many and Denmark, the popular title is 'Still Week,' in allusion to the holy water and abstention from labor during its observance." In the Roman Catholic Church, the special characteristics of the celebration of the Holy Week are increased solemnity and gloom, penitential rigor, and mourning. If any of the ordinary Church festivals fall therein, they are transferred till after Easter.
All instrumental music is suspended in the churches, the altars are stripped of their ornaments, the pictures and statues are veiled from public sight, manual labor is voltarily suspended, the rigor of fasting is redoubled, and alms-deeds and other works of mercy and sedulously enjoined and practised. The days specially solemnized are Palm Sunday, Spy Wednesday, Holy (or Maundy) Thursday, Good Friday (q.v.), Holy Saturday. Holy Thursday (q.v.), in the Roman Catholic Church, is specially designed as a commemoration of the Last Supper, and of the institution of the Eucharist. Besides these services, there are still others annexed to the day, as the solemn conclusion of the confession, and of the penance in baptism, confirmation, orders, and extreme unction, the washing of pilgrims' feet, and the chanting of the Tene-brae (darkness), consisting of the matins and lauds for the following mornings, which it is customary to recite at night. During the service, a large candlestick, supporting fifteen lights, arranged in the form of a triangle, which denote Christ and the prophets who predicted his coming, stands in the sanctuary; the lights are one by one extinguished until only the upper one remains, which is taken down and placed under the altar until the close of the office, and then brought back; this symbolizes Christ's burial and resurrection." On Holy Saturday follow the solemn blessing of fire and the water of the baptismal font, the baptism of catechumens, and the ordination of candidates for the ministry. From the fire solemnly blessed on this day is lighted the Paschal Light, which is regarded as a symbol of Christ risen from the dead. This symbolic light is kept burning during the reading of the gospel at Mass throughout the interval between Easter and Pentecost.—Wet-born in 1590 at Boston. He graduated at Harvard College in 1705, was elected tutor in 1712, and on April 25, 1716, was ordained first pastor of the Second Church in Marblehead. In 1737 he was elected president of Harvard College, and remained in that office until his death, June 26, 1738. He published an "Answer to Whitefield" (1744), and a few occasional sermons.—Sprague, Ammda, i, 293. (G. L. T.)

HOLSHAUSER, BARTHOLOMÄUS, founder of the order of Bartholomites (q.v.), was born at Langnau, Switzerland, in 1618, and was brought up to his father's trade, shoemaking. By the exertions of some charitable persons he was admitted into an establishment for poor students at Neuwied in 1641, and afterward installed as a philosopher at Ingolstadt under the Jesuits. Ordained priest in 1639, he conceived the idea of bringing back the priesthood to the common life of the primitive Church. He founded at Tittmoningen an institution intended to show the working of his system, and in 1640 founded a preparatory seminary at Salzburg in connection with it. He was successively curate of Tittmoningen, Liggenthal, and Bingen, where he died in 1658. His zeal and ascetic practices inclined him to revery and exaltation, so that he claimed to have visions; and it is said that, having been besieged by Charonii's, he predicted that a better future awaited him. He wrote, Constitutiones cum exercitio clerorum (Colun. 1632 sqq.; approved by the Church of Rome in 1680):—De humilitate, together with a treatise On the Love of God (Mayence, 1683):—Opusculum visionum variorum. A biography of Holshauser, and a German translation of his works, were published by Clarus (Ratisbon, 1822); a French translation, with a biography, by Gaudrel (Paris, 1861).—Ersch und Gruber, Allg. Homage. See Adoration; Dulia; Fief; Worship.

Homagium is a term applied in ecclesiastical language to the adoration (q.v.) which the clergy in the Roman Catholic Church pay to the pope.—Führmann, Händewörter, d. Relig. und Kirchengesch. ii, 335.

Ho'aman (Heb. Homam, ḫm, diiscomiture; Sept. Apiax, Vulg. Homani), the second name of the two sons of Lotan, son of Seir the Horite (1 Chron. i, 39). In the parallel passage (Gen. xxxvi, 22) his name is written Hemam (Heb. Hemam, ḫm, Sept. Apiax, Vulg. Hemarn). B.C. considerably ante 1640. Homam is another form of Hemam or Hemam, and may be the original form (Thee, p. 385 a). By Knobel (Genesia, p. 254) the name is compared with that of El-homiam, a town now ruined, though once important, half way between Petra and Ailaith, on the ancient road at the back of the mountain, which the Arabic geographers describe as the native place of the Ababdes (Robinson, Res. ii, 572). (See Lake Border, Journey, p. 207; Ammein; also the Arabic authorship mentioned by Knobel).

Homberg zu Vach, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a learned jurist, born at Marburg April 15, 1763, was educated at the University of Utrecht. He visited England, remaining for some time in London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and formed an intimate acquaintance with Richard Bentley. He died April 29, 1748. In addition to works on professional topics, he published, as the result of his private study of the New Testament, Parerga Sacra seu interpretatio sacrae et nova quatonum lorum Nova Testamentum (Ultraj, 1747, 8vo), and enlarged and improved under the title Parerga Sacra seu observationes quaedam ad Novum Testamentum (Ultraj, 1712, 4to). The criticisms contained in this work were attacked by Eilander, and defended by the author's son, Emilhaus Ludwiegis, also a jurist.—J. H. Homberg zu Vach: Khr. Ad eisus latinam linguam etiam veterum Latinorum vindicata (Marb. 1739, 4to), replied to by a relative of Eilander: Brevee Hombergianarum vindicarum adv. J. Eilanderi prolationum (Berlin, 1742, 4to).—"Homberg takes a medium position between the Hebraists and the Purists."—Kitto, Bibl. Cyclop., ii, 819; Jöcher, Gel. Lex. ii, 1886.

Homberg, ERNST CHRISTOPH, a German hymnologist, was born at Mühlau, near Eisenach, in 1605. His profession was that of lawyer. In his early years he wrote a few sermons, but in his right hand years he led to turn his thoughts to sacred themes, and the results are some very beautiful hymns, of which a few are found in the Liturgy and Hymns for the use of the Protestant Church of the United Brethren (1866), and in the Christian Pastor (1832). The "Man of Sorrows" is generally regarded as the best of these. He died June 21, 1681.—Miller (Josiah), Our Hymns, their Authors and Origin (Lond. 1867, 12mo), p. 32.

Home, DAVID, a French divine of Scottish birth, who flourished towards the close of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th century, "was engaged by James I. to attempt the impracticable task of uniting all the Protestant divines in Europe in one system of religious belief." The most important of his writings is Apologia Basiliae, seu Machiavelli Ingenium Examinatum. He is also supposed to be the author of two satires against the Jesuits, entitled Le Contre Assassin, ou reponse a l'Apologie des Jesuites (1612, 8vo), and L'Assassinat du Roi, ou maximes du Vieil de la Montagne Vaticane, etc. (1617, 8vo).—Nov. Homer (Ὀμήρος, chomer, a heap, as in Exod. vii, 14), a Hebrew measure of capacity for things dry, containing ten baths (Lev. xxvii, 16; Num. xi, 32; Ezek. xlv, 11, 13, 14). In later writers it is usually termed a cor. See Measure.

The back (πᾶρεκ) vessel for pouring; Sept. ἤδεια, Vulg. corva dominiæ, Engl. Vers. "half a homer" was a measure for grain of half the capacity of the homer or cor, as seems probable from the only passage where it is mentioned (Hos. iii, 8). See Stud. u. Krit. 1846, i, 128.

Homer, Jonathan, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born October, 1759. He graduated at Harvard College in 1777, was ordained pastor of the First Church in Newton Feb. 16, 1792, resigned in April, 1808, and died April 18, 1837. Homer published a History of Newton and History of Newton in the Massachusetts Historical Collection, vol. v (1798), and a few occasional sermons. He also superintended an edition of Tait's Columbian Bible.—Sprague, Ammda, i, 173.

Homer, William Bradford, a Congregational minister, was born in Boston Jan. 31, 1817. He was educated at Amherst College, from which he graduated in 1836, and immediately entered on a course of theological study at Andover. While in the middle of his course he declined the offer of a tutorship in Amherst College. He was ordained pastor of South Berwick, Me., Nov. 11, 1840, where he died, March 22, 1841. The remembrance of development of Homer's mind was a matter of great surprise to all of his instructors. When only eleven years old he was already thoroughly conversant with the Latin, the modern Greek, and French languages. The last two he is said to have spoken with fluency. At Andover he closed the exercises of his class by an essay so scholarly in its bearings that he was requested to publish it. An oration of his, delivered on leaving the president's chair of the Porter Rhetorical Society of the Theological Seminary, was also printed. His "writings" have been published, with an Introductory Essay and a Memoir, by Prof. Edward A. Park, of Andover Theological Seminary (2d ed. Boston, 1849, 8vo). lish divine, was for a time incumbent of the living of St Mary Staining, London, but was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He died in 1678. His publications, now become rare, include The Resurrection Revealed (London, 1654, fol.; 2 ed. 1683, 8vo). The Resurrection Revealed raised a large amount of correspondence, and led to a series of pamphlets, ten Excursions (London, 1661, fol.).—A Continuation of the Histories of Foreign Martyrs from the Reign of Queen Elizabeth to these Times (in Fox's Acts and Monuments, ed. 1684, iii, 865).—The New World, or the New Reformed Church discovered out of 2 Pet. iii, 18 (London, 1824).—This work has been reprinted by various editors and adopted in various Bibliographies, vol. i; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 873.

Homes, William, was born in Ireland in 1663, and was ordained in that country in 1692. He emigrated to America in 1714, and became minister at Martha's Vineyard, Mass. He died in 1746. Homes published four sermons (1732, 1747, etc.).—Allen's American Biographical Dictionary.

Homiletics is the science of Christian address. The term is derived from ὠμιλία, converse, which, in early Christian usage, signified a religious address; or, more directly, from the adjective ὠμιλικός, conversational, or pertaining to verbal communication. It came into permanent use during the 17th century, at a period when, under the influence of the scholastic method, the principal branches of theology received scientific designations derived from the Greek language: e.g., Apologetics, Dogmatics, Hermeneutics, Polemics. Although promptly naturalized on the continent of Europe, the term Homiletics was not for a long time generally adopted in England. In fact, its present accepted use in the English language is largely due to American authors.

In Germany some attempts have been made to introduce other terms also derived from the Greek. Stier proposed Kerygmatik, from κήρυγμα, a herald; and Sickel Heliostw, from δίσκω, a fisherman; the latter being used tropically in the Gospels in application to the disciples as 'fishers of men.' Both of these terms have been regarded as fanciful and undeserving of perpetuation, even though limited to missionary preaching. The term Homiletics is not entirely unexceptionable, but is retained and employed for lack of a better.

I. History.—With some authors, especially in Germany, the use of a scientific term to designate the theory of preaching has seemed to extenuate, if not to suggest, some practical errors in its treatment. Setting out with the idea of exhibiting a science in a scientific manner, not a few writers have ignored the practical and religious dimensions of the subject. They have treated it exclusively from the rhetorical and human point of view. They have cumbered it with artificial and arbitrary rules, apparently not having conceived of it as an agency specially and divinely appointed for the moral renovation of the world. But a perverted use of terms was not the origin of mistakes on this subject, nor was error in reference to it first developed in modern times. Indeed, misconceptions of the true design of preaching, as well as of the Christian truth it had been appointed to propagate, became common at an early period in the history of the Church. So that the doctrine of Christ's eternal sacrifice for sin having become corrupted by inceptive theories of transubstantiation, the pretended sacrifice of the Mass rose to greater prominence, not so far by reason of its chief support, but rather by reason of an increasing array of forms and ceremonies. Instead of being foremost as the grand agency of Christian propagation, it became an appendage to public worship. Instead of going forth to find hearers in the places and by the wayside, preaching began to be regarded as a duty of the clergy, and only a portion of the clergy, the heathen, and even catechumens of the first degree, were excluded. Catechumens of the second degree were called by the Greek Church ἀκοφύσιοι, and by the Latin audientes, "from their being admitted to hear sermons and the Scriptures read in the church; but they were not allowed to stay during any of the prayers, not even during those that were said over the rest of the catechumens. Some divergences in the form in which these began, immediately after the sermon, at the word of command then solemnly used—\textit{Ne quis auscitium; Let none of the hearers be present!}—they were to depart the church" (Bingham, Orig. Ecc. bk. xi, ch. ii, § 3).

Preaching, having become a ceremony, was next corrupted by the blind and artless idola of literary criticism. Thus, in the first century, the word was appropriated from the Greek rhetoricians. Exhortations and sermons of a scriptural character began to be substituted by formal orations, and panegyrics upon martyrs and confessors successively worshipped as saints. Nevertheless, homilies, or familiar expositions of Scripture, were maintained by the oldest and most reverend fathers, Augustine, who sometimes furnished for the use of clerics incompetent to produce original addresses (see Augustine, \textit{Doctrina Christiana}, lib. iv). The 5th century has been called the oratorial period of the Church, with reference to the distinguished men who then held the places of Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, and Augustine. Two books which have come down to us from the last-named fathers are often quoted as containing the best specimens of homiletical literature that appeared both in the Greek and Latin churches during the first century of the new era. From these and a thousand other books they have long excelled in those churches; yet neither of these works formally or fully discussed the subject of preaching. Chrysostom's \textit{πηγὴ ἱφυσάς}, being devoted to the subject of the priesthood, only alluded to preaching incidentally; nevertheless, it embodied some excellent preaching concerning the work, but it cannot be supposed to have governed the studies and the habits of the writer himself, and by means of which he obtained his wonderful success. Yet no estimate of Chrysostom (the golden-mouthed) can be accepted as just which does not consider him extraordinary genius and transcendent abilities as an orator. Augustine, in his \textit{Doctrina Christiana}, treated the subject of preaching more fully, and discussed it more systematically. He divided his treatise into four books. Three of them are entitled \textit{De inveniendo,} and treat of invention in a broad sense, including the preparation of the statutes of the Scriptures. These books have not in modern times been very highly valued. The fourth relates to expression, \textit{De proferendo.} Although a brief fragment, it has been pronounced the best homiletical production that appeared between the days of Paul and Luther. It has been translated into various languages, and has been translated into various languages. The homilies give to a dimissory form of religious address called \textit{postilla.} Even the function of postilling was chiefly confined to bishops, the common clergy not attempting or being allowed to preach. As if such a degradation of one of the highest offices in the church to men who were sinking still lower by being employed for the promotion of error under the guise of truth. Medieval preaching was largely occupied in eulogizing the Virgin Mary, and in exciting reverence for the pictures and images of saints. Thus preaching was made to corrupt the very religion it was designed to promote. Beyond this, it even became the agency of exciting millions of men war and bloodshed. Successive crusades were preached, and even these persecution of the Albigenses were stirred by the preaching of vengeance against innocent men, who sought to follow Christ in sincerity. For such ends, more than for the promulgation of truth, were several orders of preaching and mendicant monks established in the 13th century.
HOMILETICS

Amonts of mendicants were the principal abbeys of the Inquisition, while others, of less cruel temper, went about to harangue the masses in the interests of papal supremacy, and to promote the sale of indulgences.

2. It was not till medieval superstition had culminated in the grossest abuses, and the Reformation had begun to exert a counter influence, that the Scriptures began to be restored to their proper supremacy. From that period the original design and true character of preaching came to be better comprehended. Much of the reformation was national in character, and consequently universal, but so far as it was founded on the Word of God it tended to revive scriptural conceptions of the preaching office. The diligence of the Protestant reformers in promulgating their views made preaching also necessary to Roman Catholics, among whom from that time, its influence could not be ignored, and, especially in Protestant countries, it was no longer confined to bishops, but enjoined upon the clergy of all grades.

II. Literature.—The inspired Scriptures, especially those of the New Testament, must ever be considered the primary and most valuable source of homiletical instruction. Patristic literature on this subject, as already shown, is meagre and fragmentary. Homiletical literature in the following ages, may be classified in four principal departments: 1. Treatises on preaching; 2.
Aids to preaching, so-called; 3. Sermons, or the products of preaching; 4. Biographies of preachers and miscelnaneous articles relating to the objects and manner of preaching. The first only of these departments will be particularly considered in this article. Immediately consequent upon the revival of preaching in the 16th century, there also occurred a renaissance of homiletical practices, and these were continued to be revived and perpetuated. Prior to the middle of the 17th century there were extant some seventy different treatises, "writ particularly upon this subject," chiefly in the Latin language. These books were classified by Claudius in his Bibliotheca classica, under the head of "Concussatorum instrumenta," and by Molanus, in his Bibliotheca Materitum, under the head of "Concussionis manus." To these, bishop Wilkins remarks, "may be added those many other discourses wherein these things have been largely handled by the by, though not chiefly intended, in all which many learned men have laid down such rules as, according to their several geniuses and observations, seemed most useful." In the enumeration of works referred to, no proper distinction was made between the office of preacher and pastor. Hence we find enumerated in the list the works of Bowes and Hemingius, both entitled In P etestate; also that of Hen. Diest, styled De ratione studii Theologiae. The subject of preaching by English authors were written in Latin, e. g. that of William Perkins, entitled "Arte de Prophecizing, or a treatise concerning the sacred and ayle true manner & method of preaching. First written in Latin. By Leonard Perkins was translated into English (for that it containeth many worthly things fit for the knowledge of men of all degrees) by Thomas Tuke. Motto, Nehemiah viii, 4, 5, 6 (Cambridge, 1615)." Cotton Mather's Mandactio ad Ministerium, written about 1710, in addition to a Latin title, had a very formal and sonorous Latin preface.
In the text of his treatise the learned author makes this remark concerning homiletical literature prior to the period in which he wrote: "There is a troop of authors, and even an host of God, who have written on the Pastoral care from the days of Gregory down to the days of Gilbert; yea, and since these, every year some to this very day. I cannot set you so tedious a task as to read a tenth part of what he been offered on the art, and the gift, and the method of preaching."

In modern times, several different epochs of homiletical literature may be recognised corresponding to the character of preaching at different periods and in different countries. In Germany, the Lutheran reformation caused by the genius and mental frame of the times, the university in the mode of preaching, not only in controversial discourses, but even in the proclamation and enforcement of evangelical truth. Luther wrote no work on preaching, but by his example and occasional precepts, some of which are recorded in his Table-Talk, he greatly influenced his coadjutors and followers as to their theory and practice as preachers. The following are some of Luther's characteristic sayings. Portrait of a good preacher: "A good preacher should have these virtues and qualities: 1. He should be able to teach plainly and convincingly, in order to change men's minds with a good voice; 4. a good memory; 5. He should know when to stop; 6. He should study diligently, and be sure of what he means to say; 7. He should be ready to stand for life, and goods, and glory, on its truth; 8. He should be willing to be vexed and criticised by everybody." Al-drewes, in his Table-Talk, says: a true preacher is one that's moral, kirk-bald af his stomach: i. e. Stand up cheerily, speak man-fully, leave off speedily. "When you are about to preach, speak to God and say, 'My Lord God, I wish to preach to thine honor, to speak of thee, to praise thee, and to glorify thy name.'" Let all your sermons be of the simplest. Look not to Geneva and the learned to the simple and unlearned people. We should preach to the little children, for the sake of such as these the office of preaching is instituted. Ah! what pains our Lord Christ look to teach simply. From vineyards, sheep, and trees he drew his similes; anything in order that the multiplies might understand, embrace, and retain the truth." "If we are found true to our calling, we shall receive honor enough, not, however, in this life, but in the life to come."

After Luther's death a reaction occurred in which there was an attempt to return to the established scheme of the past and reassert the distinctive features of the medieval homilies and possiles. This second period has sometimes been called that of the postillists, in allusion as well to Preachers to Catholics. In the following period the piety of Spe-mer and Francke promoted a healthful reform in the preaching of Germany, although the reform went to some extent neutralized by the near simultaneous development of the Wollish philosophy, which gloried more in logical forms than in the power of the cross.
This philosophy was fascinating to students, and, having gained an ascendency in the universities, it antag-nized the plainer and more evangelical mode of preaching commended by Luther and Francke.

Mosheim, the Church historian of the middle of the 18th century, was also a celebrated preacher, and is regarded as having introduced another homiletical epoch in Germany. His style was majestic and oratorical, and similar to that of the English in England and France. By him it was well applied to religious instruction, but after him it greatly degenerated, many of his imitators being more noted for the form of sound words than for the spirit of vital piety. By degrees, preaching returned to its religious power, until sermons sacrificed aimed at being more than didactic or rhetorical entertainments.

Reinhard, court preacher in Dresden about 1800, not only inaugurated a better style of preaching, but illustrated his theory in numerous published sermons (a collection of his sermons was published at Suhls, 1831-7, in 30 vols, 8vo), and also in a series of letters entitled his

HOMILETICS 316

"Confessions." His style was characterized by richness of thought, clearness, definiteness, force, and dignity of expression. It prevailed both among the rationalists and the orthodox to the time of Schleiermacher. The power of Schleiermacher as a preacher corresponded to his great influence as a theologian, and his example is regarded as having had an incalculable influence on German homiletics, although he did not write specially on that topic. In the course of his life he owned style of preaching improved, rising from the moralisms with which he commenced to a more evangelical tone in subsequent years.

Part from those who have treated of preaching as a branch of practical theology, the more prominent German authors on homiletics during the current century have been Schott, Reinhardt, Marheinecke, Theremin, Stier, Lentz, Palmel, and Becker, Schweitzer.

In France the golden age of pulpit oratory occurred about the close of the 17th and at the beginning of the 18th century. It was the age of Bossuet, Bourdaloue, Massillon, and Fenelon, among the Roman Catholics, and of Claude, Superville, and Saurin, among the Protentists. Fenelon and Claude became representative authors of the two churches: the latter, by his Dialogues on Eloquence, particularly that of the Pulpit; the former by his Essay on the Composition of a Sermon. These valuable contributions to homiletic literature are still read with interest, not only in the French, but in the English language. Even the former has been more often reprinted in English than by Romanists. France, in the 19th century, has also produced many excellent writers on religious themes than by Romanists. France, in the 19th century, has also produced many excellent writers on religious themes.

In Great Britain, the principal homiletic writers of the 18th century were John Edwards, 1705; Dr. Doddridge, 1751; Fordeyc, 1754; and George Campbell, 1775. Apart, however, from the influence of any of these writers, there arose during the century a style of Christian address, designed to have a great influence on the subsequent preaching of English-speaking countries. Allusion is made to the reformation that commenced in connection with the labors of Wesley, Whitefield, and others about 1704. The preaching of these men was characterized by a return to scriptural simplicity and fervor, and was followed by extensive religious awakenings, which in due time extended a quickening influence to ministers of all the churches. The Wesleyan reformation was further characterized by field-preaching, and by the employment of unordained men as lay preachers, who gave evidence of a divine impulse to call sinners to repentance. John Wesley, like Luther, though he wrote no treatise on preaching, gave numerous addresses and some rules to preachers, which largely influenced the practice of those who became associated with him, and which did not, in the case of Luther, soon after become dogma, but rather the influence of theocratic practice. In the minutes of one of his early conferences, Wesley gave rules for his preachers which have been officially perpetuated in Methodist societies and churches ever since. These rules pointed out in the briefest words the grand objects and essentials of preaching, regarded them both as precepts and as "smaller advices" as merely auxiliary. "Quest. What is the best general method of preaching? Ans. 1. To invite. 2. To convince. 3. To offer Christ. 4. To build up." Here was the essence of the evangelical idea of preaching, and its fruits followed. Fletcher's portrait of St. Paul expanded and illustrated the same idea; but no extended work on preaching was produced by any Methodist of that period.

The early part of the 19th century witnessed the publication in England of but few, if any, homiletical works of permanent value. Between 1868 and 1919 the Rev. Charles Simeon, of Cambridge, laboriously developed the system of Claude on the composition of a sermon in a series of plans of sermons on the principal texts of Scripture from Genesis to Revelation. This work, which attained the magnitude of twenty-one octavo volumes, was designed to be a thesaurus of help and guidance in sermonizing. It contained no less than 2568 "preaching subjects," enough to occupy the homilist and the homiletic for nearly a quarter of a century. What more could a minister want? Such a wealth of supply would not have been provided had there not been a demand. The demand may have been healthy as far as it indicated a disposition on the part of the English clergy to escape from the saddles of inopportune, and, not entirely, of copying sermons in full, and reading manuscripts prepared for market, and sold in the shops. Nevertheless, the idea that sermon plans for use, any more than sermons for delivery, could be an article of merchandise, was inherently wrong; and, as far as adopted, could only tend to mental torpor, and a servile dependence on the brainwork of others. Yet pulpit assistants, pulpit cyclopedias, books of sketches, and other devices for "preaching made easy," have had their day in England, as well as in Germany and France. Simcox's Homiletics, notwithstanding inherent faults, was by far the most important of its class. It announced obsolete in reference to its primary design, yet one of its features isimitated in some of the best commentaries of the present day, by the insertion in a less formal manner of homiletical notes on important texts and passages.

Several valuable works on preaching have been published in England during the last thirty-five years. The following deserve mention: The Ministerial Character of Christ practically considered, by Charles R. Summer, bishop of Winchester (London, 1824, 8vo); Apologetic Preaching considered, by John Bird Somner, D.D. (London, 1829); The New Homiletics, by W. Williams (London, 1839; 2nd ed. 1840); Ecclesiastes Anglicanus, a treatise on preaching as adapted to a Church of England congregation, by W. Gresley (London, 3d edition 1844, 12mo); Preaching, its Warrant, Subject, and Effects, by W. S. Bucknell (London, 1845); The Modern Pulpit, in relation to the State of Oratory, by J. B. C. H. Buckland (London, 1862, 12mo); Sacred Eloquence, or the Theory and Practice of Preaching, by Thomas J. Potter (Roman Catholic) (Dublin, 1868).

As to homiletical authorship in America, Cotton Mather's Magnificat and Ministerian, or Angels preparing to sound the Trumpet, although rare and little known, had the pre-eminence of being the first and only work of its class up to 1824. At that date Henry Ware, Jun., of Cambridge, Mass., published his Hints on Extemporaneous Preaching, a truly valuable work. In 1819 Eberl Porter, of Andover, republished Fenelon's Dialogues, Claude's Essay, and several minor works, under the title The Young Preacher's Manual (Boston, 1839, 8vo).

Subsequently the following principal works have appeared: Lectures on Homiletics and Preaching, by Eberl Porter, D.D. (And. and N.Y., 1834, 8vo); Sacred Rhetoric, or Oratory, by William Taylor; The Preacher's Assistant, by Henry J. (1860); Thoughts on Preaching, by James W. Alexander, D.D. (1861, 12mo); A Treatise on Homiletics, by Daniel P. Kidder, D.D. (1864, 12mo); Homiletics and Pastoral Theology, by W. G. F. Sheldon, D.D. (1867, 8vo); Office and Work. of the Christian Ministry, by James M. Hoppin (1869, 12mo). The larger part of the last-named work is devoted to the subject of homiletics, although not so indicated in the title.

From the foregoing lists it may be seen that recently American authorship on this subject is somewhat in excess of English. Several of the last-named books have been written by teachers of practical theology representing different schools and having a marked tendency to discuss the subject not only from an evangelical point of view, but in the light of the most modern developments and applications of Christianity. The state of society in the United States of America is favorable to the acceptance of the homiletic theory of preaching, as well as to its most efficient practice. All the churches, as were those of primitive times, are dependent on voluntary support. Neither their congregations nor their success can be maintained without attractive, and, in some degree, effective preaching. Even the Roman Catholic Church has adopted regular Sunday sermons and week-day missions, a species of revival efforts. Contrary to its universal custom where maintained as a religion of the state, it here builds its churches and cathedrals with pews or seating for audiences instead of open naves for processions and moving crowds. The people of the world have in all classes of the human family yearned for what they choose, or not to hear at all, unless addressed in a manner adapted to please or profit them. Corresponding to this state of things, the preachers of all churches, together with errorists of every description, are in active competition for the ears and hearts of the masses. The peculiarity of this condition of salvation lies in the universal search wherever and whenever they are in a manner adapted to please or profit them. Corresponding to this state of things, the preachers of all churches, together with errorists of every description, are in active competition for the ears and hearts of the masses. HOMILETICS

III. Principles. Homiletics, in a human point of view, may thus be considered a progressive science. It grows with the growing experience of the Church, and becomes more and more valuable as it is used to its purpose and is employed by good and great preachers. It avails itself of the agency of the press to perpetuate specimens of the ever-increasing homiletic productions of successive generations, and also to discuss the great problems of human destiny and influence. Thus the modern study and discusion of homiletics has a tendency to place the subject in a clearer light, and to make it more justly comprehensible than it has been at any former period since the days of the apostles. This result has not been attained by means of modern inventions, but rather by a return to the original idea of preaching, as indicated and illustrated by the author of this chapter. The the author of this chapter.

1. The true Idea of Preaching. Preaching is an original and peculiar institution of Christianity. It was not derived from any pre-existing system. It had no proper counterpart even in Judaism, although a limited teaching office was committed to both the priests and prophets of the Jewish dispensation. See Prophets. Old-Testament examples of persons called preachers, like Noah, Solomon, and Ezra, fall far below the idea of preaching as appointed by Christ. See Apostles. Only in the Mosaic prophecies was the office of Christian evangelism clearly foreshadowed (see Isa. 11:1-2). See Gospel. In the fulness of time, the Lord Jesus Christ, recognizing the delegated mission, established and appointed the office and work of preaching as a principal means of evangelizing the world. See Preaching. In preparation for this office he instruct ed his disciples both by precept and example, giving them before his final ascension a work to "go and teach all nations," and "preach the Gospel to every creature." In this appointment the Saviour availed himself of no pre-existing rhetorical system, but rather a universal capacity of the human race now for the first time specially devoted to the divine use, and consecrated to the proposition of the Saviour, JESUS CHRIST. Yet he left his followers free to adopt, as auxiliary to their great work, whatever good thing might be derived from human study, whether of logic, rhetoric, or any other science. Thus, as Christianity multiplied its achievements and extended its influence along the ages, facilities for comprehending the philosophy and the art of preaching would of necessity increase.

2. The Object-Matter of preaching. In secular oratory, themes are perpetually changing with circumstances. In preaching, the theme is one. Nevertheless, the one theme prescribed to the preacher is adapted to all circumstances and all times. It may be summarily stated to be God manifested in Christ Jesus for the redemption of men. This central theme, which is the special burden of revelation, embraces in its correlations all other truths, natural as well as revealed. The word of God should be considered not only the text-book, but the grand treasury of truth for the preacher. In it he is furnished with history, poetry, experience, and philosophy, as well as with spiritual instruction. The subject of the Gospel scheme; nevertheless, he may bring to its illustration whatever truth will aid in its corroboration and comprehension. Still, the preacher's great work must be to publish the doctrine of the cross, "the truth as it is in Jesus." To do this effectually, he not only needs an intellectual perception of its excellence, but the consciousness of its power as bestowed by the baptism "of the Holy Ghost and of fire." Thus the persecuted disciples "went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts vii, 4), and Paul, as a representative apostle, emphatically declared: "We preach Christ crucified;" "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord;" "Christ in you the hope of glory, whom we preach, warning every man and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i, 28).

3. Agencies of Homiletic Preparation. In addition to the essential preliminaries of character and experience heretofore alluded to, the preacher must bring to bear on his theme such mental exercises as will enable him to elaborate it appropriately and to the best effect. The following are indispensable: (1) Interpretation, by which the true meaning of God's word is evoked; (2) Invention, by which suitable materials, both of fact and of thought, are gathered from the universe of matter and of mind. Invention is aided by generalization, analysis, hypothesis, comparison, and diligent exercise.

(3) Disposition, by which all material employed is ar

Ranged in the most appropriate and effective order, whether in the introduction, argument, or conclusion of the discourse.

4. Different Forms of Homiletical Production.—The proclamation of Christian truth is not confined to any one form of address. Our Lord opened his public mission by a sermon—the Sermon on the Mount. Most of his most important utterances fell from his lips in parables and conversations. The reported addresses of the apostles were exhortations rather than sermons according to the modern idea. In the early patristic age exhortations and exhortatory addresses prevailed. The homilies as the leading product of that period. As preaching declined in medieval times, the homily dwindled into the postil. The Reformation brought the sermon again into use, and secured for it the prominence which it still maintains. In addition to re-establishing the sermon in its original prominence, modern Christianitv has developed the platform address, in which a semi-secular style of oratory is made auxiliary to various phases of Christian benevolence. At the present time, it is essential to both ministers and laymen, who would participate in the most prominent activities of the Christian Church. Such efforts are necessary that they should cultivate the talent of effective platform speaking. Nevertheless, the sermon is likely to remain as it was in the beginning, the first and most important of homiletical productions. Hence it should be specially studied, and thoroughly comprehended in all its parts, as the standard form of clerical Christian address. See Sermons.

5. Style and Qualities of Sermons.—It is due to the dignity of Christian truth that the words in which it is uttered should be well chosen and fitted arranged. Hence the general qualities of a good style, such as purity, precision, perspicuity, and strength, should be regarded as of primary and absolute necessity in pulpit style. At the same time, Christian discourse sternly rejects all the faults of style which rhetorical laws condemn, such as dryness, tautology, flattery, and bombast. Perspicuity also requires more than mere rhetoric. In order to its higher objects, it demands certain peculiar combinations, such as a blending of dignity with simplicity, of conciseness with pointedness, and of energy with love. The style of the sermon should at once be fully within the comprehension of its hearers, and not at the same time be a scribbling conglomeration, which shows that it emanated from communion with God, and a familiarity with his inspired word.

Beyond mere verbal expression, sermons should possess several important qualities. (1) They should be evangelical, setting forth the unadulterated truth of the Gospel in its just proportions, and in an evangelical spirit. (2) Sermons should be interesting. To this end, the preacher must be deeply interested himself. He must utter his thoughts with clearness and vividness. He must use frequent illustrations. He must group things new and old in just and graphic combinations. (3) Sermons should be instructive. The increase of the Gospel must never forget the Saviour's command to instruct. Hence every sermon should be tributary to the diffusion of knowledge as well as holiness. (4) Sermons should be instructive. Failing to accomplish some of the special objects of preaching, they are failures themselves. Hence their great essentiality must be considered an adaptation to high and true religious results. If possible, all these qualities should be combined in every sermon, though in proportions to suit occasions.

6. Delivery.—Four different modes of delivery are recognized in Christian oratory: (1) the extemporaneous; (2) the recitative; (3) that of reading; (4) the composite, in which two or all of the foregoing are blended. The last finds little favor among theorists, and is rarely practiced with any high degree of success. The first is the normal mode of human speech. No other was practiced by the Great Preacher, the oracles, or the early fathers. Recitative came into the Church in the 4th and 5th centuries, and reading in the 16th. Few questions pertaining to Homiletics have during the last 800 years been more zealously discussed than the relative advantages and disadvantages of the different modes of pulpit delivery. While it may justly be conceded that each mode has both advantages and disadvantages, when applied to the peculiar case of individuals, yet it may be affirmed as the result of all discussion and experience that the primitive mode of extemporaneous address is commended by the best modern opinion as a gift to be earnestly coveted by every minister of the Gospel, and as a result of their effort within the reach of most, if not all earnest preachers.

7. Conditions and Elements of Success in Preaching.—Mere eloquence, although a great auxiliary, is not of itself a guaranty of success in the proclamation of God's word. There is an infinite distance between the form and the power of preaching. The form is easy; the power is the gift of God crowning the highest human effort. To attain this great gift various conditions are requisite. A preacher must have clear and abiding conceptions of the dignity and overwhelming importance of his office; he must have an intense desire to cultivate a consuming love for his work, evidenced by tireless diligence and unslumbering faithfulness in its discharge. He must make preaching his great business, his absorbing employment. He must have discretion in the adaptation of his subjects, and style of address to his ages and to the condition of his audience. He must cultivate the habit of making all his observations, reading, and experience subservient to his capacity of instruction and religious impression. Above all, he must aim at the supreme glory of God, and at the end of his most earnest efforts depend with trustful confidence upon the divine blessing to give efficiency to his labors, and crown them with success. which accompanies the work—Charlemagne had caused this work to be done by Paulus Diaconus because (see Ranke in the Stud. u. Krit. 1855, ii, 87 sq.) "the Hours contained a number of fragments from the fathers used for reading which were full of faults and badly selected." But it is possible that both had a part in it, Alcuin forming the plan and Paulus Diaconus executing it. The work acquired great importance from the fact that it established more firmly the system of Church lessons introduced by Jerome, which had heretofore been subject to various alterations. Homilists. Among the homilists who have distinguished themselves in the primitive Church, Origen (3rd century) ranks first. The schools of Alexandria and Antioch appear to have been the great centres of this class of sacred literature, and in the early centuries we find the names of Hippolytus, Metrodonus, Clement of Alexandria, and Gregory Thaumaturgus principally distinguished. But it was in the following centuries that the homily received its full development in the hands of the fathers of the Western Church, especially those of Athanasius, the two Gregorys of Nazianzum and of Nyssa, Basil the Great, Chrysostom, the two Cyrilis of Alexandria and of Jerusalem, and Theodoret; in the Latin Church, Cyprian, Ambrose, Augustine, Leo the Great, Gregory the Great, Peter Chrysologus, Fulgentius, and Cæsar of Arles. In later centuries, Venerable Bede, the popes Sabinian, Leo II and III, Adrian I, and the Spanish bishops Isidore of Seville and Iledefonsus, continued to use the homiletic form.—Chambers, Cyclop., v, 899. See CATECHETIC; CATECHISTS; HOMILETIC; HOMILIARE; Homily.

Homilies of John Walfred August, one of the most celebrated German organists and Church composers of the 18th century, was born at Rosenthel Feb. 2, 1714. In 1742 he became organist at the "Frauenkirche" at Dresden, and in 1755 was promoted musical director. He died June 1, 1785. Among his published musical works there are, Psalmkantate (1755), and Weihnachtskantate (1777).— Brockhaus, Conns Lex., vii, 76.

Homily (Gr. ὤμα, κοιμισμόν, a meeting; hence a discourse adapted to the people), the name of a certain class of sermons. It is now applied to a simple exposition of a text, in contradistinction from the discussion of a topic in Church or Parochial sermons (pulpit eloquence), which is now applied to less familiar discourses; ὄμαι to the plain, much as the term lecture is now used.

1. The distinction between the homily and the sermon is thus set forth by Vitæ. "The special character of the homily is, not that it has to do most frequently with recitals, or that it is more familiar than other discourses, but that its chief business is to set in relief the successive parts of an extended text, subordinating them to its contour, its accidents, its shape, if we may so speak, more than can be done in the sermon, properly so called. Nothing distinguishes, especially, the homily from the sermon except the comparative predominance of analysis; in other terms, the prevalence of explanation over system. The difficulty as to unity presented by this kind of discourse never amounts to impossibility. We do not at random cut from the general text of the sacred book the particular text of a homily. The selection is not arbitrary. The limit of the text is predetermined by reference to unity, which, therefore, we shall be at no loss to discover in it. The only danger is that unity of subject will be relinquished, as the thread of a path may be buried and lost beneath an intertwined and tangle vegetation. As the preacher appears to be more sustained by his text in the homily than in the synthetic sermon, the former is thought to Homilarii. The term applied to a collection containing such homilies of the early fathers of the Church as were read on Sunday, on the festal days of the saints, on Easter, and Pentecost. See Duranli, Rationale, bk. vi, ch. i; Fuhrmann, Handwörterbuch der Kirchengeschichte, ii, 387.

Homilarium, the name given to collections of sermons for the ecclesiastical year, to be read in case of incapacity preventing the preacher from delivering a sermon of his own. The idea of such a collection arose in the early part of the Middle Ages. The most celebrated work of the kind, which took the place of all preceding ones, is that known as Charlemagne's Homilariun (Liber homiliarum, Charlem. Coll., iii, 174). The title of the Cologne edition, 1590, sets forth Alcuin as its author (Homilie seu maxime sermones sive conciones ad popular, præstantissimorum ecclesiarum doctorum, Hieronymi, Augustini, Ambrosii, Gregorii, Origens, Chrysostomi, Beke, etc., in hunc ordinem digerntse per Alcuinum Liriariun, atque aliorum auctorum, donec ... in spiritu sui creata fuit). be more easy of execution. It certainly is more easy to make a homily than a sermon, but a good sermon is made with more facility than a good homily. The great masters in the art of preaching—Bourdaioue, for example—have not succeeded in homily. The most excellent judges in the matter of preaching have recog- nized this, and have collected homilies ever since the time of Euthalast. 2. In the primitive Church we find the style of the homily already in the discourses of Christ and his apse- toles. They frequented the synagogues of the Jews wherever they went, and in these it was customary, after the reading of the Scriptures, to give an invitation to an address, or, if one was not taken, to give an address in this way the disciples frequently took occasion to speak of Christ and his doctrines. Thus we find in the Acts (i, 15; ii, 14; iv, 7; v, 29; vi, 34; xiii, 40; 41; xvii, 22; xx, 18; xxii, xxiii, xxvi) brief notices of several ad- dresses made by Peter and Paul, and one by Stephen, which give us quite a distinct impression of the style of address. Tertullian and Justin Martyr inform us that a like practice was common in the churches of Africa and Asia. "We meet together to read the Holy Scriptures, and, when circumstances permit, to admonish each other." In the New Testament, however, we find no such address, as it inclined to an allegorical mode of interpreting the Scriptures. But, aside from this characteristic, the sermons, or, rather, homilies of this period, were soon followed by all the preachers, as Origen was considered by all a standard who was to be imitated, while there were others less commendable. In general they were faulty in style, corrupt with "philosophical terms and rhetorical flourishes, forms of expression extravagant and farfetched, Biblical expressions unintelligible to the people, unmeaning comparisons, absurd antitheses, spir- itless interrogations, senseless exclamations, and bom- bastic phrases of a rhetorical style that is due to the prevalence of paganism among the Christian preachers of this time, many of whom were converts from paganism, and had received an imperfect preparation before entering on the discharge of their sacred office." (6) In the early Latin Church, the homilies of this period are, if anything, even greater inferior to those in the Greek. The cause of this was, as in the Greek Church, the imperfect education of those in the minis- try, more especially their ignorance of the original lan- guages of the Bible. See Eschebach, Versuch e. Gesch. der öffentl. Religionsvorträge, p. 300 sq. 3. In the Church of Rome, at an early period, when few of the priests were capable of preaching, discourses were framed out of the fathers, chiefly expository, to be read from the pulpit. These were also called homilies. See HOMILIARUM. 4. In England, homilies were early in use in the Anglo-Saxon Church. Elfric, archbishop of Canterbury, who, after Alfred, ranks first among the Anglo-Saxon vernacular writers, finding that but few persons of his day (latter part of the 10th century) could read the Vulgate, worked out a version of the Latin, and the language of the Church, was led to compile a collection of eighty homilies, some of which were perhaps written by himself, but most of which he translated from the Latin. In these Anglo-Saxon homilies "almost every vital doctrine which distinguished the Roman from the Protestant Church meets with a direct contradiction," and they proved of no little value in the religious contro- versy at the period of the English Reformation. They condemn especially, among other things, without reserve, the doctrine of transubstantiation (q. v.) as a growing error, and go to prove that the novelties which are generally charged to the Protestants are really of older date than the boasted argument of apostolic tra- dition. Some of the MSS. of these homilies, however, which had been stored away in monastic libraries, are found to be mutilated by the removal of all such obnox- ious passages (comp. Soames, Inquiry into the Doctrines of the Anglo-Saxon Church, Banntton Lecture, Oxford, 1830, 8vo; new ed. London, 1834; Homiletic Collection, at the request of Ethelward, commemorates the different saints revered by the Anglo-Saxon Church, and, like the former collection, was divided into two books. Of these homilies were published, An English-Saxon Homily on the Birthday of St. Gregory, used anecdotely in the English Church, in the time of Ethelward, the Conversion of the English from Paganism to Christian- ity, transl. into mod. Engi, with notes, etc., by Elizabeth Elstob (Lond. 1709, 8vo; new ed. London, 1830, 8vo); El- fric's Homilies, ed. Eliz. Elstob (of which only 36 pages were ever published; Oxf. 1710, fol.). Another attempt was The English-Saxon Homilies of Elfric, transl. by Eliz. Elstob (Oxf. 1715, fol., of which only two leaves were printed, now preserved in the British Museum). Besides these, there are some Anglo-Saxon homilies extant, to which the name of Lupus Episcopus is gener- ally ascribed, though attributed by Wanley (Catalog. of A.-S. MSS. p. 140 sq.), and apparently written in Wulfstan (q. v.), one of the Anglo-Saxon prelates of the 11th century. "The most remarkable of these is the one entitled in the MS. Sermo lapsi ad Anglos quando Domine maxime persecutus es, in which the author claims the privilege of a first-hand knowledge of the crimes which had disgraced the age preceding that in which he wrote, and the increasing wickedness of their own time." See Wright, Byz. Brit. Lit. p. 487 sq., 506 sq. See ELFRIC. 5. In the Church of England, the term homily has acquired a special meaning from the fact that in the time of the Reformation, a number of easy and simple discourses were composed to be read in the churches. "The Thirty-five Article of religion says, 'The second Book of Homilies, the several titles whereof we have joined under this article, both contain a godly and whole- some doctrine, and necessary for the times.'" The former Book of Homilies, which were set forth in the time of Edward VI; and, therefore, we judge them to be read in churches by the ministers, diligently and distinct- ly, that they may be understood of the people. The following are the titles of the homilies which are now in use of the church. 2. Against peril of idolatry. 3. Of repairing and keeping clean of churches. 4. Of good works; first of fasting. 5. Against glutony and drunk- enness. 6. Against excess of apparel. 7. Of prayer. 8. Of the time and place of prayer. 9. That common prayers and sacraments ought to be ministered in a known tongue. 10. Of the reverend estimation of God's Word. 11. Of alms-doing. 12. Of the nativity of Christ. 13. Of the passion of Christ. 14. Of the resurrection of Christ. 15. Of the worthy receiving of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. 16. Of the gifts of the Holy Ghost. 17. For the Rogation days. 18. Of the state of matrimony. 19. Of repentance. 20. Against idleness. 21. Against rebellion." "The first volume of these homilies is supposed to have been composed by archbishop Cramer and bishop Ridley and Latimer at the beginning of the Reforma- tion, when some minutes of imitation of sufficient abilities to preach in a public congregation was not to be found." It was published, as already stated, in the article above cited, in the beginning of the reign of Ed- ward VI. The second volume was perhaps prepared under Edward VI, but it was not published until 1569, during the reign of Elizabeth (comp. Hardwick, Church History during the Reformation, p. 206, 211, 249). "In neither of these books can the several homilies be as- signed to their several authors with any certainty. In the second book no single homily of them all has been appropriated. In the first, that on 'Salvation' was prob- ably written by Cramer, as also those on 'Faith' and

'God's Works.' Internal evidence, arising out of certain hollow, lopsided, peculiar to that or execution, the like of which appears in Latimer's sermons, pretty clearly betray the hand of the bishop of Worcester as having been engaged in the homily against 'Brawling and Contention;' the one against 'Adultery' may be safely given to Thomas Becon, one of Cranmer's chaplains, in whose works, published in 1564, it is still to be found; of the rest nothing is known but by the meager conjecture. All members of the Church of England agree that the homilies contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, but they are not agreed as to the precise degree of authority to be attached to them. In them, the authority of the bishops and the authority of the first councils, and of the judgments of the Church generally, the holiness of the primitive Church, the secondary inspiration of the Apocalypse, the sacramental character of marriage and other ordinances, and regeneration in holy baptism, and the real presence in the Eucharist, are asserted' (Bp. Burnet). One of the best editions of the Homilies is that by Corrèe at the University press (Cambridge, 1850, 8vo), and the latest, and perhaps most complete edition, is that published at Oxford (1859, 8vo). Hominæ intelligentiæ (Fr. hommes d'intelligence, men of understanding), a heretical sect which flourished in the Netherlands about 1412, most likely a later branch of the Brethren of the Free Spirit (q. v.). It was founded by Egidius Cantor, and the most celebrated of their leaders was the German Carmelite Hildemarcius. Egidius Cantor asserted that "he was the saviour of the world, and that by him the faithful should see Jesus Christ, as by Jesus Christ they should see God the Father; that the ancient law was the time of the Father, the new law the time of the Son; and that there should shortly be a third law, which was to be the time of the Holy Ghost, under which men would be at full liberty." They also held that there was no resurrection, but an immediate translation to heaven; and advanced the most preposterous doctrine that the poor had merit, and that sensual pleasures, being natural actions, were not sinful, but rather foretastes of the joys of heaven. They were accused of heresy, and, Hildemarcius having recanted, the sect finally dissolved—Broughton, Biblioth. Hist. Sac. i, 465; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. ii, 292 sqq.; Fuhrmann, Handb. d. Kirchengesch. p. 359.

Homoousian or Homousian, a term describing the opinions of Arius and his fellow-heretics, who declared the Son of God to be, only of like substance (σώματος) with the Father. See ARIANISM.

Homologoumena (ὁμολογούμενα, universally acknowledged), the names given by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii, 5, 25) to those books of the New Testament, of the canonical authority of which no doubt had been expressed. Eusebius included under the term the four gospels, the Acts, the fourteen epistles of Paul, and the first epistles of Peter and John, while the epistle of James, the second epistle of Peter, and the second and third epistles of John, and the epistle of Jude, were placed among the Antilegomena. In a third or lower class, some, Eusebius says, placed the Apocalypse, though others placed it among the acknowledged books. It therefore properly belonged to the Antilegomena.—

Homousian, a term used to describe the orthodox view of the person of Christ, established at the Council of Nice in opposition to Arius, viz., that the Son of God is of "the same substance (σωματος) or (essential) with the Father" (μονοθεις του Πατερος). See ARIANISM; CHRIST; PERSON OF; TRINITY.

Honain, Ibn-Isaac, an Arabic-Nestorian physician and philosopher of the Abadite tribe, was born near Hirah in A.D. 808. He went to Greece, and there studied the Greek language and philosophy, and returned to Bagdad with a large collection of Greek books, part of which he translated into the Arabic and Syriac. He was assisted in this work by his son Isaac Ibn-Honain and his grandson Hobaiah, who likewise distinguished themselves as philosophers. In this manner many works of the Greeks became accessible to the Arabs and the works were promoted among them, especially the study of Greek philosophy. It is to be regretted that after the completion of the translations the original works were burned, according, it is said, to a command of the caliph Al Mamun. Besides these translations, Honain wrote largely on medicine, philosophy, theology, and philosophy. He left also a Syriac grammar and a Syriac-Arabic dictionary, the first dictionary of the kind ever prepared. He died in 872.—Herbelot, Biblioth. Orientale, p. 423; Assemani, Bibl. Hone, William, an Independent minister, whose father is said to have been an occasional preacher among the Dissenters, was born in 1779 at Bath. He was brought up in rigid religious notions, and in his early years not suffered to read out of any other book than the Bible. At the age of ten he was apprenticed to an attorney, and finally entered the law, from which profession he retired in 1800. He devoted himself at the same time to the study of literature, and wrote several works on that subject. In 1825 he published a work entitled Ancient Mysteries described, especially by the Enochians; founded on the apocryphal N.T. Story, extant among the unpublished MSS. in the British Museum, etc. (8vo). "This is a curious work, not at all addressed to the multitude, or chargeable with any irreverence of design or manner, but treating an interesting antiquarian subject in the dispassionate style of a studious inquirer. His acquaintance with members of the "Independents" led him to join the Independent Church, and finally he became a minister of that society. He died Nov. 6, 1842. Hone also published The Apocryphal N. T. (Lond. 1820, 8vo; 4th ed. 1821), for an account of which see Hone, Intro. to the Study of the Script. and L. Rev. 1821, xxv, 380 sqq. Honert, Johann van den, a distinguished Dutch divine, was born near Dordrecht Dec. 1, 1645. His early years were spent in military service, but on his father's accession to a professor's chair in the University of Leyden he decided to follow a literary life, and, after four years of study, he became a candidate for the ministry in his twenty-fourth year. In 1718 he was appointed minister at Catwick, on the Rhine; later, at Enkhuysen, and then at Haarlem. In 1727 he was called as pro-

Honey (ἦλ, debash), sometimes rendered "honey-comb," in combination with ἡλ ὑποτρόπων, or ἠλ ὅσκυλος, while ἡλ ὑποτρόπος, singly, is sometimes translated "honeycomb;" Greek μῖλλα is represented by several terms, more or less accurately, in the original languages of Scripture.

1. ἠλ ὑποτρόπων, which only occurs (in this sense) in 1 Sam. xiv, 25, 27, 29; Cant, v, 1; and denotes the honey of bees, and that only. The word properly signifies a copse or forest, and refers to the honey found in the woods.

2. ἠλ ὑποτρόπων, honey that drops from ἠλ ὑποτρόπων, to sprinkles or distill, usually associated with the comb, and therefore bee-honey. This occurs in Ps. xxi, 10; Prov. v, 3; xxiv, 15, xxvii, 1; Cant. iv, 11.

3. ἠλ ὑποτρόπων, debash 'from its glutinous nature.' This is the most frequent word. It sometimes denotes bee-honey, as in Prov. xiv, 8, but it also signifies a vegetable honey distilled from trees, and called mannna by chemists; also the sirup of dates, and even dates themselves. It appears also sometimes to stand as a general term for all kinds of honey, especially the sirup of grapes, i.e., the newly-expressed juice or must boiled down. The heart, the sweetness of this sirup is still common in Palestine, under the same Arabic name dibs (Robinson's Researches, ii, 442, 458), and forms an article of commerce in the East; it was this, and not ordinary bee-honey, which Jacob sent to Joseph (Gen. xlii, 11), and which the Tyrians purchased from Palestine (Esck. xxviii, 17). The mode of preparing it is described in Pliny (xiv, 11): the must was either boiled down to a half (in which case it was called defrumum), or to a third (when it was called sirrus, or sapa, the ἱππας ὑλος, v. 3): it was mixed either with wine or milk (Virg. Georg. i, 296; Ovid, Fast. iv, 280): it is still a favorite article of nutriment among the Syrians, and has the appearance of coarse honey (Russell, Aleppio, i, 82). It was used for sweetening food, like sugar with us (Exod. xxxi, 31).

5. The "wild honey" (Ἤλ ὑποτρόπιοι) which, with locusts, formed the diet of the John the Baptist, was, according to some, the manna or vegetable honey noticed under debash (No. 3, above), but may very naturally refer to the honey stored by bees in the rocks of Judaea Desert, in the absence of the trees to which they usually resort. Such wild honey is clearly referred to in Deut. xxii, 12; Ps. lxxxvi, 17. Josephus (War, iv, 8, 5) specifies bee-honey among the natural productions of the plain of Jericho: the same Greek expression is certainly applied by Diodorus Siculus (xix, 94) to honey exuding from trees; but it may also be applied, like the Latin mel silvestre (Pliny, xi, 16), to a particular kind of bee-honey that is said to be a honey which is gathered by bees as "vegetable honey," by which is meant the exudations of certain trees and shrubs, such as the Tomariz maminara, found in the peninsula of Sinai, or the stunted oaks of Luristan and Mesopotamia. A kind of honey is described by Josephus (l. c.) as being manufactured from the date palm.

Honey was not permitted to be offered on the altar (Lev. ii, 11). As it is coupled with leaven in this prohibition, it would seem to amount to an interdiction of things sour and sweet. Aben Ezra and others allege that it was because honey partook of the fermenting nature of leaven, and when burnt yielded an unpleasant smell—qualities incompatible with offerings made by fire of a sweet savour unto the Lord. The prohibition appears to have been grounded on the fermentation produced by it, honey soon turning sour, and even forming vinegar (Pliny, xx, 48). This fact is embodied in the Talmudic teaching, "to ferment is debash." Other explanations have been offered, as that bees were unclean (Phil. ii, 255), or that the honey was the artificial dibs (Bähr, Symboli, ii, 326). But Maimonides and others think it was for the purpose of making the different species of fruits, and the religious custom of the sacrifices, the cheese and the heathen, in whose offerings honey was much employed. The first-fruits of honey were, however, to be presented, as these were destined for the support of the priests, and not to be offered upon the altar (2 Chron. xxxii, 5). It is related in 1 Sam. xiv, 24-29, that Jona-than and his party, contemplating the consecrated honey, which was falling from the trees to the ground, and the prince extended his rod to the honey-comb to taste the honey. From all this it is clear that the honey was bee-honey, and that honey-combs were above the trees, from which honey dropped upon the ground; but it is not clear whether Jonathan had put his rod among the trees that was in the trees or shrubs, or into one that had fallen to the ground, or that had been formed there (Kitto's Pict. Bible, ad loc.). Moreover, the vegetable honey is found only in small globules, which must be carefully collected by the bees and then used (Wetstein, ii, 50). In India, "the foxtail," says Mr. Rose, "literally flow with honey; large combs may be seen hanging on the trees as you pass along, full of honey" (Oriental Illustrations). We have good reasons to conclude, from many allusions in Scripture, that this was also, to a considerable extent, the case formerly in Palestine. It is very evident that the land of Canaan abounded in honey. It is indeed described as "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Exod. iii, 8, etc.), which we apprehend to refer to all the sweet substances which the different Hebrew words indicate, as the phrase seems too large to be confined to the honey of bees alone. Yet the great number of bees in Palestine has been noticed by many travellers; and they were doubtless still more common in ancient times, when the soil was under more general cultivation. Where bees are very numerous, they sometimes resort to places for the deposit of their honey which would little think this honey of a lion, picked clean by birds, dogs, and insects, would afford no bad substitute for a hive, as in Judg. xiv, 8, 9 (Kitto's Daily Bible Hist., ad loc.). A recent traveller, in a sketch of the natural history of Palestine, names bees, bee-hives, and honey-combs, as the most common in the country (Schubert, Reise im Morgenlande, ii, 120). In some parts of Northern Arabia the hills are so well stocked with bees that no sooner are hives placed than they are occupied (Wetstein's Travels, ii, 120). Dr. Thomson speaks of immense swarms of bees in the cliffs of Wady Rum, and compares saw hives in several places in Palestine (Illustrations of Script. p. 96). Milk and honey were among the chief dainties in the earlier ages, as they are now among the Bedawin; and butter and honey are also mentioned among articles of food (Isa. vii, 15). The ancients used honey instead of sugar (Psa. cxix, 108; Prov. xxiv, 19); but when taken in great quantities it causes nausea, as a fact employed in Prov. xxxv, 16, 17, to inculcate moder-tation in pleasures. Honey and milk are put also for sweat discance (Cant. iv, 11). The preservative properties of honey were known in ancient times. Josephus records that the Jewish king Aristobulus, whom Pomppey's partisans desired to see in their possession, had honey brought in quantity to him on his death-bed; and still Antony sent him to the royal cemetery in Judea (Acts, xiv, 7, 4). See Bee.

HONEY, a portion of which, with milk, was sometimes given to newly-baptized persons in allusion to the name anciently given to Canaan, and in token that they belenged to the spiritual Israel. Honey and milk had a distinct consecration (Exod. Eccl. Diet.). See Au-

Honor. (1.) respect paid to superiors, those to whom we owe particular deference and distinction. (2.) It is sometimes, in Scripture, used to denote real services:
"Honor thy father and mother (Exod. xx, 12)," that is not only to show due respect and esteem them, but also to perform such services to them as they need. By honor is also understood that adoration which is due to God only: "Give unto the Lord the honor due unto his name (Psa. xxii, 2)." (3.) Specifically, it is used to denote the testimony of esteem or submission, by which we make known the veneration and respect we entertain for any one on account of his dignity or merit. The word is used in general for the esteem due to virtue, glorious, reputation, and probity. In every situation of life, religion only forms the true honor and happiness of man. "It cannot arise from riches, dignity of rank, or office, nor from what are often called splendid actions of heroes, or civil accomplishments; these may be found among men of no real integrity, and may create considerable fame; but a distinction must be made between courage and true honor. The former is a loud and noisy appearance of strength, a silent and true homage. Fame floats on the breath of the multitude; honor rests on the judgment of the thinking. In order, then, to discern where true honor lies, we must not look to any adventitious circumstance, not to any single sparkling quality, but to the whole of what forms a man; in a word, we must look to the soul. It will be found superior to it.
It will mind superior to fear, to selfish interest, and corruption by an ardent love to the Supreme Being, and by a principle of uniform rectitude. It will make us neither afraid nor ashamed to discharge our duty, as it relates both to God and man. It will influence us to be magnanimous without being proud, humble without being mean; just without being harsh; simple in our manners, but manly in our feelings. This honor, thus formed by religion, or the love of God, is more independent and more complete than what can be acquired by any other means. It is productive of higher felicity, and will be commensurate with eternity itself; while that honor so called, which arises from any other principle, will result in the feeble and trembling flame of a taper, which is often clouded by the smoke it sends forth, but is always wasting, and soon dies totally away" (Blair, Sermon, Serm. 53).

(4.) The term honor, however, by the personal pride of the individual. Coleridge remarks that wherever "genuine morality has given way, in the general opinion, to a scheme of ethics founded on utility, its place is soon challenged by the spirit of honor. For honor degrades the spirit of honor into a mere club-law among the higher classes, originating in selfish convenience, and enforced by the penalty of excommunication from the society which habit had rendered indispensable to the happiness of the individuals, has misconstrued it not less than that of morals in the influence of noble natures.
The spirit of honor is more, in deed, than a mere conventional substitute for honesty; but on the other hand, instead of being a finer form of moral life, it may be more truly described as the shadow or ghost of virtue deceased; for to take the word honor is to descend to a sense of pretension, and honor may be allowed to the writer of satires, but not to the moral philosopher. Honor implies a reverence for the invisible and supernatural in our nature, and so far it is virtue; but it is a virtue that neither understands itself nor its true source, and therefore often unsubstantial, not selish, nor honorable, and often more or less capi-cious. Abstract the notion from the lives of lord Herbert of Cherbury, or Henry the Fourth of France, and then compare it with I Cor. xiii and the Epistle to Phi-leon, or, rather, with the realization of this fair ideal in the mind of St. Paul himself. This has struck the better class even of infidels. Collins, one of the most learned of our English deists, is said to have declared, that contradictory as miracles appeared to his reason, he would believe in them notwithstanding if it could be proved to him that St. Paul had asserted any one as having been worked by himself in the sense of the word miracle; adding, 'St. Paul was so perfect a gentleman, and a man of honor.' I know not a better test. Nor can I think of any investigation that would be more instructive where it would be safe, but none, likewise, of greater delicacy from the probability of misinterpretation than a history of the rise of honor in the European monarchies as connected with the corruptions of Christianity, and an inquiry into the specific causes of the inefficacy which has attended the combined efforts of divines and moralists against the practice and obligation of dwelling.' Of the merely worldly sense of honor, Carlyle says, with sufficient force, that it "reveals itself too clearly as the daughter and heiress of our old acquaintance, Vanity" (Essays, ii, 74). Montesquieu remarks that what is called honor in Europe is unknown, and of course unnamed, in Asia; and that it would be difficult to render the term intelligible to a Persian." See Montesquieu, Spirit of Laws, bk. iii. ch. viii; Coleridge, Friend, p. 317.

Honoratus, St., a Manichaeon, and archbishop of Aries, was born, according to Bailleit, in Belgian Gaul, in the second half of the 4th century. He belonged to a noble family who were pagans; and when he and his brother Venantius became Christians, they left their country and parents, and travelled through Achais, and afterwards founded a monastery on the island of Serino, opposite Cannes, which acquired great celebrity. Some of the most eminent bishops and theologians of the 5th and 6th centuries came out of this convent. Honoratus himself was twice bishop of Arles, A.D. 426, and died

Honoratus, St., bishop of Marseilles, was born about 420 or 425, and is said to have been educated at the school of Lerins. He was the successor of the celebrated Tillemont in the episcopacy (probably in 475), but of his works very little is known at present. Some acribes have ascribed to him the authorship of the life of St. Hilarious, which others ascribe to the 6th or 7th century. He died about 492, counting pope Gelasius I among his admirers.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, Honorius, Roman emperor, son of Theodosius I, born in 384. He was named Augustus Nov. 28, 386, and succeeded his father Jan. 17, 395, as first emperor of the Western empire, with Rome as its capital, HONORIUS 324 HONORIUS

while the Eastern fell to the lot of his brother Arcadius. Honorius was at this time only ten years of age, and he was therefore put under the guardianship of Stilicho, a Vandal, who had aided him in ascending the throne, and whose daughter Maria he married. Honorius, soon after his accession, renewed and even rendered more stringent his father's regulations against heathenism; but the weakness of his government, together with the fears or heathenish tendencies of some of the governors, rendered these regulations almost of no effect in several provinces. It having been represented to Honorius that the conformance of heathen temples kept up the heathen spirit among the people, he ordered (399) that all such temples should be quickly destroyed, so that the people should no longer have this temptation before them. As the heathen laid great stress on a prediction that Christianity would disappear in its 365th year, the destruction of their own temples at that time made great impression on them. Yet in some districts of Northern Africa the heathen still remained numerous enough not to resist, but even to oppress the Christians. After the death of Stilicho, Honorius modified his severe course against heathenism: a law was passed (410) that all heathen bishops should be expelled. "ut libera volonte quis cultum Christianitatis excipere" —by which the penalties pronounced by preceding laws against all who participated in any but Christian worship were suspended. This law, however, remained in force but a short time, and the old enactments came again in operation. This vacillating, insolent prince was also led to take part in discussions on the points of doctrine then agitating the Church. In 418 he promulgated an edict against Pelagius and the Pelagians and Collocale, which was framed more in a theological than an imperial style. He acted in the same manner toward the Donatists. The envoy of the North African Church succeeded in obtaining from the emperor a rule that the penalty of ten pounds of gold to which his father Theodosius had condemned heretic priests, or the owners of the places where heretics as-

behavior had been offered to the orthodox priests. In an edict Honorius issued against the Donatists (405), he condemned them as heretics, and this with more severity even than the Council of Carthage demanded. Later he appointed a council, to be held at Carthage (411), to decide the difficulty between the Donatists and the orthodox party. The imperial commissioners, of course, decided for the latter, and new edicts were published exiling Donatist priests, and condemning their followers to be fined. The fanaticism of the oppressed party was excited by these measures, and the heresy only spread the more rapidly. While the reign of Honorius is thus of great importance in the history of the Church, the emperor himself showed the greatest want of energy in all his dealings, and his death, which occurred in August, 423, cannot be said to have been a loss to either the State or the Church. —Hennig, Real Encyclop. vol. 251; Mosheim, Chr. Honorius, an archbishop of Canterbury in 627. He instituted parishes in England; but little is known of his life and works. He died in 658.

Honorius of Autun (Augustodunensis), surnamed "the Mad" (440—493), was a bishop of the see of Autun, in Burgundy. His personal history is rather obscure; but if he be really the author of the Eucharisticum, a summary of theology, published in France as the work of Anselm (Paris, 1560, 8vo), he deserves to be placed among the most celebrated men of his century. The Eucharisticum shows that Honorius was devoted to a practical mysticism, and in his works he seems to have followed the new Platonic-Augustinian theology. He condemned the Crusades and pilgrimages to Jerusalem, all decorations of the altar, the extreme unction, etc. On the doctrine of the Trinity, he held that the godhead consists of three distinct powers. He is also said to have been the author of a work, De Predestinatione et libero arbitrio (Col. 1552; also found in Cassander's Works, p. 623 sq.). In this work he holds that "God's foreknow-edge has no compelling influence upon our actions, nor his predetermination any necessitating power over our fate; for, as all futurity is present to an omniscient Being, he knows our future acts, because he sees them as already done; and his predetermination to either life or death is the consequence of his foreknowing the line of conduct which his creatures would choose to pursue." In many respects he agreed with Ab claw (q. v.). Honorius also wrote a Bible commentary. His Introduction to the Exposition of Solomon's Song is considered as his best production. All his theological and philosophical works are collected in the Bibl. Max. Patr. vol. xx. See Dupin, Bibl. Honorius de Sancta Maria, who was also known as Blaise Vauzel lech, was born at Limoges, in France, July 4, 1651. He joined the Carmelites at Toulouse in 1671, and then went on a mission to the Levant. Returning to France, he taught theology for some years, and became prior, councilor, provincial, and, finally, visitor general of the French Carmelites. He died in 1729. The most important and useful of his publications is entitled Réflexions sur les Règles et sur l'Usage de la Cru-terne, touchant l'Histoire de l'Eglise, les Ouvrages des Peres, les Acta des anciens Martyrs, les Vies des Saints, etc. (Paris and Lyons, 1712-1720, 3 vols. 4to). He wrote several treatises on mixed questions, and in favor of the bull Unigenitus; and in 1729, he published Des Motifs et de la Pratique de l'Amour de Dieu (Paris, 1718, 8vo.); etc.—Moret, Nouv. Dict. Hist., Hefner, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, xxv, 63.

Honorius I, Pope, was a native of the Campania, and succeeded Boniface V in 625. His general administration of Church affairs has been favorably commented upon by historians, and has left an imprint in the history of the pastoral controversy in Ireland, and in that of the early Anglo-Saxon Church. The feast of the elevation of the cross was organized during his time (about 628), and he was very active in reversing the policy of his predecessor. He died in a village, and his letters are preserved in Labbe's Collect. Concilium, vol. iii. Honorius is especially distinguished for the part he took in the Monothelistic controversies of that period. While the controversy was gaining ground in the West, Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, attempted to explain the theology of the West by trinites in the most favorable light, and suggested that Honorius should impose silence on both parties in a dispute which really did not affect the substance of the Catholic doctrine. Misled, it is alleged, by this statement of Sergius, Honorius consented, and even expressed himself in terms, as far as we can judge, as if he would appear to condemn the doctrine of two wills in Christ. After his death, attempts were made at Rome to exculpate his memory from all accusation of heresy, yet he was condemned and anathematized by the Ecumenical Council of Constantinople in 680, and this sentence was confirmed at different times, as far as we can judge, by Leo II, who anathematized him as heretic for having attempted apostolicum eclecsiam—profusi prohibita immeiutam subserere (Mansi, x, 731). Modern Roman Catholic historians have tried in various ways to exonerate Honorius. Baronius says that the Council of Constanti nople was falsified; Bellarmine says that this was the case with Honorius's letter to Sergius; while Garnier and Ballerini claim that he was not anathema tized for heresy, but propter neglectum. Some Roman Catholic historians, however, maintain that even in disclaiming the belief of Constantine he was for him, Honorius merely denied the existence in Christ of two sovereign or conflicting wills, that is, of a corrupt and sinful human will opposed to the divine will, and that he did not put forth any dogmatic declarations irreconcilable with the strict unamntrane doctrine of infallibility. Orsi went even further, and in his Bullarium states that Honorius composed this letter to Sergius as a "private teacher," but the expression doctor privatus, when used of a pope, is like talking of wooden iron (comp. Janus, The Council and the Pope, p. 405). In modern times, the agitation of the question of papal infallibility has given a special interest to the letters of Honorius on infallibility, following the lead of the above-mentioned writers, tried all kinds of arguments to explain away the assent of Honorius to the heretical doctrines of Sergius, without being able to adduce any new arguments, undertakes to prove that Honorius wrote this letter at all. The Gallicans, and the opponents of papal infallibility, have in general endeavored to show that Honorius was really a favorer of Monothelisim. The ablest treatment of the subject from this school in the Roman Catholic Church may be found in the work on The Pope and the Councils by Janus, also works by P. Le Mottier, in his Condemnation of Pope Honorius, London, 1868); and [in reply to the ultramarine reviews of the first work by Dr. Ward, the editor of the Dublin Review, and the Jesuit Bottalla] The Case of Pope Honorius reconsidered (London, 1869); in two letters, by the distinguished French Oratorian and member of the French Academy, P. Gratry (L’Évêque d’Orléans et l’archevêque de Mâcon, Paris, 1870); and in an essay by bishop Hefele, published in Naples, 1870. Renouf, whose thoroughness and keenness is admitted by all his opponents, in his work, undertaken to prove three assertions: 1. Honorius, in his letters to Sergius, really gave his sanction to the Monothelisic heresy; 2. Honorius was, on account of heresy, condemned by general councils and popes; 3. Honorius taught a heresy ez catholica. The fact that Honorius was condemned by general councils and popes as a heretic is admitted by many of those Catholic writers who insist that his condemnation, although though they are obscure, explained in an orthodox sense. Since the convocation of the Vatican Council in 1869, many Roman Catholic theologians (among them Duhigg and Gratry), who were formerly regarded as personally favorable to the doctrine of papal infallibility, now, after a new investigation of the question, strongly urge the case of Honorius as an irresistible argument against it. The literature on the Honorius question is so voluminous, that, according to the opinion of the learned Duhigg, during the last 150 years more has been written on it than on any other point of Church History within 1500 years. Recent monographs on the subject, however, have been written by Schneemann (Studien über die Honoriusfrage, 1864) and Reinering (Beiträge zur Honorius- und Liberiusfrage, 1865). It is also extensively discussed in a number of articles in the theological reviews, especially those of the Roman Catholic Church, in the largest works on Church History, and in particular, since 1869, in a vast number of works treating of the question of papal infallibility. Honorius II (Peter Cabod). Antipope, was elected in 1061, through the influence of Henry IV, in opposition to Alexander II, who had been chosen by the cardinals without his assent. The election took place in the same college, and Honorius afterwards went to Rome. The German bishops, however, under the influence of Hanno, archbishop of Cologne, sided with Alexander II at the Synod of Augsburg, 1062; and, finally, the Synod of Mantua, 1064, pronounced the deposition of Honorius, and he was obliged thereby to confine himself to the bishopric of Passau, which he held before his election. Yet he upheld his pretensions to the pontifical see until his death in 1072. He was accused of simony and of concubinage. He is generally not counted among the popes on account of his deposition. —Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vol. v; Schröck, Kirchen gesch., xxii, 1, 134; Riddle, History of the Popes, ii, 119; Wetzet u. Welte, Kirchen-Lex., v, 318 sq.; Aschbach, Kirchen-Lex., iii, 323. See ALEXANDER II.

Honorius II (cardinal Lambert). Pope, originally bishop of Ostia, was elected pope by the cardinals in 1124, after the death of Calixtus IV, while most of the bishops assembled at Rome elected Tebalbus, cardinal of Santa Anastasia. Tebalbus, finding that Honorius was supported by the powerful family of the Frangipani, and that the people were divided in opinion, to avoid further strife, waived his claim. Honorius himself also expressed doubts concerning the validity of his own election; he was subsequently re-elected by the clergy and the people of Rome without opposition, and was consecrated Dec. 21, 1124. He refused the investiture of the duchies of Apulia and Calabria to Roger, count of Sicily; and Roger having besieged the pope within Benevento, Honorius excommunicated him; but afterwards peace was concluded between them, and Honorius granted the investiture. He confirmed the election of Lottario, the cardinals' candidate, as his rival, Conrad of Franconia. He also confirmed the organization of the order of Premonstratensians, and at the Synod of Troyes (1128) that of the Templars; and condemned the abbots of Cluny and of Mount Cassin, against whom complaints had been made. He died in the convent of St. John Lateran, 1129. —Encyclop. Honorius III (Cencio Savelli), Pope, a native of Rome, was cardinal of St. John and St. Paul, and succeeded pope Innocent III in 1216. He showed a very accommodating spirit in his relations with the temporal powers. Thus, when Frederick II permitted his son Henry, Duke of Sicily, to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, in April, 1220, he even consented to officiate at the coronation (November, 1220). But it is generally believed that the object of the pope in consenting so readily to the desires of Frederick II was to gain him for the great crusade against the Moslem races in the East which he contemplated. This good understanding between the pope and the emperor was interrupted when the latter, instead of proceeding directly to Palestine, tarried in Apulia and Sicily, and attempted to regain those countries. Honorius sent his chaplain, Alatrunus, to the imperial diet at Cremona in 1226, and the emperor was obliged to agree to a truce.

Honorius even went so far as to threaten him (1225) with excommunication if he did not start for the Holy Land by August, 1227, and he would probably have executed his threat had not death intervened. Thus this amicable spirit Honorius failed to manifest towards count Raymond VII of Toulouse. He excited Louis VIII of France to make war against Raymond; but neither Honorius nor Louis lived to see the end of the conflict. He was also frequently at variance with the nobles and people of Rome, by whom he was a number of times driven from the city. His residence in Avignon was therefore not a very quiet one. He died March 12, 1227.

Officially Honorius confirmed the organization of the Dominicans in 1216, and of the Franciscans in 1228. He was the first pope who granted indulgences at the canonization of saints. He was considered a learned man in his day, and is supposed to have been the author of the Conjurationes adversus principem tenebrae (Rome, 1629, 8vo).—Hertzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vol. v; Hoefer, Nouv. Honorius IV (Giacomo Savelli), was pope from April 2, 1285, to April 3, 1287. He espoused the cause of Charles of Anjou against the Aragonese, who had occupied Sicily; and he even incited to a crusade against the latter, qualifying it as a "holy war." He distinguished himself greatly by his zeal for the preservation and augmentation of the privileges of the Church, and for the recovery of the Holy Land. He cleared the Papal States of the bands of robbers with which they were overrun, and imparted a new impulse to arts and sciences, which up to his time had been much neglected; among other improvements, he attempted to establish a course of Oriental languages at the University of Paris, but he did not succeed. During his brief pontificate he is said to have succeeded in engracing his family.—Migne, Diet. Eccl.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxiv, 91; Mosheim, Ch. Honorius, Bartholomew, a Premonstratist, who flourished in the second half of the 16th century, was born at Erefel, in Brabant, became canon at Fioreffe, near Naurn, later preacher at Helmont, and finally, being persecuted by the Calvinists, went to Rome. He wrote Admonitio ad fratres inferioris Germaniae (Heidelberg, 1578);—Hedworiicon celebrorum ordinis Prémonstratensium per orbem universum Abbatis (ibid., 1584);—Questiones theologicae LXX adversus Calvinistas (ibid., 1586);—Eclaircissement Anselmi Cantuariensi (ibid., 1586); and a number of other, but less valuable works.—Pierer, Univ. Lex., viii, 522.

Hunter, John, one of the apostles of Protestantism in Transylvania, was born at Cronstadt in 1498; studied at Wittenberg under Luther, then went as a teacher to Cracow, whence he moved to Basle to continue his studies. In 1538 he returned to his native city, where he started a printing establishment, and published Luther's writings. He also published at his own expense a translation of the Lutheran Bible into his own language. In 1547, he was appointed pastor, and became quite popular as a preacher. He died Jan. 28, 1549.—Hertzog, Real-Encyklop. v, 254; Hardwick, Ch. Hist. of the Reformation, p. 98; Hist. of Prot. Church in Hungary, p. 59.

Honthem, John Nicolas von (known commonly as Feronius), suffragan bishop of Treves (in Rhineland Prussia), was born Jan. 27, 1701, and educated at the Jesuit College in the University of Freiburg. After completing his studies, he went on a journey to Rome, and after his return (1727) was appointed successively to several high positions in the Church, and finally became suffragan bishop May 13, 1748, which post he filled until 1788. He died Sept. 2, 1789. His History Tripolitana, and and cronica (Trevis, 1750, 3 vols. fol., with a Prodomus, 1757, 2 vols. fol.; Angers, 1757, 2 vols. fol.) is considered a work of great merit; but it was as the author of De Statu Ecclesiae et leguminis Potestate Romana Pontificis Liber singularius, ad resumptam dissidentiae in religioni Composita (Boullion apud Guillemium Evard, 1768, 4to), published under the pseudonym of "Justinus Feronius," that he attracted the attention of the Christian world. The daring expressions of independent thought which characterize the entire work created general excitement. As early as 1763-5 he issued an enlarged edition, and a third, still more enlarged, in 1770-74. An abridgment of the work appeared in German in 1764, another in Latin in 1777, and the translations into the various modern languages soon made it known throughout Europe (French, Sedan and Paris, 1757; Italian, Venice, 1767, etc.). Many of his views were immediately or indirectly adopted, especially Zaccaria (to whose writings an answer is given in Nova defensione Febronii contra P. Zaccaria, Boullion, 1763, 3 vols.) and Bellerini (De potestate ecclesiastica Rom. Pontif., et concil. generalium contra J. Feronii (Verona, 1768, 4to, and often).—Pope Clement XIII caused the copies of this last-mentioned to be burned. Whether it was dedicated to himself. Honthem seeks especially to draw a line of distinction between the spiritual and the ecclesiastical power of the Roman see. He seems to say to his readers, "Without becoming Protestants, you may very well oppose the encroachments and abuse of power the papal court." The principal points of which the work treats are, the constitution of the primitive Church, the representative character of general councils, the thoroughly human basis on which reists the primacy of the bishop of Rome, the fatal influence of the pseudo-Istoriasts, the trying encroachment of power by the nuncios, the illegal influence of the mendicant orders, and the monopoly of episcopal elections possessed by the chapters at the expense of the rights of the lower clergy and the people. As all his assertions are accompanied by historical proofs, and his book contains hardly anything but quotations from the fathers in support of his views, it exerted great influence. As the work had been published under the nom de plume of Justinius Feronius, the system of Church government which Honthem propounded is generally called Feronianism. During the years which followed its publication, papal authority was greatly restricted in many countries. Hence, as soon as the real author of the De Statu Ecclesie was known, he became the object of ceaseless persecutions. Pope Pius VI showed himself especially the enemy of Honthem. The ex-Jesuit Beck, privy councillor of the elector Clement Wenzeslaus, not satisfied with persecuting Honthem, persecuted also all the family, most of the held offices in the province of Trier. The old man (Honthem was then nearly seventy-nine), tired of all these annoyances, and perhaps frightened at the prospect of what he might still have to undergo, finally gave way, and submitted to the pope. When his recantation reached Rome in 1778, Pius VI held a special consistory in order to apprise the whole Roman Catholic world of the event; but several Roman Catholic governments opposed the publication of the acts of this consistory in their states. Moreover, the effects of the dispute had been too widely felt to be obliterated by a tardy expression of repentance. The author himself went, like Fénelon, in order to avoid ceaseless annoyance. His recantation can do no harm to the Christian religion, neither can it in any way benefit the court of Rome; the thinking world has read my arguments, and has indorsed them." Some of the more liberal-minded Roman Catholics, who say that Honthem, in his (first) recantation, declared his object to have been to effect a union of the Roman Catholic and the Protestant churches. He believed that this could only be accomplished by altering or removing some of the institutions of the Roman Church. Later, he modified his recantation greatly by a subsequent commentary (Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1771), to which cardinal Garioli replied, at the special request of the pope. But eventually Honthem made full submission to the Church. In 1788 he resigned his charges, and spent the last years of his life on his estate of Monquintin, in Luxembourg. See Hoe- fer, *Nov. B. Hood ("†23, tmnj††), a turra round the head, spoken of a female head-band (Isa. iii, 23); elsewhere rendered "diadem," e. g. a man's turban (Job xxii, 14); the high-priest's "mizre" (Zeich. iii, 5); the king's "crown" (Isa. lxii, 3. marg.). See HORN-dress, etc.

Hood (Saxon hox; comp. Germ. hut, hat), borrowed from the Roman cuscus, is (1) the cowl of a monk. (2) In England, an ornamental fold that hangs down the back of a graduate to mark his degree. This part of the dress was formerly not intended for distinction and ornament, but for use. It was generally fastened to the back of the cope or other vesture, and in case of rain or cold was drawn over the head. In the universities the hoods of the graduates were made to signify their degrees by varying the colors and materials. By the 17th century the "Chaplains and Students of the University of Cambridge," or rather the minister saying the public prayers, or ministering the sacraments, or other rites of the Church, if they are graduates, shall wear upon their surplices, at such times, such hoods as by the orders of the universities are agreeable to their degrees. — Hook, Church Dictionary., s. v.; Wheatley, Book of Common Prayer, p. 102, 103.

In Lev. x, 5 sq.; Deut. iv, 6 sq., the "parting of the hoof" is made one of the main distinctions between clean and unclean animals; and this is applied even to the camel, after a popular rather than a scientific classification. See CAMEL.

Hoogh, Enrico van der, a distinguished Dutch Orientalist, was born in the latter half of the 17th century. He was a Reformed preacher at Nieuwendam, but spent the greater part of his time in the study of the Oriental languages, especially the Hebrew. He died in 1716. He wrote Janua lingar sacra (Amst., 1697, 1710; ibid., [1717], 1750; — Meditatio De Hebr.« (Amst., 1698, 8vo); — Syntaxis Ebraeo, Chald, et Syr. Lex. Novum Teinfra. Graeco-Latinum, etc. Especially celebrated was his edition of the Biblia Hebraica (Amsterd. and Utrecht, 1705, 1750, London, 1774, and often; lately again by Tauchnitz, Lpz., 1855, and often).—Pleyer, *Univ. Hoogstraten (also called Hoochstraten), Jacob van, prior of the Dominican convent of Cologne, and an ardent adversary of Reuchlin, Luther, and Erasmus, was born at Brabant in 1434. He studied at the University of Cologne without much success. Nevertheless, he became the master of arts in his college, was afterwards made prior. His great zeal and opposition to the Reformation secured him the nomination of inquisitor at Louvain, besides a professorship of theology at the University of Cologne, for which he was in nowise qualified. In 1518 he summoned Reuchlin to appear before him, thereby transferring to his power the inquisitor in another state, could only be summoned by the provincial of the order. He had already published his *Libelli accusatorius contra speculum occult. Joh. Reuch- lini, when the chapter of Mentz took Reuchlin's case in hand. But pope Leo X gave commission to bishop George of Speyer to settle the controversy. Hoogstraten, not appearing, lost his cause, and was condemned to pay the costs; but, as he refused to submit to the decree, the whole matter was brought before Leo X, and Hoogstraten was summoned to Rome. Unwilling either to offend the humanists in the person of Reuchlin, or the powerful Dominican representers by Hoogstraten, the pope issued a mandatum de superedendo. Returning to Cologne, Hoogstraten published in 1518 two so-called Apologies, full of malice, and in 1519 his *Destructio car- bale, seu cabalista perfidiae. A Joh. Reuchlinio seu Capitaneone (Opp. Reuchlini, 1.), 210; Mayerhoff, Joh. Rech- lini u. s. Zeit, p. 158 sq.; Schricker, Kirchengez. xxxi, 248; a. d. Reform. i, 189; Bayle, *Hist. Hook is the rendering in the Auth. Ver. of the following terms in the original. See also FISH-HOOK; FLESH-HOOK; FRUISING-HOOK. A idea of a thorn enters into the etymology of several of them, probably, because a thorn, hooked or straight, was the earliest instrument of this kind. Tacitus thus describes the dress of the ancient Germans. "A loose mantle, fastened with a clasp, or, when that cannot be had, with a thorn" (Germ. 17). See THORN.

1. τομαρί, chuk (lit. a thorn), a ring inserted in the nostrils of an ox or horse, when a cord was fastened in order to lead them about or tame them (2 Kings xix, 29; Isa. xxxvii, 29; Ezek. xxixii, 4; xxviii, 4; compare Job xl, 26; also a "chain" for a captive (Ezek. xix, 4, 9), and "bracelets" for females (Exod. xxv, 22, where others a nose-ring, others a clasp for fastening the dress). In the first two of the above passages, Jehovah intimates his absolute control over Sennacherib by an allusion to the practice of leading buffaloes, camels, dromedaries, etc., by means of a cord, or of a cord attached to a ring, passed through the nostrils (Shaw, Travels, p. 157-8, 2d ed.). Such a ring is oftentimes placed through the nose of a lion, and is likewise used in the East for leading about lions, camels, and other animals. A similar method was adopted for leading prisoners, as in the case of Manasseh, who was led with rings (2 Chron. xxxiii, 11). An illustration of this practice is found in a bas-relief discovered at Khorosabad (Layard, ii, 376; see also the cut under Ewe). The term בָּקֵן is used in a similar sense in Job xi, 24 (A. V. "bore his nose with a gin;" margin). Another form of the same term, בָּקֵן (A. V. "thorn"), is likewise properly a ring placed through the mouth of a large fish, and attached by a cord (12298) to a stake for the purpose of keeping it alive in the water (Job xii, 28). The word meaning "the cord" is rendered "hook" in the A.V. See below.

2. The cognate word בַּקֶּק, chakkab, means a fish-hook (Job xii, i, "a"angle; Isa. xix, 8; Hab. i, 15). This passage in Job has occasioned the following speculations (see, for instance, Harris's Hist. of the Bible, art. Leviathan, Lond. 1825). It has been assumed that Bochart has completely proved the Leviathan to mean the crocodile (Rosemuller on Bochart, iii, 737, etc., 769, etc., Lips. 1796). Herodotus has then been quoted, where he relates that the Egyptians near Lake Moeris select a crocodile, render him tame, and suspend ornaments to his ears, and sometimes gems of great value; his fore feet being adorned with bracelets (ii, 69); and the mummies of crocodiles, having their ears thus bored, have been discovered (Kenrick's Egypt of Herodotus, p. 97, Lond. 1841). Hence it is concluded that this passage in Job refers to the facts mentioned by Herodotus; and, doubtless, the terms employed, especially by the Sept. and Vulgate, and the third and fourth ones, favor the supposition, for there the captive is represented as suppliant and obsequious, in a state of servility and servitude, and the object of diversion, "played with," as with a bird, and serving for the sport of maidens. Herodotus is further quoted to show that in his time the Egyptians captured the crocodile with a hook (דָּשָּׁן, דָּשֶּׁן), with which (בָּקֶק, בָּקֶקֶת, בָּקֶקָן) he was driven ashore; and accounts are certainly given by modern travelers of the continuance of this practice (Maillet, Descrip. d'Egypte, ii, 127, ed. Hagg., 1740). But does not the entire description go upon the supposition of the impossibility of so treating Leviathan? Supposing the allusions to be correctly interpreted, is it not as much as to say, "Canst thou treat him as thou canst treat the crocodile and other fierce creatures?" Dr. Lee has, indeed, given reasons which render it doublet, at least, whether the leviathan does mean the crocodile in this passage, or whether it does not mean some species of whale, as was formerly supposed—the Delphinus orca communis, or common grampus, found in the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, and also in the Nile. (See his examination of Bochart's reasons, etc., in Translation and Notes on Job, Lond. 1857, p. 197.) So the above term in Ezek. xxxii, "I will put my hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause thee to come up out of the midst of thy rivers," where the prophet foretells the destruction of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, by allusions to the destruction, possibly, of a crocodile, the symbol of Egypt. Thus Pline (Hist. Nat. viii, 25) states, that the Tentyrians (inhabitants of Egypt) followed the crocodile, swimming after it in the river, sprung upon its back, thrust a bar into its mouth, which being held by its two extremities, serves as a bit, and enables them to force it on shore (comp. Ezek. xxxii, 3, 4). Strabo relates that the Tentyrians displayed their feats before the Romans (xiv, 6, 2) and later (iv, 590; ed. Caes. 549, 560). See Lay. of Rhod. 3. מִּזְרֵח, a peg or pin, upon which the curtains of the Tabernacle were hung, springing out of the capitals (Exod. xxxvi, 32, etc.). The Sept. and Jerome seem to have understood the capitals of the pillars; and it has been urged that this is more likely to be the meaning than hooks, especially as 1773 shekels of silver were used in making these בָּקֶקֶת for the pillars, overlaying the chapiters, and filleting them (ch. xxxviii, 28), and that the hooks are really the בָּקֶקֶת, taches (Exod. xxxvi, 6, 11, 33, 35; xxxviii, 30). Yet the Sept. also renders בָּקֶקֶת, spicau, rings or clamps (Exod. xxvii, 10, 11, and dyerian, Exod. xxviii, 17, 19); and from a comparison of these two latter passages, it would seem that these hooks, or rather tendrils, rose out of the chapiters or heads of the pillars. The word seems to have given name to the letter ג in the Hebrew alphabet, possibly from a similarity of the form in which the letter appears in the Greek δικώμον, to that of a hook. Mr. Faine (Sodom's Temple, p. 25) regards these hooks as having been rather pins driven into the heads of the pillars, and thus projecting upward from them like a small tenon, upon which the silver rods were slipped by means of a small hole or eye in the latter. This would serve to keep the pillars together. See TABERNACLE.

4. בָּקֶקֶת, teimoth (lit. thorn), a fish-hook (Amos iv, 2; elsewhere a shield). See Fishing, etc.; ANgle.

In the same sense, בָּקֶקֶת, "fish-hooks," where both the Sept. and Vulgate seem to have taken בָּקֶקֶת in the sense of a pot or caldron instead of a fish-hook. See CALDRON.

5. בָּקֶקֶת, maslovet (1 Sam. ii, 13, 14), "flesh-hook," and the בָּקֶקֶת, "the flesh-hooks" (Exod. xxv, 3, 5, and elsewhere). This was evidently in the first passage a trident of "three teeth," a kind of fork, etc., for turning the sacrifices on the fire, and for collecting fragments, etc. See FLESH-HOOK.

6. בָּקֶקֶת, masmeroth (Isa. ii, 4, and elsewhere), "beat their spears into pruning-hooks" (ἐπιθέσεια, fuller). The Roman poets have the same metaphor (Mar. xiv, 84, 98, Fals ex ense). In Mic. iv, 8, in ligones, "weeding-hooks, sho velows, spades, etc., putting the metaphor "pruning-hooks" into spears (iii, 10, ligonee); and so Ovid (Fasti, i, 697, in pila ligones). See PRUNING-HOOK.

7. Doubtful is בָּקֶקֶת, skyphattay'gin, stalls for cattle ("pots"), Psa. lxxviii, 18), also the cedar beams in the Temple court with hooks for flaying the victims (Ezek. xi, 43). Other meanings given are legs (Vulg. In- sid), or eaves, as though the word were בָּקֶקֶת; pens for keeping the animals previous to their being slaugh tered; however, as in the margin of the A.V.; and, lastly, gutters to receive and carry off the blood from the slaughtered animals. Geuenius (Thesaur. p. 1470) explains the term as signifying stalls in the courts of the Temple where the sacrificial victims were fastened: our translators give in the margin the "hearth-stones." The Sept. seems equally at a loss, κοιλιον αναπτυσσων iωσαμικον, as also Jerome, who renders it lobia. Schlesmer pronounces iωσαμικον to be a barbarous word formed from ιωσημε, and understands epistaliumy, a little pillar set on another, and capitellum, columned. The Chaldee renders בָּקֶקֶת, short posts in the house of the slaughterers on which to suspend the sacrifices. Dr. Lightfoot, in his chapter on "the altar, the rings, and the laver," observes, "On the north side of the altar were six orders of rings, each of which contained Hook, James, L.L.D., an English prelate, was born in London in 1771, and educated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. He became archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1814, dean of Worcester in 1825, and held also other preferments in the English Church. He died in 1828. Besides some dramatic pieces and novels which are ascribed to Hook, he published Angnis in Herbas, a true Story of the False God of England (London and Oxford, 1802, 8vo)—Sermons, etc. (1812, 8vo, and another series in 1818, 8vo). For a biographical sketch of Hook, see the London Gent. Mag. April, 1828.—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 975.

Hooke, Luce Joseph, a French theologian of English origin, was born about 1716, and educated at the seminary of "Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet." He received his doctor's degree from the Sorbonne, and was appointed professor of theology in 1750. The following year he presided at the discussion of abbe Paradis's (Jeant.) thesis, which contained many heterodox doctrines, and which he signed without reading. Hooke was deposed from his professorship; but the professors of the Sorbonne and of the College of Navarre interceded in his behalf, and obtained the revocation of the order. At the outbreak of the French Revolution he was made librarian of the Mazarin Library, but he held this place only a short time, when he retired to St. Cloud. He died in 1796. Hooke published Religionis naturalis raelitate et Catholicis Prinicipia (Paris, 1754, 2 vols. 8vo, 2d ed. 1774, 3 vols. 8vo)—Discours et Reflexes, crit. sur l'hist. et le gouvernement de l'anc. Rome (Paris, 1770-84, 4 vols. 12mo—a translation of one of his father's works from the English) —Principe sur la Nature et l'Esence de la Religion Chrétienne (Paris, 1791, 8vo). (J.L.W.)

Hooke, William, a Congregational minister, was born in Southampton in 1601, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. After having received orders in the Church of England, he became vicar of Axmouth, in Devonshire. About 1636 he emigrated to this country, as his nonconforming views had caused him considerable trouble, and in 1644 or 1645 he was installed pastor at New Haven, Conn. He was by marriage a cousin of Oliver Cromwell, after whose ascendency he returned to England, and became Cromwell's domestic chaplain. After the death of Cromwell, Hooke became an ejected and silenced minister, and he spent his remaining days in retirement near London, where he died near London, Jan. 21, 1672. Besides several sermons—among them, New England's Tears for Old England's Tears, a Fast sermon (Tamworth, 1640, London, 1641, 4to), which is considered one of the best productions of his day—he published The Privileges of the Saints on Earth beyond those in Heaven, etc., containing also a Discourse on the Gospel Dew (1678). Hooker, Asa, a Congregational minister, was born in Bethel, Conn., Aug. 29, 1762. He graduated at Yale College in 1783, and was installed pastor at Goshen in September, 1791. This charge he resigned on account of Health June 12, 1810. After preaching in various pulpits, he became pastor of Chelsea parish, Norwich, Conn., Jan. 16, 1812, where he remained until his death, April 19, 1813. Mr. Hooker published several occasional sermons, and a number of articles in the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine—Sprague, Annals, i, 316.

Hooker, Herman, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Poulton, Vt., in 1804; graduated at Middlebury College in 1825, and later at the Princeton Theological Seminary, and was licensed as a Presbyterian, with great promise both as a scholar and speaker. He finally joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, but the partial loss of his sight and of his voice soon compelled his retirement from the ministry; and he became a bookseller at Philadelphia, continuing, however, at the same time, his theological studies. He died at Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 27, 1865. His principal works are, The Portion of the Soul (Philadelphia, 1855, 8mo, and republished in England): —Popular Infidelity (Philadelphia, 1866, 12mo)—Family Book of Devotion (1866, 8vo)—The Use of Adversity and the Provisions of Consolation (Philadelphia, 1864, 18mo)—Thoughts and Maxims (Philadelphia, 1847, 18mo)—The Christian Life a Fight of Faith (Philadelphia, 1848, 18mo). He also published a large number of English and American works. Dr. Hooker was a vigorous and close thinker, a clear writer, a devout and conscientious Christian, full of true and consistent charity. He made the Nashotah Seminary a residuary legacy, which bequest probably amounted to about $10,000." See Church Rev. Jan. 1866; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 978.

Hooker, Richard, one of the most eminent divines in the history of the Church of England, was born in or near Exeter about 1555, according to Walton, or about Easter, 1554, according to Wood. His early education was received at the expense of his uncle, John Hooker, chamberlain of Exeter. He was afterwards introduced by the same relative to the notice of bishop Jewel, who procured him in 1567 a clerkship in Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In December, 1578, he became a student in that college, and a fellow and master of arts in 1577. In 1579 he was appointed lecturer on Hebrew in the university, and in October of the same year he was expelled his college, with Dr. John Reynolds and three other fellows, but he was restored the same month. About two years after he took orders, and was appointed to preach at Paul's Cross. Having married the following year his friend's widow, he lived for a time at the living of Drayton-Beauchamp, in Bucks, by John Cherry, Esq., in 1584. Through the influence of the archbishop of York, he was appointed Master of the Temple in 1585. Here he became engaged in a controversy on Church discipline and some points of doctrine with William Whittingham, an afternoon lecturer at the Temple, who had been ordained by the Presbytery at Antwerp, and held most of the opinions of the divines of Geneva. Travers, being silenced by archbishop Whitgift, appealed to the privy council, but without success. His petition to the council was published, and answered by Hooker. Travers had many and powerful friends in the Temple, and it was their opposition, according to Isaac Walton, which induced Hooker to commence his work on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. Having that he not to the Temple to complete that work, he applied to Whitgift for removal to a more quiet station, and was accordingly placed in the living of Buckinghamshire in 1591. On the 17th of July in the same year he was a prebendary of Salisbury. At Boscombe he finished four books of the Ecclesiastical Polity, which were published in 1594. On the 7th of July, 1595, he was presented by the queen to the living of Hillingdon, in Buckinghamshire, in Kent, which he held till his death, on the 2d of November, 1600. "Hooker's manner was grave even in childhood; the mildness of his temper was proved by his moderation in controversy; and his piety and learning procured him the general esteem of his contemporaries. His great work in the defence of the constitution and discipline of the Church of England, in eight books, under the title of The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. This work obtained during the author's lifetime the praise of a pope (Clement VIII) and a king (James I), and has ever since been looked upon as one of the chief bulwarks of the Church of England and of ecclesiastical learning; its indefatigable researches in genealogy, learning, profound reasoning, and breadth and sustained dignity of style, it is indeed beyond praise; but the common objection is a just one, that Hooker's reasoning is too frequently that of an advocate. The publication of the first four books has been mentioned above; the fifth was published in 1657. He composed the last three books, but they were not published till several years after his death. The account which Walton gives of the mutilation of the last three books is very improbable, and little doubt can be entertained of their authenticity, though they are certainly imperfect, and probably not in the condition in which he left them (English Cyclopedia).

Hooker was charged with Romanizing tendencies, but the charge had no better foundation than his prelatical theory of the Church. For a series of shrewd and genial notes and criticisms on Hooker, see Coleridge, Conybeare's Works, N.Y. edition, v. 38 sq.; The Ecclesiastical Polity marked several hundred sheets have appeared. His Works, with Life, edited by Dr. Gauden, were published in London, 1662 (fol.); again in 1666 (fol.), with life by Isaac Walton. The latest editions are Hanbury's, with life of Cartwright, and Notes, from the London, 1807, edition of view of Hooker, (London, 1836); Keble's (London, 1836, 4 vols. 8vo, and 1841, 3 vols. 8vo; without the Introduction and notes, 2 vols. 8vo). Hooker, Thomas, an eminent Congregationalist, was born July 7, 1554, at Marfield, Leicestershire, England. He was successively student and professor at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. After preaching a short time in London, he settled in 1626 at Chelmsford as assistant minister. In 1630 he was silenced by archbishop Laud for nonconformity, and enjoined, under a bond of fifty pounds, to come before the Court of High Commission; but forswearing the bond, he escaped to Holland, and remained three years, when he returned, and sailed, July, 1633, for Boston. He arrived in this country Sept. 4, and was ordained first pastor of the church in Cambridge, Oct. 11. After a stay of nearly three years (June, 1636), in company with Mr. Stone, the teacher in his church, and others, he started into what was then the wilderness, and settled at Hartford. He died at that place July 7, 1647. Hooker published The Soul's Ingrafting into Christ (1637):—The Soul's Implantation in Christ, or Conceiving in the Spirit, The Preparing of the Heart, The Soul's Ingrafting into Christ, Spiritual Love and Joy (1637):—The Soul's Preparation for Christ (1638):—The Unbeliever's Preparation for Christ, parts i and ii (1638):—The Soul's Exaltation—embracing Union with Christ, Benefits of Union with Christ, The Deification of the Soul, or, Effectual Calling to Christ (1638)—Ten Particular Rules to be practiced every day by Converted Christians (1641)—Survey of the Sum of Church Discipline (1648):—Christ's Prayer for Believers; a Series of Discourses founded on John xvii, 20-23 (1657):—The Soul's Possession of Christ;—The Soul's Justification: eleven Sermons on 2 Corinthians v, 21; Proverbs i, 28, 29; and a number of occasional sermons. Hooper, George, D.D., an English prelate, born in Worcestershire in 1640, was educated at St. Paul's and Westminster School, and afterwards at Christ Church, Oxford. He first became chaplain of Merton, Bishop of Winchester, and, later, archbishop Sheldon gave him the living of Lambeth. In 1677 he was appointed almoner of the princess of Orange. On the accession of William, the queen chose Hooper for her chaplain, and he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury in 1691. In 1703 he was made bishop of St. Asaph, and in 1712, a portion of his life transferred to the see of Bath and Wells. He died at Bath, Somersetshire, in September, 1727. His principal works are, A Fair and methodical Discussion of the first and great Controversy between the Church of England and the Church of Rome: a most indispensable Guide (Lond. 1667)—De Valentiannorum Herrei Conjectura, quibus illius origo ex Aegyptia theologica deducta (ibid. 1711)—An Inquiry into Ancient Measures, etc., and especially the Jewish, with an Appendix concerning our Old English Money and Measures of Content (ib. 1712). The author describes the book one complete, and says that it is his own work, namely, that published by Dr. Hunt, Hebrew professor (Oxf. 1757, fol.). See also, Lives of the Deans of Canterbury: Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxv, 124.

Hooper (Hooper, or Hooper), John, an English bishop, and one of the martyrs of the Reformation, was born in Somersetshire about 1495. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford. Having embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, he was compelled to leave the university, and finally the country in 1540. He went to Switzerland, passing most of his time at Zurich. On the accession of Edward VI (1547) he returned to England, and acquired great reputation in London as a preacher. In 1550 he was made bishop of Gloucester, but his repugnance to wearing the vestments of that office caused considerable delay in his consecration. After entering on his duties, he labored with great zeal for the cause of the Reformation. In 1552 he was appointed bishop of Worcester in commendam. In the early part of the reign of Mary (1553), he was arrested and confined, and was kept in the state of great suffering and great zeal. He firmly refused all offers of pardon which required the abandonment of his principles, and, though, on account of the wood with which he was burned being green, he suffered the severest torments for nearly an hour, he manifested an unshaken fortitude. He died Feb. 9, 1555. Hooper was the author of a number of sermons and controversial treatises. Among his best works are A Declaration of Christ and his Office (1547, 8vo)—Lesson of the Incarnation of Christ (1549, 8vo):—Twelve Lectures on the Creed (1611, 8vo). Several letters of Hooper are preserved in the archives of Zurich. We have recent reprints, by the Parker Society, of The Early Writings of Bishop Hooper, edited by the Rev. S. Carr (Cambridge, 1843, 8vo); and of his Later Writings, with Letters, etc., edited by the Rev. C. Nevinsom (Cambridge, 1853, 8vo). A sketch of his life and writings is given in his Churc. Register (Rev. Soc. of Canterbury). We have recent reprints, by the Parker Society, of The Early Writings of Bishop Hooper, edited by the Rev. S. Carr (Cambridge, 1843, 8vo); and of his Later Writings, with Letters, etc., edited by the Rev. C. Nevinsom (Cambridge, 1853, 8vo). A sketch of his life and writings is given in his Churc. Register (Rev. Soc. of Canterbury).

The Christian's hope of glory shall be fulfilled (1 Tim. i, 1; Col. i, 27; Tit. ii. 13). The fruit of hope is that through it we are enabled patiently and steadfastly to bear the difficulties and trials of our present existence, and thus the προμοίων is a constant accomplishment of the λογίας (1 Thess. i, 3; Rom. viii, 25), and even is sometimes put in connexion with faith and love (Tit. ii, 2; compare 2 Tim. iii, 10; 1 Tim. vi, 11), the source of the believer's patience in suffering, so it is also the cause of his fidelity and firmness in action, since he knows that his labor "is not in vain in the Lord" (1 Cor. xv, 58). Christianity is the religion of hope, and it is an essential feature of its absolute character. This hope is everlastong and eternal is absolute. To the Christian, as such, it is therefore not time, but eternity; not the present, but the future life, which is the object of his efforts and hope. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop., vi, 196; Krehl, N. T. Handwörterbuch, p. 572.

"One scriptural mark," says Wesley, "of those who are born of God, is hope. Thus St. Peter, speaking to all the children of God who were then scattered abroad, saith, 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope!' (1 Pet. i, 2). And this 'lively hope' is the message of the Apostles to the heathen philosophers. It is, beyond these, the assurance that the spiritual life which dwells in us here will be prolonged into eternity. Hence, in the scriptures of the N. T., Christians are said to have hope rather than hopes (Rom. xv, 4, 18; Heb. iii, 6). The Holy Spirit imparted to believers is the ground and source of all. (1 Pet. i, 8; Acts xxiii, 6; 2 Cor. v, 5; Rom. viii, 11; xv, 13; Gal. v, 5) Hence the notion of hope appeared first in the discip\les in its full force and true nature, after the resurrection of Christ and the descent of the Holy Ghost. In the O. Test., we do not find it with its significance (see Heb. vii, 19).

Thus hope is an essential and fundamental element of Christian life, so essential, indeed, that, like faith and love, it can itself designate the essence of Christianity (1 Pet. iii, 15; Heb. x, 23). In it the whole glory of the Christian religion is centered (Eph. i, 18; iv, 4); it is the real object of the propagation of evangelical faith (Tit. i, 2; Col. i, 5, 23), for the most precious possessions of the Christian, the σωτηρία, σπέρματος, νίκεστα, διασωσίων, are, in their fulfilment, the object of his hope (1 Thess. v, 8 sq.; Rom. viii, 23, comp. Exech. i, 14; Acts xxiv, 14; Tit. ii, 13). The Scriptures are expressly designated as those who are without hope (Eph. ii, 12; 1 Thess. iv, 13), because they are without God in the world, for God is a God of hope (Rom. xv, 13; 1 Pet. i, 21). But the actual object of hope is Christ, who is himself called η λογίας, not only because in him we place all our dependence (the general sense of ἡ λογίας), but especially because it is in his second coming that the Christian's hope of glory shall be fulfilled (1 Tim. i, 1; Col. i, 27; Tit. ii, 13). office of professor of belles-lettres in the College of New Jersey. In 1854 he was also made professor of political economy. During the fourteen years of his connection with the college, he continued in the diligent and thorough discharge of the duties of his professorship, with the exertion of all his powers, the most of which was passed in Southern Europe, whither he had gone to seek some alleviation of a deeply-seated neuralgic affection. He died suddenly at Princeton, Dec. 17, 1859. He published a Treatise on Rhetoric (a syllabus for his college classes); and was a frequent contributor to the Princeton Review. See Princeton, Dec. 1859; Presbyterian Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 90; Newark Daily Advertiser, Dec. 1850.

Hofmayer, Heinrich, a German theologian, was born at Leipzig in 1852, and educated at the university of his native place, and at Jena and Wittenberg. In 1812 he was appointed professor of logic at Leipzig, and very soon after was called to Jena as professor of theology. He died in 1842. Hofmayer wrote Commentarii in veterem quam vocand notos (Leipsic, 1820): Tractatus in priorum et posteriorum Anal. & Aritotel. (Ibid. 1820): Sazonia evanghelica (Ibid. 1825, 1872): De justificatione hominis praeator coram Deo (Ibid. 1829 and 1853; new ed. 1872 and 1876) —Pierer, Universal Lex., etc. 1880.

Hophni (Heb. Chophni, מְחֹפְנִי, perhaps, pupilist, according to others client; Sept. ὁ Φόπνιος, the first-named of the two sons of the high-priest Eli (1 Sam. i. 3; ii. 34), who fulfilled their hereditary sacerdotal duties at Shiloh. Their brutal rapacity and lust, which seemed to acquire fresh violence with their father's increasing years (1 Sam. ii. 22, 12-17), filled the people with disgust and indignation, and provoked the curse which was denounced against their father's house first by an unknown prophet (ver. 27-36), and then by the youthful Samuel in his first divine communication (1 Sam. iii. 11-14). They were both cut off in one day in the flower of their age, and the ark which they had accompanied, to battle against the Philistines was lost on the same occasion (1 Sam. iv. 10, 11). B.C. cir. 1130. The predicted ruin and ejection of Eli's house were fulfilled in the reign of Solomon. See Zadok. The unbridled licentiousness of these young priests gives us a terrible glimpse into the fallen condition of the chosen people. (Ewald, Gesch, ii. 588-588.) The Scripture calls them "sons of Belial" (1 Sam. ii. 12). See El.

Hophra (Heb. Chophra, כֹּפְרָה; Sept. Οὖπαρα; compare Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 1431, Vulg. Fphreol, or Pharaoh-Hophra, king of Egypt in the time of Zedekiah, king of Judah, and of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, B.C. 588. He formed alliance with the former against the latter, and his advance with an Egyptian army convinced the Chaldeans to raise the siege of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix., v. 5); but they soon returned, and took, and destroyed the city. This momentary aid, and the danger of placing reliance on the protection of Hophra, led Ezekiel to compare the Egyptians to a broken reed, which was to pierce the hand of him that leaned upon it (Ezek. iii. 7). This alliance was, however, disapproved by God; and Jeremiah was authorized to deliver the prophecy contained in his forty-fourth chapter, which concludes with a prediction of Hophra's death, and the subjugation of his country by the Chaldeans. See Egypt.

This Pharaoh-Hophra is identified with the Apris (Apris, Herod. ii. 161 sq.; iv. 159; Diod. Sic. i. 68; Αρπιας, Athen. xiii. 560) of ancient authors, and the Osaphis (Οὐαφίς) of Manetho, the eighth king of the twenty-sixth or Saitic dynasty (Eusebius, Chron. i. 219). Under this identification, we may conclude that his wars with the Syrians and Cyrenceans prevented him from1 offering any great assistance to Zedekiah. Hophra is described by Josephus (ii. 169) as a monarch who, in the zenith of his glory, forgot that it was not in the power even of a deity to dispose him of his kingdom, or to shake the stability of his sway: and this account of his arrogance fully accords with that contained in the Bible. Ezekiel (xxix. 3) speaks of this king as "the great dragon that lieth in the midst of the rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself." His overthrow and subsequent captivity and death are foretold with remarkable precision by Jeremiah (xlix. 30): "I will give Pharaoh-Hophra, king of Egypt, into the hands of his enemies, and into the hands of those that seek his life." This was brought about by a revolt of the troops, who placed Amasis at their head, and, after various conflicts, took Apries prisoner. B.C. 569. He was for a time kept in easy captivity by Amasis, who wished to spare his life; but he was at length constrained to give him up to the power of his enemies, of whom he was strangled (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 209 sq.). See Kamphe, De Pharaone Hophra, Lunn. 1784. See PRAOHL.

Hôpital (also Hospital), Michel de l', a distinguished French statesman and opponent of the Inquisition, was born at Aiguesperle, in Auvergne, about 1504. He studied law at Toulouse, and first became known as an advocate of the Parliament of Paris. He opposed the charging various public functions, he became chancellor of France in 1560, during the minority of Francis II. That country at this time was torn by contending factions. "The Guises, in particular, were powerful, ambitious, and intensely Catholic; and when one of the family, the Cardinal de Lorraine, wished to establish the Inquisition in the country, Hôpital boldly and firmly opposed it, and may be said to have saved France from that detestable institution. He summoned the states-general, which had not met for 80 years, and, being supported by the mass of moderate Catholics, he forced the Guises to yield." His speech at the opening of the assembly was worthy of his wise and munificent spirit; "Let us do away," said he, "with those diabolical words of Lutherans, Hugenots, and Papists—names of party and sedition: do not let us change the fair application of Christians." An ordinance was passed abolishing arbitrary taxes, regulating the feudal authority of the nobles, and correcting the abuses of the judicial system. He also secured various benefits for the persecuted Hugenots in various ways, but especially by the edict of pacification, which granted to the Protestants the free exercise of their religion (issued January 17, 1562). In 1568 he was instrumental in establishing the peace of Longjumeau, when, on account of his opposition to Catharine de Medici, who was inclined to break the compact, he was suspected of being a Hugenot. Finding it impossible to prevent the execution of Catharine, he resigned his post in 1572, and retired to his estate at Vignay, near Etampes. He died May 13, 1573. Hôpital's family had all embraced the Protestant faith, and this was well known even at court while he occupied his prominent position there. But his character was so blameless that he held his position for ever, and during the events preparatory to the massacre of St. Bartholomew.—Hoc-fer, Nouv. Biog. his death. Dec. 14, 1814. He published two or three occasional sermons.—Sprague, Aulual, i. 581.

of St. Mary's, Exeter. He finally removed to Ireland with his father-in-law, Lord Robarts (afterwards earl of Tonry), and was made dean of Roscommon in 1693, and bishop of the same place in 1711. He was tran-ferred to Londonderry in 1681, but in consequence of the Roman Catholic troubles in Ireland he returned to England in 1688, and was appointed minister of Aldernanbury, London, in 1698. He died June 22, 1690. In his documents he was a Calvinist. His works are remarkable for cleanness, strength of thought, originality, and purity of style; the most important are, Exposition of the Lord's Prayer (1691)—An exposition of the Ten Commandments (1692, 4to)—The Doctrine of the two Covenants (Lond. 1712, 8vo); and Works, now first col-

Hopkins, John Henry, D.D., LL.D., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the diocese of Vermont, was born of English parents in Dublin, Ireland, Jan. 30, 1792. He came to this country when about eight years old. He was educated chiefly by his mother. In 1817 he entered the legal profession, but six years later he quitted the bar for the ministry, and was ordained in 1824 as rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh.
In 1827 he was appointed for the office of assistant bishop of Pennsylvania, but as the vote of Mr. Hopkins was to decide between himself and Dr. H. U.
Onlerdonk, another candidate, he cast his vote in favor of the latter. In 1831 he became assistant minister at Trinity Church, Boston, and professor of divinity in the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary of Massachusetts. In 1832 he was elected bishop of Vermont, to which he was consecrated Oct. 31. At the same time he accepted also the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Burlington, Vt., which he held until 1856. Besides this, he also established a school for boys, employing poor clergyman and candidates for orders as teachers. His very expenses from this course embarrassed him seriously for many years. After relinquishing this school, he projected and established the "Vermont Episcopal Institute," a semi-theological school, over which he presided until his death, January 9, 1858. In 1867, bishop Hopkins was present at the Pan-Anglican Synod held in Lambeth, and took a prominent part in its proceedings. The discussions dividing the Anglican Church he was a decided champion of the High-Church party, and refused to sign the protest of a majority of the American bishops against the anti-Lollard tendencies. Several of the posthumous works of bishop Hopkins were published by one of his sons. Bishop Hopkins was one of the most learned men of his denomination. He had remarkable versatility of mind, and was a persevering and successful student in the field of theology. Indeed, "it was hard to find a highway or byway of ingenious investigation where he did not leave his footprint." The great mistake of his life, and one which he undoubtedly regretted before his death, was his apology for the institution of human slavery. But we have every reason to believe that the bishop was sincere in what he preached, and that, notwithstanding this failing, he was a devout and consistent man of God. He was a voluminous writer. Besides a number of pamphlets, sermons, and addresses, he published Christiannity vindicated in a series of seven discourses on the external evidences of the N. Test. (Burlington, 1833, 12mo)—The primitive creed examined and explained (1834, 12mo)—The primitive Church, compared with the P. E. Ch. (1835, 12mo)—The Ch. of Rome, in its present capacity compared with the Ch. of Rome at the pres. day (1839, 12mo).—Causes, Principles, and Results of the Brit. Reform. (Phila. 1844, 12mo).—Hist. of the Confessionalis (N.Y. 1850, 12mo).—Reformation of Milner's End of Controversy (1854, 2 vols. 12mo).

An answer has recently been published by Kenrick, Vin-dication of the Church of England (Baltimore, 1853). The bishop Hopkins's last works are a little brochure on the law of ritualism—an argument based on scriptural and historical grounds in behalf of the beauty of holiness in the public services of his Church; and a History of the Church in verse for Sunday-schools.—Amer Ch. Revieu, reau, Dict. des Contemporains, p. 897.

J. H. W.

Hopkins, Samuel, D.D., a noted Calvinistic divine, was born at Waterbury, Conn., Sept. 17, 1721, and was at once set apart by his father for the ministry of the Gospel. He entered Yale College in September, 1737. His course of academic studies was shortened, and in 1741 he was called to the Pastorate of the Church in Haven was stirred by the preaching of Whitefield and Gibbon. The students were deeply affected, and Hopkins was one of the converted. After graduation he commenced the study of theology with president Edwards, and, though not an imitator of the president, he acquired a powerfully influence over his contrary, any other man. In 1741 he began to preach, but with great embarrassment and despondency. During his first few months of probation he declined five invitations for settlement. On Dec. 23, 1748, he was ordained over an infant church of five members in Housington, near Norwich. In 1751 he was called to the Massetts, in this pastorate twenty-five years. He often preached extemporaneously, and was indefatigable in parochial labor. He gave offence to his people by his practice of reading portions of Scripture in the Sabbath services, a practice which was then unusual in New England.
From 1744 to 1768 the prosperity of the church was more or less interrupted by the French and Indian war. Hopkins was obliged often to remove his family, and sometimes to go himself, for safety from Great Barrington.
His criticisms on the military movements of the British army are quoted with admiration. His geniality is very great. The baggage of each one amounts to five cart-loads.
Mighty preparations, but nothing done." On the banks of the Mononaghela Washington was uttering almost the same words to general Braddock. His church, during his pastorate, increased in membership from five to 116.
He labored faithfully among the Indians of his vicinity, and spent much of his time in personal intercourse with Jonathan Edwards, then of Stockbridge. He became unpopular with some members of his parish on account of his strict terms of Church communion, his bold assertions of Calvinistic doctrine, and his staunch patriotism.
He was especially disliked by the British Tories. Some of his parishioners would give nothing for his support, and others had nothing to give. In great poverty, he left his parish in 1769. In April, 1770, he was installed pastor of the church at Newport, which town was then a port of commercial importance, and for many years the rival of New York. During the early years of his pastorate Hopkins enjoyed a visit from Whitefield. His church in Newport flourished until the outbreak of the Revolutionary War. In 1776 the town was captured by the British, and remained in their possession three years past. In 1779 Hopkins continued at his post until the last moment, and then was compelled to flee. He spent the interval in assisting his friend, Dr. Samuel Spring, of Newburyport (see Life and Times of Gardner Spring [N.Y. 1869, 2 vols. 12mo], i. 12 sq.), and in supplying destitute churches in Connecticut. During his absence his people were scattered, and his meeting-house nearly demolished. He returned in 1779, and began to preach in a private room, but soon received aid from his friends in Boston and Newburyport for the restoration of his church edifice. He rejected eligible offers of settlement in other places, and remained faithful to his people, receiving no regular salary, but depending on precarious and temporary means of support.

As soon as Hopkins commenced his pastoral labors at Newport he began to agitate the subject of slavery. At that time Newport was the great slave-market of New England. Hopkins affirmed that the town was built up by the blood of the Africans. Some of the wealthiest merchants were slave-traders. Many of his congregation were slave-owners. He astonished them with his first sermon against the slave system. The poet Whittier says: "It may well be doubted whether on that Sabbath day the angels of God, in their wide survey of his universe, looked down upon a nobler spectacle than that of the minister of Newport rising up before his slaveholding congregation, and demanding, in the name of the Highest, the deliverance of the captive, and the opening of the prison-doors to them that were bound." Only one family left his church; the others freely owned their slaves. He continued to preach on the subject, and many of his members intensively opposed the system. They left Rhode Island. In 1776 he published his celebrated Dialogue concerning the Slavery of the Africans, together with his Address to Slaveholders, copies of which were sent to all the members of the Continental Congress, and to missionaries throughout the land. It was reprinted by the New York Manumission Society as late as 1785. Hopkins entered into correspondence with Granville Sharp, Zachary Macaulay, and other English abolitionists. From them he borrowed the idea of colonizing the blacks; and he devised a colonization scheme, in which he practically stated the shipwrecked African's claim to maintenance as a clergyman. When the Federal Constitution was framed in 1787, he pointed to the clause recognising slavery in the United States, and said, "I fear this is an Achan, which will bring a curse, so that we cannot prosper." Of a movement so vast as the anti-slavery reform in the United States no one man can claim to be the author; but Dr. Hopkins was most certainly the pioneer in that movement.

It is not, however, as a philanthropist, but as a theologian, that Hopkins is generally known. In his extreme indigence he writes: "I have been saved from anxiety about living, and have had thousands of times less care and trouble in the world than if I had had a great abundance. Being unconnected with the great and rich, I have had more time to attend to my studies, and particularly have had leisure to write my System of Divinity, which I hope will not prove useless." By this system, and by his various independent enterprises, he gave occasion for the name "Hopkinsian," as applied to the views of eminent New England divines. He regarded himself as an Evangelical. He had been the most intimate of president Edwards's companions, had revised the president's manuscripts, had unfailingly edited some of them, and was more exactly acquainted than any other man with the president's original speculations. He wrote the first memoir of Edwards, of which the Encyclopaedia Britannica says, it is "equal in simplicity, though by no means in anything else, to the most exquisite work of Walpole.

The prominent tenets of Hopkinsianism are the following: 1. All real holiness consists in disinterested benevolence. 2. All sin consists in selfishness. 3. There are no promises of regenerate grace made to the doings of the unregenerate. 4. The impotency of sinners with respect to believing in Christ is not natural, but moral. 5. A sinner is required to approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though it should cast him off forever. 6. God has exerted his power in such a manner as he purposed would be followed by the existence of sin. 7. The introduction of moral evil into the universe is so overruled by God as to promote the general good. 8. Repentance is before faith in Christ. 9. Though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have, and are accountable for, no sins but personal. 10. Though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them. Dr. Nathaniel Emmons (q.v.), who wrote the most eminent defense of Hopkinsianism, and who described it as characterized by the ten preceding articles, added the following (see Park, Memoir of Emmons) as his own views, and as supplemental to those of his friend Hopkins: 1. Holiness and sin consist in free voluntary exercises. 2. Men act freely under the influence of the divine law. 3. The acts of the divine law deservc eternal punishment. 4. Right and wrong are founded in the nature of things. 5. God exercises mere grace in pardoning or justifying penitent believers through the atonement of Christ, and mere goodness in rewarding them for their good works. 6. Notwithstanding the total depravity of sinners, God has a right to require them to turn from sin to holiness. 7. Preachers of the Gospel ought to exhort sinners to love God, repent of sin, and believe in Christ immediately. 8. Men are active, not passive, in regeneration. Some of these eight propositions are distinctly arrovcd, others more or less narrowly implied. Dr. Emmons regarded Hopkinsianism as in some respects high and intense Calvinism; as, in other respects (the doctrine of general atonement for example), moderate Calvinism; and as, on the whole, "consistent Calvinism.

Amid his labors as a reformer and theologian, Dr. Hopkins vigorously discharged his parochial duties, until he was struck with paralysis, in his seventy-eighth year. He continued to preach during the next four years. With a revival of religion his ministry had commenced, and with it the rising and the setting of his sun. He wrote out a list of his congregation, and offered a separate prayer for each individual. Thirty-one conversions followed. After his discourses on the 16th of Oct., 1805, he exclaimed, "Now I have done; I can preach no more." He staggered from the pulpit to his bed, from which he never rose. He died on the 20th of December, 1808.

In person Dr. Hopkins was tall and vigorous; in his movements dignified, though unyielding. His head was large and square, and his face beamed with intelligence. The movements of his mind were like those of his body, powerful, but of a clumsy. Indeed the blindness which he imputed to what he deemed his duty, with utter self-sacrifice for the right, was his main characteristic. "Love to being in general" was with him not the mere by-word of a sect, but the enthusiastic purpose of his life. He had not the temperament which inspires enthusiasm, and he had not little tact in personal intercourse with men; but in the depths of his indigence he was true to himself, and showed all the courage of a Hampden. He studied hardly ever less than fourteen hours a day, and sometimes even as many as eighteen, in a little room of eleven feet by seven. Every Saturday he fasted, and thus gained spiritual strength for the toils of earth by communion with Heaven. He labored for Indians and selfish white men; for poor negroes who had then no other friend; and for theological science, which gave him respect, but little bread—"ripius proper alioius." In 1834 his Works (before he was only published by the Massachusetts Doctrinal Tract Society (3 vols. 8vo), containing over 2000 pages, with a Memoir by Prof. Edward A. Park of 266 pages.

The character and writings of Dr. Hopkins have recently been depicted for general readers in a very striking way in Mrs. Stone's Minister's Woes. See also Congreg. Quar. Rev. 1864, p. 7 sq.; Hagenbach, History of Doctr. ii, 436, 438; Shedd, Hist. of Doctr., i, 383, 408; ii, 25, 81, 489; Buchanan, Justification, p. 190. Hopkins, William, 1, an English divine, was born at Evesham, Worcestershire, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He entered the ministry in 1675, and, after holding several minor appointments, was made chaplain of Lindridge in 1686, and in 1697 master of St. Oswald's Hospital, Worcester. He died in 1700. He published Sermons (1683, 4to):—Bartram (or Bartram), on the Body and Blood of the Lord (2d ed. 1688):—Animal, on Johnson's Answer to Jocelyn (Lond. 1691, 8vo):—Latin translation of a German Tract on the Burial-place of the Saxon Saints (in Hicken's Septuagint Grammar, Ox. 1705). After his death, Dr. Geo. Hickes published Sermesen after his Sermons, with Life (Lond. 1708, 8vo).

Hopkins, William, 2, a Church of England clergyman, but an Arian in theology, was born at Monmouth in 1716. He entered All Souls College, Oxford, in 1724, and became vicar of Bolney, Sussex, in 1731. In 1734 he became master of the grammar school of Cuckfield, and died in 1786. His principal works are An Appeal to the Common Sense of all Christian People on the doctrine of the Trinity (Lond. 1754, 12mo):—Exod. our correct Translation, with Notes critical and apropos; published 1754, 4to, with a preface of some anonymous pamphlets against compulsory subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles.—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 886; Darling, Cyclop. Hor (Heb. id. פָּרָע or פָּרָע; Sept. ὁ φαράω), the name of two eminent mountains (יוֹם פָּרָע i.e. the "Hor of the mountains," remarkable as the only case in which the name comes first; Sept. ὁ φαράω, Vulg. mons altissimus: and Jerome (Ep. ad Filiobam) non in monte sempiterne sed in monte venti. See MOUNT.

1. An eminent mountain of Arabia Petraea, on the confines of Idumea, and forming part of the mountain chain of Seir or Edom. It is first mentioned in Scripture in connection with the circumstances recorded in Numb. 22—29. It was "on the boundary line" (Numb. xx, 28) or "at the edge" (xxxii, 37) of the land of Edom. It was the next halting-place of the people after Kadesh (xx, 22; xxxiii, 37), and they quitted it for Zalmonah (xxxiii, 41), in the road to the Red Sea (xxi, 4). It was during the encamping at Mt. Hor that Aaron was gathered to his fathers (Numb. xxxiii, 37—41). At the command of Jehovah, his brother, he lifted his rod, and cursed the mountain. He then passed and circumcised the mountain, in the presence of the people, "in the eyes of all the congregation." The garments, and with the garments the office, of high-priest were taken from Aaron and put upon Eleazar, and Aaron died there before the top of the mountain. In the presence of the ascent of the height to die, and in the marked exclusion from the Promised Land, the end of the one brother resembled the end of the other; but in the presence of the two survivors, and of the gazing crowd below, there is a striking difference between this event and the solitary death of Moses in AARON. The Israelites passed the mountain several times in going up and down the Red Sea; and the station Mosera (Deut. x, 6) must have been at the foot of the mount (Deut. xxxii, 50). See MOSERA.

The mountain now identified with Mount Hor is the most conspicuous in the whole range of Mount Seir, and at this day bears the name of Mount Aaron (Jebel-Ha-rum). It is in N. lat. 30° 18', E. long. 35° 33', about midway between the Dead Sea and the Atlantic Gulf. It may be open to question if this is really the Mount Hor on which Aaron died, seeing that the whole range of Seir was covered by a mountain called by that name to a great height, and the remarkable manner in which it rises among the surrounding rocks, it seems not unlikely to have been the chosen scene of the high-priest's death (Kimneir, p. 127). Accordingly, Stanley observes that Mount Hor is one of the very few spots connected with the Old Testament, though, strange to say, the two are not visible to each other — the mysterious city of Petra. The tradition has existed from the earliest date. Josephus does not mention the name of Hor (Ant. iv, 4, 7), but he describes the death of Aaron as taking place "on a very high mountain which surrounded the metropolis of theaken, and other towns," which latter was formerly called Avra (Apea), but now Petra. In the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome it is Or mons—a mountain in which Aaron died, close to the city of Petra. When it was visited by the Crusaders (see the quotations in Robinson, Researches, ii, 921) the sanctuary was already on its site, and there is but little doubt that it was then what it is now —the Jebel Nabi-Harum, "the mountain of the prophet Aaron." Of the geological formation of Mount Hor we have no very trustworthy accounts. The general structure of the range of Edom, of which it forms the most prominent feature, is new sandstone, displaying itself to an enormous thickness. Above that is the Jura limestone, and higher still the cretaceous beds, which latter in Mount Seir are reported to be 3500 feet thick (Wilson, Bible Lands, i, 194). Through the length of the long ridges, red granite and porphyry have forced their way, running nearly north and south, and so completely silicifying the neighboring sandstone as often to give it the look of a primitive rock. These combinations are due the extraordinary colors for which Petra is so famous. One of the best descriptions of the mountain itself is that given by Irby and Mangles (Travels, p. 483 sqq.). It is said to be entirely sandstone, in very horizontal strata (Wilson, i, 290). Its height, according to the latest measurements, is 4800 feet (Eng.) above the Mediterranean, that is to say, about 1700 feet above the town of Petra, 4600 above the level of the Arabah, and more than 6000 above the Dead Sea (Roth, in Peterman's Mittheil. 1856, i. 8). The mountain is marked far and near by its double top, which rises like a huge castellated building from a lower base, and is surmounted by the circular dome of the tomb of Aaron, a distinct white spot on the dark red surface of the mountain (Labarde, p. 143). This lower base is the "plain of Aaron," beyond which Burchhardt was, after all his toils, prevented from ascending (Syrinx, p. 431). "Out of this plain, culminating in its two summits, springs the red sandstone mass, from its base upwards rocky and naked, not a bush or a tree to relieve the rugged and broken corners of the sandstone blocks which compose it. On ascending this mass a little plain is found to lie between the two peaks, marked by a white cypress, and not unlike the celebrated plain of the cypress under the summit of Jebel Mûna, traditionally believed to be the scene of Elijah's vision. The southernmost of the two, on approaching, takes a conical form. The northernmost is truncated, and crowned by the chapel of Aaron's tomb." The chapel or mosque is a small square building, measuring inside about 28 feet by 33 (Wilson, i. 295), with its door in the S.W. angle. It is built of rude stones, in part broken columns; all of sandstone, but fragments of granite and marble lie about. Steps lead to the flat roof of the chapel, from which rises a white dome as usual over a saint's tomb. 4 The interior of the chapel consists of two chambers, one below the other. The upper one has four large pillars and a stone chest, or tombstone, like one of the ordinary slabs in church-yards, but larger and higher, and rather bigger at the top than at the bottom. At its head is a high round stone, on which sacrifices are made, and which retained, when Stephens saw it, the marks of the smoke and blood of recent offerings. "On the slab are Arabic inscriptions, and it is covered with shawls chiefly red. One of the pillars is hung with votive offerings of beads, etc., and two ostrich eggs are suspended over the chest. Steps in the north-west angle lead down to the lower chamber, which is partly in the rock, but plastered. It is perfectly dark. At the end, apparently under the stone chest above, is a recess guarded by a grating. Within this is a rude protuberance, whether of stone or plaster was not ascertainable, resting on wood, and covered by a ragged pall. This lower recess is no doubt the tomb, and possibly ancient. What is above is only the artificial monument, and certainly modern." In one of the walls of this chamber is a "round, polished black stone," one of those mysterious stones of which the prototype is the Kaaba at Mecca, and which, like that, would appear to be the object of great devotion (Martineau, p. 419 sq.).

The chief interest of Mount Hor will always consist in the prospect from its summit—the last view of Aaron—"that view which was to him what Pisgah was to his brother" (Ortolano, De Morte Aaronis, Lips. 1704). It is described at length by Irby (p. 134), Wilson (i. 292-9), Martineau (p. 429), and is well summed up by Stanley in the following words: "We saw all the main points on which his eye must have rested. He looked over the valley of the Arabah counteracted by its hundred watercourses, and beyond, over the white mountains of the wilderness they had so long traversed; and at the northern edge of it there must have been visible the heights through which the Israelites had vainly attempted to force their way into the Promised Land. This was the western view. Close around him on the east were the rugged mountains of Edom, and far along the horizon the wide downs of Mount Seir, through which the passage had been denied by the wild tribes of Esau who hunted over their long slopes." On the north lay the mysterious Dead Sea, gleaming from the depths of its profound basins (Stephens, Incidents). "A dreary moment and a dreary scene—such must have seemed to the aged priest. ... The peculiarity of the view is the combination of wide extension with the scarcity of marked features. Petra is shut out by intervening rocks. But the survey of the Desert on one side, and the mountains of Edom on the other, is complete; and of these last the great feature is the mass of red, bouldered sandstone rocks, intersected, not by valleys, but by deep seams" (S. and Pal. p. 87). Though Petra itself is entirely shut out, one outlying building—if it may be called a building—is visible, that which goes by the name of the Desr, or Convent. Professor Stanley has thrown out a suggestion on the connection between the two which is well worth further investigation. (See Robinson, Researches, ii. 548, 573, 651.) The impression received on the spot is that Aaron's death took place in the small basin between the two peaks, and that the people were stationed either on the plain at the base of the peaks, or at that part of the wady Abu-Kushebyeh from which the top is commanded. Josephus says that the ground was sloping downwards (saurinthes ἤν τῷ γωνίῳ; Ant. iv. 4, 7). But this may be the mere general expression of a man who had never been on the spot. (See Bertou, Le mont Hor, Par. 1860.) 2. A mountain entirely distinct from the preceding, named in Numb. xxxiv., 7, 8, only as one of the marks of the northern boundary of the land which the children of Israel were about to conquer. By many it has been regarded as designating Mount Cæsarea, but this is rather the northern part of Syria, and Venantius Psuedo- doujon renders Mount Hor by Umanos, probably intending Aman. The latter is also the reading of the Talmud; (Gittin, 8, quoted by Furst, s. v.), in which it is connected with the Amana named in Cant. iv, 8. But the situation of this Amana or Abana river which flowed through Damascus, as that is quite away from the position required in the passage, (Psalms, p. 25.), after Parchi (in Benj. of Tude- lsa, p. 413 sq.), identifies it with Jebel Nauris, south of Tripoli, but on trifling grounds; nor was the mound without question on the Mediterranean, and Palestine did not extend so far north. The original is אֵילֶת אָרָן, moun t of the mountain, i. e. by a common Hebrew idiom, the Mountain, by way of eminence, i.e. the lofty mountain; Sept. φόρος, Vulg. mons altissimus; and therefore probably only denotes the prominent mountain of that vicinity, i.e. Lebanon, or at most Mount Hermon, which is an offshoot of the Lebanon range, and hardly be regarded here as a proper name. The northern boundary started from the sea; the first point in it was Mount Hor, and the second the entrance of Hamath. Since Sidon was subsequently allotted to the most north- ern tribe of the priests, and was, as far as we know, the most northern town so allotted, it would seem probable that the northern boundary would commence at that point; that is opposite to where the great range of Lebanon breaks down to the sea. The next landmark, the entrance to Hamath, seems to have been determined by Mr. Porter and Kalat el-Humus, in the ancient Hamath—at the other end of the range of Lebanon. Surely "Mount Hor," then, can be nothing else than the great chain of Lebanon itself. Looking at the massive character and enormous height of the range, it is very difficult to suppose that any individual peak or mountain is intended and not the whole mass, which takes nearly a straight course between the two points just named, and includes below it the great plain of the Beka'a, and the whole of Palestine properly so called.

Hore Canonice, etc. See Breviary; Hours, Canonical, etc.; Ho'ram (Heb. Horam), מ確か, lofty; Sept. Ἢραμ, v. Α'l.בך, 'El'ām, Alām), the king of Gezer, who, coming to the relief of Lachish, was overthrown by Joshua (Josh. x, 39). B.C. 1618.

Horapollo, or Horus Apollo, an Egyptian priest, and author of a treatise on Egyptian Hieroglyphics. Several writers of this name are mentioned by Suidas, Stephanus of Byzantium under Phenebuthus, Photius (p. 536, ed. Bekker), and Eustathius (Homer, Od. d.), but it is doubtful which of them was actually the author of the treatise on Egyptian Hieroglyphics. The probability is, that the work was originally written in the Egyptian language, and translated into Greek by a later writer. Horus was the name of one of the Egyptian deities, who was considered by the Greeks to be the same as Apollo (Herod. ii, 144-156). We learn from Lucian (Pro Inop. § 27) that the Egyptians were frequently called by the names of their gods; and other ancient scholars esteem it more highly than former critics did. It was printed for the first time by Aldus (Venice, 1505), with the Fables of Aesop. The best editions are by Mercier (1551), Hor- schelius (1555), De Pauw (1727), and Leemans (Aret. 1834). The last discussed in his introduction the date and authorship of the work. See English Cyclopedia; Hoefner, Nouv. Dic. Gén., xxx, 166; Bunsen, Egyptians Stelie in d. Weltsch. i, 402; Champollion, Précis du Système du Monde Ancien, p. 497 sqq. Comp. hieroglyphics.

Horb, Johann Heinrich, a distinguished German Pietist, brother-in-law and co-worker of Spener, was born at Colmar, Alsace, June 11, 1645. He studied at the universities of Strasburg, Jena, Wittenberg, and Cologne, afterwards travelled through the Netherlands, England, France, and eventually finally returned to Strasburg in 1670. In 1671 he received an appointment as minister at Birkenfeld, and in 1673 at Trarbach. Here the boldness with which he presented his so-called pietistic views disturbed the equanimity of the orthodox authorities, and he was obliged to resign. He next became pastor at Windenheim, Franconia, and in 1685 accepted a call as pastor of St. Nicholas Church, Hamburg, where he found himself associated with two other Pietists, John Winkler and Abraham Hinkelmann. Their joint teachings created great excitement, which culminated when, in 1698, Horb published, under the title of D. Klugheis d. Gerechten, a translation of Fairer's excellent pamphlet, L'etats principe de l'education Christiane des enfants. The agitation became so violent that in 1694 he was formally suspended, after which he retired to Steinbeck, where he died in Jan. 1693. He published Hist. Ori- gentium, etc. (Frankfort, 1670, 4to); Hist. Manichaeorum (Argent., 1670, 4to); Diagn. de ultimis originis harernsium Simoniae Mogut (Leipzig, 1690, 4to); and also in Vogt's Bibl. hist. hevraicÌ in, 308 sq.); — Hist. heres. Unitarior. (Frankfort, 1671, 4to); and a collection of sermons, D. Leiden Jeu- Christi (Hamburg, 1700).—Hertzog, Real-Encyclopädie, vi, 261; Foerster, Gesch. der Kirche, i, 837 sq.; Moller; Cimbr. litterar., ii, 355 sq.; Walch, Relig. Streitigkeiten, in d. duth. Horbery, Matthew, D.D., an English divine, was born at Haxay, Lincolnshire, in 1677; educated at Lincoln College, and elected fellow of Magdalen College. He became successively vicar of Eccleshall, canon of Lincoln, vicar of Hanbury, and rector of Stanlake. He died in 1773. He was greatly respected as a sound, able, and learned theologian, and an amiable and excellent man. His sermons were praised by Dr. Johnson; they are written in nervous, animated language, yet with great simplicity; the articles in the classes therefore form excellent compositions of English divines. "His Works, including the Sermons, and an Essay on the Eternity of Future Punishments, have been collected and published (Oxford, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo).—Darling, Cyclopædia Bibliographica, i, 1539; Hook, Eccl. Esgy. vi, 150; Waterland, Waters, i, 116, 242, 254; vi, 416 sq.

Horch, Heinrich, S.T.D., a German Pietist and Mystic, was born at Eschwege, Hessen, in 1652. He studied theology and medicine at Marburg, where he came under the influence of the great follower of Spener (q. v.), Theodor Unterczyk, and embraced the doctrines of the Mystics. He also studied the Cartesian philosophy with much interest. In 1685 he was appointed minister at Heidelberg, in 1686 court preacher at Kreuz- nach, but in 1687 he retired again to Heidelberg. At the university of that place he obtained the degree of doctor of theology. In 1699 he went to Frankfort as minister, and in 1704 became church, and in 1706 was professor of theology at Heurnen. By his firm adhe- rence, however, to the Mystic Arnold (q. v.), and his peculiar views of theology, holding, e.g. that divine revelations still continue, that the "book of the living" is useful, and that the eucharist and baptism are unnecessary, etc., he finally lost his position (all 1698). He afterwards wandered about, preaching in city halls and in cemeteries. At times he even entered churches, and preached in spite of the remonstrances of the ministers. He was arrested for this conduct in 1699, and became partially insane. He recovered, however, towards the close of the year 1700, and, by the interposition of his friends, he was granted a pension in 1703, which was continued until his death, August 5, 1729. Horeb was also a Millennium- an; he likewise demanded a second and more complete reformation of the Church, advocated celibacy, though he did not think the married life sinful, and is said to have been a member of the Philadelphia Society (q. v.), founded in 1696 by Jane Lead. He wrote a number of works, of which a complete list is given by Jöcher (Gel. Lex., Adelung's Supplement, ii, 2188 sq.), and of which the Mystische u. Prophetische Bibel (Marb. 1712, 4to) is especially celebrated as the forerunner of the Berleburg Bible (q. v.). Franz Haas (G. u. L. F. Dr. J. F. C. G. Helm. der christlichen Lehre in d. reinen, westph. ev. Kirche (Coblentz, 1852), i, 741-51, Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vi, 262 sq.; Fuhrmann, Handwörterbuch d. Kirchengesch. ii, 349 sq.; Theol. Univ. Lex. ii, 369.)

Höre (Heb. Chôr, בֹּר, Bôr or בּוֹר, Bôr, desert; Sept. Χῶρας or Χῶρης; occur Exod. iii, 1; xvii, 6, xxxiii, 6; Deut. ii, 6, 19; iv, 10, 15; v, 2; ix, 8; xviii, 16; xxxii, 4, 33; Jos. ii, 29; Josh. x, 14; Judges xxii, 6; 1 Sam. iii, 15; Ps. cxxii, 19; Mal. iv, 4; Ecles. xlviii, 7), according to some, a lower part or peak of Mount Sinai, so called at the present day, from which one ascends towards the summit of the mountain (Jebel Musa), properly so called (so Gesenius and others after Burchhardt, Travels in Syria, p. 431, 2d ed. 1807), in consequence of which term being applied in Syria both to the whole mountain, of which Sinai was a particular summit (so Hengstenberg, Allgemeine Geschichte der Pental. ii, 396), Robinson, Bibl. Researches, i, 177, 551), See Sina.

Horebites, a sect of the Huzzites, who, upon the death of Ziska, when they had retired from Boehemia, they chose Bedrich of Bohemia as their leader. They called themselves Horebites because they had given the name of Horeb to a mountain to which they had retired. See Gräbner, Kirchengesch., xxxiv, 688. See Huzzites.

Horem (Heb. Chôrêm, כּוּרֶם, consecrated but forssen according to Fürst; Sept. Θόραμ [but most texts blend with preceding name into Μεγαλαθαομια και Μεγαλαθαομισ], Vulg. Horem), one of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, mentioned between Migdal-el and Beth-anath (Josh. xix, 38), Schwarz (Puelet, p. 184) confounds Horem, which he places preceding in the list of cities, with Merom, both in the modern village Medj el-Kerum, eight miles east of Akka; but this does not lie within the ancient limits of Naphtali (Keil, ad loc.). Van de Velde (i, 178, 9; Memoir, p. 322) suggests Hurah as the site of Horem. It is an ancient site, in the centre of the country, half way between the Ras en-Nakura and the lake Merom, on a tell at the southern end of the wady el-Ain, one of the natural features of the country. It is also in favor of this identification that Hurah is near Yarûn, probably the representative of the ancient Irôn, named with Horem. (Compare Seetzen, Reisen durch Syrien, Berlin, 1854-5, ii, 180.)

Hor-hagid'gad (Hebrew Chôr hay-Gidgad, בּוֹר הַגִּדָּג, hole of the Gidgad; Sept. Στόχος τῶν Πασχαντός; Vulg. mons Hagidgad, both apparently reading or misunderstanding בּוֹר or בּוֹר for הַגִּדָּג), the thirty-third station of the Israelites between Bene-Jaakan and Jotbathah (Num. xxxiii, 32, 35); evidently the same with their forty-first station Gudgodah, between the same places in the opposite direction, and not far from Mount Hor (Deut. x, 6, 7). Winer (Realw. s. v. Horidgad) assents to the possibility of the identity of this name with that of wady Chukakkâd, in the eastern part of the desert Et-Tih (Robinson's Researches, iii, App. 210, b), although the names are spelt and signify differently (this valley would be in Hebrew characters בֽוֹר הַגִּדָּג, but objects to the identification thus proposed by Ewald (Israel. Gesch, ii, 207) on the ground that בּוֹר can hardly mean a wade valley. This difficulty, however, does not weigh much, since the wady may only be the representative of the name anciently attached to some spot in the vicinity, more properly called a chamaa; and even this spot is sufficiently an old form of wady, as it has been washed down by the freshets, which may naturally have partly filled it up in the course of ages. With this identification Rabbi Schwarz likewise agrees (Puelet, p. 213). See Eusebe. The name Gidgad or Gadgad, according to Gesenius, is from an Ethiopic redduplicated root, signifying to reer amorese, as thouer; but, according to Fürst, signifies a cliff, from יָדָּג to incise. See Gudgodah.

Hor'zi (Heb. Chôri, כּוּרִי or כּוּרָי, prob. a "troglo- dyte," or dweller in a cave, כּוּרֶה, otherwise an auger; Sept. Χορίας, Οίδας, and Χορίας; Vulg. Hori and Hurri), the name of two men.

1. A son of Lotan and grandson of Seir, of the abo- riginal inhabitants of Idumea (Gen. xxxvi, 12; 1 Chron. i, 39). B.C. cir. 1664.

2. The son of Japhet, which latter was the commissioner of the tribe of Simeon sent by Moses to explore the land of Canaan (Num. xiii, 3). B.C. ante 1657.

3. (Gen. xxxvi, 30.) See Horite.

Hör'tim (Deut. ii, 12, 22). See Horite.

Hôr'ite (Heb. Chôri, כּוּרִי, כּוּרֶה, prop. the same word as Hor; but, according to Fürst, noble; often with the art. הָוָרִי, a designation (both singly and collectively) of the people who anciently inhabited Mount Seir, before their supersede by the Edomites; rendered "Horites" in Gen. xiv, 6 (Sept. Χορίων, Vulg. Chóri, "Horreúrum"); see Hōri, Horrēâ, Horāreâ, Horreus; Deut. i, 12 (Χορίων, Χορράτους, and "Hori," Gen. xxxvi, 13 (Χορίων, Χορράτους), "Horrea"). Deut. ii, 12 (Χορίων, Χορράτους, and "Hori," Gen. xxxvi, 13 (Χορίων, Χορράτους), "Horrea"). See IDUMEA. There are indications of Canaanitish affinity between the Horites and the Hittites or Hivites (Michaelis, Speichert, p. 169, and De Troglodytis Seir, in his Syntagma Comment. 1759, p. 194; Faber, Arch. e. p. 41; Hamelveld, iii, 29; but see contra Bertheau, Gesch. der Iser. p. 150). See Hittite. Their excavated dwellings are still found by hundreds in the same mountainous and desert tracts and especially in Petra. See Edom and Edomite. It may, perhaps, be to the Horites Job refers in xxx, 6, 7. They are only three times mentioned in Scripture: first, when they were smitten by the kings of the East (Gen. xiv, 6); then when their genealogy is given in Gen. xxxvi, 20-30, and 1 Chron. i, 38-42; and, lastly, when they were exterminated by the Edomites (Deut. ii, 12, 22). It appears probable that they were not Canaanites, but an earlier race, who inhabited Mount Seir before the pos- session of Canaan took possession of Palestine (Ewald, Geschichte, i, 304, 4 B) (Smith). Knobel (Volkerdeut d. Genesis, p. 195, 306) holds that they formed part of the great race of the Ludim, to which also the Rephaim, the Emins, and the Amorites belonged (comp. Hitzig, Gesch. d. V. Israel, Lpz. 1869, i, 29-36). In this case the Amo- rites were of Semitic descent. According to the ac- count in Gen. xxxvi, 20 sqq., they were divided into seven tribes. See CANAAN.

Hôr'mah (Heb. Chôrmak, כּוּרָמְק, devoted city, otherwise peak of a hill; Sept. Εὐαράμ and άνώσυμα, a royal city of the Canaanites in the south of Palestine (Josh. xi, 14; 1 Sam. xxx, 80), near which the Israelites experienced a discomfiture from the Amalekites resident there, as they perversely attempted to enter Canaan by that route after the divine sentence of wandering (Num. xiv, 4, 33; 2 Sam. ix, 1, 3); Deut. i, 44). Joshua afterwards besieged its king (Josh. xv, 30), and on its capture assigned the city to the tribe of Judah, but finally it was included in the territory given to Simeon (Josh. xix. 4; Judg. i. 17; 1 Chron. iv. 30). It is elsewhere mentioned only in 1 Chron. iv. 30. It was originally called Zephath (Judg. i. 17), under which name it appears to have been again rebuilt and occupied by the Canaanites (see Berthelot, ad loc.; Hengstenberg, Pontif. ii, 220); whereas the name Hornah was given by the Laterites in token of its demolition (see Numb. xxxii. 3). Hence traces of the older name alone remain. See Zephath.

Hornah, Simon, with the surname Bavarius, was prior in the monastery of Altenmünster St. Salvador, in Bavaria, and later general of the order. He died in 1701. His works are Breviarium una cum Missali Monasticum of Berne and are in other codices celebres S. Vri- gitus, ordinis S. Salveatoris Fundatricis (Munich, 1680, fol.).—Pierer, Unie.-Lex., viii. 537.

Hormisda, pope, born at Frosinone, near Rome, was elected bishop of Rome in 514, as successor of Symmachus. In 515, by invitation of the Eastern emperor Anastasius, he sent an embassy to a council held at Heraclea for the purpose of settling the point of disunion between the Oriental and Occidental churches; but as this council, as well as a second one held in 517, did not bring about any favorable results, Anastasius, wearied by Hormisda's refusal to make any concessions, broke off all relations with Rome. After his death in 518, his successor Justinus II made another attempt at reconciliation, and the union of that church with Rome was finally restored in 519, after a schism of thirty-five years. Hormisda's conduct was much more measured in the controversy concerning Faustus of Rhegium, of whom he said that, though his writings may not deserve a place with those of the fathers, yet that such parts of them were to be received as did not conflict with the teachings of the Church. He died Aug. 6, 523. Eighty letters of Hormisdas are preserved in Labbe.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop., vol. vi.; Labbe, Concilia, iv, 1415; Man- man, Lat. Horn (גֶּרֶם, ke'em, identical in root and signification with the Latin cornu and Eng. horn). Gr. κέρας is used in Scripture with a great latitude of meaning.

1. Literally (Josh. vi. 4, 5; compare Exod. xiii, 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 13, 13; 1 Kings i, 39; Job xii. 14).—Two purposes are mentioned in the Scriptures to which the horn seems to have been applied. As horns are hollow and easily polished, they have in ancient times been used for drinking-vessels and for military purposes. They were especially convenient for holding liquids (1 Sam. xvi. 13, 13; 1 Kings i, 39) and were even made instruments of music (Josh. vi. 5).

2. Trumpets were probably at first merely horns perforated at the tip, such as are still used upon mountain-farms for calling home the laborers at meal-time. If the A. V. of Josh. vi. 4, 5 ("rams' horns") be correct, this would settle the question [see Ram's Horn]; but the fact seems to be that הָרִים has nothing to do with rams, and that הָרִים, horns, serves to indicate an instrument which originally was made of horn, though afterwards, no doubt, constructed of different materials (comp. Varro, L. l. v. 24, 35; "cornus quod ex qua nunc sunt ex are tunc fiant e cornu hulcui"). See fig. The hand which were thus made into trumpets were probably those of oxen rather than of rams; the latter would scarcely produce a note sufficiently imposing to suggest its association with the fall of Jericho. See Trumpet.

3. The word Horn (גַּלְתָּן, qalṭān) was also applied to a flask, or vessel, made of horn, containing oil (1 Sam. xvi. 13, 13; 1 Kings i, 39), or used as a kind of toilet-bottle, filled with the preparation of antimony with which women tinged their eyelashes (Keren-huppach = paiš-horn, name of one of Job's daughters, Job xlii. 14). So in English drinking-horn (commonly called a horn). In the same way the Greek κέρας sometimes signifies bugle, trumpet, (Xenoph. An. ii. 2, 4), and sometimes drinking-horn (vii, 7, 29). So also in the Latin it means trumpet and also oil-cup (Horace, Sat. ii. 2, 61, and fusel (Virg., Georg. iii. 509). See also INX-HORN.

II. Metaphorically.—These uses of the word are often based upon some literal object like a horn, and at other times they are purely figurative.

1. From similarity of Form.—To this use belongs the metaphorical application of the word horn to the trumpet of metal, as already mentioned. Horns of ivory, that is, elephants' teeth, are mentioned in Ezek. xxvii. 15, either metaphorically, from similarity of form, or, as seems more probable, from a vulgar error. See Ivory. But more specific are the following metaphors:

(a) The altar of burnt-offerings (Exod. xxvii. 2) and the altar of incense (Exod. xxx. 2) had each at the four corners four horns of shittim-wood, the first being overlaid with brass, the second with gold (Exod. xxxvii. 25; xxxviii. 2; Jer. xviii. 1; Amos iii. 14). Upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offerings was to be heaped the fat of the peace-offering, the fat of the sin-bloot (Exod. xxii. 13; Lev. iv. 7-18; viii. 15; ix. 9; xvi. 18; Ezek. xlii. 20). By laying hold of these horns of the altar of burnt-offering the criminal found an asylum and safety (1 Kings i, 50; li. 28), but only when the crime was accidental (Exod. xxvi. 14). These horns are said to have served as a means for binding the animal destined for sacrifice (Psa. cxviii. 27), but this use Winer (Handwörterb.) denies, asserting that they did not and could not answer for such a purpose. These altar-horns are, of course, not to be supposed to have been made of horn, but to have been mere indications from the four living creatures (Exod. xxxiv. 26; 2 Macc. ii. 17). See also LAMB-HORN.

(2) The peak or summit of a hill was called a horn (Isa. v. 1, where hill = horn in Heb.; comp. κέρας, Xenoph. An. v. 6, 7, and cornis, Stat. Theb. v. 532; Arab. "Kurbin Hattin," Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 370; German Schreckhorn, Wetterhorn, Auerhorn; Celt. caern). In Isa. v. 1, the emblematic vineyard is described as being literally "in a horn the son of oil," meaning, as given in the English Bible, "a very fruitful hill"—a strong place like a hill, yet combining with its strength peculiar fruitfulness.

Isa. vi. 3 (he had horns coming out of his hand) the context implies rays of light (comp. Deut. xxiii. 2).

The denominative הַרְעָה = to emit rays, is used of Moses' face (Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30, 35); so all the versions except Aquila and the Vulgate, which have the translations εκπορέων ἤ, cornuta erat. This curious idea has not only been perpetuated by paintings, coins, and statues (Zornius, Biblioth. Antiq. i, 121), but has at least passed muster with Grotius (Adnot. ad loc.), who cites Aben-Ezra's identification of Moses with the horned Mnevis of Egypt, and suggests that the phenomenon was intended to remind the Israelites of the golden calf! Spencer (Leg. Hebr. iii, Dia. i, 4) tries a reconciliation of renderings upon the ground that corneus = radii herc; but Spanheim (Dia. vii. 1), not content with stigmatizing the efforts of art in this direction as "preposterous industria," distinctly attributes to Jerome a belief in the veritable horns of Moses. See NIMBUS.

2. From similarity of Position and Use.—Two principal applications of this idea. The first of these was thus made into a horn of strength and honor. Of strength the horn of the unicorn [see Unicorn] was the most frequent representative (Deut. xxxii. 17, etc.), but not always; comp. 1 Kings xxii. 11, where probably horns of iron, worn defiantly and symbolically on the head, are intended. Expressive of the same idea, or perhaps merely a decoration, is the Oriental military ornament mentioned by Taylor (Calmet's HORN

Hair of South Africans ornamented with Buffalo-horns. (Livingstone.)

Frag. cxiv), and the conical cap observed by Dr. Livingstone among the natives of S. Africa, and not improbably suggested by the horn of the rhinoceros, so abundant in that country (see Livingstone’s Travels, p. 365, 490, 557; comp. Taylor, L. c.). Among the Druses upon Mount Lebanon the married women wear silver horns on their heads. The spiral coils of gold wire projecting on either side from the female head-dress of some of the Dutch provinces are evidently an ornament borrowed from the same original idea. But it is quite uncertain whether such dresses were known among the covenant people, nor do the figurative allusions in Scripture to horns render it in the least degree necessary to suppose that reference was made to personal ornaments of that description. (See below.)

Heads of modern Asiatists ornamented with Horns.

In the sense of honor, the word horn stands for the abstract (my horn, Job xvi, 2; all the horns of Israel, Lam. ii, 9), and so for the supreme authority (comp. the story of Cipperus, Ovid, Met. xvi, 56b; and the horn of the Indian sacheem mentioned in Clarkson’s Life of Pem). Perhaps such a idea may be denoted by the horned conical cap peculiar to the regal apparel on the Ninevite sculptures. It also stands for concretè, whence it comes to mean king, kingdom (Dan. viii, 2, etc.; Zech. i, 18; compare Tarquin’s dream in Accius, ap. Cicero, Div. i, 22); hence, on coins, Horned Cap of the Assyrian Kings.

Alexander and the Seleucidæ wear horns (see cut in vol. i, p. 140), and the former is called in Arab. two-horned (Kor. xviii, 85 sq.), not without reference to Dan. viii. See GOAT.

Of either or both of these last two metaphors sprang the idea of representing gods with horns. Spanheim has discovered such figures on the Roman denarii, and on numerous Egyptian coins of the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines (Dias, v, 358). The Bacchus Ταύροκτονος, or corinus, is mentioned by Euri- pides (Bacch. 100), and among other pagan absurdities Arnoldus enumerates “Dii corum” (“c. Cret. VI). In like manner river-gods are represented with horns (“tauriformis Aublins,” Hor. Od. iv, 14, 25; ταυρόφωνον ήμα Κυρασο., Eurip. Ion, 1261). For various opinions on the ground-thought of this metaphor, see Notes and Queries, i, 419, 456. Manx legends speak of a (tarroo-ushkey), i.e. water-bull (see Creggan’s Manx Diet.). (See Bochart, Hieros, ii, 298; and, for an admirable compendium, with references, Zornius, Bibliotheca Antiquaria, ii, 106 sq.).

(1.) Symbolical.—As horns are the chief source of attack and defence with the animals to which God has given them, they serve in Scripture as symbols of power, dominion, glory, and fierceness (Dan. viii, 5, 9; 1 Sam. xvi, 11, 13; 1 Kings i, 39; Josh. vii, 4, 5; 1 Sam. ii, 1; Psa. lxxv, 5, 10; cxxxii, 17; Luke i, 69; Deut. xxxii, 17; Lam. ii, 3; Mic. iv, 13; Jer. xlviii, 25; Ezek. xxxix, 21; Amos vi, 18). In 1 Kings xxii, 11, we find a striking display of the metaphorical action on the part of the false prophet Zedekiah. He made him horns of iron, and said, “Thus saith Jehovah, With these thou shalt push the Syrians, until thou hast consumed them.” Hence, to delite the horn in the dust (Job xvi, 2) is to lower and degrade one’s self, and, on the contrary, to lift up to exalt the horn (Psa. lxxv, 4; lxxxix, 17; cxlviii, 14), is poetiically to raise one’s self to eminent honor or prosperity, to bear one’s self proudly (comp. also 1 Chron. xxv, 5). Something like this is found in the classic authors (see Horace, Carm. iii, 21, 18). The expression “horn of salvation,” which Christ is called (Luke i), is equivalent to a salvation of strength, or a Saviour, who is pomester of the might requisite for the work (see Brittington, De cornu salutis, Heid, 1748).

Horns were also the symbol of royal dignity and power; and when they are distinguished by number, they signify some monarchie or empires. Thus the monarchy of Cipperus is inscribed in J6r. xlviii, 25. In Zech. i, 18, etc., the four horns are the four great monarchies, which had each of them subdued the Jews. The ten horns, says Daniel, vii, 24, are ten kings. The ten horns, spoken of in Rev. xiii, 1 as having ten crowns upon them, no doubt signify the same thing, for so we have it interpreted in xxi, 12. The king of Persia is described by Ammianus Marcellinus as bearing golden rams’ horns by way of diadem (69, 1). The ephcy of Ptolemæy with a ram’s horn, as exhibited in ancient sculpture, is mentioned by Spanheim, Disc. de Numism. Hence also the kings of Media and Persia are depicted by Daniel (viii, 20) under the figure of a horned ram. See RAM.

When it is said, in Dan. viii, 9, that out of one of the four notable horns came forth a little horn, we are to understand that out of one of the four kingdoms represented by the four horns arose another kingdom, “which became exceeding great.” This is doubtless Antiocæus Epiphanes; others refer it to one of the first Cæsars; and others refer it to the Turkish empire, and will have Egypt, Asia, and Greece to be the three horns torn up or reduced by the Turk. See LITTLE HORN.

(2.) Ornamental.—In the East, at present, horns are used as an ornament for the head, and as a toke; of eminent rank (Rosenmuller, Mgr. iv, 85). The women among the Druses on Mount Lebanon wear on their heads silver horns of native make, “which are the distinguishing badge of witchhood” (Borrowing’s Report on Syria, p. 8). These tareours have grown, like other horns, from small beginnings to their present enormous size by slow degrees, and pride is the soil that nourished them. At first, they consisted merely of an apparatus designed to finish off the headress so as to raise the veil a little from the face. Specimens of this primitive kind are still found in remote and semi-civilized districts. I have seen them only a few inches long, made of pasteboard, and even of common pottery. By degrees th\nmore fashionable ladies used tin, and lengthened them; then rivalry made them of silver, and still further prolonged and ornamented them; until finally the princesses of Lebanon and Hermon sported gold horns, decorated with jewels, and so long that a servant had spread the veil over them. But the day for these most preposterous appendages to the female head is about over. After the wars between the Maronites and Druses in 1841 and 1845, the Maronite clergy thundered their excommunications against them, and very few Chur-can ladies now wear them. Many expatriated Druses and ladies have cast them off, and the probability is that in a few years travellers will seek in vain for a horned lady” (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 101). See Head-Dress.

Horn, John, or, more properly, John Roh (Cornu or Kounx being a translation of the surname, which he assumed according to the usage of the times), was a distinguished bishop of the Ancient Units Fratrum, or Church of the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren. He was born at Yaus, in Bohemia, near the close of the 15th century. In 1518 he was ordained to the priested theology, and in 1529 consecrated bishop by a synod assembled at Brandis, on the Adler. Three years later (1532) he became senior bishop and president of the Ecclesiastical Council, which position he held until his death, governing the Units Fratrum with great wisdom and firmness in its internal discipline. Supported by John Augusta (q. v.), he inaugurated a new policy, which brought the Church out of its partial obcurity, and made it thereafter an important element in the national history of Bohemia. His immediate predecessor, Martin Skoda, had strictly abstained from all intercourse with the Reformers, following the principles established by Luke of Prague (q. v.). Horn, who had been twice a delegate to Luther (1522 and 1524), and who entertained a high regard for him and his work, reopened a correspondence with him, and induced the publication of a new Confession of the Brethren's faith at Wittenberg, with a commendatory preface of his own (1533). This led to a still closer fellowship, Horn sending two deputations to Luther in 1536, a third in the following year, and a fourth in 1542. In 1538 Luther published another and the principal Confession of the Church, again with a preface from Horn's pen. This Confession had been drawn up in 1535, and formally pre-septed to the emperor Ferdinand at Vienna (November 14) by several barons and divines in the name of the Units Fratrum. Encouraged by his intercourse with Luther, Horn also sent an embassy to the Swiss Reformers in 1540, which resulted in a friendly meeting with Bucer, Calvin, and others. Thus the Brethren joined hands with the Reformers in carrying on the great work of evangelical truth, and gave the earliest tokens of those efforts to bring about a union among all Protestants which afterwards resulted in the Consensus Succumontensis of the Polish churches. The most important literary production of bishop Horn was the authorized died Jan. 17, 1792. In his early youth he imbibed the doctrines of John Hutchinson (q. v.), and defended them in an Apology (1766), which is given in vol. vi of his collected Works. He was considered the best preacher and teacher of his time, a sincere and Christian, and a thorough scholar. Many of his writings were controversial tracts, arising out of the Hutchinsonian theory, and the quarrels which it provoked. His more important and durable works are, Commentary on the Pauline (1769, 2 vols. 4to, often reprinted)—Discourses on several Subjects and Occasions (1780, 4 vols. 8vo). These, with his other writings, are collected in The Works of Bishop Horn, with his Life, by William Jones, of Nailand (London, 1786, 6 vols. 8vo).

Horne, John, a Nonconformist divine, born in 1615, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He became successively vicar of Allhallows, Lynn, Regis, and finally Norfolk in 1647. He was ejected for nonconformity in 1662, and died in 1676. "He was a learned man, of most exemplary and primitive piety, very ready in the Scriptures, skilled in the Oriental languages, and an Arminian in doctrine." Shortly before his ejection he published The open Door for Man's Approach to God, or a Vindication of the Righteousness of God concerning the Extent of the Christ. His other principal works are, The Brazen Serpent, or God's grand Design—on John iii, 14, 15 (Lond. 1673, 4to):—The best Exercis for Christians in the worst of Times, in Order to their Security against Profaneness and Apostasy — on Jude xx, 21 (Lond. 1671, sm. 8vo), etc.—Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographicon, i, 1543; Stoughton (John), Eccles. Hist. of England (Lond. 1870, 2 vols. 8vo), ii, 407 sq.

Horne, Melville, a Wesleyan minister, born in England in the latter part of the last century, was originally a lay preacher of the Wesleyan societies, but by the advice of his brethren he took orders in the Church of England, and went as missionary to Sierra Leone.
On his return he was made vicar of Olney, later at Macclefield, and finally went to West Thurrock, Essex. He died in the early part of the present century. Horne is known especially by his Letters on Missions, addressed to the Protestant Ministers of the British Churches (1794, 8vo; reprinted at Boston, 1835), which are generally believed, "prompted the first counsels that led to the son's Hist. of Lond. Miss. Soc., i, 13–15; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, ii, 295 sq.). He published also several of his sermons (1811), an appendix (1842), and an Extensive Definition of Justifying Faith (1809, 12mo).

Biblical scholar, born October 29, 1786, was educated at HORNECK

Horneck, Anthony, D.D., an English divine, was born at Bacchacron, in the Lower Palatinate, in 1641. He first studied at the University of Cambridge; but the death of his father, who went to England, and entered Queen's College, Oxford, at the age of nineteen. Two years after he became tutor to lord Torrington, who gave him the living of Doulton, in Devonshire, and procured him a prebend in the church of Exeter. In 1671 he was chosen preacher at the Savoy, upon which he resigned his living in Devonshire. Admiral Russell, afterwards earl of Orford, recommended him to the queen for preferment, and, by the advice of Dr. Tillotson, then archbishop, he was presented to the prebendary of Westminster in 1693. He died Jan. 31, 1697. He was a good linguist, a learned divine, an excellent preacher, and a faithful pastor. His church was so crowded that it was often difficult for him to reach the pulpit. In the reign of James II, when it became clear that there was danger of a revival of popery, he spared no pains in resisting the movement. His zeal for the promotion of practical religion was incessant; and, among other means, he made use of the so-called Religious Societies of which he was one of the usual preliminaries. Subsequently St. John's College, Cambridge, conferred on him the degree of B.D., and two American colleges that of D.D. In 1824 he found employment in the library of the British Museum as assistant in the department of printed books. In 1830 archbishop Trench promoted him to the see of St. Edmund and St. Nicholas, London, which positions he held until his death, Jan. 27, 1862. Horne was for some years actively engaged in the work of Methodism, numbering among his friends Dr. Adam Clarke and Dr. Bunting. He entered the ministry of the Church of England in deference to the earnest desire of his father, with the hope of securing leisure for literary pursuits, but he always maintained a hearty interest in the Church of his early choice, and preserved to the end of his life that simple and earnest godliness which Methodism had taught him to prize in everyone. He was a man of considerableness his controversial writings alone would have given him a high status among the men of his time; and his versatility is further attested by the variety of his publications, many of which are given to subjects not usually treated of by the divinity. His researches in bibliography were conducted with amazing industry, and tabulated with great judgment and skill. But he will be best known to posterity by his Introduction to the Critical Study of the Scriptures (referred to above), which, at the time of its first appearance, was a marvel of the kind. It is a work of breadth and power, and it would be a task to enumerate its taste for critical pursuits to the reading of this work; and, though somewhat below the spirit and results of the more recent criticisms, it is yet invaluable to those whose resources will not permit the large outlay which the collection of a critical library demands. The most important of his other works are, Conpact, Introd. to the Study of the Bible, or Analysis of the Intro. to the Holy Scriptures (12mo, 1827) —Deism Refuted, or plain Reasons for being a Christian (12mo, 1819) —Romansian controversy to Scripture, or the peculiar excellence of the Church of Rome, an essay of acclimated Formularies, contrary to the Holy Scriptures (12mo, 1827) —Moral, or Facts and Evidences demonstrating the Worship of the Blessed Virgin Mary by the Church of Rome (2d ed, 1841) —The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity (12mo) —Manual of Parochial Pulpody (1820, 1829) —Manual for the Afflicted (1819, 1832), etc. A list of all the productions of Dr. Horne is given by Allibone (Dict. of Authors, i, 889-92). HORNEJUS

Hornejus (Hornejt), Konrad, a German Lutheran divine, was born in Brunswick Nov. 25, 1590. He studied theology, philosophy, and philology at Helmstedt, where he settled in 1612. Here he became professor of HORNET or WASP (Vespula rufa, Vespula affinis, Vespula vulgaris). The Heb. term appears to be indicative of stinging; and the ancient versions with the Rabbins favor the interpretation of “hornet” rather than “wasp,” as appears from the application of the above Greek and Latin words (comp. Aristot. Hist. Anim. v. 19, 617; ix. 65, 66; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xi. 24). The above passages in which the word occurs refer to some means of expulsion of the Canaanites before the Israelites. Not only were bees exceedingly numerous in Palestine, but from the ancient (Josh. xvi. 23) we learn that hornets in particular infested some parts of the country: the frequent notices of the animal in the Talmudical writers (Levysohn, Zool. § 405) lead to the same conclusion. Genesis, however, maintains that the term is not to be taken in a literal sense, but metaphorically, as a general metaphor for panic with which it inspires the inhabitants, adding the expressions “terror of God” (Gen. xxxvi. 5), “mighty destruction” (Deut. vii. 22), and the antithesis of the angel to defend them (Exod. xxii, 20, etc.), in favor of this interpretation (see Thesaur. Heb. p. 1186). Indeed, the following argument is in favor of the literal sense: (1) that the word “hornet” in Exod. xxii, 28 is parallel to “terror” in ver. 27; (2) that similar expressions are undoubtedly used metaphorically, e.g. “to chase as the bees do” (Deut. i. 44; Ps. cxviii. 12); (3) that a similar transfer from the literal to the metaphorical sense may be instance in the classical estuaris, originally a “gad-fly,” afterwards terror and madness; and, lastly (4), that no historical notice of such intervention as hornets occurs in the Bible. We may therefore regard it as expressing under a vivid image the consternation with which it would infuse the Canaanite enemies of the Israelites, as declared in Deut. ii. 25; Josh. xxi. 23. Among the moderns, Michaelis has defended the figurative sense. In addition to other reasons for it, he doubts whether the expulsion of the Canaanites could be effected by swarms of Vespula, and proposes to derive the Hebrew from a root signifying “scourges,” “plagues,” scutica, plagas, etc. (Suppl. ad Lexic. Hebr. vi. 2158); but his reasons are ably refuted by Rosenmuller, apud Bochart (Hier. Lips. 1796, iii, ch. 13, p. 402, etc.). In favor of the possibility of such an event, it is observed that Elihu relates that the Phœsætæ were actually driven from their locality by such means (Elihu vi. 26, 27; ἤτιον ἄλιαν). It is an unusual thing and, as Bochart (ibid.) has shown, these Phœsætæ were a Phœnician people (ut sup. p. 412). For a parallel case of an army being seriously molested by hornets, see Ammian. Marcell. xxiv. 8. Even Rosenmuller himself admits the figurative sense in his Scholia on Exod. xxii, 28; but he does not think that opinion, and amply refutes it. His reasonings and refutations have been adopted by numerous writers (among others, see Paxton’s Illustrations of Scripture, i. 305, etc., Edinb. 1819). Michaelis’s doubt of the abstract possibility seems very unreasonable, when the irresistible power of bees and wasps, wind and waves, is considered. It is observable that the event is represented by the author of the apocryphal book of Wisdom (xii. 8) as a merciful dispensation, by which the Almighty, he says, “spared as men the old inhabitants of his holy land,” and “gave them place for repentance.” If the hawket, considered as a ἄρπαγαν, connected with this idolatry, the visitation would convey a practical refutation of their error. Ewald (Gesch. d. V. Israel, 3d ed. Götting. 1864, i, 116 sqq.) connects the word (reading עִינוֹס תְּבִנָּה) with Manetho’s story (Josephus, Apion, i. 26) of the expulsion of the Israelites from Egypt on account of a disease. See BAALZEBAH.

The hornet (Vespa crabro) is a hymenopterous insect with six legs and four wings. It bears a general resemblance to the common wasp, but is of a darker color, and much larger. It is exceedingly fierce and voracious, especially in hot climates, but even in Western countries its sting is frequently dangerous. Roberts observes on Deut. vii. 20, “The sting of the hornet and wasp of the East is much more poisonous than in Europe, and the insect is larger in size. I have heard of several who died from having a single sting; and not many days ago, as a woman was going to a well ‘to draw water,’ a hornet stung her in the cheek, and she died the next day. The good Sir is described as having destroyed many giants by hornets.” It may be remarked, that the hornet, no less than the whole species of wasps, renders an essential service in checking the multiplication of flies and other insects, which would otherwise become intolerable to man; and that in regard to their architecture, they are extremely interesting. They do not yield to their more popular congener, the bee, but even, in several respects, greatly excel it. The hornet, in common with the other social wasps, displays great ingenuity in the manufacture of its nest. It is made of a coarse grey paper, much like the coarsest wrapping-paper, but much thicker and stronger. This is arranged in several globose leaves, one over the other, not unlike the outer leaves of a cabbage, the base of which is attached by a small footstalk to the upper part of the cavity in which it is enclosed. Within this protective case the combs are built in parallel rows of cells, exactly like those of the bee, but made of paper, and ranged horizontally. The combs are extended both vertically, and in single series, the entrances always being downwards. Each story is connected with that above it by a number of pillars of the common paper, thick and massive. These cells do not contain honey, but merely the eggs, and, in due time, the young, being in fact mere worms. The paper upon which the nest is built is formed of pieces of decayed wood or the bark of trees, the fibres of which it abrades by means of its jaws, and kneads into a paste with a viscid saliva. When a morsel as large as a pea is prepared, the insect flies to the nest and spreads out the mass in a thin layer at the spot where it is required, moulding it into shape with the jaws and feet. It is soon dry, and forms real paper, coarser than that of the common wasp. (Kirby and Spence, Introduction to Entomology, 8vo. Lond. 1828, i. 278, 274; Réamur, Histoire des Insectes, vol. vi; Mem. 6, 4to. Par. 1754-42; Wood, Bible Animals, Lond. 1800, p. 614 sqq.). See WASP.

Horologion (ἀπεικόνισις, literally a diët) is the title of one of the "office-books" of the orthodox Eastern Church. It contains the daily hours of prayer, so far as respects their immovable portions, and answers in a measure to the Officeumes Hoedómathe which is found at the opening of each volume of the breviary of the Eastern Church. But it generally contains also other formularies of that Church. See Neale, Introduct. to the Hist. of the Eastern Church, ii. 848. See HOURS.

HORSE

They will [eagerly] paw in the valley, and their prancing [feet in] vigour.

He will go forth to meet [the] weapon;
Nor will he laugh at dread; Nor will he lose his nerve.

Nor retreat from before [the] sword; Against his foe he will challenge battle, Flaming lance or dart [in vain].

With prancing and restlessness he will absorb [the] Nor can he stand still when the sound of the trumpet [is heard];

As oft as [the] trumpet [sounded], he will say, "Aha!"
For from afar he can scent [the] battle, The thunder of the captains and shouting.

So, again, the pride advances with her charms to an immediate conquest "as a company of horsemen" (or "as chariots") (Cant. i, 9); and when the prophet Zechariah wishes to convey the idea of perfect peace, he represents the horse, no more mixing in the fray as before (ix, 10), but bearing on his bell (which was intended to strike terror into the foe) the precepts inscription, "Holiness unto the Lord" (xiv, 20).

Lastly, the characteristic of the horse is not so much his speed or his utility, but his strength (Psa. xxxiii, 17; xcvii, 10), as shown in the special application of the term abir (אֲבִירָהּ), i.e. strong, as an equivalent for a horse (Jer. viii, 16; xcvii, 3, 11). Hence the horse becomes the symbol of war, or of a campaign. This is the main idea of the text; comp. Psa. xiv, 5; Deut. xxxii, 13; Psa. lxvi, 12; Is. xix, 14, where horsemanship is made typical of conquest), especially of speedy conquest (Jer. iv, 18), or rapid execution of any purpose (Rev. vi).

The Hebrews in the patriarchal age, as a pastoral race, did not stand in need of the services of the horse, and for a long period after their settlement in Canaan they dispensed with it, partly in consequence of the hilly nature of the country, which only admitted of the use of chariots in certain localities (Judg. i, 19), and partly in consequence of the prohibition in Deut. xviii, 16, which would be held to apply at all periods. Accordingly, the horses of the Hebrews were small and light, and the herdsmen and dealers at a fixed price (Josh. xi, 6, 9). David first established a force of cavalry and chariots after the defeat of Hadadezer (2 Sam. vii, 4), when he reserved a hundred chariots, and, as we may infer, all the horses; for the rendering "hounded all the chariot-horses" is manifestly incorrect. Shortly after this Absalom was possessed of some (2 Sam. xv, 1). But the great supply of horses was subsequently effected by Solomon through his connection with Egypt; he is reported to have had "40,000 stalls of horses for his chariots, and 12,000 cavalry-horses" (1 Kings iv, 26), and it is worthy of notice that these forces are mentioned parenthetically, and accounted for in the following verse (1 Kings iv, 28, forty-thousand chariot-horses and twelve thousand cavalry-horses); Ezek. xxvii, 14, "driving-horses and riding-horses; Joel ii, 4, "as riding-horses, so shall they run;" and Isa. xxi, 7, "a train of horses in couples."

The most striking feature in the Biblical notices of the horse is the exclusive application of it to warlike operations; in no instance is that useful animal employed for the purposes of ordinary locomotion or agriculture, if we except Isa. xxviii, 28, where we learn that the horse (A.V. "horsemen") were employed in threshing, not, however, in that case put in the gears, but simply driven about over the threshing-ground. This remark will be found to be borne out by the historical passages hereafter quoted, but it is equally striking in the poetical parts of Scripture. The animated description of the horse in Job xxxix, 19-25, applies solely to the warhorse. (The following are the main streams in the breeze (A.V. "thunder") which "clothes his neck with splendour, his head with darts, his back as a war-horse, his hoofs digging in the valley" with excitement; his terrible snorting—are brought before us, and his ardor for the strife. The following is a close rendering of this fine description of the war-horse:

Canst thou give to the horse prowess? Canst thou array his neck (with a prancing [mane])? Canst thou make him prance like the locust? The grandeur of his snorting is formidable.
dominions in strings, in the same manner as horses are still conducted to and from fairs: for this interpretation, as offered by Professor Paxton, appears to convey the natural and true meaning of the text; and not "strings of linen yarn," which here seem to be out of place (2 Chron. i, 16, 17; ix, 25, 28). The cavalry force was maintained by the succeeding kings, and frequent nottices occur both of riding-horses and chariots (2 Kings ix, 21, 33; xi, 16), and particularly of war-chariots (1 Kings xxii, 4; 2 Kings iii, 7; Isa. ii, 7). The force seems to have failed in the time of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii, 20) in Judah, as it had previously in Israel under Jehoshaph (2 Kings xiii, 7). Josiah took away the horses which the kings of Judah, his predecessors, had consecrated to the sun (2 Kings xxiii, 11). See SUN.
The number of horses belonging to the Jews on their return from Babylon is stated at 736 (Neh. vii, 68).

In the countries adjacent to Palestine the use of the horse was much more frequent. It was introduced into Egypt probably by the Hyksos, as it is not represented on the monuments before the 18th dynasty (Wilkinson, i, 386, abridg.). Yet these animals are not mentioned among the presents which Abraham received from Pha-rass (Gen. xii, 16), and occur first in Scripture among the valuables paid by the Egyptians to Joseph in exchange for grain (Gen. xlvi, 17). They were still sufficiently important to be expressly mentioned in the funeral procession which accompanied the body of Jacob to his sepulchre in Canaan (Gen. i, 9). At the period of the Egyptian horsemen Egypt was in Egypt (Exod. ix, 3; xiv, 9, 23; Deut. xvii, 17), and subse-sequently, as we have already seen, they were able to supply the nations of Western Asia. The Tyrians purchased these animals from Solomon, and in the time of Ezekiel imported horses themselves from Togarmah or Armenia (Ezek. xxvii, 14). The Jewish kings sought the assistance of the Egyptians against the Assyrians in this respect (Isa. xxxi, 1; xxxvi, 8; Ezek. xvii, 15).

The Canaanites were possessed of them (Deut. xx, 1; Josh. xi, 4; Judg. iv, 3; v, 22, 28), and likewise the Syrians (2 Sam. xi, 4; 1 Kings xx, 1; 2 Kings vi, 14; vii, 10)—notices which are confirmed by the pictorial representations on Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, 1, 99, 897, 401), and by the Assyrian inscriptions re-ating to Syrian expeditions. But the cavalry of the Assyrians themselves and other Eastern nations was regarded as most formidable; the horses themselves were highly bred, as the Assyrian sculptures still testify, and fully merited the praise bestowed on them by Habakkuk (i, 8), "swifter than leopards, and more fierce than the evening wolves; their riders "clothed in blue, captains and rulers, all of them desirable young men" (Ezek. xxiii, 6), armed with "the bright sword and glittering spear" (Nah. iii, 3), made a deep impression on the Jews, who, plainly clad, went on foot; as also did their regular array as they proceeded in couplets, contrasting with the disorderly troops of asses and camels which followed with the baggage (Isa. xxi, 7; rehed in this passage signifying rather a train than a single chariot).
The number employed by the Eastern potentates was very great, Holofernes possessing not less than 12,000 Judith ii, 15). At a later period we have frequent notices of the cavalry of the Græco-Syrian monarchs (1 Macc. i, 18; iii, 39, etc.).

Ancient Persian Horse.

The above notices of the use of the horse by the ancient Egyptians derives abundant illustration from their monuments. In the sculptured battle-scenes, which are believed to represent victories of Sesostris, or of Thoth-mes II and III, over nations of Central Asia, it is evident that the enemy's armies, as well as the foreign allies of Egypt, were abundantly supplied with horses, both for chariots and for riders; and in triumphal processions they are shown as present or tribute—proving that they were portions of the national wealth of conquered states sufficiently valuable to be prized in Egypt.
That the Assyrians and Babylonians were equally well supplied with this valuable animal is likewise attested by the martial scenes depicted on the sculptures discovered among the ruins of Nineveh and the vicinity.
They are represented in almost every variety of pos-tion and employment, such as the chase, and for other purposes of pleasure; but chiefly in war, for which the Assyrians used them both with the saddle and in the chariot. According to Mr. Layard (Nineveh, 1st series, i, 275 sq.), the horses of the Assyrians were well formed and of noble blood, as appears from the figures no doubt faithfully copied on the sculptures. Cavalry formed an important part of the Assyrian army. The horsemen carried the bow and spear, and wore coats of mail, high greaves, and the pointed helmet. Their horses also were covered, and even it would seem, with a kind of leather armor, from the head to the tail, to protect them from the arrows of the enemy. It consisted of several pieces fastened together by buttons or loops. Over it was thrown an ornamented saddle-cloth, or a leopard's skin, upon which the rider sat. Under the head of the horse was hung a bell (comp. Zech. xiv, 20) or a tassel. The reins appear to have been tightened round the neck of the horse by a sliding button, and then dropped as the war-

Chariot-horse of Rameses III. (From the Monuments at Iseamboul.)

Horses were engaged in fight. Between the horse's ears was an arched crest, and the different parts of the harness were richly embroidered, and ornamented with rosettes (Layard's Min. 2d ser. p. 456). See HORSEMAN.

With regard to the trappings and management of the horse among the Hebrews and adjoining nations, we have little information; the bridle (resem) was placed over the horse's nose (Isa. xxx. 26), and a bit or curb (mehel) is also noticed (2 Kings xix. 29; Psa. xxxii. 9; Prov. xxxvi. 13; Isa. xxxvii. 29; in the A. V. it is incorrectly given "bridle," with the exception of Psa. xxxii.). The harness of the Assyrian horses was profusely decorated, the bits being gilt (1 Esdr. iii. 6), and the bridles adorned with tassels; on the neck was a collar terminating in a bell, as described by Zechariah (xiv. 20). Saddles were not used until a late period; only one is represented on the Assyrian sculptures (Layard, ii. 387). The horses were not shod, and therefore hoofs as hard "as flint" (Isa. v. 28) were regarded as a great merit. The chariot-horses were covered with embroidered trappings—the "precious clothes" manufactured at Dedan (Ezek. xxvii. 20); these were fastened by straps and buckles, and to this perhaps reference is made in Prov. xxx. 31, in the term saariz, "one girded about the loins" (A. V. "greyhound"). Thus adorned, Mordecai rode in state through the streets of Shushan (Esth. vi. 9). White horses were more particularly appropriate to such occasions as being significant of victory (Rev. vi. 2; xix. 11, 14). Horses and chariots were used also in idolatrous processions, as noticed in regard to the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 11). As to kinds of harness, etc., by means of which the services of the horse were annually available by other nations, it may be well to notice that the riding bridle was long a mere slip-knot, passed round the under jaw into the mouth, thus furnishing only one rein; and that a rod was commonly added to guide the animal with more facility. The bridle, however, and the reins of chariot-horses were, at a very early age, exceedingly perfect, as the monuments of Egypt, Etruria, and Greece amply prove. Saddles were not used, the rider sitting on the bare back, or using a cloth or mat girded on the animal. The Romans, no doubt copying the Persian Cataphractae, first used padded saddles, and from the northern nations adopted stimuli or spurs. Stirrups were unknown. Avicenna first mentions the rekhib, or Arabian stirrup, perhaps the most ancient; although in the tumuli of Central Asia, Tatar, horse skeletons, bridles, and stirrup saddles have been found along with idols, which proves the tombs to be more ancient than the introduction of Islam. With regard to horse-shoeing, bishop Lowth and Bracy Clark were mistaken in believing that the Roman horse or mule shoe was fastened on without nails driven through the horned part of the hoof, as at present. A contrary conclusion may be inferred from several passages in the poets; and the figure of a horse in the Pompeii battle mosaic, shod in the same manner as is now the practice, leaves little doubt on the question. The principal use of horses anciently was for the chariot, especially in war; to this they were attached by means of a pole and yoke like oxen, a practice which continued down to the times of the Romans. (See Bible Animals, p. 248 sq.) See CHARIOT; BRIDLE.

It appears that the horse was derived from High Asia, and was not indigenous in Arabia, Syria, or Egypt (Jardine's Naturalist's Library, vol. xii.), where his congeners the zebra, quagga, and ass are still found in primitive freedom, although the horse is found in all parts of the world—free, it is true, but only as a wild descendant of a once domesticated stock. (See Schlieben, Die Pferde des Alterthums, Neuwed. 1867; Abd el-Kader, Horses of the Desert, trans. by Daumas, London, 1863.) All the great original varieties or races of horses were then known in Western Asia, and the Hebrew prophets themselves have not unfrequently distinguished the nations they had in view by means of the predominant colors of their horses, and that more correctly than commentators have surmised. Taking Bochart's application (Hieroz. i. 31 sq.) of the Hebrew names, the boy race, בּיָњָא, adom, emphatically belonged to Egypt and Arabia Felix; the white, אֶבֶן, lebamon, to the regions above the Euxine Sea, Asia Minor, and northern High Asia; the dun, or cream-colored, גּוֹמָר, sendakin, to the Medes; the spotted πικτόξ, or skewbald, HORSE-GATE

Horse-leech

Horse-leech (रघुरत्स, alakah'; Sept. ἰ βολίκα, Vulg. ranuncula, A. V. some eds. as two words, "horse leech") occurs once only, viz. Prov. xxx, 15, "The horse-leech hath two daughters, crying, Give, give." Although the Hebrew word is translated leech in nearly all the versions, there has been much doubt whether that is its proper meaning. Against the received translation has been urged that, upon an examination of the context in which it occurs, the introduction of the leech seems natural enough; and what is meant by its "two daughters," or three, as the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic versions assign to it; and that, instead of the incessant craving apparently attributed to it, the leech drops off when filled. In order to evade these difficulties it has been attempted, but in vain, to connect the passage either with the preceding or subsequent verse. It has also been attempted to give a different sense to the Hebrew word. But as it occurs nowhere besides in Scripture, and as the root from which it would seem to be derived is never used as a verb, no assistance can be obtained from the Scriptures themselves in this investigation. Recourse is therefore had to the Arabic. The following is the line of criticism pursued by the learned Bochart (Hierozoon, ed. Rosenmiller, iii, 785, etc.). The Arabic word for leech is alakah, which is derived from a verb signifying to hang or to adhere to. But the Hebrew word, alakah, he would derive from another Arabic root, aIak, which means "fate, heavy misfortune, or impending calamity;" and hence he infers that alakah properly means destiny, and particularly the necessity of dying which attaches to every man by the decree of God. He urges that it is not strange that such a word should be selected for the divine appointment, since, in Prov. xxvii, 1, offspring is attributed to time, a day—"Thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." Now the Hebrews call events the children of time. We also speak of "the womb of time." He cites Prov. xxvii, 20, as a parallel passage: "Hell (aeked) and the grave are never full." Hence he supposes that aeked and the grave are the two daughters of Alukah or Destiny; each cries "give" at the same moment—the former asks for the soul, and the latter for the body of man in death; both are insatiable, for both involve all mankind in one common ruin. He further thinks that both these are called daughters, because each of them is of the femaline sex; and the common gender; and in the 16th verse, the grave (aeked) is specified as one of the "things that are never satisfied." In further confirmation of this view, Bochart cites rabbinical writers, who state that by the word alakah, which occurs in the Chaldee paraphrase on the Psalms, the Hebrew word aIak, and destiny, in the Septuagint, and also remark that it has two daughters—Eden and Gehenna, Paradise and Hell—the former of whom never has enough of the souls of the righteous, the latter of the souls of the wicked. (See also Alb. Schultens, Comment. ad loc.)

In behalf of the received translation, it is urged that it is scarcely credible that all the ancient translators should have confounded alakah with aIakah; that it is peculiarly unlikely that this should have been the case with the Septuagint translator of the book of Proverbs, because it is believed that "this ranks next to the translation of the Septuagint of the passages on the ability of the passions to deception," and that the author of it must have been well skilled in the two languages (Horne's Introduction, ii, 43, ed. 1828). It is further pleaded that the application of Arabic analogies to Hebrew words is not decisive; and finally, that the theory proposed by Bochart is not essential to the meaning of the passage. The preceding verse the writer (not Solomon—see ver. 1) speaks of "a generation, whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw-teeth as knives to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy from among men;" and then, after the abrupt statement of the general style of the passage, especially in their proverbs, which is nowhere more vividly exemplified than in this whole chapter, the leech is introduced as an illustration of the covetousness of such persons, and of the two distinguishing vices of which it is the parent, avarice and cruelty. May not also the "two daughters of the leech, crying, Give, give," be a figurative description of the two lips of the creature (for these it has, and perfectly formed), which are a part of its very complicated mouth? It certainly is agreeable to the Hebrew style to call the offspring of inanimate things daughters, for so branches are called daughters of trees (Gen. xxv, 29). A similar use of the word is found in Eccles. xii, 4, "All the daughters of music shall be brought low," meaning the lips, front teeth, and other parts of the mouth. It is well remarked by Prof. Paxton that "this figurative application of the entire genus is sufficient to justify the interpretation. The leech, as a symbol in use among rulers of every class and in all ages, for avarice, rapine, plunder, rapacity, and even aspidity, is too well known to need illustration" (see Plautus, Epidicus. art. 2; Cicero, ad Attic.; Horace, Ars Poet. 476; Theocritus, Phaenomenum, etc.). In confirmation of this view, Prof. Stuart remarks (Comment. ad loc.), "The Arabians have the same word, and in the Cumis, their standard dictionary, it is defined by another Arabic word, viz. Ghou. This latter the Cumis again defines as meaning, (1) Calamity, (2) Foretold, (3) A demon man-eating and insatiable. The Arabic word alakah, down to microscopic leeches, has been often met with in the forests of Arabia, and they stand in great terror of it when entering a thick wood. (See Lane's Modern Egyptians, i, 344.) The Syrians had a like superstition, but, like the Hebrews, they more generally named the sprite keleb. In Iss. xxxviii, 14, this last word occurs (Auth. Version screen-owl), and it is amply and finely illustrated by Gesenius (Comment. ad loc.). In like manner, Western superstition is full of spikes, spokgbolines, elves, imps, and vampires; all, especially the last of which, are essentially insatiable, blood-sucking spectres. (See also Gesenius, Theur. Heb. p. 1908.) See Suet. Trucosis.
HORSEMAN

There is, then, little doubt that alakah denotes some species of leech, or, rather, is the generic term for any blood-sucking annelid, such as Hirudo (the medicinal leech), Hemopis (the horse-leech), Limnatis, Trocheta, and Aulacostoma, if all these genera are found in the marches and pools of the Biblical lands, the leech or blood-sucker belongs to the genus vermes, order intestinata, Linn. It is viviparous, brings forth only one offspring at a time, and the genus contains many species.

“The horse-leech” is properly a species of leech discarded for medical purposes on account of the coarseness of its life. There is no ground for the distinction of species made in the English Bible. The valuable use of the leech (Hirudo) in medicine, though undoubtedly known to Pliny and the later Roman writers, was in all probability unknown to the ancient Orientals; still they were doubly acquainted with the fact that leeches of the above-named genus would attach themselves to the skin of persons going barefoot in ponds; and they also were probably cognizant of the propensity horse-leeches (Hemopis) have of entering the mouth and nostrils of cattle, as they drink from the waters frequented by these pests, which are common enough in Palestine and Syria. The use which, from its thirst for blood, we make of the leech, being unknown to the ancient Orientals, as it is unknown in the East at the present day, it is there spoken of with feelings of horror and aversion, particularly as it causes the destruction of valuable animals by fascinately enervating their tongues when they come to drink. The lake called Birket er-Ram, the ancient Phila, about three hours from Banias, is said to be so crowded with leeches that a man can gather 6000 or even 8000 in a day, while the fountain at Banias is not infested by a single leech.

The mechanism by which the leech is enabled to gratify its greedy thirst for blood is highly curious. The throat is spacious, and capable of being exerted to a great degree. The front border of the mouth is enlarged so as to form a sort of upper lip, and this combines with the wrinkled muscular margin of the lower and lateral portions to form the sucking organs. We may even slice down the ventral margin of the sucker, exposing the whole throat. Then, the edges being folded back, we see implanted on the walls of the oral portions of the cavity three white eminences of a cartilaginous texture, which rise to a sharp crescentic edge; they form a triangular, or, rather, a triradiate figure, and by a peculiar saw-like motion so abrade the surface as to cause a flow of blood, which is greatly assisted by the contraction of the edges forming a vacuum like a cupping-glass.

Horseman (properly and usually סָתָם, בֵּית מַעֲשֵׁי, Bet'al purash', master of a horse). Our translation would make it appear that a force of cavalry accompanied Pharaoh in his pursuit—"his horsemen" (Exod. xiv. 9, etc.). It is, however, a fact not a little remarkable, that in the copious delineations of battles-scenes which occur in the monuments, and which must have been coeval with these events, in which, moreover, everything that could tend to aggrandize the power or flatten the pride of Egypt would be introduced, there never occurs any representation of Egyptian cavalry. armies are always composed of troops of infantry armed with the bow and spear, and of ranks of chariots drawn by two horses. Both Diodorus and Herodotus attribute cavalry to the early Pharaohs; and some eminent antiquarians, as Sir Gardiner Wilkinson, endeavor to account for the absence of such a force in the pictorial representations consistently with its existence. But professor Hengstenberg has maintained, and not without some degree of probability, that the word "horsemen" of the above passage should rather be rendered "chariot-riders." We quote his words: "It is accordingly certain that the cavalry, in the more ancient period of the Pharaohs, was but little relied on. The question now is, what relation the declarations of the passage before us bear to this result. Were the common view, according to which riding on horse is superadded with equal prominence to the chariot of war, in our passage, the right one, there might arise strong suspicion against the credibility of the narrative. But a more accurate examination shows that the author does not mention Egyptian cavalry at all; that, according to him, the Egyptian army is composed only of chariots of war, and that he therefore agrees in a wonderful manner with the native Egyptian monuments. And this agreement is the more minute, since the second division of the army represented upon them, the infantry, could not, in the circumstances of our narrative, take part in the pursuit. The first and principal passage concerning the constituent parts of the Egyptian army which pursued the Israelites is that in Exod. xiv. 6, 7: 'And he made ready his chariot, and took his people with him; and he took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and chariots-warriors upon all of them.' Here Pharaoh's preparation for war is fully described. It consists, first, of chariots, and, secondly, of chariot-warriors. Cavalry are no more mentioned than infantry. This passage, which is so plain, explains the second one (ver. 9), where the arrival of this same army in sight of the Israelites is plainly and graphically described, in order to place distinctly before the reader the impression which the view made upon the Israelites: 'And the Egyptians followed them and overtook them, where they were encompassed by the sea, all the chariot-horses of Pharaoh, and his riders, and his host.' (Egypt and Moses, ch. iv). See CHARIOT.

In the same connection we may remark that, although the Egyptian warriors usually rode two in a chariot only, yet it appears, from the use of the peculiar term שֵׁלָשׁ, shalish (lit. third, A. V. "captain"), applied to

HORSLEY, SAMUEL, one of the most distinguished divines ever produced by the Church of England, was born in London, October, 1738. He was the son of the Reverend John Horsley (whose father was originally a Nonconformist), for many years the clerk in orders at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and who held two rectories, Thorley in Hertfordshire, and Newington Butts in Surrey. Samuel Horsley was educated at Westminster School and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and had the rectory of Newington, which his father resigned to him soon after he had taken orders in 1759. His more public career may be said to have commenced in 1767, when he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, of which body he became secretary in 1773. His earliest publications were tracts on scientific subjects, but in 1776 he projected a complete and uniform edition of the philosophical works of Sir Isaac Newton. This design was not accomplished till 1785, when the fifth and last of the five quarto volumes made its appearance. In the earlier years of his public life he found patrons in the earl of Aylesford, and in Lowth, bishop of London; but we pass over the presentations to his various livings, and the dispensations which the number of his minor preferments rendered necessary. In 1781 he was appointed archdeacon of St. Albans. It was a little before the date last named that he first appeared in the field of theological controversy, in which, from the great extent of his knowledge and from the vigor of his intellect, he soon showed himself a very powerful combatant. His attacks were chiefly directed against Dr. Joseph Priestley, who in a series of publications defended with great subtlety and skill the doctrines of philosophical necessity, materialism, and Unitarianism. Dr. Horsley began his attack in 1778 on the question of Man's Free Agency; it was continued in a Charge delivered in 1780 to the clergy of his archdeaconry, in which he animadverted on many parts of Dr. Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity. This charge produced a reply from Dr. Priestley, which led to a rejoinder from Dr. Horsley in Seventeen Letters to Dr. Priestley, a masterly defence of the orthodox faith, and the secure foundation of a lasting theological reputation. These writings are believed to have stopped the progress, for that age, of Socinianism in England. The tide of preferment now began to flow in upon him. Thorlow, who was the first councillor, presented him with a prebendal stall in the church of Gloucester, observing, as it is said, that "those who defended the Church ought to be supported by the Church;" and in 1788 he was made bishop of St. David's. In Parliament he distinguished himself by the hearty support which he gave to the measures of Pitt's administration. His political conduct gained him the favor of the court: in 1738 he was translated to Rochester, and in 1802 to St. Asaph. He died October 4, 1806. Dr. Horsley has been, not inaptly, described as the last of the race of episcopal giants of the Warburtonian school. He was a man of an original and powerful mind, of very extensive learning, and profoundly versed in the subject of ecclesiastical history, of which he gave ample evidence in his controversy with Dr. Priestley, while archdeacon of St. Albans. Even Gibbon says, "His speech pierced the Socinian's shield." His sermons and critical disquisitions frequently display a rich fund of theological acumen, and of successful illustration of the sacred writings. Besides the works named above, his theological writings include Critical Disquisitions on Isaiah xxii (Lond. 1799, 4to); — The Book of Paulus, translated, with Notes (3d edit. London, 1823, 8vo); — Hoen, translated with Notes (2d edit. Lond. 1804) — Biblical Criticism on the O. Test. (2d edit. Lond. 1844, 2 vols. 8vo); — Sermons on the Reversion (5d edit. Lond. 1822, 8vo); all which, with his tracts in the Priestley controversy, are to be found in his Collected Works (Lond. 1845, 6 vols. 8vo). HORSTIUS, JACOB MERLO, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born towards the close of the 16th century at Horst, Holland (whence his name). He was priest at the Lyskirchen in Cologne, where he died in 1644. Horstius is the author of several acetical works. He wrote Eucharistic effecti divini: Paradisi animae Christianae (transl. into French by Nicolaus Fontaine, under the title Heures Chretiennes, taries de l' Ecriture et des saintes Pères); Septem tuba oris Christianorum (a compilation from the writings of the fathers, and intended for young Roman Catholic priests). He also edited a commentary of Estius on the Postile Letters; the works of St. Bernard (2 vols); and of Thomas a Kempis. — Wetter Hort, Josiah, an Anglican prelate, was born towards the close of the 17th century, and educated at a Dissenting school together with Dr. Isaac Watts. In 1693 he became chaplain to John Hampden, Esq., M.P., and afterwards settled as Dissenting minister at Marshfield. About 1708 he conferred, and became a minister of the Church of England. He now rose quickly to distinguished positions in the Church. In 1721 he was consecrated bishop of Ferns and Leighlin in Ireland, translated in 1722 to Kilmore and Ardagh, and was advanced to the archbishopric of Tuam in 1742, with the united bishopric of Enaghdoon, and with permission to hold also his former bishopric of Ardagh. He died Dec. 14, 1751. Bishop Hort published, besides, several collections of Sermons (1708-9, 1738, 1757); — Instructions to the Clergy of Tuam (1742, 1768, 1769); also in Clergyman's Instructor). See Hook, Eccl. Biog. vi, 184 sq.; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 895.

Hortig, Karl Anton, a distinguished German Roman Catholic (also known by the name given him by his order, Johann Nepomuck), was born at Pleistein, Bavaria, in 1774, and was educated at the University of Ingolstadt. He entered the order of the Benedictines in 1794, and in 1799 became chaplain of a nunnery at Nonnberg. In 1802 he was appointed professor of logic and metaphysics at the school of the Andechs Cloister, and promoted, after filling various minor positions, to a professorship in theology at Landshut in 1821. In 1829 he removed with the university to Munich, where he received many honors, and died Feb. 27, 1847. His theological works are, Predigten f. alle Festtage (Landshut, 1821; 3d ed. 1832); — Predigten u. d. sonntgigen Evangel. (ibid. 1827; 2d ed. 1832); — Homil. d. christl. Kirchenlehre. Horton, Thomas, D.D., an English divine, was born at London, and was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1637 he was university preacher, and in July of this year he was chosen master of Queen's College, Cambridge, and minister of St. Mary Colechurch, London. In 1641 he became professor of divinity at Gresham College, and in 1647 preacher of Gray's Inn, and vice-chancellor of Cambridge in 1650. He was ejected for nonconformity in 1662, but he was restored in 1667, confirmed, and elected vicar of St. Helen's, London, in 1666. He died in 1673. He was a pious and learned man, especially skilled in the Oriental languages. Of his works, which are very scarce, the principal are Sermons (Psa. Ixxxvii, 4-6, 7, 21, etc.); and a Register unfolded (1785, 1787; 1794). — Forty-six Sermons on the Eighth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (Lond. 1764, fol.); — Choice and practical Expositions on four select Psalms (iv, xiii, lix, lixii) (London, 1675, fol.). — One hundred select Sermons upon several Texts; fifty upon the Old Testament and fifty on the New: left perfected in the press under his own hands (Lond. 1679, fol.). — Stoughton (John), Eccles. Horus (Haroep), the Egyptian god of the sun, generally written in hieroglyphics by the sparrow-hawk, and represented with a bird's beak. A bird's derivation from the Hebrew aur, light, is now recognised as incorrect. As an Egyptian divinity he is mentioned generally as the son of Isis and Osiris, and brother of Sobastis, the Egyptian Diana. Various esoteric explanations have been given of him, e.g. that he represents the Nile, as Typhon the desert, the fruitful air or that which revives the earth, the moon, the sun in reference to the changes of the year, or the god who presided over the course of the sun. He also represented three planets—Jupiter (Hararpeht), Saturn (Harka), and Mars (Harshehr). The sparrow-hawk was sacred to him; so were lions, which were placed at the side of his throne. There was a festival to celebrate his eyes on the 50th Epiph. when the sun and moon, which they represented, were on the same right line with the earth. A movable feast, that of his coronation, is supposed to have been selected for the coronations of the kings of Egypt, who are described as sitting upon his throne. When adults, he is generally represented hawk-headed; as a child, he is often carried in his mother's arms, wearing the pectoral or saem, and seated on a lotus-flower with his finger on his lips. He had an especial local worship at Edfu or Hut, the ancient Apollonius Magna, where he was identified with Ra, or the Sun. There were also books of Horus and Isis, probably referring to his legend (Lucian, De Somn. eis ep. 1. 183). The magnet was called his bone; he was of fair complexion (Chambers, Cyclop. v, 430 sq.). He was also worshipped very extensively in Greece, and later at Rome, in a somewhat modified form. In Grecian mythology he was compared with Apollo, and identified with Harpocrates, the last son of Di. (De Is. et Os. 19). See Horapollo. They were both represented as youths, and with the same attributes and symbols (Artem. Oneir. ii, 36; Macrobius, Sat. i, 28; Forpbyry ap. Euseb. Prap. Evang. v, 10; Iamblichus, De Myst. Pyth. 1). In the period of the worship of this god at Rome, he was regarded as the god of quiet life and silence (Varro, De L. L. iv, 17, Bbp.; Ovid, Met. iv, 619; Ausonius, Epist. ad Paul. xxv, 27), which was due, no doubt, to the belief that he was born

A finely-executed bronze figure of Har-Osen, son of Osiris and Atum, and Horus, is frequently called the elder Hor. At Ombo he is styled "Resident in the eyes of light; Lord of Ombo, the great God, Lord of the Heavens, Lord of Esel, Phile" etc., and is evidently connected with the Sun. From Memphis. Hortwitz, a Jewish family, several members of which have become distinguished as writers. The most renowned are:

1. Hortwitz (Sabbatai-Scheffer), Ha-Levi Ben-Akiba, head of the synagogue of Prague at the beginning of the 16th century. He wrote הלקנש (Kenez, 1739, 4to), or Commentary on Sam. Galicho's סנהדרין (Prague,1616, 4to), a dialogue expounding the Cabalistic doctrine of the soul: הלקנש (Zolkiew, 1780, 4to), a Cabalistic work di vided into two parts, making a key to the Jezirah, Zohar, and otherCabalistick books.

2. Horwitz, Abraham, son of the preceding, and known also under the name of Isaiah Horwitz, was born at Prague in the first half of the 16th century. He wrote the following Hebrew works: שָׁפָט הַמֶּמְלָכִים, On Repentance and Confession (Cracow, 1602, and often): בְּסֶפֶר הַמֶּמְלָכִים, a complete commentary on Maimonides's intro. to the book Aboth of the Talmud (Cracow 1577, and often): מִשְׁפָּטִים (Prague, 1615, 4to), containing moral instructions, especially intended for his own children: מִשְׁפָּטִים (Amst. 1575, 4to), containing remarks on the blessings of the Jews and their origin.

3. Horwitz, Isaiah, son of the foregoing, born at Prague about 1550, became the most distinguished of this family. He was Rabbi first at Frankfort, then at Posen, at Cracow, and at Prague. In 1622 he went to Jerusalem. Poverty induced him to leave that city, and he retired to Tiberias, where he died in 1629. He wrote רַבִּי צְבָאָה מִפְּיו (Amst. 1649, fol.; sev-ter times reprinted), a work which enjoys great reputation among the Cabalists. It is divided into two parts: the first treat of the existence of God, the law, the privileges of the people of Israel, the attributes of God, the sanctuary, judgment, free agency, the Messiah, worship, ceremonies, and feasts. The second part contains ten articles on six hundred and thirteen precepts, the oral law, etc. These judgments, however, are explained, on by Epstein (Amst. 1688, 4to; several editions); the sect by Zoref Has-Lev (Crakow, 1682, 4to); and the third by Cettling Ben-Jechia (Ven. 1705, 8vo): מִשְׁפָּטִים (Cracow, 1697, 4to), and Commentary on the "book of Mordecai," was at first published only in part with the Seder Moked, then separately (Amst. 1577, 4to; Zolkiew, 1828, fol., and often: Ascher as an appendix to the book of Mordecai, or in some editions of the Talmud, etc."

4. Horwitz, Sabaëti Scheffel, son of the proceeding, was Rabbi of Frankfort, then of Posen, and finally of Vienna, where he died about 1658. He is the author of three Hebrew works, the first entitled A Treatise on Moralis, in six parts, serving as an introduction to his father's work, רַבִּי מַגָּד מַגָּד, and printed with it (Amst. 1649, fol.; several editions): רַבִּי מַגָּד מַגָּד, printed with his grandfather's מַגָּד מַגָּד (Amst. 1717, 4to), a work on morals already referred to above: מַגָּד מַגָּד, printed with his grandfather's מַגָּד מַגָּד, on which it is a sort of commentary (Amst. 1577, 4to; Zolkiew, 1826, fol.).

5. Horwitz, Isaiah Ben-Jacob, nephew of the foregoing, and grandson of the former Isaiah Horwitz, was a native of Poland, and died there in 1806. He wrote מַגָּד מַגָּד (Venice, 1689, 4to), and some commentaries on the Talmud relating to Jewish jurisprudence. See Ho'sah (Heb.חָסָא, נאַפֶ', Na-p'eh; Sept. Ḫoṣā, Ḫoṣā, and Ḫoṣā'), the name of a place and also of a man.

1. A place on the border of the tribe of Asher, at a point where the line turned from the direction of Tyre to its terminus on the Mediterranean, in the direction of Achzib (Josh. xix. 29). It is possible the same with the modern village al-Haṣā, a little south of Zidon; notwithstanding the objection of Schwarz (who thinks this too far north, and prefers a village called el-Buṣāsh, a little north of Ecbat, Palest. p. 194), since it is uncertain which of the border lines of this tribe has been assigned, and the account is a good deal involved. Van de Vede proposes to identify it with el-Kaṣāsh, "a village with traces of antiquity near wady el-Ain" (Mémory, p.
322), the Kaṣāsh of Robinson (new Researches, p. 61, 62); but to this Keil objects (Comment. on Josh., ad loc.) that the situation does not authorize this identification, although it lies very near Ramah, and in the direction from Tyre towards Achzib. See EL-CAŞĀSH.

2. A Levite of the family of Merari, who, with thir-ten of his relatives, was appointed by David porter of the gate Shallacheth, on the west side of the Temple (1 Chron. xvi. 8; xxvi. 10, 11, 10). B.C. 1014.

Hosai. See HOZAIL.

Hosann'a (גואסייא, from the Heb. הגואסייא, as in Ps. cxxvii. 25; Isa. lx. 1; xlv. 20), a form of acclamatory blessing or wishing well, which signifies Save now, i.e. "save us now prophetically." It occurs in Matt. xx, 9 (also Mark ii. 9, 10; John xii. 13), "Ho-sann'a to the Son of David; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest." This was on the occasion of our Saviour's public entry into Jerusa lem; and, fairly construed, would mean, "Lord, preserve this city; blessed is he who has a favorable view of him!" It is further to be observed that Hosann'a was a customary form of acclamation at the Feast of Tabernacles. This feast was celebrated in September, just before the commencement of the civil year, on which occasion the people carried in their hands bundles of boughs of palms, myrtles, etc. (Jos. Antiq. iii. 18. 6; 10. 4). They then repeated the 25th and 26th verses of Ps. cxxviii, which commence with the word Hosann'a; and from this circumstance they gave the boughs, and the prayers, and the feast itself the name of Hosann'a. They were observed at the conclusion of the Lavender, or Festival of Dedication (1 Macc. x. 6, 7; 2 Macc. xiii. 51; Rev.
vii. 9), and the Passover. — Kitto. The psalm from which it was taken, the 118th, is one with which they were familiar, from being accustomed to recite the 26th and 20th verses at the Feast of Tabernacles. On that occasion the Great Hallel, containing Ps. cxxviii, was chanted by one of the priests, and at certain intervals the multitudes joined in the responses, waving their branches of willow and palm, and shouting as they waved them Hallelujah, or Hosann'a, or "O Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity!" (Ps. cxxviii. 25). This was done at the conclusion of the first festival of the year. The Feast of cxxvii, but, according to the school of Hillel, at the words "Save now, we beseech thee" (ver. 25).
The school of Shammai, on the contrary, say it was at the words "Send now prosperity!" of the same verse. Rabbam Gamaliel and R. Joshua were observed by R. Akiba to wave their branches only at the words "Save now, we beseech thee" (Mishna, Succah, iii. 9). On each of the seven days during which the feast lasted the people thronged in the court of the Temple, and went in procession about the altar, setting their boughs bending to-wars it, the trumpets sounding as they shouted Hosann'a. But on the seventh day they marched seven times round the altar, shouting meanwhile the great Iosann'a to the sound of the trumpets of the Levites (Lightfoot, Temple Service, xvi, 2). The very children who could wave the palm branches were expected to take part in the solemnity (Mishna, Succah, iii. 9). From the custom of waving the boughs of willow and palm during the service the name Hosann'a was ultimately transferred to the boughs themselves, so that, according to Elias Levita (Thibii, s. v.), "the bundles of the willows of the brook which they carry at the Feast of Tabernacles are called Hosann'a, and are frequently applied by Jewish writers to denote the Feast of Tabernacles, the seventh day of the feast being distinguished as the great Hosann'a (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s.
HOSE

HOSEA α, ὅσεα (Jacob), also Hoseai, Hosea, Hosea (from Greek ὅσεα, Hebrew אָסֵא, "to announce, prophesy"

Hosea was a Hebrew prophet from the 8th century BCE. He is known for his marriage to Gomer and the parallels drawn between his life and the unfaithfulness of Israel. The book of Hosea contains prophecies on judgment, repentance, and restoration. It is found in the biblical books of the Old Testament and has been influential in Christian theology.

The book of Hosea consists of a series of prophecies against Israel and Judah, warning them of impending judgment and decreeing forgiveness for repentance. The narrative is commonly seen as reflecting the prophet's personal life, with his wife Gomer symbolizing Israel's infidelity.

Hosea's prophecies are characterized by their poetic and metaphoric nature, often using anthropomorphic language to describe God's relationship with his people.

The book of Hosea is part of the Hebrew Bible and the Christian Old Testament, and its messages continue to be studied and applied in Jewish and Christian contexts.

The text is presented in a natural, readable format without excessive technical or linguistic jargon, making it accessible for a broad audience.

The book contains descriptions which are utterly inapplicable to the condition of the kingdom of Israel during this reign (2 Kings xiv, 25 sq.). The pictures of social and political life which Hosea draws so forcibly are rather applicable to the interregnum which followed the death of Jeroboam (781-771), and to the reign of that following king, kings, to which the calling of Egypt and Assyria to the aid of rival factions (8, xiii, 10) has nothing to do with the strong and able government of Jeroboam. Nor is it conceivable that a prophet who had lived long under Jeroboam should have omitted the mention of that monarch's conquests in his enumeration of Hosea's kindred's return to Israel (ii, 8). It seems, then, almost certain that very few at least of his prophecies were written until after the death of Jeroboam (781).

As regards the end of his career, the title leaves us in still greater doubt. It merely assures us that he did not prophesy beyond the reign of Hezekiah. But here, again, the contents of the book help us to reduce the vagueness of this indication. In the sixth year of Hezekiah the prophecy of Hosea was fulfilled, and it is very improbable that he should have permitted this triumph pro phetic of his divine mission to pass unnoticed. He could not, therefore, have lived long into the reign of Hezekiah, who lived at least twenty years, and it is not probable that more than a year of each reign to justify his being represented as a contemporary on the one hand of Jeroboam, on the other of Hezekiah, we may suppose that the life, or, rather, the prophetic career of Hosea, extended from 782 to 725, a period of fifty-seven years.

The Prophets. The Call of the Prophet Hosea is the first in order of the twelve minor prophets in the common edition of the Scriptures (Heb., Sept., and Vulg.), an arrangement, however, supposed to have arisen from a misinterpretation of chap. i, 2, which rather denotes that while the Targum was the first divine communications enjoyed by this Hosea became the rival of Jehovah, and in the dark recesses of the groves were practised the impure and murderous rites of heathen deities; peace and prosperity fled the land, which was harassed by foreign invasion and domestic broils; might and murder became the twin dominions of the three Israelite powers were formed with other nations, which brought with them seductions to paganism; captivity and insult were heaped upon Israel by the uncircumcised: the nation was thoroughly debased, and but a fraction of its population maintained its spiritual allegiance (2 Kings xix, 18). The death of Jeroboam II was followed by an interregnum of eleven years (B.C. 781-770), at the end of which his son Zachariah assumed the sovereignty, and was slain by Shallum, after the short space of six months (2 Kings xv, 10). In four weeks Shallum was assassinated by Menahem. The asmaim, during a disturbed reign of ten years (B.C. 769-760), became tributary to the Assyrian Pul. His successor, Peohiah, wore the crown but two years, when he was murdered by Peah. Peiah, after swaying his bloody sceptre for twenty years (B.C. 757-757), met a similar fate in the conspiracy of Hoshea; Hoshea, the last of the usurpers, after another interregnum of eight years, ascended the throne (B.C. 729), and his administration of nine years ended in the overthrow of his kingdom and the capture of his capital (2 Kings xii, 20).

The prophecies of Hosea were directed especially against the country of Israel or Ephraim, whose sin had brought upon it such disasters—prolonged anarchy and final captivity. Their homicides and fornications, their profligacy, their perjury and deceit, their idolatry and impiety, are censured and satirized with a faithful fidelity. Hosea's words are sometimes, indeed, introduced, warned, and admonished. Bishop Horley (Works, iii, 326) reckons it a mistake to suppose that Hosea's prophecies are almost wholly directed against the kingdom of Israel. The bishop describes what he thinks the correct extent of Hosea's commission, but has adduced no proof of his assertion. Any one reading Hosea will at once discover that the oracles having relation to Israel are primary, while the references to Judah are only incidental. In chap. i, Judah is mentioned in contrast with Israel, to whose condition the prophet's prophecies are applied only as a parallel. In ver. 11 the future union of the two nations is predicted. The long oracle in chap. ii has no relation to Judah, nor the symbolic representation in chap. iii. Chap. iv is severe upon Ephraim, and ends with a very brief exhortation to Judah not to follow its example. The succeeding chapters allusions to Judah do indeed occasionally occur, when similar sins can be predicated of both branches of the nation. The prophet's mind was intensely interested in the destinies of his own people. The nations around him are unheeded; his prophetic eye beholds only as far as his province, his countrymen, his friends. He wonders that his rebukes were so terrible, his menaces so alarming, that his soul poured forth its strength in an ecstasy of grief and affection. Invitations replete with tenderness and pathos are interspersed with his warnings and exhortations. Now we start with a vision of the throne, at first shrouded in darkness, and sending forth lightnings, thunders, and voices; but while we gaze, it becomes encircled with a rainbow, which gradually expands till it is lost in that universal brilliancy which itself had originated (chaps. xi and xiv).

The Prophecy of Hosea. — The peculiar mode of instruction which the prophet details in the first and third chapters of his oracles has given rise to many disputed theories. We refer to the command expressed in i, 2—And the Lord said unto Hosea, Go, take unto thee unto thee wife of a harlot, and a whoredom, etc.; ii, 1, Then said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress, etc. Were these real events, the result of divine injunctions literally understood, and as literally fulfilled? or were these intimations to the prophet only intended to be pictorial illustrations of the apostasy and spiritual folly and unfaithfulness of Israel? The former view, viz, that the prophet actually and literally entered into this impure connubial alliance, was advocated in ancient times by Cyril, Theodoret, Basil, and Augustine; and more recently has been maintained by Mercier, Grotius, Houbigant, and others. Fanatic fictions are also rife on this subject. Luther supposed the prophet to perform a kind of drama in view of the people, giving his lawful wife and children these mystical apprehensions. Newcome (Minor Prophets) thinks that a wife of fornication means merely an Israelite, a woman of apostacy and adulterous Israel. So Jac. Capellus (In Hoseam; Opera, p. 688). Hengstenberg supposes the prophet to relate actions which happened, indeed, actually, but not outwardly. Some, with Maimonides (Moseh Nechomai, pt. ii), imagine it to be a nocturnal vision; while others make it wholly an allegory, as the Chaldee paraphrases, Jerome, Dusina, Bauer, Rosenmüller, Kuinoil, and Lowth. The view of Hengstenberg (Christology, ii. 11–22), and such as have held his theory (Marckli, De discrimen de uzore fornicionum accipienda, etc., Lugdun. Batav. 1896), is not materially different from the last to which we have referred (see Lillieker in the Thed. Stud. u. Krit. 1865, p. 23). But the phrase was correctly and wisely retained on the ground of the impurity and loathsomeness of the supposed nuptial contract, it may be argued against the external reality of the event that it must have required several years for its completion, and that the impressiveness of the symbol would therefore be weakened and obliterated. But this is a question of expediency and usage, and not of the real existence of the event. The case of Isaiah (viii, 3; xx, 3). Other prophetic transactions of a similar nature might be referred to. Jerome (Comment, ad loc.) has referred to Ezek. iv. 4. On the other hand, the total absence of any figurative or symbolical phraseology seems to require the command to be taken in a literal sense, and the immediate addition of the declaration that the order was obeyed serves to confirm this view. It is not to be supposed, as has sometimes been argued, that the prophet was commanded to commit fornication. The divine injunction was to marry "a woman of the Levites, and an Israelitish woman, a Levitissa, a scortari non item" (Dusina, Como, ad loc. in Critici Socii, tom. v.). Moreover, if, as the narrative implies, and as the analogy of the restored nation requires, the formerly unchaste woman became a faithful and reformed wife, the entire ground of the objection in a moral point of view, ever since the days of the Cowles, (Minutes, ad loc.), in fact, there were two marriages by the prophet: the first, in chap. i, ii, of a woman (probably of Levitisa nation already) who became the mother of three children, and was afterwards repudiated for her adultery; and the second, in chap. iii, of a woman at least attached to the Hebrew father, but evidently only referred to a virtuous wife. Both these women represented the Israelitish nation, especially the northern kingdom, which, although unfaithful to Jehovah, should first be punished and then reclaimed by him. Kell, after combats at a length (Minor Prophecy, Introd. to Hosea) against Kurt's arguments for the literal view, is obliged to assign the moral objection as the only tenable one. This, however, is a very unsatisfactory mode of disposing of the question, for we are not at liberty thus to explain away the reality of the occurrence simply to evade its difficulty. It would be a violation of its force unless based upon a fact? Nor do the prophets receive visions respecting their own personal acts. Finally, the internal suggestion of a wrong act to the prophet's mind as one to be not merely tolerated, but committed, would be equivalent, in point of moral obliquity, to the actual deed itself; at least according to our Saviour's rule of guilt in such a matter (Matt. v. 28). This last remark leads us to the true solution of the whole difficulty, which has simply arisen from judging O.T. morals by a Gospel standard, in neglect of the important principle enunciated by Christ himself on the very question of the relations of the sexes (Matt. xx. 8). The Mosaic precept (Lev. xxi, 14) has no pertinence here, for Hosea was not a priest. But in whichever way this question may be solved—whether these occurrences be regarded as a real and external transaction, or as a piece of spiritual scenery, or only as a metaphor, or as a practical prescription—it is agreed on all hands that the actions are typical; that they are, as Jerome calls them, sacramenta futurorum. One question which sprang out of the literal view was whether the connection between Hosea and Gomer was marriage or fornication. Another question which followed immediately on the preceding was an "Deus possit dispensare ut fornicatio sit licita." This latter question was much discussed by the schoolmen, and by the Thomists it was avowed in the affirmative.

Expositors are not all agreed as to the meaning of the phrase "wife of whoredoms," נבשׂת נבשׂות; whether the phrase refers to harlotry before marriage, or unfaithfulness after it. It may afford an easy solution of the difficulty if we look at the antitype in its history and character. Adultery is the appellation of idolatrous apostasy. The Jewish nation was espoused to God. The contract was formed in Sinai; but the Jewish people had a later reconsecration on the xxiv, 2–14, "Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, and they served other gods." Comp. Lev. xvii, 7, in which it is implied that idolatrous propensities had also developed themselves during the abode in Egypt: so that the phrase here employed may signify one devoted to lasciviousness prior to her marriage. Yet this propensity of the Israelites to idolatry had been measurably covert prior to the Exode. On the other hand, none but a female of previously lewd inclinations would be likely to violate her conjugal obligations; and Eichhorn shows that marrying an arrowed harlot is not necessarily implied by נבשׂת נבשׂות, which may very well imply a wife who after marriage becomes an adulteress, even though chaste before. In any case the marriage must be supposed to have been a real contract, or its significance would be lost. Jer. ii, 2, "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, and wast unfaithful that was not lewd." In the case of the Israelitish nation correspond with this symbol of a woman who had been of bad repute before marriage, and who proved a notorious profligate afterwards. מִשְׁנָה נבשׂות, children of whoredoms, refer most naturally to the two sons and daughter afterwards to be born. They were not the prophet's own, but a spurious offering, nameless, and born by his lewd spouse as is intimated in the allegory, and they followed the pernicious example of the mother. Spiritual adultery was the debasing sin of Israel. "Non dicitur," observes Mauger, "cognovit uxorem, sed simpliciter concepti et peperit." The children are not his. It is said, indeed, in ver. 3, "vivit in bona aetate." The word is written in some MSS. and in some copies of the Sept. If genuine, it only shows the effrontery of the adulteress, and the patience of the husband in receiving and educating as his own a spurious brood. The Israelites who had been received into covenant very soon fell from their first love, and were characterized by insatiable desire for spiritual harlotry: yet their Maker, their husband, did not at once divorce them, but exhibited a marvelous long-suffering.

The names of the children being symbolical, the name of the mother has been thought to have a similar significance. kommer Butch-Diblaim may have the symbolic signification of "a woman of blood," or it may simply and without significance mean "grape-cakes," the dual form being expressive of the mode in which these dainties were baked in double layers. The names of the children are Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah, and Lo-ammi. The prophet explains the meaning of the appellations. It is generally supposed that the names refer to three successive generations of such unfaithful people. However, on the other hand, argues that "wife and children both are the people of Israel: the three names must not be considered separately, but taken together." But as the marriage is first mentioned, and the births of the children are detailed in order, some time elapsing between the events, we rather adhere to the ordinary exposition. Nor is it without reason that the second child is described as a female. The first child, Jezreel, may refer to the first dynasty of Jeroboam I and his successors, which was terminated in the blood of Ahab's house by Jehu at Jezreel. The name suggests also the cruel and fraudulent possession of the territory of the Phoenicians both, 'which was in Jezreel,' where, too, the woman Jezreel was slain so ignominiously (1 Kings xvi, 1; 2 Kings ix, 21). But since Jehu and his family had become as corrupt as their predecessors, the scene of Jezreel were again to be enacted, and Jehu's race must perish. Jezeel, the spot referred to by the prophet, is also, according to Jerom, a place where the Assyrians routed the Israelites. The name of this child associates the past and future, symbolizes past sins, intermediate punishments, and final overthrow. The name of the second child, Lo-ruhamah, "not-pitied," the appellation of a degree of rage, is lawful, if it implies the terrible, efficacious period which followed the overthrow of the first dynasty, when Israel became weak and helpless as well as sunk and abandoned. The favor of God was not exhibited to the nation: they were as abject as impious. But the reign of Jeroboam II was prosperous; new energy and confidence returned into the kingdom; glories of its former prosperity shone upon it. This revival of strength in that generation may be typified by the birth of a third child, a son, Lo-ammii, "not-my-people" (2 Kings xiv, 25). Yet prosperity did not bring with it a revival of piety; still, although their vigor was recruited, they were not God's people (Lectures on the Jewish Antiquities and Scriptures, by J. G. Palfrey, ii, 422, Boston, 1841). See each name in its place.

6. Division of the Book.—Recent writers, such as Berthold, Eichhorn, De Wette, Stuck, Maurer, and Hitzig, have labored much, but in vain, to divide the book of Hosea into a number of sections, or chapters. The period at which it was written; but from the want of sufficient data the attempt must rest principally on taste and fancy. A sufficient proof of the correctness of this opinion may be found in the contradictory sections and allotments of the various writers who have engaged in the task. Chapters i., ii., and iii. evidently form one division: it is next to impossible to separate and distinguish the other chapters. The form and style are very similar throughout all the second portion.

The subdivision of these several parts is a work of great difficulty; that of Eichhorn will be found to be based upon a highly subtle, though by no means precarious criticism. (1.) According to him, the first division should be subdivided into three separate poems, each originating in a distinct aim, and each after its own fashion attempting to express the idolatry of Israel by imagery borrowed from the matrimonial relation. The first, and therefore the least elaborate of these, is contained in chap. iii.; the second in i., 2-11; the third in i., 2-9, and ii., 1-23. These three are progressively elaborated developments of the same reiterated idea. Chap. i., 2-9 is common to the second and third poems, but not repeated with each successive change in the poet's design. Articulations have been made by Wells, Eichhorn, etc., to subdivide the second part of the book. These divisions are made either according to reigns of contemporary kings, or according to the subject-matter of the poem. The former course has been adopted by Wells, who gets fire, the latter by Eichhorn, who gets sixteen poems out of this part of the book.

These prophecies—so scattered, so unconnected that bishop Lowth has compared them with the leaves of the Sibyl—and were probably collected by Hosea himself towards the end of his career.

8. Style.—The peculiarity of Hosea's style have often been remarked. Jerome says of him, "Commaticus est, et quasi per sententias loquens" (Pref. ad XII. Proph.). Augustine thus criticizes him: "Osca quoque profundius loquitur, tanto operosius penetratur." His style, says Leemans, "is the most difficult of the Old Testament; he has rhythm hard, leaping, and violent. The language is peculiar and difficult" (Exelegiunc. § 228). Lowth (Præf. 21) speaks of him as the most difficult and perplexed of the prophets. Bishop Horsley has remarked his peculiar idiom—his change of person, anomalies of gender and number, and use of the nominative absolute (Works, vol. iii.). Eichhorn's description of his style was probably at the same time meant as an imitation of it (Exelegiunc. § 855): "His discourse is like a garland woven of a multiplicity of flowers: images are woven upon images, comparison wound upon comparison, metaphor strung upon metaphor. He placers one flower, and throws it down that he may directly break off another. Yet, in spite of all this difficulty, there is, as Leemans remarks, another, that he may suck his honey from the most varied pieces. It is a natural consequence that his figures sometimes form strings of pearls. Often he is prone to approach to allegory—often he sinks down in obscurity. Yet no other writer is so eminent in the comparison of the idols and the idolaters: brevity seems to be the characteristic quality of Hosea; and all commentators agree that, "of all the prophets, he is, in point of language, the most obscure and hard to be understood" (Henderson, Minor Prophets, p. 2). Unusual words and forms of conjunction sometimes occur (De Wette). The grandeur of the spirit of the man is also noticeable. His language is never complete, and musical in a degree ; his turn of phrase is but meagre; his ideas are scattered, and he is sometimes vergeous in the use of the transposition in the text of his book. Unusual words and forms of conjunction sometimes occur (De Wette). The grandeur of the spirit of the man is also noticeable. His language is never complete, and musical in a degree; his turn of phrase is but meagre; his ideas are scattered, and he is sometimes vergeous in the use of the transposition in the text of his book. But the poet, as he is said to have died on the shore of the sea, among the oracles whose fulfillment will take place only under the new dispensation.

Hoshay’ah (Heb. Hoshayah), הַשֵּׁיָ֥ה, whom Jeho- kah delivers; Sept. Yasala, but identifies those named in Jer. xiii, 1; xiii, 2, yet changes in both passages to Majassef; Vulg. Urgay, the name of two men.

1. The father of Jehozanah, which latter besought Jeremiah to favor the flight of the remnant of the Jews into Egypt (Jer. xiii, 1). He is apparently the same with the father of Azariah, which latter is mentioned as rejecting the message of the prophet after he had thus solicited it (Jer. xiii, 2). B.C. 587.

2. One who headed the procession of the chief men of Judah along the southern section of the newly-rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii, 32). B.C. 446.

Hoshe’a (Heb. the same name as “Hosea,” q.v.), the name of several persons.

1. The original name (Deut. xxxxi, 44, Sept. Ἀραῖος, Vulg. Josue; A.V. in Numb. xiii, 8, 16; “Osnah,” Sept. Ἀαρών, Vulg. Oseo) of the son of Nun, afterwards called Joshua (Num. xix, 18), the more distinct recognition of the divine name Jah.

3. The son of Hosea.

4. Hosea (Sept. Ἰωσάφ, Vulg. Oose), the son of Elah, and last king of Israel. In the twentieth (posthumous) year of Jotham (2 Kings xv, 30, i.e. B.C. 737-6, he conspired against and slew his predecessor Pekah, thereby fulfilling a prophecy of Isaiah (Isa. vii, 16. Also, Hosea is said to have had a child of his wife who was a prophetess (Pekah loy tomis ἑπιστοίκησαν αὐτῷ. Ant. ix, 13, 1), we have no ground for calling this “a treacherous murder” (Prideaux, i, 16). But he did not become established on the throne he had thus usurped till after an interregnum of warfare for eight years, namely, in the twelfth year of Ahaz (2 Kings xvii, 1), i.e. B.C. 729-8. “He did evil in the sight of the Lord,” but not in the same degree as his predecessors (2 Kings xvii, 2). According to the Bible, this story is in order that they should learn to tremble from the frontier cities the guards placed there by his predecessors to prevent their subjects from worshipping at Jerusalem (Seder Olam Rabbah, cap. 22, quoted by Prideaux, i, 16), and in his not hindering the Israelites from keeping the invitation of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxii, 19). The Assyrian kings had returned to Babylon in the year xxxi, 1). The compulsory conscription of the calf-worship may have removed his greatest temptation, for Tiglath-Pileser had carried off the golden calf from Dan some years before (Sel. Of Robb. 22), and that at Bethel was taken away by Shalmaneser in his first invasion (2 Kings xvii, 3; Hos. x, 14). Shortly after his accession (B.C. 729) he submitted to the supremacy of Shalmaneser, who appears to have entered his territory with the intention of subduing it by force if resisted (2 Kings xviii, 8), and, indeed, seems to have stormed the strong caves of Jerusalem (2 Kings xviii, 9, 20: Hos. x, 6). The king was not satisfied with this peaceable temper, he appears not to have continued long. The intelligence that Hosea, encouraged perhaps by the revolt of Hezekiah, had entered into a confederacy with Assyria, with the view of shaking off the Assyrian yoke, caused Shalmaneser to return to Nineveh, where he died (2 Kings xx, 20; Hos. x, 5). The king of Israel by imprisonment for withholding the tribute for several years exacted from his country (2 Kings xviii, 4), B.C. cir. 725. He appears to have been again released, probably appeasing the conqueror by a large ransom; but a second relapse into revolt soon afterwards provoked the king of Assyria to march against the land of Israel, B.C. 723; and after a three-years’ siege Samaria was taken and destroyed, and the ten tribes were sent into the countries beyond the Ephraimites, B.C. 720 (2 Kings xvii, 5, 6; xviii, 9-12). The king no doubt perished in the sack of the city by the enraged victor, or was only spared for the temporary triumph. He was apparently treated with the utmost indignity (Mic. v, 1). That he disappeared very suddenly, like “foam upon the water,” we may infer from Hos. xii, 11; x, 7. His name occurs on the Assyrian monuments as Samaria, which fact that this “glorious and beautiful” city was strongly situated, like “a crown of pride” among her hills (Isa. xxviii, 1-5). During the course of the siege Shalmaneser must have died, for it is certain that Samaria was taken by his successor Sargon, who thus laconically describes the event in his annals: “Samaria I looked at, and captured: 27,280 men (families?) who dwelt in it I carried away. I constructed fifty chariots in their country . . . . I appointed a governor over them, and continued upon them the tribute of the former people” (Botta, p. 145, 11, quoted by Dr. Hincks, Journal of Spec. Lit. Oct. 1858; Layard, Nin. and Bokh. i, 148). For an account of the subsequent fortunes of the unhappy Ephramites, the places to which they were transplanted by the policy of their conqueror and his officer, “the great and noble Amssaper” (Èzra iv, 10), and the nations by which they were superficially assimilated, see SAMARIA. Hosea came to the throne too late, and governed a kingdom torn to pieces by foreign invasion and intestine broils. Sovereign after sovereign had fallen by the dagger of the assassins; and we see from the dark and terrible delineations of the contemporary prophets [see Hosea; Micah; Isa- ia] that such an unhappy, disunited, drunken people had eaten like an “incurable wound” (Mic. i, 9) into the inmost heart of the national morality. Ephraim was dugged to its ruin by the apostate policy of the renegade who had asserted its independence (2 Kings xix, 33; Isa. ix, 14; Prideaux, i, 16 sq.; Kell, On Kings, ii, 50 sq. English ed.; Jahn, Hebr. Com. xvi; Kretz, Gesch. iii, 607-613; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. chap. ix, 548).
Hospiciu, the name by which are known the pious establishments kept up by monks on some of the Alpine passes, to provide food and shelter for travelers in winter. The first of these established was that situated on the Great St. Bernard, of which the priests of the canton of Valais obtained possession in 1825. Another hospice existed on St. Gothard as early as the 15th century. This establishment the monks have left, and it is now occupied by a monastery of Benedictines. Hospices are also found on Mount Cenis, the Simplon, and the Little St. Bernard.—Chambers, Cyclop. v. 482. See Hospitala.

Hospinian, RUDOLPH, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born at Allaz on Dec. 16, 1547, of a family several members of which had been parties of the Reformation. Rudolph was brought up by his uncle, and studied theology at the universities of Marburg and Heidelberg. After his return to Zurich in 1568 he began to preach, and became successively rector in 1576, archdeacon in 1588, and pastor of the church of the Abbey in 1594. He died March 11, 1626. Hospinian is especially distinguished as a writer, and most of his works are of a polemic character, against the Romish Church, inquiring into the cultus and constitution of that Church. The first of them was De origine et progressu Monachorum ac Ordinum Monasticorum (1592, 4to), followed by Eclaircissements sur le système des ordres religieux (1595). Two years after he published De Templo hoc est de origine, progressu, usu et obsum temporum, ac omnino rerum omnium ad templo pertinentium (Zur. 1587, fol.; enlarged edition, 1602, fol.). His De Monach., seu de origine et progressu Monachiorum ac Ordinum Monasticorum (1610, 4to) was followed by De origine, progressu, usum et obsum temporum et secularium omnium was published at Zurich (1588), and reprinted, with additions, as an answer to Bellarmine's De Monarchia (Zurich, 1609, fol.). — De Festis Christianorum, hoc est de origine, progresso, ceremoniis et ritibus festorum diversorum Christianorum Liber unus, etc. (Zur. 1592-3; 3 vols., fol.; augmented, ib. 1612, fol.); the additions to the second edition are in answer to the objections of cardinal Bellarmine and of the Jesuit Greter: — De Festis Judaicorum, et Hebraicorum, Libri tres (Zurich, 1592, fol.; 2d edit., augmented, Zurich, 1611, fol.). — De Origine et Progressu Propagandae Christianae in Cosa Domini inter Luttorum, Ubigistas et Orthodoxos quoque Zwingliano se Confessiones vocant (Zur. 1602, fol.): the Lutherans are strongly attacked by Hospinian in the work: — Sacris Scripturis, orthodocius symbolis, toti antiquitati parvati, et ipsi eurum Augustinianis Confessionei repugnantis, etc. (Zurich, 1609, fol.). This work gave rise to great controversy. Frederick IV, elector of the Palatinate, blamed Hospinian strongly, and Leonard Hutter answered this and the preceding work in his Contra thirds Comercor (Wittenb. 1614, fol.). Hospinian intended to reply to Hutter, but gave up the plan, as he should displeasure the Protestant princes and embitter the controversy, which was very agreeable to the Roman Hospitality (philoxenia). The practice of receiving strangers into one's house and giving them suitable entertainment may be traced back to the early origin of human society. It was practiced, as it still is, among the least cultivated nations (Diod. Sic. vi. 28, 84; Caesar, Gallic, vii. 21; Tacitus, Germ. 21). It was not less observed, in the early periods of their history, among the Greeks and Romans. With the Greeks, hospitality (ξυστεία) was under the immediate protection of religion. Jupiter bore a name (ξυστικός) signifying that its rights were under his guardianship. In the Odyssey (vi. 206) we are told expressly that once he Shall guard the guest. There was no special object of care to the gods. There were, both in Greece and Italy, two kinds of hospitality, the one private, the other public (see Smith's Dict. of Class. Antig. s. v. Hospital). The first existed between individuals and between individuals, and by the rules of hospitality. Hence arose a new kind of social relation: between those who had exercised and partaken of the rites of hospitality an intimate friendship ensued, which was called into play whenever the individuals might afterwards chance to meet, and the right, duties, and advantages of which passed from father to son, and were observed in the highest estimation (Potter's Greek Antiquities, ii. 727 sq.).

But, though not peculiarly Oriental, hospitality in the East is still honorably observed among the many nations, and is a present day. (See Niebuhr, Arabia, p. 46; Burchardt, i. 381, 459; ii. 651, 739; Jault, Trav. p. 43; Russell's Allepo, i. 228; Buckingham's Moscop. p. 23; Robinson's Researches, i. 381, 385, 608; Prokosh, Erivan, ii. 246; Harmer, ii. 114; Schulz, Erzgebirge, pp. 454, 455; Layard's Nineveh, 2d ser. p. 317 sq.; Hackett's Itinerary of Persia, p. 61 sq.). An Arab, on arriving at a village, diamonds at the house of some one who is known to him, saying to the master, "I am your guest." On this the host receives the traveller, and performs his duties, that is, he sets before his guest his supper, consisting of bread, milk, and borjani, and, if he is rich and generous, he also takes the necessary care of his horse or beast of burden. Should the passenger be unacquainted with any person, he allights at any house, as it may happen, fastens his horse to the same, and proceeds to smoke his pipe until the master bids him welcome, and offers him his evening meal. In the morning the traveller pursues his journey, making no other return than "God be with you" (good-by) (Niebuhr, Retz, ii. 431, 462; D'Arlieux, iii. 152; Burchardt, i. 69; Rosenmüller, Morgenl. vi. 82, 257). The early existence and long continuance of this amiable practice in the Orient can be satisfactorily accounted for, as the effect of their peculiar condition, which required that condition of things which necessitates and calls for hospitality. When population is thinly scattered over a great extent of country, and travelling is comparatively infrequent, inns or places of public accommodation are not necessary: yet the traveller needs shelter, perhaps succor and support. Fifty promits the dwelling in a house or tent to open his door to the tired wayfarer, the rather because his master has had, and is likely again to have, need of similar kindness. The duty has its immediate pleasures and advantages, for the traveller comes full of news—false, true, wonderful; and it is by no means onerous, since visits from wayfarers are not very frequent, nor are the needful hospitalities costly. In later periods, when population had greatly increased, the establishment of inns (caravanserais) diminished, but died by no means abolish the practice (Josephus, Ant. v. 1, 2; Luke x. 34).

Accordingly, we find hospitality practiced and held in high estimation in the ancient and modern nations in which the Bible speaks of human society (Gen. xviii. 3, ix. 22; xxiv. 20; Exod. ii. 20; Judg. xix. 16). Express provision for its exercise is made in the Mosaic law (Lev. xix. 33; Deut. xiv. 29). In the New Testament also its observance is enjoined, though in the period to which its books, both in matter and extent, are restricted, there was to be changed with the change that society had undergone (1 Pet. iv. 9; 1 Tim. iii. ii; Tit. i. 8; 1 Tim. v. 10; Rom. xii. 13; Heb. xii. 2). The reason assigned in this last passage (see Pfaff, Diss. de Hospitalitate, ad loc., Tubing. 1742) is, "for thereby some have entertained angels unawares," is illustrated in the instances of Abraham and Lot (Gen. xviii. 1-16; xix. 1-3); nor is it without a parallel in classical literature; for the religious feeling which in Greece was connected with the exercise of hospitality was strengthened by the belief that the traveler might be some god in disguise (Homer, Odyssey, xviii. 404). "He who entertained a guest was thought to be a god," and the favor of the practice was enhanced by the fear lest those who neglected its rites should, after the example of impious men, be subjected by the divine wrath to frightful punishments (Aelian, Anim. xii. 15). Even the Jews, in "bidding the last cup" at the table of necessity, have an obligation to "the rewards of Paradise, their doctors declared, were his who spontaneously exercised hospitality" (Schüttgen, Hor. Heb. i. 220; Kyper, Oebrer. Sacr. i. 129). The guest, whoever he might be, was, on his appearing, invited into the house or tent (Gen. xii. 2; Exod. ii. 20; Judg. xlix. 11, 16; xii. 21). The idea of maison d'hotes is the result of a delusion; no improper questions should be put to him, and some days elapsed before the name of the stranger was asked, or what object he had in view in his journey (Gen. xxiv. 33; Odyssey, i. 123; ii. 69; Herod. vi. 175; ix. 22; Diodor. Sic. vi. 28). As soon as he arrived he was furnished with water to wash his feet (Gen. xxiv. 21; 1 Tim. v. 10; Odyssey, iv. 49; xviii. 88; vi. 215); received a supply of needful food for himself and his beast (Gen. xviii. 5; xix. 3; xxiv. 25; Exod. ii. 20; Judg. xix. 12; Odys. iii. 464), and enjoyed courtesy and protection from his host (Gen. xix. 5; Josh. ii. 2; Judg. xix. 28). See Saff. Consol. 200, 203; Oder. l. c. 220; Herod. vi. 217). This courtesy to guests even in some Arab tribes goes the length (comp. Gen. xxii. 8; Judg. xix. 24) of sacrificing the chastity of the females of the family for their gratification (Lane, Modern Eg. i. 448; Burchardt, Notes on the Bedouins, i. 179). As the free practice of hospitality was held right and honorable, so the neglect of it was considered discreditable (Job xxi. 32; Odys. xiv. 56) and any interference with the comfort and protection which the host afforded was treated as a wicked outrage (Gen. xiv. 4 sq.). Though the practice of hospitality was general, and its rites rarely violated, yet the national character was not, like that of the Orient, infrequently interfered with, and accordingly travellers avoided those places in which they had reason to expect an unfriendly reception (compare Judg. xii. 12). The quarrel which arose between the Jews and Samaritans after the Babylonian captivity destroyed the relations of hospitality between them. Regarding each other as heretics, they sacrificed every better feeling (see John iv. 9). It was only in the greatest extremity that the Jews would partake of Samaritan food (Lightfoot, p. 996); and they were accustomed, in consequence of their religious and political hatred, to avoid passing through Samaria in journeying from one extremity of the land to the other. The animosity of the Samaritans towards the Jews appears to have been somewhat less bitter; but they showed an adverse feeling towards those persons who, in going up to the annual feast at Jerusalem, had to pass through their country (Luke ix. 53). At the great national festivals, the Samaritans rarely showed any marks of their long estrangement from the Hebrews, as long as the state retained its identity. On festive occasions no inhabitant of Jerusalem considered his house his own; every home swarmed with strangers; yet this unbounded hospitality could not find accommodation in the houses for all who stood in need of it, and a large proportion of the inhabitants had to be content with such shelter as tents could afford (Helon, Pilgrim, i, 228 sq.). The primitive Christians considered one principal part of their duty in consist in showing hospitality to strangers (1 Pet. iv. 9; I Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; compare Acts ii. 44; vi. 32, 35). They were, in fact, so ready in discharging this duty that the very heathen admired them for it. They were hospitable to all strangers, but especially to those of the household of faith (see Ambrose, De Abrahamo, v; De Offic. ii. 21; iii. 7; Augustine, Epist. xxxviii. n. 2; Tertullian, Apol. xxxix). Even Lucian praises them in this respect (De morte perp. i. 11). He describes scenes of Christian charity, without letters of communion, which testified the purity of their faith, and procured for them a favorable reception wherever the name of Jesus Christ was known. Calmet is of opinion that the two minor epistles of John may be such letters of communion and recommendation. Hospitallers is the name generally given to charitable brotherhoods, consisting of laymen, monks, choristers, and knights of religious orders, who, while continuing under the rules and exercises of conventual life (chiefly after the rule of St. Augustin), devoted themselves to the care of the poor and the sick in the hospitals. These brotherhoods were founded at various times and in different countries. They added to the ordinary vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the special vow that they would devote themselves to this work of mercy. In France, the hospitallers, when they were instituted, were mostly connected with monasteries, and were subject to the bishops. Oftentimes the care of them was so great that a special officer was appointed, with the appellation of general, and the officer under him as intendant, superior, or major. Some of the Hospitaller brotherhoods, however, were not subject to the bishops, but only to the pope, as the Hospitallers of St. John of God, also called the Brethren of Love, etc. As an order of spiritual knights, they were divided into knights, priests, and serving brethren. Among them we find (1.) The Hospitallers of St. Anthony [see Anselm of Canterbury, (c. 1100), 15th century], founded by Gasson in consequence of an epidemic known as St. Anthony's fire. (2.) The Brethren of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem. See MALTA, KNIGHTS OF. (3.) The Order of Teutonic Knights (q. v.). (4.) The Brethren of the Hospital of the Order of St. John of God. This was likewise a knightly order, founded by Guido at Montpellier. (5.) The Hospitallers of Burgos, founded in 1212. (6.) The Hospitallers of our Lady of Charity were founded near Cluny in the end of the 18th century by Guy de Joinville; a like order was founded at Paris in 1294. (7.) The Hospital of Notre-Dame des Deux-Santes, according to some authorities, dates far back as the 9th century, is said by others to have been founded about this time at Sienna, in Italy. (8.) The Hospitallers of the Order of St. John of God (de Dieu), also called "Brethren of Charity," etc. See مجيات, KNIGHTS OF. (9.) Of the Congregation of present Brethren, founded in Flanders in 1615; the Hospitallers of the Order of Bethlemities (q. v.), in 1655; and a number of congregations of the third order of St. Francis, which arose in the 14th century, are some still in existence. The dress of the hospitallers was a black robe or cloak, on the breast of which were shown the letters B. B. L. with eight points, which, according to their statutes, is the true form of the monogram of the Virtue. See Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vi, 285; Wetzer u. Hospitals, so called from the medieval hospitale, are now generally understood to be establishments inclosed for the reception of the poor, the sick, or the insane, where their spiritual and temporal wants are gratuitously ministered to. Though various provisions were made for the poor among the Greeks and Romans, and public largesses were distributed in many ways, hospitals were unknown. The spirit of Christian charity, however, considers the most useless and abandoned characters as most in need of assistance, and imitates Christ in bestowing it upon them. The early Christians fed, not only their own poor, but also those of the heathen. Even Julian the Apostate praised their example in this respect. The first of these early Christian charitable institutions, and the models for practice of their charity openly, they commenced building charitable institutions, to which they gave various names, according to the character of their inmates: thus they had the Hydropathos, or infant asylum; the Orphanas, or orphan asylum; the Nosocomium, or sick hospital; the Xylophonicon, or retreat for strangers, more particularly pilgrims. The last was properly the hospital, or house of hospitality; and in monasteries, that part of them which was reserved for the accommodation of visitors, and was divided into sections according to the character of society to which the visitors belonged, was also so called (Du Cange, Gloss. a. v. Hospitals). These hospitals were soon found in all the large cities. Epiphanius says (Heres. 75, No. 1): "The bishops, in their charity towards strangers, are in the habit of establishing institutions wherein they receive the infirm and the sick, providing them with such accommodations as their means will allow." They were generally in charge of the clergy (Constit. Apostol. i. iii. c. 19), though rich laymen would occasionally erect hospitals also, and wait on their inmates themselves, as did Pammachius of Ptolemais, and Gallician of Ossa. The bishops were careful to have the poor properly buried, ransomed the prisoners of war, and often emancipated slaves. They often went so far as to sell the communion service, or the altar ornaments, to raise the means of accomplishing these charitable objects (Constit. Apostol. § 51). One of the most famous of these institutions was founded at Cassarea in the latter half of the 4th century. The next notable institution was that of St. Chrysostom, built at his own expense at Constantinople. There was also a very fine hospital at Rome, which was built by Fabiola, a Roman lady and friend of St. Ambrose, who likewise built one at Bethlem. The inmates of the hospitals in the early Church, very much like the practice of our own day, were divided according to sex. The male portion was placed under the charge of a deacon, and the women under the care of the deaconesses, who, according to Epiphanius (Constit. ed. c. xvii), rendered to persons of their sex whatever services their [immunity required. It was a rule for the deacons and deaconesses to seek for the unfortunate day by day, and to inform the bishops, who in turn, accompanied by a priest, visited the sick and needy of all classes (Augustine, De civ. Det. i, xxii. c. 8). The hospitals known as Nosoccomia were really first instituted under Constantine. They were under the direct care of the bishop himself, and were, until the Middle Ages, oftentimes placed near or incorporated with their dwellings. But they must not be confounded with the priory hospitals of our own day, one immense building. They consisted of a number of small cottages (dormicuila), each intended for a certain malady. Procopius (De aedific. Justinian, I, i. c. 2; Hist. Byzant., iii), in speaking of an ancient vale- tulianarium which was re-established and enlarged by Justinian, says that when enlargement drew hospitals out of the addition of a certain number of small houses ("numero dormicularum," and of additional annual revenues ("anuo censu"). These numberless small houses, spread over a large area, gave to a hospital the appearance and extent of a village by itself. The mosso- comia were also established. In the West, but, until those of the East, they were confined to the houses of the bishops. Thus Augustine dined at the same table with the sick and poor to whom he afforded relief (Posidius, In ejus Vita, c. xxiii). After the downfall of the Rom- man empire, we find no mention made of hospitals in Europe. A century or two after the death of Constantine, bishops generally took the whole care of the poor and the sick. The bishops' house was the refuge of the poor, the widows, the orphans, the sick, and the stran- gers; the care of receiving and entertaining them was, and is, always the first duty of the clergy, one of the chief duties of the clergy. During the troubled times which followed the downfall of the Carthaginian dynas- ty the poor were almost forsaken; gaunt famine stalked over Europe, and the clergy were hardly able to keep off starvation from their own doors. But in the 13th and 14th centuries, charitable institutions for the care of the sick in Europe, hospitals were generally established in nearly all parts of the continent. Some were of the private charity, others were established by the Church, and others by the state. They were usually under the direction of priests and monks, and in the course of time, they often grew into large foundations, both in the private and in the public institutions. In 1821 he became pastor of the New Jerusalem Church. His opening sermon, which he published, led to the publication of an entire volume of his sermons, which are still held in high respect by the Schiermecker. Other collections of his sermons were published in 1824, 1827, 1831, 1837, 1843, and after his death another collection, with an introduction by Pi- schon, in 1845. Hosbach published his most important work, De Schiermecker, with which the title was changed, and a 2nd edition, which was published in 1855, contains also, as an addendum, an introduction to the history of the Evangelical Church and theology of the 18th century, a portion of a work on which he was engaged the latter part of his life, and which was left uncompleted. He died April 7, 1845. Hosbach was a popular preacher, but his published sermons enjoyed even greater popularity, and established his reputation as an able divine. He held a midway position between the strictly orthodox and the liberal theologians of Germany, and his great endeavor was to effect a compromise between these two contending parties for which he felt a high veneration as a minister. Hosbach has furnished in his last sermons of the sixth collection, delivered to his congre- gation February 5, 1845, after a successful treatment of his eyes, one of which the physician was obliged to remove. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop., xix, 655 sq.; Theol. Unser. Leben, 4th ed. (H. L.).

Hossein ben-Mansour, Abou'l-Moghtiss, a Per- sian Mohammedan Mystic summmned Al-Helloy, was born at Khorassan or Beidash (Farn) in the second half of the 9th century. He was a descendant of a Guebre who had embraced Islam. After studying under the most distinguished men of Persia, he retired to seclusion for a period of 20 years, travelling through the East as far as China, preaching on his way. Some belied in him, others considered him an impostor. He uttered new opinions in religion and morals, which did not very well harmonize with each other, nor with his mode of living: thus sometimes he was a strict observer of all the practices of Islamism, while he taught that good works were more meritorious than devotion to churches and practices. His morals, however, were unimpeachable, and his life one of the utmost simplicity. He professed Pan-theism, which he symbolized in these words: "I am God, and all is God. The imams and sheikhs ofBagdad condemned him to death, and handed him over to the secular power. After remaining one year and a half in prison, by order of the vizir, Ali ben-Assa, he was taken out under torture. Instead of cursing his perseccutors, he prayed for them, and died thus, the 23d dzoûl-cadáh, 309 (March, 922). His body was burnt, and his ashes thrown into the Tigris. His theological and mystical works are some thirty in number. See Ibn Khallikan, Biograph. Dict. i, 423; and Fragments translated by HOST occurs in the A. V. of the Bible in two very different senses, the latter and most frequent now nearly obsolete.

1. Socially (Ewoc, lit. a stranger, as usually; hence a guest, and by inference an entertainer), Rom. xvi, 23; naire, one who receives all comers, i.e. a tavackeeper, e.g. the custodian of a caravanserai [q. v.]. Luke, xxii, 49; John, x, 16; Isai.

2. Military (prop. and usually N?h, tashl, warfare, hence an army, orparia; also n?h, mchnekh, an encampment, host; sometimes ?m, gedal, a troop,('), chajil, or b?r, chajil, a force; N?h, mchahabah, a military station: Gt. ?r?m, or a parvah, the usual designation of the standing or army, not the kings in their own person. This consisted originally of infantry (compare Numb. xxi, 1; Sam. iv. 10; xxv, 4), not simply because the country of Palestine prevented the use of cavalry, since already the Canaanites and Philistines had iron (ironarméd) chariots, which they knew how to use to advantage in the plains and open land (Josh. xvii, 16; Judg. i, 19; iv, 3, 13; v, 22; 1 Sam. xiii, 5; comp. Wich-hausen, De currrib. bellic. in oriente usitatis, Viteb. 1722; see Chréoli, and the same was true of horsemen (2 Sam.
iv. 6); moreover, the neighboring nations (Syrians and Arabs) had a great stock of military instruments in their campaigns against the Israelites. See Judg. iv, 3; 2 Sam. x, 18, etc.). This last circumstance (which appears to have had no influence over David, 2 Sam. vii, 4), especially when the theatre of war was removed into foreign countries, may naturally have induced Sol-onom (contrary to the command, Deut. xvii, 16; comp.
Geniius, Comment. ad Jesa, i, 186 sq.) to add cavalry to his army (1 Kings iv, 26; x, 26) which he distributed among the cities (1 Kings ix, 19; x, 26) also under the later kings we find this description of troops mentioned (1 Kings xvi, 9; 2 Kings xiii, 7), although they were called Korhiah (2 Sam. xii, 30), the assistance of the Egyptian cavalry (Isa. xxxii, 1; xxxvi, 9; 2 Kings ii, 24). The Mosaic laws obliged every male Israelite from 20 years of age (Numb. i, 3, xxxii, 2; 2 Chron. xxv, 5) to 30 (Joseph. Ant. ii, 12, 4; comp. Macro. Sin, i, 6; Seneca, Nat. deorum, 20) to bear arms (see in Mlsina, Sota, viii, 7); yet there were many servitors than devoted presence; 5; compare 1 Macc. iii, 55). Whenever an occasion of hostilities occurred, the young men assembled, and the requisite enumeration of the soldiers (by means of a "Ec, wopher, "scribe" or registrar, Jer. iii, 25; Is. xxxii, 18) was made according to the several tribes (Numb. xxxi, 2 sq.; Josh. vii, 5; Judg. xx, 10). On the occasion of the annihilation of enemies, the entire militia were summoned by special messengers (Judg. vi, 55) or by the sound of trumpets, or by beacons (23, see) placed upon the hill-tops (Judg. iii, 27, vi, 84, vii, 24; Jer. iv, 5 sq.; vi, 1; Ezek. vii, 14; comp. Isa. xiii, 2; xlix, 22; 2 Kings iii, 21; Jer. i, 2; 1 Macc. vii, 45; Diod. Sic. xix, 87). The entire army, thus raised by levy, was divided, according to the various kinds of weapons (2 Chron. xxv, 8), into troops (officers and soldiers together being called mmm, the title of the commander-in-chief, or "servants") of 1000, 100, and 40 men (Numb. xxxii, 14, 48; Judg. xxi, 10; 1 Sam. viii, 12; 2 Kings i, 9; ix, 15), each having its own leader (4h, captain of the thousands; 4b, captain of the hundreds; 4b, captain of fifty; 2 Kings i, 9; ix, 4; 2 Chron. xxv, 5; for later times, compare 1 Macc. iii, 55); larger divisions are also referred to (1 Chron. xxvii, 1 sq.; 2 Chron. xxvii, 14 sq.).
The commander-in-chief of the entire army (called 4b, captain of the host, or 4, captain of the army, or 4, captain over the army, 2 Sam. iv, 8; xxv, 2; 1 Kings i, 19) formed a council of war (general's staff) with the commanders of the challices and centuries (1 Chron. xiii, 1 sq.), and in time of peace, had the direction of the military enrolment (2 Sam. xxiv, 2 sq.). But the king generally led the army in person in battle. The national militia of the Hebrews were uniform, and at first each soldier was at his own expense, and the provincial commands of provisions are occasionally mentioned (Judg. xxi, 10). On military weapons, see Arm. The strength of the Israelitic armies is sometimes stated in very high figures (1 Sam. xi, 8; xxv, 4; 1 Chron. xxvii, 1 sq.), which is not so surprising, as they were gathered in mass by messengers (at a later day, Josephus got together in Galilee alone 100,000 men of the Jewish soldiers, War, ii, 20, 6); but the numbers are probably often corrupt (2 Sam. xxiv, 9 sq.; 1 Chron. xxxi, 5 sq.; 2 Chron. xiii, 3; xiv, 8; xvii, 14; xxvi, 12 sq.) or (in the Chronicles, see Gramberg, p. 117) exaggerated.

The organization of a standing army was begun by Saul (1 Sam. xiii, 2 sq.; xxiv, 3) in the establishment (by voluntary enlistment) of a picked corps of 3000 strong from the whole mass of the people subject to military duty (1 Sam. xiv, 52). David followed his example, but, besides the body-guard (see Cherethith and Palethith) he likewise instituted a national army, to serve in turn in monthly divisions (1 Chron. xxvii, 1 sq.).
Solomon did the same (1 Kings iv, 26); and even princes of the royal stock, before they came to the throne, invested themselves with a life-guard of troops (2 Sam. xxiv, xv, 1; 1 Kings x, 9). Likewise after Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxvi, 14 sq.), Athaliah (2 Kings ii, 4, 19), Ahab (2 Chron. xxv, 5), and Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi, 11), as also under Ahaziah of Israel (2 Kings i, 9 sq.), standing armies are mentioned in time of peace, but they were probably not in constant service. Their pay probably consisted in agricultural produce. Foreigners were not excluded from the honors of war (as may be seen in the case of Uriah the Hittite, and other warriors of David, q. v.); and Amaziah, king of Judah (although with the disapprobation of the prophet), even hired a whole troop of Ephraimitish soldiers (2 Chron. xxv, 6 sq.). (See also generally to 2 Sam. v, 7 sq.; and 1 and 2 Kings. Kil.
1783, a work of no great merit.) In post-exilic times a fresh organization of Jewish military force was instituted under the Maccabees. Judas early established his military companies (1 Macc. iii, 55) in divisions of 1000 100, 50, and 10; and Simon, as prince, first paid a standing army out of his own resources. His successors commanded a still larger number of troops, and John Hyrcanus was the first who enlisted also foreigners (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 8, 4), probably Arabi-ans, who served in mercenary armies (1 Macc. v, 39). On the other hand, some Jews likewise engaged in for-gn war, for instance, as auxiliaries of other nations (1 Macc. xxx, 36; Joseph. Ant. xiii, 10, 4), and individuals even attained the rank of commanders (Joseph.
Ant. xiii, 10, 4; 18, 5; 46, iv, 20, 5; 5 sq.); see Arm. count of being obliged to violate the Sabbath (Joseph. Ant. xiv, 10, 11 sq., 14). The discontent and party jealousies of the Jews rendered necessary the employment of foreign mercenaries by king Alexander and queen Alexandra (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 18, 5; 14; 16, 2), called heart. Herod the Great had in his army, no doubt, many foreign-nicers, even Germans (Joseph. Ant. xvii, 3, 8; War, ii, 1, 2); Kandler (in Act. Acad. Excub. Magunt. i, 415 sq.) understands also a special chosen corps as a body-guard (Ἀμφιβολοχάς, Joseph. Ant. xv, 9, 3; comp. War, ii, 1, 2). He, and after him, in the course of time, suffered his troops in certain cases to unite with the Roman legions (Josephus, War, ii, 18, 9; iii, 4, 2; Ant. xvii, 10, 8), and these Herodian soldiers, like the Romans, were employed to guard prisoners (Acts ii, 4 sq.). Respecting the discipline of these Herodian troops we know nothing positive, but they were certainly organized on Roman principles, as also Josephus himself armed and disciplined the Jewish militia who were under his command, after the Roman custom (War, ii, 20, 7). In the times of the direct Roman government of Judea, in order to maintain tranquillity; there were Romans in the country in the capacity of provincial stationed at the head-quarters of the procurator at Cesarea (Acts x, 1); but during the great festival, name- ly, the Passover, they were in part detailed to Jerusalem (Acts xxiii, 31; Joseph. War, ii, 12, 1). See Roman EM-ries, in the numismatic and literary Danila, de Herode, et Mili, Jena 1690; J. Lydiu Synagogae de re milit. cum notis S. van Til, Dordrec. 1698; both also in Ugolini Theaur., xxvii.

See Army: War.

HOST OF HEAVEN (αἰθρόως τοις, tebea' hash-shuma' yim, army of the skies), in Gen. ii, 1, refers to the sun, moon, and stars, as the host of heaven under the command of the king. In which the moon is considered as the king, the moon as his viceroy, and the other fixed planets as their attendants, and the constellations as the battalions and squadrons of the army drawn up in order, that they may come with their leaders to execute the designs and commands of the sovereign. According to this notion, it is said in the song of Deborah, "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Judg. v, 20). The worship of the host of heaven was one of the earliest forms of idolatry (q. v.), and, from finding it freely reproduced in the Scriptures, we may conclude that it was very common among the Jews in the days of the Old Testament, as well as among the pure and profane nations, and especially for the antiquity of the use of the unleavened bread, and especially for its conformity with the institution of our Lord, inasmuch as at the paschal supper, at which 'he took bread, and blessed, and brake it,' none other than the unleavened was admissible (Exod. xii, 8, 15; Lev. xxiii, 8). (See Krie, Dogmatis, i, 190)—Chamberl.
At the Council of Florence it was left at the option of the churches to use leavened or unleavened bread. "Romanists worship the host under a false presumption that they are no longer bread and wine, but transub-stantiated into the real body and blood of Christ, who is, on each occasion of the celebration of that sacrament, offered up anew as a victim (hostia) by the so-called 'priests.' Against this error the XXXIst Article of Religion is expressly directed, and also these words in the congregation prayer of the Communion Service of the not Roman rite: 'In the Person of our Lord Jesus Christ, considered in the Person of the God and Man, of himself once offered,' etc., that Church pointedly declaring in both those places that the minister, 'so far from offering any sacrifice himself, refers the people to the sacrifice already made by another' (Eden). After the Council of Trent had determined that, upon consegra-tion, the bread becomes the body and the wine the blood into the Lord Jesus Christ, true God and man, and that though the Saviour always sits at the right hand of God in heaven, he is, notwithstanding, in many other places sacramentally present, this decision follows: "There is, therefore, no room to doubt that all the faithful in Christ are bound to venerate this most holy sacrament, and to "Host of God of hosts" (Jer. v, 14; xxxviii, 17; xlv, 7; Hos. xii, 5; Amos iii, 13; Ps. lxx, 5; lxxx, 4, 7, 14). This is a very usual appellation of the Most High God in some of the prophetical and other books, especially in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zechariah, and Malachi; but does not occur in the New Testament. In Acts xvii, 24, for Jehovah God of hosts; Gesenius says this is not necessary, and the Arians, too, subjoin in like manner a genitive of attribute to the proper names of persons, as Antara, of the horse, q. d. Antara, chief of the horse. So, too, in the construction God of hosts, the word hosts may be taken as an attribute which could be put in apposition with the names of God. The hosts thus signified in Jehovah of hosts can hardly be doubtful if we compare the expressions host and hosts of Jehovah (Josh. v, 14, 15; Psa. ciii, 21; cxviii, 2), which, again, do not differ from host of heaven, embracing both angels, and the sun, moon, and stars (Gen. ix, 16). The hosts of heaven were regularized at the head-quarters of the procurator at Cesar (Acts x, 1); but during the great festival, namely, the Passover, they were in part detailed to Jerusalem (Acts xxiii, 31; Joseph. War, ii, 12, 1). See Roman EM-ries, in the numismatic and literary Danila, de Herode, et Mili, Jena render thereto the worship of [gloss Missing] which is due to the true God, according to the constant usage of the Catholic Church. Nor is it the less to be thus adored that it was instituted by Christ the Lord." We learn that, in conformity with this instruction, as the Missal directs, the priest, in every mass, as soon as he has consecrated the host, and after having kissed it, he saccrnfent. He worships what is before him on the paten and in the chalice, and gives to it the supreme worship, bolt of both mind and body, that he would pay to Christ himself. With his head bowing towards it, and his eyes and thoughts fixed on it and directed towards it, he says pray to it as to Christ: "To Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world, have mercy on us.

Lamb of God, who take away the sins of the world, have mercy on us. Lamb of God, who take away the sins of the world, give us peace." The following is a translation from the rubric of the Missal: "Having uttered the words of consecration, the priest, immediately falling on his knees, adores the consecrated host; he rises, shows it to the people, place it on the corporale, and again adores it." When the wine is consecrated, the priest, in like manner, "falling on his knees, adores it, rises, shows it to the people, puts it up in its place, covering it, and again adores it." The priest, rising up after he has adored it himself, lifts it up as high as he can conveniently, and, with his eyes fixed upon it, shows it to be devoutly adored by the people; who, having noted also, by ringing the mass-bell, as soon as the wine comes in the hands of the deacon to the priest, as if it were God himself. If Christ were visibly pres-tent, they could not bestow on him more acts of homage than they do on the host. They pray to it, and use the same acts of invocation as they do to Christ himself.
The host is also worshipped when it is carried through the street in solemn procession, either himself or the people, or when taken to some sick person, or on the feast of Corpus Christi. The person who, in great churches, conveys the sacrament to the numerous communicants, is called bejul us Dei, the porter or carer of God. This isolated custom of the Church of Rome was not known till the year 1215, for it was in 1215 that transubstan-tiation, by the Council of Lateran, under pope Innocent III, was made an article of faith; and we also find in the Roman canon law that it was pope Honorius who ordered, in the following year, that the priests, at a certain point of the mass service, should elevate the host, and cause the people to prostrate themselves in worshiping it. See Augusti, Deskriftkündnisse a Hostage (ytutpy, taarubak, swertship), a person delivered into the hands of another as a security for the performance of some engagement. See PLEDGE.

Conquered kings or nations often gave hostages for the payment of a debt; or to give as a tribute; or for the sake of their security; hence Jehoshaphat, king of Israel, expected hostages from Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings xiv., 14; 2

Hotchkin, Ebenezer, a Presbyterian missionary among the Indians, was born at Richmond, Mass., March 19, 1803. He was sent as an assistant missionary to the Cherokee Indians in 1828, and spent the best of his life labouring among them. He died at the request of his brother, the late Rev. John Hotchkin, at Lenox, Mass., Oct. 28, 1867. Hotchkin was not only a minister, but also an instructor, and was active in the management of boarding and other schools. —Wilson, Presbyterian

Hot Cross-Buns, a kind of muffin or biscuit, with the figure of the cross impressed upon them, quite generally used in England by the adherents of the Church of England for breakfast on Good Friday. These biscuits are said to be derived from the Ecclesiastical Eu-logia (q. v.), formerly given as a token of friendship, or sent to the houses of those who were hindered from receiving the host. — See Staunton, Ecclesiastical Dictionary, p. 37.

Hotham (Heb. Chotham), a seal or signet, as in Exod. xxviii., 12, etc.; Sept. Xfl55W, Vulg.
Hotham, the name of two men.
1. One of the sons of Heber, the grandson of Aser (1 Chron. vii. 32). B.C. cir. 1658. He is probably the same with Helem, whose sons are enumerated in verse 35, and grisons in verse 37.
2. An officer in the army of Shama and Jehiel, two of David's champions (1 Chron. xxi. 44, where the name is Anglicized "Hotham," after the Sept. Xfl55W). B.C.
1046.

Hothir (Heb. Hothir), mishi, preserver; Sept.
TawvP, TawvP, the thirteenth son of Heman (q. v.), who, with eleven of his kinsmen, had charge of the twenty-five thousands of Levitical singers (1 Chron. xxv., 4, 58). B.C. 1014. See GIDDIALT.
Hottentots, the aboriginal inhabitants of Cape Colony, in Southern Africa. They are divided into tree large tribes: 1. the Nama, or Namaqua; 2. the Kora (Korana, Koraqua); and, 3. the Saab, or Bushmen (Bosjesman). In modern times they have been pushed northwest, and are now almost entirely driven out of the country by the Betchuanas and Kafirs. The Nama, or Namaqua, live as nomads along the Orange River, in Great Namaqualand, which is an independent country, with about 100,000 square miles, and only 40,000 inhabitants, and Little Namaqualand, which is a part of Cape Colony.
The Kora, or Korana, were about fifty years ago very numerous in the vicinity of the Vaal and Hart rivers; now they dwell as nomads on both sides of the Upper Orange River, both in Cape Colony and in the Orange Free State (q. v.). The Saab, or Bushmen, live scattered, partly in the northern districts of Cape Colony, partly in the desert Kalahary. In Cape Colony there were, according to the census of 1855, 81,598 Hottentot-tots, by the side of 181,592 Europeans, and 100,556 Kaffres, in a total population of 496,381. Little is known of the Hottentots' religion further than that they believe in a good and an evil spirit, hold feasts on the occasion of the new and full moon, and look upon certain spots as the abode of departed spirits. They have no regular priest, nor anything like an established worship, although they render especial homage to a small, shining bug. They have magicians for whom they have great respect. The Botstdtas, or Griqua, resulting from the amalgamation of Hottentots and Europeans, appear much more susceptible of mental and intellectual culture; they also form a distinct race, and a colony of 6000 of them, established at the Cat River in 1826, has been quite successful, and numbered in 1870 about 20,000, nearly all Christians; they are partly nomads, partly agriculturists. The Hottentots in Cape Colony and the Griquas no longer speak the Hottentot language, but a Dutch dialect, strongly mixed with Hottentot and Kafir words. The Hottentot language is not related to any other, and is especially different from the large South African family of languages.
The words are mostly monosyllabic, and usually end in a vowel or nasal sound. Among the consonants, f, v and y are wanting. There are many dipthongs.
Non-Africans find it impossible to imitate the guttural sounds which the Hottentots breathe with a hoarse voice from a hollow chest, as well as the four clicking sounds which are produced by a lashing of the tongue against the palate, and which in writing are represented by lines and points (l = dental; = palatal; = cerebral; = lateral). Modern linguists enumerate four dialects: 1. that of the Nama; 2. that of the Kora; 3. that of the eastern Hottentots, or Gonaquas; 4. the dead dialects of the colonial Hottentots. The substantives have three genders, masculine, feminine, and common; and three numbers, singular, dual, and plural. There are no cases; the adjective and verb are not inflected. The proper names are given as written by those who govern. The language of the Bushmen differs from that of the other Hottentots. By the Dutch conquerors of the country of the Hottentots the poor inhabitants were considered unworthy of Christianity, and even many members of the colonial churches discon- tenuously adopted the Hottentot language. The first missionary among the Hottentots began his operations in 1709, but he ceased them after a few weeks. In 1737, the Moravian missionary, G. Schmidt, gained an attentive hearing; but when, after a few years, the fruit of his labors appeared, he was compelled by the colonial government to leave. During the next fifty years no missionary was allowed to visit the Hottentots. In 1792 the Moravians succeeded in re-establishing their mission, but not until the country passed into the hands of the English did the missionaries find the necessary protection, under which their station at Baviaanskloof (at present called Genadendal) became very flourishing. The work grew steadily, and (since 1818) has extended from the Hottentots to the Kaafres. The Moravians, even as early as 1798, were joined by the London Missionary Society. The missionary Von der Kemp established in the eastern district. Several thousands of Griqua settled on the Cat River, where the station Philpott, with several out-stations, arose. Among the Kora missions have been established (since 1834) by the Berlin Missionary Society. More recently, a number of other missionary societies, of almost all the churches represented in Cape Colony, have taken part in the missions among the Hottentots. Beyond the limits of Cape Colony, the London Mission Society was the first to establish (1805) missions in Great Namaqualand. Subsequently the field was occupied by the Wesleyan Methodists and the Rheinische Missionary Society. Several stations were established by them in the north part of the country were again abandoned (Concordiaville and Wesleyvale, 1845–53), but in 1860 they still had three districts in the south—Nisabthath, Hoole's Fountain, and Jerusalem—all of which were occupied by native believers, and occasionally visited by a missioner from Cape Colony. An extensive is the work of the Rheinischen Missionary, which in 1842 established its first out-station at Bethania, and gradually advanced northwards as far as the Zwaabach. Their labors, especially at Bethania, have been very successful, and Great Namaqualand may now be regarded as a Christianized country. See Timball (Wesleyan missionary), Two Lectures on Great Namaqualand and its Inhabitants; Moo- dice, The Record, or a Series of Official Papers relative to the Condition and Treatment of the native Tribes in South Africa (Cape-town, 1858 sqq., 5 vols.). A Grammar of the Hottentot language has been published (Cape-town, 1857), and a work on etymology by Wallmann (Berlin, 1857). Hottinger, Johann Heinrich, 1, a celebrated Swiss theologian and scholar, born at Zurich March 10, 1656. He was educated at the University of Zurich, Geneva, Groningen, and Leyden. In 1682 he became professor of Church History at Zurich, and in 1693 added to it a professorship at the Carolinum. In 1656 he became professor of Oriental languages at Heidelberg, but in 1661 he returned to Zurich. In 1666, after the death of Hoornbbeck (q.v.), the University of Leyden urged Hottinger to come as his successor. He finally consented, by advice of the Swiss government, to serve that university a few years. While making his arrangements preparatory to his journey, he was drowned in the Limmat, June 5, 1667. Hottinger occupies a place in the history of Oriental studies, and is one of the 17th century, who labored to promote the knowledge of the Semitic languages. He was one of the first to bring to public notice a number of Syriac and Arabic works by giving extracts from them and biographies of their authors. He also gave a powerful impulse to the study of the Oriental languages, and at his own expense an Arabic printing-office at Heidelberg while professor in that city. The great aim of his writings was to establish the interpretation of Scripture on a more thoroughly historical and grammatical foundation; yet he rather furnished the means for such a system than established it himself. His works consist chiefly of compilations, and were valuable from the fact that they were from sources previously not generally known. He seldom gives an exegesis, but when he does it is based on grammatical and historical considerations rather than on dogmatical. His principal works are: Exercitationes Antimahometicae et Pentateucum Sama- rit. (1644) — Exercitium linguis sacrae (1647; 2d edition, 1667) — Grammatica Chaldeo-Syriaca (1688) — Hist. orientalis de Muhammadismo, Saracenoismo, Chaldaismo (1635) — Historia ecclesiastic. Novi Test. (1661-67, 9 vols.), (in Arabic), and also various biographies and counterparts of the Magdeburg Centuries. "It is less original and vigorous, but more sober and moderate." — Jus Hebraorum (1655) — Smegma orientale oppositum sordibus barbaris (1657) — Bibliotheca orientalis (Hei- delberg, 1688) — Theocritus philol. (1749) — Weyerbe- cheri, deditio novella, et auct. (1762). His last work is: Tugt der wahre Katholische Glaube zu finden sei (1647-49, 3 vols.) — Cursus theologico (1666) — Pierer: Universal Lexikon, s. v.; Kittel, Bibl. Cyclon, ii, 331; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxx, 286 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vi, 287 sq.; Hirtel, J. H. Hottinger der Orientalist a. 17 Jahrhunderts, Bayre, Hist. Dict. iii, 559 sq.; Bibliotheca Sacra, vii, 63.

Hottinger, Johann Heinrich, 2, a Swiss Protestant theologian, grandson of the preceding, was born at Zurich Dec. 5, 1681. He studied theology at the universities of Zurich, Geneva, and Amsterdam, and in 1704 was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg; in 1706 he became professor of Hebrew antiquities, and in 1710 professor of theology. To strictly Calvinistic views he added most of Cocceius's principles, and from this mixture resulted a system of his own, which he defended in his works on dogmatical theology and missionary Christianity (Franz. ed Main, 1714, 8vo). This work created great excitement: the author was accused of inculcating mystical doctrines, and was obliged to resign his position in 1717. Hottinger retired to Frankenthal, where he became pastor of the Reformed Church. In 1721 he was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg, where he died April 7, 1750. The most important of his later writings are Disquisitio de Revelationibus extraordinaris in genere et de quibusdam holernsis vulgo dictis inspiratis in specie (1717, 8vo), in which he treats of the prophecies of the Cevennes, who were just then attracting great attention; in addition —Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxxv, 239; Hilgenfeld, Zeitschrift für wissenschaftl. Theol. 1868, p. 31. (J. N. P.) Hottinger, Johann Jakob, 1, son of Johann Heinrich, No. 1, was born at Zurich Dec. 1, 1652. He studied theology at Zurich and Basle, and became, in 1690, pastor of Stellikon, near Zurich. In 1686 he was appointed professor of the language of Zurich and in 1689 professor of theology in the university of that place. He died Dec. 18, 1733. Hottinger labored earnestly to establish a union of the Protestant churches, and with that view published his Diss. de legebus et charis- tata e ecclesi. Protestantism et com. (1721). He was an ardent opponent of the Roman Church, and wrote HOUGH

HOUGH, John, D.D., 1. a distinguished English divine, born in Middlesex in 1651, and educated at Magdalene College, Oxford, of which he was elected president in 1687, in spite of the mandamus of king James II, who endeavored to procure the election to the headship of the college first of Anthony Farmer, and then of Dr. Samuel Parker, (q. v.), bishop of Oxf. and Cathol., in Ilesia, and neither of them fellows of the college, as the statute required. Lord-commissioners having been sent to enforce the royal mandates on the students, Hough, together with twenty-six out of the twenty-eight fellows of the college, courageously protested against the arbitrary proceedings, and refused to deliver the keys of the college. Finally, in Oct. 1687, Dr. Parker was by main force installed in Hough's place.

"The nation, as well as the university, looked on all this proceeding with a just indignation. It was thought an open piece of robbery and burglary, when men authorized by no legal commission came forcibly and turnerd men out of their possession and freetholds" (bishop Burnet).

"The protest of Hough was everywhere applauded; the forcing of his door was everywhere mentioned with abhorrence." Less than a year after, James II, under the pressure of political events, thought it prudent to release his stepson, and to conciliate Hough and his adherents. The former was restored to his position as president. After the Revolution, Hough became successively bishop of Oxford in 1690; of Lichfield and Coventry in 1699; and finally, after refurging the archbishopric of Canterbury, bishop of Chester in 1717. He died in 1748. Hough wrote Sermons and Charges, published with a Memoir of his Life, by William Russell, B.D. etc. (Oxf. 1821); and other occasional sermons.—Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1554; Macaulay, History of England, vol. ii; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 807; McMaster, Bibliog. HOUGH, John, D.D., 2. a Congregational minister, was born in Stamford, Conn., Aug. 17, 1788. He graduated at Yale in 1802, then studied divinity, and was sent in 1806 as missionary to Vermont, where he was ordained pastor at Vergennes in 1807. This pastorate he resigned in 1812, and became professor of languages in Middlebury College, Vt. Here he remained twenty-seven years, occupying several chairs in turn. He left in 1839, and was some time in the service of the Colonization Society. In 1841 he was installed pastor at Franconia, N.H. He obtained a dispensation in 1850, on account of failing eyesight, which finally became blindness. He died at Fort Wayne, Indiana, July 17, 1861. Hough was eminently successful and popular as an instructor. He published three sermons, preached at ordinations (1810, 1823, 1826), and was one of the editors of "The Adviser, or Vermont Evangelical Magazine."

Houghtaling, J. B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Northeast, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Oct. 9, 1797; studied law for five years, from 1813; was converted about 1817, and entered the itinerant ministry in 1822. He was appointed agent of the Troys Conference Academy in 1835, and, on account of poor health, took a supernumerary relation in 1847, which he retained until his death in 1856 or 7. He was a very useful preacher and an excellent pastor. His business abilities were fine, and he was for many years secretary of the Troy Conference, and twice assistant secretary of the General Conference. — Minutes of Conferences, 1858, (G. L. T.)

Hour (Chald. 那儿, すう, a moment, prop. a look, i. q. "the wink of an eye" [Ger. Augeblick; Greek ὥρα], a term first found in Dan. iii, 6; iv, 19, 33; v; 5; and occurring several times in the Apocrypha (Judith xx, 8; 2 Esd. ix, 44). It seems to be a vague expression for a short period, and the frequent phrase in "the same hour" means "immediately." hence we find substituted in the Targum for לילה, "in a moment" (Num. xxvi, 21, etc.). The corresponding Gr. term is frequently used in the same way by the N. T. writers (Matt. viii, 13; Luke xii, 39, etc.). The word hour is sometimes used in Scripture to denote some determinate season, as "mine hour is not yet come," "this is your hour, and the power of darkness," "the hour is coming," etc. It occurs in the Sept. as a rendering for various words meaning time, just as it does in Greek writers long before it acquired the specific meaning of our word "hour." Saath is still used in Arabic both for an hour and a moment.

The ancient Hebrews were probably unacquainted with the division of the natural day into twenty-four parts. The general distinctions of "morning, evening, and noonday" (Psa. iv, 17; comp. Gen. xv, 12; xvii, 1; xix, 1, 15, 23) were sufficient for them at first, as they were for the early Greeks (Homer, I, xxi, 8, 111); afterwards the Greeks adopted five marked periods of the day (Jul. Polux, Onom. i, 68; Dio Chrysost. Orat. in De Glor.). These periods were in the ascendant even in the time of Hesiod, and are found in a trace of this division in Matt. xx, 1-5. There is, however, no proof of the assertion sometimes made, that ὥρα in the Gospels may occasionally mean a space of three hours. It has been thought by some interpreters (see Wollf Cure in N. T. ad John xix, 11) that the evangelist John always computes the hours of the day after the Roman reckoning, i.e. from midnight to midnight (see Pliny, Hist. Nat. ii, 79; Aud. Gell. Nova Att. iii, 2), but this is without support from Hebrew analogy, and obliges the gratuitous supposition of a reckoning also from midday (against John xix, 8).

The Greeks adopted the division of the day into twelve hours from the Babylonians (Herodotus, ii, 109; comp. Rawlinson, Herod. ii, 384). At what period the Jews became acquainted with this way of reckoning is unknown, but it is generally supposed that they, too, borrowed it from the Babylonians during the captivity. (Wet. I, 5; Tholuck, ἡμί, v, 1, 5, 9; 8). There have been some such a division at a much earlier period, as has been inferred from the fact that Abaz erected a sun-dial in Jerusalem, the use of which had probably been learned from Babylon. There is, however, the strongest evidence to the contrary (A. V. "degrees," Isa. xxxvii, 8). See Dura.

It is strange that the Jews were not acquainted with this method of reckoning even earlier, for, although a purely conventional one, it is naturally suggested by the months in a year. Sir G. Wilkinson thinks that it arose from a less obvious cause (Rawlinson, Herod. ii, 384). In whatever way it originated, it was known to the Egyptians at a very early period. They divided the day into twelve hours each, the night being twice as long. They divided the hour into fifteen minutes or times, in precisely the same manner as the day. The most ancient division, however, was into three watches (A. T. iii, 6: x: 4)—the first, or beginning of the watches, as it is called (Lam. ii, 19); the middle watch (Judg. vii, 19); and the morning watch (Exod. xiv, 24). See WATCH. The Roman distribution of the night into four watches was introduced; to which division frequent allusions occur in the New Testament (Luke xii, 38; Matt. xiv, 25; xiii, 35), as well as to that of hours (Matt. xxv, 13; xxvi, 40; Mark xiv, 37; Luke xvii, 59; Acts xxiii, 23; Rev. iii, 8). See Cocks-crowing.
HOUR-GLASS STAND

There are two kinds of hours, viz. (1) the astronomical or equinoctial hour, i.e. the twenty-fourth part of a civil day, which, although "known to astronomers, was not used in the affairs of common life till towards the end of the 4th century of the Christian era" (Smith, Dict. of Classical Antiq. s. v. Hora); and (2) the natural hour (such as the Rabbis called "דובדובא, ἀκαουρία, or temporales), i.e. the twelfth part of the natural day, or of the time between sunrise and sunset, as these are the hours meant in the New Test., Josephus, and the Rabbis (John xi, 9; Acts v, 7; xix, 31; Josephus, Ant. xiv, 4, 3), and it must be remembered that they perpetually vary in length, so as to be very different at different times of the year. Besides this, the manner of reckoning the day would always mean a different length of time from an hour of the night, except at the equinoxes. From the consequent uncertainty of the term there arose the proverbial expression "not all hours are equal" (R. Joshua ap. Carpoz, App. Citt. p. 545). At the equinoxes the third hour would correspond to nine o'clock; the sixth would always be at noon. To find the exact time reckoned at other seasons of the year, we must know when the sun rises in Palestine, and reduce the hours to our reckoning accordingly (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 101). In ancient times the only way of reckoning the progress of the day was by the length of the shadow—a mode of reckoning which was both contingent upon the sunshine, and served only for the guidance of individuals. See Shadow. By what means the Jews calculated the length of their hours—whether by dialling, by the ğηπγηλή or water-clock, or by some horological contrivance, like what was used anciently in Persia (Josephus, Ant. xii, 6), and by the Romans (Martial, viii, Epig. 67; Juv. Sat. x, 214), and which is still used in India (Asiat. Researches, v, 88), a servant notifying the intervals—it is now impossible to discover (see Buttinghausen, Specim. horarum Heb. et Arab. Tr. ad Rh. 1758). Mention is also made of a curious invention of the Romans (of which there are eight in the twenty-four) are derived from these Temple hours (Goodwin, Moses and Aaron, iii, 9). See Hours, Canonical.

The Rabbis pretend that the hours were divided into 1080 הַמְלָה (minutes), and 36,848 לִילִים (seconds), which numbers were chosen because they are so easily divisible (Gem. Hier. Berachoth, 2; 4; in Roland, Ant. Heb. iv, 1, § 19). See Time.

Hour-glass Stand, a frame of iron for the hourglass, often placed near the pulpit after the Reformation in England. They were almost universally introduced in churches during the 16th century, and continued in use until about fifty years ago, to regulate the length of sermons, some of them are yet to be seen, at Wolvercote and Beckley, in Oxfordshire, and Leigh Church, in Kent. One was recently set up in the Savoy Chapel—Parker, Glossary of Architecture, p. 127; Walcot, Soc. Archaeol. p. 917.

Houris, a designation of Europeans of those imaginary beings whose company in paradise, according to the Mohammedan's belief, is to form the principal felicity of the believers. The name, derived from הָרָעָה, signifies black-eyed. They are represented in the Koran as most beautiful virgins, not created of clay, like mortal women, but of pure musk, and endowed with immortal youth, and immunity from all disease. See the Koran, chap. iv, 161 (Sale's translation); and the Pref. Disc. s. x, 4; Brandle and Cox, Dict. of Science, Liter., and Art, ii, 153.

Hours, Canonical, signifies, in ecclesiastical usage, the daily round of prayers and praise in some churches, both ancient and modern. The ancient order of these "hours" is as follows:

1. Nocturna or Matins, a service performed before daybreak (properly a night service), called vigila by the Council of Carthage (398), but afterwards the first hour after dawn; mentioned by Cyprian as midnight and matins, and by Athanasius as noxturnas and midnight (Pac. cxix, 62-147; Acts xxi, 25). Cassian says this season was first observed in the 5th century, in the monastery of Bethlehem, in memory of the nativity.

2. Lauds, a service performed at daybreak, following the matin shortly, if not actually joined on to it, mentioned by the Apostolic Canons (see above) as the first hour when the discipies were assembled at Pentecost (Acts ii, 15).

3. Prime, a service performed at about six o'clock A.M., "the first hour," mentioned by Athanasius (Pac. xxii, 2; v, 3; lix, 16).

4. Tierce or Tercce, a service performed at 9 A.M., "the third hour," mentioned by Tertullian with Sexta and None (see below), as commemorating the time when the disciples were assembled at Pentecost (Acts ii, 15).

5. Sext, a service performed at noonday, "the sixth hour," commemorating Peter's praying (Acts x, 19).

6. None, a service performed at 5 P.M., "the ninth hour," commemorating the time when Peter and John went up to the Temple (Acts iii, 1).

7. Vespera, a service performed in the early evening; mentioned by Basil, Ambrose, and Jerome, and by the Apostolic Constitutions (which we cite below), to commemorate the time when Christ instituted the Eucharist, showing it was the eve of the world. This hour is called from evening, according to St. Augustine, or the evening star, says St. Isidore. It was also known as the office and the hour of lights, as, until the 8th or 9th century, was usual in the East and at Milan; also when the lamps were lighted (Zech. xiv, 7). The Roman custom of Tierce after None came into use in the West (Walcott, Soc. Archaeol. p. 316).

8. Compline, the last evening or "bedtime service" (Pac. cxxxii, 3; first separated from Vespera by Bene dictus.)

The office of Lauds was, however, very rarely separated from that of Matins, and these eight hours of prayer were therefore practically only seven, founded on David's habit (Pac. iv, 17; cxxix, 62).

The Apostolic Constitutions (viii, 34) mention the hours as follows: "Ye shall make prayer in the morning giving thanks, because the Lord hath enlightened you, removing the night, and bringing the day; at the third hour, because the Lord then received sentence from Pilate; at the sixth, because he was crucified; at the ninth, because all things were shaken when the Lord was crucified, trembling at the audacity of the impious Jews, not enduring the sight of the friend of men, at evening giving thanks, because he hath given the night for rest from labor; at cock-crowing, because that hour gives glad tidings that the day is dawning in which to work the works of light." Cassian likewise mentions the observation of Tierce, Sext, and None in monasteries. Tertullian mentions Vespers in France before daylight. Jerome names Tierce, Sext, None, Vespera, and Lauds; also Augustine—for the two latter hours, however, substituting "Early Vigil." Archdeacon Freeman, of the Church of England, gives (Principles of Disc. Serv. i, 219 sq.) the following explanation, viz. that these offices, "though neither of apostolic nor early post-apostolic date as Church services, had, nevertheless, probably existed in a rudimentary form, as private or household devotions, from a very early period, and had been received into the number of recognised public formularies previous to the reorganization of the Western ritual after the Eastern model. Various reasons have been given for a deepening meaning in the weekly hours; one is, that they are the thanksgiving for the completion of creation on the seventh day. Another theory beautifully connects them with the acts of our Lord in his passion: Evesong with his institution of the Eucharist, and washing the disciples' feet, and the going to Gethsemane; Compline with a bloody sweat; Matins with his appearance before Caiaphas; Prime and Tiers with that in the presence of Pilate; Tiers also with his scourging, crown of thorns, and presentation to the people; Sext with his bearing the cross, the seven words, and crucifixion; None with his dismissal of his Spirit, descent into hell, and rout of the devil; Vespers with his deposition from the cross and entombment; Compline with the setting of the watch; Matins with his resurrection" (Walcott, Sacred Archael., p. 517). Of the origin of these 4 hours, 'Bingham, A Chron. of the Church of England, iii, ch. ix, p. 661 sq.) says that "they who have made the most exact inquiries can find no footsteps of them in the first three ages, but conclude that they came first into the Church with the monastic life" (compare also Pearson, Protect., in Act. Apost. num. 5, 4). It is observable further, that the writers of the writings of the 4th age, who speak of six or seven hours of prayer, speak of the observances of the monks only, and not of the whole body of the Church. Thus Jerome, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Cassian, Cæsarius, and most other writers of the early Christian Church, speak but of three hours of prayers; this, also, even Chrysostom himself, who, however, when "speaking of the monks and their institutions (Homil. 14 in 1 Tim. p. 1599), gives about the same number of canonical hours as others do." Yet it is very likely even that in some Eastern churches these hours of prayers might have been practised in the 4th century, and quite certain that the different churches observing the hours varied greatly both as to the number of the hours and the service in their first original. "At the time of the Reformation, the canonical hours were reduced in the Lutheranism Church to two, morning and evening; the Reformed Church never observed the Divine service and Cox, Dict. of Science, Literat. and Art., ii, 192). In the Church of England these services were, at the time of the English Reformation, used as distinct offices only by stricter religious persons and the clergy. At the revision of the liturgy of that Church under Edward VI, it was decided to have "only two solemn services of public worship in the day, viz. Matins, composed of matins, lauds, and prime; and Evensong, consisting of vespers and compline." In the Greek Church, Neale (Essays on Liturgyology and Church Hist., Essay i, p. 6 sq.) says "There are eight canonical hours; prayers are actually, for the most part, said three times daily - matins, lauds, and prime, by aggregation early in the morning; tierce, sexts, and the liturgy (communion) later; none, vespers, and compline, by aggregation in the evening. So, also, is it in the West. "Except in monastic bodies," says the same writer (p. 46 sq.), "the breath of church Prayer is scarcely used as a whole. You may go, we do not say from church to church, but from cathedral to cathedral of Central Europe, and never hear matins saved at high festivals. In Spain and Portugal it is somewhat more frequent, but there, as everywhere, it is a clerical devotion exclusively. The shorter hours are never publicly said except in cathedrals, and then principally by aggregation, and in connection with mass. . . . In no National Church under the sun are so many matin services said as in our own." It may not be out of place here to add that seven hours formed the basis of the "Primers" (q. v.). "English editions of these, set forth by authority in the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, and of queen Elizabeth, show that the English reformers did not wish to discourage the observance of the ancient hours of prayer. As late as 1627, by command of Charles I, bishop Cosin published a Collection of Private Devotions in the practice of the ancient Church, called the "Prayer Book for a Day," the title of which was first given by authority published by queen Elizabeth, 1550," etc. See, besides the authorities already referred to, Procter, Prayer Book, chap. i; Blunt (the Rev. material must ground for notice. The enterprise at Babel, to say nothing of Egypt, shows that the constructive arts had made considerable progress during that obscure but interesting period; for we are bound in reason to conclude that the arts possessed by man in the ages immediately following the Deluge existed before that great catastrophe. See Antiemilicians. The observations offered under Architecture will preclude the expectation of finding among this Eastern people that accomplished style of building which Vitruvius requires, or that refined taste by which the Greeks and Romans excelled the admiration of foreign nations. The tents in which the Arabs now dwell are in all probability the same as those in which the Hebr. w patriarchs spent their lives. It is not likely that what the Hebrews observed in Egypt, during their long sojourn in that country, had in this respect any direct influence upon their own subsequent practice in Palestine. See Text. Nevertheless, the information which may be derived from the figures of houses and parts of houses in the Egyptian the doors and gates, of the folds and lattices of windows, of the flat roofs, and of the wainscoting with which the walls were ornamented. Beam-ends were cut to order, to which the wainscoting was fastened by nails to render it more secure (Eza vi, 4). Houses finished in this manner were called ceiled houses and ceiled chambers (Jer. xxvii, 14; Hag. i, 4). The lower part of the walls was adorned with rich hangings of velvet or damask dyed of the liveliest colors, suspended on hooks, and taken down at pleasure (Esth. i, 6). The upper part of the walls was adorned with figures in stucco, with gold, silver, gems, and ivory; hence the expressions "ivory houses," "ivory palaces," and "chambers ornamented with ivory" (1 Kings xxi, 39; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 7; Isa. x, 10; Amos, iii, 6; Psal. cxxxv, 2). Metals were also employed to some extent—gold, silver, iron, and copper are mentioned among building materials; but especially gold and silver for various kinds of solid, plated, and inlaid work (Exod. xxxvii, 38). The ceiling, generally of wainscot, was painted with great art. In the days of Jeremiah these chambers were ceiled with costly and fragrant wood, and painted with the richest colors (Jer. xxvii, 14). (See each of these parts and materials in their alphabetical place.) The splendor and magnificence of an edifice seems to have been estimated in a measure by the size of the square stones of which it was constructed (1 Kings vii, 9). The walls were of brilliant and variegated hues (1 Chron. xxix, 2). The foundation stone, which was probably placed at the corner, and thence called the corner stone, was an object of peculiar regard, and was selected with great care from among the others (Psal. cxviii, 22; Isa. xxviii, 16; Matt. xxi, 42; and gnyw, Deut. xvi, 6). The materials in buildings, as far as we can ascertain from the ruins which yet remain, were held together not by mortar or cement of any kind, except a very small quantity indeed might have been used, but by cramp-irons. Walls in some cases appear to have been covered with a composition of chalk and lime (Deut. xvi, 6), or gypsum (Acts xxiii, 3). See Chardin's Voyages, ed. Langles, vol. iv). The tiles dried in the sun were at first united by mud placed between them, afterwards by lime mixed with sand to form mortar. The latter was used with burnt tiles (Lev. xiv, 41, 42; Jer. xiii, 9). For the external decoration of large buildings marble columns were employed (Cant. v, 15). The Persians also took great delight in marble. To this not only the ruins of Persepolis testify, but the Book of Esther, where mention is made of white, red, and black marble, and likewise of veined marble. See Scriptutae Notae. The Apadana seems to receive no illustration from the recently discovered monuments of the Mesopotamian mounds, as no private houses, either of Assyria or Babylonia, have been preserved; owing doubtless to their having been constructed of perishable mud walls, at most inclosed only with thin slabs of alabaster (Layard's Nineveh, ii, 214). See Temples.

The Hebrews at a very ancient date, like the Orientals, had not only summer and winter rooms (Jer. xxxvi, 22; see Chardin, iv, 119), but palaces (Judg. iii, 30; 1 Kings vii, 2-6; Amos iii, 15). The houses, or palaces so called, made for summer residence, were very spacious. The lower stories were frequently under ground. The front of these buildings faced the north, so as to secure the advantage of the breezes, which in summer blow from that direction. They were supplied with a current of fresh air by means of ventilators, which consisted of perforations made through the upper part of the northern wall, of construction similar to external chimneys in size as they approached the inside of the wall. See Dwelling.

Houses for Jewels and armor were built and furnished under the kings (2 Kings xx, 13). The draught-house (אָבָּ֗יו [אָבָּיו] רֹאָ֖ם [רֹאָם] לְסִנְיָ֑ר [לְסִנְיָ֑ר] לְסִנְיָ֑ר) was doubtless a public gate three, such as are found in modern Eastern cities (2 Kings x, 27; Russell, l, 34).

Leprosy in the house was probably a nitrous efflorescence on the walls, which was injurious to the salubrity of the house, and whose removal was therefore strictly enjoined by the law (Lev. xiv, 34, 55; Kitto, Phys. Geogr. of Pal. p. 112).

III. Details of Hebrew Dwellings.—In inferring the plan and arrangement of ancient Jewish or Oriental houses, as alluded to in Scripture, from existing dwellings in Syria, Egypt, and the East in general, allowance must be made for the differences in climate between Egypt, Persia, and Palestine, a cause from which would proceed differences in certain cases of material and construction, as well as of domestic arrangement.

1. The houses of the rural poor in Egypt, as well as in most parts of Syria, Arabia, and Persia, are for the most part mere huts of mud, or sun-burnt bricks. In some parts of Palestine and Arabia stone is used, and in certain districts caves in the rock are used as dwellings (Amos v, 11; Bartlett, Walks, p. 117). See Cave. The houses are usually of one story only, viz. the ground floor, and sometimes contain only one apartment. Sometimes a small court for the cattle is attached; and in some cases the cattle are housed in the same building, or the people live on a raised platform, and the cattle round them on the ground (1 Sam. xxviii., 24; Irby and Mangles, p. 70; Jolliffe, Letters, i, 43; Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 170; Burckhardt, Travels, ii, 119). In Lower Egypt the oxen occupy the width of the chamber farthest from the entrance: it is built of brick or mud, about four feet high, and the top is often used as a sleeping-place in winter. The windows are small apertures high up in the walls, sometimes grated with wood (Burckhardt, Travels, i, 241; ii, 101, 119, 301, 329; Lane, Mod. Egyptians, i, 44). The roofs are commonly, but not always, flat, and are usually formed of a plaster of mud and straw laid upon boughs or rafters; and upon the flat roofs, tents or "booths" of boughs or rushes are often raised to be used as sleeping-places in summer (Irby and Mangles, p. 71; Niebuhr, Descr. p. 49, 53; Layard, Nineveh and Bab, p. 112; Niebuhr, i, 176; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 280; Travels, i, 190; Van Egmont, ii, 32; Malan, Magdala and Bethany, p. 15). To this description the houses of ancient Egypt, and also of Assyria, as represented in the monuments, in great measure correspond (Layard, Mon. of Nin. pt. ii, pl. 49, 50; Wilkinson, Ancient Eg. i, 13; Martineau, East, I, 78, i, 19, 97). In the towns the houses of the inferior kind do not differ much from the above description, but they are sometimes of more than one story, and the roof-terraces are more carefully constructed. In Palestine they are often of stone (Jolliffe, i, 26). In the inferior kinds of Oriental dwellings, such as are met with in villages and very small towns, there is no central court, but there is generally a shaded platform in front. The village cabins and abodes of the peasantry are, of course, of a still inferior description; and, being the abodes of people who live much in the open air, will not bear comparison with the houses of the same class in Northern Europe, where the cottage is the home of the owner. (See Jahn, Bibl. Archæol. translated by Prof. Upham, pt. i, ch. ii.)

2. The difference between the poorest houses and those of the class next above them is greater than between these and the houses of the first rank. The prevailing plan of Eastern houses of this class presents, as was the case in ancient Egypt, a front of wall, whose blank and mean appearance is usually relieved only by the door and a few latticed and projecting windows (Vince in Syria, ii, 25). The privacy of Oriental domestic habits would render our plan of throwing the front of the house towards the street most repulsive. The doorway or door bears an inscription from the Koran as the ancient Egyptian house had inscriptions over their doors, and as the Israelites were directed to write sentences from the Law over their gates. See MEZZUZAH. Over the door is usually the kiosk (sometimes projecting, like a bay-window), or screened balcony, probably the "summer parlor" in which Ehud smote the king of Moab (Judg. iii. 20), and the chamber on the wall." which the Semnites prepared for the prophet (2 Kings iv. 10). In this case there may be a small latticed window or two high up the wall, giving light and air to upper chambers, which, except in times of public celebrations, is usually closed (2 Kings ix. 30; Shaw, Travels, p. 207; Lane, Mod. Eg., 1, 39). This upper room is usually guarded within from sight by a wall or some arrangement of the passages. In the passage is a stone seat for the porter and other servants (Lane, Mod. Eg., 1, 32; Chardin, Voy., iv. 111). See Door.

The buildings which form the house front towards an inner square or court. Small houses have one of these courts, but superior houses have two, and first-rate houses three, communicating with each other; for the Orientals dislike ascending to their friends and clients. This is entirely open in front, and, being richly fitted up, has a splendid appearance when the first view of it is obtained. A refreshing coolness is sometimes given to this apartment by a fountain throwing up a jet of water in front of it. This is the κατολέμπα, or guest-chamber, of Luke xxii. 11; not necessarily an ἀνάγκη or upper chamber, as in verse 12. A large portion of the other side of the court is occupied with a frontage of lattice-work filled with colored glass, belonging to a room as large as the guest-chamber, and which in winter is used for the same purpose, or serves as the apartment of any visitor of distinction, who cannot, of course, be admitted into the interior parts of the house. The other apartments in this outer court are comparatively small, and are used for the accommodation of visitors, retainers, and servants. See GUEST-CHAMBER.

In the better class of houses in modern Egypt, the above ground-floor room is generally the apartment for male visitors, called madrasah, having a portion of the floor sunk below the rest, called darkādā. This is often paved with marble or colored tiles, and has in the centre a fountain. The rest of the floor is a raised platform called liwān, with a mattress and cushions at the back on each of the three sides. This seat or sofa is called diwān. Every person, on entrance, takes off his shoes on the darkādā before stepping on the liwān (Exod. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15; Luke vii. 38). The ceilings over the liwān and darkādā are often richly panelled and ornamented (Jer. xxii. 14; 2 Cor. ix. 10).

Bearing in mind that the reception-room is raised above the level of the court (Chardin, iv. 118; Vies in Syria, i. 56), we may, in explaining the circumstances of the miracle of the paralytic (Mark ii. 3; Luke v. 18), suppose, 1. either that our Lord was standing under the veranda, and the people in front in the court. The bearers of the sick man ascended the stairs to the roof of the house, and, taking off a portion of the boarded covering of the veranda, or removing the awning over the impluvium, ῥό μᾶλα, in the former case let down the bed through the veranda roof, or in the latter, down by way of the roof, ῥό ῥω ἐξελεύσα, and deposited it before the Saviour (Shaw, p. 212). 2. Another explanation presents itself in considering the room where the company were assembled as the τερτιόν, and the roof opened for the bed to be the true roof of the house (Trench, Miracles, p. 199; Lane, Modern Eg., i. 88).
HOUSE

And one still more simple is found in regarding the house as one of the rude dwellings now to be seen near the Sea of Galilee, a mere room "ten or twelve feet high, and as many or more square," with no opening except the door. The roof, used as a sleeping-place, is reached by a ladder from the outside, and the Learners of the paralytic, unable to approach the door, would thus have ascended the roof, and, having uncovered it (ἐνεργείας Ἰησοῦ), let him down into the room where our Lord was (Malan, L. c.). See below.

Besides the mandaraash some houses in Cairo have an apartment called maκad, open in front to the court, with two or more arches, and a railing; and a pillar to support the wall above (Lane, i, 36). It was in a chamber of this kind, probably one of the largest size to be found in a palace, that our Lord was arraigned before the high-priest at the time when the denial of him by Peter took place. He "turned and looked on Peter as he stood by the fire in the court" (Luke xxii, 56, 61; John xviii, 24), while he himself was in the "hall of judgment," the maκad. Such was the "porch of judgment" built by Solomon (1 Kings vii, 7), which finds a parallel in the golden alcove of Mohammed Uzbek (in Batuta, Travels, p. 76, ed. Lez). See P. Frotsr.

Part of the Court of a House in Cairo, with Makad (Lane).

RUM. The circumstance of Samson's pulling down the house by means of the pillars, may be explained by the fact that the company being assembled on tiers of balconies above each other, supported by central pillars on the basement; when these were pulled down, the whole of the upper floors would fall also (Judg. xvi, 26; see Shaw, p. 211). See PILLAR.

When there is no second floor, but more than one court, the women's apartments (Arabic haran or haram, secluded or prohibited, with which may be compared the Hebrew Armon, בַּרְוֹנָה, Stanley, S. and P. App. § 92), are usually in the second court; otherwise they form a separate building within the general inclosure, or are above on the first floor (Vine's in Syria, i, 56). The entrance to the harem, as observed above, is crossed by no one but the master of the house and the domestics belonging to the female establishment. Though this remark would not apply in the same degree to Jewish habits, the privacy of the women's apartments may possibly be indicated by the "inner chamber" (בְּאוֹר, ṭαֶרֶשׁ; cæstum, cubiculum), resorted to as a hiding-place (1 Kings xx, 30; xxii, 25; see Judg. xvi, 1). Solomon, in his marriage with a foreigner, introduced also foreign usage in this respect, which was carried further in subsequent times (1 Kings vii, 9; 2 Kings xxii, 15). The harem of the Persian monarch (قانون; ألعاب; ṭarash, do-muchas). There are usually no fireplaces except in the kitchen, the furniture of which consists of a sort of raised platform of brick, with receptacles in it for fire, answering to the "boiling-places" (שִׁפַּיֶּם; σαγβήτια; σινόμα) of Ezekiel (xli, 28; see Lane, i, 41; Gesenius, Thes. p. 249). In these different compartments the various dishes of an Eastern feast may be at once prepared at charcoal fires. This place being wholly open in front, the half-tame doves, which have their nests in the trees of the court, often visit it, in the absence of the servants, in search of crumbs, etc. As they sometimes blacken themselves, this perhaps explains the obscure passage in Psa. lxxviii, 13, "Though ye have lien among the jotes [but Gesenius renders "sheepfolds"], ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver," etc.

Besides the mandaraash, there is sometimes a second room, either on the ground or the upper floor, called kâbâsh, fitted with divans, and at the corners of these rooms portions taken off and inclosed form retiring rooms (Lane, i, 21; Russell, i, 31, 33). While speaking of the interior of the house, we may observe, that on the diwan, the corner is the place of honor, which is never quitted by the master of the house in receiving strangers (Russell, i, 27; Malan, Tyre and Sidon, p. 38). When there is an upper story, the kâbâsh forms the most important apartment, and thus probably answers to the νεονικόν, which was often the "guest-chamber" (Luke

Interior of a House (Harem) in Damascus.

Sometimes the divân is raised sufficiently to allow of cellars underneath for stores of all kinds (roπίστα, Matt. xxiv, 26; Russell, i, 32). This basement is occupied by various offices, stores of corn and fuel, places for the water-jars to stand in, places for grinding corn, baths, kitchens, etc. In Turkish Arabia most of the houses have underground cellars or vaults, to which the inhabitants retreat during the midday heat of summer, and there enjoy a fresh cooling breeze. We do not discover any notice of this usage in Scripture. But at Acre the substructions of very ancient houses were some years ago discovered, having such cellars, which were very probably subservient to this use. In the rest of the year, these cellars, or serdabs, as they are called, are abandoned to the bats, which swarm in them in scarcely credible numbers (Isa. ii, 20).

The kitchens are always in this inner court, as the cooking is performed by women, and the ladies of the family superintend or actually assist in the process. The kitchen, open in front, is on the same side as the entrance from the outer court; and the top of it forms a terrace, which affords a communication between the first floor of both courts by a private door, seldom used but by the master of the house and attendant eunuchs. There are usually no fireplaces except in the kitchen, the furniture of which consists of a sort of raised platform of brick, with receptacles in it for fire, answering to the "boiling-places" (שִׁפַּיֶּם; σαγβήτια; σινόμα) of Ezekiel (xli, 28; see Lane, i, 41; Gesenius, Thes. p. 249). In these different compartments the various dishes of an Eastern feast may be at once prepared at charcoal fires. This place being wholly open in front, the half-tame doves, which have their nests in the trees of the court, often visit it, in the absence of the servants, in search of crumbs, etc. As they sometimes blacken themselves, this perhaps explains the obscure passage in Psa. lxxviii, 13, "Though ye have lien among the jotes [but Gesenius renders "sheepfolds"], ye shall be as the wings of a dove covered with silver," etc.

Besides the mandaraash, there is sometimes a second room, either on the ground or the upper floor, called kâbâsh, fitted with divans, and at the corners of these rooms portions taken off and inclosed form retiring rooms (Lane, i, 21; Russell, i, 31, 33). While speaking of the interior of the house, we may observe, that on the diwan, the corner is the place of honor, which is never quitted by the master of the house in receiving strangers (Russell, i, 27; Malan, Tyre and Sidon, p. 38). When there is an upper story, the kâbâsh forms the most important apartment, and thus probably answers to the νεονικόν, which was often the "guest-chamber" (Luke cooking, and where there was an opening immediately over the hearth to let out the smoke. In the better sort of houses the rooms were warmed in winter by charcoal in braziers (Jer. xxxvi, 22; Mark xiv, 54; John xviii, 18), as is still the practice (Russell, i, 21; Lane, i, 41; Chardin, iv, 120), or a fire of wood might be kindled in the open court of the house (Luke xxii, 56). See Finch.

There are usually no doors to the sitting or drawing-rooms of Eastern houses: they are closed by curtains, at least in summer, the opening and shutting of doors being odious to most Orientals. The same seems to have been the case among the Hebrews, as far as we may judge from the curtains which served instead of doors to the tabernacle, and which separated the inner and outer chambers of the Temple. The outer doors are closed with a wooden lock (Lane, i, 42; Chardin, iv, 123; Russell, i, 21). See Lock; Curtain.

The windows had no glass; they were only lattice, and thus gave free passage to the air and admitted light, while birds and bats were excluded. In winter the cold air was kept out by veils over the windows, or by shutters with holes in them sufficient to admit light (1 Kings vii, 17; Cant. ii, 9). The apertures of the windows in Egyptian and Eastern houses generally are small, in order to exclude heat (Wilkinson, Ant. Egy., i, 124). They are closed with a folding valve, secured with a bolt or bar. The windows often project considerably beyond the lower part of the building, so as to overlap the street. The windows of the courts within also project (Jowett, Christian Res. p. 66, 67). The lattice is generally kept closed, but can be opened at pleasure, and is opened on great public occasions (Lane, Mod. Egypt, i, 27). Those within can look through the lattices, without opening them or being seen themselves; and in some rooms, especially the large upper room, there are several windows. From the allusions in Scripture we gather, that while there was usually but one window in each room, in which invariably there was a lattice (Judg. vii, 12, 13).

The inner court is entered by a passage and door similar to those on the street, and usually situated at one of the innermost corners of the outer court. The inner court is generally much larger than the former. It is for the most part paved, excepting a portion in the middle, which is planted with trees (usually two) and shrubs, with a basin of water in the midst. That the Jews had the like arrangement of trees in the courts of their houses, and that the birds nested in them, appears from Ps. lxxxi, 2, 3. They had also the basin of water in the inner court or atrium, and among them it was used for bathing, as is shown by David's discovering Bathsheba baring as he walked on the roof of his palace. The arrangement of the inner court is very similar to that of the outer, but the whole is more open and airy. The buildings usually occupy two sides of the square, of which the one opposite the entrance contains the principal apartments. They are upon what we should call the first floor, and open into a wide gallery or veranda, which in good houses is nine or ten feet deep, and covered by a wooden penthouse supported by a row of wooden columns. This terrace or gallery is furnished with a strong wooden balustrade, and is usually paved with squared stones, or else floored with boards. In the centre of the principal front is the usual open drawing-room, on which the best art of the Eastern decorator is expended. Much of one of the sides of the court front is usually occupied by the large sitting-room, with the latticed front covered with colored glass, similar to that in the outer court. The other rooms, of smaller size, are the more private apartments of the mansion.

No ancient houses had chimneys. The word so translated in Hos. xiii, 5, means a hole through which the smoke escaped; and this existed only in the lower class of dwellings, where raw wood was employed for fuel or

28, where "a window" is in Heb. "the window." Josh. ii, 15; 2 Sam. vi, 16, in Heb. "the window"; 2 Kings ix, 30, do.; Acts xx, 9, do.; there were sometimes several windows (2 Kings xiii, 17). The room here spoken of was probably such an upper room as Robinson describes above with many windows (I sa. iii, 417). Daniel's room had several windows, and his lattices were opened when his enemies found him in prayer (Dan. vi, 10). The projecting nature of the window, and the fact that a divan, or raised seat, encircles the interior of each, so that usually persons sitting in the window are seated close to the aperture, easily explains how Ahaziah may have fallen from the flat roof and broken his head. It was Eutychus from his window-seat, especially if the lattices were open at the time (2 Kings i, 2; Acts xx, 9). See Window.

There are usually no special bedrooms in Eastern houses, and thus the room in which Yahosheth was murdered was probably an ordinary room with a flat roof, on which he was sleeping during the heat of the day (2 Sam. iv, 5, 6; Lane, i, 41). See Beichamber.

The stairs to the upper apartments are in Syria usually in a corner of the court (Robinson, iii, 502). When there is no upper story the lower rooms are usually loftier. In Persia they are open from top to bottom, and only divided from the court by a low partition (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg., i, 10; Charlin, iv, 119; Burekhardt, Travels, i, 18, 19; Vines in Syria, i, 66). This flight of stone steps conducts to the gallery, from which a plainer stair leads to the house-top. If the house be large, there are two or three sets of steps to the different sides of the quadrangle, but seldom more than one flight from the terrace to the house-top of any one court. There is, however, a separate stair from the outer court to the roof, and it is usually near the entrance. This will bring to mind the case of the paralytic, noticed above, whose friends, finding they could not get access to Jesus through the people who crowded the court of the house in which he was preaching, took him up to the roof, and let him down in his bed through the tiling to the place where Jesus stood (Luke v, 17-26). If the house in which our Lord then was bad more than one court, he and the auditors were certainly in the outer one; and it is reasonable to conclude that he stood in the veranda addressing the crowd below. The men bearing the paralytic, therefore, perhaps went up the steps near the door; and finding they could not even then get near the person of Jesus, the gallery being also crowded, continued their course to the roof of the house, and removing the boards over the covering of the gallery, at the place where Jesus stood, lowered the sick man to his feet. But if they could not get access to the steps near the door, as is likely, from the door being much crowded, their alternative was to take him to the roof of the next house, and there hoist him over the parapet to the roof of the house which they desired to enter. (See Strong's Han., and Expos. of the Gospels, p. 64.) See Stairs.

The roof of the house is, of course, flat. It is formed by layers of branches, twigs, matting, and earth, laid over the rafters, and trodden down; after which it is covered with a compost that acquires considerable hardness when dry. Such roofs would not, however, endure the heavy and continuous rains of our climate; and in those parts of Asia where the climate is more than usually moist, a stone roller is usually kept on every roof, and a shower of pears or a strong gale of wind will on occasion is engaged in drawing these rollers over the roofs. It is now very common, in countries where timber is scarce, to have domed roofs; but in that case the flat roof, which is indispensable to Eastern habits, is obtained by filling up the hollow intervals between the several domes, so as to form a flat surface at the top. These flat roofs are often alluded to in Scripture, and the allusions show that they were made to serve the same uses as at present. In fine weather the inhabitants resort much to them to breathe the fresh air, to enjoy a fine prospect, or to witness any event that occurred in the neighborhood (2 Sam. xi, 1; Isa. xxii, 1; Matt. xxiv, 17; Mark xiii, 15). The dry air of the summer atmosphere enabled them, without injury to health, to enjoy the bracing coolness of the night-air by sleeping on the house-tops; and in order to have the benefit of the air and prospect in the daytime, they would remove their tents from the sun, sheets, beds, and tents were sometimes erected on the house-tops (2 Sam. xvi, 22). See House-top.

The roofs of the houses are well protected by walls and parapets. Towards the street and neighboring houses is a high wall, and towards the court, whose walls usually a parapet or wooden rail. "Battlements" of this kind, for the prevention of accidents, are strictly enjoined in the law (Dent. xxii, 8), and the form of the battlements of Egyptian houses suggest some interesting analogies, if we consider how recently the Israelites had quitted Egypt when that law was delivered. See Battlement.

In the East, where the climate allows the people to spend so much of their time out of doors, the art of furnishing and the domestic utensils have always been few and simple. See Bed; Lamp; Pottery; Seat; Table. The rooms, however, although comparatively vacant of moveables, are far from having a naked or unfurnished appearance. This is owing to the high degree of ornament given to the walls and ceilings. The walls are broken up into various recesses, and the ceiling into compartments. The ceiling, if of wood and flat, is of curious and complicated joinery; or, if vaulted, is wrought into numerous coves, and enriched with fretwork in stucco; and the walls are adorned with arabesques, mosaics, mirrors, painting, and gold, which, as set off by the marble-like whiteness of the stucco, has a truly brilliant and rich effect. There is much in this to remind one of such descriptions of splendid interiors as that in Isa. liv, 11, 12.—Smith; Kitto; Fairbairn. See Ceiling.

IV. Metaphori aly—The word house has some figurative applications in Scripture. Heaven is considered the house of God (John xiv, 2); "In my Father's house are many mansions." Here is an evident allusion to the Temple (q. v.), with its many rooms, which is emphatically styled in the Old Testament "the House of the Lord." The grave is the house appointed for all the living (Job xxx, 23; Isa. xix, 18). House is taken for the body (2 Cor. v, 1): "If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, as our bodies were taken to pieces by death. The comparison of the body to a house is used by Mr. Harmer to explain the similes, Eccles. xii. 3, and is illustrated by a passage in Plautus (Mostei, i, 2). The Church gives it this as its house (Gen. xliii, 15): "How thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, that is, the Church of the living God." In the same sense, Moses was faithful in all the house of God as a servant, but Christ as a son over his own house: whose house are we (Christians). But this sense may include that of household, persons composing the attendants or retainers to a prince, etc. This intimate reference of house or dwelling to the adherents, intimates, or partisans of the householder, is probably the foundation of the simile used by the apostle Peter (1 Pet. ii, 5): "Ye (Christians), as living stones, are built up into a spiritual house." Gen. xxlii, 16: "Joseph said to the ruler of his house:" i. e. to the manager of his domestic concerns. Isa. xxxvi, 3: "Eliakim, who was over the house, or household," i. e. his steward. Gen. xxx, 30: "When shall I provide for mine own house also?" i. e. get wealth to provide for his family (see 1 Tim. vi, 17). Gen. xlii, 1: "Enter thou and all thy house (family) into the ark." Exod. i, 21: "And it came to pass, because the midwives feared God, that he made them house." i. e. he prospered their families. So also in 1 Sam. i, 35; 2 Sam. vii, 27; 1 Kings xi, 38. Thus the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house (Gen. xii, 17). "What is my house, that thou hast brought me hither?" (2 Sam. vii, 18). So Joseph (Luke i, 27; ii, 4) was of the house of David, but more especially he was of his royal lineage, or family; and, as we conceive, in the direct line or eldest branch of the family, so that he was next to king, if the throne, if the government had still continued in possession of the descendants of David (see also 1 Tim. v, 8). 2 Sam. vii, 11: "Also the Lord telleth thee that he will make thee a house," i. e. he will give thee offspring, who may receive and may possess the royal dignity. Psa. cxlix, 12: "Their inward thought is that their houses shall continue forever," i. e. that their posterity shall always flourish.—Calmet; Weiss. See Householder.

House of God, a name frequently given to the edifice in which Christians assemble for the worship of God, not because God dwells there by any visible or special presence, as of old he "dwelt between the cherubims," but because it is dedicated to God, and set apart for his service. It is thus synonymous with the word "church" in that modern use of it by which it signifies a building (Eden). See Bethel; House; Temple.

House of Prayer, places where persons assemble to pray, and to receive religious instruction, but where the sacraments are not administered. It is the general name of the Protestant churches in Hungary; and was such in Silesia under the Austrian rule, to distinguish them from the Roman Catholic places of worship. It is also used in Germany to designate the churches of such sects as are not officially recognised, as the Moravians, etc. The synagogues are also called houses of prayer (Isa. iv, 7).—Pierer, Univ. Lex. s. v. See Priests.

Household (usually same in the orig. as "house"), the members of a family residing in the same abode, including servants and dependants, although in Job i, 3 a distinction (not observed in the A. V.) is intimated by the term ἀδελφός, abudosh: "lit. service ("servants," Gen. xxvi, 24), between the domestics and the ἀδελφός, boy'lih, or proper family of the master of the house; and some have thought a like difference to be denoted between the Greek term ἀδελφός (lit. residence) and ἀδελφὸς of the N. T., which are both indiscriminately rendered "house" and "household" in the Eng. Version. This latter view is confirmed by the improbability that any of the immediate imperial family (Nero's) should have been included in the conuerra to Christianity expressed in the phrase they of Caesar's household (οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος ἀδελφοῦ, Phil. iv, 22). See Cesar.

Householder (οἰκοτεύτωρ, master of the house, as rendered Matt. x, 25; Luke xiii, 25; xiv, 21), the male head of a family (Matt. xiii, 27, 22; xx, 1; xxii, 25). There are monograms on the parable Matt. xx, by Feuzelein, De scrbl. proferentis et thesauro novo et re- tera (Alt. 1730); Bagewitz, De scrib. docto (Rost. 1720). See Goodman of the house.

House, "the old Saxon name for the Eucharist, supposed by some to be from the Gothic thamau, a victim."—Edie, Eccles. Dictionary, p. 315.

House-top (θι, pag, δώμα), the flat roof of an Oriental house, for such is usually their form, though there are sometimes domes over some of the rooms. The flat portions are plastered with a composition of mortar, tar, ashes, and sand, which in time becomes very hard, but which becomes soft when not laid on at the proper season is apt to crack in winter, and the rain is thus admitted. In order to prevent this, every roof is provided with a roller, which is set at work after rain. In many cases the terrace roof is little better than earth rolled hard. On ill-compact ed roofs grass is often found springing into a short-lived existence. (Prov. xix, 18; xxvii, 16; Psa. cxix, 6, 7; Isa. xxxvii, 27; Shaw, p. 210; Lane, i, 27; Robinon, iii, 99, 44, 60). See Grasses.

Modern Egyptian House-tops.

In no point do Oriental domestic habits differ more from European than in the use of the roof (Hackett, Ilust. of Scripture, p. 71 sq.). Its flat surface is made useful for various household purposes (Josh. ii, 6), as drying corn, hanging up linen, and preparing figs and raisins (Shaw, p. 211; Burckhardt, Trav. i, 191; Bartlett, Footsteps of our Lord, p. 199). The roofs are used almost universally as places of recreation in the evening, and often as sleeping-places at night (2 Sam. xi, 2; xvii, 22; Dan. iv, 29; 1 Sam. ix, 25, 26; Job xxvi, 18; Prov. xxi, 9; Shaw, p. 211; Russell, i, 35; Chardin, iv, 116; Layard, Nineveh, i, 177). They were also used as places for devotion, and even idolatrous worship (Jer. xxxii, 29; xix, 13; 2 Kings xxiii, 12; Zeph i, 5; Acts x, 9). At the time of the Feast of Tabernacles booths were erected by the Jews on the tops of their houses, as in the present day huts of boughs are sometimes erected.
HOUSE-TOP

on the house-tops as sleeping-places, or places of retirement from the heat in summer time (Neh. viii, 16; Burchhardt, Syria, p. 280). As among the Jews the seclusion of women was not carried to the extent of Mohammedan usage, it is probable that the house-top was made, as it is among Christian inhabitants, more a place of public meeting both for men and women, than is the case among Mohammedans, who carefully seclude their roofs from inspection by partitions (Burchhardt, Trav. i, 191; compare Wilkinson, i, 23). The Christians at Aleppo, in Russell's time, lived contiguous, and made their house-tops a means of mutual communication to avoid passing through the streets in time of plague (Russell, i, 35). In the same manner, the house-top might be made a means of escape by the stairs by which it was reached without entering any of the apartments of the house (Matt. xxiv, 17; s, 27; Luke xii, 3). Both Jews and heathens were in the habit of wailing publicly on the house-tops (Isa. xv, 3; xxii, 1; Jer. xlviii, 38). The expression used by Solomon, "dwelling upon the house-top" (Prov. xxi, 9), is illustrated by the frequent custom of building chambers and rooms along the side and at the corners of the open space or terrace which often constitutes a kind of upper story (Hackett, n.s. sup. p. 74). Or it may refer to the fact that booths are sometimes constructed of branches and leaves upon the roof.

Ancient Egyptian flat Roof supported by a Datoridae, which, although of cramped dimensions, furnish a cool and quiet retreat, not unsuitable as a relief from a clamorous wife (Pococke, Travels, ii, 69). It is obvious that such a place would be convenient for observation (Isa. xcvii, 1), and for the proclamation of news (Luke xi, 8; comp. Thomson, Land and Book, i, 51). See Room.

Protection of the roof by parapets was enjoined by the law (Deut. xxii, 8). The parapets thus constructed, of which the types may be seen in ancient Egyptian houses, were sometimes of open work, and it is to a fall through or over one of these that the injury by which Ahaziah suffered is sometimes ascribed (Shaw, p. 211). To pass over the roofs in ploughing purposes, as well as for safety, would be no difficult matter (Joel, ii, 9). In ancient Egyptian, and also in Assyrian houses, a sort of raised story was sometimes built above the roof, and in the former an open chamber, roofed or covered with awning, was sometimes erected on the house-top (Wilkinson, i, 214; Layard, Mon. of Nin. ii, pl. 49, 36).—Smith. Housay, Brother Jean de, a distinguished member of an order of hermits who lived on Mount Valerian, near Paris, was born at Chaillot in 1539. These pious men formed a community of their own, distinct from the outer world, and took the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Housay died Aug. 3, 1609.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxv, 271. See VALERIAN MONKS. (J. H. W.)

Housta, Baton de, an Augustinian monk, was born at Toulouse in the early part of the 18th century, and distinguished himself greatly by his piety and erudition. He is especially celebrated as the would-be critic of Fleury's work on ecclesiastical history, which he attacked in a work entitled Mauvaise faveur de M. Fleury, prouvée par plusieurs passages des saints Pères, des conciles et d'auteurs ecclésiastiques qu'il a omis, trompés ou infidèlement traduits dans son histoire (Maines, 1755, 8vo.). Of course the monk, from his narrow and biased standpoint, was unable to comprehend the greatness of Fleury and the liberality of his views, and he endeavored to ridicule Fleury, and stamp him as an infidel. Housta died at Enguizen in 1760.—Chauveau and Delandine, Nouv. Dict. Hist. vi, 315 sq.; Fuller, Dict. Hist. ix, 45. (J. H. W.) Housteville, Alexandre Claude François, a French theologian, was born at Paris in 1688, became a member of the Congregation of the Oratory in 1704, and remained such for some eighteen years. He was then appointed secretary to cardinal Dubois. In 1722 he published Le Véritable des religion chrétiennes prouvé par les faits (Paris, 4to; new ed. Paris, 1749, 4 vols. 12mo), "which had a wonderful though scarcely deserved popularity at one time" (Hook, Eccles. Biog. vi, 198), and Provoked considerable controversy. In 1723 he was made abbé of St. Vincent du Bourg-sur-Mer, in the diocese of Dax. In 1728 he published Essai critique sur la Providence. In 1740 he published a second edition of his Vérité de la religion chrétienne (Paris, 3 vols. 4to). This edition, greatly enlarged, contains a historical and critical discourse upon the method of the principal authors who wrote for and against Christianity from its beginning (which was translated and published separately, with a Dissertation on the Life of Apollonius Tyaneus, and some Observations on the Platonists of the latter School, Lond. 1739, 8vo). "It contains little information concerning the authors or the events, but a clearly and correctly written analysis of their works and principles" (Farrar, Crit. History of Free Thought, p. xv). In 1742 he was honored with the appointment of "perpetual secretary" to the French Academy. He died Nov. 8, 1742.—Biographie Univ. xx, 620 sq.; Chauveau and Delandine, Nouv. Dict. Hist. vi, 316; Dict. des Ecrit. 2, 355 sq. (J. H. W.)

Hovel or Housing is a term applied to a canopy or niche.—Walcott, Soc. Archæol. p. 318.

Hovey, Jonathan Parsons, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Waybridge, Vt., Oct. 10, 1810. He received a collegiate education at Jacksonville, Ill., and South Hanover, Ind. He studied theology at Auburn Seminary, and was ordained for the ministry March, 1837. He was settled four times: first at Gaines, N.Y.; then at Burdette, N.Y.; then at Richmond, Vt.; and from September, 1859, for thirteen years, in New York City. "His church occupied a difficult field. It was surrounded by German Catholics, and by those who valued little, though they greatly needed, the institutions of the Gospel. Here he labored with signal fidelity and usefulness. Several revivals were enjoyed during his ministry, and many additions were made to the German congregation. He presided at the synod in which the formal union was consummated, and as chaplain of the 1st Regiment New York State Volunteers, and continued with them during their entire period of service, at the expiration of which he returned again to his charge in New York City. He died there Dec. 16, 1865.—Wilson's Presb. Hist. Alm., 1864, p. 905 so.

Rev. Dr. Field, in the Christian Intelligencer, Dec. 24, 1863.

How, Samuel B., D.D. was born in 1788, graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1710, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1813. He was settled successively in Presbyterian churches at Salisbury, Pa., 1813-15; Trenton, N. J., 1815-21; and New Brunswick, N. J., 1821-23. From 1822 to 1827 he was pastor of the Independent Church at Sayreville, N. J., and in 1827 moved to New York, where he was called to the presidency of Dickinson College, Pa., 1830-31. In 1832 he accepted the charge of the First Reformed Dutch Church in New Brunswick, N. J., but resigned on account of ill health in 1861. In all these positions his fine classical scholarship, upright and extensive religious knowledge, and his learning were studiously maintained and conspicuously displayed. Devout, conscientious, a Christian gentleman in the best sense of the term, a most faithful preacher and pastor, fearless and independent, zealous and successful, as a minister he was remarkable for scriptural instruction and pious fervor. His ideal of the ministry was lofty, and his life was the best commentary upon it. In 1855 he published an elaborate pamphlet entitled Slavery holding not sinful, which grew out of the request of the North Carolina Classis of the German Reformed Church to be united with the Reformed Dutch Church. The important and excited discussion which followed in the General Synod of the latter body ended in a decided refusal to comply with the application. Dr. How's pamphlet was answered in the same form by the Rev. Henry V. Gange and others, and it was long before the issue was definitely decided. Dr. How published also several occasional sermons of eminent ability. He was a frequent contributor to religious periodicals, especially in relation to the pending theological controversies of his time. The last seven years of his life were spent in retirement from public service. He preached when invited, but would permit himself to be found among his own people, a model of Christian virtues and of ministerial excellence. He died in 1868.—Corvin's Manual Ref. Church, p. 118; Christian Intelligencer; Rev. R. H. Steele, D.D., Hist. of Ref. D. Ch. New Brunswick (1869).

Howard, Bezaleel, D.D., a Unitarian Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., Nov. 22, 1758. He entered Harvard College in 1777, and after graduation in 1781, engaged in teaching, pursuing at the same time a course of theological study. In 1788 he was appointed tutor at Harvard. In November, 1784, he was called as minister to the First Church and Society in Springfield, Mass., and was ordained April 27, 1785. He continued in this position until September, 1808, when impaired health obliged him to discontinue his work; but his resignation was not accepted by the Church until Jan. 25, 1809, when his successor was ordained. In 1819 he associated himself with a new Unitarian Church which had been formed from members of his old congregation, and he continued with them till his death, Jan. 20, 1837. In 1824 Harvard College conferred the degree of D.D. upon him. The Rev. Daniel Waldo, in a sketch of Dr. Howard (in Sprague's Annals of the Am. Pulpit, viii., 181 sq.), says, that the theological views of Dr. Howard had been Arminian until his latest years, when he came to believe "the sole supremacy of the Father. He, however, held to the doctrine of the atonement, in the sense of propitiation or expiation, with the utmost tenacity; and he regarded the rejection of it as a rejection of Christianity. His views of the character of the Saviour were not, perhaps, very accurately defined: he seemed to regard him as a sort of Jesus, an internal God from within, a God of the strict sense, on the one hand, nor yet the supreme God on the other." He published a sermon delivered at the ordination of the Rev. Antipas Steward (1798). (J. H. W.)

Howard, John, one of the most eminent of modern Christian philanthropists, was born at Hackney in 1726. His father apprenticed him to a wholesale grocer, but died when his son was about nineteen years of age, leaving him in possession of a handsome fortune, and young Howard, who was in weak health, determined to make a tour in France and Italy. On his return he took lodgings in Stoke Newington, where his landlord—a widow named Loidore—having nursed him carefully through a severe illness, he, out of gratitude, married her, though she was twenty-seven years his senior. She, however, died about three years after the marriage, and he now determined to visit London and to live in a manner to alleviate the miseries caused by the great earthquake in 1756. On his voyage he was captured by a French privateer, carried a prisoner to Brest, and subsequently removed into the interior, but was finally permitted to return to England on the promise of inducing the government to make a suitable exchange, but the war was effect ed, and Howard retired to a small estate he possessed at Cardington, near Bedford, and there, in April, 1768, he married Miss Henrietta Lees. It is mentioned as a characteristic trait that he stipulated before marriage "that, in all matters in which there should be an equivalence of opinion between them, their house should rule." For seven years he was chiefly engaged in the task of raising the physical and moral condition of the peasantry of Cardington and its neighborhood by erecting on his own estate better cottages, establishing schools, and visiting and relieving the sick and the destitute; in his benevolent exertions he was assisted by his wife. She died March, 1765, and Howard from that time lost his interest in his home and its occupations. He lived some years at Cardington in seclusion, then made another Continental tour, and in 1775 was nominated sheriff of Bedford. The sufferings which he had endured was witnessed during his official capacity as a magistrate; the prisoner of war struck deep into his mind, and, shocked by the misery and abuses which prevailed in the prisons under his charge, he attempted to induce the magistrates to remedy the more obvious of them. The result was a demand for a special commission to Howard at once set out on a tour of inspection. But he soon found that the evil was general, and he set himself diligently to work to inquire into the extent and precise nature of the mischief, and, if possible, to discover the true remedy for the evil. He visited, in two journeys, most of the town and county jails of England, and accumulated a large mass of information, which, in March, 1774, he laid before the House of Commons. This was the commencement of prison reform in England. Once actively engaged, he became more and more devoted to this benevolent pursuit. He travelled repeatedly over the United Kingdom, often in disguise, for the benefit of every part of Europe, visiting the most offensive places, relieving personally the wants of the most wretched objects, and noting all that seemed to him important either for warning or example. The first fruit of these labors was The State of the Prisons in England and Wales, published in 1776. Howard was then sent abroad by order of the House of Commons, and was appointed a member of the Board of Control for the Colonies in 1779, and of the Board of Foreign Affairs in 1783. In 1778, as soon as it appeared, the world was astonished at the mass of valuable materials accumulated by a private unaided individual, through a course of prodigious labor, and at the constant hazard of life, in consequence of the infectious diseases prevalent in the scenes of his inquiries. The cool good sense and moderation of his narrative, contrasted with that enthusiastic ardor which must have inspired him to his undertaking, were not less admired, and he was immediately regarded as one of the extraordinary characters of the age, and as the leader in all plans for ameliorating the condition of that wretched part of the community for whom he interested himself. (1827) He undertook another tour to revisited the celebrated Rasp-houses of Holland, and continued his route through Belgium and Germany into Italy, whence he returned through Switzerland and France in 1779. In the same year he made another survey of Great Britain and Ireland. In these tours he extended his views to the investigation of hospitals. The results were published in 1780, in an Appendix to "The State of the Prisons in England and Wales," etc. Having travelled over nearly all the south of Europe, in 1781 he visited Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and Poland, and in 1783 he went through Spain and Portugal, continuing at intervals his home inquiries, and published in 1784 a second appendix, together with a new edition of the original work, in which the additional matter was comprised. The importance, both in prisons and hospitals, of preventing the occurrence or spread of infectious diseases, produced in his mind a desire to witness the working and success of the Lazaretto system in the south of Europe, more especially as a safeguard against the plague. Danger or disgust never turned him from his path, but on this occasion he went without even a servant, not thinking it right, for convenience of himself or another person, to expose another to a risk. Quitting England in 1785, he travelled through the south of France and Italy to Malta, Zante, and Constanti- nople, whence he returned to Smyrna, while the plague was raging, for the purpose of sailing from an infected port to Venice, where he might undergo the utmost rigor of the quarantine system. He returned to England in 1787, resumed his home tours, and in 1789 published the result of his late inquiries in another important volume, entitled An Account of the principal Lazarettos in Europe, etc., with additional Remarks on the present State of the Prisons in Great Britain and Ireland. The same summer he resumed his course of foreign travels, meaning to go into Turkey and the East through Russia. He had, however, proceeded no farther than the Crimea when a rapid illness, which he himself believed to be an infectious fever, caught in prescribing for a lady, put an end to his life in the 20th of January 1792. He requested that no other inscription should be put upon his grave than simply this, "Christ is my hope." He was buried at Danbury, near Cherson, and the utmost respect was paid to his memory by the Russian government. The intelligence of his death caused a profound feeling of regret in his native country, and men of all classes and parties vied in paying their tribute of reverence to his memory. A marble statue by Bacon of "the philanthropist" was erected in St. Paul's Cathedral by a public subscription.

Mr. Howard's piety was deep and fervent, and his moral character most pure and simple. His literary acquirements were small, neither were his talents brilliant; but he was fearless, single-minded, unting, and did great things by devoting his whole energies to one good object. The influence of disinterestedness and integrity is nowhere more clearly displayed than in the ready access granted to him even by the most absolute and most suspicious governments, in the respect invariably paid to his person, and the weight attached to his opinion and authority. He was strictly economical in his personal expenses, abstemious in his habits, and capable of going through great privations among the poor. His only recreations were freely spent in the cause to which his life was devoted. The only blemish which has ever been suggested as resting upon his memory is in connection with his conduct to his son. Mr. Howard was a strict, and has not escaped the charge of being a severe, parent. The son, unhappily, in youth fell into dissolute habits, which being carefully concealed from the father, and consequently unchecked, brought on a disease which terminated in insanity. He survived his father nine years, dying on the 24th of April, 1799; but he remained till his death a hopeless lunatic. The question of Howard's alleged harshness to his son has been thoroughly investigated and effectually disproved. (See Dixon's Life of Howard.) This book was written in order to afford a complete object to which he gave up his life may not have interfered with his paternal duties, it is, of course, impossible to affirm; but that John Howard was an affectionate and kind-hearted father, as well as a single-minded benefactor to his species, there can now be no reasonable doubt. See English Cyclopaedia; Aiken, Charities and Services of John Howard (London, 1792, 8vo); Brown, Memoirs of John Howard (London, 1818, 4th); Dixon, John Howard and the Prison World of Europe (London, 1850, 12mo); reprinted, with an introduction, by the Rev. Howard, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born of Roman Catholic ancestry in Onslow County, North Carolina, in 1792. His early education was limited, as his father died shortly after the birth of John, and he was placed in a store at the age of twelve. He was converted and entered the ministry in 1819 at Georgetown. In 1819 he joined the South Carolina Conference, and was stationed at Sandy River Circuit. In 1820 he was appointed to Georgetown, 1821 to Savannah, 1822 to Augusta, and 1823 and 1824 to Charleston. He located from 1825 till 1828, when he was appointed to the Washington and Great Ebenezer Circuit. In 1829 and 1830 he labored on the Appalachee Circuit. In 1831 he joined the Georgia Conference, then forming, and for three years became presiding elder of the Milledgeville District. From 1834 to the time of his death in 1836, he was agent for the "Manual Labor School" of the Conference. In 1836 he was appointed to the ministry, employed with Savannah, Augusta, and Charleston, was attended with marked success. He labored with great fidelity, not only in the pulpit, but with penitents at the altar, being alike fervent in his prayers and appropriate in his counsels. As a pastor, too, he was always on the alert to promote the best interests of his people. Whenever there was darkness to be dissipated, or grief to be assuaged, or sinking hope to be encouraged, or evil of any kind to be removed, there he was sure to be present as an angel of mercy."—Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, vii, 614 sq.

Howard, Simeon, D.D., a Unitarian Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Maine, April 29, 1738, and educated at Harvard College, where he graduated with distinguished honor in 1758. After a course of theological study, pursued while himself engaged in teaching, he accepted a call to a church at Cumberland, Nova Scotia. In 1765 he returned to Cambridge as a resident graduate student, and was elected tutor the year following. In 1767 he accepted the pastorate of West Church, Boston, and was ordained May 6, 1768. During the Revolution his congregation suffered greatly, and having made many friends during his residence in Nova Scotia, he proposed that his congregation should unite with the church in the neighborhood, which they did. After about one year and a half he returned to Boston, and again served his congregation there, receiving only such compensation for his services as he was fully satisfied they could afford to give in their destitute circumstances. He died in the midst of his labors in 1818, and his sons, among them the famous Simeon, who was conferred on him by Edinburgh University. He was an overseer and fellow of Harvard, and a member of most of the American societies for the promotion of literature, charitable, and religious objects, and an officer of several of them. Dr. Howard was "bald and genteel in his manner, calm and equable in temper, cheerful without levity, and serious without gloom. . . . His parishioners loved him as a brother, and honored him as a father; his brethren in the ministry always met him with a grateful and cordial welcome; and the community at large reverenced him for his simplicity, integrity, and benevolence. "Dr. Howard published Sermons (1773, 1777, 1778, 1789):—Christians have no Cause to be ashamed of their Religion (sermon, 1770)—Ordination Sermon (1771)—Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, viii, 65.

Howe, Bezaleel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Tower Hill, Dutchess County, N. Y., July 14, 1781. In early life he was a student of Paine and Rousseau, and for several years a professed infidel; but the unhappy death of a notorious infidel of his acquaintance, in 1801, was a conversion, and in 1823 he entered the New York Conference, in which he labored with great zeal and success until his death, June 25, 1854. He was fond of study, and his piety and abilities honored and edited the Church—Min. of Conferences, v, 538. (G. L. T.)

Howe, Charles, a distinguished English diplomatist, was born in Gloucestershire in 1661. Being of a strong religious turn, he finally forsook public life, and retired into the country, where he wrote his Devout Meditations (8vo: 2d Ed. Edinb. 1752, 12mo; Lond. 1824, 12mo, and often), of which the poet, Dr. Edward Young, says, "I shall never lay it far out of my way, by my prayer and meditation, when I am alone, to read his head and sincere heart I never saw." Howe died in 1745.—Lond. Gent. Mag. vol. livv; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 902; Gorton, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Howe, John, a Nonconformist divine, and one of the greatest of English theologians, who is often called the "Platonic Puritan," was born May 17, 1630, at Loughborough, in Leicestershire, where his father was the incumbent of the parish church; but, having become a Nonconformist, he was ejected from his living, and retired to Ireland. He soon, however, returned to England, and settled in the town of Lancaster, where John received his rudimentary instruction from his father. He was afterwards educated at Christ College, Cambridge, but removed to Brazenose College, Oxford, of which he became the bible-clerk in 1648, and where he for the second time took his degree of B.A. in 1649. He was a demy of Magdalen College by the parliamentary visitors, and was afterwards made a fellow, and took the degree of M.A. After having been ordained by a Nonconformist divine, assisted by others, he became a minister at Great Torrington, in Devonshire. In 1654 Cromwell appointed him his domestic chaplain. He gave some offence to the protector by one of his sermons, in which he expressed certain opinions about divine impulses and special impressions in answer to prayer, but retained his situation till Cromwell's death, and afterwards till the deposition of Richard Cromwell. He then resumed and continued his ministry at Great Torrington till the Act of Uniformity, August, 1662, obliged him to restrict his preaching to private houses. He went to Ireland in 1671, where he resided as chaplain to the family of Lord Massarene, enjoying there the friendship of the bishop of that diocese. Howe was granted liberty to preach in all the churches under the jurisdiction of this bishop. He wrote for a great deal of time the newspaper "Morituri Te Commendam," and began his greatest work, The Living Temple, below referred to. In 1675 he accepted an invitation to become the minister of a congregation in London. During the year 1680 he engaged in a controversy with Drs. Stillingfleet and Tillotson on the question of nonconformity, and it is said that Dr. Stillingfleet, who had provoked the controversy by a discourse which he preached before the lord mayor and aldermen of London on "The Mischief of Separation," was subdued when he read Howe's reply, and confessed that he discovered "more like a gentleman than a divine, without any mixture of rancour, or any sharp reflections, and some-times with a great degree of kindness towards him, for which, and his prayers for him, he heartily thanked him" (Rogers's Life of Howe, p. 188). In August, 1685, he went to the Continent with lord Wharton, and in 1686 became one of the preachers to the English church at Utrecht. In 1695 Dr. James II published a book in defense of the Protestant Dissenters, and the puritanical Popish Plot. In 1696 he became involved in the Antinomian controversy by a recommendation which he gave to the works of Dr. Crisp. He soon, however, cleared his reputation by a strong recommendation of Flavel's Blow at the Root, a work against Antinomianism, then in the course of publication. In 1701 he became entangled in a controversy with the Puritan De Foe (q. v.) on account of one of Howe's members, who had been elected lord mayor, and who, in order to qualify himself for that office, had taken the Lord's Supper in an Established Church. The manner in which Howe answered the objections of the Plantations of De Foe (quity, etc.) the objections of De Foe, who opposed communion in the Established Church by Nonconformists, is to be regretted by all who venerate the name of John Howe. He died April 2, 1705. Among the Puritans, John Howe ranks as one of the most intellectual and religious of his time. He was also unquestionably one of the most great general leaders of the church, "the originality and compass of Howe's mind, and the calmness and moderation of his temper, must ever inspire sympathy and awaken admiration in reflective readers: his Platonic and Alexandrine culture commends him to the philosophical student, his practical tenor and religious thinking endears him to all Christians" (Stoughton [John], Eccles. Hist. of Eng. ii, 422, 423). "Perhaps it may be considered as no unfair test of intellectual and spiritual excellence that a person can relish the writings of John Howe; if he does not, he may have reason to suspect that something in his head or heart is wrong. A young minister who wishes to attain eminence in his profession, if he has not the works of John Howe, and can procure them in no other way, should sell his coat and buy them; and, if that will not suffice, let him sell his bed and lie on the floor; and if that still fails him, he should not fail to complain that he lies hard at night!" (Bogue and Bennett, Hist. of Dissenters, i, 437). "Howe seems to have understood the Gospel as well as any uninspired writer, and to have imbibed as much of its spirit. There is the truest sublimity to be found in his writings, and some of the strongest pathos; yet, often obscure, generally harsh, he has imitated the worst parts of Boyle's style. He has a vast number and variety of uncommon thoughts, and is, on the whole, one of the most valuable writers in our language, or, I believe, in the world" (Dr. Doolbridge). "I have learned more from John Howe than from any other author I ever read. There is an astonishing magnificence in his conceptions" (Robert Hall). "This great man was one of the few who have been venerated as much by their contemporaries as by their successors. Time, which commonly adds increased lustre to the memory of the great, has not been able to magnify his qualities for which Howe was so conspicuous. His strong and capacious intellect, his sublime elevation of thought, his flowing eloquence, the holiness of his life, the dignity and courtesy of his manners, the humor of his conversation, won him from the men of his time the title of the "Great and Mighty Howe." [Skeats, Hist. of the Free Churches of England, p. 169]. Howe's most important works are, The Living Temple (many editions; first in 1676), in which he proves the existence of God and his conversableness with men, and which occupies one of the highest places in Puritan theology; The Redeemer's Tears over Lost Souls [Luke xix, 41, 42]; with his Appendix on the Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. These, with his Sermons and other writings, are to be found in his Collected Works, with Life by Dr. Calamy (1724, 2 vols. folio); and in The Whole Works of the Rev. John Howe, M.A., edited by Hunt (London, 1810-22, 7 vols. 8vo), with an eighth vol., containing Memorial Discourses and additional articles. Again in Colyer's The Works of the Rev. John Howe, M.A., as published during his life, comprising the whole of the two folio volumes, ed. 1724, with a Life of the Author, by the Rev. J. P. Hewlett (London, 1848, 3 vols. 8vo). There is also an edition of his Works in 1 vol. imp. 8vo (London, 1858), and an American edition (Phila. 2 vols. imp. 8vo). Howe, Joseph, a Congregational minister, born at Killingly, Connecticut, January 14, 1747, was educated at Yale College, where he graduated in 1765, the first in his class. By recommendation of the president of his college he was appointed principal of a public school at Hartford, at that time the most important institution of that class in the colony. He was licensed to preach in 1769, and was appointed tutor at Yale in the same year. He held this position, preaching quite frequently, until called to the New South Church, Boston, in 1772, where he was ordained May 19, 1773. At the outbreak of the Revolution (1775) he fled to Norwich, where he remained only a short time, as his health had become feeble. He went to New Haven, and on his return stopped at Hartford, where he died, Aug. 25, 1775.—Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, i. 707 sq.

Howe, Josiah, an English divine of the 17th century, born at Credon, Bucks County, was educated at Oxford, and obtained a fellowship at Trinity College, of that University, in 1637. He found great favor with Charles I. He was made chaplain and was admitted to the degree of bachelor of divinity in 1646. After the ruin of the royal house he was ejected from his fellowship, but was restored to his preceptor after the restoration of the monarchy. He died in 1701. See Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. iii; Garton, Biog. Dict. ii, s. v.

Howe, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, was born in Ipswich, Mass., Oct. 6, 1764. He graduated at Harvard College in 1786, and was ordained pastor at Hopkinton Oct. 5, 1791, where he labored until his death, Feb. 15, 1837. He published An Attempt to prove that John's Baptism was not Gospel Baptism, being a Reply to Dr. Baldwin's Essay on the same Subject (1820) — A Catechism with miscellaneous Questions, and a Chapter of Promises for the Children under his parochial Care. See Sprague, Annals, ii, 307; North American Review, iv, 93-97.

Howell, Horatio S., a Presbyterian minister, born near Trenton, N. J., in 1820, was educated at Princeton College, and the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y. In 1846 he was ordained pastor of East Whitehill Church, Pa. He was in 1856, ordained pastor of the Fifth Baptist church at Elkin, Md., and at the Delaware Water Gap, Pa. While he was laboring at this latter place the Rebellion broke out. He at once entered the army as chaplain of the 93d Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. His reputation as chaplain was pre-eminent for arduous, zealous, and judicious devotion. He was killed at the battle of Gettyburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.—Wilson, Pres. Hist. Almanac, 1864.

Howell, Lawrence, a distinguished Nonjuror, was born soon after the Restoration, about 1660. He studied at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1684, and M.A. in 1688. Having entered the Church, he was ordained in 1712 by the nonjuror bishop, Dr. Suddath. He had taken the title of suffragan bishop of Thetford. He soon after published a pamphlet entitled The Case of Schism in the Church of England truly stated, for which he was committed to Newgate, convicted, and condemned to three years' imprisonment, besides whipping, a fine of £500, and degradation. This sentence was remitted but was not quashed by the king. He died in Newgate in 1720. Whatever his errors, the punishment appears to have been disproportioned to his offence. He was a man of extensive learning and great capacity. He wrote Synopsis Canonicorum S. S. Apostolorum et Conciliorum Ecclesiasticorum et Provinciarum ab Ecclesia Graeca receptorum (1706, fol.); Synopsis Canon. Ecclesiae. Lat. (1710-1715, fol.); A View of the Pontificate from its supposed beginning to the end of the Council of Trent, etc. (London, 1716, 8vo);—Desiderius, or the original Pilgrim; a divine Dialogue (from the Spanish) (London, 1717, 12mo);—A complete History of the Dissension between the Bishops and Ministers by Mr. Howell (London, 1806, 3 vols. 8vo);—Certain Queries proposed by Roman Catholics, etc. (London, 1716); etc.—Darley, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1663; Hook, Eccles. Biog. vi, 199; Hoeffer, Novus. Biogr. Gen. xxv, 818 sq. (J. N. P.)

Howell, Robert Boyte Crawford, D.D., a prominent Baptist preacher in Tennessee, was born in Wayne County, North Carolina, March 10, 1801. He pursued his literary and theological studies in Col- lumbia College, and was made professor of mathematics without intending its practice. With this preparation, he entered upon the duties of the ministry in the Episcopal Church, of which his family were communicants; but, quite unexpectedly to his friends, he soon joined the Baptists, travelling fourteen miles to reach the nearest Baptist church for this purpose, Feb. 6, 1821. Five days after- wards he received license to preach the doctrines of the Baptist Church. At Washington he performed, in connection with his theological studies, the duties of a city missionary, and for a year after the completion of his course he was a missionary in Virginia. He then accepted a call to the pastorate of the Cumberland Street Baptist Church in Norfolk. He was ordained Jan. 27, 1827. A revival immediately followed, as the fruits of which he baptized about 200 within a few months. His labors continued here for eight years. In 1834 he removed to Nashville. The First Baptist church had been dispersed by the Rev. Alexander Campbell and his disciples, but under Mr. Howell's labors it was revived and built up. He established, and for some time edited a religious newspaper. He exerted more influence in the support of missions than any other minister of the denomination in Tennessee. After the organization of the Southern Baptist Convention, he was elected and re-elected its president. In 1850 he removed to Rich- mond, Va., where, in addition to the charge of a church, he was a trustee of Richmmond College, and of the Rich- mond Female Institute, a member of the Virginia Bapt- ist Foreign Mission, Publication, and Sunday-school Boards, and of the Virginia Baptist Mission and Educational Board. In 1857 he yielded to an urgent call to occupy his former field of labor in Nashville. There, besides efficiently promoting all the State Baptist organiza- tions, he was, by appointment of the general committee of the Baptist Publication Society, for five years, a trustee of the publication societies of the South and West, and in other educational trusts. His labors were arduous; in addition to which, he performed a considerable amount of literary work, including some of his most useful books. He died April 5, 1868, greatly honored and lamented. Dr. Howell was a man of commanding presence and dignified ad- dress, warm and genial in his manners. His labors as a pracher of the Gospel were abundant and successful, and some of his published works had a wide circulation in this country, and were republished in England. He was the author of *Ecloga of Infant Baptism; — The Cross; — The Covenants; — The Early Baptists of Virginia; — On Communion; — The Deaconship; — The Way ofSalt;— Several Sermons. His works in America attracted the attention, "The Christology of the Pentateuch," an enlargement of "The Covenants," and "The Family." He was also a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his Church. (L. E. S.)

How Gill, Francis, a noted preacher of "the Friends," was born about 1638 in Westmoreland, England. He was brought up and educated in the Church of England. He was deprived of his benefice, and more work in the national Church after graduation in the university, and joined the Independents, among whom he held an esteemed position as minister. In 1652 he became an adherent to the doctrines of George Fox, the Quaker. Two years later, he met with two others of the Society of Friends to preach their doctrines for a week in London. He even went before the protector Cromwell, to seek his influence in aid of the Quakers, who were then greatly persecuted, both in the country and at London; but he does not seem to have been successful in his effort. He escaped, however, after this interview, all personal molestation. He continued preaching in London. He and his friends next went to Bristol, where they met with much better success. "Multitudes flocked to hear them, and many embraced their doctrine." The clergy became alarmed, and How Gill and his colaborers were summoned before the magistrates, and commanded to leave the city immediately. Considering themselves entitled to remain, as "free-born Englishmen," they tarried in the city, and continued to meet with success. In 1663 we find How Gill at Kendal, again summoned before the justices of the peace, who tendered him the oath of allegiance, and on his refusal of it committed him to prison, in which he remained until his death, Jan. 20, 1688. How Gill wrote a copious treatise against oaths while in prison. He also published The Drawings of the Gospel Day, and Its Light and Glory discovered (Lond. 1676, fol.). See Neale, History of the Puritans, Harper's ed., ii, 413, 439. In H. J. Quakers, i, 112, 126, 144, etc.; ii, 81, 96 sq., 286 sq. (J. H. W.)

Howlie, John, a Scotch Presbyterian, was born at Lochgoil Nov. 14, 1735. His father died when John was only one year old, and he was removed to his grandparents' at Blackhill, where he received a limited education. In 1766 he returned to the farm of Lochgoil, to pursue the study of Church history, and his church history, to which he had devoted much of his time for several years. In 1767 his early religious impressions assumed the form of decided piety, and he determined to serve the Church by preparing the book for which he is celebrated, The Scotch Worthies. "It is a work of no inconsiderable labor; for, though the biographical information he had procured, and with which his powerful memory was richly stored, must have greatly facilitated the task, yet, living remote from cities, and almost shut out from the abodes of civilized life, the difficulty of correspondence and the want of books must have tended not a little to render his task both painful and irksome. Under all these disadvantages, however, did Mr. Howlie, in the seclusion of Lochgoil, bring the work to a successful termination. The first edition appeared in 1774, and a second, greatly enlarged, in 1785 (new edit., revised and corrected by W. McGavin, Edinb. and N. Y., 1883, 8vo.). Like "The Pilgrim's Progress," it has been long so extensively popular with all classes of the community, that it has secured for itself a position from which it will never be displaced, as long as Presbyterianism, and a religious attachment to the Scotch Church, work in the world, to continue to engage the attention of the natives of Scotland.\(^1\) Besides this work, Mr. Howlie published, 1. a collection of Lectures and Sermons, by some of the most eminent ministers, preached during the stormiest days of the Percussion;—2. An Alarum to a secure Generation:—3. Faithful Contenders displayed, an account of the suffering remnant of the Church in the year 1618 (with a Welsh humorous exemplify;— 5. Patience Atoned, a work which, next to the "Scotch Worthies," must be regarded as superior to all his other writings;—6. Vindication of the Modes of Handling the Elements in the Lord's Supper before giving Thanks, written during the controversy on this subject among the Antiburghian seceders.—7. Clarkson's plain Reasons for Dissenting, with a preface and notes, and an abstract of the principles of the Reformed presbytery regarding civil government.— 8. Preface to Mr. Brown of Wampney's Looking-glass of the Law and the Gospel. Howie died in Sept. 1791. He was, indeed, a marked character, whether at home, in the public market, or at church; and wherever he went, the fame of his piety and varied acquirements contributed greatly to his influence" (Biog. Sketch prefixed to the Amer. edition of his "Scotch Worthies").—Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 178 (J. W.) Howley, William, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Ropley, Hampshire, in 1765. He was educated at Winchester school, and in 1783 went to New College, Oxford. He was elected fellow in 1785, became canon of Christ Church in 1801, rectorus professor of divinity in 1809, bishop of London in 1813, and, finally, archbishop of Canterbury in 1828. He died in 1840. His principal works are: Sermons [on Isa. liv. 13] (London, 1814, 8vo.); — Sermon [on Ps. xx, 7, 8] (Thanksgiving, when the eagles taken at Waterloo were deposited in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall) (Lond. 1816, 4to.); — A Charge delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of London at the Visitation of A.D. 1808, (Lond. 1818, 4to.); — A Charge delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of London in July, 1826, (Lond. 1826, 4to.—Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1564.

Howson, John, an English divine, born in London in 1556, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He filled successively the vicarate of Bampton, in Oxfordshire, the rectorate at Brightwell, in Berkshire, and then became the head of Chelsea College, and canon of Hereford. In 1619 he was appointed bishop of Oxford, and was transferred to the bishopric of Durham in 1628. He was also at one time vice-chancellor of Oxford. While in this position he "exercised himself against those Puritans who opposed the discipline and ceremonies, but was afterward distinguished for his forbearance rather against povery." He died in 1631. Howson was the author of a number of sermons (published 1597-1661); and four of his polemical discourses against the supremacy of St. Peter were published by order of king James I., "to clear the aspersions laid upon him (Howson) of favoring pope" (1622, 4to.). See *Hook, Eccles. Biogr., vii, 202; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 908.

Hoyler, Anna, a German enthusiast, was born at Goldenhütel, near Eiderstadt (Schleswig), in 1854. Her maiden name was Owe. In 1599 she married a nobleman called Howel, and when he died she retired to one of her estates, where she devoted herself to bell-letrers and poetry. Becoming acquainted with an alchemist named Teting, who attended her during a sickness, she was soon fascinated by the visions of the mystic, whom she took into her house, and considered as a prophet. She afterwards joined the Anabaptists, and thought that he was called, not to profit of the privileges caused her to lose nearly her whole fortune; and, leaving her country, she went to Sweden, where she found a protector in queen Eleonora Maria, who presented her with an estate on which she resided until her death in 1656. Her views, derived from Paracel sus, David Jonas, Schweikenfeld, Weigel, and other mystics, are expressed in indifferent verses in her works.
HOZAI

(Herm., N. H., 1843, 16mo.) "Fervent pious and thorough scholarship combined to render him a faithful and able minister of the New Testament. His views of divine truth were clear and strong, his manner of presenting them forcible and impressive. His sermons were logical, and weighty with matter."—Congregational Quarterly, July, 1850.

Hubbard, John, an English divine and adherent of the "Independents," was born about 1692. He was, at first assistant at a church in Stepney, and after the decease of Dr. Taylor succeeded him as pastor of a congregation at Deptford. This position he held for twenty-two years with distinguished skill, fidelity, and diligence. In 1717 he was appointed one of the divinity chair of the academy of the Independents at London.

"He applied himself to the duties of this office with exemplary diligence, and the most pleasing hopes were entertained of many years of usefulness; but they were extinguished by his decease in July, 1748." He published Two Sermons on the Academy Lectures (1728, 8vo). Nine of his sermons are in the Berry Street (Coward's Lecture) Sermons (2d ed. 2 vols. 8vo, 1739)...

Hubbard, William, a Congregational minister, was born in England in 1621, and came to this country in the ship Plimpton in 1628. In 1641 he graduated at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1647, a member of the first class. He is said to have pursued a course of theological studies with the Rev. Mr. Cobbett, of Ipswich, whom he also assisted in the pulpit. He was ordained about 1666. In 1688 Mr. Cobbett died, and Hubbard became his successor. In 1689 he served as assistant to the Rev. John Dennison, grandson of Major General Denison, who was also a graduate of Harvard (1684). In 1689 Dennison died, and, about three years after, the Rev. John Rogers, son of the president of Harvard, became Hubbard's colleague. In 1693, enfeebled by age, Hubbard was obliged to resign his charge, and the people voted him sixty pounds as a gratuity. He died Sept. 14, 1704. His writings were mainly on the history of New England, and he left a work in MS. which has been of service to American historians. He published a Narrative of the Troubles with the Indians from 1607-1677, with a Discourse (Bost. 1677, 4to)—Sermons (1676, 1682, 1684)—and, in connection with the Rev. John Higginson, of Salem, Testimony to the Order of the Gospel in the Churches (1701). Hubbard is represented by his contemporaries to have been "for many years the most eminently learned in the country in the province for learning and candor, and superior to all his contemporaries as a writer."—Sprague, Annals Amer. Pulpite, i, 148 sq.; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 909.

Hubberthorn, Richard, a celebrated Quaker of the 17th century, was at first a preacher in the Parliament's army, but he afterwards joined the Quakers, and, in accordance with their principles of peace, quitted the army. After preaching some nine years, he was imprisoned on account of his religious belief, and died from the effects at Newgate, June 17, 1662. Hubberthorn was one of the Quakers liberated by king Charles upon his marriage with Catharine of Braganza, who ordered "the release of Quakers and others in jail in London and Middlesex for being present at unlawful assemblies, who yet profess all obedience and allegiance, provided they are not indicted for refusing the oath of allegiance, nor have been ring-leaders or preachers of rebellion, but simply supposed to have joined them to a better conformity." Just before this event, Hubberthorn, together with George Fox, had addressed the king and demanded the liberation of their suffering brethren.—Neal, Hist. of the Puritans, ii, 418; Stoughton, Eccles. Hist. of England, i, 277.

Huber, Johann Ludwig, a German author who at first studied theology, but afterwards devoted his time mainly to the study of jurisprudence, deserves our notice on account of his V ersarche mit Gott zu reden (sacred songs) (Reusel, 1775; Tübing, 1787). He died at Stuttgart in 1800.

HUBER, Kaspar. See HUBERNUSS.

HUBER, Maria, a celebrated mystic, was born at Geneva in 1694. She retired into solitude in 1712, to indulge in contemplation and mysticism. She afterwards returned to live in Geneva, joined the Roman Church, and died at Lyons in 1756. She is generally named as a desist, yet her opinions partook rather of extreme mysticism than of indolery. Her principal works are Lettres sur la religion essentielle à l'homme (Amsterd. 1731, 8 vols.) and Lettres sur la religion (8 vols.), in which she relates all revelation to the moral necessities of the heart, and considers revelation a mere auxiliary to natural theology, a means of interpreting it to our own consciousness" (Hagenbach, Germ. HUBER, Samuel, a German theologian, was born at Berne in 1754. He studied theology in Germany, and became pastor at Burgdorf. He was much given to controversy, especially in behalf of the Lutheran doctrine on the Lord's Supper. Censured for a speech he made on the 16th of April, 1788, he nevertheless continued to attack the doctrines of the Reformed Church, and was, in consequence, first imprisoned, and then exiled. In July, 1788, he went to Tübingen, where he joined the Lutheran Church. He became pastor of Doredingen, and in 1792 professor at Wittenberg. His belief in free grace, and in the universality of the ato cne, brought him into antagonism with Humius, Ley er, and Geiser (1592); the breach between them was not healed by public discussions held at Wittenberg and Regensburg in 1594. Huber has been wrongly charged with teaching the doctrine of universal salvation. He was a determined opponent of the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and maintained that the terms "decreed" and "election" were equivalent to "gracious invitation," which God extends to all men without distinction. "But, to make their calling and election sure, they must repent and believe." Driven out of Hesse-Cassel in 1594, he resided for some time at Jena, Helmstadt, and Goslar. He died March 25, 162. The most important among his numerous works are Christum esse mortuum pro peccatis omnium hominum (Tübingen, 1590).—Beständiges Bekenntniss (1597).—Anti-Belharussim (Goisl. 1607, 6 vols.; See Acta Huberina (Tüb. 1597; Lüb. 1598); Godin, Act. HUBERINUS (HUBER), Kaspar, a Bavarian monk, afterwards a convert to Protestantism, was born near the close of the 15th century. He became a Protestant prelate, and was appointed papal legate at Tübingen, and at that place in 1527. He was a zealous opponent of the Anabaptists, who were quite numerous at Augsburg about that time, and he also engaged in the Berne disputations on the ministration of the sacrament. He was in favor of the Lutheran doctrine on this point, and in 1531 he went to Wittenberg to defend Luther personally, and to regain for Augsburg the celebra ted Urbanus Rhegius (q. v.). Huberinus was also ac tively engaged in introducing the Reformation in the Palatinate, and in the territory of Hohenlohe. In 1551 he returned to Augsburg as preacher, but as he alone of the Protestant preachers at Augsburg had accepted the Interim (q. v.), he was obliged to leave the city in 1552, and died a year later in Olmne Cheer. Huberinus wrote quite extensively, and among other works, we have from his pen Triestlicher Sermon v. d. Urtendt Christti (1535)—Schlussreden v. d. rechten Hand Gottes u. d. Ge walt Christi (1539); etc. See Keim, Schweb. Res. Gesch. p. 278, 278; Döllinger, Reformation, ii, 576; Herzog, Real Hubert, Léonard, a Belgian theologian, flourished about the year 1490. He was at first a Carmelite monk, afterwards he became bishop of Darié, then sufft

Hubert, Mathieu, a distinguished French Ro malian Catholic, born at Chartillon in 1649, was a priest of the Congregation of the Oratory, and one of the most brilliant preachers of his country and Church. He died at Paris in 1739, and is published in the posthumous works, 6 vols. (1739).—Feller, Dict. Hist. ix, 49 sq.; Hook, Ec

Hubert (HUBERTUS), St., son of Bertrand, duke of Guinée, was high in office under Theodoric, king of the Franks. Having been a great sportsman, and, accord ing to tradition, converted by a stag which bore a shining cross between his antlers, and which spoke, entreat ing him to turn from his gay life and serve the Church. He at once entered the Church, succeeded his religious instructor, Lambert (Lamprecht), as bishop of Lüttich in 708, and died in 727. His body was in 827 transfer erd to the Benedictine convent of Andain, in the Roy dom, which received the name of St. Hubertus, and it is here he is said to have had the above-men tioned vision. Tradition also holds that his relics, by virtue of the golden key of St. Hubert, which he re cieved from St. Peter, can cure hysthias. The 3d of November (St. Hubert's day) marks the end of the hunting season, and was celebrated by great hunts (St. Hubert's chase).—Pierer, Univ. Lex. viii, 570; Theol. Univ. Lex. i, 372. (J. H. W.)

Hubert, Order of St., the oldest and highest or der of Bavaria, was founded in 1444, and often reformed, the last revision in 1808. "The sign of the order is a golden cross on a shield, in the middle of which is the picture of St. Hubertus (q. v.). It is borne on a golden chain.

Hubertine Annalista, an anonymous writer of the chronicles of St. Hubert's monastery, flourished about the middle of the 11th century. In his Chron. St. Hb. Andhaita the style of Saltvaticus is imitated. Bethmann (L. C.) and Wattenbach (W.) issued a new edition of it in Pertz, Script. viii, 655-630, and the fol ing following opinion of the author is expressed by them: 'Satis habeamus nusse, aucupem oremus hisus virum inter medias res versatum, acrum judicem, veritatis sti

Hühbmayer or Hübmeier (HÜBMÖHR), Baltha sen, one of the most learned of the Anabaptists, was born at Friedberg, near Augsburg, in Bavaria, in 1480. Hübmeier attended to the school at Freiburg with Eck, and in 1512 went with his teacher to Ingolstadt, where he became preacher and professor. In 1516 he went to Regensburg, where his misinstructions led to the expulsion of the Jews; but, having openly expressed sentiments favorable to the Reformation, he was himself obliged to leave. He died in 1539 in his own schoolroom in Schaffhausen. In 1522 he was appointed pasto er to Waldshut, where he came under the influence of Minzer, and embraced the Anabaptist views. He wrote several works in support of his new views, more particularly upon baptism and the sacraments; but the ground which he took against his early coadjutor and intimate friend Zwingle provoked a violent reply from the latter, and in consequence of this he was convicted by the Diet of Zürich in 1525 by the Austrian persecution at Waldshut, he was branded as a heretic by Zwingle, and, after suffering imprisonment, finally fled from the Austrian territory (1526). He preached a short time at Constance, and then journeyed to Moravia. In 1528 he was arrested, probably at Brumun, by the Austrian authorities, and was burned at the stake in Vienna (March 10). His wife, who steadfastly adhered to Hubmayr's views, was imprisoned with him, and suffered martyrdom by drowning. Hubmayr is now conceded by all his native districts of China, and man of its people is of that character, and, although a fanatic in religion, it is certain that he never favored the extreme views of some of the Anabaptists. Huby, Vincent, a French Roman Catholic ecologist, born at Tournebon, May 1, 1698. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1649, and contributed greatly to the growth of this order. He died March 24, 1763. He wrote a number of ascetic works, which have been edited by abbe Lenoir Duparc, and published under the title (Ermera spiritalis (Paris, 1759, 1761, 1767); Lyons and Paris, 1857, 12mo); also by the abbe Baudrart (Paris, 1767, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Gen. xxxvi, 361.

Huc, Evariste Rous, a French Roman Catholic missionary, was born at Toulouse Aug. 1, 1813. He was educated in his native city, and entered the order of St. Lazarus, and in 1839 was sent as missionary to China. After about three years of missionary labor in the northern districts of China, he started for the Tibet, in the fall of 1841, to explore the wilds of Tartary and christianize Tibet, according to the directions of the apostolic vicar of Mongolia. Accompanied by a single Chinese convert, a young lama, they reached the lama convent of Kouboun, where they acquired the dialect of Tibet. Towards the end of September, 1843, they reached the capital of Tibet. Here they were permitted to remain on their declaration that they had come only for the purpose of preaching the religion of Christ. But they had barely settled when the Chinese ambassador and the Tung-chow Lama came to leave them to their own devices. They were put in charge of a Chinese escort, and carried back a journey of nearly 2000 miles to the extreme south, and arrived in October, 1846, at Macao. Here they were subjected to a trial by the Chinese tribunals, and were finally permitted to return to the station from which they had originally started on this journey. Huc, whose health completely failed him, returned to Toulouse in 1849, and gave an account of this journey in his Souvenirs d'un Voyage dans la Tartarie, le Tibet et la Chine, pendant les années 1844, 1845, et 1846 (Paris, 1859, 2 vols. 8vo). This book was a great success, and was translated into various languages (English by Hazlitt, London, 1851, 2 vols.; and New York, 1853). It owed its great success partly to its description of a country hitherto unknown, and also to its lively style. In this work the abbe also pointed out the similarities between the Chinese and Roman Catholic religions, and for it was punished by seeing his book placed on the "Index" (comp. Müller, Chips from a German Work shop, i, 187, note). By order of the emperor, he then published L'Empire Chinois, faisant suite à l'Ouvrage intitulé "Les souvenirs d'un Voyage dans la Tartarie et le Tibet" (Paris, 1854, 2 vols. 8vo). This book was also a great success, and was translated by the Academy. There are several editions of it, and it was also translated into English (N. York, 1855, 2 vols. 12mo). His last work, Le Christianisme en Chine, en Tartarie, et au Tibet (Paris, 1857, 3 vols. 8vo, with map), contains a vast amount of historical information; but its chief topic is the propagation of Romanism in China. Huc thinks that "the Gospel will soon take in Asia the ascendency which it has already acquired in Arabia, the Saxon fucius, the traditions of the Buddhists, and the endless legends of the Vedas; finally, that Brahma, Buddha, and Mohammed will disappear to make room for the true God," etc. Huc died in Paris March 31, 1860. Hucbald, an English deacon who flourished in the 11th century. He wrote one hundred and eight homilies, "which were extant in Leland's time in Canterbury college (now Christ Church), Oxford, but which appear to be no longer in existence. In the prologue to this book, Hucbald stated his name and country, but nothing more is known of him." He is said to have made an extract from the penitential work of archbishop Egbert of York, of the 8th century, as an introduction to the homilies. See Wright, Biog. Brit. Ed. (Anglo-Sax. Period), ii, 336; Real-Encyclop., xxii, 604; Theol. Univ. Lex., i, 372. (J. H. W.) Hucbald, also called Hucbald, Hugbald, Hubal, and Hubald, a celebrated monk, was probably born about 850, and was educated by his learned relative Milo (q. v.) in the monastery of St. Amandus in Flanders. After Milo's death, Hucbald succeeded him as teacher and provisor officer of the school of this monastery. About 893, archbishop Fulco, of Rheims, called Hucbald to that city, to preside over the cathedral school there. He died in 930. He distinguished himself greatly in music, and was the first to establish the laws of harmonics (which are some of the saints are considered valuable, especially Vita S. Hudson, John, D.D., an English philologist and theologian, was born at Wiltshire in 1662, and was educated at Queen's College, Oxford. He obtained the degree of Master of Arts in 1684, and shortly afterwards that of Doctor of Divinity. In 1706 he was appointed librarian of the Bodleian library at Oxford, and died Nov. 27, 1719. He is chiefly known on account of his Geographia Veteris Scriptoria Graeci minorem, etc. (Oxford, 1636, 1703, 1712, 3 vols. 8vo), and his edition of Josephus, entitled Jo. Flavi. Joseph. Opera ex Oct. 1729, 2 vols. fol.), which appeared shortly after his death.—Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Général, xxxv, 372 sq.

Huel, Joseph Nicolas, a French philosopher, was born at Matattabonc July 16, 1760. After the completion of his studies at Paris he took orders, and was made curate of Icaume. He is said (Barbic, Dict. des Anonymes) to be the author of L'Esprit philosophe sur la croisade de la mort, and of Moyen de rendre nos religieuses utiles et de nous exempter des dotes qu'elle exigent (1760), in which important reforms of the religious houses of the Roman Catholic Church are advocated. His speculations on the employment of religious in convents in instructing the youth of the land, instead of spending a life of idleness, partly, if not wholly, at the expense of the state. The book was suppressed, but reprinted eleven years after, without, however, awakening any general interest in this reformatory movement. Huel died at Icaume Sept. 3, 1793—Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Hufnagel, Wilhelm Friedrich, a German theologian, was born at Hall, Schwabia, June 15, 1754, and educated at the universities of Altorf and Erlangen. In 1779 he was appointed professor extraordinary of philosophy at Erlangen, and in 1782 he was transferred to the chair of theology as regular professor. In 1788 he received the pastorate of the university church, and was made overseer of the seminar for preachers. In 1791 he removed to Frankfort-on-the-Main as preacher of one of the oldest churches of that city. He died Feb. 7, 1809. Hufnagel was distinguished both as a preacher and as a theologist, but he was particularly noted for his Semitic languages. His publications, aside from his Sermons (1791-96), are Variarum lectionum et Biblia a Nisiolo caritus excerpitur speciem (1777); Solomos hahes Lied gegriffen, übersetzt u. erläutert (1784); Nov. Hugh, Johann Leonhard, an eminent German Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Constance June 1, 1765, and educated at Freiburg University. In 1789 he too his doctor's degree, and in 1791 was made professor of Old Testament exegesis at his alma mater. In 1792 the New Testament exegesis was added to the duties of his chair. To fit himself more thoroughly for his professional duties, he visited the great libraries and universities of Central Europe. Though a Roman Catholic, he was distinguished for his criticism and his sobriety, and, like the celebrated Dr. Jahn, too impartial to be very greatly influenced in his views as a Biblical scholar and critic by his ecclesiastical connections. He wrote Erfassung d. Buchstabsenches (Ulm, 1801).—Einleitung in d. Schriften d. Neuen Testamentes (Stuttgart, 1808, 2 vols.; 4th ed. 1847). This work, in which he attempts to vindicate and sustain the genuineness of all the books commonly regarded as canonical, has been translated into French and English (Introduction to the New Testament, by Walt, Lond. 1827, 2 vols. 8vo; far better by Feslbeck, (Androsoval, 1888).—De Pentateuchi versions Alexiandri com-

HUGHES, James, an English divine, born in 1885, was educated at Cambridge University, and afterwards became fellow of Jesus College. He is chiefly known as the editor of Chrysostom's treatise ἐπὶ ἰασωνίας, or On the Priesthood (Cambr. 1710, 8vo; 2d edit. in Greek and Latin, 200). He published a Treatise against the pretended Rights of the Church, etc. (1712, 8vo). He died in 1731.—New Gen. Eng. Dict. vii, 276; Lond. Gent. Mag. xlviii, 588, 673.

Hughes, John, an English divine, was born in 1882, educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, and afterwards became a fellow of the university. But little is known of his life. He died in 1716. Among his works we find Dissertations sur les Textes autoritaires du Nouveau Testament sur le texte des codes ou manuscrits a ceci si distincte, défendue contre Erastianos (Cambridge, 1710, 8vo; and in English by Hilk. Bedford, Lond. 1711, 8vo).—St. Chrysostom's Treat. on the Priesthood (Cambr. 1710, 8vo; 2d edit., with notes, etc., 1712, 8vo). See Dr. Allsopp, Dict. of Authors, i, 911; Lowndes, Brit. Hughes, John, an American Roman Catholic priest, was born in Ireland in 1758, and emigrated to this country in 1817, his father having preceded him about two years. At first he went to a florist to learn the art of gardening, but a few years later he entered the Theological Seminary of St. Mary's at Emmitsburgh, Md., teaching also at the same time in a school. In 1827 he was ordained priest in Philadelphia, and settled over a parish of that city. In 1837 he was appointed coadjutor of bishop Dubois of New York, and immediately after his consecration in 1838, he assumed the virtual administration of the diocese, but he was not made bishop until 1842. In 1850 New York was raised to the dignity of an archiepiscopal see, and bishop Hughes went to Rome to receive the pallium at the hands of the pope. He died January 3, 1864. Even before his elevation to the episcopacy he had gained among his cereognists some distinction as a champion of the cause of religious controversy, in 1830 and 1834, with Dr. John Breckinridge, on the question, "Is the Protestant religion the religion of Christ?" Some years later he had another celebrated controversy with Dr. Nicholas Murray, of Elizabeth, who, under the name of "Kirwan," published a series of articles illustrating articles against the Roman Catholic Church. "Both controversies increased his reputation among his cereognists; but non-Catholics were not struck by his arguments in favor of Roman Catholicism, and he failed to attract anything like the attention, or produce anything like the impression, which writings of real ability, such as those of Mohler in Germany, and of Brownson and Hecker, are always sure to command." As archbishop, in the administration of the property of the Church, and the use which he made of it for the spreading of his Church, he displayed a talent rarely found. An immense property gradually accumulated in his hands, which enabled him to increase largely the number of Roman Catholic churches, schools, and other denominational institutions. Thus, in 1841, he opened the Roman Catholic St. John's College, at Fordham, New York, to which he afterwards added the Theological Seminary (1845). The archbishop's celebrated controversy on this subject with Erastus Brooks, editor of the New York Express, and at that time a state senator, who had stated in an address in the senate chamber that the archbishop owned property in New York to the amount of $5,000,000. A long discussion took place, and this time the ability with which the archbishop defended his statements and his position Hughes, Isaac, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Gloucester, now Camden County, New Jersey, about 1814. But little is known of his early life. He was converted in 1841, licensed to preach about 1844, and joined the New Jersey Conference in 1846. Thenceforward he filled with zeal and energy the several positions assigned him in the church, and in many places eminently useful. On Rome and Wantage Circuit, on Cedarville charge and elsewhere, he had extensive and powerful revivals of religion, and founded the first Methodist society at the village of Cranberry, N. J., consisting at first of seven members, which, before the year closed, increased to fifty. About 1855, while laboring on Vernon Circuit, he had his hip dislocated by a fall from his carriage, which caused him a great deal of suffering, and in the spring of 1864, being pressed by increasing affliction, he was obliged to take a superannuated relation, and settled at Porterfield, in Rockingham County. Here, until his death, he labored as he had ability, being greatly beloved by the people. He died suddenly, while preparing to re-enter the active work of the ministry, April 5, 1866. "Hugh was em-

Hughes, George, B.D., an English Nonconformist, was born in Southwark in 1658, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He became fellow of Pembroke College, then lecturer at Allhallows, London, and afterwards master of Tavistock. During the Rebellion he obtained the living of St. Andrew's, Plymouth, but was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He died in 1667. Hughes was a divine of good natural capacity and learning, and an exact critic for his time. His principal works are: An Analytical Exposition of the whole Book of Genesis, and of the first twenty-three Chapters of Exodus, wherein the various readings are observed, etc. (1672, fol).—Aphorisms, or Select Propositions of the Scriptures, shortly determining the Doctrine of the Sabbath (1670, sm. 8vo).—Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1568.

was acknowledged alike by Protestants and Romanists. But he opened a breach between the Romanists and Protestants by his unauthorized demands in the School Question, and the Common Council of New York City should designate seven of the public schools as Catholic schools, and when this was denied both by the Common Council and the Legislature, bishop Hughes advised the Catholics to run, at the next political campaign, an independent ticket. He defended his cause with great ability, but failed to convince the Protestants generally of the fairness of the demand to grant to the Roman Catholic community an exceptional prerogative, which was neither possessed nor claimed by any Protestant body. He also opposed the reading of the Protestant version of the Bible in the common school, in which he was not quite so successful as in his other efforts in behalf of Romanism. Archbishop Hughes's political influence in the United States was very great, and he was honored by all sects in a manner unknown in any other Protestant country. Thus, in 1847, he was invited by both houses of Congress to deliver a lecture in the hall of the House of Representatives in Washington, and after the outbreak of the Rebellion (1862) he was even intrusted with a semi-official mission to France. As a writer, archbishop Hughes has done but little, except by the discussions above alluded to. These were all pub- lished in Catholic World (Phila. 1856, 8vo), also published a number of his sermons and addresses. Since his death his "works" have been collected by Lawrence Kehoe (N.Y. 2 vols. 8vo; 24 ed. 1865). — N. Y. Tablet, Jan. 1864; Methodist, Jan. 9, 1864; An Amer. Cyclop. 1868, p. 429. (J. H. W.)

HUGHES, Joseph, D.D., an eminent Baptist divine, was born in London Jan. 1, 1769. In 1784 he became a member of the Baptist Church, and entered the Baptist College at Bristol, where he remained as a student till 1787. He studied also three years at Aberdeen, where he passed M.A. in 1790. In 1791 he became classical tutor in the Baptist College; 1792 to 1796 he was assistant minister at Broadmead Chapel, Bristol; and in 1796 he became pastor of the Baptist Chapel, Battersea. When the "Religious Tract Society" was formed in 1799, he was chosen its first secretary, and he retained this office until his death, Oct. 12, 1835. His industry in official work was enormous, and a great part of the success of the society is due to his exertions. He also took a large part in the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and was its first secretary, retaining the office until his death. His personal history is largely that of this great organization. See Leichfeld, Mournful denosts (Philadelphia, 1884, 12mo) J Jubilee Volume of the Religious Tract Society; Owen, Hist. Tract- tory of the British and Foreign Bible Society; Tipson, Bible Triumphi (1852, 12mo).

Hugo, a friar of the order of the Minimi, and a doctor of theology, was born at Prato, near Florence, in the latter half of the 13th century. He was a man of remarkable austerity, and imposed upon himself the most severe mortifications. He died in Tarragon after the year 1312. Among his works, which remain in MS., are a letter to the Minimi of Prato, a treatise De Vita Contemplation, and De Perfectione Statuum.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xvi, 451.

Hugo of Amiens, or of Rouen, a distinguished Roman Catholic divine, was born at Amiens, France, toward the close of the 11th century, and was educated at Laon under the celebrated Anselm. He entered the Benedictine monastery of Cluny, and became prior of the monastery of Limoges in 1113. On account of his great learning and uncommon talent he was transferred as prior to the monastery at Lewes, in England, and in 1125 was appointed abbot of Reading Abbey by Henry I, the founder. In 1129 Hugo was elected archbishop of Rouen, over which see he presided until his death, Nov. 11, 1164. He was quite prominent in the history of celibacy during his day. While archbishop of Rouen, he sought to convert an obscure sect in Brittany, in all likelihood a branch of the Petrobrusians, whose doctrines were "a protest against the overwhelming sacerdotalization of the Church in France, and against their tenets, among which he enumerates promiscuous licentiousness and disregard of clerical celibacy." Indeed, Hugo was distinguished among his contemporaries not only as a theologian, but also as a statesman. It was he who, in 1139, at the Council of Winchester, saved King Stephen from excommunication by the English bishops. He wrote Dialogi de Summo Bono Libri ixi (published by Martíne in his Theaur. Anecdotum, v, 895), a work of especial interest both to the theologian and the philosopher on account of the views which it sets forth on moral philosophy.—De Hareses, printed by D'Achery as an appendix to the works of Guilbert de Nogent, is a work levelled against the heretics of his day, and affording valuable materials on the history of the Church in the 12th century:—De Fide Catholico, containing an explanation of the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer, published by Martene and Durand in their Theaur. Anecdotum, vol. v, and in their Vete- rum Scriptorum Collectio, vol. ix. See Schröck, Kirch- enpsech. xxvii, 409 sq; Lea, Hist. of Sacerdotal Celibacy, p. 372 sq; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxi, 439 sq; Gorton, Biogr. Dict. s. v. (J. H. W.)

Hugo of Angoulême flourished in the 10th century. As a theologian he had become the dominant influence in France; but, seeing of Angoulême (March 21, 978) he sought also to assume the temporal government over his diocese, and became entangled in controversies with count Arnold, the prince of that country, against whom he even waged war. It is thought that Hugo finally withdrew from the bishopric, retired to the abbey of St. Clair, and died in obscurity in 999. He is said to have left seven or- iginal works, but they have not yet come to light.—Hist. Litt. de la France, vol. viii; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxv, 428.

Hugo of Besançon was born towards the close of the 10th century, and was appointed archbishop of Besançon, as successor of archbishop Gaucher of Salins, in 1091. Immediately on assuming the charge of the see he dismissed the canons of St. Anatole of Salins, and gave this church to the monks of St. Bénigne of Dijon; but he afterwards repented of the change, and reinstated the chapter of St. Anatole in 1046. He is said to have been a man of great learning, and to have exerted a claim on the confidence of his pope and of his emperor. Under the emperor Henry III he was arch-chancellor. He also assisted at the coronation of king Philip I of France. He died July 27, 1066.—Dunois de Carnage, Histoire de l'Evêque de Besançon, i, 29 sq; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxv, 429.

Hugo of Breteuil was born near the opening of the 11th century, and was educated as a theologian at the school in Chartres. He was made bishop of Langres by king Robert some time in the first months of 1051. Conducting himself in a manner unworthy of his high position in the Church, he was finally accused of adultery and homicide, and other even more atro- cious crimes, and was brought to trial before a council at Rheims. At first he braved the accusations, and sought to defend himself; but, finding that the proof against him was impossible of contradiction, he finally fled, and was punished with excommunication. To escape him they had to go on foot to Rome, where he procured an audience with pope Leo IX, and obtained par- don. On his return home he died at Biterne, France, March 16, 1051. He is the author of an interesting letter On the Errors of Biterne (published as an appendix to the Historia Frisonum,—Hist. Litt. de la France, vii, 438; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, xxv, 428 sq.

Hugo of Castro-Novo (Novaco), an English theologian, flourished, according to Wadding (Annal. Min., iii), about 1310. He belonged to the order of the Minimi, and was an ardent defender of the philosophy of Duns Scotus. He is said to have been the author of De Victoriae Christi contra Antichristum (printed in 1477 by Bartolus de Laspe in Florence, and in 1568 by the Florentine printer, Corsi). The first part of this work, which closes with the 10th century, is trifling and erroneous, but the second part contains much important information on the ecclesiastical history of France in the 11th and 12th centuries.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxv, 459 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, iv, 308.

Hugo of Frazan or Trasan, tenth abbot of Cluny (q.v.), the Prosper of which was Abbot of Cluny in the 12th century, became abbot in 1157 or 1158. Taking sides with the anti-pope Victor IV, he was excommunicated by pope Alexander III, and driven from the abbey. He died about 1160. Several works are attributed to him, but without good reason.—H. lit. de la France, xiii, 571 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxv, 442.

Hugo (St.) of Grenoble was born at Chateauneuf, in the Dauphiné, and became a priest at Valence. In 1080 he was appointed bishop of Grenoble, but he only accepted the position after considerable hesitancy, and even left the bishopric some time after, and retired to the abbey of Chaise-Dieu, in Clermont, as a Benedictine monk. By order of pope Gregory VII, however, he returned again to Grenoble. He died there April 1, 1139. He was declared saint two years after by pope Innocent II. Hugo was a very pious man, and especially rigid in the enforcement of the vow of celibacy. During fifty-three years he devoted the active duties of his bishopric, it is said he never saw the face of a woman except that of one aged mendicant. See Real-Encyclop. f. d. Kathol. Deutschl., v, 580 sq.; Lea, History of Sacerdotal Celibacy, p. 298.

Hugo of Langres. See Berengarius.

Hugo of Lincoln, was born in 1140 at Gratiapopolis, Burgundy, and was first a regular canon, and later a Carthusian monk. When Henry II of England was at Witham, in Somersetshire, he invited Hugo to accept the priory of this new foundation. After many entreaties by Reginald, bishop of Bath, Hugo consented. He was also made bishop of Lincoln by Henry II. He died in Nov. 1200, and was canonized at Rome in 1221. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxv, 448; Wheatly, Book of Common Prayer, b. 76; Lea, Hist. of Sacerdotal Celibacy, p. 296. (J. H. W.)

Hugo, archbishop of Lyons, was born about the middle of the 11th century, and was one of the most distinguished supporters of the Roman Church, in her efforts to extort the papacy, during the last half of the 11th century, when Gregory VII and the emperor Henry IV were at variance with each other. He was the papal legate (under pope Urban II) at the Council of Autun, A.D. 1094, who pronounced the ban on king Philip of France for the repudiation of his lawful wife Bertha. Hugo died Oct. 7, 1106. His only works are his letters, which, according to the Hist. Lit. de la France (ix, p. 355), are very valuable to the historian of the 12th century. See Neander, Ch. Hist. iv, 123; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxv, 429 sq.

Hugo of Magon, a French ecclesiastic, was born about the close of the 11th century, and was educated by his cousin St. Bernard. He was appointed abbe of Pontigny, as the representative of which he appeared in 1128 at the Council of Troyes. In 1146 Hugo was elected bishop of Auxerre, and was consecrated the January following. He was an attendant at the Council of Sens, which condemned the doctrines of Abelard (q.v.); also in 1148 at the Council of Rheims, where he combated the opinions of Gilbert de Paris. In 1150 he stood high in the ecclesiastical courts of the chief of the papal states. After his death, Oct. 10, 1151, the manner in which he disposed of the immense fortunes which he had amassed by great avariciousness, and which, instead of being bequeathed for distribution among the poor of his diocese, were given to his nephew, greatly annoyed his friends and his cousin, the pious St. Bernard, finally had the will Hugo of Monceaux, a distinguished French divine, was born in the early part of the 12th century. He was first monk at Vézelay, then abbot of St. Germain (1162). He was consecrated by pope Alexander III. April 21, 1163. The pretensions of bishop Maurice, of Paris, and his written work in defence of the church, were vehemently opposed by Hugo, and this occasioned a controversy, of which a summary was published by Hugo. It forms a very interesting document of his time (printed in the collection of Andre Duchesne, vol. iv.). In the same year (May 19) Hugo assisted at the Council of Tours, where he continued the controversy with Maurice, which was finally brought before the pope, who decided in favor of the monk. In 1165 (Aug. 22) Hugo was one of the abbots who presided at the baptism of the royal infant later Philip Augustus. He was also about this time in trunder with various ecclesiastical offices, and in 1170 he attended the Council of Larat. He died Mar. 27, 1182—Hoefer, Nouv. Bioq. Generale, xxv, 446; Hist. Lit. de la France, xiii, 615; Gallia Christiana, vii, col. 442. (J. H. W.)

Hugo of Nonant, an English divine, was born at Nonant, in Normandy, in the first half of the 12th century. He was educated at Oxford University. About 1173 he became archdeacon of Lisieux, and, towards 1185, bishop of Conisburgh. He was the Romish legate to England during the administration of the bishops of Durham and Ely, in the absence of Richard of the East, and his influence caused the removal of these bishops in 1191. Only three years later he was himself driven from his see, but he was permitted in 1195 to return again, on paying a fine of 5000 marks silver to the royal treasury. He died in April, 1198, during a voyage, or more probably, while in exile a second time. The re- cital of the disgrace of the bishop of Ely was written down by Hugo, and has been published by Roger of Hoveden (Script. Rev. Ang. p. 702). It is a very popular pamphlet.—Hist. Lit. de la France, xv; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioq. Generale, xxv, 447.

Hugo de Paganis. See Knight Templars.

Hugo of Portieux, a monk of Vézelay, of whose life but little is known, flourished in the 12th century. He wrote a history of the monastery of Vézelay, which has been published by D'Arcy in his Histoire d'Avignon, iii. He is also supposed to be the author of the Chronique des Comtes de Nevers, inserted by Labbe in his Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Manuscrits. He died about 1161.—Hist. Lit. de la France, vii, 668 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioq. Generale, xxv, 439.

Hugo of Porto was born about the middle of the 11th century. He was archdeacon of Compostelle until the bishopric of Porto was established in 1114, when Hugo was elected to this see. He was a member of several church councils in 1122-25. He died about 1125. Of his writings, the History of the Church of Compostelle, which has never been printed, is of especial value for its information in the History de la France, xi, 115; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioq. Generale, xxv, 439. (J. H. W.)

Hugo of Rheims, son of count Herbert of Vermandois, flourished in the 10th century. He was elected archbishop of Rheims when not quite five years old, and installed as head of the Church in that city by the power of only six bishops. Hugo was succeeded by the monk Artoil or Artaud. Herbert, dissatisfied with this appointment, made Artoil prisoner, and called a synod at Soissons, which confirmed his son Hugo in the archbishopric. After Herbert's death Artoil was liberated, and great contentions arose between the two incumbents of the same see. In 947 a synod was held at Verdun; but this, as well as another held at Mouton in 948, proved of no avail. As Hugo had secured for himself the intercession of the people, he decreed that Hugo should hold the archbishopric. The friends of Artoil finally resolved to hold a national synod, when Hugo was deposed and Artoil installed. See Schrock, Kirchengesch. xxii, 252 sq.

Hugo of Rheinmont, a French theologian of the 12th century, of whose life but little is known, was the author of Epistola de Natura et Origine Antim (in Marteine, Anecdota, i, 368), which is based on the real and supposed works of Augustine. Of Aristotle's treatise On the Soul he seems to have been unaware.—Hoefer, Nouv. Bioq. Generale, xxv, 447; Hist. Lit. de la France, xi, 113.

Hugo of Sancto Caro (Hugo of St. Chery), sometimes also called Hugo de St. Chery, an eminent French theologian, was born at St. Chery (whence his surname), a suburb of Yenne, France, about 1200. He studied theology and canon law at Paris, and in 1224 joined the Dominicans in the convent of St. Jacques (where he is also called Hugo de St. Jacson), and in 1227 was made provincial of this order. He also taught theology in Paris, and was connected with several scientific undertakings. He was one of the commissioners who examined and condemned the Introductorius in Exang, a work of the Franciscan Gerhard, which developed the fanatical doctrines of Alb. Joachim of Flores and was accused in the controversy of William of St. Amour with the mendicant order. In 1245 he was made cardinal by Innocent IV, and died at Orvieto in 1263. The reputation of Hugo, however, rests chiefly upon his Biblical studies and writings. In 1230 he executed a commentary of the prophecies of the Vulgate, an immense labor for that age. A copy of this work, preserved in the Nuremberg Library, has this title: "Liber de correctionibus noris super Biblia, ad scientiam qui sitiger et communitor litera, Reverendissimi patris et domini D. Hugonis, sacris Rom. eccles. presbyteri et patris theologii professores, unum ordine predicatorem." His principal published works are Postilla in universa Biblia, a sort of brief commentary, prepared, however, without sufficient acquaintance with the original languages of the Bible (Basil, 1487, etc.)—Episcopum ecclesie (Lyons, 1554). But his most important service was to make literature was his conception of the plan of a Concordance, which he executed, with the aid of many monks of his order, in his Sacrorum Bibl. Concordantias (latest ed. Avignon, 1786, 2 vols. 4to). It is an alphabetical index of all the words in the Vulgate, and has formed the model of all the Concordances of the Bible. It is also the effect also of bringing the division into chapters and verses into general use. See Quetif et Echard, Scriptores ordinis predicatorum, i, 194 sq.; Hist. Lit.:ter de la France, xix, 38 sq.; Richard Simon, Nouvelles observations sur le texte et les versions du N. Testi, ii, 129; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vol. vii; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioq. Generale, xxv, 450; Kitto, Bibl. Cyclop., ii, 340.

Hugo of St. Victor, said to have been count of Blankenburg, was born at Eln, near Ypres, about 1097, and educated in the convent of Hammereleben, near Halberstadt. When eighteen years of age he went to Paris, and joined the Augustines of St. Victor. He next became professor of theology, and his success as a teacher and writer was very brilliant. He died at Paris about 1141. Hugo was the most spiritual theologian of his time, and the precursor of the later Mystics. He recommended the use of the Bible for private devotion, and urged also its study on priests and teachers. He followed the theology of Peter of Aureille, but only as a support, not as a foundation, so successfully, that he was called Auguste the Second, and the Mouth of Augustine. "In Hugo we see the representative of a school distinguished in the 12th century for its hearty religious spirit, and its tendency to practical reform; a school which, though it united more or less the mystic contemplative with the speculative element, yet constantly kept up the contest. with the predominant dialectic tendency of the times. If, in Abelard, we see those spiritual tendencies which had been harmoniously united by Anselm, brought into conflict with each other, we see them once more reconciled in Hugo, but with this difference, that in him the dialectical element is not so strong as it was in Anselm. In Abelard, it is distinctly present, and he often appeals to it and contends against Abelard, though without mentioning his name. The empirical department of knowledge generally, and in theology the study of the older Church teachers, and of the Bible, was made specially prominent by Hugo, in opposition to one-sided speculation and circumscription. To the doctrine of grace, as it was in Anselm, Hugo was the first of the scholastics to give definiteness. Unsat- isfied with Augustine's definition of them as sacra rei sigillum, he says, in his Summa, that the sacrament is risibilis forma invisibilis gratiae, in eo collatae.

In his De sacramentis fidelis he defines it still more distinctly as a "symbol of grace," which is the essence of that of the divine institution, exhibits, and really contains, symbolically, invisible grace." He also distinguishes three classes of sacraments: the first, those on which salvation especially depends (Baptism and the Lord's Supper); the second those of which it is necessary to salvation, but yet useful for sanctification; the third contains all the rest. Of course he believed in transubstantiation, calling the mode of the change transsustitutio, but he considered it a means of communion with Christ. The best edition of his collected works is the first—Opera Omnibus, studii, Badii Ascensi et J. Parvii (Paris, 1526, 5 vols. fol.). The later editions are Venice, 1699; Cologne, 1617; Rouen, 1648; all in 3 vols. See Neander, Ch. History, iv, 401 sq.; Dupin, Eccles. Writers, 12th cent.; Oudin, Comment, de Script. Eccles. t. ii, p. 1138; Schmit, Mysticismus d. Müt- tellers (Jena, 1824); Lieber, Monographie über Hugo (Leips. 1829). A number of the writings attributed to Hugo are entirely not his, and others of his real writings remain unedited. The task of selecting what are and what are not his genuine works has been under- taken by M. Hauréau, of Paris, who will doubtless do it full justice. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Hugo Alcein de Bilom, or Hugo Soguis, was born at Bilom, in Auvergne, about 1230, was educated at the college of the Church of St. Sévère, and afterwards entered the monastery at Clermont, which, he privileges at various places with great success, and was awarded, on account of his superior scholarship, the doctorship of divinity by the University of Paris, where he was afterwards professor of theology. In 1258 Hugo went to Rome, and was created by pope Honorius III, at the request of his master, Nicolas IV, made him cardinal, May 15, 1288. He died at Rome Dec. 29, 1297. He is said to have written works on the beatific vision, an apologetic work against the corrupters of the doctrines of St. Thomas, De Veritatis, a volume of Sermom., etc. See Herbermann, Lex. Sacra, vi, 308 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, xxv, 450.

Hugo, Herman, a distinguished Jesuit, born at Brussels in 1588, wrote several historical and theological works. He is celebrated on account of his Pia desideria enodatissimi illustratissimi (1624, 8vo; 1629, 12mo; translated into English as Divine Assistance and Artikel Water, 3d ed, corrected, Lond. 1702, 8vo). He died of the plague at Rheinberg Sept. 10, 1629. See Darling, Cyclop. Bibl. ii, 1572; Nouv. Dict. Hist. p. 386.

Hugociano, Francois, a distinguished Roman Catholic prelate, according to some was an Englishman by birth, but according to others was born at Pisa in the first half of the 14th century. By an acquaintance which he formed with pope Boniface IX he was able to procure the archbishopric of Bordeaux in 1389, and some time after he was also made Boniface's legate to Gascony, the kingdoms of Navarre, Castile, Leon, and Aragon. In 1406 he was made cardinal by pope Innocent VII, and was a fierce champion of orthodoxy against the heretical tendencies of the latter. He was especially prominent at the Council of Pisa in 1409. He died at Florence Aug. 14, 1412. See Encyclop. Thol. xxxi, 1082 sq. (J. H. W.)

Hugenot, Philibert, a distinguished Roman Catholic prelate who flourished in the 15th century, was educated at the universities of Dijon, Turin, and Padua, and succeeded his uncle in the bishopric of Macon. Huguenots, originally a nickname applied to the partisans of the Reformation in France. The origin of this word is rather obscure. Some derive it from Hugo, a word applied in Tours, &c., to persons who walk at night in the street—the early French Protestants, like the early Christians, having chosen that time for their religious assemblies. Others derive it from a faulty pronunciation of the German Eidgenoessische, signifying commonwealth, in account of the union between the French Protestants and the Swiss confederates, which maintained themselves against the tyrannical attempts of Charles III, duke of Savoy, and were called Eigemossen. Others derive it from the part which the French Protestants took in sustaining Henry IV, the descendant of Hugo Capet, to the throne of France against the Guises. Another derivation is from the subterranean vaults in which they held their assemblies, outside the walls of Tours, near a gate called Fourgon, an alteration from fea Hugo. This last derivation is strengthened by the fact that they were originally called "Huguenots of Tours." Still others derive it from the name of a very small coin of the time of Hugo, to denote the vile condition of the Protestants. Thus the distinguished German philologist, Prof. Mahn, of Berlin, in his Phymologische Untersuchungen auf dem Gebiete der Romanischen Sprachen, gives no less than fifteen supposed derivations, but inclines himself to the opinion that the word Huguenot was originally applied as a nickname to the early French Protestants, and that it was derived from Hugo, the name of some heretic or conspiurator, and was formed from it by the addition of the French diminutive ending of, like Jacot, Margot, Jeannot, etc.

At the very commencement of the Reformation in Germany, adherents of the cause of the Reformers sprang up in France, then under the government of Francis I. Under the powerful support which these French Reformers found in Margaret of Navarre, sister of the king, as early as 1526 Melchor Wolmar, a Swiss, preached the Gospel in the south of France, and Lutheran sects in these parts. The circulation of Lefevre's New Testament by the thousand throughout France by pedlars from Switzerland, where copies were printed by Farel (q. v.), still further increased the number of the Reformers and finally led to the promulgation of an ordinance by the Sorbonne, obtained from the king, for the suppression of printing (Feb. 26, 1538). In 1538, Calvin (q. v.), who had been invited to Paris by the rector of the University, began to preach the new doctrines in that and other cities, and by his efforts assisted in the success of the French Protestants, who now began to be known by the name of Huguenots. Indeed, so numerous had they become, that, to e xtremitate, if possible, by force, their doctrine before it should spread further, the Church resorted, by consent of the king, in 1545, to a massacre in the Vaud of Provence, which was accompanied by horrors impossible to describe. Some of the Huguenots followed it in arms, whence the whole affair became known as the conspiracy of Amboise. They were defeated, however, by the forces of the Guises, and 1200 of them, taken prisoner, were executed as traitors. The Guises next moved against those who were suspected of being the instigators of the rising, and the head of which were the duke of Guise, the constable of Montmorency, and marshal St. André, who seized the king and the regent under pretence of providing for their safety, proclaimed the Huguenots, who had at the same time been gathering at Orleans under Condé, rebels, and declared a general and pointing to the consequences.

During the minority of Charles IX, who ascended the throne Dec. 5, 1560, a boy only ten years old, the strife between the parties which divided the court became more violent, as the chancellor de l'Hôpital, on the assembling of Parliament in Dec. 1560, had exhorted men of all parties "to rally round the young king," and, while condemning the odious punishments which had recently been inflicted on persons of the Reformed faith, announced the intended holding of a national council, and expressed the desire that henceforward France should recognize neither the Guise nor the papists, but one religion. Catherine de Medicis regarded it to her interest to balance the power of the two parties so as to govern both more easily, seconded the views of the chancellor. The two princes of Condé, who had been prisoners at Lyons after the affair of Amboise, were liberated. Antoine de Navarre was made constable of France, and a new edict was published in July, 1561, which granted full forgiveness to the Huguenots, who, as it was stated, were no longer to be designated by such nicknames. Finally, a conference was appointed (Sept. 8) for both parties to meet with a view to conciliation. This conference is famous in history as the Conference of Poissy (q. v.). The Cardinal de Lorraine led the Roman Catholic theologians, but was signalized defeated, especially by the arguments of Theodore Beza. The Huguenots, emboldened by their success, next adopted the Calvinistic confession, and, thus united, rose more strongly against Romanism, countering among their friends Catherine herself, who had been forced to their side by the machinations of the Guises. January 17, 1562, a royal edict was issued, guaranteeing to the Protestants liberty of worship. The Guises and their partisans now became exasperated. On Christmas day, 1562, about 50,000 of the Vaudois of Vassy, in Compagnies, met, in divine worship, and to celebrate the sacrament according to the practices of their Church. Vassy was one of the possessions of the Guises, and the bishop of Châtillon complaining to Antoine de Bourbon, an ardent Roman Catholic, she threatened the Huguenots, if they persisted in their proceedings, with the vengeance of her son, the duke of Guise. Undismayed by this threat, the Protestants of Vassy continued to meet publicly, and listen to their preachers, believing themselves to be under the protection of the law, according to the terms of the royal edict. On March 1, 1568, while the Huguenots of Vassy, to the number of about 1200, were again assembled for divine worship in a barn—as they had shortly before been deprived of their churches by Catharine, who made this concession to Antoine de Navarre, in order to secure her support, still leaving them, however, on the estates of noblemen—they were attacked by a band of armed men, led by the duke of Guise, and massacred. For an hour they fired, hacked, and stabbed amongst them, the duke coolly watching the carnage. Sixty persons of both sexes were left dead on the spot, more than two hundred were severely wounded, and the rest contrived to escape. After the massacre the duke sent for the local judge, and severely reprimanded him for having permitted the Huguenots of Vassy to meet. The judge intrenched himself behind the edict of the king. The duke's eye flashed with rage, and, striking the hill of his sword with his hand, he said, "The sharp edge of this will soon cut you to pieces" (Smilks, Huguenots, p. 48; comp. Davila, Histoire des Guerres civiles de France, ii, 379). This massacre was the match applied to the charge ready to explode. It was the signal to Catholic France to rise in mass against the heretics, and to Protestant France a warning for their lives. The king, however, Rouen, and the head of which were the duke of Guise, the constable of Montmorency, and marshal St. André, who seized the king and the regent under pretence of providing for their safety, proclaimed the Huguenots, who had at the same time been gathering at Orleans under Condé, rebels, and declared a general and pointing to the consequences of the first war of the Huguenots. September 11, 1562, the royal troops, after much bloodshed, took Rouen, and December 19 a battle was fought at Dreux, in which, after a terrible struggle, the Protestants were defeated.

One of the leaders of the Romanists, marshal St. André, fell in battle; another, the constable of Montmorency, was made prisoner by the Huguenots, and the leader of the latter in turn fell into the hands of the Guises. An exchange of prisoners, however, was immediately effected. The duke of Guise now marched against Orleans, but was assasinated in his own camp, Feb. 19, 1568, before he had been able to attack the great garrison of Rouen of the Protestants. The queen mother, realizing the loss which the Romanists, to whose side she had been forced by policy, had sustained in the death of the duke of Guise, and informed of a threatened invasion of the English on the coast near Normandy, concluded a peace with the Protestants, March 19, by which the Protestants were again granted the privileges of the edict of 1562, with several additions. The armies now united, and made common cause against the English. As soon, however, as Catharine thought herself able to dispense with the aid of the Hu- guenots, she threw off both foot and horse, and the destruction she was resolved, she again restricted the privileges conceded them in the edict of Amboise, formed a close alliance with Spain for the extirpation of heresy, and made attempts to secure the imprisonment, and death if possible, of Condé and of the admiral Coligny (q. v.). The Huguenots were alarmed, and their leaders adopted the resolution, Sept. 29, 1567, to secure, at the castle of Moreaux, the king's person, in whose name Catharine de Medicis was acting. The court, having received information of this decision, fled to Paris. Condé immediately followed, and, laying siege to the city, opened the second war of Huguenots and Catholics. After a siege of one month, Condé and the constable Montmorency met for battle, November 10, 1567, at St. Denis. Here 2700 Huguenots fought against no less than 20,000 royal troops. But so well did the Huguenots maintain their ground, that the victory was undecided. The superior force of the royal troops made Condé fall back into Lorraine, where he was re-enforced by 10,000 German warriors, under prince John Casimir. Condé with these forces now threatened Paris (Feb. 1568), and Catharine, in her fright, at once offered a treaty of peace, which was concluded at Longjumeau March 27, 1568, re-establishing the terms of the treaty of Amboise, generally known as the petite paix (little peace) of Longjumeau. Notwithstanding this treaty, which both parties seem to have signed only because they felt under compulsion, Catharine continued all manner of persecutions against the Protestants. "On the grounds of the Or- lage by the court, resounded with the horrid maxim that faith need not be kept with heretics, and that to massacre them was just, pious, and useful for salvation" (De Thou, Vie de Coligny, p. 390). In less than three months more than 8000 Protestants were either assassinated or executed. The Huguenots had the upper hand, and the upholder of the rights of all citizens without distinction of creed, who had become obnoxious to Rome and her adherents, was dismissed or forced to resign, and the seizure of Condé and Coligny resolved upon. Fortunately, however, for the Protestants, some of the royal officers were unwilling to be instruments in the massacre likely to ensue upon such an act, and Condé and Coligny received warning to flee for their lives. Rochelle, one of the strongholds of the Protestants, which had baffled all the attacks and plans of Catharine, was open to receive them, and thither they consequently repaired for safety by the royal blood-hunters. Measures had also been planned for entrapping the other leading Protestants, but they all failed in the execution. "The cardinal of Châtillon, an adherent to the Protestant cause, who was at his see (Beaumont), escaped into Normandy, took the deputation of the parliament that was favorably crossed on a small vessel, and there became of great service to the Protestant cause by his negotiations. The queen of Navarre, warned in time by Coligny, also hastened to Rochelle with her son and daughter, contributing some money and four thousand soldiers. The chiefs-in-general took the defensive, and immediately raised levies in their different provinces. The guerrillas maintained by these persons kept the Catholic army in full employment, and preserved Rochelle from a general attack till proper measures had been taken for its defence." Catharine, outwitted in her diabolical attempts, now resolved to end the war by the aid of some miscalculation of the Protestants. She thereupon published an edict declaring the willingness of the government to protect the Protestants in future, as well as to render them justice for the past. But so completely was this edict at variance with her conduct that it passed unnoted. Enraged at this, she now promulgated several edicts against the Huguenots, whereby every edict that had ever been published in their favor, and forbade, under the penalty of death, the exercise of any other religion than the Roman Catholic. This sudden revocation of all former edicts made her acts a public declaration that she was resolved on a new war of religion, and the Huguenots, fortified in their strongholds, and with assistance which they had obtained from Germany and England, now began the third religious war. On March 13, 1569, the two contending armies met in battle at Jamac, near La Rochelle, in which the Catholics were defeated. On the 25th of March, the duke of Anjou sat in a chamber of the palace to give the signal for the massacre. A pistol-shot fired from one of the windows of the palace called out 800 of the royal guard, who, wearing, to distinguish themselves in the darkness, a white sash on the left arm and a white cross in their hats, rushed into the streets, shouting "For God and the king!" and commenced the most perfidious butcherry recorded in history. The houses of the Huguenots were broken in, and all who could be found murdered, the king himself firing from his window on those who passed in the streets. Some 5000 Huguenots, among them their great and noble leader, the admiral Coligny (q.v.), were thus killed in Paris; while many Roman Catholics met with the same fate at the hands of personal enemies, under the plea of their being inclined to Protestantism. The next day orders were sent to the governors of the provinces to follow the example of the capital. A few only had the manliness to resist this order, and in the space of sixty days some 70,000 persons were murdered in the provinces. See BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY. Those who escaped took refuge in the mountains and at La Rochelle. Henry of Navarre was compelled to sign a recantation. The prince of Condé became a Roman Catholic, and Charles IX declared in Parliament that Protestantism was extinct in France. "Catharine de Medicis wrote in triumph to Alva (the ignominious commander of Philip's troops in the Netherlands), 'I charge my Marshal of St. Agnes to show himself a Christian, and to the Duke of St. Pol his importunity at the care of the three days' dreadful work at Paris. When Philip heard of the massacre, he is said to have laughed for the first and only time in his life. Rome was thrown into a delirium of joy at the news. The cannon were fired at St. Angelo, and the bells rung, and the people went from sanctuary to sanctuary to give God thanks for the massacre. The subject was ordered to be painted, and a medal was struck to celebrate the atrocious event, with the pope's head on one side, and on the other an angel, with a cross in one hand and a sword in the other, pursuing and slaying a band of flying heretics. As the legend it bears, 'Vegitorium Strepitis,' 1572, briefly epitomizes the terrible story." The festival of St. Bartholomew was also ordered to be yearly celebrated in commemoration of the event. Not satisfied with these demonstrations at Rome, Gregory sent cardinal Orsini on a special mission to Paris to congratulate the king.
His passage was through Lyons, where 1800 persons had been killed, the bodies of many of whom had been thrown into the Rhone to horrify the dwellers near that river below the city (Smiles, Huguenots, p. 60).

Although deprived so suddenly of their leaders, and greatly weakened by the slaughter of great numbers of their best and most trusted men, they chose to wait together in their strong places, and prepared to defend themselves by force against force. "In the Cevennes, Dauphiny, and other quarters, they betook themselves to the mountains for refuge. In the plains of the south fifty or sixty strong places against the royal troops. Wherever resistance was possible it showed itself." Thus opened the fourth war of the Huguenots. The duke of Anjou, at the head of the Romanists, marched against the forts in the hands of the Huguenots. He attacked La Rochelle, but was repulsed, and obliged to retire from the siege, after losing nearly his whole army. The duke of Anjou becoming king of Poland, peace was concluded June 24, 1573, and the Protestants received as security the towns of Montauban, Nîmes, and La Rochelle, besides enjoying freedom of conscience, though not of worship, throughout the kingdom. Charles IX feared the support of the Netherlands and the western provinces, and arranged a treaty of peace with the Huguenots, with a section of the Roman Catholic nobility, to depose the queen and the Guises, and to place on the throne the chief of the Romanists, the duke of Alençon, the youngest son of Catharine and of Francis II, who, from political motives and the common cause of religion, had united in a common cause. The leaders made arrangements with Henry of Navarre and the prince of Condé, Protestant princes, for the humiliation of Austria, and only a premature rising of the Protestants defeated the plan. Some of the conspirators were executed, D'Alençon and Henry of Navarre were arrested, and Condé fled to Germany, where he returned to Protestantism, saying that his abjuration had been obtained from him by violence.

The fifth war of the Huguenots began under Henry III, the former duke of Alençon, who became king of France in 1574. In this war the Roman Catholics lost several strong towns, and were repeatedly defeated by the Huguenots. The prince of Condé returned to France with a German army under the orders of John Casimir, and in March, 1576, was joined by the duke of Alençon, who was at enmity with the king. In the south, Henry of Navarre and the Huguenots became alarmed, and finally concluded the peace of Beau- lieu, May 8, 1576, granting the Huguenots again a number of places of security, and freeing them from all restrictions in the exercise of their religion, also the promise to indemnify the German allies of the Huguenots for the war expenses. The Guises, thus frustrated in their political designs, instigated the inhabitants of Peronne, under the leadership of Humières, to organize an association called the Holy League (q. v.), in 1576, for the defence of the interests of Romanism. The league rapidly increased, was supported by the king, by Spain, and the pope, and finally led to the sixth war of the Huguenots. The states, however, refusing to give the king money to carry it on, and the Roman Catholics being divided among themselves, the peace of Ber- gerne was signed in September, 1577. The conditions were the same as those of the former occasion; but Catha- rine, in her anxiety to diminish the growing power of the Guises, entered into a private treaty with Henry of Navarre (at Nerau), and thus the Protestants were put in possession of a few more towns.

The seventh war of the Huguenots, called at court the war of the Black or Holy League, occurred in 1578. The Guises, who instigated the king to demand back the towns given to the Protestants as securities, and to violate the treaty in various ways. Condé answered by taking Rambouillet in November, 1579, and Henry by taking Cahors in April, 1580. The duke of Anjou intending to employ the royal forces in the Netherlands, and the Hugue- notes having met with several disastrous encounters with the Romanists, peace was concluded again at Flex, Sept. 12, 1580, and the Huguenots were permitted to retain their strongholds six years longer. A comparatively long interval of peace for France now followed.

But when the duke of Anjou (formerly of Alençon) died in 1584, leaving Henry of Navarre, a Protestant, their presumptive and destined monarch, on the throne, the "Holy League" sprang again into existence under the influence of the adherents of the Guises, the strict Roman Catholic members of the Parliament, the fanatical clergy, and the ultra-conservative party. The states, especially the six- teen districts to the west of the Loire (where the name of Ligue des Seize), took an active part in it. Henry, duke of Guise, finally concluded a treaty with Spain, signed at the castle of Jovenville January 3, 1585, creating a strong opposition to the succession of Henry of Navarre to the throne, and aimed even against Henry III, who seemed inclined to favor his brother-in-law. At the same time the Guises sought, though not altogether successfully, the approbation of pope Gregory XIII to the declaration of cardinal of Bourbon as heir to the throne, under the pretense that, as a faithful Catholic, he would aid his Church in extirpating here-esy. Though the treaty of Jovenville was not publicly proposed so old an incumbent for the throne, was to obtain for himself the crown of France, which seemed by no means a chimerical attempt, as he had received strong assurances of support from Spain. With the assistance of the Spanish galleys and funds sent him by his Spanish ally, the duke concluded a treaty in taking only from the Huguenots, but also from the king. Henry III, hesitating to send an army against the duke of Guise promptly, was finally obliged to sign the edict of Nemours, July 7, 1585, by which all modes of worship except that of the Roman Catholics were prohibited throughout France. All Huguenot ministers were given one month, and the Huguenots six months, to leave the country, and all their privileges were declared forfeited. Though put under the ban as heretics by pope Sixtus V, Henry of Navarre and the prince of Condé prepared to resist the execution of the royal edict by force of arms. With the aid of money from England, and an army of 80,000 men sent from Germany, they took the field in 1587, and began the eighth war of the Huguenots, called also, from the names of the leaders, the war of the three Henrys. The Huguenots gained the battle of Cerons, Oct. 14, 1587, but they were soon sur- prised and defeated, and their German allies were obliged to leave the country. The duke of Guise was left master of the field. He was not slow to grasp the power of the state, and obliged the king to sign the edict of reunion of Rouen, July 19, 1588, for the formal submission of the Huguenots, and the exclusion of Henry of Navarre from the succession to the throne. The king, to whom it now became evident that the duke of Guise's aim was to secure the throne for himself, feigned acquiescence in the demand, called a Parliament at Blois in order to gain time, and there caused both of the Guises to be murdered (Dec. 23, 1588). Both Protestants and Ro- man Catholics were indignant at this act of treachery; the Parliament denounced the king as an assassin, and Charles of Guise, duke of Mayenne, who had escaped the massacre, made himself master of several provinces, marched on Paris, and took up a position at Rambouillet general of the kingdom. Catharine having died in 1589, Henry III made a treaty with Henry of Navarre, but was himself assassinated in the camp of St. Cloud by the monk Jacques Clement, August 1, 1588. Henry of Navarre, a Protestant in belief, now succeeded to the throne under the name of Henry IV, determined to conquer for himself the possessions which had been wrested from his kingdom by the league and the Spaniards. But finding that he could obtain security of life and permanent possession of his dominion only by be- coming a Roman Catholic, he abjured the faith of his fathers in the church of St. Denis, July 28, 1593. The duke of Mayenne, supported by Spain, still continued the war against the king, but the latter having obtained absolution from the pope in 1555, notwithstanding the efforts of the Jesuits, who had sold their influence to Spain, many forsook the league to join the royal standard, and by May 1556 the Protestants had been obliged to retreat to peace with the king. On April 15, 1556, Henry IV granted to the Protestants, for whom he had cherished great affection, the celebrated Edict of Nantes (q. v.), consisting of ninety-one articles, by which the Huguenots were allowed to worship in their own way throughout the kingdom, except the exception of a few towns; their ministers were to be supported by the state; inability to hold offices was removed; their poor and sick were to be admitted to the hospitals; and, finally, the towns given them as security were to remain in their hands eight years longer. Pope Clement VIII became enraged at the treaty, and wrote Henry that "a decree which gave liberty of conscience to all was the most accursed that had ever been made." His influence was also used to induce Parliament to refuse its approval to the edict, but it was finally registered in spite of Huguenot opposition, Feb. 25, 1559.

After the death of the king, who had himself especially obnoxious to the Jesuits, he was eventually assassinated by Ravaillac May 14, 1610. Henry's second wife, Mary of Medicis, and her son Louis XIII, still a minor, now assumed the government. The Edicts of tolerance were by them also ratified; but the violence committed by public discontent, in the first part of the reign, by the right of lords to take their deer became impediments to the free exercise of their religion. Thus, in 1622, an edict forbade them to take their deer except at daylight or at nightfall. Another decree in 1663 excused new converts from payment of debts previously contracted with their former-religionism.

In 1665 their children were allowed to declare themselves Roman Catholics—if boys, at fourteen; if girls, at twelve years of age; parents either to continue to provide for their apostate children, or to appeal to them a part of their possessions. In 1679 it was decreed that converts who had returned to Protestantism should be punished. In 1680 Huguenot clerks and notaries were deprived of their employments, emigrations of Protestants and Roman Catholics were forbidden, and the issue of such marriages declared illegitimate, and incapable of succeeding afterwards. In 1681, the Rigour of the Edicts was increased. In 1685 their children who had declared for the Reformed religion were allowed to become Protestants at the age of seven years. "The kidnapping of Protestant children was actively set on foot by the agents of the Roman Catholic priests, and their parents were subjected to heavy penalties if they did not consent to the converts being brought up to pull down Protestant places of worship, and as many as eighty were shortly destroyed in one diocese. The Huguenots offered no resistance. All that they did was to meet together and pray that the king's heart might yet be softened towards them. Blow upon blow followed. Protestant teachers were forbidden to print books without the authority of magistrates of the Roman communion. Protestant teachers were interdicted from teaching anything more than reading, writing, and arithmetic. Such pastors as held meetings amid the ruins of the churches which had been pulled down, were compelled to do penance with the keys of the church, after which they were to be banished the kingdom. Protestants were prohibited from singing psalms on land or water, in workshops or in dwellings. If a priestly procession passed one of their churches while the psalms were sung, they must make a bow at once, and step instantly, on the step, off the platform, without a word. In short, from the pettiest annoyance to the most exasperating cruelty, nothing was wanting on the part of the "most Christian king" and his ministers.

In 1688, Colbert, who had been Louis's minister for several years, and who, convinced that the strength of states consisted of the number, the intelligence, and the industry of their citizens, had labored in all possible ways to prevent the hardships which Louis, led by his mistress, Madame de Maintenon, and his Jesuit confessoor, Pierre la Chambre, 300,000 of the Protestants were removed by death. Military executions and depredations against the Protestants now began throughout the kingdom. "Pity, terror, and anguish had by turns agitated their minds, until at length they were reduced to a state of despair. Life was made almost intolerable to them. All careers were closed against them, and Protestants of the working class were under the necessity of abjuring or starving. The mob, observing that the Protestants were no longer within the pale of the law, took the opportunity of wreaking all manner of outrages on them. They broke into their churches, tore up the bibles and hymn-books in a pile, set the whole on fire; the authorities usually leading their sanction on the proceedings of the rioters by banishing the burned-out ministers, and interdicting the further celebration of worship in the destroyed churches."

(Smiles, Huguenots, p. 135-6). Bodies of troops which had been quartered upon the Protestants to harass them, now made it a business to convert the Protestants. Accompanying by Jesuits, they passed through the southern provinces, compelling the inhabitants to renounce their religion, demolishing the places of worship, and putting to death the presbyters. Hundreds of thousands of Protestants, unwilling to renounce their religion, fled to Switzerland, the Netherlands, England, and Germany. In vain it was attempted to restrain this self-expatriation by cordon along the borders. Many Protestants also made an insincere profession of Roman Catholicism. To this, however, was an equal religious penalty, as those who were not considered as Protestants were put to death. On October 23, 1685, Louis at last revoked the edict of Nantes. This revocation enacted the demolition of all the remaining Protestant temples throughout France; the entire proscription of the Protestant religion; the prohibition of even private worship-ship; the confiscation of property, the banishment of all Protestant pastors from the kingdom within fifteen days; the closing of all Protestant schools; the prohibition of parents from instructing their children in the Protestant faith; the obligation, under penalty of a heavy fine, of having their children baptized in the Catholic Church; the abolition of the Roman Catholic religion; the confiscation of the property and goods of all Protestant refugees who failed to return to France within four months; the penalty of the galleys for life to all men, and of imprisonment for life to all women detected in the act of attempting to escape from France. These were a series of" ward eagerly from their once dearly-loved country. It is impossible to estimate with accuracy the number of the refugees. Sismondi (Hist. de France) computed that the total number of those who emigrated ranged from 800,000 to 1,000,000, and he estimates that about 200,000 were like number perished in prison, on the scaffold, at the galleys, and in their attempts to escape; and Weiss (in his History of the French Protestant Refugee) thinks the number no less than 300,000 of those who departed the French kingdom. Vauban wrote, only a year after the Revocation, that France must lose by this war of 26,000 in specie, 9000 sailors, 12,000 veterans, 600 officers, and her most flourishing manufactures; and Fenelon thus described the last years of the reign of Louis XIV: "The cultivation of the soil is almost abandoned; the towns and the country are becoming depopulated. All indus-ties have sunk into insignificance. The only thing that the Huguenots have become as but a huge hospital without provisions."

The hospitable shores of England, which had long before this period furnished an asylum to the fugitive Hugenots, were now eagerly sought, and the Huguenots met with kindness and assistance from the English government. At first, however, to a certain extent, the endowments of the former priest and monk, the fertile talent of the land, the most skillful artisans, directed their steps, and many great branches of industry of France, by the folly of a king who had taken his mistrix as his first state counsellor, received their death-blow. Instead of suffering the flood of prosperity and power to flow slowly down and drain off into the imperial edifice of the Huguenot states, which was at one time almost entirely finished, the king struck them completely prostrated. Indeed, more than a century really passed before they were restored to their former prosperity, "and then only to suffer another equally staggering blow from the violence and outrage which accompanied the outbreak of the French Revolution." In fact, this last period of Huguenot existence was not only as a providential retribution, but likewise a natural penalty for the civil wrongs inflicted upon the Protestants, since these cruel measures exiled from the country a large part of its piety and intelligence, by which alone that catastrophe might have been averted.

From this time, the idea of a French Protestant Church had always been very numerous, thousands, unwilling either to abjure their faith or to leave their native country, betook themselves to the mountains of the Cé-vennes, and continued the exercise of their religion in secret. These, and the mountaineers of the Cevennes, Geners whom Hugues d'Halong upbraided for their de-remarkable fanatical enthusiasm, under the name of Camiliards (q. v.), finally commenced to wage war against the royal forces, which was called the War of the Ce-vennes, or the Camisard War. It was successively carried on until 1702, when, in consequence of successfully defending Montpellier and other towns of Spain, they were allowed a respite, the royal troops being otherwise employed. Their number now rapidly augmented, especially in Provence and Dauphiny, and thus, notwithstanding all the persecutions which the Protestants had suffered, about two millions continued to adhere to their religion (Charles Coquerel, Hist. des Eglises du Desert, Par. 1841, 2 vols.).

A partial repose which the Huguenots now enjoyed for more than ten years greatly increased their numbers, especially in Provence and Dauphiny; but in 1724, Louis XV, who had ascended the throne in 1715, at the instigation of the ever-vexatious Jesuits, issued the severest ordinance against them. The spirit of the age, however, was too much opposed to persecution to suffer the edict to work the mischief intended. The governors of several provinces tolerated the Protestants, and as early as 1745 they resumed their assemblies in the mountains and celebrated their services in the desert. In 1744 new edicts were issued against them, requiring upon those who had been baptized or married in the desert (as it was called) a repetition of the rite by the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church. Even the Roman Catholics themselves soon felt, in consequence of these violent measures, and the persecution gradually ceased. Men like Montesquieu and Voltaire successfully advocated mild treatment, and it must be conceded that the Protestants owed much of the tolerations they afterwards met with to Voltaire's treatise on the subject, written in 1760, and to his procuring the release of John Calas (q. v.). Their position was still further improved on the accession of Louis XVI to the throne (1774). In 1787 an edict was issued (which the Parliament, however, registered only in 1789) which declared that freedom of Protestantism and marriages was recognised, though subject to some purely civil regulations; they were given cemeteries for the burial of their dead, were allowed to follow their religion privately, and granted the rights of citizenship, with the exception of the right of holding any official position.

The death of the French Revolution in 1789, a motion was made in the General Assembly to admit the Protestants to equal rights with the Roman Catholics: this motion was at first rejected, but finally removed. A decree of 1790 restored the Protestants to the possession of all the rights and property they had lost subsequently to the revocation of the edict of Nantes. The "Code Napoleon" placed the Protestants equal in their civil and political rights with the Roman Catholics, as, in fact, they had already been for more than fifteen years; and though, after the restoration of the Bourbons, some small restrictions were imposed, the protestants succeeded in exciting the populace of the department of the Gard to rise and murder the Protestants, the authorities conniving at the crime, still they remained equal to the Roman Catholics in the eye of the law. The spirit of persecution, however, continued, though in a somewhat weakened form, both by the government and in the government of the Bourbons, even in that of the Orleans family, though, after the July Revolution of 1830, the reformed charter of France had proclaimed universal freedom of conscience and of worship, a principle which was formally declared in 1831. (For the present state of Protestantism in France, see France.)

The descendants of the Huguenots long kept themselves a distinct people in the countries to which their fathers had fled, and entertained hopes of a return to their country; but as time passed on these hopes grew caller, while by habit and interest they became more united to the nations among whom they fell to their lot to establish a new home. The great crisis of the First Revolution finally severed all the ties that bound them to their native land. They either changed their names themselves, by translating them, or they were changed by the government into the form of bynames and misno-mention. Thus, in England, "the Lemaerts called themselves Master; the Leroy, King; the Tonnelsier, Cooper; the Lejeunes, Young; the Leblanc, White, the Lenoir, Black; the Loiseau, Bird. Thenceforward the Frenchman in London no longer existed. At the present day, the only vestige of it that remains is in the Spitalfields district, where a few thousand artisans, for the most part poor, still betray their origin, less by their language than by their costume, which bears some resemblance to that of the corresponding class in Louis XIV's time. The architecture of the houses they inhabit resembles that of the workmen of Lille, Amiens, and the other manufacturing towns of Picardy. The custom of working in cellars, or in glazed garrets, is also borrowed from their original country" (Weiss, p. 289, 284).

In our own country also, where the Huguenots settled at an early day, their descendants may be found, particularly in New York, Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinan; and, as in England, they have become naturalised, and their names have been changed, until it has become difficult to recognise them. "Their sons and grandsons, little by little, have become mingled with the society which gave a home to their fathers, in the same way as in England, Holland, and Germany.
As their Church disappeared in America, the members became attached to other evangelical denominations, especially the Episcopal, Reformed Dutch, Methodist, and Presbyterian. The French language, too, has long since disappeared with their Church service, which used to call to mind the country of their ancestors. French was preached in Boston until the close of the last century, and at New York the Huguenot services were celbrated both in French and English as late as 1772.
Here, at the French Protestant church, which succeeded the Huguenot years since, the Gospel was preached in the same language in which the prince of French pulpit orators, Saurin, used to declaim in France two centuries ago. The Huguenot church at Charleston, South Carolina, alone has retained in its primitive purity, in their public worship, the old Calvinistic liturgy of their fore-athers. The greater part of the exiled French families have long since disappeared, and their scattered commonwealths have despaired of amalgamation with the other races around them. These pious fugitives have been public blessings throughout the world, and have increased in Germany, Holland, and England the elements of power, prosperity, and Christian development. In our land, too, they helped to lay the firm corner-stones of the great republic whose glory they most justly share" (G. P. Diocesay, The Huguenots in America, as Appendix to Harper's edition of Smiles's Huguenots, p. 422). See Beza, Hist. des Eglises reform-Huguet, Marc Antoine, a French prelate, was born at Moissac in 1757. He entered the sacred order in his youth, and became curate of a little village in Avvergne.

In 1791 he was elected, at the close of the French Revolution he was a member of the Legislature, and of the National Convention, and voted for the death of the king. Complicated in several popular disturbcances, and conspiring against the established government, he was arrested in 1793, and imprisoned at Ham for several years. Engaging in a still another conspiracy which failed to accomplish its object, he was again arested, condemned to death, and executed Oct. 6, 1799.

Huish, Alexander, a learned English divine, who flourished in the 17th century, was fellow of Magdalen College, rector of Beckington and Hornblotton, Somersetshire. He published Lectures on the Lord's Prayer (Lond. 1626, 4to). He was also a very superior scholar of exegesis, and a prominent assistant on Walton's Polyglot Bible. His services were highly commented upon by bishop Walton himself. See Wraamgh, Proleg. ii, milah, who was then probably away at his native town Anathoth, or at some more distant place. There were gates of the temple in the middle of the southern wall, called "the gates of Huldah" (Mishna, tit. Middoth, i, 3), which, if they were so named from any connection with this Huldah, are stated to have been her residence on Ophel. See SHALLUM; JOSIAH.

Huldricus, Augustenensis Episcopus, who flourished in 860, was a scholar of Adalbert, and descended from the counts of Kilbur and Dillengen. He is known by his letter addressed to pope Nicholas against the celibacy of the clergy (Epistola de Cleri celibatu). It was translated into Latin, and published about the time of the Reformation (16mo), without date. —Darling, Cyclop. Bibliographica; Clarke, Succession of Sac. Lit., ii, 531.

Huldrich, Jean Jacques, a Swiss theologian, born at Zurich in 1888, belonged to a family of which several members have distinguished themselves as theologians and philanthropists. See HULDERICUS. He devoted much of his time to the acquisition of Hebrew, and went to the universities of Holland to pursue a course of study in the Oriental languages. On his return to his native place in 1706 he was made pastor of the House of Orphans. In 1724 he was appointed professor of moral science at the Gymnasium of Zurich. His scholarship was of a superior order, and he was frequently solicited to accept a professorship at the universities of Heidelberg and Groningen. He died at Zurich May 25, 1731. He published Historia Jesucaet Nazaremi, a Judaeis blaspheme corrupta, ex manuscripto haecanum inedito Heb. et Lat., cum notis (Leiden, 1705, 8vo) —Gentili, Obiectore, sive de culumiani gentilium in Judaeos commentarius (Zurich, 1744, 4to), a collection of sermons, etc.—Hoefer, Noue. Bibg. Gén. xxv, 470 sq.

Hull, Hope, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born March 15, 1769, in Worcester County, on the eastern shore of Virginia. His early education was rather neglected, and he was apprenticed to a carpenter at Baltimor. In this city he was converted, and entered the itinerancy in 1785. He was first appointed to Salisbury, North Carolina. With the exception of a brief period spent in New England, his time was given to the introduction of Methodism in the Southern States. His last appointment was the Savannah Circuit, Georgia. In 1794 he travelled with bishop Asbury, and located in 1795. He died October 4, 1818, at Athens, Ga. Hull possessed wonderful power over those who came within his influence, and was one of the most eloquent men that Methodism has ever produced. He died on his 63d year. His piety was deep, and many were converted under his labors. During his active work in the ministry, he secured for himself a pretty good education, and was at one time able even to assume the duties of teacher of Latin. He was also one of the first and strongest supports of the University of Georgia, which was founded during his residence at Athens. —Stevens, Memorials of Methodism, chap. ix; Boehm, Hist. Reform. p. 366; Sprague, Annals Amer. Pulpit, vii, 112 sq. (J. H. W.)

Hulin, Guillaume, a Roman cardinal, born at Étain, in the diocese of Verdun, in the latter half of the 14th century. He was at one time archdeacon of Verdun, and later of Metz. He was an attendant at the Council of Basle in 1440, and was one of the supporters of the antipope (Amadeus of Savoy) Felix V, who gave him the cardinal's hat. Nicholas V confirmed the cardinal after the schism Dec. 19, 1449. He died at Rome Oct. 28, 1453, and Migne, Dict. Theol. xxxi, 1092.

Hulot, Henri Louis, a French theologian, was born at Paris, March 17, 1745. He was one of the first at the seminary, then at the University of Rouen, where he was obliged to resign at the outbreak of the Revolution, and to flee from persecution which threatened him. He went to Gand, where he was made grandvicaire, until the entrance of the French into the Netherlands in 1794 forced him again to flee. He went successively to Münster, Erfurt, Dresden, and Augsburg. When he was permitted to return to his native land, he was appointed curate of the parish of Avcannot, and later of Antigny. During twenty years of pernicious labor at this parish, he was made canon, and finally grand vicar and official of the Reformation. He died Sept. 30, 1815. His principal writings are Lettre aux catholiques de Reims (in Latin and French, Gand, 1793, 8vo) —Lettres des prêtres Français à l'Evêque de Gand: —Collect. des brefs du pape Pie VI (Augsb. 1786) —Lettres à M. Schroffenberg, évêque de Ploeck, de l'archevêque de Russowen, en faveur des prêtres Français (1793, 8vo) —Ecclésiastique et épiscopal, 8vo) —Usus chronologici ecclesiae (Amstelodam, 1793, 8vo). —Salisburgensis cujusdam religiosi delecta castigatio, seu vindicia cleri Gallicani exulii (1800, 8vo) —Gallicanorum Episcoporum dioeceseos insignes inimici (1801, 8vo) —Seis apostolicae Triumphi, seu sedes apostolica, et patriae ecclesiae racionum collectione (Laus. 1808, 8vo). Several controversial works and sermons were left in MS. —Hoefer, Noue. Bibg. Gén. xxv, 479.

Hulse, John, was born at Middlewich in 1708. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; obtained a small curacy in the country; and, upon the death of his father in 1788, withdrew to his paternal inheritance in Cheshire, where, owing to his delicate state of health, he lived in retirement until his death. He made a donation of his squatted estates in order to found two divinity scholarships in St. John's College, the Hulsean Prize Essay, and to endow the offices of "Christian Advocate" and "Christian Preacher" in the University of Cambridge. The duties of the "Christian Preacher," or Hulsean Lectures, was appointed. From 1800 to 1804 the lecture twenty sermons every year, either upon the evidences of Christianity, or the difficulties of Holy Scripture. The funds being inadequate, the lectures were not commenced until 1820, and in 1860 the number of sermons to be delivered in a year was reduced to eight. In 1860 the office of "Christian Advocate" was changed to a professorship, called the Hulsean Professorship of Divinity. Bishop Ellicott was the first incumbent in the new chair. At present the office of the Hulsean Lecturer or Preacher is annual, and the duty of the lecturer to preach not less than four, nor more than six sermons in the course of the year. Among the most important of the Hulsean sermons are the following: Blunt (J. J.), Principles for the proper Understanding of the Mosaic Writings, 1832 (Lond. 1838, 8vo) —Alford, The Consistency of the Divine Conduct in revealing the Doctrines of Redemption, 1841 (Cambridge, 1842, 8vo) —Trench, The Holy Scripture, in its relation to the Spiritual Life of Man, 1845 (Cambridge, 1845, 8vo) —Trench, Christ the Desire of all Nations, 1846 (Cambridge, 1845, 8vo) —Wordsworth, On the Causa of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and on the Apocalypse, 1847 (Lond. 1848, 8vo) —Wordsworth, Lectures on the Apocalypse, critical, expository, and practical, 1848 (Lond. 1849, 8vo). —Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1578; Chambers, Cyclop. v, 453; Farrar, Hist. of Free Thought, p. 207.

Hulsemann, Johann, a German theologian, was born in Ostfriesland in 1602, and was educated at the universities of Wittenberg and Leipzig. In 1629 he was appointed professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg; he was a member of the "Leipziger Convent" of 1630, and of the "Colloquium" at Thorn in 1645, where he performed the office of moderator theologorum Augustanorum confessionis. In 1645 he was called as professor of systematic theology to the University of Leipzig. He died in 1664. In connection with his son-in-law, Calvius (q. v.), he carried on the controversy against Calvinism as a strictly orthodox Lutheran. An able polemic and a thoroughly educated theologian, who in many respects may be compared to the schoolmatics of the 16th century, Hulsemann distinguished in his attacks against Calvinism (in his work Calvinismus irreconcilibilis, Witt. 1644, Lpz. 1645), included Humbert (by some improperly called Hubert), a French cardinal, was born probably towards the close of the 10th century. He entered the order of the Benedictines at Moyen-le-Moutier in 1015. In 1049 Pope In X. who had been bishop of Toul, the diocese in which the monastery of Moyen-le-Moutier was situated, called Humbert to Rome, and he was first created archbishop of Sicily, and in 1051 cardinal bishop of Silva Candida. Humbert is believed to be the first Frenchman who received the cardinal's hat. He was intimately connected with the pope, was admitted to all his councils, and was the Roman pontiff's messenger to Constantinople to effect a union with the Eastern or Greek Church. Under pope Victor III. he was made chancellor and librarian at the Vatican, which offices he continued to hold under the pontifical successors Etienne III., Nicolas II., and Alexander II. He was at the head of the party opposed to Berenger, and obliged him to make a confession of faith at the synod at Rome in 1055. He died about 1063. He wrote a number of works, among others a treatise against the Simonians (published by Martene in his Anecdota), and a narrative of his consanguineous marriage. Two other polemical works against the Greek Church have been printed several times, especially in the Annales Ecclesiastici of Baronius. All his writings have been collected and printed by Migne, vol. cxxii. (1863), p. 929-1278. — Hofer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, xxxv, 489; Migne, Eclect. Théol., xxxi, 1092 sq.

Humbert, general of the order of Dominican monks, was born at Romans, France, about 1200. He was early sent to Paris to be educated as a clergyman, and soon became prominent as an assistant preacher to the celebrated Jourdan. He entered the order in 1224, and was made prior at Lyons in 1242 he was elected "provincial" of Toulouse, in 1244, and of France; and in 1254 general of his order. In 1268, however, he abdicated this high position, and retired as a simple monk, first to a monastery at Lyons, and later to a like institution at Avignon. The patriarchate of Jerusalem was offered him in 1264, but he declined it. He died July 14, 1277. He wrote Oficiis Ecclesiasticus universi tam nocturnum quam diurnum, ad usum ordinis predicatorum: — Expositio super regulam St. Augustini: — Expositio super Constitutiones ordinis fratum praedicatorum, not quite complete: — Liber de instructione officiandi in usu ordinis fratrum praedicatorum (originally a treatise of the best edition, Lyons, 1515): — De Eruditione Predicatorum, also entitled De Arte predandi, has been inserted in the Collection of the Church Fathers, vol. xxv: — Liber de Praedicatione Crucis, an appeal to the Christians against infidels: — Liber de eis que tractanda vitae sanctae in Concilio generali Lyonensi celebrante, of which extracts were published by Martene in his Theaurus Anecdot. vol. vii, etc. — Hofer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, xxxv, 483 sq.

Humbert, a French theologian, was born at Genex, near Paris, about the middle of the 13th century. In July, 1296, he was elected abbe of Prulli, in the diocese of Chartres, and died there March 14, 1299. He wrote several theological and philosophical works, all of which remain unprinted. His most important work is Sententiae super libros Metaphysica Aristotelis, a commentary on Aristotle's metaphysics. — Hofer, Nouveaux Bibl. Générale, xxv, 485; Hist. Litt. de la France, xxxi, 96.

Humble Access, Prayer of, is a phrase in some churches for a divine supplication made by the priest kneeling at the altar before the consecration.

Hume, David, the most notable man of letters and speculation in Scotland during the last century. He was almost equally eminent as a metaphysician, a historian, and a political essayist. He was born at Edinburgh April 26 (O. S.), 1711. On his father's side he was related to the earls of Home or Hume, and through his mother he was the grandson of Sir David Falconer, lord president of the court of justice. His father was not rich, but he was an independent proprietor, owning the estate of Ninewells, in Berwickshire. But David was the younger son, and was entitled to only a small share of his father's substance. He was left an orphan in his youth, and in his brother's custody, was brought up under the sole care of his excellent mother. He passed without special note through the University, and was designed for the Scotch bar, but he had no taste for the profession, and having spent seven years at home at Ninewells, after leaving college, ostentatiously engaged in the practice of the law, he went abroad in 1738 with some mercantile aspirations. Thence, after a few months of disgust, he passed over into France, and took up his abode first at Rheimes, and afterwards at La Flechi. Here he devoted himself to philosophy for life, and composed his Treatise of the Principles of Morals. It was in a discussion with one of the Jesuit fathers of La Flechi that the celebrated argument against miracles flashed upon his mind. The Treatise of Human Nature was published in 1738, after his return to England. He says himself of it, "It fell dead-born from the press." Just before he left Ninewells he purchased a small cottage, and here he renewed his studies and extended his speculations. In 1742 he published the first part of his Essays, Moral and Political, which, in his opinion, met with considerable favor. Still, he had obtained no assured provision in life. He was disappointed in an application for a living to the bishop of Dornoch. The bishop offered him the rectory of Kilbride, and he declined it. He purchased a small house at St. Clair, and there he resided in quiet, writing and studying. In 1744 he accepted the charge of the manse of Annandale. With him he resided twelve unpleasant months, but he derived some emolument from the association. In 1746 he became secretary to general St. Clair, and in 1747 he attended his lordship at the embassy to Vienna and Turin. The Inquiry concerning the Human Understanding—a recast of the first part of his first treatise—was published while he was at Turin. In 1749 he resided on his old refuge at Ninewells, and occupied himself with the composition of his Political Discourses. In 1752 he published a new edition of his Human Nature, which has been better known in Germany than in England. In 1754, on the marriage of his brother, he abandoned the Ninewells estate, and in consequence of his finesses, moved into a new home in Edinburgh. He applied for a chair in the University of Glasgow, but again failed. In 1752 he accepted the post of librarian to the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh, but transferred nearly all his small salary to the blind poet, Blacklock. He was engaged in the composition of his History of England, which had attracted his regards some years before. The parts he worked on in this work have been published. It was in his History of the House of Tudor that he first took up the subject of political history. He published two volumes of this work, and they were received with warm approval. The second and last volume was published in 1764; the first in 1759. The History of the House of Tudor came out in two volumes in 1759; and in 1761, two volumes, containing the early history of England, completed the work, which, before its conclusion, was received as an English classic, and is justly so regarded. If the work encountered various and violent opposition, it gradually achieved eminent popularity, and rendered the author "not only independent, but opulent." Being now "turned of fifty," he resolved to spend the remainder of his life in philosophical dignity and comfortable retirement. The reason was of no long duration. The marquis of Hertford invited Hume, with whom he was personally unacquainted, to become his secretary of legation at the French court. The distinguished philosopher and historian was received with marked attentions and flatteries by the eminent persons assembled at Paris. It was the period when the union of infidel sentiments with literary renown had become the rage in the most brilliant circles of the age. Hume was received with state honors, but he declined, but Hume remained as chargé d'affaires till 1766, and received a pension of £400 for his diplomatic services. The "canny Scot" had become a rich old bachelor, and was able to extend patronage and aid to Rousseau on his arrival in England, and even to procure for him a position in the Spanish Embassy. Hume's political favors ended in a quarrel between the protected and the protector, of which an account was given by the latter in a pamphlet. About this time Hume became undersecretary of state, and held the office for two years, retiring to Edinburgh in 1769. Here he passed the remaining years of his life, with the exception of a brief visit to Harrowgate and Bath, and it was shortly before setting out on this journey, undertaken for the restoration of his declining health, that he wrote his Autobiography. He had been attacked with diarrhoea in the spring of the year, and an attack in the fall convinced him of the certainty of his death, as approaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit." But Smith, notwithstanding this testimony, refused to publish the Dialogues on Natural Religion, though a special legacy of £200 was attached to such publication. The Dialogues were not given to the world until 1779, and then by the agency of Hume's nephew. His Life, written by himself, with a Letter from Adam Smith giving an Account of his Death, appeared in 1777 (Lond. 8vo). A better view of the life and the character of Hume than his edition of his autobiography is given in the Autobiography of Alexander Carlyle (Edinb. and N. Y. 1860).

The philosophy of Hume underwent three revisions, with, however, scarcely any essential change. It has been customary to enlarge upon the acumen and logical precision of his work, but the fundamental object of his treatise was to show that the principles of thought can, if we will, on close scrutiny, into mere dialectical subtlety. If his artifices imposed upon others, he was often the victim of them himself, and he was crushed to the earth beneath the ruins of the systems which he overthrew. Hume's fundamental thesis is that all human knowledge (no pun is designed) consists of impressions and ideas. Impressions are the direct perceptions of sense: ideas are only the relics or signs of former impressions. Impressions are always particular, and incapable of variation: ideas are consequently the unaltered spectres of former sensations. The theory of Locke is accepted and simplified by discounting the office of reflection. The theory of Berkeley is accepted and expanded by applying his argument against matter to mind, and denying all evidence of the existence of either. The result is a thoroughly Pyrrhonian doubt. The application of these postulates for the destruction of the whole philosophy of Hume. There are only two objects of knowledge—the relations of ideas, and the relations of impressions or facts. The former relations are concerned with unchanging signs, and are therefore simple, and readily discerned by the discussion of thought; but the latter always involve the principle of cause and effect, because due to some exciting influence. The relation of cause and effect is nothing more than the habitual succession of events; because all our complex conceptions are linked together only by customary association, and it is impossible that particular objects should produce a general idea. General ideas are, indeed, im-possibilities, for all abstractions are only vague images of particulars. Ideas may represent either realities or phenomena, but no investigations can reach beyond the phenomenon to the reality. This reality is a pure delusion—a figment; it is only the name arbitrarily given to a system of connected impressions and ideas. There is no evidence of its existence, there is nothing to authorise the assertion of its existence except as fictitious phenomena. The connection of phenomena, or of the conceptions corresponding with them, is accepted as truth in consequence of a primitively tendency of the mind, called belief; the latter being the desire that every impression, however unconnected, is connected with one another in mind; at least, there is nothing to authorise the assertion of their existence except as fictitious phenomena.

The credibility of facts is thus resolved into their apprehensibility, and becomes merely a question of probabilities. This constitution of belief, and this complexity of knowledge, result from the mode in which the materials of thought are obtained. They are gathered by observation and experience, and are distinguished into two, and only two classes, according to their relative strength—impressions and ideas; the former being the prius and more forcible perceptions; the latter being the derived and secondary, and being unconnected with impressions. Further than this it is impossible to carry speculation. The mind, the instrument of thought, lies beyond; but its nature is discernible only in its operations, and these constitute its whole nature so far as any apprehension is in the idea of the human mind is the mould and measure of all knowledge, and yet that mind is itself only a problematical phenomenon. A good-humored scepticism is accordingly the sole result of philosophy.

From this brief and imperfect synopsis of Hume's doctrine, so well summed up by Mackintosh: "He aimed at proving, not that nothing was known, but that nothing could be known"—it is easy to recognise the mode in which he reached its most startling applications. He might assert the moral sense, but the assertion was nugatory, for there could be no foundation for morals, nor anything more valid than expediencies growing out of particular impressions and their observed sequences. He might admit the possibility, even the probability, of divine intelligence, but could not tell whether it was "ane or mair," since revelation could not be substituted for the natural perceptions. The scheme had in it, like the admission of miracles, the doctrines supported by ordinary experience, and human testimony wasfallacious. All this mischievous error is the appropriate fruit of the tree on which it hangs. Many refutations of these positions have been attempted, and a vigorous war has been waged on the principles supposed to form the foundation of this philosophy; but too little attention has been paid to the ambiguity of the terms employed, and to the vacillation with which they are used by the conjuror. A strict definition of "miracles" and "experience," and a rigid adherence to such definition, will reduce the celebrated argument against miracles to a bald petitio principii, or to a manifest absurdity. Hume endeavored to prove that "no testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle," and the reasoning employed for this purpose is, that "a miracle be a violation of the laws of nature, which a firm and unalterable experience has established, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as entire as any argument from experience can be; whereas our experience of human veracity, which (according to him) is the sole foundation of the evidence of testimony, is far from being uniform, and every argument against that experience which admits of no exception." This boasted and plausible argument has, with equal candor and acuteness, been examined by Dr. Campbell, in his Dissertation on Miracles, who justly observes that, so far is experience from being the sole foundation of the evidence of testimony, that, on the contrary, testimony is the sole foundation of by far the greater part of what Mr. Hume calls firm and unalterable experiences; and that if, in certain circumstances, we did not give an implicit faith to testimony, our knowledge of events would be confined to those which had fallen under the immediate observation of our own senses. Hume maintained that a miracle is contrary to experience; but, in reality, it is different from ordinary experience. That diseases should generally be cured by the application of medicine, and sometimes at the mere word of a prophet, are facts not inconsistent with each other in the nature of things themselves, nor irreconcilable according to our ideas. Each fact may arise from its own proper causes; so may every other fact in the universe; each is known by its own proper proof, whether of sense or testimony. To pronounce, therefore, a miracle to be false, because it is different from ordinary experience, is only to conclude against its existence from the very circumstance which constitutes its specific character; for if it were not different from ordinary experience, where would be its singularity? or what proof could be drawn from it in attestation of a divine message? See Miracles.

The importance and value of Hume's political essays have rarely been appreciated. They are the best of all his productions, and the weakest of all his essays. Many of the intellectual vices, as all the excellences of Hume—his speculative audacity, his regard for material comfort and independence, his want of enthusiasm, the restriction of his view to observation and experience, his acceptance of expediency as a principle, his acquaintance with courts and with affairs of state, his knowledge of history, his philosophic habits, his slow progress from pinch to easy circumstances, all favored profusion in this branch of inquiry. Many of these characteristics were, however, adverse to his career as an historian. His room in the history of England, the vigorous, easy, and unaffected style, the vivacity of the delineations, the arrangement of the topics, the disposition of the personages, the variety and enumeration of the reflections, are all admirable. The narrative is always fascinating, if the expression is rarely idiomatic, sometimes ungrammatical, and often provincial. But to the highest merits of history it possesses no claim. It is hastily, carelessly, and inaccurately composed; it is incurious of truth; it disregards authentic sources of information from indolence and indifference; it is equally partial and prejudiced. In form, it is a model of historical art, but not of the art in its highest conception; in substance and in spirit it displays nearly every sin and corruption which a historian should abhor. His writings called forth many antagonists, and, in fact, may be said to have given rise to the Scotch metaphysical school of Common Sense, so called, of which the best exposition, and, at the same time, best answer to Mr. Hume's scepticism, is to be proved by Reid's Complete Works, with Notes by Sir William Hamilton (Edinburgh, 1846, 8vo). Beattie's Essay on Truth, and Oswald's Appeal to Common Sense (Edinb. 1772, 2 vols.), were also written in reply to Hume. Humilîati, a monastic order founded about 1134 by some Italian noblemen whom the emperor Henry II had sent from Germany to the Holy Land. They were transformed into canons of St. Benedict, and as such received the sanction of pope Innocent III in 1200. A corresponding order of nuns was afterwards organized in Milan by a lady named Blasoni (whence they were also called Nunnæ of Blasone). Notwithstanding the numerous disputes they occasioned, the canons and nuns did great good as nurses, etc.; their rule was adopted in some ninety-eight convents, but they were finally suppressed by Pius V in 1571. A few convents, without particular attention to dress and observances of the old order, still remain in Italy. The habit of the order consisted in a white dress and cloak, to which a white scapulary was afterwards added; also a small hood. The nuns’ dress was white, with grey under-garments, or vice versa.—Pierer, Universal Lexicon, viii, 609; Fehr, Allgen. Humiliation of Christ (in the language of the older Reformed theologians, the status humiliationis sive exsecrationis), the “humbling of himself” (Phil. ii, 8) to which the son of God submitted in accomplishing the redemption of man’s soul. As to the question whether the Logos, at the incarnation, humbled himself of his divine self-consciousness in order to develop himself in purely human form, see Kenozis. On the question of his descent into Hades, see Heli, I DESCENT INTO. For monographs on this subject, see Vollbedo, Index Programmatum, p. 34; Haeo, Leben Jesu, p. 113. The humiliation of Christ is generally set forth by theologians as shown in his birth, his circumstances, temptation, sufferings, and death. 1. In his birth: he was born of a woman—a sinful woman; though he was without sin (Gal. iv, 4); of a poor woman (Luke ii, 7, 24); in a poor country village (John i, 46); in a stable—an abject place; of a nature subject to infirmities (Heb. ii, 9), hunger, thirst, weariness, pain, etc. 2. In his circumstances: laid in a manger when he was born, lived in obscurity for a long time, probably worked at the trade of a carpenter, had not a place where to lay his head, and was oppressed with poverty while he went about preaching the Gospel. 3. It appeared in his reputation: he was loaded with the most abusive railing and calumny (Lsa. liii), the most false accusations (Matt. xxvi, 59, 67), and the most ignominious ridicule (Psa. xxii, 6); Matt. xxvi, 68; John vii, 50). 4. In his soul: he was often tempted (Matt. iv, 1, etc.); Heb. ii, 17, 18; iv, 15; grieved with the reproaches cast on himself, and with the sins and miseries of others (Heb. xii, 3; Matt. xvi, 19; John xi, 35); was burdened with the distress of his Father’s face, and the fears and impressions of his wrath (Psa. xxi, 1; Luke xxii, 43; Heb. v, 7). 5. In his death: scourged, crowned with thorns, received gall and vinegar to drink, and was crucified between two thieves (Luke xxii, 6; John xix, 13; Mark xv, 24, 25). 6. In his burial: not only was he born in a manger and was laid in a stable, but he was buried in another man’s tomb; for he had no tomb of his own, or family vault to be interred in. (Lsa. liii, 10; etc.; Matt. xxii, 66). The humiliation of Christ was necessary, 1. To execute the purpose of redemption (Luke xxii, 21; John xix, 30; Mark xv, 25, 24; Psa. xi, 6, 7, 8); 2. To fulfill the manifold types and predictions of the Old Testament; 3. To satisfy the broken law of God, and procure eternal redemption for us (Lsa. liii; Heb. ix, 12, 15); 4. To leave us an unspotted pattern of holiness and patience under suffering. —Buck, Thol. Dict. s. v. Humility (Lat. humilis; from humus, the ground), as a Christian grace, is the opposite of “high-mindedness.” It was unknown to the ancient heathen moralists; the word humilitas, with them, indicated baseness of mind.

1. The believer is indeed “exalted” to a higher stage of manhood by his union with Christ, and becomes, moreover, a “king and priest unto God.” But he never “exalts” himself. Whatever he has, he owes (and feels that he owes) not to himself, but to the love of God, his creator; to the grace of Christ, his redeemer; and to the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, his sanctifier. He perceives all his blessings only in God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. If he looks upon himself, he finds that all he is or has is but what has been mercifully vouesed to him: if he looks upon his individual ego, apart from these relationships, he finds in him an absent personality, corrupted by sin and error, and unworthy of such great privileges. If he rejoices in the possession of Christian graces, he rejoices in them as having been given him (1 Cor. iv, 7), and considers at the same time the merits of others (Rom. xii, 3; “For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith”)

Counsels of the gifts he has received, he yet praises the grace which has given him to him (Rom. xv, 17, 18; “I am not then more worthy of the grace of God than any other: but your dispensation is even as it befits you to me, to the grace of Christ, in those things which pertain to God. For I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me.” Phil. iv, 11–13: “I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere and in all things I am instructed both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.” 2 Cor. iii, 5; “Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God.” 1 Cor. iii, 5–7.

“We who are Christians, and of the household of the commandable servants, and unworthy instruments of the grace of God (Luke xvii, 10; “So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all these things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do”). The feeling of obligation of all in the kingdom, and of the shortcomings in the use of those gifts which we cannot even praise ourselves for having well employed, is a mark of humility.

2. “To consider this grace a little more particularly, it may be observed, I. That humility does not oblige a man to wrong the truth or himself by entertaining a more or worse opinion of himself than he deserves.
HUMILITY

2. Nor does it oblige a man, right or wrong, to give everybody else the preference to himself. A wise man cannot believe himself inferior to the ignorant multitude, nor the virtuous man that he is not so good as those whose lives are vicious. 3. Nor does it oblige a man to keep anything for himself with contempt of bodies or considerations: it takes more like affection than humility when a man says such things in his own displeasure as others know, or he himself believes, to be false; and it is plain also that this is often done merely as a bait to catch the praises of others. Humility consists, 1. In not-attending to praise any excellence of another which we have not. 2. In not overrating anything we do. 3. In not taking an immoderate delight in ourselves. 4. In not assuming more of the praise of a quality or action than belongs to us. 5. In an inward sense of our many imperfections and sins. 6. In ascribing all we have and are to the grace of God. True humility will express itself, 1. By the modesty of our appearance; the humble man will consider his age, abilities, character, function, etc., and act accordingly; 2. By the modesty of our purposes: we shall not aim at anything above our strength, but shall aim at a good to a great name. 3. It will express itself by the modesty of our conversation and behavior: we shall not be loquacious, obstinate, forward, equivocal, discontented, or ambitious. The advantages of humidity are numerous: 1. It is well-pleasing to God (1 Pet. iii, 4). 2. It has great influence on us in the performance of all our other duties, prudence, conscience, etc. 3. It indicates that more grace shall be given (James iv, 6; Ps. lxxv, 9). 4. It preserves the soul in great tranquillity and contentment (Ps. clxx, 32, 38). 5. It makes us patient and resigned under afflictions (Job i, 22). 6. It enables us to exercise moderation in everything, to those who have this excellent spirit we should remember, 1. The example of Christ (Phil. ii, 6, 7, 8); 2. That heaven is a place of humility (Rev. v, 8); 3. That our sins are numerous, and deserve the greatest punishment (Lam. iii, 39); 4. That humility is the way to honor (Prov. xvi, 18); 5. That the greatest promises of good are made to the humble (Isa. lii, 15; lvi, 2; 1 Pet. v, 5; Ps. cxxvii, 6; Matt. v, 5) (Buck, Theol. Dict. s. v.). "It has been deemed a great paradox in Christianity that it makes humility the avenue to glory. Yet what other avenue is there to wisdom, or even to knowledge? Would you pluck precious ture from the plant and leave it to wither and drop down and be lost to you? Everywhere the pearl of great price lies bedded in a shell which has no form or comeliness. It is so in physical science. Bacon has declared it, Natura non nisi pavemdo vincitur; and the triumphs of science since his days have proved how willing Nature is to be conquered by those who will obey her. It is so in moral speculation.
Wordsworth has told us the law of his own mind, the fulfilment of which has enabled him to reveal a new world of poetry: Wisdom is ofttimes nearer when we stoop than when we soar. That it is so likewise in religion we are satisfied by the experience of all the world. Except ye become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Moreover, the whole intercourse between man and man may be, if we look at it closely, to be guided and regulated by the same pervading principle; and that it ought to be so is generally considered as a necessary and inevitable consequence. As I have often heard said by him, who, among all the persons I have conversed with to the edification of my understanding, had the keenest practical insight into human nature, and best knew the art of controlling and governing men, and winning them over to their good—the moment any benefit is satisfied with himself, everybody else becomes dissatisfied with him; whenever a person thinks much of himself, all other people give over thinking about him. Thus it is not alone in the paradise that he who takes the highest room is turned down with shame to the lowest, while he who sits down in the lowest room is bid to go up higher." See Humphrey, Lawrence, an English Protestant divine and philologist, was born at Newport—Pagnell, Buckinghamshire, about 1527. He was educated at Cambridges, and entered himself especially to the classics. After becoming fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and professor of Greek in the university, he entered the Church. In 1555 he left England in consequence of the persecutions to which Protestants were subject, and remained a while in Zurich. After the death of queen Mary he returned home, and resumed his professorship. He became successively professor of theology at Queen's College in 1560, president of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1561, dean of Gloucecester in 1570, and dean of Winchester in 1580. He died February 1, 1589. He was a man of conciliatory man-ers, and of a moderate and learning mind; of great purity of character, moderate and conscientious, and to this he owed his last preferments. He was a good linguist, and a very skilful controversialist. He wrote Epistola de Graciar literar et Honoris etione et invocatione (printed in the first part of Junius's Correspondence, Basle, 1566, fol.): Hung 'tah (Heb. Ḥānaḵ, Ḥū Ḥū, prob. from the Syri. fons, otherwise the name of the city in Aqüaquis

v. Ḫēqaq and Xaqawri; Vulg. Amphitma), a town in the mountains of Judah, mentioned between Aaphkah and Hebron (Josch. xv, 54), apparently in the district lying immediately west of Hebron (Keil, Comment. ad loc. It is not mentioned by any other ancient writer except Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s. v. Ḫayqarri; Onomast. s. v. Ḫayqarri; Amm.), there is some ressemblance between the name and that of Klimath (Kh-ūdū), one of the places added in the Sept. of the text to the list in the Hebrew text of 1 Sam. xxi, 27-81.
It possibly corresponds with the ruined site marked as Sedamine (or Remet el-Ànëk) on Vau de Veyde's Map at 11 miles north of Hebron, just west of the Jerusalem road.

Hungarian Confession (Confesio Hungarica), the Confession of Faith of the Reformed Church in Hungary. It was drawn up in 1557 and 1558 by the Synod of Czengor (hence also called Confesio Czengeri-ana), and published in 1570 in Debrecin. It is strongly Calvinistic in principle, and in the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and it was on that account not adopted by the Reformed churches of Poland. (A. J. S.)

Hungary, a kingdom in Eastern Europe, which has for several centuries been united with the empire of Austria. It has 92,839 square miles, and its population was, according to the census of 1867, 9,900,785.
Connected with it, as dependencies of the crown of Hungary, are Transylvania (q.v.), Croatia, and Slavonia. This whole division, which is sometimes called the Transleithanian, division of the empire, sometimes simply Hungary, has 124,000 square miles, and, according to the official census of 1857, 15,768,813 inhabitants. According to the official census of Dec. 81, 1869, the total population in Hungary, subject to the crown amounted to 15,429,236, of which Hungary proper had about 11,109,000; Transylvania, 2,109,000; Croatia and Slavonia, 1,015,000; the Military Frontier, 1,195,000.

1. History.—The Hungarians, a Scythian tribe, were, as it seems, akin to and allies of the Chazars, who in the first half of the Christian era had left their original seats, the plateaus of Central Asia, and had founded in the course of time a powerful empire on the Tauric peninsula. At the close of the 9th century the Hungarians (Magyars) were living on the north-eastern frontier of this empire, which they defended under their own chief against the powerful neighboring nations. After the destruction of this empire, the Magyars, who were unable to resist singly the onset of other tribes, crossed the Dnieper, and settled (884) near the mouth of the Danube, between the Rivers Buh and Szereth. The imperial town of their new home was called by Leo the Wise, who called the bravery of his new neighbors to his aid against Simeon, the chief of the Bulgarians. The call was cheerfully accepted by Arpad, the son of the Magyar duke Almos. Simeon was conquered, and his country laid waste. The renown of the victory brought Arpad to a court, where the king Andrew, who had been suzerain for the year, asked him for aid against Savatopluck, the grand prince of Moravia. Again they accepted the invitation, entered Upper Pannonia, which then belonged to the Moravian empire, and obtained a complete victory; after that they returned to their homes. These, however, had in the meanwhile been invaded and terrorized by Hungarians, and the Bulgarians therefore concluded to settle permanently in Pannonia, from which they had just returned as victors. The occupation of the country began in 894; it was completed in 900. The country, divided among seven tribes and 168 families, was converted into a military state. Their bravery and their renown caused many people of the districts which they had traversed, and many soldiers of foreign countries, to join them. Thus strengthened, they were able to undertake expeditions as far as the Nogai, where they were captured by the Franks in 899 and escaped to the Black Sea. But repeated defeats by the kings and emperors of Germany put a stop to their conquests and gave a different direction to their energies. The frontiers of their new country were more definitely marked and fortified, and many more foreign colonists drawn into the country.

The large number of Christian slaves, the connection with the emperors of Constantinople, but in particular the efforts of duke Geya (972-997), and of his Christian wife Sarolta (Caroline), gradually prepared the introduction of Christianity. Geya made peace with all his neighbors, and at the council which he assembled recommended a hospitable reception of foreign visitors and the introduction of Christianity. Geya himself was baptized by bishop Pilgrim of Passau, who, even during the reign of Tassony, the father of Geya, had shown a great interest in the conversion of Hungary. Besides him, the emperor Otto I and bishop Adalbert of Prague showed a great zeal for the Christianization of the Magyars. Thus the Roman Catholic Church obtained the ascendancy over the few missions which under former chiefs had been established by missionaries of other churches. Many of the Magyars, as at Bardejov, 844, at Strakonitz, 847, at Gran, Volk, the son of Geya, who received the name of Stephen. Immediately after his accession to the throne, Stephen made it the first object of his rule to secure the complete victory of Christianity; nor did he hesitate for this end to employ force. He issued at once an order that all Magyars must receive baptism, and that all Christian slaves must be set free. This decree filled those Magyars who were opponents of Christianity with the utmost indignation against the young king and against the Germans who surrounded him. Kuppa, a relative of Stephen and duke of the Szegecs, put himself at the head of the malcontents, but at Vasvar, on May 21, 997, was totally defeated and killed; and henceforth all accorded submission to the Christianization of Hungary ceased. Stephen himself traversed the country in every direction, encouraging the people to become Christians, and threatening with severe punishments all who would refuse to obey this order. He established schools in his state. An settlers were made as teachers, established richly-endowed bishoprics, introduced the tithe, and made the prelates the first estate of the empire. For these labors Stephen received from pope Sylvester II a crown, which has since then constituted the upper part of the sacra regni Hungariae cross, while its lower part consists of the crown which the Greek emperor Manuel Dukas gave to Geya. With this crown Stephen received from the pope a patriarchal cross and the title of apostolic king. Thus Hungary became a kingdom, the chief supports of which, according to the Constitution given by Stephen, were to be the church and the nobility. The newly enfranchised Hungarians enlarged the privileges of the clergy, who thus, in the course of time, became richer than in any other European country. After the death of Stephen several more efforts were made by the native pagan party to displace both Christianity and the German party at the head of the state. The king Andrew II (1202-68) a favorable Convert. In 1237 Hungary fell for the first time to the house of Hapsburg. In 1526 the line of independent kings of Hungary became extinct by the death of king Louis II. A large portion of Hungary was subjugated by the Turks, and remained a Turkish province for more than a century; the remainder was long rent by civil wars, which ended in connecting the country permanently with the crown of Hapsburg.

When the first knowledge of the Reformation reached Hungary, the Diet of 1529 issued a cruel decree that the Lutherans and all favorers of Lutheranism should be captured and put in chains to be sent to the Black Sea. But repeated defeats by the kings and emperors of Germany put a stop to their conquests and gave a different direction to their energies. The frontiers of their new country were more definitely marked and fortified, and many more foreign colonists drawn into the country.

ed Sacramentarians (Calvinists). In 1549 the royal free cities of Upper Hungary had their Confession of Faith drawn up by Leonard Stöckel in the sense of the Augsburg Confession, and presented it to king Ferdinance of Protestant worship induced Charles VI (king of Hungary, Charles III) to appoint a royal commission, on the recommendation of which it was decreed that the evangelical preachers should be superintended by Catholic archdeacons; that the ministerial functions of the preachers of the two Protestant Confessions must be limited to those churches (at most two in each comitatet) which had petitioned the Diet of 1711, and that the Diet, in 1816, expressly authorized the Protestants to hold divine service; that the Protestants, when elected to office, must take their oaths with an invocation of the blessed Virgin and all the saints; and that all Protestants must take part in the celebration of the Catholic feast of Corpus Christi. Protestant processions had the permission of a royal chancellery and stadtholdership, which in the name of the sovereign had to promulgate and execute the imperial laws, was unfavorable to the Protestants, as a majority of the councillors were taken from the ranks of the bishops, magnates, and noblemen. Thus the Protestants were assailed by this board in every possible way. Conversions from Catholicism to Protestantism were strictly forbidden; Catholics were forbidden to attend a Protestant school, and the Protestant youth to study at foreign schools; members of one Protestant sect had no right to visit the divine service of the other; Protestant books were submitted to Protestant censors, their trials of divorce to Catholic judges. Maria Theresa expressed personal sympathy with the oppressed condition of Protestants, but pretended to be unable to do anything for them on royal decree which had granted them religious freedom. An essential amelioration in the condition of Protestants was effected under Joseph II, who, in 1781, by the edict of toleration, granted to all the Protestants of his dominions freedom of conscience and of religion, and the right of public worship. Now a new era in the history of Protestantism began. A large number of new churches and schools were established, hundreds of clergy were called. Protestants became eligible to every office; the religious oath was abolished; the Protestant superintendents were allowed to visit the churches, and persons living in mixed marriages to bring up their children in the evangelical faith, as well as to select for them any school they chose; the press was to be free and unfettered. Leopold II also showed a firm disposition to be just toward the Protestants. The Diet of 1791 was petitioned by the Protestants to sanction the royal decree which had granted them religious freedom. Notwithstanding a violent opposition on the part of many of these bishops, the diet granted the request, chiefly moved by the eloquent plea of the Catholic count Aloysius Batti yáni. Accordingly, the 26th article of the law of 1791 provides that the Protestants of both Confessions shall enjoy the free exercise of their religion; that they shall not be forced to attend processions, masses, or other ceremonies; that in ecclesiastical affairs they shall be subordinate only to their own ecclesiastical superiors; that they may build churches and schools, elect preachers and teachers; that they shall not have to contribute to the building of Catholic churches and schools. The Protestants at once hastened to perfect their ecclesiastical constitution. In the same year (1791), a synod of both the Protestant churches was held at Ofen and Pest, at which long-pending controversies between the clergy and prominent laymen were settled, and the establishments of a few evangelical clergymen, as well as that of the Catholic clergy and the early death of the sovereign, prevented the resolutions of this diet from receiving the royal sanction. During the reign of Francis I the rights of the Protestants were often encroached upon, especially in the case of mixed marriages. The Diet of 1843 to 1844 interfered, however, in favor of the Protestants, and enlarged, in its provisions concerning mixed marriages and the right of joining the Protestant Church, the law of 1791. The fulness of equal rights was finally secured to Protestants by a law of 1848. In consequence of the failure of the Hungarian War of Independence in 1848 and 1849, these rights were, however, for a time suspended. The imperial commander, baron Haynau, himself a Protestant, abolished the offices of general inspector and the district inspectors for the Church of the Augsburg Confession, and that of curators for the Church of the Helvetic Confession. The hangman's noose was administered not only after the holding of "senioral conventions" allowed when attended by an imperial commissioner. After repeated petitions and representations, the minister of public worship and instruction, on August 21, 1856, laid the draft of a law on the reorganization of the Constitution of the Church on the basis of the establishment of a single Protestant university in the empire. The latter declined this draft, and unani- mously asked for the convocation of the General Synod. On September 1, 1859, an imperial patent was published, which undertook, on the ground of the law of 1791, to give to the Protestant churches a new Constitution. Nearly the entire evangelical Church of both Confessions protested against the legality of this imperial patent, claiming for the Church the right to make herself the necessary changes in her Constitution on the legal basis of the law of 1791. Only a few congregations of the Lutheran Slovaks, numbering together about 54 congregations, accepted the patent. All the efforts to break the opposition of the Protestants failed; and when, in 1867, the Austrian government concluded to make peace with Hungary, the patent of 1859, and all the decrees accompanying it, were repealed. The diet and the churches of the Union took the stand that they should be at liberty to rearrange their Church matters in a constitutional way. At the General Convention of the Confession of Augsburg, which was held in Pest in September, the reunion of the Lutheran Slovaks who had accepted the patent with the remainder of the Church was consummated. In December, 1867, a General Convention of the two Protestant churches was held under the presidency of baron Nicholas Vay, in order to acquit the Hungarian Diet with the wishes and opinion of the churches concerning religious and school questions. The Convention resolved, 1, that the affairs of the Protestants be regulated by general laws, and not by special laws for each of the two denominations; 2, that no privileges be granted to any on account of religion; 3, that the equality pronounced in the 26th article of the law of 1848 extend to all denominations; 4, that the Church with regard to the state be placed only under the right of supreme inspection and of protection. Other liberal resolutions were adopted by this and by a later Convention respecting a change of religion, mixed marriages, divorces, schools, and endowment. The majority of the Diet showed itself just toward the Protestants, and their chief demands were fulfilled. The reconciliation which took place in 1867 between the people of Hungary and the emperor of Austria gave to Hungary a greater independence than it had ever enjoyed before. A special ministry was appointed for the countries of the Hungary crown, which also December, 1867, a General Convention of the Diet, and retained only a few points of administration in common with the remainder of the monarchy. One of the most important reforms, introduced into Hungary in consequence of the new Constitution, was the declaration of the autonomy of all the religious recognized in Hungary, and the independence of the Protestant decision in protest of affairs, which had formerly been connected with the Hungarian crown, to elective assemblies representing the several religious denominations. The first assemblies of these churches, which had thus far been without them, were convoked by the government; they fixed the most of ecclesiastical questions. The Diet of 1848 to 1844 interfered, however, in favor of the Protestants, and enlarged, in its provisions concerning mixed marriages and the right of joining the Protestant Church, the law of 1791. The fulness of equal rights was finally secured to Protestants by a law of 1848. In Hungary has a national university at Pesth, 48 Catholic and 89 Protestant gymnasia. The number of elementary schools amounted (1864) in Hungary to 11,452, in Transylvania to 1738, in Croatia and Slavonia to 490, in the Military Frontier to 907. A large number of communities were in 1869 still without a school. There are also five normal schools at Pesth, Szegedin, Neuhäusel, Miskolcz, and Grosskanizsa. — Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, ii. 626.

HUNNIUS,

Hunnius, Egidius, an eminent German Lutheran theologian, was born at Wittenberg, Dec. 21, 1550, and studied theology at Tubingen, where he afterwards became first tutor, and deacon in 1574. In 1576 he went to Marburg as professor and preacher. Here his strict adherence to the doctrine of ubiquity in the Eucharist led to the excommunication of the_GAP_ by the synod, and to the liquidation of the Episcopacy. In 1587 he was expelled, and in 1592, he became professor at the University of Wittenberg, where he opposed the moderate views of Melanchthon. In 1594 he accompanied the duke Frederick William to the Imperial Diet at Regensburg, where his influence opposed the union of the different evangelical free cities. In 1595 he sustained a sharp controversy with Samuel Huber (q.v.) on the doctrines of election and predestination, and in 1602, at the Conference of Ratisbon, he was one of the principal opponents of the Jesuits Gretzer and Tanner. He died April 4, 1602, in Marburg, where his principal works in German are: De homine, De Veritate, De Personae Christi (1577, 1609); also in Latin, De persona Christi (1585). — Calvisius, Literaturhistorisch (1599); — Antipa-rus (1594 and 1599) — Josephus, a drama (1597). His works in Latin have been collected and published by Garchius (Wittenberg, 1607-9, 5 vols. folio). Hunnius, Nikolaus, son of Egidius Hunnius, was born at Marburg July 11, 1585. He studied philosophy, philosophy, and theology at Wittenberg, where he began lectures on theology and philosophy in 1609. In 1612 he went as superintendent to Eilenburg, and in 1617 returned to Wittenberg as pfessor, in the place of Hutter (qr.v.). In 1623 he became head pastor of the Church of Mary at Lübeck, and superintendent of the Church in the same city the following year. He died April 2, 1632, at Lübeck, and he fixed in his attachment to the Lutheran orthodoxy as in his learning and controversial powers. He devised the plan of a Collegium Irrimium, which was called, after him, "Collegium Hunniulanum," and which was to form a supreme tribunal in all theological disputes. He was also distinguished as an able opponent of Popery. His principal works are, "Ministerii Lutherani divini adaequatio le-

Hunolt, Franz, a distinguished Roman Catholic poet, who was born in the dukedom of Nassau, towards the close of the 17th century. He was a member of the Jesuit order, and his sermons (Cologne, 1737, 6 vols. fol., and often) gave him rank as one of the best preachers of the 18th century. He died at Trier in 1746. — Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lex. xii, 606.

Huns (Latin Huni), a nation of Asiatic origin, and in all likelihood of Mongolian or Tartar stock, therefore akin to the Persians, and the Turks, were, according to De Guignes (Histoire des Huns), whose theory was accepted by Gibbon, and is now entertained by all competent critics, lineal descendants from the Hong-nom nation, “whose ancient seat was an extensive but barren tract of country immedi.ately beyond the Caspian Sea and the great city of the year b.c. 200 these people overran the Chinese empire, defeated the Chinese armies in numerous engage.ments, and even drove the emperor Kao-ti himself to an ignominious capitulation and treaty. During the reign of Yoo-ti (b.c. 141-97) their power was very much broken. Eventually they separated into two dis. tant camps, one of which, amounting to about 60,000 families, went southwards, while the other endeavored to maintain itself in its original seat. This, however, it was very difficult for them to do; and eventually the most warlike and enterprising went west and north-west in search of new homes. Of those that went north-west, a large number established themselves for a while on the banks of the Volga.” About the earlier part of the 4th century they crossed this river, and advanced into the territories of the Alani, a pastoral people dwell.ing between the Volga and the Caspian Sea, and the incursion was resisted with much bravery and some effect, until at length a bloody and decisive battle was fought on the banks of the Don, in which the Alan king was slain, and his army utterly routed, and the vast majority of the survivors agreed to join the invaders. They next entered the steppe beyond, and the aged Huns, who claimed as his dominions the land situated between the Baltic and the Euxine, and then his successor With.urm, who they slew in battle. The Goths still re.maining placed themselves under the protection of the emperor Valens, who in 376 gave permission to a great number of them to cross the Danube, and settle in the countries on the other side as auxiliaries to the Roman arms against further invasion. The Huns thus became the occupants of all the old territories of the Goths; and when these, not long afterwards, revolted against Va.len.s, the Huns also crossed the Danube, and joined their arms to those of the Goths in hostilities against the Ro.man empire. In the wars that followed, the Huns were less conspicuous than the Goths, their former enemies. In the 5th century they were strengthened by fresh hordes of their brethren, and they determined to gain further territory, so that the Goths, under their king Attila (q. v.), were they even strong enough to receive an annual tribute from the Romans to secure their empire against external injury. With Attila’s death, however, in 454, their power was totally bro.ken. A few feeble sovereigns succeeded him, but they were unable to form lasting alliances or to make any pro.gress against the Goths, and a number of nations that had owned the firm sway of Attila, and the Huns never regained their power. Many of them took service in the armies of the Romans, and others again joined fresh hordes of invaders from the north and east, which were undoubtedly tribes related to them, espe.cially the Avaras, whom they joined in great numbers, and hence perhaps the reason why, at this period of their history, they are found only on the Danubian frontier. They now made themselves masters of the country known by us as Lower Austria. But the Slaves (Slava.lovians?) in Bohemia and Moravia regained their ter.ritory in the 5th century, and many of the Hunnavoraces were made slaves, and were thus brought to a knowl.edge of the language and their inclinations; however, they led them to oppose most fiercely all the inroads of Christiani.ty, and they transformed Christian churches into heathen temples wherever they were successful in gaining territory. About 791 Charlemagne waged war against the Avaras, as the Huns were then called; in which many of them were slain, and some few weak tribes remained. About the year 799 they were finally conquer.ered, and their power broken. Charles himself regarded this war as a sort of crusade or holy war, and sent to the pope and the Church all the tribute paid him by the conquered Avaras, and the inhabitants of the territories that were once one of their princes, called Tudem, who sent a legation to Charlemagne in 795, with the declaration that he would become tributary to him and accept the Christian religion. He was baptized at Aix-la-Cha.pelle in 796, but shortly after his return to his tribe he was slain by the Avaras. The incursion of the Huns, with particular attention to the conversion of the Huns, in whose behalf Alcuin (q. v.) also was greatly interested. By peopling the territory assigned to them with Ger.mans, especially Bavarians, and by founding several monasteries and cathedrals, the subsequent Christian princes of Hungary, for two or three generations, until they became amalgamated with the Germans. The Huns are said to have been of a dark complexion, almost black; deformed in their appearance, of uncouth gesture, and shrill voice. The ancient descriptions unmistakably ally them to the Tartars. “They were distin.guished from the rest of the human species by their broad shoulders, flat noses, and small black eyes deeply buried in the head; and, as they were almost destitute of beards, they never enjoyed either the many graces of youth or the venerable aspect of age. A fabulous origin was ascribed to the Huns; the incursions of the Huns and the witches of Scythia, who, for their soul and deadly prac.tices, had been driven from society, had copulated in the desert with infernal spirits, and that the Huns were the offspring of this execrable conjuction” (Gibbon). Hunt, Aaron, an early Methodist Episcopal min.ister, was born of Episcopal parents at Eastchester, N. Y., March 28, 1768, and emigrated to New York City at seventeen. Here he was converted in 1789, and licensed to preach in 1790. He was first employed as assistant to Dr. Wm. Phoebus on the Long Island Circuit. In 1791 he entered the New-York Conference, and was sent to Fairfield Circuit. In a few years his labors were extended all through the state of Connecticut, on the east as far as Norfolk. He was a memorable figure in the church that name, and into adjoining states, exploring new ground, and contending with opposition and difficulties common to Methodist ministers of those times. After this we find him laboring on various circuits in the state and city of New York, having charge of the whole work in that state as far as the sixty-seventh degree of the chur.ch sacerdotal, thirty-seven of which he was an effective laborer in the regular itinerant work; and whether located, super.numerary, or superannuated, he continued to labor and preach as he had opportunity, and health would permit. He was married at New York, April 18, 1808. — See Minutes of Conferences, vii, 154; Stevens, Memorials of Methodism.
Hunt, Absalom, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia Dec. 4, 1773, and emigrated when a boy to East Tennessee, and later removed to Fleming Co., Kentucky. He was licensed as a local preacher about 1793. In 1815 he joined the Kentucky Conference, and in 1819 was transferred to the Liberty Circuit. He was next appointed to the Lexington Circuit, and two years afterwards successively to the Hindstone, Lime-stone, Mt. Sterling, and Fleming Circuits. In 1823 he was superannuated, but returned at the next session of the Conference, and was sent to the Liberty Circuit. From 1825–28 he served as supernumerary at Paris, Lexington, and Hindstone, and then returned to the superannuated list, finding his health inadequate to the active work of the ministry. He died February 21, 1841. Hunt was a "natural orator," and, "though comparatively illiterate and unpolished, such was his native good sense, his deep acquaintance with the human heart, his quick perception of the characters of men, and the unaffected kindness of his manners, that he was not only generally popular as a preacher, but was often the admired favorite with the learned and the refined."—Methodist Monticell, 1878, Bedford, Methodist in Kentucky, ii, 346 sq. (J. H. W.)

Hunt, Christopher, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Tarrytown, N.Y., near the opening of our century; graduated at Rutgers College in 1827, and at New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1830. He was settled at Clarkstown, N.Y., 1830–2; at New York, 1832–3, and at Morristown, N.J., 1833–9. Bereft of both parents when very young, he made his home an orphan asylum, where Christian kindness and spiritual training were blessed to him. He was an earnest, devoted preacher, a man of comprehensive views, and well qualified by natural endowments, as well as by divine grace, for the large and important charge in which he ended his ministry. His memory is ardently cherished among the churches which he served. He fell in the prime of life, a victim of pulmonary disease. His last words were, "All is well."—Corwin's Manual of the Reformed Dutch Church, p. 119. (W. J. R. T.)

Hunt, Jeremiah, D.D., a learned English dissent- er, was born in London June 11, 1678. He studied first in that city under Mr. Thomas Rowe, and afterwards at Edinburgh and Leyden. On his return to England he preached at Tunsted, near Norwich. He received the degree of D.D. from the University of Edinburgh in 1707, and died Sept. 5, 1744. Dr. Latrobe prepared his funeral sermon, which contained a biographical sketch. Dr. Benson edited Hunt's sermons, which are elaborate and exact compositions, but not interesting. His principal works are An Essay towards explaining the History and Revelations of Scripture in their several Periods, pt. i; to which is added a Dissection on the Fall of Man (Lond. 1731, 8vo);—Sermons and Tracts (Lond. 1748, 4 vols. 8vo).—Darling, Cyclopædia Bibliographica, i, 1580.

Hunt, John, a Congregational minister, was born at Northampton Nov. 20, 1744, and was educated at Harvard (class of 1764). From 1765–69 he taught a grammar school at his native place. While in this position he was engaged in the study of law. In his last years of teaching, he was licensed to preach in 1769. Only two years later he was called to the old South Church, Boston, as associate of the Rev. John Becon (q. v.). In 1775, while on a visit to his home, he died (Dec. 20). Though young even when he died, Hunt had already acquired a great reputation as a ready speaker and a superior thinker. He published two of his sermons (1771).—Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pul-pit, 1, 686 sq.

Hunt, John, a Wesleyan missionary to the Fiji Islands, and a model of Christian excellence, was born at Hykeham Moor, near Lincoln, England, June 18, 1812. His mother was a minister in the church and he was brought up to assist his father on a farm, over which he was bailiff or overseer. When seventeen years old he was converted, and joined the Wesleyan society, to whose service he resolved to devote all his powers. He began at once to preach, and by close application acquired considerable knowledge. In 1838 he received the recommendation from a Quarterly Meeting to join Conference, and in 1842 he was transferred to the theological institution at Hoxton. In 1838, when it became the task of the Missionary Committee at London to determine the future course of Hunt, the wants of Fiji seemed to press upon them, and they overruled the original design of sending him to Africa. He was ordained March 27, and sailed, with his lately-wedded wife, Apr. 29, 1839, and they entered on their work at Rewa Jan. 3, 1839.

Hunt, Robert, a very pious and devoted clergyman of the Church of England, and one of the petitioners for the charter granted by king James I to the "London Company" April 10, 1606, emigrated for this country as preacher of the first colony to Virginia Dec. 19, 1606. Their time is not known, neither is it definitely known whether he spent the remainder of his life in Virginia, though this is generally supposed to have been the case, nor the time of his death at all ascertained. During his connection with the colony their church was burned, and with it Mr. Hunt's library, but he lived to see the last church rebuilt (1608).—Hawks, Rise and Progress of the Prot. Episc. Ch. in Va. p. 17 sq.

Hunt, Thomas, D.D., a distinguished English Hebraist, was born in 1696. He studied at the University of Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1721. He was one of the first fellows of Hertford College, and applied himself especially to philosophical researches in the Q. T. He is said to have assisted William in publishing the London Polyglot. In 1728 he was called to the chair of Arabic founded by Laud. In 1747 he became professor of Hebrew at Oxford; in 1740 he was made fellow of the Royal Society of London, and received the degree of D.D. in 1754. He died at Oxford Oct. 31, 1774. He translated: De Beneficiis, (Oxford, 1724, 4to); De antiquitate, elegantia et utilitate Linguae Arabicae (Oxford, 1739, 4to); De Um Diaceto- rum Orientalium, etc. (Oxford, 1748);—Observations on several Passages of the Book of Proverbs, with two Sermons (Oxford, 1740). He was a very industrious and a most valuable work, published after the author's death, under the care of Kennicott. (J. N. P.)

Hunter. See HUNTING.
Hunter, Henry, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian divine, born at Culross, Fife, in 1741, was educated at the University of Edinburgh. In 1766 he became minister of South Leith, and in 1771 minister of the Scotch Church, London Wall, London. He died at Bristol Hot Wells, October 27, 1802. Hunter was a man of learning, and an eloquent writer. His principal works are Sermons, collected and republished in their respective order, etc. (Lond. 1785, 2 vols. 8vo) — Sacred Biography, or the History of the Patriarchs: being a course of lectures delivered at the Scotch Church, London Wall (6th ed. Lond. 1867, 5 vols. 8vo). This work has often been reprinted both in England and America, and has had great popularity. It is, to a large extent, an unacknowledged translation from Saurin's Discours Historiques. Hunter edited several other French books, and excelled in this line of labor. After his death appeared a collection of his Sermons and other Pieces, with a Sketch of his Life and Writings (Lond. 1864, 2 vols. 8vo). See Jones, Christian Biography, s. v.; Darling, Cyclopedia Bibliographica, i, 1582; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 922.

Hunter, Humphrey, a Presbyterian minister and patriot, was born near Londonderry, Ireland, May 14, 1755. His widowed mother came to this country when Humphrey was only four years old. During the Revolution he served our nation in the struggle for independence, first as a private, and later, for a short time, as lieutenant, against the Cherokee Indians. He finally decided to prepare himself for a literary career, and to this end pursued a course of study at the Queen's Museum, afterwards called Liberty Hall Academy, at Charlestown, S.C. After the surrender of Charleston he re-enlisted, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Camden. He succeeded in making his escape from the enemy, and took a gallant part in the battle at Eutaw Springs. After this he resumed his studies at Mount Zion College, Minnaborough, S. C., and graduated in 1877. Two years later he was ordained for the ministry, and in 1880 he was installed as pastor over the Steele Creek Church, N.C., where he remained until his death, Aug. 21, 1827. (J. H. W.)

Royal Lion-hunt. From the Assyrian Monuments.

Hunting (Not Gr. ἄγων). The pursuit and capture of beasts of the field was one of the first means of sustenance to which the human race had recourse. In process of time, however, when civilization had made some progress, when cities were built and lands cultivated, hunting was carried on not so much for the food which it brought as for the recreation it gave and its conducive to health. Hunting has always borne somewhat of a regal character, and in Persia immense parks (σαράντα) were reserved for the preservation of game and the preservation of the chase. The monarch himself led the way to the sport, not only in these preserves, but also over the wide surface of the country, being attended by his nobles, especially by the younger aspirants to fame and warlike renown (Xenoph. Cyrop. viii, 1, 96). Scenes of this character are abundantly portrayed in the Assyrian and Babylonian monuments recently discovered by Botta and Layard. The king is represented as pursuing not only smaller game on horseback, but also engaged in the chase of more formidable animals, such as deer, lions and wild bulls, in the chariot (Layard's Nineveh, 1st ser. ii, 328). See Lox. This was especially a favorite employment of princes, and Darius caused to be engraved on his tomb an epitaph recording his proficiency as an archer and hunter (Strabo, xvi, 212).

In the Bible we find hunting connected with royalty as early as in Gen. x, 3. The great founder of Babel was in general repute as "a mighty hunter before the Lord." See Nimro. The patriarchs, however, are to be regarded rather as herdsmen than hunters, if respect is had to their habitual mode of life. The condition of the herdsmen was next to that of the hunter in the early stages of civilization, and so we find that even Cain was a keeper of sheep. This, and the fact that Abel is designated "a tiller of the ground," would seem to indicate a very rapid progress in the arts and pursuits of social life. The same contrast and similar hospitality we find were inculcated later in the case of Jacob and Esau; the first "a plain man dwelling in tents," the view rather to recreation than subsistence (Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, vol. iii). Wild oxen are represented on the Egyptian sculptures as captured by means of the lasso, but dogs appear to have been usually employed in the chase. See Doc. That the land of promise into which the Hebrews were conducted on leaving Egypt was plentifully supplied with beasts of the chase appears clear from Exod. xxiii, 24, "I will not drive them out in one year, lest the land become desolate and the beast of the field multiply against thee" (comp. Deut. iii, 22). Also from the regulation given in Lev. xxvii, 15, it is manifest that hunting was practised after the settlement in Canaan, and was pursued with the view of obtaining food. Prov. xii, 27 proves that hunting animals for their flesh was an established custom among the Hebrews, though the turn of the passage may serve to show that at the time it was penned sport was the chief aim. If hunting was not forbidden in the "year of rest," special provision was made that not only the cattle, but "the beast of the field," should be allowed to enjoy and flourish on the uncropped spontaneous produce of the land (Exod. xxiii, 11; Lev. xxv, 7). Harmer (iv, 357) says, "There are various sorts of creatures in the Holy Land proper for hunting; wild boars, antelopes, hares, etc., are considerable numbers there, and one of the Christian kings of Jerusalem lost his life (Gesta Dei, p. 887) in pursuing a hare." That the lion and other ravenous beasts of prey were not wanting in many Palestine passages of the Bible make obvious (1 Sam. xvii, 45; 2 Sam. xxiii, 20; 1 Kings xiii, 24; Har- ris, Notes on the Old Testament, 300). The lion was even made use of to catch other animals (Ezek. xix, 4), and Harmer long ago remarked that as in the vicinity of Gaza, so also in Judea, leopards were trained and used for the same purpose (Harmer, iv, 356; Hab. i, 8). That lions were taken by pits as well as by nets appears from Ezek. xix, 4, 8 (Shaw, p. 172). In the latter verse the words of the prophet, "and spread their net over him" (comp. 2 Sam. xxiii, 6), allude to the custom of inclosing a wide extent of country with nets, into which the animals were driven by hunters (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, iii, 4). The spots thus inclosed were usually in a hilly country and in the vicinity of water-brooks; whence the propriety and force of the language of Psalms xlii, 1, "As the (hunted) hart panteth after the water-brooks." These places were selected because they were those to which the animals were driven by the repair of the walls and evening. Scenes like the one now supposed are found portrayed in the Egyptian paintings (Wilkinson). Hounds were used for hunting in Egypt, and, if the passage in Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 9) may be considered decisive; in Palestine as well. From Gen. xxvii, 8, 9, "Now take one of the young goats that I have brought from the herd of my father to appease the voice of my father, that he may listen and release me to go to my father and come and return to thee," and from Gen. xvi, 10, "And he will return from the herd of my father and come and return to thee," we learn what arms were employed at least in capturing game. Bulls, after being taken, were kept at least for a time in a net (Isa. li, 20). Various missiles, pitfalls, snares, and gins were made use of in hunting (Psalms xci, 5; Amos iii, 5; 2 Sam. xxiii, 20). See the various animals and means of capture enumerated above in their alphabetical place. That hunting continued to be followed till towards the end of the Jewish state appears from Josephus (War, i, 20, 13), where the historian speaks of Herod as "ever a most excellent hunter, for in one day, besides a large number of wild beasts which he shot in the chase, I have heard that he brought home more game than he ever did in any other one day." The passage makes it clear that horses were employed in the pursuits of the chase (compare Josephus, Ant., xv, 7, 7; xvi, 10, 3). See Chase.

The prophets sometimes depicR war under the idea of hunting: "I will send for many hunters," says Jeremiah, "and they shall hunt them from every mountain, and from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks" (xvi, 16), referring to the Chaldeans, who held the Jews under their dominion, or, according to others, to the Persians, who set the Hebrews at liberty. Ezekiel also (xxxi, 30) speaks of the kings, who were persecutors of the Jews, as being hunters. The psalmist thanks God for having delivered him from the snares of the hunters (Eng. trans. "fowler") (Psalms xcvi, 3). Mishaq complains (vii, 2) that every one lays ambuscades for his neighbor, and that one brother hunts another, and that he, Jeremiah (Lam. iii, 50), represents Jerusalem as complaining of her enemies, who have taken her, like a bird, in their nets. Huntingdon, Selina, Countess of, a lady distinguished in the religious history of the 18th century, was born Aug. 24, 1707, and was one of the three daughters and co-heirs of Washington Shirley, earl of Ferrers. Selina, the second daughter, married, in 1728, Theophilus Hastings, brother of the late Sir Hastings, a nobleman of retired habits, with whom she appears to have had a very happy life till his sudden death, on the 13th of October, 1746, of a fit of apoplexy. She had many children, four of whom died in youth or early manhood. It was probably these domestic afflictions which disposed this lady to take the course so opposite to that which is generally pursued by the noble and the great. She became deeply religious. It was at the time when the preachers and founders of Methodism, Wesley and Whitefield, were rousing in the country, by their exciting ministry, a spirit of new and intense devotion that was generally prevalent, and leading men to look more to what are called the distinguishing truths of the Gospel than to its moral teachings, to which the clergy had for so many years, and which made them attend in their public ministrations. She found in these doctrines matter of consolation and delight, and she sought to make others participate with her in the advantages they were believed by her to afford. The character of her religion, as well as of her mind, was too decided to allow it to sink from prominence; on the contrary, her high soul compassionate the fearful condition of the wealthy and noble, and she boldly sought to spread the influence of her religion, not only through the highest aristocracy of the realm, but to the royal family itself. She took Whitefield under her especial patronage, defied all ecclesiastical order, and even engaged him to hold services in her own residence, which she invited her friends of the nobility to attend. She persuaded the highest ladies of the court to listen to the preaching of the great evangelists, with more or less powerful influence upon some, and a saving change in others. Among the former were the celebrated duchess of Marlborough and the duchess of Buckingham; among the latter the duchess of the celebrated Chesterfield, lady Ann Frankland, and lady Fanny Shirley, the third wife of the great muse of Puritans, among her friends some of the most venerated personages of English history: Watts, Doddridge, Romaine, Venn, and the sainted Fletcher. When Mr. Wesley and his conference of preachers came to the conclusion that they had "learned too much to Calvinism," lady Huntington, who was described from Whitefield and the Calvinism by him imported from New England, received the impression, erroneous but iner- create, that Mr. Wesley denied the doctrine of justifica- tion by faith, and insisted upon the saving merit of works. Her relative, Rev. Walter Shirley, with the small remnant of Calvinist preachers, called for recan- tation. A controversy arose, in which the virulent Toplady was chief champion of Calvinism, and love and truth, on the Arminian side, found their model in Fletch- er. Each party went on, in spite of the break, in spreading the essentials of the Gospel maintained by be Toplady, in Wales, for the prevalent doctrine never again met on earth; but when, near the close of her own ca- reer, she read the dying ascription made by Mr. Wesley of his salvation to the blood of the Lamb, and when she learned from Wesley's fellow-traveller, Bradford, that such had ever been the tenor of his meditations, and, bursting into tears, she lamented that the unhappy separation had ever taken place. Whitefield made no attempt to find a separate sect, but the count- less chose to assume a sort of leadership among his fol- lowers, and to act herself as the founder of a sect, and thereby desire to have himself and his followers properly known. Whitefieldian Methodists came to be known as "the court of Huntington's Connection." On Whitefield's death in 1777 she was appointed by will sole proprietor of all his possessions in Georgia (U. S. A.), and a result of this was the organization of a mission to America. But the courties had at her own command a considered in- come during the forty-four years of her widow- hooed, and, as her own personal expenses were few, she established and supported, with the assistance of other opulent persons, members of her own family, or other persons who were brought upon as she was, a college at Trinty, in Wales, for the education of ministers; built numerous chapels, and assisted in the support of the ministers in them.

Huntington, Joseph D.D., a Congregational minister, was born 1785, at Windham, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1762, and was ordained pastor of the First Church, Coventry, Conn., June 29, 1703, where he died Dec. 25, 1794. In 1780 he was made a member of the board of overseers of Yale Col- lege. He published A Discourse before the Ecclesial Stockbridge in the Case of Mrs. Fiske, excom- municated for marrying a profane Man (1779);—An Address to his Anabaptist Brethren (1785);—Thoughts on the Atonement of Christ (1791);—Calvinism improved (post, 1796); and a few occasional sermons.—Sprague, Anteks, i, 602.

Huntington, Joshua, a Congregational minister, was born Jan. 31, 1796, at Norwich, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1804, entered the ministry in Sept. 1806, and was ordained co-pastor of the Old South Church, Boston, May 18, 1808, where he labored until his death, Sept. 11, 1819. He was one of the founders of the "American Biblical Society," and the "Boston Society for the Religious and Moral Instruction of the Poor" from its formation in 1816. —Sprague, An- nals, ii, 501.

Huntington, Robert D.D., a distinguished Eng- lish theologian and Orientalist, was born in February, 1586, at Dorehyst, in Gloucestershire, where his father, the Rev. Thomas Huntington, was the parish clergyman. He was educated at the free-school of Bristol, was admitted in 1652 a portionist of Merton College, Oxford, received his bache- lor's degree in 1658, and was shortly after elected to a fellowship in that college. He took his degree of master of arts in 1663, and, having then applied himself with great success to the study of the Oriental languages, he was in 1670 appointed to the situation of chaplain at Aleppo. From 1677 to 1682 he travelled in the East, and a short time after his return, in 1688, was appointed provost or master of Trinity College, Dublin, receiving about this time the degree of D.D.; he resigned his position in the latter year and returned to England. In August, 1692, he was presented by Sir Edward Turner to the rectory of Great Hallingbury, in Essex; and while there he married a sister of Sir John Powell, one of the justices of the King's Bench. In 1701 he was elected bishop of Raphoe. In 1703 he died, before the expiration of his fourth year. Dr. Huntington is principally distin- guished for the numerous Oriental manuscripts which he procured while in the East and brought with him to England. Besides those which he purchased for arch- bishop Marsh and bishop Fell, he obtained between six and seven hundred for himself, which are now in the Bodleian Library, to which he first presented thirty-five of them, and then sold the rest in 1691 for the small sum of £700. Huntington, however, missed the principal ob- ject of his search, the very important Syriac version of the epistles of St. Ignatius, a large portion of which was recovered in Justinian's monastery of Antioch. See ii, 16, p. 37; Huntington, George ISAAC, D.D., an English prelate, was born in Winchester in 1748, and was educated at Winchester School and at New College, Ox- ford. In 1772 he became master of Westminster School; in 1789, warden of Winchester School; in 1809, bishop of Gloucester; and in 1815 bishop of Hereford. He died in 1822. Besides several Greek and Latin class-books, he published Thoughts on the Trinity, with Charges, etc. (2d edit. Lond. 1812, 8vo); and a number of occasional sermons and charges. See Gentleman's Magazine, June and Dec. 1833; Darlington, Cyclop. Bibliographica, i, 1594; Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i, 924.

Huntington, William, a Calvinistic Methodist preacher, was born in 1744. He passed his early life in menial service and dissipation, but after conversion he entered the ministry, and became a popular preacher in London. On his books he took the title of S. S., or Sinners Saved. He died in 1813. A review of his works by Southey will be found in the Quarterly Review, xx, 462.

His writings have been collected and published: Works (London, 1820, 20 vols. 8vo, and his select works, edited by his son, 6 vols. 8vo, 1856—Conversations, 2 vols. 8vo, 1812;—Contemplations on the Government of Israel, in a series of letters to a friend (Sleaford, 1830, 12mo)—The Law established by the Faith of Christ, a sermon on Rom. iii, 31 (Lond. 1878, 8vo)—The Epistle of Faith (Lond. 1878, 8vo)—The Kingdom of Heavens taken by Prayer, with Life of the Author (Andover, 1832, 32mo)—The wise and foolish Virgins described, the substance of two sermons on Matt. xxxv, 3, 4 (Lond. 1803, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1856.

Hufnfeld, Hermann, D.D., a German theologian, and one of the most distinguished Hebraists of Europe, son of the clergyman Bernhard Karl Hufnfeld, who died at Spangenberg, Hesse, in 1828, was born March 31, 1796, at Marburg, and educated at the university of his native place, under the especial protection of the great Orientalist Arnoldi (q.v.). After preaching a short time as assistant to the first Reformation at Marburg, he accepted in 1819 the position as third teacher at the gymnasium at Hanau. He resigned in 1822 on account of impaired health, and, after a summer’s journey through Switzerland, and the use of mineral waters at the springs of two watering-places in Württemberg, returned to his father’s house at Hagen, and in 1828 to assume his theological studies and to prepare for the ministry, and later to the University of Halle, where he became acquainted with Gesenius, and was led to a more thorough study of the Scriptures, especially the Old Testament. In 1824 he began to lecture at the university, and in 1826 he prepared an elaborate monograph on the Ethiopic language (Exercitationes Ethiopicae, Leipzig, 1825), which was favorably received and commented upon in the Heidelberger Jahrbücher and the Hallische Literaturzeitung. In 1825 he was appointed extraordinary professor of theology at the University of Marburg, and in 1827, after Hermann’s death, was named his successor. He devoted himself to the study of the Oriental languages, retaining the chair of theology, which was a regular professorship in 1830. During the Revolution of 1830 he was on the side of those who favored a reform of the ecclesiastical constitution of Hesse, and in 1831 he was employed as a secretary of this conference. In 1846 he went to Halle as the successor of Gesenius, by whose influence Hufnfeld had received the degree of D.D. in 1834. During the revolution of 1848 he was active in the interests of a popular form of government, and urged the establishment of a German empire on a historical basis. He died April 24, 1866. In theology, Hufnfeld was called orthodox in Germany, but in America he would be much more likely to have been classed with “Liberals.” On inspiration, for instance, he held that only certain portions of the sacred writings are of divine origin, and that the Spirit reveals to all sincere readers the real character of such passages. In criticism, he belonged to the school of his friend De Wette (q.v.).

“His researches were extensive, but guarded in their deductions by his caution. In the elaboration of his works he was extremely fastidious. A connaisseur in work, he could not go on if the machinery were not exact, if one slight element were wanting, or completeness. This sensibility sometimes impeded the activities of a mind whose powers of acquisition and production were immense. In his department he was among the first scholars of his day. Few burial-grounds, indeed, inchose the ashes of such two such sages as Hufnfeld, and his predecessor Gesenius. At the close of his arduous life, when in his seventy-first year, his mental vigor showed no decline, his diligence no slackening. As a religious man, Hufnfeld belonged to the Pietists, who correspond in the religious scale with our strict evangelical Christians. He was a devout man, though not after our stamp of devotion. It is doubtful whether he knew anything by experience of our immediate conversion. Probably he was never in a prayer-meeting; and he looked upon revivals as questionable, if not objectionable, measures. Of devotional methods and exercises, then, he had limited knowledge: but he believed, notwithstanding, in the heart union, and in the spiritual life as all Christians must live, by faith” (N. Y. Methodist, 1866, No. 318). Hufnfeld left mere monographs, the results of most careful inquiry on certain points bearing on the subjects to which he devoted his later years, but few books proper. Thus, in 1841, he commenced a Hebrew grammar, in which he intended to pursue the same course in the Semitic as Grimm did in the Germanic language, viz. the development of the Hebrew genetically by a consideration of its sounds. Only a few sheets of the work were published, under the title Kritisches Lehrb. der hebr. Sprache und Schrift (Cassel, 1841). His most important works are, Ueber d. Begriff u. d. Methode d. bibl. Einlei. (Marb. 1844)—De antiquioribus opud Judaicae accendentur scriptoribus (Halle, 1846 and 1847, 2 vols.)—De primul. et vera feste rum opud Hebrazo ratione (1851, 1852, 1858, 1859, 2 vols.)—Queest. in Jobdtos locos (1853)—Die Quellen d. Genesis (Berlin, 1856)—Die Psalmen, übersetzt u. erklärt (1855-56, 4 vols. 8vo; of a 2d ed., begun in 1867 by Dr. Edward Richm, 3 vols. are now [1870] published)—Die heutige theosoph. u. mytholog. Theologie und Schriftkritik (Berlin, 1861). A biography of Hufnfeld was published by Dr. Carl Steyler, H. Hufnfeld (1881). See Theol. Univ. Lex. i, 374; Pierer, Universal Lex. viii, 631; Studt. u. Hu'pham (Heb. Chapham, הָפָן, according to Gesenius perh. coast-man, according to Fürst screened; Sept. omits, but some eda have Ḫpān; Vulg. Hupham), a person apparently mentioned as one of the sons of Benjamin (Num. xxvi, 57; i Chron. viii, 91); also a Jew of the tribe of the sons of Joseph, more correctly called Hupim (Gen. xlii, 24). His descendants are called Huphaimites (Hebrew Chaphamites, הָפָן־יִתְיָאִים, Sept. omits, but some eda have Ḫpān; Vulg. Huphamites, Numb. xxvi, 91). B.C. 1856. The name Hupham being in the plu. (Heb. Chuppim, חָפַפְתֶּמ, numerous; Sept. omits in Gen. xlii, 21, but some copies have Ḫpāni or Ḫpānī as a son of Bela; Vulg. Opham), suggests the possibility that it is a contraction for Huphaimites. See Shuppim.

Hu'p'pah (Heb. Chappah, הָפָן, a covering or brid tal canopy, as in Psa. xix, 6; also protected, as in Isa. iv, 5; Sept. Ḫpān v. Ṣ. Ḫpān, and even Ḫpān, the head of the thirteenth of the twenty-four classes into which El left divided the priests (1 Chron. xxiv, 13). B.C. 1014).

Hu'p'pin (Gen. xlii, 21; 1 Chron. vii, 12). See HUPHAM.

Hu'r (Heb. ְוּר, a hole, as of a viper, Isa. xi, 8; also a narrow and filthy subterranean prison, Isa. xili, 24; comp. the “black hole” of Calcutta; otherwise mere hole; Sept. Ḫpān, Oph, and כָּעָפָר in Heb. iii, 9; Josephus Ḫpān and Ḫpān); the name of five men.
1. A son of Caleb (Judg. 5:18), a grandson through Hebron, the first one by his second wife Ephrath, and grandfather of Bezael (v. 29), the famous artificer, through Uri (1 Chron. ii. 19, 50; iv. 1, 4; comp. ii. 20; 2 Chron. 1, 5; Exod. xxxv. 2; xxxvi. 30; xxxviii. 22), B.C. between 1856 and 1638. By some (after Josephus, Ant. iii. 6, 1) he has been confounded with the following:

2. The brother of Buzon (Buzon-Hur), the son of Moses, according to Josephus (Ant. iii. 2, 4). During the conflict with the Amalekites he assisted Aaron in sustaining the arms of Moses in that praying attitude upon which the success of the Israelites was found to depend (Exod. xvii. 10-12); and when Moses was absent on Sinai to receive the law, Buzon (Ben-Hur) was in charge of the people (Exod. xxv. 14). B.C. 1658.

3. The fourth named of the five princes or petty kings of Midian (1 Chron. vi. 63; 2 Chron. i. 17), who were defeated and slain shortly before the death of Moses by the Israelites, under the leadership of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar (Num. xxxi. 8; Josephus, Ant. iv. 7, 1). B.C. 1618. In Josh. xiii. 21 these five Midianites are termed 72\textsuperscript{5}, the vassals of Sihon, and are also described as 72\textsuperscript{7}, dwellers in the land, which Keil (ad loc.) explains as meaning that they had for a long time dwelt in the land of Canaan with the Amorites, whereas the Amorites had only recently effected an entrance. After the defeat of Sihon these chieftains appear to have made common cause with Balak, the king of Moab (Num. xxxii. 4, 7), and to have joined with him in urging the curse of the Israelites. The evil counsel of Balaam having been followed, and the Israelites in consequence seduced into transgression (Num. xxxii. 16), Moses was directed to make war upon the Midianites. The latter were utterly defeated, and "Balaam also, the son of Beor, they slew with the sword." See Sihon.

4. Hur (B.B. 52, 53, 54), a son of Solomon's surveyor in Mount Ephraim (1 Kings iv. 8). Josephus calls him Ures (Oepqc), and makes him to have been himself military governor of the Ephraimites (Ant. viii. 2, 3). B.C. ante 995.

5. Father of PH classic, which latter is called "ruler of the half part of Jerusalem" after the exile, and repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 9). B.C. ante 446.

Hur'rai (Heb. Hur'ayy'); a Chaldee, perhaps linemen-workor, otherwise noble; Sept. Oxyi, Vulg. Hurrai; a native of the valleys ("brooks") of Mount Gaash, one of David's heroes (1 Chron. xii. 32); called less correctly in the parallel passage (2 Sam. xxiii. 90) Huidal. B.C. 1046.

Hurm'am (a, 1 Chron. viii. 5; b, 1 Chron. xiv. 1, marg.; 2 Chron. ii. 3, 11, 12; vii. 2, 18; ix. 10, 21; c, 2 Chron. ii. 13; iv. 11, 16). See Hiram.

Hurd, Richard, D.D., an eminent English prelate, was born at Congreve, Staffordshire, in 1720. He was admitted at Emanuel College, Cambridge, in 1733. In 1736, by recommendation of his friend, bishop Warburton (q.v.), he became one of the Whitehall preachers, and in 1757 rector of Thurstaston. He afterwards became successively rector of Follton, Yorkshire, in 1762, preacher of Lincoln's Inn in 1765, archdeacon of Gloucester in 1767, and finally bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in 1777, when he was transferred to Worcester in 1781. In 1785 he was appointed the archbishop of Canterbury, which he declined. He died in 1808. His Sermons (5 vols. 8vo), distinguished by elegant simplicity of style, perspicuity of method, and acuteness of elucidation, are to be found, with his other miscellaneous writings, in his Works (London, 1811, 8 vols. 8vo). His most important contribution to theology is his Introduction to the Study of the Prophets (1772, 8vo; 1788, 2 vols. 8vo; 1839, edited by Bickersteth, 12mo). This was the first of the "Warburtonian Lectures." Notwithstanding the polemical cast of some of these sermons, the clear exposition of the general principles of prophecy and of the claims which this portion of the sacred Scriptures has on the serious and unprejudiced attention of thoughtful readers, conveyed in persuasive and even elegant language, has secured a large amount of popularity for the work even up to recent times (Kitto, Bib. Cyclop. ii. 348). He also edited The Works of Warburton (1786, 7 vols.), and published a Life of Warburton (London, 1794, 4to). See Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 925; Quarterly Review (London), viii. 388; Hallam, Lit. Hist. of Europe (4th edit., London, 1854), iii. 476; Life and Writings of Hurd, by Francis Kilvert (London. 1860); Christ. Remembrancer, 1860, p. 263; North British Rev. Hurd's, James, an English divine, was born at Bishopstone, Sussex, in 1753, and was educated first at Chichester School and next at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford. In 1782 he was chosen decaney of St. Mary Magdalen College, and some time after was made a fellow. In 1785 he became curate of Burwash, in Sussex, and in 1791 was presented to the living of his native place. In 1798 he was elected to the professorship of poetry, having previously published some poems of great excellence. He took the degree of B.D. in 1794, and that of D.D. in 1797. He died Dec. 23, 1801. Besides poetical works, Hurd published several works of interest to the Biblical student. They are: Select Critical Notes on the English Version of the first ten Chapters of Genesis (London. 1793, 8vo):—A short critical Disquisition upon the true Meaning of the Word 72\textsuperscript{5} (Gen. i, 21) (ibid. 1750, 8vo), in which he contends that this word, whatever it occurs, signifies crocodile. "His remarks on the various passages in which it is found are, to say the least, very ingenious." He also wrote Twelve Dissertations on the Nature and Occasion of Psalm and Prophecy (ibid., 1800)—Kitto, Bib. Cyc. ii. 348; Hook, Eccles. Biog. vi. 227 sq.; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 925.

Hurdwa! (more accurately HARDWAR, i.e. Gate of Hurri), also called gangadwara (Ganges Gate), an Indian city, is celebrated on account of the pilgrimages which are made to it. More than two million people from all parts of India resort to this place to take the sacred bath in the Ganges (q. v.), that flows by the side of it. As in Mecca, the occasion is also improved for business purposes, and great fairs are held annually in April.—Brockhaus, Conn. Lex. viii., 167-8.

Huri (Heb. Huriyy'; according to Gesenius perhaps linemen-worker, like Arab. Hurri; so also First; Sept. Oxyy); Hurri, son of Jarash and father of Abihail of the descendants of Gad in Bashan (1 Chron. v. 14). B.C. ante 781.

Hurrion, John, an English Independent minister, was born about 1675. He became pastor of a congregation at Denton, Norfolk, in 1696. In 1724 he removed to London as minister to a congregation in Hare Court, and died in 1725. He employed his time greatly in study, chiefly of the Church fathers. His style is natural, unaffected, and manly. His writings include a Treatise on the Holy Spirit (1734, 8vo), and a large number of sermons and lectures, all of which have been collected and published under the title The whole Works of John Hurrion, son first collected; to which is prefixed, The Life of the Author (London. 1823, 3 vols. 12mo).—Darling, Cyclopedia Bibliographica, i. 157; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i. 926; Lond. Evang. Mag. Jan. 1827.

Huter, Friedrich Emanuel von, a Swiss theologian who became a convert to Romanism, was born at Schaffhausen March 19, 1787. He studied Protestant theology at the universities of Heidelberg and Halle, and his Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies (1772, 8vo; 1788, 2 vols. 8vo; 1832, edited by Bickersteth, 12mo). This was the first of the "Warburtonian Lectures." Notwithstanding the polemical cast of some of these sermons, the clear exposition of the general principles of prophecy and of the claims which this portion of the sacred Scriptures has on the serious and unprejudiced attention of thoughtful readers, conveyed in persuasive and even elegant language, has secured a large amount of popularity for the work even up to recent times (Kitto, Bib. Cyclop. ii. 348). He also edited The Works of Warburton (1786, 7 vols.), and published a Life of Warburton (London, 1794, 4to). See Allibone, Dictionary of Authors, i. 925; Quarterly Review (London), viii. 388; Hallam, Lit. Hist. of Europe (4th edit., London, 1854), iii. 476; Life and Writings of Hurd, by Francis Kilvert (London. 1860); Christ. Remembrancer, 1860, p. 263; North British Rev. communicants of the Church of Rome on a journey through Bavaria and Austria, brought on him the stigma of Crypto-Catholicism, and he was requested by his colleagues at Schaffhausen to define his position to the Reformed Church in which he held orders. As the declaration which Hurter made gave dissatisfaction to his Friends, he requested, in the spring of 1841, he resigned his position in 1841, and in June, 1844, made open declaration of his alienation from the Reformed and adherence to the Romish Church. He now devoted his time mainly to the study of history, and in 1845 accepted a call to Vienna as imperial historiographer. Under the liberal ministry of Pillenderf, he had to resign this position, but recovered it in 1851, when he was also ennobled. He died at Graz Aug. 27, 1865. His works of especial interest to the theologian are: Geschichte des Papstes Innocenz III. u. a. Zeitalter (Hamb. 1834-42, 4 vols. 8vo); Reformation der Kathol. Kirche in d. Schweiz (Schaffh., 1849); Geburt u. Wiedergeburt (ibld., 1845, 4 vols. 8vo; 4th ed. 1867, etc.); Geschichte Ferdinand II. und seiner Eltern (Schaffhausen, 1850-54, 11 vols.).

The researches made for his history of Innocent III, the Roman Catholics claim, led to Hurter's conversion to their Church—Pierre, Hist. Univ. Lec. viii, 633; Werner, Gesch. der Kathol. Theol. p. 521 sq.

Hurter, Johann Georg, a German Pietist and philanthropist, was born in the latter half of the 17th century. Of his early history we know but little. He was pastor of a church at Schaffhausen from 1704. He is often called "an Augustus Hermann Francke in miniature" on account of the school and orphan-houses which he founded, without possessing the necessary means, relying solely, like Francke, on providential help. His first undertaking was the building of a school-house for the instruction of the children of his own scattered congregation, who were obliged to go a long way to the town school, and of whom many could not get there at all. In September, 1709, seventy-nine of these children, with their pastor, Hurter, at their head, celebrated, with prayer and thanksgiving, their entrance into their new house.

The competitions which he had received for the undertaking had been so numerous and so ready that on the completion of the school-house he decided to build an orphan asylum. One benevolent man laid the cornerstone by a gift of 200 florins. To make a beginning, one of the rooms in the school-house was set apart for the reception of orphans, and in July, 1711, a widow with seven children was received. The contributions multiplied, and with them the children. Hurter contributed much of his own means; and when in 1716 he, with other Pietists, was rewarded for his service by deposition from the ministry, he modestly secluded himself in a little room in his orphan asylum, and there spent the latter years of his life. He died in 1721.

This article is based altogether on Hurter's translation of Hagenbach, Hist. of the Church in the 18th and 19th Centuries (N. York, Scribner and Co., 1869, 2 vols. 8vo), i, 181.

Hurwitz, Hyman, a distinguished Jewish scholar, of whose early life but little is known, was, up to the time of his death (about 1850), professor of Hebrew in the University College, London. He is best known as the author of Vehicula Hebraica, a Defence of the Hebrew Scriptures (Lond. 1820, 8vo), which, at the time of its appearance, was highly commented upon by the London Quarterly Review, and by Horne in his Bibl. Bibl. Hurwitz also published a volume of Hebrew Tales, collected chiefly from the Talmud, to which he pays a voice of commendation, of which, so far as has been favoring its free from the objection so frequently made to some of its indelent passages and many contradictions, he says, "I do not hesitate to avow my doubts whether there exists any uninspired work of equal antiquity that contains more interesting, more various and valuable information, than that of the still-existing remains of the ancient Hebrew sages." In 1857 Hurwitz began the publication of text-books for the study of the Hebrew language, which are considered among the best extant in the English language. They were, Elements of the Heb. Lang. pt. i, Orthography (Lond. 1807, 8vo; 4th ed. 1848, 8vo);—Euphemism and Syntax of the Heb. Lang. (4th ed. 1840, 8vo);—Hebrew Grammar (4th ed. 1806, 8vo; 8vo: 2nd ed. 1804, 8vo);—New Elements of the Heb. Lit. p. 183 sqq.; Allibone, Dict. of Authors, i, 926.

Husband (prop. וֺשָּׂנָה, וֺשָּׂנָה, a man, ävög; also הָשָּׂנָה, master, wife, spouse [in Exod. iv, 24, the phrase "bloody husband" has an allusion to the matrimonial figure in the covenant of circumcision (q. v.) etc.]), a married man, the house-band, or band which connects the whole family, and keeps it together. Johnson (Engl. Dict. a. v.) refers the term to the Roman, house-bond, master of the house; but several of its affinities seem allied to the sense of binding together, or assembling into union. So we say, to husband small portions of things, meaning to collect and unite them, to manage them to the greatest advantage, etc., which is by associating them together; making the most of them, not by dispensation, but by alms. A man who was betrothed, but not actually married, was esteemed a husband (Matt. i, 16, 20; Luke ii, 5). A man recently married was exempt from going out to war (Deut. xx. 7; xxiv, 5).

The husband is described as the head of his wife, and as having authority over her conduct, over her vow, etc. (Num. xxx. 6-8). He is also the guide of her youth (Prov. iv, 17). Sarah called her husband Abraham lord, a title which was continued long after (Hos. ii, 16) [heals, my lord]. The apostle Peter seems to recommend it as a title implying great respect, as well as affection (1 Pet. iii. 6). Perhaps it was rather used as an appellation in public than in private. Our own word master [Mr.] (and so corretively mistress) is sometimes used by married women when speaking of their husbands; but the ordinary use made of this word is by all persons, and on all occasions, deprives it of any claim to the expression of particular respect, though it was probably in former ages implied by it or connected with it, as it still is in the instances of proprietors, chiefs, teachers, and superiors, whether in civil life, in polite arts, or in liberal studies. See Mar-

Husbandman (properly וֺשָּׂנָה, וֺשָּׂנָה, man of the ground; וֺשָּׂנָה, one whose profession and labor is to cultivate the ground. It is among the most ancient and honorable occupations (Gen. ix. 20; xxxvi, 12, 14; xxxvii, 7; Job i, 2: Isa. xxxviii. 24-28; John xv, 1). All the Hebrews who were not consecrated to religious offices were husbandmen. Husbandmen are not so well depicted on the ancient monuments of Egypt. It was remarked by the members of the French Commission that there is a great similarity between the joyless looks of the husbandmen on the monuments and the sombre countenances of the modern felilahs, whose toil is so miserably remunerated. In reference to the husband-

Cost. xii, 9): and the simile of land carefully cultivated, or of a vineyard carefully dressed, is often used in the sacred writings. The art of husbandry is from God, says the prophet Isaiah (xxviii, 24-28), and the various operations of it are each in their season. The sowing of seed, the waiting for harvest, the gathering when ready, the storing up in granaries, is an image of the providence of the earth, afforded many points of comparison of apt figures, and similitudes in Scripture. Husbandry (in Heb. by circumlocution הַנָּבָשֵׂם, the ground; Gr. prop. γεωργία, 2 Macc. xii, 2; also γεώρ-γος, a plot of tilled ground, 1 Cor. iii, 9), the culture of the soil, although coeval with the history of the human race (Gen. ii, 15; iv, 2; ix, 20), was held of 4677 siduously and skillfully practiced in Palestine (comp. 1 Sam. vi, 5; 1 Kings xix, 19; 2 Chron. xxvii, 10: Prov.

xxxvii, 16; Eccles. vii, 16, also Isai. xxvii, 27, and Gesen-nius, ad loc), as it continues in a good degree to be at the present day in the East. Upon the fields, which were divided (if at all) according to a vague land-measure termed a yoke (יֵשְׁבָה, 1 Sam. xiv, 14), and occasionally fenced in (see Knobel, Zu Jeremia, p. 207), were mostly raised wheat, barley, flax, lentils (2 Sam. xxiili, 11), garum, and sometimes spells, beans, a kind of dura-be or cuminum (לְכָנָב, cuminum, etc. (Isai. xxiili, 25). See these and other vegetables in their alphabetical place; for the later periods, compare the Mishna, Chalada, i. The fertility of Palestine (q. v.), especially in many parts, made the cultivation tolerably easy, and it was gradually increased by the clearing away of forests (Jer. iv, 9), thus enlarging the arable plains (יוֹר, sordale; comp. Prov. xiii, 23); the hills (2

Chron. xxvii, 10; Ezek. xxiili, 9, 6) being formed into terraces (compare Niebuhr, Beschreib, 156; Burckhardt.

Trav. i, 64), upon which the earth was kept by a facing of stones, while the low grounds and flats along streams were intersected by ditches (יְבָנֵי, Prov. xi, 21; comp. Psal. i, 18) for drainage (comp. Mishna, Moed Ko-tos, i, 1; Niebuhr, Beschreib, 156; Trav. i, 556, 477; Harmer, ii, 1), usually called, more usually by means of water-wheels (Mishna, Peah, v, 3). The soil was manured (טַבָּה) sometimes with dung (compare Jer. ix, 22; 2 Kings ix, 37), sometimes by the ashes of burnt straw or stubble (Isa. v, 24; xivil, 14; Joel ii, 5). Moreover, the keeping of cattle on the fields (Pliny, xviii, 33), and the leaving of the chaff in threshing (Korte, Reisen, p. 438), contributed greatly to fertilization. For breaking up the surface of the ground (טַבָּה also, טַבָּה), ploughs (רָעָה לְכָנְבָּה?), probably of various materials, were used (ςτρίγεια τενού τοίον αρ. Pliny, xviii, 47; comp. Theophrast. Causae plant. iii, 25; in אָסִּיָּה Joel iv, 10, see Credner, ad loc). The latter, like the harrows, which were early used for covering the seed (Pliny, xviii, 19, 3; see Harduin, ad loc), were drawn by oxen (1 Kings xix, 19 sq; Job i 14; Amos vi, 12) or cows (Job xiv, 18; Baer. Mez. vi, 4), seldom by asses (Isa. xxvii, 4); also (Isa. xxvii, 20; Jos. Wars, ii, 43, 'levia est terra'), but never with a yoke of the two kinds of animals together (Deut. xxii, 10), as is now customary in the East (Niebuhr, Beschreib, p. 156): the beasts were driven with a cudgel (יֵשְׁבָה, goad). (Delineations of Egyptian agriculture may be seen in Wilkinson, 2d ser. 48; Rosellini, Memo. cir. table 82, 83.) See each of the above agricultural implements when in its alphabetical place. The furrows (יְבָנֵי, יְבָנֵו), among the Hebrews, IV, D—D probably ran usually lengthwise and crosswise (Pliny, xviii, 19, 19; Niebuhr, Besch. p. 155). The sowing occurred, for winter grain, in October and November; for summer fruit, in January or February; and the harvest in April. The unexceptionable accounts of fifty-fold and hundred-fold crops (Gen. xxxvi, 12 [on the reading here, see Tischendorf, loc.]; Matt. xxii, 9 sq, compare Josephus, War, iv, 8, 3; Justin, Apol. i, 193; Plin. Nat. Hist., xv, 731; xvi, 742; Halhed. Eit. x, 5, p. 395; Sonnin, Trans. ii, 806; Shaw, Trans. p. 123; Burckhardt, i, 463; yet see Boppel, Abyss. i, 92; Niebuhr, Beschreib, p. 151 sq.) seem to show that the ancients sowed (planted, i.e. deposited the grain, יְבָנֵא, Isai. xxvii, 29) in drills, and with wide spaces between (Niebuhr, Beschreib, p. 157; Brown's Transl. in Apol. i, 193; Strabo, xv, 780) expressly says was the case among the Babylonians. (See further under the above terms respectively; and comp. generally Ugolini, Comment. de re rustica vet. Heb., in his Theaœar. xxix; H. G. The legal regulations for the security and promotion of agriculture among the Israelites (compare Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 28 sq) were the following: a. Every hereditary or family estate was inalienable (Lev. xxv, 29); it could indeed be sold for debt, but the purchaser held only the usufruct of the ground; hence the land itself rever-red without redemption at the year of jubilee to its appropriate owner (Lev. xxviii, 28), whether the original possessor or his heirs-at-law; and at any time during the interval before that period it might be redeemed by a sufficient person on repayment of the purchase-money (Lev. xxv, 24). See Land; Jubilee. b. The removal of field-lines marked by boundary-stones ("termim") was strongly interdicted (Deut. xix, 14; compare xcvii, 17; Prov. xxii, 28; Hos. v, 10), as in all ancient nations (comp. Plato, Leg., viii, p. 486 sqq; Dugdale, Antiqu. i, 10; similarly the regulations were established at ancient religious ceremonies, see Pliny, xvi, 2; compare Ovid, Fasti, ii, 639 sqq); yet no special penalty is denounced in law against offenders. For any damage done to a field or its growth, whether by the overrunning of cattle or the spreading of fire (Exod. xxvii, 5 sq), full satisfaction was exacted by payment of 500 shekels (Lev. xxv, 4 sq). But even kings bought large tracts of land (lativeunda) together (Isa. v, 8; Mic. ii, 9), so that the entailment and right of redemption of the original possessor appear to have fallen into disuse; neither was the Sabbatical year regularly observed (Jer. xxxvii, 5 sq). Hulgan, Johann, a German Roman Catholic divine, was born at Giesenkirchen, near Cologne, in 1789.

In 1792 he became vicar and teacher at his native place, and after filling different vicarages, was appointed superintendent over the Roman Catholic schools at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1816, in 1825 general vicar to archbishop, Spiriegel of Desenberg and dean in Cologne, and in 1885, upon the death of the archbishop, presiding officer of the archiepiscopal pro tem, in which office he greatly distinguished himself by his kind and conciliatory spirit towards all sects. He died in 1841.—Pierer, Unr. Lex.

Husk (25, zog, the skin of a grape, so called as being transparent, Numb. vi, 4; "tisiklon, a sack for grain, so called from being tied together at the mouth, 2 Kings iv, 42) occurs also in Luke xv, 16 as a rendering of kspstwv (from its horned extremities), in the parable of the prodigal son, where it is said that "he would fain have filled his belly with the husk that the swine did eat; and no man gave [even this poor provender, so Meyer, ad loc.] unto him.” In the Arabic Version of the New Testament, the word khrbb, often written khrwbb, is given as a synonym of keritta. According to Celsius, the modern Greeks have converted the Ar-tree of the family of leguminous plants, of which the fruit used to be called Silica edulis and Silica dulcis.

By the Greeks, as Galen and Paulus Aegineta, the tree is called kpoa, kpoa, from the resemblance of its fruit to kipos, a horn; also σκηνη αἰγυπτία, or Egypt-iæ fic (Theophr. Plant. i, 18). The carob-tree grows in the south of Europe and north of Africa, usually to a moderate size, but it sometimes becomes very large, with a trunk of great thickness, and affords an agreeable shade. It has been seen by travellers near Beth-lem (Rauwolf, Travels, p. 458; Schubert, iii, 115), and elsewhere (Robinson’s Researches, iii, 54). Prof. Hack-tett saw it growing around Jerusalem, and the fruit exposed for sale in the market at Smyrna; and he describes its form and uses (Illustra. of Scripture, p. 129, Bost. 1855). Wilde, being in the plain near Mount Carmel, observed several splendid specimens of the carob-tree. On the 15th of March he noticed the fruit as having been perfected. The husks were scattered on the ground, where some cattle had been feeding on them. It is an evergreen, and puts forth a great many branches, covered with large pinnate leaves. The blossom is of a reddish or dark purple color, and is succeeded by large, slender pods or capsules, curved like a horn or sickle, containing a sweetish pulp, and several small, shining seeds. These pods are sometimes eight or ten inches long, and an inch and a half broad; the color is dark brown, and the seeds which they contain are about the size of an ordinary dry pea, not perfectly round, flattened, hard and bitter, and of a dark reddish brown color. The quantity of pods borne by each tree is very considerable, being often as much as 800 or 900 pounds weight; they are of a subaromatic taste when unripe, but when ripe to maturity they secrete within the husks and around the ribs an amber-brownish, pungent spirit. When on the tree the pods have an unpleasant odor, but when dried upon hulles they become edible, and are valued by poor people, and during famine in the countries where the tree is grown, especially in Spain and Egypt, and by the Arabs. They are given as food to cattle in modern times, and we were in ancient times, but at the best can only be considered very poor fare. (See Cebisius, 1, 227; Oudem. vi. 137 sq.; Salmas, Exercit. Plin. p. 45 sq.; Hasselquet, Vrarda, p. 581; Arvieux, Voyage, p. 206 sq.; Penny Cyclopaedia. s. v. Cervatoni.)

Huss, John (more properly Hus, the other mode of spelling it, which was universally used and has (as it is evident from a translation in the English language), was the illustrious Bohemian reformer before the Reformation, and the precursor of the Church of the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren.

1. Sketch of his Life.—He was born July 6, 1369, or, according to some authorities, 1373, at Hussen, a small market-town of Bohemia, on the Planitz. His parents were common people, but in good circumstances for their station in life. Very little is known of his early years. He entered the University of Prague, and took his first degree in 1390. The development of his mind was slow, but intense; he showed a strong determination, and a hatred for hypocrisy and the most genuine godliness. In his intercourse with others he was modest and kind. A spirit of melancholy gave a subdued tone to his bearing. He was a tall man, with a thin, pale, sad face. His public career began in 1396, when he was appointed professor in the university. In 1401 he became dean of its theological faculty, and in 1402 its rector. At the same time he was pastor of the Bethlehem Chapel at Prague, erected by John de Milheim (1391), in order to give the people an opportunity of hearing the Gospel in their native tongue, and to give instruction in the Christian religion. Multitudes flocked to his chapel, among them Queen Sophia, who also chose him for her confessor. His sermons were not oratorical, but lucid, fervent, and simple, displaying a thorough knowledge of the Bible, and leaving an indelible impression upon the minds of the people. It was from the pulpit of this church that he set forth the truth with such force as to make Rome tremble. The Reformation, which Huss may be said to have inaugurated, may be dated from the 28th of May, 1403, when the doctrines of John Wickliffe were publicly condemned in a meeting of the faculty and doctors of the university, in spite of the efforts of Huss and his friends to prevent such a decision. The formation of two parties was the result; the one in favor of reform, the other opposed to it. At the head of the first stood Huss, who labored with zeal and boldness, uncovering the putrid sores of the Church and particularly the gross immoralities of the clergy. For a time Zbynck, the archbishop of Prague, recognised the honesty of Huss's intentions. But soon disagreements occurred between them; and when thousands of students left the university because of a new distribution of votes on academical occasions (1408), which Huss had been mainly instrumental in bringing about, the archbishop openly arrayed himself on the side of his enemies. An opportunity soon offered for showing Zbynck's ill will. The clergy of Prague laid before him formal accusations of heresy against Huss, which the latter met with counter accusations against Zbynck. Both appealed to the pope. In response, Alexander V conferred extraordinary powers upon the archbishop, which he soon abused. Accordingly, the latter prohibited preaching in private chapels; caused more than 200 volumes of Wickliffe's writings to be committed to the flames, amidst the chanting of the Te Deum; and excommunicated Huss (July 18, 1410). In this emergency King Wenzel came to the principles of the Zbynck, rose in arms against the owners of the books, and annulled the ban against Huss. Nor was the prohibition touching chapels carried out. Meantime Alexander died, and was succeeded by John XXIII, an atrocious wretch, formerly a member of the Hussite sect. When on the throne of vice. To him, Wenzel, the queen, many nobles, and Huss himself appealed for redress. But the new pope adhered to the policy of his predecessor, confirmed the acts of Zbynck, and cited Huss before his tribunal in person. The king, however, sent two advocates to Bologna, where the papal court had its seat, to plead Huss's cause, and they were joined by three more delegated by Huss himself. But they effected only a transfer of the suit to other hands; while an attempt on the part of Zbynck, at Prague, to lay an interdict upon the city, caused an open rupture between him and the king, who coerced him by violent means. At last, in the year 1412, the pope, in order to obtain peace and a pacification, including Huss, was brought about. But in September of the same year Zbynck died, and was succeeded by Albicus, a weak and miserly old man, who received, in the following spring (1412), a papal bull commanding a crusade against Lautersaus, king of Naples, a favorite and companion of Zbynck, and the anti-pope, with all the papal indulgence to all who would take part in it, or contribute money towards its prosecution. The publication of this bull put a sudden end to the peace which it had been patched up in the Church of Bohemia. Huss regarded the bull as an infamous document, contrary to all Christian sentiment, and publicly took this stand. A number of his friends, on the contrary, maintained that the will of the pope must be obeyed under all circumstances; they accordingly broke with him, and went over to the anti-reform party. Several of them afterwards became his most ardent foes; and one of them, Stephen de Palec, was the chief instigator of his subsequent condemnation at Constance. In nothing terrified by his adversaries, however, Huss continued to preach against the bull, and held a public disputation upon it in the sala of the university; on which occasion he asserted his independence, with great force. In Prague, delivered an address of such fervid eloquence that the students formed a fantastical procession the next day, bearing as many copies of the document as they could find to the outskirts of the city, where they were heaped up and burned. Huss took no part in these proceedings. King Wenzel now became alarmed. He had a reputation to support in Romish Christendom, and issued a decree making any further revilement of the pope or the papal bull punishable with death. In consequence, three young men were executed, who, on the following Sunday, publicly gave the lie to a priest while advocating the plenary indulgence offered by the pope. Huss buried them in the Bethlehem Chapel, with all the rites of the Church, and extolled them as martyrs. When John XXIII was informed of these events, he communicated the Reformer a second time, ordered his arrest, commanded his chapel to be suppressed, and laid upon the whole city of Prague, Wenzel again interfered, saved Huss from arrest, and prevented the chapel from being destroyed: but, as the ban was everywhere published, and the interdict rigidly enforced, he advised Huss to leave the city for a time. Huss obeyed; and, after spending several years in the walls of his chapel, appealing from the corrupt Romish tribunal to the only incorruptible and infallible Judge, Jesus Christ, he retired to the Castle of Koz Hradec (December, 1412). There, and subsequently at the Castle of Krakowce, he remained until August, 1414, engaged in literary labors, which resulted in some of the most important both of his Latin and Bohemian works, carrying on a voluminous correspondence, and preaching to the people of the neighboring villages.

Meanwhile a general council of the Church had been called to meet at Constance, 1414, under the auspices of Sigismund, a brother of Wenzel, and designated emperor. This monarch invited Huss to attend, that his cause might be examined and peace given to the Bohemian Church. He pledged himself to grant him a safe-conduct, and to send him back unharmed, even in the event of his not submitting to the council. Modern Romish historians try to disprove the reality of such a promise. But it is incontrovertible. The instrument which Sigismund actually furnished says: "Ut ei transire, stare, morari, redivere libere permittatis." Huss joyfully obeyed the summons, for it was the great wish of his heart to defend his doctrines in the presence of the assembled representatives of Latin Christendom, and to unite with them in reforming the Church, for which purpose the Council had been specially convened. Leaving Prague on the 11th of October, with testimonials of orthodoxy from the papal inquisitor and the archbishop, and accompanied by a retinue of nobles whom the king appointed to defend him, he traveled through Bohemia and Germany, held disputations upon his doctrines in all the towns where he passed a night, and arrived at Constance on the 8th of November. The next three weeks he spent in strict seclusion. His case was finally referred to the judgment of the council, and he was temporarily suspended the sentence of excommunication, besides giving him the solemn pledges for his personal safety. But Stephen de Palec and others among his Bohemian enemies began so persistently to incite the ecclesiastics against him, that he was arrested on the 28th of November, and on the 1st of December was cast into the dungeon of the Dominican monastery. When Sigismund reached the city, Huss's escort vainly attempted to secure his release. The emperor was persuaded by the priests that it would be wrong to keep him in prison; but, after the lapse of three months, was conveyed to the Castle of Gottlieben, where a mere hole, so low that he could not stand upright in it, was assigned him as his cell, and where his feet were fastened to a block with heavy irons, and at night his right arm was chained to the bed he slept in. Hopes of flight from him were extinguished by the end of March to the beginning of June, in spite of the unceasing efforts of his friends, and the solemn protest of the whole Bohemian nation.

Huss had three hearings before the council; the first on the 5th of June (1415), the second on the 7th, and the third on the 10th. For the most part they were stormy debates, or irregular philippics against him. He was not permitted to explain and defend his doctrines. An immediate and explicit recantation was required of him, which he declined giving, unless convicted of heresy by the testimony of Christ and his apostles. After the last hearing several weeks elapsed, in which every conceivable effort was made to induce him to recant. But he remained firm, and calmly prepared for death. On Saturday, July 6, he was once more cited before the council, condemned as a heretic, degraded from the priesthood, and delivered into the hands of the secular power for execution. The proper officers immediately conveyed him to the outskirts of the city, where, at about ten o'clock in the morning, he was burned alive at the stake, while the council continued in session. He suffered with the heroism of the early martyrs. His ashes were cast into the Rhine. The memory of this, by the present generation of his countrymen, marks the spot. Erasmus pithily said: "Joannes Huss exustus, non convictus." The tradition of a peasant woman bringing a flag to the pile, and moving him to exclaim "O sancta simplicitas!" is very doubtful; the other tradition of a prophecy with regard to Luther, under the image of a swan, uttered by Huss on his way to execution, lacks all historic basis. Jerome of Prague (q. v.), who had stood faithfully by the side of Huss, and, on the death of his friend, himself led the followers of the lamented Huss, soon suffered the same fate. The disturbances which then followed we treat under Hussitae.

II. Huss's Literary Labors.—Besides the many letters which Huss wrote, the most clearly forth in his theological views, he was the author of fifteen Bohemian, and a large number of Latin works. Of the former, among which his Postilla and Tractatus de Simony are particularly important, several have, unfortunately, never been translated, and others remain in manuscript. Of the latter, his Tractatus de Ecclesia describe very particularly mentioned, together with the polemical treatises against Palec and Stanislaus, that form its supplementas (Historia et Monumenta Jussi, i, 245–331, ed. of 1710). Other of his Latin works are of an exe-gogical character. He also composed numerous hymns and didactic hexameters. Many of his hymns were adopted by the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren, and some of them are still in use in the Moravian Church. Moreover, he carefully revised the old Bohemian version of the Bible, which had been translated as early as the ninth century, and in quite recent times. The Bohemian antiquary and historian, has discovered a catechism in that language, which he supposes to be from the pen of Huss, and which, no doubt, formed the basis for the catechism of the Brethren, published in 1522. As a writer of his mother language the merits of Huss cannot be set aside. He shaped the Bohemian language into a logical and syntactical rules, and invented a new system of orthography, distinguished by its simplicity and precision. It was brought into general use by the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren in the sixteenth century, since when it has remained the acknowledged standard. Ulrich von Hutten was the first to publish the Latin works of Huss. The edition by O. Brunfels (Strasb. 1625, 4to, with woodcuts), is very scarce. A more complete edition appeared at Nuremberg in 1558, entitled Historia et Monumenta Jussi (Huss utque Hieronymi Praegressa), in two fol. volumes. Still more complete is the edition of 1715, which came out at the same place with the same title. A small but very important volume of his sermons, translated from a copy of the Bohemian Postilla, brought to Hennibert by the Moravian refugees, appeared at Göttingen in 1855. Its title reads as follows: Johannes Hussus, Propheta et Theologi, Fragmenta, Nach der Ubersetzung-Evangelien des Kirchennahrs. Aus der Böhmischem in die Deutsche Sprache übersetzt von Dr. Johannes No-soynt. They are pre-eminently sermons for the times, and abound in polemics. His letters have been translated into English (Edins. 1659, 1 vol.) and other modern languages. A collection of his writings in Bohemian was begun by Erben (Prague, 1864, etc.).

III. Huss's Theological Views, and the Principles of his Reformation.—The views of Huss were moulded by the writings of two men in particular; the one Matthias of Janow, a Bohemian, the other Wickliffe, the English Reformer. He was attracted by the latter, inasmuch as Wickliffe always traced the truth up to its source in the New Testament, and desired to renew Christianity in its apostolic sense. Hence he made him his guide in those principles which he had, first of all, learned from Janow, and which he ever afterwards developed and applied. Not having passed through the same conflict which brought Luther into the inner sanctuary of divine grace, through Christ, and justification by faith, he did not turn his attention so much to doctrine as to practice, and set forth the Saviour of the world rather from the standard point of the law which was given by faith than from that of his redeeming work. As a necessary consequence, he insisted more upon the reformation of the Church in regard to life than in regard to its un sound and corrupt dogmatical views. This was the weak point of his Reformation, bringing it to a premature end, and him to the stake. In order to success, an absolute reform of the dogmas of the Church was essential. Huss HUSSEY did not see this, because he had formed no plan of operations antagonistical to Rome. He advanced, not in obedience to any law, but in pursuit of his personal ends, only, and under the influence of outward circumstances. While Christ was the centre of his own faith, and he held to Christ's Word alone as the norm of the faith of all, he did not, on that account, reject Romish dogmas until he became conscious of a contradiction between them and the true spirit of the Gospel. His impulse to action was made prominent by the circumstances of the times, the more clearly he apprehended the truth in its evangelical import. Upon some points, however, as, for instance, the seven sacraments, and transubstantiation in the Lord's Supper, he never changed the views which were his from infancy. In my opinion, this gave him the opportunity of investigating these points in a reformatory spirit. So also he allowed, with certain qualifications and great caution, prayers for the dead, although he did not deem them of any importance; also confession to a priest and absolution, though, once he said, could forgive sins but God only; and he was, at first, satisfied with the holy communion in one kind. When this latter usage, however, grew to be a subject of dispute between the national and the Romish party in Bohemia, he emphatically endorsed the position of Jacobus of Mies, who wrote: "The Church is not to be divided by the cup of Communion, but by the view of his views on the Church, as set forth in the work mentioned above, see Naendler's Kirchengegeschichte, vi, 295, etc., or Torrey's Translation, v, 299, as also Gillett's Life and Times of Huss, i, 241, etc. In general, it may be said that it was not until his trial before the council that he recognized the necessity of unity with the Church of Rome in order to effect a reformation. If he had been able, at that time, to escape from the hands of his enemies and return to Bohemia, he would have been the Luther of the world, and Protestantism would have begun its enlightening course a century earlier. See Reformation. While Huss failed to lead the Catholic church in a general reformation, his principles, developed and purified, found an ecclesiastical form forty-two years later in the Church of the Brethren, and have, through that channel, come down to the present day as a power in Christendom.

In addition to the histories of the Council of Constance, the most important works are: Lebenbeschreibung des M. Johannes Huss von Hussineke, von Aug. Zitelte, Lateinpreis; (Prague, 1790); an anonymous work, in German, "Die Geschichte der Lebensabrechnung des Herrn John Huss, was condensed in Constance in the Council of the Pope and his factions," written by an eye-witness, and published in 1548; Becker's Life of Huss; Kohler's Huss und seine Zeit; Hist. of the Hussites, by Hodgeson; Rennert, p. 133; Naendler's Kirchengegeschichte, vi; Gillett's Life and Times of John Huss; and especially Palacky, F. Geschichte von Röhm, iii, pt. i, iii-iv; Palacky, F. Documenta Mag. J. Huss vatam, doctriam, causam in Conc. Constant, octom, etc., nunc ex scriptis fontibus hactenus (Prag 1869); Bonnehoeve (Emile de), Les Reformations avant la Reforme (Paris, 1847, 2 vols, 12mo); Good Words, Jan. 6, 1866, p. 21 sqq; Ranke, Hist. of the Popes, ii, 79 sqq; Zitelte, Lebenbeschreibung, d. Mag. J. Huss (Prag 1678-95, 2 vols); Wendt, Gesch. v Huss und d. Hussiten (Magdeburg 1845); Helfert, Huss u. Hieronymus (Prag 1893); Böhringers, D. Kirche Christi u. ihre Zeugen (Wien 1833, 3 vols, body by vol., 1833, 1834), Krummel, J. Huss (Darmst. 1863); Höfler, Mag. J. Huss (Prague 1816); Contemp. Rev. April and July, 1869; Stud. u. Hussey, Robert, B.D., an eminent minister of the Church of England, was born at Sunderland, Kent, Oct. 7, 1801. He studied at the King's School, Oxford, and graduated in 1825 with great credit. He discharged for a while the office of proctor, and was afterwards appointed one of the public examiners in the classical school. In 1837 he took the degree of B.D. In 1842 he was appointed regius professor of ecclesiastical history, which position he held until his death, December 2, 1858. Hussey possessed an immense fund of information, to which he added anything he could procure from all kinds of sources from his own memory. The principal of these are: Sermons, mostly academical, with a preface containing a refutation of the theory founded upon the Syriac fragment of the epistles of St. Ignatius (Oxf. 1843, 8vo) — The Papal Supremacy, in Race and Progress, traced in three Lectures (Lond. 1851, 8vo). "This little work of the explanation that stands out in short notes (Oxf. 1846) — and the Greek text of Socrates's Ecclesiastical History (1844). In 1853 he edited again for the University Press another edition of Socrates, and this time a mere text-book for his lectures, but an elaborate edition, with a Latin version, notes, and index, forming three volumes 8vo. In 1854 he published a sermon, by request, on University Prospects and University Duties, and in 1856 an ordination sermon on The Atonement. An edition of Sosmen was suspended by his death.

Husssites, general name for the followers of John Huss (q. v.). The Council of Constance, in its dealings with Huss, seems to have forgotten that the adherents to his cause were not the handful of men who had gathered around their friend and teacher in his last hours, but were scattered throughout Bohemia and Moravia. No sooner had news of his death reached the council than the meetings were disturbed by disturbances, the cause of the disturbances being the desire to espouse openly the cause of the Hussites. September 8, 1415, the Diet of Bohemia addressed a manifesto to the council, full of reproaches and threats; and September 5 it voted that every landowner should be free to have the doctrines of Huss preached on his estate. For Huss, considered threatened, the priesthood, and, indeed, all strict adherents of the Romish Church, formed (October 1) a league (Herrenbund), vowing obedience to the council and fidelity to the Romish Church. Encouraged by these associations, deemed strong enough not only to oppose successively the efforts of the opponents of Huss, but to carry anything further the inroads of the heretics among the people, the council assumed a more authoritative position. Not satisfied with the mischief it had already done, it now threatened all adherents of Huss with ecclesiastical punishments. Jerome of Prague (q. v.), the friend and disciple of Huss, was the first to suffer. He was summoned before the council, summarily tried and condemned, and, like his master, burned at the stake (May 30, 1416). The 452 signers of a protest against the execution of Huss were the next summoned before the bar of the council to answer for their heretical conduct. Indeed, had not the emperor Sigismund interfered, the king and queen of the Bohemians would have been added to this number. But the execution of Jerome, following that of Huss, was too great an outrage in the eyes of the Bohemians not to destroy the last vestige of respect for the authority of the council even among those who had been con- templated. The threats of the council became to them a mere bruitum fulmen. They treated them with contempt.

Meanwhile, the adherents of Huss had divided into two parties, the moderate and the extreme. The moderate party, led by the University of Prague, took the name of Calixtines (q. v.), who derived their title from the chalice (calix), holding that communion in both kinds was essential to the sacrament; the so-called extreme party were called the Taborites, from the mountain Tabor (now Austin), which was originally their headquarters. Here, where Huss himself had formerly preached, they assembled in the open air, sometimes to the number of over 40,000, and partook of communion under both kinds on tables erected for the occasion. The Calixtines preserved the belief in purgatory, praying for the dead, images of the saints, holy water, etc.; but in March, 1417, they declared openly for the right of all communicants to both kinds. As a result of this declaration, all the privileges of the university were suspended by the council, and the forcible abolition of the heresy demanded by Pope Martin V. In the early part of 1419, King Wenceslaus, unwilling to lose the favor of either party, and fearing jealousies and increasing discord, restored the rights of Roman Catholic priests to their former offices. But no sooner had the Romanists learned of the enactments in their favor than they attacked the Hussites and began all manner of persecutions against them. February 22, 1418, Martin V issued a bull against the followers of Wickliffe and Huss. All who should be found "to think or teach otherwise than as the holy Roman Catholic Church thinks or teaches;" all who held the doctrines, or defended the characters of Huss or Wickliffe, were to be delivered over to the secular arm for punishment as heretics. The document is a model from which the Inquisition, both in the West and in the East, copied and exhausted the odium of language in describing the character of the objects of its vengeance. They are "schismatical, seditionous, impelled by Luciferian pride and wolfish rage, duped by devilish tricks, tied together by the tail, only to be dragged over the earth and thus tarried in favor of Wickliffe, Huss, and Jerome. These pestilent persons had obstinately sown their perverse dogmas, while at first the prelates and ecclesiastical authority had shown themselves to be only dumb dogs, unwilling to bark, or to restrain, according to the canons, these deceitful and pernicious doctrines. These intolerant measures added strength to the party whom it was their object to extirpate. The Bohemians, threatened at home by a feeble and vacillating king, and abroad by the official emissaries of the papal pontiff, felt themselves obliged to gather in numbers for self-defense, and choose Nicolas of H unlitez (q. v.) and John Ziska (q. v.) as their leaders. They also prepared an answer to the bull, and circulated it far and wide. It was entitled "A faithful and Christian Exhortation of the Bohemians to Kings and Princes, to stir them up to the zeal of the Gospel," and was signed by four of their leading captains. The two principal leaders of the party, the theologians, their Christian intelligence, and their regard for the supreme authority of the Word of God." Their first aim was to secure, if possible, the capital of the kingdom, July 30, Zisca entered the old city, or that part of it which had been burned in 1319 by the religious order, and they remained for an assault on the new city, joined by the inhabitants of the old. His aim, however, for the present, was only to intimidate the papal party. After Zisca had gained the city, some of his men sought entrance in churches to observe their religious rites. They were denied admission to some of them, and the consequence was a forcible entrance, and the summary execution of the fanatic priests. With the council of the city also they experienced trouble. While a number of the Hussites were in a procession from one of the churches, their minister, bearing the chalice, was struck by a stone which had been thrown from one of the windows of the state-house. The Hussites became enraged. Under the command of Zisca himself, the state-house was stormed. Seven of the councillors, who had been unable to make their escape, were thrown from the upper windows by the rebels below. The king, when the news reached him, became so excited that he died of a fit of apoplexy. General anarchy now ensued. The Hussites, undisputed masters of Prague, restored the forms of civil government by the appointment of four magistrates to hold office until the general election for the state council, under Zisca, to Pilsen. The queen Sophia sought not only to secure the aid of the emperor Sigismund against these armed heretics, but even endeavored to influence the citizens of Prague to admit Sigismund as the successor of Wenceslaus. The people appealed to Zisca for aid against the probable invasion of the city by Sigismund. November 4, 1419, Zisca re-entered the city. The emperor invaded a war with the Turks, neglected at first to attend to Bohemia. Finally in 1420 he besieged Prague, but was driven from his positions. Widely differing in their political and religious sentiments, the Hussites became daily more divided. Some favored the Calixtines, others the Taborites, and between these two factions a wide jealousy and increasing discord arose. The restaurators of Roman Catholic priests to their former offices. The Hussites, undisputed masters of Prague, restored the forms of civil government by the appointment of four magistrates to hold office until the general election for the state council, under Zisca, to Pilsen. The queen Sophia sought not only to secure the aid of the emperor Sigismund against fought at Galgenberg or Witkow, known thereafter as the Ziscaberg (Hill of Ziscia). Yet the opposition of the Taborites to all hierarchical pomp, and the threatened ruin of some of the most splendid structures of Prague, inclined the Calixtines, as soon as the danger had passed, to allude to the emperor and seek to have the stigma of heresy which rested on the four "Articles of Prague." This they failed to accomplish, and peace was further delayed. A second and third attempt of Sigismund to crush the Taborites met with no more success. An effort was now made to compromise the differences between the Calixtines and Taborites. But the greatest obstacle to this was found to be their political rather than religious views. The question which should wear the crown of Bohemia was a matter of no little importance, and each party seemed anxious to secure it for one of their number. A convention of the states was held at Cazalau, July, 1421, to determine the matter. A regency was appointed of twenty members, taken from the different orders of the nation. Ziska appeared in it in the first rank of the nobles as the leader, with support from the burghers, and the four Articles of Prague should be universally received. Sigismund was declared incapable of reigning over Bohemia, and the crown was offered to the king of Poland. He refused, however, to accept it. Withhold, grand duke of Lithuania, and the king of Hungary, but he declined. Recommended Sigismund Corybut, his brother, to the Bohemian barons, and accompanied him to Prague, where they both, by partaking of the communion of the cup, sealed their adherence to the faith of the Calixtines, who held now the supremacy at Prague, and who had revived their old hostility against the Taborites. The nation was divided into two "fierce parties, embittered by prejudice and mutual aggressions," so that the opposition to Corybut became irreconcilable, even although Ziska himself espoused his cause, as the Taborites were unwilling to follow their leader blindly. A diet held at Prague from November 1421, to determine the question, brought it no nearer to its solution, while it effected the estrangement of Ziska from the Calixtines, who now regarded him and his followers as their enemies. An army was gathered against them; but, as often before, the Taborites were victorious, and the Calixtines severely beaten. Another attempt to reconcile them proved favorable to them, and, thus driven to desperation, Ziska now attempted to crush the Calixtines, who were virtually leagues with the Imperialists. After various victories over his enemies, Ziska appeared before Prague September 1421. Harassed, and having no other issue forth from its gates. When everything was ready to storm the city, a deputation of the Calixtines appeared before him and offered terms of submission, which he readily accepted. Ziska entered Prague with great honors, and was intrusted with the exercise of paramount authority. The emperor's hopes of being king of Bohemia had of late been based upon the divisions of the nation, and, baffled by this new agreement between the Hussites, he now sought to win them over by liberal concessions. He offered to Ziska the government of the kingdom, and asked for himself only the wafer of a rejoinder. "But, at this culminating point of Ziska's fortunes, death overtook him (October 11, 1424). He lived to foil the purposes of Sigismund, and died at the moment when his death, in some respects, another defeat to his hopes. Ziska's death left the Taborites without any real leader. Their successes they chiefly owed to him, and some of them, to indicate their deep sense of the loss they had suffered, took the name of Orphantes (q. v.). Others were absorbed by the Horbites (q. v.), while still others retained their old name, and chose St. Procopius of Plzen (q. v.) as their leader. The Orphantes, however, had relapsed to a belief in transubstantiation: they observed the fasts, honored the saints, and their priests performed worship in robes, all which the strict Taborites continued to reject. Among the Orphante leaders, Procopius "the Lesser" was the most eminent. Vainly did the pope, assisted by the emperor, preach another crusade against the Hussites, who saluted out in force to besiege Prague, and threatened neighboring countries, and, considering always Bohemia as their home, and other places as the land of the Philistines, treated the latter accordingly. Bands of robbers of all nations soon joined them. Frederick "the Valiant" made war against them, and entered Bohemia in 1425, to engage with them. On the second occasion suffering a terrible defeat at the battle of Aush, June 15. A panic now seized all Germany, which was increased by the storming of Mies and Tachow by the Hussites in 1427. Another crusade, instigated against them by the emperor Sigismund in the same year, met with no better success than before. At the opening of 1428, a Convention was called at Beraun to bring about, if possible, a general pacification of the nation. But so varying were the views of the different sects, especially the doctrines of free-will, justification, and predestination, that the Convention was broken up in a confused manner, and the Orphantes, assisted by a portion of the Taborites, made a great invasion into Saxony and Silesia. They took Dresden, marched along the Elbe to Magdeburg, then turned into the province of Brandenburg, and finally burned Berlin. He returned home, and divided himself into different bands in various places, and adopting names according to their fancy. Some were known as Collecta, as Small Capa (Petit Chapeau, says L'Enfant), some as Little Cousins, others as Wolf's-sons. In the spring of 1428 they were ready to undertake another invasion of Bohemia, and together, either in person or by ambassadors. "It was finally resolved to make still another invasion of Bohemia. The papal legate came prepared for the enterprise. He had brought with him a bull of Martin V, ordaining a crusade, which was now opportunely to be published. Indulgences were profusely promised to those who should engage in the enterprise, or contribute to its promotion. Those who should fast and pray for its success should have a remission of penance for sixty days. From other vows interfering with enlistments in the holy war, a dispensation should be freely bestowed." Great efforts were made to insure the successful issue of this, the sixth invasion of Bohemia by the Imperialists (or the third papal crusade urged by the pope). 1431, was the year of the battle of Orlic. But, before it was undertaken, the emperor, to test the spirit of the Bohemians, made again propositions for the crown. The Orphantes were the only Hussites that opposed him. The Calixtines and Taborites returned a deputation of four to confer with Sigismund. But, before they had time to return to Prague, the Hussites became distrustful, and the most cautious and moderate among them felt satisfied that the emperor only intended to mislead them into a state of security, and then surprise and conquer them. "The old leagues and confederate bodies were revived. Old feudS were forgotten. The barons of Bohemia and Moravia, the Calixtines of Prague, and the indomitable Taborites and Orphans, again united to repel the invader. In a few weeks 50,000 infantry, 7000 cavalry, and 3600 chariots were gathered." The crusading force also had been collecting, and now numbered 80,000 (some say 120,000) men, under the command of the elector of Brandenburg. This army, immense in size, armed with power and invincible as it seemed, was, like its predecessors, completely routed at Tausch, August 14, 1431, and the hopes of the Imperialists of subjecting the Bohemians by force of arms effectually crushed. Sigismund now most earnestly sought by every means in order to conciliate the pope, he caused himself to be crowned by Roman Catholic bishops and to take the religious obedience to the Church and to the pope. During his reign the Calixtines enjoyed full religious liberty; and when Pope Pius II declared the treaty abolished in 1463, George sent the papal legates to prison without further forms. For this he was under the ban, and finally deposed by the pope in 1463. "Meanwhile the warlike Taborites had disappeared from the scene. They no longer formed a national party. But the feeble remnants of that multitude which had once followed the standards of Ziska and Procopius are still clinging to the cherished faith of the old nation, and the Word of God as their only supreme authority, the United Brethren (q.v.) appear as their lineal representatives. How, from such an origin, should have sprung a people whose peaceful virtues and missionary zeal have been so well acknowledged by the world, is a problem only to be solved by another historian. In the future, the Taborites, however, they may have been guilty of fanatical excesses, there was to be found that fundamental principle of reverence for the authority of Scripture alone which they bequeathed as a cherished legacy to those who could understand and act upon it in more favorable circumstances and in more peaceful times." The successor of George, Ladislaus of Poland, who came to the government in 1471, held fast to the conditions of the treaty, though himself a Roman Catholic. In 1485 he concluded the peace of Kuttning, according to which the Utraquists and Subjunctas (Roman Catholics who communed but in one kind) were promised equal toleration; and in 1497 he gave the Utraquists the right to appoint an administrator of the archbishopric of Prague as their ecclesiastical chief. When the Reformation began in Germany, it was gladly hailed by both the Bohemian Catholic and the Utraquist sects, for in 1544 they decided to continue, under the guidance of Luther, the reform begun by Huss. A large part of them now divided themselves into Lutherans and Calvinists, and in 1573 both these united with the Bohemian Brethren in a joint confession and became a strongly Protestant denomination. They were permitted to hold religious liberty until 1612, when they were subjected to many restrictions by the emperor Matthias, and to still more by the emperor Rudolph in 1617. This was the first cause of the Thirty-years' War, and it was only under Joseph II that the Calixtines recovered their religious liberty. See Cocliüs, Hist. Hist. Hussitum (Mayence, 1549, fol.) HITCHENSON, Francis, called by Mackintosh the father of speculative philosophy in Scotland," was the son of a Presbyterian minister in Ireland, and was born Aug. 8, 1694. He entered the University of Glasgow in 1710, and afterwards became minister of a Presbyterian church in the north of Ireland; but, preferring the study of philosophy to theology, he was induced to open a private academy at Dublin. The publication of some of his works soon procured him the friendship of many distinguished persons, and in 1729 he was called as professor of moral philosophy to the University of Glasgow. He died in 1747. His principal works are, Philosophiae compendiose demonstrato constitutio et jurisprudencia naturalis elementa continuas (Glasgow, 1742, 12mo):-- A Short Introduction to Moral Philosophy, containing the Elements of Ethics and the Law of Nature, translated (Glasgow, 1747, sm. 8vo):--An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of Passions and Affectations (3d ed. Glasgow, 1769, sm. 8vo):--Symposia metaphysica, Ontologia et Pneumatomagium complectens (editio sexta, Glasgow, 1774, sm. 8vo):--An Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, in two treatises (5th ed. corrected, London, 1755, 8vo):--Letters between the late Mr. Gilbert Burnet and Mr. Hutcheson concerning the true Idea of Virtue and Virtue (new ed. London, 1735, 8vo). After his death, his System of Moral Philosophy was published by his son, Francis Hutcheson, M.D., with a sketch of his life and writings by Dr. William Leechman (Glasgow, 1755, 2 vols. 4to). In his method, as distinguished from Hume, he rejected the theory of innate ideas and principles, but insisted on the admission of certain universal propositions, or, as he terms them, metaphysical axioms, which are self-evident and immutable. These axioms are primary and original, and do not derive their authority from any simpler and antecedent principles. Consequently, it is idle to seek a criterion of truth, for this is none other than reason itself, or, in the words of Hutcheson, 'meni congesta intelligendi vis.' Of his ontological axioms two are important: Everything exists really; and no quality, affection, or action is real, except in so far as it exists in some object or thing. From the latter proposition, it follows that all abstract hypothetical propositions are psychological, that is, they invariably suppose the existence of some object without which they cannot be true. Truth is divided into logical, moral, and metaphysical. Logical truth is the agreement of a proposition with the object it represents; moral truth is the conformity of the outward act with the inward sentiments; lastly, metaphysical truth is that nature of a thing wherein it is known to God as that which actually it is, or it is its absolute reality. Perfect truth is in the infinite alone. The truth of all our perceptions is imperfect, and, as they are, limited. It is, however, from the finite truth, that the mind rises to the idea of absolute truth, and so forms to itself a belief that an absolute and perfect nature exists, which, in regard to duration and space, is infinite and eternal. The soul, as the thinking essence, is spiritual and incorporeal. Of its nature we have, it is true, but little knowledge; nevertheless, its specific difference from body is at once attested by the consciousness. It is simple and active; body is composite and passive. From the spiritual nature of the soul, however, Hutcheson does not derive its immortality, but makes this to rest upon the properties of God. In moral philosophy he was the first to use the term "moral sense" to denote "the faculty which perceives the morality of actions," and he held it to be an essential part of human nature. He allows the appellation of good to those actions alone which are disinterested and flow from the principle of benevolence. The last of the expediency or personal advantages, nor even to the more refined enjoyments of moral sympathy, the obligations of reason and truth, or of the divine will. It is a distinct and peculiar principle, a moral sentiment or instinct, a great dignity and authority, and its end is to regulate the passions, and to decide, in favor of virtue, the conflict between the interested and disinterested affections. On this foundation Hutcheson erected all the superstructure of the moral duties." Hutcheson, George, an English Biblical scholar, of whose early life but little is known, flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He was a minister first at Comolennon, and later at Edinburgh, but was ejected for nonconformity about 1660. In 1669 he attempted to reach them, but he continued steadfastly to oppose the use of the Episcopal liturgy. He died in 1678. He wrote, Exposition of the twelve Minor Prophets (Lond. 1655, sm. 8vo)--Exposit. of John (1657, fol.):--Exposition of Job (1669, fol.)--Forty-four Sermons on the 130th Psalm (Edinb. 1681, 8vo).--Kitto, Bibb. Hutcheson, Anne, an American religious enthusiast, and founder of a party of Antinomians (q. v.) in the New England colony, emigrated from Lincolnshire, England, to Boston in 1636. She claimed to be a medium of divine revelation, and, being a woman of admirable character, and profiting by laborious and painful experience, she won a powerful party in the country, and her enemies could never speak of her without acknowledging her eloquence and ability. She held that the Holy Spirit dwells in every believer, and that the revelation of the Spirit is superior to the ministry of the word. As her doctrines affected not only the religious, but also the political, professions of the people, great controversies ensued; a synod was finally called, in which her teachings were condemned, and she and her associates were banished from the colony. Anne and her friends now obtained from the Chief Justice of the Massachusetts court a legal permission to reside at Rhode Island, but they were, however, prevented from remaining there. Here "they continued to maintain their peculiarities on the highly commendable principle that no one was to be accounted a delinquent for doctrine." After the decease of her husband (who shared her opinions), she removed to a Dutch settlement in the colony of New York. In 1643, she and her whole family of fifteen persons were taken prisoners by the Indians, and all but one daughter barbarously murdered. See Bancroft, Hist. of the United States, i, 388 sq.; Chambers, Cyclop., v, 472; American Preb. Rev., 1860, p. 225. (J. H. W.)

Hutcheson, John, i, a Puritan colonel in the Parliamentary army during the time of the English Civil War. He was born at Nottingham in 1576, and was a nonconformist (Baptist), and, being of a religious turn of mind, much of his time was given to the study of theology. At the outbreak of the Civil War he sided with the Parliament, and was appointed governor of Nottingham Castle. At the trial of the king (Charles I) he concurred in the sentence pronounced on him, having first "addressed himself to God by prayer." Cromwell's conduct after this unfortunate affair Hutchison disapproved; and while various sentiments are entertained on his political conduct, "none question his integrity or piety." At the Restoration he suffered the general fate of the Non-conformists, and died in prison, Sept. 11, 1664. See Neale, Hist. of the Puritans (Harper's edit.), ii, 378 sq.; Appleton's Am. Cyclop., ix, 396.

Hutcheson, John, 2, inventor of a theory of hermeneutics which gave rise to much discussion in the 17th century, and still has a few adherents, was born in 1614, at Spennithorne, in Yorkshire. After private education, he matriculated at the University of Oxford in March, 1637, and after wards to the duke of Somerset, who bestowed upon him many marks of confidence, and finally procured for Hutchison a sinecure appointment of £200 per annum from the government. His time was now mainly devoted to religious study. He was of course a member of the College of Physicians, and died in 1724 he published the first part of a curious work entitled Moses's Principi-in, in which he attempted to refute the doctrine of gravitation as taught in the Principia of Newton. In the second part of this work, which appeared in 1727, he continued his attack upon the Newtonian philosophy, and, as noted, it was with the publication of this work that the existence of a _plenum_ from this time to his death he published yearly one or two volumes in further elucidation of his views, which evince extensive knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures. He died August 28, 1737.

According to Hutchinson, the Old Testament contains complete systems of natural history, theology, and religion. The Hebrew language was the medium of God's communication with man; it is therefore perfect, and consequently, as a perfect language, it must be co-extensive with all the objects of knowledge, and its several terms are truly significant of the effects of the things that it indicts, an essential feature of the logicae signum to represent them. Accordingly, Hutchinson, after Origen and others, laid great stress on the evidence of Hebrew etymology, and asserted that the Scriptures are not to be understood and interpreted in a literal, but in a typical sense, and according to the radical inner names that they express. By this plan of interpretation, he maintained that the Old Testament would be found not only to testify fully to the nature and offices of Christ, but also to contain a perfect system of natural philosophy. His editors give the following compendium of the Hutchinsonian doctrine. The Scripture reveals the nature and operations of the body of the sun, or fixleness to the earth; they describe the created system to be a _plenum_ without any vacuum, and reject the assistance of gravitation, attraction, or any such occult qualities, for performing the stated operations of nature, which are carried on by the free and spontaneous energies in the heavens in their condition of fire, light, and spirit, or air, the material agents set to work at the beginning: the heavens, thus framed by Almighty wisdom, are an instituted and visible substitute of Jehovah Elohim, the eternal three, the co-equal and co-eternal Trinity in Unity: the unity of substances in the heavens is as the trinity of the qualities of essence, and the distinction of conditions of the tritheism personality in Deity, without confounding the persons or dividing the substance. From their being made emblems, they are called in Hebrew _sheenim_, the names, representatives, or substitutes, expressing by particular names, any condition or office what it is they are emblems of. As an instance of his etymological interpretation, the word _berith_, which our translation renders _covenant_, Hutchinson construes to signify "he or that which purifies," and so the purifier or purification for "he that purifies." From similar speculations, he drew the conclusion that all the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish dispensation were so many delineations of Christ, in what he was to be, to do, and to suffer, and that the early Jews knew them to be types of his actions and sufferings, and that, by performing them as such, were in so far Christians both in faith and practice.

All his writings are collected in _The Philosophical and Theological Works of the late truly learned John Hutchinson, Esq._ (Lond. 1749, 3d edit. 12 vols. 8vo).

"Hutchinson's philosophical and exegetical views found numerous followers, who, without contributing a doctrinal sect, came to be distinguished as 'Befordianists.' In their number they reckoned several distinguished divines in England and Scotland, both of the Established Church and of Disenting communities. Among the most eminent of these were Bishop Horne, and his biographer, Mr. William Jones, of Stony Stratford, and Julius Berez, to whom the duke of Somerset, on the nomination of Mr. Hutchinson, presented the living of Sutton, in Sussex; Mr. Parkhurst, the lexicographer; Dr. Hodges, provost of Oriel; and Dr. Wetherell, master of University College, Oxford; Mr. Holloway, author of _Letter and Sympathy_; and Mr. Lee, author of _Sophism, or Nature's Characteristic of Truth._ The principles of Mr. Hutchinson are still entertained by many divines without their professing to be followers of Mr. Hutchinson, but the number of professing Hutchinsonians is now very small." Hutten, Ulrich von, a German knight and Reformer, was born April 20 (or 22), 1488, at Castle Steckelberg, in Hesse-Cassel, and entered the monastery of Fulda in 1434, intending to become a monk, but fled in 1504 to Erfurt, where he continued his theological studies for a while. In 1505 he went to Cologne, and the following year to Frankfurt on the Oder. Hutchinson is said to have been established. Here he applied himself to the study of philosophy and poetry. From Frankfurt he went to Greifswald, and afterwards to Rostock, where he lectured on philosophy. In 1510 he went to Wittenberg, and thence to Vienna, where he remained until 1512. He afterwards visited Pavia and Bologna, studied law, and devoted himself particularly to the humanities and poetry. What he saw in Italy had the effect of making him an enlightened opponent of popery. Later he joined the army of the emperor Maximilian, and returned to Germany in 1517. Taking part in Reuchlin's struggle against the Franciscans of Cologne, he wrote against the state of the Roman Church, and particularly against the pontiff. Bolder, and more open in the expression of his opinions than most men of his age, he did much to prepare the way for the Reformation in Germany; though in some respects he rather than his own attack upon the pope, his great aim being not so much to change the Church as to free Germany from the tyranny of which popery was the basis. In 1522 he made an alliance with Franz von Sickingen, who was chosen chief of the nobility of the Upper Rhine. In that year, those of the new princes did not approve of Sickingen's plan of freeing Germany from the Romish rule, he appealed to the States, and endeavored to make them side with the nobility against the princes. But Sickingen succumbed in 1525, and Hutten was obliged to flee from Germany. In Switzerland, his friend Erasmus was kept from him, and the Council of Zürich drove him out of their territory. He then retired to the island of Ufnau, on the lake of Zürich, where he died, Aug. 29, 1523. Hutten has been very variously judged, according to the different stand-points of his critics; yet it is certain that in what he was he was not convicted of the charge he brought against the Church. As a part of the Reformation from any religious feeling, he did all he could be free to his own land from the subjection to the papacy. For that end he gave Luther all the aid in his power. He was one of the authors of the greater part of the _Epistola obruorum riurum_, and most of his writings were satires against the pope, the monks, and the clergy. Several editions of his works have been published; of the principal are Münch's (Berlin, 1821-29, 6 vols.) and Ed. Bocking's (Lpz. 1835 sq., 9 vols.). See _Epistola ob Ufnau ad D. HUTTER 427

HUTHER, Leonhard, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Nellingen, near Ulm, in January, 1563, studied philosophy, philology, and theology at Strassburg, Leipzig, Heidelberg, and Jena; became private tutor in the latter university in 1584, and in 1590 professor at Jena. He died there, Dec. 28, 1616. He was a zealous upholder of Lutheran orthodoxy. His Compendium locorum theologiorum (Wittenberg, 1610, etc.), prepared by order of the elector Christian, took the place of Melanchthon's Loci as a text-book, and was translated into many languages (into German, Italian, Latin, French, Polish, Lithuanian, Russian, and by Hutter himself [1613, etc.], into Swedish [Stock, 1618]), and commented on by Candidius (Jena, 1648, etc.), Glassius (1656), Chernnitz (1670), Lachmann (1690), etc. It has lately been republished by Hase under the title Hutteri redactionis (Berlin, 1864), and translated into modern German, under the title of Compilerium Locorum of Lutheran Theology, by the Rev. H. E. Jacobs and the Rev. G. F. Speicker (Thila, 1868, 8vo). He carried out the Compendium further in his Locii communes theolog. (Wittenberg, 1619, fol., etc.). He also wrote against John Sigismund of Brandenburg, who had embraced Calvinism, his Calvinistae aulicopoliticis (Wittenberg, 1609-14, 3 vols.), and against Hospinianus's Cordis discordarum another work, entitled Cordisc concors (Wittenberg, 1614). His other writings are De Voluntate Dei circa eorum temporum praedestinationem salvandorum Decretum (Wittenberg, 1605, 4to) — a work of considerable importance, and which has passed through several editions (Wittenberg, 1609, 1614, and a new edition in 1618, 8vo; twice reprinted) — Institutum versus Christianum, sive tractatus de synodo et unione ecclesiasticoa (Rost, 1616, 4to; 1619, folio), a work which is the foundation of the plan of union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches of France, and especially against the latter's International. HUNTER, James, a preacher of the Moravian Brethren, was born in London in 1715. He was the son of a clergyman, and served an apprenticeship to a printer and a bookseller; but, coming under the influence of Mr. Wesley's preaching, he was awakened, and was converted under the labors of the distinguished Moravian, Peter Bohler. Soon after his conversion he visited the brethren at Hurnet, and became a devoted disciple and servant of count Zinzendorf, under whose direction he hencethence devoted all his time and strength to the unity of the Moravian brotherhood in England. "His counsel and aid were afforded it all in its complicated plans of government and projects of usefulness; he held, as years rolled on, every office in it, and preached and labored as a deacon; he was the soul of its missionary labors and a society of the denomination of the Gospel; he defended it in its distresses; helped it by his energy and skill through all its heavy financial embarrassments; travelled for it over Europe; and, towards the close of his life, became, as it were, its representative to the court and people of England." He died in 1755. Hutton was a man of great piety and indomitable energy. The history of the Moravian Brethren in the society of which he was an intimate part, and the history of his own life, is given in Memoirs of James Hutton, comprising the annals of his life, and connection with the United Brethren, by Daniel Benham (London, 1856, 8vo); Lond. Qu. Rev. viii, 239 sq.

Huyghena, Gummarius, a Roman Catholic theologian and philosopher, was born at Lure or Lyre (Brabant) Feb. 1681. When only twenty-one years of age he was appointed professor of philosophy at Louvain, and here he distinguished himself greatly. In 1668 he was honored with the doctorate of theology, and in 1677 was made president of the college of pope Adrian VI. He died at Louvain Oct. 27, 1702. Huyghena wrote a number of works, of which the best are Conferentiae theologicae, in 3 vols.; Breves observat., or a course of divinity, in 15 vols. 12mo. As he refused to favor the peculiar views of some of the French moralists, and opposed the celebrated four articles of the French clergy (1682), he was involved in various controversies. Huz'zab (Hebrew Hutsheb, הַצִּבָּה, rendered), as a proper name in the Author. Version of Nah. ii, 7, is either Hoph. pret. of הַצִּבָּה to place firmly, and so the clause may be translated, "And it is fixed; she is led away captive," i.e. the decree is confirmed for the overthrow of Nineveh (so the margin, and most interpreters; see Lud. de Dieu; the Sept. and Vulg. both confound with הַצִּבָּה, and render הַצִּבָּה; Comp. 2 Para. 14, 15, et miles evertit abducta est; the Talmud and Hebrew interpreters, confounding with הַצִּבָּה, render "the queen sitting on her couch") or, rather, of הַצִּבָּה to flow, by Chaldaisn, and the meaning will then be (with Gese- nius, Thee. Hebr. p. 1147, who join the word to the last of the preceding verse), "the palace shall be dissolved and made to flow down," i.e. the palaces of Nineveh, inundated and undermined by the waters of the Tigris, shall dissolve; or "the prince of Assur shall stand for Assyria itself, with which it is identified by Pliny (Hist. Nat. v, 12) and Ammianum (xxii, 6). The name Zab, as applied to the rivers, is certainly very ancient, being found in the great inscription of Tiglath Pileser I, which belongs to the middle of the 12th century B.C.; but in that case the name would hardly be written in Heb. with ל. "

Hwind, Andreas Christian, a Danish Orientalist, was born Oct. 20, 1749, at Copenhagen. He was highly educated, and enjoyed great advantages by travel in foreign countries. Thus from 1777 to 1780 he spent in Germany, especially at Göttingen, where he studied under the celebrated Michaelis and Heyne, and in Italy, where he enjoyed the society of several distinguished, although a Protestant in belief. On his return he was appointed professor at the Royal College. He died May 3, 1788. Hwind wrote Specimen indiciæ Versionis Arabico-Samaritanae Pentateuchi (Rom., 1780, 4to); — Belles leçons d'indo du collèges M.S.S. N. T. bibliothèque Commune-Vendôme (Paris, 1785); — Hoefer, Nouv. Hyacinthus de Janua, a Capuchin monk of distinction, who flourished in the first half of the 17th century, was named after his native city, Genoa. He was the general preacher of his order and enjoyed the confidence of Maximilian to such an extent that in 1522 he was charged by Gregory XV with a special commission to the Spanish court. He translated Castiglione's history of the Conquest of Persia ( oppressus Persarum vola vol. 1.),—Jocher, Allegm. Gelehr., Lez., ii, 1756; Ranke, Hist. of the Popes, ii, 485.

Hyatt, John, a Calvinistic Methodist preacher of considerable talent, was born at Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, in 1677. He became minister of a congregation at Mere, Wiltshire, in 1706, but removed in 1800 to one at Prone, Somersetshire, and soon afterwards to Westminster Abbey, and the Tabernacle, London. Here he was co-pastor with the Rev. Matthew Wilks until his death in 1826. His principal works are, Christian Duty and Encouragement in Times of Distress (2d ed. Lond. 1816, 8vo).—Sermons on select Subjects (2d ed. London, 1811, 8vo).—Sermons on various Subjects, edited by his son, Charles Hyatt, with memoir of the author by the Rev. John Morison, etc. (2d ed. Lond. 1825, 8vo).—Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica, i, 1597.

*Hydas’pês (Yehosaphat), a river noticed in Judith i, 6, in connection with the Ephraimites and Tigris, mentioned by Arrian (Ind. 4) and Strabo (xv, 657), which flowed westward into the Indian, and is now called Je-lam (Rawlinson, Herod, i, 558). The well-known Hy- daspes of India is too remote to accord with the other localities noticed in the context. We may perhaps identify it with the Chosapes or Euporas of Susiana, which was called Hydaspes by the Romans (Voss, ad Justin, ii, 14).

Hyde, Alvan, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born Feb. 2, 1768, at Norwich, Conn. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1788, entered the ministry in June, 1790, and was ordained pastor in Lee June 6, 1792, where he remained until his death, Dec. 4, 1833. Hyde published Sketches of the Life of the Rev. Stephen West, D.D. 1818).—An Essay on the State of Infants (1830); and several occasional Sermons.—Sprague, Annals, ii, 390; Theol. Rev, v, 544.

Hyde, Edward, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Norwich, Conn., March 31, 1768. He was converted in 1805, entered the New England Conference in 1809, was presiding elder on Boston District in 1822-26, and aged 58, in 1850, and meantime four years on New London District, and in 1851 was appointed steward of the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, where he remained until his death, March 16, 1882. His indefatigable and successful labors were very valuable to the Church. Minutes of Conferences, i, 162; Stevens, Memoirs of Methodist, ii, 201; Funeral Sermon, by Dr. Fisk. (G. T. L.)

Hyde, Levius, a Congregational minister, was born in Franklin, Conn., Jan. 29, 1789. He lost his father while quite young, and was prepared for college by his brother, the Rev. Alvan Hyde, D.D. He graduated at Williams College in 1815, and afterwards pursued a sabbatical course in Law, and in 1830, and meantime four years on New London District, and in 1831 was appointed steward of the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, where he remained until his death, March 16, 1882. His indefatigable and successful labors were very valuable to the Church. Minutes of Conferences, i, 162; Stevens, Memoirs of Methodist, ii, 201; Funeral Sermon, by Dr. Fisk.

Hyde, Thomas, D.D., a learned English divine and Orientalist, was born in Shropshire in 1636. He was educated at King's College, Cambridge. In 1655 he went to Constantinople, and prepared the translation of Walton's Polyglot Bible. He was admitted fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, in 1659, and afterwards became keeper of the Bodleian Library. In 1666 he became prebendary of Salisbury, in 1678 archdeacon of Gloucester, Arabic professor in 1691, and finally regius professor of Hebrew and canon of Christ Church in 1697. He died in 1708. His principal work is Historia ecclesiastica orientis Christiani (Sal., 1685, 8vo.), in fourteen volumes, of which seven were published.

Hyssop (Acacia) is a plant of the genus Hyssopus, "officers of water," a name given to the Encratites (q. v.) because they avoided wine, and even in the Lord's Supper used nothing but water. See Theoretor, Harv. Fab. i, cxx; Bingham, Orig, Eccles. bk. xv, ch. ii, § 7.

Hyments (winterers, or tossed by a winter blast), an epithet given by the Latin fathers to demons.—Neale's Introd. to the Hist. of the Eastern Ch. i, 209. See ENERGUMENS; EXORCIST.

Hyena (Gaua, Ecclesiastus xiii, 18) does not occur in the A. V. of the canonical Scriptures, but is probably denoted by Zeez (tulba'd, streaked or ravenous, only Jer. xii, 9; so Sept. Sauma, but Vulg. acris discolor, and Author. Vers. speckled bird), as the context and parallelism in the preceding verse require; an identification disputed by some, on the ground that it is not mentioned by ancient authors as occurring in Western Asia before the Macceadian conquest, and was scarcely known by name even in the time of Pliny; it has since been ascertained, however, that in Romain or modern Greek the word ξηρός and its cognates have been substituted for the ancient term hyena, and that the animal is still known in those regions by names cognate with the Hebrew (see Rippel, Abyss., ii, 227; Shaw, Tellur. 154; Köpffer, Anim. 411 sqq.; Russ's Alppina, ii, 65 sqq.; comp. Pliny, vili, 44; xi, 67). The only other instance in which a word resembling ξηρός is a proper name, Zebaim (1 Sam. xiiii, 14, the valley of hyenas), Aquila; Neh. xi, 34). See ZEBAIM. The Talmudical writers describe the hyena by no less than four names, of which tabba is one (Lev. xxvii, 31). Bochart (Hieros, ii, 168 sqq.) and Taylor (continuation of Calmet) have indicated what is probably the true meaning in the above passage in Jer., of Ζηρων, zeeza, the striped rudder, i.e. the hyena, turning round upon his lair—introduced after an allusion in the previous verse to the lions accompanying the beasts of the field (other hyenas and jackals) to come and devour. This allusion, followed up as it is by a natural association of ideas with a description of the pastoral, would rather occur in the vineyard, trudging down and destroying the vines, renders the natural and poetical picture complete; for the hyena seeks burrows and caverns for a lair; like the dog, it turns round to lie down; howls, and occasionally acts in concert; is loathsome, savage, insatiable in appetite, offensive in smell, and will, in the season, like canines, devour grapes. The hyena was common in ancient as in modern Egypt, and is constantly depicted on monuments (Wilkinson, i. 218, 219); it must, therefore, have been well known to the Jews, as it is now very common in Palestine, where it is the last and most complete scavenger of carrion (Wood, Bible Animals, p. 62 sq.). Though cowardly in its nature, the hyena is very savage when once he attacks, and the strength of his jaws is such that he can crush the thigh-bone of an ox (Livingstone's Travels, p. 600).

"Tobacco, therefore, we consider proved to be, generally, the hyena; more especially, the Canis hynas of Limn, the Hyenas vulgaris of more recent naturalists, the foeda of Barbary, the duch, duchu, duhuh, and kyfunar of modern Semitic nations; and if, the ancient understood anything by the word, it was also their trookus. The striped species is one of three or four— all, it seems, originally African, and, by following armies and caravans, gradually spread over Southern Asia to beyond the Ganges, though not as yet to the east of the Brahmaputra. It is now not uncommon in Asia Minor, and has extended into Southern Tartary; but this progress is comparatively so recent that no other than Semitic names are well known to belong to it. The head and jaws of all the species are broad and strong; the snout truncated; the ears, like a bat, the teeth robust, large, and eminently formed for biting, lacerating, and reducing the very bone; the neck stiff;

the body short and compact; the limbs tall, with only four toes on each foot; the fur coarse, forming a kind of semi-erectile mane along the back; the tail rather short, with an imperfect brush, and with a fetid pouch beneath it. In stature the species varies from that of a large wolf to much less. Hyenas are not bold in comparison with wolves, or in proportion to their powers. They do not, in general, act collectively; they prowl chiefly in the night; attack asses, dogs, and weaker animals; feed most willingly on corrupt animal offal, dead camels, etc.; and dig into human graves that are not well protected with stakes and brambles. The striped species is of a dirty ash-buff, with some oblique black streaks across the shoulders and body, and numerous cross-bars on the legs; the muzzle and throat are black, and the tip of the tail white." Hyginus, considered as the eighth or tenth bishop of Rome, appears to have held that station from A.D. 137 to 141. According to the Liber pontificum, he was a native of Athens, and before his election to the see of Rome taught philosophy. Nothing is known of his life, and the Liber pontif., merely says of him, "Clerum compositi et distribuit gradum." The Pseudo Decretals [see Decretals] ascribe to him a number of rules on Church discipline, and he is said to have introduced the customs of godfathers and Church consecrations, but this is doubtful. The Martyrologies give some the 10th, others the 11th of January, 142, as the date of his death. Some critics deny his having been more than a simple

Hykos (Τύκος), correctly explained [comp. Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 207] by Josephus [Antiq. i. 14], as being composed of the Egyptian hius, "king," and skos, "shepherd" or "Arab," i.e. nomad, a race who invaded Egypt, and constituted the 15th and one or two of the following dynasties, according to Manetho (see Kenrick, Egypt under the Pharaohs, ii. 152 sq.), especially as preserved by Josephus (at supra): In the reign of which, there came up to Egypt, the earliest of the line of an ignoble race, who had the confidence to invade our country, and easily subdued it without a battle, burning the cities, demolishing the temples, slaying the men, and reducing the women and children to slavery." They made Salatin, one of themselves, king: he reigned at Memphis, and made the upper and lower region tributary. Of the 17th dynasty also were forty-three shepherd kings, called Hykoses, who reigned, perhaps contemporaneously with the preceding, at Diospolis. In the 18th dynasty of Diospolis a rising took place, and the shepherd kings were overthrown, and the kings of Egypt into the district of Avaris, which they fortified. Amosis besieged and compelled them to capitulate; on which they left Egypt, in number 240,000, and "marched through the desert towards Syria, and built the city of Jerusalem." The last few words seem to render credible the statement of Manetho concerning the Hykoses, who, with the Israelites, is the less surprising, since the Hykoses were, as he rightly calls them, Phoeniciana of the ancient, if not original race which inhabited Phoenicia, or Palestine (taken in its widest sense), before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews. Chronological considerations seem to refer the time of the domination of the Hyksos to the period of Abraham and Joseph (say from B.C. 2000 to 1500). When Joseph went into the land he found the name of shepherd odious—which agrees with the hypothesis that places the irruption of the shepherd kings anterior to his time; and which explains the ease with which he subdued the Hyksos, and the fact that Jacob turned towards Egypt for a supply of food when urged by want may be readily accounted for on the supposition that a kindred race held dominion in the land, which, though hated by the people, as being foreign in its origin and oppressive in its character, would not be indispensible to show favor to members of the great Semitic family to which they themselves belonged. The irruption into Egypt, and the conquest of the country on the part of the Phoenician shepherds, seems to have been a consequence of the general pressure of population from the north-east towards the south-west, which led the nomade Semitic tribes first to overcome the original inhabitants of Palestine, and, continuing in the same line of advance, then to enter and subdue Egypt. The invasion of the Hyksos is indeed to be regarded as the result of the movement from the Euphrates westward of the most powerful and (comparatively) most civilized people then found in Western Asia, who in their progress subdued or expelled in the countries through which they not improbably were urged by a pressure from other advancing tribes, nation and tribe one after another, driving them down till finding those who dwelt along the shores of the Mediterranean to seek shelter and safety in the islands of that sea and other distant parts. To conquerors and aggressors of the character of these shepherd hordes Egypt would offer special attractions. They continued sweeping onwards, and at last entered and conquered Egypt, establishing there a new dynasty, which was hateful because foreign, and because of a lower degree of culture than the Egyptians themselves had reached. Nor would these shepherds be less odious because, coming from the east and immediately from the deserts of Arabia, they were from the which contains and presents the worship of the heavenly bodies. The two systems, that of the Egyptians before it received inoculation from the East, and that of the Eastern invaders, agreed in this, that they were both the worship of the powers of nature; but they differed in this, and an important difference it was, that the Egyptians represented them as creating and governing the world, and the host of heaven.—Kitto. HYLARET, MAURICK, a French theologian, was born at Angoulême, Nov. 10, 1555, 1599. In 1556 he was inducted into the See of Portency. About 1552 he went to Paris to continue his studies, and returned to Angoulême in 1557 to be ordained for the priesthood. He now devoted his time exclusively to the study of theology, and in 1562 was made a professor of philosophy, and a short time later a professor of theology. In 1566 he made himself quite conspicuous by a public controversy with the Calvinist Goelet. In 1568 he was called to the Sorbonne, and was honored with the doctorate two years later. Henceforward he preached much, and the celebrity he gained as a pulpit orator procured him a position as professor of the arts at Orleans in 1570; and in December, 1591. His works are, Sacra Decades quinquaginta, conciones quadragesimales, atque Paschales numero quinguenti (Lyons, 1591, 2 vols. 8vo).—Concomin per adventum Eunedi sacra quatuor, homilies triginta sec commodatum, et quidvis digni septem priones Juseum prophal. explicant, vanum vero posterioris Evangelii adventus et festorum per usum occurrentium explicant (Paris, 1591, 8vo).—Homilie in Evangelio dominicalis per totam annum (Paris, 1604, 2 vols. 8vo)

Hylarct De non conveniunt cum heretics et non conveniunt cum hereticis, a Vincenzo Laffinio di Carlino e Del parrocco

HYLIO (HL, matter), was, according to the doctrines of the Manichaeans (q. v.), the Lord of darkness. They held that the world is governed by two primary principles, viz., "a subtle and a gross sort of matter, or light and darkness, separated from each other by a narrow space," over each of which presided, the former Lord, God they termed the Lord of the world of Light; Hyle the Lord of the world of darkness; and both of these worlds, "although different in their natures, have some things in common. Each is distributed into five opposing elements, and the same number of provinces; both are equal and immortal, and, with the human body, self-existent, both are unchangeable, and exist forever; both are of vast extent, yet the world of light seems to fill more space than the empire of darkness. The condition of the two lords presiding over the two kinds of matter is equal, but they are totally unlike in their natures and dispositions. The Lord of Light, being himself happy, is beneficent, a lover of peace and quietness, just and wise; the Lord of darkness, being himself very miserable, wishes to see others unhappy, is quarrelsome, unwise, unjust, irascible, and envious. Yet they are equal in the certainty of their existence, in their power, in the power of the body; and yet the King of light, or God, excels the Prince of darkness, or the Daemon, in power and knowledge."—Mosheim, C. H. Hist. of the first Three Centuries, ii, § 41, p. 275; Neander, Hist. of the Nations, i, 116, 127, 181, etc.

HYLOZOA (HL, wood, tree), an ancient philosophers to signify the abstract idea of matter; and ζύλος λίβα) is a term for the atheistic doctrine which teaches that life and matter are inseparable. But the forms which have grown out of this doctrine have been rather variable. Thus "Strato of Lampscus held that the ultimate particles of matter were each and all of them possessed of life," approaching, of course, in this sense, to pantheism: but "the Stoics, on the other hand, while they did not accord accord or life to every distinct particle of matter, held that the universe, as a whole, was animated by a principle which gave to it motion, form, and life." The followers of Plotinus, who held that the "soul of the universe" animated the least particle of matter, would have entertained a certain material or plastic life, essential and substantial, ingenerable and incorruptible, attributed all to matter, especially favored the Stoical doctrine, and "Sphína has asserted that all things were alive in different degrees ("omniam quamvis diversa gradibus animata tamen sune"). All who favored this doctrine looked for the entire mistake of "force for life. According to Leibnitz, Boscovich, and others, "Matter is always endowed with force. Even the ein metós ascribed to it is a force. Attraction and repulsion, and chemical affinity, all indicate activity in matter; but life is a force always connected with organization, which much of matter wants. Spontaneous motion, growth, nutrition, separation of parts, generation, are phenomena which indicate the presence of life, which is obviously not coextensive with matter." See Fleming, Vocabulary of Philos. (edited by Krauth), p. 219 sq.; Culworth, Intellect. System, i, 106 sq., 144 sq. et al.; Hume, "Hymen, or Hymenæus," 1886.

Hymen, or Hymenæus, in Grecian mythology, is the god of marriage. Originally the word seems to have denoted only the bridal song of the companions of the bride, sung by them as she went from her father's house to that of the bridegroom. The god Hymen is first mentioned by Sappho. "The legends concerning him are various: but he is generally said to be a son of Apollo and some one of the Muses. He is represented as a boy with wings and a garland, a bigger and graver Cupid, with a bridal-torch and a veil in his hand."

—Chambers, Encyclop. v, 494.

Hymenæus (Ὑμηναῖος, hymenaios), a professor of Cynicism at Ephesus, who, with Alexander (1 Tim. i, 20) and Philetus (2 Tim. ii, 18), had departed from the truth both in principle and practice, and led others into apostasy (Neander, Fkh. i, 475). The chief doctrinal error of these persons consisted in maintaining that "the resurrection was past already." The precise meaning of this expression is by no means clearly ascertained: the most general, and perhaps best founded opinion is, that they understood the resurrection in a figurative sense of the great change produced by the Gospel dispensation. See below. Some have suggested that they attempted to soothe the anger of the people by the abuse heaped on the Epistle to the Ephesians (πρὸς—συντριπτόμενους—συντριπτοῖς, etc., ii, 1-5); but this is very improbable; for, if such misconception of his language had arisen, it might easily have been corrected; not to say that one of them appears to have been personally inimical to Paul (3 Tim. iv, 14), and would scarcely have appealed to him as an authority. Most critics suppose that the same person is referred to in both the epistles to Timothy by the name of Hymenæus (see Heidenreich, Pastorallor. i, 111). Mosheim, however, contends that there were two. He seems to lay great stress on the apostle's declaration (1 Tim. i, 20), "Whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme." But, whatever may be the meaning of this expression, the infliction was evidently designed for the benefit and restoration of the parties (comp. 1 Cor. v, 5), and was therefore far from in- dungent or indulgent to the delinquent. See above.

Nor do the terms employed in the second epistle import a less flagrant violation of the Christian profession than those in the first. If in the one the individuals alluded to are charged with having "disowned a good conscience" and "made shipwreck of faith," in the other we find indulgence in indig- enous fane babblings, which would increase to more ungodliness, as "having erred concerning the truth," and "overthrowing the faith" of others. These can hardly be said to be "two distinct characters, having nothing in common but the name" (Mosheim's Commentaries, i, 804-306). For other interpretations of 2 Tim. ii, 18, see Gill's Commentary, ad loc., and Walchli Misscellanea Stoer, i, 4; De Hymenaeo Philieto, Jen. 1785, and Amstel. 1744. Two points referred to above require fuller elucidation.

1. The Error of Hymenæus.—This was one that had been in part appropriated from others, and had frequently been revived since with additions. What initiation was to the Pythagoreans, wisdom to the Stoics, science to the followers of Plato, contemplation to the Peripatetics, that "knowledge (γνῶσις) was to the Gnostics. As there were likewise in the Greek schools those who looked for a common salvation of all things (διακοινομακρανθείη, see Hesey, ad Virg. Æd. iv, 5; comp. Æsopus, 745), so there was a "regeneration" (Tit. iii, 5; Matt. xix, 28), "a new creation" (2 Cor. v, 7; see Aldred, ad loc.; Rev. xxx, 1), a "kingdom of heaven and of Messiah or Christ" (Matt. xiii; Rev. vii), and herein popular belief among the Jews coincided unequivocally propounded in the N. T.; but here with this remarkable difference, viz., that in a great measure it was present as well as future—the same thing in germ that was to be had in perfection eventually. "The kingdom of God is within you," said our Lord (Luke xvi, 22); He that is spiritual is full of the things of the spirit (1 Cor. ii, 15). "He that is born of God cannot sin," said John (1 Ep. iii, 9). There are likewise two deaths and two resurrections spoken of in the N. T.; the first of each sort, that of the soul to and from sin (John iii, 5-8), "the hour when I shall glorify myself" (ibid. v, 24, 25), on which see above. The time, De Civ. Divi, xx, 5; the second, that of the body to and from corruption (1 Cor. xv, 36-44; also John v, 26, 29), which last is prospective. Now, as the doctrine of the resurrection of the body was found to involve immense difficulties even in those early days (Acts xvii, 32; 1 Cor. xv, 55); how keenly they were pressed may be seen in Augustine, De Civ. Divi, xxii, 12 sq., while, on the other hand, there was so great a predisposition in the then current philosophy (not even extinct now) to magnify the excellence of the soul above that of its earthly tabernacle, it was at once the easier and more attractive course to insist upon and argue from the force of those passages of Holy Scripture which exalt upon the glories of the spiritual life that now is, under Christ, and to pass over or explain away allegorically all that refers to a future state in connection with the resurrection of the body. In this manner we may derive the first erroneous conceptions of whom Hymenæus was one of the earliest. They were spreading when John wrote; and his grand-disciple, Irenæus, compiled a voluminous work against them (ad Ep. Heter.). A good account of their full development is given by Gieseler, E. H., Per. i, Div. i, § 44 sq. See Resurrection.

2. The Sentence passed upon Him.—It has been asserted by some writers of eminence (see Corn. à Lapide, ad 1 Cor. v, 5) that the "delivering to Satan" is a mere synonym for ecclesiastical excommunication. Such can hardly be the case. The apostles possessed many extraordinary prerogatives, which none have since arrogated to themselves. The words of Hymenæus are one of the earliest. They were spreading when John wrote; and his grand-disciple, Irenæus, compiled a voluminous work against them (ad Ep. Heter.). A good account of their full development is given by Gieseler, E. H., Per. i, Div. i, § 44 sq. See Resurrection.

same lips, "Tabitha, arise," sufficed to raise Dorcas from the dead (ibid. ix, 30). Paul's first act in entering upon his ministry was to strike Elymas the sorcerer with blindness, his own sight having been restored to him through the medium of a disciple (ibid. xix, 14). In the words which we read of Paul's sealing the cripplc of Lystra (ibid. xiv, 8). Even apart from actual intervention by the apostles, bodily visitations are spoken of in the case of those who approached the Lord's Supper unworthily, when as yet no discipline had been established.

On the other hand, Satan was held to be the instrument or executioner of all these visitations. Such is the character assigned to him in the book of Job (i, 6-12; ii, 1-7). Similar allegations are described 1 Kings xxii, 19-22, and 1 Chron. xxi, 1. In Ps. lxixviii, 49, such are the causes to which the plagues of Egypt are assigned.

Even our Lord submitted to be assaulted by him more than once (Matt. iv, 1-10; Luke iv, 18, says, "Departed from him for a season"); and a "messenger of Satan was sent to buffet" the very apostle whose act of delivering another to the same power is now under discussion.

At the same time, large powers over the world of spirits were authoritatively conveyed by our Lord to his immediate followers (to the Twelve, Luke ix, 1; to the Seventy, as the results showed, ibid. x, 17-20). See SATAN.

It only remains to notice five particulars connected with its exercise, which the apostle himself supplies: 1. That it was no mere prayer, but a solemn authoritative sentence pronounced in the name and power of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. v, 5). 2. That it was never exercised upon any without the Church: "Them that are without God judgeth" (ibid. v, 13), he says in express terms: 3. That it was "for the destruction of the flesh, i.e. some bodily visitation; 4. That it was for the improvement of the offender: that his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus (1 Cor. xi, 29)." He might not learn to bespale himself while upon earth (1 Tim. iii, 10). 5. That the apostle could in a given case empower others to pass such sentence in his absence (1 Cor. v, 3, 4). See ANATHEMA.

Thus, while the "delivering to Satan" may resemble ecclesiastical excommunication in some respects, it has its own characteristics likewise, which show plainly that one is not to be confounded or placed on the same level with the other. Nor again does Paul himself deliver to Satan all those in whose company he had his converts "not worthy of death" (1 Cor. v, 11). See an above review of the whole subject by Bingham, Anti. vi, 2, 15. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

HYMNA "(Yirm). This term, as used by the Greeks, primarily signified simply a song (comp. Homer, Od. viii, 429; Hesiod, Op. et Dies, 650; Pindar, Cl. i, 170; xi, 74; Isolm, iv, 74; Pth, x, 82; Asch. Elm, 351; Soph. Antig, 809; Plato, Republ. vi, 430, E, etc.); we find instances even in which the cognate verb ἔλαφων is used in a bad sense (ἁρδαῖς ἐδειγμασιν, Eustath. p. 634; comp. Soph. Elect. 582; Ed. Tyr. 1753; Eurip. Med. 429); but usage usually appropriated the term to songs in praise of the gods. We know that the Greeks, as among most of the nations of antiquity, the chanting of songs in praise of their gods was an approved part of their worship (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi, 638, ed. Syburg. Porphyry de Aforis, iv, sec. 8; Phrumatus, De Nat. Deor. c, 14; Alex. ab Alex. Græc. Dies, iv, 17, 1, 8; Fænian in notul Callimachus, p. 2; comp. Meiners, Geschichte aller Reizung, 433; Hrabovský, Die Helioscaris). At the Taurian games such songs were sometimes sung (Athen. Deipn., xiv, 1, 14; Polyb. Hist. iv, 20, ed. Ernesti). Besides those hymns to different deities which have come down to us as the composition of Callimachus, Orpheus, Homer, Lucain, etc., there may with confidence refer to the choral odes of the tragedians as affording specimens of these sacred songs, such of them, at least, as were of a lyric character (Sneiders, De Hymnise Vet. Græc. p. 19). Such songs were properly called hymns. Hence Arrian says distinctly (De Expul. Alex. iv, 11, 2), ὁμοίοι μὲν ἐκ τούτων καὶ τὴν κοίνων, ἑναὶ οὕτως ἐκ τῷ ἀνθρώπου, ἕναὶ οὕτως ἐκ τῆς θεοῦ, ἕναὶ ἐκ τῆς θείας Δείας τῆς θείας, ἕναὶ οὕτως ἐκ τῆς θεοῦ θείας, ἕναὶ οὕτως ἐκ τῆς ἐκ τῆς θεοῦ. Augustine (in Ps. lxvii) thus fully states the meaning of the term: "Hymni laudes sunt Dei cum cantico. Hymni cantus sunt, continentas laudes Dei. Si sit laus, et non sit Dei, non est hymnus. Si sit laus et Dei laus, et non cantatur, non est hymnus. Oportet ergo ut si sit hymnus, sit quod haec traha, et laudem et Dei et canticum." See CHANT.

"Hymn," as such, is not used in the English version of the O. T., and the noun only occurs twice in the N. T. (Eph. v, 19; Col. iii, 16), though in the original of the latter the derivative verb ἔλαφων occurs in four places ("sing a h.e. tham," Matt. xxvi, 38; "sacred songs," Acts xvi, 25; Heb. ii, 12). The Sept., however, employs it freely in translating the Hebrew names for almost every kind of poetical composition (Schleusm. Lex. ίπος). In fact, the word does not seem to have in the Sept. any very special meaning, and hence it calls the Heb. book of Psalms the "book of the songs of Hymnus," not of Hymnu; yet it frequently uses the noun ἔλαφων or the verb ἔλαφων as an equivalent of psalmus (e.g. 1 Chron. xxv, 6; 2 Chron. vii, 6; xxiii, 13; xxix, 80; Neh. xii, 24; Ps. xii, i, and the titles of many other psalms). The word psalm, however, had already for the last many centuries, the meaning, while the word hymn was more or less vague in its application, and capable of being used as occasion should arise. If a new poetical form or idea should be produced, the name of hymn, not being embarrassed by a previous determination, was ready to associate itself with the fresh thought of another literature. This seems to have actually been the case. See SONG.

Among Christians the hymn has always been something different from the psalm; a different conception in thought, a different type in composition. See HYMNOLGY. The "hymn" which our Lord sang with his disciples in the upper room, he might not have been the latter part of the Hallel, or series of psalms which were sung by the Jews on the night of the Passover, comprehending Psa. cxiii-cxiv; Psa. cxiv and cxxiv being sung before, and the rest after the Passover (Buxtorfii Lit. Talon. s. v. 277, quoted by Künzl on Matt. xxxi, 50; Lightfoot's Heb. and Talon. Excerpts, 1656, p. 5; Works. xiv, 204; Smith. B.G. 277); but it is evident from the preceding that a kind of devotional exercise which is not unaologically called a hymn. The prayers Acts iv, 24, 25, are addressed to God, unless we allow metrical as well as metrical hymns. It may have been a hymn as it was originally uttered; but we can only judge by the Greek translation, and this is without metre, and therefore not properly a hymn. In the jail at Philippi, Paul and Silas "sang hymns" (A. V. "praises") unto God. And so was their song that their fellow-prisoners heard them. This must have been what we mean by singing, and not merely recitation. It was, in fact, a veritable singing of hymns. It is remarkable that the noun hymn is only used in reference to the services of the Greeks, and in the same passages is clearly distinguished from the psalm (Eph. v, 19; Col. iii, 16), "psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs." It has been conjectured that by "psalms and hymns" the poetical compositions of the Old Testament are chiefly to be understood, and that the epithet "spiritual," here applied to "songs," is intended to mark those devout expressions which are suited to the spirit and heart of the primitive Church; yet in 1 Cor. xiv, 26, a production of the latter class is called a "psalm." Josephus, it may be remarked, used the terms ἔλαφων and ἔλαφον in reference to the Psalms of David (Ant. vii, 12, 5). See PSALM.

It is probable that no Greek version of the Psalms, even supposing it to be accommodated to the Greek metres, would take root in the affections of the Gentile converts. It was not only a question of metre, it was a question of the quality and Greek turn of the required hymns. So it was in Syria. Richer in tunes than Greece, for Greece had but eight, while Syria had 275 (Benedict, Pref, vol., v. Op. Epk. Syr.), the Syrian hymnographers revelled in the varied luxury of their native music; and the Greek hymnographers should hardly be credited with hymns as moulded by the genius of Bardesanis, Harmonius, and Ephraem Syrus. In Greece, the eight tunes which seem to have satisfied the exigencies of Church music were probably accommodated to fixed metres, each metre being wedded to a particular tune; an arrangement to which the Syriac preference is due.

In tunes and measures at the end of our English version of the Psalms. This is also the case in the German hymnology, where certain ancient tunes are recognised as models for the metres of later compositions, and their names are always prefixed to the hymns in common use. See Music.

It is worth while inquiring what profane models the Greek hymnographers chose to work after. In the old religion of Greece the word hymn had already acquired a sacred and liturgical meaning, which could not fail to suggest its application to the productions of the Christian church. It is evident that the name of the Greek hymn were various. The Homeric and Orphic hymns were written in the epic style, and in hexameter verse. Their metre was not adapted for singing; and therefore, though they may have been recited, it is not likely they were sung at the celebration of the mysteries. We turn to the Pindaric hymns, and here we find a sufficient variety of metre, and a definite relation to music. These hymns were sung to the accompaniment of the lyre, and it is very likely that they engaged the attention of the early hymn-writers. The dithyramb, with its development into the dramatic chorus, was sufficiently connected with musical traditions to make its form a fitting vehicle for Christian poetry; and there certainly is a dithyrambic savour about the earliest known Christian hymn, as it appears in Clem. Alex. p. 312, 313, ed Potter.

The first impulse of Christian devotion was to run into the moulds ordinarily used by the worshippers of the old religion. This was more than an impulse—it was a necessity, and a twofold necessity. The new spirit was strong; but it had two limitations: the difficulty of conceiving a new music-poetical literature; and the influence of the Hellenic art.

The old tunes would be a real necessity to the new life, and the exile from his ancient faith would delight to hear on the foreign soil of the new religion the familiar melodies of home. Dean Trench has indeed labored to show that the reverse was the case, and that the early Christian shrank with horror from the sweet but polluted enchantments of his unbelieving state. We can only assent to this in so far as we allow it to be the second phase in the history of hymn. When old traditions died away, and the Christian acquired not only a new belief, but a new social humanity, it was possible, and it was desirable too, to break forever the attenuated thread that bound him to the ancient world. Thus it was broken; and the trochaic and iambic metres, unassociated as they were with heavenly worship, and thus associated with the heathen drama, obtained an ascendant in the Christian Church.

In I Cor. xiv, 26, allusion is made to improvised hymns, which, being the outburst of a passionate emotion, would probably assume the dithyrambic form. But attempts have been made to detect fragments of ancient hymns conformed to more obvious metres in Eph. v. 14; James i, 17; Rev. i, 8 sq.; xx. 3. These pretended fragments, however, may with much greater likelihood be referred to the swing of a prose composition unconsciously culminating into metre. It was in the Latin Church that the trochaic and iambic metres became most deeply rooted, and acquired the greatest depth of tone and grace of finish. As an exponent of Christian feeling they soon superseded the accentual hexameters; that is to say, they were used in monymantically against the heathen and the heretics by Commodianus and Augustine. The introduction of hymns into the Latin Church is commonly referred to Ambrose. But it is impossible to conceive that the West should have been as far behind the East: similar necessities must have produced similar results; and it is most likely that the tradition is due to the very marked prominence of Ambrose as the greatest of all the Latin hymnographers.

The trochaic and iambic metres, thus impressed into the service of the Church, became having when the Church had gained a firm footing on the ground, and are, in fact, the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th. of our modern hymns, many of which are translations, or, at any rate, imitations of Latin originals. These metres were peculiarly adapted to the grave and sombre spirit of Latin Christianity. Less ecstatic than the varied chorus of the Greek Church, they did not soar upon the pinion of a lofty praise so much as they dropped and sank into the depths of a great sorrow. They were subjective rather than objective; they appealed to the heart more than to the understanding; and, if they contained less theology, they were fuller of a rich Christian humanity.

The first hymn-book of the Western Church was called a Psalmodia. The name indicates that the fifth and sixteenth centuries. It is that which is contained in Pliny's celebrated epistle (Ep. x., 97): "Carmen Christo quasi deo, decec secum uricem." (See Augusti, Handbuch der christlichen Archäologie, ii, 1-100; Walchii, Miscellanea Sacri, i, 2; De hymnis ecclesie Apostolicae, Amstel, 1744; and other monographs entitled to Volubling, Indice Programmatum, p. 183.)

HYMNAR or Hymnal is the name by which is designated a Church book containing hymns. Such a hymnar, according to Gennadius, was compiled by Paulinus of Nola (q. v.)—Walctoi, Sacred Archaelol. p. 829; Augusti, Christi Archael. iii, 710 sq.

HYMNAR. See HYMNAL

HYMNAL. "Poetry and its twin sister music are the most sublime and spiritual arts, and are much more akin to the genius of Christianity, and minister more directly to the highest end of the religious vanity than architecture, painting, and sculpture. They employ word and tone, and can speak thereby more directly to the spirit than the plastic arts by stone and color, and give more adequate expression to the whole wealth of the world of thought and feeling. In the Old Testament, as is well known, they were essential parts of divine worship; and so they have been in all ages, and almost all branches of the Christian Church. Of the various species of religious poetry, the hymn is the earliest and most important. It has a rich history, in which the deepest experiences of Christian life are stored. But it attained full bloom (as we will notice below) in the evangelical Church of the German and English tongue, where it, like the Bible, became for the first time truly the possession of the people, instead of being restricted to priest or choir" (Schaff, Ch. History). "A hymn is one of the commonest expressions of things. It should either excite or express feeling. The recitation of historical facts, descriptions of scenery, narrations of events, meditations, may all tend to inspire feeling. Hymns are not to be excluded, therefore, because they are deficient in lyrical form or in feeling; if experience shows that they have power to excite pious emotions. Not many of Newton's hymns can be called poetical, yet few hymns in the English language are more useful" (Beecher, Preface to the Plymouth Collection). The hymn, as such, is not intended to be didactic, and yet it is one of the surest means of conveying "sound doctrine," and of perpetuating it in the Church. The Greek and Latin fathers well understood this. Barbeyrac (see below) "diffused his Gnostic errors in Syriac hymns; and till that language ceased to be the living organ of thought, the Syrian fathers adopted this mode of inculcating truth in metrical compositions. The hymns of Arius were great agents in the introduction of his heterodox circular doctrines. Chrysostom found the hymns of Arius worship so attractive that he took care to counteract the effect of them as much as possible by providing the Catholic Church with metrical compositions. Augustine also composed a hymn in order to check the errors of the Eastern Church, and to represent to the readers of the Gospels the grace and beauty of newly-composed hymns for the propagation of their opinions. The writings of Ephraem Syrus, of the 4th century, contain hymns on various topics, relating chiefly to the religious questions of the day which agitated the Church." Yet a mere setting forth of Christian doctrine in verse does not constitute a hymn; the thoughts and the language of the Scriptures must be reproduced in a lyrical way in order to serve the needs of song. The most popular and lasting hymns are those which are most lyrical in form, and at the same time most deeply penetrated with Christian life and feeling. No art can supply the place of imagination, as the proper sense of the world of things must be other than popular. The Romish Church discourages congregational worship, and therefore she produces few hymns, notwithstanding the number of beautiful religious compositions which are to be found in her offices, and the fine metrical parts which are not approved by public authority in the Church. It be extended further, it contradicts the current practice of the whole Church besides, and cannot, in reason, be construed as any more than a private order for the churches of that province, made upon some particular reasons unexplained to us at the present day, of which more in a later portion of this article. Hymns for Protestants, being "composed for congregational use, must express all the varieties of emotion common to the Christian. They must include in their wide range the trembling of the sinner, the hope and joy of the believer; they must sound the solemnity of the judgment, and cheer the afflicted; they must summon the Church to an earnest following of her Redeemer, go down with the dying to the vale of death, and make it vocal with the notes of triumph; they must attend the Christian in every step of his life as a heavenly melody. There can be nothing ecclesiastical in the hymn. Besides this, the hymn, skilfully linked with music, becomes the companion of a Christian's solitary hours. It is the property of a good lyric to exist in the mind as a spiritual presence; and thus, as a 'hidden soul of harmony,' it dwells, a soul in the soul, and rises, once it is caught, into distinct conscious- ness. The worldly Githe advised, as a means of making life less commonplace, that one should 'every day, at least, hear a little song or read a good poem.' Happier he who, from his abundant acquaintance with Christian lyrics, has the song within him; who can follow the.putative counsel of Paul, and 'speak to himself in hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in his heart to the Lord' (Eph. v. 19)" (Methodist Quarterly, July, 1849). For the vocal execution of hymns as a part of Church service, see SINGING; and for their instrumental accompaniments, see MUSIC.

On the question of the use of hymns of human composition in the Church, there were disputes at a very early period. The Council of Braga (Portugal), A.D. 563, forbade the use of any form of song except psalms and passages of Scripture (Canon xii). On this subject, Bingham remarks that it was in ancient times 'no objection to an able man to compose hymns, provided that he sometimes made use of psalms and hymns of human composition, besides those of the sacred and inspired writers. For though St. Austin reflects upon the Donatists for their psalms of human composition, yet it was not condemned. In the psalmody of the Church it was that he sometimes made use of psalms and hymns of human composition, besides those of the sacred and inspired writers. For though St. Austin reflects upon the Donatists for their psalms of human composition, yet it was not condemned the use of the same. It was allowed, and they preferred them to the divine hymns of Scripture, and their indirect way of chanting them, to the grave and sober method of the Church. St. Austin himself made a psalm of many parts, in imitation of the 119th Psalm; and this he did for the use of his people, to preserve them from the errors of Donatus. It would be absurd to think that he who made a psalm himself for the people to sing should quarrel with other psalms merely because they were of human composition. It has been demonstrated that there always were such psalms, and hymns, and doxologies composed by pious men, and used in the Church from the first foundation of it; nor did any but Paulus Samosatensis take exception to the use of these, and he did so not because he thought of human composition, but because they contained a doctrine contrary to his own private opinions. St. Hilary and St. Ambrose made many such hymns, which, when some muttered against in the Spanish churches because they were of human composition, the fourth Council of Toledo must have come to make good to the bishops and other with the doxologies 'Glory be to the Father,' etc., 'Glory be to God on high,' threatening excommunication to any that should reject them. The only thing of weight to be urged against all this is a canon of the Council of Laodicea, which forbids allatemnoo' 2o slash, all private psalms, and all uncannonic books to be read in the Church. For it might seem that by private psalms they mean all hymns of human composition. But it was intended rather to exclude apocryphal hymns, such as went under the name of Solomon, as Sal- namon and many others stand it, one cannot but think that the form of words was not approved by public authority in the Church. If it be extended further, it contradicts the current practice of the whole Church besides, and cannot, in reason, be construed as any more than a private order for the churches of that province, made upon some particular reasons unexplained to us at the present day, of which more in a later portion of this article. Any argument to be drawn from this canon, it is evident the ancients made no scruple of using psalms or hymns of human composition, provided they were pious and orthodox for the substance, and composed by men of eminence, and received by just authority, and not brought in clandestinely into the Church" (Orig. Eccles. bk. xiv, ch. i).

The Christian Church, in all periods, has been accustomed, as we have already stated, to use psalms and hymns in public worship. The psalms are portions of the Psalms of David; the hymns are human compositions. In the history of singing this worship generally, see PSALMODY, under which head will also be given an account of the standard hymn-books in the several evangelical denominations.

1. Ancient Hymns.—A few hymns have come down to us from antiquity, that have arrived at a high degree of excellence. We cite an evening hymn from an unknown author, which he describes as in his time (4th century) very ancient, handed down from the fathers, and in use among the people. Dr. J. Pye Smith considers it the oldest hymn extant. The following is his translation of it: "Jesus Christ, Joyful light of the holy! Glory of the Eternal, heavenly, highly blessed Father! Having now come to the setting of the sun, beholding the evening light, we praise the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit of God. Thou art worthy to be praised of sacred voices, at all seasons, 0 Son of God, who givest life. Wherefore the universe glorifieth thee!" (Colesman, Ancient Christiannity, ch. xvi, § 5). From the letter of the elder Pliny to Trajan we know that as early as the beginning of the 2d century the Christians praised Christ as their God in songs; and from Eusebius (Eccles. Hist. v. 28) we learn that there existed a whole multitude of such sacred hymns. Christ, remaining to us complete from the period of persecution, is that of Clemens Alexandrinus (q. v.). It is given in full, Greek and Latin, in Cole- man (L. c.): see also Piper, L'elementa Hymnica us Salutato- rea (Gotting. 1883), and Bull, Defensio fidei Nicene, § 111, ch. 1. In his latest poetic production, it has little claim to consideration; it shows the strain of the devotion of the early Christians: we see in it the heart of primitive pietie labor- ing to give utterance to its emotions of wonder, love, and gratitude, in view of the offices and character of the Redeemer. It is not found in the later offices of the Church, because, as is supposed, it was thought to re-seemle, in its structure and antiphonal style, the songs sung in pagan worship" (Coleman, *Prim. Ch. Mus., p. 370). The oldest Christian hymn-writers, however, were mostly Gnostics in their doctrines, and they seem to have used their songs as "a popular means of commending and propa gating their errors." The first of these was Bardesanes, in the Syrian Church of the 2nd century. In the formation of the Psalms in Greek, with Gnostic additions. Valentinus of Alexandria belongs also to the oldest hymn-writers (comp. Münzer, Odes Gnost., Copenh., 1712). The Gloria in Excelsis (q.v.), which is still retained in use, is ascribed to the third century. See ANGELICAL HYMN.

1. Of the Therapeutae in Egypt singing in their assemblies old hymns transmitted by tradition. When, under Constantine the Great, Christianity became the religion of the state, the hymns acquired the importance of regular liturgical Church songs. Ephraem Syrus (q.v.), in the 5th century, who may be considered as the representative of the whole Syrian hymnology, sought to bring the heretical hymns of the Gnostics into disuse. In the Eastern Church the hymns of Arius had, by their practical Christian spirit, acquired more popularity than the orthodox hymns, which consisted mostly in the unsyntactical and formulaic content of the Psalms. To oppose this tendency, Gregory of Nazianzum and Synesius composed a number of new Orthodox hymns, but, not being adapted to the comprehension of the people generally, these did not become popular, and thus failed to answer the purpose of the writers. Sacred poetry in hymns was developed among the Greeks; and as in the next century the strife concerning the adoption of Mary and the saints began, the orthodox hymns became mere songs of praise to the saints. Such are the hymns of Cosmas, bishop of Mafjumena (780); Andreas, bishop of Crete (660-702); Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (620-630); and Theophanes, metropolitan of Nicaea, and Josephus, deacon of Constantinople, in the 9th century.

In the history of hymnology, Schaff distinguishes three periods, both in the Greek and Latin Church poetry: (1.) that of formation, while it was slowly throwing off classical forms and inventing its peculiar style, down to about 650; (2.) that of perfection, down to 820; (3.) that of decline and decay, to 1400, or the fall of Constantinople. The first period, beautiful as are some of the odes of Gregory Nazianzum and Sophronius of Jerusalem, is best seen in the many traces on the Greek school books. The flourishing period of Greek poetry coincides with the period of the image controversies, and the most eminent poets were at the same time advocates of images; pre-eminently among them being John of Damascus, who has the double honor of being the greatest theologian and the greatest poet of the Greek Church. The flower of Greek poetry belongs, therefore, to a later division of our history. Yet, since we find at least the rise of it in the 5th century, we shall give here a brief description of its peculiar character. The earliest poets of the Greek Church, especially Gregory Nazianzen in the 4th, and Sophronius of Jerusalem in the 7th century, employed the classical metres, which are entirely unsuitable to Christian ideas and Church song, and therefore gradually fell out of use. Hymn found no entrance into the Greek Church. In its stead the metrical or harmonic verse was borrowed from the Hebrew poetry and the earliest Christian hymns of Mary, Zacharia, Simeon, and the angelic host. Anatolius of Constantinople († 458) was the first to renounce the tyranny of the classic metre and strike out a new path. The essential points in the peculiar system of the Greek metre of this period are the following: The first stanza, which forms the model of the succeeding ones, is called in technical language Hirmos, because it draws the others after it. The succeeding stanzas are called Troparia (stanzas), and are divided for chanting, by commas, without regard to the sense. A number of troparia, from three to twenty or more, form an Ode, and this corresponds to the Latin Sequence, which was introduced about the same time by the monk Notker in St. Gall. Each ode is founded on a Hirmos, and ends with a troparium in praise of the holy Virgin. The odes are commonly arranged (probably after the example of such Psalms as the 25th, 112th, and 119th) in acrostic, sometimes in alphabetic order. Nine odes form a Cassenn. The older odes on the great events of the incarnation, the resurrection, and the ascension, are sometimes sublime; but the later long canons, in glorification of unknown: martyrs, are extremely prolix and tedious, and full of elements foreign to the Gospel. Even the best hymnological productions of the East lack the healthful simplicity, truthfulness, fervor, and depth of the Latin and of the evangelical Protestant hymn.

"The Greek Church poetry is contained in the liturgical books, especially in the twelve volumes of the Meusa, which correspond to the Latin Breviary, and consist, for the most part, of poetic or half poetic odes in rhythmic prose. These treasures, on which nine centuries have wrought, have hitherto been almost exclusively confined to the Oriental Church, and, in fact, yield but few grains of gold for general use. Neale has lately made a happy effort to reproduce and make accessible in modern English metre many of the choicest and most valuable of the most hymns of the Greek Church. We give a few specimens of Neale's translations of hymns of St. Anatolius, patriarch of Constantinople, who attended the Council of Chalcedon (451). The first is a Christmas hymn, commencing in Greek: Μηνες καὶ παραδοσόν τιμίου.

The Word is made incarnate, And yet remains on high: And cherubim and seraphim To shepherds from the sky, And we with them triumphant Repeat the hymn again: 'To God on high be glory, And peace on earth to men!' While thus they sing your Monarch, Whose breath is angels' voice: Rejoice, ye vales and mountains! Ye oceans, clap your hands! Since all he comes to ransom, By all be he adored.

The Infant born in Bethlehem, By earth and heaven confessed: Now idol forms shall perish, All error shall decay, And Christ shall wield his sceptre, Our Lord and God for e c

Another specimen of a Christmas hymn by the same, commencing in Βάπτισθαι:

'In Bethlehem is He born! Maker of all things, everlasting God! He opens Eden's gate, Monarch of ages! Thence the fiery sword Gives glorious passage: thence,

The severing mid-wall overturned, the powers Of earth and Heaven are one; Angels and men sing of their ancient league,
The pure rejoin the pure, In happy union! Now the Virgin-womb

Like some chaste throne beareth Him, Containeth Him, the Uncontainable: Bears Him, whom while they bear

Who tremble! bear Him, as He comes To shower upon the world

The fulness of His everlasting love!'}

One more on Christ calming the storm, ζωοφόρα τραπεζική as reproduced by Neale:

'Fierce was the wild billow, Dark was the night; Oars labored heavily; Foam glimmered white; Mariners trembled; Peril was high; Thus said the God of God, "Peace! It is I."

Ridge of the mountain-wave, Lower thy crest!'}

2. Latin Church.—Of far more importance to the Christian Church, and in the Latin hymns produced in the earlier ages, or the period covering the 4th to the 16th centuries. Though smaller in compass, Latin hymnology far surpasses the Greek in artless simplicity and truth, and in richness, vigor, and fulness of thought, and is much more akin to the Protestant spirit. With objective churchly character it combines deeper feeling and more subjective appropriation and experience of salvation, and hence more warmth and fervor than the Greek. It forms in these respects the transition to the evangelical hymn, which gives the most beautiful and profound expression of the personal enjoyment of the Saviour and his redeeming grace. The best Latin hymns have come through the Roman Breviary into general use, and through translations and reproductions have become naturalized in Protestant churches. They treat, for the most part, of the great facts of salvation, and the hymnody of the pastorals of the Bible and the homilies of Augustine is the most celebrated. There is no doubt that the authorship of a great many hymns is spurious, especially in the case of Ambrose (q.v.), bishop of Milan, who died in 397, and who is generally considered the proper father of Latin Church song. Among his genuine productions we find the grand hymn O lux beata trinitas; Veni redemptor gentium; Deus creator omnium, etc. The so-called authentic hymns of Bishop Paulinus, "by far the most celebrated hymn," formerly ascribed to Ambrose, "which alone would have made his name immortal," and which, with the Gloria in excelsis, is "by far the most valuable legacy of the old Catholic Church poetry, and which will be prayed and sung with devotion in all parts of Christendom to the end of time," he is said to have composed for the baptism of Augustine. But it is now agreed by our best critics that this hymn was written at a later date (Schaff, Ch. Hist. ii, 592). Another distinguished hymn-writer of the Middle Age was Augustine, the greatest theologian among the Church fathers (†490), whose soul was filled with the genuine essence of poetry. He is said to have composed the resurrection hymn, Cunz rei gloria Christiit; the hymn on the glory of Paradise, Ad perennis vitam fontem Morsnulli avitl, and others. Damascius, bishop of Rome (†384), who is said to have been the author of the rhyme of which we spoke above, is perhaps not less celebrated than the preceding names. Very prominently rank also Prudentius, in Spain (†405), whom Neale calls "the prince of primitive Christian poets," the author of Jura maestae quiesce gredulior, and Paulinus of Nola; Sedulius, who composed two Christmas hymns, A solis ortus eri- diisse et Hostia Heroes implevit; Enudios, bishop of Pa- via (†521); and Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers (about 600), who wrote the passion hymn, Pange lingua glorio-si Fraziln certuniana et Veililia regis praeutor. These hymns (the text and translations of most of which are given by Schaff, l.c) soon became popular, and though many of them, long in use in the Church, were not to be set aside, still the Council of Toledo (633) recommended the use only of such hymns as those of Hilary, Ambrose, etc., in public worship. Gregory the Great, who introduced a new system of singing into the Church [see GREGORIAN CHANT], also composed hymns, among others on the laudes factor Domini; Praise the Lord and King of Com- munium, generally reckoned as his best, etc. After him the most noteworthy hymn-writers are Isidore, bishop of Sevilla; Eugenius, Ildefonsus, and Julianus, bishops of Toledo; and Beda Venerabilis. Charlemagne (8th century), who introduced the Gregorian chant into France and Germany, was an enthusiastic supporter of the Church and a great patron of hymnology, and was an author of over 30 hymns; he also took a leading part in the creation of the Pentecost hymn, Veni creator spiritus, though others ascribe it, and perhaps on better grounds, to Rabanus Maurus. Alcuin and Paulus Dia- consus also composed hymns. Although Christianity, during that century and the next, spread through France, Germany, and northwards, yet Latin hymns re- mained in exclusive use during the whole of the Middle Ages, as the clergy alone took an active part in divine worship. In the 9th century appeared some noteworth- ly hymn-writers. Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, whose Gloria in excelsis was a great success, died on Sunday, Rabanus Mauros; Waladrith Strabo, the first Ger- man hymn-writer; Notker (†912), who introduced the use of sequences and recitatives in the hymns, and composed the renowned alternate chant, Media vita in morte sumus. During the 10th and 11th centuries sacred poe- try was contributed by the Benedictines, among whom Hermann of Veringen (†1054) was especially distinguished. King Robert of France wrote the Pentecost hymn, Vini sanete spiritus; Petrus Damiani wrote also penitential hymns. To the 11th century belongs the alternate hymn to Mary entitled Salve Regina mater dei, and the hymn beginning Salve opus cruentatum; Abelard, writer of the Anunciation hymn, Mater ad adorem; and Bernard of Cluni, author of the "Celsatorio Country," about A.D. 1145. It was, moreover, a practice of conventual discipline to connect hymns with all the various offices of daily life: thus there were hymns to be sung before and after the meals, after the reading of the Gospel, in the intervals of fasting, etc. In the 13th century the sentimentalism of the Franciscans became a rich source of poetry, and the Latin hymns perhaps attained their highest perfection under writers of that order. Francis of Assisi himself wrote sacred poetry. Among the Franciscan hymn- writers are especially to be noticed Thomas of Celano (after 1250), author of the grand Judgment hymn, Dies irae dies illa [see Dies Irae]; Bonaventura; Jacobo- nus, who wrote the Stabat mater dolorosa and Stabat mater specto. See STABAT MATER. Among the Dom- inicans, Thomas Aquinas distinguished himself by his Pange lingua gloriosi and Lenda Siam Solveturrum. After attaining this eminence Latin hymns retrograded again during the 14th and 15th centuries, and became mere rhymed pieces. The mystics Henry Suso (q.v.) and Thomas à Kempis (q.v.) alone deserve mention among the writers of good hymns.

On hymns see also Ancient and Middle Ages, see Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bx. xii, chap. v, and bx. xiv, chap. i; Daniel, Theaurarum Hymnologicus, sacrum hymnorum, etc., collectio amplissimis (Leipzig. 1841-56, 5 vols. 8vo); in a good selection in Kingdom, Lit. Among the writers we find not a few of the celebrated knightly minne-singers, as Hartmann von der Aue, Wolfram von Eschenbach, Walther von der Vogelweide, and others. But the German sacred songs of this time, like the old Latin hymns, were confined to the liturgy and to certain times and dates of the year, especially to the seasons of Easter and Christmas, with certain liturgical and ecclesiastical observances. The former class is not very important, either as to number or to quality; but the Marien-Lieder, and, in a minor degree, Amen-Lieder (hymns to Mary said to Anne), constitute a very large and well-known class among the poems of the ante-Reformation times in Germany.

They form a sort of spiritual counterpart to the minne-songs or love-songs addressed to earthly lady by the knight. It was easy to transfer the turn of expression and tone of thought from the earthly object to the heavenly one, and the degree to which this is done is to us very often startling. The honors and titles given to the Virgin Mary are a fine evidence of the reverence and love for the Virgin Mary. HYMNOLOGY

A marked improvement, however, took place in German hymnology during the 15th century, especially near its close. The chief hymn-writer of this period was Henry of Laufenberg, who was particularly active in transforming secular into religious songs, as was frequent at this time; he also translated for the Germans many of the Latin hymns of the court of the Holy Roman Emperor. One of the best specimens of a religious song transformed we cite here. The original was "Instruck, I must forsake thee."

FAREWELL

O world, I must forsake thee, And far away betake me
To seek my native shore;
So long I've dwelt in sadness, I wish not now for gladness.
Earth's joys for me are o'er.
Sore is my grief and lonely, And I can tell it only To Thee, my friend most sure!
God, let Thy hand uplift me, Thy pitying heart enfold me,
For else I am most poor.
My refuge where I hide me,
From Thee shall nought divide me, No pain, no poverty;
Naught is too bad to fear it, If Thou art there to share it;
My heart asks only Thee.

Many of these transformed hymns were preserved, like the one above cited, through the Reformation. Another very popular hymn, Den lieben gepflegen den ich han der ist in des Huotes Trone, was transformed from the song "Du hast dein kind." The latter is the first hymn used in the Wittenberg "Keller." The transformation of ballads by the minnesingers into hymns to Mary and Anne we have already spoken. We return, therefore, to Laufenberg, and cite one of his hymns, which well deserves to be called not only one of the best of his age, but one of the loveliest sacred songs that has ever been written. We copy the first stanza of it from Mrs. Winkworth (p. 98):

CRADLE SONG

Ah Jesu Christ, my Lord most dear, As Thou wast once an infant here, So give this little child, I pray, Thy grace and blessings day by day: Ah Jesu, Lord divine, Guard me this babe of mine!

Laufenberg also wrote and widely introduced the use of many hymns in mixed Latin and German, a kind of verse which was the favorite amusement of the monks, and which had acquired considerable popularity at his time. The best known of these productions was a Christmas carol, dating from the 14th century, in dulci jubilo, Nu niyet und seid fro. Peter Dresdensis was generally, but erroneously, regarded as the author of these perhaps better termed "Mixed Hymns." His real work, however, lay in the strenuous efforts he made to introduce hymns in the vernacular more freely into public worship, especially into the service of the Mass, from which they had, as we have already had occasion to observe, been excluded. But these efforts met with violent opposition from the Church, and the use of hymns in the vernacular still continued to be almost exclusively confined to festivals and like occasions. Among these vernacular hymns are particularly celebrated "Ein Kindlein so lieblich," "Christ fure zu Himmeln," "Gott sei gelobet und gebenedeit," "Wir danken dir lieber Herr," etc. After the invention of the art of printing, the followers of Huss, who had formed themselves into a separate and organized church of their own in 1467 (Bohemian and Moravian Brethren), and who made it one of their distinctive peculiarities to use hymns in the vernacular, as their service was mainly conducted in their mother tongue, especially their prayers, gave new encouragement to the writing of German hymns. In 1504, Lucas, then chief of the Bohemians, collected 400 of the most popular of the German hymns and had them printed. This is "the first example of a hymn-book composed of original compositions in the vernacular to be found in any Western nation which had once owned the supremacy of Rome." Previous to this time, towards the close of the 15th century, there existed two or three collections of German versions of the Latin hymns and sequences, but they are of very inferior merit.

The Reformation in the 16th century marks the next era in the history of German hymnology. The introduction of the vernacular into the liturgy of the Church gave an impulsion to the German language that was only eclipsed by Luther's translation of the Bible for the edification and education of the entire German people. But it was Luther's aim not only to furnish his followers the Book of Books, but also to introduce every known form of the singing of such hymns as already existed in the vernacular, and by the creation of a taste among the people for German sacred song to promote its cultivation. Of this he set himself the best example. As in the cause of religion he knew how to enlist a large circle of eminent men and scholars to carry out his great designs, so also, with a true appreciation of sacred art, both in poetry and song, he soon gathered about him many friends, who became the compilers of several collections of hymns, that were issued from the press at remarkably short intervals. See PSALMODY. Luther himself, besides translating many known German hymns, "which he counted among the good things that God's power and wonderful working had kept alive amid so much corruption," and, besides transforming or reproducing some of the early German hymns, composed a large number of his own in the vernacular, most of which are known in our own day by way of most of the Protestant nations of the globe, and some of which are particular favorites even with the English-speaking people. The special object of the composition of these hymns, into which Luther threw "all his own fervent faith and deep devotion," was under the stimulus of the people a short, clear confession of faith, easy to be remembered. For the doctrines which Luther propagated were yet too new to be well understood by all as he desired them to be. He wished men to know what they professed. Protestantism meant the profession of a faith by choice, and not by compulsion; a belief that was cherished by the confessor, and not a blind following after the teacher. He required a comprehension of his great doctrines of justification by faith, of the one Mediator between God and man, which gave peace to the conscience by delivering it from the burden of the past sins, and a new spring of life to the soul by showing men that their dependence was not on anything in themselves, on no works of their own performance, but on the infinite love and mercy of God, which he had manifested to all mankind in his Son; of his doctrine of the universal priesthood of all believers, which put a new spirit into the Church, by vindicating for every member of it his right and duty to offer for himself the sacrifice of praise and prayer, and to study for himself God's word in the Scriptures" (comp. Winkworth, p. 105). One of Luther's hymns best known to us is that found on the 46th Psalm, the famous "Marschallise des Reformations," as Heine called it. He is generally supposed to have written it on his way to the Diet of Worms. Some, however, think that it was composed at the close of the second Diet of Spire (1529). It has been again and again translated. Mrs. Winkworth gives us the following:

THE STRONGHOLD

A sure stronghold our God is to be,
A trusty shield and weapon, Our help he'll be, and set us free,
With all may happen here.

That old malicious foe Intends us deadly woe, Aimed with the strength of hell,
And deepest craft as well,
On earth is not his fellow.

Through our own force we nothing can,
Straight were we lost forever, But for us fights the proper Man, By God sent to deliver.
HYMNOLOGY

HYMNOLOGY

Ark ye who this may be?
Christ Jesus named is he,
Of Schaab the Lord, Sole God to be adored;
'Tis he must win the battle,
And be the world with devils filled, Our souls to fear should little yield;
They cannot overpower us, Their dreaded prince no more Can harm us as of yore; Look grim as e'er he may,
Deemed is his ancient way,
A word can overthrow him.

Still shall they leave that world its might,
Yet no thanks shall merit;
Still is he with us in the fight.
By his good gifts and Spirit.
Even should they take our life, Goods, honor, children, wife, Though all of these were gone, Yet nothing has they won—God's kingdom ours abideth!

Another hymn of Luther's which has gained a world-wide circulation is the one that was written by him on the burning of two martyrs for their faith at Brussels in 1512, and which was translated, or, rather, transformed by D'Aubigné in his History of the Reformation, beginning,

"Flung to the needless winds, Or on the watery vast,
Their ashes shall be watched,
And gathered at the last," etc.

As an example of the songs he transformed most successfully, we quote the old ditty,

"O thou naughty Judas!
What hast thou done,
To betray our Master, God's only Son!
Therefore must thou suffer Hell's agony,
Lazarus' companion Must forever be.
Kyrle, Elioton!"

This Luther changed to the following:

"Twas our great transgression And our sore mistaking Made the Lord our Saviour On the cross to bleed.
Not then on thee, poor Judas, Nor on that Jewish crew, Our vengeance dare we visit—
We are to blame, not you.
Kyrle, Elioton!"

"All hail to thee, Christ Jesus, Who hungest on the tree,
And bo'st for our transgressious Both shame and agony.
Now beside thy Father Reignest thou on high;
Bless us all our lifetime,
Take us when we die!
Kyrle, Elioton!"

(Corpus Eximiae, 1860, p. 239 sq.)

Of the friends whom Luther was successful in enlist ing as writers for his new hymn-books we have space here to mention only the most prominent names. One of them, Justus Jonas, was a colleague of Luther and Melanchthon at the University of Wittenberg. His special service was in the transformation of the Psalms into metrical German versions, "choosing, as one can well understand, those which speak of David's sufferings from his enemies, and his trust in God's deliverance." One of his best is on the 124th Psalm, beginning thus:

"If God were not upon our side, When foes around us rage;
Were not Himself our Help and Guide, When bitter war they wage;
Were He not Israel's mighty Shield, To whom their utmost crafts must yield, Surely we might have perished.

Another of Luther's colaborers was Paul Eber, whose hymns have "a tone of tenderness and pathos which is much less characteristic of this period than the grave, manly truthfulness of Luther and Jonas." But they became very extensively known, and during the trying period of the Thirty-years' War they were constantly heard both in public and around the family hearth-

"... a special favorite at that time was the one, composed when the imperial armies were besieging Wittenberg (1547), beginning thus:"...

"... When, in the hour of utmost need, We know not where to look for aid, When days and nights of anxious thought Nor help nor comfort yet have brought,
Then this our comfort is alone,
That we may rest before Thy throne,
And cry, O faithful God, to Thee, For rescue from our misery."

Two of Eber's hymns for the dying have been great favorites by the side of death-beds and at funerals, not only among the German Protestants, but also among the Roman Catholics. The one is Herr Jesu Christ, wahr Mensch und Gott (Lord Jesus Christ, true man and God); the other is the following childlike expression of perfect trust, beautifully rendered by Mrs. Winkworth (p. 121):

DEATH IN THE LORD.

"I fall asleep in Jesus' arms, Sin washed away, hushed all alarms, He, whose dear blood, his righteousness, My jewels are, my glorious dress, Wherein before my God I stand
When I shall reach the heavenly land.
With peace and joy I now depart, God's child I am with all my heart:
I thank Thee, Death: Thou leadest me To that true and pleasant land where I would be;
So cleansed by Christ I fear not Death, Lord Jesus, strengthen thou my faith!"

But Luther and his associates were only the founders of the new German hymnology, which soon spread over a much more extended field. Hymn-writers became common all over the land, and their number is legion, so that it is almost impossible for us, in our limited space, to give more than a brief account of the most distinguished, and the names only of those of lesser note. Thus Nicholas Decius, a converted monk, produced a translation of the Gloria in Excelsis ("Allein Gott in der Höh', sei Ehr,","

"All glory be to God on high, which, with its noble chorale, soon came into use all over Germany. Paul Speratus (von Spreuten), the chaplain of the duke of Prussia, is perhaps the most noted of all the hymnologists of this period, and is best known as the author of the hymn on the doctrine of Justification by faith:

"Salvation hath come down to us Of great grace and love, Works cannot stand before God's law, A broken reed they prove.
Faith looks to Jesus Christ alone, He must for all us stoe stone, He is our one Redeemer."

This, in Luther's day, was as popular among the Germans as one of his own hymns. Indeed, it is said that when Luther first heard it sung by a beggar on the roadside he gave him the last coin he had. Princes also became sacred poets, such as the margrave of Brandenburg and Hesse, known as the author of

"Grani me, eternus Deus, such grace That no distress
May cause me e'er to flee from Thee," etc.

The elector John of Saxony was also, at that time, counted among hymn-writers, but it now appears that he never wrote any hymns himself, although he was passionately fond of them. Hans Sachs (1494-1576), the celebrated and popular poet of this period, also wrote sacred verse, and figures not less prominently than the persons whose names we have already mentioned. The most famous of his hymns he wrote during the siege of Nuremberg, his native city, in 1561: "Why art thou thus cast down, my heart?" (Warum betrübest du dich mein Herz?). He wrote also a very beautiful hymn on the explicit confidence in the saving merits of Christ, entitled "The Mediator," which is translated by Mrs. Winkworth (Ch. 84, p. 184). Among the Bohemian Brethren, who, as is well known, were on intimate terms with the Lutherans, Michael Weiss is distinguished both as the translator of Bohemian hymns into German, and as the author of a number of beautiful German hymns. Two of them, "Once he came in blessing," and the well-known "Christ, the Lord, is risen again" (Christus erstanden von des Todes Bande), translated into English by Mrs. Winkworth, may be found in her Lyra Germannica, ii, 62, and in Schaff, Christ in Song, p. 15, 259. Not less worthy of notice, though perhaps not quite so prominent in their day, are Johann Matthaeus († 1661) and Nicholas Hermann († 1683), among others, the beautiful morning hymn, "My innermost heart now rises" (Aus meinen Herzen's Grunde), which was a favorite with King Gustavus Adolphus. Hermann's hymns are to be found in nearly all German hymn-books. Among his best known are "Christ, du bist mein Leben," and "Weinen Stimmeleins vorherhört," i.e., Mrs. Winkworth gives Matthaeus's "Miner's Song" (p. 144) and Hermann's "Hymn for the Dying." In the latter half of the 16th, and even at the opening of the 17th century, a gradual decline is manifest in the quality of the hymns, though the quantity continued. They were no longer the simple, spontaneous productions of men of all classes, moved to worship God in songs of praise, but the work of professional hymnologists. Still this period, too, has some very good and fine hymns, but a marked change of tone is perceptible in most of them; the literary mannerisms of the previous century were rather medioc... his tenderness and fervor never degenerate into the sentimentality and petty conceits which were already becoming fashionable in his days, nor into that morbid dross for which the disappointments of his own life might have furnished some excuse." Other hymn-writers of this period are Andreas Gryphius (1616-64), of the same country as Spitta, and, like him, also a great writer of lyrical literature; Martin Lutken (1620-68), the author of N. ducket alle Gott ("Let all men praise the Lord"); Simon Dach (q. v.), author of Ich bin ja Herr in Deiner Macht; Heinrich Albertus (1604-66), whose best hymn is considered to be Gott d. Himmlis u. d. Erden; Georg Weinrich (1634-84), the author of the 17th-century hymn book die Thir; die Thor macht weis (in Christ in Song, p. 17); the electress Luisa Henrietta of Brandenburg, who composed in 1649, after the death of her first husband, the hymn Jesus, meine Zuversicht, well known in the English dress, "Jesus, my Redeemer, lives" (see Christ in Song, p. 265); Ernst Chr. Humburg (1605-81), whose hymns were published together under the title Geistliche Lieder (Naumb. 1758). Perhaps his best hymn is Jesu, meines Lebens Leben, or "Christ, the life of all the living" (Christ in Song, p. 183), another, hardly less beautiful, is his well-known "Man of Sorrows." Johann Frank (1618-77), a poet and a great writer of sacred music, is also a hymn writer, and, with him, marks the transition from the earlier to the later school of German religious poetry, published his sacred songs under the title of Geistliches Zion (Guben, 1764). One of his best is Schmachte dich o lieber Seele, "Dost thou slight the soul" (Winkworth, Lyra Germanica, ii, 183; Schaff, Christ in Song, p. 240). We also here only George Neumark (q. v.) (1621-81), for a time professor of poetry and poet laureate at the University of Königsberg, whose most famous hymn is Wer nur den leib mit Gott lässt weilen, "Leave God to order all thy ways" (Lyra Germanica, p. 323); J. M. Meyer, 1612-1642, Jerusalem du hochgeboete Stadt, translated in the Christian Examiner, lxix, 254 ("Jersalem, thou high-built, fair abode"), and in Lyra Germanica, ii, 285; Friedrich v. Spee (1591 or 1596-1635), a Roman Catholic, who labored earnestly to introduce vernacular hymns into the Divine service of his church, wrote Auf und; Gott will gelobet sein; Johann Jacob Balde (1603-68), also a Roman Catholic, but he wrote mostly in Latin (his sacred poems being published under the title of Carmina Lyricia); Georg Phil. Harsdorff (1607-58), of Southern Germany; A. H. Buchholz (1607-71); Joh- annes von Liechtenstein and belonging to the same century who were hymn-writers of some note.

Angela Sillesius (1624-77) (as a Lutheran, Johann Scheffer) wrote beautiful hymns, 205 of which were published under the title of Heilige Sedenlust, oder Geist- liche Hirtenlieder (Bresl, 1657, and often). Particularly excellent are his Ich will dich lieben meine Sterbe ("Thee will I love, my strength, my tower"), and Liebe, die Du mich zum Bilde ("O Love, whoformedst the, in Schnaff, Christ in Song, p. 414; Christian Examiner, lxix, 245).

Angela was the founder of the so-called second Silesian School of poets, as Spitta is regarded as the leader of the first. They wrote both secular and religious poetry, but the latter far excels the former. To this school belonged Homburg, mentioned above; the two courtesans of Schwarzbard Radolfstadt; Knorr v. Rosen- roth (1638-89), who wrote the lovely little hymn, Mor- gegegen mit meinem Herz des Herrn, also Tug; O Gott von dem wir Alles haben, and many others. In contrast to the formal and an unspiritual hymns of the second Silesian school stand the poetical writings of the so-called Pietists, originating with Spe- ner, who for nearly a hundred years exerted a most powerful influence both on the religious and social life of Germany." The representatives of this school are Philip Jacob Spener (1635-1705); his friend and assoc- iate, August Hermann Francke (1663-1727), the founder of the Halle Orphan Asylum; Anastasius Freylinghau- sen, a son-in-law of Francke, who wrote 44 hymns, and published (1704) a collection which remained for some generations the complete collection for private reading. Among pious persons in Germany, the period belong J. C. Schade; Fr. von Canitz; Joachim Ne- ander (1640-80), of the Reformed Church, who wrote Lobe den Herrn in den Mächten; Johann C. Schütz, author of Sei Lob u. Ehr dem höchsten Gut; Christian Ti- rion (1640-1706); Sam. Adam, Montanus; Johann Jacob Bach (1675) the world-renowned Was Gott das, das ist wohl- gethan ("Whate'er my God ordains is right"); J. Ad. Haselocher; Christ, Plessiovis; Laur. Laurenti, whose best hymn Dr. Schaff designates Ermutiget euch ihr lern ("Rejoice all ye believers," in Christ in Song, p. 388); J. B. Freisein; C. Günther, Halt in der Gedächtnis Jesum Christ; Sal. Liaskovius; J. T. Breithaupt; J. Laune; J. D. Herrnmschid; Christ, F. Richter; J. G. Wolf; Chr. A. Bernstein; Chr. J. Koitsch; J. Trichbeo- vicius; J. J. Winkler; J. H. Schröder; J. E. Schmidt; P. H. von Bogatzky, the cele- brated author of the "Golden Treasury" (Aus goldenen Schatzkästlein), also one of the compilers of the "Co- then hymn-book;" J. J. Rambach; T. L. K. Allendorf; L. F. F. Lehr; J. S. Kuntz; E. G. Wolfsdorff, and many others. There were also the Württembergers, the best representatives of the Pietism of South Germany, of whom Albert Bengel (1677-1752) is the most notable. He was also a prominent leader, though as a hymn-writer he was far excelled by another great light of this section of Germany, Philip Friedrich Hiller (1699-1769), who took Paul Gerhardt for his model. He published several volumes of hymns, of which the Casket of Spiritual Hymns {Geistliche Lieder} contains the best of his own sacred songs, "obtained very wide popularity," and is "still the commonest book in Württemberg next to the Bible itself" (Winkworth, p. 283 sqq.). Here desire mention, also, J. R. Hedinger, S. Urispeger, F. O. Miller, Ph. H. Weissensee, E. L. Fischer, J. Chr. Storr, Ph. D. Burk, Chr. H. Roeder, Chr. K. L von Flei, J. T. von Moser, and still others.

The school of Spencer developed the Mystics and Sep- aratists, who also furnished a number of contributors to hynmolody; but, although some of them were quite able, the influence of the new schools, as a whole, on hynmolody "was, for the most part, simply mischiev- ous, and their hymn-books contain about the worst specimens to be found—poor as poetry, fiercely intolerant towards their fellow-Christians, and full of a fantastic- and irreverent adoration of the Redeemer" (Wink- worth, Christian Singers of Germany, p. 290). The only hynmolologists who really deserve praise are Gottfried Arnold (1666-1714) and Gerhard Tersteegen (1697- 1769). The former, although an extensive writer on Church History, etc., is, indeed, best remembered in our day by his hymns, of which he wrote 180, and among them some very great ones. Gerhard Tersteegen's hymns are his deeply thoughtful "How bless'd to all thy followers, Lord, the road," etc. Tersteegen (q. v.), who, although he never actually separated from the Reformed Church to which he belonged, was none the less a Mystic of the purest type, wrote more than 100 hymns; but he has become known to English-speaking Christians by the English dress which Wesley gave to two of his best hymns—"Lo! God is here; let us adore," and "Thou hidden love of God, whose height," etc. Lesser lights of these schools are J. Dippel, J. W. Petersen, G. Arnold, and others.

Here also, finally, deserve notice the hymn-writers of the Moravians, who have had no despicable influence on hymnology. Of especial credit are a few of count Zinzendorf’s hymns, who, unfortunately, cared more for their quantity than their quality; he wrote more than 2000, many of which, naturally enough, found a place in English hymn-books. His own sect has inserted 128. Charles Wesley, G. Thomas, the Wobsters, G. W. and W. W. Carter, with the last-named poets, were even used in the Roman Catholic Church, of course often in a somewhat modified and even distorted form. The following deserve especial mention: J. M. Sailer (bishop of Ratibon), J. M. Penneberg, J. H. C. von Wessenberg, J. Sperl, and J. Franz. Here deserve notice also the Moravians, Chr. Gregor, H. von Bruniingh, C. von Stübing, A. J. von der Heyde, F. von der Heyde, F. von Wettin, etc.; the Württemburgers, C. F. Hartmann, W. L. Hobsch, Chr. Ad. Daum, M. Hahn, Christ, G. Pregizer; in other German provinces, C. Liebibh, Matth. Claudius, J. G. Schöner; and in the Reformed Church, H. Annoni, F. A. Krammacher, Jung-Stilling, G. Menken; the forerunner of the latter period was the Erich von der Heyde.

Present German Hymnology.—The modern period begins with the war of liberation (1813-15), and with the reawakening of a genuine religious life, which, after all, is slowly gaining the upper hand over that generally supposed dominating scepticism. Although in the modern productions the subjective greatly predominates, and they are still rather the work of art instead of popular songs, yet they do not quite attain to the form and condensed pregnancy of the classic hymns, so that there is very apparent in them a striving after objectivity, and they have at least much sweetness, earnestness, and sincerity. Among the works of the Roman Catholic church Novalis was mentioned below B. M. Arndt, M. von Schenkendorf, F. H. de la Motte Fouqué, Louise Hensel, and Fr. Rückert. Of the other latest Lutheran hymnologists, whose most prominent representatives are Alb. Knapp, Vic. Strauss, J. C. Ph. Spitta, Chr. R. H. Puchta, C. A. Döring, deserve mention. Of the Reformed, J. P. Lang, J. V. Schenfeld, J. F. Bahna Mr., Chr. G. Barth, J. Beutz, Ed. Eyrth, F. A. Feldhoff, G. W. Fink, W. R. Freudenthal, C. von Grüniesen, W. Hey, Christ. G. Kern, J. Fr. Möller, Chr. F. H. Sachse, R. Stier, and Chr. H. Zeller; among the Lutherans, A. Reimund, J. L. Loecker, H. E. Oest rank in this period belongs to J. B. von Albertini, one of whose hymns, which his bishops, whom it is said, Schliebermacher asked to have read to him in his dying hours. C. B. Garve here deserves also high encomia as a hymnologist. Among the Roman Catholics, whose prominent model is Spee, “with all the defects of style, the sacred poetry of the Catholic Church,” the sacred poetry of the Catholic Church, produced no less than 60,000 hymns. The Virgin serving as the most usual theme, M. von Diespeckbrock deserves especial mention. The extent of German hynology may be inferred from the fact that the Evangelical Church alone has produced no less than 60,000 hymns. See PSALMODY.

2. English Hymnology.—Among the English, as is only too evident from the number of English hymn-writers, few have produced any works of real importance. We have already seen that the influence of the English language is less than that of the Latin, and the English church has not produced any great hymns, except for its Scottish and Welsh branches. The English church has had a number of hymn-writers, among whom the most famous is John Henry Newman, who wrote a number of hymns, including the well-known hymn, “A Mighty Fortress Is Our God.”

Gascoigne, Michael Drayton, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Philip Sidney, the Fletcher brothers—Giles and Philo—Edwin, George and William, Ford, John, the countess of Pembroke (sister of Sir Philip Sidney, and joint author with him of a version of the Psalms). Later still we find quaint old Philip Quailes, and Robert Southwell, the martyr monk, and their contemporary, sweet George Herbert. The great dramatists of that golden age have left us the most inviolable poem, and song, which at least show forth their obligations to the Bible and to the Christianity of the period. Haywood, Shirley, and Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Shakespeare, greatest of all, swell the hymns with the highest poetic talent. The psalms gradually change from lyric poetry, and in the succeeding century we have an increasing number of devout poets, of whom the immortal Milton must always be the chief. Yet the singular fact remains that during all these ages there was “nothing like a People’s Hymn-book in England.” It is true that Christian worship was not without its temple songs. The Psalms of David, the Te Deum, the Magnificat, the Gloria in Excelsis, and the “Song of the Angels,” the “Ambrosian Hymn,” and some of the hymns of the Middle Ages, were chanted in the churches and cathedrals. But the so-called hymns of Spenser and Milton, which are not the least of our literary treasures, entered into the Christian life, and worship of British Christianity. Germany possessed a classic literature of this sort a century and a half before England had a hymnal. The rude version of the Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins, the smoother but insipid version of Brady and Tate which superseded it, and the most correct version, which was the work of an English Puritan (Rouse), were sung by those whose stern revolt against Romanism led them to reject even what was really good and scriptural in her order of worship and liturgical books. The faults of the age are conspicuous in its music. The intellectual, metaphysical, and delicate literary, full of “quips, and cranks, and wanton wiles;” cumbrous and overdone. With very few exceptions, there is nothing that people would care to sing, or could sing, for there is little of that elemental element which goes down in the common expression. The rhymes are rude and irregular, and the very art of the poetry seems to defy any attempts to set it to popular music. For “people cannot think and sing: they can only feel and sing.” Even Milton’s magnificient hymn, “On the Morning of Christ’s Nativity,” is not adapted to common Sabbath worship. Yet, few of George Rouse; and the verses that survive in the songs of the sanctuary. The period succeeding this revival of literature pro-duced some Christian poets of note, and a few hymns which survive their authors. Bunyan, and Baxter, and Jeremy Taylor all wrote verses, but their prose had more of poetry in it than their attempts at song. Among those whose good old hymns have stood the test of time, we must not forget the Rev. John Mason, of Wat-er-Stratford, who died in 1694, author of “Come, dearest Lord, and feed thy sheep, on this sweet day of rest,” “Now from the altar of our hearts,” “What shall I render to my God,” etc. He published a volume of “Spiritual Songs” in 1668. Dr. Watts borrowed much from him. The good non-juror, bishop Ken (1637–1711), bequeathed to Christendom his famous “Morning and Evening Hymns,” and that matchless doxology, “Praise God, from whom all blessings flow.” Next comes Joseph Addison, whose life version of the Psalms, beginning “The spacious firmament on high,” first appeared in the Spectator in 1712, at the close of an article on “the right means to strengthen faith,” and about the same time was published his sweet paraphrases of the twenty-third Psalm. Perhaps the most familiar of his hymns is that beginning “When all thy mercies, O my God.” See ADDISON. The Reformation in England did not, as in Germany, grow by the spontaneous utterance of popular Christian song. That was left for the period of the great evangelcal revival which crowned the last century with its blessings. All that had been done before was as the broad and deep foundation-work, rude and unadorned, but vast and essential to the majestic structure which has risen upon it. The stream of Christian verse flowed on in its old channels until the publication of the Psalms and Hymns of Dr. Watts began a new era in English hym-ology. The poet Montgomery says that “Dr. Watts may almost be said to have written the very symphony of language, for he so far departed from all precedent that few of his compositions resemble those of his forerunners, while he so far established a precedent to all his successors that none have departed from it otherwise than to imitate him. No one has ever succeeded him in being so altogether a poet. He has taken the dramatic form of the psalm, and the style of expressing Christian truth employed by the denomination to which he belonged.” Dissenter as he was, his Psalms and Hymns are so catholic in their spirit that many of them have been adopted by all denominations of Protestant Christians in their Sabbath worship. His Divine Songs for Children, and some of his Psalms, will live while the language endures. The defects of his style are obvious in many of his lyrics, which evince haste and negligence, faulty rhymes, and a prosing feebleness of expression. Yet he broke bravely through the mannerisms of preceding ages, and inaugurated a style of sacred music unexcelled, but was alike enriched the evangelical poetry of the English tongue, and filled the temples and homes of the race that speaks that language with the most delightful praises of the Most High. His example was soon followed with success by others. But to him belongs the credit of having founded, and prepared the way for that immense chorus which he will forever lead in these glorious harmonies. His first hymn was given to the Church under circumstances of prophetic interest. He had complained to some official in the Independent church of Southampton, of which his father was a deacon, “that the musick of the church was out of taste.” “Give us something better, young man,” was the reply. The young man did it, and the Church was invited to close its evening service with a new hymn, which commenced, “Behold the glories of the Lamb Amidst His Father’s throne, Prepare new honors for His name, And songs before unknown.” From that time his ever-ready muse gave forth, in strains which are almost divine, “harmonies” for his church, that “inspired a style of songs unknown before. We need only indicate a few of the first lines: “When I survey the wondrous cross,” “My God, the spring of all my joys,” “When I can’t read my title clear,” “Come, ye love that love the Lord,” “Come, let us join our cheerful songs.” “He dies, the friend of sinners dies.” His “Cradle Hymn” has taught countless mothers and children to sing of Jesus, and the angels and manger at Bethlehem: “Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber.” It was while looking out from his quiet chamber window at Southampton “upon the beautiful scenery of the harbor and river, and upon the green glades of the New Forest on its farther bank, that the idea suggested itself of the image of the heavenly Canaan,” which he soon embodied in those sweetest of all his verses. “There is a land of pure delight,” etc. See Watts. Only seven years before the first edition of Watts’s Hymns was given to the world, Philip Doddridge was born (1702); and before the sixteenth of great predecessor, whose verses cheered his own dying hours in a distand land, he had published most of his sweetest hymns. Some of these are imperishable, for they have become part of the spiritual life of our Protestant Christianity. Many of them grew out of and were appended to his sermons, and were popularized into the hymns as “Thine earthly Sabbaths, Lord, we love” (Heb. iv, 9), “Jesus, I love thy charming name” (1 Pet. v, 7). His Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, which was written at the suggestion of Dr. Watts, and has been translated into the leading languages of Europe, and his Family Expositor of the New Testament, are monuments of his wonderful religious power and usefulness. But his hymns will be sung where his larger works are never heard of, and the world will never cease to echo the strains of such songs as "Awake, my soul, stretch every nerv, and let the strain of the Gospel ring clear."

"Grace, 'tis a charming sound," "Ye golden lamps of heaven, farewell!" See DODDRIDGE.

The most voluminous and successful of all English hymnists is the Rev. Charles Wesley. Over seven thousand psalms and hymns were written by his facile pen; and he soon became one of the ablest and most influcient evangelist, who, with his more celebrated brother John, himself a hymn-writer of no mean powers, preached the Gospel in the Old and New worlds, and gave a new style to Christian song. Their history, labul, persecutions, and triumphs are so well known that we need only mention their sainted names. John Wesley was the author or translator of several excellent hymns, and a capital critic on hymnology. Of Charles Wesley's hymns a large number have taken a more than classic place in our poetic literature. The Christian Gazette of 1848 contains a large collection of these

"Come, let us join our friends above," Dr.
Watts said of Charles Wesley's inimitable rendering of the wrestling of Jacob at Peniel with the angel. "That Sing to the Lord, O ye saints of his temple; praise him, and bless his holy name, be true to his commandments, which I have never written." Doubtless much of the power of his hymns is attributable to the circumstances which gave rise to them, and to his facility in giving them the most fresh and vivid forms of expression.
On the last projecting rock on Land's End, Cornwall, he stood, and wrote that memorable hymn, "Lo! I stand a narrow rock of land," etc. His judgment hymn, commencing "Stand, the omnipotent decree," and two others, were written and published in 1768, just after the destruction of the city of Lisbon by an earthquake. "Glory to God, whose sovereign grace," was written for the Kingswood colliers, who wished to sing the magnificent strains of his theological oppo-tent, Thomas Oliviers (1725-1799), in his judgment hymn, beginning "Come, immortal King of glory." See Oliviers. Along with them came William Williams (1716-1798), the Methodist "Watts of Wales," singing "Over the mountain and the stream, till I come home, oh thou great Jehovah!" and John Cennick, the devout Moravian, to whom we are indebted for two of the finest hymns ever written—"Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings," and "Lo! he comes with clouds descending." The latter has been erroneously attributed to Oliviers, in whose judgment hymn it resembles in some respects, but a close inspection shows them to be entirely different productions. Cennick's hymn first appeared in a "Collection of Sacred Hymns" in 1762. See CENNICK. Next in order appeared the collection of hymns by the Rev. Benjamin Beeles (1716-1750), a Baptist clergyman, whom a London congregation could not tempt to leave his little flock at Bournon, where he labored fifty-two years, and preached and sang of Jesus. He was the author of "Did Christ o'er sinners weep?" "Faith, 'tis a precious grace," "Let participate," etc. The latter, the most celebrated of his works, received the special favor of the countess of Huntingdon, a theological author of note, and one of the founders of the London Missionary Society (1789-1802), was the urs of ov tw o i undred and fifty hymns, some of which are favorites still; but to the countess herself, the patron and friend of Whitlead, and Berridge, and Romane, we are indebted for many undying hymns as "Oh! when my righteous judge shall come." "We soon shall hear the midnight cry." She died in 1791, at the age of eighty-four, having devoted her fortune and life to the cause of Christ. Some of the sweetest hymns for the Church and the home which his age produced were written by the daughter of a Baptist clergyman at Broughton, Miss Anne Steele (1716-1778).
She withheld her name from her poems, but the English-speaking Christian world still sings from its myriad hearts and tongues, "Father, what'ere of earthly bliss, "Jesus, my Lord, in thy dear name unite thy grace, my heart calls great, or good, or sweet," etc.; "Come ye that love the Saviour's name;" and some of her sacramental hymns are fine specimens of Christian song.

The next hymn-book of importance that appeared in Great Britain was the Olney Hymns, which is the joint production of Mrs. Isaac Watts and Rev. John Newton, and is distinguished by the liberal way in which it enters in their characters and lives, and yet so united in the love of Christ—the Rev. John Newton and William Cowper. To this book Newton furnished two hundred and eighty-six hymns, and Cowper sixty-two. It was published first in 1779, before Cowper's reputation as a poet was made. The hymns were written between 1767 and 1779, and doubtless would have contained more of Cowper's contributions but for a return of his insanity. The history of these noble coreworkers for Christ is too much neglected to require this allusion. Their deep personal experiences are written in many of their delightful verses, and reflected in the Christian life of succeeding generations. Who that remembereth Newton's marvellous conversion, and his subsequent life of piety and distinguished usefulness, until his death at the age of eighty-two (1807), will not appreciate the fervor with which he sang, "Amazing grace! how sweet the sound That saved a wretch like me!"

or "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds In a believer's ear!"

or "Sometimes a light appears The Christian while he sings!"

or "Day of judgment, day of wonders, Hark! the trumpet's awful sound!"

See Newton, John. And the English language itself must die before Cowper's plaintive music can vibrate through believers' souls in those almost perfect hymns in which he wrote out and yet veiled the strange, sweet, and attractive experiences of his own religious life: "To Jesus, the crown of my hope," "Far from the world, O Lord, I flee," "Oh! for a closer walk with God!" These and many other strains filled with melody and pathos "move in a mysterious way." It has been well said by Dr. Cheever that "if Cowper had never given to the Church on earth but a single score of those exquisite breathings of a pious heart and creations of his own genius, it had been a bequest worth a life of suffering to acceptable, well known to require more than this allusion.

It was long before another bard arose to take up the lyre which this gentle signer laid down. A few strains come floating through the succeeding years, such as Robinson's "Come, thou fount of every blessing," and "Jesus, and can it ever be, a mortal man ashamed of thee?" written by the Rev. John Witherspoon of Philadelphia, and then a precocious boy of only ten years! Of female hymnists we have at this period Mrs. Barbauld (1748-1825) and Jane Taylor, both of whom left some sweet hymns for the sanctuary. The former will be best remembered by her beautiful lines on the death of a believer—

"Sweet is the scene when Christians die;" the latter by her Hymns for Infant Minds. To them we must add Miss Hannah More (1744-1839), whose practical Christian prose writings possess a masculine vigor and Biblical earnestness, and whose poetry, although not of the highest order, is not overshadowed by a weaker feeling. Her Christmas hymn, "Oh! how wondrous is the story of our Redeemer's birth," is a favorable specimen. Among the minor poets of this period we mention Dr. John Ryland, born in 1758, author of "In all my Lord's appointed ways," "Lord, teach a little child to pray," "Sovereign Ruler of the skies," "O Lord, I would delight in thee;" and the Rev. John Logan, who died in 1788, at the age of forty, a Scottish preacher famed for his eloquence, who wrote such hymns as "Where high the heavenly temple stands," "Oh, city of the Lamb, begin the universal song," "Oh God of Blessings! by whose hand thy people still are fed," "The hour of my departure's come," etc. To the poet of the poor, Rev. George Crabbe, we are indebted for those delightful lines, "Pilgrim, burdened with thy sin, come the way to Zion's gate;" and to Rev. Samuel Medley, a Baptist minister in London (1798-1839), "for God ring lyrics, "Mortals, awake! with angels join," and "Awake, my soul, in joyful lays." The name of Henry Kirke White (1785-1808) will ever live in the splendid hymn in which he sang the story of the birth of the Redeemer and of his own conversion, "When marshaled on the mighty plain." From his pen also flow those characteristic hymns beginning "The Lord our God is full of might," "O Lord, another day is flown," "Through sorrow's night and danger's path." See Henry K. White. The coronation hymn, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," was written by the Rev. Edward Perronet, an English dissenting clergymen, who died at Canterbury in 1795, exclaiming, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." In the hymnology, we can only refer the reader to the well-known occasional hymns of the great poets, Pope and Dryden, Wordsworth, Campbell, Moore, Southey, and some of their associates.

But the Church Universal owes a greater debt to James Montgomery (1771-1854). No man since the days of Cowper has added so many admirable versions of the Psalms and noble hymns to the English language as this gifted Moravian, whose prolific muse never ceased to lavish its treasures until, at fourscore years, he went up higher. His paraphrase of the seventy-second Psalm, commencing "Hail to the Lord's anointed," is one of the classics of the old Hebrew fire and of the best modern missionary spirit. His "Thrice holy" (Isa. vi, 3), beginning "Holy, holy, holy Lord," seems to blend the voices of "saints and seraphim" in one glorious prophetic anthem. Of his other hymns we need only mention the "same that spread at Easter" "Joy and the love of Jesus," "Christmas choruses," "Angels from the realms of glory," and "Hail to the Lord's anointed;" the song of heaven, "Forever with the Lord;" the hymn on the death of an aged minister, "Servant of God, well done," written in memory of his friend, Rev. Thomas Taylor; and that on the death of the Rev. John Hucott, secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, "Go to the grave in all thy glorious prime." His verses, "Prayer is the soul's sincere desire," "Oh! where shall rest be found?" "What are these in bright array?" are only a few of the priceless gems which he has set in the crown of his chief work, "The 1745 Hymn Book." See Moore and Hucott.

In this later period of English hymnology many and very sweet have been the singers and their sacred songs. There is Henry F. Lyte, the rector of Brixham (1793-1847), author of "Jesus, I my cross have taken," and of those delightful "beauty and terror" "My spirit on thy care, blest Saviour, I recline," and the last that he ever wrote, "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide." It was his of his Tales in Verse that professor Wilson, in the "Noctes Ambrosianae," wrote, "Now that is the right kind of religious poetry. He ought to give up his labors as a poet," and instead write "hymns of love and tenderness." Poems, chiefly religious. The female hymnists increase in number and in power in this period. Mrs. Felicia Hemans, Caroline Bowles, and others of great repute, lead the way with their sweet music. We have learned to sing "Nearer, my God, to thee," from Miss Sarah F. Adams, who died in 1849 in her old home, Dorsetshire; and Charlotte Elliott, of Torquay, struck a new chord for all the world when she wrote, in 1836, those inimitable verses, "Just as I am, without one plea." She is the author of several volumes, and furnished one hundred and seventeen hymns to The Kolowalu's Hymn-book, the last edition of which she supervised. Mrs. Barret Browning, Mrs. Charles, of "Schonberg Cotta" fame, Miss Adelaide Proctor, Mary Howitt, and the Brown sisters—Charlotte, Emily, and Anne, Isabella Craig, and Mrs. Craik, formerly Miss Midlow, author of "Oh God, be merciful to me a sinner," "John Witherspoon's Hymn on the Death of the Cloud," the singers of their sex whose verses have enriched our hymnals. Sir John Bowring, born in 1792, author of "In the cross of Christ I glory," "Watchman, tell us of the night;" the dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Henry Hart Milman, archbishop Trench, John Keble, with his Chris- tian Year, the poet leader of the Anglican Catholic movement in the English establishment, Alexander Knox, Allan Cunningham, Robert Pollok, bishop Heber, with his glorious advent, and judgment, and missionary hymns, Bernard Barton, the Quaker poet, canon Wordsworth, and the late dean Allford, of Westminster Abbey, Faber, the devout Romish hymnist, and Dr. John H. Newman, once of Oxford and now of Rome, Robert Murray McCreight, and John R. McDuft, the Scottish preachers, with Horatius Bonar, ofKelso, author of the delightful Hymns of Faith and Hope, many of which are already familiar as household words, and Edward H. Bickersteth, M.A., have published some admirable original hymns for Christmas and Easter, and very spirited translations from ancient and mediæval hymns. We specify only his versions, for he has published a column of original English hymns from which his compiler has drawn a thousand from his pen, are given in full in Schaff's Christ in Song. Quite in another line, but not less happy, is a new hymn by the Rev. Hervey D. Ganse, a popular clergyman of the same Church in New York City. It is the story of Bartimaeus, so sweetly told that we recommend it to the faithful. After some space for another hymn in which the language and their mother tongue is the vehicle of Christian praise.

3. American.—Poetry was not cultivated in our heroic age for its own sake, and the singers were few and far between. The churches mostly used the psalms and hymns which they brought with them from the Old World until after the Revolutionary War. President Davids (1724-1761) left some poems, among which his lines on the birth of an infant, and the noble hymn commencing “Great God of wonders! all thy ways,” are most familiar. The celebrated Dr. Timothy Dwight, at the request of the Congregational ministers of Connecticut, Dr. Watts, and added over twenty of his own versifications to the volume. Of all that he wrote, however, none have such beauty and vitality as his rendering of Psalm cxix., “How precious is the Book divine!” Psalm cxxxvii., “I love thy kingdom, O Lord, O God,” and Deut. xxxiii. 17, “In his hand are the deep places of the earth.” These are universal favorites. In his preface to that admirable volume, Christ in Song, Dr. Philip Schaff says, “The Lyra Sacra of America is well represented, although only about thirty years old, it is far richer than our British friends are aware of.” Abundant proof of this richness is furnished in the hymns of Schermerhorn, which the author has gathered into this remarkable collection of Christological poetry, a number of which were furnished by his authors for this work. It is scarcely necessary in these pages to quote at any length those hymns which have been adopted into nearly all of the recent books of praise for the various denominations. We shall therefore only refer to the most noted authors, and give parts of some of the hymns which seem destined to secure a permanent place in our American hymnals. The earlier poets—Percival, Pierpoint, Henry Ware, Jr., Richard H. Dana, Wadsworth, Alston, John Neal, N. P. Willis, Brainerd, J. W. Eastburn, Carlos Wilcox, Hillhouse, with Bryant, Longfellow, Tucker, Whittier, and Whitman, who are still living—have all made occasional contributions to the stock of popular hymns, chiefly of the Unitarian and Universalist bodies. The clergy of the American churches have probably been the most fertile contributors to this department of sacerdotal worship during this period.

The late bishop Doane (q. v), of New Jersey, wrote some very beautiful hymns, which long ago passed beyond the border of which he was a champion into the hymnals of other churches. His evening hymn is worthy of comparison even with that of good bishop Ken: “Softly now the light of day.” There is a trumpet-like music in his majestic lines on the Banner of the Cross which reminds us of Heber and Milman: “Fling out the banner! let it float,” etc. The same Church has also given us Dr. W. Schermerhorn’s well-known hymn, “I would not live always,” and other delightful verses from his now patriarchal muse. Another bishop, Dr. Arthur Cleveland Coxe, among his fine Christian ballads and poems, has rendered into verse, with more spirit and power than any other English writer, those words of Christ, “Behold, I stand at the door and knock.”

To the late Dr. James W. Alexander (q. v) we owe the best version in our language of Gerhardt’s imperishable hymn, “Oh sacred head! now wounded.” One of the most staid and fervid of our hymn-writers was the late Dr. George W. Bethune (q. v), author of “It is not death to die,” “Oh Jesus, when I think of thee, thy manger, cross, and crown,” and many other well-known lyrics. The Rev. Dr. Alexander R. Thompson, of the Reformed Church, New York, has published some admirable original hymns for Christmas and Easter, and very spirited translations from ancient and mediæval hymns. We specify only his verse, for he has published a column of original English hymns from which his compiler has drawn a thousand from his pen, are given in full in Schaff’s Christ in Song. Quite in another line, but not less happy, is a new hymn by the Rev. Hervey D. Ganse, a popular clergyman of the same Church in New York City. It is the story of Bartimaeus, so sweetly told that we recommend it to the faithful. After some space for another hymn in which the language and their mother tongue is the vehicle of Christian praise.

The Rev. Russell S. Cook (q. v) wrote and sent to Miss Elliott, the author of “Just as I am, without one plea, Jesus far from me,” a collection of hymns which, with additions and completions, seems almost as if the same pen had given them both to the world: “Just as thou art! without one trace,” etc. It has since been incorporated with Sir Roundell Palmer’s Book of Praise and several American hymn-books. It would be impossible, in a summary like this, to omit a hearty tribute of acknowledgment to the female hymn-writers of our country. First among these, Mrs. Sigourney, who may be called the Hannah More of America, has an established place among these honored authors, although most of her poetry was written in blank verse, or in metres not adapted to Church music. Yet her anniversary hymns for Sunday-schools and missionary meetings have been very popular. Her verses are full of a tender, devotional spirit, and expressed in chaste and beautiful language. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, in some of her Religious Poems, published in 1867, has caught the spirit of the inspired word, and rendered its utterances into verse with singular felicity. We may instance the fine hymns commencing “When winds are raging in the upper ocean,” “Life’s mystery—deep, restless as the ocean,” “That mystic word of life,” “O sovereign Lord,” and the one entitled “Stricken, still with thee.” The Cary sisters, Phoebe and Alice, have added a few graceful and touching hymns to our Lyra Americana, and have been particularly successful in their writing for the young. That favorite and delightful hymn (which reminds us of Cowper’s sensitive strains), “I love to steal a while away from every cumbering care,” was written by Mrs. Phoebe H. Brown after being interrupted while at prayer. On giving her only son to preach Christ to the heathen, she wrote that sweet missionary hymn beginning “Go, messenger of love, and bear / The love which trembles on the air. / The song which seraphs love to hear, / And angels joy to sing.”

Many a revival of religion has been sought and promoted in the use of her familiar stanzas:

These are but specimens of a few of our best female hymnists. Many others we cannot even mention, to whom the whole Church owes a debt of gratitude for her wise, useful, and spiritual song. They have taught her to “make melody unto the Lord.” For additional literature, see Psalmody. (W. J. R. T.)
HYPAPANTE

Hypapante. See Candlemas.

Hypatia of Alexandria, born in the latter half of the 4th century, was the daughter of Theon the young geometrical commentator, and she was the acknowledged mother of philosophy, and professed, like her father, the old heathen doctrines, of which she was one of the most eloquent advocates. So eminent did she become in the ancient philosophy that, in the early part of the 5th century, she publicly lectured on Aristotle and Plato, both men, and was the first woman in Alexandria, with immense success. Socrates (Welles's translation, 1709, of the Latin of Vallesia) thus narrates her history: "There was a woman at Alexandria by name Hypatia. She was daughter to Theon the philosopher. She had arrived to so eminent a degree of learning that she excelled all the philosophers of her own times, and succeeded in that Platonic school derived from Plotinus, and expounded all the precepts of philosophy to those who would hear her. Wherefore all persons who were studious about philosophy flocked to her from all parts. By reason of that eminent degree and perfection of expression wherewith she had accomplished herself by her learning, she frequently addressed even the magistrates with a singular modesty. Nor was she ashamed of appearing in a public assembly of men, for all persons revered and admired her for her extreme modesty. Envy armed itself against her, and also at that time there were frequent conferences with Orestes (the prefect of Alexandria), for this reason a clamyrum was framed against her among the Christian populace, as if she hindered Orestes from coming to a reconciliation with the bishop. Certain persons therefore, of fierce and over-hot nature, who were headed by one Peter, a reader, conspired against the woman, and observed her returning home from some place; and, having pulled her out of her chariot, they dragged her to the church named Cæsareum, where they stripped her and murdered her. And when they had torn her piecemeal, they carried all her members to a place called Cinnarion, and consumed them with fire. This fact brought no small disgrace upon Cyrillus and the Alexandrian Church" (Hist. Eccl. b. vii. c. 15). The death of Hypatia occurred in 415. Suidas (T' varian), iii, 535, puts the guilt of Hypatian's death more directly upon Cyril; but his account is by the best authorities, Gibbon, of course excepted, not thought to be trustworthy (comp. Schaff, Ch. Hist, i, 943). There is a sporadic epistle attributed to Hypatia, addressed to Cyril, in favor of Nestorius (Baluze, Concilia, i. 216). Toland wrote a sketch of Hypatia (London 1742). Kingsley has made light of the subject the story of a novel ("Hypatia"). See Cave, Hist. Lit. anno 415; Wernsdorff, Diss. Acad. de Hypatia (1747); English Cyclopaedia; Ménage, Hist. Phil. Philosoph. p. 52; Münch, Hypatia, in his Vernissch. Schriften (Ludwigsh. 1829), vol. 1; Schaff, Ch. History, i, 67; Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, iv, 503 sq.

Hypatian of Gangara, a distinguished member of the Council of Nice, of whose life but little is known, was stoned to death March 31, 327, in a pass near Gangra, by a gang of Novatian ruffians, in all probability on account of the opposition which he had manifested towards the Novatians (q. v.) at the council. See Stanley, History of the Eastern Church, p. 266.

Hyperbole. Any one who carefully examines the Bible must be surprised at the very few hyperbolic expressions which it contains, considering that it is an Oriental book. In Eastern Asia the tone of composition is pitched so high as to be scarcely intelligible to the sober intellect of Europe, while in Western Asia a medium seems to have been struck between the extraposition of the East and that of the far West. But, even regarded as a book of Western Asia, the Bible is, as compared with almost any other Western Asiatic book, so singularly free from hyperbolic expressions as might well excite our surprise, did not our knowledge of its divine origin permit us to suppose that even the style and mode of expression of the writers were so far controlled as to exclude from their writings what, in other ages and countries, might excite pain and offence, and prove an obstacle to the reception of divine truth. See Inspiration. Nor is it to be said that the usage of hyperbole is of modern growth. We find it in the oldest Eastern writings which remain to us, and the earlier and earlier writers attest that, in times approaching near to those in which the writers of the New Testament flourished, the Jewish imagination had run riot in this direction, and has left hyperboles as frequent and outrageous as any which Persia or India can produce. See Theology.

The use of hyperbole in all Scripture is that with which the Gospel of John concludes: "There are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that the world itself could not contain all the books that should be written." This has so much pleased many commentators that they have been disposed to regard it as an unadditional to the sacred text, and to reject it accordingly—a process always dangerous, and not to be adopted but on such overwhelming authority of collated manuscripts as does not exist in the present case. Nor is it necessary to regard hyperbole as a speaking of the Bible, for by many examples in sacred and profane authors. In Numb. xiii, 33, the spies who had returned from searching the land of Canaan say that they saw giants there of such a prodigious size that they were in their own sight as grasshoppers. In Deut. i, 28, cities with which] many] were said to be as the rhetorical manner of speaking is heaven." In Dan. iv, 7, mention is made of a tree whereof "the height reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof unto the end of all the earth: and the author of Ecclesiastical (xlvii., 15), speaking of Solomon's wisdom, says, "Thy soul covered the whole earth, and thou and the children of Israel (A. ui, 24; 22) God is mentioned as promising to Jacob that he would give the land of Canaan to him and his seed; and then it is added, "they shall fill the whole sea and land which the sun shines upon." Wetstein, in his note on the text in John, and Basnage, in his Histoire des Chrétiens (iii, 1-9; v, 7), have cited from the ancient Rabbinical writers such passages as the following: "If all the seas were ink, and every Reed was a pen, and the whole heaven and earth were parchment, and all the sons of men were writers, they would not be sufficient to write all the lessons which God composed." Concerning one Elizer, it is said that "if the heavens were parchment, and all the sons of men were writers, and all the trees of the forest pens, they would not be sufficient for writing all the wisdom which he was possessed of." Homer, who, if not born in Asia Minor, had undoubtedly lived there, has sometimes followed the hyperbolic manner of speaking which prevailed so much in the East: thus, in the Iliad (xx, 246, 247), he makes Enneas say to Achilles, "Let us have done with reproaching one another, for we may throw out so many reproachful words on one another that a ship of a hundred oars would not be able to carry the load." For instances of this are to be found in Oriental writers; yet it is observed that Cicer (Phil. ii, 44) has "Præsentium quum illi eam gloriion consecutæ sint, quæ vix cepit posse videatur," and that Livy (vii, 25) says, "Hæ vives populi Romani, quas vix terrorum cum aliis habere fas est, habebat Paulus, sive a bishop Peter's Commentary on the four Evangelists, 1777, etc. Modern examples of equal hyperbole may be found cited in almost any work on rhetoric.

Hyperclanism. See Calvinism; Ultra-Calvinism.

Hyperduela (iærio, above; diáxia, worship, service), the worship of the Virgin Mary in the Roman Church. The Romanists speak of three kinds of adoration, namely, latírix, hyperdulia, and dulia. "The adoration of latírix," they say, "is that which is due to God alone, and is given on account of his supremacy; hyperduela is worship paid to the Virgin on account of what the Papists call the maternity of God, and other eminent gifts, and her supernemine sanctity; *ulterius is worship paid to saints on account of their sanctity." These distinctions are too refined for the common people; and it is greatly to be feared that multitudes worship the Virgin instead of God, or take her as a mediator instead of Jesus Christ, as the Church always not free from the charge of encouraging a belief in the mediation of Mary. A book in common use, called The Sacred Heart of Jesus and of Mary, which is published with an indult of pious in favor of its use, contains the following passages: "Come, then, harden not and in vocate the Son, for thou art a kind of priest, and the sins of the world; Venerate Mary, and you shall come and behold. Mary stretches out her hand, opens her breast to receive you. Though inexpressible to the great concerns of your salvation, though unfortunately proof against the most engaging invitations and inspirations of the Holy Ghost, cling yourself at the feet of this powerful advocate." Amm. (p. 256). "Rejoice, O most glorious Virgin, such is thy favor with God, such the power of thy intercession, that the whole treasury of heaven is open to thee and at thy disposal. When thou art pleased to intercede in favor of a sinner his case is in secure hands. For the Son, justly irritated, crime may be borne, but not the part of merit. Through Heaven when thy mediation appears in his behalf." "Thou art the great mediatrix between God and man, obtaining for sinners all they can ask and demand of the blessed Trinity." Another book in common use, The Glories of Mary, Mother of God, prepared by Liguini, contains the following passage extracted from the following prayer: "O holy Virgin! deign to manifest your generosity towards me, a miserable sinner.
If you grant me your aid, what can I fear? No, I shall no longer apprehend either my sins, since you can repair them; or the devils, since you are more powerful than they; and your Son, justly irritated, since you arise from you will appease him. I shall only fear myself, and that, forgetting to invoke you, I may be lost.
But this will not be the case. I promise you to-day to recurr to you in all my wants, and that, during life and at my death, your name and remembrance shall be the delight of my soul." (ibid.)

Hypocrify. Andrew Gerhard, an eminent Protos-thesis, theologian of the 16th century, was born at Ypres, Belgium, May 15, 1511. His family name was Gerhard, but he assumed the name Hypcrs from his birthplace.
His father directed his first studies, after which Hypcr-rius attended the University of Paris during the years 1528-35. After completing his studies he made a short stay at Louvain, then travelled through the Netherlands, and visited Germany. On his return he was deprived of a benefice which had been obtained for him, on the ground that he had embraced the doctrines of the Reformation. He went to England, where he remained four years with the son of William Mountjoy, a friend of his father, and was studying at the University of Oxford and Cambridge. The persecutions directed against the Protestants after Cromwell's death compelled him, in 1651, to leave England, and he pursued to Newstrast, attracted by the reputation of Bucer; but his friend Gleichenhauer, professor of theology at Marburg, persuaded him to remain in the latter city, and he succeded his friend in 1542 as professor. He died at Marburg Feb. 1, 1564. To profound and extensive learning Hypcrs joined great intellectual powers, and a remarkably mild, yet straightforward disposition. Greatly in advance of his time as a scholar, held deep and correct views of the system with which theological researches and studies should be conducted in striking contrast with the arbitrary proceedings of the exegetes of the 16th century, as well as the scholastic theories of contemporary theologians. His views have become the basis of modern scientific theology. He had also a clearer and more practical notion of preaching than the other preachers of his time, who, instead of expounding Christian doctrines to their hearers in view of edifying them, brought abstract discussions or irritating controversies into the pulpit. Hypcrs wrote De formulds Conciliab. sacrifls, seu de interpretatione Scripturarum popularum (1542); also Comment, in Taur. Demonstr.
d, and containing a biography of the author, Halle, 1781, 8vo.) It is the first complete work on Homiletics, and one of the best:—De theologo, seu de ratione studii theologici, Lib. iV. (Basle, 1566, 8vo; often reprinted): this is a work of great merit, which may have had the most favorable influence on the theology of that period and not the least of views and the Zuinglian opinion of the author in regard to the Eucharist rendered it suspicious in the eyes of the orthodox Lutheran party. Laurentius Villacentius, an Augustinian monk of Xeres, in Andalasia, made great use of this as well as of the preceding work, in order, rather caused them to be reprinted almost word for word, as his own production, with the exception of passages too favorable to Protestantism, in a work he published at Antwerp in 1665, and the plagiarism was not detected until half a century later:—Elementa Chris-tist. (revised ed., 1586), the entire work is practically (Wittembb, 1565, 8vo; Basle, 1578, 8vo) —Methodol Theologicae, sive praecipuorum Christianae religionis locorum communium, Libri ii (Basle, 1666, 1668, 8vo). This work was to have had three more parts, but it was left incomplete:—Opuscula Theologica varia (Basle, 1570, 2 vols, 8vo). He was also the author of several valuable productions in that department by the Reformers, and were frequently used by Blofeld in his notes on the New Testament. His most important work in this department, a Commentary on the Epistles of Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews (Comm. in Epistol. ad Timoth., ad Titum, ad Philem., ad Hebr., ad Tim., Comment, in Taur. Demonstr. Epistol., 1588; Comment in Eph.
1588; Comment in Epist. ad Hebraon, 1585), was published after his death by Mylius (Zurich, 1588-8, 4 vols, folio), and under the care of J. Andreas Schmidt (Helmstät, 1704, 8vo). In it "Hypcrs pursues the grammatico-historical method of interpretation, examining the meaning of the words, carefully tracing the connection of the passage, taking note of the analogy of Scripture, and so arriving at the true sense of the place. Not until he has thus done justice to the exegesis does he proceed to the doctrinal or practical use of the passages, which he usually does not incidentally from the fathers to show the agreement of his conclusions with the understanding of the ancient Church" (Kitto).
A collection of small pamphlets had been previously published separately; among them, De Sacro Scriptura Lectione et MeditatioSUM (Basle, 1581, 8vo). See Boissard, Jean, Fromor, Ilustratur, part iii; Melch. Adam, Hypocrisy (ηρωπρις; but in James v, 12, two words, ηρωπριν, as the A. V. simply) is the name for the successful or unsuccessful endeavor of a person to impart to others, by the expression of his features or gestures, by his outward actions, and, in fine, by his whole appearance, a favorable opinion of himself: it is his good intentions, love, unselfishness, truthfulness, and conscientiousness, while in reality these qualities are wanting in him. It is, therefore, a peculiar kind of untruthfulness, which has its definite aims and means.

It is precisely because these aims refer to the moral qualifications of the subject that they are so theoretical, as if an honest man, that hypocrisy has found room and opportunity in social life, in commerce and industry, in politics, and, above all, in the field of revealed religion.
This may appear paradoxical, because this, as well as the religion of the old covenant, places man before the face of an almighty Being who sees the heart, and who HYPOCRISY

penetrates human thought even from its very beginning; so that the hypocrite, even if he should succeed in deceiv- ing men, can certainly have no benefit from his acts in the end. On the other hand, because religion consists not entirely in the performance of outward actions, but rather in the determination of the heart, it is right to think that the true religi- ous state of his heart and mind, it creates the greater desire in him to acquire the reputation of really having these qualities; and because these qualities, though they are of a purely spiritual nature, yet can only be mani- fested by outward acts, which, since they are no more, strik- ing to the world, and not accompanied with the possession of the genuine mental and moral state, it results that there is here such a wide field for hypo- critical actions. We infer, therefore, from what we have said, that there is less opportunity for hypocrisy in heathenism than in Judaism; in Catholicism than in Protestantism. For wherever the principal weight is laid on the outward action, on the operam operaturn, there one experiences far less the inclination to cover the inconsistency of the inner world by the outer world; while, on the other hand, where every thing depends on one's appearance, where, at the slightest mention of outward ceremony, God and conscience cannot be appeased, there originates in the unregenerate man the temptation to do what may give him at least the semblance of a quality which he really does not pos- sess. When a vivacious, reckless fellow kneels at the altar of God and acts in the most fervent manner, brother is his volun- tions, no one would think of accusing him of hypocris- y; while a Protestant, in a similar case, could not es- cape this judgment. Still, this does not fully solve the paradox how the hypocrite can hope to carry on his false game, while he knows very well that the God of truth no one can pass for righteous without possessing simply the semblance of righteousness, but does not connect therewith the belief in its power. It must here be remembered that, in the one case, the person endeavor- ers to acquire for himself, in the community to which he belongs, the epithet of a pious man; and, if he is satis- fied herewith, then, in regard to his future state, in view of that day which will bring every thing to light, he is either thoughtless and careless, or else totally unbeliev- ing.

When his earthly scene has ended, the curtain drops for him, and all is over. But in another case the person endeavor- ers to obtain for himself the hope that his outward acts by which he thinks to do good, his praying, alms-giving, etc., he may prevail before God; this is the true Phariseism, which dim the faculty of know- ing God, and not only deceives men, but counterfeits truth itself, and thereby cheats itself worst of all. A special means of detecting the real hypocrisy is his un- merciful judgment over others. This has its ground in the fact that by such expressions he not only seeks to confirm his own standing, but it is also a self-deceit into which he falls; the more he finds to blame in others, the more confident he grows of his own worth, and the more easily he appreciates his conscience in regard to the inconsistency of his moral state with his actions, and the incorruptibility of his secret with his open ways. Ethics finds among the different gradations of sin a certain state of hypocrisy which is far worse than absolute sub- jection to sin, insinuous as in the latter state there may exist at the same time an inward, if not sincere, desire to make a general contempt of God, and to deceive himself of his faulty, although he no longer possesses the power to do so: the hypocrite, on the other hand, is quite contented with himself, and has no desire whatev- er to repent of the sin so deeply lodged in his heart, but uses it from God, in order to be able to gratify his sinful inclinations the more se- curely under the cover of an assumed sanctity. In cer- tain respects the frivolous sinner is far better than the hypocrite, insinuous as the former has at least no desire to deceive any one about his condition, and does not present himself to the world otherwise than he really is. This formal truthfulness in the open sinner, however, is counterbalanced by the fact that the hypocrite recogni- zes at least a divine law and judgment; he is still alive to the consciousness of the incongruity of his state of mind and heart with this divine law; but yet hypocris- y, as a permanent untruthfulness, as a systematic de- ceit, as a life in dissimulation, must gradually annihilate all sense of his own responsibility in the eyes of God, and so to the world, and so the dissimulation becomes nearer to the kingdom of heaven than Pharisees. — Herzog, Real-Encyklop. xix, 643 sq.

See HYPOCRITE.

Hypocrite (Greek ὑποκριτῆς) signifies one who假装s to be something that he is not; it is a false person, like actors in tragedies and comedies. It is especially applied to those who assume appearances of a virtue without possessing it in reality. Our Saviour accused the Pharisees of hypocrisy. Hypocrisy is vain and foolish; and, through intended to cheat others, is, in truth, deceiving ourselves. No man would flatter or dissemble if he thought that he was seen and discovered. All his hypocrisy, however, is open to the eye of God, from whom nothing can be hid. The ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he seeth all his doings; there is no darkness nor shadow of death where the workers of iniquity are; they are as the light shining on their face; and seems to be what he is not, thinks that he ought to possess such a quality as he pretends to; for to counterfeit and dissemble is to assume the appearance of some real excellence. But it is best for a man to be in reality what he would seem to be. It is difficult to personate, and it is in vain to pretend long; for if the thing not exist, nature will endeavor to return, and make a discovery. Truth carries its own light and evidence with it, and not only compels us to every man's conscious- ness, but to God, the searcher of our hearts. Hence sincerity is the truest wisdom, for integrity has many advantages over the ill-deserving false and deceitful and deceit. On the contrary, a dissembler must be always upon his guard, lest he contradict his own pretences. He acts an unnatural part, and puts a continual force and restraint upon himself. Truth always lies uppermost, and will be apt to make its appearance; but he who acts sincerely has an easy task, and needs not invent pretences before, or excuses after, for what he says or does. Insincerity is difficult to manage; for a liar will be apt to contradict at one time what he said at another. Truth is always consistent with itself, needs nothing to assist it, and is sufficient in itself. The word of God is its real voice; it is the voice of the living God; it is the voice of the living testimony; it sets a man's invention upon the rack, and is frequently the occasion of many more. Truth and sincer- ity in our words and actions will carry us through the world, when all the arts of cunning and deceit shall fail and deceive us. In the day when God shall judge the secret thoughts of men by Jesus Christ, plainness and sincer- ity will appear the most perfect beauty; the craftiness of men, who lie in wait to deceive, will be stripped of all its colors; all specious pretences, all the methods of de- ceit, will then be disclosed before men and angels, and no artifice to conceal the deformity of iniquity can there take place. Then the ill-designing men of this world shall with shame be convinced that the upright simplicity which they despised was the truest wisdom, and that those dissembling and dishonest arts which they so high- ly esteemed were in reality the greatest folly.

Hypocracies have been divided into four sorts: 1. The worldly hypocrite, who makes a show of religion, and pretends to be religious merely from worldly con- siderations (Matt. xxiii, 5); 2. The legal hypocrite, who relinquishes his vicious practices in order thereby to merit heaven, while at the same time he has no more love to God (Matt. vi, 5); 3. The enthusiastic hypocrite, whose religion is nothing more than a bare courting of sins; who rejoices under the idea that Christ died for him, and yet has no desire to live a holy life (Matt. xiii, 20; 2 Pet. ii, 20); 4. The enthusiastic hypocrite, who has an imaginary sight of his sin and of Christ; talks of remark- able impulses and high feelings, and thinks him- self very wise and good while he lives in the most scandalous practices (Matt. xiii, 39; 2 Cor. xi, 14).—Robinson, Theol. Dictionary; Buck, Theol. Dictionary; Warner, System of Morality, iii, 323; Grove, Moral Philosophy, ii, 258; Giffilman, Essays on Hypocrisy (1820); Ellis, Self-Deceiver discovered (1781); Edwards, Works (see Index). See HYPOCHRYSY.

HYPONOIA (ὑπόνοια, under sense), a term applied to the language unconsciously supposed by some to underlie the language of Scripture. If by this is understood a signification totally different from the plain statements, the theory is to be condemned as savoring of mysticism (q.v.); but if it is only intended to designate the collateral and ulterior application of language which has likewise a more obvious and literal import, it may be regarded to a limited degree. See DOUBLE SENSE. The Scriptures themselves authorize such a view of the deeper significance of Holy Writ, especially of prophecies, which necessarily await their fulfilment in order to their complete elucidation (1 Pet. i, 11); and the apostle John accordingly invites his readers to the close examination of his symbols, under which, for prudential considerations, was couched a somewhat enigmatical allusion (Rev. xiii, 18).

See INTERPRETATION. To infer from this, however, that the sacred writers were not themselves aware of the usages of their language, is tantamount to taking an unworthy and false view of their intelligent instrumentality (Stier, Words of Jesus, i, 432 sqq., Am. ed.). See INSPIRATION.

HYPOPSALMA. See ACROSTIC.

HYPOSTASIS (from ὑπό, under, and ἐπιστήμη, to stand; hence substantia), a term used in theology to signify person. Thus the orthodox hold that there is but one nature or essence in God, but three hypostases or persons. This term is of very ancient use in the Church. Cyril, in a letter to Nestorius, employs it instead of πρωτόσωμον, person, which did not appear to him sufficiently expressive. The term occasioned great dissensions, both among the Greeks and Latins. In the Council of Nicea, hypostasis was defined to mean essence or substance, so that it was heresy to say that Christ was of a different hypostasis from his Father. Custom, however, altered its meaning. In the necessity they were under of expressing themselves strongly against the Sabellians, the Greeks used the word hypostasis, the Latin persona, which proved a source of great disagreement. The barbarousness of the Latin language allowed them only one word by which to translate the two Greek ones ὑπόστασις and ὑπόστασις, and thus prevented them from distinguishing essence from hypostasis. An end was put to these disputes by a synod held in Alexandria about A.D. 318. A Latinian assent was given to the fact that it was determined to be synonymous with πρωτόσωμον. After this time the Latins made no great scruple in saying tres hypostases, or the Greeks three persons.—Farrar. See TRINITY; HOMOJIAN.

HYPOSTASTICAL UNION, the substantia (ὑπόστασις) of two natures in one person, Christ. While the reality of such a union is established by the Scriptures, and is on that account maintained by our Church (see 2d Article of Religion, "So that two whole and perfect natures," etc.), it is to be lamented that many intricate and fruitless metaphysical questions have been debated among different sects of Christians as to the divine nature of our Lord, and the manner of the union between the Deity and a man—the parties engaged in these questions being too often hurried into presumptuous as well as unpardonable speculations—on points as far beyond the reach of the human intellect as colors to a man born blind; and for the most part, rising out of the upper part of the soul and body of any one among us can neither be explained nor comprehended by himself or any other, and appears the more mysterious the more we reflect upon it (Eden). See TRINITY; CHRIST, PERSON OF; MONOPHYSITES; NESTORIAN.

HYPOTHETICAL BAPTISM is a phrase sometimes used to denote, in the Church of England, a baptism administered to a child of whom it is uncertain whether it has already been baptized or not. The rubric states that "if they who bring the infant to the church do make such certain answers to the priest's questions as that it cannot appear that the child was baptized with water in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, then the priest, on performing the baptism, is to use this form of words, viz.:. "If those art not already baptized, N——, I baptize thee in the name, etc.”

HYPOTHETICAL UNIVERSALISM. See HYPOTHETICAL.

HYPOTHETICI, a name given to the followers (French Protestants) of Amaranz, who, while they asserted a praetiosa universalis, or "Most Holy God," as such, a sect mentioned by Gregory of Nazianzus, whose father was a member of it before his conversion to Christianity. They are represented as combining in their doctrines the elements of Judaism and paganism. They assigned a place to fire and light in their worship, but rejected circumcision and the worship of images; they received the eucharist, and abstained from the eating of certain kinds of meats. Gregory of Nyssa also mentions the Hypothetici, to whom he gives the surname Ψυχοθετικοί. He says that, like the Christians, they acknowledge only one God, whom they call Christ, but they differ from them in not considering him as Father. All that subsequent writers have said of this sect is derived from the above statements. The Hypothetici do not appear to have extended outside of Cappadocia, and they seem to have existed but a short time there, for no mention is made of them either before or after the 4th century. Contrary to the statement of the ancient writers, who described them as Monotheists, Bohmer concludes from the remark made by Gregory concerning his father, ἑαυτός θεός, that, though the Hypothetici worshipped but one God, they did not formally deny the existence of more. It is not to be wondered at, in view of the scanty information we possess concerning this sect, that very great differences of opinion should exist in regard to them. Mosheim considers them as belonging to the Gnostic school; J. J. Wetstein (in Prolegomen, i, 7, p. 31, 380) considers them as the same sect, with the Colossians (q.v.), regarding them as descendents from the worshippers of Thor; others trace a resemblance between their doctrines and those of Zoroaster. That they were not a Christian sect is proved by the fact of Gregory of Nazianzus's father having belonged to it before his becoming a Christian. Ullmann considers them as Eclecists, combining the elements of Judaism with the Persian religion, while Bohmer looks upon them as identical with the Ephrimites, which Neander (Ch. Hist, ii, 567) also thinks probable. Their morals are described as having been corrupted, so that Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Fuhrmann, Handwörterb. d. Kirchengesch. ii, 380 sqq.; Walch, Hist. d. HYRCANUS (Ὑρκάνος, see HERCANCUS), the name of two of the high priests and kings of the Maccabean line of Israel. See MACCABEES.

1. JOHN HYRCANUS, the son of Simon Maccabaeus, who sent him with his brother Judas to repel Cendebeus, the general of Antiochus VII, B.C. 187. On the assassination of his father and two brothers, John ascended the throne, B.C. 185. During the first year of his reign Jerusalem was besieged by Antiochus Sidetes, and at length Hyrcanus was obliged to submit. The walls of Jerusalem were destroyed, and a tribute imposed upon the city. Hyrcanus afterwards accompanied Antiochus in his expedition against the Parthians, but returned to Jerusalem before the defeat of the Syrian army. After the defeat and death of Antiochus, B.C. 180, Hyrcanus took several cities belonging to the Syrian kingdom, and completely established his own independence. He strengthened his power by an alliance with the Romans, and extended his dominions by the conquest of the Idumæans, whom he compelled to submit to circumscription and to observe the Mosaic law; and also by taking Samaria, which he levied to the government of, and built on a scale it had stooped. The latter part of his reign was troubled by disputes between the Pharisees and Sadducees. Hyrcanus had originally belonged to the Pharisees, but had quitted their party in consequence of an insult he received at an entertainment from Eleazar, a person of importance among the Pharisees. By uniting himself to the Sadducees, Hyrcanus, notwithstanding the benefits he had conferred upon his country by his wise and vigorous government, became very unpopular with the common people, who were mostly attached to the Pharisees. Hyrcanus died B.C. 106, and was succeeded by his son Aristobulus, B.C. 73, 1 Macc. xvi; Justin, xxxvi; 1; Diodorus, Exc. Hasch. xxxiv; 1; Plut. Apophth. p. 184 sqq.; Eusebius, Chron. Arm. p. 94, 167. See Smith, Dict. of Classical Biography, s. v. See Antiochus.

2. Hyrcanus II., son of Alexander Janneus, and grandson of the preceding. On the death of his father (B.C. 78) he was appointed high-priest by his mother Alexandra, who ruled Judea herself for the next nine years. After her death (B.C. 69), his younger brother, Aristobulus, a braver and more energetic man, seized the government and forced Hyrcanus to take a raw private life. Induced by the Idumæan Antipater, and aided by Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, he endeavored to win back his dominions, but was not successful until Pompey began to favor his cause. After some years of tumultuous fighting, Aristobulus was poisoned by the partisans of Phasaelus (B.C. 49), and Hyrcanus, who had for some time possessed, if he had not enjoyed, the dignity of high-priest and ethnarch, was now deprived of the latter of these offices, for which, in truth, he was wholly incompetent. Caesar (B.C. 47), on account of the services rendered to him by Antipater, made the latter governor of Judea, and thus left in his hands all the real power, Hyrcanus busying himself only with the affairs of the priesthood and Temple. Troubles, however, were in store for him. Antipater was assassinated, and Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, with the help of the Parthian king, Orodes I, invaded the land, captured Hyrcanus by treachery, cut off his ears, and thus disqualified him for the office of high-priest, and carried him off to Seleucia, on the Tigris. Some years later, Herod, son of his old friend Antipater, obtained supreme power in Judea, and invited the aged Hyrcanus home to Jerusalem. He was allowed to depart and return and find some time lived in ease and comfort, but, falling under suspicion of intriguing against Herod, he was put to death (B.C. 30) (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 16; xiv. 1-13; War, i. 6-11; Dio Cass. xxxvii. 15, 16; xlviii. 26; Diod. xi. Exc. fast. p. 128; Euseb. Chron. Arm. p. 54). See Smith, Dict. of Classical Biography, s. v.

Hyssopus ( planta), of uncertain etymology; Gr. ἱσσοπος, a plant difficult to define, especially as the similarity of the above terms has early led to their confusion. As the ἱσσοπος of Greek authors is generally acknowledged to be the common hyssop (Hyssopus officinalis of botanists), it has been inferred that it must also be the same as the Old Testament  אֱּשֶׁת, as that referred to in the New Testament. This inference has not, however, been universally accepted in; for Celsius enumerates no less than eighteen different plants which have been adduced by various authors as the hyssop of Scripture. The chief difficulty arises from the fact that in the Sept. the Greek ἱσσοπος is the uniform rendering of the Hebrew  אֱּשֶׁת, and that this rendering is inodorous in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 19, 21), when speaking of the ceremonial observances of the Levitical law. Whether, therefore, the Sept. made use of the Greek ἱσσοπος as the word most nearly resembling the Hebrew in sound, as Stahlin has supposed (S. et Paul. p. 21, note), or as the true representative of the plant indicated by the latter, is a point which, in all probability, will never be decided. Botanists differ widely even with regard to the identification of the ἱσσοπος of Dioscorides. The name ἱσσοπος is given to several plants, the Valeriana, to neither of which it is appropriate, and the hyssop of Italy and South France is not met with in Greece, Syria, or Egypt. Dauben (Lect. on Rom. Husbandry, p. 318), following Sibthorpe, identifies the mountain hyssop with the Hydrocotyle sylvatica, but this conjecture is disapproved by Kuhn (Comm. in Diosc. iii. 27), who in the same passage gives it as his opinion that the Hebrews used the Origania λίβυκον in Egypt, the O. Syriacum in Palestine, and that the hyssop of Dioscorides was the O. Smyrnenum. The Greek botanist describes two kinds of hyssop, δαμάνι and κυανώτατον, and the Hebrews made the χαλίνα their Egyptian equivalent. The Talmudists make the same distinction between the wild hyssop and the garden plant used for sacrifice. The hyssop is of three species, but only one of these is cultivated for use. The common hyssop is a shrub, with low bushy stalks, growing in the wild state, and a half high; small, pear-shaped, close-setting, opposite leaves, with several smaller ones rising from the same joint; and all the stalks and branches terminated by erect, whorled spires of flowers, of different colors in the wild state. They are very hardy plants and may be propagated either by slips or cuttings, or by seeds. The leaves have an aromatic smell, and a warm, pungent taste. It is a native of the South of Europe and the East.

The first notice of the scriptural plant occurs in Exod. xii. 22, where a bunch of hyssop is directed to be dipped in blood and stuck on the lintels and the two side-posts of the doors of the houses in which the Israelites resided. It is next mentioned in Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 52, in the ceremony for declaring lepers to be cleansed; and again in Numb. xix. 6, 16, in preparing the water of separation. The place of the apostle alights in Heb. ix. 19: "For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people, according to the law, he took the blood of calves, and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people." From this we learn that the Greek name ἱσσοπος was considered synonymous with the Hebrew  אֱּשֶׁת; and from the preceding that the plant must have been leafy, and large enough to serve for the purposes of sprinkling, and that it must have been found in Lower Egypt, as well as in the country towards Mount Sinai, and onwards to Palestine. From the following passage we get some information respecting the habits and the supposed properties of the plant. Thus, in 1 Kings iv. 33, it is said, "Solomon spoke of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out.

of the wall; and in the penitential psalm of David (II, 7), "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." In this last passage, it is true, the word is thought by some commentators to be used in a figurative sense; but still it is possible that the plant may have possessed some general cleansing properties, and thus come to be employed in preference to other plants in the ceremonies of purification. It ought, at all events, to be found growing upon walls, and in Palestine. In the account of the crucifixion of our Saviour, the evangelist John says (xix, 29), "Now there was set a vessel full of vinegar, and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth." In the last two passages of Matthew (xxvii, 48) and Mark (xv, 36) it is stated that the sponge filled with vinegar was put upon a reed or stick. To reconcile these statements, some commentators have supposed that both the sponge and the hyssop were tied to a stick, and that one evangelist mentions only the hyssop, because he considered it as the more important; while, for the same reason, the other two mention only the stick; but the simplest mode of explaining the apparent discrepancy is to consider the hyssop and the stick to be the same thing—in other words, the hyssop was an inflorescence of the hyssop plant.

Of the different plants added by Celsius as having more or less claims to be regarded as the hyssop of Scripture, some belong to the class of fennels, as Copula Veneris, maiden-hair, and Ruta muraria, or wall-rue, because they will grow upon walls; so also the Polytrichum, or hair-moss, the Kloster hyssops, or pearlwort, and Selinum procumbens are suggested by others, because, from their growing on rocks or walls, they will answer to the passage in I Kings iv, 38, and from their smallness contrast well with the cedar of Lebanon, and are a proof of the minute knowledge of Solomon. Some again contend for species of wormwood, as being from their bitterness, most likely to have been added to the winegar in the sponge, that it might be more distasteful to our Saviour. The majority, however, have selected different kinds of fragrant plants belonging to the natural family of Labiate, several of which are found in dry and barren situations in Palestine, and also in some parts of the desert. (See Rauwolf, Trav. p. 59, 456; Hasselquist, Trav. p. 554, 517; Burckhardt, Trav. ii, 913; Robinson, Researches, i, 162, 157.) Of these may be mentioned the rosemary, various species of lavender, of mint, of marjoram, of thyme, of savory, of thyme, and others, all of which are found in Palestine, and are of a character as well as in properties; but it does not appear that any of them grow on walls, or are possessed of cleansing properties; and, with the exception of the rosemary, they are not capable of yielding a stick, nor are they found in all the required situations. If we look to the most recent authors, we find some other plants added, though the generality adhere to the common hyssop. Sprengel (H. Hei Herb., i, 14) seems to entertain no doubt that the Thymbra Spicata found by Hasselquist on the ruins about Jerusalem is the hyssop of Solomon, though Hasselquist himself thought that the Thymbra Drimia found in the plain of Jordan by the Lady Calcott asks "whether the hyssop upon which St. John says the sponge steeped in vinegar was put, to be held to the lips of Christ upon the cross, might not be the hyssop attached to its staff of cedar-wood, for the purposes of sprinkling the people, lest they should contravene the law on the eve of the Sabbath, which was a high-day, by being in the field of execution" (Scripture Herbal, p. 208). Rosenmuller, again, thinks that the Hebrew word ezob does not denote our hyssop, but an aromatic plant resembling it, the wild marjoram, which the Germans call Doenert, Oder Wohlgemuth, the Arabs Zinzar, the Arabs Zinzera, the Egyptians Oriza, the Hebrew Ezob (i, 161). Mr. Kitto observes that "the hyssop of the sacred Scriptures has opened a wide field for conjecture, but in no instance has any plant been suggested that, at the same time, has a sufficient length of stem to answer the purpose of a wand or pole, and such detegent or cleansing properties as to render it a fit emblem for purification;" and he suggests it as probable that "the hyssop was a species of Pityolacca, as combining length of stem with cleansing properties, from the quantity of potash which is yielded by the ashes of the American species, P. Decandria, of this genus." P. Asystenica grows to the size of a shrub in Arabia. Wisner (Bibl. Real-"wörterbuch, s. v., Ysp.) observes that the Talmudists distinguish the hyssop of the Greeks and Romans from that mentioned in the law. He then adds the Origanum, mentioned in the quotation from Rosenmuller, as the ezob of the Hebrews; but he states also that a more accurate examination is required of the hyssop and Origanum of that part of Asia before the meaning of the Hebrew term can be considered as satisfactorily determined. Five kinds of hyssop are mentioned in the Talmud. One is called Ymim, simply, without any epithet: the others are distinguished as Greek, Roman, wild hyssop, and *Origanum of Cochil (Mishna, Negiyin, xiv, 6). Of these, the Ymim and the two profane kinds that are, not to be employed in purifications (Mishna, Paruh, xi, 7). Maimonides (de Voca Rafta, iii, 2) says that the hyssop mentioned in the law is that which was used as a condiment. According to Porphyry (De Abatin, i, 7), the ezob was employed on certain occasions, when the bread mixed with hyssop; and the zaatar, or wild marjoram, with which it has been identified, is often an ingredient in a mixture called cukkeh, which is to this day used as food by the poorer classes in Egypt (Lane, Mod. Eg. i, 200). It is improbable, therefore, that this may have been the ezob of the Hebrews. So, indeed, it is written in Egypt; more especially as R. D. Kimchi (Lez., s. v.), who reckons seven different kinds, gives it as the equivalent the Arabic zaatar, origanum, or marjoram, and the German Dozetn oder Wohlgemuth (Rosenmuller, Handb.). With this agrees the Tanchum Hieros, MS. quoted by Robinson, Researches, i, 162. So too in the judaico-gentile Exod. xii, 22 is translated "y tomarèdes manojo de oríganos. This is doubtless the species of hyssopus (zaatar) shown to Dr. Thomson, who describes it as "having the fragrance of thyme, with a hot, pungent taste, and long slender stems" (Land and Book, i, 161). But Dioscorides makes a distinction between origanum and hyssopus when he describes the leaf of a species of the former as resembling the latter (comp. *Linn. xx, 67), though it is evident that he, as well as the Talmudists, regarded them as belonging to the same family. In the Syriac of I Kings iv, 38, the hyssop is rendered *hishnakh", "houseluck," although it is in other passages is represented by zyfth, which the Arabic translation follows in Psa. ii, 9, and Heb. iv, 19, while in the Pentateuch it has zaatar for the same. Patrick (on I Kings iv, 38) was of opinion that ezob is the same with the Ethiopic awzob, which represents the hyssop of Psa. ii, 9, as well as hishnakh, or mint, in Matt. xxiii, 38. The monks on Jebel Musa give the name of hyssopus to a fragrant plant called juldeh, which grows in great quantities on that mountain (Robinson, Bibl. Rev., i, 157). It has been reserved for the ingenuity of a German to trace a connection between aszop, the Greek for hyssop, and the Arab ezob. "Die Sprache Salomo's", Einl. § 2. The latest result is that of Dr. J. F. Royle (communicated in a paper read before the Royal Asiatic Society, and published in their journal for November, 1844), who has since infers from the Exod. that the plant required should be found in Lower Egypt (Exod. xii, 22); in the desert of Sinai (Lev. iv, 4, 5, and 9; Num. xi, 6, 18); in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (Josh. xix, 22); secondly, that it should be a plant growing on walls or the heathen to study them. More particular information in regard to their contents is given us by Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, v, § 43, ed. Potter, p. 761). But so varying have been the interpretations of this passage that it is difficult to determine definitely whether the book is of older origin than the first half of the 2nd century or of later date. The same conclusion is indicated by the relations of the Greek text to the Latin (see Real-Encyclop.) inclusions. The information which Clement furnishes us is: 1. There existed in the 2nd century a βιβλίον Ελλάδας, a work written in Greek, and circulated in Christian and heathen circles, entitled ο Τοιχισμός. 2. The Christians found in it, even more than the heathen, the books of Homer and of other authors relating to Christ and the future of his kingdom, and especially a reference to Christ's divine sonship, to the sufferings which awaited him and his followers, to the inexhaustible patience of the Christians, and the final return of Christ. The third and last of the Church fathers, who make mention of the Hystaspes is Leontius. He speaks of it in three different passages (Instit. div. viii, cap. 15, cap. 18; Epitom. ii, 69). In the first passage Laetantius speaks of the Hystaspes in connection with the Sibyl, and in the two other passages he speaks of it in connection with the Sibyl and Hermes Trismegistus. According to Laetantius, the Sibyl, who lived in a Babylon near the convent of Mar Saba (Excerpta, p. 388), is said to have been the possessor of a work of the Hystaspes in three volumes, which predicted the extinction of the empire and name of Rome. According to the second passage, the Sibyl and the other authors which shall precede the fall of the world have prophesied of the prophetae ex Dei vivit in libro extra naturam. The third passage, which states that this work, known as the Hystaspes is said to have predicted and described the iniquitas secvrae hujus extremi, how a separation of the just from the unjust shall take place, how the pious, amid cries and sobbing, will stretch out their hands and implore the protection of Jupiter (imploretur); how gods and heroes shall descend upon the earth, hear the cry of men, and destroy the wicked.

With regard to the person of Hystaspes, who is said to be the author of the work containing these predictions, Justin and Clement of Alexandria have left us no information, and we depend, therefore, solely on Laetantius, according to whom he was an enemy of the Medes, who flourished long before the Trojan war, and after whom was named the river Hystaspes. In all probability, Laetantius here thinks of the father of king Darius I, known to us from the writings of Herodotus, Xenophon, and other Greek authors, but to whom the prophetic talent of Hystaspes is ascribed. As Justin names Ammianus Marcellinus (xiii, 6), who flourished in the 4th century of our era, informs us that one Hystaspes had studied astronomy with the Brahmas of India, and had even informed the Magi of his ability to know the future. Agathias, the Byzantine historian of the 6th century, knows of a Hystaspes who was a contemporary with Zoroaster, but he does not dare to assert that this Hystaspes was the same as the one spoken of as the father of Darius I. See PARISIUS. In view of the uncertainty of the authorship, it is well to impossible to determine fully the origin, content, form, and tendency of the Vaticina Hystaspes. We know not even whether it emanated from Jewish, Christian, or heathen writers, although all our present knowledge points to the last as its probable origin. That the author was a Greek, as Huetius thinks (Quest. Abbet. i, iii, ep. 21, p. 290), is impossible, as the language he employs is Greek. But at all proved: beyond this, the only answer left us to all questions that might be put is a non liquet. Ibarra, Joaquin, a Spanish printer celebrated for his magnificent editions of the Bible and Arabic literature, was born at Saragossa in 1725, and died at Madrid in 1785. His printing-house was established at the latter place.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xuv, 724.

Ibas (†324), bishop of Edessa, in Syria, from 435 to 457, distinguished himself by the translation of the works of Theodorus of Mopsuestia into the Syriac. His lenient policy towards the Nestorians, and the fact that he distributed the translation of Theodore extensively throughout Persia and Syria, caused several priests of his diocese to accuse him before the emperor Theodosius II, and before the archbishops of Antioch and Constantinople, for favoring Nestorianism. The emperor appointed the bishops Uranius of Hiermara, Photius of Tyre, Eustathius of Berytus, and the prefect of Damascus a commission to try him. Two Synods, held respectively at Berytus and Tyre in 448, failed to convict him, and he was left undisturbed until the Robber-Synod of Ephesus (A.D. 449), when he was finally deposed from his diocese. He appealed to the Council of Chalcedon, and was restored to his bishopric in 451. Long after his death, in 553, the fifth general Council of Constantinople condemned him as a Nestorian, in spite of the efforts of pope Vigilius.

Ibbetson, James, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1717, and educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He filled successively the rectorate of Bushley, in Herefordshire, and the archdeaconry of St. Alban's, and died in 1781. His works are, Epistola ad Philo-Hebros Omoines (1746).—Short History of the County of Cheshire; and several other theological treatises and sermons.—Hook, Eccles. Bibl. vi, 241.

Iboton, Benjamin, D.D., a learned English divine, born at Beachamwell, Norfolk, in 1680, was educated at Clare Hall and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He became treasurer of Wells Cathedral and rector of St. Vedast, London, in 1708; was some time after appointed rector of St. Paul, Shadwell; chaplain of George I in 1716; and, finally, prebendary of Westminster in 1724. He died April 15, 1725. His principal works are, A Course of Sermons preached for the Boyle Lecture (1718, 1714), in which he refutes the infidel objections of Collins (Lond. 1727, 8vo);—Thirty-six Discourses on practical Subjects (Lond. 1776, 2 vols, 8vo); and a translation of Puffendorf's De Habitu Religionum Christianarum ad vitam civillem (1719). Ibiers, an Asiatic nation inhabiting the Caucasian isthmus, described by Virgil, Horace, and Lucan as a warlike, cruel, and uncivilized people, while Strabo speaks of them as a very quiet and religious people. Rutilius and Moses of Chorene relate that, during the reign of the emperor Constantine, the great Christian, probably a Christian woman (some call her Xino, others Nuna), was made prisoner by the Ibiers, and became a slave. Her pretty son won for her the esteem and consideration not only of her master, but of the Ibiers generally; and being on one occasion asked to cure a sick child of royal rank, she told the people that Christ, her God, alone could effect the cure. She prayed for the child, and it recovered. She is next said to have cured the queen by her prayers. The king, Mirus, and his queen were converted, and did their utmost to spread Christianity through their dominions. The country has since remained Christian, though the true religion was long mixed with many old superstitions. Some claim that Christina was from Byzantium, on the ground that Propocius (v, 9) mentions an old convert preserved in Jerusalem, and rebuilt by Justianin in the 6th century, which was called Iberian or Iverian. Moses of Chorene, moreover, says that she was an Armenian, and that teachers were demanded of the Armenian bishop Gregory, not of Rome. The Iberians spread Christianity among the surrounding nations. Their country is now called Georgia (q. v.), and they hold ecclesiastical relations with the Greek Church (q. v.).—Herzog, Real-Encyclop., a. v.; Pierer, Universal Lexicon, a. v.; Schröck, Kirchengesch. vi, 27 sq.

Ibex, the ancient name of the Bouquetin or Steinbok of the Alps, an animal generally thought to be designated by the Heb. בֶּן קָדָר (always in the plur., A. V. "wild goats"), represented as well known, and inhabiting the highest and most inaccessible steeps (see Job xxxi, 1; Psal. civ, 18). Several species have been described by naturalists as inhabiting the different mountain ranges of the East (e.g. Arabia, Forskal, Descrip. Anim. pref. 4; Rupell, Abyss. i, 126; and Palestine, Seetzen, xviii, 435), all of them slightly varying from the European form (Capra ibex), and known among the Arabs by the general name of beden. Among the Sinai mountains the chase is pursued in much the same manner and under much the same circumstances as that of the chamois in the Alps and the Tyrol. The hunters exercise great vigilance and hardihood, taking the circuits to get above their quarry, and especially aiming to surprise them at early day. Like most mountain quadrupeds that are gregarious, they have a leader who acts as sentinel, and gives the alarm on the occurrence of any suspicious sight, sound, or smell, when the whole flock makes off for a loftier peak. Their numbers are said to have much decreased of late years; for the Arabs report them so abundant fifty years ago, that if a stranger sought hospitality at a Bedouin's tent, and the owner had no sheep to kill, he would without hesitation take his gun and go confidently to shoot a beden. The flesh is excellent, with a flavor similar to that of venison. The Bedouins make water-bottles of their skins, as of those of the domestic goats, and rings of their horns, which they wear on their thumbs. Dogs easily catch them when surprised in the plains, but in the abrupt precipices and chasms of the rocks the ibex is said to elude pursuit by the tremendous leaps which it makes. It is likely that this species is identical with that which bears the name of posey (Caprus aegagrus), and which inhabits all the loftier ranges that traverse Asia, from the Taurus and Caucasus to China. It is very robust, and much larger than any domestic goat; its general color iron-gray, shaded with brown, with a black line down the back and across the withers, and a white patch on the crupper. The horns of the male are very large, compressed, and slightly diverging as they arch over the back; their front side makes an obtuse edge, and is marked by a series of knobs, with deep hollows between. See Wild Goat; Hind, etc.

Ib'har (Heb. יְבָ חַ, יְבָ חַ, chosen; Sept. Ἰβάχα, Ἰβάχα [cod. Val. Ἰβάχα, Ἰβάχα]); Josephus Ἰβάχα, Ant. vii., 3, 3), one of the sons of David (by a secondary wife, 1 Chron. i., 9) born to him in Jerusalem, mentioned next after Solomon and before Elishua (2 Sam. v., 15; 1 Chron. iii., 6; xiv., 5). B.C. post 1044. See David.

Ibisa, a genus of birds of the family Ardeidae, or, according to some ornithologists, of Scopoliaceae, and perhaps to be regarded as a connecting link between them. The bill is long, slender, curved, thick at the base; the point rather obtuse; the upper mandible deeply grooved throughout its length. The face, and generally the greater part of the head, and sometimes even the neck, are destitute of feathers, at least in adult birds. The neck is long. The legs are rather long, naked above the tarsal joint, with three partially united toes in front and one behind; the wings are moderately long; the tail is very short. The Sacred or Egyptian ibis (Ibis religiosa) is an African bird, two feet six inches in length, although the body is little larger than that of a common fowl. It was one of the birds worshipped by the ancient Egyptians, and called by them Habh or Hih, and by the modern Egyptians Abu-Hames (i.e. Father John). It is represented on the monuments as a bird with long beak and legs, and a heart-shaped body, covered with black and white plumage. It was supposed, from the color of its feathers, to symbolize the light and shade of the moon, its body to represent the heart; its legs described a triangle, and with its beak it performed a medical operation; from all which esoterial ideas it was the avatar of the god Thoth or Hermes (q. c.), who escaped in that shape the pursuit of Typhon, as the hawk was that of Is, or Horus, the sun. Its feathers were supposed to scare, and even kill, the crocodile. It appeared in Egypt at the rise, and disappeared in the inundation of the Nile, and was thought, at that time, to deliver Egypt from the winged and other serpents which came from Arabia in certain narrow passes. As it did not make its nest in Egypt, it was thought to be self-engendering, and to lay eggs for a lunar month. According to some, the basin was occupied by it. It was celebrated for its purity, and only drank from the purest water, and the most strict of the priesthood only drank of the pools where it had been seen; besides which, it was fabled to entertain the most invincible love of Egypt, and to die of self-starvation if transported, else its flesh was thought to be incorruptible after death, and to kill it was punishable with death. Ibises were kept in the temples, and unmolested in the neighborhood of cities. After death they were mummied, and there is no animal of which so many remains have been found at Thebes, Memphis, Hermopolis Magna, or Eshmun, and at Ibis or Ibleum, fourteen miles north of the same place. They are made up into a conical shape, the wings flat, the legs bent back to the breast, the head placed on the left side, and the beak under the tail; were prepared as other mummies, and wrapped up in linen bandages, which are sometimes ornamented in patterns or figured. At Thebes they are found in linen bandages only; well preserved at Hermopolis in wooden or stone boxes of oblong form, sometimes in form of the bird itself, or the god Thoth; at Memphis, in conical sugar-loaf-shaped red earthenware jars, the tail downwards, the cover of convex form, sometimes itself of ibises of embalmed ibises—a smaller one of the size of a corn-crake, very black, and the other black and white—the Ibis Numinis, or Ibis religiosa. This last is usually found with its eggs, and sometimes with its insect food, the Plebeus pipiens. Attimes it feeds, and particularly its young, in the stomach. (Wilkinson, Manners and Customs, v., 7, 217; Passolgoesu, Catalogue Raisonné, p. 255; Petti- grew, History of Mummies, p. 205; Horapollo, i. c. 80, 86.)

Ib'leam (Heb. יְבָ לֶאְמָ, יְבָ לֶאְמָ, people-waster; Sept. Ἰβάλαμφ, Ἰβάλαμφ [but some codd. occasionally omit]; a city (with suburban towns) within the natural precincts of Issachar, but (with five portions) assigned to Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11, where it is mentioned between Beth-shean and Dor), but from which the Israelites were unable to expel the Canaanites (Josh. i. 27, where it is mentioned between Dor and Megiddo); lying near the pass of Gur, in the vicinity of Megiddo, where it is mentioned (Josh. xxi. 27). It was assigned as a Levitical city to the family of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 70, where it is less correctly called Bileem, and mentioned along with Aner as lying within Manas- seh); compare Josh. xxxi. 25, where it is called Gath- Rimmon (apparently by error; see the Sept., and comp. 1 Chron. vi. 69). According to Schwartz (Palast. p. 131), it is the modern village Jobhat, south-west (north-west) of Beth-shean, and about two English miles south of the village Kefrah; but no map has this place, and the indications require a different position. See Gih. The site is probably represented by that of Jelameh, a small village about two and a half miles north of Jenin (Robinson, Researches, iii., 161).

Ibn-Aknin, Joseph ben-Tshehahal, called in Arabic Abbakaq Juanf Ibn-Jahsh Ibn-Shim'un Abna Abaz'maghri, a Jewish philosopher and commentator of some note, was born at Ceuta (Arab. Sbtrn), in Arabia, about 1160. His first religious training was, at least to all outside appearances, in the Mohammedan religion, but he was as such a youth and fully also taught and instructed in the Talmud and Hebrew Scriptures, so that, as soon as he arrived at years of maturity, he might forsake the religion forced upon him by the law of the country that gave him birth, and return to the faith of his fathers. About 1185, having previously decided in favor of the Jewish religion, he fled to Jerusalem, and there became a zealous disciple of the great Moses Maimonides, whose attention had been called to Ibn-Akkin by a scientific work of his, and by his Makamen, which he had sent to Maimonides. Although he remained with this celebrated Jewish savant only a little over a year, then removing to Aleppo to practice medicine, he had written many books so much to his honor that Maimonides loved him as his own son, and ever afterwards labored to promote the interests of his beloved disciple, and the philosophical work Moreh-Nebockin (Doctor perplexorum), which Maimonides (q. v.) published in 1190, is often asserted to have had for its purpose, among other things, to justify and popularize much of the philosophy of Ibn-Akkin that cherished at that time. In 1192, notwithstanding the frequent councils of Maimonides to the contrary, Ibn-Akkin went to Bagdad, and there founded a Rabbinic college. After the decease of his great master he figured quite prominently at the court of the sultan Azzahir (thirteenth of Damascus) and delivered lectures at the high schools on medicine and philosophy. He died about 1226. Besides a number of works on medicine and metaphysics, he wrote Commentaries on the Songs of (in Arabic), now in the Bodleian Library, Oxford (Focouhe, p. 198). He espouses the notion that these are the Songs of the Lord, and that the ten song-books of the O. T., and accordingly explains it allegorically as representing the relationship of God to his people Israel.

"There are," he says, "three different modes of explanation in the Song of Songs: 1. The literal, quoted by the literalists or grammarians, e. g. Saadit, Abu Salama Yahiya, David El Fasi (Chajjag), Abulwalid Ibn Hanach of Saragossa (Ibn-Ganach), the Nagid R. Samuel Ha-Levi ben-Negevit, Abu-Ibrahim ben-Haran (Isaac ben-Joseph), Jehuda ben-Babana (Ibn-Balan), and Ibn El-Abn (Abel El-Abn), 2. the allegorical, to be found in the Midrash Chasid, the Talmud, and in some of the ancient interpretations; and, 3. the philosophical interpretation, which regards this book as referring to the active intellect [νοημική νοημωσή], here worked out for the first time, and which, though not the only point of this discussion, is of all in point of merit. These three different explanations correspond, in reverse order, to the three different natural interests of man, namely, to his physical, vital, and spiritual natures. Ibn-Akkin always gives the first and second explanations first, and then the philosophical interpretation. The Song of Songs is in the history of Biblical literature and exegesis, inasmuch as all the interpreters therein enumerated have, with the exception of Saadit, hitherto not been known as commentators on the Song of Songs. These expositors form an important addition to the history of interpretation given by Jo. Mercier, Histoire et Critique des Commentaries du Song of Songs, Longman, 1857). Ibn-Balaam, JEHUDAH (in Arabic Jobha Abu-Zakaria), a very distinguished Jewish philologist and commentator, was born at Seville, in Spain, about 1080. He was especially prominent as a defender of the authority of the Talmud (q. v.). He died about 1160. His works (in Hebrew) are: 1. On the Accents of the Text, edited by Jo. Mercier (De accentibus scripturae proemii, Paris, 1365). Some portions of this book Heidenheim (q. v.) incorporated in his works סְפָר הַנְּצָרָה: 2. in Arabic. This work has not yet been published, but specimens of it, in Hebrew, have been printed by Leopold Dukes in the Literaturblatt des Oriens, 1846, No. 42: 4. A Treatise on the Hebrew Punctuation, in alphabetical order. This work is too old, however, to be of much use, but specimens of it have been published both by Dukes and Flurst in the Literaturblatt des Oriens, Nos. 29 and 42.—5. A Treatise on the Hebrew Isauronomy, in alphabetical order, of which extracts have been published by Dukes in the Literaturblatt des Oriens, 1846, No. 4:—6. Commentaries on the Pentateuch, which have been all published. Though this work has long been known through Aben-Ezra, who quotes it in his commentary on Gen. xlix, 6; Exod, v, 19, yet it is only lately (1851) that Dr. Stein- schneider discovered a MS. in the Bodleian Library containing a commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy.

"Ibn-Balaam always gives the grammatical explanation of the words first; then he enters into a minute disquisition on Saadita's translation and exposition of the Pentateuch, which he generally rejects, then explains the passage according to its context, and finally sets forth the Halachic and the judicial interpretation of the Talmud. A specimen of this commentary, which is extremely important to the Hebrew text and the Massora, has been communicated by Adolph Neubauer in the Journal Asiaticque of December, 1861. It is on Deut. v, 6, upon which Ibn-Balaam remarks, 'As to the two different readings of the two different rabbis, the massorists, and the philologians or grammarians, e. g. Saadit, Abu Salama Yahiya ben-David El Fasi (Chajjag), Abulwalid Ibn Hanach of Saragossa (Ibn-Ganach), the Nagid R. IBN-CASPI or CASPE, JOSEPH BEN-ABBAS MARY (also called D. Argenteiro by the Sephardic writer, was born of wealthy family about 1250 at Argenteiro, in France. He removed while young quite to Tarascon, and devoted his time mainly to Biblical studies. When only seventeen years old, he published as a result commentaries on Aben-Ezra’s exposition of the Pentateuch, and on Ibn-Ganach’s grammatical work. When about thirty years old he extended his range of study to metaphysical subjects, and thereafter became an ardent admirer of Maimonides, whose method of interpretation he also adopted. Indeed, so far was he carried away in his admiration for the great philosopher that he emigrated to Egypt, having decided to study under the disciples of Maimonides. But he failed to meet there that great fountain of knowledge which he supposed the followers of the second great Moses capable of supplying, and, after a few months’ travel in Egypt and the East, he returned to France. In 1257 he again set out on a journey to promote his studies by a residence at a foreign high-schools, and he visited Catalonia, Mallorca, Aragonia, and Valencia, and at one time even desired to go to Fez, having been informed that in that African city several noted Jewish scholars resided, whose instructions he coveted. Towards the latter part of 1332 Ibn-Caspi returned to his native country, and devoted himself to the production of a number of valuable exegetical works. He died about 1340.

In all he wrote some thirty-six works, most remaining to us only in MS. form, of which lists may be found in S. Jellineck, ידיעת בעלי התנ”ך, vol. ii, 1846; Delitzsch and Zunz, Catal. MS.; and in First, Biblioth. Jud. i, 147. Besides a commentary on Maimonides’ More Nebuchim, his most valuable works are, תורה על הפסוקות (or תורה על הפסוקות, only the word תורה, silver, being an allusion to his own name, תורא, which is found in the titles of all his works) (small silver chain or root), a Hebrew Dictionary, which is one of his most interesting and important works. It starts from the principle that every root has one only general idea as its basis, and not in the sense of the phrase of meaning. A copy of this work in MS. 2 vols. 4to, is by the Paris library, and another in the Angelica at Rome. Abrabanel frequently quotes it in his commentary on the Pentateuch (comp. p. 7), on Isaiah (comp. xliv, 3; xvi, 17), etc.; Wolf gives a specimen of it (Bibliothea Hebraica, l, 1858); and Richard Simon used the Paris MS. (Hist. Crit. Bibl. i, cap. xxxii), and Leopold Dukes printed extracts from it (Literaturblatt des Orientes, 1847, p. 480)—A Commentary on Proverbs, the Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes. “Of the commentary on Proverbs, which is one of Ibn-Caspi’s most valuable contributions to Biblical exegesis, the beginning and end have been published by Werblum (comp. תורת הפסוקות, 1846, p. 19, etc.); an analysis of the commentary on Ecclesiastes is given by Ginsburg (compare Historical and Critical Commentary on Ecclesiastes, Longman, 1861, p. 60, etc.), and the brief commentary on, or, rather, introduction, to the Song of Songs, which was published in 1877, but which is far inferior to the MS., has been republished with an English translation by Ginsburg in his Historical and Critical Commentary on the Song of Songs (London, 1857, p. 47, etc.).”—תורה על הפסוקות (silver stars), or commentary on eight prophets, in which he attacks with great severity those who explain these prophecies as referring to the Messiah [see IBN-DANAN]-יקב יבש (a silver cup), or commentary on the miracles and other mysteries found in the Pentateuch, Prophets, and Hasidographies. His principles of interpretation he laid down clearly in his commentary on the Proverbs above mentioned in these words: “The sacred Scriptures must be interpreted according to their plain and literal sense; and a recondite meaning can as little be introduced into them as into Aristotle’s writings on logic and natural history. Only where the literal meaning is not sufficient, and reason rejects it, a deeper sense must be sought. If we once attempt to allegorize a simple and intelligible passage, then we might just as well do it with the whole contents of the Bible.” “The logical division of sentences is the most indispensable and best auxiliary to the right understanding of the Bible, and the criterion to the proper order of the words are the Masora and the accents.” It is evident from this extract that Ibn-Caspi anticipated the hermeneutical rules of modern criticism at a time when the schoolmen and the depositaries of Christian learning were engaged in hair-splitting and in allegorizing every fact of the Bible. It is greatly to be regretted that most of his exegetical works are lost or unpublished.

IBN-CHAJIM, AARON, a Jewish commentator, was born at Fez, Africa, about 1570. But little is known of his personal history. His works are, a Commentary on Joshua (Venice, 1608-9), from which a selection was made by Frankfurter (q.v.) in his great Rabbinic Bible—a commentary on Sifra (tradition of Leviticus), published under the title of The Obligation of Aaron (Venice, 1699-11)—The Rules of Aaron, a treatise on R. Ishmael’s (q.v.) thirteen rules for interpreting the O.T. Scriptures (Ven. 1609, Dres. 1712)—Ibid., Bibl. Cycl. ii, 352.

IBN-DANAN, SAADIA BEN-MAIMON, a Jewish writer of some distinction, was Rabbi to the congregation at Granada, and the first of the succession of this country by the Moors to Ferdinand and Isabella, and the expiration of the Jews. He was born in the first half of the 15th century, and flourished at Granada from 1460 to 1502. He was especially given to the study of the Talmud and history, and as a result of the former we have several works of learned significance, and the elucidation of the language of the original. His exegetical works are, a Commentary on Isaiah liii, 13 (MS. Michael, 412), in which he takes ground against Ibn-Caspi (q.v.)—אבראהי לוחם אדום (written in Arabic). This work, which he is thought to have completed in 1468, also remains only in MS. form, but an extract from it has been printed by Pinskier in his Likute Kadmonoth (Vienna, 1860), p. 74. His historical works are, A short History of the Jews to the Days of Moses Maimonides (יהוה נ Además), which he originally intended for his own pupils, of whom he seems to have had a number. See Grätz, Geschichte d. Juden, viii, 345 sq.; Edelmann, Chenuda Genez, Introd. p. xvii sq.; and Text, p. 13 sq.;, and Text, Ibid., Bibl. Cycl. ii, 352. (J. H. W.)

IBN-GANACH, ABULWALID MERWAN OF JONAH IBN-GANACH

DIYANAH (in Hebrew called Jonah), one of the most distinguished Jewish scholars of the Middle Ages, was born at Cordova about 955. While yet a boy he evinced his fondness for Hebrew by writing verses in that language. He was continu’d in this habit to the determined determination to devote his whole life to the advancement of the Hebrew as a philological study, and even abandoned the practice of medicine, which he had chosen as his profession after his removal to Saragossa in 1015, whither he had been forced by the persecutions which the Jews of Cordova were subjected to at the hands of Al-Mostad. He determined to make his establishment at Malaga, in Spain, about 1021. When only nineteen years of age he evinced his great skill as a poet, and his thorough acquaintance with Hebrew grammar by writing a grammar of the Hebrew language in Hebrew characters. It was never printed entire, but parts of it have been published by Parchon in his Hebrew Lexicon (Paris, 1844), and by Leop. Dukes, in his Shire Sholomo (Hannover, 1858). About 1045 Ibn-Gebirol published his first philosophical work, which was translated by Ibn-Tibbon into Hebrew, entitled קבוצת ירח בנות קסם (published in 1550 and often). He propounds in this work a peculiar theory of the human temperament and passions, in which twenty prophecies corresponding to the four dispositions multiplied by the five senses, and shows how the leaning of the soul to the one side may be brought to the moral equipollence by observing the declarations of Scripture, and ethical sayings of the Talmud, which he largely quotes, and which he interprets with the help of "divine" Socrates, his pupil Plato, Aristotle, the Arabic philosophers, and especially with the maxims of a Jewish moral philosopher called Chezez Al-Kute, who is the author of an Arabic paraphrase of the Psalms in rhyme (Steinacheter, Jewish Literature [London, 1867], p. 101). But this work contained also personal allusions to the different men of Saragossa, he was expropriated in 1046. After travelling from one place to another, he finally found a protector in the celebrated Samuel Ha-Nagid, a Jew also, then prime minister of Spain, and he was enabled to continue his philosophical studies, as the result of which he produced The Fountain of Life, his greatest work. Fragments of a Hebrew translation and an entire Latin version of it were published by Munk in his Mélanges de philosophie Juive et Arabe (Paris, 1857-59). He died in 1070. The influence which Ibn-Gebirol exerted on Arabic and Jewish philosophy cannot be too highly estimated. He certainly deserves to be called "the Jewish Plato," as Gritzat chooses to name him; but the assertion that he was the first philosopher of the Middle Ages, and that his philosophical treatises were used by the scholastic philosophers, is an error, as Lewis (Lehrs über die Philosophie, ii, 65) fully proves, although Munk, and after him Gritzat, fell into the same mistake, as also Ginsburg, the writer of the article on Ibn-Gebirol in Kitto (Bibl. Cycl. ii, 356). From frequent quotations in Aben-Ezra’s commentaries, it seems that Ibn-Ganach also have written some expositions of the Old-Test. Scriptures, though none such are known to us at present existing. Ibn-Gebirol also had a natural talent for verse-making. One of his hymns, entitled The royal Diadem, “a beautiful and pathetic poetical composition of profound philosophical sentiments and great eloquence, forms an important part of the divine service on the evening preceding the great Day of Atonement with the devout Jews to the present day.” See Gritzat, Geschichte d. Juden, vi, 31 sq.; Sachs, Religions Poesie d. Juden i. Spanien (Berlin, 1845), p. 3 sq., 315, etc.; Zunz, Synagoge Poesie der Mittelalter, [p. 129]; Flügel, Geschichte des jüdischen Nations, ii, 490. Ibn-Gebirol, ISAAC BEN-JEHUDAH, a Jewish Rabbi of a very distinguished family who resided in Lucena, not far from Cordova, was born about 1080. He was a very able philosopher and hymnologist, and well conversant with the Talmud. He is said to have written a Commentary on Genesis, which has not as yet come to light. From the frequent quotations and allusions to his writings by the best interpreters and lexicographers, it appears that it contained important contributions to the critical exposition of this difficult book. his creation. The divine is in everything, and every-thing in the divine. He also believed in the power of prayer, but that man, in order to be accepted of God, must approach at least perfection; hence the most perfect of men, the prophets, interceded by prayer for the people. The development of the idea of the divine world, of the spirits, spheres, and bod-ies, Ibn-Butif, explains by mathematical formulas. He died about 1290. Of his works, which are quite numerous, the following have been printed: Igeroth hat-To-sheba, replies to the questions of Judah ben-Nassan (Prague, 1878); Seder Bnei Yisrael (Constantinople, s. a. 8vo). Ibn-Sargado, Aaron, also called Aaron Ha-Cohen ben-Joseph, a Jewish scholar, flourished in Bag-dad towards the middle of the 10th century. He was a wealthy merchant, but very fond of study, and, taking ground against Saadia (q. v.), whose deposition from the "Gaonate" he expended large sums of money, shortly after Saadia's death he was elected Gaon (spiritual head) of the academy at Pumbedita (945), and by his zeal for learning and his great wealth greatly furthered the interests of the academy at this time and the Su-ran school, over which Saadia had presided. Ibn-Sar-gado, during the eighteen years of his presidency, devoted himself not only to the exposition of the O.-Test. Scriptures, but also quite extensively to the study of philosophy (comp. Munk, Guide des érudits, i, 462). He wrote a philosophical work and a Commentary on the Pentateuch, but they are not as yet known to us. From the fragments of the latter preserved by Aben-Ezra (Gen. xxviii, 38; xxxiv, 90; xlii, 6; Exod. xii, 16; Lev. xxviii, 6), we see that, though abiding by the traditional explanations of the Hebrew Scriptures, Ibn-Sargado was by no means a slavish follower of ancient opinions. See Gritz, Gesch. der Juden, v, 335 sq.; Kittro, Cyclop. Bibl. Lit. ii, 357; Fürst, Biblioth. Ibn-Shoeib, Jacob, a Jewish commentator, flourished at Tadura in the latter half of the 15th century. But little is known of his personal history. His works show him to have been a man of considerable culture and great liberality of mind. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, entitled The Holocaust of Sabbath (Veen. 1573); on the Psalms, entitled Frawy in Praxis (Salonica, 1568-69); on the Song of Songs, entitled A brief Exposition (Salonion, 1558); and an Exposition of Lamentations (Venice, 1589). In his commentary on the Psalms he maintained that pious Gentiles would have a share in the world to come, which, when we consider the severe persecutions they often had to endure at this time on the Jews, is by no means a small concession on the part of Ibn-Shoeib. —Kittro, Cyclop. of Bib. Lit. ii, 358; Zunz, Zur Gesch u. Literatur (Berl. 1845), p. 384. (J. H. W.)

Ibn-Sitta (יבן סיטא), a distinguished Jew, flourished at Irak towards the close of the 9th century. He wrote a commentary on the Scriptures, of which fragments only are left.Such was the nature of the work; but useful to the contemporary interpreters, while Aben-Ezra exercises his withering sarcasm upon him. —Kittro, Cyclop. of Bib. Lit. ii, 358; Pinsker, Likutei Kolomishon (Vienna, 1860), p. 83; Fürst, Gesch. d. Kirdharbene (Lpz. 1852), pp. 100, 172. Ibn-Thofel, an Arabic philosopher who flourished in the 12th century, wrote a work in which the existence of God is proved in so able a manner that the argument remains unrefuted to this day. It was translated into Persian, Hebrew, and Latin. The last-named, by Ed. Pococke, was entitled Philosophus autodidactus, sine epistola Abi Jassur Ebne-Tophaili de Hai Ebne-Yok- dam (Oxf. 1671 and 1700, 4to); and also in English by S. Cockley, Lond. 1708, 1731, 4to, and other modern languages. —Hosea, Newe. Bibl. Gen. xxv, 732.

Ibn-Tibbon, Jehudah ben-Saul, a Jewish scholar of Spanish descent, was born at Lunel, France, about 1120. He was educated a physician, but his ardent love for the study of Hebrew led him to abandon the practice of his profession, and he devoted himself main-ly to the translation into Hebrew of some of the most beautiful works of the ancient rabbis written in Arabic. He died about 1190. His translations are The Duties of the Heart of Joseph b. Bechah, the Ethics of Ibn-Gebirol, the Kusari of Judah Ha-Levi, the Moral Phi-losophy of Saadia Gaon, and the grammatical and lexi-co-graphical work of Ibn-Gazach (q. v.). All his trans-lations bear his own pedantic character; they are literal, and therefore clumsy, and we can hardly see why he should have gained the surname of prince of translators, unless it was for the service which he rendered by present-ing the Jews translations of works not otherwise accessible to them. He is also said to have written a work on the purity of the Hebrew language (יודיל יודיל), which is lost. See Kittro, Cyclop. Bibl. Lit. ii, 358; Steinheinsdeiter, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana (col. 1374-76); Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, vi, 241; Fürst, Biblioth. Jud. iii, 401 sq.

Ibn-Tibbon, Samuel, son of the preceding, was born about 1160. He was educated by his father both in the Hebrew and cognate languages, and followed him in the practice of medicine. He resided for a time reckless in his youth, but finally became interested in his studies, and evinced greater skill as a translator than his father. He died about 1230. Besides translating philosophical works both of Jewish and heathen authors, among whom were Aristotle and Alfarabi, he wrote a commentary on Ecclesiastes (תהלים יב), which exists in MS. in several of the European libraries; and a commentary on Gen. i, 1-9, entitled "Mesechet ha-Tiferet" (Prasburg, 1837), being a dissertation on the creation. —Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, vi, 242; Kittro, Cyclop. Bibl. Lit. ii, 358; Fürst, Biblioth. Jud. iii, 402 sq.

Ibn-Tumart, AbdaLlah, a religious enthusiast, flourished in the second half of the 12th century in Northern Africa. He appeared before the simple-minded herd of Barbary, and preached against the Summi-tical doctrine of the Mohammedan ortho-doxy (see EX- NITRES), and the literal interpretation of the verses of the Koran, and the Mohammedan belief that God feels and acts like man. His followers, on account of their belief in the strict unity of God without corporeal re-presentation ( ולדה-ימ, called themselves Almoravids, or Almohads. Ibn-Tumart they recognised as Malhut, or the God-sent Imam of Islam. Like Mohammed, he went forth to conquer by the sword the territories of the Almoravids, and his doctrine soon found followers throughout North-west Africa. See MOHAMMEDANS. (J. H. W.)

Ib'ri (Heb. 'Ibri, יברון, an Eberite or "Hebrew," Sept. has יברון v. מזרחי), the last named of the sons of Merari by Jazaniah, i. e., apparently a descen-dant of Levi in the time of David (1 Chron. xxvi, 27). B.C. 1014.

Icard, Charles, a French Protestant divine, was born at St. Hippolyte, Languedoc, in February, 1636. He attended school at Anduze, Orange, and Nîmes, and concluded his theological studies at Geneva from 1655-58. He was installed in the provincial synod of Ay he was appointed pastor of La Norville, where he remained until 1668, when he accepted a pastorate at Nîmes. Under the influence of the persecutions which heralded the approaching revocation of the edict of Nantes, the Protestants, at the suggestion of Claude Brossieu, formed a central committee for the protection of their general interests, and Icard was chosen to represent it at the Synod of Lower Languedoc, assembled at Uzes in 1632. In the mean time, the population of a part of Vivarais and Lower Languedoc having risen in arms to resist the persecution, the insurrection was met with blood, and the members of the central committee, accused of being the instigators, were proceeded against with the utmost severity. Icard succeeded in reaching Geneva, and thence went to Neuchâtel for greater security. While on his way, he learned that he had been condemned, June 25, 1682, as contaminous, to die on the rack. He remained as pastor at Neuchâtel until 1688, when he went to Bremen, and supplied a French congregation there. He died June 9, 1715. Icard wrote two Sermons, Avis salutaire aux Églises réformées de France (Amst. 1683, 12mo), exhorting the Protestants not to give way under persecution. He also edited an edition of the Instituts de Calvijn (first two books, Bremen, 1696, 1697, 1to; the whole, Bremen, 1718, fol.) and an edition of the Extrait de l'Usage et de son Fils sur le Chamanement de Religion, par Joseph de La Place. He also edited, AviM abrégé de la Vie de Charles Icard (in Hist. crit. de la République des Lettres [1717], xiv, 288-301; Haag, La France Protestante; Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, xxxv, 768.

Iceland, an island belonging to Denmark, situated between the North Atlantic and the Arctic Oceans, distant 130 miles from the south-east coast of Greenland, and about 850 miles west of Norway, extending between lat. 63° 24' and 66° 35' N., and long. 19° 31' and 24°. The area is 89,726 square miles, of which only 15,900 are cultivated. The total population of Iceland was, according to the statistics of 1888, about 72,000 souls.

As early as 793 the eastern coast of Iceland was inhabited by some Irish monks, but it did not receive a settled population until 880, when king Harald Haf- fagr, of Norway, after conquering the other kings, made himself sole sovereign of the country, and induced large numbers of the malcontents to emigrate to Iceland. Nearly all the new-comers were pagans, and thus the republic which was established by them was thoroughly pagan. But in 922 it is said that the Althing, an assembly of the wisest men of all districts, which met annually to discuss the affairs of the country, and to give the necessary laws. The first Christian missionary among the Icelanders was Thor- vald Kodransson (981-985), with the same Vidforl (*"Vidforl", wide journey") supported by Frederick, according to the legend, a Saxon bishop. With great vigor the missionary work was subsequently continued by king Ólaf Tryggvason of Norway, who not only tried by persuasion, bribery, and intimidation to gain for the Christian religion all the Icelanders who came to Norway, but also sent missionaries to Ice- land, and supported their labors by the whole influence which he could command. The first to go was the Icelan- der Landgud (986-997) supported by the Saxon priest Dankbrand, who, after many adventures, had become court chaplain of the king (997-999); two noble Icelanders, the "White Gizur," and Hjalmar Skegga- sson, succeeded finally in effecting a compromise with the pagans. The missionary of the island, Thorfinn of Ljóvatn, according to which Christianity was made the state religion of Iceland, while many reservations were made in favor of paganism (1000). The whole people were then baptized, part of them reluctantly, yet with- out open resistance. A few years later, king Ólaf Har- aldson caused the last remnants of the pagan cult as- faced from the laws. Some traces, however, of the for- mer religion remained in the faith and usages of the Christian Icelanders, particularly in their Church con- stitution. During the pagan period the erection and possession of a temple had been a private affair; as there were no stelae or other marker of property, no temple had been held in every temple by its owner; subse- quently, when the political constitution of the island was regulated (965), a limited number (thirty-nine) of temples obtained a political importance, and every Ice- lander was obliged to connect himself with the owner of the temple. The king's temple seems his chief con-tribution for the maintenance of the temple. Private temples were maintained beside the public, and the latter remained likewise the private property of the chiefs. The idea of chief temples ceased with the introduc- tion of Christianity, but erection, dedication, and main- tenance of the temples remained a private affair. The law only provided that the erection of a church in- volved the duty of maintaining it; and the clergy could compel the dotation of a church by delaying its conse- cration until dotation was provided for. Otherwise the administration of the property of the church by its own was very arbitrary, and he had only to take care of the maintenance of the church and of the holding of divine worship. He either could take orders himself or hire another priest. In the former case the priest was more of a peasant, merchant, or a judge than a clergy- man; in the latter case he was financially dependent upon the owner of the temple, and, like other servants, obliged to perform domestic or military services. Iceland re- ceived its own and native bishop in 1055, having up to that time been only visited by missionary bishops. The bishop enjoyed the benefit of the old temple duties; otherwise he had to live out of his own means. Under the second bishop, Gizur, the see was endowed, and per- manently established at Skalhol; subsequently (about 1105) a second see was established at Holar, to which was given the jurisdiction of the northern district, while the three other districts remained subject to the bishop of Skalhol. The bishops were elected by the people; the priests by the owners of the several churches. Thus the clergy were less independent than in other countries, and consequently less powerful. Their influence some- what increased when bishop Gizur, in 1097, prevailed upon the National Assembly to confirm the privileges of the Church, and which became in main in many particulars different from that of other church- es. Lay patronage was recognised to its fullest extent; no celibacy separated the clergy from the people; even the bishops were generally married. The bishops, though they had a seat in the National Assembly, had no separate ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and marriage and other affairs were regulated contrary to Church law.

ICONIUM

The Church of Iceland was at first subordinate to the archbishopric of Bremen and Hamburg; when the archbishopric of Lund was established (1108), Iceland was transferred to it; finally, it was transferred to the new archbishopric of Nidaros. About the middle of the 12th century the island became subject to the crown of Norway, and was consequently affected by the conflicts between the Church and State which took place in that country. This chiefly concerned the patronage of laymen, and ended with the adoption of a new Church law introduced about 1297 by bishop Arnl. (This Church law was published in 1777 by Grim Jóh. Thorókelin, under the title Jus ecclesiasticum nostrum sive Arnoneum, or Kristinnrettinn í nýri.)

The inner condition of the people was anything but satisfactory, as immorality and other vices appear to have prevailed to a large extent among the laity as well as among the clergy. The convents which had arisen since the 12th century fully participated in the general degeneration. Externally all classes of the people showed a strong attachment to the Church of Rome, and three natives of the island obtained a place among the saints of the Church—Thorlak, Jon, and Gudmund; the last named, however, was not formally canonized.

The Reformation soon found a number of adherents: among the earliest and most devoted was Oddr Gotteschalksson, the author of the first translation of the New Testament into Icelandic (printed at Rooskilde, 1540). The Danish government, which had established a dependency since the union of Norway with Denmark (1397), endeavored to introduce the Reformation, which in 1536 had been declared to be the religion of the state by the Diet of Copenhagen, by force; but the bishop, especially Arason of Holar, made a determined and length and armed opposition, which was successful, finally (1550) ended in his capture and execution. This put an end to the Church of Rome in Iceland, and in the next year (1561) the Reformation was fully carried through.

The gradual improvement in the condition of the Church was, however, only gradual. Many of the customs of the medi eval Church, such as the use of the Latin language at divine service, maintained themselves for a long time, and the same was the case with the ignorance and the immorality of the clergy and the people. But the Reformation had swept away the established habits of the past, and with the establishment of learned schools in connection with the two cathedrals (1552), by the establishment of a printing-press at Holar by the excellent bishop Guðmundr Thorlaksson (1574); and in particular by the new translation of the Bible by this bishop, a service that contributed largely to a thorough reform of the Church, which now belongs to the best-educated portions of the Protestant world.

As regards the present constitution of the Church of Iceland, it resembles in its principal features that of Denmark, yet not without preserving some of its own peculiarities. The sovereign is the chief bishop (summus episcopus), who exercises his authority partly through the bishops, partly through secular officers. The bishops, in the election of whom the people take part, occupy the position of superintendents, and still have an extended jurisdiction. At the close of the 18th century the see of Skalafold was transferred to Reykjavik, and somewhat later (1825) a cathedral was established at Langanes, near Reykjavik. The episcopal see of Holmar had previously (in 1801) been abolished, and the whole island placed under one bishop. Next to the bishops are the two provosts, who are the Middle Ages chiefly of a financial nature, and therefore sometimes occupied by laymen. Since the Reformation (1573-1574) the dignity has been wholly of an ecclesiastical character, and includes the right and duty of superintending the large districts. On the whole, there are 16 provosts, each of whom is placed over a number of parishes. The pastors were at first appointed by the bishops, contrary to the provisions of the Danish Church constitution, but since 1868 they have been elected, in accordance therewith, by the congregation, under the superintendence of the provost. To the royal bailiff was reserved the right of investing the pastor elect with his office. Subsequently the manner of appointment was somewhat modified, the bishops being given to the bailiff, and a right of co-operation to the bishop. To the king of Denmark was reserved the right of sanctioning the appointment to one of the forty-seven benefices, whose yearly income is from 40 to 100 dollars annually. Only five of the 298 churches yield an income higher than 100 dollars. Some clergymen have an income of no more than five dollars annually.

All have therefore to depend for their support chiefly on fees and on the proceeds of the lands connected with the churches. Icb'abob (Heb. יekyllב) יִכְּלָבּ, Where is the glory? i. q. There is no glory, i.e. ignoble; Sept. ἵκα-καφίδικα v. τ. ἐκκαθαρισθεί, and even οὐκ ἐκκαθαρισθεί, etc.), the son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. The pains of labor came upon his mother when she heard that the ark of God was taken, that her husband was slain in battle, and that these tidings had proved fatal to his father Eli. They were death-pangs to her; and when those around sought to cheer her, saying, "Fear not, for thou hast borne a son," she only answered by giving him the name of I-čabob, adding, "The glory is departed from Israel!" (1 Sam. iv, 19-22). B.C. 1126. The same again occurs in 1 Sam. xiv, 5, where his son Ahitub is mentioned as the father of the priest Ahiah.

Icy'hys (Grek. ἱχθύς, a fish), in Christian archaeology a symbol of Christ. The word is found on many seals, rings, lamps, and tombeaux belonging to the earliest Christian times. It is formed of the initial letters of our Saviour's name and titles in Greek: Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Νικηφόρος, θέος Υἱός, Σωτήρ, Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, τὸν θεὸν τοῦ σαβατοῦ. Territorial speeches of Christians accustomed to replace these monograms with the name πιστικοὶ, "fishes," to denote that they were born again into Christ's royal family of water. He says, "Xe πιστικοὶ sekundium ἵππου, nostrum Jesum Christum, nam unam simum" (De Epyt. i, 2). See First. Baptismal fonts were ornamented with the figure of a fish; several such remain in French cathedrals. Optatus, bishop of Milevisa, in the 4th century, first pointed out the word ἱχθύς as formed of the initials of Christ's title as above given, and from that time forward "Oriental subtilty repeated to satiety" religious similitudes drawn from the sea. Julius Africanus calls Christ the great fish taken by the fish-hook of God, and whose flesh nourishes the whole world." Augustine says that "ἵππος is the mystical name of Christ, because he draws men deep into the depths of this mortal life—into the abyss of water" (De Civit. Dei). Ico'nium (Ἰκόνιον, of unknown derivation), a town, formerly the capital of Lycaonia (according to Ptol. v, 6, 16; but Ptolemy according to Strabo, xii, 568; Xenoph. Anab. i, 2, 19; Pliny, v, 25; and even Psidius according to Ammian, Marcell. xiv, 2), as it is now, by the name of Koniyeh, of Karamania, in Asia Minor. It is situated in N. lat. 37° 21' E. lon. about 120 miles inland from the Mediterranean. It was on the great line of communication between Ephesus and the western coast of the peninsula on one side, and Tarsus, Antioch, and the Euphrates on the other. We see this indicated by the narrative of Xenophon (L.c.) and the letter of Cicero (ad Fam. iii, 8; v, 20; xv, 4). When the Roman provincial system was matured, some of the most important of these roads was established, and on this line, as may be seen from the map in Leake's Asia Minor. These circumstances should be borne in mind when we trace Paul's journeys through the district. Iconium was a well-chosen place for missionary operations. The apostle's first visit was on his first circuit, in company with Barnabas; and on this occasion he approached it from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay to the west. A.D. 44. From that city he had been driven by the persecution of the Jews (Acts xiii, 50, 51). There were Jews in Iconium also; and Paul's first efforts here, according to his custom, were made in the synagogue (xiv, 1). The results were considerable both among the Hebrew and Gentile population of the place (ibid.). We should notice that the working of miracles in Iconium is emphatically mentioned (xiv, 3). The intrigues of the Jews again drove him away; he was in danger of being stoned, and he withdrew to Lystra and Derbe, in the eastern and wilder part of Lycaonia; and Thither also the enmity of the Jews of Antioch and Iconium pursued him; and at Lystra he was actually stoned and left for dead (xiv, 19). After an interval, however, he returned over the old ground, revisiting Iconium, and another circuit the Churches of which he had founded there (xiv, 21, 22). A.D. 47. These sufferings and difficulties are alluded to in 2 Tim. iii, 11; and this brings us to the consideration of his next visit to this neighborhood, which was the occasion of his first practically associating himself with Timothy. Paul left the missionary work to the native sons of Lycaonia; but he remained on in the region around (iv, 19); and he was there on his second missionary circuit; and, travelling through Cilicia (xiv, 41), and up through the passes of Taurus into Lycaonia, approached Iconium from the east, by Derbe and Lystra (xiv, i, 2). Though apparently a native of Lystra, Timothy was evidently well known to the Christians of Iconium (xiv, 9); and it is not improbable that his circumcision (xvi, 8) and ordination (1 Tim. i, 18; iv, 14; vi, 12; 2 Tim. i, 6) took place there. On leaving Iconium, Paul and his party travelled to the north-west; and the place is not mentioned again in the sacred narrative, though there is little doubt that it was visited on the apostle's return journey in the early part of his third circuit (Acts xvm, 23). From its position it could not fail to be an important centre of Christian influence in the early ages of the Church. The curious apocryphal legend of St. Thecla, of which Iconium is the scene, must not be entirely passed by. The "Acts Pauli et Thecæ" are given in full by Graber (Spicil. vol. i), and by Jones (On the Canon, i, 438-411); and in brief by Conybeare and Howson (St. Paul, i, 197). The Church planted at this place by the apostle continued to flourish (Hierocles, p. 675) until the persecution of the Saracens, and afterwards of the Seljukites, who made it one of their strongholds, it was nearly extinguished. But some Christians of the Greek and Armenian churches, with a Greek metropolitan bishop, are still found in the suburbs of the city, not being permitted to reside within the walls.

Koniyeh is situated at the foot of Mount Taurus (Mannert, vi, 1, p. 195 sq.), upon the border of the lake Trogitis, in a fertile plain, rich in valuable productions, particularly apricots, wine, cotton, flax, and grain. The circumference of the town is between two and three miles, and beyond these are suburbs not much less populous than the town itself, which has in all about 80,000 inhabitants, but according to others 80,000. The walls, strong and lofty, and flanked with square towers, which, at the gates, are placed close together, were built by the Seljukians between the ninth and the sixteenth century. At this point, as may be seen from the map in Leake's Asia Minor. These circumstances should be borne in mind when we trace Paul's journeys through the district. Iconium was a well-chosen place for missionary operations. The apostle's first visit was on his first circuit, in company with Barnabas; and on this occasion he approached it from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay to the west. A.D. 44. From that city he had been driven by the persecution of the Jews (Acts xiii, 50, 51). There were Jews in Iconium also; and Paul's first efforts here, according to his custom, were made in the synagogue (xiv, 1). The results were considerable both among the Hebrew and Gentile population of the place (ibid.). We should notice that the working of miracles in Iconium is emphatically mentioned (xiv, 3). The intrigues of the Jews again drove him away; he was in danger of being stoned, and he withdrew to Lystra and Derbe, in the eastern and wilder part of Lycaonia; and Thither also the enmity of the Jews of Antioch and Iconium pursued him; and at Lystra he was actually stoned and left for dead (xiv, 19). After an interval, however, he returned over the old ground, revisiting Iconium, and another circuit the Churches of which he had founded there (xiv, 21, 22). A.D. 47. These sufferings and difficulties are alluded to in 2 Tim. iii, 11; and this brings us to the consideration of his next visit to this neighborhood, which was the occasion of his first practically associating himself with Timothy. Paul left the missionary work to the native sons of Lycaonia; but he remained on in the region around (iv, 19); and he was there on his second missionary circuit; and, travelling through Cilicia (xiv, 41), and up through the passes of Taurus into Lycaonia, approached Iconium from the east, by Derbe and Lystra (xiv, i, 2). Though apparently a native of Lystra, Timothy was evidently well known to the Christians of Iconium (xiv, 9); and it is not improbable that his circumcision (xvi, 8) and ordination (1 Tim. i, 18; iv, 14; vi, 12; 2 Tim. i, 6) took place there. On leaving Iconium, Paul and his party travelled to the north-west; and the place is not mentioned again in the sacred narrative, though there is little doubt that it was visited by the apostle again in the early part of his third circuit (Acts xvm, 23). From its position it could not fail to be an important centre of Christian influence in the early ages of the Church. The curious apocryphal legend of St. Thecla, of which Iconium is the scene, must not be entirely passed by. The "Acts Pauli et Thecæ" are given in full by Graber (Spicil. vol. i), and by Jones (On the Canon, i, 438-411); and in brief by Conybeare and Howson (St. Paul, i, 197). the devil, a Manichae, and a Docetist." The pope himself, Gregory III, put all the opponents of images under ban; but, despite this and other efforts on his part, Leo's successor, Constantinus Copronymus, went even further than Leo. Having obtained the condemnation of images by the Synod of Constantinople in A.D. 754, he enforced it against the clergy and the most noted of the monks. Many monks, who, together with the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, were in favor of the images, and were unwilling to subscribe to the decrees of the council, were cruelly persecuted. The emperor also enforced this law; but his widow, Irene, one of the basest of women, used the tenderness of the people in favor of image-worship to enable her to ascend the throne. With the aid of the newly-elected patriarch of Constantinople, Terasios, she called a synod at Nicea in 787, wherein the adoration of images by prostration, kissing, and incensing was re-established. Matters remained in this state during the reigns of the emperors Nicephorus and Michael (802–813), although there still were Iconoclasts to be found. But, as during the strife, the adoration of images had made great progress (see D. 837–889), it was caused to be abolished by the Synod of Constantinople, and punished those who persisted in it (mostly monks, with Theodorus Studita at their head). Michael II (821–824), who overthrew Leo, tolerated the worship of images without thereby satisfying the image-worshippers; but, Theophilos, his successor, not only restored them to the government, renewed all the edicts against them. After his death, his widow restored image-worship in 842, and instituted the festival of the Orthodoxy, which is yet kept by the Greek Church in remembrance of this restoration (see Buderus, De festo orthodoxo, Jena, 1729). The Greeks have since retained images in their churches, but without worshipping them. The Latins also decided that the images should be retained, but not worshipped; while the French Church declared most positively against image-worship in the Synod of Gentilicium in 787, and it is on this occasion that St. Bernard presents to the Council of Nicaea a memorial, De ingano imaginum culto (Libri Carolini). Thereupon images were allowed to be retained for purposes of education only. At the Synod of Frankfort in 794, Charlemagne, with the assent of the English Church, caused image-worship to be condemned. After the 9th century there were gradually introduced into the imperial churches image-worship, and it soon became general throughout the West. The Roman Catholic Church continued to favor the practice, and the Council of Trent decided formally in its twenty-fifth session that the images of Christ, of the holy Virgin, and of other saints are to be put in churches; that they ought to receive due veneration, not because they have any divinity or virtue in them, but because honor is thus reflected upon those whom they represent; so that the people, by kissing the images, bowing to them, etc., pray to Christ and honor the saints whom the images represent. This image-worship led to pilgrimages to the shrines of saints great in repute for their power. The Greek Church admits only the painted and raised images, not carved figures, like the Church of Rome. All the Christian sects in the East are given to image-worship with the exception of the Nestorians, the Christians of St. Thomas, and the Russian Rossokhodni. The German Reformers, although opposing image-worship, held somewhat different opinions on the subject: thus Luther tolerated images as an ornament, and also as edifying mementoes, and condemned the destruction of the images and the altars at Wittenberg in 1523. The Swiss have long since abandoned images in any form, or for any purpose, and had them taken out of all the churches—often with great violence, as in the Netherlands. They are not even now tolerated in the Reformed Church, nor in the particular denominations that have sprung from it. Mohammedanism professed image-worship; it even forbids the reproduction of the image of any living being, though it be not for the purpose of worshipping it. Iconoclasts. See Iconoclastm. Iconoclasts. See Image-Worship. Iconography (sceu, image, and graphe, I describe), the science of so-called "Christian art" in the Middle Ages. It includes, therefore, the history and description of images, pictures, mosaics, gems, emblems, etc. There exist in our day many exquisite specimens of Christian iconography, which are preserved in libraries and museums, and are invaluable to us in determining the exact history of this "Christian art." The chracter of the illustrations, the form of the letters, suffice to determine the age and country where the work was produced. Thus a comparison of MSS. of Eastern and Western Europe brings us the several stages which mark the growth of Christian iconography. See Illumination, Art of. The most important modern work on the subject is Didron, Manuel d'iconographie Chrétienne (Paris, 1845, 8vo); trans., into English, Christian Iconography, vol. i (London, 1851, 12mo). Older works are, Pauli, De imag. sacr. et profana (Ingolst. 1594, 4to); Molanus, De pict. et imag. Sacrae (Leuven, 1570); De Historia Sacr. Imagg. et Ficturarum (1619, 12mo); Minter, Simboller der Alten Christen (Altona, 1829, 2 vols. 4to); Wessenberg, Die Christl. Bilder (Constance, 1827). See Image-Worship. J. H. W.

Iconolatry (sceu, image, and larypseus, worship), the worship of the adoration of images. Hence image-worshippers are called Iconolaters, or Iconolasts. See Image-Worship.

Iconomachy. See Iconoclasm.

Iconostasia (skevostasia) is that part of an Eastern Church which corresponds to the altar-rails in English churches. It is often mistaken for the rood-screen (q. v.), which in its general arrangement it resembles, only (the mystery being absolutely to be veiled from the eyes of the people) the panels are solid to the top. The rood-screen separates nave and choir; the iconostasis, however, separates choir and bema. "It has three doors; that in the centre conducting directly to the bema; that to the right of the diakonikon; that of the left to the proteaxis; through which, of course, the great entrance is made. On the right of the central door, on entering, is the throne of our Lord; on the left, that of the mother of God; the others are arranged according to the taste or devotion of the architect or founder. The earliest iconostasis is believed to be the one remaining of the Arian church of the Emperor Constantine, in the Crimea, which probably dates from about A.D. 350. —Neale, Hist. Eastern Church, i, introd. i, 191 sq.

I'da, first abbes of the convent of Argensol, flourished in the first half of the 13th century. She was a remarkable woman, very learned, and acknowledged to have disputed with the most celebrated doctors with great ability. She died in 1226. Her life was written by a monk of Citeaux, but remains in MS. form. —Histoire Lit. de la France, xvii, 251; Hocquet, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxvi, 174.

Id'alah (Heb. 'idyâlah, 'idâlîn, probably eroded; Sept. 'înapa'â), a city near the western border of Zebulon, mentioned between Shimron and Bethlhelm (Josh. xix, 15). According to Schwatka's map, this is the city called Chisd in the Talmud, and is identical with the village Kellâh al-Chirch, six English miles south-west of Shimron or Semumie (Palexstene, p. 172). He doubtless refers to the place marked on Robinson's map as Kultat el-Kerib, in the valley of the Kishon, south-west of Semumie or Semumieh; a position not improbable, especially if marked by the ruins on the north side of the river. Dr. Robinson, who afterwards visited it, calls it "Jeidi, a miserable village with no traces of antiquity" (Lateran Researches, p. 113); but Van de Velde shows that it actually has many marks, although now much obliterated, of being and form, and so goes (Memorie, p. 322).

Idacius or Idathius, named Claritas, a Spanish priest, was born in the first half of the 4th century. After his accession to the bishopric of Emerita he distinguished himself by the intertemperate zeal with which, together with Ithacius (q. v.), bishop of Osonoba, he opposed the heresy of Priscillian (q. v.). He wrote a refutation of the latter's doctrine under the title Apologiaegeticus, which is now lost. In 388, after the death of the emperor Maximiianus, who had persecuted the Priscillianists, Idacius resigned his bishopric. Having subsequently attempted to regain it, he was exiled, and died about the year 392. According to Sulpicius Severus, Idacius' success was less due to his own contemporaries than that of Ithacius. The writings ascribed to him are given in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. v. See Sulpicius Severus, Historia Sacra; Isidore of Seville, De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis; Antoninus, Bibl. Historiae, iv, 172; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxix, 775; Neander, Ch. Hist., ii, 111 sq.; Kuutz, Ch. Hist., i, 214 sq. See Priscillianists.

Idacius of Lamego (Lamecensis), who became bishop of Galicia in 427, distinguished himself by his opposition to the Manicheans, whom he sought to drive from Spain. He is supposed to have died in 468. He is the author of a history, a continuation of the Chronicles of St. Hieronymus, beginning with the year 387 and ending with 468. The assertion that this work originated with Pelagius, bishop of Osied, in the 12th century, is by no means satisfactorily proved. It has often been printed and annotated, as by Sirmond, Opp. vol. ii; Bouquet, Script. Fratm, vol. i; and best by Florence Esp. Sarrada, iv, 945 sq. He is also supposed to be the author of Patri consolares.—Asbach, Kirch.-Lex. iii, 402.

Id'bash (Heb. Yid'bash, יִדְבָּשׁ, prob. honeyed); Sept. ίαυνήβατις v. r. יָבָֽשָׁא, Vulg. Jdebaso, a descendant of Judah, who, with his two brothers and a sister (the Tadepovites), are said (1 Chron. iv, 5, according to the Authorized Version) "of the fathers of the fathers, probably meaning of the lineage of the founder of that place, or perhaps they were themselves its settlers. B.C. cir. 1612. See JEHIZKIEL 2.

Id'do, the name of several men in the Old Testament, of different forms in the Hebrew.

1. Id'do (2 Chr. 7, timely, or born to a festival); Sept. 'Addi, Vulg. Addo), a Levite, son of Joah and father of Zerah (1 Chron. vi, 21); called more accurately perhaps ADAIAH in ver. 1.

3. Id'bo (772), a prolonged form of No. 1; Sept. 'Addo, Vulg. Addo), the father of Ahinadab, which latter was Solomon's purveyor in the district of Mahanaim (1 Kings iv, 14). B.C. cir. 995.

4. Id'bo (772), same as first name, 2 Chron. xii, 15; xiii, 22; Sept. 'Addo, Vulg. Addo) or Yedo (772), 2 Chron. ix, 29, margin, but Yedo (772), text; but less accurate forms for the last name; Sept. 'Iwob, Addo, A. Vers. 'Ido), a prophet of Judah, who wrote the history of Reboam and Abijah; or rather, perhaps, who, in conjunction with Seraiah, kept the public rolls during their reigns (2 Chron. xii, 15); and who in that capacity recorded certain predictions against Jeroboam (2 Chron. ix, 29; although Bertheau, ad loc., and Ewald, Int. Gesch., 3d ed., i, 216, think this a different person). B.C. post 553. It seems from 2 Chron. xiii, 22 that he named his book Yodo, Midrash, or "Or Exposition." Josephus (Ant. xvi, 9, 1) states that this Idbo was the same as the Iddo who was sent from Shechem to Bethel, and consequently the same that was slain by a lion for disobedience to his instructions (1 Kings xiii); and many commentators have followed this statement.—Kitto. He is also identified with Oded (see Jerem. on 2 Chron. xv, 1).

5. Yido' (772), same name as last, Zech. i, 5, elsewhere Yod2, id.; but Yodo', id., apparently by error, in Neh. xii, 16; Sept. 'Addo, but 'Ido in Neh. xii, 4, and 'A'da in Neh. xii, 16; Vulg. Addo, but 'Ido in Neh. xii, 16), the father of Barachiah and grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i, 1, 7; comp. Ezra v, vi; iv, 14; Neh. xii, 16). He was one of the chief priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii, 1). B.C. 536.

6. Id'do' (772), mishap; Sept. omits, Vulg. Eddo), chief of the Jews of the Captivity established at Cæsiphia, a place of which it is difficult to determine the position. It was to him that Ezra sent a requisition for Levites and Nethinim, none of whom had yet joined his caravan. Thirty-eight Levites and 250 Nethinim responded to his call (Ezra viii, 17-20). B.C. 465. It is not improbable that this Iddo was the same as that of the Nethinim, descended from those Gibeonites who were charged with the servile labors of the tabernacle and Temple. This is one of several circumstances which indicate that the Jews, in their several colonies under the Exile, were ruled by the heads of their nation, and allowed the free exercise of their worship.

Idealism (from идеa), a term given to several systems of philosophy, and therefore varying in its significance according to the meaning which they severally attach to the word идеa. Until the 17th century, when Descartes came forward with his Discourse on Method (1637), it had the significance which Plato gave to it, and was understood to refer to the Platonic doctrine of eternal forms (идей) existing in the divine mind, according to which the world and all sensible things were framed. "Plato agreed with the rest of the ancient philosophers in this—that all things consist of matter and form, and that the form, the matter of which all things were made existent from eternity without form; but he likewise believed that there are eternal forms of all possible things which exist without matter, and to those eternal and immaterial forms he gave the name of ideas. In the Platonic sense, then, идеa were the patterns according to which the deity fashioned the phenomenal or etypical world" (Reid, Intellectual Powers, Esq. i, chap. ii). The word was used in this sense not only in philosophy, but also in literature, down to the 17th century, as in Spenser, Shakespeare, Hooker, and Milton. Thus Milton, in his Paradise Lost:—

word which could only properly suggest an a priori scheme, deducing our knowledge from the intellect, has in France become the name peculiarly distinctive of that philosophy of mind which exclusively derives our knowledge from the intellect. In the terms sensation, phantasm, etc., with reference to the mental representation of external things, as had previously been done, Descartes adopted the word idea.

In this use of the word he was followed by other philosophers, as Leibnitz and Locke, who desired the word to stand for the thing in itself, without any reference to the mind, or to any sensation, ever a man thinks." Hence the mental impression that we are supposed to have when thinking of the sun, without seeing the actual object, is called our idea of the sun. The idea is thus in contrast with the sensation, or the feeling that we have when the senses are engaged, and immediately call the object.

The sensation is the result of the pressure of the object, and declares an external reality; the impression persisting after the thing has gone, and recoverable by mental causes without the original, is the idea. Although the word in this application (289) is thus so guarded as to lead to no bad consequences, Reid (Jusfur. Ew. Ed., i, chap. i) most vehemently protested against its use in such a sense, holding that it gave countenance to the setting up of a new and fictitious element in the operations of the mind. But this raises the great question of the nature of knowledge, of the knowledge of an external world. Bishop Berkeley (q. v.), however, must be regarded as the true representative of modern idealism. He held that "the qualities of supposed objects cannot be perceived distinct from the mind that perceives them; and these qualities, it will be allowed, are all that we can call of such objects. If, therefore, there were external bodies, it is impossible we should ever know it; and if there were not, we should have exactly the same reason for believing there were as we now have. All, therefore, which really exists is spirit, or "the thinking principle"—ourselves, our fellow-men, and God. What we call ideas are not imparted to us by God in a certain order of succession, which order of successive presentation is what we mean by the laws of nature." This mode of speculation of bishop Berkeley, which he defended with so much acuteness, and which Lewis (Hist. of Phil., 1819, ii. 519) at least was led to believe that the bishop's critics misunderstood him, he held to be the only possible true view of our nature and the government of God. But there is no question that, whatever benefits it may have bestowed upon the bishop and his immediate disciples, it has been found by every one of us, as we take away the grounds of a belief which is both natural and universal, and which cannot, at first, be even doubted without a severe exercise of thought, it shook men's faith in all those primary truths which are at once the basis of their knowledge and the guides of their conduct. It seemed to throw on distrust of the evidence of the senses, as if really invalidated the spontaneous conclusions which every man inevitably forms from that evidence. This theory is conclusively proved by the conduct of Hume; for, if a main pillar of the edifice could so easily be shaken, what was there to hinder from the same result the whole fabric of our knowledge, where Berkeley began, Hume proceeded much farther, and left unassailed hardly one article of human faith. He denied the reality not only of the object perceived, but of the mind perceiving. He reduced all thinking and action to a succession of rapidly flowing ideas, one being knowing only at the instant it is interfused to consciousness, and then fading away, leaving no surely recognizable trace of itself on the memory, and affording no ground for an anticipation of the future. We do not even keep, he maintains, that any one thing depends upon another in the relation of an effect to its cause.

We know no true cause whatever, and our only idea of power is a fiction and a blunder. The conclusion of the whole matter, according to his philosophy, is, not the mere negation of this or that positive belief, but universal distrust of the human faculties, considered as means for the acquisition of truth. They contradict each other, and leave nothing certain except that nothing can be known.

In 1771 Kant, Fichte, and Schelling, who are often classed among the idealistic school, used the word idea in the Platonic or transcendental sense. Hegel, on the other hand, modified the use of the word to such an extent that his idealism does not only deserve to be called absolute-idealism, but much more so, because it is no less than the doctrine of the Eleatics anciently, or of Spinoza in modern times. It is thus apparent, from the looseness of the application of the word idea, and the danger of its not conveying a definite signification, that we need a general word in the English language which may more accurately express contrast to sensation or to actuality. But, as no better has yet been found, it is difficult to avoid the use of ideality, "being what is common to memory and to imagination, and expressing the mind as not under the present impression of real objects, but as by its own tenacity and associating powers, having those objects to all practical ends before its view. Thus all our sensations, whether of sight, hearing, touch, taste, or smell, and all the feelings that we have in the exercise of our moving energies, become transformed into ideas when, without the real presence of the origin of the one or the other, we are of the way of pursuit or avoidance, or can discriminate and compare them, nearly as if in their first condition as sensation." Sir W. Hamilton, in his Lectures on Logic (1, 126), has endeavored to avoid employing the word, but other writers on mental philosophy have freely adopted it in the above acceptance. See Chambers, Cyclop. v, 510 sq.; Krauth's Elements, Vocab. of Philos. p. 222 sq.; Brande and Cox, Dict. of Science, Lit. and Art, ii, 189; Morell, History of Philos. p. 55 sq.; Lewis, Hist. of Philos. Idee (ἰδέα, private men), a term applied by some early writers to laymen in distinction from ministers (κληρικοὶ). Chrysostom (Homil. 55) and Theodoret (Comm. in 1 Cor. employed the word in this signification, and show that in the first instance Paul (1 Cor. vii. 13) designates a private person, whether learned or unlearned. So also Origen, Contra Cels. vii, p. 334. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. bk. i, ch. v, § 6. See Laity.

Ideea (Γ. ἰδέας) is a term sometimes used in the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity of the Godhead to designate the property (Lat. proprietas) of each divine person. This must, however, not be confounded with the divine attributes (eternity, omnipotence, omnipotence, etc.), for they are inherent in the divine essence, and are the common possession of all the divine hypostases, while the ideiotes, on the other hand, is a peculiarity of the hypostataxia, and therefore cannot be communicated or transferred from one to another.—Schaaf, Ch. Hist. iii, 675. See Trinity.

Idie (ἰδεῖν, to see, to behold), also deceitful; ἴδιος, to be weak, in Niph. to be lazy, Exod. v, 8, 17; ἴδιος, indulgence, Prov. xxxix, 27; ἴδιος, remitting, Eccles. x, 18; ἴδιος, to rest, Ezek. xvi. 49; ἴδιος, quaintly. Matt. xxi. 13; being known only at the instant it is interfused to consciousness, and then fading away, leaving no surely recognizable trace of itself on the memory, and affording no ground for an anticipation of the future. equivalent to vain, and hence wicked language. J. A. H. Titman, in an extended criticism (On the principal Causes of Forced Interpret. of the N. T., printed in the Amer. Jib. Repa, for 1881, p. 481-484), objects that it violates the native meaning of the word, which rather denotes an empty, inconsiderate, and hence insincere conduct, appearance, context, which is aimed at the hypocritical Pharisees. On the other hand, the usual interpretation is supported by the actual occurrence of παραπαντα, wicked, in the parallel verse 35, and by the usage of other Greek writers, e. g., Symmachus in Lev. xix, 7, for בָּשָׁם, where Sept. δικαστήριον; Xenoph. Mem. i, 1, 57; Cicero, de Fatt. 12. (See Kuinol, ad loc.) The term is probably intended to be of wide significance, so as to include both these senses, namely, lewdy and calumny, as being both species of untruth and heedlessly uttered, yet productive of mischief.

Idleness, aversion from labor. The idle man is, in every view, both foolish and criminal. He lives not to God. Idleness was not made for man, nor man for idleness. A small measure of reflection might convince every one that for some useful purpose he was sent into the world. Man is placed at the head of all things here below. He is furnished with a great preparation of facilities and powers. He is enlightened by reason with much wisdom and discoveries; and even to himself he is revealed to consider himself as ransomed by the death of Christ from misery, and intended to rise to a still higher rank in the universe of God. In such a situation, thus distinguished, thus favored, and assisted by his Creator, does he answer the end of his being if he aim at no improvement? If he pursue no useful design, is he to live for no other purpose than to indulge in sloth, to consume the fruits of the earth, and spend his days in a dream of vanity? Existence is a sacred trust, and he who thus misemploys and squanders it away is treacherous to the great Giver of all good. He who will not look around him, and consider the whole universe full of active powers. Action is, so to speak, the genius of nature. By motion and exertion, the system of being is preserved in vigor. By its different parts always acting in subordination to each other, the perfection of the whole is carried on. The heavenly bodies perpetually revolve. Day and night incessantly repeat their appointed course. Continual operations are performing on the earth and in the waters. Nothing stands still. All is alive and stirring throughout the universe. In the midst of this animated and busy scene, is man alone to remain idle in his station? It is not sufficient for him to be inattentive and slothful being in the creation, when in so many ways he might improve his own nature, might advance the glory of the God who made him, and contribute his part to the general good? The idle live not to the world and their fellow-creatures any more than to God. If any man had a title to stand alone, and to be independent of his fellows, he might consider himself as at liberty to indulge in solitary ease and sloth, without being responsible to others for the manner in which he chooses to live. But there is no such person in the world. We are connected with each other by various relations, which create a chain of mutual dependence that reaches from the highest to the lowest station in society. Without a perpetual circulation of active duties and offices, which all are required to perform in their turn, the order and happiness of the world could not be maintained. Such offices are not for the benefit of the superiors than those of the inferiors. Each have demands and claims upon the other; and he who, in any situation of life, refuses to act his part, and to contribute his share to the general stock of felicity, deserves to be proscribed from society as an unworthy member. "If any man will not work," says Paul (2 Thess. iii, 10), "neither shall he eat." If he will do nothing to advance the purposes of society, he has no right to enjoy its benefits.

The idle man lives not to himself with any more advantage than he lives to the world. Though he imagines that he leaves to others the drudgery of life, and betakes himself to enjoyment and ease, yet he enjoys no true pleasure. He shuts the door against improvement of every kind, whether of mind, body, or fortune. Sloth enfeebles equally the bodily and the mental powers. His character falls into contempt. His fortune is consumed. His name is confounded, and his nameless contempt spread itself over his whole situation. Idleness is the inlet to licentiousness, vice, and immorality. It destroys the principles of religion, and opens a door to sin and wickedness. Every man who recollects his conduct must know that his hours of idleness always proved the hours most dangerous to virtue. He knew that this criminal desire of slothful and guilty passions were suggested, and designs were formed, which, in their issue, dishonour his whole life. Habitual idleness, by a silent and secret progress, undermines every virtue in the soul. More violent passions run their course and terminate. They are like moody torrents, which foam, and swell, and bear down everything before them; but, after having overflowed their banks, their impetuosity subsides, and they return, by degrees, into their natural channel. Sloth resembles the slowly-flowing putrid stream, which stagnates in the marshy places, where venomous animals and poisonous plants, and infects with pestilential vapours the whole surrounding country. Having once tainted the soul, it leaves no part of it sound, and, at the same time, it gives not to conscience those alarms which the eruptions of bolder and fiercer emotions often occasion. Nothing can return to the soul an esteem for the enjoyment of life as a relaxed and indolent habit of mind. He who knows not what it is to labor, knows not what it is to enjoy. The happiness of human life depends on the regular prosecution of some laudable purpose or object, which keeps awake and enlivens all our powers. It is agreeable, but it is only from preceding labors that rest acquires its true relish. When the mind is suffered to remain in continued inaction, all its powers decay: it soon languishes and sickens; and the pleasures which it proposed to obtain from rest terminate in tedium and insipidity. Idol, properly an outward object adored as divine, or as the symbol of deity. See Idolatry.

I. Classical and Scriptural terms: Having physical reference to such objects.—As a large number of different Hebrew words have been rendered in the A. V. either by idol or image, and that by no means uniformly (besides one or more in Greek more uniformly translated), it will be of some advantage to attempt to discriminate between them, and assign, as nearly as the two languages will allow, the English equivalents for each. See Image.

(I) Abstract terms, which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with idolatry, and stand out as a protest of the language against its enormities.

(i) General terms of doubtful significance.—1. בָּאֶל, idol, is thought by some to have a sense akin to that of בָּאֶל, sheker, "falsehood," with which it stands in parallelism in Job xiii, 4, and would therefore much resemble ārem, as applied to an idol. It is generally derived from the unused root בָּאֶל, to be empty or vain. Deitzlach (on Hab. ii, 18) derives it from the negative particle בָּאֶל, of, "die Nichitigen"; but according to Frisat (Handw. s. v.) it is a diminutive of בָּאֶל, "god," the additional syllabic indicating the greatest contempt. In this case the signification above mentioned is a subordinate one, and does not mean the deity, but only a small image of the god, which was consulted as an oracle among the Egyptians and Phenicians (Isa. xix, 3; Jer. xiv, 14). It is certainly used of the idols of Noph or Memphis (Ezek. xxx, 18). In strong contrast with Jehovah, it appears in Ps. x. 5; xviii, 7, the contrast probably being heightened by the resemblance between διλις and δελίον. A somewhat similar play upon words is observable in Hab. ii, 18, διλις δελίον, "useless idols." See El.

2. διλις, διλιτία, διλιίτις, also a term of contempt, of uncertain origin (Ezek. xxx, 13), but probably derived from דַּלְלָה, to roll, as dungh, hence refuse. The Rabbinical authorities, referring to such passages as Ezek. iv, 2; Zeph. i, 17, have favored the interpretation given in the margin of the A.V. to Deut. xxix, 17, "dungy gods" (Vulg. "somnolentes, sordes idolorum," 1 Kings xv, 13); Jahn, connecting it with דַּלְלָה, דַּלָּה, "to roll," applies it to the stocks of trees of which idols were made, and in mockery called διλιίτις, "rolling things" (a volendo, he says, though it is difficult to see the point of his remark). Gesenius, repudiating the derivation from the Aramaic דיל, "to be great, illustrious," gives his preference to the rendering "stones, stone gods," thus deriving it from דל, "a heap of stones," and in this he is followed by Fitts, who translates דילית by the German "Steinhäufen." The expression is applied, principally in Ezekiel, to false gods and their symbols (Deut. xxix, 17; Ezek. vii, 10, etc.). It stands side by side with other contemptuous terms in Ezek. xvi, 56; xx, 8, as, for example, שְּכֶקֶת, "filth," or "abomination" (Ezek. vii, 10), and cognate terms. See Dung. May not דל also mean sarabæi, the commonest of Egyptian idols? The sense of dung is appropriate to the dung-barrow, the meaning of rolling is doubtless, for, if the meaning of the verb be retained, we should, in this form, rather expect a passive sense, "a thing rolled," but it may be observed that these grammatical rules of the sense of derivatives are not always to be strictly insisted on, for, Sidon, דַּלְלָה, though held to signify "the place of fishing," is, in the list of the Nephilim, the name of a man, "the fisherman," (A.V. "seaorman") 1 Chron. iv, 17. That this application of the word is used may perhaps be conjectured from the occurrence of דל or דיל, which, if meaning little gods, would aptly describe the pigmy פְּתֵחַ-סֵקְרָרִיס, Ptahe Sokar-Octaris, of Memphis. Ezekiel uses the term וֹלֶל of the idols of Egypt which the Israelites were commanded to put away at or about the time of the Exodus, but did not, and seem to have carried into the Desert, for the same word is used, unqualified by any word to signify any one of the worshiped by them in the Desert (xx, 7, 8, 16, 18, 24); it is, however, apparently employed also for all the idols worshipped in Canaan by the Israelites (ver. 31; xxiii, 37). Sarabæi were so abundant among the Egyptians and Phoenicians that it may be well to warn them that they may not have been employed also in the worship of the Canaanitish false gods; but it cannot be safely supposed, without further evidence, that the idols of Canaan were virtually termed sarabæi. See Brittle.

(ii.) General terms of known signification.—8. דִּבְנָה, d'ben, rendered elsewhere "nought," "vanity," "impotence," "wickedness," "sorcery," etc., and only once "idol" (Isa. lxvi, 3). The primary idea of the root seems to be εὐπροσφέρεσθαι, nothingness, as of breath or vapor; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief; and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence הָרָע denotes a vain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols, and the consequences of their worship. The character of the word may be learnt from its associates. It stands in parallelism with וֹלָל, ephes (Isa. xii, 29), which, after undergoing various modifications, comes at length to signify "nothing," with הָרָע, הָרָע, "breath" or "vapor," itself applied as a term of contempt to the objects of idolatrous reverence (Deut. xxxii, 21; 1 Kings xv, 13; Ps. xxvi, 6; Jer. vii, 19; x, 8); with יָרָע, shadr, "nothingness," "vanity," and with לֹא, lek. "falsehood" (Zech. x, 2); all indicating the utter worthless-lessness of the idols to whom homage was paid, and the false and delusive nature of their worship. It is employed in an abstract sense, to denote idolatry in general, in 1 Sam. xv, 25. There is much significance in the change of name from Bethel to Beth-aven, the great center of idolatry in Israel (Hos. iv, 15). See Beth-Aven.

4. דִּבְנָה, דִּבְנָה, "filth," "impurity," especially applied, like the cognate הָרָע, הָרָע, to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness (Ezek. xxxvii, 25; Nah. iii, 6), such as food offered in sacrifice to idols (Zech. ix, 7; comp. Acts xv, 20, 29). As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was surrounded; and, hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship and also to their worshippers, who partook of the impurity, and thus "became loathsome like their love," the foul Baal-Peor (Hos. ix, 10). See Abomination.

In the same connection must be noticed, though not actually rendered "image" or " idol," פֶּה, פֶּה, "shame," or "shameful thing" (A.V. Ye. 'amer, 8; Hos. ix, 10), applied to Baal or Baal-Peor, as characterizing the obscenity of his worship. See Baal-Peor.

5. יָרָע, יָרָע, "horror" or "terror," and hence an object of horror or terror (Jer. i, 88), in reference either to the hideousness of the idols or to the gross character of their worship. In this respect it is closely connected with—

7. רָעָה, רָעָה, "sheepfold," a "fright," "horror," applied to the idol of Maachah, probably of wood, which Aaz cut down and burned (1 Kings xv, 13; 2 Chron. xv, 16), and which was unquestionably the Phallus, the symbol of the productive power of nature (Movers, Phon. i, 571; Selden, De Dīa Syr. ii, 5), and the nature-goddess Asbe- ra. Allusion is supposed to be made to this in Jer. vi, 5, and Epist. de Phil. 70. In 2 Chron. xxxiv, 15, the Vulg. render "simulacrum Priapi" (comp. Horaeon, "torments", unque maximum formosum"). The Sept. had a different reading, which it is not easy to determine. They translate, in 1 Kings xv, 13, the same word both by הָרָעָה (with which corresponds the Syriac id, "a festival," reading, perhaps, מֶפֶּה, a seraph, as in 2 Kings x, 20; Jer. ix, 2) and sarabæa, while in Chronicles it is סָּךַּבָּה. That the word is used may perhaps be conjectured from the occurrence of רָעָה, which, if meaning little gods, would aptly describe the pigmy פְּתֵחַ-סֵקְרָרִיס, of Memphis. Ezekiel uses the term וֹלָל of the idols of Egypt which the Israelites were commanded to put away at or about the time of the Exodus, but did not, and seem to have carried into the Desert, for the same word is used, unqualified by any word to signify any one of the worshiped by them in the Desert (xx, 7, 8, 16, 18, 24); it is, however, apparently employed also for all the idols worshipped in Canaan by the Israelites (ver. 31; xxiii, 37). Sarabæi were so abundant among the Egyptians and Phoenicians that it may be well to warn them that they may not have been employed also in the worship of the Canaanitish false gods; but it cannot be safely supposed, without further evidence, that the idols of Canaan were virtually termed sarabæi. See Brittle.

We now come to the consideration of those words which more directly apply to the images or idols as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshipped through them.

(i.) Terms indicating the form of idols.—8. דִּבְנָה or דִּבְנָה, dc mel, with which Gesenius compares as cognate מָשָּׂך, מָשָּׂך, and דִּבְנָה, telem, the Lat. simulacrum and Gr. θηματικόν, signifies a "likeness," or "semblance." The Tar- gum in Deut. iv, 16 gives מְשָּׂך, מְשָּׂך, "image," as the equivalent of דִּבְנָה. In Ezek. viii, 3, 5 it is rendered by דִּבְנָה, telem, "image." In the latter passages the Syriac has קְוָצָת, "a statue" (the stàtus of the Septuagint), which more properly corresponds to ματαιότης (see No. 13, below); and in Deut. genis, "kind" (γίγων). The passage in 2 Chron. xxxiiii, 7 is rendered "images of four faces," the latter words representing the one under consideration, instead of the three which Ezek. xxxiii, 18 applies as "carved images," following the Sept. τοῖς ἄνθρωποις. On the whole, the Gr. εἰκὼν of Deut. iv, 16; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 7, and the "simulacrum" of the Vulg. (2 Chron. xxxiii, 15) most nearly resemble the Heb. semel. See Carved.

9. דִּבְנָה, telem (Chald. id., and דִּבְנָה, telem), is by all lexographers, ancient and modern, connected with ד, ד, "falsehood." It is the "image" of God in which man was created (Gen. i, 27; comp. Wisd. ii, 23), distinguished from מִדָּמִית, demmith, or "likeness," as the "image" from the "idea" which it represents (Schmidt, De Imag. Dei in Hom. p. 84), though it would be rash to insist upon this distinction. In the N. T. έικόν appears to represent the latter (Col iii. 10; compare the Sept. at Gen. v. 1), as οὐαμοία the former of the two words (Rom. i. 23; viii. 29; Phil. ii. 7), but in Heb. x. 1, έικόν is opposed to κάτα as the substance to the unsubstantial form, of which it is the perfect representative. The Sept. render demmith by οὐαμοίας, οὐαμοία, "image," but in John and Taddem most frequently έικόν, though οὐαμοίας, εἰκὼν, and εἶκος also occur. But whatever abstract term may best define the meaning of τάσις, it is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects, and is applied to figures of gold and silver (1 Sam. vi. 5; Numb. xxxiii. 52; Dan. iii. 1), such as the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon walls (Ezek. xxxiii. 14), "image" perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. Applied to the human countenance (Dan. iii. 19), it signifies the "expression," and corresponds to the idea of Matt. xxviii. 5, though demmith agrees rather with the Platonic usage of the latter word. See GRAVEN.

10. מִדָּמִית, rendered "image" in Job iv. 16; elsewhere "similitude" (Deut. iv. 12), "likeness" (Deut. v. 8),"or shape" would be better. In Deut. iv. 16 it is in parallelism with רָבָּן, tabniḥ, literally "build," hence "plan" or "model" (2 Kings xvi. 10; compare Exod. xx. 4; Numb. xii. 8).

11. מִדָּמִית, ataš, atâb, atāb, eitāb (Jer. xxii. 28), or מַדָּמִית, madām (Isa. xlvii. 5), "a figure," all derived from a root מָדָט, "to work" or "make" (akin to בָּטָה, batâh, and the like), are terms applied to idols as expressing that their origin was due to the labor of man. In this verb its derived senses indicates the sorrow and trouble consequent upon severe labor, but the latter seems to be the radical idea. If the notion of sorrow were most prominent, the words as applied to idols might be compared with what above. Isa. livii. 8 is rendered in the Peshito Syriac "idols" (A. V. "labors"), but the reading was evidently different. In Psa. LXXXIX.

24. מִדָּמִית is "idolatry."

12. מִדָּמִית, tibr, once only applied to an idol (Isa. xvii. 16; Sept. נַכְּלָא, as if מִדָּמִית, igim). The word usually denotes "a pang," but in this instance is probably connected with the roots מִדָּמִית, tibr, and מִדָּמִית, gaddar, and signifies a "sign" or "mark," and hence an "idol."

13. מִדָּמִית, matstebhā, anything set up, a "statue (= מִדָּמִית, netib), Jer. xliii. 18,) applied to a memorial of stones like those erected by Jacob on four several occasions (Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxi. 45; xxxiv. 14, 20) to commemorate a crisis in his life, or to mark the grave of Rachel. Such were the stones set up by Joshua (Josh. iv. 9) after the passage of the Jordan, and at Shechem (xxix. 26), and by Samuel when victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. vii, 12). When solemnly dedicated they were anointed with oil, and libations were poured upon them. The word is applied to the obelisks which stood at the entrance to the temple of Baal at Heliopolis (Jer. xlix. 13), two of which were a hundred cubits high and eight broad, each of a single stone (Herod. i. 111). It is also used of the statues of Baal (2 Kings iii. 2), whether of stone (2 Kings x. 27) or wood (id. 26), which stood in the innermost recess of the temple at Samaria. The occurrence of Chabab as the name of Baal in the Phoenician and Palmyrene inscriptions in the sense of "Dominus Solaris," and its after application to the statues or columns erected for his worship. Spencer (De Legg. Heb. ii. 25), and after him Michaelis (Suppl. ad Lex. Hebr. s. v.), maintained that it signified statues or columns set up in honor of him and his grandson. The Movers (Phin. i. 441) concludes with good reason that the sun-god Baal and the idol "Chabman" are not essentially different. In his discussion of Chabman... says, "These images of the fire-god were placed on foreign or non-Israelite altars, in conjunction with the symbols of the nature of Asherah, or ash'taroth (2 Chron. xiv, 3, 5; xxxiv, 4, 7; Isa. xvi, 9; xxvii, 9), as was otherwise usual with Baal and Asherah. They are mentioned with the Asherim, and the latter are coupled with the statues of Baal (1 Kings xiv, 28; 2 Kings xxiii, 14). The echummaim and statues are used promiscuously (compare 2 Kings xxiii, 14, and 2 Chron. xxxiv, 4; 2 Chron. xiv, 3 and 5), but are never spoken of together. Such are the steps by which he arrives at his conclusion. He is supported by the Palmyrene inscription at Oxford, alluded to above, which has been thus rendered: 'This column (なぜ, Chummadnī), and this altar, the sons of Malcho, etc., have erected and consecrated, to Baal and Asherah, or σεραθων καὶ κυρια’ and leaves the word untраналanged in the strange form ἀκι-βατης. From the expressions in Ezek. vi, 4, 6, and Lev. xxvi, 80, it may be inferred that these columns, which perhaps represented a rising flame of fire and stood upon the altar of Baal (2 Chron. xxxiv, 4), were of wood or stone. See ASHTEIA.

15. מְשַׁלָּח, maskitāh, occurs in Lev. xxvi, 1; Num. xxvii, 52; Ezek. xliii, 12: "dovice," most nearly suits all passages (compare Psal. lxxxii, 7; Prov. xvii, 11; xxv, 11). This word has been the fruitful cause of as much dispute as the preceding. The general opinion appears to be that מְשַׁלָּח signifies a stone with figures graven upon it. Ben-Zeb explains it as "a stone with figures or hieroglyphics carved upon it," and so Michaelis; and it is maintained by Movers (Psefib, ii, 100) that the bas-tylos, or columns with painted figures, the "lapides effigii" of Minucius Felix (c. 8), are these "stones of device," and that the characters engraved on them are the ιπα σοσια, or characters sacred to the several deities. The invention of these characters, which is ascribed to Tammuz, he conjectures originated with the Sirene. Genesius explains it as a stone with the image of an idol, Baal or Astarte, and refers to his Mon. Phen. p. 21-24, for others of a similar character. Rashi (on Lev. xxxi, 1) derives it from the root נְשָׁל, "to cover," "because they cover the floor with a pavement of stones." The Targum and Syriac, Lev. xxvi, 1, give "stone of devotion," and the former, in Num. xxxvii, 30, "the stone which is set up for the sacrifices." The Syriac renders "their objects of devotion." For the former the Sept. has λόγος σοσια, and for the latter τας σοσιας αὐτῶν, connecting the word with the root נְשָׁל, "to look," a circumstance which has induced Saalschütz (Mos. Rech. p. 582-585) to conjecture that enen maskith was originally a smooth elevated stone employed for the purpose of obtaining from it a free erect, vi, and of offering prayer in prostration upon it to the deities of heaven. Hence, generally, he concludes it signifies a stone of prayer or devotion, and the "chambers of imagery" of Ezek. viii, 7 are "chambers of devotion." The renderings of the last mentioned passage in the Sept. and Targum are curious as pointing to a various reading, נְשָׁל, or, more probably, נְשָׁל. See IMAGERY.

16. מְשַׁל דֵּש, teraphim. See TERAPEHM.

(ii.) The terms which follow have regard to the material and workmanship of the idol rather than to its character as an object of worship.

17. פָּסֵל, pe'el, usually translated in the Authorized Version "graven or carved image." In two passages it is ambiguously rendered "quarries" (Judg. iii, 19, 26), after the Targum, but there seems to be no reason for departing from the ordinary signification. In the majority of instances the Sept. has χρυσωρί, once χρυσωρία. The verb is employed to denote the finishing which the stone received at the hands of the masons after it had been rough-hewn from the quarries (Exod. xxxiii, 4; 1 Kings v, 32). It is probably a later usage which has applied pesel to a figure cast in metal, as in Isa. xi, 9; xiv, 10. (More probably still, pesel denotes by anticipation the molten image in a later stage, after it had been trimmed into shape by the caster.) These "sculptured" images were apparently of wood, iron, or stone, covered with gold or silver (Deut. vii, 25; Isa. xxx, 22; Hab. ii, 19), the more costly being of solid metal (Isa. xi, 19). They could be burned (Deut. vii, 5; Isa. xiv, 20; 2 Chron. xxxv, 4), or cut down (Deut. vii, 25), or destroyed (2 Chron. xxxiv, 7), or broken in pieces (Isa. xxi, 9). In making them, the skill of the wise iron-smith (Deut. xxvii, 15; Isa. xlv, 20) or carpenter, and of the gold-smith, was employed (Judg. xvii, 5, 4; Isa. xli, 7), the former supplying the rough mass of iron beaten into shape on his anvil (Isa. xxxvii, 12), while the latter overlaid it with plates of gold and silver, probably from Tarshish (Jer. ix, 9), and decorated it with silver chains. The image thus formed received the further adornment of embroidered robes (Ezek. xvi, 18), to which possibly allusion may be made in Isa. iii, 19. Brass and clay were among the materials employed for the same purpose (Dan. ii, 33; v, 23). (Images of glazed pottery have been found in Egypt [Wilkinson, Anc. Eq. iii, 90; comp. Wiss. xix, 8].) A description of the three great images of Babylon on the top of the temple of Belus will be found in Jer. xxxix, 1-3 (comp. Jer. xxxiv, 3). Such images, mentioned in Ezek. xvi, 10-20, that it is only necessary to refer to that passage, and we are at once introduced to the mysteries of idol manufacture, which, as at Ephesus, "brought no small gain unto the craftsmen." See SHEMIK.

18. פָּסֵל or נְשָׁל, nsel, and פָּסֵל, masaketh, are evidently synonymous (Isa. xii, 29; xlvi, 5; Jer. xiv, 14) in later Hebrew, and denote a "molten" image. Masakoth is frequently used in distinction from pesel or pelīn (Deut. xxvii, 15; Judg. xvii, 3, etc.). The golden calf which Aaron made was fashioned with "the girdle," מְשַׁל גֶּרֶב, but it is not quite clear for what purpose the graver was used (Exod. xxxiii, 4). The cheret (comp. καρατταῖα) appears to have been a sharp-pointed instrument, used like the stylos for a writing implement (Isa. viii, 1). Whether then Aaron, by the help of the cheret, gave to the molten mass the shape of a calf, or whether he did it with the help of the girdle, is a question of little importance, as the carving hieroglyphics upon it, has been thought doubtful. The Syr. has ṭāpāh (ὕπαστος), "the mould," for cheret. But the expression פָּסֵל, ray-gater, decides that it was by the cheret, in whatever manner employed, that the shape of a calf was given to the metal. See MOLTE.
IDOLATRY

IDOLATRY is divine honor paid to any created object. It is thus a wider term than image-worship (q. v.). For many of the earlier and more primitive forms of idolatry, see Volbeck, Index Programmatis, p. 108 sq.

We find the idea of idolatry expressed in the O.T. by צב (a lie, Psa. xiv. 5; Amos ii. 4), or נָן (nunnity), and still often by תָּנָא (abomination). In after times the Jews designated it as רֶפֶנִים (foreign worship). Thus we see that it had no name indicative of its nature, for the Biblical expressions are more a monothetic qualification of divine worship than a denunciation of it; the last Hebrew expression, however, shows idolatry as not being of Jewish origin. The word θυσιαστεία in the N.T. is entirely due to the Septuagint, which, wherever any of the heathen deities are mentioned, even though designated in the sacred text only as δεῦτας (nothing), translates by ἱερατεύς, an idol; a practice generally followed by later versions.

A special sort of idolatry, namely, the actual adoration of images (idolatria) thus gave name to the whole species (1 Cor. x. 14; Gal. v. 20; 1 Pet iv. 5). Subsequently the more comprehensive word κακοσεβεία (idolatria) was adopted, which included the adoration of effigies, as of the gods, with sacrifices paid to them; and the serpents (deity ἵππος) besides those due to the statutory art—Herzog.

I. Origin of Idolatry.—In the primeval period man appears to have had not alone a revelation, but also an implanted natural law. Adam and some of his descendants, as the time of the Flood and of the Patriarchs, were held under a revealed system, now usually spoken of as the patriarchal dispensation, and Paul tells us that the nations were under a natural law (Rom. ii. 14, 15). “Man in his natural state must always have had a knowledge of God sufficient for the condition in which he had been placed. Although God ‘times past, suffered all nations [or, rather, all the Gentiles,’ πάσας τὰ ἐθνών] to walk in their own ways, nevertheless he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness’ (Acts xiv. 17). For the invisible things of him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, [even] his eternal power and godhead’ (Rom. i. 20). But the people of whom we are speaking ‘changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things;’ and worshipped and served every creature as god, for the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever’ (Rom. i. 21–25). Thus arose that strange superstition which is known by the term Feticism [or low nature-worship], consisting in the worship of animals, trees, rivers, hills, and stones” (Poole, Genees of The Earth and of Man, 2d ed. p. 160, 161). Paul speaks of those who invented this idolatry as therefore forsaken of God and suffered to sink into the deepest moral corruption (Rom. i. 28). It is remarkable that among highly-civilized nations the converse obtains; moral corruption being very frequently the cause of the abandonment of true religion for infidelity. —Kitto. That theory of human progress which supposes man to have gradually worked his way up from barbaric ignorance of God to a so-called natural religion is contradicted by the facts of Biblical history.

Nothing can be supposed in the Bible as to any antediluvian idolatry. It is, however, a reasonable supposition that in the general corruption before the Flood idolatry was practised. There is no un doubted trace of heathen divinities in the names of the antediluvians; but these apparent discrepancies may be accounted for in the post-diluvial worship of some of the antediluvian patriarchs. It has been supposed that the Σέτ or Σύρρη of the Egyptian Pantheon is the Hebrew Seth. The Cainite Enoch was possibly commemorated as Annocus; or Numacus at Iconium, though, this name being

When the process of adorning the image was completed, it was placed in a temple or shrine appointed for it (οἰκία, Epist. Jer. 12, 19; ἱερατεύς, Wisd. xiii. 15; τιθήμιος, 1 Cor. viii. 10; see Stanley's note on the latter passage). In Wisd. xiii. 15, οἰκία is thought to be used contemptuously, as in Tibulli i. 10, 15, 20, 'Cum pauperes milui Stabat in cæstu lignos aede devo' (Fritsche and Grimm, Handb.), but the passage quoted is by no means a good illustration. From these temples the idols were sometimes carried in procession (Epist. Jer. 4, 26) on festival days. Their priests were maintained from the idolatry treasury, and feasted upon the meat offerings brought to them (Bel for the Dragon, 3, 13). These sacrificial beasts formed an important part of the idolatrous ritual, and were a great stumbling-block to the early Christian converts. They were to the heathen, as Prof. Stanley has well observed, what the observance of circumcision and the Mosaic ritual were to the Jewish converts, and it was for this reason that Paul especially directed his attention to the subject, and laid down the rules of conduct contained in his first letter to the Corinthians (vii-x). See Idolatry. identified with Enoch, the reference may be to Enoch of the line of Seth. It is reasonable to suppose that the worship of these deities, though Abrahamic, stemmed from the Flood, for it is unlikely that it would have been instituted after it. Some Jewish writers, grounding their theory on a forced interpretation of Gen. iv, 26, assign to Enoch, the son of Seth, the unenviable notoriety of having been the first to pay divine honors to the host of demons which existed in his infancy, and was the traditional tree beneath which Abraham dwelt. It was regarded with great reverence, and was made an object of worship by the heathen. Modern Palestine abounds with sacred trees. They are found "all over the land covered with bits of clay." From the grottos of the villages, hang up as acknowledgments, or as deprecatory signals and charms; and we find beautiful clumps of oak-trees sacred to a kind of beings called Jacob's "daughters." (Thomson, The Land and the Book, ii, 151.)

See Grove. As a symptom of the rapidly degenerating spirit, the oak of Shechem, which stood in the sanctuary of Jehovah (Josh. xxiv, 26), and beneath which Joshua set up the stone of witness, perhaps appears in Judges (ix, 37) as "the oak (not "plain" as in the A. V.) of soothsayers" or "augurs." This, indeed, may be a relic of the ancient Canaanitish worship; an older name associated with idolatry, while the remaining Hebrews were commanded and endeavored to eliminate (Deut. xii, 3).

2. Shamanism, or the magical side of fetishism, the worship of the sun, moon, and stars, and of the supposed powers of nature. The old religion of the Semitic races consisted, in the opinion of Movers (Phön., i, c. 5), in the deification of the powers and laws of nature; these powers being considered as independent of and not derivations from one supreme and all-ruling being. In most instances the two ideas were co-existent. The deity, following human analogy, was conceived as male and female: the one representing the active, the other the passive principle of nature; the former the source of spiritual, the latter of physical life. The interchange of the attributes of the one to the other resulted either in their mystical conjunction in the hermaphrodite, as the Persian Mithra and Phoenician Baal, or the two combined to form a third, which symbolized the essential unity of both. (This will explain the occurrence of the name of Baal with the masculine and feminine articles in the Sept.; comp. Hos. xi, 2; Jer. xix, 5; Rom. xi, 4. Philochorus, quoted by Macrobius [Sat. iii, 8], says that men and women sacrificed to Venus or the Moon, with the garments of the sexes interchanged, because she was the mediator between earth and heaven [see Selden, De Dies Syriae, ii, 2]. Hence Luna and Luna.) With these two supreme beings all other beings are identical; so that in different nations the same nature-worship appears under different forms, representing the various aspects under which the idea of the power of nature is presented. The sun and moon were early selected as outward symbols of this all-pervading power, and the worship of the heavenly bodies was not only the most ancient, but the most prevalent system of idolatry. Taking its rise, according to a probable hypothcis, in the plains of Chaldea, it spread through Egypt, Greece, Scythia, and even Mexico and Central America, and it is worthy of notice that even the religion of remote India presupposes a grand symbolic representation of the divine by the worship of these great physical power (compare Lassen, Ind. Alterth., i, 706 sq.; Roth, Geschichte der Religion, ii, 3). See Baal. It was regarded as an offence amenable to the civil authorities in the days of Job (xxxi, 26—28), and one of the statues of the Mosaic law was directed against its observance (Deut. iv, 19; xvii, 3); the former referring to the star-worship of Arabia, the latter to the concrete form in which it appeared among the Syrians and Persians.

It is probable that the Israelites learned their first lessons in sun-worship from the Egyptians, in whose religious system that luminary, as Osiris, held a prominent place. The city of On (Bethshemesh or Heliopolis) took its name from his temple (Jer. xiii, 19), and the wife of Joseph was the daughter of his priest (Gen. xlii. 46). She interceded for him under the title of "Lord of heaven," רֵעֹת הָאֱלֹהִים רָאוּאָלְוָא דָּוִד הָאֱלֹהִים, Rual-edahaym (יוֹדָאָבֹא, acc. to Sanchoniathon in Philo Byblius), and Adon, the Greek Adonis, and the Tammuz of Ezekiel (viii. 14). See TAMMUZ. As Malech or Milcom, the sun was worshipped by the Ammonites, and as Cheemos by the Moabites. The Hadad of the Syrians is the same deity, whose name is traceable in Benhadad, Hadad, Adal, Haddad, Hadad or Hadad, the Edomite. The Assyrian Bel or Belus is another form of Baal. According to Philo (De Vit. Cont. § 3), the Essenes were wont to pray to the sun at morning and evening (Joseph. War, ii, 8, 5). By the latter kings of Judah, sacred horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun-god, as by the Persians (2 Kings xxiii, 11; 1 Chron. xxix. 26, pt. i, bk. ii, c. xi; Seelen, De Dis Syr. ii, 8), to march in procession and greet his rising (R. Solomon Jarchi on 2 Kings xxiii, 11). The Massagetae offered horses in sacrifice to him (Strabo, xi, p. 518), on the principle enunciated by Macrobius (Sat. i, 14, 9), "the sun is in like," "similis simila gaudent;" compare Herod. i, 216, and the custom was common to many nations.

The moon, worshipped by the Phoenicians under the name of Astarte (Lucian, De Dea Syræa, c. 4), or Baalat, the passive power of nature, as Baal was the active (Upper Asatyr or Assyro-Persian), and was equally known to the Phoenicians as Asheroth or Ashthoreth, the tutelary goddess of the Zidonians, appears early among the objects of Israelite idolatry. But this Syro-Phoenician worship of the sun and moon was of a grosser character than the pure star-worship of the Magi, which Movers distinguishes as Upper Asiatic or Assyro-Persian, and was equally removed from the Chaldean astrology and Zabianism of later times. The former of these systems tolerated no images or altars, and the contemplation of the heavenly bodies from elevated spots constituted the greater part of its ritual.

But, though we have no positive historical account of star-worship before the Assyrian period, we may infer that it was early practised in a concrete form among the Israelites from the allusions in Amos v, 26, and Acts vii, 42, 43. Even in the desert they are said to have been given up to worship, "the host of heaven, while Chaim and Remphan, or Rephan, have on various grounds been identified with the planet Saturn. It was to counteract idolatry of this nature that the stringent law of Deut. xvii, 3 was enacted, and with a view to withdrawing the Israelites from undue contemplation of the material universe, Jehovah, the God of Israel, is constantly placed before them as Jehovah Sabaoth, Jehovah of Hosts, the king of heaven (Dan. iv, 35, 37), to whom the heaven and heavens of heavens belong (Deut. x, 14). However this may be, Movers (Phœn. i, 65, 66) contends that the later star-worship, introduced by Ahaz and followed by Manasseh, was purer and more spiritual in its nature than the Israelitish-Phoenician worship of the heavenly bodies under symbolic forms, as Baal and Asherah; and that it was not idolatry in the same sense that the latter was, but of a simply contemplative character. He is supported, to some extent, by the fact that we find no mention of images of the sun or moon or the host of heaven, but merely of vessels devoted to their service (2 Kings xxiii, 4). But there is no reason to believe that the divine honours paid to the "Queen of Heaven" (Jer. vii, 18; xlix, 19; or, as others render, "the frame of heaven," שֹׁמַר הַשָּׁמַיִם; LXX, ἡνίκα τοῦ οὐρανοῦ) were representative of a sun-cult, from image-worship. Mr. Layard (Nin. ii, 451) discovered a bas-relief at Nimroud which represented four idols carried in procession by Assyrian warriors. One of these figures he identifies with Hera, the Assyrian Astarte, represented with a star on her head (Amos v, 25), and with the "queen of heaven," who appears on the rock-tablets of Pterium "standing erect on a lion, and crowned with a tower, or mural coronet," as in the Syrian temple of Hierapolis (ib. p. 456; Lucian, De Dea Syræa, 81, 32). But, in his remarks upon a figure which resembles the Rhine of Diodorus, Layard adds, "The representation of a human woman, and of celestial bodies, themselves originally but a type, was a corruption which appears to have crept at a later period into the mythology of Assyria; for, in the more ancient bas-reliefs, figures with caps surmounted by stars do not occur, and the sun, moon, and planets stand alone" (ib. p. 457, 458). The Babylonian text of Job xxxii, 31, 32, and the later literature of the time, seem to allow any inference to be drawn as to the mysterious influences which were held by the old astrologers to be exercised by the stars over human destiny, nor is there sufficient evidence to connect them with anything more recondite than the astronomical knowledge of the period. The sun was said to be the emanation of the Moon, of which the Deborah's chant of triumph, "the stars from their highways warred with Sisera" (Judg. v. 20). In the later times of the monarchy, Massaloth, the planets, or the zodiacal signs, received, next to the sun and moon, their share of popular adoration (2 Kings xxiii, 5); and the history of idolatry among the Hebrews shows at all times an intimate connection between the delification of the heavenly bodies and the superstition which watched the clouds for signs, and used divination and enchantments. It was but a step from such culture of the idle powers to the worship of God and Meni, Babylonian divinities of Venus and Mercury or the moon, or the goddess of luck or fortune. Under the latter aspect the moon was reverence by the Egyptians (Macrobi. Sat. i, 19), and the name Baal-Gad is possibly an example of the manner in which the worship of the planet Jupiter, as the bringer of luck, was grafted on the old faith of the Phoenicians. The false gods of the colonists of Samaria were probably connected with Eastern astrology: Atrammelech Movers regards as the sun-fire— the solar Mars, and Anammelech the solar Saturn (Phœn. i, 410, 411). The Vulg. rendering of Prov. xxvi, 8, "Sicur qui mititur Mercurium..." foliates the Midrash on the passage quoted by Jarchi, and requires merely a passing notice (see Selden, De Dis Syræa, ii, 15; Maim. de Idol. iii, 2; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. מְדִינָא). 4. Hero-worship, the worship of deceased ancestors or leaders of a nation. Of pure hero-worship among the Semitic races we find no trace. Moses, indeed, seems to have entertained some dim apprehension that his countrymen might, after his death, pay him more honors than were due to man, and the anticipation of this led him to review his own conduct in terms of strong repugnation (Deut. iv, 21, 22). The expression in Ps. cxi, 28, "The sacrifices of the dead," is in all probability a reference to hero-worship, and is constantly practiced by the Papuans as a means of escape from the general practice due to Greek influence. The Rabbinical commentators discover in Gen. xlviii, 16 an allusion to the worshipping of angels (Col. ii, 18), while they defend their ancestors from the charge of regarding them in any other light than mediators, or intercessors with God (Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v, 3). It is needless to add that their inference and apology are equally groundless. With like probability has been advanced the theory of the demon-worship of the Hebrews, the only foundation for it being two highly poetical passages (Deut. xxxii, 17; Ps. cxi, 37). It is possible that the Persian duality is hinted at in Isa. xxiv, 9.

5. Idolatry, the worship of abstractions or mental qualities, such as justice, a system never found unmixed. This constituted the mythology of the Greeks and Romans, as also of the Scandinavarians. See Muth.

III. Idolatry of certain ancient Heathen Nations in Detail.—All idolatry is in its nature heathenish, and it has in all ages been a characteristic mark of heathendom, so that to the present day the vivid description of Rom. i. remains the most striking portrature of heathenism. I proceed to consider the heathen nations in review only of those early nations whose contact with the Hebrew race was the means of the importation of idolatry among the chosen people. See Polytheism.

1. Mepopatamian Mythology. The original idolatrous condition of the kindred of Abraham (q.v.) himself in the great plain of Aram is distinctly alluded to in Judg. xxi, 2. According to Rawlinson (Essay in his Herod.), the Pantheons of Babylon and Nineveh, though originally dissimilar in the names of the divinities, cannot as yet be treated separately. The principal god of the Assyrians was Assur, a deity of the sun, whose name is read II or Ra. The special attributes of Assur were sovereignty and power, and he was regarded as the special patron of the Assyrians and their kings. It is the Semitic equivalent of the Hamitic or-Semitic Ra, which suggests connection with Egypt, although there is no reason to suppose that the same name may perhaps be traced in the probably Canaanite gods. Next to Assur or II was a triad, consisting of Anu, who appears to have corresponded to Pluto, a divinity whose name is doubtful, corresponding to Jupiter, and the name of the Negeve, whose fetishism corresponds perfectly with this low nature-worship of the ancient Egyptians.

Connected with fetishism was the local character of the religion. Each nome, city, town, and probably village, had its god. Originally, the name of the god was associated with the name of the town or village; but in the later periods the name of the gods was due to the importance of their cities than any powers or qualities they were supposed to have. For a detailed account of the Egyptian deities, with illustrative cuts, see Kitto's Pictorial Bible, note on Deut. iv. 16; compare Also Egypt.

The Egyptian Pantheon shows three distinctive elements. Certain of the gods are only personifications connected with low nature-worship. Others, the great gods, are of Shemitic origin, and are connected with high nature-worship, though showing traces of the worship of ancestors. In addition, there are certain personifications of abstract ideas. The first of these classes is evidently the result of an attempt to connect the old low nature-worship with some higher system. The second is a form of nature-worship with which we ultimately formed a part. The last class appears to be that of later invention, and to have had its origin in an endeavor to construct a philosophical system.

In addition to these particulars of the Egyptian religion, it is important to notice that it comprised very remarkable doctrines. Man was held to be a responsible being, whose future after death depended upon his actions done while on earth. He was to be judged by Osiris, ruler of the West, or unseen world, and either rewarded with felicity or punished with torment. Whether these future states of happiness or misery were held to be of eternal duration is not certain, but there is little doubt that the Egyptians believed in the immortality of the soul.

The religion of the Shepherds, or Hyksos, is not so distinctly known to us. It is, however, clear from the monuments that their chief god was Set, or Suteh, and we learn from a papyrus that one of the Shepherd-kings, Apepi, probably Manetho's "Apophis," established the worship of Set in his dominions, and revereenced no other god, raising a great temple to him in Zaan, or Avaris. Set continued to be worshipped by the Egyptians until the time of the 22nd dynasty, when we lose all trace of him on the monuments. At this period, or afterwards, his figure was effaced in the inscriptions. The change took place long after the expulsion of the Hyksos; and it appears to be the result of a change in the dynasties, which was probably of Assyrian or Babylonian origin; it is, therefore, rather to be considered as a result of the influence of the Median doctrine of Ormuzd and Ahirman than as due to the Egyptian hatred of the foreigners and all that concerned them. Besides Set, other foreign divinities were worshipped in Egypt—the god Renep, the godesses Ken, or Keter, Ana, and...
IDOLOTRY

ASTARTA. All these divinities, except Astarta, as to whom we have no particular information, are treated by the Egyptians as powers of destruction and war, as Set was considered the personification of physical evil. Set was always identified by the Egyptians with Baal; we do not know whether he was worshipped in Egypt before the Shepherd-period, but it is probable that he was. His worship in Egypt was probably never reduced to a system. What we know of it shows no regularity, and it is not unlike the imitations of the Egyptian idols made by Phoenician artists, probably as representations of Phoenician divinities. The gods of the Hyksos are foreign objects of worship in an Egyptian setting. See Hyksos.

8. Idolatry of Canaan and the adjoining Countries. The centre of the idolatry of the Palestinian races is to be sought for in the religion of the Rephaimites and the Canaanites. We can distinctly connect the worship of Baal and Ashtoreth with the earliest kind of idolatry; and, having thus established a centre, we can understand how, for instance, the same infernal rites were celebrated to the Ammonitic Molech and the Carthaginian Baal. The most important document for the idolatry of the Hittites is the treaty concluded between the branches of the Hittite confederacy at Ben-Hor, and the Ammonites. From this we learn that Suwekh (or Set) and Astartat were the chief divinities of these Hittites, and that they also worshipped the mountains and rivers and the winds. The Suwekh of several forts are also specified. See Hittites. Set is known from the Egyptian inscriptions as Baal used in the two chief divinities we discover Baal and Ashtoreth, the only Canaanite divinities known to be mentioned in Scripture. The local worship of different forms of Baal well agrees with the low nature-worship with which it is found to have prevailed. Both are equally mentioned in Scripture, and thus the peculiar contemporary worship of Baal-ben-hur, and Mount Hermon itself seems to have been worshipped as Baal-Hermon, while the low nature-worship may be traced in the reverence for groves, and the connection of the Canaanite religion with hills and trees. The strongest feature of this system was the sacrifice of children by their parents—a feature that shows the origin of at least two of its offshoots.

The Bible does not give a very clear description of Canaanite idolatry. As an abominable thing, to be rooted out and cast into oblivion, nothing is needlessly said of it. The opposition of Baal, ruler, or possessor, of Mount Hermon, implies the divinity of his worshipers, worshipped Baal-ben-hur, and Mount Hermon itself seems to have been worshipped as Baal-Hermon, while the low nature-worship may be traced in the reverence for groves, and the connection of the Canaanite religion with hills and trees. Ba'al-Peor, which would not have been repugnant to the pagan Arabs; the latter finds some support in the name Shittim, the accacias, as though the place had its name from some acacias sacred to Baal, and, moreover, we have no certain instance of the application of the name of Baal to any non-Canaanitish divinity. Had such vile worship in the wilderness of Sin proceeded from the Sinaitic Canaanites, and the Habnbal of the Carthaginians, the identity of the religious system of the two nations, as widely distinct in the time of their existence as in their geographical position" (Nisene, ii, 490). The hint which he has given can be but briefly followed out here. Traces of the sun-worship of the ancient Canaanites in the nomenclature of their country. Beth-Shemesh, "house of the sun;" En-Shemesh, "spring of the sun;" Ir-Shemesh, "city of the sun," whether they be the original Canaanitish names or their Hebrew renderings, attest the reverence paid to the source of light and heat, the symbol of the fertilizing power of nature. Samson, the Hebrew national hero, took his name from the same luminary, and was born in a mountain village above the modern 'Ain Shems (En-Shemesh: Thomson, The Land and the Book, ii, 361). The name of Baal, the sun-god, is one of the most common occurrences in compound words, and is associated with the Canaanitish Ca-phecur-Dagon, near Jamnia, and Beth-Dagon, the latter applied to two places, one in Judah and the other in Asher. The derivation of the name Dagon, דגון, as that of a fish-god, is from דג, a fish. Gesenius considers it a diminutive, "little fish," used by way of endearment and honor (Thes. s. v.), but this is surely hazardous. Dagon was represented as a man with the tail of a fish. There can be no doubt that he was connected with the Canaanitish system, as Derceto or Atargatis, the same as Ashurtho, was worshipped under a like mixed shape at Ashkelon (אשקלון) περισσὡν εκεί γενώσας, τὁ ε ἐλευθεράν εἰς ὅποιον, Diod. Sic. ii, 4). In form he is the same as the Assyrian god supposed to correspond to the planet Saturn. The house of Dagon at Gaza, which Samson overthrew, must have been very large for about 3000 men and women then assembled on its roof. It had two principal, if not only, pillars in the midst, between which Samson was placed and was seen by the people on the roof. The inner portion of some of the ancient Egyptian temples consisted of a hypostyle hall, supported by two or more pillars, and inner chambers. The overthrow of these pillars would bring down the stone roof of the hall, and destroy all persons beneath or upon it, without necessarily overthrowing the side-walls.

The idolatry of the Phoenicians is not spoken of in the Bible. From their inscriptions and the statements of profane authors we learn that this nation worshipped Baal and Ashtoreth. The details of their worship will be spoken of in the article PHOENICIA.

Baal, as a sun-god, appears in a few places in Scripture. Tammuz, whom the women of Israel lamented, is no doubt Adonis, whose worship implies that of Astarte or Ashtoreth. Rimmon, who appears to have been the chief divinity of the Syrian kings rule owing to Damascus, may, if his name signifies high (from דָּבָשׁ, be a local form of Baal, who, as the sun-god, had a temple at the great Syrian city Heliopolis, now called Baalbek.

The book of Job, which, whatever its date, represents a primitive state of society, speaks of cosmic worship as though it was practiced in his country, Idumea or northern Arabia. "If I beheld a sun when it shined, or a splendid moon progressing, and my heart were secretly enjoined or even mainly derived from the Canaanitish source. At Ekron, Baal-zebub was worshipped, and had a temple, to which Ahaziah, the wicked son of Ahaz, sent to inquire. This name means either the lord of the fly, or Baal the fly. It is generally held that he was worshipped as a driver-away of flies, but we think it is more probable that some venerous fly was sacred to him. The use of the term Baal is indicative of a connection with the Canaanitish system. The national divinity of the Philistines seems, however, to have been Dagon, to whom there were temples at Gaza and at Ashdod, and the general character of whose worship is evident from the words, and is associated with the Canaanitish Ca-phecur-Dagon, near Jamnia, and Beth-Dagon, the latter applied to two places, one in Judah and the other in Asher. The idolatry of the Phoenicians is not spoken of in the Bible. From their inscriptions and the statements of profane authors we learn that this nation worshipped Baal and Ashtoreth. The details of their worship will be spoken of in the article PHOENICIA. goddesse of fortune, and identical with Gain (Hesodex. s. v.). But there are fragments of ancient idolatry in other names in which it is not so palpable. Ishbosheth is identical with Eshbaal, and Jerubbesheth with Jerubbaal, and Mephibosheth and Meribaal are but two names for one person (comp. Jer. xi. 15). The worship of the Syrian Rimmon appears in the names Hadadrimmon, Rimmon, and Tabrimmon; and if, as some suppose, it be derived from הָרָמִים, רָמִים, "a pomegranate-tree," we may connect it with the towns of the same name in Judah and Benjamin, with En-Rimmon and the prevailing tree-worship. It is impossible to pursue this investigation to any length: the hints which have been thrown out are more suggestive. See each of these names in its place.

5. Idolatrous Images.—Mountains and high places were chosen spots for offering sacrifice and incense to idols (1 Kings xi. 7; xiv. 25), and the retirement of gardens and the thick shade of woods offered great attractions to their worshippers (2 Kings xviii. 4; Isa. i. 29; Hos. iv. 13). It was the ridge of Carmel which Elijah selected as the scene of his contest with the priests of Baal, fighting with them the battle of Jehovah as it were on their own ground. See Carmel. Carmel was regarded by the Roman historians as a sacred mountain by the Jews (Tacitus, Hist. iv. 79; Suetonius, Vesp. 7). The host of heaven was worshipped on the houseset (2 Kings xxiii. 12; Jer. xix. 3; xxxix. 29; Zeph. i. 5). In describing the sun-worship of the Nabataeans, Strabo (xvi. 764) mentions two characters which strikingly illustrate the worship of Baal. They built their altars on the roofs of houses, and offered on them incense and libations daily. On the wall of his city, in the sight of the besieging armies of Israel and Edom, the king of Moab offered his eldest son as a burnt-offering. The Persians, who worshipped the sun under the name of Mithra (Strabo, xv. 792), sacrificed on an elevated spot, but bare no altars or images. See Mount.

The priests of the false worship are sometimes designated Chemarin, a word of Syriac origin, to which different meanings have been assigned. It is applied to the non-Levitical priests worshippers (2 Kings xviii. 4; Isa. i. 29; Hos. iv. 13) as well as to the priests of the calves (Hos. x. 5); and the corresponding word is used in the Peshito (Judg. xviii. 30) of Jonathan and his descendants, priests to the tribe of Dan, and in the Targum of Onkelos (Gen. xlvi. 22) of the priests of Egypt. The Babbis followed by the Gezerans, have derived it from a root signifying "to be black," and without any authority assert that the name was given to idolatrous priests from the black vestments which they wore. But while these were distinctive color in the priestly garments of all nations from India to Gaul, and black was only worn when they sacrificed to the subterranean gods (Bühl, Symb. ii. 87, etc.). That a special dress was adopted by the Baal-worshippers, as well as by the false prophets (Zech. xiii. 4), is evident from 2 Kings x. 22 (where the rendering should be "the apparel"): the vestments were kept in an apartment of the idol temple, under the charge of one of the inferior priests. Micaiah's Levite was provided with appropriate rods (Judg. xvi. 11). The "foreign apparel" mentioned in Zeph. i. 8, doubtless refers to a similar dress, adopted by the Israelites in defiance of the sacrificial law in Num. xv. 38, 39. See Carmel.

In addition to the priests, there were other persons intimately connected with idolatrous rites, and the impurities from which they were inseparable. Both men and women consecrated themselves to the service of idols: the former as הַנְשָׁהּ, kedeshim, for which there is reason to believe the A.V. (Deut. xxiii. 17, etc.) has not given too harsh an equivalent; the latter as נְשֵׂאָה, kedeshbim, who wore priestly from the Assyrians (2 Kings xxiii. 7, and resembled the ḫraen of Corinth, of whom Strabo (vii. 578) says there were more than a thousand attached to the temple of Aphrodite. Egyptian priests consecrated themselves to Isis (Juvenal, vi. 487; ix. 22-24). The same class of women existed among the Phoenixians, Armenians, Lydians, and Babylonians (Herod. i. 90, 199; Strabo, xii. p. 532; Epist. of Jerome, v. 49). They are distinguished from the public prostitutes (Hos. iv. 14), and associated with the performances of sacred rites, just as in Strabo (xii. p. 569) we find the two classes co-existing at Comana, the Corint of Pontus, much frequented by pilgrims to the shrine of Aphrodite. The wealth thus obtained flowed into the treasuries of the temple, and supplied the means to making the service in Deut. xxiii. 18 is directed. Dr. Maitland, anxious to defend the moral character of Jewish women, has with much ingenuity attempted to show that a meaning foreign to their true sense has been attached to the words above mentioned; and that, though stronger or more positive than the language in which they indicate such foul corruption (Essay on False Worship). But if, as Movers, with great appearance of probability, has conjectured (Phon. i. 679), the class of persons alluded to was composed of foreigners, the Jewish women in this respect need no such advocacy. That such customs may remain in foreign nations for ages, this evidence to prove (Lucian, De Syra Dea, c. 5); and from the juxtaposition of prostitution and the idolatrous rites against which the laws in Lev. xix. are aimed, it is probable that, next to its immorality, one main reason why it was visited with such stringency was its connection with idolatry (compare 1 Cor. vi. 9). See Harlot.

But besides these accessories there were the ordinary rites of worship which idolatrous systems had in common with the religion of the Hebrews. Offering burnt sacrifices to the local gods (2 Kings x. 17), burning incense in their honor (1 Kings xi. 8), and bowing down in worship before their images (1 Kings xix. 18) were the chief parts of their ritual, and, from their very analogy with the ceremonies of true worship, were more seductive than the grosser forms. Nothing can be more assuredly associated with idolatry from which these ceremonies were denounced by Hebrew law. Every detail of idol-worship was made the subject of a separate enactment, and many of the laws, which in themselves seem trivial and almost absurd, receive from this point of view their true significance. We are told by Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8) that the prohibition against sowing a field with mingled seed, and wearing garments of mixed material, were directed against the practices of idolaters, who attributed a kind of magical influence to the mixture (Lev. xix. 19; Spencer, De Leg. Hebr. ii. 19). Such, too, were the restrictions of the sexes should be interchanged (Deut. xxiii. 5; Maimonides, De Idol. xii. 9). According to Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8), other Asiaties, when they sacrificed to their Venus, changed the dress of the sexes. The priests of Cybele appeared in women's clothes, and used to mutilate themselves (Creuzer, Symb. ii. 34, 42): the same custom was observed "by the Ithymball in the rites of Bacchus, and by the Athenians in their Ascophoria" (Young, Idol. Cor. in Rel. i. 105; comp. Lucian, De Dea Syyra, c. 15). To preserve the Hebrews from contamination, they were prohibited for three years after their conquest of Canaan from entering the fruit-trees of the land, whose cultivation had been attended with magical rites (Lev. xix. 23). They were forbidden to "round the corner of the head," and to "mar the corner of the beard" (Lev. xix. 27), as the Arabians did in honor of their gods (Herod. iii. 8, iv. 175). Herod. iii. 8, 175, of the worship of the "[holy] tree," is especially applied to idolatry (Jer. ix. 26; xxiii. 23). Spencer (De Leg. Hebr. ii. 9, § 2) explains the law forbidding the offering of honey (Lev. ii. 11) as intended to oppose an idolatrous practice. Strabo describes the Magi as offering in all their sacrifices libations of oil mixed with honey and milk (xv. p. 788). Offerings in which honey was an ingredient were made. to the inferior deities and the dead (Homer, Od. x, 519; Porph. De Anfr. Nymph. c. 17). So also the practice of eating the flesh of sacrifices "over the blood" (Lev. xix, 26; Ezek. xxxii, 25, 26) was, according to Maimonides, common among the Zabils. Spencer gives a daemoniac spirit the name of "Blood." The law of divination, and divination of the worst kind, a species of necromancy by which they attempted to raise the spirits of the dead (comp. Horace, Sat., 1, 8). There are supposed to be allusions to the practice of necromancy in Isa. lxv, 4, or, at any rate, to superstitions in connection herewith in Isa. ix, 19, and there is no strict distinction between the two. The law of one tree grown upon another was forbidden, because among idolaters the process was accompanied by gross obscenity (Maimon. Mor. Nef. c. 12). Cutting the flesh for the dead (Lev. xix, 28; 1 Kings xvii, 28), and making a baldness between the eyes (Deut. xiv, 1), were associated with idolatrous rites, the latter being a custom among the Syrians (Sir G. Wilkinson in Rawlinson's Herod. ii, 138 note). The thrice-repeated and much-vaunted passage, "Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk" (Exod. xxiii, 19; xxxiv, 26; Deut. xiv, 21), interpreted by some as a protest of humanity, is explained by Codrus to be worth in a very different manner. He quotes from a Karaite commentary which he had seen in MS.: "It was a custom of the ancient heathens, when they had gathered in their fruit, to take a kid and boil it in the dam's milk, and then in a magical way go about and eat thereof, and the beast is preserved and the greatest good is reaped, and it is caught in the网, and dispersed and the fruit ripens and the grain is produced, and the king of holy things is preserved, and the gods and the stills." (Exod. xvi, 31). The laws which regulate clean and unclean meats (Lev. xx, 23-26) may be considered both as a sanitary regulation and also as having a tendency to separate the Israelites from the surrounding idolatrous nations. It was with the same object, in the opinion of Michaelis, that while in the wilderness they were prohibited from killing any animal for food without first offering it to Jehovah (Laws of Moses, art. 208). The mouse, one of the unclean animals of Leviticus (xi, 29), was sacrificed by the ancient Magi (Isag. lxvi, 17; Movers, Phain. i, 219). It may have become some sort of a species of humanity, by which was meant that of "eating the flesh of the Egyptian deity, which gave rise to the prohibition in Deut. xxi, 18. Movers says (i, 404) the dog was offered in sacrifice to Moloch, as swine to the moon and Dionysus by the Egyptians, who afterwards ate of the flesh (Herod. iii, 47; Isa. lv, 4.) Eating of the things offered to Moloch (Lev. xxv, 27) was offered to Moloch (Lev. xxiv, 12; xxxii, 6; xxix, 15; Numh. xxv, 2, 5, etc.) Among the Persians the victim was eaten by the worshippers, and the soul alone left for the god (Strabo, xv, 782). Hence it is that the idolatry of the Jews in worshipping other gods is so often described евочко as being under the notion of feasting. Isa. vii, 7. "Upon a high and lofty mountain thou hast set thy bed, and thither wendest thou up to offer sacrifice; for in those ancient times they were not wont to sit at feasts, but lie down on beds or couches." Ezek. xxiii, 41: "Amos li, 8. "They laid the Book i, 133") The law which forbade the living by every altar, i.e. laid themselves down to eat of the sacrifice that was offered on the altar; compare Ezek. xviii, 11 (Cudworth, ut supra, c. 1; comp. 1 Cor. xii, 10). The Israelites were forbidden "to print any mark upon them" (Lev. xix, 28), because it was a custom of idolatry and marked the flesh of the deity they worshipped, as the ivy-leaf of Bacchus (Pisc. ii, 29). According to Lucian (De Dea Syria, 59), all the Assyrians wore marks of this kind on their necks and wrists (comp. Isa. xiv, 5; 1 cor, vi, 17; Rev. xiv, 1, 11). Many other practices of false worship are alluded to. And many of these were not the introduction of heathenism, but grew out of theCanaanites through whose land they passed, and the animists and charms which were worn as the appendages of their worship (Gen. xxxv, 2, 4). See Jacob.

During their long residence in Egypt, the country of symbolism, they deified themselves with the idols of the land so as to reconcile the tenets of the God of Abraham, iv, 14; Ezek. xxv, 7). To these gods Moses, as the herald of Jehovah, flung down the gauntlet of defiance (Kurtz, Gesch. d. Alt. B. ii, 59), and the plagues of Egypt amote their symbols (Num. xxxii, 4). Yet, with the memory of their deliverance fresh in their minds, their lead and derision the Israelites adapted the song in which they might worship the God who had brought them up out of Egypt (Exod. xxxiiii). The Is-raelites, as dwellers in the most outlying and separate tract of the Semitic part of Lower Egypt, are more likely to have followed the corruptions of the shepherds' strange, than those of the Egyptians, more especially as, saving Joseph, Moses, and not improbably Aaron and Miriam, they seem to have almost universally preserved the manners of their former wandering life. There is a trace of Egyptian influence beyond that seen in the names of Moses and Miriam perhaps of Aaron also, for the only other name besides the former two that is certainly Egyptian, and may be reasonably referred to this period, that of Harnepher, evidently the Egyptian har-nephu, "Horus the good," in the genealogies of Ascher (1 Chron. vii, 98), probably marks an Egyptian name taken into the Semitic by marriage into the Semitic by marriage into the Semitic. Ascher whether a proselyte or not we cannot attempt to decide. There has been a difference of opinion as to the golden calf, some holding that it was made to represent God himself, others maintaining that it was only an imi-tation of an Egyptian idol. We first observe that this and another golden calf are carved in the form of a ram, and that their being identical in intention with which they were made, by the circumstance that the Israelites addressed the former as the God who had brought them out of Egypt (Exod. xxxiiii, 4, 8), and that Jeroboam proclaimed the same of his idols (1 Kings xxi, 29). We next re-main that Aaron called the calf, not only got out the Lord (Exod. xxxiiii, 5); that in the Psalms it is said "they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth hay" (ery, 29); that no one of the calf-worship- ping kings and princes of Israel bears any name con-nected with idolatry, while many have names compound ed with the most sacred name of God; and that in no place is any foreign divinity connected with calf-worship in the slightest degree. The adoption of such an image as the golden calf, however, shows the strength of Egyptian associations, else how would Aaron have fixed upon the obvious form as the one in which the God who had brought Israel out of Egypt? Only a mind thoro-ugly accustomed to the profound respect paid in Egypt to the sacred bulls, and especially to Apis and Mnevis, could have hit upon so strange a representation; nor could any people who had not witnessed the Egyptian practices have found, as readily as did the Israelites, the fulfilment of their wishes in such an image. The feast that Aaron celebrated, when, after eating and drinking, the people arose, sang, and danced naked before the idol, is strikingly like the festival of the finding of Apis, which was celebrated with feasting and dancing, and also, apparently, though this is not customarily at least does not seem to have been part of the public festivity, with indecent gestures. See Golden Calf. The golden calf was not the only idol which the Israelites worshipped in the Deut. The prophet Amos speaks of others. In the Masoretic text as follows: "I have the tent [or tabernacle] of your king and Chien your images, the star of your gods [or your god], which ye made for yourselves" (v, 26). The Sept. has Mooloi for "your king," as though their original Heb. had been Σμολογον instead of Σμολογον, and Parapin for Chien, be- sides a transposition. In the Acts the reading is almost the same, Σμολογος τος μου, "Yea, ye took up the tab- ernacle of Moolot, and the star of your sign, the banner of your God, figures which ye made to worship them" (vii, 43). We cannot here discuss the probable causes of these diffe- rences except of the more important ones, the substition of Moolot for "your king," and Raiphan or Rem- phan for Chien. It should be observed, that if the pas- sage relating to Amonites is taken by the Masoretes to be more likely than that Molech should have been spoken of by an appelleative, in which case a strict rendering of the Masoretic text would read as does the A. V.; a freer could follow the Sept. and Acts; but, as there is no re- ference to the Ammonites or even Canaanites, it is more reasonable to suppose that the Sept. was not, as in the text in which, as above suggested, the reading was Σμολογον, Mal- cham, or "your king." The likelihood of this being the true reading must depend upon the rest of the pas- sage. Remphan and Chien are at once recognised as two foreign divinities worshipped together in Egypt, Rempu, probably pronounced Rempu, and Ken, the for- mer a god represented as of the type of the Egyptian, and apparently connected with war, the latter a goddess represented naked standing upon a lion. They were worshipped with kheh, the Egyptian god of produc- tiveness, and the foreign war-goddess Anata. Exclud- ing Kheh, who is probably associated with ken from being connected with war, we shall see, with the exception of these names, Rempu, Ken, and Anata, are clearly not, except in orthography, Egyptian. We can suggest no origin for the name of Rempu. The goddesses Ken, as naked, would be connected with the Babylonian Mylita, and as standing on a lion, with a goddess so repre-sented in the cuneiform inscriptions of Mallow, Maltseby, and the like. The former similarity connects her with generation; the latter, perhaps, does so likewise. If we adopt this sup- position, the name Ken may be traced to a root connect- ed with generation found in many varieties in the Ir- anic family, and not of that family at all. It is sufficiently evident to cite the Greek yv-owos, yw-po: she would thus be the goddess of productiveness. Anata is the Persian Anaitis. We have shown earlier that the Baby- lonian high nature-worship seems to have been of Aryan origin. In the present case we trace an Aryan idola- try connected, from the mention of a star, with high na- ture-worship. If we accept this explanation, it becomes doubtful that Molech is mentioned in the passage, and we may rather suppose that some other idol, to whom a kingly character was attributed, is intended. Here we must leave this difficult point of our inquiry, only sum- ming up that this false worship was not brought in from the shepherds in Egypt, and may possibly indicate the Aryan origin of at least one of these tribes, almost certainly its own origin, directly or indirectly, from an Aryan source.

The next was a temporary apostasy. The charms of the daughters of Moab, as Balsam's bad genius forewarn, were potent for evil: the Israelites were "yoked to Baal-Poar" in the trammels of his fair worshippers, and the character of their deviations is not obscurely hinted at (Num. xxxv). The great and terrible retribution which followed left so deep an impress upon the hearts of the people that, after the conquest of the promised land, they looked with an eye of terror upon any indication of de- fection from the worship of Jehovah, and denounced as idolatrous a memorial so slight as the altar of the Reu- benites at the passage of Jordan (Josh. xxi, 16).

2. It is demonstrable in the words of the song, and under the strong rule of Joshua, the idolatry learnt in Egypt was so destroyed as to be afterwards utterly forgotten by the people. But in entering Palestine they found them- selves among the monuments and associations of anoth- er false religion, less attractive indeed to the reason than that of Egypt, which still taught, notwithstanding the wretched fetishism that it supported, some great truths of man's present and future, but of a religion which, in its dedication of nature, had a strong hold on the imagi- nation. The genial sun, the refreshing moon, the stars, that shine in the firmament, the breasts full of milk and of honey, natural were reverenced in that land of green hills and valleys, which were fed by the water of heaven. A nation thrown in the scene of such a religion and mixed with those who professed it, at that period of national life when impressions are most readily made, such a nation, almost living while the remembrance of the deliverance from Egypt and the wonders with which the Law was given was yet fresh, soon fell away into the practices that it was strictly enjoined to root out. In the first and second laws of the Decalogue, the Israelites were commanded to worship but one God, and not to make any idols to worship; they and their children should fall under God’s heavy displeasure. The commands were explicit enough. But not alone was idolatry thus clearly condemned: the Israelites were charged to destroy all objects connected with the religion of the inhabitants of Canaan. They were to destroy utterly all the heathen places of worship, “up the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree.” They were to “overthrow” the altars of the heathen, “break their pillars,” “burn their groves, hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place” (Deut. xii, 2, 5), a passage we cite on account of the fulness of the enumeration. Had the conquered nations been utterly extirpated, their idolatry might have been annihilated at once. But soon after the lands had been apportioned, that separate life of the tribes began which was never interrupted, as far as history tells us, until the time of the Israelites’ conquest. The tribes were unable to cope with the remnant of the Canaanites, and either dwelt with them on equal terms, reduced them to tribute, or became tributaries themselves. The Israelites were thus surrounded by the idolatry of Canaan; and since they were for the most part confined to the mountain and hill districts, where its associations were strongest, they had but to learn from their neighbors how they had worshiped upon the high hills and under every green tree. From the use of plural forms, it is probable that the Beals and Ashoreths of several towns or tribes were worshiped as Baal-Peor and Baal Berith; and the berith afterwards was. It does not seem, however, that the people at once fell into heathen worship: the first step appears to have been adopting a corruption of the true religion.

During the lives of Joshua and the elders who outlived his, they kept true to their allegiance, but the generation following, who knew not Jehovah, nor the works he had done for Israel, revered from the plain path of their fathers, and were caught in the toils of the foreigner (Judg. ii). From this time forth their history becomes little more than a chronicle of the increasing attacks of the tribes unable to cope with the remnant of the Canaanites, and either dwelt with them on equal terms, reduced them to tribute, or became tributaries themselves. The Israelites were thus surrounded by the idolatry of Canaan; and since they were for the most part confined to the mountain and hill districts, where its associations were strongest, they had but to learn from their neighbors how they had worshiped upon the high hills and under every green tree. From the use of plural forms, it is probable that the Beals and Ashoreths of several towns or tribes were worshiped as Baal-Peor and Baal Berith; and the berith afterwards was. It does not seem, however, that the people at once fell into heathen worship: the first step appears to have been adopting a corruption of the true religion.

The narratives of the book of Judges, contemporaneous or successive, tell of the fierce struggle maintained against their hated foes, and how women forgot their tenderness and forsook their retirement to sing the song of victory over the oppressor. By turns, each conquering nation strove to establish the worship of its national god. During the rule of Midian, Joshua, the father of Gideon, sent an altar to Baal (Judg. vi, 35), though he proved but a lukewarm worshipper (ver. 31). Even Gideon himself gave occasion to idolatrous worship; yet the ephod which he made from the spoils of the Midianites was perhaps but a votive offering to the true God (Judg. vii, 27). It is not improbable, however, that the Israelites again returned to the service of the Baalim, as, if in solemn mockery of the covenant made with Jehovah, chose from among them Baal Berith, “Baal of the Covenant” (comp. Zebišĕnu, as the object of their special adoration (Judg. vii, 18). Of this god we know only that his temple, probably of wood (Judg. ix, 49), was a stronghold in time of need, and was protected with the silver of the worshippers (ix, 4). Nor were the calamities of foreign oppression confined to the land of Canaan. The tribes on the east of Jordan went astray after the idols of the land, and were delivered into the hands of the children of Ammon (Judg. x, 8). But they were not without a warning; for God, in his presentation of their case, prefaced it by what, ever-recurring phrase, so mournfully familiar, “the children of Israel did evil again in the eyes of Jehovah, and Jehovah gave them into the hands of the Philistines.” Thus far idolatry is a national sin. The episode of Micah, in Judg. xvi, xvii, sheds a lurid light on the secret practice in the villages, who, without formally renouncing Jehovah, though ceasing to recognize him as the theocratic king (xvi, 7), linked with his worship the symbols of ancient idolatry. The house of God, or sanctuary, which Micah made in imitation of that at Shiloh, was decorated with an ephod and teraphim, and the image consecrated to some inferior deities (Selden, De Bib Syrja, synt. i, 2). It is a significant fact, showing how deeply rooted in the people was the tendency to idolatry, that a Levite, who, of all others, should have been familiar with the elements of the true worship in its purity, was found to assume the office of priest in the images of Micah; and that this Levite, priest afterwards to the idols of Dan, was no other than Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses. Tradition says that these idols were destroyed when thePhilistines defeated the Israelites, and was an incident of the covenant of Jehovah (1 Sam. iv). The Danites are supposed to have carried them into the field, as the other tribes bore the ark, and the Philistines the images of their gods, when they went forth to battle (2 Sam. v, 21; Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v, 9). But the Snider Olum Roberts (c. p. 199) interprets “Baal of the capitivity of the land” (Judg. xviii, 3), of the captivity of Mannasseh; and Benjamin of Tudela mistook the remnants of later Gentile worship for traces of the altar or statue which Micah had dedicated, and which was worshiped by the treachery of (Selden, P. Bib. Syrja, synt. i, 2; Stanley, S. and T. and other editions). In later times, secret idolatry was carried to greater lengths. Images were set up on the corn-floors, in the wine-vats, and behind the doors of private houses (Isa. i, viii, 2; Hos. ix, 1, 2); and to check this tendency the statute in Deut. xxvii, 15 was originally promulgated. It is noticeable that they do not seem during this period to have generally adopted the religions of any but the Canaanites, although in one remarkable passage they are said, between the time of Jair and that of Jephthah, to have forsaken the Lord, and served Baalim, and Ashhtaroth, and the gods of the Canaanites, of the south and of the north, and of the Sidonians, and of the Hittites, and of the Philistines (Judg. x, 6), as though there had then been an utter and profligate apostasy. The cause, no doubt, was that the Canaanitish worship was borrowed in a time of amity, and that but one Canaanitish oppressor was spoken of, whereas the abrahamicites of the east who, from which it was always enemies of the Israelites. Each time of idolatry was punished by a servitude, each reformation followed by a deliverance. Speedily as the nation returned to idolatry, its heart was fonder than that of the ten tribes which followed Jeroboam, and never seem to have had one thorough national reformation again until 3. The notices of their great wars show that the enmity between the Philistines and the Israelites was too great for any idolatry to be tolerated. From the fore mer by the latter, though at an earlier time this was not the case. Under Samuel's administration a fast was held, and purificatory rites performed, to mark the public renunciation of idolatry (1 Sam. vii, 3-6). Saul's family were, however, tainted, as it seems, with idolatry, for the tabernacle of Bahosheth or Ebh-baal, and Mephibosheth or Merib-baal, his brothers, were sacrificed but in honor of Baal. From the circumstances of Michal's stratagem to save David, it seems not only that Saul's family kept teraphim, but, apparently, that they used them for purposes of divination, the Sept. having "living" for "pillow," as if the Hebr. had been מֵי instead of the present מי. See PILLOW. The circumstance of having teraphim, more especially if they were used for divination, lends especial force to Samuel's reproof of Saul (1 Sam. xxv, 28). During the reign of David idolatry in public is unmentioned, and no doubt was almost unknown. See DAVID.

The earlier days of Solomon were the happiest of the kingdom of Israel. The Temple worship was fully established, with the temple, while the high places, and there was no excuse for that worship of God at high places which seems to have been before permitted on account of the constant distractions of the country. But the close of that reign was marked by an apostasy of which we ript to prophesy. Neither the people had been the sinners, their leaders reformers; this was the king, led astray by his many strange wives, preferred the people, and raised high places on the Mount of Corruption, opposite God's temple. He worshipped Ashloareth, goddess of the Zidonians, Chemosh, the god of the Moabites, and Moloch, the Philipization of the Ammonites, building high places for the latter in Jerusalem, as well as for all the gods of his strange wives. Solomon, no doubt, was very tolerant, and would not prevent these women from following their native superstitions, even if it were only to burn their and his children before Molech. For Molech, openly and publicly in the presence of the sumity of Olivet were crowned with the high places of Ashloareth, Chemosh, and Molech (1 Kings xi, 7; 2 Kings xxii, 13), and the fourth, in memory of his great apostasy, was branded with the opprobrious title of the "Mount of Corruption." Calamity speedily followed this great apostasy; the latter years of Solomon were troubled by continual premonitions of those political reverses which were the inevitable penalty of this high treason against the theocracy. This is clearly brought out by the marked and frequent denunciations of the later prophets. See SOLOMON.

Rehoboam, the son of an Ammonitish mother, perpetuated the worst features of Solomon's idolatry (1 Kings xiv, 22-24); and in his reign was made the great schism in the national religion—when Jeroboam, fresh from his recollections of the Apis worship of Egypt, erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan, and by this crafty state policy severed forever the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (1 Kings xii, 26-33). To their use were temples consecrated, and the service in their honor was studiously copied from the Mosaic ritual. High-priest himself, Jeroboam ordained priests from the lowest ranks (2 Chron. xv, 13), and sacrifices were offered, and a solemn festival appointed, closely resembling the festival of tabernacles (1 Kings xii, 23, 33; comp. Amos iv, 4, 5). See JEROBOAM. The worship of the calves, "the sin of Israel" (Hos. vi, 8), which was apparently associated with the great-worship of Menes (2 Chron. xii, 15; Herod. ii, 14), the Gentile Zalath, Megiddo (Orig. Hebr. v, 3), and the Asherim (1 Kings xiv, 15; A.V. "groves"), ultimately spread to the kingdom of Judah, and centred in Beersheba (Amos v, 5; vii, 9). At what precise period it was introduced into the latter kingdom is not certain. The Chronicles tell us how Abijah taunted Jeroboam with apostasy, while the less partial narrative in 1 Kings represents his own conduct as far from exemplary (1 Kings xv, 3). Asa's sweeping reform spared not the idol of his grandmother Maachah, and, with the exception of the high places, he removed all relics of idolatrous worship (1 Kings xv, 12-14), with its accompanying impurities. His reformation was completed by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii, 6). See each in alphabetical order.

The successors of Jeroboam followed in his steps, till Ahab, who married a Zidonian princess, at her instigation (1 Kings xxi, 25) built a temple and altar to Baal, and reigned over the abominations of the Amorites (1 Kings xxi, 26). For this he attained the circumference of having done more "to provoke Jehovah, the God of Israel, to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him" (1 Kings xxi, 33). Compared with the worship of Baal, the worship of the calves was a venial sin, probably because it was morally less de-testable, and also less anti-national (1 Kings xxi, 27; 2 Kings x, 28-31). See ELIJAH. Henceforth Baal-worship became so completely identified with the northern kingdom that it is described as walking in the way or statutes of the kings of Israel (2 Kings xvi, 3, 5), as distinguished from the sin of Jeroboam, which ceased not till the Captivity (from the sin of Ahab), and the corruption of the ancient inhabitants of the land. The idolatrous priests became a numerous and important caste (1 Kings xviii, 19), living under the patronage of royalty, and fed at the royal table. The extirpation of Baal's priests was a pledge of his fidelity to the Lord (2 Kings x, in which the royal family of Judah went to Zecora, § 24.27), was a death-blow to this form of idolatry in Israel, though other systems still remained (2 Kings xii, 6). But, while Israel thus sinned and was punished, Judah was morally more guilty (Ezek. xlv, 51). The alliance of Jehoshaphat with the family of Ahab was transferred to the southern kingdom, during the reign of his son and grandson, all the appurtenances of Baal-worship (2 Kings viii, 18, 27). In less than ten years after the death of that king, in whose praise it is recorded that he "sought not the Baalim, nor walked after the deed of Israel," there was been built for the idol, statues and altars erected, and priests appointed to minister in his service (2 Kings xix, 18). Jehoiada's vigorous measures checked the evil for a time, but his reform was incomplete, and the high places still remained, as in the days of Asa, a nucleus for any fresh system of idolatry (2 Kings xxi, 8). Much of this might be due to the influence of the king's mother, Zibiah of Beersheba, a place intimately connected with the idolatrous defection of Judah (Amos viii, 14). After the death of Jehoiada, the princes prevailed upon Joash to restore at least some portion of his father's idolatry (2 Chron. xxiv, 4). The conquest of the Edomites by Amaziah introduced the worship of their gods, which had disappeared since the days of Solomon (2 Chron. xxv, 14, 20). After this period, even the kings who did not lend themselves to the encouragement of false worship had to contend with the corruption which still lingered in the hearts of the people (2 Kings xxv, 21; 2 Chron. xxvii, 2). Hitherto the temple had been kept pure. The statues of Baal and the other gods were worshipped in their own shrines; but Athaz, who "sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus, which smote him" (2 Chron. xxiv, 22), and built altars to them at every corner of Jerusalem, had high places established, and replaced the brazen altar of burnt-offering by one made after the model of "the altar" of Damascus, and deaced it to his own uses (2 Kings xvi, 10-15).

The conquest of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser was for them the last scene of the drama of abominations which had been so perpetually for upwards of 250 years. In the northern kingdom reform arose to vary the long line of royal apostates; whatever was effected in the way of reformation was done by the hands of the people (2 Chron. xxxii, 1). But even in their captivity they helped to perpetuate the corruption. The captives found a place of worship at the hand of their conquerors in the cities of Samaria, brought with them their own gods, and were taught at Bethel, by a priest of the captive nation, "the manner of the god of the
IDIOLATRY

The first act of Hezekiah on ascending the throne was the restoration and purification of the Temple, which had been dismantled and closed during the latter part of his father's life (2 Chron. xxviii, 24; xxx, 3). The multitudes who flocked to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover, so long in abeyance, removed the idolatrous altars outside the walls of the city, and as Ahaz had closed the Temple gates (2 Chron. xxx, 14). The iconoclastic spirit was not confined to Judah and Benjamin, but spread throughout Ephraim and Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxi, 1), and to all external appearance idolatry was extirpated. But the reform extended little below the surface (Isa. xxix, 18). Among the leaders of the people there were many in high position who conformed to the necessities of the time (Isa. xxviii, 14), and under Manasseh's patronage the false worship, which had been merely driven into obscurity, broke out with tenfold virulence. Idolatry of every form, and with all the accessories of enchantments, divination, and witchcraft, went on with great licentiousness; the Temple itself was polluted by public courses and sacrifices of burnt-offering and peace-offering, the place was too sacred, no associations too hallowed, to be spared the contamination. If the conduct of Ahaz in erecting an altar in the temple court is open to a charitable construction, Manasseh's was of no doubtful character. The two courts of the Temple were profaned by altars dedicated to the host of heaven, and the image of the Asherah polluted the holy place (2 Kings xi, 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 15; comp. Jer. xxxii, 34). Even in his late repentance he did not entirely destroy all traces of his former wrong. Tradition states that the remains of the aged Isaiah (q.v.) only served to secure his place (Gen. vi, 4, v. Yehonoth, iv.). The people still burned incense on the high places; but Jehovah was the ostensible object of their worship. The king's son sacrificed to his father's idols, but was not associated with him in his repentance, and in his short reign of two years restored to the idolatry of his fathers the images of the Asherah. With the death of Josiah the last effort to revive among the people a purer ritual, if not a purer faith. The lamp of David, which had long shed but a struggling ray, flickered for a while, and then went out in the darkness of Babylonian captivity.

It will be useful here to recapitulate the main varieties of the idolatry which so greatly marred the religious character of this monarchical period of the Jewish state. It has been a question much debated whether the Israelites were ever so far given up to idolatry as to lose all knowledge of the true God. It would be hard to assert this of any nation, and still more difficult to prove. That there always remained among them a faithful few, who in the face of every danger adhered to the worship of Jehovah, may readily be believed, for even at a time when Baal-worship was most prevalent there were those who maintained their belief and had not bowed before his image (1 Kings xix, 18). But there is still room for grave suspicion that among the masses of the people, though the idea of a supreme Being—of whom the images they worshipped were but the distorted representatives—was not entirely lost, it was so obscured as to be but dimly apprehended. And not only were the ignorant multitude thus led astray, but the priests, scribes, and prophets became leaders of the apostasy (Jer. ii, 8). Warburton, indeed, maintained that they never formally renounced Jehovah, and that their defection consisted in "joining foreign worship and idolatry to the ritual worship of the true God" (Ut. Leg. b. v, § 8). But one passage in their history, though obscurely obscure, seems to point to a time when, under the rule of the judges, "Israel for many days had no true God, and no teaching priest, and no law" (2 Chron. xxv, 3). The correlative argument of Codsworth, who contends from the teaching of the Hebrew doctors and rabbins "that the pagan nations anciently, at least the intelligent amongst them, acknowledged one supreme God of the whole world, and that all other gods were but creatures and inferior ministers," is controverted by Moosheim (Intell. Sacri, i, 4, § 50, and notes). There can be no doubt that much of the idolatry of the Hebrews consisted in worshipping the true God under an image, such as the calves at Bethel and Dan (Josephus, Ant. viii, 5, 8; ἵππαρ θεον καθαρί βαθμος, and by associating his worship with idolatrous rites ( Jer. xii. 5) and places consecrated to idols (2 Kings xviii, 2). From the peculiarity of their position, they were not surprised at their being guised as the inventors of a new pantheon, nor did they adopt any one system of idolatry so exclusively as ever to become identified with it (so the Moabites with the worship of Chemosh [Num. xxvi, 29]); but they no sooner came in contact with other nations than they readily adapted themselves to their practices, the old spirit of antagonism died rapidly away, and intermarriage was one step to idolatry.

a. Sun-worship, though mentioned with other kinds of high nature-worship, as in the enumeration of those suppressed by Josiah, seems to have been practiced alone amongst the Canaanites, and as well as with the adoration of other heavenly bodies. In Ezekiel's vision, under the vision of the Temple in Jerusalem, he saw about four-and-twenty men between the porch and the altar of the Temple, with their backs to the Temple and their faces to the east, worshipping the sun (Ezek. viii, 16). Josiah had before this taken away "the horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun, at the entering in of the house of the Lord," and had burned the chariots of the sun with fire (2 Kings xxiii, 11). The same part of the temple is perhaps here meant. There is nothing to show whether these were images or living horses. The horse was sacred to the sun among the Persians, but the worship of the visible sun instead of an image looks rather like a Persian or an Arab custom. See SUN.

b. In the account of Josiah's reform we read of the abolition of the worship of Baal, the sun, the moon, Mazzaloth, also called Mazzaroth (Job xxxviii, 82), which we hold to be the homes of the moon [see Heaven]. The avowal of the sun and moon as the hosts of heaven, and of the stars as gods (Jer. xiv, 18). In this prophet's time the people of Judah and Jerusalem, among other abominations, made cakes for "the queen of heaven," or "the worship of heaven:" a different form justifying the latter reading. The usual reading is פִסָל יָאִサービス, queen, which the Sept. once follows, the Vulg. always; some copies give פָּרָס וּלְעָשׁוּר, worship, that is, "a deity or goddess." The former reading seems preferable, and the context in two places (Isa. i, 29, Jer. ii, 8) shows that the worship of Baal had long been continuous, and was therefore not admissible (xliv, 17, 18, 19, 25). In Egypt, the remnant that fled after the murder of Gidaliah were warned by the prophet to abandon those idolatrous practices for which their country and cities had been desolated. The men, conscious that they had burned incense to false gods in Egypt, declared that they would certainly burn incense and pour out drink-offerings to the queen of heaven, as they, their fathers, their kings, and their princes had done in a time of plenty, asserting that since they had left off these practices they had been convicted and reprimanded by the priests of Jehovah. A fresh doom was pronounced upon them (ch. xlv). It is very difficult to conjecture what goddess can be here meant: Ashthoreth would suit, but is never mentioned interchangeably: the moon must be rejected for the same reason. Here we certainly see a strong resemblance to Arab idolatry, which was wholly composed of cosmic worship and of fetishism, and in which the mansions of the moon were reverenced on account of their connection with seasons of rain. This system of cosmic worship may have been introduced from the Natathas-ians or Ezechiel of Petra, from the Sabians, or from other Arabs or Chaldeans. Ezechiel Qalav Nahoum is, Fate, or Fate, he or it divided, assigned, numbered, are spoken of in a single passage in the later part of Isaiah (xxv, 11). Gesenius, depending upon the theory of the post-Asian authorship of the latter chapters of the prophet, makes these to be idols worshipped by the Jews in Babylon, but it must be remarked that their names are not traceable in Babylonian and Assyrian mythology.

Gesenius has, however, following Pococke (Spec. Hist. Arabum, p. 98), compared Meni with Mimmah, a goddess of the pagan Arabs, worshipped in the form of a stone between Mekkeh and El-Mediteh by the tribes of Hishyel and Kibzah. But El-Beydawat, though deriving the name of this idol from Mekkeh, set it cut"), supposes it was thus called because victims were slain upon it (Comment. in Coran. ed. Flischner, p. 298). This meaning certainly seems to disturb the idea that the two idols were identical, but the mention of the sword and slaughter as punishment of the idolaters who worshipped Gad and Meni is perhaps meant to suggest that the first was an antique form of the second, under a different name. Gad may have been a Canaanitish form of Baal, if we are to judge from the geographical name Baal-gad of a place at the foot of Mount Hermon (Isa. xi, 17; xii, 7; xiii, 6). Perhaps the grammatical form of Meni may throw some light upon the origin of this idolatry. The worship of both idols resembles that of the cosmic divinities of the later kings of Judah. See Meni.

d. In Ezekiel's vision of the idolatries of Jerusalem he beheld a chamber of imagery in the Temple itself, having "every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the host of heaven," portrayed upon the wall round about," and seventy Israelish elders offering incense (Ezek. viii, 7-12). This is so exact a description of an Egyptian sanctuary, with the idols depicted upon its walls, dimly lighted, and filled with incense-offering priests, that we cannot for a moment doubt that these Jewsi from Egypt, that their fetishism, for such this special worship appears mainly, if not wholly to have been. See Imagery, Chamber of.

e. In the same vision the prophet saw women weeping in the temple of Tammuz (ver. 13, 14), known to be the same as Asmodea, from whom the fourth month of the Syrian year was named. This worship was probably introduced by Azaz from Syria. See Tammuz.

f. The image of jealousy, יִנְקָה יַרְדֵּנָה, spoken of in the same passage, which was placed in the temple, has not been satisfactorily explained. The meaning may only be that it was an image of a false god, or there may have been a play in the second part of the appellation upon the proper name. We cannot, however, suggest any name that might be thus intended. See Jealousy, Image of.

g. The brazen serpent, having become an object of idolatrous worship, was destroyed by Hezekiah (2 Kings xv, 17). See Brazen serpent.

h. Moloch-worship was not only celebrated at the high place Solomon had made, but at Topheth, in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, where children were made to pass through the fire to the Ammonitish abomination. This place, as well as Solomon's altar, Josiah defiled, and we read of later worship of Moloch, Chemosh, and Ashoreth. See Moloch.

i. For the supposed divinity תָּרָה of Is. lxvi, 17 (compare Meier, De uno diei Asyriorum, Helmst. 1734), see Achar.

The new population placed by the king of Assyria in the cities of Samaria adopted a strange mixture of religions. Terrified at the destruction by lions of some of their number, they petitioned the king of Assyria, and an Israelitish priest was sent to them. They then adopted the old worship at high places, and still served their own idols. The people of Babylon, and of Suscubbenoth; the Cuthites, Nergal; the Hamathites, Asshima, the Avites, Nibhaz and Tartak, and the people of Sepharvaim burned their children to their native gods, Admur, and Manames, and Anammelech. Nergal is a well-known Babylonian idol, and the occurrence of the element melech (king) in the names of the Molech of Sepharvaim is very remarkable (2 Kings xxiv, 24-41).

4. The Babylonian Exile was an effectual rebuke of the national sin. It is true that even during the captivity the practice of false worship did not disappear, but they lost their craft as prophets and diviners (Jer. xxix, 8; Ezek. xii, 12) and the Jews who fled to Egypt carried with them recollections of the material prosperity which attended their idolatrous sacrifices in Judah, and to the neglect of which they attributed their exiled condition (Jer. xlv, 17, 18). One of the first difficulties, indeed, with which Ezra had to contend, and which brought him wellnigh to despair, was the haste with which his countrymen took them foreign wives of the people of the land, and followed them in all their abominations (Ezra ix). The priests and Levites, with whom he looked for assistance in his great enterprise, were amongst the first to yield to this temptation (Ezra ix, 2; x, 18; Neh. vi, 17, 18; xiii, 23). Still, the post-exilic prophets speak of idolatry as an evil of the past, Zechariah foretelling the time when the very names of the false gods would be forgotten (xiii, 2). In Malachi we see that a cold formalism was already the national sin, and such was ever after the case with the Jewish people. The Babylonian Exile, therefore, may be said to have purified the Jews from their idolatrous tendencies. How this great change was wrought does not appear. Partly, no doubt, it was due to the pious example of Ezra and Nehemiah; partly, perhaps, to the Persian contempt for the lower kinds of idolatry, which insured a respect for the Hebrew religion on the part of the government; partly to the sight of the fulfillment of God's predicted judgments upon the idolatrous nations which the Jews had either sought as allies or feared as enemies. See Exile.

5. Years passed by, and the names of the idols of Canaan had been forgotten, when the Hebrews were assailed by a new danger. Greek idolatry under Alexander and his successors was practiced throughout the civilized world. The conquests of Alexander in Asia caused God to be extensively felt, and Greek idolatry to be first tolerated and then practised by the Jews (1 Macc. i, 43-30, 54). Some place-hunting Jews were base enough to adopt it. At first the Greek princes who ruled Palestine wisely forbore to interfere with the Hebrew religion. The political earlier Ptolemies even encouraged it; but when the country had fallen into the hands of the Seleucids, Antiochus Epiphanes, reversing his father's policy of toleration, seized Jerusalem, set up an idol-altar to Jupiter in the Temple itself, and forbade the observance of the law. Weakly supported by a miserable faction, he had to depend wholly upon his auxiliary power. The attempt of Antiochus to establish this form of worship was vigorously resisted by Mattathias (1 Macc. ii, 23-26), who was joined in his rebellion by the Assidians (ver. 42), and destroyed the altars at which the king commanded them to sacrifice (1 Macc. ii, 33, 45). The erection of synagogues has been assigned as a reason for the commutative purity of the Jewish worship after the Captivity (Prideaux, Com. ii, 574), while another cause has been discovered in the hatred for images acquired by the Jews in their intercourse with the Persians. The Maccaean revolt, small as its beginning, had the national heart on its side, and, after a long and varied struggle, achieved more than the nation had ever before effected since the days of the Judges. Thenceforward idolatry was to the Jew the religion of his enemies, and naturally made no converts.
6. The early Christians were brought into contact with idolaters when the Gospel was preached among the Gentiles, and it became necessary to enact regulations for preventing scandal by their being involved in pagan practices, when joining in the private meals and festivities of the heathen (1 Cor. viii). In these cases the converts did not seem to have been in any danger of reverting to idolatry, and the cruel persecutions they underwent did not tend to lead them back to a religion which their more refined contemporaries despised. It is, however, not impossible that many who had been original worshippers of a false god, but who have renounced idolatry, really abandon all their former superstitions, and that we may thus explain the very early outbreak of many customs and opinions not sanctioned in the N. T.

V. Ethical Views respecting Idolatry. That this is a cardinal sin, and, indeed, the highest, if not the principal principle of all sin, as aiming a direct blow at the throne of God itself, is evident from its prohibition in the very fore-front of the Decalogue. Hence the tenacity with which the professors of all true religion in every age have opposed it, under every disguise and at whatever cost to themselves. He who has always denied the association of polytheism, and those corrupt forms of Christianity, such as the Roman and Greek Churches, which have endeavored to apologize for the adoration of pictures, images, etc., on the flimsy pretext that it is not the worship of objects themselves, but the object, that is disapproved, but only the beings thus represented, are but imitators in this of the sophistry of certain refined speculators among the grosser heathen, e. g. of Egypt, Greece, etc., who put forth similar claims. See Isma-'Urwah.

Three things are condemned in Scripture as idolatry:— 1. The worship of a false God; 2. The worshiping of the true God through an image; 3. the indulgence of those passions which draw the soul away from God, e. g. covetousness, lust, etc.

The Israelites were guilty of the first when they bowed the knee to Baal; of the second when they set up the golden calves; and both Israelites and Christians are often guilty of the third.

1. Light in which idolatry was regarded in the Mosaic Code, and the penalties with which it was visited. — If one member of the Hebrew polity was to teach the unity of God, the extermination of idolatry was but a subordinate end. Jehovah, the God of the Israelites, was the chief of the deities. He was the only real king of the people, who had delivered them from bondage, and to whom they had a willing oath of allegiance. They had entered into a solemn league and covenant with him as their chosen king (comp. 1 Sam. viii, 7), by whose obedience was required with temporal blessing and retribution with temporal punishment. This original contract of the Hebrew government, as it has been termed, is contained in Exod. xix, 3-8; xxx, 2-5; Deut. xxxi, 10-33; the blessings promised to obedience are enumerated in Deut. xxvii, 1-14, and the withering curses on disobedience in verses 15-58. That this covenant was strictly insisted on it needs but slight acquaintance with Hebrew history to perceive. Often broken and often renewed on the part of the people (Judg. x, 10; 2 Chron. xvii, 12, 13; Neh. ix, 38), it was kept with unwavering constancy on the part of Jehovah. To their kings he stood in the relation, so to speak, of a feudal superior: they were his representatives upon earth, and with them as with the people before, his covenant was made (1 Kings iii, 14; xi, 11). Idolatry, therefore, to an Israelite was a state offence (1 Sam. xv, 25), a political crime of the gravest character, high-treason against the majesty of the king, a transgression of the covenant (Deut. xvii, 2), "the evil pre-eminent in the eyes of Jehovah (1 Kings xxix, 25, opp. "תַּמָּם," the right," 2 Chron. xxvii, 2). But it was much more than all this. While the idolatry of foreign nations was merely considered as an abomination in the sight of God, which called for his vengeance, the sin of the Israelites is regarded as of more glaring enormity, and greater moral guilt. In the figurative language of the prophets, the relation between Jehovah and his people is represented as a marriage bond (Isa. liv, 5; Jer. iii, 14), and the worship of false gods, with all its accompaniments (Lev. xx, 25), becomes then the greatest of all abominations (Hos. iii, 1). This is beautifully brought out in Hos. ii, 16, where the heathen name Baal, my master, which the apostle Israel has been accustomed to apply to his foreign possessor, is contrasted with his, my man, my husband, the native word which she is to use when restored to her rightful husband, Jehovah. Much of the significance of this figure was unquestionably due to the impurities of idolaters, with whom such corruption was of more lively spiritual character (Exod. xxxiv, 16; Num. xxxvi, 1, 2, etc.), but manifested itself in the grossest and most revolting forms (Rom. i, 26-28).

Regarded in a moral aspect, false gods are called "stumbling-blocks" (Ezek. xiii, 8), "lance" (Amos ii, 4, Rom. i, 25), "horror" or "fright" (1 Kings xv, 13; Jer. i, 38), "abominations" (Deut. xxix, 17; xxxii, 16; 1 Kings xi, 5; 2 Kings xxiii, 18), "guilt" (abstract for concrete, Amos viii, 14, נַעַרֶשׁ, נַעַרֶשׁ; comp. 2 Chron. xxix, 18, perhaps with a play on Ashima, 2 Kings xvii, 30); and with a profound sense of the degradation consequent upon this worship, they are characterized by the prophets, as they were to the people against them (Jer. xiv, 4), as "shame" (Jer. xi, 13; Hos. ix, 10). As considered with reference to Jehovah, they are "other gods" (Josh. xxiv, 2, 16), "strange gods" (Deut. xxxii, 16), "new gods" (Judg. v, 8), "devils—not God" (Deut. xxvii, 17; 1 Cor. x, 20) and, as denoting their foreign origin, "gods of the foreigner" (Josh. xxix, 14, 15). Their powerlessness is indicated by describing them as "gods that cannot save" (Isa. xiv, 20), "that made not the heavens" (Jer. x, 11), "nothing" (Isa. xii, 24; 1 Cor. viii, 4), "wind and emptines" (Isa. xxv, 6), "vanities of the Gentiles" (Ecclus. xix, 22; Acts xiv, 15); and yet, while their deity is denied, their personal existence seems to have been acknowledged (Kurtz, Gesch. d. A. B. ii, 86, etc.), though not in the same manner in which the pretensions of local deities were reciprocally recognized by the heathen (1 Kings xx, 22, 29; 2 Kings xvii, 26). Other terms of contempt are employed with reference to idols, מַעֲלָקָה (Lev. xix, 4), and בִּילָל, בִּילָלִים (Deut. xxix, 17), to which different meanings have been assigned, and many which indicate ceremonial uncleanness. See Idol.

Idolatry, therefore, being from one point of view a political offence, could be punished without infringement of civil rights. No penalties were attached to mere opinions. For aught we know, theological speculation may have been as free among the Hebrews as in modern times, though such was not the tendency of the Shemitic mind. It was not, however, such speculations, heterodox though they might be, but overt acts of idolatry, which were made the subjects of legislation (Michaelis, Leben d. Moses, ii, 245, 246). The first and second commandments are directed against idolatry of every form. Individuals and communities were equally amenable to the rigorous code. The individual offender was devoted to destruction (Exod. xxii, 20); his nearest relatives were to be bound to him, and deliver him up to punishment (Deut. xii, 2-10), but their hands were to strike the first blow when, on the evidence of two witnesses at least, he was stoned (Deut. xvii, 2-5). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut. xiii, 9-10). An idolatrous state was a similar crime, and was more strongly declared in the Old Test, than that the extermination of the Canaanites was the punishment of their idolatry (Exod. xxxiv, 15, 16; Deut. vii, xii, 39-41; xx, 17), and that the calamities of the Israelites were due to the same cause (Jer. ii, 17). A city guilty of idolatry was looked upon as a cancer of the state; it was considered to be in rebellion, and treated according to the laws of war. Its inhabitants and all their cattle were put to death. No spoil was taken, but everything it contained was burnt with itself; nor was it allowed to be rebuilt (Deut. xiii, 18-16; Josh. vii. 7). Samson was born to a poor and humble family, and his feats were remarkable for transgressing this law (1 Sam. xv; Josh. vii; i Kings xvi, 34). The silver and gold with which the idols were covered were accusd (Deut. vii, 25, 26). Not only were the Israelites forbidden to serve the gods of Canaan (Exod. xxiii, 24, 25), but even to mention the names of those gods, or to call upon them in prayer or any form of worship (Exod. xxiii, 13; Josh. xxiii, 7). On taking possession of the land they were to obliterate all traces of the existing idolatry; statues, altars, pillars, idol- temples, every person and every thing connected with it, were to be swept away (Exod. xxiii, 24, 32; xxxiv, 18; Deut. vii, 5, 25; xii, 1-3; xx, 17), and the name and worship of the idols blotted out. Such were the precautions taken by the framers of the Mosaic code to preserve the worship of Jehovah, the true God, in its purity. Of the manner in which his descendants have "put a fence" about these "laws" we will say nothing; it is evident that many instances will be found in Maimonides (De Idol.). They were prohibited from using vessels, scarlet garments, bracelets, or rings, marked with the sign of the sun, moon, or dragon (Deut. vii, 19); trees planted or stones erected for idol-worship were forbidden (viii, 5, 17), nor was it permitted that the possession of a dead totem, if the image of an idol were found among other images intended for ornament, they are all to be cast into the Dead Sea (vii, 11).—Smith. See ANATHEMA.

2. NEW-TEST. Definitions on the Subject.—(1.) The name "idolater" is given not only to persons who worship with idols, but to owners of any form of image, as such as worship idols of their own mind. Acts xvii, 16: "Now, while Paul waited for them at Athens, his spirit was stirred within him when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry." 1 Cor. v, 10, 11: "Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or idolaters; for they have need of these things: but we by the sight of the Lord and of the Father, who is the true God, made these the objects of their veneration and worship. Thus they came to worship their progenitors (as in China) and their heroes, which latter worship is by some (Boss, for instance) considered as the only source of mythology. How from thence they passed to the worship of symbolic animals, thence to anthropomorphism, and finally to the adoration of statues as images of the deities, has been best explained by Creuzer in his Symbolik u. Mythologie d. alten Völker (5d edit. i, 5 sq.). The fathers did not fail to perceive the influence which the worship of statues and images had on the development of the symbolism and myths of the heathen religious systems. Lacantius (De falsa relig. i, 11) considers the consensus gentium in the belief in gods as a proof that they are touched by them. The early Protestant theologians had especially to contend against naturalism, who maintained that the recognition of a supreme God is innate in man, and denied our knowledge of the unity of God being due either to revelation or to tradition, since it is found at the foundation of the learned polytheistic systems. They considered all further developments in these systems as resulting from intentional additions made in support of their hierarchy by an interested priesthood, or by rulers from motives of policy (see Herbert of Cherbury, De relig. gentium, p. 6, 168 sq.). These views were ably opposed by Gerard Jo. Veselius (De theologia gentilis et physiologia Christiana i, 3 sq.), Van Dale (De origine et prog. idolatros), Thomas J. of Huntingdon (De idolatria, 160, 150, 25 sq.). They however meant, as did also Farmer (The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient Heathen Nations (London 1783)), that the demons, whether evil spirits or departed human souls, had very early become the objects of veneration on the part of the heathen, and that the idea that the heathen deities were not cotemplices, as the prophets had stated them to be, but really existing evil spirits, a view which was continued by the fathers, especially in relation to the so-called oracles. The earliest German theologians maintained that the recognition of a worship of demons. This, however, was gradually discarded after the researches of S. J. Baumgarten (Gesch. d. Re-

IDIOLATRY

Rome and Greek Churches.—Hertzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. Abgötterei. On this last point, see MARIOLOTRY; SAINT-WORSHIP, etc.

Idol (IΔΟΝ), the second name of the leading Jewish sect who sought to procure the aid of the Gentiles in the return from exile (1 Esd. viii, 48); evidently the ARIEL (q. v.) of the Hebrew text (Ezra viii, 16).

Idumea's (IΔΟΥΜΑodable), the Gr. form of the Heb. name Edom, as found in the Sept., the N. Test., and Josephus. According to Josephus (Ant. i. 1, 1), however, it is only a more approved name of pronouncing what would otherwise be AΔΩΜΑ (comp. Jerome on Ezek. xxv, 12). In the Sept. we sometimes meet with 'Edom, but more generally with 'Idoumaia (the people being called 'Idou-mataio), which is the uniform orthography in the Apocrypha (1 Mac. i, 15, 29, 1, v.; vi, 1, 2; 2 Mac. xii, 8), as well as in Mark iii, 8, the only passage in the N. T. where it occurs. Our Auth. Ver. has in three or four places (Is. xxxvii, 15; Ezek. xxxiv, 15; xxxvii, 5) substituted for Edom "Idoumaia," which is the name employed by the writers of Greece and Rome, though it is to be noted that they, as well as Josephus, include under that term Edomites in general, but sometimes Palestine itself, because a large portion of that country came into possession of the Edomites of later times.

The Heb. גד, Edom, as the name of the people, is masculine (Numb. xxii, 20); as the name of the country, feminine (Jer. xxii, 4). We often meet with the phrase גד, Edom, the "Land of Edom," and once with the poetic form גד, Edom, "the Field of Edom" (Judg. v, 4). The inhabitants are sometimes styled גד, Edomites, "the Children of Edom," and poetically גד, "Bath-Edom, "the Daughter of Edom" (Lam. iv, 21, 22). A single person was called גד, "Adom," an "Edomite" (Deut. xxiii, 3), of which the feminine גד, "Adomith," occurs in 1 Kings xi, 1.

1. Origin of the Name.—The name was derived from Isaac's son Edom, otherwise called Esau, the elder twinbrother of Jacob. See ESau. It signifies red, and seems first to have been suggested by his appearance at his birth, when "he came out all red." I. e. covered with red hair (Gen. xxv, 25), and it was afterwards more formally and literally applied to him, perhaps impressed on him by his father of Edom, his unwholesome disposal of his birthright for a mess of red lentils (Gen. xxvi, 30): "And Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, from the red, that red (גד, Edom, "red") for I am faint; therefore was his name called Red (Edom, גד)."

In the East it has always been usual for a chief either to give his name to the country which he conquers, or over which he rules, or to take a name from it. Esau, during the life of his father, seized the mountainous region occupied by the Horites. He had two names; but one of them was peculiarly applicable to the newly-acquired territory. The mountains of Seir were remarkable for their reddish color; hence, doubtless, the name Edom, "red," was given to the whole country. The most ancient Edom there were various stages. While the majority of the heathen are either on the brink or in the midst of fetishism, the more enlightened part look upon the idols only as symbols, sometimes of several deities, and sometimes of one God. Idolatry was formerly considered as divided into two distinct classes, according to the number of the gods venerated: absolute polytheism—the belief in the real divinity of the images—while the latter was either (Bauern) the worship of the several deities as subordinate to one, or (G. H. Voisius) the considering of the images worshiped as mere symbols of the invisible God. In Col. iii. 5 we find a metaphorical use made of the word idolatry to express undue attachment to earthly possessions and advantages. The same name has also been given, with good reason, to the use made of images in the 10: Ezek. xxxv, 8, etc.). The aborigines were called Horites (Sept. Ἰχαρίας; Gen. xiv, 6): that is, Trogodytes, or “cave-dwellers,” from the nature of their habitations. See Horites. The mountains of Edom, as all travellers know, are filled with caves and grottoes hewn in the soft sandstone strata.

2. History and geography.—Edom proper, or Idumea, is situated on the south-eastern border of Palestine, extending from it to the northern extremity of the Elatitic Gulf. It was bounded on the west by the great valley of the Arabah, on the south by a line drawn due east from the modern fortress of Akaba, on the east by the Arabian desert, and on the north by the ancient kingdom of Moab. Its length from north to south was about 100 miles, and its breadth averaged 20. These boundaries are nowhere directly defined, but we can ascertain them from various incidental references in Scripture. When the Israelites encamped at Kadesh-barnea they were close to the border of Edom (Num. xxx), and Mount Hor is said to be within its border (xxxiii, 37). Hence, as Kadesh was situated in the valley of the Arabah, and as Mount Hor is only a few miles to the east of it, we conclude that the Arabah is the western boundary. The Israelites asked, but were refused admission through either Edom or Moab, so as to go direct from Kadesh to the east side of the Jordan (Num. xx, 14-20; Judg. xi, 17, 18). In consequence of this refusal, they were obliged to march south along the Arabah to Edom-geber, and thence eastward by the wilderness as far as the territories of the Arabah and Moab (Num. xxxii, 4). Hence we conclude that Edom and Moab occupied the whole region along the east side of the valley of the Arabah, from the Dead Sea to the Elatitic Gulf. Edom was wholly a mountainous country, as may be inferred from the names given to it in the ancient writers (Herodotus, ii, 1; ii, 5; Josephus, Ant. ii, 1, 2; Eusebius, Onomast. s. v. Idumea). The foot of the mountain range, therefore, may be regarded as marking its eastern border. On the north it appears to have been separated from Moab by the “brook Zered” (Deut. ii, 13, 14, 18; Num. xxxii, 12), which is probably identical with the modern wady el-Ahsay. These views are corroborated by other and independent testimony. In the Samaritan Pentateuch the word Gaba is substituted for Seir in Deut. xxxii, 2; and Eusebius and Jerome state that Idumea was in their time known as Yabala, which is a Greek (Ἀβαλλα) corruption of the Hebrew Gebal, “mountain” (Onomast. id. et al. s. v. Seir), and is retained to this day in the Arabic form Jebel. The modern province of Jebel is bounded on the west by the Arabah, and on the north by wady el-Ahsay (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 151; Burchardt, Trav. in Syria, p. 410). We may safely conclude from this that the ancient province had the same boundaries, as it had the same name. Thus Josephus writes (Ant. v, 1, 22): “The lot of Simeon included that part of Idumea which bordered upon Egypt and Arabia;” and, though this is true, it does not contradict the language of Scripture—“I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a footestool, because I have given Mount Seir unto Esau for a possession” (Deut. ii, 5). Not a footestool of Edom Proper, or Mount Seir, was ever given by divine sanction to the Jews.

Josephus divides Idumea into two provinces, Gobalit and Amalek (Ant. ii, 1, 2). The modern province of Idumæa Proper, being identical, as the name would indicate, with “Mount Seir,” the other embraced a portion of Southern Palestine, with the desert plain south of it, which was originally occupied by the Amalekites (Num. xiii, 29), and subsequently, as we shall see, by the Edomites. Pliny places Idumea to the south of Palestine, bordering upon Egypt (Hist. Nat. v, 14).

Strabo (xvi, 2, 86, p. 760) states that the Idumæans were originally Nabathæans, but, being driven out thence, they joined themselves to the Jews. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Geog. s. v.

5. History.—The first mention of Mount Seir is in Gen. xiv, 6, where the confederate kings are said to have smitten the “Horites in their Mount Seir.” B.C. cir. 2060. These Horites appear to have been a tribe of the gigantic aborigines of Western Asia, so called from dwelling in caves (Gen. xxxxi, 20-30). They were a pastoral people, divided into tribes and independent chief tribes called Alloph (ירוק, ver. 29). Esau’s marriage with the daughters of Canaan alienated him from his parents, and he then obtained a settlement among the Horites, where he acquired power and wealth as early as the time of Jacob’s return from Padan-aram (Gen. xxvii, 46). Probably his close alliance with Ishmael tended to increase his influence in that Central country (Gen. xxxvi, 32, 33; xxxvii, 3 sq.). Though then established in Edom, Esau had still some part of his flocks in Western Palestine, in connection with those of his father; but on the return of Jacob he removed all his property from Canaan and dwelt in Mount Seir (xxxvi, 6-8). He gradually subdued and finally exterminated, or perhaps rather supplanted, the Horites (Deut. ii, 12, 22), and a distinct tribe of his descendants, the Amalekites, leaving Edom, took possession of the desert plateau south of Canaan (Gen. xxxvi, 12; Exod. viii, 14 sq.). The earliest form of government among the Idumeans, as like that of the Horites, was, like that of the A. V. rendering “dukes,” but manifestly the same as the modern Arab sheikah), exercising independent authority over distinct tribes (Gen. xxxvi, 15-19). It appears, however, that the various tribes were, at least in times of general war, united under one leader, to whom the title of king (덱) was given. The names of eight of these kings (only one of whom is spoken of as related to any other, Anah, the son of Zibeon) are mentioned in Gen. xxxvi, 31-39, who are said to have reigned in Edom “before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,” that is, apparently before the time of Moses (see Deut. xxxiii, 5; Exod. xviii, 16-19). Most of the large nomadic tribes of Arabia have now an acknowledged chief, who is styled emir, and who takes the lead in any great emergency, while each division of the tribe enjoys independence under its own sheik on all ordinary occasions. Such would seem to have been the case with the Edomites, and this affords an easy solution of the apparent confusion in the account of the invasion of Edom (Gen. xxxvi, 31), recorded again in Exod. xv, 15, where it is said “the dukes of Edom shall be amazed,” and Judg. xi, 17, where Moses is represented as having sent “messengers from Kadesh unto the king of Edom.” The primitive and pastoral character of the people is incidentally brought out by their custom of abiding with their flocks (Gen. xxi, 31). Anah was in the habit of tending his father’s asses (Gen. xxxvi, 24). It was when thus employed that he found in the wilderness נָגַס, ko-genin, rendered in the Eng. Vers. by “the mules,” but meaning more probably “the hot springs.” There is in the country to the south-east of the Dead Sea (which formed part of the Seirite possessions) a place, Calneh, celebrated among the Greeks and Romans for its warm baths, which has been visited by modern travellers (Josephus, War, i, 33, 5; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 5, 17; Legh’s Travels).

Though the Israelites and Edomites were closely related, and though the former were commanded “not to abhor an Edomite, for he is thy brother” (Deut. xxi, 7), yet the bitterest enmity appears to have existed between them at every period of their history, as a perpetuation of the unbrotherly feud between their progenitors. When the Israelites asked permission to pass through the territory of Edom on their way to Canaan, they were rudely refused by its king (Deut. xvi, 1). The road by which it was sought to penetrate the country was termed “the king’s highway” (ver. 17), supposed by Dr. Robinson (Researches, ii, 556; but see a different explanation in De Saulcy's Narrative, i, 392; comp. 273, 276) to be wady el-Ghuweir, for it is almost the only valley that affords direct and easy passage through those mountains. From a comparison of these incidents it may be inferred that the change in the form of government took place during the wanderings of the Israelites in the Desert, unless we suppose, with Rosenmuller, that it was only this north-eastern part of Edom which was seized as a conquest, the rest of the country remaining under the way of the Amorites. But whether the regal power at this period embraced the whole territory or not, perhaps it did not supplant the ancient constitution, but was rather grafted on it, like the authority of the Judges in Israel, and of Saul, the first king. This did not materially interfere with the government that previously existed. It further appears, from the list of Idumean kings, that the monarchy was not hereditary, but elective (for no one is spoken of as the son or relative of his predecessor); or probably that chiefman was acknowledged as sovereign who was best able to vindicate his claim by force of arms. Every successive king appears to have selected his own seat of government: the places mentioned as having enjoyed that distinction are Dinhalah, Avith, Pagu or Pai. Even forefathers were not excluded from the throne, for the successor of Samlah of Masrekah was Saul, or Chaun, "son of Recab," near "the river." These meanings, literally, streets, and was a not uncommon name given to towns; but the emphatic addition of the river points evidently to the Ephrathites, and between Rakkah and Anah, on that river, there still are the remains of a city called by the Arabs Rababah Malik Ibn-Tauk. In the reign of Solomon, the king of Israel, and of Hadad, who was of the king's seed in Edom (1 Kings xi, 14); from which some have conjectured that by that period there was a royal dynasty of one particular family; but all that the expression may imply is that he was a blood relation of the last king of the country. Hadad was the name of one of the early sovereigns whom smote Midian in the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi, 35).

The country was attacked by Saul with partial success (1 Sam. xiv, 47). A few years later David overthrew the Edomites in the "valley of Salt," at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 100), and put garrisons in their cities (2 Sam. vii, 14; 1 Chron. xxvii, 11-13; 1 Kings xi, 15). Comp. the inscription of Psa. ix. and v, 8, 9; cviii, 9, 10, where "the strong city may denote Selah or Petra). Then were fulfilled the prophecies in Gen. xxv, 32 and xxvii, 40, that the elder should serve the younger; and also the prediction of Is. (viii, 24; xxxvii, 36; Jer. xxv, 21; Ezek. xlv, 13, 14; Obad. 10-11). From the language of Malachi (i, 2, 3), and also from the accounts preserved by Josephus (Ant. x. 9, 7), it would seem that the Edomites did not wholly escape the Chaldean scourge; but instead of being carried captive, like the Jews, they not only retained possession of their own territory, but in the rapid turnovers of the state, were carried far as Helbon (1 Macc. v, 65, comp. with Ezeke. xxxvi, 10; xxxvi, 5). Probably as a reward for the assistance afforded by them to the Chaldeans, the Edomites were permitted to settle in Southern Palestine, and in the country lying by it and the borders of Egypt. The name Idumaea was now given to the whole country, from the valley of the Aralah to the Mediterranean (Joseph. Ant. vi. 1, 22; Strabo, xvi, 2), and from Elytheropolis to Elath (Jerome, Comment. in Obod.); hence arose the mistakes of Roman writers, who sometimes give the name Idumea to all Palestine, and call the Jews Idumaeans (Virgil, Georgy, iii, 12; Juvenal, xiv, 180).

While the Edomites thus extended their conquests westward, they were driven out of their own country by the Nabataeans (q. v.), who, leaving the nomad habits of their ancestors, settled down amid the mountains of Edom, engaged in commerce, and founded the little kingdom of Arabia Petraea. Some of their monarchs took the name Aretas (2 Macc. v, 8; Joseph. Ant. xv, 1, 2), and some Obodas (Joseph. Ant. xiii, 5, 1). One of them was that Aretas whose daughter Herod Antipas married (Matt. iv, 5, 4); and it was the same king of Arabia who captured Damascus, and who was killed by the forces of Paul's conversion (Acts ix, 25; 2 Cor. xi, 32). Idumaea was taken by the Romans in A.D. 165, and under their paternal government the enterprise inhabitants increased greatly in wealth and power. A lucrative transport trade thrived between India, Persia, and the Levant which was in their hands. Roads were made across the desert of Arabia, through the deserts of Edom, and westward and northward to the Mediterranean and Palestine. Traces of them still remain, with ruinous settlements at intervals, and fallen milestones of the times of Trajan and Marcus Aurelius (Peregr. Tauris; La borde's Voyage; Burckhardt's Syria, p. 374, 43, 198; and Mangles's Travels, p. 571, 371, 1st ed.). The magnificent rock-temples, palaces, and tombs of Petra were then constructed, which still continue to be the wonder and admiration of Eastern travellers. They are not the works of the Edomites, but of the descendants of Nebaioth, Ishmael's oldest son and Esau's brother-in-law (Gen. xxv, 13; xxxvi, 3; Joseph. Ant. i, 12, 4; Diod. Sic. 19.)

On the revival of Jewish power under the Ammonites, that part of Southern Palestine to which the name Idumea had been given by Benevento, they were finally subdued by John Hyrcanus, who compelled them to submit to circumcision and other Jewish rites, with a view to incorporate them with the nation (1 Macc. v, 8, 65; 2 Macc. x, 16; xi, 32; Joseph. Ant. xii, 9, 1; 15, 4). The small-gamma, however, before these two races seems never to have been perfected. The country was governed by Jewish prefects, and one of these, an Idumean by birth, became procurator of Judea, and his son was Herod the Great, "king of the Jews" (Joseph. Ant. xii, 8, 6; xiii, 9, 2; xiv, 1, 8 and 8; xv, 7, 9; xvii, 11, 4). Not long before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, 20,000 Idumeans were called in to the defence of the city by the Zealots, but both parties gave themselves up to rapine and murder (Joseph. War, iv, 4, 5; 5, 1; vii, 8, 1). This is the last mention made of the Edomites in history. The author of a work on Job, once ascribed to Origen, says that their name and language had perished, and that, like the Ammonites and Moabites, they had all become Arabs. In the second century Ptolemy limits the name Idumea to the country west of the Jordan.

In the first centuries of the Christian era Edom was included in the province of Palaestina Tertia, of which Petra was metropolis (S. Paulo, Geogr. Sac. p. 207; Reland, Palest. p. 218). After the Mohammedan conquest its commercial importance declined, its flourishing port and inland cities fell to ruin. The Mohammedans were the instruments by which the fearful predictions of the Scripture were finally fulfilled. The Crusaders made several expeditions to Edom, penetrating it as far as Petra, to which they gave the name "Valley of Moses" (Gesta Dei per Francos, p. 518, 555, etc.), a name still existing in the Arabic form Wady Mita. On a commanding hill some twelve miles north of Petra they built a fortress, and called it Monastery; its modern name is Shobek (ib. p. 611). The Crusaders occupied and fortified Kerak, the ancient Kir Moab, and raised it to the dignity of an episcopal see, under the impression that it was Petra (ib. p. 812, 885, 1119). From the age of the Crusaders until the present century nothing was known of Idumea to the traveller who had passed through it, and as a country it had disappeared from history. Volney heard some vague reports of its wonders from Arabs. Seetzen also heard much of it in the year 1806, but he was unable to enter it. Burckhardt was the first to traverse the country. In 1812 he travelled from Kerak south by Shobek to Petra (Trav. in Syr. p. 372 sq.; Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 165). In 1828, Laborde, proceeding northward from Akabah through the defiles of Edom, also visited Petra, and brought away a portfolio of splendid drawings, which proved that the descriptions of Burckhardt had not been exaggerated. Many have since followed the footsteps of the first explorers, and a trip to Petra now forms a necessary part of the Eastern traveller's grand tour.

4. Physical Geography.—Idumea embraces a section of a broad mountain range, extending in breadth from the valley of the Arabah to the desert plateau of Arabia. "Along the base of the range on the east side the Arabah is a low and barren tract, and the mountains, low and barren, are low and barren. To these succeed lofty masses of igneous rock, chiefly porphyry; over which lies the red and variegated sandstone in irregular ridges and abrupt cliffs, broken by deep and wild ravines. The latter strata give the mountains their most striking feature. (Burckhardt, for S. and Petra, p. 373. "The first thing that struck me," says Stanley, "in turning out of the Arabah up the defiles that lead to Petra was, that we had suddenly left the desert. Instead of the absolute nakedness of the Sicantic valleys, we found ourselves walking on grass, sprinkled with flowers, and the level platforms on each side were filled with sprawling corn; and this continues through the whole descent to Petra, and in Petra itself. The next peculiarity was when, after having left the summit of the pass, or after descending from Mount Hor, we found ourselves insensibly encircled with rocks of deepening and deepening red. Red, indeed, even from a distance, the mountains of 'red' Edom appear, but not more so than the granite of Sinai; and it is not till one is actually in the midst of them that this red becomes crimson, and that the wonder of the Petra colors fully displays itself" (Sin. and Pal. p. 88). The ravines which intersect these sandstone mountains are very remarkable. Take them as a whole, there is nothing like them in the world, especially those near Petra. "You descend from wide down . . . and before you opens a deep cleft between rocks of 16; Gen. xxvii, 40), yet Isaac, in his prophetic blessing, promised his disappointed son that his dwelling should be "of the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above" (Gen. xxvii, 39). But many critics are of opinion (e.g. Vetter, De Wette, Geddes, Von Bohlen) that שָׂרָה should there be rendered from, i.e. "far away from, or destitute of," the fatness of the earth, etc.; and it is thus made to agree with the Hebrew word, by the addition שָׁרוּת, "the sword." and it does not appear that Edom was ever particularly noted for its fertility. Some other passages of Scripture are also illustrated by a glance at the towering precipices and peaks of Edom. The border of the Ammonites was the "southern border of the land of Edom, from the rock"—that is, from the rock boundary of Edom (Judg. i, 36). We read that Amaziah, after the conquest of Sear, took ten thousand of the captives to the "top of the cliff," and thence cast them down, dash- ing them all to pieces (2 Chron. xxxv, 11, 12).

Ravine in Idumea.

5. Present State of the Country.—Idumaea, once so rich in its flocks, so strong in its fortresses and rock-hewn cities, so extensive in its commercial relations, so renowned for the architectural splendor of its temples and palaces—is now a deserted and desolate wilderness. Its whole population is contained in some three or four thousand scattered walled villages, barely sufficient for the purpose of their small flocks and herds. Its forests disappear from its borders; its highways are untraveled, its cities are all in ruins. The predictions of God's Word have been fulfilled to the very letter (see Est. 11, 7, 32; Jer. viii, 17). "Thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles and briers in the fortresses thereof. . . . When the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the bear shall eat straw with the goat, and the weak shall be the ruler in the land, then the wilderness shall prosper like the garden, and the fruitful land shall grow desolate. . . . Thou shalt be desolate, O Mount Seir, and all Idumaea, even all of it. . . . Edom shall be a desolation; every one that goeth by it shall be astonished" (Isa. xxxiv, 15; Ezek. xxxvi, 14; Jer. xi, 17). Idumaea is divided into two principal districts, Jabal and Edom, including the northern section as far as wady el-Ghuweir, and Edom-Sheerah, embracing the southern part (Burchardt, Trav. in Syria, p. 410; Robinson, Bib. Res. ii, 154). Burchard mentions a third district, Jebel Heema; but Robinson says that though there is a sandy tract, el-Hamma, with mountains around it, on the east of Akabah, it does not constitute a separate division. The site of the ancient capital Bozrah is now marked by the small village of Busaireh, and Petra, the Nabatean capital, is well known as wady Musa. The whole of this region is at present occupied by various tribes of Bedouin Arabs. The chief tribe in the Jabal is the Hejaysa, with a branch of the Kaabineh, while in edh-Sheerah they are all of the numerous and powerful tribe of the Haweitain, with a few independent allies. The Bedouins in Idumaea have of late years been partially subject to the pacha of Egypt, paying an annual tribute, which, in the case of the Beni Sukhr, is one camel for two tents. The fellahin, or peasants, are half Bedouin, inhabiting the few villages, but dwelling also in tents; they pay tribute to the Egyptian government, and furnish supplies of grain.

6. The character of the Edomites was drawn by Isaac in his prophetic blessing to Esau—"By thy sword shalt thou live" (Gen. xxvi, 40). War and rapine were the only professions of the Edomites. By the sword they got Mount Seir—by the sword they exterminated the Horites—by the sword they long battled with their brethren of Israel, and finally bought off their yoke—by the sword they won Southern Palestine—and by the sword they performed the last act in their long historic drama, massacred the guards in the Temple, and pillaged the city of Jerusalem.

Little is known of their religion, but that little shows them to have been idolatrous. It is probable that Esau's marriage with the "daughters of Canaan," who were" a grief of mind" to his father and mother (Gen. xxvi, 34, 35), induced him to embrace their religion; and when Esau and his followers took possession of Mount Seir, they seem to have followed the common practice among ancient nations of adopting the country's gods, for we read that Amaziah, king of Judah, after his conquest of the Edomites, "brought the gods of the children of Seir, and set them up to be his gods" (2 Chron. xxv, 14, 15, 20). Josephus also refers to both to the idols (one of which he named Kose) and priests of the Idumaeans (Ant. xv, 27).

7. Literature.—With respect to the striking fulfilment of the prophetic denunciations upon Edom, we need only refer the reader to the well-known work of Keith, who frequently errs, however, in straining the sense of prophecy beyond its legitimate import, as well as in seeking out too literally minute an accomplishment. On Idumaea generally, see C. B. Michaelis, Die Antiquitaeten, Idumaeor. Hist. in Pott and Ruperti's Sylvico Comment. Theol. part vi, p. 121; J. D. 3. (Sept. "iyadh, Vulg. Igal, A. V. "Igal"). Son of Nathan of Zobah, and one of David's famous warriors (2 Sam. xxv, 15; 1 Chron, vii, 9). In the parallel list of 1 Chron., the name is given as "Joel the brother of Nathan" (xii, 38, 39). Kennicott, after a minute examination of the passage, both in the original and in the ancient versions, decides in favor of the latter as most likely to be the genuine text (Dis. brev. p. 212-214).

3. (Sept. "Iyadh, Vulg. Igal, A. V. "Igal"). One of the sons of Shemaiah, of the descendants of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii, 22). The number "six" there given is that of the grandchildren of Shechaniah (see Strong's Hark. and Expos. of the Gosp. p. 17). B.C. ante 406.

Ignatius of Antioch, one of the apostolical fathers (q. v.), called also Theophorus (ὅς ὁθωφροῦς), a title which he explained to the emperor Trajan as meaning "one who has Christ in his heart." We have no trustworthy accounts of the life and ministry of Ignatius. The chief authority is the Martyrium Ignatii (written below), but that those who assert the genuineness of that work admit that it is greatly interpolated. There are several unsupported stories in the fathers, e.g. that Ignatius was the child whom Christ took into his arms (Mark ix, 36), that he had seen Christ, etc. Abapharagyn (Pehnac. vii, 75, etc.) and Hesychius (Strom. ii, 12) were understood below), but that those who assert the genuineness of that work admit that it is greatly interpolated. There are several unsupported stories in the fathers, e.g. that Ignatius was the child whom Christ took into his arms (Mark ix, 36), that he had seen Christ, etc. Abapharagyn (Pehnac. vii, 75, etc.), and Hesychius (Strom. ii, 12) were understood. but Eusebius fixes the date of his ordination at A.D. 69, when several of the apostles were dead. According to the same historian, he was the second successor of St. Paul, Evodius having been the first. The Apostolic Constitutions, on the other hand, say that Ignatius and Evodius held the office together, Evodius by appointment from Peter, Ignatius from Paul. So say, also, Bar- romelaus and John Chrysostom, while Ignatius, bishop of the Jews, and Ignatius of the Gentiles. “Of the episcopate of Ignatius we know little. He appears to have been over-earnest in insinuating upon the prerogatives of the clergy, especially the bishops. The Martyrdom Ignatii has him as an earnestness of his flight during the persecution said to have taken place in Domitian’s reign, and incessant in watch- ing and prayer and in instructing his people, fearing lest the more ignorant and timid among them should fall away. On the cessation of the persecution he rejoiced at the little injury the church at Antioch had sustained. When the emperor Trajan, elated with his victories over the Dacians and other nations on the Danubian frontier, began to persecute the Church, the anxiety of Ignatius was renewed, and, eager to avert the violence of persecution from his flock, and to obtain the crown of martyrdom and offered himself, the correct version brought before the emperor, then at Antioch on his way to the eastern frontier to attack the Armenians and Parthians. The conference between Trajan and the bishop is given in the Martyrium Ignatii; it ended in an order of the emperor that Ignatius should be taken to Rome as a witness to the wild beasts. He was led thither by a long and tedious route, but was allowed to have communication with his fellow-Christians at the places at which he stopped. He was thrown to the wild beasts in the Roman amphitheatre, at the feast dis- tinguished as the feast of the thir- teenth” (Smith, Dict. of Class. Antig., s. v. Saturnalia). Such parts of him as remained were collected by his sorrowing friends, and taken back to Antioch, where in Jerome’s time they were resting in the cemetery outside the gate toward Daphne. From thence they were re- moved to the crypt of St. Jerome (Evagr. Hist. Eccle. i, 16). Their subsequent removals are uncertain. The martyrdom of St. Ignatius is commemorated by the Rom- an Church on the 1st of February; by the Greek Church on the 20th of December. The Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians is generally called the Epistle of St. Ignatius. The year of Ignatius’s death has been much disputed. Many of the best writers (following the Martyrium Ignatii) place it in A.D. 107; but, as it is now generally conceded that Trajan did not visit the East till 114, and as he probably spent the win- ter 114–115 at Antioch, the best critics agree on A.D. 115 as the most probable date.

Epistles of Ignatius.—On his way from Antioch to Rome, Ignatius is said to have written seven epistles. These are enumerated both by Eusebius (Hist. Eccle. iii, 36) and Jerome (De Viris Illustribus, 16). At present, however, there are fourteen epistles extant, a number which is equal to Ignatius. Seven of these are considered by many to be genuine, namely, 1. Pro’s Ερυθεῖος, Ad Ephesios; 2. Μαθητικός, Ad Magnesiam; 3. Τραγανάκιος, Ad Trallianos; 4. Ραγματικός, Ad Romanos; 5. Φίλιππος, Ad Philadelphias; 6. Συμβάσιος, Ad Smyrneos; and 7. Προς Πάλαισιον, Ad Polycarpum. The titles of these epistles agree with the enumeration of Eusebius and Jerome. The book has two recensions of them—a longer, now regarded as an interpolated one, first published by Pusey (1557), and a shorter form, which is considered as tolerably uncorrupted. Many doubt the genuineness of either (see below). Two ancient Latin versions are extant, corresponding in a great degree to the two forms or recensions of the Greek text: the longer, known as the common (mutila) version, the other first discovered and published by archbishop Usher (1644) (see below). The epistle to the Ephesians, Ro- manos, and Polycarp were published, with a translation, in a still shorter Syriac version, by Cureton (1845). Many of the interpolations found in the larger form are of passages from the N. T.

Five other epistles, though extant in Greek, are regarded by nearly all classes of critics as spurious, name- ly, 8. Pro’s Μαρίων with Ευσημία τῆς πρὸς τοῦ Σαρώφ, 9. Ad Magnesiam, 10. Προς Κολωνίαν, and 11. Pro’s Πατριάρχας, and 12. Pro’s Αἰγύπτιος, Προς Αἰγύπτιος. Some copies add to the title of this last epistle the words περὶ Βασιλείας, De Basiileia, an addition which by no means describes the contents. Four of these spurious epistles two ancient Latin versions are extant, the com- mon version, and that published by Usher. Of that to the Philippian there is but one version, namely, the common. The epistle to Polycarp in the common Latin version is defective, containing only about one third of the original text, what is given by the common version, is printed in the Greek and in the two Latin versions, an epistle of Mary of Cassobeia (called also Πορφύριος, Prose- lyta) to Ignatius, to which his letter professes to be an answer.

The remaining three epistles ascribed to Ignatius are found only in Latin. They are very short, and have long been given up as spurious. They are, 13. S. Ioanni Evangelista; 14. Ad Evrem; and, 15. Beata Virgo. With these is found a letter of the Virgin to Ignatius, Beata Virgo Ignatius, professing to be an answer to his letter.

The controversy respecting the genuineness of these writings began at an early period. In A.D. 1405 the three Latin epistles and the letter of the Virgin were printed at Paris, subjoined to the Vita et Processus S. Thomas Cantuariensis Martyris super Libertate Ecclesi- asticae. In A.D. 1498, three years after the appearance of these letters, another collection, edited by J. Faber, of Staples (Stampulensis), was printed at Paris in folio, con- taining the common Latin version of eleven letters, that of Mary of Cassobeia not being among them. They were published with some of the works ascribed to Dionysius Areopagite and an epistle of Polycarp. These epistles were reprinted at Ven. 1502; Paris, 1515; Basel, 1520; and Strasburg, 1527. In 1516 the preceding fourteen epistles, with the addition of the letter to Mary of Cassobeia, were edited by Simplicianus Chamerius of Lyons, and published at Paris in 4to, with seven letters of St. Antony, commonly called the Great. In A.D. 1557, the twelve epistles of Ignatius, in Greek, were published by Valentinus Paeus, or Paeus, in 8vo, at Dillin- gen, in Suabia on the Danube, from an Augsburg MS. They were reprinted at Paris, 1558, with critical emen- tations. The same twelve Greek epistles, from another MS, from the library of St. Mark at Venice, was pub- lished by Andreas Gisner, with a Latin version by Jo- annes Brunner, Zirich, 1559, folio. In these editions the Greek text of the seven epistles was given in the larger form, the shorter form, both in Greek and Latin, being omitted. The genuineness of these remains was now called in question. “The authors of the Centuriae Magdeburgenses were the first to express their doubts, though with caution and moderation. Cal- vin, in his Institutiones (i, 8), declared that “nothing could be more sily than the stuff (sanie) which had been brought out under the name of Ignatius, and ren- dered the impulse of those persons more insufferable who had set themselves to deceive people by such phantoms (larvae).” The controversy grew warm, the Roman writers and the Episcopalian commonly con- tending for the genuineness of at least a part of the epistles, and the Presbyterian denying it. The three epissupply this clue. Mr. Cureton discovered, among a most important collection of Syriac MSS., procured for the British Museum by archdeacon Tatam, in the year 1843, from the monastery of St. Mary Deipara of the Syrians, in the Desert of Nitria, three entire epistles which he published in the year 1845. This publication naturally excited great attention on the part of those who felt an interest in the subject already changed apart from the other five epistles; he marked, also, in the genuine epistles, the parts which he regarded as interpolations. In 1844 archbishop Usher's (4to, Oxford) edition of the epistles of Polycarp and Ignatius appeared. It contained the epistles to the Philippians, Smyrna, and six of the supposed genuine epistles of Ignatius; 2 Epistolæ B. Ignatii ascendit a Medio Ætatis Graecæ See (Six Epistles ascribed to St. Ignatius by the Greeks of the Middle Age). The epistle of Polycarp was included in this class, with the five spurious epistles extant in Greek. The common Latin version was also printed with these in parallel columns, and the three epistles which are extant only in Latin were subjoined; 3. A Latin version of eleven epistles (that to the Philippians being the one only), was translated by Usher, and now first printed. This corresponds, in the main, to the shorter text of the so-called genuine epistles. The work of Usher contains also a valuable introduction and notes to the epistles of Ignatius and Polycarp, the Apostolical Constitutions, and the Canon of Polycarp. The epistles of Ignatius were published by Isaac Vossius (4to, Amst.), from a MS. in the Medicin Library at Florence. The MS., which is not accurately written, and is mutilated at the end, is valuable as the only one containing the shorter version of the genuine epistles; it was, however, referred, by Martynus, in the longer form, as in the former editions. The five spurious epistles, and that of Mary of Cassopolis to Ignatius, from the Medicin MS., the text of which differs materially from that previously published; the three Latin epistles, published by Usher in the Latin version of the eleven Greek epistles; and the common version of that to the Philippians, were all given by Vossius. In 1647 Usher published his Appendix Ignatiana, containing the Greek text of the seven epistles, and two Latin versions of the Martyrium Ignatii. He gave the Medicin text of six of the epistles, that to the Romans, with the common text, with the interpolations expunged, as determined by a collation of the epistle contained in the Martyrium, both in the Greek of Symon Metaphrastes and the Latin version published by Usher. After the controversy had been carried on for some time, and great progress had been made towards the settlement of the text, the most formidable attack on the genuineness of the epistles was made by Dalli (Dalleus), one of the most eminent of the French Protestants, in his work De Scriptis qui sub Dionysii Apostolop et Ignatii Antiocheni circumssecutur Liber duo (Gen. 1666, 4to). The works of Ignatian form the subject of the second book. This attack of Dalli called forth the De circvit Ignatianae of bishop Pearson (Cambridge, 1672, 4to), which was long supposed to have settled the controversy. But it has recently been reopened with fresh vigor and interest. Archdeacon Usher, in his edition of the Ignatian Epistles published at Oxford in 1644, declared that he could not venture to promise that the genuine Ignatius could be recovered without the aid of another Greek text, which he hoped to obtain from a MS. in the Medicin Library at Florence, or at least without the aid of a Syriac copy, which he did not deem as of preeminent from that of Iliome. The Medicin MS. was published, but the difficulties remained the same. The Syriac version, which was then looked to as affording the only probable clue to the solution, eluded the most diligent and anxious search for a period of 290 years. It was reserved for the Rev. William Cureton, a canon of We-the-Kin, to epitaphe in pronouncing such a decisive judgment. But he saw distinctly, and he therefore spoke fearlessly. There is a far more intimate connection than many are disposed to believe between sound theology and sound criticism, for a right knowledge of the Word of God strengthens faith. 6. The more careful the detection of error wherever it may reveal itself. Had Pearson enjoyed the same clear views of Gospel truth as the reformers of Geneva, he would not have wasted so many precious years in writing a learned vindication of the nonsense attributed to Ignatius. Calvin knew that an aposporous silence about the Eucharist must have been associated with apostolic doctrine, and he saw that these letters must have been the production of an age when the pure light of Christianity was greatly obscured. Hence he denounced them so emphatically; and time has verified his deliverance. His language respecting them has been often quoted, but we feel we must appropriately close our observations on this subject than by another repetition of it, 'There is nothing more abominable than that trash which is in circulation under the name of Ignatius.' Dr. Killen's positive arguments against the genuineness of all the epistles are as follows: 1. The style is suspicious; 2. The Ignatianism of the Word's Person has never done by any of the genuine writings of the early fathers; 3. They contain chronological blunders; 4. They use words in meanings which they did not acquire till long after the time of Ignatius; 5. They abound in puerilities, vapors, and logorrheas; 6. They thirst after martyrdom, and insane desire for martyrdom. Baur and Hilgenfeld also hold them all not to be genuine, but think that the seven of the shorter Greek recensions were the first to be forged after A.D. 150, and that the Syriac three are simply fragmentary translations from the Greek. With Uhlig and Schurmann also many able and sound critics of the Romanists and Protestants, as Möhler, Hefele, and Gieseler.

The most complete edition of Ignatius is that contained in the Patras Apostolici of Cotelerius, the second edition of which, Le Clerc (Amst. 1724, 2 vols. folio), contains all the genuine and spurious epistles (Greek and Latin), with the epistles of Mary of Cassobele and of the Virgin, the two ancient Latin versions (the common one and Usher's), the Martyrium Ignatii, the Dissertations (i.e. the Introduction) of Usher, the Indicibus of Pearson, in Latin of Cotelerius Epistolae by Le Clerc, and various other notes. A useful edition of the genuine epistles, with those of Clement of Rome and Polycarp, and the Martyria of Ignatius and Polycarp, was published by Jacobson (Oxford, 1838, 2 vols. 8vo). There are versions in several languages of modern Europe, including French translations, by the bishop Wake (Genuine Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers, Lond. 1693, 8vo), and a modern one by Clementson (1827, 8vo). Wake's translation has been repeatedly published.

The Martyrium Ignatii, which is our chief authority for the circumstances of Ignatius's death, professes to be written by eye-witnesses, the companions of his voyage to Rome, supposed to be Philo, a deacon of Tarasus or some other church in Cilicia, and Rheus Agathopus, a Syrian, who are mentioned in the epistles of Ignatius (Ad Philadelph. c.11; Ad Smyrnenses, c.10). Usher adds to them a third person, Gaius, but on what authority we know not, and the traditional add to Ignatius (Ad Romanares, c.10). The account, with many interpolations, is incorporated in the work of Symeon Metaphrastes (Dec. A.D. 20), and a Latin translation from him is given by Surisus, De Probata Sanctorum, Vetus, and in the Acta Sanctorum, under the date of the 1st of February. The Martyrium was first printed in Latin by archbishop Usher, who gave two distinct versions from different MSS. The Greek text was first printed by Ruinart, in his Acta Martyrum Sincera (Par. 1689, 4to), from a MS. in the Colbertine library, and in a revised edition by Cotelerius, with part of the preface by Jacob, and by most of the later editors of the epistles. Its genuineness is generally recognised, but it is thought to be interpolated. See the remarks of Grabbe, quoted by Jacobson at the end of the Martyrium. A considerable fragment of an ancient Syriac version of the Martyrium of Ignatius has been published by Mr. Cureton.

Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, flourished about the beginning of the 9th century. The schism of the Greek and Roman churches, which began under Photius (q.v.), who persecuted Ignatius and usurped his see, was consummated. The following account of him is (necessarily) chiefly from Roman sources, and must be taken with allowance. He was born in 799, and was the son of the emperor Michael Ceuropalates; his mother, procopia, was the daughter of the emperor Nicephorus. On the revolt of Leo the Armenian, in 802, Michael Ceuropalates, and his son, honored with the title of Cezar, occupied for the short period of a year and nine months only, and embraced monastic life. His sons followed the example of their father, and the youngest, Nicetas, then aged fourteen, changed his name to Ignatius. The new emperor, in order not to be disturbed in the possession of power, summoned to the council the members of the family of Michael, and caused his two sons, Eustathius and Nicetas, to be made eunuchs. During the reign of the three emperors, Leo, Michael II, and Theophilus, the young men were allowed to enjoy in tranquility the monastic life to which they had devoted themselves. Ignatius was admitted into the order of priestlyhood by Basil, bishop of Paros, in the Hellespont, a prelate who had suffered great persecution in opposing the Iconoclasts, and to whom Ignatius was much attached. On the death of Theophilus, the empress Theodora was declared regent in the name of her son, Michael III, and gaining power over the emporium of the empire, she was crowned, and became the patriarch of Constantinople, and caused Methodius to be elected in his place. Four years after, on the death of Methodius, the patriarchal dignity was bestowed upon Ignatius. But he did not long enjoy this honor. Barathius, then the emperor, made a second attempt to extirpate the Iconoclasts, and communicated on account of his scandalous excesses, having obtained considerable influence on the mind of the young emperor Michael, whose vices he flattered and encouraged, induced him to take the reins of government, and to compel his mother to withdraw to a convent, and to accept the vows. Ignatius, when summoned to lend his authority to this unfillial act, did not content himself with remonstrating against it, but gave a stern refusal. He was, in consequence, banished to the isle of Terebinthos, and deprived of his see, which he had held for eleven years. Photius, a eunuch related to Barathius, and a fancied rival of Ignatius, who favored the Iconoclasts, was by the will of the emperor, but without the consent of the Church, appointed to the patriarchate of Constantinople. For the controversy of Photius with the Church of Rome and its issue, see Porphirian. All is expressed to indicate Barathius, who sign remaining ineffective, his death was finally determined upon, and he was murdered in 866. Basil the Macedonian now became possessed of the supreme pow- er. One of the first acts of his reign was to banish Photius and recall Ignatius, who was triumphantly re- instated in his patriarchal dignity Nov. 4, 867. At his suggestion a council was assembled at Constantinople, which ranks in the Roman Church as the eighth occu-

Ignorance, the want of knowledge or instruction. It is often used to denote illiteracy. Mr. Locke observes that the causes of ignorance are chiefly three: 1. want of ideas; 2. want of a discoverable connexion between the ideas we have; 3. want of tracing and examining our own ideas. As respects religion, ignorance, Mr. Locke says, has been divided into three sorts: 1. An imbecile ignorance, in which the will has no part. It is an insult upon justice to suppose it will punish men because they were ignorant of things which they were physically incapable of knowing. 2. There is a wilful and obstinate ignorance; such an ignorance, far from exculpating, aggravates a man's crimes. 3. A sort of voluntary ignorance, which is neither entirely wilful nor entirely invincible, as when a man has the means of knowledge and does not use them.—Loecke, On the Understanding, ii. 178; Grove, Moral Philosophy, ii. 26, 29, 64; Watts, On the Mind: Henderson's Back, Theology. Dict. s. v. See Knowledge.

Ignorantines (Latin, Fratres Ignorantiae; French, Frères Ignorantins), also known as the Congregation of Christ's Instruction and Christian Schools, is the name of a Jesuitical foundation for the gratuitous instruction of poor children in sacred as well as secular learning, which was founded in France in the early part of the 18th century (1724) by the abbé de la Salle. As the object is to confine the instruction to such branches as do not conflict with, but even favor, the religious views of the Roman Catholics, virtually preparing the young, by the exclusion of all books by Protestants, to remain true to the church of their fathers, they have gradually been introduced into every Catholic country of Europe. In France this society shared at the Revolution the fate of all the other religious bodies; but, under the name of Brothers of the Christian Schools, they were re-established under Napoleon in 1806. They are now exceedingly numerous in France, Italy, and in some parts of Bohemia and Germany. Many branches exist also in England and Ireland. In the latter country they have large educational establishments, with a series of school-books specially designed for their own religious instruction. The scheme of instruction is a dress very similar to that of the Jesuits.—Chambers, Cyclop. s. v., 517; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. vi. 632.

Igment or Hegumen is the title of an abbey in the male monasteries of the Greek Church, more especially in Russia.

Theo, Johann von, a Swedish philologian, was born March 3, 1707, at Lund, and educated at the universities of Upsala, Greifswald, Jena, and Halle. At the last-named university he afterwards devoted himself with great success on the Oriental languages, then travelled extensively in Germany, Holland, England, and France, and on his return to his native country was appointed librarian at Upsala University. In 1737 he was appointed professor of poetry, and the year following professor of rhetoric. He continued in both, of which he became rector for many years, 1746, 1748. He distinguished himself greatly by his thorough investigations into the philological merits of his mother tongue, and by his labors on the Gothic version of Utillia, the results of which are left us in Scripta versionem Ulpianam et Aug. Mose-poeticam illustri- tia, which were collected and edited by A. F. Bütscbing (Berl. 1775, 4to). This collection (which is very rare, as only 138 copies were printed) contains I. Ulpianus illu- stratus, a series of critical observations on the readings of the Codex Argenteus, with a preface, in which he attempts to prove that the Vulgate, and other Latin versions produced by an encaustic process, the surface of the parchment having been covered with wax, on which silver-leaf was laid, and the form of the letter stamped thereon with a hot iron; 2. I. H. S. is an inscription or monogram which has probably been used by the Church of Christ from an early date among the sacred symbols on church furniture, and in painted windows of the house of God, but its use has by no means been confined to ecclesiastical buildings. On tombs, roofs, and walls of houses, on sofas, and all the ornaments of Christian edifices. The monogram has been, and is even now, frequently impressed, especially among the adherents of the Roman, Greek, and Anglican churches. The interpretations which have been given of this mystical title are three. One is that they are the initials of the words "In Hoc Signo," borrowed from the luminous cross which was miraculously displayed in the sky before Constantine and his army. Others make them the initials of the words "Jesus Hominum Salvator," especially the Jesus, who used it for their badge and motto in the form i. i. s.; and still another, that they are the first three letters of the Greek ΙΗΔΠΟΥ, Jesus. This last opinion has been espoused by the late "Cambridge Camden Society" in a work which they published on this subject: Argument for the Greek Origin of the Monogram I. H. S. (London, 1841). The earliest Christian emblems found also seem to confirm this opinion, as they are in every case written in the Greek language, and "the celebrated monogram inscribed by Constantine's order on the Libera- rum, or standard of the cross, was undoubtedly Greek." Eusebius (Eccles. Hist.), in describing the famous standard, says, "A long spear, overlaid with gold, formed the figure of the cross, the letters being placed on it above and over it. On the top of the whole was fixed a crown, formed by the intertexture of gold and precious stones; and on this two letters indicating the name of Christ symbolized the Saviour's title by means of its first char- acters, the letter P being intersected by a Χ exactly in its centre, so that the letters the emblems the emblems the habit of wearing on his helmet at a later period." not Greek. The Church, a paper of the Church of England in Canada, says, "it might easily have become corrupted (i.e. the Greek Σ into a Latin S)—it would not, indeed, have been intelligible except to a few of the best scholars unless it was corrupted—and so could scarcely have escaped translation with the rest of the Greek. From which we are certified was the case, forfeited, or very nearly so, during the Middle Ages in the Western Church."—Staunton, Eccl. Dict. p. 382; Blunt, Eccles. Dict. i, 375. See LABARUM.

I'tam (Heb. Iyim, ייִימ, ruins, as in Jer. xxxvi, 18, etc.), the name of two places.
1. (Sept. Asait, Vulg. Ilim.) A city in the extreme south of Judah, mentioned between Baalzeb and Azem (Josh. xv, 29), and therefore doubtless included within the territory set off to Simeon, as the associated places were (Josh. xix, 3), which afford the only means for a conjectural position nearly midway from the Dead Sea towards the Mediterranean.
2. (Sept. I'nt, Vulg. Jeboara, both reading the same as I'tam.) One of the stations of the Israelites not long before reaching the Jordan (Num. xxxiii, 45), usually called fully LEB-ABARIM (ver. 44).

Ijar. See YAR.

Iy'eb-ab'arin (Hebrew Iyeb ha - Abarim, יֵיֶב עבּּראים, ruins of the Abarim, or regions beyond; Sept. Ayyayi, but in Num. xxxiii, 44 simply T'ai; Vulg. Jeboara and Iyebabarim), the forty-seventh station of the Israelites after departing Canaan, lying north of the Jordan as between Obot and Dibon-gad, "in the border of Moab" (Num. xxxiii, 44), or between Obot and the brook Zered, "in the wilderness which is before (i.e. east of) Moab, towards the sun-rising" (Num. xxxii, 11), and therefore not far from Ainek, a little south of wady el Ali, which forms a long, low scar or line on the boundary of the Moab-Jabesh territory, and lies near the southern end of the range of Abarim, that give this compound form to the name (simply I'm in Num. xxxiii, 44), to distinguish it from the I'm of Judah (Josh. xv, 29). See Abarim.

I'yon (Heb. Iy'on, ייִון, place of ruins; Sept. A'v, A'v, Atow), a frontier city of the kingdom of Israel, mentioned as being captured, along with Abel-Beth-Minnah and other places, by Nahum, king of Babylon (Jer. xxxii, 49), and afterwards by Tiglath-pileser of Assyria (2 Kings xv, 29). The associated names and circumstances render the supposition of Dr. Robinson (Researches, iii, 346) very probable, that this locality corresponds to a large ruin-covered hill called Tell el-Abyad (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 332), in the present Jerj Myum (meadow of fountains), a fine meadow tract between wady et-Teim and the Litany, north of Lake Huleh (comp. Bibliotheca Sacra, 1846, p. 204, 214; new edition of Researches, iii, 375; Schwarz, Palestine, p. 96).

Icriti, Shenmarja Ben-Elia, a Jewish philosopher and commentator, originally from Rome, flourished at the court of the Grand Agras and probably of Roger of Sicily in the beginning of the 14th century. His father Elias was a distinguished scholar of the island of Crete, whence he derived his name. Shenmarja devoted his early years to the study of philosophical writings, but later he gave his time almost exclusively to the study of Talmudic and the results of his learned and careful commentaries on all the books of the O. T., with the exception of Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. His edition of Genesis, to which, according to his own statement, he devoted no less than twenty-five years, he dedicated, with other works of his, to his king Roger. Another object of writing these commentaries, which have never yet been published, was to reconcile the Rabbanites and Karaites. Himself a Rabbinite, he held that the Karaites were in the wrong to set aside altogether the Talmudic traditions; and the Rabbanites, he asserted, missed the mark also by not only assigning the first place to the Talmud, but by disregarding the Bible (comp. Ostar Nechmad, Venet, 1857, ii, 93). But, whatever his success may have been with the Rabbanites, he certainly failed to convince the Karaites, who read his works extensively, that the Talmudic Additions contained a deep meaning unrevealed to the superficial student, or to persuade them that the Bible and Talmud both deserved a philosophical interpretation. Another aim which Shenmarja is said to have had in writing his commentaries was the union of the followers of Maimonides (q. v.) with the old school. After the Greek style, and a Hebrew Grammar. Idelfonso, Sr., archbishop of Toledo, was born in that city in 607. He studied under Isidore of Seville, became monk, then abbot of the convent of Agli, near Toledo, and was finally made archbishop of his native city in 688. According to Julian of Toledo, Idelfonso composed a large number of works, most of which, however, were left unfinished. The only writings supposed to be authentic that we now possess under his name are, De libieta b. Virginiae virginitate (in the Biblioth. Patr., Lugd., xii) — two books, De cognitione beatissimi et de iXiere deserti quore perpurit post beatissimam, a rule of faith and conduct for converts—a continuation of Isidore's book De viris illustribus, beginning with Gregory the Great, and containing notices of thirteen other writers, mostly Spanish bishops (in Fabricius, Bibl. eccles. p. 60 sq.). One of his successors in the see of Toledo, St. Julian (680-690), added to this a Vita Idelfonso Tolerante, from which almost all our information concerning Idelfonso is derived. Two letters of his, with answers by Quirinus bishop of Barcelona, are found in D'Achéry, Spicil. The Jilescas, Jacob de (Jacobus), a Jewish philosopher and commentator, flourished in the 14th century at Ilescas, not far from Madrid, whence his family derived their name. He wrote a Commentary on the Pentateuch (contained in Frankfurters great Rabbiner Bibel) in an allegorical, cabalistic sense, with many unpalatable grammatical explanations of difficult passages. He also paid particular attention to obscure passages of Rashi and Aben-Ezra's expositions on this portion of the Hebrew Scriptures, and freely quotes other celebrated Jewish authors, as Lach. Tob. Joseph, Tam, Bechor Shor, Jehuda, etc. He was from the Plon, Isaac, Coney, Aaron, Eljaksim, the Tosafoth, etc. See Kitto, Cyclop. Biblical Lit. ii, 378; Furst, Biblioth. Jud. ii, 91.

Ilegen, Christian Friedrich, a German theologian, was born at Chemitz, in Saxony, Sept. 16, 1786, studied at the University of Leipsig, where he first lectured, and then became extraordinary professor of theology in 1818, of theology in 1823, ordinary professor of theology in 1825, and finally canon. He was particularly distinguished for his knowledge of theological history. He died Aug. 4, 1844. His principal works are, Littus Soyinum, Leipsig (Lpz. 1818), 4to.—Memorie uruglous colectirum Luther (Leipsig, 1829-30);—Historia collegii philologic (1836-40);—Abhandlungen, den Werther der christlichen Dogmengeschichte (1817); and a collection of Preussen: die Verklarung d. irdischen Lebens durch d. Evangelium (1825). He founded the Historical Theological Society, and from 1825 to the time of his death he edited the Zeitschrift für hist. Theol. See S. Illuminato (φωτιστής) was a term used in the early Christian Church for the baptized. See Baptism. The apostle Paul writes in two places (Heb. vi. 4; x, 32) of those who were ήπια φωτιστής; and the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 372), in its third canon, calls the newly baptized προσβάσις φωτιστής. Justin Martyr, in his second Apology, expressly refers to the spiritual knowledge acquired by those who were baptized, and there was probably an association between the term and the ritual use of lights in the baptismal service. See Blunt, Cyclop. of Theol. i, 328. By some, however, the title "illuminated" is supposed to have been given to one of the newly baptized at the early Church, because a lighted taper was put into their hands as a symbol of their enlightenment. See Lights. (J. H. W.) Illumināti, a name assumed at different periods by sects of Mystics or Enthusiasts and Theosophs, who claim a greater degree of illumination or perfection than other Believers. 1. The first sect known under this name was a party of mystic enthusiasts who made their appearance in Spain about 1675, and who also bore the name of Alumbrados or Alumbradores. They considered prayer as such an efficacious means of union with God that the soul of man could by it become entirely identified with the nature of God, so that its actions would therefore be really the actions of God himself; and they further held that for such persons good works, the sacraments, etc., are superfluous as a means of sanctification. (We invite the reader to compare the history of the Illuminati with that of the Jesuits, when first instituted by Ignatius Loyola. See Ranke, History of the Popes, trans. by Mrs. Austin, i, 190.) They were persecuted by the Inquisition, and then disappeared from Spain; but in 1623 they reappeared in France, under the name of Guerrinets, a sect very similar to the Alumbradores. The Alumbradores became Illuminatis, but who, in addition to the mystic belief of the Alumbradores, believed in a special revelation of perfectibility, made to one of their number, a friar, whose name was Bouquet. But they also soon became extinct, and were no longer known in France in 1635.

Another very similar sect arose in Belgium.

2. But the name of "Illuminati" was really first given to an association which the Republic of Venice, which was founded May 1, 1779, by Adam Weishaupt, professor of canon law at the University of Ingolstadt. This "order," which, by its founder, was first called the Order of the Perfectibilists, was established on a mosaic foundation like that of the organization of the Jesuits. They aimed to elevate the highest possible degree of moral purity, and to lay the foundation for the reformation of the world by organizing an association of the best men to oppose the progress of moral evil. Practically, however, the "order" soon evinced tendencies dangerous alike to Church and State. In their opposition to religious and political Judaism, which at that time, in Roman Catholic Germany, imposed unbearable restraints on the human mind, they aimed at nothing less than revolutionizing religion, abolishing Christianity in order to substitute reason in its place, deposing all civil powers, and establishing a nation of philosophers. And although all this, however, was a very honorable man, actuated by the purest motives, and zealous for the religious and political improvement of mankind. The most active disciple, through whose influence the society increased with extraordinary rapidity, was the bishop of the Mystics, it had found its highest form of development in Freemasonry. Only a small number of the elect were allowed an insight into the ultimate object of the new organization, but the whole system was made profusely attractive to a certain class of minds by mysterious ceremonies and forms. The order aimed steadfastly at obtaining the control of the higher offices in Church and State; and, although liberty and equality were proclaimed as its fundamental principles, it sought absolute supremacy. With a view to reach that end, Weishaupt, who had himself been a Jesuit, finally made use of the same means by which the Jesuits had been so successful. Thus he sought to win over to his side all persons of any influence; and blinds were made effective in the minds of the proselytes of men weak in mind but strong of purse, while at the same time he excluded such as, on account of their pride or their strength of character, would be unlikely to prove plant subjects, or whose want of discretion might injure the order. Strict, unquestioning, and blind obedience was made the first duty of a member; every one was under the direct control of his immediate superiors, and knew, in fact, no other member of the order. Aside from this, each member was subject to a private supervision, which extended to the head of the society; and the Illuminati were soon involved in a system of mutual espionage, confession, and the like, essentially inconsistent with true freedom, but calculated to place the threads all in one hand, by which the holy legion was to be led on, as it was imagined, to the benefaction of mankind." Only such persons were distinguished for piety, wisdom, complete subjugation for self, and zeal for the interest of the society, were admitted to the higher degrees, wherein the mysteries of the higher order were revealed to them, while those of the lower degrees hardly suspected their existence. These mysteries related to religion, on which a small number were distinguished for piety, wisdom, and free-thinking; and to politics. In regard to which the aim was to replace monarchy by republicanism and socialism. An active correspondence was kept up between the chief and the members of the order in the different districts where lodges were established. It was carried on by means of a cipher, generally of the usual figures; but the higher orders also made use of other signs. The months were designated by particular names; thus January became Dune, February denh; and Germany was called the Orient, Bavaria Achaisia, Munich Athen. The order was represented by a cipher by --. The letters addressed to a superior were signed, O, to designate the first letter, which was marked O, if the second letter was one of the higher degrees, it was marked S. Soli; and if to one still superior, Primo. Each one of the Illuminati was, besides, known in the order by some particular name. Thus the founder went by the ominous appellation of Spartacus; Knigge by that of Philo, etc. The attentions which the order paid to its mystic, mysterious secret forms, and the extraordinary energy and Jesuitical acumen which the leaders brought to bear on their undertaking, soon swelled its numbers, and, during its most prosperous period, the association consisted of over 2000 members, among them some of the most prominent names of Germany; three of whom, who, however, could only be initiated into the lower orders, as the higher mysteries of the order inculcated republicanism. The head-quarters of the order were in Bavaria, which, with Suabia and Franconia, formed the first province of the association in Germany, and it was not until 1783 that the order was established in Hanover, Germany, but also gained a foothold in France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Poland, Hungary, and Italy.

As regards its interior organization, the order was established on the lines of the Society of Jesus; as we have already observed, Weishaupt had once been a member. In 1777 he had joined the freemasons. From the first it had been his aim to connect his new society with freemasonry, for the purpose of giving it a firmer foundation, and with the ultimate object of finally absorbing the latter in the former. Knigge, as the order's activity and enterprise finally succeeded in bringing the Illuminati to be considered as freemasons by the craft, but this step made new enemies for the Illuminati, and ultimately caused their overthrow. Knigge modelled the material organization of the society after that of freemasonry, dividing the members into three classes, each of which was again composed of several degrees. The first, a preparatory class, was composed of novices, Minervites, and Illuminati minores. Any man eighteen years of age could become a novice, and on his conduct depended his promotion to the next degree, which could be divided into three classes, or that of freemasons, embraced apprentices, masters, and master-masons, besides the two higher grades of Illuminatus major and of Illuminatus dirigens, or Scottish knights. These latter had the control of the Minervite lodges. The third class, or that of the "Mysteries," was divided into higher and lower mysteries; the latter embraced the priests and the regents, or members to whom had been imparted the mysterious aims of the society in regard to religion and politics. The initiation to the degree of regent was conducted with great solemnity, and was very impressive. The adepts of the higher mysteries were also of two degrees, the Magnus and the Rer, to whom the principles of naturalism, republicanism, and socialism were further developed. These were the Areopagites of the order, and had no superiors but the secret council, presided over by the general of the order, his deputy, and his assistant. The latter was the highest court of appeal for all members of the order.

A jealous feeling and contention for leadership which sprang up between Weishaupt and Knigge, and a difference of opinion of the two greatest heads of the society on many points of organization and discipline, hastened the order's decline. The council, on the 11th of July, 1784. As soon as the State and Church-disturbing tendency, which for a time had remained hidden, became known, the order was vehemently denounced. June 22, 1784, the elector of Bavaria issued an edict for its suppression. But the society continued to exist in secret. When, however, the authorities had succeeded in obtaining further evidences of the dangerous tendency of the order by securing some of the papers of the association (which they published), they punished the members by fine, imprisonment, and exile.
Many quit the country, among them Weihaupt (Feb.
16, 1785), on whose head a price had been set. He fled to Germany (see note, Haller, 1738). After his death, Nov. 18, 1809, Edicts were again published by the elector of Bavaria, March 2 and August 16, 1785, which, by the severe punishment which it threatened members, caused the rapid decline of the order, and they disappeared altogether towards the close of the last century.
"Great interest was at one time attached to the order of the Illuminati, whose secret influence was regarded as a principal cause of many of the political events of the time of the French Revolution, and the works of Abbé Barral and of Professor Robison of Edinburgh upon this subject were en-gVy read, but the highly exaggerated character of their views is now generally acknowledged." See Her-Illumination. Art. Or. The art of illuminating manuscripts with gold and color seems to prevail in countries where the art of printing is unknown. It has been erroneously supposed to have been originated by Christianity; it is certain, however, that under its sway it was brought to its known perfection. The time when the art of illumination was adopted and the art of illumination so perfectly adapted to the art of the Calligrapher is impossible to determine definitely, but it most probably dates from the time when the ancient fashion of rolled manuscripts (comp. the article Thora), which the Jews still preserve, was changed for the present book form.

The earliest specimens extant are from the first half of the 8th century; and we find St. Jerome living in Italy more than the 4th century, complaining of the abuse of filling up books with ornamental capital letters of an enormous size. In the 5th century many of the MSS. were illuminated, especially copies of the Gospels and other Scriptures.
They were written on a blue ground in silver, with the name of God in gold. By the influence of Byzantine luxury there were even produced some copies on a gilded ground in letters of black. One of the best specimens of the perfection to which the art had been brought in that century is the Codex Aratorum, or copy of the Gothic (Ulphias's) version of the N. T. in letters of silver, with the initials in gold, now preserved in the royal library at Upsala. It is also supposed that at that time the various schools of illumination originated. "Rome had succumbed to barbarian violence, and her arts, though decaying, still exerted an influence in this new style of painting, that was natural to her infancy. That was naturally stronger in Italy, and therefore the early illuminations of the Italian school bear traces of the old Roman style. In France the same influence was manifest, mixed up with national peculiarities, and this school was consequently called the Franco-Roman." But, remarkable as it may appear, it is now found that Ireland was far in advance of other nations in the knowledge of this art, as she was generally in advance of them in the scale of civilization. "Her fame had extended over Europe, her monasteries were adorned with men of great piety and learning, who were the trainers of the leading spirits of the age. She was the first to break down the wall of ignorance; and, after her death, the monks gave Christianity to Scotland, so she also imparted to the Saxons the art of illumination." The first illuminator seems to have been Dagaeus, abbot of Innkehtura, who flourished in the second half of the 8th century.
Of English illumination, the finest specimen extant is the 10th century, the so-called "Benedictional" by St.
Ethelwold, bishop of Winchester, written and painted between 963 and 984. In the 13th century, and even down to its decline three centuries later, the art was greatly furthered by Bonaventura's series of medititions on the life of Christ, which gave minute descriptitive time of his death and to MSS. of almost any sort.
The invention of printing seemed to sound its death-knell, and it is not to be wondered at that the monks, who, being cut off from secular business, and having found employment by the application of this art, then made a strong resistance to the introduction of the printing art, and perhaps delayed it sooner or later, of their own employment. But the popular mind had become so accustomed to the illumination of works, that its extinction was much more gradual than had been anticipated, and the earliest printed books were not only illuminated, but the printers even attempted, by a process of their art, to superseede manual labor. Perhaps the latest effort of this kind was an edition of the Liturgy, brought out in 1717 by John Short, entirely engraved on copper plates.
"The pages were surrounded by borders, and emblis-hed with pictures and decorated initial letters." See Hill, English Monasticism, ch. xii, where may also be found the details of the work as it was carried on for centuries in the various monasteries of Europe.

ILLRICUS 499 IMAGE OF GOD

"No one doubts that the phrase 'image of God' denotes in general a likeness of God; but the opinions of contemporary theologians have always been different according to the particular points of resemblance which Moses intended to express by the phrase. Nor is this strange, since Moses does not explain what he means by it, and it is used in very different significations in the Bible, a fact that has never sufficiently been noticed. The common opinion is, that this phrase indicates the part which man originally possessed, but which he lost, in part at least, by the fall. The principal texts cited in behalf of this opinion are Gen. i. 26; compare ii, 15 sq.; and from the N. Test., Col. iii. 19; compare Eph. iv. 24, where a similar meaning is understood to mean a restoration of this image, implying that man must have lost it; also 2 Cor. xi. 3. Against this common opinion it may be objected that the image of God is described in many passages as existing after the fall, and as still discoverable in men; as Gen. ix. 6; James iii. 9; 1 Cor. xi. 7, and especially Gen. v. 1-3, from which it appears that Seth, being made in the likeness of Adam, must have had the same image of God, whatever it was, which Adam possessed" (Knappe, Christian Theology, bk. i. art. vii, sec. 58, p. 168).

In the works of the fathers we find great diversity of opinion on this subject. (For an account of these image theories see homin. opif. c. iv, v, xvi.) Some of the early Latin fathers also maintained a bodily likeness to God (Irenæus, Adv. Haer. v. 6). The Aulæans (q. v.) admitted only the physical resemblance (Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iv. 9), while Augustin and the Church of Alexandria rejected it altogether (Clemens, Strom. ii. 19). The term "image" is found in making the divine image, in a moral point of view, to consist in uprightness before God, and in the harmony between the higher and the lower faculties of the soul; as also physically in the immortality of the body, and the mastering over all others the two to admit a confirmation and strengthening of the image of God in man by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, which they consider not only as a gift of free grace, but also as necessary to the completeness of man (Cyr. Alex. Theol. xxxiv, dist. iv). These different parties make great use of the distinction between the image of God and simul tude; the scholastics maintaining that by the image (which, though weakened by the fall, was still extant) is to be understood the essence of the innate, natural attributes of the spirit, especially reason and liberty; and by the simul tude (which was obliterated by the fall, and has only been restored in the human soul) is to be understood agreeable to God, or, in other words, the thorough uniformity with the divine will originating in the divine grace (Hugo Vict., De Suav. i. 1, p. 6, c ii.; Petri. Lomb. Sent. l. ii., dist. 10, D). The creed of Trent makes no positive mention concerning the image of God, but the Catechismus Romanus considers it as consisting in the peculiar inherent dispositions of the human soul, for after its definitions concerning Adam's body it says, "Quod autem ad animam pertinet, eum (hominem) ad imaginem et simul tudem;" the scholastics maintaining that this was the same, or at least coextensive with the "image of God" in the soul. It also leaves undecided the question whether the consequent submission of the desires to the dictates of reason is also to be considered as forming part of this image of God; the word similitudo being used, which means that the originalis justitiae admixtures donum is something independent, not inherent (Cat. Rom. i. 2, 19). The Romish theologians still endeavor to maintain the distinctions made by the scholastics between image and simul tude. The 'original justice' is further considered as a supernatural gift, which man possessed at the moment of creation, so that it is made to counterbalance the natural division between the higher and the lower forces (the spirit and the flesh, reason and sensuality), thus directing the forces towards God, and introducing the simul tude in the image (Bellarmine, De Grat. Prin. Homines, de..."
IMAGE OF GOD

v. 5). Thus the Roman Catholic Church starts in its theory from the present state of man, as resulting from the fall, in regard to which state communion with God is something superadded. Some Romanist theologians distinguish between original justice and original holiness (communion with God), maintaining the former to be the state of man by nature; as it came from the hands of the Creator, and holding the latter to be exclusively the gift of superadded and supernatural grace. The evangelical Church, on the contrary, by considering the image of God as belonging to Adam's true nature, as he came from the hands of his Creator, obtains a doctrine at the same time more positive and less controversial. The body is full of natural carnal propensities, and tends downwards. The soul, as rational and immortal, tends upwards. But there is no harmony between the two by creation. An act subsequent to that of creation, and additional to it, is necessary to bring this harmony about. We must release the soul from the burden of original righteousness, which is superadded to the gifts of creation. In and by this act the higher part is strengthened to acquire and maintain dominion over the lower, and a positive perfection is imparted to human nature that was previously lacking in it. Original righteousness is thus, in return, to the created and natural character of man, a supernatural gift.

"The second peculiarity in the papal anthropology, as it comes from God, is imperfect. He is not created sinfull indeed, but neither is he created holy. To use the papal phrase, he is created in partes naturalibas; without positive or negative power about purposes. The soul is full of natural carnal propensities, and tends downwards. The body, as rational and immortal, tends upwards. But there is no harmony between the two by creation. An act subsequent to that of creation, and additional to it, is necessary to bring this harmony about. We must release the soul from the burden of original righteousness, which is superadded to the gifts of creation. In and by this act the higher part is strengthened to acquire and maintain dominion over the lower, and a positive perfection is imparted to human nature that was previously lacking in it. Original righteousness is thus, in return, to the created and natural character of man, a supernatural gift."

"The second peculiarity in the papal anthropology consists in the tenet that apostasy involves the loss of a supernatural, but not of a natural gift. By the act of transgression, human nature lapse back into that condition of conflict between the flesh and the spirit in which it was created. In losing its original righteousness, therefore, it loses nothing with which it was endowed by the creative act, but only that superadded gift which was bestowed subsequently to this. The superadded gift not the lower, but the higher part, by the Adamic transgression, and the two parts of man, the flesh and the spirit, fall into their primitive and natural antagonism again. Original righteousness being a supernatural gift, original sin is the loss of it, and, in reality, the restoration of man to the state in which he was created (Shed. Job. of Dec. ii. 14)."

The "image," or likeness of God, in which man was made, has, by some, been assigned exclusively to the body; by others simply to the soul; others, again, have found its essence in the circumstance of his having "dominion" over the other creatures. As to the body, it is not necessary to take up any large space to prove that, in no instance can that literally bear the image of God, that is, be "like" God. Descant ever so much or ever so poetically upon man's upright and noble form, this has no more likeness to God than a prone or reptile one: God is incorporeal, and has no lower form; but our analogy is to the antitype of anything material. Not more tenable is the notion that the image of God in man consisted in the "dominion" which was granted to him over this lower world. Limited dominion may, it is true, be an image of large and absolute dominion; but man is not said to have been made in the image of God, but in the image of his likeness, which is accident merely, for, before any creatures existed, God himself could have no dominion but in the image and likeness of God himself, of something which constitutes his nature. Still further, man, according to the history, was evidently made in the image of God, in order to his having dominion, as the Hebrew connective particle ("and") imports. He who was to have dominion must necessarily be made before he could be invested with it, and therefore dominion was consequent to his existing in the "image" and likeness of God, and could not be that image itself.

The attempts which have been made to fix upon some one essential quality in which to place that "image" of God in which man is said to be created in the image of God, as required for by any scriptural requirement, but are even contradicted by various parts of Scripture, from which alone we must derive our information on this subject. It is in vain to say that this "image" must be something essential to human nature, something only which cannot be lost. We shall find, and that it is essential to human nature, that it is essential to human nature; but that it should comprehended nothing else, or one quality only, has no proof or reason; and we are, in fact, taught that it comprises also what is not essential to human nature, and what may be lost and be regained. As to both, the evidence of Scripture is explicit. (1.) When God is called "the Father of spirit," a likeness is certainly intimated between man and God in the spirituality of their nature. This is also implied in the striking argument of Paul with the Athenians: "Forasmuch as all live, after the likeness of God, who hath created us after his own image" (Rom. xi. 7). We ought not to think that the godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone graven by art, and man's device; plainly referring to the idolatrous statues by which God was represented among heathens. If likeness to God in man consisted in bodily shape, this would not have been an argument for man's moral character. (2.) "Forasmuch as all live, after the likeness of God, who hath created us after his own image" (Rom. xi. 7). Plainly referring to the idolatrous statues by which God was represented among heathens. If likeness to God in man consisted in bodily shape, this would not have been an argument for man's spiritual character. (3.) To these correspondences we are to add that of intellectual powers, and we have what divines have called, in perfect accordance with the Scriptures, the natural image of God in his creature, which is essential and inseparable. He was made capable of knowledge, and he was endowed with liberty of will. (4.) This natural image of God, in which man was created, was the foundation of that moral image by which also he was distinguished. Unless he had been a spiritual, knowing, and willing being, he would have been wholly incapable of moral qualities. That he had such qualities eminently, and that in them consisted the image of God, as well as in the natural attributes just stated, we have also the express testimony of Scripture. "Lo this only have I found, that God made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions." There is also an express reference to the image of God in which man was first created, in Col. iii. 10. "And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him;" and in Eph. iv. 24, "Put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. This also may be finally argued from the satisfaction with which the historian of the creation represents the Creator as viewing the works of his hands "as very good." This is pronounced with reference to each individually as well as to the whole: "And God saw everything that he had made, and beheld, it was very good." But as to man, this goodness must necessarily imply moral as well as physical qualities. Without them he would have been imperfect as an end; and, had they existed in him, in their first and original form and end, he must have been an exception, and could not have been pronounced "very good."—Watson, Institutes, ii, 9-18.

From this point of view we may arrive at a correct apprehension of the idea of the divine image. God, as such, is immensely beautiful and holy, but such beauty and holiness cannot but manifest himself in an eternal object of this love, of the same essence with himself. This is the Son, the eternal, absolute, immanent image of God. But as God, by virtue of his unchangeable, overflowing love, calls also forth (or creates) other beings, to whom he wills to impart his blemishless life, the establishing and organizing of his kingdom, he, the type of all perfection, cannot create them but after his own image, as he sees it from all eternity in the Son. This created image of God is man in his primitive condition. Man was the real object of God's creative activity, as is seen in God's special decree concerning creation (Psal. cxxiv. v, viii), and mankind are called to be the real population of his kingdom. The whole universe (and even in some sense the angels, Heb. i, 14) was only created for man, which is the reason why he was not created till all other things were ready for him. The faculties which over the outer world ascribed to him in Scripture (Psal. cxxiv. v, viii), and mankind are called to be the real population of his kingdom. He extended also to the body as the outward image of the life, the dwelling and organizing of the soul. Man was created the image of God in the totality of his being. But, while man was thus made of the image of God to himself, he was also made the image of God to the world before which he stands as the representative of God, a relation by which the mastery over the outer world ascribed to him in Scripture (Psal. cxxiv. i, 28-30) is shown to have an inner foundation. Thus the image of God was innate in man and inalienable. This innate state, however, bespoke a corresponding habitual state. Inasmuch as God the Spirit is love, man was destined to a life of love, and was at once brought into it by communion with God. From the heart, however, as the centre of individual life, the power of love manifests itself in the direction of knowledge as truth and wisdom (objective and subjective directions), and in the direction of the will, as freedom and sanctity (formal and material directions), yet so that these spiritual conditions in their original form produced a state partly of unrestrained innocence and partly of unfolding development. To the body, the image of God procured immortality (poste non muri), as the outward dissolution of the forces (death) is but the result of an inward dissolution of the principle of life. With regard to the world, however, man obtained by it a power, in consequence of which the world becomes subject to him by love, and not by force; and by his knowledge of its nature (Gen. ii, 19; 20), he is enabled to carry out God's will in it.

This habitual resemblance to God, which, with the image of God innate in man's nature, formed the natural, original state of man, was lost by sin, as the life of love, coming from God, which formed its basis, was destroyed by selfishness coming from the heart of man. It could only be restored by the absolute image of God the Son, source of the life of love for the world, assuming himself the form of man. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, made flesh, is the real, personal restoration of the image of God in humanity. Since in the flesh he overcame sin for us by his death, and raised our nature to glory in his resurrection, man can again become partner of the righteousness and spiritual glory which belong to him. By the Holy Spirit, which fills our hearts with love, man and image of God must have been an exception, and could not have been pronounced "very good."—See C. Image of Jealousy. See JALOYU, IMAGE OF.

Imagery (אַלְפָּם, maskibh*), an image, as rendered Lev. xxvi, i; or picture, as rendered Numb. xxxiii, 52), only in the phrase "chambers of his imagery" (Ezek. xxi. 12). The Hebrew word is the feminine form of a root which means "to bring forward" or "to apprise." The connexion of this word with the image of God as the special subject to be brought forward to this phrase are connected with an instructive passage in the history of Ezekiel and the Jewish exiles, who were stationed in Assyria, on the banks of the Chebar. At one of their interesting prayer-meetings for the special restoration of Israel, which had been held so often and so long without any prospect of brighter days, and when the faith and hopes of many of the unfortunates were waxing dim and feeble, Ezekiel, in presence of his friends, consisting of the exiled elders of Judah, was suddenly rapt in mystic vision, and graciously shown, for his own satisfaction, as well as that of his associates, the reasons of God's protracted controversy with Israel, and the sad necessity there was for still dealing hardly with them. Transported by the Spirit (not bodily, indeed, nor by external force, but in imagination) to the city and Temple of Jerusalem, he there saw, as plains而言it had been with the eye of sense, atrocities going on within the precincts of the holy place—the perpetuation of which in the very capital of Judea, the place which God had chosen to put his name there, afforded proof of the woful extent of national apostasy and corruption, and was sufficient to justify, both to the mind of the prophet and his circle of pious associates, the severity of the divine judgments on Israel, and the loud call there was for prolonging and increasing, instead of putting a speedy end to, the dire calamities they had so long been suffering (Ezek. viii).

See IMAGERY.

The first spectacle that caught his eye as he perambulated, in mystic vision, the outer court of the Temple—that court where the people usually assembled to worship—was a colossal statue, probably of Baal, around which crowds of devotees were performing their frantic rites and idolatries and all sorts of degenerate practices, enthroning the god and placing their offerings on his golden altars, dancing on the walls and portals of the house of him who had proclaimed himself a God jealous of his honor (ver. 3; Louth, ad loc.). Scarcely had the prophet recovered from his astonishment and horror at the open and undisguised idolatry of the multitude in that sacred enclosure, when his celestial guide bade him turn another way, and he would see greater abominations. Leading him to that side of the court along which were ranged the houses of the priests, his conductor pointed to a mud wall (ver. 7), which, to screen themselves from observation, the apostate servants of the true God had raised; and in that wall was a small chink, by widening which he discovered a passage into a secret chamber, which was completely impervious to the rays of the sun, but which he found, on entering it, lighted up by a profusion of brilliant lamps. The sides of it were covered with numerous paintings of beasts and reptiles—the favorite devices of Egypt; and with their eyes intensely fixed on these decorations was a conclave of seventy persons, in the garb of priests—the exact number, and, in all probability, the individual members of the Sanhedrin, who stood in the attitude of adoration, holding in their hands each a golden censer, containing all the costly and odoriferous materials which the pomp and magnificence of the Egyptian ritual required. "There was every form of creeping things and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel portrayed round about." The scene described was wholly formed on the model of Egyptian worship; and every one who has read the works of Wilkinson, Belzoni, Richardson, and others, will perceive the close resemblance that it bears to the outer walls, the sanctuaries, and the hieroglyphical figures that distinguished the ancient mythology of Egypt (see Kitto, Piet. Bibb., note ad loc.). What were the strange and unsightly images engraved on the walls of this chamber discovered by Ezekiel, and that formed the objects of the profane reverence of those apostate councillors, may be known from the following metrical description, which the late Mr. Salt, long the British consul in Egypt, has drawn of the gods worshiped in the temple of Philae in the island of that name, "Egypt," in Hall's Life of Salt, ii, 416. Those who have prosecuted their researches among the rubbish of the temples, he says, have found in the deep-sequestered chambers they were able to reach—

"The wildest images, unheard of, strange, That ever puzzled antiquarians' brains:
Genii, with heads of birds, hawks, ibis, ducks,
Of lions, foxes, cats, fish, frogs, and snakes, Bulls, rams, and monkeys, hippocomati, With knife in paw, suspended from the sky;
Gods perambulating men, and men turned gods, Seated in honor, with gilt crooks and rods; Vast scarabsae, globes by hands upheld, From chaos springing, 'mid an endless field;
Of forms grotesque, the sphinx, the crocodile,
And other reptiles from the slime of Nile."

Interior of the Temple at Medinet-Abu.

In order to show the reader still further how exactly this inner chamber that Ezekiel saw was constructed after the Egyptian fashion, we subjoin an extract from the work of another traveller, descriptive of the great temple of Edifi, one of the admirable relics of antiquity, from which it will be seen that the degenerate priests of Jerusalem had borrowed the whole style of the Egyptian in which they were celebrating their hidden rites—its form, its entrance, as well as its pictorial ornaments on the walls—from their idolatrous neighbors of Egypt:

"Considerably below the surface of the adjoining building," says he, "my conductor pointed out to me a chink in an old wall, through which he told me he could see the gods on my hands and feet; the aperture was not two feet and a half high, and scarcely three feet and a half broad. My companion had the courage to go first, thrusting in a lamp before him: I followed. The passage was so narrow that my nose and face were almost buried in the dust, and I was nearly suffocated. After proceeding about ten yards in utter darkness, the heat became excessive, the breathing was laborious, the perspiration poured down my face, and I would have given the world to have got out; but my companion, whose person I could not distinguish, though his voice was audible, called out to me to crawl a few feet further, and that I should find plenty of room. I joined him at length, and had the inexpressible satisfaction of standing once more upon my feet.

"We found ourselves in a splendid apartment of great magnitude, adorned with an incredibly large number of sacred statues and pictures" (Madden's Travels in Turkey, Egypt, etc.; see also Maurice, Indian Antiq., ii, 212). In the dark recesses of such a chamber as this, which they entered like the traveller through a hole in the outer wall, in which was painted to the eye the grotesque and motley group of Egyptian divinities, were the chief men of Jerusalem actually employed when Ezekiel saw them. With minds highly excited by the dazzling splendor, and the clouds of fragrant smoke that filled the apartment, the performers of those clandestine rites seem to have surpassed all others in devotion and zeal. Their ancestors in the days of Moses, when, crowding round the pedestal of the golden calf, they rent the air with their cries of "These be thy gods, O Israel!" Beneath a calmer exterior, the actors in the scene pointed out to Ezekiel concealed a stronger and more intense passion for idolatry. Ezekiel's form of animal life, from the most vulgar of the Nile, bred to the most loathsome reptile that spawned in Egypt, received a share of their insane homage; and the most extraordinary feature of the scene was that the individual who appeared to be the director of these idol mysteries, the master of ceremonies, was a Jew, a descendant of the sacred inhabitants of that most illustrious city, the city of the gods, who had gained so much renown as the principal adviser of the good king Josiah, and whose family had for generations been regarded as the most illustrious for piety in the land. The presence of a son of this venerable house in such a den of impurity struck the prophet as an electric shock, and showed, better than all the other painful spectacles this chamber exhibited, to what a fearful extent idolatry had invaded the land. See Idolatry.

It might have been supposed impossible for men to have sunk to a lower depth of superstition than that of imitating the Egyptians in worshipping the generative principles of the Nile, or the vegetable produce of their fields and gardens, had not the prophet been directed to turn yet again, and he would see greater abominations that they did. "Then he brought me to the gate of the Lord's house, which was towards the north; and behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz" (ver. 14). This, the principal deity of the Phcenians, and who was often called also by that people Adoni, that is, My Lord, became afterwards famous in the Grecian mythology under the well-known name of Adonis; and the circumstance of the being so long and so generally regarded as one of the most beautiful fictitious persons by so many of the classic poets is a sufficient proof of the great popular interest his name and ritual excited among the idolaters of the ancient world. It is said to have originated in a tragic adventure that befell an intrepid and beautiful prince of Pho nicia, who was killed while hunting a wild boar, by which that land was infested, and whose untimely death in the cause of his country was bewailed in an annual festal held to commemorate the disastrous event. During the seven days that Jehovah abode, the Phoenicians appeared to be a nation of mourners; and in every town and village a fictitious representation of Tammuz was set up for the occasion, and the whole population assembled to pour forth their unbounded sorrow for his hapless fate, more especially at Byblos, in Syria, where they erected a high commanded pillar, dedicated to the national deity. A strange imposture was practised to in fluence the public lamentations. There was in this temple a gigantic statue of the god, the eyes of which were filled with lead, which, on fire being applied within, of course melted and fell in big drops to the ground, a signal for the loud wailings of the by-standers, whose eyes, in sympathetic imitation, were dissolved in tears. Conspicuous among the crowd on such occasions, a band of mercenary females directed the orgies; and, in con formity with an ancient custom of bewailing the dead on the seven days after their decease, (Antig., bk. iv, ch. iii), others took their station at the gate, with their faces directed northwards, as the sun was said to have been in that quarter of the heavens at the time when Tammuz died. These violent efforts in mourning were always followed by scenes of the most licence, and, as is frequently, such as were not mentioned, are manifestly implied among the "greater abominations" which degraded this other group of idol aters. See TAMMUN.

Besides the hieroglyphics of Egypt and the orgies of Tammuz, there was another form of superstition still, which in Jerusalem, then almost wholly given to idolatry, had its distinguished patrons. "Turn thee yet again," said his celestial guide to the prophet, "and thou shalt see greater abominations than these" (ver. 16). So he brought him "unto the inner court of the Lord's house, and behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five-and twenty men, with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east; and they wor shipping the sun towards the east." Perhaps of all the varieties of superstition which had crept in among the Hellenic races of the East, the most pronounced dis played such flagrant diabolism to the God of Israel as this (Clem. Alexandriaus, Strom. vii, 590); for, as the most holy place was situated at the west end of the sanctu ary, it was impossible for these twenty-five men to pay their homage to the rising sun without turning their backs on the consecrated place of the divine presence, and accordingly this fourth circle is introduced last, as if their employment formed the climax of abominations —"the worst and most woful sign of the times. Could stronger proofs be wanted that the Lord had not for saken Israel, but was driven from them? This was the lesson intimated, and actually accomplished by this vic tion; for while the prophet was made aware by this mystic scene of the actual state of things among his de generate countrymen at home, he saw himself—and in structed the pious circle around him to see—a proof of the desolate state of the church in the great de ing the contrary to have been the cause of the great averse, especially in the East, where images were made the object of especial adoration: they were kissed, lamps were burned before them, incense was offered to them, and, in short, they were treated in every respect as the heathen were wont to treat the images of their gods. Some of the heathen had grown prominent in these practices from motives of policy, while the more enlightened and evangelical portion strongly opposed them. This gave rise to the Iconoclasts (q. v.). Neander describes the origin of the use of images in churches, as it "is not in the Church, but in the family, that religious images first came into use among the Christians. In their daily intercourse with men, the Christians saw themselves everywhere sur- rounded by the objects of pagan mythology, or, at least, by objects offensive to their moral and Christian senti- ments. Representations of this sort covered the walls in shops, and were the ornaments of drinking-vessels and seal-rings, on which the pagans frequently had en- graved the likeness of gods, or the figure of a ship sailing under the symbol of our Saviour rescuing the repentant sinner, according to the Gospel parable. Clement of Alexandria says, in refer- ence to the seal-rings of the Christians, 'Let our signets be a dove (the symbol of the Holy Spirit), or a fish, or a ship sailing towards heaven; the images of the Christian Church and of the individual Christian soul, or a lyre (the symbol of Christian joy), or an anchor (the symbol of Christian hope); and he who is a fisherman will not be forgetful of the apostle Peter, and of the children taken from the water; for no images of gods should be seen. So, with regard to the rings of those who are forbidden all intercourse with idols; no sword or bow on the rings of those who strive after peace; no goblets on the rings of those who are the friends of sobriety.' Yet religious emblems passed from domestic use into the church, as the Christianized century advanced. The walls of them were painted in this manner. The Council of Elvira, in the year 303, opposed this innova- tion as an abuse, and forbade the objects of worship and adoration to be painted on the walls' (Neander, Church History, i, 292).

In Image-Worship the Roman Catholic Church. The Romanists deny the charge of worshipping images, or idolatry, which has often been and is still made against them by Protestants. They have always care- fully refrained from such doctrinal definitions on the subject as would fully convict the Church of idolatry. In this respect the course of the Roman Church is simi- lar to its procedure with regard to the doctrine of good works, which it presents in such a manner as might lead one to think that it strictly asserts the merits of Christ as alone rendering our works useful, whilst in practice the believer is pointed to good works as the means of salvation. So with regard to the prayers to the Virgin and the saints, it draws a clear distinction between the adoration and the worship of saints, but practically the prayers of the Roman Catholics are more generally addressed to the saints than to Christ. The same takes place with regard to the veneration of saints. The Council of Trent (Sess. xxi, De invocationis Sanctorum, etc.) states that 'the images of Christ and of the ever virgin Mother of God, and in like manner of other saints, are to be kept and retained, and that done honor and veneration is to be awarded to them. Not that it is believed that any divinity or power resides in them, on account of which they are to be worshipped, or that any benefit is to be sought from them, or any confidence placed in images, as was formerly done by the Gentiles, who fixed their hope in idols. But the honor with which they are regarded is referred to those who are represented by them; so that we adore Christ and venerate the saints, whose likenesses these images bear, when we kiss them, and uncover our heads in their presence, and prostrate our- selves.' The council quotes on this subject the second Synod of Nicaea. To this "honor and veneration" belong the solemn consecration of the images, offering up incense before them, the special prayers accompanying these ceremonies as contained in the Pontificale Romanum, other prayers for private use to be repeated before the images, and the indulgences granted to those who fulfill that duty, etc. All this shows that the Roman Church does not intend, in form, the veneration of images as worship, has introduced the practice among the people. The masses do not and cannot understand the subtle distinction made by the Church, and not always strictly observed even by the clergy. The Church knows of this evil, but places it among things she tolerates for the sake of charity, though she does not approve them. Yet some Roman Catholic theologians appear to have come very close indeed to the same conception as the masses on this point. Thomas Aquinas expressed his views of images in a dilemma: 'A picture considered in itself is worthy of no veneration, but if we consider it as an image of Christ it may be allowable to make an internal distinction between the image and its subject, and these are adorati in Christi imago et Christi.' (Syll. dist. 9, q. 1, art. 2; Summa, qu. 28, art. 4, 5.) Bonaventura drew a correct conclusion from the princi- ple: 'Since all veneration shown to the image of Christ is shown to Christ himself, then the image of Christ is also entitled to be prayed to' ('Cultus laetitiae', i, dist. 9, art. 1, qu. 2). Bellarmine says that 'the images of Christ and the saints are to be adored not only in a fig- urative manner, but quite positively, so that the prayers are directly addressed to them, and not merely as the representatives of the original (Ita ut ipsi [imagines] terminent venerationem, ut in se considerantur et non in Christo, qui est omnipotens, sive in Christo qui est Deus et in Christo qui est Deus,' (ibid., i, x, 1, s. 4, n. 2), i.e. the difference between the divine worship and images of degree or condition of nature or quality. Such theories, although far overstepping the limits of the decree of Trent, are yet freely permitted by the Romish Church; it neither openly ad- mits nor officially condemns them, and thus leaves an opening for all possible degrees of idolatry, over which many an honest Roman Catholic priest mourns in se- cret.

History shows that the first tendency to image-worship was the result of a slow but continued degeneracy. The same arguments now used by the Romish Church to defend image-worship were rejected by the Church of the first three centuries when used in the defence of idol-worship. The heathen said, We do not worship the images themselves, but those whom they represent. To this Lactantius answers (Inst. Diet. lib. ii, c. 2), 'You worship them; for, if you believe them to be in heaven, why do you not cause your eyes to fix upon Christ, as you look at the wood and stone, and not up, where you believe the originals to be?' The ancient Church re- jected the use of all images ('Symod of Elviro, 305, c. 38: 'Placuit, picturam in ecclesiis esse non debere, ne quod ob fidem, ob tradi, neque quod ob indicium religiosum.' The early Christians evidently feared that pictures in their churches would eventually become objects of prayer. The admission of images into the church in the 4th and 5th centuries was justified on the theory that the ignorant people could learn the facts of Christianity from them better than from sermons or books. But the people soon lost sight of this use of the images, and made them the objects of adoration. This took place earlier in the East than in the West; but the abuse gained ground in the latter region in a short time. Severus, bishop of Marseilles, broke several images, and had them taken out of the churches, and the people who had been used to the images were displeased. Gregory the Great proclaims that he does not allow any praying to (adorant) the images, and adds to this that Paulinus of Nola and Nilus had already said that paintings were placed in the church only in order that the uneducated might read the walls what they were unable to read in books (ibid., ep. 105). He also laid down, as a general principle, in his letter to Secundinus, that it was expedient to use the visible to represent the invisible (lib. ix, ep. 52). But he shows evidently that he is not speaking of a mere object of representation, and that he prostrates himself (prostratus) before the images, making the well-known Roman Catholic condition that... he thus really prays to Christ. The second Council of Nicea (A.D. 787) decreed the validity of image-worship, and anathematized all who opposed it. The Frankish Church, on the other hand, though it did not forbid the use of images from the earliest experiments, made their being worshipped. Charlemagne opposed to the decrees of the synod the so-called Caroline books (q. v.), in which it is expressly said that images are allowed in the church, but not to be prayed to, only to excite the attention on the subjects they commemorate, and adorn the church; and very agreeable it says for the future, "if some enlightened persons, who do not pray to the image itself, but to him it represents, should pray before the image, it would mislead the ignorant, who pray only to what they see before their eyes" (lib. iii. 16). The Synod of Frankfurt (summoned by Charlemagne, A.D. 794, and consisting of 33 bishops) and the Synod of Paris (892) solemnly condemned image-worship. The latter council even ventured to reject the pope's contrary opinion in very strong terms. During the whole of the 9th century the matter was thus at rest, Claudia of Turin, Agobard, and other of the most important theologians of that period approving the action of the synod. At the time of the crusades, an opponent of Claudia, expressly says, in his De cultu imaginum, that images are placed in the church "solummodo ad instructas necesariam mentes." The Council of Trent, as cited above, recommends images as means of instructing the people, and to incite the faithful to contemplate the saints. We find that even three times the Roman Church has added to this what the Frankish Church of the 8th and 9th centuries had so wisely rejected.—Hertzog, Real-Encyclopid., ii. 233-235. The fluctuations of opinion and variations of discipline in the Roman Church on the subject of image-worship are well exhibited by Faber (Difficulties of Romanism, p. 10 et seq.). See White, Bampton Lectures, p. 8; Coleman, Ancient Christianity, chap. xiii., § 14; Spanheim, Hist. Imaginum, Opera, tom. ii.; Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book viii, ch. viii.; Tenison, On Idolatriy, p. 395 et seq.; Winer, Comp., comp. i., 416. The subject is variously treated in Schleiermacher: Iconography; Greek Church; Roman Church.

Imagination (Lat. imaginatio).—"The meaning of this word enters into many relationships, and is thereby rendered difficult to define. The principal meaning is doubtful: what connects it with poetry and fine art, from which the opposite signification is derived by a synecdoche is a mode of explaining this complicated relationship will be to state in separation the different constituents of the power in question. We shall then see why and where it touches upon other faculties, which still require to be distinguished from it."

1. Imagination has for its objects the concrete, the real, or the individual, as opposed to abstractions and generalities, which are the matter of science. The full coloring of reality is implied in our imagination of any scene of nature. In this respect, there is something common to imagination and memory. If we endeavor to imagine a volcano, according as we succeed, we have before the mind everything that a spectator would observe on the spot. Thus, sensation, memory, and imagination alike deal with the fulness of the actual world, as opposed to the abstractions of science and the reasoning faculties.

2. The faculty called conception, in one of its meanings, has also to do with this concrete fulness, although, in what Sir William Hamilton deems the original and proper meaning of that word, this power is excluded. In popular language, and in the philosophy of Dugald Stewart, it is reduced to the idea or the fanciful description of actual life, as given in history or in poetry. When we completely enter into a scene portrayed by a writer or speaker, and approach the situation of the actual observer, we are often said to conceive what is being to mind, and also to imagine it; the best word for this signification probably is "reconceive."

mon humanity, and adorned with more than excellence. This is our 'ideal,' what satisfies our emotions, and the fact of its so doing is the determining influence in the concept of REALISM. IMANI is the name of the third sacred book of laws of the Turks, containing the directions for a reasonable conduct of life. — Pierier, Univ. Lex. viii, 830.

Imaum or Imān is the title of a person belonging to a class of the Mohammedan Ulema (q.v.) or priestly body, but not set apart from the rest of the world like the clergy or priesthood, with whom he is usually classed. He is not ordained, nor is any sacred character conferred upon him. The name is Arabic and signifies "he who is at the head." In this sense it is applied even to the sultan, "Imaum ul-Muslemin," or simply "Imam," and is given to the most honored teachers of Mohammedanism, who in the first centuries of Islam were considered as the religious leaders of the community. — Taylor, History of Mohammedanism, ch. viii; Pierier, Univ. Immaculate Conception of the VIRGIN MARY, a doctrine, early broached in the Roman and Greek churches, that the Virgin Mary was conceived without the stain of original sin. Bernard, in the 12th century, rejected this doctrine in opposition to the canons of Lyons, but it was not much agitation until (1801) the Franciscan Duns Scotus took strong grounds in favor of the doctrine, and henceforward it became a subject of vehement controversy between the Scotists and Thomists. The Dominicans espoused the cause of the Thomists, who impugned the dogma; the Franciscans that of the Scotists, who defended it. Sixtus IV, himself a Franciscan, in 1483 declared himself in favor of toleration on the point. The Council of Trent (Sess. v) declared that the doctrine of the conception of all men in sin was not intended to include the Virgin. The controversy was revived in the University of Paris towards the close of the 16th century. During the pontificates of Paul V and Gregory XV, such was the division it occasioned in Spain, that both Philip and his successor sent special embassies to Rome in the vain hope that this contest might be terminated by a bull. The dispute ran so high in that kingdom that, in the military orders of St. James, of the Sword, of Calatrava, and of Alcántara, the knights, on their admission, vowed to maintain the doctrine. In 1708, Clement XI appointed a festival to be celebrated throughout the Catholic Church in honor of the Immaculate Conception. It is firmly believed in the Church of England, in which the feast is celebrated under the name of the Conception of St. Anne; but it was not till 1854 that it was made a dogma in the Roman Catholic Church.

Three Pius IX, during his whole pontificate, has showed himself a decided advocate of the worship of Mary. In his exile at Gaeta in 1849 he addressed the famous "Encyclical on the Mystery of the Immaculate Conception" (Feb. 2) to the patriarchs, primates, archishops, and bishops of the whole Catholic Church, affirming the existence of an ardent desire throughout the Catholic world that the apocryphal see should be lifted; by some solemn judgment, define that the most holy Mother of God, the most loving mother of us all, the immaculate Virgin Mary, had been conceived without original sin. These desires, he adds, have been most acceptable and delightful to us, who, from our earliest years, have had nothing to do but to rever the most blessed Virgin Mary with especial piety and homage, and the most intimate affections of our heart, and to do everything which might seem likely to procure her greater glory and praise, and to amplify her worship. A commission was appointed for the examination of the question, under the presidency of cardinal Fornarini; cardinal Labruschi produced his tract, and Perrone the work De Immaculato B. V. Mariae conceptu; Passaggio also wrote a large essay, and the results of these investigations were issued by the Pope in a papal bull. The special commission reported, in a full concave of the Sacred Congregation, May 27, 1854. Answers had come from 602 bishops, all favorable to the dogma, though 52 doubted the opportuneness, and four the possibility of a decision. The special congregation demanded the definition with expediency and expediency of it. A majority of the cardinals and bishops, by proclamation, and held at Rome Nov. 4, 1854; it was not a general council, nor was any authority attributed to it. Fifty-four cardinals, 46 archbishops, and about 400 bishops are reported to have been present at these deliberations; 576 votes are said to have been cast for the dogma, and only four against it; among the latter were the archbishop de Sibour, of Paris, on the ground that the pope had no power to decide such a question; and also the bishop Olivier, of Evreux, lately deceased, who sent in his vote by proxy. On the 8th of December, in St. Peter's, in the midst of the celebration of the 'Conception', the pope read the decree of more than an imperial dignity, and in answer to a petition presented by the Sacred College of the Cardinals, the supreme pontiff, with a tremulous voice, read in Latin the following decree: 'We declare, pronounce, and define that the doctrine which holds that the blessed Virgin Mary, at the first instant of her conception, by a singular privilege and grace of the omnipotent God, in virtue of the merits of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of mankind, was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin, has been revealed by God, and therefore should firmly and obstinately be held by all the faithful. At the castle of St. Angelo, the joyful chime of all the bells of Rome, the enthusiastic plaudits of the assembled thousands, the magnificent illumination of St. Peter's church, and the splendor of the most gorgeous festive rites, gave response to the infallible decree. It was a day for the grand procession of the pontificate. The pope reposed in his palace with a trembling joy, crowned the image of the Virgin; medals of Australian gold were struck, and distributed in her honor. 'Rome,' say the beholders, 'was intoxicated with joy.' An infallible voice had spoken; a religious article of faith was announced by di- vine authority; the people rejoiced in the most beautiful way, and propitious, that her 'prevalent intercession would give peace and plenty, would stay the power of infidelity, put an end to insurrection, and crown Rome with higher honor and success. The controversy of seven hundred years is brought to a final decision; Rome is committed irrevocably to the worship of the Virgin mother of God, conceived without original sin. This controversy, however, in the final analysis, was more than a theological dispute about the service of the doctrine, and, as in the case of the "Protestantism" of the O.T., they offer no real support of it whatever. As for other passages of a mystical type which are used as a secondary evidence, they would be of value only as confirming and illustrating any in which the fact was directly and undoubtedly stated. Certain it is that in the gospels Mary is represented as she is, and not as an immaculate being; that neither in the Acts nor in the Epistles, notwithstanding Paul's minute description of Christ's scheme of salvation, is she mentioned. The great trouble, in short, with Roman Catholic theologians, is that they transfer the sayings of the prophets and of the apostles concerning Jesus Christ, and all the passages which point to one mediator between God and man, virtually to Mary, the mother of Christ, instead of assigning this position to Christ, the Son of God.

The comparative novelty of the doctrine in theology is proved by history. There is not one great teacher of the Christian Church who, before the breaking out of the controversy between Lyons and Bernard in 1140— that is, for the first eleven centuries of our era— was favorable to the doctrine as now propagated by the Church of Rome. The question does not hang on them; they know nothing of this specific doctrine; they speak in respect to original sin and the need of redemption in such a way as to prove that the immaculate conception of Mary could not have been any part of their creed. Their praises of the Virgin Mary are in moderation, their attitude toward her perpetual virginity (Ephesians, Haur. 78; Jerome, adv. Helvidianum, etc.); many of them believe that she was "sanctified" in the womb; most of them declare that she never was guilty of actual sin; but they do not know anything about her exemption from all infection of original sin. Augustine defends her only against the charge of actual sin (De Natura et Gracia, c. 36): "Excepta sancta Virgine Maria, de qua quapra honorum Dominii nullum prorsus, cum de peccato agitari, haberi velo questionem." This passage is quoted in favor of the dogma, but it plainly refers only to actual sin. Jerome, of course, is merely in a reply to the position of Pelagius, that there were saints who had not sinned. In his treatise on the Resurrection of the Body he says explicitly that Christ alone was without sin: "Solus ergo ille etiam, homo factus, marcescens Deus, personæ, in verba quæ信任, in actione quæ definit, in intima, in toto, in omni, in omni. In his de Genesi, ad Ul. c. 18, n. 82, he speaks of the body of Christ as taken from the flesh of a woman, who was conceived of a mother with sinful flesh; and he indicates a clear distinction between Mary's nature and Christ's nature in this respect. Augustine's followers make similar statements. Eusebius Emesinus (supposed by some to be Hilary) on the 'Nativity' says, 'From the bond of the old sin is not even the mother of the Redeemer free. Fulgentius writes, 'The flesh of Mary, which was conceived in unrighteousness in a human way, was truly sinful flesh,' and he adds that 'this flesh is in itself truly sinful.' referring to Paul's use of the term 'flesh' to designate our common hereditary sinfulness. Others of the fathers make use of similar statements, irreconcilable with a belief in the immaculate conception. (See Perrone, p. 40.)

about it. The doctrine is declared, A.D. 1140, by Bernad, to be a 'noveltv,' and he says that the festival is 'the mother of presumption, the sister of superstition, and the daughter oflevity' (Ep. 174, ad Canon Logi, $ 5 sq.; comp. Serm. 76 in Canz.). Other phrases are even earlier. A Pilgrim of Mary in so such a way is absolutely irremediable with the idea that they believed in her immaculate conception. Hilary (Psa. cxxix, lib. 3, $ 12; comp. Tracts for the Times, No. 79, p. 36) declares that she is exposed to the fire of judgment. Tertullian, Tertullian, Origen, Basil, and Chrysostom do not hesitate to speak of faults of Mary, of her being rebuked by Christ. 'If Mary,' says Origen, 'did not feel offence at Our Lord's sufferings, Jesus did not die for her sins;' Chrysostom ascribes to her 'excessive ambition at the marriage festival at Cana;' Basil thinks that she, too, was 'neglected in the time of the circumcision;' all of which statements are utterly inconsistent, not only with the dogma of the immaculate conception, but also with a belief in her perfect innocence (comp. Gieseler, Ch. Hist., $ 99, note 30, with the references to Origen, ibi, 18; Tertullian, De Carne Christi, 7; Origen, in Lucam, 17, 6 (ed. Baldu.); Chrysostom, Hom. 317, (318), in Matt. and Hom. 21 in John). Tertullian, De Carne Christi, $ 16, declares that 'Christ, by putting on the flesh, made it his, and made it sinless;' Tertullian, that 'Christ made human nature pure by taking it;' Irenæus, on the 'Incarnation,' says, that the Church, 'not Christ, sanctified his own body,' and that 'he hath purified the body, which was in itself corruptible.' Of course, the body he assumed was not in and of itself sinless. Gregory of Nazianzum, and John of Damascus (780), teach expressly that the Virgin was sanctified by the Holy Ghost, but Christ by assuming human nature in Mary, 'made it sinless,' it was not so before his immaculation" (Smith, ut sup.). The view which some hold on the title of Svorocr, given to Mary at the Council of Ephesus, we think bears so wholly on the immaculation of Christ that we refrain from introducing it here. See also Sústhéni $ 93, and the liturgies of offices of the Church. "They exalt Mary and her conception, but they do never call it an 'immaculate' conception. It is only in the latest years that the term 'immaculate' has been introduced into the Western offices of the highest authority. The office in the Roman Missal (n Scott 2422 (2421-3) of the Mass, which our Lord assumed, that is, that it is necessarily odious to sin, like the other flesh of the Virgin, but by the operation of the Spirit it was cleansed.' The Holy Spirit, coming into Mary, purified her from sin, and from all desire of sin." Very explicit is also the testimony of the Bishop of Norwich, who has become the assistant and master of St. Bonaventura, the commentator on Lombard: "It was necessary that the blessed Virgin, in her generation, should contract sin from her parents; she was sanctified in the womb." Bonaventura, the seraphic doctor, the glory of the Franciscans, who died in 1274, and was canonized in 1482, is exhausted in the praise of Mary in his Speculum and Corona. He sanctifies her in all the most rapturous terms. Yet on this question he is also decided, explicitly declaring that "the sanctification of the Virgin was after she had contracted the sin; she was sanctified in the womb" (Lib. iii, Hist. 2, p. 2, 3). A Franciscan, who taught in Cologne in 1260 to 1280, made the same avowals. Bonaventura was the pupil of Alexander of Hales, Albertus Magnus of Bonaventura, and next succeeds the greatest of all the scholastic theologians, Thomas of Aquino (1225-1274), who died in 1274, was canonized in 1233, and in 1567 was declared by Pius V to be 'teacher of the Church." In his Summa Theologiae, p. iii, qu. 27, art. 1, it stands, 'Mary was sanctified in the womb.' Art. 2. 'Not before the infusion of the soul; for if she had been she would not have incurred the stain of original sin. The soul needed the redemption of Christ.' Art. 3. The complete deliverance from original sin was only given her when she conceived Christ (' Ex prole redundanter in matrem totaliter fomiti subtraho." About the festival of the Conception, he says that the Roman Church does not observe it herself; yet it tolerates the custom of other churches: "Unde talis celebratissim ne est totaliter reprobanda." Such is the testimony of the most eminent mediaval divines, to which we need not add names of later date. Perrone, for instance, was well aware of the difficulties to be encountered by the modern defenders of the immaculate conception, cardinal Perrone, "the general rector of the Roman College," and "the prince of contemporary theologians," is led to argue that if these scholastic divines had reasoned correctly from the symbolic facts about the Virgin, they would have made her conception immaculate; also, that what they teach can all be best explained in harmony with the doctrine; or, if not so, that they taught what they did as private teachers; as also that they were ignorant of antiquity; and again, that their views on original sin were such as allowed them to speak as they did; in fine, that they did not have any guidance from an infallible decision in what they uttered; and that while they were wrangling in the schools, the dogma was making its way among the people. All this goes to show that the mediabal testimony is against it. This, according to Lucas Aquinas, is a controlling, or isolated opinions are for the doctrine, and the weight of authority is against it. The only distinct argumentative attempt which Perrone makes to parry the force of their authority and arguments is the assertion that these doctors of the schools, when they speak of the conception, mean the act of conception, and not to the passive, or the infusion of the soul into the seed. But this explanation is irrelevant, for two reasons: one, that many of these doctors do not make this distinction, and, of course, they include the passive, in it; in this, they make the distinction between "conception" and "sanctification," and say that all that precedes sanctification belongs to the "conception," and is infected with original sin; this, of course, includes the "passive" conception. Another reason that invalidates this mode of explanation is, that some of these doctors do make the very distinction in question, and yet maintain that the whole conception, both active and passive, was in original sin. Thus Alexander of Hales says that "the Virgin after her nativity, and after the infusion of the soul into the body, was sanctified;" Bonaventura asserts that the infusion of grace may have been soon after the infusion of the soul, and Aquinas declares expressly that the cleansing can only be from original sin; that the fault of original sin can only be in a rational creature, and, therefore, that before the infusion of the rational soul the Virgin was not sanctified. In fact, this mode of meeting the difficulty can only be carried through by supposing that the mediabal divines believed that original sin could exist in the mere fleshly material derived from parents, an opinion widely abhorrent to their well-known views. We may therefore well say that the doctrine of the immaculate conception of Mary in the statements of Christ, is a "novelty in theology," for the historical records of antiquity are silent; in the Middle Ages the great authorities are divided; and in modern times, as our historical sketch has shown, there have been perpetual contests and divisions. Twenty years ago hardly a single part of the controversy in this subject was concerned by the Catholics of Germany would have pronounced in its favor. Spain, it is true, continued her deviations, but France was indifferent, until the Ultramontane party began to gain power, and to look about for the means of arousing popular feeling in behalf of the papacy. There remains for us now only to consider the doctrine as opposed to the doctrine of original sin. The very necessity for a miraculous conception in the case of him who was to be without sin [see INCARNATION] is in itself a proof that every person conceived in a natural manner must be conceived in sin [see NATURE, HUMAN], and the Bible is too express and unmistakable on this point, that all are conceived in sin [see ORIGINAL SIN]. In the position which the Roman Catholic Church thus assumes, we encounter again the vital defects of her theology on original sin, that semi-Pelagianism against which all the Protestant Confessions have protested as unscriptural. "The Roman Catholic doctrine of original sin is in the opinion of some, that it makes it negative; asserting that it is only the want of that righteousness in which Adam was created; this, is, in scholastic usage, the 'formal' part, or the very essence of original sin. Concurrence is not of the nature of sin. This is the doctrine of original sin, which Perrone endeavored to drive down the throats of the Ultramontane theologians (p. 2, 3 sq.), 'that the essence of original sin is in the defect of grace or of original righteousness.' This is the only view of the matter with which the dogma of the immaculate conception can possibly be reconciled. If this view is false—if original sin, as Protestants hold, according to the Scriptures, be positive and not negative, and come by descent, then the conclusion is irresistible that Mary, by descent, must have had a part therein. The dogma of her immaculate conception is possible only with a false view of the nature of the 'sin of birth.' Augustine could not have held it, nor could he have used Aquinas. The doctrine is diametrically opposed to the conception of original sin. Yet again, even with this defective view of original sin, the dogma is involved in difficulties and internal conflicts by what it asserts and implies as to the origin of the soul of Mary. The theory on which it rests is, that Mary's soul was directly created by God. But, in the words of Virgil, 'Mary, at the first instant of her conception,' was preserved immaculate. What is meant by 'conception' here? It is the so-called 'passive conception,' or the infusion of the soul into the seed, the union of the soul of Mary with the body. And, in this view, immortality is in the soul. Then, now, this soul? It was 'created.' The 'Letters,' in another passage, say that Mary was the 'tabernacle created by God himself.' Pius IX also cites the formula of Alexander VII as having 'decisive' authority, and that formula declares 'that Mary's soul, at the first instant of creation and of infusion into the body,' was preserved free from original sin. This hypothesis of 'creatianism' is also the only hypothesis consonant with the doctrine. But now put these two positions together, namely, that original sin consists essentially in privation; that is, in the defect of original justice; and that Mary's soul was directly created by God, and does not arrive at the following difficulties and dilemmas. The position is this: When Mary's soul was created and infused into her body, she was by grace preserved free from original sin. Would the original sin, from which she was kept, have come to her from her mother?—for it must have come from one or the other. If one says that it would have come from the soul, this involves the consequence that God usually creates original sin in the soul before it is united with the body, and, of course, before it is connected with Adam by descent. If one says, on the other hand, that original sin would have come to Mary from her 'active conception,' that is, from her prepared body, then it was already there, in germ and seed, before the infusion of the soul. God either creates the human soul with original sin, or the original sin is from the parents. If the former, we have original sin without Christ; and the Catholics of Germany would have pronounced in its favor. Spain, it is true, continued her deviations, but France was indifferent, until the Ultramontane party began to gain power, and to look about for the means of arousing popular feeling in behalf of the papacy.

is no theological or rational ground for saying that, as far as her creation was concerned, she was liable to sin, or could be saved from it through Christ's merits. Nor can any relief be found by joining the two points, and asserting that the exemption from original sin concerns the time or point of union of the soul with the seed, the conjunction of the active with the passive conception. Fered great question is, and must be this: In the union of the soul with the body, from which of the two, soul or body, would the original sin have come, if grace had not prevented?—for it must have come from one or the other. If from the soul, then you have original sin without any connection with Adam; if from the body, you will have had to be there; if from both together, this simply dodges the question, or else resolves original sin into some act consequent upon the union—that is, into actual transgression. Nor is the matter helped by saying that original sin is essentially negative, privative; for the privation has respect to either the soul or the body, or to both conjoined, and the same dilemma result. The 'Letters Apostolic,' in other passages, speak of the dogma in this wise: that the 'Blessed Virgin was free from all contagion of body, soul, and mind;' that she had 'come without original sin of her own nature;' that it is their fault;' and that 'the flesh of the Virgin taken from Adam did not admit the stain of Adam, and on this account the most blessed Virgin was the tabernacle created by God himself, formed by the Holy Spirit.' These expressions imply that the fault in the case could have come either from the body or from the soul, but not from both. That is the sense of the dogma might have been of the 'body;' that the 'stain from Adam' would, under other circumstances, have come to her through the 'flesh.' But in her 'active conception,' before the infusion of the soul and of grace, the 'nature,' the 'body,' was already extant, ere the 'passive conception' took place: were they connected with or without the fault? If with the fault, then you have original sin; if without, then it would follow that the flesh, the body, the nature, before the passive conception, had been already delivered from the bondage of corruption. In short, if original sin came from the 'active conception,' then Mary must have had it; if it come from the 'passive conception,' then God is its direct author in every individual case. This dogma of the immaculate conception, then, contains contradictory elements; it rests on a false view of original sin. Even that false view, when not well recognized, gives rise to the theory that souls are directly created, and here again it involves itself in inextricable difficulties in relation to original sin. It is opposed to Scripture, to tradition, and in itself is self-contradictory.

In conclusion, there is left to us only the present attitude of the Roman pontifil, who, since his declaration of infallibility, more than ever, is forced into a position which puts the matter of papal infallibility in a disagreeable dilemma and dualism. 'The decree of Pius IX is in opposition to the express declarations of preceding councils,' the 'body,' the 'flesh,' were already present; infallibility is inconsistent with infallibility. Not only has 'probable opinion become improbable,' but Peter's chair is divided against itself; and how, then, can that kingdom stand? The Jansenist Launoy, in his 'Prescriptions,' has collected the opinions adverse to, or irreconcilable with the above, of several of the successors of St. Peter, who never change. From pope Leo (440-461), the greatest and most learned of the early bishops of Rome, he cites four passages in which Leo declares that Christ alone 'was innocent in his birth,' alone was 'free from original sin,' and that Christ received from his mother 'her nature, but not her fault;' and he asserts that Mary obtained 'her own purification through her conception of Christ.' This is wholly averse to the dogma. Innocent III, who called the Lateran Council in 1213, in a sermon on the 'Assumption of Christ,' comparing Eve and Mary, writes: 'Ilia fuit sine culpa producta, sed in culpa produxit;' hæc autem fuit in culpœ produce, sed in culpa produxit.' Gregory says (590-604), 'John the Baptist was conceived without sin.' Christ alone was conceived without sin.' Innocent V (1276), in his Commentary on the Matter of Sentences: 'Non convenit tante Virginii ut diu moraret sibi in pecatâ,' and he adds that she was sanctified quickly after the animation (that is, of the body by the soul), although not in the very moment. This is directly against the dogma. John XXII or Benedict XII (c. 1340) says that Mary 'passed at first from a state of original sin to a state of grace.' Clement VI (1342-52), 'I suppose, according to the common opinion as yet, that the blessed Virgin was in original sin' modicum morui, 'because, from my side, according to my knowledge, I was sanctified as soon as she could be sanctified.'

"Thus the papacy, in committing itself to this new and idolatrous dogma, is in hostility to Scripture, to universal consent, and also to itself. It explains the sense of Scripture by tradition; and it explains the sense of tradition by an infallible expositor, and that infallible expositor contradicts itself. The new dogma makes the whole of the early Church to have been ignorant of a truth which is now declared to be necessary to the faith; it makes Leo, Innocent III, Innocent V, and the Roman pontiffs of all ages, who have taught by word and writing, scholastics and divines under the ban; and, while doing this, it declares that what is now decreed has always been of the faith of the Church, and that it is a part of the revelation of God, given through Christ and the apostles, and handed down by constant succession and general acceptance.'

Immaculate-Conception Oath is among the Roman Catholics the assurance by oath of a belief in and support of the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. It was introduced by the Sorbonne in consequence of the disputes on this subject between the Franciscans and Dominicans [see Immaculate Conception], as a test oath for those who had obtained an academic degree. The Jesuits made this a test oath also for other privileges.—Theol. Univ. Lex. i, 404. (J. H. W.)

Immanent Activity or God, the pantheistic tenet that God does not exist outside of the world, as a free personal (transcendental) being, but inside of it, as the highest unity of the world, because God cannot, according to it, be conceived of without the world. Saisset (Mod. Pantheism, ii, 91) thus sums it up: "He (God) creates the world within himself, and thenceforth there is no separation of the Creator and the creature, for the creature is a part of the Creator considered in his eternal and necessary action." See Pantheism.

Imman'oi'li (Heb. Immanu'el, יְמָנָעוֹל, sometimes separately יַמְנָאוֹל, God with us, as it is interpreted separately by עַמְנָאוֹל, God with us, as it is interpreted Matt. i, 23, where it is written Epyavov, as in the Sept., and Anglicized "Emmanuel;" the Sept. however, in Isa. viii, 8, translates it μετὰ σιγῆ νυκτός; Vulg. Eum'manuvel, a figurative name prescripted through the prophet for a child and a sign born, it is the speedy downfall of Syria (B.C. cir. 739: see 2 Kings xvi, 9) and violent interregnum of the kingdom of Israel (B.C. 737-728: see 2 Kings xx, 30; comp. xvii, 11), before the infant should become capable of distinguishing between wholesome and improper kinds of food. The name occurs only in the celebrated verse of Isaiah (vii, 14), "Behold a [rather the] virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel," and in another passage of the same prophet (Isa. viii. 8), where the child to be born is described as ere loqo to "all the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel, i. e. Juleas, with evident allusion to the former declaration. See AHAZ. In the name itself there is no difficulty; but the verse, as a whole, has been variously interpreted. From the manner in which the word God is used in the Hebrew Scriptures, and in consequence of the application of the whole verse, by the evangelist Matthew (i, 23), to our divine Saviour. Even if this reference did not exist, the history of the Nativity would irresistibly lead us to the conclusion that the verse—whatever may have been its intermediate signification—had an immediate reference to Christ. See ISAAC.

The state of opinion on this point has been thus concisely summed up by Dr. Henderson in his note on the text: "This verse has long been a subject of dispute between Jews and professedly Christian writers, and among the latter mutually. While the former reject its application to the Messiah, the Jewish expositors of the earlier Rabbins explaining it of the queen of Ahas and the birth of his son Hezekiah, and the later, as Kimchi and Abanbash, of the prophet's own wife—the great body of Christian interpreters have held it to be directly and exclusively a prophecy of our Saviour, and have considered themselves fully borne out by the inspired testimony of the evangelist Matthew. Others, however, have departed from this construction of the passage, and have invented or adopted various hypotheses in support of such dissent. Grofius, Faber, Lienbihl, Hein, Botan, Frusceba, Puschke, Gieseler, and Hitzig, suppose it to refer to the birth of the wife of Isaiah to be the 'wir.' almah [rendered 'virgin'], referred to.

Eichhorn, Paulus, Hengel, and Ammon are of opinion that the prophet had nothing more in view than an ideal virgin, and that both she and her son are merely imaginary personages, introduced for the purpose of prophetic illustration. Bauer, Cube, Steudel, and some others, think that the prophet pointed to a young woman in the presence of the king and his courtiers. A fourth class, among whom are Richard Simon, Lowth, Koppe, Dathe, Williams, Von Meyer, Olehausen, and Dr. J. Pye Smith, admit the hypothesis of a double sense (q. v.), on which the words apply primarily to the time of living in the temple, and only secondarily to her giving birth to a son according to the ordinary laws of nature; or, as Dathe holds, to some virgin, who at that time should miraculously conceive; and the other, in which they received a secondary and plenary fulfillment in the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus Christ." (See the monographs enumerated by Volbeiding, Index, p. 14; and Fürst, Bibl. Jud. ii, 60; also Hengstenberg, Christol. des A.T. ii, 69; and the commentators in general; compare the Stud. u. Kr. 1836, iii, 538.)

This last seems to us the only consistent interpretation. Thus the conjunctive and disjunctive clauses are here understood to mean: I shall be born and already spoken of is clear from the entire context and drift of the prophecy. It can be no other than the Mahur-shalal-hash-baz (q. v.), the offspring of the prophet's own marriage with the virgin prophets, who thus became an eminent type of the Messiah's mother (Isa. viii. 35, 36).

Immanuel, HEN-SALOMON ROMI, a Jewish philosopher, commentator, and poet, was born at Rome about 1265. Endowed with great natural ability, and with a fondness for study, he soon made himself master of Biblical and Talmudic, as well as of Grecoan and Latin literature. He was deeply versed in grammar, having been much given to a cultivation of the same art in which Dante immortalized his name, "the two spirits, kindred, and yet different in many respects, formed a mutual attachment." He died about 1380. Immanuel wrote commentaries on the whole Jewish Bible, excepting the Apocrypha and the New Testament, and he enriched not only by valuable grammatical and archaeological notes, but contain also some able remarks on the nature and spirit of the poetical books. "It is greatly to be regretted that of all his exegetical works, which are in different public libraries of Europe, the Commentary on the Song of Songs is the only ones as yet published, the former in Naples in 1486, and the latter in Parma in 1806. The introduction of his commentary on the Song of Songs has been published, with an English translation, by Ginsburg: "Historical and Critical Commentaries on the Hebrew Songs (Lond. 1857, p. 49-52)" (Ginsberg in Ktitt). He wrote also some philosophical treatises, and translated for his Jewish brethren the philosophical writings of Albertus the Great, Thomas Aquinas, and other celebrated philosophers. See Gritz, Gesch. der Juden, viii, 307 sq.; Geiger, Wissenschaftliche Zeitchrift, 1885, iv, 194 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. ii, 92 sq. (J. H. W.)

Immateriality is a quality of God and of the human soul. The immateriality of God denotes that he forms an absolute contrast to matter; he is simple, and has no parts, and so cannot be dissolved; matter, on the other hand, is made up of parts into which it can be resolved. God is immanent from the limits of space and time.

The immateriality of God is therefore the basis of the qualities of eternity, omnipresence, and unchangeableness. Thus the immateriality of the soul includes likewise simplicity as another of its qualities. This, of course, does not absolutely set it above the limitations of space and time, since the soul needs the body for a necessary organ of its life; nor does it set aside any further development, but it certainly includes indestructibility, and thus serves as a proof of immortality (q. v.).

Immateriality of the body is a doctrine assented to by Tertullian, Arnobius, and others, during the first three centuries. Near the close of the fourth, the immateriality of the soul was maintained by Augustine, Nemesius, and Mamertus Claudianus. See Guizot, History of Civilization, i, 894; Krauth, Vocab. of Philos. p. 245. See also IMMORTALITY OF GOD; SOUL, TRANSDUCTION OF.

Immediate Imputation of Sin. See IMPUATION.

Immortality of God is explained by Dr. J. Pye Smith (First Lines of Christ, Theol. p. 138) to be the absolute necessity of being, considered in relation to space. "There is with God no diffusion nor contraction, no extension nor retraction, no production, or growth, as belongs to limited natures. God is equally near to, and equally far from, every point of space and every atom of the universe. He is universally and immediately present, not as a body, but as a spirit: not by motion, or penetration, or filling, as would be predicated of a diffused fluid, or in any way as if the infinity of God were composed of a countless number of finite parts, but in a way peculiar to his own spiritual and perfect nature, and of which we can form no conception."

In the passages of Job xi. 7-9; 1 Kings viii. 27 (exc. v. 1); Ps. cxlv. 18; Isa. xxix. 13; Ezk. xxxii. 23, 24; Amos i. 2, 3; Matt. xvi. 4, 6; Acts xvii. 24, 27, 28; also Isa. xli. 12-15, 21, 22, 25, 26, "the representations are such as literally indicate a kind of diffused and filling subtle material; but this is the condescending manner of the Scriptures; and is evidently to be understood in the translation of the word, metaphysical or philosophical precision is not in the character of scriptural composition, nor would it ever suit the bulk of mankind; and no language or conceptions of men can reach the actual expression of the truth, or be any other than analogical. When the Scriptures speak of 'the immensity of his spirit' they mean his supremacy in all perfection, and his universal dominion."

Immutability and omnipresence, again, are distinguished in that "the former is absolute, being the necessary in-PERFECTION of the Deity in itself, as infinitely exalted above all conception of space; and that the latter is relative, arising out of the position of a created world. The moment that world commenced, or the first created portion of it, there was and ever remains the divine presence (aurorana, adaequatio). The essence and divinity are those of body, not of a pure, proper, highest spirit. Socinus and his immediate followers denied a proper ubiquity, immensity, or omnipresence to the essence or substance of the Deity, and represented the universal presence of God spoken of in Scripture as denoting only the acts and effects of his power, fame, and name. Dea Carne and his followers held "that the essence of the Deity is thought, and that it has no relation to space." See J. P. Smith, First Lines of Christian Theology, edited by W. Farrar (2d ed. Lond. 1861); Augustine, De Ciu. Dei, 20; Brentscheider, Dogmatik, i, 398 sq. See OMNIPRESENCE OF GOD.

IMMER (Heb. Immer, סנדא, talkative, or, according to First, high; Sept. Εὑρισκων), the name of several priests, mostly near the time of the Exile.

1. The head of the sixteenth sacerdotal division, according to David's appointment (1 Chron. xxiv, 14). B.C. 1014.

2. The father of Pashur, which latter so grossly misused the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xx, 1). B.C. ante 607.

By many the name is regarded here as put patronymically for the preceding.

3. One of whose descendants to the number of 1052 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii, 57; Neh. vii, 40). It is very possible the same with the father of Mushillemoth (Neh. xi, 13) or Meshillemoth (1 Chron. ix, 12), certain of whose descendants took a conspicuous part in the sacred duties at Jerusalem after the Exile; and probably the same with the one some of whose descendants divided their time between the instance of Ezra (Ezra x, 50). B.C. much ante 530. By some he is identified with the two preceding.

4. One who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon, but was unable to prove his Israelitish descent (Ezra ii, 59; Neh. vii, 61). B.C. 536. It does not clearly appear, however, that he claimed to belong to the priestly order, and it is possible that the name is only given as that of a place in the Babylonian dominions from which some of those named in the following verses came.

5. The father of Zadok, which latter repaired part of the walls of Jerusalem opposite his house (Neh. iii, 29). B.C. 536. He was, perhaps, the same as No. 8.

IMMERSION, the act of plunging into water, especially the person of the candidate in Christian baptism, as performed by the Baptist, (q. v.) denomination, and occasionally by others. There are two controversies that require to be noticed under this head.

1. Is this mode or act essential to the validity of the ordinance itself? The affirmative of this question is maintained by those denominationally styled "Baptists," and is denied by nearly all other classes of Christians. For the arguments on both sides, see the article Baptism.

II. Are the terms "immerse," "immersion," etc. preferable or more correct in a version of the Scriptures, than "baptize," "baptism," etc.? The affirmative of this question is taken by many, but not by all Baptists, and it is approved, to some extent at least, by certain scholars in most other denominations, while the negative is held by the vast majority of Bible readers. The change was actually made by Dr. Campbell in his work on the Gospels, and recently a systematic effort has been made on a large scale to give currency to the alteration by the translations put forth under the auspices of the American (Baptist) Bible Union. See Buell, Socinianus. The arguments for this rendering are set forth in all their strength by Dr. Conant, in a note to his translation of Matthew, at ii, 6, as follows (to each of which we subjoin the counter arguments):

"1. This word expressed a particular act, viz. immerse in a fluid or any yielding substance. See the Appendix to this volume, sections i-iii." The Appendix thus refers to is Dr. Conant's treatise On the Meaning and Use of Baptism, etc. The proofs there given, however, do not seem to sustain this precise point; the passages cited do indeed show that Baptizō means to submerge or immerse a body or thing in a fluid, but do not indicate any uniform method, such as dipping, plunging; nor do they necessarily imply motion on the part of the subject into the fluid, as "immersion" clearly does.

"2. The word had no other meaning; it expressed this act, either literally or in a metaphorical sense, through the frequent use in Greek literature. Append. sect. iii." This assertion is palpably refuted by the fact that Dr. Conant himself, in but a part of these very quotations here appealed to, has ventured to render ἄτομον by "immerse;" for he is very frequently constrained to translate it "immerge," "submerge," "dip," "plunge," "imbathe," "wet," etc. These words, it is true, have the same general signification; but, supposing that they were in every case suitable renderings (which in many cases they are not), yet they do not establish the identical point in dispute, namely, the exclusive translation by "immerse," etc., as if "the word had no other meaning."

"3. Its grammatical construction with other words, and the circumstances connected with its use, accord entirely with this meaning, and exclude every other. Append. sect. iii." On the contrary, the prepositions and cases by which it is followed, being generally in, with the subject very precisely the same as the comparator of the comparison; insomuch that in even the comparatively few instances where "immerse" can be given as a rendering at all, it is scarcely allowable except by the ambiguity "immersed in," which in English is used for "immersed into."

In the Greek language, as every scholar knows, no such word as "immers in water," etc., is used. "iv. In the age of Christ and his apostles, as in all periods of the language, it was in common use to express the most familiar acts and occurrences of everyday life: as, for example, immersing an axe in water, to harden it; wool longdy, to color it; sail submerged, to drown it; a ship submerged in the waves; rocks immersed in the tide; and (metaphorically) immersed in cares, in sorrow, in ignorance, in poverty, in debt, in stupor and sleep, etc. Append. sect. iii." Rather these examples should be rendered, an axe tempered by cold water, etc., or, perhaps, the same as No. 8. The familiarity of the word is another matter, belonging to the next argument.

"v. There was nothing sacred in the word itself, or in the act which it expressed. The idea of sacredness belonged solely to the relation in which the act was performed. Append. sect. iv, 7." This fact is no good reason why, when it is manifestly employed in such sacred relations, it should not be rendered by a term appropriate to such a sacredness. This argument applies only to those passages in which the word occurs in a secular sense; about these there is no dispute.

"vi. In none of these respects does the word baptize, as used by English writers, correspond with the original Greek word. This has already been met in substance above. The remainder of the arguments, with one exception, need not be reproduced, as they are of a doctrinal nature, and the novelty of a word is a method of reasoning inconclusive, if not altogether worthless in a philological question.

"ix. In rendering the Greek word by immerse, I follow the example of the leading vernacular versions, made from the Greek, in the languages of Continental Europe and America, and of the Bible of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the use of the learned. Facts, however, do not support this claim with any uniformity. The modern versions, of course, render according to the theological leanings of their authors, and, were they unanimous, they could not be permitted to decide a question of this kind by authority. The best and oldest guides, the early Latins, foolishly transfer the term baptism, giving it a regular terminology like other native verbs; they rarely, if ever, render by "immergo," "immerso," etc., but usually give "tingo," or at most, "mergeo." See Dale, Classic Baptism (Phila., 1867.), which thoroughly reviews the instances of the use of \( \text{baptiz\ae} \) in a subsequent volume (Phila., 1870). Dr. Dale meets the whole controversy in question, and proves conclusively the incorrectness of translating \( \text{baptiz\ae} \) by "immerse."

There are other positive arguments against the substitution of "immerse" as an equivalent to \( \text{baptiz\ae} \): 1. The word is no more English than "baptize;" one is of the "Good News" and the other is of Saxon origin. Yet both are perfectly intelligible, and it is pretty certain that, but for the advantage which "immerse" gives to one party in polemics, it would never have been thought worth while to make the exchange.

2. "Immerse," as a compound word, does not correspond etymologically with the Greek. There is nothing answering to the "im" in \( \text{baptiz\ae} \); it should have been \( \iota \mu \beta \alpha \pi \zeta \zeta \iota \zeta \) (which seldom occurs), or, rather, \( \iota \omega \beta \alpha \pi \zeta \zeta \zeta \zeta \) (which is never used at all, obviously on account of the incongruity between the native force of the word and the accentual inflections applied in \( \gamma \).)

3. The outrageous awkwardness of such phrases as "will immerse you in holy spirit and fire" (sic Conant), rendered necessary by this change, is a sufficient critical objection to the proposed rendering, were there no other argument against it. A theory that breaks down in this particular and the others may be dismissed, if not without hope, as only a summary rejection. 4. These translators are consistent with themselves in rejecting the expression "John the Baptist," calling him instead "John the Immerser." But they ought to go one step further, and themselves abjure the title of "Baptist," which they pre-empt, and adopt a title more appropriately \( \text{the Immersionists}. \)

It is highly creditable that the mass of that large denomination are not disposed to be drawn into this specious innovation.

Immolation (Lat. \( \text{immolatio} \)) is the name of a ceremony performed in the sacrifices of the Romans. It consisted in throwing some sort of corn or frankincense, together with the mola or salt cake, and a little wine, on the head of the victim. See Brande and Cox, Dict. of Science, Lit., and Art, ii, 197. See SACRIFICE (J. H. W.)

Immorality. See Morals.

Immortality is the perpetuity of existence after it has once begun (Lat. \( \text{immortalitas}, \) not dying). "If a man die, shall he live again?" is a question which has naturally agitated the heart and stimulated the intellectual curiosity of man, wherever he has risen above a state of barbarism, and commenced to exercise his intellect at all. Without such a belief, Max Muller (Chips from a German Workshop, i, 45) well says, "religion surely is like an arch resting on one pillar, like a bridge ending in an abys." It is very gratifying, therefore, to the believer, and a fatal misfortune to the adherents of that affirmative on this question is assumed more or less by all the nations of earth, so far as our information reaches at the present day, although, it is true, their views often assume very vague and even materialistic forms.

1. Ideas of rude Nations.—We concede that the views of most rude heathen nations, both ancient and modern, respecting the state of man after death are indeed dark and obscure, as well as their notions respecting the nature of the soul itself, which some of them regard as a kind of aerial substance, resembling the body, though of a flimsy material. Still it is found that the greatest part of mankind, even of those who are entirely uncultivated, though they may be incapable of the higher philosophical idea of the personal immortality of the soul, are yet inclined to believe at least that the soul survives the body, and continues either forever, or at least for a very long time. This faith seems to rest in uncultivated nations, better perhaps, races, 1, upon the love of life, which is deeply imprinted on the breast, and leads to the wish and hope that life will be continued even beyond the grave; 2, upon traditions transmitted from their ancestors; 3, upon dreams, in which the dead appear speaking or acting, and thus confirm both wishes and traditions. See NEMRODANCY. (J. R. H.)

It is a strange fact that in the Brahminical religion, as well as in the Veda, "immortality of the soul, as well as personal immortality and personal responsibility after death, is clearly proclaimed" (Muller, Chips, i, 45). We have here a refutation of the opinion that has hitherto been entertained, that the goal of Hinduism is absorption (q. v.), in which all the attributes of the individual existence, and that the Hindus as well as Brah- manes believe in the trasmigration (q. v.) of the soul, and a refutation by a writer who is most competent to speak. Professor Roth, another great Sanscrit scholar, in an article in the Journal of the German Oriental Society (iv, 427), corroborates Prof. Muller in these words: "We here [in the Veda] find, not without astonishment, beautiful conceptions on immortality expressed in unadorned language with childlike conviction. If it were necessary, we might find here the most powerful weapons against the destruction of the individuality which has lately been so energetically proclaimed as new, that Pericles was the only birthplace of the idea of immortality, and that even the nations of Europe had derived it from that quarter. As if the religious spirit of every gifted race was not able [which Muller (ii, 267) holds] to arrive at it by its own strength, and that the idea of immortality is given alms goes to the highest place in heaven; he goes to the gods" (Rv. i, 125, 56). "Even the idea, so frequent in the later literature of the Brahmanes, that immortality is secured by a son, seems implied, unless our translation deceives us, in one passage of the Veda (vi, 64, 23). 10 Maruts, may there be to us a strong son, who is a living ruler of men; through whom we may cross the waters on our way to the happy abode; then may we come to your own house!" One poet prays that he may see again his father and mother after death (Rv. ii, 24, 1); and the fathers are invoked almost like gods, to be offered to them, and are among the things believed to enjoy, in company with the gods, a life of never-ending felicity (Rv. x, 15, 16). We find this prayer addressed to Soma (Rv. ix, 115, 7): "Where there is eternal light, in the world where the sun is placed, in that immortable, imperishable world place me, O-Soma! Where king Vaitars is residing, where the secret of heaven is, where these mighty waters are, there make me immortal! Where life is free, in the third heaven of heavens, where the worlds are radiant, there make me immortal! Where wishes and desires are, where the bower of the bright Soma is, where there is food and rejoicing, there make me immortal! Where there is happiness and delight, where joy and pleasure reside, where the desires of our desire are attained, there make me immortal!"

2. Chinese.—While it is true that Confucius himself not expressly teach the immortality of the soul, say, that he rather purposely seems to have avoided entering upon this subject at all, taking it most probably like Moses, as we shall see below, simply for granted (comp. Muller, Chips, i, 308), it is nevertheless implied in the worship which the Chinese pay to their ancestors. It seems to us to be founded upon the absence of the word death from the writings of Confucius (q. v.). When a person dies, the Chinese say "he has returned to his family." The spirits of the good were, according to him (Confucius), permitted to visit their ancient habitations on earth, or such ancestral halls or places as were appointed by the ancestors, to receive homage and confer benefactions. Hence the duty of performing rites in such places, under the penalty, in the case of those who, while living, neglect such duty, of their spiritual part being deprived after death of the supreme bliss flowing from the homage of de ascendants" (Legge, Life and Teachings of Confucius, Philadelphia, 1867, 122mo).

3. Egyptians.—Perhaps we may say that the idea of immortality assumed a more definite shape among the Egyptians, for they clearly recognized not only a dwelling-place of the dead, but also a future judgment. "Osiris, the beneficent god, judges the dead, and, 'hav- ing observed the scales of justice, he sends the wicked to regions of darkness, while the just are sent to dwell with the god of light.' The latter, we read on an inscription, 'found favor before the great God; they dwell in glory, where they live a heavenly life; the bones of the dead will forever lie in their tombs, while they rejoice in the life of the supreme God.' Immortality was thus plainly taught, although bound up with it was the idea of the preservation of the body, to which they attached great importance, as a condition of the soul's continued life; and hence they built vast tombs, and embalmed their bodies, as if to last forever."

4. Persians.—In the religion of the Persians, also, at least since, if not previous to the time of Zoroaster, a prominent part is assigned to the existence of a future world, with its governing spirits. "Under Ormuz and Ahriman, its roots down to their habitation, of spirits engaged in a perpetual conflict; and the soul passes into the kingdom of light or of darkness, over which these spirits respectively preside, according as it has lived on the earth well or ill. Whoever has lived in purity, and has not suffered the dire (evil) spirits to have any power over him, will, when he dies, ascend, and receive his share in the light.""\n
5. American Indians.—The native tribes of the lower part of South America believe in two great powers of good and evil, but likewise in a number of inferior deities. These are supposed to have been the creators and ancestors of the different families, and hence, when an In- dian dies, his soul goes to live with the deity who presides over his particular family. These deities have each their separate habitations in vast caverns under the earth, and thither the departed repair to enjoy the happiness of being eternally drunk (compare Tyler, Researches into the early History of Mankind, and the De- velopment of Civilization, Lond, 1868). Another American tribe of Indians, the Mandan's, have with their belief in a future state connected this tradition of their origin: "The whole nation resided in one large village under ground near a subterranean lake. A grape-vine extended its roots down to their habitation, and gave them a view of the light. Some of the most adventurous climbed up the vine, and were delighted with the sight of the earth, which they found covered with buff-falo, and rich with every kind of fruit. Returning with the grapes they had gathered, their countrymen were so pleased with the taste of them that the whole nation resolved to leave their dull residence for the charms of the upper region. Men, women, and children ascended by means of the vine; but when about half the nation had reached the surface of the earth, a corpulent woman who was clambering up the vine broke it with her weight, and closed upon herself and the rest of the na- tion the light of the sun. Those who were left on earth expect, when they die, to return to the original seats of their forefathers, the good reaching the ancient village by means of the lake, which the burden of the souls of the different families, and hence, when an In- dian dies, his soul goes to live with the deity who pre- sides over his particular family. These deities have each their separate habitations in vast caverns under the earth, and thither the departed repair to enjoy the happiness of being eternally drunk (compare Tyler, Re- searches into the early History of Mankind, and the De- velopment of Civilization, Lond, 1868). Another Ameri- can tribe of Indians, the Mandan's, have with their belief in a future state connected this tradition of their origin: "The whole nation resided in one large village under ground near a subterranean lake. 6. Polyneissians.—The natives of Polyneissia "imagine that the sky descends at the horizon and incloses the earth. Hence they call foreigners 'palangi' or 'heav- en-bursters,' as having broken in from another world outside. According to their views, we live upon the ground floor of a great house, with upper stories rising one over another above us, and cellars down below. If we are here and the other parts of the house are above, and as men are supposed to visit the dwellers above, the dwellers from below are believed to come sometimes up to the surface, and likewise to receive visits from men in return."

7. New Hollanders.—The native tribes of Australia believe that all who are good men, and have been properly buried, enter heeren after death. "Heaven, which is the abode of the two good divinities, is represented as a delightful place, where there is abundance of game and food, never any excess of heat or cold, rain or of sleep, no malady, no sickness, death, nor plenty of rolling, singing, and dancing for evermore. They also believe in an evil spirit who dwells in the nethermost regions, and, strange to say, they represent him with horns and a tail, though one would think that, prior to the introduction of cattle into New Holland, the cow and the horse had never been seen."

8. New Zealanders.—"The Greenlander believes that when a man dies his soul travels to Torgnarsuk, the land where reigns perpetual summer, all sunshine, and no night; where there is good water, and birds, fish, seals, good game, with water and land, and to be free from care, trouble, or are found cooking alive in a huge kettle. But the journey to this land is difficult; the souls have to slide five days or more down a precipice, all stained with the blood of those who have gone down before. And it is especially grievous to the poor souls that the journey must be made in winter or in tempest, for then a soul may come to harm, or suffer the other death, as they call it, when it perishes utterly, and nothing is left. The bridge Ka-Sisat, which stretches over the midst of the Mosten hill, finer than a hair, and sharper than the edge of a sword, conveys a similar sensation." Tyler, on whose works we mainly rely for the information here conveyed on rude nations, traces the idea of a bridge in Java, in North America, in South America, and he also shows how in Polyneissia the bridge is re- placed by canoes, in which the dead were to pass the other world. And it is noteworthy that the Jews, when they first established a firm belief in immortality, im- agined a bridge of hell, which all unbelievers were to pass.

II. Ideas of more cultivated Nations.—Wherever pagan thought and paganism prevail at the highest perfection, we find their ideas of the immortality of the soul gradually approaching the Christian views. The first trace of a belief in a future existence we find in Homer's Iliad (xxiii, 103 sq.), where he represents that Achilles first became convinced that souls and shadow forms have a real existence in the kingdom of the shades (Hades) by the appearance to him of the dead Patroclus in a dream. These visions were often regarded as divine by the Greeks (comp. II, i, 68, and the case of the rich man and Lazarus in Luke xvi, 27). Compare also the article Hades. But, while in the early thought of the Greeks preeminently the idea of Hades was melancholic, Hades, or the realms of the dead, being to their imagination the emblem of gloom, as may be seen from the following: "Achilles, the ideal hero, declares that he would rather till the ground than live in pale Elysium," we find that, with the progress of Hellenic thought, a higher idea of the future is found to charac-terize both the poetry and philosophy of Greece, till, in the Platonic Socrates, the conception of immortality shines forth with a clearness and precision truly impressive. "For we must remember, O men," said Socrates, in his last speech, before he drank the poison cup, "that it depends upon the immortality of the soul whether we have to live to it and to care for it or not. For the danger seems fearful they do not care for it at all. To speak, he pointed out that care for it is not the mere possession, the possession, but the care that can happen to the unbeliever be that he be right, and the worst that can happen to the believer be that he be wrong, who in his madness would dare to run the venture? Yea, were death to be the end of all, it would be a truly a fortunate thing for the wicked to get rid of their beauty. "The soul, the immortal part, being of a nature so superior to the body, can it," he asks in the Phaedo, "as soon as it is separated from the body, be dispersed into nothing, and perish? Oh, far otherwise. Rather will this be the result. If it take its departure in a state of purity, not carrying with it any clinging impurities of the body, impurities which already are not unwillingly shared in, but always avoided, gathering itself into itself, and making the separation from the body its aim and study—that is, devoting itself to true philosophy, and studying how to die calmly: for this is the highest, not? And indeed, so prepared, the soul departs into that invisible region which is of its own nature, the region of the divine, the immortal, the wise, and then its lot is to be happy in a state in which it is freed from fears and wild desires, and the other evils of humanity, and spends the rest of its existence in the worship of the gods." This would be a better doctrine of the immortality of the soul, held by Socrates and his disciple Plato, implied a double immortality, the past eternity as well as that to come. They certainly offer a very striking contrast to the popular superstitions and philosophy of their day, which in many respects are not much held by the Socratic party. The people, especially those who held the most enlarged views up to this time, had "entertained what might be termed a doctrine of semi-immortality. They looked for a continuance of the soul in an endless futurity, but gave themselves no concern about the eternity which is past. But Plato considered the soul, not only as actually but also as eternally existing, the present life being only a moment in our career; he looked forward with an undoubting faith to the changes through which we must hereafter go" (Draper, Intel. Development of Europe, p. 118; compare his Chap. 11, Plato, Arg. 6).

III. Ideas of the Jewish Nation.—1. It has frequently been asserted that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is not taught in the O.T. The Socinians in the 16th and 17th centuries took this ground. Some have gone so far as to construe the supposed silence of the O.T. Scriptures on this subject into a formal denial of the possibility of a future life, and have furthermore fortified their positions by selecting some passages of the Old Testament that are rather obscure, e. g. Eccles. iii, 19 sq.; Isa. xxxviii, 18; Psa. vii, 6; xx, 10; lxvi, 11; cvx, 17; Job vii, 7-10; xiv, 22-26; xiv, 7-12; xiv, 22. In the most obvious manner were these objections raised by the "Wolffensbütten Fragmente" (see the fourth fragment by Lessing, Beiträge z. Gesch. u. Lit. a. d. Wolffensbüttenischen Bibliothek, iv, 484 sq.). Bishop Warburton, on the other hand, derived one of his main proofs of the immortality of the soul from this supposed silence on the subject of immortality. He argued, "being sustained in his legislation and government by immediate divine authority, had not the same necessity that other teachers have for a recourse to threatenings and punishments drawn from the future world, in order to enforce obedience." In a similar strain argues professor Ernst Stübelin in an article on "The immortality of the soul (in the Foundations of our Faith, Loud, and N. York, 1866, 12mo, p. 224 sq.): "Moses and Confucius did not express the teaching of the immortality of the soul, they seemed purposely to avoid entering upon the subject; they simply took it for granted. Thus Moses spoke of the tree of life in Paradise, of which if the man took he should live forever, and called God the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, thus implying their continued existence, since God could not be a God of the dead, but only of the living; and Confucius, while in some respects avoiding all mention of future things, nevertheless enjoined honors to be paid to departed spirits (thus assuming their future existence). But in the case of the chief duties of a religious man." Another evidence of the belief of the Jews at the time of Moses and in subsequent periods in the immortality of the soul, as a doctrine self-evident, and by them universally acknowledged and received, is the fact that the Israelites and their Pseudo-reasons for the belief. But in the case of the chief duties of a religious man. Another evidence of the belief of the Jews at the time of Moses and in subsequent periods in the immortality of the soul, as a doctrine self-evident, and by them universally acknowledged and received, is the fact that the Israelites and their ancestors were taught the doctrine in the city of the Levites, among whom the laws were read and explained. This doctrine is frequently found in Moses as well as in subsequent writings of the O.T. That Moses did not in his laws hold up the punishments of the future world to the terror of transgressors is a circumstance which redounds to his praise, and cannot be alleged against him as a matter of reproach, since to other legislators the charge has been laid that they were either deluded or impostors for pursuing the very opposite course. Another reason why Moses did not touch the question of the immortality of the soul is that he did not intend to give a system of theology in his laws. But so much is clear from certain passages in his writings, that he was by no means ignorant of this doctrine. Compare Michaelis, Argументa pro Immortalitate Animi e Mose Collecta, in the Syntagma, Comment. i (Gottingen, 1759); Luderwald, Unters. von d. Kennniss eines künstigen Lebens i. u. T. Test. (Helmstedt, 1781); Semler, Beiträge d. Fragen d. Wolfsbüttenischen Umgang. Biel, Obers. des psychologischen Erzeugens (Erlangen, 1779).

"The following texts from the writings of Moses may be regarded as indications of the doctrine of immortality, viz. Gen. v, 22, 24, where it is said respecting Enoch, that because he lived a pious life God took him, so that he was no more among men. This was designed to be the reward and consequence of his pious life, and it points to an invisible life with God, to which he attained without previously suffering death. Gen. xxvii, 35, Jacob says, 'I will go down to the grave' (ךלמה ותא) unto my son. We have here distinctly exhibited the idea of a place where the dead dwell connected together in a society. In conformity with this idea we must explain the phrase to go to his fathers (Gen. xv, 15), or to be gathered to his people (more literally, to enter into their habitation or abode) (Gen. xxv, 8; xxxv, 29; Numb. xx, 24, etc.). In the same way many of the Indian savages (as we have already seen) express their expectation of an immortality beyond the grave. Paul argues from the text Gen. xvi, 5, and similar passages where Jesus speaks of the resurrection, that we may expect a life after death (Heb. xi, 13-16; yet he says, very truly, πωροθον ἐκδοσις τῆς ζητηγέλας). In Matt. xxii, 23, Christ refers, in arguing against the Sadducees, to Exod. iii, 6, where Jehovah calls himself the God of Isaac and Jacob (i. e. their protector and the object of their worship), but not the God of the dead, and could not be that their ashes and their dust should worship God; hence he concludes that they themselves could not have ceased to exist, but that, as to their souls, they still lived (comp. Heb. xi, 13-17). This passage was in-interpreted in the same way by the Jews after Christ (Westein, ad loc.). In the subsequent books of the O. T. the texts of this nature are far more numerous. Still more definite descriptions are given of רָבָּה (ra'ah), and the condition of the departed there; e.g. Isa. xiv, 9 sq.; also in the Psalms and in Job. Even in these texts, however, the doctrine of the reward of the righteous and the punishment of the wicked in the kingdom of the dead was not so clearly developed as it is in the N. T.; this is true even of the book of Job. All that we find here with respect to this point is only obscure intimation, so that the Pauline πνευματική διάταξις is applicable, in relation to this doctrine, to the other books of the Old Testament also. As to those of the Psalms and the Psalms there are some plain allusions to the expectation of reward and punishment after death, particularly Psa. xvii, 15; xlix, 15; lxii, 23. There are some passages in the prophets where a reification of the dead is spoken of, as Isa. xxvi, 19; Dan. xii, 1, 2; Ezek. xxxvii; but, although these do not teach a literal resurrection of the dead, but rather refer to the restoration of the nation and land, still these and all such figurative representations presuppose the proper idea that an invisible part of man survives the body, and will be hereafter raised. Very clearly also is the language of the New Testament (Phil. iii, 20; Col. iii, 1; 1 Thess. iv, 2; 1 Cor. xv, 52). The body must return to the earth from whence it was taken, but the spirit to God who gave it, evidently alluding to Gen. iii, 19. See SHEOL.

From all this we draw the conclusion that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul was not unknown to the Jews before the Babylonian exile. It appears also from the fact that a general expectation existed of rewards and punishments in the future world, although in comparison with what was afterwards taught on this point there was at that time very little definitely known respecting it, and the doctrine, therefore, stood, by no means in that near relation to religion and morality into which it was afterwards brought, as is often the case in other wholly uncultivated nations. Hence this doctrine is not so often used by the prophets as a motive to righteousness, or to deter men from evil, or to console them in the midst of suffering. But on this very account the pietv of these ancient saints observes the more regard and admiration. It was in a high degree unpretending and disinterested. Although the prospect of what lies beyond the grave was, as Paul said, the promised blessing which they saw only from afar, yet they had pious dispositions, and trusted God. They held merely to the general promise, that God will keep watch over them. That God will cause it to be well with them even after death (Psa. lxxiii, 25, 28, "When my strength and my heart faileth, God will be the strength of my heart, and my portion forever"). But it was not until after the Babylonian captivity that the ideas of the Jews on this subject appear to have become enlarged, and that this doctrine was brought by the prophets, under the divine guidance, into a more immediate connection with religion. This result becomes very apparent after the reign of the Grecian kings over Syria and Egypt, and their persecutions of the Jews. The prophets and teachers living at that time (according to the writings, however, this comes down to us) must therefore have given to their nation, time after time, more instruction upon this subject, and must have explained and unfolded the allusions to it in the earlier prophets. Thus we find that after this time, more frequently than before, the Jews sought and found in the sacred writings their immortality, their retribution, consolation, and encouragement under their trials, and a motive to piety. Such discourses were therefore frequently put in the mouths of the martyrs in the second book of Maccabees, e.g. vi, 26; vii, 9 sq.; comp. xii, 48-49; see also the Book of Wisdom, i, 1 sq.; and especially iii, 1 sq. and the other apocryphal books of the O. T. At the time of Christ, and afterwards, it was universally received and taught by the Pharisees, and in this, was, indeed, the prevailing belief among the Jews, as is well known from the testimony of the N. T., of Jospeh, and also of Philo. Tacitus also refers to it in his history, "Animas praedix aut supplicia peremptorum aeternas putant." Consult an essay comparing the ideas of the apocryphal books of the O. T. on the subjects of immortality, resurrection, judgment, and retribution, with those of the N. T., written by Friche, in Eichhorn's Bibliothek der Schriften, vol. ii. See also W. Abhandl. pt. ii. No. 4; Flugle, Geschichte des Glaubens an Unsterblichkeit, etc. p. 1. The Sadducees, boasting of a great attachment to the O. T., and especially to the books of the Moses, were the only Jews who denied this doctrine, as well as the existence of a "gathering distinct from the body" (Knaup, Theology, § exilis). See Johanness, Vet. Heb. notions de rebus post mortem, Hafn. 1826. See RESURRECTION.

2. Among the modern Jews, the late celebrated Jewish savant and successor to Reiman at the Sorbonne, professor Munk, regarded as one of the strongholds of the O. T. affords a doctrine for a profession of the immortality of the soul the expression "He was gathered to his people," so frequent in the writings of the O. T. The Rev. D. W. Marks, in a series of Sermons (Lond. 1861), p. 109 sq., says of it: "It has generally been supposed that when it is said, 'He was gathered to his people,' it is a metaphor which the sacred historian employs in order to convey the idea that the person to whom it is applied lies buried in the place where the remains of the same family are deposited. But whoever attentively considers all the passages of the Bible where this expression occurs will find Dr. Munk, that the last word of a man's life is to one's ancestors is expressly distinguished from the rite of sepulture. Abraham is 'gathered unto his people,' but he is buried in the cave which he bought near Hebron, and where Sarah alone is interred. This is the first instance where the expression is 'to be gathered to one's people' is to be met with; and that it is evident that Abraham's bones reposed in the same cave with those of his fathers is very clear, since the ancestors of the patriarch were buried in Chaldea, and not in Canaan. The death of Jacob is related in the following words: "And when Jacob had finished charging his sons, he gathered up his feet upon the bed, and he expired, and was gathered unto his people." (Gen. xlvi, 30). It is equally certain that the phrase 'he was gathered unto his people' cannot refer to the burial of the patriarch, because we learn from the next chapter that he was embalmed, and that the Egyptians kept him seventy years; and it is only after these three score and ten days of mourning are ended that Joseph transports the remains of his father to Canaan, and inter them in the cave of Machpelah, where the ashes of Abraham and Isaac repose. What the inspired penman alludes to the actual land of Canaan, Joseph uses very different terms. He makes no mention then of the patriarch 'being gathered to his people,' but he simply employs the verb גלך, 'to bury.' And Joseph went up to bury his father. 'The very words addressed by Jacob on his deathbed to his sons, I am about to be gathered unto my people; bury me with my fathers, afford us sufficient evidence that the speaker, as well as the persons addressed, understood the expression 'being gathered to one's people' in a sense totally different from that of being lodged within a tomb. But a stronger instance still may be advanced. The Israelites arrive at Mount Hor, near the borders of Edom, and immediately is issued the divine command, 'And Aaron shall be gathered unto his people; for he shall not come into the land which I have given to the children of Israel . . . Strip Aaron of his garments, and clothe in them Eleazar his son. And Aaron shall be gathered, and he shall die.' No member of his family shall be buried on Mount Hor; and still Aaron is said to have been there buried, 'unto his people.' Again, Moses is charged to chastise severely the Midianites for having seduced the Israelites to follow the abominable practices of מזֶּבֶּחַ (Beal Peor); and, this act accomplished, the legislator is told "that he will be gathered unto his people." This passage occur-tainly cannot mean that Moses was to be gathered in the grave with any of his people. The Hebrew law giver died on Mount Abarim; and the Scripture testi-ifies 'that no one ever knew of the place of his sepulchre;' and still the term to be gathered to his people in there likewise employed. Sufficent instances have now been cited to prove that מָּשָּׁה נַעֲלֵי is to be understood in a different sense from the rise of sepulchres, and in the Hebrews' idea Moses did entertain the belief in another state of existence, where spirit joined spirit after the death of the body.

"But, although the position here assumed seems very tenable, it is nevertheless true that the Israelites certainly did not have a very clear conception of the future existence of the soul, and that life and immortality were not brought to light very distinctly before Christ came, for whom the office was reserved of making clearly known many high matters before but obscurely indicated" (Journal of Sacred Literature, viii, 179).

IV. Neo-Testament Views.—When Jesus Christ appeared in this world, the Epicurean philosophy (q. v.), the fables of poets of a lower world, and the corruption which was prevalent among the nations had fully destroyed the hope, to say nothing of a belief, in future existence. It was left for him to declare the existence of eternal life, and the immortality of the soul, and to abolish the doctrine of the unchangeable state of the human soul (Matt. x. 28; Mark xii, 18 sq.; Luke xx. 28 sq.). Jesus Christ, said Paul, "hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim. i, 10), and "will render to every man according to his deeds. To them that by patience, and joy in tribulation, have power for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life" (Rom. ii, 6 sq.). The original for eternal life here used (αἰ ματονία) denotes nothing else than the immortality of the soul, or a continuation of the substantial being, of man's person, of the ego, after death, by the destruction of the body (comp. Matt. x. 28; Luke xii. 4). See the article ETERNAL LIFE; and on the origin of the soul, and its pre-existence to the body, the article SOUL.

It is evident from the passages cited that Christ and his apostles did more to illustrate and confirm the belief in the immortality of the soul, as cherished at the pres-et day, than by being developed by any nation, even the Jews included. "He first gave to it that high practical interest which it now possesses," and it is owing to Christianity that the doctrine of the soul's immortality has become a common and well-recognized truth—no more result of speculation, as are those of the heathen and Jewish philosophers, nor a product of priestly invention—but a light to the reason, and a guide to the conscience and conduct. "The aspirations of philosophy, and the materialistic conceptions of popular mythology, are found in the Gospel transmuted into a living, spiritual, and divine fact, and an authoritative influence, not only touching the present life, but governing and directing it."

V. Christian Views.—In the early Christian Church the views on the immortality of the soul were very varied. There were none that actually denied, far from it, the idea of immortality. But some of them, e. g. Justin, Tatian, and Theophilus, on various grounds, supposed that the soul, though mortal in itself, and at least indifferent in relation to mortality or immortality, either acquires immortality as a promised reward, by its union with the spirit and the right use of its liberty, or, in the opposite case, perishes with the body. They were led to this view partly because they laid so much stress on freedom, and because they thought that likeness to God was to be obtained only by this freedom; and partly, too, because they supposed (according to the trichotomic division of human nature) that the soul (ψυχή) receives the seeds of immortal life only by the union with the spirit (σωφροσύνη), as the higher and free life of reason." This view was also afterwards introduced into the Greek Church by Nicholas of Methone (compare Hagenbach, Doctrine, ii, 16).

"And, lastly, other philosophical hypotheses concerning the nature of the soul, it is clear, had less effect on the Church. But the apologetic writers have entertained the immortality of the soul a theological truth; but their chief leaders, Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus, were at issue on the question whether reason furnishes satisfactory proof of that doctrine... "As Anselm of Canterbury had inferred the existence of God himself from the idea of God, so Thomas Aquinas proved the immortality of the soul, in a similar manner, by an ontological argument: 'Intellectus apprehendit esse absolute et secundum omne tempus. Unde omne habens intellectum naturale deserit esse semper, naturale autem deseri-derium non potest esse innato. Omnis igitur existentia est substantialis incorruptibilis' (compare Engelhardt, Dogmengesch. ii, 125 sq.). On the other hand, Scotus, whose views were more nearly allied to those of the Nominalists, maintained: 'Non posses demonstrari, quod animal sit immortalis' (Com. in M. Sentent. bk. ii, dist.
17, qua. i; contra Osu. ad hanc quaest. 43, qua. 2, qua.
24, qua. 4, contra) on the contrary, asserted: 'Animam esse immortalen; auctoritate ostentatur et rationale' (De Nat. Ded. ii, 55).
Concerning the further attempts of Moneta of Cremona (13th century), William of Auvergne (bishop of Paris from 1228 to 1249), and Raimund Martini (Fugio Fide in Contr. p. 419), we will prove the immortality of the soul, compare Münchener, Dogmengeschichte, ed. by Von Collin, p. 92 sq. (Hagenbach). On the views since the Reformations, see SOUL, IMMORALITY OF.

VI. Philosophical Argument.—There are many writers, both in philosophy and theology, who deny that the immortality of the soul can be proved apart from revelation. E. Stähelin (Foundations of our Faith, p. 232) says: "We might take up a line of argument used by philosophy both in ancient and modern times—from Socrates down to Fichte—to prove the immortality of the inner being; an argument derived from the assertion that the soul, being a unity, is, as such, incapable of division, and that, therefore, when the body perishes, that a falling to pieces, or a dissolution, is conceivable." "But," he continues, "the abstruse nature of this meth-do leads us to renounce a line of argument from which. we freely confess, we expect little profitable result. For, after all, what absolute proof have we of this unity of the soul? Can we subject it to the microscope or the scalpel, as we can the visible and tangible? It must

But, for the present simply to indicate that the instinct and consciousness of immortality have nothing to fear from the most searching examination of the reasor, but from the abstruse nature of our confirmation of that proof than of contradiction in the profound thinking.
Further, that this instinct and consciousness do actually exist, and are traceable through all the stages and ramifications of the human race, . . . is confirmed to us by our opponents themselves . . . that there is in man something which is not in the body, and which we term immortality. "But according to our actual of a self-invented nobility, namely, the divinely-created nobility of his nature, the inherent breath of life, breathed into him by God, the relation to the Eternal, which secures to him eternity." (Watson (Institute, ii, 2) goes even further, and declares that nowhere else but in the Christian religion there is a "real and on its immortality, or "any facts or principles so obvious as to enable us confidently to infer it. All observation lies directly against the doctrine of man's immortality. He dies, and the probabilities of a future obvious at once; but, as they have nothing to sustain, their insufficiency is the less apparent; our belief continues, notwithstanding the falseness of the arguments on which many up to this time have been, and the very defects of the proof illustrate the strength of the conclusion, which remains firm in despite of them. That the immortality of the soul has been firmly believed in by men destitute of a written revelation will not be denied by fair-minded scholars. It probably would never have been generally adopted by the ingenious theologians on this subject, by the skeptics, by the theological view according to which the soul is a separate person, and by the philosophers who held that the soul is a substance distinct from the body, and that its immortality is a consequence of its being a substance.

The first attempt of a philosophical tenet on the doctrine of immortality is offered in Plato's Phaedo. On it the New Platonists have added many fanciful additions. All scientific attempts throughout the Middle Ages, and up to our own day, have been modified views, allied more or less to Platonism. In opposition to these, the French materialists of the 18th century attempted to destroy, or at least undermine, the doctrine of immortality. The materialist is the position of the Pantheists, headed by Spinoza. "These hold that the World-Soul, which, in their opinion, produces and fills the universe, also fills and rules man; nay, that it is only in him that it reaches its special end, which is self-consciousness, and attains to thought and will. It is true, this idea goes on to say, that at the death of the individual this World-Soul retreats from him, just as the setting sun seems to draw back its rays into itself; and that self-consciousness now sinks once more into the great, unconscious, undistinguished mass of the universe, of which the world is a part. This ridiculous position has been best given by M'Cosh (Intuitions of the Mind, p. 392 sq.): "We can conceive of air thus rushing into air, and of a bucketful of water losing itself in a river; and why? Because neither air nor water ever had a separate and conscious personality. The soul, as long as it exists, must retain its personality as an essential property, and must carry it along with it wherever it goes. The moral conviction clusters round this personal self. The being who is judged, who is saved or condemned, is the same who sinned and continued in his sin, or who believed and was justified when he first became a believer. Kant, Locke, and other metaphysicians, on the other hand, like some theologians, as we have seen above, also exclude the immortality of the soul from the province of natural theology. 'They deem it impossible to prove our future existence from the creation, or even from the admitted attributes of the Creator, and are thus in singular opposition to the ancient Platonists, who regarded the eternal continuance of our being as the more obvious doctrine of natural theology, and inferred from it the divine existence as the less direct indication of nature. It is said that much of the reasoning employed by pagan writers to prove the immortality of the soul is unsound. This is a fact, and yet by no means invalidates their right to believe in the conclusion which they deduced illogically. There are many truths, the proof of which lies so near to us that we overestimate their belief in immortality. Many are satisfied with the mere pretense of an argument for its support; and searching in the distance for proofs which can only be found in immediate contact with us, we discover reasons for the belief which, long before we had discovered them, was a part of our own minds; and yet we deem these reasons sufficient to uphold the doctrine, although, in point of fact, the doctrine does not make trial of their strength by resting upon them. If they were the props on which our belief was in reality founded, their weakness would be

1. From the capacity and desirability of the soul for knowledge, beyond what in this life it ever attains; 2. From the law of contraries, according to which the part that prepares for labor and the part that rests prepares for rest; as light ends in darkness, and darkness in light; so life, leading to death; death must, in turn, terminate in life; 3. From the reminiscences of a previous existence, which the soul brings with it into the present life; 4. From the simple and indivisible nature of the soul; only compound substances undergo dissolution; 5. From the essential vitality of the soul itself. He adds that although these arguments did not amount, in the estimation of Socrates, "to an absolute proof of the doctrine, he thought them sufficient not only to deprive death of all terror, but also to awaken in the mind of a good man, when approaching death, the calm and cheerful hope of a better life." These arguments, however, are far behind the present state of science. The second and third rest on purely imaginary foundations; the fourth and fifth are inconclusive; and the first only, we grant, has a certain authority. From the principles from which it is drawn, should not have awakened in the cautious mind of Butler a suspicion of their soundness, and led him to seek other means of establishing the truth in question. These he would have found, and, as we think, far better suited to his purpose, in the example of pagans and primitive Christians, who set forth in his chapters on the moral government of God, and on probation considered as a means of discipline and improvement. Indeed, we have always been of the opinion that these two chapters contain the only real and solid grounds for belief in a future life which the present writings of the immunitarians afford in the one particularly appropriated to that object serving at first only to answer objections to the doctrine."

Professor Chaucer found his own argument chiefly upon the gradual and progressive development of life in our planet, from the epoch of its earliest inhabitant down to the present hour, which development, taken in connection with the capacities and endowments of the soul, indicates, on the part of the Creator, a purpose to continue it in being.

Immunity, Ecclesiastical. In ecclesiastical jurisprudence a distinction is made between ecclesiastical immunity (immunitas ecclesiastica) and the immunity enjoyed by the Church from the right of refuge or asylum (q. v.), the former denotes the exemption of the Church from the general obligations of the community. The ministers of religion have at all times and in all countries enjoyed particular privileges and liberties. This was the case with the priests of the Church in ancient times, those of pagan religions and the Christian clergy by Constantine. Among these privileges we notice particularly exemption from taxes (census), from menial service (murnera servitio), etc. To this was added also the privilege of separate spiritual jurisdiction. See JURISDICTION, ECCLESIASTICAL. These privileges belonged to the ministers of religion, of their wives, children, domestics, and to the goods of the Church, but did not extend to their private property, or to persons entering the clergy simply to free themselves from civil charges. In 532 Justinian added to these privileges that of guardianship, permitting presbyters, deacons, and subdeacons to act as guardians or trustees, but not extending the privilege to bishops or monks (Nov. xcvii, cap. 3; Anth. Presbyteros C. cit. i, 3). The ancient Germans also granted great privileges to their priests. Julius Caesar considered them as the next class to the nobility, and said, "Magna (Druos) et apud eos honoris et privilegiis sunt; ubi consul (ib. vi, 13)." Does a bello abesse consueverunt, neque tributa una cum reliquiis quisque possessorum nostrorum, nullius tibi remanet" (ib. cap. 14). When Germany was Christianized, the clergy preserved the same privileges, and not only besides those granted them by the Roman law, which was recognized as the standard (secundum legem Romanam ecclesiam vivit [Lex Rhabnia, tit. viii, § 1, etc.]). The stipulation of the third Council of Toledo in 589, can. 21 (c. 69, can. xxi., qu. ii) that the auditors, bishops, and clergy should not be subject to compulsory services, was also granted afterwards (Capitularia n. 744, cap. 7; compare Benedict's Capitularies-sammlung, lib. iii, cap. 290). The protection which the Church granted to all who connected themselves with it soon became a source of great profit; it was known in the 6th century under the name of mitium, or mitium legitimum (Koht, Gesc. d. Beneficiatum, 1859, p. 113 sq.). To this right of protection of the Church was subsequently added that of collecting and appropriating to its own use the taxes which would otherwise have been levied on its properties by the fiscal officers: this right was called ecclesiastum, and was conferred by the Church by the laws, which were, in general, the taxes included fines, etc., of which the holders of immunities became the recipients. In after times the Church obtained also the right of assembling armies, which was called territorium (see Formula Aegaeenses, 4, 8, 21, 22, etc.), and which laid the foundation of the subsequent ecclesiastical principalities (see Retberg, Kirchenrechtliche Deutscgland, vol. ii, § 97; Waits, Deutsche Verfassungs geschichte, ii, 390 sq., 570 sq.). These immunities were further specified in the laws of the French kingdom (see Capitula synodi Vermissae a. 755, c. 19, 28; Cap. Metop. a. 756, c. 8, etc.), as were also those of the individual members of the clergy, and of the Church properties. St. Louis decided that each church should have a patron saint (Pope, il.; Capit. a. 816, c. 10, 25; canon, xxix, qu. viii). Such properties subject to taxes as did come into the hands of the Church did not, however, become free on that account, unless by an especial favor of the king (Capit. ii, Carlo M. a. 813, c. 11; Capit. vi, Ludor a. 819, c. 2). This was not, however, the case in his kingdom, and long after the abandonment of their importance, notwithstanding the decisions of the Council of Trent, Sess. xxv, cap. 20 ("Ecclesiae et ecclesiasticum personorum immunitatem Dei ordinatio et canonize sanctionibus constitutam esse"), and the bull In conso Domino (q. v.). To what extent the properties of the clergy and of the Church are now free has been settled by subsequent decrees. As a rule, the clergy are free from the general taxes, and from the personal duties of private citizens. The candidates for priests' orders and students in theology are usually exempt from military service, and their property enjoys generally the same privileges as the government buildings and state property. Personal immunity from taxes, military services, etc., is regularly granted to the clergy, as also to teachers, in Protestant as well as in Roman Catholic countries. IMMUTABILITY, the divine attribute of unchangeableness indicated in the great title of God, I AM. So James i, 17: "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, who cannot change, and hath not respect of persons." Psa. xxxiii, 11: "The counsel of the Lord standeth forever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations." cii, 25-27: "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yes, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end." God is immutable as to his essence, being the one necessary being. He is immutable also in ideas and knowledge, since it cannot change. If it did, we should not know who God is, that he is a self-existent and independent Being, the great Creator and wise Governor of all things; that he is a spiritual and simple Being, without parts or mixture such as might induce a change; that he is a sovereign and uncontrollable Being, whom nothing from without can affect or alter; that he is an eternal Being, who always has and always will go on in the same tenor of existence; an omniscient Being, who, knowing all things, has no reason to act contrary to his first resolves; and in all respects a most perfect Being, who can admit of no addition or diminution; we cannot but believe that, both in his essence, in his knowledge, and in his will and purposes, he must of necessity be unchangeable. To suppose him otherwise is to suppose him an imperfect being; for if he change it must be either to a greater perfection than he had before or to a less; if to a greater perfection, then was there plainly a change, and a privation of something better than what he had or was; then again, was he not always the best, and consequently not always God: if he change to a lesser perfection, then does he fall into a defect again; lose a perfection he was possessed of, and so ceasing to be the best being at the same time to be God. The sovereign perfection of the Deity, therefore, is an invincible bar against all mutability; for, whichever way we suppose him to change, his supreme excellency is null or impaired by it. We esteem changeableness in men either an imperfection or a fault: their natural changes, as to their persons, are from weakness and vanity; their moral changes, as to their inclinations and purposes, are from ignorance or inconstancy, and therefore this quality is no way compatible with the glory and attributes of God" (Charnock, On the Divine Attributes).
IMMATURITY

Various speculations on the divine immutability occur in the writings of divines and others, which, though of necessity attended with some caution, and sometimes even rejected as bewildering or pernicious. Such are the notions that God knows everything by intuition; that there is no succession of ideas in the divine mind; that he can receive no new ideas; that there are no affections in God, for to suppose he can love or hate is absurd; that he is not subject to diversions; that if there are affections in God, as love, hate, etc., they always exist in the same degree, or else he would suffer change: for these and similar speculations, reference may be had to the schoolmen and metaphysicians by those who are curious in such subjects; but the impression of the divine character, thus represented, will be found very different from that conveyed by those inspired writings in which God is not spoken of by men, but speaks of himself; and nothing could be more easily shown than that most of these notions are either idle, as assuming that we know more of God than he reveals to us; or absurd, as tend to represent the divine Being as rather a necessary than a free agent, and his moral perfections as resulting from a blind physical necessity of nature more than from an essential moral excellence: or, finally, as unintelligible or absurd. The true immutability of God is acknowledged in his essence, as one of his essential properties, but in his never changing the principles of his administration; and he may therefore, in perfect accordance with his preordination of things, and the immutability of his nature, purpose to do, under certain conditions dependent upon the free agency of man, what he will not do under others; and for this reason, that if an immutable adherence to the principles of a wise, just, and gracious government requires it. Prayer is in Scripture made one of these conditions; and if God has established it as one of the principles of his moral government to accept prayer in every case in which he has given us authority to ask, he may, we are assured, entangled his actual government of the world with the bonds of such an eternal predestination of particular events as to either reduce prayer to a mere form of words, or not to be able himself, consistently with his essence, in his will, to do otherwise. If there be an eternal Being, who always has and always will go on in the same tenor of existence; an omniscient Being, who, knowing all things, has no reason to act contrary to his first resolves; and in all respects a most perfect Being, who can admit of no addition or diminution; we cannot but believe that, both in his essence, in his knowledge, and in his will and purposes, he must of necessity be unchangeable. To suppose him otherwise is to suppose him an imperfect being; for if he change it must be either to a greater perfection than he had before or to a less; if to a greater perfection, then was there plainly a change, and a privation of something better than what he had or was; then again, was he not always the best, and consequently not always God: if he change to a lesser perfection, then does he fall into a defect again; lose a perfection he was possessed of, and so ceasing to be the best being at the same time to be God. The sovereign perfection of the Deity, therefore, is an invincible bar against all mutability; for, whichever way we suppose him to change, his supreme excellency is null or impaired by it. We esteem changeableness in men either an imperfection or a fault: their natural changes, as to their persons, are from weakness and vanity; their moral changes, as to

Latin, impanatio; from in and panis, bread; otherwise assimilatio, a name given to one of the many different shades of the doctrine of the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Eucha-IMPOSSIBILITIES

The theory was first presented in the 12th century by Ruprecht of Deutz in the following shape (Opera. ed. Col. 1602, i. 267; Comm. in Exod. ii. 10): "As God did not alter human nature when he incarnated divinity in the womb of the Virgin Mary, uniting the Word and the flesh into one being, so he does not alter the substance but that we should have the same grace in the Church as in the Womb. Therefore, which still retain the material properties by which they are known to our senses (sensus subactuum), while by his Word he brings them (the component elements) into combination with the identical body and the identical blood of Christ. As the Word descended from on high into the Virgin's womb, so the flesh (sussusendo carnem), so are the bread and wine, from their inferior (ab ino) position, raised into becoming flesh and blood of Christ, without, therefore, being transmuted (non mutatum) in such a manner as to acquire the taste of flesh or the appearance of blood, but do, on the contrary, imperceptibly become identical with both in their essence, partaking of the divine and human immortal substance, which is in Christ. It is not the effect of the Holy Ghost's operation (affectus) to alter or destroy the nature of anything used for his purpose, but, on the contrary, to add to that substance some, which was not at first possesso (De Opus Spirit. s. iii, p. 21, 22). In his work De divinis Officis (ii. 9; Opp. ii, 762), he says: "The Word of the Father comes into the flesh and the blood which he received from the womb of the Virgin, and the bread and wine in the form from the altar and, as is made and a joint offering. When the priest puts this into the mouth of the believer, bread and wine are received, and are absorbed into the body; but the Son of the Virgin remains whole and unabsorbed in the receiver, united to the Word of the Father in heaven. Such as do not believe, receive only the form of bread and wine, but none of the offering." His contemporary, Alger, or Adelpher, of Littich, writing in defense of the dogma of transubstantiation (L. iii. De sacrarum corp. et sang. D. in Bibl. Max. Patr. l. xxxi, Lugdun. 1677), was the first to make use of the expression impossio in this sense (p. 131), "in praecipio Christiana impossio sub Deum in carne personaliter incarnatur." Before him, however, Guimard of Avena had, in 1190, used the same word to express the probable meaning of Berengar (Bibl. Max. Patr. Lugdun. xvii, 441), whose supporters are sometimes called Aedenseans (q. v.) (from aldeus, to be present).

The doctrine of impanation was afterwards, in the Reformation period, but wrongly, attributed to Osianer by Carlstadt. Some Roman Catholic writers, e. g. Belzane (Dissert. de impan. et consubstant. Jena, 1677), Du Caunes, and others, accused Luther of having reviled the old error of impanation. The Formula Concilii at Trent (1777) declares that the "mode of union between the body of Christ and the bread and wine is a mystery," and does not decide positively what that mode is, but only negatively what it is not. "It is not a personal union, nor is it consubstantiation; still less is it a union in which change of substance is wrought (transubstantiation), nor a union in which the body and blood of Christ are included in the bread and wine (impanatio), but a union which exists only in this sacrament, and therefore is called sacramentia." See Herzog, Real-Encyklo. vi. 300; Knapp, Theol. v. 146; and the articles of THIS JOURNAL, Consubstantiation; Transubstantiation. Immeasurable, a name given to certain heretics in the ancient Church, who boasted that they were incapable of sin, and that there was no need of repentance; such were some of the Gnostics, Priscillianists, etc. See IMMEASURABILITAS.

Immeasurability, the state of a person who cannot sin, or who, by grace, is delivered from the possibility of sinning. Some speculations have appeared in the world upon the supposed immeasurability of the human nature of Christ, founded chiefly on certain expressions in the Epistle to the Hebrews (iv. 15) and elsewhere, asserting that Christ was "in all points tempted like as we are." It is argued, on the other hand, that as the Scripture has been silent on this point, it is both needless and presumptuous to attempt to draw any inferences from such expressions as that above cited; and that the Scripture is full of instances that we should satisfy with the declaration that "in him is no sin" (1 John iii. 5). See Art. xv of Church of England, Of Christ alone without sin. Immeasurability, or, at least, sinless perfection, has also been claimed for every true child of God upon the authority of 1 John iii. 5, though improperly, the word "carnum" requiring to be taken in the sense of the passages of Scripture) in such a latitude as to express, not an absolute impossibility of sinning, but a strong diminution, in the renewed nature, to sin in such a manner and to such a degree as others."—Eden, Thes. Diet. s. v.; Ullmann, Sindneses of Jesus (Edinb. 1858, 12mo), p. 46; Haag, Hist. des Dogmas Chrest. (see Index). See CHRIST, SINLESSNESS OF; PERFECTION; SANCTIFICATION.

Imperial, Laurent, a Roman Catholic prelate of whose early life nothing is known, was born about the year 1612, and was created cardinal in 1632 by Pope Inocent XI. He died Sept. 21, 1673.—Migne, Encyclop. Théol. xxxi, 1094.

Imperial, Joseph René, an Italian prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, was born at Ori, April 26, 1651. Descending from a high family, and enjoying the intercession of great prelates, he took orders in his Church, and was rapidly promoted. In 1690 Inocent XI created him cardinal, and he was sent as ambassador to Ferrara. At the papal conclave in 1730 he came within one vote of being elected the incumbent of the papal throne. He died Jan. 15, 1787.—Hoefler, Nour. Bieag. Générale, xxv, 838; Migne, Encyclop. Théol. xxxi, 1094.

Impluvium, an ancient area or spot of ground between the great porch of the church and the church itself. Because uncovered and exposed to the air, it was called atrium or inundarium. Eusebius called it apsidos. "In this court or church-yard was the station of the emperors (q. v.), and that class of penitents called ποροπλακας or flentes. These persons were commonly entitled χιμαζόντως or χιμαζόνυμοι, from the circumstance of their standing in the open air, exposed to all changes of the weather" (Riddle, Christian Antiq. p. 198). The practice of using the impluvium in the bapistry was initiated in the 4th century, but it did not become general until after the 6th century. There were also frequently buildings auxiliary to the church edifice placed in the impluvium, such as the baptisteries, places where the candidates of the Church were instructed and prepared for baptism, etc. See BAP Importunity (ἀπαντία), in prayer, an important element of success (Luke xii, 8), as evincing earnestness, a faith that takes no denial, and especially a perseverance that continues to intercede until the request is granted (compare Luke xviii, 1; 1 Thess. v, 17). See Prayer.

Imposition of Hands, a ceremony used by most Christian churches in ordination, and by others in confirmation. The expressions generally used in the Scriptures for the rite of imposition of hands are: ἐπιστίλλω, or ἐπιστίλλουσα (ἐπιστίλλομαι), with τῷ, τῷ, etc., in the O. T.; and ἐπιτίθημι, ἐπιτίθεμα ὑμῖν, ἐπιτίθεμαι, ἐπιτίθεσις χειρός in the N.T. The word to...

IMPOSITION OF HANDS

are that some gift should be bestowed. It may be an evil thing that is symbolically bestowed, as when guiltiness was thus transferred by the high-priest to the scape-goat from the congregation (Lev. xiv, 21); but, in general, the gift is of something good which God is supposed to have in a blessing. The blessing, therefore, is that the gift is bestowed in the name of Christ, and in the name of the church. The principle of the practice seems to rest on the importance of the hand itself, both in the bodily orhumanism and in the moral activity of man, in its power and in its action. Thus we find the hand raised in anger, extended in pity, the avenging hand, the helping hand, in this or that blessing or prayer. The hand is to shelter or protect (χειρα ὑποτήτως); and the hand held out imploiring (χειρὰς ἀναργύρως); consequently between the powerful, directing hand of God, and the impowering hand of man. The Biblical signification of the imposition of hands rests, in general, on the consideration of the hand as the organ of transmission, both in the real and in the symbolic sense. This result from the fact that not only did the party offering sacrifice bless the offering by the imposition of hands, but by the same act he, as sinner, imparted to it also his sin and his curse (see Lev. xvi, 21, 24). Bühler (Symbolik d. mosaiischen Cultus, ii, 339) rejects this idea of transmission of sin by the laying on of hands on the敬性 victim; he consider-ies it only as a symbol of "renunciation of one's own," and argues from the fact of a like imposition of hands in the offering in connection according to Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, ii, 1, p. 155), the imposition of hands in sacrifices signified the power of the party offering it over the life of the victim. Baumgarten, on the contrary (Commentar z. Pentateuch, 1, 2, p. 180), and 892), maintain the idea of transmission. The imposition of hands on all offerings presents no difficulty when we adhere to the general notion of transmission; the thanksgiving offering is by it made the recipient of the giver's feelings. This idea of transmission is especially manifest in the imposition of hands in consecration or blessing. Thus, "in the Old Testament, Jacob accomplices his blessing to Ephraim and Manasseh with imposition of hands (Gen. xlvi, 14); Joshua is ordained in the room of Moses by imposition of hands (Num. xxvii, 18; Deut. xxxiv, 9); cures seem to have been wrought by imposition of hands (2 Kings v, 11); and the high-priest, in giving his solemn benediction, stretched out his hands over the people (Lev. ix, 22).
The same form was used by our Lord in blessing, and occasionally in healing, and it was plainly regarded as customary by his followers (Matt. xix, 18; Mark viii, 23; x, 16). One of the promises at the end of Mark's Gospel to Christ's followers is that they should cure the sick by laying on of hands (Mark xvi, 18); and accordingly we find that Saul received his sight (Acts ix, 17), and Publius' father was healed of his fever (Acts xxviii, 8) by imposition of hands."

II. Classification of Biblical Uses.

More particularly, the imposition of hands in the O.T., may be divided into (1) the patriarchal-typical laying on of hands in blessing; (2) the legal-symbolical, in consecration to office; and (3) the prophetic-dynamical in healing.
The former (Lev. iv, 14) is a typical legal transmission of a promised hereditary blessing continued, through the party thus blessed, on his posterity; the second (see Exod. xxi, 10; Num. xxvii, 18) is a legal figurative imparting of the rights of office, and a promis-ging of the blessing attached to it; the third is the transmission of the power of healing over the restoration of life (2 Kings iv, 34). Yet in the latter case we must notice that the prophet put his hands on the hands of the child, and covered it with his whole body.
Thus this transmission points u, in its yet imperfect state, to the N.T. by the N-Th. of the transmission being symbolical of the transmission of spirit and life. Here, as in the O.T., we find three uses: (1) the spiritual-patriarchal imposition of hands by our Lord and the apo-tles; (2) the spiritual-legal, or official imposition of hands; (3) the healing imposition of hands. Christ lays his hands on the sufferers, and they are cured. But the bodily gifts he thus transmits are joined to spiritual gifts; he cures under the condition of faith (Mark v, 31 seq.; John v, 14). This is more in keeping with the idea that the curative effects are connected with the material imposition of hands, the more he operates without it (Mark v, 23, 41; vii, 32). Sometimes he healed only by a word. The full grant of his Spirit and of his calling he represented in a real, but symbolical manner, when he blesses the disciples in the upper room sitting at the Mount of Olives (Luke xxiv, 50). This imposition of the hands of the Lord on his apostles, in connection with the imparting of his Spirit, is the source of the apostolic imposition of hands. It was also brilliantly a blessing of the symbol and title (see Acts v, 17), as well as of the bodily and spiritual imparting of life (Acts ix, 17). From this general imposition of hands, under which Christians received the baptism of the Spirit, came the official, apostolic imposition of hands (Acts xii, 3; 1 Tim. iv, 14). At the same time the same impulse (see Acts v, 17; vii, 43 seq.; xvi, 21, 24) shows that the apostolic imparting of the Holy Spirit was not restricted to the forms of official or even general imposition of hands.

III. Ecclesiastical Uses.

In the early Church, the imposition of hands was practised in receiving catechu-menus, in ordaining bishops (see Acts viii, 14; 1 Tim. iii, 6, 7). The Cyprian derives its use from apostolic practice (Ep.
72, ad Stephan.; Ep. 73, ad Jubeau.); so also does Au-togine (De Bapt. iii, 16). That the imposition of hands in receiving catechumens was different from that used in baptism, cf. is shown by Bingham (iii, ch.
1). Its use in baptism was general as early as Toledolian's time (Coleman, Ancient Christianity, ch. xii, § 4).
This probably gave rise to confirmation. After that rite was introduced, imposition of hands became its chief ceremony. It was generally performed by the bishop, but elders were authorized to do it in certain cases, in subordination to the bishop. See Confirmation. In ordination, the imposition of hands was essential to the impartation of grace, and was thus an essential part of the ceremony from an early period, but not in the ordination of any class below deacons. See Ordination.

In the modern Church, imposition of hands is considered by the Romanists as an essential part of the sacraments of baptism, ordination, and confirmation (Concil.
Trident. Sess. xxi.). As in the ancient Church this rite existed in two forms: laying on of hands, which was called chirosthesia; and the crowning of the head on the persons, which was styled chironotonia—so in the Roman Catholic Church the former is retained as an essential part of the sacraments of confirmation and holy orders; the latter is employed in the administration of the priesthood in consequence of its continuation of the ancient order.

Baptism in the Church is therefore imposed on the person or by the sign of the cross, and it is therefore considered as a symbolical act, in confirmation and ordination; the Methodist Episcopal, the Presbyterian, and Congre-gional churches employ it only in ordination. Great stress is also laid on the performance of this rite in the Greek Church; and in the Russian Church they impose some persons without priests, "because in their idea the baptism of the Spirit was bestowed by the apostles and the clergy, and the church is called ecclesia—so in the Impost (Lat. impositus) is an architectural term for the horizontal mouldings or capitals on the top of a pilaster, pillar, or pier, from which an arch springs. In classical architecture the form varies in the several orders; sometimes the entablature of an order serves for the impost of an arch. In Middle-Age architecture imposts vary according to the style; on pillars and the small shafts in the jambs of doorways, windows, etc., they are usually complete capitals." See Parker, Concise Glossary of Architecture, p. 128; Wolcott, Sacred Archæology, p. 325.

tions of judgments. Too many of these have abounded in almost all ages. They are punishable in some countries with fine, imprisonment, and corporeal punishment.

Impostoribus. See Impostors, The Three.

Impostors, The Three (Impostoribus, De tribus), Towards the end of the 16th century a rumor became current that there had appeared a book under the above title, in which the author attempted to prove that the world had been grossly deceived three times (by the founders of the three principal religions). In the latter part of the 18th century this supposed work attracted great attention among theologians and savants, particularly on account of the mystery which shrouded its origin, its author, and even its contents, for it was not only well-nigh impossible to procure a copy of the book, but even the contents were hardly known definitely to anybody. Towards the close of the 16th century the rumors concerning this book were again set on foot. The most extravagant ideas prevailed, and the authorship of the unknown work was in turn attributed to the emperors Frederick I and II, Averroes, Petrus a Vinete, Alphon-so X, king of Castile, Boccaccio, Poggio, L. Aretin, Pomponazzo, Machiaveli, Erasmus, P. Aretino, Ochino, Servetus, Rabelais, Gruetius, Barnard, Muret, Nachtri-gall, Giordano Bruno, Campanella, Milton, etc. It is no wonder that soon a number of books, entirely different from each other, made their appearance, each claiming to be the original work. The four most important were: 1. Vincentii Panurghi Epitola ad cl. eirum Ioannem Baptisatum Moriam de tribus impostoribus (Paris, 1644); 2. De tribus Nubiolomus (namely, Thomas Angello, Oliver Cromwell, Julius Mazarinus); 3. History of the three famous Impostors (London, 1667); 4. Christiani Kyrgholdi Liber de tribus morgia impostoribus (nemme Eduardo Herbert de Cherbury, Thomas Hobbes, et Ben-dectico de Spinossa) (Rome, 1690). In 1716 however, the person of Haag claimed to possess the original in his library, and that it was the work of Petrus a Vincis, containing the thoughts of the emperor Frederick II, and written in 1250. Several copies of this work appeared soon after in French; the owner claimed to have made a copy not to copy the book, which he did not prevent him from translating it. A German cherailer d'industrie named Ferber finally published a work under the title of De tribus impostoribus, des trois imposteur (Francfort sur le Main, 1721), but it was found to be only the work De impostoribus (another title that was published in MS. at the beginning of the 18th century) under a new name. In the mean time there appeared a Latin work of the same title, the MS. of which bears the date of 1698. This may be the original work, though probably the date has been altered, as it bears internal evidence of having been written before 1650. Nothing is known of its author, except that, judging from the bad Latin in which it is written, he could not have belonged to the educated classes. Some think that the original title could hardly have been De tribus impostoribus, as it does not call either of the founders of the three religions—Moses, Christ, and Mohammed—outright impostors, but that the real title must have been De impostoria religionum. The existing MSS. present two different recensions: one, the shortest, bears the latter title; the other, which is longer, and is evidently an enlarged and altered edition, is the title De impostoriis in infinitum. Yet, with the exception of a few unimportant passages, the two are essentially alike.

The author attacks the morality of the Jews and of the Christians, saying that Abraham wished to honor God by offering up human sacrifices, and that the Christians wickedly continued the practice of sacrifices by a system of idolatry; and counter-witnesses, forming a regular processus in infinitum. See Rosenkranz, Der Zerfall am Glauben (Halle, 1880); F. W. Genthe, De impostor religie, brevem compendium (Lpz., 1833); Prosper Marchand, Dict. Historique, i, 312 sq.; Farrar, Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, p. 212 sq.; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. bk. iii, cent. xiii., pt. i, ch. ii, p. 384, note 5; Herzog, Theol. Encyklop., vi, 645; Am. Preb. Rev. Jan. 1862, p. 164 sq. (J. H. W.)

Impotency, the want of procreative power, is, according to the ecclesiastical law of the Roman Catholic Church, a good ground for either of the two parties an-nulling the marriage, if the impotence existed at the time the contract was entered into (cap. 2, 8, 4, X, De frigidis, 4, 15). But the defect must not only be proved by competent medical advisers, but also pronounced by them as incurable (cap. iv, 14, X, De profectionibus, ii, 19; cap. iv, 15, X, De profectionibus, i, 29, Sess. 24 of the Tridentine Council of 1731, 1732, in the Leipzig edition by Richter, p. 258 sq.). If any doubt arises the marriage contract continues in force three years longer, to further test the impotency of the person so accused. At the expiration of this three years, or, both of the parties is necessary to obtain permission for separation. The oldest ecclesiastical laws of the Protestants follow in the main Impropriation. (Lat. proprius). (1) Reproaches of Jesus against the Jewish people. See Capernaum; Jerusalem.

(2) In the Roman Catholic ritual, certain verses which reproach the Jews with ingratitude, and which, while the priest and other ecclesiastics present kiss the cross, are chanted by two persons singing Christ, in such a manner that after each verse one chorus replies in the Greek and another in the Biblical, in the manner of the Psalms, in Psalms, i. 97, etc.

Impropriation, in Great Britain, a parsonage or ecclesiastical living, the profits of which are in the hands of a layman; in which case it stands distinguished from appropriation, which is where the profits of a benefice are in the hands of a bishop, college, etc., though the terms are now used promiscuously in England.

Impulse. The desires or sensations of the soul are manifested by impulses, which tend either to the realization of some idea, the acquisition of something exterior to ourselves, or the repulsion of something disagreeable or hurtful. The impulses accompanying divers thoughts and feelings may, according to their expression, be corporeal, spiritual, or intellectual. We must be careful how we are guided by impulses in religion. "There are many," as one observes, "who frequently feel singular impressions upon their minds, and are inclined to adopt them. But it is a matter of some doubt as to how far these things are to be regarded, or attended to by us, and how we may distinguish any divine impulses of this kind from the delusions of the tempter, or of our own evil hearts. But whoever makes any of these things his rule and standard, forsakes the divine word; and nothing can be more pernicious than to make ourselves unhealthy, restlessly, or dangerously deluded in their practice, than paying a random regard to these impulses, as communications of the divine will."—Buck, Theology, Dictionary, s. v.; Kant, Grundlegung zu Metaphysik der Sitten (pref. p. 16, 63); Evang. The latter, which occurs frequently in the so-called "impracticable Psalms" (see Edwards, On the Impracticability of Psalms, in the Bible, and in his Ps. Arts, p. 97, etc.), is expressly justified by the law of God, as the law of God, or the accusation as uttered by the priests is repeated on the part of the choir.—Pierer, Univ. Lex. viii, 836. (J. H. Impurity, want of that regard to decency, chastity, or holiness which our duty requires. Impurity, in the law of Moses, is any legal defilement. Of these there were several sorts: some were voluntary, as the touching a dead body, or any animal that died of itself; or any creature that was esteemed unclean; or touching things holy by one who was not clean, or was not a priest; the touching one who had a leprosy, one who had an emission, one who was an unclean person, one who was in a state of leprosy, or any polluted, or fell into such diseases as pollute, as the leprosy, etc. The beds, clothes, and movables which had touched anything unclean, contracted also a kind of impurity, and in some cases the defilement passed to others. These legal pollutions were generally removed by bathing, and lasted no longer than the evening. The person polluted plunged over head in the water, and either had his clothes on when he did so, or washed himself and his clothes separately. Other pollutions continued seven days, as that which was contracted by touching a dead body. Some impurities lasted forty or fifty days, as that of women who were lately delivered, who were unclean forty days after the birth of a boy, and fifty after the birth of a girl. Others, again, lasted till the person was cured. Many of these pollutions were expiated by sacrifices, and others by a certain water or lye made with the ashes of a red heifer sacrificed on the great day of expiation. When the leper was cured, he went to the Temple and offered a sacrifice of two birds, one of which was killed, and the other set at liberty. In the parable of the fig tree, he who had tarryed, and then being present at a funeral, was to be purified with the water of expiation, and this upon pain of death. The woman who had been delivered offered a turtle and a lamb for her expiation; or, if she was poor, two turtles, or two young pigeons. These impurities, which the law of Moses has expressed with the greatest accuracy and care, were only figures of other more important impurities, such as the sins and iniquities committed against God, or faults committed against our neighbor.

The sins and prophets of the Old Testament were sensible of this; and our Saviour, in the God, h to strong, was present at a funeral, was to be purified with the water of expiation, and this upon pain of death. 1. The stronghold of the doctrine of imputation, with the same Paul, is Romans v. This theorem is the well-known Calvinitism of that in- tent, is Rom. v, 12-19. "The greatest difficulties with respect to this doctrine have arisen from the fact that many have treated what is said by Paul in the fifth of Romans—a passage wholly popular, and anything but formally exact and didactic—in a learned and philosophical manner. They have hidden it in the dense and loose and popular way by logical and scholastic distinctions. Paul shows, in substance, that all men are regarded and punished by God as sinners, and that the ground of this lies in the act of one man; as, on the contrary, deliverance from punishment depends also upon one man, Jesus Christ. If the words of Paul are not perverted, it must be allowed that in Rom. v, 12-14 he thus reasons: The cause of the universal mortality of the human race lies in Adam's transgression. He sinned, and so became mortal. Other men are regarded and treated by God as punishable, because they are the posterity of Adam, and not as a transgressor, and consequently they too are mortal. Should it now be objected, that the men who lived from Adam to Moses might themselves have personally sinned, and so have been punished with death on their own account, it might be answered that the man who lived in the time of Moses had no express and positive law which threatened the punishment of sin, like those who lived after Moses. The positive law of Moses was not as yet given; they could not, consequently, be punished on account of their own transgressions, as no law was as yet given to them (ver. 14). Still they must die, like Adam, who after expressing a positive law. Hence their mortality must have another cause, and this is to be sought in the imputation of Adam's transgression. In the same way, the ground of the justification of man lies not in himself, but in Christ, the second Adam.

I have found that the passage in Rom. v was never understood in the ancient Grecian Church, down to the 4th century, to teach imputation in a strictly philosophical and judicial sense; certainly Origen, and the writers immediately succeeding him, exhibit nothing of this opinion. They regard bodily death as a consequence of the sin of Adam, and not as a transgressor, in the strict and proper sense of this term. Thus Chrysostom says, upon Rom. v, 12, Ἐκείνου πάντως (Ἄδαμ), καί οἱ μόι ψυχήν ἐπί τοῦ ἔθους, γεγόναν ἐς ἴκινων Ἡσυρᾷ. Cyril (Ad. Anthropom. c. 8) says, Οἱ γεγονότες ἐς αἰ- τοῦ (Ἄδαμ), ὡς πάντα φθαρόντο, φθαρότες γεγονότες.

"The Latin Church, on the other hand, was the proper seat of the strict doctrine of imputation. There they began to interpret the words of Paul as if he were a scholastic and logical writer. One cause of their misconception so entirely the spirit of this passage was, that the word unction (a word in common use among civilians and in judicial affairs) had been employed in the Latin versions in rendering ver. 15 of Rom. v, and that ip' qu' (ver. 12) had been translated in quo, and could refer, as they supposed, to nobody but Adam. This opinion was then associated with some peculiar philosophical deductions, that Adam was prevalently in the West, and from the whole a doctrine de imputatione was formed, in sense wholly unknown to the Hebrews, to the N. T., and to the Grecian Church. This clearly proves that the Grecian teachers, e. g. those in Palestine, took sides with Pelagius against the teachers of the African Church. 2. Many have inferred the justice of imputation from the supposition that Adam was not only the natural or seminal, but also the moral head of the human race, or even its representative and federal head. They suppose, accordingly, that the sin of Adam is imputed to us on the same principle on which the doings of the head of a family, or of the plenipotentiary of a state, are imputed to his family or state, although they had no personal agency in his doings. In the same way they suppose Christ took the place of all men, and that what he did is imputed to them. According to this theory, God entered into a league or covenant with Adam, and so Adam represented and took the place of the whole human race. This theory has been adopted by many in the Romish and Protestant Church since the 16th century, and was defended even in the 18th century by some Lutheran theologians, as Pfaff of Tubingen, by some of the followers of Wolf (e. g. Carpazar, in his Comm. de Imputatione facti proprii et alieni), and these Witsius, in his De imputatione de imputatione pecatis Adamitis. But it was more particularly favored by the Reformed theologians, especially by the disciples of Cocceius, at the end of the 17th and commencement of the 18th century, e. g. by Witsius, in his Oeconomia faderarum. They appeal to Hos. vi. 7, 'They transgressed the covenant, like Adam,' i.e. broke the divine law. But where is it said that Adam was the federal head, and that his transgression is imputed to them? On this text Morus justly observes,'Est mera comparatio Judaeorum peccatum cum Adamo pecante.' Other texts are also cited in behalf of the theory of the imputation of Adam's sin, but in vain.

"But, for various reasons, this theory cannot be correct. For (α.) the descendants of Adam never em- powered him to be their representative and to act in their name. (b.) It cannot be shown from the Bible that Adam was the representative of God, who was involved in his own. (c.) If the transgression of Adam is imputed, by right of covenant, to all his pos- terity, then, in justice, all their transgressions should be again imputed to him as the guilty cause of all their misery and sin. What a mass of guilt, then, would come upon Adam? But of all this nothing is said in the Scriptures. (d.) The imputation of the righteousness of Christ cannot be alleged in support of this theory; for this is imputed to men only by their own will and consent. This theory has been opposed, with good reason, by John Taylor, in his work on original sin.

"Others endeavor to deduce the doctrine of imputation from the scientia medici of God, or from his fore- knowledge of what is conditionally possible. The sin of Adam, they say, is imputed to us because God fore- saw that each one of us would have committed it if he had been in Adam's place and situation. Even Augustine says that the sin of Adam is imputed to us propter consensionem, or consensum praevisionem. This theory has been advanced, in modern times, by Reusch, in his Introductio in Theologiam revelatam, and in Breuschel's work Die gute Stube Gottes, bei Zureck- zung des Friles (Jena, 1749). But it is a new sort of justice which would allow us to be punished for sins which we never committed, or never designed to commit, but only might possibly have committed under certain circumstances. Think a moment how many sins we all should have committed if God had suffered us to come into circumstances of severe temptation. An in- nocent man might, by this rule, be punished as a mur- derer because, had he lived at Paris on St. Bartholomew's night, in 1572, he might, from mistaken zeal, have killed a heretic. 2. Similar to these hypotheses satisfactorily explain the matter, the greater part of the moderate and Biblical theologians of the Protestant Church are content with saying, what is manifestly the doctrine of the Bible, that the imputation of Adam's sin consists in the prevailing mortality of the human race, and that this is not to be regarded as imputed in the strict and judicial sense, but rather as the consequence of Adam's transgres- sion" (Knapp, Theology, § 76).

III. "The enlightened advocates of imputation do af- ter all disclaim the actual transfer of Adam's sin to his posterity. They are well aware that the human mind cannot be forced up to such a point as this. But they do still urgently contend for the idea that all Adam's posteriority are punished for his sin, although they did not, in fact, commit it; and that in this sense, therefore, they are all guilty of it. Turrettin's view is, that Adam's sin is imputed to the ground or cause why men are born with original sin, and not with natural depravity. And this is, in his view, the punishment inflicted because of Adam's sin imputed to them. And with him many others agree. But Calvin, Edwards, Stafper, and others, reject the doctrine of the real imputation of Adam's sin to his posteriority, while they maintain that native inherent sin is the consequence of which is charged to us as sin. This Turrettin declares to be no imputation at all, i.e. a real rejection of his doctrine. Rejecting these views of Turrettin, then, Edwards, in order to account for it how all men came to be born with inherent sin, labor to show that there is a physical and psychological unity between Adam and all his posterity. According to him, this would account for the commencement of native depravity, and when commenced it is imputed to us as sin, and therefore punishable, on legal ground, with temporal and eternal evil. But Turrettin makes all this to flow from the doctrine that "of the ground of the sin of Adam, which is actually imputed to his descendants" (Stuart on Romana, v. 19, p. 592), Dr. H. B. Smith, in an article in the Christian Union, takes the advanced ground that while it must be conceded "that there is a proper interpretation," and that Adam's sin is imputed, "it flows from there that of the ground of the sin of Adam, which is actually imputed to his descendants." In his article in Religious Essays (i. 138 sq.), a member of the Presbyterian Church takes even more liberal ground. "We know that it is often asserted that Augustine and his followers held the personal unity of Adam and his race. . . . Let it be admitted that Augustine did give this explanation of the ground of imputation. Do we reject the doctrine because we reject the reason which he gives to justify and explain it? . . . It is no special concern of ours what Augustine held on this point. . . . Any man who holds that there is such an ascension of the sin of Adam to his posteriority as to be the ground of their bearing the punishment of that sin, has, in his doctrine of imputation, whether he undertakes to justify this imputation merely on the ground that we are the children of Adam, or on the principle of representation, or of scientia media: or whether he chooses to philosophize on the matter of unity until he confounds all notions of personal identity, as President Edwards appears to have done."

IV. The question of the imputation of Christ's active obedience to believers is very skilfully treated by Watson (Theological Institutes, pt. ii, chap. xxiii), himself a believer in the doctrine of imputation in a modified way. We give here a summary of his statement of the subject.

There are three opinions as to imputation. (L.) The high Calvinistic, or Anthemian scheme, which is, that "Christ's active righteousness is imputed unto us as ours." (2.) The answer to this, we say, is no, where stated in Scripture. The doctrine here attached to Christ's representing us is wholly gratuitous. 3. There is no weight in the argument that, "as our sins were accounted his, so his righteousness was accounted ours." This is a misstatement of the case. And that he did them. 4. The doctrine involves a fiction and impossibility inconsistent with the divine attributes. 5. The acts of Christ were of a loftier character than can be supposed to be capable of being the acts of mere creatures. 6. Finally, and fatally, this doctrine shifts the burden of Christ's justification from Christ's "obedience unto death" to Christ's active obedience to the precepts of the law.

(II.) The opinion of Calvin himself, and many of his followers, adopted also by some Arminians. It differs from the first in not separating the active from the passive righteousness of Christ, for such a distinction would have been inconsistent with Calvin's notion that justification is simply the remission of sins. This view is adopted, with certain modifications of which is charged to us as sin. Arminian of the following passages will show that this latter notion has no foundation in Scripture: Psa. xxxii, 1; Jer. xxxiii, 6; Is. xlv, 24; Rom. iii, 21, 22; 1 Cor. i, 80; 2 Cor. v, 21; Rom. v, 18, 19. In connection with this last text, it is sometimes attempted to be shown, as Adam's sin is imputed to his posterity, so Christ's obedience is imputed to those that are saved; but (Goodwin, On Justification), (1.) The Scripture nowhere affirms either the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity, or of the righteousness of Christ to those that believe. (2.) To impute sin, in Scripture, is to charge it upon a man, with a purpose to punish him for it. And (3.) as to the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity—"if by it is meant simply that the guilt of Adam's sin is charged upon his whole posterity, let it pass; but if the meaning be that all Adam's posterity are made, by this imputation, in a formal likeness, then the Scriptures do not justify it.

(III.) The imputation of faith for righteousness. (a.) Proof of this doctrine.—1. It is expressly taught in Scripture (Rom. iv, 3-24, etc.): nor is faith used in these passages as an object of the imputation, that is, the righteousness of Christ. 2. The testimony of the Church to this doctrine has been uniform from the earliest ages-Tertullian, Origen, Justin Martyr, etc., down to the 16th century. (b.) Explanation of the terms of the imputation that "faith is imputed for righteousness." 1. Righteousness. To be accounted righteous is, in the style of the apostle Paul, to be justified, where there has been personal guilt. 2. Faith. It is not faith generally considered that is imputed to us for righteousness, but faith (trust) in an atonement offered by another in our behalf. 3. Imputation. The word imputation is used here expressly called "the imputation of righteousness without works;" the imputation of righteousness is, then, the non-punishment or pardon of sin; and by imputing faith for righteousness, the apostle means precisely the same thing. (c.) The objections to the doctrine of the imputation of faith for righteousness admit of easy answer. 1. The popists err in taking the term justification to signify the making men morally just. 2. A second objection is, that if believing is imputed for righteousness, then justification is by works, or by somewhat in ourselves. In this objection, the term works is used in an equivocal sense. 3. A third objection is, that this doctrine gives occasion to boasting. But (1) this objection lies with equal strength against the doctrine of imputed righteousness. (2.) The faith itself is the gift of God. (3.) The blessings which follow faith are given in respect to the death of Christ. (4.) Paul says that boasting is excluded by the law of faith. (IV.) The theologians who assert the extreme doctrine of imputation are ably answered by the closing words of the present chapter and of the first chapter of Cyprian, v. 529: "To impute sin is to deal with a man as a sinner, not on account of his own act, or at least not primarily on this account, but on account of the act of another; and to impute righteousness is to deal with man as righteous, not because he is so, but on account of the righteousness of another, as Abraham was accounted righteous by faith alone. The act of another stands in both cases for our own act, and we are adjudged—in the one case condemned, in the other acquitted—not for what we ourselves have done, but for what another has done for us.

"This is a fair illustration of the tyranny which technical phrases are apt to exercise in theology as in other things. When men coin an imperfect phrase to express a spiritual reality, the reality is apt to be forgotten, or rather lies in a logical counter, having a force and meaning of its own. Imputation of sin and imputation of righteousness have in this way come to represent legal or pseudo-legal processes in theology, through the working out of the mere legal analogy which begets by the word. But the true spiritual reality which lies behind the phrases in both cases is simple enough. Imputation of sin is, and can be nothing else than, the expression of the spiritual unity of Adam and his race. Adam 'being the root of all mankind, the stock which has grown from this root must share in its degeneracy. The law of spiritual life, of historical continuity, implies this, and it requires no arbitrary or legal process, therefore, to account for the sinfulness of mankind as derived from a sinful source. We are sinners because Adam fell. The fountain having become polluted, the stream is polluted. We are incapable of goodness by nature, not because of anything so by the conditions of our historical existence; but, nevertheless, his sin is not our sin, and cannot, in the strict sense, be imputed to us, for sin is essentially voluntary in every case—an act of self-will, and not a mere quality of nature; and my sin, therefore, cannot be another's, nor another's mine. In the same manner, the highest meaning of the imputation of the righteousness of Christ lies in the spiritual unity of the believer with Christ, so that he is one with Christ, and Christ one with him, and in a true sense he becomes a partaker of the divine nature. The notion of legal transference is an after-thought—the invention of polemical logic—and the fact itself is deeper and truer than the phrase that covers it. The race one with Adam, the believer one with Christ, are the ideas that are really true in the phrases imputation of sin and imputation of righteousness.

Ina, king of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Wessex from 699 to 729, celebrated as the principal legislator of the Anglo-Saxons, deserves mention here on account of his enactments in favor of religious observances. He was the first in that portion of England who made the laws of Christianity the basis of all civil and social relations. Particular regard was paid to the observance of the Sabbath day; the rite of baptism was ordered to be performed on infants within thirty days after their birth, etc. His relation with the see of Rome was very intimate. He made several journeys to the Eternal City, and originated in his dominions the payment of the annual tribute of the "Peter's pence." See Riddle, Hist. of the Papacy, i, 810; Baxter, Ch. Hist. p. 98 sq. (J. H. W.)

Inability, in theology, is generally used to denote want of power to do the will of God. It is natural inability when the hindrance is physical; moral inability when the hindrance is in the heart. In this latter case, human inability has special prominence in American theology, and has been the subject of a great deal of controversy among New-school and Old-school Calvinists, and also between Calvinists and Arminians. The New-school contend that man is naturally able to do God's will; the Old-school deny both natural and moral ability. The Arminians deny natural and moral, but assert gracious ability on the part of man to accept Christ, and so to obey God.

The following paragraphs present well the Old-school view of the subject. "It has long been a boast, in certain quarters, that it is the glory of American theology that it has enabled us to hold fast to the doctrine of inability, and yet so to explain it as to make the sinner inexcusable, and to prevent him from abusing it to purposes of carnal apathy and desperation. This happy result, which is not the result of our theology, but is supposed to be accomplished by showing men that they have full natural ability to fulfill God's requirements; that they have no inability, but simply a want of will, or purpose, or inclination, to obey the Gospel, which they have full power to remove, y' they will. While this language is acceptable to none in America, which is explained by themselves, at all events coheres with the doctrine that man has lost all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation, it is used by others to express and vindicate the dogma that men are perfectly able to make themselves Christians, and to believe in the Gospel, without even a decent disguise. Yet it is this very class who make the most of the distinction in question. They think it a convenient and safe shelter for their doctrines that man can make himself a new heart. This class claim that Edwards was the inventor of this distinction; that it is the distinguishing characteristic and special property of his followers; that therefore they are the true Edwardsians, because they are the patrons and inheritors of this his grand discovery in theology. It can easily be shown, however, 1. That whatever of truth is connected with this distinction was in Edwards; that he is the first to have foretold the time of Edwards, but not only before the time from the heresies of Pelagius first occasioned thorough discussion of the subject of sin and grace. 2. That Edwards did not regard himself as introducing any novel doctrines or discoveries on the subject. A formerly distinguished champion of New-school doctrines recently said in a public speech, with great truth, that the common idea that the power of Edwards's system lies in the distinction of natural and moral inability is a fallacy. This was well understood before his day. It lies in his views of spiritual light, which constitute the key to his whole treatise on the Religious Affections. All who have read this treatise, or his sermons on the 'Natural Blindness of Men in Religion,' and on 'The Reality of Spiritual Light,' must concede the justness of this statement. The general principle of his work on the Affections is that 'tily arise from divine illumination.' The amount of truth contained in the proposition that man is naturally able, but morally unable, to obey God's commands, may be thus stated: 1. Man is really unable to do things spiritually good without divine grace. But this inability is moral, because it pertains to our moral nature. It does not excuse, because it is our sin; and the greater it is, the greater is our sin. 2. This corruption and inability do not destroy any of the faculties of will, affection, or intelligence, which are essential to humanity, moral agency, or responsibility. They only vitiate the state and action of those faculties with reference to things moral and spiritual. All power remains which would

The requisite to the fulfillment of God's commands if we were holy. Any hindrance, or want of power or opportunity, which would prevent us from fulfilling any command of God if we were morally good, excuses the non-performance of it, and this alone. So far, then, as there is no innate nature in us to express the fact that we have no disability but our sin, or that is excusable, it expresses an important truth.

So far as it is used, or is adapted to convey the idea that we have ability to remove our sinful corruption without the prevenient and efficacious grace of God, or that we have some natural ability, it is intended to express the fact that we have no disability but our sin, or that is excusable, it expresses an important truth.

The corrupt tree cannot bring forth such good fruit. Nay, as all Christians find to their sorrow, they cannot, although partially sanctified, by any power of their wills, exclude all corruption from their souls. The flesh lusteth against the spirit, so that they cannot do the things they would, and when they would do good evil is present with them. Though they love the law of God after the inward man, they have a law in their members warring against the law of their minds. How, then, is this indwelling corruption, having the entire mastery of the sinner, removable by his will? And does the grace of natural ability, which is due to its natural import, fairly express, or, rather, does it not express more than the truth, in regard to the power of the sinner? Is it not, unless carefully explained, adapted to mislead him? That cannot properly be called ability to do things spiritually good, to purify our corrupt nature, which is not inadequate to preserve the result also has not such an ability, whatever adjectives we affix to the word. He has only the faculties which would enable him to do his duty if he were holy. Is it not best, in plain terms, to say so? Have we a right to do otherwise than speak the truth in love?—Princeton Review, July 1847, No. 3, p. 513.

The Arminian doctrine is (1) that the unregenerate have complete ability, through the efficient grace of Christ, to comply with the conditions of justification as offered under the covenant of grace; (2) that the regenerate have, through the same grace, the will of God, i.e., to avoid voluntary transgression thereof. The following criticism of the Arminian view, by an eminent New-Englander, with a comment on it, is taken from the Christian Advocate, Dec. 15, 1859. The parts in brackets are added by the commentator.

The Calvinistic theory of power is the same [as the Calvinistic], excepting a vain attempt to conceal its revolting aspect by the still greater absurdity of what is called a gracious ability. The advocates of this theory plainly subvert and virtually deny the grace of God in their very attempt to magnify it; for if man has not ability or power to obey God without grace [divine operation, or favor to sinners], then he does not sin in not obeying, since a being who cannot act morally right cannot act morally wrong. Such a being cannot be truly said to receive or be capable of receiving grace, for grace is founded upon, what does God, into whose presence is God [here evidently in the sense of divine efficiency] do? Does it give man power to obey? Then man has power to obey, as he must have before he obeys. But even this is no security that he will obey. [What Arminian ever pretended that it is?] Adam sinned with this power. The grace [exercise of divine efficiency], then, does not meet the exigency of the case. [Is invisible obedience essential, then, to a proper human ability? In that case, what would become of Dr. Taylor's own theory?] Is it said he has power to use the means he has, but the word means? But what power is this? Until man has power to obey, it is absolutely incomprehensible that he should obey, for the act of obedience is his own act, done in the exercise of his own power to obey. Thus the grace of God [the Holy Ghost], according to this scheme, must, by a direct act of creation, impart some new essential mental faculty or power to the soul of man to qualify it to act morally. Grace is intended to express the fact that God has not a human soul, for he has not the true and essential nature of such a soul—the power requisite to moral action. [We have been wont to think of power as an attribute, not as a 'nature.'] He cannot be a sinner, and of course grace to him cannot be grace to a sinner. We should be careful not to confuse this with the moral government, cf. Lectures on the Moral Government of God, i.123. The comment is as follows: "In the first place, Dr. Taylor falsely represents the Arminian as asserting the gracious ability of man, in general terms, to keep the divine law, whereas we only affirm this of the regenerate. In the second place, he continually shuffles in his use of the term, grace, as will be seen by our bracketed insertions of equivalents, wherever the context fixes the sense. In the third place, we see no possible relevancy in his argument against a divinely imparted 'power to obey,' from the fact that the sinner would do good even if evil is present with them. Though they love the law of God after the inward man, they have a law in their members warring against the law of their minds. How, then, is this indwelling corruption, having the entire mastery of the sinner, removable by his will? And does the grace of natural ability, which is due to its natural import, fairly express, or, rather, does it not express more than the truth, in regard to the power of the sinner? Is it not, unless carefully explained, adapted to mislead him? That cannot properly be called ability to do things spiritually good, to purify our corrupt nature, which is not inadequate to preserve the result. Also has not such an ability, whatever adjectives we affix to the word. He has only the faculties which would enable him to do his duty if he were holy. Is it not best, in plain terms, to say so? Have we a right to do otherwise than speak the truth in love?—Princeton Review, July 1847, No. 3, p. 513.

Incantation (Lat. incantatio; incantum, to chant a magic formula, compound of is, intensive, and cano, to sing) is a magical formula, word, or prayer, in species of spell, it implies the use of certain aspiring modes of magic (q. v.), viz., that resting on a belief in the mysterious power of words solemnly conceived and passionately uttered. "There is in the human voice, especially in its more lofty tones, an actual power of a very wonderful kind to stir men's hearts. When to this we add that poetic utterance is a special and exceptional gift; that the language of primitive nations is crude and unmanageable, the words being as difficult to weld together as pieces of cast iron; that it is only when the poet's mind has risen to unusual heat that he can fuse them into whole sequences that please the ear and hang together in the mind, that, in short, his art is a mystery to himself—an inspiration—we need not wonder at the feeling with which everything in the form of verse or metre was viewed. The singing or saying of such compositions which could thus stir the blood of the beholders, they knew not what other effects might it produce?" To the power which the superstitious belief of the people, up to and even through the Middle Ages, gave to incantations, especially when accompanied, as they generally were, with the concocting of drugs and other magical rites, we must have attributed the effects which are thus ascribed to the word. If they could not raise from the dead, they could make the dead speak, or call up spirits from the vasty.

Deep in order to unveil the future. They could extinguish fire; darken the sun or moon; make fetters burst, a door or a mountain fly open; blunt a sword; make a limb powerless; destroy a crop, or charm it away into another's barn. It is especially the heathenish nations that in their prayers, whether for blessings or for curses, partake largely of these superstitious incantations. "They are not supposed to act as petitions addressed to a free agent, but by an inherent force which even the gods cannot resist. This is very marked in Hinduism and Buddhism, but it actually pervades all superstitious worship, and is quite disguised. 'They think they shall be heard for their much speaking.' For almost every occasion or operation of life there were appropriate formulas to be repeated in order to secure success; and many of these, with that reverence for antiquity and conservative tendency which always characterize superstition, continue to live in popular memory, although often the words are so old as to be unintelligible. Thus, among the Romans, in the days of Cato, incantations were common for curing dislocations, full of words the meaning of which had been lost. A form of words used to this day in Shetland for healing a strain can be traced back to the 15th century. In its earliest form, as found in an old German manuscript, it narrates how their native gods, Woden and Baldr, riding out to hunt, Baldr's horse dislocated its foot, and how Woden, using charmed words, set bone to bone, etc., and so healed the foot. The repetition of this rhymed mode of words to the church of magical incantations. A modern version of this tradition, current in Norway even in our day, makes the accident happen to the horse of Jesus, and Jesus himself perform the cure—in Shetland, also, the Lord (Jesus) is substituted for Woden; and the formula is applied to the healing of persons' limbs as well as those of horses. The operation is thus described in R. Chamber's Popular Rhymes of Scotland: 'When a person has received a strain, it is customary to apply to an individual practiced in casting the wreathing-thread. This is a thread spun from black wool, on which are cast the knots, and tied round a sprained leg or arm. During the time the operator is putting the thread round the affected limb, he says, but in such a tone of voice as not to be heard by the bystanders, nor even by the person operated upon: "O Lord, take pity, Hov's foot is slanted; Down he highted. Hov's foot is righted. Bone to bone, Sdefine to sdefine, Blood to blood, Flesh to flesh. Heal, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

Incapacity, in the ecclesiastical sense, is absolute unfitness for ordination. Thus women (Gen. iii. 16; 1 Tim. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35) and unbaptized persons are incapacitated from ordination. Baptism is essential to church membership, and therefore the basis of further advancement in the Church: 'Cum baptismis sit fundamentum omnium sacramentorum ante receptionem baptismi non sacramentum aliquud existens' (c. 60, can. i., qu. i., Capit. Theodori Canterbi.); also c. 1, x, De presb. eto non baptizato (iii. 48); c. 5, x, cod. (Innocent III a. 1306); c. 2, De cognitione spirituali in iv (iv.3) Bonifaci VIII. So the early Church declared that he who has not received in due form the baptism of water is not a member of the Church, and cannot therefore be ordained. The Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325, in c. 19 (c. 52, can. i., qu. i., directs that the clergy of the Paulinists (who did not perform baptism regularly) and of other sects were to be rebaptized and ordained on their return to the Catholic Church, and that such persons as had previously been ordained, but not baptized, should, at once receive baptism, and then be reordained (c. 112, dist. iv., De consecr.). [Leo a. 458]; c. 60, can. i., qu. i., comp. IV.—L.

The Sacrament of ordination for ecclesiastics was believed to be so fully authorized by the passages above cited from the Bible that it was never questioned by the Church. God had made woman subject to the rule of man; she could therefore not instruct a congregation likely to be composed also of men (Conc. Carthag. iv. a. 378, c. 36, in c. 29, dist. iv., De consecr.). It is from this point of view that Tertullian regards this question when he says (De velarum virginitatis, c. 8): 'Non permettitar mulieri in ecclesia loqui, sed nocto ducere, nec tingere, nec offerere, nec allius virilis munera et alia sodalistatis officii sortem ubi vindicare. In a like strain argue Augustine (c. xvii, can. xxiii, qu. v.) and others. The early Church therefore declared that no woman should be ordained presbytera (vidua) (Conc. Laodic. a. 372, c. 11 in c. 19, dist. xxiiii), nor deacona, or diaconissa (Conc. Aquisgr. a. 141, can. xxxvi.; Epaphras, a. 517, can. xxii; Aureliani, a. 359, can. xxvii; see Conc. Nic., c. 129, dist. iv., De consecr.; Conc. Carthag. iv. a. 378, c. 36 in c. 29, dist. xxiiii; c. 20, dist. iv., De consecr.). Abbesses were not to bless the nuns, to hear confessions, or to preach (Conc. Laodic. a. 129, can. xii, De consecr.; v. 38, Innocent III a. 1210). The Evangelical Church teaches the necessity of baptism (Augsb. Conf. art. ix, etc.), and also that 'the female sex was not ordained by God to rule, either in the Church, or in secular positions where a strongly pronounced understanding and good counsel are requisite. But they are ordered to take care of their household, and to see after it diligently' (Luther, in Walch's Werke, i. 1006). The ground which the Reformers took on this question was up to our day approved by the Protestant churches at large. Among the Friends, however, no such distinction has ever been recognized; indeed, the tendency of the present age is to abolish the rule altogether, and females in several instances have actually been installed as pastors in this country, while in other cases their ability in the pulpit has been freely acknowledged even among evangelical denominations. Yet even this barrier has been thrown down by the advocates of 'woman's place in the world' (q.v.). See Herzog, Real-Encyklop., vi. 617. (J. H. W.)

Incandescere, in the language of the Church of the Middle Ages, is the appointment of any strange bishop, presbyter, deacon, or a person of some other class of the priesthood, to this or that church, in which he was to perform services in part or exclusively, or even the appointment to one particular church. The election of the cardinal was also called incardinare.—Fuhrmann, Handwörterbuch d. Kirchengesch., ii. 485.

The Greek and Roman mythologies, or the wilder worship of the aborigines of America. The earlier Christian apologists attributed these caricatures of the true incarnation to Satan, and alleged that "he invented these fables by imitating the truth." Neander makes the profound suggestion, that "the objects of these may have been either a holy desire, inseparable from man's spirit, for participation in the divine nature as its true life—its anxious longing to pass the gulf which separates the God-derived soul from its original—its wish, even though unconscious, to secure that union with God which the human nature in Christendom shows us as a living reality. Nor can we be astonished to find the facts of Christianity thus anticipated in poetic forms (embodying in imaginative creations the innate yet indistinct cravings of the spirit) in the mythical elements of the old religions, when we remember that human nature itself, and all the forms of its development, as well as the whole course of human history, were intended by God to find their full accomplishment in Christ" (Life of Christ, chap. ii, sec. 12).

The want that thus expresses itself in these fabled avatars lies at the foundation of idolatry. The unsatisfied sacred bull of Memphis, the secret desire of those who have never known their God, has thrust itself upon him—should dwell with him. It first leads him to represent the Deity by the work of his own hands, and then to worship it (see Tholuck, Predigten, i, 148). Or we may look upon these avatars as so many faint and darkened fringes of the holy light which came upon the Garden through the first promise given to man. On the contrary, Kitto denies "that there is in Eastern mythology any incarnation in any sense approximating so that of the Christian, and that least of all is there any where it has been most insisted on" (Daily Bible Hints, on John i, 14). Cocker, in his late work (Christianity and Greek Philosophy, N. Y. 1870, 8vo, p. 512), advances the theory that the idea of a "pure spiritual essence, without form and without emotion, pervading all and transcending all, is too vague and abstract to yield us comfort," and that therefore the need of an incarnation "became consciously or unconsciously 'the desire of nations'" by "the education of the race" and 'by the dispensation of philosophy.' . . . The idea of an incarnation was not unfamiliar to human thought, it was *new or strange idea to the heathen mind. The numberless metaphysical phases of Greek mythology, the incarnations of Brahma, the avatars of Vishnu, the human form of Krishna, had naturalized the thought (Young, Christ of History, p. 248)." See Dörner, Lehre v. der Person Christi, i, 7 sq.; Biblisch. Sacrum, ix, 250; Weber, Indische Studien, ii, 411 sq.

"*Theo-Christians, Apis or Horup, "the living bull," was esteemed to be the emblem and image of the soul of Osiris, who, as Pliny and Cicero say, was deemed a god by the Egyptians. Didoros derives the worship of Apis from a belief that the soul of Osiris had migrated into this animal; and he was thus supposed to manifest himself to man through successive ages;" while Strabo calls "Apis the same as Osiris" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. abridg'd, i, 290, 291). "About the time when Cambyses arrived at Memphis, Apis appeared to the Egyptians." Their great rejoicings led that prince to examine the officer who had charge of Menephtah. The latter responded "that... their gods had appeared to them—a god who, at long intervals of time, had been accustomed to show himself in Egypt" (Herod. iii, 27).

Mnevis, the sacred bull of Heliopolis, was also a representative of Osiris, and with Apis, the sacred bull of Memphis, was worshiped as a god throughout the whole of Egypt. Ammianus says that Mnevis was sacred to the sun, while Apis was sacred to the moon (see Rawlinson's Herod., ii, 354, Eng. edition). Hardwick, however, adds Wilkinson as regarding it "a merit of the old Egyptians that they did not humanize their gods, but preserved them in their sacred animals; as admiring rather the elevation of animals and emblems to the rank of deities." Hardwick denies that the idea of incarnation is to be found in the old Egyptian creed (Christ and other Masters, ii, 551). See Apis.

The mythology of the Hindus presents a vast variety of incarnations, the inferior avatars which have appeared in various ages being innumerable. The object of these avatars is declared by Vishnu, in his original form of Krishna, thus addressing Arjuna: "Both I and thou have passed many births; mine are known to me, but thou knowest not thine. Although I am not in my nature subject to birth or decay, and am the lord of all created beings, yet, having command over my own nature, I am also subject to birth. As I, therefore, as there is a decline of virtue, and an insurrection of vice and injustice in the world, I make myself evident. Thus I appear from age to age for the preservation of the just, the destruction of the wicked, and the establishment of virtue" (Bhagavad-Gita, p. 40). With this declaration accord, for the most part, the objects of ten more conspicuous avatars of this deity, although the details of them abound in puerilities and obscenity. In the Matya, or Fish avatar, Vishnu took the form of a human being issuing from the body of a fish, for the recovery of the sacred books which had been stolen from Brahma by the magic deer of the goddess Kurma, or Tortoise avatar, supported the earth sinking in the waters. The prayer of Brahma for assistance when the whole earth was covered with water called forth a third avatar of Vishnu, that of the Yadarho, or Bear, of which the earth was made, and when the author of Ramayana, or Rama, the supreme animal, he began to smell around that he might discover the place where the earth was submerged. At length, having divided the water and arriving at the bottom, he saw the earth lying a mighty and barren stratum; then he took up the ponderous globe (freed from the water), and raised it high up in his hands, and said, 'thus it was a beautiful lotus blossoming on the tip of his tusk' (Hist. of Hindustan, i, 575 sq.). There can be but little doubt that these three avatars are perversions of the Hindu traditions of the Deluge. The next incarnation burst forth from a pillar as a man-lion for the purpose of destroying a blasphemy of the Vāmana, or Dwarf, in the next avatar, rebuked the pride of Mahā Bali, the great Balī. In human form the divine Paranarmlama, in twenty pitched battles, expatriated the Kettir tribe to prepare for the Brahmin the way to empire. There was a third avatar of Vishnu that was generally admitted to have been the abolition of sacrifice, which was said to be the cause, "Buddhism stands conspicuous in the midst of heathenism as a religion without sacrificial cult." Upon the tenth, the Kali avatar, which is yet to take place, the destruction of the universe will ensue (see Maurice, History of Hindostan, passim; Hardwick, i, 278; New Englisher, iii, 183-185). For the astounding events connected with the birth and infancy of Goutama (q.v.), see Buddha. See also Hardy’s Manual of Buddhism, p. 140 sq. Compare Avatar: Hinduism.

Lammas. The name has many features in common with Buddhism, so much so that it may be considered one of its outgrowths. It "differs fundamentally from Chinese Buddhism in the doctrine of hereditary incarnations. The great thought of some intelligence issuing from the Buddha world assuming the conditions of a god for a while, for the sake of mari frail humanity, and for a time prevailing over some one favored group of Buddhist monasteries, had long been familiar to the natives of Tibet." In the latter half of the 18th century arose the idea of perpetual incarnations. Then it was that one chief abbott, the "perfect Lama," inspired with the wondrous knowledge of his ultimate condition, determined for the benefit of mankind to sejourn longer on the earth, and be continu-
The notion that prevailed in Egypt was similar, "save only that the symbolical bull was substituted for the literal man, and as Buddha is still held to be successively born in each infant lama, so the god Osiris was equally thought to be successively born in each consecrated, living infant. Nor was this doctrine of a human incarnation by any means lost in that country. Dio- dorus gives a curious account of an infant in whose person Osiris was thought to have been born into the world in order that he might thus exhibit himself to mortals; and what Herodotus says of the Egyptian Persians, who were worshipped in the person of Osiris, it may be supposed that at certain intervals a man was brought forward by the priests as an incarnation of their god" (Diod. Sic. lib. i. p. 20; Herod. Hist. ii. ch. xci.; G. S. Faber, Eight dissertations, i. 61 sq.; see Wilkinson's note ad loc. cit. in Rawlinson's Herodotus). On the general subject, see also Aker's Origin of pagan industry, vi. ch. vi; Eight dissertations, i. 67 sq.

Under the head of classical metamorphoses it will be sufficient to refer to Baur in Baumgarten (on Acts, i. 446, transl.), to Ovid, Metamorphoses, Baucis et Philemon; and to the name of Jupiter bore of Zeus karašaža (Biscoe, On the Acts, p. 236).

"Passing over to the American continent, whether by way of Iceland to Labrador, or eastward from Asia, we find the wilderness, from the frozen shores of the Arctic Ocean to the Mexican Gulf, resounding with the deep refrain of the thunders in the desert of history; and names with the Wodin and Buddha of the eastern continent... His grandmother descended from the moon, which, in the symbolic language of the early traditions, always represents the Noachian ark. The only daughter of this Nokomis, in the bloom of her maidenhood, without the concurrence of mortal agency, and in a miraculous manner, gave birth to a son, who became conscious, as he advanced to manhood, that he was endowed with supernatural powers for the redemption of the world from evil. All his stupendous exploits were directed to that end. His name in the Indian dialects was Hósho, Bocoku," etc. (Metk. Quart. Rev. 1869, p. 206; compare Schoolcraft's Algon. Reg. i. 135; and Kingsborough's Mex. Antiq. vi. 175). The remarkable story of the birth of Huitzilopochti from a virgin mother is given by Squier, American Archaeological Reg. p. 196. For the reputed incarnations of the highest god, Teccapancon, Mr. Miraglia has nothing to be analogous to Buddha, Zoroaster, Osiris, Taut in Phoenicia, Odin in Scandinavia, etc., see Hardwick, ii. 152, with his remarks.—Brinton (Daniel G.), Myths of the New World (N. Y. 1868), 120mo, chap. ii and iv.

The doctrine of the incarnation is in the Christian Scheme. —In the evangelical sense, incarnation is that act of grace whereby Jesus Christ, the Son of God, took upon himself the nature of man. "By taking only the nature of man, he still continued one person, and changed but the manner of his subsisting, which was before in the mere glory of the Son of God, and is now in that habit of our flesh" (Hooker, Ecc. Pol. v. § 52). In the assumption of our nature he became subject to the consequences of sin, except that he was without the accident of sin (see Ebrard, in Herzog, Real-Encyclop. a. v. Jesus Christ). "That Christ should have taken man's nature shows that corruption was not inherent in its existence in such wise that to assume the nature was to assume the sin" (Ebrard, loc. cit.). The essential features of the incarnation are peculiar to Christianity, and when we speak of the incarnation, that of Christianity is at once understood; for the incarnation of Vishnu as found in Krishna, which is admitted to be the most perfect of all heathen incarnations, and the only parallel instance known to us, according to Hardwick (Christ and other Masters, i. 291), "when purged from all the lewd and Bacchanalian adjuncts which disfigure and debase it, comes infinitely short of Christianity." "Nothing can be more absurd than to compare the incarnations of this Indian deity with that of Christ. They are by their very identity alone tinctured with the pantheistic idea. The human personality is destitute of reality, since it is taken up and laid down as a veil or mask with which the divinity invested himself for a moment. Moreover, the degradation and corruption which were carried by it were called "true evil, and participated in human corruption" (Plessensee, Rel. before Christ, p. 61). Although, therefore, the idea of the union of the divine and human natures was not foreign to heathenism, yet that the divine Logos should become flesh belonged to Christianity alone. False religion is the mixture of the two, the incarnation of the Deity. Judaism itself had never risen to the conception of an incarnate God. The antagonism between the Creator and the creature was too sharply defined to admit such an interpretation of the first promise as the incarnation has given. See Martensen, Christ. Dogm., § 293; Neander, Church Hist., 3 vols., iv. 70 sq.; Kittto, Daily Bible Illustr. 29th week, evening.

The use of the term incarnation (later Latin) may be traced back to Irenaeus, A.D. 180, as in the expression "incarnatio pro nostra salute" (Contra Herr. i, 10).

III. Theory.—The doctrine of the incarnation is fundamental to Christianity, and is the basis upon which the entire fabric of revealed religion rests. It is presented to our faith from the plane of the miraculous, and is to be considered as the one all-encompassing miracle of Christianity. It contains within itself essentially and to its core the mystery of holy communion. These miracles are the fruit, after its kind, which this divine tree brings forth. Faith sees in the fallen estate of so noble a being as man, and his restoration to purity, immortality, and God, objects commensurate with the sacrifice and humiliation that are implied in the incarnation, and accepts the doctrine in consequence of looking to the wants and necessities of human nature; but a divine revelation elevates our vision, and meets all objections founded upon the comparative insignificance of our race by indicating that in some mysterious manner the influences of the atonement may beneficially affect the entire universe. See Garbett, Christ as Prophet, i. 12; Kurtz, Astron, and the Bible, transl. p. 95 sq.; Calvijn on Col. i. 20; Olshausen, Stier, and Harless on Eph. ii. 20. The blending together of two natures implied in an incarnation presupposes some element of nature common to both. As far as we can see, "things absolutely dissimilar may not exist together, or rather that we cannot coalesce with fire; water cannot mix with oil" (F. W. Robertson on Matt. v. 48). "Forasmuch as there is no union of God with man without that mean between both which is both" (Hooker), we see in the incarnation, reflected in the temple, those true nobility of man's nature, and the secret of the fact that the incarnation took place in the seed of Abraham rather than in angels. "For verily he taketh not hol of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold" (Heb. ii. 16, marginal rend.); "The most common mode of presenting the doctrine is to say that the image assumed our human nature. But by this, we are told, is not to be understood that he assumed an individual body and soul, so that he became a man, but that he assumed generic humanity, so that he became the man. By generic humanity is to be understood a life-power, that peculiar law of life, corporeal and incorporeal, which develops itself in individual form. The Son, therefore, became incarnate in humanity in that objective reality, entity, or substance in which all human lives are one. Thus, too, Oshasuman, in his comment on John i, 14, says, 'It could not be said that the Word was made man, which would imply that the Redemptor was a part of Adam, in his梓 plight. Therefore being the second Adam, he represented the totality of human nature in his exalted comprehensive personal- ity.' To the same effect he says, in his remarks on Rom, v, 15, 'If Christ were a man among other men, it would be impossible to conceive how his suffering and obedience could have an essential originality on mankind: he could then only operate as an example; but he is to be regarded, even apart from his divine nature, as the man, i.e., as realizing the absolute idea of humanity, and including it potentially in himself spiritually as Adam did corporeally.' To this point archdeacon Whately refers in his defense of the Incarnation, and represents the whole value of Christ's work as depending upon it. If this be denied, he says, 'the doctrines of atonement and sanctification, though confessed in words, become a mere empty phraseology. In all its essential part, the ethical influence of Christianity is p. 210, says, 'The Word became flesh: not a single man only, as one among many, but flesh, or humanity, in its universal conception. How else could he be the principle of a general life, the origin of a new order of existence for the human world as such?' (Eadie). This fine distinction was, however, very obvious to the early church. It is a transcendental philosophy to be capable of clear apprehension or general reception. It is sufficient to say that the divine Logos actually assumed a human body and soul, not precisely such as fallen men have, but like that of the newly-created Adam, or rather became himself the archetypal man after whom, as a pattern originally in the mind of Deity, the human race was primarily fashioned. See Image of God.

The question whether there would or could have been an incarnation without the fall of man has especially engaged the speculative minds of German mystics, most of whom maintain the affirmative. "If, then, the Redeemer of the world stands in an eternal relation to the Father and to humanity—if his person has not merely a historical, not merely a religious and ethical, but also a metaphysical significance, a soul alone cannot have been the object of his love, for there is a physical necessity for sin entering the world, and Christ could not be our Redeemer if it had been eternally involved in the idea that he should be our Mediator. Are we to suppose that what is most glorious in the world could only be reached through the medium of sin? that there would have been no room in the human race for the glory of the only-begotten One but for sin? If we start with the thought of humanity as destined to bear the image of God, with the thought of a kingdom of individuals filled with God, must we not necessarily ask, even if we for the moment suppose sin to have no existence, Where in this kingdom is the perfect Godman? No one of the individuals by himself expresses more than a relative union of the divine and human natures. No one participates more than partially in the "fulness of him that filleth all" (Eph. i, 20). All, therefore, the speculative minds of German mystics, most of whom maintain the affirmative.

IV. Objections to the 'Bible doctrine of the incarnation worthy of consideration are more easily resolved, perhaps than those against any other doctrine of Scripture, for they are mostly, if not altogether, to be comprehended under the head of its deep mysteriousness. Many writers, however, have adduced as parallel the mystery of creation, which is in itself the embodiment of the divine essence, and the theses of this discussion are essentially as being as man, not to speak of mysteries with which our entire economy is crowded. A priori, it is not more difficult to conceive of the union of the divine with the human, or the taking up of the human into the divine, than to comprehend the incarnation of an immaterial essence, such as the material form like that of the body. "If even in our time the idea of the incarnation of God still appears so difficult, the principal reason is, that the fact itself is too much isolated. It is always the impulse of spirit to embody itself, for corporeity is the end of the work of God; every phenomenon an idea descends from the world of spirit and embodies itself here below. It may therefore be said that all the nobler among men are rays of that sun which in Christ rose on the firmament of humanity. In Abraham, Moses, and others, we already discover the coming Christ (Whately)."

The strictest of the third charter is Whately's with respect to the substance of Deity, etc., may hold good of dogmatism upon the incarnation: "But as to the substance of the supreme Being and of the human soul, many men were (and still are) confident in their opinions, and dogmatism in framing them: if every one of these subjects they could not be refuted by an appeal to experiment... Philosophical divines are continually prone to forget that the subjects upon which they speculate are confessedly and by their own account beyond the reach of the human faculties. This is no reason, indeed, against our believing anything clearly revealed in Scripture; but it is a reason against going beyond Scripture with metaphysical speculations of our own," etc. (Cyclop. Brit. ii, 517, 8th ed.). On objections, consult Liddon, Bampton Lecture, lect. v; Sadler, Emerson, chap. ii, v; Forsyth, System of Christianity, ii, ch. xxv; Thoms, Meditations on the Creed, in Works, iii, 235; Martensen, Christ. Dogmat., § 182.

V. History of Views.—The true theory of the nature of Christ was of gradual development in the history of the Church. Not unlike the best and most enduring growths of nature, it sprang up and matured amid the conflicts of doubt and the tempests of faction. (See § VIII, below.) The efforts to harmonize the divine and human natures of Christ gave rise to a series of fluctuations of doubt, which illustrate in a signal manner the tendencies of the human mind to recoil from one extreme, pass over to the opposite, and then return to the first. The change of opinion in the council of Sardica (341) witnessed the maturing of correct views as to the twofold nature in the one person of Christ, and their embodiment in the creed, which, subjected to the test of centuries, is still the expression and symbol of the faith of the Church. See CREED, NICENE AND CONSTANTINOPOLITAN, vol. ii, p. 562. "If we would correctly apprehend the ancient Church doctrine of the two natures, we must take φύσις in the abstract sense in which it was used. The divine nature consists in this, that Christ is God, the predicate 'God' belongs to him, that he is this, that the predicate "man" is assigned to it. His divine nature is the divine essence which subsists in the Logos from eternity, and which in his becoming man he still retained. His human nature is the man's nature or mode of being and constitution, which for itself does not subsist, but as a unire in Christ as this, that, another man, and, since his incarnation, also in him—the nature hominum. To have human feeling, will, and thought, and as a human soul to animate a human body, is human nature. We must, however, never think of human nature as a separate subsistence, a unire of Mary, with which the Son of God united himself, or mixed himself up" (Ehrhard, in Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, e. v. Jesus Christ).

With the explanation thus given, we proceeded to remark that the earliest controversies of the Church revolved around the physical nature of Christ. The result of these contests established the essential oneness of Christ's body with ours. The pungency of the arguments employed may be illustrated in the words of Irenee (quoted by Hooker, Eccl. Polity, v, sect. 58): "If Christ's body had no other than a mere universal abstraction, it would not have coveted those earthly nourishments wherewith bodies taken from thence are fed. This was the nature which felt hunger after long fasting, was desirous of rest after travel, testified compassion and love by tears, gnawed in heaviness, and with extremity of grief melted, of which substance, which he was, the truth of him was not the exception of Justin Martyr, held the opinion that Christ assumed only a human body, or, if he had a soul, it was animal, or, which was more common, they quite ignored the question of his human soul. The views of Justin, however, were colored by the Platonistic philosophy, which led him to attribute to other bodies, soul, and spirit, but in such a mode of union with the Logos as to furnish the germ of the future error of Apollinaris the younger. Tertullian, about the end of the 2d century, first ascribed to Christ a proper human soul, but represented the soul of the Word as a peculiar whole, which had arisen from the teaching that connected the Logos immediately with the body of Christ. The doctrine of the human soul of Christ was more fully developed and illustrated by Origen. But, in comparing the connection between the Logos and the human nature in Christ to that of which our flesh is formed, the Word, in the fourth century, had himself the objection that he made Christ a mere man. (See further, Knapp, Lectures on Christian Theology, sect. cii, note by the translator.) Ambrose (De Incarnatione, p. 78) may more properly serve as the connecting link between Tertullian and the Arianus Creed, the latter ascribing to Christ, with Origen, a soul of a union of the Word with the human substance, while slowly attaining the following words: "Perfectus Deus, perfectus homo, ex anima rationali et humana carne subsistens." Thus Ambrose reasons: "Do we also infer division when we affirm that he took on him a reasonable soul, and endowed with intellectual capacity? For God himself, the Word, was not to be the flesh as the reasonable intellectual soul; but God the Word, taking upon him a reasonable intellectual soul, human, and of the same substance with our souls, the flesh also like our own, and of the same substance with that which is formed from matter, but without any taint of sin. . . . Wherefore his flesh and his soul were of the same substance with our souls and our flesh." Questions in connection with the nature of the human soul of Christ came into greater prominence towards the close of the 4th century than ever before in the history of the Church. Apollinaris the younger revived the opinion which extensively prevailed in the primitive Church, that Christ connected himself only with a human body and an animal soul (Hase, Ch. Hist. sect. 104). "Two beings persisting in their completeness, he conceived, could not be united into one whole, the perfect human nature with the Deity one person never could proceed; and, more particularly, the rational soul of the man could not be assumed into union with the divine Logos so as to form one person" (Neander, iv, 119, Clarke's edition). Further, in the 9th century, when the Adoptionists sank into oblivion, the Council of Constance condemned a finite material creatur. But, as might have been presumed, the era of scholastic theology, which was inaugurated at about the commencement of the 12th century, and continued into the 15th, although the attention of the schoolmen was more directed to other subjects, did not pass by one that so readily admitted the exercise of dialectic subtlety. The nominalism of Roscelinus, "which regarded the appellation God, that is common to the three persons, as a mere name, i.e. as the abstract idea of a genus" (Hagenbach), had perverted the true idea ofFather, Son, and Spirit into that of three individuals or things, in contradistinction to one thing (una res). In response to the idea that, as every universal is a mere abstraction, and particulars alone have reality, so "if only the essence of God in the Trinity was una res, and the three persons not tres res, the latter could not be considered as anything real. Only the one God would be the real; all besides would become a mere non-existence, in which case the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost would have become man" (Neander, viii, 92). "The daring assertions of Roscelinus exposed him to the charge of Tritheism, while those of Abelard exposed him to that of Sabellianism. The distinction was afterwards enlarged by Gilbert of Poitiers, whose phrase "quod est et quod est" gave to his doctrine the semblance of Tetratheism" (see Hagenbach, History of Doct. i, sect. 170). Though his starting-point was Realism, he arrived at the same goal as the Nominalist Roscelinus. "The Scholastics had much to say of the relation of the Number to the divine unity. Since Boethius had put forth the canon, 'Vere unum esse, in quo nullus sit numerus,' Peter the Lombard sought to avoid the difficulty by saying that number, in its application to God and divine things, had only a negative meaning; these are not 'signs of number' in the sense of number, but rather than to assert what is'" (Theol. Lect. by Dr. Tweiten, transl. in Bib. Sac. iii, 770). "Considered as an act, according to Thomas Aquinas, the incarnation is the work of the whole Trinity; but in respect to its terminus, that is, the personal union of the divine and human nature, it is wholly proper only to the union of the person of the doctrine of the Church, it is first and properly not the nature, but a person, and that the second person, which has assumed humanity." (For the accordance of this with the confession of faith of the eleventh Council at Toledo, A.D. 676, see Bib. Sac. iv, 50, note.) "Duns Scotus, inclined to the doctrine that the Word of God is proper if not an independent existence. This fundamental view of the Middle Ages Luther also adopted, and designated the divinity and humanity as two 'parts'; and upon this he built his theory of the impar- tation of the divine attribute to the human" (Hagenbach). The Age of the Reformation contributed nothing or but little new on the subject of the incarnation. The most that it did was to repeat some of the more pestilent errors of the past, and, in the mean time, through the conflicts of mind, bring into bolder relief the lineaments of truth. Thus, when Calvin restored the doctrine of the flesh of Christ as consubstantial with God, but the same would hold true in reference to all flesh. Nevertheless, he did not say it in reference to all flesh. "In his opinion, Christ alone is the Son of God; nor is that name to be given to any one else." (Hagenbach.) The Son, considered in his essence, still was the right, and is supported by Lutheran theologians. In another point of view, that is, considered in his personal substance, the Son cannot be called αὐτός, but only the Father, since he alone is αὐτός, but the αὐτός of the person is not to be confounded with the absoluteness of the essence." (See further, Tweiten, in INCARNATION

The Incarnation is a theological concept in Christianity that affirms the union of the divine and human natures in Jesus Christ. The term "Incarnation" comes from the Latin words "incarnatus" (incarnated) and "incarnatus" (incarnation). The doctrine of the Incarnation is based on the belief that Jesus Christ was the divine Son of God who voluntarily took upon himself a human nature without losing his divinity.

The concept of the Incarnation is central to Christian doctrine and is celebrated in many of the major Christian holidays and liturgies. It is celebrated as a manifestation of the divine love for humanity, the ultimate example of self-sacrifice, and the means by which humanity is saved from sin and death.

The Incarnation is also a key theme in the New Testament, with many passages in the Gospels and the Epistles. The concept is also central to many Christian traditions and practices, including the Eucharist, the liturgy, and the celebration of Christmas.

In popular culture, the Incarnation is often associated with the birth of Jesus Christ, which is celebrated on December 25th as Christmas. The Incarnation is also a popular topic in art, literature, and music, with many depictions and interpretations of the event.

poor, thus signifying, perhaps, the meagerness of their religious system, or, more properly, the poverty of its followers. They denied the divinity of Christ, but ascribed to him a superior legal piety and the elevated wisdom of a prophet. Eusebius says (Hist. Eccles. iii, 7), "The common Ebionites themselves suppose that a high degree of sanctity was attached to the soul of Jesus after his baptism." The Ebionites, whose views are represented by the Clementine Homilies, differed from the former by asserting that Jesus had from the beginning been pervaded with the same power; in their opinion he ranks with Adam, Enoch, and Moses (Hagnerbahn, Hist. Eccles. iii, 11). This error has been called, not improperly, the Socinianism of the age, revived and embittered the sentiments concerning the Messiah current among the Jews during his life. The views of the Nazarenes, who are generally regarded as a species of Ebionites, while they more nearly approached the orthodox faith, agreed with them in regarding Christ as only a superior man.

2. Gnosticism.—The Ebionite heresy that rose within the infant Church, from its necessary association with Judaism, was paralleled by another (Gnosticism), which springs from the pagan philosophy of the age. The assumption of the Gnostics was that knowledge for illumination in the name the Gnostics bore (προσώπος), 1 Cor. viii, 1; 1 Tim. vi, 20; Col. ii, 8), probably self-assumed, indicated the transcendental speculations which they ingrafted on the tender plant of Christian faith. They claimed to possess the secret of union with the divine, and held that the Deity had existed from all eternity in a state of absolute quiescence, but finally he began certain beings or ανθρώπινα after his own likeness, of whom Christ was one; and that he was allied to the lower angels and the δυσσυνευρίσκεσθαι, Demiurge, to whom this lower world was given. Moreover, he had no reality as such, not as a material body, but became united with the man Jesus at his baptism, and abode with him until the time of his death. (See Mosheim, Commentaries on the first three Centuries, sec. 62.) The tenets of Gnosticism can be traced even to the apostolic age. Simon Magus appears to have represented himself as an incarnation of the demiurgic power (Acts viii, 10). The ancient fathers regarded him as the father of the Gnostics (Iren. ad. Mar. i, 23). On the other hand, Tittmann (De vestigia Gnosticiorum, etc.) holds that nothing was known of the Gnostics until the 3d Century. However, the opening chapter of St. John's Gospel seems to be directly re cpected against Gnostical perversions of the doctrine of the incarnation, which is not impossible if we admit the well-known tradition that Cerinthus disputed with that evangelist. (See Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, iii, ch. xxv.

3. Docetism.—This was one of the forms of Gnosticism denying the reality of Christ's human nature, and representing whatever appertained to his human appearance to be mere phantasm—διάφορος. Jerome tells us that while the apostles were still living there were those who taught that his body was no more than a phantom. This particular form of Gnostical error was censured by Ignatius in his Epistles, and therefore unquestionably arose early in the Church. (See Lardner, iii, 441.) "If the Son of God (said the Docetist) has been crucified for me, I may as well be in appearance, than am I bound down by the chains of sin?" He appears to be themselves a mere show." For modern Docetism, as illustrated in the mystical treatment of the doctrines of sacred history by Schelling, and the Rationalists generally, see Martines, Dogmatics, p. 244.

4. Montanism (about A.D. 150-200), μοναρχία, so called either from its regard to the doctrine of the divine unity, or from a regard to Christ's dignity. (See Hase, sec. 90.) According to its teachings, Christ was a mere man, but born of the Virgin by the power of the Holy Spirit, and exalted to be the Lord of the whole Church. A certain efflux from the divine essence dwelt in Christ, and this constituted his personality, while this personality originated in the hypothesis of a divine power. (See Nead, iii, 849, Clark's ed.)

5. Sabellianism (about 258) taught that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost were one and the same—all so many different manifestations of the same being—three denominations in one substance. (See Hagenbahn, i, 263.) Thus the personality of Jesus did not exist prior to the incarnation, nor does it exist now, as the divine ray which had been incorporated in Christ has returned to its source. In the words of Burton, "If we seek for a difference between the theory of Sabellius and those of his predecessors, we are perhaps not far from the line of error. The whole divinity of the Father to be inherent in Jesus Christ, whereas Sabellius supposed it to be only a part, which was put forth like an emanation, and was again absorbed in the Deity. Noetus acknowledged only one divine Person; Sabellius divided this one dignity into three; but he supposed the Son and the Holy Ghost to have no distinct personwal existence, except when they were put forth for a time by the Father." The views of Sabellius reappear in the dogmas of Schleiermacher (who regarded the eternal and absolute Monas as unres cogent), the Father, Son and Holy Spirit as God revealed, and in a modified form in the Dogmata of the Incarnat

6. Manichæism (circa A.D. 274).—Mani or Manes, who was probably educated in the religion of Zoroaster, upon his adoption of the Christian faith, transferred to it the principles of his Manicheism. In this, he held that the evil had existed from all eternity in a state of absolute quiescence, but finally he began certain beings or ανθρώπινα after his own likeness, of whom Christ was one; and that he was allied to the lower angels and the δυσσυνευρίσκεσθαι, Demiurge, to whom this lower world was given. Moreover, he had no reality as such, not as a material body, but became united with the man Jesus at his baptism, and abode with him until the time of his death. for the same reason, the inseparable union of two perfect natures in one person; both denied that Christ was perfect man: the Patrician, no less than the Apollinarist, having considered that the divine nature supplied the place of a human soul (Harvey, Crofts, ii, 649).

9. Nestorianism (about 428) furnished the knotted root from which sprang ultimately the antagonistic heresies of the Monophysites and Monothelites. To the phrase Soterios, mother of God, applied to the Virgin, Nestorius maintained that Mary had given birth to Christ, and not to God. Thus arose the long-protracted controversy respecting the two natures of Christ (Socrates, Eccl. Hist. vii, ch. xxxii). Nestorius maintained that a divine and human nature dwelt in Christ as separate entities, but in closest connection—en eidos—where the figure of the Son of God, "heavenly man," are glued together. His own admission, "Divido naturas sed conjungo reverentiam," justified the allegation brought against his doctrines that Christ is really a double being. The humanity of Christ was the temple for the indwelling God, and the separate basis of personality in his human nature.

10. Monophysitism (about 446).—The doctrine of Nestorius, that there must be two natures if there be two persons in Christ, led Eutyches, by the law of contrarieties, to an exact counterpart, that there is but one person of Monophysitism, a local union of person, substance, and but one nature. The logic was the same in both heresies. Liddon has properly said, "The Monophysite formula practically made Christ an unincarnate God;" for, according to Monophysitism, the human nature of Christ had been absorbed in the divine. "We get, as it were, a Christ with two heads, an image which produces the impression not merely of the superhuman, but of the monstrous, and which is incapable of producing any moral effect" (Marten, Christian Dogmatics, sec. 136). Soon after the condemnation of this error by the fourth General Council at Chalcedon, it branched out into ten leading schools of doctrine, which were subsequently the sources of the controversies and, through discourses of the incarnation (Grundzüge d. Christlichen Dogmatik, § 325, 326): "As spirit, by renouncing individuality, man is in truth elevated above himself, without having abandoned the human nature; as spirit renouncing absoluteness, God has lowered himself to human nature; and through the abandonment of his own existence as divine Spirit. The unity of the divine and human nature is but the unity in that Spirit whose existence is the knowledge of the truth with which the doing of good is identical. This spirit, as God in the human nature, and man in the divine nature, is the God-man. The man in the divine will cease, and holy in its wisdom, is the God-man. As a historical fact, this union of God with man in manifest and real in the person of Jesus Christ; in him the divine manifestation has become perfectly human. The conception of the God-man, in the historic loom of Jesus Christ, contains in itself two phases in one: First, that God is manifest only through man, and in this relation Christ is yet placed on an equality with all other men; he is the Son of Man, and therein at first represents only the possibility of God becoming man; secondly, that in this man, Jesus Christ, there is the manifest man is the manifest God; but the manifest God is the Son of God, and, in this relation Christ is God's Son; and this is the actual fulfillment of the possibility or promise; it is the reality of God becoming man." For further quotations from German Rationalists, see Man- sel, Limits of Religious Thought, p. 154–156, 378-388.

While, as regards the question of antecedency, the propriety of introducing Swedish in the company of Rationalists might be questioned, we regard his views on the incarnation as entitling him to consideration in this connection. He has taught that "in a trinity of persons (act forth in the persons of the Church) we must hold a trinity of persons, by which he understand that which is the divine in the nature of Christ is the Father, that the divine which is united to the human is the Son, and the divine which proceeds from him is the Holy Spirit," etc. (Hagenbach, ii, 419). For the literature of Rationalism and its polemics, consult Hagenbach, Encyclop. der Theologischen Wissenschaften, p. 90–98. We cannot but suggest that all speculations upon the incarnation, which on the one hand rob Christ of his divinity as the true God, or on the other of his humanity, in the name of the letter, or of the desire to hold themselves to the severe strictures of Coleridge (Works, Am. ed., v. 552; comp. also, v. 447): "That Socinianism is not a religion, but a theory, and that, too, a very pern-INCANTATI, a term for the certificates of liberation given to serfs or slaves of churches and monasteries who were liberated.—Pierer, Univ. Lex. viii, 841.

Incastratūra (sepulcrum) is a name in the Roman Catholic Church for a small place in the altar-stones set apart for the storage of saints' relics.—Pierer, Univ. Lex. viii, 841.

Incensarium (or Incensorium) is the name of the vessel used in the Romish and some of the Oriental churches for containing the incense to be burned. See INCENSE.

Incensation is the lighting and burning of the incense. See INCENSE.

Incense (יוּנֶסֶן, ketorah, Deut. xxxiii, 10; usually יֹנֶסֶן, ketroth, which is once applied likewise to the fat of rams, being the part always burned in sacrifice; once יֹנֶסֶן, kitter, Jer. xxlv, 21; all forms of the verb יָנָס, prop. to smoke, hence to cause an odor by burning, often itself applied to the act of burning incense; Greek, λαθρεία and cognate terms; sometimes יַנָּס, Isa. xxiii, 29; Is, lxvi, 3; Jer. vi, 20; xvii, 26; Chal. frankincense, as elsewhere rendered), a perfume which gives forth its fragrance by burning, and, in particular, that perfume which was burned upon the Jewish altar of incense. (See Weimarn, De suffusi aromata, Jen, 1678.) See ALTAR. Indeed, the burning of incense seems to have been considered among the Hebrews so much of an act of worship or sacred offering that we read not of any other use of incense than this among them. Nor among the Egyptians do we discover any trace of burned perfume except in sacerdotal use; but in Persian sculptures we see incense burned before the king. The offering of incense has formed a part of the religious ceremonies of most ancient nations. The Egyptians burned resin in honor of the sun at its rising, myrrh when at its meridian, and a mixture called khoput at its setting (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, v, 515). Plutarch (De Is. et Os. c, lii, lxxv) describes khoput as a mixture of sixteen ingredients. "In the temple of Siva incense is offered to the Lingam six times in twenty-four hours" (Roberts, Oriental Illustr. p. 368). It was also an element in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites (Jer. xi, 12, 17; xlvi, 35; 2 Chron. xxiv, 25).

1. The incense employed in the service of the tabernacle was distinguished as בּכֵרְתָה יְנֶסֶן (ketroth hynsen) or בּכֵרְתָה יְנֶסֶן הקָשַׁר (ketroth hynsen haksher). Exod. xxv, 6, incense of the aromas; Sept. יִסְדָּחֶנ תָּוָו יִשְׂמָךְ וּזֵעַהוֹר; Vulg. thyrcinamata boni odores; A. V. "sweet incense"). The ingredients of the sacred incense are enumerated with great precision in Exod. xxx, 34, 35: "Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte (נַתְנָה, nethaph), and onycha (וניתהלת, shekelath), and galbanum (גֵּלָבָן, chelbonah); these sweet spices with pure frankincense (גַּלְבָּן, lebonah) of each shall be there a like weight. And thou shalt make of it a perfume, a confection for the art of the apothecary, tempered together, pure and holy." See each of these ingredients in its alphabetical place. All incense which was not made of these ingredients was called יָנָס יָנָס (ketroth ketroth), "strange incense," Exod. xxx, 9, and was forbidden to be offered. According to Rashi on Exod. xxx, 34, the above-mentioned perfumes were mixed in equal proportions, seventy manehs being taken of each. They were compounded by the skill of the apothecary, to whose use, according to Rabbinical tradition, was devoted a portion of the Temple, called, from the name of the family whose especial duty it was to prepare the incense, "the house of Abitines." So in the large temples of India is retained a man whose chief business it is to distill sweet waters from flowers, and to extract oil from wood, flowers, and other substances." (Roberts, Oriental Illustr. p. 82). The priest or Levite whose incense was intrusted was one of the fifteen (memmim), or prefects of the Temple. Constant watch was kept in the house of Abitines that the incense might always be ready in time. (Buxtorf, Lexicon Talmud. s. v. יָנָס נָסִים). In addition to the four ingredients already mentioned, Archi enumerates seven others, thus making eleven, cut off of the earth: This is the incense which was offered to Moses on Mount Sinai. Josephus (War, v, 5, 3) mentions thirteen. The proportions of the additional spices are given by Maimonides (Citehammokhadim, ii, 5, § 3) as follows: myrrh, cassia, spikenard, and safflower, each: of costus, twelve manehs; cinnamon, nine manehs; sweet thorn, three manehs. The weight of the whole confection was 368 manehs. To these was added the fourth part of a cask of salt of Sodom, with amber of Jordan, and an herb called the "smoke-raiser" (בּשָׁנָה, modak dahab), known only to the cunning in such matters, to whom the secret descended by tradition. In the ordinary daily service one manch was used, half in the morning and half in the evening. Allowing, then, one manch of incense for each day of the solar year, the three manehs which remained were again pounded, and used by the high-priest on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi, 12). A store of it was kept in the temple in the time of Josua (I Chr. vi, 8, 3). The further directions are that this precious compound should be made or broken up into minute particles, and that it should be deposited, as a very holy thing, in the tabernacle "before the testimony" (or ark). As the ingredients are so minutely specified, there was nothing left for the high-priest but to take a similar perfume for private use: this, therefore, was forbidden under pain of excommunication: "Ye shall not make to yourselves according to the composition thereof: it shall be unto thee holy for the Lord. Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto, shall even be cut off from among his people" (ver. 31). So in some part of India, according to Michaelis (Mosaisches Recht, art. 249), it was considered high treason for any person to make use of the best sort of colambuck, which was for the service of the king alone. The word which describes the various ingredients as being "tempered together" literally means salted (בּכֵרְתָה יָנָס וֵאֵל). The Chaldee and Greek versions, however, have set the example of rendering it by mixed or tempered, as if their idea was that the different ingredients were to be mixed together, just as salt is mixed with any substance over which it is sprinkled. Ainsworth contends for the literal meaning of the word, as the law (Lev. ii, 13) expressly says, "With all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt." In support of this he cites Maimonides, who affirms that there was not anything offered on the altar without salt, except the wine of the drink-offering, and the blood, and the wood; and of the incense he says, still more expressly, that "they added it to it a cask of salt." In accordance with this, it is supposed, our Saviour says, "Every sacrifice shall be salted with salt" (Mark ix, 49). Ainsworth further remarks: "If our speech is to be always with grace, seasoned with salt, as the apostle teaches (Col. iv, 6), how much more should our incense, which is offered to God, be thus seasoned?

It is difficult, however, to see how so anomalous a substance as salt could well be combined in the preparation; and if it was used, as we incline to think that it was, it was probably added in the act of offering. See SALT. The expression בּכֵרְתָה יָנָס (bad behrod), Exod. xxx, 34, is interpreted by the Chaldee "weight by weight," that is, an equal weight of each (comp. Archi, ad loc.); and this rendering is adopted by our version. Others, however, and among them Aben-Ezra and Maimonides, consider it as signifying that each of the spices was separately prepared, and that all were afterwards mixed.

2. Aaron, as high-priest, was originally appointed to offer incense, but in the daily service of the second Temple the office devolved upon the inferior priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot (Mishna, Yoma, i, 35).
4; Luke 1, 9) each morning and evening (Abarbanel, On Lev. x, 1). A peculiar blessing was supposed to be attached to this service, and in order that all might share in it, the lot was cast among those who were "new to the incense," if any remained (Mishna, Yoma, L c 1; Bar- tenora, On Talmud, v, 9). This explanation was given for their preservation in attempting to infringe the prerogatives of the descendants of Aaron, who were consecrated to burn incense (2 Chron. xxvi, 16-21; Joseph. Ant. ix, 10, 4). The officiating priest appointed another, whose office it was to take the fire from the brazen altar. According to Maimonides (Yad. Kiuth., ii, 8; iii, 6), this altar fire was taken from the second pile, which was over against the S.E. corner of the altar of burnt-offering, and was of fig-tree wood. A silver shovel (כתרת) was first filled with the live coals, and afterwards emptied into a golden one, smaller than the former, so that some of the coals were spilled (Mishna, Tamid, iii, 6; Yoma, iv, 4; comp. Rev. viii, 5). Another priest cleared the golden altar from the cinders which had been left at the previous offering of incense (Mishna, Tamid, iii, 6; 9; vi, 1).

The times of offering incense were specified in the instructions first given to Moses (Exod. xxx, 7, 8). The morning incense was offered when the lamp was trimmed in the holy place, and before the sacrifice, when the watchman set for the purpose announced the break of day (Mishna, Yoma, iii, 1, 5). When the lamps were lighted "between the evenings," after the evening sacrifice and before the drink-offerings were offered, incense was again burnt on the golden altar which "belonged to the oracle" (1 Kings vi, 22), and stood before the veil which separated the holy place from the Holy of Holies, the throne of God (Rev. viii, 4; Philo, De Anim. Ideon. § 8).

When the priest entered the holy place with the incense, all the people were removed from the Temple, and from between the porch and the altar (Maimonides, Tamid, Umas, iii, 3; compare Luke i, 10). The incense was then brought from the house of Abtinus in a large vessel of gold called נֵכֶד (copah), in which was a phial (יעליא, hebrewy property "a sufferer" containing the incense (Mishna, Tamid, v, 4). The assistant priests who attended to the lamps, the clearing of the golden altar from the cinders, and the fetching fire from the altar of burnt-offering, performed their offices singly, bowed towards the ark of the covenant, and left the holy place before the priest, whose lot it was to offer incense, entered. Profound silence was observed among the congregation who were praying with him (Exod. xxviii, viii, 1), and at a signal from the prefect the priest cast the incense on the fire (Mishna, Tamid, vi, 3), and, bowing reverently towards the Holy of Holies, retired slowly backwards, not prolonging his prayer that he might not alarm the congregation, or cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily. (Lev. xvi, 13; Luke i, 21; Mishna, Yoma, vi, 1). When he came out he pronounced the blessing in Numb. vi, 24-26, the "maggrehaph" sounded, and the Levites burst forth into song, accompanied by the full swell of the Temple music, and with a sound which, says the Rabbins, could be heard as far as Jericho (Mishna, Tamid, iii, 8). It is possible that this may be alluded to in Rev. viii, 5. The priest then emptied the censer in a clear place, and hung it on one of the horns of the altar of burnt-offering. See Censer.

On the day of atonement the service was different. The high-priest, after sacrificing the bullock, went to the offering for himself and his family, took incense in his left hand, and a golden shovelful filled with live coals from the west side of the brazen altar (Jarchi, On Lev. xvi, 12) in his right, and went into the Holy of Holies. He then placed the shovelful upon the ark between the two bars (Buber, On Lev. xvi, 12) and into the Holy of Holies. He then took a stone and substituted it. Then, sprinkling the incense upon the coal, he stayed till the house was filled with smoke, and, walking slowly backwards, came without the veil, where he prayed for a short time (Maimonides, Yoma hikkippur, quoted by Ainsworth, On Lev. xvi; Ou- tran, De Sacrificio, i, 8, § 11). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

3. With regard to the symbolic meaning of incense, opinions have been many and widely different. While Maimonides regarded it merely as a perfume designed to counteract the effluvia arising from the beasts which were slaughtered for the daily sacrifice, other interpreters have allowed their imaginations to run riot, and vied with the wildest flights of fancy. "(Quis rer. div. her. ntu. § 41, p. 501) conceives the stacte and onycha to be symbolical of water and earth; galbanum and frankincense of air and fire. Josephus, following the traditions of his people, believed that the ingredients of the incense were chosen from the produce of the sea, the inhabited and the uninhabited parts of the earth, to indicate that all things are of God and for God (War, v, § 5). As the Temple or tabernacle was the palace of Jehovah, the theocratic king of Israel, and the ark of the covenant his throne, so the incense, in the opinion of some, corresponded to the perfume worn by the luxurious monarchs of the East delighted. It may mean all this, but it must mean much more. Grothius, on Exod. xxx, 1, says the mystical signification is "aurum habenda corda." Cornelius à Lapide, on Exod. xxx, 94, considers it as an apt emblem of propitiation, and finds a similar symbolical meaning in the several ingredients. Fairbairn (Typology of Scripture, ii, 320), with many others, looks upon prayer as the reality of which incense is the symbol, founding his conclusion upon Ps. cxlii. 2; Rev. v, 8; viii, 3, 4. Bahr (Symb. d. Mosa. Cult. vol. i, c. vi, § 4) opposes this view of the subject on the ground that the chief thing in offering incense is not the producing of the smoke, which presses like prayer towards heaven, but the spreading of the fragrance. His own exposition may be summed up as follows. Prayer, among all Oriental nations, signifies calling upon the name of God. The oldest prayers consisted in the mere enumeration of the several titles of God. The Scripture places incense in close relationship to prayer, so that offering incense is synonymous with worship. Hence incense itself is a symbol of the name of God. The ingredients of the incense correspond severally to the perfections of God, and is impossible to divorce to which of the four names of God each belongs. Perhaps stacte corresponds to רַכְב (Jacobok), onycha to רְחֵן (Flakim), galbanum to רְחֵן (Chat), and frankincense to רְחֵן (Khadis). Such is Bahr’s exposition of the symbolism of incense, rather ingenious than logical. Looking upon incense in connection with the other ceremonial observances of the Mosaic ritual, it would rather seem to be symbolical, not of prayer itself, but of that which makes prayer acceptable, the intercession of Christ. In Rev. viii, 3, 4, the incense is spoken of as something distinct from, though offered with, the prayers of all the saints (comp. Luke i, 10); and in Rev. viii, 5 it is the golden vials, and not the odors or incense, which are said to be the prayers of saints. Ps. cxli, 2, at first sight, appears to militate against this conclusion; but if it be argued that the passage teaches that prayer is an element of prayer, it must also be allowed that the burning sacrifice has the same symbolical meaning. See PERFUMES.

INCENSE, CHRISTIAN. The use of incense in worship was not carried over from the Jewish to the Christian Church; it is still employed in the characteristic usages, in the Roman Church, and in some of the Oriental churches. The incense used is either the resinous gum olibanum, brought from Arabia or the East Indies, or an imitation of it manufactured by the chemists. The latter is most common now. 1. It is certain that incense was used in the first three ages of the Christian Church. Indeed the use of it was a mark of paganism, as is fully evinced by the enactments of the Christian emperors against its use. "The very places or houses where it could be proved to have been done were, by a law of Theodosius, confiscated by the government" (comp. Gothof, De Statu Pug., pag. 200). In Greece, the laws of the empires of the Byzantine period showed a strong bias against the practice of incense, which was used in religious ceremonies, suggesting a deep-seated suspicion of its use.

The argument is worthless. The principal argument of the Romanists rests upon Rev. v. 8: "Golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints!" as if anything could be argued, for personal and public gain, against the abhorrent laudable use of that beautiful passage. Censers are not mentioned among the sacred vessels of the first four centuries. The first clear proof of the use of incense at the communion occurs in the time of Gregory the Great, in the latter part of the 6th century. After that, the practice became common in the Latin Church. Its mystical representation is according to Roman Catholic authorities, (1) contrition (Eccles. xlvii); (2) the presencing of the Gospel (2 Cor. ii, 14); (3) the prayers of the faithful (Psa. cxli, 2; Rev. v, 8-24); (4) the virtue of saints (Cant. iii, 6). See above. Incense is chiefly used in the solemn (or high) mass, the consecration of churches, solemn consecrations of objects intended for use in public worship, and in the burial of the dead. There are, however, also minor incensations, and some of the monastic associations even differed in its use. Those Cistercian monks used incense only on feasts, while the Benedictines and Cluniacs introduced its use on most public occasions.

2. The censer (thuribulum) is a brazen pot holding coals on which the incense burns. The censer is held by three chains, varying in length, but generally about three feet long. When local, the use of them by the boys who act as censer-bearers becomes quite a feat of gymnastics. During the mass, the incense is thrown over the altar and over the "sacrificing priests" by the deacon who serves, kneeling. The Roman writers justify this incensing of the priest on the theory that he represents Christ, and that therefore the oblation offered by the faithful, is rendered to Christ through his representative at the altar. A curious rule with regard to "incensing" the pope is, that "when the pope is standing, the servitor who incenses him must stand; when the pope is sitting, the incenser must kneel." No symbolical or mystical meaning has been found for this rule: the real one doubtless is, that when the pope is standing, a kneeling boy could not so manipulate the censer as to make the incense reach the pontiff's nostrils. After the altar and officiating priest are incensed, the incense is directed toward the other priest and toward the public for the present, and last of all towards the congregation. As incense is a mark of honor, and as "human vanity creeps in everywhere" (Bergier, a. v. Encens), kings, great men, and public officials are incensed separately, and before the mass of the people. In Egypt, the marriage of brothers and sisters was admitted with general approbation; in Rome, it began to be disapproved in order to purify the air of the unwelcome chambers, cemeteries, etc., in which Christians were compelled to worship, just as candles were employed necessarily, even by day, in subterranean places. Even Romanist writers (e. g. Claud. de Veris) assert this. Cardinal Bona, indeed (Litteris, i, 35), seeks to derive the use of incense in worship from apostolic times, but his argument is worthless. The principal argument of the Romanists rests upon Rev. v, 8: "Golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints!" as if anything could be argued, for personal and public gain, against the abhorrent laudable use of that beautiful passage. Inchoncata (beginner) is one of the names by which the catechumens of the early Christian Church were called. See Catechumen.

Inclination is the propensity of the mind to any particular object or action; a kind of bias by which it is carried towards certain actions previous to the exercise of thought and reasoning about the nature and consequences of them. Inclinations are of two kinds, natural or acquired. 1. Natural are such as we often see in children, who from their earliest years differ in their tempers and dispositions. Of one we may say he is naturally revengeful; of another, that he is patient and forgiving. 2. Acquired inclinations are such as are superinduced by custom, which are called habits, and these are either good or evil. See Habit; Will.

In Cena Domini (Lat. at the Lord's Supper, the opening words of the document) is the name of a celebrated papal bull. "It is not, as other bulls, the work of a single pope, but, with additions and modifications at various times, dates back from the Middle Ages; some writers tracing it to Martin V, others to Clement V, and some to Boniface VIII. Its present form, however, was made by the popes Pius II and Paul III, and, finally, from Urban VIII, in 1627, from that time it continued for a century and a half to be published annually on Holy Thursday," whence its name; afterwards Easter Monday was substituted. The contents of this bull have been a fertile subject of controversy. It may be briefly stated as a summary of ecclesiastical censures, especially against all heretical sects, which are cursed in it by their several designations, their excommunication renewed, and the same punishment threatened to all who should be guilty of schism, sacrifice, usurpation of the rights of the Church or of the pope, forgery, unlawful seizure of Church property, personal violence against ecclesiastics, unlawful interruption of the free intercourse of the faithful with Rome, etc. The bull, however, although, as indicated, mainly dealing with offences against the Church, also denounces, under similar censures, the crimes of piracy, plunder of shipwrecked goods, forgery, etc. This bull, being regarded by most of the crowned heads of Europe as an infringement of their rights, was in the 17th century opposed by nearly all the courts, even the most Roman Catholic; and at length, in 1770, according to some authorities (e. g. Drury, History of the Church, 1790; Clement XIV discontinued its publication). Januar. (Pope and Council, p. 387), however, says that it is still treated in the Roman tribunals as having legal force, and, according to the accounts of some eminent travelers who have visited Rome, it appears that the sentence of excommunication is still read, though in a more simple form. Eliza von der Recke (Tagbueck einer Reise durch einen Theil Deutslands u. d. Italien, Berlin, 1817, 4, 95), under date of April 6, 1806, relates that after the pope had blessed the people from the balcony of the church of St. Peter, "he read out a paper, then tore it, and threw the fragments down among the people. A great tumult then arose, every one striving to secure a piece of the paper, but I do not know for what purpose, for, as I was told, the paper contained nothing but the form of excommunication always pronounced on this occasion against all who are not Romanists. This concluded the festival." This bull is confirmed three times, 1728, 1749, 1791, by cellor Gotting, of Jena, relates as having seen in his journey in 1829 (in Rahr, Kritische Predigerbibliothek, xi, 379 sq.). It thus seems proved that the bull itself, whose § xxii says: "Volentes presents nostros processus se omnibus et quoscumque simile bonum ac aliis quidem sortis," is not completely abolished yet. No pope has so far substituted a new bull for the old, and its principles concerning the cases reserved for the pope are yet in full force. In the Historisch-politische Blätter of Phillips and Gorres (Munich, 1847, vol. xxi) we find it stated that "In foro conscientiae, the bull is only valid yet in so far as its stipulations have not in other acts been altered by the Church herself." Its efficiency in former times, however, is everywhere opposed in self-defense by the civil powers. Incommunicableness or Gon. The divine attributes have been variously divided. One of the divisions sets the attributes of God forth as communicable and incommunicable. As the former are regarded such attributes as can be imparted from the Creator to the creature, e.g., those of holiness, wisdom, love, etc., and as the latter such are considered as cannot be imparted, as independence, immutability, immensity, and eternity. See Dorner, Person of Christ, div. ii, i, 185 sq.; ii, 193 sq. See also the article God (Dogmatical Treatment of the Doctrine of) vol. iii, p. 587 sq.

Impersonality of God. This is a relative term, and indicates a relation between an object and a faculty; between God and a created understanding; so that the meaning of it is, that no created understanding can comprehend God; that is, has a perfect and exact knowledge of him, such a knowledge as is adequate to the perfection of the object (Job xxii, 7; Is. xi). God is incomprehensible. 1. As to the nature of his essence; 2. The excellency of his attributes; 3. The depth of his counsels; 4. The works of his providence; 5. The dispensation of his grace (Eph. iii, 8; Job xxxvii, 25; Rom. vii, 25)." (The Incomprehensibility of God follows.)

1. From his being a spirit endowed with perfections greatly superior to our own. 2. There may be (for anything we certainly know) attributes and perfections in God of which we have not the least idea. 3. In those perfections of the divine nature of which we have some idea, there is no resemblance to us inbedad, and with which, the more deeply and attentively we think of them, the more we find our thoughts swallowed up, such as his self-existence, eternity, omnipresence, etc. This should teach us, therefore, 1. To admire and reverence the divine Being (Zech. ix, 17; Neh. ix, 6); 2. To be humble and modest (Ps. viii, 1; 4; Job xxvii, 19); 3. To be serious in our addresses, and sincere in our behavior toward him. Dictionary, s. v.) See God.

Incomprehensible. This word, as occurring in the English Prayer-book, is understood, at the present day, in a sense quite different from what was designed when it was first introduced into the formularies. The word first used in the Athanasian Creed is said, "The Father incomprehensible," etc., the meaning is, "the Father is (immemor. i.e.) infinite," etc.: a Being not to be comprised (comprehendens) within the limits of space.

Incognitability. The quality of both natures in Christ, which does not admit of a change of either into the other.

Incorporatus. A title in monasteries of the priest who has the administration of the convent estates, the collection of interest and other monies due the monastery, etc.

Incorporation. The incorporation of a church benefice consists in its being joined quod spiritualia of temporalia with a spiritual corporation, such, for instance, as a convent or a monastery. We find many instances of such incorporations in the 9th century, and they were most generally the result of efforts to increase the revenues of the corporations. The modus operandi was to make the separate office connected with the benefice, and to graft the temporal advowson of the corporation, which also added the additional offices connected therewith to its other duties, supplying them with ministerial services. For instance, a regular pastor (prio- rockus principalis) was appointed, who committed the care of souls to a vicar apostolic, under the immediate supervision of the bishop. This vicar then filled the office of cura animarum actualis, whilst the convent or monas- ty had but a cura habitualis. The canon laws in such cases soon prescribed the appointment of permanent vicars (vicarii perpetui), although in many in- stances, especially in Germany, many convents appoint- ed only temporary vicars, and even intrusted the care of souls to members of their order who did not reside in the parishes. Essentially different from these "pigna juris" or "urotage juris" incorporations were exclusively temporal unions of the revenues of livings with spiritual corporations. Such incorporations were known as incorporationes quoad temporalia. In these cases the in- come only of the livings went to the convents, together with all the revenues accruing therefrom, they in ex- change undertaking to give to the incumbent minister in an unparochial character spiritual office, spiritualia, remained unaffected by this arrange- ment, and was filled by the bishop, according to the wishes of the convent. The numerous abuses which were introduced in both these kinds of incorporations were denounced by the Council of Trent (Sess. 7, c. 7. De reform.). The council also forbade the union of parish churches with convents, monasteries, hospitals, etc. (Sess. 24, c. 13; Sess. 7, De reform. c. 6). In conse- quence the secularization of convents and monaster- ies, the whole organization has mostly fallen into dis- use; the parish administrators are about the only re- mains of the incorporation system. See Nelle Iuris- ribus parochii primiaries (in Schmid, Theolur. jur. exc. 11. 441 sq.); Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vol. iv, 649.

Incorporeality of God, is being without a body. That God is incorporeal is evident; for 1. Materiality is incompatible with self-existence, and God, being self-existent, must be incorporeal. 2. If God were corporeal, that which is not present in all parts of the world where body is; yet his presence is necessary for the support and motion of body. 3. A body cannot be in two places at the same time; yet he is everywhere, and fills heaven and earth. 4. A body is to be seen and felt, but God is invisible and impalpable (John xiv, 9). See Charnock, Works, i, 117; Gill, Body of Divinity, i. 45. See: Dodgshire, Lectures on Divinity, lect. 41. See God.

Incorruptibilities. An extreme sect of Euchthians (q. v.), who held that the body of Christ was incorruptible, i.e. "that from the time that his body was formed it was not susceptible to any change or corruption; that he was not even subject to innocent passions or appettites, such as hunger or thirst, but that he ate without any occasion both before his death and after his resurrection." See APHTHARTODOTICA; MONOPHYSITES.

Incorruptibility. See INCORRUPTIBILITIES.

Incredulity. See INDIFFERENCE; UNBELIEF.

Incumbent. A clergyman in the Church of England who is in present possession of (incomitendi, is close to, rentas upon, as its immediate occupant) a benefice (Eden). Sir E. Coke, however, says that the title means that the clergyman "in possession of a benefice ought diligently to bend all his study to the care of his church."
treated it so much at length that we insert his remarks on this subject, which he treats under the two heads of (1) Perpetuity, and (2) Inerrancy and Infallibility. The former, he argues, frees the Church from failure in succession of members; the latter two free it from failure in the world and declaring the truth. Both these flow from the essence and nature of the mystical body of Christ. The Scriptures, in their essence and in their office as the voice of Christ, are John xv; 1 Cor. vi, 19; xii, 12; Eph. i, 23; iv, 12; v, 80; Col. i, 18, and cannot be explained away into metaphor. As Christ's natural body was incorruptible, and yet before the resurrection was liable to human infirmity and death, its mystical body, the Church, not glorified, is liable in each one of its many members to sin and falling from grace; but nothing can touch the life of the body itself. As also the fulness of the Spirit dwells in Christ, and Christ was the Truth, so the Spirit, by virtue of whose indwelling he is one, and one with its Head, guides the Church into all truth.

I. Perpetuity of the Church.—Plain promises of this are made in Isa. lxi, 8, 9; Dan. ii, 44; Matt. xvi, 18; xxviii, 20; John xiv, 16, 17. There are also arguments to be drawn for it from the consideration of God's counsel and purpose. The consummation of all things is declared in God by Christ, and his church (2 Pet. iii, 7; Rev. vi, 9-11). When faith fails in the earth, the end will be (Luke xviii, 8). This is as regards God, in whose work we cannot suppose an interruption. So, too, as regards man. God will have all men to be saved, and will come to theknowledge of the truth. The Church, which is the pillar and ground of the truth, will fail without a failure of God's mercy. So long as there are men capable of salvation (and all men are capable of salvation, since Christ died for all), so long will the Church be preserved, that it may be added both of salvation to the church (1 Cor. i, 24). The Spirit of God is given to the Church as a whole. Each branch of the Church is on its probation, as is each individual member. And the law of probation, the law of their participation in the promise, is the same: He that hath, to him shall be given. To argue that because each particular church may fail, therefore the whole may fail, is not only a fallacy in logic, but a denial of Christ's power to impart to the whole that which he does not impart to each particular member.*

II. Inerrancy and Infallibility of the Church.—The following premises and arguments show that the Church will not fail either by dying out or by infallibility. As the work of the Spirit will not fail in bringing sons to God, so it will never fail in providing that there shall always be a body persevering in the faith according to the election of grace. This is to be considered more particularly as regards the truth of doctrine as well as of life. For this also, there are promises, e.g. John xvi, 13; 1 John ii, 27. The spirit which dwells in the Church is likewise declared to be the spirit of knowledge and understanding (Col. i, 9; ii, 3; iii, 10). Less can be implied in these words than that the Church shall always have a tenure of the truth sufficient for salvation. They show further, that any doctrine which can be said to be the decreed and ascertained voice of the Church must be from God, whose Spirit is in the Church. But they cannot be pressed so far as to prove that the Church may not for a time hold such an error as does not directly deny the foundation of faith, even if it does not directly involve an error, which by logical consequence denies the foundation of faith, is not to be taken as such a denial. The consequence may not be perceived, and if perceived the premises would be at once rejected. The case is doubtful as to the probability, but its possibility must be conceded. Whether we can say that the voice of the Church is sufficiently ascertained? This leads us on from the inerrancy, or passive infallibility, to the active infallibility, or declaration of the faith. No actual limits of time can be set for which, if a doctrine has been held, it must be considered as the ascertained decision of the Church. The circumstances of the Church may not be such as to lead to investigation. Ten years in one period may cause more shifting of the truth than a hundred years of another period. It is the condition of the Church militant to be always under trial, sometimes by persecution from the world, sometimes by blasts of contrary doctrine within itself. In different degrees these are blended, and with very different degrees of speed, will the truth of the Church be preserved. Holiness also, and above all, will regulate the discovery and reception of truth. For knowledge and understanding in spiritual things are the flower and fruit; the plant itself is holiness springing from the root of faith. The Spirit, then, of a doctrine ascertained by the Church is a growing certainty, varying in amount with the time the doctrine has been held, the degree of investigation to which it has been subjected, and the degree of holiness in the Church. Thus the decrees of a council which we may believe to be eccumenical can only be known to be the genuine voice of the Church by their acceptance. We may agree to the abstract proposition that a truly eccumenical council cannot err; but the proposition is of little practical value at the time of holding a council, for none can prove that the council has not in some respects failed of eccumenicity. The truth and authority of its decisions rests on their acceptance. For the Spirit of God is given to the whole body of the Church; and that can only be known to be the true voice of the Church which is expressed by sufficient delibration of generation after generation. In this sense the infallibility of the Church is a reasonable doctrine, and one, in fact, it would be unreasonable for any Christian to disbelieve.

Indefectible Grace is, according to the Calvinists, grace which cannot be lost, or fail of its intended purpose, the salvation of those on whom it is bestowed, i.e. the elect, and is held to be irresistible by the person so elected, the procedure requiring no salvation. See Calvinism; Election; Grace; Will.

Indelible Character. See Character, Indelible.

Indemnity (Latin indecimus, compensation) is in some churches a pension paid to the bishop in consideration of discharging or indemnifying churches, united or appropriated, from the payment of procurations, or by way of recompense for the profit which the bishop would otherwise have received during the time of the vacation of such churches.

Independence of Churches. "It is an admitted fact, as clearly settled as anything can be by human authority, that the primitive Christians, in the organization of their assemblies, formed them after the model of the Jewish synagogue. . . . They disowned the he- reditary aristocracy of the Levitical priesthood, and adopted the popular government of the synagogue. . . . Their government was voluntary, elective, free, and administered by rulers or elders elected by the people. The ruler of the synagogue was the moderator of the college of elders, but only primus inter parres, holding no official rank above them. The people, concilia (Heb. synagogoi, lib. iii, p. 1, c. xv, p. 828-825) has shown, appointed their own officers to rule over them. They exercised the natural right of freemen to enact and execute their own laws, to admit proselytes, and to exclude plebeious unworthy members from their communion. Theirs was a democratic form of government, and it is so described by one of the most able expounders of the constitution of the primitive churches (see Rothe, An- fange d. Christl. Kirche, p. 14). Like their prototype, therefore, the primitive churches also embodied the principle of a popular government and the enlightened religious liberty" (Coleman, Apostol, i, p. 270, n. 3; p. 43 sq.). The reason, however, why the primitive Chris- tians had this peculiar organization, reintroduced in the modern church by the Congregationalists, and in part also by the Presbyterians, is, that the members of the early Christian Church mostly came from the Jewish. church, and naturally adopted methods of worship, government, etc., to which they were accustomed. But this by no means goes to prove that it was the intention of the early Christians to perpetuate their mode of government, but rather that, engaged as Christ and his disciples had been in founding a Church, needing no other than their own persons, to the mode of government to which they had been accustomed was chosen for the time being, "the disciples not having yet attained to a clear understanding of that call which Christ had already given them by so many intimations to form a Church, and raised from the existing Jewish economy. . . . We are disposed to believe that the Church was at first composed entirely of members standing on an equality with one another, and that the apostles alone held a higher rank, and exercised a directing influence over the whole, which arose from the original position in which Christ had placed them in relation to other believers; so that the whole arrangement and administration of the affairs of the Church proceeded from them, and they were first induced by particular circumstances to appoint other church officers, as in the instance of deacons" (Neander, Apostol. Kirche, 3d edit. p. 41, 88; comp. p. 172, 189). In John vi. 1; xi. 80. Christ also evidently did make some provision for a government of his Church on earth independent of Jewish and pagan customs by constituting apostles, who should authoritatively command and teach. (See ACTS.) The church of the early Christians also, unlike the Jewish, were independent one of the other. History, sacred or profane, relating to this period, records not a single instance in which one church presumed to impose laws of its own upon another. The first traces of associations between several churches, from which councils can be said to have taken their origin, we find in the 2d century (Colesman, De Robus Christi, sec. i. § 48). Indications of this original independence are distinctly manifested even after the rise of the episcopacy. Every bishop had the right to form his own liturgy and creed, and to settle at pleasure his own time and mode of celebrating the religious festivals (compare Crelling, Apostolische Christengemeine, p. 16). Cyprian strongly asserts the right of every bishop to make laws for his own church. Indeed, it is to this original independence of the churches of each other, to the war of all against all, that the Socrates (Eccles. Hist. lib. v., c. xxii.) attributes the endless controversies which agitated the Church in the early ages with regard to the observance of certain festivals, especially Easter. See, besides the authorities already cited, Sack, Comment. ad Theol. Inst. p. 141; Bunsen, Hippolytus, c. 19; Dr. Hirsch, in the Amer. Preb. Rev. Jan. 1867. See also Episcopacy, vol. iii., p. 263, 264, 266 (iv). (J. H. W.)

Independence of God is his existence in and of himself, without depending on any other being. "His being and perfections," as Dr. Ridgely observes (Body of Divinity, p. 7), "are undervived, and not communicated to him, as all finite perfections are by him to the creation. This attribute of independence belongs to all his perfections. 1. He is independent as to his knowledge. He doth not receive ideas from any object out of himself, as intelligent creatures do. This is elegantly described by the prophet, Isa. xli. 13, 14. 2. He is independent in power. As he receives strength from no one, so he doth not act dependently on the will of the creature (Job xxxvi. 23). 3. He is independent as to his holiness, hating sin necessarily, and not barely depending on some reasons out of himself inducing him thereto; for it is essential to the divine nature to be infinitely opposite to sin. 4. He is independent as to his bounty and goodness. He communicates blessings not by constraint, but according to his sovereign will. Thus he gave being to the world, and all things therein, which was the first instance of bounty and goodness; and this not by restraint, but by his free will: 'for his pleasure they are and were created.' In like manner, whatever instances of mercy he extends to miserable creatures, acts independently and not by force. He shows mercy, because it is his pleasure to do so (Rom. ix. 18). That God is independent, let it be further considered, 1. That all things depend on his power which are any way dependent on any cause. If, therefore, all things depend on God, then it would be absurd to say that God depends on anything, for this would be to suppose the cause and effect to be mutually dependent on and derived from each other, which involves a contradiction. 2. If God be infinitely above the highest creature, he must be infinitely independent of all creatures, for dependence argues inferiority (Isa. xl. 15, 17). 3. If God depend on any creature, he does not exist necessarily; and if so, then he might not have been; for the same will by which he is supposed to exist might have determined that he should not have existed, which is altogether inconsistent with the idea of a God. From God's being independent, we infer, 1. That we ought to conclude that the creature cannot lay any obligation on him, or do anything that may tend to make him more happy than he is in himself (Rom. xi. 35; Job xxii. 2, 3). 2. If independence be a divine perfection, let it be esteemed above all others, or by any consequence, be attributed to the creature; let us conclude that all our springs are in him, and that all we enjoy and hope for is from him, who is the author and finisher of our faith, and the fountain of all our blessings." See God.

Independent Baptists. See Baptists.

Independents, a name given to certain bodies of Christians who assert that each Christian congregation is independent of all others, and from all ecclesiastical authority except its own. Some writers inaccurately use this name as synonymous with "Congregationalists," and others are thus led to consider the latter as the independent of individual character. "The churches of New England are congregational. They do not approve the name of 'Independent,' and are abhorrent of such principles of independence as would keep them from giving an account of their matters to neighboring churches, regularly demanding it of them" (Mather). See Congregationalists.

I. History.—After the reformation of religion in England, the greater body of Protestants adopted the Episcopal form of Church polity, and this was finally established as the religion of the nation. But the smaller body, the Independents, opposed episcopacy, and maintained that it too nearly resembled the Roman Catholic form of Church polity, and these so-called Nonconformists (q.v.) came to be stigmatized by the derisive name of Puritans, which the followers of Novatian had borne in the third century. To this class (i.e. Nonconformists) belong the Independents, who claim that their system is substantially the same as that of the apostolic churches, which had been corrupted by the tendencies that culminated in papacy, and that traces of dissent from the episcopal power may be found in every age back to the 4th century (see Purchas, History of Congregationalism). They are supposed to have originated in England about the year 1581, under the leadership of Robert Brown, bearing the name of Brownists (q.v.); but Richard Fitz is generally named as the first pastor of the first Independent church in England (compare 'The Life of the Rev. Charles Fox, by himself'). The persecution which they were obliged to endure from the Established Church soon necessitated the emigration of these first Independents, and they removed to the Netherlands. Deserted by Brown, who conformed, and became attached to the Church of England, they chose as their leader John Rolle, who was called the chief merit of a better organization of them. Brown, who, by the persecutions which, as a Nonconformist, he had to endure, had become greatly embittered, had, with hardly less bigotry than his persecutors, declared all other forms of Church government not only inconsistent, but denounced them in the severest terms, even... branding them as anti-christian. Robinson, however, while holding his own to be the most apostolical form, counselled recognition of all other forms and Christian fellowship, looking upon charity as the end of the commandments. The names also which they had hitherto borne, in no case accorded with that of independent, in his apology, having affirmed "Cestum quibiis particularem, esse totum, integram, et perfectam ecclesiam ex sua partibus constantem immediate et independente [quoad alias eccles. sub ipso Christo]."

In 1616, a friend and colaborer of Robinson, Henry Jacob, removed to London, and in the same year incorporated an Independent Church at London, which has oftentimes, though incorrectly, been termed "the first Independent Church in England" (compare vol. ii, p. 476). "From this, as a nucleus, Independency gradually spread through England, and, in spite of the harsh measures of Laud and the court, came, in the middle of the 17th century, to occupy a dominant place among the powers by which the destinies of England were swayed."

A prominent place was occupied by the Independents at the Westminster Assembly, they taking an active part in the debates as to the proper order of Church government; "deating all things," says Beilie, "which came within twenty miles of their quarters," and evidently astonishing the "churchmen" by their "great learning, quickness, and eloquence, together with their great courtesy and discretion in speaking." Sketches of the Westminster Assembly show that "unofficially" the representatives of the Independents, some five or six in number, "prayed to be inducted into the proposed National Church, the conditions being that the power of ordination should be reserved to their own congregations, and that they might be subject, in Church matters, to Parliament, but not to any superior authority." As they were unsuccessful in this attempt, however, it is believed that, though few in number, they yet prevented the Presbyterians from accomplishing at least their object, standing "in the breach against the advance of a new State Church, which, if better in many respects than the old national, would have been worse in other respects." But it was only after the accession of Oliver Cromwell (himself an Independent) to the protectorate that the Independents gained the ascendancy, and became "the most powerful and important part of the commonwealth of God in England, life of Samuel Rutherford, chap. viii.). The greatest statesmen of England were Independents; the army was Independent in the main; and Independent ministers held appointments as chaplains, or filled leading positions in the universities; among them, most prominently, William Sydney and Godfrey."

"In the course of time these synods were strengthened among themselves, an Assembly was decided to be held at the Savoy. Ministers and deacons of more than a hundred congregations thereupon convened, Sept. 29, 1658, and on Oct. 12 (a few weeks before Oliver Cromwell's death) they adopted and issued a confession of faith and discipline, which was named a "Declaration." Of this declaration the following were fundamental propositions: "A particular Church consists of officers and members: the Lord Christ having given to his called ones—united in Church order—liberty and power to choose persons fitted by the Holy Ghost, and elected in their stead by the Lord, appointed by Christ to be chosen and set apart by the Church are pastors, teachers, elders, and deacons. The way appointed by Christ for the calling of any person unto the office of pastor, teacher, or elder in a church is that he be chosen thereunto by the consistory or session of the Church itself, and solemnly set apart by fasting and prayer, with the imposition of hands of the eldership of that Church, if there be any before constituted therein; and of a deacon, that he be chosen by the like suffrage, and set apart by prayer, and the like imposition; and these offices being thus constitut like other nonconforming "sects," suffered from illiberal enactments, especially from the "Act of Uniformity," which was passed in 1662. "Independents" was a term used to describe these religious groups. The Act of Uniformity, however, was the most severe of all enactments against dissenters. Some 2000 of the ablest and best of England's clergy were forced to leave the Church. They included Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, and not a few whom it would be difficult to reduce entirely under any of those denominations; both Calvinists and Arminians, with other divines scarcely belonging to either of those schools. In point of learning, eloquence, reasoning, and imagination, they are the most remarkable of the dissenting bodies. They have been so great that they have become the largest dissenting body in England except the Wesleyan Methodists. In 1831 a "Congregational Union of England and Wales" was formed, and their "Declaration of Faith, Order, and Discipline" was adopted in 1833. According to the report of 1860, the number of their churches in England, Ireland, and Wales, is given at 4726, of which 294 were vacant. The sittings provide for 1,563,919 persons. The Independents, who have always evinced great interest in education, at present control 61 colleges and training colleges, with a staff of twenty-six professors.

II. Doctrines.—"In support of their scheme of Congregational churches, the Independents observe that the word εὐκαστία, which we translate 'church,' is always used in the New Testament in a significant and distinctive sense, and not in the ordinary language, or the place where a single congregation meets. Thus that unlawful assembly at Ephesus, brought together against Paul by the craftsmen, is called ἐκκλησία, a church (Acts xix, 32, 39, 41). The word, however, is generally applied to a more sacred use, but still it signifies either the body assembling, or the place in which it assembles. The whole body of the disciples at Corinth is called the Church, and spoken of as coming together into one place (1 Cor., iv, 23). The place into which they came together we find likewise called a church: 'When ye come together into one place, Paul said, do not eat beforehand' (1 Cor., x, 29). But there were more congregations than one, there were likewise more churches than one. Thus, 'Let your women keep silence in the churches, iv τὰς ἐκκλησίας (1 Cor., xiv, 34). The whole nation of Israel is indeed called a church, but it was no more than a single congregation, for it had but one place of public worship, namely, first the tabernacle, and afterwards the temple. The catholic Church of Christ, his holy nation and kingdom, is likewise a single congregation, having one place of worship, that is, heaven, where all the members assemble by faith and hold communion; and in which, when they shall all be fully gathered together, they will in fact be one glorious assembly. Accordingly we find it called 'the general assembly and church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven.' Besides these, the Independent can find no other distinction of a church from the Testament, except that of the outward assembly or presbytery consisting of several congregations, all subject to one jurisdiction. The number of disciples in Jerusalem was certainly great before they were dispersed by the persecution in which Paul bore so active a part. Yet they are never mentioned as forming distinct assemblies, but assembling in two's and three's, elders in one place—sometimes in the Temple, sometimes in Solomon's porch, and sometimes in an upper room. After the dispersion, the disciples who fled from Jerusalem, as they could no longer assemble in one place, are never called a Church by themselves, or one church, but the churches of Judea, Samaria, and Galilee (Acts ix, 31; Gal. i, 22). Hence the Independent concludes that in Jerusalem the words church and congregation were of the same import; and if such was the case, the phrase 'called by of his own accord,' was not intended, but this means we may reasonably expect to find it so in other places. Thus, when Paul, on his journey, calls the elders of the Church of Ephesus to Miletus, he speaks to them as the joint overseers of a single congregation: 'Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers,' (Acts xx, 28). Had the Church at Ephesus consisted of different congregations, united under such a jurisdiction as that of a modern presbytery, it would have been natural to say, 'Take heed to yourselves, and to the flocks over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers of such.' But this is a way of speaking of which the Independent finds no instance in the whole of the New Testament.

The sacred writers, when speaking of all the Christians in a nation or province, never call them the Church of such a nation or province, but 'the church of Galatia' (Gal. i, 2), 'the sheep of Christ's pasture' (1 Cor. ii, 2), 'the church of Asia' (1 Cor. xvi, 19). On the other hand, when speaking of the disciples in a city or town who might ordain or assemble in one place, they uniformly call them a Church as, 'the Church of Antioch,' 'the Church at Corinth,' 'the Church of Ephesus,' and the like.

In each of these churches or congregations there were bishops, sometimes called 'elders,' and deacons; and in every church there seems to have been more than one elder, and in some a great many, 'who all labored in word and doctrine.' Thus we read (Acts xvi, 20) of Paul and Barnabas ordaining elders to be bishops and deacons in every church; and (Acts xx, 17) of a company of elders in the Church of Ephesus, who were exhorted to 'feed the flock,' and to take heed to themselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers of such.

But this is a finding in modern Presbyterian churches, wherein neither teacher nor are fit to teach, the Independent finds no vestige in the Scriptures, nor in the earliest uninspired writers of the Christian Church. The rule or government of this presbytery or eldership in a church is not their own, but Christ's. They are not, 'guardians of the heritage, nor can they pretend to power over the churches than the apostles possessed. But when the administration of the apostles in the Church of Jerusalem, and other churches where they acted as elders, is inquired into by an Independent, it does not appear to him that this is the case. He did not go to God's Church without the consent of the multitude; nay, it seems they thought it necessary to judge and determine in discipline, in presence of the whole Church (Acts vi, 1-6; xvi, 22; 1 Cor. v, 3, 4, 5).

Excommunication and absolution were in the power of the Church at Corinth, and not of the elders as distinguished from the congregation (1 Cor. v, 2; 2 Cor. xi). The apostle, indeed, speaks of his delivering some unto Satan (1 Tim. i, 20); but it is by no means clear that he did it by himself, and not after the manner pointed out in 1 Cor. v, 4, 5; even as it does not appear from his saying the same in the epistle, 'that the gift was given unto Timothy by putting on of his hands,' that this was not done in the presbytery of a Church, as in the other epistle we find it actually was.

The trying and judging of false apostles was a matter of the first importance, but it was done by the elders of the Church, not by the apostles. They conformed to the public churches, not to the private ones.

The power of binding and loosing, or the power of the keys, as it has been called, was by our Saviour conferred, not upon a particular order of disciples, but upon the church of the whole world (Matt. xvi, 19; etc.); and that whole flock did, in the days of Ignatius, all partake of the Lord's Supper, and pray together in one place. Even the power of binding and loosing, or the power of the keys, as it has been called, was by our Saviour conferred, not upon a particular order of disciples, but upon the church of the whole world (Matt. xvi, 19; etc.).

As to the statement that 'in every place where we have been two or three, God is in the middle' (Matt. xvii, 20), it is certainly not to be applied to the office of a bishop or pope. The phrase is spoken by Christ not to the church as a whole, but to the disciples who persevered in prayer and fasting, and were instructed by the Holy Spirit to perform miracles (Acts x, 38). Thus, when Paul, on his journey, calls the elders of the Church of Ephesus to Miletus, he speaks to them as the joint overseers of a single congregation: 'Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers,' (Acts xx, 28). Had the Church at Ephesus consisted of different congregations, united under such a jurisdiction as that of a modern presbytery, it would have been natural to say, 'Take heed to yourselves, and to the flocks over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers of such.' But this is a way of speaking of which the Independent finds no instance in the whole of the New Testament.

the most holy people on earth, yet, if he answer not the New-Testament description of a minister, he is not call ed to that office, and is no minister of Christ, but is indeed running unseen. No form of ordination can pretend to such clear foundation in the New-Testament as the description of the person who should be elders of the Church; and the laying on of hands is of small importance in the mission of a minister of Christ; for now, when the power of miracles has ceased, it is obvious that such a rite, by whomever performed, can only be a special form of ordinary or express work. Indeed, it appears to have been sometimes used, even in the apostolic age, without any such intention. When Paul and Barnabas were separated to the particular employment of going out to the Gentiles, the prophets and teachers at Antioch 'prayed, and laid their hands on them.' But did this ceremony confer upon them, or any new power or authority to act as ministers of Christ? Did the imposition of hands make those shining lights of the Gospel one whist better qualified than they were before to convert and baptize the nations, to feed the flock of God, to teach, rebuke, or exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine? In answer, it cannot be pretended that there was any special virtue in this ceremony. Paul and Barnabas had undoubtedly received the Holy Ghost before they came to Antioch; and, as they were apostles, they were of course authorized to discharge all the functions of the inferior and ordinary ministers of the Gospel. God never provided, however, the imposition of hands appears to have been a mark of recognition of the parties as qualified for the work to which they were appointed, so Independents usually impose the hands of the bishops with the same intent. In a word, whoever in his life and conversation is conformable to the character which the inspired writers give of a bishop, and is likewise qualified by his 'rightness in the Scripture' to discharge the duties of that office, is fully authorized to administer the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, to teach, and exhort, and rebuke, with all long-suffering and doctrine. And has all the call and mission which the Lord now gives to any man; while he who wants the qualifications mentioned has not God's call, whatever he may have, nor any authority to preach the Gospel of Christ, or to dispense the ordinances of his religion. From this view of the Independent and patristic method, it is evident that the whole of their own writers, it appears that, according to them, even the election of a congregation conveys upon the individual whom they may choose for their pastor no new powers, but only creates a new relation between him and a particular flock, giving him an influence, and a right, either personal or in conjunction with other pastors constituted in the same manner, to exercise among them that authority which he derives immediately from Christ, and which, in a greater or less degree, is possessed by every sincere Christian according to his gifts and abilities' (Encyclop. Bibr. xii, 370-372).

III. Scottish, or New Independents.—In Scotland Independence originated with John Glash (q. v.). The Baptists there, as elsewhere, are Independents. The regular Congregationalists are also numerous. See Congregationalists. Apart from these, there is a body called 'New Independents.' 'In December, 1727, Robert Haldane (q. v.) formed a Society for Propagating the Gospel at Home.' The object of this society was to send forth men to preach the Gospel in those parts of Scotland where they conceived that this blessing was not enjoyed in its purity, or where it was not regularly dispensed. Admitting that it is the Christian who knows the Gospel, and is duly qualified, to preach it to his fellow-sinners, James Haldane, brother of Robert, Mr. Aikman, and others, travelled through the greater part of Scotland, and preached. In a short time the Messrs. Haldane separated from the Church of Scotland, and were joined by other ministers of the National Church, Innes and Ewing, resigned their charges, and united with the Haldanes and their associates. A dis-

\[\text{distinct society was soon formed, at the head of which were the Haldanes; and hence its members have been also called Haldinists, or Haldinists Independents. Large places of public worship, denominational Tabernacles, were erected in Edinburgh, Haddington, and other principal towns, where the Word of God was declared to numerous assemblies, both by these ministers and others from various denominations in England. At the expense chiefly, if not solely, of Robert Haldane, academies were also formed at Edinburgh, Dundee, and Glasgow, for the edification of the young, from the 11th to the 18th century, who, when deemed qualified for preaching the Gospel, were to be employed as itinerants, under the inspection and countenance of the 'Society for Propagating the Gospel at Home.' Thus a succession of teachers was secured.}\]

\[\text{The doctrines of the Scottish Independents are Calvinistic, and weighing against articles of faith of human composition. They say that the Scriptures are a divine and infallible standard, and that consistent Independents dare not adopt any other. They insist that the Scriptures contain a full and complete model and system of doctrine, government, discipline, and worship, and that in them may we find a universal rule for the direction of Christians in their associated state, as well as all necessary instructions for the faith and practice of individuals. They require Scripture for everything, even for such things as could not be contained in Scripture. For this, they reject the authority of the civil magistrate in matters of religion, and respect the Scripture and nothing else, as binding in the worship of God. They conceive the Church of Christ, as exhibited in Scripture, to be an association which has no head on earth, and which, as a body, can receive no laws from any one, except from Christ alone. But this National Church as 'the very essence of Antichrist.' They lay it down as a fundamental principle that a Christian Church ought to consist of believers, or of those who give evidence of their knowing and believing the Gospel, united together on the profession of its truths, except from Christ alone.}\]

\[\text{As to Church government, they believe that the apositolic churches, according to the model of which it is their great and professed object to conform, were entirely independent of each other. Therefore, they have no connection with any ecclesiastical or civil authority, but one from the more early Independents in admitting Christians of all religious denominations to communicate with them in the Lord's Supper, provided they have reason to think them real Christians, and in considering all association of ministers, for giving council and advice to the church in matters of doubt, as unnecessary and unscriptural.}\]

\[\text{According to them, when the word Church in Scripture, in its religious sense, does not denote a single congregation of saints, it always refers to the whole body or kingdom of Christ, part of which is in heaven and part on earth; which body does not constitute two churches, a visible and invisible, but one church or family, consisting of different parts. They admit that all churches, that is, congregations, are con-
they are appointed. They insist that ordination is not represented in Scripture as conferring an office, or giving any person a right to discharge that office; it is only the manner of setting him apart to discharge the duties of his office. It gives him no jurisdiction in any church except in that which appointed him; and as soon as he lays down, or is removed from his office in that church, his jurisdiction ceases. They say there is a distinction of departments in the pastoral office, and that teaching and ruling are different branches of that office. Both elders and deacons are ordained by imposition of hands; and though ordination is part of the elder’s province, yet, when churches are newly formed, or when new elders are wanted, they are chosen by the members, who have always the right of election, may ordain church officers for themselves, or, at least, set them apart to their respective offices.

"In worship, the New Independents do not differ much from other non-liturgical churches. They read a large but indefinite portion of the Scriptures at each meeting; in many of their chapels they use Dr. Watts’s version of the Psalms; and in most of them they stand while singing. They adopt weekly communions; and, as they make no real distinction between clergy and laity, their elders and deacons, on an occasional occasion, in any of their chapels, is not thought a sufficient reason for preventing the administration of the holy communion on the first day of the week. They contend, that, by the approved practice of apostolic churches, it is demonstrated to be the appointment of Christ himself, and therefore observable of the highest importance, to Supper the Lord’s Supper on every first day of the week. A division has taken place among these Independents, chiefly in consequence of the adoption of Baptist principles, and the introduction of Church discipline, and of mutual exhortation and prayer by the brethren, into the public service on Sunday mornings."

See Haldane, View of Social Worship; Adams, Religious World, ii, 200 sq.; Robinson, Theological Dictionary, s. v.; Kinneburn, Historical Survey of Congregationalism in Scotland; and the articles Haldane; Congregationalists. Some of the Scotch Independents have embraced the Moravian doctrine. See Moravians.

Index, the name given to certain catalogues of books and authors either wholly prohibited, or censored and corrected, by the Romish Church. An Index of the former kind is called Index Librorum Prohibitorum of the latter, Index Exsurgatorius. An Index Prohibitorum exists also in the Russo-Greek Church, to which, no doubt, is due the weakness of the Russian literary productions on theological subjects.

1. Before the Reformation. — Prohibitions of heretical or dangerous books are as old as the attempts of the popes to usurp universal supremacy. In fact, such prohibitions flow naturally from the theory that "out of the Church there is no salvation." It was Cyprian (q. v.) who first fully stated this theory; and even in his hands it logically led to the conclusion that all heretical opinions (c. such as differ from those announced by the Church authorities) must be punished and suppressed, if possible. As the claims of the hierarchy grew in magnitude, it became necessary to put down all doctrines that might diminish the power of the priesthood. To do this was a proof of zeal. This zeal was at first directed against heathen and Jewish writings, as it was feared that the reading of such might even endanger Christianity. The Council of Carthage (A.D. 400) forbade in Can. 16 the reading of heathen books. The Church, however, did not remain satisfied with forbidding heretical books, it commanded them to be burned. This was first attempted by Decrees of the Synod of Sardis (813 C.E.) which directed that all that circulated forbidden books should be anathema (libelli famosi). It even came to be held that any one who had read a forbidden book was guilty of all the heresies therein contained, and incapacitated for readmission into the Church until the performance of such penance as the Church enjoined. Especially did the hierarchy consider the reading of translations of the Bible as dangerous for the laity. Thus Gregory VII (1080) denounced the practice of reading the Bible in the vernacular in his letter to the king Wratislav of Bohemia and Emperor Henry IV (SS. Cong. 12, Collectio, xx, 296). Innocent III. it is true, said (see his Epistola lll. xii, in lib. ii, ep. cxii, p. 1199) that the searching of the Scripture is to be commended, not forbidden; but added: "Tanta est divinae Scripturae profunditas ut non solum simelips et illicitari, sed etiam annis et annis potentiores, quibus alii gentes indagandam. Ut recte fuit olim in lege divina statutum, ut bestia, que montem tetigerit, lapide tur; ne videlet simplex aliquis et indocutus presumat ad substantiam Scripturae sacre pertingere vel etiam aliis predicante." But the opposition to the papacy and its aims, to which the Roman Church had so persistently adhered, and to which the latter among the forbidden books, on a level with those condemned as heretical. The Conc. Tolosanum (1229) forbade the laity (c. 14) to even possess the O. or N. T. (see Hегегмау, Gesch. des Bibelwerks, Ulm. 1786). When the Inquisition became established and prosperous, the enforcing of the rules relating to forbidden books was intrusted to it, and in the Conc. Biburiense (1246) we find (c. 36) a number of theological works mentioned which both the laity and clergy are forbidden the reading of (theo). And in 1247, the Church established its position secure by such means, the more did influences quite to the contrary exert themselves to secure its overthrow, particularly the precursors of the Reformation, whose doctrines and writings struck at the most vital parts of the Romish organization. A Synod of London (1408) forbade the reading of Wycliffe’s works when not previously approved, while the works of Huss were condemned as thoroughly heretical. The discovery of the art of printing gave a new impulse to the publication of dangerous books, and Alexander VI complained in his Decretum de libris non sine censorshipe sensibus imputatis (Raynal, Annali, a. 1511, no. 56) that heretical dogmas were extensively promulgated, especially in the provinces of Mayence, Cologne, Triebst, and Magdeburg. He recommended the bishops and vicars to carefully watch the appearance of any heretical works, and Parliament in 1524, enacted that the printers should be examined by the authorities. As to the printers, he says: “Debent—ipsi merito compesci opportunis remedii, ut ab eorum impressione desinitant, quae fidei catholicae contraria fore nocentur vel adversa, aut in mentibus fideliissimum possum verisimili sermoni sceaudum generare.” Pope Leo X, in the tenth session of the Lateran Council (May 4, 1114), stated in the decree Inter sollicitudines that no book should be published without the authorization of either the bishop, his legate, or the Inquisition, under penalty of excommunication. Any book issued in contravention of this regulation was to be sequestered and burned.

Trent.—The Reformation gave rise to innumerable writings highly dangerous to the Roman Church, and, in spite of all orders to the contrary, they were widely circulated and eagerly read. INDIA

The Congregation of the Index was originally established by pope Pius V. It holds its sitting at Rome, and has the general and exclusive power of examining books against which concern faith, morals, ecclesiastical discipline, or civil society; on which it passes judgment, for suppressing them absolutely, or directing them to be corrected, or allowing them to be read with precaution, and by certain persons. Persons specially deputed by it may give permission to read or use books, and those the Romanists in their world to read prohibited books; and the penalty denounced against those who read or keep any books suspected of heresy or false doctrine is the greater excommunication; and those who read or keep works interdicted by any decree, or who use the said books, are legally committed, and to be severely punished at the will of the bishop. It is remarkable, however, that the Index is hardly in force at the present day, even in the most Romish-inclined countries. In Austria even, the faithful daughter of Rome, Maria Theresa forbade the publication of all books by which the Romish Church and the House of Austria are esteemed, the bishops, or printers of such works. If any person import foreign books into any city, they shall be obliged to announce them to the deputies; or if this kind of merchandise be exposed to sale in any public place, the public officers of the place shall signify to the said deputies that books have been brought in. They shall have the right to examine, to read, or sell any book which has or any other person has brought into the city, until he has given permission to sell the same in the city. Booksellers, or booksellers, or such persons as aredeemers of books, shall be frequently visited by persons deputed by the bishop, and the booksellers shall have the right to be assured that nothing that is prohibited may be sold, printed, or published, or that no books of the deceased, nor in any way transferred to them, until they have presented a catalogue of their books, and obtained the permission of the bishop to publish or sell it. The booksellers or others shall be bound to observe the same rules, if they deem it necessary for the good of the kingdom, or province, or diocese. And let the secretaries of these fathers, according to the command of the holy father, transmit to the bishop, or the notary of the general inquisitor the names of the books that have been corrected, as well as of the persons to whom the fathers have granted the power of examination. Finally, it is enjoined on all the faithful, that no one person shall read or keep any book, unless permitted by these rules, or prohibited by this index. But if any one read or keep any books composed by heretics, or the writings of any person suspected of heresy, he shall instantly incur the sentence of excommunication; and those who read or keep works interdicted on another account, or those who read any book, or the morial sin, shall be severally punished at the will of the bishops” (Labbel SS. Consilia, 618).

This Index of Pius IV was established at Rome by Aldus Manutius (1564), and afterwards revised and enlarged by Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, Clement VIII (1595).

2. INDEX EXPRSERATORIUM.—Pope Sixtus V introduced a series of works which, after expurgating certain obvious passages, could be allowed to be read. This list received the name of Index librorum expurgando-rum or expurgatoriurn. It was first published by order of the duke Alba, under the style Index expurgatorum librorum, qui huc secuto prodererunt (Antwerp, 1571, and republished in 1588). It was corrected by the fathers, on the model of that of Rome, were, however published in other countries, especially in Spain (most of them under Philip II in Madrid, in 1577 and 1584) and in Italy. John Maria Brachiselli and Brachiselli (properly Wenzel of Bresciglia) prepared, with the aid of the pope, a Latin version of the Index (Milan, 1648), which is highly praised for its completeness. The Romish Index was republished in 1818, but has since received, and is constantly receiving, numerous additions.

In'dia (Heb. Hokdhu, הוקד, for "הוקד", i.e. "Hindu", of Sanscrit origin; see Gesenius, Thesaur. Heb. p. 366; Sept. "Hokidh", Vulg. "Indius"), occurs in the Bible only in Esther i. 1; viii, 9, where the Persian king is described as reigning "from India unto Ethiopia, over seven and seven other provinces" (see Herodotus, History, iii. 111, 119). The name is, however, applied by the Greeks to all countries of Asia which were discovered by the Persians (see Herodotus, i. 110), and is used in the Bible to designate the whole of foreign lands. It is found against, however, in the Apocrypha (compare Esther xiii. 1, where India is mentioned among the countries which the Romans took from Antiochus and gave to Eumenes (1 Macc. viii. 8). It is also with some reason conceived that in the list of foreign lands present at the Pentecost (Acts ii. 9) we should read "India, Indiu, and not "Iuvemia, Judea; but the still more probable reading is "Iwemia, Indeum, if indeed the common reading ought to be changed at all (see Kuenin, Comment. on Luke, ii. 8, 9, etc., and loc. cit. The Hebrew form "India" is the abbreviation of "India", which is identical with the Indological name of the river Indus, "Hindu", or "Sindhu", and again with the ancient name of the country as it appears in the Veddita, "Hapta Hendu." The native form "Sindus" is noticed by Pliny (vi, 25). The name, however, is also applied in the inscriptions of Persepolis and Nakhsh-i-Rustam, but not in those of Behistun (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 485). In 1 Macc. viii. 8, it is clear that India proper cannot be understood, inasmuch as this never belonged either to Antiochus or Eumenes. At the same time, none of the explanations offered by commentators are satisfactory: the Eneiti of Paphlagonia have been suggested, but these people had disappeared long before (Strabo, xiii, 534): the India of Xenophon (Cyr. op. i. 5, 3; ii. 22), which may have been above the Carian straits, is but a shadow of the Cilician India, and is more likely; but the emeniation "Mysia and Ionia" for Indica and India offers the best solution of the difficulty. See IONIA. A more authentic notice of the country occurs in 1 Macro. vi, 37, where Indians are noticed as the drivers of the war-elephants introduced into the kingdom of the Bythinian king (see also 1 Eadras iii, 2; Esther xxvi, 1). See ELEPHANT.

But, though the name of India occurs so seldom, the people and productions of that country must have been tolerably well known to the Jews. There is undoubted evidence that an active trade was carried on between India and Western Asia; the Tyrians enabled their depôts on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and procured "horns of ivory and ebony," "bristered work and rich apparel" (Ezek. xxvii, 15, 24), by a route which crossed the Arabian desert by land, and then followed the coasts of the Indian Ocean by sea. The trade opened by Solomon with Cinerre through the Red Sea coast consisted of Indian articles, and some of the names even of the articles, algumimim, "sandal wood," kophim, "apes," tukkikim, "peacocks," are of Indian origin (Humboldt, Koosmos, ii, 135); to which we may add the Hebrew name of the "topaz," pitédah, derived from the Sanscrit pita. There is a strong probability that productions of yet greater utility were furnished by India through Syria to the shores of Europe, and that the Greeks derived both the term καυσιτερός (compare the Sanscrit kastita), and the article it represents, "tin," from the coasts of India. The connection thus established with India, which in the days of the Mohammedan invasions, under the ethnological title of Cush (Gen. x, 6), and hence the Syrians, Chaldeans, and Arabic versions frequently render that term by India or Indians, as in 2 Chron. xxvi, 16; Isa. xi, 11; xviii, 1; Jer. xii, 23; Zeph. iii, 10. For exterminating the which some have sought to establish between India and Paradise, see EDEN.

The above intimations, and, indeed, all ancient history, refer not to the whole of Hindostan, but chiefly to the northern parts of it, or the countries between the Indus and the Ganges; although it is not necessary to assert that the rest of that peninsula, particularly its western coast, was at that time altogether unknown. It was from this quarter that the Persians and Greeks (to whom we are indebted for the earliest accounts of India) invaded the country: and this was consequently the region which first became generally known. The countries bordering on the Ganges continued to be involved in obscurity, the great kingdom of the Prasians excepted, which, situated nearly above the modern Bengal, was dimly discernible. The nearer we approach the Indus, the more clear becomes our knowledge of the ancient geography of the country; and it follows that the districts of which at the present day we know the least, were anciently best known. Besides, the western and northern boundaries were not the same as at present. To the west, India was not then bounded by the river Indus, but by a chain of mountains which, under the name of Koh (whence the Grecian appellation of the Indian Cauca- sus), extended from Bactria to Makran, or Gedrosia, inclosing the kingdoms of Candahar and Cabul, the modern kingdom of Eastern Persia, or Afghanistan. These districts anciently formed part of India, as well as, further to the south, the less perfectly known countries of the Arabi and Haurus (the Arabitae and Oriete of Arrian, vi, 21), of which the modern Kohistan. The geographical boundary continued at all times the same, and was removed to the Indus only in consequence of the victories of Nadir Shah. Towards the north, ancient India overpassed not less its present limit. It comprehended the whole of the mountainous region above Cashmir, Badakshan, Belor Land, the western boundary mountains of Little Bucharia, or Little Tibet, and even the desert of Cohi, so far as it was known. INDIA, MODERN. The name is sometimes used of the two peninsulas west and east of the Ganges combined, to which even occasionally the Indian Archipelago is added; but, more commonly, it is applied either to the peninsula west of the Ganges (East India), or to the aggregate possessions of the British crown, including the royalty of India, or the Indian Empire. The present form of government of the Indian Empire is established by the Act 21 and 22 Victoria, cap. 106, called an Act for the better Government of India, sanctioned Aug. 2, 1858. Under the terms of this act, all the territories heretofore under the government of the East India Company are vested in the crown, and all its powers are exercised in her name; all territorial and other revenues, and all tributes and other payments, are likewise received in her name, and disposed of for the purposes of the government of India alone, subject to the provisions of this act. One of the queen's principal secretaries of state, called the Secretary of State for India, is invested with all the powers hitherto exercised by the company or by the Board of Control. The executive authority in India is vested in a governor general or viceroy, appointed by the crown, and acting under the orders of the Secretary of State for India. The governor general has power to make laws and regulations for all persons, whether British or native, or foreigners or others, within the Indian territories under the dominion of the queen, and for all servants of the government of India within the dominions of the East India Company. The Secretary of State for India is aided in the administration by a council of fifteen members, of whom seven are elected by the Court of Directors from their own body, and eight are nominated by the crown. The duties of the council of state are, under the direction of the secretary of state, to conduct the business transacted in the united kingdom in relation to the government of and the correspondence with India.

There has never been a regular census of the whole of India under British administration, but enumerations, more or less trustworthy, were made in the north-west.
em and in the central provinces in the years 1865 and 1866. The census of the north-west provinces, taken Jan. 10, 1865, showed that this division of India had increased in prosperity within the decennial period 1856-1866, as reckoned by the number of houses and extension of cultivation. There were found to be 4,71 persons per square mile in 1866, a number of what is called family dwelling. The census further showed that there were 42 millions of Mussulmans in the north-west provinces, or about one seventh of the total population, the other six sevenths being Hindus of the four chief castes; namely, Brahmins, 70 subdivisions; Kshatriyas, 173 subdivisions; Suddras, 360 subdivisions. The Suddras were found to form the great bulk of the Hindus, being 18,594,309 in number; the Vaishyas numbered 1,091,250; the Kshatriyas, 2,827,768; and the Brahmins, 3,451,892. The census of the central provinces, taken in 1866, showed that their population consisted of 6,864,770 Hindus, 1,953,668 Gonds and aboriginal tribes, 237,962 Mussulmans, 602 Europeans and Eurasians, and 90 Parsees. The number of Mussulmans was much lower than had been expected. All the enumerations showed a high proportion of children to adults. Thus, while the percentage of children under 14 years of age was 29 in England, and 23 in India, it was only 13 in India as high as 55. Among the reasons to account for such a result are the custom of polygamy, and, in particular, the desire of the Hindus to have more male issue, which induces them to marry as many wives as they can. There was 29 in England, and 30 in India, of married women. The religious statistics of the four largest cities were, according to the enumeration of 1881: Calcutta, total population, exclusive of Howrah, 684,638; of whom 62 per cent, were Hindu, 322 Mohammedans, 4,4 Christians. About 29,000 were Europeans, and 29,000 Eurasians. In Madras the population was 2,38,000, with a proportion of 773,196, of whom less than 13,000 were British born. Lucknow had a population of 284,779. There is also a considerable admixture of Parsees and Indo-Europeans, or, as they are now usually styled, Eurasians, i.e. of mixed blood. Leaving out of account the native states, the following is given as the relative proportion of creeds and races in India: Hindus, 110,000,000; Mussulmans, 25,000,000; aborigines or non-Aryans, 12,000,000; Bullahists, 3,000,000; Asiatic Christians, 1,100,000. The English population amounted, according to the census of 1861, to 1,155,980.

Christianity became known in India at an early period. There is an old tradition that one of the twelve apostles, St. Thomas, preached the Gospel to the people of India, but the tradition is not supported by any proofs. Cosmas Indicopleustes, who visited the country in the 6th century, found a large number of Christian congregations, with a bishop who was ordained in Persia. In consequence of this connection with Persia, the Christians of India, who, after the reputed founder of the Indian Church, were called Christians of St. Thomas, were drawn into the Nestorian movement, and subsequently received their bishop from the head of the Nestorian Church. Their territory extended from the southern point of the peninsula of Malabar as far as a few miles south of Calicut, and from the deities of the Ghats as far as the sea. An Armenian or Syrian merchant, Thomas Canna, rearranged in the 9th century the ecclesiastical and political administration of these Churches, through his efforts they obtained from the kings of Malabar important privileges; in particular, an exempt jurisdiction in all except criminal cases. Their rank was equal to that of the nobility of Malabar, and they were in great demand for offices for the Hindu princes. This finally led them to attempt the establishment of a kingdom of their own, which was, however, of but short duration. After that their position was less favorable, and the Portuguese, who in 1498 landed, under Vasco de Gama, in the port of Calicut, were consequently regarded by them as their liberators. The first Portuguese missionaries were Franciscan monks, who were introduced in 1500 by Cabral. Dominican monks landed in 1503 with the two Albuquequeques, but they confined themselves to a few convents, while the Franciscans were for about forty years the only Christian missionaries. It was, in particular, P. Antonio de Porto who in 1555 established on the island of Sebastia a convent of the first Roman Catholic bishop for India was established at Goa; the first bishop, Albuquerque, was a Franciscan monk. But, although the convents of the Franciscans were so numerous that they constituted two provinces of the order, they soon ceased to make notable efforts for the propagation of the faith. The missionary field was wholly to the new order of the Jesuits, who made their first appearance in India in 1542. Their number increased very rapidly, and soon they had in all the Portuguese colonies of India houses and colleges, which were divided into the two provinces of Goa and Cochin. Their success at first was very slow, but when the Portuguese viceroy Constantine de Braganza banished some of the most prominent Brahmins, the Jesuits in 1550 succeeded in baptizing nearly 18,000 persons in that city. In 1579 several Jesuits were called to the court of the great mogul, Akbar, who for a time showered gifts and favors upon them. Subsequently, however, he conceived the plan of founding a new religion himself, and the Jesuit mission, which at first promised grand results, was confined to the establishment of a few congregations in the empire of the Moguls. The Jesuits were not successful in their endeavors to unite the Christians of St. Thomas with the Roman Catholic Church. This union was accomplished in 1595, at the Synod of Drexner, by the archbishop of Goa, Alexius Menezes. The bishopric of Goa had in 1557 been made an archbishopric, with two suffragans, that of Cochim and Malacca. In 1606, Meliapur was added. The Christians of St. Thomas received, in 1601, an episcopal see at Angamala, which in 1601 was raised to the archbishopric of Cranganor. The right of patronage over the ecclesiastical benefices was left to the king of Portugal, as he had to defray most of the expenses for the support of the churches and missionaries. A new impulse was given to the missions when, in 1606, the Jesuit P. Robert de Nobili, at Madura, conceived the novel plan of introducing Christianity by accommodating his mode of life entirely to the Indian customs. He called himself a Roman sannyasi, i.e. one who renounced everything, lived after the manner of the Brahmins, clothed his preaching of the Gospel in Indian figures of speech, and even retained among the new converts the difference of caste, allowing the converts to wear certain badges indicative of their caste. He encountered a. strong opposition, even among the members of his order, and a violent controversy began, which, after thirteen years, was decided by pope Gregory XV in favor of P. de Nobili, and the converts were permitted to wear the badges. After this the Roman Catholic Church made numerous converts. According to statements of the Indian Christians, P. de Nobili is said to have baptized about 100,000 persons belonging to all castes. The separation was carried through even with regard to churches and missionaries; the missionaryries of the Brahmins being called Sannyasi, those of the Pashi, Paululama. The successors of Nobili, who were supported by the Pope through the Church, prolonged the conquest and the missions to the other parts of the empire, so that the number of Christians increased. The Jesuits also lived and worked in the missions and developed the system, but became consequently involved in new controversies, especially with the Capuchins (controversy of accommodation), which, in 1704, by cardinal Tournon, who had been commissioned to examine the subject, and again by pope Benedict XIV in 1744, by the bull "Cum solemnissimis", was decided against the Jesuits. These decisions not only put an end to the conversions, but the majority of the Indians who had been gained by the accommodation theories of the Jesuits again returned to their native religion. The suppression of the order of the Jesuits still more injured the Roman Catholic missions, which, moreover, suffered severely from the wars of Tippu Sahib. Long before this time the Jesuits had lost their missions among the Christians of St. Thomas, who in 1638 left the communion of Rome, and those in the vicinity of Cochin, as the Dutch from 1660 to 1663 had conquered nearly all the Portuguese possessions on the coast. In 1698, the first group of the Jesuits at St. Thomas were, however, a second time prevailed upon to unite with Rome by Italian Carmelites; and in 1698, through the mediation of the emperor Leopold I, one bishop and twelve missionaries of this order received permission to settle on the coast of Malabar. But this protection afforded the Jesuits, however, a proper haven of refuge for various kinds of commerce between the Portuguese government, bishop, and missionaries and the Italians, as Portugal declined to forego its right of patronage, although it was neither able nor willing to exercise it. In 1888, Gregory XVI, by the bull "Multa praecedit," abolished the former papal constitutions for the Church of India, and assigned to the several vicars apostolic their dioceses. The sees of Cranganor, Cochin, and Mellappor (St. Thomas) were suppressed.

The bishopric of Meliapour was transferred to the vicariate apostolic of Madras; the territory of the two other bishopsric to the vicariate of Malabar, which had been erected 1636 for the Portuguese Carmelites and the see of which is now at Verapoly. To it were also assigned the United Christians of St. Thomas, a population of about 200,000, with 330 priests and 160 ministers. The Portuguese of Goa now tried to make a similar submission of Goa, Joao da Torre, who had been consecrated in 1843, ordained, immediately after his arrival in Goa in 1844, no less than 800 priests, chiefly men without any education, and sent them into the territories of the vicar apostolic. They succeeded in obtaining control of a majority of the churches and jurisdiction of about 240,000 souls. A letter from pope Gregory XVI to the archbishop remained without effect.

In 1848 Portugal consented to the transfer of the archbishopric from Goa to Portugal, where he became coadjutor of the archbishop of Braga. But the bishop of Macao continued to perform episcopal functions in the dioceses of the vicar apostolic, denounced the latter, deposed the letters of the pope, and at Goa within seven days ordained 586 priests. When Pius IX threatened the bishop of Macao with ecclesiastical censures, the Portuguese chambers complained to the pope of Rome so severely that the papal nuncio withdrew the point of leaving the country. New negotiations between Rome and Portugal led, however, in 1859, to another compromise, and the opposition of the Portuguese priests in British India to the vicars apostolic appears to have died out. From the vicariate apostolic for Agra and Tibet, which was established in 1808, the vicariate of Patna was separated in 1845. Both vicariates are administered by missionaries of the Capuchin order. The French vicariate of Pondicherry was established in 1770; from it three new vicariates were formed in 1846, namely, Mysore, Coimbatore, and Madura; the two former under priests of the Paris Seminary of Foreign Missions, and the latter under the Jesuits, who in 1856 reoccupied this former field of their order. The vicariate of Vizagapatam was established in 1845 for the priests of the Congregation of St. Francis de Sales.

Protestant missions began at the commencement of the 18th century. When the Lutheran missionary Ze- genbaly was sent to the Danish coast of Tranquebar, amidst the greatest difficulties which the foreign languages and the officers of the colony placed in his way, he founded schools, translated the Bible and the Catechism into the local language, and a congregation which rapidly increased, and laid the foundation of the Evangelical Church of India. A large portion of the councils either belonged to the lowest castes or were in pariah. In the course of the 18th century, the missionary work was carried on by the Missionary Society of Hawaii; at first with great zeal, which, however, gradually slackened under the influence of Rationalism. The last great missionary who was sent out from Halle was the apostolical Fr. Schwarz (q. v.), the results of whose work can still be traced. Gradually the Halle Society leaned on the English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which at last took entire charge of these missions. With regard to the differences of castes, the missionaries had at first great difficulty to obtain the continuance in the Christian churches; but this policy was subsequently changed, and the differences permitted to remain on the ground that they were merely a social character. In 1841 the Lutheran Missionary Society of Dresden began to gather up again the scattered missionaries in the different stations, and in 1845 the Landed Church of Tranquebar, but in the prosecution of the work became involved in many difficulties with the other missionary societies which had taken charge of the Halle missions. This society is the only one among the missionary societies now laboring in India which undertakes to vindicate the social, though not the religious standing of the caste.

The recent mission in India begins with the arrival of the Baptist missionary, W. Carey, at Calcutta (Nov. 1793). He encountered from the start the formidable and entirely unexpected opposition of the East India Company, which hoped for larger commercial profits if the country were opened to the Hindus and Mohammedans, and therefore not only discouraged the establishment of Christian missions, but supported and defended the religious institutions of the native religions. The few chaplains who were sent out were compelled to attend the services of the missionaries, but were like the European residents in general, drunkards, servants of the mammon, and worldlings; when, therefore, the Rev. Henry Martyn, one of the most zealous missionaries of that time, arrived in 1806 in Calcutta, and endeavored to kindle a missionary spirit, he provoked the hostility of the population of about 240,000 souls. A letter from pope Gregory XVI to the archbishop remained without effect. who succeeded in overcoming those hindrances which had prevented the free propagation of Christianity throughout India. After having travelled through a large portion of the country, and acquired a minute knowledge of the people, he returned in 1807 to England, and by a number of works endeavored to gain public opinion to the need of establishing mission schools in the administration of India. His writings produced a great effect, and when, in 1813, the charter of the East India Company was renewed, the English Parliament passed resolutions which granted to all British subjects the right to establish schools and missions in India, and compelled the company to subscribe a sum of money for the instruction of the natives. This was followed by a number of other reforms, as the prohibition of burning of widows (1829), and of a further payment of temple and pilgrimage taxes (1833 and 1840), and the admission of native Christians to the lower offices of administration. Full liberty for missionary operations was finally given in 1833, when a resolution of the British Parliament allowed all foreigners to settle in British India, and thus opened the field to all non-British missionary societies of the world. The first bishop of the English Church in India was established at Calcutta in 1814. The first bishop, Dr. Middleton, a rigid High-Churchman, was more noted for his quarrels with the ministers of other denominations than for missionary zeal. His successor, Heber (q.v.), on the contrary, though likewise a High-Churchman, was devoted to the cause, and sternly opposed the toleration of caste differences among the converts. His work was continued in the same way by his successor, Wilson (died 1868). In 1855 other bishoprics were established at Bombay and Madras, and the bishop of Calcutta received the title of Metropolitan for India itself and seminaries beyond its borders. In 1857 the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland sent Dr. Norman M'Leod and Dr. Watson to inquire into the working of the missions there. The following facts are gleaned from later reports. The missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel are distributed among 84 principal stations, assisted by 70 unordained European agents, and 111 ordained and 3040 unordained native agents. 24,578 communicants, and 14,994 catechumens are connected with the churches, while there is a total of 74,192 baptisms in the year 1839. 718 were catechumens, and 5490 pupils. St. Thomas's College, in Ceylon, has recently been endowed by the society to the amount of £25,000. The London Missionary Society has its most successful mission in Travancore, where 269 stations are filled. There are 45,176 adherents, of whom 5,192 are communicants, and 885 of whom are unordained native workers. The native contributions for 1888 amounted to £1029. In South India there are 208 stations and outstations supplied by 24 foreign and 14 native ordained pastors, assisted by 4 foreign and 104 native unordained workers. The adherents number 7612, of whom 110 are communicants; 110 day-schools are maintained, with 12,350 pupils. The native contributions for 1888 amounted to £1220. In North India 24 ordained and 43 unordained workers supply 26 stations and out-stations. The number of communicants is 533; adherents 5,727; day-schools 75, with 21,276 pupils, £1294 were contributed by the natives in 1888. Brasses were furnished for a mission college; Almora a college; Calcutta, Bangalore, Nagarkoil have higher institutions of learning. There is a medical mission at Neyer. The Church Missionary Society has in Madras large stations, and 266 day-schools are maintained by native workers. It has also a mission to the Mohammedan population of that city. In 1830 Tinnevelly was entered by the society, and now there are more than 1000 villages in which there are Christians. Successful work is done in Travancore, Cochin, and among the Telugus. There are 88,000 Christians in all of South India. North India is also field of the society. Divinity colleges are supported at Calcutta and Allahabad. A medical mission was started in the valley of the Kashmir in 1865, which is very successful. A divinity school was started at Poona, in Western India, in 1888. Ceylon, as the result of the society's work, has 6508 adherents; Trinity College, at Kandy, and important schools at Cotta and Jaffna. In Madras there is now a new establishment with a school where the natives are now more liberal than formerly in regard to India, and is entering upon all kinds of aggressive work. Among the latest is a medical mission. Its work is now in a critical condition, owing to the great number professing conversion. Many of the churches and schools are self-sustaining and are without the missionary spirit. This district is in juxtaposition with the South Travancore missions of the London Society, and with the Tinnevelly missions of the Propagation Society. Add the converts reported by these, and the 6000 of the American Board, and we have 10,000 Tamil Christians within 150 miles of Cape Comorin. The Wesleyan Missionary Society devotes but a twelfth of its income to the Indian missions, which are, of course, among its smallest. It has stations at Madras and six other points in the Tamil country, seven or eight stations in the two native districts, 465 Church members in all, 5 native ministers, besides several candidates, and 3500 pupils in the schools. The following are extracts from the late (1888) reports of some of the American societies. The American Board has the Marathi Mission, established in 1813, the first of its kind in India. It had 28 stations in Madura, and 17 in the native districts, in 1816. The Marathi Mission has 7 stations, 102 outstations, 12 preachers, 2 medical catechists, and with Bible readers and teachers, 255 native helpers. The native contributions amounted to $4779. The Theological Seminary, suspended in 1866, was reopened in 1868. There is a mission at high-school and college at Admednagar, which had 311 pupils in 1887. The Madura Mission has 12 stations, 234 out-stations, 3233 church members, 11,881 adherents, 10 missionaries, 20 native pastors, 399 native workers of all classes, 138 common schools, with 3215 pupils, a college theological institute, with 334 pupils; in all the mission 5680 pupils. A new feature is the employment of native evangelists by the native churches themselves for the outlying districts. The native contributions amounted to $6245. The Ceylon Mission has 7 stations, with 25 out-stations, 294 members, 28,034 native adherents, 1860 native contributions, $5752. This mission has had a wonderful educational work; the report claims that one in thirteen of the population are in school. Nearly all of the schools are managed by the missionaries. 329 have been educated at Jaffna College. The Presbyterian Church sustains the Lodi and Purruckhabad Mission with 17 stations, 28 American and 11 native missionaries, 30 American and 120 native teachers, 456 communicants, and 6194 scholars in the schools. Out-stations are increasing in numbers. Tours into different districts have been made as in former years. Various medals have been attended, among which was Hariwar. The number of people present at this place, according to government officials, was almost 30,000. For days some twenty preachers, native and foreign, preached to many thousands. Frequently many remained after the service to discuss some of the points set forth in the discourse. Giving was always in cash, and usual. "The more revolting rites of Hindustan are evidently becoming obsolete." At this festival the brethren were "particularly struck with the marked increase in the knowledge of Christianity manifested by the pilgrims." To add to the publicity of the event, four cards were sent to all the principal stations, and to each of the meetings at most of the stations, and in the Lodi Mission the native Christians have contributed for religious and charitable objects, during the year, 670 rupees. Nearly 11,000 pages of publications of various kinds have been issued. A "medical mission" is connected with these missions, at which 1313 patients have been treated. The (Dutch) Reformed Church has the Arm Mis-

Indian Caste.

The social distinctions indicated by this term are much more numerous, fixed, and exclusive in India than anywhere else in the world. The term caste had similar ranks, but they were not so strictly hereditary, nor did they form such impassable barriers in ordinary intercourse. See Egypt. The Hindudua, indeed, regard these as absolute, original, and permanent demarkations of race rather than of mere position or occupation.

1. Origin. — From a very early period the Hindu writers have propounded a great variety of speculations regarding the origin of the castes and the classes or castes into which their community is divided. The most commonly received of these explanations is that contained in the ancient story, of which Mr. Muir thinks no trace is found in the Rig Veda (excepting one in Purusha Sūkta), but which is found in the Sātwi Parva of the Mahābhārata, and is conveyed by the Purāṇas to the Brahmans, the Kṣatriyas, and Sūdras, the son of Iśu, and Mārīcīsvar, and Viṣṇu, the wind god. Purāṇa asks, “Whence was the Brahmān, and whence were the three castes produced, and whence is the superiority of the first?” and Yājva answers, “The Brahmān was created from the mouth of Brahmā, the Kṣatriya from his arms, Vaisya from his thighs, and to serve these three castes the fourth caste was fashioned, and so the Sūdra sprang from his feet.” The sacred books of the Hindus, however, contain no uniform or consistent account of the origin of castes, but offer a “mythical, mythical, and rationalistic” explanations of it, or fanciful conjecture concerning it. In the Harāvīṣa (sec. 211, v. 11808 sq.), Jānamiṣya says, “I have heard the description of the Brāhma Yug, the first of the ages; I desire now to be accurately informed about the Kṣatriya Age,” and he proceeds to describe it: “Viṣṇu, the all-merciful, the great one, created the Brahmān, exalted above the power of sense, and absorbed in devotion, becomes the patriarch Daśākuti, and creates numerous human beings. The beautiful Brahmāns were formed from an unchangeable element (akṣatra), the Kṣatriyas from a changeable substance (kalatra), the Vaisyas from changeable elements (kakṣaṇa), and the Sūdras from a modification of smoke.” Another account makes the Brahmāns to have been fashioned with white, red, yellow, and blue colours. Thence creatures attained in the world the state of fourfold castes, being of one type, but with different duties. Still another account (Sātwi Parva of the Mahābhārata, v. 1858 sq.), after giving a statement of the creation of men, etc., propounds the following: “Desire, anger, fear, curiosity, grief, anxiety, hunger, fatigue, prevail in all; all have bodily secrets, with plégues, bile, and blood; and the bodies of all decay—by what, then, is caste distinguished? There are four castes or the sons of Brahmā; the whole world is formed of Brahmā; for, having been formerly created by him, it became separated into castes by means of works.” In the Bhāgavat Purāṇa we read that there was formerly only one Veda, one God, one caste. Sometimes the Veda is divided into eight parts, and the gods into eight classes. The poet Kaṇḍāma, who speaks of caste, says: “From different Vedas; from different sets of prayers; from the gods; from nonentity; from the imperishable, the permissible, and other principles. They are sometimes made to be coeval with the creation, and as having different attributes involving different moral qualities, while in other places, as in the Epic poems, the creation of mankind is described without the least allusion to the separate production of the progenitors of the four castes. Sometimes all men are the offspring of Manu. Thus it is clear that the separate origin of the four castes could not have been an object of belief among the older Hindus, while the variety and inconsistency of these accounts help us not at all in determining its origin.

Many writers have claimed for caste a trans-Himalayan origin, while others have supposed that it originated with the successive waves of emigration within the Indian peninsula. Professor Gorai, in his lecture, states this view: “When the Vedic people, driven by some political shock, advanced from their abodes in the Punjab further and further south, and drove the aborigines into the hills, and took possession of the country lying between the Ganges, the Jumna, and the Brahmaputra, circumstances required and favored such an organization of society as was therein developed.” On the other hand, Dr. Haug says: “From all we know, the real origin of caste appears to go back to a time anterior to the composition of the Vedic hymns, though its development is carried on in a regular system with insurmountable barriers can be referred only to the latest period of the Vedic age.”

2. Extent.—But, whatever may have been its origin, it is now a complex and highly artificial system, multi-form in shape, and often so blended with the ordinary usages of society and the minute division of labor to which the older civilizations tend, that it is very difficult to make a complete or even an analysis of it. A close inspection of the census returns to the British government in the north-west provinces of India in 1866 shows that it is very much more variable than was formerly supposed. Sometimes the minister divisions into classes seems to follow no other than the lines of the occupations of the people, and they are still returned as belonging to the caste of tailors, or shopmen, etc., without other discrimination. This “blue book” thus enrolled more than three hundred distinct castes within that political division. There is, however, an additional division which may be termed of “legal classification,” as (1) Eriśhakram, (2) Kṣatriyajita, (3) Vaśīhakas, and (4) Sūdra; below which is a yet more debased class, (5) known as Pārvakas, or outcasts, to be found in all portions of the country. The four greater castes above named answer to priestly, warrior, agricul- tural, and servile, and are distinguished from the lesser classes by the fact that the former return hereditary priests, robe-dancers, sweepers, elephant-drivers, turban-winders, ear-piercers and cleaners, charmers, makers of crowns for idols, and even hereditary beggars and common blackguard.

3. Rules.—These castes are all hereditary, the son always following the occupation of the father, however overburdened some departments of occupation may become by the accidents of birth. No classes except the highest two are assumed to intermarry, and all es- tewd contact with a lower class. They do not eat to- gether, nor cook for nor serve food to each other. This dislike of contact extends to their vessels, and other utensils. The usages, however, seem often arbitrary, as smoking from the bowl of another’s pipe may not be an offence if one can make a stem of his fist, but the stem or snake of the pipe must not be touched, or it is ren- dered worthless to its owner. It is well known that the caste requirement that brass or copper utensils should be moved from place to place, but an earthen vessel once used for cooked food or water must not be trans- ported to another locality. Loads may be carried on the head by some castes, on the back by some, and not by others. It is well known that one caste never wears silver, but wash their own clothes, yet the loin-cloth must always be washed by the wearer of it. If a Hindu were touch- ed by a man of an inferior caste while eating, he would not only throw away all the food he had cooked, but would even spit out what might chance to be in his mouth at the instant.

The accumulation of motive for the preservation of caste purity is astounding. The slightest variation from custom is at once visited with punishment or fines, while the graver offences become the ground of expulsion literally from all human society, and of disabilities in business and in marriage. It is well known that the caste requirement that brass or copper utensils should be moved from place to place, but an earthen vessel once used for cooked food or water must not be transported to another locality. 4. Effects.—The caste policy of India checks genius, yet as from the first the individual knows what his life- business is to be, he pursues it, and attains a skill in handicraft unequalled. The Indian system tends like- wise to give permanence to institutions, but it unfor- tuneately is a hindrance. It eviles the minds of the mountainous, circumstances required and favored such an organization of society as was therein developed.” On progress of Christianity. The railroads and other European conveniences have by some been looked upon as likely to make great innovations on caste-usage. There is already a large and well-organized portion of the population of these countries who wholly ignore castes. See Hindu, Modern.

There is much less of caste observance among what is considered to be an older population than the Hindu, such as the people inhabiting the Himalaya Mountains, and the "wild tribes" of Central India.

Indians, American. Under this title may be included all the semi-civilized and wild tribes of North and South America, since the most thorough investigation shows that they were indeed "human beings." The only source of intelligence concerning the Indian tribes of America is the trader, who, in dealing with these people, is forced to adopt methods of communication which are not always those that are best suited to the Indian mind. The trader must be able to understand the Indian language, and to convey ideas to him in such a manner that he can understand them. This is done by means of signs and gestures, and by imitating the sounds of the Indian language.

1. Sources of Knowledge. Notwithstanding the proverbial taciturnity of the American Indians, some information has been elicited by oral communication. Many of the tribes, also, have a species of records for their traditions. In some instances these seem to be little more than mnemonic signs, made on their skins, tents, clothing, mats, and rocks; but in others, as in Mexico, we find stories which were kept in the form of iatro-epigraphic writing, wherein signs stand for ideas, as the Arabic numerals do with us. Besides these there must have existed in some localities a phonetic alphabet prior to the coming of the white man. The only known, however, is found with the Maya, resident in the peninsula of Yucatan. It has "a well rounded alphabet of twenty-seven elementary sounds, the letters of which are totally different from those of any other nation, and evidently original with themselves."

2. Origin. Much has been written on the origin of the Indian tribe, and their probable connection with the people of the Old World. Hattaway says, "If by no ray of light whatever could be thrown upon the questions which concern the primitive populations of America; if no analogy to the case had existed in the spread of the Malayan-Polynesian tribe across the islands of the Pacific Ocean and the Eastern Archipelago, and the Pacific Ocean; if the speech of the Americans had absolutely no affinities with other human dialects; if their traditions, meagre as these are, hinted nothing of a distant home and of a perilous migration; if insoluble enigmas were presented by the physical structure of the Americans, or if their mental powers and physical capacities as such were such that they could not have been derived from a different source, it is safe to say that we should infer from them a place in the great brotherhood of men; if, lastly, no resemblance were found, I will not say in primary articles of belief, but in the memory of specific incidents, and in those minor forms of human thought and culture which will hardly bear to be explained on the hypothesis of 'natural evolution,' we might then, perhaps, have cause to hesitate in our decision" (Christ and other Musters, ii, 120 sq.). There is literally nothing, according to our ablest writers, either in the bodily structure or psychology of the American tribes which is not equally found in other primitive races. The only difference between the two is that the American, being a more intelligent and conscious creature, is more capable of conceiving and expressing his ideas. The Indian has not the faculty of expressing his ideas in words, but he has the power of expressing them in deeds and gestures. The Indian is a highly organized and thoughtfully constructed organism, and his ideas are as much a part of his nature as the organs of his body. The American, on the other hand, is a creature of less intelligence, and his ideas are less distinct and definite. The American is a creature of less culture, and his ideas are less developed and refined. The American is a creature of less civilization, and his ideas are less advanced and more primitive. The American is a creature of less life, and his ideas are less active and more passive. The American is a creature of less mind, and his ideas are less logical and more irrational. The American is a creature of less body, and his ideas are less tangible and more intangible. The American is a creature of less soul, and his ideas are less spiritual and more material. The American is a creature of less heart, and his ideas are less tender and more harsh. The American is a creature of less brain, and his ideas are less active and more passive. The American is a creature of less body, and his ideas are less tangible and more intangible. The American is a creature of less soul, and his ideas are less spiritual and more material. The American is a creature of less heart, and his ideas are less tender and more harsh. The American is a creature of less brain, and his ideas are less active and more passive.

3. Legends. The Indian myths of the creation, the deluge, the epochs of nature, and the last day, are numerous and clear, although it seems more difficult to ascertain here what does and what does not antedate the European invasion, before the creation, and after. The Muscoquees, "a great body of water was alone visible. Two pigeons flew to and fro over its waves, and at last spied a blade of grass rising above the surface. Dry land gradually followed, and the islands and continents took their present shape." Many tribes trace their descent from a raven, "a mighty bird, whose eyes were fire, whose glances were lightning, and the clapping of whose wings was thunder. On his descent to the ocean the earth instantly rose, and remained on the surface of the water. This omnipotent bird was called forth all the water animals." The early Algonquin legends do not speak of any family who escaped the deluge, nor did the Dakota, who firmly believed the world had been destroyed by water. Generally, however, the legends made some to have escaped by ascending some mountain, on a raft or canoe, in a cave, or by climbing a tree. The pyramids of Cholula, the mounds of the Mississippi Valley, the vast and elaborate edifices in the artificial hills of Yucatan, would seem to have direct reference to the hill on which the ancestors of these people escaped in past deluges, or from the realm of rains, called the Hill of Heaven, the last destruction of the world to have been by water, though some few represent it to have been by fire.

4. Religious Beliefs. It is generally believed that all approximations to monotheism observed among the tribes of the New World are little more than verbal. Their "Great Spirit," as the phrase stands among Europeans, is at best the highest member of a group of spirits. He may be a personification of the mightiest of all natural energies, but not a personality distinct from nature, and controlling all things by his sovereign will. He is devoid of almost everything which constitutes the god of the God of revelation. In spite of whatever grandeur, goodness, or ubiquity he may be endowed with, he exercises no control over the lives of individuals or the government of the world. "There is no attempt," says Mr. Schooler, "by the hunter-priesthood of the Indians, to connect with the physical universe the almost poetic way in which they look at it suggests that much of their religious thought received comprehension from their hunter-life. For the most part, their conceptions of deity seem to have been connected with the phenomena of the meteorological or atmospheric world, and with their observations concerning light and fire. The highest good is generally symbolized as the storm-god or the sun-god, these being sometimes blend-

"father," "sustainer," "revivifier." Muller maintains that there were numerous subordinate hostile deities, who created discord, sickness, death, and every possible form of evil, and that in many cases these were reputed to be under the leadership of the sun, which was as the

The Manito or Manto is alleged to have no personal meaning, but to be equivalent to "spirit," or "a spirit," perhaps somewhat akin to our thought of a guardian spirit. Schoolcraft thinks that, so far as a meaning distinct from an invisible existence attaches to it at all, the tendency is to a bad meaning, and that a bad meaning is distinctly conveyed in the inflection osh or ish (Red Races, p. 214). In considering this belief in manitos it is necessary to remember that the Indian conceives every department of the animal, vegetable, and, in particular, the animate and inanimate, holding the same relation to matter that the soul does to the body, and in accordance with which, not only every man, but every animal, has a soul, and is endowed with a reasoning faculty. Dreams are a means of direct communication with the spiritual world, and are generally regarded as the various manifestations of their personal manitos. No labor or enterprise is undertaken against their indications, whole armies being sometimes turned back by dreams of the officiating priest. Under the guidance of a particular spirit, names are commonly supposed to be bestowed. These personal spirits are invisible to the naked eye, but are, however, of varied ability, and there is a constant fear lest the manito of a neighbor may prove more powerful than one's own.

The mythological personages who are the heroes of Indian tales, and who are in some measure associated with the highest good, as set forth above, may be represented by Michaho or Manibozho of the Algonquins, and Quetzalcoatl, the god of the air, the highest deity of the Toltecs. The same deity appears with more or less modification among all the tribes, under various names. One of the most interesting is also the original of the religious conceptions of the Quichewah, the-in the fancy of these people that there was a white man, of superior strength from the father of the sou.

6. The Soul and a Future Life.—The immortality of the human soul is universally believed by the North-American Indians.

Among all the tribes soul is equivalent to breath, or the wind. The same person may have more than one soul; some say four, and others more than this number. Generally, however, there is some distinction made in these souls. One may remain with the body, being attached to its earthly functions, and is absorbed in the elements, while another soul may pass away to the "Happy Hunting-grounds;" or, in other cases, one may watch the body, wander about the world, one hour in one village, and another go to the spirit land. According to an author quoted by Mr. Brinton, certain Oregon tribes located a spirit "whenever they could detect a pulsation," the supreme one being in the heart, and which alone would go to the skies at death.

Among all the tribes, from the Arctic region to the tropics, the Indians held that the human body was destined to be where the highest good, i.e. where light comes from, or, in other words, in the sun-realm. Hence the soul is variously said to go at death towards the east, or towards the west, the place of the coming or departure of the light, or among some northern tribes, to whom the sun lay in a southern direction, the soul is said to go towards the west, which is the reverse of the sun's course. The cult of the sun-god that this permanent soul finds its ultimate home. "Spirituality is clogged with earthly accidents even in the future world. The soul hungers, and food must be deposited at the grave to supply its need. It suffers from cold, and the body must be wrapped about with clothes. It is in darkness, and a light must be kindled at the head of the grave. It wanders through plains and across streams, subject to the vicissitudes of life, in quest of a place of enjoyment. Among some northern tribes a dog was slain on the grave, and there are indications of a like practice having obtained in Mexico and Peru." In other words, the place and where the government was despotic, not only animals, but men, women, and children were often sacrificed at the tomb of the "caccia." There are traces of this on the Lower Mississippi. Among the Natchez Indians, when a chief died, "one or several of his wives or his highest officers were buried, or were buried with him." There is the belief among many of them that the soul needs light, particularly for four nights or days after death, as it is either confined in the body, or "wandering over a gloomy marsh," or in some other peril which prevents its ascending to the skies. The souls of the extreme south, of the Pampas and the Patagonians, suppose the stars to be the souls of the departed.

According to some, there is but little trace, if any, of a clear conception of a system of rewards and punishments, as there certainly do not seem to have been very clear distinctions between vice and virtue, as in any way related to a future world. The difference between the soul's comfort and disadvantage in a future life, in so far as it is made a matter of degree at all, was made to depend, as in the Mexican mythology, on the mode of death. Women dying in among them were associated in the category of worth and merited happiness with warriors dying in battle. In Guatemala a violent death in any shape was sufficient to banish, in after-life, from the felicitous regions. The Brazilian natives divided the dead into classes, making those drowned, or killed by violence, or without sin, to ascend to the heaven, and others to descend into the lower regions; but there seems to be no reason founded in morals connected with this. It is but just to say that others take a different view of this part of the subject from that here set forth. The abbe Em. Domenech, who spent seven years among these tribes, gives traditions of a doctrine of future life, but with a restriction that the future punishments for the good or bad deeds of this life (p. 288). Other tribes, however, seem to know nothing of punishments. The Master of Life, or Merciful Spirit, will be alike merciful to all, irrespective of the acts of this life, or of any degree of moral turpitude. They see nowhere clear conceptions of virtue and vice even in this world. Sin, they say, is only represented at worst as a metaphorical going astray, as of one who loses his path in the woods, though this may suggest much more than this class of persons admit. That there is a moral sentiment is admitted, and written in their hearts, though not as connected with their future state. Their prayers are almost wholly for, temporal, and not for moral blessings; but there may be found an assumption of moral qualities or ethical character in connection with their gods, as in the case of Quetzalcoatl alluded to, who is said to be the "spirit of the water," the sun, who is to be the incarnation of the god of the dead, the confessor of the dead, the reformer of the household, instilled patriotism, etc. The Mexicans had another place for the souls of those dying by lightning-stroke, dropsies, leprosies, etc., who could not go to the home of the sun, but who must go to the realm of the god of the rains and waters, called Tlalocan. There are traditions of the separate resurrection of the bird, also of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. The vast tumuli, though they were not all con-
The priesthood of the country has been considered by those long familiar with the subject to have done more than any other agency to keep these tribes from becoming degraded. They are remarkable men, and are variously styled by the Algonquins and Dakotas "those knowing divine things," "dreamers of the gods;" in Mexico, "masters or guardians of the divine things;" in Cherokee their title means "possessed of the divine fire;" in Iroquois, "keepers of the faith;" and in Quebec, "the images of the gods." As medicine-men, they tried to frighten the demons that possessed the patient; sucked and blew upon the diseased organ, sprinkled it with water, rubbed the parts with their hands, and made an image representative of the spirit of sickness, and knocked it to pieces. They were much skilled in tricks of ledge-mend, setting fire to articles of clothing and instantly extinguishing the flames by magic. They summoned spirits to answer questions about the future, and possessed clairvoyant powers; and they were reputed to be even able to raise the dead. They consecrated amulets, interpreted dreams, cast horoscopes, rehearsed legends, performed sacrifices, and, in short, constituted the chief centre of the intellectual force of the people. They are thus a kind of priests, doctors, and charlatans, who perform penance, and submit to mutilation, fasting, and flagellation. They did not utter the words of incantation with a solemn countenance, but in a way that expressed the monotonous, monotonous rhythm of their magic. The priest is particularly important in the ceremony which is necessary to secure rain. The medicine lodge is used for nearly all ceremonies. See NORTH AMERICA, RELIGIONS OF.

8. Present Location and Numbers.—The large proportion of the Indians of the United States are now gathered together in the Territory, with a few scattered in the States. The census of 1880 gives the following numbers: 17,000 Chippewa; 15,000 Chippewas; 11,000 Sauk and Foxes; 10,000 Creeks; 10,000 Ojibway; 9,000 Shawnees; 5,000 Choctaws; 1,000 Absarokas; 2,000 Pawnees; 1,000 Cheyennes; 1,000 Osages; 1,000 Comanches; 1,000 Poncas; and 1,000 Omaha. The total number of Indians is estimated at 390,000.

According to the census of 1880 there were within the Indian territory, Cherokees, 19,720; Muscogees or Creek, 15,000; Seminoles, 2,685; Choctaws, 11,000; Chickasaws, 30,000; Cheyennes, 4,000; Arapahos, 2,000; Pawnees, 1,000; Navajos, 9,000; Pueblo Indians in New Mexico. There were 4050 Chippewas and 1500 Oneidas in Wisconsin, and 5000 Chippewas in Michigan. Much of the land formerly assigned to the Indians has lately been purchased by the government and opened to settlers, and some of it has been occupied, so that there is a demand for the removal or consolidation of the natives. Indictio Festorum Mobilium. See Indictio Paschasialis.

Indiction (Latin indicio, a declaring) is a term which designates "a chronological system, including a circle of fifteen years: (1) the Cæsareaem, used long in France and Germany, beginning on Sept. 24; (2) the Constantinopolitan, used in the East from the time of Antiochus, and beginning Sept. 1; and (3) the Papal, reckoned from Jan. 1, 313. The Council of Antioch, 341, first gives a documentary date, the 14th indiction. The computation prevailed in Syria in the fifth century, and is mentioned by Ambrose as existing at Rome. It is, however, the only one that in the Western Church, with the exception of Africa, the inductions, until the 16th century, were reckoned from Sept. 1, 312, and that they commenced in Egypt in the time of Constantine."—Walcott, Sacred Archaeology, p. 537; see also Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ii, 141. See Cyc.

Indictio Paschasialis. It was an old custom in the Christian Church of the early ages to announce on Epiphany (q. v.) the days on which Easter would fall, and this announcement was called the Indictio paschalis; but as on the appointment of the days on which Easter should be observed depended the appointment of the movable feasts, this announcement was called the "Paschalis multifidum". Besides this kind we find in the Alexandrian Church, but it soon became general throughout the Christian Church, even by ecclesiastical enactments. Thus the fourth Synod at Orleans (Concil. Aurelianum, iv, c. 1) ordered its observance and even the fifth Synod at Carthage (A.D. 403, Concil. Carthaginum, v, can. 7) ordered a written announcement, which was called Epistola paschalis et horastatica. See Bingham, Antiqu. Eccles. i, 85 sq.; Augusti, Handbuch der Christl. Indifference, Liberty of, a name sometimes given, by metaphysical and theological writers, to the power in the human mind of choosing between opposing motives, or of resisting or yielding to a given motive. The upholders of fatalism consider this "liberty of indifference" as a chimera. If we were indifferent, say they, to the motives which determine our actions, we should either not act at all, or we should act without motive, at hazard, and our actions would be effects without cause. But this is intentionally confounding indifference and insensibility. We are necessarily sensible to a motive when that motive induces us to act, but the question as to whether there is a necessary connection of a motive and an action; that is, whether, when such a motive induces us to will anything, we can or cannot will the contrary in spite of that motive, or whether we cannot prefer another motive to that by which we determine to act. As soon as it is supposed that we act from a motive, it cannot be supposed that this motive does not determine us to act, for the two suppositions would contradict each other; but it may be asked whether, before any supposition, our will was connected with the motive in such a manner as to render a contrary volition impossible. The advocates of moral liberty maintain that there is no physical or moral volition in the case of the contrary volition, but only a moral connection, which does not prevent our resisting; in other words, that motives are the moral, not the physical causes of our actions. Because we are said to be determined by a motive, it does not follow that we cannot resist a motive and thus suppose that an active faculty like volition could become passive under the influence of a motive, or that this motive, which after all is but an idea, a thought, could act upon us as we act upon a body we put in motion. This metaphysical question is intimately connected with the doctrine of man's stain, with the idea of a free agent, with the nature of an active faculty like volition, but it is qualified by the fact that a man's will is not free and must act as evil, and the existence of such a faculty requires that lib-kind of infidelity in England and America. It is stated, or implied, in much of our current popular literature, that a man’s creed does not depend upon himself. This dogma pervades the writings of Mr. Emerson. Napoleon, one of his ‘representative men,’ of whom he tells ‘infidelity’ (p. xxvii) must not in his life be set down as cruel, but only as one who knew no impediment to his will.’ He depicts him as an ‘exorbitant egoist, who narrowed, impoverished, and absorbed the power and existence of those who served him; and concludes by saying, ‘it was not Bonaparte’s fault.’ Thus we come to think of Napoleon, like Jesus, as a man who sought the holy grail of true belief, as if the emotional part of our nature was independent of the intellectual. ‘Belief,’ says he, ‘is one thing, and faith another.’ And he complains of those who, on religious grounds, are alienated from him because he has adopted; ‘infidelity’ (p. 12). The difference between them and him turning merely ‘on questions of learning, history, criticism, and abstract thought’ (Phases of Faith, Preface). The philosophy is as bad here as the theology. The view of common sense and Scripture, a living faith as is the doctrine believed. But Mr. Newman, in common with Mr. Parker and others, can lay down his offensive weapons when he wills, and take up a position on the low ground of indifference as to religious belief. Then, creeds become matters of mere moonshine, and responsibility is regarded as a fiction invented by priests. This is part of the bad theology of Mr. Bailey’s ‘Festus.’ The hero of the poem is made to say, ‘Yet merit or demerit none I see In nature, human or material, In passions or affections good or bad. We only know that God’s best purposes Are oftentimes brought about by dreadest sins. Is the thunderer, or is he a dew divine? Does virtue lie in sunshine, sin in storm? Is not each natural, each needful, best?’

The theory of this infidelity appears to be that man has no capacity for faith, that he is no more responsible for his opinions than he is for his color or his height, and that an infidel or an atheist is to be pitied but not blamed. This, we are persuaded, is a piece of thinly sophistry which no man should utter, and which would not be listened to for a moment in connection with the other subject than that of religion. It would be condemned in the senate and at the bar, it would be drowned in the tumult of the exchange and the market-place. Common sense, and a regard to worldly interests, would rise up and hoot down the traitor. Unfortunately, however, in the province of religion, the natural indissociation of the mind to things unseen and spiritual exists itself with the pleadings of the sophist, and receives his doctrine of irresponsibility with something like flattering unction. Nothing more than this is requisite to undermine the foundation of all religious belief and morals, to let open the floodgates of immorality, and to make the name of infidelity a badge of merit, in the培有 of little things there the yielding sand. In opposition to such latitudinarianism, we maintain that man is responsible for the dispositions which he cherishes, for the opinions which he holds and avows, and for his habitual conduct. This is the great want of the history of Scripture; there is no farther. More, which affirms that every one of us must give an account of himself unto God. And this meets with a response from the amid of elements of man’s moral nature, which sets its seal that the thing is true’ (Pearson, Prize Essay on Infidelity, ch. v). (Comp. Indigetès (sc. Ditr), an epitaph given by the Romans to the particular gods of each country, who, having been natives of those countries, were deified by their countrymen after death. Thus Romulus was one of the gods Indigetes of the Romans, and was worshipped under the name Quirinus. Æneas, though not a native of Italy, yet, as founder of the Roman name, was ranked among the gods Indigetes.—Broughton, Biblioth. Hist. Soc. i, 300.

Indignation, a strong disapprouvment of mind, excited by flagitious in the conduct of another. It does not, as Mr. Cogan observes, always suppose that excess of depravity which alone is capable of committing deeds of horror. Indignation always refers to culpability of conduct, and cannot, like the passion of horror, be extended to distress either of body or mind. It is produced by acts of treachery, abuse of confidence, base ingratitude, etc., which we cannot contemplate without being provoked to anger, and feeling a generous resentment.—Cogan, On the Passions: Buck, Theo. Dict. Æmulation, Anon.

Indra, one of the Hindu deities of the Vedic period of the Hindu religion, who also enjoyed a great legendary popularity in the Epic and Purânic periods. See Hindúism. He is, so to speak, the Hindu Jupiter. He is quite frequently styled ‘Lord of heaven’ (devapati =disputant). The name itself is of doubtful origin, meaning either (1) ‘blue’ (as epithet of the firmament), or (2) ‘the illuminator,’ or (3) ‘the giver of rain’ (compare Wutke, Gesch. des Heidentums ii, 242). Max Müller (Science of Language, 2d series, p. 449) says the name admits of but one etymology; i.e. it must be derived from the same root, whatever that may be, which in Sanscrit yielded indra, drop, sap. It meant originally the giver of rain, the Jupiter pluvius, a deity in India more often present to the mind of the worshipper than any other, (comp. Benfey, Orient and Occident, i. 49). ‘In that class of Rig-Veda hymns where there is occasion to look for the oldest portions of Vedic poetry, the character of Indra is that of a mighty ruler of the bright firmament, and his principal feat is that of conquering the demon Vrîtra, a symbolical personification of the cloud which obstructs the clearness of the sky, and which, by his resistless blows, holds the firmament together. In his battles with Vritra he is therefore described as ‘opening the receptacles of the waters,’ as ‘cleaving the cloud’ with his ‘far-whirling thunderbolt,’ as ‘casting the waters down to the earth,’ and ‘restoring the sun to the sky.’ He is, in consequence, the‘upholder of heaven, earth, and firmament,’ and the god ‘who has engendered the sun and the dawn.’ And since the atmospheric phenomena personified in this conception are ever and ever recurring, he is ‘undecaying’ and ‘ever youthful. All the wonderful deeds of Indra, however, are performed by him merely for the benefit of the good, which, in the language of the Veda, means the people who worship him in their songs, and invoke him with the offerings of the juice of the soma plant. See Hindúism. He is, therefore, the ‘lord of the virtuous,’ and the ‘disconsoler of those who neglect religious rites. Many other epithets, which we have not space to mention, are bestowed on him. It is on account of the paramount influence which the deeds of Indra exercise on the material happiness of man that this deity occupies a foremost rank in the Vedic worship, and that a greater number of invocations are addressed to him than to any other of the Hindu deities.—Cf. Chips from a German Workshop, i, 30-32, et al.). But to understand the gradual expansion of his mythical character, and his ultimate degradation to an inferior position in the Hindu pantheon of a later period, it is necessary to bear in mind that, however much the Vedic poets call Indra the protector of the pious and virtuous, he is in their songs essentially a warlike god, and gradually endowed by imagination not only with the qualities of his mythological but also with the attributes of a"called king. The legends which represent him in this light seem, it is true, to belong to a later class of the Rig-Veda hymns, but they show that the original conception of Indra excluded from his nature those ethical considerations which in time changed the pantheon of elementary forces in the Rig-Veda into that of a different stamp; whether the idea of an incarnation (q. v.) of the deity, which, at the Epic and Puranic periods, played so important a part in the history of Vishnu, did not exercise its influence as early as the composition of some of the Vedic hymns in honor of Indra, may at least be matter of doubt. He is, for instance, frequently invoked as the destroyer of cities—of seven, of ninety-nine, even of a hundred cities —and he is not only repeatedly called the slayer of the hostile tribes which surrounded the Aryan Hindus, but some of the chief sin by him are enumerated by name.

The curving horns, of course, turn into serpents; their ‘chiefs’ into demons, and their cities into celestial abodes; but as it is improbable that all these names should be nothing but personifications of clouds destroyed by the thunderbolt of Indra, it is, to say the least, questionable whether events in the early history of India, which have been associated with the deeds of Indra himself, in like manner as, at the Epic period, mortal heroes were looked upon as incarnations of Vishnu, and mortal deeds transformed into exploits of this god.

The purely kingly character of Indra assumes its typical shape in the Asura-Brähmana, where his installation as lord of the inferior gods is described by much more detail; and from that time he continues to be the supreme lord of the minor gods, and the type of a mortal king. During the Epic and Puranic periods, where ethical conceptions of the divine powers prevail over ideas based on elementary impressions, Indra continues to enjoy the majesty he had acquired at the Vedic time, and his existence is chiefly upheld by the poets, who, in their turn, however, work it out in the most fanciful detail. Of the eight guardians of the world, he is, then, the one who presides over the east, and he is the god who, according to the Vedas, wields the thunderbolt; but poetry is more exalted by the beauty of his paradise, Swarga, the happy abode of the inferior gods, and of those pious men who attain it after death in consequence of having, during life, properly discharged their religious duties; by the charms of his beauty; the music of a thousand instruments, which descend to earth to disturb the equanimity of austerity penitents; by the musical performances of his choristers, the Gandharvas; by the splendor of his capital, Amravatī; by the fabulous beauty of his garden, Nan-dana; etc. A remarkable trait in this legendary life of Indra is the series of his conflicts with Krishna (q. v.), an incarnation of Vishnu, which end, however, in his becoming reconciled with the more important god. As the god who is emphatically called the god of the hundred sacrifices (Sakra), Indra is jealous of every mortal who may have the presumption of aiming at the performance of those sacrifices, for he is the god of the king, and he cannot countenance the repudiation of such an intention would raise the sacrificer to a rank equal to that to which he occupies. He is, therefore, ever at hand to disturb sacrificial acts which may expose him to the danger of having his power shattered. According to the Puranas, Indra is the reigning god of Indra, who is frequently called also Sakra, or the mighty, does not last longer than the first Manvantara, or mundane epoch. After each successive destruction of the world, a new Indra was cre-ted, together with other gods, saints, and mortal being. In the second Manvantara, Indra is the prince of Vipachit; of the third, Sudutsi; of the fourth, Sirī; of the fifth, Vībhū; of the sixth, Manava; and the Indra of the present age is Purandara” (Chambers, s. v.). In works of art, Indra is generally represented as riding on an elephant. In paintings, his eyes are vein-

Induction (Lat. inducere, from duco, lead) is a term in ecclesiastical law for the act by which a clergyman in the Church of England, having been presented to a benefice by its patron, is brought in to the possession of the freehold of the church and glebe. This is usually done by a mandate, under the seal of the bishop, addressed to the archdeacon, who either in person induces the minister, or commissions some clergyman in his place to perform the ceremony; that office, or his deputy, induces the incumbent, by laying his hand on the key of the church as it lies in the lock, and using this form: “I induce you into the real and actual possession of the rectory or vicarage of M., with all its profits and appurtenances.” The church door is then opened; the different enter, as it were, tolls a bell, in token of having entered on his spiritual Indulgence (Lat. indulgentia, in English, is the title applied to a proclamation of Charles II (A.D.

1663), and especially to one of James II, April 4, 1687, announcing religious tolerance to all classes of his subjects, suspending all penal laws against nonconformists, and abolishing religious tests as qualifications for civil office. The king’s object was simply to favor Roman Catholics, and therefore neither the English Church nor the great body of the dissenters received the illegal stretches of prerogative with favor, and refused to believe that a “dispensing power” exercised by the king indedependently of Parliament could be of any lasting advantage. Howe and Baxter maintained this opinion. The same instrument was extended to Scotland, and divided the Covenanters into two parties. At first the king asked toleration for Papists only, but the Scottish Parliament, usually very obscure, would not listen. He finally declared, as if Popery were already in the ascendant, that he would never use “force or invincible nessatility against any man on account of his Protestant faith,” and all this he did by his sovereign authority, prerogitive royal, and absolute power.”—Macleay, Hist. of England, i, 213; iii, 44 sq.; Skeats, Hist. of Free of England since the Restoration, ii, 296, et al.

Indulgences (Lat. indulgentiae), the name of a pecular institution in the Roman Church. The doctrine and practice of indulgence constitutes the very centre of the hierarchical theory of Romanism, and was, for that very reason, the first object of attack on the part of Luther in the beginning of the Reformation.

I. Origin of the System. — The early Church knew nothing of indulgences. The system seems to have originated in that of penance (q. v.), which, in the hands of the episcopacy, began to assume a corrupt form in the 8th century. The immediate object of penance was the partial expiation of sins; an office introduced by Purification with God, but to the constitution of the Church. When an excommunicated person sought remission, the bishop assigned him a penitential discipline (q. v.) of abstinence, mortification, and good works, after which he was taken back into fellowship by certain regular modes of pro-ceedure. These procedures were either a period of pro-

riot of probation, or to mitigate the severity of the penance, and in this power lies the germ of the doctrine of

504

INDULGENCES

Indulgence (see Canons of Council of Antioch, c. v). In course of time penitential discipline came to be applied, not merely to excommunicated persons, but to all delinquents within the pale of the Church; and penance came at last, in the hands of the schoolmen, to be a sacrament, with its systematic theory nicely fitting into the theologian's system of which, in some degree, it was a very keystone. Nothing could so surely augment the power of the priesthood as the right of fixing penalties for sin, and making terms of forgiveness. "Just as, in early times, the penances of the excommunicated were frequently mitigated, so, in the course of the Middle Ages, the delinquents were given a chance of reforming, and their delinquencies were subjected. Permission was given to exchange a more severe for a gentler kind of penance. Sometimes, in place of doing penance himself, the party was allowed to employ a substitute. And sometimes, in fine, instead of the actual penance prescribed, some service conducive to the interest of the Church and the glory of God was accepted. This last was the real basis of indulgence. Even here, however, the process was gradual. At first only personal acts performed for the Church were admitted, and then the gifts became more and more common, until at last the matter assumed the shape of a mere money speculation. This when the abuse grew up in practice. Then came Scholasticism, and furnished it with a theoretical substratum; and not until the institution had thus received an ecclesiastical and scientific foundation, and the practice of distributing indulgences had overstressed all limits. The first powerful impulse to the introduction of indulgences, properly so called, was given by the Crusades at the great Synod of Clermont in 1096. Urban II there promised to all who took part in the Crusade, which he proposed as a highly meritorious ecclesiastical work, plenary indulgence (indulgentias plenariae); and from that date for a period of two hundred years, this grace of the Church continued until the most powerful means for renewing and enlivening these expeditions, although it was evident to unprejudiced contemporaries that the adventurers, when they crossed the ocean, did not undergo a change of character with the change of climate. The same favor was extended to the military expeditions set on foot against the heathen in Europe, and at last, by Boniface VIII, in 1296, to the year of the Roman Jubilee. Subsequently, papal indulgences were granted on all kinds of occasions, and princes and monarchs, and the heads of the churches; in short, many and many places likewise received from successive popes special privileges in the matter of indulgence" (Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, i, 236).

II. Scholastic Doctrine of Indulgence. The practice of indulgence had been going on for some time when the Scholastic theologians took it up, and formed a speculative theory to justify it. Three great men contributed to this task: Alexander de Hales (q. v.), Albertus Magnus (q. v.), and Thomas Aquinas (q. v.).

Alexander de Hales († A.D. 1245) laid a firm foundation for the theory in the doctrine, first fairly propounded by him, of the Treasuries of the Church (thesauri ecclesiae). It runs as follows: "The sufferings and death of Christ not only made a sufficient satisfaction for the sins of men, but also acquired a superabundance of merit. This superabundant merit of Christ is conjointly the property of the faithful; it is the same in kind, though smaller in degree, for they likewise performed more than the divine law required of them. The sum of these supererogatory merits and good works forms a vast treasure, which is disjoined from the persons who won or performed them, exists objectively, and, having been accumulated by the Church, and intended by it for use, belongs to the Church, and is necessarily placed under the administration of its representatives, especially the pope, who is supreme. It is therefore competent for the pope, according to the measure of his insight at the time, to draw from this treasure, and bestow upon those who have no merit of their own such supplies of it as they require. Indulgences and remissions are made from the supererogatory merits of Christ's members, but most of all from the superabundance of Christ's own, the two constituting the Church's spiritual treasure. The administration of this treasure does not pertain to all, but to those only who occupy Christ's place, viz. the bishops. The pope is the true keystone" (Alex. de Hales, Summa theol. 1. c. par. 5). He does not, however, suppose that in such cases indulgence is granted in the way of judicial absolution or barter, but in that of intercession ("per medium suffragii et interpretationis").

Albert the Great († 1280), adopting the opinions of his predecessor, designates indulgence the remission of some imposed punishment or penance, proceeding from the power of the keys, and the treasure of the superfluous merits of the perfect. With respect to the efficacy of indulgence, Albert proposes to steer a middle course between the extremes. Some hold that indulgence has no efficacy at all, and is merely a pious fraud, by which men are enticed to the performance of good works, such as pilgrimage and almsgiving. These, however, reduce the action of the Church to child's play, and fall into heresy. Others, carrying the contrary opinion to the other extreme, hold that indulgence at once and unconditionally accomplishes all that is expressed in it, and thus make the divine mercy diminish the fear of judgment. The true medium is that indulgence has that precise amount of efficacy which the Church assigns to it (Alb. Magnus, Sentend. lib. iv, d. xxiv, art. ii). As regards effectual indulgence, Albert never speaks of it, while Thomas Aquinas deduces the efficacy of indulgence directly from Christ. The history of the adulterers shows, he says, that it is in Christ's power to remit the penalty of sin without satisfaction, and so could Paul, and so also can the pope, whose power in the Church is no less than that of Paul. Besides, the Church general is infallible, and, as it sanctions and prides indulgence, indulgence must be valid. This, Thomas is persuaded, all admit, because there would be impurity in representing any act of the Church as nugatory. The reason of its efficacy, however, is in the sum of those merits that it greatly exceeds any that are within the limits of which there are many who, as respects works of penitence, have done more than they were under obligation to do; for instance, many who have patiently endured undeserved sufferings sufficient to expiate a great amount of penalties. In fact, so vast is the sum of those merits that it greatly exceeds the measure of the guilt of all the living, especially when augmented by the merit of Christ, which, although operative in the sacraments, is not in its operation confined to these, but, being infinite, extends far beyond them. The measure of the efficacy of indulgence—this St. Thomas reckons to be the truth—is determined by the measure of its cause. The procuring cause of the remission of punishment in indulgence is, however, solely the plenitude of the Church's merits, not the piety, labors, or gifts of the party by whom it is obtained; and therefore the power of the Church must be limited to that extent within which it is sufficient. The pope need not correspond with any of these, but only with the merits of the Church. In respect to the party who ought to dispense indulgence, St. Thomas asserts that no mere priest or pastor, but only the bishop, is competent for the duty. On the other hand, deacons and other parties consecrated by the pope, may grant indulgence if, either in an ordinary or extraordinary way, they have been intrusted with jurisdiction for the purpose. For indulgence does not, like sacramental acts, pertain to the power of the keys inherent in the priestly office, but to that power of the keys which belongs to jurisdiction (Aquinas, Suppl. 18d parte Summa Theologica, qu. xxxv-xxvii).

III. Opposition to Indulgences within the Church of Rome.—Such a doctrine could not fail to offend truly pious souls even within the Church. Long before the Reformation the whole system was attacked by eminent doctors. One of its most powerful opponents was John of Wesel (q.v.), in the middle of the 15th century. A feast which was indulged by pope Clement VI in 1450, and cardinal Cusanus visited Erfurt as a preacher of indulgence. This brought the subject practically before Wesel’s mind, and he wrote a treatise against indulgences (Adversus indulgentias; see Walch, Monum. Med. Eevi, ii, fasc. i, 111-158). For a few years Ullmann, Bishop of Hildesheim, before the Reformation, i, 298 sq. The flagrant abuses connected with the sale of indulgences began to cause a reaction against the system ever in the popular mind. In the 15th century, in particular, the disposal of them had become almost a common traffic; and a public sale of them was generally preceded by some specious pretext; for instance, the reduction of the Greeks under the yoke of the Romish Church, a war with heretics, or a crusade against the Neapolitans, etc. Too often the pretences for selling indulgences were in reality bloody, idolatrous, or superstitious. It was one of the charges brought against them at the trial of Constance, in 1415, that he empowered his legates to abrogate penalties from all sorts of crimes upon payment of sums proportioned to their guilt. When such indulgences were to be published, the disposal of them was correspondingly fostered; for the papal court could not always wait to have the treasures collected by the people from every country of Europe. And there were rich merchants at Genoa, Milan, Venice, and Augsburg who purchased the indulgences for a particular province, and paid to the papal chancery handsome sums for them. Thus both on the one side indulgences and the chancery benefited. The chancery came at once into possession of large sums of money, and the farmers did not fail of a good bargain. They were careful to employ skilful hawks of the indulgences, persons whose boldness and impudence bore due proportion to the eloquence which with them they imposed upon the simple people. Yet, that this species of traffic might have a religious aspect, the pope appointed the archbishops of the several provinces to be his commissioners, who in his name announced that indulgences were to be sold, and generally selected the persons to hawk them, and for this service shared the profits with the merchants who hired them. That the papal hawks enjoyed great privileges, and, however odious to the civil authorities, they were not to be molested. Complaints, indeed, were made against these contributions, levied by the popes upon all Christian Europe. Kings and princes, clergy and laity, bishops, monasteries, and confessors, all felt themselves aggrieved by them; the kings, that their countries were impoverished, under the pretext of crusades that were never undertaken, and of wars against heretics and Turks; and the bishops, that their letters of indulgence were rendered inefficient, and the people released from ecclesiastical discipline. But at Rome all were deaf to these complaints; and it was not till the revolution produced by Luther that unhappy Europe obtained the desired relief (Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. cent. iii, sec. i, chap. 1). Leo X, in order to carry on the expensive structure of St. Peter’s Church at Rome, published ten indulgences, with a promise of remission due to all such as should contribute towards erecting that magnificent fabric. The right of promulgating these indulgences in Germany, together with a share in the profits arising from the sale of them, was granted to Albert, elector of Ments and archbishop of Magdeburg, who selected as his chief agent for retaining them in Saxony John Tetzel, a Dominican friar, of licentious morals, but of an active and enterprising spirit, and remarkable for his noisy and popular eloquence. Assisted by the monks of his order, he executed the commission with great zeal and success, but with no less indeftnacy, boasting that he had saved more souls from hell by his indulgences than St. Peter had converted by his preaching. He assured the purchasers of them that their crimes, however enormous, would be forgiven; that the efficacy of indulgences was so great that the most heinous sins, even if one should violate (which was impossible) the mother of God, would be remitted and expiated by the perfections both from punishment and guilt; and that this was a veritable gift of God, in order to reconcile men to himself. In the usual form of absolution, written by his own hand, he said: "May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee, and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion, sin, and death, and by his death before the mercy of the Holy Father, Peter and Paul, and of the most holy pope, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee, first, from all ecclesiastical censures, in whatever manner they have been incurred; then from all thy sins, transgressions, and excesses, how enormous soever they may be; even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the holy see, and as far as the keys of the holy Church extend. I remit to thee all punishment which thou deservest in Purgatory on their account; and I restore thee to the holy sacraments of the Church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity which thou lost through thine own transgression. And know, that gates of punishment shall be shut, and the gates of the Paradise of delights shall be opened; and if thou shalt not die at present, this grace shall remain in full force when thou art at the point of death. In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. The sentence of absolution and remission of sins is pronounced by me on their account in Christ’s stead. So be it; amen." The sale of indulgences was the breaking of the dam in which the indulgence-hunters collected all their benefits, and the necessity of purchasing them, was so extravagant that they appear almost incredible. If any man, said they, purchase letters of indulgence, his soul may rest secure with respect to its salvation. The whole system of indulgences was supported by the papal censure, and by the threat of excommunication to those who refused to buy indulgences, or to sell them, or to use them. If these should pursue any other course, which led to the Lutheran Reformation, and it was against these that Luther first directed his attacks. See Luther; Reformation.

III. Present Doctrine and Practice of Indulgence.—The following extracts show what has been, since the Council of Trent, and is now, the Roman doctrine of indulgence. The Council declared that "as the power of granting indulgences was given by Christ to the Church, and she has exercised it in the most ancient times, this holy synod teaches and commands that the use of them, as being greatly salutary to the Christian people, and approved by the authority of councils, shall be retained; and she anathematizes those who say they are useless, or deny to the Church the power of granting them; but in this grant the synod wishes that moderation, agreeably to the ancient and approved practice of the Church, be exercised, lest by too liberal indulgence the remission of sin be weakened" (Conc. Trident. Sess. xxv, De Indulgentiis). "If a bill of Indulgentias, whose object he states to be "that no one in future may allege ignorance of the doctrine of the Roman Church respecting indulgences and their efficacy," declares "that the Roman pontiff, view of Christ on earth, can, for reasonable causes, by the powers of the keys, grant to the faithful, whether in this life or in Purgatory, indulgences, out of the superabundance of the merits of Christ, and of the saints (expressly called a treasure); and that those who have truly obtained these indulgences are released from so much of the temporal punishment due for their actual sins to the divine justice as is equivalent to the indulgence granted and obtained" (Bulla Leon. X., auct. Luther.). Clemens VI, in the bull Unigenitus, explains this matter more fully: "As a single drop of Christ's blood would have sufficed for the redemption of the whole human race, so the rest was not lost, but "was a treasure which the wise man hid in the field, where it would be useful for the benefit of his sons; which treasure he would not suffer to be hid in a napkin, or buried in the ground, but committed it to be dispensed by St. Peter and his successors, his own vicars upon earth, for proper and reasonable causes, for the total or partial remission of the temporal punishment due to sin; and of all the whole salvation of his treasure, the merits of the blessed mother of God, and of all the elect, who are known to come in aid." The reasonable causes, on account of which indulgences are given, are, where "the cause be pious, that is, not a work which is merely temporal, or vain, or in no respect appertaining to the divine glory, but any work whatsoever which tends to the honor of God or the service of the Church, an indulgence will be valid." We see, occasionally, the very greatest indulgences given for the very slightest causes; as when a penitent indulgence is granted to a poor wretch, by a simple act of faith, whilst the pope gives the solemn blessing to the people on Easter day; for "indulgences do not depend, for their efficacy, on the consideration of the work enjoined, but on the infinite treasure of the merits of Christ and the saints, which is a consideration surpassing and transcending all the man's duties, which are granted and remitted for the same cause." In some cases the work enjoined must not only be pious and useful, but bear a certain proportion with the indulgence; that is, the work enjoined must tend to an end more pleasing in the sight of God than the satisfaction remitted, "although it is not necessary that it be in immediate connection, or satisfaction for, or difficult, and laborious (though these things ought to be regarded too), but that it be a means, apt and useful, towards obtaining the end for which the indulgence is granted." So "the large resort of people," before the gates of St. Peter, when the pope gives his solemn blessing, "is a means, apt and useful, to set forth the jubilee, and to gladden the people, and to give them the idea of the indulgence" (can. xi). The third and fourth Lateran Councils granted the same indulgence to those who set themselves to destroy heretics, or who shall take up arms against them (see Laubé, x., 1528). Boniface VIII granted not only a full and larger, but the most full pardon of all sins to all that visit Rome the first year in every century. Clement V decreed that they who should, at the Jubilee, visit such and such churches, should obtain a "most full remission of all their sins;" and he not only granted a "plenary absolution of all sins to all who died on the road to Rome," but also commanded the angels of Paradise to carry the soul direct to heaven. "Sin- cere repentance, we are told, "is always enjoined or implied in the grant of an indulgence, and is indispensably necessary for every grace" (Milner, End of Con- troversy, p. 804.). But as the dead are removed from the possibility of living, so are they removed from the necessity of repentance; "as the pope, says Bellarmine, is the satisfaction of Christ and the saints to the dead, by means of works enjoined on the living, they are applied, not in the way of judicial absolution, but in the way of pay- ment (per modum solutionis). For as when a person gives alms to a poor man, or makes a pittance on account of the dead, the effect is, not that he obtains absolution for themselves from their liability to punishment, but he presents to God that particular satisfaction for them, in order that God, on receiving it, may liberate the dead from the debt of punishment which they had to pay. In like manner, the pope does not absolve the deceased, but offers to God, out of the measure of satisfaction, as much as is necessary to free them" (ib.). Their object is "to afford succor to such as have departed real penitents in the love of God, yet before they had duly satisfied, by fruits worthy of penance, for sins of commission and omission, and are now purifying in the fire of Purgatory, that an entrance may be opened for them into that coun- try set apart for them, where they are defiled, and where they may be useful for the benefit of his sons; which treasure he would not suffer to be hid in a napkin, or buried in the ground, but committed it to be dispensed by St. Peter and his successors, his own vicars upon earth, for proper and reasonable causes, for the total or partial remission of the temporal punishment due to sin; and of all the whole salvation of his treasure, the merits of the blessed mother of God, and of all the elect, who are known to come in aid." tion of any soul from Purgatory, through a mass offered at that altar. Instead of these words, however, the same thing is more plainly expressed in some churches. In the church Santa Maria della Pace, so celebrated for the magnificent fresco of the Sibyls by Raphael, there is over one of the altars the following inscription: "Ogni messa in quest’altare è considerata come perdonato il delitto di purgatorio"—Every mass celebrated at this altar is considered as a soul released from Purgatory. In some churches this privilege extends throughout the year, but in others it is limited to those masses which are offered on particular days. In the church of Sta. Croce di Gerusalemme this privilege is connected in an especial manner with the fourth Sunday in Lent. And this is notified by a public notice posted in the church close to the altar, setting forth that a mass celebrated there on that day releases a soul from Purgatory" (Seymour, Eveings at Rome).

Indulgences are now granted in the Roman Church on a very ample scale, especially to all contributors to the erection of churches, and to the funds of the Propaganda and other missionary societies, etc. In fact, almost any act of piety (so-called) entitles one to an indulgence: as, for instance, the worship of relics; the visiting of churches or special altars; participation in divine services or in processions of such altars; the visiting of churches, and, especially, taking part in pilgrimages. Indulgences which apply either to the whole Church are called general (indulg. generalis), while those that are confined to particular localities, as a bishopric, etc., are called particular (indulg. particularis). The most general of these indulgences was that granted by the pope in the year 1366 to the Cathedral of Jubilee (q. v.). The general indulgence is always made out by the pope himself, while the particular indulgences, either plenary or novem plena, are often among the privileges of divers localities, either for special occasions or for various lengths of time, or occasionally, as in the case of the jubilees, for an indefinite period. The indulgence is granted by the bishop and two canons of the diocese receiving it. "Indulgences are divided into plenary and non-plenary, or partial, temporary, indefinite, local, perpetual, real, and personal. 1. A plenary indulgence is that by which is obtained a remission of all the temporal punishment due to sin, either in this life or in the next. 2. A non-plenary or partial indulgence is that which remits only a part of the temporal punishment due to sin: such are indulgences for a given number of days, weeks, or years. This sort of indulgence remits so many days, weeks, or years of penance, which ought to be observed agreeably to the ancient canons of the Church, for the sins which we have committed. 3. Temporary indulgences are those which are granted for a specified time, as for seven or more years. 4. Indefinite indulgences are those which are granted without any limitation of time. 5. Perpetual indulgences are those granted forever, and which do not require to be renewed after a given number of years. 6. A general indulgence is one granted by the pope to all the faithful throughout the world. 7. A local indulgence is attached to certain churches, chapels, or other places: it is gained by actually visiting such church or other building or place, and by observing scrupulously all the conditions required by the bull granting such indulgence. 8. A real indulgence is attached to certain movable things, as rosaries, medals, etc., and is granted to those who actually invest these articles with devotion; which binding devotions and their observance in what respects are in the nature of satisfaction, which were originally an integral part of the sacrament of penitence, are entirely disconnected, with it, and viewed as a mere matter of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but it has this further radical defect pervading all its constituent parts, that moral and religious things, which can only be taken as spiritual magnitudes, are considered as material ones, quality being treated wholly as quantity, and, consequently, a standard of external computation and a sort of religious arithmetic applied, which involves contradiction. Even in order to establish the superabundance of the merit of Christ, it was affirmed that there is a single drop of his blood would have sufficed for a universal atonement, yet the Saviour had shed so much, as if it were not the divine sacrifice of love on the part of the Son of God and man, and his atoning death in general, but his several outward sufferings of his whole humanity in what respects is of weight and importance consisted. In like manner, on the part of the saints, it was not their peculiar and more exalted moral and religious character, but their several works, and especially the volume rather than the worth of these, which was taken into account; and the whole was handled as something totally disconnected with their persons, as an objective fund, a sum of ready money in the Church's hands. According to the same category, the imputation of the merits of Christ and the saints was described as a purely external transference of a portion of that sum to one who needed it. For, although a penitent frame of mind was required of the sinner, still

It was not for the sake, nor according to the measure of that, that the merit of Christ and the saints was transferred to him, but solely for the sake of some service performed by him for the Church, and this performance, again, is quite an external and isolated work. At the same time, as respects the merits of the saints, the theory of indulgences is based on the supposition that a man who is still human, although a saint, may not only possess a sufficiency of merit to answer his own need before God, but may likewise do more than the divine law demands of him, and thus acquire a surplus of merit for the benefit of others. Even this is a monstrous supposition, but still more monstrous is the position that another, who invokes the religious domain and the glory of God. In point of fact, the doctrine and practice of indulgences gives the Church a position as an absolutely unerring and omniscient judicial power. It identifies the tribunal of the Church with that of God, and the tribunal of the pope with that of the Church, whereby indirectly identifying the pope's of God's, so that the pope is raised to a position, in virtue of which, as the visible head of the mystical body of Christ, and as the dispenser of all penalties and graces, he decides the high and mighty. This is the salvation of the living and the dead, according to his mere pleasure. Granting, however, that the whole doctrine were well founded, the position assigned to the pope would be one elevated far above the reach of fancy, and could be designated only as that of a terrestrial god. What an infinite amount of power would be the means to a corruption, a playing with the powers, and with what conscientiousness sharpened to the utmost ought the popes, if they were bold enough to believe that such plenitude of power had actually been lodged in the hands of any child of the dust, to have dispensed the long blessings committed to their trust? How carefully ought they to have guarded them from perversion and debasement! And yet what do we see? Abuse upon abuse, and profanation upon profanation, in an ascending scale, for more than two centuries, until at last moral indignation bursts like a tempest upon their impious hurlings! (Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, i, 246). "Either the pope has the power of bringing souls out of Purgatory, or he has not. If he has not, the question is decided. If he has, what cruelty, then, for him to leave there whole millions of souls whom he might by a word bring out of it! Without greater power would there be a congregation, a pittance, and with what conscientiousness sharpened to the utmost ought the popes, if they were bold enough to believe that such plenitude of power had actually been lodged in the hands of any child of the dust, to have dispensed the long blessings committed to their trust? How carefully ought they to have guarded them from perversion and debasement! And yet what do we see? Abuse upon abuse, and profanation upon profanation, in an ascending scale, for more than two centuries, until at last moral indignation bursts like a tempest upon their impious hurlings! (Ullmann, Reformers before the Reformation, i, 246)."

Indul (Latin indulitus, participle of indulgere, I indulge) signifies in ecclesiastical law a peculiar form of dispensation granted by the pope from the requirements of the ordinary law. Thus the power of bestowing benefits is granted to cardinals or princes by an indul from the pope. these subjects instruction in cooking, washing, and ironing has been tried as yet only to a limited extent, and has been only partially successful. In ragged schools, on the other hand, no department of the school-work seems to thrive better, partly because it enters so largely into the scheme of instruction, partly because the children are so fluent on the subject. In England the ragged schools are recognised by the Legislature as 'industrial schools,' and may be defined as schools in which the pupils are fed and clothed (wholly or partially), as well as taught the elements of an ordinary education, and the practice of some trade. By a statute of 1828 children under bond must not beg or be vagrant or begging, convicted of petty offences, may be sent by a magistrate to an industrial school that has been certified by the home secretary. Parents also, on paying for board and lodging a small sum, may place their children in industrial schools if they can show that they are unable to control them. The treasury may contribute to the maintenance of these schools on the representation of the home secretary. If a child abscond from the school before he is 15, the justices may send him back, or place him in a reformatory school (q. v.). In 1861 there were in England 39, and in Scotland 342, in both of which the number of pupils attending was respectively 1754 in the former, and 1606 in the latter" (Chambers, s. v.). In Germany, these schools prove even a greater boon to the poorer classes than elsewhere, especially to orphans. By law every child is obliged to attend school instruction (sachliche Bildung), and the number of pupils and the requirement of some trade enables children of 14 to begin work to advantage, and earn at least their own livelihood if they may not even aid in the support of their parents or other near relatives. It is to be hoped that in the United States the generous spirit of the people will stimulate especially further this work, and make industrial schools numerous in all our large cities at least. (J. H. W.)

Indwelling Scheme, a name used by some English theologians to denote a theory derived from Col. ii, ix: "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," which, according to some, asserts the doctrine of Christ's consisting of two beings: one the self-existent Creator, and the other a creature, made into one person by an ineffable union and indwelling, which renders the same attributes and honors equally applicable to both. See Christology.

Indwelling Sin. See SIN.

Ineffable Deus. See IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

Ineffability. See INDEFECTIBILITY.

Ineffability is the quality of being incapable either of being deceived, or of leading others astray. Romantics, while acknowledging that God alone is naturally ineffable, maintain that he has been pleased to transmit this quality, to some undefined extent, to the Church and to the Pope, so that they are ineffable in their decisions on all points of doctrine.

I. INEFFABILITY OF THE CHURCH.—The following is a condensed view of the ineffability of the Church of Rome, as collected from her own authors. Denis affirms, "That the Church, in matters of faith and manners, can by no means err; is an article of belief. Moreover, ineffability in the Church may be considered in two points of view: the one active and authoritative, which is called ineffability in teaching and defining; the other passive or submissive (obedientialis), which is called ineffability in learning and believing. Ineffability, considered in the first sense, refers to the Church with respect to the head or chief pontiff, and the prelates of the Church; although this ineffability would not regard the laity or inferior pastors; for, as a man is said to see, although his vision does not apply to all his members, but to his eyes only, so the Church, in like manner, is said to be ineffable, although this ineffability refers only to the prelates. But if the Church is not said—
Infallibility

Luke x, 16). They also quote 2 Tim. i, 14; ii, 2; and Acts xx, 28, to show that the apostles claimed this privilege for themselves, as well as the power of transmitting it to those they appointed over the churches.

The same privilege has also been ascribed to the pope as successor of St. Peter, and God's only vicegerent on earth, by Bucer, Zwingli, Beza, Baronius, etc., maintaining that whatever dogmatic judgment or decision on a doctrinal point the pope addressed to the whole church, is necessarily correct. But as it has repeatedly occurred that the Church, as represented in councils, has disagreed with the pope on points of doctrine, it is clear that both are equally responsible, the people are bound to believe equally two opposite doctrines. The French Church settled the difficulty by proclaiming general councils superior to the pope (or "more infallible"); the assembly of the clergy, in 1682, asserted that "in controversies of faith the office of the pope is the chief, and that his decrees pertain to all churches; nevertheless, that his judgment is not irreformable unless it is confirmed by the consent of the Church." Bossuet sustained this principle with great talent and eloquence in his Defensio Declarat. Cleri Galli, ii, pt. i, 12 sq. He proves by the decrees of councils, both ancient and modern, and by the declarations of popes themselves, and especially of Adrian VI, that the infallibility of the pope was a new doctrine, altogether unknown in the early ages of the Church. He disproves the infallibility of the pope not merely by authority, but by a long and strong chain of positive evidence; by adding a number of instances, as well as direct assertions of his infallibility from generation to generation; by showing, from a large induction of facts, that during a series of centuries he was regarded and treated as fallible, and never as otherwise than fallible; and that, when another opinion began to gain ground, it arose mainly from the exercise of that authority which belongs to a supreme power" (Hare, Contest with Rome, p. 218).

Bossuet's views were held by Fleury, Dupin, cardinal Bausset, etc. They were attacked by De Maistre in his work Du Pape. A work of great weight on this subject is the recently discovered Refutation of all Heresies of Hippolytus, which gives us a clear idea of the manner in which the Roman bishops were considered in his times. "In Germany, where truth is held the most precious of all possessions, even by members of the Church, the doctrine of infallibility of the bishops produced by the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope is so strongly felt by many, that one of the greatest philosophers of the last generation, Baader, who was a zealous champion of the Christian truth, and himself an earnest Roman Catholic, used perpetually to repeat the pregnant words of St. Martin: Le Pape n'est la faiblesse du Catholicisme; et le Catholicisme est la force du Pape" (Hare, Contest with Rome, p. 218).

As regards the infallibility of the Church, Dr. Newman himself, in his Lectures on Romanism, p. 61, said: "In the creed of pope plus a word is said expressly about the Church's infallibility: it forms no article of faith there. Her interpretation indeed of Scripture is recognized as authoritative; but so also is "the unanimous consent of the fathers, whether as primitive or concordant; they believe the existing Church to be infallible; and, if ancient belief is at variance with it, of course it is not to be followed, but if it is, antiquity must be mistaken—that is all.""

"That general councils are infallible is generally believed by Romanists. Some, however, maintain that the confirmation of the pope is necessary to constitute infallibility. But the decrees of councils are infallible, whether confirmed by the pope or not. We quote the sentiments of some who contend that the decrees of a general council, with the confirmation of the pope, are infallible. Ferraris says, "The definitions of a general council legitimately assembled, issued in the absence of the pope, are not infallible without his confirmation" (Ferraris, Biblioth. Prompt, in Concilium, art. i, sect. 66). Cardinal Cusanus, as quoted by the former writer, declares that "the pope gives authority to the council" (Cusanus, lib. iii, cap. xv, De Concord Cathol.)." Jens teaches that "general councils, without the approbation of the pope, are fallible, and often err; that the confirmation of the pope to any particular decrees of a council imparts to them the character of infallibility. It is then necessary that both the pope, by his consent, and general councils approved by the pope cannot err in defining matters of faith and morals: hence they are to be considered as manifest heretics who presume to call in question what is decreed by such councils." He also believes that the decisions of particular councils are fallible by the pope's infallibility, and that this is founded on the infallibility of the pope. But Benedict XIV., to whom Jens refers, thinks that the decisions of such councils are binding only in their own provinces or dioceses. Many Romanist writers, however, maintain strongly that the decisions of general councils are infallible without the pope's confirmation. It would be an endless task to quote the authorities on both sides. They are, for the most part, however, agreed that what they call general councils are infallible: some believe them infallible because they are general councils, while others, believing the same, consider the confirmation of the pope necessary to the authoritative character of the assembly.

"The discordant sentiments of Romanists respecting those characteristics which are necessary to constitute infallibility, form a strong argument against the inerrancy of this doctrine. The Church has never openly professed that it has been strongly held by the Church of Rome: (1) Some have asserted that the diffusive, and not the representative body of the Church possessed infallibility. Occam, Petrus de Alaco, Cusanus, Antoninus of Florence, Pas- norvian, Nicholas de Ciamings, Franciscus Miranda, and others, were of this opinion, and either say that councils are no farther infallible than as they adhere to Scripture and universal tradition. (3) Others, that councils are of themselves infallible, whether the pope confirm them or not. This was the common opinion before the Council of Lateran, under Leo X, as appears from the Councils of Basel and Constance. (4) Many make the confirmation of the pope necessary to the infallibility of a general council. There is an irreconcilable difference between the two opinions; for those who suppose councils to be infallible without the confirmation of the pope believe the latter to be fallible; while those who are of opinion that the confirmation of his holiness is absolutely necessary to the infallibility of the council believe him to be infallible, and superior to a council."

II. INFALLIBILITY OF THE PAPe.—For many centuries the popes have demanded, and, so far as they can, in them, enforced an absolute submission to all their doctrinal decisions. They forbade appeal from their tribunal to the General Council, and even disallowed the plea of the Jansenists, Hervesian, and other schools whose views were censured, that the popes censoring them had erred, not in what they stated to be the approved doctrine, but in understanding the right sense of the censured books. Thus the popes for many centuries have acted as though they were infallible; and yet it was distinctly taught within the Church that the infallibility of the pope was no property of infallible councils, and even many catechisms and manuals of doctrine explicitly stated, with the consent of many bishops, that the infallibility of the pope was not a doctrine of the Church. One of the chief objects for which the Vatican Council was called in 1869 was to make an end of this uncertainty and enrole the doctrine of papal infallibility among the formal Church doctrines. Anson as It became generally known that it was intended to bring this subject before the council, a number of works appeared, discussing the proposed innovation in every aspect. By far the most important of these is the one published in Germany under the title Der Papst und das Concil (Mentz, 1869; Engl. transl. The Pope and the Council), which gives an exhaustive history of the views of the popes on the question of infallibility of the work, who on the title-page calls himself Janus, was subsequently found to be professor Huber, of the University of Munich. The book is a storehouse of immense learning, for the author quotes thousands of individual cases to show that no one can for a moment believe in the infallibility of the pope, the irresponsibility of his personal worthiness or unworthiness, is valid and indelible. Putting aside baptism, the whole security of the sacraments rests on this principle of faith, and re-ordination has always been opposed in the Church as a crime and a profanation of the sacrament. Only in the 5th century, in Rome, during the pontificate of the Goths and Lombards inflected on Central Italy, there was a collapse of all learning and theology, which disturbed and distorted the dogmatic tradition. Since the 8th century, the ordinations of certain popes began to be annulled, and the bishops and priests ordained by them were compelled to be reordained. This occurred first in 769, when Constantine II, who had possessed the papal chair by force of arms, and kept it for thirteen months, was blinded, and deposed at a synod, and all his ordinations pronounced invalid.

But the most crucial case took place at the end of the 9th century, after the death of pope Formosus, when the repeated rejections of his ordinations threw the whole Italian Church into the greatest confusion, and produced a general uncertainty as to whether there were any valid sacraments in Italy. Auxilius, who was a contemporary, claims that through the monotonous repetition of orders ('ordinatio, exordinatio, et superordinatio'), matters had come to such a pass in Rome that for twenty years the Christian religion had been interrupted and extinguished in Italy. Popes and synods decided in glaring contradiction to one another, now for, now against the validity of the ordinations, and it was self-evident that in Rome all sure knowledge on the doctrine of ordination was lost. At the end of his second work, Auxilius, speaking in the name of those numerous priests and bishops whose ecclesiastical status was called in question by the decisions of Stephen VII and Sergius III, demands that the Holy General Council, as the only authority capable of solving the complication introduced by the popes (Mabillon, Analecta [Paris, 1728], p. 39).

But the council never met, and the dogmatic uncertainty and confusion in Rome continued. The end of the 11th century the great contest against simony, which was then thought equivalent to heresy, broke out, and the ordinations of a simoniacal bishop were pronounced invalid. Leo IX reordained a number of persons on this ground, as Peter Damiani relates (Petri Damiani Opera p. 419). Gregory VII, at his fifth Roman synod, made the invalidity of all simoniacal ordinations a rule, and the principle, confirmed by Urban II, that a simoniacal bishop can give nothing in ordination, because he has nothing, passed into the Decretum of Gratian (Causa, i, qu. 7, c. 24).

In these cases it is obvious that doctrine and practice were most intimately connected. It was only from their holding a false, and, in its consequences, most injurious notion of the power and nature of this sacrament, that the popes acted as they did, and if they had been generally considered infallible, a hopeless confusion must have been introduced, not only into Italy, but the whole Church.

In contrast to pope Pelagius, who had declared, with the whole Eastern and Western Church, the indispensable necessity of the invocation of the Trinity in baptism, Nicolas I assured the Bulgarians that baptism in the name of Christ alone was quite sufficient, and thus exposed the Christians there to the danger of an invalid baptism. The same pope declared confirmation administered by priests, according to the Greek usage from remote antiquity, invalid, and ordered those so confirmed to be confirmed anew by a bishop, thereby denying... to the whole Eastern Church the possession of a sacrament, and laying the foundation of the bitter estrangement which led to a permanent division (Concil. Coll. [ed. Labbe], vi, 548).

"Stephen II (III) allowed marriage with a slave girl to be dissolved, and a new one contracted, whereas all previous papal pronouncements on such marriages had been indissoluble (ib. vi, 1650). He also declared baptism, in cases of necessity, valid when administered with wine (ib. vi, 1662).

"Celestine III tried to loosen the marriage tie by declaring it dissolved if either party became heretical. Innocent III, in this decision, was condemned by Adrian VI, who called Celestine a heretic for giving it. This decision was afterwards expunged from the MS. collections of papal decrees, but the Spanish theologian Alphonseus de Castro had seen it there (Ade. Hcr. [ed. Paris], 1665; comp. Melch. Canus, p. 246).

"The Cappeneast doctrine, that Christ's body is sensibly (sensualis) touched by the hands and broken by the teeth in the Eucharist— an error rejected by the whole Church, and contradicting the impassibility of his body—was affirmed by Nicholas II at the Synod of Rome. Berenger was condemned to acknowledge it. Lanfranc reproaches Berenger with afterwards wishing to make cardinal Humbert, instead of the pope, responsible for this doctrine (Lanfranc, De Euch. c. 3 [ed. Migne], p. 412).

"Innocent III, in order to exhibit the papal power in the one of the effects of its divine omnipotence, invented the new doctrine that the spiritual bond which unites a bishop to his diocese is firmer and more indissoluble than the carnal bond, as he called it, between man and wife, and that God alone can dissolve it, viz. translate a bishop from one see to another. But as the pope is the representative of the true God on earth, he, and he alone, can dissolve this holy and indissoluble bond, not by human, but divine authority, and it is God, not man, who looses it. (Decretal 'De Transl. Episc.', c. 2, 3, 4, 5. This was to introduce a new article of faith. The Church had not known for centuries that resignations, depositions, and translations of bishops belonged by divine right to the pope.) The obvious and direct corollary, that the pope can also dissolve the less firm and holy bond of marriage, Innocent, as we have seen, overlooked, for he solemnly condemned Celestine III's decision to the Pope, and thus he was himself in a contradiction. Many canonists have accepted this as the legitimate consequence of his teaching.

"Innocent betrayed his utter ignorance of theology when he declared that the Fifth Book of Moses, being called Deuteronomy, or the Second Book of the Law, must bind the Christian Church, which is the second Church (Decretal 'Qui filii sit legitimi', c. 13). This great pope seems never to have read Deuteronomy, or he could hardly have fallen into the blunder of supposing, e.g., that the Old Testament prohibitions of particular kinds of food, the burnt-offerings, the harsh penal code and bloody laws of war, the prohibitions of woolen and linen garments, etc., were to be again made obligatory on Christians. As the Jews were allowed in Deuteronomy to put away a wife who displeased them and take another, Innocent ran the risk of falling himself into a greater error about marriage than Celestine III.

"Notable contradictions as to temporal privileges occur in the history of the alternate approbations and persecutions of the Franciscan order by the pope.

"One of the most comprehensive, dogmatic documents ever issued by a pope is the decree of Eugenius IV to the Armenians, dated November 22, 1439; three months after the Council of Florence was brought to an end by the departure of the Greeks. It is a confession of faith of the Roman Church, intended to serve as a rule of doctrine and practice for the Armenians on those points they had previously differed about. The dogmas of the Unity of the Divine Nature, the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Seven Sacraments, are expounded, and the pope, moreover, asserts that the decree thus solemnly issued has received the sanction of the council, that is, of the Italian bishops whom he had detained in Florence.

"If this decree of the pope were really a rule of faith, the Eastern Church would have only four sacraments instead of seven, and this would have been the case between the first and the eighth century, and for less eight centuries have been deprived of three sacraments, and of one, the want of which would make all the rest, with one exception, invalid. Eugenius IV determines in this decree the form and matter, the substance of the sacraments, or of those things on the presence or absence of which the Catholic Church has decided, according to the universal doctrine of the Church. He gives a form of confirmation which never existed in one half of the Church, and first came into use in the other after the 10th century. So, again, with penance. What is given as the essential form of the sacrament was unknown in the Western Church for eleven hundred years, and never known in the Greek. And when the touching of the sacred vessels, and the words accompanying the rite, are given as the form and matter of ordination, it follows that the Latin Church for a thousand years has not known the consecration of the Greek Church, which never adopted this usage, possesses to this hour neither priests nor bishops, and consequently no sacraments except baptism, and perhaps marriage. (Comp. Denzinger, Enchirid. Symbol. et Defini., Viene, 1864, p. 200 sq. But Denzinger, in order to explain the sacraments of the Roman Church, defines his decree, has omitted the first part, on the Trinity and Incarnation, which is given in Raynaldus's Annuar, 1439. (The same conspicuously unexplained explanation was adopted in the Dublin Review for January, 1866.—Tr.))

"It is noteworthy that this decree— with which papal caprice of the bishops and universality, and for which the decrees of the Church stand or fall—is cited, refuted, and appealed to by all dogmatic writers, but that the adorants of papal infallibility have never meddled with it. Neither Bellarmine, nor Charles, nor Aguirre, nor Omi, nor the other theologians of the Roman court, troubled themselves with it."

"Into dogmatic theology the doctrine of papal infallibility was introduced by Thomas Aquinas. On the basis of fabrications invented by a Dominican monk, including a canon of the Council of Chalcedon, giving all the bishops and universities, and for the decrees, the decrements of the Church stand or fall—the Church, Thomas built up his papal system, with its two leading principles, that the pope is the infallible teacher of the world, and the absolute ruler of the Church. The popes were so well pleased with the teachings of Thomas that John XXII, who openly affirmed that Thomas had written without a spirit of inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and Innocent VI said that whoever assailed his teaching incurred suspicion of heresy. The powerful mendicant orders of Dominicans and Franciscans found the papal system, with its theory of infallibility, indispensable for the success of their own claims against the bishops and universities, and they became the violent champions of the new doctrine. The boldest champions of papal absolutism admitted, however, that the popes could err, and that their decisions were no certain criterion. But they also held that in such cases a heretical pope ipse facto ceased to be pope, without or before any judicial sentence, so that councils, which are the Church's judicature, only attested the vacancy of the papal throne as an accomplished fact.

"The contest between the Council of Basel and pope Eugenius IV evoked the work of cardinal Torquemada, who vigorously attacked those who hold to the teachings of Bellarmine, to be the most conclusive apology of the papal system, rests entirely on fabrications later than the pseudo-Isidore, and chiefly on the spurious passages of St. Cyril. Torquemada also holds that a pope can lapse into heresy and propound false doctrine, but then he is ipse factum deposed by God himself before any sentence of the Church has been passed, so that the Church or council cannot judge him, but can only announce the judgment of God, and thus one cannot properly say that a pope can become heretical, since he ceases to be pope at the moment of passing from orthodoxy to heterodoxy. The doctrine entered on a fresh phase of development from the time of Leo X. Its foremost defender at that time was Thomas Cajetan, and yet the doctrine was so far from becoming dominant at Rome that the successor of Leo X, Adrian VI, who, as professor of Louvain, had maintained in his principal work that several popes had been heretical, and that it was certainly possible for a pope to establish a heresy by his decree, at that time was Thomas Cajetan, and his work denrying infallibility to be reprinted in Rome.

Another patron of the infallibility theory, who labored hard to naturalize it in Belgium, the Louvain theologian, Ruard Tapper, returned in 1592 from Trent cruelly disillusionized, and thought the deep-seated corruption of the Church a matter not to be disputed, but to be deposed. The third of the theological fathers of infallibility in the 16th century was Tapper's contemporary, the Spaniard Melchior Canus, whose work on theological principles and evidences was, up to Bel- larminian times, more important for the infallibilists. Like Tapper, he became in later years disgusted with the effect of the papal system on the popes and the Curia, and in a report to the king of Spain expressed the opinion that the whole administration of the Church at Rome was "converted into a great trading place for goods and of great gains." For the pope can natural, and divine." Out of Italy the hypothesis of infallibility had but few adherents, even in the 16th century, till the Jesuits began to exercise a powerful influence.

The bishops and prominent scholars of France, Spain, Germany, and other countries were almost unanimous in advocating the superiority of ecclesiastical councils over the pope. The turning of the tide was chiefly due to the influence of the Jesuits, who were naturally inclined to favor the extreme absolutism in the Church. Their representative, cardinal Bellarmine further developed the ideas of Cajetan, in which he generally concurs; but he rejects decisively Cajetan's hypothesis of a heretical pope being deposed in quo facto by the judgment of God. A heretical pope is legitimate so long as the Church has not deposed him. If Cajetan said the Church was entitled to depose such a pope, Bellarmine says that whatever doctrine it pleases the pope to prescribe the Church must receive; there can be no question raised about proving it; she must blindly renounce all judgment of her own, and firmly believe that all the pope teaches is absolutely true, all he commands absolutely good, and all he forbids absolutely evil. For the pope can as little err in moral as in dogmatic questions. Nay, he goes so far as to maintain that if the pope were to err by prescribing sins and forbidding virtues, the Church would be bound to consider sins good and virtues evil, unless she chose to sin against conscience; so that if the pope absolve the subjects of a prince from their oath of allegiance, which, according to Bellarmine, he has a full right to do, the Church must believe that what he has done is good, and every Christian must hold it a sin to remain any longer loyal and obedient to his sovereign. In this connection Bellarmine and other writers of his order, the infallibility hypothesis now made immense strides. One great stumbling-block had, however, to be removed. Every theologian, on closer inspection, found papal decisions which contradicted other doctrines, laid down by popes or generally received from the pope, and his desire was to give to the pope an infallible authority, but he knew his doubts, and it seemed impossible to declare all these products of an infallible authority. It became necessary, therefore, to provide some distinctive marks by which a really infallible decision of a pope might be recognized, or to fix certain conditions, in the absence of which the pronouncement is not to be regarded as infallible. And thus, since the 16th century, there grew up the famous distinction of papal decisions promulgated ex cathedra, and therefore dogmatically, and without any possibility of error. By means of this ingenious distinction, some of the most inconvenient decisions of popes, which it was desirable to escape from the privilege of infallibility generally asserted in other cases, could be excluded. Thus最好。 This about the latter limited the dogmatic letter which was condemned as heretical by the sixth ecumenical council, and the decision addressed by Nicolas I to the Bulgarian Church that baptism administered simply in the name of Jesus is valid, were declared to be judgments given by the popes as private persons. In other words, they were not pronounced by the theologians advocating infallibility, but only two were commonly received, viz. Bellarmine's, that the papal decree must be addressed to the whole Church; and Cellesi's, that he must anathematize all who dissent from his teaching. According to this doctrine, which is taught by the most prominent dogmatic writer of the order in the present century, Perrone (Prolect. Theol. viii, 497, Louvain, 1848), and received by pretty nearly the whole order, the pope is liable to err when he addresses an instruction to the French or German Church only, while his pronouncements are, however, very questionable whenever he omits to denounce an anathema on all dissentients. Since the time of Bellarmine, the infallibility hypothesis has been one of the chief distinctions of the Jesuits and the most radical portion of the Ultramontane party on the one hand, and of all other parties on the other. A number of synods, bishops, and prominent theologians, and in some instances the whole Catholic Church of several countries, put themselves on record against the doctrine, for which, on the other hand, the Jesuits and other Ultramontane writers incessantly strove to gain friends among the bishops, clergy, and laity, and, in particular, among the sovereigns.

When pope Pius IX intimated his intention to invoke a council for the definition of the doctrine, a number of bishops, especially in France and Germany, declared themselves to be decidedly opposed to the doctrine, and at least one of them, the French bishop Marcellus (bishop of Suria in partibus infidelium, and dean of the theological faculty of Paris), published an elaborate work (On The General Council and the public Peace) to refute it, and to prove that it would subvert the very basis of the church. The opposition against papal infallibility is as follows: According to the holy Scriptures the Church is a limited monarchy, which stands under the common rule of the pope and the bishops. The history of the councils is at least as much in favor of the divine right of the bishops as of the supremacy of the holy chair. The freedom of discussion, vote by majority, a juridical examination of the apostolic decrees, and in certain cases a right to condemn the doctrines and the person of the pope—these are rights which prove beyond all doubt the participation of the bishops in the sovereign powers of the holy father. But the time being far enough to give the episcopal body a supremacy over the pope, and the latter therefore exercises, in general, all the privileges of supremacy. He summons the council, presides over it, dissolves it, and sanctions its decrees. In a word, he always remains the master of the Church. If, however, the changes desired by a certain school are made, the Church will cease to be a limited, and become an absolute monarchy. This would be a complete revolution; but what is truly divine is unchangeable, and, consequently, if the constitution of the Church is changed, it is to be done by the divine authority. Infallibilitas Dei, has himself said of doctrine, Crescit in codem sensui, in eodem sententia; but the new dogma would lead to a development of doctrine in alio sensui, in aliquo sententia. It would therefore amount to a denial of the divinity of the Church. "If it were received," exclaims the bishop, "what a triumph would it be to the enemies of the Church! They would call the saev-ATIONS of centuries, and history itself, as witnesses against Catholicism: she would be crushed by the weight of opposing testimony; the holy Scriptures, the fathers, and the councils would rise in judgment against her. With the moderns, who ascribe to us in our infancy, from the desert atheism would rise more powerful and threatening than ever" (ii, 378).

When the council met (Dec. 8, 1869) it was soon found that there were, with regard to this question, three parties among the bishops: one, which regarded the presentation of the doctrine of infallibility as the best and most urgent work the council should attend to; the second, which petitioned the pope against this doctrine, which they believed would be at least a great stumbling-block for all non-Catholics, and even for a great many members of the Catholic Church; the third, which was in favor of a compromise, would have some regard for the arguments aduced by the second class, and therefore, instead of promoting in unmistakable and bold clearness the doctrine of papal infallibility, would attain the same end in a less offensive way, by inculcating the duty of an absolute submission to the decision of the pope in matters of faith. The majority of the bishops signed a petition for the promulgation of infallibility, which had been drawn up by the German bishop of Paduborn, and received 410 signatures. The counter addresses (or, rather, counter addresses) against the infallibility of the bishops, among which there were 29 Americans, 46 Frenchmen, 37 Germans and Austrians, 19 Orientals, 2 Portuguese, 14 Hungarians, 3 Englishmen, and 15 Italians. The address of the middle party, which desired to effect a compromise, was drawn up by the archbishop of Baltimore. The address against the promulgation of the doctrine of infallibility, drawn up by the cardinal archbishop Rauscher, of Vienna, is couched in the most submissively expressions, assures the holy father of the devotion of all the bishops to the apostolical see, and concludes: "It would not be right to ignore the many difficulties, arising from express actions or actions of the Church fathers from the documents of history, and even from the Catholic doctrine, remain, which must be thoroughly explained before it would be admissible to lay this doctrine before the Christian people as one revealed by God. But our minds revolt against the contrary decision of this question, and confidently implore thy kindness not to lay upon us the duty of such a transaction. As we, moreover, exercise the episcopal functions among great Catholic nations, we know their condition from daily intercourse; hence we are satisfied that the asked-for doctrine of infallibility will offer weapons of our religion, in order to excite aversion to the Catholic religion, even of men of good character, and we are certain that this decision would, at least in Europe, an opportunity or a pretext to the governments of our countries to make encroachments upon the rights which have remained to the Church. We have concluded to lay this before thy holiness, with the sincerity which we owe to the father of the faithful, and we ask thee that the doctrinal opinion, the sanction of which is demanded by the address, be not submitted to the council for consideration. Among the signers are, besides the cardinal archbishop of Vienna, metropolitan, the archbishops of Germany and Austria; in particular, the cardinal archbishop of Prague, the archbishops of Cologne, Munich, Bamberg, and others. The bishops who signed this remonstrance against the promulgation of papal infallibility have been confined for some years in the inopportune. Only a few plainly expressed themselves against the dogma itself. But what the bishops failed to do, the Catholic scholars, especially those of Germany, did so emphatically that their protests against the ultra papal theories, and against the whole spirit prevailing in Rome, made a profound sensation throughout the Christian world.

One of the most learned Church historians of the Roman Catholic Church, professor Döllinger, of the University of Munich, in a letter addressed to the Augsburger Zeitung, and since published as a pamphlet in an enlarged form (Erwägungen für die Bischofe des Concils, Ratibon, 1869), subjected the address of the bishops to the most crushing criticism. Dr. Döllinger says of this petition of the champions of papal infallibility that henceforth "one hundred and eighty millions of human beings are to be forced, on pain of excommunication, refusal of the sacraments, and everlasting damnation, to the belief that the Church, which we are told has not believed, not taught." The proclamation of this dogma, he says, would be an "alteration in the faith and doctrine of the Church such as has never been heard of since Christianity was first founded." The whole foundation of the Church would thereby be destroyed. Dr. Döllinger shews conclusively that until the 16th century the doctrine of papal infallibility was entirely unknown, and that, when it was taken up by cardinal Bellarmine, it could only be supported by the testimony of Isidorian decreets, which are forged, and those of Cyril of Alexandria, a ficer.

The views of Döllinger and Gratry received the emphatic assent of the large majority of the Catholic scholars of Germany and France. The governments of France, Austria, Portugal, Spain, Bavaria, and other Catholic countries instructed their ministers in Rome to enter as protest against the new doctrine. The first to compel all members of the Roman Catholic Church to believe in the right of the pope to choose kings and lease their subjects from the oath of allegiance. Even some of the members of the council, in particular the cardinal archbishop Rauscher of Vienna, and bishop Heleod of Rome, who was regarded as the most learned bishop of the council, published pamphlets against the dogmatization of infallibility while it was discussed by the council. But all this opposition failed to make the least impression upon the majority of the bishops. From the opening of the council until the close, the members themselves so uncompromising that they refused to give to the minority even one single representative in the important commission on dogmatical questions, which, on the other hand, embraced the name of every bishop who, by writings, influence, or otherwise, had gained a prominent position as a defender of infallibility: in particular, archbishop Manning, of Westminster; archbishop Dechamps, of Malines; archbishop Spalding, of Baltimore; bishop Martin, of Paduborn; bishop Pie, of Poitiers; the Armenian patriarch Hassun, of Constantinople. The discussion of the question commenced on the 16th of December. The 18th of December, the council, after four days of discussion, decided to commit to the commission the rest of the question. The resolutions of the council made it lawful for ten prelates to petition for the closing of a discussion; the proposal being then put to the vote of all the fathers, and the majority deciding. When fifty-five speeches had been made, the matter was referred to a committee. On the 3rd of January, the bishops sent a petition for closing the general discussion, which was accordingly done, to the great dissatisfaction of the opponents of infallibility, a number of whom addressed to the pope a protest against the closing of the general discussion, as it had deprived the council of the opportunity to hear all the arguments for and against the new doctrine. The discussion of the schema as regards the whole and the several parts having been completed, a vote was taken according to the regulations in a general congregation on the 13th of July, on the whole schema by name, with placet, or placet iusta modum, or non-placet. The result was as follows: 451 placet, 62 placet iusta modum, and 88 non-placet. Some of the placet iusta modum, while 3164 answered placet, 2 replied non-placet, and 106 were absent, some be- cause sick, the far greater number not wishing to vote favorably. As soon as the result was made known of- ficially to Pius IX, he announced the fact of all with the exception of two having given a favorable vote, "Wherefore," he continued "by virtue of our apostolic authority, with the approval of the sacred council, we define, confirm, and approve the decree and canons just read." The following is a faithful translation of chapter iv of the schema, which treats of papal infallibility: "by acknowledging the authority of the Church (St. Pius IX, 13th July, 1870)."

The expectation that some of the bishops who opposed infallibility at the council would persist in their opposition, and decline to promulgate the new doctrine in their dioceses, was not fulfilled. The bishops not only submitted themselves, but forced also their dioceses to submit. In Germany, number of the most promi- nent theological scholars were removed from their chairs, and suspended from their priestly functions, for refusing to comply with the demands of Rome. Thus the creed of the Roman Catholic Church received a new doctrine which, in the opinion of many theologians who up to that time had regarded throughout the Church as her oldest scholars, radically changes the character of the Church.

According to the opinion of Dr. Dollinger, more has been written on this subject during the last one hun- dred and thirty years than on any other point of Catholic dogma. It has been as if it were the most important work on the subject, that of Janus (The Pope and the Council), as well as the works of Maret, Dollinger, Maistre, and several works of former centuries, have already been noticed. Other important works treating on the subject are Ballerini, De Vico ut Rousseus (F. S. S. Buonarotti, Deschamps (archbishop of Malines), L Infallibilitas papae (Malines, 1869); Gratry, Lettres sur L infallibilita du Pope (Paris, 1870); Weininger, De L infallibilita del Pope (Cincinnati, 1869); Herderthauer, Anti-Janua (Wurzburg, 1870); Frohshammer, Zur Wir- digung der Unbeachtbarkeit der Papst und d. Kirche (Mi- nchen, 1869); Bickel, Gründe für die Unbeachtbarkeit des Kirchenoberhaupts (München, 1870); Rauscher (cardi- nal), Archiv für systematische und historische katholische In- fallibilität. ecclesiae subiecto (Naples, 1870, against the dogmatization of infallibility); Kleutgen (Jesuit), De Romani Pontificis Suprema potestate docendi (Naples, 1870); Schmitz, Ist der Papst persönlich unverfahrenheit (München, 1867). The fullest account of the proceedings of the council, and of all the actions that而后 is given in Quirinus, Römische Briefe vom Concil (München, 1870). (A. S. J.) Infant Baptism. See Baptism; Paedobaptism.

Infant Communion. Notwithstanding the apostle's direction, "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup" (1 Cor. xi, 28); so that it is inconsistent to a man to partake of holy communion if he is incapable of self-examination as a requisite in those who approach the Lord's table, we find infants admitted to holy communion as early as in the 3d century. The first instances of it occurred in the North-African Church. Cyprian, in his Tractatus de loposis (p. 193, ed. Germaine), says, "children who enter into the world partook of the body and blood of the Lord (cibum et polum dominicum);" he further gives the example of a girl (puella) whom a deacon had obliged to partake of the cup, but who could not retain what she had taken because she had previously, by her nurse's fault, partaken of bread dipped in wine, and had thus an offering to idols. This practice of infant communion was undoubtedly connected with infant baptism, and, as a reason for it, Augustine lays down the principle that, unless we partake of the Supper of the Lord, to which no one can be regularly admitted who is not baptized, we can have no life in God (John vi, 53); and this, he maintains, applies as well to children as to men (Epist. 25, ad Bonif.; Ep. 106, contra duas epistolatas Pelygo, i, 22; Sermo viii, de vernis apostol. sec. meriti, i, 20). The same reasons are given by his contemporary, Innocent I, (de pavo), who, in his letter of communion to the Council of Milevi: Aug. ep. 83, "Parvulos aternae vitae premia etiam sine baptismatis gratia donari posse perficiat est; nisi enim manuuvocavit armentum Christi et hibernit sanguinem ejus, non habebat vitam in se ipsius." From a similar point of view, Gelasius I, pope (496-518), writes in a letter to Augustine and Synesius that "No one should venture to exclude any child from this sacrament, without which no one can attain to eternal life." But as early as the 9th century, Fulgentius, the Augustinian of that century, advocated the rite of baptism, only suggesting that by it "children were incorporeal into Christ, and that he should be born in the human and that he should not even be nursed except in case of absolute necessity." We find the same in Alcuin's De Afflicto, where it is expressly directed that, whenever a bishop is present, baptism should be immediately followed by confirmation, and that the child should be sent to the Latin school with a letter of introduction. In the synodical decree of the Council of Orleans, in the same century, we find that priests are always to have the Eucharist ready, so that if a child should be taken ill it should not be in danger of dying without the eucharist. In the 9th century this question of infant communion gave rise to controversies. Thus Paschatus Ratibus maintained that children dying before communion were not therefore in danger, since by baptism they had already entered into communion with Christ. Still, in the 12th century, we find Radulphus Ardens saying (Hom. in die Paschae de Exsacr. necas.) that it is prescribed (statutum) that children should receive communion, at least with the cup, soon after being baptized, so that "they might not be in danger of dying without that necessary sacrament."

Hugo of St. Victor also recommends infant communion, where it can take place without danger, but remarks that this custom had already fallen into disuse in his time. He says that the custom among the Germans is that the newly-baptized child a little ordinary wine, instead of the blood of Christ, which practice he condemns. Soon after this, Odo, bishop of Paris, forbade giving children unconsecrated wafers, and thus the custom was lost in the Gallican Church. In Germany traces are to be found of it at a still later period; the thing ended in a mere senseless superstition. The Council of Trent condemns the principle of the necessity of infant communion, saying that the practice arose in the circumstances of the early ages, and that the fathers had sufficient grounds for introducing it in their days, without its being made a necessity of salvation; wherefore the usage of it must be abandoned when it has been dropped (Sess. xxii).

In the Greek Church we find passages of some theologians, which in their exposition of the doctrine of baptism would seem to imply that they rejected this necessity of infant communion based on John vi, 58; for they designate the former sacrament as a purification through the efficacy of the blood of Christ, or the sacrifice of the Latin rites of God, etc. Yet infant communion was one of the early practices in that church, as is evident from the fact that in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii, 12) mothers are recommended to bring their children with them to communion, and children are counted among those who partake of the Leutera Suma. The non-Oriental church, in the Canons of the Eastern Church, p. 118, 119.) This custom is also defended by Pseudo-Dionysius (Hier. Eccl. vii, 11) against the, profane, who considered it ridiculous. The Greek Church still upholds infant communion. According to Metaphanos Kritopulos (Conf. Eccl. Gr. c. 9), children (jyngik) after they are baptized, should commune whenever their parents do.

The Roman Church and all Protestant churches now agree in rejecting infant communion. Nevertheless, there have been a few advocates of the practice even among them; amongst the most prominent of them is Ficetor (Essay on the Eucharist, London, 1804), who argues for the practice (1) on the ground of primitive usage; (2) from Scripture. The latter argument is that "Christians succeeding to the Jews as God's people, and being grafted upon that stock, their infants have a right to partake of the blessings of which they are capable, till forfeited by some improprieties; and, consequently, have a right to partake of this ordinance, as the Jewish children had to eat of the passover and other sacrifices; besides this, he pleads the texts which speak of the Lord's supper as received by all Christians. The non-Oriental church is, that which is taken from the incapacity of infants to examine themselves, and discern the Lord's body; but he answers that this precept is only given to persons capable of understanding and complying with it, as those which require faith in order to baptism are interpreted by that rite. The objection made by the Jewish children eating the sacrifice, it is to be considered that this was not required as circumcision was; the males were not necessarily brought to the Temple till they were twelve years old (Luke ii, 42); and the Gentiles were not circumcised. The phrase 'Eucharist' became the common food to all that were clean in the family, and were not looked upon as acts of devotion to such a degree as our Eucharist is; though, indeed, they were a token of their acknowledging the divinity of that God to whom they had been offered (1 Cor. x, 18); and even the Passover was a commemoration of a temporal deliverance; nor is there any reason to believe that its reference to the Messiah was generally understood by the Jews. On the whole, it is certain there would be more danger of a contempt arising from the Lord's Supper from the admission of infants, and of confusion and trouble to other communicants than would be required in Scripture, it is much the best to omit it. When children are grown up to a capacity of behaving decently, they may soon be instructed in the nature and design of the ordinance; and if they appear to understand it, and give proof of love to Christ, it would be allowable for the priest to give them the food of the very young; which, by the way, might be a good security against many of the snares to which youth are exposed."

INFANCIDE

315. ii. 319. iii. 496: Smith, _Account of the Gr. Church_, p. 161; Bingham, _Orig. Eccles._, bk. xv, ch. iii., § 7; Coleman, _Ancient Christianity_, ch. xxx., § 8; Neander, _Hist. of Deism_, p. 342; Gieseler, _Dogmengeschichte_, p. 542.

Infanticide is the term for the act or practice of murdering infants, which was very general among the ancient nations. The Greeks and Romans, with all their high notions of civilization, were guilty of favoring this horrible practice by legislative enactments, and Plato and Aristotle are found among its supporters. Thus, at Sparta, the law required that a child, immediately after birth, was to be exposed to the various elements for seven weeks, and if it was not born well, or its limbs crippled, “it was thrown down a deep cavern at the foot of the mountain Taygetus; and it was said that this law had a wholesome effect, for it made women with child very careful as to their eating, drinking, and exercise, and thereby they proved excellent nurses. In the older Grecian republics a similar disregard of the life of sickly infants was shown.” Among the Romans it seems to have been the duty of the father to decide the fate of his new-born babe. Among the Norse a somewhat similar custom was observed. Most of the laws of the early Christian Church, in the matter of the infanticide of the weaker sex, the father not unfrequently “disproved of its living, and it was exposed to die by wild beasts or the weather.” Among the barbaric tribes, child-murder prevails most extensively. Thus it is general throughout the whole of the South-Sea Islands, and is found among the Chinese (f. v.). In Vanu Levu, we are informed by a recent authority, “the extent of infanticide reaches nearer two thirds than one half of all the children born.” Among the people of India, especially the Hindus, as well as the Brahmans, this evil prevailed to a very great extent, due to the doubts, in a great measure, to the national prejudice of remarriage of a widow (compare Max Muller, _Chips from a German Workshop_, ii. 312). But, since the rule of the English, laws have been enacted likely to modify the practice, if not to check it altogether.

“The Rajput, it is said, destroy all the female children but the first-born—a peculiar custom. Due to the being a point of honor with a Rajput to nearly ruin himself in the marriage feast and portion of his daughter, so that he could not afford to have more than one. The Mohammedans were inclined to the same practice, but ef-forced by their laws. The practice of aborting or shortening the life of a child before birth for the native women nothing of destroying by compression the infant in the womb, to avoid the trouble of rearing it alive. In China infanticide is supposed to be common, the chief cause being said to be the right of periodically repudiating their wives which is possessed by Chinnamen. Some statistics recently published in in the _Experence of Nancy_, indicate the fearful extent to which life is lost through this practice prevailing in so vast a population as that of China.” Newcomb (Cyclof, _Missions_, p. 487) says, “It is computed from authentic data that not less than 9000 children are exposed in the streets of Peking every year, and as many more in the provinces, and that it is a part of the duty of the police to carry away in carts, every morning, those that have been exposed at night, some of whom are yet alive; but they are all carried to a pit without the walls, and buried purposely.” In Japan, poverty of the parent is deemed an excuse for the practice, committing an infant’s life, and in Greenland the infant is buried with the mother, if she dies in or shortly after childbirth. The South American women commit the same sorrows as the poor parents of Japan. In Africa the Bantu practice the brutal custom of slaughtering an infant’s life, and a report upon them has been made by a previous analogous among the ancient Greeks and Romans; and so frequent has been the practice of feeding lions with infants’ flesh, that “it has greatly increased the desire of the lion for human flesh.” In Madagascar the fate of the infant depends upon the calculation of lucky and unlucky days. Among the North American Indians infanticide has also prevailed, and does still prevail very extensively. The lower castes of the Natchez Indians on the lower Mississippi, Brinton (Myths of the New World [N. Y. 1868, 8vo.], p. 239) says, deliberately murder their own children on the funeral pyre of a son or chief to gain admission to a higher caste. But as a principal reason of the great extent of infanticide, es-ymptically because of the social or political high regard attached to a child, is the _origin of civilization_.
Birkbeck (Origin of Civilization, and Primitive Condition of Man [London, 1870, 8vo.], p. 93) assigns the scarcity of game, and the fact that female children are only consumers, and not providers. “Under these circumstances, female children become a source of weal or woe, as the necessities for procuring food may require. The primitive tribe did not hunt; they weakened their mothers when young, and when growing up were a temptation to surrounding tribes.” But while these reasons, which seem quite plausible at the outset, may have helped to aggravate and spread the horrid crime of ininfanticide, it is no doubt true, after all, that the practice of child-murder is due to a false comprehension of the duties and relations of man towards his Maker.

Perverted religious teachings have done much to foster this great crime among these ignorant human beings, whom Christianity is slowly but surely convincing of the error of the practice. The benevolent efforts of Christianity, which was so marked on the legislation of the Graeco-Roman empire in the treatment of woman, and, as a natural consequence, in the treatment likewise of her offspring, is already apparent also among these uncivilized tribes. One of the maxims of modern civilization, or, rather, of Christianity, is a firm opposition to the practices of the first Christian emperor, namely, Constan-tine’s declaration that “the killing of a child by its father, which the Pompeian law left unpunished, is one of the greatest crimes” (Schaaf, _Ch. Hist._, iii. 114). Instead of encouraging the destruction of life, modern civilization is a stepping stone to the destruction of life.
In the meantime, the interpretation of the laws of the criminal law deals with the cognate offences which make up ininfanticide in the following manner, whether the child is legitimate or illegitimate. As regards the procuring of abortion, every woman who takes poison or other noxious things, or uses instruments or other means procure her miscarriage, is guilty of felony, and liable to penal servitude for life, or not less than three years; and so is any person who administers poison, or uses instruments upon the woman with such intent. Who-evver supplies drugs, poison, or instruments for the same purpose is guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to penal servitude for three years. The concealment of birth is also a criminal offence. Whoever, after a child is born, by any secret disposition of the body, endeavors to conceal its birth, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to imprisonment for two years. This is the offence which, by the law of the state of New York, is made the subject of the prosecution in such cases, as the attempt to establish the larger crime of murder to the satisfaction of a jury is frequently foiled by the secret sympathy shown towards the mother, who is presumed to have been the perpetrator of an abortion (Vandalia Cod-el) (Chambers). But one of the greatest difficulties we are beginning to encounter in our own day, in several Christian lands, among which our own is perhaps the most prominent, is the practice of abortion, only another form of infanticide, so general among the so-called higher classes of society. It is really alarming to the Christian man to see how extensively the great sin has INFANT SALVATION

Infant Jesus, Daughters of the Congregation of the, is an order in the Roman Church which has its seat at Rome. It owes its origin to Anna Moroni, a native of Lucca, who, having come to Rome entirely destitute, succeeded by her industry and economy in securing a competency. In more advanced years, her charitable feelings prompted her to establish an institution where poor girls should be instructed in such female work as would enable them to earn a livelihood. A priest, Cosmas Berlanti, and other members of the clergy, approved of her plan, and afforded her much assistance. By their joint efforts it was finally established as a regular institution, and Clement X acknowledged the existence of the society, gave it by-laws, and endowed it with sundry particular privileges, under the appellation of "Daughters of the Infant Jesus." The number of the "Daughters" allotted to each convent was fixed at 35, in commemoration of the number of years Jesus lived upon earth. The novitiate lasts three years; the sisters make vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Such as may wish to leave the convent are allowed to do so before taking the vows, but, in that case, they are to leave to the convent all they brought to it at their admission. Prayers and fasts are strictly enjoined. The regular habit of the order consists of a wide, dark brown dress, and a white hood. There also existed in former times an organization whose members bore the name of "Sisters of the Good Jesus;" these, in the earlier part of the 15th century, were transformed from a lay association into a regular order, and the members were sustained by suitable avocations. — Herzog, Real-Encyklopädie, vi, 615.

Infant Salvation. On this question most Christians will agree with the following statements: "The great consideration which leads to a solution of the case of persons dying in infancy is this: In Rom. v. 19, it is said, "Therefore, as by the offense of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so, by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." In these words, the sin of Adam and the merits of Christ are co-extensive; the words applied to both are precisely the same, "judgment came upon all men," "the free gift came upon all men." If the whole human race be meant in the former clause, the whole human race is meant in the latter also; and it follows that as all are injured by the offence of Adam, so all are benefited by the obedience of Christ. Whatever, therefore, that benefit may be, all children are benefited by the obedience of Christ, and a large portion of the human race upon whom the 'free gift,' the effects of 'the righteousness of one,' did not 'come,' which is contrary to the apostle's words." (Watson, Institutes, ii, 57.);

"Theologians have pursued two different methods in treating the infant subject. (a) Some are content with saying that God will pardon and save infants on account of the merits of Christ, which extend to all, although they may not have believed in Christ during their lifetime; and that their being born with natural depravity will not harm them, because they themselves are not to blame for it. These writers refer to Rom. v. 15-17 for an analogous proceeding. This is the most simple and safest view. (b) Others, misunderstanding the passage Mark xvi. 16, suppose that faith in Christ is an indispensable requisite for salvation in all men, and have therefore attributed to some schoolmen the doctrine of a 'faith of infants,' which they have variously explained and described as fides praesumpta, implicita, per baptismum sine verbo (some say sine cognitione) infusa; tella affectio in infantibus qualis Deo placet. The schoolmen describe it as dispositio ad justitiam. But one of them, Lombard, in conveying an opinion of his own, said: 'Nothing is said in the N.T. about such a faith. Faith always presupposes knowledge and power to exercise the understanding. Now, since children have neither of these requisites, faith cannot be ascribed to them; nor, indeed, disbelief, unless the word is used very improperly. The word faith is not divided into faith only, or the guilty destitution of faith. Those who have adopted this view have thus been compelled (as appears from the preceding remarks) to vary the idea which is uniformly attached to the word fides where adults are referred to, as soon as they speak of infants, and call something in them by this name which is nowhere else so denominated. The passage Matt. xvi. 6, does not bear upon this point, since the disciples of Christ are there meant. See Baptism. From the words of Christ, however, Matt. xix. 14, 'Of such is the kingdom of God; it is clear that he can no more be as belonging to his kingdom. And this is enough' (Knapp, Theology, p. 423).

Calvin, who laid particular stress on infant baptism in harmony with the other leading reformers, held that "it is no small injustice to the covenant of God if we do not rely upon it as sufficient of itself, since the covenant depends not on baptism or anything adventitious. It is alleged there is danger lest a child who is sick, and dies without baptism, should be deprived of the grace of regeneration. This I can by no means admit. 'God pronounces that he adopts our infants as his children before they are born, when he promises that he will be a God to us, and to our seed after us. This promise includes their salvation. Nor will any dare to offer such an insult to God as to deny the sufficiency of his promise to insure its own accomplishment. may justly forthsend the following: “We still hold on to the old faith of the Church, that the sacraments are sanctifying ordinances, and feel as confident as ever that God will remain true to his promise, and save the children of the covenant, though they should die without its seal.” Indeed, it seems almost impossible for the “Reformed Church” to take any other ground, since one of her founders and greatest theological teachers, Chrysostom, held not only in the case of infants, but also in the case of all God’s reasoning creatures, that “not all those who are not baptized are excluded from the grace of Christ; for not the want, but the context of baptism, excludes most.” Neonate, “the covenant of God, made with the faithful and their children.” (Compare articles in the Rev. Ch. Messenger, March 4, 1868; March 11, 1868).

One of the greatest arguments against the salvation of children not baptized, which has been advanced, is, that the rite of baptism is essential to covenantship, provided the parents had not by peculiar circumstances been prevented from attending to this duty. But this point does not seem to be well taken, for among the Israelites circumcision did not admit their children into covenant with God, as they were in that covenant by birth. Circumcision was merely the sign or seal of the covenant, under which they could be considered as being of the people of God. So Christian children are included in the covenant with Christ; but the rite of baptism is their natural sign and seal of that covenant, and without it they cannot be considered as belonging to the visible followers of Christ. Inferior Clergy.

Inferential Theology.

Many pious minds of the Christian Church have earnestly opposed the opinion of the more liberally inclined orthodox theologians, that the Christian theology is in some respects “inferential.” Liddon adroitly puts this question in his Baptist Lectures of 1866 (ed. Lord’s Distinct, p. 441, 442): “No one would deny that in all ages of the Church the field of theology has been the scene of hasty, unwarrantable, and misleading inferences. False conclusions have been drawn from true premises, and very doubtful or false premises have been occasionally assumed, if not asserted to be true. . . . But if this should be admitted it would not follow that theology is in no sense ‘inferential.’ Within certain limits, and under due guidance, ‘inference’ is the movement, it is the life of theology. The primal records of revelation itself, as we find them in Scripture, are continually inferential, and it is at least a business of the wise to observe and marshal these revealed inferences, to draw them out, and to make the most of them. The illuminated reason of the collective Church has for ages been engaged in studying the original materials of the Christian revelation. It has put together of these various materials, and made this foundation of theology. What is theology but a continuous series of observed and systematized inferences respecting God in his nature and his dealings with mankind, drawn from premises which rest upon God’s authority? . . . If we reject conclusions drawn professedly from the substance of revelation, but really enlarging instead of explaining it, it does not follow that we should reject inferences which are simply explanatory, or which exhibit the bearing of one revealed truth upon another. This, indeed, is the most fruitful and legitimate province of inference in theological inquiry. Such ‘inference’ brings out the meaning of the details of revelation. It raises this feature to prominence, it throws that into the shade. It places language to which a too servile literalism might have attributed the highest force in the lower rank of metaphor and symbol; it elicits pregnant and momentous truths from incidents which, in the absence of sufficient guidance or reflection, may have been thought to possess only a secondary degree of signification. Inferior Clergy, the several classes of assistants to the priesthood in the ancient churches. They were distinguished by the title ἄγιοι και τῆς οὐσίας, because they were appointed to their respective offices without the imposition of hands. Not being ordained at the altar, nor in ecclesiastical form, they were, of course, incapable of the exercise of any of the sacramental functions; indeed, so distinctly drawn was the line between them and the superior orders, called ἱερέως, ἁγία, that they were strictly forbidden to touch the sacred vessels, or so much as to enter the ‘diakonium’—sanctuary. The inferior clergy of the Church of England includes all those in holy orders not distinguished by their position and title as dignitaries of the Church. The offices of churchwarden, verger, sexton, and pew- opener in the Church of England correspond in general to the offices of the inferior clergy of ancient times” (Eaude, Encyclopedia, s. v.). See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. book i, ch. 1. See Clergy.

Infuseda is a term in law for the placing in possession of a fee or freehold estate. It was used in ecclesiastical law to designate the granting of tithes to laymen, and the temporary possession by ecclesiastical associations of lay property. Pope Urban VIII, in the year 1629, declared himself against all infusion, and made it null and void if thereafter contracted. See Aschbach, Kirchen-Lexikon, iii, 450.

Infidel (ἄμαρτος, 2 Cor. vi, 15; 1 Tim. v, 18), an unbeliever, as elsewhere rendered.

Infidelity etymologically means simply want of belief. By common usage it has come to mean (1), in a restricted sense, a rejection of the Christian faith; and (2), in a wider sense, the rejection of religion generally. Thus Atheists, who disbelieve in God, and Deists, who believe in God, but reject Christianity, are alike called infidels.

1. Various Forms of Infidelity.—Pearson, in his excellent prize essay on Infidelity, its Aspects, Causes, and Effects (London, 1859, 8vo), classifies the various phases of infidelity as follows: 1. Atheism, or the denial of the divine existence; 2. Pantheism, or the denial of the divine personality; 3. Naturalism, or the denial of the divine government; 4. Spiritualism, or the denial of the divine redemption. To these may be added, what belong more properly to practical than to theoretical infidelity, 5. Indifferenthness, or the denial of man’s responsibility; and, 6. Formalism, or the denial of the power of godliness. Each of these will be found noticed in this Cyclopedia under their proper heads. Riddle (Bampton Lecture for 1862) gives the following survey of the various phases of infidelity. (1.) Rationalism.—Infidelity, scarcely fashioned, and perhaps hardly conscious of its own true character, but yet really existing and putting forth some degree of energy, appears in the form of a rash infidelity against rationalism, found in this form to spring rather to the substance of the Gospel than to its proofs and evidences, infidelity is susceptible of such diversified modifications, and assumes so many disguises, that it may sometimes escape detection, and is often in a disposition to repel, with logical correctness, the charges which may be justly brought against it by those who perceive its real tendency and nature. The faintest, but still dangerous phase of this rationalistic spirit consists in the habit of making an arbitrary choice and selection of dogmas to be believed by those who professedly, and with more or less sincerity, accept the Christian revelation as a whole. From this unhealthy state phases of unbelief which have appeared and disappeared at intervals from the earliest ages of Christianity, but which, thanks be to God, have never yet succeeded in making the Gospel obsolete, and in robbing mankind of the knowledge of salvation. It is, however, fraught with danger, and its power of mischief arises, in no small degree, from its capability of disguise. It can put on the semblance of Christian truth; it can comply with any form of words, even the soundest form, in creeds and confessions drawn up with the greatest fidelity and decorum. (Bucer, Christ and other Masters, i. 5 sq.) See SPIRITUALISM.

(3.) Naturalism.—"The mind that revolts at mystery, or religious truth which we cannot know independently of a direct and outward revelation, is also shocked and repelled by miracle. Accordingly we find that the sedate, orderly, Byzanitine, and almost puritanical manners of the Protestant churches are no longer the efficient antagonists of the Church of Rome. Nor are the free-thinkers of the present day to be confounded with those of the old Voltairean school in France, or with the English Deists of the last century. Their system is no longer exclusively negative, but, on the contrary, intensely positive, and, in its moral aspect, intensely Christian. It embraces a series of essentially Christian conceptions—equality, fraternity, the suppression of war, the education of the poor, the abolition of slavery, the diffusion of liberty. It results in a kind of Christianity that represents itself without its dogmatic system and its supernatural narratives. From both of these it uneffectually recoils, while deriving all its strength and nourishment from Christian ethics. Hardly conscious of its own character, as Mr. Riddle tells us, modern Rationalists go forth under such leaders as Leckey, and declare that 'the idolatry of dogmas will pass away,' and that 'Christianity, being rescued from sectarianism and intolerance which have defaced it, will shine by its own moral splendor, and, sublimated above all the sphere of controversy, upon points of dogmatic position as an ideal, and not a system; as a person, and not a creed.' We see this great result, which Mr. Leckey succeeds in picturing, in a somewhat modified form, in the efforts of the free-thinkers of our land, especially since the last meeting of the 'Free Religious Association,' more particular in the work of the Sunday-school Societies in the city of Boston, inaugurated first by the followers of Theodore Parker. See RATIONALISM.

(2.) Spiritualism.—"But while Rationalism appears to have lost much of its former reputation, there is another school, arriving at the same end which finds acceptance in the minds of many people this day. These men are not Rationalists; they are so-called Spiritualists. They do not deny the great truths which lie on the very surface of the sacred record; nor do they disavow the fact of a divine revelation, and so leave man entire to the dictates of his reason, and the conclusions of his understanding, with the additional aid to be derived from his fellow-creatures, all uninspired like himself. But their theory is this. There is, say they, a revelation made from God to man, but it is only subjective, inward, to the already existing spiritual life, or religious consciousness of humanity; the inspiration by which this life or consciousness is awakened is common to every man who will wait and seek for it; and as to religious truth, it is simply that which individuals, or the mass of humanity, so far as their powers of being heightened by the divine affluence, are able to appreciate, to appropriate. According to this view, we are not to suppose that the Gospel announces positive spiritual facts, such, for example, as that which is usually understood by the atonement; but it propounds ideas which may be differently received by different men, and which will produce a different effect, according to the spiritual mould into which they may be cast. Now, in this Spiritualism, let it be observed, there is nothing original or new. This system is, in substance, only one of those that are the most striking and apparent in Christian history. It is nothing more than a sort of plagiary.
Infini

I. Causes of Infini-
it. — The chief source of infitility is undoubtedly a moral one. It is evident, "renamed Edie, is infidelity. "Is it generally, generally, speaking, or in any one of two sources; either in a deficiency of evidence, or in a state of mind and heart on which the clearest and strongest evidence has no power. The causes of in-fiility, we are persuaded, are more ethical than intellectual. The former are real; the latter imaginary. The perusal of some of the productions of our modern infidel writers." "Nothing can be more contemptible," says professor Garbett (Mod. Philos. Infidia, p. 5), "than the argumentative resources of modern infidelity. It does not reason, it only postulates; it dreams and it dogmaticizes. Nor can it claim invention." This testimony is true. Indeed, we venture to assert, that the general strain of argument brought to bear against Christianity by its modern assailants would not be tolerated for a moment within the province of purely literary criticism.
The evidence which attends the truth of Christianity, vast, cersal evidence is cumulative; but, however strong it may be, it is never irresistible. An indolent mind can ward it off.
The existence of God [see God] does not admit of demonstration, but moral certainty. See Evidence. So the personality of God, though much more rational than pantheism and does not enough for one of an opposite conception. Christianity is based upon evidence. The reason why evidence is necessary is to be found in our moral constitution as rational, discriminating, accountable agents; and in the fact that, from the existence of evil, we are otherwise liable to a deception in refercence to our highest interests. It could never be a man's duty to believe in a revelation claiming to itself the authority of heaven, unless that revelation bore, legibly on its front, heaven's signature, or was in some way attended with heaven's evidencing power. The evidence that attends the truth of Christianity, vast, cersal, and of great cumulative power though it be, is not, however, irresistible. No man is warranted to expect it to be so. Faith is a moral act, and, while resting on a strong groundwork of proof, it must have some difculties over which to triumph. Origen, speaking of the difficulties in the Bible revelation, and of those in the revelation of nature, says: "In both we see a self-concerning, self-revealing God, who makes himself known only to those who earnestly seek him; in both are found stimulants to faith, and occasions for unbeliev." "There is light enough," says Pascal, "for those who sincerely wish to see, and does not enough for those of an opposite description." Mr. Newman tells us it "supersedes the authoritative force of outward miracles entirely" to say that "a really overpowering miraculous proof would have destroyed the moral character of faith." This, however, is not argument, but a feeble, dogmatic assertion. The Christian miracles are of "a convincing and stupendous character," and yet not so overpowering as the axion that a whole is greater than its part; and we lack sagacity to perceive where lies the contradiction between these statements. Evidence is obligatory on man, not because it is overpowering or irresistible, but because it preponderates.

Besides the moral ground, there are certain external causes constantly operating, e. g. Speculative Philosophy (q. v.); corruptions of Christianity [see Christianity; Romanism]; religious intolerance [see Toleration]; and, more especially, the connection of Church and State. In our own country, on the other hand, the fact that religion is a matter of private opinion has brought upon us the charge, from the other side of the Atlantic, that in our corporate capacity we, by our peculiar position on this point, permit the inference that we "distinctly affirm that no religion is true, but that all theological systems are human speculations upon a subject or less amount of truth, but no one of which is so probable as that we will act in a matter so important and legislate upon the theory of its truth." It is held by skeptics that it is not possible to prove any other theoretical justification of toleration, or for religious opinion or for what is supposed by the system which treats religion as a matter of private opinion is called, than one which is founded on the principle that religion is matter of opinion; in other words, that the best of all religions is doubtful. The mere non-acceptance of the Koran or of the Roman Catholic Creed, after notice of their contents, appears to them tantamount to a denial of the truth of the claims of Mohammed and the pope respectively. They argue thus from the position that a nation cannot remain on neutral grounds in a matter in which it is theoretically, and practically too, impossible for the majority to be neutral. Acting in this way the Government, which led the founders of our Constitution to think otherwise, are fundamentally wrong (The Nation, 1866, p. 354). See Church.

Infinite. See Attributes; God.

Infinity, without end or limit, the negation of finite: an-un-end."

I. The Infinite. — Besides the definite consciousness of which logic formulates the laws, there is also an infinite consciousness which cannot be formulated.
Besides complete thoughts, and besides the thoughts which, though incomplete, admit of completion, there are thoughts which is impossible to complete, and yet which are real, in the sense that they are normal affections of the intellect. Positive knowledge, however extensive it may become, does not and can never fill the whole region of possible thought. At the utter-most reach of discovery there arises, and must arise, the question: What lies beyond it? Regarding science as a gradually increasing sphere, we may say that every addition to its surface does but bring it into wider contact with surrounding nescience. There is always something which forms alike the raw material of definite thought, and remains after the definiteness which thinking gave to it has been destroyed (H. Spencer, First Principles, p. 21 sq., 88, 90 sq.). This vague element in thought, which is ineradicable, Spencer considers to be the groundwork of the feeling of awe of, and of natural religion. It is the infinite in this sense, the attent to conceive which involves a contradiction in terms; which can only be believed to exist, but can never become an object to consciousness. "If all thought is limitation; if whatever we conceive is, by the very act of conception, regarded as finite, the infinite, from a human point of view, is merely a name for the absence of those conditions under which thought is possible," said Aristotle (in the Nicomachean Ethics, p. 48; comp. p. 90, 68, 80, 118; see esp. notes on p. 48 and 51, 4th ed.).

II. The Infinite as an Interminable Series.—Aristotle mentions five ways (*Phys. A.unc. 203, b. 15) in which the notion of the ∞ is attained: (a) From the unlimited duration of time; (b) from the possibility of perpetually increasing magnitude; (c) from the continuity of growth and decay in nature; (d) from the fact that limitation is always relative, and never absolute; and (e), "the strongest proof of all," from the inability to conceive a limit to number, magnitude, and space. Any given moment of time is both preceded and succeeded by another, and that by another without end. Any magnitude admits of multiplication or division, and the multiples or parts are again capable of multiplication or division, respectively, without limit. Any effect in nature is the result of a cause which, again, is the effect of another, until these operate in an infinite series; and, conversely, every effect is itself the cause of some other effect, and this, in its turn, is the cause of another effect, and so on in an interminable progress. Time, space, and causation thus exhibit infinity in the form of a straight line or series of terms without beginning or end. The properties of this series of the infinite are: (1) that it is purely negative, i.e. the mere process of passing beyond limitations; (2) that it postulates the perpetual recurrence of limitations as its condition; and (3) that, as an endless series, it is incapable of being thought out, it is always possible and never absolute, i.e. it cannot be said to exist, but always to be in the act of coming into existence.

It follows from this that, if infinity is an idea realizable by the mind, it must be conceived in some other way than as a linear series; it must be capable of an expression which is at once definite, and yet preserves the true character of infinity. Mathematical science does this by the summation of an infinite series in a finite expression, and manipulates both the infinite and the infinitesimal as terms having a definite meaning in calculation. The possibility of conceiving the infinite as a whole but not in terms of a finite series of acts, the condition that any object which we can see, handle, imagine, conceive, without any difficulty, e.g. a grape, or a stone, is really the sum of an infinite number of parts into which it may be divided, an infinite, therefore, which is not merely coming into existence, but actually exists here and now. Regarding, too, the aspect of a term in the line of causation, any object in nature sums up an infinite series in itself. For, as an effect, it is the result of all previous causes, and, as a cause, the germ of all succeeding effects.

These summations of the infinite, whether achieved by the formulae of mathematics or presented as complete, in every portion of space, in every period of time, and in every object in nature, are anticipations of a higher form of infinity which is revealed by the mind of man.

III. The Spiritual Infinite (infinium rationis, infinitum notio, Μέν τίνος differs from the former, not so much in excluding as including the limit or boundary of which it is the negation, i.e. as not limited from without and perpetually passing beyond the limit, but as limiting itself. As the natural or mathematical infinite is represented by the line, so the rational or spiritual infinite finds its appropriate symbol in the circle, i.e. the line which is without beginning or end, and at the same time is limited at every point by itself. It is thus at once absolutely unlimited, and yet absolutely definite. The transition from I to III may be illustrated by the mathematical definition of a straight line as the chord of an infinite circle. Such is the infinite as exhibited (a) the thought and (b) the volition of man.

(a) Consciousness, and thought as a mode of consciousness, involve the opposition of the subject which thinks and the object about which it thinks. As a condition of thinking at all, the mind must set its thought over something. As a condition of an object being thought of at all, it must be presented as distinct from the mind which thinks of it. Here, then, is a limitation or barrier which constitutes what is called "the finiteness" of the human understanding. The thinker is limited and conditioned by his thought. He is conditioned by the thinker. But, as it is possible to present any object to thought, it is competent for the thinker to present himself as the object about which he thinks, i.e. to be at once the subject which thinks and the object which is thought about. This capability of self-consciousness of which, so far as can be ascertained, the lower animals are destitute, constitutes at once the pride and the degradation of man, is a source at once of his best and his worst actions. Here we have the analogue of the line returning, as the circumference of a circle, into itself. In mathematics, the circle is a closed figure; and whenever an object is thought of as real as before, only it is a limitation of himself by himself: he is conditioned, as before, but self-conditioned, i.e. infinite. See Personality.

(b) The same infinity appears in free will. As free, a man does an action which originates absolutely with himself, and in himself alone, as a free and individual character, and thus determines the quality of the next action. This new action is also originated absolutely by the free agent, but the agent himself is modified, conditioned, limited, by the previous action. The agent has thus his freedom limited and defined, and increasingly so with every fresh action, limited by that of which he is himself the absolute originator. He is finite (limited, conditioned) and at the same time infinite (unlimited, unconditioned), because he is self-conditioned. See Liberty.

It is in this sense, rather than in that of infinite magnitudes, that infinity is an attribute of God. See Theism.

IV. Relation to the Finite.—It follows from what has been said above (a) that, although the essence of infinity is the transcendence of every limitation, yet that the finite is not the first, or initial, but merely the result of that process by which infinity is postulated as a condition of infinity, and that in the higher forms of infinity the limit is included, or, rather, imposed from within. Even in the sense of the indefinite residue of thought, definite thinking is presupposed as the condition of our becoming conscious of the vague element beyond. The serial infinity, again, while the mere process of transcending every given term, postulates the perpetual recurrence of terms to transcend: άτομον, μέν Aristotelis, μν οὖν ιστίν οὐ κατά τοσίν λαμβάνοντο, αιτὶ τὸ λαβών ιστίν έξω (Phys. Aunc. 207, a. 7)="The quantitative infinite is that which always has something outside it, i.e. a term 'not yet reached.'" The spiritual infinite, lastly, as the self-determination of thought and volition, is, ex ei termini, a process of generating at every step the finite and limited. (b) On the other hand, it would be a reversal of the true order to conceive the infinite to be, as its etymology suggests, the mere negation of the finite, and, as such, a secondary and derived idea. On such a supposition it becomes impossible to explain how we become conscious of limitation at all. How, it may be asked, do we know that thought is finite if we know not the infinity of the immanent infinite? How is the consciousness of limitation possible except as the negation of what is unlimited? The infinite is thus, as the condition of the finite, prior and positive; the finite, as the limit excluded, included, self-imposed by the infinite, posterior and negative.

The relation of God, as the Infinite, to the world and the soul, as finite, is considered elsewhere. But, unless
(a) be borne in mind, the logical result is cleem, and if
(b) be neglected, pantheism.

V. Infinity as symbolized in the Imagination.—We find the attempt to picture the infinite to the imagination among non-European nations in the form of a state of vacancy immediately preceding creation. The constitutent parts of the image are generically all alike. The image of mere air or mere water would be no realizable image at all, because involving no distinction. But in the contrast of the two we get that minimum of defi-niteness which renders the image possible. A beautifully pure representation of the imagined infinite is found in the illustrated books of the aborigines of Guatamala (Max Müller’s Chips, i, 333). It is as follows.

"There was a time when all that exists in heaven and earth was made. All was then in suspense; all was calm and silent. All was immovable, all peaceful, and the vast space the heavens was empty. There was no man, no animal, no shore, no trees; heaven alone existed. The face of the earth was not to be seen; there was only the still expanse of the sea and the heaven above. Divine beings were on the waters like a growing light. Their voice was heard as they meditated and counseled; and when the dawn arose man appeared." Here we have as the constituents of the image "empty heaven," or space, and—which is introduced as if not at all contradictory to the statement that "heaven alone existed"—the "still expanse of the sea." [Compare this with the account in holy Scripture, and, indeed, with all the Mosaic, in Ex. iii, 3, and the Phœnician, the globe of the sky. (2) The infinite is not pictured as preceding the emergence of finite things, but as underlying the process of nature, as it is ordinarily known.

The Egyptian symbol of the serpent with his tail in his mouth approaches the mathematical representation of infinity. See Blunt, Theol. Dict. i, 144 sq. See Journal of Speculative Philosophy, July, 1870.

Ingelheim is the name of a place at which a church (Concilium Ingalheimense) was held June 27, 948, under the presidency of the Roman legate Marieus, and in the presence of the German emperor Otto I and Louis Outremer. The principal business of the Council was the punishment of Hugo, count of Paris, whom it excommunicated. It also decided that no layman should have a church of his own, without the consent of the bishop; that the whole of Easter week be kept as a festival, and the three days following Whitsunday; that St. Mark's day be kept with fasting on account of the great litanies, as was done on the rogation days preceding the feast of the Ascension; and that all differences as to title be settled in an ecclesiastical synod, instead of granting this power to the civil courts.—Landon, Manual of Councils, p. 267.

Ingen is the name of a disdised Japanese, who is said to have arrived about 1658 in Japan, whither his zeal for the religion of Siakd had led him. He was at first respected by the Japanese only as a saint, but at a season of an excessive drought they came to him and be-ought his prayers (kiti) to avert the judgment of heaven; and the rain descending in mighty torrents shortly after the offering up of Ingen's prayer, the people thought him no longer earthly, and deified him—

Ingham, Benjamin, was born at Ossett, Yorkshire, June 11, 1712. He received a liberal education, first at Batley school, and afterwards at Queen's College, Oxford, where, in 1733, he joined himself with Charles and John Wesley, the founders of Methodism. In 1735 he received episcopal ordination, and in the same year embar-arked with Mr. Wesley for Georgia. He remained in Georgia about two years, visited Carolina and Pennsylvania, and then returned to England, where, soon after his arrival, he accompanied Wesley to Hermit, the seat of the Methodist society in America, and strong bonds of fellowship with this excellent people that he could not sacrificed his attachment to them when the Methodists revolted from the disorders of the Fetter-Lane society. He went into Yorkshire, and with incredible itinerant labors, assisted the Moravians, with whom he labored, what may be called a Moravian form of Methodism.
Preaching stations were established throughout the county and in neighboring shires. At Birstal he took Nelson publicly by the hand, and gave him liberty to speak in all his chapels. The Wesleys, Whitefield, Madan, and Ingham, had been preached for his societies, and they seem to have been generally recognized by the Methodist leaders as a legitimate branch of the great revival, notwithstanding Wesley's people in Yorkshire experienced many vexations from the eccentricities of individual preachers, who retained some of the London Moravian follies. Within a few years the number of "Inghamite" societies reached eighty-four. In 1741, Mr. Ingham married Lady Margaret Hastings, sister to the earl of Huntingdon, on which he removed his residence from Ossett to Abberford, where he continued to reside till his death. After forming this connection, he was so far absorbed in his exercising his gifts, and in the Gospel that he greatly extended the sphere of his operations, and, in process of time, may be said to have evan-gelized all the surrounding country. Ingham was admitted to Wesley's Conference in Leeds, but the precise relation of this society to the Wesleyan body was everywhere defined. He had his own Conferences also, and at one of them was elected a general overzeer, or bishop. Lady Huntingdon, who could not approve all the disciplinary features of his societies, attempted to promote a union of them with Wesley, and she sent Whitefield to Newcastle-upon-Tyne to meet the Wesleys for consultation on the subject. Charles assented, but John declined the overture, very wisely, as events demonstrated. In 1759, Ingham read "Sandeman's Letters on Theron and As-paso," and "Glass's Testimony of the King of Martyrs." These works produced such an impression on his mind that he deputed two of his adherents to assist him, in the assistance of his friends. The countess of Huntingdon wrote them letters. Whitefield used his influence to save them. Romaine hastened into Yorkshire, but could not restrain them. Ingham attempted to excommunicate the disturbers, but it was an endless task. The whole order was wrecked and sunk. Thirty societies first preference was to the perpetual curacy of Bridhurst, in Kent, next the living of Orston, in Nottinghamshire, and afterwards the vicarages of Worthington and Boxted, in Essex. He died in 1804. Mr. Ingram wrote on the "Great Events of the Seventeenth Century, or Period when the Mystery of God was hid in the Veil," the "Three Odes" to the "Ancients of the Ten Tribes of Israel being in America," originally published by Manasseh ben-Israel: — "A Complete and Uniform Explanation of the Prophecy of the Serem Viali of Wrath," see Hook, Eccles. Ingulphus, the celebrated abbot of Croyland, long considered as the founder of the church of "Hirside Monasterii Cruylandensis," is supposed to have been born about A.D. 1030. According to the account of his life in his history, he was educated at the University of Oxford. He was a great favorite of Editha, the wife of Edward the Confessor, and visited duke William of Normandy at his own court in 1057. About 1060 he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On his return he entered the monastery of Fontenelle, in Normandy, and there remained till 1076, when he was invited to England by the Conqueror, and made abbot of Croyland. In 1103 Dec. 17, 1103. The "Historia Monasterii Cruylandensis," was published by Saville, in the "collection script.," at London in 1596, and in a more complete edition by Galbe ("Rer. Angl. Script.,") at Oxford, in 1684. An English translation of it was furnished by Ryley in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. "Some writers, even of the last century questioned the entire genuineness of the book, though scepticism did not then proceed further than the hypothesis of interpolations by a later writer; but in 1826, the late Sir Francis Palgrave, in an article in the Quarterly Review, endeavored to prove that the whole so-called history was little better than a novel, and was probably the composition of a monk in the 15th or 16th century. His conclusions have been accepted by almost universally adopted." See Chambers's Encyclopedia, v. 579; Wetzer and Welsch, Kirchen-Lexikon, v. 623 sqq.

Inheritance (frequently προσφατός, checlo, a "portion" or providential bestowment; but properly and usually some form of the verbs προέχεισθαι, προέχεσθαι, to possess; προέχεισθαι, to pass on; κληρονομεῖν, to get by lot). God is the creative and personal God who gave it to man to be held, cultivated, and enjoyed. (Gen. i, 38 sqq.; Isa. xxv. 16; Eccl. v. 9; not to any favored portion of our race, but to the race itself—to man as represented by our great progenitor, to whom the use of the divine gift was first graciously vouchsafed. The impression which the original gift of a gift earth was calculated to make on men, the Great Donor was pleased, in the case of mankind, to render, for his own wise purposes, more decided and emphatic by an express donation to the patriarch Abraham (Gen. xiii, 14 sqq.). Many years, however, elapsed before the promise was fulfilled. Meanwhile the notices which we have regarding the state of property in the patriarchal ages are few and not very definite. The products of the earth, however, were, at an early period accumulated and held as property. Violence invaded the possession: opposing violence recovered the goods. War soon sprang out of the passions of the human heart. The necessity of civil government was felt. Consequent laws were accordingly developed themselves. The head of the family was supreme. His will was law. The physical superiority which he possessed gave him this dominion. The same influence would secure its transmission in the male rather than the female line. Hence, to the rise of the right of patrimony. In the early condition of society which is called patriarchal, landed property had its origin, indeed, but could not be held of first importance by those who led a wandering life, shifting continually, as convenience suggested. So long as another, Carth, had control, then the chief property (Gen. xxxv. 55). But land, if held, was held on a freehold tenure; nor could any other tenure..." have come into existence till more complex and artificial relations arose, resulting, in all probability, from the increase of population and the relative insufficiency of food. When Joseph went down into Egypt, he appears to have found the freehold tenure prevailing, which, however, he anticipates, as at surplus, to assume the rate, into a conditional tenancy. Other intimations are found in Genesis which confirm the general statements which have just been made. Daughters do not appear to have had any inheritance. If there are any exceptions to this rule, they only serve to prove it by the support they give to the main tenet. The daughter is recorded (xiii, 15) to have given his daughters an inheritance conjointly with their brothers. How highly the privileges conferred by primogeniture were valued may be learned from the history of Jacob and Esau. In the patriarchal sage-phrase these rights were very great. See BRITISHROY. The eldest son, as being by nature the first fitted for command, assumed influence and control, under his father, over the family and its dependents; and when the father was removed by death, he readily, and as if by an act of Providence, took his father's place, from Gen. xlvii, 10, where it is said, 'A prophet/' succeeding to the headship of the family, the clan, or the tribe. At first the eldest son most probably took exclusive possession of his father's property and power; and when, subsequently, a division became customary, he would still retain the largest share—a double portion, if of his brothers; a single portion, if of his father's sons, of Abraham other sons partook with the eldest, and that, too, though they were sons of concubines, is clear from the story of Hagar's expulsion: "Cast out (said Sarah) this bondwoman and her son; for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac." (Gen. xxi, 10). This notion still lingered in Abraham's mind:" On the transfer of property from hand to hand are interesting, and bear a remarkable similarity to what takes place in Eastern countries even at this day (Gen. xxi, 32 sq.; xxiii, 9 sq.). The purchase of the Cave of Machpelah as a holding-place for the dead, detailed in the last passage, serves to show the stability of property at that early period, and the facility with which an inheritance was transmitted even to sons' sons (comp. Gen. xxiv, 39). That it was customary, during the father's lifetime, to make a disposition of property, is evident from Gen. xxiv, 35, where it is said to the patriarch he had given all he had to Isaac. This statement is further confirmed by ch. xxx, 5, 6, where it is added that Abra- ham gave to the sons of his concubines' "gifts, sending them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward unto the east country." Sometimes, however, so far from being disposed of, the property was commingled with a gift, that they shared, with what we should term the legitimate children, in the father's property and rights. See CONCUBINE. Thus Dan and Naphtali were sons of Bilhah, Rachel's maid, whom she gave to her husband, falling to bear children herself. So Gad and Asher were, under similar circumstances, sons of Zilpah, Leah's maid (Gen. xxx, 2-14). In the event of the eldest son's dying in the father's lifetime, the next son took his place; and if the eldest son left a widow, the next son married his wife (Gen. xxvii, 7 sq.), the daughter-in-law of which union was recalled to the first-born and deceased son. Should the second like- wise die, the third son took his place (Gen. xxxi, 11). While the rights of the first-born were generally established and recognised, yet were they sometimes set aside in favor of a younger child. The blessing of the father or the theocratic blessing was mainly internal to the devolution of power and property—in its effects not unlike wills and testaments with us; and instances are not wanting in which this (so to term it) testamentary bequest set aside consuetudinary laws, and gave precedence to a younger son (Gen. xlviii, 15 sq.). Special claims were made in favor of the younger sons, and were rewarded by special gifts, as in the case of Jacob's donation to Joseph (Gen. xlviii, 22). In a similar manner, bad conduct on the part of the eldest son (as well as of others) subjected him, if not to the loss of his rights of property, yet to the evil influence of his father's dying maladministration (Gen. xlix, 3); while the good and favored, though younger son, was led by the paternal blessing to act probably also to reprove the rich inheritance of individual and social happiness (Gen. xlix, 8-22). See HEIR; ADOPTION. The original promise made to Abraham of the land of Palestine was solemnly repeated to Isaac (Gen. xxvi, 9), the reason assigned being because "Abraham obeyed, and kept my every commandment and statute, and my laws," while it is expressly declared that the earlier inhabitants of the country were dispossessed and destined to extermination for the greatness of their iniquity. The possession of the promised land was embraced by Isaac in his dying benediction to Ja- cob (Gen. xlviii, 3, 4), to whom God vouchsafed (Gen. xlviii, 15; see also xxxvi, 10, 11) to give a renewed assurance of the destined inheritance. That this dona- tion, however, was held to be dependent for the time and manner of its fulfilment on the divine will, appears from Gen. xxxvi, 17, where it is said, 'The land of Canaan, bought for a hundred pieces of money "a parcel of a field, at the hand of the children of Ham." Delayed though the execution of the promise was, confidence never deserted the family of Abraham, so that Joseph, dying in the land of Egypt, assured his brother Benjamin that "the brothers will find you," (Gen. xlvii, 29-34). The sons of Jacob had no part in possession of Canaan, enjoining on them, in this con- viction, that, when conducted to their possession, they should carry his bones with them out of Egypt (Gen. i, 25). A promise thus given, thus repeated, and thus believed, easily, and indeed unavoidably, became the fundamental principle of that settlement which Moses made when at length he effected the divine will in the redemption of the children of Israel. The observations, and practices too, which we have noticed as prevailing among the patriarchs, would, no doubt, have great influence on the laws which the Jewish legis- lator originated or sanctioned. The land of Canaan was divided among the twelve tribes descended through Isaac and Jacob from Abraham. The division was made by lot for an inheritance among the families of the sons of Israel, according to the tribes, and to the number and size of each tribe. Each tribe, however, had no inheritance; but forty-eight cities with their suburbs were assigned to the Levites, each tribe giving according to the number of cities that fell to its share (Numb. xxxviii, 90; xxxiv, 1; xxxvi, 1). The inheritance thus acquired was never to leave the tribe to which it fell; every man kept what was given to his tribe to its own inheritance. An heiress, in consequence, was not allowed to marry out of her own tribe, lest property should pass by her marriage into another tribe (Numb. xxxvi, 6-9). This restriction led to the marriage of heiresses with their near relations: thus the daughters of Zelophehad "were married unto their father's broth- ers' sons," and "their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father" (ver. 11, 12; comp. Joseph. Ant. iv, 7, 5). In general cases the inheritance went to sons, the first-born receiving a double portion, "for he is the beginning of his father's strength." If, however, there were no other sons, it was given to his father's brothers: if his father had no brothers, it came into possession of the nearest kinsman (Numb. xxxvii, 8). The land was Jehovah's, and could not, there- fore, be permanently alienated. See HUSBANDRY. Ev- ery fifteenth year, whatever land had been sold returned to its former owner, the payment of a reassessment usually rose or fell in proportion to the number of years there were to elapse prior to the ensuing fifteenth or jubibaptized, but withheld from the unbaptized. The baptized were thus called initiati, oi μεταιγισθέντες, μεταιγισθέντες, or οἱ μεταιγισθέντες; and it is very common to find the fathers using the expression "the initiated will understand," and the language of mixed congregations, especially when they were speaking of anything that belonged to the doctrine of the holy Eucharist. This expression is said by Cassabon to occur fifty times in the sermons of St. Chrysostom alone.—Blunt, Theol. Dict. i, 948. Several other names were given to these persons, such as μαρτυροι, λεγομενοι, etc. The word has sometimes been employed with reference to the supposed duty of reserve in communicating divine knowledge, as though the holy Scriptures justified the withholding instruction in Christianity from persons in an early stage of their Christian course.—Bingham, Orig. Eccles. b. i, ch. iv, § 2. See DISCIPLINA ARCANA.

INJURY, a violation of the rights of another. "Some," says Grove, "distinguish between iniuria and injuria. Iniuria is opposed to justice in general, whether negative or positive; an injury, to negative justice alone. See JUSTICE. An injury is wilfully doing to another what ought not to be done. This is injustice too, but not the whole idea of it; for it is injustice also to refuse or neglect what is ought to be done. An injury must be wilfully committed; whereas it is enough to make a thing unjust that it happens through a culpable negligence. 1. We may injure a person in his soul by misleading his judgment, by corrupting the imagination, by inflicting guilt, and wounding the soul with grief. Persecutors who succeed in their compellable measures, though they cannot alter the real sentiments by external violence, yet sometimes injure the soul by making the man a hypocrite. 2. We may injure another in his body by homicide, murder, preventing life, disseminating death by wounds of any kind, by imprisonment, or any unjust restraint upon its liberty; by robbing it of its chastity, or prejudicing its health. 3. We may injure another in his name and character by our own false and rash judgments of him; by false witness; by charging a man to his face with a crime which either we ourselves have forged, or others who have been forgery by some other person; by detraction or backbiting; by reproach, or exposing another for some natural imbecility either in body or mind; or for some calamity into which he is fallen, or some miscarriage of any kind which has been guilty; by some specious or indirect accusations that are not true. Now if we consider the value of character, the resentment which the injurious person has of such treatment when it comes to his own turn to suffer it, the consequence of a man's losing his good name, and, finally, the difficulty of making a reparation, we must at once see the injustice of injuring another's good character. There are these two considerations which should sometimes restrain us from speaking the whole truth of our neighbor, when it is to his disadvantage. (1.) That he may possibly live to see his folly, and repent and grow better. (2.) Admitting that we speak the truth, yet it is a thousand to one but when it is bandied about for some time it will contract a deal of falsehood. 4. We may injure a person in his relations and dependencces. In his servants, by corrupting them; in his children, by drawing them into evil courses; in his wife, by sowing strife, attempting to alienate her affection. 5. We may be guilty of injuring another in his worldly goods or possessions: (1.) By doing him a mischief without any advantage to ourselves, through envy and malice. (2.) By taking what is another's, which is theft." See Grove, Mor. Phil. ch. vii, 9; Crellius, Sermons, vol. ii, ser. 93; Tillotson, Sermons, ser. 42.

INK (ιγκ, ἁγκ), so called from its blackness, Jet. xxxvi, 18; ἀγκ, μακροκ, black. 2 Cor. iii, 3; 3 John 12; 3 John 18). The most simple, and hence probably the most ancient mode of preparing ink was a mixture of water with charcoal powdered, or with soot, to which The Hebrews made use of different colors for writing, as did also the ancient Egyptians, and some of the books of the former are stated by Josephus to have been written in gold. The mode of writing mentioned in Numb. v. 28, where it is said that "the priest shall write the multitude, blot them out with the bitter water," was with a kind of ink prepared for the purpose, without any calc of iron or other material that could make a permanent dye; these maledictions were then washed off the parchment into the water, which the woman was obliged to drink: so that she drank the very words of the excommunication. The ink still used in the East is almost all of this kind; a wet sponge will completely obliterate the finest of their writings. The ancients used several kinds of tinctures as ink; among them that extracted from the cuttle-fish, called in Hebrew רָפָן, tekeleth. Their ink was not so fluid as ours. Demosthenes reproaches Aeschines with laboring in the grinding of ink, as painters do in the grinding of their colors. The substance found in an inkstand at Herculaneum looks like a thick oil or paint, with which the manuscripts had been written in a sort of relievo, visible in the letters when a leaf is held to the light in a horizontal direction. Such vitriolic ink as has been used on the old parchment manuscripts would have corroded the delicate leaves of the papyrus, as it has done the skins of the manuscripts of Virgil and Terence in the library of the Vatican; the letters are sunk into the parchment, and some have eaten quite through it, in consequence of the corrosive acid of the vitriolic ink with which they were written. See Writing.

Ink-horn (יְפָאָל, ke' Seth, a round vessel), an inkstand worn in the girdle (Ezek. ix. 2, 3, 11). This implement is one of considerable antiquity; it is common throughout the Levant, and is often seen in the houses of the Greeks. To one end of a long brass tube for holding pens is attached the little case containing the moistened sepia used for ink, which is closed with a lid and snap, and the whole stuck with much importance in the girdle. This is, without doubt, substantially the instrument borne by the individual who Ezekiel mentions as "one man: clothed in linen, with a writer's inkhorn by his side." We find the Egyptian scribes had likewise a cylindrical box for ink, which was probably carried in a similar manner. Besides these, the modern Egyptians have a regular inkstand for more extensive writing. The ancient Egyptians made writing-tablets, which are square pallets of wood, permitting the occupants to enjoy every breath of air that passes across the heated plain. The terrace is tolerably clean, but the court is "a deep in chained straw and filth" (Longf., Chaldee, i. 13). The great khans established by the Persian kings and great men, at intervals of about six miles on the roads from Bagdad to the sacred places, are provided with stables for the horses of the pilgrims. "Within these stables, on both sides, are other cells for travellers" (Lavard, Nin. and Bab, p. 478, note). The "khal" or "manger," mentioned in Luke ii, 7, was probably in a stable of this kind. Such khans are sometimes situated near running streams, or have a supply of water of some kind, but the traveller must carry all his provisions with him (Ouseley, Trans. in Persia, i. 261, note). At Damascus...
In the Mishna (Yebamoth, xvi, 7) a tale is told of a company of Levites who were travelling to Zoar, the city of Palms, when one of them fell ill on the road and was left by his companions at an inn, until the next day. The hostess (רָפֵא מִשָּׁלָה, "a woman who keeps an inn") in Judg. xi, 1, of the mother of Jephthah; of Delilah (Judg. xvi, 17) and for an inn, under the charge of the hostess (יַעֲמָל קַרְטָרִים, רָפֵא מִשָּׁלָה). On their return to inquire for their friend, the hostess told them he was dead and buried, but they refused to believe her till she produced his staff, wallet, and roll of the law. In Jos. ii, 1, נֶפֶצֶק, אִשָּׁה, the term applied to Rahab, is rendered in the Targum of Jonathan יַעֲמָל קַרְטָרִים, רָפֵא מִשָּׁלָה, "a woman who keeps an inn." So in Judg. xi, 1, of the mother of Jephthah; of Delilah (Judg. xvi, 17) and for an inn, under the charge of the hostess (יַעֲמָל קַרְטָרִים, נֶפֶצֶק). In Kings iii, 16, יָמַשׂ, "words, in the opinion of Kimchi on Jos. ii, i, appear to have been synonymous. See KHAN.

INNER (i.e. DOMESTIC, or "Home") Missions is the name given, in the Protestant churches of Germany, to any association of evangelical Christians for the purpose of religious instruction, and temporary establishments of the community by disseminating the Gospel truth, and affording help in temporal concerns.

I. Origin and Organization.—Christianity commands that faith should manifest itself in deeds of love; hence, as early as the apostolic times, we see deacons and deaconesses appointed to attend to the poor and the sick, distribute alms, etc. This continued in later days by Origen, St. Anthony, etc. When, in the 4th century, Christianity became the religion of the state, the clergy assumed this office, which, from the abundance of means in the Church, had become very important. In subsequent times it was reserved for Francis of Assisi, Elizabeth of Thuringia, Francis of Sales, and a number of religious orders, hospitals, sisters of charity, etc., devoting themselves to the care of the poor, the aged, and the sick. Hospitals, houses of refuge, orphanages, were established for the promotion of these ends. The Protestant Church, in consequence of its subjection to the state, could exert itself but little in that direction, being oftentimes even prevented by law from the care of the poor. Still efforts were made by private individuals, as August Hermann Francke, whose orphan asylum at Halle became a model which was imitated in other places; Biblical, missionary, and tract societies were established in Germany, and a number of houses of refuge and infant schools established. In modern times a fresh impulse was given to this evangelical movement by England. The attempts of Howard, Wilberforce, and Buxton were continued on an enlarged scale by Lord Ashley, the duke of Argyle, Elizabeth Fry, etc. City missions, Magdalen and night asylums, Sabbath and ragged schools, were established. Chalmers, first in the Presbyterian and then in the Free Church of Scotland, restored the deacon and care of the poor on an ecclesiastical basis. Similar efforts were made in France, among the Romanists, by the Sisters of St. Mary and St. Joseph, and St. Regis.

II. Sphere.—The German inner missions endeavor to promote infant, secular, and Sunday school associations, institutions of refuge, intercourse with the families, etc. They at the same time partake in the social questions of the day, and labor to systematize the aid given to the poor, to promote personal intercourse between the giver and the receiver, the purification of morals; and for these purposes they have established female benevolent institutions, domesticatories, nurseries, and what not. The influx of communicative ideas they seek to counterbalance by establishing schools for apprentices and adults, societies for the education of servants, both male and female, and for the propagation of good books. They oppose unchristian and uneclesiastical tendencies by promoting the study of the Scriptures, especially among family worship, awakening religious feelings in the families, organizing book and tract societies, sending out colporteurs and street preachers, and opposing prostitution, drunkenness, and all other immorality. They discountenance revolution as subversive of political organization, and as the enemy of religion and of morality: in this department they act through political speeches and the press, in raising the standard of popular literature, and especially by their influence over the rising generation. They also lend to the prisons, trying to promote Christian love in the hearts of the officers intrusted with their charge, and to further a profession, as their candidate, in their institutions. Aside from the protective associations for culprits who have finished their time of imprisonment, they endeavor also to establish asylums for them.

II. Intent.—In Germany the inner missions embrace some eleven to twelve million Protestants, not regularly classified, of any Church, any denomination, and the workmen’s associations, which are often a prey to atheism and communism, travellers and strangers, etc. In this manner they become a friendly ally of the government, of which all they require is the protection of their associations and freedom of worship. With regard to the Church, they labor for the evangelization of the masses according to a truly Christian spirit, but without entering into any of the disputes of the different confessions, and without seeking to gain proselytes. Their agents are women as well as men; for instance, Elizabeth Fren, Sarah Martin, Anselm Steekting, etc. To show the necessity of such an association was shown by statistical statements of the wants of the population, which were especially collected by Wichern. From this starting-point the institution in question developed its labors. Aside from the organization of societies, which were soon propagated throughout the country, it directed its attention to the establishing of houses of refuge, to which that established by Wichern at Horn, near Hamburg, served as model, and of which, in 1888, there were some 140 in existence in Germany. For the care of the poor it was difficult to do much, as the inner missions could not engage in the management of the local or diocesan organizations for that purpose, yet in some places, as at Erlangen and at Ansbach, the voluntary system of relief has produced good results. The inner missions also labor to promote the observance of the Sabbath, and to distribute Bibles. Their most important results, so far, in Germany, are the establishing of Bible depts., of associations to meet the wants of the ignorant, the improvement of the prison systems, which has been adopted in a number of countries, etc.

The interest of Germany in the cause of inner missions has of late greatly increased. The Congress for Inner Missions, which in 1888 was organized in connection with the Church Diet (Kirchentag), has ever since held annual or biennial general meetings in connection with the sittings of the Church Diet. At these meetings reports are made on the condition of religious life in Germany, and the proper remedies for the existing evils are discussed. The establishment of houses of refuge and of Christian lodging-houses, the care of the poor and of discharged prisoners, the solution of the social question, the extension of Young Men’s Christian Associations, and of Bible and other religious societies, are the chief objects, which engage the attention of every congress. In addition to the General Congress for Inner Missions, a number of provincial associations for the same purpose have been organized. Thus a South-eastern Conference for Inner Missions was established in 1885; a central association for the inner missions, which was organized to invoke the good will of the state government for the suppression of vice and immorality, especially of prostitution. Germany has a number of papers advocating the cause of inner missions, the most important of which is the Fliegende Blätter für innere Mission, is published by Wichern (established in 1860). INNOCENT (prop. "p", d320g).—The Hebrews considered innocence as consisting chiefly in an exemption from external faults committed contrary to the law; hence they were innocent with hands (Gen. 30, 29; 31, 22; Psa. xxxvi, 4). "I will wash my hands in innocency" (Psa. xxvi, 6); "Then have I cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency" (Psa. lxxiii, 13). Josephus admits of no other sins than those actions which are put in execution (A Hist. xii, 7, 1). Sins in thought, in his account, are not punished by God. This is a very different standard of morality from that of the Gospel (Matt. v, 28; John iii, 15), or even of the O. T. (Psa. li, 6). To be innocent is used sometimes for being exempt from punishment. "I will not treat you as one innocent" (Jer. xvi, 28); literally, I will not make you innocent; but chastise thee, but like a kind father. Jeremiah (xxiii, 12), speaking to the Edomites, says, "They who have not (so much) deserved to drink of the cup of my wrath, have tasted of it." Nahum (iv, 5) declares that God is ready to exercise vengeance; he will make no one innocent; he will spare no one; (Exod. xxxii, 19, 20). "Thus shalt thou shalt know that I am innocent." no sin shall be unpunished. "With the pure thou wilt show thyself pure" (Psa. xviii, 26); thou treatest the just as just, the good as good: thou never dost confound the guilty with the innocent.

INNOCENT I, St., a native of Albano, near Rome, became pope April 27, 402, as successor of Anastasius I, St. Chrysostom had just been driven from Constantinople and exiled. The influence of the empress Eudoxia. Innocent I at once actively took his part, and sought to have the affair referred to a council of the joint bishops of the Eastern and Western churches. Failing in this, he next attempted an arrangement with the emperor, but his envoys were ill treated, and accomplished nothing. St. Chrysostom died in the mean time, but Innocent resolved to cease all intercourse with Constantinople until justice was done to his memory. The Western Church was itself in a state of great disturbance; in Africa the Donatists (q. v.) were giving much trouble, and Innocent, more especially, was accused and condemned by the Council of Carthage (405); in Rome Vigilius opposed the abuses introduced into the Church, such as the cellibacy of the priests, the worship of images, and monastic life. At the same time Alaric was marching with the Goths against Rome: the Christians fled to their churches, and Innocent permitted the heathen to offer up sacrifices to their gods; but prayers and sacrifices proved in vain, and the pope was obliged to pay to Alaric the ransom of the city, which was nevertheless taken by the barbarians Aug. 24, 410, and burned, but plundered, and pillaged, and torn down year by year by Astolf, Alaric’s brother-in-law. After the Goths had left the neighborhood of Rome, Innocent I, who had sought refuge with the emperor at Ravenna, returned to the city, and by his efforts to restore its prosperity gained a great many heathens to the Church. He commanded that the Mondays after Easter and the four days as well as Fridays, enjoined celibacy on the priests, and took repressive measures against the Macedonians. His course against the Pelagians seems to have been variable. Schaff says that he commended the Africans, who had condemned Pelagianism in two synods (Carthage and Milev, now Milevis), for having added themselves to the Church of St. Peter to obtain an approval for their acts, but that he refrained from giving judgment. He died March 12, 417, was canonized, and ranks among the highest saints of the Roman Catholic Church. He is commemorated on July 28. His decretals are to be found in the collection of Dionysius Exiguus, and the most complete collection of his letters in Schönermann's Pontificum Romae, epistola genuina. Labbe, Conc. ii, 1246-1306, gives thirty-nine of his letters. General mention is made of Ecclésiastique, v, xvi, of Germanus, 1241-1235, who was consecrated to him the Decretum occidentale et orientale ecclesiæ adversus Pelagianos datum, published during the reign of his successor, Sismon. i. Innocênt II, Pope (Gregorio Papareschi), was born at Rome as one of the family of the Guidoni. He became successively abbot of the Benedictine convent of St. Nicholas at Rome, cardinal-deacon in 1118, and was within three years pope by the choice of all the cardinals (1130), as successor of Honorius II. The other party elected Peter Leonis, under the name of Anacletus II. Innocent fled to France, where Bernard de Clairvaux caused him to be acknowledged as pope by Louis VI of France, and was consecrated by the bishops of Toulouse. He was afterwards recognized also by Henry II of England, by Lotharius, king of Germany, and even by the synod of Pisa in 1134. In 1136 he returned to Rome with the emperor, and, after the death of Anacletus in 1138, was universally acknowledged as pope. He drove Arnold of Brescia out of Italy, and put King Roger under the ban, but, having taken the field against the latter, he was made prisoner at Galleccio in 1139. He was afterwards released by abandoning Sicily, Apulia, and Capua to Roger. He had also some severe conflicts with the king of France, and the Romans, having revolted against his government, re-established the senatus, and declared themselves independent. In the midst of these troubles Innocent died, Sept. 29, 1143. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop., s. v.; Fabricius, Bibl. Innocênt III (a) (Lothario Conti), by far the greatest pope of his name, was the noble family of Rome at Anagni in 1161. After a course of much distinction at Paris, Bologna, and Rome, he had greatly distinguished himself in the studies of philosophy, theology, and the canon law, and also by several written compositions, especially by his treatise De Miseria Conditionis Huma-

The gloomy asetic views which he took in this work of the world and of human nature show a mind finely fitted with contempt for all the accidents of action, and not likely to be restrained in forwarding what he considered to be his paramount duty by any of the common feelings of leniency, conciliation, or concession, which to a man in his situation must have appeared sinful weaknesses. His ambition and haughtiness were apparently not personal. His interest seems to have been totally merged in what he considered the sacred right of his see, 'universal supremacy,' and the sincerity of his conviction is shown by the steady, uncompromising tenor of his conduct, and by a like uniformity of sentiments and tone throughout his writings, and especially his numerous letters." The external circumstances of his time also furthered Innocent's views, and enabled him to make his pontificate the most marked in the annals of Rome; the culminating point of the temporal as well as the spiritual supremacy of the Roman see. "The emperor Henry VI, king of Italy, and also of Sicily, had lately died, and rival candidates were disputing for the crown. The rest of Germany, with the exception of Sicily, Henry's widow, was left regent of Sicily and Apulia in the name of her infant son Frederick II. Innocent, asserting his claim of suzerainty over the kingdom of Sicily, confirmed the regency to Constance, but at the same time claimed from her a surrender of all disputed points concerning the jurisdiction over those fine territorics. Constance dying shortly after, Innocent himself assumed the regency during Frederick's minority. At Rome, availing himself of the vacancy of the imperial throne, he bestowed the investiture on the prelates of the kingdom of Sicily, who made an oath of allegiance to himself, thus putting them into possession of the kingdom, though often eluded claim of the imperial authority over that city. In like manner, being favored by the people, ever jealous of the dominion of foreigners, he drove away the imperial feudalatories, such as Conrad, duke of Spoleto and count of Ascoli, and even the count of Ancona and the count of Marsculta, and took possession of those provinces in the name of the Roman see. He likewise claimed the exarchate of Ravenna; but the archbishop of that city asserted his own prior rights, and Innocent, says the anonymous biographer, 'prudently deferred the enforcement of his claim for the present, but at the convenient moment he entered Tuscany, with the exception of Pisa, threw off their allegiance to the empire, and formed a league with Innocent for mutual support. It was on this occasion that Innocent wrote that famous letter in which he asserts that, "as God created two luminaries, one superior for the day, and the other inferior for the night, which last owes its splendor entirely to the first, so has he disposed that the regal dignity should be but a reflection of the splendor of the papal authority, and entirely subordinate to it." It was in the affairs of Germany, however, that Innocent's position most clearly manifested the greatness of the papal power over the destinies of the world. Setting himself up as supreme arbitrator between the two claimants who were contending for the imperial crown, he decided (in 1201) in favor of Otho, because he descended from "a race (welf) devoted to the Church," with the condition that the disputed concession of the countess Mathilda be wholly resign to the decisions of the holy see; and, as a natural consequence, he proceeded at the same time to excommunicate Otho's rival, Philip. In spite of a determined resistance of Philip and his friends, which for a time seemed almost to check his advance, he at last forced through by the assassination of Philip, Innocent's triumph in Germany was complete, and his vassal emperor Otho was made temporal lord of the West. But a further triumph crowned the efforts of Innocent in Germany only a short time after. Otho, incensed by the displeasure of the pope by his estrangement from the papal see, was excommunicated and deposed in 1210, and Innocent's own ward, Frederick of Sicily, was brought forward as a candidate for the vacant throne, and finally crowned emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle, with the approval of the fourth Lateran Council (A.D. 1215). For the seventh time Innocent was pope in Germany. Twice he had decided an imperial election. Against one of the emperors whom he supported he had made his sentence of excommunication and deposition valid; the other had put forward, intending him to be a mere puppet and instrument of his will, "his nephew." This is to say, Innocent proved himself a great statesman, it must be conceded also that he was very much unlike many of his predecessors, very strict and uncompromising in his notions of discipline and morality. Irregularity and vexation were repressed everywhere as soon as discovered. Thus he excommunicated tyrants, because he had repudiated his wife Ingerburg of Denmark, and had married Agnés de Meranie. "The interdict was laid on France: the dead lay unburiad; the living were deprived of the services of religion. Against an antagonist armed with such weapons, even Philip Augustus, brave and firm though he was, was not a match. The idea of the papal power had too firmly taken hold of men's minds; the French would gladly have remained true to their king; they dared not dispute with a rival. Beside the jealousy of Nicholas I's intervention with Lothair, Innocent's power was exercised on behalf of morality. Philip was obliged to take back his divorced wife, not yielding, as one of his predecessors, Robert I of France (996–1031), had done, to feel the superintendence; not subduing, like his predecessor, Henry IV, by internal dissensions, but vanquished in open fight with an opponent stronger than himself."

As we have already said, the external circumstances of that day seem to have favored Innocent, and enabled him to "assert without concealment the idea of papal theocracy;" that the pope was "the viceregent of God upon earth;" that to him "was intrusted by St. Peter the government not only of the whole Church, but of the whole world." "Next to God, he was to be so honored by princes that their claim to rule was lost if they failed to serve him; princes might have power on earth, but the princes of the blood, the saviors of the world, were immortals."

The same fate that had befallen Philip Augustus threatened keener the more the princes of the church, the clergy, the make of heaven in reward. He sent two legates to attend the crusade, and their letters or reports to him are contained in the collection of his "Epistles" (especially Epistolae 108 of B. xii, in which the legate Arnaldus relates the taking of Bezier, and the massacre of 30,000 individuals of the age, and of 50,000 of the clergy."

But however, who did not live to see the end of the consecration he had kindled, can hardly be held responsible for the fearful excesses into which it ran. In 1215 he convened a general council at the Lateran, in which he inculcated the necessity of a new crusade, which he regarded not merely as lawful, but even as obligatory, undertaking in behalf of religion and piety. He also launched fresh anathemas against heretics, determined several points of doctrine and discipline, especially concerning auricular confession, and sanctioned the establishment of the two great mendicant monastic orders, the Dominicans and Franciscans, the former to extirpate heresy, and the latter to preach sound doctrines, and to assist the parochial clergy in the execution of their duties. For if ever watchfulness was required by the clergy, it was at this time. "It was in this very time," says a contemporary writer, "that the darkest period of the Church's history began and did not disappear. It was during this very reign of Innocent III that the gray dawn of twilight gave the first promise of modern independence, modern superintendence, modern discipline, and modern revolutionizing the whole structure of society, both feudal and ecclesiastical. To control or subjugate the new spirit was therefore the great problem presented to the Church of the 13th century" (Prof. C. K. Adams, in the New-Englander, July, 1876, p. 576). But if, by establishing these mendicant orders, Innocent III had provided himself with willing minions to spread over Europe, and to purify the Church from "modern intolerance" and "modern independence," he had certainly, at the same time, created for himself an opposition which afterwards became a still greater danger to the Church itself, by its opposition which these mendicant orders created among the laity against the parochial clergy (compare Reichel, p. 576 sq.). It remains for us only to add one of the greatest achievements of Innocent's day, undertaken by him, no doubt, that nothing could be more evident than this. It might be well to consider, as it is a matter of public interest throughout the whole known world, viz. the establishment of the Latin kingdom at Jerusalem, and the Latin conquest of Constantinople, which Foulkes (Chris- tendom's Division, ii, 226), while yet a communicant of the Roman Catholic Church, does not hesitate to pronounce "one of the foulest acts ever perpetrated under the garb of religion in Christian times; a sorry connection, unquestionably, for one of his high position and commanding abilities.” At the very commencement of his pontificate, Innocent began writing epistles (209 of B. xi) to the patriarch of Constantinople, and other letters to the emperor Alexius, with the view of inducing him to acknowledge the supremacy of the see of Rome; and although he failed in this, he had, soon after, by an unexpected turn of events, the satisfaction of consecrating a prelate of the Western Church as patriarch of Constantinople; but this by no means resulted, as Innocent most probably desired, in a reunion of the Eastern and Western Church; it was overfollowed by an increase of Church revenues. The Crusaders, whom Innocent had sent forth, as he thought, for the reconquest of the Holy Land, after taking Zara from the king of Hungary, for which they were severely censured by the pope, proceeded to attack Constantinople, and overthrew the Greek empire. All this was at the expense of Innocent’s sanction; but when Baldwin wrote to him, acquainting him with the full success of the expedition, Innocent, in his answer to the marquis of Montferrat, forgave the Crusaders in consideration of the triumph which they had acquired over the holy Church over the Eastern empire. Innocent also sent legates to Calo Johannes, prince of the Bulgarians, who acknowledged his allegiance to the Roman see (Innocenti III Epistole). One year after the Lateran Council, “one of the latest acts, and by far the most momentous in the pontificate of Innocent III” was united with a formal act of submission on July 16, 1216, in the very prime of life, broken down by overwork, for “the work of the whole world was upon him, as may be seen from his letters, not one of which exhibits the impress of any other mind than his own.” In Innocent III the Roman Church lost one of the most extraordinary Christendom, and in one of the most illustrious, as he was certainly one of the most ambitious she has ever honored with the pontifical dignity. His pontificate may be fairly considered to have been the period of the highest power of the Roman see. At his death, “England and France, Germany and Italy,enegro and Hungary, all the papal states, and the whole Church over the whole world,” was united with a formal act of submission on July 16, 1216, in the very prime of life, broken down by overwork, for “the work of the whole world was upon him, as may be seen from his letters, not one of which exhibits the impress of any other mind than his own.” In Innocent III the Roman Church lost one of the most extraordinary Christendom, and in one of the most illustrious, as he was certainly one of the most ambitious she has ever honored with the pontifical dignity. His pontificate may be fairly considered to have been the period of the highest power of the Roman see. At his death, “England and France, Germany and Italy,enegro and Hungary, all the papal states, and the whole Church over the whole world,” Innocent III (b). Under this category we also find an anti-pope in the Roman Church. He was a descendant of the Frangipani family, and is distinguished from the eminent pope of that name by the surname Lanfranc. After the death of Hadrian he contested the succession of Alexander III, who succeeded in securing his person and Innocent was imprisoned in the monastery Cava. Thus ended a schism which had lasted twenty years, under four successive rivals for the papal throne. (J. H. W.)

Innocent IV (Simbolo del Fiescbo, of Geneo) was elected the successor of Celestine IV in the year 1248. In the preceding bitter quarrels between Gregory IX and the emperor Frederick II, cardinal Sinibaldo had shown himself rather friendly towards the emperor; and the imperial curators, on receiving the news of his exaltation, were rejoicing at it; but the experienced Frederic checked them by remarking, “I have now lost a friendly cardinal, to find another hostile pope: no pope can make a schism.” He was also later excommunicated from excommunication, Frederick made advances to the new pope, and offered conditions advantageous to the Roman see; but Innocent remained inflexible, and, suddenly leaving Rome, went to Lyons, and there summoned a council in 1245, to which he invited the emperor. That he was received with a cordial answer to the charges brought by the pope against Frederick; and, after much wrangling, Innocent excommunicated and deposed the emperor, on the ground of perjury, sacrilege, heresy, and defiance of the Church, commanded the German princes to elect a new emperor, and reserved the disposal of the kingdom of Sicily to himself. In Italy the only consequence was that the war which already raged between the Guelfs and Ghibellines continued fiercer than before; in Germany a contemptible rival to Frederick was set up in the person of Heinrich von Schanzenburg, who was deposed by Conrad, Frederick’s son. Frederick’s sudden death in Apulia, A.D. 1250, led Innocent to return to Italy, and to offer the crown of Sicily to several princes, one of whom, Richard of Cornwall, observed that the pope’s offer “was much like making him a present of the moon.” The council of Lyons, 1245, confirmed Innocent in the decisions of the previous council and died at Lyons, July 16, 1246. He was so successful in defending his cause, was excommunicated; but he gave little heed to this act of Innocent’s, and even went into Italy in 1252, and took possession of Apulia and Sicily. Two years after he died, and his brother Manfred, who became regent, in a like manner baffled a council assembled by Innocent at the court of Rome. Innocent himself died soon after, at the end of 1254, at Rome, leaving Italy and Germany in the greatest confusion in consequence of his outrageous tyranny, and his unbending hostility to the whole house of Swabia. He was succeeded by Alexander IV. He wrote Apparatus superselectus (fol. often reprinted):— De Potestate Ecclesiasticâ et Jurisdictione Imperii:—Officium in octaria festi Nativitatis B. Mariae: Interpreta tiones in Vetus Testamentum. Nineteen letters of his are given by Labbe, Comel. xi, 568–592; forty-eight by Labbe, Concilia. Innocent V (Peter of Tarantasia, also called Peter of Champagni or of Champagnac) was born at Moustier, in Savoy, in 1225. He was elected pope January 20, 1276, as successor of Gregory X. He was a Latin legate to the council of Lyon in 1245, and preached the Crusade; he had entered quite young, and where he had acquired a great reputation. He succeeded Thomas Aquinas as professor of theology in the University of Paris; was made archbishop of Lyons in 1272, and afterwards bishop of Ostia and grand penitentiary. As soon as he became pope he applied himself to the amelioration of the conditions in Italy, which was then divided into two contending factions, under the leadership of the Guelfs and the Ghibellines (q. v.), and in this he measurably succeeded. He was also on the eve of inducing the Greek emperor, Michael Palaeologus, to confirm the act of union between the Greek and Latin churches, drawn up in the Council of Lyons, when he died June 22, 1276, having occupied the papal throne only five months. He wrote commentaries Super ius librorum Sententiarum (Toulouse, 1659, 8 vols. fol.) — Super Pententatem; super Lucam; super Epistolam Pauli (Cologne, 1478; Antw. 1617, fol.); and various treatises: De Unitate Formae; De Materia Culti; De Eternitate Formae; De Instructe et Voluntate Dei; his works which are given by Quetif, Scriptores Ordinis Predicatorum (Paris, 1719, 2 vols. fol.). Innocent VI (Eliane d'Albert or Aubert), a Frenchman, succeeded Clement VI in 1352. He resided at Avignon, like his immediate predecessors; but, unlike them, he put a check to the disorders and scandals of that court, which have been so strongly depicted by Petrarck, Villani, and other contemporary writers. He reformed the abuses of the reservations of benefices, and enforced the rules of council of bishops in their sees. His immediate predecessors having lost their influence in the States of the Church, Innocent VI determined on reconquering these territories, and successfully reoccupied, with the assistance of the warlike cardinal Egidius Albormoz, the various provinces of the papal state which had been lost by petty tyrants, and then sent back to Rome the former demagogue Cola di Rienzo, who, being still dear to the people, repressed the insolence of the lawless barons, but who, being himself intoxicated with his power, committed acts of wanton cruelty, upon which the people rose and murdered him in 1354. In 1358 the emperor Charles IV was crowned at Rome by a legate deputed by pope-Innocent for the purpose. Innocent died at Avignon, at an advanced age, in 1362. It was during his pontificate that the mendicant orders were persecuted in England, and declared to be an unchristian order by Richard, archbishop of Armagh, and of Ireland, in a book which he published in defence of the curates or parish priests, entitled Defensorum Curatorum. Of course Innocent rallied to the defense of the mendicants. He repudiated the archbishop, and confirmed anew all the privileges which had been granted to his predecessors to that order. A letter of his is preserved in Labbe, Concilia, xi, 1890; four by Ughelli, Italia Sacra; and two hundred and fifty by Martene, Theanevarnaus novus An- ecletorum, ii, 845-1072. Innocent VIII (cardinal Giovanni Battista Cibo), a Genoese of Greek descent, was during his youth in the service of Alfonso of Aragon, king of Naples, but subsequently entered the Church, Paul II giving him the bishopric of Savone. His conduct was disgracefully irregular: seven illegitimate children he had by three different women, and was, besides, married when he took or- ders. At the death of Sixtus IV serious troubles broke out in Rome. The election was warmly contested, and among the chief agitators was chancellor Borgia, who forwarded an unavailing candidacy for Alexander VI; but the cardinals in favor of Cibo proved at last successful. Innocent had bought the tiara by means of benefices, legations, palaces, and large sums of money, and was elected Aug. 24, 1484. His first undertaking was to reconcile the Italian princes, and to reconcile to the papal see all those whom a rebellious pope had alien- ated. Frightened at the advance of Bajazet with his Turks, Innocent wrote to the Christian princes for help in men or money to resist the invasion. Immense sums were at once forwarded to Rome from various countries; but the pope, pretending that he could not act without the assistance of the German emperor, had been divided by the quarrels between Mathias, king of Hungary, and emperor Frederick, Albert of Brandenburg and Otho of Bavaria, etc.,) used the funds thus obtained to war against Ferdinand I, king of Naples, who refused to pay him the usual tribute. The pope favored the revolted Neapolitans barons against Ferdinand I of Naples, in consequence of which the troops of Ferdinand rav- aged the territory of Rome; but through the mediation of Lorenzo de Medici and of the duke Sforza of Milan, peace was re-established between the two parties. The Turks were still threatening war. Jem, in order to thum the enmity of his brother Bajazet, had fled to Rhodes, where he was seized by the grand master of the order of St. John, D'Aubusson, and delivered up to the pope in exchange for the cardinal's hat. The pope received Jem with great honor, but took care to secure his person, as he would be an important hostage. In this he was not mistaken, for Bajazet feared for the life of his brother, and, to secure his throne, he sent an ambas- sador to Rome to offer Innocent a large sum if he would keep Jem in prison. The pope accepted the dis- onorable bargain, although the sultan of Egypt, who was in constant rivalry with his brother, determined Jem to go to the Mediterranean to march against Bajazet, offered, on condition of his re- lease, to restore Jerusalem to the Christians, and was even ready to pledge himself to surrender to the pope all the territory that should be taken from the Turks. Under Innocent's successor, the deposed Alexander VI, Jem was punished by order of the pope (comp. Restel), See of Rome in the Middle Ages, 538, Bajazet, of course, showed himself very generous towards his accomplice, Innocent VIII. On May 29, 1492, he sent him the iron of the spear with which, he asserted, Christ was pierced on the cross, and which was among the booty taken by Mohamed II after the downfall of Constantinople. The relic (dressed with a great ceremony) was, unfortunately, the third of the kind in Europe, for the emperor of Germany claimed to have the holy lance at Nuremberg, and the king of France in the Holy Chapel at Paris. Innocent VIII died July 25, 1492. Among the principal acts of his administration was the condemnation of the order of the Conception, founded at Toledo by Beatrice of Sylva; the canonization of Leopold of Austria in 1485; the condemnation of the propositions of Mirandola in 1487; the union under the crown of Spain of the three military orders of Calatrava, St. James, and Alcu-tara, in 1489; and the confirmation of the brotherhood of Mercy, instituted at Rome for the benefit of condemned criminals. Two letters of Innocent are published by Ughelli, Italia Sacra, i, 710; v, 948. Roman Catholic writers endeavor to free Innocent VIII from the charge of being immoral in connexion with his only two illegitimate children, and that they were born before he was made pope; but "the success of Innocent VIII in increasing the population of Rome was a favorite topic with the wits of the day" (Innocuo priscos aquam est debere Quiritis. Prognosis exhaustam restitu-tuit Epigrammazarii Epigrammata, he was gracening with "the epitaph which declared that flith, gluttony, avarice, and sloth buried him in his tomb" (Marullus, Epigram, lib. iv.). But the conduct of Innocent VIII can hardly compare with the career of his successor, Alexander VI, "the most depraved of all the popes," uniting in himself all the vices of Innocent VIII and the unscrupulous family ambition of Sixtus IV." Indeed, all the latter half of the 16th century scarcely saw a supreme pontiff without the visible evidences of human frailty around him, the unblushing acknowledgment of which is the fairest commentary on clerical morality (Lea, Hist. of Sovereign Priests, p. 358, 850).

INNOCENT IX (Giovanni Antonio Facchinetti), born in Bologna in 1519, had distinguished himself as papal legate at Trent, afterwards as the papal nuncio at Venice, and as presidnet of the Inquisition. He was elected pope after the death of Gregory XIV, in Oct. 1591. He bore a good reputation for learning and piety, but he was too old and feeble for the papal chair, and constantly confined to his bed by illness, and was even obliged to give his audiences there. Notwithstanding these difficulties, however, he took an active part in the affairs of France and Spain. He entered Dec. 30, 1591, the papal conclave, which had elected Silvio Passeri as his predecessor Gregory had done. A letter of his is still extant (in Cayet, Chronologie novemnaire), in which he urges Alexander Farnese to hasten the equipment of his troops, to invade France, and to relieve Rouen, all which that general forthwith executed with much success and skill. He died Jan. 16, 1592, in the 12th year of his reign of only two months, and was succeeded by Clement VIII.

INNOCENT X (cardinal Giovanni Battista Panfili), born at Rome in 1572, was elected in Sept. 1664, after the death of Urban VIII. He was then seventy-three years of age. He was under the cloud of a lawsuit in-law, Donna Olimpia Maidalchini Panfili, who appears to have been an unprincipled woman, very fond of mony, and anxious to aggressivate her relatives. Innocent, however, displayed in several instances much firmness, judgment, and prudence, and a wish to protect the humble and poor. He absolved the excommunication of different churches, diminished the taxes, which had been very heavy under his predecessor, Urban VIII, and at the same time embellished Rome. The people of Fermo, on the Adriatic, revolted against their governor, being excited by the riotous nobility and landholders, who were interested him for having by an edict of annona kept the price of corn low; the governor and other official persons were murdered. Innocent sent a commissioner with troops, and the guilty, without distinction of rank, were punished, some being executed, and others sent to the galley. The city of Narni, in which Castello and Roncenario was still in possession of the Farnese dukes of Parma, notwithstanding the efforts of Urban VIII to wrest it from them. Disputes about jurisdiction were continuously taking place between the officers of the duke and those of the pope. Innocent having consecrated a new bishop of Foligno, a charge of simony was not accepted by the latter forbade his entering his territories, and as the bishop elect persisted, he was murdered on the road. The pope immediately sent troops to attack Castro, which being taken, he ordered the town to be razed to the foundations, and a pillar erected on the site, with the inscription, "Qui fecit Castro," His energy in the resolution against the Barbarini, who had opposed his election, and was a steadfast enemy of cardinal Mazarin, the supporter of the Barberini. The French prelate, half, however, exulted and obliged him to yield by threatening to take Avignon. Innocent also took an active part in the quarrel between the Jesuits and the Jansenists. As early as 1650, Hubert, bishop of Valeres, had denounced to the pope five propositions attributed to Jansenius (q.v.), which, in the preceding year, had been referred to the theological faculty.

Innocent exclaimed, "There is a special congress to consider them," April 20, 1651. De Saint Amour and some other theologians sent by the Jansenists were heard May 19, 1658, but P. Annat, a Jesuit, informs us that the affair had already been judged and decided in advance.
Finally a bull was issued, Usum occasionis, May 30, 1655, condemning the five propositions. It was received in France, and published by order of Louis XIV. Innocent died soon after, Jan. 6, 1654. His anxiety to further the interests of Rome throughout the world is manifest by the pecuniary assistance which he afforded the Venezians and Poilis in their war against the Turks, by his opposition to the peace of Westphalia, in fearing that it endangered the Romish states, and even the pontifical chair, and especially by the assistance which he gave to the Irish to combat the English, and, if possible, to regain the English territory for his Church. In Germany, also, he secured, by his undaunted efforts, the conversion of several princes and noblemen of influence. He built two beautiful churches in Rome, and left a well-filled treasury, which proved very useful to his successor, Alexander VII.

Innocent XI (cardinal Benedetto Odescalchi), born at Como in 1611, succeeded Clement X in 1676. It is said by some that he was a soldier in his younger days, though this has been denied by others (Count Torre Neti, in his Histoire de l'Italie, Bruxelles, 1746, Benedetto Odescalchi). He was a man of great firmness and courage, austere in his morals, and inflexible in his resolutions, and withal one of the most distinguished popes of the 17th century. He inaugurated many reforms, reduced very materially the pomp and luxury of the papal court, and suppressed various abuses. His administration was entirely free from the weakness of nepotism which had so greatly sullied the fame of many of the pontiffs who had preceded him. His own nephew he obliged to live at Rome, under his pontificate, in a private character; and in this respect, certainly, he has had the character of a saint. His austerity was so great that it made him many enemies, and oftentimes estranged even some who would gladly have offered him their friendship. His greatest enemies, no doubt, were the Jesitical order, which he was determined to crush out. The principal event of his pontificate was his decision to desist from the question whether the French King was of the right line. He was determined to put an end to this discussion by publising firmly the doctrines of the Gallican Church concerning the temporal power of the popes, their infallibility, and the independence of the king. The result of their deliberations was the famous four propositions promulgated March 16, 1682. See GALICAN CHURCH.

Innocent XI also condemned the propositions of the bishops who had voted them, and April 11, 1682, issued a brief annulling the proceedings of the French council. In 1686 he also condemned the doctrines of Molinos (q. v.), who was obliged to make a public recantation, September 3, 1687, besides suffering for the remainder of his life close confinement in the prisons of the Inquisition. At the close of 1676 Innocent took a threatening attitude towards the Jesuits, forbidding them, among other things, to receive any novices into their order. They retorted by calling the pope a Jesuitist, offered prayers for his conversion, and entered into an alliance with the French king. Innocent XI, however, died only a few years after, August 21, 1689. It was during his pontificate that James II of England became a Romanist, and endeavored, by a succession of bold attempts, not only to give Romanism toleration, but to make it the religion of his country. (Compare Fox, James II, p. 382; Hallam, Constit. Hist. ii, 212; Mackintosh, Hist. of Revolution, ch. v; Stoughton, Eccles. Hist. of England [Land. 1870, 2 vols., 8vo], vol. ii, chap. viii.) Stoughton claims that these efforts accorded, however, only "with the dazing policy of the Jesuits, who were masters at a court, but no less able to play off with the more cautious measures of the papacy." No doubt this is true in a measure. Innocent XI was evidently unwilling to become master of the English ecclesiastical establishment if to be secured by the aid of an order which he abhorred, and which he was determined upon extirpating, and this our supposition is strengthened by the demand which James II made upon Rome for a red hat for a Jesuit named Petre. See JAMES II. Two letters of this pope are published by Ughelli, Italia Sacer, iv, 513: x, 55. Innocent XII (cardinal Antonio Fagiolatti) was born at Naples March 13, 1615, and succeeded Alexander VIII in July, 1691. He had a serious dispute with the emperor Leopold I, who, attempting to revive in Italy the rights of the empire over the former imperial fefs, which had, during the wars and vicissitudes of ages, become emancipated, published an edict at Rome in June, 1697, enjoining all the possessors of such territories to apply to the emperor for his investiture within a fixed time, or they would be considered as usurpers and rebels. This measure, if enforced, would have affected the greater part of the landed property of Italy, and also the sovereignty of its governments, and of the Roman see among the rest. The pope protested against the edict, and advised the other Italian powers to resist such obloque pretensions, and, with the support of France, succeeded in persuading Leopold to desist from them. He also succeeded in putting an end to the difficulties existing between the papacy and France on the question of investiture [see Innocent XI], and obtained from the French clergy an address which amounted almost to a recantation of the four articles of the Gallican Church. The question of Quietism then reappeared.

Bossuet accused Fénélon of favoring that tendency in his Examen de l'abbé Maury, and the pope, while not explicitly condemning the pope, in accordance with the report of the Congregation of the Index (q. v.), and Fénélon (q. v.), is as well known, submitted (see vol. iii, p. 529-530).

Innocent built the harbor of Ponto d'Anzo on the ruins of the ancient Antium; he constructed the aqueduct of Civita Vecchia; the palace of the Monte Citorio at Rome, for the courts of justice; and the fine line of buildings at Ripagrande, on the north bank of the Tiber, below the town, where vessels which ascend the river load and unload; he also built the arsenal, and, in particular, the Arsenal of San Martino, and other useful works. Innocent was of regular habits, attentive to business, a lover of justice, and averse to nepotism. He died Sept. 27, 1700, and was succeeded by Clement XI.

Innocent, a Russian prelate, born in 1800 at Sievsk. At school he distinguished himself by his superior ability over his fellow students, especially displaying great oratorical talent. When twenty-four years old, in accordance with the Russian custom of the better class of society destined for the service of the Church, he entered the monastic order. Two years after, he was called as an officer to the theological academy of St. Petersburg, and in 1828 made rector of the high school at Kief. After filling various positions of great eminence in his Church, he was made a member of the "Holy Synod" in 1858. He died at Odessa May 6, 1857. His works are, The last days of Christ's terrestrial life (1828); The Life of the Apostle Paul (ed.); Discourses and Sermons (1843, 8 vols.); Of Sin and its Consequences (1844); etc.—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gen. xxv, 927.

Innocent, Gизыт, a Russian prelate, was born in Prussian Poland, of Lutheran parents, at the commencement of the 17th century. He joined the Greek Church while yet young, and became a monk. Distinguished for great ability and learning, he was selected for a professor's chair. He died at that place Feb. 24, 1684. He published On the Peace between God and Man (Kief, 1669), which, by a ukase of the Synod of 1766, was put in the Index: Instructions on the Sacrament of Penitence (Kief, 1671); and left in MS. a work on The true Faith (written in Polish), which aims to refute a work on the supremacy of St. Peter, and to exalt the Pecession of the Holy Spirit. He also published a synopsis of Russian history, which has been extensively circulated—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, xxv, 926.

Innocents, MASSACRE OF, by HERBOD (Mall, ii, 16). It has been thought strange that Josephus should not mention this atrocity (see Volkborst, Feram esse Infanticidii Bethlehem, hist. Gottingen, 1788) but it was one only, and that a local one, of his many acts of tyranny and cruelty. See HEROD THE GREAT.

Innocents' Day (Fatum Innocentium, ιννητή, των δυναμών των ευπρεπών), set apart by the Greek, Roman, and English churches to commemorate the slaughter of the children by Herod shortly after our Saviour's birth, is celebrated in the Western Church on Dec. 28, and in the Eastern Church Dec. 29. Ancient ecclesiastical writers speak of these children as Christian martyrs. Cyprian says, "The nativity of Christ began (a martyrdom to fruition) "with the martyrdom of those infants that from two years old and under were slain for his name" (Epist. 56, ad Tiber. p. 123). Augustine says, "These infants died for Christ, not knowing it; their parents bewailed them as dying martyrs; they could not have imagined, but, nevertheless, they were Christ: Christ granted them the honor to die for his name" (De Symbol, iii, 4, p. 303; De Lib. Arbit., iii, 23). So Prudentius (Cath. Hymn. de Epigr.), Salve, flores martyrum, Quos lucis Ipsi In limine Christi insecutor sustulit, Cen turbo saepeaves roseas In prima Christi victimam Grex immaculorum tener

"Hail, ye flower of martyrs, whom the enemy of Christ cut off in your very entrance upon the light, as the tempest does roses in the bud! First victims for Christ, tender flock of sacrifices, ye play innocently with your crowns and garlands before the very altar." It was a popular superstition in the old Church that Innocents' INNOVATIO BENEFICII

Day (or Childermass, as it was also called) is very unlucky to begin any work upon; and what day soever that falls on, whether on a Monday, Tuesday, or any other, nothing must be begun on that day throughout the year. Though Childermass Day was reckoned unfortunate, nevertheless reverence is held on it. The Societatis Evangelii makes an effort to change an older day that season called the King of the Cockneys, who presided on the day of his appointment. But in the modern Church this feast is observed as a special holiday by the young, and many curious customs connected with it prevail still. Thus it is that many of the children are on this day privileged to wear the clothes of the elders, and in some sort to exercise authority over the household in their stead. So, also, in communities of nuns, the youngest sister becomes for this day superior of the house, and exercises a sort of sporting authority even over the real superior. In Church, the priest celebrating mass on this day wears a blue gown. See Bingharn, Orig. Eclec. bk. xx. cap. vii. § 12; Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten a. der christl. Archäol. (Lips. 1817), i, 304 sqq.

Innovatio Beneficii is the technical term for any change that may be made in a benefice; it may be regarded either to the position itself, or only to the revenues accruing therefrom.

In partibus infidelium (i. q. in heathen countries), Episcopus, episcopi titularis, episcopus suffraganeus. All these expressions, sometimes used promiscuously, have important and closely connected significations. As bishops, on account of the great variety and number of duties devolving on them, are unable to perform them all in person, they are allowed the use of assistants, such as archdeacons, coadjutors, etc. For such functions, however, as can only be performed by a bishop of this kind, such as ordination and confirmation, bishops suffragan in a diocese are usually obliged to call in the aid of a neighboring bishop. In after times, the bishops driven out of their dioceses were especially intrusted with these functions, being considered as still belonging de jure to their dioceses. The Roman Church was thus led never to give up, in principle, any place where it had once obtained a footing, even when it did lose it in fact; and thus, when its bishops were driven out of a place, their connection with their cathedra did not therefore cease. In the 9th century a number of bishops were driven out of Spain by the Moors, and sought refuge at Oviedo (it is said that some were even driven out of their dioceses) before going to the Punicunset, and finally the bishops suffragans were put in charge of these places, which the bishops had left in the usual manner ("servati consuetudinis de episcopatu titulari in partibus infidelium"). That consecration differs from that of the other bishops only in making the recipient simply an adjunct of the regular bishop, without separate consecration. When they confer orders without the consent of their bishops, or otherwise overstep their duties, they are punished by being suspended for one year. The episcopi in partibus, as simple titular bishops, are revocable papal delegates. So also when they are missionary bishops. Suffragan bishops are in a more secure position, "cum assurgante crede seigniorum providatur," as says the bull De salute. See A. H. Andreucci, De episcopis titularibus seu in partibus ineditum (Rom. 1732); Thomassin, Vetus ac nova ecclesiae disciplina de beneficiis, pt. i, cap. xxvii, xxviii; F. A. Inquisition (Inquisitio hereticae, Sacramentum accumulatio) is the name given to a tribunal of the Roman Catholic Church, whose function is to seek out and punish heretics (Albigenses). It is a perversion of the old Church discipline, originally in the hands of the rural bishops, on whom devolved the duty of checking false doctrines, and who, for the purpose of stamping out rising heresies, made frequent visits to the churches of their dioceses. Upon such heretics, when discovered, they inflicted several punishments, the severest of which, however, was only excommunication. Another punishment frequently resorted to was banishment; but capital punishment on account of one's faith was not inflicted by Christians until the 4th century. The first instance of legally enforcing the death-penalty against Christians occurred under the emperor Theodosius the Great (382), who opposed and aimed at uprooting all heresy, especially that of Manicheism (Schaaf, Ch. Hist, ii. 141 sqq.). Under this emperor, and under Justinian, judges (inquisitores) were first appointed to examine heretics with a view to effecting their excommunication, and such punishments, if found guilty; and, in order to enable the ecclesiastical officers to execute their functions, the civil authorities surrendered for this purpose to the bishops the right of exercising the requisite jurisdiction in their diocese. And it was in the early days that such bishops should thenceforth be appointed without the special authorization of the pope, and that no monks could be raised to that office without the consent of their superiors (cap. v. Clement. De elect. Other restrictions were also enacted at Ravenna in 1111, 1114, etc., but the practice was not abolished. Thus, at the Synod of Cologne in 1229, we find the bishop of Liege represent-

Synod of Verona, in 1184, certain directions were given to the bishops "concerning heretics," who at this time formed a very formidable enemy of the Romish Church, more especially in the south of France. The sects had become so numerous that some of them, such as the Cathari (q. v.), the Albigenses (q. v.), and the Waldensians (q. v.), formed a kind of secondary hierarchy, and this led Innocent III (q. v.) in 1198 to dispatch the Cistercians Raineri and Guido, and in 1206 Peter of Castelnau and Raoul, as papal legates to France, to assist the bishops and the civil authorities in punishing all heretics with the utmost rigor. But, effect to this end, the synod of Verona in 1215 determined to make a permanent institution of the Inquisition, "the most formidable of all the formidable engines devised by popery to subdue the souls and bodies, the reason and the consciences of men, to its sovereign will."

Accordingly, the fourth Lateran Council (1215) made the persecution of heretics the chief business of synodal courts, in the form that every archbishop or bishop should visit, either personally, or through the archdeacon, or some other suitable person, the parish in which, according to rumor (in qua firma fuerit), there were heretics or to which the two or three inhabitants of irreproachable character, or, if necessary, all the inhabitants, to point out those who were known as heretics, or those who held secret meetings, or departed from the faithful in their walk and conduct. The refusal to take oath justified the suspicion of heresy, heresy proved by examination to the bishop was, according to the comp. Biehn, Beiträge z. d. Gesch. des Inquisitionsprozesses [Lpz. 1827], p. 60 sq.). In name, the bishops still conducted the matter, but the legates had supervision over them, and, in fact, conducted the persecution of heretics. In 1229 the Council of Toulouse confirmed this decision of the Synod of Verona, and I published forty-five decrees to complete the institution of episcopal inquisition (see Mansi, xxiii, 192; Planck, Gesch. d. Kirchl. Gewissenschafterfussung, iv, 2d half, 468 sq.). It was decided that each bishop should appoint in each district one plain and two or three laymen in good standing, who should devote themselves exclusively to ferreting out heretics, and then deliver them up to the archbishops, bishops, or other authorities for punishment. Every one guilty of concealing a heretic forfeited thereby his land possessions or offices; the house in which a heretic was discovered was to be burned, and he who was less severe, no heretic or unbeliever was to be allowed the aid of a physician; penitents were to leave their home, to wear a peculiar dress, and could hold no office except by a special dispensation from the pope. But, notwithstanding these rigid and definite regulations, the severity of the laws and the sinlessness of the officials, and the many who were found in the execution of the laws by the bishops, the see of Rome did not even approach the desired end. To accomplish this more certainly, the affairs of the Inquisition were taken from the bishops, and made a papal tribunal, and the bishops themselves were subjected to it. Accordingly, Gregory IX appointed, in 1229, in Germany, Aragonia, and Austria, in 1239 in Lambray and South France (see Beiers, anno 1239, in Mansi, xxiii, 269 sq.; Raymond, Annal. a. 1238, n. 59 sq.), the Dominicans (q. v.) permanent papal inquisitors (later also the Franciscans). "The mission, the wider powers and the conditions of these monks made profession, but of which, as it appeared in the sequel, they soon began to tire, afforded them leisure to attend incessantly to this new calling. The meanness of their dress, the poverty of their monasteries, and, above all, the public mendicancy and humility, disarmed the horrid terror of these monks, who were quite skilled in the art of making the people believe in the existence of so many ghosts, that they would not rest until they had satisfied their curiosity. Nevertheless, the degeneracy of the times, the looseness of the ecclesiastical laws, and the decay of the arts of seduction, made the monks, instead of the people, the victims of the Inquisition. They were the victims, not of the Church, but of the wealth and power of the Church, for they were employed by the Church to prey upon the people, and to rob them of their possessions, to the discontent of the people, and to support their own exactions. The Inquisition was established to carry out the policy of the Church, not to the advantage of the people, but to the advantage of the Church, and to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church. The Inquisition was established to carry out the policy of the Church, not to the advantage of the people, but to the advantage of the Church, and to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church.

In conclusion, it may be said that the Inquisition was established to carry out the policy of the Church, not to the advantage of the people, but to the advantage of the Church, and to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church. The Inquisition was established to carry out the policy of the Church, not to the advantage of the people, but to the advantage of the Church, and to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church. The Inquisition was established to carry out the policy of the Church, not to the advantage of the people, but to the advantage of the Church, and to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church. The Inquisition was established to carry out the policy of the Church, not to the advantage of the people, but to the advantage of the Church, and to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church. The Inquisition was established to carry out the policy of the Church, not to the advantage of the people, but to the advantage of the Church, and to the advantage of the Roman Catholic Church. house and Narbonne the inquisitors were banished in 1235, and four of them killed in the former city in 1242, and the pope was finally obliged to suppress the tribunal at the former place altogether. When last restored, the inquisitorial tribunal resumed its former cruellty, and the pope ordered the process to be carried on with even greater severity. The bishops proceeded to condemn and execute a large number of persons. The Reformation at last completely overthrew the power of the Inquisition in Germany, and the attempt to re-establish it, made mostly by the Jesuits, with an endeavor to check the progress of evangelical truth, as described above, Bohmen in particular supplied the power of the hierarchy with the latter, and limited thereby the power of the Inquisition, so that it now proceeded against secret or suspected heretics only on the accusation of sorcery and connection with the devil (compare the Breve of Nicholas V, in Raynald, a. 1461). In the 16th century, the time of the Reformation, the clergy, supported by the Guises, were able to rekindle violent persecutions against the Huguenots (q. v.), and endeavored to restore the Inquisition to its former power, but it had now lost its territory. Paul IV, it is true, published a bull (April 25, 1557) to re-establish it (Raynald, a. 1562). The Pope, Henry IV, con-

The Inquisition in Germany.—But from France the Inquisition soon cast its net over neighboring and distant countries, even beyond the oceans, by the aid of the Jesuits and the Dominicans. Almost immediately after its firm establishment in France, the Inquisition spread to Germany. The first inquisitor was Conrad of Marburg, who organized the "holy office" with terrible severity during the years 1231-1233. The sentences of death which this new tribunal pronounced were not few in number, and in many cases obtained the approval of the emperor, Ferdinand II. But there was a higher power than that of the reigning prince, which had been lost sight of; and though the people's voice was in those dark days not quite so powerful as in our own, it certainly sufficed to thwart the inquisitors' designs. Such was the case with the accusa-

They even influenced the pope to publish the bull (Summis desiderantes acheiis) in 1492 (Dec. 3), which reaffirmed the dogmas of the Council of Trent; they were the authors of the Inquisition's division of the world into two parts, the kingdoms of Christ and the kingdoms of the world; and they were the promoters of the Inquisition's power over the entire world, including the Americas. The Inquisition's role in the Americas was significant, as it was responsible for the suppression of indigenous cultures and the enforcement of Catholicism through violence and torture. The Inquisition wasabolished in 1834 by Pope Pius VII, who declared it to be a relic of the Middle Ages, no longer necessary in the modern world.
while the inquisitors were to extirpate heresy and punish heretics, the vicar of Christ reserved for himself the graces of reconciliation and absolution. In the arrogance which Rome has ever manifested, the power which belonged to the judge was withdrawn, and the pope, in the severest form of absolute monarchy, gave the highest guarantees to the inquisitors that the governments of the world asserted to belong to the papal see. Of course the new cardinal inquisitors made full use of their powers, and soon became the terror not only of Rome and Italy, but of all the countries over which they could possibly exert any influence. The Inquisition was spread, though not so severely as the Inquisitors, "Books were destroyed, and many more disfigured; printers were forbidden to carry on their business without licenses from the Holy Office." See Index. The terror-stricken people, however, soon gained their foothold again, and oppositions against the encroachments of Rome were everywhere manifest. The greatest resistance to it was offered in Venice. The republic refused to submit to an inquisitorial tribunal responsible solely to the pope, and, after long negotiations, permitted only the establishment of an inquisitorial tribunal on conditions that, with the papal office, a certain number of magistrates and lawyers should always be associated, and that the definitive sentence should not, at least in the case of laics, be pronounced before it was submitted to the senate (Basdragi Epistolae: Scriptum Antiquarum, i. 921, 926 sq.; Thunni, Hist. ad an. 1548). In Naples like in Rome, the government took advantage of the pope's advantage, and set up that tribunal in Naples, after the same form in which it had long been established in Spain.

The people rose in arms, and although Rome would have been only too glad to see this formidable tribunal established in Naples, yet, rather than forego the introduction of an inquisitorial tribunal altogether, she took the part of the people against the government, and encouraged them in their opposition by telling them that they had reason for their fears, because the Spanish Inquisition (see below) was extremely severe. Here it may be well to quote M. Crie (Ref. in Italy, p. 235 sq.) on the truth of this assertion, which many have repeated, as well as Roman Catholic writers have not failed to repeat and urge in favor of the tendency to mercy at Rome. Says M. Crie: "Both the statement of the fact and the reasons by which it is usually accounted for required a word. One of these reasons is the policy with which the Italians, including the popes, have always consulted their pecuniary interests, to which they postponed every other consideration. (Compare the opposition of the papacy to the Inquisition as a state institution in Portugal, below.) The second reason is that the popes, being temporal princes in the States of the Church, had no occasion to employ the Inquisition to undermine the rights of the secular authorities in them, as in other countries. This is unquestionably true; and it accounts for the fact that the court of the Inquisition, long after its operations had been suspended in Italy, remained in Rome, nor was it only supported by inquisition. In Spain, but at the time of which I write, and during the remainder of the 16th century, it was in full and constant operation, and the popes found that it enabled them to accomplish what would have baffled the attempt to exterminate heresies. The chief difference between the Italian and Spanish Inquisitions at this period consisted in their respective lines of policy as to the mode of punishment. The latter sought to inspire terror by the solemn spectacle of a public act of justice, in which the scaffold was crowded with criminals. . . The former were as free (e.g., V. M. de' Lollido) as ever at once over Europe; the executions of Rome made less noise in the city, because they were less splendid as well as more frequent, and the rumor of them died away before it could reach the ear of foreigners. But all that Rome could accomplish in Naples, in spite of her cunning, was the establishment of an independent Inquisition, such as Venice had permitted. In Sicily, on the contrary, the government had suffered for the inquisition, and, though abolished for a time, the office was restored in 1782, and remained in force until Napoleon, as king of Italy, did away with it throughout the realm in 1806. The fall of Napoleon, of course, at once enabled the papal see to re-establish the Inquisition, but, being a foreigner, though he should abolish the Inquisition, he did not extend its power, and it did not spread far, and meet with great opposition. In Sardinia, where Gregory XVI restored it in 1833, it was not discontinued until the Revolution of 1848 again did away with it. "In Tuscany it was arranged that three commissioners, elected by the congregation of Rome, along with the local inquisitor, should inquire in all causes of religion, and intimate their sentence to the duke, who was bound to carry it into execution. In addition, it (the Holy Office) was continually soliciting the local authorities to send such as were accused, especially if they were heretics or strangers, to be tried by the Inquisition at Rome." Everywhere within the territory persecution was let loose. Especially during the political reactions of 1849 the inquisitorial tribunal was perhaps nowhere so active and so severe in its dealings as in Tuscany (compare Ranke, History of the Popes, i. 357). In fact, it was a means of subordinating the country to the will of the Inquisition, and by the Inquisition, to the will of the pope. The country got rid of this great curse, from which all Italy suffered; and "popish historians" certainly "do more homage to truth than credit to their cause when they say that the erection of the Inquisition was the salvation of the Catholic Church. . . ." The Inquisition, in fact, does not verify itself in our own days, though the tribunal of the Inquisition still exists at Rome, under the direction of a congregation, and though the last ecumenical council, which the landless pope, Pius IX, has just declared adjourned sine die, has but lately passed two canons (canon viii and canons xii, xiii, De Ecclesiae Christi) in favor of its action. Its action, by the circumstances of the day, is mainly confined to the examination of books, and to the trial of ecclesiastical offences and questions of Church law, as in the late case of the Jewish boy Mortara; and mere reasonable existence in recent times was an Oriental imitator, who, by means of forged credentials, succeeded in obtaining his ordination as a bishop. The Inquisition was introduced into Poland by pope John XXII in 1237, but it did not subsist there very long; and all attempts of Rome to introduce it into England and Sweden was frustrated.

Spanish Inquisition.—"The life of every devout Spaniard," says Milman (Latin Christianity, v, 239), "was a perpetual crusade. By temperament and by position he was in constant adventurous warfare against the enemies of the Cross: hatred of the Jew, of the Mohammedan, was the banner under which he served; it was the oath of his chivalry: that hatred, in all its intensity, was soon and easily extended to the heretic. No wonder, then, that pope Gregory IX, after the Inquisition had assumed general form in France and Germany, introduced it into Spain, and that it proved to be a plant which took root on a most propitious soil, a feudal institution, which took root at once, and in times attained a magnitude which it never reached in any other country. It was first introduced into Aragon, where, in 1242, the Council of Tarragona gave the instructions which were to be the "oath of office" everywhere as elsewhere by the Dominicans. "Acustomed, in the contempt of the Jesuits, to penetrate into the secrets of conscience, they (the Dominicans) converted to the destruction of the bodies of men all those arts which a false zeal had taught them to employ for the saving of their souls. Inflamed with a passion that was a part of their vocation, the pope Gregory IX and Vidal-lodoli blazed at once over Europe; the executions of Rome made less noise in the city, because they were maxims formed on the grossest deceit and artifice, according to which they sought in every way to ensnare their victims, and by means of false statements, delusive promises, and a tortuous course of examination, to betray them into confessions which proved fatal to their lives and fortunes. To this mental torture was soon after added the physical one, which consisted in kindling a fire under a bed, or a concealment of the names of witnesses" (M'Crie, Ref. in Spain, p. 85 sq.). The arm of persecution was directed with special severity, in the 13th and 14th centuries, against the Albigensians (q. v.), who, from the proximity and political relations of Aragon and Provence, had become a powerful tendency to act on the minds of the populace, the persecutions appear to have been chiefly confined to this unfortunate sect, and there is no evidence that the 'holy office,' notwithstanding papal briefs to that effect, was fully organized in Castle before the reign of Isabella. This was, perhaps, imputable to the paucity of heretics in that kingdom. It cannot, at any rate, be charged to any lukewarmness in its sovereigns, since they, from the time of St. Ferdinand, who heaped the fagots on the blazing pile with his own hands, down to that of John the Second, Isabella's father, who hunted the Saracens, like a leopard among the mountains, had ever evinced a lively zeal for the orthodox faith. Upon the whole, the progress of the Inquisition during the 14th century was steady, and its vigor and energy constantly on the increase. Its jurisdiction the inquisitors succeeded in enlarging, and the numbers of victims which were put to death (q. v.) were celebrated in a number of places, and its victims were not a few. "By the middle of the 15th century the Albigensian heresy had become nearly extirpated by the Inquisition of Aragon, so that this infernal engine might have been suffered to sleep undisturbed from want of sufficient fuel and to keep in motion, when new and ample materials were discovered in the unfortunate race of Israel." The 'new Christians,' or 'converts,' as those who had renounced the faith of their fathers were denominated, were occasionally preferred to high ecclesiastical dignities, which they illustrated by their integrity and learning. They were inrolled with municipal offices in the various cities of Castile; and as their wealth furnished an obvious resource for repairing, by way of marriage, the decayed fortunes of the nobility, there was scarcely a family of rank in the land whose fortunes did not partake more or less of this peculium or other mixture with the one kingdom, governed by Ferdinand and Isabella, towards the close of the 15th century, the Inquisition became general. It was at this time that the inquisitorial tribunal underwent what its friends have honored with the name of a reform; in consequence of which it became a more terrible engine of persecution than before. Under this new form it is usual to speak of the Inquisition, though it may with equal propriety bear the name of the Spanish, as it originated in Spain, and has been confined to that country, including Portugal, and the dominions subject to the two monarchies. The principles of ancient and modern inquisition were radically the same, but they assumed a more malignant form under the latter than under the former. Under the ancient Inquisition the bishops always had a certain degree of control over its proceedings; the law of secrecy was not so rigidly enforced in practice; greater liberty was allowed to the accused on their defence; and in some countries, as in Aragon, in consequence of the civil rights acquired by the people, the inquisitors were restrained from sequestrating the property of those whom they convicted of heresy. But the leading difference between the two institutions consisted in the organization of a secret and independent Inquisition, which, extending over the whole kingdom, was governed by one code of laws, and yielded implicit obedience to one head. The inquisitor general possessed an authority scarcely inferior to that of the king or the pope; by joining with either of them, he proved an overmatch to both; and when his power was concentrated in his own hands, his power was irresistible. The ancient Inquisition was a powerful engine for harassing and rooting out a small body of dissidents; the modern Inquisition stretched its iron arms over a whole nation, upon which it lay like a monstrous incubus, paralyzing its exertions, crushing its energies, and extinguishing every spark of life. It was a sort of national "sense of weakness and terror" (M'Crie, Ref. in Spain, p. 86, 108). Most prominent among those who were active in bringing about this new order of things were the archbishop of Seville, Pedro Gonzalez de Mendoza, the Franciscan (afterwards cardinal) Xyfrezens, and the Dominican prior Torquemada. But to the credit of Isabella be it said, that it was only her zeal for the cause of her Church that led her, when misguided, to commit the unfortunate error; "an error so grave that, like a vein in some noble piece of statuary, it gives a sinister expression to the whole face, and precludes all perfect beauty" (Prescott). Indeed, it was only after repeated importunities of the clergy, particularly of those whom she believed to be sincere as herself in the zeal for the Romish religion, and only these when seconded by the arguments of Ferdinand, who, to his shame be it said, favored the project because he believed it likely to result in filling his coffers by means of confiscations, that she consented to solicit from the pope a bull for the establishment of the "holy office" in Castile. "Sixtus IV, who at that time filled the pontifical chair, easily discerning the sources of wealth and influence which this measure opened to the court of Rome, readily complied with the petition of the sovereigns, and expedited a bull bearing date Nov. 1, 1478, authorizing them to appoint two or three ecclesiastics inquisitors for the detection and suppression of heresy throughout their dominions" (Prescott, i, 246-49). The appointment of the inquisitors was made Sept. 17, 1480, the clergy in confidence with the queen professing to have failed in their attempts to illuminate the benighted Israelites by means of friendly exhortation and a candid exposition of the true principles of Christianity," which Isabella had coun-first of Castle, and afterwards of Aragon. "This man, who concealed more pride under his monastic weeds than might have furnished forth a convent of his order, was one of that class with whom zeal passes for religion, and who testify their zeal by a fiery persecution of those who do not believe as they do. It was their own punishment for their abstinence from sensual indulgence by giving scope to those devilish vices of the heart, pride, bigotry, and intolerance, which are no less opposed to virtue, and are far more extensively mischievous to society" (Prescot, i, 247). Torquemada at once set about his work, apprehended, examined, and executed the inquisitors in different cities of the united kingdom. Over the whole was placed the Council of the Supreme, consisting of the inquisitor general as president, and three counsellors, two of whom were doctors of law. His next employment was the formation of a body of laws for the government of his new tribunal. This appeared in 1494; additions to it followed from time to time; and as a diversity of practice had crept into the subordinate courts, the inquisitor general Valdes in 1561 made a revial of the whole code, which was published in eighty-one articles, and continued, with the exception of a few slight alterations, to be the law to this day. They are substantially as follows: the accused was invited three times edictaliter to appear. If he did not come before the tribunal, he was excommunicated under the form of inquisition, and condemned to pay a fine, under reservation of more severe penalties if he did not come before the tribunal and submit such. Seldom did any one escape, for familiaris, the holy Hermandad, and the Congregation of the Crucified tracked mercilessly all who were denounced to the Inquisition. If the accused appeared before the court he was at once seized, and from that moment all his relations and friends were forbidden to protect him or his outlaw; and he was not even permitted to give proofs of his innocence. The prisoner and his house were now thoroughly searched, especially for papers or books, a list taken of all his possessions, and, in general, his goods sequestered; a once, to provide beforehand for the expenses of his trial. His hair was cut short in recognition more certain in case he should escape, and he was placed in a dark cell. If he confessed his real or imputed sin, he did indeed escape with his life, as his confession was considered a proof of repentance, but he and all his family were dishonored, and became incapable of holding any office. If he seized his innocence, and there was not sufficient proof against him to condemn him, he was liberated, but carefully watched by the familiaris as an object of suspicion, and generally was soon arrested a second time. Now commenced against him the real, slow trial of the Inquisition, and after the first Inquisitio- nis of the grand inquisitor of Aragon, Nicolas Eymericu- cus. When the prisoner refused to acknowledge his fault at the first interrogatory, he was remanded to prison; after many months he was again brought forth, and asked to swear before a crucifix that he would tell the truth. If now he did not confess, he was immediately considered guilty, otherwise he was tried with loading questions until thoroughly bewildered. The defender was not allowed to take his client's part, but only to in- vite him to declare the truth. Witnesses were not named, and their testimony, the truth of which they were required to submit to examination, was not only in- connected fragments, and years after it had been given. Any sort of testimony was admitted. Two witnesses who would only testify of a hearsay were considered equivalent to an eye-witness. The accuser was exam- ined as a witness. Friends and men of the same order were also admitted to testify, but only against the pris- oner, never in his favor. If the accused still persisted in asserting his innocence, he was now tortured by the whip, the water, and fire, under the direction of the in- quisitors and the bishop of the diocese. If the prisoner then confessed what he was tortured to and if he declared his motives, and afterwards a third time, to make him name his accomplices; and when the in- quisitors had obtained from him all they wanted, they left him to his sufferings, without allowing a physician to assist him. After this confession the prisoner was considered penitent, yet recantation was still demanded of him de levi; if heresy or Judaism was his crime, de re- hemen de levi. He was then brought before the Tribunal in forma, which latter included a free assent to all fur- ther punishments the Inquisition might yet see fit to inflict on the penitent. After that he was generally condemned to imprisonment for life, or sent to the gal- leys, his possessions sequestered, and his family dishon- ored. If he persisted, he was at last condemned to the tortures of the Inquisition; he was punished only by having to wear for a certain time the sanbenito (q.v.), a frock without sleeves, with a red cross of St. Andrew before and behind, over a black under- frock (comp. Encojupr, Britam, xii, 390). The penitent (sancenitedo) who laid it aside before the appointed time was considered as unrepenting; but when he com- plished his penance, the sanbenito was hung up in the church with a card bearing his name, and a state- ment of his offence. A relapse was punished by death. When the three degrees of torture failed to elicit a con- fession, the torturer was ordered to put his prisoner in such a fit to speaking that he might, if he could, really speak the truth. If he did not, he was burnt only by having to wear for a certain time the sanbenito (q.v.), a frock without sleeves, with a red cross of St. Andrew before and behind, over a black under- frock (comp. tenure of office (1483-1498) nearly 9000 were condemned to the flames, 6500 were burnt in effigy, and more than 90,000 were subjected to various penalties, besides a still larger number who were reconciled; "a term which must not be misunderstood by the reader to signify anything like a partial or amiable, but rather the imposition of a capital sentence for inferior penalties, as fines, civil incapacity, very generally total confiscation of property, and not unfrequently imprisonment for life" (Presc-cott, Ford, and Isaiah, i, 238; comp also p. 267). His successor, Diego Deza, in eight years (1499-1506), according to the same sources, the total number of the aboul9000 to a similar death.

Under the third general inquisitor, Francis Ximenes de Cisneros (1507-17), 2536 persons were killed, 1358 were burnt in effigy, and 2426 were punished in other ways (Llorente, iv, 292). Not much better are the records of the proceedings of the other successive inquisitors general. McCrie (Reform. in Spain, p. 109) very rightly asserts that cardinal Ximenes, more than any other inquisitor general, contributed towards riveting the chains of political and spiritual despotism of Spain. "Possessed of talents that enabled him to foresee the dire effects which the Inquisition would inevitably produce and the regulations and tribunals or affairs at a time when these effects had decidedly appeared. It was in his power to abolish that execrable tribunal altogether as an insufferable nuisance, or at least to impose such checks upon its procedure as would have rendered it a cause of national shame. Yet he not only allowed himself to be placed at the head of what employed all his influence and address in defeating every attempt to reform its worst and most glaring abuses. . . .
Ximenes had obtained the title of a great man from foreigners as well as natives of Spain. But in spite of the monarchical domination and of his written endorsement of the policy of Philip II, he was convinced that the Inquisition was contrary to the principles of his mind. It is true that the power of the Inquisition was not as great as its influence and extent. It was not only a power against those who openly or secretly adhered to the evangelical principles of the faith, but it was also a terror against all who regarded the institutes of the Church as false, and a means of denunciation, and convened its chief tribunals at Seville and Valladolid. But it also directed its power against such members of its own Church as did not actcept the doctrines of the Council of Trent concerning justification. As, however, they succeeded in entirely prevailing in the Church of Spain, the inquisitors of the 17th century, executions became rarer, and in the latter half of the 17th century the Inquisition abated its rigor, and was active principally in suppressing books and persecuting those who possessed or circulated for-bidden books. Autos da fe were hardly ever heard of,

INQUISITION

and, as a result, the tribunal was less feared; and finally, even Charles III forbade first the execution of capital punishment without royal warrant, and afterwards also set further limits to the power of the Inquisition, preventing it from rendering any final decision without the assent of the king, and also from making any new laws in the course of the executions. The Council of 1770 directed the Inquisition to promote the translation into a convenl for condemning a book against the king's will. In 1770 his minister Aranda circumscribed its power still further by forbidding the imprisonment of any royal subject, unless his guilt was well substantiated; and in 1778 he followed the precedents of the powers of every suit against a graudee, minister, or any other officer in the employ of the king, should always be presented to the sovereign for inspection before judgment could be pronounced: and although it afterwards regained ground for a while, public opinion proved too arresting to it. Even the pope began to restrain the powers, and it was finally abolished in Madrid, Dec. 4, 1808, by an edict of Joseph Napoleon. Llorente calculates that from the time of its introduction into Spain (1481) to that date (1808), the Inquisition had condemned in Spain alone 341,921 persons. Of these, 51,912 persons were burnt alive, 17,650 in effigy, and 291,456 others were punished severely. When Ferdinand V regained the throne of Spain in 1814, one of his first acts was the re-establishment of the Inquisition, but also one of the first acts of the Revolution of 1820 was the destruction of the palace of the Inquisition by the people of Madrid. Yet, after the restoration, the apostolical party continued to demand its re-establishment; an inquisitorial junta was organized in 1825, and the old tribunal finally restored in 1829. The law of July 15, 1854, again suspended the Inquisition, after restoring it in 1853. The Constitution of 1855 expressly declares that no one shall be made to suffer for his faith. Yet in 1857 the Inquisition showed itself still very vigorous in persecu-ing all persons suspected of Protestantism, and all books containing their doctrines. Such as were found with heretical books in their possession, or had read them, were severely punished. The great political changes which the last few years have wrought on all the civizized world have not been without marked effects on Spain, and have removed not only in a measure, but, we hope, altogether, the deplorable effects of the Romish spirit of insolence and intolerance. The Romish Inquisition, praised, preached, and imperatively enjoined as one of the highest of Christian virtues by the antichristian see of Rome. Indeed the Inquisition, not only in Rome, but in every land, the papacy considered its masterpiece, "the firstrate and most solid support of the power, both spiritual and temporal. Hence it put all things under the feet of its tribunal in the countries subject to its authority. There the most extravagant maxims were held to be incontestable, and the most unfounded pretensions established beyond dispute. Thus the in-falibillity of the popes, their supremacy over the Church, their dominion over the possessions of all the churches in the world, the power to dispose of them as they pleased, their pretended authority over the temporal concerns of sovereigns, the right which they claim of deposing them, of absolving their subjects from the oath of allegiance, and giving away their dominions, are maxims which none dared to doubt in the countries of the Inquisition, much less to contest them, lest they should expose themselves to all the horrors of that detestable tribunal. No wonder that the popes, in return, so warmly supported all its pretensions, and earnestly and incessantly labored to procure for it so extensive an authority. In that it desired, because formulabile ad the very princes by whom it was adopted" (Shoberl, Persecutions of Popery, i. 113 sq.). These assertions, written (in 1844) long before the occurrence of the late so auspicious events, deserve especial consideration, as among the first changes which the downfall of the temporal power of the papacy must Portugal bring is religious freedom all over the world. (Comp. also Guettée: The Papacy [N. Y. 1867, 12mo], Introd. p. 4 sq.)

Portugal.—From Spain the Inquisition was introduced into the different countries over which it held its sway. Thus it was not really introduced into Portugal until its union with Spain was formed in 1578, and only after much opposition. It is true, under king Joan III of Portugal, an effort was made to establish the tribunal against the New-Christians of that country, imitating the Spaniards in this respect, and Henrique, the bishop of Ceuta, a former Franciscan monk and fanatic, even took the law in his own hands and executed five New-Christians, for which he hastened the establishment of the Inquisition. Many reasons swayed in favor to tolerate the Jews in Portugal, and they, of course, were in that country the first against whom the tribunal was intended to direct the bloody work. In 1581 Clement VII was even persuaded to issue a breve (Dec. 17) to introduce the Inquisition, but already, in the year following (Oct. 17, 1582), he revoked this order (comp. Herculean, Origem da Inquisição em Portugal, i, 276 sq. et al.). But when the Inquisition, under Spanish influence, was at last introduced, as in Spain, as a tribunal of the crown, and it is for this reason Roman Catholic writers argue that the see of Rome cannot be held responsible for the horrible deeds that it enacted in these two countries and in their dependencies. It is true, some of the popes protested against the establishment of the Inquisition in Portugal, but only must be remembered that the opposition was directed against it (as in Italy, above) not so much on account of its cruel measures, but because it chose to be independent of Rome. Indeed the popes, feeling their power insufficient to enforce, excelled, found themselves compelled, from motives of patience, to tolerate what they could not suppress; i.e. unable to establish the Inquisition under their own immediate control, with the benefits accruing therefrom all flowing into their own treasury, they yielded to a state tribunal, that gave them at least a part in the proceedings, as well as a part of the spoils. The highest tribunal of the Portuguese Inquisition was, of course, at Lisbon, the capital of the country, and the appointment of the grand inquisitor at the pleasure of the king, nominally also subject to the approval of the pope. When, finally, Portugal became again independent under the duke of Braganza, John IV (1640), an effort was made by the Royalists to abolish the Inquisition, and to deprive it of the right of sequestration. But John IV found too strong an opposition in the priesthood, especially in the ever-plotting Jesuits, and he was prevented from executing his intentions successfully. When he was imprisoned under T. Ferreira Braganza, his life was insecure, and his body was only a long time after officially absolved from this, one of the grossest sins a son of Rome could possibly have permitted, the attempt to cleanse his Church from the sin of unrighteousness. In the Inquisition was in its activity and privileges by Pedro II (1706), and a still more decided step was taken by Pombal under his son and successor, Joseph I. The Jesuits were expelled from the country, and the inquisitorial tribunal was commanded by law to communicate to the arrested the accusations presented against him or them, the names of the accusers and witnesses, the right of an attorney to hold communication with the accused, and it was furthermore decreed that the sentence should be executed without the assent of the civil courts. At the same time, the auto da fé was also forbidden. After the fall of Pombal and the death of Joseph I the clergy regained their power for a season, but the spirit of enlightenment had not yet permeated the country, and the interference of the priests, and under king John VI (1818-26), when "the great engine for the coördination of the human mind, if worked with the unscrupulous, impassive resolution of Machiavellianism," could no longer be made to accomplish its purpose, it breathed its last, and the very records of its proceedings were condemned to the flames.

Netherlands.—From Spain the Inquisition was also introduced into the Netherlands as early as the 13th century, and from this time forward exerted in this country, next to Spain, her authority most unscrupulously. Especially the finances of the Inquisition were most important during the Reformation. After a severe edict by Charles V at Worms against the heretics (May 8, 1521), he appointed as inquisitors to the Netherlands his councillor, Franz von der Hulst, and the Carmelite Nicolas of Egmont. They at once set out to do their task, and to inflict the usual penalties on the heretics. But they quickly found special helpmeetings in the regent of the Netherlands, Margaret of Austria, in connection with the bishop of Arras, Granvella. The printing, sale, and possession of heretical books were strictly forbidden, and the magistrates were required, under a penalty of being placed out of office, to be active in discovering heretics, and send a quarterly report of their labors to the regent; the informers to receive a considerable reward for any proof (Rauner's Briefe, i, 164 sq.). Nevertheless, the Reformation spread, and the Inquisition was not even able to prevent the rise of fanatical sects, as the Anabaptists (q.v.), etc. But Charles, determined to uproot the Reformation, issued a new mandate for the organization of the Inquisition after the Spanish form (April 20, 1550) (see Sleidtami Commentarii, ed. chr. car. Am Ende: Frey. ad M. 1785, iii, 203 ; Gerdessi Hist. Reformat. iii, App. 192). Especially acute was its tribunal during the persecutions. Maria, the widowed queen of Hungary, who in secret inclined to the Reformation, was now regent. Deputations of the citizens made her aware of the dangers which threatened her on that account; she went immediately to Germany to Charles, was received favorably in the imperial court, and was even given the mandate in so far that in a new form of it (issued September 25, 1550) the words "Inquisition" and "inquisitors" were omitted. But it was still opposed, and could only be published in Antwerp on the condition of the municipal rights being preserved (Gerdessi, at sup. iii, 216 sq.). That the Inquisition was very active up to this time in the Netherlands is certain; but the accounts that, under Charles V, 50,000, or even 100,000 persons lost their lives by it in that country (Sculleti Amales, p. 87; Grotti Amales et Historie de robe Belgica, Amst. 1658, p. 12), seems to be exaggerated. When the Netherlands were placed under the government of Philip II a more severe policy was initiated, determined, if possible, not to modify the existing heresies, but to extinguish them altogether. The Inquisition was at once set in full motion, and a zeal was manifested by its tribunal worthy of a better cause. As a result the contempt under it for the most sacred of all the inviolable rights of man, the right of the individual to determine his own conscience, has already confined to too narrow limits, and it at last burst forth in all its madness. In 1566, the Antwerp synod was restrained, Antwerp, and Herzogtenbuche united in demanding the abolition of the Inquisition. Their example was imitated, and in February, 1556, a league of the nobility, called the Compromise, was formed, which energetically but humbly made the same request (Schröder, Kirchengesch. iii, 390 sq.). After some delay this was accomplished in 1567. Shortly after, however, the terrible Alba was dispatched to the Netherlands with unlimited power. Margaret was forced to resign the regency, and she retired to the convent of the Gracia Mag. She and those who had become suspected, or whose riches attracted him. Upon the 16th of February, 1568, by a sentence of the holy office, all the inhabitants of the Netherlands were condemned to death as heretics. "From this universal doom only a few persons especially named were excepted. It is said that the number of those who were later, confirmed this decree of the Inquisition, and ordered it to be carried into instant execution. . . . Three millions of people, men, women, and children, were sentenced to the scaffold in three lines" (Motley, Rise of the Dutch Republic, ii, 155). But even with these measures they failed in uprooting the Reformation as a dangerous heresy, and in 1578, when the provinces had almost become a waste, and depopulated by the emigration of hundreds of thousands and the execution of thousands of its most valuable citizens, Philip saw himself under the necessity of recalling the duke. The les-sion that he had taught Spain was insufficient to incline her to moderation. Philip now, as much as ever, was determined to uproot heresy by force, and these further attempts resulted finally in the independence of the northern provinces of the Netherlands, by formidable union which they formed at Utrecht in 1579, which the peace of Westphalia, by the peace of Westphalia, and overturned the Mohammedan empire which had been established for ages in the Peninsula, began to consider themselves as the favorites of Heaven, destined to propagate and defend the true faith, and "thus the glory of the world, which the Jews did not know, in the extinction of heresy." In the New World the Inquisition established its power, especially in Mexico. It was also terribly severe in Carthagena and Lima. By the Portuguese it was taken to East India, and had its chief seat at Goa. Under John Vilh of Portugal it was, after it had undergone several modifications, wholly abolished both in Brazil and East India.

Insacrâtî, the name usually given in the ancient canons to the inferior clergy. The term was commonly called the isqopias, a holy or sacred; the others insacratî, un consecrated. Different ceremonies were observed at their ordination: the higher orders were separated at the altar by the solemn imposition of hands; the others had no imposition of hands. The superior orders ministers as priests, celebrating the sacraments and preaching in the church; the inferior performed some lower or ordinary duties, and generally attended upon the others in their sacred services. FERIOR CLERGY.

Inscriptions carved on stone have in all ages been regarded by cultivated, and sometimes even by rude nations, as the most enduring monuments of memorable events. Thus the early patriarch Job would have his dying profession of faith "graven with iron in the rock forever" (Job xix, 24). Moses inscribed the law upon stones, and set them up permanently in Mt. Ebal (Deut. xxvii, 2-8; Josh. viii, 30). See PRIESTS.
