernowicz (Galicia) and Carlovitz (Hungary). For Protestant theologians there is a theological faculty at Vienna, which, however, is not connected with the university. Hungary has six schools for the study of theology and philosophy, three for each of the two churches. The Unitarians have a college at Klausthal. Authorieth. Johann Hermann Ferdinand von M. D. was born at Stuttgart, 20th October, 1772, and died 24 May, 1835, at Tübingen, where he was professor of the classics. He was the author of a treatise, Uber das Buch Hlob (Tübing, 1823), and an essay, Uber den Ur sprung der Beschneidung bei weiden und halbweiden Völkern (Tübing, 1829), besides many medical essays, for which see Hoefler, Biog. Générale, s. v.

Authentically. A term frequently used in reference to the literary history of the Holy Scriptures. (1.) In a broad and loose sense, by the authenticity of the canonical books is meant that they were really written by the authors whose names they bear; that those which are anonymous were written at the time in which they profess that they were written; and that their contents are credible. (2.) In careful and scientific researches, authenticity implies authority: an authentic account is truthful, and therefore credible. A genuine book, on the other hand, is one written by a person whose name it bears, whether it be truthful or not. Thus, for instance, Addison's History of Europe is genuine, because it was written by Addison; but it is not authentic, because it looks at facts with partisan eyes. — Home, Introduction, II. 1. Authority. (1.) In matters religious and ecclesiastical, an assumed right of dictation, attributed to certain fathers, councils, or church courts. On this subject Bishop Hoadley writes: "Authority is the greatest and most irreconcilable enemy to truth and argument that this world ever furnished. All the sophistry—all the humor of philosophical possibility—all the cunning of the subtlest disputers in the world may be laid open and turned to the advantage of that very truth which they designed to hide; but against authority there is no defense." He shows that it was authority which crushed the noble sentiments of Societies and others, and that by authority the Jews and heathens contradicted the truth of the Gospel; and that, when Christians increased into a majority, and came to think the same method to be the only proper one for the advantage of their cause which had been the enemy and destroyer of it, then it was the authority of Christians, which, by degrees, not only laid waste the honor of Christianity, but well-nigh extinguished it among men. It was authority which would have prevented all reformation where it is, and which has put a barrier against it wherever it is not. The remark of Charles II. is worthy of notice—that those of the established faith make much of the authority of the church in their disputes with dissenters, but that they take it all away when they deal with papists.—Buck, Theol. Dict. s. v.

(2.) In a proper sense, by the "authority of the church" is meant either the power residing generally in the whole body of the faithful to execute the trust committed by Christ to his church, or the particular power residing in certain official members of that body. The first-named authority is vested in the clergy and laity jointly, the latter in the clergy alone. In the interpretation of Scripture for any church, that church's authority does not belong to all divines or "distinguished theologians" who may be members of the church, but only to the authorized formularies. Single writers of every age are to be taken as expressing only their individual opinions. The agreement of these opinions at any one period, or for any lengthened space of time, may and must be used as proof to ourselves, privately, as to the predominant sentiments of the church at that time, but no opinions can be quoted as deciding authoritatively any disputed question. The universal church "deserves deference in all controversies of faith; and every particular church has a right to defend such rights and ceremonies as are not contrary to God's written word; but no church has a right to enforce any thing as necessary for salvation, unless it can be shown so to be by the express declaration of Holy Scripture. See the XXIst and XXXIVth Articles of the Church of England, and the Vth and XXIst of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Eden, Theol. Dict. e. v. See Rule of Faith; Tradition.

I. Anglo-Saxon Translations. — Though our Anglo-Saxon ancestors early possessed translations, chiefly from the Latin, of at least portions of the Scriptures, the first attempt with which we are acquainted is the rude but interesting poem ascribed to CEDMAN, a monastic bishop of Winchelsea, which contains the leading events of Old Testament history, and renders several passages with tolerable fidelity; but the epic and legendary character of the composition preclude it from being ranked among the versions of Holy Writ. The first portion of it, entitled The Fall of Man, has been translated by Bosanquet (Long. 1860, 8vo). This work was succeeded in the following century by the Anglo-Saxon Psalter, said to have been translated by ALDHELM, bishop of Sherborn, who died in 709; the first fifty Psalms are in prose, the others in verse. About the same period, GETHLAC, the first Saxon anchorite, is reported to have translated the Psalms. The next laborer in the field was the Venerable BIDE, who turned the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer into Anglo-Saxon. He also translated the Gospel of John, and completed it just as death put an end to his learned labors, in the monastery of Jarrow, on the south bank of the Tyne, A.D. 785. The close of the next century probably produced the celebrated Durharn Book, containing the four Gospels in Anglo-Saxon, written between the lines of an earlier Latin copy, by Alldred, a priest. The following is the Lord's Prayer from this version — Matt. vii, 9-13.

Fader unu th euth in heofonum, sie gehalgud noma thin: to cmeth rig thin; sie wile thin sunes inheordne in eorthe; hiaf usum orfe wistle susi tudere: & forges us rydla susi susu forsoton seydum susum; & no inledi us in costungus uigfrycefrum frime.

The Psalms, which have the Anglo-Saxon word placed over the corresponding Latin, was probably executed about the same period, by Owyn, aided by Farman, a priest at Harewood. About this time, AIIHEBRB, bishop of the See of York, undertook an Anglo-Saxon translation of the Ten Commandments, with such of the Mosaic injunctions from the xxi, xxii, and xxiii chapters of Exodus as were most to his purpose.

He is also said to have entered upon a translation of the Psalms, which he did not live to finish. Next in order come some fragments of an imperfect intermediary version of the Book of Psalms, far from perfect. Similar glosses were made on the Psalter; also on the Canticles of the Church, the Lord's Prayer, and other portions of Scripture. In the latter part of the tenth century, the monk Elfric translated — omitting some parts, and greatly abridging others — the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, a portion of the Books of Kings, Esther, Job, Judith, and the Maccabees, in Anglo-Saxon, a brief account of the books of the Old and New Testaments; and, by the texts and quotations used in his homilies, he contributed greatly to the knowledge of the Scriptures. A third Anglo-Saxon version of the four Evangelists, of which there are two copies, and a few copies of the Psalms, appear to have been executed at a later period, probably but a little before the time of the Norman Conquest. With these, the series of Anglo-Saxon translations of parts of Scripture would seem to end; though it is not improbable that other portions of Scripture were translated which have not come down to us. Before the middle of the eleventh century the language of Cedmon and Bede had undergone important changes, probably through the influence of Edward the Confessor and his Norman associates, among whom he had been educated. At the period of the Conquest, A.D. 1066, the Norman began rapidly to revolutionize the Latin and Anglo-Saxon language. Soon after this period a version of the Gospels appears to have been made, of which there are three copies, and it is difficult to determine whether they are to be assigned to the Anglo-Saxon or Anglo-Norman class of literary remains. Before the year 1200 the Anglo-Normans had translated into their own dialect, in prose, the Psalter and Canticles of the Church, and towards the middle of the following century appear to have possessed not only a history of the Old Testament in verse, as far as the end of the books of Kings, but also, it is supposed, a prose version of a great part of the Bible. Nevertheless, the Anglo-Saxon versions and glosses of the Gospels, and other portions of Scripture, continued long after in partial use. See Anglo-Saxon Versions.

II. Early English Translations. — The earliest essays of Biblical translation assumed in English, as in most other languages, a poetical form. The Ormulum, written perhaps at the commencement of the thirteenth century, is a noble example of verse of the paraphrase of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles. The Biblical poem called "Soulehole" was probably written about the same period. To a later period of the same century belongs the poem reciting the principal events in the books of Genesis and Exodus. Apparently coeval with this is the metrical version, from the Latin, of the whole book of Psalms. In some manuscripts a version is found partly similar, but with amendments and revisions, probably the partial adaptation of the same version to a more modern diction and orthography. The 100th Psalm is here given as a specimen of this ancient English version.

Mitches to God al that us Serves to loved in felness,
In go yel al in his rih,
In gladness that is so brijth.
Whiles that loved god is he thus,
He us made and our soi nech,
His folk and ship of his fode;
In ges euy his gratitude are god's;
In schrit his worches belive,
In yrge to him yhe aerche, Heryes his name for louere he banhe,
In all his merci do in stende and stende.

The earliest version in English prose of any entire book of Scripture is the book of Psalms, translated by WILLIAM of NEWCASTLE, a Norman, born in Kent. The translation is generally faithful and literal. The following is a specimen of this version — Ps. xxiii, 1-6:

Digitized by Google
Our Lord goeth me and nothing shall defasten to me; In the steed of pasture he set me there. He nourised me up waters of life, for the waters of life have made me glad. He made me v p the bristliest of rynultums; for his name. For yf that I have shown ammend of the shadow of dete. Y s shall noy doth comfort of the world. Y shall do me ammendung; comforted me. Thou madest radia grace in my soul; ouayna hem that trublen me. Thou madest feit my soul and madest me to full- celer. And thy merci shall folwen me; alle dala of mil lif. And that I woonne in thee of our Lord; in length of dala.

Schorham's version of the Psalms could scarcely have been completed, when another was undertaken by Richard Rolle, chantry priest at Hampole, near Doncaster, who died in 1349. Of this work of Rolle, to which he subjoined a commentary, there were copies which were still in use at the time in which this original must have been altered to some extent. The following is a specimen of this version—Ps. lxix, 1-6:

God, gnis come in this heritage; thei fled thi holy tempul, thei sette Jerusalem in kepyng of appult. Thei sette the dynde bodys of thi serannate mecte to the fowyng of the lyft. Floche of thi halowes to be syfted of stryf. Theliple hore biode as waster in vmbgong of Jerusalem; and none was for to grane, hede to thei of thei myngag thyne ngnebors and hef- ling to alle that in oure vmbgong are. Hawe longe, shalt thou be wrothe in ende; kyndetl shall be thi luf as fir. Holde ongoun herte in gnis that thi ne knowe not; and in kyndgome that thi mem lace note.

All these versions were made in Latin, and some of the venerable relics still exist in manuscript in the public libraries in the kingdom. A few of them have been printed as objects of literary curiosity. It was not till about the year 1380 that our language was enriched with a complete copy of the Scriptures, by the hands of Wycliffe and his coadjutors, not improbable with the aid of other fragmentary portions then existing. This translation was made from the Latin Vulgate, collated with other old copies. For several centuries there had occasionally been found fragments in English in the same language, with the Hebrew and Greek languages; and, though Wycliffe occasionally introduced Greek words in some of his writings, yet it seems scarcely probable that the knowledge of Greek possessed by him was at all sufficient to enable him to translate from that language. Hence, if the translation in any way resembles the Latin, it belonged to a later and more critical age to use the originals in forming vernacular versions of the Scriptures. The translation of the New Testament was probably the work of Wycliffe himself. During its progress, the Old Testament was taken in hand by one of Wycliffe's coadjutors; and from a note written in the margin of the oldest existing portion of the Book of Baruch, the translation is assigned to Nicholas de Herford. Not unlikely the cause of this manuscript, and also of another which is probably a copy, suddenly breaking off in the Book of Baruch, was the summons which Herford received to appear before the Synod in 1382. The translation was evidently completed by a different hand, not improbable by Wycliffe himself. However this may be, it was certainly through Wycliffe's energy that the earliest translation of the whole Bible in the English language was carried on and executed. Many of the peculiarities of his translation are still attributed to the time in which Wycliffe lived; and it is remarkable that, in his version of the Scriptures, he writes far more intelligible English than is found in his original works; the dignity of the book which he translated seems to have imparted an excellence of expression to the version itself. No part of the genius of the man was better illustrated than in his Song of Solomon, by Dr. Adam Clarke, in his Commentary, until 1848, when Mr. L. Wilson published the New Testament in a beautiful Gothic-letter quarto volume. More recently, the entire Bible, accompanied with Purvey's revision, has been published. The following are specimens of Wycliffe's translation—Gen. iii, 7, 8; Luke viii, 31-39:

And the ezen of both being openend; and whanne thed knewen hem stille to be nakid, thed sowedon to gide leasses of a foole wynde to seone y a figno tre and mede hem bruyke. And whanne thed were by the voye of the Lord God gyngwe in paradis in the snyngwe after myd-dal, Adam had hyd hisem and his wif fro the face of the Lord God in the gardyn of eden and the tree of amending.

And thel priden him, that he slechrute not comandane hem, that thel sullen be helto to the devouns, that many houles ther was here leesseweynge in an hit, and thel priden him, that he slechrute suffre hem to entere in to him. And hem he sullif suffre hem to entere in to hem, that hem suffrde the devouns to dede wynds westen hem the devouns, and entrinde in to hoggel; and withe the flore wene heilugis in the to the lake of water, and was straitly.

As Wycliffe's translation was completed in a comparatively short space of time, and necessarily possessed blunders incident to a first edition, it is not surprising that a revised version was contemplated even in his lifetime. The change was made, according to him, about the year 1888, not more than four years after the death of Wycliffe, the revision was accomplished, but with few substantial differences of interpretation, by Purvey, who had been Wycliffe's curate, and, after his death, became the leader of the Lollard party. Purvey's revision rendered the text more correct, intelligible, and popular, and caused the earlier translation to fall into disuse. Copies of this revision were rapidly multiplied; even now, more than one hundred and fifty copies of the whole or part of Purvey's Bible are in existence. The following are specimens of Purvey's version—Gen. iii, 7, 8; Luke viii, 31-39:

And the ezen of both being openend; and whanne thed knewen hem stille to be nakid, thed sowedon to gide leasses of a foole wynde to seone y a figno tre and mede hem bruyke. And whanne thed were by the voye of the Lord God gyngwe in paradis in the snyngwe after myd-dal, Adam had hyd hisem and his wif fro the face of the Lord God in the gardyn of eden and the tree of amending.

Notwithstanding the prohibitory constitutions of Archbishop Arundel in 1408, and the high price of manuscripts, both versions were extensively multiplied; they contributed largely to the religious knowledge which prevailed at the commencement of the Reformation, and probably be first ones to come into the hands of the people. In the year 1413, the first one of Wycliffe's Testaments was not less than four marks and forty pence, or £2 10s. 6d., equal to £4 2s. 6d. now, taking sixteen as the multiple for bringing down the money of that time to our standard. It is somewhat remarkable that the revised version by Purvey has been taken until recently as the only one in circulation. A portion of the New Testament portion was published by Lewis, 1731; by Baber, 1810; and again by Bagster, in his English Hexysly. It is, however, now known that the most ancient version is Wycliffe's, and the revised or modern one is by Purvey. These two earliest English versions of the entire Bible by Wycliffe and Purvey were printed, column by column on the same page, with various readings from the several manuscripts, in four splendid quarto volumes, under the care of the Rev. J. Forshall and Sir F. Madden, Oxford University Press, 1830.

The circulation of Wycliffe's version, and that of his reviser, Purvey, in manuscript, was the sowing of seed destined to yield a mighty harvest. The down-fall of the Eastern empire in 1453 contributed to the revival of learning by scattering learned Greeks, who carried with them manuscript treasures from Constantinople. The printing-press contributed immensely to the reviving of the library and to the extending the press to several places on the Continent the Scriptures were printed not only in Latin, but in Hebrew and Greek, thus providentially preparing for setting forth the Inspired Oracles in the vernacular tongues. In England, however, the operation of the press was slow. In vain do we look over the list of works by the father of the press in England, for a copy of any portion of
The scriptures. The earliest attempt at giving forth any portion of the scriptures in print in English was a translation of the contents of the Psalms, in 1505, by Fisher, the Romish bishop of Rochester; and even this was printed on the Continent, though published at London. The instrument in the hand of God for translating the New Testament, and a great part of the Old, out of the original tongues into English, was William Tindal. But England Tyndale could find no place to print his translation of the New Testament. In the year 1524 he passed over to Hamburg, where he is said to have published the same year the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. As, however, no fragment of this first fruit of Tyndale's labor is known to be remaining, we suspect that it is lost. It was probably printed in Paris, and was first printed at Cologne. In September, 1525, Tyndale, with his assistant Roye, was at Cologne, actually engaged in bringing the first edition of his New Testament, in quarto, through the press. When the sheets of this edition were printed as far as the signature K, the printer, through the influence of Cochlinis, a Romish deacon, was interdicted from proceeding further with the work. Tyndale and his assistant snatched away some of the printed sheets, and fled to Worms. In this city Tyndale immediately printed an octavo edition of his Testament; then, it is said, he completed the quartus which had been interrupted, and published both in Leipzig, at the close of 1525, and in 1526. The only relic of the precious old quartus, which was the first partially printed edition, for we are inclined to think that it never was completed, was discovered in 1854 by the late Mr. Rodd, and is now in the British Museum. It only contains the prologue, a table of the books of the New Testament, and part of the Gospel of Matthew—chap. i. xxi. The following is a specimen of this fragment, printed at Cologne by P. Quentell—Matt. ii, 1, 2:

When Jesus was born in Bethlehem a town of Judæa, in the time of Herod, King of Judæa, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him. The only known perfect copy of the octavo, which was the second printed, but the first published complete edition of Tyndale's New Testament, is preserved in the Baptist College Library, Bristol. The following is a specimen of this edition, printed at Worms at the close of 1525 or early in 1526—Mark iv, 3-5:

When he was in Bethsaida in the house of Simon the leper, and he sat at meat; and there was a woman of Samaria that kept an alabaster box of ointment, which she had made of spikenard, pure and costly, and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. Then said Jesus, Whereunto shall this ointment be to me? But they said, Except thou hadst done this unto the poor, thou hadst done right. But she hath done what she could; she hath done it willingly. And she left a name that is recorded through all ages. And they glorified him. In November, 1534, Tyndale published at Antwerp a third edition, "diligently corrected and compared with the Greeke." The second or first complete edition, though a most important advance, certainly bears marks of haste; but the edition of 1534, revised by himself, stands in the first place as exhibiting Tyndale as a translator. The following is a specimen of this edition—Mark iv, 3-5:

When he was in Bethsaida, in the house of Simon the leper, even as he sat at meat, there came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment, which was pure and costly, and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. And there were some that were there disconteining themselves, saying, Whereunto shall this ointment be to me? But Jesus said, Except thou hadst done this unto the poor, thou hadst done right. But she hath done what she could; she hath done it willingly. And they glorified him. That Tyndale's New Testament was translated from the Greek, no one can question who has examined it with care; it will be found continually to leave the scriptures of the Vulgate. Mr. Zuerze, and adheres to the third edition of Erasmus's Greek Testament, printed in 1522. Sometimes, indeed, great deference is paid to the critical observations of Erasmus; but still the translation is made from the Greek, and not from his Latin version. When Erasmus departed from the Greek, as he does in several places, apparently through inadvertence, Tyndale does not follow him, but adheres closely to the original. As Tyndale's New Testaments were eagerly bought up, partly by erudite inquirers, and partly by others for destruction, numerous surreptitious copies rapidly issued from different presses, chiefly by the order of this edition. The time about fourteen editions were issued, and eight or nine in 1538, the year of his death. A very curious edition of Tyndale's Testament was printed, probably at Antwerp in 1538, during the translator's imprisonment at Vilvorde. The letter and the spelling prove that it was printed in the Low Countries. Some suppose that the book which was produced at this time, is that of Tyndale's native county, peculiarly adapted to agricultural laborers; and that, by this edition, he nobly redeemed his bold pledge given to the priest in Gloucestershire many years before, "If God spare me life, ere many years I will cause the boy that driveth the plow to know more of the Scriptures than you do." He also put headings for the first time to the chapters. The following is a specimen of this edition—1 Cor. xvi, 41:

Wisdom is one manner of glory of the sunne, & a nother glory of the moonne, & a nother glory ye stars. For out: stars differeth fro a nother in glory. The edition of Tyndale's New Testament, printed in folio, at London, by Thomas Berthelet, in 1536, from the revised edition of 1534, was the first portion of the English Scriptures printed on English ground. The following is a specimen of this rare and interesting edition—1 Cor. xvi, 45, 46:

The first man Adam was made a lyvyng soule, and the last Adam was made a spirytuall Homin to him that is nat frytich which is spirituall: but that which is natural, & than that which is spirituall. The martyr Tyndale was also the first to translate the five books of Moses into English from the Hebrew. As the books of Genesis and Numbers are in Gothic letter, while those of Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy are in Roman type, it would appear that these books were printed at separate times and in different places. The following occurs at the end of Genesis—"Emperius eritus in the last line, farewell, Helme. By me, Hans Luft, the yer of our Lordes 1580, the 17 days of Januarii." Tyndale also translated and published the Book of Jonah. In the succeeding years of his life he was engaged in translating, perhaps in conjunction with Rogers, the remaining books of the Bible. Tyndale's translation, as far as the end of Chronicles, was printed by Rogers and issued as part of his martyrdom, to have been in the possession of Rogers. The following is a specimen of Tyndale's Pentateuch of 1530—Gen. xxiii, 18-20:

And she hasted and late downe her pytcher upon her armes and gese him drinke. And shee had green hym drynke, she sayd: I will drawe water for thy camels also, unlesse thou haue dronke ynowe. And she pumpd out her pytcher in to the trough, and watered the shee, and agayne unto the well, to fet water: and drew for all his camels. During the year 1530, the Argentine English Psalter was printed. The translator, who rendered from the Latin, calls himself J ohan Alref. The date at the end of this Psalter is January 10, 1530; it seems to have been, perhaps, an antedating, the first whole book of the Psalter which was translated into English, the completion of Tyndale's Genesis having appeared one day subsequent. In 1531 there was published a translation of Isaiah by George Joye; in 1533, two leaves of Genesis; and in 1534 he published a translation of Jeremiah and the Book of Psalms. These portions were also translated from the Latin Vulgate. Mr. Lox, in his life of the translator, published not to translate, the whole Bible into English. He commenced this work in November, 1534, and it was printed, probably at Zurich, in October, 1535. Though Coverdale had evidently the Hebrew and Greek before him, he freely translated the translations of Tyndale both printed and perhaps manuscript. He speaks of his having been aided by five sundry interpreters in the Dutch, German, and Latin languages. In the Old Testament he may have had, 1st, the Latin Vulgate; 2d, Pagninus’s version; 3d, Luther’s German translation; 4th, Leo Juda’s German-Swiss version; 5th, the Latin version connected with Sebastian Munster’s Hebrew Bible, the first volume of which was printed in 1534. The New Testament appears to be in part a revision of Tyndale’s, in which Coverdale took much care, and availed himself both of the edition of 1525 and the amended one of 1534. This Bible, with its title-page of 1535, had the following as the title: “Brittia. The Bible, that is, the holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament, faithfully and truly translated out of Douche and Latyn into English.” However, it must be observed, the use of the words “out of Douche, i.e. German, and Latyn, was merely a bookselling artifice by the printers, to make the work circulate better, as being intimately connected with the reformed doctrines, which were then equally well known by the name of German or Dutch doctrines. In the new title inserted the following year, these terms were left out. Coverdale certainly did not follow the Latin, nor even Luther’s version; there is no doubt he did himself all the different means of assistance within his power. This Bible was reprinted with some amendments at Zurich in 1537, with a London title-page, and was then allowed by the king to “go abroad among the people,” but without any regal imprint or license. The following is a specimen of Coverdale’s translation—Ps. xc (xlii), 4, 5:

He shall cover the vnder his wings, that thou mayest be safe vnder his fethers: his faithfulness and trueth shall be thy shylde and buckler. So yth shal not need to be a feryed for euery bugges, serpent, or any other dawe.

In the year 1537, the translations of Tyndale were published in a collected form, under the name of “Thomas Matthew.” The editing of this Bible was realy the work of the martyr Rogers. To this edition was prefixed, An Exhortation to the Study of the Holy Scriptures, beneath which stand J. R., the initials of his name. In the execution of this work, Rogers had the assistance of the avowedly unconverted imprimatur manuscripts, before him. The Old Testament is a reprint of Tyndale’s Pentateuch; the remainder, as far as the Second Book of Chronicles, was copied from Tyndale’s manuscripts, which were undoubtedly in Rogers’s safe keeping. The New Testament was Tyndale’s of 1536. The author of the printer’s labor was not then stamped upon it as clearly to show that at least two thirds of the translation were his work; the remainder is the work of Rogers, who was probably aided by Coverdale’s sheets. At the end of the Old Testament, the letters W. T. are printed in very large text capitals curiously flourished. This Bible was probably printed at Leubeck, and it is impossible that it was printed at all in the press, under the joint labors of Tyndale and Rogers, at the time of Tyndale’s arrest and martyrdom. Much credit is due to Rogers, who probably resided at the place of printing, as the careful editor of this Bible; he was evidently a fine scholar, and he seems to have acted both as inquiring to give his countrymen a Bible as correct as possible, and likewise to perpetuate the labors of Tyndale, his friend and instructor in the truth of the Gospel. This Bible was translated by the first Hebrew, Greek, and English scholars, and is executed most in conformity with the views of the latest and best Biblical critics. This revision, which is frequently but not entirely correct; “‘Tyndale’s Bible,” appeared with the then much coveted words, “Set forth with the king’s most gracious license;” hence it was the first properly authorized edition of the English Bible. This Bible—at least part of it—appears to have been printed at the expense of Richard Bancroft, his partner, Edward Ritchurch—who afterwards married the widow of Archbishop Cranmer. They, about the same period, became printers themselves, as their initials appear at the beginning of the Prophets, where, perhaps, the part of the expense which they defrayed commenced. “Thomas Matthew” may actually have been the person at whose cost the whole improvement or correction of this Bible was brought about, the popular translation, and from the various editions it appears to have been much used for many years. The following is a specimen of Tyndale’s rendering from the Hebrew—2 Sam. i, 17, 18:

And David sang these songs of mourning over Saul and his House; and the Lamentations of his mother. And he had to teach the children of Israel the stanzas thereof.

In 1538, several editions of Coverdale’s new version of the New Testament were published. He also issued several editions of the English New Testament, together with the text of the Latin Vulgate. The printing of this Diggleshott Testament was executed with great carelessness, so that Coverdale had it speedily reprinted in Paris. It is probable that Nicholson the printer, hearing that Coverdale’s Latin and English Testament was about to be reprinted at Paris, with more attention to accuracy, printed the one bearing the name of “Elizabith’s” within a month; in order to anticipate the Paris edition. The following is a specimen of Coverdale’s Testament—Matt. v, 13:

Ye are the salt of the earth. But if ye salt vndavie abke, wherein shall it be salted? it is thereby good for nothing, but to be cast into the vnter of the maws.

In the year 1540, he published the English translation known by the name of “The Great Bible.” This edition was executed under the superintendence of Grafton, to whom Coverdale lent his aid as corrector. This Bible was printed at Paris by the permission of Francis I., obtained by Henry VIII. But, notwithstanding the royal license, just as the work was well advanced, the Inquisition interposed, and issued the order dated December 17, 1538, summoning the French printers, their English employers, and Coverdale, the corrector of the work, and inhibited their farther proceeding. The impression, consisting of 2500 copies, was seized, confiscated, and condemned to the flames. Four great dry-fats full, however, of these books escaped the fire by the agency of the avowedly unconverted imprimatur manuscripts, before them; and the burning of them; and the English proprietors, who had fled on the first alarm, returned to Paris as soon as it was subsided, and not only recovered some of these copies, but brought with them to London the presses, type, and even the workmen, and resuming the work, finished it, but in a very laborious manner. This Bible, which is a revision of Matthew’s version, probably by the hand of Coverdale, has been unhappily confounded with “Cramner’s Bible,” issued in 1540. The preface written by Cranmer for the edition of 1540 was inserted in some copies of the Great Bible, but subsequently to their completion. The statesman Cromwell, not Cranmer, was the master-spirit, not only in getting up this edition, but in securing the royal injunction that “the whole Bible, of the largest volume in English,” should be set up in the churches. This edition, continued, with slight alterations, to be the authorized English version of the Bible—except, of course, during the reign of Elizabeth, when, on the 29th of April, 1559, it was superseded by the Bishop’s Bible. The Psalms in this Bible were the same as those found in the book of Common Prayer, having seventeen interpolations from the Septuagint or Latin Vulgate, but printed in a smaller type, and between parentheses. These readings were marked in Coverdale’s Bible as not being authorized by the Church of England, and continued in Cranmer’s editions. The following is a specimen, with the interpolation in smaller type, which includes three verses—Ps. xiv, 3, 4:

But they are all gone out of the ways, they are altogether become abominable: there is none that doth good, no not one (they there is an open sepulchre: with their toses they have dysrene their ears from the face of the earth: the earth is full of of carvings and buttervans: they are swift to shed blood. In-story and unhappiness is in them eyes, and the way of peace they know not, nor do they come to know the fountain of the they have no knowledge that they are all such workers of mys-cheets, exagyye up my people as it were brass.

In the year 1589, another edition of the Bible appeared to the king. It was the new recension of Matthew's Bible, executed by Richard Taverner, under the patronage of Lord Cromwell. The three editions through which this Bible almost immediately went prove that its circulation was considerable, though it is to be observed that they were pri-ately printed, as they were used by, those who used it, as ever, even for a time, publicly made an authorized version. Tav-nerer's New Testament, of which he published two editions, is a different recension from that which accompanied his "Recognition of the Bible.

In the year 1540 "Cranner's Bible" was issued from Grafton and Withchurch press. This was probably the first complete Bible ever printed in England. This edition, of which only five hundred copies were printed, was a mere revision of the Great Bible of 1589, and had a preface by Cranmer. Another edition, "overseen and perused," by the king's command, by Cuthbert Tottall, bishop of Durham, and Nicholas Crandall, bishop of Rochester, also made a few variations in the text, appeared in 1541. The following is a specimen from Cranmer's New Testament—Matt. vi, 9-13:

Out our father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Let thy kingdom come. Thy will be fulfilled; as it is in heaven, so it is on earth. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom and the power, and the glory for ever. Amen.

The only impressions of any portions of the Scriptures which were printed during the remainder of the reign of Henry appear to have been the Epistles and Gospels for the Sundays, in 1549, probably an edition of the Pentateuch in 1544, Joyce's book of Daniel and the books of Solomon in 1545, and the New Testament according to the text of the Great Bible in 1546. The number of copies of the Scriptures in circulation at this time must, however, have been very considerable. In 1547 a statute was published which prohibited the printing of Tyndale's version; and in 1546 Coverdale's translation, as well as Tyndale's, was prohibited by a stringent proclamation, and all such books were to be delivered up to persons appointed for the purpose, in order that they might be burned. The diligence with which Henry's professed annihilators, in the destruction of the earlier editions, accounts for the very few copies which have come down to our time. The destruction appears to have been almost as complete as that of the earlier editions of Tyndale's New Testament.

Among the early acts of the reign of Edward VI was the reversing of the restrictions which had been laid on the circulation and the reading of the Scriptures. Yet no new recension or translation was published, except a translation of the paraphrase of Erasmus in 1549-50. Among those who took part in this work was Coverdale; and the Princess Mary—the future persecuting queen—translated a portion of the Gospel of John. Another translation of the new translation of the Bible; but Pagius and Bucer died, and the work was frustrated. An edition of Coverdale's Bible, said to have been printed at Zurich, was published in 1550. This edition was probably one of the two revisions which Coverdale mentioned in his sermon at Paul's Cross, in which he defended his version, and said that it was the best that he knew for the time being, as he had twice before, doubted not he should amend." During some part of this reign Sir John Cheke translated the Gospel of Matthew, and perhaps part of Mark, but the translation was not then published. The following is a specimen of Cheke's version—Matt. ii, 1:

When Jesus was born in Bethlem a cit of Juri in king Herod's time there was a report among the Wises men that

However, many editions of the Bible were printed, some being reprints of Matthew's Bible, some of Cranmer's, and some of Tavener's Recognition. The total number of impressions of the Bible in the reign of Edward was at least thirteen. There were also several editions of the New Testament, some of Tyndale's translations, some of Coverdale's version, and some, according to Cranmer's Bible. The number of these editions of the New Testament amounts to at least twenty-five, so that the whole number of Bibles and Testaments in circulation comprised many thousand copies.

On the accession of Mary the printing and the circulation of the Scriptures in English was hindered, so that her reign only witnessed the printing of one edition of the New Testament, printed at Geneva in 1557. The translator of the Generation Testament was Wiliam Whittingham, a native of Holmest, six miles from Durham, who was one of the exiles from England. On the accession of Mary the printing and the circulation of the Scriptures in English was hindered, so that her reign only witnessed the printing of one edition of the New Testament, printed at Geneva in 1557. The translator of the Generation Testament was Wiliam Whittingham, a native of Holmest, six miles from Durham, who was one of the exiles from England. This was a small square volume, printed in Roman letters, with the supplementary words in italics. It was the first English New Testament divided into verses and broken into small sections or paragraphs. The preface was written by John Calvin, whose sister Catharine was married to Whittingham. In the preface the author renders not a little service to the translator followed the judgment of Beza in his theological views. The following is a specimen of this version—Matt. xiii, 19:

When seen a man hearth the words of the kyngdome, and vnderstandeth it not, there commeth that cuyf one, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart, and this is the corn which was sown by the way syde.

Whittingham and his companions in exile also executed a translation of the whole Bible at Geneva, and it is not unlikely that Coverdale aided in the work. The translators probably had motives which sufficiently influenced them in executing a new version, instead of giving a mere reprint or revision of any which had preceded. The intention of such a work had been entertained in the reign of Edward VI, and it is probable that in this projected revision, from the manner in which the name of Bucer was connected with it, there was an intention to embody the results of the translation made from the biblical knowledge possessed by the Reformers on the Continent. This translation differed from all that had preceded it not only in its plan, but also in its execution. The other versions had been generally the work or the revision of an individual, or, at most, of a small band of persons; but this the translation of certain particular parts; in this translation we find, on the contrary, many acting unitedly in the formation of a version, and thus, in the plan of operation, there was a principle of completeness which had not been acted on previously. The translators, by the use of supplementary words, often aided the sense without seeming to insert what was not found in the original. It was also stored with marginal notes. This version of the whole Bible was printed at Geneva by Rowland Hall in 1560, so that it was not published until after many of the exiles had returned home. In this translation, which was the first complete English Bible divided by verses, it is to be observed that the translation of the New Testament differs in several respects from that which had been separately printed in 1556. The expense of preparing the Geneva Bible was chiefly borne by John Bodley, the father of Sir Thomas, the founder of the noble library at Oxford. On the return of the exiles, Queen Elizabeth granted a patent to Bodley for the book, and again, on the desire to print this edition; yet, on account of the interferce of Archbishop Parker, no edition of the Geneva Testament or Bible was published in England till the year 1576. Immediately after Parker's death this version was published; it continued to be frequently reprinted in this country, and was for many years the popular version in England, having been only gradually displaced by King James's translation, which appeared fifty-one years afterward. From the peculiar reading in Gen. iii, 7, the editions of the Geneva version have been commonly known by the name of "Bradshaw's" but this reading, as we have already seen, is as old as Wycliffe's time, and occurs in his translation. To some editions of the Geneva Bible is subjoined Beza's translation of the New Testament, Englished by L. Thomson. The following are specimens of the Geneva Bible—Gen. xii, 42, 43, and Matt. xiv, 19.

And Pharaoh took of his ring from his hand, and put upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in garments of fine linen and put a golden chain about his neck, and he set him upon the best chariot that he had, and one of the chief of his eunuchs did he put over the land of Egypt. Whereupon man might bear the word of the kingdom, and understand it, not the dull one cometh, and catcheth away that which was sown in his heart: and this is he which hath the seed of the way side.

The next version of the Bible was superintended by Archibald Parker, hence sometimes called "Parker's Bible," and published in 1568. This version was executed with great care by more than fifteen learned men, the initials of whose names occur at the end of the portions executed by them. From the general character of those who were engaged in its preparation being bishops, this version is also called the "Bishops' Bible." This edition is adorned with one hundred and forty-three engravings, including portraits and maps, which give it quite a pictorial appearance. The passages from the Vulgate, which had been introduced into Cranmer's Psalms, are omitted in this edition. It is continued to be the version authorized to be read in the parish churches for forty-three years; but in private use it never displaced the Geneva version. Though the Bishops' Bible was the avowed basis of our authorized version, this latter was executed upon wholly different principles, and is very different in general character. The Vulgate was prefixed, among other things, the sum of Scripture, tables of genealogy, and a preface written by Parker.

In 1585, under Archibald Whitgift, the seventeen readings from the Latin Vulgate were re-introduced, so as to harmonize with the Psalms in the Prayer-book. The edition of 1572 contains a large version of the Latin Vulgate from the Cranmer's and part of the bishops'. The edition of 1595 has the Psalms according to Cranmer's Bible. The following is a specimen of this version—Mal. iii, 17:

And they shall hate to me, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day, saith the Lord of hosts, that do add (judgment), a foot to foot, I will spare them as a man sparing his own son which serveth him.

In the year 1582 was published the Anglo-Rheishm version of the New Testament. The circumstances which led to the execution of this version are to be found in the history of the expulsion of Romanists from England in the reign of Elizabeth. The versions of the New Testament previously executed, from that of Tyndale to the Bishops' Bible inclusively—the English text of Coverdale's Diglott New Testament excepted—had been made from the original Greek; but the Rheishm translators took for their basis the Latin Vulgate. Some of the principal objects which the Rheishm translators had in view was evidently to circulate their doctrinal and controversal notes, together with the Scriptures translated by them. Though the translators desired anything rather than to give the rendering of the text simply and fairly, for the purpose of as many dishonest persons; yet very many passages exhibit a desire of expressing the sense obscurely, or at least in such a way that a common reader may find not a little difficulty in gathering from the words a definite meaning. However, if we take the whole version, we shall find a very large portion well translated, and truly exhibiting the sense of the Latin Vulgate, such as they had it. Though the Council of Trent had defined the Latin Vulgate to be the "authentic" version, as yet, when the Rheishm version was printed, there had been no decision to what copy was to be regarded as such. The Rheishm translators, as may be supposed, did not exactly agree with either the Sixtine published in 1590, or the Ciemensine, published in 1593; and in 1598 they have the reading adopted afterward by the one, sometimes that which is found in the other. This may be said to be a matter of comparatively small importance, so long as they used the best readings which were within their reach, in the absence of an authentic edition of the Latin Vulgate.

The following is a specimen of this version—Heb. xi, 4:

By faith Abel offered a greater host to God than Cain; by which he obtained testimony that he was just, God giving testimony to his gifts, and by it he being dead yet speaketh.

The Romish translation of the Old Testament was published at Douay, in two volumes, in the years 1609 and 1610. The editors of this part of the version speak of it as having been executed many years before, but that the poor estate of the English Romanists, in their banishment, hindered its publication. They say that they have followed the very version accredited as the Ciemensine edition of the Vulgate, that thus it might be fully in accordance with "the authenticated Latin." The following is a specimen of this version—Gen. xlii, 10:

The scepter shall not be taken away from Judah, and a Tyre out of his thigh; but he that cometh up to him is to be sent, and the same shall be the expectation of that gentiles.

In the modern editions of the Douay Bible and the Rheishm Testament, many changes have been introduced, some of which approximate to the authorized version, while others are not improvements. It is marvellous how editions of the Scriptures were multiplied in the days of Tyndale, and how, during the severity of occasional persecutions. Besides about fourteen editions issued in Tyndale's life-time, eight or nine were issued in the year of his death. From the death of Tyndale to the close of Mary's reign, 1558, no fewer than fifty editions of the New Testament and twenty-six of the entire Bible were printed, and from 1558 to 1611 there were issued more than fifty editions of the New Testament, and about one hundred and twenty of the Bible, besides separate books. Of this number, twenty-one editions of the New Testament and sixty-four of the Bible were of the Genevan translation. Still the work of Tyndale forms substantially the basis of every revision, not excepting the translation now in common use.—Bastow.

III. History of the English Translation now in common Use.—The authorized version was undertaken at the command of King James I, in consequence of several objections having been made by the Puritans to the bishops' translation at the second day's sitting of the conference held at the palace of Hampton Court, January 16th, 1609-4. The method proposed by the king for the accomplishment of the new translation was thus: That the version should be made by some of the most learned men in both the universities; that it then should be reviewed by certain of the bishops; that it should then be laid before the royal privy council; and, last of all, be ratified by royal authority. Accordingly, fifty-four men, pre-eminently distinguished for piety and learning, were appointed to execute this great work. However, the list of persons actually employed in the translation contains only forty-two; the fifty-four dishonest persons; yet thus appointed were made bishops before the work was completed, yet, as none of them were so at the time of the appointment, it would appear that the number needed to make up the deficiency is to be found in the fact of certain bishops having been especially named as having the work in some manner under their control. This view is not improbable when It is known that Bancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, is said to have made some alterations in the version; and, if so, he, bishop of Winchester, was one of those who gave the work its final revision. The following is a list of the translators' names, by the paragraph the part of the text assigned, from Clarke's Commentary, Gen. Pref. to O.T.; Masculino, Authors of Eng. Bible, N. Y. 1853:

1. The Pentateuch; the story from Joshua to the First Book of the Chronicles exclusively: these ten persons at Westminster: Master of Pembroke Hall, in Cambridge; then dean of Westminster; afterward bishop of Worcester; Dr. MEADE, fellow of Pembroke College, in Cambridge; dean of St. Paul's; afterward bishop of Norwich. Dr. SARAVI. Dr. CLARKE, fellow of Pembroke College, in Cambridge; professor of divinity; Dr. LAFERRE, fellow of Trin. Coll., in Cambridge; president of St. Clement Danes. (Being skilled in architecture, his judgment was much relied on for the fabric of the Temple.) Dr. LEIGH, archdeacon of Middlesex; parson of All-Hallows, Barking. Master HUBERT. Mr. KING. Mr. THOMSON. Mr. BENEDICT. of Cambridge; vicar of Totham, near London.

2. From the First of the Chronicles, with the Rest of the Story of the Kings, the Apocrypha, etc., are the following eight persons at Cambridge: Master, Edward Lively. Mr. Richardson, fellow of Pembroke College, in Cambridge; after-d-D., master of Pembroke House Coll., then of Trin. Coll. Mr. CHADLEON, afterward D.D.; first of Christ Coll., then master of Emmanuel Coll. Mr. Darwell, fellow of Pembroke Coll., in Bedfordshire, where he died, a single and a wealthy man. Mr. ANDREWS, fellow of Pembroke Coll., in Cambridge; and master of Jesus Coll. Mr. HARRISON, the vice-master of Trinity Coll. Mr. SPALDING, fellow of St. John's Coll., in Cambridge, and master of Jesus Coll. Mr. KING, fellow of Peter-House Coll., in Cambridge, and Hebrew professor there.

3. The Four Greater Prophets, with the Lamentations, and the Twelve Lesser Prophets, these seven persons at Oxford: Mr. HARDING, pres. of Magdalen Coll. Dr. REYNOLDS, pres. of Corpus Christi Coll. Dr. Holland, rector of Exeter Coll. and king's professor. Dr. Kilby, rector of Lincoln Coll. and regius professor. Master Fairen, afterward D.D., and bp. of Gloucester. Dr. HART, tutor to the son of a good family, beneficed at Glaston, in Buckinghamshire. Mr. FAIRCLough.

5. Acts of the Apostles; these eight at Oxford: Dr. RIVET, dean of Christ Church, afterward bp. of London. Mr. BANCTOR, master of University Coll., and master of Pembroke Coll. Mr. CHAPMAN, reader in Newbrough, in Cambridge. Mr. THOMAS. Mr. NAYL. Mr. VRAN. Mr. RAMBER. Mr. RAMBER.

6. The Epistles of St. Paul, and the Canoncical Epistles; these seven at Westminster: Dr. BARNACLE, of Trinity Coll., in Cambridge, dean of Chester, afterward bishop of Lincoln. Dr. HUTCHINSON. Dr. SPPICHEL. Mr. EYTON. Mr. HARRIB. Mr. SANDERSON. Mr. DAKINS.

The following instructions were drawn up for their proceedings:

1. "The ordinary Bible read in the church, commonly called the English Bible, should be followed, and as little altered as the original will permit."

2. "The names of the prophets and the holy writers, with the titles of the books in the same order, as in the text, to be retained as near as may be, as according as they are vulgarly used."

3. "The old ecclesiastical words to be kept, as the word church is not a foreign word, it is not a local or translated compound." 4. "When any word hath divers significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most eminent and approved and received by the property of the place and the analogy of faith."

5. "When the division of the chapters to be altered either not at all, or as little as may be, if necessity so require." 6. "No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the text in the margin."

7. "Keep such quotations of places as shall be marginally set down as shall serve for the fit references of one Scripture to another."

8. "Every particular man of each company to take the same part of the work; and he that shall have amended them severally by himself, where he think good, all to meet together, to confer what they have done, and agree for their part what shall stand." 9. "As any one company has despatched any one book in this manner, they shall send it to the rest, to be considered of seriously and judiciously; for his majesty is very careful in this point."

10. "If any company, upon the review of the book so sent, shall doubt of the accuracy of any place, or have occasion to send them word thereof to note the places, and therewithal to send their reasons; to whom it shall not be requisite for them to be compounded at the general meeting, which is to be of persons of each company, at the end of the work."

11. "We shall read the books, and the book to be translated, letter by letter to be directed by authority, to send any learned in the land for his judgment in such a place."

12. "Let every person of every company, every bishop to the rest of his clergy, admonishing them of this translation in hand, and to move and charge as many as being skillful in the tongues, have taken on themselves to give their observations to the company, either at Westminster, Cambridge, or Oxford, according as it was directed before in the king's letter to the queen's chancellor."

13. "The directors in each company to be the deans of Westminster and Chester for Westminster, and the king's professors in Hebrew and Greek in the two universities."

14. "These translations to be used when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible, viz., Tyndale's, Coverdale's, Matthew's, Whittingham's, General."

To these the following rule was added:

15. "Bodeas the said directors before mentioned, three or four of the most ancient and grave divines in either of the universities, not employed in translating, to be as bidden by the vice-chancellor, to give their opinion without difference with the rest of time, whether the translation to be overseers of the translation, as well Hebrew as Greek, for the better observation of the 4th rule above specified."

According to these regulations, each book passed the scrutiny of all the translators successively. In the first instance, each individual translated every book which he had been assigned to, and after his delivery, the readings to be adopted were agreed upon by the whole of that company assembled together, at which meeting each translator must have been solely occupied by his own version. The book thus finished was sent to each of the other companies to be again examined; and, if they agreed that the style was as Selden informs us, 'one read the translation, the rest holding in their hands some Bible, either of the learned tongues, or French, Spanish, Italian, etc.'

If they found any fault, they spoke; if not, he read on." In this way every precaution was taken to secure a faithful translation, as the whole Bible underwent at least six different revisions by the most learned men in the kingdom. The translation was commenced in the spring of 1607, and occupied about three years, and the revision of it occupied about three quarters of a year more. It was printed in Gothic letter, and first published in folio in 1611, with the title, The Holy Bible Containing the Old Testament and the New Testament, Newly translated out of the original Tongues: And with the former translations diligently compared and revised by his Majesties special Comandement. Appointed to be read in Churches." The expense of this translation appears not to have been borne by the king, nor by any government commission, but chiefly, if not entirely, by Mr. Barker.

IV. Critical Estimate of the Authorized Version.—It has often been affirmed that "King James's Bible is in no part a new translation taken directly from the originals, but that it is merely a revision of the earlier English versions, and compared with various Continental translations. The arguments from these remarks seem to be correct. The translators themselves give us a correct view of the nature of their work. In their dedication to King James, they observe, 'Your highness, out of deep judgment, apprehended how convenient it was that, out of the original tongues, together with comparing of the labors, both in our own and other foreign languages, the best and most approved, there should be one more exact translation of the Holy Scriptures into the English tongue.' It must be admitted, however, that they closely followed the Septuagint and Vulgate in their emendations of previous English translations to suit the originals. As King James's version has been so extravagantly eulogized by some as it has been unduly decried by others, it is.
ers, it will be well calmly and briefly to consider its merits as well as its faults.

The most prominent perhaps among its excellences is its philosophical style. Its words are usually chosen from the old and more expressive Saxon element. It is this feature, no doubt, that has so endeared it to the popular heart, and which gives it a charm to the youngest reader. There are some noticeable exceptions to this remark, however, for it sometimes uses Latin terms when Saxon were at hand, e.g. "cognition" for thought; "illuminate" for enlightened; "matrix" for womb; "prospective" for forseidler; "terrestrial" for earthly; "vocation" for calling, etc. In the Lord's Prayer, at both passages (Matt. vi. 13; Luke xi. 4), our translators employ "temptation" for provocation, which has not uncommonly been considered unbecoming and unexpressive.

Vers. is its general accuracy and fidelity to the original. In this respect it compares to great advantage with the Septuagint, which not only very often misses or misconstrues the entire drift of a clause, but sometimes interpolates words and whole verses from scripture, elsewhere, and also with the Vulgate and other ancient versions, which, if they do not, like the Tar- gums, run into paraphrase, yet are very often misled into fanciful and erroneous interpretations. To this commendation, however, there must, in candor and truth, be made very large drawbacks in many instances. The translators in A. V. have never failed to take advantage of the many kinds of rendering. Not only were the sciences of sacred philology, and especially of Biblical geography and antiquities, in too crude a state to enable the translators to fix the exact meaning of obscure and doubtful terms with precision, but they have totally ignored the dialects, the phrases, the idioms, the peculiarities of expression, especially the laws of paroimia (q.v.), re- ducing poetry to prose, and transposing the words in the clauses arbitrarily and without reference to the original. They habitually neglect the import of moods and tenses, especially in the Hebrew (constantly ren- dering the present or future by the present or indefinite past, or the reverse), and they constantly lose the true force of particles and the nice shades of meaning in the prepositions, the article, and syntactical construction. Occasionally they are very happy in their renderings, but there is scarcely a verse, especially in the more highly-wrought and terse utterances of the O. T., that is not simple, pure, and beautiful in some poetic position, especially the laws of paroimia (q.v.), reduc- ing poetry to prose, and transposing the words in the clauses arbitrarily and without reference to the original. The spelling and punctuation are very irregular, as in all books of the time. The following two verses, taken at random, will be a sufficient example—Matt. ix, 1, 2:

And he entered into a ship, and followed after, and came into his own city.

And behold, they brought him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed: and Jesus seeing their faith, said unto the palsy of the palsy, Some, be of good cheer, thou sinner be for

There are also many typographical errors—more, indeed, than would be borne with in any Bible printed now. The most striking is in Exodus xiv, 10, which reads thus, modernizing the spelling:

And when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Israel lifted up their eyes; and behold there was Egypti with them behind them, and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel lifted up their eyes, and behold, the Egyptians marched after them, and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.

Other notable errors are in Lev. xiii, 56, "the plain be somewhat dark," where we must read, "the plague be somewhat dark"; Lev. xvii, 14, "Ye shall not eat the blood," for "Ye shall eat;" Jer. xxii, 8, "deliver the spoiller," instead of "deliver the spoiled;" Ezek. xxiv, 7, "poured it upon the ground," for "not upon;" Hosea vi, 5, "shewed them," for "hewed them;" and many others. These, however, were soon corrected.

Notwithstanding that by the king's command marginal notes were not to be affixed, some were found inserted in our Bibles of this present edition. We have, for instance, in the note, "The Roman penny is the eighth part of an ounce, which, after five shillings the ounce, is sevenpence halfpenny." Others of this class are found in other places. The translators did not even avoid critical notes. Baruch 1, 10, at "prepare ye manna," has "Gr. corruptly for mincha, that is, a meat-offering." Others of these notes might be pointed out; but, as a general thing, these would be quite as well omitted, as they now generally are. The number of marginal references is very small—only 9890, including the Apocrypha.

At present the best Bibles, without the Apocrypha, have over seventy thousand. Bagster's Comprehensive Bible claims to have "nearly half a million," which, we opine, is incorrect.

The translators' manuscript has been lost. According to a pamphlet published in 1660, it was, five years previously, in the possession of the king's printers. In another to the next of the translators. Address to the Reader is said to be preserved in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Copies of this edition are now pretty scarce. The commonest loss, as with other books, is of title-pages.

Much care is necessary to identify an imperfect copy of this edition, for a second was printed in 1611, and others in 1613, 1617, 1834, and 1840, from the same type, and running page for page. Each edition presents typographical errors peculiar to itself. The only clue we have here space to give is, that the second editions of 1611 are the only ones in which the signatures recommence with the New Testament, and the second of that year have the above-mentioned errors corrected. Many bad ones, however, are found in it, not the least of which is the enumeration of "1 Corinthians" and "2 Corinthians" in the list of the books of the Old Testament instead of Chronicles. In 1883 a reprint of this first edition, page for page, but in Roman letter, was made at Oxford, so exact as to follow even the margin. The second edition was immediately reprinted and the ancient spelling throughout. Bagster's English Hieropa also contains the text of the New Testament printed verbatim from this edition; and where the book itself is unattainable, these are perhaps the best substitutes for those who, for any reason, require to go back to the Bibles of the time. Many others have reformed the text "to such a standard of purity as, it is presumed, is not to be met with in any other edition hitherto extant." How far this is the case will be seen by-and-by. Besides this, the punctuation was revised throughout "with a view to preserve the true sense;" upon comparison with the Hebrew and Greek originals, which was done in the body of the text and also in the marginal references. In the body of the text, the "heads or contents prefixed to the chapters;" many proper names were translated in the margin, where the narrative contained an allusion to their meaning (this should have been done fully); the chronology, which was first added in 1611, was changed, and the marginal references were compared and corrected throughout, besides having 30,495 new ones added.

Dr. Blayney makes an accidental admission, tending to lower confidence in the book, that two proofs were read, "and, generally speaking, the third likewise," which is quite insufficient for a standard edition of any work, or even an ordinary edition of the Bible. Four proofs are the least allowable on such a work. It is no wonder that afterward one hundred and sixteen typographical errors were discovered in it. The most important is in Rev. xviii, 22, which in the quarto copy reads:

22 And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more in thee; and the sound of the mill shall be heard no more in thee: Reference to a correct Bible will show that the following words are omitted: "at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more." But, saying nothing of accidental errors like this, there is yet abundant ground for complaint against the text for incorrectness. In Joshua iii, 12, all previous editions had read "Take ye twelve men; it appears here, to the confusion of the grammar, "Take you twelve men." In Joshua xi, 19, "unto my place" is changed to "unto my place;" and, so far as there is a difference in the sense, the change is incorrect. But these errors, though utterly out of place in a standard Bible, are venial by the side of others. In Joshua iii, 6, Bible beads be mentioned after read "the elders of Gilead:" he has, "the children of Gilead." In Psalm xxiv, 8, instead of and who shall stand in his holy place? he introduced or who shall stand." In Psalm cxxi, 16, he, followed only by editions copied from him, reads for he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the gates of iron in sunder, "the true reading being "bars of iron." In Deut. xxv, 3, he is the first to read whatsoever be hath pleased," the inserted "hath" being quite superfluous. His is the only edition we have met with which reads, in Isaiah xlii, 3, "But these two things will I not forsake;" the reading of the Authorized Version is changed he introduced into Matt. xvi, 16, where he reads Thou art the Christ" instead of Thou art Christ." In this edition we find, for the first time, in 2 Cor. xii, 2, I knew a man in Christ about fourteen years ago instead of of above." In 1 John 1, 4, the reading our joy for your joy, though often met with, is only an error first made in this edition. In punctuation too, Blayney did but little better. There are few places where he for the first time mispointed a verse, but he has perpetuated many errors. In Deut. ix, 3, the original, and all down to his time, are pointed substantially thus: "The Lord thy God is he that leadeth thee as a bird leadeth her, he will destroy them, etc.; but the sense is entirely changed by putting the colon after "thereafter," and no point at "therefore." In Acts xxvii, 18, the translators placed the comma after "day," but he perpetuated the mistake of placing it after "tempest," the effect of which is to make the mariners endure an exceedingly storm for twenty-four hours before they lightened the ship. In Heb. x, 12, the sense is entirely lost by placing the comma after "serva instead of at "for ever," according to the translators. Other typographical errors remained uncorrected. For instance, the marginal readings of Jonah iv, 6, is the meaningless "pallister, In 1 Tim. ii, 5, Bishop "jesus faceless' instead of "shamefastness": a word of an entirely different meaning; and this error, unfortunately, has been continued to our day. In the same text he perpetuated the nonsensical corruption "broided," and in 1 Tim. iv, 16, he continues the error by inserting of "thy doctrine," instead of the doctri ne. He is faulty in a critical point: the distinction between Lord and Lord. The word seems to be uniformly printed Lord with him; certainly in every case we have noticed, including many where the Hebrew is Adonai. On the other hand, Blayney did some good things. He changed the obsolete "sith" into "since" in two places, though he left it unchanged in two others: Ezek. xxxv, 6, and the heading to Rom. v. In a few cases in which "mo" had remained unaltered to his time, he changed it to more. He changed "fet," taken as a preterite, into "fetched," as a verb present it had been altered before. He attempted, too, to change "glister," but, as with ". and the New Testament, he entirely eschewed. It contains no special preface, or mention of its peculiarities on the title-page or elsewhere, but is simply dated Oxford: Printed by T. Wright and W. Gill, printers to the University." It was published at four guineas. The University of Oxford paid Dr. Blayney £6000 for his labor in revising the Bible. They thereupon concluded that they had an available standard, and incontinently adopted it. The other privileged presses followed. But very soon his errors, one by one, came to light; some were corrected at one press, some at another; just as had been the case before, passages really correct were changed in ignorance, and the upshot of the whole was that in a very few years there was no standard again.

In 1804 the British and Foreign Bible Society was formed, and proceeded to work on the principle of buying the cheapest Bibles it could and trusting to the printers for accuracy. The American Revolution had erected a new Bible-reading nation; an effort was made in its first Congress to restrict the printing of the book to licensed houses was cut short by the first amendment to the Constitution, and the book was thrown into the hands of the trade at large, with anything but a beneficial effect on its general integrity. To crown all, the English printers became careless in supplying the American market. Charles Knight tells us of a Bible so full of typographical errors that its printers dare not publish it in England, and he was assured we had to send the whole edition to America! The editions of 1806 and 1813, though adopted as standards by the Protestant Episcopal Church, were but careful reprints of Blayney without further editorial care.

3. The American Bible Society's Revision.—This society was formed in 1816, and proceeded to print its own Bibles, thus making itself responsible for their correctness. The first edition, in 1817, was followed almost any respectable copy that came to hand, disregarding discrepancies. But in so many editions as were now produced in England and here, these differences were constantly increasing in number. They were chiefly in punctuation, the use of capitals and italics, and such minor points. At length, in 1847, these had accumulated to such an extent that the proof-readers of the Society really did not know what to follow. The matter was now referred to the Board of Managers of the Society, and in February, 1848, they resolved to have a thorough collation of the English Bible made, and appointed Rev. J. W. McLane, D. D., Bishop of Pennsylvania, and the firstDickensian of the Church of Williamsburg, N. Y., to proceed with it. Accordingly, recent copies from the four "standard" British houses were obtained, an American Bible Society's copy was the fifth, and the edition of 1811 the sixth. Blayney was ignored. These were carefully collated, and compared with the text as printed by the didactic hand, minute noted; and this comparison furnished the data whence to prepare the text of a future edition. The number of variations found was about twenty-four thousand. The Apocrypha formed no part of the work. The rules governing the formation of this standard text were simple. The reading of a majority of the copies was to be followed; when the three English copies agreed as to the use of the hyphen, their usage was to be accepted. In other matters, where each copy was inconsistent with itself, a system was agreed on. For instance, each copy had in one place "a highway," in another "an highway." So, too, every copy sometimes "a husband" and "an husband," "a hole" and "an hole," "a hill" and "an hill," "a house" and "an house," etc., so that even the strict grammatical rule was enforced. The distinction between "O" and "Oh," which had been lost sight of, was brought out, either form being used, as the sense of the passage required. In capital letters the words "Spirit" and "Scripture" were found very irregular; the first was made to be capital when referring to the Holy Spirit and not elsewhere, and the second was used when referring to the whole volume. Some spellings, now obsolete, were reformed, as "spunge," "sope," "cuckow," "plaister," "rasor," "morter," "aswaged," and others; and, what was of more importance, some names of Old-Testament characters given in the New Testament, and there spelled according to the Greek, were changed to the ordinary Old-Testament spelling. Thus "Juda" was changed to "Judah," because it was already spelled so in the Old Testament; "Gedeon" to "Gideon," "Jephthae" to "Jephthah," "Sina," to "Sinai," "Channaan" to "Canaan," "Cort" to "Korah," and so on with some—not all. In the margin of the page, the changes from the modern copies were made. In Josh. xix, 2, "and Sheba" was made "or Sheba." In Ruth iii, 15, "she went" was changed to "he went." In Solomon's Song ii, 7, "he please" was made "she please." In Isa. i, 18, "wash ye" was altered to "wash ye." But all of these corrections were according to the original edition, which had been departed from in each case wrongly. Farther, in Matt. xxi, 41, "in judgment" was made "in the judgment," because the Greek required it, and very many early English copies had it, though not the first. Also in Solomon's Song iii, 5, and viii, 6, the change was made as in ii, 7; for, though the original edition here read "he," the probability, all things considered, was that it was but a typographical error in each case. In prosecuting the collation, the headings of the chapters came under notice. These often differed; but, so far as they agreed with the edition of 1611, or that of Blayney, they were found to be correct. Many were found incorrect, either false, as those to Daniel vii, Isaiah xli, Zechar. xii; others were comments on the text, as those to Ps., xiii, Dan. xi, and the whole of Solomon's Song; others were incomprehensibly clumsy, as the few first of Acts; some positively shocking, as "the Lord refuseth to accept every sacrifice" (Exod. xxxiii); "Samuel sent by God under pretense of a sacrifice" (1 Sam. xvi). These headings had not been prepared by the body of the original forty-seven translators, but by one of their number and one other person; they were never considered as forming part of the version; they had been extensively altered before, both by Blayney and by many anonymous parties, and therefore the committee under whose care the collation was going on resolved to remodel these where necessary. Wherever "Christ" or "the Church" was mentioned in any Old-Testament heading, "Messiah" and "Zion," the equivalent words used in the Old-Testament paragraphs, were omitted, as in the margin of the first for "out" a comment. The marginal references were again rectified, many errors corrected, and their number, upon the whole, diminished. A very few marginal readings were added, chiefly explanatory of proper names. To Matt. xxiii, 34, where "at" is now generally considered to be a slip from the first for "out" a note was put, "Or, strain out;" and to "Jesus," in Acts vii, 46, the committee put the note, "That is, Joshua," as the translators themselves had done in Heb. iv, 8. (See, on the whole subject, the Society's pamphlet entitled "Report on the History of the Recent Collation of the English Version of the Bible," N. Y. 1857.) The standard thus prepared was published in 1851. Though issued in a quiet way, it was received with general approval. For six years it remained the standard of the Society, and during that time not a whisper of disapprobation was heard. But in 1857 a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of Baltimore published a pamphlet at this very period, carefully avoiding specific charges, the most severe spirit was exhibited. The Society was accused of an attempt to "supersede the time-honored version in its integrity;" it was making a "half-way adventure" toward a new translation; it was "debasin the standard," it was "a new second-rate Bible." The committee had found twenty-four thousand variations in the Bibles in common use; their language was converted into a statement that they had made twenty-four thousand changes. The New-York organ of the same church at once joined in the attack, but the amount of its charge amounted to the assertion that the translator was different from every copy collated. In the General Assembly of the Old-School Presbyterian Church in the same year, the same subject was brought up by a speaker who stigmatized the standard as being "tinkered up" by "an anonymous printer and a New-School preacher!" Asking, "Why discard these epistles that have been acquired by two hundred years?" that they had not been so acquired in, and that abundant reason had been shown for "discarding" them. In July, 1857, the (Presbyterian) Princeton Review had a most bitter article on the same subject. The only attempt to meet the difficulties of the case was the statement (page 510) that the Society should "give up entirely all idea of producing a standard text," or otherwise should "take the standard editions and collate them." But if this latter course was followed, as it had been, "the Society would have no right to exercise its own discretion in selecting the readings or the punctuation it would adopt." In compliance with these and similar demands from auxiliary bodies, the Board of Managers, in February, 1858, revoked this standard. Their present imperial quarto edition is now their printer's guide. With this action perished the hope of having for the present a generally-accepted standard of King James's translation. One cannot now look with approval in the East isial, because dissent in many branches is so extensive; nor by co-operation, because they have no union; nor by their Bible Society, because it does not print its own books. In this country the American Bible Society is the only body which has any general authority. It is to be regretted that this society has not been authorized by its constitution to retain and prosecute the needed work. See Bible Societies, 8, xii.

VI. Marginal Readings.—These are generally passed over by Bible readers, but a careful student will find them invaluable for ascertaining the precise meaning of any text. They are of two kinds: the first, commonly marked by a dagger (†), giving the literal translation of a peculiar idiom in the originals where it could not be rendered in good English, also the translation of significant proper names; and the other, marked by a parallel (∥), representing a possible different rendering where the original may have been caused to be so rendered by some force or voided by being prefixed by "That is," in the translations of names, or "Heb," "Chald," or "Gr," according to the original language in the first class; and "Or," in the second class. In many modern Bibles they are referred to by consecutive figures or Greek letters; but it is the system here described that is used by the modern translators and by the American Bible Society. The translators regarded these readings as a component part of their work; and to the present day ministers of the Church of England read and use either the marginal rendering or that in the text at pleasure. They were first used by the translators of the Geneva version of the Bible half a century before ours was made.

Since the publication of our translation in the year 1611, the marginal readings have at various times been enlarged and improved. There are now about three hundred of these more than the original number, and a few have been omitted. Of the others, many have been retained. We are adding the necessary explications. A few palpable errors have been corrected, as in the note to 1 Sam. v. 4, where the stump of the fish- idol Dagon was indifferently described as "the fishy part," now correctly printed "the fishy part." In other cases one note has been divided into two, one of each was made into one. And one or two "and" cases of compound clauses has been introduced into a note and perpetuated. Jo- nah's gourd (Jonah iv. 6) is in the first edition described as a "palme-crist," or palma cristi (the castor-oil plant), in the margin; but the word has been corrupted into "palmerist," to which no meaning can be attached.

There is no trace of any person or body authorized to make these changes, and except in the correction of palpable typographical errors, as above noticed, it would seem that they should no more be meddled with than should those other readings which form the body of the text. Both came originally from the same translating body, and were intended to be equal authority. This fact at once places them above the rank of mere commentary, and renders their study most important. Ruth i, 20, for example, is almost meaningless as commonly printed; but when opposite "Nao- mi" we read "that is, Pleasant," and opposite "Ma- ra," "that is, Bitter," we see at once a beauty in the passage of which otherwise we could form no idea. So, also, with strength of expression. Verse 13 of the same chapter is made much stronger when, instead of "it giveth me much for your sakes," we read, "I have much bitterness for your sakes." Job xvi. 3, is wonderfully strengthened if we adopt the Hebrew idiom—never mind if the English is not so good—and instead of "vain words," read "words of wind." So when, in Job v. 7, we read "sons of the burning coal" instead of "sparks," we at once see, better than by any commentary ever written, the metaphorical character of Old Testament poetry, and thenceforth the value of the poetic books with vastly-increased appreciation.

VII. Chapter and Verse. — Among the Jews, with whom the only divisions of the Scripture was into books, according to authorship, references were made by citing the subject treated of near where the passage quoted or alluded to it. In this way, for instance, the Sadducees to what we call Exodus iii. 6, as we see by Mark xi. 26. The meaning here is not that God spoke to Moses in the bush, for the text says that he spoke to him out of it; but rather, "have ye not read in the Book of Moses, in The Bush, how God spake unto him?" that is, "in that part of the Book of Moses called The Bush." "I may observe," says Arch- bishop Trench, "that Romans xi. 2, is a quotation of the same kind. It can never mean 'of Elias,' as in our version, but is rather 'in [the history of] Elias,' in that portion of Scripture which tells of him." The Koran is quoted by this means now. Its chapters are called from their subjects by such names as "The Cow," "The Thunder," "Smoke," "The Moon," "Di- vorce," "The Spider," "The Resurrection," "The Slanderer," and so on.

The division into chapters was made by a cardinal, Hugo de Sancto Caro, about the year 1250. He was engaged in compiling a Latin Concordance, the first of which we know, and according to the recommendation of his superiors, to facilitate his labor. The Book of Psalms is naturally divided. Paul quotes "the second Psalm" and "another Psalm" in Acts xiii, 33, 35. The chapters having been marked, greater precision was obtained by putting capital A, B, C, and so on, at regular distances down in the margin, so that any passage near the beginning of a chapter would be quoted; for example, "John, 10, A;" further down, "Jeremi- ah, 14, D;" and so on. The early English versions all showed this arrangement, and Marbeck's Concordance, the first one in English, makes its references in this manner. These smaller divisions by letters were intended to give a convenient and easily-remembered system, and in different translations were of different lengths. They generally embraced about six or seven verses under one letter. The divisions into chapters were not uniform; at least they are not so in our early English translations. Wycliffe, for instance, divides the book of Psalms into six books: and one of the thirty chapters in 1 Chronicles by dividing the fourth chapter into two. Very frequently in the Pentateuch and Job, and occasionally elsewhere, there is a difference of one to four verses in the beginning of a chapter. Where this is the case, too, our version often makes the difference in the worst place.

The divisions into verses were made by several persons. About 1430 Rabbi Mordecai Nathan divided the Hebrew Bible thus, using Cardinal Hugo's chapters. In 1527 a Latin Bible was published at Lyons in which this division of the Old Testament was followed, and the New Testament also divided, but into verses as before. In the New Testament arrangement in this part of the Scriptures was made about 1550, by Robert Stephens, a printer of Paris, who executed the work while making a horse- back journey from Lyons to Paris. This was done only as an advertisement for an edition of the Testa- ment he soon after published in Greek, with two Latin versions. The circumstances under which the work was done effectually prevented the exercise of any scholastic or critical care or ability. But, though the Old Testament was divided first, no edition of it in Hebrew was printed thus till 1661. The first English Scripture printed with verses was the Testament printed at Geneva, 1567, and in 1569 the whole Bible at the same place. The Bishops' Bible, next in order, pub- lished in 1568, had them, but also had the marginal guide letters, as in the earlier translations, and in its marginal references it uses the letters instead of the verses. In the next Protestant translation, King James's, of 1611, the letters were once more omitted. It seems never to have been considered that the division into verses superseded chapters; but really a reference to Luke 24:43 would be much shorter than to Luke xii. 13. The Psalms are, by their structure, naturally divided into verses. But yet our transla- tions and commentaries are still prolix, and, indeed, for instance, is in Coverdale's Bible made one para- graph; Matthew's, twelve verses; Cranmer's, fifteen, Geneva and Bishops', eleven; and the Douay, twelve. In Cranmer's Bible each of the alphabetical sections of Psalm cxix is numbered Independently, 1 to 8.

From all this it appears that these divisions have no divine warrant whatever, were carelessly made, and should be disregarded in seeking the sense of any part of Scripture. Hence it follows that the best Bibles for common use are those called Paragraph Bibles, in which the matter is reduced to ordinary prose form, except in the poetical books, which are printed in short lines, or at least show their poetic structure. Un- fortunately, but few editions are thus published. The Religious Tract Society of London issue a few; one in 12mo, some thirty years ago, was the best. One they have recently got out, in royal 8vo, with notes and maps, has all the parallel passages, and, though very useful, is so encumbered with reference marks in the text as to make the reading harder. A. U. Rev. T. W. Cole published a very good one in Cam- bridge, Mass., 1834. Before that, others had been got out at Oxford, chiefly objectionable as not showing the poetic form of some parts. One of the most useful Paragraph Bibles to the English student is that of it, forty-two such bishops; in that of Antioch, sixteen; in that of Jerusalem, twenty-five. The earliest mention of such bishops is in the Notitia of the Emperor Leo in the tenth century. — Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. ii. ch. xxix. § 1, 2, 3; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Auto da Fe (Spanish, from the Latin Actus Fidelis, "act of faith"), a ceremony in the acts of the Spanish Inquisition in which condemned heretics were punished, and those acquitted of heresy were released. The auto da fé generally took place on a Sunday, between Pentecost and Advent, and very often on All-saints' day. The procession was headed by the Dominican monks, carrying the banner of the Inquisition. Following these, and separated from them by a crucifix, were those whom the Inquisition had pardoned. Next marched those who were condemned to death, attired in a peculiar habit, barefooted, their head covered with a high cap, on which were painted devils and flames. Finally came effigies of such as had avoided condemnation by flight, and the coffins of the victims, painted black, with images of devils and flames on them. The march was closed by priests, who accompanied the procession through the principal streets of the city as far as the church, where a sermon on the gospel was preached. The ventriloquial confession of the convicted was then read to the accused, who were obliged to stand in front of a cross, with extinguished tapers in their hands. As soon as the sentence of death was read against any one, an officer of the Inquisition gave the accused a slight tap on the chest to signify his surrendering the culprit to the secular authorities. The condemned were then loaded with chains, taken to prison, and two hours afterward cited before the higher court, where they were asked in what religion they preferred to die. Such as declared their adherence to the Roman Church were strangled, the others burnt at the stake. At a stake were prepared on the place of execution for each priest involved, and the victims made their peace with the church, and, when all their efforts failed, solemnly consigned them to the devil. The burning then commenced; and the remains of such as were already dead, together with the effigies of such as had fled, were also thrown into the fire. The day after the auto da fé, those whom the Inquisition had pardoned were (after swearing never to reveal what had taken place during their trial) restored to the places from whence they had been taken when arrested. On the occasion of an auto da fé, the Inquisitors were accompanied by the civil and military authorities, and even the young and princes, while people of all ranks crowded to see the exhibition. No auto da fé has taken place since the middle of the 18th century; and the sentences after that time, up to the abolition of the Inquisition in 1808 by Joseph Napoleon, were carried into execution privately, in the buildings of the Inquisition. See Inquisition.

Auvargue, Guillaume d', bishop of Paris, born at Aulnay in the second half of the 12th century; died March 30, 1249. He was one of the most learned theologians and philosophers of his day, and undertook to refute Aristotle on metaphysical questions. He was doctor of the Sorbonne and professor of theology, and subsequently was called to the see of Paris. His sermons and essays on several points of ethics were published by Le Fèron in 1674 (2 vols. fol.).—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii. 795.

Auvargue, Pierre d', or PETRUS DE CHROS, a French theologian and philosopher, died Sept. 25, 1307 (according to others, 1301). He became, under the guidance of Thomas Aquinas, a distinguished theologian and philosopher. He was doctor of the Sorbonne and canon of the chapter of Paris. According to the Acta Gallicana, Clement V was subsequently bishop of Clermont. He wrote a number of commentaries to Aristotle.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, iii. 795.

Avezius. 1. Arian bishop of Milan, A.D. 358-374 (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vi. 23). He was the leader of the Arians in the Western churches. When the orthodox bishop Attila of Milan was held in 329, under the presidency of Bishop Damasus of Rome, the condemned Arianism, they did not dare to pronounce the anathema against Auzenius, because they knew he would be protected by the favor of the Emperor Valentinian I. Although they were at last prevailed upon by Athanasius to mention in their synodal epistle to the Illyrians the condemnation of Auzenius, he himself maintained himself in his see until his death. He was succeeded by Ambrose (q. v.).

2. Abbot, born in Syria, being the son of Abduz, who was compelled by the persecution under King Sapor to leave his country and settle in Syria. In 342 Auzenius came to Constantinople, where he received an appointment in the royal guards, but afterward retired to a solitary mountain in Bithynia, named Oxius, where, clothed only in the skins of animals, he led a life of the most complete austerity. When the Council of Chalcedon was convoked, Auzenius was unwillingly compelled to attend, and subscribed the decrees. After this he retired to a more remote mountain, called Siloe. The voce clamando of the hermits, charged with the Inquisition, was then sent to him, and he was commanded to subscribe to the decrees, which he refused; and he was ordered to be arrested. Of these, many continued to abide near him in cells, and followed the example of his ascetic course of life. He died in 470. His memory is celebrated on the 14th of February. — Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii. 21; Butler, Lives of Saints, Feb. 14; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

A'va (Heb. Avva, 8387, rain). Sept. Aouvi (2 Kings xvii. 24), also Iva'h (Heb. Jacobs), 7772, same signif.; Sept. Aovvi, 2 Kings xviii. 84; xix. 13; but in Isa. xxxviii. 13, unites with the preceding word, Avaryoyvovt (avaryoyvovt, the capital of a small monarchal state conquered by Sennacherib, and from which King Shalmaneser sent colonies into Samaria. The early Jewish translators (Syriac and the Targums) understand it as a mere appellative; but it is associated with other proper names as a city. Some take it for the river, or rather the town which gave name to the River Arvah (Akam of Ezra viii. 31; Bellermann, Handb. iii. 874); but this name is quite different in the Heb. (87778). Iken (Diessitt. Philol. p. 152) would identify it with the Phoenician town Arvatha, mentioned in the Notitia Vit. Dignitatum Imper. Rom. (but the reading here is rather doubtful, see Roland, Palaest. p. 232 sq.); or with the town of Abaž, between Beirut and Sidon, which Paul Lucas mentions in his account of Syria as a place of a Druses reservoir, which he supposes to be the land of the Avites between Tripoli and Beirut, because they are described as worshipers of Nibazh (2 Kings xvii. 31), an idol which he compares with the great stone dog that formerly stood in that quarter, on which account the Lycus obtained its name of Nahr el-Keib, Dog River (comp. Mannert, VI. i. 880). This, however, rests upon a confusion of the Avim of 2 Kings xvii. 31, with those of Deut. ii. 23; Josb. xiii. 3. See AYlve. Avva or Iva'h was doubtless a city of Mesopotamia, in the region indicated by the associated names (Babylon, Cuth, Ha-math, Sepharvaim), perhaps somewhere farther east, in the direction of the classical Ariarathes.

Avalonius, Elvan, an apostle of England, lived in the second century. He preached Christianity to the Britons, and converted king Lucius, with his entire court. This king sent him to bishop Eleutherus to Rome, who made him bishop of London about 181. An "Essay on the Origin of the Church of Great Brit- ain" is attributed to Avalonius.—Hoefler, Biographie Générale, 6954, s. v.

Avaris. Avoi, Avojep Sphaxon Avoj, Ant. xii. 6, 1; Vulg. Aurovum and Averos; prob. of Arabic derivation, see Grimm, in loc.), an epithet of Eleazar, the brother of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. ii. 5).
Avarice (from Lat. avarus, from ame, crave, strive after), an undue love of money. Avarice consists not merely in seeking after worldly wealth too eagerly, or by unjust means, but in loving it excessively, even though it be our own. Avarice is in its nature sin, and is of a kind of idolatry. Gregory the Great enumerates seven particular sins which spring from avarice, or, as he calls them, "daughters of avarice," viz. treasons, frauds, lies, perjuries, restlessness, violations, hardness of hearts (Mor. in Jobum, lib. xxxi, cap. 17). The cause of this vice is really unbelief, because it is a violation, therefore do they so greedily scrape and hoard" (Barrow On the Creed, Sermon 1). It grows by indulgence, and is strongest in the aged, as if, by a penal irony, they who can least enjoy riches should most desire them (Wesley, Sermon, sermon. cxxx).

Avaris (A'varis), the name of a city on the borders of Egypt and Syria, which the shepherd-kings (Hyksos) again occupied after their expulsion from it, according to Manetho, as recited by Josephus (Apion, i, 26). Kawlinson (Historical Ec. p. 74) thinks it is a corruption of the name Hebrews, who are referred to as being settled in Goshen. See Aaram.

Avatar or Avatara, a term in Hindu mythology, denoting the descent of the Deity. The number of the Avatāras mentioned in the Puranas, or legendary poems of the Hindoos, is very great. Those of Vishnu alone, who is distinguished by the character of "Preserver" in the Trimagi, or triad of the principal Hindoo deities, are stated to be endless. They are variously enumerated; but all accounts seem to agree in selecting the following ten as the most conspicuous:

1. Matsya, the Fish, under whose form Vishnu preserved Manu, the ancestor of the present human race, during a universal deluge.

2. Kurma, the Tortoise, which incarnation Vishnu underwent in order to support the world (Muni); and rather the entire earth, when the celestial gods and their opponents the Asuras, or Dāityas, were churning the sea for the beverage of immortality (amrita).

3. Varaha, the Boar. Vishnu, with the head of a monstrous boar, is represented as slaying Hiranyakāśa, the chief of the Asuras, who had taken possession of the celestial regions, and as uplifting the earth, which had been sunk to the bottom of the sea.

4. In his incarnation as Narasimha, a being half man and half lion, Vishnu killed Hiranyakāsippu, the brother of Hiranyakāśa.

5. The form of Vīmaṇa, the Dwarf, was assumed by Vishnu in order to hide the pride of King Bali. He went to a sacrifice which the king was performing, and substituted for as much ground as he could measure with three steps, which request being granted, the dwarf suddenly grew to an immense size, and with his steps comprised earth, mid-air, and heaven.

6. Vishnu appeared in a human form, as Pururādama, the son of Jamadagni and Renuka, in order to preserve mankind, and especially the Brahmins, from the tyranny of the military tribe of the Kāthārisyas.

7. Vishnu was born as the son of King Dasaratha, and under the name of Rāma, in order to destroy Ravana, the Dāitya sovereign of Ceylon, and other demons who were then infesting the earth. The actions of Rāma form the subject of a celebrated epic poem in Sanscrit, called the Rāmāyana, and attributed to the ancient sage Vālmikī.

8. The most celebrated of the Avatāras of Vishnu is his appearance in the human form of Krishna, in which he has been wholly and completely incarnate, whereas the other Avatāras are only considered as emanations from his being. Krishna assisted the family of the Pandavas in their war with the Kuru, and through them relieved the earth from the wicked men who oppressed it. The history of this conflict is told at length in the Mahābhārata, another great epic poem in Sanscrit.

9. Buddha is, by the followers of the Brahminical religion, considered as a delusive incarnation of Vishnu, assumed by him in order to induce the Asuras to abandon the sacred ordinances of the Vedas, by which they lost their strength and supremacy.

10. Kali, the Sign of the Time of the Dying Avatāras in which Vishnu will appear at the end of the Kaliyuga, or present age of the world, to destroy all vice and wickedness, and to restore the world to virtue and purity.—Penny Cyclopædia. See BUDDHISM; HINDOOISM.

Ave Maria or Ave Mary (Hail, Mary!), the angel Gabriel's salutation of the Virgin Mary when he brought her the tidings of the incarnation (Luke i, 26). It is now a prayer or form of devotion in the Romish Church, called the Angelic Salutation (q. v.), and used to invoke the aid of Mary. The chaplets and rosaries are divided into so many Ave-Marys and so many Pater-nosters. The papiats ascribe a wonderful efficacy to the Ave Mary. The following is the prayer: "Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus. Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us sinners, now, and in the hour of death. Amen." The practice of using this prayer at all is no older than the eleventh century, and its use before sermons is not referred to in the church books until when Vincentius Ferrerius, a Spanish Dominican, began to use it before his sermons, from whose example it gained such authority as not only to be prefixed to sermons, but to be joined to the Lord's Prayer in the Roman breviary.—Bingham, Origi. Eccles. bk. xiv., ch. iv; Furrer, Eccd. Diet. s. v.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen- Lexikon, s. v. See ROSARY.

Aven (Heb. id., nothingness, hence insignificance, as often, especially idolatry, and so concretely an idol itself, as in Isa. lxi, 3), a contemptuous name given to three places on account of the idolatry practised there. See also BENONI.

1. (Sept. 'On). A plain (ἐλν Navalik, valley, "the plain of the sun," of Damascene Syriac, mentioned by Amos (i, 6) in his denunciation of Aram (Syria) and the country to the north of Palestine. It is generally supposed to be the same as the plain of Baalbek, or valley of Baal, where there was a magnificent temple dedicated to the sun. See BAALBEK. Being between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, it is supposed by Rosenmüller and others in loc. to be the same plain or valley that is mentioned in loc. as the valley of Lebanon in Josh. xi, 17 (comp. Gibbon, Thes. bib. i, 59). Some, however, would rather seek Aven in the plain four leagues from Damascus toward the desert, where Micah (Notes on Amos) heard from a native of Damascus of a valley near that city called Us, and he quotes a Damascene proverb referring thereto; but this locality lacks confirmation (see Henderson, in loc.), for the information was at best suspicious, and has not been confirmed, although the neighborhood of Damascus has been tolerably well explored by Burckhardt (App. iv) and by Porter. The prophet, however, would seem to be alluding to some principal district of the country on the Arabian shore with Damascus, and so the Sept. have understood it, taking the letters as if pointed, "On, and expressing it in their version as "the plain of" On, by which they doubtless intend the great plain of Lebanon, Care-Syria, in which the renowned idol-temple of Baalbek or Heliopolis was situated, and which still retains the very same name by which Amos and Joshua designated it, "Baalak in the plain of On. The word has been wholly and completely incarnate, whereas the other Avatāras are only considered as emanations from his being. Krishna assisted the family of the Pandavas in their war with the Kuru, and through them relieved the earth from the wicked men who oppressed it. The history of this conflict is told at length in the Mahābhārata, another great epic poem in Sanscrit.

2. (Sept. Ἡλιοπόλις, Eng. marg. "Heliopolis.") Another name for Oxy (q. v.) in Egypt (Exek. xxx.i, 17).

Johannes, a Protestant theologian, born at Eger in 1520, died at Zelitz, Dec. 5, 1590. After having been in succession pastor at Planen, Gesanitz, Schoenfeld, he was appointed professor of theology at Jesenik, and in 1575 became at Zelitz. He is the author of a celebrated Prayer-book, which went through a great number of editions (Strasbourg, 1578, etc.), and was translated by Zader into Latin. He also published a Hebrew Grammar and Dictionary, and several other works.—Hoefer, Biographie Générale, iii, 826.

Avenger of Blood (αἰμαρρήτης), a term applied to the nearest relative of a murdered person, inasmuch as he had the right, and on him devolved the obligation of killing the murderer (2 Sam. xiv, 7, 11) wherever he met him (outside any of the cities of refuge). Respecting this custom, ancient among the Hebrews from the earliest times (Gen. x, 14; xxvii, 45), as among other nations of antiquity (e.g., the Hebrews, see Weckmuller, Helden, Alterth., iii, 241, 254; the inhabitants of Trachonitis; see Josephus, Ant. xvi, 9, 1), and in the East to this day among the Arabsians, Persians, Abyssinians, Druses, Circassians, etc. (see Chardin, iii, 417 sq.; Niebuhr, Beitr. p. 58 sq.; Reises, ii, 430; Pau Ferrand, Mission. Isr., iii, 491; Burckhardt, Trav. ii, 672, 1011; Lebo, Relation d'Egypte, p. 128 sq.), the Jewish lawgiver, in order to restrain its abuse, appointed (Exod. xxii, 13; Num. xxxv, 9 sq.; Deut. xix, 1 sq.; comp. Joseph. Ant. iv, 7, 4) six cities of refuge (苡卽, 유), which was the practice in the same city of refuge, to which the manslayer might have recourse, and where, if his offence had not been premeditated, he might remain in safety till the death of the high-priest at that time acting should release him from the danger of retribution, which on the other hand, the wilful murderer was to be in any case surrendered to the pursuer for vengeance. If, however, the man-slayer quitted the city (Deut. xiv, 6), or even went beyond the prescribed limits of its environs (Num. xxxv, 25 sq.), the avenger might kill him with impunity. See AYLUM. A similar provision prevailed among the Medes (see Weckmuller, Helden, Alterth., ii, 1 sq.; Heffer, Athen, Gerichtsw. p. 136) for the rescue of the accidental man-slayer. Avignon (Aviение), an episcopal see of France, on the Rhone, capital of the department of Vaucluse, 20 miles N.E. of Nîmes. In 1848 it passed into the possession of Pope Clement VI and his successors, and was the see of the pontiffs from Clement X to Gregory XI, i.e. for sixty years. Baluze's Vues des Pays d'Avignon (1693, 2 vols. 4to) is an admirable refutation of the ultramontane pretensions. It maintains that the holy see is not necessarily fixed at Rome. By the Concordat of 1801 Avignon ceased to be a metropolis, but by that of 1821 it was re-established. See FACET.

Several Councils were held in Avignon. The most important were: 1, in 1299, in which 29 canons were adopted, some concerning discipline, and the others against heretics; the inhabitants of Toulouse were excommunicated for not having expelled the Albigensians; 2, in 1327, against the antipope Pierre de Corbie.—Landon, Manual of Councils, Smith, Tables of Church Hist.

Avila, Juan de, a famous Spanish preacher, surname the "Apostle of Andalusia," because he spent 40 years of his life in preaching to the towns and villages of Andalusia, was born in 1500 at Almodovar del Campo, in New Castle, and died May 10, 1569. He is the author of a number of religious works, which are still held in great esteem by Roman Catholics. A complete edition of his works, together with a biography, was published by Martin Ruiz under the title Vida y Obras de Juan de Avila, predicador apostolico de l'Andalusiad (Madrid, 1618, 2 vols. 4to, reprinted in 1757). A French translation of his works was published by Arnauld d'Andilly (Paris, 1673, fol.), and a German by Schermer (Ratisbon, 3 vols. 1861).

A'vim (Heb. 'avorim), with the article, the ruins, or the Avites' tower; Sept. Aivv, v. r. Aivv, a city in the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned between Bethel and Parah (Josh. xvii, 25). It may have been so named as having been settled by the Avites (q. v.) when expelled from Philistia, although it is uncertain whether they penetrated so far into the interior of the country (Keil, Comment. in loc.). The associated names A'ima and A'ir, seem to indicate a location eastward from Jerusalem, and it is possibly the same with A't (q. v.). See AVITE.

Avise or Aviz, knights of a military order of Portugal (order of St. Brionio de Aviz), instituted by Alphonso I, in 1147 or 1162, in commemoration of the capture of Evora from the Moors, whence the name of this order was at first called knights of Santa Maria de Evora. They were afterward styled the Knights of Aviz, from the valley where they were encamped, and where they built a fortress. These knights followed the rule of Citeaux, with some variations, and their duty was to defend the true faith by force of arms, to keep chastity, and to wear a religious dress, consisting of a scapulary and hood, so made that it did not hinder their fighting. Their dress of ceremony was a white cloak, having on the left side a cross fleur-de-lis, at the foot of which are two birds. In their armorial bearings they also have two birds and a tower. They possessed in Portugal about forty commanderies, and since 1530 the grand mastership of the order has been in the crown.—Helyot, Ordres Relig., i, 365; Landen, Excl. Dict., i, 674.

A'vite (Heb. 'avv, only in the plur. נכ.bill, gentile from 'Avv), name of two tribes of people.

1. (Sept. Edom, Anth. Vers. "Avivi," in Deut.; Edom, "Avivi," in Josh.) A people who originally occupied the southernmost portion of that territory in Palestine along the Mediterranean coast which the Cophorim or Philistines afterward possessed (Deut. xi, 23). They are usually considered a branch of the Hivites, a people descended from Canaan (Gen. x. 17). See Hivite. The territory of the Avites is mentioned in Josh. xiii, 3. In addition to the five Philistine states, it would appear that it was not included in theirs, and that the expulsion of the Avites was by a Philistine invasion prior to that by which the five principalities were founded. Their territory began at Gaza, east of the Jordan, and extended to the river of Egypt" (Deut. ii, 23), forming what was the Philistine kingdom of Gerar in the time of Abraham, when we do not hear of any other Philistine states. There were then Avites, or Hivites, at Shechem (Gen. xxxiv, 2), and we afterward find them also at Gideon (Jos. ix, 7), and beyond the Jordan, at the foot of Mount Hermon (Jos. xii, 3).—But we have no means of knowing whether these were original settlements of the Avites, or were formed out of the fragments of the nation which the Philistines expelled from southern Palestine. See GEER; PHILISTINE. According to Ewald (Geschichte, i, 160) and Berthau, the Avvim were the aborigines of Palestine Proper. They may have been so, but there is nothing to prove it, while the mode of their dwellings points rather to a nomadic origin. The Avvim were driven out of their native domain northward from the Desert (Stanley, Sinai and Pal. App. § 83). In Deut. ii, 23, we see them "dWelling in 'the' villages" (or nomad encampments—Chatzerim) in the south part of the "plain," or great western lowland, "as far as Gaza." In these rich possessions they were attacked by the invading Phœbes and Phœbeans (Josh. xii, xvi), which came forth out of Caphtor," and who, after 'destroying' them and "dwelling in their stead," appear to have pushed them farther north.

This must be inferred from the terms of the passage in Josh. xiii, 2, 8, the enumeration of the rest of the land still remaining to be conquered. (The punctuation of this passage in our Bibles is not in accordance with the Hebrew text, which has a full stop at Geshuri [ver. 2], thus: "This is the land that yet remaineth, all the borders of the Philistines and all the Geshurite. From Sihor . . . even to the border of Ekron northward, is counted to the Canaanite," etc.) Beginning from "Sihor, which is the river Euphrates," probably the Wady el-Arish, the list proceeds northward along the lowland plains of the sea-coast, through the five lordships of the Philistines—all apparently taken in their order from south to north—till we reach the Avvim, as if they had been driven up out of the more southerly position which they occupied at the date of the earlier record into the plains of Sharon. It is perhaps worth notice, where every syllable has some significance, that while "the Gazathite . . . the Ekronite," are all in the singular, "the Avvim" is plural. So with the other aboriginal names. Nothing more is told us of this ancient people, whose very name is said to signify "ruin." Possibly a trace of their existence is to be found in the town "Avim" (accurately, as in the other cases, "the Avvim"), which occurs among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii, 23), and which may have preserved the memory of some family of the extinct people driven up out of their fertile plains to take refuge in the wild hills of Bethel; just as in the "the Abodes of the Avvim," the Hebrew verse we have probably a reminiscence of the otherwise forgotten Zemarites.

But, on the other hand, it is possible that the word in this place is but a variation or corruption of the name of Al. See AVIM. The inhabitants of the northern-central districts of Palestine (Galilee and the adjacent portions of Lebanon) in later times distinguished themselves as tattling the gutturals, as, for instance, ה with ה (see Lightfoot, Coh. Cent. ch. 87. Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. col. 434). It is possible that ה, Hurice, is a variation, arising from this cause, of ה, Arete, and that this people were known to the Israelites at the date of the conquest by the name of Hivites. At any rate, it is a curious fact that both the Sept. and Vulg. identified the two names, and also that the town of ha-Avim was in the actual district of the Hivites, in the immediate neighborhood of Gilboa, Chephirah, and their other chief cities (Josh. xi, 7, 17, compared with xviii, 22, 27). The name of the Avvim has been derived from AVVA (Avva), or IVVah (Ivah), as if they had migrated thence into Palestine; but there is no argument for this beyond the mere similarity of the names. See AVVA.

A"with (Heb. Ag"ith, א"ית, ruins; Sept. 1 saioth, Vulg. A"ith), a city of the Edomites, and the native place (capital) of one of their kings, Hadad ben-Bedad, before there were kings in Israel (Gen. xxvii, 25; 1 Chron. i, 46, where the Heb. text has א"ית, Ag"ith, Sept. ג"ית, v. r. ג"ית, Egoth, Vulg. A"ith). It would seem to have been situated at the north-eastern extremity of the range of Mount Seir, as the king is stated to have thence made a hostile incursion into the territory of Edom, and his neighbors, the Ammonites and Moabites, with the Midianites. The name may be compared with el-Choreith, a "chain of low hills" mentioned by Burckhardt (p. 375) as lying to the east of the district of Kerek in Moab (Knobel, Genesis, p. 252).

AVITUS (properly Sestus Alcimus Edicos, or Ecclits, Avitus), bishop of Vienne, was born at Vienne about the middle of the fifth century. At a religious dispute between the orthodox bishop and the Arrians in 442, he was the leading spokesman of the orthodoxy, and gained the confidence of King Gondebaud of Burgundy, whose son and successor, Sigismund, he converted from Arianism (after Gondebaud's death). He vigorously attacked the Ariean heresy, both by writing and speaking, and presided at the council of Paris in 517. He died according to the commonly received opinion, February 5th, 525, although other accounts assign an earlier date. He was a man of great learning, and there are still extant a number of his letters, homilies, and poems, which may be found in Bib. Moz. Patr. i, 500; and in Bib. Patr. Galland. t. x.—Dupin, Hist. Ecol. Freres, v. 4.

Avoídance, in the Church of England, takes place where a benefice becomes void of an incumbent. This happens either by the death of the incumbent, or by his being appointed to a prebendary of such a kind as necessarily makes the living vacant; as when a clergyman is made a bishop all the prebendaries he holds fall to the crown, who is the patron for that time, unless there be some special dispensation, or cession, or resignation. In the first-named instance, which is avoidance by fact, the patron must take notice of the avoidance at his peril; in the last case, which is avoidance by law, the ordinary must give notice to the patron to prevent a lapse.

Averydon, JEN Baptiste Elie, a Franciscan (Minim), born at Paris, 1652; he made profession, January 30, 1671, in the convent of the Black and Blue Minims, and was also elected Prebendary of St. Avois, in the cathedral of Rheims. He began his career as a preacher in 1676, and continued until 1728, i. e. for fifty-three years, and died at Paris, May 10th, 1729, aged seventy-eight. He was much sought after as a preacher, and left many devotional works, which are highly esteemed in the Roman Church. The following have been translated by the Benedictine Abbot of the Church of England: "Conduite pour passer sainement le temps de l'Avinent," Guide for passing Advent holy, with preface by Dr. Pusey (London, 1844, 12mo); "Conduite pour passer sainement le Carême," Guide for passing Lent holy, ed. by Pusey (London, 1844, 12mo); "L'Année Affective," The Year of Affectations, ed. by Pusey (London, 1845, 12mo); and Exsurgite, Mediation, ed. by Shipton (London, 1862, 12mo).

Awrakeshness (3) is used with regard to individuals, and designates the first work of the Spirit in conversion, i. e. conviction; (2) it is also applied to reveal of religion, in which multitudes of sinners are awakened. The state of sin is in the New Testament represented as a sort of sleep or death (Rom. vi, 14, Awake, thou that sleepest; and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.) When man, then, is brought to a consciousness of his sins, and feel sorrow and contrition on account of them, and these are followed by a desire for the forgiving and renewing grace of God, and partly for improvement, the process is called conatskepsis. This is found in the New Testament, although the thing itself is largely explained therein. The prodigal son was awakened by his self-inflicted poverty, Peter by the correcting look of the Lord, Paul by the miraculous apparition of Christ, Judas by the consequences of his betrayal, and many by the preaching of Jesus or by his miracles. Awakening takes place when the sinner, who before did either not know the truth, or else treated it lightly, is strongly impressed with it, and gives up his heart and mind to it. Comp. Acts i, 36, 37: "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ. Now when they heard this they were pricked in their heart, and said unto him, What shall we do? Acts x, 38, and brethren, what shall we do?" (Comp. also ii, 43; iv, 4; v, 11; xi, 23, 24.) One of the principal aims of the preacher in presenting the word of God and of the church in the exercises of divine worship is to produce the awakening of sinners.

As, according to the doctrine of the New Testament, all possible agencies of deliverance and of moral improvement in humanity are to be ascribed to the Holy Spirit, the church holds, and rightly, that the operation of the Holy Spirit is united with the word of Christian truth, and also with visible religious exercises, in the awakening of sinners. It is also right in considering the message and the medium of the Holy Spirit. Awakening may also result from external changes and events in life, by which truth, previously received into the heart, is made real, as if awakened from slumber, so that the sinner himself is aware of the sleep or death of sin. Among the outward causes often producing awakening are sickness, either our own or others, particularly such as is the result of sin; the death of those we love, or sometimes of those who have fallen victims to their sins or to others of us, perhaps have ended their life by suicide; or the death of such as were associated with us in our sins; and we shall either ashamed and confounded, or fall into gross sin, either by ourselves or others, which discloses to us the bottomless nature of sin; deliverance out of danger, or, on the other hand, undeserved blessings. Intercourse with plow and good persons, or sometimes of the bad, may lead to awakening. Sometimes the Spirit uses the ministries of youth and of its inexplicable feelings and of confused impulses; sometimes solitary meditation; sometimes the contemplation of nature; the reading of biographies, the study of works of art, as means of awakening. Both good and evil can be made awakening in the life of man; thus the Hebrews were disposed by the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" (Comp. x, 22: "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness; otherwise thou also shalt be cut off;" 1 Cor. x, 6, 11: "Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted. Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

The effects produced by an awakening cause differ widely; both for objective and subjective reasons, more quiet and tranquil natures, its effect may be slow and gentle; in the more vigorous ones it is more forcible, and often sudden. But the weaker natures are, on the other hand, more easily awakened than stronger ones, while the latter, though requiring a stronger impulse, are more likely to belastingly impressed. When moral sense, judgment, or conscience, is yet awake, the feeblest awakening can act effectually; but where conscience has become numbed and dormant, a more powerful impression is required. It is evident, besides, that the result will be influenced by a variety of other causes, such as the more or less enlightened state of the subject, the energy of the impulses, the relations of life, either favorablen or unfavorable to the development of moral sense, etc. Of course, to produce saving effects, the impression must last, i.e. it must not merely lead to a resolve to amend, but must work it out also. This, however, is not the work of a moment, but of a whole lifetime through which the awakening mustlast steadfastly and unceasingly act. The sinner must do all in his power to apply the prevenient grace, which is the source of the awakening, to the redemption of his soul; for without the sinner's own co-operation, the work of sanctification will not be accomplished. In order, then, to render the effect of awakening persistent, it is necessary to keep the memory of it continually in the soul, and to connect with it all that follows. We see, therefore, how great an obstacle is frivolity, which never looks back, but only considers the present or the future; and for that reason the sanguine temperament, while more readily awakened for a moment, is more difficult to impress lastingly; choleric natures are touched easily and deeply, the melancholy lastingly, and the phlegmatic with difficulty. The strength of the awakening is measured by the inward pains of conscience, but cannot be estimated by the outward tears or demonstrations, partly on account of differences in temperaments. Sanguine and choleric subjects will be more demonstrative than phlegmatic or melancholy while under the same force of awakening.

Awi (aw') is, marti'a, perforator, Sept. brithros), an instrument for boring a small hole (Exod. xxii, 6; Deut. xv, 17). Considering that the Israelites had recently withdrawn from their long sojourn in Egypt, there can be no doubt that the instruments were the same as those of that country, used by the sandalmakers and other workers in leather (Wilkinson, ii, 165). In the above passages the word is employed in reference to piercing the ear as a sign of perpetual servitude, which it seems was a custom common among other Oriental nations (Petronius, Satyr. 102), and it was the practice in Lydia, India, and Persia to perforate the ears of boys dedicated to the service of the gods (Xen. Anab. iii, 1, 31; Plutarch, Sympos. ii, 1, 4). See Servant.

Axe. Several instruments of this description are so discriminated in Scripture as to show that the Hebrews had them of different forms and for various uses. (1) ἀρχηγός (so called from chopping), which occurs in Deut. xiv, 5; xx, 19; 1 Kings vii, 7; Isa. x, 15; ἐξίνον, Matt. iii, 10; Luke iii, 9; corresponding to the Lat. secare. From these passages it appears that this kind was employed in felling trees (comp. Is. x, 84), and in hewing large timber for building. The conjecture of Gesenius, that in 1 Kings v, 7, it denotes the axe of a stone-mason, is by no means conclusive. The first text supposes a case of the head slipping from the handle in felline a tree (comp. 2 Kings viii, 5). This would suggest that it was shaped like fig. 3, which is just the same instrument as our common hatchet, and appears to have been applied by the ancient Egyptians to the same general use as we do. The reader is reminded of the contrivance of the Egyptians (wanting in this) of fastening the head to by thongs. (2) ἀρχηγός, ma'atsud (a hewing Ancient Egyptian Axes, Cleaver, and Adze. From the British Museum.

The most common use of the axe, as is well known, is to cut down trees; hence the expression in Matt. iii, 10, and Luke iii, 9, "the axe is laid at the root of the trees" (comp. Silius Italicus, 10; also Virgil, Aen. vi, 180; Isa. x, 35). That trees are a general symbol of men is well known. See FOREST; TREE. (See also Ezek. xxvi, 8; Dan. iv, 7, 8; Matt. vii, 19, xii, 33; Psalms i, 3; Ezek. xi, 1, 2). What John Baptist therefore refers to is probably the excision of the Jewish nation. But there is a force in the preposition used here which escapes the ordinary reader: the expression πρὸς τὴν μίαν τῶν διόρθων καταργεῖ, denotes that it had already been struck into the tree preparatory to felling it, and now only awaited the signal for the utter vengeance of Heaven. The axe was also used as the instru-ment of decollation, to which there is allusion in Rev. xx, 4, "The souls of them that were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus," literally, "cut with an axe." Hence the axe becomes a symbol of the divine judgments. Sometimes it is applied to a human instrument, as in Isa. x, 15, "Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith?" i.e. Shall the proud king of Assyria boast himself against God, whose instrument he is to execute his purpose? In Jer. ii, 20, the army of the Medes and Persians is most probably intended, as elsewhere the instrument of God's vengeance is called a sword, a rod, a source (see also Jer. xlvii, 22). By axes, which were a part of the insignia of the Roman magistracy, was denoted the power of life and death and of supreme judgment. Axes were also used in war (Sidonius, Carm. Ep. iv, 347; Horace, Od. iv, 4; Carm. Secul. 54; Virgil, Aen. ii, 490). Axes were used in sacrifices; hence called the axe of the Hierophant. These are seen on various coins (Smith's Hist. of Coins. Ant. s. v. Securitis).

Axe. See ABALON.

Aixoromus (Αἰξορόμος), given by Josephus (Ant. x, 8, 6) as the son (or successor) of Iasus, and father (or predecessor) of Philides, in the list of the Jewish high-priests, apparently instead of Jehoiada (q. v.). See HIGH-PRIEST.

Axe occurs only in 1 Kings vii, 22, 28, as a translation of ḫ, yad, hand, in the phrase יָדָּם, hand, in the phrase יָדָּם, hand, in the phrase יָדָּם; see the gloss to the previous phrase.

Axell, Henry D.D., was born at Mendham, N. J., June 9, 1775, and graduated at Princeton in 1796. In 1797 he removed to New York, and again in 1804 to Gaussa, N. Y., where he kept a classical school. In 1810 he was licensed, and in 1812 called to the Presbyterian Church in Geneva. At the time of his ordination in 1812, his church consisted of 70 members; at the time of his death of about 400. In two revivals his labors had been particularly blessed. He died Feb. 11, 1849. His eldest daughter died a few days after him, and was placed in the same grave.—Sprague, Amada, iv, 455.

Ayah. See Kitrai.

Aydelott, Joseph, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1758, and entered the itinerant ministry in the Philadelphia Conference in 1802. After 28 years of active service, he died at Philadelphia, in May, 1854. "Perhaps no man gave a more decided character to the purity and excellence of religious life, as well as his preaching, was living comment upon the doctrines and precepts of Christ, and his Master owned his labors." —Minutes of Conferences, i, 475.

Ayler. See FOAL.

Aylliffe, John, LL.D., fellow of New College, Oxford; degraded and expelled for the publication of a work said to contain scandalous aspersions, entitled, "The Ancient and Present State of the University of Oxford" (2 vols. 8vo, 1714), taken, in fact, chiefly from Wood's Athenæ. He also published Paragoni Juris Canonicæ Anglicani, 1726, and a "New Pandect of the Roman Civil Law" (Lond. 1734, fol.), one of the most elaborate works in English on the civil law. No other particulars are recorded of him.

Aylmer, John, bishop of London, born in 1521, of a good family, in Norfolk. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge, but chiefly at the latter; and after leaving the university was appointed tutor to the celebrated Lady Jane Grey. In 1553 he was made archdeacon of Stow, but on the accession of Queen Mary was obliged to leave England, and retired to Zurich. In 1563 he became archdeacon of Lincoln, and in 1565 appointed one of the bishops in the see of London. Several persons have been as vigorously opposed to the Puritans as to the Romanists; and unhappily, amid many excellencies of character, he had a persecuting spirit. On more than one occasion his severity was rebuked by the privy council. In the case of a clergyman named Benison, who was imprisoned by Aylmer for a supposed irregularity in regard to his marriage, the bishop was desired by the privy council to make him compensation, lest in an action for false imprisonment he should recover damages which would touch his lordship's credit. By the Puritans Aylmer was ridiculed in pamphlets, scandalous reports were actively circulated to his injury, and frequent complaints of his conduct were made to the privy council. Aylmer would gladly have exchanged into a more retired diocese, but none of his plans for this purpose succeeded; and he was still bishop of London when he died on June 3d, 1594. See Maitland, Essays on the Reformation; Neal, Hist. of Puritans, i, 224, 265, etc.

Aylworth, James P., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of the fathers of the Oneida Conference, was born in 1788. He entered the ministry in 1822, serving chiefly in Central New York, until his superannuation in 1847. He died in 1848. —Minutes of Conferences.

Aymo. See HAMO.

Aymon, John, a French writer, lived at the close of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century. He was first a Catholic priest, then left the Roman Catholic Church at Geneva, and married at the Hague. He again returned to the Church of Rome, and in 1706 was put by the Cardinal de Noailles in the Seminary of Foreign Missions. In 1707 he fled to Holland with a manuscript (the original of the Acts of the Council held at Jerusalem in 1672 and 1673), and had it printed at the Hague under the title Monumenta Authenticae de Eglise Greque (1708, 4to), reproduced under the title Lettres et Anecdotes de Caraquer (Amsterdam, 1708). Aymon was judicially pursued by Clement, the librarian of the French king, and in 1709 the States-General ordered the restoration of the manuscript. Aymon wrote also Actes Ecclésiastiques et civils de tous les Synodes Nationaux des Eglises Réformées de la France (Amsterdam, 1705), and general works on the Roman Catholic Church.—Hoefer, Biographie Générale, iii, 900.

Azael (Awel, Awel), the father of Jonathan, which latter was one of those who superintended the repudiation of the Gentile wives after the return from Babylon (1 Esdr. ix, 14); evidently the Azazel (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ex. x, 15).

Azazel (Azazel), one of the Israelites, "sons of Maassai who did not accept the dismission. He and the Gentile wife after the exile (1 Esdr. ix, 84); but the name is apparently an erroneous repetition for the Israel just preceding it (Azareel of Ezra x, 41). See AZAZEL.

Azal (Heb. Atal), Ben, prob. the same as Azel, in pause; Sept. Αζαλι (v. v. Αζαλι), apparently a place near Jerusalem on the east, mentioned only in Zech. xiv, 5, as the limit to which the "ravine" or cleft (Neb.) of the Mount of Olives will extend when "Jozobiah shall go forth to fight." Henderson (Comment. in loc.) regards it as the proper name of a place close to one of the gates on the east side of Jerusalem, to which the cleft of the valley was to extend westward, so as at once to admit those who should flee from the enemy; but this seems too strict a literalism for so figurative a prophecy. First (Urb. Wörterb. s. v.) inclines to identify it with the Beth-εθν of Mic. i, 11. Perhaps the conjecture of Gesenius (Thes. Heb. p. 144) is the most easy way of adoption, that the term be simply an appellativo for Ben, q. d. at the side, i.e. of foot of the mountain, sc. Olivet. The supposition of Schwarz (Pales. p. 185) that it is the present village Azarai, or Bethany (according to him, the Iżal of the Talmud, Mqlīd, v. 6), evidently proceeds from his Jewish prejudices against the account respecting Lazarus in the Gospels. See ENSOEL.

Azazal'ah (Heb. Azazylah, Azazylah, Azazylah, heard by Jehozobiah; Sept. 'Aṣāziyah, the father of Jeshua, which latter was one of the Levites that subscribed the sacred covenant after the exile (Neh. x, 9). B. C. ante 410.

Azaephion (Aseaphion), given in 1 Esdr. v, 83, as the first named of the family heads of the "sons of Solomon's servants" that returned from Babylon; apparently the same as the Asevireon (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 55), where the Heb. has the article, אֲשֶׁר, has-Sopherh.

Azaara (Azaraq), one of the heads of the "temple servants," said to have returned from the exile (1 Esdr. v, 81); but the genuine text (Ezra ii, 49) has no such name at all.

Azar'ai (Neb. xii, 36). See AAREEL.
AZAREEL (Heb. Azare'el, מַעֲרֵיָּל, helped by God), the name of five men.

1. (Sept. ʼΩσαρί ly. Esa') One of the Benjamite scribes and archers that repaired to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xxv, 6). B.C. 1054.

2. (Sept. ᾮσερ ρί l v. Ἀσερί) The head of the eleventh division of the musicians in the Temple, consisting of himself and eleven others of his family (1 Chron. xxv, 18; called Uzziah in ver. 4). B.C. 1014.

4. (Sept. ᾮσερ ρί l) An Israelite, one of the descendants of Bani, who denounced the Gentile wife whom he had married on the return from Babylon (Ezra x, 41). B.C. 435.

5. (Sept. ᾮσερ ρί l v. ᾮσηρ ρί, ᾮσηρί) Son of Ahazai and father of Amasai, which last was one of the chiefs of the 128 mighty men of the priests who served at the Temple under the supervision of Zabdiel, on the restoration from Babylon (Neh. xi, 18). B.C. cir. 440. He is probably the same with one of the first company of priests who were appointed with Ezra to make all circuits of the newly completed walls with trumpets in their hands (Neh. xii, 48, where the name is Anglicized "Azariel"). B.C. 446.

Azari'ah (Heb. Azar'iyah, עֲזָרִיָּה, helped by Jehovah), answering to the German name Gottfried, also in the prolonged form Azeray'ah, עֵזָרָיָּה, 1 Kings iv, 2, 5; 2 Kings xv, 6, 8; 2 Chron. xv, 1; xxvi, 2; xxii, 6; xxiii, 11, 17, 20; xxviii, 12; xxix, 12; xxxi, 10, 13, Sept. 'Azeriya and 'Azeria, a very common name among the Hebrews, and hence borne by a considerable number of persons mentioned in Scripture, especially in the families of the priests of the line of Eleazar, whose name has precisely the same meaning as Azariah. It is nearly identical and is often confounded with Ezra, as well as with Zerubbah and Seraiah. See also AZARIAH.

1. Apparently the only son of Ethan, the grandson of Judah (1 Chron. ii, 8). B.C. 1856.

3. A person named as a son of the high-priest Zadok, and an officer in the cabinet of Solomon (1 Kings iv, 2). B.C. cir. 1000. He is perhaps the same, however, with No. 6 below.

4. A son of Nathan and captain of King Solomon's guards (1 Kings iv, 5). B.C. cir. 1000.

5. A prophet who met King Asa on his return from a great victory over the Cushite king Zerah (2 Chron xv, 1, where he is called the son of Oded, but Oded simply in ver. 8). See ASA. B.C. 930. He powerfully stirred up the spirit of Asa, and of the people of Judah and Benjamin, in a brief but pithy prophecy, which has been preserved, to put away all idolatrous worship, and to restore the altar of the one true God before the porch of the temple. Great numbers of Israelites from Ephraim, and Manasseh, and Simeon, and all Israel, joined in the national reformation, to the great strengthening of the kingdom; and a season of rest and great prosperity ensued.—Smith, s. v.

6. A high-priest, son of Abimelech and father (grandfather) of Johanan (1 Chron. vi, 9), perhaps the father of Amariah, who lived under Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (2 Chron. xix, 11). B.C. ante 912. See HOM-PIER.

7. One of the sons of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxii, 2, where the name is repeated, as if he had two sons of this name). B.C. post 912.

8. Otherwise called AHAZIAH (q. v.), king of Judah (2 Chron. xxii, 6).

9. Son of Jeroham, who joined Jehoiada in his pious efforts to restore the worship of the Temple, and put down the usurpation of Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii, 1). B.C. 877.

11. A person named as son of Johanan and father of another Amariah, a high-priest (1 Chron. vii, 10, 11), whom some suppose the same as Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, who was killed in the reign of Josiah of Judah (2 Chron. xxxiv, 20-22). In Ezra vii, 3, either his or a former person's father is called Mesaroth. B.C. cir. 609. See HIGH-PRIEST. From the date he appears to be the same with the high-priest who opposed King Uzziah (q. v.) in offering incense to Jehovah (2 Chron. xxvi, 17, 20). B.C. 781.

12. Otherwise called ZEZZIAH (q. v.), king of Judah, (2 Kings xiv, 21; xv, 1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 23, 27; 1 Chron. iii, 12, etc.).

13. A son of Johanan and chief of the tribe of Ephraim, one of those that protested against enslaving their captive brethren of Jerusalem during the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii, 12). B.C. 739.

14. A Levite, son of Zephaniah and father of Joel (1 Chron. vi, 86). In ver. 24 he is called UZIAH, the son of Uriel and father of Shaul. It appears from 2 Kings xiv, 21, that his son Joel lived under Hezekiah. B.C. ante 726.

15. A high-priest in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi, 10, 13). B.C. 726. He seems to be the same incorrectly called AIHETH in 1 Chron. vi, 11, 12. He appears to have co-operated zealously with the king in that thorough purification of the Temple and restoration of the Temple services which was so consequent an event in Hezekiah's reign. He especially interested himself in providing chambers in the house of the Lord in which to stow the tithes, and offerings, and consecrated things for the use of the priests and Levites, and in appointing overseers to have the charge of them. The maintenance of priests and Levites, and the maintenance of the Temple services depended entirely upon the supply of such offerings, whenever the people neglected them the priests and Levites were forced to disperse themselves to their villages, and so the house of God was deserted (comp. Neh. x, 36-39; xii, 27-50, 44-47).—Smith, s. v.

16. The son of Hilkiah and father of Seraiah, which latter was the last high-priest before the captivity (1 Chron. vi, 13, 14; ix, 11; Ezra vii, 1, 8). B.C. cir. 600.

17. One of the "loud men" who rebelled Jeremiah for advising the people that remained in Palestine after the expatriation to Babylon not to retire into Egypt, and who took the prophet himself and Baruch along with them to that country (Jer. xxiii, 2-7). B.C. 587.

18. The Hebrew name of ABEDNEGQ (q. v.), one of David's three friends who were cast into the fiery furnace (Dan. i, 7; iii, 9). He appears to have been of the royal lineage of Judah, and for this reason selected, with Daniel and his two other companions, for Nebuchadnezzar's especial service. The three children, as they were called, were remarkable for their beauty, and wisdom, and knowledge, and intelligence. They were no less remarkable for their piety, their strict adherence to the law of Moses, and the steadfastness of their faith, even in the face of death, and their wonderful deliverance. B.C. 583. See DANIEL.

19. One of the nobles who returned from Babylon (Neh. vii, 7; xii, 39), and joined in the oath of fidelity to the law (x, 2), and assisted in interpreting it to the people (viii, 7). His father's name was Maaseiah, and he repaired that part of the wall of Jerusalem opposite his house (iii, 23, 24). In Ezra ii, 2, he is called SERRAH. B.C. 538-534.

Azari'as (Ἀζαρίας, the Greek form of Azariah), the name of several men in the Apocrypha.

1. The last named of the "sons" of EMMEN (rather HARRIM) among the priests who promised to renovate their Gentile wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 21); evidently the Uzziah (q. v.) of the true text (Exra x, 21).
1. One of the nobles stated to have supported Ezra on the right while reading the law to the people (1 Esdr. ix, 48); but the genuine list (Neh. viii, 4) does not contain this name.
2. One of the priests who expounded the law on the same occasion (1 Esdr. ix, 48); the Azariah (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Neh. viii, 7).
3. The son of Helcias and father of Seraias in the genealogy of Ezra (2 Vulg. 4 Esdr. l, 1); the Azariah (q. v.) of the Heb. lineage (Ezra vii, 1).
4. The son of Helcias and father of Seraias in the genealogy of Ezra. He is mentioned by the angel Raphael (Tobit viii, 12; vi, 6, 13; vii, 8, 9, 12).
5. The name (Song of 3 Children, ver. 2, 26, 60) of Abednego, Daniel's companion in trial, i. e. Azariah (q. v.) of Dan. i, 7. He is mentioned by this Greek appellation also in 1 Macc. ii, 50, and by Josephus (Ant. x, 10, 1). See DANIEL, ADDITIONS To.
6. One of the generals under Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. v, 19); he was defeated by Gorgias near Jamnia (1 Macc. v, 56, 60; Josephus, Ant. xili, 8, 2 and 4).

A'azāz (Heb. Az'āz, אֶזָּעַז, strong; Sept. Ἀζω'ατ, v. r. Ὄζω'ατ), the son of Shema and father of Bela, a Reubenite (1 Chron. vi, 8). B.C. apparently ante 47.

Azazel [so Milton] (Heb. Az'āzel, אֶזְאזֵל, strong; Sept. Αζω'ατ, v. r. Ωζω'ατ), a word of doubtful interpretation, occurring only in the ordinance of the festival of expiation (Lev. xvi, 8, 10, 26).
1. Some contend that it is the name itself of the goat sent into the desert. So Symmachus ρηγός ἀπροχέμονος, Aquila ρηγός ἀπολογεμένως, Vulgate hircus emissarius; but not the Septuagint (for γρα ἀποτομητικώς, in ver. 8, as by no means to be explained, with Theodoret and Cyril, by γρα ἀποτομητικώς, nor the Mishna (for the expression נַחַלְנָה רַכְבּ, hircus emissarius, of Yoma, iv, 2; vi, 1, 2, is only added as a gloss on account of the occurrence of נָחַלְנָה in the Heb. text).
   It should also be observed that in the latter clause of Lev. xvi, 10, the Sept. renders the Hebrew term as if it was an abstract noun, translating נַחַלְנָה by γρα ἀποτομητικώς. Buxtorf (Heb. Lex.) and Fuglius (Crurici Sacri in loc.), in accordance with this view of its meaning, derived the word from נַחַלְנָה a goat, and נַחַלְנָה to depart. To this derivation it has been objected by Bochart, Winer, and others, that נַחַלְנָה denotes a scape-goat. It is, however, alleged, that the word applied in this manner was common in Gen. xxx, 22, etc.
   But the application of נַחַלְנָה to the goat itself involves the Hebrew text in insuperable difficulties. In ver. 10, 26, the azazel clearly seems to be distinguished as that for or to which the goat is let loose. It can hardly be supposed that the prefix which is common to the designation of the two lots should be used in two different meanings, if both objects were beings.
2. Some have taken Azazel for the name of the place to which the goat was sent. (1) Aben-Exra quotes the words of an anonymous writer referring to it as a hill near Mount Sinai. Vatinius adopts this opinion (Critici Sacri, in Lev. xvi). (2) Some of the Jewish writers, with Le Cerf, consider that it denotes the cliff to which the goat was taken to be thrown down. So Pseudo-Jonathan, Saadia, Arabs Erpenius and Jarchi, interpret a hard or difficult place (comp. Mishna, Yoma, vi, 6). (3) Bochart (Hieroz. i, 749 sq.) regarded the word as a pluralis fractus signifying desert places, and understood it as a general name for any fit place to which the goat might be sent. This has the approbation of Hengstenberg (Prod. et Mem. p. 136). Geuenius remarks that the pluralis fractus, which exists in Arabic, is not found in Hebrew. Moreover, on this interpretation the context (ver. 10) would contain a palpable tautology, for the goat was to be sent to Azazel in the wilderness. Moreover, no such place as Azazel is elsewhere mentioned; and had it been a mountain, "would not have been omitted.

3. Many of those who have studied the subject very closely take Azazel for a personal being to whom the goat was sent. (1) Gesenius gives to נטז the same meaning as the Sept. has assigned to it, if ἀποτομητικός is to be maintained in its usual sense. In this case also, so designated he supposed to be some false deity who was to be appeased by such a sacrifice as that of the goat. He derives the word from a root unused in Hebrew, but found in Arabic, نَتْزَ, to remove or take away (Heb. Lex. s. v.). Ewald agrees with Gesenius, and speaks of Azazel as a demon belonging to the pre-Mosaic religion. (2) But others, with scarcely less perspicacity, interpret it as an evil spirit, who is himself the devil himself. So, among the rabbins, Menahem, who mentions the four arch-demons Sammael, Azazel, Machel, and Machazeel. In Sirr. Eliezer, c. 46, it is stated that Azazel, for the propitiation of which the goat was let loose, is the same demon with Sammael (compare Eisenmenger. Entw. Judasjud. ii, 157; Zohar, od Gen. ii, in Castell, Opp. Posth. p. 390). In the apocryphal book of Enoc, Azazel (not Azazel) is among the chief of the spirits by whose doctrine and influence the earth was corrupted (viii, 11; x, 12; xiii, 1 sq.; xxv, 9); and among the Greek writers the same name (Azazel, Αζω'ατικά) occurs (Fabric. Cod. supscript. i, 104); sometimes as Αζω'ατικος, but this by other demon, Αζω'ατος); and in Syrian authors (Cod. Nazar. i, 240) it is the name of an evil spirit otherwise called Barbag. The same title (Ἀζω'ατικά) among the Gnostics signified either Satan or some other demon (Epiphan. Hier. 54); on which account Origen (contra Cirta. vi, p. 363, ed. Soden) supposes that when in the passage of Leviticus in question, to understand the devil as meant. From the Jews and Christians, the word passed over to the Arabsians (see Reland, De Rel. Mohammed. p. 189); and so, in later magical treatises, Azazel and Azathl are reckoned among the genii that preside over the elements. Among the moderns this view has been copiously illustrated by Spencer (De legibus Hebræorum ritualibus, iii, diss. 8, p. 1039-1085), and has been assented to by Rosenmüller (od Lev. in loc.), Ammon (Bibl. Theol. i, 390), Von Cöln (Bibl. Theol. i, 199), Hengstenberg (Christol. i, 1, 36). The following are the arguments used in its support: (a) The contrast of terms ("to the Lord" ) to Azazel in the text naturally presumes a person to be intended, in opposition to and contradistinction from Jebovah.
(b) The desert, whither the consecrated goat of Azazel was sent away, was accounted the peculiar abode of demons (see Isa. xiii, 21; xxxiv, 13, 14; Baruch iv, 35; Tobit viii, 3; Matt. xii, 43; Rev. xvii, 2; Mon. mond. Neonch. iii, 30). (c) This interpretation may be confirmed by the early derivation of the word, i. q. נטז, signifying either strength of God (comp. Gabriel), if referred to a once good but now fallen angel, or power over against God, as applied to a malignant demon. Spencer derives the word from נט' תטס, and נט, explaining it as οἶκος recedens, which he affirms to be a most suitable name for the evil spirit. He supposes that the goat was given up to the devil, and committed to his disposal. Hengstenberg affirms with great confidence that Azazel cannot mean the thing but another name for Satan. He repudiates the conclusion that the goat was in any sense a sacrifice to Satan, and does not doubt that it was sent away laden with the sins of God's people, now forgiven, in order to mock their spiritual enemy in the desert, his proper abode. He explains it by its Hebrew gamsals their excelling triumph. He considers that the title of the rite was Egyptian, and that the Jews substituted Satan for Typhon, whose dwelling was the desert.
On the other hand, this explanation is forbidden by the total absence in the O. Test. of any reference to have been in that locality (Josh. xx, 35; 2 Chron. xii, 9; Neh. x, 9), but is most clearly defined as being near Shochoh (that is, the northern one) (see SHOCHOH) (1 Sam. xvii, 1). Joshua's pursuit of the Cenamites after the battle of Beth-horon extended to Azekah (Josh. x, 10, 11). Between Azekah and Shochoh, an easy step out of their own territory, the Philistines encamped before the battle in which Goliath was killed (1 Sam. xvii, 3). It was among the cities fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xii, 9), was still standing at the time of the invasion of the kings of Babylon (Jer. xxxiv, 7), and is mentioned as one of the places re-occupied by the Jews after their return from captivity (Neh. vi, 80). Eusebius and Jerome state (Onomast. s. v.) that there was in their time a town in this quarter called Azahelae, united between Jerusalem and Eleutheropolis, which was probably the same as that mentioned by Joshua (see Reland, Palest., p. 603). According to Schwarz (Palest., p. 102), it is represented by the modern village Tell Eskarah, three miles east of Saphia or Alba Specula; but this appears rather to be from the name Zecharjah (Tell Zarchariah, Robinson's Researches, ii, 249). The notices would correspond better to the present Zawkah, marked on Zimmermann's Map a little to the north-east of Beit-Jibrin (Eleutheropolis); but that is in the hill country, beyond the Jordan, to the south of the city of Jerusalem, which was the boundary of the group in Josh. xv, 35. See Tarn, Van de Velde (Memoirs, p. 101), who states that there must have existed at this site as that of a village on a high hill-top called Albek, about 14 miles N. of Daman, and between 4 and 5 miles E.N.E. of Shuweihke (Robinson, Researches, ii, 342 note).

Azel (Heb. 'Atzel, 'ezel, noble; Sept. 'Ezriel), the son of Eleashah, of the descendants of king Saul, and father of six sons (1 Chron. viii, 57, 88; ix, 43, 44). B.C. considerably post 1037. See Azal.

A'zem (Heb. E'tzem, 'ezem, a bone, in pause 'a'tzem, 'a'tem; Sept. 'Azmus v. r. 'Azmus, 'Azam), a city in the tribe of Simeon, originally included within the southern territory of Judah, in the neighborhood of Bilnah (or Bilhah) and Eltolad (or Tolad) (Josh. xv, 29; xix, 3; 1 Chron. iv, 29), in which last passage it is Anglicized "Ezem," Sept. Bacoam v. r. 'Azam). These notices afford only a slight ground for a conjectural location, perhaps in the plain at the south-west extremity of the tribe, possibly on the ruins on Tell Abuwar (Van de Velde, Megiddo, p. 158). Azay'oth (Asyopot, Vulg. omits), given (1 Esdr. v, 16) as the name of a man whose descendants (or place whose inhabitants), to the number of 102, returned from the captivity; but the original lists have the name Yorah (Ezra ii, 16) or Harim (Neh. vii, 24), and the number 112.

Aze'atha (A'tzatha v. r. 'Aza'ath), given (1 Esdr. v, 15), in connection with Celan, as the name of another man whose descendants (or place whose inhabitants), to the number of 67, returned from the captivity; but the genuine lists (Ezra ii, 16; Neh. vii, 21) have no corresponding names.

Az'agad (Heb. A'segad, 'azagad, strong in fortune; Sept. 'Agged, 'Azegad), the head of one of the families of the Israelites whose descendants, to the number of 1222 persons, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 12; Neh. vii, 51), and 111 with Ezra (Ezra viii, 13; Neh. x, 5). B.C. ante 586.

Az'i'ah (Heb. A'shia), one of the "temple servants" whose sons returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. v, 31); evidently the Uzza (q. v.) of the genuine texts (Ezra ii, 49; Neh vii, 51).

Az'iel (Lat. id., for the Greek text is lost), the son of Marimuth and father of Amarias, in the genealogy of Ezra (2 [Vulg. 4] Esdr. i, 1); evidently the Aziariah (q. v.) of the Heb. list (Ezra vii, 8).

Az'irah (Heb. A'shira, 'azirah, Sept. 'Otsira), prob. a AZIZA 577

contracted form (1 Chron. xv. 20) of the name JAZIxl (q. v.) in the same chapter (ver. 18).
AZIZ'Z (Heb. 'Aziz', יֶזִ italic; strong; Sept. 'Ωζηζ'), an Israelite, one of the descendants of Zattu, who divorced the foreign wife that he had married on the return from Babylon (Ezra x. 27). B.C. 459.
AZIZ'UZ (AZÏ'ZUZ), a king of Edom, who embraced Jewish customs, and was inspired to marry Drusilla; but she afterderwise deserted him for Felix (Josephus, Ant. xx. 7, 1, 2).
He died in the first year of Nero (A.D. 54), and was succeeded by his brother Soemus (Joseph. iib. 8, 4).
AZIM'AVOT (Heb. Asma'vot, עִנָּה, perhaps strong as death; Sept. 'Αυμάω and 'Αυμάω), the name of three men, and also at place.
1. A Barhumite (or Baharumite), one of David's three mighty men (2 Sam. xxii. 31; 1 Chron. xi. 39), and father of two of his famous slingers (1 Chron. xii. 3). B.C. 1061.
2. The second named of the three sons of Jehodeah (1 Chron. vii. 86) or Jarah (ix. 42), a descendant of Jonathan. B.C. post 1087.
3. A son of Abd, and overseer of the royal treasury under David and Solomon (1 Chron. xxvii. 25).
B.C. 1014.
4. A village of Judah or Benjamin, and mentioned in connection with Geba (Neh. ii. 29). Twenty-two persons resident of this place were enrolled in the list of those that returned from the captivity at Babylon (Neh. vii. 28), in the first month. The place is called BEITH-AZIMAVOTH. The corresponding Arabic name Azimut is still found in Palestine, but not in a location corresponding to the one in question (Robinson's Researches, iii. 102; De Saucy's Narratives, i. 91). Schwartz (Palest. p. 129) conjectures that the name of this place may have been derived from that of the Benjaminite preceding; but he concludes that it was Almeth, Almon, and even Bahurim.
The notices seem to point to some locality in the northern environs of Jerusalem; hence Ritter (Erck. vi, 519) identifies it with Birnem, a village north of the site of Anathoth (Van de Velde, Memory, p. 291).
AZ'I'MON (Heb. Ahim'on, אָהָיָּם, strong; Sept. 'Αυ-μων, Διαμων), a place on the southern border of Pallate, between Hazar-edar (beyond a bend on the Kerak) and "the river of Egypt" (Num. xxxiv. 4, 5; Josh. xv. 4). The site is perhaps marked by the ruins on a hill near Wady es-Sharin (Robinson, Researches, i.
296), near the junction of Wady Futeis with Wady Ru-halbeh [see TARB], about half way between Elusa and Reboheth (Van de Velde's Map). See ORMON.
AZ'NE'CHOTH-TAR'OR (Heb. Ammon-Tabor, אַמָּה תּוּבָּה, [i. e. summits] of Tabor [comp. Usen-She-rab, "'Chinloth-Tabor"; Sept. 'Αμνός-τάβιον], a town on the western border of Naphthali, between the Jordan and Hukkok (Josh. xii. 34). It is placed by Eusebius (Onomat. s. v. 'Αμνοςας) in a plain not far from Dioscorea. Neither of these notices, however, could allow a position near Tabor, as the name implies; for the territory of Zebalon, at least, intervened. See TAR and TABBOTH. They may, however, be somewhat combined in a conjunctural locality at the eastern edge of the plain el-Buttafah, in the vicinity of Kurn Hattin.
AZ'OR (Αζόρ, from 'mzî, to help), one of the paternal ancestors of Christ (Matt. i. 13, 14); perhaps the same with AZIKIMAN (1 Chron. iii. 28). See AZZUR.
AZ'OR, or AZ'ORUS, JOHN, a Spanish theologian, born in 1588 at Zamora, in Spain, died in 1609. having entered the order of the Jesuits, he became professor of theology, first at Alcala, and subsequently in the Jesuit College at Rome. He published his lectures on morai theology under the title Institutiones Morales. Some of the opinions advanced in this work produced a considerable sensation. He, for instance, finds it "probable" that it is allowable for a man who is threatened by another with a box on the ear to kill the aggressor. The Dominicans violently attacked this proposition, but Pope Clement VIII authorized a new edition of it. Subsequently Pascal resumed the attack in his Lettres Provinciales, in which the "probabil-ism," or the doctrine of probable opinions, of which Azorius is one of the authors, is severely censured.
Notwithstanding these attacks, the work of Azorius had a large circulation in Italy, in Spain, and in France, and was recommended by Bossuet to his priests. The Institutiones have frequently been published at Venice, Cologne, Rome, Lyons, and other places.— Hoefer, Biographie Générale, iii, 935.
AZ'O'TUS (AZÔ'TUS, the Grecized form (Acts vii.
40; so 1 Mac. iv. 15; v. 68; x, 77, 78, 88; xi, 4, xii.
34, xvi, 10) of the name of the city ASH'DOD (q. v.).
AZ'O'TUS, MOUNT (AZÔ'TOS or Ωτος; or Ωτος unused; Vulg. mon. Azotus), a spot to which, in the battle in which Judas Maccabeus fell, he pursued the broken right wing of Bacchides' army (1 Macc. ix. 19). Josephus (Ant. xii. 11, 1) calls it AZA (Azôts, or Azotta, Αζοτα, according to many MSS.), which Ewald finds in a mountain west of Birzeit, under the form ATURA, the Philistine Ashdod being, in his opinion, out of the question. But it is possible that the last-named encampment, Ezzas, was at some distance.
AZ' 'IHEL (Heb. 'Azrihel', צָרִיאַהל, help of God), the name of three men.
1. (Sept. Tişqūr.) The father of Jerimoth, which latter was phylarch of the tribe of Naphthali under David (1 Chron. xxvii. 19). B.C. 1014.
2. (Sept. 'Izqûîah.) One of the valiant heads of families of the tribe of Manasseh east who were taken in captivity by the Assyrians as a punishment of their
3. (Sept. 'Izqûîâh.) The father of Seraiah, which latter was one of the persons ordered by King Jehoiakim to seize Baruch and Jeremiah, and imprison them for sending him the roll of threatening prophecy (Jer. xxxvi. 20). B.C. 665.
AZ'ril'kan (Heb. 'Azrikaim', צַרִיאַקְאִים, help against the enemy; Sept. 'Ekepaq' and 'Ekepaq, once [2 Chron. xxvii. 7] Ekepaq), the name of four men.
1. The father of the six sons of Azel, the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 38; ix. 44). B.C. post 1087.
2. (Josephus, 'Ekepaq, Ant. ix. 12, 1.) The governor of the king's house in the time of Ahaz, slain by Zichri an Ephraimite (2 Chron. xxvii. 7). B.C. cir. 738.
3. A Levite, son of Hasabiah and father of Hasbah (1 Chron. ix. 14; Neh. xii. 15). B.C. ante 536.
4. The last named of the three sons of Neatrim, a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 29). B.C. cir.
404. He is perhaps the same as Azor (q. v.), the son of Eliakim and father of Sadoc in Matt. i. 13, 14 (see Strong's H.A.R.M. and Expos. of Gospels, p. 16, 17).
AZ'UBAH (Heb. Asazâbâh', צַרִיאַבָּה, deserted), the name of two women.
1. (Sept. 'Azôbâd v. r. 'Azôbâd.) The first wife of Caleb, Judah's grandson, by whom he had three sons (1 Chron. iv. 19). B.C. ante 1000.
2. (Sept. 'Azôbâd.) The daughter of Shilhi and mother of King Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 42; 2 AZ'SUR, a less correct mode of Anglicizing (Jer. xxvii. 1; Ezek. xii. 1) the name AZZUR (q. v.).
AZ'turan (Αζτωρ, v. r. 'Az'tou). The name of a man whose descendants (or place whose inhabitants), to the northeast, were stated (1 Esdr. v. 15) to have returned from the captivity; but the true lists (Ezza ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21) have no corresponding name.
ASYMITEs (from a negative and ζημ, low), a title applied by the Greeks to the Western Church, because it uses unleavened bread in the Eucharist.
The Greek Church has always maintained the use of AZZAH
Azzah, an unusual (but more correct) mode of Anglicizing (Deut. ii. 23; 1 Kings iv. 24; Jer. xxv, 20) the name Gaza (q. v.).

AZZAN (Heb. Azzon, "זִ֣זָּ֣ן", perhaps a thorn; Sept. O'çaiw v. r. O'çan), the father of Paltiel, which latter was the commissioner from the tribe of Issachar for dividing the land of Canaan (Num. xxxiv, 26). B.C. ante 1618.

AZZUR (Heb. Azzer, "אַ֣זֵּר" and "אַ֣זֶּר", helper), the name of three men. See also Azor.
1. (Sept. 'Azqep). The father of Hananiah of Gibbon, which latter was the prophet who falsely encouraged King Zedekiah against the Babylonians (Jer. xxviii, 1, where the name is Anglicized "Azur"). B.C. ante 595.
2. (Sept. 'Azqep v. r. B'Ezep.) The father of Jazaniah, which latter was one of the leaders of the people whom the prophet in vision saw devising false schemes of safety for Jerusalem against the Babylonians (Ezek. xi, 1, where the name is Anglicized "Azur"). B.C. ante 593.
3. (Sept. 'Azqep.) One of the chief Israelites who signed the covenant of faith with Jehovah on the return from Babylon (Neh. x, 17). B.C. cir. 410.

Baader, Franz Xavier von, a Roman Catholic philosopher of Germany, was born at Munich in 1765, and died there, May 23, 1841. In early life he devoted himself especially to the study of medicine and natural science, and was rewarded for his services in the mining interests of his country by the title of nobility. He established a greater reputation by his lectures and works on philosophy and theology. Though a layman, he was appointed, in 1827, Professor of Speculative Dogmatics at the University of Munich, which chair he retained until 1838, when a ministerial decree excluded laymen from the delivery of lectures on the philosophy of religion. From early youth he had a great devotion to Rationalism, and a great longing for a deeper understanding of the mysteries of the Christian revelation. He studied with particular interest the mystic and theosophic writers, among whom he took especially Jacob Boehme (q. v.) for his guide. After his example, he built up a system of theology and philosophy, which, as all admit, is full of profound and original ideas, though, on the whole, visionary and paradoxical in the extreme. Baader never separated from the Roman Church, but published several works against the primacy of the Pope. His system of philosophy has still (1860) a number of followers, both among Romanists and Protestants. Among his principal works are: Kongreß über speculative Dogmatik (Stuttg. 8 vols. 1829-38); Revision d. Philosopheme der Hegel'schen Schule (Stuttg. 1839); D. morgenländische und der abendländische Katholizismus (Stuttg. 1841). His complete works have been edited, with explicit introductions, by six of his followers, Fr. Hoffmann, Hamburger, Lutterbeck, Otten-Sacken, Schaden, and Schliiter (Baader's Stimmenleiche Werke, Leipz. 1850-60, 16 vols.). The sixteenth volume contains a copious general index, and an introduction on the system and the history of the philosophy of Baader, by Dr. Lutterbeck. See also Hoffmann, Vorrede zu spekulativem Lehre Franz Baaders (Aschaffenburg, 1836).

BA'AL (Heb. id. בָּאָ֣ל, lord or master), a generic term for god in many of the Syro-Arabian languages. As the idolatrous nations of that race had several gods, this word, by means of some accessory distinction, became applicable as a name to many different deities. See BAAL-BERITH, BAAL-PEOR, BAAL-ZEBUB. There is no evidence, however, that the Israelites ever called Jehovah by the name of Baal; for the passage in Hos. ii. 16, which has been cited as such, only contains the word baal as the sterner, less affectionate representative of husband. It is spoken of the master and owner of a house (Exod. xxvii, 7; Judg. xix, 22); of a landlord (Job xxxi, 30); of an owner of cattle (Exod. xxxi, 28; Isa. i, 8); of a lender of money, i.e. creditor (Deut. xi, 2); also of the head of a family (Lev. xxvi, 4); and even of the Assyrians (or the princes) as conquerors of nations (Isa. xvi, 8). See BAALIM. It also occurs very frequently as the first part of the names of towns and men, e.g. BAAL-GAD, BAAL-HAMON, BAAL-HANAN, etc., all which see in their alphabetical order, and compare BAAL-. As a strictly proper name, and in its simple form, Baal stands in the Biblio for a deity, and also for two men and one village. See also GEBBAAL; KIZLATHI-BAAL; MBABB-BAAL.

Ancient Medals with the Head of Baal.

1. This name (with the article, בֶּנְ בָּאָ‬, ben-Ba'el, Judg. ii, 13; Sept. ב בָּאָ‬ Baal, but also ב Baal, Jer. xix, 5; xxix, 35; Rom. xi, 4) is appropriated to the chief male divinity of the Phoenicians, the principal seat of whose worship was at Tyre, and thus corresponds with ASHERETH, their supreme female divinity. Both names have the peculiarity of being used in the plural, and it seems that these plurals designate either (as Guenius, Thea, s. v. maintains) statutes of the Divinities, or different modifications of the divinities themselves. That there were many such modifications of Baal is certain from the fact that his name occurs with numerous adjuncts, both in the O. T. and elsewhere, as we have seen above. The plural BAALIM is found frequently alone (e. g. Judg. ii. 11; x. 10; 1 Kings xviii, 18; Jer. ix. 14; Hos. ii. 17), as well as in connection with ASHERETH (Judg. xiv. 6; 1 Sam. vii, 4), and with Asherah, or, as our version renders it, "the groves" (Judg. iii. 7; 2 Chron. xxxiiii. 3). There is no difficulty in determining the meaning of the name, since the Hebrews and Canaanites, in the very common name of female divinity, having the meaning lord, not so much, however, in the sense of ruler as of master, owner, possessor. The name of the god, whether singular or plural, is always distinguished from the common noun by the presence of the article (בֶּנְ בָּאָ‬, ben-Ba'el), except when it stands in connection with some other word which designates a peculiar modifi-cution of Baal. In the Chaldaic form the word becomes shortened into Baal, and hence, dropping the guttural, წწ, Be, which is the Babylonian name of this god (Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. et Talm.; so Gesenius, Forst, Movers; the identity of the two words is, however, doubted by Rawlinson, Herod. i, 247). We need not doubt of the very high antiquity of the worship of Baal. We find his cultus established among the Moabites and their allies the Midianites in the time of Moses (Num. xxii, 41), and through these nations the Israelites were seduced to the worship of this god under the particular form of Baal-peor (Num. xxvi, 9 sq.; Deut. iv, 3). Notwithstanding this the whole subsequent history is in every way one of triumph brought upon them in this instance, the succeeding generation returned to the worship of Baal (Judg. ii, 10-19), and with the exception of the period during which Gideon was judge (Judg. vi, 26 sq.; viii, 30) this form of idolatry seems to have prevailed among them up to the time of Samuel (Judg. x, 1; 1 Sam. vii, 4), at whose rebuke the people renounced the worship of Baalim. Two centuries pass over before we hear again of Baal in connection with the people of Israel, though we can scarcely conclude from this silence that his worship was altogether abandoned. We know that in the time of Solomon the service of many gods of the surrounding nations was introduced particularly that of Ashtoreth, with which Baal is so frequently connected. However this may be, the worship of Baal spread greatly, and, together with that of Asherah, became the religion of the court and people of the ten tribes under Ahaz, king of Israel, who, partly through the influence of his wife Jezebel (q. v.), the daughter of the Sidonian king Ethbaal, appears to have made a systematic attempt to suppress the worship of God altogether, and to substitute that of Baal in its stead (1 Kings xvi, 31-33; xvii, 19, 22). And though this idolatry was occasionally put down (2 Kings iii, 2; x, 29), it appears never to have been permanently or factually abolished in that kingdom (2 Kings xvii, 16). In the kingdom of Judah also Baal-worship extensively prevailed. During the short reign of Ahaziah and the subsequent usurpation of his mother Athaliah, the sister of Ahaz, it appears to have been the religion of the court (2 Kings vii, 27; comp. xi, 10), as it was subsequently under both kings Ahaz (2 Kings xvi, 8; 2 Chron. xxviii, 2), and Manasseh (2 Kings xx, 3).—Smith.

The worship of Baal among the Jews appears to have been appointed with much pomp and ceremonial. Temples were erected to him (1 Kings xvi, 26; 2 Kings xi, 18); his images were set up (2 Kings x, 26); his altars were very numerous (Jer. xi, 18), being erected particularly on lofty eminences [see HIGH-PLACE], (1 Kings xvii, 20), and on the roofs of houses (Jer. xxxii, 29); there were priests in great numbers (1 Kings xviii, 19), and of various classes (2 Kings x, 19); the worshippers appear to have been arrayed in appropriate robes (2 Kings x, 22; comp. Lucian, De Deis Syr., 50). His priesthood (the proper term for which seems to be ἄρματος, 3ar Matt, so called from their black garments) were a very select and numerous body (1 Kings xviii, 19), and were divided into the two classes of prophets and of priests (unless the term "servants," which comes between these words, may denote a third order—a kind of Levites, 2 Kings x, 19). As to the rites by which he was worshipped, there is no doubt (according to the most ancient version of the book, which is expressed, lid, about the altar, and, when they prayed, were not an- swered, as was the case with knives and blood, as among the peoples of Belon (Lucan Pharm. i, 565; Tartull. Apologi. ix; Lactant. Divin. Inst. i, 21).—We also read of homage paid to him by bowing the knee, and by kissing his image (1 Kings xix, 18; comp. Cicero, in Verres, iv, 45), and that his worshippers would swear by his name (Jer. xii, 16)._Kittel, Smith. See ETIBAAAL.

Throughout all the Phoenician colonies we continually find traces of the worship of this god, partly in the names of men, such as Ather-bol, Asdru-bol, Han-ibol, and still more distinctly in Phoenician inscriptions yet remaining (Gesenius, Mon. Phoen. passim). Nor need we doubt to regard the Babylonian Bel (Isa. lxvi, 1) or Belus (Herod. i, 181) as essentially identical with Baal, though perhaps under some modified form. Rawlinson distinguishes between the second god of the first triad of the Assyrian pantheon, whom he names provisionally Bel-Ninmrod, and the Babylonian Bel, whom he considers identical with Melrodach (Herod. i, 510 sq.; 521 sq.). Traces of the idolatry symbolized under it are even found in the British Isles, Baal, Bel, or Bel being, according to many, the name of the principal deity of the ancient Irish; and on the tops of many hills in Scotland there are heaps of stones called by the common people "Bel's hair," which it is supposed that are supposed to have been offered in early times (Statistical Account of Scotland, iii, 108; xi, 621). See ETIBAAAL.

The same perplexity occurs respecting the connection of this god with the heavenly bodies as we have already noticed in regard to Ashthoroth. Creuzer (Symb. et Myth. der Märtyrer (Phén. i), 251) says that Baal was to be the Sun-god; on the other hand, the Babylonian god is identified with Zeus by Herodotus, and there seems to be no doubt that Bel-Merodach is the planet Jupiter (Rawlinson, Herod. i, 512). On the whole, Baal probably represents properly the sun, and, in connection with Astarte, or the moon, was very generally worshiped by the idolatrous nations of Western Asia, as representing the great generative powers of nature, the former as a symbol of the active, and the latter of the passive principle. Traces of this tendency to worship the principal luminaries of heaven appear frequently in the history of the Israelites at a very early period, before Sabianism as such was distinctly established (Exod. xx, 4; Deut. iv, 19; xvii, 8; 2 Kings xxiii, 11). Gesenius, however (in his Thesur. Heb.), contends that Baal was not the sun, but the planet Jupiter, as the guardian and giver of good fortune; but the view of Münster (in his Religion der Babylonier) seems to be the most tenable, that, whereas he does not possess the astrological character of this worship, still maintains that, together with and besides that, there existed in very early times a cosmological idea of the primitive power of nature, as seen in the two functions of generation and conception or parturition, and that the sun and moon were the fittest representatives of these two powers. It is quite likely that in the case of Baal, as well as of Ashtoreth, the symbol of the god varied at different times and in different localities. Indeed, the great number of names with which the name of Baal is found is a sufficient proof of the diversity of characters in which he was regarded, and there must no doubt have existed a large number of persons in the worship. It may even be a question whether in the original notion of Baal there was reference to any of the heavenly bodies, since the derivation of the name does not in this instance, as it does in the case of Ashthoroth, point directly to them. If we separate the name Baal from idolatry, we see, according to its meanings, an allusion simply to the highest deity in the worship. With this the idea of productive power is naturally associated, and that power is as naturally symbolized by the sun; while, on the other hand, the idea of power and arrangement and rule, and so of prosperity, is naturally suggested by the word, and in this mythological sense as the blood-god of Jupiter. In point of fact, we find it in the Baal answering to all these notions, e. g. Brēt
BAAL

Balamem (Plut. Per. v, 267) "Lord of the heavens;" בַּלּוֹמֵה, Baal-Hamon (Gesenius, Mon. Pharn. p. 849), the Sun-Baal (comp. the similar name of a city in Cant. vii, 11); בַּלּוֹמָה, Baal-Gad, the name of a city (Josh. xi, 17), q. d. Baal the Fortune-bringer, which god may be regarded as identical with the planet Jupiter. Many more compounds of Baal in the O.T. occur, and among them a large number of cities, which are given below. There has recently been discovered among the ruins of a temple on Mount Lebanon an inscription containing the name בַּל-מָרְאֶה, the first part of which is evidently identical with the Phoenician Baal, which has been worshipped still under the title of "the god of dancing" (Biblioth. Sacra, 1843, p. 559 sqq.). Dr. Wilson, when at Damascus, obtained the impression of an ancient scarabaeus, on which was carved an inscription, in the old Phoenician alphabet, containing the name בַּל-מָרְאֶה, "to wall" of Baal. (Lawes of Bible, ii, 276. See BAALIM.)

3. (Sept. Baal v. r. Beil ell and even Yowl.) A Reubenite, son of Reba and father of Beerah, which last was one of the ten sons of Jesse who were slain at Eleutherah by Tiglath-Pileser I. (1 Chron. vii, 5). B.C. ante 738.

4. (Sept. Baal.) A place in the vicinity of Ain and Ashan, inhabited by the Simeonites (1 Chron. iv, 38); probably the same elsewhere (Josh. xix, 8) called BAALATH-Beer (q. v.). See BAAL.

Baal or Baal (Heb. בָּשָׁל, בָּשָׁל, i. e. Baal), a geographical word occurring as the prefix or suffix to the names of several places in Palestine (see those following, nota Bene-Baal). Gesenius has expressed his opinion (Thes. Heb. p. 225, col. a) that in these cases it has no reference to any worship of the god Baal at the particular spot, but merely expresses that the place "possesses" or contains something special denoted by the other part of the name, the word Baal bearing in that case a definite synonymy with that of Beth (q. v.). See BAAL-TAMAR, etc. Without contradicting this conclusion, some reasons may be mentioned for reconsidering it. See BAALIM.

1. Though employed in the Hebrew Scriptures to a certain extent metaphorically, and there certainly with the force of "possession" or "ownership," as in the "house of Baal" (I Kgs. i, 5), etc. (Gen. xxxvii, 19), etc., Baal never seems to have become a naturalized Hebrew word, but frequently occurs so as to betray its Canaanite origin and relationship. Thus it is several times employed to designate the inhabitants of towns either certainly or probably heathen, but rarely, if ever, those of one undoubtedly Hebrew. It is applied to the men of Jericho before the conquest (Josh. xxiv, 11); to the men of Shechem, the ancient city of Hamor the Hivite, who rose to recover the rights of Hamor's descendants long after the conquest of the land (Judg. ix, 2, 51, with Ewald's commentary, Gesch. ii, 445-447), and in the account of which struggle the distinction between the "lORDS" (יְהוָּה) of Shechem and the "men" (הָעָם, Hebrew relative) of Amelech is carefully maintained. It is used for the men of Kelah, a place on the western confines of Judah, exposed to all the attacks and the influences of the surrounding heathen (1 Samuel xxiii, 11, 12), for Urijah the Hititte (2 Sam. xi, 26), and for others (Isa. xvi, 8, etc.). Add to this the consideration that if Baal forms part of the name of a person, we must not identify the name with that of the Hebrew alteration, as Jerubbaal for Jerub-Baal; Melibechoth for Melib-ba'al; Shebosheth for Esb-baal, and others. In Hos. ii, 16, a remarkable instance is preserved of the distinction, noticed above in connection with the record of the revolt at Shechem, between the heathen Baal and the Hebrew Jah: "At that day, saith Jehovah, men shall call me 'Jah,' and shall call me no more 'Baali,'" both words having the sense of "my husband."

2. Such places called by this name, or its compounds, as can be identified, and several of which existed at the time of the conquest, were either near Phoenicia, or Baal-gad, Baal-hermon, Belmaros (of later times), or in proximity to some other acknowledged seat of heathen worship, as Baal-meon and Bamoth-Baal, near Baal-poer; or Kirjath-Baal and Baal-tamar, connected with Gibeon and Bethel (see Dem., "Der Baal in d. Hebr. Eigenennamen," in der Zeitschr. d. deutch. geword. Gesellsch. 1862, iv, 72 sqq.).

3. On mentioning the once Baal forms part of the names of places which we elsewhere discover to have been elevated spots, spots in which the worship of the Cannanites delighted. Thus Baal-hermon is elsewhere called "Mount Baal," and Baal-perazim is (very probably) "Mount Perazim." Baalath-beer, too, is called in the parallel lists Ramath (i. e. "height"). Compare the Vulgate rendering of Baalath in 1 Chron. xiii, 6, "ad collem Carathariam," also Baalath (Josh. xv, 11).

4. There is the consideration of the very deep significance with which the name of Baal must always have been invested in the Israelitish and still more in the predecessors in the country—for those who venerated and those who were commanded to hate him. Surely this significance must have been sufficient to prevent that portentous name from becoming a mere alternative for a term which, like Ben- (q. v.), was in the commonest daily use.—Smith, s. v.

5. The most significant form in which this compound word occurs is its use as an element (in a manner common to all the Semitic languages) in proper names, like-el (בָּשָׁלות) and Jah (יְהוָּה) of the Hebrew; sometimes at the end, e. g. Eth-baal (יֵשׁ בָּשָׁל), Meri-baal (מֵר בָּשָׁל), Esh-baal (יָשׁ בָּשָׁל), Jerub-baal (יְרֵעַ בָּשָׁל), etc. (which see severally); at other times at the beginning, e. g. Baal-hamon (יְהוָּה הַמָּרְאֶה), Baal-gath (יְהוָּה אֲגַת), and in some instances the heathenish "Baal" has supplanted the corresponding Jewish sacred name, e. g. El-kods (יִהוָּה כּוֹדֵס), 2 Sam. v, 16 = Beel-kods (בֶּל בָּשָׁל), 1 Chron. iv, 7. This was a frequent method of formation in Phoenician proper names, as appears from those occurring in classical Biblical and Biblical history; and is clearly inscriptions on coins, e. g. Itbeal (יִתֵּבַל), "with Baal," Gerb. i, 2), Bathbeal (בָּשָׁל), "daughter of Baal," Carth. 8), Ribkembaal (רַיבּכֶּל בָּשָׁל), "sage of Baal," Numid. i, 2), Ribkhbaal (רַיבּכֶּל בָּשָׁל), the same by assimilation of the ב, ב, i, 3), Ribkembeal (רַיבּכֶּל בָּשָׁל), the same with the insertion of the relative prex "i, ב, i, 2), Jeshbaal (יֶשֶׁבַל), "desire of Baal," Cit. 26), Jaascherbaal (יֶאֵשֶׁר בָּשָׁל), "enriched by Baal," Numid. v, 1), Malikbaal (מַלְיַכְבָּשָׁל), "ruled by Baal," Malt. iii, 1), Mezbbaal (יְמָצֶב בָּשָׁל), "kindled by Baal," Numid. i, 4), Morbaal (מְר בָּשָׁל), "made by Baal," i, 3), Mouttohaal (מוֹטָש בָּשָׁל), "given by Baal," i, vii, 1), etc. (see Gesenius, The. Heb. p. 224, b.—Fürst, s. v. See Name.

Ba'alah (Heb. בַּלָּאָה, בַּלָּאָה, mistres, cirelts), the name of two cities and of one mountain. See also BAYAF.

3. (Sept. Baalath v. r. Beol.) A city in the southern part of Judah, mentioned in connection with Beer-sheba and Imm (Josh. xxv, 29), apparently the same elsewhere called BAALAH (Josh. xix, 5), also BILBAH, and assigned to Simeon (2 Chron. iv, 29). In the first-named passage it forms part of the preceding name Bizlithah-Baalath. See BIZLITHAH.
BAALBEK

2. (Sept. Budzl v. r. Baalas, but omits in 1 Chron.) A city on the northern border of Judah (Josh. xv. 10), between Bethel and Jerusalem (q.v.) (Josh. xvi. 9; 1 Chron. xiii. 6), otherwise called a city of Judah (2 Sam. vi. 2). In Josh. xvi. 60, and xviii. 14, it is called Kirjath-Baal. From the expression "Baal which is Kirjash-jearim" (comp. "Jebusi, which is Jerusalem," xviii. 28), it would seem if Baalas were the earlier or Canaanite appellation of the place.

3. (Sept. יבש Budzl v. r. יבש, etc.) A mountain "on the N.W. boundary...between Shiron and Jabnool" (Josh. xv. 11), usually regarded as the same with Mount Jearim (ver. 10), from the neighboring Kirjash-baal; but erroneously (see Keil, Comment. in loc.), for the direction in the text requires a location more westerly, apparently at the modern Tell Hermes (Van de Velde, Mop). See TIRE.

Ba'alath (Heb. Ba'alath), מָצִיתָ הָאָרֶץ, another form of the name Baalath; Sept. Baalatha (v. r. Τιθικάν in Josh.), but Baalatha v. r. Balas in 2 Chron., a town in the tribe of Dan, named with Gebbethon, Gath-ribbon, and other Philistine places (Josh. xix. 44), apparently the same that was afterward rebuilt by Solomon (1 Kings ix. 18; 2 Chron. viii. 6). Many have conjectured this Baalatha to be the same as Baalbek (so Schwarz, Puelet, p. 62); but in that case it must have lain in northernmost Dan, whereas the possession was restored to that tribe in its territory wholly in the south near Judah; and many years before the migration (recorded in Judg. xviii) which gave Dan a northern territory. Correspondingly, Josephus places the Baalatha of Solomon (which he calls Bileth, Balzì) in the southern part of Palestine, near Gezer or Gezer (Ant. viii. 6, 1), within the territory which would have belonged to Dan had it acquired possession of the lands originally assigned to it. The Jerusalem Talmud (Sanhedr. 1) affirms that Baalatha lay so near the line of separation between Dan and Judah that the fields only were in the former tribe, the buildings being in the latter. Schwarz, however (Puelet, p. 138 note), disputes this position; the statement seems to have reference to the post-exilic distribution of Palestine, by which Judah gave name (Judæa) to the entire neighborhood, including Benjamin as well as Dan and Simeon, an arrangement evidently growing out of the earlier division into two nations (the south corresponding to Judah, and Israel); Van de Velde is probably correct in identifying the site with that of Dar Bâlût, on the high southern shore of Wady Kerma, about half way between Jaffâ and Nahalou; but he distinguishes this from the Baalatha of Solomon, assigning only the insufficient reason that this locality is not situated near a highway where a fortified place would be required (Memor. p. 291).

Ba'alath-beer (Heb. Ba'alath Beer, מָצִית הָאָרֶץ, Baalath of [or having] a well; Sept. Baalatba v. r. Bealâ), probably the same as the Baal of 1 Chron. iv. 38, a city of Simeon; mentioned in connection with Ramath-Negeb, or Southern Ramah (Josh. xix. 8; comp. 1 Sam. xxx. 27), in such a manner as to make them identical (so the Sept. B תְּרוֹמָת וֹאֶלִים; Vulg. Baalath-Beerramoth). See Ramath. It is also the same with the Bealath (q.v.) of Judah (Josh. xv. 24). Other sacred wells in this parched region were the Beer-lahai-roi, the "well of the vision of God;" and Beer-sheba, the "well of the oath." See Beer.

BAALBEK, a city of Cœle-Syria, celebrated for its superb ruins yet extant of an ancient temple of the sun, and supposed by many to be the site designated by the later beacon "House on the Forest of Lebanon" (1 Kings vii. 2; x. 17; 2 Chron. iii. 5). We are also informed that among those parts of Palestine which were unsubdued by the Hebrews at the death of Joshua was "all Lebanon towards the sun-rising from Baal-gad, under Mount Hermon, unto the entering into Hamath" (Josh. xiii. 5). This position of a site between Baalbek and Hamath has been often presumed as resulting from that of the temple of Baalbek, which some have reached, that it is no other than the place which, from a temple consecrated to the sun that stood there, was called by the Greeks Helipolis, i.e. city of the sun; and which the natives called and still call Baalbek, a word apparently of the same meaning. The honor of being identified with Baalbek has also been claimed for the Baalbek which Solomon built or fortified; but this claim has already been disposed of (see Baalath); and no weight is to be attached to the local traditions which claim Solomon as the founder of Baalbek, seeing that it is the practice of the natives to ascribe to that great king every grand ancient work of other ages, by which the one is mixed up with the other. It is also to be observed that those who contend for Baalath admit its possible identity with Baal-gad, and hence there are no conflicting claims to adjust. Even those who suppose the Baal-hamon of the Canticles (vii. 11) to be Baalbek, conceive that to be a later name for Baal-gad, and hence the only question that remains is whether Baalbek is not the more ancient name of the place afterward known as Helipolis and Baalbek. Baalbek, in the Syrian language, signifies the city of Baal, or of the sun; and, as the Syrians never borrowed names from the Greeks, or translated Greek names, it is certain that when the Greeks came in contact with the Syrians they found them surrounding some or other signifying "city of the sun," since they termed it Helipolis, which is doubtless a translation of the native designation. Now the question is whether this word has the same meaning as Baal-gad, and, if not, whether any circumstances can be pointed out as likely to occasion the change of name. If we take Baal for the name of the idol, then, as in the case of Baalbek, the last member of the word must be taken as a modifying appellation, not as in itself a proper name; and as God means a mart, a multitude, or a press of people; Baal-gad will mean Baal's crowd, whether applied to the inhabitants, or to the place as a resort of pilgrims. The syllable Baal has precisely the same meaning in the Arabic. If this should not seem satisfactory, we may conclude that Baal was so common an element in the composition of proper names that it is not sufficiently distinctive to bear the stress of such an interpretation, and may rather take it to signify divinity, or any deity (as in natural or artificial combinations) the place where a thing is found. See Baal. According to this view, Baal-gad would mean the place of God. Now Gad was an idol (Isa. lxv. 11), supposed to have been the god or goddess of good fortune (comp. Sept. Τύγγας; Vulg. Fortuna); and identified by the Jewish commentators with the planet Jupiter. See Gad. But it is well known that Baal was identified with Jupiter as well as with the sun; and it is not difficult to connect Baalbek with the worship of Jupiter. John of Antioch affirms that the great temple at Baalbek was dedicated to Jupiter; and in the celebrated passage of Macrobius (Saturn. i. 20), in which Macrobius says that the worship of Jupiter was brought by Egyptian priests to Helios in Syria, he expressly states that they introduced it under the name of Jupiter (sub nomine Jovis). This implies that the worship of Jupiter was already established and popular at the place, and that heliostyles previously was not; and Helios, it would rather seem, was brought into Baalbek to have borne some name referring to Jupiter than to the sun, and may be sure that a name indicative of heliostyles must have been posterior to the introduction of that worship by the Egyptians; and, as we have no ground for supposing that this took place before or till long after the age of Joshua, it could only have been adopted by the people corresponding to Helipolis. But see Baal-gad.

Baalbek is pleasantly situated on the lowest declivity of Anti-Libanus, at the opening of a small valley.
into the plain El-Bekas. Through this valley runs a small stream, divided into numberless rills for irrigation. The place, according to the determination of Maj. Rennell (Geogr. of W. Asia, i, 75), is in N. lat. 34° 1' 30" N., and E. long. 36° 11', distant 109 geog. miles from Palmyra, and 381 from Tripoli. Its origin appears to be lost in the most remote antiquity, and the historical notices of it are very scanty; the silence of the classical writers respecting it would alone seem to imply that it had previously existed under another name. In the absence of more positive information, we can only conjecture that its situation on the high-road of commerce between Tyre, Palmyra, and the farther East, must have contributed largely to the wealth and magnificence which it manifestly attained. It is mentioned under the name of Heliopolis by Josephus (Ant. xiv, 8, 4), and also by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v, 22). Two Roman inscriptions of the time of Antoninus Pius give sanction to the statement of John of Antioc, who alleges that this emperor built a great temple to Jupiter at Heliopolis, which was one of the wonders of the world (Hist. Chron. lib. xi). From the reverses of Roman coins we learn that Heliopolis was constituted a colony by Julius Caesar; that it was the seat of a Roman garrison in the time of Augustus, and obtained the Insiculam from Severus (Ulpian, De Censibus, 9). Some of the coins of later date contain curious representations of the temple (Akersman, Rom. Coins, i, 389). After the age of Constantine the splendid temples of Baalbek were probably consigned to neglect and decay, unless, indeed, as some appearances indicate, they were then consecrated to Christian worship (see Chron. Pasch. p. 303, ed. Bohn; comp. Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v, 10; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. iii, 7; iv, 27). From the accounts of Oriental writers Baalbek seems to have continued a place of importance down to the time of the Moslem invasion of Syria (see Ammian. Marcell. xiv, 8). They describe it as one of the most splendid of Syrian cities, enriched with stately palaces, adorned with monuments of ancient times, and abounding with trees, fountains, and whatever contributes to luxurious enjoyment (D’Herbelot, Bibloth. Or. v, v.). On the advance of the Moslems, it was reported to the Emperor Heraclius as protected by a citadel of great strength, and well able to sustain a siege. After the capture of Damascus it was regularly invested by the Moslems, and, containing an overflowing population, amply supplied with provisions and military stores, it made a courageous defence, but at length capitulated. Its importance at that period is attested by the ransom exacted by the conquerors, consisting of 2000 ounces of gold, 4000 ounces of silver, 2000 silk vests, and 1000 swords, together with the arms of the garrison. It afterward became the mart for the rich pilgrimage of Syria; but its prosperity soon received a fatal blow from the caliph of Damascus, by whom it was sacked and dismantled, and the principal inhabitants put to the sword (A.D. 748). During the Crusades, being incapable of making any resistance, it seems to have quietly submitted to the strongest. In the year 1400 it was pillaged by Timour Beg, in his progress to Damascus, after he had taken Aleppo. Afterward it fell into the hands of the Metafeli—a barbarous predatory tribe, who were nearly exterminated when Djezzar Pasha permanently subjected the whole district to Turkish supremacy. In 1750 an earthquake completed the devastation already begun by Mohammedan vandalism.

The ruins of Heliopolis lie on an eastern branch of the mountain, and are called, by way of eminence, the Castle. The most prominent objects visible from the plain are a lofty portico of six columns, part of the great temple, and the walls and columns of another smaller temple a little below, surrounded by green trees. There is also a singular temple of nearly circular form. These, with a curious column on the highest point within the walls (which may possibly have been a clepsydra, or water-dial), form the only erect portions of the ruins. These ruins have been so often and so minutely described by scores of travelers, as well as in many works of general reference, that, since their identification as a Scriptural site is uncertain, a few additional observations only may suffice. The ruins of Baalbek in the mass are appar. ently of three successive eras: first, the gigantic hewn stones, in the face of the platform or basement on which the temple stands, and which appear to be remains of older buildings, perhaps of the more ancient temple which occupied the site. Among these are at least twenty standing upon a basement of rough stones, which would be called enormous anywhere but here. These celebrated blocks, which in fact form the great wonder of the place, vary from 30 to 40 feet in length; but there are three, forming an upper course 20 feet from the ground, which together measure 190 feet, being severally of the enormous dimensions of 63 and 64 feet in length, by 12 in breadth and thickness (Addison's Damasculus and Palmyra, ii, 55). "They are," says Richter (Waldfahrten, p. 281), "the largest stones I have ever seen, and might of themselves have easily given rise to the popular opinion that Baalbek was built by angels at the command of Solomon. The whole wall, indeed, is composed of immense stones, and its resemblance to the remains of the Temple of Solomon, which are still shown in the foundations of the mosque Es-Sakkara on Mount Moriah, cannot fail to be observed." This was also pointed out by Dr. Richardson. In the neighboring quarries (q. v.) from which they were cut, one stone, hewn out but not carried away, is of much larger dimensions than any of those which have been mentioned. To the second and third eras belong the Roman temples, which, being at and about the time of Antoninus Pius, present some of the finest specimens of Corinthian architecture in existence, and possess a wonderful grandeur and majesty from their lofty and imposing situation (Addison, ii, 57). Among the ornaments of these buildings Richter finds confirmation of the following statement of Macrobius: "when the temples are often unequivocally appear. The winged globes surrounded with serpents show that the priests of Baalbek received their ideas of divinity from On, the Heliope-pia of Egypt." Speaking generally of these remains, Burckhardt says, "The entire view of the ruins of Palmyra, when seen at a certain distance, is infinitely more striking than those of Baalbek; but there is not any one spot in the ruins of Tadmor so imposing as the interior view of the temple of Baalbek" (Syria, p. 13). He adds that the architecture of Baalbek is richer than that of Tadmor. Mr. Addison remarks that "the ruins, though so striking and magnificent, are, nevertheless, quite second-rate, as compared with the Athenian ruins, and display in their decoration none of the bold conceptions and the genius which characterize the Athenian architecture." The present Baalbek is a small village to the east of the ruins, in a sad state of wretchedness and decay. It is little more than a heap of rubbish, the houses being built of mud and sun-dried bricks. The population of 5000 which the place is said to have contained in 1751 is now reduced to barely 2000 persons; the two handsome mosques and fine serai of the emir, mentioned by Burckhardt, are no longer distinguishable; and travelers may now inquire in vain for the grapes, the pomegranates, and the figs in abundance which used to abound (Iken, Disert. de Baal Hamon et Baal-Gad, in Disert. Philologico-Theolog. i, 136; Wood and Dawkins, Ruins of Baalbek, Lond. 1757; Pococke, Description of the East, ii, 106-113; Maundrell, Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 134, 139; Volney, Voyage en Syrie, ii, 215-230; Thesprot, Cosmographe, bk. vi. ch. xiv.; Schubert, Reise in das Morgenland, Erlangen, 1841; see also Rosenmuller, Biblical Geography, ii, 252-257; Thomson, Land and Book, i, 350-361; Kelly's Syria, p. 256-256; Smith's Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v. Hellas and Syria)—Kitto, s. v. Baal-Gad.

Ba'll-be'th (Heb. Ba'al Berith), בָּעָל בֵּרִית, covenant-lord; Sept. Baal'bamid V. r. Bria' baalhineq; Judg. ix. 4) is the name of a god worshipped by the people of Shchem (Judg. viii, 30), who, on account of the constitution of the name, has been compared to the Περίος of the Greeks, and the Latin Deus Fidius. Bochart and Creutzer think that this name means "God of Berith;" but, whether or not the name of that town is to be recognised in the Berothah of Ezek. xlvii, 46, there is hardly any ground for their opinion. Gleiser (i, 162) considers the name equivalent to "Baal in covenant with the idolaters of Israel." The meaning, however, does not seem to be the god who presides over covenants, but the god who comes into covenant with the worshippers. In Judg. ix. 46, he is called simply "the Berith" (ברית בָּעָל). We know nothing of the particular form of worship paid to this god. See Baalim.

Ba'ël of Judah (Heb. Ba'alayeh Yehud th, בָּעָל יְהוּדָה, lords or cities of Judah; Sept. and Vulg. render ei οἱ γείτοναι 'Ivdoalling, or Joda), a city in the tribe of Judah, from which David brought the ark into Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 2). It is elsewhere called Baalah (q. v.), and was still better known as Kvir'ath-je'arim (1 Chron. xiii, 6).

v. t. Balagva, once [Josh. xiii, 5] Galgal, a city of the Canaanites, perhaps in the valley of Lebanon, at the source of the Jordan and foot of Mount Hermon, whose kings were taken and put to death by Joshua, but the city itself remained unsubdued in his day (Josh. xvi, 17; xii, 7; xiii, 5). It was a place evidently well known at the time of the conquest, as such a place is the most northern (Josh. xvi, 17, xii, 7), or perhaps north-western (xii, 5, Hamath being to the extreme north-east) point to which Joshua's victories extended. See BAALAM. The words the plain (נְן נְנָה) of Lebanon would lead to the supposition that it lay between the two ranges of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, which is still known by the same name El-Bukka'a, and it has accordingly been identified by Iken and others (including Thompson, Land and Book, i, 368) with Balbek (Ritter, Erdkunde, xxvii, 290). See BAALBEK. But against this are the too great distance of Balbek to the north, and the precise expression of the text—under Mount Hermon. The conjecture of Schwarz (Palest, p. 60), supported by Robinson (Researches, new ed. iii, 219), is, that the modern representative of Balad-gad is Banias, a place which long maintained a great reputation as the sanctuary of Pan. See CAESAREA, PHILIPPICA. From its association with Mount Hermon, it would seem to be the same with BAAL-HERMON (Judg. iii, 8; 1 Chron. v, 23).—Smith.

BAAL-GUR. See GUR-BAL.

Ba'al-hamon (Heb. Ba'al Hamon, בַּעַל חָמוֹן, place of multitude; Sept. Balakwv), a place where Solomon is said to have had an extensive vineyard (Cant. viii, 11). Rosenmüller (Allerh. i, ii, 281) conceives that if this Baal-hamon was the name of a place that actually existed, it may be reasonably supposed identical with Baal-gad or Heholiqa; for Hamon was a chief Phoenician god (Davis, Carthage, p. 256, 262), perhaps the Ammon of the Egyptians (see Nah. iii, 8), whom the Greeks identified with Jupiter (Bib. Geogr. ii, 253). We are not inclined to lay much stress on this conjecture (see Iken, Disser. phil. in loc.), which, however, is adopted by Schwarz (Palest, p. 60). The name, called Hamon, in the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix, 28), which Ewald (Comment. in loc.) thinks was the same as Baal-hamon; but there is little probability in this conjecture. The book of Judith (viii, 3) places a Balamon (Balakwv) or Bealomon (Balawv) in central Palestine, and therefrom inferred the mountain of Ephraim, not far north of Samaria. See BAALAM. If it be the same place (see Gesenius, Thes. Heb. p. 225), this vineyard may have been in one of the fat valleys of the drunkards of Ephraim, who are overcome with wine, to which allusion is made in Isa. xxxviii, 1. It appears to have been situated amongst the eminences south-east of Jemini.—Kitto; Smith. See BET-HAGGAN; BAALIM.

Ba'al-hanan (Heb. Ba'al Chanam, בַּעַל חַנָּם, lord of grace, or Baal is gracious), the name of two men.

2. (Sept. Baladam v. r. Baladam.) A Gederite, royal overseer of the olive-trees and sycamore-trees in the low plains under David (1 Chron. xxvii, 28). B.C. 1914. From his name we may conjecture that he was of Canaanitish extraction.

Ba'al ha'sor (Heb. Ba'al Chasar, בַּעַל חָסָר, having a village; Sept. Bealazawv v. r. Balazawv), the place where Abalaom kept his flocks, and held the sheep-shearing feast at which Amnon was assassinated (2 Sam. xii, 23). The Targum makes it the plain of Hazor, and so Ewald (Ger. Gesch. ii, 689); but this locality would be far from that of the above passage, where it is said to have been beside (כִּנְכֵה) Ephraim; not in the tribe of that name, but near the city called Ephraim, which was in the tribe of Benjamin, and is mentioned in 2 Chr. xiii, 19; John xvi, 64. This Ephraim is placed by Eusebius eight miles from Jerusalem on the road to Jericho, and is supposed by Reland to have been between Bethel and Jericho (Palestinae, i, 377). Perhaps Baal-hazor is the same with Hazor (q. v.) in the tribe of Benjamin (Neh. xi, 28), now Am'ar in the vicinity indicated (see Schwarz, Palest. p. 180).

Ba'al-hermon (Heb. Ba'al Chameron, בַּעַל חָמוֹן, lord of Hermon), the name of a city and a hill adjoining.

1. (Sept. makes two names, Baal' Eprw.) A town not far from Mount Hermon, mentioned as inhabited by the Ephraimites in connection with Bashan and Senir (1 Chron. v, 23). It was probably the same as the BAAL-GAD (q. v.) of Josh. xi, 17 (Robinson, Researches, new ed. iii, 409).

2. (Sept. translates φρος τοῦ Ἄρμων, Mount Hermon.) A mountain ( walmart) east of Lebanon, from which the Israelites were unable to expel the Hivites (Judg. iii, 9). This is usually considered as a distinct place from Mount Hermon; but the only one in that region; for doing so is the statement in 1 Chron. v, 23, unto Baal-hermon, and Senir, and [unto] Mount Hermon; but it is quite possible that the conjunction and may be here, as elsewhere, used as an expletive unto Baal-hermon, even Senir, even Mount Hermon. Perhaps this derives some color from the fact, which we know, that this mountain had at least three names (Deut. iii, 9). May not Baal-hermon have been a fourth, in use among the Phoenician worshippers of Baal, one of whose sanctuaries, Baal-gad, was at the foot of this very mountain?—Smith. See BAALIM.

Ba'al-i (Heb. Baalei, בַּעֲלֵי, my lord; Sept. Bealiai), a colder and more distinct title for ha'Bai, which the prophet reproaches the Jewish Church for hitherto applying to Jehovah, instead of the more enduring term L'di (may Baal, which he predicts she would be emboldened to employ when freed from her idolatries (Hos. ii, 16). Some have supposed from this that the Jews had even borrowed the term Baal from the surrounding nations as expressive of sovereign deity, and so applied it to Jehovah; but this is not likely. See BAAL.

Ba'alim (Heb. hab-balaim, בֶּהָב-בָּלָאִים, plural of Baal, with the def. article prefixed; Sept. Baalies), according to most, images of the god Baal set up in temples and worshipped, usually in connection with those of Ashtar (Judg. ii, 11; 1 Sam. vii, 4, etc.); according to others, various forms of Baal (Ort. Dienst der 2 in Israel, Leyden, 1864). See ASHMORETH.

Baal has been the general name for the deity among the Phoenicians and Carthaginians, and is the name of Baal Pachos, ad En. i, 729: "lingua Punica Deus B'al dictur," Isidor. Orig. viii, 11), but with the article (הַבָּאל, "the Baal") BAIIL, distinctively, the chief male divinity (on the fem. 'h B'al, Rom. xi, 4, and often in the Sept., see Winer, New Test. Gr. § 205) of the Phoenician (i. e. proper Sidonian, Syrian, Carthaginian, and colonial Punic) race (hence the syllable 'lehol or lei so often found at the end of their proper names, e.g. 'Lehol or Ethbaal (q. v.), 'A'lehas ('Herod. vii, 78), 'E'nelebaal and M'lebaal (Joseph. Ap. i, 21); also Hannibal, Abibal, Adhbarbal, Hadhrubal, Maharbal, etc. (comp. Fromm, De cultu deor. ex iudaeis, Altorf, 1744-45, p. 17 sq.). Yet that the suffix in these names is not expressive of deity in general, but only of Baal specifically, appears from a similar use of the titles Melkart, Astarte, etc., in other personal appellations [see generally Münzer, Reig. d. Karthager, 2d ed. Kopenha. 1821], like Bel among the Babylonians (for the contraction בֶּל, Bal, for בִּלַּה, Baal, see Gesenius, Mom. Phra. p. 462, and the tudes of the Dikaiopolis (of Bel). From the Bibl. p. 510). The apostate Israelites worshipped him (in connection with Astarte) in the period of the judges (Judg. ii, 11, 13; iii, 7; vi, 25 sq.), and the later kings, especially Ahaz (2 Chron. xxvii, 2) and Manasseh (2 Kings xx, 5) of Judah, and Ahab and Hosea of Israel (2 Kings xvi, 31 sq.; xvii, 19 sq.; 2 Kings xvii, 16 sq., 20 sq.; 1 Kings xvii, 1 sq., 6 sq., etc., with but little interruption (2 Kings iii, 2; x, 28; xi, 18). They had temples to him (1 Kings xvi, 32; 2 Kings x, 21 sq.), and altars (Jer. xi, 13) erected especially on eminences and roofs (Jer. xix, 5; xxxii, 29), as well as images set up in his honor (2 Kings iii, 2). Respecting the form of his worship we have very few distinct notices. His priests and prophets were very numerous (1 Kings xvii, 22; 2 Kings x, 19 sq.), and divided into various classes (2 Kings x, 19). They offered this incense to god (Jer. vii, 9; viii, 12; xxxii, 20 sq., etc.), and, clothed in a peculiar costume (2 Kings x, 22), presented to him bloody offerings, including children (2 Kings iii, 2). In connection with these, the priests danced (derisively, "leaped") (1 Kings xvi, 26) around the altar, and gazed themselves with knives (1 Kings xvii, 26) when they did not specifically gain their suit (Propert. ii, 18, 15; Tibull. i, 4, 77 sq.; Lucian, i, 565; Lucian, Des Syr., 50 [Ling. 1729]; Movers, Phthisis, i, 692). On the adoration (q. v.) by kissing (1 Kings xix, 18), see KISS. That this Baal worshipped by the Israelites was the same as the widely famed Tyrin Baal, whom the Greeks called Hercules, admits of scarcely a doubt (Movers, i, 178 sq.), and thus Baal is identified with Melkarth also. The ancients in general compare Baal with the Greek Zeus or Jove (Sanchoniathon, p. 14, ed. Orelli; Augustine, Quest. in Jud. 16; Dio Cass. lix, viii, 8), as they still more frequently do the Bolus of the Babylonians [see BAI], but sometimes identify him with Chronos or Salus (Ctes. ap. Phot. p. 543). Most investigators recognise in him the sun as the fructifying principle of nature (Proclus, Metaph., vol. ii, 297, 1 sq.; Bibl. Theol. p. 366 sq.); while Gesenius (Comment. ad Jer. ii, 385, and Theour. p. 224) interprets the Babylonian Bel and the Phoenician Baal as the principal lucky star of the Asiatic astralogy, i. e. the planet Jupiter. The latter view has the following considerations in its favor:1. With the sacred worship of the Philistines, the usual title of this planet (in Syriac) is Jeel (2). A star of good fortune, God, was evidently esteemed a deity in Western Asia (comp. Isai. lxv, 11), and from this the city Baal-Gadoub doubtless had its name (3). In 2 Kings xxi, 5, Baal (יהוה) would seem to be distinguished from the sun as an object of worship; (4) On Phoenician coins likewise the sun-god is commonly named distinctively "Lord of Heaven", Baylesum (ץוֹר אֶלֶם) יבָלֶסִים, *Bellemna, i. c. יבָלֶסִים; comp. also Augustine, in Jud. 10). The same name (Balesum) occurs in Plautus (Pers. v, 2, 67). For other reasons for the identification of the Babylonian, Syrian, and Phoenician Baal with the solar deity, see Movers, Canaan. ii, 9, 10. Sensenbeil investigated (p. 185 sq.) the relations of this divinity to the other ancient Asiatic deification of the powers of nature, some of which appear in the names Tammuz, Moloch, and Chian (q. v. severally). Without tracing these out minutely, it is appropriate in this connection to specify some of the functions and spheres of activity which Baal, like Zeus among the Greeks, appears to have fulfilled among the Phoenicians, especially inasmuch as the plural form Baaleh is thought by many to be expressive of this multifort development. The following are referred to in the Bible:

1. Baal-birth (בָּאַל בֹּרִית, Covenant-Baal), corresponding to the Zeit ιδροος, Dewa Fidius, of the Greek and Roman mythology. He was worshipped in this capacity in a special temple by the Shechemites (Judg. viii, 29; ix, 4, 46); among whom, however, there were also resident (Judg. i, 28; 2 Kings xxvii, 28. Bochart, Cananae. xvii, p. 859), whom Creuzer (Symbol. ii, 87) follows, renders the name "Baal of Berytus" (comp. also Steph. Byz. s. v. Beproq, like the titles Baal of Syria (בָּאַל בָּרִית, Baal of Taras (בָּאַל תָּרוֹס), found in inscriptions. As the Heb. name of Berytus (q. v.) accords with this title (בָּאַל בָּרִית), and a deity of a alliance or contracts might well be requisite to the polity of the Phoenicians (in whose territory this city was incised in the midst of &c.), as an interpreter of Movers (p. 171), with which Bertheau (on Judg. ix, 4) accords, namely "Baal with the league is formed" (comp. Gen. xiv, 3; Exod. xxiii, 82; xxxiv, 12 sq.), gives a signification not altogether inapposite. See Baal-Birth.

2. Baal-Zebub (בָּאַל צֶבּוּב, Fly-Baal; the Sept. construes the latter part of the name differently, יֵרֵעַי יִבּ דָּבָי בֹּדָי אָפִירָבִים; but Josephus thinks the name has the meaning of a great and powerful deity of the Philistines at Ekron (2 Kings i, 2, 3, 10), corresponding to the Zeis αἰσθόμενος μηνιάς (Pausan. v, 14, 2; viii, 26, 4) and Dewa Mygrios or Mygroides (Plin. x, 40; xxxi, 29) of the Greeks and Romans (Salmas. Exerc. p. 9 sq.; Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 467; iv, 392; Hitzig, Philo. p. 818), and to the Hercules Mygrius (mηνιάς) of other notices (Solin. c. 7; Clem. Alex. Protept. p. 11, ed. Syll.). Flies (and gnats) are in the East a much greater annoyance than with us (comp. Bochart, Hier. iii. 346 sq. See FLY). From this explanation of Baal-Zebub only Hug has of late disserted (Freud. Zeitschr. vii. 104 sq.); and this, in so far as he clings to the benign and savage deity of the dung-beetle (carabaeus pallidus), worshipped also in Egypt (as a symbol of the world's gods), rests on many uncertain assumptions, and is therefore improbable. (For other interpretations, see the Exeg. Hamb. d. A. T. ix, 2 sq.) See Beezebub.

3. Baal-Phoros (*בָּאַל פּוֹרֹס, Priapem-Baal, or simply Peor (פּוֹרִס), was the name of a god of the Moabites (Num. xxxv. 1 sq.; xxxi, 16; Josh. xxii, 17), apparently worshipped by the prostitution (perhaps proceeds of the hire) of young girls (whence, according to the rabbins, the name, from פּוֹרַס, pa'ar, to fructose, i. q. to deprive of virginity, comp. Jonathan, Targ. on Num. xxxv. 1), probably corresponding to the Roman Piasio (see Jerome, ad Hos. iv, 14) and Muta (Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 976). If the above rabbinic significance of the title be correct, he would seem to have given name to Mt. Peor, where the Israelites entered Israel by Jeepol (1 Kings xvi, 16 sq.), to the place where was the seat of his worship; but it is more likely that the title was borrowed from the hill (q. d. "ravin") as a distinctive epithet (Movers, p. 667) for his form of worship in that locality (see Creuzer, Symbol. ii, 85). Jerome (in Juvin. i, 12) considers this deity to be Beshanah (q. v.): Winer, i, 118. See Baal-Phoros.

4. The deity styled emphatically the Baal (*בָּאַל, q. d. "the great lord"), whose worship was transferred into Israel by Jezebel (1 Kings xvi, 16 sq.), was apparently the god with whom the Greek * HERKULES* (2 Mac. Iv, 18, 20) in appellation was Melkart ("king of th..."
Tyro, or Haroed ("merchant," he being supposed to be a great navigator), which the Greeks corrupted into a resemblance to their own Ἰφύλαρχος, and under the name of the "Tyrian Hercules" he was much celebrated (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvi, 5; Arrian, Exped. Alex. ii, 16). When Herodotus was in Egypt he learned that Hercules was there regarded as one of the primeval gods of that country, and being anxious to obtain more explicit information on the subject, he undertook a voyage to Tyre. The priests there informed him that the foundation of the temple was coeval with that of the city, which they said was founded 2300 years before that time. It was in honor of this god that the Carthaginians for a long time annually sent the tenth of their income to Tyre (Herod. ii, 44). The account of the Baal of Jechabel and Athaliah agrees with this Hercules, since the representation of Scripture (1 Kings xix, 18) is the same with that of Diodorus Siculus (ii, 10), that the fire was always burning on his altar, the priests officiated barefooted, and kissing was among the acts of worship (Cicero, in Terren, iv, 43). Many representations of the Tyrian Hercules appear exact on coins, of which there are two specimens in the British Museum. The first was found in the island of Cosynia (now Pantelleria), which belonged to the Tyrians; the other is a Tyrian coin of silver, weighing 214½ grains, and exhibits a very striking head of the same idol in a more modern and perfect style. One of the figures of the date is obliterated, but it is thought that the complete date may have given 84 B.C. See HERCULES.

5. In addition to the above, Forst (Heb. Handwörterbuch, s. v.) enumerates the following as local or special attributes of Baal. (a) Baal-gad (בַּאַל-גָּד, q. d. Luck-Baal), the epithet of Baal as bringing good fortune, like the luck-dispersing star Jupiter; and thence with the name of a city (Josh. xvi, 17; xxii, 7; xviii, 3) at the foot of Mount Hermon (Jebel esh-Sheik), in which neighborhood was also situated the city Baal-Hermon (1 Chron. v, 23). See Baal-gad. (b) Baal-hamon (בַּאַל-הָמוֹן, q. d. Heat-Baal), the title of the Phoenician Baal, as representing the vivifying warmth of nature, like the Egyptian Amon (Sun-god) [see AMON] and thence given to a city in Samaria (Cont. viii, 11), where his worship may have been practised. See Baal-hamon. (c) Baal-chashor (בַּאַל-חַשְׁוָר, q. d. village-protecting Baal), the epithet of Baal as the tutelary deity of Hazor (q. v.); then the name of a city in the vicinity of Ephraim or Ephron (2 Sam. xiii, 22; 2 Chron. xiii, 19). See Baal-hazor. Baal-Hazor is repeatedly named among the Phoenicians as the guardian divinity of towns, e.g. "Baal-Tyre" (בַּאַל-תְּיוֹר, Malt. i, 3), "Baal-Tarsus" (בַּאַל-תָּרָס, on coins of that city), "Baal-Libya" (בַּאַל-לִיָּבָה, Zelc Aji, Numid. iv, 1), etc. See Baal- (d) Baal-chermon (בַּאַל-כֶּרֶמ, q. d. Hill-Baal). i.e. Baal as the protector of Mount Hermon, in a city near which his worship was instituted: thence applied to the city itself (1 Chron. v, 23), near Baal-gad (q. v.). That part of Hermon (q. v.) on which this town lay is called (Judg. iii, 3) Mount Baal-Heron (q. v.). See Baal-hermon. (e) Baal-iron (בַּאַל-יוֹם, q. d. heaven-dwelling Baal), i.e. Baal as associated with the hill of Baal or Saturn, supposed to be in the seventh heaven, as the term divine "habitation" ( вместить) often signifies (Deut. xxvi, 15; Ps. lxviii, 6), and thus equivalent to the later Baal-zebul (בַּאַל-צָעָל, lord of the celestial dwelling, i.e. "prince of the power of the air"), and the Phoenician Baalmeqam (בַּאַל-מֵקרָם, lord of heaven), as interpreted by Sanchoniathon [p. 14, Kinon onomast.] in Augustae in loc. Judg. (version codice), whence the name of the place Beth-baal-meqam (בֵּית בַּאַל-מֵקרָם, q. d. "house of Baal") so called apparently as the presiding deity of the mountain Percasim (q. v.), an eminence famous for an ancient victory ([Isa. xxviii], 27), and probably a seat of his worship; and hence applied in this form to the place itself (2 Sam. v, 20; 1 Chron. xiv, 11), in the same way as Hermon and Peres above, and at length Lebanon itself, as mountains representing great natural features. See Baal-perazim. (f) Baal-tephron (בַּאַל-תֶּפְרֹון, i.e. Typhon-Baal), the name of Baal as the opposing genius of cosmical order (comp. Typhon, the north, i.e. the dark, cold quarter), or the ruling spirit of winter. This was an Egyptian phasis of the divinity, and the name was transferred from one to the other by the.google.com. See Baal-bazeleth. (g) Baal-tamar (בַּאַל-תָּמָר, q. d. palm-stick-Baal, comp. Jer. v, 5), is Baal the phalus of Bacchus, or the scarce-trumpus in the melon-patches (see the apocryphal explanation in Baruch vii, 70), and thence assigned to a city in the fertile meadow near Gibeah (Judg. xx, 35), called in the Onomast. Beth-Tamar. See Baal-tamar. On the subject generally, see (in addition to the works above referred to) Selden, De Dies Syriae; Perizonius, *Origines Rabb., Bullmann, Ueb. Kronos, in Abhandl. d. Berlin. Akad. 1814, 1815; Buttmann, Mythol.; Gesenius, in Ersch's Encyk. viii; Stuhlf, Reig. d. hebr. Volker d. Oriente; Metzger, in Paulli's Bibl. Quellen d. künstlichen Wintermythen; Baal-Hermon; Movers, in Ersch's Encyk. xxxvii. See Baal.

Ba'il-sis (Heb. Ba'al-sis, prob. for בַּאַל-סִיס, son of evolutions; Sept. Βαύλος τ. βαλεοσα; and even Βαύλος; Vulg. Baalus), king of the Ammonites about the time of the Babylonian captivity, whom Johanan and his fellow-generals reported to Gedaliah, the viceroy, as having sent Ishmael to assassinate him (Jer. xi, 14). B.C. 587. Some MSS. have Baalis (בַּאַלִיס), and so Josephus (בַּאַלִיס, Ant. x, 9, 8).

Ba'el-me'ôn (Heb. Baal melod, בַּאַל-מֵלוֹד, lord of dwelling; Sept. γελοτός, but in Chron. Baal-meôn v. Balelmus, and in Ezek. omits; otherwise Baal-Meôn, Jer. xviii, 28, and Baal-Meôn, Jer. xxvii, 28; Baal-Meôn, a town in the tribe of Reuben, which lay beyond the Jordan, or at least one of the towns which were "built" by the Reubenites (Num. xxxii, 38), and to which they "gave other names." Possibly the "Bith." (q. v.), which is added to the name in its mention elsewhere, and which sometimes superseded the "Baal." (q. v.), is the original name, with changes referred to. See BAALIM. It is also named in 1 Chron. v, 8, and on each occasion with Nebo.
In the time of Ezekiel it was in the possession of the Moabites, and under that prosperous dominion evidently had become a place of distinction, being noticed as one of the cities which are the "glory of the country" (Ezek. xxv, 8). The ancient town of Jericho (Onomast. s. v. Bēlμαθω, Balmen) it was still a vast large village called Balmanso, 9 miles distant from Heshbon (Ibýςος, Ebusus), near the "mountain of the hot springs," and reputed to be the native place of Eliah. At the distance of two miles south-east of Heshbon (Ezr. viii, 64) from the ruins of a place called Myran, or (as Dr. Robinson [Researches, iii. Append. p. 170] corrects it) Mā'is, which is doubtless the same; so Schwarz, Main (Palæst., p. 227). In Num. xxxii, 3, apparently the same place is called Berea, perhaps by an error of the copyists or by contraction. —Kitto; Smith.

Ба́л-пе́р'ор (Heb. Бa'ál Pœr", יִבְנֵי יִבְנֵי הָעֲל, "lord of Peor", or sometimes only יִבְנֵי יִבְנֵי הָעֲל, "Peor, respectively represented in the Sept. by Βασιλεύς and Παράσια) appears to have been properly the idol of the Moabites (Num. xxx, 1-9; Deut. iv, 3; Josh. xxii, 17; Psa. civ, 28; Hos. ix, 10); but also of the Midianites (Num. xxxi, 15, 16). It is the common opinion that this god was worshipped by obscene rites, and from the time of Jerome downward it has been usual to compare him to Bel and Baal (Ezek. xxv, 9). In the days of Eusebius and Selden and J. Owen (De Dies Syriæ, i, 5; Theol. Syræanæ, v, 4) seem to be the only persons who have disputed whether any of the passages in which this god is named really warrant such a conclusion. The narrative (Num. xxv) seems clearly to show that this form of Baal-worship was connected with licentious rites. The least that the above passages express is the fact that the Israelites received this idolatry from the women of Moab, and were led away to eat of their sacrifices (comp. Psa. civ, 28); and it is possible for that sex to have been the means of seducing them into the adoption of their worship, without the idolatry itself being of an obscene kind. It is also remarkable that so few authors are agreed even as to the general character of these rites. Most Jewish authorities (except the Targum of Jonathan on Num. xxxv) represent his worship to have consisted of rites which are filthy in the extreme, but not lascivious (see również Pasner, i, 7, 7; Pasner, p. 19, the fullest collections of Jewish testimony on this subject). Without laying too much stress on the rabbinical derivation of the word "Baal, kisius, i. e. "apercer hymnwm virginem," we seem to have reason to conclude that this was the nature of the worship. This is, moreover, the view of Creuzer (ii, 411), Winer, Gesenius, Fürst, and almost all critics. The reader is referred for more detailed information particularly to Creuzer's Symboliek and Movers' Phönizier. The identification of Baal with the sun [see Baal] as the generative power of nature confirms the opinion of the lascivious character of this worship. Peor is properly the name of a mountain [see Peor], and Baal-Peor was the name of the god worshipped there. Some identify this god with Chemosh (q. v.). —Kitto. See BAALIM.

Бa'ál-пeр'аsиm (Heb. Бa'ál Per'asim, בַּעַל פְּרָזֵי, having rents; Sept. [at the first occurrence in S. I.]. Baal Peoris [v. r. Peoris], the scene of a conflict of the Philistines over the possession of a great destruction of their images, and so named by him in a characteristic passage of exulting poetry—"I Jehovah hath burst (גָּזַב) upon mine enemies before me as a burst (גָּזַב) of waters." Therefore he called the name of that place 'Бa'ál-per'asim," i. e. "burns or destructions (2 Sam. v, 20; 1 Chron. xiv, 11). The place and the circumstance appear to be again alluded to in Isa. xxviii, 21, where it is called Мoasc Perazim. Perhaps this may indicate the previous existence of a high-land or sanctuary of Baal at this spot, which would lend more point to David's exclamation (see Gesenius, Jes. in loc.). The Sept. render the name in its two occurrences respectively "Ερώνα θανάσων καὶ Δαμνος θανάτων, the latter an instance of retention of the original word and its explanation side by side; the former uncertain. See PERAZIM. It is important as being the only one with the prelix Baal [see BALL] of which we know the circumstances under which it was imposed; and yet even here it was rather an opprobrious application of a term already in use than a new term. It is not improbable that the site has been near the valley of Rephim, west of Jerusalem; perhaps identical with the modern Jebel Aby (Van de Velde, Map). See PERAZIM.

Бa'áл-шaлишa (Heb. Ba'ál Shalishah, בֶּן-יִבְנֵי הָעֲל, "lord of Shalishah, or having a third; Sept. Baalshalisha v. r. Baalshali and Baelshali), a name placed only in 2 Kings iv, 42, as that from which the man came with provisions for Eliah, apparently not far from (the Ephraimites) Gilgal (comp. v, 36). It was doubtless in the district of Shalishah (q. v.) which is mentioned in 1 Sam. ix, 4; but whether it took its name thence, or from some modification of the worship of Baal (q. v.), of which it was the seat, is uncertain. See BAALIM. Eusebius and Jerome describe it (Onomast. Basilaeand, Bethesda, where the frequent interchange of the term Baal, Beth, and Bethabara, as in De Dies Syriæ, v, 4 (Bala) 193 sq.). Selden and J. Owen (De Dies Syriæ, i, 5; Theol. Syræanæ, v, 4) seem to be the only persons who have disputed whether any of the passages in which this god is named really warrant such a conclusion. The narrative (Num. xxv) seems clearly to show that this form of Baal-worship was connected with licentious rites. The least that the above passages express is the fact that the Israelites received this idolatry from the women of Moab, and were led away to eat of their sacrifices (comp. Psa. civ, 28); and it is possible for that sex to have been the means of seducing them into the adoption of their worship, without the idolatry itself being of an obscene kind. It is also remarkable that so few authors are agreed even as to the general character of these rites. Most Jewish authorities (except the Targum of Jonathan on Num. xxxv) represent his worship to have consisted of rites which are filthy in the extreme, but not lascivious (see especialmente Pasner, i, 7, 7; Pasner, p. 19, the fullest collections of Jewish testimony on this subject). Without laying too much stress on the rabbinical derivation of the word "Baal, kisius, i. e. "apercer hymnwm virginem," we seem to have reason to conclude that this was the nature of the worship. This is, moreover, the view of Creuzer (ii, 411), Winer, Gesenius, Kurst, and almost all critics. The reader is referred for more detailed information particularly to Creuzer's Symboliek and Movers' Phönizier. The identification of Baal with the sun [see Baal] as the generative power of nature confirms the opinion of the lascivious character of this worship. Peor is properly the name of a mountain [see Peor], and Baal-Peor was the name of the god worshipped there. Some identify this god with Chemosh (q. v.). —Kitto. See BAALIM.

Бa'áл-тaмár (Heb. Бa'ál Tamār, בֵּן-יִבְנֵי הָעֲל, "place of palm-trees; Sept. Baal Tzamīt, a place near Gibeah, in the tribe of Benjamin, where the other tribes fought with the Benjamites (Judg. xx, 85). It was doubtless called as being located on the sanctuaries or groves of Baal. See BAALIM. The palm-tree (יַפְרָם) of Deborah (Judg. iv, 5) was situated somewhere in the locality, and is possibly alluded to (Stanley, Palest., p. 145). Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Baselāmā, Baalshamār) call it Bethamar (Bēthāmā, Bethamari), thus affording another instance of that interchange of Beth and Baal which is also exemplified in Baal-Belshalishah and Baelshali. The notice (ib.) which corresponds to the present ruin site Erkah, about three miles N.E. of Jerusalem (Van de Velde, Map), on a ravine running toward Anthoth (Robinson, Researches, ii, 315 note).

Бa'áлтa (Бa'алтa, prep. fem. of Baal), another name apparently for the Syrian Taimus, the chief female deity of the Phoenicians, the Ashtaroth of the O. T. See ASHTARTE.

Бa'áл-зeбüb (Heb. Бa'ál Zebūb, בֵּן-יִבְנֵי הָעֲל, "lord of Baal, or Baal, my lord") occurs in 2 Kings i, 2, 3, 16, as the god of the Philistines at Ekron, whose oracle Ahaziah sent to consult. Though such a designation of the god appears to us a kind of mockery, and has consequently been regarded as a term of derision (Selden, De Dies Syriæ, p. 375), yet there seems no reason to doubt that this was the name given to the god by his worshippers, and the plague of flies in hot climates furnishes a sufficient reason for the designation. See FLY. Similarly the Greeks gave the epithet αἰγών to Zeus (Clem. Alex. Protrept. ii, 88) as worshipped at Elis (Pausan. v, 14, 2), the Νοίρας δειος of the Romans (Solin. Polhyist. 1, and Poly. xvi, 6, 84, init.) speaks of a Fly-god Myopeas. The name in the one case is the name of the god himself, it is difficult to suppose that it was not the proper and reverential title of the god; and the more so, as Beelzebul (Βαλζαζόλ) in Matt. x, 23, seems to be the contemptuous corruption of it. See BEELZEBUB. Any explanation, however, of the symbolic sense in which flies may have been regarded in ancient religions, and by which we could conceive how his worshippers could honor him as the god of ships, would appear to us much more compatible with his name than the only sense which can be derived from the Greek parallel. This receives some confirmation, perhaps, from the word of Josephus (Ant. i. 2, 1), who says, “Ahasiah sent to the Ph (rif Mo'as), for that is the name of the shipbuilder (n. brises).” Then the classical idiom would lead us to conclude that all these Baals are only the same god under various modifications of attributes and emblems, but the scanty notices to which we owe all our knowledge of Syro-Arabian idolatry do not furnish data for any decided opinion on this phasis of Baal.—Kitto; Smith. See BAALIM.

Ba‘al-ze‘phon (Heb. Ba‘al Tophôn, יבצ פון, place of Tophôn; Sept. Βασιλευς της Γαλιλαίας, Βασιλειανοῦ, Ant. ii, 15, 1), a town belonging to Egypt, on the border of the Red Sea (Exod. xiv, 2; Num. xxxiii, 7). Forster (Emp. Asi. J. D. Michaelis, p. 28) believes it to have been the same place as Heropolis (Ἑρώπολις), on the western gulf of the Red Sea (Phiny, Hist. Nat. v, 12; Strabo, xvii, p. 836; Ptolem. iv, 5), where Typhon (which Forster makes in Copitc ΔΩΤΩΝ; but, contra, see Rosenmuller, Altertümer, ii, 219), one of the evil genii of the Egyptians, was worshipped. See BAALIM. But, according to Manetho (Josephus contra Apion, i, 26), the name of Typhon’s city was Avaris (Ἀβαρίς), which, some, as Champollion (who writes OYAPI, and renders “causing malaria”; L’Egypte sous les Pharaons, ii, 67 sq.), contend, must be the same as the town which was known to the Egyptians as a stronghold of the Hyksos, both places which were connected with Typhon (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἰππος). Avaris cannot be Heropolis, for geographical reasons. (Compare, as to the site of Avaris, Brugsch, Geographische Nachrichten, i, 86 sq.; as to that of Heropolis, Lepsius, Chron. d’Égypte, i, 364 sq., and 943, against the two places being the same.) In fact, a thing is known about the situation of Baal-zephon except what is connected with a consideration of the route taken by the Israelites in leaving Egypt, for it was “over against Baal-zephon” that they were encamped before they passed the Red Sea. The supposition that identifies its site with Jebel Deraj or Kulubab, the southern barrier of the mouth of the valley leading from Cairo to the Red Sea, is as likely as any other. See EXOD. From the position of Goshen, and the indications afforded by the narrative of the route of the Israelites, Baal-zephon must have been on the western shore of the Gulf of Suez, a little below its head, which at that time was located by some twenty miles northward of the present head. See GOSHEN; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF. Its position with respect to the other places mentioned is not clearly indicated. The Israelites encamped before or at Phihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon, according to Exodus (xii, 2), while in Numbers Pi-habiroth is described as being before Baal-zephon; and it is said that when the people came to the former place they pitched between Migdol (xxviii, 2); and again, that afterward they departed from before Phihahiroth, here in Heb. Habiritho (v. 8). Migdol and Baal-zephon have therefore been opposed to one another, and the latter behind Phihahiroth, with reference to the Israelites. Baal-zephon was perhaps a well-known place, if, as seems likely, it is always mentioned to indicate the position of Phihahiroth, which we take to be a natural locality. See PHIHARIOOTH.

The name has been supposed to mean “sanctuary of Typhon,” a conjecture not approved by Gesenius (Thea. Heb. p. 225), but by Fürst (Heb. Handb., s. v.). Zephon would well enough correspond in sound to Typhon, had we any ground for considering the latter name to be either Egyptian or Semitic; and even then Zephon in Baal-zephon might not be its Hebrew transcription, inasmuch as it is joined with the Hebrew form פון. Hence many connect Baal-zephon, as a Hebrew compound, with the root פון, to syg, as if it were named from a watch-tower on the frontier like the neighboring בנה, “the tower.” It is noticeable that the name of the son of Gad, called Ziphon (תפ) in Gen. xlv, 16, is written Zephon (תפ) in Num. xxvi, 15.—Kitto; Smith.

Ba‘nina (Heb. Ba‘ina, בָּנִי, probably for בָּנְי, son of affliction), the name of three or four men.

1. (Sept. Ba‘i.) Son of Ahiel, one of Solomon’s twelve surveyors; his district comprised Tannach, Megiddo, and all Bethshean, with the adjacent region (1 Kings iv, 12). B.C. 1012.

2. (Sept. Ba‘i.) Son of Hushai, another of Solomon’s prophets. See HUSHAI. He was advising Asher and Bealoth (1 Kings iv, 16, where, however, the name is incorrectly Anglicized “Baannah”). B.C. 1012.

3. (Sept. Ba‘i.) Father of Zadok, which latter repaired a portion of the walls of Jerusalem on the return from Babylon, between the fish-gate and the old-gate (Heb. iii, 4, 7). B.C. 446.

4. (Sept.) One of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esdr. v, 8); the Ba‘ani (q. v.) of the Heb. text ( Ezra ii, 2).

Ba‘nu‘a (Heb. Ba‘nu‘ah, בָּנְעוֹת, another form of the name Ba‘a [q. v.]; Sept. Ba‘a‘nah), the name of four men.

1. One of the two sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, captains of bands in Saul’s army, who assassinated Jabesh. After the battle of Megiddo, they were slain by David, and their mutilated bodies hung up over the pool at Hebron (ver. 5, 6, 19). B.C. 1046. Josephus represents him (Bawouwa, Ant. vii, 2, 1) as a person of noble family, and instigated by personal ambition. See DAVID.

2. A Netophathite, father of Heleb or Heled, which latter was one of David’s thirty heroes (2 Sam. xxiii, 29; 1 Chron. xi, 30). B.C. ante 1061. The Sept. utterly confounds the list of names at this part, but some copies retain the Bawou.

3. (1 Kings iv, 16.) See Ba‘ana, 2.

4. One of the chief Jews who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, B.C. 536 (Ezra ii, 2; Neh. vii, 7); possibly the same with one of those who long afterward (B.C. 410) united in the sacred covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x, 27).

Ba‘nitas. See Ba‘anites.

Ba‘nit‘as (rather Bawais [q. v.], Bawaisa‘), one of the Israelites, son of Phoras, who divorced his Gentile wife after the exile (1 Esdr. v, 20); evidently the Ba‘anit‘ah (q. v.) of the correct text ( Ezra ii, 2). See BANAITHAS.

Ba‘nit‘as, a sect of Paulicians, called by the name of their leader, Banitis, in the ninth century.—Neander, Ch. Hist. iii, 256, 266. See PAULICIAN.

Ba‘naro‘a (Heb. Ba‘nara‘a, בֶּנְארוֹא, bruitish; Sept. Bapqá‘ v. r. Ba‘ara), one of the wives of Shabaharim, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii, 8, where, however, there is some confusion as to his prior children), by whom she had several children (ver. 9, where by some error she is called Hordah, compare ver. 11). B.C. ante 1612. See SHEBAHAIM.

Ba‘nas (Bawas), the name (according to Josephus, War, vii, 6, 8) of a valley inclosing the city of Jericho on the north, and so called from an extraordinary species of plant (but whether the same with the gigantic τις, τιγγανος, mentioned in the same connection, does not appear), to the root of which the credulous Jewish historian ascribes magical properties of a most marvellous character. See HERODIUM. For other faint notices of a locality by names similar to Baaris, in the vicinity of Machaerus, see Reldan, Paest. p. 881.

Ba‘‘sel‘a‘b (Heb. Ba‘ab soluble, מֵאָבַּם, or work of Jahob; Sept. Ba‘san), a Gerizite Levite, son of Malchis, and father of MIchael, in the lineage of Asaph (1 Chron. vi, 40 [25]).
B. C. cir. 1310.

Ba'ashah (Heb. Ba'ashah), נֹבֵשָׁה, for נֹבֵשׁ, from an obsolete root, נֹבֵשׁ, signifying, according to Fürst [Heb. Handw. s. v.], to be bold, but according to Gesenius [Thes. Heb. s. v. נֹבֵשׁ], to be offensive, hence wicked; Sept. Baasah, Josephus Básos, Ant. viii, 11, 4, etc.), third sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, and the founder of its second dynasty (1 Kings xvii; xviii; 2 Chron. xvii; 14, xii, 9). He reigned B.C. 950-927.

Baasha was son of Ahijah, the tribe of Issachar, and commander of the royal forces of the northern kingdom; he conspired against King Nadab, son of Jeroboam, when he was besieging the Philistia town of Gibbethon, and, having killed him, proceeded to extirpate his entire circle of relatives. He appears to have been of humble origin, as the Prophet Jehu speaks of him as having been "exalted out of the dust" (1 Kings xvi, 2). In matters of religion his reign was no improvement on that of Jeroboam; he equally forgot his position as king of the nation of God's election, and was chiefly remarkable for his persecution of the worship of the Lord (2 Kings ii, 24, 35). It was probably in the twenty-third year of his reign [see Ahab] that he made war on his king, Aza, and began to fortify Ramah as a barrier against it. He was compelled to desist, however, being defeated by the unexpected alliance of Asa with Benhadad I of Damascus, who had previously been his ally. Baasha took several towns in the north of Israel, and conquered lands belonging to it near the sources of Jordan (1 Kings xv, 18 sq.).

Baasha died in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, and was honorably buried in the beautiful city of Tirzah (Cant. vi, 4), which he had made his capital (1 Kings xv, 35).-Smith, s. v. For his idolatries, the Lord sent a messenger to him that God would exterminate his family likewise, which was accomplished in the days of his son Elah (v. s. v.) by Zimri (1 Kings xvi, 10-13). See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

Baba. See MISHNA.

Babas (בַּבָּא or בָּבָא), since the latter only appears as a genitive, a person mentioned by Josephus as the last descendant of the Asmonaeans, but simply to reinforce his sons were preserved by Costabara from the general massacre of the adherents of Antigonus ordered by Herod the Great on obtaining possession of Jerusalem, until their concealment was disclosed by Salome to the tyrant, who immediately made sure of their death (Ant. xiv, 7, 10).

Babe (בַבָּה, old', or בַבּ, old, so called from its petulance, Psalm viii, 2; xvii, 14, elsewhere "child" or "infant" וּבַבּ: לָתַע), from the same root, Ish, iii, 4; once וְבַבּ, second. Exod. ii, 6, usually a "lad.") Gr. βαπάς, prop. an unborn fetas, Luke i, 41, 44, but also a very young child; Luke ii, 12, 16; 1 Pet. ii, 2; νεανίς, strictly an infant [i.e. as yet unable to talk], but likewise used of children generally. Matt. xi, 29; xxi, 16; Luke x, 21; Rom. ii, 10; 1 Cor. iii, 1; Heb. v, 13). This term is used figuratively in Isa. iii, 4, to represent the succession of weak and wicked princes who reigned over the kingdom of Judah from the death of Josiah to the destruction of the city and Temple. In the New Testament, the term refers to those who are weak in the Christian faith and knowledge, being ignorant and inconstant; or being but born again, begotten from above, they require that heavenly nourishment which is suited to their nature—"the sincere milk of the word" (1 Cor. iii, 1; Heb. v, 13; 1 Pet. ii, 2). See CHILD.

Ba'el (Heb. Ba'el), בַּעֵל, confusion; and so the Sept. Βαυαρός; Gen. xi, 9), originally the name applied to the Tower of Babel (Gen. xi, 9), but afterwards extended (in the Heb.) to the city of Babylon (Gen. x, 10), which appears to have grown up around it, and finally to the whole province of Babylonia (Ezra, xxiii, 17, margin), of which this was the capital. For these latter, see BABYLON; BABYLONIA.

1. Origin of the Tower.—From the account in Gen. xi, 1-9, we learn that the primitive fathers of mankind having, from the time of the Deluge, wandered without fixed abode, settled at length in the land of Shinar, where they took up a permanent residence. As yet they had remained together without experiencing those vicissitudes and changes in their outward for which the possession of different methods of speech, and therefore of one language. Arrived, however, in the land of Shinar, and finding materials suitable for the construction of edifices, they proceeded to make and burn bricks, and using the bitumen, in which parts of the country abound, for cement, they built a city and a tower of great elevation. A divine interposition, however, is related to have taken place. In consequence, the language of the builders was confounded, so that they were no longer able to understand each other. They therefore "left off to build the city," and were scattered "abroad upon the face of all the earth." The narrative adds that they were "confused by God" (confusion from this confusion of dialect. See CONCEPTION OF TONGUES.

2. Its Design.—The sacred narrative (Gen. xi, 4) assigns as the reason which prompted men to the undertaking simply a desire to possess a building so large and high as might be possible by their strength. In the very plains where they had settled, it was easier to prevent their being scattered abroad, and thus the ties of kindness be rudelyصدر, individuals be involved in peril, and their numbers be prematurely thinned at a time when population was weak and insufficient. The idea of preventing their being scattered abroad by building a lofty tower makes it probable in the most remarkable manner to the wide and level plains of Babylonia, where scarcely one object exists different from another to guide the traveller in his journeying, and which, in those early days, as at present, were a sea of land, the compass being then unknown. Such an attempt agrees with the circumstances in which the sons of Noah were placed, and is in itself a commendable nature. But that some ambitious and unworthy motives were blended with these feelings is clearly implied in the sacred record, which, however, is evidently conceived and set forth in a dramatic manner (vers. 6, 7), and may wear around a historical substance, as the poetical drama, in which the apostle Julian has attempted to turn the narrative into ridicule; but even if viewed only as an attempt to account for the origin of diversity of languages, and of the dispersion of the human family, it challenges consideration and respect. The opinion of Heeren (Asiatische Natkun, ii, 146) is far different and more correct: "There is," says he, "perhaps nowhere else to be found a narrative so venerable for its antiquity, or so important in the history of civilization, in which we have at once preserved the traces of primordial international commerce, the first political associations, and the first erection of secure and permanent dwellings. In it appears that the victory of this nature over the absurd or visionary pictures which the Greeks and Romans give of the primitive condition of mankind, will gratify the student of the Bible and confirm the faith of the Christian by showing the marked difference there is between the history contained in Genesis and the lives of the most ancient of the poets, or the tales of the mythologist. (See Eichhorn, Diversitatis lingvarum ex traditione Semitica origines, Gotth. 1788; also in the Biblioth. d. bibl. Lit. iii, 981 sq.)

3. Traditions concerning it.—Versions more or less substantially correct of this account are found among all the chief nations. The Chaldeans themselves are said (Abydenus, quoted by Eusebius, Prepar. Evang. i, 14; comp. Chron. Armen. i, 38 and 59) that the first men, rallying on their size and strength, raised a tower reaching toward heaven in the place where Babylon afterward stood, but that the winds, assisting the gods, brought the building down on the heads of the builders, out of which the flame which Jupiter. In the middle of the sacred enclosure there stands a solid tower of a stadium in depth and width; upon this tower another is raised, and another upon that, to the number of eight towers. An ascent to them has been made on the outside, in a circle extending round all the towers. When you reach about half way you find resting-places. In the last tower the temple is. In the temple lies a large bed well furnished, and near it stands a golden table; but there is no image within; nor does any one remain there by night, only a native female, one whom the god has chosen in preference to all others, as say the Chaldeans who are priests of that god. And these persons also say, asserting what I do not believe, that the god himself frequents the temple and repose on the couch. And there belongs to the temple in Babylon another shrine lower down, where there stands a large golden image of the god, and near it is placed a large golden table, and the pedestal and throne are gold, and, say the Chaldeans, these things were made for bright-hued talents of gold, and the shrine is a golden altar; and there is another great altar where sheep-offerings are sacrificed, for it is not permitted to sacrifice upon the golden altar, except sucklings only; but upon the greater altar the Chaldeans offer every year a thousand talents' worth of frankincense. The time when the sacrifice is offered is the visitation of the god. And there was at that time in the temple a statue of twelve cubits of solid gold; but I did not see it, and relate merely what was told me by the Chaldeans. Darius Hystaspis wished to have this statue, but did not dare to take it; but Xerxes, his son, did not; and the Persians took it, and burnt the temple, and burnt the statue. Thus is this sacred place abandoned; and there are also in many private offerings. There offerings, made by individuals, consisting of statues, censers, cups, and sacred vessels of massive gold, constituted a property of immense value. On the top Semiramis placed three golden statues of Jupiter, Juno, and Bêsa. The first was 40 feet high, and weighed 10,000 Babylonish talents. The statue of Bêsa was of the same weight: the goddess was seated on a golden throne with lions at each knee, and two serpents of silver. The statue of Juno was erect like that of Jupiter, weighing 800 talents; she grasped a serpent by the head. The lower limb had a sceptre with gems. A table of beaten gold was common to these three divinities, weighing 500 talents. On the table were two goblets of 20 talents, and two censers of 500 talents each, and three vases of prodigious magnitude. The total value of the precious articles and treasures contained in this proud achievement of idolatry has been computed to exceed six hundred millions of dollars.

From the Holy Scriptures it appears that when Nebuchadnezzar conquered Jerusalem and levelled most of the city with the ground, "he brought away the treasures of the temple, and the treasures of the king's house, and all that was in the temple, of Bêsa et al流出" (2 Chron. xxxvii, 7). The brazen and other vessels which Solomon had caused to be made for the service of Jehovah are said to have been broken up by order of the Assyrian monarch, and formed into the famous gates of brass which so long adorned the superb entrance to the great central area of the temple of Belus (comp. Hezek. ap. Joseph. Antiq. i. 4, 8). The purposes to which this splendid edifice was appropriated may be partly gathered from the preceding statements. These purposes varied in some degree with the changes in opinions and manners which successive ages brought. The signal disappointment inflicted on its original founders show that even in its origin there was connected with it something greatly displeasing to God. It seems, indeed, always to have existed in derogation of the divine glory. Consecrated at the first, as it probably was, to the immoderate ambition of the monothestic children of the Deluge, it passed to the Sabian religion, and thus, falling one degree from purity of worship, became a temple of the sun and the rest of the host of heaven, till, in the natural progress of corruption, it sank into gross idolatry, and, as the passage from Herodotus shows, was polluted by the vices which generally accompanied the observances of heathen superstition.

In one purpose it undoubtedly proved of service to mankind. The Babylonians were given to the study of astronomy. This ennobling pursuit was one of the peculiar functions of the learned men denominated by Herodotus Chaldeans, the priests of Belus; and the temple was crowned by an astronomical observatory, from the elevation of which the stars heavens could be most advantageously studied over plains so open and wide, and in an atmosphere so clear and bright as those of Babylonia.

To Nimrod the first foundations of the tower are ascribed; Semiramis enlarged and beautified it (Ctesias ap. Diod. Sic. ii, 7); but it appears that the temple of Bel, in its most renowned state, was not completed till the time of Nebuchadnezzar, who, after the accomplishment of his many conquests, consecrated this superb edifice to the idolatrous object to whom he ascribed his victory. That the observatory on the tower was erected in remote times there is good reason to believe. Prideaux mentions (Connections, i, 123) the circumstance that when Alexander made himself master of Babylon, Callisthenes, the philosopher, who attended him thither, found astronomical observations ascending upward 1900 years.—Kitto. See Astronomy.

6. Evidence as to its present Remains.—After the lapse of so many centuries, and the occurrence in "the land of Shinar" of so many revolutions, it is not to be expected that the identification of the Tower of Babel with any actual ruin should be easy, or lead to any very certain result. The majority of opinions, however, among the learned, make it the same as the above-described temple of Belus; and as to its modern locality, the predominant opinion has been in favor of the great temple of Nebi at Borsippe, the modern Birnimrud, although the distance of that place from Babylon is a great difficulty in the way of the identification. When Christian travellers first began to visit the Mesopotamian ruins, they generally attached the name of "the Tower of Babel" to whatever mass, among those beheld by them, was the loftiest and most imposing. Rawlins, in the 16th century, found the "Tower of Babel" at Fekugish; Pietro della Valle, in the 18th, identified it with the ruin Babti near Hillah; while early in the present century Rich and Kev Porter revived the Jewish notion, and argued for its identity with the Birth. There are, in reality, no positive grounds either for identifying the tower with the temple of Belus, or for supposing that any remains of it long survived the check which the builders received when they were "scattered abroad upon the face of the earth," and "left off to build the city" (Gen. xi, 6); yet the striking general similarity of its form and construction to those structures, taken in connection with its evidently great antiquity, create a presumption in favor of the identification that it is difficult to resist. See Ninurta. Nor, indeed, does the Birn Limrud lie much, if any, farther distant from Hillah (the modern representative of Babylon) than do (in an opposite direction) some other ruins (e.g., especially the mound called Babii, the only other rival to the honor of representing the ancient Tower of Babel and temple of Belus in the vicinity), which were yet undoubtedly included within the ample circuit of the ancient walls; in fact, the Birn itself will fall within the line of the outer walls of Babylon, if laid down of the extent described by Herodotus. See Babylon. Its pyramidal structure, also, with the numerous contractions of its successive stages, still traceable in the ruins, favors the identification (see below).—Smith; Kitto.

7. Description of "Birn Limrud," its supposed modern Relic.—The appearance of this massive ruin is deeply impressive, rising suddenly as it does out of a wide desert plain, with its rent, fragmentary, and fire-blasted pile, masses of vitrified matter lying around, and the whole hill itself on which it stands caked and hardened out of the materials with which the temple had been built. Its dreary aspect seems to justify the name which the remnant of the captivity, still abiding among the waters of Babylon, give to the place, namely, "Nebuchadnezzar's Prison;" an appellation which may have been assigned from the circumstance of that monarch's being confined there, under the care of the priesthood, during the period of his madness, or from the King of Israel's having been incarcerated within its precincts by Nebuchadnezzar after his last conquest of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxx). A very considerable space round the tower, forming a very court or area, is covered with ruins, affording abundant vestiges of former buildings, exhibiting uneven heaps of various sizes, covered with masses of broken brick, tiles, and vitrified fragments—all bespeaking some signal overthrow in former days. The tower-like ruin on the summit is a solid mass 28 feet broad, constructed of the most beautiful brick masonry. It is rent from the top nearly half way to the bottom. It is perforated in ranges of square openings. At its base lie several immense unshapen masses of fine brickwork, some changed to a state of the hardest vitrification, affording evidence of the action of fire which seems to have been the lightning of heaven. The base of the tower at present measures 2082 feet in circumference. Hardly half of its former altitude remains.

Of the original pyramidal form, the erections of Semiramis and Nebuchadnezzar appear to have begun at the stage of the former overthrow. From its summit, the view in the distance presents to the south an arid desert plain; to the west the same trackless waste; toward the north-east marks of buried ruins are visible to a vast distance. The bricks which compose the tower are mostly stamped with several lines of inscription, in the cuneiform or Babylonian character. Some extend to four, or even seven lines, but the dimensions of all are the same. The bricks of Babylon are of two kinds, sun-dried and fire-burnt. The former are larger and of a coarser make than the latter. Their solidity is equal to that of many kinds of stone. They are composed of clay mixed with chopped straw or broken reeds, in order to increase their compactness. This is the sort of brick which the children of Israel made while in Egyptian bondage. The unburnt bricks commonly form the interior or mass of a building. This is the case with the great tower, while it was faced with the more beautiful fabric made in the furnace or kiln. See full particulars in Rich’s Memoir of Babylon and Persepolis; Ker Porter’s Travels in Persia; comp. Ritter, *Erdk. xl, 876 sq.—Kitto.

8. Type and Character of the Building.—It must be allowed that the Birs Nimrud, though it may not be the Tower of Babel itself, which was at Babylon (Gen. xi, 9), yet, as the most perfect representative of an ancient Babylonian temple-tower, may well be taken to show, better than any other ruin, the probable shape and style of the edifice. This building appears, by the careful examinations recently made of it, to have been a kind of retreating pyramid built in seven receding stages. "Upon a platform of crude brick, raised a few feet above the level of the alluvial plain, was built of burnt brick the first or basement stage—an exact square, 272 feet each way, and 26 feet in perpendicular height. Upon this stage was erected a second, 230 feet each way, and likewise 26 feet high; which, however, was not placed exactly in the middle of the first, but considerably nearer to the south-western end, which constituted the back of the building. The other stages were arranged similarly, the third being 188 feet, and again 26 feet high; the fourth 146 feet square, and 15 feet high; the fifth 104 feet square, and the same height as the fourth; the sixth 62 feet square, and again the same height; and the seventh 20 feet square, and once more the same height. On the seventh stage there was probably placed the ark, or tabernacle, which seems to have been again 15 feet high, and must have nearly, if not entirely, covered the top of the seventh story. The entire original height, allowing three feet for the platform, would thus have been 150 feet, or, without the platform, 158 feet. The whole formed a sort of oblique pyramid, the gentler slope facing the N.E., and the steeper inclining to the S.W. On the N.E. side was the grand entrance, and here stood the vestibule, a separate building, the debris from which, having joined those from the temple itself, fill up the intermediate space, and very remarkably prolong the mound in this direction" (Rawlinson’s Herodotus, ii. 490-8). The Birs temple, if the same called the "Temple of the Seven Spheres," was ornamented with the planetary colors (see the plan), but this was most likely a peculiarity. The other chief features of it seem to have been common to most, if not all of the Babylonian temple-towers. The feature of stages is found in the temples at Warks and Mugheir (Loftus’s Chaldæa, p. 129 and 168), which belong to very primitive times (B.C. 2230); that of the emplacement, so that the four angles face the four cardinal points, is likewise common to those ancient structures; while the square form is universal. On the other hand, it may be doubted whether so large a number of stages was common. The Mugheir and Warks temples have no more than two, and probably never had more than three, or at most four stages. The great temple of Belus at Babylon (if Babil) shows only one stage; though, according to the best authorities, it too was a sort of pyramid (Herod., Strab.). The height of the Birs is 150 feet, that of Babl 140 (?), that of the Warsa temple 100, that of the temple at Muqair 50 feet. Strabo’s statement that the tomb of Belus was a stade (806 feet in height) would thus seem to be a gross exaggeration. Probably no Babylonian tower ever equaled the Great Pyramid, the original height of which was 480 feet. See PYRAMIDS.

9. Its Materials and Manner of Construction.—On these points more light is to be obtained from the Warsa and Muqair buildings than from the Birs. The Birs was rebuilt from top to bottom by Nebuchadnezzar, and shows the mode of construction prevalent in Babylon at the best period; the temples at Warsa and Muqair remain to a certain extent in their primitive condition, the upper stories alone having been renovated. The Warsa temple is composed entirely of sun-dried bricks, which are of various shapes and sizes; the cement used is mud; and reeds are largely employed in the construction. It is a building of the most primitive type, and exhibits a ruder style of art than that which we perceive from Scripture to have obtained at the date of the tower. Burnt bricks were employed in the composition of the tower (Gen. xi, 3); and though perhaps it is somewhat doubtful what the chumur (ến) “a lime” used for mortar may have been (see Fresnel in Journ. Asiatique for June, 1858, p. 9), yet, on the whole, it is most probable that the typhon, (which abounds in Babylonia) is the substance intended. See BITUMEN. Now the lower basement of the Muqair temple exhibits this combination in a decidedly primitive form. The burnt bricks are of small size and of an inferior quality; they are laid in bitumen; and they face a mass of sun-dried bricks. A solid wall outside it ten feet in thickness. No reeds are used in the building. Writing appears on it, but of an antique cast. The supposed date is B.C. 2300, but little later than the era commonly assigned to the building of Babel. Probably the erection of the two buildings was not separated by a very long interval, though it is reasonable to suppose that of the two the tower was the earlier. If we mark its date, as perhaps we are entitled to do, by the time of Peleg, the son of Eber, and father of Reu (see Gen. x, 25), we may perhaps place it about B.C. 2400. See Dispersion of Nations.

10. Advantages of this form.—It is not necessary to suppose that any real idea of “scaling heaven” was present to the minds of those who raised either the Tower of Babel, or any other of the Babylonian temple-towers. The expression used in Genesis (xi, 4) is a mere hyperbole for great height (comp. Deut. i, 28; Dan. iv, 11, etc.), and should not be taken literally. Military defence was probably the primary object of such edifices in early times; but with the wish for which this may have been combined further secondary motives, which remained when such defence was otherwise provided for. Diodorus states that the great tower of the temple of Belus was used by the Chaldeans as an observatory (ii, 9), and the careful emplacement of the Babylonian temples with the angles facing the four cardinal points would be a natural consequence, and may be regarded as a strong confirmation of the reality of this application. M. Fresnel has recently conjectured that they were also used as sleeping-places for the chief priests in the summer time (Journ. Asiatique, June, 1858, p. 529-531). The upper air is cooler, and is free from the insects, especially mosquitoes, which abound below; and the description which Herodotus gives of the chamber at the top of the Belus tower (i, 181) goes far to confirm this ingenious view.—Smith, s. v.

11. Confirmation from other Pyramidal Temples.—Mr. Taylor (Fragmenta to Calmet’s Dict.) has given views of several similar structures now extant, of which we copy two. The first, rising in several steps or stages, is at Tampere, in the East Indies; and at Forda, it is presumed, a just idea of the Tower of Babel. It is, indeed, wholly constructed of stone, in which it differs from that more ancient edifice, which, being situated in a country destitute of stone, was, of necessity, constructed of brick. On the top of this pyramid is a chapel or temple, affording a specimen of the general nature of this kind of sacred edifices in India. These amazing structures are commonly erected on or near the banks of great rivers, for the advantage of ablution. In the courts that surround them innumerable multitudes assemble at the rising of the sun, after having bathed in the stream below. The gate of the pagoda uniformly fronts the east. The internal chamber commonly receives light only from the door. An external pathway, for the purpose of visiting the chapel at the top, merits observation.

The next is an ancient pyramid built by the Mexicans in America; it agrees in figure with the former, and has on the outside an ascent of stairs leading up one side to the upper story, proceeding to the chapel on its summit. This ascent implies that the chapels were used from time to time, and no doubt it marks the shortest track for that purpose, as it occupies one side only.

12. Literature.—Kircher, Turris Babel (Amst. 1773); Zengravius, De turri Babel (Vitemb. 1774); Hoynoyvius, De turri Babylonicae (Regiom. 1694); Colombus, De causis tur. Bab. (Regiom. 1673); Cyrill. Ba‘bi (Ba‘bi v. r. Ba‘bn), a chief Israelite whose "son" returned from Babylon (1 Esdr. viii, 37); evidently the BARRAI (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra ii, 12), which also recurs in the same verse of Esdras.

Babi, or Bablata, a Persian sect of Mohamans, whose founder, according to one account, BABI

Moollah Sadik; according to others, a certain Bab, who, coming forth in 1852 as a prophet, was shot by order of the shah of Persia. It is probable that both names refer to the same person, and that Sadik assumed the name of Bab, i.e. Papa, Father; or, according to another version, the Gate, through which alone truth and eternal bliss can be reached. A more recent and authoritative source is the 1882 French translation of the Philosophies d'Asie Centrale (cited in The Nation, June 22, 1866, from which this account is taken). About 1843 a youth of Shiraz, named Mirza Ali Mohammed, after reading the Christian Scriptures, as well as the Oriental Sacred Books, came out as a prophet, to reform or destroy Islamism. He is said to have had dealings with many of the people, and to have soon made many proselytes. Inspired by success, he now declared that, instead of the Gate, he was the Point; that is, the very creator of truth; no longer a simple prophet, but a living manifestation of divinity. The title of the Bab was now conferred upon a priest of the Khorasan. Moollah Hosein Bounarhwich, who became the active chief and soon the warrior- apostle of Babism. Hosein was sent on a missionary tour into Irak and Khorasan, taking with him the writings of his master. He made a great sensation by his preaching. Another missionary was a woman, possessed of extraordinary beauty and eloquence. About 1845 and 1846 Babists generally gathered at a place called Sholik Teberi, and built a huge tower, providing it for a siege. They now gave out political predictions, in which the advent of the Bab as universal sovereign was announced. All who died fighting for the new faith were to rise again, to become princes of some of the countries over which the Bab would extend his sway. Two large armies sent against the Babists were surprised and routed. A third expedition, though it succeeded in withstanding the sortie of the Babists, and in mortally wounding the Babist chief, Moollah Hosein, retired. The next campaign was more successful. For four months the Babists held out, in spite of tremendous odds, but at last, worn out by famine, they tried to force their way through the enemy's lines, but were overpowered, and when they surrendered only 214 were living. The survivors, and multitudes of others who professed to revere the memory of the heroes, were cruelly put to death. The Babist insurrection in Khamseh was also put down. Meanwhile Ali Mohammed had been living in semi-concealment at Shiraz. After the insurrection of Mezenderan he was brought before a court of royal commissioners and Mohammedan priests. In the examination which took place he was silent, and the judges were unable to gain the advantage. Seeing this, the discussion was abruptly broken off, and the Bab, with two of his disciples, was condemned to death, which was inflicted the next day. Everything now seemed to be finished; but the new Bab, Mirza Isaa, whom a divine mark had pointed out at the age of fifteen as the successor to the office, established himself at Bagdad, where he kept up communication with his followers through the pilgrims to the shrines there. The Babists were now forbidden from making any more attempts at insurrection until the Bab should decide that the hour had come and should give them the signal. In 1852 an attempt was made at Bagdad, but failed. The attempted assassins were recognized as Babists. Forty others were arrested, among them the feminine apostle, Gourret-Oul-Ayn, the Consolation of Eyes. The next day she publicly confessed her Babism, was buried at the stake with insult and indignity, and her ashes were cast into the river. The whole of the prisoners were distributed each to a courtier as his special victim. Then was seen at Tehran a sight never to be forgotten. Through the streets, between the lines of executioners, marched men, women, and children, with burning splinters flaming in their wounds. The victims sang: "In truth we come from God, and we return to him." A sufferer falls in the road; he is raised by lashes and bayonet thrusts. But no apostate was found among the sufferers.

Babism, like Mohammedanism, asserts the absolute unity of God; but the eternal unity, far from shutting himself up in himself, is, on the contrary, a power ever-extending, ever-moving, acting, creating. God has created the world by means of seven words—Force, Power, Will, Action, Condensation, Glory, and Revelation—which words embrace the active plenitude of the virtues which they respectively represent. God possesses other virtues, even to infinity, but he manifests these by the creation of material and spiritual worlds. The former consists of persons distinguished from him by the privation of all emanatory action, but he is not altogether separated from him, and at the last day of judgment he will be confounded anew with him in the eternal unity. The Babist doctrine of revelation does not claim that the Bab has revealed the complete truth, but only as his predecessors, the prophets before him, have done—that portion of truth necessary for the age. The Bab is declared superior to Mohammed as Mohammed was to Jesus; and another revelation, which will complete the Bab's, is announced as coming in the future. Nineteen is a sacred number, which the Babists seek to prove over everything. Practically, he says, the Unity was composed of nineteen persons, among whom the highest rank belongs to the Bab. All the prophets who have appeared are, like the world, manifestations of God: divine words; not God, but beings who come from God more really than common men. At the death of a prophet or a saint, his soul does not quit the earth, but joins itself to some soul still in the flesh, who then completes his work. Babism enjoins few prayers, and only upon fixed occasions, and neither prescribes nor defends abductions, so common in the religious rites of Mohammedanism. All the faithful wear amulets. Mendicancy, so much in honor among the Musulman people, is forbidden. Women are ordered to discard veils, and to share in the intercourse of social life, from which Persian usage excludes them.

What will be the future of Babism it is difficult to tell. Since 1852 it has changed its character to a secret doctrine, which recruits its members in Leiden and other centers in Europe. The secret Babists who before suffered martyrdom so courageously rather than deny their religion, now, obedient to the new order of their chief, conceal their faith with Oriental dissimulation. Babism is much more in harmony with the subtle and imaginative genius of the Persian people than the Shiite Mohammedanism, which is still too much bound by the present religion and the present dynasty, both of which were established among them by foreign conquest, less and less acceptable every year. The hour when the Bab shall send word from Bagdad that the time has come for the Babists to take up arms again will be a very critical one for the present dynasty of Persia and for Shiite Mohammedanism.

The first thorough work on the origin and the history of the Bab is the one above referred to by Count Gobineau (formerly French minister in Teheran). Little had previously been published in Europe concerning the sect. (See Ztschrift der deutschen moralphilosophischen Gesellschaft, vol. v., and Petermann's Annalen, vol. ii.) The history of the Bab in Gobineau's work is followed by treatises on their doctrines, and, as a concluding appendix, he gives the sacred book of the Bab, "The Book of Precepts." See also Polak (a German, court-physician of the Shah, and director of the medical school at Teheran), and his "The Life and Times of Abul Fyz, and his Benefactors" (Leipzig, 1855, 2 vols., vol. i, p. 350—354).—Pfister, Universal-Lexicon, ii, 117; The Nation, June 22, 1866; American Ann. Cyclopaedia, 1865, p. 698.

Babington, George, an eminent English prelate, was born at Nottingham in the year 1851. He BABYLON was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became master of arts in 1578. He applied himself closely to theology, and became one of the most impressive and useful preachers of his day. In 1588 he was installed into the prebend of Wellington, in the cathedral of Hereford, and through the interest of the Earl of Pembroke was advanced to the bishopric of Llandaff in 1591. In 1594 he was translated to the see of Exeter, from whence, in 1597, he was translated to Worcester. Bishop Babington was a man of eminent Christian character as well as scholarship. Fuller testifies that he "was not tainted with pride, idleness, and courtesies of the world." He died at Worcester on 5 May, 1610. His works are collected under the title "The Works of the Right Reverend Father in God, George Babington, late Bishop of Worcester." (London, 1622, fol.). They contain Notes on the Pentateuch, Exposition of the Creed, the Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer, with a Conference between Man's Frailty and Faith, and three sermons.—Jones, Christian Biography, p. 163. Hook, Eccl. Biog. i, 446.

Babylas, St., became bishop of Antioch about the year 230. When the Emperor Philip, who, in ascending the throne, had murdered the young Emperor Gordian, came to Antioch on his way to Rome, about Easter, 244, Babylas repulsed him from the church door, and refused to permit him to join in Philip's worship. According to the old legend, he was thrown into a well and appeared among the public penitents. After a time Decius repudiated Philip's empire and life, and stirred up a virulent persecution against the Christians. Babylas, conspicuous from his lofty station, did not escape this storm, and about the end of the year he was wounded and thrown into prison, where, in the following year, he died. The Latins commemorated him on the 24th of January, the Greeks on the 4th of September. Chrysostom has a homily in Babylas (t. ii, 578, ed. Montf.). See Eusebius, Ch. Hist. vi, 39; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. xxiii.

Babylon (Heb. and Chald. Babel, דַּבַּל, Gr. Βαβυλών), the name of more than one city in the Old Testament and other ancient writings. See also Babel.

1. Originally the capital of the country called in Genesis בֵּית הַרְפָּעֵה, and in the later Scriptures Chaldea, or the land of the Chaldeans (דַּבְּלָן). See those articles generally.

2. The Name.—The word Babel seems to be connected in its first occurrence with the Hebrew root בָּאֵב, "to confound" (as it by contraction from the reduplicated form בָּבֵל, Babel), "because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth" (Gen. xi, 9); but the native etymology (see the Keren, ii, 66) is Bebel, "the gate of God," or perhaps more simply "the gate of God," and this no doubt was the original intention of the appellation as given by Nimrod, though the other sense came to be attached to it after the confusion of tongues (see Eichhorn, Biblisch. d. bibl. Lit. iii, 1001). Another derivation deduces the word from בָּבָל, "the court or city of Belus" (see Abulfed in Rosenmüller, Alterth. ii, 60), or בָּבָל ( = בָּבֵל), Bela's Hill (Furst, Neb. Handb. s. v.). A still different etymology is proposed by Tuch (Gen. p. 576), from בָּבָל, "the house of Bel." Whichever of these etymologies may be regarded as the preferable one, the name was doubtless understood or appropriated by the sacred writer in Genesis so as to be expressive of the disaster that befell the founders of the place. In the Bible a later date the place is appropriately termed "Babylon the Great" (בֵּית הֶבֶל, Jer. li, 58; דַּבֵּל, Dan. iv, 27), and by Josephus also (Ant. viii, 6, 1, § μυδήν Βαβυλών). The name Babylon is likewise that by which it is constantly denominated in the Sept. and later versions, as well as by the Apocalypse (Ch. Macr. vi, 4).
probably, but for his death, have restored. Under Seleucus Nicator the city began to sink speedily, after that had been built by Nebuchadrezzar, and made it his place of abode. In the time of Strabo and Dio- dorus Siculus the place lay in ruins. Jerome, in the fourth century of the Christian era, learned that the site of Babylon had been converted into a park or hunting-ground for the recreation of the Persian monarchs, and that, in order to preserve the game, the wall was left to remain there where it was. The following extract from Rich (p. 80) is compared with these historical facts, the prophecy of Isaiah (xiii, 19) will appear to have been strikingly fulfilled to the letter: "I had always imagined the belief of the existence of satyrs was confined to the mythology of the West; but a sort of satyr was within me when I examined this ruin (the Mujellebeh) mentioned that in this desert an animal is found resembling a man from the head to the waist, but having the thighs and legs of a sheep or goat; he also said that the Arabs hunt it with dogs, and eat the lower parts, abstaining from the upper, on account of their resemblance to those of the human species." More thorough destruction than that which has overtaken Babylon cannot well be conceived. Rich was unable to discover any traces of its vast walls, and even its site has been a subject of dispute. "On its ruins," says he, "there is not a single tree growing, except an old one," which only serves to make the destruction more complete. Ruins like those of Babylon, composed of rubbish impregnated with nitre, cannot be cultivated. For a more detailed account of the history of Babylon, see the article BABYLONIA.—Kitto.

4. Ancient Descriptions.—The statements respecting the topography and appearance of Babylon which have come down to us in classical writers are derived chiefly from two sources, the work of Herodotus and of Ctesias. These authors were both of them eye-witnesses of the glories of Babylon—not, indeed, at their highest point, but before they had greatly declined—and left accounts of the city and its chief buildings, which the historians and geographers of later times were, for the most part, content to copy. To these accounts are to be added various other details by Quintus Curtius, and Pliny, and a few notices by other ancient visitors.

According to the account of Herodotus (i, 178-186) the walls of Babylon were double, the outer line being 56 miles in circumference, built of large bricks cemented with tar and pitch, and the inner wall of the city in the form of an exact square; hence they measured 14 miles each along each face. They were 87 feet thick and 350 feet high (Quintus Curtius says four horse-chariots could pass each other on them without danger), protected on the outside by a vast ditch lined with the same material, and proportioned in depth and width to the elevation of the inner wall of the city. The city was entered by twenty-five gates on each side, made of solid brass, and additionally strengthened by 250 towers, so placed that between every two gates were four towers, and four additional ones at the four corners. From all the gates proceeded streets running in straight lines, east and west, and fifteen miles in length, fifty in number, and crossing each other at right angles. Other minor divisions occurred, and the whole city contained 676 squares, each about two miles and a quarter in circumference. Herodotus appears to imply that this whole space was covered with houses, which were frequently three or four stories high. The river ran through the city from north to south, and on each side was a quay of the same thickness as the walls of the city, and 100 stadia in length. In these quays were gates of brass, and from each of them steps descending into the river. A bridge was thrown across the river, of great beauty, but with a passage for the passage of elephants and 500 feet in breadth. As the Euphrates overflowed during the summer months, through the melting of the snows on the mountains of Armenia, two canals were cut to turn the course of the waters into the Tigris, and vast artificial lakes formed. The city of Babylon, indeed, made a part of the river. On the western side of the city an immense lake, forty miles square, was excavated to the depth, according to Herodotus, of 85 feet, and into this lake the river was turned till the work was completed. At each end of the bridge was a palace, and these had a subterranean communication. In each division of the town, there was a citadel, or fortress or stronghold, consisting in the one case of the royal palace, in the other of the great temple of Belus. This last was a species of pyramid, composed of eight square towers placed one above the other, the dimensions of the basetement tower being a stade—or above 200 yards—each side. The height of the temple is not mentioned by Herodotus. A winding ascent, which passed round all the towers, led to the summit, on which was placed a spacious ark or chapel, containing no statue, but regarded by the natives as the habitation of the god. The temple stood in a sacred precinct, two stades (or 400 yards) square, which contained altars for burnt-offerings and a sacred ark or chapel, wherein was the golden image of Bel.—Kitto; Smith.

According to Ctesias (ap. Diod. Sic. ii, 7 sq.), the circuit of the city was a little under 42 miles. It lay, he says, on both sides of the Euphrates, and the two parts were connected together by a stone bridge above 1000 feet long and above 600 feet broad. The town of Babylon, composed of rubbish impregnated with nitre, cannot be cultivated. For a more detailed account of the history of Babylon, see the article BABYLONIA.—Kitto.

The account given by Quintus Curtius (v, 1) of the entrance of Alexander into Babylon may serve to enliven the narrative, and, at the same time, make the impression on the reader's mind more distinct. "A great part of the inhabitants of Babylon stood on the walls, eager to catch a sight of their new monarch. Many went forth to meet him. Among these, Baephon the king of the citadel and of the royal trea-ture, strewed the entire way before the king with flowers and crowns; silver altars were also placed on both sides of the road, which were loaded not merely with frankincense, but all kinds of odoriferous herbs. He brought with him for Alexander gifts of various kinds of gold and silver, horses and fine cloaks, which were carried before him in their dens. The magi came next, singing, in their usual manner, their ancient hymns. After them came the Chaldeans, with their musical instruments, who are not only the prophets of the Babylonians, but their artists. The first are wont to sing the praises of the kings; the Chaldreans are the interpreters of the stars, and the astrologers. The second, besides their periodic viciastancies of the times and seasons. Then followed, last of all, the Babylonian knights, whose equipment, as well as that of their horses, seemed designed more for luxury than magnificence. The king, Alexander, attended by armed men, having ordered the crowd of the townspeople to proceed in the rear of his infantry, enticed the citizens to a chariot and repaired to the palace. The next day he carefully surveyed the household treasures of Darius, and all his money. For the rest, the beauty of the city and age turned the eyes not only of the king, but of every one, on itself, and that with good reason. Within a brief period after this Alexander lay a corpse in the palace.

Of one or two events facts must be in conveying a full idea of this great and magnificent city. When Cyrus took Babylon by turning the Euphrates into a neighboring lake, the dwellers in the middle of the place were not for some time aware that their fellow-townsmen who were near the walls had been captured. This, says Herodotus (i, 191), was owing to the magnitude of the city, and to the circumstance that at the time the inhabitants were engaged in carousals, it being a festive occasion. Nor, according to Xenophon, did the citizens of the opposite quarter learn the event till three hours after sunrise, the city having been taken by night. Alexander had 10,000 men during two months to remove the accumulatated ruins precipitated by order of Xerxes nearly 200 years before. From the fallen towers of Babylon have arisen not only all the present cities in its vicinity, but others which, like itself, have long since gone down into the dust. Since the days of Alexander, four capitals, at least, have been built out of the ruins of Babylon: Seleucia, by the Greeks; Ctesiphon, by the Parthians; Al-Ma'aden, by the Persians; and Kufa, by the caliphs; with towns, villages, and caravansaries without number. The necessary fragments and materials were transported along the rivers and the canals.

The antiquity of the canals of Babylonia dates from the most remote periods of the Chaldaeo-Babylonian monarchy. The ancient kings of Assyria and Babylonia well understood the value of canals, and their empire arose upon alluvial plains, amid a system of irrigation and drainage which spread like a net-work over the land. It may be sufficient to specify the Nahr Malikah, or Royal Canal, the origin of which has been referred both to Nimrod and Cush. Abydenus, however, attributes it to Nebuchadnezzar. From the account of Herodotus, it appears to have been of sufficient breadth and depth to be navigable for merchant vessels. It is not, therefore, surprising that some writers have placed it as the source of the Euphrates. The soil around Babylon is of a light, yielding nature, easily wrought for canals and other purposes, whether of art or war. Cyrus, therefore, would find no great difficulty in digging a trench about the city sufficient to contain the waters of the river (Cyrop. viii). Alexander (Strabo, xvi, p. 610), in enlarging one of the canals and forming basins for his fleet, laid open the graves of many buried kings and princes, which shows how readily the soil yields and gives way before the labors of man.

The new palace built by Nebuchadnezzar was prodigious in size and superb in embellishments. Its outside, according to Josephus, was three miles wide and ten miles long. The two ancient embattled walls, besides a great tower. Three brazen gates led into the grand area, and every gate of consequence throughout the city was of brass. In accordance with this fact are the terms which Isaiah (xlv, 1, 2) employs when, in the guise of a prophet, he prophesied: "The glory of his power should fall before him: "I will open before him the two-leaved gates; I will break in pieces the gates of brass:" a prophecy which was fulfilled to the letter when Cyrus made himself master of the place. The palace was splendidly decorated with statues of men and animals; vessels of gold and silver, and furnished with luxuries of all kinds brought thither from conquests in Egypt, Palestine, and Tyre. Its great est boast were the hanging gardens, which acquired even from Grecian writers the appellation of one of the wonders of the world. They are attributed to the gallantry of Nebuchadnezzar, who constructed them in compliance with a wish he had entertained to see elevated groves such as he had enjoyed on the hills around her native Ecbatana. Babylon was all flat; and to accomplish so extravagant a desire, an artificial mountain was reared, 400 feet on each side, while terraces one above another rose to a height that overtopped the walls of the city; that is, above 500 feet in elevation. The ascent from the terrace to the terraces was made by corresponding flights of steps, while the terraces themselves were reared to their various stages on ranges of regular piers, which, forming a kind of vaulting, rose in succession one over the other to the required height of each terrace, the whole being bound together by a wall of 22 feet in thickness. The level of each terrace or garden was then formed in the following manner: the top of the piers was first laid over with flat stones, 16 feet in length and 4 feet in width; on these stones were spread beds of matting, then a thick layer of bitumen; after which came two courses of large bricks over the bitumen. The earth was heaped on this platform; and in order to admit the roots of large trees, prodigious hollow piers were built and filled with mould. From the Euphrates, which flowed close to the foundation, water was drawn up by machinery. The whole, says Q. Curtius (v, 5), had, to those who saw it from a distance, the appearance of a series of enchanting mountains. Such was the completion of Nebuchadnezzar's work, when he found himself at rest in his house, and flourished in his palace. The king spoke and said, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power and the majesty of my people that is, to a picture which is amply justified by the descriptions of heathen writers. Nowhere could the king have taken so comprehensive a view of the city he had so magnificently constructed and adorned as when walking on the highest terrace of the gardens of his palace.

Babylon, as the centre of a great kingdom, was the seat of boundless luxury, and its inhabitants were notorious for their addiction to self-indulgence and effeminacy. Q. Curtius (v, 1) asserts that "nothing could be more corrupt than its morals, nothing more fitted to excite and allure to immoderate pleasures. The rites of hospitality were polluted by the grossest impiety and murder, for ingenuity lusty, whether of kindred, respect, or esteem. The Babylonians were very greatly given to wine and the enjoyment which accompany inebriety. Women were present at their convivialities, first with some degree of propriety, but, growing worse and worse by degrees, they ended by throwing off at once their modesty and their clothing. Once in her life, according to Herodotus (i, 199), every native female was obliged to visit the temple of Mylitta, the Babylonian Astarte (q. v.) or Venus, and there receive the embraces of the first stranger who threw a piece of money into her lap; an abominable custom, that is alluded to in the A. e., which is placed in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar (ii, 269). On the ground of their awful wickedness, the Babylonians were threatened with condign punishment, through the mouths of the prophets; and the tyranny with which the rulers of the city exercised their sway was not without a decided effect in bringing on them the punishment of the terrors of the Lord. Nor in the whole range of literature is there anything to be found approaching to the sublimity, force, and terror with which Isaiah and others speak on this painful subject (Isa. xi. 11; xviii. 1; Jer. ii. 39; Dan. v. 1). Babylon even stands, therefore, in the New Test. (Rev. xvii. 5) as the type of the most shameless prodigality and idolatry.—Kitto.

5. Investigation of the ancient Topography.—In ex-
The ruins of Babylon, as described by various authors, show that the city was a massive structure. The walls were 250 feet high, and the total area of the city was estimated to be over 100 square miles. The walls were made of mud brick, and the city was surrounded by a moat. The gates of the city were also large and well-defended.

The city was divided into several districts, each with its own temples and palaces. The most notable of these was the temple of Bel, which was dedicated to the god of war. The city was also renowned for its libraries and schools, which attracted scholars from all over the ancient world.

Babylon fell into decline after the Persian conquest in 539 BC, and was eventually destroyed by Alexander the Great in 331 BC. However, its legacy lived on, and it is still a site of great archaeological interest today.

Plan of part of the Ruins of Babylon, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates.

About five miles above Hillah, on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, occur a series of artificial mounds of enormous size, which have been recognised in all ages as probably indicating the site of the capital of southern Mesopotamia. They consist chiefly of three great masses of building—the high pile of unbaked brickwork called by Rich "Mujilah," but which is known to the Arabs as "Babil"; the building denominated the "Ka'ar" or palace; and a lofty mound upon which stands the modern tomb of Amsun Is. Ab (Loftus's Chaldæa, p. 17). Besides these principal masses the most remarkable features are two parallel lines of rampart bounding the chief ruins on the east, some similar but inferior remains on the north and west, an embankment along the river side, a remarkable isolated heap in the middle of a long valley, which seems to have been the ancient bed of the stream, and two long lines of rampart, meeting at a right angle, and with the river forming an irregular triangle, within which all the ruins on this side (except Babil) are enclosed. On the west, or right bank, the remains are very slight and scanty. There is the appearance of an enclosure, and of a building of moderate size within it, nearly opposite the great mound of Amsun, but otherwise, unless at a long distance from the stream, this side of the Euphrates is absolutely bare of ruins.
(See Rawlinson's Herodotus, ii, 473).

Scattered over the country on both sides of the Euphrates, and reducible to no regular plan, are a number of remarkable mounds, usually standing single, which are plainly of the same date with the great mass of ruins upon the river bank. Of these by far the most striking is the vast ruin called the Birs Nimrud, which many regard as the Tower of Babel, situated about six miles to the S.W. of Hillah, and almost that distance from the Euphrates at the nearest point. This is a pyramidal mound, crowned apparently by the ruins of a tower, rising to the height of 153½ feet above the level of the plain, and in circumference somewhat more than 2000 feet. See Babel. (Tower of).

7. Identification of Sites.—On comparing the existing ruins with the accounts of the ancient writers, the great difficulty which meets us is the position of the remains almost exclusively on the left bank of the river. All the old accounts agree in representing the Euphrates as running through the town, and the principal buildings as placed on the opposite sides of the stream. In explanation of this difficulty, it has been urged, on the one hand, that the Euphrates, having a tendency to run off to the right, has obliterated all trace of the buildings in this direction (Layard's Nis. and Bab. p. 420); on the other, that, by a due extension of the area of Babylon, it may be made to include the Birs Nimrud, and that thus the chief existing remains will really lie on the opposite banks of the river (Rich, Second Memoir, p. 32; Ker Porter, Travels, ii, 385). But the identification of the Birs with Borsippa seems to interfere with this latter theory; while the former is unsatisfactory, since we can scarcely suppose the abrasion of the river to have entirely removed all trace of such gigantic buildings as those which the ancient writers describe. Perhaps the most probable solution is to be found in the fact that a large canal (called Shebl) intervened in ancient times between the Kaar mound and the ruin now called Babil, which may easily have been confound by Herodotus
with the main stream.
This would have had the two principal buildings upon opposite sides; while the real river, which ran down the long valley to the west of the Kaar and Amsun mounds, would also have separated (as Ctesias related) between the greater and the lesser palace. If this explanation be accepted as probable, we may identify the principal ruins as follows:
1. The great mound of Babil will be the animal temple of Be-lus. It is an oblong the old palace platform (which resembles those at Nineveh, Susa, and elsewhere), upon which are still standing certain portions of the ancient residences to which the name of "Ksar" or "palace" especially attaches. The walls are composed of burnt bricks, of a pale-yellow color, and of excellent quality, bound together by a fine lime cement, and stamped with the name and titles of Nebuchadnezzar. They contain traces of architectural ornament—piers, buttresses, pilasters, etc.; and in the rubbish at their base have been found slabs inscribed by Nebuchadnezzar, and containing an account of the building of the edifice, as well as a few sculptured fragments, and many pieces of enamelled brick of brilliant hues. On these last portions of figures are traceable, recalling the statements of Ctesias (ap.

mass, composed chiefly of unbaked brick, rising from the plain to the height of 140 feet, flattish at the top, in length about 200, and in breadth about 140 yards. This oblong shape is common to the temples, or rather

BABYLON

Diodor. Sicul.) that the brick walls of the palace were colored, and represented hunting-scenes. No plan of the palace is to be made out from the existing remains, which are tossed in appearance on the highest part of the mound. 3. The mound of Aμουμ is thought by M. Oppert to represent the "hanging gardens" of Nebuchadnezzar; but this conjecture does not seem to be a very happy one. The mound is composed of poorer materials than the edifices of that prince, and has furnished no bricks containing his name. Again, it is far too large for the hanging gardens, which are said to have been only 400 feet each way. The Aμουμ mound is described by Rich as an irregular parallelogram, 1100 yards long by 800 broad, and by Ker Porter as a triangle, the sides of which are respectively 1400, 1100, and 850 feet. Its dimensions therefore, are very greatly lessened by the curious structure with which it has been identified. Most probably it represents the ancient palace, coeval with Babylon itself, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks in his inscriptions as adjoinging his own more magnificent residence. It is the only part of the ruins from which bricks have been derived containing the names of kings earlier than Nebuchadnezzar, and is therefore entitled to be considered the most ancient of the existing remains. 4. The ruins near each side of the Euphrates, together with all the other remains on the west bank, may be considered to represent the larger palace of Cæsars, which is said to have been connected with the greater part of the city by a tunnel under the channel of the stream (>). The old course of the Euphrates seems to have been a little east of the present one, passing between the two parallel ridges near it at the bend in the middle, and then closely skirting the mound of Aμουμ, so as to have both the ruins just named upon its right bank. These ruins are of the same date and style. The bricks of that on the east bank bear the name of Nergilissar; and there can be little doubt that this ruin, together with those on the opposite side of the stream, are the remains of a palace built by him. Perhaps (as already remarked) the little mound immediately south of this point, near the east bank, may be a remnant of the ancien bridge. 5. The two long parallel lines of embankment on the east, which form so striking a feature in the remains as represented by Porter and Rich, but which are ignored by M. Oppert, may either be the lines of an outer and inner enclosure, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks asdefences of the city, or they may represent the embankments of an enormous reservoir, which is often mentioned by that monarch as adjoinging his palace toward the east. 6. The southernmost embankment, near the east bank of the river, is composed of bricks marked with the name of Labynetus or Nabunid, and is undoubtedly a portion of the work which Berosus ascribes to the last king (Pragm. 14).—Smith.

It must be admitted, however, that the foregoing scheme of identification (which is that proposed by Rawlinson, Heroedou, ii, Essay iv) involves the improbably supposition of a mistake on the part of the ancient author. In describing the course of the Euphrates through the middle of the defences of the city, it seems to us unduly to restrict the ancient limits, and thus excludes the Birs Nimrud; and it affords no explanation of the remarkable line of mounds meeting in a right angle on the east of the ruins, and most naturally thought by nearly all topographers (Rich, Ker Porter, Flinders, Layard, and Mr. Ferguson) to have been one of the corners of the city wall. Nor does it altogether agree with the recent conjectural restoration of the royal residence at Babylon on the bold plan of M. Oppert (in the Atlas accompanying his Expedition en Mésopotamie, Par. 1858), who supposes the extant remains opposite Hillah to be a part of the palace surrounding the edifices of the inscriptions, and gardens, and enclosing walls, the double line of city walls being of much larger extent. He appears, however, to have disregarded many details of the modern as well as ancient indication in his identification (see Rawlinson, op. cit. p. 467 sq.). Perhaps the inscriptions, and the peculiar indications (as above) are correct so far as concerns the royal buildings themselves, the chart of Oppert (given above) truly represents the entire circuit of the city; and that the palace, with its appendages, was enclosed in an interior quadrangle, which the river likewise divided diagonally, its eastern half corresponding to the triangle embracing the edifices here described.

The most remarkable fact connected with the magnificence of Babylon is the poorness of the material with which such wonderful results were produced. The whole country, being alluvial, was entirely destitute of stone, and even wood was scarce and of bad quality, being only yieldable by the palm-groves which fringed the courses of the canals and rivers. In default of these, the ordinary materials for building, recourse was had to the soil of the country—in many parts an excellent clay—and with bricks made from this, either sun-dried or baked, the vast structures were raised which, when they stood in their integrity, provoked comparison with the pyramids of Egypt; and even when, even in their decay, excite the astonishment of the traveller. A modern writer has noticed, as the true secret of the extraordinary results produced, "the unbounded command of naked human strength" which the Babylonian monarchs had at their disposal (Grote's Hist. of Greece, vol. ii, p. 401); but this may be but a fragment of the account for the phenomena; and we must give the Babylonians credit for a genius and a grandeur of conception rarely surpassed, which led them to employ the labor whereof they had the command in works of so imposing a character. With only "brick for stone," and at first only "slime (')t7 for mortar" (Gen. xi, 3), they constructed edifices of so vast a size that they still remain, preserved day among the most enormous ruins in the world, impressing the beholder at once with awe and admiration.—Smith.

2. Another Babylon lies in Egypt, south of Heliopolis, on the east bank of the Nile (Strabo, i, 17). It was founded by Babylonians, who had escaped from Egypt during the civil commotions between the empires (Diod. Sic. i, 56; Josephus, Ant. ii, 85), and whose ruins are described by Hartmann (Der Africa, 1826), Proekesh (Erinnerungen, i, 58).
Champollion (U. Egypte, ii, 33). It is now called Babboual (Smith's Dict. of Class. Geogr. s. v.).

3. The Babylon in 1 Pet. v, 13, is thought by some to be Rome, but by others (in accordance with a tradition of the Coptic Christians) to be the above place in Egytus. Babylon contradicts this last assertion by saying that there is no mention of a Bishop of Babylon till 500 years after Peter's time, under Justin the Younger.
(see also Bertholdt, Ewol. vi, 3063; Steiger, Br. Pet. p. 21 sq.) There is no good reason for supposing any other than ancient Babylon to be here meant, since it is known that this continued to be inhabited by Jews down to the Christian era (Geese. Jees. i, 470.
Introd. to N. T. iii, 866. See Peter (Epistles of).
4. In the Apocalypse (xiv, 8; xvi, 19; xvii, 5; viii, 2) Babylon stands for Rome, symbolizing bea-thenism: "Babylon is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication." This reference appears to have derived from the practice of the Jews, who were accustomed to designate Rome, which they hated, by the opprobrious and not inappropriate name of Babyl-on (Schottgen, Hor. Hebr. i, 1126). The literal Babyl-on was the beginner and supporter of tyranny and idolatry; first by Nimrod and Ninus, and afterward by Nephenes and Nebuchadnezzar. Therefore, she is accused of magical enchantments from her youth or fancy, i.e. from her very first origin as a city or nation. This city and its whole empire were taken by the Persians under Cyrus; the Persians were subdued by the Macedonians, and the Macedonians by the Romans; so that Rome succeeded to the power of Old Babyl-on.
It was her method to adopt the worship of the false deities she had conquered; so that by her own acts she becomes the heiress and successor of all the Babyonian idolatry, and of all that was introduced into it by the intermediate successors of Babylon, and consequently of all the idolatry of the earth.
See Revela-

Further, that Babylon is Rome is evident from the explanation given by the angel in Rev. xvii, 18, where it is expressly said to be "that great city which ruleth over the kings of the earth;" no other city but Rome being in the exercise of such power at the time when the vision was seen. That Constantinople is not meant by Babylon is plain also from what Mede has stated (Works, p. 922): "The seven heads of the beast says he) are by the angel made a double type, both of the seven hills where the woman sitteth, and of the seven sovereignties with which in a successive order the beast and his kingdom is a part, and ties to tie both beast and whore to Western Rome." Rome or Mystic Babylon (says the same author, p. 484) is called the "Great City," not from any reference to its extent, but because it was the queen of other cities.
See Rome.

Babylonia (Βαβυλωνία), a name for the southern portion of Mesopotamia, constituting the region of which the later city of the same name was alone is occasionally used in Scripture for the entire region; but its most usual designation is CHALDEA (q. v.). The Chaldæans proper, or Chaldeans, however, were probably originally from the mountainous region farther north, now occupied by the Kures (with which name, indeed, many find an etymological connection; see Goliath, or Alphar, p. 17; Rodiger, in the Zeitschr.
f. d. Kunde d. Morgenl. iii, 8), a portion of whom under the Assyrian sway may have migrated into Mesop-tamia (see Isa. xxiii, 13), and thus eventually become masters of the rich plain of Shinar (see Vitringa, ad Jees. i, 412 sq.; Gesenius, art. Chaldeer, in Erich and Gruber's Ewol. The original inhabitants now soevertheless appear to have been of the Shemitic family (see Adelung, Literatur, i, 314 sq.; Olahausen, Emend. sum A. T. p. 41 sq.); and their language belonged to the class of tongues spoken by that race, particularly to the Aramaic branch, and was indeed a dialect similar to that which is now called the Chaldean. See ARAMEAN LANGUAGE; CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.

The two words, Babylonia and Chaldea, were, however, sometimes used in another signification; Babyl-onia, as containing in an extended sense Assyria also and Mesopotamia, nearly all the countries which Assyria in the narrow sense included; and Chaldea, indicated, in a narrower signification, the south-western part of Babylonia between the Euphrates and Babylon (Strabo, xvi; Ptol.). In Hebrew, Babylonia bore the name of SHINAR (q. v.), or "the land of Shinar;" while "Babylon" (Psa. xxxvii, 13) and "the land of the Euphrates" (Isa. xxxv. 6; Ezek. xii, 19) seem to signify the empire of Babylon. It is in the latter sense that we shall here treat it. See CHAL-DEANS.

1. Geography and general Description.—This province of Middle Asia was bordered on the north by Mesopotamia, on the east by the Tigris, on the south by the Persian Gulf, and on the west by the Arabian Desert. On the north it began at the point where the Euphrates and Tigris approach each other, and extended to their common outlet in the Persian Gulf, pretty nearly comprising the country now designated Iraq Arab. The climate is temperate and salubrious.
The country in ancient times was very populous, especially in the valley of the Euphrates. Timber is not produced. Many parts have springs of naphtha.
As rain is infrequent, even in the winter months, the country owes its fruitfulness to the annual overflow of the Euphrates and the Tigris, whose waters are conveyed over the land by means of canals. Quintus Curtilis (1, 5) declares that the country between the Euphrates and the Tigris was covered with so rich a soil that the cattle were driven from their pastures lest they should be destroyed by satiety and fatness.
During the three great empires of the East, no tract of the whole appears to have been so reputable for ferility and riches in the district of Babylonia, which rose in the main from the proper management of the mighty river which flowed through it. Herodotus mentions that, when reduced to the rank of a province, it yielded a revenue to the kings of Persia which comprised half their income. The terms in which the Scriptures describe its natural as well as its acquired supremacy, shows the imperial character of the country in the same facts. They call it "Babylon, the glory of kings; the beauty of the Chaldean excellency; the lady of kingdoms, given to pleasure; that dwelleth carelessly, and saith in her heart I am, and there is none else beside me." But now, in the expressive and inimitable language of the same book, may it be said, "She sits as a widow on the ground. There is no more a throne for thee, O daughter of the Chaldeans!" As for the abundance of the country, it has vanished as clean away as if "the besom of desolation" had swept it from north to south, the whole land, from Ecbatana of Bagdad to the farthest reach of sight, lying a melancholy waste.

In order to defend the country against hostile attacks from its neighbors, northward from Babylonia, between the two rivers, a wall was built, which is known under the name of the Median Wall (Xen.
Anab. ii, 4, 12).—The Babylarians were famous for the manufacture of cloth and carpets; they also excellled in making perfumes in carvings and working in precious stones. They were a commercial as well as manufacturing people, and carried on a very extensive trade alike by land and by sea. Babylon was indeed a commercial depot between the Eastern and the Western world (Ezek. xvii, 4; Isa. xiii, 14).
See Cotton. Thus vast quantities never delivered by art, Babylonia became the first abode of social order and the cradle of civilization. Here first arose a powerful empire—here astronomy was first cultivated—here measures and weights were first employed. Herodotus has noticed the Chaldeans as a tribe of priests (i, 28); Diodorus (i, 28) as a separate caste under Belus, an Egyptian priest; while the book of Daniel refers to them as astrologers, magicians, and Chaldeans, but there can be little doubt, as laid down by Gesenius (Jesec. xxiii, 13), that it was the name of a distinct nation, if not, as Heren (Manual of Anc. Hist. p. 28) has maintained, the name of the northern nomades in general. In connection with Babylon, the Chaldeans are to be regarded as a conquering nation as well as a learned people; they introduced a correct method of reckoning time, and began their reign with Nabonassar, B.C. 747. There is a scriptural reference to the proud period in the history of the Chaldeans when learned men filled the streets and the temples of Nineveh and Babel: "Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this people was a little one before their inhabitants increased, and they dwelt in the wilderness: they set up the towers thereof, they raised up the palaces thereof; and he brought it to ruin" (Isa. xxiii, 13). Babylonians, during this period, was "the land of the Chaldeans," the same as that into which the children of Judah were carried away captive (Jer. xxiv, 5).—Kito, s. v.

II. History of the Babylonian Empire.—The history of Babylon itself mounts up to a time not very much later than the Flood. See Babel. The native historian seems to have possessed authentic records of his country for above 2000 years before the conquest by Alexander (Berosus, Progym. 11); and Scripture represents the "beginning of the kingdom" as belonging to the time of Nimrod, the grandson of Ham, and the great-grandson of Noah (Gen. x, 6-10). Of Nimrod no trace has been found in the Babylonian remains, unless he is identical with the god Bel of the Babylonian Pantheon, and so with the Greek Belus, the hero-founder of the city. This identity is possible, and indeed the most ancient records appear to show that the primitive inhabitants of the country were really Cushite, i.e. identical in race with the early inhabitants of Southern Arabia and of Ethiopia. The seat of government at this early time was, as has been stated, in lower Babylonia, Erech (Warka), and Ur (Myceria) being the capitals, and Babylon (if built) being of no consequence. The country was called Shinar (נֵגָר), and the people the Akkadim (comp. Accad of Gen. x, 10). Of the art of this period we have specimens in the ruins of Mugheir and Warka, the remains of which date from at least the 20th century before our era. We find the use of kiln-baked as well as of sun-dried bricks already begun; we find writing practiced, for the bricks are stamped with the names and titles of the kings; we find the ancient practice employed to support buildings, and we have probable indications of the system of erecting lofty buildings in stages. On the other hand, mortar is unknown, and the bricks are laid either in clay or in bitumen (comp. Gen. xi, 2); they are rudely moulded, and of various shapes and sizes; sun-dried bricks predominate, and some large buildings are composed entirely of them; in these reed-matting occurs at intervals, apparently used to protect the mass from disintegration. There is no trace of ornament in the erections of this date, which were imposing merely by their size and solidity.

The first important change which we are able to trace in the external condition of Babylon is its subjection to Assyrria. The influence of Assyrria, the neighboring kingdom of Elam or Susiana. Berosus, in the document containing the history of a first Chaldean dynasty consisting of eleven kings, whom he probably represented as reigning from B.C. 2234 to B.C. 1576. At the last mentioned date he said there was a change, and a new dynasty succeeded, consisting of 23 kings, who reigned 456 years (from B.C. 1576 to B.C. 1518). It is thought that this transition may mark the invasion of Babylonia from the East, and the establishment of Elamitic influence in the country, under Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiiv), whose representative appears as a conqueror in the inscriptions. Amraphel, king of Shinar, and Arisoch, king of Ellasar and Titi, would be "friendly princes," states Chedorlaomer had subjected, while he himself may have become the founder of the new dynasty, which, according to Berosus, continued on the throne for above 450 years. From this point the history of Babylon is almost a blank for above twelve centuries. Except in the mention of the plundering of Job by the Chaldeans (Job iii, 19), nothing definite is known of the events of this period. It is possible that some of the events which Achen quoted (Job, vii, 21), Scripture is silent with regard to the Babylonians from the time of Abraham to that of Hezekiah. Berosus covered this space with three dynasties; one (which has been already mentioned) of 49 Chaldean kings, who reigned 456 years; another of 9 Arab kings, who reigned 245 years; and a third of 49 Assyrian monarchs, who held dominion for 596 years; but nothing beyond this bare outline has come down to us on his authority concerning the period in question. The monumental records of the country furnish a series of names, the reading of which is very uncertain, which may be arranged with a degree of probability in chronological order, apparently belonging to the first of these three dynasties. Of the second no traces have been hitherto discovered. The third would seem to be identical with the Upper Dynasty of Assyria, of which some account has been given in the article Assyria. It would appear, then, that the Babylonians, after having been under Chaldean dynasty which ruled for 224 years (Brandis, p. 47), and a second dynasty of Elamitic Chaldeans who ruled for a further period of 458 years, fell wholly under Semitic influence, becoming subject first to Arabia for two centuries and a half and then to Assyria for above five centuries, and not regaining even a qualified independence till the time marked by the close of the Upper and the formation of the Lower Assyrian empire. This is the conclusion which seems naturally to follow from the abstract which is all that we possess of Berosus; and doubtless it is to a certain extent true. But the statement is too broad to be exact; and the monuments show that this Babylon was at no time absorbed into Assyria, or even for very many ages togetherr a submissio vassali. Assyria, which she had colonized during the time of the second or great Chaldean dynasty, to which she had given letters and the arts, and which she had held in subjection for many hundreds of years, passed in her turn to be the predominant Mesopotamian power, and the glory of Babylon in consequence suffered eclipse. But she had her native kings during the whole of the Assyrian period, and she frequently contended with her great neighbour, being sometimes even the aggressor. Though much sunk from her former greatness, she continued to be the second power in Asia, and retained a vitality which at a later date enabled her to become once more the head of an empire.

The line of Babylonian kings becomes exactly known to us from the year B.C. 747. An astronomical work of the geographer Ptolemy has preserved to us a doxographical importance of which the preparative chronology is scarcely possible to exaggerate. The Canon of Ptolemy, as it is called, gives us the succession of Babylonian monarchs, with the exact length of the reign of each, from the year B.C. 747, when Nabonassar mounted the throne, to B.C. 331, when the last Persian king was deposed by Alexander. The document is of course not accurate in accordance with the statements of Scripture, always vindicated to itself a high authority in the eyes of Christian chronologists, has recently been confirmed in so many points by the inscriptions that its authentic character is established beyond all possibility of cavil or dispute. As the basis of all the rest, the interpretation of this inscription to Cyrus, it seems proper to transcribe the earlier definition of it in this place. [The accession gis]

Of Nabonassar, the first king in Tolemy's list, nothing can be said to be known except the fact, reported by Berosus, that he destroyed all the annals of his predecessors for the purpose of compelling the Babylonians to date from himself (Pragm. 11 a). It has been conjectured that he was the husband or son of Semiramis, and owed to her possession of the throne the royal title which he retained as proof. It rests mainly upon a synchronism obtained from Herodotus, who makes Semiramis a Babylonian queen, and places her five generations (167 years) before Ntocris, the mother of the last king. The Assyrian discoveries have shown that there was a Semiramis about this time, but they furnish no evidence of her connection with Babylon, which still continues uncertain. The immediate successors of Nabonassar are still more obscure than himself. Absolutely nothing beyond the brief notation of the canon has reached us concerning Nadius (or Nabius), Chelinoth (or Chelinosus), and Porus, or Elieusus, who certainly cannot be the Tyrian king of that name mentioned by Menander (Ap. Joseph. Ant. ix, 14, 2). Mardocemulus, on the contrary, is a monarch to whom great interest attaches. He is undoubtedly the Merodach-Baladan, or Berosach-Baladan (q. v.) of Scripture, and was a personage of great consequence, reigning himself for the first time, for 19 years, and then being re-instated in his former dignity by his son. He appears to have been independent of Babylon at this period, while the interest which he felt in an astronomical phenomenon (2 Chron. xxxii, 31) harmonizes with the character of a native Chaldean king which appears to belong to him. The Assyrian inscriptions show that after reigning 12 years Merodach-Baladan was deprived of his throne and driven into banishment by Sargon, who appears to have placed Arceanus (his son?) upon the throne as viceroy, a position which he maintained for five years. A time of trouble then ensued, estimated in the canon at two years, during which various pretenders assumed the crown, among them a certain Harisa, or Acisa, who reigned for a head of a month, and Merodach-Balanad, who held the throne for half a year (Polyhist. ap. Euseb.). Sennacherib, bent on re-establishing the influence of Assyria over Babylon, proceeded against Merodach-Balanad (as he informs us) in his first year, and having de-throned him, placed an Assyrian named Belô, or Bél Rogers, who reigned for three years. At the end of this time, the party of Merodach-Balanad still giving trouble, Sennacherib descended again into Babylonia, once more overran it, removed Belô, and placed his eldest son—who appears in the canon as Arceanus—upon the throne. Arceanus reigned for five years, when he was de-throned by a certain Ribgelus, who reigned for one year; after which Masisemorodocus held the throne for four years. Nothing more is known of these kings, and it is uncertain whether they were viceroy or independent native monarchs. They were contemporary with Sennacherib, whose reign belongs also to the second interregnum, extending to eight years, which the canon interposes between the reigns of Masisemorodocus and Asaradocus. In Asaradocus critical eyes long ago detected Esarhaddon, Sennacherib's son and successor; and it may be regarded as certain from the inscriptions that this king ruled in person over both Babylon and Babylonia, having found the country at peace and prosperous under his predecessors at their respective capitals. Hence we may understand how Manasseh, his contemporary, came to be "carried by the captains of the king of Assyria to Babylon" instead of to Nineveh, as would have been done in any other reign. See Esarhaddon. Saoduchusus and Cinsiladasus (or Cinneladasus), his brother (Polyhist.), the successors of Asaradocus, are kings of whose history we know nothing. Probably they were viceroy under the last Assyrian monarchs, who are represented by Abydenus (ap. Euseb.). as retaining their authority over Babylon up to the time of the last siege of Nineveh. With Asaradocus, the successor of Cinsiladasus, and the father of Nebuchadnezzar, a new era in the history of Babylon commences. According to Abydenus, who probably drew his information from Berosus, he was appointed to the government of Babylon by the last Assyrian king, at the moment when the Medes were about to make a fresh attack; whereupon, betraying the trust reposed in him, he went over to the enemy, arranged a marriage between his son Nebuchadnezzar and the daughter of the Median leader, and joined in the last siege of the city. See Nebuchadnezzar. On the success of the confederates (B.C. 625) Babylon became not only an independent kingdom, but an empire; the southern and western portions of the Assyrian territory were assigned to Nabopolassar in the partition of the spoils which followed on the conquest, and thereby the Babylonian dominion became extended over the whole valley of the Euphrates as far as the Taurus range, over Syria, Phoenicia, Palistina, and Cilicia. It was a strong and powerful kingdom. Thus, among others, the Jews passed quietly and almost without remark from one feudal head to another, exchanging dependency on Assyria for dependence on Babylon, and continuing to pay to Nabopolassar the same tribute and service which they had previously rendered to the Assyrians. Friendly relations seem to have been maintained with Media throughout the reign of Nabopolassar, who led or sent a contingent to help Cyaxares in his Lydian war, and acted as mediator in the negotiations by which that war was concluded to Herod, i, 74). At a later date hostilities broke out with Egypt. Necho, the son of Psammatik I, about the year 601, invaded the Babylonians, who attacked him on the south-west, and made himself master of the entire tract between his own country and the Euphrates (2 Kings xxiii, 29, and xxi, 7). Nabopolassar was now advanced in life, and not able to take the field in person (Beros. Pragm. 14). He therefore sent his son, Nebuchadnezzar, with the help of the Egyptians, and the battle of Carchemish, which soon followed, restored to Babylon the former limits of her territory (comp. 2 Kings xxiv, 7 with Jer. xlvi, 2-15). Nebuchadnezzar pressed forward and had reached Egypt, when news of his father's death recalled him, and hastily returning to Babylon, he was fortunate in being there without any struggle, acknowledged king (B.C. 604). A complete account of the works and exploits of this great monarch—by far the most remarkable of all the Babylonian kings—will be given in the article NERICHADNEZZAR.
It is enough to note in this place that he was great both in peace and in war, but greater in the former. Besides recovering the possession of Syria and Palestine, and carrying off the Jews after repeated rebellions into captivity, he restored Phoenicia, besieged and took Tyre, and ravaged, if he did not actually conquer Egypt. But by and by he had lost the large part of his native land—as the builder and restorer of almost all her cities and temples—that this monarch obtained that great reputation which has been handed down his name traditionally in the East on a par with those of Nimrod, Solomon, and Alexander, and made it still a familiar term in the mouths of the people of Babylonia as long as he reigned and held it; as his memorial upon the earth one half the amount of building that was erected by this king. The ancient ruins and the modern towns of Babylonia are alike built almost exclusively of his bricks.
Babylon itself, the capital, was peculiarly the object of his attention. It was here that, besides repairing the walls and restoring the temples, he constructed that magnificent palace, which, with its triple enclosure, its hanging gardens, its plated pillars, and its rich ornamentation of enamelled brick, was regarded in ancient times as one of the seven wonders of the world (Strab. xvi, 1, § 5). NERICHADNEZZAR died B.C. 561, having reigned 43 years, and was succeeded by Evil-Merodach, his son, who is called in the Canon IIIbarnādumus. This prince, who, in the year that he began to reign, did lift up the head of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, out of prison' (2 Kings xxv, 27), was murdered, after having held the crown for two years only, by Nergal-sarru, brother-in-law. See EVIL-MERODAC. NERIGLUSHAR — the Nergal-sarru of the Canon—is (apparently) identical with the "Nargal-sar-ezer, Rab-Mag" of Jeremiah (xxxix, 3, 13, 14). He bears this title, which has been translated "chief of the Magi" (Gesenius), or "chief priest" (Coll. Rawlinson), in the inscriptions, and calls himself the son of a "king of Babylon." Some writers have considered him identical with "Darius the Mede" (Larcher, Conringius, Bouhier); but this is improbable [see DARIUS THE MEDE], and he must rather be regarded as a Babylonian of high rank, who, having married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzer, rather than a Babylonian king. He was, however, quite popular by Evil-Merodach unpopular with his subjects, murdered him, and became his successor. NERIGLUSHAR built the palace at Babylon, which seems to have been placed originally on the west bank of the river. He was probably advanced in life at his accession, and thus reduced to death by his death, and left the crown to his son Laborossoarchod. This prince, though a mere lad at the time of his father's death, was allowed to ascend the throne without difficulty; but when he had reigned nine months he became the victim of a conspiracy among his friends and connections, who, professing to detect in him symptoms of a bad disposition, instigated the people, and seized him and put him to death. NABONIDUS (or Latorynus), one of the conspirators, succeeded; he is called by Berosus "a certain Nabonidus, a Babylonian" (ap. Joseph. Ap. i, 21), by which it would appear that he was not a member of the royal family; and this is likewise evident, in which he became an impostor for his father the rank of "Rab-Mag." Herodotus seems to have been mistaken in supposing him (i, 188) the son of a great queen, Nitocris, and (apparently) of a former king, Latorynus (Nebuchadnezzer?). Indeed, it may be doubted whether the Babylonian Nitocris of Herodotus is really a historical personage. His authority is the sole argument for his being Nitocris. It is difficult to credit against the silence of Scripture.
Berosus, the Canon, and the Babylonian manuscripts, She may perhaps have been the wife of Nebuchadnezzer, but in that case she must have been wholly unconnected with Nabonidus, who certainly bore no relation to that monarch.
NABONIDUS, or Latorynus (as he was called by the Greeks), mounted the throne in the year B.C. 555, very shortly before the war broke out between Cyrus and Croesus. He entered into alliance with the latter of these monarchs against the former, and, had the struggle been prolonged, he would have been forced into Asia Minor. Events proceeded too rapidly to allow of this; but Nabonidus had provoked the hostility of Cyrus by the mere fact of the alliance, and felt at once that sooner or later he would have to resist the attack of an avenging army. He probably employed his long and peaceful reign of 17 years in preparations for the defense of his country, and for theLibrary of Nineveh, which Herodotus ascribes to his mother (i, 185), and accumulating in the town abundant stores of provisions (ib. c. 190).
In the year B.C. 589 the attack came.
Cyrus advanced at the head of his irresistible hordes, but wintert upon the Diyalek or Gyndes, making his final approaches in the summer. Nabonidus appears by the inscriptions to have shortly before this associated with him in the government of the kingdom his son, Bel-shar-ezer or Belshazzar; on the approach of Cyrus, therefore, he took the field himself at the head of his army, leaving his son to command in the city. In this way, by help of a recent discovery, the account of Berosus and the book of Daniel, hitherto regarded as hopelessly conflicting—may be reconciled. See BELSHAZZAR. Nabonidus engaged the army of Cyrus, but was defeated and forced to shut himself up in the neighboring town of Borsippa (marked now by the Birs-Nimrud), where he continued till Belshazzar guarded the city, but, over-confident in its strength, kept insufficient watch, and recklessly indulging in untimely and impious festivities (Dan. v), allowed the enemy to enter the town by the channel of the river (Herod. i, 191; Xen. Cyrop. vii. 7). Belshazzar was thus taken by a surprise, as Herodotus had prophesied (ii, 81)—by an army of Medes and Persians, as intimated 170 years earlier by Isaiah (xxxi, 1-9), and, as Jeremiah had also foretold (ii, 39), during a festival. In the carcase which ensued upon the taking of the town, Belshazzar was slain (Dan. v, 30).
Nabonidus, on receiving the intelligence, submitted, and was not harmed either in person, or in property, who not only spared his life, but gave him estates in Carmania (Beros. ut sup.; comp. Abyss. Fragm. 9).
Such is the general outline of the siege and capture of Babylon by Cyrus, as derivable from the fragments of Berosus, illustrated by the account in Daniel, and confirmed by the recent discovery by aid of the dead heb., obtained recently from the monuments, of the relationship between Belshazzar and Nabonidus. It is scarelessly necessary to remark that it differs in many points from the accounts of Herodotus and Xenophon; but the latter of these two writers is in his Cyropaedia a mere romancer, and the former is very imperfectly acquainted with the history of the Babylonians. The native writer, whose information was drawn from authentic and contemporary documents, is far better authority than either of the Greek authors, the earlier of whom visited Babylon nearly a century after its capture by Cyrus, when the tradition had doubtless become current.
According to the book of Daniel, it would seem as if Babylon was taken on this occasion, not by Cyrus, king of Persia, but by a Median king named Darius (v, 31). The question of the identity of this personage with any Median or Babylonian king known to us from profane sources will be discussed under DARIUS.
Here, however, it may be mentioned that Scripture does not really conflict on this point with profane authorities, since there is sufficient indication from the terms used by the sacred writer, that "the Mede," whoever he may have been, was, real conqueror, nor a king who ruled in his own right, but a monarch intrusted by another with a certain delegated authority (see Dan. vi, 31, and ix, 1). With the conquest by Cyrus commenced the decay and ruin of Babylon. The "broad walls" were then to some extent "broken down" (Beros. Fr. 14), and the "high gates" probably "burned with fire" (Jer. ii, 58). The process, that is to say, was ruined; though it is not to be supposed that the laborious and useful task of entirely demolishing the gigantic fortifications of the place was attempted or even contemplated by the conqueror. Babylon was weakened, but it continued a royal residence not only during the lifetime of Darius the Mede, but through the entire period of the Persian Empire. The Persian kings held their court at Babylon during the larger portion of the year, and at the time of Alexander's conquest it was still the second, if not the first city of the empire. It had, however, suffered considerably on more than one occasion subsequent to the time of Cyrus. Twice in the reign of Darius (Behist. Ins.), and once in that of Xerxes (Ctes. Pers. § 29), it had risen against the Persians, and made an effort to regain its independence. After each rebellion its defences were weakened, and during the long period of profound peace which the Persian empire enjoyed from the reign of Xerxes to that of Darius Codomannus they were allowed to go completely to ruin. The Persians also suffered grievously from neglect. Alexander found the great temple of Belus in so ruined a condition that it would have required the labor of 10,000 men for two months even to clear away the rubbish with which it was encumbered (Strabo, xvi, 1, 5). His designs for the restoration of the temple and the general embellishment of the city were frustrated by his untimely death, and the removal of the seat of empire to Antioch under the Seleucids gave the finishing blow to the prosperity of the place. The great city of Seleucia, which soon after arose in its neighborhood, not only drew away its population, but was actually constructed of materials derived from its buildings (Plin. H. N. vi, 30). Since then Babylon has been a quarry from which all the tribes in the vicinity have perpetually derived the bricks with which they have built their cities, and (besides Seleucia) Ctesiphon, Al-Moalain, Bagdad, Kufa, Kerbelah, Hilah, and numerous other towns have been built on the ruins of the city. "The beauty of the Chaldees excellency," has thus emphatically "become bposable" (Jer. ii, 87)—she is truly an "astonishment and a hissing, without an inhabitant." Her walls have altogether disappeared—they have "fallen" (Jer. ii, 44), been "thrown down" (I, 15), been "broken down" (Ili, 11), and "the light of day is upon her waters" (I, 39); for the system of irrigation, on which, in Babylonia, fertility altogether depends, has long been laid aside; "her cities are everywhere a "desolation" (II, 43), her "land a wilderness;" "wild beasts of the desert" (jackals) "lie there," and "owls dwell there" (comp. Layard, Nis. and Bab. p. 484, with Isa. xlix, 20, 21, and Jer. i, 29). The native regard the whole site as haunted, and neither will the "Arab pitch tent nor the shepherd fold sheep there."—Smith.

After the exile many of the Jews continued settled in Babylonia; the capital even contained an entire quarter of them (comp. Susann. 5 sq.; 1 Pet. v, 18; Joseph. Antiq. Antiq. vi, 5, 4; Jer. ii, 19, 28; Opp. ii, 578, 587; and after the destruction of Jerusalem these Babylonian Jews established schools of considerable repute, although the natives were stigmatized as "Babyloniens" by the bigoted Jewish population (Talm. Babyl. Joma, fol. 66). Traces of their learning exist not only in such rabbinical literature that emanates from the east, but in the Talmud. Layard has recently discovered several earthen bowls covered with their Hebrew inscriptions in an early character, copies and translations of which are given in his Bab. and Nin. p. 436 sq.

Babylonián, son of Babel, 2, 32, 33; son of Babel or Babylon, Ezek. xxiii, 15, 17, 23; Chald. Babay, 2, 33, Ezra iv, 9; Gr. Babelinos, Bel 3), an inhabitant of BABYLON or BABYLONIA.

Babylonian Garment. Ašd retu Shamár; Sept. ποδήθες with Vulg. polluum coccinem, a Babylonian mantle [see ATTIRE], i.e. a large robe or tunic. A number of figurines of men and women are also of this type, worn in rich colors (comp. Pliny, Hist. Nat. viii, 48), such as were fabricated at Babylon (q. v.); hence a valuable piece of clothing in general (Josh. vii, 21). See EMBROIDERY.

Ba'ca, Valley of (Heb. 'mek hab-Baka, 2, 4, vale of [the] weeping; Sept. καθαρίζων τοῦ θαλα- πούλων, Vulg. Vallis inclyturnam), a valley apparently somewhere in Palestine, through which the exiled Psalmist sees in vision the pilgrims passing in their march toward the sanctuary of Jehovah at Zion (Psa. lxxiii, 6). The passage seems to contain a play, in the manner of Hebrew poetry, on the name of the trees (בּקָא, bekah); see MULBERRY) from which the valley probably derived its name, and the "tears" (בּקָא, bek) shed by the pilgrims in their joy at their approach to Zion. These tears are conceived to be so abundant as to turn the dry valley in which the baka-trees delighted (so Lengerke, Anim., p. 155) into a springy or marshy place (בּקָא). That a real locality was in the mind of the Psalmist is most probable, from the inspection of the use of the name (comp. Prov. xxv, 1, Thes. p. 205). A valley of the same name (Beckah) still exists in the Sinaic district (Burckhardt, p. 619); but this, as well as the valley near Mecca (Niebuhr, Beschr. p. 383), is entirely out of the region demanded by the context. Some regard this valley as a valley (cf. Beckah). The most likely suggestion is that this spot is far from possessing the dreariness and drought on which the point of the Psalmist's allusion depends. The rendering of the Targum is גהלמה, i.e. the Ge-Hinnom or ravine below Mount Zion. This locality agrees well with the mention of bekaim-trees in 2 Sam. v, 23. To the majority of Interpreters, however, it does not appear necessary to understand that there is any reference to a valley actually called by this name. The Psalmist in exile, or at least at a distance from Jerusalem, is speaking of the privileges and happiness of those who are permitted to make the usual pilgrimages to that city in order to worship Jehovah in the Temple; and it is possible that there is any reference to a valley actually called by this name. Baccalaureus (i. e. Bachelor), one who takes a first degree in divinity, arts, medicine, or civil law. This degree was first introduced in the thirteenth century by Pope Gregory IX. Rhenanus maintains that the name was borrowed from the baccalureus, the fisherman who, at the hand of the new graduate. The usual derivation is that given by Alciatus, viz. bacca laurea, a laurel berry; but the Spanish bachiller, which means at once a barber and a master of arts, taken in conjunction with the Portuguese bacarei and bacilo, a shoot or twig of the apple tree, Latin baculus, a stick or shoot, and the French bachellet, a damsel, seem to point to its original and generic meaning, which probably was a person shooting or protruding from one stage of his career into another more advanced. With this general signification, all the special meanings of the word given by Du Cange (Glosarium, s. v.) seem to have some analogy. 1. It was used, he says, to indicate a person who cultivated certain portions of church lands called baccalariae—which he supposed to have been a corruption of casaelaria—a fee belonging to an inferior vessel, or to one who had not attained to a full feudal recognition. 2. It indicated ecclesiastics of a lower dignity than the other members of the religious brotherhood, i. e. monks who were still in the first stage of monkhood. 3. It was used by later writers to indicate persons in the first or probationary stage of knighthood; i. e. not esquires simply, but knights who, from poverty and the insufficient number of their retainers, from their possessing, perhaps, only the boccalaria above referred to, or from monastic, yet not yet raised their banners in the field (lem banniere). 4. It was adopted to indicate the first grade or step in the career of university life. As an academical title, it was first introduced by Pope Gregory IX in the thirteenth century into the University of Paris to denote a candidate who had undergone his first academical trials, and was authorized to give lectures, but was not yet admitted to the rank of an independent master or doctor. At a later period it was introduced into the other faculties as the lowest academical honor, and adopted by the other universities of Europe. 5. In the Middle Ages two kinds of bachelors were recognized in theological studies, viz. Baccalaurii cursores and Baccalaurii formati. The former were those who, after six years of study, were admitted to perform their courses. There were two courses, one in explaining the Bible for three years, and the other in explaining four years the Master of the Bible; consequently, those who performed the biblical course were called Baccalaurii biblici; the others, Baccalaurii sententiarii; while those who had finished both courses were known as Baccalaurii formati.—Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v.; Herzog, Real-Encyclopaedie, Suppl. i. 434; Hillicher, De nomine Baccalauri (Lips. 1752); Gottsched, Geschichte Baccalauri (Lips. 1788); Landen, Ecles. Baccalaurii, a society in the Church of Rome, founded in Italy by one Baccanari after the suppression of the Jesuits in 1778. Its object was to restore the order under a new name and form. Pius VI favored the organization, and it spread into Austria, Holland, and England. In 1814 the members were united with the re-established order of Jesuits. See Jesuits.

Bacchides (Bacchides, son of Bacchus), a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes (Josephus, Ant. xii, 10, 2) and governor of Mesopotamia (iv ἐν παντὶ τοῦ ποταμοῦ, 1 Mac. vii, 8), who was commissioned by Demetrius Soter to investigate the charges which Alcimus (q. v.) preferred against Judas Maccabaeus. He confirmed Alcimus in his veracity and left him; and it was interpreted by him as a sign of the extreme part of the Asiatics (q. v.), he returned to Antioch. After the expulsion of Alcimus and the defeat and death of Nicana, he led a second expedition into Judea. Judas Macca- beaus fell in the battle which ensued at Laisa (B.C. 161), and Baccihides re-established the supremacy of the Seleucidae (1 Mac. xii, 5, 6; Ant. xii, 2, 3; Joseph, Ant. xiii, 1, 1). He next attempted to surprise Jonathan, who had assumed the leadership of the national party after the death of Judas; but Jonathan escaped across the Jordan. Baccides then placed garrisons in several important positions, and took hostages for the Seleucidae. In the present government, after completing the pacification of the country (Joseph, Ant. xiii, 1, 5), he returned to Demetrias (B.C. 160). After two years he came back at the request of the Syrian faction, in the hope of overpowering Jonathan and Simon, who still maintained a small force in the desert; but, meeting with ill success, he turned against those who had induced him to undertake the expedition, and sought an honorable retreat. When this was known by Jonathan he sent envoys to Baccides and concluded a peace (B.C. 158) with him, acknowledging him as governor under the Syrian king, while Baccides pledged himself not to enter the land again, a condition which was fully observed (1 Mac. xiii, 24; Joseph, Ant. xii, 1, 6; xiii, 1, 1; comp. 2 Macc. viii, 30).

He must have been a different person from the Baccides, the general of Antiocus Epiphanes in charge of the fortresses of Judea, whom the Ammonian priest Matthias, with his sons, slew with their daggers (Joseph. Wars, i, 1, 2).—Smith, s. v.

Bacchus rūs (Bacchius rūs; Vulg. Zaccarus), given as one of the "holy singers" (τῶν ἁγνάκαρων) who had taken the foreign wife (1 Edcr. i, 40; but no name corresponding with this is added in the genuine list (Exa, x, 24).

Bacchus, the Latinized form (in the Auth. Vers. 2 at Macc. vi, 7; xiv, 38) of the heathen deity called by the Greeks Dionysus (q. v.). The latter occurs also in (the so-called) 3 Macc. ii, 29. In all these instances this mythic deity is named in connection with circumstances which would indicate that he was an object of special abhorrence to the Jews; for in the first it is stated that the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus; in the second, the erection of a temple to him is threatened in order to compel the priests to deliver up Judas to Nicana; and in the third, the branding with the yew leaf, sacred to him, is inflicted on them by way of punishment. This falls in with Tactitus's account, therefore, it is difficult to take them to be the priests of the Jews accompanied their singing with flute and cymbals, and had garlands of ivy, and a golden vine was found in the Temple, they worshipped Bacchus, for that this was not at all in accordance with their statutes (nequaquam congruentibus institutis, Ηϊου, v, 6). As Bacchus was the god of wine, and in general of earthly festivity and jollity, and as his rites sanctioned the most frantic excesses of revelry and tumultuous excitement, he would necessarily be an object of abhorrence to all who believed in and worshipped Jehovah. Probably, therefore, the fact that some pagans associated with the Jewish worship had, as mentioned by Tactus, and still more fully by Plutarch (Symposiæ, iv, qu. 6), led to the supposition that they revered Bacchus, may have produced in their minds a more determined recoil from and hatred of all pertaining to his name. In the pagan system Bacchus is the god of wine, and his representations as the son of Jupiter, the son of Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. His mother perished in the burning embraces of the god, whom she persuaded to visit her with his attribute of royalty, the thunderbolt; the embryo child was sewn up in Jupiter's thigh, whence, in due time, he was produced by it into light; and on his birth he indicated a signal vengeance on the extreme party of the Asiatics (q. v.), he returned to Antioch. After the expul-sell for a slave, into dolphins; his revenge on the scolding Pentheus, and his invasion and conquest of inocata. Bacchus was generally figured as a young man effeminate appearance (Σχῆμα ποτεφορός, Eurip. Bacc.
858; Euseb. Chron. p. 29), with a garland of ivy binding his long hair (Strabo, xv, p. 1038); in his hand he bore a thyrsus, or rod wreathed with ivy, and at his feet lay his attendant panther. His companions were the Bacchantes, the Lena, the Naiads and Nymphs, etc., and especially Silenus. His worship seems to have arisen from that "striving after objectivity" (Wachsmuth, Helles. Alterthümek. ii, 2, p. 118), which is the characteristic of a primitive people.
The theatre of the Bacchantes, the sacred grove appears to have been the original seat of this religion, and it was introduced thence into Greece shortly after the colonization by the Ionians of the Asiatic coast of the Helles-pon. The admission of the identity of Osiris and Dionysus by Plutarch and other mythological theorists, as well as Herodotus's simple statement of the assertions of the Egyptian priests to that effect, is without proof of the common origin of the worship of this divinity in Egypt and Greece; but there is no doubt certain modifications of the Dionysiac rites took place when the commencement of the intercourse between the Ionians and the Egyptians (Pompey Cyclop.
a. xvii). The worship of Bacchus was intimately con-ected with that of Demeter, and under the name of Iacchus he was adored along with that goddess at Eleusis. Virgil invokes them together (Georg. i, 5) as the lights of the universe. According to the Egyptians, they were the joint rulers of the world below (Herod. h, 129). In a certain sense he is represented as sitting with her in a chariot drawn by male and female centaurs.

attributes of Bacchus, see Creuzer, Symbolik und My-thologie, pt. iii, bk. 5, ch. 2 of Moser's Abrégement.)

Bacchor (Bacisor; Vulg. Bacchor), apparently a whose detachment Dothierus belonged (2 Macc. xii, 85); or possibly it may have been only the title of one of the Jewish companies or squadrons.

The term is often applied to denote falling off or deformation in the practice of religion and the duties of Acts xxii. 21; 2 Thess. ii. 8; 1 Tim. iv. 1. This may be either partial or complete; partial, when it is in the heart, as Prov. xiv. 14; complete, as that described in Heb. vi.
4, etc.; x. 6, etc. On the latter passage Chrysostom observes: "When a house has a strong foundation, same as the foundation of the house, some of the beams break, or a wall wall, while the foundation and the main supports are not overwhelmed; so in religion, while a person maintains the true doctrines, and remains on the firm rock, though he fall, true repentance may restore him to the favor and image of God; but as in a house, when the foundation is bad, nothing can save the building from ruin; so, when heretical doctrines are admitted for a foundation, nothing can save the profeesor from destruction." It is important, in interpreting these passages, to keep it steadfastly in mind that the apostasy they speak of is not only moral, but doctrinal. See FALLING AWAY.

2. It is also used less accurately of a loss of fervor in religious feeling and of zeal in religious duty. In this sense it should be called partial backsliding, which must be distinguished from Apostasy (Apostasia), as the former may exist where there are good intentions on the whole; but the latter is a studied profession of appearing to be what we are not. The causes of backsliding are the cares of the world; improper connections; inattention to secret or closed duties; self-concealment and dependence; indulgence; listening to and parleying with temptations. A backslidden state is manifested by indifference to prayer and self-examination; trifling or unprofitable conversation; neglect of public ordinances; shunning the people of God; associating with the world; living a life of sin; neglect of the Bible; and often by gross immorality. The consequences of this awful state are—loss of character; loss of comfort; loss of usefulness; and loss of a well-grounded hope of future happiness. To avoid this state, or recover from it, we should beware of the first appearance of sin; be much in prayer; attend the ordinances; and unite with the people of God. We should consider the awful instances of apostasy, as Saul, Judas, Demas, etc.; the many warnings we have of it, Matt. xxiv.
13; Heb. x. 38; Luke ix. 62; how it grieves the Holy Spirit; and how wretched it makes us; above all things, our dependence should be on God, that we may always be directed by his Spirit, and kept by his power.—Watson, Theol. Dictionary, s. v.; Buck, Theol.
Dictionary, s. v.; Clarke, Theology (by Dunn), p. 369.

UTION.

Backus, Azel D., president of Hamilton College, was born at Norwich, Conn., Oct. 13th, 1755.
While yet a boy he imbied infidel principles, but was reclaimed by the instructions of his uncle, the Rev.
Charles Backus. He graduated A.B. at Yale in 1787.
He was licensed in 1789, and succeeded Dr. Bellamy as pastor at Bethlehem in 1791. Here he labored faithfully, both as pastor and as principal of a classical school, till 1817, when he was elected president of Hamilton College. After five years of successful administration, his health failed, and he died in 1821.
He was a man of good endowments and great industry.—Sprague, ANNALS, p. 287.

Backus, Charles D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born in Norwich, Conn., Nov. 5, 1749. He lost his parents in his childhood, but, as he early discovered a love of learning, his friends assisted him to obtain a liberal education. He graduated A.B. at Yale in 1769, and, after studying theology under Dr. Hart of Preston, was licensed in 1778. In 1774 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Somers, where he remained until his death, December 30, 1803. During the course of his ministry nearly fifty young men studied theology under his roof, and among them were Dr. Winslow, of Andover, President Moore, of Amherst, and others. His reputation brought him invitations to the chair of theology at Dartmouth, and also at Yale, but he declined both calls. He published a number of occasional sermons.
—Sprague, ANNALS, p. 61.

Backus, Isaac A.M., a distinguished Baptist minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., Jan. 9, 1794.
In 1746 he became a member of a Congregational church in Ticut, Middleborough, Mass. In 1749 a number of the members of Mr. Backus's church altered their sentiments with regard to baptism, and he at length united with them in opinion. He was immersed in 1781. For some years he held open communion, but afterward abandoned it. A Baptist church was duly constituted in 1756, and he was installed its pa-sor. He faithfully discharged his pastoral duties for more than half a century. To his labors during this long period the Baptists of America owe much of their success. He was a voluminous writer, and published, among other works, a History of the Baptists (3 vols.), and also an Abridgment of the same (1 vol.).
On one occasion he was seen in Spruce Street, v. 11, 66.

Bacon, Francis, Viscount St. Albans and Baron Verulam, one of the most celebrated philosophers of modern times, was born in London, Jan. 22, 1616.
His father and mother were both under Elizabeth, and a distinguished lawyer and statesman; his mother was a learned and pious woman, who had translated several ascetic works from Italian, and had taken part in the theological controversies of her time. Early in life he gave signs of extraordinary talent, and Queen Elizabeth used to call him playfully her young lord keeper. In his twelfth year he is said to have speculated on the laws of imagination, and in the next year he was matriculated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained for three years and a half. After the termination of his studies in 1577, his father sent him to France, under the protection of his uncle, Edward, Duke of Kent, to the French court. There he came in contact with a number of distinguished men, and laid out a plan for a reconstruction of the philosophical sciences. The death of his father recalled him to England in 1580, and, failing to get an office for which he applied, he devoted himself to the study of law. In 1583 he was called to the bar, in 1586 he was made a bencher, and in 1589, at the age of 28, counsel extraordinary to the queen.
Still he could not rise under Elizabeth, who rejected his claims for preference on the ground that he was "not very deep." As some compensation for his disappointment, Count Essex made him a present of Twickenham Court, worth about £1,600, and so beautiful that Bacon called it the Garden of Paradise.
Bacon, some years later, was charged with rewarding this disinterested kindness with ingratitude on the trial of Essex; but probably unjustly (see the Penny Cyclopadedia, s. v.). In 1595 he was returned to Parliament as member for the county, and greatly distinguished himself for parliamentary eloquence. After the accession to the throne of James I, he rapidly rose in capacity and influence. In 1603 he received the honor of knighthood, in 1604 he was appointed king's counsel, in 1607 solicitor general, in 1613 attorney general for the kingdom, and in 1618 he was appointed lord high chancellor, and in the same year raised to the peerage as Baron of Verulam. Three years later the title of Viscount of St.
Albans was conferred on him. From the same year, 1621, dates his fall. A committee of the House of Commons reported two cases of corruption against him, and before the close of the proceedings similar cases to the number of 24 were presented. When this was referred to the House of Peers he abandoned defence, confessed his guilt, and was sentenced, on May 3d, to a fine of £40,000, and to imprisonment in the Tower during the king's pleasure. The sentence proved a farce, and in a few months he was released from imprisonment after two days, and the fine was subsequently remitted, but he never recovered his standing. Only once he was afterward summoned to attend Parliament, and the remainder of his life was spent in humble circumstances and among the few friends whom adversity left him. He died at Fishbourne, July 9, 1626.
Bacon was the author of a philosophical system which is called after him the Baconian philosophy, and which has had a marked influence on the subsequent development of philosophy and of literature in general. "The sciences," he says, "have hitherto been in a most sad condition. Philosophy, wasted in empty and fruitless logomachies, has failed during so many centuries to bring out a single work or experiment of actual benefit to human life. Logic hitherto has served more to the establishment of error than to the investigation of truth. Whence all this? Why this penury of science? Simply because they have broken and danced naked before the curtain of mystery.
The blame of this is chargeable to many sources: first, the old and rooted prejudice that the human mind loses somewhat of its dignity when it busies itself much and continuously with experiments and material things; next, superstition and a blind religious zeal, which has so long held the most in the field of natural philosophy; again, the exclusive attention paid to morals and politics by the Romans, and since the Christian era to theology by every acute mind; still further, the great authority which certain philosophers have exercised, and the great reverence given to an-iquity; and, in fine, a want of courage, and a despair of overcoming the many and great difficulties which lie in the way of the investigation of nature.
All these causes have contributed to keep down the sciences. Hence they must now be renewed, and regenerated, and reformed in their most fundamental principles; there must now be found a new basis of knowledge, a new form of procedure, a new philosophical reformation of the sciences depends upon two conditions—objectively, upon the referring of science to experience and the philosophy of nature; and sub-jectively, upon the purifying of the sense and the intellect from all abstract theories and traditional prejudices. Both conditions furnish the correct method of natural science, which is nothing other than the method of induction. Upon a true induction depends all the soundness of the sciences." In these propositions the Baconian philosophy is contained. The historical significance of its founder is, therefore, in general this:
that he directed the attention and reflection of his contemporaries again upon the given actuality, upon nature; that he affirmed the necessity of experience, which had been formerly only a matter of accident, and made it as in and for itself an object of thought.
His merit consists in having brought up the principle of scientific empiricism, and only in this (Schwegler, History of the Enlightenment, viii, 432). The principles of his method are to be found in many writers before him, even in Aristotle; but it was Bacon's glory that he set forth those principles as to bring mankind to act upon them. His plagiarisms, especially from his great namesake, Roger Bacon, are unquestionable (see De Maistre, Sources de St. Petersbourg, Methode Quarterly, Jan. and April, 1888; and Bacon, Roger).
So far as Bacon's own mind was concerned, he was a firm believer in divine revelation (see his Confession of Faith: Prayers: Character of a Christian; Works, ed. Montague, vol. vii). Theology, as science, he held to rest on data given by inspiration, just as metaphysics must rest on postulates. On this last point the following passage is pregnant: "Wherefore, whatever primitive matter is, together with its influence and action, it is sui generis, and admits of no definition drawn from perception, and is to be taken just as it is found, and not to be mixed up from any preconceived idea. For the mode of it, if it is given to us to know it, cannot be judged of by means of its cause, seeing that it is, next to God, the cause of causes, itself without cause. For there is a certain real limit of causes in nature, and it would argue levity and inexperience in a philosopher to require or im-sagine a first cause, or a last, and positive idea of any nature, as much as it would not to demand a cause in those that are subordinate" (Fable of Cupid, Works, ed. Montague, xv, 45). As to theology, his language is: "Omnis enim scientia duplicem sortitum informa-tionem. Una inspirator divinitus; alter oritur a se..."

au. Partismur, igtur, scientiam in theologiam et philosophiam. Theologie hie intelligimus insinuatis, non naturalitas. (De Augmenta, iii, 1.) In book he work he wrote in opposition to the expression sene, insomuch as in religion the first principles are independent and self-subsistent (per se subsistente). "Let us conclude," he says, "that sacred theology ought to be drawn from the word and oracles of God, not from the natural reason, but from the supernatural reason. For it is written, the heavens declare the glory of God, but not the heavens declare the will of God." See also his prayer in the preface to the Inauguratio Magna. Bacon's own position, then, is clearly defined, although De Maistre, in his Soirées de St. Petersburg, seeks to deprive him not of all merit with regard to the science of induction, but also almost of the name of Christian. It is another question how far the influence of the Baconian system, confined as it is to the material sciences, has tended to generate a materialist and rationalist way of thinking. On this point, see RATIONALISM; PHILOSOPHY.

The greatest philosopher of the Scholastic school upon whom Bacon had any influence was Hales. Albert the Great, and Thomas Aquinas, whom he styles vir eruditus et famosus. It was not unnatural that the monks should suspect so plain spoken a man, especially one who kept cakepans and crucibles at work, studied the stars, and made strange experiments. As for the works of all sorts, adding to the many valuable notes, has been published by archbishop Whately (London, 1857; Boston, 1860).—(2) A treatise on the Advancement of Learning (London, 1605). This work, revised and enlarged, was afterward translated by Ben Jonson, George Herbert, and other friends of Bacon, into Latin, and published under the title De Augmentis Scientiarum (London, 1629). The works De Sapientia Veterum, Sygura Sygurate, Nova Atlantis, are likewise highly valued. Complete editions were published by Rawley (Amsterdam, 1665, 6 vols.); Mallet (London, 1740); Stephens, Locker, and Birch (London, 1765, 6 vols. 4to); Basil Montagu (London 1825-34, 17 vols. 8vo); Spedding, Ellis, and Heath (London, 1857 sq.); American ed., Boston, 1863-65. A biography of Bacon may be found at the head of every complete edition of his works; that by Montagu is especially valuable (reprinted in Bacon's Works, Philo. 8 vols. 8vo). BACON, John, an English writer of the fourteenth century; born at Bacthorpe, in Norfolk, and styled the "father of the English school." He took the degrees of doctor of canon and civil law and of divinity at Paris, and became so strongly attached to the opinions of the Averroists that he was looked upon as their head. In 1329 he was elected provincial of the Carmelite order, which he had entered in his youth, and afterward in 1346 he wrote Commentarii super guatutur libros sententiarum (Paris, 1841, fol., often reprinted), and many other works. See Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, 14th cent.; Landon, Eccl. Dict. i, 192.

BACON, Roger, the greatest of the English philosophers before the time of his namesake, Lord Bacon, was born near Lichester, in Somersetshire, about 1214. He was educated at Oxford, and, according to the custom of his day, proceeded to the university of Paris to study philosophy. After he had obtained his doctor's degree. About 1240(?) he returned to Oxford, and there (perhaps on the advice of Grossetête q.v.), he took the vows as a Franciscan, and applied himself closely in the vocation of the study of languages, as well as to experimental philosophy. It was the mistake of his life that he joined the Franciscans; his natural inclination was for science and experiment, a prohibition being issued against Bacon's lectures in the university, as well as against the publication of any of his writings. He was charged with magic and diabolism, as was commonly the case at that time with those who studied the sciences, and particularly chemistry. Bacon was a true thinker, and, as such, was necessarily regarded as an innovator in such an age, although it was the age of Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura. He complained of the absolute submission to authority. "I would burn all the books of Aristotle if I had them in hand" (Comp. Theol. pt. i, ch. 2). He is a very severe upon the scholastic theology, upon Albertus Magnus, and upon Thomas Aquinas, whom he styles ver eruditoris et famosus. It was not unnatural that the monks should suspect so plain-spoken a man, especially one who kept cakepans and crucibles at work, studied the stars, and made strange experiments. BACON

Of the grandeur of Bacon's scientific intellect, and of the marvelous discoveries made by him, this is not to be expected to be the first. Francis says, he gave the greatest attraction of the Middle Ages. In the depths of an age of tradition, he saw what science was, and devoted his life to its pursuit. In languages, he mastered Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic. He held, with Plato, that Mathematics is the mistress and key of all the sciences (Opus Majus, pt. iv). In twenty years (a vast age in those days), he wrote 365 books, in books, apparatus, and experiments. As early as 1624 he sent the pope a proposal to rectify the Julian calendar—three centuries before the thing was done. "Roger Bacon, the vast intellect that England has produced, studied nature as a natural philosopher rather than as a chemist, and the extraordinary discoveries he made in those branches of science are familiarly known: the rectification of the errors committed in the Julian calendar with regard to the solar year; the physical action of the action of lenses and convex glasses; the invention of spectacles for the aged; that of achromatic lenses; the theory and perhaps the first construction of the telescope. From the principles and laws laid down or partially apprehended by him, a system of unanticipated facts was sure to spring, as he himself remarked; nevertheless, his inquiries into chemical phenomena have not been without fruit for us. He carefully studied the properties of saltpetre, and, in opposition to the ordinary opinion, he did not discover gunpowder, which had been explicitly described by Marcus Graecus fifty years before, he improved its preparation by teaching the mode of purifying saltpetre by first dissolving the salt in water and then crystallizing it. He also called attention to the chemical action of air in combustion" (Viguer, L'Alchimie et les Alchimistes, part i, ch. iv, p. 80, 81).

The history of Bacon's writings is among the curiosities of literature. A number of his smaller works were printed before the 18th century, but his greatest writings waited until that date. Among the former are his Perspectiva (Frank. 1614); De Specula et Specula Mathematica (Frank. 1614), reprinted in 1677; De Mirabilis Potestate Artis et Naturae (Paris, 1654); Giard, De l'admirable Pouvoir, etc., ou est traité de la Pierre Philosophale (translation of the preceding) Paris, 1557, reprinted in 1629; Scripta quaedam de Arte Chemica (Frank. 1609 and 1629); Specula Alchimica et De Artibus et de Nativitate Magus (in vols. ii and v of Zeitner's Therapeutum Chemicum, Strasbourg, 1569, transal, by Girard, under the title Miroir d'Alchimie, Lyon, 1557; Paris, 1612 and 1627); De rerum variae et perspicacitate (Oxf. 1590, translated by Dr. R. Browne, Lond. 1608). The greatest of his works were not published until 1788. A number of Bacon's MSS. were known to exist in the libraries of the Continent and of England, especially in the Cottonian Library and in that of Dublin, and Dr. Samuel Jebb, at the request of Richard Mead (court physician), edited and printed the Opus Majus (Lond. 1788, fol.). It is carefully done, but yet it contains much (the MSS. are in the handwriting of other hands). The work contains nothing on the subject to this book. Professor Ingmar, of the University of Dublin, has discovered some of the missing part of the work, and a complete edition of his works is promised, as the British government intrusted the task to Professor Brewer, of King's College, who published vol. i (on the subject of philosophy). Compendium philosophiae, and de Nativitate Magus (large 8vo. The Opus Minus is an epitome and complement of the Opus Majus; the Opus Tertium is an enlargement of it. Cousin discovered a MS. of this last work in the library of Douai, and published an enthusiastic notice of it in the way of a preface, in 1848. Pursuing his researches, he found in the Amiens library a manuscript commenting on Aristotle. Cousin now appealed to England to vindicate the name of one of her greatest sons, and the result is seen in the edition announced above. A French scholar, M. E. Charies, also devoted years of study and travel to Roger Bacon, and published Roger Bacon, ses ouvrages, ses doctrines, d'apres des textes inedit (1862, 8vo).

Roger Bacon was the forerunner, in philosophy, of Lord Bacon, who borrowed largely from him, not only in method, but also even in details. The monk passed over into a forgotten name, as if he had not been able to rectify the secrets of nature. Lord Bacon promoted science by his method, but in actual application of the method he was a child. Roger Bacon anticipated him in the method, and was, at the same time, himself a great experimenter and successful inventor. On the relations between these two great men, see Professor Holmes's excellent articles in the Methodist Quarterly, January and April, 1858, where the subject is more ably and thoroughly treated than by any other writer. Professor Holmes sums up as follows: "That Lord Bacon was anticipated by Roger Bacon in nearly everything that was most distinctive in the double forms of the same idea is a child. He was not baffled after the copious illustrations given in this essay. That he borrowed directly and consciously from him is our own private conclusion; and that the forced loan amounted to plagiarism, and was levied, like one of James I's voluntary gifts from his people, for the support of a new and secret faction, is not a conviction, though we will not demand from the public an absolute verdict to this effect. But we do claim that the highest honors which have been assigned to Francis Bacon are due to Roger Bacon and his contemporaries, and we do assert that the friar has been as hardly and unjustly dealt with by the lord chancellor of nature as Auleby, and Egyptian, and the other suitors in the court of equity were handled by the lord high chancellor of England."

"Throughout the whole of his writings Bacon is a strict Roman Catholic; that is, he expressly submits matters of opinion to the authority of the church, saying (Cott. MSS., cited by Jebb) that if the respect due to the vicar of the Savior (ecclesiae Salvatoris) alone, and the benefit of the world, could be consulted in any other way than by the progress of philosophy, he would not, under such experiments as lay in his way, proceed with his undertaking for the whole Church of God, however useful and otherwise important. But for Christianity, in its Latin or Western form, breaks out in every page; and all science is considered with direct reference to theology, and not otherwise. But, at the same time, to the credit of his principles, considering the book-burning, heretic-hunting age in which he lived, there is not a word of any other force except that of persuasion. He takes care to have both authority and reason for every proposition that he advances; perhaps, indeed, he might have experienced forbearance at the hands of those who were his persecutors, but he did not to clearly made out prophets, apostles, and fathers to have been partakers of his opinions. 'But let us try whether I am ignorant of anything that I intend to exclaim the eloquence of your holiness, in order that the papal majesty should employ force against weak authors and the multitude, or that my unworthy self should raise any stumbling-block to study' (Penit Cyclopedia, s. v.). Indeed, the whole scope of the first part of the work is to prove from authority and from comparison the power of the philosopher and Christianity. You cannot disagree—a sentiment altogether of his own revival, in an age in which all philosophers, and mathematicians in particular, were considered as best of dubious orthodoxy. The effect of his writings on theology was to introduce a freer spirit, and to prepare the way for the future. He combated the one-sided supremacy of Aristotle, and even the authority of the fathers; he pointed out errors in their writings, and appealed to the original.
besides numerous contributions to periodicals, he published "tracts on episcopacy, old and new school presbyterianism, salvation made sure, salvation in earnest," etc. he died april 2, 1868. — willson, presbyterian hist. almanac, 1864, p. 283.

Badby, John, an English mechanic, born in the 16th century, and who fell a martyr in the persecution against the lollards, whose principles he had adopted. he replied to arundel, the archbishop of canterbury, who was disputing with him on transubstantiation, that, with the body of Christ, there could not be a few thousands, but perhaps twenty thousand, god in english, while he believed but in one. he was burnt at smithfield in 1499, and remained steadfast to the end.

Badcock, Samuel, an English theologian, born at south molton, devonshire. in 1747, died at london in 1788. he was first a dissenting minister, but in 1787 took orders in the church of england. he was a contributor to the "london review," monthly review, and several other periodicals. his review of Priestley's "history of the corruptions of Christianity" (in monthly review, june and august, 1783) was generally regarded as the best refutation of Priestley's views. Priestley answered immediately ("a reply to the inaccuracies, etc., in the monthly review for june, 1783"). Badcock was again replied to by another article in the monthly review (sept., 1783). he also published in the "gentleman's magazine," 1783, some memoirs of the wesleys, charging them with jacobitism, which John Wesley refuted. — allibone, dictionary of authors, 1:98; Jones, Christ, biography, s. v.; Wesley, works, n. Baden, Grand-Duchy of, one of the minor german states. see Germany.

1. christian history: we have no precise information as to the first introduction of christianity into the country now forming the grand-duchy of baden. the reports of the missionary labors of Fridolin (q. v.) in the 6th or 7th century, tradprat in the Bregenau about 640, and Firmim on the island of Reichenau, are largely mixed up with legends. toward the beginning of the 8th century the majority of the population was converted, principally through the efforts of the bishops of Strasbourg and constance, which sees had been erected in the 7th century. the university of heidelberg, in the palatinate, was founded in 1388; that of freiburg (then under the authority of the archbishop of freiburg) in 1407, of which several are of the spirit of opposition to the corruptions in the church. under the influence of Tauler (q. v.) when preacher at Strasbourg, and of the writings of suso (q. v.), an association of pious mystics, the "friends of God" (q. v.), labored zealously for evangelizing the lower classes of the people. among other illustrious men who prepared in this region, the way for the reformation of the 16th century, we mention Jerome of Prague, John Wessel, Reuchlin, agricola, and, later (1511), Wolfgang Capito. of great influence was the visit of Luther and his disputation in April, 1518, and two years later he received assurances of the approbation of his writings from his friend Serapion, bishop of Strasbourg, and Caspar Heidt (Heid). among the pioneers of evangelical preaching were Urban Regius, John Eber- lin, Jacob Otter, erhard schnepf, etc.; among the first noblemen who embraced the doctrines of the ref-formation, the Count von Wertheim and Goetz von Berlichingen. The bishops of Mentz, Wurzburg, and Spire, however, opposed the Reformation, especially after the accession of Frederick III. In 1517 he commissioned the first Archbishop of Freiburg some 2000 evangelical books were burnt in the presence of the minister, and many Protestants, both ministers and laymen, had to flee. In Constance, however, the citizens protected the works of Luther against the imperial edict, and John Wninger, a follower of the death of the Elector Frederick III, the Austrian part of Baden, where Anabaptist and revolutionary movements mixed themselves up with the progress of the Reformation, the Austrian government succeeded in crushing out Protestantism altogether (Dec. 1525). After the Diet of Spire (1526) the Reformation made rapid progress in Wertheim, the Landes of Baden, Pforzheim, Durlach, and even in the Palatinate under the ministry of John Gallin. Yet the opposition continued in the upper countries, and in Freiburg Peter Speyler, preacher at Schlatt, was drowned in the Ill. In Constance, on the other hand, the Reformation was firmly established; clerical celibacy was abolished in 1555. In the elections the chapter was completely free to choose. In 1590 Constance adopted the Tetrapolitan Confession, and joined the Schmalkaldic confederacy. After Margrave Philip's death, 1585, the northern half became altogether Protestant, while the southern remained Roman. In August, 1548, Constance was put under the ban of the empire for not accepting the Interim of 1540, which was finally established, and persecutions commenced anew, which did not end until the peace of Augsburg (1555). Yet after that event, Margraves Charles II of Baden-Durlach, Philip of Baden-Baden, and Duke Christopher of Wurttemberg aided the progress of Protestantism. Under the Elector Frederick III Calvinism was more particularly favored. In 1561 the electorate introduced the Heidelberg Catechism, which he himself had composed with the aid of Oelevius and Urvins, in the place of the catechisms of Luther and Brentz. In his possessions Calvinism was established, but in the other districts of Baden Lutheranism maintained the ascendency. The Romish worship was for a time established in Baden-Baden by Duke Albrecht of Bavaria and Margrave Philip, successor of Philip, who joined the Romish Church in his fifthcentury. The contest between the two evangelical confessions was renewed by the Formula Concordiae (q. v.), till a union was arrived at by the promulgation of the Edict of Worms, which was held at a lity of both the churches. Since 1534, when the General Synod met again for the first time, this union has been confirmed by the introduction of a new catechism, a new agenda (q. v.), and a new hymn-book. In 1483 a supreme ecclesiastical council was created for the administration of ecclesiastical affairs. The greater portion of the clergy and people were pleased with the union: only a small body of Lutherans demanded the maintenance of the pure doctrines and practices of their church; and when they saw that their wishes could not be gratified in the State Church, they seceded. Several years of persecution, however, passed before the pronouncements of the Edict of Worms were finally established in a Lutheran Church. Within the State Church, in which, at the conclusion of this union, Rationalism prevailed, and was taught by men like Paulus (q. v.), a hot contest arose between the Rationalistic and evangelical parties. The General Synod of 1837 resolved to adopt the decrees of 1555, but on the promulgation of the Edict of Worms, the spiritual part of divine service is considerably enlarged and the forms of prayer greatly changed (see Bähr, Dua Badische Kirchenbuch, Karlsruhe, 1890). About the beginning of the 19th century, the more cultivated of the Roman clergy of Baden, under the guidance of Stephen Scheurleer (q. v.), prepared for liberal reforms. Indeed a large portion of the priesthood demanded the abolition of celibacy, the introduction of the German language at divine service, the convoca-tion of diocesan synods with lay delegations, and other reforms. The government desired to make Wessenberg the first archbishop of the newly-erected see of Freiburg, but could not obtain papal confirmation. A reaction in favor of ultramontanism was commenced under the Archbishop Vicari (1844), and in 1853 a violent conflict began between State and Church. The priests received one class of directions from the archbishop, and another from the supreme ecclesiastical council of the state. Some priests were arrested for siding with the archbishop, others were suspended ecclesiastically for obeying the government. The archbishop excommunicated the members of the Catholic supreme ecclesiastical council, and was himself arrested in 1854. The Legislature unwaveringly supported the government, which, however, showed itself anxious to conclude a compromise with the archbishop. Negotiations with Rome concerning a convention (cordo- s) were eagerly pursued in 1855, but were not concluded before 1859. The convention with Rome created a great deal of dissatisfaction among the people: the Chambers in 1860 decidedly refused to ratify it, and it was long abandoned by the government also. See Cossutius.

II. Ecclesiastical Statistics.—The number of Roman Catholics was, in 1864, 583,476; of members of the Evangelical Church, 472,558; of Mennonites and other dissentients, 2554; of Israelites, 25,268. The Evangelical Church is divided into 28 dioceses (deaneries) and 185 parishes. The parishes consist of the clergy and the number of lay deputies of the local church councils, meet every third year in a synod. In the year after the meeting of a synod, all the clergy of a diocese meet under the presidency of the dean for the discussion of moral questions; and in the third year a school convention is held in a similar manner for discussing the affairs of the primary schools, which in Baden, as in every German state, have a denominational character, and are subject to the control of the clergy. The General Synod meets regularly every seventh year, but may at any time be convoked by order of the grand-duke. Every two dioceses elect a clerical delegate, and four dioceses a lay delegate. The grand-duke adds to this number of delegates two clerical and two lay members of the supreme ecclesiastical council, one professor of the theological faculty of Heidelberg, and a commissary who presides. A theological faculty is connected with the University of Heidelberg: here also are members of the most distinguished theologians of Germany, such as Roth, Schenkell, Umbreit, and Ullmann. The two latter are known in the literary world as the founders of the best German theological quarterly, the Studien und Kritiken. Connected with the theological faculty is also an evangelical Preachers' Seminary, at which every native candidate for the ministry must spend one year. For the training of teachers there is a Protestant Normal School. The Roman Catholic Church, under the Archbishop of Freiburg, has 35 deaneries, with 747 parishes, 2 normal schools, and a theological faculty connected with the University of Heidelberg. Thus the life of the Roman clergy is dying out. A theological quarterly was for some years published by the theological faculty of Freiburg, but is discontinued. The most celebrated Roman theologians in the present century have been Hug and Hirscher; a Romanist writer of the 19th century; Grobe's treatise on the preachers, Outlines of the formation of nuns have been established since 1848. The Lutheran siders from the State Church (old Lutheran Church) had, in 1850, three parishes with about 900 members. The principal work on the history of Protestantism in Baden is Vierbratan, Geschicht der Evangelischen Kirche in Baden. See also Wiggers, Kirch. Statistik, ii, 208, 207; Schem, Eccles. Year-book for 1859, p. 115 sqq., and p. 208.
of the 16th century, was born about 1490. He was the tutor of Duke Ludwig II of Zweibrücken, and subsequently (after 1518) pastor of Landau, a town in the Bavarian Palatinate. He adhered to the Reformation in 1521, and worked for its introduction into Landau with such zeal and success, that at the time of his death only a few canons and monks of the Augustinian convent remained in connection with the Roman Catholic Church. Bader was one of the first reformers who published an outline of the doctrines held by the reformed churchmen (A. Griesbach-Büchlein, Anfang des christlichen Lebens, Strasburg, 1526) several years before the appearance of Luther's catechisms. In 1527 he wrote a pamphlet against the Anabaptists, and especially against the learned Denck. His views on the Lord's Supper were nearly the same as those of Zuinglius and Bucer, and a tabular summary of them (Summarium und Rechenschaft vom Abenteuch unserer Herrn J. C.) was printed in 1583 at Strasburg on one side of a folio sheet. He was, in general, like his friend Bucer, for a reconciliation of the reformation parties. In later years Bader was on friendly terms with Schwenkfeld, who visited him at Landau, and most of his friends at Strasburg and Zweibrücken were on this account greatly displeased with him. Bader died in August, 1548.—Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, s. v., 160.

Badger is the interpretation in the Auth. Vers. of the word צֶבָּרָה, tach'ash (Ezek. xvi, 10; Sept. צֶבָּרָה, כֹּ֤בֶד. אֲרָ֥מ. כְּבֶדָּה; Compl. כְּבֶדָּה, al. כְּבֶדָּה in Exod. xxxv, 5; Alex. יַ֣עַרְגָּה, יַעְרַגָּה in Exod. xxxv, 7; תַּכָּשָׁה, ἕλαφος, Aq. and Sym. כְּבֶדָּה in Ezek. xvi, 10; Vulg. pelles satanicae, satanicae); but many doubt its correctness, since the badger is not found in Southern Asia, and has not as yet been noticed out of Europe. The word occurs in the plural form in Exod. xxv, 5; xxxvi, 14; xxxvii, 7, 28; xxxviii, 19; xxxix, 34; Num. iv, 6, 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, 25; and, in connection with זוּרָך, orot, "skins," is used to denote the covering of the Tabernacle, of the Ark of the Covenant, and of other sacred vessels. In the Ezek. xvi, 10, it indicates the material of which the shoes of women were made. Possibly the Latin tasso or tasso, the origin of the Spanish tazon, Ital. tazza, Fr. tasseon, Germ. Dachse, is the same word as tachash; and these designate the badger. This, however, appears to be the only support for the rendering "badger" (Ezek. tasso) besides that of the Chaldee paraphrast (כָּבֶדָה, tasso, sic dictus quia gaudet et superbuit in coloribus multos,) Buxtorf, Lex. Heb. s. v.). See Zoology.

The Badger.

The ancient interpreters understand by it a color given to leather, e. g. Sept. כָּבֶדָּה: so Aquila, Symmachus, and the Syriac, which are followed by Bochart (Hier., ii, 387), Rosenmüller (Schol. ad V. T., Exod. xxv, 5; Ezek. xvi, 10), Bynaeus (De Calicis Hærecordium, lib. i, ch. 3), Scheuchzer (Phys. Sacr. in Exod. xxy, 5), and others. Parkhurst (Heb. Lex. s. v.), observes that "an outermost covering for the tabernacle of azure or sky-blue was very proper to represent the sky or azure boundary of the system." But he is not altogether in the right. The Tabernacle, and what it was, an animal like a ceret. Others, as Gesner and Harenberg (in Iuvnat. Breuix, ii, 312), have thought that some kind of wolf, known by the Greek θαλασσα, and the Arabic Shkeel is intended. Hælsem (in Dissert. Philol. Systolic. diss. ix, § 17) and Büchlein (Anfang des Christlichen Lebens, Strasburg, 1526) are of opinion that tachash denotes a cetacean animal, the Trichechus manatus of Linnaeus, which, however, is only found in America and the West Indies. Others, with Sebald Rau (Comment, de is qua ex Arab, in unum Tabernaculum fuerant repetita, Tract. ad Rhem, 1758, ch. ii), are in favor of tachash denoting some kind of seal (Phoca vitulina, Lin.). Dr. Geddes (Crit. Rem. Exod. xxv, 6) is of the same opinion. Gesenius understands (Heb. Lex. s. v.) some kind of seal or badger, or other similar creature.) Of modern writers Dr. Kittto (Pict. Bld. in Exod. xxv, 5) thinks that tachash denotes some clean animal, as in all the preceding cases, and that it has not been used for the sacred coverings. The corresponding Arabic word is not only a dolphin, but also a seal, and seals (ם) were numerous on the shores of the peninsula of Sinai (Strab. xxxi, 876). The etymology of the word in Heb. is favorable to this view, from the root צ'ש, 'chash', to rest; and seals no less than badgers are somnolent animals. (See Simonis Exercitio de וַשַּׁלָּם, Hal. 1735.) Maurer, however (Comment. in Exod.), derives it from the root צ'ש, Tachash, to penetrate, a notion which suits the burrowing of the badger as well as the plunging of the seal. Pliny (i, 56) mentions the use of the skins of seals as a covering for tents, and as a protection from lightning. (Comp. Plut. Symp. v, 9; Sueton. Octav. 90; Faber, Archde. Heb., i, 115.) The tachash has also been identified with the Trichechus marinus of Linnaeus, and with the sea-cow called manatus or dugong. Others find it in an animal of the hyenas kind, which is called by the Arabs tachash (Botta's Voyage in Yemen, 1841). Robinson (Researches, i, 171) mentions sandals made of the thick skin of a fish which is caught in the Red Sea. It is a species of halicore, named by Ehrenberg (Syst. Alg. 1838) Halicora Hemphilli. The halicora hemphilli is clumsy and coarse, and might answer very well for the external covering of the Tabernacle. According to Ehrenberg, the Arabs on the coast call this animal Naka and Lottum. Arabian naturalists applied the term ensan alma, "man of the sea," to this creature. Thevenot speaks of a kind of sea-man, which is taken near the port of Tor. "It is a great strong fish, and hath two hands, which are like the hands of a man, saving that the fingers are joined together with a skin, like the foot of a goose; but the skin of the fish is like the skin of a wild goat or chamois. When they say that fish, they strike him on the back with harping irons, and so force him to go to the sea, and so kill him with the skin of it for making bucklers, which are musketproof." Nielbahr adds the information that a merchant of Abushar called dakaash that fish which the captains of English ships call porpoise. The same traveler reports that he saw prodigious schools of these animals swimming. Professor Rippell (Mus. Notech, i, 115, t. 6), who saw the creature on the coral banks of the Aysinsian coast, ascertained by personal examination that the creature in question was a sort of dugong, a genus of marine Pachydermata, to which he gave the name of Halicora tabernaculi, from a conviction that it was the tachash of Moses. It grows to a height of 7 feet in length. See What.

In the present state of zoological knowledge, however, it is not necessary to refute the notions that tachash was the name of a mermaid or homo-marinus, Eastern Africa contain a number of ruminating animals of the great antelope family; they are known to the natives under various names, such as pucasce, empassus, lacassine, and takalith, all more or less varieties of the word tackla, they are of considerable size, often of slaty and purple-gray colors, and might be termed stag-goats and ox-goats. Of these one or more occur in the hunting-scenes on Egyptian monuments, and therefore we may conclude that the skins were not in use in abundance, but were dressed with the hair on for coverings of baggage, and for boote, such as we see worn by the human figures in the same processions. Thus we have the greater number of the conditions of the question sufficiently realized to enable us to draw the inference that tackla refers to a ruminant of the Aligecerina or Damaline groups, most likely of an iron-gray or slate-colored species* (Kitto, s. v.). See Antelope.

Bag. A purse or pouch. The following words in the original are thus rendered in the English version of the Bible: 1. בַּגָּו (heb. bag), a pocket (Sept. βαγγός, Vulg. saccus), the "bags" in which Naaman bound up the two talents of silver for Gehazi (2 Kings v. 23), probably so called, according to Gesenius, from their long, cone-like shape. The word only occurs besides in Isa. iii. 22 (A. V. "crispin-pins"), and there denotes the reticules carried by the Hebrew ladies. 2. הָלַּגָּו (Heb. halag), a bag for carrying weights (Dout. xxv. 18; Prov. xvi. 11; Ecclus. vi. 11); also used as a vessel (Isa. i. 14; Is. xxv. 6); hence a cup (Prov. xxvi. 31). 3. כַּלְךְ (kalch, from kala, to pack), translated "bag" in 1 Sam. xvi. 40, 49, is a word of most general meaning, and is generally rendered "vessel" or "instrument." In Gen. xiii. 25, it is the "sack" in which Jacob's sons carried the corn which they brought from Egypt, and in 1 Sam. ix. 7; xxi. 5, it denotes a bag or wallet for carrying food (A. V. "sack"), compare Judg. x. 5; xii., 10, 15. The shepherd's "bag" which David had seems to have been worn by him as necessary to his calling, and was probably, from a comparison of Zech. xi. 15, 16 (where A. V. "instruments" is the same word), for the purpose of carrying the lambs which were unable to walk or stand for a long journey. The shepherds were sick and binding up those that were broken (comp. Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 16). 4. "בַּגָּו, teror" (Sept. ἐμφεός, ἐμφας, Vulg. sacculus), properly a "bundle" (Gen. xliii. 35; 1 Sam. xxv. 29), appears to have been used by travellers for carrying money during a long journey (Prov. vii. 20; Hag. i. 6; compare Luke xii. 33; Tob. ix. 6). In such "bundles" the priests bound up the money which was contributed for the restoration of the Temple under Jehoiada (2 Kings xii. 10; A. V. "put up in bags"). 5. The "bags" (ἀλοπεκοῦς, Vulg. loculi) which Judas carried was probably a small box or chest (John xii. 6; xiii. 29). The Greek word is the same as that used in the Sept. for "chest" in 2 Chron. xiv. 8, 10, 11, and originally signified a box used by musicians for carrying the mouthpieces of their instruments. 6. The βακάρων, or [w6l][l]et (Luke x. 4; xiii. 32; xxi. 35, 36). Of these terms it will only be necessary here to discuss one application, which they all sustain, i. e. as a receptacle for money. The money deposited in the treasuries of Eastern princes, or so intended for large payments, or so sent to a government as taxes or tribute, is collected in long, narrow bags or purses, each containing a certain amount of money, and sealed with the official seal. As the money is counted for this purpose, and sealed with great care by officers properly appointed, the bag or purse becomes current, as long as the seal remains unbroken, for the amount marked thereon. In the receipt and payment of large sums, this is a great and important convenience in countries where the managers... ment of large transactions by paper is unknown, or where a currency is chiefly or wholly of silver; it saves the great trouble of counting or weighing loose money. This usage is so well established that, at this day, in the Levant, "a purse" is the very name for a certain amount of money (now twenty-five dollars), and all large payments are stated in "purse." The antiquity of this custom is attested by the monuments of Egypt, in which the embassadors of distant nations are represented as bringing their tributes in sealed bags of money to Thothmes III; and we see the same bags deposited intact in the royal treasury (Wilkinson, i, 148, abridgm.). When coined money was not used, the seal must have been considered a voucher not only for the amount, but for the purity of the metal. The money collected in the Temple, in the time of Josiah, seems to have been made up into bags of equal value after this fashion, which were probably delivered sealed to those who paid the workmen (2 Kings, xii, 10; comp. also 2 Kings v, 23; Tobit ix, 5; xi, 16).—Smith, Append.; Kittto, s. v. See Money.

Bagger, Hans Olesan, a Danish theologian, born at Land in 1646, became bishop of Zealand in 1675, and died at Copenhagen in 1689. He is the author of the Danish Church-Ritual, which was introduced in 1686, and of a revised altar-book, both of which are still in use in the Danish Church. Being consulted by the Danish government as to whether the interest of the Lutheran Church allowed the admission to Denmark of the French Calvinists, who had been expelled by Louis XI, he emphatically opposed it, because such an admission "would expose the souls of the Lutherans to temptation and to the risk of everlasting damnation."—Pierer, Universall Lexicon, s. v.

Bag'o (Bayo), the head of one of the Israelitish families ("sons"), to which is assigned the Uthi, son of Icarlucorius, who returned from the captivity (1 Esdr. viii, 40); evidently the Bioviai (q. v.) of the true text (Exra viii, 14).

Bag'os (Bayosr), the enunuch (or chamberlain) who had charge of the tent of Holofernes, and introduced Judith (Jud. xii, 11, 15; xiii, 1, 3; xiv, 14). The name is Ptolemy, Forsch. I, xxxix) to be equivalent to enuch in Persian (Plin. Hst. Nat. xiii, 4, 9), and, as such, was probably a title of office rather than a personal appellation (see Quintil. v, 12; comp. Burman ad Ovid. Am. ii, 2, 1). Accordingly, we find the name often recurring in Eastern history (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v.) even so late as that of the chief enunuch of Herod's harem, who was put to death for intriguing with the Pharisees (Josephus, Ant. xvii, 2, 4 ad fin.).

Bag'oI (Bayof), one of the Israelitish families whose "sons" (to the number of 2060) returned from the exile (1 Esdr. v, 14); evidently the Bioviai (q. v.) of the Heb. text (Exra ii, 14).

Bagos (Bayos), the general of Artaxeres (probably Menemon; the text, as emended by Hudson, has του δουλου Αρταξέρκεων τοις Αχαου Αρποι;) he sacrilegiously entered the Temple at Jerusalem, and imposed oppressive taxes upon the Jews (Josephus, Ant. xi, 7, 1).

Bagot, Lewis, a bishop of the Church of England, was born in 1740. He was a son of Lord Bagot. After studying at the University of Oxford, he became a canon of that church, and vicar of Bredon, Worcs, and of St. Asaph. He died in 1862. He is the author of numerous theological works, the most important of which is Twelve Discourses on the Prophecies concerning the first Establishment and subsequent History of Christianity, preached at the Warrington Lecture, in the Lincoln's Inn Chapel, 1786.—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, 1, 96; Burkitt, Biog. Generalites, iv, 198.

Bagshaw, William, a Nonconformist minister, was born in 1628, and died in 1702. He became the northern parts of Derbyshire for him the title of "the Apostle of the Peak." He published Water for a Thirsty Soul, in several sermons on Rev. xxii, 6 (1655), and a number of other works. Some 50 of his works, upon various subjects, have never been printed.—Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 99.

Baha'rumite (Heb. with the art. hab-Bocharum, ' hủyדב ת"כ תדימ: Sept. בברועי v. r. בברועי), an epithet of Azemeth, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi, 38); doubtless as being a native of Bamburim (q. v.).

Bahat. See Marbel.

Bahr, Joseph Friedrich, a German theologian, was born in 1713, and died in 1775. He became, in 1789, deacon at Bischofswerda; in 1791, pastor at Schönfeld; and, after filling several other church positions, finally became superintendent. He wrote, among others, "The Reformation against the Socinians," Abhandlung der reinen Lehre der evanglicen Kirche der Sterblichkeit und dem leiblichen Tod des menschlichen Geschlechts; a life of Christ (Lebensgeschichte Jes. Christi, 1777).—Hoefler, Biog. Generalites, iv, 172.

Bahrdt, Karl Friedrich, a German Rationalist, notorious for his bold infidelity and for his evil life, was born Aug. 23, 1741, at Bischofswerda, Saxony. He studied at Pforta and at Leipzig, where his father was professor of theology. The old Lutheran faith was still taught there; but Ernesti was one of the professors, and a new era was dawning. Bahrdt first imbibed Crusius's (q. v.) philosophical orthodoxy. In 1761 he became master, and began to lecture, and did it fluently and with success, on dogmatic theology. He soon became very popular, also, from his eloquence in the pulpit. In 1768 he was compelled to resign as professor ext. of theology on account of a charge of adultery, and it is clear that even thus early he was leading a very immoral life. Through the influence of Klota, a man of kindred spirit, he was made professor of Biblical archaology at Erfurt; but he soon fell into ill repute there, and next obtained a chair at Giessen. Here he abandoned the doctrines of the Trinity and the Atonement, and published several books which brought down the wrath even of Semler (q. v.). His poverty was so tremendous that he was forced to spread himself thin in search of fame and wealth, of which he was so desperately, yet always poor, he returned to Halle in 1779. His career here for ten years was erratic and disgraceful; he wrote books, lectured when he could get hearers, and opened a tavern in a vineyard, with the assistance of his maid, who lived with him as his wife, though his own good wife was yet alive. In 1787 he was imprisoned. He died near Halle, April 23, 1792. He was the living type and illustration of the vulgar rationalism of his age. His writings were very numerous (nearly 150 in number), but are of no critical or theological value, and therefore need not be enumerated.—Kahnin, German Protestantism, ch. ii, p. 130; Hurst, History of Rationalism, p. 139-149.

Bahu'rim (Heb. Bacherim), בַּהֲרִים, or [in 2 Sam. iii, 16; xiv, 17) בַּהֲרִים, '高く すでに, otherwise young men's village; Sept. בַּוְּרִים, but B'icon, v. r. בַּוְּרִים in 2 Sam. iii, 16; Josephus Bijon, Ant. vii, 9, 7, ed. Havercamp; for other var. readings, see Reiland, Palast. p. 614), a place not far from Jerusalem, of which the slight notices remaining connect it almost exclusively with the flight of David (q. v.) from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, through his son's house at Beersheba, and he came to the road leading up from the Jordan valley to Jerusalem. Shimei, the son of Gera, resided here (2 Sam. xvii, 18; 1 Kings ii, 8), and from the village, when David, having left the "top of the mound" behind him, was making his way down the eastern slopes of Olivet into the Jordan valley below, Shimei issued forth, and running along (Josephus Zarpiswos) on the side of "rib" of the hill over against the king's party, flung ladders against the wall, and, found the walls, with a virulence which is to this day exhibited in the East toward fallen greatness, however eminent it may previously have been. Here in the court of a house was the well in which Jonathan and Ahimaaz eluded their pursuers (xvii, 18). In his account of the occurrence, Josephus (Ant. vii, 9, 7) distinctly states that Bahurim lay off the main road (read "g'g'k" idq), which agrees well with the account of Shimel's behavior. Here Phalite, the husband of Michal, bade farewell to his wife on her return to king David at Hebron (2 Sam. iii, 16). Bahurim must have been near the southern boundary of Benjamin; but it is not mentioned in the explanation given of its being Benjaminite, as, from Shimei's residing there, we may conclude it was. In the Targum Jonathan on 2 Sam. xvii, 5, we find it given as Almon (עמאן); but the situation of Almon (see Josh. xxii, 18) will not at all suit the requirements of Bahurim. Dr. Barclay conjectures that the place lay where some ruins (apparently those called Kubbah on Van de Velde's map, and the remains of the remote fort mentioned, as in Robinson's Researches, i. 109) still exist close to a Wady Dibawayh, which runs in a straight course for three miles from Olivet toward Jordan, offering the nearest, though not the best route (City of the Great King, p. 568).

AEMAZETH the "Barhumite" (2 Sam. xxiii, 31), or "the Bahubumite" (1 Chron. xi, 38), one of the heroes of David's guard, is the only native of Bahurim that we hear of except Shimhi.—Smith, s. v.

Baier, John William, a Lutheran divine, born at Nuremberg in 1647. He was a member of several German universities, and rector and theological professor of the University of Halle, where he died in 1698. He wrote, Compendium Theologiae Pravae (Jena, 1686, 8vo, often reprinted).—De Purgatorio (Jena, 1677, 4to).—De Aquis Iuxtae Pontifici (Jena, 1692, 4to).—Collatio doctrina Quacquerorum et Protestantantium (Jena, 1694, 4to).—Bibl. Univ. iii, 229; Winer, Thol. Literatur.—Landon, Eccles. Dictionary, s. v.

Ball (Heb. בַּר, "arab," to become surety; Gr. ἄραβας), as a legal regulation, does not occur in the Hebrew law, nor in the Acts of the Apostles. Vers. of the Scriptures: but the custom nevertheless prevailed among the (later) Hebrews, as is evident from the many allusions to it in the Book of Proverbs. Indeed, these maxims are evidence of great rigor in the enforcement of such obligations (Prov. xi, 16; xvii, 18; xxvii, 20). See Surety (Theo. Dict.).

Barley, Jacob, a "frontier missionary" of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Rowley, Mass., 1731. He graduated at Harvard in 1755, and in 1758 was licensed to preach by the Congregational Association at Exeter, N. H. In 1759 he left the Congregational Church, and embarked for England, to be ordained. He then went to the University of Glasgow, where he was finally ordained, and appointed a missionary of the "Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts" to Pownalboro', Me. He immediately removed and entered on his duties. Taking the side of England in the Revolution, he escaped to Halifax, N. S., in 1779, and labored as a missionary there and at Cornwallis until his death, July 26, 1808. See Bartlet, Life of Rev. Jacob Bailey (N. Y. 1810).—Sprague, Annals, v. 204.

Bailey, John, Congregational minister, was born in Lancashire, England, Feb. 24, 1644, studied under Dr. J. Harrison, and entered the ministry at Chester, 1666. As a Nonconformist, he was imprisoned in Lancashire for three years, and again at another place, and at times in the house of Mr. Hunt, who went to Limerick, Ireland, where he labored faithfully as pastor for 14 years. The office of chaplain to the Duke of Ormond, with the promise of a deanship and bishopric, was tendered to him on condition of conforming to the Established Church, but he refused. He was finally imprisoned, and only released on a promise to leave the country. About 1673 he sailed for New England, and was ordained minister of the Congregational Society at Watertown, October 6, 1686, with his brother, Thomas Bailey, as his assistant. He removed to Boston in 1692, and became assistant to Mr. Allen, of the First Church, in 1693. Here he labored, as his failing health would allow, till his death, December 12, 1707. He was a man of eminent piety and exemplary life. A volume of his discourses was published in 1689.—Sprague, Annals, i, 201.

Baillie, Adrian, a Romanist writer of repute, was born at Neuville, near Beauvais, June 13th, 1619, and was educated at a Franciscan convent. He afterward studied at Beauvais, and in 1670 was admitted to holy orders. He was, at a time, a visitor on the continent; but, feeling himself to be required for this kind of life, he left France, and took the charge of the library of M. de Lamoignon, the advocate general, with whom he passed the remainder of his days, and died January 21st, 1706. His works are: J Quintum de Sivuma (4 vols.). The work was to have consisted of seven parts; the first is a kind of preface to the other, and gives general rules for forming a sound judgment of a work; the other six parts were to have contained his own opinions and the judgments of others concerning works of every kind; but he only finished a small part of his design. This work was reprinted, revised, at Paris (7 vols. 4to, 1729); and Amsterdam (1735, 17 vols. 12mo).—Life of Descartes (1692).—Treatise on Devotion in the Blessed Virgin Mary (1698). This work was condemned at Rome in 1695, and denounced to the Sorbonne as soon as it appeared as derogating from the worship due to the Virgin:—Les Vies des Saints, his most celebrated work, printed in 1701, in 8 vols. fol. and in 12 vols. 8vo; and reprinted in 1740 and 1741. He is author of the Histoire des Fêtes Mobiles et Les Vies des Saints de l'Ancien Testament, in 4 vols. fol. and 17 vols. 8vo. These last editions are the most highly esteemed. Baillie also published several less important works, and left thirty-five folio volumes in MS., containing the catalogue of the library of Lamoignon. During the twenty-six years that he was librarian to that gentleman, he only went out once a week; all the rest of his time he spent in reading or conversing with the savans. He slept only five hours, and most frequently in his clothes.—Bibl. Univ. iii, 226; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Baillie (or Bailey), Rosam. R., a Scotch theologian, was born at Glasgow, April 30, 1692, and educated at the university of that town. During the rebellion he was an active opponent of Episcopacy, and he obtained much credit for his refusal in 1637 to preach before the General Assembly in favor of the liturgy and canons, which the king was desirous to introduce into Scotland. In 1638 he was appointed a member of the consistory at Glasgow, and at the same time held the chair of divinity at Oxford. A memoir was agreed upon, and in 1640 he was deputed to London to carry the accusations of the lords of the covenant against Laud. In 1642 he was appointed professor of divinity in the University of Glasgow. In 1648 he was sent as one of the commissioners of the Scotch Presbyterians to the assembly at Westminster. He excommunicated the murder of the king, and denounced
It as a horrible parricide, and was always faithful to the house of Stuart. Charles II would have made him bishop, but, true to his principles, Baillie refused this. He was said to know twelve or thirteen languages, and was versant in them. In 1661 he was appointed president of the university. In 1662 he died. Of Baillie's works, the most important are, Discussions from the Erotes of the Time (4to, London, 1645);—Anacatapecia, the true Fountain of Indepedency, Brownism, Autonomy, Familism, etc. (a second part of the Discussions, 4to, London 1647);—Appendice Pratica ad Joannis Ducorti Episcopi Graecorum Acta, Historica, selecta, Opera Historica et Chronologica Liber Duo (6o, Amst., 1663, and Basil, 1669). He also published several sermons and other short tracts. But all of the produce of his pen, by far the most interesting part consists of his Letters, written to various friends, which throw much light on the history of the times. A complete edition was produced under the care of David Laing, Esq. (in 3 vols. crown 8vo, Edinb. 1841–42), with annotations and a life of Baillie. See Hetherington, Church of Scotland, ii, 185.

Bainbridge or Bambridge, Christopher, archbishop of York, and cardinal-priest of the Roman Church, was born at Hulton, in Westmoreland, and educated at Oxford. He was ordained in 1695. In 1705 he was advanced to the see of Durham, and was translated the next year to the archbishopric of York. Bainbridge distinguished himself chiefly by his embassy to King Henry VII to Pope Julius II, who created him cardinal of St. Praxedes in March, 1511. His letter to King Henry VIII concerning the pope's bull, giving him the title of Most Christian King, is extant in Rymer's Fadura (ed. 1704–1735, xii, 576). Cardinal Bainbridge died at Rome, July 14, 1514. His death was caused by poisoning administered by Rinaldo de Moresca, a priest whom he had employed in menial offices, and who, after confessing that he was suborned to this act by Sylvester de Giglia, bishop of Worcester, who was at that time envoy from King Henry VIII to Rome, committed suicide. See Engl. Cyclop. s. v.; Biog.Britan. ed. 1778, i, 515; Wood, Athenae Oxon. ed. Bliss, ii, 700.

Bainiez, Ralph, was born in Yorkshire and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge: he was eminent as a Hebraist, and was made regius professor of Hebrew at Paris. In 1554 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry; in 1559 he was ejected by Queen Elizabeth, and very shortly after died at Islington. He wrote a Commentary on the Proverbs, 1556, and a few Hebrew works. Redwin, De Præs. Angl. p. 324.

Baird, Robert, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister and philanthropist, was born in Fayette Co., Penn., October 6, 1798. After academical training at Uniontown, he entered Washington College, and passed thence to Jefferson College, where he graduated in 1818. After spending a year as a teacher in Bellefonte, where he was a frequent newspaper contributor, he went to the Presbyterian theological seminary at Princeton, where he was ordained for the ministry of the gospel and was tutor in the college. In 1822 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and in the same year took charge of an academy in Princeton, which position he held for five years. In 1828 he was ordained to the work of the Gospel ministry. In 1827 he purchased and laid the field of the New Jersey Bible Society, "the extension of Protestantism and the evangelization of the world, in connection with the great religious and benevolent societies." He took a leading part in the movement made by the New Jersey Bible Society to supply every destitute family in New Jersey with the Scriptures. He was appointed chairman of the committee into whose hands he referred all such associations as wished to have the Bible, and, in a few months, the committee had a circulation of 40,000. Before the completion of the New Jersey Bible Society, the committee was dissolved, and the New Jersey Missionary Society was organized. The New Jersey Missionary Society, Dr. Baird did much to lay the foundation of public education in that state, and originated the first system of common schools established in the state, which, with few modifications, still remains in force. In 1829 he became agent of the American Home Missionary Society, which engaged in the work of missions all over the country, doing much to advance the influence of the society, and adding largely to its funds. In 1835 Dr. Baird went to Europe, and resided in Paris and Geneva, with the exception of a few months, for the next eight years. His primary object was to ascertain what the American churches could do to receive the rest of the world to its influence and to convert the Roman Catholics. Among the results of his labors was the formation of the Foreign Evangelical Society, since merged into the American and Foreign Christian Union, of which he was one of the founders. In the Scandinavian countries, in Russia and in Germany, he met with extraordinary success in giving an impulse to the temperance reform. His exertions in behalf of the Bible and Tract Societies were confined to no single country of Europe, while his intercessions for the persecuted were put forth alike in Protestant Sweden and in Roman Catholic France. His recent translation of the Sacred Scriptures in the modern Russ, under the auspices of the imperial government, are believed to have been greatly attributable to Dr. Baird's strenuous personal efforts. To the cause of Protestantism, of temperance, and of education, Dr. Baird was enthusiastically devoted. Possessed of a fine personal appearance, of considerable ability, and of a talent for manner, an accomplished linguist, and a man of broad information, Dr. Baird had a large personal acquaintance among the great and good men of America and Europe. He was admitted to interviews and discussions with all the monarchs that rule the destinies of the Old World. His thorough business instinct, his pure religious character, and his unbounded charity, stamped him as a man who could give counsel to kings, and who had access by right to every source of influence and power. In 1843 he returned to America, continuing to be corresponding secretary of the Foreign Evangelical Society of the American and Foreign Christian Union (with slight interruption, and making several visits to Europe) to the time of his death, March 15, 1863.

This brief sketch suffices to show Dr. Baird as an indefatigable laborer. His sympathies were eminently catholic, and his activities were cosmopolitan. His name, and the name of his person, were known in the most distant branches of the church throughout the United States and Europe. Amid his incessant missionary labors and travels he found time also for a large literary activity. Besides numerous reports for the benevolent societies with which he was connected, and many contributions to newspapers, magazines, and reviews, he wrote a View of the Valley of the Mississippi (Phila. 1832, 12mo); Memoir of Anna Jane Linnard (Phila. 1835, 18mo); Memoir of the Rev. Joseph Sanford (Phila. 1836, 12mo); Histoire des Sociétés de Tempérance des États-Unis d’Amérique (Paris, 1836, 12mo; translated into German, Dutch, Danish, Finnish, Russ, and Swedish); And the better to the commencement des sociétés (Paris, 1837); L’Union de l’Église et de l’État dans la Nouvelle Angleterre (Paris, 1837, 18mo); Visit to Northern Europe (N. Y. 1841, 2 vols. 12mo); Religion in America (Glasgow and Edinburgh, 1842, 8vo; translated into German, Dutch, French, Swedish, etc.); revised ed. N. Y. 1859); The great Protestant and Free churches in Italy (Bologna, 1841); Histoire des sociétés (Paris, 1845, 12mo); Christian Register and Register (N. Y. 1851, 12mo, in part);—*See Life of Dr. Baird, by his son, Prof. H. M. Baird (N. Baius, or De Bay, Michael, a Romanist writer of eminence, was born at Melia in 1518, and studied at Louvain. In 1561 he was appointed professor of theology at Louvain, as substitute for Professor Tapper, who died. The Council of the College, however, induced him to continue his lectures, which he delivered in this capacity gave great offence, and when Tapper and Ravenstein returned, they denounced eighteen propositions taken from his lectures and writings to the faculty of theology at Paris as heretical. In 1560 a censure was issued by that body, whereby three of these dogmas were declared to be erroneous and fifteen either wholly or partly heretical.

The following propositions and the corresponding censures may be cited:

"Proposition 4. Free-will is in itself sinful; and every act of the free-will, left to itself, is either mortal or venial sin."—Censure. This proposition is heretical in both its parts.

"Proposition 5. Man sins in every thing that depends on himself, and cannot avoid sinning."—Censure. This proposition is heretical.

"Proposition 7. A schismatic or a heretic, or a man who is not purely an infidel, may sometimes merit eternal life by merit of condescendence."—Censure. This proposition is heretical.

"Proposition 11. Contrition does not remit sin without the sacrament of baptism or that of penance, except in cases of martyrdom or of extreme necessity."—Censure. This proposition is heretical.

"Proposition 12. If a sinner does all that is ordered him, neither his contrition nor his confession avail to the remission of his sin, unless the priest gives him absolution, even though the priest refuse absolution out of malice, or unreasonably."—Censure. This proposition is heretical.

"Proposition 14. Grace is never given to those who oppose it, and the same holds of the first Justification: for Justification is faith itself, and it is through faith that the sinner is made righteous."—Censure. The first two parts are heretical, and the last false.

"Proposition 16. No one is without original sin, save Jesus Christ only; and, accordingly, the Blessed Virgin died owing to the sin which she had contracted in Adam; and all her sufferings in this life were, like those of all the other righteous, the penalty of actual or original sin."—Censure. This proposition is heretical in all its parts, and injurious to the Blessed Virgin and all the saints.

Francesque appealed against the doctrines of Baius to the Cardinal Granvelle, governor of the Low Countries, but he refused to receive the appeal, and enjoined silence on all parties. Baius and John Hes- sels were sent, in 1563, to the Council of Trent by Granvelle as deputies of the University of Louvain. At the council the learning and talent of Baius gained him general admiration. On his return he published several works on the controverted points, viz. De Meritio Operum (1561):—De Prima Hominis Justitia et Virtutibus Impiorum (1565):—De Sacramentis in Genere contra Calvinum (1565):—De Libero Hominis Arbitrio, de Charitate et Justificatione (1566). The controversy was very vigourous, and carried on by Baius, who died in 1567. Pius V issued a bull condemning seventy-six dogmas, but without naming Baius, for whom he had great regard; and to this Baius, after having written to the pope, was compelled to yield, which he did before Mottilion, the grand vicar of the Cardinal Granvelle, and after that of Cardinal Tollemache. He was made inquisitor-general of Holland. He died September 16th, 1589.

His doctrine (called Bautism) was afterward taken up by the Jansenists. His works were edited by Quesnel and Gerberon (Colon, 1696, 2 vols. 140); the edition was condemned at Rome, 1567.—Bibl. Cant. 1645:—Bibl. Historie, 1581, part i. 947:—Douay, Dictionary, s. v.; Kuhn (R. C.): Dogmatik, p. 480 sq.; answered by Schaezler (R. C.), Dogma v. der Gnad (Mainz, 1855, 8vo); Wetter u. Wette, Kirchen-Leitikon, s. v.

The bull of Pius V is given in Duns, Theologia, vii, 199.

Baj‘ith (Heb. with the art. hab-ba‘ith, הַבַּעַית, the house), taken by some to be the name of a city in Moab, where there may have been a celebrated idol temple. It occurs in the prophecy against Moab (Isa. xv, 2): "He is gone up to Baalith and to Dibon, the high places to weep," which passage is thus interpreted by Bishop Lowth: "He is used for the people of Moab. Bajith and Dibor are in the Chaldee and Syriac versions made into the name of one place, Beth-Dibon. Beth [i.e. Bajith] may signify the house or temple of an idol." The Sept. has Bajith הַבַּעַית, Vulg. Arcadiit domus. Grenier (Comment. ex Jov., i. 71) understands it as referring, not to a place of this name, but to the "high places" in the same sentence (comp. xvi, 12). The allusion has been supposed to be to Beth-Baal- meon, or Beth-diblahathim, which are named in Jer. xlix, 29, as here, with Dibon and Nelus. In view of this view Henderson (Comment. in loc.) coincides. See BAAoth.

Babak‘ak‘ar (Heb. Babbakk‘ar, בָּבֵבָךְ, a battle; Sept. Baszaeixiop), the head of one of the families of the Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii, 51; Neh. vii, 53). B.C. ante 536.

Babkulk‘ah (Heb. Babbuk‘ah, בָּבָבּוּקָה, prob. wounding of Jehorah; Sept. Baszaeixiop, Baoziqia, but other copies omit), a Levite, "second among his brethren," who dwelt at Jerusalem on the return from Babylon (Neh. xi, 17; xii, 9, 25, where the identity is proved by the associated names). B.C. post 536.

Bake (אֵבָא, opakh). This domestic operation was usually, among the ancient Israelites, committed to the females or slaves of the family (Gen. viii, 6; Lev. xxvi, 26; 1 Sam. viii, 18; xxvii, 24; 2 Sam. xii, 8; Matt. xiii, 38; comp. Jer. viii, 18; xliv, 19; see the Mishna, Challah, ii, 7; Thilo, Cod. apocryph. t, 96; Pirn., xvii, 28; Arbeius, Vocab. i, 226; v. 418; Buxtorf, Sac. Hist. ii, 46; Russell, Antiquities, i, 180; Robinson, i, 180), but later they had regular bakers (אֵבָא, opaks), Hos. vii, 4, 6; comp. Joseph. Ant. xv, 9, 2), and in Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvi, 21) there was a special "Bakers' Street" (baazarah, forum pistorium). See MECHANIC. The dough (אֵבָא, batek‘), Sept. στοιχις, was made of wheat, barley, or spelt flour (Mishna, Shebath, iii, 2), and every family took care to bake their own supply in small quantities fresh daily (comp. Arbeius, i, 69; iii, 227; Tavernier, ii, 280; Harmer, Antiq. of the Jews, ii, 215; Hoad, in a wooden bowl or trough (אֵבָא, misha‘ret), Exod. xii, 29; comp. Shaw, Tov. p. 231; Rosenmuller, Morgenl. i, 303 sq.), leavened (an act denoted by the verb אֵב, chamat) properly (Pline, xvii, 26), and kneaded (an operation designated by בָּשֹּׁה, lade). The femur was omitted whenever it was necessary to bake in haste (Gen. xix, 3; Exod. xii, 24, sq. 40; Judg, vi, 19; 1 Sam. xxviii, 24; comp. Pline, xvii, 27), and the modern Bedouins scarcely use leaven at all (Arbeius, iii, 227; Robinson, iii, 76); and even in cities, for the most part, bread is baked under lock and key in the East (Ruttm. i, 119). See PASSOVER; LEAVEN. The bread is made in the form of long or round cakes (אֵבָא תַּקְקֶרֶת, kikkeroth le‘chem, Exod. xxiii, 23; 1 Sam. ii, 36; Judg. viii, 5; Sept. κολλωρίτ αποκυρ, of the size of a plate and the thickness of the thumb (Korte, *Res. p. 486; Russell, *Alex. p. 146; Harmer, *Obs. iii, 60 sq.; Robinson, ii, 486); hence in eating they were not cut, but broken (Isa. vii, 7; Matt. xiv, 19; xxvi, 26; Acts xx, 11; comp. Xenoph. *Anak. vii, 8, 92; Plaut. *Pens. iii, 5, 19; Curt. iv, 2, 14; Robinson, ii, 497). See Meal. The proper oven ("אֹמֵד, tannur"), comp. Hos. vii, 4, 6), which in Oriental cities is sometimes public (Shaw, *Trav. p. 202; Harmer, i, 246), differs little from ours (Arvieux, iii, 229). But, besides these, use was principally made of large stone jars, open at the mouth, about three feet high, with a fire made inside (regularly with wood, comp. Isa. xliiv, 15, but on occasion also of dry dung, Ezek. iv, 12; comp. Arvieux, iii, 228; Korte, p. 438; see Fuel), for baking bread and cakes, as soon as the sides were sufficiently heated, by applying the thin dough to the exterior (according to others, to the interior surface likewise), the opening at the top being closed (comp. Arvieux, *iii, 227; Niebuhr, *Beob. p. 57; Tavernier, *i, 280; Rüppell, v, 24). Such a pot is still called tannur by the Arabs (Michaelis, Orient. Bibl. vii, 176). Another mode of baking, which is still very common in the East, consists either in filling a shallow pit with red-hot gravel-stones, which, as soon as they have imparted their heat to the hole, are taken out and the cakes of dough laid in their place (Tavernier, i, 64); or a jar is half filled with hot pebbles and the dough spread on the surface of these (Arvieux, iii, 229). This preparation of bread is probably denoted by the מְמַלְמִים, mamlish, ygguth retapanim* ("cakes.baken on the coals"), of 1 Kings xix, 6. That baked regularly in the oven, on the other hand, is call.

The Israelites doubtless became early acquainted with the finer method of preparing bread practised among the Egyptians (comp. Exodus xii. 39), and the cook. The operations are delineated on the annexed cut, taken from the representations on the tombs of Ramses III at Thebes (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, a supplement, i, 174 sq.).—Winer, i, 129. Baker, Charles, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Clinton, R. I., April 7, 1738. In 1821 he was received into the New England Conference on probation, and subsequently labored for thirty-six consecutive years chiefly in Maine and Massachusetts. After eight years of superannuation, he died, in triumph, at Somerville, Mass., August 16, 1864.—Minutes of Conferences, 1865, p. 61.

Baker, Daniel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Jan. 21, 1791, and studied at Hampden Sidney College, and at Princeton, where he graduated A.B. in 1815. He studied theology with Mr. Hill, pastor of the Presbyterian church in Winchester, Va., and was ordained pastor of the church in Harrisonburg, Va., March 5, 1818. Finding himself called to the ministry, in 1821, he resigned his charge in 1821; and from 1822 to 1825, he was pastor in Washington D. C. Here John Quincy Adams was one of his hearers, and several acts of great kindness on the part of that eminent man are recorded in his life. Here he wrote A Scriptural View of Baptism, afterward expanded into a work with the quaint title, Baptism in a New Light, in which he is a revivalist having been noised abroad, he began to travel among the churches, and the remainder of his life was chiefly spent in this way. His travels extended throughout the Southern States, and even to Texas, where he finally settled. Here, among other labors, he founded Austin College, of which he was the first president. He died at Austin, Dec. 10, 1857.—Memoirs of Daniel Baker, by his Son (Philadelphia, 1859, 12mo).

Bakers, one of the scurilous names given by the heathen to the early Christians. In Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 14), the heathen interlocutor calls the Christians Plautinae propriae homines et pictores, "men of the race of Plautus, bakers." Jerome says that Plautus called himself a baker, that the Christian bakers might be able to make bread, and he compelled his bakers to add to their bread a certain grain, of which he gave the following reason: "For magic, like demons, is unable to bless" (In Num. Hom. xiii).

Bakor's language, "I will not whoso blest be blessed" (Num. xxii, 6), he considers as only designed to flatter Balaam, and render him compliant with his wishes. (See Bess; La prophéte de Balaam, Par. 1882.)

Balaam is one of those instances which meet us in Scripture of persons dwelling among heathens, but possessing a certain knowledge of the one true God. He was endowed with a greater than ordinary knowledge of God; he was possessed of high gifts of intellect and genius; he had the intuition of truth, and could see into the life of things—in short, he was a poet and a prophet. Moreover, he confessed that all these superior advantages were not his own, but derived from God, and were his gift. And thus, doubtless, he had won for himself, among his contemporaries far and wide, a high reputation for wisdom and sanctity. In Balaam's case, we see that he who was the blessed was also the cursed. Eldest, however, by his fame and his spiritual elevation, he had begun to conceive that these gifts were his own, and that they might be used to the furtherance of his own ends. He could make merchandise of them, and might acquire riches and honor by means of them. A. custom existed among many nations of antiquity of devoting enemies to destruction before entering upon a war with them. At this time the Israelites were marching forward to the occupation of Palestine; they were now encamped in the plains of Moab, on the east side of Jordan by Jericho. Balak, the king of Moab, having received the news that the Israelites had not done as he had expected upon others and perhaps partially deceived himself. When the elders of Moab and Midian told him their message, he seems to have some misgivings as to the lawfulness of their request, for he invited them to tarry the night with him, that he might learn how the Lord would regard it. These misgivings were confirmed by the express prohibition of God upon his journey. Balak reported the answer, and the messengers of Balak returned. The King of Moab, however, not deterred by this failure, sent again more and more honorable princes to Balaam, with the promise that he should be promoted to very great honor upon completing his request. The prophet again refused, but, notwithstanding, invited the embassy to tarry the night with him, that he might know what the Lord would say unto him farther; and thus, by his importunity, he extorted from God the permission he desired, but was warned at the same time that his actions would be overruled according to the Divine will. Balaam therefore proceeded on his journey with the messengers of Balak. But God's anger was kindled at this manifestation of self-will, and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him. The words of the Psalmist, "Be ye not like to horse and mule which have no understanding, whose mouths must be held with bit and bridle, otherwise they will not come near unto thee" (Psa. xxxii, 9), had they been familiar to Balaam, would have come home to him with most tremendous force; for never have they received a more forcible illustration than the comparison of Balaam's conduct to his Maker with his treatment of his ass affords us. The wisdom with which the tractable brute was allowed to "speak with man's voice," and "forbid" the untractable "madness of the prophet," is palpable and conspicuous. He was taught, moreover, that even she, the angelic, sent to behold the spiritual peculiarities which had relieved his eyes from his own, and to the end that he might rest from the morrow down upon his face. It is hardly necessary to suppose, as some do, that the event here referred to happened only in a trance or vision, though such an opinion might seem to be supported by the fact that our translators render the word 52 in xxiv, 4, 16, "falling into a trance," whereas no other idea than that of simple falling is conveyed by it. The Apostle Peter refers to it as a real historical event: "The divine man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet" (2 Pet. ii, 16). We are not told how these things happened, but that they did happen, and that it pleased God thus to interfere on behalf of His elect people, and to bring forth from the genius of a self-willed prophet, who thought that his talents were his own, strains of poetry bearing upon the destiny of the Jewish nation and the Church at large, which are not surpassed throughout the Mosaic records. It is evident that Balaam, although acquainted with God, was desirous of throwing an air of mystery round his wisdom, from the instructions of his masters. He offered to be the judge of the seven altars he everywhere prepared for him; but he seems to have thought also that these sacrifices would be of some avail to change the mind of the Almighty, because he pleads the merit of them (xxiii, 4), and after experiencing their impotency to effect such an object, "he went no more," we are told, "to seek for enchantments" (xxiv, 1). His religion, therefore, was probably such as would be the natural result of a general acquaintance with God not confirmed by any covenant. He knew Him as the fountain of wisdom; how to worship Him he could merely guess from the traditions of his country; and the customs of his forefathers, used by the patriarchs; to what extent they were efficient could only be surmised. There is an allusion to Balaam in the Prophet Micah (vi, 5), where Bishop Butler thinks that a conversation is preserved which occurred between him and the King of Moab upon this occasion, and which contains the points of the story. We must bear in mind that Balak is nowhere represented as consulting Balaam upon the acceptable mode of worshipping God, and that the directions found in Micah are of quite an opposite character to those which were given by the son of Beor upon the high-places of Baal. The prophet is recounting "the righteousness of the Lord" in delivering His people out of the hand of Moab under Balak, and at the mention of his name the history of Balaam comes back upon his mind, and he is led to make those noble reflections upon it which occur in the following verse. "The doctrine of Balaam is spoken of in Rev. ii, 14, where an allusion has been made to the false spirit of Balak. In the vision of the angel, mentioned in v. 15. See NICOLAITANS. Though the utterance of Balaam was overruled so that he could not curse the children of Israel, he nevertheless suggested to the Moabites the expedient of seducing them to commit fornication. The effect of this is recorded in ch. xxxv. A battle写了afterward fought against the Midianites, in which Balaam sided with them, and was slain by the sword of the people whom he had endeavored to curse (Num. xxxi, 8). B.C. 1618. (Comp. Bishop Butler's Sermons, serm. vii; Ewald, Gesch. des Volkes Israel, ii, 277; Stanley, Jewish Ch. 1, 299 sq.) Of the numerous parables which we find in "this strange mixture of a man," as Bishop Newton terms him, not the least striking is that with the practice of an art expressly forbidden to the Israelites ("there shall not be found among you one that useth divination" [Deut. xxiii, 16], "for all that do these things are an abomination to the Lord," ver. 12) he united the knowledge and worship of Jehovah, and was in the habit of receiving intimations of the future in a dream or vision as the Lord (Jehovah) shall speak unto me" (Num. xxii, 8). The inquiry naturally arises, by what means did he become acquainted with the true religion? Dr. Hengstenberg suggests that he was led to renounce idolatry through the reports that reached him of the miracles attending the Exodus; and that he experienced the deception of the soothsaying art, he hoped, by becoming a worshipper of the God of the Hebrews, to acquire fresh power over nature, and a clearer insight into futurity. Yet the sacred narrative gives us no reason to suppose that he had any previous knowledge of the Israelites. In Num. xxii, 11, he merely repeats Balaam's message, "Behold there is a people come out of Egypt," etc., without intimating that he had heard of the miracles wrought on their behalf. The allusion in Num. xxiii, 22, might be prompted by the divine affluence which he then felt. And had he been actuated in the first instance by motives of personal aggrandizement, it seems hardly probable that he would have concurred with those divine communications with which his language, in Num. xxiii, 8, implies a familiarity. Since, in the case of Simon Magus, the offer to "purchase the gift of God with money" (Acts viii, 20) called forth an immediate and awful recompense from the apostles, would not this be a fact to give a direct view to personal emolument and fame, have met with a similar repulse? Dr. Hengstenberg supposes, indeed, that there was a mixture of a higher order of sentiments, a sense of the wants of his moral nature, which led him to seek Jehovah, and laid a foundation. for intercourse with him. In the absence of more copious and precise information, may we not reasonably conjecture that Jacob's residence for twenty years in Mesopotamia cost him the maintenance of some lost ideas of religion, though mingled with much superstition? To this source, and the existing remains of patriarchal religion, Balaam was probably indebted for that truth which he unhappily "restrained by unrighteousness" (Rom. i, 18). (See Onder, De Bileama, Jen. 1715.)

"Balaam" is derived from balaim, a difference of opinion has long existed, even among those who fully admit its authenticity. The advocates for a literal interpretation urge that, in a historical work and a narrative bearing the same character, it would be unnatural to regard any of the occurrences as taking place in vision, unless expressly so stated; that it would be difficult to determine where the vision begins and where it ends; that Jehovah's "opening the mouth of the ass" (Num. xxii, 28) must have been an external act; and, finally, that Peter's language is decidedly in favor of the literal sense: "The dumb ass, speaking with a man's voice, reproved the madness of the prophet" (Matt. i, 23; cf. Pindar, in the speech of the ass). That the speaking of the ass and the appearance of the angel occurred in vision to Balaam (among whom are Maimonides, Leibnitz, and Hengstenberg) insist upon the fact that dreams and visions were the ordinary methods by which God made himself known to the prophets (Num. xii, 6); they remark that Balaam, in this instance, was not as in his historical narrative (xxvii, 8, 4, 15), speaks of himself as "the man who had his eyes shut," and who, on falling down in prophetic ecstasy, had his eyes opened; that he expressed no surprise on hearing the ass speak; and that neither his servants nor the Moabish princes who accompanied him seem to have been cognizant of any supernatural appearance. Dr. Jortin supposes that the angel of the Lord suffered himself to be seen by the beast, not by the prophet; that the beast was terrified, and Balaam smote her, and then fell into a trance, and in that state conversed first with the beast and then with the angel. The angel presented these objects to his imagination as strongly as if they had been before his eyes, so that this was still a miraculous or preternatural operation. In dreaming, many singular incongruities occur without exciting our astonishment; it is therefore not wonderful if the prophet conversed with his beast in vision without being startled by the phenomenon (see ibid. Dissertation on Balaam, p. 190-194). See Ass (of Balaam).

The limits of this article will not allow of an examination of Balaam's magnificent prophecies, which, as Herder remarks (Griech. d. Ehrb. Poesie, II, 221), "are distinguished for dignity, compression, vividness, and fulness of imagery. There is scarcely any thing equal to them in the later prophets," and "(he adds, what few readers, probably, of Deut. xxxii, xxxiii, will be disposed to admit) nothing in the discourses of Moses." Hengstenberg has ably discussed the doubts raised by De Wette and other German critics respecting the antiquity and genuineness of this portion of the Pentateuch (the Book of the Law). A full treatment of the Character and Prophecy of Balaam may be found in the Bib. Sac. 1846, p. 847 sqq.—Kitto, s. v.; Smith, s. v.

Baldan (Heb. Bala'don, בֶלֶדָן, Bel is his lord; Sept. Balaodon), a name used in a double capacity. First observers (Heb. Handks. s. v.) that, if of Semitic origin, it corresponds to the Phoenician Bal-Adon (בַּלֶּדָן, "Bal'Adon") of coins, Numid. v, 1; but as the associate name Merodach (q. v.) is prob. not Semitic, we may perhaps better derive Baldan from the Sanscrit balu (strength) and dhana (rich es), with the sense of valiant and wealthy.

1. The father of the Babylonian king Merodach, baldan (2 Kings xx, 12; Isa. xxix, 1). B.C. ante 711. See MERODACH-BALADAN.

2. A surname of Merodach-Baladan (Isa. xxix, 1), or Merodach-baladan (2 Kings xx, 12) himself (q. v.).

Bala'h (Heb. בָּלָה, בָּלָה, Bala', balah), the contraction of the name Balalah or Bilah; Sept. Balah v. Balah, a city in the tribe of Simeon, mentioned in connection with Hamath and Azor (Josh. xix, 8). It seems to have been the same with that elsewhere called Bialah (1 Chron. iv, 29) or Baalah (Josh. xv, 29), and, if so, must have been transferred to Judah, or so accounted in later times, like many other cities of this region. See BIZOTJILAH.

Bala'ak (Heb. בָּלָאָק, בָּלָאָאָק, empty; Sept. and N. T. Bala'ak, Balaacea, Bulaqua, Att. iv, 6, 2; son of Zipor, and king of the Moabites (Num. xxiii, 2, 4); he was an ally of the heathen army of the Israelites, who, in their passage through the desert, had encamped near the confines of his territory, that he applied to Balaam, who was then reputed to possess great influence with the higher spirits, to curse them. B.C. 1616. But his hostile designs (Josh. xxix, 2) were frustrated. See Balaam. From Judg. xi, 25, it is clear that Balaak was so certain of the fulfilment of Balaam's blessing, "Blessed is he that bleakest thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee" (Num. xxix, 9), that he never afterward made the least military attempt to oppose the Israelites (comp. Mic. vi, 5; Rev. ii, 14).—Kitto, s. v.

4, and the Abel-maim (q. v.) of Scripture. Roland (Pudde, p. 615, 622) inclines, however, to identify it with the Bellonoch (Bellouoch) stated by Epiphanius (Vit. Prophetarum, p. 344) to have been the native place of the prophet Hosaeus, and called Belemon (Bellouoch) in the Pachal Chronicle.

Balances (Heb. in the dual שָׁבָּכִים, mosene' gyn, i. e. two poisers; and so the Chald. equivalent, בָּכִים, mosene'a' gyn, Dan. 27; once the Heb. הַשֱּׁבֵּכַח, bacheh, prop. a branch, as of "cane," used in the sing. Isa. xlvi, 6, the rod or beam of a steel-yard; in Rev. vi, 5, צַנָּבַח, a gale, hence a "pair of balances" or scale.) In the early periods of the world gold and silver were paid by weight, so that persons employed in traffic of any kind carried with them a pair of scales or balances and different weights (generally stones of different sizes) in a pouch or bag. Fraudulent men would carry two sorts of weights, the lighter to sell with and the other to buy with (Mic. vi, 11). Balances or scales of various forms are frequently seen upon the most ancient Egyptian monuments, and were also used for dividing the spoil by the ancient Assyrian warriors (Bonomil, Nineveh, p. 163, 268; they bear a general resemblance to those now in use, and most likely they are similar to those used by the ancient Hebrews (Lev. xix, 36).

Among the Egyptians large scales were generally a flat wooden board, with four ropes attached to a ring at the extremity of the beam; and those of smaller size were of bronze, one and a half inch in diameter, pierced near the edge in three places for the strings. The principle of the common balance was simple and ingenious: the beam passed through a ring suspended from a horizontal rod, immediately above and parallel to it, and when equally balanced, the ring, which was large enough to allow the beam to play freely, showed when the scales were equally poised, and had the additional effect of preventing the beam tilting when the goods were taken out of one and the weights suffered to remain in the other scale. To the lower part of the ring a small plummet was fixed, and this being touched by the hand, and found to hang freely, indicated without the necessity of looking at the beam, that the weight was just. The figure of a baboon was sometimes placed upon the top, as the emblem of the god Thoth, the regulator of measures, of time, and of writing, in his character of the moon; but there is no appearance of the goddess of justice being connected with the balance, except in the judgment scenes of the dead. The pair of scales was the ordinary and, apparently, only scale used by the Egyptians, no instance of the steel-yard being met with in the paintings of Thebes or of Beni Hassan; and the introduction of the latter is confined to a Roman era. The other kind of balance, whose invention has been ascribed by Pliny to Dedalus, is shown to have been known and applied in Egypt at least as early as the time of the Eightha. One kind of balance used for weighing gold [see Dolphiinus] differed slightly from those of ordinary construction, and was probably more delicately formed. It was made, as usual, with an upright pole, rising from a broad base or stand, and a cross-beam turning on a pin at its summit; but instead of a string suspending the scales, there was an iron rod either side, terminating in a hook, to which the gold was attached in small bags (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. abridg. ii, 151, 152). See Weight.

A pair of scales is likewise a well-known symbol of a strict observation of justice and fair dealing. It is thus used in several places of Scripture, as Job xxxi, 31; Psa. lxix, 13; Prov. vii, 1, and xlvi, 11. But it is joined with symbols denoting the sale of corn and fruits by weight, becomes the symbol of scarcity; bread by weight being a curse in Lev. xxvi, 26, and in Ezek. iv, 16, 17. So in Rev. vi, 5, "He that sat upon him had a pair of balances in his hand." Here the balance is used to sell corn and the necessaries of life, in order to signify great want and scarcity, and to threaten the world with famine. See Scales.

Balas. See Alexander.

Balas'amus (or rather  Baalas'amus, Ba'al-samoe; comp. Belsamem in the art. Baal.), the last named of those that stood at the right hand of Ezra while reading the law (1 Esdr. ix, 43); but the corresponding name in the true text (Neh. viii, 4) is Massehah (q. v.).

Bald (prop. בַּלְּד, kareh, nght. 6, naturally bare of hair on the top or back of the head; Sept. ψαλακρός; different is the בַּלְדָּה, balad, diseased loss of hair on forehead, Lev. xiii, 41; Sept. ἁμαθολειτος). There are two kinds of baldness, viz., artificial and natural. The latter has to be understood under the "scab" and "deafness" (Lev. xxii, 20, perhaps i. q. demurraf), which were disqualifications for priesthood (Mishna, Berachoth, vii, 2). In Lev. xiii, 29 sq., very careful directions are given to distinguish the scull (תַּבָּה, tibah, "freckled spot," ver. 89), described as "a plague (תִּבְּכָה, tibkah, stroke upon the head and beard" (which probably is the Mentagra of Pliny, and is a sort of leprosy), from mere natural baldness which is pronounced to be clear. vi, 40 (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. 1855, S. 247). But this shows that even natural baldness subjected men to an unpleasant suspicion. It was a defect with which the Israelites were by no means familiar, since the Egyptians were very rarely subject to it, according to Herodotus (iii, 12); an immunity which he attributes to their constant shaving. They adopted this practice for purposes of cleanliness, and generally wore wigs, some of which have been found in the ruins of Thebes. Contrary to the general practice of the East, they only let the hair grow as a sign of mourning (Herod. ii, 36), and shaved themselves on all joyous occasions; hence in Gen. xii, 44, we have a man undistinguishable from the same and similar ones in China and among the modern Egyptians, who shave off all the hair except the shooareh, a tuft on the forehead and crown of the head (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. iii, 359 sq.; Lane, Mal. Egypt. i, ch. 1). Baldness was despised both among Greeks and Romans. In Homer (II. ii, 219) it is one of the defects of Thebes; and Aristophanes probably means it in Thespis, Pist. 767; Ec. 550) takes pride in not joining in the ridicule against it (Neb. 540). Caesar is said to have had some deformity of this sort, and he generally endeavored to conceal it (Suet. Ces. 49; comp. Dom. 18).
In 1770 he was ordained minister of the first Cong. church in Danbury. In the Revolution he was an ardent Whig, and, as chaplain in the army, contracted the disease of which he died, Oct. 1, 1776.—Sprague, Annals, i, 166.

Baldwin, Elihu Whittlesey, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, born in Greene Co., N. Y., Dec. 29, 1786; and educated at Yale and Andover, was licensed to preach in 1817, and by his labors established the Seventh Presb. Church in New York, of which he became pastor in 1820. In 1885 he became president of Wabash College, at that time a very arduous post, on account of the pay and expenses in which the institution was involved. In 1889 Mr. Baldwin received the degree of D.D. from Indiana College. He died Oct. 15, 1840, having published several tracts and sermons.—

Baldwin, Thomas, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Boxrah, Conn., Dec. 28, 1758, and died at Waterville, Me., Aug. 29, 1826. Though educated among Pendletonists, he adopted Baptist views, and was clastified by immersion in 1781. In the following year he began to preach, and was ordained in 1788 pastor of the Baptist church in Canaan, N. H., where he was residing. In 1790 he removed to Boston, taking charge of the Second Baptist Church in that place. In 1794 he received the degree of A.M. from Brown University, and in 1803 was made a fellow of that body.
From the latter year till his death he was the chief ed-or of the "Mass. Bapt. Miss. Magazine," published in Boston. Dr. Baldwin published several pamphlets on baptism and communion, besides "A Series of Letters In Answer to the Rev. Samuel Worcester," published in 1810, and various tracts and sermons.—Sprague,

Bale, John (Baluns), bishop of Osorr, an English historian and theologian, was born at Cove Hithe, in Suffolk, Nov. 21, 1465, and was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he early gained a reputation for letters and opposed the Reformation. He attributes his conversion to Lord Wentworth, and soon began to write against Romanism; and although protected for a time by the Earl of Essex, he was, after the death of Cromwell, obliged to retire into Flanders. He returned under Edward VI, and received the living of Bishopstocke, in Hampshire. On Feb. 2, 1553, he was made bishop of Osorr. When Edward died he took refuge at Ba-ale, where he remained till 1559, when he returned into England, and, refusing to resume his episcopal tradi-ons (he at first did not desire), he was made prebend of the Church of Canterbury, and died there, Nov. 5, 1563.
His chief work is his Illustrum majoris Britanniae Scriptorum Summarium, first printed at Ipswich in 1549. This dition contained only five centuries of writers; but an enlarged edition was published at Baze in 1557, etc., naming nine centuries, under the following title: Scrito-rum Illustrum M. Britanniae, quam nunc Argi-cam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus, a Jepheo per 8618 annum usque ad annum hunc Domini 1657, ex Beross, Gen-nodio, Bedo, ecc. collecta; and in 1563 a third dition expected. He was a very voluminous writer; a long list of his printed c works is given by Fuller, and also in the Engl. Cy-clopaedia (s. v. Bale). His works were placed on the prohibitory Index, printed at Madrid in 1667, as those of a heretic of the first class. No character has been more variously represented than Bale's. Geemer, in his Biblia, calls him a writer of the greatest diligence, and Bishop Godwin gives him the character of a laborious inquirer into British antiquities. Similar praise is also bestowed upon him by Vogler (Introduct.
Universali, in Notit. Scriptor.). Anthony A Wood, however, styles him "the foul-mouthed Bale. Hearne (Pref. to Hemm.) calls him "Baleus in multo mando-dex." And even Fuller (Worthies, last edit. ii, 882) says "Bilious Baleus passeth for his true character." He inveighed with much asperity against the pope and papists, and his intemperate zeal, it must be acknowledged, often carried him beyond the bounds of decency and candor. Fuller, in his Church History (cen. ix, p. 68), pleads for Bale's railing against the papists. "Old age and ill usage," he says, "will make any man angry. When young, he had seen their superstition; when old, he felt their oppression."
The greatest fault of Bale's book on the British writers is its multiplicity of their works by frequently giving the heads of chapters or sections of a book as the titles of distinct treatises. A selection from his works was published by the Parker Society (Cambridge, 1849, 8vo). See Strype, Memorials of Cranmer, p. 206, 360; Collier, Eccl. Hist. v, 600; Fenner Cyclopedia. s. v.

Balfour, Walter, was born at St. Ninian's, Scotland, 1776, and educated in the Scotch Church at the expense of Mr. Robert Haldane. After some years' "practising he came to America, and became a Baptist about 1806. In 1823 he avowed himself a Universalist, and labored, both as preacher and writer, in behalf of Universalism until his death at Charlestown, Mass., tmore, Memoir of Rev. W. Balfour (Boston. 1880).

Balguay, John, an English divine, was born at Sheffield in 1666, and educated at Cambridge, where he passed M.A. in 1726. In the Bangorian controversy (q. v.) he maintained the views of Bishop Hoadley, and wrote, in 1718, 1719, several tracts on the dispute.
In 1726, in view of the indulgent principles of Lord Shaftesbury, he published A Letter to a Deist, and The Foundation of Moral Virtue. These, with others, are given in A Collection of Tracts, by the Rev. J. Balguay (Lond.
1784, 8vo). His Sermons (2 vols. 8vo) had reached a third edition in 1790. Balguay was a "laxitudinarian"
(q. v.) in theology. He died in 1784.—Allibone, s. v.

Balguay, Thomas, D.D., son of John, was born in Yorkshire in 1716, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where in 1741 he became M.A., and in 1758 D.D. In 1757, under the patronage of Hoadley, he was made prebendary of Winchester, and afterward archdeacon of Salisbury and Winchester. He abandonned Hoadley's "laxitudinarianism," and brought his sound scholarship to the "defence of the Christian religion and of the English Church." He wrote a number of excellent sermons and charges, which may be found in his Discourses on various Subjects, edited by Drake, with a Memoir of Balguay (Cambridge, 1822, 2 vols. 8vo). He wrote, also, Divine Benedictions inducated from the Epistles of St. Paul (Lond. 2d ed. 1803, 12mo). He died unmarried, Jan. 19, 1795. See Hook, Eccl. Biog. i, 477; Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Ball (ball, du), well known as being used in vari-cous sports and games from the earliest times, several kinds of which are depicted on the Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, i, 108 sq. abridged). The word occurs in this sense in Isa. xxii, 18, but in a subsequent chapter (xxii, 3) it is employed as a ring or circle, and translated "round about" in the prophecies of the siege of Jerusalem. In Ezek. xxiv, 5, in the symbol of the same event, it is translated "turn," but probably means twist, as in the margin.

Among the Egyptians the balls were made of leather or skin, sewed with string, crosswise, in the same manner as the women of Egypt. The Greek Autzy were of corn; and those which have been found at Thebes are about three inches in diameter. Others were made of string, or of the stalks of rushes platted together so as to form a circular mass, and covered, like the former, with leather. They appear also to have a smaller kind of ball, probably of the same materials, and covered, like many of our own, with slips of leather of an elliptical shape, sewed together longitudinally, and meeting in a common point at both ends, each alter-ate slip being of a different color; but these have only been met with in pottery (Wilkinson, i, 200).

Ball, John, a Roman priest, who seems to have imbibed Wickliffe's doctrines, and who was (previously to 1386) excommunicated repeatedly for preaching "errors, and schisms, and scandals against the pope, archbishops, bishops, and clergy." He preached in favor of the rebellion of Wat Tyler, and was executed

Ball, John, a Puritan divine, was born in 1565, at Cassington, in Oxfordshire. He studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, and was admitted a fellow of and passed his life in poverty on a small cure at Whitmore, Staffordshire, to which was united the care of a school. He died in 1640. His Catechism had gone through fourteen editions before the year 1632, and has had the singular lot of being translated into Turkish, Lat., and Flem. (London 1636). It has also passed through many editions. He published also The Power of Godliness and other treatises (Lond.
1567, fol.) See Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, i, 108.

Balle, Nikolai Ediniger, a distinguished Lutheran theologian of Denmark, was born in 1744 in Zealand, became in 1772 Professor of Theology at Copenhagen, and in 1784 Professor of Theology at Halle, in Prussia.
He wrote, Theses theologicae (Copenhagen. 1776), and A Mammal of Religious Dogmatics (Copenhagen. 1781); he was also the editor of a magazine for modern church history of Denmark (Magazin fur den nyere danske Kirkehistorie, Cop-then 1792-94, 2 vols.).

Ballermine, Peter and Jerome, brothers, priests of Verona, distinguished for their learning. Peter was the Prior of the Monastery in 1702, and is said to have lived very frugally, wrote several books, and studied together, and published, in conjunction and separately, many important works on jurisprudence and theology. Among these were, The Works of Car-

Ballimathem (ballimathem, from ballame,) is generally understood to refer to those wanton dances which were practised at marriage festivals, but sometimes indicates the practice of playing on cymbals and other musical instruments. The word ballame means to throw the legs and feet about rapidly; hence to dance a certain lively dance peculiarly popular among Greece and Sicily. The words ballet and ball are from this root. The Council of Laodicea, and the third Council of Toledo, forbade the promiscuous and lasci-ious dancing of men and women together under this name, which is generally interpreted sensuous dances associated with lascivious songs. Ambrose, Chrysostom, and others of the fathers, are faithful in condemning the practices which were adopted in their day at marriage ceremonies, many of which were highly disgraceful. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. xvi, ch. 2, § 10.

Ballou, Hosea, a Universalist minister, was born April 30th, 1771, at Richmond, N. H. At an early age he joined the Baptist Church, of which his father was a minister, but was soon expelled after account of his embracing Universalist and Unitarian opinions. At the age of twenty-one he became an itinerant preacher of the then new doctrines he had adopted. His abilities and acquisition of a large attendance, he was invited in 1794 to a permanent charge at Dana, Mass., which he accepted. In 1802 he removed to Barnard, Vt.; in 1807, to Portsmouth, N. H.; and in 1815, to Salem, Mass. Two years later he accepted the charge of the Second Universalist Society at Boston, where he held till his death, June 7th, 1852. Mr. Ballou was an industrious writer. In 1819 he commenced the Universalist Magazine; and in 1831 the Universalist Expositor (now the Universalist Quarterly). He published The Doctrine of Future Retribution (1834), and numerous other controversial works, besides Notes on the Parables: A Treatise on the Atonement; and several volumes of Sermons. See Whittemore, Life of the Rev. H. Ballou.

Balm (for the original term, see below), a production more particularly ascribed to Gilead (Gen. xxxvii, 25; Jer. viii, 22). Balm or balsam is used as a common name for many of those oily, resinous substances which flow spontaneously or by incision from certain trees or plants, and are of considerable use in medicine and surgery. Kimchi and some of the modern interpreters understand the Heb. word rendered "balm" to be that particular species called opobalsamum, or balm of Gilead, so much celebrated by Pliny, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Tacitus, Justin, and others, for its costliness, its medicinal virtues, and for being the product of Judea only; and which Josephus says grew in the neighborhood of Jericho, the tree, according to tradition, having been originally brought by the Queen of Sheba as a present to King Solomon. On the other hand, Bochart strongly contends that the balm mentioned Jer. viii, 22, could not possibly be that of Gilead, and considers it as no other than the resin drawn from the terebinth or turpentine tree. Pliny says, "The trees of the opobalsamum have a resemblance to fir-trees, but they are lower, and are planted and hallowed after the manner of vines. On a particular season of the year they sweat balm. The darkness of the place is, besides, as wonderful as the fruitfulness of it; for, though the sun shines nowhere hotter in the world, there is naturally a moderate and perpetual gloominess of the air." Mr. Buckingham observes upon this passage, that "the situation, boundaries, and local features of the valley of Jericho are accurately given in these details, though darkness, in the sense in which it is commonly understood, would be an improper term to apply to the gloom. At the present time there is not a tree of any description, either of palm or balsam, and scarcely any verdure or bushes to be seen, but the complete desolation is undoubtedly rather to be attributed to the cessation of the usual agricultural labors, and to the want of a proper distribution of water over it by the aqueducts, the remains of which evince that they were constructed chiefly for that purpose, rather than to any radical change in the climate or the soil." The balsam, carried originally, says Arab tradition, from Yemen by the Queen of Sheba, as a gift to Solomon, and planted by him in the gardens of Jericho, was brought to Egypt by Cleopatra, and planted at Alm-Sheemesh, now Mataar, in a garden which all the old travellers, Arab and Christian, mention with deep interest. The balsam of Jericho, or true balm of Gilead, has long been lost (De Sacy).

Balsam, at present, is procured in some cases from the fruit of a shrub which is indigenous in the mountains between Mecca and Medina. This shrub was cultivated in gardens in Egypt in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and that this was also the case in Palestine, in very early times, appears from the original text in Gen. xliii, 11, and Jer. xlv, 11. The balsam of Mecca has always been deemed a substance of the greatest value; though it is not the only one possessing medicinal properties, yet it is, perhaps, more eminently distinguished for them than other balsamic plants of the same genus, of which sixteen are enumerated by botanists, each exhibiting some peculiarity. There are three species of this balsam, two of which are shrubs, and the other a tree. In June, July, and August they yield their sap, which is received into an earthen vessel. The fruit, also, when pierced with an instrument, emits a juice of the same kind, and in greater abundance, but less rich. The sap extracted from the body of the tree or shrub is called the opobalsamum; the juice of the balsam fruit is denominated carpopalbsamum, and the liquid extracted from the branches when cut off, the xylobalsamum (Jahn, Bibl. Archaeol. i, § 74). According to Bruce, "The balsam is an evergreen shrub or tree, which grows to about fourteen feet high, spontaneously and without culture, in its native country, Azab, and all along the coast to Babelmandeb. The trunk is about eight or ten inches in diameter, the wood light and open, gummy, and outwardly of a reddish color, incapable of receiving a polish, and covered with a smooth bark, like that of a young cherry-tree. It is remarkable for a penury of leaves. The flowers are like those of the acacia, small and white, only that three hang upon three filaments or stalks, where the acacia has but one. Two of these flowers fall off, and leave a single fruit. After the blossoms follow yellow fine-scented seed, included in a reddish-black pulpy nut, very sweet, and containing a yellowish liquor like honey." A traveller, who as-alled into Palestine and Syria purposely to obtain a knowledge of this substance, it grew in Jericho and many other parts of the Holy Land. The cause of its total decay has been ascribed, not without reason, to the royal attention being withdrawn from it by the distractions of the country. In more recent times its name has been dropped, but in Egypt, for Prosper Alpinus relates that forty plants were brought by a governor of Cairo to the garden there, and ten remained when Belon travelled in Egypt, nearly two hundred and fifty years ago; but, whether from not agreeing with the African soil or otherwise, one died in the first century, and now there appears to be none. (See also Thomson, Land and Book, ii, 198, 457.) See GILAD, BALSAM.

The word balm occurs frequently in the Authorized Version, as in Gen. xxxvii, 25; xlii, 11; Jer. viii, 22; xlvi, 11; li, 8; and Ezek. xxvii, 17. In all these passages the Hebrew text has יִלְחָמ (yllakh), which is generally understood to be the true balsam, and is considered a produce of Gilead, a mountainous district, where the vegetation is that of the Mediterranean region and of Europe, with few traces of that of Africa or of Asia. Lee (Lev. p. 590) supposes it to be mastich, a gum obtained from the Pistacia Lenticia; but Gesenius defends the common rendering, balsam. It was the gum of a tree, or shrub growing near Gilead, and very precious. It was one of the best fruits of Palestine (Gen. xlii, 11), exported (Gen. xxxvii, 25; Ezek. xxvii, 17), and especially used for healing wounds (Jer. viii, 22; xlvi, 11; li, 8). The balsam was almost peculiar to Palestine (Strabo, xvi, 2, p. 763; Tac. Hist. v, 6; Plin. xii, 23, § 54; § 57, 58), distilling from a shrub near the vine and rue, which in the time of Josephus was cultivated in the neighborhood of Jericho and of the Dead Sea (Ant. xiv, 4, 1; xv, 4, 2), and still grows in gardens near Tiberias (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 328). In Ezek. xxvii, 17, the Auth. Ver. gives in the margin resin. The fact that the šorix grew originally in Gilead does not forbid us to identify it with the shrub mentioned by Josephus as cultivated near Jericho. The name balsam is no doubt derived from the Arabic balasam, which is probably also the origin of the Βαλασσαμος of the Greeks. Forskal informs us that the balsam-tree of Meccah is there called absasam, i. e. "very odorous." The word balsam, given by him, is the name of a fragrant shrub growing near Meccah, with the branches and twigs of which they clean the teeth, and is supposed to refer to the same plant. These names are very similar to words which occur in the Hebrew text of several passages of Scripture, as in the Song of Solomon, vi, 1, "I have gathered my myrrh with my spice (balasam); ver. 18, "His cheeks are as a bed of spices." (basam): and in vi, 2, "gone down into his garden to the beds of spices" (basam). The same word is used in Exod. xxxv, 28, and in 1 Kings x, 10. "There came no more such great abundance of spices (basam) as those which the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon." In all these passages the Hebrew word, or its cognates, seem (בָּשָׁם and בָּשָׂם), though translated "spices," would seem to indicate the balsam-tree, if we may infer identity of plant or substance from similarity in the Hebrew and Arabic names. But the word may indicate only a fragrant aromatic substance in general. The passages in the Song of Solomon may with propriety be understood as referring to a plant cultivated in Judah, and given by the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon. In all these passages, however, when the queen brought spices (balasam), as well as spices, for both are the produce of southern latitudes, though far removed from each other. (On the balsams of modern commerce, see the Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. Balsamine, et al.) See BALSA.

Balsem, JAIME LUCIO, a Spanish theologian, born Aug. 28, 1810, at Vich in Catalonia, died there July 9, 1848. He was for some time teacher of mathematics at Vich, was exiled under the regency of Espartero, and founded in 1844, at Madrid, a political weekly, El Pensaiento de la Nacion, as an organ of the Conservativo or Catholic party. In 1847 a pamphlet in favor of the political reforms of Pius IX (P xã IX, Madrid and Paris, 1847) brought him into conflict with his party. His principal works are a comparison of the relation of Protestantism and Roman Catholicism to European civilization (El Protestantismo comparado con el Catolicismo en sus relaciones con la civilizacion Europea, 3 vols. 8vo, Madrid, 1848; Eng. transl. London, 1849, 8vo); a Filosofia fundamental (Barcelona, 1846, 4 vols; translated into French, 3 vols. 1852; into English, by H. F. Brownson, 2 vols. New York, 1857); and a Curso de Filosofia Elemental (Madrid, 1837).

Balsam. See Bolsec.

Balsam (Gr. βαλασσαμος, i. e. πυκνωμελος, Arab. balasam), the fragrant resin of the balsam-tree, possessing medicinal properties; according to Pliny (xii, 54), indigenous only to Judea, but known to Diodorus Sic. (iii, 46) as a product of Arabia also. In Palestine, praised by other writers also for its balsam (Justin, xxxvi, 8; Tacit. Hist. v, 6; Plutarch, Vit. Ant. xxxvi); Florus, iii, 5, 29; Dio. Caesar, i, 18), this plant was cultivated in the environs of Jericho (Strabo, xvi, 763; Diod. Sic. ii, 48; xix, 98), in gardens set apart for this use (Plin. xii, 54; see Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 1; xv, 4, 2, 4; War i, 6, 6); and after the destruction of the state of Judea, these plantations formed a lucrative source of the Roman imperial revenue (see Diod. Sic. ii, 48). Pliny distinguishes three different species of this plant; the first with thin, capillary leaves; the second a crooked scabrous shrub; and the third with smooth rind and of taller growth than the two former. He tells us that, in general, the balsam plant, or shrub, has the nearest resemblance to the grape-vine, and its mode of cultivation is almost the same. The leaves, however, more closely resemble those of the rue, and the plant is an evergreen. Its height does not exceed two cubits. From slight incisions made very cautiously into the rind (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 4, 1; War i, 6, 6) the balsam trickles in thin drops, which are collected with wool into a horn, and then preserved in new earthen jars. At first it is whitish and pellucid, but afterward it becomes darker and reddish. That is considered to be the best quality which trickles before the appearance of the fruit. Much inferior to this is the resin pressed from the seodas, the rindi alnabz (Vesnin, Planta. ix, 6; Strabo, xvi, 763; Pausan, ix, 28, 2). This description, which is not sufficiently characteristic of the plant itself, suits for the most part the Egyptian balsam-shrub found by Belon (Paulus, Samml. iv, 188 sq.) in a garden near Cairo (the plant, however, is not indigenous. It is, but the layers are brought there from Arabia Felix; Prosp. Alpin. De balsamo, iii; Plant. Erg. xiv, 30, with the plate; Abbudallatif, Memoirs, p. 68). Forskal found between Mecca and Medina a shrub, abwadna (Niebuhr, Reise, i, 551), which he considered to be the genuine balsam-plant, and he gave its botanical description and said it was the Amrya of the Koran. The plant, Arab. p. 79 sq., together with two other "%eties, Amrya kauf and Amrya kafal. There are two species distinguished in the Linnean system, the Amrya Gileadensis (Forsk. "A. opobalsam.") and A. opobalsam. (the species described by Belon and Alpin); see Linné's Volut. Plantagogi, i, 478 sq., plates; Planeck, Plant. Med. pl. 155; Berlin, Jahrh. d. Pharm. 1795, pl. i; Alami, Mater. Indicae, i, 26 sq. More recent naturalists have included the species Amrya Gilead in the genus Protium; see Wight and Walker (Arnott), Prodrom. flos penisindicus Orientalis. London, (1854), i, 177; Lindley, Flora Medica (London, 1886, 8vo), p. 168. This is the species which the Meccan balsam most in vegetable small quantity (Pilin, xii, 54, "succes e plaga manan . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . . sed tenui gutta plorata"), which never reaches us unadulterated, grows only in a single district in Yemen; of late, however, it was discovered in the East Indies also. See generally Prosp. Alpin. Dial. de balsamo (Venet., 1851); as also in several editions of his work De Planttg. Aeg. p. 1592; and in Ugolini, Thesaur. xi, with plates; Veilting, Opobalsamum veteris cogniti vindicior, p. 217 sq.; Bochart, Hieroz. i, 628 sq.; Michelis, Suppl. 2143 sq.; Le Moyné, Dia. Botanik, ii, 661 sq.; Martius, Flora Irano, p. 848 sq.; Sprengel, Zui Dioscor. ii, 355 sq.—Winer.

Our only reason for mentioning all this is of course the presupposition that the Palestinian balsam is named in the Biblical also, and, indeed, the borem (בּ, Cant. v, 13), also basam (בּ, v. 1; comp. Arab. bashaam), which in both passages appear to be names of garden-plants, must be taken for the balsam-shrub (the ancient translators consider the word as a name). It is more difficult to state, however, whether this balsam-tree is mentioned also in the books of the O. T. The tereri or tereri (תְּרֶרֶי) is commonly taken for such. This name is given to a precious resin found in Gilead (Gen. xxvii, 25; Jer. xvi, 11), and circulated as an article of merchandise by Arab and Phoenician merchants (Gen. xxvii, 25; Ezek. xxvii, 17). It was one of the principal products of Palestine which was thought to be worthy to be offered as a gift even to Egyptian princes (Gen. xlii, 11), and was considered a powerful salve (Jer. viii, 22; xlii, 11; li, 8). Hebrew commentators understand, in fact, balsam by tereri. The ancient translators render it mostly by gum. However, others (Oedmann, Samml. iii, 110 sq.; Rosenmüller, Alterth. iv, i, 166 sq.) take it to be the oil of the Myrrha of the ancients (Pilin, xii, 46 sq.) or the Eunagmus anqutisfolia of Linnaeus. The fruit of this plant resembles the olive, and is of the size of a walnut. It contains a fat, oily kernel, from which the Arabs press an oil highly esteemed for its medicinal properties, especially for open wounds (Maurand, in Pauloni, Flam. hist. med. 110; Marnit, 73, 274; Tréoul, Traité, p. 107). That this tree grows in Palestine, especially in the environs of Jericho, we are told not only by modern traveller (Hasslequint, Voyages, p. 150; Arvesch, ii, 150; Poëce, Essel, iv, 47 sq.; Volney, Voyages, ii, 240; Robinson, ii, 291), but even by Josephus (Ant, iv, 8, 4). We must admit, however, that the Hebrew name tereri seems to imply a plant with a resin trickling from some plant than a pressed oil, and that the arguments of Rosenmüller in favor of his statement, that the Mecca balsam is a mere perfum and not a medicine, have not much weight (see Gen. ii, 31, 1186). Our physicians make, indeed, no medicinal use of palm-rum, dun in vulgar rum; inficta gutta aliquot infandum quot continuato brevisimo tempore vulnera maximoque momenti persansant")

The tereri, therefore, might have been the balsam, and if so, the shrub, which originally grew in Gilead, may have been transplanted and cultivated as a garden-plant on the plains of Jericho, and preserved only there. We greatly doubt, however, whether the balsam shrub ever grew wild anywhere but in Arabia, and it seems to us more probable that it was brought from Arabia to Palestine, though, perhaps, not by the Queen of Sheba (Josephus, Ant. viii, 6, 6). Besides the tereri (תְּרֶרֶי), another word, natsa (ץ, מִים), mentioned in Exod. xxxi, 24, as an ingredient of the holy incense, is taken by some commentators for the balsam; this, however, is perhaps rather Sactr (q. v.). See MASTICK; AROMATICS.

Balsamon, Theodore, an eminent canonist of the Greek Church, was born at Constantinople in the twelfth century; was made chancellor and librarian of the church of St. Sophia, and about 1196 became patriarch of Antioch, without, however, being able to go there before the functions of the see were transferred to the city was occupied by the Latins, who had intruded a bishop of their own. He died about 1200. His first work (which he undertook at the wish of the Emperor Manuel Comnenus and the patriarch Michael Anchialus) was Photii Nonomocanon Canones 83. Apotolorum, etc. (with a Commentary on the Canons of the Apostles and the first four and partial Conciliar Canones (Canonical Epistles of the Fathers), printed at Paris, 1615, fol.; also a Commentary on the Synagoga of Photius, given in Beveridge, Synodicon, sine Pandecta Canones (Oxon. 1672-92, 2 vols. fol.). For an account of Balsamon and his works, see Beveridge's Synodicon (Oxon. 1672-92, 2 vols. fol.), Hist. Lit. Anno 1180; Hoefner, Biogr. Générale, iv, 311.

Baltus, Jean François, a Jesuit, born at Metz, June 8th, 1667. He became a Jesuit in 1682, and in 1717 was called to Rome to examine the books written by the members of his company. Returning to France, he was, in succession, rector of several colleges of his order, and died at Rheims, librarian of the college, March 19th, 1743. He wrote, Réponse à l'Histoire des Oracles de M. Fontenelle (Strasb. 1707 and 1709, 8vo) —Defence des Saints Pères occisés de Platonisme (Paris, 1711, 4to); new ed. under the title Parité du Christ (Paris, 2 vols. 8vo, 1808) —Defence des Prophétes de la Religion Chrétienne (1757, 3 vols. 12mo), with other works. —Biogr. Toulouse, where he remained for eight years. He soon acquired a high reputation in ecclesiastical history and the canon law. Not wishing to serve as a priest, but desirous of opportunity to pursue his studies quietly, he received the tonsure, and put himself under the care of the local Provincial of the Canons Regular. On the death of De Marca in 1662, the chancellor of France, Le Tellier, took Baluze under his protection; but in 1667 he attached himself to Colbert, who made him his librarian, and it was by his care that the listed hundreds of books in the nation acquired its richest treasures, and attained to such great celebrity among the learned. He left the family of Colbert in 1670, and afterward Louis XIV made him director of the royal college, with a pension. This situation he held until his eightieth year, when he was banished for having published the "Genealogical History of the House of Avignon," in 2 vols. fol. (1706), by order of the Cardinal de Bouillon, who had fallen into disgrace at court. He obtained a recall in 1713, after the peace of Utrecht, without, however, recovering his appointments, and died July 26th, 1718. His library, when it was sold after his death, contained 1500 MSS., which were purchased by the Bibliothèque de la Marine, Baluze left as many as forty-five published works, of which the most important are—Regnum Francorum Capitularia (1677, 2 vols. fol. ; also, edited by Chinnicius in 1780, 2 vols. fol. a superb edition) ; Epistolae Innocentii Pope III (1683, 2 vols. fol). This collection is incomplete, owing to the unwillingness of the author to give him the time to give him free access to the pieces in the Vatican library. Breguiny and De La Porte du Thell, in their Didacioma, Charta, etc., 1791, have given the letters which Baluze could not obtain ;—Concilia Romana Collectio (1663, vol. 1, fol.). This work was intended to embruit all the known councils which Labbe has omitted in his collection, and would have many volumes; but Baluze abandoned his first design, and limited himself to one volume)—Vita Paparum Anteimunum ("Vies des Papes d’Avignon." 1683, 2 vols. 4to, an admirable refutation of the ultramontane pretensions. He maintains that the holy see is not necessarily fixed at Rome. "Macellum" (7 vols. 8vo. A new edition, considerably enlarged and improved, was published by Manet at Lucca in 1761, in 4 vols. fol.). A complete list of his works may be found at p. 66 of the Capitularia. See Dupin, Eccl. Wraters, 17th cent.; Vie de Baluze, written by himself, and continued by Martin.

Ba’mah (Heb. Ba’mah, בָּמָה, a height; Sept. Βαμώς, an eminence or high-place, where the Jews worship, as well as idols, or as a proper name, Ezek. xx. 29). In other passages it is translated "high place," and in Ezek. xxxvi, 2, such spots are termed "ancient high places," or ancient heights. See BAMOTH. On such places the Hebrews made oblations to idols, and also to the Lord himself, before the idea obtained that unity of place for the divine worship was indispensable. The Jewish historians, therefore, for the most part, describe this as an unlawful worship, in consequence of its being so generally associated with idolatrous rites. See HIGH-PLACE. The above passage in Ezekiel is very obscure, and full of the paraphrase so dear to the Hebrew poets, so difficult for us to appreciate; "What is this high place (חַלֹם) whereunto ye hie (כְּעָלָם) and the name of it is called Ba’mah (בָּמָה) unto this day?" (Ewald (Prophetes, p. 298) pronounces this verse to be an extract from an older prophet than Ezekiel. The name here, however, seems to refer, not to a particular spot, but to any such locality individualized by the term (see Henderson, Comment, in loc.).

Bambeas, NUPHITYOS, an archimandrite of the Greek Church, and one of the principal prose writers of modern Greece, was born upon the island of Chios, and died at Athens in Feb. 1855. He studied at the College of Chios and at the University of Paris, reorganized, after his return from Paris, the College of Chios, and remained its president until the war of Independence in 1821. In 1824 he became Professor of Philosophy at the University of Corfu, afterward director of the School of Sciences, and, at last, Professor of Philosophy and Rhetoric at the University of Athens. On account of his extensive learning, the British and Foreign Bible Society confided to him the task of translating, in union with Rev. Mr. Lowdes, and Mr. Nicolaides of Philadelphia in Asia Minor, the Bible into modern Greek. During the last years of his life, Mr. Bambeas attached himself, however, to the Russian or Napaan party, which is hostile to the reformation of the Church. He wrote a manual of sacred eloquence (Εὐχάριστον τῆς τοῦ Ιησοῦ Χριστοῦ τῆς εὐαγγελίας, Athens, 1861), a manual of ethics (Εὐχάριστον τῆς Χριστί, Athens, 1860), and other works on philosophy, ethics, and rhetoric, and several Greek grammars. Bambino, the name of the swaddled figure of the infant Saviour, which, surrounded by a halo, and watched over by angels, occasionally forms the subject of altar-pieces in Roman Catholic churches. The Somassimo Bambino in the church of the Ara Coeli at Rome is held in great veneration for its supposed miraculous power in curing the sick. It is said to be of wood, painted, and richly decorated with jewels and precious stones. The carving is attributed to a Franciscan pilgrim, out of a tree that grew on Mount Olivet, and the painting to the evangelist Luke. The festival of the Bambino, which occurs at the Epiphany, is attended by thousands of pilgrims. In a famous song of the Bambino is said to draw more in the shape of fees than the most successful medical practitioner in Rome. —Chambers's Encyclopedia, s. v.

Ba’moth (Heb. Ba’moth, בָּמָה, a height; Sept. Ba’maṣ, the forty-seventh station of the Israelites, on the borders of Moab (Num. xxix. 19, 20); according to Eusebius and Jerome (Onomaster, s. v. Ba’maṣ, Bemoth), a city near the river Arnon. As it was the next encampment before reaching Pisan, was usually identified with Jebel Attar (see Nemo), it may not improbable be identified with Jebel-Illamek, immediately east, a position which seems to agree with the circumstances of all the notice. Kruse, however (in Seetzen's Reise, iv, 226), thinks it the place now called Wash, on the road to the Arnon. It is probably the same place elsewhere called BammOTH-Ba’al (Josh. xiii. 17).

Ba’moth-ba’al (Heb. BammOTH-Ba’al, בָּמָה-בָּאָל, heights of Baal; Sept. B apaς Βαας v. r. Be’maν Bala, and αἱ στάσεις τοῦ Βααδί, or, as the margin of our version reads, "the high places of Baal" [see Baal], a place given to the truce of Reuben, and situated on the river Arnon, or in the plain through which that stream flows, east of the Jordan (Josh. xiii. 17; comp. Num. xxi. 28; xxii. 41; not Jer. xxxiii. 35). It is probably the same place elsewhere (Num. xxi. 19) called simply BamOTH (q. v. —ment, in loc.), identifies it with the modern Jebel Attar, a site marked by stone-heaps observed both by Seetzen (ii, 342) and Burchhardt (Syria, p. 370); but this is rather the summit of Nebo.

Bampton Lectures, a course of eight sermons preached annually at the University of Oxford, under the will of the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury, who died in 1796. According to the directions in his will, they are to be preached upon some of the lowest subjects: To confirm and establish the Christian faith, and to refute all heresies and schismatics; upon the divine authority of the holy Scriptures; upon the authority of the writings of the primitive fathers as to the faith and practice of the primitive Church; upon the divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus CHRIST: upon the divinity of the HOLY GHOST: upon the articles of the Christian faith, as comprehended in the ACTS OF TRINITY. A series of Discourses, as delivered in the Church of Christ, in the years 1853 and 1854, is given by Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, t. 106. More than seventy volumes (8vo) of the Bampton lectures are now before the public, and one is added annually. The most remarkable are the following: Those delivered in 1874, on Christianity and Mohammedanism, by Dr. White, who was accused of having offended some in their composition from Dr. Palfrey and Dr. Badcock; those by Dr. Tatham in 1879, on The Logic of Theology; those of Dr. Nott in 1802, on Religious Enthusiasm—this series was directed against Wesley and Whitefield; those of Dr. Mant in 1812; those of Reginald Heber in 1818; Whitby in 1822; Milman in 1827; Burton in 1829, on the Heroes of the Apostolic Age; Soames in 1830, on the Doctrines of the Anglo-Saxon Church. But of the whole series, none have caused greater controversy than those by Dr. Hampden in 1832, on The Scholastic Philosophy considered in its Relation to Christian Theology. They were attacked on all sides, but especially by the leader of the Roman Catholic Association, W. Hughes. In 1858, Dr. Walsh was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity in 1860, a petition against his appointment was sent up to the throne, and upon this being rejected, a censure was passed upon him in convocation by a large majority, declaring his teaching to be unsound, and re- leasing undergraduates from attendance at his lectures. In spite of this clerical persecution, he was raised to the see of Hereford in 1847. A recent course of Bampton Lectures, delivered by Mansel in 1858, on The Limits of Religious Thought, has caused a less bitter, but scarcely less interesting controversy. The main position which he takes up is, "That the human mind inevitably, and by virtue of its essential constitution, finds itself involved in self-contradictions whenever it ventures on certain courses of speculation," i.e. on speculative concerning the infinite nature of God. He maintains that all attempts to construct an objective or metaphysical theology must necessarily fail; and the position of the infinite is utterly impossible, under the existing laws of human thought—the practical aim of the whole course being to show the "right use of reason in religious questions." Mr. Mansel has been accused by his critics of condemning all dogmatic theology (e.g. all creeds and articles), and of making revelation itself impossible. The Bampton Lectures for 1859 were delivered by Geo. Rawlinson, the subject being The Historical Evidence of the Truth of the Scripture Records, stated anew, with Special Reference to the Doubts and Discoveries of Modern Times. The volume for 1862 was delivered by Lord Plumptre, on The History of Free Thought (N. Y. 1868, 12mo.); Chambers, Encyclopaedia, s. v.; Modern Quarterly, 1863, p. 867.

Ban (banus, banum), in ancient jurisprudence, a declaration, especially a declaration of outlawry; in ecclesiastical law, a declaration of excommunication (q. v.). According to the canon law of the Roman Catholic Church, the authority to declare the ban resides in the pope for the whole church, in the bishop for his diocese, in the apostolic legate for his legation, and in the prior of an order for his subordinates. Priests had formerly an independent right of excommunication, but can now that only right only by authority of the bishop. The ban covers all, whether heretics or not, under the jurisdiction of the administrator (Conc. Trident. Sess. xxv, cap. 8). See Excommunication.

For Banus of Marriage, see BANUS.

Ban (roo' Baw v. r. Barovas; Vulg. Tabul.) given as the name of one of the priestly families that had lost their priestly privileges at the epoch of the excommunication in the passage (1 Esdr. v, 87); it doubtless stands for TOLIAH (q. v.), i.e. תוליה יב, in the parallel lists of Ezra (ii, 60) and Nehemiah (vii, 62).

Bana'as (Bawanas), the last named of the "sons of Ethma" among the Israelites who had taken foreign wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 85); evidently the BANIAH (q. v.) of the genuine list (Ezra, x, 45).

 Bancroft, Aaron, D.D., was born at Reading, Penn., 1755, and graduated at Harvard College. In 1776 he became pastor of the Congregational Church of Worcester, Mass., where he remained until 1808. He was educated a Calvinist, but became an Arian in middle life. In 1808 he published a Life of Washington, which was well received, and has been often reprinted (last ed. N. Y., 2 vols. 12mo.). In 1822 he published a volume of Sermons.—Allibone; New Am. Encyc.

Bancroft, Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Farmworth in 1584, and entered at Christ's College, Cambridge. In 1684 he was made rector of St. Andrew's in Holborn. When chaplain to Archbishop Whigfield, he delivered a sermon at St. Paul's Cross, in which he strongly warned the Parliament against the Puritans. In 1587 he was made bishop of London; though the influence of the archbishop, and was sent by Queen Elizabeth in 1600 to Embden, to put an end to the differences which existed between the English and Danes, but his mission was unsuccessful. He attended the Hampton Court Conference in 1664, and in March in that year was appointed by the king's will president of convocation, the see of Canterbury being vacant. In the eleventh session, held May 23, he presented the Book of Canons now in force, which he had selected out of the articles, injunctions, and synodical acts passed in the two previous reigns. After this he was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and his primacy is distinguished for the commencement of the now authorized version of the Scriptures. He was a strenuous High-Churchman, and a bitter opponent of the Puritans. He was the first Anglican divine who publicly maintained the divine right of bishops. This was in a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross, February, 1588; in which he maintained that the ordination of a bishop is the act of priests and deacons; that they governed by divine appointment; and that to deny these truths was to deny a portion of the Christian faith." On the effect produced by this sermon, see Heylin, Aennius Revidimus, p. 284. He died at Lambeth in 1610, leaving his books to his church. His principal published works were, Discovery of the Untruths and Slander of Reformations (sermon preached February, 1588) — Survey of the pretended Holy Discipline (Lond. 1593, 4to.)—Dangerous Positions and Proceedings published under the Pretext of Reformation, for the Presbyterial Discipline (Lond. 1595, 8vo). See Bisg. Bur. vol. i.; Neal, Hist. of Popery, p. 266; Lambeth, Hist. of the Church, vol. ii., p. 5; London (1842, 8vo); Hook, Eccles. Biography, i, 506.

BANDINEL

BANDINEL, JAMES, D.D., was educated at Jesus College, Oxford; became M.A. in 1758, D.D. in 1777, and died at Winchester in 1804. He was rector of Netherby, Dorsetshire, for many years. He published "Eight Sermons on the peculiar Doctrines of Christianity," being the Bampton Lectures for 1780 (Oxford, 1780, 8vo), which are marked by ingenuity and critical talent.

Banda, small societies instituted by Wesley with the object of promoting personal holiness and good works among the early Methodists. The first "rules of the band societies," drawn up December 25, 1738, may be found in Emory, "History of the Methodist Discipline," p. 200. These societies were more select than class-meetings (q.v.), and admitted only persons of the same sex, as married or all single, who were put in charge of a "hand-leader." They have nearly gone out of use in America, the article relating to them in the Discipline having been struck out by the General Conference of 1856. They still may be found in England, though not very numerous. See Emory, "History of the Discipline," p. 200 sqq.; Grindrod, "Compendium of Laws of Methodism," 1741 sqq.; Porter, "Compendium of Methodism," 50, 460; Stevens, "History of Methodism," i, 122, ii, 453; Wesley, "Works," v, 188.

Bangor or Bangor, Peter, a Swedish theolical, was born at Helsingfors in 1633, was made professor of theology in the University of Abo, and bishop of Viborg. He died in 1696, having published a "Commentarius in Hébræos," and a "Historia Ecclesiæc.""Bangor (Bangeriam), an episcopal see in Wales, in Caernarvonshire. The foundation of this see is altogether involved in obscurity. The cathedral is dedicated to St. Daniel, its first bishop, and the chapter consists of a dean, treasurer, precentor, two archdeacons, five canons, and two minor canons. The diocese comprises Anglesea, and parts of Caernarvonshire, Denbigh, Montgomery, and Merionethshire, containing one hundred and seventy parishes, of which thirty-seven are impropriated. The present (1866) incumbent is James Colquhoun Campbell, D.D., consecrated in 1859.

Bangorian Controversy, a title derived from the bishop of Bangor (Hoadley), who, in the reign of George I, wrote "A Preservative against the Principles and Practices of Non-Jurors;" and afterward preached and published a sermon from the passage, "My kingdom is not of this world." (John 18, 36.), in which he maintained the supreme authority of Christ in his own kingdom; and that he had not delegated his power, like temporal lawmakers during their absence from their kingdom, to any persons as his vicegerents and deputies. The publication of this sermon by order of the king led to the controversy above named, in which Dr. Snape and Dr. Sherlock, the king's chaplains, took a prominent part as the opponents of Hoadley, maintaining that there were certain powers distinctly vested in the church by Christ, its king, of which the ministers of the church were the constitutionally-appointed executors. This controversy lasted many years, and led to the discontinuance of the Convocation. The pamphlets on the subject are very numerous; one of the most important is, William Law, "Three Letters to Bishop Hoadley," to be found in Law's "Scholar Armed," i, 273, and also in Law's "Complete Works" (London, 1762), vol. i. See England, History of Church; Hildesley.

Bangs, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Stratford, Conn., in 1781, commenced preaching in 1806, entered the itinerant ministry in N. Y. Conference in 1819, became superintendent in 1885, and died in great peace, Feb. 4, 1849. His youth was vain and profane, but from his conversion he was full of holy zeal and love for souls. "He preached holiness to others, and enjoyed its exalted felicity himself," and about three thousand conversions were the fruit of his labors. - "Minutes of Conferences," iv, 328.

Bangs, Nathan, D.D., an eminent minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born May 2, 1778, near Bridgeport, Conn. When he was about thirteen, the family removed to Stamford, Delaware Co., N. Y., and here he was born, the bourne of the common school education of the time, by which he profited so well that at eighteen he was capable of teaching such a school himself. In 1799 he went to Canada, and spent three years there in teaching and in surveying land. In 1800 he was converted, and in 1802 was elected to the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which conference he entered as an itinerant in Canada. The next six years he spent in arduous labors in Canada, going from village to village as an itinerant minister, often through virgin forests, guided only by the "marks" of the wood-cutter or the hunter. In 1808 he was returned to the state of New York, being appointed by the bishop to the Delaware Circuit. Such had been his rapid rise in influence that his brethren sent him to the General Conference of this year, and so commanding were his subsequent services that he was a delegate in every session after, except that of 1848, down to 1856, when his advanced years justified his relinquishing his responsibilities. In 1818 he was sent to New York City, which was ever after the headquarters of his labors and influence for his denomination. Methodism here was then still in its youthful struggles; it consisted of one circuit, with five preaching-places. The city population was below one hundred thousand. The city and its suburbs now (1865) comprise a million of people, and more than twice as many Methodist preachers as the whole Conference then reported, though it swep over much of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, and over Eastern New York, up the Hudson into Canada to even Montreal and Quebec! What a history for one life! In 1818 he was appointed presiding elder of the Rhinebeck district; from 1817 to 1820 he was pastor in New York; and in 1829 he was elected "Book Agent," and assumed the charge of the Methodist Book Concern, then a small business, and deeply involved in debt. Under his skilful management (from 1829 to 1828) the Concern rapidly increased from its earliest period, and its business was immensely extended. In 1828 the "Christian Advocate" was established, and the editorial matter from 1826 to 1828 was chiefly furnished by Dr. Bangs, though he was still discharging the arduous duties of senior book-agent. During the whole period of his influence (1820-1828) he was the editor of the "Methodist Magazine." Such an amount of labor would have worn out any man not endowed with great intellectual and bodily vigor—qualities which, in Dr. Bangs, were supplemented by indomitable industry and perseverance. In 1829 he was appointed editor of the "Advocate," including, also, the editorial labors of the "Magazine." In 1832 the General Conference appointed him editor of the "Methodist Quarterly Review," a new form of the "Methodist Magazine." His office comprised also the editorial charge of the books of the general catalogue. He had no paid assistance in the labors of the two periodicals, no appropriation being made for contributions, but the variety and vigor of his own articles imparted continued freshness and power to their pages.

His services to the missionary cause were perhaps the most important of all his vast and varied labors. He was one of the founders of the Methodist Missionary Society, and he assisted in its original institution; he wrote its first "Circular Address" to the churches; during sixteen years prior to the organization of the secretariat as a special and salaried function, he labored indefatigably and gratuitously for the society as its vice-president, secretary, or treasurer. He wrote in these years all its annual reports. In 1858 he was appointed "Missionary Secretary." He now devoted his entire energies to the Missionary Society, conducting its correspondence, seeking missionaries for it, planning its mission-fields, pleading for it in the pulpits and periodicals, and health of mind and body. Much of the literary labors of his later years was devoted to the exposition of the doctrine of entire sanctification. In his eightieth year he preached with vigor, and his writings of that period are luminous and powerful. His last sermon was on the certain triumph of the Gospel. He died in great peace May 8, 1862.

Dr. Bangs was a man of vigor and force—a fighter, when need be, to the last. "No man could show a nobler indignation against anything unrighteous or mean; no man could speak more unflinchingly or directly to the very face and teeth of a pretentious, an evasive, or disingenuous disputant, but no man over his head."

BANGS, Stephen Beckman, a prominent young Methodist preacher, son of the Rev. Heman Bangs, was born in New York, March 25, 1823, graduated at the N. Y. University in 1843, and was licensed to preach in the following year, joining the N. Y. Conference. His style of preaching excited strong attachments, which were useful to him in his early death, March 20, 1846. In his few years he had been promoted to the high honors of his Station, and was immediately appointed a professorship in Augusta College, Ky., which he held for only one year, being impressed with the duty of entering the Christian ministry. In 1831 he entered the N. Y. Conference of the M. E. Church, and continued to labor, except when his feeble health compelled him to desist, the death of Sept. 5, 1802. His historical powers were of the highest order, and his command of language rarely equalled. His writings alone would have made him an historical character of his church. His editorial productions in the Advocate, the Magazine, and the Quarterly Review would fill scores of volumes. His Annual Missionary Reports would make no small library of missionary literature. His more substantial publications are more numerous than those of any other American Methodist. As early as 1809 he began his career as an author by a volume against "Christianism," an historical, anti-christian, in New England. Three years later the General Conference appointed him chairman of a committee to collect the historical materials of the denomination, and thence the results which resulted in his History of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Before the appearance of this, his most important productions, his name was unknown (1812, 12mo); Predestination examined (1817, 12mo); Reformer Reformed (1818, 12mo); Methodism Eviscerated (1820, 12mo); Life of the Rev. Freeborn Garrettson, one of the best of our biographies, and an essential collection of data for the history of the church. In 1822 appeared his Authentic History of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a volume which has added much to the missionary enterprise of the denomination. In 1835 he published Letters to a Young Preacher, full of excellent counsels on ministerial habits, on books, study, preaching, etc.; and in 1836, The Original Church of Christ (12mo). In 1839 appeared the first volume of his History of the M. E. Church. In three years the remaining three volumes were published. It was a book for the times, if not for all time. His other publications are an Essay on Emancipation (1848, 8vo); State and Responsibilities of the Methodist Episcopal Church (1850, 12mo); Letters on Sanctification (1851, 12mo); Life of Arminius (18mo); and numerous occasional tracts. Among them "Emancipation" is substantially that recommended in the message of the President of the United States to Congress in 1862. "Let Congress," he says, "make a proposition to the several slave states that so much per head shall be allowed for every slave that shall be emancipated, leaving it to the state Legislatures respectively to adopt their own measures to affect the object." Thus did this sagacious old man anticipate by several years the best suggestion which our national leaders were able to utter on our greatest national problem before its final solution by the sword. It is elaborated with skillful and intrepid ability, and fortified by decisive and logical conclusions, from its first to its last page. It is in concluding "array of motives to emancipation," that they "are strong enough, one would think, to rouse all but the dead to the importance of the task."—See Stevens, Life and Times of Nathan Bangs, D. D. (N. Y. 1863, 12mo); Ladies Repository, June, 1859; The Methodist, May 10, 1862; Methodist Quarterly, January, 1864, p. 172.

Bangs, William M'Kendree, son of the Rev. Nathan Bangs, D.D., was born in New York, December 15, 1810, and graduated at 19 years of age at the University of Ohio, with the highest honors. He was immediately offered a professorship in Augusta College, Ky., which he held for only one year, being impressed with the duty of entering the Christian ministry. In 1831 he entered the N. Y. Conference of the M. E. Church, and continued to labor, except when his feeble health compelled him to desist, the death of Sept. 5, 1852. His historical powers were of the highest order, and his command of language rarely equalled. Whether conversing familiarly with his friends, discussing some difficult abstract question, or preaching to a congregation, his style was remarkably adapted to the subject and the occasion. His sermons were clear, systematic, easy to be understood, neither encumbered by extraneous matter, nor disfigured by learned pedantry. They were characterized by a beautiful simplicity, and always bore the impress of a great mind." As a controversial writer he excelled greatly; his articles in the Methodist Quarterly Review, especially those of 1836 and 1837, in reply to the "Christian Spectator," and his reviews of Watson's Theological Institutes, are fine specimens of analytical as well as comprehensive thinking. —Minutes of Conferences, v. 211; Sprague, Annals, vii, 773.

Babi' (Heb. Bani', "373. built; Sept. usually Bavi, sometimes Bouvi or Bovovi, etc.), the name of at least five men.

2. A Levite, son of Shamer, and father of Amazai (1 Chron. vi. 46). B.C. long ante 1048.

2. A Gédite, one of David's thirty-seven warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 80). B.C. 1046.
A descendant of Pharez, and father of Imri, one of whose descendants returned from Babylon (1 Chron. ix, 4). B.C. long ante 586.

4. One of the heads of families whose retainers to the number of 642 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel ( Ezra ii, 10; x, 29, 34; Neh. x, 14; 1 Esdr. v, 12). He is elsewhere (Neh. vii, 15) called Binnui (q. v.). See also Bani. He was himself one of those who divorced their heathen wives (Ezra x, 88). Others consider this last a different person, and identify him with some of those referred to below. B.C. 586-410. See CHANAINI.

5. A Levite, whose son Rehum repaired a portion of the (branch) wall of Jerusalem skirting the brow of Mount Zion on the east (Neh. iii, 17). Apparently the same Bani was among those who were conspicuous in all the reforms on the return from Babylon (Neh. viii, 7; ix, 4 twice; 5, x, 13). He had another son named Uzzai, who was appointed overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem (Neh. xii, 22). His name was also Bani (Neh. xi, 22). B.C. 446-410. See CHANAINI.

Bani (Bavviac y.v. Bavi; Vulg. Bani), the ancestor or family-head of one of the parties (that of Asaliath, son of Josha, with 160 retainers) that returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Esd. vii, 86). This represents a name, Bani (q. v.), which has apparently escaped from the present Hebrew text (Ezra viii, 10).

Baniash (found in the Auth. Vers. only in the forms "banished", Heb. יבניאשׁ, madakin, 2 Sam. xiv, 13, 14, outcast, as elsewhere; and "banishment," Heb. בניתאשׁ, mad banias, "banishment of baniai", Lam. ii, 14, rather ascriptions; Chald. בניתאשׁ or בניתאשׁ, beinaashah, or beinaashah, lit. a rooting out, Ezra vii, 26). This was not a punishment enjoined by the Mosaic law; but after the captivity, both exile and forfeiture of property were introduced among the Jews; and it also existed under the Romans, by whom it was called diminutio capita, because the person banished lost the rights of a citizen, and the city of Rome thereby lost a head. But there was another description of exile termed deportatio, which was a punishment of greater severity. The party banished forfeited his estate, and, being bound, was put on board ship and transported to some island specified by the emperor, where there was confined in perpetual banishment (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v. banias). In this manner the little John was exiled to the little island of Patmos (Rev. i, 9). See EXILE.

Bank. In Luke xix, 28, the Greek word ἔστηκαν, table, is rendered "bank" in the modern sense of the term, which, by a similar appropriation, is derived from the same root as bench. In Matt. xxi, 12; Mark xi, 15; and John ii, 15, it is employed literally, and describes the steps of the mount-church (q. v.), on which he sat in the market-place, as is still the custom in the East, and also in the outer court of the Temple. In other passages it denotes an ordinary table for food.

The term "bank," ἐστήκαν, also occurs in 2 Sam. xx, 15; 2 Kings xix, 82; Isa. xxxvii, 88, as the name of the mount raised against a besieged city; it is elsewhere rendered "mount" in the same sense. See STAIR.

The "bank" or shore of a river or sea is designated by the Heb. term יַבָּן, yavan, or yavanah or yavanah, and יַבָּן, yavanah, a lip.

Bann. See BANNA.

Banna's (Baavanios y.v. Baavanio, Vulg. Banna), one of the "sons of Asom" that denounced their Gentile wives after the captivity (1 Esdr. ix, 88); apparently a corruption for Zabad (q. v.) of the genuine text (Ezra x, 88).

Bannor, or Standard, of Ensign, or Signal (q. v. severally). These words are probably used indiscriminately by the sacred writers. Some of the rabbins suppose that the ancient Hebrew tribe-standards were flags bearing figures derived from the comparison of the tribe as a lion, a serpent, a bull, etc. (Gen. xlix, 23; Num. xiv, 8). The Tirzah (q. v.) of the tribe of Judah (1 Sam. vi, 19), "the escutcheons of the tribes, as determined by these ingenious tribesmen, did not in every instance correspond with any possible interpretation of Jacob's prophecy, nor with the analogous prophecies of Moses when about to die." However, there may be some truth in the rabbinical designation. And as the tribe of Judah was represented by a lion, may not its motto have been, "Who shall rouse him up?" Thus the banner of the royal tribe would be an interesting prediction of the appearance and universal triumph of Christ, who is called the "lion of the tribe of Judah" (Hos. v, 14; Rev. v, 6). The four following Hebrew words signify banner, standard, ensign, flag, or signal:

1. דֶּשֶּל (דֶּשֶל), as being conspicuous, flag, banner, or standard of a larger kind, serving for three tribes together, one of which pertained to each of the four general divisions. The four standards of this name were large, and ornamented with colors in white, purple, crimson, and dark blue. The Jewish rabbins asserted (founding their statement on Gen. xlix, 1, 9, 17, 22, which in the case is very doubtful authority) that the first of these standards, that of Judah, bore a lion; the second, or that of Reuben, bore a man; that of Ephraim, which was the third, displayed the figure of a bull; while that of Dan, which was the fourth, exhibited the representation of cherubim. The standards were worked with embroidery (Num. xxvii, 2, 5, 16, 18, 25; Sol. Song ii, 4; vi, 4, 10). See CAMP.

2. OTH (אֹת, a sign), an ensign or flag of a smaller kind. It belonged to each single tribe, and perhaps to the separate classes of families. Most likely it was originally merely a pole or spear, to the end of which a bunch of leaves was fastened, or something similar. Subsequently it may have been a shield suspended on the elevated point of such pole or spear, as is sometimes done among the Greeks and Romans. The Targumists, however, believe that the banners were distinguished by their colors, the color for each tribe being analogous to that of the precious stone for that tribe in the breast-plate of the high-priest; and that the great standard (דֶּשֶל) of each of the four camps combined the three colors of the tribes. This is supported by the fact that the names of the tribes appeared on the standards, together with a particular sentence from the law, and were moreover charged with appropriate representations, as of the lion for Judah, etc. Most modern expositors seem to incline to the opinion that the ensigns were flags distinguished by their colors, or by the name of the tribe to which each belonged (Num. ii, 2, 84). See FLAG.
3. Nas (Q2), from its lofty place, a lofty signal, a standard. This standard was not, like the others, borne from place to place. It appears from Num. xxi, 8, 9, that it was a long pole fixed in the earth; a flag was fastened to its top, which was agitated by the wind, and seen at a great distance. In the same way as a fire is visible as far as possible, it was erected on lofty mountains, chiefly on the irrigation of an enemy, in order to point out to the people a place of rendezvous. It no sooner made its appearance on such an elevated position than the war-cry was uttered, and the trumpets were blown (Psa. ix, 4; Isa. v, 25; xii, 12; xiii, 2; xxvi, 6; Jer. x, 4; Isa. xliii, 10; xlix, 1, 10). See Ezek. xliii, 12, 27; Ezck. xxvii, 7; in this last passage it is the standard or flag of a ship, not the sail. See War.

4. MARSTH ( 마련ת, from its elevation), a sign, a signal given by fire. Some writers have supposed that this signal was a long pole, on the top of which was a grate not unlike a chafing-dish, made of iron bars, and supplied with fire, the size, height, and shape of which denoted the party or company to whom it belonged (Jer. vi, 1). See Beacon. There appear to be several allusions in Scripture to the banners, standards, or ensigns of ancient nations; a proper knowledge of them might aid us in understanding more clearly many of the sacred predictions. In ancient nations, national and religious standards are probably referred to instead of the names of the nations, as the hegoat with one horn was the symbol of Alexander the Great and the Macedonian people, and the ram with two horns Media and Persia, etc. (Dan. vii, 3-9). See Macedon. The banners and ensigns of the Roman army had idolatrous, and, therefore, abominable images upon them, hence called "the abomination (q. v.) of desolation;" but their principal standard was an eagle. Among the evils threatened to the Hebrews in consequence of their disobedience, Moses predicted one in the following terms: "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flyeth." (Deut. xxxxi, 49; compare also Jer. iv, 13). In Matt. xxi, 28; Luke xvi, 17, the Jewish nation, on account of its iniquity, is compared to a dead body, exposed in the open field, and inviting the Roman army, whose standard often bore the figure of an eagle, to come together and devour it. See Eagle.

5. A banner was formerly a defence, as a banner is regarded as a token of protection, and it was regarded as the surest pledge of fidelity. God's lifting or setting up a banner is a most expressive figure, and imports his peculiar presence, protection, and aid in leading and directing his people in the execution of his righteous will, and giving them comfort and peace in his service (Psa. xx, 5; lx, 4; Sol. Song ii, 4; see the dissent on the latter passage by Löwe, in Eichhorn's Bibl. ii, 184 sq.). See Standard-bearer.

Bands of Matrimony (בנין נישואין), a phrase that has been for many ages used to signify the public announcement in church of the intention of two parties to become united in matrimony. Ignatius, in his Ep. to Polycrates, 8, says: "Be it known that he who is to marry do so with the consent or direction of the bishop. And Tertullian (ad Uxorem, lib. ii, cap. 2 and 9; De Pudicitia, cap. 4) implies that the Church, in the primitive ages, was familiar with marriages. The earliest existing canonical enactment on the subject in the English Church is that in the 11th canon of the synod of Westminster in 1279, which says: 'No marriage shall be contracted without banns thrice published in the church.' It is supposed by some that the practice was introduced into France as early as the ninth century; and it is certain that Odo, bishop of Paris, ordered it in 1176. The council of Lateran, in 1215, preceding the decrees of King John and the 62d canon of the synod of London, 1208-4, forbids the celebration of marriage except the banns of matrimony have been first published three several Sundays or holy-days in the time of divine service in the parish churches or chapels where the parties dwell, on pain of suspension for three years. Marriage without the publication of banns was condemned in England, and parties so married offended against the spirit of the laws. The principal motives which led to the order for the publication of banns were to prevent clandestine marriages, and to discover whether or no the parties have any lawful hinderance. The Church of England enacts that the banns must be published in church immediately before the sentences for the offertery. If the parties dwell in different parishes, then banns must be published in both. In the Roman Church the banns are ordered to be published at the parochial mass, at sermon-time, upon some three Sundays or festivals of observance. With regard to dispensations of banns, the council of Lateran speaks of nothing of the kind. The council of Trent (De Reforma, xxii, cap. 1) permits them in certain cases. Such dispensations have been granted by bishops in England ever since Archbishop Mepham's time at least, who died in 1688, which power of dispensing was continued to them by the statute of 1696. The Act xxvii Henry VII, 21, by which all bishops are allowed to dispense as they were wont to do. Before publishing the banns it was the custom for the curate anciently to assuage the two persons to be married in the name of the blessed Trinity; and the banns were sometimes published at vesper rather than on the day of marriage. See Ringham, Or. Eccl. lib. xxii, cap. ii, § 2; Martene, De Ant. Rit. lib. ii, cap. ix, art. v, p. 136, 185; London, s. v.

Ban'ts (Bn’ts, בָנְתָו), one of the "sons of Maa'n" who renounced his Geul'th wife after the return from Babylon (1 Esdr. ix, 84); apparently either the Bani or Bin'nit (q. v.) of the true text ( Ezra x, 88).

Banquet (בָּנַquet; בָּנְקָט, a feast; and so rendered except on the formal occasions in Esther v, vi, vii; in 1 Pet. iv, 8, κόμως, from the drinking prevalent among the heathen on such occasions). The entertainments spoken of in Scripture, however large and sumptuous, were all prohibited at the expense of one individual; the ἰπανος, γεος, of the Greeks, to which every guest present contributed his proportion, being apparently unknown to the Jews, or at least practised only by the humbler classes, as some suppose that an instance of it occurs in the feast given to our Lord, shortly before the Passover, by his friend, Simon the Pharisee (Matt. xxvi, 7; Mark xiv, 1; comp. with John xii, 2). Festive meetings of this kind were held only toward the close of the day, as it was not till business was over that the Jews freely indulged in the pleasures of the table; and although, in the days of Christ, these meals were, after the Roman fashion, called suppers, they corresponded exactly to the dinners of modern times, the hour fixed for them varying from five to six o'clock P.M., or sometimes later. See Meal.

On occasions of ceremony the company were invited a considerable time previous; and on the day and at the hour appointed, an express by one or more servants was sent to the house where the expected guests, was dispatched to announce that the preparations were completed, and that their presence was looked for immediately (Matt. xxiii, 8; Luke xiv, 17). (Grotius, in loc.; also Morier's Journey, p. 73.) This custom obtains in the East at the present day; and the second invitation, which is always verbal, is always delivered about noon. It was then announced in the most frequent and frequently in the very language of Scripture (Matt. xxiii, 4). It is observable, however, that this after-sentiments is sent to none but such as have been already invited, and have declared their acceptance; and as, in these circumstances, people are bound by every feeling of decorum and propriety to point out to other engagements to the duty of waiting upon their entertainers, it is manifest that the vehement resentment of the grandees in the parable of the great supper (Luke xiv, 16 sq.), where each of the guests is described as offering to the bearer of the express some frivolous apology for absence, was, so far from being harsh and unreasonable, as infidels have characterized it, fully warranted and most natural according to the manners of the age and country. By accepting his invitation they had given a pledge of their presence, the violation of which on such trivial grounds, and especially after the liberal preparations made for their entertainment, could be viewed in no other light than as a gross and deliberate insult.

At the small entrance-door a servant was stationed to receive the tablets or cards of those who were expected; and as curiosity usually collected a crowd of spectators, anxious to press forward into the scene of gayety, the gate was opened only so far as was necessary for the admission of a single person at a time, who, on presenting his invitation-ticket, was conducted through a long and narrow passage into the receiving-room; and then, after the whole company was assembled, the master of the house shut the door with his own hands—a signal to the servant to allow himself to be prevailed on neither by noise nor by importunities, however loud and long-continued, to admit the by-standers. To this custom there is a manifest reference in Luke xiii, 24, and Matt. xxv. 10 (see Morier’s Journeys, p. 142).

One of the first marks of courtesy shown to the guests, after saluting the host, was the refreshment of water and fragrant oil or perfumes; and hence we find our Lord complaining of Simon’s omission of these customary civilities (Luke vii, 44; see also Mark vii, 4). See ANOINTING. But a far higher, though necessarily less frequent attention paid to their friends by the great was the custom of furnishing each of the company with a magnificent habit of a light and showy color, and richly embroidered, to be worn during the festivity (Eccles. ix, 8; Rev. iii, 4, 5). The loose and flowing style of this gorgeous mantle made it equally suitable for all; and it is almost incredible what a variety of such sumptuous garments the wardrobes of some great men could supply to equip a numerous party. In a large company, even of respectable persons, some might appear in a plain and humbler garb than accorded with the taste of the voluptuous gentry of our Lord’s time, and where this arose from necessity or limited means, it would have been harsh and unreasonable in the extreme to attach blame, or to command his instant and ignominious expulsion from the banquet-room. But where a well-appointed and sumptuous wardrobe was opened for the use of every guest, to refuse the gay and splendid costume which the munificence of the host provided, and to persist in appearing in one’s own habiliments, implied a contempt both for the master of the house and his entertainment, which could not fail to provoke resentment; and our Lord therefore spoke in accordance with a well-known custom of his country when, in the parlour of the marriage of the king’s son, he describes the stern displeasure of the king on discovering one of the guests without a wedding garment, and his instant command to thrust him out (Matt. xxvii, 11).

At private banquets the master of the house of course presided, and did the honors of the occasion; but in large and mixed companies it was anciently customary to elect a governor of the feast (John ii, 8; see also Esclus. xxxii, 1), who should not merely perform the office of chairman, ἀρχιεράξιος, in preserving order and decorum, but take upon himself the general management of the festivities. As this office was considered a post of great responsibility and delicacy, as well as honor, the choice, which among the Greeks and Romans was left to the decision of dice, was more wisely made by the Jews to fall upon him who was known to be possessed of the requisite qualities—a ready wit and convivial turn, and at the same time firmness of character and habits of temperance. Fig. 1. Ancient Egyptian Party of Guests, to whom Wine, Ointment, and Garlands are brought.

1. A mait-servant presenting a cup of wine to a gentleman and lady, 2, 3, seated on chairs with cushions, probably of leather; 4, Another holding a vase of ointment and a garland; 5, Presents the lotus-flower, and 9, a necklace or garland, which he is going to tie round the neck of the guest, 10; 11, A female attendant offering wine to a guest; in her left hand is a large basket of fruit. The tables, c, c, are covered with cloth; d, a, cloth; d, g, grapes; other birds, m, s, 2, 2; grapes in baskets, b, flowers, p; and other things prepared for the fest; and beneath them are glass bottles of wine, b, g.
ARCHITECTURISTS. The guests were scrupulously aranged either by the host or governor, who, in the case of a family, placed them according to seniority (Gen. xxiii, 38), and in the case of others, assigned the most honorable (comp. 1 Sam. ix, 22) a place near his own person; or it was done by the party themselves, on their successive arrivals, and after surveying the company, taking up the position which appeared fittest for each. It might be expected that among the Orientals, by whom the laws of etiquette in these matters are strictly observed, many absurd and ludicrous contests for precedence must take place, from the arrogrance of some and the determined perseverance of others to wedge themselves into a place where they deem themselves entitled to. Accordingly, Morier informs us "that it is easy to observe, by the countenances of those present, when any one has taken a higher place than he ought." "On one occasion," he adds, "when an assembly was nearly full, the Governor of Kaahan, a man of humble mien, came in, and had seated himself at the lowest place, when the host, after having tested his particular attention to him by numerous expressions of welcome, pointed with his hand to an upper seat, which he desired him to take" (Second Journey). As a counterpart to this, Dr. Clarke states that "at a wedding feast he attended in the house of a rich man in the suburbs of Damascus, on the 1st of March, 1788, Mr. Jean d'Arce, a gentleman who had seated himself at the top were noticed by the master of ceremonies, and obliged to move lower down" (see also Joseph. Ant. xvi, 24.) The knowledge of these peculiarities serves to illustrate several passages of Scripture (Prov. xxxv, 6, 7; Matt. xxiii, 6; and especially Luke xiv, 7, where we find Jesus making the unseemly ambition of the Pharisees the subject of severe and merited animadversion).

In ancient Egypt, as in Persia, the tables were ranged along the sides of the room, and the guests were placed with their faces toward the walls. Persons of high official station were honored with a table and seat at the head of the room; and in these particulars we trace an exact correspondence to the arrangements of Joseph's entertainment to his brethren.
According to Lightfoot (Exercit. on John xxiii, 25), the tables of the Jews were either wholly uncovered, or two thirds were spread with a cloth, while the remainder was left bare, and only the dishes were vegetables. In the days of our Lord the prevailing form was the triclinium, the mode of reclining at which is described elsewhere. See ACCUMULATION. This effeminate practice was not introduced until near the close of the Old Testament history, for among all its writers prior to the age of Amos, אֶסְעָת, to sit, is the word invariably used to describe the posture at table (1 Sam. vi, margin, and Psa. cxxvii, 8, implying that the ancient Israelites sat round a low table, cross-legged, like the Orientals of the present day), whereas 다가다 şey (Gen. liii, 34) was regarded as a great delicacy still (Buckingham's Travels, ii, 136), as it was also in the days of Samuel. But according to the favorite cookery of the Orientals, their animal food is for the most part cut into small pieces, and served up in the form of stew, such as seems to have been the "broth" presented by Gideon to the angel (Judg. vi, 19). The made-up dishes are "savory meat," being highly seasoned, and bring to remembrance the marrow and fatness which were esteemed as the most choice morsel in ancient Nebuchadnezzar's banquets. As to drink, what was laid on the table, was intended to be taken by a guest, his cup was filled with wine till it ran over (Psa. cxxvii, 5), and it is said that the ancient Persians began their feasts with wine, whence it was called "a banquet of wine" (Esther Ancient Assyrian Guests drinking a Toast.

v, 5). See Rinck, De apparatu convivii regis Persarum (Regiom. 1758); Köhler, Observat. (Lips. 1769), p. 1 sq.
